“Do you have any idea how disheartening it is to come to the conclusion that you might have been right about too much rule following?” Manner’s speaking quietly, keeping the conversation between them as they move through the line at the buffet.

Tim glances over to Manner as he says that. “Do you have any idea how disheartening I find this whole set up? This is…” He shakes his head.

“Vindication of your Cyberbabies. I didn’t…” He’s shaking his head, too. Too old, too stuffy. Manner knows there’s something wrong when he’s the wild card. He sighs and glances over to the DEA table. “They’re getting the cold shoulder tonight.”

“Easier to blame them for the lack of people, I guess.”

Manner rolls his eyes. “They aren’t the problem. Not a big one, anyway. IRS screwed the pooch, big time.”

Tim glances over to their delegation. They’re auditors, not a group known for being especially engaging or lively, but they’re walking wounded these days. Hollow-eyed, nervous, jumpy. They’re getting a lot of the blame. In the legal world, pretty much everyone left at the IRS is facing some sort of investigation, and in the illegal world, people are still lynching IRS agents. One got killed in Tallahassee last week. Add in what happened to the DC branch… Tim figures he’d be walking wounded in that case, too.

Tim watches one of them flinch when someone lays a hand on her shoulder. “Blaming them would be like kicking a sick dog.”

Manner inclines his head at that. “Suppose so.”

It’s another rubber chicken buffet, and Tim is doing his part of having a bit, chatting with the people around him, and… though he didn’t expect it, soaking up a lot of attention.

Unlike Tech In Anti-Terror, where he was just another guy in the room, this is CyberTech in Crime, and he’s THE guy in the room. He’s the example of what you can do with sharp people, good tools, and the ability to do the damn job and say fuck it to the consequences.

Tim’s not sure if that’s a good thing or not, but the last time he had this many people treating him like he was awesome was when he went down to Cybercrime the first time and got to be a rock star because he was a qualified field agent.

Having people come over to talk to him is happening a lot, though. He’s not going to get to slip out of this one within a few minutes of the dessert course. 10:30 is his hard deadline, and he’s fairly sure they’ll want to be talking to him until 10:29:59. But there’s a little guy who’s going to want to eat, and tonight it’s his job to wield the bottle.

There’s a tall man, mostly gray hair, some brown in it, who’s been waiting by the side of Tim’s current conversation. (Chatting with a DEA and ATF representative about the paperwork software. It isn’t flashy or anything, but if you’ve got a set number of people, and you can free up a third of their time by having the computers do the work, you effectively end up with a 33% boost in your manpower.) He doesn’t interrupt, but it’s clear he wants the chance to talk to Tim about something.

So, after he’s talked through what his program does and how it does it, Mr. DEA and Mrs. ATF get the hint and head off, letting the new guy have Tim to himself.

“You’re Tim McGee, right?” he asks, as he offers his hand.

Tim doesn’t recognize the man in front of him, but his name tag says Tom Fenton FBI. (Tim is, just like Tom, wearing a name tag, too.) Tim nods and offers his hand. “I am.”

Fenton smiles. “Good. Tom Fenton, I’ve been waiting for you.” He’s edging Tim toward the bar. “Can I buy you a drink and monopolize a bit of your time.”
Tim shrugs. He’s not feeling wildly politic, and Fenton’s hitting him slightly wrong, though he’s not sure why. “Bar’s open,” he holds up his left hand, which has a sparkling mineral water in it, “and I’ve got a drink, but if you’ve got something interesting to say, you can have my time.”

“Fair enough.” He leads Tim further from the crowd. Private conversation apparently. Once they’re out of earshot of the rest of the Commission, Fenton says, “As I’m sure you know, FBI has jurisdiction over every other Federal organization and many state ones when it comes to public corruption charges. This last few months have shown us that we weren’t nearly active enough on that front, and we’re reorganizing to devote a lot more time and talent to that.”

Tim nods; that is interesting.

“We intend to have a cyber department that does nothing but watchdog every other Federal employee. We want you to run it.”

Tim exhales long and sharp on that. If that’s what he thinks it is… On the inhale he remembers rule eight. Never assume.

“You’ve got my undivided attention. Tell me more.”

Fenton smiles a bit at that. The look of a man who knows he’s holding a royal flush. “One of the laws that’s going through the new Congress is an act that will strip any federal employee, while at work, of his or her privacy rights. Sounds awful, but it means that our people will have no warrant requirements. Means we’ll be able to get cameras on everyone in the field. Means we’ll be able to go in and check out anything they do on the job. No firewalls, nothing to hide behind, if they do it, we get to know.”

Tim exhales long and slow on that, too. He’s got no idea how he feels about a law like that, but he does know that’d make the job a hell of a lot easier.

“There are millions of Federal employees, and this department will have over four hundred people who do nothing but keep an eye on them and their computers. We’ll be setting up a secure whistleblower system, so people can report and not have to fear reprisals, and we will investigate every report. Doesn’t matter who it’s on or how little it might be.”

That sends heady tingles through Tim.

“Who’ll be watching us?”

Fenton smiles at that. He likes the question, and the us even more. “We’ll watch and blind audit each other every year.”

“Why me?”

Fenton sends him a really, you’re gonna ask sort of look at Tim, but Tim wants to hear it. “You’re the poster child for the job we want to do, so we want you in charge of it.”

“The whole whistleblower program, or just the cyber part?”

The look on Fenton’s face makes it clear that he can’t tell if Tim’s negotiating or if he’s asking for clarification. Tim’s not entirely certain, either.

“You’d be the Director of Cyber Corruption.”

“Who would I report to?”
“We don’t have the person picked, yet, but we will have a Director of Public Corruption Investigation.”

For some reason this is making him think of sitting next to Tony, watching the Untouchables on the big screen at MTAC. “New Untouchables.”

“Basically.”

Tim thinks for a moment. He doesn’t know where this is going, not in the long run, but he also knows that right now, he is negotiating, and he knows that this… has potential, to do some serious good, and to take up a TON of time, and… And if he’s doing that, then he’s not working on redoing how Federal Law Enforcement works. So, that would be an issue, maybe, but… Whole department… Except it’s not the whole department, not the way he’s got it with NCIS, and no control over who he’d be reporting to, and that’s the poison pill in any job.

“Okay… Four hundred people?”

Fenton nods.

Tim shakes his head. “That’s a demotion. I’m the next head of NCIS.”

Fenton laughs. Then he shakes his head. “There isn’t going to be a next Director of NCIS.”

A slow smile crosses Tim’s face; he gets the game now. “You’re sure that all of the agencies are going to be combined, and you’re grabbing everyone you can to make sure you guys are the last ones standing.”

“We are going to be the only ones left standing. Have a chat with your grandmother, and you’ll be sure of it, too. ATF, DEA, all of you little military guys, you’ll end up under our umbrella.” He glances over to the IRS side of the room. “They’ll be off on their own, with the rest of the fraud guys, but crime, real crime, we’ll all be under one roof.”

And Tim knows why Leon’s got him here. And he can see that this is… maybe a whole lot of opportunity. And probably the end of a whole lot of opportunities. “The guy who runs your watchdog department, will he be building it from scratch?”

Fenton nods.

“How do you guys feel about… unusual family situations?” Tim figures that if Fenton knows who his grandmother is, he likely knows about the rest of it, but it’s worth asking.

Fenton shrugs. “Do you mean the dust up with your father, or the fact that you and your wife appear to be living with Dr. Palmer’s family?”

“Yes.”

“Your name and reputation for what we hope to do buys more good press than whatever it might be you do at home. So, boyfriend, girlfriend, unusually affectionate pet sheep, we do not care. Keep it discrete, and as long as we can trust you’re un-blackmailable, and given how little effort it took my people to find out what you’re doing, we’re assuming you just don’t care if the wider world knows, we’re good.”

Tim nods, slowly. That tells him how public this office is intended to be. His name has weight inside the government, where whatever he does at home isn’t that big of a deal, but the wider world… They don’t intend to be parading him around. Probably. “Send me the offer, for the head of the whole watchdog department, not just the Cyber side. I’ve got a few plans of my own, and if that fits with them, we’ll talk.”

Fenton doesn’t even blink at that idea. He doesn’t agree to do it, either. He just watches Tim, sips his drink, and then moves on.

Driving home, Tim’s phone buzzes to let him know he’s got an email. At the next stoplight he checks. It’s from Tom Fenton. Tim pulls into the nearest parking lot and gets reading.

It’s a full Director position, at the FBI, with a department of 1000 people, all reporting to him.

Tim McGee, Director of Public Corruption Investigations.

Or, as he’s skimming over it, he gets what he’s being offered. The new version of IA, for the entire Federal Government.

He’s not entirely sure what to do with that, but he does have a pretty good idea of what he needs to do next. Namely, burn a little rubber so he’s home in time to grab Sean’s next feed.

The house is dark when he gets in, but no one is crying, so he’s probably got a moment or two to relax. He creeps upstairs. Three little girls snoozing in one room, check.

One little boy, snoozing in his crib, check.

Three grownups, snoozing in their bed, check.

And all is right at the McGee house.

He pulls off his tie, and creeps to his closet to hang up his tie and jacket. From there, he’s going through his going to bed motions as silently as possible. He doesn’t want to wake anyone up. Partially, because sleep is good, and partially, because he wants some time with his thoughts.

It’s a BIG FUCKING JOB.

Fewer people reporting to him than he’d have if he ran NCIS, but more power, more ability to touch everything, and shaping a department from scratch…

Less of the stuff he wouldn’t like about possibly running NCIS. If that offer is real… And he’d need to find out more… but this might not be a political position. This might be actual work. Less schmoozing and more building systems to catch bad guys and make sure that everyone else can do that, too.

That’s a heady feeling.

It’s not NCIS. It’s giving up his home away from home for somewhere else.

But, if Fenton is right… Giving up NCIS may be a foregone conclusion.

And he does know who’ll have a better idea of that. And, yes, it’s later than he’d usually call, but Penny’s something of a night owl, so…
He’ll text. If she’s asleep, she’ll miss it.

_Hey, you up? Can we talk?

He’s just pulling a t-shirt on when Sean starts to cry. Tim grabs his jammy pants, and then he’s on the job.

---

He’s got himself in his PJs, laying on his side in the guest room bed, Sean lying on his back, head propped on Tim's arm, next to him, nursing away, when his phone rings.

It’s Penny. “Are you okay? We saw that text…”

He supposes that he should have figured a midnight text after today’s news would make her think he was dwelling on Sean’s hearing. “Yeah, we are. This is… actually not about that. Um…” Tim lays out what Fenton had for him, “So, is this BS, selling me a best case scenario or what…”

“The law is real, and it’s going to pass by a huge margin. I don’t know if any of these guys have realized that it will apply to them, too, but none of them want to be seen as being against it. And yes, the FBI will be in charge of enforcing it.”

“So, that’s half of it. How about NCIS, our days really numbered?”

The sound she makes is non-committal. “Reorganization into one operation… They’re talking, a lot, about that. That’s part of why you guys are meeting with each other. Congress will be holding open hearings this summer about what to do. Leon’ll have an invite, so if you want to get a plan to him, that’s the way to go.”

“Got to make sure I’ve got an invite to that, too.”

“Leon’ll be able to bring his own people along. You’ll have an invite if you want to testify. Actually, round about spring they’ll be starting up the trials of the old regime. You’ll be up to testify for that, too. If you’ve got real plans, that’ll be the time to start making friends.”

“Ugh.” What he needs to do if he’s going to sell the computer idea he’s thinking of isn’t anything he enjoys, or thinks he’s particularly good at.

“Would you rather that was the time I started introducing you to friends?”

“Better. I’m not the only one with ideas in that direction. Mine are wider, so… that might be the sort of thing I can sort of plant in someone else’s head and occasionally play with.” He’s quiet after that, thinking about the system in his head, and the kind of work that would be necessary to make it real.

“Do you want a Public Corruption Department?” Penny asks after a moment.

Tim stares through the dark of the room he’s in, at the little glow of the nightlight on the far wall. “I…” He licks his lips. “I’d be better at designing the computer system. But the chance to do that is not a given. This is. And… if everything ends up under the FBI, me being there, at that level, would give me some power to work on the system. Build a basic level for my group, and roll it out wider after… Maybe… I don’t know. Not sure about any of this. If NCIS is going to be around, I might stick with them. I’d be home and comfy and…”

“Bored.”
He sighs a bit at that, too. Since he’s gotten Cybercrime up and working, and since he’s been done with the vote buying scheme, it has been less thrilling than he’d hoped. “Not exactly. But… Building the system to make it work better was more interesting than running it. Right now, pretty much any decent tech guy could do my job. I’m out of the office for, literally, weeks at a time right now, and it’s chugging along fine without me. Someone else could do my job, probably improve on it, too. Editing is easier than creating, but… A new system from scratch… I could do a lot with that.”

“But if you’re at NCIS, you’ve got weekends and nights free…”

“Most of the time. Not sure how that’d work with this. Doesn’t sound like I’d be low on staff, and it’s not like I’d be hunting down murders and kidnappers, so maybe less urgent than what I do now… so… I don’t know, Penny.”

“What are your loves saying?”

“Nothing, yet. I got home after bedtime. You and Sean are the only ones who know about this, and he’s supremely indifferent to this whole thing.”

She laughs a little. “He would be. And how is our boy?”

“Laying on my chest slurping away.”

“No hearing at all?”

“Maybe 10% in his left ear. Our Doc wants us to see Dr. Snyder.”

“Good choice. Unless you want to come up to Philly and see Dr. Harlen at Penn, you won’t do better. And even if you do, you won’t end up much better off. If they suggest surgical correction might be an option, come on up and get a second opinion, otherwise…”

“Close’ll be more important.”

He can feel Penny nodding. “You and Abby okay?”

“Eh… Enough. It… I don’t even have words. It just is. Started teaching the girls to sign today. Molly’s getting it fast.”

“She would. Ducky and I are picking it up, too. Slower. Neither of us have very quick fingers these days. We can see the guy on the video do it, but making our own hands… that’s a bit different.”

“I remember that. Just like any muscle memory, it’ll feel weird until your hands get it down, and then you won’t have to think about it.”

“We’re working on it. It’s getting pretty late.”

“Yeah, I know.”

“I’ll keep my ears open, and keep finding people for you. People to cultivate. Friends who’ll be interested in the sort of computer work you want to do. See if it’s worth trying to hold out for it. Does your offer have a drop dead date on it?”

“Two months out, and thanks for looking.”

“What are you going to say to Leon?”

“Exactly what happened, and what I’m thinking of for the computer stuff, and… And all of it. If NCIS really is about to be swallowed by a new, bigger FBI… He was planning on retiring soon anyway, I mean, not that soon, but... but he’ll want to know what’s going on, see what he can do.”

“Lots of changes coming up.”

“Yeah.” Sean’s coming up dry on his bottle. “Okay. He’s done with his bottle. Time for burp and sleep.”

“Good night, Tim.”

“Night, Penny.”

The last thing Tim does before going to sleep is to send off a text to Leon. You’re right, you wanted me there. Tomorrow morning, my house, eightish. We’ll talk.

He’s almost asleep when I’ll bring the coffee. comes back to him.
Tim doesn’t have Jimmy’s sleep discipline. When his mind gets racing, he has a very difficult time shutting it down.

So, he was able to drop off to sleep about ten minutes before Sean called for more food. At two hours after what should have been his last feed.

It feels like it’s been a long time since: Resolved, little boy weighs enough to not eat every two hours, but it’s actually been… Eighteen hours.

Which means fussing.

Tim gently pats his son, saying, “Go back to sleep. It’s not food time, yet.”

Sean’s having none of that.

By the time ten minutes of wailing has passed, Tim’s awake, Sean’s in a bloody mood, and if a newborn can eat spitefully, he’s slorping down his bottle with murder in his tiny little eyes.

“Not gonna be any faster next time. You’re better off just sleeping.”

Slorp, slorp, slorp.

Tim assumes he’s imagining the glare, because babies don’t glare. Hell, Sean’s so new he doesn’t even have tears when he cries, yet, so glaring is totally out of the question.

But, in that he’s feeding an angry little man, and given that his own restful state has been completely fried by this experience, Tim’s back thinking about the job, and about the FBI and about everything.

He grabs his phone and sends off a text to Fornell. What do you know about Tom Fenton?

Five minutes later, as Tim’s patting Sean’s back and walking him around the room, his phone buzzes. Are you building a goddamned boat, too? Normal people sleep, you know!

That’s why I texted, one beep, done. Don’t want to talk, you roll over and go back to sleep.

I figured you’d know this by now, fathers with teenage daughters CANNOT sleep through a text. FBI Agents can’t sleep through questions about the number two guy in the whole FBI. What and why do you want to know?

Number Two Guy in the FBI answers the ‘can he really do this’ question. Yes, he can.

He any good to work for?

Never met him. He’s above my pay grade by a mile. Why?

He just sent me a job offer.

No response for a good minute before Good one? pops up on Tim’s phone.

Yeah.

He’s got a reputation for being a good guy. Straight shooter, likes rules and follows them, but he’s not big on rules just for the sake of rules. He lays one down, there’ll be a good reason for it. What’s the job?

Director of Public Corruption Investigations. Got any scuttlebutt on that?

There’s a long quiet moment, filled only by Sean’s burp, and Tim getting him resettled down to nurse.

Finally, Oh, yeah, there is. Been hearing whispers for a while. Part of Anti-Corruption would be the IA of the Gods. They were looking at Josh Leven, our Director of IA for the job. The other part is keeping watch on the guys who make the laws, Congress, Senate, Judges. You gonna take it?

Thinking about it. How’s working for the FBI?

I liked it. Suit and tie every day. No visible tattoos and they won’t let you wear the skirt.

We’ll see. Though in that case, Tim couldn’t care less about dress code for him. If he’s getting the people he wants for something like that… Of course, there’s also something to be said for hiring the straightest of the straight arrows for an anti-corruption force. They’ll expect me to live the job, won’t they?

They do if you want to move up the ladder, sounds like you’ll be, what, two rungs from the top?

Something like that. Reporting to Comey.

He’s the head of the FBI.

One rung from the top, and the top of my particular area. Don’t think they plan on putting me in the lineup to go any higher, and I wouldn’t want it. A lot of the rest of this might be upside down and topsy-turvy, but Tim’s sure of that.

Then as long as you get the job done, they won’t care how much you’re actually there. Question is: what’s the job? Leven hasn’t investigated an actual case in probably five years. They might expect you to not be there much at all. Off at conferences, talking to people, making connections. Be a good idea to see if you’re actually supposed to run this thing, or be a figurehead.

That’s something Tim’s wondering about, too. They’re offering a lot of money for a figurehead. Tim’s not sure what figureheads get paid, but he assumes it would be less than someone who does actual work. But maybe he’s got that backwards.

They would. You get to pick your own team?

So they say.

Meet with Comey before you answer. I’ve heard he can be… challenging.

Tim spends a moment remembering saying something similar to Jethro once upon a time. He smiles at that. On a one to Jethro scale, what are we talking?

Good point. Half a Jethro.

Thanks Fornell. Sorry to wake you up.

It happens. You want me to poke around some when I go in tomorrow. See if I can get anything more than rumors?
Sure.

There’s another long quiet period, where Tim makes goofy faces at Sean, and he slowly finishes off his bottle. His eyes are drooping, and Tim’s feeling so damn tired, too, but his mind’s too active to drop off.

Eventually, Saw that text you sent out today. You and Abby holding up okay? pops up.

Yeah. Little guy is in my lap, nursing, right now. Just like any other little guy. He’s okay, just… Different. And we’re okay, too.

Just different. ;)

Tim can’t believe Fornell sent him a smiley face, but… Miracles never cease, apparently. He writes back, Just a bit. He’s slowing down, so it’s burp and back to sleep time.

Good luck on that.

Thanks.

Sean, after his burp and snuggle, lays on the bed and conks out. Tim gently strokes his fingers over Sean’s tummy. “At least you’re a good sleeper. Just got to do it in longer stretches.”

For several moments, Tim lies next to his son, eyes closed, trying to think of sleepy thoughts, but they just aren’t coming.

Too much to think about, too much to process.

What do I want?

Home, family time.

That one’s easy. Stay with NCIS. Do the job. Catch the bad guys, and make the system he’s got run better. No real glory, not anymore. But, except for the occasional all-hands-on-deck, he’d be home by six, and have most of his weekends off.

And when there’s no more NCIS?

If…

When…

He’s got the sinking suspicion that(111,1013),(475,1039) is the correct answer. One of the big complaints about the system is that there’s too much overlap. And, especially with what his guys do, there really isn’t a good reason to have their own investigators. They could become a branch of the FBI, get moved over in one sweep, and piggy back onto the FBI’s support structures, legal, HR, computing systems… Stop paying rent for all of those little three/four men teams scattered around the country, just pop them into the closest FBI building…

Tim can see it happening.

So, when, not if… What happens then? Move into whatever they get folded into. Be another computer guy. Work with and for other computer guys. He won’t be the top of any given heap, because it’ll have been a few years, and all of those positions will be filled. So, maybe he get a shot to make their systems run better, if they pay attention to him. If they haven’t already solidified their plans. If the system can still be changed…

That idea grates on him. Go from being the boy genius to just another computer guy reporting to the gray hairs… It’s making his toes curl, and not in a good way.

What do I want?

He can see it. The system. Put your crime in and the system handles the computer stuff. And he wants to build it.

To build the computer system that makes law enforcement work. That’s it. Really. That’d be his talent. That would be his skills being used to do something that no one else would do as well. That’s what he could do that would really change the world.

He’s not an anti-corruption guy, not any more than any other vaguely honorable person who doesn’t give two shits about kowtowing to the powers that be. He’d do it well. He could run that department, and he could make it sing.

And that’s where Tim hits the wall.

From what he just saw, not kowtowing to the powers that be might be rarer than his computer skills. Everyone in the room with him tonight could build the kind of system he’s thinking about. They might not have all the ideas, but once it’s laid out for them, once they have a blueprint, and they could do it.

Lay the idea out, and some of them would likely do a better job than he would when it comes to just building the thing.

If he explained the idea to Manner, in a month he’d have the whole thing laid out, people assigned to do it, testing procedures in place, all he’d need would be funding and bodies in chairs. He’d do it slower than Tim would, and he’d follow all the rules, and in the end he’d have everything documented so anyone else could use the system, too. Tim’s certain Manner could do it. And he’s certain that’s true of just about everyone else there tonight, as well.

But none of them twigged to the corruption around them. That’s why they were all giving the IRS guys the side-eye. They were eyebrows deep in the shit, and none of them noticed, or if they did, none of them successfully did anything about it. But, it’s not like the rest of the guys in that group were walking around with clean shoes. All of them were touching it in one way or another.

Is there a shortage of brains in this world, or honorable men? Tim fiddles with that idea for a while, and then what everyone was talking about hit him. Can’t find people. Why not? Because these guys are so locked into their rules that they couldn’t figure out how to hire high school students or loosen up their dress codes to make their offices even slightly more appealing to the people they want to hire.

What was he thinking earlier? That these guys would never be top talent because they can’t think outside the box? Something like that.

People who can’t think outside the box, can’t think past following rules and orders. They don’t question what their Boss does, or what his Boss does. They don’t look at what’s happening and see the red flags because they’re being told that’s the way it’s supposed to work.

He sighs long and hard. He’d trust Leon an awfully long way, but he’d also double check. He has double checked. And he’s got the sinking sensation that no one else in that room could say that.

And he’s got the feeling that that’s the answer between what he wants to do, and what he should do.

What does an honorable man owe his boss?

He knows he’s not hiding anything from Leon. He’ll lay it all out for him, but… Does he need to stay? If NCIS is around for three more years, that gets Leon to early retirement. That gets Tim to middle age, middle management, and likely a demotion. If NCIS goes, there won’t be another small federal agency for him to run, or run a department in.

Maybe, maybe if NCIS gets folded into the FBI, maybe, they’d decide to keep them working with Navy and Marine cases, maybe, and maybe, they’d let him run that, as a department of the FBI…

Maybe…

But he knows if he were running the FBI, and he suddenly got jurisdiction over all military personnel cases, that he’d handle them just like all the other cases. A murder is a murder is a murder, so there’s no reason to have a special team just to handle one particular set of them.

The thoughts whiz and blur, not letting him sleep. At 6:08, (two hours and eight minutes,) Sean’s up again. Tim keeps patting him. “Come on, baby, give it a little more. Ten more minutes.”

Sean is again unpleased by this. Abby heads in before the lengthening period is over. She sees Tim sitting on the bed next to Sean, patting his back, bags under his eyes, and she feels the unsettled, frantic energy coming off of him.

“He keep you up all night?”

Tim shakes his head. “I was up all night, but not because of him. Grab my phone, and read the email from Tom Fenton.”

“Okay.” She’s picking up his phone and settling in next to him. Sean’s wailing louder because he can smell Abby, and knows the milk must be near. “Who’s Tom Fenton?”

“According to Fornell, the number two guy at the FBI.”

She kisses Tim and lays her hand on Sean’s back. “Soon baby. Breakfast is up soon. You need to be sleeping longer.” She shifts focus to Tim. “What’s he want with you? Talk about what you did in taking down the vote buying scam?”

Tim smiles at her. “Related to that, but not in the way you’re thinking.” He glances at the clock. “Okay, that’s 2:15. Now you get to get up.” Tim gets Sean cleaned up while Abby reads the email. She’s just about done when Sean’s all cleaned up, so Tim waits for her to finish, while Sean sucks on his finger, which he does not consider an appropriate replacement for a bottle/Abby’s breast.

When she’s done, she looks up at him, eyes wide, and he nods, handing Sean over.

“Wow.”

Tim nods again.

“What…”

Tim’s shaking his head. “I don’t know. I figured we’d all talk about it this morning. Any signs of life from the rest of the crew?”
“I think they’re still hugging the bed for a few more minutes. Awake.” She looks down to Sean. “Hard to sleep through you caterwauling,” and back to Tim, “but not moving yet.”

“Leon’ll be here at eight to talk. Let me get them up, and we can talk, first.”

Jimmy and Breena look awfully cozy. They’re all snuggled in under warm blankets, tangled together. He can tell neither of them is asleep, but those few morning moments of quiet, eyes closed, sleep just an inch away cuddling is awfully sweet, and he wants to get in on it.

Tim strips down, and sneaks under the covers, trying not to let in too much cold air.

“Mmm…” from Breena.

He gently kisses the back of her neck. He snuggles in for a moment, but can’t hold the quiet for much more than that, too much stuff in his mind right now.

Another kiss, and he reaches across her to lay his hand on Jimmy’s stomach. “Need both of you guys awake.” They’ve got about half an hour before the girls get up, and this conversation will be easier without trying to get little girls cleaned up, dressed, and fed, during it.

“Uh uh.” Breena’s eyes close tighter. “Sleeping. You need us sleeping.”

Jimmy nods. “Five more minutes.”

Neither of them had to get up with Sean, but that doesn’t mean they could sleep through his complaining about having to wait to eat.

“The FBI offered me my own department last night.”

That gets eyes opened. Breena rolls over so she’s facing Tim, and Jimmy rolls to his side and props himself up on his elbow for the same reason. “What kind of department?” Breena asks.

“Public Corruption. Be the head of IA for pretty much everyone drawing a government paycheck.”

“What are you thinking?” Jimmy asks.

“That we should get up, head to the other room, and talk with Abby, too.”

As Tim’s getting the other half of their family up, Abby’s fully awake, has read through the whole offer, and her mind is spinning.

First and foremost, leave NCIS? They’ve talked about that, a long time ago, in the sense of maybe doing it if they couldn’t work it with the kids, but… This isn’t leaving to get more family time, this is leaving for… a better (maybe, how could it be better somewhere else? NCIS is better) career.

Everyone shifting around, new jobs, new positions, that was hard enough, but this…

She doesn’t like it. Not one little bit.
Which is when the rational part of her brain kicks in and reminds her that she is married to this man, it’s not like she’ll never see him again if he works somewhere else.

But… that’s NCIS becoming even less home, and more work.

She sighs down at Sean… Thinks of the girls in their beds down the hall… Thinks of Ducky and Penny and Gibbs…

That’s the thing, NCIS isn’t home anymore. Half her family isn’t there all the time. Not anymore… Tim hasn’t been in the office since December. Not that she is, either, but…

Home is here, and Jimmy and Breena’s, and the House. It’s not there, not anymore.

And that feels… wrong.

But wrong or not, it’s true.

The other three head in a minute later. They get settled in the bed, curled around each other, as Sean nurses away, and Tim explains what happened last night.

“So you want it?” Breena asks when he’s done.

He shrugs. “I don’t know. If there’s not going to be an NCIS… If it’s what I think it is…”

“What happens to you if there’s no NCIS?” Breena’s looking at Jimmy and Abby.

Tim opens his hands wide. He doesn’t know.

Jimmy shrugs a bit, too, but… “People’ll still get killed. They’re going to need MEs and lab people. I can’t imagine they’d scrub the buildings and scuttle the whole thing.”

Abby nods along with that. “Might just change the name on the front of the building. It’s the government, they don’t spend tons of money to move people around if they can avoid it.”

“That’s if there’s no NCIS. They may not go there.” But Tim’s voice holds a hint that he’s not believing that.

“What did Penny say?” Abby asks, having a good idea why he might not be buying that.

“They’ll be holding hearings about it in the summer.”

“But the FBI wants your answer by April 1st,” Abby adds.

“Yeah.” He sighs… Anna begins to fuss, and time for uninterrupted conversation is over. “Leon’s coming over at eight. Jethro’s coming over to spend more time with Kelly, you want him to take the girls to daycare, and the four of us can talk with him?”

Breena shakes her head. “We’re slammed today, I need to be in as soon as possible. You talk with him, get more of an idea of what’s coming up.” She stands up, calls out, “Coming, Anna,” and then kisses each of them. Then she pats Tim’s cheek. “You’d do great things with it.”

He exhales. “Yeah, I would.”
She kisses his forehead again. “That’s the answer then, isn’t it?”

Abby, Tim, and Jimmy share a look. It’s not that cut and dried for them, because they do work together. NCIS is tied into their marriage and lives together and their web of interconnections in a way it isn’t for her.

But, of course, she’s also right, too. If doing the right thing matters… If he could do more with it than what he’s got now…

Tim sighs, and Jimmy and Abby get it.

And then it doesn’t much matter, because it’s morning, and it’s time to get ready to deal with the day ahead.

Jimmy sends a note to Allan. Got a meeting this morning, not sure when I’ll be in. Let me know if we get a case, okay?

He’s tying his tie when he gets back. *Sure. Big enough deal to be late for work, not so big as to miss actual *work.

That’s about the size of it. I’ll let you in on what I learn. It’ll end up effecting you, too.

Mysterious.

Jimmy smiles wryly at his phone. Yeah. See you this morning.

Leon’s not sure who exactly he’ll be chatting with as he pulls up to the McGee house. He’s not sure how the domestic situation works there, and if he’s about to head into Tim’s office and talk with just him, or if, since whatever he’s learned may effect three quarters of them, if it’ll be the McPalmers, or if the whole of Clan Gibbs will be there for this.

As a result, he’s got five coffees, a dozen donuts, and a selection of muffins and cookies.

He’s thinking he’s got his bases covered, until he remembers that everything he’s got, besides the coffee, is filled with sugar, and he might be having a meeting with a diabetic.

He sighs and gets out of the car, juggling everything.

There’s one car he doesn’t recognize in the driveway. The car next to it, he knows is Dr. Palmer’s. Gibbs’ truck is in front of his. So, that gives him some idea of the guest list. Most of the clan, but not necessarily everyone.

Leon doesn’t have free hands to knock, so he kicks the door a few times, and in a moment, Gibbs, with Kelly in his arms, opens the door. “Morning, Leon. They’re all at the kitchen table.”

“You not sticking around?” He notices that there’s a young woman tucking diapers into a diaper bag in the foyer just behind the door.

Gibbs shakes his head. “I’ll get the highlights.” He kisses Kelly’s cheek. “We’ve got a date I can’t miss.”
“Mall!”

“Yep, going to the Mall.” Gibb signs mall to Kelly.

“Playground!”

He signs playground as he says, “Exactly.” Heather hands over the stocked diaper bag. “Have you met Heather?”

By this point, Tim’s also in the foyer, relieving Leon of snacks. Leon’s shaking his head, and getting introduced by Gibbs. A moment later, Gibbs, Kelly, and Heather have headed out to amuse the toddler, and Leon’s being herded into the kitchen, where Jimmy and Abby are finishing up breakfast.

Tim hands coffee over to Jimmy, and looks up from the cups, asking, “Any of them decaf?”

Leon shakes his head.

“Too many hours until sleep.” He grabs one of them, and hands another one to Leon as Jimmy gets up to grab milk, cream, and sugar.

“Oh, Leon! You read my mind!” Abby says, very pleased to see the donuts. And he’s pleased to see at least someone’s interested in eating them. Tim and Jimmy appear to be sticking with the coffee. Tim’s sipping his like it’s life in a cup, and Jimmy’s got a hand on his back with a don’t overdo it look on his face. Tim nods, and slows down on how fast he’s drinking.

“How are you doing?” Leon asks Abby, getting up to date and through the pleasantries as he’s watching the three of them... be married, he supposes.

They’re just about settled down and ready to talk when Sean starts to fuss.

Abby sighs. “Two fifteen.”

“Better than yesterday,” Tim replies.

“I’ll go see if I can get him down to two thirty. Back in a bit. You get Leon up to date. Hold off on the decision making part until I’m back, okay?”

“No problem.”

Abby kisses Tim on the way up, pets Jimmy, snags another donut, and smiles at Leon.

Tim smiles at Leon, too, though the look in his eyes is tired and buzzing, not happy. He explains that bit of conversation he and Abby just had. “We’re trying to get him to three hours between feeds. So, each time, we’re holding off another ten minutes. She’ll be down again soon… and…” He makes sure everyone’s got a drink and food, and then moves them into the living room. “More comfortable nursing environment for when they’re down here.”

Leon handles this with somewhat strained patience. He’s lived this. Sort of. When his kids were babies, he took three days off, and that was it. Jackie and her mom took care of most of the baby stuff, and if someone had wanted to talk to him, he certainly wouldn’t have done it with her in the room, let alone nursing.

Of course, if someone had wanted to talk to him about work, at home, with a new baby, he also wouldn’t have been married to someone who was actively involved in said work.

And then he’s done musing, because Tim’s explaining what happened the night before.
Leon’s nodding along, actually feeling a bit relieved because wanting new/better tools and a better pool of talent isn’t anything he’d consider threatening. The whispers he’s been hearing, where the computer guys all head off to do their own stuff, that’s been making him sweat.

Then Tim gets to Tom Fenton, and as soon as Leon hears the name he knows this is about to take a turn he doesn’t want to hear.

Tim lays it out calmly, the job offer, the end of NCIS, the reorganization of everything, and it’s not that Leon hasn’t heard those rumors, too, but… He’d been hoping they weren’t going to get any traction on that, but…

But…

If the FBI’s certain enough to start laying out the money to rebuild, that doesn’t bode well for the rest of them. Change and the FBI don’t exactly go hand in hand, and if they’re moving, it means they know something the rest of them don’t. They don’t reorganize on the basis of rumor.

They don’t reorganize fast, either. They’ve gotten the heads up a few years in advance to make sure they’re ready to go when the changes go through.

Leon sighs. He knew about the Public Corruption Investigations position, because a week ago Fenton popped over to have a chat with him about it. Fenton didn’t mention the idea of no more NCIS, probably because, for Leon, it wouldn’t much matter. If NCIS goes, he’ll be offered early retirement or a decent position somewhere. They won’t just boot him out.

Leon turned him down. Running a department for the FBI, even one along those lines, would be a step down for him. He wonders idly if Abbi got the same offer, and also turned it down, or if having talked to him, they decided she’d have a similar reaction. Or if they decided having a functional CGIS to absorb was more important than asking her about the Public Corruption Investigation Directorship.

McGee’s talking about his grandmother, saying they’ll be having hearings about it, and Leon’s nodding. That’s not the sort of thing that would happen without some sort of Congressional oversight. Granted, he’s not sure if this is real oversight, or if this is something to make it look like the rest of the country had some input just to make sure the change flows more smoothly.

When Tim wraps up, Leon says, “I’d rather they were talking about splitting you guys off.”

Tim doesn’t disagree with that. Splitting off it more or less what he’s kind of interested in doing. Having NCIS cease to exist isn’t.

Abby’s still not down with Sean, so Tim decides to get into the splitting the computer guys off part of it. If he’s going to take all Friday afternoon to talk about that, Leon deserves a heads up before it happens. “They… The rest of the conference… They were mostly talking about not having the right tools or people. And, they aren’t exactly wrong. We’re low on man power and we don’t have the cutting edge tools. And… I’m the one who’s going to talk about us splitting off, but not exactly in the way you’re thinking about it.”

Leon doesn’t look thrilled at that, but at this point, he’s figured that if McGee’s coming up with something more or less directly opposed to what he wants, he’ll have a good reason for it. Also, it’s painfully obvious that Tim has way too many ideas in his head right now, and if he wants to get to the bottom of all of this, he needs to just let McGee go, rather than trying to get him to focus down on Are you leaving me?
Tim says, “You’ve got to remember there’s cybercrime: crimes committed with the use of a computer, and then there’s computer tech: solving crimes with the use of a computer. And, really, there isn’t a huge reason for us to have the one.” Tim shrugs a bit. “Most places are big enough to not have both wrapped into one department. Cybercrime, that’s… maybe twenty-five percent of what we do. Maybe… five percent of what NCIS does. And if they’re all off on their own… That might be better off… Maybe… The rest of it is solving crimes with computers, and that’s vital to keep in house.”

Jimmy inclines his head a bit, and Tim nods. Jimmy, of course, already knows what Tim’s thinking on that, and he’s reminding Tim that he doesn’t have enough qualifiers on that statement. “Sort of… Here’s what I’m going to be proposing on Friday. It'll be moot if we all end up on one team… Sort of…”

“Sort of?” Jimmy asks.

“I want to build it for everyone to use, so the Local LEOs would still need it, and that wouldn’t be useless.”

Jimmy nods, and Leon wishes that they’d go back about six steps so he could catch up with them. “What are you going to be—“

Abby heads down with Sean, who has calmed down a bit on the fussing.

There’s another round interruptions that go with saying hi to the new baby. Leon’s not gritting his teeth, but only by supreme force of will.

Finally, Abby’s on the sofa, next to Tim, who’s got his arm around her, as Sean has second breakfast, and Tim says, “Thanks for being patient, here’s Friday’s plan…”

“What I’m going to suggest is one system for using computers to solve crimes. Cybercrime, in the sense of hackers hunting other hackers, that’s its own thing. I want to propose the ultimate crime database. I want a system where every bit of evidence, every lead, every person we talk to, all of, gets fed in, and it’s constantly taking that data, making connections, spitting them back out at us, and shifting who owns the case to whomever has the most relevant experience…”

Leon’s just staring at Tim, not sure what he’s thinking of that.

“Okay. Dead body on the street. The Local LEOs do their bit, and give us a call. We do our bit, and if the finger prints pop up something else, then we call in other people and get into a turf war. We settle that, and feed more data into the computer, say we’ve got a bullet casing, so we run that, and connect to other guns, and maybe we get into another turf war if the shooter’s been involved in something else. Say we’ve got a hair, so we run that, too, and more turf wars if it comes up to someone else with a record, and each level we end up fighting with each other department that overlaps to get their information out of them, and if the Local LEOs are involved, we don’t even know if they’ve bothered to put their information in, and it’s a mess.

“ar system, everything, every time, in it goes. And it’s one system, so we’re not juggling AFIS for prints, and facial recognition for another, and bullets for another, each with their own rules and log ins and systems, and on and on. Everything goes into one system. Our cases, Local LEOs, the entire rest of the Feds, all of them. So, say, I’m checking phone records. I run the numbers like I always do. While I do that, the system will tell me anyone else who is checking the same numbers. The system will tell me when the email address I’m looking at has been looked at before, by whom, and why. I talk to someone, and I’ll know who else has talked to him, and what he said. I won’t end up with a situation where I end up in a turf war, because all of the data is there.
“And because all the data is there, if I’m looking at a phone number, I can see there’s a cop in Peoria who’s checking into the guy my guy is calling, and we can get together and solve the damn thing that much faster.

“We’ll work it so it’s on our phones/computers. Say, a local LEO pulls a guy over. He puts the license plate into his computer, and right now all it comes back with is open warrants. With this system, it comes back with everything, including instructions on what to do with the guy. No more run a BOLO, as soon as someone goes into the system, they’ll hit an automatic BOLO. Stuff like that.”

Leon can tell that Jimmy and Abby have heard of versions of this before. And he knows that Tim’s been in this game long enough to know that what he’s talking about is illegal on a few levels, expensive as hell, and would require more manpower than NCIS could bring to the table.

But, everything is shifting, and if there was ever a time something like that could be built…

Leon nods slowly. He can think of, off the top of his head, at least five cases where they were behind the eight ball when some little detail popped up out of nowhere, and finally let them know that there were other cases intersecting with their case, as well. “If you could get it done…”

Tim nods. “Yeah. If. Most of what our cyber department does would be outsourced… Most of what everyone’s cyber department does would be outsourced. So, that’s what I’m going to get up and suggest on Friday. Or… maybe not outsourced so much as run like we do it at NCIS. Pop your case in, and the magic information fairies take care of it, and then everything pops up on your computer, and even a complete computer novice has everything he wants pop up in a few hours.”

“And if we’re all under one umbrella in a few years…” Leon can see where this goes.

Tim nods. “That’s the question, isn’t it? Are you getting anything…”

Leon shakes his head. “Not on that. The rumors I was hearing was a new Department of Cyber Technology that would handle most of what you’re talking about.”

“And your concern is that if it gets sent off site, it’ll be slow, clunky, unresponsive, and the big guys would get the first dibs on talent and time.”

Leon nods.

“If I build it, or design it, or just have oversight on the basic idea, it’ll triage, and it won’t care who puts the job up, just what the job is.”

Leon’s look is very elegant. They all know that the little agencies have to scramble for money, attention, tools, and people. And, even when they don’t, AFIS for example, can take anywhere from hours to weeks to return an ID, and that’s just fingerprints. Of course, if they’re all one agency… But even if they are, people will still have agendas and plans within plans.

Tim sighs. “Yeah…”

Abby strokes his knee. “That leads into your new job offer, doesn’t it? If you were doing that, playing favorites and cutting resources to smaller groups would be something you’d keep eyes on, right?”

Tim nods. It probably would be. Then he’s looking at Leon, asking with his eyes what Leon thinks about this.
“I’d rather you were working for me.”

Tim inclines his head. If he’s going to have a Boss, he’d rather it was Leon, too.

“It’s a better opportunity than anything I can offer you.”

Tim sighs. “If they gave it to you, would you take it?”

Leon sighs. “They did offer it to me. Not... not the level they gave it to you. I didn’t push. They didn’t send me a formal offer. Fenton came over to ‘have a chat’ with me. He didn’t hit me with the idea that there wouldn’t be an NCIS in a few years, just that I had capable seconds-in-command to take over my job, and that they needed someone who wouldn’t flinch when it came to going after the big guys.”

“Oh.” Tim’s not surprised he wasn’t the first guy they went to. But they didn’t expect to offer him the job they did, either. “What did you say to him?” Tim asks.

“That I was happy where I was, and perfectly capable of going after the big guys from here.”

Tim’s not sure what to do with that. He’s thinking of his job prospects, but Jimmy and Abby are thinking for theirs as well, and they both notice what Leon said.

“So, he didn’t mention anything to you about everyone under one agency?” Jimmy asks.

“He didn’t. Either he’s improving his negotiating position with McGee, or he knew that I’m in a position where NCIS being swept into something else won’t affect me too much. Depending on when it happens, they’ll put me out to pasture, or offer me something equally interesting. Diplomatic position, suggest I run for Congress, cushy advisory position with the Navy, something.”

“And Penny doesn’t know that it’s coming up?” Abby says.

“She tells me they’re going to run hearings. But she does know the law that’ll put the new Public Corruption Investigation office into play will pass.” Tim sighs at that one, too. “There’s something. I don’t know what’s in that thing, but we might not want to stick around after it passes. He said something about stripping all federal employees of their privacy rights while at work.”

“Isn’t that already true? There was something in our contract about anything we did on the NCIS computers, in the building, in the cars, and on and on, you guys got to know about,” Jimmy says. He remembered reading that when he signed up with NCIS.

Leon nods. “That’s true. It’s also, already, technically illegal to conduct work on your personal computers and phones to try to get around that, too. I think what’s changing is that they’re actually going to try to enforce it.” Leon sips his coffee. “What are you going to do?”

“Learn more.” Tim taps his cup, and rests his head on Abby’s shoulder for a moment. Then he looks up at Leon. “I’d like to run NCIS Cybercrime, and the build that computer system.”

Leon nods.

“But, as has been pointed out to me, I can probably do more good running the Corruption Department.”

Leon nods at that, too. He can see that Tim would be good at something like that. And, if he weren’t so unhappy at the idea of losing him, and more unhappy at the idea of losing NCIS, he’d be amused at the idea of seeing McGee fitting into the FBI.
“Assuming the job is what I think it is. So, learn more. Find out what they actually expect me to do. See what I can find out about NCIS’ future. They don’t expect an answer until April, and I can easily ask for 60 or 90 days notice. I’d be with you until at least June. Get through the hearings,”

“Even if we all stay different agencies, you’d still have the office, right?” Abby asks.

“I think so.”

Leon nods slowly. “You go, no poaching. As long as there’s an NCIS, I keep your teams.”

“Fair enough.” Tim glances at the clock. Nine. Time for him to get moving if he’s going to be at the Commission meeting to get more intel and do his job.

“It’s time for you to go, right?” Leon says.

Tim nods. “And you and Jimmy, too.”

On the way to NCIS, Leon starts thinking through who he knows in the next Congress. Probably… About 100 of them. Which would have been a big deal, back in September, but is now just a drop in the bucket.

Still, time to get talking, see what’s going on.

Time to decide what to do about that. Fight to keep NCIS NCIS, or see how to get all of Federal Law Enforcement into on bucket.

He thinks about Tim’s big plans for computers, and realizes that right now is the time to think about everything that’s ever bugged him about Federal Law Enforcement, and come up with the change.

If he were to start from scratch, and design the perfect law enforcement agency, how would it look?

He makes a note to have his secretary give Fenton a call. Time to start thinking big, though big might in fact be little. (Part of him is liking the idea of small, mobile teams, lots of them, who all use the same back up resources, but are able to be everywhere, fast and nimble… Sort of like the anti-crime equivalent of Navy SEALS…) If they are going to redo this from the ground up, he wants in on it.

Tim’s getting his laptop packed up. Just about time to go.

“Sorry we didn’t really get into the stuff that’ll effect you,” he says to Jimmy and Abby.

“Can’t get into what you don’t yet know,” Jimmy replies. Though both of them can see Abby’s unsettled.

She shakes her head. She wants the answers now, but she can’t expect them to just appear out of thin air. There probably aren’t answers to pull out of the air, yet, either.

Abby gives them a limp smile. “Always the private sector. I still get four or five offers a year.”

Jimmy nods at that. He’s got an open offer to work in the private sector with his favorite person on earth. Hell, if he ever takes that offer up, her dad might, finally, retire.
And all three of them can feel the tension, and ache, of not knowing what comes next.

Not enough of the good stuff. Not enough people. Not enough money to get the good people and equipment…

Tim’s heard it all before and lived it.

He’s trying to pay attention to the discussions of what equipment they want. On any other day, this would be interesting, because they’re talking about all the latest toys and what they want to do to super charge them.

It’s a tech guy’s wet dream. All the goodies and all the things to do with them.

But, his inner tech guy has been sent to the back of the brain, and career guy is in charge right now.

So, he’s half-heartedly taking notes.

An email pops up from Penny, only a few words and an attachment. Here’s the law.

He doesn’t have the time or attention to read it verbatim, but the quick scan he sees makes him wonder if he wants to be a Federal Employee after this thing passes.

Basically, it’ll give the FBI the right to ransack anything he does at work/during work hours. Supposedly, at home and on his private computer, they’ll still need a warrant, but anything done on the clock/with the Fed’s equipment/in one of their buildings/vehicles is on record, and they’ve got a big appropriation to pay for the tech to keep eyes on everyone, and the storage to keep what they record.

He’s pretty sure, that were he to be investigating under that law, the first thing he’d be doing is looking for off-the-books meetings. Congressman A and Lobbyist B meet up for lunch with no phone calls, no appointments on the books, no emails on their official calendars… Time to get a warrant.

He knows they say sunshine is the best disinfectant, but right now he’s thinking this might be the equivalent of sitting on the sunny side of Mercury.

Then again, he saw what they did with those privacy rights…

Maybe it’s more like chemo. Yeah, it sucks, but the disease it’s curing is worse.

He sends Penny a text back. Thanks. You’re sure it’ll pass?

Probably with 85% approval. The only guys voting against it are the guys pointing out that it’ll basically allow for continuous monitoring of the military 24-7, and that those guys should have some privacy during their off hours, even if they are living on base. If it gets amended to cover that between the Congress and Senate bills, they’ll probably pull for it, too.

Tim nods at his phone.

He rereads Fenton’s email. It’s got a general description of the job, the pay scale, his responsibilities, who he’d be reporting to, but there’s a lot of vagueness in those words. (Like, what exactly is, ‘promoting the effectiveness of anti-corruption actions’? Anti-corruption stings? Making what they currently do more effective? Going around and talking to the press about how great they’ll be at kicking corruption’s butt?)

He thinks for a few more minutes.

If they want him to do this, then they’re going to get him.

Tom,

Set a meeting between you, me, and Comey. I’m free before 10:00 every day for the next two weeks. We’ll talk details.

Tim
Tuesday night means it’s Breena’s turn on Sean duty.

It’s been a long day. “Slammed” just began to cover what was in store for the day. They’d had a pretty full schedule set for today when they got the call mid-afternoon yesterday. Car accident, three people, Jewish ceremony.

Mother, father, and little boy. Those cases are nasty to begin with, and the extra time pressure brought by a Jewish ceremony makes things tighter. But… They had the evening viewing time free, and one of Jeannie’s rules is that if they can help, they do. In the thirty years she’s run the front of the house, she’s never turned someone away if they’ve had the room free.

So, they did.

But that meant working fast, and two hours later than she usually does.

Which means Breena’s not in the mood for too much fooling around from Sean, who is looking up at her with those big murky blue eyes, crying his little head off, because it’s been two hours and twenty minutes and he wants food.

“Okay, little man!” Breena picks up Sean, one hand under his bum and the other behind his head, and has him looking her right in the eye. “Now, you listen… Shit…” She rearranges him so his face is pressed to her chest just below her throat. “Okay, you…” She know this is just rumbles to him, but, she’s in Mama laying down the law mode, so it’s time for little boy to… listen up? feel up? pay attention… that’ll do. “Pay attention! Now, we’re done with this waking up every two hours looking for a snack stuff. You are not a preemie, and you do not need to eat every two hours. And yes, we love the fact that you’re a little social butterfly looking for love and attention all the time, but that sort of behavior is for daytime. Right now, during these dark hours, you’re supposed to be sleeping. And you’re supposed to be doing it for three hours at a stretch.”

Sean responds by fussing at her.

“Nope. You’re getting out of this pattern of waking up every two hours at night. So now, you’re going back in the crib, and you’re snoozing for another hour.”

More fussing.

“Yeah, Mama and Daddy are taking it easy on you, edging things up by ten minutes at a time. Uh uh. We’ll be at this for weeks. And this is stopping in the next two days.”

More intense fussing.

“I know that sound. You’re not actually hungry, you’re just looking for a suck and cuddle. Back in the crib for you.”

Louder fussing. Breena puts her hand on his tummy and gently, slowly, pats him. She makes sure he’s got the pacifier in his mouth, and settles in for the long wait.

And after ten of the longest minutes ever, Sean does stop crying, and he does fall back to sleep. Sometimes, it’s better not to have mom or dad on the job.
Breena settles into the rocking chair next to his crib, unsure of how many times she’s going to have to put him back down before it’s eating time.

She rocks slow and gentle, remembering doing this with Anna. With Molly they were too fried and too new and ended up with Molly running the show, which didn’t work all that hot.

With Anna, she and Jimmy switched off feeds, and set the clock, and got her trained, which meant they all got more sleep, and everyone was better off.

She drifts off and catches a cat nap before Sean wakes up again, this time at three hours and five minutes out.

He’s gratified to see that she picks him right up, gets him cleaned up, and a bottle into his mouth in less than five minutes.

She watches him sucking away, cuddled in her arms, wrapped in new baby smell, and the soft weight of his little body snug against hers, and wonders if he’s got a little brother or sister in the works. Few more days before they get to find out.

Part of her hopes there is. That glow of a new baby, of one more little guy for their family. Part of her is remembering how sick she gets, and wants more time to enjoy this little guy before she’s tossing her cookies all the time.

Unlike last cycle, she doesn’t have a good sense one way or another this time.

When she shifts Sean around for burp time, she thinks about NCIS, or the lack of NCIS. Whatever direction Tim takes this, and she’s getting a pretty strong Pro-FBI vibe off of him, she knows Tim’s going to be fine.

Jimmy and Abby…

Jimmy’ll be fine, too. He’s easy to work with, and MEs generally run their own teams. If he gets shifted into a new unit, he’ll be just like every other ME, the final authority on whomever is on his table, and that’s that.

And, though she’s not entirely sure about it, she’s thinking he might not mind if he wasn’t in charge of the next department he ends up in. Especially if that next department doesn’t have NCIS’ efficiency when it comes to paperwork and case handling.

Solving the problems were always more interesting to him than managing the morgue. She’s certain he won’t complain if he never has to run an inventory again.

Abby…

The Lab is her second home. For a long time, it was her first home. It’s her nest and safe place. Doesn’t matter how bad the outside gets, there’s always the lab, where the work never changes and the truth is constant and…

And she’s going to have a hard time shifting around.

They haven’t had a good chance to really talk about it, yet. That said, all things considered, ostpartum hormones are no one’s friend when it comes to dealing with upsets, she’s holding up pretty well. But, this weekend, when they’ve all got some quiet time, and hopefully a bit more information…

But how much information can they have about a decision that won’t be made, possibly for years to come? The old government was slow as hell on this sort of thing, and the new one… They don’t even have a president, yet, and it doesn’t look like the new one’ll come out of this next round of voting, either. Still fifty candidates to get through.

Might be two years, might be three…

That’s a long time to not know what’s going to happen.

Breena says a quick prayer for comfort and calm, knowing that it’s out of her hands, and trusting that God knows what He’s doing. She focuses back down at Sean, who’s happily slurping away, and starts quietly humming to him.

---

Tim switches nights with Jimmy, so he’s got Sean duty on Wednesday night, instead of Thursday. He wants to be good and awake for talking to Fenton and Comey, and ready to give his presentation to the rest of the cyber guys.

Right now though, with Sean in his arms, he’s thinking about him.

There are things Tim wonders about his son. Thoughts that never would have occurred to him if those hearing tests had come back normal. Like… how does crying work for him?

He assumes that babies have some sort of understanding of make noise/someone picks them up. Normally, if you don’t go in, they just cry louder and louder, and sure, eventually, after they’re exhausted, eventually they stop crying and fall asleep. But… How does, or would… Sean understand that? Open mouth, breathe hard… someone comes?

How does he think that works? (Assuming babies think… It’s occurring to Tim, as said thoughts are meandering around his head, shortly after one o’clock on his feed night, that he’s tired enough he’s getting oddly philosophical, but he’s okay with it.)

And, after all, Sean is crying. So, he’s reaching out, requesting something. (Though Tim’s damned if he can tell what. He’s fed, he’s got a clean diaper, he’s burped, what he’s fussing over, Tim doesn’t know.) There’s supposed to be a food cry, and a tired cry, and an irritated cry, but all of Sean’s cries sound the same to Tim. (Granted, most of Kelly’s did, too.)

Or… Sean chirps and coos like other babies, but… he won’t do it back. If Tim gets up close to him, face to face, and sticks his tongue out at Sean, Sean’ll do it back, little pink tongue slipping out, just like Daddy, but if he coos at Sean, he just opens his mouth in response. Tim’s tried putting Sean’s little hand on his throat when he coos at him, but that’s just way too obscure of a concept for a baby not yet two weeks old.

He does open his mouth back at Tim, just… no sound.

---

As he’s on circuit 78,029,948 of his house, Tim’s thinking about getting a Fitbit. He’s somewhat idly curious about how many steps a night he’s going through as he’s walking Sean around. Might be nice to know.

He’s thinking about that as Sean’s cries slow down, and Tim begins to creep back upstairs toward the bed they’ve been sharing during feed time.

Sean’s still awake, eyes open but droopy, as Tim lowers him to the bed, hoping he’ll settle down, and that Tim’ll get… shit… forty-five minutes of sleep before it’s time for his next feed.

Although, compared to how they did this last time… He knows he’s getting a full night of sleep tomorrow, and the next night, and the night after that. This isn’t nearly as bad as it was with Kelly.

Somehow that’s cold comfort as he closes his eyes and tries to fall asleep before the seven pound alarm next to him starts to call for more food.

Tim’s not sure what magic Breena did, but Sean is sleeping almost three hours between feeds. He’s only got five minutes of fussing to get him to three hours.

In the blue gray hour of 4:00, Tim unwraps his son, cleans him off, gets him re-clothed and lying on the bed. Then off to wash his hands and make up the bottle. Then back to Sean, “Bottle time, little boy.”

And, of course, Sean doesn’t respond to that, but Kelly never calmed down when he talked to her, either.

Either the food is in his mouth, or it’s not, and if it’s not, it doesn’t matter how close it is or when it’s coming, because it’s not in his mouth.

One he’s got Sean set, his mind wanders. Fornell did get back to him, but didn’t have much in the way of concrete information. There will be a Department of Public Corruption Investigations. It will cover all of the Federal Government. It will have jurisdiction on any state case that’s brought to it, too, though it wouldn’t be able to just go hunting for state cases. It will have not just the power, but also the mission, to poke its nose into any chunk of the US Federal Government it sees fit to investigate.

They’re looking for a thousand people, spread all around the world. One of the differences for this unit would be the ability to investigate overseas, as long as the person being investigated is a member of the US Federal Government or one of the State Governments.

Internal Affairs of the Gods indeed.

Anyone, any case, anywhere.

Just setting up a good system to report those crimes/criminal suspicions and get the investigations started would put Tim squarely on the side of doing a hell of a lot of good. Maybe not solving murders level good, but… Maybe that’s the wrong way to look at it. The people he’d be investigating would be powerful, the kind of people who can go and get other people killed, sent off to die, if nothing else.

He’d be taking them out of the game. That…

That could do a hell of a lot of good.
He fumbles around for his phone and writes a note for himself. Jurisdiction over contractors/providers? There’s a lot his crew could do with that, too. One more note Need full supply of forensic accountants.

By his night on baby duty, Jimmy has come to the conclusion that Sean prefers songs with a seventy to eighty beats per minute range.

Or, pretty much, Abby’s heartbeat.

He doesn’t know how the songs feel to Sean, but, if he’s walking him around, keeping his pace and his voice (Sean’s head pressed to his throat, crown of his head just under his chin) in that range, he’s got the magic.

He can put Sean to sleep like nobody’s business.

Hand him an awake, fussy little dude, and a few choruses, some gentle bouncing, and several circuits around the downstairs, and he’s ready for dreamland.

The other three adults are not amused by the fact that of the four of them, Jimmy’s the only one who isn’t a complete zombie in the morning after his nights on.

He’s attempted to explain the magic, but even showing them the songs and the beat and the patting technique, he’s still the only one who can do it. (Sean especially likes Wonderwall, Ryan Adams, not the original Oasis, which is what Tim ends up with when he tries it. Too fast.)

And he’s not even pretending that that doesn’t tickle him pink.

As much as a newborn can have a favorite, he’s it, and it makes him glow.

Sean’s hand is just big enough to curl around Jimmy’s index finger, and like all little babies he likes to keep his hands in pretty tight fists.

But even more than that, he like’s holding onto something in that little fist.

So, in the dim glow of the nightlight, Jimmy sits up against the headboard of the guest room bed, Sean in the crook of his arm, bottle in one hand, and his index finger clasped in Sean’s hand.

He gently strokes his middle finger over Sean’s hand, as he hums a little, idle thoughts of this and that floating about in his mind.

He’s a bit surprised by how unfazed he is at the idea of NCIS not being NCIS any more. Maybe it’s not real, yet. Getting upset about rumors is never a good idea, and all they have now are rumors. So, maybe that’s why it isn’t hitting. Maybe it’s that he’s fairly certain that he can keep Dr. Allan with him wherever they may go next. No sane person breaks up a fully functioning ME team, especially not one with years of experience. Though… as he thinks about it, by that point Allan may prefer to run his own team, and Jimmy wouldn’t hold that against him.

Sean wriggles a bit in his arm, hand flexing against his fingers.
This is real. The rest of it… vapors of ideas, with no actionable options.

“Because maybe… You’re gonna be the one that saves me… Cause after all… You’re my wonderwall…”

Sean nurses away, looking up at him, as he sings softly in the midnight gloom.

Abby doesn’t have a midnight feed. Not until Monday. She does have the 7:00 feed, which is while the rest of the adults in their family are in bed, getting up, or starting the day and wrangling the other kids.

So, she gets her dim hour with Sean, with a bit more light, the occasional bit of laughter and conversation, small people snuggling in sometimes, and usually, a warm breakfast waiting for her when she’s got him back down again.

Today, as she slips her breast out of the nursing bra, she wonders what her parents would have thought about this. They always loved a good joke, and she can see them thinking that this would have been a fine one, at least, on a cosmic irony scale. The adopted child of deaf parents with a natural born deaf child.

And… she knows her mama always said that children ended up in the families where they belonged. Now, knowing that she’s adopted, that makes a hell of a lot more sense. She supposes that those conversations, about how God makes sure babies end up where they belong and with the people who’ll love them right were about getting her ready to tell her that she was adopted.

But, of course, they never got to have that conversation.

She nestles Sean close, making sure he’s looking her in the eye as he latches on. “You’re in the right place, love. You know that. We’re going to make sure you know that. Every day of your life.”

He just watches her and suckles away.

She starts to think about NCIS, but… Nothing good lies down that road. Tim’s got his meeting with Comey and Fenton today, and then his big talk at the Commission, so hopefully that’ll get them some intel. And they’re at the house for dinner and the weekend, so they’ll get to find out what Ducky and Penny have to say, and she knows that Tony’s been talking to Bishop and Jake, see what they could pick up, but…

But they don’t know. Tim hasn’t made any decisions, yet, and NCIS or not NCIS is still probably at least a year away from any sort of action.

So, she shuts that down, watches her son, and thinks more about her parents.

Penny went looking through the family records, and from what she could dig up, there were, over the course of one hundred and fifty years, three different McGillicuddys (her mother’s maiden name) were deaf.

And from what she’s reading, if this is genetic, and most forms of congenital deafness are, it’ll likely be a recessive gene. So it’s got to be kicking around in Abby’s family tree, too, and right now, she’s curious.

Her adoption records are sealed. She can, obviously, get around that, but as of this point, she hasn’t.

Kyle, who from a young age knew he was adopted, has also never met their parents.

Abby wonders about them, too. Kyle’s five years younger than she is, so they… Stayed together? Had a one off for old time’s sake… Most of the people she knows who were put up for adoption didn’t have parents who stayed together. Usually, parents who stay together keep their kids with them, too…

She rocks Sean, wondering.

She wonders if she has any other brothers or sisters, wonders if they grew up with their parents, or were put up for adoption.

When she learned about Kyle, she ran Luca’s DNA against hers, and they don’t match. On any level. Luca matches the lock of her mother’s hair, which fits her memories of Mama being pregnant. She assumes the other half of the mix has to be Papa.

But, of course, she doesn’t, as a matter of fact, know that. And she’s not willing to do what she has to to find that out.

She is, however, thinking of running her DNA through the databases, see if anyone else comes up. She’s already in the system, had to do that to see if she matched Mama’s hair. It would only take a few strokes of her keyboard when she gets back to find out. For all she knows she may have other brothers, sisters, cousins… family, out there.

Parents. They might be in the system. The answer to who they are and who she comes from. That may be available.

She… probably wouldn’t contact her parents if she found them. They sealed the records, and… For whatever reason they didn’t want to/couldn’t take care of her.

God made sure she landed in the right spot. But… if they did pop up, she’d probably check them out online, see if Jimmy could get their medical records, just… ferret out the information that would be important for her and Kyle to know.

And then… like Tim’s parents, they can just be people who loaned a bit of useful DNA to the cause.

---

Tim pops into the room with Abby, and she looks up from Sean. “Oh, you’re ready to go, aren’t you?” He’s in his full “battle gear” kilt, eyeliner, black nail polish, hair fluffy, boots, dragon tattoo peeking over the edge.

Tim nods at her, and kisses her. “Gotta get going early. I’ll let you know how it goes.”

She pulls him down and kisses him again. “Love you.”

“Me, too.” He pets Sean, and kisses his head, too. And then he’s out the door, and the world swims along, changing every day.
Friday morning. Tim’s up and ready to shift his world.

More than that, if outing the vote buying scheme was him ripping down the old world, today it’s time to start rebuilding a new one.

He’s feeling like he’s in a good place for it, too. Either he’s getting more used to sleeping through Sean’s cries, or Jimmy had a really good night with him, but in addition to getting up and ready for battle, Tim’s decently rested, too.

Abby’s already up with Sean, nursing him. Jimmy’s already in the shower, and Breena’s hugging the bed for another few minutes of sleep.

Tim’s hoping that’s a sign of new baby on the way. He’s got a very strong, ‘baby on board’ feel. But they won’t find that out until tomorrow.

That idea makes him smile. He’s sure. No matter how today goes, tomorrow’s gonna have some pretty sweet news.

But he’s still got to get through today to get there, which means getting in the shower before little girls wake up.

“Gearing up for battle?” Breena asks when he’s out of the bathroom, towel around his hips, sitting in front of Abby’s makeup mirror, putting eyeliner on.

“Yeah. If I’d thought more about it, I’d have put on my nail polish last night.”

She smiles at that idea, pets his hair, and heads into the bathroom to get her morning started.

“You sure adversarial is how you want to do this?” Jimmy asks, once he’s got his glasses on and can see what Tim’s doing.

Tim smudges the black line under his left eye. “Been thinking about that for two days. But, if I’m going to take this, then I’m going to run it, and I don’t want them having any illusions about what they’re getting. They know I can blend in and play nice. They did enough background check to know about you guys, that means they know about Probie McGee and Agent McGee. And now, I want to show them that Director McGee doesn’t have to play by their rules if he doesn’t want to. I want them to know that if they put me in charge of this, I’m going to do it my way, and that exactly zero fucks will be given about if they like it or not.”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow as he pulls his boxer briefs on. Tim can tell he’s wondering if Tim’s torpedoing this intentionally. Tim’s fairly sure he’s not, but the question isn’t out of line.

“I’m protecting my future employees, too. I’ll expect most of them to look like Feds, but I’m also going to want some serious computer talent for this, and they won’t. If they can’t handle me, then they won’t be able to handle them. Good to get that out of the way now, not when I’ve put two years into this thing.”

Jimmy nods, stepping into his pants.
Makeup done, Tim dresses carefully for this meet up. In his most look at me, I'm not the FBI outfit he owns.

He can dress FBI. He owns and wears all of the usual accoutrements on a regular basis, and once upon a time he did the suit and tie thing every single day. Having been introduced to some decent suits, and gotten into fairly good shape, he actually looks good in a suit and tie these days. (It occurs to him, as he’s fastening the belt on his kilt, that part of looking okay in suits now might be that he’s older. He was twenty-five the last time he wore one every day, and that might have had something to do with looking like a kid playing dress up. But that’s another thought for another day.)

And who knows, maybe one day he will wear a suit and tie again, on a regular basis. But it’s not happening today.

So, big black boots, check. Visible tattoos, check. He even swaps his wrist cuff to his right wrist, just to up the number of visible tattoos. That leads into the next bit, visible leather: check. Kilt, of course. T-shirt and sweater, indeed. Eyeliner, lots of it.

He’s going to push them so far out of their comfort zone they won’t know what to do with themselves, and then he’s going to see if they can work with him and take him seriously.

Fornell knows about the meeting, was planning on heading in Friday morning anyway, and thus ended up in charge of making sure that Tim ended up where he was supposed to be.

He’s waiting in front of the FBI headquarters and notices a guy… He sighs. Yeah, McGoth in the skirt decided to show up for this thing. Once he’s in earshot, he say, “God, McGee, are you trying to get tossed out of the building before you even get to the meeting?”

Tim grins at him. “Yes.”

Fornell just stares at him and shakes his head. “You actually want this thing?”

“Depends on how much butt I’ll have to kiss. I intend to make it clear that my current set up is pretty sweet, and that I’m doing them the favor by thinking of taking this up, not the other way around.”

Fornell hasn’t applied for a new job in more than thirty years, but he can’t imagine going into one with that attitude. “You know you’re not the only guy they’re considering for this.”

Tim smiles again. “Yep. But I’m the only one who will walk into a meeting with the Director of the FBI with a middle finger practically tattooed to my forehead. And if I’ll do that for him, what do you think I’ll do for the guys I’m investigating?”

Fornell nods, slowly, at that. Of all of his kids, Tim’s the one he sees the least of Gibbs in, but… Then there’ll be a minute like that, where the pieces fall into place, and he can see the hand of Gibbs shining through. Granted, Gibbs wouldn’t do it in that get up, but, that’s how Gibbs would run IA.

“They let you run this thing, you’re going to be terrifying, aren’t you?”

Tim smiles one last time. Then his grin drops. “So, where are we going?”
Security checks his ID three times, including calling NCIS and asking for confirmation that he wasn’t in the building, and a request for someone to send over a copy of his picture.

As he and Fornell stand in front of the metal detector, waiting for the security guard to get his picture from NCIS, Tim says, “My irises are in the Federal Database, want to run them?”

The guard shakes his head.

“We don’t have a scanner down here, anyway,” Fornell adds.

Tim shrugs a bit.

The guard checks the picture that just came up on his computer, looks up at Tim, looks back down, and then back at Tim and says, “You can go through.”

Tim shakes his head. “I’ll set it off. I’ve got a ton of metal in my arm, hand, and foot.” He shows off the scars on his hand, sticks in into the metal detector, and the unit screams.

The guard sighs, grabs the wand, and slowly gets to it.

As they get through, Fornell says, “You enjoyed that, didn’t you?”

Tim shrugs. “Not exactly. Don’t love metal detectors these days. But, if he’s going to give me crap for how I look, I don’t mind tossing it back by making him get up and do some work.”

Fornell shakes his head. “What happened to you? Where’d that timid, nervous guy go?”

“He’s gone.”

“Yeah. Just remember, when you swagger in there with your big, swinging dick, that if you can do this job better than anyone else, you should do it, and maybe walking a little smaller might help you get this job.”

“If I walk too much smaller, I’m not the guy to do this job.” Fornell leads him to an elevator and pressed the button for the top floor. As the door opens, Tim says, “Look. Part of this is an affect, an image to provoke a response. I want to see what they do with this. Part of this is real, me, when I’m not being timid and nervous. And part of it is if I do this job right, I’ve got to have the balls to walk up to the President of the United States, whoever the hell he ends up being, and tell him that I will dissect his entire life if and when I feel like it. Hell, if I take this job, I need to be able to say that to Comey, too.”

Fornell glances at Tim, watching him. He stares for another second, and then hits the button for the floor they’re going to. “I always figured you were a computer guy.”

“I am a computer guy.”

“No. You’re no more a computer guy than Diane’s an accountant. You’re a cop who uses a computer. It’s not the same thing.”

Tim’s not sure what to do with that, so he says, “Thanks?”

“It’s a compliment.”

“Ah.”
When the doors open, Fornell points Tim down the hall. “Last doors on the left.”

“Thanks, Fornell.”

“No problem. I’ll admit, if you take it, I’ll be amused to see how it goes.”

“You and everyone else.”

Fornell smiles at that. Tim nods, and off he goes.

Comey’s secretary just about swallows her tongue when he walks in. She’s a beat late when he strides over, offers his hand, and says, “Tim McGee, I’ve got an eight o’clock with Director Comey.”

She blinks, hard, and says. “Uh. Yeah. I’ve got you on the books. Can I see your ID?”

He hands it over, and gives her a searching look. “So, the guys downstairs know you think they’re bad at their job?”

She blushes, and doesn’t offer him coffee when she hands the ID back.

He nods and sits down.

When he’s been waiting two minutes, it occurs to him that she also didn’t do anything to let her boss know he’s here. That makes him think he’s in for a wait.

He grabs his back pack, pulls his laptop out of it, asks for the wifi code, gets online, and starts going through his work back at NCIS.

Twenty minutes in, he’s responded to three emails, put out one small fire back at his own job, and decided that he’ll give it ten more minutes. When he’s got an appointment, if he’s running late, he’ll text whoever it is and give them a new ETA or offer to reschedule. He figures that since Comey’s the Director of the FBI, he’ll give him some slack, and wait for him, but only some.

His time is important, too.

Two more emails, and he’s standing up, packing his laptop into his backpack, when the door opens and Fenton comes out. “Tim, good to see you.”

He doesn’t blink at the outfit, doesn’t mention the time, and strides right over to offer his hand.

Tim has the sinking suspicion that they wanted to see what he’d do with a delay.

“Good to see you, too.” He takes Fenton’s hand, shakes, and nods at the door. “Everything ready?”

“Certainly.” Big smile, no explanation for the delay.
When Tim got confirmation that they were going to meet up, he googled Comey, and he’s a somewhat older, more tired looking version of his wiki photo.

Granted, for that matter, so is Tim. (He’s amused to see that he’s got two of them now. One on the vote buying scandal, and another as Thom E. Gemcity. So far, no one has linked the two of them.)

Comey also doesn’t blink at his appearance, which leads him to believe that either A: he’s a hell of a poker player, or B: the reason Tom could walk out the moment he was getting up to leave is that they were watching him.

Tim’s sure that A is true as a matter of general fact. He’s also pretty damn sure about B.

He offers his hand. “Mr. Comey, I’m Tim McGee, nice to meet you.”

“Likewise. I take it you’ve given our proposal some thought.” He ushers Tim and Tom to a conference table, already laid out with muffins, a coffee carafe, orange juice, and a collection of milk, creamer, sugar, and the like. Tim helps himself to a cup of coffee, heavy on the milk.

Tom does likewise, and Comey doesn’t drink anything.

“I’ve given a lot of thought to it. A thousand people, 200 million yearly budget, all of public corruption under my wings, get to build it from the ground up. Yes, I’ve given that a lot of thought. And all of those thoughts rest on a question, what do you expect me to actually do?”

“How do you mean?” Comey seems to be keeping his cards close to his vest.

“Okay. If you want, I will build you a take-no-prisoners public corruption unit. I’ll make a new Untouchables, if that’s what you want. But, I want to make sure that that’s what you want. I’m not going to be a name. I’m not a good political pet. I can handle the meet and greets and schmoozing, but prefer to do real work. And, unless it’s in writing, I’m somewhere between inept and useless at press conferences. That’s not me, and if that’s the job, I don’t want it. Likewise, if you’ve got someone else you want to design this thing, and you just want me to look pretty and rubber stamp it, I’m out of here.”

“Tell me about how you’d build this unit,” Comey says without answering his question.

“Tell me if I’ll be able to build it.”
He sees Comey’s eyes flick over his outfit, wander down his arm to his hands, cupped around the coffee mug, lingering on the three kiss marks visible on the inside of his wrist.

“We offered you the tech portion for your computer skills, and bumped the offer up because of what you did with your own department. That said, in the outside world you’re political poison, so we’ll make sure you don’t get too much attention from the outside world. Your lifestyle is too unconventional for you to be the face of this Department. Part of what we’d expect you to do, though, is to find a face for it.”

Tim nods at that. He can do that. Probably aim for someone a bit older, more stable looking, Gibbs back when they made him the poster boy of NCIS, something like that. Give him some sort of fancy title, ‘Director of Public Affairs,’ or something. Heck, he might actually see if he can find an actor for the job, someone who thrives in saying the right thing, loves to schmooze, and can be trained up on the rest of it. Got to be someone to fit that description.

“I can and will work with that.”

Comey and Fenton look pleased to hear that.

Tim gets into the details. “How to build it, first and foremost, we’ve got to make sure that there’s a way to let us know about cases in true anonymity. Part of why whistleblowers don’t like to blow, is because we do an awful job of protecting them. That stops on my watch. We’ll set up a case site that anyone can access. From there they’ll be able to report whatever they like, without having to fear reprisal. We’ll also make sure that where the reports come from is recorded. What ip address sends them. That way, we can start to weed out the crackpots. Say we get a hundred reports a day from one computer in DuBoise about a bunch of DC people, we know to put them on the back burner.”

“We will investigate every report,” Comey says.

Tim nods at that, too. “And we will. The system will triage what it gets. Depending on what the case is and how credible the report is, say it’s an IRS case and the computer doing the reporting is in the….” Tim quickly tries to remember where the hell the IRS is now. “Hagerstown IRS building, that’ll get it bumped up a few notches. Say it’s a case where a Director is taking bribes, that’ll bump it up a few notches further. Say it’s the third report on that guy, by different IRS computers, for different offenses, and even further up it goes. While a report from the middle of nowhere, that’s one of fifty other reports from the same computer in the middle of nowhere about a middle manager in the Office of Printing taking kickbacks from ink sellers, that one would probably drop several notches, and wait for a slow day to get picked up.”

Tom makes a note of that.

“That’s passive crime. Crimes that come to us. Then there are the ones we’re going to go after. Part of what I’m going to do is hire people whose whole job will be going up against these guys and lead them into temptation. We will try to bribe officials; we’ll encourage them to keep appointments off the books; we’ll offer kickbacks; we will try to get them to break the law, and then we’ll throw the book at them. We will have a unit that just handles sexual harassment charges. Whatever it is that the person in question likes to harass, I will have someone who can fit that description on staff, and we will aggressively go after proof, so we’re not just going in with he said/she said cases.

“I will have two teams of lawyers, one to prosecute these cases, and one to keep an eye on the laws that are coming up and make sure we know who benefits, who loses out, and who will be in a position to try and do something about them. We watched drug cartels pump piles of money into anti-drug laws to keep their profits high. I will have people who do nothing but watch the laws and figure out who might want to do what about them. They’ll help us keep up on targets for our stings.
“I will have a team of forensic accountants and hackers, and as soon as we get someone trapped into a bribe or kickback, we’re going to dismantle their lives.

“I’ll build a random number generator that will come up with Federal Employee IDs, few thousand a year, and we will audit them. If anyone had noticed how many members of the old government were living above their pay grade, we wouldn’t have had this big of a problem.”

“How are you going to do that, legally?” Comey asks. “You won’t have that level of discretion under the law.”

“The IRS is allowed to audit anyone it likes for any reason it likes. You” he looks to Fenton, “tell me we’re all going to be one group in a few years. That’s how we’ll do it. And if that doesn’t hold up, we’ll stick something into a law to make sure that every elected Federal Official can be audited at any time he’s in office. With all the new Congressmen, I could just do them and have that take up all of the time of my audit team.”

Comey and Fenton take that in stride.

“My hackers will also be watching the Fed’s computers, keeping eyes on what everyone is doing, what little niggly bits and pieces they toss into our systems. We are not going to end up with people skimming money out of our systems, rewriting laws for their own benefits, or spying. Not on my watch.

“We will have active investigators, the people who come in after we get a tip off, or after we’ve started a case, and they will be the straightest straight arrows you’ve ever seen.” He intentionally looks over Comey’s suit, and Fenton’s. “You have a look. That FBI look. It’s designed to make sure that anyone who sees you gets nervous. It radiates wholesome authority and imperviousness to corruption. My active investigators will match that. My undercover guys will look like whatever they have to. My trial lawyers will be so sharp they’ll have perps begging to plead out. Those are the branches that will deal with the outside world, and they will match the image they need to match.

“My auditors, legal analysts, and computer guys, they’ll look like whatever they want to, and you won’t give them any flack on it. They won’t be in ‘face’ positions, and as such, they can do what they want.”

Comey and Fenton are still nodding, and then Comey says, “What about the elections?”

“What about them?” Tim asks.

“Part of Public Corruption is insuring clean elections. What will you do about that?” Comey asks.

This time, Tim blinks. He’s thinking fast. 1000 people and 200 million dollars is tight for what he wants to do. He’s going to have more than half of that in salary, benefits, and overtime alone, and he’s going to have to scramble to build the rest of what he wants with the remaining money, and then put the elections on top of that?

Tim shakes his head. “Can’t be done. Not on that budget and that many people.”

“You’re supposed to be the tech whiz,” Fenton says.

“I am the tech whiz, so when I tell you, you can’t do this on that budget, believe me, it can’t be done. Especially since we killed the party system. If they were still doing the heavy lifting and giving us boots on the ground and money for the systems, maybe, I could do it, but just me? Cannot be done. More time, more money, more tools, and yes, I can build you a clean election system and keep eyes on it, but not with what you’re offering me.”
Comey glances at Fenton. Fenton shrugs. “We’ve been told it can be done. Invest in the tech, run the elections online…”

Tim laughs. “Have everyone register with their Social Security number and the ip address they’re going to vote with, each time that combination gets used, it can’t be used again, record the votes, allow everyone to print their vote out, and if there’s an irregularity tally the paper votes. Uh huh. Yep. I can build that system, and it’ll take two minutes to break it. Especially since Social Security doesn’t purge the rolls of dead people. You’d end up with more people voting than are currently alive. That’s the bare bones of a system that might, eventually, work. You’d want iris scans or something to prove the person voting is the person who’s allowed to vote, something like that.”

Comey smiles.

“And that was a test to see if I’d just tell you whatever you wanted to hear?”

Fenton nods at that, too.

“Ten years ago, if you’d told me to do it, I would have died trying. I’m out of that business. You’re already asking for the almost impossible, which I will deliver. I’m not breaking a sweat trying to get you what isn’t possible. Now, are the elections under my watch?”

“Sort of. Formal complaints of irregularities will be under your watch. Making the system, making sure it works, making sure someone’s got eyes on it to see that it’s working, all of that will belong to whatever replaces the Federal Election Commission,” Fenton replies.

“That I can do. That would be the kind of job my hackers would take care of. I can’t imagine we’re staying with paper ballots all that much longer.”

“Gone by the 2018 Congressional elections,” Comey replies.

Tim nods and gets back to explaining how he’d run the Department of Public Corruption. “As for what I’ll build, you’ll have oversight in the sense of I will allow you to know everything I’m doing. You’ll get full access and accounting. You’ll have no say in how I do it or who I hire. If you like what I’m doing, great. If you have suggestions, I’ll listen. But at the end of the day, I’ll do it my way, and you’ll let me keep doing it, or fire me as you see fit.”

Comey nods, looking Tim up and down. “And may I assume, this, is part of making that statement of independence?”

Tim raises an eyebrow. “It could be. Or it could be a test. If I hire the kind of people I want to run the kind of department that will do the job the way it needs to be done, what they’ll be wearing will make what I’m wearing right now will look tame. And if you can’t take me in a kilt and sweater, I’m sure the guy with the purple Mohawk, piercings, neck and face tattoos, is going to be a problem, and if he’s a problem, then we’re going to have a problem. Understand?”

“We understand,” Comey says.

“Do you like my vision?” Tim asks.

They glance at each other.

“Yes,” Comey says.

“If you want me, I can start the first Monday in July. I need your decision by April 1st.”
“Are you accepting our offer?” Comey asks.

“I’m giving you mine, and seeing if you want it.”

They glance at each other again. “The contract will be in your mailbox by the end of next week,” Comey says.

Tim nods. He stands up, and offers his hand to the both of them. Fenton offers to walk him out. As they’re in the hallway, Tim says, “It’s not a hard condition, but if you want me to actually get top computer and undercover talent, do what you can to drop the drug testing for FBI employees. Even better, get pot legal. It’d be nice to be able to actually get some people who have graduated college.”

Fenton inclines his head, indicating he’ll think about it. The elevator opens, and he steps in with Tim. “This isn’t a hard condition, either, but we’d prefer you looked like one of the straight arrows, too.”

Tim smiles a bit. “Some days, I will.”

---

When he gets back into his car, Tim lets out a long, slow breath. Then the rush of holy shit I just did that! streams through him, tingling his fingers and toes.

Director of Public Corruption Investigation. No more NCIS. No more…

He stops. If he gets thinking too much about that, he’ll stall out, and he’s got one more dragon to slay.

Time to get to the Omni, and redo how the world understands Federal Law Enforcement.

As he puts his key in the car, it hits him that, with the exception of days where he’s actually saved a life, this is the biggest day of his professional life.

And it’s about to get bigger.

Friday, at least at the last one of these he was at, was a mingle and schmooze day. It was likely supposed to be one at this Commission, too, which is why they had the afternoon free for him to take it over.

He’s coming in a bit late. That half hour dick move at the beginning of talking to Comey means it’s 10:14 when he heads in. So this time he’s getting mildly hassled for looking completely out of character and being late.

The security guys, who he’s seen every day this week, are asking for his ID again.

Tim rolls his eyes, shows them his badge, including the one they made him for the Commission meetings, and eventually gets let into the main floor.

And the schmooze-fest is in full force. They’re talking in small clumps, moving from crew to crew, passing out ideas. And staring at Tim.

He idles over to the closest of the groups, listening in, as they give him the side eye. Fortunately, they’re talking about getting more power out of the systems they have, and he can start adding tech to that, which rapidly overcomes his outfit.

After a bit of that, he starts having other people ease on over, curious, not just about the outfit, but about what he’s going to do today.

Tim enjoys that, and keeps his comments non-committal and cryptic.

1:30 to 4:00. He blocked the whole time out, though he doesn’t think he’ll take all of it. He hopes, he’ll do this, and then they’ll get talking as a group, and by the end they’ll have an idea of who is going to move what forward.

They’ve got a podium for him, which he doesn’t love, but there are too many people here for him to do a functional campfire. So, up he goes. Tim waits a moment for everyone else to get into the folding chairs they’ve been inhabiting for the last week. Some of them are pulling out laptops or tablets to take notes, and he lets them get set.

Tim can feel them all staring at him. They’ve been doing it all morning, because he couldn’t look less like the rest of this crowd if he tried, because he did try. This is it. He’s as far out as he goes. Okay, he could possibly have lipstick on, too, and his collar. He’s almost as far out as he goes.

He’s as far out as he’s willing to leave the house.

And they are staring.

Which is where he’s going to start his talk.

“This is how I look on the weekends.” Not really, but he’s making a statement. He shrugs a bit.

“Actually, these days, since my son’s eleven days old, I’ve also usually got a spit up cloth over my shoulder. Now, I know you know I’ve got all the hacking cred anyone ever needs. A bunch of you have come over to chat with me, talk ideas about talent and tools, talk about what we do and how we do it.

“You all know who I am and what I’ve done.

“And today, I’m going to talk to you about talent, tools, and the future of computers in Federal Law Enforcement.

“So, let’s talk talent. Here’s the question, and you guys don’t have to do a show of hands, or anything along those lines, just answer it in your heads. I’ve got a Magna Cum Laude in Biomedical Engineering from Johns Hopkins. I’ve got a Summa Cum Laude Masters in Forensic Computing from MIT. I got through FLETC with the highest score to date, and I kept that record for eleven years. You’re looking at my resume, and it’s perfect. I walk into the interview dressed like this. As soon as I’m out the door, how many of you would toss my resume?”

He can see them, especially the sixty plus members of the crowd looking at each other.

“Yeah. And that’s why you can’t find talent. Here’s a good rule of thumb, if you are over fifty, and the computer guy sitting in front of you is under thirty, and looks like you, you don’t have top talent. You might have very good second-tier talent, and most of the time that will do the job. But you don’t have the top. The ability to blend into a Federal work environment should not be your primary hiring concern when you go looking for computer talent. Chuck your idea of what a computer guy is supposed to act and look like, how old he or she is supposed to be, and what he or she does in his or her off time, and you can start to find talent, too. Hire guys who look like you for human resources or accounting, get guys who look like me for computers. Boom. That one’s done. Next up, tools…
“Today, we’re talking about building a new tool, and how we’re going to completely change how all of Federal Law Enforcement uses computers to solve crimes.”

He sees them looking around again. This is Cybercrime not IT. “Yeah. I know. We’re going a bit off task, but right now you guys, and the people who work for you, represent the entire computer tech brain trust of the US Federal Government, and I’m drafting you into completely rebuilding how we deal with crime. Our sort of crime, and every other sort, too.”

That’s getting some looking around at each other, too. He can tell a good third of them are sure he’s wasting their time, but he’s got a few eyes flickering with interest.

“Right now, every person in this room has at least one device, and probably several, capable of getting you basically every piece of information on the planet.” Tim fishes his phone out of his pocket and holds it up. “Right here, I’ve got the mass of Pluto, the height of the Statue of Liberty, Marilyn Monroe’s lipstick technique, how to make chocolate mousse, and how to build an atomic bomb. Literally billions of people put information out there every single day, and this device sorts it out, finds what I’m looking for, and gives it to me in less than a second.”

His crowd is… curious. They don’t know where he’s going with this, but they at least look intrigued. Well, most of them. He can see some of them aren’t interested in this and just want to get back to the mingling.

“How do we deal with crime now? I know how my guys do it. We get a report of something hinky. Occasionally, very occasionally, that report goes straight to us. Most of the time, that report gets filtered through a few levels of LEOs. More than that, usually, there’s a physical crime that leads someone to check out a computer trail, which they will muck up, that will eventually result in said LEO deciding that maybe they don’t actually know what they’re doing, and then they call my guys in. Once we get on the case, we’ve got the tech side, but we’ve got to pull teeth to get the non-tech side, and once we’ve got the tech side set up, our LEOs don’t know what the hell to do with it? This sounding familiar?”

He seeing nods, though a lot of the crew isn’t seeing how this connects to his phone.

“Am I the only one in the room who’s been a full field agent?”

Four other hands go up, and all of them are guys who are past sixty. They likely started back before there was cyber anything, and worked their way up.

“Okay. For the rest of you, physical crime works pretty much the same way. We almost never get a case where the guys who will investigate the case gets it from beginning to end. Local LEOs get the ball rolling, and then the case meanders through a slew of groups. That case will be limited by what information the investigators can access, and how fast they can get it. I did twelve years in the field, and way more often than should have happened, we’d hit a block because we couldn’t get information that someone else had tucked away.

“And that’s going to end. We are going to rebuild how crime works. What does that have to do with my phone? I’m going to explain this system to you, and when you think ‘that’s too much,’ ‘it’ll be too slow,’ or ‘it can’t be done,’ or ‘there are too many moving pieces involved to make it work,’ I want you to think about your phone or laptop or tablet, and realize that the engine for how we’re going to do this already exists, and we’re just going to modify it for our purposes.”

Tim can see a collection of what the hell are you going to suggest looks, as different members of the audience glance at their phones or laptops.
“We’re going to build a system that uses every piece of information that we get on every crime, and then sorts it all out and gives it to our investigators in as close to real time as possible.

“I’m going to walk you through how this new system will work with a case I had this summer. This is the one that set a bunch of other cases unraveling.

“For me, it started when I got a call from the Navy’s Pension department. Little payments, nothing big, nothing more than two dollars were vanishing from retiree paychecks. When I got it, it was because our accounting guys had been able to hunt down the fact that the bank wasn’t the problem. I hacked the hell out of it, and hunted down the guy doing it. And I pulled it out of the weeds and solved the case because I was better with a computer than the guy doing it. But, that’s not how this should have gone.

“With the system I’m proposing, this is how that crime should have gone. Retiree gets his check. He notices that there’s a buck twenty-six discrepancy. And, yes, that’s how this case begins. Over and over and over again, old guys were calling in with stupid little fees like that. For months, that went on without anyone doing anything.

“Anyway, ideal world. Our retiree calls in, and makes his report. The guy he talks to at the bank says, “Not on our end,” and reports it. Okay, now the system has its first bit of information. Next, our retiree calls the Navy, and they take his report and say, “Uh, not on our end either,” and reports it. In the real case, for months, the Navy just credited his, and hundreds of thousands of guys like him, and that was the end of it.

“Now, with the system I’m talking about, it’s got two bits of information. There’s a discrepancy, but no one’s owning up on it. It’s a computer system, there can’t be a discrepancy with no one owning it. Someone, somewhere is making this happen. The system, because it updates in real time, already knows about the hundreds of other guys who are having the same problem. In fact, after about… five… maybe ten guys, the system has already decided there’s a case and gotten someone on it. Because even if this is a glich, it needs to be solved, and the chances of it being a glich are awfully low.

“In the real case, no one did anything for months. Millions of dollars in these little payments went scurrying off with nothing happening. And, if it weren’t for the fact that my step-mom’s department had just made a huge corruption splash, and my Boss had put out feelers for similar hints of things along those lines going on, this would have kept happening.

“New system, nope. It knows something’s going on, and it puts someone on it. The new system, it knows every investigator in the Federal Government. It knows all of their specialties, where they are, and how slammed they are on casework. Then it goes and finds the least busy, most qualified person for the job, and it hits their job queue.

“That someone starts to investigate. She double checks, and yeah, it’s not coming from the bank or the Navy. She gets that into the system, too, and the system notices that there are the same reports coming from Army Retirees, and with Social Security payments, too.

“So, unlike the real case, where the only reason I found out this was happening with every other branch of the US Government was a good guess and the guy who was doing it told me, this system we’re going to build would have already found the pattern, and gotten our NCIS investigator talking to the Army and Social Security.

“Now we’ve got all three groups working together, looking for where the money is going. Every time one of them has a breakthrough, all the others get it, too. Near instant information sharing.
“So, in the real case, I had to find out how the money was going AWOL. I came up with half dozen ways to code it, and went looking for that code. I’d find a bit in one spot, and another bit in another spot, and so on and so forth. It was slow and painful. My computers can only do so much searching at one time. And I’ve only got so many ideas for how to do this in my head.

“I lucked out. My ideas matched some of the hacker who was responsible for this’s ideas, and I was able to find his code. But, if he’d been that much better than me, I might have never found him, because I am one guy, working on my own.

“Now, with the system in place, we’ve still got to find the code that’s stealing the money. I’ve got a ton of code to go through and can only search it so fast. But, with the system, I’ve got Army and Social Security searching for the same sorts of things. We split the searches between us, and start knocking out terms, and finding them that much faster. The problem unravels faster, and on all three fronts. Each time one of us finds something, the other two branches find out, too, making each search faster and more efficient. Plus, because I know I’m not the only guy on the problem, I’ve got other people to work with, who will have other ideas of what to go looking for, and maybe one of them has the magic phrase that makes the money disappear.

“With the system, we break his worms in hours, not weeks. With the system, we all bring charges against him, instead of just me.”

He can see he’s got them intrigued.

“We’ll build our own web. Every case, every detail, it’ll all go into the web, and just like google, you go hunting for something, and it’ll find it.

“Our system, our web, will have every investigator, every team, in there. Whoever’s got the specialty in the area, and the least work on his plate, he’s going to get called up. We will constantly be working with each other, all departments, all the time.

“We’re going to drop whose department has jurisdiction over what, and act like we’re really on the same team. Once this system is in place, jurisdiction is going to be about skill. If I’m the best guy for a cyber job, and Manner over there is the second best, and we’re both light on work, it doesn’t matter that I’m NCIS and he’s CGIS, we’re on the case, working with each other.

“And that’s just for us. We’re going to roll this out for everyone. Imagine a murder. 911 gets the call. Our system is already in on that, and by the time the Local LEO is responding, we’ve already got background on the area and the number calling it in.

“Local LEO gets there. Any bit of information he gets is put into the system. Who the victim is, if that’s known, what sort of crime, if known, where, what weapon, as he’s working the scene, the system is also working. First off, it’s calling in the closest, least busy ME. There is no reason why one ME should be slammed, and the guy two miles away on the other side of an invisible line/with a different department is twiddling his thumbs. We’re going to use the system to assign agents based on specialty, geography, and case load.

“So, our ME is on the scene, and he’s going to take over the body, and everything he finds will also be going into the system, and automatically updating to everyone involved.

“He hits the scene, and first things first, takes a picture of the victim’s face. It’s automatically uploaded into facial recognition. No more cases where you’ve got a picture, and I’ve got a dead body, and we never find each other because I put my body’s finger prints but not face into the system.
“The ME loads the prints, and again, they automatically go into the system. If I’ve got a Federal murder, and you’ve got a local robbery, it’s possible before I’m even done processing the scene, you’ve gotten the note that I’ve got your robber.

“The ME takes the body back, and does his job. DNA, into the system it goes. Anything he finds, into the system. Pictures of everything. All of it’s going to build databases. Maybe our guy doesn’t have anything in our system, but his tattoo looks a lot like seventeen other ones in our system, so we use it to track down who did his art, and that’s how we get the ID.

“Back at the scene, every bit of evidence is collected and logged. That evidence is used to build connections and narrow the search. As soon as it’s declared a murder, the system is already slicing and dicing through every other murder to look for similarities. So, gunshot, that cuts out all the stabblings. .45 caliber, there goes all the rifles, .22s, and the like.

“While they work the scene, the system works the data.

“Evidence goes back to the lab. They do their job, and everything they upload, all goes into one system, and it is constantly searching. I’ve worked the forensics lab, too, and anyone who’s ever done that knows that every single system has its own inputs, its own idiosyncrasies, and own language. Instead of having to master ten different systems, we’re going to have one.

“Normally, we finish with the scene, come back, and start going through the victim’s life. Get back, and run phone and email and… No. On the scene, put in the victim’s phone number, email, facebook, all of it, and by the time you get back, it’s gone through, given you the people he was talking to the most, and letting you know if any of his contacts overlap with anyone else’s cases. Yeah, that one phone number that links a murder, kidnapping, and drug running scheme may just be a dentist, or he may be the guy who’s in charge of the whole thing. Either way, you now know all three cases have that number in common, which you wouldn’t have under the old system. Same with email, same with facebook, same with all of it.

“By the time you’ve gotten a death certificate and permission to start on financials, you will have a list of interconnections to sort searching through, and once you’ve got your permissions on the financials, it’ll do the same thing with bank accounts. I can tell you that a lot of the recent crap that went down would have gone down a hell of a lot faster if we would have been able to link where all of that money was coming from or going to.

“And each piece of the data improves your case and everyone else’s, too. You will have everything you need to do your job, you will be hooked up to the other people on that job, and there will be no more of these cases where you never get part of the deal because it’s stuck in a lab in Paducah, and you’re off working a case on a base in Berlin.

“This is what we’re going to build. And by the time we’re done, we will be faster, better, sleeker, and catching more of the bad guys than we ever did before.”

He’s got their interest, all right. At least on the ones who are real computer guys. The bureaucrats aren’t nearly as convinced.

“Here’s the last bit. Everyone uses it. We’re not going to run into a situation where we’re Feds so we’ve got a kidnapping, and the Local PD has a murder, and we never find out that the guy we’re hunting for is on a slab twenty miles away. All the data, all law enforcement, and if we build it, we will completely upend how law is practiced in the US.” Tim smiles at them.

“So, let’s talk tech. I’ve given you the end goals, now let’s go over the blue prints. By the time we’re done today, I want fifteen of you up here, willing to take over on this and make this baby your own.”
By the time he’s getting ready to leave the Commission, Tim feels jittery, high, buzzing, and like he owns the world.

There were about sixty people at the Cybercrime Commission, and he got at least twenty-five of them committed to this, another fifteen interested, and twenty more talking about how he’s insane and there’s no way this can ever possibly be done.

_Fuck them._ He thinks as he’s talking to the guys who set the Commissions up. They’re interested enough that they’re setting up one more Commission, first week of March, where the best of the computer brains of the Federal Government, from anywhere they can find them, his guys, IT, the military, all of them, are going to sit down and plan this thing out.

Right now, his goal is to have a working blueprint set up to take to Congress before summer. His second goal is to get Penny, and any congressmen she thinks would be interested in something like this to show up for that Commission meeting, because he wants this.

He can see two of the naysayers grumbling over in the corner about how this can _never_ be done, staring at him. He thinks they’re… IRS and Secret Service. And, yeah, he doesn’t want to deal with them, not really, but he knows they aren’t totally insane, either. Most of the last big technological things the government has attempted have been train wrecks.

He touches his phone. There’s no reason they should be, though. Run it like a web. Each case gets its own page. Each page has all the information in it. Set them up on a wysiwyg-style page builders, with each section already in place, and all they’ve got to do is type or hit the upload button. Searching for information would mean using good SEO style programming. Literally nothing he wants to do here is new or uncharted territory.

Of course, and it hits him this is probably why IRS is doing most of the grumbling, they were in charge of making sure people complied with the ACA, and the ACA was supposed to set up a simple, basic, website. A secure marketplace. Something that every major retailer on earth managed to pull off, on time and on budget and with security in place. And they couldn’t get the damn thing working properly for almost a year after it went live, and last Tim heard, the security features on it still don’t work.

Of course, the last he heard, the guys who built it, and the guys who made the deal for who would build it, were under indictment for kickback and bribes, so…

Tim sighs, more proof that they aren’t low on brains, just honorable men.

Assuming said men can be found for his system… The only thing they should have to program from scratch would be the ap to upload into onto every agent/cop’s smart phone. Then he rolls his eyes. How many times is he going to hear about how hard it is to do that? Let alone how often is he going to hear about how much smart phones cost?

Director of Public Corruption McGee has another thought, Agents and Cops _should_ be using official smart phones. Ones he can access. Field Agent McGee thinks they should also be phones with good cameras. Get rid of the digital cameras they use, take all the shots on their phones, which would be pre-loaded with the ap, automatically uploading all the pictures as soon as they take them…

Tech Guru McGee can see it. Click the ap, it would keep track of which cases which cop is working, and open a menu to those cases, click which case you’re on, click the in ap camera button, and all of the pictures you take would automatically upload and get sorted into the case. No lost shots, no ‘my battery failed,’ no ‘oops my thumb drive died/got lost/was eaten by the dog/stolen.’

He makes a note of that as he’s starting to walk out. Manner falls into step beside him.

“I’ll admit, I wasn’t expecting that. The hiring stuff, I expected, but that…” he shakes his head.

Tim nods. He’s fairly sure that Manner’s never thought of that, either. But he’s sure of one other thing. “But, now that you’ve got the idea, you can run it, can’t you?”

Manner snorts. “In my copious spare time.”

Tim nods at that. “I hear that.”

Manner looks up at him, catching something, besides the jittery, manic high on Tim. “What? You’re on paternity leave right now. You should have time.”

“Spoken like a man who’s never had a baby.”

Manner shrugs. “Something else is up, too. You wouldn’t be even mentioning someone else building this if it wasn’t.”

“There’s a really good chance I’ll be building something else, too, and won’t be able to do more than
be the idea guy on this.”

“Like your Navy security tests.”

That’s probably a good model for this. Get a plan, get it started, hand it off, and occasionally poke it from time to time to see how it’s going. “Yeah. Make sure you’re at the next Commission meeting on this one. If this is ever going to go anywhere, we’re going to need someone who can dot all the is, cross all the ts, speak bureaucrat, make the Congressmen feel like they’re being paid attention to, and rules followed.”

Manner smiles dryly at Tim. “And you think I’d be great at that.”

“Better than I would. I can come up with the idea, but I need someone who can actually get it built, and that means someone who can make a whole bunch of people work together within a rule structure. That’s you, right?”

Manner inclines his head, acknowledging that he is good at that. “I have a job.”

“This is a better, and more important one. Abbi’ll forgive me for poaching you. And… She knows this, already, and you do, too, now, but don’t talk too much about it. Part of me talking about no jurisdiction is that they’re talking about lumping us all into one team. Two-three years from now, there probably won’t be a CGIS. Abbi’ll be in charge of Ocean Border Crime or something. Two-three years from now, we will definitely need someone to run this system.”

Manner listens, eyes narrowing for a second, and then Tim can see him putting things together.

“But not you?”

Tim nods.

“What are you going to be doing?”
“Haven’t signed the contract, yet, but probably Director of Public Corruption Investigation.”

Manner exhales long and slow. Then he laughs. “You’re going to be the guy who makes sure everyone follows the rules?”

“Nope. We’ve got rules coming out our ears. Probably too many of them. That’s not the issue. I’m going to be the guy who makes sure people do their jobs. And I want a functional computer system to keep track of all my cases, make sure that I can get all the information I need when I need it, and that everyone else who’s got a case that intersects with one of mine gets it, too.”

Manner nods. “Okay. Well… We’ll see. I might not be the guy for this job, but if I’m not, I’m sure he or she’ll be at the next Commission for this. They’ll be digging tech guys out of woodwork for this one.”

“They will. I know who I’m sending, in addition to me.”

“Your Angels.”

Tim rolls his eyes. “They are not ‘my Angels.’”

“Fine. The Double X Dream Team. Better?”

Tim snorts at that. “You going to one of these next week?”

“Nope. I’m actually doing my job next week. We’re finally starting to get some butts in chairs, who actually know something about computers over at CGIS, and I want to get them working. Our backlog is years long. You?”

“Probably sending Howard so I can get back to being a dad on paternity leave.”

It’s closer to five when he gets out than he would have liked. That means a quick run to NCIS, grabbing Jimmy, and off to the House they go.

But, quick or not, he does owe Leon a heads up on what he did and said.

He’s got to drive through Rock Creek Park to get to the Navy Yard. It’s still as grim and gray as it was back in October. Granted, this time of year, it would normally be pretty gray. January in DC isn’t known for bright, green foliage.

This time of year, though, there should be joggers, and some kids on sleds taking advantage of the snow, and… just people. Sure, not a ton of them, it’s cold out, but at least some.

He drives past one guy walking across the park. Behind him, there are piles of rubble, the park is being used as a place to dump broken things until they can be hauled out of the city. There’s enough snow on them that they just look like mounds of white, but Tim knows there shouldn’t be large, jaggy, hills in the background. In front of him, closer to Tim’s car are stubs of burnt tree trunks.

January in DC should be gray. But the park is char black and snow white.

With the windows closed, he can’t smell death or char on the air anymore, and The Morgue is down to one tent and only a few refrigerated containers. Most of the bodies have gone home, now.
Through town he’s seeing more glass and fewer boards over windows and doors. There are construction crews all over the place, and trucks, either filled with rubble and moving it out, or being filled with rubble to move it out seem to be on every corner.

He’s not the only car on the street. More of them are moving around. There’s almost something he might, if he hadn’t worked in DC for the last 14 years, call traffic.

As he drives along, he gets a glimpse of the Washington Monument, still black from smoke and char. Cleaning it is probably way down on the list of priorities. At least, he can’t imagine Jarvis sitting there saying, “Well, we could be clearing streets and rebuilding hospitals and schools, but I think we should really wash off the Washington Monument.”

Coming back, and healing, but not there, not yet.

He drives past five blocks of rubble, whatever had been there before had burned, collapsed, and now was being used as a place to hold wreckage until someone can haul it away. Whatever had been there before, it’ll never come back. Not the way it was.

He thinks about what he’s building, about his job, and about what he’s going to tell Leon.

Tim pulls into the Navy Yard, showing his ID.

Nothing ever stays the same.

Tim’s texting Jimmy as he heads up to Leon’s office, letting him know he’s here and they’ll be heading off soon.

Karen’s at her desk, working away on something. “He got a few minutes?”

“I’ll check.” She picks up her phone as Tim pockets his. “I’ve got Director McGee out here.” She listens to Leon and then nods to Tim, pointing at the door.

“Thanks, Karen.”

Leon looks up at him as he walks in. “I’d been hoping the stories were exaggerating.”

Tim shrugs. “You’re the one who told me to shake them up, let them see your wonder kid with the ink.”

Leon shakes his head. “And that you did. I’ve gotten four calls checking in to see if you’re legit today.”

“Two from the FBI, what were the other two?”

“IRS called, and so did Medicaid.”

Tim snorts as he sits on the corner of Leon’s desk. “I ruffled some feathers today.”

Leon leans back, pops a toothpick into his mouth and chews it contemplatively, staring at Tim. “I’d imagine so. What’d you come up with?”
Tim thinks of the best way to describe this. “What’s your phone?”

“iPhone 6.”

Tim nods. That’s a phone that’ll do what he needs done. “Okay, imagine you had a case ap on it. Imagine all cops/feds do. That ap represents a web of cases, and the ability to search them, like Google. Case comes up, and a page gets made for it. That ap keeps track of every case you work, and updates your page. It runs your camera, does your case’s phone/email/social media searches, and links them to every other phone/email/social media bit that pops up into another case. Every person you talk to, you pop the name and address in, and if he’s been talking to someone else on another case, you’ll see it. You use the camera on your phone to take finger prints from bodies/suspects, the ap uploads them instantly, into your case. Same thing with facial recognition. The web then runs them against all the other images. DNA, prints on objects, trace, the lab still does that, but it all goes into the web and attaches to your page.

“Now, say you’ve got a phone number attached to your victim, click the link on it, and every other case, federal and local, that number appears in pops up. Now, imagine that for all of your evidence, all of your victims, all of your suspects, everything.

“That’s what I proposed.”

Leon takes the toothpick out of his mouth and exhales long and low. “Ambitious.”

Tim nods. “Yep. But if we get it up and going…”

Leon nods, too. “Yeah. If you could build it…” He can see exactly how valuable something like that could be, and he’s tech-savvy enough to know that Tim’s talking about something that would use off the shelf components. And he’s politics-savvy enough to know if this gets built “business as usual,” it won’t work.

“So, that’s what we’re working on. We’ve got another Commission meeting set for the first week of March, just to talk about building this. You’re more than welcome.”

“I think I will attend. Been talking to Fenton and Comey about all Federal Law Enforcement under one roof. It’s been… interesting. And what you’re talking about would make things easier.”

That reminds Tim of part of what his system will do. “Left out the best part on that. Case comes in, it gets its number, and some details popped in. First thing the system does is assess whoever is closest with the most specialization in that area. As more details emerge, it might reassign the case, and from the first responder to detective, it most certainly will.”

“Individual people?” Leon asks.

“I was thinking along those lines, build teams by whoever is best at whatever, closest, and has the least on their plate. Why?”

“I’d been thinking about mobile teams. We’d base them out of cities all over the country, and they’d respond to issues as they arise. Like Navy SEALs, but for crime. Like the SEALs, they’d have backup in the form of whatever the closest FBI hub is, but unlike our current system, they’d be more spread out. Instead of having them all out of Salt Lake and traveling to anything within a few hundred miles. We’d have them all over the Rocky Mountains, and only send them to the main hub when they need what’s back there.”

Tim nods with that. “I could see it working with a combination of teams and individuals. Individuals may start cases, get the base information in, handle evidence collection, and then hand off to teams…
Or some issues might only need one or two people, other bigger ones would call in teams. We could work with that. Or… have everyone set as individuals, with team rankings. I set my preferences, Tony and Draga for casework. Jimmy and Allan if I need an ME. Abby for lab work. If they just need a computer guy, I pop up on my own, but if they need a murder investigation, all of us come up, something like that.”

“I can see that.” Leon bites down on his toothpick. He’s quiet for a moment, waiting for Tim to say more, but Tim’s thinking through this additional bit of coding and how to build a sort function that works that way. Finally, after another moment, when it's clear that Tim’s off programing in his head, Leon says, “Got something else to tell me?”

Tim blinks, remembering what happened this morning. He’d been so into explaining this afternoon that he’d forgotten that he'd have to tell Leon something else, too.

“Yeah. Unless there’s a poison pill in the contract somewhere, June 30th is my last day. I’ll let you know once I’ve read it through and signed it, but… They’re offering me the whole department, to build from the ground up, as I see fit.”

Leon nods at that, and stands up. “You’ll do well with it.”

Tim smiles, looking up at Leon. “I hope so.”

Leon offers Tim his hand. “You will.”

Tim thinks about it for a second, and maybe it’s this afternoon, or the outfit, of just a general fuck it sort of attitude, but he stands up too, and pulls Leon into a quick hug. When he steps back, he says, “I’m going to miss it here, and I’ve been very proud to work for you.”

Leon brushes that off, not sure what to do with that or the hug. “You’re not leaving yet, and you’ve got to get your department ready to stand without you.”

“I’ll do you proud on that.”

Leon gives him a wry smile. “Do not hire an eighteen-year-old, ten minutes out of high school to run the place.”

Tim chuckles. He’s got a few ideas for a new Director of Cybercrime. “The guy who’s running my Pacific team’s pretty good. Might see if he wants to move up. Got to look through who else I’ve got.”

“No one from your current team?”

Tim shakes his head. “I’d love Ngyn, she’s got time in and the talent, but she’d hate it. I’ll offer it to her, because she’s more than earned it, but she’ll turn me down, and we’ll all be better off for that. Howard has the talent, but is too young. Brand is way too young. Beyond that… no. I got great followers on my team here, but not leaders.”

Leon nods in agreement with that. “That’s always the sticking point. Good followers are rare, good leaders are hen’s teeth rare. You find one, and you nurture him, and you protect him, and you keep him doing his job.”

“And that, in a nutshell, is why we were always able to get away with so much.”

Leon nods, that little, knowing smile on his face. “In a nutshell.”
Tim glances behind Leon and checks the time. “Got to go grab Jimmy and get on the road, can’t miss the sunset.”

Waiting for the elevator, Tim sends off a text to Delilah Fielding. Remember that computer thing we were talking about? I’ve got a full on Commission set up for it. First week of March. Get back to DC. I’ve got Storm in play, but I still need a Professor X for this project.

As the doors close, he gets back. You did not just make that joke, did you?

Tim can see it staring up at him on his screen, so apparently he did. Uh. Sorry?

Oh no. You do not call me a seventy-year-old bald man and just get away with it.

Very sorry. Get stateside and a working dinner, with Storm, Kitty Pride, and a few other X-men is on me.

There’s a second of pause. Then he gets. Why aren’t you Professor X?

Because I just got upgraded to Captain America.

Different team.

Yeah. Just about to head off for home. Clear your schedule and get back here. It will be worth your while. Tomorrow, I’ll write it all up and send it off to you. If you don’t agree, I’ll pay for dinner at wherever you want in Dubai, to make up for upsetting your schedule.

LOL. The place I’ve had my eye on here is expensive on a federal salary.

;) I don’t expect to have to pay it. More tomorrow, Prof X.

Okay, Cap.

As he steps out he gets one more text from Delilah. Who’s Wolvie?

Tim laughs, quickly sends back, Working with the Avengers. Because, if anyone is going to be Wolverine, it’s Gibbs, and he already knows what he wants Wolvie doing.
“You look like you’re having a good day, Director McGee,” Allan says as Tim walks into autopsy.

Tim smiles at him, putting his phone back into his pocket. “I am. Good day here?”

Jimmy heads out from the storage closet as Allan’s saying, “Yes, actually. No new clients today, so we got caught up with everything else.”

“Ah… Cutting it close?” Jimmy says to Tim.

Tim nods. “Had to see Leon.” He glances over to Allan and Jimmy nods; Allan’s in the loop. “Got talking about what happens next. If I can sell this idea I’m working on, you guys will be ‘on call.’ Whoever’s closest and has the least bodies in his building gets the call. Won’t matter if they’re Navy or civilians or whatever. And when you’ve got a body in each drawer, you guys go off call until you can take a new person.”

Tim looks around autopsy and Jimmy and Allan… “Actually, if this is going to work, I need to know what’s a good shift for you guys. How many bodies at a time is a good match for a two man team?”

Jimmy and Allan look at each other, both thinking about what a ‘good day,’ one that’s busy enough, but not insane, looks like. “We’ll talk about that Monday,” Jimmy says to Allan, pulling on his coat. “Come on, Ziva’ll be pissed if we’re late.”

Tim nods at that. “See, ya, Allan.”

Allan tips an imaginary hat at his boss and his husband, and nods them off.

“Did you take it?” Jimmy asks as soon as they’re in the elevator. That’s the part of this he’s most interested in.

Tim nods. “Almost. I’ll get the contract by the end of the week. Read it, make sure they’re offering what they say they are, and, yeah.”

Jimmy smiles, but it’s a little off. “Not sure if I should celebrate or be sad you’re leaving.”

Tim nods at that, too, stepping closer to Jimmy and holding his hand. “I know. I feel it, too.”

Jimmy pecks his cheek. “So, you want to get into it now, or hold it for dinner?”

“You mind if I hold it for dinner and spend most of the drive writing down notes. Got a lot of ideas in my head and it’d be good to get them down.”

Jimmy gives him an affectionate shove. “As long as we get your real attention at dinner, I’ll chauffer for you, buy you some more working time.”

“Thanks.”
This time, they’re the ones sneaking in two seconds before the sun sets and Ziva lights the candles. Tim can feel that the rest of the crew is curious as to how it all went, but the blessings come first.

But, once the prayers are said, the children blessed, the wine poured, and the challah broken, it’s all on Tim.

With them all staring at him, he’s not even entirely where to start. Hell, Tony and Ziva (unless one of the others told them) haven’t even heard about the job offer from the FBI, let alone him considering taking it, let alone him saying yes this afternoon.

“Okay… So, big day over here… Big day starts back on Monday,” and from there he tells them what’s been happening.

Abby gently squeezes his hand when he gets to accepting the contract, and he kisses the back of her hand. There will certainly be time for the four of them to talk more about how this changes things. Right now, he’s just getting through what’s up.

Tony’s about to break in about the FBI stuff when Tim holds up his hand, “Believe it or not, that’s only the beginning of today.”

“That’s the beginning? What’d you do accept it, and immediately go find another multi-national conspiracy involving everything that’s left of the government?” Tony snarks.

“That’ll be Tuesday. Today I may have worked on rewriting how all of us are going to do our jobs…” And from there it’s time to talk about the system he’s seeing and what it’ll do.

By the time he’s done, Tony’s just shaking his head. “You have no middle gears. It’s everything all the time, or just laying around with babies, isn’t it?”

Tim shrugs. “Yeah, well, that was my week. And maybe your futures. Leon’s told me I can’t poach from NCIS, so, as long as it’s around I don’t have a place on the Anti-Public Corruption task force, but…” He glances to Ziva and Gibbs… “You two don’t work for NCIS anymore.”

Abbi shakes her head and sends Tim a not too hot glare. “Oh no! You’re already taking Manner away, you do not get Ziva, too!”

Ziva laughs at that, and reaches for her glass of sparkling cider. “And what do you see me doing? I’ve almost gotten through your list of employees who need to be investigated.”

Abbi smiles a bit. “Just about the same thing you’re doing now, but instead of people, cases. Our backlog is insane, and I need someone to look through those cases and prioritize them. Trust me, until you decide you’re done, I will have work for you.”

“And how is getting done going?” Penny asks Ziva, passing Ducky the salt before he can ask for it.

Ziva glares at her belly. “Little person in there has decided that stabbing hip pain is exactly what I need. If I stand up for more than a few minutes at a time, my left leg starts to scream.”

Breena nods at that, looking at her oldest daughter, who’s snuggling in Gibbs’ lap, “helping” him “eat his green beans.” They’ve found that vegetable consumption goes up and vegetable drama goes down if it’s a game involving the adults. “Been there. That was Molly. Hopefully he’ll scoot a bit, stop poking you in the sciatic nerve, and it’ll get better soon. But, even if he doesn’t, come April, you’re done.”

Ziva looks to the sky. “Amen.” She glances back to Tim, who’s eating with one hand and holding Sean against his shoulder with the other. “What were you thinking for anti-corruption work?”

He smiles at Ziva and to Gibbs. “I won’t have the department until July, so this would still be a ways out.”

“July I will be momming.”

Tim nods. “It might be a very part-time gig.”

Ziva shakes her head. Tim’s idea of “very part time” is unlikely to be her idea of “very part time.” Tim shrugs, understanding her look, and redirects his attention to Gibbs.

“What are you thinking?” Gibbs asks, wondering what Tim’s got in mind for them. “Also you’re the Director of Public Corruption, you think hiring family is going to look good?”

“For this job, yes.”

“What’s the job?” Ducky asks.

“Something you could do, too, if you’re not swamped with stuff up in New York. I’m going to have to build this thing from the ground up. It’s got 1000 people. Which means I need talent. Part of this group… You know what a Paladin is?”

“Heard the word,” Gibbs says, but he’s not exactly seeing how Tim wants it to fit that into this. Ducky, of course, knows what a Paladin is, but in that he’s thinking the historical reality of a Paladin, say the Knights Templar, he’s not exactly seeing the immediate connection.

“Okay, in the D&D games the Paladin is a holy knight. The best of the good guys. Lawful Good. Pure as the driven snow, in it for the glory of god/service to his fellow man. I need Paladins for this job, a lot of them.”

“You want us to find them?” Ziva says.

“Yeah, and not just in the usual places. I mean, I’ll have personnel forms to go through, too, but that’s not all I want. I don’t just want cops, Feds, and military. I also want kids, young men and women who have never thought about jobs as Feds. I want fire fighters and EMTs. Literal missionaries if you can find them. A crew of Mormon Boy Scouts might be exactly who I need for this. I want you looking through the news for the guy who donates bone marrow to strangers and runs into a burning building to save people. I need them smart as hell, straight as a level, and they’ve got to clean up good.”

Tony’s been listening, and he says, “I know what you’re doing.”

Tim nods at him. “Yeah. You do. Untouchables. Hunt them down from wherever. Go through those ‘heartwarming’ internet stories. I don’t care if the kid’s a twenty-two year old college senior, I’ll get him through FLETC. I need the character under that. I want my Men in Black to show up, once we’ve got a good case started, and make the guys I’m investigating wet their pants at the sight of them. I want these guys righteous, above reproach. I want them to know they’re doing the Lord’s work, and I want everyone they work with to know it, too.”

“Sounds like you’ve given this some thought,” Penny says.

“Some. Lots of thoughts this week.” Sean gurgles a bit, and Tim shifts his hold on him, so he’s in the crook of his arm, looking up at him and out at the rest of the table. “Better?”
Sean seems to approve of his new position. He sucks his pacifier a little slower, looking up at his Daddy, who makes a goofy face at him.

“I’d certainly expect that, Timothy,” Ducky adds as he passes the turkey toward Jimmy.

“You’d be right,” Tim says, getting back to the conversation with the adults. “We’re going to be having a week long meeting next month on the computer system… God, I need a real name for that.”

“That you need someone else to come up with,” Tony adds.

Tim shrugs a bit. Tony’s not wrong. He’ll just keep calling it The System or The Ap or something like that if it’s just in his lap. “Well, McNicknameGenerator, think of a name for this thing for me. You’re the one who’s good at that,” Tim shoots back to Tony. Tony inclines his head, liking that job, and thinking.

Tim manages to get a bite of his turkey into his mouth, and adds, “I should probably hunt down Senior at some point, too.”

Tony raises an eyebrow. “Why would you possibly want Senior on this?”

“Paladins on one side, Rogues on the other. I’m going to want con-men, undercover wizards, and shady businessmen to do some work for the side of the angels. We’re going to set people up, offer bribes, try to get laws skewed to benefit specific groups, offer illegal campaign contributions… If anyone knows people who do that…”

“Tread lightly on that one, Tim,” Ziva says. “He gets a bit touchy if you outright say he’s a con man.”

“I wasn’t going to put it like that, but…”

Ziva raises an eyebrow.

“I’ll work on my sales pitch.”

She smiles at him.

“Anyway, next month… Penny, Ducky, any Congressman or Senator you can find who’d be even remotely interested in this thing… Monday to Thursday we’ll plan, Friday we’ll present. Get them to DC for that Friday.”

“How do you intend to run this, and your new department, and your old one?” Ducky asks.

“I don’t. By that Friday I’ll have gotten the blueprint done, and I’ll step away. I’m already looking for people to put in charge. That’s what I’m stealing Manner for. He’s my make the system run guy, and I’ve got a call in to someone else who’s hot with the electronics to see about big picture issues.” He glances over to Gibbs, “And… you know, I might need a few retired law enforcement guys to work with these people and explain how a case works and what LEOs need. Think you and Fornell would be up to that?”

Gibbs swallows his wine and puts his glass down, and then asks, “Are we advising or making sure the system is fool proof?”

Tim shrugs. “Little of both. The biggest problem a lot of tech solutions have is the guy who’s supposed to use it can’t figure it out. My guess is that if we can get this ap set so you can use it, that’ll mean it’s ready for wider distribution.” Tim thinks a bit more about that. “Fool proof in both directions. Make sure the guys who’ve never set foot outside of the computer lab can make something that a cop needs, and make sure cops who got dragged into using a smart phone kicking and screaming can make the ap work.”

“Congressmen will want to know how much it would cost,” Penny says.

“Yeah. I do, too. But that’s something I won’t have the answer to anytime soon. We can build it from already existing equipment. We can use people we already have on payroll to program and run it. We can’t do that and have all of those people doing their current jobs, too.”

“Security will be an issue, as well,” Penny says, already seeing the kind of comments other Congressmen would make.

Tim nods. “Yep. And in a month when I and a bunch of other people have been working on this, we’ll have a better idea. Right now it’s way too new. We’ll have a presentation worth watching, so get me people for it, but right now, seven hours into planning, it’s nebulous.”

“Fair enough,” Penny smiles at Tim, able to see he’s starting to come down from a long, exciting day. “So, what have the rest of you been up to? We’ve gotten official word, DC will go up for statehood on Monday, and it should pass the vote. Then all we’ll be waiting for is a President to sign it into law.”

“Does that mean you come home?” Breena asks.

Penny shakes her head. “Until a census can be taken and a vote put on the books, Jake and I are the acting Congresspeople representing DC.”

Abby smiles at that. “Congresswoman Langston? Congresswoman PhD. Langston? PhD. Congresswoman Langston? How does that work out?”

“There are many other doctors among our midst. A law degree is a doctorate, too. Unless it’s a medical doctorate, we just go by Mr. or Ms. So, he’s Dr. Mallard, and I’m Ms. Langston, and that’s that.”

“Technically, only lawyers who don’t practice law are allowed to use the title of Juris Doctor. The rest of them are supposed to go by Esquire. The idea being that those who practice law are not in the business of studying or crafting it,” Ducky adds. “Granted, on the floor of the Congress, that would be all of the lawyers. None of them have active practices right now.”

“What are you doing up there, as Congresswoman Langston riles up support for Tim’s pet project?” Tony asks.

“Eleanor and I have been working on a project for Mr. Jarvis. He’s given us a pile of papers on the effects of taxation on population growth and business growth, and is asking us to try and figure out which ones actually know what they’re talking about.”

“He’s got you doing economic research?” Abbi asks, as she butters a piece of challah.

“He does. They’re interesting to read, and Eleanor and I have had some fascinating conversations about the intricacies of statistical analysis and number crunching.” A mischievous spark lights Ducky’s eyes. “Or, as Mr. Twain put it, ‘There are lies, damned lies, and statistics.’”

That perks Tim back up. “That was something else I wanted on my team.”

“Statistics?” Abby asks, not immediately seeing where a statistician would fit onto his computer
“The anti-corruption team. This is the sort of thing Bishop trained for. I’m looking for people to read the new laws, and then figure out who benefits by having them pass, who benefits by breaking them, help me find where the corruption starts. Is that the sort of thing you’d think she, or you, would like?” Tim asks Ducky.

“I would find that quite interesting. And I imagine that Eleanor would, too. Though, like Ziva, she might be looking for a somewhat scaled back set of work duties in six or so months.”

“Bishop’s pregnant?” Ziva asks.

“They let everyone know the beginning of this week,” Penny says. “Though, since she’s been working with Ducky, he noticed the morning sickness months ago.”

“Their first child is due at the end of June or beginning of July,” Ducky adds.

“Are they happy about it?” Jimmy asks.

“Oh, yes.” Ducky says. “She’s as glowy as someone who throws up three times a day can be. And Jake is standing an extra six inches high.”

“Not getting her back anytime soon, then,” Tony says. He sighs at that. “I knew she wasn’t coming back, but… Time to actually get serious about hiring someone. I’ve got the resumes on my desk. If we don’t get a case Monday, that’s what Draga and I’ll get down to.”

“And how is Eric?” Breena asks, setting Anna free from her high chair. She’s finished her dinner and is thus free to roam about the living room and dining room. “Haven’t seen him around in a while.”

“He’s okay. Feeling like he can breathe again now that he knows he’s got full visitation with Kevin. In fact, he cut out early today to go pick him up. He and Diane are ‘taking a break.’ I think he’s okay with that, but he misses her, and Emily. He really liked having a little sister. We were talking today about what, if any sort, of relationship he can have with a seventeen-year-old girl he’s not related to.”

“The kind where her mom or dad is there all the time,” Gibbs says.

Tony nods, seriously. “That was my advice, too.”

“Who are you looking for to round out you and Eric? One guy, two?” Jimmy asks.

“Start with one. We got Bishop hoping to go in hard on the anti-terror stuff, but…” He glances to Tim. “You get this thing of yours built, and if we all do end up on one team, we’d never get terror stuff, would we?”

Tim shakes his head. “Unlikely. You might get called in on a murder, and you’d handle it until the terror aspect gets noted, then it’d shift off to the terror guys, or all of you would work together on it, depending on what’s going on with the case. But, yeah, Bishop might get called in to work analytics on a terror case, but they wouldn’t call you in for that. Well… You’ve got some terror experience, so if everyone else who’s got more is up to his eyeballs in terror cases, you might get one, but only if all the guys with more experience in it are busy.”

Tony nods. Though he can imagine the situation where that might happen, he hopes it doesn’t. “I want a cop. Or someone I can train into one. If we’re going to solve murders and thefts, then that’s who I want. Good eyes and a better gut.”
“He’s out there,” Jimmy says.

“Just got to fine her,” Penny adds.

Tony holds up his hands. “I’m equal opportunity. My best partner ever was a lady.” He flashes Ziva a smile. Ziva smirks at Tim.

“I thought I was your partner!” Tim adds in.

Gibbs rolls his eyes and shakes his head, sending a quick glare at all three of them. “Behave.”

“Yes, Dad,” Tim replies with a smirk of his own.

Breena takes over the conversation. “So, in totally not crime related news, Amy came into the office with a huge grin on her face today, and the big, sparkly ring to go with it. Last night was the anniversary of the first time she and Collin met. They’d been in line together at a coffee shop, and got talking when the shop ran out of milk while they waited. Last night, he texted her to meet him at the shop, intentionally waited until she was in line, and then said to her, ‘If I’d known then what I do now, I’d have done this,’ then knees hit the floor, ring came out, and he asked her to marry him. She’s over the moon, and Dad is almost not annoyed.”

That gets some chuckling out of the family.

It’s later that night, after babies have been put to bed, when the adult McPalmers have some time to themselves.

This is probably Tim’s favorite time of the day, when the four of them can lay around, be with each other. Sometimes they’ll read, or watch a show, or he and Jimmy might game while the girls talk. Just, low key, relaxing, together time.

Tim, who’s crashing from a very exciting day, suggested bed. It’s Breena’s night with Sean, so he’ll get to sleep (probably, depends on how fussy little guy is) through the night, and he’s looking forward to that, but he also wants some talking time, and for them, easy talking time is an in bed sort of thing.

So, they’re ready for bed, makeup off, clothing in the hamper, snuggled in for bed. He’s on his side, like usual, wrapped around Abby, who’s facing Jimmy, who’s lying on his back, with Breena at his far side.

Abby squeezes Tim’s hand, and turns a bit to kiss him. “You’re really leaving?”

“Yeah. Something Fornell said to me today, kind of wraps it up. If you can do the job, and do it better than the next guy, then you should. And I can. Maybe I’m not a better investigator than the next guy, but I build better systems. And I know how to build this.” He kisses the back of her neck, and squeezes Jimmy’s hand. “Every time I start thinking about it, I can see it more clearly. I know how the pieces fit together and where and why. I know where the support structures are and how we’ll build the webs to catch these guys.”

“It’s going to be really weird not having you in the building,” Jimmy says.

Tim nods. “I know. It’s going to be weird not being there. I hugged Leon when I gave notice.”
The rest of them laugh at that. “He swallowed that toothpick, didn’t he?” Jimmy says when he stops.

“Just about.” Tim’s hand is resting on Jimmy’s chest, and Breena’s tracing her fingers over his. They’re all quiet for a few minutes. Tim can feel sleep starting to lull him. “This is going to matter even more.” He kisses Abby and squeezes Breena’s fingers. “This is my favorite part of the day, because it’s the only time we get all four of us together. But work’s always been second, because I’ve got you and Jimmy nearby, and even if we’re not working together, I know you’re near.” His voice is a little shaky as he says, “And I’m going miss that so much.”

He’s on the far side of Abby, so she ends up in the middle of the hug between him, Jimmy, and her, but that’s okay, too. The hand on his back is broad and warm, and Abby’s head is tucked against his chin, her soft body snug against his, and under his hand is Jimmy’s strong bicep. It’s a good hug.

Breena gives them a moment to hold that with each other, to be there in that space they share that she’s not part of, and then she joins the hug, too. She might not share that bond with them, but she can understand its loss and offer comfort for it.

Tim’s voice is quiet as he says, “Abby and I already have this deal. At least five minutes, every single day, awake, together. Just, being with each other. And if the work gets too crazy and I can’t get home every night… If I have to drive to NCIS and Palmer’s to get that five minutes, that’s what’s going to happen. At least five minutes, just us, every day.”
The Almost Perfect Saturday

There’s no such thing as the perfect day. Though Tim would say he’s gotten awfully damn close.

And, though it won’t stick out in his mind as a specific date, Saturday is a day he’ll remember as “The Almost Perfect Saturday.”

He wakes up feeling awfully good. A bit sleepy, but even if you aren’t the one who’s doing the heavy lifting, a bit sleepy is as good as you ever get with a not-quite-two-week-old baby.

He’s in bed, snuggled up against Abby, who’s in the middle between him and Jimmy, when Breena brings Sean in for his first breakfast. He’s not awake enough to follow what Breena and Abby are saying to each other, but he does notice Abby sitting up.

He’s not snuggled against her back anymore. His face is pressed against her hip, and his arm is across her legs, his hand resting on Jimmy’s chest.

Soft humming and little muwf, muwf, muwf, nursing sounds filter through his waking up brain. He kisses Abby’s leg and stretches a bit, adding his own content, sleepy sounds to the mix. He feels her hand run through his hair, and he hears the sound of another kiss, but he’s not sure if that’s Abby kissing Sean’s head, or Jimmy kissing Abby.

Either way, it’s good.

He knows he’s got to get moving soon. If Sean’s nursing, they’ve got, at most, half an hour before the girls get up, but he’s not feeling any need to move yet. Soon will come soon enough, and warm and dozy next to his loves is good.

He hears the toilet flush, and the sound of the bathroom door opening. This time he’s awake enough to catch Abby saying, “Well?”

He catches the sound of Breena’s footfalls as she crosses the room. Abby makes an excited yip sound, so obviously she just saw something, probably from Breena, which peels Tim’s eyes open. He shifts up a bit, onto his elbow, and watches Breena slip into bed next to Jimmy, who’s also blinking open his eyes and starting to look alive.

He doesn’t see what’s got Abby glowing, but there’s a niggly little voice in the back of his head that knows what this is about. It’s just too sleepy to get to the front of his mind.

He does see Breena kiss Jimmy, and then lean over him to kiss Abby. Tim scoots up a bit more to get a kiss from Breena before she settles back in next to Jimmy.

“You awake?” Breena asks Jimmy as he’s curling in toward her, wrapping his arm around her waist.

“Enough.” (His eyes are closed again, and he’s resting his head on her hip.)

“Pregnancy test is positive!”

That sets grins to growing. Jimmy’s eyes open, and he hugs Breena tighter, his hand settling on her belly, as he kisses her again. Tim leans over Abby to give Breena another kiss, too, feeling giddy all over as his lips stroke hers.

Sean squawks a bit, not liking these people constantly moving around and brushing him while he’s trying to eat. Tim pats him gently, then rearranges himself so he can kiss Breena again, and Jimmy, and Abby.

Then he pets Sean, and says to him, “Now we get to see if your little brother is exactly nine months younger than you are.”

Breena giggles at that. “October 8th, 2017. Could be.”

“Boy or girl?” Abby asks.

Breena shrugs. “I knew Molly was a girl, and beyond that…”

“Boy,” Tim and Jimmy say at the same time.

“He’s calling to his daddies, is he?” Abby asks.

“Yes,” Jimmy says, sounding awfully content. “He knows there is a serious testosterone imbalance in this house, and he’s out to get us closer to even.”

That gets some laughing, too. Granted, given how good of a mood everyone is, very basic concepts like “lettuce” or “moo cow” would have resulted in giggling.

Abby looks down at the little boy at her breast. “Give it thirteen years. You, Dave, and… Donny, right?”

“Donald Timothy,” Breena says as Jimmy smiles, and Tim feels that rush through him, probably about the same way it hit Jimmy, say, nine months ago. “Or maybe, Rose Jeannie.”

“Oh, your mom would be so thrilled with that,” Abby says.

Breena nods. “Yeah, she will be. Rose was her mom. Well, Rosaria, but we’re not very Italian anymore. And we’re really not Catholic anymore, so naming her after a rosary would probably miss the mark.”

“Still, good sentiment.” Tim says.

There’s a few moments of just quietly holding each other, feeling the joy, and hope, and, yes, for Jimmy and Breena, a tinge of fear, too. The shadow of Jon touches all of these moments. But, for the most part, it’s the rush of a new life and new possibilities.

It’s after little girls are up, after they’re marking sure everyone has cheerios, bananas, and adults have coffee, and in Jimmy and Abby’s case, food, that Abby says, “So, are we telling everyone? Tim and I are awful about keeping stuff like this quiet, but…”

Jimmy and Breena flash each other a look. They didn’t tell anyone, besides the McGees, Breena’s family, Ducky and Penny about Anna until they were sure she was okay.

Of course, back when Anna was cooking, they weren’t so tied to this group of people.

And, back when Anna was cooking, anyone who didn’t see Breena all the time, like, say most of this family, wouldn’t have noticed the constant morning sickness. It’s one thing to slap on some makeup and fake functional for a few hours a week for Shabbos. It’s another thing to keep it going all Friday night, and Saturday, and Sunday.

So, basically, as of this point in time, they know that everyone in the family will selectively go blind if that’s what they want them to do, but… They’ll know. It’s a house full of cops, and of all the girls, Breena’s the one least able to keep a pregnancy under wraps.

Hell, they all knew last time. After all, it’s one thing to slap some makeup on and fake functional for a few hours, and it’s another thing to actually look healthy.

Absolutely no one will believe she just suddenly developed a five-month-long case of the flu. But they will nod their heads in sympathy, keep the kitchen stocked with ginger candies and mint tea, do dtheir best to not get her too close to smells that set her off, and pretend that this is a totally normal occurrence, if that’s what she tells them.

Jimmy’s still watching Breena, and she’s still looking back at him. They didn’t talk about it last time.
They just… didn’t tell anyone. Probably a lot of reasons for that, avoiding ‘comforting words,’ avoiding having to hear anything along the line of them ‘replacing’ Jon, avoiding scorn… If Anna had been another trisomy baby, they would have found out early enough to terminate, and… That could have been a shit storm in the wider world. Hopefully wouldn’t have, but… At least at their church there are some hardcore, pro-life in all circumstances types. And that was nothing they wanted to even get close to.

But this isn’t the wider world, and no one in this group will do anything other than hold and support them, no matter what happens over the next nine months.

Breena purses her lips a little, and Jimmy gives her a quick nod. “Yeah. We’ll tell them at breakfast,” she says.

Having a big, black doggie who likes to play in the snow, a property with a long front yard that just happens to be covered in snow, an aunt/step-grandma whose family runs sled dogs, and a fairly handy grandfather-type-guy, means that while part of the crew is on, Mission: Make Breakfast, Gibbs, Mona, Tim, and Jimmy, have a collection of little girls getting pulled around the yard on a sled powered by a Labrador/Doberman mix.

Tim’s got Sean in his arms, all bundled up in multiple blankets, his ultra-plush little onesie, and his two sizes too big fluffy bear outfit, watching Jimmy and Gibbs keep Mona from tearing around too fast as the girls scream with glee.

There’s light snow falling, just enough to be pretty, not so much as to damage visibility or make the Anna whine. (She doesn’t like anything wet falling on her this week, which has made for interesting bath times.)

He hears Jimmy say to Gibbs, “So, she’s a Lab/Doberman mix?”

Gibbs shrugs. “That’s what the rescue said.”
Jimmy’s staring at Mona as she trots around in a wide circle. “Had a case this week. Went to the victim’s house, and his wife had three dogs who looked a whole lot like Mona. Only, they called them Rottweilers.”

Mona’s ears perk up at that, and Tim would swear that she’s staring at Jimmy with a took you long enough to figure it out expression on her face.

Tony pops his head out of the door and calls out, “Breakfast is on!”

The only thing Tim misses when it comes to breakfast at their house is bacon. If they were all at Elaine’s he could order it, and that would be that, but here… It’s not a kindness to make the guy who’s sworn off bacon have to cook the stuff in his own home and watch other people eat it.

And, pancakes, turkey sausage, scrambled eggs, overnight steel cut oats, (Ducky’s telling them how this is the only proper way to make oatmeal, and that any other way produces a soupy gruel good only for paste.) honeydew melon chunks, grapefruit, and lots of coffee go a long way to filling up any breakfast-oriented desires he might have.

They’re passing platters along, filling up their own plates, and when that’s done and everyone has the breakfast of their choice, there’s a few moments of content chewing before Breena says, “I’m going to miss this.”

The part of the crew that doesn’t know what that means looks a little alarmed, but they rapidly noticed the four way grin, and begin to put the pieces together.

Breena takes a big forkful of pancake with maple syrup, a bit of sausage balanced on top of it, and happily bites into it.
“But with any luck, I’ve got at least ten days until I can’t keep food down, so I expect all of you to help me find everything I’m going to want to eat for the next five months, and hook me up with it!”

From there comes the rush of congratulations and hugs.

The perfect day involves time for work and time to play.

And for Tim, working on the computer system he wants to build is something of a hybrid of the two. He’s in his room, his laptop on, Dragon up, and pushing it through its paces, hoping the email he’s drafting will make any sense.

The reason why he’s pushing it is that a certain baby boy has decided he has no interest in going down for a nap when the entire rest of the world is awake and doing interesting things.

Which means he’s fussy as hell.

Which means Tim’s got Sean on his chest, walking him back and forth, trying to master Jimmy’s pat technique as he talks to the computer, getting his ideas for how this system works and what it does down, so that he can send it to Fielding, and hopefully, get his Professor X on board.

So… Can Dragon pull his words out over small, annoyed cry/whines of a tiny baby?

The answer appears to be… sort of. About eighty percent of his dictation came through okay.

Work and playtime also means that when said fussy little boy finally falls asleep, he and Abby get an hour to work together on the computer system he’s talking about.

Abby’s not a computer pro, but she could be, and between the two of them, they’ve got a lot of good ideas for what this ap should do and how to make it do that.

They’re shooting ideas back and forth, talking programming, talking functionality, talking about what phone they’d want to do this, and all of the rest of it, and having a very good time doing it. They’re sprawled (well, as sprawled as someone with huge, achy nursing breasts and a still sore c-section scar can sprawl) on their bed, pillows strewn about in support, laptop between them as they work on ideas.

And both of them are having a good time with it.

He stops, kisses her, and she smiles, hand on the back of his neck, lips meeting his, with maybe a tiny bit of heat to go with warmth and pleasure. He smiles at her and she smiles back, and then they get back to it.

He’s pretty proud of the email he sends out to Delilah, and he CCs it to Manner as well. Might as well see if he can get Xavier and Storm talking to each other.

And from there, he shuts the ideas down as well as he can. He’s on baby walking tonight, which is plenty of time to let computer stuff rampage though his head.

As Sean starts to chirp again, letting them know that he’s interested in yet another meal, and Abby responds by getting up slowly and mooing at him, it hits Tim that this might be one of the last times they work together.

If he’s FBI, and they’re NCIS… he might not be able to talk to them about what he does.

Tim shakes his head. If he’s got to put his entire family on the FBI employee list as unpaid advisors, or whatever, to get around that, that’s what he’s going to do.

He’s not the wonder-kid without them. That’s the point of the team. They work better with each other because they need these extra minds to bounce these ideas around with.

The house has three heat pumps. There are several reasons for this, but the main one would be that each floor will be much easier to keep comfortable, and will use a lot less energy if it has its own dedicated heating/cooling unit.

That said, they also go through a decent amount of firewood. And with the place empty during the week, there’s no one around to chop firewood.

So, log splitting is on the list of chores (in addition to make and clean up food) for the week.

Jethro’s the one who pointed out they were down to their last few logs, and Jimmy’s the one who decided that this would be a great way to see how well Jethro and Tim are doing on shoulder, back, arm rehabbing.

Tony’s along for this because Jimmy’s also pretty sure that the two of them are the ones who’ll be doing the real work.

When they were clearing out the downed trees, and taking care of some of the still standing but listing badly ones from the woods, Gibbs made sure to cut those trees into firewood sized chunks. And he made sure to pile them up neatly by the back patio. Before his shoulder got hurt, he even got some of them split. Enough to get them through to late-middle January.

And now it’s time to get more of them split.

Gibbs is annoyed at feeling a certain level of trepidation at this. His shoulder/back is healing, and most of the time, it doesn’t bug him. (Too much. His lung is a much bigger deal than the missing bone and muscle in his back.) But most of the time is not all of the time, and he knows he’s not back up to the level of strength he used to have.

But, somehow, he’s up first for this. Jimmy’s got the log up on the chopping block, and is holding out the axe, sooo…

He grabs the axe, waits for Jimmy to step back, lines it up, takes the swing, and… Yeah, it hurts. And not just on the physical jarring sensation of axe biting into wood, traveling up his arm, and settling into a low dull ache in his bicep and back, but also on the mental level of the fact that he didn’t hit center and the damn thing didn’t split.
He lifts the axe, this time with the log still on it, and... damn it, that’s heavy, before whacking it back down, this time splitting it, into... about a third on one side and two thirds on the other. He can feel the memory of his Dad staring at him, shaking his head. Back when he was... eight, nine, something like that, it was learn-how-to-split-logs time, so they worked on it.

He’d take a massive swing, and sometimes hit the log, or the chopping block, and once, missed his leg by less than an inch. “Control, Leroy. Slow and easy and hit it right.” His mom was sick that year. He remembers that. And control wasn’t his friend, because he was angry and scared and wanted something to hit. And it’s now, decades later, that he’s understanding why Jackson spent so many hours out there splitting wood, too.

Gibbs lines up the two-thirds side, and gives it a slow, easy hit, exactly where he’s aiming for, a third of the way in. Then picks it up again, and whacks the axe back down with the log still on it. Again, it splits.

He takes what’s left of that side, and this time, hits dead center and splits it in one go.

Jimmy stops him. “So?”

“Sore. Tired already. If I had to do it, I could, but...” Gibbs looks at Jimmy and Tony.

Jimmy nods. “Can you not swing in a full arc, or are you babying it?”

Gibbs didn’t realize he wasn’t swinging in a full arc, but that might have been why he couldn’t hit dead center easily. He shrugs.

Jimmy nods again. “Got some stretching for you. It’s pretty clear you’re missing some muscles and we’re going to work on that. Okay, Tim, you’re up.”

Tim shakes his head. This is the kind of thing he’s never done much of. Yes, he was a Boy Scout, and a good one, but Boy Scouts tend to scrounge wood. They rarely have piles of it just waiting to be turned into smaller pieces. Set him loose in the forest with a Swiss Army Knife, and he can get a decent fire going (eventually, it’s not a fast procedure) but this sort of thing isn’t part of what he’s ever spent any real time doing.

He watched Gibbs do it, and tries his best to copy it. Line the axe up, figure out where to hit, bring it down nice and steady, and... “FUCK!” He drops the axe and shakes out his wrist. “Arhs...” He shifts to rubbing his shoulder.

“I take it that hurts?” Jimmy says dryly.

“Yeah! Why’d you suggest that?”

“Wanted to see how solid your wrist and shoulder are.”

“Not very!” Tim’s still rubbing his shoulder. He feels like the vibration from the strike just crept into every break and all the rips from where his shoulder dislocated and is now dancing around in shades of pain. He winces again.

“Why aren’t you doing this?” he asks Gibbs.

“Because the force of the strike went through about ten broken bones and a whole mess of dislocations for you. For him, he’s got the bit of scar tissue in his arm from the bullet, and most of the damage in his back isn’t in the direct line of force,” Jimmy replies for Gibbs.
“And he didn’t hit a big, gnarly knot about an inch down on his log,” Tony adds, looking at where Tim’s axe strike stops. He picks it up, and whacks down, successfully splitting the log, but nodding after. “Yeah, he wasn’t giving up without a fight.”

Gibbs looks pained at that and mutters, “Damn.”

Now the other three are staring at him. He points to the two halves of the log. “I didn’t notice it, but that’s would have been a nice burl.”

“Can you still use it?” Jimmy asks.

Gibbs nods a bit. “Something small. Candlesticks…” He rescues both halves of the log.

“So, now that you know that hurts, what do you have for me?” Tim asks.

Jimmy sends him a smug smile. “All the reason I need to keep you out of the ring at Bootcamp for another six months. We doing that tomorrow?”

“Don’t see why not,” Gibbs says. “Looks like we’re still working with Ziva?”

Jimmy nods at both of them.

Tony’s got the axe, so he grabs the next log, and sets it up. “So, what happens to us,” he points to him and Jimmy, “if you and your computer wizard stuff goes through?”

Tim shrugs. “Job gets easier; I hope.”

Tony chops straight through the next log, and Jimmy sets it for the next cut. “I get that. What really happens?”

“If we’re lucky, your phone will do about 80% of the legwork you used to have me run for you. If we’re good in addition to lucky, it starts making connections I couldn’t make. And if it gets built by the guys who currently build stuff like that, it’ll be a giant electronic albatross that makes everyone’s life worse.”

Tony strikes again, and Tim grabs the logs, tossing them in the basket they’ll bring them in with.

“And us ‘on call?’” Jimmy asks, setting Tony’s next cut.

“Okay, why do we have jurisdictions?” Tim says.

“That’s a question for Penny or Ducky or Ziva,” Tony says.

“Federalism,” Gibbs replies. “They wanted a government big enough to do things like fight wars and build interstates, but small enough to keep local control. So, States and Federal level. The whole reason why DC exists is to make sure no State got to claim the Capitol of the United States for its own.”

The other three nod at Gibbs, not very surprised to see he’s the one who stayed awake during civics classes well enough to remember this stuff.

Gibbs continues, “Part of why ‘we’ve’ got jobs is for things that happen between states,” Tony splits the next log, Tim grabs the halves, and Jimmy sets the next one up, “or to cover things that aren’t part of any given state.”

“Military bases, soldiers…” Tony nods.
That makes a certain amount of sense to Tim. “Okay, so we’ve got these levels so people could have more control, but… It’s just biting us in the ass these days. And, I don’t know if I can get the States involved in this. I’m hoping we can dangle the ap at them and they’ll decide to get into it, but… Maybe it’s just us. But, I mean, there’s no reason why we handle crimes involving the Navy, and Army CID has the Army, and the FBI’s got interstate, and CGIS has the Coast, DEA’s got drugs, and Homeland’s got terror. We all do the same crimes.

“So, you and Draga, you’re murder guys. Day in day out, that’s most of what you do. Dead body shows up, you take care of it. And it shouldn’t matter if that dead body is in blue, khaki, or… hell, civilian pink. The tools are the same, the crimes are the same, it’s not like a Metro murder is radically different from a Navy murder two streets over. Same basic thing. So, instead of having you do a lot of murder, and a little terror, and the occasional kidnapping, and the once a blue moon talk a suicidal guy off a ledge, how about you just do murders, and Bob over at Metro, who does robberies day in and day out takes care of them, and Ed at the FBI who’s the Kidnapping King can get all of them.”

“And Sam and I?” Jimmy asks.

“You’ve told me that Metro’s slammed all the time, and most of the time we’ve got empty drawers. With the paperwork software, you don’t actually need Allan full time, not with the number of people you handle right now. So, why not take some of their bodies? Metro’s slammed, we’re swimming in corpses, Faluvia’s two hours away and has like three murders a year. They’ve got a morgue and an ME. It’s just wasted capacity to not use them. And it’s not like the old days when it would take a long time to talk to them. Phone, video call, whatever. Instant communications and you can see whatever there is to see. There’s no reason why we don’t spread the bodies out.”

“Except that it’s probably illegal,” Tony adds.

Tim shrugs and Tony splits another log. “Yeah. Probably. At the very least I can see if I can get our side of it working together,” Tim says. Jimmy’s placing another log for Tony, who hands the axe over, letting Jimmy get a few splits in. “So, what is a good day for you and Allan?” Tim nods to Tony and Gibbs, “I know what a good day for them is.”

Jimmy strikes the log in front of him, splitting it fast and sweet. He got a lot of practice at this up in Canada. Gibbs nods at him, satisfied at the tidy job he just did.

“One new case a day?” He thinks while Tony lines up a new log for him. “One questionable death. We can whip through an obvious cause pretty fast. Guy’s got all the signs of asphyxia, and he’s got a piece of beef lodged in his throat, that’s a two hour job for us. Heart attack? That’s a blood test and looking at the heart, easy enough. Gunshot? Usually we spend more time grabbing the guy and taking him back to the Morgue than working on the cause of death.

“So, say, eight hour day. On a good day, we’ve got three hours of getting there, picking up the body, getting him packed up, and back. That gives us time to get him catalogued, washed off, and all the basic tests taken care of, and a straight-forward autopsy done.”

“But not a complicated one?” Tim asks. Yeah, Gibbs always knew exactly when to go down, but that was almost never his job. While Jethro or Tony would do that, Tim would be working on phone, financials, emails… crunching the data and getting warrants.

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not just with two of us. Part of why we have a higher solved crime rate is that I’ve got the time to work with the little fiddly details. Metro doesn’t.”

“So, say you guys get four bodies in a five day week…”
Jimmy nods. “Yeah. Assuming they aren’t all complicated murders, or all accidents/old age, whatever, that’s a good rate. Time to get into the details, but not so empty I’m sending Allan home.”

Tim nods, taking out his phone, making a note.

Tony shakes his head. “You do this, you ever going to have downtime?”

Tim gives him an are you kidding look. “I’ve got downtime!”

Tony’s not buying it, and Jimmy’s also giving him the we’ll see look.

“I will make sure I get down time.”

Jimmy nods at him.

Tim watches him split another log, and then says to Tony, “I’m not allowed to poach NCIS, but, as soon as there isn’t an NCIS anymore…”

“I’m the murder guy, remember? There should be a lack of bodies in the crimes you want to handle.”

Tim snorts at that. “I can hope, I guess. But…”

Tony nods. They both know that Tim’s planning on getting into the kind of stuff people have and will kill to keep quiet.

Tim gives him a I didn’t get to my point yet look.

Tony sends him well, get to it look back.

“Eventually, I’m going to need guys who look good in a suit, know all the right words, can lay the charm on with a trowel and pretend to be swanky businessmen. And eventually, I’m going to need them a certain age, too.”

That gets Tony’s interest, because he has been wondering about what happens once he hits 57 and won’t be able to work field cases any more.

Tim nods at him. “Yeah. Gonna need guys who look old enough to have the kind of money to make the sorts of deals that get legislators in trouble.”

“And you’re going to need the kind of guys who know how to speak the non-verbal language that goes with that.” Tony’s got a bit of a smile on his face.

“Yeah, wear the right clothing, know the right brands, all that ‘stuff’ that goes with being rich and that I’m utterly useless at. So, say, ten years from now, you want to play James Bond for me?”

Tony laughs at that, a happy sound. “I can think of worse ways to spend my ‘golden’ years.”

---

Abbi heads out of the kitchen, where she and Ziva have been working on dinner goodies, to find Gibbs and Ducky playing chess at the kitchen table. As she heads out, Gibbs pulls his chair back a bit, so she can sit in his lap, and she does, watching the near silent game for a moment.
“Mate,” Gibbs says, sliding his queen into position, small smile on his face. He and Duck have been at it for two hours now, and he’s been behind since the third move.

Ducky grins up at him, whips his knight out of hiding, and says, “Checkmate.”

Jethro shakes his head. Teach him to play against the guy who’s been practicing his game since before he could walk.

“Awfully quiet down here.” Abbi says, looking around. Tim’s napping on the sofa, Sean on his chest, and Kelly curled up at his side. But besides them, Jethro, and Ducky, and Ziva punching down the dough in the kitchen, it’s very empty right now.

“Girls are napping. Mona’s keeping watch,” Gibbs adds.

“And, apparently Jimmy has never seen Mr. Smith Goes To Washington, which both Tony and Penny thought was an affront to nature and good taste, so the rest of the family is in the A/V room watching that.”

“You all done?” Gibbs asks.

Abbi decided that with a cold snowy day, and a woman who would soon be on not too much food, that today is a soup day. It took a bit of Googling, but she found a butcher that had soup bones, and right now the house is filled with the scent of sweet spices and beef broth, slowly simmering away.

By tonight it’ll be homemade pho.

“Got to skim the fat every now and again, add some more water from time to time, but any sort of real work is done. Why, you got some plans?”

He grins at her and pats her hip. “Was hopin’ to.”

She smiles a bit at that and kisses his temple.

“I had a serious thought, too.”

Abbi raises an eyebrow, and Ducky gives them a look.

“It’s for you, too, Duck.”

Ducky nods.

“I know you’re not very religious. And I’m going to Breena’s church because that’s where the rest of the family is. It’s not like I’m in love with the pastor or anything. I was thinking about what you,” he looks to Ducky, “did with Jimmy and Breena’s wedding.” His eyes shift to Abbi. “They had a real wedding, but none of us got to go because that was the week Deering decided to play hell with the Navy. Six months later, Jimmy and Breena had a wedding party, and Duck sort of ran it. Got up, did the Minister part. I was wondering how you’d,” he means both of them, “would feel about something like that for our wedding?”

Abbi thinks about it for maybe a tenth of a second before smiling. She much prefers the idea of someone who she actually knows and loves marrying them, as opposed to a pastor she sees maybe twice a season (about as often as she goes to church with Gibbs) and has no relationship with.

“I’d be fine with that. Ducky? You in?”

Ducky’s pleased by the request, but he’s seeing a glaring problem with it. “You two do know that I’m not actually an ordained minister?”

Gibbs shrugs; Abbi doesn’t care. Then her eyes light up as she remembers her sister’s wedding. “You don’t have to be. At least, not in Alaska you don’t. My sister did a Quaker-style wedding. That didn’t need an officiant. Not sure if they’re legal in Virginia, but if they are…”

Gibbs is fine with that, and he adds, “Plus, if it’s not, would you be okay with jumping through the hoops to get ordained with someone online or something?” He looks at Tim, still sleeping, and decides not to wake him up. “Tim’d probably know, but a while back we had a case with this guy who was claiming his prostitution ring was legal because he was a minister and his ‘church’ was offering ‘healing services.’ He’d gotten ordained by some online thing, and was using that to avoid paying taxes.”

“How did you end up with that case?” Abbi asks.

Gibbs sighs. “He was the spouse of a Sailor. Was running the thing out of his on-base house.”

“Oh, I bet his house was popular,” Abbi can imagine how well that went over.

Gibbs nods. “Yes, it was. That’s how we got called in, too many sailors in and out all the time.”

“And, you’d like me to follow the lead of this pimp and procure an online ordination?” Ducky says, dryly, looking from Gibbs to Abbi, disbelief on his face.

“Okay, yeah, that sounds really sleazy when you say it like that,” Abbi says.

Ducky nods. “I’m more than far enough along to have come to the conclusion that I do not need to be annoying any possible deity that is watching. If this can be done without an ordination, I will be happy and honored to marry you, and if not…”

Gibbs and Abbi nod. They understand. Abbi pulls her phone out and starts googling. A minute later she says, “Looks like you need to dust off your wedding speech. Quaker-style weddings are legal in Virginia.”

The “almost perfect” afternoon involves naps.

There’s something about a very new baby, and a somewhat older baby, both of whom are snoozy and using him as a pillow that just zonks Tim out. He knows that one moment he was on the sofa, talking with Ducky about how to encourage the states to go in for his ap idea, watching him and Gibbs play chess, and then the next it was two hours later, his chest feels cold, and he can see that the reason that’s happened is Ziva appears to have picked Sean up, and is getting him tidied up and ready for another meal.

She’s in the far corner of the living room, where they’ve got a changing station set up, because with this many babies, it’s just easier to have one nearby, talking with Breena.

“Three in one year,” Ziva’s smiling and shaking her head.

“It’s fun. My Dad’s family is close like that. I’m the ‘on her own’ cousin. Amy’s got two in her year, and Christine’s got one. Always have someone to play with. Always someone going through the same basic stuff. We were all at different schools, so we had someone to complain to about the rest of our friends without having to worry about it getting back to them. That was good.”

“Always someone to bug the hell out of you,” Tony adds. “I’ve got cousins coming out of my ears. Annoying snots.” He kisses Ziva, who’s fastening up Sean’s diaper. “But these three.” He tickles the underside of Sean’s chin. “You’re the smart one.” He pats Ziva’s tummy. “And he’s the handsome one.” Breena gets a cheek kiss. “And you’re working on the funny one. These three, they’re going to get on.”

“Like their daddies?” Ziva says with a smile.

Tony starts to grin back and then a little wicked light hits his eyes. “Hopefully not quite that well.”

Breena snorts a quick laugh at that. “I don’t think it matters as much if they’re all boys, but point taken.”

“Sounds like the set up for a buddy cop show or something,” Tim says quietly. Kelly’s still snoozing against his side.

Tony laughs at that idea and morphs into his TV announcer voice, “A tale of three cousins. By day they’re freshmen at Bellevue High School, but at night they roam the mean streets of Washington DC, looking for injustice and righting wrongs. They’re, THE WONDER TRIPLETS.”

They all laugh at that, and then Breena thinks for a moment. “Only if this one shows up a bit early. If he goes full term, he’ll be a grade behind these two. Cut off date is September 30th in our area.”

“So, show up a little early so you get to go to school with Sean and Dave,” Tony says to Breena’s tummy.

“Show up a little early so you’re not driving your mama crazy,” Ziva adds.

Breena nods, slow and steady on that. Sean, who’s all cleaned up, stares in their general direction, kicking his feet, and looking like he’s about to start asking for dinner.

Ziva picks him up. “Yes, I know. We’ve talked long enough. Come with me, your Mama fell asleep during the movie and is dozing on the sofa upstairs. Let’s go get her and more milk.”

Sean may not hear what his Aunt Ziva is saying, but he understands being scooped up, snuggled against a warm chest, and carried. He lets out a content little gurgle.

Having been given the mission to feed Breena as much good stuff as they can before she can’t eat, Abbi and Ziva are on top of it.

The house has been filling with incredible smells all day. Abbi decided, since she had a whole day, and, since it was cold and snowy out, that today would be a great day for soup.

And… if they’re going to do soup… They all like pho. And it’s not that complicated, just, time intensive. The only issue was if they could find soup bones, and that only took a few moments of googling to locate.
And, if they’re going to have pho, there should be baguettes, too. Ziva’s on that.

By late afternoon, the house smells like warm, sweet spices and fresh bread.

Tim’s in the living room, building intricate stacks of blocks for the girls to knock down, and he says to Jimmy, “Heaven is a family that cooks.”

Jimmy nods at that. Even better than a family that cooks is one that will go out of its way to feed you food you can eat. Stevia isn’t the traditional sweetener in pho, but Abbi was willing to play with it to make something Jimmy could eat easily.

Toddlers like meals they can “customize.”

They especially like it when Aunt Ziva gives them little bowls of mostly noodles with a bit of broth and a few pieces of meat, and then small plates with different leaves and condiments. (Not the peppers. They already know that won’t fly.)

Molly and Kelly had a blast nibbling on the herbs, dunking them in the soup, and ‘making pho’ for themselves. Anna likes gnawing on the bread. She’s making a gummy mess of it, getting it smeared on her face and hair.

Ducky’s working his way through cilantro, (a sprinkling gesture followed by spelling out c-i-l-a-n-t-r-o) and he notices his hands shaking, which they do, a lot, these days. Granted that’s been true for a while now, but… He’s much more aware of it when he’s signing.

“I suppose,” he says, as he forms the O at the end for Molly (who’s also whipping through this) to see, “that this little tremor will have to be the signing equivalent of my accent.”

No one’s sure what to say about that.

Later, as they’re cleaning up from dinner, Gibbs gets Ducky on his own. “You okay?”

Ducky smiles at him. “I am old, and last autumn was not any sort of kindness to my system.”

Gibbs gives him the quit the BS look.

Ducky sends him another one back, mostly resignation with a bit of frustration. He holds out his hands, and again, they’re shaking. “It’s likely just getting older. If it’s not… I am already well past the age where aggressively going after anything this might be would be worthwhile.”

Another look from Gibbs.

“Most of men born the year I was are already dead. Many of them didn’t make it to see the century turn, let alone now. If these are the first tremors of Parkinson’s, which would take years to fully develop, the possibility of it ever being a problem are minimal.”

Gibbs eyes narrow a bit. He doesn’t like that, but Ducky isn’t wrong.

“I’ll be eighty-three in April, and I intend to celebrate it, and your wedding. And with any luck, I’ll be here for quite a few more birthdays and anniversaries, but time catches up to all of us, sooner or later.” He looks at his hands. “And my lead on it is getting smaller and smaller.”

As the guys are rounding up the girls, getting them ready for bed, Breena says to them, “You know, there’s something else I’m going to want to get as much of as I can before I start to feel sick…” She pats Tim on the ass and kisses Jimmy, and suddenly, they are both extremely motivated to get little girls ready for bed, fast.

For a second, they both stare at her, looking like horny just short circuited all higher level brain function. She grins at both of them and winks, sure this is going to be the fastest bedtime in the history of bedtime.

And, once they’re in the kids’ bathroom, stripping off little girls with reckless abandon, she and Abby head to the Palmer bedroom.

“You sure you don’t want to play?”

Abby shakes her head, hand very lightly touching her stomach. “How much sex did you want two weeks after Anna was born?”

Breena nods at that. When any of her babies were brand new, she had less than zero interest in having sex. For a good two months the idea was actively repulsive. “I get that, just, anytime you want to hop in…”

Abby holds a hand up. “Open invitation, I get it. I think I’m just going to watch, hop in for snuggles, and if it looks like you’re still going good when Sean wants his next meal, I’ll grab him, so you can keep the party going.”

“Thank you.”

“No problem,” Abby says with a smile.

Breena likes stories. Unlike Tim, she prefers to read them as opposed to telling them, but that doesn’t mean she can’t tell them, or that, every now and again, an idea or two doesn’t stick in her head and want to get worked out.

After the four of them got together, Tim decided that if she wanted to, she could see his raw work, though he did spend about ten minutes telling her that it was really rough, and he can’t spell, or be bothered to spell check, for shit when he’s on a boat load of Percocet.

He was right, his Dragon Knights stuff is rough, but it’s also blisteringly hot, and uncensored in a way Tim rarely is.

She knows Jimmy’s going to be in those stories. She also knows that everything Abby sent her was her and Tim or her and Breena and Tim. (Breena’s not in any way surprised to see that everything written before the four of them started sleeping together doesn’t have Jimmy in any of the sexy bits.) Jimmy… Dae… shows up in the non-sexy bits, and obviously, he and Tim… Gabe… are extremely close, and she knows that all four of them together is eventually where the story’s going, so...

“Think our Dragon Knights might want to do some rescuing and ravishing?” she asks Abby.

Abby smiles at that. “No. Not at all.” She shakes her head while still smiling. “Neither of them ever wants to be the big damn hero sweeping in to save the day and then be ‘rewarded’ by the love of the pretty damsel.”

They both giggle at that.

“Jimmy okay with something like that?” Abby means this level of role playing. She’s not sure if Jimmy’s interested in pretending to be a knight.

Breena’s looking through her lingerie, seeing if she brought something damselish, as she says, “I think he’ll go for it. We’ve never played this game, but we’ve played before.”

“Ah, yes, Dr. Palmer.”

Breena smiles. Then she pulls out a long pink slip. It’s sheer and satin, with a lace trim. “This?”

“Unless you’ve got a corset?”

Breena shakes her head. “Only if you brought one.” Abby flashes Breena an are you kidding look. Breena sticks her tongue out at her. She tosses off her clothing and heads into their bathroom for a bit of quick cleanup. A few minutes later, she’s out, and then puts on the slip.

Abby eyes her, stands up, fluffs her hair a little, sniffs, and says, “Butterflies, Flowers, and Jewels Attending.”

Breena nods at her; that’s the perfume she was intending to put on. “Great minds thinking alike.”

“You want me to tie you to the bed, so they can properly ‘rescue’ you?”

Breena breaks into a very wide smile at that. “Oh yeah.” She eyes their bed. “We should be doing this at your place. That hook in the ceiling would work perfectly for this.”

“Next time. On the bed?”

“Nah…” She’s heading toward her closet, opening the door, and kneeling down to sort through the few pairs of shoes she decided should live here. None of them have any practical value at all. Most of them have never been worn outside of the bedroom. Especially since they’ve had kids, they only go out to the kind of place she might wear a shoe like these to once or twice a year, max. After a few minutes debating between two of them, she decides on the pair she wants. They’re small, light, delicate; pink, like her slip; and have a thin strap that goes over her ankle. They’re Jimmy Choos, and while some women buy expensive shoes as a present for themselves, she buys expensive shoes as a present for Jimmy. So far, he has never complained when she comes home from the shoe store with some sort of tiny, ridiculously expensive wisp of leather and satin to put on her feet.
She holds them up to Abby. “Instant hard-on for Jimmy. So… I need to be standing up, make sure he can really see them.”

Abby nods and heads over to the dresser. They don’t have a “toy box” here. They do have so little in the way of clothing, that the entire top drawer can hold goodies. (Granted, right now goodies are pretty sparse, but there are a few ropes.)

“At the foot of the bed, hands behind your back, tied to the post?” Abby says as she pulls the ropes (red, silk) out of the dresser.

“That’ll work.”

“Want me to gag you, too?”

“Uhhh…” She’s not sure about that.

Abby’s already past that idea. “Ohh, better. Tie your feet to the foot of the bed. Jimmy’ll get your legs, Tim’ll get your arms…”

Breena nods at that, too. Much better.

Breena stands by the foot of the bed, and Abby crouches down to her feet. “You really okay with that?”

“It’s sore, but… got to keep moving.”

“Good sore?”

Abby nods. “Jimmy’s checking every day, the scar’s coming along just fine, and no signs of infection.”

As Abby ties Breena’s left foot to the bed, Breena says, “It’s making a huge difference. You’re doing a lot better this time.”

Abby shrugs some. “Amazing what sleep and not being sick will do. Still feel weird, but… You’re right, it’s not nearly as bad.” She lays a quick kiss on Breena’s tummy. “And here’s hoping that’s true for you, too.”

“Amen. I’m not counting on it, but… It’d be really nice to not lose weight when I’m pregnant.”

Abby nods at that, fingers on Breena’s belly. “You hear that Donnie. No making Mom sick. She’s got a big job to do, and she can’t be doing it green around the gills.”
Breena laughs a bit, and they hear the guys heading into the bathroom. Like most of the rest of the crew, they spent the day in their PJs, so she’s pretty sure they’ve got at least a few more minutes while they get a fast shower, but it’s time to get moving if the scene’ll be set properly when they get in here.

“Think she’s got something planned?” Tim asks Jimmy as they’re in the bathroom, getting a very fast shower.

“That looked like an I’ve got plans sort of grin. But even if she doesn’t…”

Tim nods even if the plan is just a generic, let’s have lots of sex, he’s all over that. He crashed pretty fast last night. There was snuggling, and some talking, and he knows Jimmy and Breena were moving in a sex direction, but he and Abby stayed in cuddle and sleep mode.

And, of course, this morning was good, but it wasn’t that sort of good. And, in addition to not being that sort of good, he’s only getting into the shower now, so it’s not like he got a shot to take care of himself at any point today, or… yesterday… or… yeah, he thinks Wednesday was the last time he got off.

Might explain why he feels ready to run into the bedroom.

“Shave?”

Jimmy pets his chin. “Yeah.”

Tim gets to it. He usually shaves on Friday mornings, but he skipped it to add just that much more of a disreputable edge to his look yesterday.

“Me?” Jimmy asks.

Tim shakes his head. Jimmy usually does Friday morning and Sunday or Monday depending on if they’re going to church. He’s a tiny bit stubbly, but not bad.

Five minutes later, they’re out of the shower, wet, naked, skin pink from the heat, squeaky clean, and ready to go play.

Jimmy opens the door, and for a brief moment Tim’s very glad that he uses his glasses to see things that are close up. Because right now, Breena, pretty in pink silk, tied to the posts on their bed, hair long and fluffy, one breast almost free of her slip, is more than worth watching.

Jimmy mutters, “Shit,” under his breath, because all he’s looking at is a pinkish blur in front of the white/cream blur of the bed. He hops back into the bathroom, and is out a minute later with his glasses. His eyes trail down her body, settling on her feet, and then skitter up to her eyes, and that grin on her face gets wider and hotter.

Then she remembers the character she’s playing, “Brynne.” “Dae, Gabe, thank the Gods you’ve found me! I was so afraid!"

Tim’s eyes light up and a grin spreads across his face fast as lightning. He almost laughs for the joy of it, but he shuts it down and snaps himself into Gabe.

Jimmy’s slightly unsure of what’s going on, but a fast, under the breath, “Dragon Knights. You’re Dae. I’m Gabe. She’s Brynne,” from Tim gets the idea across well enough.

Tim steps forward, “Always, Brynne, always find ya, luv.”

“Well, ya took yer sweet time, doin’ it.” Then Breena breaks into a giggle. Neither she nor Tim should ever attempt anything even remotely like an Irish or Scottish accent. They’re both doing an appalling job of with it.

(Jimmy’s snickering away in the background, catching Abby’s eyes, she’s also giggling at this.)

The Dragon Knights might be from some sort of vaguely Celtish place, but Jimmy knows he’s not even going to try the vaguely scots/irish, old fashioned, Lord of the Rings-esque voice that Breena and Tim are going for. He also knows that, after more than a decade of working with Ducky, that he can absolutely nail a highly educated lowland Scots accent.

“Did you doubt us, our Brynne?” he says, mimicking Ducky’s accent and speech pattern, stepping over to her, crouching down to start untying her feet, and place a gentle kiss on the arch of her foot.

Play stops dead for a second at that, the other three just staring at him. He looks up from Breena’s foot, grins back, kisses her ankle again, and then says, his own accent and cadence, “If all I learned in fifteen years with him was how to dissect a corpse, I wouldn’t have been paying attention.” That gets some head shaking. He kisses her foot again, grins up at her, and says, still in Jimmy, “And I love these!”

“Knew you would, baby.” Breena smiles back.

Tim’s hand caresses her neck, settling to cup around the back, and he kisses her deep and wet. “Corgon’s forces have fallen. You’re safe, now.”

“Isn’t that the bad guy from Highlander?” Jimmy asks, still untying Breena’s foot.

Tim glances back down at him. “You seem to be missing the point of this game.”

“I’m just hoping you’re not going to get us all sued into the next century for copyright violations when this thing goes live.”

Tim gently whacks Jimmy on the back of the head.

“Right, playing along.” He tugs the first of the ropes free. “It was a long and horrible battle, but we’re here. Naked, and wet, with no weapons. Terrible fight, in the rain, against unarmed ninjas, with no clothing, and, oh, look, a bed! Cue the porn music!”

Breena and Abby are outright laughing at that.

“Okay smartass. You want to go back and do wardrobe?” Tim says.

“Nah. I’m just playing. Okay…” He stops to think for a second, while Tim’s looking down at him. “We’re naked because the dragons don’t need to be wearing clothing, right?”

“And when they shift to human form, they don’t suddenly start wearing it. It probably is raining outside, that’s why we’re wet, and we don’t need weapons because we breathe fire,” Tim adds.

“All right,” Jimmy nods.

“She’s a dragon, too. She knows how it works,” Tim says, kissing Breena again, hoping he’s got Jimmy on board enough to get into the game.

“And would be in no way surprised to see both of you show up naked in wet, assuming your rescue attempt was happening in the middle of a rainstorm.” She’s ready to get on with the game, too.

By this point Abby’s gotten her phone and added a rain sounds background music.

Breena nods to Abby. “Thanks.”

“Why do you need to be rescued?” Jimmy asks. Then he looks at Tim, “I mean, did you write this? She’s a dragon, can’t she just… burn the ropes and fly away on her own.”

Deep sighs from Breena and Tim. (And possibly some eye rolling.)

“No, he didn’t write this. I thought you guys might like it.”

“One of us does!” Tim adds, pointedly.

“I like it, just… I haven’t read the stories, so I’m a bit behind here.”

They all glance at each other, and the unspoken message to get back to the game is loud and clear.

“Come, love,” Tim goes back to his own voice, but keeps Gabe’s speech patterns. “Let’s get all three of us out of here before they realize we’re here.”

“They change the guards every hour, so the sooner the better,” Breena replies, also in her own voice.

“Then we’ve got about a minute before they find the first dead watchman,” Tim says.

Jimmy pulls the other rope free, and as much as he’d like to linger at her feet, gently stroking and nibbling along them, that’s not really part of this game, so he stands up, and says, still with Ducky’s accent, “And we are ready on my end. What have you been doing, Gabriel, sleeping? Those ropes still look frightfully tied.”

“Gabe” shoots “Dae” the stink-eye, and gets untying.

“Dae” smirks happily, and kisses his wife hello. He wraps his arms around her as his lips slide over hers, and when he pulls back, he looks her in the eye, saying, “I’ve missed you, my love.”

She kisses back, sweet and soft as his lips dance with hers. “And I you.”

Jimmy’s stroking her hair, neck and shoulders, looking into her eyes, lips hovering bare millimeters over hers, “They’ll never take you again. Never. The war ends tomorrow. Just past sundown, we’re ending this for good.”

Tim stands back up, wrapping his arms around both of them. “So, we’ll need to make the most of that time when we get home. Ready?”

Breena, who’s read the stories and knows that Gabe can teleport himself and others, nods. Jimmy’s not sure what they’re supposed to be ready for, so he doesn’t quite have the right expression, as Tim’s quietly murmuring something, but he rolls with it.
“Home!” Breena says, when Tim stops his “magic spell.”

Jimmy’s about to ask if they just teleported, and if they did why they didn’t just swoop in and grab Breena that way, and then decides that’s unlikely to be a detail that matters for this game. Instead he says, “Home. Where we all belong, and with any luck, we’ll soon spend the rest of our days here.”

“Amen,” Breena adds.

Tim’s already scrambled onto the bed, laying on his side, facing them, patting it, and Breena follows him, Jimmy a hair behind her. As she’s kneeling on the bed, he spans her hips with his hands, kissing her shoulder, and then lifts her slip over her body. He leaves the shoes on, looking forward to feeling them slip up and down his body. She flows into Tim’s arms, and Jimmy snuggles around them on her other side.

There’s a moment of snuggling and kissing. Of Tim’s lips followed by Jimmy’s, and the feel of large, warm hands stroking over her shoulders, hips, back and chest.

She rolls over, to face Jimmy again, for more kisses, and his tongue slipping over her lower lip, and Tim’s lips on her neck and ear.

Hands, so many hand. She’s laying with her neck over Tim’s right arm, so he’s not touching her with that hand, but his left is cupping her mound. Not stroking yet, just holding. A warm, firm pressure, and a promise of good things to come. Jimmy’s hands, one’s under her chin, thumb caressing her ear, fingers on her jaw, as they kiss. The other is on her breast, stroking gently, catching her nipple between his thumb and forefinger, offering her a light tug to counter the soft rub of his palm against her breast.

“I was dreaming of you…” Breena says with a long, content sigh. “All those nights on my own, and you’d fill my dreams.”

Jimmy’s kissing her neck, while Tim nuzzles her ear. He kisses her earlobe softly and say, “Tell us what you were dreaming, our love. What thoughts filled your dreams and kept the lonely ache away.”

“Not away, Gabe. Made it worse. I’d wake, wet and needy, body throbbing, aching all over for you.” Tim groans against her neck, kissing wet, open mouthed on the nape of her neck as those sounds settle in his dick, adding a bit of sweet ache of his own to the mix. “But you’d be gone. Just fantasies leaving me wanting.”

She purrs at that, and then speaks again, voice sounding sad. “Tomorrow night, Dae, it’ll all be dreams again, too.”

“Sweet dreams, love,” Tim says. “But in the morning, you’ll wake, and we’ll be there.” He bites her earlobe, sharp little nip, and then grinds against her bum, squeezing gently with the hand holding her pussy. “Nothing like a fight to make a man want to fuck, and day after tomorrow, as the sun rises, we’ll be back, so ready for you.”

“And tonight, we’re here,” Jimmy grinds against her, dick hard against her tummy, “And like Gabe says, so ready.” He kisses her, wet and steady, tongue slipping between her lips over and over, mimicking the old, beloved rhythm of them fucking each other. She knows the dance, loves it, and offers him a little suck to go with each thrust.
Jimmy groans quietly at that. A soft, satisfied sound.

“You weren’t the only one with dreams,” Tim says. “Been dreaming of this. You in our arms. Getting to watch him love you. Getting to do it myself.” His voice is soft in her ear, and his breath hot against her neck. “Tell us your dreams, Brynne. Let’s wipe away the lonely with lovin’ and fuckin’.”

She slides her leg up Jimmy’s, wrapping it over his hip, and pulling him a little closer, and slips onto him, with a happy sigh from both of them. “This, love. Dreaming of this. Between you two, filled up by you, both of you with me and in me. Gabe, love, you got me?”

“Gabe’s” got her all right. He scoots a bit, slipping forward so that he’s also in place, and for a moment there’s the sweet, full, tight hug of her body on him and Jimmy.

“This my loves. I was dreaming of this. Wrapped tight in your arms, feeling both of you filling me up. I’d lay between you, wet and full, kissing and loving, rocking back and forth between you, feeling that sweet, sweet ache build to bursting.”

“And, did you burst, dreaming in your—“ Tim starts to ask as Breena starts a slow, gentle rock and runs into a problem. Unfortunately, this is not, in fact, working.

Right now, all three of them on their sides, her rocking between the guys, is from a slow, close, relaxed, and very intimate sort of way, great. And, the three of them, on their sides, staying still, that worked pretty well, too.

But, as soon as she started to move, it fell apart.

The thing is, Jimmy, who at six feet, is a bit taller than the average guy, is also on the long end of average for straight guy dick size, but still average. At six one, Tim’s a little bit taller (and longer), but not huge. They both have very nice dicks that she’s quite fond of, but neither of them have what could be considered record setting equipment.

So, on their sides, which is, at best, a shallow position, when she rocks forward, onto Jimmy, Tim slips out. When she rocks back toward Tim, trying to get him back in, Jimmy slips out, and Tim, who slipped out a second ago, pokes her in the butt. They each need an extra inch or so for this to work, or she’s got to lose about two inches of butt. (Which would make both of them pout. They like that curve.)

Which means some level of rearranging has to happen, or this isn’t going to work the way she wants it to. But, she also wants this, close and tight in between them and very relaxed.

She kisses both of them, and says, “Okay, this isn’t doing it.”

(They appear to have both come to the same conclusion, what with neither of them having a dick inside her at the moment.)

“Lady’s choice, what do you want?” Jimmy asks, kissing her, and stroking his hand down her side. She purrs a little at that. This position is really nice. Tim’s warm and solid behind her, and he’s gently nibbling on her ear, his teeth smooth and hard, his tongue soft and wet, little bites interspersed with sharp nips, and his hand is doing good things to her nipple, while his other arm is under both her and Jimmy’s necks. Jimmy’s in front, and her leg’s over his hip, and he’s got his hand on her butt, rubbing soft and sure, while he kisses her deep.

So, yes, this is a very nice set up. And she’s debating. She could do each of them, one at a time, this way. That would be good. Jimmy’s scooted a bit, and has gotten his dick back into play, and without trying to get Tim into the mix, she can rock soft and easy on him, which feels great.

She really likes this, other than the fact that she wanted both, this is really nice.

She kisses Jimmy, and twists to kiss Tim. Both. Both is really good, and tonight, she wants that.

She strokes her hand up Jimmy’s arm, feeling the strength and power in those muscles under her fingers. She knows he’s more than strong enough for it. Might not be lazy or relaxed, but he can keep himself up more than long enough. Tim’s the question. If she does this the way she’s thinking, her whole body weight will be laying on him, and she’s not sure if his ribs are up for something like that, yet.

“Can I lay on you?” she asks Tim, turning to kiss him.

“Probably. What do you want to try?” He scoots a bit, and they start to untangle from each other.

“You lay on your back.”

Tim smiles up at her. “I can do that.” He lays back, hands behind his head, erection pointing at the ceiling. “Now what?”

Breena straddles him, facing his feet, sinks down on his dick, which makes him groan, and sends a shivery rush through her, too. “Mmmm…” comes out of her once she’s settled, and she feels him gently stroking his fingertips up her back. From there she lays back, too. Her head on his shoulder, his lips on her temple.

“This okay?”

Tim nods, and she can feel him taking a few experimental deep breaths. “Yeah. I think so. If it’s a problem we’ll rearrange again.”

She turns her face to him, and kisses him. Little awkward, her neck doesn’t want to turn quite that far, but she’s doing it. Then she rests her head on his shoulder, and smiles up at Jimmy. “You know where you go, Dae, or shall I draw you a map?”

Jimmy’s eyes spark back at her. “Oh, I think I can figure it out. You good, Tim?”

“Good how?” He thinks he covered him being good a moment ago.

“Close to getting off?”

“I’m liking this, but not on a hair trigger, right now.”

“Excellent.” Jimmy leans over, each hand planted flat on the mattress beside Breena and Tim’s sides, and he kisses her lips, soft and wet and gentle. From there, he slips back into Dae. “And I’ve been dreaming of you, too, my lady. Dreaming of the glorious, wet pink of you on my tongue.”

He kisses each breast, wet, sucking kisses, and Tim gets in on it, too. Hands cupping her breasts, rolling and playing with the nipple Jimmy’s not laving with his tongue.

Tim rocks as best as he can, not a whole lot of range of motion on his back with Breena on top of him like this, but he can get a little motion and friction going, and at this angle he’s getting her right in the g-spot with each thrust, so a soft “Uhhh…” slips out of Breena each time he does it.

Between him and Jimmy they get a good rhythm going. Jimmy sucks each time Tim thrust. Breena’s got her head back, lolling on Tim’s shoulder, mouth open, small, exhaled gasps slipping out of her with each of the boy’s moves.

Tim kisses her temple. “That’s it, our love. Sing for us.”

Jimmy sucks her nipple one last time, and begins to kiss his way down her belly, murmuring something, Breena’s checked out enough she’s not sure what he’s saying, just hearing his voice, soft and deep as his lips caress a wet trail closer and closer to her pussy.

Tim’s right hand finds the breast Jimmy left, and he toys with both of them.

Jimmy lays a gentle kiss on her muff, just saying hello. Another, soft, brushing kiss, more nuzzling her pubic hair then any sort of lip action, teasing her with these gentle kisses, while Tim slows down, not thrusting so much as just rocking slightly. The merest hint of friction, and some good, steady g-spot pressure to go with Jimmy’s gentle tease.

He blows on her pubes, a soft, tickly sensation whispers through her, and apparently surprised Tim a bit, because he jerks, too.

---

For Tim this is a very bizarre sensation. It’s sex. That part’s awesome. He’s all on top of (underneath?) that part. It’s also, very wet. He knows Jimmy isn’t exactly tidy about eating pussy, so he’s getting drooled on some, too. That’s not a problem. He honestly can’t think of a time where he was in favor of less wet sex.

No the odd part is the fact that he’s thrusting gently, getting Breena in the G-spot, making her very happy as Jimmy’s licking away, but, he’s also getting his dick rubbed by Jimmy’s chin. Not every single thrust, but, enough, and Jimmy’s chin is a little more stubbly than he’d prefer anything rubbing against his dick be.

Actually, that’s not quite true. Jimmy’s moving his head up and down a little, because that’s the stroke Breena likes, and apparently he does better by moving his head than moving his tongue (or maybe he does both, or he could be rubbing himself against the bed, Tim’s obviously not getting the entire picture as to what’s going on) but when his head is higher, Tim gets a very light brush of something just slightly rough just below the head of his dick, and he’s almost embarrassed by how good that feels. On the down stroke though, he’s getting nine o’clock shadow rubbed into the length of dick, and that’s not going to be winning any awards anytime soon.

At least, not for him. Breena’s vice tight on him, panting hard, and gripping Jimmy’s hair in two tight fists. Whatever he’s doing is working wonders for her.

---

Oh, God, this is her favorite. Jimmy’s eating her out, Tim’s fucking and they’re both so damn good at it. This… Oh yes! More of this!

Tim’s holding her pussy spread wide, and Jimmy’s got his tongue molded to her clit, moving it up and down, fast and focused and in exactly the right spot, and Tim keeps arching up into her and…

Oh God, just, a…

Fuck! Yes!
Ohhhhh….

Tingles all over, spreading from her toes inward. Her clit’s pulsing and pussy clenching and Breena’s crying out, whimpering, ecstatic, and then it gets better. Jimmy stops kissing and slides into her, next to Tim.

Tim shouts at that, and Jimmy stops for a second before he gets back to it…

God… he’s pulling out long and slow and in easy and deep and Tim’s doing as much as he can from below and one orgasm slides into two without slowing down or stopping. Maybe it’s just one long one. When he times it right, Jimmy can keep her going for almost a full minute, pulse after pulse after pulse, and it looks like that’s where he’s taking them.

She’s shaking with each wave of orgasm, and he’s timing his thrusts, deep, moderately fast, rubbing his pelvic bone against her clit as each wave starts to subside, just bumping her along, one extra twitch after another.

Okay, Tim might not have loved the rougher bit of Jimmy going down on Breena, but by the time Jimmy’s sliding into her with Tim, his dick is so sensitized and so wet that the feel of Jimmy slipping over his skin just about sends Tim levitating off the bed.

He shouts at it, character completely broken, “Jimmy, FUCK!”

Jimmy stops dead, not sure if that was a give me more or back the hell off shout, and Tim whacks him on the ass with the flat of his palm. “Move,” comes gasping out a second after that.

And Jimmy is happy to move. He’s going to get them both off, good.

It’s the best visual on earth. Breena’s pink pussy wrapped around Tim’s dick. Nothing else looks like that. It’s live action porn with two of his favorite people and he gets to lick it.

Best sound, too. Breena coming hard, panting and moaning.

Under him, both of them, Breena’s gone, rippling around him, face pink, eyes closed and lips open. His tongue strokes over hers, his body making hers crest. He kisses her, swallowing her come cries, basking in them. She’s slowing down, so he keeps the pace, just nudging her along, and switches to Tim.

He’s an inch away from coming, rocking as hard as he can, body tight, eyes open, staring right up at Jimmy.

Jimmy’s looking back down at him, seeing pleasure-blown pupils, and light green eyes gone dark at the intensity of this space shared only by the four of them.

And, for the first time, it’s really hitting him that Tim is beautiful.

His hips stutter for a second with it, but he gets back to himself, and kisses Tim.
Tim’s eyes slip shut. He does that when he kisses, and he’s got one arm around Breena, hand flat against her chest, feeling her heart pound under his palm, and the other one on Jimmy’s ass, urging him to go faster, fuck harder.

And Jimmy’s not a big talker when it comes to sex. That’s more Tim’s thing, but right now, Tim’s gone, and Jimmy’s hyper-present, very much here in his head and in his body, very aware of the people around and under him.

He doesn’t so much break the kiss as kiss his words to Tim. “Come on, Tim. Give it to me, baby. Breena’s all done, we’ve done her good, now it’s your turn.”

Tim’s hand tightens, hard, on Jimmy’s ass as he arches up, groaning. Breena twitches at it, giving them both a little happy squeak. Jimmy can feel Tim pulsing, feel the extra wet, the gush against the head of his dick as he’s rubbing in and out and that…

“Shit… Oh, fuck!”

That knocks him over the edge, too.

There’s lazy cleaning up, and quiet snuggling. It’s Tim’s night to get up with Sean, so he’s at Abby’s back, right next to the edge of the bed, and she’s facing Jimmy.

The last thing he remembers hearing before drifting off for not nearly as much of a nap as he’d like, is Abby saying to Jimmy, “You really saw him tonight, didn’t you?”

He hears a soft kiss between Jimmy and Abby, and a quiet, “Yes.”

“He’s beautiful, isn’t he?”

“Yeah.”

Tim kisses the back of Abby’s neck, and pats Jimmy’s chest.

And that’s where the Almost Perfect Saturday ends.
There’s been a stack of resumes on Tony’s desk for weeks now.

Okay, not a literal stack of resumes. It’s a thumb drive. But it feels like a stack.

And, with the official, ‘I’m pregnant and not coming back to full duty email from Bishop,’ in his inbox, that thumb drive feels like it’s mocking him.

Tony glances over to Draga, and then back to the thumb drive. He’s reaching for it, about to put it in his computer when the phone rings. “DiNozzo…”

He’s nodding, getting the address noted, and then gives his usual response. “We’re on it.”

Draga looks up from the case he’s working on. “Dead body?”

Tony nods. “Yep. And we’ve got a drive. Chesterfield County LEOs found a dead sailor in a car.”

“Where’s Chesterfield?” Draga asks.

Tony’s texting the address to Jimmy. “Outside of Richmond.”

“You weren’t kidding about the drive. I’ll go get the van gassed up.”

Tony nods. Then he grabs the thumb drive. “Make sure you bring your laptop, too. I’ve got some reading to do on the drive.”

Draga glances over at Tony as he waits at a red light. Tony wasn’t kidding about reading. He hopped into the van, and before they were even out of the Navy Yard, he popped the thumb drive in and got to work.

Draga sighs. He knows what that thumb drive is, and he got the email from Bishop, too.

He’s happy that she’s happy with Baby Mollop in the works, but…

He actually liked just him and Tony. Okay, it’s kind of slow, but he did the paperwork thing back before McGee flew the coop for Cyber. The two of them together aren’t going any slower than the four of them were back in the paperwork days.

And, if they get a newbie…

Since October, Tony’s been Eric’s partner. If they get a newbie, he’s going to go back to being Eric’s boss, and Tony’s a much better partner than boss.

Hell, lead partner, top partner, partner in charge, senior partner, any of those are fine with Eric, and all of them are better than Tony the Boss who’s… not a really good fit for the role. Not that he’s bad at it, but… Eric’s had some really great Bosses, and Tony isn’t one of them. He’s either going too hard or not hard enough, and can’t seem to stay in that keep everyone active, motivated, on track, and happily buzzing along for more than an hour or two at a time.
But he is a damn good partner.

Of course, a lot’s changed since October. They’re back doing the work Tony’s best at. He’s a murder guy, and he’s a really good murder guy, and maybe part of them having a solid partnership right now is that they’re doing, mostly, murders.

Maybe part of why this works so well is that this is Tony’s strong suit. Maybe, if they aren’t working endless terror cases, where a really good day is one where they manage to pin a six-year-old bombing on a guy they last caught on facial recognition three years ago, maybe Tony would be a better Boss.

The light shifts and Draga pulls the van out.

---

Eric doesn’t think there’s much chance of getting through this without at least one more guy added to the mix. He tries to think of something he’d like about adding someone else. They’re heading south on 95 when Eric says, “An extra pair of hands or two for evidence collection won’t rain on my parade.”

Tony looks up from the resume he’s reading. “Nope. Be nice to get done with a scene in less than a full day.”

“Got anyone in there who’s good and fast with prints?”

Tony shakes his head. “Not so far. Looking mostly at guys who haven’t worked crime before. No bad habits to unlearn.”

“Oh.” Draga thinks about that. “That part of what you liked about me?”

Tony nods. “It’s worked out well for us.”

---

The candidates are swimming in his mind. Tony’s reading them, skimming them, no one’s jumping out at him as really worth it.

No one looks like the A-Team. Hell, he’s not sure he’s got the B-Team here.

He glances over at Draga, who’s driving along, looking alert and calm. His usual driving posture

Philly and Baltimore Tony had a partner, not a team. Right now, he’s got a partner. It’s working pretty well. Like Draga said, it’s slow on collecting evidence. He makes a note to widen his search, see if he can find a crime scene tech who wants to take a level in badass and jump up to the majors.

They’re slow on leads…

But, if Tim can get his miracle computer thing into play, and if they do specialize…

All they’d need would be the two of them.

And if wishes were horses, they’re all be hip deep in horse poop. No way Tim’s miracle computer thing, even if everyone bends over backwards to make it work, will be ready in the next two years, and more likely five.
There’s a lot of time between now and then, and then might not ever come to be.

“Ideal partner for us, who is he… she…?” Tony asks.

“Smart like Bishop, but ready to hit the ground running.”

Tony agrees with that. He and Draga aren’t precisely stupid, but they’re heavier on street smarts than books smarts and a well-balanced team needs a book smart guy. He’s thinking about that, and feels Draga hesitate, not sure about saying what’s on his mind. “Just say it.”

“Okay. Maybe it was because she was so cute and little, but… I never felt like she pulled her weight on watching my back. I was out there protecting her. It wasn’t a mutual thing. And, I know she’s a hundred times smarter than me and her pattern finding skills linked more cases and solved more than me trudging through leads, but I’d like to feel like this new one could actually pull the trigger if push comes to shove, and I never actually knew that about Bishop.”

Tony nods. “She never did fire a weapon, did she?”

“Not even through October. I was near her on the wall that day…” Draga shakes his head. “I don’t think she fired. And… I don’t know. If Fornell hadn’t shown up with the tanks, her bullets wouldn’t have mattered one way or another, so maybe she decided that if she couldn’t win, she wasn’t going to kill anyone, but… I want someone who will blow the son of a bitch’s head off to make sure I get to see Kevin again, and I was never entirely certain about that with her.”

Tony nods. “So, you’d consider active military service a plus.”

“Something like that. Someone who’s been through at least one grinder and came through okay.” Eric taps his glasses, remember the accident that knocked his vision down enough he couldn’t fly anymore. “Okay enough.”

“You care if she’s a she?”

“Nope. Don’t have a preference either way. Like, I never had the sense that I was there to protect Ziva. When we went out, we went out together. You find me anyone like that, boy or girl, and I’m fine.”

Tony nods at that. “Languages, we need that.”

Eric nods in agreement. “At least, Spanish. Precision distance shooter. Especially if we’re talking about more and more murder cases, I want someone watching my back who can hit an apple from the other side of a parking lot. Doesn’t have to be a sniper, but I’d like a marksman.”

“That’d be good.” Neither he, nor Eric, can do that. They’ll get close, but they aren’t Gibbs, or Ziva, or Tim, even, with a rifle. “Evidence collection.”

“Yep. Electronic evidence as well as physical.”

“You don’t want to be the only guy with the computer?”

Eric shrugs. That’s not why he wants someone who can handle a computer. He debates saying why and decides to, worst’ll happen is Tony gets annoyed. He’s pretty sure the two of them are past the BS to make each other feel good stage. “I don’t think you can competently do this job anymore if you can’t run the computer side of it.”

“He says to the man who’s abysmal at it,” Tony replies, a little heat in his voice, but not a lot.
Eric nods. “You’ve got how many years left?”

“Eight years.”

“Eight years left. Okay, fine, I’ll handle the computer work and get you through. But this new guy, girl… We’re looking my age or younger, right?”

Tony nods. “Was thinking between twenty-five and thirty.”

“If you’ve got someone between twenty-five and thirty who can’t handle the computer work, he’s too damn stupid to do this job. Most of the computer stuff isn’t arcane knowledge anymore. Most if it is stuff people my age learned in junior high. The guy who can’t run phone/financials/social media isn’t the guy we want.”

“Okay.” Tony sighs, looking at the screen in front of him.

“That doesn’t sound enthusiastic.”

“It’s not. Kate, Ziva, McGee… Serendipity. Right place, right time, the hand of God came down and dropped these people into my lap and… I’m not seeing the hand of God in this thumb drive.”

Draga shrug. “We in a rush?”

Tony shrugs back. “Depends, how soon you want to get back home?”

Eric barks a short laugh. “Not nearly as soon as you do. Not like I’ve got a pregnant wife who wants to see me at home.”

Tony sighs. Two hour drive down, who knows how long to process, two hours back, if they’re lucky… Only upside is that “DC Traffic” is a thing of the past. Anywhere you want to go in DC, like his apartment, can be gotten to from any other part of DC, in about twenty minutes now.

At least it’ll be a fast case.

Jimmy and Allan beat them there, so when Tony gets to the crime scene tape, he ducks under it and heads right to Jimmy, bypassing the LEO who’s standing around drinking coffee, doing a bad job of keeping the scene secure.

Jimmy’s in the garage, next to a car, with Allan, surveying the scene. He more senses Tony than sees him, because he’s thinking through the easiest way to get a person in full rigor out of a car without moving the seat/steering wheel.

“I know we investigate them all as murders until we know for sure, but I don’t see this one staying one for long,” Jimmy says.

Tony nods. It’s a sailor in a car in a garage. She’s bright pink. The windows in the garage have been boarded over with cardboard and taped shut. Same thing with the door leading into the house. (He can see broken cardboard and tape dangling from the now open garage door.) There’s a hose leading from the exhaust pipe to the back seat window, also taped into place to make sure none of the CO can get out. He can see the note on the seat next to her, and the complete and total lack of anything that looks like signs of struggle.
“Yep. We know the drill. Time of death?”

Allan looks up from the stretcher. “Between midnight and two, barring new evidence.”

“Get her on her way, and we’ll do the rest. Draga—“

Tony turns to see Eric with his camera out. “I’m already photographing, then prints on the tape, make sure she’s the one who built the gas trap.”

“You’ve got it.” Tony looks over to the Local LEO who’s just noticed him there. “Time to find out what’s going on.”

It’s not exactly cut and dried, because no case is, but this one looks as close as a case can get. Once they get the prints back to the lab, they’ll know for sure, but…

But a woman who’s been battling depression for three years and was just dumped by her fiancée a month after her mother, who everyone said was her best friend, died of cancer, isn’t hard to see as a suicide. Add in that she stopped taking her pills three days ago, and… Tony’s really not feeling a murder on this one.

Assuming they don’t find a glowing neon motive hiding in the finances or phone calls, or a wrong print on the tapes, this one’s in the bag.

Which means Tony’s not thinking about Seaman Carol Conner as they’re getting ready to make the drive home.

Reddington, Mervis, Spader, Ashwanti, Burke, O’Lauchlin.

Names, names, names. They’re the best of the bunch on his resume list. (Though Tony’s got a suspicion that he pulled O’Lauchlin because it makes him think of Tim and Ducky.)

“Toss me the keys,” he says to Draga.

Draga does, and Tony catches them easily. “Reddington, Mervis, Spader, Ashwanti, Burke, and O’Lauchlin. Read up, pick your favorite two. We’ll interview them this week.”

“Just two?”

“I’m going to hit HR up for people who used to be crime scene techs. Might be nice to get someone who’s good and fast at that, right?”

Draga nods, getting into the van.

They’re just about to the I-395 on ramp when Draga’s done reading. It might not be the hand of God or instant love, but he’s got two he’s pretty satisfied with.

“Melanie Burke.”
“Former Atlanta firefighter, right?” Tony asks. She stuck out to him, too. Only lady in the bunch who looked like a possible good fit.

“Yeah. Worked with them for six years while putting herself through college. Has a BA in Criminal Justice from Emory. Decent but not amazing marks from FLETC. Did a year with the DEA, resigned when the shit hit the fan in October, and is looking to ‘join the good guys’ according to her cover letter.”

“I suppose that’s one good thing about last fall, we’re not hurting for job applicants.”

Draga shakes his head. “No, we aren’t.”

“What do you like about her?” Tony asks.

“Fire fighter, that takes guts.”

“Or a death wish.”

Eric would have to admit that’s true. Fire fighters are usually a hybrid of a deeply honed sense of service and adrenaline junky tendencies. “Could be. Quit the DEA the day the shit hit the fan. Looks like she didn’t want to be associated with them.”

“I liked that, too. No references from any of her past jobs, though.”

Draga nods. He hadn’t noticed that, but checking closer, he sees she wasn’t fired from anything, but she doesn’t have any recommendations, either.

That’s not a deal killer for Tony. “Granted, none of my past jobs would have recommended me, either. We can bring out talent if it’s hiding in there, and I’ve got personal experience of being a half-decent person in a bad department.”

Eric raises an eyebrow.

“You ever see Homicide?” Tony says.

“Yeah.”

“I worked Baltimore PD in the ‘90s. Homicide is a prettied up version of reality.”

Draga waits a moment longer, but Tony doesn’t say anything more than that.

“Who else?” Tony asks.

“Spader.”

“Makes me think of the actor,” Tony says as he hits the turn signal and eases them onto the interstate.

Draga snorts a fast laugh. “Everything makes you think of movies and actors.”

“Why him?”

“Joined the Navy out of high school, spent four years on a nuclear sub, college, and then re-enlisted as an officer, car accident means he can’t pass the physical for the US Navy, but we can still use him.”

“Kindred spirit.”
Draga shrugs a bit at that. “Maybe. Depends a lot on what he did with that accident.”

Tony doesn’t remember a job between the accident two years ago and now. FLETC would have eaten up some of that time. “Applied to work with us from the looks of it.”

“Yeah. Decent amount of healing up figuring out what to do next time. Not too much… I guess we’ll see how bitter he is.”

Tony glances over to Draga, and remembers that he didn’t leave the service voluntarily. The idea that having to bail over the deep blue, and coming out of that accident with a dead bird on his record and a need for corrective lenses, and how that may have shaped him, isn’t something that Tony’s ever thought of.

“You miss it?”

Eric smiles. “I miss being in the air all the time. The rest of it… I could take or leave that. And, apparently I did.”

“Why not fly for… I don’t know, United, or something.”

Draga’s smile goes sad. “Doesn’t matter if the bird you were flying died on its own. Doesn’t matter if they stopped making that model because it kicked off so many times. One crashes with you at the stick, and that’s the end of your career as a flier. No one’ll touch you after that.”

“The Captain goes down with his ship.”

“Yep.”

There’s not much for Tony to say to that, so he says, “Burke and Spader. I’ll make the calls tomorrow morning.”

On Thursday morning, Burke comes in, and Tony takes one look at her and knows she’s not the fit. He just knows. How, why… no clue, but the gut says she’s not the guy for the job.

There’s nothing terribly off about her. Not like she showed up in jeans and t-shirt and had a chat about her personal pet demon on anything.

In fact, she looks a lot like a cop. Looks a bit like a female version of Tony. She’s tall and broad, wide through the shoulders and hips. Solid muscle with a layer of too much fast food and desk work flub on top of it. Looks like she played women’s softball or lacrosse, and was probably good at it, but was is the operative word.

She’s got the red hair, green eyes, and freckles to go with her last name.

Her hair is short, her nails are, too. No makeup. Her pants suit looks right out of the Hillary Clinton ‘professional woman of a certain age’ catalogue. (Though Burke’s a good twenty years south of ‘a certain age.’) In his less sensitive days Tony would have called her a Bull Dyke.

One glance at Draga, and it’s clear that he’s not getting that ‘gonna need to protect this one’ sense he did off of Bishop. Tony doesn’t feel it, either. Burke can take care of herself, and anyone else, too. That gets a plus in Tony’s book.
She’s brusque and doesn’t seem to have much of a sense of humor. She doesn’t smile once the whole interview. That’s probably what gets to Tony the most. This job’ll suck the life out of you if you let it, and working with someone who can’t get into the black humor of it is a recipe for sorrow.

Draga’s not overly enthusiastic, either, but he’s not nearly as ‘NOPE’ as Tony is.

“Why not?” he asks when Tony immediately shakes his head as the elevator doors shut behind Burke.

“Not hiring two of you ginger bastards. People’ll start asking if I’m running a branch of MI6.”

Eric smiles at that. “Uh huh.” He looks in the direction of the closing elevator. “Just rubbed you wrong, too, huh?”

Tony nods. “We work too close and too long of hours to not get on. Yeah, we annoy each other, fine, but… My gut says no. Yours?”

Draga nods.

“All right. Spader tomorrow.” Then he sits down and starts going through the list of guys who, once upon a time, were Crime Scene techs.

Both of them.

Apparently, in the real world, Crime Scene Techs stay Crime Scene Techs. They don’t suddenly decide to be done with the world of forensics and strap a badge on. And when they do… One of them isn’t actually looking for a job. She’s already an FBI agent, and if Tony’s going to get her, he’s going to have to somehow woo her away.

Not impossible. The DiNozzo charm has wooed more than one lady away from a set position. He sends her resume over to Draga to check out.

He sends her a polite note asking if she’s content with her job and might be interested in looking elsewhere. He’s friendly, personable, and signs it Tony DiNozzo, Major Case Response Team Leader, NCIS.

Ten minutes later he gets back.

Tony,

I could be interested. One question, do your teams process your own crime scenes, or do you have people for that?

Ashley

He sends her the response that they do get into their own scenes, and that’s why, unlike the FBI, they’re able to solve crimes faster and more efficiently. He’s hoping she’s asking because she wants to use all her skills to really get into this. Handle the job from beginning to end.

So, he writes about that, and his tone is persuasive, drawing attention to what they do, and why his offer is such a good one.
Unfortunately he gets back,

Tony,

If I never print another scene again, it’ll be too soon. Look me up when you’ve got a scene of crime’s team of your own to handle the messy work.

Thanks,

Ashley

“There goes that one.”

“DiNozzo?”

He shakes his head at Draga. “Ashley Brett left crime scene work because she hated it. Shockingly enough, she wasn’t finding my offer interesting.”

“Ah. Think that’ll be true of the other one?”

“We’ll find out.” And with that, Tony makes the call to Beth Johnson, the ex-crime-scene-tech from the Pittsburg PD.

On the third ring he gets a voice. “Hello.”

“Hi. This is Tony DiNozzo from NCIS, I was wondering if I could speak to Beth Johnson.”

He hears the excitement in her voice. “This is her!”

“Hi. I have your resume on my desk, and was wondering if you’d like to come in for an interview?”

“Oh, my God! Yes! When?” Her voice is breathy, and she’s very excited.

“Monday, Tuesday? When can you get down here?”

“I can be there on Monday. What time?”

“Work starts at eight. Come on in then.”

“I will!”

“Excellent. I’ll email you the details, and we’ll see you on Monday morning.”

“Thank you, so much!”

“You’re welcome.” Tony says goodbye and hangs up and re-checks her resume. She should be somewhere in the 25-26 age range. He felt like he was talking to a teenager. Granted, people who want jobs tend to be happy about getting called for them.

He sends the resume over to Draga, and then sends off a description of the job, what they’re looking for, where they are, how to get into the building, and all the rest of it to Beth.

He sees Draga put down his pen, (he’s signing the copies of the paperwork that the printer just spit out) and start reading. After a few minutes, he looks up and says, “CMU’s a good school. She graduated from there, so she’s got to have some brains.”

Tony nods at that. “Three years with the Pittsburgh PD as a crime scene tech.”

“FLETC last year. Good marks. She might be exactly what we’re looking for.”

Tony nods at that, too. She might be.

If Burke didn’t trigger any desire to be overly protective, Spader really isn’t doing it. In fact, Spader actually makes Tony want to take a step back, maybe hide.

It’s very rare that Tony finds himself being physically intimidated by someone. He’s six one, admits to two ten, and once upon a time that was true, and he honestly can’t remember the last time he had to look up to make eye contact with someone.

(Okay, yes, Draga is taller than he is, but not by enough that he has to look up to make eye contact.)

Zach Spader is six five, two-fifty, black hair cut high and tight, with ice blue eyes. He looks like the kind of guy who can call The Rock a pussy, and get away with it.

Seeing him, the only thing Tony can think of is, ‘How the hell did you fit into a sub?’

Draga’s on the same page, but he actually asks it. “They let you in a sub?”

Spader smiles. “Been tall forever, but wasn’t always in this shape. I didn’t start lifting until I finished rehabbing my knee. The Doc who was in charge of me said it’d never get back right. I proved him wrong, but it’s in my file, so the Navy won’t let me back. Had a lot of free time since then, so I work with other wounded vets, show them there’s light at the end of the tunnel, give them an idea of what they can do.”

Eric nods at that and smiles. That sounds like the kind of guy he’s looking for.

Tony puts that bit of information into the back of his mind. He likes it, too, after all, he’s got a really good history with guys who tell the world to fuck off when the world tells them they can’t do something, but he’s got to see if Spader’s got the whole package.

He does. Not perfect, but good. He’s as good as Draga with a computer. He speaks French and Arabic. Spanish would be more useful than French, but Arabic is good. His references are decent.
His CO says that he’d have happily kept Spader on, and confirms that Spader got screwed by his Doc. His record isn’t spotless, but it’s good. One fight with another shipmate back in ’08, when he was brand new. His FLETC scores are solid, and his instructors liked him well enough.

Tony’s seen a lot worse, and he’s got the sense he can work with this.

“You like him?” he asks Eric as the elevator doors shut on Spader.

Eric nods. “Enough to call him back and see what he might do with a day in the field.”
“We can do that. Got Johnson on Monday.”

“Got a good feeling about Spader. She’s going to have to knock it out of the park.”

Tony inclines his head. He’s not ready to cancel on Johnson, but he’s got a good feel on Spader.

“Wouldn’t be the first time that’s happened.”

The bread is broken, the prayers said, blessings offered, and food (roast lamb and potatoes, peas and mint, sautéed greens) passed around the table, when, like with most other Fridays, the ‘how was your week’ conversation begins.

Tony listens to Penny and Ducky’s updates. One more round of voting and there should be a President, though at this point he’s so burned out he doesn’t care enough to muster a vote for any of the guys who are left. When Stewart and Colbert dropped out of the race, he did, too.

Once they manage to get a President, DC, Puerto Rico, Guam, North York (previously Upstate New York), New York (previously New York City), and Chicago, can all be confirmed as states in their own right. Tony’s… dryly amused at that. If he wasn’t so burnt out about the whole thing, finally having the chance to vote for senators and congressmen might be nice, but… He’s burnt on it.

“Once we manage to get a President, the hearings will start, right?” Abbi asks.

“That gets his attention.

“Should be,” Penny says. “Once we’ve got a President, we’ll also have a Vice-President, which means the Senate will finally be complete, and from there, we should start the hearings up. Which means a lot of time in New York for you.”

Abbi nods. She was already in the process of doing a lot of testifying in front of Congress for what was going on with CGIS, having broken it to the wider government, she expect to do a lot more. “Leon, too.” She glances around the table. “And you.”

Tim nods. “Think they’ll let me skype?”

Penny shrugs. “I’d be for it, but I don’t know if the wider Congress will go for it.”

Abbi looks annoyed. “Is everyone going to be able to ask questions? Going up in front of one committee of twelve of them was bad enough, can’t imagine how long 5000 plus will take.”

“There will be an investigative committee,” Penny says.

“You on it?” Jethro asks.

She shakes her head. “I can’t be. Too close to you guys. Jake can’t be, he was in the thick of it, too. DC is going to be unrepresented on this committee.”

“How many on the committee?” Abbi asks.

“Fifty, picked by random draw.”

Abbi groans. “Oh, god. I’ll be testifying until I’m old.”

“Hopefully not. Remember a lot of the country will be watching this. They’ll be going full on Nuremburg style trials for this. Televised, real lawyers on defense. I know the first round is the investigative Committee, and they’ve only got a year scheduled for that. Then comes the trials.”

“Just long enough for them to listen, come to some sort of conclusion, and then get replaced by a new crop of Congressmen,” Jethro adds.

Penny inclines her head in agreement. “Half of the team is made up of Senators. They’ll be around through the whole thing.” She adds some salt to her lamb and passes it to Tony, who’s next to her. “Tony, how was your week?”

“Getting closer to a new team member,” he fills them in on his options.

Ziva, who has heard this before, but hasn’t had the chance to talk to Tony, yet, today, has a bit to add. “I have more background on Melanie Burke.”

He flashes her a curious look. “A reason to give her another chance?”

“A reason why your gut may have been firing. She applied at CGIS, and has crossed my desk.”

“You didn’t mention that before,” Tony says, potato paused en route to his lips.

“I wasn’t sure if I was remembering the right person before. You were telling me about her last night, I double checked this morning, and it’s the same woman.”

“She didn’t make our to-hire list, either?” Abbi asks.

Ziva shakes her head. “Though she might be of interest to Tim and his quest for untouchables.” Tim looks up from wiping spit up off of Sean. “She’s got active lawsuits against three different organizations for sexual harassment or discrimination.”

“Whoa!” Tony says. “Why didn’t that pop up on my radar?”

“Because she’s the plaintiff, not the defendant.” Ziva says, “Whoever you hire, make sure he/she’s more qualified than Melanie is.”

“That’s why she’s got no recommendations, right?”

Ziva nods. “When I did background on her, the only thing I could get was confirmation that she worked for each group, nothing about what sort of employee she was.”

Tim’s very interested in that. “Good cases?”

“Sealed ones. One’s against the Atlanta FD, one’s against an instructor at FLETC, one is against a weight lifting gym in Atlanta.”

That sets a spark in Tim’s eyes. He’s thinking he wants to see what’s in those cases, because someone like Melanie could be invaluable to him. “If those are good cases, you’re right, I could really use her.”

Ziva nods.

Abby takes Sean from Tim, and says to Tony, “Is Spader more qualified?”

“Better FLETC scores, was in the Navy, he looks better on paper than she does.”

“Good,” Ziva replies. She looks over to Breena, who is eating her lamb. “Donnie is continuing to play nicely?”

Breena nods at that, with a smile, and a bite of food. “So far. Granted, I can always get through the first month. Let’s see if I’m still sitting up and taking nourishment this time next week. How about Dave, is he behaving?”

Ziva groans. “No, he is not.” She glares at Tony. “He is taking after his father and doing little annoying things over and over and over, just to see how much of it I’ll take.”

That gets a look of commiseration from the family’s moms.

“He was kicking me in the bladder and stomach today, at the same time! Heartburn and had to pee, for more than two solid hours.” She gently whacks her tummy. “That works on your Daddy.” Then she makes a little ‘ngh’ noise. “But not, apparently, on you.”

Tony rubs her belly. “Three more months.” He looks across the table to Tim and Abby and Sean. “And how is little dude doing?”

“Eating, sleeping, crying, and pooping,” Abby says, holding her son.

“Behaving exactly like a newborn should,” Tim adds. “We did get a note from the ear specialist. He wants us to take Sean in to get an MRI of his ears.”

“What does that mean?” Tony asks.

“That whatever is wrong, isn’t just a nerve issue,” Tim adds.

“Depending on what they find, it might be something that can be surgically corrected,” Jimmy says.

Tony glances at Tim and Abby. He knows that if you ask these sorts of questions wrong, they can get kind of touchy. “That’d be good, right?”

“Depends on what sort of surgery they’re talking about,” Abby replies. “But, yes, if there’s a problem they can fix surgically, that’d be great.”

“If?” Penny asks.

Tim shakes his head a bit. “He sent us an email, and… the wording suggests that he thinks it’s a physical problem in addition to a nerve issue. You know how doctors like to keep things vague until they have enough information?”

“Because they don’t want to get your hopes up or make you want to go find a ledge to jump off of,” Jimmy adds.

“I’m not saying there isn’t a reason for it,” Tim replies, “but, it’s frustrating. I get the sense that this is more of a fact finding mission than a healing mission.”

“Either way, in three more weeks we get to see about trying to get an infant to stay perfectly still, on his own, in a big metal tube,” Abby says.

“That sounds like Hell,” Ziva says.

Tim nods and Abby says, “Yes. Supposedly, he’ll be sleeping, and it’ll be harder for Tim and I standing around outside, waiting, but…”

Tim strokes Abby’s back. Neither of them are looking forward to handing Sean to a nurse who will take him away to do stuff to him. But right now, he’s in Abby’s arms, awake, looking around, watching dinner (or at least, watching the blurs around him) and being awfully chill for a little baby.

Tim changes the subject. “I got the contract from the FBI on Tuesday.” Abby, Breena, and Jimmy, already know this story, but the rest of the crew doesn’t. “It’s long.”

“Is it what they said it would be?” Ducky asks.

“Yes. All that’s left is signing it.”

“You haven’t signed it, yet?” Ziva asks.

“Probably for the same reason Tony hasn’t hired anyone for his team, yet. It’s really final.”

He and Tony share a look, both of them understanding the cusp they’re about to topple over.

Tim cooked, so he’s not on dishes tonight. He is, however, hovering at the edge of the kitchen, a mug of spiced cider in his hands, as Tony and Gibbs wash up.

They don’t have to talk about it. They all know, and right now, they’re all together in that space, just feeling it.

What it means to be the Boss. What it means to build and have a team. What it means to leave a team. What it means to lead one.

“Spader sound good,” Gibbs finally says after a few minutes of scrubbing out pots.

Tony nods at him. “Looks good, too. Now. Want to get to know him a bit more. Johnson sounds young. Really eager. I’ve got room for two if they both work out.”

Gibbs nods. He looks over to Tim. “Monday morning?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. I’ll bring it in, and my paperwork software. Hand in the contract, and hand over the software to their lead IT guy. Explain who I am and that I want an FBI version of it up and running by my first day. Fornell says they’ve got more forms and more internal tracking documents over there, so they can’t just copy what I’ve got, but the basic idea shouldn’t be too hard to implement, not when they’ve got a blueprint coded and sitting in front of them.”

“That’s a test, too?” Tony asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah, if they can’t get something like that done in six months, I know where the work starts, and it’s not the outside world.”

“You’re back to work on Monday, right?” Tony asks.

Tim nods at that, too. “Yep. Got to get my guys ready to go on without me. Have to have a chat with Ngyn, then start looking through the rest of my team leaders.”

“If we’re not on call out, come up and meet Johnson, I’d like to get your thoughts on her.”

“Sure.”
The good thing about trimester three is that Ziva doesn’t fall asleep any second she’s staying still. So, once the kiddies have been put to bed, and a cutthroat game of Trivial Pursuits has been played by the adults (shock of shocks, Ducky won), it’s bedtime for them.

She’s on her side, curled back against his chest, spooned up nice and close, both of them, for the moment, she’ll get too hot soon, enjoying the cave of warmth under their blankets.

Tony kisses her neck and hair, his hand resting on her belly, feeling Dave squirming around. There’s a wry smile in his voice as he says, “I keep looking up expecting to see you at your desk. It’s been months, we’ve had a whole other person come in and leave, and… I still expect to see you there.”

She takes his hand and kisses it.

“I keep looking for you in the resumes. Keep hoping that someone will just walk in and lightning will strike, and… It can’t happen because you’re not going to walk in and slouch provocatively, with your hair all wrapped up in a scarf, and ask if I’m having phone sex.”

Ziva smiles at that memory. “And you’ll be so unsettled by that, you’ll tell me you’re playing charades.”

He scoffs. “Over the phone.” Tony sighs. “They’re all fine, really. But, they aren’t you, and they’re not McGee or Gibbs or Kate and… I miss my team.”

“Draga is your team.”

“I know, and he is, and… It takes time. I know.”

She rolls over to face him. “You want the pah!”

“I want the pah! And so far, I’m not feeling it.”

“You can keep looking.”

“I think the lack of pah is more about me than about the people I’m looking at. When you went back to Israel, we were looking for someone else, and… no pah!”

Ziva smiles at him. “Then go find your pah!”

“I’ve got my pah! I just don’t get to work with her anymore.”

She kisses him. “I know.”

Beth Johnson is not what Tony’s expecting. Given the quick phone conversation, he was expecting something of a cheerleader. Cute, perky, blonde.

He supposes that she is, technically speaking, cute and perky. She’s young. But, unlike Bishop, he’s not secretly wondering if a Tim’s got another Cyberbaby roaming the halls and she accidentally ended up in front of him.
She’s in her twenties, and looks it. She’s got an easy smile, big brown eyes with mascara commercial lashes, and the most beautiful brown skin he’s ever seen. Like, model skin. He’s never seen anyone who wasn’t Photoshopped with literally flawless skin before, but she’s got it.

So, she’s not cute, she’s beautiful.

Draga keeps staring, and at one point, when she’s working on the computer, using Tim’s test to see if she can hack the data, he pulls him up to the landing in front of MTAC, and for the first time ever, smacks him upside the back of the head.

“Keep it in line.”

Draga nods. “Yes, Boss.”

They both look over to Johnson, who’s humming quietly as she kicks the data’s ass.

“This gonna be a problem?”

Draga opens and shuts his mouth. Then he says, “I will make it not be one.”

“Yeah, that’s the right answer to tell your boss, now tell your partner the truth.”

He opens and closes his mouth again. Then he sighs. “Just thinking of all of those late nights with Bishop. She’s married. I was with Diane… I knew, it was always, there, in the background, but never got past that. Now I’m single, and I don’t see a ring on Johnson’s finger. Asking for trouble, probably… Maybe… I don’t… God, she’s gorgeous!”

Tony applies another slap to the back of the head.

“Look, you can hit me with a brick, but she’s not going to be any less attractive when I come to.”

Tony looks up at the ceiling. Lightning may have just struck, but not for him.

Tim does swing by at lunch time, and offers to take all three of them out. Tony thinks that’s a good way to see how this group jells out and about, because a big part of what they’ll spend a lot of time doing is sitting around BSing with each other.

Can’t do this job with someone you can’t spend twelve hours in a car with.

So, lunch out, sure.

“It doesn’t look as burned out as I was afraid it would,” Johnson says as they head out of the Navy Yard. Coming from Pittsburg, she’s seen the news, but the news coverage seemed to thrive on disaster porn, so lots of pictures that look straight out of Independence Day or Fallout 3. Areas like the one they’re in, which are functional again, but battered, not so much.

“Should have seen it back in November,” Draga replies, and proceeds to spend the next ten minutes effusively telling her about the fall of DC. In his version of the story, he, Tim, and Tony are all big damn heroes, and Tony can see she’s enjoying the story, but she’s taking it with a pretty big grain of salt.

Tony’s driving, and he sees Tim watching them, and then flash an awfully amused look to Tony.
Beth catches it, and smiles a bit, too.

Tony, intentionally, does not laugh.

She knows a moonstruck guy when she sees one, and she’s putting up with it well. So, that’s a few extra points on her side.

“Why leave crime scene work?” Tim asks when they’re all settled in at Carlo’s. It’s worse for the wear. The windows are still boarded over. The menu’s been scaled down because they can’t get everything they used to. The tables and chairs don’t match anymore, and some jackass came in and broke the mirrors from behind the bar, so that wall is also currently sporting cardboard.

But, Carlo is still running the joint, the burgers are still good, and right now, they will happily support any restaurant that’s back in service, trying to make a go at it in what’s left of DC.

Beth nibbles a French fry. “I never got to see how the cases ended.” She swallows. “Like, okay, we’d go into a scene, and it’d be a blood bath. So, I’d be taking swabs and printing and photographing and then… Poof! Gone. The next day it’d be a new scene, and more blood and crime and no answers. I want to see how the story ends.”

“How do you feel about actively writing the end of the story?” Tony asks.

She smiles. “I’d like that.”

Tim lingers with Tony over the check, letting Draga and Johnson go ahead. Once they’re out of earshot, he laughs.

“Oh, Lord, it’s you and Ziva!”

Tony shakes his head. “Yeah, I see it, too. Is that a good thing, or not?”

Tim elbows him. “I don’t know, tell me about it in fifteen years when you’ve got some baby Dragas calling you ‘Pop.’”

Tony shakes his head, again. “Kevin calls me Tony.”

“Right, already one little Draga out there.” Tim watches them in the back seat of the car, snarking at each other. (Once Draga got out of moonstruck phase, he’s been alternating between big damn hero and charming snark.) He shakes his head, huge smile on his face. “We keep saying Karma’s a bitch. I can’t wait to see how this one bites you in the ass. You’ve got to hire her, just for my sake. Can’t wait to see this!”

Tony gives him a shove. “You’ll be off in your kingdom at the FBI. You won’t get to see it.”

Tim waves that off. “I’ll hear about it. That’ll be enough. Make some excuse to get Jimmy up there today, he needs to see this.”
On the way home, Tony makes a detour to see Gibbs.

He’s getting dinner ready as Tony heads in. “Smells good.”

“Just chicken.”

“Good chicken.” He sits down on the sofa, looking at chicken breasts sizzling over the fire. “Got the skin on them, that’s good.”

“Tastes like cardboard otherwise.” Gibbs sits next to him. “You here to talk cooking?”

He swallows. “Remember the horny idiot I was when Ziva walked in the door the first time?”

Gibbs nods.

“If Jen hadn’t forced her on the team, would you have hired her?”

Gibbs knows what Tony’s asking. Not, was she qualified for the team, but, would you have put her on a team with me if you’d had the choice.

Gibbs sighs. “Draga likes Johnson?”

“He’s looking at her like Mona looks at a raw steak. So far, all I can say on his behalf is that he’s not visibly drooling.”

Gibbs chuckles, many memories of Tony and Ziva, and earlier, Tony and Kate, in his head.

“Can he work with her?”

“He says he will. Not sure if putting them on the same team is doing either of them any favors.”

“She good?”

“Yeah. I think she is. She’s faster on the computers than he is, and did three years as a crime scene tech. She’s fluent in Spanish. Scored in the top 10% of her marksmanship class at FLETC. She’s got skills we need. I grab her and Spader, and I’ve got a fully balanced team again.”

“Which you need.”

Tony nods. “Got to see if those two can play nice, too.”

“They will.” Gibbs smiles at Tony, remembering.

“You’re thinking of you and me after we said goodbye to Vivian.”

“And of finding Kate and Tim. Give them a go. You’ve got a Probie year for a reason. They don’t work, off they go, no harm, no foul.”

“Gonna get 12 engraved on dog tags and make them all wear them.”

Gibbs laughs at that.
And If You Can...

Stay at home dadding with a very tiny little boy is a hell of a lot easier than it was with a tiny little baby girl. Probably because they’ve got a nanny now, and two extra parents helping with nighttime baby duty.

So, it’s in a pretty good mood, with not exactly a spring in his step, but something less than exhausted Zombie-hood, that Tim grabs Sean once he’s done nursing with Abby, gets them both geared up for the cold weather, and heads off to the postbox.

All of fifty feet from his front door.

Yeah, it’s not a huge long walk or anything, still, with a new baby, getting the mail is an adventure.

So, Sean’s tucked against his chest, head under his chin, fuzzy bear winter onesie ears ticking his cheek, as Tim says to him, “Okay, we’re off to go get the mail. And once we’ve done that, we’re going to get everyone in the car, and off to the house for our weekend we go.”

Sean gurgles a bit at that.

“It’ll be fun. You and Kelly’ll nap in the car. When we get there, you’ll still be snoozing, so into your room you’ll go. I’ll get dinner started and then…” he pulls the mail out, and like Comey said, there’s a thick envelope from the FBI with his name on it, “and then I’ll do some reading with your mama.”

It’s a thick contract.

Abby’s reading it out loud to him while he seasons the lamb for the oven.

She pauses while he flips the leg over, rubbing salt, pepper, and rosemary all over it. “You know, this is longer than my contract, your contract, and Tony’s all put together.”

He looks up from the lamb. “Yeah. By the time I sign this thing, the FBI’ll own me body and soul, this life and the next.”

She nods at him and reads some more. Then she makes a face at the document in front of her. “Don’t like this bit.”

“Gotta read it out loud, baby.” Yeah, she was reading, to herself. Which doesn’t do him, fifteen feet away, in the kitchen, much good.

“As per the terms of this contract,” Abby reads, “all communications in regards to the duties outlined herein are to be kept to members of the FBI with the correct clearances, see section 4:10, 4:11, and 4:12.” She flips around, reads some more, and then says, “You basically can’t talk to anyone about what you’re doing unless they work for the FBI or another Federal Agency and have a higher clearance than you do.”

“And that would be?”

Abby shrugs. She doesn’t know what everyone’s clearance is. “Abbi. Maybe your grandmother.
Maybe. Maybe not. Definitely not Breena.”

“Okay, first order of business is taking care of that. I’m handing this thing in with contracts for all of you, too.”

“Contracts for all of us to do what?”

“Advise.” Tim puts the leg of lamb on a roasting rack. He heads over to the sink and washes his hands, and then heads over to Abby. He stands behind her, hands on her shoulders, and kisses the top of her head. “I’ve told Comey I’m running this department however I like, and all he’s got is the power to veto me. And part of how I like it is me being able to talk shop with you guys.”

“Good luck on that.” She flips around a bit more. “Nothing in here about him being able to tell you how to do your job. He’s got the right to yearly audits of what you’re up to, and you don’t have any length of time on this. He can drop you whenever he feels like it.”

Tim nods. That’s pretty much what he’s expecting. “First order of business then is making sure I’ve got all of you on the list of people I can talk to. So, how do you feel about an unpaid advisory position at the FBI?”

Abby rolls her eyes a little. “Tingly all over. You know I’ve always wanted to be a G-woman.” She winks. “We do X-files roleplaying again, that’ll up my Scully cred.”

He giggles and kisses her. “I’ll have the badge to go with my Mulder suit.”

That makes her outright laugh.

She turns her face to him, and he bends a little to kiss her. Tim straightens back up. “Okay, let me get the lamb in the oven, and then we can finish reading this on the sofa.”

Saturday morning, Tim still hasn’t signed the contract. He should. He’s talked to everyone, and he knows he’s going to do it, but…

But shedding NCIS from his identity is harder than he expected. He said goodbye to Agent McGee readily enough. (Okay, yeah, there was some foot dragging with that, too. And as he thinks about it, he realizes his first year anniversary as Director of Cybercrime McGee has come and gone without his notice.) But this time…

He pokes the contract. Jimmy lays a hand on his shoulder. “You don’t have to go. None of us will be even anything like bothered if you turn it down.”

He looks up from his place at the breakfast table they got for their own section. “I know.” His fingers rest on the contract. “But I should.”

Jimmy kisses the top of his head, and hands him the pen that’s been sitting next to his hand for an hour. “Then do it.”

Tim signs.

For someone who’s spent almost his entire adult life involved with law, the fact is that Tim’s not entirely sure how to write up contracts for the rest of everyone else.

He’s got the FBI small-phonebook-sized contract in front of him, and he kind of remembers what he signed with NCIS, but looking at the cursor blinking away on his laptop isn’t precisely inspiring him to greatness.

But Tim’s not going to be the guy who goes off to work and vanishes, and then comes home and can only talk about the kids or the weather.

He gets to typing. Each one is one page long, basically saying that the person who signed it is an unpaid advisor to Tim McGee. That position offered the advisor no wages, no benefits, no status with the FBI (beyond the ability to talk to Tim), and no claim to any of the above at any future point.

By dinner on Saturday, his whole family has signed up as Unpaid Advisors to Director McGee.

He’s mildly amused at the mental image he has of Comey looking at this when he hands it in.

Normally, on a Monday morning, Tim would catch a ride into work with Jimmy or Abby. They don’t usually all go together, it’s a good plan to have two cars there so that if they can’t all stay to the same time, everyone can get home easily enough. But, Abby’s still off, and Jimmy’s going straight in to the office today, and Tim isn’t.

Today he’s heading to the FBI, to hand Comey a signed contract.

It feels heavy. It’s a long document, and he added more pages to it. But, even as a long document, it’s not that big.

But, paper isn’t just pulped trees. It’s got the weight of the words on it, and words can be little light things or they can carry the weight of stone.

These are stone words. These are the words that break the tie NCIS has had on him for basically his entire adult life. And though he’s sure this is a move in the right direction, he’ll be damned before he can figure out how he feels about this.

This time, as he heads into the FBI building, he’s in his usual dressed for work outfit. Coat, jacket, button down, jeans, nice shoes. He even added a tie in deference to where he’s going today. He’s a bit casual for the FBI, but not insanely so, especially for a visitor.

This time, he doesn’t get a second glance as he goes through security.

Once he’s upstairs, Comey’s secretary barely glances at him, and she certainly doesn’t ask him for ID. She does let Comey know he’s waiting, and a minute later, she waves him in.

“McGee, is something wrong?” This would be when Tim realizes Comey expected him to mail the contract back.

“Nope. Just, handing it in.”
“Oh, good. Doris told me you were out there, and I thought you’d come to say you had second thoughts.”

“A ton of them, but that’s not stopping this.”

Comey flashes him a small smile. He appears to appreciate the frankness, and that Tim’s enough of a realist to have doubts about this.

“I’ve also got a present for you.” Tim pulls a thumb drive out of his pocket. “Actually, it’s for your head of IT.”

Comey looks intrigued. “Is that…” he takes the thumb drive, “the paperwork software I keep hearing about? Leon’s been bragging about how fast everything goes for a while, now.”

Tim nods. “It’s not like your guys can just upload it and get it working. You’ve got your own systems and paperwork, but this is what we use, and it’s got all the main bugs worked out. Should be pretty easy to modify it for your organization. I expect this up and running by the time I start.”

Comey smiles at that, too. This time the smile is amused and extremely doubtful. “Good luck on that. Todd Carney runs IT. He’s on the third floor. Go give it to him.”

Tim eyes Comey, not sure if this is a test. “Just to make sure, since I don’t actually work here, yet. You are giving me permission to do what I need to to make sure this system is up and running by my first day here?”

“You’ve signed the contract. If you want to get the ID badge made up, and then head over to IT, that’s fine by me. Or you can just head down.” Comey hands the thumb drive back.

Tim nods. He’s got a visitor badge right now. He doesn’t, however, have any paperwork to get an ID badge with. “You want to write me up a permission slip so I can get the ID badge?”

Comey takes care of it. “First floor, hallway to the right, just beyond security.”

Tim’s got the note. “The contract says I get an office and secretary.”

“You’ll be on four. You get to hire the secretary yourself. When you come in to work, you’ll have access to HR.”

“And if I want that ahead of time?”

“Have at it. You looking to hire people before you start?”

“At least some of them. Want to hit the ground as close to running as I can.”

Comey likes that.

---

Rules for the sake of rules. The FBI really seems to like them. Getting an ID takes the patience of a saint. He, of course, doesn’t have the proper paperwork, and a ‘make this guy an ID badge that says: Timothy McGee, Director of Public Corruption Investigations’ note from the Director of the FBI doesn’t speed anything up.

Probably makes it slower.
There’s a system for how this is supposed to work, and he’s mucking it up, and the ladies who run HR are not happy with him.

But, eventually, they find someone who can figure out how to do go around the system to get a picture of him on a piece of plastic with a clip on it, and from there, he’s off to explore.

He’s debating how much weight he should be throwing around. HR, he just waited patiently, pulled out his laptop, and worked on other problems while they dithered around looking for someone to do the job.

If HR is slow that’s not a huge deal. So it takes an hour to get an ID. There will never be a situation where getting an ID fast will matter a whit.

IT on the other hand…

That’s the question.

He’s talking about making them completely re-do their entire computer structure, in six months. Sure, they aren’t starting from scratch, but that’s not exactly going to make the day of whoever gets this foisted off onto them.

Tim actually laughs a little at that.

He finds IT. He’s surprised to see they’re above ground. They aren’t at NCIS. They’re kept below ground to make sure the computers are protected from pretty much anything short of a EMP. But here… He’s looking out at lines and lines of desks, all nice and tidy, to large glass windows that used to have a lovely view of DC and are now sooty, streaky, and overlooking a lot of charred wreckage and reconstruction.

He glances around, not seeing what he’s looking for. He heads to the nearest computer, and asks the lady sitting at it, “Where is Mr. Carney?”

She looks a little startled to be asked that. “Uh… His office is behind you. Down the hall, to the right, then left, and then all the way down.”

“Thanks.”

Tim turns around, follows her directions, and having walked past more computers than he thinks NCIS has at the Navy Yard, he finds the office.

Carney has a secretary, too.

Tim explains who he is, and that he’d like to see Carney if he has some time. She checks his ID, which of course, isn’t actually in the system, because he’s not in the system.

She’s eyeing him, holding the ID, and Tim sighs. “Either call down to HR, where I just was, or call up to Comey, who I left an hour ago. Take your pick. It’s real.”

Her eyes narrow, and she makes another call. “Hey Doris, I’ve got a guy here claiming to be the Director of Public Corruption Investigations… Uh huh… Yeah… Tall, brown hair, green eyes, black leather jacket… Okay.” She hangs up, and her posture straightens up a bit. “So, you’re the real deal, huh?”

He gives her a smile. “That’s the rumor. May I see Mr. Carney?”
“He should be free, let me check.” She does, and a moment later Carney, a tall Black man in his mid-fifties, heads out.

“Hi. Tim McGee,” Tim offers his hand, and Carney takes it, looking at him curiously.

“Hello, Tim McGee. I’m sorry, I don’t know why you’re here.” His eyes flick to the ID, and he starts to look a little nervous. Tim files that away. He’s basically IA now, which means everyone’ll get nervous around him.

“I’m here bearing gifts.” Carney is still looking wary, and Tim’s words don’t ease that. He ushers Tim into his office. “What do you know about the NCIS paperwork software?”

Carney shrugs. “I know it exists. I’ve got a few people nipping at my heels trying to get me to build one for us. Why?”

Tim flicks his ID badge. “Technically, I don’t start this job until July. Right now, I’m still with NCIS, and I’m the architect of the paperwork software.” He hands over the thumb drive. “You can’t just install it. You’ll have to modify it for your systems. But, in six months, when I start here, I want this up and running.”

“Six months?” Carney looks like this is the punchline to a very bad joke.

Tim nods.

“Really?”

Tim nods again. “Shouldn’t take you more than a month. It’s all in there, you just need to modify it for your forms. Another month or two for testing. Three additional months for SNAFU. You’re good to go.”

“I can’t even get this on the schedule of upkeep for two years.”

Tim blinks. “Two years? You are so backlogged that when someone has a tech call, you are two years behind?”

“No. But our maintenance and upgrade schedule is done two years out. We can start on this after the 2018 system upgrade.”

Tim purses his lips and blinks again. “This system will save the entire FBI tens of thousands of man hours a day, and you can’t install it for two years?”

“I’d like to, but… What should I bump? Getting new computers set up? Running system diagnostics? Making sure our current systems keep running?”

“Yes.”

Now it’s Comey’s turn to blink. “What? Things fall apart if I don’t follow that schedule.”

Tim’s not terribly impressed by that. If his system is that tight, there’s something wrong with it. “Crime. That’s our job. We solve crimes. Not you and I, not personally, not anymore,” Tim adds quietly, hoping that’s not really true. “But we’re here so they,” he gestures to the outside world, “can do that. They don’t get to go do that if they’re filling out forms. So, this just got bumped to the top of your list. It’s higher priority than anything not absolutely vital to keep the FBI running. Move back new computers and put those people on this.”
Carney is looking at Tim like he’s being particularly dense. “They’re installation techs. What would they do with this?”

Tim mentally groans. Of course they’ve got enough people here to have guys who just install computers. He thinks for a moment and then says, “Wait, you’ve got a two-year-long queue?”

Carney nods.

“Two-years-long?”

“Yes.” He puts a lot of emphasis on that, as if he’s talking to a particularly stubborn, and stupid, child. “We have all of our maintenance set two years in advance.”

“We’ve lost five states in the last three months, and sure, you didn’t have more than a handful of people in North Dakota and Alaska, but you want me to believe that you guys shut down your offices in California and Texas, two of what used to be the three most populated states, didn’t fire any of those guys, moved them around to what you’ve got left here in the US, and you can’t find thirty guys who are just twiddling their thumbs to implement this?”

Carney looks chagrined at that.

Tim’s eyes narrow. Rules for the sake of rules. They set those schedules up two years ago, and by God they were going to follow them.

Carney sighs and nods. “Six months?”

“Six months, and it better run smooth as silk.”

On the drive back to NCIS, Tim’s thinking through his next job. Talk to Ngyn. He’ll offer her the job, she’ll say no, and then he’ll spend the rest of the morning reading up on his other team leaders.

From there, it’s lunch with Tony’s new crew. That’ll be interesting.

Tim had forgotten that some of NCIS is a bit tense around him these days.

It comes slamming back into him when he goes breezing into Abby’s lab to show off Sean pictures with the guys, and they all give him the cold shoulder.

He prints out a picture of Sean in his fuzzy bear snuggli, and tapes it up on Abby’s computer. He can feel Corwin staring at him, eyes burning into the back of his head.

On the way out, Tim texts Abby. Your guys are still righteously pissed on your behalf.

He’s in the elevator when he gets back What happened?

They all glared at me and couldn’t bother to even smile at the Sean pictures.

Wince.
Yeah. Given how frosty the reception was, I didn’t stick around to chat. Didn’t mention that he’s deaf.

Okay. How’d dropping off the contract go?

Tim spends a minute texting her the details, and then heads into his own office.

It’s true that he lost a lot of popularity points with NCIS in general, it’s also true that he’s the Boss of Cybercrime, and when the Boss is taping up pictures of his new baby, people come over to say congratulations and coo over how cute he is.

Which Tim absolutely takes as Sean’s due. He is an insanely cute little boy, and even if people are looking at him like he’s a two-timing pervert, there’s no reason why they shouldn’t spend a moment basking in the joy that is looking at pictures of Sean in a series of ridiculously cute little outfits.

He’s still stuck with not having a good answer for “How is he?”

He’s fine. He’s growing in leaps and bounds. He’s already eight pounds and his hair is coming in nice and thick. He’s as healthy as a newborn can be, except, he’s deaf.

It occurs to Tim, as he’s taping those pictures up and answering questions about Sean, that one of these days, those pictures will have hearing aids or cochlear implants, or something, and that it’s going to be really obvious to anyone who sees a picture of Sean that he can’t hear.

So, as he’s talking to Connon (who is also a dad) about his little guy, he says, “We did have one hiccough. They did the hearing tests, and Sean’s deaf.”

Connon nods along. “Yeah, I heard about that. Last update said you guys didn’t know what was coming next, any news?”

This would be when Tim remembers that Howard and Ngyn are on his baby contact list, and of course, they got the Sean’s deaf email.

By now, it’s probably all over work.

“More testing coming up soon.”

“That’s got to be rough. Even when everything is fine, seeing them in the doctor’s office sucks.”

Tim inclines his head. “Yeah. He slept through the testing, easy as can be. I had to keep myself from grabbing him away from the nurse.”

Connon laughs a bit at that. “First time Seth had his vaccinations, I wanted to hit the nurse. She’s doing her job, but she made my boy cry, and… I almost grabbed her away from him.”

Tim shakes his head. “It’s crazy. But, yeah.”

Connon’s watching him, gaze intense. “Heard some rumors…”

“About?” Tim’s wondering if they’re on the verge of a really uncomfortable conversation about his sexuality.

“Some sort of big computer shindig coming up. Redoing how we run the whole thing. I want in.”
That Tim’s happy to talk about. “I’ll be sending out the email later today. Got a few big projects coming up and we’re going to need people on them. I’m good with you clearing out your calendar for the first week of March.”

“Good.”

He swings by Ngyn’s desk, and promptly remembers that she and the rest of the Dream Team usually work nights.

Which means… Email time.

He sends her off a quick one asking for some facetime when she gets in this afternoon. He sends a longer one out detailing what he hopes to do with the March Tech in Crime Commission, and how he wants all of them to devote some time to ideas for how this should work. He then sets out a plan for them to come up with a team to go to the Commission, people who will be on point for representing the rest of NCIS Cyber for this.

He sends that out to his guys and IT, too.

Anyone with the talent for it should be doing it.

Which leaves him with five minutes before lunch with Tony and his newbie.

Lunch was fun. Johnson’s so cute. She looks so much like Abbie from Sleepy Hollow Tim wants to pinch himself. And Draga is in so far over his head he doesn’t know what to do with himself. Tim can’t wait to see how this shakes out. Tony tells him that Spader is also a young guy, and Tim just shakes his head.

Team DiNozzo’s going to be a blast.

Tim’s in a fabulous mood as he gets back to the office.

He swings by Autopsy to go check in with Jimmy, get him up to date on Tony’s new kids, and suggest he needs to get up and see them for himself.

Jimmy also appears to be amused by Tony’s new team, and says he’ll get up as soon as he’s got the monthly inventory done.

“So, what are we doing for the ladies for Valentine’s day?” Jimmy asks Tim as he’s counting up the packs glass slides.

“Uh.” Right, there’s this thing, that’s happening in three weeks, that requires him to do something.

“Eloquent.”

Tim’s shaking his head. “No ideas. I’m gonna assume sex is out for Abby. Maybe not, but I’m not going to plan on it.”

Jimmy offers up a lackluster smile. “Probably for Breena, too.”

They sigh. Both are hoping this will be a low or no morning sickness pregnancy, but neither is planning on it.

Tim dithers through his go-to romantic plans while Jimmy watches him. Tim looks back, getting the sense that Jimmy’s got an idea. “What?”

“How does writing poetry go?”

“Uh…” He doesn’t understand what Jimmy means by that.

“Like, do you have to be inspired, or can you just sit down and slug it out?”

“Never tried just belting it out, but I probably could, why?”

“You write; I sing.”

Tim likes that idea. A whole lot. He doesn’t know much about writing music, but he figures that if Jimmy can get a tune out of whatever lyrics he can come up with… “Ziva plays piano, and Tony plays guitar and piano.”

Jimmy nods at that. “Yeah. I can write the music. Been a long time since I’ve done something like that, but a note’s a note. Doesn’t matter if it’s voice or instrument. So… get me some lyrics.”

Tim keeps thinking. “Don’t suppose you could get me a tune first, and then give me something to build them on.”

“We’ll both work on it, and then shape it together.”

Tim smiles, huge grin on his face. The ladies should really go for that. A moment later, he’s still watching Jimmy when a thought hits. “Do we get each other Valentine’s presents?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Wasn’t planning on it.”

Tim nods. “I wasn’t either.”

“Okay, we’re good.”

Back to work. As he told Connon, he’s got two big projects and the second one needs people on it, as well.

He grabs his phone as he heads to his desk, and calls Tony. “Is Bishop still on the payroll?”

“Yeah. She just gave her thirty days’ notice. Why?”

“I’ve got a project that someone who’s good with statistical analysis should be on. If we’re still employing her, I’d like to run it by her.”

“Fine by me. As long as she’s got time to run financials and stuff.”

“I don’t think I’ll monopolize her time.”
“Okay.” There’s a pause while Tony thinks. “What do you need statistical analysis on? Terror stuff?”

“Closer to home. Back when the thing went down with The Admiral, Vance and I got talking to the press. We made some noise about NCIS using big data to hunt down sexual harassment and discrimination. So, I’m back, I’ve got a few minutes, time to get that going.”

Tim can’t see Tony’s expression, but he can imagine it. “Good luck.”

“Thanks.”

He gets to his office, writes yet another email, explaining what he wants to do to Bishop, and how, in order to do it, he needs a median number of assault cases baseline to play off of.

An hour later, as he’s working through the basic design ideas, he gets an email back from her, very excited, happy to be on it.

Tim smiles at that. Good to get her working on something she’s a good fit for.

He’s got the basic plan laid down. Not bad for three hours of work. Granted, nothing is done beyond the basic plan, and honestly there are more than a few sections where he’s got a set of parentheses and _insert functional code here_ as place holders.

It actually looks a lot like the outline of one of his novels when he’s just getting into it.

One last thing to do before going home, and that’s poke his head out of his office, and see that now, as the night shift is beginning, that Ngyn is sitting at her desk.

He ambles over. “Hey, got a minute to talk?”

She’s looking slightly worried as she stands up, saying, “Sure, Boss.”

Normally he’d say something like, “This isn’t a big deal, relax.” But it is a big deal, so he doesn’t, and he can feel her tense walking the twenty steps to his office beside him. Unfortunately, him closing the door behind them just freaks her out more.

“It’s okay, Ngyn. Nothing… Okay, not nothing, this is a big deal, and one I’d like to keep between us for the time being.”

Now she’s gone from freaked out to borderline panicked. “Everyone’s okay, right? Sean and Abby and Jimmy and…”

He smiles. “No one’s sick, hurt, or dying or anything like that. Since we shook everything up back in October, the world’s been changing. Hopefully for the better. One of those changes is that I’ve accepted a position with the FBI starting in July.”

“You can’t leave!”

He smiles at that, too. “Thanks. I don’t want to, not really, but… It’s a good job, and it’s a job I could do really good things with. It’s Director of Public Corruption Investigations. It’s doing what we did back in October, all the time, for anyone who works for the government.”
Ngyn lets out a long, slow breath. “Wow.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Can’t say no to that. But, I can’t do that and still run this department. So, come July, I’m out of here, and we need a new Director of Cybercrime for NCIS.”

Ngyn’s eyes go wide and for a second he feels like he’s looking at a deer in the headlights. Then she blinks and straightens up and nods. “Okay.”

Tim wasn’t expecting that. “Okay?”

“Yeah. You’re offering me the job, right?”

Tim blinks. “Uh… well… yeah, but…”

“But…” she’s staring at him.

“But you were supposed to say ‘no.’ Ngyn, you don’t like working with people, which is like, sixty percent of this job.”

She shrugs. “Why are you asking me?”

“You’ve got the time in, you’re a great problem solver, you’ve got the technical skills and the vision to do great things, just… you’re weaker on getting other people to execute than I’d like, but I didn’t want to insult you by not offering you the job.”

“Do you want to leave NCIS? All else being equal, would you stay here?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. I love it here, but… It’s a great job I could do great things with.”

She smiles back at him, and he sees his own thoughts reflecting back at him. “You’re heading off in July, right?”

He nods.

“Four months. Give me four months to work on my dealing-with-other-people skills. If at the end of four months, you don’t think I’ve done well enough with it, I won’t blink when you offer this to your next best pick.”

Now it’s Tim’s turn to smile. “I like that idea. And I’ve got another one. You get online and read your emails, yet?”

“You got me ten seconds after I sat down, hadn’t even logged in, yet.”

Tim nods at that, too. “Get online, read the email I sent about the Tech in Crime commission. You’re point on the NCIS team. I want a blueprint for what this thing is going to be, based on what everyone at NCIS has to offer on this, and you’re going to be the one to handle the NCIS contingent at the Commission. If you can run that without wanting to curl up into a ball and cry, the day to day stuff of this job shouldn’t shake you.”

Ngyn straightens her back again. She doesn’t exactly look happy, but she doesn’t look like she’s about to go off to face a firing squad, either.

She starts to get up, and Tim has another insight. “It’s okay if you don’t want it.”

“I know. But, like you said, I could do great things with this, so I might as well be in a position to do them.”
“Yeah.” Tim nods at her again. “That’s the whole crux of it right? Why we do this kind of work?”

“Yeah, it is. So, do I still call you Boss?”

“Out there you do. I’m not going public with this for a while, yet. Leon knows, and you and him are all I need knowing about this until, say, late May. In here, in private, I prefer Tim.”

“Okay, Tim.”

All in all, as he’s walking to his car, he’s thinking that was a good day.
Feel like dinner at Fornell’s? Pops up on Abbi’s phone about mid-day on Wednesday.

She thinks about it, looks at the pile of stuff in her inbox, thinks about what’s left that she’s got to do today, and how many late nights she’s worked this week, and decides that, yes, she deserves an early night for once.

Sure. Pick me up here, and then over to his place? She sends back to Gibbs.

Be there at 5:30.

“What’s the occasion?” Gibbs asks as Wendy opens the door and kisses him on the cheek. He can tell something big has happened. The house smells like heaven, buttery-garlicy-seafoody scents wafting about. He can see that Fornell’s got champagne on ice, and wine glasses at the ready. The table’s set for a feast, and everyone has good mood vibes pouring off of them.

She’s hugging Abbi, and says, “Not my occasion. He wouldn’t say until you two showed up.”

“Mysterious,” Abbi replies.

Wendy shrugs, takes their coats and waves them through the dining room toward the kitchen, where Fornell’s cooking away.

“Win the lotto?” Gibbs asks. Fornell’s not quite as tight with cash as Diane made him out to be, but this level of expense on an out of the blue Wednesday night… That’s odd for him. And Gibbs always gets a bit uncomfortable when people start acting odd.

“Sea scallops were on sale,” he says, standing in front of the stove, browning up a little butter with some garlic and onions in it. “Too many to eat at once, and they don’t freeze.”

That strikes Gibbs as a good reason to get together. But he knows it’s not the only reason. Among other things, if he hadn’t wanted to get together, Fornell would have only gotten enough scallops for him and Wendy. Besides, Gibbs saw the bubbly, and knows Fornell well enough to know good scallops on sale is just the tip of whatever’s got him so happy.

“What are you doing with them?” Abbi asks, pulling closer to the stove, getting a quick kiss from Fornell.

“Scallop scampi. Pasta’s almost done. They’re just about ready to go in.”

“Short cooking time?” Gibbs asks. What he knows about scallops and how to cook them would fill a small thimble. He’s much better acquainted with eating them.

Fornell shakes his head. “Jethro…” He gently slips the first of them into the hot butter. “You just want them to,” he makes a little kiss sound, “the butter and garlic. And then,” one more kiss sound, “over they go. They’re just saying hi, nice and easy. Then a bit of stock…” he shakes his head, pouring the liquid in with the scallops, “Nona’d be rolling over in her grave if she saw me doing this with chicken stock.”
“With as often as you send her rolling, Tobias, you could strap a generator to her coffin and run the house off of it,” Wendy says with a smile.

He nods a bit at that. “She always had every sort of stock in the house. Whatever they’d eat, if there were usable left overs, they’d go into a bag, chicken, fish, beef, or vegetables. Bag gets full, the stock pot comes out, and then she’d freeze it in her ice cube trays and keep them in the freezer ready to pop into whatever needed it.”

Abbi doesn’t know Fornell as well as the other two, but he’s in an ebullient mood. “You’re in a goofy mood, aren’t you?” She and Wendy share a look on that one.

“That’s one way to put it.” He gently pokes one scallop as the stock starts to simmer. “Ah… hear that bubble? Another minute, a bit more simmer, and then it’s time for the parsley and lemon juice, and we’re ready to go.”

“What’s got you in such a goofy mood?” Gibbs asks.

Fornell shakes his head again. “You’ll never believe it.”

“Probably not,” Gibbs says.

Fornell gently stirs the scampi, turning down the flame, flipping the scallops again, and then spooning the sauce over them. “All right, just one last kiss.” He looks back at the other three. “Let’s get this on plates, and I’ll tell you about it at dinner.”

“Remember Don Calfalone?” Fornell asks as once food is on plates, butts are in seats, and bubbly is bubbling away in fluted glasses.

Gibbs thinks, the name is familiar, and then he knows... “You spent, four years, on and off, undercover trying to grab him, right?”

Gibbs nods, he remembers the two of them talking about Calfalone. Back when this started Diane used to be part of those conversations, and long after she was gone, the hunt for Calfalone was still running strong. But nothing ever stuck, Calfalone always had too many buffers, and he kept his people too well taken care of to make talking worthwhile.

Fornell takes a swig of his bubbly. “They just got him in the vote buying scheme. Both the RNC and the DNC required that any money be deposited directly from your personal bank account. That was part of making sure that no one talked about it. Not only did they have the information to destroy your finances if you talked, but they also made sure that you’d implicate yourself.”

Gibbs had been wondering for a while why no one talked about that. There had been tens of thousands of people involved, and in his experience that’s about ten thousand times too many to keep a secret.

“He spent twenty-six million dollars over the last twenty-five years, entirely on Senators and Congressmen, all of them on the Judiciary committee. That’s part of why we couldn’t get anything to stick to him, he made sure the judges who were trying him owed him, indirectly, for their jobs. Got half a dozen federal judges that are in trouble now, too."

“And we’re… celebrating… this?” Wendy can see that it’s good this guy is going down, but, she’d have thought Fornell would have wanted to take him down in person.

Fornell smiles. “Guess who’s getting out of paperwork hell next week, and is going to be in depositions for at least the next month, plus all the trial prep. I’m the resident Calfalone expert, and I’m going to get to testify against all those judges who disallowed evidence, and cut testimony and witnesses. I’m back working on something useful for at least another month.”

Gibbs shares a smile with Fornell, they both know how off-kilter it feels to spends days on busy work.

By the end of dinner, Abbi is certainly seeing the potential for retirement. Okay, sure Gibbs and Fornell bitch about not having the job, but both of them talking about being able to go after the cases they want to, and not dealing with stupid crap like budgets and OSHA certifications and all the rest of that… Is actually reminding Abbi that she doesn’t really want to be retired, she just doesn’t want to be management.

She sighs at that.

Gibbs hears and glances over to her, stroking her hand. “Okay?”

She smiles, a wry look on her face. “Just got promoted higher than I would have liked. I had a kidnapping ring. Never got them. Tried. We knew how it worked and generally who was doing it, but… It was a service for people who wanted to screw over the ex who got custody. So, low priority to begin with. Yeah, they were kidnapped kids, but they weren’t being held for ransom, no one was in danger of being killed, they were usually being taken overseas on behalf of their non-US-Citizen Dads. But that’s still a lot of heartbroken moms begging to get baby girl or boy or both back.”

Wendy winces and Fornell and Gibbs nod. “And the guys kept weaseling out of your grasp?”

“Yes. Part of the problem was we generally didn’t know about the missing kid until after they went missing, which makes this harder to do. Can’t set a sting for something like that. You can’t set a watch on every kid in the US who’s part of a bad custody fight. Part of it is they took payment in cash. So, I didn’t have a money trail to run down. Add in mostly non-US citizens… It was a mess. I spent six years, on and off, on that case. Occasionally we could get the kids back, which is where I got at least some of the intel on how they were being taken out of the US, but never got the guys.”

“And you want to,” Fornell says.

“My white whale.”

“How about you, Gibbs? Got some white whales of your own?” Wendy asks.

Gibbs shrugs a bit. He blew the head off his white whale a long time ago, and then Ziva shot the next one, and all the rest haven’t quite risen to the level of whale. “Anyone who’s been on this job more than a year has a white whale or two. But most of mine, they’re more like white… sharks. Big,
“But not huge.”

“And you’ve got a Second-in-Command and Computer Boy hunting for them,” Fornell adds.

Gibbs smiles at that. “Does help to make ‘em look smaller. Someone’s gonna get them sooner or later.”

“Speaking of Computer Boy, I heard he signed up with us,” Fornell adds, bite of scallop on his fork, en route to his mouth.

Fornell nods, McGee at FBI feels odd to him, too. Might be the kind of odd the FBI needs, though. Then he says to Wendy, “Last time I saw him, he showed up at the office in the skirt, makeup, boots, and tattoos all over the place. Security just about died rather than let him in.”

“And you had a blast at that, didn’t you?” she asks, smile on her face, imagining Tobias enjoying that, a lot.

Fornell does look smugly amused. “I might have. He’s already got the head of IT pissed. Apparently, by pointing out that he had five state’s worth of currently underemployed techs sitting around, everyone wants their stuff done right now.”

Gibbs chuckles at that.

“Okay, start talking,” Wendy says after pulling Abbi into the kitchen for post-dinner cleanup and girly talk.

“About…” Abbi looks like the proverbial deer in the headlights.

“About? Really? About that ring on your finger and what’s going to happen about it! Come on, wedding details, woman! What do you have?”

“Errr…” Abbi’s got some vague ideas and an inbox the size of a whale, a blue whale. Right now, the inbox is winning.

“Oh, honey.”

“The Omni. We’ve got the Omni booked for December 31st 2017 into Jan 1, 2018. Quaker style wedding, so Ducky can do whatever level of officiating we need.”

“Oh…” Wendy smiles at that. “That’s a lovely idea.”

“Gibbs’.”

“Dress, colors, theme, details?” Wendy sees Abbi not say anything for a moment, and then adds, “You mean to tell me Gibbs’ girls haven’t dragged you out to go find a dress, yet?”

“They’ve been suggesting it, but… The job doesn’t really ever end, and all I want to do on the weekend is lay around, nap, maybe cook if I’m feeling inspired, and play with the kids. I’ve already spent ten million hours making decisions about everything, I don’t want to decide anything else when I’m off."

“I get that. Twenty-five years as a social worker means I know every flavor of exhausted to ever exhaust. But, you want the right dress, and you want it to fit, it’s time to get moving on it.”

Abbi nods. “Ziva’s been poking me in that direction.”

“Ziva?” Of all the girls, Wendy would have assumed Breena would be the one on top of this.

“Ziva plans a mean wedding when she puts her mind to it. I have one dress idea… Remember Grace Kelly’s.”

Wendy’s eyes go soft as she imagines that. “Oh… I can see that. All proper and elegant… Hair up…
Soft makeup. Oh yeah, I can see that.”

“During lunch Ziva finds me pictures of dresses that might work. Breena’s sent me a few, too.
Nothing I love, yet. Abby’s trying to get me to go meet the costume designer who made her dress and have her do it.”

“Having it made for you might be a good plan. You get exactly what you want, and you don’t have to wade through two hundred not good enough dresses.”

Abbi nods.

“Of course, you miss the chance to stumble onto something fun if you do it that way. No chance of a surprise popping out and grabbing you. Look, I’ve got a free Saturday, and a place in Virginia with a million dresses. Drop the kids with the boys, grab your girls, and I’ll grab Emily, and we’ll make a day of it. It’ll be fun.”

Abbi smiles at that, knowing that her ‘girls’ would love that, and glances toward the living room, where one of the greatest surprises of her life is chatting with his best friend about… something.

“Let’s see how fried I am come Friday. If it’s all systems go, then we’re on.”

Wendy smiles at that. “We’re going to have such a good time,” she says, eyes sparkling.

“She’s got a boyfriend.” Fornell says boyfriend with the same tone and inflection he would use to say suppurating pustule.

“It happens, Tobias.”

Fornell shakes his head. “Not like this. He’s a…” Fornell is visibly editing himself as he thinks about Jared Ridge, Emily’s new boyfriend, “weasel.”

Gibbs sighs. He’s got a mental image of some brow beaten, timid little boy who treats Emily like a goddess and just existing is enough to make Fornell hate him. “You think any boy that might be interested in Emily is a weasel.”

Fornell shrugs a bit. That’s not an unfair characterization. “Wendy and Diane think he’s a weasel, too.”
That clarifies the issue for Gibbs. If the ladies don’t like him, too… “Then we run him off.” For Gibbs, this is a complete no brainer. If there’s some little weasel keeping company with Emily Fornell, they all show up and drive him back to his burrow. “I’ll grab my boys, you get Draga, and we go visit him and his parents, explain the situation to them, and that’s that. He never sets foot near Emily again.”

Fornell sighs. “Not that easy. Wendy thinks part of why she likes him is that he gets our attention. And Diane thinks going all bonkers on him will just make him more attractive to her. We’re brainstorming ways to get rid of him without making her like him more.”

Gibbs opens and closes his mouth. That’s a complication he doesn’t know how to deal with. But if anyone does… “I’d talk to Abby about that.”

“Agent Fornell?” Jimmy asks.

There are a lot of people who Jimmy would expect to show up at Tim’s front door at eight o’clock on a Thursday. Any of the family. His minions. Abby’s guys. Heather’s friends on occasion show up looking for her here.

Tobias Fornell is not one of those people.

And there are several people that Fornell expects to open the door when he knocks at McGee’s house at 8:00 on a Thursday. Jimmy Palmer is not among them.

“Palmer?” For a second, Fornell’s not entirely sure he’s at the right place. Then McGee wanders over, which isn’t helping.

“Whose house am I at?”

“My house,” Tim answers. “Come on in. What’s going on?”

Fornell looks confused, but steps in. “I was wondering if I could talk to Abby.”

“She and Breena are on story time tonight. But they should be down any minute,” Jimmy says.

“Okay.” Jimmy and Tim lead Fornell into the living room where… There’s some sort of video game on the television, paused, two controllers, and a baby boy, on the floor, lying on his back kicking his feet a little bit. Fornell can see a glass of water, a cup of coffee, and a pacifier on the coffee table.

Fornell gives Sean the attention he deserves, a bit of a tickle under the chin, and he starts to coo at him and then stops, suddenly, feeling a little stupid.

Jimmy sits next to them. “It’s okay. Just talk to him like you would with anyone else. He’s going to be learning to pick up verbal communication though sight, so… have a little chat.” Sean gurgles at them. “He’s a talky little guy.”

Tim watches Fornell, who’s feeling a bit flatfooted at the idea of intentionally starting up a conversation with a baby while other people watch him, and rescues him by saying, “So…you want a drink?”

“Uh. Yeah. That’d be great.”
Fornell watches Jimmy pick Sean up, holding Sean between his legs, back against Jimmy’s pelvis, head resting on his belly. “Bedtime for this one is soon, too. But he spends a bit of time awake after every feed now, so we’re showing him Call of Duty.”

“We start gamers off young in this house. Coffee, cider, water?” Tim calls out from the kitchen.

Fornell nods at Jimmy, steps around him, and heads in to the kitchen with Tim.

“Coffee’s good. Unless Jethro taught you how to make it.”

Tim smirks at that. “I like mine a tad less aggressive than he likes his.”

“Great. Cream, no sugar.”

Tim heads to the coffeemaker. “It’s decaf.”

Fornell looks surprised by that but says, “Not a problem this late at night.”

Tim pours the cup, hands it to Fornell. “I’ve got milk...” He checks in the fridge. There is cream, but only enough for Jimmy’s morning cup, and while Tim believes in hospitality, he’s not putting Jimmy out to flavor Fornell’s drink. “No cream.”

“That’s fine.”

He hands over the jug of milk, and then back to the living room for his own cup. He tops himself up and stares at Fornell at his kitchen table, wondering what on earth could possibly have brought this man to his house. “So… is this an only for Abby sort of thing...?”

“Jethro suggest that she’d be good to talk to about this.”

They hear a loud exploding sound from the living room, and Tim winces. A moment later, Jimmy’s in the kitchen, Sean against his shoulder. “And I’m dead.”

“Told you, you need to wait for me.”

“Uh huh.” Jimmy looks dubious, and his voice is teasing as he says, “He’s not quite as hot as he thinks he is.”

“You shove a hardware store’s worth of metal into your hand and see how hot you are!” Tim replies, gesturing with his right hand.

The two of them snarking about the game, as Jimmy walks around McGee’s kitchen, with McGee’s son on his shoulder, gently bouncing a bit while patting his back is really… surreal… to Fornell. They’re two guys, buddies, very close buddies who… are good with each other’s kids… and… Fornell blinks. They’re a couple. He can see it. He knows what this is when he sees McGee and Abby do this, or Jimmy and Breena, but... No… No way. He can’t be seeing this. They’re just good friends, who are unusually comfortable in each other’s homes. Hell, he’ll let himself into Jethro’s place and cook for him, and people used to joke all the time about them being married. But it was never more than them just being good friends. Okay, maybe not never, the Diane thing complicated it, but it was never anything romantic.

This is just like that. They’re just buddies.

Good buddies, over at each other’s house, lateish, on a Thursday, while their wives put the kids to bed, and... Jimmy just helped himself to a sip of Tim’s coffee, from his cup. He’d do that with Jethro. …And Tim just rested his hand in Jimmy’s back while he did it, which would only happen with Jethro if the hand in question were slapping him upside the back of his head for stealing his coffee.

Nope. That hand’s just sitting there, on the back of Jimmy’s neck, index finger gently rubbing up and down as Tim coos at his son and makes a few goofy faces for him.

Yeah… good buddies. One of whom got up and told the whole world he likes sex with men.

Fornell’s poker face slams into place. He’s a guest in this guy’s home, drinking his coffee, and he’s trying to get help from his wife. Now it not the time to have a possible meltdown about this.

If there is a this.

Fornell licks his lips and tries a tentative question, “The ladies are upstairs putting your girls to bed?”

Jimmy nods, handing the cup back to Tim, who sits down at the table across from Fornell. “Yeah, we take turns on that. Bath time’s a lot easier with at least two people on it.”

Fornell nods; he certainly remembers that. Actually, a few of his better memories of being married to Diane involve bath time for Emily on weekend nights when they were all in a good mood. Emily splashing around, bubbles, the three of them playing. Those are some good memories.

“Whoever’s on bath time gets story time, too, and then tuck ins,” Tim adds. “And whoever isn’t then heads in for a round of kisses and cuddles and songs, last minute requests, hunts down stuffed animals and pacifiers, and then, with any luck, and only two or three false starts, little girls are down for the night.”

That sounds like they do this a lot. But, little guys go to bed early, so if they enjoy spending the evening together, putting the kids to bed and then taking them home makes a lot of sense. He and Diane would do that, some nights, with Emily. Go visit a friend, put her to bed, carry sleeping baby to car seat, and home they go.

Not during the middle of the week, though.

“So, what does Jethro think Abby will be good with?” Jimmy asks as he continues his round of walking/patting with Sean, humming something low between spoken words.

Fornell decides that getting onto topic is probably going to be a lot more comfortable than any of the thoughts wafting through his head right now. “Emily’s got a boyfriend.”

“Ah.” Tim says, “And Gibbs thought you should talk to Abby about that.” Though he’s not immediately seeing why calling Abby in for that would make sense. Jimmy’s looking just as puzzled about that, too.

Fornell can see that why he’d be talking to Abby isn’t self-evident to Tim or Jimmy. “Don’t like him, at all. Little bastard treats her like shit.”

“Still not seeing why you want to talk to Abby about this.” Jimmy says, “Little bastard’s treating her like shit, we all get together and explain how it’s going to be to him. Draga alone should make him wet his pants, and we’ll just hammer home the idea that no one will ever, ever find his body.”

Tobias blinks slowly as he stares at Palmer. He’s fairly sure that Palmer’s a marshmallow with a pair of glasses. Sure, he’s a marshmallow in freakishly good physical shape, but he’s the last person you’d call for something like this. Hell, he’s standing there, holding a baby, wearing a knitted sweater with little snowmen and snowflakes on it. “You’re volunteering to scare the hell out of this punk?”

“Jethro didn’t already volunteer us?” Tim asks.

“He might have.”

“Well, even if he didn’t, I’d be in. I like Emily.” Jimmy nods along as Tim talks. Sure, he doesn’t really know Emily, but as the future dad of two teen girls, he’s perfectly cool with Mission: Scare Punk Into Submission. “Tony’ll come along, too.”

“Jethro said that, too.”

“Good.” Tim’s got his this is settled look on his face. “Why do you want to talk to Abby? Give me his name, and I’ll start looking into him… Shouldn’t be too hard to make his entire life miserable with a few keystrokes.” Fornell finds the smile on Tim’s face disturbing.

“I think she likes the fact that he pisses me off. And Diane and Eric are done, but Eric’s trying to be a stand-up guy and still be Emily’s friend/big brother, and he’s the kind of punk who makes Eric want to stick around and pay attention to Emily. That might be why he’s attractive to her.”

“Oh.” Jimmy says.

Tim blinks slowly, understanding the problem. “And having all of us show up with the baseball bats might make him even more attractive.”

“Ew.” Jimmy winces and then shrugs. “I’ve got nothing for how to deal with that.”

This is a parenting conundrum Tim doesn’t have an answer for, either, and yes, talking to Abby is seeming like a better and better idea by the second.

“Yeah,” Fornell says.

“Gibbs is right, you should talk to Abby, and Breena. I bet they’ll have a better idea than we do,” Tim says.

“Talk to us about what? Tobias?” Abby says as she and Breena head into the kitchen. Abby settles herself onto Tim’s lap, and Breena takes one of the free chairs at the table. Tim wraps his arms around her, kisses her, and looks very happy with life in general. Then she stands up, and both he and Jimmy nod, time to go up and finish up with putting girls to bed.

Simple, easy affection. Between McGee and Palmer, and McGee and Abby, and he’s starting to think that if he sticks around long enough, he’ll see McGee pat Breena’s butt.

Fornell’s not sure what to do with that, but both Abby and Breena are watching him, eagerly waiting for him to get into the details, so he does.

The ladies listen, ask good questions, some of which he doesn’t know the answers to, and listen more.

By the time McGee and Palmer are back down, all kiddos put to bed, Breena’s saying to him, “We got the call from Wendy about taking Abbi out on Saturday, and Molly’s birthday party is next weekend. Saturday will be a fact finding mission. We’ll get girl time with her and investigate, and then for Molly’s birthday, bring her and Jared. Part of it’ll be a show of clan strength, let him know there are a whole lot of guys who will beat him into a pulp if he doesn’t shape up. Meanwhile, we’ll get a chance to see him in action and how they relate to each other. Give us a better idea of what’s going on.”

“Okay.” Fornell’s curious as to what will happen with Jared and this crowd, but getting some expert help doesn’t bug him at all.

Abby adds, “If what you think is happening is happening, she’s either got a really low self-esteem and doesn’t think she can do any better. Or she’s doing okay self-esteem wise and is really pissed at you and/or Eric, so she’s picked a guy who hurts her because she knows it hurts you and/or him. Or she’s going with this bum because she wants more attention from either or both of you.”

Fornell looks into his cup of coffee. “Every time I try to spend more time with her, she wants to be with someone else.”

Abby and Breena share a look. “That’s teenage girls.”

Fornell glowers. “I thought this was supposed to be done by now. She’s leaving for college soon and…”

Abby smiles. “Put more points in wants more attention. Probably from everyone, because it is all going to change soon. You ever take her shooting?”

“No. Diane doesn’t like guns.”

“Well, she’s eighteen now,” Breena says. “Shooting with my dad is one of my favorite growing-up memories. I think it’s time you spend some time with her doing something she might think is cool.”

It’s Friday morning, and Fornell is enjoying yet another day of “retirement.”

He rolls his eyes as he fills in yet another document. See, the thing is, he will, eventually, be in depositions on the Calfalone case, but that doesn’t start until Monday. Which means, right now, he’s still on paperwork, and apparently, if you, say, use your FBI credentials to excuse “borrowing” a few tanks while telling your one-time partner to pretend to be a US Army General, and then, say, open fire with that tank on several crowds of rioters, you end up with paperwork until the end of time.

And he’s filling it out. At the rate he’s going, he’ll be done just about three years after he dies.

Pretty much, he’s got to account for every bullet he fired, or ordered fired, or was in the general vicinity of when it was fired. And, he’s got to do it from the other side, too, how many were fired at him, which, since he was inside the goddamned tank, is something of a challenge.

And given how many thousands of rounds he went through over the course of that month, accounting for them is a major pain in the ass.

Riding to the rescue with the tank was fun, this part, here, filling out the accounting of what he did with those tanks, not so much fun.

So, he’s not exactly whizzing through the forms.

The only upside is there is copious footage of him bringing food in, and taking people out. In one case, which got about ten million views on youtube alone, he’s the guy commanding the lead tank providing the cover that got a few thousand starving/near starving elementary school children out of the city. All of that good press means that he’s sitting in a nice office, filling out forms, instead of under indictment for manslaughter, due to the aforementioned open-firing on rioters.

He’s trying to remember exactly what heading his gunner was using when they took fire while he was trying to get that elementary school’s worth of kids out of the city when his phone buzzes.

Jimmy’s number. Party’s set. 2/12/17 2:00. Make sure Jared shows up.

Fornell texts back. Thanks. Have already gotten Emily, she’s working on Jared.

See ya then!

Fornell rolls his eyes. Of course Palmer signs off with an exclamation point.

McGee and Palmer, and the girls. Probably. He winces at that. Something’s going on. Something he should probably just leave the hell alone, but… Gibbs said they were okay and he’s going to be so damn hurt if they’re not.

Then his breath stops in his chest. Gibbs said they were okay. Said no divorces are in the offing. Gibbs knows. Gibbs knows and is okay with it!

Fornell’s jaw literally drops. He can’t imagine… He blinks hard and… just… For a moment he sits there while the idea that Gibbs could know about something like that and be cool with it short circuits his brain.

By the time he can think again he decides he’s got to check. Maybe Gibbs is okay because there’s nothing there, just four really good friends. Because Gibbs would be cool with that, and… Good friends come in all sorts of shapes and sizes and… and he’s fairly sure that little tableau of four-way domestic bliss he walked into last night isn’t what most people would call “friends.”

Fornell feels weird doing it, but… He can. He shouldn’t be able to. None of his higher ups know he’s got this access code. (And he intends to keep it that way.) But, sometimes you need the Big Boss’s login information, so, he’s got it.

And he uses it. To read McGee’s background check. If anything hinky’s going on, their guys would have found it.

He’s a bit surprised at exactly how accomplished McGee is. For example, he didn’t know about the books. Okay, he knew they existed, he didn’t know they were best-sellers. He knew McGee was bright, he didn’t know he’s the one who took down Gibbs’ FLETCH high score, or that he kept it himself for 11 years. (He also hadn’t known that Gibbs had had the record score before McGee.) He didn’t know about the degree in Biomedical Engineering, he’d assumed the kid had always been a computer geek.

But it’s mostly stuff like that.

Then he gets to the personal section, and it’s blank.

And that’s all Fornell needs for confirmation. No one would write down in his official file that he’s in a four-way relationship.

No one.

But, normally things like he’s married, who he’s married to, has two kids, lives in Alexandria, stuff like that, should be in there.

Leaving the whole thing blank is a code. It means ask the guy in charge of the investigation, because nothing on this gets written down.

Fornell sighs. He saw what he saw. Gibbs knows. And if Gibbs knows… The rest of the family’s got to know, too. He tries to imagine how Gibbs or DiNozzo or Ducky could be cool with this, but… But they must be. He was there at Christmas, and the whole family was happily buzzing away.

He sighs again, not sure what the hell to do with that.

One more sigh. Nothing. He does nothing with it. It’s got to be like being gay or pregnant. You don’t ask about it, and you don’t tell anyone what you suspect, and if whoever it is wants you to know, they’ll tell you to your face. If you do know, you don’t tell anyone without the express permission of the people involved.

Just like McGee’s file. That’s an intentionally blank space, filled with information that he can’t and shouldn’t share.
Saturday morning.

The Gibbs clan ladies have handed off little people. They’ve shuffled off into Abby’s Highlander, and are on the road, getting ready to hunt.

Mission: Locate Wedding Dress, Or At Least Get A Pretty Good Idea Of What We’re Looking For For Future Hunts, is on.

“For me, it was Belle,” Breena says. “That yellow gown! I had some little girl, princess ideas before that, but… that one stuck. For a really long time, that was my idea of ‘wedding.’ Okay, Abbi, spill. We know you’ve got one, which Disney Princess is yours?”

“Uh…” In all honesty, Abbi never hooked into the Disney Princess thing. Though she’s got no trouble at all seeing little girl/teen Breena being really into it.

“Ariel, right?” Abby says, eyes watching the road. She’s the one driving. “The red hair?”

Abbi laughs a little, and shakes her head. “I didn’t have one.”

“Oh, come on, no one’s that hard of a tomboy,” Breena says.

“I don’t have one, either,” Ziva adds.

“You didn’t grow up in the US. If you grew up in the US, and you’re a girl, you’ve got a Disney Princess. Even Penny’s got one,” Abby says. “You’ve got whatever the Israeli equivalent is.”

“Wait, Penny’s got one?” Abbi asks as Penny smiles a bit, looking borderline embarrassed.

“I was five when Snow White came out. Black hair, red lips, Prince Charming. It was the first movie I ever saw, and going out was a huge big deal. Everyone got dressed up in our Sunday-best, and we each got to have our own bottle of Coke, and shared a bag of popcorn. So, yes. I did have one. Did. A long time ago. Then I grew up and spent the rest of my life fighting against the idea of pretty dresses and a husband is all the goals in life a woman ever needs. Tania’s the only one of the lot I can even stand now, and Ariel makes my skin crawl.”

Breena shakes her head. “No fantasy life. Not to say I don’t like Tania, because I do, but there’s something to be said for the idea of a magic world where you get all the books you could possibly want, a castle that cleans itself, and a man who will keep you company while you read all you want.”

Penny rolls her eyes a bit, and shakes her head. “Enjoy your fantasy. I’m still telling our girls not to wait for a prince.”

“I don’t think little girls growing up in this house are going to get the message that sitting around waiting for anything, let alone a prince, is a good plan,” Ziva says.

Abby nods. Her girls can have the dresses, the prince, the unicorns, and the career involving multiple advanced degrees in hardcore sciences. For Kelly, Molly, Anna, and any other girls they have, it’s not going to be an either/or thing. At least, not if MamaAbby has any say in it.

“So, back to the main point, Abbi, what’s your wedding fantasy archetype? The image that hit you young and stuck with you?” Breena shifts the question a bit to get them away from princesses.
And Abbi sighs a bit. “I really didn’t have one. No long or fluffy dresses where I grew up. We didn’t have a TV. Only went to the movies once a blue moon, and I didn’t see a Disney Princess movie until I was a Marine. A few of the other girls wanted to go see a movie, and Mulan was playing, and… Yeah, okay, I liked it, but, I was already twenty-one at the time, and it didn’t set my heart yearning for fluffy wedding dresses.”

“Wait, you didn’t see one of the movies until you were in your twenties?” Breena sounds stupefied at that. Even Ziva’s looking pretty amazed.

“You have no idea how far off the beaten path where I grew up was. Hell, no one on the eastern seaboard really knows what rural means. No TV. Pre-internet days. An hour drive to a town with a movie theatre and library. I read a lot of books, and once I could drive, I’d get to the movies, but not so Disney films.”

Breena shakes her head. “So, what, pictures of mom and dad’s wedding?”

“My parents aren’t married, at least not in the had-a-wedding sense. And maybe not in the got a license sense, too. They don’t wear rings, but they do have the same last name. So, I didn’t get to look at pictures of their wedding as a kid to get an idea. It just wasn’t any sort of a thing where I grew up. Some people lived together, how that happened…” Abbi shrugs. “Fairytale princess weddings, that’s not part of my ‘little girl growing up’ fantasies.” Abbi thinks for a moment, remembering her five-or-six-year-old self. “Milk cows that would muck themselves out. That’s one of my growing up fantasies. Being warm in the winter. That’s one. Sparkly dresses, not so much.

“Okay, Ziva,” Abbi asks, genuinely curious, “what’s the Israeli equivalent of a Disney Princess?”

“First of all, I grew up in Tel Aviv, not middle-of-nowhere Montana, we had Disney princesses. But, I wanted to be Aladdin, not Jasmine. The princesses I wanted to be were at the ballet. Abba would take Tali and I at least once a season. The opera, too. That was our Date-Night-With-Abba time. We’d get all dressed up, and he’d tell everyone he was going out with the prettiest girls in Tel Aviv. When I was little, I was going to be a dancer, and Tali was going to be a singer, and together we’d write the music. She’d sing, and I’d dance.” Ziva smiles at that memory. “So, very long and tall women, with perfect posture, hair back in a bun, gems on her brow, dancing strong and elegant, with lights sparking off thousands of layers of gauze. Swan Lake, the dancers almost glittered, and moved like clouds across the stage.

“We’d get home, and she’d hum the music, make up words for it, and I’d spin and leap. Ari was home when we saw Swan Lake, and for months after he called us ברכות וברכה… His little swans. That was spring, and he went to University that fall.” She smiles again, this time bittersweet. She doesn’t say it, but she’s very aware of the fact that that was the last good year her family had. “I know we are not looking for a formal tutu. What are we looking for, Abbi?”

Abbi explains the Grace Kelly idea. “It doesn’t have to be a clone of that, but… something elegant and restrained and warm enough I won’t be freezing my butt off in it. Winter wedding, so it better have some sleeves.”

“No poof?” Breena asks.

“I’m not outlawing it, but if it’s poofy, it better be elegant poof. Ziva’s professional tutus might be good, but anything that makes me think of the little, plastic, fluffy ones for kids, nope.”

“White?” Abby asks.

“Doesn’t matter. If it looks good enough, it could be purple and I’d go for it.” Then she thinks for a moment. “Maybe not. Purple and red hair aren’t necessarily friends.”

That gets a little laughter.

“Price range?” Penny gets to the practical stuff.

“Under two grand is good, under one grand is better. Not like I’m going to be wearing this thing over and over.” She looks at the rest of the ladies. “What happened to your dresses?”

Breena sighs. “I sold mine. We moved up the ceremony, and didn’t have time to do all the hair and makeup and the rest of it. I never got to wear it. Hopefully, it got some good memories attached to it with another bride. The reception we ended up having was less formal, and I still have that dress. And one of these days, when all these little guys are done wreaking havoc on my body, I will fit back into it, again!”

“You look fine!” Abby says, knowing Breena isn’t thrilled with the way she’s put on seven pounds in the last ten days.

“Uh huh.” She rolls her eyes. “I’m just glad I’m not trying to squeeze my butt into a dress.”

Abby shakes her head. “None of that. Tim’s got a rule, and it goes to you, too, no badmouthing your body in front of me. You look perfect, end of subject.”

“Fine.” There’s another eye roll to go with that. Yes, she’d rather gain ten pounds now and then lose them over the next three months, as opposed to drop them from her pre-pregnancy-test-positive-result-weight, but that doesn’t mean she likes what she sees when she tries to button her pants. “Where’d yours end up?”

“Stored in the attic.” Abby says. “Though I’m planning on getting it re-cut and dyed. One of these years, we’re going on another clubbing date, and I will rock that dress.”

“No saving it for Kelly?” Abbi asks.

“I’ve never met anyone who actually wanted her mom’s dress, and mine… It’s not like it’s a classic, timeless, elegant piece of work. It’s mine. It’s white and red and steampunk and goth and… Nope. Mine. She can go find her own wedding dress. Penny?”

“Gave it to Goodwill a million years ago. It was everything cutting edge of 1949 fashion. Didn’t have a daughter. No daughters-in-law that wanted to look like they’d stepped right out of the wedding scene at the beginning of the Godfather. After Nelson died, I took it out, petted it some, cried over a lot of memories, and then, like a lot of the rest of the stuff cluttering up our house, I gave it away. How about your, Ziva?”

“Still hanging in our closet.”

“If one of the girls wants a mom dress, they should go for Ziva’s,” Abby adds. “That one is elegant and timeless and will look beautiful no matter what or on whom.”

Ziva nods. “I hope for that.” And she does. She has a very clear image of Miriam, Miri, they’ll call her, DiNozzo standing next to her as she opens the box that dress will go into one day, pulling back the tissue paper wrapping, and taking about her wedding, looking at the pictures, and maybe Miri will want the dress, maybe she won’t, but that’s a very clear image of starting the conversation about Miri’s eventual wedding, and what to look for in a husband, which reminds Ziva of the other part of their mission. “What do we know about Jared Ridge?”
“According to Fornell he’s quote, a weasel, unquote,” Abby says.

“And he treats her like shit,” Breena adds. “Though, ‘like shit,’ appears to mean that he’s a dud as opposed to violent.”

“He’d be dead if he were violent,” Penny says. And the rest of the ladies in the car know that’s a literal statement.

“And we’re finding out why she likes him?” Ziva asks.

“Pretty much. They want to get him out of the picture, without making her like him even more,” Abby replies, shifting across two lanes of traffic as her phone begins chirping driving directions at her.

They’re quiet for a moment while the phone keeps sending them through a collection of tight turns in a small city filled with one way streets. After a moment, though, they find a huge parking lot, filled with cars, in front of a building that Abbi would describe as a slightly fancied up warehouse.

“Wendy wasn’t kidding about this place being huge,” Abbi says.

The other ladies nod. Breena’s got her phone out, texting Wendy. Her first plan of just show up and run into each other has been beaten into submission by the size of this place. “They’re just inside the front doors, waiting for us.”

And thus, Mission: Wedding Dresses and Weasels is on.

They get in to the store, and Abbi quietly says to Ziva, “I feel like that girl in last night’s movie, ‘I didn’t know there was this much white in all the universe.’”

Ziva nods, understanding how Rey felt. There’s so much white. She can see, just on the edge of her peripheral vision, bridesmaid land, where the color is, but in front of them, it’s white. In every shade, hue, intensity, trim, pattern, fabric and finish. She feels like she just stepped into some bizarre land of snow or something.

There’s an occasional splash of red or green or silver, and there appears to be a section for ‘older/second time brides’ in all sorts of pastels, but all the rest of it is white, ivory, cream, snow, eggshell, bone, chalk, more white, whiter white, whitest white, Damn That’s White, and Holy Fuck! So White! and, of course, Goth-Skin-Makeup-White.

There’s lace, and tulle, and crinoline, and satin, and silk, and brocades and… And Abbi’s out of vocabulary to explain what all this stuff is. It’s white. There’s a ton of it.

“I see you found it, great!” Wendy says, offering hugs. Emily’s a little behind her, looking to be in a pretty good mood for an eighteen-year-old drug off to get a wedding dress for someone she barely knows.

“Hard to miss,” Abby offers. She hugs everyone, and Emily smiles back at her.

“What are we looking for?” Emily asks with a smile. Okay, this might not be her favorite way to spend a Saturday, but she’s at least going to be pleasant about it.
“Uh… Simple, elegant, restrained, and it should be warm. If it looks like Grace Kelly’s wedding dress, all the better, but I’m not crossing anything out, yet.”

That gets some nodding. “Okay, I grabbed one of the dressing room/viewing areas for us. Go put your stuff down,” Wendy gestures off toward the back, and Abbi does spy an area that’s got a familiar looking purse and a not even remotely familiar looking book bag, and a cooler (she wonders why there would be a cooler) on a sofa, in front of a raised platform and a collection of full length mirrors. “I’m thinking we all grab something for you, and then you start trying stuff on, and we get rid of what doesn’t work. What size are we looking for?”

“Ach eight? Maybe. I don’t know. I wear something between a six and a twelve depending on who made it.”

“Bra, waist, and hips size?” Breena asks, getting into shopping mode.

“Thirty-four C, twenty-seven, and thirty-six inches around,” Abbi replies.

“All right,” Breena’s eyes gleam, she’s planning on having a lot of fun with this. “Let’s get shopping! Come on, Emily, we’ve got get our girl outfitted!” And with that, Breena’s got both tasks firmly in hand.

Fortunately, the dresses are stored by both size and style. So they can just skip the sleeveless section.
That cuts almost sixty percent of them out of the pile.

Breena’s plan of attack is to locate something white, ivory, or cream, preferably in a good, thick silk satin, possibly a brocade, with a structured bodice, long sleeves, and a floor-length skirt. The dress in her imagination has pearl buttons down the front, and comes up to Abbi’s throat. While doing this, she intends to just chat with Emily. Nothing probing, nothing too deep, just get a feel for her.
According to her parents, she’s a generally happy kid, but it’s good to get an outside set of eyes on that.

She explains what she’s looking for, and then asks, “So, what do you want to see Abbi in?”

Emily’s flicking through dresses hanging in their bags. It’s hard to get a good feel for how they look, but she’s whipping through the lace ones like they’re made of plutonium. “Nothing too lacy. I’ve seen the Princess Grace picture, and I like the idea, but I just can’t see Abbi in that much lace.”

Breena nods at that. “I’m looking for a similar cut, but not that fabric.”

“Yep. But who knows, she might look great in it. She looked great at Dad’s wedding, and I wasn’t expecting that. I’ve got so much cop in mind, the dressy girl is hard to see.”

Breena laughs a bit. “Did you feel that way about your dad in the tux?”

“Oh, God, him and Uncle Gibbs, too! Did a double take when I saw them all spiffed up. It was one thing with Abby’s wedding, I had to beg, plead, cajole, and beg some more to get him into his sky cavalry uniform, but Wendy just said, ‘black tux’ and off he went to go find one.” Emily smiles at that.

“Looks like a happy memory.”
“It is. It’s good to see him have a life outside work and me.”

“Good to see him happy?”

“Yeah. I know so many kids with all this drama about their step-moms and step-dads and… Mom and Dad didn’t make each other happy, but I’m lucky enough they aren’t actively trying to make each other miserable, or, if they are, they don’t do it where I can see it. Sarah, my best friend, her mom is always badmouthing her step-mom.” Emily rolls her eyes. “I’ve met both of them, and okay, her mom’s not completely wrong, Cicily is young and kind of silly, but she’s not evil.”

“How young?”

“Twenty-eight.”

Breena winces. “That’s really young for a guy with an eighteen-year-old daughter.”

“I know, but… Draga’s thirty now, and he was barely twenty-nine when mom started dating him. Dad may have glared a bit, but he didn’t say anything. Sarah’s mom, she doesn’t want her dad to be happy with anyone. She’s a really unpleasant person to be around, and she blames that on Sarah’s dad, too.”

“You think that’s true?”

Emily shrugs. “She seemed pretty unhappy back when they were married. I don’t know.”

“Good answer. A bad marriage’ll make a person miserable, but a miserable person can’t make a good marriage.” Breena discretely eyes Emily, seeing if that gets her attention on any extra level. If it does, she can’t see it.

“Ooo!” Emily says, shoving the dresses in bags back. “Take a look at this!”

“Oh yeah!” Breena nods slowly and appreciatively. “We’re definitely taking that back to Abbi.”

“So, what, I just sit here and you guys scuttle around, finding stuff for me?” Abbi says to Wendy.

“That’s the idea. We hunt, you play dress up. Once we’ve done a few rounds of this, we’ll have a better idea of what you’re looking for.”

“I don’t hunt?”

“You can’t be trying on if you’re out there looking around.” Wendy fishes a bottle of wine out of the cooler she’s got next to the sofa. “You don’t want to make decisions, right?” She pulls out a corkscrew, too. “You sit back, relax,” she gets the chardonnay open, “have a drink,” she pours and hands the first glass over to Abbi, “and we will go out and fetch you dresses. You put the dresses on. We take pictures, and eventually there may be some decision-making but it won’t happen today.”

“What do you have in there?” Abbi asks, looking into the cooler, taking a sip of what is a very tasty chardonnay.

“Good stuff. Got wine, got snacks, got more snacks, more wine, non-alcoholic stuff for the pregnant mommy brigade, glasses, plates, here…” she puts the bottle of wine back into the cooler, after pouring some for herself, too, and then begins to put an assortment of little nibbles, fruit, some cheese, little sandwiches, onto a plate. “You sit back and get pampered. Just make sure you don’t get any of the food on the dresses.”

“Yeah, that part I’ve got.”

“I’m going to go look at shoes for you. Eight and a half?”

“Wide.”

“No problem. You find a shoe you love, and maybe we can build from there.” Wendy snags one of the tiny sandwiches, pops it between her lips, grins at Abbi, and is off.

Abbi sipping her wine, looking around this massive forest of never-ending white, is coming to the conclusion that girly stuff, when orchestrated by Wendy Fornell, may be a lot of fun. She settles back, takes another sip, and relaxes, waiting for her team of bridesmaids to bring her dresses.

“You look comfy,” Breena says, seeing Abbi relaxing back on the sofa, wine glass in hand, plate covered with nibbles next to her.

“You know, I am. I could get used to this.”

Breena laughs at that, then gestures to Emily. “Show her what you found.”

“Come on, get up.” Emily says as she’s unzipping the bag the dress is in.

Abbi puts the glass down, and stands up, taking the dress from Emily as she pulls it out of the bag. She eyes it, holds it up to her in front of the mirrors, and nods. It’s passed the first look inspection. “Okay, let’s try it on.”

She heads into the dressing room. “You need help?” Breena asks.

“It’s just got a zipper up the back, I think I can handle it.”

“It’s not quite what you were looking for, but…” Emily says.

“It’s good. It doesn’t have to be exactly what Grace had on.” It’s not even close. Though, restrained and elegant do pop into her head when she sees this. Abbi shucks her street clothing, and notices that Wendy (or the people who run this place) stocked the dressing room with a robe, so between changes she can just toss that on instead of into and out of her jeans, t-shirt, and sweater over and over. She’s also, already, wearing the only strapless bra she owns, so that means this won’t look too silly.

She shimmies into it, whatever size it might be, it’s a bit too tight. Abbi decides she doesn’t need to know what size this is supposed to be. She does get the zipper all the way up, and spends a moment just looking at herself, the bride in the mirror.
She didn’t get to this point with Liam. She had the ring, and they’d talked about the wedding some, had a date a year and a half off, but she was waiting to get home to do anything like this.

She hadn’t even decided if she was going to wear a wedding dress, or like Liam, get married in her formal uniform. That uniform, and what went into earning it, meant just as much to her as it did to him, and, since they’d been talking about getting hitched by a Justice of the Peace, and then having a huge barbeque party on the beach, there wasn’t a lot of room in that idea for a wedding gown.

For someone who genuinely didn’t have any little girl, fluffy dress fantasies, standing there in the long white dress, satin cascading down her body, that’s got some powerful juju. She feels magic and pretty all over.

And Abbi wasn’t, at all, expecting that.

( Maybe Wendy slipped something into the wine. That thought makes her giggle a little, too. )

She steps out, and Breena inhales so fast she hisses, and Emily just stands there, dumbstruck.

“Oh, Abbi…” Breena says it with a huge grin on her face. “Come on, up on the dais.” Abbi does get on there, in the special pretty lights, with the mirror on three sides. Breena hops up behind her, and pulls her hair up, holding it in a bun.

Abbi looks at herself. It’s a soft cool white, in a thick, rich silk satin. There aren’t any little curly-cues or embellishments. Just yards and yards of impossibly soft statin, skimming down from her chest, snug along her torso, and then following a the a-line down her hips to the floor. At her chest there’s a ruched horizontal band covering from the points of her shoulders down to mid bicep.

Her collarbones, the very top of her chest, and neck are bare, and with Breena holding her hair up, she’s got a long line of naked neck dipping into what’s pretty much the poster child for ‘elegant and restrained’ dresses.
“Pop a string of pearls around your neck, teardrop pearls on your ears, and a strand around your wrist, and you’re ready to go.” Breena can see exactly how this should look. Emily picked well, the color of the dress is close to the pearl on Abbi’s engagement ring.

Abbi can see it. She can almost taste it. There’s an intoxicating image of walking down an aisle and Gibbs seeing her in this for the first time, and she can imagine the dumbstruck look on his face at her like this, followed by that grin of his that lights up his whole body.

Breena’s fingering the collar, giving it a skeptical look. “This is pretty, but, can you move your arms in this?”

That snaps reality back into place. Abbi attempts to raise her arms, and she’s only got about half her range of motion. And yes, she doesn’t think anything should be happening at her wedding that will require her to extend her arms directly above her head, but, given how life likes to pop up and surprise her, she’s not going to bet on it.

“You can throw a bouquet in it, that’s all you need,” Breena says.

Abbi’s shaking her head.

“Let’s get a picture of it, at least,” Emily says. Which makes sense. She snaps the shot, and one of the label, adds the note, too constraining, and Abbi tells her to put in, slightly too tight, and then she sends it off to the rest of the crew.

The hunt continues.

“Look, look, look!” Abby bustles over with a… something… in her arms. The dresses are all in bags, so it can’t be a dress, and it’s cool white with a silver shimmer where the light hits it right, and it’s overflowing her arms, so it’s big, but…

“I’m looking,” Abbi says from where she’s trying on the one Penny found. (Pretty much a replica of Kate Middleton’s dress, which was a revamped version of Grace Kelly’s dress.) It looks good, but it’s not sending happy bride tingles down Abbi’s spine. “I don’t know what it is.”

“Close your eyes.”

Abbi nods her head a bit, and then does. She feels Abby drape whatever it is, probably a cloak, given the feel, over her.

“Okay, open them!”
She does, and stares. It is a cloak: velvet, lined with satin, and it’s cool dull white with a subtle silver sheen. There’s an ornate silver clasp at her neck. And, it can’t be real fur, Abby wouldn’t grab anything that was real fur, but the hood and edges are lined in some sort of ridiculously soft, white, furlike stuff, with another silver sheen. More the suggestion of silver, than real silver. As Abbi turns, she catches hints of it along the halo of the fur.

Wrapped in that, she looks, and feels, like a snow fairy.

“If you don’t buy it, I will,” Abby says.

“What would you do with it?” Emily asks.

“I have no idea. Wear it to bed.” Emily looks scandalized at that, and Penny chuckles. She knows her grandson well enough to know exactly what buttons that cloak would hit for him. “It’s too pretty not to take home.”

Abbi nods slowly, looking at it, feeling it’s heavy warmth wrapped around her. “This is coming home with us.”

Breena eyes it, looking it up and down. She adjusts it a bit, and, yep, it’ll pull back some, drape behind Abbi’s shoulders, or over them in front. She can control how much warmth this provides. “You know, you add this, and you can put all the sleeveless dresses onto the list now, too. This’ll be more than warm enough.”

“We’re not going anywhere, if you want a glass, you can have one,” Wendy says to Emily, as she’s watching the chardonnay.

“Dad’ll flip.”

Wendy looks right and left. “You know, I don’t see him anywhere. I’m cool with it, your mom would be, too. We’re not, by a long stretch, the only bridal party having a good time here, you want some, you can have some.”

And with permission granted, Emily does get a glass (closer to half, Wendy’s pouring, and she doesn’t put a lot in there. She just wants Emily talky, not drunk) she takes a sip and smiles. “Not bad.”

“Wine gladdens men’s hearts,” Ziva says. She knows what Wendy’s doing, and doesn’t mind it. “Ducky would have the whole quote. But this is what it’s made for. Something to make the good times that much better.” She pets David. “And in a few months, when we actually get to celebrate this wedding, I intend to enjoy some.”

Emily finishes her first few sips and then Ziva shuffles her off. “Come on, let us look some more.”

Ziva DiNozzo is very good at many things, among them the ability to read someone’s phone without looking like she’s doing it.

Emily Fornell is very good at many things, too. Realizing she’s being surveilled by people who’ve spent their entire adult lives doing stuff like this, isn’t one of them.

So, when she gets a text, and looks up at Ziva to say, “Jared,” she doesn’t pay any attention to the fact that Ziva just nods, and drifts off a bit behind her to ‘look at other dresses.’

Bored. Apparently, Jared’s a hell of a conversationalist.

Poor baby. Emily writes back.

Don’t make fun. You doing anything?

Yeah. Helping my aunt get her wedding dress, remember?

Oh. That. Get out of it. I’ll pick you up.

No! I’m having a good time.

Spending time with strangers is more fun than me. Great. Love you, too. Ziva can already feel the creepiness radiating off this guy, and she wants to slap him, sight unseen.
Don’t be like that. I asked if you wanted to spend today together before I said yes to this. You said you were busy. I’m free tonight.

I’m not. Plans got moved. Hence, bored. Come on, tell ‘em you just remembered a study date.

I am not going to be the person who drops a commitment because something else comes up. Ziva mentally cheers Emily at that.

Fine. I’ll just sit here, twiddling my thumbs.

Emily’s eyes roll. I know what you’ll be twiddling, and it’s not your thumb. That’s the only reason you want me with you so bad.

There’s a moment of quiet, where Ziva debates what to do with that information. Emily’s eighteen, so the idea that she’s having some sort of sex with her boyfriend shouldn’t be shocking. Ziva was certainly doing it when she was seventeen, but, for some reason it hits her hard. It’s Emily, who is a little girl or, apparently, not so little.

Also, this guy, just from fifteen lines of text, is such a slug. Okay, maybe Ziva’s high school boyfriend wasn’t that much better. If memory serves, all they liked about each other was how they could make each other feel, but he was at least respectful to her.

Ziva thinks for a moment longer. Or, he was respectful of the fact that her father could literally get him killed. Six of one, half a dozen of the other.

;) pops up from Jared. Wanna see?

Are you crazy? I’m in a store, with people around! And that’s the last of the conversation that Ziva gets to see as Emily makes sure she’s back to the dresses, with the phone held close and her hand covering most of the screen.

A few minutes later, when no texting has gone by, and Ziva’s picked up another dress, she says to Emily, “Good conversation?”

Emily blushes from her throat to her hair.

“You know, it’s early, but, we’re here, and they’ve got them, you want to look at prom dresses?” Wendy asks Emily as she and Ziva bring Ziva’s dress back.

Emily sighs.

“That doesn’t sound like a happy sigh,” Penny says.

“I’m not going this year.”

“Why on earth not? You love prom. You had a great time last year!” Wendy says.

“Jared thinks it’s stupid.”

Penny and Wendy share a look, and that look is not one of overwhelming approval. If anything, Wendy now thinks less of Jared Ridge.
“Uh huh.” Penny says. “That’s fine. He’s allowed to think it’s stupid. I’m not a huge prom person, either. But, you like it, right?”

Emily nods. “Yeah, it was fun.” Her voice sounds lukewarm as she says that.

“Fun,” Wendy says, matching Emily’s tone. “You spent six months working on your dress and costume last time. You and your friends all went to dinner, danced all night, had a hell of a good time at the after party. You talked about it for months. But it was fun.”

“Well, yeah, but… It’s kind of girly.”

“So!” Penny says. She might not love girly, but she will fight to the death against the idea that girly=bad. “You like girly stuff, that’s fine, you go off with your girlfriends, have a blast with the girly stuff, and Jared can sit on his butt doing whatever it is he likes.”

“He says it’s a waste of money.”

“You are allowed to waste your money however you like,” Penny says, voice sharp. “He doesn’t have any right to make any comments about how you spend your money.”

Breena catches the tail end of that, and homes on in. “We talking budgets?”

“No for the wedding. Her boy is criticizing going to prom because it’s expensive,” Wendy says.

Breena shrugs a bit. “Eh… I can see that. Tux, limo, tickets, dinner. That’s a lot of money for a kid.”

“No. He’s busting on her for spending her own money to take herself out,” Penny says.

“Ew!” Breena react as if she just found a fist sized slug in her salad. “Oh, that’s just wrong! Come on, honey, no guy gets to do that. He doesn’t want to spend his money on you and something you like, that’s… not cool, but at least fair.” Breena draws a little circle with her finger around them all. “What do you think would happen if Gibbs sat down and said, ‘You can only spend so much on a dress?’”

Emily looks perplexed at that. She can’t, under any circumstance, imagine Gibbs doing that. Penny reads that look. “Exactly. You can’t see him doing that, right?”

She shakes her head. “Nope.”

“No, because he’s a decent guy. Look, you end up with one bank account eventually, and you make budgets together, and you stick to them because you made them together. Abbi and Gibbs are doing that. But, the idea that he’d tell a woman who’s spending the money she made herself what she can or should do with it would never occur to him,” Penny says.

“Or any of the rest of our guys,” Breena adds.

Penny eyes Emily for a moment while Emily thinks about that. “So… I want to see the pictures.”

Again Emily bushes scarlet, and her eyes almost bug out of her head. Ziva knows what pictures she’s thinking of.

“He’s got to be awfully handsome for you to put up with a man who tries to tell you what you should do.”

Emily calms down, but Wendy didn’t miss that, and has a pretty good idea of what sorts of pictures must be on her phone now.
Emily finds a shot of Jared, and… he’s not ugly, but like most eighteen-year-old guys, he’s not about to step out of a fashion shoot, either. Penny looks at the shot, and supposes he looks sort of Justin Bieberish, minus the tattoos. Mostly, he’s tall, gangly, appears to have good skin, and can, when a camera is directly pointed at him, produce a half-decent, cocky smile.

“He’s not really telling me what to do, he’s just telling me what he thinks about it. He’s allowed to do that, right?”

“And he thinks prom is girly and stupid? Or he thinks you’re girly and stupid for wanting to go?”
Penny asks, eyes sharp.

“Prom. Not me.” And all of them know that she’s lying.

“Uh huh. And what great thing does he want to do instead?” Breena asks.

Emily looks confused.

“You want to do something. It’s a big deal for you. He doesn’t. And, yes, he’s allowed to not want to do whatever it is you want to, but if he’s going to veto what you want to do, it’s his job to come up with some sort of compromise. You want a nice celebration of the end of school, something romantic and fun. Okay, doesn’t have to be tuxes and formal dresses, but he can at least offer to take you to a nice dinner and movie, or go to the beach, or… you know, something fun, that you do together,” Breena says.

“He hasn’t suggested anything.”

“Ah. What’s a fun date, normally?” Penny asks.

Emily blushes again.

Penny rolls her eyes and chuckles, then she makes sure she’s got full eye contact with Emily and shakes her head a bit. “Uh huh. He’s got the magic rocket in his pocket. Emily, they’ve all got one.
And trust me, dear, they’ll all be happy as a clam to introduce you to it.”

Breena isn’t sure if Emily’s taking this in or about to have a seizure at Penny being so bold.

Penny’s enjoying this. Emily, like every young person, is entirely certain that sex is something that ceases to exist after fifty and is totally forgotten by sixty. Likewise, in that she was born in 1999, she’s also firmly convinced that sex was invented in 1998. Disabusing her of this is something that pleases Penny to no end.

“My sisters started dating back in the late ‘30s early ‘40s and even then, rubbing on each other was pretty much every young couple’s favorite activity. Honey, I’m eighty-four, and if I got online and asked to see some dick, I’d get buried in an avalanche of offers. Go dump this twit and find someone who’ll put a smile on your face when you’re wearing your clothing. Better yet, we’ll be doing some honeymoon shopping for Abbi soon, Breena and Abby can take you on that trip, find you a battery powered boyfriend, and get you set. It’s a lot easier to see the frogs among the princes when you take care of yourself.”

Emily’s eyes are so wide they’re about to fall out of her head. Her color has dropped to ashy white, and she slowly turns to Wendy. “You cannot, ever, say anything about this to Dad.”

Wendy is about to collapse she’s not laughing so hard. She’s got a smile tugging at the corners of her lips and she’s vibrating gently as she tries to keep herself under control. She manages to nod before succumbing to the giggles. After a moment, she does get herself under control, and Emily’s color
Even playing dress up gets tiring after a while. How this should be, or why, Abbi doesn’t know. It’s not like she’s running for miles with a full pack on her back, or on hour twenty-eight of a six-day stakeout, but… If she never sees another white dress again…

Okay, not never. She’s seen some she really likes, and the ‘to think about more’ pile is steadily growing.

But… she’s done.

Almost.

One more left. Ziva found it while scoping out Emily’s text chat with Jared. She’s getting Abby filled in on what Emily and Jared were texting about, which is a soft buzz in the background as Abbi pulls on the last dress.
The back has a long line of pearl buttons hiding a zipper, and a shimmery satin bow, like Abby’s cloak it’s white with a hint of silver.

In her mind, she can hear the announcer saying, “We’ve got a winner!”

When she steps out, Ziva and Abby go quiet. Both of them grin. Abby starts shooting pictures. Ziva stands up, grabs the cloak and drapes it over Abbi’s shoulders. She’s a princess in layers of filmy white, haloed in silver-tipped white.

Ziva nods, very satisfied. Abbi gets it, that this approval is beyond words. Her internal quiet and Abbi’s is synching up nicely. Abbi nods back at her. They’re done. This is it.
Just got to get it paid for and sized.

Abbi tips her head a bit, and says to Ziva, “So, what color are the bridesmaids wearing?”

Ziva eyes the dress, thinks for a few moments, and says, “Royal purple, more blue than red, silver accents.”

“Okay.”

Abbi’s in line, getting everything paid for, when Abby gets a text, from Jimmy.

Looks like someone tired Daddy out. It’s a shot of Tim on his back, on the sofa, asleep, with Sean, bright-eyed and ready to play some more, on his chest.

We’ll be home soon. Ready to celebrate the victorious hunt!

You got a dress?

And then some. Good intel, too. ;)

Why does that smiley face fill me with dread?

Because Breena and I have one last trip out with Emily, tomorrow. And what’s involved with that trip is nothing you need to be thinking about in conjunction with Emily Fornell.

All right, bleaching out my brain right now. Home soon, right? Your menfolk are hungry. Bring us back dinner, too?

Yeah, we can pick something up on the way home. What do you guys want?

Supposed to be good Lebanese a few miles from you. We were about to order, just wanted to make sure you were okay with grabbing it.

We’re good. Give him a kiss from me when he wakes up.

A second later, Abby gets back, No kisses for me?

You can collect yours in person when I return.

The kiss emoji pops up on her phone, and she tucks it back into her pocket.

All in all, she’d call this a beyond successful day.
“So, what does Emily like about him?” Jimmy asks Abby as they’re working on getting dinner unpacked.

“He’s good with his tongue,” Abby replies.

And at that moment, Tim decides there are certain thoughts that should not, on any level, be associated in his mind with Emily Fornell, so he willfully misunderstands her. “Good sweet talker,” he says grabbing forks to put on the table.

Abby, knowing what he’s doing, and seeing that Jimmy looks very happy to go along with that ride, says, “Yep. And we’re off to show her how to get all the romance she wants on her own.”

“Oh.” Jimmy says. “A trip to Barnes and Noble to peruse the love poems.”

“Exactly,” says Breena, putting falafel into a bowl. “We want her to see how good it can be, and what someone who knows what he’s doing can do for her. None of this second-rate-crap.”

“Sort of like food, introduce her to a great burger, and hope she loses her taste for McDonalds,” Tim says.

“That’s the idea,” Abby replies.

“Sounds like a fun trip,” Tim replies.

“We think it will be,” Breena says, carrying the crispy fried chick pea and almond fritters to the table.

The first time Abby went to a sex shop, it was with her first real boyfriend.

New Orleans in the early ‘90s. Probably one of the only places west of New York City, east of Los Angeles, and south of Chicago where a person could find a well-lit, non-sleazy, sex positive shop that catered to gay and straight clients, was covered in safe sex information, and condoms of every shape, size, color, flavor and size.

She remembers feeling like a kid in not just a candy store, but in Willy Wonka’s candy land. Sooo much stuff, a lot of which she’d never imagined before. They spend close to five hours (most of them skimming the books), giggled (a whole lot), had a quickie in the bathroom (and on the bus on the ride back to LSU), he maxed out his credit card, and she cleaned out her bank account, and both of them thought it was the best trip to New Orleans ever.

The first time Breena went to one… Okay, technically speaking, Breena’s never been to an actual shop before. The first time she did this, she was online, had been engaged for... maybe eight hours, and was getting ready to hit Jimmy with the ‘here’s this sex book, tell me what you like’ conversation.

To say she was eager to get married and enjoy everything that goes with that would have been a massive understatement.
She bought eight books. (After all, she needed to read a lot of them to see which would be the best one to share with Jimmy.) Previous to that point she’d always used her fingers to take care of herself, though a virgin she might have been, stupid or sheltered she wasn’t, so… She was there, she had money, she got herself a few toys, and some things that she thought Jimmy might like, and had an extremely good time when she got home a few days later and found the note in her mailbox saying there was a package waiting for her in the rental office.

And, looking back at that, both of them think that an excellent tradition that should start among the McPalmozo girls (assuming that at some point, there will be a DiNozzo girl) is that, when they hit a certain age, that whichever one of the ladies they get on best with, will take them out to a sex shop and have a long, frank, extremely detailed and graphic conversation about not just health class mechanics of making babies, but about making love, pleasure, orgasms, and the reason why it’s the joy of sex.

It’s also true that both Breena and Abby are of the impression that this is the sort of thing that one should be resolutely unashamed of. But, they are also aware of the fact that just because you aren’t or shouldn’t be ashamed of something, doesn’t mean you want to do it with your parents.

Thus, they’re getting ready to step into the role of ‘cool older person who can answer questions without risking any sort of feelings of judgement.’ Or, as Abby puts it when they get into the car to head off and pick up Emily, “We’re the Orgasm Fairies.”

Breena laughs a bit and gives her a look. “Kind of like the Tooth Fairy, but instead of a lost tooth, we show up and slip a vibrator under your pillow when you lose your virginity?”

Abby loves that idea. “Oh yeah! Though, hopefully with our girls, we’ll get there a bit earlier than that.”

“That’d be nice. I’d rather they not be playing catch up with this.” Breena knows Abby, Tim, and Jimmy’s first time sex stories, and all three of them have something in common. They weren’t great. Tim’s was physically and emotionally disappointing. Abby’s was physically disappointing. Jimmy’s was actually pretty good, he certainly remembers it fondly, but not amazing. Her first time; however, when she went into it with a head full of information, lots of time, a good set up, and someone she utterly adored, was amazing.

And she wants that for their girls.

“I can’t believe we’re really doing this,” Emily says as she slips into the car behind Abby and Breena.

“Believe it. This is something every woman needs to know, so…” Abby says.

“We’re off to round out your education,” Breena finishes.

She shakes her head a bit. “Dad would have a stroke if he knew we were doing this.”

“Then, for the sake of making sure Gibbs’ best man is in shape to do his job, you better not tell him what we’re doing,” Breena says.

Emily laughs, a bit of a blush lighting her face. “I’m saying nothing. But… How many people on your side know about this?”
“All of them,” Abby answers matter of fact. “Though most of the guys have decided that not thinking about you and sex in the same sentence is conducive to a long and healthy life, so they’re happily telling themselves that we’re off to Barnes and Noble to look at the love poems and have a long conversation about how real men treat women they love.”

“And that’s going to happen, too,” Breena adds.

Emily has missed the how good men treat women they love bit, and focused on everyone knows. “Oh, God, Gibbs knows! He’s gonna—“ “Say absolutely nothing. No one wants your dad having a fit. You are an adult. It’s your body. The better you know what it likes the better you’re going to be in the long run. And, not to put too fine a point on it, but the better you do getting yourself off, the less appealing those twits out there look. Being horny is like being drunk, suddenly a bunch of 3s start looking like 8s or 9s. And none of us, least of all your dad, want you hooking up with a 3,” Breena adds.

“And you all think Jared’s a 3,” Emily says with an arched eyebrow.

“2.5.” Abby adds. “But that’s based on Wendy and Diane’s assessment.” And what Ziva told them about that text. Bits of that made the hair raise on the collective backs of necks of that crew. That looked like step one of the kind of guy who starts off borderline okay, and two years down the line, is a real problem. “We’ll also watch. That’s why he’s coming to Breena’s next weekend. We’ll make sure that it’s not just mom and dad overreacting. But, you’ve got to realize, you are not in this on your own. You’ve got a wide net of people looking out for you, and if you do something that makes one of them worry, the rest of the crew swings into action.”

“So, this is an intervention? He’s not a serial killer, Abby.”

“It is an intervention, and none of us think he’s a serial killer. You ever get chewed out for getting an A minus on a test?” Breena asks.

Emily scowls at that memory.

“Yeah, I know, I didn’t like that, either. My buddies are squeaking by with Cs, but if I got two answers wrong, Mom would get that disappointed look, and Dad would pull me aside for a ‘chat,’” Breena says. “That’s what’s going on here. You can do better.”

“But I like him,” Emily says.

“Why?” Abby asks. “What about him makes you smile. Besides sex. We’re hooking you up with better sex than you can get with him. I guarantee that. It’s going to be at least a few more years before you run into a guy who can read you well enough to do a better job with you than you can do for yourself.”

Emily sighs, and both of the older women let her think. After a moment goes by without any response, Breena says, “Emily, it shouldn’t be that difficult to come up with something. Ask me what I like about Jimmy, and I can go on for a week.”

“It’s not difficult, it’s… I don’t know if you’d understand what I like about him.”

“Try us. I guarantee we can’t understand what you don’t say,” Abby replies.

“People like me when I’m with him.” She looks up at the ceiling of the Highlander. “Most of the time, no one at school sees me. I’ve got my three buddies, and that’s it. I’m more popular with the teachers than I am with the other kids. I might as well be an invisible ghost.”
“And when you’re with him, people notice you,” Abby says.

“Yeah. And not just as someone to copy homework answers off of. They listen to me, and talk to me, and some of them are really nice. I’m finally a senior, I’ve got my little crew of friends, we’re doing fine, and taking hard classes, making the final push to get into college, and we’re okay because we’ve got each other, and then everything went to hell last fall! A third of my class is gone now, including one of my good friends. Everyone scattered because we all had parents who worked for or with the government, and a lot of them lived in DC. He saw me sitting by myself at lunch, the lunch I should have been having with Stacy, but she’s in Georgia now, because her parents worked for the EPA, and that’s the closest office that’s open and had room for them! He sat next to me, talking about English lit, which we have together, and he’s not stupid, he had some good comments about why Twilight was just following the patriarchal tradition of spoon-feeding girls dysfunctional relationships as a romantic good and that making us read Romeo and Juliet and pretending it’s a love story was just doing the same thing with fancier language. And, I liked that, it was a good conversation, and the next day he waved me over to eat with his buddies, and…”

“And if you break up with him, you’re back to eating lunch on your own?” Breena says.

Emily sighs. “Three days of the cycle I don’t have lunch with my other friends, and because everything got flipped upside down, kids gone, their parents in jail or moved to different parts of the country, or, shit, I’ve got seven classmates who lost one or both parents last fall… Everything shifted, and when I stared eating with him, I brought my buddies over, too, and now they’re part of his group, and who knows if they’ll decide to stay with him or me if I leave him.”

“Do they think he’s a good boyfriend?” Abby asks, gently.

Emily sighs at that, too. “Sarah doesn’t. Kristin does. Stacy never got to meet him. Meet him meet him, she’d seen him around the halls, and knows his name, but never talked to him.”

“How about your new friends, his buddies, what do they think?” Breena asks.

Emily shrugs. “They’re his buddies. They like him.”

“Girl buddies, guy buddies?” Abby asks.

“Both. It’s about twenty kids.”

“So… Are you saying you like your social position with him more than you like him?” Breena asks.

“Eh… I like him, but… I like them, too.”

“Are you his first girlfriend?” Abby asks.

“No!”

“So where are they? Any in the group still?” Breena says, turning a bit to look behind her at Emily.

“Not his core group. There’s the core group, Jared, Seth, Cora, Miki, and Rob, and then there’s the wider group.”

“Are you core group or wider group?” Abby asks.

“Right now, both.”

“Is there someone in that group you really like?” Breena asks. “Or do you just like being part of it?”
That gets a long sigh, and more looking at the ceiling of the Highlander. “Seth’s really sweet. But he’s Jared’s best friend, and if I dump Jared, I won’t get to see Seth anymore.”

“Oh,” Abby replies. Breena nods. They’ve hit the soft, squelchy emotional target.

“And is Seth… fond of you?” Breena asks.

Emily shrugs. “I don’t know. He’s fond of Jared. They’ve been buddies since kindergarten. He told Jared to lay off on the prom is stupid stuff when I’m around, and smiled when he said it.” Emily has a little smile on her face when she says that.

Breena and Abby share a look. Both of them are on the same page here.

“You know, I have the feeling if you were to suddenly find yourself single, you might end up with a prom date shortly thereafter,” Breena says.

“Oh, come on. He is not going to ask out the girl who just dumped his best friend.”

The adults share another look. Abby chews her lip a bit. Breena thinks. They aren’t sure exactly how specific to be about this. Then Breena says, “You know, one of these days, maybe you should have a conversation with your Dad, or Gibbs, about what a guy might do when his best buddy has a girl he wants, and then he doesn’t.”

Which is when a few things that Emily knows about her mom, dad, and Uncle Gibbs click into place, and her eyes go wide. “Oh.”

Both of the adult ladies nod.

---

One of the perks of taking this trip in 2017, instead of 1991, is that sex shops are not secret things confined to the shady part of town.

Likewise, they are not, by a long shot, the only trio of ladies in the place, doing a “christening,” for lack of a better word, of a young woman off to start really exploring her sexuality.

When Abby first did this, the idea that a girl might do this with her ‘aunts’ just wasn’t a thing. But right now, they’re in the store, and it’s them, and probably three other groups of older women with a younger girl, most of them with some sort of coffee based drink, talking about the pros and cons of different styles of vibrators and which lubes they like best and on and on.

Abby thinks this is very much a sign of the world being a better place now than it used to be. And, for the moment, she’s wishing that Penny and Ducky weren’t already heading north to get back to New York, because she’s sure Penny would have had a blast on this trip. (If for no other reason than the fact that they can go on it.)

Okay, sure, in Virginia, people under 18 aren’t allowed in a sex shop, so Emily did have to show her driver’s license, but once they got in the door, there were no hints that she, or anyone else for that matter, didn’t belong in there or should be even remotely embarrassed about being there.

“First off, stocking up. Which kind of condoms do you like?” Abby asks, once they get in.
“He’s in charge of that.”

“And you make sure he never ‘forgets’ them?” Breena says.

Emily nods. “Yeah. He can get a bit whiny about that, but he knows nothing’s happening if he doesn’t bring one, so he’s always got one.”

“Do you have your own?” Abby asks.

Emily shakes her head.

“Okay, we’re fixing that.” Breena grabs three six packs. “Jimmy, Tim, and Tony’s favorites. Guys are not interchangeable and what feels good to one won’t necessarily feel good to the next one. That said, between the three of them, they’ve got almost seventy years’ experience of using these things, and, Tony especially, has tried them all, so these are the ones our guys like best.”

Emily understands why Breena knows which kind Jimmy likes best. She’s a bit startled by the idea that she knows what Tim and Tony like best. “You know which kinds Tim and Tony like best?”

Breena smirks. “We’ve had some fun over the years stocking play kits. One of our wedding traditions is making sure that the bride has a good collection of fun stuff for her honeymoon.”

Then Emily looks into the basket at the pile of condoms, curious. She knows Ziva is pregnant, knows Abby just had a baby, and doesn’t know that Breena’s got a plus one, but she did notice her not drinking when they were looking for a dress for Abbi. “You guys still use condoms? Isn’t…” she doesn’t know how to ask politely what she’s thinking, which is something along the lines of I didn’t think old, married people used them.

“Not very often,” Abby replies. “I’m not having much sex at all right now, but when we get back to it, I’ll be using condoms. When Sean’s old enough for a little brother or sister, I’ll say goodbye to them, and that’ll probably be the end of them for me. We don’t use them for disease prevention, just temporary birth control. It’s not worth going on the pill, getting your whole system upside down, if you’re only going to need it for three or six months.”

Breena nods with that. “The dynamics of the game are a bit different when you’re in the baby-having part of life. I don’t use them at all right now, and Ziva doesn’t, either.”

“And none of us were using them with our boys before we were trying to get pregnant.”

“Fluid-bonded,” Emily says.

“They’ve got a term for it now, of course,” Abby replies. “Yeah, we are. But right now, my hormones are already crazy, I’m nursing, menopause is lurking, and I’m not going to make them even crazier by adding birth control pills or a patch or something. I can say, Tim is eagerly awaiting the day the condoms get retired again.”

“Jimmy and I do something like that, too. After a new baby there’s a six month stretch with all the time condoms, and then my period starts back up, so I can start charting, figure out when I’m fertile…” which reminds Abby, and she goes scuttling off to the book section, finds the one that explains everything every woman needs to know about how her cycle works, and how to know where she is in it, and rushes back with it, dumping it in their cart.

“That one. Of everything we’re getting today, that’s the one you need to read and memorize. Life gets so much easier when you know why your body and mood are doing what they’re doing.”
Breena eyes Taking Charge of Your Fertility For Women and nods. “If there’s anything I’d mandate everyone read in school, this would be it.”

And, while it’s true that at any other time Emily would find that book fascinating, there’s a lot of stuff in this store, and she wants to do some exploring. Abby and Breena see that, and Abby says, “Okay, we’ve got condoms covered. Let’s get some lube to go with them, and then you’re free to explore.”

“Why are we getting lube with them?” Emily asks. “They’ve already got lube.”

“Put a bit, just a drop or two, on the inside, and that feels better for him, and add some to the outside for you. The lube on condoms isn’t very good.”

The lube section is a huge collection of tester bottles, along with a sealed, Fort Knox style location where the lubes live. Abby chuckles at that. “Apparently people shoplift these like crazy. Okay, you want a water-based lube for anything involving toys, and silicon if you’re thinking anal, and anything else is up to what feels good to you.”

The next hour involves playing with the testers. Abby and Breena appreciate the way Emily shops. She reads packaging, tests everything, and is even checking reviews on Amazon. She is thorough about how she spends her money.

As she’s looking through she runs into the ‘anal sex’ lubes. “Okay, why would I want lube that numbs… anything?” Emily asks holding a tube of Anal EEZE.

Abby shakes her head. “You don’t. At least, not for lube. You want a tube of it to keep in your apartment or dorm room to rub on bruises or small cuts, go for it, it’s good for that. But for sex, I don’t recommend it.”

“If it hurts, don’t do it! For anything!” Breena adds.

Abby adds a rider to that. “If it hurts bad don’t do it. Sometimes you might like a little sting or stretch or whatever, and that’s hurting good, and that’s fine, but if you need to numb yourself to do something, that’s you shutting down your body telling you to stop doing it.”

“And don’t do that!” Breena says, and this time Abby nods, vigorously.

Abby take the tube out of Breena’s hand. “Any guy shows up with this, and all he’s telling you is that all he knows about anal sex comes from porn. Send him home to google and learn until he knows what the hell he’s doing. Trust me, if he thinks this is how to do anal, he’s going to be lame in the sack for everything else, too.”

“And worse than lame, he’s telling you he doesn’t care if it hurts you.” Breena shakes her head, takes the lube away from Abby, and puts it back on the shelf. “Anyone who shows up with this stuff doesn’t have enough patience or care for you and your pleasure to be allowed into your presence, let alone your bed.”

“Best way to look at it, and this is something I got from Breena, is that your body is a sacred space, and only certain petitioners are worthy of being allowed access to the holy of holies.”

“I didn’t put it like that.”

“Well, no, but that’s the basic idea. Make sure he treats your skin like it’s sacred, and you’re in for a better time. Look, it doesn’t have to be until death do us part and love of a lifetime, but make sure he understands that he’s getting to taste the nectar of the gods when he gets his tongue on you.”
Emily laughs a little at that.

“Yes, you can laugh because it’s funny, but no, you’re not laughing because it’s wrong. Your body and access to it is a privilege, one that needs to be earned! When you’re deciding if he gets to have access, see how he treats the things that are important to him, make sure he treats you at least that well. If all he wants is a quick orgasm, he can do that for himself. And if all he wants is a quick orgasm, he’s unlikely to be willing to make sure you get off, too, so leave him to his own devices when it comes to quick orgasms for him,” Breena says.

“What if he wants a quick one for me?”

Abby smiles at that. “That’s a good time. Let him get on his knees and give you one, and then be nice and return the favor. Abby’s golden rule of oral sex, give as you want to receive! And that means no spitting. You don’t want him wiping his tongue off if he licks you, so don’t do that to him.”

Emily eyes the flavored lubes. “Then…”

“Just for play,” Abby says. “Something different. Though, most guys like how pussy tastes. If I brought some of this stuff home and gave it to him to use, Tim would just roll his eyes at me, and then tell me in extremely graphic terms about how the taste of pussy is a good two-thirds of the fun or oral sex, and he might as well put a condom on his tongue as use that crap.” That gets another wide-eyed look from Emily. Abby powers on, “If you’re both clean, as in recently applied soap and water, and healthy, you should taste good to each other. And if you don’t, that’s a good sign that you need to get checked out.”

“What if his… cum… tastes icky?”

“Swallow fast, and then gargle, brush your teeth, or grab some gum. Again, if he’s healthy, he shouldn’t taste bad. Nothing you want a gallon of, but it shouldn’t be repulsive. Neither of our guys taste like much of anything. It’s more mouthfeel than flavor,” Abby says.

“Jimmy’ll taste a bit off if his blood sugar goes too far off the day or so before. But I can smell that on him long before I’d be able to taste it.”

Abby who hasn’t run into that, gives her a curious look.

“You know how if his blood sugar gets out of whack he can have that sort of maple syrup scent?”

Abby shakes her head at that, too.

“Okay, yeah, usually he’s really good about keeping himself in line.” Emily’s still a few pieces of information short here, and Breena picks up on that. “Jimmy’s diabetic. If his blood sugar gets too far out of control, you can smell it on him, and, a few days later, taste it. He’s really good about keeping his sugar under control, but he’s had a few times where he’s let his insulin slip.”

Abby files that away to ask about later, and says, “And again, if he’s tastes awful, that’s a bad sign. And, honestly, in your age group, any guy you date shouldn’t have had long enough to develop the kind of bad habits that can make semen rank. If he’s eighteen and smoking so much that you don’t want his cum in your mouth, his skin, hair, and lips should all smell and taste so bad he shouldn’t have gotten an invite into your bed to begin with.”

“And if he’s not in your age group, you’ve got no business tasting his cum,” Breena says, without a trace of blush, though that’s not a sentence she ever expected to say. “And if he’s not in your age group, he’s got no business offering it, either. All of our guys are happily imagining us off doing some romantic-love-oriented-thing, because if they think about what we’re actually doing, they’ll imagine it, and you, and doing things with you and what we’re buying, and they all know they’re way too damn old to be thinking about that.”

“They’ll be thinking about…” Emily’s somewhere between horrified and titillated at that.

“They’re guys. Who like sex. With women. A LOT,” Abby says. “You are an attractive woman who is genuinely pleasant to be around. Of course they’re thinking about it. But they also know that’s creepy, and over the line, so they’re working on not thinking about it.”

“Anyone over twenty-five is hitting on you, and he’s too damn old,” Breena says.

Emily looks confused. “How… twenty-five… Just like that?”

“Just like that!” Breena snaps her fingers. “Add seven years to your age, and that’s the line until you hit twenty-five, then have at it.”

“But…”

“Nope. Twenty-five. It takes 10,000 hours to get really good at something. Twenty-five gets you to 10,000 hours of sex, relationshipping, and adulting. That’s when you’ve got enough experience to go beyond the seven-year limit.” Abby says it, but both she and Breena are pretty sure they’ve come up with another rule for the future McPalmozzo girls.

In the end, Emily gets the variety pack of several different brands of lube, which Abby and Breena approve of. There’s only so much information you can get from rubbing a drop of lube between your fingers. Field-testing is a superior learning technique.

They let her spend a good chunk of time browsing the book section.

And then a longer period of time playing with the toys. That involves a lot more googling and reading up on reviews. They’re more than willing to buy whichever toy she likes as a gift for her, but they also want to make sure she gets something that’s solid, well built, and will get the job done.

“You’re not getting anything for yourselves?” Emily asks as she looks up from her phone, which is currently on a site that reviews sex toys.

“My toy box is well stocked these days,” Breena says.

Emily looks at her, and at Abby, and back to her. “What do you actually… use?”

“When we’re on our own, or with the guys?” Abby asks.

“Uh… Both?”

“Don’t do a lot of on my own these last few years,” Abby says.

“No time?” Emily asks.

“Not exactly. You really only want so much sex, and I get enough sex with other people that I’m generally not looking for on my own time.”

“Oh.” Emily’s not sure what to do with that. There’s almost a sense of pity coming off of her.
Abby shrugs a bit. “Right now, my body’s not into sex at all. That’s just what happens after a new baby. When I’m not this close to having had a baby, I was having sex almost every night. That’s plenty of sex for me.”

“Oh.” And this time, with a concrete number, Emily’s got a better idea of what’s going on and isn’t looking at Abby like she’s feeling sorry for her.

“When I was single, on my own time, most of the time was just fingers and thoughts, but once or twice a week I’d make sure to really do myself, and that’s when the toys and stories and videos came out. And in those cases I might go through a few toys. But, in general,” Abby taps a basic wand vibrator, “this, or something like it, is my ‘old reliable.’”

“I like a bit more stretch than is easy to do with just fingers, so once I got a dildo, it’s been part of just about all my own my own playtimes. But, like Abby, since I’ve been married, I haven’t been doing a lot of on my own play. It’s not that it doesn’t happen at all, it’s just… Sex with Jimmy is more fun than sex on my own, so, assuming he’ll be available in the not wildly distant future, I’ll wait to play with him.

“And with the guys… Most sex is easy, quiet, and relaxed. No toys, bells, or whistles. Maybe some lube. Half an hour or so, everyone has a good time, and is ready for a good night of sleep.”

Abby laughs.

“Okay, as good as you can get with little kids in the house.”

“It’s a lot like food,” Abby says, “you don’t want a seven course dinner every night. Or even most nights. But as a treat, oh yeah! Tim and I call it snack sex, meal sex, and banquet sex. Snack sex is a quickie. Like grabbing a potato chip when you want something salty. It’s great, but you don’t want to live on it. Meal sex, that’s what Breena’s talking about. That every night, every other night, at home, getting ready to sleep or waking up, put a smile on everyone’s face, start the day off good, or end it sweet, sex. For most people, that’s probably 90-95 percent of the sex you have.”

“And then there are banquet nights,” Breena says with a smile in her voice.

“And on banquet nights, anything you see in this store might come into play.” Abby finishes. “But, if you want to know what we like best, what gets used most often… Lube. Good lube makes everything go better.” As Abby says that, Breena heads over to the next row, and is then back a moment later with a little packet in her hand.

“Cock rings. Just a basic ring of silicon, you slip it on him, just over his dick for just a little snug, over his dick and balls for really snug. Both of our guys recommend them. And, if you like a bit of extra stretch, those are a treat for you, too.”

“Ropes. Not the stuff they’ve got here. This stuff is too expensive and doesn’t look very good. Just basic decorator’s rope. Head off to a fabric store, and look around, you find ribbons and cords, and that’ll do just fine. Unless you want to hang someone from the ceiling, you don’t need more than that, and honestly, we’ve done everything short of that, and have never come close to breaking those silk cords they use to tie curtains up.” Emily looks mildly scandalized by that.

Abby glances at Breena, and decides that Emily probably doesn’t need to know that the next most used toy in their box is the strap-on dildo. She’s not sure how much of that Tim wants out and about, so she edits that out of the list. Shoes for Jimmy’s enjoyment come next, and they aren’t going on the list, either, so…
“Sexy undies. That’ll just depend on what you like, what looks good on you, and what he likes.”

Breena eyes the lingerie selection in the store. “None of this stuff is bad, but… I’d buy online, where you can return it if the size isn’t quite right or it doesn’t look on you the way you thought it would.”

“I like anal play, so we’ve got a few toys for that,” Abby says.

“And I don’t, so it’s not in my toy box,” Breena adds.

“And that’s just different people with different bodies like different things.”

“Which is part of being here. Get you a few things, and then you play and experiment.” Breena nods to the toys. “Pick the one you like best, and that’s on us.”

Emily’s eyes go wide. She had seen one that looked really interesting and had great reviews, and it was 200% of her budget for all of this.

“Condoms, lube, basic supplies, having them on hand is on you,” Abby says. “One of my rules is that if you’re at a point in your life where you can’t afford the necessary supplies to have safe sex, then you aren’t in a position to take the risk that comes with sex. If you can’t afford condoms, you really can’t afford a baby or an STD, so no sex with other people for you. Let me take that one step further, if you hear yourself or anyone who wants to sleep with you say, ‘Condoms are so expensive,’ you or they don’t have enough money to afford the kind of sex where you need condoms. Anyone who says that isn’t getting more than a hand job, and if you’re the one saying it, that’s where you draw your line. So, you’re buying that” she points to what’s already in the basket, “for yourself. As for the toys. That’s for you, to play with on your own or with a friend, and that’s the sort of thing someone who wants you to be happy might buy for you.”

“But put a condom on the toy if you’re playing with a friend,” Breena adds. “You can spread STDs by using them without protection.”

“Which again invokes Abby’s ‘you must be able to afford condoms to play with other people’ rule.”

Emily nods slowly at that, and says, “And that would be rule number what?”

“Twenty-seven,” Abby says with a grin as Emily heads off to go look at the toys some more.

Breena raises an eyebrow. “You just make that up?”

Abby shrugs. “First time I ever said it out loud. Certainly lived by it when I was single.”

“Okay. You guys get done with this. I need to go pump,” Abby says, leaving Breena and Emily to face the checkout line on their own.

She’s almost done the first side before they join her in the car. “Long line.”

Breena nods. “No returns, so everything has to be taken out of the box, checked to make sure it works, and then packed back up, and we were behind the bachelorette party.”

Abby nods. “So, I’m guessing you want to run back home and get to try those out, but that’s not quite up, yet.”

Emily’s mouth opens and shuts.
“Part of this is also why, at first glance, we think Jared looks like a turd, and how to identify a good guy,” Breena adds. “Where are your keys?” she asks Abby.

Abby hands them over. She’s already in the passenger seat. “You’re driving?”

“That’s why you’re over there, right?”

“Yeah.”

“So,” she turns to Emily, “where do you want to get a drink and a snack or something, and talk?”

Once they’ve settled into their seats at a quiet, almost deserted coffee shop, Breena says, “There are frogs, princes, and vipers, and between us we’ve kissed an awful lot of frogs, lucked out to have found a prince or two, and lucked out again in not getting bit by a viper.”

“Too hard,” Abby says, “but that’s the cautionary tale at the end of this story.”

“All guys, at the beginning of getting to know them, are frogs. They just are. You don’t know enough about them to decide if there’s prince material under the frog or not.” Breena puts a teaspoon of sugar into her cappuccino.

“Over the years we’ve rubbed up against a lot of frogs, looking for prince, and eventually we found some frogs that turned into princes…” Abby says, sipping her raspberry Italian soda, and picking up one of the cupcakes Breena had gotten them.

Emily’s sitting there, listening, trying not to look too bored at the combined wisdom of the ages being spewed upon her. She is interested in the toys, and the cookie in front of her, and she’s not obviously tuning them out, so that’s probably about as good as they can hope for right now.

“But we had a pretty good idea there was a prince under that frog skin before the rubbing commenced.”

Abby laughs at that. “There are always hints that under that shiny green skin, there’s a prince lurking. You can’t do it the same way I did, everyone’s phone has a map on it now, but back when I was dating, one thing I’d do was suggest directions for how to get to where we were going.” That gets Emily’s attention. And Abby smiles, she was figuring that actual hands on advice might be a good way to get her attention.

“It’s just a basic little thing, but what does he do when you give him directions? Does he listen? Does he take your directions? Does the idea of you giving directions annoy him? He doesn’t have to follow your route, that’s fine, he might have a better way to get there, but if he acts like an ass about you giving him directions to the restaurant, that’s not a prince. So, by the time I got to the restaurant, I’d already weeded a quarter of them out.”

Breena nods. “I always said no to something in the first two dates. Something he wanted to do.
Movie, dinner, whatever. Just to see how he’d respond. The guy who won’t take your no for an answer is the guy you drop like a red hot cast iron frying pan. If he’s a pain in the ass about not going to see a movie, he will not be cool with you saying no to sex, and he will make your life miserable if you try to break up with him after he’s invested some time and energy in you.”

“You said no to more than dinner,” Emily says, remembering Breena’s weed-out-the-slugs technique.
Breena smiled. “That was the big no. Guys who had already gotten past the little no test got to that one. Look, you don’t want to abstain until you get married, that’s fine, but I can guarantee you that if you say to a guy, ‘I love men, I love how they smell, and feel, and kiss, and how they make me feel, but I’m a virgin,’ or in your case, ‘I’m waiting for a man I… like, love, know better, whatever, and if you respect that, I’d like to see you again, and if you don’t, I’ll get my half of the check, call and Uber, and we’ll part ways, no harm, no foul,’ a herd of horny frogs will go hopping off, never to be seen again.”

“The problem with that technique is that it leaves you with the princes and the vipers. The princes respect you and your choices and still want to get to know you better. The vipers are now looking at you as a challenge to be overcome,” Abby says.

“And that’s what worries us, and your parents, about Jared. Ziva caught some of your text conversation,” Emily looks like she wants to die of embarrassment at that, but Abby keeps on, “and, after this shopping trip, it should be pretty clear we don’t care what you might be doing with him on your phone.”

“And given that you can’t get sick or pregnant over the phone, we’re all in favor of a mostly electronic sex life,” Breena says.

“But… and this is a big but—“

“Gargantuan but…”

“The earlier part, when you’re telling him that you’re having a good time, and he’s trying to get you to leave, that raised a lot of red flags,” Abby’s face is concerned, and it’s not like she’s making a show of this. Ziva told her about that bit of the conversation, and it did make the hair on the back of her neck stand up.

“For example, you’ll notice we’ve been out for a few hours, and though both guys have texted, it’s just to talk to us, see how things are going, and send us cute pictures from home. They’d like us to be home, but they know we’re having a good time, so they’re not being jerks about it. So, sure,” Breena grabs her phone, and finds Jimmy’s latest text, which is a picture of him doing bicep curls, with Molly on one arm and Kelly on the other and a mildly salacious double entendre about pumping some more iron later. “he’s looking to make me want to be home, with him, but you’ll notice what he’s doing, making home, and him, look appealing to me. He’s not telling me he’s bored, lonely. He’s not telling me to come home. He’s not telling me to break my commitments. He’s just, gently, reminding me that there’s a good time waiting at home for me, and that maybe I don’t want to spend all day on this mission.”

Abby realizes that Breena’s hitting near the target, and she decides to shoot closer. “Being bored, lonely, or horny isn’t a crime. Saying I miss you isn’t a problem. Setting the situation up so it’s a ‘you like them better than me’ issue, is.

“A viper will try to make your whole life revolve around him, and he’ll do it an inch at a time. He’ll start by being needy. Needing more of your time, more of your attention, and more, and more. Vipers strike fast, but they don’t set their prey up fast. They are patient, and they will slowly, gently, slip you away from the people who matter until you’ve only got them, then they strike like lightning.

“We’re a family of cops, we’ve seen this go wrong, which is part of what you’re seeing right now, but ‘reassure me that you love me best’ is a warning sign for us. That’s usually the start of bad things.”

Breena nods at that.
“Now for the cautionary tale. I caught a real viper. And, seriously, only luck, good timing, and a family full of cops saved me on that one. At first, it’s great, because a viper is needy and you and only you can serve his needs. He loves you, and worships you, and never wants to be apart from you —“

“How’s the different from what you’ve been saying about how a guy should treat me?” Emily asks.

“That’s one of the hard parts. When you’re just starting out, a viper can look like a really good boyfriend. The biggest thing is how does he act when you want to be on your own or with your friends and family? A good guy is cool with that. A viper gets whiny about it.”

“Again, cue us worrying about Jared,” Breena says.

“He doesn’t usually do that. He hasn’t texted all day.”

“Is that because he knows you’re on your own and he’s letting you have time, or because he’s trying to punish you, make you feel insecure? Like he doesn’t really care about you?” Abby asks.

They both catch the flicker in Emily’s eyes. She doesn’t answer, but she doesn’t have to. There’s enough doubt in her eyes that they know that at least the idea that this is happening is getting to her.

“Yeah. You have a tiff, and he just vanishes, also not a good thing. One day, okay, fine. Much longer… That raises some flags, too. When we were dating, Jimmy and I talked every day. Might just be a quick, Slammed at work, tomorrow? Sort of thing, but, even if we were fighting, we kept talking.”

“You were fighting?” Emily looks like she can’t believe that.

Breena smiles dryly. “We’ve had a few doozies over the years.”

“And Tim and I have, too. It happens. And if you can make up, forgive, and let it go, you’re once again in prince territory. Frogs hold onto things and get annoyed about them for years. Vipers hold onto them, bring them up over and over, beat you with them, subtly change the story so you’re the bad guy, and use them to make you feel like you owe them.”

They see that hit Emily, too.

“Uh huh,” Abby says. “Look, it’s possible, and likely for that matter, that Jared’s just a jerk, and a young one at that. Vipers aren’t common, and just being a jerk can look like a viper, too. Especially to over protective adults. But… Just because he may not be a viper doesn’t mean you want a jerk, either.”

“And if he is a viper… Abby…” Breena leads.

“My viper… He was so clingy and needy and everything was always a problem that only I could solve, and yeah, at first, you feel like a hero. You’re Florence Nightingale with a side of Wonder Woman. It’s great. But then there are more problems that only you can solve. And he wants all of your time. And he starts to get annoyed by you seeing your friends, or working—“

“And he hates your job and your friends,” Breena adds, knowing this story.

“Yeah, he’s suggesting that maybe one day you’d like to move away with him. Somewhere just the two of you. That sounds really romantic, right?” Abby asks.

Emily nods a bit.
“Yeah. No. It’s not. Your life, my life, Breena’s life, none of us, should revolve entirely around another person. That’s a bad sign if he, or you, want that. You want a week or two of just you, that’s normal. Everyone wants that. Too much longer than that… You’re starting to get into dangerous territory.

“He starts getting annoyed when you aren’t the solution to all the problems. And he gets annoyed when things don’t go exactly his way. And then things start changing. Something happens, you fight about it, that happens, but he keeps bringing it back up, and every time he tells you about it, you’re a little less reasonable, and it’s always you, he’s the pure as the driven snow little lamb, and if you stick to the truth about what happened, he’ll finally say something like, ‘Fine, if you have to see it that way, I’ll play along.’

“A guy ever says that, or anything along those line, you run the fuck away from him. You stop seeing him. You cut him out!” Breena says.

“And that’s where I got sick of my viper. I don’t like particularly needy guys to begin with, and he was just way too far over the line, and of course, he was constantly being ‘wounded’ by me, because I’m ‘cold’ and ‘distant’ and too focused on my ‘job’ and those friends who ‘don’t really love me the way he does.’ I left him.

“But he knew my number, he knew where I lived, and where I worked, and he wouldn’t leave me. He stalked me for almost a year before I could get the restraining order.”

“You had to get a restraining order? Why didn’t Gibbs—“ Emily asks.

“Didn’t tell him, and he asked me the same thing when he found out about the Viper. And I’ll tell you what I told him, ‘I wanted him restrained, not beaten within an inch of his life with a baseball bat.’”

“Why did you have to say that to Gibbs?” Emily asks.

“For the same reason he made sure to start teaching me how to shoot the day after that fiasco ended, because a restraining order is just a piece of paper, and a piece of paper has never stopped a man from doing anything he wanted to do. The viper, he set up a crime, the idea being that he’d ‘save’ me from the bad guy, and I’d be so grateful, I’d… I don’t know. I know he didn’t plan on having it last. They found the ‘suicide note’ he’d written in my handwriting for when I decided we were done.”

“Holy shit… Is he… Did…” Emily opens and closes her mouth.

“He gets out of jail later this year. They could only keep him for a decade. He does not know my new name. He doesn’t know where I live. And Tim’s made sure that he can’t find that out. We have three guns in our home, and one of them is mine. When I’m out, I always have a Taser on me. It’s in my purse right now. And you can absolutely bet that the second he steps out of prison that Tim will be tracking his every move, and if he gets within ten miles of me, all of NCIS, and the FBI likely, will show up and happily drag his ass back to jail for violating his parole.”

“Do you think…” Breena asks that time.

Abby shrugs. “I hope not. And beyond my usual pay attention to my surroundings, which everyone should do, I’m not sweating it, because I refuse to spend the next fifty years afraid. But… I got lucky. The situation with him could have been much worse, and if it was…” Abby sips her drink, thinking of how to put this. “If a viper bites you, bad things are going to happen. You got bit, that’s a bad thing. Bad things will happen to him. What happens to him will depend on how badly you get bit. Bad things will happen to our family when we’re done with him if we’re not careful. The whole world is vastly better off with you knowing how to weed the vipers out ahead of time, because, trust me, if a viper needs his head cut off, we’ll do it, but that’s… messy.”

“Have… you guys…” Emily doesn’t finish that sentence, and Abby and Breena don’t respond.

They drop Emily off at her mom’s place.

“See you on Saturday!” Breena says, with a smile.

“See you then.” To say that it’s been an enlightening day for Emily Fornell is an understatement. To say that she’s about to call up Jared and dump him though… That is yet to be determined.

Abby looks over at Breena. “You think she’ll still be dating Jared by then?”

Breena shrugs. “Depends on how much she likes Seth.”

“So, part two of the plan, have a chat with Gibbs and Fornell about how you too can get the best friend.”

Breena nods.

Chapter End Notes

Taking Charge of Your Fertility For Women is a real book, and assuming you're the sort of person who wants to know how and why your (or a woman's) body does what it does, it's worth its weight in gold.
Like any child, Emily Fornell has a somewhat different view of her parents than the rest of the world, and of the view they have of themselves.

Unlike any other child, Emily is a hybrid of the Fornell and Anderson lines, and is thus incapable of letting a mystery set untouched.

And thinking about starting a conversation with her Dad or maybe Uncle Gibbs, she’s thinking that she’s got something of a mystery on her hands.

The first time she met “Uncle Gibbs” she was a little girl. Mostly she remembers her Dad was scared and angry. Her mom was terrified and angrier. Uncle Gibbs seemed calm, but sad. She remembers him looking at her, a lot, wistful.

After that, sometimes when she was at her Dad’s place, Uncle Gibbs would be there. She came to realize that he was a friend of her dad. Occasional mentions of ‘our ex-wife’ hit her radar, but since she there wasn’t a time when her parents lived together that she can remember, the idea that they were ever married is something that took years to set in, so it took a few years for her to realize their mutual ex-wife was her mom.

She was probably about ten then, and she asked about that. Diane told her that she had been married to Gibbs before Fornell. Tobias told her that he met Diane through Gibbs.

And being ten, that was enough.

When Sterling went missing, and she got to see her mom with Gibbs, it stopped being enough. She was 12 then, old enough to notice that there was something going on with them. Something she didn’t usually see with Sterling and her mom…

It took her another year, and another shot of seeing her Mom when she was dealing with Gibbs, to come to the conclusion that her mom had a crush on Gibbs. Which seemed odd since they weren’t married anymore and somehow her Dad had happened after Gibbs. Things fell apart with Sterling after that. But, after Sterling, if she needed some time away from her parents, they were both fine with her crashing at Gibbs’ place. And he was fine with her being there, seemed pleased that she was happy to work on whatever project he had going in the basement.

Her mom stopped getting angry when she talked about Gibbs.

Of course, that was also about the time she stopped getting so angry at Fornell, too.

Emily asked what had happened with them, and Diane looked sad and shook her head, and then said it didn’t matter, not anymore.

When she asked her Dad, he got a really guilty look on his face, and said that sometimes people do stupid things, and sometimes, they get insanely lucky and something good comes out of the stupid. “Your mom and I got really stupid. We knew we weren’t a good idea, but we tried anyway. That got us you, which is the best thing that ever happened to me, but us together, that was a bad idea.”

At that point, she thought she had the basic idea down. Mom on the rebound bounced from Gibbs to his best friend. His best friend knew it was a bad plan, but got together with her anyway. And she’s the result.
But, at home, after playing with her new toys, she’s thinking more about what Abby and Breena said, and what they didn’t say, about a guy, his best friend, and a girl they both shared.

She’s got an internet connection, some time, and… She checks the department of vital records. Two things become clear very quickly, her parents got married five months before she was born, not a year and five months, and her mom’s divorce to Gibbs was finalized a month before she and her dad got married.

Emily sighs long and low, staring at the screen in front of her. Dad hadn’t been kidding about stupid.

Then another thought hits. She has blue eyes. Light blue eyes. Both of her parents have greeny-brown hazel eyes.

Gibbs has blue eyes.

Emily blinks very slowly, and then jumps up and starts pulling on clothing, fast. She’s not sure which one of the three of them she needs to talk to, but she needs to talk to someone.

Her mom isn’t home. Not a huge surprise. She’s working pretty much every minute she’s awake these days. Jarvis has her doing basically everything that involves money for DC. She mutters a lot about not being a miracle worker and needing a staff, but Emily knows she’s thriving on this kind of work. She loves being entirely in charge and only having to report to someone who’s pretty much just told her, “I don’t care how it happens, just do it.”

She hits Gibbs’ place next, not sure if he’ll be there or at their home on the Chesapeake. She knows from Abby and Breena that they stay there over the weekends, and at 6:00 on a Sunday, that might qualify as weekend, or not.
She just doesn’t know.

When she pulls up at Gibbs’ place there’s his truck and Abbi’s car, so obviously they’re home.

Like always she heads in, and Mona leaps up to get some petting.

“Emily?” Abbi looks up from the computer on her lap. She’s on the sofa, reading something, and very curious to see Emily in her house. “Weren’t you with Abby and Breena?”

“I was. Is Uncle Gibbs here?”

“Yeah, in the basement. Dave’s crib needs some work.”

“Oh. Good.”

Abbi sizes Emily up. She looks rattled, and she can imagine sex talk with Breena and Abby could get pretty wild, but she’s also pretty sure that’s not the sort of thing that sends you scuttling over to Uncle Gibbs’ place. “You really okay?”

Emily opens and closes her mouth a few times, and then says, “Probably.”

“Is it Jared?”

“No. This is… Not him. Can I go down?”

“Yeah, sure.” Abbi’s sure she’ll get the full story from Jethro, but she’ll admit to being curious.

Emily heads down, as quietly as she can go. She stops, two steps from the bottom and for a moment, she just watches Gibbs work. She’s trying to see herself in him. Or maybe signs of him in her, but leaning over a plank of maple, running a plane over it, she doesn’t see anything, until he looks up at her with those big, blue eyes.

“You just want to sit?” he asks.

She shakes her head, coming all the way down the steps, still looking at his eyes.

“Mine are darker than yours, and the wrong shape. Your grandma and Aunt Gillian have the same color eyes as you.”

“How…” She can’t imagine how he could have known what she was thinking.

“You’d figure it out sooner or later, bound to have some questions. Wasn’t sure you’d come see me, though.”

“Mom’s working, and not sure I want to hit Dad with this.”

Gibbs inclines his head he pours himself a drink, and almost pours one for her, but decides that he’s gonna be in enough trouble with Fornell after this conversation, he doesn’t need to get Emily drunk on top of it. “You want a soda or coffee or something?”

“I’m… nah.”

Gibbs takes a sip. “So, ask.”
“What happened? With you and mom and dad?”

“Mind if I ask what’s got you thinking about it?”

She rolls her eyes a little and settles onto one of the stools. “You know Dad and Mom don’t like Jared, and have roped you guys into ‘doing something about it.’”

Gibbs nods.

“Okay, Breena and Abby get me talking and… I like Jared, he’s… anyway. He’s got a friend I really like, I mentioned that, and I saw Abby and Breena look at each other, and then think, and look again, and then Breena said that maybe I should have a chat with your or Dad about how it’s not the end of the world to hop from one guy to his buddy. Those looks got me thinking. How the three of you act got me thinking, too. So, I checked. You and mom didn’t get divorced in ’97.”

Gibbs nods. “Nope. Weren’t even married yet, then.”

She looks into his eyes again. “How’d you know I wasn’t yours? I mean… you wouldn’t have left mom, pregnant, unless you were certain, right?”

Gibbs nods at that, too. “I had the vasectomy years before I met your mom. And before I called the divorce lawyer, I had it tested. I’ve been sterile since ’91.”

“But…” she’s trying to remember the first time she met Gibbs, really remember, not put facts and ideas that are in her head now onto that situation. “But the first time you saw me, you weren’t sure.”

He shrugs a bit. “It wouldn’t have been the first time a Navy Medic got a test wrong. And, yes, the first time we met, I wondered. I know your mom and dad have, too.” Gibbs gets his phone and finds a picture of his Kelly. “That’s my daughter.” He finds a shot of Kelly and Shannon. “And her and her mom. Your eyes made me wonder some, but, not too much. This is what happens when I get together with a red-head with green eyes.”

“The brown hair and green eyes win.”

“Pretty much.”

“But… I mean, that’s not certain. DNA doesn’t always work the same way every time.”

“Which is why all three of us have wondered from time to time…” He shakes his head. “Go look at a picture of your grandma. You’ve got her eyes. Your Aunt Gillian, she’s got the same colored eyes, and both of them have that same light red hair.”

“You mean my mom’s mom and her sister? Yeah, we know I’m related to my mom. That’s not the question,” Emily says dryly. “No one on Dad’s side has blue eyes.”

Gibbs sighs again. He gestures up toward Abbi upstairs. “If that test had been wrong, we’d know by now. Been together a year next week, and that’s more than enough time to know. And by the time I saw you for the first time, if that had been wrong, I’d have known.”

Which is when Emily remembers the comments about condoms and the lack of using them and all the rest of it. Which is when it really hits her that all of these adults around her, all of them really do have sex, and that, maybe they kind of know what they’re talking about when it comes to this stuff.

“Oh.”
Gibbs nods.

“What happened with you three?”

Gibbs doesn’t shrug at that, though he wants to. He exhales long and low, trying to figure out how to put it into words. Then he swallows, and again, and remembers sitting down here, going mute with Diane, hiding in his protective shell of silence, and he going to do his damnest to do better by her daughter.

“When your mom and I met, we were both in a bad place. Trying to run away from ourselves. With each other. And that doesn’t work. Doesn’t matter how hard you run, you always bring yourself. But, for a while at least, we could distract each other, and we did, and had a good time at it.”

Gibbs bites his lip.

“But you’re always there. And… I screwed your mom over. I wasn’t a good husband, and she had every right to be angry at me. And she screwed me back. And your dad, he got caught in the middle.”

Her eyebrow rises. “She cheats on you with him, and he’s the one getting caught in the middle.”

Gibbs shrugs again. “I wasn’t having an affair, but I’d been cheating on her from the beginning. Never told her about Kelly or Shannon. And when things happened with your Dad, I’d left for afloat on the Med. I just went. Didn’t ask her about it, didn’t talk to her, just went. Only wrote once or twice a week, never called. I basically left her.”

“You weren’t kidding about being a bad husband.”

“No. You name the screw up, and I’ve done it.”

“You’ve cheated, for real?” Again the idea that these are real people who have dealt with the kind of stuff that’s happening in her life, and more on top of it, is starting to sink in. The idea that “good people” can do bad things, make bad decisions, and all the rest of it, that’s starting to sink in, too.

“It’s all real, sex, not sex, it’s all really cheating. Emily, and yeah, not on your mom, but, yeah. I was a good husband to Shannon, and I’m a good husband to Abbi, but your mom, Stephanie, and Hannah, not at all. Not even close.”

“So, you leave, and she hooks up with my dad?”

“I don’t know the details. Obviously, I wasn’t there. But I’d been gone for six weeks when I got the ‘I’m pregnant letter.’”

Emily thinks about that. “Doesn’t sound like you were gone long before she grabbed him.”

Gibbs sighs again. “Even when I was there, I wasn’t there. We had a great time dating. Our engagement was a lot of fun, and then we got married and I… left. I took myself away from our marriage. I made sure there was no shot of it ever coming close to being anything like what I had with Shannon. Your mom didn’t know what was going on, just that I went from being a good boyfriend to missing in action.

“Your Dad and I met before I met Diane. We were friends, worked a few cases together, and before Ducky introduced me to Diane, we’d spend evenings chewing over cases, drinking, hanging out. And after Diane and I got together the three of us would get together for dinner, hang out, have a good time. And we had some awfully good times the three of us together. It’s taken almost twenty years, but I think we will again.

“Your dad went undercover not long after we got married. So she lost both of us within a month of each other.

“He came back a bit before I left, but she’s my wife, so he can’t spend time with her unless I am, too, and I’m not at home. I’m working as much as I can. Because if I’m home with her, I feel like I’m killing Shannon and Kelly all over again, so I’m not home.

“Your Dad and I spend time together at work, or grab a beer in a bar after work, we still get on fine, and he’s telling me that I’m being a jerk with your mom, but I’m not listening. I’ve got my stock answer for that. ‘She knows the second b is for bastard.’”

Emily smirks at that.

“He told me that after I left, she started calling him, just to see if I was talking to him. I wasn’t. And they still like each other. Dinner’s still a good time. And by the time a month’s done, you’re cooking along, and she claims she didn’t know for sure that you were Tobias’ until I served her with divorce papers.”

“How could she not know? You had a vasectomy.”

“That I didn’t tell her about.”

“Ew.” Emily winces.

Gibbs nods.

“I thought you two broke up and Dad was a rebound.”

“That’s not wrong. Your mom just didn’t know we’d broken up, because I wasn’t enough of a man to let her go.”

“You were running away from Kelly and Shannon?”

Gibbs gives her a sort of look. “I was running away from missing them, ran to your mom, and I started to get happy with your mom, and that felt bad, too, so I started running from that, too.”

“What was mom running from?”

“That question’s for her. She probably understands it differently than I do, or did.”

Emily thinks about that for a moment. “You and Dad are okay?”

“Yeah. Now. The last ten years. Uh... Once I got the test back, I sent him a letter telling him not to marry your mom. Found a divorce lawyer and sent her papers. Didn’t talk to her at all. When I got on land again, I beat the shit out of him, and he let me. Then we didn’t talk again until 2002, and when we saw each other on a case, he pretended he didn’t know me.

“But just like with your mom, we’re friends. We genuinely like each other... Eh, sometimes we don’t like each other. We love each other. And if backs are to the wall, we protect each other. Doesn’t matter what happened before, we’ve got each other’s backs. That’s why your mom knew she could come to us when Sterling got in trouble. Why you’ve always got a place in my home. Why your Dad’s keeping his eye out for Tim at the FBI.” Gibbs sips his drink again. “So, Jared’s got a buddy?”
“Yeah. And… I don’t think I can see him if Jared’s not around. Like Dad and Mom when she was married to you.”

“You’re not married to Jared, and the nineties have been over for a long time. And if they’re really friends, they’ll still be friends when whatever happens with you and them happens. Might take a while, but they’ll get it worked out.

“Just, break up with Jared before you ask the buddy out.”

“What if Seth, his buddy, doesn’t want to see me because I dumped his friend? I mean… I get to see him every day at school now, and if we break up… I won’t. And, I’ll miss him.”

Gibbs doesn’t know what to do with that. After all, there is something of a code, and don’t date your buddy’s girl is part of it. “Oh… Uh… I don’t know. I’m bad at this stuff. What did the girls say?”

“To talk to you.”

“Ugh…” He mentally gives Abby and Breena a headslap for dumping this in his lap. “Does he like you?”

“Maybe? I don’t know. He likes Jared.”

“Well, figure out if he likes you, too. That’s a good starting point. And… don’t date a guy because you like his friend.”

“Seth isn’t the only thing I like about Jared.”

“Yeah. So, I hear.” That gets a very long sigh out of Gibbs. “So, I’m not mentioning to your dad. I keep reminding myself that you’re two months younger than Shannon was when we met, over and over and over, so I don’t flip out about it myself.”

Emily laughs at that.

“Go talk to your dad, too. Yeah, you’re his little girl, and he’s going to be overprotective, but he’s not going to steer you wrong. He reads people better than almost anyone on earth, and if he thinks Jared’s trouble, watch out. And he can tell you if Seth likes you. He might not want to, but he’ll see it. And, unlike me, he can tell you all about wanting your best friend’s girl, and, what, in that situation, he would have liked to have had happened.”

He smiles at her.

---

When Emily gets to her Dad’s place, he and Wendy are home. They’re cleaning up dinner. She sits at the kitchen table, munching down the leftovers, and watches them work.

Wendy is the first of Dad’s girlfriends that she’s gotten to meet. She suspects there has to have been other women between her mom and Wendy, but she doesn’t actually know that for a fact.

Dad rinses everything off and loads the dishwasher. Wendy clears up and scrapes off any bits of food into the trash can. Emily’s not really paying attention to what they’re talking about; she’s watching them be married.
She’s trying to remember anything like this with her Dad and Mom, but… She wasn’t even two when they divorced, no memories at all of them together. Most of her memories of them are of tense quiet, and snappish conversations between them. And more quiet, which she thinks is because they had some sort of agreement to not badmouth the other one in front of her. So they didn’t say a lot about the other one.

They’ve warmed up over the last few years, though.

Tobias and Wendy are just cleaning up and talking, and moving around the kitchen easy and peaceful. Occasionally he’ll pat her on the bum, and she might give him a little peck, but for the most part they’re doing the chores, in rhythm, together.

Mom and Eric would do this, but not exactly like this. She has a system for everything, and the first few times Eric tried to help out, she got sharp on how it was supposed to be done, but once he got the idea down, they were able to work together on automatic, too.

But with Eric and Mom, Mom was in charge. Eric seemed okay with that. She wonders if he really was, and if that’s part of why he’s not coming around anymore.

She wonders if that’s part of why Gibbs and Dad are remarried or close enough, and her Mom isn’t.

She doesn’t get the sense that Dad or Wendy is in charge. Obviously, someone has to decide how and when things get done, but she has no idea who or how it happens here. It just does.

That gets her thinking about Jared, and he’s always got to be in charge, too. Might be part of what she likes about him. It puts her in mind of being with her Mom, and there’s a certain ease that goes with someone else telling you everything to do.

Granted, just like with her mom, she certainly doesn’t do everything Jared wants to do, or do it the way he wants it done. And just like with her Mom, when she’s had enough ‘my way is the only way’ she leaves and goes somewhere else, where she can do whatever it is her own way.

She fiddles with that idea while playing with the meatball on her plate.

“You going to eat that, or poke it to death?” Tobias asks, as she’s spearing it with her fork, for the twentieth time.

She puts the fork down. And, either Wendy’s got the sense she needs some time with her Dad on her own, or is just off doing something else, but she’s not in the kitchen anymore.

“Both, maybe. It’s long dead anyway, it doesn’t mind.”

Fornell smiles at her, and sits across from her at the table, cup of coffee in his hand. “What’s going on?”

“Big day, Dad. Uh… say you’ve got a crush on someone, and she’s dating your best friend, what do you do?”

What Fornell does is go white, swallow hard, and wonder who he’s got to kill for that getting out. Emily can see he’s distressed by that, so she adds, “And, like, you can see the guy she’s with isn’t a good fit. She likes him and all, but he’s not a great guy, not for her, what… If you could write it from scratch, what would you want her to do?”

That begins to intrigue Fornell, because he can see that she’s asking him for help on something that’s hers. Asking for help with something he’s been through.

He sips his coffee. “If I got to write it,” he taps the cup with his index finger, “set it up from beginning to end…” He sighs a little, how would he have done it, how would he have liked it to go? He sighs again. “If she really loved the guy in the first place, I would have wanted him to be a better man for her, and I would have talked to him about how he wasn’t doing his job.” Which he had done, with Gibbs. They got married, everything was okay, and he went undercover for four months, and when he got back, they’d fallen apart. “Because if she really loved him, the two of us weren’t ever going to work out, and all the hoping, dreaming, and rearranging wouldn’t have changed that. But, if she really loved him, and he was a good guy under a lot of hurt and some bad history, maybe he could shape up and be the man she needed.” He sighs, wondering if there had ever been a shot of Gibbs shaping into that guy, or if that marriage was, as he’d been telling himself for years, dead, and all he did was hammer the nails into the coffin with his dick.

“What if she likes him, but she likes the fact that when she’s with him she gets to see his best friend even more?”

Fornell nods at that, and for the first time in a while feels better about this Jared thing, because he knows what Emily’s asking him.

“If that was the case, and if I was the best friend, I’d want her to dump the guy she only kind of likes, and then, after a bit, I’d go ask her out.”

“You wouldn’t want to stop seeing her because she dumped your best friend?”

Like Gibbs, Fornell isn’t entirely sure what to do with that. He sighs. “Honestly, I don’t know. Would depend on how much I liked her. How much I liked him. What kind of guy they both are.”

“Best friends since kindergarten.”

He winces. “That’ll be sticky. Invite them all over, and Wendy and I’ll lurk around, try to get a better read on them.”

“Thanks, Dad.”

He kisses her. “You’re welcome.”

A week later, sullen waves of radiant teenage malice are sloshing all over the place as Jared Ridge walks into the Palmers’ house. He’s vastly too cool to be doing anything like attending a three-year-old’s birthday party, so he slouches in, lands on the sofa, talking to no one, puts his earbuds in, pulls his phone out, and starts texting.

He’s been in the house for less than nine seconds, Emily isn’t even in the door yet, and Tim is already jonesing to go over and break his phone, and maybe a few fingers. He looks over to Jimmy, who is also vastly less than thrilled to have this punk in his house.

And that’s where it begins. He just sits there like a lump, not interacting with anyone, (besides the other side of his phone) other than to occasionally tell Emily to do or get things for him.
Other than the black lump of sullen teenage angst in the corner, it’s a pretty good party. Okay, yes, it’s a toddler party, and the larger Slater clan has turned out for this so, there are, by conservative estimate, fifty people at this thing.

It is loud. There are tons of food. Kids of most ages are running around. The guest of honor is having a blast chasing her cousins, both of the clan Gibbs and the Slater line, and shrieking as only a three-year-old can shriek.

She’s graduated from Muppets to Shaun the Sheep, so there are white fuzzy sheep all over the place, and in one corner Shaun and Co are on the TV, with several of the kids watching and giggling.

And, of course, as often happens in February, it’s cold and wet outside, so everyone is inside the house.

“So, do we know what the Valentine’s Day surprises are?” Wendy asks, knowing that A: Jared’s got nothing. She won’t even have to ask. The guy who thinks prom is a waste of money does not get his sweetie something for Valentine’s, and B: Hearing that other guys, real guys, adult guys who are not her father, actually go out of their way to make their ladies happy on Valentine’s Day, is something Emily should see.

“We—“ Abby starts, and shuts down, not sure how to phrase this, but Breena takes over, rescuing the mission, sure that if you don’t suspect anything is going on with the four of them, you’ll take ‘we’ to mean, me and my buddy, as opposed to, me and my wife. “We think Tim and Jimmy have teamed up to write us a song.”

Wendy nods, looking pleased. Emily looks a bit startled at the idea of that much effort, and, though they miss it, Fornell’s eyes go a bit wide, too. He’s awfully sure what ‘we’ means, and the idea that the guys are double teaming the Valentine’s goodies is giving him a very concrete idea of what all might be going on.

He sees Gibbs on the far side of the room, eating a cupcake, talking to Tim, Jimmy, and Tony, and shakes his head. Whatever is going on here, apparently it’s not just a sex romp. He’s romped that romp before, and it didn’t involve going out of his way to invent romantic treats for said rompees.

“A song?” Wendy asks.

“Not entirely sure about that, but they keep ducking off to Tim’s computer to ‘work on something’ and occasionally I’ll hear some music come out,” Abby says.

“They sing?” Emily asks, looking at Tim and Jimmy, and then back to Jared, who is still glued to his phone, though one of the Slater kids, Emily guesses she’s six, is hanging over him, trying to read over his shoulder, and he’s half-heartedly trying to swat said child away.

“Jimmy does. Tim’s the poet. That’s why we think they’re working together,” Breena says. “Neither of them has all the pieces on his own, but together…”

“Although, given how much quiet cursing I’ve also heard, they may be working on a song, but no song may be forthcoming,” Abby ends with.

“Is Tony part of this?” Emily asks.
The ladies glance at each other, and toward Tony, who is talking with Ziva and Ed’s brother, Wes. “We don’t think so, but we’re not sure. Jimmy might be writing the music on Tim’s computer, and if they get it done, they might get Tony and Ziva to play.”

“But, if they are, he’s got something else planned,” Abbi says. “He’s already asked me to block off the 14th for Ziva. She doesn’t know it, yet, but she’s got the day off.”

“Nice. You know what he’s got planned?” Wendy says.

Abbi shakes her head. “And I don’t know what, if anything, Gibbs has in mind. How about Tobias?”

“As long as I can remember, we’ve had Valentine’s Dinner together,” Emily says. “So, I know we’re going out. I know Wendy’s coming with us.”

“But we don’t know where. Balentino’s, our annual date, didn’t make it through the fall, so… Somewhere. It’ll probably be an Italian place, and it’ll be a good one,” Wendy adds. “And you know, next year, he’ll be gassing up the car to get to Charlottesville. Can’t miss his Valentine’s date with his girl, even if she is at UVA.”

That lights up some faces. “You decided on the University of Virginia! Oh, that’s awesome!” Abby says.

Breena’s smiling, too. “That’s a great school. One of my best friends went there and loved it.”

Emily smiles at them, looking a little embarrassed at all the praise.

Tim’s glowering at Jared. He just called Emily, “Babe,” and not in a cute, little pet name sort of way. Not the way he sometimes calls Abby, “Baby.”

“Fact-finding mission,” Abby says quietly to him.

“Oh, I’ve got a fact I want to find. I want to see what happens when I kick his ass so hard I can tickle the back of his tonsils with my toes.” Tim wiggles his fingers to illustrate the idea.

Fornell blinks slowly, not sure who the hell this guy is, and what happened to McGee, and then he knows, the little girl in his arms with her head on his shoulder, looking awfully snoozy because it’s getting onto afternoon naptime, happened. Then he nods solemnly, and says, “I’ll be for science. You like science. It’s your thing, right? I’ll write it down. That’s what those guys Emily likes to watch on TV say. The difference between science and messing around is writing it down.”

Tim and Abby both give him a genuine smile at knowing that line.

“I can’t believe you let him in your house,” Tim says.

“At least in my house I’ve got an eye on him.”

Tim shrugs. “I suppose there’s that.”

“She invited the whole crew of them over, and I got to see Seth. I’ve met him three times, actually. He’s” Fornell sounds grudging as he says this, “not as big of an asshole as Jared.”

“Wow, talk about an enthusiastic recommendation,” Abby says.
Fornell looks at Tim, and then at Kelly, and Tim nods. “That’s glowing praise,” he says, and Fornell nods again.

“Well, keep encouraging her about that, and about how it’s not the end of the world to make a play for your best friend’s guy.”

“Yeah, she actually talked to me about that,” Fornell says. “But… I don’t like Jared, and Seth does, so, what does that say about Seth?”

Abby shrugs at that. It’s a valid point.

By two hours into this thing, Abby’s coming to the conclusion that Jared is likely a jerk, and not a viper. Granted, that’s hard to tell without seeing what happens after they get out of here, but in her experience vipers don’t want you to spend time with your friends and family, but they also don’t want those friends and family to be wary of them, so when they show up at something like this, they at least make an effort to chat with the people around them.

And, assuming that Jared doesn’t have some sort of intense social anxiety issues, he’s just a jerk.

Three adults have attempted to engage him in conversation, resulting in monosyllabic answers. Sarcastic monosyllables.

She’s got Emily and Breena together, and quietly says to them, “Emily, he’s…”

“I know. He’s not usually this bad, but he really didn’t want to come to this.”

“How’d you get him to come?”

“I told him it was a really big deal to me and that my whole family would be here and that he needed to come, so he’s been whining about it, but he showed up.”

“What kind of whining?” Breena asks.

“Mostly that I better get hand warmers ready, because I better be at every ice hockey game he’s playing this next month.”

“That doesn’t sound like an even trade,” Breena says.

“It’s not that bad. Seth plays, too.”

Fornell finds the party… difficult.

And not because it’s bad or anything. Part of him, part that is looking at Jared Ridge like he’s a malignant tumor, is aware of the fact that one day, hopefully in the distant future, he’ll be doing the granddad thing, and it’s fun.

He actually likes playing goofy games with little kids, and he’ll happily snuggle babies if they end up in his hands.

He’s having a pretty good time with that.
The difficult part is that he keeps wanting to point out to Emily how Jimmy and Tim treat their wives. They’re just being themselves at a party, pleasant, attentive, on point, just nice guys who adore their wives. And he’s got no problem pointing it out when Tony’s doing it. (And Tony, who is on full-on show Emily what a good, charming, pregnant husband looks like mode, is being ultradoting to Ziva, whose hips are hurting, and has not had to get up once since they got here, because he’s happily off getting her treats and bringing people over to chat with her and rubbing her back and all the rest of it. His last Valentine’s before the baby game is on point.) He’s happily drawing her attention to Tony because he’s absolutely certain that when Ziva leaves the room he’s not fucking Tim.

Or… shit… uh… No. No! Not happening.

Tim and Jimmy, who may be off composing love songs to their wives (individual wives? Wives in common? Is this all four ways around or…) in their spare time, are still… Problematic. How does he show that off to his little girl as a good husband?

Kind, attentive, good with kids, sneaking away for quickies with his best friend… His male best friend… Tim’s talking to Abby and just rested his hands on Breena’s shoulders and is giving her a gentle rub. Or maybe the female one. Fornell isn’t exactly sure how it works, but he’s awfully sure that monogamy isn’t on the list.

Apparently he’s watching Tim and Jimmy and Abby and Breena play with the kids too hard, because Gibbs comes over and says, “You okay?”

Fornell shrugs a bit. “Got some wood to sand tonight?”

“I could. You need to talk.”

“Yeah.”

Since this is supposed to be a fact-finding mission, the adults of this group are just watching, but there’s only so much watching of the lump of black mood in the corner they can do before one of them breaks and starts doing to go with watching.

And, in this case, the one who breaks is Ed.

When Jared’s sitting there, earbuds in, texting fast, and then says, in a snotty, whiny, entitled tone, to Emily, who is twenty feet further away from them than he is, and who is actually interacting with the other people in the room, “Babe, grab me a cupcake,” Ed’s blood pressure shoots up.

When Emily brings him a vanilla one, and he rolls his eyes and says, “You know I don’t like vanilla, get me a chocolate one,” Ed snaps. The other adults can almost literally see the little twig in Ed’s head, that was keeping him from doing anything, shatter as he leaps forward, landing heavily on the sofa.

He sits down next to Jared, claps a hand onto his shoulder, squeezing hard, and grabs the cord on the earbuds, yanking them out of his ears, while glaring down at him.

Jared blinks at him, startled. “Dude!”

“Don’t dude me you little asshole.” Jared rolls his eyes, and Ed squeezes his shoulder, hard, again. The rest of the adults can see his fingers sinking into Jared’s flesh. That gets Jared’s attention, and he stares. “You see this crowd here, Jared?”

He nods, looking like he’s humoring Ed, but everyone in this crew who’s run an interrogation can see the fear in the back of his eyes.

“Every single person in this group is a cop or a mortician, and every one of them has decided that you aren’t good enough to lick Emily Fornell’s shoes. Now, you are going to get your ass up, and walk out of this house, you will send a little note off, from the curb, to have someone come pick you up, and you will never be seen within ten feet of Emily Fornell again, or we will kill you, and I will make sure that no one ever finds your body.”

Jared starts to laugh, and then Ed squeezes his shoulder, again, hard, and makes sure that he’s staring Jared down.

“I don’t think you understand this situation, Jared. I’m not bullshitting you. I own and use, every single day, a crematorium.” He yanks Jared’s phone out of his hand, quickly switches onto the web, and puts in the address of his business. When the picture of Slater and Palmer’s pops up, he shoves it back into Jared’s hands. “That’s mine. I own it!” Jared starts to look a bit concerned. “And if I find out you’re hanging with Emily again, I will personally make sure that I will be the last person to see you as anything other than a few wisps of ash and char.” Ed nods over to the rest of the crew. “That one, with the tattoos and the baby, she’s a forensic scientist, she’ll make sure there’s no evidence. Emily’s dad, he’s FBI, the guys who handle kidnappings and missing kids, and they’ll make sure you stay on the missing person list. The tall one in the skirt, he’s the computer guy, and a writer, he’ll make sure there’s a record of you wanting to leave home. They’ll find your angst-filled personal diary hidden in your phone, spilling your guts about how you hate home and school and can’t stand it and want to leave. That one over there, with the pregnant wife, he’s a cop, and he’ll make sure that credit card mommy and daddy got for you for emergencies will have bought a few bus tickets. Get near Emily again, and we will take you out and make sure that everyone else thinks you ran away. Now get the hell up and out of this house!”

By the time Ed is done, all the rest of the guys in the house are just staring at him, as Jared sits there, eyes wide, skin white, shaking slightly.

“I… I… You can’t! I’m telling my parents!”

Ed smiles low and dirty. “Go ahead and do it, Jared. You don’t know the phone number here. You can’t get them here unless you remember how to get here, and if you do, and they drive up with you, that cute guy with the round glasses and the pink heart bedecked valentine’s day sweater, who looks just about as dangerous as a cream puff will open the door, listen to your parents, nod and say…”

And Jimmy jumps on that, and says, in his most harmless, concerned, creampuff voice, “Oh, yeah. Jared was here for Molly’s birthday. But, it looked like he and Emily were having a bit of a tiff. He was just sitting around texting with his buddies, wouldn’t talk to anyone, and then he got up and left.”

“And when Mommy and Daddy hear that, they are going to believe him because they know who you are and how you behave when you’re in a snit. Now get out of this house and make sure none of us ever sees or hears about you being near Emily again!”

Emily has her hand clamped over her mouth, and her eyes are the size of saucers.

Jared, once Ed lets go of him, scurries out of the house as fast as he can.

Then Ed gets back up, wipes his hands together like he’s trying to remove something nasty from them, sidles over to Jimmy, who’s standing next to Collin and says quietly to both of them, “And that’s what I did to the ones I didn’t approve of.” Then he looks over to Fornell and says louder, “Wanna get a drink, Tobias?”

And Fornell just nods slowly.

A minute later Tim “wanders” into the kitchen, and hears Ed say, “Three daughters. Got one of ‘em married to a decent man. One engaged to one. One of ‘em still looking for one.”

Fornell says very quietly, “From what Gibbs says, you don’t like Jimmy.”

“I don’t. But that doesn’t mean he isn’t a decent man. And it doesn’t mean he treats her badly. He’d be gone if he treated her badly.”

Fornell nods at that. “What’d you do when your girls were getting ready to go to college?”

Ed sighs, and nods back, taking a sip of his iced tea. “Is that why she’s got that dweeb?”

Fornell shrugs. “Might be. Might want more attention from Draga or me. Might just like him. Might like his best friend and doesn’t know how to wrangle that. Probably a bit of all of it.”

Ed shakes his head. “High school. Senior year of high school with my girls meant a period where they wanted to be really independent, and be certain that they were still Daddy’s little girl. Go be her man, keep idiots like that moron away, make her feel safe and secure, and…” Ed sighs long and loud, “eventually she’ll bring one home you can’t run off, because he loves her too much to go, and you won’t run him off, because she loves him too much to banish him, and you end up with a dweeb at all of your family shindigs, but you get some beautiful grandbabies out of it, and a happy girl.”

“Why don’t you like him?” Fornell nods toward Jimmy, and wonders if Ed’s got any hints about Jimmy and Tim, because that would certainly be a reason for him to be anti-Jimmy.

“He just annoys me, possibly on principal alone. Amy’s boy,” he nods in the direction of Collin, who’s chatting with Jimmy, “bugs me, too.”

“Oh.”

“You know how it is. No man on earth is smart enough, rich enough, or good enough for your baby girl.”

Fornell nods along. Though, he sees the way Gibbs is with Tim, Tony, and Jimmy, and he hopes that one day Emily will bring a man home that he will want for a son-in-law.

Scratch that. He hopes, one day, Emily will go find his son, and bring him home.

Emily finds Abby and Breena, grabbing them and pulling them into the foyer. “Was that real?”

“Ed’s not killing anyone,” Abby says. “Not for this. Not for just seeing you. But Jared doesn’t know that. And he doesn’t need to.”

Breena quietly says, “That was just a threat. If there’s a guy who’s a real problem, someone who’s bitten you, or is so close to it that you raise the red flag, he won’t get a threat, he’ll just vanish.”

“Ed just gave you, and Jared, an out. You can claim you don’t want to see him because you’re scared. He can say your family is crazy, and he doesn’t want anything to do with you. Both of you are out of this relationship without either of you having to take responsibility for it. And in a month or so, you can go give Seth a call and see what he’s up to,” Abby says.

“If Jared comes around again once, that’s just being eighteen and having more balls than brains. You say you’re scared or you don’t want to see him, or whatever, and you’re done. He comes around again, that’s the sign of a viper. And that’s when our guys all get together, go to Jared’s house, and have a long talk with him and his parents. Nothing bad, other than his parents knowing he’s a creep, happens to Jared then,” Breena continues.

“He comes around again. And you don’t want him coming around,” Abby looks over the party, seeing the guys talking, fooling around, playing with kids, “and we’ll take care of him.”

“What about taking care of your own messes?” Emily asks.

“A big part of being an adult is knowing which messes you need help for and which ones you can take on your own. A bigger part of being an adult is owning up to the fact that you can’t take care of everything on your own, and asking for help when you need it. A guy keeps coming around, after he’s been warned off twice, that’s time to get more help than just you on your own.”

“That’s part of why we have families, so we don’t have to do stuff like this on our own. So, you okay? I know Dad going off like that wasn’t something you were expecting. I certainly wasn’t.”

“I’m…” Emily opens and closes her mouth. “I don’t know. Uh…” She starts to smile a bit. “I didn’t just dump Jared.”

“Nope,” Breena says.

“And if he doesn’t want to see me again, that’s on him.”

“Yes,” Abby says.

“So… if his best friend were to be interested, he could just ask me out, because his buddy decided I wasn’t worth the risk.” That smile on Emily’s face spreads.

“Exactly,” Breena says. “Maybe the next time we do one of these parties, you’ll bring Seth around?”

“Maybe… It’s possible no guy will set foot near any of my family from now on.”

Abby shrugs. “College in August. Clean slate. Once you get there, high school stops mattering.”

---

Gibbs expects that it’s the combined history of him and Fornell and Diane that has Fornell heading over to chat and sand some wood.

He’s not expecting Fornell to show up with a bottle of pretty good scotch. (He’s not a bourbon guy, Gibbs isn’t a Campari and soda guy, so scotch is their compromise drink.) Everything with them and Diane is so over and done, it doesn’t need booze anymore.

Gibbs raises an eyebrow at the bottle.

Fornell pours them both a shot. “One of these years I’m buying you a set of glasses for down here. It’s just wrong to drink this out of the same jars you keep screws in.”
Gibbs shrugs. “Little metal never hurt anything.”

“You completely burned out your taste buds on that coffee you like. You know that, right?”

Gibbs shrugs at that, too, and sips the scotch. It is good, and he thinks Tim would enjoy it. “Save it up and share it with Tim, he’ll appreciate it.”

“I’m liking that kid more and more as time goes by.”

“Good.”

“And I’m worried.”

“FBI?”

Fornell shoots Gibbs a be less dense look. He wouldn’t be here with a drink if it were job related. And he’s talk to Tim directly in that case. “For him, and his family, and you. Remember me down here talking divorce lawyers. You said they were all fine. You suddenly change the definition of fine? Or you keeping his secrets close and lying to me? I know the third option, that you just don’t know what’s going on, is wrong.”

Fornell’s not wrong about any of it. Gibbs takes that drink. “What do you think is going on?”

“No telling tales, huh?”

“You’ve known me how long?”

“Yeah. Here’s what I know. McGee’s private life blows up when he stands up to his Dad and tells the whole world he likes to get fucked by men, apparently in pretty much those exact words. I get wind of it, and you tell me it was an op, and everything is cool. That doesn’t set my lie detector off, so, no matter what else is going on, that was an op, and for the time being things are cool. Fast forward to last weekend. You send me over to talk to Abby, and when I’m there, Palmer and his wife are over, too, and it takes me a minute to see it, but once I do, I can’t not see it. If Tim’s into sex with men, Jimmy’s the guy giving it to him. I decide to look into Tim’s FBI background check, see if they’ve caught it, and there’s literally nothing about his private life in his file, and you know what it means when part of a background check is intentionally left blank, so something is going on. There’s no tension with the girls, so the girls are okay with it, or don’t know. In the history of sex, there was never a man so good a liar that he could pull off what Tim and Jimmy are doing without the girls getting at least a hint that something is up, and maybe Breena could pull it off, but Abby’s not a good enough actress to keep cool if her guy’s banging another guy on the down low.”

Gibbs sips his drink wondering what to say to that. “What else did you see at the party, at all the family gatherings?”

“Two guys who’ve always set my not-quite-male-enough radar on edge who look like they were all but written by a romance novelist they dote so hard on their wives.”

Gibbs inclines his head.

“Are they overcompensating?”

Gibbs doesn’t respond. It’s not his secret to tell.

“You said they’re okay.”
“They are.”

Fornell’s eyes search his. “Shit, you believe that.”

“Because it’s true. No divorce on the horizon. Everyone who needs to know does, and it’s okay. Everything you see about them is real.”

Fornell drinks his scotch. “It can’t be. If it’s all real, it doesn’t make any sense.”

“Doesn’t it?” Gibbs sips his drink again. “You ever wonder what would have happened if we could have shared Diane?”

Gibbs gives him the look that says he knows what kinds of sexual shenanigans Fornell got up to when he was a young man drunk off his ass with some money to burn and a bunch of buddies in Saigon.

“You don’t do that kind of shit with your wife! That’s like the top of the pyramid of shit you don’t do with your wife. She’s your wife, not a hooker you met when you were drunk, stoned, and stupid.”

Gibbs shrugs. “Probably would have been a mess.”

“Probably? Probably! There is no possible universe where the three of us even… Just… No! NO!”

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. I was still me, and she was still her, and tossing you in the mix wasn’t going to make anything different about either of us.”

“If you think the problem with me, you, and Diane is that neither of you were in a good place for a relationship, then I’ve got my answer, your definition of okay did a one eighty when I wasn’t looking.” Fornell shudders. The idea of the three of them squicks him on a gut level. “So, I take it by that comment, you mean it’s all four of them. Or Abby and Jimmy have joint custody of Tim, or…”

He shakes his head. “How can this possibly be ‘okay?’”

Gibbs inclines his head again. “Because it is. Because you see them with the girls, and you see them with each other, and with the kids, and it’s okay. You feel it when you see them. Your gut isn’t in a knot. You aren’t waiting for the fight to break out.”

“I thought you and Diane were okay, too.”

Gibbs laughs. “God help both of us if we aren’t wiser than that by now.”

“How can you be okay with… whatever this is. You won’t even put a name on it for me. How okay can it be if you can’t name it? To me?”

Gibbs dithers for a moment. It’s not that he can’t name it. It’s that it’s not his secret to tell. “What did you see when you went to Tim’s house. Details.”

“You’re trying to lead me to the right answer without saying anything.”

Gibbs nods. “Not my story. Not my secret.”

“Palmer answers the door and for a moment, I’m not sure who’s house I’m at. The girls are putting the older babies to bed. So, it’s just McGee and Palmer. McGee’s making me some coffee, explaining that the girls do this a lot. Tubby time, girls go down. The four of them switch out who’s on tubby time and who’s on tuck ins. Palmer’s got the baby. He’s really easy with Sean. Holding him, patting him, singing a bit. He’s good with kids, I know that, but he’s really good with Sean and Sean’s good with him. He and McGee are talking about the video game they’re playing, just, goofing around. Palmer takes a sip of McGee’s coffee, from his cup, and McGee rests his hand on the back of Palmer’s neck, pets him a little, and… And I can see it, they’re a couple. We’re good friends. If things had been different, I’d have been that good with your kids and you’d have been that good with Emily, and… But if I’d taken a sip of your coffee, you’d whack me upside the back of my head, not pet me, certainly not on the neck. Then the girls come down. Abby sits in McGee’s lap, and he’s happy as a clam to have her in his lap. Same little pet. She gets a kiss, same easy touch with Palmer and Breena, and then he and Palmer head up to handle tuck ins.

“The girls are talking about Emily, we’re spitting ideas, and the guys come down and they’re sitting around, happy, attentive, easy. Palmer and Breena are easy in Tim and Abby’s house. Comfortable, the way I am here. They’re easy with each other, too, not sharing a seat, but no tension. Four seats around the table, and Tim and Abby have one, Jimmy’s got one, Breena’s got one, and I’ve got the other. McGee and Abby are making sure there’s space for me, or they just like touching.”

“Both.”

“Both.” That makes sense to Fornell, and fits his idea of Abby and Tim. “Palmer and Breena walk me out, like I said, easy in McGee’s house, and Palmer keeps a hand on Breena’s shoulder, stroking her neck some.”

“Which hand?”

Fornell makes himself see it. “Left.”

“Details.”

“Just tell me.” Gibbs continues his look. “He’s a righty. Wears an off-brand Rolex wanna-be watch.”

Gibbs nods, that’s right.

“He had on a stupidly cute sweater. Just like today. Where the hell does he get those things?”

“Breena’s mom makes them for him. He’s the only one who actually wears them, so he gets a lot of them.”

“But not because of anything about how he and Breena get on.”

“Yeah. I know.”

“Do you?” Gibbs makes sure that Fornell has that good and strong in his head. “You think Ed would miss it if he was making Breena cry?”

“No. If he was making Breena cry, he’d be gone and Ed would be in jail.”

Gibbs nods. “Left hand, what else?”

Fornell closes his eyes, bringing up the image. “Rings. He wears two of them on his ring finger. One’s old. One’s newer… They’re wedding rings, aren’t they? One’s Breena. He’s had it for years. The other… Tim, Abby, both?”
Gibbs doesn’t smile with his lips, but his eyes let Fornell know he’s on the right track.

“Breena got a ring for Christmas. You helped Jimmy make it for her. Wendy was telling me about that. It’s wood.” Fornell thinks, hard, trying to see it. “It’s three bands of wood made into a circle. She wears it on her right ring finger. But, McGee doesn’t have an extra ring. Or Abby.”

“You ever see him without his wrist cuff?”

Fornell thinks back, going through a collection of images of McGee… “When he interviewed at the FBI. He usually wears it left, and he moved it to his right.”

“What’s on his wrist?”

“How’d Tim and Abby look in Jimmy and Breena’s place today?”

“Just as easy as Palmer and Breena were at their place. Like they live there. They were co-hosting the party.”

Gibbs nods. “Good with all the kids, right?”

“Yeah. If it weren’t for the hair, I wouldn’t be able to tell which kids go with which adults. Not by how they act with each other.”

“The floor plan at our place on the Chesapeake? You and Wendy came in, and you put your coats…”

“Door to the right. Long hallway. Bedroom, really big bed… Palmers and McGees are down there. The girls share a nursery.” That gets another memory out of Fornell. “Afternoon nap time. The babies were in the nursery, McGee had sacked out on the sofa, and Abby and Breena were catching some zs together in the second bedroom.”

“Sounds like you’re describing a marriage,” Jethro says quietly.

“Yeah, if I was talking about two people. Sounds like a recipe for disaster if I’m describing four.”

Gibbs continues to just look at Fornell. “You gonna do anything?”

“Like what, pull Ed aside and tell him Palmer’s banging McGee?”

Gibbs inclines his head.

“No. Not even mentioning what I’m seeing to Wendy. Just like the personal section in his FBI file, I’m keeping it blank.”

“Think they’d have offered him the job if they thought it was going to blow up?”

Fornell sighs. “No. They’re good about that. Hoover could dress in drag, as long as he was discrete about it. Same for everyone else ever since. As long as it won’t end up all over the papers, they won’t blink about whatever the hell it is you do in your spare time.”

“So. I’m good. FBI’s good. You see it yourself, Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena are good. They’re giving your girl good advice and stepping up to protect her if need be. What’s the issue?”
Fornell sighs, put like that... “It’s weird.”

Gibbs laughs, hard, at that. When he’s done he takes another drink and nods. “Yeah. I’ll give you that.” One more drink. “Emily was down here asking about the three of us. Having a heart to heart about boys. I’m giving her... not bad advice, about love. You’re married. I’m engaged. We’re retired. Got a crew of grandbabies who call me Uncle Gibbs or Pop. Tim and Ziva call me Dad now. We got a house on the water, and I’m making another crib. All of it’s weird.”

“So you love it.”

“Yeah.”

“Even... the stuff with the four of them?”

“My kids are happy, in love, and devoted to raising their kids right. Really, what more could I possibly ask for? I saw the way you were looking at Ed when he was talking about Jimmy. You don’t want to be that guy. I don’t want to be him, either. I want them to be happy and they are. And them happy makes me happy, so, yeah, I’m good with all of it.”

Fornell sighs at that, too. He shakes his head a bit. “DiNozzo shit a brick when he found out, didn’t he?”

“Sideways.”

Fornell smirks and gives Gibbs an affectionate pat upside the back of the head. “At least one of you guys is still sane.”

Gibbs nods. “Jared darken your door again?”

“Not a peep. Not yet. He’s probably smart enough to stay away. I hope.”

“Okay, tell me about this Seth kid...”
The aftermath of a toddler party is overtired little kids, and wiped out adults. Easy dinner (Chinese delivery), getting the kids down as quickly as they can, and then crashing into bed after them is the order of the night.

Slow lazy sex for Tim, Jimmy, and Breena. Abby’s still not really feeling up for anything along those lines so she watches and cuddles, gives and takes kisses, and by the time they’re done, they’re all feeling more human again.

And tired, but not sleepy. Don’t want to get out of bed tired. It’s 8:30, even for a turn in early night, that’s early.

But for a laying around in bed, talking, naked night, that’s perfect.

Laying around talking nights, they tend to cuddle into their original couples.

Abby’s on her side, the only one of the three of them not naked. Nursing breasts are way too sore to be sans bra, but post-baby bleeding stopped last week, so she’s feeling okay without panties, She’s almost naked, curled onto her side, spooned into Tim, who’s behind her.

He’s also on his side, pillow under his head, one arm under her neck, the other draped over her hip. When he’s just listening and resting, his lips are against the back of her head. Right now, he’s feeling very content and lazy. Especially since it’s not his night to get Sean, though it’s a somewhat moot point because little guy still has one more of his normal evening feeds (10:00) before they move onto the full nighttime rotation, where Breena’s got him.

Breena’s next to Abby, for the moment, she’s on her side, facing Jimmy, arm and leg draped over him, head on his chest. He’s got one arm under her neck, wrapped around her, hand resting on her shoulder. His other hand is on her low back. They’re trading lazy kisses and resting with one another.

And after one slow kiss, she rolls over to face Abby, and says, “Okay, after this week and all the drama with Emily, I want to hear about the first time someone else got each of you off.”

“Oh, God…” Tim says, closing his eyes, bringing that memory back. “Been a long time since I’ve thought of that. Uh… Senior Prom…”

“That the one with the pink vest?” Abby asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah, that’s the one. Salmon, not pink.”

“Oh huh,” Jimmy says. “Like you can actually see the difference.”

“I can tell the difference! Salmon and peach, okay, I can’t tell the difference between those colors. Which I know for a fact, because the first vest I picked was peach, and it didn’t match, so she and my mom went with me the second time and picked salmon because it did match. But salmon and pink, I’m good on.”

“Okay, great, we’ve covered prom tux colors, tell us about your girl,” Breena says. (She and Abby have hit the point where they suspect the only colors Tim can see are bright, vibrant strong ones or jewel tones. They’re fairly sure that all pastels are the same color to him, because three years into Uncle/Fathering, he cannot be trusted to get the light blue onesie if there is a light green and light gray and light tan one next to it. Likewise, he’s got some interesting interpretations of the colors of some of the outfits they wear.)

He smiles again. “Jessica Mulray. She was a year older than me, which was good because the second time, we were parked in her car in a park that closed at dusk, and it was after dusk, after midnight. Fortunately, she was over eighteen, legal to be driving after midnight, and the cop didn’t think to ask if I was.” Tim laughs at that memory, too, though at the time he’d been about to shit himself, he was so scared.

“So, wait, you’re seventeen… Jailbait?” Jimmy asks.

Tim nods. “Like I said, it was a good thing he didn’t think to check my age.”

“That was the second time?” Breena asks.

“Well, it would have been the second time. We were well on our way to a second time, except a cop showing up kind of put a damper on things. Real second time was a few days later.”

“So how about we hear about the first time?” Breena asks.

“All right, so, Senior Prom, I’m seventeen, she’s three days past eighteen, and we’d been dating for four months, some kissing, a little petting, but nothing too heavy, but it’s prom night, and I’ve got some high hopes.”

Abby giggles. “Oh, I bet you did.”

“Oh, yeah. Matterhorn high. Higher than my hard-on.” That gets a bit more giggling. “So, I get a very careful shower, shaved off all seven of my downy, little bunny fuzz whiskers, desperately attempted to make both chest hairs look virile and manly, spent an hour messing with my hair, probably had enough cologne on to stun an elephant, and put on a rented tux that fit when I rented it but was about an inch too short by the time I got it.”

Abby and Breena giggle at that, too.

“So, you’re saying you didn’t precisely look like you were about to step out of GQ,” Jimmy says.

“I looked like I was trying.”

“Yeah, that’s why no one’s seen my prom pictures,” Jimmy says.

“I’ve seen them.”

“Bite your tongue, woman.” He gently swats Breena’s tush. “Those pictures don’t exist.”

Breena turns and nips his shoulder. “Uh huh. We’ll get to your story.”

“I had a driver’s license, but those days I didn’t drive, so she picked me up. And we did the whole pictures thing, and off to a nice dinner out, and then prom. ‘In Your Eyes,’ the Peter Gabriel song, that was our prom theme. And… It was really nice. We really liked each other, had Bio II and Calculus together. It’s the ’90s, so the dancing isn’t difficult. Hold each other and sway for the slow ones, grind for the fast ones.”

“And you liked that, didn’t you?” Breena asks.

“Pretty girl grinding against me? Yeah!” He nods. “Of course I liked that. I liked it a lot. Still like it. Three months after you put me in the ground, when Zombie Tim gets back up again and starts looking for brains, I’ll still like it.”

Abby laughs at that, taking his hand in hers and kisses his palm, while wiggling her bum against him. He gives her a little grind and kisses her ear.

“Did she like it?” Breena asks.

“She didn’t seem to mind, and it’s not like me enjoying it was in any way subtle. I was a walking hard-on for most of that night, including dinner, just on the anticipation of what was coming later. She knew I was liking it, and she gave it a squeeze a few times, encouraging me, so I think she was pleased by it.”

They laugh at that image, too.

“I almost spit my soda across the room the first time she did it.” Tim’s got a huge grin on his face remembering this. “I pulled out the chair for her, and sat next to her, and we were talking and eating, and just having a good time, and her hand had been on my leg, a bit above my knee, which was the sort of thing that usually happened if she was sitting near me. And… I think we were talking about music, maybe… or dancing or… I don’t remember. I think her hand sliding up my leg blanked out the part of my brain that remembered words, but, she was smiling at me, and it was a little bit of a shy look, like she wasn’t quite sure if it was okay, little bit naughty, like she knew I wanted it, little smile, and she slid her hand up my leg, and then past my thigh, which was as high up as it had ever gone before, and she didn’t stop, and I just about choked on my drink.”

“Obviously, you survived,” Jimmy says.

“And managed to not do a literal spit take. To the dance we go, and we dance fast and slow and close and far apart and she sits in my lap when we’re sitting down, and her hands go wandering and mine aren’t exactly staying in nun-approved territory, either.

“Anyway, we cut out early. We were supposed to be going to an after party one of her buddies is having, but said buddy knows the real plan, so she’s covering for us. She’s got a job housesitting. Luckiest damn break of my teen life, and part of why I had high hopes. We had to be home by 2:00, so we don’t have a ton of time, but an hour and a half, alone, in a house… Oh, yeah, I had plans.”

“You lost your virginity at seventeen? I didn’t hear that story,” Jimmy says. He’s pretty sure he’s heard Tim’s losing it story, and his memory is that it involves a not fabulous experience in college.

“Because it didn’t happen. Well… Okay, sort of. I didn’t think of it as losing my virginity, especially not then, but… now… yeah… Probably qualifies more than the first time I had penetrative sex with a girl.”

“From now own, the first time another person gets you off, that counts as losing it?” Breena asks.

“Um… I’m good with that,” Tim says.

“I think we get to define it however each of us likes,” Abby says. “Keep going, Tim. I haven’t heard this story before, and I want to know more.”

“Uh… We do get to the house, and she’s got candles and music and all the rest of it. There’s even wine in the fridge, but she’s got to drive, and I’m not going to drink if she’s not, so it just stays there.

“Background: she had rules, and before that night they matched Breena’s pretty closely, clothing on, hands on top, kissing, petting, grinding, that was it. We were at a Catholic high school, so rules like that weren’t uncommon. And, I’m not going to push those rules. Never did, and wasn’t planning on doing it. But especially with how she was feeling me up under the table during dinner, and how we’ve been dancing all night, and we’re going to this house on our own, and it’s prom night, I was really hopeful that she was thinking maybe it was time to ease up on those rules.

“She unlocks the door to the house, and we head in, close up behind us, and I’m so excited, just, here, with her, sex, in someone else’s house, oh, God, so naughty. What if they come home early? What if the neighbors saw? And the condom’s about to burn through my wallet it’s so eager to get out of there and into action. She’s messing with candles and I’m just standing there, wondering what I should be doing, then she turns to me, lit soft and peachy, and says, ‘We’re not having sex tonight.’ I think I pouted at her. She was tiny. Like, five two or something like that, and by then I was at least five ten, so I was a head taller than she was, and she stepped up right in front of me, almost touching, smiled up at me, pulled me closer, kissed me, and said, ‘But that doesn’t mean we aren’t going to have fun. There’s a lot of not sex for us to play with.’”

“Were you still pouting?” Breena asks.

“Maybe. If I was, I stopped it really fast, because she put my hand on the back of her dress, right at the zipper and said, ‘Well?’ It took me a second, but I figured out what she was asking for, and then just about ripped her dress when I couldn’t figure out the hook and eye closure at the top of the zipper.” Tim closes his eyes, thinking about it, about the rush of undressing a girl for the first time, the crazy, urgent, so turned on, fumbling, gotta do it NOW, OH HOLY MOTHER OF GOD, BOOBS! Feel of it. “Finally got her out of it, and…” he shakes his head a bit, and Jimmy grins, he knows what Tim’s remembering.

“Christmas, your birthday, Halloween, and Easter all together?” Jimmy asks.

“God, yeah. Times six.” He kisses Abby, and pets Breena with the foot closest to her. “Love you two beyond all reason, but first girl you see naked, for real, that’s the most beautiful woman on earth.”

Jimmy nods.

“I had to keep my shorts on, but she took everything off. Before that, we’d made out in her car, or at the movies, tight, cramped spaces, but here we had a bed, a real bed, and plenty of space. And she’s naked and I get to look. We lay down, and she was on top of me, all spread out, rubbing all over me, kissing. Yeah.” He knows he’s got a dopey grin on his face, but right now he feels too good to be bugged by it. “We put that hour and a half to good use.”

“You did not last an hour and a half!” Jimmy says.

“Nope. Not even close. Didn’t have to. You remember seventeen, perpetual hard-on!” Right now, at thirty-nine, less than half an hour after an orgasm, both of them are limp and sated. Seventeen didn’t quite work that way. He’s honestly not sure if his dick actually went down that night, or just went from hard to really hard to somewhat less hard. “Second and third time were pretty slow. Didn’t even try to wear my jockeys home. Just threw them in the trash can; they were so soaked. I hope the guy who owned the place didn’t open the can up and wonder how the hell he ended up with a crusty pair of whity-tighties in there. I swaggered home like I was eight feet tall and had just won a land war in Asia.”

“You get her off?” Abby asks.

Tim winces a little at that. “Probably not. She might have gotten herself off on me, all the right bits were rubbing against each other, and she made a lot of happy noises, but my hands and mouth didn’t get anywhere and stay there long enough to have done her that much good. Unless she did it herself or it happened by accident, I didn’t get a girl off until grad school.”

Jimmy nudges him a bit, “That’s why you study.”

“Yeah, well, I was studying biomedical engineering and computers.”

“Wasted time,” Jimmy says with a smile. He kisses Breena and strokes Abby, “They’re what’s worth studying.”

“Okay, glorious guru of sex, tell us about your first.”

Jimmy knows that Breena asked the question how she did because Abby’s mentioned Tim’s first time having sex wasn’t all that hot. He also knows that Breena knows his first time getting off with someone else wasn’t that hot, either. He doesn’t think she’ll mind at all if he answers with his first good orgasm with someone else. And if they get to define it however they like, he’s liking Sasha Kannis.

(Not that his actual first time was bad or traumatic or anything, just… fast and sort of embarrassing, and he’d rather think about a time he enjoyed.)

“Sasha Kannis. My high school sweetie, and yes, we did lose our virginities together. But that’s later. When we started dating, her mom was in school, so she was home every day when we got home from school, but… when we wrapped up sophomore year, she also finished up her degree. Come junior year, she’s got a job, and Sasha’s house is empty from after school until 5:30 at night. Three hours a day.”

“And you used every possible minute of it,” Abby says with a dirty grin.

“As many of them as we could. I had choir, drama club, and soccer. She had field hockey, and was part of the drama club, too, so it wasn’t just non-stop making out. But we did both have nothing after school on Thursdays, and, better yet, both of our sets of parents’ were under the impression that we had after school activities on Thursdays.

“So, we’d get to her house after school, and it’s the first Thursday of the new school year. We’ve both been waiting for it all summer. ALONE time!

“We didn’t have ‘rules,’ not the way Breena did or Tim was talking about, but… She didn’t want to have sex until she got married, sometimes, and I was still fairly Christian back then, too, and the whole God doesn’t want you fucking message scared me sometimes. And neither of us wanted to be parents in high school. One of the girls in my homeroom was pregnant, and she had science with another one who got knocked up, so we were both aware of the fact that it really could happen. So, that tends to cut down on the ‘let’s do it now’ eagerness. But we both liked making out and… We’d kind of flip flop, she’d be in a ‘let’s do it’ place, and I’d get scared, and then I’d get over it, and she’d back off, so we had a pretty comfortable, ‘we’re not going all the way’ policy. One hard line, and pretty much anything that didn’t cross that line was okay.

“But, even sixteen-year-old-me wasn’t quite so horny as to get off on a bit of grinding at a dance.” Fifteen-year-old Jimmy had been, which is where the actual first time story comes in. Which wasn’t with Sasha, or for that matter a girl he liked all that much, but she had been soft, warm, pretty, pressed up tight against him, and rubbing. It kind of caught him by surprise, and he didn’t think the girl noticed because she kept right on grinding to the end of the song (which was a bit ouchy), but wet, sticky pants for the rest of the night wasn’t fun. “And a bit of grinding at a dance, making out in deserted corners at parties or in movie theatres was most of the on our own time we got. Neither of us had a car, for example. And when you go on dates by bus, you miss out on a lot of good making out opportunities. So most of the time, we didn’t get a chance to even put that limit to the test.

“And then we’ve suddenly got Thursday afternoons.

“She got home first, and I’m trying to be really sneaky, so the neighbors don’t notice me creeping into her apartment and tell her parents.”

“Did you succeed?” Tim asks.

Jimmy winces. “Not as well as I had hoped. But no one said anything until… March. Which resulted in a long and excruciating conversation for her with her parents about safe sex and all the rest of it, and her Dad glaring at me for the next six months. Apparently, neither of them believed the ‘really, we’re not having sex’ line, which actually had a lot to do with us actually crossing that line come junior prom time.” Jimmy shakes his head and sighs. “It’s amazing what, ‘Really, you don’t need to keep lying to me,’ does when said over and over when you’re telling the truth.” He shakes his head at the stupidity. “Anyway, it’s Thursday, I’ve gotten into the apartment, and we’ve got all of this alone time.”

He grins at that.

“She told me to just go in. Don’t knock, because the neighbors would hear. And I’ve been to her apartment before, so I know where her bedroom is. And I go in, and I don’t know exactly what’s coming next, but I’m hard because I know something’s coming up, and I walk in and she’s already on the bed, naked, and I just about passed out so little blood made the return trip to my brain.

“I’d seen bits and pieces of her. Felt them, too. But, this was the first time I got to see all of her and my brain fried. She laughed, happy, not making fun of me, and I just stood there and stared.

“I think she said, ‘You just gonna watch?’ and I think I said, ‘Uh…’ and then snapped out of it and jumped onto the bed with her while trying to tear my clothing off.

“I don’t remember the details. Not… not anymore. I do remember the feeling. She was so soft, and smooth, and so naked. She had little breasts, just barely a handful, and I remember that soft, jiggly weight in my hand,” Tim’s nodding along at that, remembering that sensation. “Her hair smelled like Vidal Sassoon shampoo. They don’t make it anymore, but I can still smell it if I think about it, and for years later, I couldn’t smell it without getting turned on.

“Wanted to touch and taste and see and all of her at once.” He tries to make himself see it. Tries to pull images out of the sensations. “Kneeling. We were kneeling together, and she had my dick between her legs, and… so soft, so warm, so snug. I can remember my heart pounding, feeling it in my ears, and eyes, and dick, and her butt under my hands, and she was kissing me, all soft and naked, and we were rubbing together.” Jimmy’s got a soft, dreamy look on his face, remembering all of this. “Can’t imagine it took long, but it felt like forever, and I just came and came and came and…” He’s still smiling. “It was good.”

“Same question the girls asked me, you do her any good?” Tim asks.

“Not right that second, but like I said, it can’t have taken that long, because there was time for me to stretch her out and kiss her all over. And I didn’t get her off that time, but I did get my mouth on almost every inch of her body, and she appreciated the effort.”

“Did you ever get her off?” Abby asks.

“Yeah! Got good at it, eventually. We dated for almost three years. I can tell that story, too, if you like.”
“I want to hear that one,” Abby says.

Breena nods. She didn’t think to ask that question when she was hearing this story the first time.

“We didn’t just do it in her bed. We did it pretty much everywhere in that apartment. Her parents’ room was the only place we didn’t try it. Her bathroom had a tub, so we decided to get a bath together. She was between my legs, back to my chest, and had one leg up on the edge of the tub. Her toenails were sparkly blue. I remember that clearly. Her hair was wet, and I can remember the feel of that against my cheek.” Jimmy closes his eyes, remembering. “I was petting her breasts, and her legs, and pussy, stroking her all over, and she was rocking into my hand, pressing into me. I knew girls could get off. So, I had an idea of what I was aiming for, just kind of vague on how to get there, and kind of vague was probably the kind of job I was doing, too. Felt good, but not enough focus.

“She took my hand, and helped me. How fast, and where, and how hard, and kept me on target. And, with some help, I was able to do her some good. And once I knew what I was trying to do… Well, I wanted to do it, a lot. So, I did. That’s the day I strutted home eight feet tall, having conquered Asia.”

“Uh huh,” Tim says, dryly. “Show off.” Tim’s noticed something though. Between watching the earlier sex, and this conversations, Abby’s body is actually starting to act a bit turned on. She’s breathing a little faster, and that looks suspiciously like a little flush on her cheeks and chest.

He stays away from her breasts, and just rests his palm on her mound, while kissing her neck. “You want to tell us a story and see if I can do you some good?”

Abby sighs at that. She has been enjoying the stories. Tim’s behind her, so she slips her leg over his hip. “Slow and gentle?”

“Probably just fingers. But if I can get it up, I’ll give you all the slow and gentle you want. Breena, can you reach the condoms and lube?” Breena stretches, fumbles around in the bedside table for a moment, and grabs them, tossing them back to him. “Thanks, baby.” He kisses Abby. “Always be prepared.”

She grins at that. “Got your Wilderness Scout on?”

He smiles. “That’s the first time I wanted to have. And one day, we’re going back to that cabin by the lake, and we’ll play that one out.”

“Ooo!” Abby likes that idea.

He kisses her again. “Tell us a story?”

Abby sighs and settles in against Tim, as his palm starts a gentle, rhythmic squeeze. Just light pressure, waking her body up, reminding it that it likes stuff like this.

“First time I got off with someone else… I told Breena a bit about this when we were figuring out which sex store to go to.”

Breena smiles, snuggling into Jimmy. “It’s a good story.”

“His name was Patrice Leon.” She uses the French pronunciation and can see the look Tim and Jimmy are sharing. “He was from Baton Rouge. Having a French name wasn’t a big deal there. We were at LSU together, met during orientation, had been flirting like crazy, dated for a few weeks, and decided to have sex with each other. First time, for both of us.
“And, he was having a great time, and I was having an… okay time. A frustrating time. It’s second semester, 1992, barely, and… And we live in a place where it’s all about sex. Dick up, dick in, and boom, fireworks. But that’s not happening. Neither of us knew what we were aiming for. He’s killing himself trying to not get off, and I’m getting sore because I don’t need an hour of penetration, it’s not going to get me off.

“Petting had been good. Kissing, I liked that. Get condom on and… Wet and eager and fizzle.

“My roommate was off at the library, so we had a few hours of alone time in my dorm room, and we’re doing it, and he gets off, and I don’t, and he’s disappointed because he wants to get me off. And I’m frustrated because I went from ‘I’m so close’ to the dreaded ‘orgasm death march’ where he’s fucking away, going to get me off or die trying, and I’m getting less turned on by the second because ‘die trying’ is looking more and more like the right answer.

“He goes as long as he possibly can, and I’m doing everything I can to get him off faster, because it’s starting to hurt, and we’re both just not happy at all with this. So he gets off, rolls off of me, tosses out the condom, and then says, ‘Okay, what do you do to yourself? Just show me, and I’ll do it.’”

“Sounds like a winner,” Jimmy says, sarcastically.

“You gonna say you’ve never been on the giving side of an orgasm death march?” Abby asks with an eyebrow high.

He opens and closes his mouth, rethinking a few experiences over the years.

“Uh huh. Onto the good part of the story. I had to tell him I didn’t do myself, which he didn’t believe at all.”

“I’m seconding that,” Tim says. “Not saying you’re lying, just can’t wrap my head around it.”

Jimmy and Breena are nodding.

“Not everyone grew up in the liberal north. Some of us grew up Catholic in the part of the world that took the whole masturbation-is-a-sin thing seriously. And, even when some of us, by which I mean me, were feeling naughty, doing it didn’t do much, because I had my fingers and a candle and a basic understanding of how intercourse worked. And, sure, okay, but… fizzle. Hell, the anatomical drawings in my sex ed class didn’t even have a clitoris on it.”

“Oh, that’s just wrong!” Jimmy says.

“Didn’t need it on the sketch to explain how girls got pregnant, so it wasn’t there. Catholic school education. We got the cross section shot of the uterus and ovaries, and that was it. No external view. They all but told us vigorous hand holding could make us pregnant and then we’d get a horrible disease and die. And yes, we’d all seen our dads’ collections of smutty magazines, but none of them had anything besides naked ladies in them. And, yeah, I liked those just fine, but I knew what a naked lady looked like. That wasn’t the information I needed.

“So, we’re both thinking slot a, tab b, insert, rub, and all should be good.

“And it wasn’t. But, for as conservative rural Louisiana is, New Orleans isn’t. And I knew, from one of my Mardi Gras trips with Paulette, that there were stores in New Orleans that had information in them. So, we pool our Christmas present money, sell back a textbook or two, got some bus tickets, and down we went.

“And that store… Kids in the candy store. That was fun. And, again, it’s 1992, so the internet isn’t a thing, let alone the sort of thing you can watch porn on, so sex shops had booths, where you could rent videos by the minute.”

“That sounds so seedy,” Breena says.

“Like you wouldn’t believe. And the smell… Oh God. And I’m like the only woman in the store, and the guys are staring at me. It’s flattering and a little scary. And we’ve been having sex for months, which I liked, but I’m not getting off. And everything around us is sexy. And, remember, bisexual, and this place is filled with pictures of gorgeous naked women, or girls in tiny, tight little bits of lingerie. I’m dripping down my thighs, tingling all over, what’d Jimmy call it, walking hard-on?”

“That was me,” Tim says.

“But I’ve been there, too,” Jimmy adds. “You feel like a good, stiff breeze in the right place’ll do it for you.”

Abby nods, and Tim ups his stroking game. He adds a bit of lube to his fingers, and starts gently slipping them between her lips. Intentionally not getting her clit. He’s rubbing all around it, though.

“We were in there for an hour, looking at the books, and clothes, and videos, and toys, and… Just couldn’t take it anymore. It’s a buck for five minutes, and we want to save as much money as we can for buying stuff, but we need some alone time. So, run back to the booths, find an open one. It’s a sex shop, so no one cares if you go in on your own or with someone else. But we don’t know that, we’re getting off on naughty and being so adult and so much sex all over the place.

“He pops two dollars into the machine, which opens up the door. Vinyl booth, smells like Lysol. There’s a spray bottle of disinfectant and paper towels and a cheery, ‘Please clean up after yourself’ sign.

“We didn’t even grab a video at first. Just got in there, pulling open his pants, and I’m wearing a little black skirt…”

Tim can see it in his mind. Young goth Abby, in a seedy sex shop, little black skirt, and knee high socks and boots, smelling like sex, and wet to her thighs, and his dick gives a little appreciative twitch at that idea.

“Yeah, I know you like that.”

He kisses her ear. “Did you like it?”

“Oh, yeah. That set a lot of future kinks. We’re kissing and petting and I’ve got him in hand, and… I mean we’re there, so we might as well watch something, right? He grabbed a video pretty much at random. And, I’ve never seen any video porn before. It’s a VCR tape, so the guy who had it last just stopped it where he finished, and it’s two girls going down on each other, sixty-nining.”

Tim focuses in a bit closer, rubbing his middle finger just next to Abby’s clit and she squirms a bit, whimpering.

He nibbles her ear. “Oh yeah, want me to get closer?”

“Please!”

“Keep talking, baby, tell me how seeing those pretty girls made you feel.”
“Hot and shivery all over. One was a pretty blonde, with the prettiest little pussy I’d ever seen at that point, and the other was a brunette, and she was holding the blonde wide open, licking her clit over and over and my own clit was throbbing at it, wanted to get licked so bad. Patrice is watching, too, and he’s almost moaning at it, because he hasn’t seen that before either. Really hadn’t occurred to either of us to try that and… It’s going to happen as soon as we can find a room. But there isn’t room in here.”

“He obviously didn’t know what he was doing,” Jimmy says.

“If there’s room to fuck, there’s room to lick,” Tim adds.

Both of them nod to each other.

“They were doing it on the bed, legs wide, and lots of room and light on the video. We’re in a booth that’s made for one person.”

Tim and Jimmy share a I don’t buy it look.

“Get over yourselves,” Breena adds. “What happens next?”

Tim starts to just lightly stroke over Abby’s clit. Dragging his finger, feather light over it. She wriggles, groaning against him, and his body perks up a bit more. Looks like he might be able to get his dick into this game. Hasn’t been that long since he got off last, but it’s been a damn long time since Abby’s been interested in sex, and if she is, he wants to be there to give it to her.

“Condom, that happens next. Get it rolled on. First time we’re trying it in anything other than missionary or cowgirl. He’s sitting on the little bench, and I straddle him, facing the video, still watching, eyes wide, and the girls, they’re so pretty and so naked and wet pussies and wet tongues and the sounds… Yeah, it’s fake, but it’s still hitting me hard.”

The story’s hitting Tim hard, and his body is rising to the occasion.

“And he’s watching, and I am, and breathing hard, nipples aching, every breath rubbing them against my t-shirt, and he’s got one hand on my breast, and the other on my clit, or trying to find it at least. We can see the girls are using their fingers to thrust, but aren’t fucking with their tongues, they’re licking, over and over, so he tries doing that with his fingers,” Tim speeds up a bit, focusing on her clit with his fingers, and tries to give Breena a, give me a hand with the condom, I don’t want to let go sort of look, which by some miracle of sexual telepathy she gets, and does give him a hand with the condom and the lube, and as he’s stroking Abby nice and gentle, she kisses her, wet and deep, as Tim very slowly, very gentle and shallow just edges into her, groaning along with Abby, deep in his throat at that feel of that.

“Love you,” whispers out of her as he eases in. His lips are on her neck/shoulder, and he agrees.

“Home again, baby,” he kisses to her skin.

She adds the roll of her hips, and Breena returns to Jimmy, who sets his own fingers to work. This is hot, but his dick is still out of the game and he’s not expecting a miraculous rise. But his fingers don’t go limp after an especially good time, so Breena’s in good hands.

“Only,” Abby pants a bit, “ten minutes of video time. And I’m in his lap, bouncing up and down, hard, so wet and so turned on and... That turned on everything feels better. Every stroke is wet and full and hot and dragging, dripping, wet, cum all over the place, moaning, fucking, sex.” Her voice caresses each word, stroking over them, like Tim’s finger is stroking over her, and her body is stroking over his.
Those words are killing Tim, he’s moaning into her neck, rubbing faster, focused, letting her set the speed of her hips. (And Jimmy’s realizing that miracles do indeed occasionally arise.)

“And he’s not quite got it with his fingers, and I don’t quite have it, either. No mirror in there. Aching, so close, so wet, and so, so needy. Whimpering, begging for it, needy.”

Tim bites gently on her throat, and rubs firmer, faster, feels her hips speed up to keep pace with him.

“And the girls on the video are moaning and panting and fucking, tongues so pink, pussies so wet, fingers rubbing deep and sure and tongues pointy and flicking fast and he finally gets it, drags his finger over my clit and I groan so loud someone in the store cheered for us.”

Tim smiles at that, and he can hear Jimmy and Breena giggle at it.

“He’s not stupid so as soon as that happens that finger isn’t moving. It’s staying right there. Just pressing and I’m rocking on him, bouncing up and down, and the girls are fucking in front of us, and he’s groaning, trying to not get off so I can keep going, and I’m so close, so fucking close, just need a little more, that finger not moving isn’t quite doing it for me, so I try rocking, anything to get some friction, just need a little more.” Tim rubs a bit faster and rocks a bit deeper, and Abby groans at that. He can feel her body start to grow tighter on his.

“That’s it baby, come for me, let me feel you ripple on my cock.”

“So close.”

He strokes faster, little harder. “There you go. Just like that. All wet and soft and feeling good. Feel so good, so good.” He keeps rocking into her, and she does feel good. Feels like sex and love and home, and it doesn’t matter he did this less than an hour ago, it’s Abby’s body on his, and he loves it and loves her and he’s kissing her and she’s half turned into him to get more of those sweet kisses as he’s rocking in and out and his fingers rub round and round over and over.

She’s pulling a little tighter, jaw going tight, and he’s sucking her tongue and stroking fast with his hand and slower, steadier with his dick. “Come on Abby, give it to me, baby.”

She moans, high and panting, and then is gone, rippling all over, twitching in his arms, and Tim’s grinning into her lips, riding the high of getting her off. Only takes a few more strokes of his own to get himself over the edge, too. And then they’re both lying together, wrapped in each other’s arms, and glowing with sex and lazy kisses.

He can hear Breena’s soft moan; she’s having a good time, too, and he enjoys that, but mostly he’s looking at Abby, seeing her right now, tired eyes, baby weight plump face, smile lines, a few gray hairs among the blonde ones. The changes of the years shining on her face. Some of those changes he’s at least partially responsible for.

He thinks of her at eighteen in college and just starting off with sex, imagining her then. He squeezes her tighter, careful to avoid her breasts. He wishes he could have been there for eighteen (even if that would have put him at fourteen) and loves that he’s here for forty-three.

He strokes her face, and she smiles at him, meeting his lips with a few more soft kisses.

Both of them can feel, and hear, Jimmy and Breena making love. And after a few more moments, their come cries finish the party.

There’s a quiet space shared between the four of them. Mostly just touching and petting. Then they start to move a bit, shift around, clean up. Sean’s going to start asking for his second dinner soon.
As they get up and get moving, Breena says, “So… Did you actually get off for the first time in a porn booth at a sex shop?”

Abby giggles. “Nah. Made the whole thing up. I mean, we went to the sex shop, but we behaved, sort of, we pretty much made out the whole bus ride home, until we got back to my dorm room, and then kicked my roommate out for pretty much the next two days. I was wild at eighteen, but not that wild.”

Tim nips her shoulder. “You tease!”

She kisses him back. “Come on, you loved that story.”

Jimmy’s laughing, hard, at that, and then they hear the little feed me squawk of Sean.

“Back to the grind,” Abby says, getting up, pulling on her robe, and heading off to get their youngest. Over her shoulder she says, “And don’t think you got out of telling us your stories, Breena. We’re going to hear about getting Jimmy naked for the first time one of these days.”

Breena and Jimmy, grin at that. “One of these days,” she says.
Love Song

Tim prefers music without lyrics, and as he’s spending what feels like hour 6,908 staring at a blank pad of paper, he understands why. Lyrics are fucking hard.

Granted, right now, Jimmy would tell you that lyrics are a snap and music is hard.

Though, as Tim pointed out to him, nothing at all was stopping him from coming up with lyrics if it was such a piece of cake, and he was more than welcome to write all the damn lyric he likes, and Tim could go off and find a piece of music to shove them into. After all, he’s got every damn jazz song ever recorded, a computer, and access to Abby’s sound equipment, so he could certainly rip lines of music out of a song, and build one for them, and then he can fit whatever lyrics Jimmy could dream of into it.

Jimmy didn’t look thrilled with that.

And both of them, realizing they were getting snarky and snappish, decided that that was a splendid time to put the project on the backburner and go blow some shit up online.

Unfortunately, Valentine’s is three days away and this project has been backburner-ing for more days than it should have been. They’ve hit crunch time, and if this is going to happen, it’s got to get on the front burner.

A long time ago, Tim learned that three quarters of wining any battle involving will power was to avoid temptation.

And, given how many cupcakes he had at yesterday’s party, he has given into temptation enough recently when it comes to sweet, sugary things.

The problem is, it’s awfully tricky to avoid temptation when living with two women, one of whom is in ‘eat everything that isn’t nailed down because tomorrow may be when I start throwing up every five seconds’ mode and the other one is in ‘I’m making all of the food our child eats, so I’ve got to eat all the time’ mode.

And, see… He’s trying to be good and strong, like Jimmy, who can sit there and watch them have ice cream and cookies after dinner and not eat them. But, he… his hand is inching across the table toward the Milanos, the mint and dark chocolate ones he loves, looking up at him succulent pastry and deep dark chocolate, and, gosh, he could just dip it in his coffee, and it’d be sooo good… Jimmy slaps his hand, for which Tim nods and says, “Thank you.”

It’d be easier if he could say, “Hey, could you just not eat this stuff around me?” But, A: it’s their home, too, and B: both of them are pulling in major calories to provide for his children. It’s not like this is just snacking for the sake of snacking, Breena’s legitimately looking at months of no fun with food, and Abby’s nursing. If she’s not eating or drinking, she’s hungry all the time.

Tim decides watching them munching away on dessert is not going to lead to good places, so he stands up. “Gonna get some programming in.”
He probably should be doing some programming. Ngyn’s been bouncing some ideas for how to run what she’s calling CrimeWeb (better name than he came up with) and he could be working on that. Or, he could be mucking about with the data sets that Bishop have been giving him, and starting to work on a program that will begin looking for problem spots in the Navy when it comes to harassment.

Or he could, and he should, because damn it Valentine’s day is after tomorrow, work on the lyrics for the song he and Jimmy have been trying to write.

Because, when it comes down to it, writing the lyrics is probably a more productive use of his time than hoping for a grisly murder to keep Jimmy away from home on Valentine’s day, and then using that as an excuse for not having it done.

So, he sits in front of a pad of paper, tapping his pen against the desk, feeling like he’s never even heard music before, let alone being capable of writing some.

---

Inspiration strikes in weird ways. He’s free writing, scribbling bits and pieces onto his pad, and then…

I’m not gonna write you a love song.

Tim’s staring at that, tapping his pen against the pad of paper, thinking of a somewhat successful pop song he knows he’s heard on Breena’s shuffle mix.

“Already been used,” Jimmy says, looking over Tim’s shoulder as he heads in to “help” with the “programming” while the ladies get babies cleaned up and ready for bed.

“Hush. I think I’ve got something here.”

Though you deserve it he writes down.

“Are you actually using the music for Sara Barellie’s Love Song?” Obviously, Jimmy can’t hear what’s in Tim’s head, but he can read the words and has a sense for how Tim’s trying to shove them into one of Breena’s favorite songs.

“Maybe… Let me work this.” He hunches over the paper, pen in hand, but nothing pops up. So, he leans back in his chair, and looks at Jimmy’s who’s half leaning/half sitting on his desk. “We do our own cover of someone else’s song it still counts, right?”

Jimmy thinks about that. “Especially if we rewrite the lyrics.”

Tim writes a bit more feeling something akin to inspiration starting to strike:

And so much more.

I’m not gonna write you a love song/Though I tried my best, but I failed the test/The words just wouldn’t come.

I’m not gonna write you a love song/No words could ever really say/How much I love you.

“Doesn’t scan.”

“You’re the musician, make it scan.” Tim shoots back.
“Ugh.” There are many things Tim is extraordinary at. Music isn’t on the list. “You know this is the chorus, right?”

“Ngh…” Tim slumps a bit. “Yeah.”

“How about, ‘I didn’t write you a love song, though you deserve it, every single day…” Jimmy sings.

Tim writes that down fast. “Yeah, that’s good.”

_I didn’t write you a love song/ Though I tried my best / I couldn’t pass this test/ You see_
_When the words don’t come/ It’s completely not fun / But it’s true_
_I didn’t write you a love song/ Because there just aren’t words to wrap up/ How much I love you_

Jimmy’s nodding, looking at the paper, and then hops up to go find Breena’s phone and see if he can get a copy of the music they’re modifying as Tim fiddles with his pen.

Tim thinks a bit more and adds:

_Spent a million hours, staring at a blank page/ Crossed out words that didn’t work/ Played wadded up paper basketball for an age_
_He hummed a million bars/ Worked out notes during rides in cars/ Spent hours on every tune/ And even if he’d tried ‘til June…_
_We didn’t write you a love song/ Though we really tried/ And almost cried/ You see_
_We didn’t write you a love song/ Because the words just can’t say_
_How much we love you_

When Jimmy gets back with Breena’s phone, he sees what Tim’s got, and nods. “Change most of it to we?”

Tim nods, too. “Yeah. And you’re singing, so flip the I and him on the stuff I just did.”

Jimmy plays the original song, and they both listen to it all the way through. Then Jimmy starts messing with the tune, trying bits of lyrics. After a few minutes of that, he says. “You realize; this doesn’t need to be full song length now. A verse or two, and, say… spa day gift certificates, and we’re good to go!”

That inspires Tim.

_We didn’t write you a love song/ Though we really tried/ You see_
_We didn’t write you a love song/ But we know for sure / That you love the spa/ Oh yay!_
_We didn’t write it/ No way/ Happy Valentine’s Day (hand over present)_

Jimmy’s reading over his shoulder and laughs. “Yeah, that’ll do the job.” Then he grabs the pen and adds. _We’re still hoping/ to get laid!_

Now Tim’s really laughing. “We’ll be lucky not to get smacked upside the head with that.”
“Eh. They’ll think it’s funny.”

“That goes after the spa package, and it better be a good one.”

Jimmy nods. He heads over to Tim’s computer and get online, hunting for said spa packages.

Tim fiddles some more. We’re didn’t write you a love song/Though we tried our best/ But we made a mess, you see.

Jimmy looks up. He doesn’t think Tim’s aware of the fact that he’s quietly singing his lyrics. “That’s good. We’ll have to pop that in there somewhere.”

Tim does look a little startled at that, because Jimmy’s on the other side of the room and shouldn’t be able to read the page from there. “I don’t think we’re roping Tony and Ziva into playing instruments for this.”

Jimmy shakes his head. He’s not going anywhere near Tony with this. The eye roll alone at these lyrics should sprain Tony’s orbitals for weeks.

We didn’t write you a love song/Though we liked the idea/ Couldn’t make it real. That time he’s just writing.

They hear Abby call down from upstairs. “Kids are washed. Story and song time!”

Jimmy glances at Tim, who nods, story and song time, indeed.

---

“He’s Shaun the Sheep, he’s Shaun the Sheep, he even mucks about with those who cannot bleat…” Okay, as lullabies go, the theme song for Shaun the Sheep might be a bit off, but Molly loves it (she makes little m-mm-m-m bleating sounds to go along with her daddy singing), Kelly tolerates it, Anna couldn’t care less, and all music is just rumbly vibrations for Sean, so it’s a winner.

Jimmy sings, holding Sean against his chest and throat. Tim tucks little girls in, making sure they’ve all got stuffed animals, pacifiers, sippy cups with water, favorite blankets, kisses, and the rest of the seemingly endless array of accoutrements necessary to get a collection of three tiny girls to bed.

“Oh, come and bleat with Shaun the Sheep!” Jimmy wraps up, also kissing each girl, and then both of them ease out of the nursery, hoping that with a little luck all three of them are down for the night.

As they’re heading down the stairs, Jimmy says, “You know, you should sing, too.”

“The girls cry when I sing to them.”

“They do not!”

“Molly does.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes. “Once. And I’m sure that wasn’t because of your singing voice. Your speaking voice is not repulsive, and you were singing some of what you were writing, so I know for a fact that there is a range of notes you can sing.”

Tim rolls his eyes back at him and shakes his head. He’s not singing. There is no possible universe in which him singing counts as a gift.

“Okay, Mr. Poetry Jam, add a spoken word verse. You do that, right?”

Tim sighs, bouncing Sean, who’s starting to fuss a little, yes, he “does” that.

“I don’t have anything. All the lyrics we have, which are not arranged in any particularly nice order, are on that sheet.”

“Wing it.”

Tim sighs as they head into his office. “I’m bad at winging it.”

“This song is bad, too. Wing it anyway. Add your voice to it. That matters.”

Tim, kind of, half-heartedly, nods.

If Sam Allan never has to be involved in song writing again, it’ll be too soon.

Tim may be chewing nails trying to get lyrics out, but Jimmy’s been on music, and as someone with an extensive background in choral music and barbershop quartet, voice isn’t just a matter of making words sound nice, it’s also, for Jimmy, an instrument.

Which means Dr. Allan’s been serenaded, quite a bit, over the last few weeks, as Jimmy works on tune and rhythm.

And worse, once Jimmy noticed that Allan can A: carry a tune, and B: has a pleasant singing voice, he’s been dragooned into actually helping with this, too.

And, okay, yes, if a guy, or guys were writing love songs for Allan, he’s be tickled pink, but he’s looking at yet another Valentine’s Day with only memories of the man he loves, he tends to be a bit sour on the day.

Jimmy’s humming different arrangements, apparently there was some sort of breakthrough last night resulting in bastardized versions of Love Song hummed and sung throughout Autopsy, as they’re working on removing the victim’s spleen, and Allan’s hoping he won’t be asked to start belting out the goofy lyrics Tim’s come up with, as he tries to think of a way to get out of this, gently.

Finally, Allan thinks of a TV show his parents loved back when he was a child.

“Dr. Palmer, have you ever heard of Jeeves and Wooster?”

Jimmy stops humming and looks up from his scalpel work. “Can’t say that I have. Jeeves as in the ever faithful butler?”

“Yes. That’s where Jeeves comes from. They’re stories by P. G. Woodehouse. And a collection of shows starring Hugh Laurie and Stephen Fry. You might like them.”

Jimmy shrugs, no idea why Allan’s recommending this, but he’ll put it on their to-watch queue. “Light and fun to watch?”
“Quite. And, Wooster, who is nominally the Boss, keeps forcing Jeeves to help him with his music.”

That gets Jimmy’s attention.

“And Jeeves is not a music kind of guy, but it’s his Boss, so he tolerates it, but you can see the please make this stop radiating off of him during each scene while he’s being asked to sing along.”

Jimmy swallows.

“And Bertie, who loves his music, is completely incapable of seeing the Jeeves isn’t having a good time.”

“Point take, Dr. Allan.”

“Thank you, Dr. Palmer.”

99.999% of the time, Breena Palmer has guts of steel.

She’s a mortician, and that’s not a career for the squeamish. Dead bodies, even well-loved, gently-handled dead bodies are… well… yucky. There are various solids, fluids, and smells that even the most meticulously clean body produce.

And, in that a good percentage of their clients are not, due to the nature of death, meticulously clean when they get them, and that part of their job is to go about providing said meticulous clean, a new client on the table is often covered in an array of less-than-pleasant substances waiting to be removed.

Normally, this isn’t a problem. Normally, she and her dad strip off whatever clothing their client is wearing, then comes the shower hose, along with good strong soap, and a thorough washing and rinsing off before they get into anything else they’re going to do.

Pretty much, at the absolute least, everyone messes themselves when they die, and if they don’t get that all properly cleaned off, come viewing time, there are going to be some irate clients.

To make matters worse, this particular client was rather large, in the sense that an extra-wide casket has been purchased, and was not getting the sort of attention she should have been getting from her caregivers. So, there’s the reek of not nearly enough bathing, the yeasty smell of folds of skin that have been just lying on each other for days, if not longer, and the vaguely maple syrup scent of uncontrolled diabetes.

She and her Dad are talking about how if the people who “cared” for Ms. Jethry had spent half as much on making sure she took her meds as they did on her coffin, she’d probably still be alive, (They have versions of this conversation fairly frequently.) as they get her ready for her funeral.

Normally, she and her dad would just get to it. But normally Breena isn’t four days shy of a month pregnant.

Her dad starts to cut Ms. Jethry’s pjs off, and the wave of scent hits Breena, sending her running for the trash basin, and from there to the restroom.

And thus, 26 days pregnant, the day before Valentine’s, morning sickness has come to visit.
Her parents know she’s pregnant. They found out the day after the rest of the family, after Sunday supper.

So, Ed isn’t surprised to see her go bolting off when he begins to get Ms. Jethry undressed. They’ve done this three times before.

Just means he’s got a bit more work for the next few months. He’ll handle these jobs on his own, and Breena will take over more of the makeup work. With her trusty trashcan next to her.

He doesn’t want to get too close to her, because, of course, he too smells like Ms. Jethry, but he sends a quick text to her mom, so she’s not in the bathroom, puking, alone.

Breena’s sitting on the floor, head against the seat of the toilet, awash in the sickly green haze of “morning sickness.”

She’d been almost hopeful that maybe this time it wouldn’t hit so hard.

Ha ha ha.

She did get to almost a month before it set in, which was longer than the previous three times.

Her mom knocks on the door, and eases in. “Hey, honey.”

“Nghm…”

She pets Breena’s hair. “Yeah. I know.” And she does. Breena and Amy weren’t too bad, she felt a little green with both of them. Then came Christine and morning sickness of doom. Over the course of the nine months Christine was in utero, Jeannie went from 146 pounds to 142 pounds, which is not the direction a pregnant woman’s weight is supposed to go.

Ed’s vasectomy was done before Jeannie got out of the second trimester. He wasn’t taking any chances of that ever happening to his wife again.

She hands over the glass of cool water, and Breena gratefully swishes out her mouth. “Here.” In Jeannie’s hand is two things. One of the anti-nausea tabs Breena’s had in her purse since the test said pregnant and a Tums.

She takes the anti-nausea pill first. It dissolves on her tongue, which matters, because with a regular pill she’s got a catch-22, she can’t keep the pill down until it’s in her system, and it can’t get in her system if she can’t keep it down. This just fizzles on her tongue, absorbs into her bloodstream, and…

Five minutes later she’s just feeling mucky instead of horrible.

Her mom’s still on the floor next to her, rubbing her back. “You look like you’re starting to perk up, some.”

Breena pops the Tums into her mouth and chews. Her dentist says the only reason she hasn’t lost any teeth is that she keeps up a steady diet of antacids when she’s pregnant. “Some.” She groans. “I was hoping it was going to be different.”

“Me, too, baby. And your dad.” Jeannie strokes her baby’s back. They adore their grandchildren, and they know there’s a huge baby boy shaped hole in both Breena and Jimmy’s hearts. Which is why, even Ed, with his lack of tact and mental filter, hasn’t said anything, but… “Maybe, this is the last one? For a few years, at least?”

Breena sighs. She knows what her parents, and a lot of the other people around them, haven’t said. People almost never intentionally have four pregnancies in four years. When they told people they were pregnant with Jon when Molly was just six months old, they did get some stares, she got a few ‘you know what causes that, right?’ comments, and she knows that’s part of why her Dad’s less than thrilled with Jimmy.

But losing Jon shut all of that up. No one says anything if you end up pregnant pretty much as soon as you possibly can after losing a baby.

And Anna was a girl and Jon was a boy, and if they keep trying for a boy, no one says anything. Except, maybe, her parents, who love her more than anything except her sisters, and hate the idea of seeing her sick for months at a time.

Breena sighs again. Even if this is a little boy, he won’t be Jon.

“Maybe.”

During his lunch, which is late, because they did have a body, Jimmy’s on picking up the gift certificate for the girls.

He’s quietly singing along, “We didn’t write you a love song/though we really tried/and almost cried, indeed!” as he heads into the day spa. “But the words didn’t flow/and the notes didn’t go…” He hums a bar of melody, “And it didn’t matter one way or another/cause the words can’t say/how much we love you.”

He’s actually starting to get pretty satisfied with that.

Sure, it’s not going to be a Top 40 hit, ever, but it’s getting the point across, shows genuine effort, and doesn’t sound terrible.

 Granted, he’s got no idea what the hell Tim’ll whip out for his verse, but right now, Jimmy’s fairly pleased with the bits that are under his control.

He’s more pleased as he picks up the envelopes with the gift cards in them. The lady at the counter reads his order back to him, and he nods. She smiles at him. “Looks like someone’s having a happy Valentine’s day. Mom and wife, or wife and daughter?” she asks as he’s slipping his credit card into the card reader.

He supposes he walked into that one. How many guys get good, meaning expensive, Valentine’s day presents for anyone else?

He smiles at her. “Wife and our best friend.”

“Oh.” She’s a little surprised at that, but rolls with it. “That’ll be fun. You know, we work with men, too, right? You can join in also."

Maybe one of these years he might. But it’s not happening this one. “Four babies under four between the two of them. Someone’s got to watch the kids.”

And the counter lady flashes him a knowing smile. “Got ya! We’ll make sure they have a great time.”

“Thanks.”

On the way back to NCIS, Jimmy picks up a treat for the girls. For tonight. Because they like them, and he’s walking by the place that sells them, and it’s been a while since he’s brought some sort of little goodie home for them.

He makes a detour into the bakery, and eyes the goodies. Abby’s easy. She wants all strawberry everything right now. Probably part of jonesing for her beloved Caf-Pow and not getting any. So, he asks for a chocolate-covered-strawberry cupcake. Breena loves cannoli, and he loves watching her eat cannoli, so a pistachio one for her, and he’s pretty satisfied with that when one other thought hits. He’s not just going home to two girls tonight.

And there are little, single serve, tiramisus here, too.

It’s true that as a matter of fact he doesn’t get Tim little treats. But he’s not sure why not, or why he shouldn’t. (Other than this is the guy who’s trying to keep his weight under control so a small pile of sugary calories might not be an ideal treat for him. But, an unexpected little pile of sugar in exactly the form he loves might be an ideal treat for him, if Jimmy adds some extra yoga time to it…)

He orders the tiramisu, too.

Jimmy’s heading out for the evening, and the way out, he detours to Tim’s office, checking in to see how far behind him he is.

“Just about done,” Tim says. He’s spent the day going over Ngyn’s first blue-print and suggesting additional people to add to her slate of talent. So far, he’s impressed.

So far, he’s also noticed that she’s got Howard handling most of the people-facing aspects of the job, which strikes him as good delegation, and maybe something to get worried about. Or not. Depends on how she does with people who won’t toe the line.

“Great, see you at home, soon.”

Tim nods, absently, and as Jimmy’s opening the door to leave, he notices the bakery box in Jimmy’s hands. “Goodies for home?”

Jimmy stops, door open, and turns back to Tim, smiling. He’s aware of the minions at his back, so he chooses his words carefully. “Got a chocolate covered strawberry cupcake, a pistachio cannoli, and a single serve tiramisu.”
“Oh.” Tim’s surprised at that, because Jimmy doesn’t generally get him little treats, and he doesn’t get Jimmy little treats, and... he kind of ate through this week and last week’s ration of treats at Molly’s birthday party, so he finds himself in the really weird sort of situation where he wants to devour that, because, yes, a little tiramisu with his name on it makes him really happy, but his metabolism still hasn’t bounced back from the autumn, and he puts on weight like crazy when he eats sugary things, and...

“And I’ve got the workout to go with it.”

Tim nods. “Okay.”

Jimmy’s facing Tim, so none of the Minions can see him wink. He puts the snacks down, and carefully, slowly, spelling out more than a few of the words, signs, If you’re lucky, it’ll be a fun one.

Tim signs back, and hopes he’ll get it, No better way to plank than with a woman under you. Think Breena’ll like that?

Jimmy didn’t get all the details, but he’s got the basic idea of what Tim’s saying, and smirks. Yep. I’ll lay back, watch. You do the work. I’ll take the credit for lasting forever.

Tim laughs. And if I’m not lucky, you’ll kick my ass with impossible yoga poses.

If I can do them, they can’t be impossible!

Tim smiles at that. “Thanks.”

Jimmy nods. “See ya.”

As soon as Jimmy steps into the house, he knows that Tim’s not getting lucky tonight, and he’s not, either.

Breena’s on the sofa, skin grayish, eyes closed, nauseous vibes pouring off of her.

He sighs. So much for his surprise.

In he goes, saying hello, kissing and hugging the kiddos, who are spread out on the floor playing toddler games. Then he kneels on the floor next to her. “I’m sorry.” They’d both been hoping this time would be better.

She shrugs a bit. “Might not last long.”

His hand lands on her forehead, but, just like he suspects, she doesn’t have a fever, or swollen glands. She’s not ill, just pregnant.

She sits up slowly, and looks at the box on the floor. “Oh.”

He nods. “Yeah. You want me to tell you what I got?”

She nods. “Sure, maybe it’ll sound so good I’ll want to eat it.”

“There’s a pistachio cannoli in there for you.”

She smiles at the treat, and then shakes her head. The medication she’s on means she won’t throw up, too much. It doesn’t mean she’ll feel good.

“Hey!” Abby heads in from the kitchen. She’s been getting the nauseous-lady friendly dinner ready. She hugs Jimmy, and he hugs back, careful with her breasts, and they trade kisses. “Got some ramen going for our girl.”

Jimmy nods, he can smell it. Chicken broth, noodles, meat, and veg. He’ll skip the noodles, but it sounds good to him. “Got a treat in here for you, too.”

Abby takes the box, looks to Breena, makes sure she can open it without triggering her, Breena nods, so she opens it, looks down, sees the cupcake with the chocolate covered strawberry on it, and lights right up. “Thank you, Jimmy!”

Tim’s in a good mood as he’s heading home. He’s got spoken word verses dancing about in his head, and feeling pretty good about them.

He opens the door, but he’s not seeing anyone, and all the sound he’s hearing is coming from the kitchen. He is running a bit later than usual. Traffic snarl two miles from home slowed him down.

Deep inhale… smells like some sort of chicken soup. He likes chicken soup, so that sounds good, and should balance out nicely with the little treat Jimmy got him.

He hangs his coat up, kicks his shoes into line beside Jimmy, Breena, and Abby’s, and puts his go bag into his office before heading into the kitchen.

“Hey,” he says, heading in. A collection of his favorite sounds wash over him. Cries of “Daddy” and “Uncle Tim”, “Hellos” from the other three adults. Abby’s spooning soup into bowls. So he heads over to her first, and gets and gives a hello kiss, and grabs two of the bowls, taking them to the dinner table.

It’s the same table he and Abby bought when they got their first apartment together. It’s a lot more crowded these days. All four chairs have an adult and there are kids at each corner. Two of them in high chairs. One has a “big girl chair,” a folding chair with a booster seat on it, and one has his corner of the table cleaned off so his sling chair fits on it. Tim’s idly thinking, that in addition to a bigger bed, they need a bigger table.

Jimmy’s standing next to the table, slicing the baguette into pieces, and buttering them. Little girls may not love chicken soup, but they do love butter, and will eat/gnaw on bread. He puts the bowls on the table in front of Jimmy and Breena, pats Jimmy on the butt, turns to kiss Breena, and sees how tired and gray she’s looking.

“Oh… I know that look.”

Breena nods. “Hit me like a hammer on an anvil this morning.”

Tim winces in sympathy. “Do you even want to be here?”

Breena nods as Abby puts more bowls on the table. “I’ll feel like crap here; I’ll feel like crap on the sofa, doesn’t matter. So, might as well be here. Listen to how today went, maybe get a little distracted by some stories.”

Tim takes that as a mission to distract his wife with good stories of how today went, so he gets to it.
And, okay, normally, ‘I spent the day overlooking the actions of my minions’ isn’t terribly interesting, Tim works that tale within an inch of its life (and several miles away from the truth) and makes it interesting.

Breena smiles at that, while slowly eating her soup. She knows he’s lying his ass off, but he’s doing it for a good cause.

The tiramisu is excellent, and Tim feels guilty as hell eating it because Breena’s in the bathroom puking up her soup. He’s not sure what, if any, rules there are about this.

Jimmy sees him staring at half a dessert. “Eat. This isn’t going away tomorrow, or anytime soon, so you can’t decide to not eat because she’s not. No, she doesn’t like to get petted while she’s throwing up, but once the retching is done, heading in with a glass of water, and keeping her company for a bit is welcome. She’ll want a lot of little, bland, snacks, and we’ll try to keep a smoothie of some sort in range, so she doesn’t get dehydrated. If this is like the last three times, she’ll throw up about three times a day. It’ll last for another twenty weeks, and there’s not a damn thing we can do to make it better or easier,” Jimmy’s voice is sharp and bitter on that one.

The toilet flushes, and Jimmy hops up, with that glass of water, to go pet his lady and commiserate with her.

Tim and Abby glance at each other, both of them want to make Breena feel better, and neither of them can.

So with a shrug, and a sigh, they set the girls free to play before tubby time, and start cleaning up the table.

“Do we have plans for the rest of the night?” Abby asks when Tim and Jimmy are done putting the kids to bed.

They glance at each other. Song’s… pretty much done…Tim’s not on an active case right now, so he doesn’t have anything to check in on, Jimmy’s done for the day, so…

“Jimmy’s going to beat my ass into submission in exchange for that tiramisu, but other than that…”

“Ohhh! Can we watch!” Abby says, big smile in her voice and on her face.

Breena smirks at that, too.

Tim rolls his eyes some. (Though he did intentionally say it that way, hoping to get that smirk out of Breena.)

Jimmy nods. “Probably be less exciting than you’re hoping for, but sure, watch.”

“Hold up for another hour, and once Sean’s down, I’ll join in, too,” Abby says. She looks down at large, sore breasts. “Not going to do anything bouncy or complicated, but moving around some more would be a good thing.”

Jimmy grins. “I’ll make him do bouncy and complicated. You just do whatever feels good.”
“Okay, this is completely fucking impossible,” Tim says, collapsing to the floor.

Jimmy gently lowers himself out of bird in flight pose. Eloquently, without a word, pointing out that it’s completely possible, because he’s actually doing it. “Just balance.”

Tim rubs his right arm. He’s not even trying to get where Jimmy is. He’s just aiming for the first stage of that pose, crow pose. “And arm strength.” He shifts around again, and gets back into his squat. “It shouldn’t be this hard. You do it just fine. Squat, plant palms on the ground, shift most weight onto palms, put knees on arms just above elbows, shift weight even more onto hands, and lift feet off the ground.” Tim attempts this while he says it. And like the last six times, he’s good until that last big toe lifts off the ground, and then he’s flopping over.

He looks up at Jimmy. “And then somehow you get your legs over your arms, straighten the damn things out, and pretty much manage to do a hovering split.”

“My legs aren’t that far apart,” Jimmy says dryly. “Give it a rest for right now. Back to Down Dog, we’ll do some more flow work, and take another stab at it at the end.”

“You mean when I’m more tired.” This is hard enough already. He can’t imagine trying this after Jimmy’s put him through “more flow.” Jimmy’s idea of “more flow” is like a Marine Drill Sargent’s idea of “a little jog,” he’s looking at at least another half hour of lunges, bends, twist, more bends, more lunges, planking, chaturangas, up dogs, down dogs, and more planking, and then do it all over again backwards.

“I mean when your mind is calmer and more focused. Brain balances first, body follows. This isn’t going to work if your head’s cluttered.”

Abby smiles at both of them. She’s lying on her back, doing a gentle twist, feeling the tightness from her c-section scar slowly starting to give. It’s a good feeling. And, she’ll admit, the view’s awfully nice, too.

She catches Breena’s eye. She’s not doing anything even remotely strenuous. She’s been laying on their sofa, keeping them company, reading her blogs for herself, and reading out loud the bits and pieces of news they’d find interesting, watching the guys a little, trying to stay distracted from feeling like crud. And she’ll admit, she’s appreciating the view, too.

The guys started out in their jammie pants and t-shirts, but the more they work, the warmer they get. Jimmy’s down to his boxer briefs now, and Tim’s still got his pants on, but likely not for long. They’re both hot, flushed, sweaty and mostly naked.

As distractions go, she appreciates it.

But not enough to want to do anything more energetic than lie on the sofa.

So, quiet night. Yoga, (And yes, at the end of the workout, Tim did get his toes off the ground, and balanced on his hands for a good three seconds before tumbling over. Jimmy declared that victory, and they were done for the night.) reading/gaming, and then watched the first episode of Jeeves and Wooster. (Resulting in Tim musing about why Wooster’s voice sounds so familiar, and then being literally stunned by the idea that Bertie Wooster, affable fop, is played by the same guy who did House.)

It’s not their first quiet night, and it’s remarkably unlikely to be their last.

This is not, by any stretch, the first Valentine’s Day Jimmy’s faced with Breena that involved no shot of sex. The dating ones… only thing on for him was his right hand. Molly was born on Valentine’s day, so… nothing that year. (Though on Feb 13th while they were doing everything they could, short of him filling a prescription for Pitocin, to jumpstart labor, there was a lot of sex.) The next year, Jon had been born less than six weeks before, and even if it had been longer, neither of them were happy enough for sex. The year after that, Valentine’s was their first time back at it after Anna was born, and that was an exceptionally good Valentine’s day, and, of course, this year, Breena’s sick, and he supposes it’s not impossible that Abby will be up for something frisky, but he’d put it at low odds.

Plus, there’s I’m still nursing, my hormones are completely out of whack, my body is doing everything it can to make sure I don’t get pregnant, and the only reason I’m even remotely interested in sex is because you’re horny, interested in sex, which can, with enough will power and erotic set up, do the job with one husband. Two of them is like asking an origami cat to purr. Just isn’t happening. So, in that situation, he’d assume that any interest in any level of frisky would likely be primarily to the benefit of Tim, and he’ll mostly get some cuddling and a nice show to watch.

Better than nothing, but not going on his top ten Valentine’s Days.
This is not, however, how things have gone for Tim. For him, every Valentine’s with Abby (at least the ones of them as a couple) has involved some level of effort, by both of them, and lots of sex. Even the ones where they weren’t a couple, they always got each other some sort of little present.

And, they’ve got their treat for the girls done.

And he knows Abby and Breena have something planned for them. (Or at least they had something planned.)

And he would never, ever say anything along these lines, even to Jimmy, because it’s more presumptuous than he likes to be, and Abby’s got a good reason for likely not wanting sex, but… But he will be kind of disappointed if there’s no sex. Yeah, he’ll get over it. No, it won’t be a big deal. And he’d rather chop his dick off than make Abby feel pressured to provide him with sex.

But… it’s part of them. Valentine’s sex. It’s something they do.

Breena wakes up on Valentine’s day feeling gray. She is not thinking about love or romance or special treats. She’s not thinking of much of anything. She’s feeling sick and bolting from the bed, running to the bathroom, startling the hell out of Tim who’s on the toilet (which is one of his no visitors times), seeing that that’s not an option, and puking in the sink.

Eventually, she hears the toilet flush, and the shower turn on, and then with a damp hand, Tim gently pats her back, and presses the anti-nausea spot on her wrist.

Eventually, her body calms down, and the heaving stops, and she collapses on the floor, and Tim takes care of the mess in the sink, and fills a glass of water for her.

He sits on the floor next to her, holding her wrist, offering the water, but right now, that would mean having to get up to spit it back out of her mouth, so she shakes her head, and rests with her head against the bathroom wall, eyes closed.

She hears him put the glass down, and move around, the sound of more water, the door opening and closing, and then he’s back, gently draping a cool washcloth on her forehead, and saying, “Open your mouth.”

She does and he lays the anti-nausea tab on her tongue.

She nods at him, and he kisses her hand. “You okay?”

“Just skippy,” she replies, with heavy sarcasm. Then she shakes her head. “Nothing you can do. Get your shower and take over with the girls so Abby and Jimmy can get ready, too.”

“Okay.”

Tim’s getting himself washed up when Breena starts to move around again. Then, a moment later, she’s in the shower with him.
He looks a little startled to see her in there. (Granted, not nearly as startled as he looked when she bolted into the bathroom.) She can see the thoughts cruising through his head and he finally comes out with, “Are you going to work?”

She’s standing under the water, letting it run over her, and turns towards him, saying, “Of course. Business doesn’t close because I don’t feel good. We’ve got four funerals today, and I can promise you, I’m not hurting nearly as badly as anyone I’m working for today.”

Tim shakes his head at that.

“You want me to take the day off?”

“Yes!” he answers her like it’s a complete no-brainer. “Stay home, rest.”

She snorts at that. “Uh huh. Tell me about all the jobs you skipped because they were on a ship.”

He opens and closes his mouth at that.

She nods. “Exactly.”

He presses gently on her shoulder, indicating she should turn around. “I’ll get your hair, then.”

Breena sighs at that. It might not be a cure for morning sickness, but a soapy head massage still feels pretty good.

Abby and Breena had had plans for Valentine’s Day. And they were sexy (though that was mostly in Breena’s court).

And now…

Unless some sort of estrogen miracle occurs, Abby’s awfully sure sexy isn’t happening. She’s not feeling it at all, and she can’t imagine Breena is, either.

So that leaves… Okay, good dinner, check. Yes, it’s dinner with four kids under four, so it’s not the classic romantic dinner, but crab legs and steak is going to go over well with this crew even if they do have to feed tiny pieces of it to small people.

Cab sav is breathing, mellowing with the air.

Mood music to go with good dinner… Yep, got that. She’s got the playlist set with soft, sensual music.

Post-dinner movie had been sexy, but she swaps that out with Deadpool. Funny and violent is a better match for Tim and Jimmy than a sex romp comedy if there’s not going to be much in the way of sex post-movie.

She and Breena had mixed up a new batch of sensual massage oil. Abby sniffs it, and yep, it’s got a lot of good memories attached to it, but it’s not triggering any sensations below her neural cortex.

She finds another small bottle, and searches around, finding a light, pleasant, vanilla-based scent, and mixes the two. Not sexy, but the original plan had been sexy movie and oil-slick bodies sliding all over each other. New plan, funny movie, and good foot rubs.
Comfort, touch, pleasure… It’ll be good, just… not what they’d been hoping for.

Dinner, especially for dinner with a sick woman, goes well. Breena manages to have at least a bite of everything, and… as of this point, as Tim and Jimmy are finishing up with getting babies to bed, all of said food is still located inside of her.

Abby’s got clean sheets draped over the living room floor, and pillows spread around, bottle of massage oil ready to go, and this afternoon, she boned up on anti-nausea points. She’s not sure who exactly she’ll be working on, but if it’s Breena, she wants to be ready to do her some good.

Deadpool’s cued up.

Breena’s lounging against the side of the sofa, looking… well, okay, not good, but like she’s at least familiar with the concept and could locate good on a map if properly motivated.

Abby has another sip of her wine. She’s been nursing her glass since dinner. First drink in more than a year and it’s hitting her pretty hard. She’s feeling good and giggly, and who knows, maybe, if the massage goes well, perhaps her body might perk up… Happened a few days ago. It could happen tonight.

Babies are washed up, put into their various sleeping outfits, tucked into bed, sung to, and with any luck, down for the night.

Sean’s who’s not quite on the same schedule as the other three, is cleaned up, and bright-eyed, looking around at everything, and having a very animated chat with his daddies.

“So,” Tim says to Jimmy as they head downstairs. “We doing it now?”

Sean coos, and Tim pats his back, cooing back to him.

“Maybe after Sean goes down?” Jimmy says.

“Bit less distraction.”

Jimmy nods as Sean lets out a loud, talky wail. They get into the living room and find the setup. A comfy little nest, candles, not yet lit, Jimmy spies the oil, so he’s got some ideas of what might be coming up. He’s surprised and pleased to see Deadpool up. Sure, he and Tim have seen it, but the girls haven’t, and they should.

He sits next to Breena, and Tim settles on her other side, resting Sean in his lap.

“Is there a plan for tonight?” Jimmy asks.

“Movie time, pause for a bit, put little boy to bed, and then see where things go.”

“Sounds good,” Tim says, as Abby comes in. She’s got another glass of wine for Tim and Jimmy, and a cup of peppermint tea for Breena.

She settles in next to Tim, petting Sean, and says to him, “Okay, baby, these are Marvel movies, and by the time you’re a teenager, you’ll have seen a whole lot of them.” Sean doesn’t look at her; he’s staring up at Tim. Abby gently strokes the side of his face, and that gets him to look in her direction. He coos at her, too, and she leans down, blows a raspberry on his tummy, and he squeals with delight.

All babies are in their bed. Movie is paused. Wine has helped to make Tim feel a bit less self-conscious about this.

It’s show time.

Jimmy’s on the floor, with Breena between his legs. He’s got his side against the soft, one leg bent, also against the sofa, and her back is resting against that leg, so he can hold her close and look her in the face. She’s holding his hand, and has her legs draped over his unbent leg.

Tim’s sitting cross-legged, facing both of them, with Abby’s head in his lap, her body stretched out so her feet are pressed against Jimmy’s hip.

Easy, comfortable positions, where everyone can see everyone else. Close enough they can all touch each other, too.

Tim glances to Jimmy. Jimmy nods back. Tim scoots a bit, gets his phone out of his pocket, starts the music, and it’s go time.

Jimmy starts off. He’s got the first three verses, and the last one.

“We didn’t write you a love song/though we really tried/and almost cried
“But the words didn’t flow/and the notes wouldn’t go…
“And it didn’t matter one way or another/’cause the words can’t say
“How much we love you…”

Tim may have teased Jimmy about serenading Breena with Bette Midler’s greatest hits, but when it comes down to it, he’s never really seen Jimmy sing. Really sing. Not just messing around to make himself, or the girls, happy. But actually work on something, focus on it, and perform.

It’s different.

His voice likely was never going to be good enough to go pro, but he loves what he’s doing, and he’s looking them both in the eyes, switching from one to the other, feeling those words, and yes, they’re light and a bit fun, but the meaning, the overwhelming devotion and adoration, that’s blazing through his voice. His tone lights some silly words, gives them more power and meaning than the dictionary had to offer.

And Tim gets what Jimmy meant by the idea that adding his own voice mattered, and why.

Jimmy’s voice goes quiet, his first three verses are done, which means Tim’s up… He takes one breath, feeling the music moving, and another knowing he’ll run out of music if he doesn’t move soon.

He’s not singing, just his usual speaking voice, and as he starts, with the three of them staring at him, he begins to hook into what he liked about poetry slams. And maybe stuff like this is easier to do with an audience. Maybe he’s just ready to let it out. Either way, music’s winding down, time to go.
“This verse is mine. He says I should wing it, and… God, I’m bad at that.

“I didn’t write you a love song, though I really tried.

“I get older, maybe wiser, and I can see the word and know the feeling

“Short word, soft word, just a breath exhaled

“Big feeling, all encompassing, touches everything

“Little word comes up short, doesn’t do much

“Love

“All soft sound, little vibration

“Love

“Even a cum cry has a more complicated articulation

“Love

“And I get older, and I know it’s real. Know how it feels “Know the words grow short and shallow

“But they’re all I’ve got

“I didn’t write you a love song, though I really tried.

“But the words couldn’t wrap up how this feels.”

And he kisses them again, and the music shifts back to Jimmy, who flashes him a quick you couldn’t come up with that before?

Tim shrugs at him, nope clear on his face.

And Jimmy heads on, “We didn’t write you a love song, though we tried really hard/Turns out he’s not a bard…

“The word wouldn’t form up right/ but come what may/ we love you every day, every way” Jimmy flashes them a grin, and Tim whips out the spa day gift certificates, holding them up toward both girls, “Happy Valentine’s day!”

And, sure, it’s not the grandest romantic song ever sung, but the girls, even Breena, are grinning at them, and hugging them, and, yeah, they hit the ball out of the park.

A four-way foot rub isn’t sex.

And, as Abby’s rippling her knuckles against the sole of Tim’s foot, and he’s pressing the pad of his thumb just below the ball of Breena’s big toe, Tim’s realizing it doesn’t have to be.
He looks between his ladies, Abby looks like she’s having a better time than Breena is, but Breena appears to be enjoying the foot rub. Or, at least it’s keeping her from focusing too close on feeling cruddy.

She moans a little as he gets into a sore spot on the arch of her foot. Happy moan.

And he wriggles, happy, as Abby flexes his toes, worming her oil slick fingers between them to gently twist the top of his foot while holding his ankle.

And maybe there’ll be sex later, or maybe there won’t, but it doesn’t matter.

It’s still their day.
There’s nothing like sitting in the pediatric radiology department of a slammed hospital to make a person jumpy.

Sean’s fine. He’s chilling out in his car seat, snoozing, more or less the picture of perfect, content baby. He’s so cute, people routinely come over to look at him, compliment them on what a good sleeper he is, and how adorable he is in his tiny little bear onesie.

His parents are significantly less chill.

Everyone around them is in here because they’re caring for someone who’s hurt, or hurt themselves. And, of course, it’s the pediatric department, so they’re in a place filled with hurt and sick kids. And just like cases with hurt kids are the worst, being stuck in a room filled with hurt kids isn’t a picnic, either.

Tim’s getting ready to bubble wrap all four of the McPalmer kids, Breena, and Ziva as he sees a little girl, she can’t be more than three, in some sort of cast-like contraption from her chest to her knees. She’s on something that looks kind of like a wheelchair, except it’s laid flat. A mobile bed of some sort. Abby’s talking to her mother. Car accident. She ended up with a broken pelvis and spine, and this is the fourth week in a row of her in that device. Right now they’re about to do another scan to see how things are healing up. With any luck, as the swelling continues to go down, and her spine keeps healing, she’ll eventually be able to walk again.

The mom asks them what they’re there for. Nothing is visibly wrong with Sean, after all.

Tim feels a little surreal to see that Mom give him a version of the look he probably gave her hearing that her daughter may never walk again. That, oh, sorry to hear it, damaged child look. Then he catches the look she gives her daughter, and maybe he’s reading too much into it, but he would swear she has a at least my kid might get better look on her face.

He glances at Abby, seeing if she caught that, too. Abby gently squeezes his hand.

The nurse calls for the mom and her daughter, and off they go.

Snoozy little boy in the waiting room was great. Wide awake little boy about to go in for a MRI is less great.

The thing about a head MRI is that it takes about fifteen minutes. Fifteen minutes with a sleeping child in an MRI is... in real time, for his hyper-concerned and nervous parents who have just spent an hour surrounded by hurt kids, probably about two hours.

Fifteen minutes with an awake, and as he notices he’s in a strange place, being handed over to a stranger, and thus, screaming, baby is about twenty-nine years.
Tim’s not sure if the setup here is designed to torture parents or not. They can see Sean on a video feed. They can hear him. So, he and Abby are standing next to each other, holding each other, desperately trying to not have a mental breakdown as they watch the nurse strap Sean into the blue, padded swaddle bundle, that keeps him perfectly still in the little tube, as he turns bright red, flails around as hard as he can, and screams his tiny head off.

The MRI tech gives them a half-hearted smile. “I know it’s hard. We’ll get it done as soon as we can. We have in intercom, you can sing to him, some babies calm down when they hear Mom and Dad singing to them.”

Abby’s nails are digging into Tim’s hand, she’s squeezing him so hard. She tries to smile back at the Tech, but it comes out as a wince.

And, with that wince, she’s doing better than Tim, who is using all of his willpower to not run in there and snatch his child back from these strangers who are causing him so much distress.

“Here,” the MRI tech flips the switch. “Let him hear your voice. It'll help.”

Abby sighs. Tim swallows hard. He’s the one who gets his voice back first. “You’re scanning his ears to see if his deafness is structural or neural.”

“Oh…” The MRI tech responds with a full body cringe. “I’m sorry.”

Abby nods. Tim sighs. “Yeah,” she says. Looking at Sean, who’s fully bundled into the swaddler, completely immobilized, looking straight up. “Only way for him to know we’re there is to touch him.”

“And you can’t go in there. I really am sorry.” He glances into the MRI chamber and sees one of the nurses give him a thumbs up, “Okay, we’re ready to go.” He starts the machine, and they see the padded table Sean’s on slowly ease into the MRI tube, and then the low thudding sound drowns out some of Sean wailing.

The fifteen longest minutes ever, finally, end.

Fortunately, for all involved, Sean conked out about six minutes into it.
But that didn’t do much to soothe his frazzled parents.

As soon as he’s out of the tube, he wakes right back up again, and lets everyone know he’s pissed about this whole situation. If a baby can be in a blood red rage, Sean is in a blood red rage. Abby gets him nursing, which helps some. Tim sits next to them, one hand on Sean, one on Abby’s back. All three of them together, the feel of Sean under his hand, and the slowly calming down sucking sounds from his boy, helps to calm Tim down. All of that, plus a flood of oxytocin, helps get Abby settled, too.

“I don’t suppose you can tell us anything about the scan?” Tim asks.

The tech shakes his head. “I just take them. Each doc who works with this hospital sends us the order for what they want scanned, we send it back to them, they read it.”

Given the tech didn’t know Sean’s deaf, that’s the answer Tim and Abby are expecting. The tech messes around with his equipment for another moment, and then says, “And it’s off. Your Doc’ll have this in his inbox the next time he checks his mail.”

Tim supposes that’s something. One step closer to… whatever comes next.

They’re in the car, on the way home, and Sean is, again, peacefully sleeping. The upside of being a baby is very short term memory. It’s been an hour and a half, and from everything they can tell, he has no memory of what happened.

(Though, if Sean is claustrophobic when he gets older, it won’t surprise either of his parents.)

They’re idling at a stop light, not really talking, when the idea that, in five weeks, they’ll talk to the audiologist, and… And they’ll have decisions to make, hits Tim.

He looks over to Abby, who’s watching the cars crossing the street in front of them. “What are we hoping this’ll find?”

She sighs long and low… Then swallows hard. “Am I a really horrible person if I say that whatever this is can’t be fixed surgically? I mean, no, not really, but…” She holds out her hand, and it’s still shaking. Tim nods, he’s calmer, not calm. “If we’re this big of a mess after an MRI, a safe, easy, doesn’t hurt at all, MR-fucking-I, what’s going to happen if they want to operate?” She shakes her head again, looking back at Sean. “I don’t mean that. Whatever he needs or… It’s not about you or me, But, God…”

Tim squeezes her hand. He understands everything she’s saying on a gut level. “I know.”

She nods again. “Honestly, for him, I’m hoping it’s… I don’t know, the little tubes aren’t formed right or something, and they’ll just go fix ‘em up, and he’ll be able to hear. For me… I’m hoping vodka and Vicodin for getting through sitting in the waiting room while they do it. I walked in that hospital room and saw you beaten to hell and gone, and I thought that was as bad as it’d ever get…” she exhales long and low as the light shifts and Tim starts driving again, “but, yeah, six minutes of screaming while I couldn’t do anything for him… You know, at least when they get shots, we get to hold them and pet them, and comfort them, and… and we had to give him to strangers and let them take him away from us, and he was so scared, and next time it’ll hurt, too, and…”
And Abby, who did a fairly good job of keeping herself functional while they were in the hospital, allows herself to fully melt down.

Tim drops Abby and Sean at home, and then heads into NCIS. He’d rather take the day and spend it with Abby, Sean, and Kelly, but… Sunday night, he’s got a pile of techs getting together to get ready for his Commission, which starts on Monday.

He should go in, head straight to his computer, and get right to it. He’s got emails coming out his ears, looking for details about this thing, he’s got meetups to plan, he’s got his own overarching blue prints to finish up, and he’s hitting the button for the Morgue, not his own floor.

He walks into the Morgue, and apparently looks like he was shot, or something, because Jimmy looks up from his computer, sees Tim, stands up, puts his hands on his shoulders, gently pushes him toward the chair, and has him sit down.

Then, and this is something Jimmy’s done, maybe, twice, since he’s been the ME, he digs the bottle of scotch he keeps in his desk drawer out, and pours Tim a shot.

“How bad was it?”

Tim shoots back the scotch, and lets it squirm through his system. “We’ve had better days. On the upside, neither Abby or I cried while we were there.”

Jimmy stands behind Tim, rubbing his shoulders. “They’re making your baby cry, and you can’t do anything about it. It’s supposed to hurt.”

Tim looks around. “Where’s Allan.”

“No bodies. He’s got an on-call day.”

Tim nods, and then leans his head back against Jimmy’s tummy and closes his eyes. Jimmy keeps kneading his shoulders, helping to burn some of the tension off. “They sent the MRI to the Doc. Can you take a look?”

“Sure, but it won’t help. I’ll see just about as much as you will. I didn’t train on this. I’m not sure I could pick out which bit is which, let alone on someone as small as Sean.”

Tim sighs.

“Appointment is coming up soon. Just a bit more wait, and then you get to have someone who’s spent his whole career learning this stuff tell you what’s going on.”

That gets another nod.

Jimmy bends down and kisses Tim’s forehead. “And that matters fuck all, because he’s our boy.”

Tim nods again.
He’s in the elevator, heading to his office, and he can hear his mother’s voice in his head saying, “Doing things your kids hate is a ton of being a parent.”

He can feel his boy screaming in his arms, furious, scared, and he did it anyway, even though Sean hated it, and…

And he flicks off the elevator. Standing with his head pressed to the door, feeling… He doesn’t know. Like the rug’s been pulled out from under him.

Part of him gets what Abby’s saying, hoping that this can’t be fixed surgically. Sean’ll just be deaf, and maybe he’ll do hearing aids, and that will be that. No handing the screaming baby over to the surgeon who will go cut him open and make him scream even more.

Even if it is for a good cause. Even if he won’t remember it. Even…

Part of him doesn’t want to be the man who makes the choice that makes his boy cry.

His mom’s voice in his head again, “You're the adult, you're the one who knows how to survive in this world, and you will do whatever it takes, even if she hates every single second of it, to make sure she has what she needs to make it through.” She was talking about Kelly, but it stands for Sean, for any child whose life he’s part of.

They’ve done the reading, and more reading on top of that. He’s got his family researching away on this. He knows that, given how severe Sean’s hearing loss is, that if he wants a shot at normal speech, he’s likely going to need cochlear implants.

Even with the implants, he likely won’t have perfect speech or the ability to ‘hear.’ He might be able to follow about 80% of the conversations around him. He’ll have some ability to ‘hear’ what’s going on around him, too. Music won’t just be an abstraction or sensation. Someone yells ‘Duck’ at him, he’ll be able to hit the floor.

And maybe they’ll be able to get that with hearing aids. Probably not.

And if they can’t…

He and Abby are the parents. It’s their job to make the hard choice. It’s their job to take the screaming if screaming gives their son a better shot in life.

He supposes someone with a different history would have an easier time with this. Someone with normal parents could look at this and say, “Here’s the line. This is doing something for the good of your child that is reasonable. This other thing isn’t.”

But his Mom’s voice is still in his head as he turns the elevator back on. “It was done with love.”

And he doesn’t know what to do with that.

For a man with three spouses, Tim’s awfully low on in-laws.

Abby’s parents are dead.
Jimmy’s mom and step-dad, in addition to being people he barely knows, are totally unaware of the fact they are his in-laws.

Breena’s parents, like Jimmy’s, aren’t exactly aware of how related they are, but, he does know them, and they raised one of his favorite people on earth and did a hell of a job at it.

And, unlike Gibbs, Penny, or the rest of the family, Ed and Jeannie aren’t deeply invested in telling him and Abby whatever they think he wants to hear about Sean. That’s the perk of in-laws, they want you to succeed, because they want their kid to be happy, but they aren’t so in love with you as to spare you anything that might annoy you.

He gets into his office, opens up his email, and grabs his phone, calling Breena.

“Tim?” He’ll text her little tidbits during the day, but rarely calls.

“Hey. I was wondering if I could talk to your dad.”

“Oh…” He can tell he’s got Breena flatfooted with that request.

“IT’S… I’LL EXPLAIN TONIGHT. NOTHING TO WORRY ABOUT. JUST, WANT TO TALK TO SOMEONE I KNOW IS A GOOD DAD, WHO’S NOT TOO WORRIED ABOUT BEING NICE TO ME. MIGHT CALL FORNELL FOR ADVICE, TOO.”

“All right. He’s three feet away. We’re doing makeup right now and need our hand. I’ll have to put it on speaker, you want me to head off?”

“You can stay. This isn’t a secret or anything.”

He hears Breena hit the call button, and then Ed’s voice saying, “Tim?”

“Hi, Ed… I was wondering if I could ask you for some advice.”

“REALLY?” Ed sounds stunned by that.

“Yes, really. Umm… Breena tell you much about me and my parents?”

“ENOUGH TO KNOW IT’S A MESS.”

“Yes.” Tim flashes an irked look at his phone, but it doesn’t care much about that, and Ed and Breena can’t see it. “That’s… the nice way of putting it. Uh… Mess… Yeah. I’ve talked with my mom some about it, and… she kept saying it was for my own good, that it was about making sure I’d be able to be on my own, do what I wanted to do, you know, feel-good bullshit.”

“Okay…” It’s clear from Ed’s voice that he’s not seeing the immediate reason for Tim on the phone with him.

“We had the first MRI with Sean and… they’re painless, only take fifteen minutes, he slept for ten of them… And he hated every second he was awake, screamed bloody murder the whole time, and… and depending on what they find next… We may be handing him over to a surgeon to cut him open, drill holes in his skull, and stick little electrodes in his brain… And I don’t want to be saying, ‘But we did it with love’ or ‘it was for your own good’ thirty years from now to a furious adult who thinks I abused him.”

Ed sighs. Tim hears that. And he hears Breena moving around, can feel the way she’s looking at him. And he knows why he’s not talking to anyone else in the family, because they’d just pet him and say, ‘Of course your heart is in the right place and you’re doing the right thing,’ because they love him and want him to feel good about this.

“If you don’t do anything, he’ll grow up deaf and signing. Maybe he’ll be able to talk, maybe not?” Ed asks.

“Yeah. He should, either way, be able to talk. How easy he’ll be for strangers to understand is up to debate. The more he can ‘hear,’ the clearer his speech should be.”

“And there are deaf people who go on to do great things, and they’re part of the wider world, and they’re successful, and everything along those lines. Breena’s told me that about Abby’s parents.”

“Yeah. It’s not as limiting as being blind would be.”

“But it is limiting. And you want him to be able to do anything he wants to do.”

“Yeah.”

“And it’s surgery, and it’ll hurt, and it has risks,” Ed also says.

“Yeah. I try not to think too hard about that. The MRI, which was painless, was hard enough. Drilling holes in his head…” Tim shakes his head, not thinking about what could go wrong with that.

“Tim, be a good dad day in and day out. Be kind to him. Be respectful. Love his mom and sister. Give him a home as free of stress as you can. Support his goals and dreams. Do the best you can for him with everything else in his life, and… If it doesn’t work, he’ll forgive you. Not saying he won’t get pissed at you, but it takes a lot of effort to screw things up so badly that your kids decide to burn bridges with you. If it gets that bad, it’s not an accident, and it won’t be based on one decision he doesn’t approve of. I don’t see you letting things get that bad.”

“Thanks. Needed to hear that from someone who’s not worried about hurting my feelings.”

Ed smirks at that, and Tim can feel it through the line. “Trust me, if it looks like you’re about to do something god-awful stupid with the kids, I will have no trouble smacking you upside the back of the head. Actually, if you weren’t doing a good job with your kids or Abby, you’d already know how I feel about it.”

Tim smiles a bit. “Okay. I’ll let you get back to work.”

Breena takes the phone back and turns it back off speaker. Tim hears the room sounds die off. “How bad was the MRI?”

“Sean’s fine. Abby and I are frazzled. We’ll all live.”

“I know that. But, it had to be bad to get you thinking like that.”

“Just, standing in the elevator, remembering my mom telling me about how when it’s someone you love, you do whatever you need to, and… And I don’t know where the damn line is. He’s screaming and… I know how it feels to me, and it feels different. Like this is necessary, in a way dragging me to swimming lessons wasn’t, but she felt that was necessary, couldn’t let me drown… and… The MRI felt like shit, too, and… And… I want to talk more, but, at home, later.”

“Okay.”

“I love you. I know you can’t say it back. See you tonight.”
“Yep. Bye.”

“Bye.”

When Breena hangs up, Ed glances over to her. “He and Abby okay?”

“He and Abby will be. It’s just hard. His parents put him through a ton of shit, all of it ‘for his own good,’ so now he’s looking at Sean and having a hard time figuring out where the line really is.”

Ed nods at that. “Hardest thing your mom and I ever had to do for you was decide if you needed your arm set. When you broke it, you remember that?”

“A little. I remember hearing it crack, and mom cutting the sleeve of my shirt off. I don’t remember it hurting.”

“It didn’t, or at least you didn’t say it was, and you were never shy about letting us know you were hurting. The EMT thought you were in shock. The Doctor told us that they could just set the bone, but you’d never have full use of your arm again, or they could pin it into place, and you would get the full use, but that meant surgery, and that meant anesthesia, which I’m allergic to, and we didn’t know about you, and maybe infections…” Ed shakes his head. “And we had to decide right then.”

Breena straightens out her left arm, all the way. “And you let them operate.”

“And hated every minute of it. And you were so pissed at us when you got out of surgery and really woke up. You could not believe we let them do that to you, because your arm didn’t hurt, until they got a hold of it.” Ed shakes his head again, little smile starting on his lips. “You didn’t talk to us for three hours. Which was a lot for a three-year-old.”

“I don’t remember that part.”

“No. You remember Mr. Bunn?”

“That little stuffed rabbit?”

“Your Uncle Wes got it for you at the hospital gift shop. You carried that little thing around for the next five years.”

“Yeah, Mr. Bunn I remember.”

Ed smiles at the image of his little girl, the spitting image of Molly, but with long blonde hair and blue eyes, a cast from her fingertips to her armpit, and a small, stuffed, white rabbit clutched against her chest.

“They’re going to do fine by Sean. He hears, he doesn’t hear, it’ll be okay. He’s not going to hate them for one, or a few even, bad decisions. Not when the rest of his home is filled with that much love.”

Breena kisses her dad’s cheek. “Thanks, Dad.”

He smiles at her.

Work helps. Fiddly, detail-oriented work, that requires he pay close attention and keep a lot of balls in the air helps even more.
Granted, that’s part of why he, and team Gibbs were always so good at their jobs. There was always work. Everything else could fall apart or go wrong, but the job was always there to soothe any aches or boredoms or dissatisfactions.

And today is no different.

At the Tech Commission where he floated this idea, he got about fifteen people interested in running/shaping CrimeWeb.

What he didn’t do, and if he’d been thinking, he would have realized was just as important, was get people in place to run the damn Commission.

Since he didn’t do that, it’s fully in his court.

So, he’s collecting each of these people, their teams (because just like Ngyn’s got the NCIS team, they each have a team on this, too) coordinating who’s doing what, and organizing who goes where and when in the week of presentations, making sure they’ve each got time to work the crowd, talk to each other, plan and make new stuff, and, on Friday, have everything set to run a presentation for Penny, Jake, and any other Congress-person they’ve managed to get down to DC for this thing.

He’s also noticing, as he gets into his emails, that there’s a large number of non-tech guys who want to come to this thing. Higher ups from different law enforcement branches, including a few of the bigger state and city departments want invites. Since he hopes this will touch on all of them, he’s tempted to tell them to come join the party.

Since he wants this time and space to be about building a system, not politicking, he’s wary of having them there.

He ends up splitting the difference, inviting each agency to send their own tech delegation, and letting them know that Friday will be show and tell for any non-tech personnel, and they’d be welcome then.

He’s sitting at his computer, looking at the draft of the email that will let the non-federal agencies know his plans on their involvement when it hits him that this, and things like it, is going to be his job from pretty much now on.

Sure, between now and leaving NCIS he’ll work cases, but once he leaves, he probably won’t investigate another case on his own again. He’ll build teams and systems and they’ll investigate.

Hell, when he leaves here, he won’t really be Boss anymore, either. ‘Boss’ is the guy who runs a team or a department. He’s the guy who points everyone in the right direction, but is also doing a lot of the same things they are. ‘Boss’ is, like Gibbs, a sergeant, maybe a Gunny, but definitely a non-con.

And that won’t be him.

For all his, “Don’t call me, Sir, I work for a living,” he’s become ‘Sir.’

Tim’s fully made the leap to officer country. And none of this piddly First Lt. stuff, either. He figures, given what his department will be in charge of, that his rank has to be equivalent of a Colonel, if not higher.
He doesn’t, not the way he meant it when he’d say, ‘Don’t call me, sir. I work for a living,’ work for a living. Not anymore.

And he’s not sure what to do with that.

“Okay, on Sunday night, I’ve got the informal, NCIS team get together,” Tim’s saying to his family as they’re getting the table cleared after dinner on Thursday night.

“Who’s the informal team?” Breena asks as she pokes her baked potato, trying to will herself to take another bite before tossing what’s left of her dinner into the ‘leftovers for lunch’ pile. She doesn’t succeed, so the potato goes into a zip lock baggie, where it might end up part of a future lunch.

“Me, Manner, his pets from CGIS, Ngyn, her Angels, Fielding’s coming in from Dubai and bringing her best tech guy, too. Abby… You want to come?”

Abby sighs, opens and closes her mouth. “Let’s see how bad the case of Mommy brain is that day.” She’s more than tech savvy enough to add to the discussion and offer good ideas, assuming she can kick her brain out of the all nursing/lullabies zone it’s been hanging out in for the last few weeks. But, as she’s carrying a plate to the dishwasher in one hand, and Sean against her shoulder with the other, she’s not feeling very tech savvy.

“I’ll make sure you’re in the count for the dinner reservation.”

She smiles at that. “Thanks.”

“Penny and Jake are coming, too,” Tim says. “Hopefully they’ll give us a heads up on who’s coming Friday and how high we’re gonna have to turn the charm up to get them interested in this thing.”

“Does that mean we’re having Jake and Bishop for Shabbos tomorrow?” Jimmy asks. He’s on washing pots and pans.

“I think so,” Abby replies. “Penny said something about that. Since we’ve got the room, they’re staying at the house during the week.”

“Sarah and Glenn are supposed to be coming, too. Should be a busy night,” Tim says.

“Guess that means we’re on company behavior for the weekend,” Breena says.

“I’d appreciate that. No idea if that’s the sort of thing that would bug either of them, or if it did bug them, if it would bug Jake enough to put a kink in eventually getting CrimeWeb off the ground.”

“But you don’t want to find out,” Jimmy replies.

“Yeah. I’d like to see funding secured and legal status ironed out before adding any potential personal scandals to the mix.”

Jimmy looks around at them. Eight people, in a kitchen, little girls playing on the floor, baby boy in Abby’s arms as she and Tim clear the table. Breena’s salvaging food that didn’t get eaten. He’s washing dishes. “Yeah, we’re the poster kids for scandalous.”

“Tonight on TMZ,” Abby starts in a television announcer voice, “the utterly depraved lifestyle of the McPalmers. Two wives, two husbands, lots of kids, and all the dirty dishes. Tell us all about it, Bob.”
That gets a laugh, and Tim rolls with it, “It’s an open secret that there are four of them, together, and sometimes, every now and again, they buy non-fair trade, non-organic coffee.”

Jimmy adds, “There’s a rumor that sometimes they don’t recycle all of their plastic baggies.” The other three of them make mock-appalled noises at that.

“Once, I saw them out with the kids, and they were feeding the girls French fries, from McDonalds!” Breena adds.

There’s a lot of giggling at that. Finally, when they’re done laughing, as Tim wipes up the table, he says, “Yep, scandalous.”

After getting the table cleared, they put the girls down, and Breena decides to go to bed, too. Before heading up, she and Tim share a wanna talk look followed by a go, rest, this’ll still be here later look from him.

Besides, given the chance of focusing on his doubts about Sean, or focusing on Breena, focusing on Breena’s a hell of a lot easier.

Morning sickness with Abby was kind of cute. (Though Tim is not stupid, so he would never, ever say that out loud.) Yes, she had a few days of feeling pretty green, but she’d take the meds and perk up in about twenty minutes and then it’d be pretty much okay until it was time to take them again the next morning.

Morning sickness with Breena is not cute.

First of all, Breena is METAL. She is the strongest woman he knows. He’s done full body nausea for up to a week, and knows exactly how bad it sucks, and knows that you’ve got to just keep going on but…

It’s day nineteen. She’s on medication and still throwing up three times a day. And apparently, whatever the really horrible morning sickness is (Jimmy told him the name but it went in one ear and out the other) this isn’t it because they haven’t had to hospitalize her for dehydration.

But it’s bad enough.

She’s limp and tired and her skin has a grayish tinge. When she’s not actively working, she’s lying on the sofa or their bed, dozing or full-on sleeping.

They try to keep enough calories in her so that she doesn’t lose too much weight. But day by day goes by and the hollows under her eyes and cheeks get more pronounced. Breena, normally, has a very round face, and usually a plump little tush and nicely round and soft boobs. The boobs are still there, but her face and butt are getting smaller by the day. She’s six pounds down, and the bones on her wrists are starting to get too easy to see.

According to Jimmy, who laughs, but it’s not a happy sound, when Tim mentions it, this is normal. This has happened every time Breena’s been pregnant, but since he wasn’t living with her, let alone watching her this closely, or seeing her naked, he didn’t notice before.

At this point, Tim would rather undergo a vasectomy via weed whacker than ever even remotely suggest that Breena should get pregnant again, let alone be involved in doing it to her.
Jimmy laughs at that, too, and says to him, “Really, two years from now, she’s naked and wet and pink and ovulating and asking for a baby, you’re going to say no?”

“Shit.” Because the only way he will say no to that is if said vasectomy has been procured, preferably without the weed whacker. And he’s got the sinking suspicion that should said vasectomy be procured that both of the girls will be beyond annoyed at him.

“Uh huh, and thus we’re working on baby number four.”

“How can you stand this? I just… Every time I look over at her…”

Jimmy points a very sad smile in Tim’s direction, but he’s looking at the sofa, where Breena was, until she went upstairs ten minutes ago, for an early bedtime. He doesn’t say anything, and it hits Tim that this is probably worse for Jimmy because he’s got the fucking MD and should be able to make things like this better.

But he can’t.

No one can.

And watching a woman they love literally shrink before their eyes is the cost of adding to their family.

Then Tim wants to kick himself. He’s watching it. She’s living it. “Come on,” he says to Jimmy, pulling him toward his laptop.

“What are we doing?”

“Finding something she can keep down, or die trying.”

“Tim, we’ve done them all.”

“Not with me you haven’t, and not with Abby. I can find parts of the web you don’t even know exist.”

“And you think cures for morning sickness will be hiding there?”

Tim just stares at Jimmy, who eventually nods, and both of them sit down, on the sofa, laptop between them, and start googling deep, looking for some miracle that, as of yet, hadn’t occurred to them.

It’s Tim’s night with Sean, so instead of curling up to sleep with his spouses, he’s got Sean on his chest, humming quietly, while he slopps down his bottle.

Right now, Sean’s in a good mood. He’s happily nursing away, looking up at Tim, content and sleepy eyes, little muwf, muwf, muwf sounds of eating dinner filling the night quiet of their home.

Tim strokes his head. He doesn’t have a lot of hair. He’s not bald, but all of his hair is very fine and awfully blond. Soft, silky fuzz under Tim’s palm. His skin is so soft. Baby soft isn’t just a marketing ploy. He’s pale, too. In the light they can see some of the tiny veins at his temples. That’s why he flushed so dark red when he was angry. Not much melanin to cover that up.

His little ears are perfect. Tiny little shells, almost the exact same shape as Tim’s, just smaller.
Tim’s trying to imagine the littlest hearing aids ever. He wonders if they’ll annoy Sean. If they won’t feel right, or if suddenly living in a world with sound will be scary for him.

And if not hearing aids… Cochlear implants still kind of look like hearing aids. There’s the little plastic part that wraps over the ear, just like a hearing aid, but unlike one, it doesn’t attach to something in the ear canal. That piece will have the microphone and the batter. There’ll be the round device that’ll use a magnet to stick to his head. That’ll be the transmitter. Take the sound from the microphone and send it to the part of the implant that’s implanted. A little wire will attach that to the ear part.

Tim’s fingers slip behind Sean’s ear. He’ll have little scars, though, they’ll be behind his ears, hard to see.

And, he’s got no hair real hair length, so for the time being he might be wearing a lot of little headbands to help keep the magnetic transmitter on his head and out of his reach.

His family is good with cochlear implants. But he’s seen the people who aren’t. Read them talking about Deaf people aren’t broken and don’t need to be fixed, and how when parents do this, they take away their child’s choice and risk their lives to try and make them conform to the larger society.

Can’t be Deaf with a cochlear implant. Can’t decide in favor of cochlear implants without making the judgement that Deaf is bad. That seems to be the thinking of that side.

Most of that makes him uncomfortable. He doesn’t think Deaf is bad or broken. “How about, Deaf is difficult, and I don’t want your life to be any more difficult than it has to be?” Tim sighs at that. He should probably talk to Sarah again. He has the sense he was too snippy with her about that when they last talked. She’ll be around tomorrow night, so that’s something.

Sean’s nursing slows down, and Tim jiggles him a little. Yes, he too would like to go back to sleep, but if Sean doesn’t finish this, they’re both going to be up again sooner than they want to be.

His eyes jerk open and he sucks a bit more intensely.

Tim kisses his forehead, and again strokes the back of his ear, where the cuts would go.

When it comes down to it, this is risking Sean’s life. The chance of death is small, but it’s there, and it’s real. Of course, that was/will be true with his vaccinations, too, and they didn’t think twice about that. Some kids are allergic to them, some kids really do have bad effects from them, but those effects are rare, and they didn’t blink. Risk mumps or risk the possibility of an allergic reaction to the mumps vaccine. No brainer, bring on the vaccines.

But no-cochlear-implants isn’t precisely the same as skipping the vaccinations. Not operating doesn’t open Sean, or anyone else’s kids, to any danger.

Not physical danger.

Anything that requires hearing will be off the list for Sean. Not in the traditional sense of he can’t be a musician. There are deaf musicians, just like there are blind painters… photographers.

But… Military, that’s out. Or anything else where a team member has to get your attention fast. Can’t be a cop if your partner can’t shout an instruction across a room, or street, to you. He’s literally laying here, and for that matter so is Sean, because when Gibbs yelled run, he ran. Who knows if he’d have made it out of that explosion if he hadn’t been able to hear that.

Most sports… team sports at least. Out for the same reason. Sean could probably be a hell of a swimmer or runner, but if he can’t hear the instructions yelled at him…

School… Walk around for years with two little devices on his head, or walk around for years with a person who has to translate everything said around you into sign. Can’t lip read if the teacher is speaking the instructions while writing the problem with her back to you on the board.

Different school. With tons of other Deaf kids. That’d take care of that problem. Until Sean’s out doing anything else. Yes, their family will sign. They’ll do everything they can to keep his home life as easy as possible for him, but one day Sean will leave their home.

Sean’s eyes are drooping again, and this time the bottle is almost done. “Okay. Come on, we’re not solving this tonight.”

He takes the bottle away, shifts Sean so he’s lying on his tummy, across Tim’s knees, and starts the gentle percussion on his back to get the gas bubbles out. A few moments of gentle thumping, a not even remotely gentle belch, and Tim’s got an extremely satisfied and sleepy little boy on his hands.

Tim cuddles him for a few more moments before lying him on his back on the bed next to him.

It’s clear Sean doesn’t remember earlier today. He won’t remember this surgery. (If there is surgery.) And Ed’s right, he may not like how they make this decision for him, but…

But he doesn’t loathe his mom because she made him learn how to swim. Or made him run around and do sports when he didn’t want to. Or made him always get the extra credit. Or…

Or…

Actually yes, he’s pissed about all of it. Still. Because there was nothing, until he got out of their house, that was ever good enough as it was.

Ed and Jeannie figured out how to have high standards for Breena without tying her sense of self-worth into her ability to get As. They managed to let her be interested in the things she liked without getting offended about them. He knows there had to be times when they made her do things she didn’t want to do, but they also let her do things she wanted to do, and supported the things she wanted to do, even when they weren’t the things they wanted her to do.

And his parents didn’t.

The things Breena’s parents didn’t want her to do were genuinely bad for her. Things that would severely limit her future choices. (Like getting pregnant in high school.)

The things his parents didn’t want him to do were bad for the future of Admiral Timothy McGee. (Like spending time writing role play adventures instead of outside, running around, building up his lung capacity, so he could pass the damn physical for Annapolis.) The only future choice for him that they approved of. They were working to limit his choices, force him into one “perfect” future, not give him the tools to be any Tim McGee he wanted to be.

And that’s the line.

He lays his hand gently on Sean’s tummy. Hearing aids, implants, whatever comes next, it’s about making sure that Sean’s got every choice he could possibly want.
Jimmy and Abby get up a bit earlier than usual, head downstairs, and get cooking. They creep back up the stairs, with smiles on their faces, just about the time Breena’s blinking her eyes open.

She gives both of them a confused look, because they’re beaming down at her from both sides of the bed, and Jimmy’s holding out a cup like it’s the Holy Grail.

“You wanna try?” he asks.

Honestly, no. She’s not, even on a good day, a leap out of bed with a smile on her face kind of gal, and right now isn’t a good day. On top of that, she doesn’t want to put anything into her body. She’d live on air right now, like an orchid, if she could. And they’re brandishing food at her.

But she’s not an orchid. So she sighs, sits up slowly, feels her head spin and stomach lurch, and takes the cup from Jimmy.

The smell isn’t revolting. There’s a start. Mint, sweet, vanilla. It’s green. Doesn’t look chunky or gritty, so there’s something.

Breena takes a little sip of the smoothie. Very tentative, just letting it touch her tongue, and lucky for her, this time her body doesn’t immediately respond to her attempts to nourish it by rebelling. It is minty, and sweet, little vanilla in there, maybe ice cream or yogurt, she’s not sure. She takes a slightly larger sip, actually swallowing some, and again, she’s able to get it down.

“What is it?” she asks.

“The brainchild of Tim, Jimmy, and I, along with every pregnancy website ever written. Whole milk, organic mint ice cream, fresh mint, ginger, two TUMS, vanilla protein powder, a little honey, an iron-free pre-natal vitamin, and a partridge in a pear tree. If you can keep it down, it’s half a day of nutrition and a third of a day of calories.”

She takes another small sip. “It’s not bad.” Granted, in any other situation this isn’t anything she’d want a lot of, but… It’s not immediately causing her stomach to attempt to leap out of her body, and that’s even with her not having had one of her pills yet.

“If you like them, we’ll have them available around the clock,” Jimmy says. They hear a small wail, and realize Tim and Sean will be joining them soon.

Breena nods, tiredly. Puking all the time means she’s not getting any energy from food, feeling sick means she’s not getting any solid sleep. She takes another sip, very tentative. This is usually when her body notices that she’s attempted to feed it something, and starts sending clear get to the bathroom signals, but it hasn’t happened, yet.

“Is this agreeing with you?” Abby asks.

Breena gently knocks on her wooden dresser, takes another small sip, and grabs her daily anti-nausea tab.

Sex comes and sex goes. That’s just part of being alive and loving.
And, granted, though he wouldn’t admit it to anyone (except maybe Jimmy) but there was a small, horny, lizard-brained part of Tim that was thinking that with two wives, the whole ‘goes’ part of life could be cut down even further.

He didn’t exactly have a blast with the nine weeks between pelvic rest and somewhat regular-ish sex (sort of) starting up again when Kelly was born, but there weren’t any other options, so that was that.

And he was kind of hoping, even before the four of them moved into this relationship fully, that, while Abby was healing up from Sean, that Breena could, on occasion, lend him a hand, so to speak.

That would be before they had the brilliant idea of having a newborn at exactly the same time they got Breen pregnant, resulting in vicious morning sickness.

The lizard-brained part of Tim does not consider this the brightest plan they’ve ever had.

And, he’s not exactly proud of this, but... he misses sex. A lot. He remembers Jimmy’s comments about going back to being best buddies with your hand, and yeah, he and Ms. Lefty have been getting to know each other real good again, but... It’s not exactly doing the job.

And, it’s also true that Abby’s not entirely out of the game. But she’s interested in very soft, very gentle, very one-or-the-other-of-them-but-not-both-husbands-at-once sex maybe every week, or more realistically, once every ten days, and... There are two guys in the equation right now, who will happily provide Abby with all the sex she could possibly want. So, that’s working out great for her. But, that cuts the number of opportunities for sex with a woman in half for Tim and Jimmy.

The lizard-brained part of Tim is quite aware of the fact that he somehow ended up with two wives and half as much sex, and that was not the deal he thought he was signing up for.

But again, sex comes and sex goes and...

Cuddling is good. He loves warm bodies all around him. He is getting all the cuddling he could possibly want and then some.

He’s not nearly as tired as he was this time with Kelly, because with two extra parents in the mix, he’s getting more sleep. (Granted, right now after his night with Sean, he’s not exactly feeling like he’s well rested or has a spring in his step.)

And his emotional needs are beyond taken care of. Feeling a bit off, want someone to talk to, need to hash an idea out... He’s got options galore.

But the sex fountain is looking awfully dry right now.

And he doesn’t want to be the asshole who’s pushing for sex when his ladies aren’t feeling well. It’s not like they’re just brushing him off here. He’d rather have sex with himself for the rest of his life than be the guy who whines about wanting to get laid to someone who is legitimately hurting.

But, god, he’s HORNY. He’s dreaming about sex, waking up with his dick rock hard and pressed against whoever’s next to him. And it’s not like ten days is anything like a record for him. (Though these days he’s not sure how he went entire years at a time with no sex with another person. He knows he did it, but... no idea how. The only guess he has is that he wasn’t going cold turkey back then.)

But, he’s at cold turkey right now.

And he doesn’t like it.
He’s only tangentially thinking about any of this, because right now, he’s in the shower, on his own, taking care of himself (quickly) when Jimmy breezes in, pulls back the curtain, and both of them sort of freeze, Tim with his hand on his dick, and Jimmy with the shower curtain in his hand.

For a second, they just stare at each other, not sure of what to do about this.

“Uhhh…” Comes out of Jimmy. Which is more verbal than Tim manages to be.

Finally, Jimmy steps in, staying at the far end of the shower, and says, “If I head back out there, they’ll wonder what’s up.”

Tim slowly nods, realizes he’s still holding himself, and lets go.

“You don’t have to stop.” Jimmy shrugs a bit. “I figured you’d get out before I got done, and I’d do the same thing.”

Tim nods slowly, but doesn’t immediately grab himself again, but he doesn’t know why. “Not like you haven’t seen it before.”

Jimmy inclines his head. Then his eyes narrow a bit. “Actually, I haven’t seen,” he eyes Tim’s hand, which is resting on his thigh, “that before.”

“If I’ve got a free hand, I touch myself when I go down on the girls, if they aren’t doing it for me.”

“I’m not looking at your dick if you’re going down on the girls.”

Tim inclines his head at that, too. If Jimmy’s kissing one of the girls, he’s mostly watching mouth and pussy, or whatever he’s doing to himself or the other girl. Mostly, he’ll check and see what Jimmy’s doing, too. Jimmy so turned on playing with the girls he’s stroking himself is part of what makes all of this stuff good.

Tim rolls his eyes a little, feeling a bit silly, but… he wants to get off, he’s still hard, and he’s not going to get another decent shot at it until after Shabbos, which given the invite list, will run late into the night, plus this guy has been with him while he’s gotten off basically every other way he can get off… so… why not? Not like Jimmy’s not in the exact same almost-no-sex boat he’s in. Not like he’s not going to do himself, too.

His hand finds his dick again, his eyes close, and he starts stroking. Quick, firm, getting the job done, not dragging anything out or particularly making love to himself. He’s trying to get into a fantasy again, but he’s very aware of Jimmy staring.

Jimmy’s watching, closely, not touching himself. Tim can’t see it, but he can feel it, and he’s almost feeling uncomfortable with that level of scrutiny. Finally, his eyes pop open and he says, “It can’t be that different from what you do to yourself.”

“It’s not, just…” Jimmy steps closer to Tim, and pulls him a little closer, too. There’s still a good six inches between them, and Tim turns them a bit more, so Jimmy’s getting some of the hot water, too.

“Just…” Tim’s eyeing Jimmy. This didn’t work out all that hot the last time it was just the two of them, but he’s not seeing a girl about to jump into the shower with them, but honestly, right now… Better than just by himself.

“The metaphorical desert island.”

Tim nods. He got the general idea of where Jimmy wants to go, but not sure of the details, though.
“Do you want to…” He leaves it open for Jimmy to fill in the blanks.

“Do you?”

That doesn’t help Tim figure out what Jimmy’s thinking of doing. He thinks of what could possibly be on the menu and decides he doesn’t care where Jimmy wants to go, it’ll be better than where he is now.

“Yeah.” Tim wants to get off. That’s really all he wants right now. Okay, not all he wants, he wants Abby and Breena and Jimmy everyone happy and healthy and hot and slick and all wrapped around him and lips and breasts and pussy and wet slippery thrusting and tight clenching muscles and moans and gasps and sex. He wants sex. Lots and lots and lots of sex. He wants sex in every color, position, speed, and place possible, and he wants all of it NOW.

Jimmy licks his lips, and then steps a bit closer, but still leaving a few inches between them, and kisses Tim.

Tim sighs a bit, feeling Jimmy’s lips warm and firm against his. They’re getting pretty good at kissing each other, and it’s been a while since Tim’s gotten anything more erotic than a quick, affectionate peck. He sighs again, sucking Jimmy’s bottom lip, and as he starts getting into the kiss, he feels how stressed out he’s been, with Sean, with work, with short sleep, with Breena sick, and all the rest of it, and some of that starts to bleed off in a way it doesn’t when he’s fucking himself.

Tim’s kissing back, and he hears Jimmy purr a little, along with the slippery wet sound of a hand on a dick. Since the dick in question isn’t his, and neither of his hands are doing anything right now, he’s thinking he’s got the idea of Jimmy’s plan of attack.

And it’s not a bad one. This is well within his comfort zone. So, he kisses back a little harder, and starts to stroke himself again.

There’s a moment of figuring out where hands and dicks go, so they’re not bumping into each other, but a quarter step to the left takes care of that, and keeps them close enough to kiss easily.

Yeah, this is better. Way less lonely, and lips and cock are way better than cock alone. Tim wraps his right hand around Jimmy’s neck, shifting a bit so more of his side is pressed against Jimmy, but that’s not very useful because Jimmy’s a righty and he’s pinning Jimmy’s arm to his side. Which Jimmy lets him know about by making a sharp, annoyed sound. Tim shifts back again, making sure they’ve got enough room to move, but close enough to kiss.

After a few more seconds, he feels Jimmy’s left hand tracing down his back. Just stroking up and down his spine, which is nice, too. Not earth-shatteringly erotic or anything, but nice. More of a comforting touch than a turn on touch.

A way of underscoring that he’s doing this with another person, not just the figments of his imagination.

Though his imagination is doing good things for him, too. In his mind the girls are here, watching, wet and naked, eyes wide, skin pinking up, cooing at them, about to leap in and join them.

Tim’s getting into it way faster now. Lips and tongue and fingers, yes, very good, and okay, the little brush of the back of Jimmy’s hand against his tummy every now and again is a little distracting, but it’s not bad.

Slippery, stroking sounds, and soft little moan-grunts, with heavier breathing. He’s missed that sound. He’s never really considered the sound of jerking off very sexy, but that’s probably because he’s never done it with another guy. But it sounds like sex. Wet and slippery hands and dicks moving fast. And those soft little grunt-moans of Jimmy’s. Jimmy making noises like that is hardwired into his mind as sex, so that helps, too.

Tim tightens his hand a bit and pumps faster, kissing harder, and Jimmy’s got his bottom lip between his teeth, nipping at him.

God, yeah, this is working. It’s good. His dick is hard, and his balls are tight, the rest of his body feels ready, primed, waiting to go off, and the tingles are just about to start when what happens after those tingles start hits him, and Tim stops cold.

Jimmy, who’s a few steps behind him, not nearly as ready to get off, notices and opens his eyes, breaking the (currently one-sided) kiss.

“What?”

“You’re standing right in front of me.”

Jimmy nods. In that they were kissing two seconds ago, and are now looking each other in the eye, that’s an exceptionally obvious statement.

Tim’s looking at him like he shouldn’t have to fill in any more blanks than that. And after a few more seconds of Jimmy looking somewhat confused, he finally gets it. “Oh.”

“Yeah.”

Jimmy thinks about it for a moment, then he shrugs. “Sad though it is to say, this is the best sex I’ve had in five days, so… we’re guys. We cum. Not like I’ve never gotten any of yours on me before. Not like I haven’t squirted you before. Is it a problem for you?”

Tim feels silly but he says, “Not really. Just, didn’t want to spray you by surprise.”

Jimmy licks his lips, gives Tim his best, I can’t believe you just said that, look, and says with Saharan dryness, “I’m vaguely familiar with how the equipment works.”

“Yeah, I know,” Tim adds, snark radiating off of him, “but, did you think it through before suggesting this?”

“It’s not like you’ve got your dick in my mouth.”

“I did in January, and I’m wondering if how that should have ended is part of why you froze and backed off.”

Jimmy sighs, shakes his head a bit, and cups his hand around the back of Tim’s head, pulling him in for another kiss. When he breaks it, he says, “Two teaspoons of cum, on my belly, in the shower, isn’t the end of the world. But this is sounding like it might be an issue for you.”

It is, a little, but it’s not just on his side of this. “I asked Abby before I came on her, and it’s one of Breena’s hard lines. It’s... I don’t know, polite.”

Jimmy nods, a quiet chuckle underlining his amusement at that idea. Tim isn’t wrong about that. Then he adds, “It’s not a kink or anything, but I like cum. You know, if I’m watching porn, or me with the girls, or you with the girls... I like seeing it.” He shrugs a bit. “Sign that everyone had a good time, you know?”
“Okay.” Tim thinks for a second about not much of anything and then, “Would you blow me?” pops out of his mouth. He blushes a bit at that, shocked he said it. Obviously, he’s tired enough his filters aren’t working too well.

Jimmy eyes him for a second before saying, “Is that a request or a question?”

“Uh…” Tim’s not entirely sure how that got out of his mouth because it appeared to have entirely bypassed his brain to do it. He’s pretty sure he wasn’t thinking about it until he heard himself say it, but now he’s got to respond to Jimmy and… “Mostly just asking… Wouldn’t mind if it happened though.”

Jimmy nods at that. He certainly wouldn’t mind a mouth wrapped around his dick, too. But he does know that if he gets down on his knees and even tries to give Tim a blow job without inviting the girls to watch, they’ll pout. And, hell, if he’s going to do that, and if the girls are watching, that might actually get them interested in having sex, and he’s sure as hell not missing that opportunity, either.

“Not today. Here.” He settles against the shower wall, and pulls Tim to him, Tim’s back to his chest. “Lean into me.”

Tim does, then reaches up and moves the water so it’s flowing over both of them, and then settles back against Jimmy. It feels nice, warm skin on his, arms around him. His eyes shut and he relaxes a bit more, waiting to see where Jimmy takes this.

Jimmy kisses his cheek. “We’re ever horny enough for it when the girls can play, or watch, and then, yes, I’ll try that again.”

“If they’re feeling good enough to play… I mean, no offense, but…”

Jimmy nods, kissing Tim’s neck. If he’s looking at the option of a blow job by Tim, Abby, or Breena, Tim’s at the bottom of that list, by several miles. “Yeah, I know. But… It’s an option. I don’t think I can ask them to do it to me and not be willing to do it in return. But I also think that’s not the sort of thing we should do without giving them an opportunity to watch.”

Tim nods. “Makes sense.” He turns his head and kisses Jimmy again.

Jimmy’s hand curls around Tim’s dick, and Tim sighs into the kiss.

He’d started to go soft when he was talking to Jimmy, but his hand, warm, firm, not his own, is very rapidly getting him back up to full-on hard. A little soap to make everything slick helps even more, and not knowing exactly what Jimmy’s going to do, how fast, how hard, has Tim ramping up fast.

He’s rocking his dick in counterpoint to Jimmy’s hand, which means he’s also rubbing his butt against Jimmy’s dick, which is nice, too. Jimmy seems to like it, too, he’s kissing Tim harder, holding him tighter. Then he stops, and Tim whimpers, but Jimmy scoots him a step forward, grabs the soap, squirts it onto his own dick, and quickly pulls Tim back to him, kissing harder, rubbing between his butt cheeks harder, too.

Tim moans, that’s awesome, all slick and slippery and rubbing on one of his favorite spots. He crosses his legs, and Jimmy groans, appreciating the extra snugness.

Jimmy’s hand is tight and hot and Tim’s fucking into it hard. This time, he’s getting off. None of this close and stopping stuff.

God, so hard, and so tight, and full and slick and… Tim’s biting Jimmy’s lip, then breaks the kiss, not wanting to bite too hard. Can’t send him off to work with an obvious love bite. He leans his head against Jimmy’s neck, trying not to moan too loud, and Jimmy speeds up a bit faster, hand tighter as he thrusts harder against Tim, and that does it… “God… Oh God…” he’s tingling and pulsing and Jimmy’s stiff behind him, biting his shoulder, hard, moving fast and erratic.

They’re both breathing fast, flushed pink, and with certain bits of them extremely well-washed. Tim gives Jimmy a gentle kiss, and Jimmy kisses back. For a moment, they hold the quiet, and then Jimmy grabs the shampoo. “You doing your hair today?”

Tim shakes his head, stepping back, adjusting the showerhead to its normal position, letting the water rinse Jimmy’s cum off of him. “I’m pretty much done.”

“Okay.”

Tim kisses him again, makes sure he’s all rinsed off, and steps out of the shower.

When he goes back into his bedroom, Abby’s nursing Sean, Breena’s lying on her side cuddling with Anna, while sucking on one of the ginger candies that don’t do much, but don’t seem to hurt, either. Tim notices there’s an empty smoothie glass next to her, and he smiles at that.

Kelly and Molly are on the floor showing off their big girl skills by successfully putting clothing on. Molly’s mostly dressed. Kelly’s got one sock on. Not bad for not quite two years old, not bad at all. He kneels next to the girls to help them get the rest of their clothing on.

Abby looks up at Tim, smirks a bit, and says, “Good shower?”

He doesn’t blush. “Uh, yeah.”

She nods and very gently pokes Breena, who slowly looks up (moving fast makes her feel more nauseous) and a wide smile breaks over her face. “You win.”

Abby nods.

Tim stares at them.

“She had nine days. I had seven,” Breena says.

He opens and closes his mouth. “Okay, the sound proofing in there isn’t that bad, how…”

“Look at yourself in the mirror,” Abby says.

So he does, and on his shoulder, is a perfect, bright red, match of Jimmy’s teeth.

“Does he have any interesting love bites?” Breena asks.

“Only if you snuck in and put one on him when we weren’t paying attention.”

That gets a little smirk out of Breena. “Maybe next time.”

Tim crosses over to her and kisses her shoulder. “Hope so.”
Though it’s true that if the three of them are going to NCIS, they take two cars, it’s also true that on most days, if it’s just two of them, they take two cars. No way to know until they’re there what the day will bring. And, it’s true, for Tim, most of the time, he’s done at traditional quitting time. It’s true for Jimmy that he works late at least two days a week. And Abby… When she’s there… No way to tell. Her crew means she’s working fewer late nights, but fewer and none aren’t the same thing.

So, at least two cars always go to NCIS to make sure that everyone can get home whenever it is it’s going home time.

Today, it’s Tim and Jimmy to NCIS. Abby’s got the next week off on maternity leave, and then she’s back to the grind, too.

Tim’s glad to have some time alone in his car to think.

Mostly, he’s thinking about today, tonight, and getting everyone together for Shabbos, but… he’s also thinking about Jimmy… a niggling sensation that things should feel… different.

But they don’t. Shower sex with Jimmy. Just the two of them. No women in the equation at all. Hell, once they really got going, he wasn’t even fantasizing about the girls being part of it. That should be a big deal, right?

But it’s not. Mostly, he just feels the way he does any other morning he manages to get laid before going to work, relaxed, happy. In a nutshell, he’s feeling pretty damn good.

And right now, he’s not looking any gift horses (or hand jobs) in the mouth.

Jimmy’s driving in twenty minutes behind Tim. He made the detour to drop the girls off at daycare before heading to work.

And like Tim, he’s in a pretty good, post-sex sort of mood.

Unlike Tim, he is looking gift handjobs (frotting?) in the mouth (fist?).

Mostly, he’s wondering what’s different this time. As Tim said, last time, he froze. This time… hell, this time he took the lead, and given a shot to back out (off?) he upped the ante.

And, given that he’s feeling pretty loose and happy, obviously, it worked.

Why?

He supposes he could be a bit hornier, or at least a different flavor of horny, than he was last time. Five days without sex, two without jerking off… not a record by any means, and he did really want to get off, but he wasn’t at willing to fuck a barracuda level, not like last time.

He was craving the emotional connection that sex has and masturbation doesn’t more than he was last time. Maybe… Or maybe this time he found the right spot on the line and didn’t overbalance lonely with horny by quite so much.

Maybe…

He’s not sure.
Breena said do what feels good, and go at it a kiss at a time. He supposes that’s more of what this morning meant. Probably.

The best Jimmy can come up with is that this time he didn’t throw himself at full speed into the wall to see if it could climb it. He went at it, sideways… probably. He was pretty sure what Tim was doing in there when he headed in. The unless it’s a hair and skin day, the guy only takes five minute showers, so if it’s minute ten of this morning’s shower and he smelled like shampoo yesterday, they all know what he’s up to.

Jimmy had an awfully good idea of what he was walking into and where he was going to go with it.

And with just the two of them… They staked out some comfortable territory, and stayed in it.

And maybe next time, comfortable territory will be an even wider area. Or not. Maybe it’ll be another hand job in the shower. Though, as he’s thinking more about Tim’s blow job comment, and about how the girls react to them playing together, he’s thinking… depending on if they’re using the extra McPalmer bedroom as a guestroom for Bishop and her husband, that maybe Saturday night might be a good time to see about expanding this area further.

Maybe it will get them interested in playing, too.

Yeah, Jimmy’s feeling pretty good this morning, but that doesn’t mean he’s not craving sex with the girls, too.

Maybe, if he’s really lucky, Breena will keep being able to drink those smoothies (as of him heading out with the girls, the first smoothie of the morning was still located inside of Breena), actually get some food into her, and her energy level with perk up some, and between them messing around and her feeling a little better, maybe they might be able to get something good with all four of them.

A man can dream, right?
Baby Central

Somehow when he wasn’t looking, Tim’s home turned into baby central.

His life turned into baby central.

And nowhere is this more clear as he heads into their house for Shabbos, and finds: four small children ranging from barely three to not quite two months old; one nursing woman on the cushy chair (with the smallest of the babies in her arms), one pregnant woman on the sofa, complaining about how her hips hurt, to the other pregnant woman, who is not nearly so far along, but is bitching about puking all the time, to the third pregnant woman, who is a guest, but just gotten past the puking all the time phase, and isn’t quite into the hips hurt all the time phase, and is happily enjoying the sweet spot that is eighteen weeks pregnant.

And, while he’d much rather all the ladies be comfortable, he’s awfully content with this kid-filled setup.

He heads in, kisses Abby, kisses Sean, kisses Breena, completely forgetting that Bishop and Jake are outside of this, and rapidly saves by kissing Ziva, too. He grins over at Bishop, “Got a thing for pregnant ladies. You want a hello smooch, too?”

“I’m good, McGee.” Though she does stand up for a hug.

His hand hovers over her belly, asking permission to touch her tiny little baby bump. She nods.

“Boy or girl?” he asks.

“Two more weeks to find out,” Jake says, coming in from the kitchen, where he’s been helping get dinner ready. Jake shakes his hand, somewhere between ridiculously proud of having spawned a new life, and shell-shocked because the Gibbs clan house at Shabbos time is not quiet or calm. There are small people all over the place, and one of them (Tim steps over and grabs Anna, starting to bounce her a bit, getting her calmed back down) is snuffling against her uncle’s chest.

Tim reads that look on his face, grins at him, looks around, figures out what the problem with Anna is, and then kneels on the floor, grabbing Anna’s pacifier back from Kelly, who somehow snagged it, thus calming baby A, and pissing off baby B. Anna stops whining, happily sucking away. Kelly bursts into tears. “Come on, Kelly, let’s find yours.” He picks Kelly up, and says to her, “Hello.”

She’s too upset about the lost pacifier to care about being greeted. “Abby?” he asks.

“Last seen when she toddled into the kitchen to see what Pop was up to.”

Tim nods at her. “Okay. Come on, Kelly, let’s go see if Pop has your paci.” The idea of maybe getting her pacifier back calms Kelly down a bit.

In the kitchen, it appears that Gibbs, Penny, and Ducky are on dinner tonight, though Tony’s leaning against one of the counters “keeping an eye on things.” Tony holds out the missing pacifier. “Saw this on the floor a minute ago. Figured one of them would be looking for it soon.”

“Thanks.” Tim heads to the sink.

“Already washed it.”
“Double thanks,” he pops the pacifier back into Kelly’s mouth, and suddenly he’s got his little love back. She snuggles into him, all happy and cuddly. “Oh, now you’re happy to see me, huh?”

He's answered by a soft little head on his shoulder and blissful sucking.

Kelly’s immediate need taken care of, Tim hugs the adults, and gives Penny a kiss, too. She raises and eyebrow at him when he does it, he’ll usually hug her, but he’s not that much of a kisser. He shakes his head with a tight, small motion, letting her know to just go with it.

He’s hugging Tony, who steps back after, looking at Tim, and shakes his head. “When did we become these guys?”

Tim raises an eyebrow.

“What, nine years went by without us touching unless it was a headslap or someone was going to die, and now we hug ‘Hello?’ I saw you at lunch today. Not like we’ve been apart for years or something.”

Tim inclines his head, everything Tony’s saying is true, but it doesn’t much matter to him. Now, he’s a guy who hugs people. Well, people he likes. He’s never going to be Abby-level everyone gets hugs, but his family… sure.

Of course, Tony could be complaining, so… “You think it’s a bad thing?”

“No, just…” Tony looks around at this house full of people, full of family, “feeling aware of the change, right now. I hugged Bishop. I almost hugged Jake. When did we become those guys?”

Tim nods, getting it. He sees Gibbs give Tony a sincere nod, too.

Tim hears the door open, only three people it could be, and at least for him, all three of them will get hugs. “Well, get ready for more of it.” He pokes his head around the fireplace separating the kitchen from the living area, and spies Jimmy. “Hey!” He heads out of the kitchen to hug his husband, and not kiss him hello.

“Are we telling them?” Sarah asks Glenn as they drive toward the Gibbs family Shabbos.

“Isn’t that why we made sure to have tonight free?” he asks. Getting a free Friday night for Sarah is easy enough. She just shifts her work around. Anytime she’s got a computer and an internet connection, she can work.

Glenn’s schedule is a bit more packed and concrete. As an arson investigator for the DCFD, he’s working every minute he possibly can. It feels like every insurance company on earth is battering his department with an unending string of calls. And when he hangs up the phone and opens his email, there’s an unending string of requests from teardown crews begging for updates. Neighborhoods can’t be demolished until he and his people have written their reports.

She nods at him, smile spreading over her face. “Yeah… I don’t know… Saying it…”

He grins back at her, understanding how saying it makes things real, as he pulls into the driveway, seeing the wide array of cars around them. “Packed house. News’ll go wide when you tell this “Yeah.” She squeezes his hand. He squeezes hers back.

Once Jimmy’s in and been greeted by everyone, Jake pulls him aside. “Penny says we’re in your room, and… Breena’s already said it’s okay, but… Really, is it okay? I mean… I don’t want to be putting your pregnant wife out of her bed.”

Jimmy nods at Jake. “It’s okay. When we were getting this place wrapped up, we were racing Christmas, trying to get it done fast, you know?” Jake nods, he gets that idea. “Anyway, we have space for guests, but when we got done with all of the main living areas we kind of stopped, ’cause, all of our rooms are done, so, guest rooms aren’t done, yet. And no, I’m not sending your pregnant wife up to sleep on bare carpet.

“I’m sure, eventually, we’ll feel like doing more shopping and decorating and putting furniture together, but…”

Jake smiles. “When we moved to DC, we still had things in boxes two years later. We ran out of gas and didn’t feel like unpacking them.”

“Exactly. Anyway, when we’ve gone to Breena’s parents’ place, we bunk with the McGees, it’s not a problem. Isn’t the first time we shared a room, and, if it’s big enough, a bed, won’t be the last. Neither of them snore, and I’m the bed hog, so we’re good.”

“Really?” Jake doesn’t look completely comfortable with that.

“Really. Besides, you can call it a crash course in parenthood. You can hear all the little guys from our room. Sean’s up every three hours, and at least one of the girls wants a bit of attention at some point in the night, too.” Jimmy gives him a mean grin. “It’ll be fun.”

Jake goes pale. This whole place is a crash course in parenthood. And sure, some of it is amazing, Ellie snuggling Sean is hitting all of his wife with his baby buttons and making him feel… he honestly doesn’t have words for it, protective and lovey and husbandly. That’s probably it. He feels more like a husband than he ever has before.

But the racket of four babies in one place is making him think they do not need to have four kids.

Jimmy’s still grinning at him, seeing it on his face, nodding, “Yeah, Tony gets that look a lot, too.”

Jake nods back at that. He can imagine.

Behind them the door opens again. Which means Jimmy’s the first one who gets to hug Sarah and her fiancée. “Hi!”

“Hey, Jimmy,” she gives him a squeeze. “Who’s this one? We have a working dinner tonight?”

Glenn shakes his head, taking Sarah’s coat. “You know who this is, or would if you ever turned on the TV. Penny’s talked about you. Sarah’s just never seen a picture.” Glenn extends his hand. “Congressman.”

Jake laughs wryly at that, shaking back. “Don’t remind me. Jake Malloy. Penny’s talked about both “Of you.” He smiles, and it’s genuine, but also practiced. Jimmy gets the sense that Jake’s moved into politician mode. “Sarah and Glenn, right?”

“Yeah,” Sarah replies.

As they’re waiting in the kitchen to go through the ritual hand washing (which takes a while with a group this large) Tim pulls Sarah aside and says, “I think I was kind of harsh with you when Sean was born.”

She shrugs a bit. “Not like you hadn’t had a very big day.”

His face accepts that out, but he also wants to own up to what he did. “Well, yeah, but… It is going to be hard, and Deaf is difficult, and it is okay to be sad or bothered or… whatever… about him having to deal with that. And I don’t want to look at him and think of it as a handicap and… And it’s still confusing, but…”

She gently bumps his shoulder with hers. “But it’s your job, PapaBear, to jump on anyone who even gets near saying anything to indicate your baby is anything less than perfect. I get it.”

That last bit sounds very sincere, in a way Sarah isn’t usually, which gets Tim’s attention. His eyebrow jumps up. “Do you?”

She grins. “Yeah.” And a slow nod confirms the grin spreading across his face. “For about… eight weeks now…”

He pulls her into a hug. She quietly says to him, “Sean was born two days after the test turned positive, and… Part of it was me freaking out, too.”

He kisses her cheek. “Yeah. So…”

“Announcement later. With dessert? Breena’s pregnant, too, right?”

“Yeah. That hasn’t gone beyond the immediate family, yet. If you’re here, you get to know, but no formal announcement for another month.”

“Okay,” he can tell by the tone of her voice she’s wondering if the baby in question is his or Jimmy’s. His look lets her know they can talk more later, when Bishop and Jake are unlikely to catch the wrong bit of conversation.

Tim pulls back, since it’s their turn for the water, huge smile on his face.

“How was the trip down?” Sarah asks Penny.

“Fine. Getting into and out of New York is an adventure. All of the mess that was New York City, with the added adventure of everyone who is part of the government all in one area trying to get out of the city on Friday afternoon. It’s…”

“Exhilarating!” Ducky adds, a glint in his eye.

Bishop sighs and shakes her head. “Did you know that back in the day he used to race cars?”

Jimmy smiles at his mentor. “The question is what didn’t he used to do. So far I’ll I’ve been able to find is elephant hunting and cannibalism.”

Ducky raises an eyebrow at Jimmy and adds, completely deadpan, “And Morris dancing.” Alas, that joke falls flat due to the deplorable lack of other Brits at the table. He shakes his head and then says, “My dear, racing was only a few times. I built that Morgan for a reason, and that reason was not just to look stylish to get to work.” Ducky grins. “But it was fun. And… there are moments that rekindle that feeling when trying to get onto 95.”

“With his passengers screaming in the back, begging him to slow down,” Jake adds, a tight smile on his face.

Tony’s laughing at that. “You start giving him driving lessons?” he asks Ziva.

She holds up her hands. “I am innocent of that.”

Jimmy’s eyeing him. “You were never a speed demon with the van.”

“Because the only way to get the van up to sixty-five miles an hour in less than a week was to drop it out of a helicopter. With a more responsive vehicle, I’ve been known to… put the pedal to the metal.”

“And enjoy the horrified shrieks of his backseat passengers,” Bishop kids.

“And yet, we’ve all gotten here alive,” Penny says.

“That one’s a speed demon, too. I’m waiting to hear about the two of them in some ridiculous car, helmets on, setting the land speed record for octogenarians on the open road,” Jake says.

“It will be, for that sort of trip, a very sensible car,” Ducky replies.

“Something designed to eat up the miles on those long midwest highways,” Penny adds, both of them grinning at each other, with ideas for Congress’s summer break in mind.

“Just don’t get arrested. We don’t need the scandal,” Jake says, only half kidding. Then he nods toward McGee, “After all, you don’t want your first job at the FBI to be busting your grandma for flouting federal speed limits.”

Tim sniggers at that idea. “I have a feeling I’ll have some bigger fish to catch.”

Sarah and Glenn, who haven’t heard about the FBI gig, spend the next fifteen minutes getting up to date on that, followed by several more minutes on ‘Leaving NCIS? Really?’

Breena’s got another of the smoothies in front of her, to go with a piece of challah, and one, tiny, piece of roast lamb, which under any other circumstance she adores, because Ziva’s recipe involves rubbing it with garlic, black pepper, whole grain mustard, and honey and, even though Penny and Ducky handled most of the cooking tonight, they still used Ziva’s recipe, so it smells amazing, but the one bite she’s taken has settled in her stomach like a lead weight, and she’s got the feeling she’ll be paying for that later.

Tim’s on the far side of the table, but he looks at the smoothie and asks, “Any better?”

She nods, looking not nearly as tired as she has for the most of the last week. (Granted, that’s not a high hurdle to clear.) “Still feel sick all the time, but these have stayed down. Dad was really impressed, first time in weeks I haven’t had to take a ‘break’ at work.”

Tim smiles wide at that.

“When are you due?” Glenn asks.

“Not soon enough,” she says with a wry half-smile. “Early October.”

“Hopefully not too much longer feeling green,” Abby says as Jimmy strokes the back of Breena’s neck.

“Amen,” Breena adds. She takes another sip of the smoothie. Molly’s already left the table, and Anna’s in her highchair on Breena’s left side. She looks at both of her girls. “If previous experience is anything to go by, I’ll be feeling mucky until June.”

Bishop shudders. “Ulgh. I did ten weeks, and that was ten more than I ever wanted to do. Hungry and nauseous the whole time.”

Breena nods at that. “Yep.” She pokes her belly. “Quit it!”

Bishop laughs. “Yeah, for some reason they don’t get that message.”

“Nope.” Breena takes another sip. She pats the cup. “I think I’ve met my new best friend for the next three months.”

Family dinners roll from conversation to conversation. A bit of talk here and there.

“Everyone voting next week?” Jake asks.

That gets some groaning.

“Yeah, that’s how we’re feeling about it, too. This time we should get a winner.” They’re down to seven candidates. It’s possible to, yet again, end up with no two guys with a combined percentage greater than fifty, but it’s unlikely. It’s impossible that they’ll end up with more than one more round. If this goes to April, they’ll be down to three candidates, and there’s no way for two of them to not get over 50% if there’s only four people.

“Woo hoo,” Tony says, voice flat and expressionless, underscoring exactly how much civic devotion is pouring off of this crowd.

“At this point, the only people who are even interested in how this works out are the ones running,” Abbi says sarcastically. (Any candidate she was interested in got booted out of the running two months ago.)
“We’re working on a plan to avoid this next time,” Penny says. “Jake’s especially happy with this, because he’s the one who put the bill forward.”

“Your DC representatives at work.” Then Jake really looks around and thinks, “Okay, that’s just you and Tony, right?” he asks Ziva.

“We’re in the city, too,” Sarah adds.

“What’s the idea?” Glenn asks.

“Approval voting. It’s not my idea. I stole it, but I hope it goes somewhere. Instead of months of run-offs, we get our ballots with all the candidates on it, and we vote for everyone who’d be an acceptable candidate. So, say there’s four thousand guys on there, and you think 200 of them would do an okay job. Vote for all of them. Leave off the guys you hate. Guy with the most votes wins. Guy with the second most votes gets VP. Counting will take a while, but when it’s done, it’s done. That way we don’t get these God-awful elimination rounds. And one guy with a fired up base can’t knock out six other guys with less fired-up bases but wider mass appeal.”

“Anything that cuts this shorter sounds good to me,” Abbi says.

That gets a lot of nods.

“So, what’s happening with your new agents?” Abbi asks Tony as she butters a piece of Challah. “Last I heard, you thought Draga was in love.”

“Holding pattern right now. Officially, you,” he points his fork toward Bishop, who’s got Anna on her lap, “still works for me. So, I’m waiting for you to get off the payroll, and then starting them up together. Draga and I didn’t think having them two weeks apart in their training was a good plan. So, March 20th, we’re breaking in two at once.”

Tony gives Gibbs a _God save me from myself_ look, and Gibbs nods, looking awfully smug. He can’t wait to hear how this works out. He might even decide to drop by NCIS and take a look.

Tim smirks. “You call out Probie, and both of them come? That’ll be interesting.”

Tony shakes his head. “I’m gonna need new nicknames.”

“Johnson and Spader, right?” Jimmy asks.

“That’s them.” Tony sees a little smirk light Tim and Jimmy’s faces. “Johnson’s the girl, so wipe those ideas right out of your heads. I’m the Boss, I can’t be messing around with anything like that.”

That gets a little sniggering. “And when did you ever let something like that stop you?” Abby asks.

“I’m not saying I won’t have them in _my_ head. Just can’t use them out loud.”

That gets more laughing.

“Besides, in a four-man team, it’s the second-in-command who gets to use the nicknames. Draga’s gonna be the one to think them up, and,” he gives Gibbs a good long look, “I’ll pretend to be above it while being quietly amused.”

Gibbs smiles back.
Bishop sees that talking shop isn’t an issue at this table. Yes, they’ve also covered family topics, like how Gibbs is doing on getting Baby DiNozzo’s crib done (one coat of finish and one last sanding, and it’s ready to go), Gibbs and Fornell taking Emily for her first shooting lesson, and Anna looking like she’ll take her first step any day now, but they’ve also covered dead bodies, cases, and Jake and Penny’s political stuff (with a promise of more of that to come with Tim later).

So, with that in mind, as conversation pauses while people chew, she says to Tim, “I’ve got your data sets ready to go.”

“Already?” he wasn’t expecting her to plow through the Navy’s harassment numbers that fast.

“The hard part was getting the numbers, once I had them, baselining was just a matter of setting up demographic groups, sample sizes, and averaging.”

“Better or worse than you were expecting?” Tim asks, wondering how long it’ll be before he’s got the time to get into those numbers and start messing with them. Not next week, that’s all Commission-time. Week after? Maybe.

“Better than the rates for the general population, but they would be, the general population includes everyone who’s already in jail for that sort of stuff. And, of course, our numbers don’t. Worse than I would have liked to have seen.”

“So, real world kind of numbers?” Abby says.

“Pretty much. The Navy and Marines don’t employ angels, just real people, who do stupid and evil things sometimes.”

“Can you do something like that for cops?” Abbi asks.

“Sure. All I need is raw numbers. How many officers, how many complaints, from there I can come up with an ‘average’ number of complaints. I can slice and dice that further. Like, with the Marines, the complaint baseline is higher for stateside units than for people overseas. If I give you one average, suddenly almost everyone in Afghanistan looks like they’re awesome, and every unit out of LeJeune looks like a group of jerks. Comparing like to like gives you a better idea of what’s going on. You want harassment cases for cops against cops or against civilians?”

Tim lights up at that. “I know I’m eventually going to want that, for both.”

Abbi’s nodding. “Same. Though for me, I’d be looking more for internal issues. Use it as a tool for us investigating the rest of the Coast Guard. But it’d be nice to know what’s an average number of complaints for a Coast Guard official. See how often we piss the rest of the world off.”

“The best way for me to give you good numbers on that is for you to collect good data,” Bishop snags another helping of green beans, happily munching a few down. “These are amazing, Penny,” Penny nods at the compliment. Non-pregnant Bishop ate everything that wasn’t nailed down. Pregnant Bishop has eaten everything that wasn’t nailed down, then grabbed the crowbar, pried up the stuff that was nailed down, ate it, and the nails, and the crowbar. How she can do that and stay so tiny is a mystery. “That was the biggest problem I had with the Navy, they’ve got numbers, but are they ‘good’ numbers? How many cases get shifted aside, lost, misplaced, circular filed, in order to make things look better? I just don’t know. Those averages might be way off.”

“Leon’s behind me on this, so we can see what we can do about getting better numbers,” Tim says.
“Keep in mind, if you crank the pressure up too high to keep those numbers low, you don’t get fewer case, you just get people who are better at not reporting what is going on,” Penny says.

Tim nods, filing that way for future use. Any system he builds for this will have to focus just as much on how the reporting side works, making sure they can get the data, as on the cutting down the number of things to report.

“Wedding stuff almost ready?” Abby asks Sarah as they’re all getting started on dessert (vanilla ice cream and Tim’s mint chip cookies). “We’ve got our invite on the fridge.”

Sarah smiles at that, and shakes her head a bit, too. “Just about. Rehearsal dinner is three weeks from today. Wedding three weeks from tomorrow. I’m still getting RSVPs trickling in, and final counts are due soon, but besides that—”

“And twenty million tiny, little details that your Mom’s flipping out over,” Glenn adds. Two hours before they left for dinner, they’d gotten a frantic call about if the catering was offering a vegetarian or vegan option. Apparently one of the cousins is vegan, not vegetarian, and Tori wanted to make sure the food was right.

Given the ‘diverse’ nature of Sarah’s friends and writers, not only is there a vegan option, there’s also a gluten-free one, and a paleo one. This is the first wedding Jimmy’s been invited to, including his own, where there was a meal on the menu that wouldn’t require him to do anything to it to make it edible.

“And mom being mom, wanting to make sure this is so carefully planned as to make the invasion of Normandy look like a fly-by-the-seat-of-your-pants operation, all is well. Tim, you’re coming to the rehearsal, right?”

“That’s the plan. Don’t want to leave you high and dry on the giving the bride away part. I might skip out on the dinner. See how fried I am.” He chooses his words carefully. That could easily be him talking about a lot of work and a little baby at home. Most of the people at the table get the subtext of seeing how long he can take being in a room with his mom.

“We’re fine with that. Not quite three-month-old at home seems like a really good reason to cut out of boring social engagements,” Sarah says, grinning at Glenn, and he smiles back at her. For her and Glenn the rehearsal and rehearsal dinner is a chance to hang out with all their friends and family from out of town. For Tim it’s a shot to spend a lot of time with a bunch of strangers, two people he’d rather avoid, a few family members he’d like to see, and maybe (depending on how much time they’re with the buddies they don’t get to see regularly) his sister and her man. Sarah understands that’s not necessarily Tim’s idea of an excellent time.

“Which is something we’ll know all about, say, around Christmastime!” Glenn says, huge smile on his face.

It takes a second for that to click with the group, and then smiles bloom, congratulations flow, and hugs are given all around.

“So, we’re looking at…” Penny eyes this crowd as everyone heads back to their seats to finish dessert. “The end of April,” Ziva smiles, “late June,” that’s Baby Bishop’s due date, “late August,” that’s Sarah, “and early October,” Breena crosses her fingers.
Tony says, “This time next year, we’re gonna be hip deep in babies.”

And Gibbs nods.

---

After dinner, Sarah asks Abby, “Could you, when you get back to work, find out if Tim and I are siblings?”

“I can. Just need some hair from you. He’s already in the system. You wondering if whatever got Sean might be in your DNA, too?”

“Not really, but… I mean, if it is, it is, nothing changing that now. It’s more… I’m curious. More curious now about who I come from. When it was just me, it didn’t matter as much. Little person in there might have some questions and… and on this level, yeah, Sean does make me think, that it might be nice to know what might be lurking in my DNA. You get that, right?”

Abby nods; she does know. “Yeah. I’ve been thinking some similar thoughts about my birth parents, too. I’ve got one full brother, who was also put up for adoption at birth, so they got together at least twice, over four years. So, what’s the story with that?”

Sarah smiles. “Yep. I know my mom was in the Navy. Well, at least that’s the story my father told.”

Abby’s eye narrows at the mention of John.

“Sorry.”

She shakes her head. “You should be able to mention him without me wincing. It’ll just take a while.” She looks away from Sarah for a moment, and then asks, “Have you heard anything.” She swallows. “Because Tim’s the ‘victim’ he gets some updates, namely that John’s supposed to be away for the next two years. They’ll let him know if he gets parole early. But, that’s it.”

Sarah shakes her head, too. “I’m not next of kin anymore, so I don’t get any updates.”

“Okay.”

“If anyone knows, it’s probably Uncle Mike or Uncle Tom. Rumor has it they’re both coming to the wedding, so you can certainly ask.”

Abby thinks about it. “I might.”

Sarah looks around, sees Tim and Bishop and Jake on the far side of the room talking about something as her brother cuddles his baby boy. That’ll probably do for making sure Bishop and Jake don’t overhear the wrong bit of conversation. “Breena’s pregnant, so… For people who know, what’s the deal with that?”

“Breena’s kids are Jimmy’s. My kids are Tim’s, and if they don’t quite match up perfectly, no one cares.”

Sarah nods at that. “Okay.”

“You and Glenn are Aunt Sarah and Uncle Glenn to all of them, though.”
“I thought we already were.”

“Oh,” Abby shakes her head. “Mommy brain. Details go flying out.” Then she smiles. “As you’ll know soon enough.”

Sarah laughs dryly. “I’ve got another question for you, about Tim.”

“Fire away.”

“Is he going to be okay with mom? I don’t mean, will he behave. He’ll do whatever he does and she’ll do whatever she does, I mean… Am I asking too much of him with this?”

Abby sighs. She almost answers, then decides to think for another moment. Then she comes up with, “Especially after this last year, I think he’s got a really good idea of where his boundaries are. And, more importantly, I don’t think he feels like he’s got to push past them to impress anyone else. So… yeah, I think he’ll be okay, and more importantly, I think if he decides he’s not okay, he’ll let Uncle Mike walk you down the aisle. He won’t try to force himself through it if it’s not working.”

“All right. I want him there, but not at the cost of making him miserable.”

“Yeah.” Abby watches her husband talking, animatedly, with Bishop and Jake, from the way they’re chatting she’s sure they’re talking numbers, data, and tech. “What do you mean by, ‘she’ll do whatever she does?’”

Sarah shrugs. “Hopefully, I mean she’ll be hyper-detail oriented and driving people crazy making sure they’re in exactly the right place doing exactly the right thing. With any luck, she’ll be so focused on making sure the flowers are in the right places and all the bows on the chairs are properly tied, that she won’t be a bother to anyone who isn’t our wedding planner.” And then Sarah takes a breath, “But… That’s a hope. And I know the more nervous and stressed out she is, the more hyper-concerted she gets and…” And she sighs again, “Both Penny and I have been telling her that giving Tim a wide berth is a good plan, but…” she licks her lips and sighs, “but she’s sorry, and she misses him so much, and she hates being out of his life, and she wants to make it better, but she doesn’t know how…” Sarah swallows hard at that. She hates the fact that her family is ripped in half. Not that it was ever Hallmark Card perfect, but… For a long time, it at least, worked.

Abby’s not sure what to do with that. Her protective toward Tim feelings are kicking up, given extra fuel by new mommy hormones, and mixed in with those hormones are all the confusing thoughts and feelings that go with trying to do the best they can with Sean and hating doing things that will hurt him, and there’s rage at the crap Tori put Tim through, and there’s the fact that she knows deep down, below a lot of the stuff Tim’s willing to deal with, is the fact that he misses his mom, too.

And right now, there’s too much anger, and too much history, and too much present for him to get to that, to touch it, but she knows it’s there.

And she doesn’t know what to do with it, other than, eventually, poking him into chatting with Rachel about her.

Sarah sees all of that on her face, feels it in the shift in Abby’s emotional vibe, and takes a literal step back. “I’ll do what I can to make sure she’s not bugging him. Penny and Ducky are going to try to make the rehearsal dinner, so they’ll help. The four of you will be at the wedding, so… It’ll be okay.”

Abby flashes her a weak smile, and makes a mental note to make sure that Tim’s got all the buffer he wants for the wedding.
And she also makes the note to find out how much buffer he actually wants.

Getting ready for bed involves some shuffling around of their usual schedule.

It’s supposed to be Jimmy’s night with little boy. But… between the bed he’d normally be snoozing next to little boy being filled with the Mishoys, Mallops, Balloys? Whatever the hell the combined noun form of Bishop and Jake is, and the fact that being on baby duty for a child who is not biologically yours is the sort of thing that causes the outside world to raise eyebrows, Tim’s on baby duty, again.

Abby’d offered to take tonight, but he wants sleep tomorrow night so he’ll be sharp going into the Commission.

Likewise, instead of the four of them in the bathroom at once. They’re taking turns as ‘couples.’ The soundproofing is good here, but not perfect, and Jake and Bishop don’t need to be hearing Tim talking to Breena in the bathroom.

So, for the time being, all babies are fed, sleeping. Jimmy and Breena are taking care of their nightly bedtime routine in the bathroom. And Tim and Abby are getting ready to settle into bed.

Or they would be, except Abby’s remembering back to after DC fell, and Tim telling them about Rachel and her ‘emotional allergy shot’ technique. Little doses of something emotionally painful now, in a safe and controlled environment, so it doesn’t always trigger a huge painful/scary emotional response later.

She’s getting undressed. Tim’s putting on PJs, since he’ll be getting in and out over the course of the night. When she’s naked, except for her nursing bra, and sitting on the bed, Abby says, “So… how much Mom-time do you want for the wedding?”

He looks up from tying the knot on the drawstring of his flannel jammy pants. “Uh… As little as possible.”

She smiles at him. “I get that. I mean, do you want active buffer zones? If she looks like she’s closing in, should we head her off, or… you know, like with going back to NCIS, do you want some small, safe doses of time with her?”

Tim blinks. He hadn’t thought of that. “Uh… I… I’ll think about it.”

Abby hugs him. “Good. Whatever you want, we’ve got you.”

He slips into the bed next to her. Tonight she’s got one of the middle spots. He snuggles in against her back, and closes his eyes. He hears the bathroom door open, and the sound of Jimmy and Breena locking it. No Jake or Bishop ‘accidentally’ wandering in.

Once they get settled in bed, Jimmy next to Abby, and Breena on the far side of the bed, she also needs easy in and out access, Abby says something else. “Sarah reminded me that we’re not going to be the only poly relationship at the wedding, and… If we want to be out, that’s fine with her and Glenn.”

That gets a lot of thoughtful quiet directed at Abby.

“A lot of people are coming to this thing, right?” Jimmy asks, sounding a little tentative.
“Yeah. More than a hundred and fifty at the last count. Glenn’s got a big family. Not too many McGees, but she’s got all of her author buddies and clients invited, so lots of people, almost all of them will be strangers we’ll never see again.”

“The ones we will see again, for sure, are Penny, Ducky, Sarah, Glenn, and baby Holland. They all know already. Maybe Uncle Mike and his family, maybe Uncle Tom and his,” Tim adds feeling a lot of weight on this. They’ve been out, sort of, before. In Winchester, where no one knew them, and this would be… similar to that. Sort of.

And he remembers, being out, sort of, in Winchester, felt good. And, hell, after the thing with The Admiral, it’s not like everyone isn’t whispering about what he might get up to in his private life, anyway.

“And, in this crowd, I guess I’m better known as Thom Gmcity than Tim McGee, and if Thom has an unconventional family life, it doesn’t really matter. If it looks like a book will sell, publishers couldn’t care less about who, or how many, people you sleep with.”

He’s testing that idea out. It feels right to him.

“Yeah, but I’m still Breena Palmer, of Palmer and Slaters’, the name you want a lot of conservative respectability to go with, so that the web of pastors, ministers, and priests our family’s built up over the years doesn’t think twice about recommending me to people in need.”

Tim nods. “Got it. Total respectability.”

“Thank you.” Breena’s got one alternative motive, in addition to her very good reason for not wanting to risk being out to people who live in DC, especially this close to Tim’s statements to the Admiral, and that’s the way Tim sounded as he left his mom out of the list of people he’d be seeing again.

Namely, she can feel he’s thinking about picking a fight.

Probably a lot of reasons for it, and she doesn’t think they’re necessarily bad, but given how dramatic her Dad tried to make her wedding because of his own crap, she’s not paying that down the road to Sarah.

Sarah, if Breena has anything to do with it, gets to have an easy, painless wedding, without any extra drama of Tim picking a fight with his mom. If he wants to be out in front of her, in any other circumstance, she’ll back him, but this time.

Nope.

They’ve been quiet for a moment, and she decides to dive into it. Better to talk it out than to let it sit.

“You want to be out, party as a foursome where other people are doing the same thing, or you want to rub your mom’s nose in it and see what she does?” Breena asks.

Tim sighs. Breena’s got him on that. He wasn’t really aware of it, but now that she’s said it. “Yes.” Abby snuggles against him a bit deeper, and Jimmy pets his neck, saying, “Keep talking.”

But he can’t talk, because he needs to think. He makes a little, “Mmm..” sound, letting them know, in the snug dark of their bedroom, that he’s thinking.

Finally, he’s got the lines in place. “I got to piss him off so hard that he hit back. And, that was…
good, satisfying. You know? I got to be the one pushing the buttons. I got to be in control. I got to be the one doing the hurting instead of getting hurt.”

“And you think the four of us would hurt her? Make her mad?” Jimmy says quietly. He didn’t pick up on the same vibe Breena did, but those words make him feel squirmy.

“Yeah!” Tim’s voice is soft, but there’s something nasty in it. “She just… We talked that one time, and she was hurting, but… not enough. Not the way I want her to hurt. ‘We did it for your own good.’ ‘You needed this stuff.’ ‘It was important.’ ‘It made you who you are today…”

Abby rolls over to face Tim, and pets his arms. She remembers what he said when he came home from that meet up. “No one’s the villain in their own story.”

He nods. Jimmy kisses the back of his neck. Breena’s got a hand on his hip.

Abby’s hand cups his face. “You want her to acknowledge that she did you wrong. That she was wrong. You don’t want her to have the refuge of ‘I did the best I could.’”

Tim nods again.

“This won’t get you that,” Breena says quietly.

Tim nods once more. “I know.” He blinks hard. They’re making him dig deeper on what he really wants. So he lays there, quietly, and thinks more. It takes a good ten minutes of quiet, of just thinking, and they let him have that space to sort it out.

“Seventeen years of hell. When I was living with them. When she let him… When she backed his plays and… He wasn’t there most of the time, so she was doing most of it.” His voice is tense and sour. “And then I’m out, on my own, and she’s going for mom-of-the-year. She’s got my picture on the mantle, and loves my books, and anything I want to do is fine, she’s all supportive, and… And we’ve got hand knitted baby gear for Kelly like a month after she knows she’s on the way… And…

“I want her to be a cut and dried bad guy. I don’t want any lingering thoughts in my mind about she did the best she could, and she was trying to be a good parent in a bad set of circumstances, and if she sees us and flips out… then I can just blow up at her, and she’s the one with the problem…”

Tim doesn’t make noise when he cries. That’s a long ingrained defense mechanism. And it works well tonight, too. In the other bedroom, less than thirty feet away, no one has any idea that anything other than an early spring’s night of napping is happening in Tim and Abby’s room.

But he is crying, and his loves are holding onto him, until another, smaller cry tears through the night. Tim sits up and wipes his eyes. “Okay… I’ve…” he doesn’t sound steady, because he’s not, but beyond and above everything else, he’s a dad, and his job is to go get the crying baby, and make sure he’s cleaned up, fed, and snuggled.

Because that’s how a baby knows love.

And that’s the job.
Tim’s not nervous as Sunday night, and the first bit of his Commission work, begins.

Excited, that’s definitely part of it. And maybe a bit of foreboding. He’s not sure if he’s getting ready to launch the maiden voyage of the Titanic or not.

He thinks about that as he tying his tie, (They’re going out for dinner, at a nice restaurant. He’s in charge of this. He might as well try to look the part.) and decides if he’s mulling over the idea that this might be a Titanic-level disaster that just possibly he is nervous.

New flavor of it, then. He’s not jittery. He doesn’t feel the need to fill the air with more and more and more chattery details. His hands and heart are steady.

So, maybe not. Maybe this is him being realistic. This is a huge project, he’s about to set it into motion, and if it works, it’ll be a thing of grace and beauty moving a lot of people to somewhere they want to get.

And if it doesn’t… Yeah, Titanic.

“Tie?” Abby asks, stepping out of the shower, toweling off her hair.

Tim shrugs. “Feeling like a grown up today?”

Abby nods and heads to her closet. She’s feeling like she might indeed have enough brains in her head to go along on this. “Let’s see if I can get myself into anything that resembles adult clothing.”

“Oh.” He’d forgotten she’s at a point where her body isn’t necessarily going to slip into her out and about clothing, let alone her nice out and about clothing. “Wear what you can. If nothing fits, I’ll dress down to match.”

She shakes her head. “You don’t need to do that.”

He shrugs one shoulder. “Don’t want you feeling out of place.”

Abby grins at him. “Honey, I know you’re used to looking at me, but have you forgotten the neck tattoos? I don’t blend anywhere ‘adult.’”

He steps closer to her and lays his lips on the tattoo of them on her neck. She sighs, wanting to press into him, but not doing it because he’s mostly dressed and she’s, aside from the parts covered by her towel, just stepped out of the shower, wet.

She turns, kisses his lips, and then gets back to her closet as he goes back to his, shuffling hangers around, looking for a jacket. (Which, before they ended up with at least three outfits for all occasions belonging to the Palmers, used to be a fairly easy task, but right now he’s eyeing a black wool sleeve and wondering if it’s his or Jimmy’s.) “Okay, I know we’ve got Penny, Ducky, Jake, and Bishop going. I know they’re the ‘political’ delegation. I know you and I are on… administration?”

He shrugs, finding his black suit jacket. “That’ll work. Bishop’s also got ‘big data’ cred. For us, tonight is mostly tech, some running things, and setting up how and what I want to work. I’m definitely there as admin, and if you want to poke me when it looks like the ship’s in danger from the rocks, please do, otherwise, you’re another set of eyes and ears to keep watch on this, make sure the tech works.”
“I can do that. Who else?”

“Manner is coming. He’s who I’m hoping will take over admin from me. When I hand this off, I’m going to need someone who can keep all the balls in the air and wrangle the tech guys while keeping the pols happy, and, I think he can do that.”

“That’s one hell of a job.”

“Yeah. All of this is one hell of a job.”

“You aren’t wrong about that.” Abby pulls out a white blouse and eyes it skeptically. She hasn’t put on anything that wasn’t a soft, nubby fleece or knit piece of clothing since before Sean was born. This is tailored silk. It’s part of the clothing she got after Kelly was born, and she needed new stuff for going back to work, and more specifically, going back to court. It’s cut to be especially flattering to a nursing mom’s figure, but demure enough to be appropriate to wear to court. The only questions are: A: does it still fit, and B: if she puts it on, will Sean (who is currently downstairs, with Jimmy and Breena and the girls) spit up on it before they get out of the house.

Only way to find out is to try it on.

She lays it on the bed and hunts down a bra. “Let’s see if I can get into this.”

Tim sees the blouse on the bed and smiles at it, and her. Then he finishes answering her question, “I’ve got Fielding coming in with her guys. When we were talking about this before, she had some really good ideas on it. So, they’re mostly tech with a side of having spent a lot of time working with the DoD’s big data and internet mining.”

“Your Angels are coming.”

He nods. “And Ngyn’s showing off her, ‘I can run this myself,’ cred. So, other than occasionally taking a second or two to check in on this, I’ve been letting her do her thing. She’s handling the NCIS delegation for this. Some of tonight, you know just about as much as I do on.”

Abby gets the bra on, and then pulls on the blouse. A bit of tugging, a moment of wondering if she’ll have to suck in her breath, but… “It fits!”

Tim nods, enjoying that fit quite a bit. It’s a little snug across the chest, but he doesn’t mind that at all.

“Who else?”

“Ngyn brought in Atherson out of Rota.”

“He’s your cryptologist, right?”

“Yeah. She’s got he and I as security for this thing. He’s doing most of the heavy lifting on that, though. Got to make sure a million or so people have access to it, but, at the same time, got to keep the rest of the world from hacking it. That’ll be…” Tim sighs.

“Impossible.”

“Yeah. Probably. But we’ll build it up as well as we can, or die trying. Probably try to set it so that each piece of equipment used to access the data is registered, so you’ve at least got to get onto the right piece of equipment to get into CrimeWeb. Been thinking, since we’re going to run it on smartphones, of making sure the damn things can take really good pictures, and use irises to get in. That way no one has to remember a password or anything. Get a registered phone, maybe each agency has its own password to get to the ap, get onto the ap, snap a picture of your eye, and that gets you in. Atherson’s in charge of making sure that if you can’t get the phone and eyeball of someone who’s already on the system, that you can’t raid the data from the outside.”

“Sounds good.” She’s tugging on the pair of black trousers that go with that blouse, and gives up with them at her hips. They’re a wool/silk blend and have no give to them. And right now, her post-baby bottom half is not going to squeeze into those pants. Abby glares at the pants and goes back to the closet, hunting around.

“Breena’s got some pregnancy jeans. Put them under the blouse, add a jacket, and that’ll be good.”

She shakes her head at him. “Nope. If I’m going to wear this, I’ll get the rest of my ‘professional’ clothing on. Otherwise, I might as well go for one of my skirts and t-shirts.”

Abby’s been in PJs for pretty much two solid months, so even a skirt and t-shirt sounds really good to Tim. He’s still grinning.

She shakes her head a little and goes diving back into the closet. She thinks she’s got a skirt her butt and post-baby tummy can be shoved into.

“Breena’s got some pregnancy jeans. Put them under the blouse, add a jacket, and that’ll be good.”

“Which part.” By this point, she knows him way past well enough to tell something, beyond the details of running the Commission, is churning about in his head.

He half smiles, but it’s a somewhat confused looking gesture. Weird is coming off of all of this. “It’s… Okay, you know if someone calls me Sir, I say, ‘Boss or McGee, not ‘Sir,’ I work for a living?'”

“You stole that from Gibbs.”

“And he stole it from a million other non-coms, and Ducky would probably say they stole it from a squire or page or someone with a sword who wasn’t actually a lord, and it probably goes back further than that. Anyway…” He sighs a bit. “I was thinking about this before, and it’s hitting pretty hard right now, this is ‘sir’ territory. I’m not building CrimeWeb. Not literally. I won’t code it. I won’t be the guy who figures out how to make it scan eyeballs or anything like that. I’m… Coming up with a shape, and then finding other guys to build it, and hooking them up with the guys who’ll get it paid for, and… Shit, this is Senior’s territory. I’m coming up with an idea, shaping it, and then putting people into place to make it real, and then selling it to other people, and then I’m going to hand it off.”

“And that feels weird.”

“That feels really weird. I’m not ‘working’ on this. I’m setting up other people to work on it. Maybe I’ll keep eyes on it enough to make sure it doesn’t go off the rails, like I do with the Navy’s cyber-testing program, but… Once this is in motion, it won’t be mine.”

Abby thinks about that for a moment. She can hear he’s feeling uncertain about it, but wants him to “keep talking. “Is it good weird?”

“I don’t know, yet. Right now, just weird. When this is done, I go back to NCIS, work on the harassment software, really work, I’ll code that myself, have the rest of the crew test it, and I’ll work cases until it’s time to head to the FBI, but once I’m there… everything I do will be like this. I don’t think I’ll be working anymore. I’ll be ideas and structure and getting other people to do things.”

She smiles at him, squeezing his hand. “This sounds like something to talk to Leon about. I’m fairly certain he’ll tell you it’s still work.”

“I know, but…” That but lingers, waiting for help.

Abby’s not sure if he can give it the help it needs, but she has an idea of some of the context he might be looking for, “But you intentionally weren’t an officer. You didn’t want to be the guy in charge. You wanted to be the genius in the back who saves the day by whipping out that little bit of know how no one else could do, and then go back to being out of the limelight.”

Abby’s got him nailed on that. He nods. She flashes him a little salute. He rolls his eyes. The last thing he ever wanted was people jumping to attention and snapping off salutes at him. “You wrote something about destiny a while back, right?”

He shrugs, not immediately sure what she’s talking about. “I’ve written a ton of things about everything.”

“Something about how we’re born with many options, and whittle it down to one, and destiny can’t be denied, and it’s about how we go about getting there that matters.”

“That’s triggering some faint memories. I was probably feeling pretty pompous when I wrote that.”

She sniggers. “Yeah, it wasn’t one of your more laid back statements. Anyway… Maybe running things, being the idea guy who gets everyone else moving in the right directions… Maybe that’s where you’re supposed to be. I mean… Look at who you come from. People who aimed low and didn’t do much aren’t your family tree. If something like this can be in a person’s DNA, it’s in yours.”

He shrugs at that, too. “I’d prefer to believe that isn’t a DNA sort of thing.”

She shrugs back, his preferences on the point are moot. Either it is a DNA sort of thing, or it’s not.

He nods back at her, well aware of the fact that the universe is supremely indifferent to his preferences on this matter, and the science that’s coming out seems to be saying that DNA’s at least as involved in all of this as environment.

He drives for about six more miles, thinking about DNA, family trees, ‘Sir,’ being an officer, and all the rest of it.

When it finally hits him, he feels blindingly stupid about it.

“I had to call him Sir.”

Abby doesn’t need a heads up to figure out who him is. She’s known for a long time that The Admiral is why Tim intentionally did not become an officer or anything like command rank for such a long time. If he’d gone to Annapolis, he would have gotten out a twenty-one-year-old Naval Ensign or Marine Second Lieutenant. With his grades and work ethic, at Annapolis he would have been ordering his classmates around. And even without that, even with the route he did pick, he ended up turning down command ranks and doing his best to let Tony or Gibbs run as many of the cases as possible.

The Admiral wouldn’t have spent more than a decade the third man on a four-man team, but Tim did, because he wouldn’t.

“Stayed… a specialist, with Gibbs’ team for a very long time, too long, maybe. Finally made the jump to management and ran it like a non-com to avoid being him.”

“I know.” She strokes his hand.

He smiles a little, but it’s not happiness, just, not wincing.

The fact of the matter is he likes this.

He’s sitting at a long oval table with a dozen other people, going over the shape of what they’re going to build, how it’ll work, the tech involved in making it happen, the political realities that will have to be observed, how to package this and make it go from being an idea into a thing, and…

This feels good. And not just on a this is enjoyable level, but it also feels right. They’re talking around the table about how much information this system is going to have to deal with and how to make it do that fast enough to be useful (after all, this app will be useless if it takes six weeks to return a match), and Penny’s asking about how much of the underlying infrastructure will have to be redone to make this work. (They’re hoping to piggyback off of the existing databases, but a lot of them are slow.) And Jake wants to know if they’ll eventually want to rebuild the whole web. And he’s got Ngyn and Fielding talking about how they’d love to rebuild it all eventually, but that’s a multi-decade project, so it’s got to be functional with the infrastructure currently in place, and…

It is good.

He’s the four-star general sitting at HQ with his hand-chosen team of one-star generals, laying out the battle plans for the entire damn invasion, and… It’s fun.

Tomorrow, when they open this up to the wider group…

Tomorrow’s going to be awesome.

And if this gets off the ground…

They’re walking out of the restaurant, and Tim shivers at that idea. If they can get this built, get it working… The world of law enforcement will shift. Better, faster, more streamlined, all one team working together to put the bad guys away.

If it works, he’ll change the world with it. Change the world the way an officer, a general… or an admiral, changes the world, by seeing the future, laying out a plan, and handing it off to other people to do.
“I work for a living…” Tim’s thinking (and apparently saying out loud) as they drive home.

“Uh, yeah…” Abby says back. “Good work. Did you see the way Atherson and Ngyn lit up at those security ideas, and Brand, she knew exactly what to do to take it a step further. This team is gold, Tim.” Abby’s smiling; it’s been too long since the working part of her brain’s been online, and she enjoyed every minute of that dinner. “I can’t wait to see this come up. Do you know how long I spend every shift updating databases? Get this in play, put it all into one system, and it’ll take care of spreading the information around.” She’s grinning as she shakes her head. “I was thinking though, you want to run this as an ap and a web, do we have any really good web developers coming to this thing?”

Tim nods. “Uh, yeah. Tomorrow. Got a few of them. A friend of a friend scalped some talent from Google and Facebook. Got a few ap designers, too. And before you ask, yeah, we snagged two guys from Amazon to talk server farm design.”

The smile on Abby’s face gets even wider. “This is going to be amazing!” Then she pulls out of the fun of building dream systems to focusing back onto Tim, who is, right now, not all giggles and smiles. That’s when she realizes he’s not talking about work but work, like he was earlier today. “You’re back at the officer stuff, aren’t you?”

He nods. “Yeah. Thinking about it, a lot.”

“What are you thinking?”

He shakes his head. “Hard to find words for, but… Feels like a major shift. I’ve been in charge for the last year, but… This is different.”

“You’re not reporting to anyone else on this. Before, the buck stopped with Leon. Here, the buck stops with you.”

He inclines his head, eyes darting between the cars on the road around them. “There’s that. More to it, though, probably.” Or not. Maybe. He is very much the guy in charge on this. But… he feels like this officer stuff will follow over to the FBI, and he won’t be the guy in charge there… Except… He’s the guy who will have the job to take out the Director of the FBI, should he need taking out. So, maybe Abby is onto something with that. If you’re the guy who watches the watchmen, the buck does stop with you.

“There always is. Keep thinking. Or spitball more tech ideas with me, let it bop around in the back of your mind, and wait. It’ll pop up, as long as you’re not actively trying to shut it down, this stuff always does.”

He nods at that, too. “I think it’s trying to pop up now. That’s why I can’t seem to let it go.”

“Oh, okay gnaw on it for a bit, and I’ll go text some ideas to Delilah. When you’ve got words, I’ve got ears.”

Tim nods, still thinking. This does feel like the verge of something big, but… It’s burbling around back there, but not breaking through, not yet.

Abby spends another moment on her phone and then says, “I am so glad you grabbed her for this.”

Tim smiles at that. Fielding knows her stuff, DoD does a lot of big data work, and she does a ton of it, taking billions of bits of information, looking for threats on the internet, and then pulling people out of the chatter, hunting them down online, so she’s got two parts of what they’re hoping this system will do, down, and she’s fun to work with.
She also appears to have smacked Manner with a bad case of ‘Pah!’ He wasn’t literally drooling, but the last time Tim saw someone so thunderstruck it was Draga looking at Johnson. “Those ideas you’re texting her about, wouldn’t be about Manner, would they?”

Abby flashes him a naughty smile. “It is possible, that between details on how to set up our database so that everyone using this device doesn’t have to go through every single piece of data, every time they run a search, thus upping our speed enough so that this is usable, that I may, just possibly, find a moment to mention that Manner is single.”

Tim laughs.

---

He’s lying in bed, later that night, back in his own home, with Abby on one side and Breena on the other when he finally remembers the thing Abby had mentioned earlier.

He didn’t write it. Well, he wrote it. It’s in one of his books. MacGregor’s talking about destiny, so he typed it out onto a piece of paper, but he didn’t write it. It’s a quote. He had to take a certain number of humanities classes at Johns Hopkins to graduate, and his Introduction to Western Philosophy class introduced him to Heidegger. He figured it was well enough known that he didn’t need to exactly spell out (beyond the use of extra quotation marks) that it was a quote. Apparently not.

“Anyone can achieve their fullest potential, who we are might be predetermined, but the path we follow is always of our own choosing. We should never allow our fears or the expectations of others to set the frontiers of our destiny. Your destiny can't be changed but, it can be challenged. Every man is born as many men and dies as a single one.”

When he says that, MacGregor is talking to Tibbs about moving on. It’s the last book of the series, and Tibbs is retiring. The uber case (The murder of Tibbs’ wife and daughter, always hinted at, occasional bits and pieces of information offered up, but never fully worked on until the last book.) has been solved. Tibbs is done. MacGregor is getting ready to move over to CyberCrime. Tommy and Liza are going to take over Tibbs’ team. Everything is shifting.

And MacGregor says that to Tibbs, talking about the destiny Tibbs should have had, the one that got knocked off kilter by the murder of his wife and child. And how, case done, bad guy dead, it was finally time for Tibbs to go back to being the man he was supposed to be.
That’s where the book ends. Tibbs getting ready to move onto what comes after being a cop. After his wife’s killer has been caught and killed.

But, lying in bed, with Abby cuddled against him, and Breena’s back against his, he’s feeling those words, and what they mean to him.

Now. As opposed to then, when he was just looking for a nice sum up to go with the series.

He sighs long and low.

Admiral Timothy McGee. That’s who he was supposed to be. At least, if you had asked his parents. He was supposed to be the man who came up with the big plans and told everyone what to do and when and how, and then have them go do it, keep an eye on the results and re-plan as needed to get the big goal done.

He was supposed to be the guy with the big goals.

He was supposed to be “Sir.”

Maybe. He’s never tried to untangle who he is supposed to be from who his parents thought he was “supposed” to be. Not on any level beyond the knee-jerk you wanted this so I’m making a 180 and going the exact opposite direction.

So, fate? Destiny? The idiot goals of power mad twits who couldn’t see the person in front of them?

His own destiny, or a mold they tried to shove him into?

Only one destiny, many paths. So, right end goal, wrong path? Was he on the wrong path, or were they trying to shove him onto the wrong path?

Has this been almost forty years of his own fears trying to shove him off the path he was supposed to be on? Had he run as far away from who he was supposed to be as he could, but it still caught him? Was this just him taking his own route to get where he was supposed to be?

In the dark, he doesn’t know.

In the dark, between two of his loves, he’s not even sure if he’s asking the right questions.

---

Being the guy running the Commission is not the same thing as being the guy running CrimeWeb.

For example, the guy running the Commission, Tim McGee, shows up two hours early to make sure everything is in place, the food will be ready, security is doing their thing, the guest list is set, blah, blah, blah…

It’s the first night, and like all the other ones, this is a cocktail hour, dinner, meet and greet. None of the other ones started with any heavy lifting until Tuesday morning, so Tim’s got them following the same pattern.

Plus, that meet and greet allows the guy who’s running CrimeWeb to get the last bit of intel he needs to do a good job of connecting people to jobs. There are way too many people here for this to work the way he wants it to, so he’s got some weeding to do.
The people around him are wrangling code, networking with developers, buzzing with conversation, some of them talking big ideas with him (which he enjoys), some of them are snarky little bastards waiting for this to fail, some want to be here, but they’re not top tier talent. Tonight, Tim’s finding out who is who.

He’s also doing a lot of behind the scenes stuff. Like making sure, tomorrow, when they get into big ideas, they’ve got functional wifi that’s properly secure, and that he (and everyone else who’s going to speak) will be able to show off what they’ve got on a big screen, and lunch will show up at the right time, and when they get talking what sort of device to work, they’ll have prototypes (mostly iPhones) to play with, and just…

Details.

He might be the Four Star General for CrimeWeb, but he’s doing non-com work for the Commission.

In some ways, that’s really comfortable. Given a job like: make sure there are enough plugs so everyone can charge their devices without blowing out the circuit, he’s feeling pretty secure. It might not be fun, not the way spinning big ideas is, but it’s real. And he’s good with real.

On the ride home, it hits him. He doesn’t have a secretary. He barely has a second-in-command. If he needs grunt work, detail work, any sort of little job: set meetings, get airline tickets, send out memos, keep track of his phone and email, he does it himself.

He’s got the budget for it. If he wanted a secretary, he could have one.

And, other than the very occasional thought that it might be handy to have someone do stuff like that, the idea of actually getting one never occurred to him.

Because non-coms do all the jobs. They may delegate some of it, but they don’t have a person whose whole job is to take care of the detail/grunt work so they can do the idea work.

Officers have adjutants or secretaries or… someone to take care of the little things so they can do the big things.

And he wonders, as he’s driving home, how much not having someone to deal with the little stuff was his subconscious making sure he didn’t make the leap into officer territory.

When he gets to Jimmy’s, a bit past midnight on Tuesday, he expects to find a dark house full of sleeping people.

Not so much. When he opens the door he sees the cool light of the TV flickering, and very soft voices quietly murmuring in the living room. Instead of heading straight up, he detours, sees Breena snoozing on the sofa, and decides to tuck her in.

He’s turning off the TV, facing it, when he hears, “Leave it. I’m not really sleeping.”

“Oh.” He turns back to her, crosses the room, and sits on the sofa next to her. “Bad night?”
“Blech.” She sticks out her tongue. “Not puking, but too sick to sleep. You need to crash?”

He does. Tomorrow’s an early start, and it’s already late. “Soon, but I’ve got a lot of ideas in my head.” He could certainly use some time to get them out. He’s stroking her hair, and she’s turning her face to his palm. “You want the distraction?”

“Please.”

“Final headcount was 243 people. I met and talked to all of them. The only thing they have in common is the idea that the current system can be improved. About a hundred of them are there because they want to build this thing. Another hundred want to glom on and grab credit. The other fifty or so are expecting it to fail, and I think they want to be there and laugh when it does.”

“Doesn’t sound encouraging.”

He’s not sure, but he figures those kind of numbers are par for the course for something like this. “That first hundred, though.” He shakes his head slightly, grin spreading across his face. “We’re gonna build something amazing with them.”

Breena sits up a bit, leaning into Tim. He takes her wrist in his hand and works the anti-nausea point. It never did much for him except let him feel good enough to sleep.

She sighs as he works that point. She’s not feeling better, but tired is starting to take over, and she’s pretty sure that his voice and touch may lull her to sleep. “Tell me about amazing.”

“Last time I was in a room with that much raw computer talent, I was wearing a cap and gown and walking down the aisle for my MIT graduation. I’m thinking we’ll fob off the naysayers until it’s testing time. I’m going to want people to shoot it down then. We’ll weed them out and call them phase three. The ‘want to be on it for the glory’ guys… This is so big, I’m sure I’ll have plenty of jobs for them. Clean up coding, testing, selling it to their own delegations, the sort of stuff that comes after the plan’s been made. And those first hundred.” Tim’s got a dreamy look on his face, “they’re going to build it. I’m going to lay it out tomorrow morning, give them my sketch, and then I’ll split them up, get them on it, send groups B and C home, and we’re going to build it.” He’s still grinning.

“I’ve got a shape and a function and a finished idea in my head, and they’re going to make it so much better! I’ve had twenty people suggest tweaks I’d have never thought of, snippets of how to make it more functional, faster, smaller, how to… God, every time you hear about the government building something it’s a fucking train wreck. It’s a million percent over budget, ten years late, and doesn’t work.” He can’t stop smiling, and sees Breena looking really tired, so he shifts again, so she’s lying on her back, and he’s kneeling on the floor, next to the sofa, still holding her wrist and facing her. She squeezes his hand and pulls the blanket over her shoulders.

Tim keeps talking, keeping his voice low. “But this, God, baby, this is going to work! We’re not fobbing it off on low bid contractors who pocket the cash and produce nothing, no one profits from it taking ten times longer than expected, most of them, the ones I’m grabbing for phase one, are taking leaves of absence from other projects to do this. They don’t even know for sure if they’re getting paid for this, but we’re doing it.

“I’ll beg, borrow, steal the funding to get this working. Penny’s got appropriations committee members coming for this, and we’ll schmooze the hell out of them. I’ll get my DiNozzo Senior smile in place and sell this damn thing, because we need it, and it’ll work.”

Breena’s smiling at him, enjoying how happy this is making him as her eyes grow heavier and sleep begins to tug her away from the waking world.
Tuesday morning, Tim’s up beyond bright and early. He’s got to get in, make sure everything is up and ready, and take care of one last detail as people come in.

Like all the Commissions he’s been to, when you get in, you check in. He’s got his guys doing this, too. Check in is an easy way to control the room, which he can’t do just by line of sight. Too many people will be at this thing to do it by line of sight.

He wants to make sure the right people get into this.

And his last detail comes from having made sure to talk to literally, everyone, on his list last night. (He had the list on his phone, and kept updating it.)

He wasn’t kidding with Breena when he talked about getting more than half of these people out of his hair. He’ll have jobs for all of them sooner or later, but not right now. So, he talked. He got an idea of who wanted to do what and how. And all night long he kept adding 1, 2, or 3 to the names on his list.

So, he got in after everyone (but Breena) had gone to bed, and leaves before everyone (but Jimmy, he’s on with Sean) is up, and gets himself to the Omni, early.

Hotels are never really still. People tend to be moving through them all the time, but, the hallway his Commission is on is quiet.

He’s got his coffee, (Half-caf, he figures he’ll need the boost, but he’s not back to full strength, yet.) half a dozen phones, his laptop, and his own personal phone.

He sees the security ladies aren’t here, yet, but their computers are. He’s not thrilled by that. It’s bad security to just leave them lying around. But, he’s here now and about to check the list. If anyone new is on it, he’ll find them.

Then he takes his coffee, and his laptop, and heads into the Commission room, currently set up as a huge collection of chairs facing a podium, and gets working.

10:00. Showtime. Everyone is in, everyone is sitting down, the conversation is starting to dull down as Tim moves toward the podium to get this show on the road.

“Good morning,” he says in his best teacher running the classroom voice. He figures, in his jeans, purple button down, black tie, and black suit jacket, that he likely looks a lot like a teacher in front of a classroom, too. “I wanted to thank all of you for taking the time to come to this. I do have ideas and jobs for everyone, but not all of you will need to be here for all of this.” That gets some annoyed muttering. “Over a long career of law enforcement, I’ve found that if you can scale down, you should. Get the plan hammered out, and then expand outward. Right now we’re in a classic, too-many-cooks, situation.”

That’s not winning a lot of happy comments, either. But Tim keeps plowing on. “When I’m not in charge of this sort of stuff, I’m a writer. And books, good books, get made a certain way. There’s the original writer, who puts everything together, and he thinks he’s got the greatest idea ever, because he’s off writing it, making his baby come to life on the page.” Tim smiles a bit, and he’s starting to get some more interest with these remarks. “Problem is, it’s the writer’s baby on that page, and just like any new parent, a writer can’t tell if his baby is ugly!” He pauses while that line gets a bit of a laugh. That makes him feel better. This is starting to move in the direction he wants it to.

“So, look at your name tags. If it’s got a one on it, you’re in the writer group. You’ll be staying here, with me, this week, and we’re going to bang out a rough draft which we will love beyond all reason, and be completely blind to the flaws of, just like a baby.” A bit more laughing.

“Now, if any of you have ever read a first draft, or seen an ugly baby, you know that sometimes, writers and parents are not objective about what they’ve brought forth, and at least in terms of a rough draft, sometimes a lot of work will be needed to make that draft into anything anyone would voluntarily read. Normally, in the writing world, we call the people who do that work, and point out, often not too gently, that the baby is in need of massive cosmetic surgery, editors. If you’ve got a 2 on your name tag, you’re going into the editing pile. Once we’ve got the draft done, you guys are going to take a whack at it. You’re going to see the good ideas and the bad ones, help us make the good ones better, and whittle out the bad ones. You’re not going to be on this week, because I don’t want you guys falling in love with the baby, and honestly, I don’t want you too friendly with group 1. I don’t want you to worry about hurting feelings or anything like that. So, thank you for your time, thanks for coming, and when we have that first draft, you’ll come out and beat it into shape, and then toss it back to group one.”

He can hear that group 2 is split on this. Some of them seem intrigued, some of them are grumbling. He’s not too worried. He feels like he’s done an okay job of weeding the real talent from the second string, and this will make sure the second string who is just in it for the glory likely won’t return his… Manner’s… calls in a few months.

Better off with them out of this.

“Okay, to carry this book analogy a bit farther, there’s what happens after the book goes live, namely critics get it. And they get paid to say nasty things about pretty much everything. Now, with books, usually, if it bombs it bombs and there’s no time to fix things. CrimeWeb is too important for that to happen. So, if you’ve got a 3 on your name tag, you are part of the Critic group, and you’re out of here. When we’ve got our working prototype up, you will get a copy to test, and I am asking you to rip it to shreds. I want every mean, nasty, non-functional, nit-picky comment you can come up with on this. Everything from the font is annoying, to the background color strains your eyes, to it’s unintuitive, to structural issues, to how your favorite sixty-seven-year-old technophobe LEO can’t turn a smart phone on, let alone use this thing, anything you could possibly complain about, that’s what you guys are going to do.

“I am going to give you an early version of CrimeWeb and carte blanche to voice every, single problem you’ve got with it, and then, we’ll take it back to group one, who will redo it again, and send it again back to group two, and then you’ll get it one more time, and from there, we’ll talk about going live.

“So, two and three, thank you for coming. I have names and contact information, and when we’re ready for you, you will get the call. Group one, let’s get to work!”

Like Abby said, this team is gold.

This is the most fun he’s had on a job in… years probably. Maybe ever.

Eh… maybe not. He doesn’t want to cheapen what he had with Gibbs’s team, or what he was doing in the basement. This is a different kind of fun.

For this crew, right now, he’s gotten through the main idea, how this will work, and he’s got his people broken into their sub-specialties, working on how to do whatever it is they do, and they’ll keep that up until Thursday. Then they’ll each present their first bit of it. Thursday afternoon, there’ll be the fast and dirty cobble it all together into one unit. Friday morning, more of that.

Friday afternoon, talking to the money guys. Selling it to congress. It won’t, by any stretch of the imagination, work by Friday. But they’ll have some pretty pictures, and some charts and graphs, and a few ideas on how much it’ll cost to build, and all the rest of that, ready to go.

In his subgroup, he’s got a few of the coders, one AFIS expert, an ap designer, his own security background, and between sessions of Tim circling the room talking to people, they’re working on a very simple prototype to show Penny, Jake, and whomever else they get down here for this.

He hopes, for his demonstration, to put a print on something, a mug maybe, powder it, and then shoot a high def photo of it with the phone, and have it pop up all of his ID stuff.

For show, and with a database of only one print, this is easy to program, but his guys get talking about how to do it for real, too.

“Why not just feed the picture directly into AFIS?” he hears Jerri Blanchare, his ap developer ask Tom Rawson, the AFIS guy.

Tom shakes his head. “AFIS has a specific way of uploading prints. This is part of what we’re streamlining, a way to get a picture of a print directly into the system without two hours of setting it up.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah. If I don’t orient the print correctly, blow it up to the right size, put my markers in the right spots, AFIS can’t use it. So…” Tom eyes Howard, who’s on this crew for her programming skills.

Catherine’s been listening, thinking about the problem. “Yeah, we can do it. Just takes time. Get the system to know what a loop and a whorl and an arch is, figure out where to put the markers, figure out how to put markers in place… You’ve got most of it ready to go, we’re just talking about automating what the lab tech does.” She eyes Tim. They’ve been getting a lot of pieces of programming to make this thing work.

Tim gestures to the rest of the crew. “You want me to set up a version of our job software for this. Everyone spitballs ideas, lists jobs that need to be done, and build a database of who’s got what talents to put on them?”

“Get the B team in on it, too. We’re going to need the extra manpower,” Manner says, popping up from somewhere.

“I can do that.”

Manner pulls him aside after that. “I like what you did with the C team.”
Tim nods. “We’ll need the rain on our parade sooner or later, but not now.”

Manner nods, and both of them watch the crowd buzzing around them, working ideas, putting together different sections of the blueprint. “You get funding for this, and it’s mine, right?”

Tim nods again. “Yeah, if I can get it in the air, I’ll hand it off.”

Manner smiles. “Good. How about this, then, if we can get it in the air, I’ll take it over. I’m the one who’ll have to deal with these people after you leave, so, how about I do what I’m good at, wrangling bureaucrats, and you do your thing, looking smart and earnest. You show them the baby is beautiful, and I’ll show them that it’s cost effective, will feed itself and change its own diapers and how it will increase accountability. Just because you love a cowboy doesn’t mean Congress does, and right now, I’d imagine they’re pretty wary of guys shouting ‘Yippie Ki Yay, let me make my own rules.’”

Tim inhales and that and then nods again. “I think you’ve got a point.”

“Good. So, where’s your grandmother?”

“Last I heard, back in NYC. They’ll come down again for Friday.”

“Give me her number, I’m going to want to know everything there is to know about the people she’s bringing down.”

Tim pulls out his phone, and texts Manner Penny’s number. Then he texts one more number.

Manner looks up from that one. “Uh?”

“So you don’t have to come up with some lame excuse to get it from me later.”

Manner smirks as he looks at Fielding’s number. “Got it last night after dinner.”

Tim laughs. “Good job.”

“Got to be more to life than work, right?”

“I certainly think so.”

Tim watches Manner head off. Manner’s an officer. He’s a bureaucrat, too. A good one. He’d be an excellent general staff member.

Not enough imagination to come up with the big picture, but once he’s got the big picture spelled out for him, he can get people on it and build it.

Tim sees Manner talking, sees him grabbing a few of the B team who are lingering around and start to put them to work. Tim can imagine what he’s got them doing, probably making pretty documents about how spiffy this is and how much better it’ll do the job than the current system.

Once he gets a headcount from Penny, he’ll probably get them researching each person coming, finding out who they are and working on the sales pitch.
What Manner doesn’t do, at least from where Tim is sitting, is attempt to research the at least fifty people who are coming to this thing all by himself. Tim sighs; he knows that if he wasn’t handing this bit off to Manner, that he would be attempting to get everything on each of these people by himself.

Officers delegate. They know what it is they can do that no one else can, and all the rest of the stuff they hand off.

Manner can get other people working on the objective: Sell this to Congress, better than everyone else here. So that’s what he’s doing. He’s using his people, effectively.

Tim’s seeing it, feeling it, in a way he hasn’t before. He looks around at this crew buzzing away around him. If he wants to, he can circle around and keep eyes on what everyone is doing, see the bigger shape and guide them toward it. Or he can go back to his own group and work on one smaller aspect of this job.

Tim rubs his lips together uncomfortably.

He’s the idea guy. Anyone else here can make sure the damn wifi works. There’s no reason for him to do stuff like that. He’s a security guy, that’s true, but so are six other guys here. He’s not adding anything to the prototype group that three other guys here couldn’t.

But no one else here could come up with CrimeWeb. No one else here has a more complete mental image of the whole design.

And if he’s working on the wifi, or making sure lunch shows up on time, or designing the code wall keeping people out of CrimeWeb, he’s wasting his time.

________________________________________

On the way home from the Commission on Tuesday, Tim wishes he could talk to his grandfather. Nelson, not his Pop.

With his aversion to his father, he’s done everything he can to avoid ‘the officer class.’ That’s covered everything from not leaping up to management years earlier, to not socializing with active duty military, to avoiding situations where he’d be the one giving orders, to… all of it.

It’s not that he can’t do it. It’s not that he isn’t good at it. It’s not, even, on a rational level, something he was aware of, but it is very much something he did.

His comfort level maxed out with guys like Gibbs, higher ranking non-coms. Guys who ran teams. Sometimes even large teams. Guys who did everything that everyone on the team did, too.

But, he looks at what he did as he moved to Cybercrime. He tested his team. That’s right out of the non-com playbook. Learn your players, find out what their strengths are, and use it. Because he thought he was the DC Branch Cybercrime Team leader. Leon was the officer, and he was the sergeant who really ran the team.

That was a comfortable move he was more than ready to make.

Turns out Leon had some tricks up his sleeve, and apparently gave him a stealth field commission. So, the next thing he did was build an entirely new system to make the whole damn army he worked with more effective.
Which is not a team leader sort of thing.

That’s officer land. Officers build systems. They look at big objectives and come up with end goals. Put a beachhead on Normandy. Go redo the way NCIS handles paperwork and free up hundreds of man hours a day for the whole agency. Build a system for rooting out corruption in the entire Federal Government. Officer-land.

Tim swallows. Given some power, apparently his first instincts are to do ‘officer’ things. While trying to look as much like a sergeant as possible.

Non-coms run teams. They run good teams who, when given a job, can see the job, do the job, and make whatever stands between them and the job go away.

And that’s Gibbs, and these days, Tony. Dispatch calls. They drop a job in his lap. And he does whatever has to be done to get the job done. And if that means unraveling a twenty-part conspiracy, the conspiracy gets unraveled.

But Gibbs, or Tony, doesn’t go out and find the jobs. They don’t make the jobs. They really don’t build the tools that lets everyone else do the job, too.

On top of that, jobs aren’t system. Go get this bad guy, go solve this puzzle, that’s a job. It might have a ton of parts. It might be a very complicated job. They might have immense leeway on how to do the job.

But it’s a job.

Look at the job, look at all the jobs, and see what people need to do it better. Give them better tools, better environments to do the job, get the right people in the job. That’s a system.

And Tim, driving home from CrimeWeb, and on the verge of an FBI career, builds systems now.

And he wishes, as he’s driving home, that he could talk to Admiral Nelson McGee, who was once Lt. Nelson McGee, standing on the deck of a sinking ship in Pearl Harbor, shooting a gun he wasn’t rated on because the gun crew was dead, rapidly coming to the conclusion that in a world of airplanes, battleships were overrated.

Nelson saw a system problem, and spent his career shaping that system. And when Admiral Nelson McGee died, his fingerprints were all over the entire Naval Aviator system, from the design of aircraft carriers, to the policies that got them built, to the reworking of the Navy to shift focus away from bigger and bigger battleships to faster and better planes with longer ranges.

As he pulls into his driveway, seeing all the cars but Jimmy’s, he wishes he had more memories of Nelson. Wishes he could guess what he would have said.

Well… he closes his car door behind him and heads in, he wishes he could guess what he would have said besides, “Get it done.” He’s absolutely sure Nelson would have said something along those lines.

“Earth to Tim…” Jimmy’s saying as Tim’s standing in the bathroom, holding Sean, who is screaming his little head off. Yes, his sisters may like tubby time, but Sean is under the impression that bath time is his own personal hell and he should never, ever have to be dipped in a bathtub. And soap… The less said about intentional attempts to apply soap to his tiny person, the better.
In that he’s starting to get crusty (and smelly), his parents (all four of them) have unanimously decreed that Sean’s getting his bath tonight.

“Yeah…” he’s patting Sean, making shushing noises, he’s not even in the water yet. Tim hasn’t even gotten him undressed, yet.

Jimmy’s drying off Anna. They’ve got the girls done and out of the tub. They decided that tubby time with a guy as little as Sean will go much better if there aren’t three bigger girls in the tub at the same time. “We’re out.” Tim nods, seeing the water draining out of the tub. He waits for it to finish, hushing Sean, bouncing him gently, “Come on, baby, it’s not that big of a deal. Someone’s pretty stinky and needs a tubby.”

Sean is not mollified.

“I’m getting in, too!”

More wailing. The water finishes draining away. Tim gives the tub a quick rinse, and then gets the water going again. “It’ll be fast.” He puts Sean on his back, on the bathmat, and begins to strip his own clothing off. Sean, apparently deciding that he’s been given a reprieve from a fate worse than death, begins to calm down.

Jimmy sees that and says, “I wonder if he can see the tub when you’re holding him up, and that’s why he flips out.”

Tim shrugs, pulling his socks off. “I’d think he wouldn’t be able to see it from that far away. His eyes aren’t that hot, yet.”

“Even I can see a bathtub from six feet away. His eyes aren’t that bad. When we get done, let’s order one of those baby tub things people pop in their sinks, and see if it’s just the tub that flips him out.”

Tim nods. “Fine.” He finishes undressing, and then strips Sean out of his onesie and diaper, lifting him to his chest. Once Sean’s up, he starts yelling again. “I think you’re onto something.” Tim grabs the baby soap, and, chin on Sean’s head, says, “Come on. No tubby for you. Let’s see if you like the shower better.”

Sean calms down some as they leave the kids’ bathroom, and he’s done crying by the time Tim gets him to his bathroom. Tim turns on the water, waits a moment for it to get warm, and steps in, his own back to the water. He gets the washcloth wet, and gently rubs is over Sean’s back. Sean’s startled by suddenly being all wet on his back, but he doesn’t scream.

Tim shuffles him around a bit more, once his back is done, so he’s cradled in his arm, looking up. He gently dabs soap on Sean’s tummy, legs, and feet. “So, what is it about you and bathtubs? Or do you just want some time without all the girls?”

Sean stares up at him, face going red, grunts, and poops on him.

Tim shakes his head, rolls his eyes, and says, “At least you waited until we were in the shower.” Then he yells to Jimmy, “Hey, we need the bleach wipes in here!”

---

Kids are asleep. Shower is sanitized. It’s a bit before nine and the adults are “done” for the night.
(Okay the three of them who aren’t on Sean duty are ‘done’ for the night.) Tim’s already in their bed, trying to get an early night, because he’s got another early morning.

“Where were you when we were getting Sean ready for his bath,” Jimmy asks as dries off his hands, heading out of the bathroom. (Wipe down shower with sanitizing wipes, toss them in trash bag, take bag to trashcan, and then wash up hands. They’ve done this more than a few times.)

“Uh…” Tim thinks back. He got Sean washed up, and himself, and then dried, dressed (Sean, Tim’s under the blankets, so he’s perfectly fine in his skin.), and into bed. “It’s silly.”

Jimmy shrugs, sitting on the bed, unbuttoning his shirt. “Don’t want to talk about it silly, or feels stupid silly?”

“Eh. Some of both maybe…”

“The ‘Sir’ thing Abby was talking about?”

“Yeah.”

Jimmy waits to see if he’ll say more.

Tim shrugs again. He licks his lips and looks up at the ceiling. “In The Captain’s house, he was in charge. Always. For everything. Immediate, unquestioning obedience was the drill. And God help you if you failed drill. That’s why we called him, even mom, The Captain. I called him, Sir, most of the time. Dad was okay, but if he was talking to me, sir was how I responded. ‘Please pass the salt, Dad,’ was fine. ‘Go clean your room.’ ‘Yes, Dad,’ wasn’t. That had to be ‘Yes, Sir.’”

“Sir was the mark of respect, and Dad was his title.”

Tim nods at that, rolling on his side, facing Jimmy, who’s standing up, getting undressed. “Yeah… Why you’ll absolutely never hear me tell any of the kids to call me, or you, or anyone else, ‘Sir.’ Mr. or Ms. will be more than enough for that.”

“Okay.” Jimmy pets Tim’s knee. “And…”

“And that was being an officer. Stand around, bark orders, and expect immediate, unquestioning obedience, followed by more orders, and more yelling, and then chew everyone out for not doing a good enough job.”

Jimmy’s following along just fine with this. “So, it’s not a mystery why you wouldn’t want to be that.”

“Exactly. And… But that’s not it, you know?”

Jimmy eyes Tim, heading into the bathroom to grab his toothbrush and start on his teeth, en route he says, “Uh… No. You’re not being specific enough about what’s it.”

Tim talks a bit louder to be heard over the water. “Any level of command will have people who bark orders and demand immediate compliance. Corporals do that. Screaming at people isn’t what makes you an officer.”

Jimmy pops out of the bathroom, toothbrush in his mouth. “I’ll take your word for it. My clients don’t order me around.”

“Gibbs isn’t an officer.”
Jimmy looks confused. He holds up a finger, darts back into the bathroom, finishes up with his teeth, and comes back a moment later, sitting on the bed, saying, “Uh… He’s the guy who’d say ‘jump,’ and we’d say ‘how high.’”

“I know. That’s… part of what I’m sorting out here. He’s not an officer because he’s the guy who gets told what the job is and then goes and does it.”

Jimmy looking confused intensifies. Obviously this means something to Tim, but it’s not his understanding of what an officer is. “How is that different from being, I don’t know, a Marine Captain. They get told to do stuff.”

Tim winces, that’s also part of what he’s trying to sort out. He wiggles his fingers to let Jimmy know he’s thinking about that, but doing it too deep will derail what he’s got in his head right now. Jimmy nods and Tim keeps talking. “Gibbs isn’t an officer because he’s not. He’s Gunny and probably Sarge before that, and then Boss after. Not… Sir.”

Jimmy nods along. That part’s solid.

“But The Admiral, he’s in jail, and he’s probably still got them saluting him. He was always Sir. And he was raising me, training me, to be Sir…” Tim’s still failing around here, feeling like he’s on the verge of something, but not sure, not yet.

“We’d get along, maybe once a blue moon.” Tim licks his lips. “Probably less. One blue moon per year, right?”

“Something like that. Thirteen full moons, twelve months, so, yeah, one a year, maybe two if they hit in January and December.”

“Tenth grade science fair. I don’t remember what I built for it, but I didn’t just get the top mark, but I also got a prize, best science experiment at a Catholic school in California, something like that.”

Jimmy nods, listening to this.

“I had to write him every week, at least five hundred words. And didn’t have to, but I chose to, write to Penny pretty regularly. So, I had a typewriter, and I wrote the letter to her, stuck a carbon paper and another sheet under it, left the space after Dear blank, and popped in his name or hers in the right space when I got done.” Tim’s looking far away as he says this. “Circuitry. Um… It was a printed circuit. The guys who did stuff like that were bounding ahead, but I pulled out a version of it.”

“How do you print a circuit?” Jimmy’s aware that circuits are a thing. He can identify one if he sees one. How they get made is a nebulous concept for him.

“They made spiffy printers. I cut a block out of wood, carved the lines out, really fine, detailed lines, applied a few layers of gold leaf to it, and pressed it onto a non-conductive surface. Could just stamp them out from there. Smaller and used fewer resources than the traditional ones. They weren’t great or anything, a few minutes of use would burn them out, but, they did work, and I think that’s how I got my scholarship to Johns Hopkins. They liked the idea of their future engineers coming up with stuff like that.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah. So I wrote Penny about it, happy, excited, proud of the award, and sent him a copy with his name on top.” Tim sighs, voice shaky. “He… um… he sent me back a really happy letter.” A sort of sick smile spreads across Tim’s face. He’d floated around for a full week after he got that letter, until he got the next one bitching about getting how he’d gotten an A- on his latest French test. “He was really proud, and sent a few books about electronic engineering and conductive metals. He was thrilled that I wasn’t just redoing what someone else had done before, but going ahead, shaping things, and…” His voice is catching… “And… And that was how I’d get to Admiral McGee the Third.

“That’s a lot of how he got there, too… He was always fiddling with robotics. Not on the water… I guess he was reading up and studying then. When he was home, he’d spend hours in the garage or basement messing around with them. Computers were getting bigger, but it’s the early ’90s so what they can do isn’t known… And… Uh eventually he puts it together and becomes one of the big names in smart warfare, and then drones.

“Grandpa… Nelson, he did the same sort of thing. He’s the reason my dad had an aircraft carrier to be on.”

Tim’s voice is tight as he says, “And that’s what officers did, to him. Grandpa saw something, a hole, and he rebuilt the whole damn Navy to fix that hole. He’s the one who made a name by yelling longest and loudest about how blue water Navy was a thing of the past. And he made them listen. And The Captain, he started with robots, and he made Admiral a few years later on drones and smart warfare. And that’s what he wanted me doing, too. I’d go to Annapolis and find a thing and… And I’d use it to change the way the Navy, and warfare, works.”

Jimmy lays his hand on Tim’s shoulder. “And you’ve found your thing?”

Tim shrugs. “Maybe. One of them.” He swallows hard. “If this goes through… It’ll be the aircraft carrier of law enforcement. It’ll change tactics and organization, redo how we see the problems and how we solve them.”

“That’s a good thing, right?”

Tim nods. “If it works.”

Jimmy lies on his stomach next to Tim, resting his hands on Tim’s shoulder, looking into his eyes. “Just because he did it, doesn’t mean you can’t.”

Tim nods again. “I know.”

“Doesn’t mean you can’t go further, and do better.” Jimmy gestures to the bedroom, but meaning their family. “Like with this. You didn’t have to stay single because he got married. You just needed to do a better job of it.”

“Yeah.”

“You don’t become him by doing stuff like this.”

“I know.”

“Then…”

Tim sighs, staring up at the ceiling again. “If I do this, run this and whatever comes next, become ‘Sir’, did he win?”

Jimmy opens and closes his mouth. He doesn’t know what to do with that.

Tim sees him do it. “Yeah. I don’t know, either.”
That snaps Jimmy out of not sure what to do. He carefully applies a light head slap and gives him a gentle shove. “No. Because that’s… No. Because it wasn’t about where you were supposed to go or who you were supposed to be. That was just… cover… for who he was. The crap he put you through was about him, and who he was and… Your grandfather wanted his boys in the Navy, wanted officers, and he managed to do it without torturing them, because it was about them. The shit The Admiral pulled wasn’t ever about you. The last time you saw him, you were the number two guy at NCIS. You’d blown up the damn world with a crime you’d broken open, took out a sitting President, and his entire administration, and the Supreme Court, and 85% of Congress, and both of the major political parties. You’ve already done more to change the world than he and your grandfather, combined, ever did. And it wasn’t enough, because it’s always been about him.”

Jimmy’s shaking his head, and keeping up deep eye contact with Tim, doing everything he can to make sure he feels these words. “Look at Sarah. Didn’t matter what she did, it was fine. Because it was never about being an admiral, or doing the Navy proud, or any of it. She could have been the youngest female admiral in the Navy, and that would have been another jewel in the McGee crown, and he couldn’t have cared less. Because it wasn’t about being in the Navy or doing Navy things or any of that. It was him… and whatever rats’ nest of fucked up shit is in his head, not… anything real, or tangible.”

Jimmy can tell Tim’s listening, but he doesn’t know if Tim’s hearing. “He was always going to keep moving the goalposts on you.”

Tim offers Jimmy a halfhearted smile. It’s not that he thinks Jimmy’s wrong about any of this, but… The brain knows, and the guts… not so much.

There’s a deep softness in Jimmy’s eyes as he says, “You do this, you’re… doing what you can to make things better. Really better. You tore it down, and now you’re rebuilding. Any guy with a gun can tear things down, but, rebuilding… That’s special, different, rare.” Jimmy gives Tim a quick kiss. “That’s not him winning. That’s you winning. Our world winning. He’s… Not part of this.”

Tim lifts the right corner of his mouth in something that looks vaguely like a smile, but isn’t one. “Other than he is.”

“No. He’s not. You’re here. And you’ve got his fingerprints and scars on you,” Jimmy lightly touches the scar through Tim’s eyebrow. “but it’s about you not him. Tim, he doesn’t even know this is happening. He’s a thousand miles away in a cage, completely out of the picture. The only way he’s here is that version of him you’re still carrying around. It’s all on you.”

“That sounds deep,” Abby says as she and Breena head in. They pile onto the bed with Tim and Jimmy.

“We’re in existential crisis mode,” Jimmy fills them in. “He’s on the verge of as close to Admiral as he’s going to get, and it’s freaking him out.”

Tim opens and closes his mouth at that, but… Yeah, Jimmy’s got that wrapped up pretty succinctly. And yes, people can tell you it’s okay, they can say that this is what you should be doing, that it’s all on you and all the rest of it, but… By the time he crashes into sleep that night, Tim’s not really settled.

“You’ve just got to do a better job than he did…” Tim’s thinking about that as he drives in for day three of the CrimeWeb Commission. “You’ve got his fingerprints and scars all over you, but he’s not here…” Or something like that. Jimmy said a lot last night, and Tim thinks he’s got the gist.

He remembers the six hundred versions of his wedding vows that he crumpled up and tossed out. Almost all of them variations on the theme of ‘I won’t be The Admiral.’

Tim sighs. He wasn’t able to get something he loved until he moved past, I won’t be you, and into I will be me.

His hands are on the steering wheel, and it’s a nice enough day that he’s not wearing gloves. Might even get into the low sixties today. Very good weather for March. Snowstorms this weekend, so something big and cold is moving down from Canada.

Good weather means he can see the scars on his hand right now. Big storms this weekend means he can feel the ache in his bones and joints, and that’s just going to get worse as the barometric pressure continues to change.

The thing is, the me he’s trying to be has been so thoroughly shaped by the you he didn’t want to be that he can’t pull them apart.

Those fingerprints and scars Jimmy’s mentioned won’t come off. They’re part of him now, and…

And the man walking around, covered in scars, is going to feel some trepidation if he’s taking steps to move him closer to what got him those scars in the first place…

Eh… That doesn’t feel right.

The man walking around, covered in scars, is going to feel some trepidation if he’s taking steps to move him closer to doing something that would please the guy who put the scars on him.

But, he wouldn’t be pleased, because he couldn’t be pleased, not by anything Tim does. That's Jimmy's point.

But the ghost in his head sees this as moving toward where he thought Tim should go.

As Tim hands his car over to the valet at the Omni, he’s thinking that’s closer to right.

---

Wednesday, all the brilliant minds opened up and worked together and played with ideas and built a really solid blueprint.

Tim’s so in love with this baby it’s like Kelly, Sean, his first novel, and the job software all wrapped into one.

As the ‘blueprint’ guy, he gets to bop from group to group, see what they’re doing, poke around in it some, point out things they’re missing, and get them talking with other groups that are verging on similar territory.

They’ve got the chairs pushed aside. Whiteboards are all over the place, huge rolls of paper laid out on the floor, everything covered in scribbles, plans, laptops strewn about with people working on them, the hum of cooling fans and chattering people all buzzing around.
Tim’s got big screens up around the room, and at each one there are smaller groups of people pointing things out, talking, building, arguing, sometimes heatedly, about what they want to do. He’s got two database designers squabbling over search algorithms, looking like they’re about to start physically fighting.

“Hey!” He’s yanking them apart. Okay, one of them is about 5’11” and 275, he’s not doing anything with him other than laying a hand on his shoulder. He is gently pushing the 4’10” and maybe 97-pound female database whiz who looks like she’s about to attempt to chew the big guy’s kneecap off back a step. They’re now glaring at him instead of each other.

“It’s a prototype. You build yours. You build yours. Then test the damn things, and whichever one works better we’ll go with.”

He can see them about to draw metaphorical knives on getting the ‘best’ one done, and decides this isn’t the way to play it.

“Scratch that. Build both of them, test each other’s, publish your methods and results, open it up to the rest of the group, and we’ll see what each one is really good at, and then we’ll merge them into one that’s better than either of the original ones were.”

That gets some sour and pouty looks. No one goes home with the glory if they’ve got to build a hybrid system.

“Fine,” Mr. Big and Mopey says.

“Yes, Sir,” comes out of Ms. Little and Annoyed.

“McGee or…” And he stops, not sure if he should finish that. After all, he was just barking an order and expecting them to follow without any argument. “Just… Call me McGee.”

“Okay.”

He’s taking a lunch break. (Okay, technically, he’s taking a bathroom break. He, and everyone else in the room, worked through lunch. Or, since lunch indicates not just a mid-day meal, but a pause in the regular day to eat said meal, they worked while munching on something.) His phone, which has been sitting in his pocket all day, ignored, has wormed its way into his conscious again, and the idea of the world outside this room comes wandering back to him.

In his text inbox is a note from Abby. It’s a link to a page about systemizers versus empathizers, and he knows she’s gently suggesting that maybe his officer/non-com framework isn’t exactly helpful right now, so a bit more reading and reframing may be in order.

He sends her a kiss emoji, along with a few words about how today is going, and then finishes up.

More good stuff as soon as he gets back out there.
Tim supposes that Jimmy’s point about how officers get told to do jobs is relevant. He supposes Abby’s systemizer v. empathizer is relevant, too.

Or he would be.

But he’s not, because today was awesome and he’s been in his sandbox building his dream castle with a bunch of other people who are also amazing architects.

And though all of his family is happy to see him enjoying this so much, only Abby’s really following what he’s talking about as he babbles his way through dinner, tubby time, and bedtime that night.

But, even not getting exactly what he’s talking about on data throughput optimization, Bayesian analysis, server farming, potential cloud utilization, security protocols, and the like, Jimmy and Breena are very pleased to see they pretty much can’t get a word in edgewise because their man is a bubbling cauldron of big ideas boiling away.

Given the option between Identity Crisis Tim and Happy Genius Tim, they prefer Happy Genius.

Jimmy says to Breena, as they’re cleaning up the last of dinner, and Tim and Abby are getting the kiddos cleaned up, “You know, for the longest time I thought she was the only bouncy one of them.”

Breena laughs at that. “Just got to hit his buttons right. God, he’s not on any caffeine right now. Can you imagine that with about two Caf-Pows an hour?”

He shakes his head, chuckling, “He’ll turn into a large humming bird, zipping from…” Jimmy works on remembering any sort of term Tim was using, “SQL to Python to… compliers?”

Breena shrugs. For most of that conversation, Tim could have been talking in French for how readily she got it. But just like she doesn’t expect Tim to get it when she’s having a good day talking about funeral home regulations and inspectors, she doesn’t expect to always get it when he’s talking.

It’s okay, as long as they listen attentively, and offer support. He’ll do it for her the next time she gets talking about the 1045-ws, or new regulations for disposal of used chemicals and hazmats.

Thursday, last day of planning and getting bits and pieces done.

First day of trying to cobble together something to show a bunch of people with lots of influence and power tomorrow.

Tim hasn’t seen a lot of Manner. He’s been circling the room, too. Also talking, poking his nose in, and, more importantly, he’s been sitting there on his own laptop, working his own side of this.

So, as Tim pulls back, letting his commission do their last few hours of design work, Manner grabs him.

“I’ve got numbers.”

Tim starts to look worried. “How bad are they?”

Manner shrugs. “Could be a lot worse. For ongoing costs, we’ve got the people to keep it up, the people to get stuff into it, and the servers.”

That matches Tim’s ideas on this. They’ll need to build something to hold all of this data, which won’t be cheap. Then they’ll have to have people to run it. Also, not cheap. And people to shove data into it, that probably won’t cost a ton, but it won’t be inconsiderable, either. The rest of it… It’s all off the shelf or open source, intentionally, to keep the price down.

His ap guys are telling him that they can make this work on any phone that’s got a good enough camera to get the details necessary to do the job. Most LEOs already have phones from work, and they can be updated as old phones die. As long as someone on the team’s got a phone with a good enough camera, they can run the ap. That by itself makes this very inexpensive to roll out.

Inexpensive, as government plans go.

“Ten-year plan, at least two billion dollars, if we can get a cold enough location to run it so we can cut back on the cooling structures for the server farm.”

Tim curses quietly. Alaska, his top pick to stick a server farm, is part of Canada now. “We’d want it in the US somewhere, right?”

“Preferably. There’s got to be somewhere that’ll want one. I’ve got Congressmen from Idaho, South Dakota, and Michigan coming, hoping we can sell them on the idea of a huge, expensive project in their area that’ll bring in jobs galore.”

Tim half smiles. “Politics is always politics. Northern Michigan, though…”

Manner nods. “Yeah. That’s the one I’m hoping for, too. We’ll still need some level of warm weather cooling capacity, but not nearly as much as if it was in Atlanta.”

“And Michigan’s been in bad shape for a while now, so it would like a big job prospect, wouldn’t it?”

Manner shifts a tight smile toward Tim. Michigan, as a whole, isn’t as well off as it was in the ‘50s and ‘60s, but, as a whole, it’s not in horrible shape. Still, not horrible isn’t great, and they wouldn’t mind something to create a higher tech version of the Detroit auto-boom, though. “They seem eager at the idea.”

“They have the infrastructure for it. This is going to suck up a ton of power.”

Manner wiggles his hand, indicating sort of. “They have capacity that’s been doing nothing for the last twenty years as their population’s been shrinking. So… Who knows if it can work, and if it’s been mothballed since the ‘90s, there’s no way to tell if it’s up to code. Your grandmother’s been talking about a grant for some sort of major, sustainable,” Manner puts air quote around that, “power upgrades. Senator Mayhew, also from Michigan, has been talking about doing some sort of thing using Lake Superior tidal power. Penny’s in love with that.”

Tim’s not up to date on it. “If it works…”

“Exactly. Plus, University of Michigan’s got talent. It’s got a decent population size, at least compared to South Dakota and Idaho.”

“So, that’s where you want to see this.”

“That’s the one I’m rooting for. South Dakota and Idaho… I mean… There’s no people there. No good universities. That might be a reason to stick something like this in one of those states, jump start them, but…”

Tim kind of remembers something about South Dakota booming with a natural gas and oil rush, but he’s not sure about that. Could have been North Dakota. He knows it was awfully empty looking when he was there. “Might be a good place for our backup server farm. This thing can’t go down, so main building in Northern Michigan, smaller, quiet, unknown backup building stuck somewhere in South Dakota.”

“Something like that.” Manner’s plans and costing out did involve a backup server farm, and having both of them far away from each other is likely a good idea.

Tim smiles a bit. “That’s for you and the planning committee to deal with.”

“Exactly. After we’ve got funding. Just get me the baby to sell, and I’ll make sure it lands in a nice crib.”

“I’m working on it. Let’s see how we’re doing on our ‘prototype.’”

Technically speaking, as they’re rolling into Friday and the dog and pony show of all dog and pony shows they do not have a prototype.

A prototype is a basic version of the final product that does whatever the final thing does, on one level or another.

The thing that’s sitting on Tim’s phone, with a little spider web icon is a prop.

It looks like what the real thing is, but it doesn’t do what the real one does.

But, with twenty minutes to go before the political delegation shows up, Tim’s going over his spiel again and again, as he straightens his tie, (He’s in a full suit today. His good, gray, made for him by Tony’s tailor, looking-sharp, date-night suit.) and fidgets a little. It’s a good prop. It looks right, it will do something that approximates what the finished project should, and it’s sturdy enough that he can hand it off to these people and it shouldn’t (fingers crossed) crash.

Penny and Jake got a collection of eighty people down here for this.

More than Tim was expecting, but, given how big Congress is now, probably fewer than optimal.

“Only takes one of them to get an appropriations bill drafted,” Manner says to him quietly. Manner is not fidgeting. And his tie is so damn straight he could use it for a plumb line.

“Yeah, but it takes what, 3500 of them to get it approved.”

Manner smiles brightly. Penny’s delegation is getting closer. “Just show it off. They’ll play ball.”

Tim slaps a smile on his own face. “Wish I was as confident as you are,” he says under his breath.

“We’re Steve Manner and Tim McGee, we took down the old government, rooted out corruption that lasted for almost a century. They’ve got their jobs because of us, and we’re offering them a tool to make them look like they’re really doing something new to make things better. As long as it works and we keep smiling, they’ll buy it.”

Put that way, Tim’s smile reaches his eyes, and he gets ready to show off his baby.

Hand shaking, introductions, more smiles, okay, this is significantly less fun than building. But this gives him what he needs to keep building, so Tim’s got a smile on his face Senior would be proud of.

(A few years ago, Tony told him that according to Senior the difference between a dreamer and a con-man is that the dreamer believes in what he’s selling and the con-man doesn’t. Well, Tim believes. And, though it never occurred to him that this might be good for anything other than law, after more than a decade of interrogations, he knows how to read the people he’s talking to. He sees how they respond to what he’s saying, and he’s matching his meet and greet technique to their reactions and making them think he’s the spiffiest thing to ever spiff.)

Once introductions are done, it’s show-and-tell time.

“So, I know your time is valuable and you want to get down to it.” Tim’s got them herded in a smaller side room, sitting in a collection of semi-circles around him, Manner, a podium, and a big screen television. His guys are all in the main conference room, still working away. (He instructed them to all look like they were going to testify in court today, because eventually, he and Manner will send the Congressmen in to see what’s on the other side of the wall, but he’s also getting all the working time he can out of this week.)

On his podium, he’s got a camera to show them what’s on the test phones. He gets the camera running, and an image of two hibernating phones pops up on the big screen behind him.

He taps the first test phone. “Basic iPhone 6. We got it two days ago at the Apple store in Arlington.” Then he touches the other test phone. “And a Samsung Galaxy 7, bought it yesterday down the street. Other than upload our ap, we’ve done nothing to these. They’re straight out of the box. We got these because they were easy and available, but any phone with a good camera will run this.”

Tim touches the iPhone. “And here’s how it runs. Get into the phone.” He puts his passcode in and up pops a collection of aps. “And there it is.” He taps the small gray web icon.

“First layer of security,” he puts in another passcode. “This number will tell us which department is accessing the ap. The ap knows which phone it’s on, and if the department and phone don’t match, it won’t open. I put in the NCIS passcode, so…” On his phone, the photo screen opens. He picks the phone up and snaps a shot of his eye. “Not blinking is the tricky part. Once you’ve shot your eye, it matches your iris to the approved users and logs you in.” Tim puts the phone back down so it’s back on the big screen again. It takes a second, but everyone sees the camera screen image of Tim’s iris vanish, and the main page open.

The main page is a list of addresses.

“Okay, as you can see, we’ve got a list of addresses. When 911 gets a call, a case starts. If it’s a crime type of case, instead of say, a fire, 911 will get CrimeWeb into play. They’ll upload the recording of the call, put the address and details in, and hand it over to the Local LEOs dispatch.

“Dispatch will send out whoever’s going to be on the first bit of the case. Their phone will update with the address and relevant details as soon as they’re assigned to the case, which is how this line gets here.” Tim taps the address. That takes them to another page with several icons on it. The first one is a crime scene tape. Tim taps it and two more icons pop up: Photographs, Recordings.” Tim taps recordings.

“This is active crime scene mode. Our LEO hits this as soon as he’s on the case. This lets us know who’s working the case, and her phone will automatically begin recording everything in ear shot. Now, most phones don’t have amazing sound quality, so it’s not like this will be able to pick up conspirators whispering in the background, but anything the LEO has to say, anyone she talks to, things like how many gunshots she hears, all of that will be recorded.

“If she’s wearing a body cam, that feed will also end up in this folder. Every three minutes, all of this information will be uploaded to our servers and deleted from the base phone. That’ll keep the phone from bogging down with too much data. When she needs the data, she’ll pull it up, streaming, from the web.

“The recorder, while in crime scene mode, cannot be turned off. So, as long as she’s at a scene doing scene related things, every sound she makes is being recorded.

“In active mode, there’s also the photography option.

“When we work a crime scene we photograph everything, and then collect it. And then go back to the office, upload the photos, and arrange them. With this phone, you photograph everything and then tag it while your crime scene people are bagging it up and taking it back to the lab. So…” Tim puts the phone down and picks up his coffee cup. It’s white, intentionally. He touches his thumb to it, and then shows off that he still knows how to print a cup. Then he takes a picture of the print. Having done that, there’s a picture of his print on the big screen.

“Okay. Tagging. Since we’re in active mode, at a crime scene, everything will automatically update to this case, we add extra tags to help sort things out, later.” He clicks on the print. And on the screen they can see him type: evidence, print, coffee mug. “Normally, I would have had to have taken that print off of the cup. With this, I get to leave the evidence where we found it. That’s usually not a huge deal, but when you’re looking to see if a scene’s real, as opposed to made up, little things like where a person’s left thumb is on a coffee mug matters.”

His phone shifts from the fingerprint to a picture of Tim.

“And it’s found me. Now, we do have a device that will take a fingerprint off a person and give us an ID, but usually, if I want a fingerprint off of a thing, I’ve got to powder it, lift it, send it to the lab, and in the lab the tech will take almost an hour to get it into AFIS properly, which will then, eventually, send me an ID. That ID will have a ‘file,’ namely my legal name, my social security number, my address, any legal cases pending about me, and that’s pretty much it.

“Check this out.” He taps himself. “Here’s all the stuff I was talking about.” Tim scans through his ‘legal’ stuff. “And now we take it a bit further. As soon as AFIS brought in a name and address, CrimeWeb hit the web, and got everything online about me.” Tim flashes through his top Googles, quickly, since most of them are about his dust up with The Admiral. “And…” He switches to the AKA section, “It’s got my alter ego.” He goes through the Tom Gemcity at a speed where the people in the audience can actually read what’s on the screen.

“Now, that’s just a slightly more in depth and streamlined version of what the current system does. CrimeWeb’s saved us maybe two days at this point. Which is nice, but it’s not a big deal. Cases where every second matters are few and far between. Here’s where CrimeWeb really speeds things up and becomes worth its weight in gold. As soon as I popped up on this, any other agency that had me in their data got a heads up, and all of their data on me just went galloping into…” He backs out of Photographs, to the next icon at the top level, a manila folder with the word Cases on it. “Cases.”

He taps the folder and the time he and Tony got arrested pops up. “Hmmm… looks like I annoyed Metro PD at one point. With the old system, my Metro arrest would have popped up, and then I could have called Metro, waited on hold for God knows how long, and eventually, a file, may have, if they could find it and were willing to let us see it, wandered over to NCIS. And, maybe, if they were feeling really sharp, they may have asked what was going on and updated their information on me.

“Or they may not have, because they’re city cops and I’m a Fed, so if they were feeling peevish, or didn’t want to share, I would have had to go bug my Boss, who would have bugged their Boss, and maybe, depending on who won the staring contest, I may have gotten that file.

“With this system, I get the file. They would have just gotten a heads up letting them know where I am and what’s going on. So, that’s great, I get direct information relating to a print found at a crime scene. But, that’s a drop in the bucket. With CrimeWeb, once that print pops up an ID, every case where I’m a suspect, person of interest, witness, bystander, LEO, if my name ever goes into any case anywhere, it’ll show up in my cases folder, and I’ll have all the details.

“And, just like every case I’m involved in is sitting in this folder, so is every case any of our evidence showed up in, any case that happened at this address, anything with an identical MO, anything like that will pop up.

“And, speaking of evidence…” The next icon at the top level is a finger print with Evidence written on it. Tim taps that. “So, my guys bagged everything up, took it back to the lab, and they did their magic, and then put all of their stuff into CrimeWeb. And, just like with my ID, anything they got is also lighting up phones all around the country as bullet matches, DNA, blood spatter, drug chemical analysis, tool marks, and all the rest of it go cruising around the web, letting anyone who is looking for a clue, get the clue.”

The next icon is a smiley face. “People.” He taps it. A collection of pictures and names pop up. “Everyone we talk to goes into this section. Anyone who gives a statement has their picture taken and gets put in here. We keep every bit of intel from each person in here, and,” he taps the picture of himself, pictures of Abby, Penny, Jake, and Manner pop up, “everyone they’re linked to, that we talk to or just find in the search, pops up, too. Can’t figure out how guy A and guy B are talking to each other, this feature here will show you that they’ve got the same dentist.”

Tim exits back up to the case level. “Now, what I’ve been showing you is the version of this a LEO would have. Judges, prosecutors, defense lawyers, they’ll all have a version of this, too. We won’t be worrying about exculpatory evidence, because as soon as our suspect has an attorney, he’ll get everything we’ve got. And as soon as the defense attorney finds something, we get it, too. Part of this system is to help us not take bad cases to trial. Sticking someone in jail for ten years because some prosecutor didn’t think that one, lone print belonging to an unknown subject was worth mentioning to the defense isn’t happening with CrimeWeb. We want to make sure we’ve got a solid case before a grand jury gets brought in.”

Tim smiles at all of them, and he can see that he’s got most of them interested. “So, that’s CrimeWeb 101. I’m opening the floor to questions. I’ve got functionality. When we all feel like we know how it works, Mr. Manner will hit you with the price tag and the practical considerations.”
“If you can do the job, you should do the job,” Fornell had said that, or something close to it, to him just a few weeks ago.

Tim’s showing off his guys, who are working away, trying to explain what they’re doing, as the group of Congressmen go wandering through, asking questions and watching the work.

Tim licks his lips. He can do the job. And the job isn’t coding CrimeWeb. Technically, it’s not even getting the basic idea for it. People come up with ideas all the time. As they say in the fiction world, ‘Ideas are cheap.’ The question is: can you sit down and write the story? That’s the part that matters.

But it’s not. Well, follow through matters, finishing the story matters, but the story, that’s a small part of this. And that’s not the job, either.

He’s gotten the idea, outlined it, found the ghostwriters, got them working together, brought in the editors, found the concept artists, hired out the publicity, located the funding, put on the show for the critics, made sure the book had proper distribution.

These days, unless he’s sitting in front of a typewriter, he doesn’t ‘write the story’ anymore.

Tim listens with half his mind as Manner explains the miracle of open source code to three Senators and why they won’t be paying millions of dollars in licensing fees for this.

He doesn’t do things anymore. Writing the story, coding the software, those are things.

That’s not what he can do that no one else can. Most people can do things. He’s very good at doing things. There are things he’s done that he’s immensely proud of.

But that’s not his gift. Not anymore.

The man who can make sure all the things get into the hands of the right people, who can use those things to build better things… The man who can see what those better things are… and make other people see that they are better…

Like Jimmy said, that’s rare.

The man who can build the system that lets other men do their things is one in million.

If not more.

And you don’t let that go to waste. You don’t hide that, or pretend you can’t do it because other people did bad things with it. You don’t avoid it because it matches an idea that was used to hurt you. Can’t skip it because it might make the wrong person happy.

Who wins? Maybe that’s the wrong question. Who loses? If he’s not doing this, everyone loses.

He can do the job. He is doing the job.

And, if he’s got stars on his shoulder, or if he’s the CEO of the company, or if he’s the guy with the blueprints, standing where the skyscraper’s going to go...

And it’s not about lording over everyone else. It’s not about snapping out orders. It’s not about some sort of inherent I’m-better-than-you-are-so-get-on-your-knees-and-kiss-my-toes. At least, not if you’re really doing the job, and Tim is.

It’s about recognition that he’s the guy who can see the big picture. He’s the guy who’s juggling all the balls. And there’s something they call the guy who keeps all the pieces in place…
“Sir?” It’s one of the younger members of the A team, trying to get his attention, and for the first time ever, Tim just turns toward the voice, accepting the title as his. “Yes.”

He flashes a relieved smile at Tim. “I’ve got two Congressmen here who’ve got questions I can’t answer.”

“No problem,” Tim reads the kids’ name tag, “Lin. Mr. Barnes and Ms. Kohn, what can I do for you…”
On Friday night, later than he would have liked, but earlier than Penny, Ducky, Bishop and Jake will get in, Tim sweeps in, in conquering-hero-home-from-the-wars mode, while Shabbos is in full swing, snags Abby, the closest of his spouses, gently pulls her out of her chair, bows her back into a Hollywood kiss, and once he’s got Abby on her feet again says, “They bought it! Appropriations bill for CrimeWeb with 78 sponsors will hit Congress whenever they get it beaten out!”

He follows that up with hugs and kisses for the rest of the group, and then more or less flops into a chair, where he finishes the rest of the meal by eating everything that isn’t nailed down, (he’s coming to the conclusion that he might not have fed himself anything between now and breakfast) and then heads to their bedroom to crash into a dead-to-the-world sleep.

Saturday… Afternoon on Saturday, he’s awake. Just about the same time Abby crashes for a nap.

That feels good, she’s soft and warm and pressed up against him, and his body, which after getting some sleep and moving off of massive job/existential crisis mode, is reminding him, in no uncertain terms, that yeah, getting himself sorted out on a brain level is lovely, but he’s got some other things he’s been ignoring this last week, and they’d really like some attention.

Lots of attention.

Warm, wet, slippery attention, preferably from both of his ladies.

He hears retching from the bathroom. Breena heads in to join them, too. Must be naptime, which means he’s been in bed for eighteen hours. He rolls over to give her a little kiss when she drags herself into bed, and she groans, with a bit of a retch, which is when he notices he hasn’t brushed his teeth since yesterday morning and likely isn’t very pleasant to kiss.

“Sorry.”

Another groan. Mental note, if your breath is bad enough to peel paint from the walls, don’t talk to the woman with killer morning sickness.

He sighs, one lady down, and then gets up, because not only is he horny as sin, but his bladder is about to explode.

Abby’s in a crabby mood, which makes sense, Sean’s hitting his two-month growth spurt and right now he wants to feed all the damn time. So, sore boobs, a little barnacle who’s also in a crabby mood, because his sleep schedule is upside down, and even though he’s got a house full of people who will happily apply food to him and let his mama nap in an effort to make her feel better, Sean ONLY wants Abby.

And, of course, if Sean’s getting all the mommy time, then Kelly wants all the mommy time, too. Or as she put it when he tried to put an arm around her when she got up from her nap, “I’ve had another person clinging to me all day today, if anyone else touches me, I’m going to scream.”
Tim removes his arm, while Breena and Penny commiserate, Bishop and Ziva take notes, and Jake backs slowly away, a look of horror spreading across his face.

Two ladies down. Looks like Ms. Lefty’s getting a workout come shower time.

Jimmy catches his eye, and the look is supposed to be a maybe if we can pry Sean off of her and get her a few hours on her own she’ll perk up sort of look, which Tim gets, but it also reminds him that Ms. Lefty isn’t his only option.

And, as he tries to remember the last time he got off with someone else (Sunday? Morning? Maybe?) or got off period (Monday? Tuesday? Eh… not recently) he’s thinking that he probably does qualify as more than horny enough to play with Jimmy, and hell, maybe that’ll cheer his ladies up, too.

He smirks a bit at that, and Jimmy’s who’s watching him catches it, flashing him a what? sort of look. Tim shakes his head, no way to say, ‘Never let it be said that I can’t multitask,’ without literally saying it. Jimmy’s learning sign language in leaps and bounds, but if he starts signing to him, Jake and Ellie will wonder what’s up.

It’s a quiet afternoon. That snow storm has shown up with a vengeance, and is dumping a pile of snow on them.

Which means Bishop and Jake are here, sleeping on the other side of their bathroom, for the duration. For that matter, so is everyone else. Short of an all-hands-on-deck situation (and with fifteen inches of snow on the ground, and more coming down, Tim’s thinking that as long as the power holds out, all-hands-on-deck will mean all-hands-remoting-into-work) no one’s going anywhere.

The guy on the weather channel says this is some sort of weird polar vortex thing that’s going to be giving them a colder, snowier, and all around less pleasant spring than usual.

On the upside, Jake might not look like the kind of guy who knows his ass from and ax handle, but he grew up a farm boy in Oklahoma. He’s used to hard winters and chopping firewood.

They’ve got frosty cold, a fire tearing through their firewood stock, and an extra set of hands, which Jimmy and Tony (who tends to get the bulk of wood chopping work these days) really appreciate.

And once the chopping is done, there’s playing with the kids, some snow shoveling (a quarter mile long driveway is hell to shovel, unless you’ve got twelve people doing it) and Gibbs breaking out his dad’s copy of Monopoly.

A long snowy afternoon bleeding into a dark snowy night, bowls of beef stew, golden wedges of cornbread, little people romping around with Mona, and a cutthroat game of Monopoly makes for an awful nice Saturday.

“What was that look you were giving me?” Jimmy asks as he and Tim creep out of the girls’ room, having given them all their goodnight kisses.
“Uh?”

“We were talking about Abby being in a porcupine mood, and you flashed me a look, and I knew it meant something, but not what?”

“Oh… Yeah. Uh…” Tim licks his lips, feeling a little weird saying it. “Okay… Haven’t gotten off since… I don’t actually know when, and… like you said, horny enough to play with each other when the girls can watch… and… Maybe if they got to watch it might help perk up Abby’s mood and distract Breena from feeling like shit.”

Jimmy smiles dryly. “You’re looking to altruistically get your rocks off?”

Tim sneers. “That’s just the kind of guy I am. Are you game?”

“If you were serious about giving as well as receiving, yeah. Probably not as long as it’s been for you, but… I’m missing getting loved on by something not attached to me.”

Tim was more hoping to receive than give, but, he was more on the getting end last time, and if he’s going to ask, he should also be offering. “Yeah, I was. You still want that blow job.”

Jimmy’s eyes go wide at Tim saying it that bluntly. “Uh… Yeah.”

“Okay. I hope I’m not terrible at it.”

Jimmy laughs. “Me, too.”

Bishop opens the door to their hallway just on the tail end of that ‘too.’ “That kind of laugh sounds like someone’s telling dirty jokes.”

Both guys stop dead and blush.

Bishop rolls her eyes. “Oh come on! I’m married! I’ve got three older brothers. I know you guys talk about sex and joke about it.”

“Yeah, well…” Jimmy says.

“So…”

He flashes a panicked look at Tim, and Tim quickly saves, “Bishop, if I even attempt to tell you that joke, Penny will string me up by my toenails and force me to read the Feminist Manifesto until my eyes bleed. Hell, if she even finds out that I know this joke, I’m going to end up neck deep in shit.”

Bishop rolls her eyes. “Fine. Is it okay if I pop my PJs in your drier?”

“Sure,” Tim says.

“Why just the drier?” Jimmy asks.

“I like them nice and toasty when I put them on. Tony’s got a copy of Chinatown queuing up. You guys in?”

Jimmy glances to Tim and then yawns. “Probably not. That’s like two hours long, and I don’t want to stay up that much later.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. I’m still feeling drained from the week. I bet the girls want an early-ish night, too.”
“With any luck, Sean’s had everything he wants to eat, and he’ll go back to sleeping in three hour stretches, and everyone will be in a better mood tomorrow,” Jimmy says.

Bishop nods at that. “I hear that.” She heads into Jimmy and Breena’s room, and a moment later is out with jammies in her arms. “Look, if you and Breena want your room back, get some real sleep… I mean, you’ve got sofas, it’s not a problem.”

Jimmy waves that off. “You’re right, it’s not a problem. Go, sleep. The girls get the bed. We camp out on the floor. And occasionally, that one forgets who he’s next to and pokes me to go get Sean.” Technically it’s Jimmy’s night with Sean, and Tim’s appreciating how Jimmy’s building in a reason for why they may see him roaming the halls with the little guy. “It’s okay.”

---

“We’re getting an early night?” Abby asks with an eyebrow high. (She been looking forward to Chinatown.)

Tim nods, giving her her best, really, you want to come to be, swear to God and on a stack of Bibles, you’ll like this.

She shoots him back a I’m so not looking to get laid tonight look.

He sends back I know that. Just come to bed.

“Okay, I guess we’re getting an early night. Apparently someone wants his snuggle buddy.”

“Yes.” Tim smiles, grabs Abby’s hand, and draws her back toward the bedroom. Breena’s already in there, she crashed shortly after babies went down, and Jimmy’s in the bathroom, brushing his teeth.

“Oh, you are so right! That is way better than Chinatown!”

Tim smirks and telegraphs very clearly that he’s about to hug her. She nods at that, so he does it. “And yes, I’m missing my snuggle buddy, too. But I also get not wanting to be a full time teddy bear.”

She sighs… “It’s just…”

“As much as any guy can get it, I think I do. I’m fairly certain I wouldn’t want to be chewed on for five hours a day, with big sister deciding little guy’s getting too much Mom time and glomming on from the other side.”

“Thanks.”

So, it’s bedtime. The girls are really looking forward to this. Tim’s certainly looking forward to… half of it. He’s really looking forward to the girls looking forward to it. And his dick, which has gotten the idea that there may be some sex in the offing, soon… ish, is perking up.
But, they’re still a bit awkward on how this all works.

Just roll over and start necking isn’t exactly part of his routine with Jimmy.

But, as horny as he is, he’s not the kind of guy who’d just go straight for the dick. So… He settles in next to Jimmy, and they shuffle around for a moment, figuring out where arms and legs go (both of them are used to being the guy who’s holding onto, instead of being held, for example), and how to get comfortable lying next to each other.

It takes a moment, but they find their spots, and settle in.

---

Kissing is good. Happy girls watching makes kissing even better. And, hell, they’re guys. They’re horny guys. Neither of them is really looking for much in the way of foreplay, so it’s not long before Tim’s got Jimmy on his back, kneeling between his legs, dick in hand and…

The thing is Tim has an exceptionally vivid understanding of how a really good blow job feels, and a rather vague understanding of how one goes about producing said sensations.

Suck, lick, nibble, slide, he has the basic techniques down, in the sense of he can name them, but… he doesn’t know what his mouth is supposed to be doing for this. He doesn’t have any muscle memory because other than a few licks and a very short bit of gentle sucking, where Breena was producing most of the stimulation, he’s never done this before.

But, a lick is a lick, and a dick is a dick, and it’s not rocket science, so…

Half the time, when Abby’s doing it, she’ll pull him straight into her mouth. Full immersion shock. Dry and warm and then wet and hot and nothing in between. The other half, she’ll take him in hand, and start with licks.

He figures that’s the way to go with this.

Jimmy’s dick fits pretty comfortably in his hand. It’s a little thicker than his is, and it fills out his fist nicely.

“Okay?” He looks up at Jimmy, who’s lying there, one hand behind his head, other gently petting Tim’s hair.

“I’ll talk you through it.”

That gets a little smile out of Breena. “There’s a good memory.”

That’s got both Tim and Abby’s attention. “I want to hear that story,” Abby says.

Tim nods. “Me, too.” He figures story time will help with this quite a bit.

He starts to sit up, and Jimmy shakes his head. “Don’t let go.” Okay, yeah, it’s Tim holding on, but it still feels nice.

Breena flashes him a genuine smile. “Yeah. We’ll talk. You listen, learn, and play.”

Jimmy smiles back at her, a very warm glow in his eyes. Yeah, this combination will work splendidly for him. He twits a bit, and kisses her hip. “And anytime you want, feel free to climb on,” he wiggles his tongue. “You can keep still, and I’ll do all the rocking.”
Her hand strokes up his arm. “If I feel up to it, I’ll join in. Just…” she sighs.

“Yeah, we know.” Tim replies. “I’ve always had absolutely no interest in sex whatsoever when I’m feeling sick.” He lifts up and kisses Abby. “Same for you, though. Party’s always better with you, baby.”

She kisses back. “I know. Maybe in a day or so… So, tell us a story, Ms. Breena.”

“Okay, so…”

Tim’s mostly listening, but he can’t not pay attention to what he’s holding onto, too. He’s never looked at a dick this closely. He can’t see his own from this angle, and that’s the only other dick he’s got anything like this close of a relationship with.

It’s actually… Kind of nice to have the freedom to really look.

He’s not sure if Breena knows what he’s doing, or if this is just how this works, but she’s saying, “You’ve got to remember, I’d never actually seen Jimmy naked at this point. We’ve petted and played some, but I was serious about no sex before we got married. So, I’ve felt it, through his clothing, seen it the same way, and that’s it. And, anyway, this seemed like a good way to get to know it.”

“God, yes!” Jimmy says. “Our wedding fell apart, and I’ve been working flat out, and then I finally get to go home, so I sent her that text, and she sent me that note back, with everything she wanted to do on it, and on the top was ‘learn how to give a’ bold, italics, underlined, with asterisks around it, in all caps, ‘AMAZING blow job.’”

Breena smiles prettily at that, and the rest of them laugh.

“And you were happy to be her guinea pig?” Abby says.

“Shockingly enough, I was indeed interested in that,” Jimmy says with a grin of his own. “And not just on a this sounds like it’ll be a ton of fun sort of thing, but also… We finally get to the having sex part of our ‘honeymoon’ and… It’s like being fifteen with a naked girl for the first time all over again. Except, this time I kind of know what I’m doing, but… Giddy and so excited, and I don’t want to be a thirty-second-wonder, so something to blow off some steam ahead of time so I can focus on her seemed like a really good thing.”

“And, I wanted to actually get to look and touch and play and explore before getting to the ‘main event’ so to say, so this seemed like a good plan to me, too.”

‘Look and touch and play.’ Tim’s looking. On one level, it’s a dick. It looks, pretty much, like every other dick. But, just like every pair of brown eyes look more or less the same, there’s a lot of variation covered by ‘more or less.’ And just like a pair of brown eyes belonging to your lover are vastly more interesting than a pair of brown eyes on a stranger, the same is true with dicks.

It does fit comfortably in his hand. There’s a gentle curve up toward Jimmy’s tummy. Built in g-spot stim. Skin colored skin, and the head is about the same color as Jimmy’s lips and nipples. So… about like pretty much every other guy… Probably. Not like Tim’s got an encyclopedic library of mental images to compare to.

“I was doing the same thing Tim is. Just, saying hi, getting acquainted.”

And that’s pretty much what Tim is doing. He can remember doing this with Abby, too. Laying her out, propping up on one elbow, and just looking. Granted, in that case, looking didn’t last all that long, because he wanted to touch and taste. He knows he did this with Breena, too, feeling the rush of just seeing everything for the first time.

Jimmy’s pale enough that Tim can see a few veins under the skin, and he’s got a little freckle just below the head of his dick.

He lets go, and gently draws his finger up Jimmy’s dick. Trailing from base to tip, and then circling it, just feeling. His skin is soft, softer than anywhere else on his body, and the head is broader than Tim’s, nicely firm under his finger. Jimmy twitches a little when he does it.

“It wasn’t exactly what I was expecting,” Breena says. “Sounds stupid. I’d seen pictures, read the sex books, and certainly rubbed up against it enough, but… Just sitting there, holding it, getting to really see…” Breena pets Tim’s shoulder. “It’s different, isn’t it?”

Tim nods, looking up to Breena. “Probably not quite as different for me. I mean, I’ve got one, too.”

“Yeah, but you never expected to be doing this, did you?”

Tim inclines his head a bit. “There is that.”

Breena wraps her hand around Tim’s, and Jimmy sighs, a happy little exhale. “It’s warm and fills up your hand, and so soft.” She strokes Tim’s hand up and down Jimmy, and Jimmy groans. “I didn’t expect it to be that soft.”

“What did you think it would feel like?” Abby asks.

Breena shrugs. “I don’t think I had an expectation… Harder, maybe.”

“Baby, it was plenty hard,” Jimmy says. “There was literally not a single cell of blood not required to keep me alive, anywhere else.”

“Well, yeah, but… It doesn’t actually feel like wood or steel or rock, you know?” She squeezes Tim’s hand, and by extension, Jimmy. “There’s some give, and this really soft, smooth layer, and the firm core underneath…”

And as she’s saying it, Tim’s feeling it. He hasn’t paid this sort of attention to his own dick since he was twelve, probably, and still figuring out what all it could do.

He can feel Jimmy in his hand, and the smooth skin Breena’s talking about, feel it slide over engorged spongy tissue under, feel that getting fuller and harder in his hand. He isn’t expecting how that makes him feel. There’s a rush at it. He knows how it feels to go harder like that. He knows the pleasure and the full feeling that goes with it, the stretch of skin growing tighter and dick getting harder, and feeling it happen in his hand, from something he’s doing (at least partially) is a kick. It sets his own dick to perking up.

That’s… He doesn’t have a good word for it, trippy, almost. He’s feeling it from both sides. The emotional, sensational feel of sex, the pleasure centered in his own body, and the physical, real, tangible feel of it in his hand, all at once.

“Oh.” Falls out of his mouth.

Breena lets go of his hand and strokes his hair. “You okay?”

Tim blinks. “Uh, yeah, just…” He scoots around a bit, so he’s next to Jimmy, heads to tails, and tugs him a bit so Jimmy’s propped on his side, facing Tim. “Try it, too. It’s… You’re doing it, but you’re feeling it, too. It’s… like turning on the girls because that’s good and makes you feel good, but it’s more intense because you’ve got all the parts, too, and…”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow at him.

“I’m not explaining it well. Just… You’ve got a dick, and it knows, and when you’re doing it… It’s a good positive feedback cycle.”

Jimmy shrugs a bit, and then rearranges the pillows, so he can lay comfortably, and tosses one to Tim so he can do likewise, and then takes Tim’s dick into his hand.

Tim’s turn to sigh. Yeah, nice, warm hand. Nice, warm, BIG, hand. Like his dick, Jimmy’s hand is wider than Tim’s, too.

“We didn’t exactly do that,” Breena says.

Jimmy’s lightly tracing over Tim’s dick, which Tim is really liking, as he says, “Would have lasted about three minutes sixty-nining.”

Tim nods. He’s been there. “Yep. That’s full body, and full brain sex. Everything about you that likes sex or is part of sex is involved.”

“So, you two look like you’re in a pretty good set up,” Abby says.

“Mmmm…” Tim says as Jimmy gives him a pleasant little twist, and then Jimmy groans when Tim does it back to him. “Yeah. See what I mean?”

Jimmy nods. It is different, more intense, when you’re feeling what you’re doing and feeling it being done back to you.

“I still want to hear about learning how to do this,” Tim adds.

Jimmy and Abby second and third that.

So, Breena continues. “I’d read enough sex books to know that a dick might be the most obvious part, what with it standing up and looking you right in the eye, but it’s not the only part that wants to get touched.”

Tim agrees with that. He lets go of Jimmy’s dick and gently cards his fingers though his pubes. Abby does that to him sometimes, and it’s not earth shatteringly sexy or anything, but it’s a nice hello sort of move. Plus, it’s also a chance to really feel them. Which is something else he’s never done much of before.

They’re thicker than his. Not just in the sense of each individual hair, which is true, but Jimmy’s pubes are also more densely packed. Rougher, too, which probably goes along with thicker. And… and this makes Tim smile. Some of them are gray. The hair on his head, after October, rapidly overtook Jimmy on the gray front, but at least he’s still young down below.

“What are you sniggering at?” Jimmy asks.

“The many marvelous variations of human anatomy.”

“Bull,” Abby says.

Tim chuckles a bit. “You’ve got some gray pubes.”
Tim can feel the eye roll, and he really feels Jimmy nip him on the hip.

“I’ll behave.”

“You better.”

Abby gets them back to Breena’s story. “So, you’re… kneeling…”

“Yeah. He was laying back, like he was when Tim started, and I was kneeling between his legs. I started with his thighs, brushing my hands up the insides of them. Familiar territory, but… naked, you know… That feeling of this is mine and I get to touch it. Then, what Tim’s doing, getting to sort of pet. Run my fingers over and through.”

“You tugged it, too. I liked that. Which was a surprise. Never thought about anyone doing that, but, it felt nice.”

Tim tries a gentle tug, and Jimmy’s hips follow his motion, a quick jerk to go with the sensation. Then he does something he likes, very lightly trailing his fingers over the hairs, skirting the edge of Jimmy’s leg, tracing the line of hair up his belly, and down again. Jimmy wriggles a bit at that, and does it back to Tim, which fills him with a light, shivery sensation.

He tries blowing on it. Abby, when she has pubic hair, likes that, and Breena does, too. Might be a treat for Jimmy. He feels Jimmy look up at him, but that feels more like a what did you just do? moment than a that was awesome, do it again! response.

“And, that’s where I… didn’t run out of ideas, I had ideas, but… I didn’t exactly know how to start. So, I asked Jimmy what he liked, and he said—“

“Anything you want to do; I’m going to like.’ And I did!”

“Yeah, but that wasn’t exactly what I was looking for. But, I didn’t know how to ask for what I was looking for, either, so… I wrapped my hand around it…” Jimmy sighs as Tim matches Breena’s story. He’s not sure if he’ll stay with it or not, but right now, this works fine. “And then I just licked. Like a popsicle.”

Tim tries that. Jimmy tastes good. Tim’s not really expecting that. Clean skin tastes like not much of anything normally, but… He knows he likes turned on woman, and he knows he likes that even better when some of his own musk is added in to it, and… Turned on Jimmy works for him, too. The scent/taste isn’t as strong as with a woman, but, Jimmy’s not as turned on as Abby or Breena would usually be by this point, and he’s really not as far along as Tim would be if his own scent/flavor is getting added to the mix, let alone licked back off of one of the girls.

He liked doing it better with Breena on Jimmy, and God, he can’t wait to do this with Abby in the mix, too, but… It’s not bad on its own.

He presses his tongue flat against the base of Jimmy’s dick, and drags it slowly up the length. Tim knows he likes that, and the nudge of Jimmy’s hips toward him lets him know he’s doing okay. And, like with the scent/flavor aspect, he also wasn’t expecting that doing it would feel good.

Pussy feels good against his lips. Especially wet, bare pussy. It’s all soft and slick and it’s like the best kissing ever because it tastes better than a mouth and smells like sex and it’s just an all around really good kiss that makes him feel good all over. Okay, no tongue action unless it’s his, and no sucking either, but even with that, kissing pussy doesn’t just make Abby or Breena feel good, it feels good to Tim, too.
It makes his dick hard. It’s completely hardwired into his mind as sex. Hell, the first time he went down on a girl, he was laying on his tummy, and just the taste and the smell and the position meant he got off doing it. (Which also meant he had a better time than his girlfriend did. It took a few more times before he got the trick of it.)

And apparently, so does licking a dick. It’s nicely firm and smooth and it feels good against his tongue. He’s got the idea that sucking on it probably feels nice, too, so he tries it. Just the tip. He’s not sure about doing much more than that, yet, but the top half inch of Jimmy’s dick slips easily between his lips, and sucking gently, sliding his lips against Jimmy’s glans feels good.

Abby squeaks at that, and Jimmy lets out a little startled gasp, apparently not expecting Tim to move that fast.

He feels a hand against his head, and hears Abby say, “Don’t take this the wrong way, but you might be a natural at this. What do you think Jimmy, does he feel good?”

Jimmy’s still a bit stunned to be watching/feeling this, this quickly. Tim’s either having a significantly better time at this than he did, or, like Abby’s suggesting, there’s some sort of inherent cock-sucking ability that he’s got that Jimmy doesn’t.

Finally, he realizes Abby asked something, and what she asked. “Yeah. Uh… This okay with you?”

Tim pulls back. “Not what I was expecting. Abby’s mentioned it feels good and… It does.”

“Smooth and round and slick on your tongue and lips,” Breena adds.

“Yeah. Nice slide. Kind of like tongue kissing, all wet and slippery.”

Both of the girls are nodding at him.

Jimmy’s thinking maybe he was too damn far into his own head last time, because he doesn’t much remember how doing it felt, beyond his mouth being open wider than he expected it to be.

Granted, Tim’s not running into much of that yet, because he’s… again… “Ahh… yeah… that’s good…” got only the top half inch of Jimmy’s dick in his mouth, but he’s doing good things with it. And, with the position they’re in, Tim’s dick is pretty much looking him in the eye, and suggesting that it’d really like some attention, too, please.

Jimmy closes his hand around the base of Tim’s dick, pulling it down, closer to his lips, feeling it twitch a bit at his touch, and Tim’s got his hand around Jimmy’s dick, and his lips around the head, practically nursing on him with the way he’s just happily sucking away on the tip, and that connection, the feel of what’s happening to him, and the feel of what he’s about to… he shifts his position a little, opening his mouth, and just giving the tip of Tim’s dick a wet kiss, and that kiss shifts into a wet lick, and from there, because he’s hooking into it, into the feel of doing it and having it done to him, he shifts into that soft, nursing suck that Tim’s using on him and…

He groans long and low.

Tim agrees; he adds the rumble of his own voice.

It’s not even a really great technique. It feels nice, but not amazing. But… Tim’s doing it and feeling it at the same time. He and Jimmy are having no problem at all keeping in a matched rhythm for this.

It’s just… trippy. Tim feels like he’s blowing himself.
Tim feels Abby’s breath against his neck. She’s curled up behind him, cuddling against his back, and she says, “Feels powerful, doesn’t it?”

He can hear the smile in Breena’s voice. “That! I remember that. Holding Jimmy’s cock in my hand, licking it from tip to base and back up again, and his hands were tight, and his eyes closed, little uuh sounds coming out of his mouth with each breath. I felt like a goddess.”

Tim doesn’t know about feeling like a goddess, but yeah, this feels good. Granted, if he could talk, he might mention that, yeah, this does feel good, but he’s had a much easier time hooking into the sex god feel with the girls. For him, this is way more of the surreal sensation of doing and being done to and having a hard time figuring out where he’s ending and Jimmy begins.

He gives Jimmy a firm squeeze to go with the sucking, just to break the illusion of fucking himself. But he’s not even done doing it when Jimmy does it back. He’s tempted to thrust forward at that sensation, but stops himself. He doesn’t want a deep mouthful of dick, yet, so he’s better off not choking Jimmy.

Tim tries something else he likes when Abby or Breena’s doing him. Instead of just holding the base and keeping Jimmy where he wants him, he starts to stroke his hand up and down. His mouth isn’t going anywhere, it’s staying steady on the tip, but if there’s anything Tim knows how to do with a dick, it’s a hand job.

He’s got really nice pressure, glide, control, speed and Jimmy groans, loud, vibrations adding a lovely tingle to the sucking he’s doing.

Jimmy ups his game in response. He slows down, and instead of just lips, he starts letting his teeth run, lightly, over the head of Tim’s dick.

Wet and sharp and… Tim’s turn to groan, loud. That’s genuinely good technique, and it feels amazing, for a few strokes he just lets it flow over him, trying not to thrust too much but it feels good and he wants to move.

Enjoying what Jimmy’s doing, Tim just stops on his end of the giving the blow job. He’s still got Jimmy’s dick in his mouth, but his hand has gone still and the only thing he’s paying attention to right now is Jimmy blowing him.

Tim breaks out of that with a jerk. If they’re sixty-nining that means he needs to be moving, too.

If.

He pulls back. And Jimmy lets go, startled, he thought he’d been doing a pretty good job. “We okay?”

“Yeah, just… can’t do and be done to at the same time, yet. Figured you’d be cool with getting to go first.”

Jimmy settles back onto his back. “I can handle that.”

He’s debating between going back to what he was doing, offering Jimmy’s tooth work back to him, or going for something that drives him crazy when Breena or Abby does it.

Jimmy’s on his back, propped on his elbows, watching Tim.

Tim grins at him, settles down further, worming his hands under Jimmy’s butt, and lays his tongue on Jimmy’s right ball.
Jimmy shivers a bit at that. He’s always liked having his balls played with, and so far, three licks into it, Tim’s doing a splendid job.

Really wet, really slick. That’s what Tim likes when Abby or Breena’s licking him, so he goes for it himself.

Mouth open wide, he’s more holding Jimmy’s right ball in his mouth than sucking on it, but he’s holding and licking and Jimmy’s groaning. It’s easy to go from really good suction to sucking too hard, balls are sensitive, but a warm, wet mouth and a little suction and tongue action, Tim knows that’s good.

Mouth full of pubes are a bit distracting, but not all that different from licking unshaved pussy, and it’s a testicle, so not nearly as fuzzy as Abby or Breena when they’re all natural.

And Jimmy trying to thrust into him, groaning, that’s… Okay, yeah, Tim’s still not sure about Sex Goddess but he’s feeling awfully good at getting those sounds out of Jimmy. He obviously can’t talk, but he does worm one of his hands out from under Jimmy’s butt, and holds it out, wiggling his fingers. Abby knows what he’s thinking of doing and rolls over, reaching for the lube.

Breena sees it, too, and she knows Jimmy likes that when she or Abby’s doing it, but figures that it’s probably a good idea to make sure Jimmy knows what’s coming next.

“You okay with Tim getting his fingers into you?”

Tim hears her ask and decides that’s a good plan. He flashes her a thumbs up for asking.

Jimmy doesn’t tense at that, but he does pause. He does like that when the girls do it, and… Tim’s not that much bigger than Abby, so his fingers… finger… he’s still firmly in the one finger camp, shouldn’t feel that different, but, even with liking it when the girls do it, it’s still a fairly slow and gentle operation, and he didn’t exactly prep for this ahead of time, so he’s not clean inside and out, but Tim knows that and is still offering, so…

“Go slow. Abby, can you grab some of the baby wipes, too?”

Tim nods a bit, and the little tug on his ball that goes with that makes Jimmy groan. Abby grabs the wipes, so Tim’s got easy clean up within hand’s reach, and they’re good to go.

Tim pulls back for a second, “Still want to hear your story, Breena.”

“Yes, well I wasn’t doing anything like that.”

Abby takes over on talking, because she wants to hear Breena’s story and watch Tim blow Jimmy. “It’s safe to say we don’t care if he’s playing out your first time. And Jimmy, you were supposed to be doing some talking through, remember?”

Jimmy groans as Tim rubs his knuckles over his perineum.

“Yeah, that’s pretty much what he did for me, too,” Breena says.

Jimmy whimpers a bit. Tim might not really know what the hell he’s doing with his mouth, because, of course, he’s never done that before, but he sure as hell knows what he’s doing with his hands, because he has done that before, a lot, and has a deep, intimate understanding of how that gentle pressure on his perineum while a slick finger just strokes over his asshole feels.

He’s got that part of this wrapped up in sparkly paper and tied with a pretty bow.
And his mouth… Yeah, that’s doing good things. Breena and Abby know a little more suction and a little less tongue, and him rocking his hips, trying to get his ball further into Tim’s mouth isn’t getting the idea across, but a wet mouth and lots of licking feels good.

Just not as good as those slick fingers and firm pressure and…

“Nghm…” and soft, panted breaths come out of Jimmy before he manages to gasp out. “Suck harder.”

Tim does, and misses the mark. Jimmy thrashes, pulling back. Tim doesn’t need Jimmy to tell him that was too hard. “Sorry.”

His next shot at it works better. Still a little softer than Jimmy wants, but Tim’s feeling tentative after that last try, and Jimmy sighs happily. “Better.”

Tim squeezes his thigh.

“Just… a little harder.”

This time Tim nails, a little harder and Jimmy groans again, fingers clenching in the bedsheets. Tim’s got him in the sweet spot right now.

Breena smiles at that, remembering… “I was treating him like he was made of spun sugar. Never played with one before, not like this, and we’ve all seen the joke about how bad a hit to the balls hurts, so I was just gently, tips of my fingers stroking over his dick, giving it light little licks, and nuzzling it a bit.”

“Treating him like a baby chick?”

“Yeah. Like if I touched it too hard it’d shatter. And… I think he was just letting me play.” Jimmy nods. He’s not really in a talking place right now, but he’s aware of what Breena’s saying. “But, after a little bit, he wrapped his hand around mine, letting me feel what good pressure was, which was probably more useful than a week of harder, softer, less soft, would have been.”

Tim’s mostly focused on Jimmy right now, but he hears that, and he’s got a hand that’s just sitting under Jimmy, cradling his butt. That hand could be doing something. He pulls his right hand out from under Jimmy, wiggles his fingers at Breena in a show me sort of way, and then wraps them around Jimmy’s dick.

Jimmy whimpers. He’s got wet and hot mouth on his ball, and slick knuckles slipping from just behind his balls to over his asshole and back, and now Tim’s other hand is wrapped around his dick, and Breena’s wrapping her hand around his, and between the sensation and the visual of two of his three loves playing him, together, he’s dying in the best possible way.

His head is back, eyes starting to close, low groans slipping from between his lips, and that’s when Tim starts to finger him. This time, when he practically jerks off the bed, it’s not about pain. Slow, dull prod, very gentle pressure, because, again, this is something Tim’s done to himself, so he’s got a pretty good idea of how much force to use to get Jimmy’s body to just slowly give around him, and eventually, assuming Jimmy works about the same way he does, he’ll pull Tim’s finger in.

And he does. Takes a few… seconds, minutes, Tim’s not sure, before he’s two knuckles deep and Jimmy’s body starts to ripple around him, feeling like a pair of pursed lips pulling against his finger.

Tim grins at that. He knows how that feels, on the receiving side, too. Almost there. Yes, he loves getting tea bagged and his prostate rubbed at the same time, but he’s not looking to draw Jimmy out for an hour here. Just looking to do a half way-decent job of getting him off.

Which means moving back to the side of this he doesn’t know how to do.

So, as he’s gently nudging Jimmy’s prostate with his index finger, he lets go of his ball and moves up to his dick.

Breena’s smiling at him, and he’s sure Abby is, too, though she’s outside of his view right now.

“Start with the tip,” Breena says. “Just like before, get it good and wet and slippery.”

Tim does. Licking all over and around, and again, it feels nice on his tongue, and good against his lips.

Jimmy’s trying to hold still. At this point he’s had all the foreplay he wants. He wants to get fucking!

“He was making that impatient little sound with me, too.”

“Two years,” Jimmy pants. “Impatient doesn’t begin to cover it!”

Tim kisses the tip of his dick and gently wriggles his finger. “It’s been a week.”

“Nghm!”

“Looks like you know what you’re doing with your hands,” Breena says, and Jimmy nods, emphatically, at that. “So, hand on his dick, wrap it up nice and snug, put your mouth on whatever’s not in your hand, and then go slow and easy. You’ll get a feel for it.”

Put that way, it doesn’t seem terribly difficult. After all, it’s oral sex, not defusing a nuclear bomb.

Tim slips his hand up so all but the head of Jimmy’s dick is sticking out of his fist, and then wraps his lips around it while keeping up a slow, steady rub with his finger.

Jimmy moans, loud. Mostly about what’s going on with Tim’s finger, but finally, getting a wet, hot mouth around his dick is doing good things for him, too.

Tim’s hands are bigger than the girls’, so, even with his fist all the way at the base of Jimmy’s dick, he’s only got a few inches sticking up on the other side. As long as he keeps his hand in place, he’s in no danger of getting poked in the tonsil.

Which is good because this is different. It’s wider and, even with his hand in place, longer, than anything Tim’s ever put in his mouth before. After all, when he eats a banana or popsicle, he takes a bite out of the top, he doesn’t try to shove the top third of it into his mouth all at once.

“Just up and down, nice and easy. Your hand’ll get wetter and slide smoother.”

He follows Breena’s voice, mostly just doing his usual hand job with his mouth on top of it. He’s not sure if this qualifies as giving head, or a really wet hand job, but Jimmy’s wriggling around and making some happy noises, so he doesn’t think it matters all that much.

“It gets more slippery, right?” Breena says.

And… actually, yeah, it does. It feels like his spit’s gone from just wet to slick, which is… cool… unexpected.

Breena takes his hand in hers, pulling it off of Jimmy’s dick and laying it on his hip. “You stay put,”
Tim assumes she’s talking to Jimmy. “Okay, slow and gentle, as low as you want to go. Just, be aware of where your teeth are.”

He can do that. And, as low as he wants… Uh… He knows what feels good from the having this done end, which is all the way down. He doesn’t think that’s happening. But, maybe, who knows? There was no version of the world where he thought this would ever happen, so…

Slow, easy, wet lips, and wet tongue, and down he goes. And nope, his nose isn’t buried in Jimmy’s pubes, his chin isn’t resting on his balls, and he’s thinking that’s probably never happening, because if he goes much further, he’s going to start gagging, and puking on Jimmy is really going to kill the mood. Four maybe five inches is more than enough.

Jimmy’s petting his hair. “You can suck as hard as you want, and go as fast.”

Tim gets that. A dick is not a testicle. It’s much happier with harder and faster. Plus, this turned on, extra stimulation is good. He sucks hard, pulling his head back up and Jimmy manages to get out, “Yah!”

He tries a few quicker strokes, and decides this wet and slick, especially when Jimmy’s hips start to roll counter point to his strokes, if he wants depth control, he needs his hand in place. So it gets back into the game, and, again, a spit slick hand on a dick is something Tim’s been doing for more than twenty-five years at this point. He knows what he’s doing with that hand.

He’s rubbing fast and steady, keeping his hand tight and a moderate amount of suction with his mouth, and he can feel Jimmy tensing up, feel the crest coming.

And like before his own dick gets into it. He can feel Jimmy stiffen, feel the extra girth, the way the skin goes tighter, and his dick throbs at it in sympathy. It wants what Jimmy’s getting, wants to be where he is. If they ever do get around to sixty-nining, he’s got the sense that it’ll be amazing.

Jimmy’s rocking against him, fast, thighs tight, one hand resting on the back of Tim’s head, his hand tight in Tim’s hair, and with every breath he’s grunting along, getting closer and closer. He’s not sure if Tim’s keeping him on edge intentionally, or doesn’t quite know how slow of a build he’s going for here, but either way, Jimmy can see the edge but isn’t quite at it.

He’s whimpering now, because Tim’s dancing him on the line.

Tim’s not intentionally spinning Jimmy out. He’s just not used to doing this, so his coordination between mouth, hand, other hand, and the rest of his body isn’t quite on point, yet.

Jimmy’s been rocking his hips against Tim, trying to get over the edge, but it’s not doing it. He’s stuck at a hair away from the tingles starting. He plants his feet on the bed, and gets his legs into it, giving himself a bit more leverage and a bit more speed, and there…

Tim feels Jimmy shift, feels the change in speed and angle, and then the dick in his mouth and hand stiffens further, and Jimmy’s ass clenches around his finger as his whole body tightens and then pulses.

Jimmy cries out at it, and much to his surprise, Tim moans, too.

He’s not sure, what, if any, expectations he had about Jimmy cumming were, but… On the one side, namely his finger, it’s exactly like with the girls. Tight and twitching. Emotionally, it’s like with the girls, awesome waves of Sex God! Mouth-wise… That’s different. There’s the pulse of Jimmy’s dick in his mouth, again and again, and not being sure how hard to suck after (if at all), and Tim knows he’s going to swallow, but he’s not entirely sure if it’s time to do that, yet.
Jimmy’s not a porn star, and Tim didn’t spin him out that hard or long, so it’s not like he’s got cum dripping out of his mouth or down his chin or anything. And, okay, it’s not a flavor he’d order a milkshake in, but like his own, it’s not nasty. He’s certainly heard about/read the salty, bitter stuff, but that’s just not part of his experience. It’s more a mouthfeel issue, warm, slimy, almost tingly, than a flavor. After a few seconds of Jimmy’s dick not doing much of anything, Tim pulls back and swallows. Then he kisses the tip of Jimmy’s dick, rests his head on Jimmy’s hip, and cuddles with him.

Jimmy’s lightly stroking Tim’s hair. “That was better than I expected.”

Tim kisses his hip. “Easier than I expected.” He looks up at the girls. “Enjoy the show?”

They glance at each other. Abby really wants to hop in. They’re both so fucking delicious like this, Jimmy spread out and spent, pink, slightly sweaty, dick soft on his belly and Tim curled between his legs, face on Jimmy’s hip, and dick hard. She’s actually wet, and hasn’t been this turned on since before Sean was born… And she’d rather cut her arm off than break into this. Yes, they’ve invited her to play, but…

This matters. In a way sex doesn’t usually matter, and she doesn’t want to cut this short or distract from it.

She glances at Breena, noticing that her color is pinking up, and nipples are hard. Apparently this has slain, or at least temporarily subdued the Morning Sickness Monster. Breena squeezes her hand and nods. She’s not cutting in on this dance, either.

“Yes, but we’re good.” Abby grabs one of the baby wipes for Tim, and gives his hand a quick cleanup.

Tim and Jimmy are not new to this dance. They can both see, even Jimmy, even without his glasses, that the girl want sex, a lot of it, NOW. And they both understand why they’re bowing out.

Tim raises an eyebrow at Jimmy. Jimmy’s done on the getting off side of the night. If he wanted to lay back, relax, and watch as the girls do him, Tim’s good with that.

Jimmy inclines his head at Tim. Like Tim’s noticed, he’s done for the receiving side of things. So, really, it’s up to Tim what he wants.

Having the ball tossed back to him, Tim gets that this is his choice. Right now he’s got the option of going with his ladies. They’re certainly willing to go on the back burner tonight, but he really doubts if he lays back and asks them to ride him, they’ll say ‘no.’

And Jimmy’s giving him the space to go with them, too, because they both know that when it comes down to it, breasts and pussy is more Tim’s speed than dick, but…

But it’s a choice. He’s got the sexual buffet of the gods in front of him, all the delicious people he could possibly want, and he gets to pick.

And sure, he loves steak. Steak is awesome. Stuck on a desert island with nothing else to eat, he’ll pick steak, but… well… maybe the occasional dish of tofu might be worth having. Variety is the spice of life, right?

He sits up. “Let me wash up, and then it’s your turn.” He pats Jimmy’s knee with his clean hand.
Tim loves to watch. When he’s having sex, his eyes are open. (Unless he’s kissing, focusing that close doesn’t work all that well for him, and the view of another eyeball, even one he loves, from half an inch away doesn’t do anything for him.)

And he loves to imagine. Sure, the line about guys thinking about sex ninety times a day, or whatever that ridiculous stat is, isn’t true, but three or four times a day, he’ll have an image of at least one, often two, sometimes more, naked people happily dancing through his mind.

And he’ll admit, that even with that, and with the fact that he and Jimmy keep getting more physically intimate, and the fact that Jimmy’s blown him before, the idea of the image of Jimmy between his legs, hand wrapped around his dick, lips wet and parted as he’s about to swallow him down had never wandered into Tim’s fantasies.

Let alone the idea that he’d like it.

But… as he’s sitting here, watching, feeling it, he is liking it. And, honestly, quite a bit more than liking it.

Jimmy’s beautiful. He’s got Tim on the side of the bed, sitting up, and he’s kneeling between Tim’s legs. He’s naked, glasses off, hair wild, little bit sweaty, and curling because of it, tongue slipping over his lips, wet lips, lips that were just wrapped around his balls, and those big hazel eyes are looking up at him, and…

And Jimmy’s fucking gorgeous. Everything Ned said about Jimmy is pouring back into Tim’s head as he’s finally seeing it.

Jimmy’s keeping up eye contact as he slips Tim’s dick into his mouth, and Tim whimpers, hand stroking over Jimmy’s cheek and chin as he restarts his experiment on fucking Tim.

Tim swallows hard as Jimmy keeps working him. Same thing he was doing earlier, hands and mouth and a bit awkward because Jimmy’s got the wet hand on dick part down pat, but he’s also not practiced at blow jobs, and even though he’s done several of prostate exams, it’s not part of how he plays with himself, so he doesn’t have Tim’s skill at that. But Jimmy did have the brains to pick a position where his legs are well situated to take his weight while he’s moving around, so he’s able to ramp up speed easily, and it’s not taking him long to get Tim cursing, happily, at him.

“Jimmy, fuck… Ahh… oh god, fuck, baby, fuck…”

Wet mouth, and those dark green eyes looking up at him, and hand, warm, tight, fast, thrusting fingers, and suction and friction and wet…

And those eyes… Waves of pleasure, sparking through his body as his own vision starts to gray out, and focus narrows down, pleasure, pulse after pulse of it centered on a mouth and dark hazel green eyes looking up at him.

There are feelings that go with his honeymoon that Jimmy’s never tried to verbalize. Having felt them, lived them with Breena, that was enough.

And, right now, as he’s got the first of Sean’s nighttime meals, they’re not precisely verbal, but he’s aware of them, again.

He and Tim talked about the thousand-dollar blow job, and the five-thousand-dollar blow job, if such a thing existed.

His first time with Breena was a five-thousand-dollar blow job. And not because of any astonishingly good technique or natural skill or any of that. On a pure physical sensation level, he’d had better blow jobs before, and vastly better ones since, but physical sensation is only part of the game when it comes to sex, and a rather small part of the game when it comes to making love.

And that night, they were making love.

It was late May, so the sun hadn’t quite managed to set, yet, and he had a few candles in the room. It was light enough to see, and see well. He wasn’t wearing his glasses, so Breena was in focus, but most of the rest of the room wasn’t.

So, he has the memory of her in sharp focus, and the rest of the world a golden-orange sunset blur.

She was rocking back and forth, listening to whatever bits of instruction he managed to get out, doing it. His astonishingly beautiful wife, naked with him, for the first time, loving his body with hers, for the first time. There was the glow of being so completely in love, enraptured, and of this moment, of being touched by hands that loved him, of laying completely open and naked, and feeling her do it, get him off.

And, he’s never been much of the no sex before marriage thing, he still isn’t, not in the sense of feeling like anyone should have to do it if they don’t want to, but…

But that space, that feeling, her lips on his skin and his body tight, full, pulsing with pleasure caused by her.

That was the intangible emotional state of love made into an all-engulfing physical sensation.

And she was absolutely right, it was the best possible wedding present she could have given him.

And then as the night wore on, it got better.

Sean’s down. Since he’s getting up to grab him again, Jimmy should be on one of the sides of the bed, but he doesn’t want that.

He worms himself into the bed, between Tim and Breena.

Breena snuggles into her usual place, on his side, arm across his chest, face against his shoulder. He kisses her forehead. Tim’s on his other side, back to Jimmy’s flank, Jimmy’s hand resting on his hip.

“You really saw him…” he remembers Abby’s voice, talking about the last time he really worked on Tim. He remembers the way Tim looked down at him tonight. Eyes low, mouth open, long spill of inarticulate pleasure as his body went tight and shuddered. He remembers the feel of Tim’s mouth on him, the feel of suck and wet, of arching up into his mouth, and the feel of Tim’s hand tight on his dick as he sucked hard, sending every nerve in his body singing.

No, not a great blow job, not on a pure physical sensation level. Tim doesn’t have the girls’ touch or experience. He’s not, when it comes to dick wrangling, a sex god, not yet, maybe not ever. And Jimmy very much doubts he qualifies as good at blow jobs, either.

He doesn’t think it matters, though.
Jimmy can feel the piece falling into place, why the “experiment” didn’t work. Why he froze.

He’s straight. He doesn’t want to have sex with men, or even, a man. He’s not ever going to be looking to get laid, with a man.

But he’s also a lover, he’s Tim’s lover, and he does want to make love with Tim.

Make love. Making love. Silly term. Jimmy, especially before Breena, considered it a euphemism for people uncomfortable with sex. But it’s not, and he gets that now. It’s the physical actions, the touches, the nice gestures, the verbs, that go along with the noun, love.

And he wants to make love with Tim in all the different ways there are to make love. And sometimes making love involves bodies and pleasure so sharp it makes you want to cry.

That’s why afterglow is good with Tim, or just sitting around talking, or fighting, or a back rub, or… any of it. It’s making love. It’s some of the physical manifestations of being in love.

But the sex part of making love is easier with the girls, because he’s wired to want sex with them. He’s had plenty of sex over the years, and devoutly hopes to have a ton more of it. But he’s not wired to want sex with Tim.

He can’t or won’t or doesn’t want to (he’s not sure where the line is) fuck Tim. He can, and will, and looks forward to, making love to and with him.

And he gets why on say, day two, of on their own, he wasn’t just jumping Tim. He was certainly horny then, but that was it, just horny, a decent toss off in the shower scratched the itch. He gets why denying himself all sex didn’t do it, either. That was looking to fuck. To get it up and off and was all about him and his dick. His brain, soul, heart, whatever, wasn’t involved in that transaction.

No sex had to go on long enough to switch away from taking care of myself into taking care of each other mode before he could get in the shower, knowing what Tim was doing, and basically make the first move.

He turns his head and kisses the back of Tim’s shoulder.

Apparently, he’s not entirely asleep, because he reaches back to pat Jimmy’s hand, before scooting back a little to press more firmly into him.

“Love you, Tim.” He keeps his voice low. He knows by the way she’s breathing that Breena’s asleep.

Tim takes his hand and pulls it to his lips, giving him a quick kiss. “You, too, Jimmy.”
Back to work after the CrimeWeb Commission almost feels like a letdown.

It’s not, not really. He’s doing good stuff, getting into the data Bishop offered, using it to build a system that tracks harassment complaints, updating the “average” and then highlighting units that are more than a standard deviation above (or below) that average for more attention. Yes, few complaints are good, but too few complaints might mean those complaints are being ‘discouraged’ if not actively ignored.

He’s not sure if that’s the golden bullet for making sure that people don’t actively try to bury complaints, but he hopes it’ll help.

It’s good work. Useful work.

It’ll make (hopefully) the Navy and Marines a much more pleasant place for a lot of people to work.

And if he’d gotten more than six hours into it before a major identity theft case rolled out of Manilla, that would have been good.

But, as it is, he’s working, along with everyone else with a skill in security systems, to nail down how a hacker got into the VA Hospital internal web in Manilla and to keep him (them?) out of it in the future, this is less build systems that change the world, and more patch holes in a fence. And somehow, fence patching has lost a lot of its shine.

But the fence has holes in it, and he’s got the tools to patch it.

So, patching he goes.

With a sigh.

Manilla is twelve hours off of DC, and Tim’s days and nights just got flipped for the duration.

8:00 AM, everyone else is getting up, and Tim’s going home. To Jimmy and Breena’s home, where he can sleep because there won’t be any little babies being little babies.

He almost drove home to his place, because sometimes Abby snags a nap when Sean goes down in the morning, but, in that it’s her first week back at work, she won’t be in the bed with him.

So, to Jimmy and Breena’s, which is currently empty.

He stays up just long enough to shovel some food into his mouth, and crashes into Breena’s bed, asleep shortly after he touches the sheets.
A few hours later, when Breena gets home, he stirs a little, snuggles in against her, and goes back to sleep.

Footsteps. One second Tim was asleep, nicely snug around Breena, and then the next he’s hearing footfalls from downstairs.

Footfalls in what is supposed to be an empty house. With Breena feeling so cruddy, the girls have been staying at daycare until Jimmy (or Tim or Abby) picks them up, closer to dinner time. That gives her some time to rest, which she’s been appreciating.

So, right now, the house should be silent.

But it’s not. Someone is moving around down there. Tim glances out the window. Whoever it is didn’t park in the driveway. His car, Breena’s car, nothing else. He scans the street. Jimmy’ll sometimes park on the street to make sure they can get out of the driveway easily. Gibbs always parks on the street. And that exhausts the list of everyone who should be moving around this house in the middle of the day.

No cars he recognizes. There are two cars he knows aren’t part of the usual cars hanging around Jimmy and Breena’s neighborhood during the day.

He rolls out of the bed fast, takes two, very quiet, steps to the closet, and has Breena’s gun safe open in a second.

She’s got a little Beretta. Ziva’s pet gun. Great. Tiny thing in his big hands. But it’s a gun, so that’s better than nothing.

He locks the door behind him, and has Tony already up on his phone.

“At Jimmy’s. Someone’s in here with me.”

No questions asked, no need for clarification. “On it. Twelve minutes out.”

Tim stalks through the hall, checking each room, but all he hears are the sounds of someone moving around downstairs. Kitchen by the sound of it.

Down the stairs, senses on high alert, whoever it is, is messing around in the kitchen, going through the drawers from the sound of it.

Tim clears the hall, gun out, finger next to the trigger, every muscle tense and ready to attack. “Freeze!”

Ed drops the bowl in his hand and all but wets his pants.

Tim feels his own adrenaline spike and then start to crash as he recognizes who’s standing in front of him. “Good God, Ed! KNOCK when you walk into a cop’s house!” Tim lowers the gun and grabs his phone. “False alarm, Tony, just Ed.”

“Doesn’t he know to knock?” Tony asks over the speaker phone. Sure, they all just walk into each other’s homes. They don’t wait for someone to open the door for them. But they also knock because it’s a bad idea to spook the guy with an enemies list and a gun.

“I think he does, now. Call off the cavalry.”
“Okay.”

Finally, Ed’s brain starts working as he decides he’s not about to get shot. “I’m not in a cop’s house, Tim. What the hell are you doing here?”

Hmmm… Those are somewhat relevant points. And, as Tim pulls out of full red-alert mode, he feels get-down-on-his-knees-and-pray level thankful that he was tired enough to just crash, because if he’d been feeling any more energetic, he would have taken off his clothing, and in full red-alert mode, he would not have put them on before going to make sure Breena was safe.

Tim swallows, sees the take out bag, sees the bowl on the floor, and says, “Probably the same thing you are, making sure Breena gets some food.”

“Oh really, where’s the food you brought?” Now that Ed’s not about to wet his pants, he’s angry, and suspicious. Yes, he saw Tim’s car when he pulled in, and he knows that the McGees are here a lot, he assumed it was Abby visiting, so he wasn’t bugged or worried about that until he heard those footsteps coming from upstairs and Tim appeared.

“In Breena. Let me put this back,” Tim says about the Beretta, hoping to buy himself some more time.

“It lives in her room!”

“Yeah, I know. That’s where I got it from.” Tim heads upstairs, fast. He pulls out his knife and pops the lock on Breena’s door (and makes a mental note to get her a better lock on her door).

“What the hell was that?” Breena sounds a bit groggy, and very ill. She woke up to the sound of a “Freeze!” and a crashing bowl. She had 911 up on her phone practically before she had her eyes open.

“Ed.” He sits next to her on the bed, and kisses her gently. “Here.”

He takes the phone from her, explains what was happening, gave the 911 dispatcher his badge number, and got that sorted out as Breena lays back down and tries to get back to sleep. When he’s done, she’s still up, so he says, “Let me put this back, and take your plates down.” Tim’s lucky enough that the plate Breena’s morning eggs were on, and her smoothie cup, are still up here. “He’s wondering why I’m here.”

That gets a small, wry smile out of her. “You mean, he knows why you’re here and wondering if he’s right?”

Tim smiles a bit at her. “Yeah. Anyway, if he asks, I showed up to get you something to eat, and do some chores. You wanna see him?”

“Sure, he can come up… OH…” She leaps out of bed and rushes to the bathroom. Tim follows, and spends a moment petting her back as she throws up. Between retches; she waves him off.

Tim gathers up the plate and mug, and heads down. He holds up the crockery to Ed. “See. Anti-nausea smoothie, which doesn’t appear to be doing the job, and two scrambled eggs.”

“You cook for her?” Ed’s staring at Tim, hard.

Tim loads the dishes into the dishwasher. “Sure.”

“Where’s Jimmy?”
“Should be at work, might be in the field.”

Ed’s watching him very carefully, seeing how easy Tim is in Breena’s home. “Uh huh… Why aren’t you?”

“I’m on eight PM to eight AM all week. Case that went hot is out of Manilla, and that’s their hours.”

“Does Jimmy know you’re here?”

If there was ever a time for balls-out no-shame, Tim figures this is it. He pulls his phone out of his pocket again, and this time dials Jimmy. “Kind of busy right now,” can be heard on speaker.

“Yeah. I know. Ed’s here and wants to know that I’ve got your blessing to be here.”

“Ed, I’m elbow-deep in intestines right now. Tim’s not doing anything Breena and I don’t want him to be doing.”

“He was in your room.”

“Yeah, Ed, I know. That’s where Breena is most of the time, right now. That’s where you’ll be if you go visit her. Get your panties out of a twist. Gotta go.”

“See you this evening,” Tim says, and a dial tone follows his words.

“Why aren’t you home with your own wife and babies?” Ed’s eyes narrow, but he starts ladling the chicken soup into a new bowl.

Tim sighs. “My wife isn’t at home, she’s at work. Sean and Kelly are with Heather, right now, which is where they usually are this time of day. I’m here because Breena’s hurting and wanted some company. I spent the morning at my place, with my wife and kids, and then came over here to help out. I did laundry and vacuumed, too. Then because there are small children at my place, who make a lot of noise, I caught a nap here, which you woke me up from, stalking around the house without knocking, setting off my defend-the-girl-alarm.” Which is true, sort of, he did the chores part yesterday. “You want me to call Abby and check with her to make sure this is okay?”

Ed’s eyes narrow again.

“Come on, helping people who are sick isn’t a radical notion. You’re here doing it, too.”

“Helping your family when they’re sick…”

“It looked like you guys hosting the christening party, I know Jeannie’s got another one in the works for Sean, I’m sure you were at the Christmas shindig, and I’m Uncle Tim to your grandkids. We’re family.”

They hear the toilet flush from above, and the sound of someone walking, slowly across the bedroom. Ed grabs the bowl, and Tim hands him a spoon. “Might want to leave it in the hallway, make sure she can take the smell of it before getting it too close.”

“Done this before, Tim. Her mother got sick like this, too, with Amy.”

“I’m sorry.”

And that, his tone, his genuine, I’m sorry she had to go through that, and Breena’s dealing with it now, and all of this sucks, gets through to Ed more than anything else Tim’s done.
(Though, in retrospect, when Ed thinks about it, the fact that Tim almost shot him for intruding on Breena impresses Ed. No, he didn’t like the fear that went with that, at all, but that level of got her back, that matters to him.)

Around six, Jimmy and Abby, and the kids all get home.

“How’d it go?” Tim asks Abby as she’s holding both of their babies. He didn’t get much time with her yesterday, so the ‘first day back’ report was cut short.

“I missed both of you, so much!” Kelly glows at that, and Sean appears to be basking in Mommy time, too. She looks over to Tim, who’s putting dinner onto plates. “Easier than going back after Kelly. We’re backlogged, of course. Four-man team with only three people on it means things go slowly, but the system’s in place and working.”

Breena’s sitting at the table, Anna in her lap, listlessly sipping her smoothie.

“You look like you’ve had a shit day,” Abby says, bowing her head to Breena’s for a kiss.

“Blech. Yeah… Cut out two hours early, and when he finished, Dad came over, and got a hell of a scare when Tim almost shot him.”

“Is that what that was about?” Jimmy asks.

Tim nods, and proceeds to tell them about today’s adventures. That fills up the first half of dinner.

“Did he buy it?” Jimmy asks.

Tim shrugs. Breena wiggles her hand in a maybe gesture. “He may have just decided he doesn’t care much if,” she gestures between her and Tim, “are fooling around. At least, if Tim’s first instinct is to run down the steps and threaten to blow the intruder away, as opposed to trying to jump out the window and hide.”

“Yeah because our car in the driveway is so stealthy,” Abby adds. “Wait, didn’t you check to see if anyone was parked in the driveway?”

Tim nods. “Yeah, I did, and the street, too. Ed drives a Lincoln, right?

“Not since last week,” Breena says. “Mom drug him kicking and screaming into the 21st century and got him into Hyundai.”

That makes sense to Tim. It’s been niggling in his head that he didn’t recognize Ed’s car. Which he should have. He decided he was tired and scared and missed it, but new car would more than explain not seeing Ed’s car and relaxing.

Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “I think he was expecting Abby in our car. Not me.”

“And I know he was expecting me to be napping. He doesn’t usually knock, but he does usually yell out ‘Hello’ or something. So, the plan was: bring over some soup, just leave it for me if I was asleep, try to get me to eat it and keep me company if I wasn’t.”

Tim sighs. “Being a good dad. That’s pretty much exactly what Gibbs did for me when I had the flu.”
“Yep.”

That seems to cover all there is to cover with this. They’re all quiet for a moment, eating, making sure kids get at least a bit of food in them, and then Abby says, “So…” with a gleam in her eyes. “Tony’s new crew is in.”

That gets some grins.

“I got to see them, too.” Jimmy adds. “You know how you look at Draga and think, ‘God, he’s BIG?’” he says to Breena.

She nods. She’s used to Draga now, but when he started, she remembered thinking he was huge.

“Yeah, well, apparently Tony decided that Draga and a pile of guns wasn’t enough on the physical intimidation factor, so he grabbed Spader who’s got two inches and thirty pounds on Draga. No one in his right mind will ever try to fight this team.” He pauses on that. “Okay, they might try to start some crap with Johnson. She’s painfully cute. But in less than a minute something like 500 pounds of pissed-off alpha-male cop is going to come and spatter whoever tries that.”

“I thought they were trying to avoid small and cute this time,” Breena says.

“Ex-crime scene tech for the Pittsburgh PD. She’s got skills they wanted,” Abby adds. “Good ones, from the looks of it. They came down today to get introduced and say hi. She’s not a lab tech, but she knew her way around the evidence we were working on. Pointed out a way to improve our bagging technique for bullet shells.”

Tim raises an eyebrow. “Instead of getting however many casings, each in their own bag, all of the bags loose in the evidence box, roaming around in there, getting smushed beneath the fingerprints and other evidence, her crew would carry larger ZipLock baggies, the gallon sized ones, for example, and tuck all ‘like’ evidence into the larger bag. So, all the bullet bags would be in one bigger bag. The prints all in another. Stuff like that. Memo about doing that went out today.”

Tim shakes his head. It’s a blindingly obvious and simple idea. One they’d never had. “It’s amazing how many easy little fixes there are out there.”

Abby nods. Not that it takes tons of time to sort the bullets out of the box, but pop them all into one big baggie, and that’ll save whoever’s on bullet casings a good three minutes of hunting them down per case. Add that up over the course of a year, over all the different types of evidence, and it’s probably a week of man hours saved.

“How was Tony doing with them?” Tim asks.

“Didn’t really see. Draga was on show and tell,” Jimmy replies.

“Supposedly, if no dead bodies pop up, we’ve got lunch with him tomorrow,” Abby says.

Jimmy holds up crossed fingers.

“Okay, how was Draga doing?” Tim asks. “Still looking moon-eyed at Johnson.”

Jimmy shakes his head and Abby says, “If he’s still doing it, I didn’t see it.”

“He looked okay. He put on his older, more-experienced big brother hat, and it looks like it’s fitting him okay.”
Abby nods at that. “I’ve got a feeling that after another year or two in second-in-command, Tony’ll put him up for his own team.”

Tim can see that. Draga’s got a good base. Some more experience, and maybe a good partner of his own, and he’d make a good team leader. And, if he ends up being serious about Johnson, getting him on his own team might be a good thing. Or not… After all, working with his loves certainly didn’t hurt Tim, or Tony for that matter.

They get an hour together. Eating, talking, Tim plays with each of the kids some, gets to kiss everyone goodnight, and then he’s off for another night of attempting to beat the clusterfuck that’s the Manilla VA Hospital’s internal web system into shape.

Long night. Victory is… almost… theirs. Probably. He hopes.

It looks like the attacks are coming from the inside. Maybe. (Tim’s certainly pulled that trick before.) They’ve been able to trace where the information goes after it leaves the VA, whoever’s doing it is using the VA system to send the information on its way, but not exactly how it’s being accessed in the first place.

He’s got a field agent keeping eyes on the terminal that’s being accessed. Someone’s about to get arrested, or his crew’s about to do a lot more work.

At 5:57 AM, he gets the call. The arrest has been made, and Special Agent Billy Dunn and the as of yet not talking and not identified hacker are heading toward a plane to take them to DC.

“You got anything on him?” Tim asks.

“He’s white, looks like he’s from California or someplace like that,” Tim doesn’t ask what, looks like he’s from California means, “and a VA ID. According to the ID he’s a web administrator here. So, he might work here, or he made up an ID to get him in the door. We’ll get him matched up before deciding that.”

“Okay. Get him over here. We’ve got some people who are going to want to talk to him.”

“You?”

Tim smiles on his end of the phone. “Among others.” Right now, crimes involving the VA isn’t his sandbox. (The only reason they got this was the first batch of victims were Marines.) In four months, they will be. So, he’s figuring that the FBI will be willing to let him sit in on this. “What’s your ETA?”

“At least sixteen hours out.”

“Thursday morning, bright and early, we’ll get into it. I want him tired, and me well-rested before we start interrogating.”

Dunn laughs. “Given how long we’re going to be in transit, I think I can get him to you, tired.”

“Wonderful.”
This time, he gets home around 6:30, just in time for everyone to be getting up and moving around.

Abby’s got Sean. He’s getting his first morning snack. Breena’s lying, very still, on their bed, and Jimmy’s grabbing as much yoga time as he can before the girls wake up.

Pretty average morning at the McPalmer household.

Tim gets the sense she’s been waiting for a time when they were all together to say this, because as soon as he hits the bed, she says, “I’m done. This is the last one.”

No one has to ask what Breena means by that. Her skin is gray. She’s got dark circles under her eyes. Sick and tired and wrecked is radiating off of her. “I… can’t do this again.”

Jimmy drops out of mountain pose and crosses the room to sit next to her and kiss her temple. “No one expects you to, baby.”

“If she’s a she…” (Which is when Tim remembers that their first baby check-up is on Friday.)

Jimmy shrugs. “Then we raise daughters and nieces and nephews. It’s okay. You don’t have to do this to yourself. Not for me. And not to get us boy.”

“When this is done, I’m getting my tubes tied.”

“Oh.” He pets her hair more, and Abby strokes her foot.

Breena does go to work that morning. As she’s said, any day she’s not actively puking on the corpses is a day she’s working. Though, given how sick she’s looking, all of them would like her to stay home and rest.

She gives them the stink eye on that. “I can stay home, do nothing, and feel sick, or I can go be useful and feel sick. I might as well be useful.”

And no one’s got a good argument against that.

Tim naps until lunchtime, figuring that the easiest way to get himself back onto “normal” time is to get some sleep in the morning, and then go to bed with everyone else tonight.

So, he’s driving toward Carlo’s, joining Jimmy, Abby, and Tony for lunch.

He’s not sure what, if anything, he’s supposed to feel about Breena being done with babies.

Realistically, five kids is pretty much all they need. They’ve already hit the point where they can’t go anywhere with all of them in one car. (Granted, they hit that when Sean joined the party. Jimmy and Breena’s minivan seats seven, and there are eight of the now. They’re out of bedrooms at both of their places. Kids are going to be sharing. When Donny (?) joins in, they’ll be outnumbered.

Yes, all of the adults have jobs, good ones, with good pay and good benefits, but… Hell, they’re probably looking at at least three million dollars of college tuition. And… depending on what happens with the local schools, maybe a hell of a lot more than that if they end up needing to send the kids to private schools and…

So, yeah, five kids between the four of them is probably enough.

And he doesn’t want to see Breena sick like this ever again. He’s entirely on board with that.

But there’s still a sense of loss that goes with the idea of Donny (?) being the last of the kiddos.

Okay, maybe not the last. It’s not impossible that Abby might get pregnant again. She’ll be almost 44 when Sean stops nursing, and women have gotten pregnant later than that…

But it’s not likely.

Tim’s the first one at the restaurant, which makes him wonder if a case just went live, but two minutes later when Tony walks in, he’s certain it hasn’t.

“Hey!”

Tony smiles at him and makes a bee line for their table. He looks over his shoulder and nods to the brand new, and very welcome, glass that’s now in the windows and door. “And we’ve got light again.”

Tim nods. “I noticed that driving in today. More windows. Fewer rubble piles. Google maps took me back through what used to be my usual route. So, that’s two more streets cleared up enough for people to drive through them.”

“Looking more and more like a city and less and less like a warzone every day. I wonder how many butts Diane’s had to kick to get that to happen.”

Tim nods. That makes him think of something. “Yeah. You know that story I’m working on…”

“Yet another alternative version of all of us off doing stuff, as… dragons… this time?” Tony knows there’s a story, but he hasn’t paid too much attention to it. Okay, yeah, mysteries starring them were kind of cool, but dragons strike him as silly.

“Something like that.”

Silly or not, he does have a mental image of what he looks like as a dragon. “I want to be a huge red dragon with massive claws, great big teeth, and fire breath.”

“You’ll be pleased to know I already wrote you like that.” Tony smiles. “Except the red part.” Then he pouts. “Just like the rest of Lorcan’s kids, you’re dark. Jimmy’s full on black. You’re sort of gray, but I can make you a sort of reddish-black instead.”

Tony chews on that idea for a bit.

“Trust me, it’ll be cool.”
He snorts at that. Tim’s making them into dragons. This is a guy who couldn’t find cool with a map. Then he smiles because he can see that to Tim, this will be cool. “Why gray? And, why are you bringing this up?”

“Because we were talking about Diane.”

“Oh, there’s an obvious leap.”

Just keep listening is clear on Tim’s face.

Tony rolls his eyes.

“I’ve got Diane figured out. Okay, so the Vikings had their raiders. You know, long boats, going all over the place, harrying the coastal villages.”

“Did I tell you Ziva’s been watching that Viking show?”

“No, but I’m not shocked. Kick ass warrior people doing kick ass things and Ziva, wow, there’s a shock. Does she like it?”

“Yeah. Enough she’s been finding some history classes online and starting a few of them up. One of them is about Vikings.”

“Awesome.” Tim and Tony share a moment to smile over the idea of Ziva starting to get some of her college dreams into play. “And that works even better for what I’m going to do with this.”

“Eh? Again, this is not an obvious leap for anyone not in your brain, McWordsmith.”

“Okay, our core group. Me, you, Gibbs, Jimmy, Breena, Abbi, Gibbs’s Abbi, not my Abby, we’re all one dragon clan. Up in the North. Think Irish/Scottish clans.”

“You’re making me into a kilt-wearing dragon.” Tony shakes his head at Tim’s fantasy land.

“No one in his right mind sticks a kilt on a dragon. The damn thing would have to be the size of a tent and as soon as they got flying it would fall off.”
Tony snorts a laugh at that mental image. And Tim flashes him a smile.

“So, we’re the M’Gys.” Tony sighs. “I’m getting to the point. Diane, Fornell, Emily, Ziva, they’re all part of a group of Caribbean looking Vikings. I’m making Diane the Pirate Queen of the South.”

Tony does laugh at that. “So, let me get this straight, you’re putting her in charge of a navy of longboats, out to raid and harry the local coastal villages.”

Tim nods. And Tony, imagining that, lights up with glee, as Tim says, “She’s got a loose alliance with us, because she’s Lorcan’s ex and Dae’s mom.”

Tony’s eyes go wide. “Wait, you made Diane, Jimmy’s mom?”

Tim shrugs. “Why not?”

“Because I’ve got a perfectly good mom of my own!” Jimmy says, pulling out a chair for Abby and sitting down. Tim stands up to give Abby a hug and kiss. “What are you doing to us?”

“Tangling the family tree even further,” Tim says when he sits back down.

“So, where do I come in?” Abby asks.

“Whole other kingdom all together. Other side of the sea. Katie of the Sky Lands. I’m thinking maybe a sort of hybrid plains-Indian and India-Indians sort of culture. Huge lands filled with nothing but sky and grass. Traders going back and forth across, long pony caravans, huge wagons filled with exotic goods. Most traders have trade secrets for how they make things. Your crew’s trade secret is knowing where the water is. That’s how you guys can get your caravans across the Sky Lands when other traders have to go around or go by sea, and risk Diane’s pirates.”

Abby squeezes Tim’s hand. It makes her happy to see him creating things like this.

“And again, why is Diane my mom?” Jimmy asks.

“Because I wanted Lorcan to have living children.”

“Diane’s a fine mom. Emily thinks she’s cool, and when your teenage daughter thinks well of you, that says a lot about your momming skills,” Abby replies.

“Yeah, that’s because you don’t have to be her kid… Wait, Tony’s one of the Lorcan kids, too, right?” Jimmy says.

“So, we’re,” Tony gestures to the three guys, “half-brothers?”

“You and Jimmy are. I’m a cousin.”

“Who’s my mom?” Tony’s starting to look concerned.

“Don’t know yet.” Tim shrugs. He knows Lorcan has had a few wives, but he doesn’t have an image of Tony’s mom. “I can make her up whole cloth or…”

“Not Jen. And… you only met Stephanie the one time, right?”

Tim nods. “Yeah, even if I were to base your mom off of her, beyond looks I don’t have anything. I’m probably just making her up.”

“Is Kate going to be part of this? She wasn’t, not really, in the first series,” Abby says.

Kate’s murder had gotten the Tibbs novels started. So Kate was there, but not there.

“She’s going to be part of your Sky-Land crew.”

Abby smiles at that. Their waitress heads over. “Hi! Been a while since I’ve seen you four all together.”

That gets some nodding.

“So, we doing our regulars, or going out on a limb and trying something new…”

Once orders have been placed, all three of them are staring at Tony, spill the beans clear on their faces.

“It’s going good. Haven’t gotten a call out yet, so right now I’m just watching them on paperwork. And, yep, they can both type.” He glances at Tim. “For some reason, paperwork’s not so much of an endurance test, anymore.”

“Sorry about, Tony.”

Tony shrugs. “Johnson’s got a good vibe to her. But this is also familiar territory. Sure she just jumped up a level, but her entire professional life has been working with cops.”

“She showed up with coffee this morning?” Abby asks. She knows what cops like.

“Basically. She got in, looked around, and then asked what we liked and went to get it, without being asked.”

“Spader?” Jimmy asks.

“So far so good. But, again, all he’s doing is typing notes into the computer. Hopefully we get a case soon, and I get to take them out.”

“Draga and Johnson?” Tim asks.
“I’ve caught him looking twice, but not so bad that I need to do something about it. She’s tolerating it. I get the feeling she’s used to having guys stare.”

“She staring at him?” Abby asks.

Tony shakes his head. “It appears to be one-sided.”

“How about Spader and Johnson?” Abby asks.

“Friendly. They’re not each other’s types. Spader’s a bit too into physical fitness. At least, that’s what we know about him now. I’m sure he’s got to have other hobbies. But, Johnson basically rolled her eyes and sighed when he and Draga got talking about which gyms he should be looking into, and if the equipment here was worth it.”

Jimmy sniggers at that. “Spader another no-carb, all protein, mega-lifter with a side of Insanity just to shake things up?”

Tony shrugs. “I was too busy silently commiserating with Johnson, both of us enjoying our bear claws, to get all the details, but I did notice a fifteen-minute conversation on which vitamin supplements they preferred.”

All three of them snigger at that.

Tim shakes his head at that, as he takes a sip of his (decaf) coffee. “You ended up with two health fanatics.” He laughs again. “Can’t wait to see how your first lunch order goes over.”

Tony sighs, long and dramatic, as their waitress brings over their lunches, handing him a hamburger and fries. “Did that yesterday.” Tony holds up a fry. “From the looks I was getting, you would have thought I’d brought in a bag of crispy, fried arsenic.”

More laughing.

“Johnson’s a vegetarian, so she’s eyeing my pastrami. And the protein patrol was fine with the pastrami, but were staring at the grilled rye it was on like it was poison. Last time I took this much crap about my diet, Kate was handing me tofu veggie rolls.”

“Ulgkk!” Tim winces. “I still remember those things.” Another wince, this time shared by Tony. “So nasty.”

“You eat tofu,” Jimmy says.

“Yeah, if you cook it right. This was like… sour, raw silken tofu smushed up with a collection of unseasoned, old, wilted veggies. It was nasty!”

“With some sort of carb free, low fat, taste-free tortilla wrapped around it,” Tony adds.

“Steamed cardboard. That’s what that thing was. I’m still sure she was pranking us,” Tim says, looking at his own lunch, grilled chicken salad, filled with lean chicken and lots of veggies. Kate would have approved.

Tony laughs at that. “You know… We didn’t see her eat hers…”

They both look at Abby. She shakes her head. “If it was a prank, she didn’t let me in on it.”

Tony’s lifting his burger to his lips, and his phone buzzes. He checks and mutters, “Of course you call now.” Then he hits the answer button. “DiNozzo. Uh huh. Yeah. Falls Church. Text me the details. Okay.” And then hangs up.

“Call out?” Jimmy asks.

“Of course. Hopefully on Friday I’ll have some more details about how they work as a team.” He signals their waitress. “Lunch to go, for me.”

Jimmy’s phone buzzes. “And me.”

She grabs their plates and says, “I’ll get you wrapped up in a minute. One check?”

Tim nods. “My week for it.”

After Tony and Jimmy leave, after Tim and Abby have finished their lunches, and the check is sitting on the table next to them, Abby says to Tim, “You want to do some sort of joint bank account with Jimmy and Breena?”

“We should probably talk about it at some point, but… I’m not feeling a burning need for it.”

She half smiles at that. “The glorious joy of adulting.”

“Something like that. Though I was thinking about what five college tuitions were going to cost, and… if we end up in the same boat Tony’s in, lousy public schools, getting those kids to college is going to cost a ton of money.”

Abby sighs at that and then nods. “Once Donny’s on the outside, Jimmy and Breena will be paying thirty-five hundred dollars a month in daycare.”

Tim winces at that. He knows what they pay for Heather, for two kids, for full day care. What Jimmy and Breena are paying for two kids for six hours a day strikes him as insane… Three kids, that’s beyond insane.

Tim runs the numbers in his head. “If we had all five of them in one place, we could keep Heather, give her a good raise, get her a part-time backup nanny for mornings, when they’re all awake, and break even.”

“That’d free up some morning time for all of us.”

“And evening getting home time, too,” Tim says. Dropping off and picking up the girls doesn’t take hours or anything, but… It does eat up twenty or so minutes a morning, and twenty or so minutes a night, that’s assuming little girls are ready to leave when they get there, which they routinely aren’t. Add in traffic and the rest of it, and, sure, that’d save whoever’s on pick up and drop off an hour a day.

“This is a conversation we should be having.”

Tim nods as their waitress takes the check.

He walks out with Abby, arm around her waist. “You going in today?” she asks.

He nods. “Maybe an hour or two. Just want to bone up on this latest case, and try to figure out who I need to call in from the FBI. It’s stupid, but… I don’t know anyone between Fornell and Comte and this feels like, I don’t know, something higher than a retired Agent but not necessarily the sort of thing you call in the Director of the FBI for.”

She smiles at him. “Does it feel like the sort of thing you’d call you in for?”

“Or one of my minions. I’m not into it deep enough to know if this is just God-awful incompetence that left open a hole for someone to break into, or if it was a doorway to let someone take advantage of a system.”

Abby glances at the city around them, and the stark physical reminders of how incompetence and taking advantage set them up for ruin. “It’s the VA, probably incompetence.”

“After this last year, I tend to think ‘incompetence’ was cover for a bunch of bastards to enrich themselves.” Tim glances around, too. Most of this street is rebuilding. A third of the buildings still have boarded up windows and doors. Half of the buildings, repaired or not, have for rent signs. Winter’s hanging on with a death grip, so even if the trees weren’t singed, they’d still be leaf free.

“Which is why the FBI wants you.”

He smiles at that, acknowledging that she’s right. “Anyway. Depending on how that hole in their protections got there, and if anyone ever tried to get them to fix it, and if the guy who was exploiting it really is an employee, I’ve got something between a crime and a conspiracy.”

“And in either case, your jurisdiction is shaky because it’s the VA.”

“Exactly. So, that’s my afternoon. Might head home early, grab another nap, and then grab the girls and meet you at Jimmy’s. You?”

“Blood spatter modeling. Dornie’s on his first double homicide, and he thinks the blood and the bodies aren’t matching up right. Right now, I’ve got the computer typing which spatters go with which people, and when I get back, I’ll start building the model.”

“Sounds like fun.”

“I think it will be. Nothing like flying liquids in three dimensional space.”

Tim kisses her, and they start to mosey back to the Navy Yard.

Thursday morning. Bright and early. Tim’s not feeling too tired. (Tomorrow morning, when he’s had his night with Sean, that’ll be a different story. But right now, he’s good.)

The man sitting across from him at the interrogation table is not looking bright-eyed or bushy-tailed. Agent Dunn did his job excellently. He delivered Ely Mait, beaten down, exhausted, all but falling asleep in his seat.

Looks like he’s from somewhere like California, is also clear. Tired Mait may be, but that doesn’t hide shaggy blonde hair in what Tim would call a skater cut. It doesn’t hide absurdly white teeth, or golden tan skin. Put this guy in board shorts and hand him a surfboard, and he’s the image of “California.”
Tim smiles in his head. Then he opens the file the VA wasn’t willing to send him, so he stole.

“According to your personnel file, you’re a web admin for the VA.”

Ely nods, slowly, bleary eyes focused on Tim’s coffee. Sure, it’s decaf, but there’s no way to tell that by sight or smell.

“You’ve been an admin for the last three years.”

Another slow nod. “So, here’s the deal. Right now, you can give me your password and let me ransack your files, see if you’re just a greedy son-of-a-bitch who exploited a hole, or if you’re the bastard who knocked the hole in the wall in the first place. And once I’ve got that password, you’ll get a nice, quiet place to sleep. Or, I’ll make sure someone gets you up and walks you around every fifteen minutes until I’ve hacked my way into your files, and then I’ll do exactly the same thing I’d do if you gave me the password, but you won’t get to sleep through me doing it.” Tim smiles.

“So…” he passes a pen and a pad of paper across the table to Ely.

Ely writes down the password.

Tim nods, smiles, and in a minute, Dunn, who had been in observation, pops back in to take Ely to processing.

Dunn quietly says to Tim as Ely zombie shuffles in front of them, “Isn’t that technically illegal?”

Tim shrugs. “You read him his rights, right?”

Dunn nods.

“Got a recording of you doing it?”

He nods again.

“I think we’ll be fine. I can’t imagine the VA, what’s left of it, is going to yell if we put a corrupt Admin’s feet to the fire.”

Dunn nods along with that. He’s got the sense that it’ll be a very long time before any Federal Agency will be willing to defend any of its people against charges of corruption, especially in cases where the person in question got caught red-handed.

Two hours later, in the internals of the emails that Ely thought he had deleted, Tim found his metaphorical smoking gun.

It’s a report, from one of the security techs, letting Ely know about a hole he’d found in their security. It’s all above board and looks exactly right.

Ely’s response to it is good, too. He’s talking about getting right on it, puts a commendation in the tech’s file, actually got the hole patched, and five months later, when a position opened up, he offered the tech a lateral promotion, involving a move to Massachusetts.

And a month after the tech who found the hole had moved on, out of watching the system, Ely came back and ripped that hole back open and started raiding the VA for personal information on Vets and using it to set up credit cards.

He starts writing up the report. Once it’s done, he’ll send Ely and what he’s found to the FBI, where, they’ll hand it off to someone who will probably start reporting to Tim in July.

Tim’s muttering to himself about what exactly he wants to do to Ely as he types. Bad enough they can’t get these guys decent health care, fast, now he’s taking their personal information and racking up millions of dollars of credit card debt for them, too.

Maybe it’s because of the number of times he’s had his own ID stolen, but by the time he’s got the goods on Ely, he’s really hoping the guys in prison don’t take it easy on him.

---

Friday morning. Time for Jimmy and Breena’s first visit with Dr. Jun for baby four.

They’re both excited, pleased, a bit nervous. Mostly pleased. They’ll get the first ultrasounds for little guy, and they’ll do the DNA test, find out if little person is male or female, and which name they’re going to stick on him/her.

This should, hopefully, be fun.

But that tinge of fear is always there.

At least it’s only a tinge this time. Going for Anna’s first checkup was nerve-wracking. This is just… on edge.

---

It’s a salad shrimp. A grainy black and white salad shrimp with little arm and leg nubs on a low-resolution ultrasound screen. But it’s their salad shrimp, and that’s all the matters.

Okay, not all, Jimmy’s got enough of an eye for this to see that the heart has all four chambers, blood appears to be whooshing around the way it’s supposed to, brain looks to be about the size it’s supposed to be, spine is curving the way it should (hence the shrimp look), umbilical cord appears to be the right size and place.

Everything looks the way a baby should look.

And he and Breena couldn’t be grinning wider.

---

Back in the office, waiting for Dr. Jun, Jimmy sits with his arm around Breena, as she slumps against him, resting.

Dr. Jun heads in, looks at the two of them, and says, “I take it the morning sickness isn’t any easier Breena nods. “Pretty stable the last two weeks. All of that was the first month.”

“Ouch.”

Breena nods again, and sighs. “What’s involved with getting my tubes tied after little guy comes out?”

Dr. Jun is in no way surprised that Breena’s done with being pregnant. She is surprised about this potential choice of ways to not get pregnant again.

“If you want to get your tubes tied, that’s fine, and we can do that, but…” She eyes Jimmy. “We’re talking invasive surgery. Even the laparoscopic version involves having to cut through your abdominal muscles. Little cuts, but still. In most cases with a monogamous couple, we suggest vasectomies. Faster, easier healing up, we’ve only got to go through skin, much less damage to the rest of the body…” She’s still eyeing Jimmy, who’s rapidly deciding if they’re outing themselves here or not.

“Diabetic,” he says, feeling weird about the fact that that’s actually coming in handy for something. “My doctor generally doesn’t want to cut me open unless he doesn’t have any other choice.”

That’s true and allows them to kick the decision down the road. If anyone is going to know about the four of them, Breena’s Ob-Gyn is likely a good choice, but he doesn’t want them making that decision right this second, cold.

Their OB doesn’t look incredibly impressed by that, but she’s not arguing, and given the way malpractice insurance works, Jimmy’s Endo probably would counsel against any surgery he doesn’t absolutely have to have, which is true about a vasectomy. But as Breena’s OB, she’d also suggest the lower stress alternative, to her patient, which is Breena.

“If you want to get one done, we can do it. It’s easiest to do when you deliver. Everything will be swollen, which makes it easier to find everything. So, baby comes out, I put a small hole under your naval, add some gas to make sure that I’ve got plenty of room to see, another small hole for the instruments, a few cuts, seal everything off, and you’re good to go.”

“Will I be able to hold our baby right after birth?”

“Yes. We’ll wait at least a few hours, let the swelling go down some, but I don’t like to hold out too long, because we keep the epidural in place so we don’t have to do that twice.”

Breena nods along at that. It makes sense to her. She’s not looking forward to the idea of having someone stick a needle in her spine any more than the absolute minimum number of times to get the job done.

“That said, I’m still going to send you home with a selection of pamphlets about long lasting birth control, and suggest that it’s a very good idea to have a chat with your Endocrinologist about the risks involved with a vasectomy.”

Breena smiles a bit and takes the plunge. “We’re not a monogamous couple.”

“Oh.” They can see they just knocked the wind out of Dr. Jun. She takes a moment to recover. “Uh… I should add a panel of STD tests then, too.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “No need. I ran the tests on our partners, they’re clean. We’re not in an open marriage, with multiple new partners. It’s a stable foursome.”

“My wife,” Breena says, “would like to get pregnant again. That can’t happen if the boys get vasectomies.”

Jun is just watching them, not sure how to react, but, she’s a doctor, with a job to provide the best care possible for her patient. “Okay… Uh… I’ll still give you information about different IUDs. ParaGuard can last up to twelve years, and by then you’ll be out of your prime fertile time. It works as well as a tubal, is less invasive, less expensive, and takes significantly less healing up. I’m not saying I won’t do a tubal for you, but… read up. In the same place, with a similar, I’m not getting pregnant again mindset, I’d opt for an IUD.”

“Don’t they involve some sort of hormonal stuff?” Breena asks. Jun knows Breena and most hormonal birth controls don’t get along all that well.

“ParaGuard doesn’t, which is why it lasts so long.”

She hadn’t known that, and it hadn’t occurred to Jimmy, at all. “Okay, I’ll read up.”

Jun nods. “So, you’re eight weeks along, little person is doing fine, I’ve got a note here saying you’d like to do DNA testing to find out of the sex…”

“Oh yeah!” Jimmy and Breena both say.

“We can do that. Any other… concerns…”

“Not until the nuchal fold testing,” Jimmy replies.

Jun checks her notes again. “Which we have scheduled two weeks from today.” They both nod at her. Jun shuts her folder. “All right. We’ll get a urine sample, do the testing, and you’ll know which set of names to put on this little person.”

Jimmy and Breena beam at that. And, though it’s true that Jun’s still awfully shocked at the idea of these two particular people being in a foursome, and not really sure what to think of it, she also knows that it’s hard to be uneasy when Jimmy and Breena Palmer are smiling at you.

Tim’s in his office, back working on the harassment software when his phone buzzes.
He feels a massive grin spread across his face as he sees the tiny black and white shrimp, and the words, Donald Timothy Palmer, ETA 10/8/17!

That night, as Tony tells them about the joys of his latest case, and breaking in his new team, Penny looks between her husband and grandson, both of them in exceptionally good moods, and mentally debates which one of the two of them is more pleased by his new namesake.
“Grab your gear!” There are more than a few tricks from the Team Gibbs playbook that Tony’s kept in his bag. ‘Grab your gear!’ is one of them.

Cases feel more… structured when they have a specific beginning, and those words, that’s the beginning.

Draga’s got Tim’s old desk. Most of the time, Tony doesn’t even think of it as Tim’s desk anymore. Okay, yes, every now and again, he glances over and expect to see the skull looking back at him. That thing was there for more than a decade, but, most of the time, in most ways, that space is Draga’s now.

Bishop had moved into Gibbs’ desk. But she wasn’t there long enough to erase the Gibbs from it. He glances over to Spader, who hasn’t made that desk his own, yet. Maybe one day, it’ll be Spader’s, but right now, it’s a very generic space. A desk, a few computers, and a huge guy behind them.

Johnson has Ziva’s desk, and Tony’s not sure if that ever won’t be Ziva’s desk. But, it’s also clear that Johnson’s working on making that space hers as quickly as possible. She’s got Steelers gear up. There are pictures of her parents. There’s a picture of her cat.

It’s as much hers as a space she’s been in for less than a week can be.

And she, and Spader, and Draga, are his.

His team, for real.

The maiden voyage of Team DiNozzo.

Another trick from the Team Gibbs playbook is the quick sit rep as they’re heading for the elevator. “Got a deal Marine in Falls Church.” He tosses Draga the keys to the van. “Draga, show them around the motor pool, get them up on leaving procedure, and gas up the van.”

Draga waves that off. He’s already shown them every inch of NCIS. He tosses the keys to Johnson, who drops them, and scrambles fast to pick them up. “Spader, get us signed out. Johnson, gas us up.” He looks over to Tony. “Out of here in seven, right?”

Tony nods, pleased with Draga.

Spader gets to drive. Tony’s in the co-pilot seat. Draga and Johnson are in the back, leaning over the back of the seat to listen in. Spader’s either a really cautious driver, or decided that since this is a vehicle he’s not used to, and the guy he’s driving around is his Boss, that just maybe doing the speed limit and obeying every traffic law ever written is a good plan.

“What do we have?” Draga asks.

“Not much. Local LEOs—“ Tony begins.
“Law Enforcement Officers,” Draga adds.

Tony continues, “Got called to an abandoned car. They knew it was trouble just from the smell. The car is registered to First Lt. James Dowling. They popped the trunk just to make sure there wasn’t anyone alive in there. There wasn’t. Now we’re on the scene. Okay, Johnson, pop quiz, what questions do we need to ask?”

Johnson thinks for a moment. It’s clear she’s got a lot of possible questions in her head, but she’s looking for the best of the bunch. “Has anyone placed a missing person report for Lt. Dowling?”

“Good question. Draga?”

Eric holds up his phone. “Give me more than two minutes. I’ve just gotten into his file… Uh…” His eyes scan over the pages. “No. He’s on a seventy-two.”

“Three days of leave,” Spader says to Johnson.

“He’s not due back for another twenty-six,” Draga says.

“All right. Next question.” Tony says, “I know Johnson knows this, so it’s for you, Spader, why is this hinkey?”

Spader stares at the road, keeping watch on the traffic, thinking hard. Finally, it’s the fact that Johnson knows that tips him off. “It’s wintertime. Hasn’t gotten past 50 in the last five days. Even if he was killed ten minutes after leaving the base, he shouldn’t smell, because he’s basically been in a refrigerator the whole time.”

Tony nods, again pleased. “Okay, Draga, give them the twist.”

“Local LEO’s tag the car the first time they see it. They check back twenty-four hours later, and if it’s still there, they get it towed. Twenty-four hours ago, someone checked that car, and it didn’t stink. Twenty-four hours later, it smells bad enough they can tell there’s a dead body in there without opening it, which tells us…”

Johnson beats Spader to the punch. “Someone put the body in there after the car was abandoned.”

“That’s our working theory,” Tony says with a nod as they pull up to a cordoned-off stretch of roadway.

Before they even get out of the van, Tony says, “First things first, look around, notice that you do not see Palmer’s van. This means we do not touch, get too close to, breathe on, or even look too hard at, the body. Until Palmer and Allan are done with it, the body is a no-go zone for you two.”

Spader and Johnson don’t look thrilled with that, but they’ll abide. They all get out of the van, and Tony starts handing out cameras.

“Evidence gathering, on the other hand, is what you’ll be doing.” Tony glances around. They’re on a two lane road in the middle of not much. Suburbs to the north and south, but this mile or two here is still fairly undeveloped. “Set a perimeter two hundred meters out,” wider than he’d usually do, but someone had to put a smelly body in this car, and there’s no way they did that without leaving a trace, “photograph everything, tag anything you see…”

“Even litter?” Spader asks, his toe nudging an empty beer bottle.

“Especially litter.” Tony thinks of having a very similar conversation with Ziva. “Our body dumper might have dumped that, too. That right there might be the only clue that he was here.”

Spader looks up and down the road, at a stretch of almost half a kilometer, covered with snow, road salt, slush, and various bits and pieces of detritus half to fully buried in the snow.

“It last snowed on Sunday. Anything under the snow would have been there since before Dowling went on leave.”

Part of Tony wants to smack Spader for trying to get out of work. Part of him is aware that that’s true, and digging out beer bottles from last spring is a waste of time. “Check and see the last time this road was plowed. If it was plowed before Dowling went on leave, you can skip anything under the snow. If it was plowed after, you’ve got to bag it, because you don’t know if the snow fell on it, or if it was tossed on it later.”

Spader gets his phone out and begins looking that up. Johnson grabs her camera, and starts walking off the distance.

A moment later, Spader says, “Last plowed on Monday, before Dowling left the base.”

“Then if it’s under the snow, leave it be.” Tony glances to Draga, an unspoken, keep eyes on him.

Draga nods, and the two of them head off in the opposite direction of Johnson to get started on Documenting a Crime Scene 101.

Tony turns toward the car, and starts to print it, waiting for Jimmy and Allan to show up.

When the familiar black and white van pulls up, Tony heads over to open the back doors before Allan can get to them.

“Feeling eager, Agent DiNozzo?” Allan asks as he steps out a moment later.

“Always. Get within about ten feet of the car, and tell me what’s wrong.”

Allan shoulders his bag and does as asked.

Jimmy heads back, grabbing his own gear, and says to Tony, “Co-opting my guy?”

“Making sure the first opinion I got on the scene is right.”

Allan’s close to fifteen feet away from the car when he says, “Phew… Unless this car has a heater running in it, the body was moved.”

Tony glances to Jimmy, and Jimmy says, “That’s the opinion you wanted tested?”

“Body found in a car in winter by the smell.”

The LEOs had opened the trunk to make sure there was no one alive in there. And then they closed it to protect the body and the scene. Jimmy finds the trunk latch, and opens it. A soft snick, and the trunk lifts, and inside lies the probable remains of Lt. Dowling. The very decayed remains of Lt. Dowling.

“Did the LEOs ID the body?” Jimmy asks.

Tony shakes his head. They’re here based off of the car registration. And, though the car has a Marines sticker on it, and is registered to a Marine, nothing about the very dead person inside suggests he may be military. At least, not at first glance. He’s not in uniform, isn’t wearing visible dog tags, no rings or tattoos to suggest service.

Granted, given the condition of his visible skin, it’d be hard to tell a tattoo from the corruption of decay.

Jimmy looks to Allan, who grabs his finger scanner and gets working on the ID.

“Time of death?”

“You’re worse than Gibbs, you know that?” Jimmy shoots back.

“Come on, Jimmy,” Tony says with a clear, cut the BS look on his face, “he looks ready to star in his own episode of The Walking Dead. That’s got to be… days?”

“Dr. Palmer, we’re going to need to take him back to get an ID. The top layer of his skin is too decayed to print.”

“Okay, Dr. Allan. And Tony… Yeah, by smell and sight, I’d say he’s at least four days gone, four days in summer, but, and you know there’s always a but…”

“Like the fact he was last seen less than three days ago,” Tony says with a tight smile.

“That’d be a huge but, and here’s another one, without knowing where he’s been for the last however many days, I can’t say how long he’s been dead. Let Dr. Allan and I get him home, do our job, and we’ll give you a time frame.”

They both look at the late, and as of yet, not terribly lamented, possible Lt. Dowling. Jimmy points to the four-inch-wide two-inch-deep caved in section along the left side of his skull. “At first guess, I’d say that’s your cause of death.”

“And if it’s not, it certainly didn’t help anything,” Allan adds, and Jimmy nods.

“If you find a baseball bat, or anything like that, grab it,” Jimmy says.

“Will do.”

Jimmy looks to his assistant. “All right, Dr. Allan, do you want shoulders or feet?”

Tony goes back to printing the car as he hears Allan and Jimmy working on removing the body from the trunk.
On the upside, there’s snow. This means tracks stick out beautifully. Anyone who’s been wandering through the woods around them since Sunday has left marks.

On the downside, there’s snow, which means tracks stick out beautifully so they’ll be trying to hunt down about twelve people, most of which, if not all of them, are likely to be locals out for a walk in the woods.

Or, as Spader puts it to Johnson when they’re back to the bullpen the next morning, still without an ID because the hands will have to soak for twenty-four hours before they can get his skin off for prints, “Do you have any idea how many men wear size eleven Nikes?”

“Sixty-four million,” she deadpans.

“In this building alone,” he replies.

“Do you want to try dental records?” Allan asks Jimmy.

Jimmy shrugs. They’ve already got Mr. Doe’s hands soaking. “We could, but…”

“But, because as you said, there’s always a but,” Allan says, looking at the caved in skull of their victim.

“So much of his left jaw is gone. We can use it to rule him out. We can’t use it to definitively rule him in.”

“Then let’s do that. You know Agent DiNozzo will be down here in—“ They hear the beep of the elevator. Allan flashes Jimmy his, told you so look.

Jimmy nods.

“What’s ya got?”

“The bizarre sensation that you were about to call me, ‘Duck,’” Jimmy replies.

“Yeah. I’m feeling him a lot today. Always happens when I’m breaking in probies. So…”

“That large cavity in his skull is your cause of death,” Allan says.

“And, assuming this is Lt. Dowling…” Jimmy glances over to Allan, who’s putting up the dental x-rays from Dowling’s file, and placing the x-rays of their Doe over top of them. Allan shrugs back at him. “And we just don’t know for sure.”

“How can you not know?” Tony asks.

Allan wiggles his finger at the X-ray. “As you can see, these parts line up just fine. That would suggest we’ve got the same person. This part,” he circles the destroyed bit of the man’s jaw. “Is a complete loss. No way to tell if this ever lined up or not. And this,” he taps a filling in the lower right bicuspid, “isn’t on the original films. New work? Could be. Different person? Could be.”

“DNA?” Tony asks.

“Sure, but Abby can’t get that done any faster than I can get you prints. I’m sure we’ll do both just to make sure we’ve got all the bases covered. Anyway, as I was saying, assuming this is Lt. Dowling, we can guess that time of death can’t be more than a certain number of hours ago, but, beyond that… His liver temp was 92 degrees, and I can absolutely tell you there is no possible way he got that decayed in the few hours necessary to drop from 98 to 92 in the kind of cold that car was.”

Tony sighs. “Tell me you’ve got something else.”

Jimmy smiles at him. “I do. He’s covered in a fine salt residue.”

“Like someone was trying to preserve him like a ham?”

Jimmy and Allan share a look, and then both of them look back to Tony. Jimmy says, “First of all, ew, and second of all… actually, that’s not a terrible idea. We were thinking he was in warm salt water, like a salt water pool or large tropical fish tank, but…”

“But a smokehouse would be warm. We saw signs of his blood pooling in his feet, not his back, and he had bruises and tie marks on his wrists. If someone were to salt and hang him up… That would pretty much do what we found,” Allan says, testing the idea out loud.

“I thought you salted the ham so it wouldn’t go bad,” Tony says, looking at the very decayed person in front of them.

“You’d usually take the pig, hang it up, drain it, remove the blood and internal organs, put a hell of a lot more salt on it, and in it, and try to keep it cool while smoking it,” Allan replies. Both Jimmy and Tony are watching him. “I watched a documentary on how Andalusian hams are made.”

Jimmy looks at Allan with a general sense of pleasure and pride. “You never know when some random bit of information will come in handy in our line of work.” Then he turns to Tony, “So… you might be looking for a smokehouse. Or, probably, a saltwater pool.”

“And someone who doesn’t know how to deal with bodies,” Tony says, eyeing their corpse.

“People hams…” Johnson says, staring at the top of her desk. She shakes her head long and slow, and then looks up at Draga. “You know, I thought I saw some messed up stuff when I was working on the evidence gathering side of this, but… people hams…”

Draga inclines his head and nods a bit. He’s seen some messed up stuff, too, but… people hams? He’s half-tempted to go down to autopsy and see if Jimmy, Allan, and Tony are just pulling their collective leg. “It’s a theory. We get facts. We make theories. We add new facts and cross out old theories as we keep going.”

“Let’s cross out people hams,” Spader says, facing Johnson’s desk, leaning butt against his. “How about, tried to fake time of death to make it look like he’d been dead longer, or less long, than he really was?”

“That’s a theory, too,” Draga says. “Likely a decent one. But, before we get rid of people hams, go looking through the aerial photos of the nearby homes and make sure there’s nothing that looks like a smokehouse. And while you’re at it, go looking for anything with an open pool or hot tub that might be filled with saltwater.”

“Hams… pickles…” Johnson’s sitting at her desk, tapping a pen against a pad of paper. “You know… Okay, if you didn’t know much about bodies… If you had a saltwater pool or hot tub or… bathtub even, I guess, you might think you could just pop the body in there, and like a pickle, it’d just stay… fresh…” Johnson says, tentatively. “You’d be wrong. I mean… you’d have to put a ton of salt in there to do it, and even with that it wouldn’t come out looking like it was brand new, but… It’d certainly mess with time of death.”

Spader thinks about that. “And, if you had a pool, with say, a cover or something, you plop a body in it, keep the cover on, and if the salt did its job, it wouldn’t smell or anything. That wouldn’t just mess with time of death, that’d give you a place to hide the body for however long you needed to.”

Draga thinks that’s a good idea. “Not like anyone expects to go swimming in March. So, if you had enough salt in there, that would buy you… weeks, months maybe, to find a good place to eventually stash the body, and… assuming the body stayed in the pool, even if the cops come looking, they aren’t going to go splashing around in your pool unless they already know you killed the guy… so… Okay… That’s not a terrible plan.”

“Except they didn’t have enough salt in the pool. So, instead of setting up a nice, sterile place for a body to hide out, they created a corrosive soup that increased decomposition speed.” Johnson sits on that for a moment. “Heated. It’s a heated pool. Hot tub, pool, bathtub with warm water, something like that. Whatever it is, it’s warm, at least eighty degrees, probably more.”

“And they went from nice, sterile place to tuck a body to a neon lit stink-bomb screaming, DEAD BODY HERE,” Spader says.

“And that’s why they had to move the body, because wherever it is they are, there’s someone else close enough to notice the stink,” Draga finishes. He’s got a smile on his face to encourage his probies, and one in his head, because he’s pleased with how quickly they’re getting into this.

“Anything interesting, Abby?” Tony asks as he heads down with a cherry smoothie for Abby.

She smiles over at him. “Yes. We’re just getting started, so not too much, but, your Doe’s shoes made this set of prints,” she points to a line of prints heading to the road about three hundred feet past the car. “He was wearing the shoes when you found him, right?”

Tony looks at the prints, leading toward the car. “Yeah, and I’m awfully certain he didn’t walk himself back to the trunk of his car.”

“Looks like you’ve got some backtracking to do,” Abby says.

“And… sweat?”

Abby smiles at him. “We have done swabs of the insides of his shoes, looking for sweat and epithelials. I’ll get you all the DNA I can find.”

“Thanks, Abs.”

Corwin pops over. “That’s not all. Dr. Allan sent us trace from the wounds on his wrist and head. His wrists were bound with duct tape…”

“But we found him un-taped,” Tony adds, putting the pieces together.

“And there were a few flakes of varnish and splinters in his head. You’re not looking for a baseball bat, you’re looking for a cricket bat. An old one. That’s actual shellac. No one’s used it commercially for at least fifty years.”

Tony sighs. “I’m looking for a cannibal with a taste for people ham and cricket. Did Thomas Harris write this scene?”

Abby smiles at that. “You read a book!”

He glares at her a bit. “Ziva read the book. I watched a movie based on a book. Good movie. And with the way this case keeps unraveling…”

“I really doubt we’re dealing with a cannibal, Tony,” Abby says. “How’s the hunt upstairs going?”

“Slow. We don’t have a formal ID, so I can’t get into Dowling’s stuff, because he’s not officially dead, or even missing, yet. His CO tells me that he’ll let me get into his personal belongings once he’s missing, but that’s not for another.” Tony checks his watch, “hour. I’ve got them looking for smokehouses, hot tubs, and as soon as I get up there, back tracking those prints.”

“Then get going!” Abby says, sipping her smoothie.

Zach Spader had some ideas of how his first case would go. Tromping through the woods, following a set of tracks wasn’t it.

It is exciting, though. Somehow, their body ended up back in his (?) trunk, and someone (him?) wearing his shoes followed this path to get him there. Maybe.

Or not. Hard to tell. So many guesses and not enough facts. He’s following the path and photographing it, making sure that if (when?) this goes to trial, the jury will see how they found the house they’re about to visit.

Johnson’s next to him with a map up on her phone. “We’re heading toward one of the houses with a hot tub in the back.”

“What do you bet it’s got salt water?”

Tony’s a few steps behind them, watching, he’s also got a good feeling about this.

A minute later, he’s got an even better feeling. His phone buzzes. It’s Draga.

“Are you heading toward 3347 Lane St.?!” Draga asks.

He looks over to Johnson, who heard that. She nods. “Round about sort of way, but, yes, it looks like that.”

“Yeah, why?”

“First off, I’ve got confirmation that our Doe is in fact, Dowling. Second of all, I just got into Dowling’s emails. He’s got a girlfriend. A young girlfriend. She lives there.”

“How young?” Tony asks.

“Eighteen next month.”
“Oh, that’s not gonna fly,” Johnson says with a wince, and Spader nods.

“How old is Dowling?” Spader asks.

“Old enough to know better,” Tony says as Draga answers over the phone with, “Twenty-three.”

They take a few more steps through the woods before Draga adds, “And guess what, Daddy’s Indian.”

“Are you thinking honor killing?” Spader asks.

“Now that you mention it, maybe. I was thinking India is a country that plays cricket.”

“Oh!” Johnson says. She wiggles her finger at the house that’s just visible through the edge of the woods. “Here we are.”

It’s a generic, suburban cookie-cutter house in a neighborhood filled with them. There is a hot tub in the back, though Tony notices that it’s covered. He also notices the lack of snow on the cover or the patio around the hot tub.

Like, perhaps sometime between now and the snow, someone took the cover off of the hot tub, and swept off the patio.

He’s thinking it, and Johnson says it, “No snow on the patio.”

“Or the hot tub,” Spader adds, grabbing more photos. “Think someone’s gone for a winter soak?”

“Could be.” Tony gives them a small smile. Then he says, “Okay, Johnson, you’re going around the left side of the house. I’m going right. We’ll meet up in the front and then knock on the door. Spader you stay here in the back. Anyone tries to run out, grab them.”

Spader nods. This is the kind of thing he was hoping to do.

Tony sees that excitement. “Gun stays on your hip unless someone starts shooting at you. You are way too green to make an ‘I saw a gun’ argument stick.”

Spader nods again. He wasn’t exactly envisioning a shootout, but… he kind of was, too. It’s been a long time since he’s seen anything like action, and he misses it.

“I will let you know when it’s time to join us, until then, or until someone tries to sneak out of that house, stay put.”

“Staying put, Boss.”

Tony smiles a bit at that.

There are lights on at the house. One car in the driveway. Tony circles around without any issues, and he sees Johnson approaching from the other side. He nods to the door, and they head to the front of the house.

He knocks. They can hear people scrambling around in there, but no one answers the door.

Tony rolls his eyes slightly, knocks again, this time saying, “Naval Criminal Investigative Service, open up.”

“You do the full name?” When she was training, they never yelled out the whole name.

“No one knows what NCIS is. I yell that out and nothing happens.”

The door opens half an inch, and one very dark brown eye, belonging, judging from the height, to a teenager, peers up at them through that crack. “Naval what?”

“Naval Criminal Investigative Services. Have you seen…” Tony holds up a picture of Dowling.

“Mum says I don’t have to talk to cops unless she’s here.” Tony flashes a look to Johnson. This kid’s been coached on what to do when the cops show up.

“May I speak to your mom?” Tony asks.

“Not here.”

“How about your Dad?”

“Not here.”

“Your older sister?”

“You can’t talk to her unless they’re here, too.”

“Okay, when will they get back?” Tony says with a mental sigh, wondering if Mom and Dad and Sis are already on the run, or hiding behind the door, hoping he’ll go away. Tony sees the sliver of a shoulder jerk up in a shrug. “What’s their number?”

“No phone, except the one in the house.”

“Okay. We’re going to sit here and wait for Child Protective Services or your parents, whoever shows up first, to get here,” Tony says.

That one eye starts to look very alarmed.

“As long as you’ve got an advocate present, it doesn’t have to be your parents. So, we’ll wait for them to get here, or maybe your mom or dad might want to come to the door and talk to me.”

“I told you. They aren’t home!” The voice is adamant, and scared, and to Tony’s ears, not lying.

“When are they due home?” Tony asks.

“I dunno.”

“All right, sit tight. I’m calling CPS.”

The door shuts. Tony gets child services up on the phone, and ten minutes later, before there’s time for anyone from CPS to have even gotten a social worker into a car, Spader comes around to the front of the house with two very shifty looking teen boys, fourteen and sixteen if Tony had to guess, one of his huge hands on each of their little shoulders, both of them radiating waves of scared, guilty, annoyed, and trying to look cool.

“Found these two trying to sneak away.”
Tony nods. “Johnson, get the van. Guess what kids? You ran away, which means now I get to take you to the Navy Yard and chat with you there.”

“But… our parents…” the older one, who Tony thinks is the one who answered the door, says.

“We’ll make sure they find out where you are. Is anyone else home?”

They both shake their heads.

Johnson pulls the van up.

“Okay, Spader, you’re on babysitting duty. You keep them in the van. Keep them quiet. You don’t talk to them, and they don’t talk to each other, okay.”

Spader nods at that, and smiles at the kids. He may have meant it to look reassuring, but it comes off like he’s about to eat them alive. Both of them blanch.

Tony checks his phone, and smiles at it. Draga’s already got the search warrant waiting for him. He holds up his phone, showing off the warrant. “Okay, Johnson, you and I are going to go looking for anyone else in that house, evidence of Lt. Dowling having been there, and, possibly, a cricket bat.”

It’s true that outside of class at FLETC, Beth Johnson has never executed a search warrant before.

It’s also true that as a crime scene tech for the Pittsburg PD, it was her job to go and find all the little bits and pieces.

So, this is like that, just… different.

For example, because this isn’t a crime scene, yet, she doesn’t have carte blanche to just grab everything. Their warrant is for several specific things, duct tape, a shellacked object that could be used to put a large dent in someone’s head, a body of salt water, anything belonging to Lt. Dowling, and Sarai Sirianapantha’s computer.

They know where they’re going first. There’s a back patio with a nice, deep, hot tub with room for six.

“First off, gloves,” Tony says to Johnson. “We’re not in crime scene mode, yet, but we don’t want to mess anything up.”

She’s got her gloves in her back pocket, and with practiced ease, snaps them on.

“We have a warrant, so right now, all we can do is test the pool, see if it’s salt water,” Tony says. “We don’t print it, we’re not going to go over it with a fine tooth comb, unless…” They’re opening the door to the patio, and both of them are very carefully trying to not touch it. They don’t want to mess up any prints. As soon as they’re within a few feet of the hot tub, the smell of dead body hits them.

“Unless we can smell corpse on the air,” Johnson says as they step to the cover on the hot tub.

Tony nods. Both of them get a fingernail hold on the cover and gently lift it off, carefully settling it onto the ground.

The water is murky and reeks of dead body. Tony pokes a gloved finger into it. “About 100 degrees.”

“So, Dowling soup?”

“Probably.” He takes off that glove and grabs his phone. “Hey, Jimmy, I think we’ve got a pool filled with some sort of human remains… Uh huh… Yeah… Can you bring a few extra people with you, we’re going to need someone to transport and watch the kids we found here. Okay… Thanks.”

“People?”

“We’re field agents. We solve crimes and stuff like that. But, at any given time we’ve got people floating around who don’t go out in the field, usually. They crunch numbers or work cold cases or whatever. Jimmy’s going to grab one or two of them, and they’ll take the kids back to NCIS. That way you and Spader will get handling the scene practice, and then, when we’re done, you two can watch Draga and I interview the older one, and then you and Spader will get to take a swing at the younger one.”

“We’re going to get to do an interrogation, on our own?” Johnson’s eyes light up at that thought.

Tony nods. “I have a feeling you two can break a fourteen-year-old, gently, without too much hand-holding.

Johnson beams at him as they get more samples of what’s floating around in the hot tub.

It’s well after dinner time when they’ve finished with the scene. They don’t have all the pieces of the puzzle, but what they do have…

A: A positive ID that the body in question is Lt. Dowling.

B: His blood and “fluids” in Sarai’s bedroom. (This resulted in Jimmy muttering something about how if some 23-year-old predator gets messing with any of his under-aged daughters, he damn well isn’t going to get caught based on sloppy cleanup. Tony pretends not to hear him while Johnson and Spader give each other worried looks.)

C: More of his bodily fluids and tissue floating around in the hot tub.

D: A wall covered in Daddy’s cricket memorabilia, and an empty space where a bat likely used to live.

E: An empty space where Sarai’s computer likely used to live.

And F: Mommy, Daddy, and Sarai are ‘missing.’

It’s not an open and shut case, but it’s about as close as they ever get. The only question is, who killed Dowling?

“Do you think they understood that if we had Dowling’s computer, we could read everything they were sending to each other?” Johnson asks as they’re driving back to the Navy Yard.

Spader shrugs. “No idea. Hell, we don’t know what’s on Sarai’s computer.” He bites his lip. “Uh…
Draga… you read the emails… Did Sarai seem… unwilling or coerced.”

“That’s dangerous territory,” Johnson says. “Legally, even if she wasn’t, she was.”

“I know, but…” Spader’s looking at Draga.

“It looks like he’s the older brother of one of her buddies. They met at a party two years ago and have been sneaking around since she’s been fifteen. Yes, it looks consensual, but… messy as hell. They both know they shouldn’t be doing it, and they write a lot about her turning eighteen so they wouldn’t have to hide anymore. Um… They were both talking about getting married…”

Tony groans at that. “Romeo and Juliet from hell?”

“Looks like the Capulets didn’t go for it,” Johnson replies.

“Anyway, the point I was making, just because we can read the emails doesn’t mean we know what else might have been on her computer. Or phone. Sexting is a thing, who knows what video files are lurking around on there,” Spader says.

“I didn’t see anything like that on Dowling’s computer, but who knows what’s on his phone.” Tony makes a mental note to add that to the list of missing things. “And, sure, if she had a camera on her computer or something like that, Mom and Dad might have decided it was just easier to take with them than to try and delete whatever was on it.” Draga replies. That’s something of a dead end, so the follows up with, “What are we thinking about the kids?”

Johnson and Tony share a look, and then Tony nods, letting her know to talk. “Nope. There was high velocity spatter on the walls, and a big dent in his head, and neither of those kids has the build to do that.”

Spader shakes his head, too. “They may not have approved of their sis and the Lt., but they didn’t kill him for it. They’re alone, and they’re scared.”

“ Alone…” Tony says, letting Spader know to keep going with that thought.

“Mom and Dad and Sis are gone. They aren’t coming back anytime soon. The kids know it. My guess is they’re supposed to keep going to school and pretending everything is okay, and eventually they’ll run off, too.”

“Suitcases!” Johnson says. “We didn’t find any suitcases! Everyone’s got at least one in their place, right?”

Draga smiles at her, pleased with that. “That’s usually how it works. So, what do we do when we get back?”

Spader and Johnson look at each other, and then back to Tony and Draga… “Uh….” Neither of them want to say, “Pack up and go home,” but it’s on both of their faces.

“We make sure that CPS has the kids, and that they aren’t going anywhere. We set a BOLO on mom, dad, and sis, and flag their travel documents. We get the request for financials set. And then we go home,” Tony replies.

Draga raises an eyebrow at Tony. He’s ready for another long night.

“I want a better idea of what happened before we talk to the kids, and by the time we’ve got that, it’ll be too late to talk to them. So, get the basics in play, let that collect us some intel while we rest, and then bright and early tomorrow, we break this wide open.”

Tony says that, and his three team members appear to agree with this plan.

On the ride home, Tony wonders if he’s going soft. Then he decides it doesn’t matter. Dowling isn’t getting any more dead. The sister is with her parents, safe enough. The kids are stewing with CPS, hopefully thinking long and hard about what’s going to happen to them.

There’s nothing that needs to happen right this second. Nothing that can happen right now, except them burning through pizza and antacids, staring at computer screens, willing them to give them more intel.

So, they might as well go home, and actually have lives outside of the job.

And when he goes to bed that night, after having talked the case through with Ziva, he’s awfully sure that that was a much better way to spend the evening than drinking coffee and mentally berating the Local LEOs for not catching his suspects in his BOLO.

Tony gets in on Friday morning and sees a report on his desk. “Shit.”

Draga, who beat him in and had placed the document that caused the profanity in question on his desk, nods. “Yep.”

It’s the credit card information from Mr. and Mrs. Sirianapantha.

And right there, highlighted by Draga, are the airline tickets.

From Tuesday. The day before they found Dowling’s body.

To Pakistan. To Lahore Pakistan.

“I’ve already got the call into our Embassy in Karachi. They tell me they’ll talk to their guys in Lahore, and they’ll see about working on getting an extradition set, but…”

Tony waves that off. Suspected of a murder will get them some level of cooperation, but it won’t get them a full-on man hunt, and it’s bleeding Pakistan which isn’t exactly the most difficult country on earth to hide in. And, hell, they’re Indians… He can’t imagine the Pakistani government being willing to do much of anything on this. He rubs his eyes. “Add kidnapping and honor killing to the write up.”

That gets a raised eyebrow from Draga. Absolutely nothing they’d seen indicated Sarai might be in any danger from her parents.

“I know. But they aren’t going to run like crazy for a dead man. They may decide to move and get on this if they think the girl is in danger.” Draga updates his information and gets it going through the chain of command.

“Are we going to go?” Draga asks.

Tony shakes his head. “Not with what we’ve got now. We don’t speak the language. We’re not looking for someone in the military. Besides Lahore, we don’t have any idea where they are. We have no good contacts. We work on charming whoever’s in charge over there and sweet talking them into helping us, because otherwise, we’re fumbling around blind out there.”

“We still have the boys,” Johnson says. She’s been listening quietly for the last moment as she took off her coat and got seated at her desk.

“We do, and we’re going to try and see if we can get out of them where Mommy and Daddy are, and if we can do that…” Draga lights up. “You may get to go on a little trip.”

“Trip?” Spader says as he strolls in. “I like trips. Where are we going?”

“Maybe Pakistan…” Draga gets the whole crew up to date. As he’s doing that, Tony gets the call. The kids are in the conference room, ready to talk.

“Rule number one, don’t let the suspect stay together. Now, why are we breaking this rule?” Tony asks as they head to the conference room.

Johnson and Spader glance at each other, Spader decides he gets to answer this one. “Because they’ve already been together for more than two days since the crime went down.”

Tony nods. “Exactly. Between elapsed time, the fact they’re already been coached by Mom and Dad on what to say, and that they’re kids, rule number one becomes more like, suggestion number one.”

“Are we going to keep them together for the interrogation?” Johnson asks.

“No. And we’re also not going to use the word interrogation. We’re,” Tony’s voice suggests the use of air quotes without him having to make the gesture, “having a little conversation, with them.”

“We know they moved the body,” Draga says.

“Why do we know they moved the body, Johnson?” Tony adds.

“Mom, Dad, and Sis were… Wait… Do we know they got on the plane, or just that they bought tickets?” Johnson replies.

“A, good thinking on that, you get a gold star, and B…” Tony turns his gaze to Draga.

“Yeah, we’ve got the security footage of them getting on the plane. I don’t know if they got off in Lahore, but they got on in DC. When we’re done talking, I’ll run that down. Only four different stops between DC and Lahore where they could have decided not to get back on the plane.”
Tony nods at that.

“So, Mom and Dad and Sis got on the plane before Dowling could have gotten into the shape he was in. So, they didn’t move the body. That leave the kids. Kid… One set of prints leading from the house to the car. Are we thinking one of them put Dowling’s shoes on and made it look like he left the house, and the other one drove Dowling’s car over and tossed him in the trunk…” Johnson says.

“Maybe,” Draga replies. “No unknown prints on the car, but we did have smudges that would have gone with someone with gloves messing around with it.”

“And, maybe if you didn’t know too much about abandoned cars… you might think the county would just tow it away… Or… Wait, no. They moved the body because it smells so bad the neighbors are going to start complaining soon, so… Do these kids want to get caught?” Spader asks.

“Another good question,” Tony replies. Then he stops the four of them. They’re only a few feet away from the Conference room. “And we’ll get into that in a moment. You two, head to Observation and observe. Draga and I are going to take Micah,” the older of the two boys, “into interrogation for our ‘little chat.’”

Micah looks nervous. He probably should. The Child Advocate next to him doesn’t look nervous. She’s done this a million times before.

“Mrs. Brandt.”

“Agent DiNozzo, Agent Draga. Just to make sure we’re clear, you don’t consider Micah a suspect?”

“No.” Tony waves that off, sitting across from Micah, holding out two cans of soda. One Coke, one Mountain Dew. “We’re looking for confirmation of things we already know.”

Micah takes the Coke and mumbles, “Thank you.”

Draga sits next to Tony, across from Micah and the Advocate. He’s got the file in his hand.

“Look, Micah,” Tony says, voice calm, sincere, “we already pretty much know what happened. We’ve put most of the pieces together. All we want to do is make sure your sister is safe.”

That confuses Micah. “Why wouldn’t she be?”

“Your parents took her to Pakistan. Your family is Indian… Just…”

Micah sighs. He bites his lip and looks at the mirrored window that Johnson and Spader are behind.

Tony keeps his voice gentle and soothing. “Right now, if we can get them home… Nothing’s going to happen to your sister. She’s the victim here. If your father had called NCIS when he caught Dowling, we would have put him in jail for a long time. And… look, if there’s a guy raping my teenage daughter, I’m going to get the nearest thing I can find and hit him with it, too. That’s true for every guy. There isn’t a jury on earth that will convict your father of murder for that.”

Spader smiles behind the glass. “Murder. That’s a nice distinction.”

Johnson nods. “Yeah. First degree murder, nope. He can’t get a conviction for that. Manslaughter on the other hand…”
Micah bites his lip harder. Tony keeps rolling on. “We just want to get everyone back home, and safe. If we can’t get them back here on their own, then we’re going to have to go hunting for them, and that can get messy. If they just come home…”

“God, look at how he’s playing that kid,” Spader sounds a little star struck as he says it.

Johnson nods. “He’s laying it on with a trowel.”

“Yeah, but the kid’s nervous and scared, looks like he hasn’t slept well in days, hip deep, soothing, everything-is-going-to-be-okay-if-you-help-us, bullshit is exactly what this kid needs right now.”

“You’re not wrong. Taking notes for our shot?”

“Yep.”

On the far side of the glass, Draga takes over. “We ran your phone records, there’s an international number you’ve been calling. A cell phone. Does it belong to your parents?”

Micah gives the tiniest head shake he can manage.

“Your sister? Do your parents not know she’s got it?”

A nod. His eyes are tearing up. “It… It…”

“IT what, Micah…” Tony’s keeping up the soft voice. “We know, it’s your Mom and Dad and Sister, and they told you to do things, and you want to do right by them, but… You’ve got to protect your family, and leaving them out there… Waiting for the Pakistani police to go and find them. They aren’t usually kind to Indians, let alone Indians wanted for murder and kidnapping, are they?”

Micah winces. “Mum’s from Pakistan. Dad’s Indian. They met in university in New York, and… That’s why she thought she could tell them. She thought they’d understand. They’d had to run away from their own parents and…”

“And they didn’t understand,” Draga says gently.

“I… I don’t… By the time we got home, Sarai was sobbing, and Mum was packing, and Dad…” He shakes his head.

“What do you bet Mom and Dad came home early, caught the love birds in the ‘private’ part of their reunion, and Dad went batshit crazy?” Spader says behind the glass.

Johnson sighs. “Like Tony said, you see some guy, some adult guy, on top of your seventeen-year-old daughter…”

“He’s at least getting thrown off of her.” They keep watching the unfolding story on the other side of the glass.

“And then they left? Told you not to talk to anyone without them there?” Tony leads.

Micah nods. “We didn’t know what had happened, not for sure. But there was this smell, and we couldn’t just leave him there. People would notice. So, it gets dark. Saakaar puts on his shoes and makes it look like he left. I get his car, and we take care of it.”

“Why did you put the car back where you found it?” Draga asks.

Micah shrugs. “Where else should I put it? I can barely drive. I don’t have a license. I don’t want to get pulled over in someone else’s car with a dead body in the trunk. We hoped that they’d just tow it away.”

“There was duct tape on Dowling’s wrists…” Draga leads.

Micah takes another sip of his soda, his eyes far away, seeing something he doesn’t want to. “He was in the water, slippery, and he’s heavy, too. We couldn’t get him out. He kept slipping back in. Saakaar decided that if we got his wrists together, we could get him around my shoulders and I could just walk out and he’d come with us.”

“That explains the tape and the blood pooling in his feet,” Spader says.

Johnson shakes her head. “How many tries do you think it took for them to get him out?”

“Too many. He was at least six inches taller than Micah. They had to be desperate to get him out of there.”

In interrogation, Tony sighs. “Are your parents coming back for you? What’s the plan on that?”

Micah fiddles with the pop tab on the Coke. “There wasn’t enough money to buy tickets for all of us at once. Dad gets paid on Friday. More money in the account. That’ll get a ticket for Saakaar. Two more weeks, and there’ll be a ticket for me.”

“So, you’re supposed to just be on your own for three weeks?” Draga asks.

“There’s a lot of food in the house. We’ve got some cash. I can drive, a little, enough to go get more groceries. We go to school during the day, stay home at night. I can look after myself for a few weeks.”

“And then… what… start over in Pakistan?” Draga asks.

“For a little while. Mum’s sister is there, and they still get on. Get us all together again and… I don’t know what happens next. Sarai… She loved him. And Dad…” Micah takes another drink of his Coke and falls into miserable silence.

“Okay. Thanks, Micah. We’ve got it from here. We’re going to talk to your brother some, and then both of you are going to go with Mrs. Brandt. She’ll make sure you’ve got a place to stay, and as soon as we find your parents and sister, we’ll let you know.”

Micah looks up, a tiny spark of hope in his eyes. “You’ll bring them home. Home safe and okay and…”

“We will. We’ll make sure they think they’re picking your brother up at the airport, and we’ll scoop them up nice and easy, and bring them home. You’ll see your Mom and Sister by Sunday. Hopefully not too long after that, you’ll see your Dad, too.”

Micah nods, tears in his eyes.

“Hello Saakaar, I’m Agent Johnson and this is Agent Spader, we’d like to talk to you about this last week.” Johnson is doing her best to copy Tony’s soothing BS voice, but she’s having a hard time of it. She’s excited, which makes keeping her voice calm difficult.

Spader picks up on it, and so does Saakaar, who does not appear to be nearly as interested in cooperating as his older brother was. He’s staring in stony silence at the soda he’s been offered, glaring at it like that can of Mountain Dew personally set his family on the road to destruction it’s currently on.

Spader decides to try a different tact. “You’re angry.”

That gets a tiny flicker of recognition from Saakaar.

“I would be, too. Right now you should be at…” Spader leads, and Saakaar stares at the table, slouching in on himself.

They wait a beat, and Johnson adds, “School right? You should be in your second period class?”

Tiny nod in response to that.

“We’d like to get you back there, as quickly as we can,” Johnson adds, this time doing a better job of sounding sincere.

Saakaar snorts at that.

“None of that,” Spader says a hint of his, bucking-up-the-distressed-seaman tone in his voice. “We can get you back to school. We can get you back with your friends. And, with a little help, we can get you back with your mom and sister.”

That gets another snort. “You can help them into jail, you mean.”

“Your sister isn’t going to jail. When we get your sister, she’ll join you and Micah. In a month, when she’s eighteen, you and your brother and her can all go home. Your mother, probably, isn’t going to prison,” Johnson says, using Tony’s very careful lie technique. Jail, she’s likely going to jail, for at least a while, but if Dad cooperates, they likely won’t bring charges against Mom.

“And my Dad?”

Johnson and Spader share a look. They know that lie won’t tell.

“Yeah. That’s what I thought.”

“Do you want to help us get your sister back?” Spader asks.

“Does it matter?”

“Yes, it does. We can do it without you, but it’ll be easier, for us and them, if you help. Your parents will tell you about the tickets somehow, right?” Johnson says.

“Yeah. They’ll text. I’ve got my phone, and they’ll send the details.”

“All we need is the use of your phone for a few hours, then,” Johnson follows up.

“And if I say no?” Saakaar sounds like he’s testing them, waiting to see if the patient façade will break.

“Then we reroute your number, have the text come to us, and answer it that way,” Spader says.

“How is that easier for them?”

“That part isn’t. The part where you get to come to Pakistan with us, and help us talk to them, so they come with us, is the part that’ll be easier for them,” Spader replies.

Johnson’s not sure, but she thinks she hears a groan from behind the glass.

But, that appears to be the absolute right thing to say to Saakaar. It gets a flicker of life out of him, something that looks like interest, and hope. “Can you help us like that, go with us, and help convince them to come back?” Johnson lays on top of Spader’s lead.

“I can do that.”

“Okay, good. Can we have your phone?” Johnson asks.

Saakaar slides it over. “One, three, six, eight. That’s the passcode.”

“Thank you, Saakaar,” Spader says. “Mrs. Brandt, we’re done here. We’ll let you know how things go, okay? And once we’re ready to go we’ll get you and be on our way.”

Mrs. Brandt puts a hand on Saakaar’s shoulder, and gently leads him out of the door.

A minute later Tony’s in there with them. “Are you out of your mind? I am not taking a fourteen-year-old into God alone knows what situation in Pakistan!”

“No. I’m not insane. We’re allowed to lie to them, say whatever we want, to get what we need from them,” Spader replies, and then he hands over the phone. “We’ve got the phone, we’ve got the code, and now we just text to his parents. They’ll know when to expect him, and we’ll get to the airport before he would have. They won’t expect us, they’ll be waiting for him, and we’ll sweep ‘em up nice and easy.”

Tony groans and applies a swift whack to the back of Spader’s head.

Spader looks confused; he expected praise for that. Johnson looks confused; she thought they were really going to take the kid along with them.

They both stare at Tony, waiting for what comes next.

“We build rapport with kids like Saakaar. We still have to take this to trial, and now he and his brother will hate us and will not be helpful come testifying time.”

“We’re not going to make them testify, are we?” Spader looks horrified at that idea.

“I hope not, but if we do... Don’t burn bridges. Especially with kids.”

“Okay… I can fix this,” Spader says. “Just, let me go get him. I’ll tell him I’m new and overstepped and… I’ll explain.”

Tony waves at the door. “Go.” Spader books out of there, going to catch Saakaar. “Lesson learned?”

“Judicious application of lying. Working on it. What’s going to happen when Micah notices how careful you were about murder versus manslaughter?”

Tony levels a long gaze at Johnson. “That’s why you can’t screw them on the little stuff. I already told the lie that’ll make them hate us. At least someone on this team has to be the good guys, and today, it wasn’t me.”

Johnson nods. “Okay. What next?”
“We keep an eye on the phone, find out where the tickets are for, and then get you or Spader and Draga on a plane to Pakistan.”

“So…” Abbi asks as Tony gets them up to date at Shabbos that night.

“So, Spader won the coin toss, and he and Draga are in the air.”

“But not you?” Abbi has a mildly confused look on her face, as she passes the challah down the table to Abby.

“Round about midnight, they’ll give me a call, let me know how it went. Then, once everyone is back in DC, around dinner time tomorrow, Johnson and I will go after the parents and see how it all shakes out.”

Ziva smiles at him. “He is nesting.”

“I am not nesting!” Tim, Jimmy, and Gibbs share a look with Tony, and all three of them nod. “It is perfectly cool for a pregnant daddy to not want to be on the other side of the planet when baby is less than two months out. And, especially when you text me in the morning to let me know that you’re starting to get those warming up contractions, for some reason I don’t feel the need to be in Pakistan.”

“Not when Draga’s perfectly capable of going there,” Gibbs adds.

“Exactly,” Tony replies.

“And is he ‘perfectly capable?’” Abbi asks.

Tony nods. “Yeah. He really is. I’m liking how he’s handling our Probies.”

“And how are you liking the Probies?” Breena asks.

“I’ve had Probies I’ve liked better, but these two… Draga and I’ll make good cops out of them.”

Gibbs has an immensely satisfied look on his face at that.

Jolting up and down on a cargo transport flight, the sound of the engine roaring away, flying towards the rising sun to go grab a murderer, that’s what Zach Spader had hoped this job would be like.

Granted, he’s got more hours to go until they get to Lahore. And more hours until they spot the Sirianapanthas, grab them, and get back on another of these flights to take them back home. So, this is a tad more boring than he had hoped for, but…

This is the verge of doing something.

And it’s been so damn long since he’s had something to do.

Draga’s strapped in next to him, head against the bulk head, eyes closed, but Spader’s pretty sure he’s not sleeping.
“First time to Lahore?”

Draga shakes his head. “Nah. We were going hard on anti-terror before the fall. That got us in this neck of the woods a few times.”

“You ever here when you were flying?”

Draga shakes his head. “All Pacific all the time. You?”

Spader smirks. “Lahore isn’t exactly submarine territory.”

Draga rolls his eyes. “Okay, Squid.”

“Uh huh… Flyboy.”

They sit quietly for a moment. “You miss it?” Spader asks, patting the hull of the plane.

“The flying I did, yeah. These monsters?” They’re in a Herc. “This is… This is like asking a formula one racer if he misses driving when you’re in a bus. Yeah, they both drive…”

Spader waves that off; he gets the basic idea.

“How about you?” Draga asks.

“All the time.” Zach glances around the Herc. “It’ll sound stupid but this isn’t that different. Close in, tight quarters, everything is metal, bouncing all over the place when it gets rough, constant noise. Pack an extra twenty people in here, and this feels like home.”

Draga shakes his head. “Tighter than I like my quarters.”

“Didn’t think the planes had a lot of space.”

“Windows. I had 270-degree line of sight.” He smiles a little.

“And nothing on earth has more space than the flight deck of an aircraft carrier on the open ocean,” Spader fills in.

“Yeah. Creep over to the edge, look out, and there’s a million miles of sky and sea. The plane is small, but the view is big, and in there, you feel like you can see forever. You don’t have that on a sub, right?”

“Right. The newer ones don’t bother with portholes, and even if they did, there’d be nothing to see. Light only travels through water so far, and we go further down than that.”

“Not like your conning crew is going to try and look out the window and steer like that.”

Spader laughs at that idea. “Exactly. If we’re in such bad shape we’ve got to steer by sight… We’re never in that bad of shape. We all died long before that happens.” He rummages around in his go bag and pulls out a protein bar. “Split it?”

“Sure.”

Spader breaks it in half and gives half to Draga. “What’s waiting for us down there?”

“If we’re lucky, we land, we find a decent spot at the airport, blend in as well as we can, and then wait for the family to show up.”
“You want me on Dad?”

“Sure. I’ll keep eyes open for the girls. If anyone tries to run, we make sure we get Dad. If we grab him first, we can secure him and then go back for the girls.”

“You know, it’s not impossible Mom brained Dowling,” Spader says.

“Not impossible, but unless she’s your size, it’s really unlikely. It takes a lot of force to put that big of a dent in a guy’s head.”

“Think they’re going to tell us that Dowling and Sarai were in the hot tub, and Dowling slipped, hit his head, and they ran?” Spader asks.

Draga thinks about it, and what they boys told them. “I’d give you even odds on that. But he would have had to have been on the roof of the house, and landed on his head, to have ‘slipped’ and gotten that badly hurt.” He chews a bite of the bar. “I’m wondering if we’re going to get both of them blaming the other one. I don’t think we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Mom or Dad did it. If the lawyers are smart, they’ll each blame the other one.”

“Wouldn’t they have to lie?” Spader asks. “I mean, the lawyers are supposed to not encourage people to flat out lie on the stand.”

“If he tells them to lie, he’s breaking the law; you’re right about that. But he doesn’t have to call them up, and they can refuse to answer questions based on if they knew the other one did it and fled, they’d be incriminating themselves.”

Spader winces. “That’s nasty. Can we win this?”

“Hope so. With any luck Sarai saw the whole thing, and she will tell us what happened.”

“Here’s hoping.”

---

It’s later, much later, when Tony gets the sit rep. And yes, swooping up the Sirianapanthas went easy. Once they saw Draga and Spader, they just gave up. Sarai wasn’t with Mom and Dad when they went to the airport, but Auntie, who was, to put it mildly, not happy with having her brother-in-law camped at her place because he killed a guy, was willing to give her to the Americans who were going to take her home to her brothers.

Tony’s pacing the main floor as he gets that update. Ziva’s already in bed, asleep, and he’s not about to wake her up with this. She’s hit the point where she’s having a hard time staying asleep, so he’s not about to cut her sleep any shorter than it already is.

Little Boy needs her to get a lot of rest so he can grow big and strong, and she needs a lot of rest so she can get him out into the world when the time comes.

And it’s his job to make sure that happens.

He finishes with the update, tells Draga and Spader to sleep on the plane, and then hangs up.

Once he does that, he hears weight shifting on the stairs leading to the upper level. It’s a familiar sort of shift, and a familiar sort of quiet.

“Hey.”
Gibbs comes closer, not making much noise. He looks up at Tony, steps closer, and pets the back of his head.

Tony understands that. If anyone knows how… off… it felt to send Draga off with a Probie, Gibbs does. But, apparently, he approves.

“Not a lot of things I wish I could have changed about my time with Shannon, but if there was something I could have done differently, I would have been home more.”

“You think she minded?”

Gibbs nods. “Not enough to say it to me. Not enough to let it poison things. She knew I was as married to the Corps as I was to her. She understood. But… Yeah. She wrote about it in her journals.”

“Ziva understands, too.”

Gibbs nods at that, as well.

“Senior was gone all the time. We lived in the Hamptons, and he was only with us on the weekends. I’m not going to be that guy. There’ll be enough cases where I have to be gone, and this wasn’t one of them.”

“Good.”

Beth Johnson’s first interrogation had taken a certain level of skill and effort. Her second…

She’s sitting across from an all-cried-out, furious, girl who is ready to bring down the wrath of Hell on her parents for killing her boyfriend and dragging her across the planet.

And if Hell isn’t available, NCIS will have to do.

Beth doesn’t even get, “Do you want to tell—“ all the way through before she’s got a torrent of invective flowing around her.

All she and Tony have to do is sit there, offer the occasional tissue, and nod. A little verbal prod or poke here and there, gets even more information flowing.

The quick version goes something like this: Even if your parents aren’t supposed to be home for a few hours, do not make a ton of noise, say, almost screaming, when having a good time with your boyfriend, because, otherwise, when Daddy gets home early and hears you screaming, he is going to run into the house, grab the nearest thing he can find (his cricket bat), and when he finds you screaming with a naked guy on top of you, he will kill the naked man on top of you with it.

Her third…

Rajit Sirianapantha looks wrecked.

He was certain there was a guy raping his daughter and he took care of him. One minute he’s in his car, pulling up, running home to grab a model he needed for one of his reports, and in the driveway he hears faint screams.

His daughter’s screams.

So he runs in, as fast as he can, grabs the only thing he’s got in the house that might be a weapon, bolts into her room, finds all of his nightmares coming true, and he hit Dowling as hard as he possibly could.

And that’s when he found out about a whole other crop of nightmares he’d never imagined, but that didn’t make them any less real.

When they get done talking to him, and head out of interrogation, Johnson feels flat. This… Isn’t justice. She’s not even sure what a win on this case would be.

She looks up at Tony as they both head back to their desks to start filling out the reports. “Tell me they aren’t all like this.”

He shrugs. “They aren’t. Not this messy. But, every case we have, every person we talk to, they all think they’re doing the right thing, given the circumstances they’re in. All of them. No one we work with is going to have handlebar moustache and spend his evenings twirling it.”

“I know, but…”

“Most of them, we’ll get a clear ‘bad guy’ and you won’t be rooting for the defense lawyer to find we messed something up.”

“I don’t know that I want that. I mean, he killed Dowling, just took him clean out, and… If there was ever a ‘When seconds count, the cops are minutes away’ moment…”

“I know, Beth. And if he’d hit him a bit less hard, or aimed for his ribs, or… something else… They’d have probably worked it out.” Tony sits down and turns his computer on.

“But they didn’t.”

“Nope. ‘They didn’t work it out’ is going to be the start and end of a lot of the cases we see.”

Johnson listlessly turns her computer on. She knows that it's in the lawyers' hands now, and that they'll work some sort of deal out, murder will become justifiable homicide, but he'll do time for hiding it, and running, and Sarai wants to bring kidnapping charges, so... Even if Rajit isn't in prison for the rest of his life, this is still going to be a huge mess.

Tony’s phone rings. She hears him pick it up and say, “We’re not on today. Uh huh… What about… No… Okay, I’ll get them back.” He hangs up and says to her. “Call Johnson and Draga back in, we’ve got a dead body in Manassas. Maybe this time, we’ll be the white knights riding to the rescue.”

She smiles a little, and picks up her phone.
Just another wedding. Tim feels like there have been a lot of them over the last few years. He’s fairly certain that, say, back when he was in his twenties, entire years could go by without a single wedding, let alone multiple ones, but for some reason he’s hip deep in them now.

Though, technically, he’s not exactly in wedding territory, yet.

Right now he’s in rehearsal dinner territory.

Okay, actually he’s in getting ready to go to the rehearsal dinner territory.

Though, as he’s in the NCIS men’s locker room, putting on his suit, getting ready to go to Alexandria, instead of driving with Abby and Jimmy to their place for Shabbos, he’s thinking he’ll cut it short on the ‘dinner’ part of this.

Home with his loves, snuggle time with his girls and boy, dinner with everyone… Almost everyone, Penny and Ducky are invited to tonight’s shindig, too. Or socializing with strangers.

He’s not wildly enthusiastic about that.

Granted, if he were willing to really think about this, it’s not socializing with strangers that he’s feeling reticent about. Spending a few hours talking shop as Thom E. Gemcity really isn’t a problem for him. So much of his real life doesn’t touch Gemcity, that it’s actually something of a treat to be him for a while.

(And if he were to ponder that, he might realize part of why being Gemcity used to be fun is that Gemcity was a vastly cooler version of McGee, and maybe part of why he doesn’t need Gemcity so much anymore is that the real Tim has finally shot past Thom on the cool and comfortable in his own skin scale.)

Nope, it’s not strangers that’s the problem. It’s the Texas contingent of his ‘family’ who’ll be at this thing.

And it doesn’t much matter. His phone beeps. His Uber is here. Working his way out of NCIS, he stops at autopsy and the lab to kiss his loves (Abby gives him a pat on the butt and approves of the suit, making him double down on the get-out-of-this-thing-early plan, and Jimmy’s working on his report, so he allows himself a quick, silent kiss that adds an odd pause to his dictation, but nothing so noticeable as to raise questions.) and is on his way.

He understands the purpose of the rehearsal part of this: make sure everyone knows who goes where and all that.

And, given that this is a hybrid of a Quaker ceremony and a Handfast (Because why wouldn’t it be? he thinks with dry sarcasm. The McGee-Allister-Langston-Mallards are some sort of vague flavor of mostly agnostic Christian-ish types. Glenn’s family is Mormon, ish, sort of. His grandparents and cousins are. His parents are less so. So, sure, a mostly Wiccan ceremony, why not?) he gets that beyond Glenn and Sarah who set this thing up, and their… Minister (Tim’s not sure what to call the lady who’s running this thing) no one really knows what they’re doing. This isn’t the same thing they’ve all done over and over at every other wedding they’ve ever been to.

So, yes, rehearsing, great.

He even knows, on a he’s been told this is going to happen level, and asked if it was okay, that at some point, he and his mom will both take Sarah’s hands and walk her down some sort of vaguely aisle-ish thing, and present her to Glenn, while his parents do the same thing for him, and all four of them will tie the first knots that bind their hands together as a sign of all the families coming together and approving of this. (Cue Mormon grandparents quietly groaning in the back of the audience.)

But knowing it and standing here, in his suit, next to Sarah and his mom, holding a length of green ribbon, waiting for the universe to swallow him whole because there is literally nothing he wants to say to that woman and the weight of the silence between them is getting heavier and heavier as she and Sarah talk about some flower-oriented detail, is not, on any level, the same thing.

His phone buzzes, breaking his feeling of suffocating. He grabs it, and sees a text from Penny. Get out of your head.

His eyes find her, on the far side of the room, and he nods at her, flashing her a bit of a smile.

Finally, the lady who’s ‘officiating’ this thing is done fiddling with the altar they’re practicing walking Glenn and Sarah to. He takes his sister’s right hand, and their mom takes her left, and he successfully walks her the fifteen feet to the altar.

Cassidy. The officiant, there’s a good word for her, smiles at everyone and gets talking. “Okay, so, you guys get up here. Sarah and Glenn spend a moment mooning over each other. I do my bit talking about how a full binding works, and then, those of you who are paying attention to the ceremony,” She smiles at Tim, his mom, and Glenn’s parents, “will hear me say, ‘In our tradition, the bride and groom marry each other, but our tradition also recognizes that a marriage is a blending of families, not just two people. So we ask for the blessing, in the form of the literal giving of their children/sibling, to this union. Tim and Tori, you’ll each offer one of Sarah’s hands to Glenn. Vera and Carlos, you’ll do the same for Glenn. Glenn and Sarah will clasp hands. Left to left and right to right. If we do this right, both of them will have a free right hand when this is done. Once hands are being held, Tim and Tori, you tie first. Easy knots please, on their left hands. The last thing we want to do is spend the rest of the night sawing through the ribbons. Then Vera and Carlos, you do it, too. Same hands. They’ll tie their own knots last, so leave those right hands free, okay?”

Tim and Tori nod. Tim ties first, looping his green ribbon loosely around his sister and soon to be brother-in-law’s wrists.

“You can maybe do it a bit firmer than that. It’s a handfast not a handlose.”

Tim rolls his eyes and adds a basic bow to the ends of the ribbons.

“Perfect. Okay, Tori, you’re up.”

And with his part of the job done, Tim zones out.

Sara had done everything she could, besides cutting the handfast out of the ceremony, to keep her brother and mother away from each other.
They aren’t sitting at the same table for dinner.

They’re in a large restaurant.

She’s got a lot of people at this thing, so they can both just blend into the crowd.

Basically, if they want to pretend the other one doesn’t exist, she’s gone out of her way to make sure they can do that.

And they’re doing that. Tori and her husband, Ben, are spending time mostly with Glenn’s family. Tim, Penny, and Ducky are spending most of their time with each other, and to a lesser extent socializing with Sarah’s writers, talking shop. (Tim’s been in the market for a new agent, and he’s got three new contacts on his list. On a professional level, this is proving to be quite a bit more useful of an evening than he was expecting.) So, in an effort to make sure his sister has a pleasant, drama-free wedding, he and Tori are basically ignoring each other.

And Tim is rationally aware of this. But he feels like there’s a spotlight on him, and on her, and that there might as well not be anyone else in the entire room. Even when Tori’s not looking at him, he feels like her eyes are on him.

“You ready to get going?” Penny asks a bit after eight.

“Please!” Tim replies. They’ve hung around, they’ve eaten, they’ve socialized. He’s done his duty by his sister for tonight, and she and Glenn both look like they’re ready to get onto the pre-wedding parties they’ve got with their buddies. (And Tim is very relieved to have not been invited to the bachelor party. He knows in some families it’s traditional to invite the bride’s male relatives to the night before revelries. Gibbs has mentioned Wendy’s sons being at Fornell’s bachelor party. And, sure, Glenn’s fine and all, but Tim really doesn’t want to go get drunk and ogle naked women with the guy.)

The rehearsal dinner is done, and so is Tim. “I’ll go get our coats.”

She smiles at him. “Meet you at the valet?”

“Perfect.”

He figures it had to happen. They’d gotten through the rest of the night without bumping into each other, but, only so many places you can wait for the coat check girl.

Tim figures Ben must also be at the valet, waiting for their car, or maybe not, maybe they’re Ubering, whatever, he’s not here.

It’s just him, and his mom, and a few strangers, standing around, waiting for coats.

“Where’s Abby?” his mom asks, tentatively breaking the silence. “I mean… is she feeling okay?”

Tim sighs a little. “Sean’s not even three months old. He still wakes up to eat every three hours. Which means we’re both tired. So, she’s at home, resting.” It was Abby’s night last night, and she is tired. Mostly though, they, as a family, decided that minimizing the time the postpartum, still hormonally unbalanced woman was in the proximity of the woman who hurt her most favorite person ever was a good plan for ensuring the peaceful proceeding of Sarah and Glenn’s wedding. One night on best behavior seemed doable. Two nights… They all know Abby, and they’re all sure she’d pick a fight with Tori, just to do it. “She’ll be here tomorrow.”

His mom keeps watching him, and now he’s wondering how many rumors and bits and pieces about the last few months she’s gotten.

“What?”

She shakes her head. “I heard about… you and John.”

“Sarah fill you in?”

“She and Penny have been doing a good job of saying nothing. They won’t tell me about you or your family, and I know better than to ask, now. Emily,” his mom’s best friend, a Navy wife, “saw the write up in Stars and Stripes about John ending up in prison. Not a lot of details in there, but busted by NCIS at a Tech in Anti-Terrorism Conference in DC, in a hate crime sting… That was you, right?”

Tim nods.

“Scuttlebutt is he hit you. Is…” She eyes the scar through his eyebrow. “Did he do that?”

“Not directly. That’s from when he tried to have me murdered on his ship.”

Tori hadn’t heard any of that, and goes pale. “He… Timothy… I…”

Tim watches her sputter syllables and words as her mind whirls. Finally, she settles on, “What did you…” She stops there, recognizing that’s the wrong question before Tim turns his back and stalks off and tries again, “What happened?”

“I beat him at his game, so he had his buddies literally beat me.”

“Like hazing?”

Tim’s ready to be done with this. He snorts at her and rolls his eyes. “Yeah. Hazing. I was in the hospital for a week with more than ten broken bones, and have a ton of screws in my hand and arm. I still don’t have full use of my right hand back, yet, and it’s been eight months. No. Not like hazing. Not even hazing getting out of control. Attempted murder. He set me up, got me locked in a cage with four guys who believed I’d killed their families, and had the guard walk away. The only reason I didn’t die on his ship was I told SecNav not to leave me alone for too long.” And with that, Tim’s collection of coats have been retrieved. He grabs them, and heads off to find Penny and Ducky.

He looks back as he’s heading off, and sees how hurt she looks.

And he’s not sure if that makes him happy or not.

________________________

He is sure, that when he gets home, and Abby, in her black, silky robe, grabs him by the tie, wrapping it around her hand, and pulls him to bed, where Jimmy’s already naked and ready to play, and Breena’s naked, and looking like with proper encouragement, that she might want to play, that he likes that a hell of a lot.
For Tim, who’s in the wedding, prep starts fairly early. He’s got to be out by noon because… Because he does.

He’s not sure why. Unlike, say, the bridesmaids, he’s not getting his hair done, or going to the salon, or applying any makeup… okay, he’ll fill in the scar through his eyebrow, any serious makeup… or anything along those lines. But, team bride is converging on the wedding at one, which means he’s got to leave at noon.

As he’s heading out, Gibbs shoots him a commiserating smile. There’s not much for the guy in the ‘father of the bride’ position to do, other than stand around and, “Offer to get snacks. That’ll get you out of the girly fest, and be useful.”

Tim nods. He can get snacks with the best of them.

He slings his suit bag over his shoulder, kisses his loves, and he’s off.

As Ducky unpacks the little bag he’s brought with him for this week’s sojourn down to their home, Penny’s coming to the conclusion that he likely shouldn’t be allowed outside, in New York City, on his own, with a credit card.

She stares down at the tiniest kilt ever made, along with a little, bitty black wool jacket, and the tiniest bow tie (also in the McGee tartan), along with a wee little sporran, and says, “I don’t ever want to know how much that costs, do I?”

He slowly shakes his head. “No. You don’t.”

She nods. “And you loved every second of getting that, didn’t you?”

He grins wide and happy. “Indeed. What is the point of finally having a grandson if I cannot, occasionally, spoil him rotten?”

Penny laughs at that. She, and Ducky, know that Sean couldn’t care less about this, thus, it’s not about spoiling him. It is very much about the enjoyment of his be-suited and bow-tied bedecked GrandDuck. “Well, let’s go show Abby what you’ve got him.”

To say the excited squeeing coming from Abby at seeing that outfit, and then at getting her son into it could be heard from Mars is only a slight exaggeration.

It’s a mostly idle thought as Tim’s checking out the wedding venue. Namely, this is a wedding, and he and Abby, and apparently Jimmy and Breena, have certain traditions for celebrating weddings.

And, he’d kind of like to continue to keep said traditions up. As he’s walking around, getting pictures of the flowers and chairs and table settings and cake, and all the rest of it, so his sister can see that everything is on the up and up, he’s also scouting the terrain for quickie territory.

Granted, given the not-wildly-sexy condition of their ladies, and the wildly sexy night they had last night, (Even Breena eventually felt motivated enough to get into it. Certain bits of his anatomy twitch appreciatively at that memory, and he tells them to stuff it because nothing’s happening along those lines for at least a few more hours, if at all) he’s not exactly banking on sexy time for this particular wedding.

He does locate an out of the way nook, off behind the fire exit stairwell, which he takes a picture of and sends to his loves, along with a winking kiss emoji, and then ponders the concept of how a four-person quickie works.

Maybe… If they… Or… If his shoulder was a little stronger they could… Or…

Nope. A four-person quickie doesn’t work.

Nothing they do, as a foursome, is quick. It’s… just… too damn many people. So, him and Abby and then another round of him and Breena… And then him and Jimmy (?) and… Okay, he knows that’s more fucking than he can do over the course of one four-hour wedding. He and Abby and he and Breena, or, he and Abby and Breena… He’s got two hands… That he can likely pull off fast…

So, okay, yeah, two threesomes… He thinks through a few good plans on that.

Assuming everyone’s interested. And… actually, threesomes work better because Sean’s coming too, and someone should be on baby duty.

Tim smiles a bit, feeling like he’s got everything well planned out.

He sends one more text, to Breena and Abby, Want to see how far I’ve come on my hand rehab?

That gets a predictable Sure, how? From Abby, along with ? from Breena.

He shoots another shot of the stairwell. Coin flip on who gets right and who gets left. Then I see which one of you I can get off first.

He gets a smiley back from Abby and a kiss from Breena.

And given that, Tim heads off from the stairwell, feeling pretty pleased with himself and the rest of the world.

Breena puts her phone down with a sigh. It’s good that she’s keeping Tim’s spirits up, but her own are awfully low.

She could not be less interested in attending this wedding if she tried. She’s sick. She’s tired. She’s not sure which one is winning today. Probably tired. She’s get down on her knees thankful that she’s got plenty of family here to ride herd on the kids, so all she’s had to do today was move from one horizontal position to another one, with occasional moments of being upright and sipping a smoothie in between.

Jimmy’s getting out of the shower. Abby’s getting dressed. They’re both moving around, but just the idea of getting up makes Breena want to give up on life.

Abby’s got her stockings on, when it hits her that they all came in here to get ready, and she and Jimmy are getting ready, and Breena is lying on the bed, eyes closed, not moving. She takes one look at her wife and correctly diagnoses the problem.

“You don’t have to go.”

Breena nods. “I don’t think I am. I’m just… beat.”
Abby sits down next to her, petting her hair. “That’s okay. Tim’s not going to be bothered at all if you bow out on this.”

Jimmy looks up from toweling off his hair. “You want me to stay home, too?”

That gets Breena up on one elbow to look at her first husband. “Jimmy, go! All I’m going to do here is sleep. Gibbs and Abbi and Tony and Ziva are doing the baby watching. You guys are taking Sean with you. I’m going to sleep, maybe go up to Ziva’s bathroom, get a bath, and then go to back to bed and sleep some more.”

“You sure…” Jimmy’s saying it, but Breena can feel Abby thinking it, too.

“Go. Support our man. I don’t need you around to nap. He might need an extra soul that loves him at this thing, so go with him.”

“Okay.”

Two hours to go. Tim’s gotten snacks. He’s run errands. He’s visited the venue, and taken pictures, sending them to Sarah, who likely gave them to their mom, and thus made sure everything was in tip top shape.

But, eventually, he ran out of ‘stuff’ to do to keep him attached to, but not really in the same place as, or interacting with, the wedding party.

Which means it’s time to bite the bullet and mosey back to the wedding party and do his job as the male family member who’s involved with this thing.

Team Bride is staging at Sarah and Glenn’s new place. And though he hasn’t been there too many times, he’s more than familiar with the building, because they’re three floors down from Tony and Ziva’s apartment.

After the fall, Glenn wanted somewhere not too badly broken up, and in the city. Sarah needed power and functional wi-fi. Until December, this was one of a handful of places that fit that description. So, here they are.

It’s not a clone of Tony and Ziva’s place. Same two bedrooms, one bath stats, but a different set up. Sarah and Glenn have a small office and a galley kitchen to go with the living room. Tony and Ziva have a walk in kitchen and a slightly larger living room. Tim smiles as he sees the second bedroom, currently filled with women getting dressed up, and wonders who else in this group knows about Baby Holland.

The maid of honor, a brown-haired woman named Liza, his sister’s best friend since her Waverly days, immediately offers him a glass of champagne as soon as he’s in the room. Looking around he notices that this is not, by any stretch, the only bottle of wine that’s open.

And thus, with Sarah not drinking, he very rapidly comes to the conclusion that everyone in the room knows she’s pregnant.

The fact that Liza and two other bridesmaids are also talking about what sort of baby gear to get is another hint in that direction.

So, with a glass of wine in one hand, and his phone in the other, he wades in amongst the girls and starts showing off photos of Sarah with his kids and bragging on her ‘Aunt Sarah’ skills, thus earning him, and her, many a brownie point for being good with kids.

He realizes he didn’t think that through about a minute into showing off Sarah with Kelly shots when he can feel his mom, who has not been allowed to see any of these pictures, staring at him.

Her eyes are burning a hole into the back of his phone, but she’s not easing around to get into position to see them. She’s continuing to respect his ban on information about his family, even if she can’t make herself look away from what he’s doing.

Tim sighs. She’s not The Admiral, and showing the pictures to strangers, in front of her, and not letting her see them, crosses the line from self-preservation to cruel.

So, Tim nods at his mom, and she rushes over, standing a step away from him, carefully not getting too close, but avidly devouring the shots of her daughter and granddaughter, and in some of the more recent shots, her daughter and grandson.

He gets the first picture of Sarah and Sean open, and his mom gasps at it, “Oh… He looks so much like you!”

Tim nods.

He feels his sister come over, she’s between him and their mom, one arm around Tim’s back, the other around her mom’s, smiling, and there are small tears in her eyes, Tim can feel hope radiating off of her, and he knows he’s neck deep in the shit because there’s way too damn much going on with this right now.

He hands Sarah his phone. “Here… you can… I need to get dressed.”

He all but sprints out of the room, and then does the slowest job he possibly can getting into his kilt and suit.

Half an hour to go. They’re at the wedding venue, hiding out in the bridal nook, waiting for things to get moving. Everyone is dressed and ready to go. People are coming, guests arriving. Almost time. There’s a photographer getting shots of everyone there. Tim thinks Sarah’s warned him ahead of time, because he doesn’t try to get a shot of the three of them together. Which Tim appreciates. He doesn’t want to try and force himself to do a version of the three of them smiling together shot from his wedding.

But he can feel that both his sister and mother would like them to be in a place where something like that could happen.

But Tim doesn’t. Not now. And, right now, they’re both working with him on that.

Visitors come in and out, the various plus ones of the bridesmaids, Glenn’s parents, Glenn’s best man delivers a present for Sarah, stuff like that.

He’s on his phone, reading up on Inspector Generals, who he’s vaguely aware exist, and from the looks of it, they didn’t so much drop the ball last year, as didn’t show up to play the game. He’s figuring out where in the grand scheme of what he wants to do at the FBI they’ll go, when he hears the door open and more voices, none of which meander through his note taking, but finally a “Tim.” from his sister does.

“Oh!” he jumps up, smile spreading across his face as he sees his family. First and foremost, he sees Sean in his stroller in… He’s picking his boy up and cuddling him as he takes in the details of the tiny kilt and the little jacket and aside from the fact that he’s wearing long tie and vest, and Sean’s got a bow tie, and no vest, the basically matching outfits. “Oh…” he’s laughing. “Did…?” He’s looking around at them, Abby beaming, Jimmy with a wide grin, and then he lands on a particularly satisfied smile looking up at him from twinkling blue eyes. “Ducky!”

He hugs Ducky and Sean together as Ducky says, “One is never too young to be properly Scottish.” Tim raises an eyebrow at that. “Or too Irish?”

Abby elbows him gently. “And Italian.” Tim wraps an arm around her and kisses her hello.

Ducky waves that off. “Details.”

Sean, alert, awake, sucking busily on his pacifier, takes all of this adoration as his due. He looks up at his daddy, and promptly grabs onto the tie, getting a death grip on it.

Tim kisses him. “I’m going to have to pry you off with a crowbar, won’t I?”

Sean gurgles.

Sarah’s stepped over. “If he doesn’t want to let go, you can certainly bring him along. I’m sure Mom’ll be fine doing all the tying if your hands are full of this little guy.”

Mom. He again feels the eyes on him. This woman has never seen him, save for ten seconds with Kelly, interact with one of his children before. She’s never seen him be a dad. And she is watching.

“That would be no problem at all, if he doesn’t want to move,” Tori says, quickly.

Tim can feel Abby tense up, feel her working on shutting Tori down. He gives her a gentle, I’m okay squeeze. “Um… We’ll see. How long has he been up?”

“He ate in the car on the way here. Right now, he’s in his quiet, well-fed, awake period. About the time you want to be walking down the aisle, he’ll want to be going to sleep,” Jimmy says.

Tim nods. “Then I’ll be handing him back before then. No one’s going to be better off with me lugging around a crabby baby.” He nuzzles Sean. “Least of all you. You’re going to go and have a nice snooze in your stroller, right?”

Sean’s look could best be classified as we’ll see.

Tim glances around, noticing that part of the party isn’t here. “Breena?”

“Is having a very pregnant day,” Jimmy says.

Sarah smiles at that and sighs. “Say no more. She’s not watching the kids is she?”

“No!” Abby says. “Gibbs and Abbi are doing most of the kid watching. Breena was sleeping when we left, with any luck she’ll get to eat something, and then get some more sleep.”

“And if we’re really lucky, she’ll wake up feeling good,” Jimmy adds. Just because it isn’t going to happen, doesn’t mean he can’t wish for it.

Tim’s mom makes a small noise, and Sarah understands it. Tori knows everyone in this group, except Jimmy, who she’s only met once, as Abby’s best man, at their wedding. “Tori Allister, this is Jimmy Palmer, Jimmy, this is our mom.”

And, if Tori was less than satisfied with that introduction, because it doesn’t actually clarify who Jimmy is, or why he’s that intimately acquainted with Sean’s sleep cycle, let alone here at the wedding, that’s rapidly burned away when he turns his attention to her, eyes frigid, doesn’t offer his hand, and says, “Ah.” He stares at her for what feels like a very long time before saying, with the darkest, coldest smile she’s ever seen form on human lips, “I’ve met your ex-husband.”

And Tori doesn’t know what the hell that means, but she knows danger when she feels it, and right now every nerve in her body is screaming at her to run away and make sure she is never alone in the same room as the man staring her down.

She licks her lips and steps back. “I…”

As she starts to turn away she sees Tim rest his hand on Jimmy’s forearm and say, quietly, “It’s okay, Jimmy. I’m okay.”

Jimmy looks back at Tim, a lot of tenderness in his eyes, and he waits for Tim to nod again before saying, “Okay.”

Just like every other wedding he’s been to, Tim finds this time and space a good place to focus on his loves.

He kisses his sister’s cheek, and hugs his almost brother-in-law, and then ties the ribbon around Sarah and Glenn’s hands. Then he steps back, letting the rest of the family do their thing. His eyes find Jimmy and Abby. They’re in the back, mostly to make it easy to duck out if Sean gets fussy, but also because back there, no one’s watching them.

Jimmy’s holding Abby’s hand, and both of them give him a smile when his eyes meet theirs. He smiles back, wishing Breena could have been here for this, and hoping she’s getting a good nap.

Penny and Ducky are next to them, with Sean between Abby and Penny. Penny’s gently rocking his baby seat, keeping little guy quietly snoozing away.

Bound. That’s what Cassidy has been talking about.

The ties, literal ones for the ceremony, and the metaphysical ones they symbolize, and how lives weave and connect into each other, making a knot that can never be undone.

Standing up there, he’s very aware of the ties between him and Abby, and Jimmy, and Breena, and with each other and all of those threads of life, love, affection, lust, time, history, blood, sweat, tears, all of it, keeping them cemented to each other.

Until my last breath.

He sees Abby smile again, and wonders if she knows what he’s thinking. If she can feel it, or if, by now, she just knows him so well as to know what would be in his mind.
She signs it back to him, and Jimmy kisses her cheek, adding his own promise to it.

He’s sure Breena can’t feel it, not from miles away and sleeping, but he thinks it at her, too.

When The Admiral kept watching him/sidling over to say something at the Tech in Anti-Terror Commission there was a certain feel that went with that. John was trying to pick a fight.

Tori’s not. Tim can feel that.

He’s not sure what she’s trying to do.

He’s got the sense she’s not sure, either.

But whatever it is, she’s doing it, a lot.

He can feel his mom watching them. It’s been happening all night. She watches him, and then Jimmy, and him and Jimmy, then him and Abby, and Jimmy and Abby, and back again. And he knows what she’s got to be thinking. If all she’s got is the secondhand write up in Stars and Stripes, which specified that John had pled guilty to assault and a hate crime, but not which hate crime, or who had been assaulted, she might not have reason to be curious about Tim being at a wedding with a man and a woman. But if she had read Leon’s speech about the direction he was going to take the Navy, it would have been awfully clear which hate crime was in play, add in who got hit... And it’s not like she’s stupid; she’d have to have her suspicions. Plus, it’s not like she didn’t live with John for more than twenty years. She knows his hot buttons. And that’s not all she’s got. After all, John wasn’t there all by his lonesome. He was part of the Navy delegation, which was ten guys, and their dates, and it’s entirely likely that his Mom knows at least a third of those guys, and if those dates were wives, probably half to two-thirds of the wives.

As Penny said, becoming an Admiral is a political game as well as a strategic one, and for a while, at least, his mom played the game. She has friends, and some of them are in high places, or at least, married to high places.

If she had wanted it, she would have gotten the scuttlebutt. All of the scuttlebutt. And as Tim thinks about last night, and her asking about where Abby was, he’s sure she’s got the scuttlebutt about what happened, all of it, at the tech conference.

As he thinks about it, by now, she’s likely got the scuttlebutt about what happened on the Stennis, too.

Though, in that case, scuttlebutt was likely to have been a hell of a lot less accurate than it was about the Tech in Anti-Terror Commission.

Tori does wander over as he’s feeding Sean, and Abby and Jimmy are dancing. Good timing on her part, both of them have been radiating stay the fuck away vibes at her all night. He glances up at her from Sean. “You brought your friend to your sister’s wedding?” She’s watching Jimmy and Abby dance as she says that to Tim. He’s got the sense ‘friend’ isn’t her first choice of words to describe Jimmy.
“My sister invited my family to her wedding. I happily brought them. I just wish Breena had been feeling up to coming, too.”

Tori thinks about that for a moment. She nods slowly. “Only some of it. Gibbs isn’t here.”

“He and Abbi have Kelly, Molly, and Anna tonight.”

Tori nods at that. “Penny’s mentioned all of them.”

“They’re her family. I’d think she would.”

“She’s mentioned that Sean’s deaf.” She’s looking at the tiny boy snuggled into the crook of Tim’s arm, wide blue eyes looking around as he slurps down a bottle of Abby’s best vintage. Looking like she wants to stroke his head, hold him close, smell his sweet baby scent. Tim scoots back from her, arm tightening around Sean, unconsciously protecting his child, and she winces.

“Yes. Week after next we go to the first appointment with the pediatric audiologist.”

“Oh. I’m… sorry. But they can… fix that, right?”

Tim takes a deep breath, lets it out slowly, and then does it again. He’s gotten versions of this before. It’s not judgmental, just a matter of not knowing how to ask the question. “He’s not broken, Mom. He’s different. They can’t make his ears work. At least, that’s unlikely. We won’t know for sure until we meet up with the Doc. Our pediatrician thinks he’s a candidate for cochlear implants, and, if he is, and if that’s the best route to take, he’ll get them. But, odds are he won’t ‘hear,’ not the way we do. The implant turns sounds into electrical impulses that’ll go into his brain and let him experience aural stimulation. He should be able to learn how to talk fairly normally. He’ll ‘hear’ enough to allow him to make sounds that are fairly normal. He’ll, hopefully, be able to catch something like eight words in ten with the implants. Abby and I both sign, and so does Gibbs, and the rest of the family is learning, too. We’ll make sure he can get those last two words easily.” Tim’s had way more experience explaining this plan than he wanted to. “He’ll grow up able to navigate hearing spaces easily, but also able to immerse himself in Deaf culture if he wants to.”

Tori’s staring at Sean, who’s still happily nursing away. “Is the surgery dangerous?”

Tim shrugs. He hates thinking about that. “More than getting tubes put in, less than open heart surgery. They’re going to put little electronic devices in his head. It’s not a walk in the park.”

Tori nods, and Tim can feel her thinking. “It’s dangerous, and hard, and he’s not going to like it. He’s going to cry and scream and you’ll feel terrible about it. But you do it because it gives him the best shot at a successful life. But she doesn’t say it.

That doesn’t stop him from saying, “It’s not the same thing, Mom.”

She shrugs.

“You’re making the point that I’m doing something he won’t like for his own good. That that’s the heart of being a parent. You make the best decision you can, and you hope like hell it works out.”

“Exactly.”

Tim shakes his head. “Whatever lets you sleep at night.” He stands up and walks away.
There’s a song that Tim remembers liking, way back when, as a teen, and he can’t for the life of him remember the name or the artist, or, even, really, what it sounded like, but the lyrics are floating around his head, “I’m learning to live without you now. Though I miss you sometimes. The more I know, the less I understand. All the things I thought I knew, I'm learning again. I've been trying to get down to the heart of the matter. And the will gets weak. And my thoughts seem to scatter. But I think it’s about forgiveness, even if, you don’t love me anymore.”

He’s dancing with Abby, but keeps looking over to his mom.

“You okay?”

Tim shrugs.

“Want to leave?”

“Not yet.”

She stares at him, eyes searching his. He flashes a quick, somewhat limp-looking smile. She nods at that. They can all feel he’s very confused right now, a lot of emotions he’s not really sure where they all go together and how they’ll all shake out.

She gives him a kiss. “We’ll stay as long as you like.”

He nods, and kisses her back, and then she rests her head on his shoulder.

A song later, the music shifts, faster, happier, and they’re still dancing. Her hand trails down his chest, lightly brushing against his belt. “Want to…”

He smiles a little and shake his head. Too many things buzzing in his head for him to get into sex mode.

She kisses him again. “I was hoping to take your mind off of it.”

“I think my mind’s supposed to be on it, right now.”

“Okay.”

He and Jimmy have been taking turns dancing with Abby.

And, yes there is a practical reason for that, someone should be with Sean. But, it’s not like the three of them are the only family Sean has here. His great-grandparents are also here, and both of them have been known to be willing to keep an eye on a sleeping infant for five for six minutes at a time if asked nicely.

Hell, if asked really nicely, they’ve even been known to change the occasional diaper. So, getting a dance or two in shouldn’t be an issue.

Tim's got Sean right now, and he’s watching Jimmy dance with Abby, and thinking about how, at every wedding they’ve been to since his own, the three/four of them have danced together.

He remembers standing in front of the mirror before Jimmy and Breena’s wedding, putting on his tie, thinking about how he and Abby would have acted if they hadn’t been sleeping together, versus how they’d act now that they were, and figuring out where to draw the line so they didn’t end up ricoeheting from suspicious because of too much affection to suspicious because of too little.

They danced as a foursome at Tony and Ziva’s wedding, and at Senior and Delphine’s. Because they weren’t fooling around then, they weren’t worried about how people would see it.

Eh… that’s not all of it. He didn’t stand up in public and admit to fucking men before that.

That. That’s the glowing neon line which makes it so he can’t play with Jimmy in public. Not without causing trouble.

He feels someone standing next to him before he sees her.

“Hi, Mom.”

She’s watching Jimmy and Abby very intently. Then she turns to Tim. “So, your sister invited your family to her wedding.”

Tim nods.

“But not Gibbs, and not Tony and Ziva.”

“Nope.”

She scans the room, and there is a trio on the dance floor. Two girls and a guy, all of them dancing together. Having a blast from the looks of it. Sarah introduced them, but Tim’s blanking on the names, other than the girl is one of Sarah’s writers. He knows there’s another quad around here somewhere, but he’s doesn’t see them.

“You want to be out there with them.”

Tim nods at that, too. Sean stirs a bit, shifting against his shoulder, making a small chirpy noise before settling into deeper sleep. He kisses his son’s head. “Yeah, I do. But shooting down the Admiral means I can’t do that anymore.”

“Why not?” He can see she’s genuinely curious about this.

“Slater and Palmer’s, Breena’s mortuary, is a closely held family business. Most of their customers are devout something or others, and besides Wiccans, there aren’t any devout something or others that think what we’re doing is cool. Jimmy can dance with Abby, and they’re just being friendly. He can’t go dancing with me. That’s not friendly. And the three of us together might get the wrong tongues wagging, especially after this winter. So many people here, and we don’t know a tenth of them. So, no, we won’t risk it. Gibbs’ wedding, that’ll be closed, family and friends only, we’ll get to be out there.”

Tori nods, watching Jimmy and Abby dance. They look good together. But they would. They’ve been dancing together for years, and this is easy music. They’re talking, and Jimmy’s said something funny, from the way Abby’s laughing.

“He’s as much yours as hers?” she asks, eyes on Jimmy and Abby.

Tim nods at that, too. “All four ways. I belong to all three of them, and they’re mine, and all the other variations you can think of.”
“Okay.”

He glances away from his wife and husband to look at his mother. “Okay?”

“Okay,” she says with a tiny nod.

“How?”

She shrugs. “What would be the point in not being okay? I see you for an hour twice a lifetime, so… Why not?”

Tim inclines his head at that. But that doesn’t feel like all of it. He’s been an investigator for too long to not see the tells. “Go ahead, say the rest of it.”

“I doubt there’s much point to it.”

“Maybe not. But you’re thinking it. You want to say it. I can feel that, see it. So, might as well say it. Not like things are going to get any more awkward.”

A sad half smile lifts one corner of her lip. “I wonder sometimes, how much happier we all would have been if your father could have done that. Could have admitted what he wanted, and gone and got it.”

Tim parses that for a moment, and decides she’s probably onto something. From his vantage as a child, it seemed like The Admiral had everything he wanted. But as an adult, an adult who has everything he wants, or is as close as anyone gets, he knows that content, happy people don’t act like The Admiral.

“You think The Admiral wanted… a man… a trio…”

“A man? Men? Maybe.” Again, Tori shrugs. She never got the sense that sex, or love, or relationships were really John’s thing. “Whatever it was, it wasn’t me, and it wasn’t you, and even being The Admiral didn’t really do it. The hole was always there.”

“Yeah.” Tim sighs at that. He’s not sure there was anything The Admiral wanted that ever could have filled that hole. “When we were in Texas, before Abby and I got married, I meant it, even… with everything else between us… you deserved to be important.”

“So did you. And you deserve to be loved,” her eyes flick away from him to Jimmy and Abby, “for who and what you are.”

He nods, briefly, at that, feeling his eyes fill. Tim bites his lip, hard, and says, “Thanks.”

“I love you, Tim. And it doesn’t end, or stop, or go away. I always have, and I always will.” She eyes the way he’s holding Sean, and he understands the message of that look. “And you’re angry. And that’s okay. You’re allowed to be angry about what we… I… did to you.”

He blinks, hard, nods once, and steps away, heading to the dance floor to cut in on Jimmy and Abby, because right now, he really needs a hug.

Tim’s holding Sean and Abby close, and Jimmy makes a quick executive decision. He doesn’t move back or away, he stays close, his one hand on Tim’s back, other hand on Abby’s.
“Are you…” Abby starts to ask, and Tim shakes his head. He just needs to be wrapped in his loves right now.

She kisses him gently, and accepts his silence.

Jimmy scans the room, looking for Tori, but he doesn’t see her. He does see Penny, but she’s talking with Ducky and a few other people he doesn’t know, so no help there.

“Should…” Jimmy starts, and Tim grabs the hand against his back, and holds it there, non-verbally letting Jimmy know not to go hunt down his mom.

Tim’s breathing deep and slow, getting himself under control. Abby’s holding onto him, petting the back of his neck.

The first blow up with his mom, back the night before Kelly’s christening, felt like draining a putrid wound. Letting the poisons latch out. It hurt, sick hurt, infected, festering hurt. And letting that out didn’t make anything magically better, it just left him in a position where he could start healing.

This feels like rehab hurt. The burning, ripping ache of loosening bound muscles and joints.

If the first confrontation got him to the point where he could start healing, this is the first step in actually doing it.

Tim’s aware, as his forehead rests on Abby’s shoulder, and she pets his neck, and Jimmy’s hand anchors him on his back, that the ball is entirely in his court now. Whatever happens next is up to him, and no one else.

He’s in a contemplative mood as his sister and Glenn cut the cake. His arm is around Abby’s waist, as she holds Sean, who is awake and watching as eagerly as a ten-week-old can. Jimmy’s next to Abby, looking like he’s got his arms crossed across his stomach, but that gives him cover to have his hand stroking Tim’s.

The first time he fought with his mom about this, he remembers saying, “You were making me hard enough to live your life.” That night, he shut that train of thought down, fast, knowing it was a way to restructure things and protect her from responsibility, but now he feels ready to look at that, again.

She was so alone for so much of it. The Admiral wasn’t on land for more than a few months at a time, and best Tim remembers he didn’t spend much time at home if he was on land. They moved every two years, and most of those years predated the internet and free long distance calling. All she had of her parents, and Penny, back in those days, were letters.

And who knew how much she would have been willing to put in a letter.

Move every two years, who knows what she had in the way of real, close, blood friends. Contacts, buddies, ladies who would watch him for a few hours and let her get out of the house, other Navy wives, sure, but friends? Friends like Tony and Abbi… People she could show up at their home in three in the morning and ask for help hiding a body, and they’d do it, no questions asked… Those kinds of friends?

Just her, and this kid, and the ghost of a husband who her whole life was supposed to be dedicated to supporting. Tim doesn’t know what John and Tori’s marriage was like, not from the inside, but he knows what the Catholic pre-marital counseling they went through was like, and it was heavy on work everything out as well as you can, along with a lot of help on how to get things worked out, but there was always the underlying foundation: if you can’t work it out, Hubby wins.

He can’t imagine The Admiral was good with that sort of power. Can’t imagine he ever attempted to work anything out.

Tim kisses his wife. He strokes Jimmy’s hand with his. He wishes he could touch Breena right now.

He got married as an adult. A fully secular adult with no overhanging belief structure in place telling him he had to do whatever this person he hooked himself up to wanted or else he’d face eternal perdition. His mom got married in 1974. She was twenty-three years old, star-eyed in love with a guy she didn’t really know, raised in her very Catholic parents’ home, a home that took things like ‘The husband is the head of the house’ seriously.

A house that believed in sin. A house that prepared her to be a ‘good wife.’

A house that believed in shame. And a divorce… That was sin and shame.

Another level of their marriage, and the end of it, hits Tim. Divorce wasn’t just sin and shame, it was sin and shame and poverty. The Admiral’s wife couldn’t have a job of her own. Oh No! That wasn’t done. Which meant the Admiral’s wife didn’t have any money of her own, either.

As a kid, money wasn’t a thing. Not really. He knows The Admiral always groused about three meals a day, a roof over their heads, and the best education money could buy, but he never got the sense they were poor, or even close. He got the sense The Admiral was making sure everyone knew who was making the money that paid for those things.

He, like his sister, got an envelope with a certain amount of money in it each month, and that was his allowance. As a kid, it was pocket money, something to get candy or toys with. Once he was fourteen, it was supposed to cover books, clothing, his lunch at school, any extracurricular activities he was part of, and whatever ‘fun’ stuff he might want. When he was sixteen gas and car insurance were supposed to come out of that, too. It was his job to save and budget that money, so that at the end of the month, he could still buy himself lunch.

When he had jobs, he gave the money to his parents, and they upped his monthly allowance accordingly, and put half of what he earned of it aside for college. But that money didn’t go into an account in his name, and when he started talking about going anywhere other than Annapolis, The Admiral made it clear that he wouldn’t have access to a penny of the money he earned that they’d been ‘saving’ for him.

He wonders if his mom was on the same system. He knows she didn’t pay for things with a credit card. He doesn’t remember ever seeing her paying the monthly bills. He wonders if she got an envelope, too, and if however much cash was in that envelope was all the money she had.

He wonders how tightly The Admiral was holding onto her. He wonders how much she had to be willing to bear to break free.

He cuddles in closer to his loves, thinking about what he’s done since he’s been adored. He tries to imagine where he’d be if he was on his own, or, worse, stuck with The Admiral, for decades at a time.

He wonders, in that case, if he’d have had the strength to fight, to get his kids out.

He likes to think he would have.
But he doesn’t know.

Seventeen bad years.

Twenty good ones.

He broke free over Christmas break of his senior year of high school. Less than twenty-four hours after his graduation, he was on a plane heading east.

His mom and sister went to his graduation. The Admiral didn’t. There wasn’t any graduation party at their house, so Tim got his picture taken with his mom and sister, and he got hugged and congratulated, and then he got permission to stay out all night. (His usual curfew was 1:00.)

So, he went to a bunch of other kids’ graduation parties, slept on his best friend’s sofa that night, and didn’t go home until noon, when he stopped back just long enough to say goodbye to his sister, grab his suitcase and ticket, and then he was in a cab heading for the plane that would take him east.

The Admiral went back to sea in August.

His mom moved back in with her parents that August, too. Set Sarah up to go to school up there. At the time, she told him she was helping Gran out with Pop. He wonders if that’s what she told The Admiral, too.

Just helping out her mom with her dad.

The divorce was final by the time he finished his freshman year.

He wonders idly, watching Tori across the room, if seeing him break free motivated her.

He knows that once she got free of the Admiral, he never had any reason to complain about her as a mom.

The night is wearing on, and they’re almost ready to go when Tim gets a quiet moment with Penny.

“You’ve been thinking about her, a lot,” she says.

“Yeah. That obvious?”

She nods. “You’ve got something you want to ask me, too.”

He nods at that, too. “Yeah. You’ve said before you told her to leave him. When was that?”

Penny sighs. “Oh, Lord… Uh… Before Sarah was born. After, too. First time was before he hit Captain.”

“And if she had wanted to run, you would have given her a safe place to land, right?”

“You’re not going to argue with me.”

Of course! We, Nelson and I, love Tori. And we didn’t think she was a good match for John. We didn’t think she was ever going to be a good match for him. Not because she wasn’t a good person or wasn’t willing to go the extra mile, she put up with a lot of crap from him. They just didn’t line up well.”

“She knew you thought that?”

“We told her. Nelson told her. I told her. There was a pretty rough patch about a year before Sarah, right when John was making the leap to Captain, and he was going full bore on everything had to be perfect in all ways at all times…”

Tim thinks back, and he sort of remembers that, but it’s vague. Of course, if it was the year before Sarah was born, it was back when he was still young enough that he was willing to do pretty much anything anyone asked him to, often with a smile.

“She had an out; she just didn’t take it.”

Penny shrugs. “She had an out, literally. But it was the ‘80s, and staying together for the kids was still considered the best thing you could do for your kids. The idea was splitting up would mess them up for life. Between that and the church… And her parents…”

He stands there and digests that.

“Does it help?” Penny asks.

He shrugs. “It’s context. You guys heading home soon?”

Penny nods. “Yeah, we’ll see them off and then get ready for the drive.”

He kisses her cheek. “I think I’m going to find Sarah, say goodnight, and get us on the way.”

Penny hugs her grandson. “Okay. We’ll see you at the house in an hour or so.”

On the drive home, he says, “Thinking about forgiveness. And… I think I can see how it looks, now, even if I can’t feel it, yet.” And, as much as everything else is upside down and confused, he knows that about himself. He is angry, and he’s not ready to let that go, not yet. But… he feels like there might be a time when he could let it go.

“How’s it look?” Jimmy asks.

“Like she did the best she could with the hand she had, and it wasn’t good, and it wasn’t enough, but it wasn’t malice, either. It wasn’t him. She didn’t set out to hurt me, she just… did.”

“You think you’ll ever feel it?” Abby asks.

“I don’t know. I can identify it, at least. That’s a start, right?” A half smile lifts one corner of his mouth.

“Probably,” she says.

They drive in quiet for another moment. “You ever forgive the man who killed your parents?”

Abby shrugs. “Not consciously, not intentionally, but… enough time passed and I don’t hate him anymore. I don’t rage about it. Not planning elaborate, or even boring murder schemes anymore. It just… happened.” She’s quiet for a moment. “I don’t know if that’s forgiveness or not. I never consciously decided to be ‘okay’ with him…” She keeps thinking. “I’m not okay with him. I’m okay
Tim squeezes her hand. Jimmy’s in the backseat, and he leans up to pet her face.

Tim’s hoping, eventually, that’s how he’ll feel about the Admiral, too. They drive in silence for a few more minutes, before Abby asks, “If you ever can feel it, then what?”

Tim shakes his head. “I don’t know.” Tim’s not eager to even attempt to untangle his mom and Abby, or his mom and Jimmy, or his mom and Gibbs, and all the other complications that go with attempting to deal with those relationships. “Let’s give it more time and see if I can ever feel it.”

Abby smiles at him, just a little one. “You will. Sooner or later. That’s part of who you are. You forgive, everyone, sooner or later.”

Tim sighs. “Maybe. Or maybe it just looks that way because most of what I deal with doesn’t even get to a one on the ‘shit I’ve been through’ meter.”

Abby squeezes his hand this time. “Maybe. Do you want to forgive her?”

“That’s okay,” Jimmy says. “You don’t have to.”

They’re quiet for another long moment before Jimmy says, “I still haven’t forgiven my Dad. I love him. Always will. But the son-of-a-bitch wouldn’t take care of himself for us. Eat better, exercise more, lose weight, keep track of his damn blood sugar. It’s... I’m not going to say it’s easy, but, he didn’t have to die at forty-eight.

“We loved him, and he left us. I’m still pissed about that. He missed my graduation, and didn’t see me get my MD, or my wedding. He never met his grand kids and you guys. He didn’t get to see Clark and I be men... And Mom... I like my step-dad, but, he’s not Dad.” Jimmy strokes Abby’s cheek. She reaches back to hold his hand, and kisses his palm. “Maybe I’m not okay enough with me for there not to be any room for not being okay with him. I don’t know. Usually I feel pretty okay with me. But it’s there, every day. Every time I check my sugar, when I weigh myself every morning, when the desserts are sitting there looking yummy, that memory of standing there with my mom and Clark, arm around her as they dropped his coffin in the ground, it’s there, keeping me going.

“I’m going to see forty-eight, and forty-nine, and a lot more after that. And I don’t think you need to forgive anything a second sooner than you want to, especially if you’re doing something useful with it.”

Tim wishes he wasn’t in the middle of a highway, because he’d like to do more than reach back blindly and squeeze Jimmy’s hand.

He wonders though, as he’s driving, if he’s doing anything useful with this, if there is anything good that could come out of it.

Sean chirps. There is that. He’s going to be a vastly better parent than the parents he had.

Somehow though, he doesn’t think he needs a lot of anger to keep him moving in that direction.

Chapter End Notes
The song Tim's thinking about is by Don Henley, and it's called The Heart of the Matter.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GSLNYZ5rIEM
Dr. Snyder

The ten days between Sarah’s wedding and Sean’s first appointment with Dr. Snyder go skittering by without much notice.

Crime, computers, babies, family time, a huge heaping pile of Normal for Clan Gibbs.

Tim supposes, sitting in the waiting room with Sean, Abby, and Gibbs, that this is part of his new normal.

Unless by some miracle of the MRI, they found some sort of little issue that could be cured with some surgery, they’re going to be here, a lot.

And from the research they’ve done, miracles of MRIs, that find an easily fixed problem are more or less non-existent.

Tim is also glad, that part of his new normal is life out of the field. Right now, Tony’s on day five of a serial murder case. The bodies are piling up, and he and Jimmy have been working full out for almost a week now, with no breaks in the case.

And if Tim were still a field agent, or if Abby didn’t have three other lab techs, Gibbs might have been here, on his own, with Sean.

But he’s not, because neither of them have to be on the case right now.

No, right now, the three of them are in a waiting room. This is a pediatric audiologist, so the room is bright, there are a lot of toys and kids’ magazines, across from them there’s a collection of little chairs and a few large wooden puzzle blocks. It’s not silent, but there is less talking than Tim expects in a waiting room. There are several kids, the oldest one looks to be five, Sean’s likely the youngest one, and the kids are either stone silent, or way too loud.

A little girl, who’s probably four, comes over to look at Sean. She stares at him in his little green onesie and tan pants, and says, in a very loud voice, “IS IT A BOY OR GIRL?”

Abby starts to sign back that Sean’s a boy, but the girl looks blankly at that, obviously not able to understand signing herself.

“Oh, HIS NAME IS SEAN,” Tim says back, also very loud.

“Oh, HE’S CUTE!”

“Oh, THANK YOU!” Abby replies.

The nurse heads in, and calls a name. The little girl either didn’t hear it, or was paying too much attention to Sean to notice, but her mother comes over, gently taps her on the shoulder, and then points to the door. The girl nods and waves goodbye to them.

One of the parents near them was watching that, and asks Abby, “You already sign?”

Abby nods; she’s been offering variations on this for a while now. “Yes. My parents were deaf. I’ve been signing my whole life.”
“Oh. I was going to ask if it was hard to learn.”

Tim takes over. “I learned as an adult. It’s not simple, but it’s not impossible, either. Set an hour or so a night for it, and,” he scans the room, and then nods to the eighteen-month-old looking baby with the same bright red curls as the woman speaking to them, who’s whacking at the sliding bead toy in the middle of the waiting area, “as you teach her, you learn it, too.”

The mom sighs. “Kind of hoping I won’t have to learn, and she won’t either. I want her to be able to speak normally.”

“Learning to sign is about you being able to talk to her. Learning to speak is about her being able to talk to hearing people. If she’s anything like my parents, she’ll use, and need, both.”

That doesn’t appear to please the Mom. She watches her daughter play, and looks at Sean, who’s kicking his little feet and watching the room.

“You mind if I ask what they did?”

“No. I like talking about my parents. They ran a salvage yard. Mostly old dead cars. When a cool one would come in, Papa would snag it for himself and rebuild it. Some they’d keep. Some they sold. Mama ran the books and made sure the business end was taken care of. Papa took care of the stock, paid for things people left, sold parts people wanted.”

“They dealt with people who could hear, then?”

“Yes. Customers every day. My brother and I hear, too. They were good lip readers, but for details they made sure things were written down. A lot of sounds look awfully similar when you’re talking. And you don’t want to think you made a deal for fifteen dollars and the seller thinks he’s getting fifty. They could both talk, and most people could follow them, but it was clear from their speech they couldn’t hear. They’d sign with each other, and with us. It didn’t stop them from doing anything they wanted to do.”

“Dance, sing?” she asks watching her daughter.

“They didn’t sing. They did dance. We usually had music on in the shop. Loud enough to rattle the windows. They liked the feel of it.”

Tim’s not sure if the Mom finds that comforting, but she seems interested.

“We don’t have any deaf people in our family. Mandy was born hearing. When she was ten months old, some…” she’s very clearly editing herself, “members of our church came back from mission with mumps. Three of the kids got sick. And when she was better, Mandy couldn’t hear anymore.”

Tim, Abby, and Gibbs wince at that. “I’m sorry,” Abby says.

“Yeah, well… It took a while to catch it. She was so sick, and for so long we were focused on that, making sure she could breathe and there wasn’t permanent lung damage. When it got really bad, she didn’t breathe for three full minutes, and at first we’re just on our knees thanking God she was still alive, but after that… Did she have brain damage? That’s hard to tell in a baby, but finally, she’s laughing and playing and she’s a year old, but she’s not talking or repeating sounds or babbling. But, okay, she’s had a rough time, give it a bit longer. Another few months, and she’s still not making much noise. We mention it to the pediatrician, and he checks her hearing, and it’s gone.”

“I’m really sorry,” Abby says.
“Yeah. Well…” Those two words cover a lot of anger, and a lot of frustration, and a lot of feelings of hopelessness. Tim’s glad that they aren’t in that emotional space. “They say Dr. Snyder is really good.”

“That’s why we’re here, too,” Tim says, not sure what to do with this lady’s story, other than get down on his knees and thank the God he rarely believes in that none of his babies have run into some idiot with a contagious disease and no understanding of how vaccines work.

“Mandy Barnes…” The nurse says. The Mom looks up, and nods at the nurse. “Off we go.” She heads over to her daughter, picks her up, and back they go.

They wait for another six minutes before a nurse calls out, “Sean McGee…” She’s perky and pleasant and coos over Sean while getting his weight and length. (Eight pounds six ounces, twenty-one and a half inches long. Little guy is growing like a weed. Little guy is also not happy about being stripped out of his clothing, handled by a stranger, or put on a scale. He complains, vigorously, about this, and doesn’t start to calm down again until Abby’s got him back in his diaper and onesie.)

Then she takes them to an examination room, and lets the know Snyder would be in soon.

This feels familiar to Tim. They’ve done this over and over and over with all of Sean and Kelly’s baby checkups. Abby hoists herself up onto the exam table (another sign of things going back to normal post-Sean. This time last month Abby’s abs would not have gone along with that.), and Tim hands her Sean. He and Gibbs take the chairs, and they wait.

Not too long. The nurse wasn’t kidding about Snyder being in soon.

There were things that they expected Snyder to be. Male. Older than Tim and Abby. (He’s probably fifty-ish.) White. (Though, when Tim realizes that’s part of what he was expecting, he’s irked by it.) Wearing a nice button down, slacks, and a lab coat. Check. One of those things (Jimmy would know what its name is.) for looking in a kid’s ears or nose, in his pocket. That’s part of Tim’s mental image of Doctor.

And then there was the thing they weren’t expecting. Hearing aids. Bright blue ones, with a little Captain America shield on them.

For a second, while Snyder is introducing himself, shaking hands, giving Sean a little pet, Tim’s staring at them. He can feel Abby’s dumbstruck, too, but she gathers herself quickly.

“You sign?” Abby finishes the sentence with her fingers.

“I learned so I could talk to her without other people listening in. I was a cop, she runs the forensics lab, and we were thinking our kids didn’t need to be hearing conversations along the lines of ‘Guess where I found the victim’s spleen?’”

Snyder seems to think that’s a fine reason to learn how to sign.
Abby takes over. She looks over to Gibbs, but like with his tongue, his fingers don’t leap into action. His grandfather signs, too. And most of the rest of the family is learning, too. So… this or “shall we talk?”

Snyder smiles. “I actually prefer to talk. Between the hearing aids and lip reading, I’m faster with speech and follow it better.”

“Oh.” Tim says. “We’ve been reading and…”

“And you’ve read about Deaf people missing words.” Snyder nods. “I have fifty percent of my natural hearing on the right side, and seventy percent on the left. Apparently they weren’t kidding about listening to high volume music for extended time with ear buds being bad for you.” Tim shoots a glance to Abby. She rolls her eyes a bit. Listening to loud music in a room isn’t quite the same thing as ear buds. “It’s true that I don’t catch everything said to me, and if you turn away when we’re having a conversation, my ability to follow it is going to drop, but not that badly. For me, all I need is someone to turn up the volume on the world, and I’m good.”

There’s a pause, and then Tim says, “But from what we’ve been told, Sean isn’t.”

Snyder nods at that. He puts Sean’s file on the table next to him and Abby and flips it open. “I’ve gotten Sean’s test results, and he is profoundly deaf.”

“What does that mean?” Abby says. “I mean, yes, he can’t hear, but…”

“Oh, back to basics. There’s sensorineural deafness, and there’s conductive deafness. Sean has a combination of the two. He’s got 100% loss on the right side, because in addition to neurological issues, the little hair cells deep in his ear not taking all the sounds to his brain, the bones in his ear are fused solid. He’s got a 95% loss on the left because the bones are almost fused, and the nerves aren’t sending messages to his brain the way they should.”

Tim and Abby look at each other, and then at Sean. Abby licks her lips and then says, “So, does that mean there’s nothing we can do?”

“No. It means that I’m not going to suggest trying hearing aids. Sean isn’t in a situation where turning up the volume will help. I could grab an air horn and blast it off an inch from his head, and he won’t twitch. It also means, that I won’t suggest trying to surgically correct the bone formation. If we got them freed up on the left side, that could improve his hearing, but with no hearing at all on the right side, and the sensorineural issues, that’s a lot of pain to get him to twenty or thirty percent on the left, which isn’t going to do all that much.”

“Cochlear implants?” Tim asks.

“That’s going to be the question. You realize they aren’t a magic bullet. We don’t do this and he’s suddenly got perfect hearing.”

They both nod. “We’ve read up on all of this.”

“It’s possible that even with implants, his best side will have fifty percent hearing.”

“By possible do you mean likely or worst case scenario?” Abby asks.

“Worst case scenario is they don’t work at all. Fifty percent on one side is the worst of the likely outcomes.”

“What’s the best of the likely outcomes?” Tim asks.
“About where I am without my hearing aids. Say sixty percent on one side, eighty on the other. He will absolutely need to learn to lip read because unless the technology keeps leaping forward, he won’t ever hear well enough to catch everything. Having a family that signs will be important for him, too.”

For a moment, Tim and Abby digest that. Snyder lets them. Then he says, “It would not be unreasonable for you to decide there’s not enough benefit to make going ahead with the surgery worth it. Not now. Not with how the technology currently works. It would not be unreasonable to go ahead, either. Assuming they work, at all, he will have an easier time learning to speak. Lip reading, if you can make out any of the sounds the person you’re reading is making, is much easier.

“But this isn’t a walk in the park. This is major surgery. And if you want to wait, you can. If you want to focus on signing and lip reading I will happily get you in contact with some of the best speech therapists in this area to help him learn to speak without hearing.”

Tim and Abby both nod, and Gibbs is the one who says, “If we do do this, when would you suggest?”

“The sooner he can hear, the sooner he starts to develop an idea of sounds and how they work. The American Academy of Pediatrics has cleared infants down to a year for the surgery, and most of the surgeons I know who do the surgery are willing to go anytime after six months. Assuming he’s generally healthy, and I’ll confab with his pediatrician on this before setting a time frame, I’d say between six and nine months is when I like to do this.”

“The articles say you don’t just pop them in and suddenly he hears,” Abby says.

“That’s true. We put them in, we give him time to heal up, and then we’ll turn them on. Because he’s so young, he won’t remember learning how to hear, but he won’t have immediate context for what’s happening. There’ll suddenly be this huge, new ton of stimulus. You’ve seen the videos of the babies who get the implant turned on and suddenly start to smile or laugh…” They all nod. “That’s true about half the time, the other half they cry because it’s scary to suddenly have all of this new stuff going on in their heads.”

“I was reading about people having to learn to hear and not doing well,” Tim says.

“Mostly older people. For you, sound has always been your primary form of communication. Sight came later. Reading came much later. Your name, the people around you, your ability to call someone to you has always been sound. But, if you’re a Deaf child or adult, that’s not how you learned to communicate. For us communication has always been a feeling. The vibration of voice, the stroke of touch, and then sight. So, there’s no automatic this sound equals this word. That is a learned skill.

“Mom and” he switches to signing, mom “aren’t connected in a deaf mind. It’d be like expecting someone to suddenly be fluent in French just because you dropped them in Paris. That’s one of the reasons why we like working with babies, they’ll learn sounds and words together. And maybe they won’t have the whole range of sounds, but they’ll at least have,” and this time he signs and speaks at the same time mom, “Mom, as one unit.”

“Except you’re not sure that Sean will ever be able, even with the implants, to put that together,” Gibbs says.

“That’s the worst case scenario. I’ve done this more than fifty times a year for the last five years, and as of this point I haven’t met anyone who didn’t have some level of improvement from the implants. I don’t expect Sean will be any different. What I don’t know is if you’ll think the level of improvement is worth the risk.”

“How much risk?” Tim asks, nervous.

“It’s a range. There’s a 100% certainty that he will be mad, sore, crabby, and unhappy with you for at least a few days after we do the surgery. His head will hurt, and he will feel upside down and sick from the anesthesia and pain meds. You and he will be in for days of what feels like the worst week of teething mixed with a tummy bug and an ear infection while he’s healing up. That’s certain. Less certain, he might end up with an infection. Most of the time, that infection would be redness, swelling, and more unhappy-baby-time as we give him antibiotics to kill that off. Very unlikely, that infection could spread into his skull or brain. Extremely unlikely, he could be allergic to anesthesia, and that would be bad. There is a lower than 1/100 of 1% chance that he might die.”

That gets a lot of quiet thought.

“Let me add this to put it into perspective. Giving birth to Sean was more dangerous, for you,” he looks at Abby, “and him, than this will be. I have pamphlets that spell everything out, that give you the risks, and my own statistics on my patients. You get to see my batting average, so to speak.

“Any more questions?”

They all look at each other.

“It’s silly, but… Are we talking one implant or two?” Abby asks. “Most of what we’ve read doesn’t actually say.”

“Because that’s a personal thing. You can do one. You can do two. We’re designed to hear on both sides, and two would give Sean the best shot of enjoying everything that goes with hearing. He’ll have a much easier time figuring out where sounds are coming from, and it’ll be much easier for him to focus in on one sound, say a voice, if he’s in a noisy location. But he doesn’t have to have two. Two means more surgery, it means longer healing up, more risk, so a lot of people go with one, because one provides at least some level of improvement.”

“Can we try hearing aids?” Tim asks. “All of the reading we did…”

“Said that’s step one. We can. If you like, I can get one of the nurses in here, and we can make a cast of his ear to get started on that. I’m not recommending it because I don’t think it will work, and it’s expensive. The surgery isn’t cheap, and I’m thinking you don’t want add more expense, possibly several thousand dollars, depending on your insurance, on a device that’s extremely unlikely to do anything for him.”

“What if it’s not expensive?” Gibbs asks. “Federal employees, they’ve got health insurance that covers everything.”

The Doc shrugs. “Sure. All you’re out then is time, so… Shall I call one of the nurses?”

“You said cast of his ear, singular.” Tim adds.

“There’s no point on doing it on the right side. With the hundred percent loss on that side, it doesn’t matter how loud we make things, he can’t get it. That gives you another potential option. Hearing aid on side A, implant on side B.”

“Assuming the hearing aid makes a difference,” Gibbs says.

“Assuming.”
They all glance around. “How long would it take to make a hearing aid?” Tim asks.

“A few weeks. We’d do the cast today, and then send it off, and then the hearing aid guys make one for him. Then we fit it for him, we program it, and we see if it helps.”

“Can we do the cast, go home, talk more, and then have you send it off after we’ve made a decision?” Abby asks.

“Sure, we can do that. We’ll do everything we can to work with you on this. There isn’t one ‘right’ answer. There are a lot of different options, and they all have different pros and cons.” He gently taps his hearing aid. “This is what works best for me. What works best for Sean will be as unique as he is. And, likely, it’ll change a few times over the course of his life. By the time he’s an adult, cochlear implants may be radically different, or completely surpassed by new technology.” Dr. Snyder stands up. “Any more questions?”

They all shake their heads.

“Okay. I’ll get Greta in here to do a cast, and then you’ll go home, talk with each other, read more, and then give me a call when you know what you want to do.”

Sean does not appear to enjoy having blue goo smooshed into his ear. If a three month old can be irked, he’s irked. But, he’s also not angry or scared. He isn’t crying, though his little blond eyebrows are knitted together, and he keeps trying to turn his head to see what’s going on.

It takes a few minutes for the goo to set up, and then the nurse gently removes it.

In her hand is a tiny blue cast of Sean’s ear. “The only question is, what do you want this to look like? Do you want it plain, skin color and clear tubing, or we can do it bright blue, or black with little pirates on them, or Captain America, or whatever you like?”

“Little skulls?” Abby asks.

She thinks about that. “Other than a little jolly roger, I’ve never seen a skull, but, I can check.”

Abby shakes her head. “Nah. Not now. Skin colored and clear is fine. He’ll grow out of them fast, right?”

“We have to resize them every three months for these little guys. Sometimes faster when they hit a quick growth spurt.”

On the car ride home there’s a sense of now what?

That pretty much wraps it up. It’s decision time.

Sean’s not going to get any less deaf while they dither about this, so…

“Hearing aid on the one side, see if it helps, and if it does go with that and the implant on the other?” Abby says tentatively.

“We could see if he’d schedule surgery for the right, and while we wait for that, test out the hearing aid, if it works, great, if it doesn’t, move to two implants,” Tim tries.

“If you do two implants, there’ll be no shot of ever getting his inner ear working on its own again,” Gibbs says, voicing the thought they’ve all had but didn’t want to focus too hard on. The implants destroy the cochlea nerve. Which means genetic therapies, trying to get the hair cells in Sean’s ear regrown, won’t work. At least, not given the current state of the technologies.

On his right ear, that doesn’t matter all that much. Between the bones and the sensorineural loss, even if they did manage to find a way to regrow the hair cells, he’d still be very deaf on that side. But on the other side, if those cells could be regrown, and those bones freed up, he might have something approaching normal ish, hearing on that side.

If the bones could be freed up enough to make a difference.

That’s a long time to be deaf on one side, especially if the hearing aid can’t get the world loud enough for him on that side.

“We should definitely test the hearing aid. He won’t do the surgery for at least three months, and we’re not paying for it out of pocket, so there’s no downside to it,” Tim says.

Abby nods along with that. They both glance back at Sean, who’s snoozing in his car seat.

Gibbs is sitting next to Sean, his big hand gently resting on Sean’s tummy. He smiles back at Tim and Abby. “Can’t wait to see you try to keep a hearing aid in an infant.”

Tim groans at that. Abby does, too. Neither of them are looking forward to trying to get a small, squirmy, very active person with no concept of ‘valuable,’ ‘expensive,’ ‘good for you,’ or ‘fragile’ to not destroy the all of the above tiny device they’re going to attempt to attach to him.

Abby looks back at Gibbs. “Other parents somehow manage to keep these things on their kids.”

Tim thinks as he pulls up to a stop light. “Maybe I’ll get the sewing machine out and make him some headbands. Make it so he can’t just whack it free when his little arms go flailing.”

Abby smiles at that, images of little headbands for Sean dancing in her mind. “When we get home, I’ll go looking for fabric.”

“Let’s make sure headbands won’t screw it up, first. He probably doesn’t want to spend all of his time listening to fabric rubbing against the microphone,” Gibbs adds.

That’s a good point.

They get home, and both Tim and Abby need to get back to work. Gibbs doesn’t, so he decides to stick around and play with the kiddos.

He and Kelly spend an hour building up block towers and knocking them down. According to Heather, Kelly’s got insane levels of focus for a toddler. Usually, if you can keep an under two-year-old on one thing for five minutes at a time, that’s impressive.

But Kelly, if it’s interesting to her, she can spend an hour or something.
And watching blocks fall down is interesting to Kelly. (She also loves watching flowing water. She can happily spend an hour sitting next to a fountain, watching it go.)

Talking is also interesting to Kelly. She’s not great at it. But she’s keeping a running commentary of mostly one word statements going about the falling blocks. “Fall! Down! BANG! Down!” And “Up Pop!” or “Stack” when she wants him to make the tower higher.

Not quite twenty-one months old. She doesn’t talk in sentences, but she absolutely knows a lot of words. She understands way more than she can say, (she signs more than she can say these days, too, but little baby ears hear and understand more than baby hands or lips can form) and she gets so frustrated when she wants or needs something and can’t explain it to the people around her.

If Gibbs had to guess, a good third of Kelly’s toddler tantrums have to do with her not being able to communicate something. The other two thirds come from getting her idea across (Resolved: I shall not get a bath) and her parents vetoing it.

He wonders though, as she’s sitting in his lap, how hard this would be if she couldn’t get everything people were trying to tell her…

Eh… Okay, not quite. Sean will grow up in a house that signs for him. He’ll get words the way Kelly does, just visually, but unlike Kelly, he won’t get them from anyone else.

Not that big of a deal right now. Probably 90% of the time Kelly’s with someone who’s part of the family or Heather. But she’s going to start pre-school soon. Come fall, she’ll start with the two-and-a-half-year-old class and have a few hours a day playing with other kids and adults and that’ll be really different for her.

He tries to imagine how different that will be for Sean. Even with all the interventions they’re talking about, he’ll basically be walking into a world of sounds, all of them muffled and indistinct. Yes, he’ll learn how to lip read, and put that with hopefully some sound…

But little kids like to run and play, and they don’t want to hold still so they can hold eye… eye to lip contact, while you talk to them. They like to look at the pictures of the book, while you read it to them, not look at you so they can hear the story. They don’t want to have to stop doing whatever it is they’re doing to focus on a conversation. They like to play while they talk. Kelly’s got no interest at all in stopping knocking the blocks down so she can sign her commentary on doing that. She doesn’t want to look away from the falling blocks so she can hear him talking back to her.

She wants to talk, and she wants to play, and she wants her Pop to keep talking to her, too while they do it.

And that’s the moment where being deaf goes from a vague concept to something concrete for Gibbs.

That even with the best they can do, this isn’t going to be a stubbed toe sort of thing. A lot of time and energy is going to have to be spent on making sure Sean can do the sorts of things other kids do.

Hopefully, the hearing aid will help. Hopefully, add that to an implant, and he’ll be able to hear a lot of what’s going on around him. Hopefully, it’ll be enough.

But Gibbs, who’s been a bit adrift lately, once again without a case or a cause, knows what he’s doing when he gets home. When he went undercover and learned how to sign and lip read, there were people there who specialized in helping deaf people live in a hearing world.

And right now, he wants to know everything about what they do.
Simple as a Seder

Most of the family had a fantasy of the perfect Christmas as a family all together at the house. And it’s not that Ziva didn’t have an ideal of that, too, but it wasn’t nearly as big of a deal for her as it was, for, say, Gibbs.

Which is not to say she doesn’t have a family holiday fantasy. She does. And it starts at sundown on Monday.

Passover.

That was the big family gathering they all got together for when she was a child. That’s where everyone caught up and sang and visited and celebrated. That was the night of wine and food and good feelings and togetherness.

And that’s what she wants for their first Passover in their new home.

------------------------

Step one on Fantasy Passover, is the same step one as any Passover. Clean.

Normally, cleaning wouldn’t be on the Sabbath, but she’s not sure how long it’ll take, and since they don’t live here fulltime, they’ve only got Saturday, Sunday, and a bit of Monday.

Fortunately, cleaning with nine adults is a fairly rapid endeavor. Yes, Breena’s not feeling up to much, so she’s bowing out on cleaning, but she, along with Mona, are keeping an eye on the kids as everyone else goes through their home with a fine tooth comb. Unfortunately, even going rapidly, it’s a big house.

And it doesn’t matter if you’ve got six people who can vacuum if there’s only one vacuum.

The same thing is true for window washing (only one squeegee), or dusting (only one dust mop).

Still, they’re powering through it, as rapidly as the tools they have will allow.

------------------------

Tim, as one of the two tallest members of the group, has half of the reaching overhead jobs. He and Tony are on making sure all of the ceiling fans have been dusted (top and bottom), the corners where the walls and ceilings meet have been swept, and the ceilings given a good going over with duster. Once that’s done, they’re supposed to be taking down all the curtains, and making sure they get a run through the washer and dryer, and then putting them back up.

High ceilings and lots of ceiling fans seems like a great idea when you’re planning out your house. They keep you cool, they cut down on the electric bill, especially in Jimmy and Breena’s room, they add to the soft, tropical feel.

They are, in pretty much every way, lovely.

Until you’re on ceiling fan five of seventeen and you feel like your arm, wrist, and ankle are about to fall off.
Tim gets off the stepladder, tossing his wet rag into the bucket, and gesturing to Tony, who’s got the dry rag, to head on up and dry off yet another fan.

“This isn’t kicking your butt, is it?”

Tony looks down from the fan to Tim with a huh? on his face.

Tim nods, and then grabs his phone. And then rolls his eyes. His early warning system is working just fine. Low pressure front, and a hell of a storm, are rolling in out of the northeast.

“What?” Tony asks.

“You know that Nor’easter that Penny and Ducky were talking about yesterday?”

“Yeah, they weren’t sure they were going to be able to make it down here. Thing veered east and ended up clobbering the Atlantic instead of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, and they made it down.”

Tim holds up his phone and shows Tony the latest weather map. The storm, in lovely shades of red and yellow, has turned west again, and is now heading right back to the Mid Atlantic.

“Again?” Tony looks fiercely annoyed. “When the hell is this winter going to end?”

Tim shakes his head. “Supposed to be snowing by tonight. Temperature’s dropping like a rock, and then raising all tomorrow. Freezing rain and sleet, wrapping up with rain and highs in the sixties by Monday.”

“Shit. Schmiel’s supposed to be landing in New York Sunday afternoon.”

“New York’s going to miss most of this. He should be fine there. Not sure if anything south of Philly and north of Raleigh will have functional airports.” Tim pockets the phone. “Time to change plans. Got to get the grocery run in today, and not tomorrow.”

“That’s if we’re even staying here…” Tony sounds a little nervous on that.

Tim nods along with that. He knows what Tony’s thinking, feeling. Because if Breena were weeks away from her due date, he’d be feeling the same thing. He also knows how much Ziva’s put into this, and since it’s not his wife or his kid, he’s not in hyper-protective pregnant daddy mode. “She’s not going to want to go home.”

“I know. She was less into making sure out wedding was perfect than this. This is… home and family and… and the childhood she lost and… Shit!” Tony’s got a ton of nervous Daddy-to-be vibes pouring off of him, along with a lot of this is the one thing his wife wants right now, more than anything. She’s invited everyone to this, has spent hours planning this out, getting the perfect Seder place settings, tricking out the menu, hand inscribing prayer books for everyone.

This matters in a way very little has for Ziva, in… not just years, for the whole time he’s known her.

And he knows that if he says, “Honey, I love you, but I want to go home and cancel this thing you’ve been working on for weeks and dreaming of for months, because I don’t want us more than an hour from a hospital,” his very pregnant ninja is going to explode in a hormonal frenzy.

And sure, Abby and Breena in a pregnant-hormone whirlwind is scary, but his Ninja is a trained killer, and even nine months pregnant she’s still got moves.
Tim can see what’s going through Tony’s mind. He does a little checking and then says to him. “Nearest hospital is eight miles from here. We’ve got Gibbs’ truck, and Gibbs who learned how to drive in the frozen winter wasteland of northwest PA, I can’t imagine it’d take more than an hour to get there.”

Tony gives him the look.

Tim lays a hand on his shoulder. “Yeah. I know. I’m going to get Gibbs and the girls and get groceries. You get to go face the dragon. Good luck.’’

Tony gives Tim a gentle shove. “You’re an asshole.”

Tim smiles. “I try. She’s not due for two weeks. Last checkup she was…”

“Negative two station, no dilation, he’s head down and in the right position, just not heading for the door, yet.”

“You’re in a house with two doctors, and a pregnant wife showing no signs of getting ready to give birth. It’s probably going to be fine.”

Tony sighs. “Famous last words.”

“Why are we getting rid of all of the bread?” Jimmy asks Ziva as he cleans out the pantry.

“It is the feast of the un-leaven bread, Jimmy. Everything that might have yeast in it has to go.”

Jimmy turns from the pantry to look at Ziva, who is currently scrubbing out the corners of the silverware drawer. “You realize literally everything in this house, including all of us, has at least some yeast on and in it. They’re floating around in the air.”

Ziva has a very determined look on her face. “That means you’re just going to have to do a better job of cleaning.”

Jimmy decides not to poke the porcupine. “Cleaning!” He grabs a perfectly good loaf of cinnamon raisin bread, (Molly’s favorite.) and tosses it into the trashcan.

Ziva sees him do it, and nods. Then she glares. Tim and Tony are heading into the kitchen, and there is no possible way they’re done cleaning all of the fans, yet.

Tony looks to Tim; Tim looks back, then he nods. “We’re going to have to change the schedule around.” Then he heads over to the computer on the table. (Tony’s.) Currently it’s playing music, keeping them all in a good place while they clean. He flicks the screen on, and gets the Weather Channel website up.

Ziva comes over and starts cursing quietly, in… probably Hebrew… under her breath.

“While you two talk it over and make a decision, I’m getting the grocery list, and we’re going to stock up. If we’re riding out the storm here, I want us to be well-provisioned.”

The conversation where they ‘make a decision’ is exactly as much fun as Tony thought it might be.
He’d rather pull several teeth out, without an anesthetic, than have this conversation.

On the upside, Ziva’s staying pretty cool.

On the downside, she’s cool because she’s decided he’s being an overprotective moron, and as long as she explains everything in small, easily digested words, she’ll win.

“Tony, we live in the city. Our hospital is ten miles from home. The one here is eight miles away, and not packed full of everyone who used to go to the hospitals in DC and Northern Virginia. You remember the room Tim and Abby were in for Sean? That closet they told us about, or the room they shared with that other couple? That was just an average day, not one where the hospital was packed with car accidents and all the other troubles that go with a bad storm. All of which are worse than they ever were in DC because they’re out of money for things like snowplows and have been for months.”

Tony sighs and grits his teeth. All of those are logical reasons to not bug out right this second. Out here, they don’t get a lot of snow clearing or road salting, but they at least get some. DC’s coffers went dry for that in February, and since then, if it’s not I-95, or one of the main routes through the city, it hasn’t gotten plowed or salted. The last two snow storms had involved him having to walk to work, because there just wasn’t any way for him to get his car, or a bus, or a train, or even the subway (why the freaking subway, which is under the damn ground, closed for snow, he’ll never know) moving through the snow.

So, she’s making relevant, logical arguments. At least, they’re good reasons for why home isn’t necessarily better than here. Tim’s house, which is four miles from a hospital, though…

What her argument is really doing is making Tony want to take her to the nearest hospital and just spend the storm there, hanging out, waiting.

To quote Han Solo, he’s got a bad feeling about this. The gut is not happy.

But, in that he is not the one currently in possession of the uterus, and, as she’s pointing out, she hasn’t had a contraction in days, and as of right now, there’s not a single flake of snow in the air, he supposes keeping on track for Passover-at-Home, isn’t a terrible idea.

But he does tell Tim to buy out the road salt. If they’ve got to stick her in the truck, and fucking walk in front of it scattering salt on the road to get her to the hospital in time, he’s doing it.

Lately, Tim and Gibbs have added a trip to their Saturday routine. They grab the oldest two girls, Gibbs’ truck, Mona, and the grocery list, and off they go to “The Museum of Food!” for “Adventures!”

This time, Jimmy, who doesn’t usually go along on this trip, is coming, too.

He’s got a list of things he and Ducky have put together.

They already have the most complete first aid kit anyone could want. But first aid and possibly deliver baby in a major snow storm are not precisely the same thing.

So, while Tim and Gibbs are making sure they’ve got lots of (non-yeast bearing) food, Jimmy’s heading to the local pharmacy and making sure they’ve got plenty of rubbing alcohol, lots of bleach, a pediatric bulb syringe for clearing airways, Novocain, Tylenol 3 (He can write a prescription for better pain killers than that. He can’t get the spinal epidural kit necessary to make sure he’s not dosing Dave with it, and honestly, unless he’s got to try a c-section to go with it, he wouldn’t want to attempt a spinal.) a stitch kit (He hopes they won’t have to try an episiotomy, but even if they don’t, some level of tearing is normal, so having something to fix the rips with is necessary.), extra gloves (Sure, he’s got a box of them in his car, and so does Tony, and Gibbs likely does, too, but he prefers the non-latex ones.) a small scale (It’d be nice to know how big Dave is if he decides now is the time to show up.) more diapers, more wipes, heavy duty pads, nursing pads, extra towels, sterile wipes, a Z-pack for Ziva (If they’re going to deliver a baby in a private house, even a very clean private house, he wants piles of antibiotics around for Ziva.), and three packs of pacifiers.

He’s got everything but the little head caps, and if they sold them here, he would have bought some.

The lady at the counter looks at that pile of stuff, and checks his medical ID to make sure he can legally purchase most of it, and then says, “So, what’s her due date?”

“Not for two weeks, but we’re further out from a hospital than we’d like to be. Better safe than sorry, right?”

The counter lady smiles. “Here’s hoping you don’t need any of this.”

“Yeah, thanks!” He swipes his credit card. “I can return everything but the antibiotics if we don’t need them, right?”

She laughs at that. “Yeah.”

By Saturday night, the house is sparkling.

Every speck of non-airborne yeast has been eliminated.

The silver Seder plate is gleaming.

Ziva Ima’s charoset recipe is in the fridge, coming together, flavors mingling for maximum sweetness. She’s got fresh horseradish waiting to be grated for the maror. All the food prep work that needs to be done is done.

And Ziva’s bouncing around, feeling great. She hasn’t felt this energetic in weeks, and she actually feels like she can breathe again. Little boy must have shifted some because he’s not kicking her in both lungs today.

And seeing her perky and moving and googling napkin fold designs for the meal, Tony is relaxing some. The fact that they have personally salted not just the driveway, but about two miles of road toward the hospital is helping him relax.

The fact that the storm hasn’t hit yet is doing a whole lot more.

According to the weather map it was supposed to be here two hours ago, but they’ve eaten dinner and are in the post-meal, post-babies down, quiet part of the night, and the weather is still playing nice.

And then it isn’t.

Literally every hair on his body leapt up when the wind started to howl. It wasn’t a gradual thing.
There wasn’t a few soft moans of wind, followed by a few louder breaths, and then full on screaming. Nope. Total silence, everything is fine, and then BAM! screaming wind.

He jerks away from the sofa (they’re lying around the family room, talking, and enjoying each other) and rushes to the sliding glass door.

“FUCK!” Less than a heartbeat later, Tim, Jimmy, and Gibbs are next to him, and none of them have said it out loud, but he can feel them agreeing with him.

Tony’s heard of the concept of whiteout snow. He’s always thought it was an exaggeration. Something people say to make a bad storm sound worse. But this is whiteout. They have a porchlight. It’s on. He knows this because a few minutes ago he could see the grill and outdoor kitchen. Which is located about fifteen feet from the door he’s standing in front of.

And now it’s gone. There’s just a wall of whirling white. He figures the porch light is giving him, maybe, four feet of visibility.

A minute after that the thunder hits. “Thunder snow?” Tony asks, looking at swirling nothing.

And then Ziva says, “Uh!” It’s an almost pained sound, mostly surprised. He whirls around, about to shit his pants, and sees she’s grinning.

“Be calm, Tony. I am fine. Baby here is not moving.” She pats her tummy, and Dave makes her a liar, at least on the literal level, when he kicks back. On the larger one, well, Tony’s not seeing any fluids leaking out of his wife, so she’s probably right about him not heading out. “We are home, and safe, and the storm cannot touch us here. Who wants hot chocolate?”

Not all that much later that night, Ziva and Tony are tucked into bed. Their room is on the second floor, and they have, intentionally, a lot of windows. In the daytime, the light in their room is lovely, and at night, when it’s not storming, they have a great view of the forest and sky.

Ziva cuddles in close to Tony, feeling him settling down for the night.

She listens to the storm rage, and yes, Monday, or whenever they get thawed out, there’ll be branches to clean up, but anything that could have toppled over and hit the house was cleared out long before they moved in.

“It is funny. On Monday, we celebrate people huddling in their homes, not daring to set foot outside because a different sort of storm raged. They stayed close with their families, feasted, and prepared for a journey. Outside lay death and sorrow, but inside, everyone was safe and warm.” She lifts the hand he has resting on her belly to his lips. “The storm will pass over us. God’s given us that promise. And the journey that comes after… It’s a new life, Tony.”

That’s both more metaphysical, and trusting, than Tony wants to be right now. He also doesn’t want to argue. He kisses the back of her neck. “Goodnight.”

“Goodnight.”

Sunday starts well. Babies get up early. Baby parents get up and deal with them. The rest of the crew sleeps in.

At least, that’s usually how Sunday starts. Ziva wakes up early.

Nothing new on that. Between having a hard time staying asleep for any real length of time because she’s insanely pregnant, and five AM being her usual wake up time, Ziva’s not normally known for hanging in bed too long.

Granted, for the last few months, she wakes up early, groans, eyelids feeling like they just want to droop back down, staggers off to relieve her currently thimble sized bladder, and stumbles back to bed to try and get comfortable again (a long, drawn out processing involving four pillows and a lot of scooting around, which invariable wakes Tony, who does not, usually, have a five AM wake-up time) before she’s able to drop back into an hour or two of sleep.

Today, when her eyes go springing open along with her bladder sending urgent, “Overflow Imminent!” alarms her way, she’s not feeling sleepy.

She’s fairly alert and maybe not rested, but… There’s a feeling of urgency, (beyond her bladder) a need to get things done!

She gets the most immediate thing done, and before flushing sees… Ugh… Both Breena and their Lamaze teacher had mentioned it was pretty ugly, and it is. It looks kind of like a small, mucousy, bloody, jelly fish… sitting in the bowl.

She pats Dave. “Good to know you are on your way, but not today.”

Part of having babies, there’s a plug of thick mucus that keeps the cervix shut tight, barring bacteria and all other manner of nasties from entering. And before baby comes out, it’s got to get out of the way. But usually, it gets out of the way in the week before baby’s en route.

So, yes, things are moving, but not fast. She continues to stroke her little boy. “Tuesday morning. Any time after Tuesday morning would be really good.”

Dave gives a wriggle and a kick. She’s thinking he’s agreeing, or maybe he’s just noticed someone’s talking to him. Either way, it’s in an awfully good mood that Ziva tosses on her robe, and heads downstairs to the McPalmer wing, where she’s sure someone will be up.

There are several McPalmers up and about. Jimmy had Sean last night, so he’s hugging the bed getting some extra zzzs. Breena is still feeling like death warmed over, so she is also hugging the bed.

So she finds, in the glassed off observation room, Tim, Abby, and three little girls. (Sean’s still in one of his sleep cycles.)

Tim’s applying Cheerios to bowls, and dousing them with milk and sliced bananas. Abby’s got a flashlight, and is shining it through the window into the storm outside. The wind has died down, at least, even Ziva’s ‘horse-like’ hearing can’t make it out, but the flakes they can see swirling through the beam of light are going awfully fast…

And awfully straight down.

Abby sees Ziva in the reflection in the glass. “It’s about half snow and half freezing rain.”
“Wonderful,” Ziva says dryly, taking one of the bananas. Keeping her potassium levels up is especially important these days. “The windows don’t look too frozen over.”

Tim nods at that, and then adds the caution to her statement. “Our windows, which are attached to our nice, warm house aren’t. When the girls are done, I’ll head out and see if we can get the truck doors open.”

“I do not think we’ll be making any emergency runs to the hospital today.”

Tim nods. “Excellent. You want to guess what your husband will do to me, and the rest of us, if you spring a leak and there isn’t a truck ready to get you to said hospital?”

Ziva chuckles at that. “By all means. Scrape away.”

Abby gives Tim a bit of side-eye though. “Carefully scrape away. None of us want you to get out there on that skating rink and take a tumble.”

“Tony practically had us put an inch of salt on the front walk and the driveway. On the basis of just traction alone, I should be fine.”

“Uh huh.”

Tim sighs. “I will be careful.”

She nods. “Thank you.”

Seven AM, babies are fed, Tim’s out attempting to chisel open Gibbs’ truck, and Ziva needs to be doing something.

The problem is, there is only so much you can do thirty-five hours before the big event. All the food that needs to be prepped is prepped. If she seasons, chops up, or begins cooking anything else now, it won’t be its best come Seder time.

She wants to go out and help Tim with the truck. That way she could burn off some of this need to do something, but both Tim and Abby explained to her in no uncertain terms that neither of them wanted to see what Tony would do to them if they let his extremely pregnant wife out in an ice storm to go and do hard, physical work requiring good balance. Which, due to the twenty or so pounds of small person and small person support equipment strapped to her belly, and her softer more, flexible joints, Ziva no longer has. (Okay, yes, she has good balance, but she used to have phenomenal balance, and now she’s just at about normal person in good shape balance.)

And they really didn’t want to know what would happen when Tony got tired of beating on them, and then handed them over to Gibbs. Because they both know that if she goes out there to chip his truck out of the ice, both of them will tag team the punishment, letting up only when they get so tired they can’t swat an idiot any longer.

Or, as Abby put it, “Do either of us look like we want permanent brain damage from the amount of head slapping we’ll get if we let you out there?”

And Tim followed up with, “Tony’ll smack my brains out through my nose, and Gibbs’ll stomp them when they land. Go, rest. I’ve got this.”
But Ziva does not want to rest.

So, instead of resting, she is folding napkins. Because table-setting origami is supposed to be A: calming, and B: will not result in any head slapping.

However, it isn’t calming, not really. It’s just barely taking the edge off of the desire to do something.

Tim comes back in a bit before eight. He’s cold and smells like the storm, icy, snowy mush on his hat and jacket.

“How bad is it?” Ziva asks.

He rolls his eyes and shakes his head as he hangs up his winter gear. “Snow’s up to my calves, and there’s an inch of sleet under it, and a half inch of ice on top. The driveway and walk are in better shape because of the salt, but there’s at least four inches of frozen crap on it.”

That gives Ziva a mission. She knows the guys, and definitely Abbi, and likely Abby, are going to be shoveling out when they start getting up. (And judging by the sounds of showers going and people moving around, is starting soon.) And shoveling out is hard work. Which means it’s time to get cooking for breakfast. She might not be able to do the hard work, but she can keep the people doing the hard work well-fed.

Though they did clean out all the bread and yeast, technically, it’s not Passover until tomorrow, so off Ziva goes in search of the flour. After all, there’s nothing about having to clear all the baking soda out of the house. And right now, she’s thinking this crew needs muffins. Lots of muffins. Muffins with blueberries and orange zest and cinnamon-sugary crumbles on top.

Oh, yeah! Lots of them. And turkey sausage. And eggs, lots of eggs, got to have a good solid base of protein for hard work. Probably need some oatmeal, too. Coffee, need to get that going, can’t have breakfast here without coffee…

Yes, Ziva’s got a plan. Tim crashes at the dining room table, and a minute later, arms and legs tired from de-icing Gibbs’ truck, he very gratefully accepts a large cup of hot coffee, rich with milk and cream.

After breakfast, after the first and second round of driveway clearing Ziva runs out of steam.

She suddenly feels like someone pulled the plug. All of that lovely energy that had been keeping her going got up and went. Fast.

She’s still feeling the need to be doing, something, anything, but her body is sending her very clear messages that the thing she needs to be doing right now, is getting a nap.

Good nap. Easy nap. She didn’t have to spend six hours tossing around trying to get the pillows in exactly the right spot. She just waddled up to bed, got herself into it, made sure Dave was on the tummy pillow, and the knee pillow was between her legs, and she was out.

She wakes up to dull, stiff ache in her belly. And sighs. Nothing new there. She hasn’t had one in a few days, but this is normal. Like the Lamaze teacher, and Breena, and Abby have all mentioned, for weeks, sometimes months before little guy is ready to go, there are these little, annoying, warming up contractions. And, like the last six hundred warming up contractions, it goes wandering off less than a minute later.

She pulls herself up, feeling a bit better for the nap, and again heads down to see what’s going on.

The storm is still storming, though right now it’s completely switched over to freezing rain.

Ziva rarely feels like she’s made a bad decision. Which is not to say that she always makes good ones, but the decisions she makes don’t often have a long period of time between make decision, and suffer the consequences thereof.

Normally the one is hard on the heels of the other, and space to ponder the idea of Did I make a bad decision? is limited to a matter of minutes if not seconds.

That’s not true right now, though, as Abbi, Jimmy, and Gibbs get back in from what is their second swing at driveway clearing and truck de-icing. And as Ziva heads into hour two of fairly steady contractions.

“Fourteen inches and still pouring down?” Tim’s asking as he’s handing around hot drinks, and even better, towels fresh out of the dryer, all toasty warm, to wrap around cold, wet bodies.

“How can we possibly be getting this kind of weather in April?” Jimmy responds with.

It’s gotten dark again, so the members of the house inside can’t tell, without help, what’s going on out there.

“What’s falling down, now?” Ducky asks.

Gibbs shakes his head. “Supposed to be rain by now, but it’s snow and sleet again. By the time we got to the far end of the driveway, the top had half an inch of sleet on it.”

“And it doesn’t matter much if we keep killing ourselves on the driveway, not until the snowplow comes through again. I’m not sure that’ll matter then, either.” Jimmy says, “Whatever mix of crud is on the road, it’s ice slippery, and hard and deep enough I can stand on it without sinking into it.”

Ziva hears that and closes her eyes, licking her lips. Abby glances to Breena, who also caught that, and the two of them look at Ziva who looks back, a slight edge of panic in her eyes.

Breena gets up, “Come on Ziva, let’s see what we’ve got for making dinner,” pulling her, and Abby, into the kitchen. Penny sees that and hustles in, too.

The guys are looking at each other, all feeling that tinge of ‘something’s up’ and the mixture of excited dread because they’re all fairly sure what’s up. After all, the absolutely last place Breena wants to be right now is in the kitchen making food.

But in the kitchen for a minute of girls’ only conversation…

“How far apart are they?” Breena asks.
“On and off since I woke up. That’s only two hours, but they’ve never been this regular.”

“How regular is regular?” Penny asks.

“Twelve minutes.”

Breena waves that off. “Even if this is the start of labor, you’ve got plenty of time. Twelve minutes apart I was still two days out with Molly.”

Ziva looks to Penny. “I don’t remember twelve minutes apart. I remember thirty hours in the hospital, stuck on a bed, not able to move or eat really until the contractions got right on top of each other, and then they gave me a boat load of drugs, and about a week later I woke up and had a baby boy.”

Ziva looks to Abby, who shrugs. “Never got that far. Four in an hour and off to the Doc’s I went.”

Penny’s checking her phone, seeing what Google thinks the ETA from their home to the hospital is. “Google’s thinking it’ll take twelve hours to get to the hospital, but Gibbs driving, so… ten?”

“I do not want to have my son in a truck!” Yes, she knows that Gibbs has delivered a baby in car, after all, she was there, and having Ducky and/or Jimmy around means lots of medical attention, but Gibbs’ truck is the absolute last place she wants to have her baby.

“Don’t blame you on that.” Penny says. “Jimmy or Ducky’ll go, too, so you’d have a doctor with you, and a full tank of gas… Gibbs’ll get you there sooner or later, just…”

“Just the longer we stay here, the more time everything has to melt, and the more likely we are to get to the other side of the storm,” Abby says, checking Weather.com. “According to this we’ve got another hour of snow/sleet, then rain, then clear and rising temperatures all night. If you can make it to noon tomorrow, we should have almost clear roads.”

“Tony will worry.”

They all feel him hovering a second before: “That ship sailed a long time ago. Were you planning on letting me into the decision making confab?” he says, voice dry, leaning against the doorway to the kitchen.

The other ladies, and the rest of the family, all decide that right now is an excellent time to get out of earshot of the kitchen.

Once the rest of the family has melted away, Ziva says, “I’m sorry.”

An apology that open, honest, and fast takes Tony’s breath away. Yes, after more than a year of marriage counseling they’ve gotten a lot better at having ‘functional’ arguments, as opposed to angry, hurt-each-other arguments, but Ziva apologizing, unprompted, is hen’s teeth rare.

“For which part?”

“Right now, for not taking the idea that David might come this weekend seriously.”

“But not for shutting me out?”

She shrugs. “Neither of us likes to worry the other one until we have all the facts.”
She’s right about that. That’s how they play this game. They don’t tell the other one something that might be upsetting until they know what they’re dealing with. “And the girls had facts that I didn’t?”

“That was the idea. More importantly, they had facts I didn’t. We’re still two Lamaze classes away from the end, and… They have done this, and I have not.”

Tony’s not sure if he should be comforted by this, or not. “And what wisdom are they offering?”

“That this is nothing to get worried about. Not yet. You remember the first day of classes, unless your water breaks, do not go to the hospital until contractions are four minutes apart and you’re having a hard time talking through them. And even then, you might be there for more than a day? Water is still inside me, and contractions are twelve minutes apart.” She winces slightly, and checks the clock. “Fourteen. It has only been two hours, and it is probably nothing. But… I am starting to feel your nervousness now.”

Tony closes his eyes. The only thing he can do right now is make this worse. If he panics, she’ll pick up on it, and they’ll feed each other’s fear. He inhales and releases a slow, easy breath. “So, we wait and see.”

“Unless you want to get into the truck and start the trek to the hospital.”

The idea that she’d meet him on that really hits him with the idea that she might be starting to get spooked.

He checks the weather again. They’re promising two more hours of storm, and then clearing skies and rising temps. Every hour after the storm stops makes the run to the hospital shorter. What’s a ten hour drive now may be an hour drive ten hour from now. Which is great, assuming all systems aren’t go ten hours from now.

But there’s no way to know that.

Which means, the two of them have the one option neither of them is good at, wait and see.

It’s a long night. And not just in the sense of how fast are contractions coming (Correct answer, about ten times an hour, ish, by midnight, though from ten to eleven featured no contractions at all.) but also in the sense that with the storm in place it got dark much sooner than normal, so it feels like they’re in hour six hundred of the longest night ever.

On the upside, the storm has stopped storming. Nothing’s doing now. They can hear dripping from the eaves as the snow and ice on the house melts.

And, at last check (ten PM) Gibbs’ truck was ready to go. It didn’t need any more de-icing because all ice was gone.

So, things could be a lot worse. They’ve got a way to get where they need to go, though the path between here and there is long and covered in frozen crap.

And that’s keeping Tony on edge, and the world moving very, very slowly.

By midnight, Ziva’s walked all over the house, she’s floated around in their tub quite a bit, and she’s tired and crabby. Just enough in the way of contractions to keep her from resting, not enough to get the kid moving.
Which is great for not trying to go for a drive on the ice, but not so hot for keeping the Ninja in a good mood.

She’s on the bed, trying to snooze, every time she’s almost, just, barely asleep her belly stiffens and she jerks back awake.

Tony’s behind her, hand on her back, gently rubbing his thumbs into her sacrum, trying to keep her more comfortable.

Then they hear it, the slow grinding thrum of the snowplow. They can’t see the road from their window, but Tony hops out of bed and leaps to the window anyway. Nope, he can’t see the road, but he can see the flashing yellow lights through the trees.

A wide happy smile spreads across his face as he starts to pull on his clothing. “I’m grabbing Tim and Jimmy, and we’re going to dig through whatever the snowplow just tossed up onto the driveway, and then your water can break at any time because we’ve got a car and a road and a hospital ready to GO!”

Ziva sighs, also feeling a lot better. Her hand strokes over Dave. “Give them a few more hours, okay?”

Dave kicks her, and then her belly stiffens again.

At any other time, both Tim and Jimmy would resent the hell out of being dragged out of a very nice warm bed, currently filled with sleeping women. They are both extremely fond of being located in said nice, warm bed, especially since they’d both been in a rather splendid post-orgasmic snooze.

However, there are things which they will get out of bed with a minimum of grumbling for, and digging out the mound of frozen crud at the end of the driveway, so that Ziva can get to the hospital with a minimum of trouble should she need to, is on the list.

“Contractions still going strong?” Jimmy asks as he flings a mound of frozen slush.

“Stopped for an hour, and then started up again an hour before I got you two up.”

Tim and Jimmy nod at that. Tim holds up crossed fingers. “Hoping I’m not jinxing it, but, sounds like Dave’s en route.”

Tony grins at them as they dig out the slush in the dark.

When Tony gets back in, Ziva’s either very, very still, or asleep. A moment later, he hears the buzz saw snore of his astonishingly un-stealthy sleeping companion, and decides she’s asleep. He grabs a pillow and blanket and heads for the AV room.

Yes, it’d be nice to snuggle up, but it’d also be nice to get some sleep between now and whatever tomorrow’s going to bring.
After the longest night ever, the longest morning ever begins.

Because today was going to be their big Passover celebration, most of the family has today off. Abbi’s remoting into work on her computer, and Tim is doing the same. If a murder gets called in, Jimmy’s up, but for the time being, he’s off for the day. It’s Monday, and that’s a big day for a funeral home, so Breena’s off for her usual morning at Slater and Palmer’s. But the rest of them are supposed to be helping to get the party ready.

If there’s going to be a party.

Breakfast time on Monday, contractions are getting stronger, a lot stronger, but not much faster. Still at ten or so times an hour, though she’s hit the point where she doesn’t want to talk or move too much through them.

So, as the family munches on leftover muffins, they watch Ziva pace the downstairs, and deal with a question:

“What are we still having everyone over?” Abby’s the one who asks it, but everyone else is thinking it.

Ziva whips toward them. “Yes! We didn’t do all this for nothing!” Then she stops walking, closes her eyes and grabs tight on the back of the sofa as another contraction hits.

“That’s five minutes,” Jimmy says, voice bright. When Ziva stops wincing, she glares at him. “Just trying to be helpful. They’re speeding up.”

Abby flashes him a quick headshake, and he shuts up.

“We can still do the party, but… If you aren’t here?” Penny says.

“Celebrate it for me. For David.”

“We can do that.”

“Schmiel!” Ziva says with a huge smile three hours later.

“My Ziva, look at you!” He hugs her close and then pulls back to marvel at her very pregnant form. “Oh…” He grins.

“We’ve been waiting for you.”

“Well, I am here.”

“Good,” Tony says, “Don’t take your coat off. Gibbs?”

Gibbs nods, grabbing his keys.

Tony gives Schmiel a quick hug, too. “Come on, we’re off to the hospital. Contractions are at four minutes apart.”

Schmiel lights up even further. “He is coming! Perfect timing.”
“Dad…”

Anthony D. DiNozzo Sr. is doing his best to be the pregnant daddy in the waiting room cliché. Pop a cigarette between his lips, and he’d be right out of a 1950’s comedy.

“You’re gonna wear a path in the linoleum,” Tony says as he finds his father and Delphine in the waiting area.

“News?” Senior demands.

“We’re all settled in. She’s six centimeters dilated. They’re thinking maybe tonight it’ll be pushing time. Not more than two visitors in there at a time, so when Gibbs and Schmiel head out, you can go in.”

Senior holds up his hands. “I don’t… Once he’s out.”

Delphine shakes her head and smiles. “He’s afraid of compromising Ziva’s modesty.”

“You remember Bob’s story about when his daughter was in labor, the nurse just came in and all of a sudden--”

Tony cuts that story short. There’s nothing at the end of the sentence he wants to hear. “Right now, she’s in a t-shirt and sweat pants, Dad. I don’t think Gibbs or Schmiel are planning on sticking around when we get to the gown and body parts flashing around part.”

“Oh. In that case, sure. We’ll go say hello.” Senior grins, looking forward to seeing his daughter-in-law before the adventure begins in earnest.

Gibbs didn’t get to do this with Sean and Kelly. He’s not sure there was time for this with either of them. But, since they’re just waiting around for Ziva’s body to kick it into overdrive, there’s time.

And this, right here, with Ziva, while Schmiel goes off to find her ice chips, able to quietly sit with her, and hold her hand when the contractions get bad, rub her back a bit and hopefully help, is pretty sweet.

Her fingers unclench from his, and she flashes him a bit of a smile as the latest one eases off.

She breathes deep and steady, and rests her forehead on his shoulder. He wraps an arm around her and kisses the top of her head.

A second later she jerks away from him, and they both notice the rush of fluid that means she and Dave have hit the point of no return. Once her water breaks, there’s no going back.

She gets up slowly and begins to waddle toward the washroom. Gibbs calls out, “I’ll get a nurse.”
Senior hears that just as Tony’s opening the door to the room. “Nurse?”

“Her water just broke.”

Senior hugs Tony close for a second, and then pushes him into the room. “And it’s time for us to get out of here.”

Gibbs pats the back of his head, and also gives him a hug. “Less than a minute away if you need anything.”

Tony nods. He thinks they’ll be fine. And then he steps in to help his wife get ready to bring their baby into the world.

Pushing hard, going with the contractions, easing David into the world wasn’t how Ziva intended to spend dinnertime on April 10th, 2017.

Right now, she should be at the house, with the entire extended family (most of whom are having a Sederless Seder in her and David’s honor), drinking the cups of wine, telling the stories to the girls, passing around food and tales of a culture that predates her by four thousand years, and will, with any luck bind her children and grandchildren to a shared history with her.

But right now, as the Doctor is saying, “You’re doing fine. Push slow and steady, there you go…” Ziva’s focused, intensely, on the here and now, and the bizarre sensation of a child easing his way into the world, and the feel of that child’s father helping to keep her up and steady.

It doesn’t hurt. Not now. It hurt a few minutes back, but supposedly once the baby gets far enough down, his body blocks some of the nerve paths or something like that. She’s past what the Lamaze teacher referred to as the ring of fire.

“Oh… I see hair! Lots and lots of black hair. Little person’s gonna have your curls!” The pediatric nurse says.

The contraction passes, and Ziva slumps into Tony. He’s petting her hair and face, murmuring about how well she’s doing and how strong she is, how much he loves her and their little boy.

The next one comes, and she starts to tense again, working on easing David into the world.

“Perfect, Ziva. The difficult part is almost over. Just a little more. And we’ve got ears. If you reach down you can feel his head.” Their doctor tells them.

Ziva does, feeling wet, sticky, somewhat goopy hair. She starts to giggle at that, and refocuses, pushing harder. “Can’t wait to see you, baby.”

“One, maybe two more pushes, Ziva. Almost there.”

“You’ve got this, baby, you’ve got it,” Tony’s whispering to her, lips a hair from her ear, arms strong on her shoulders, keeping her in the right position.

Once again the contraction eases off, and Ziva gets a moment to catch her breath before the next one starts. The next one is hard. She couldn’t talk through it if her life depended on it.

All of her world’s narrowed down to a sensation, the tight, vice clench of her body squeezing a little body out.

“Keep going, nice and steady. And… almost…”

They hear a tiny little cry. Ziva’s world opens back up again at that cry. The tiny, first-breath wail of her son cutting through all the sounds of their delivery room.

“Nurse…”

“You maneuver him, I’ll catch.”

Ziva feels the contraction, feels her body tense, pushing, then a tugging sensation, she hears the nurse say, “He’s beautiful.” Followed by Doctor saying, “Hello, baby.” There’s a moment of fussing from Dave, followed by, “He’s a boy!”

And then her son is in her arms.

And, for all of her Passover wishes and dreams, she is utterly certain, that this, right here, right now, with her son, still wet and goopy, in her arms, with her husband leaning over her, his tears dripping onto her shoulder, as he pets the child they made together, that this is the perfect Passover.

The doctors give them a good twenty minutes to just cuddle Dave. To look at him and pet him and all the rest of it, before gently peeling him away from Ziva to get him cleaned up, weighed, swaddled and the rest of it.

Tony hovers near the entire time they’re doing that.

And when they’re done one of the nurses holds Dave, in his insanely tiny, little bundle of blankets, out to Tony and for the first time ever, Tony gets to hold his son, on his own.

He stares down at this little boy, with the big, murky blue eyes, staring up at him, marvels at a person he can hold in his two hands, and grins at him.

The nurse gently lays a hand on Tony’s shoulder. “We’ve got a few more minutes of getting Ziva stitched up and back to the room, do you want to take David out to meet anyone?”

For a second, all Tony wants to do is stand there and gaze at his boy, and then he remembers that there are people here who want to meet this child.

Gibbs allows Senior first snuggles with David DiNozzo, who has his mother’s curly black-brown hair, and his father’s eyes.

That curly black brown hair is tucked under a little blue cap, and Senior’s hands are shaking as he beams at his grandson, saying, “I’m your Poppa. I held your Daddy just like this almost exactly forty-nine years ago, and you look so much like him.”

Gibbs eyes Dave, and mentally shakes his head. Those are Tony’s eyes, but Ziva’s round face, and lips. Senior looks up to Tony’s who’s radiating tired elation. “Does he have a middle name?”

Tony smiles. “Yeah. Jethro. He’s got a perfect Hebrew-Italian name.” Tony rolls over the dual pronunciation, the Hebrew David and Yethro, followed by the New York Italian DiNozzo.

That makes both Gibbs and Senior smile, and a minute later, Senior hands David over. “Hello.” Gibbs says to him, cuddling him close on his shoulder. “Your Mama wants you to call me Saba, and your cousins call me Pop or Uncle Jethro, and it doesn’t matter which one you like, I’ll always come when you call.”

David’s swaddled up nice and snug, but his eyes are open, and he’s staring up at Gibbs as he says that. And if a newborn can have a look that indicates, Okay, sounds good to me Dave does. Or maybe Gibbs is just reading that into it. Either way, it doesn’t matter, another nurse returns and says, “We’ve got Ziva all stitched up and moved back to your room. How about you take little boy in, because I bet he wants to nurse.”

Tony takes his baby, his little boy, his… right now… everything from the father who shaped him and the father who made him, and heads back to his wife, and, in a room with no doctors and no nurses, the first moment of the three of them, alone, as a family.

About twenty minutes later, there’s a shout of celebration loud enough to wake the babies at the Gibbs Clan house, as everyone gets the David Jethro DiNozzo, 8lbs 6oz, everyone is fine! text from Gibbs.
With the arrival of Dave DiNozzo, Gibbs has been splitting his time between helping out and being an active hands-on Saba, and getting his ducks into a row to do the same for Sean.

For Dave, Saba duty is pretty light. Messy. Clean spit up off the one end, clean poop off the other, and make sure his parents get all the sleep they can during the day. Because at dinner time he goes home, and then they're on, on their own, all night.

He and Dave are getting a good bit of ‘bonding’ time during the quiet hours between feeds.

“You get called back in on a case?” Abbi asks when she finds Gibbs in the attic going through his collection of notebooks.

For Sean, he’s on research mode.

A good cop keeps his notes, pretty much, forever. Gibbs doesn’t get rid of notes until everyone involved in the case is dead. Which means he’s been able, over twenty-six years, to get rid of about six cases.

But like with the way he talks, he wasn’t a voluminous note taker, either.

Details, impressions, facts, and contact information, that’s most of what he jotted down.

He’s also very organized. He’s got his notebooks by year, and month, and wrote the names of the victims on the cover of the notebook. It doesn’t take him too long to find what he’s looking for. He holds the notebook up to her. “Case is done, has been for a long time. Just hoping to find a lead on how to help Sean.”

“You deaf Marine case.”

He nods, opening the notebook. It wasn’t a terribly difficult case. “Pretty straightforward once we got into it. Just took a while to get into it.”

Abbi shoots his an explain more look.

“Had to learn how to read fingers the same way I read voices. That took a while. Had to learn to watch faces while watching fingers, that also took a while. But,” he shrugs a little, “I got it down.”

“You hoping to dig up old contacts?”

“That’s the idea. The man...” He flips through his notes. “Jim Nelson, he ran the program. He’d probably know what direction to point me in.”

Abbi smiles at that, glad to see him with something to do. (Without a case he’s been... intensively wedding planning, and... If there’s anything scarier than a Bridezilla, it’s a Marine on a mission, even if that mission is: Plan a Wedding. On the upside, he’s got the caterer beaten into submission, and instead of the wine list most people go for, they’re having a coffee and scotch bar.)

“What do you hope to do with this?” Abbi asks, pulling him up from the floor in front of the boxes he keeps his notebooks in.
“I don’t know. Find the right direction.”

“A start.”

“Yeah.”

“How do you feel about starting on dinner?”

“That sounds like a very good idea.” He tucks the notebook into his back pocket, and down to the kitchen they head.

It does take him a while to do anything useful with that notebook. The program, which worked with deaf veterans, got folded into a larger program out of Walter Reed back in the early 2000s, and then vanished into a morass of VA red tape. Jim Nelson is dead now. His second in command retired five years ago and the latest address for him burned down in the fall.

Gibbs is pacing around Tony and Ziva’s apartment, Dave on his shoulder, patting gently, while he googles people, looking for someone in that notebook he can talk to.

It takes him a few hours to find a live person who’s willing to talk to him.

Deidre McClausky still teaches sign language and lip reading to deaf vets and their families. And she’s got some free time, in the morning, though, he gets the sense she’s not thrilled to see him from her email saying that yes, he could come.

Gibbs doesn’t care much about that. She’s a link to whatever comes next, and that feels good. Yes, she works with adults, but with any luck, she’ll know where to point him so he can learn more about how to be Deaf.

He kisses the top of Dave’s head. “Got a lead, little boy.”

Dave chirps at him, and that chirp rapidly turns into the it’s naptime, get me to my crib cry.

“Oh look, it’s Gunnery Sargent Jason Anderson, 1996’s star pupil. If it’s possible to sign sarcastically, Deidre McClausky is signing sarcastically.

She’s older. Obviously. He is too. But the twenty years between twenty-three and forty-three are quite a bit easier on the face and body than the twenty years between thirty-eight and fifty-eight. She still has brown hair and most of the same figure she had in ’96. Jason Anderson had brown hair back then, too. (The one and only time he ever attempted to dye the gray.) And compared to this time two years ago, Gibbs is closer to Jason’s physique, but he can’t pass for an active duty Marine any longer.
Gibbs expects the sarcasm. After all, he was investigating her, as well as everyone else at the place, and… well… if you can hear the conversation it’s a hell of a lot easier to “lip read,” so he was a tad better at it than the other people in the class, and he may have… not exactly gently… suggested that Deidre knew more than she was letting on (she did, but not about the case) and he didn’t exactly endear himself to her when it became clear that he wasn’t actually deaf.

He has the grace to offer her a rather sheepish look about his deception though. I did finish the program. He signs back.

She nods curtly, gesturing for him to follow her into her office. Once she’s got him seated, she signs, So, what, case go hot again. You here to pick my brains?

Yes, but not about that. My three-month-old grandson is deaf, and I want to be able to do… everything… anything… I can to make this easier for him.

That gets a bit of a smile out of Deidre.

How deaf? Deidre has no hearing at all. And seeing how she doesn’t have hearing aids, or implants, Gibbs guesses it’s because they wouldn’t help. Though he supposes it’s possible she may have chosen to not take any interventions.

Complete loss in his right ear, 95% loss in the left.

Hearing aids? Implants?

We’re waiting for the aid for the one side, see if it helps. Implant on the other. He hopes that won’t piss her off, and it doesn’t.

Sounds like you’re on the right track. What do you want to know about? You want to learn how to be a speech therapist?

Gibbs thinks about that. He supposes he could. Though he can’t imagine the way the family would react to him saying he was learning to be a speech therapist. Tony’d wet his pants he’d laugh so hard at that idea. I want to know what can be done, and then find something that I’m good at.

One of the things Gibbs found most interesting about being undercover in a program for the Deaf is that people who have never heard, or at least not well, don’t have the same communication style as people who do hear. If he had thought about it before he got there, he would have known that would have to be true, but he didn’t, so it took him by surprise to see that all of those little sounds and verbal placeholders that tell hearing/speaking people what’s going on between the words aren’t part of non-verbal communications.

For example, given what Gibbs has asked for, a hearing person might make some sort of small noise to indicate, I’m thinking, give me a minute. Deidre twiddles her fingers and looks away from him. Same basic idea, but different ways of getting it across.

A minute later she signs Long list. Besides pretending to be someone you aren’t, what are you good at?

I really was a wounded Gunnery Sergeant invalided out of the service.

Her look makes it clear that’s not good enough.

I’m good with my hand. Not just like this. I can build pretty much anything you can think of. I can pick up things from books fairly easily. Good with animals and kids.
He sees the interest light in her eyes when he says animals.

What?

Dogs?

I like dogs. Have one at home.

She smiles at that. Do you know what Dogs for Deaf is?

No, but I can guess from the name. Hearing ear dogs?

Yes. After this autumn, the closest branch is in OH. They want to expand, get a branch back down here. If you’re really good with animals…

I get on great with dogs.

You would.

Alas, lack of voice means that Gibbs isn’t sure if that’s a backhanded compliment or not. And Deirdre’s poker face is good enough, he can’t tell just by looking.

This wouldn’t just be something you do for your grandson. This is the kind of thing you’d do to help a lot of people.

I’m a retired cop. I’m itching for something to help a lot of people.

Well, this could be it. The first level is puppy socialization. Puppies come to live with you, and it’s your job to make sure they get to experience a lot. Kids, other dogs, all sorts of places, lots of adults. You make sure they’re comfortable pretty much everywhere, and have laidback personalities.

I’ve got a house full of kids and adults.

Can’t just be your family. They need to be able to handle anything.

Gibbs can do that. He spent years training people to handle anything that could get thrown at him, puppies can’t be that different, and unlike certain Marines and Very Special Agents, he’d get a puppy when it’s tiny, no bad habits to break. He’s starting to get an image of him, Mona, and… hearing ear dog, that’s probably like a seeing eye dog, so he’s imagining the two of them with a German Shepard going everywhere. Next level?

Training them to be hearing ear dogs. That’s way more involved, and takes a while to learn, but… I don’t see why you couldn’t do it. Not like you’re in a mad rush.

Little guy’s too little to know what a dog is, other than the big black thing that licks him occasionally. Kids have to be at least a few years old before a hearing ear dog would come in handy… right?

At least old enough to be wandering around without a parent hovering over them. However old that is in your family.

Oldest one of the kids is a bit over three, and she’s usually got a grown-up in eye sight, definitely in earshot. So, what exactly does a hearing ear dog, do?

Listen.

Gibbs rolls his eyes. I got that. The dog can’t talk though. And it doesn’t sign, so…
Fire alarm goes off; the dog makes sure you get out. Someone rings your doorbell; dog grabs you. Someone calls your name, I’d imagine that comes in handy for little guys, the dog lets you know. He’s keeping ears on what’s around you, and gets your attention if something important is going on around you.

Like your pre-school teacher just said ‘Pack up the blocks?’

Maybe. That’d depend on how smart the dog is. But… what’s your grandson’s name?

Sean.

But, ‘Sean, pack up the blocks’ is something they train the dogs for.

Gibbs leaves that meeting with a spring in his step, a promise that Deidre will send off letters to two of the breeders in the area that work with Dogs for the Deaf, and the names of two people who he’s very eager to get to know better.

“Good meeting?” Ziva asks an hour later, as she gets Dave settled for his second breakfast of the day.

“It was.” Gibbs is in her kitchen making her what Abby and Breena call nursing fuel. It’s mostly milk and vanilla ice cream (fat, sugar, calcium), but it’s also got cocoa powder (iron, antioxidants), spinach (more iron and calcium, the cocoa is in there to kill the taste), a prenatal vitamin, and the chocolate protein powder Dragana says is the best of the bunch. (Gibbs has been unwilling to taste it to see what that means.)

The ladies like it. None of the kiddos have rebelled against it, so, he’s making it. A moment of the blender on high, and then he’s got the smoothie, and heading to sit next to Ziva on the sofa.

“How are you doing?”

Like he needs to ask. She’s got dark circles under her eyes and is sitting on a donut shaped pillow.

She says it anyway, “Tired and sore.” And she takes a long sip of the smoothie, sighing a bit at the infusion of calories. “Little man here decided last night was a perfect time to party.”

Gibbs smiles at Dave, who’s looking awfully content and snoozy right now, as he’s cuddled up to a breast and gently slurping away. “Taking after Daddy?”

Gibbs laughs. “He’s got good taste.”

Ziva looks appalled for a second, and then shakes her head. “I’m going to pretend you didn’t say that.”

“By all means, you want anything else?”

“More water?”

Gibbs goes to get that.

“So…” she says as he hands over the water.
“She still doesn’t love me, but she did give me the name of two people who breed hearing ear dogs. Apparently, the people around here who used to socialize and train the puppies are in West Virginia now. I got a note back as I was driving here saying that one of the breeders has a puppy she was hoping would be in the program. That’d be step one, socialize. Step two, learn how to teach them to be hearing ear dogs.”

Ziva grins at the idea of a collection of little puppies following Gibbs around as he whips out his Probie Training techniques on them. “Excellent. Are we going to find a collection of puppies at your house?”

“Maybe not a collection.” Gibbs tries to imagine one puppy, which… okay, for the greater good, sure. But three or four of the little things all romping around and peeing on his furniture. “Er…”

“Second thoughts?”

“I don’t know. It feels right. Mona’ll help get any little guys we have trained up.” He looks at Dave, who eats every three hours, and thinks that, if he remembers right, puppies are very similar to babies, requiring a ton of work. And while he’s happy to help out with baby work, during the day, he likes to go home at the end of that day to a house that’s blessedly free of puppies, or babies, and get some time in a quiet, comfortable, adult-oriented space.

“Any idea what sort of dogs?”

Gibbs shrugs. The one who wrote him back didn’t say. “They’d have to be smart, easy to train, laid back, social critters, so… Retrievers? Shepards? Something like that, right?”

Ziva shrugs, too. “I’d assume, but…”

“I know. Eight.”

“Yes.”

“I’ll make sure to find out what they are first. Dogs are dogs though. We get on.”

Tony stumbles through the living room at that point, looking three quarters asleep. They hear the fridge door open, the sound of something being banged around in the kitchen, the coffeemaker hissing, and then more banging around, followed by Tony staggering, clutching his coffee like a lifeline, back into the living room, and then flopping onto one of the chairs with his eyes glued shut.

“I take it you were walking Dave around while he was in his party mood?” Gibbs says.

Tony’s too tired to even nod. His eyebrow twitches a bit. He’s also dressed for work. Haphazardly. His shirt is buttoned wrong, with the holes and buttons not lined up properly, and he’s got unmatched shoes.

“Tony, you don’t have to work today,” Ziva says.

He groans with pleasure at that.

“Go back to sleep,” Gibbs adds. “I’ve got ‘em. You’re on after dinner, remember.”

He groans and staggers back to bed.

“Dave wakes up, he cries, Tony gets him, gets him cleaned up, and gives him to me. He crashes. I feed Dave, get him cleaned up again, walk him around, and get him put back down. Last night, we’d do that, he’d sleep for half an hour, and then wake up again, wanting… To eat, maybe. Tony gets up again, cleans him up again, gets him ready for me, again, and then I do my part, again… all night long.”

Gibbs winces. Then he gently bops Dave on the back of his head. Just tapping his finger against the back of Dave’s skull. “None of that. Ima and Daddy need their sleep. You wake up, you get cleaned up, you eat, and then you sleep, for two hours. You hear that, little man!”

Ziva’s staring at Gibbs. Dave, who can’t focus that far away, is staring in Gibbs’ general direction.

Gibbs shrugs again. “His daddy does well with direct orders.”

Ziva shakes her head, laughing.

Forty minutes later, when Ziva’s done nursing, Gibbs says, “Give him here. You go get some more sleep, too.”

Ziva cracks a wide yawn and nods, slowly, as she drags herself off the sofa and heads back to bed, too.

Gibbs cradles Dave in his hands, and holds him up for a bit of face to face time. “All right. We’ve got a routine here. She feeds you. You eat. Then burp time. Diaper time. Cuddle and song time, and then back to the crib you go. Where you will sleep. Got it?”

He’s fairly certain that a newborn cannot, in fact, provide someone with a snarky look as a response, but if that isn’t Tony’s smartass look coming back at him he doesn’t know what else it could be.

Gibbs shoots him the same look he’d have given Tony fifteen years ago. David is supremely unconcerned by said look.

Gibbs drapes the spit up rag over his shoulder, and then drapes Dave over the rag, and gets to patting and strolling around. “It’s a good thing you’re awfully cute.”

Dave may be a newborn, but, like his older cousins, he is in full possession of his own will, voice, and set of needs.

So, while: “Resolved, Saba is putting me to bed.” may be Jethro’s plan, it is not Dave’s plan.

Gibbs has successfully gotten the burps out of Dave, he’s got him in a clean diaper and onesie, he’s swaddled him snugly, he’s walked him around and sung to him until his little eyes started to droop. He, very gently lowered Dave into the crib, and as soon as Dave’s back hit the mattress his eyes went shooting open, and he began to wail.

Gibbs looks down at the little guy, who is expressing with loud vigor, in a way that puts him in mind of both of his parents when they’re in a bad mood, that he is NOT liking this development. AT ALL.

Gibbs stares down at him, and lays a hand on his tummy. “This is what your Aunt Breena does when you little guys want to stay up forever.”

Dave is unmollified by the parenting excellence that is Breena on getting babies to sleep. He continues to wail.

“Yeah. I hear it. You’re sleeping in there. I made that crib for you, and you are going to use it.”
More wailing.

“Give it up. I’ve had full grown men beg me for things, and I’ve had them demand them with a gun at my head. You aren’t gonna win this pissing contest. You’re gonna get sleeping in this crib, and your parents are going to get to sleep, and everyone will be happier in the long run.”

“AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA!”

“Uh huh. Sleepy time, Dave. Sleepy time.” Gibbs hums along, fairly certain Dave can’t hear him over the crying.

He can feel the eyes on the back of his head. “He’s okay Tony, we’re just having a little conversation about where little guy’s sleeping. Grab some earplugs and go back to sleep.”

Gibbs can feel the indecision behind him. Tony’s boy is crying. The man he trusts beyond all others says it’s for a good cause.

Tony steps close. “Tough love at four days old?”

“You want another night like last night?”

“Nope.”

“Ziva and I made sure he’s got everything he could possibly need. He’s not hungry, wet, uncomfortable, or anything like that. He’s just missing a human mattress. Earplugs, turn the water on in the bathroom, and go back to sleep. He’s four days old, he won’t fuss too long.”

“What if I don’t want him missing a human mattress?” Tony’s watching Dave yell his little head off, as Gibbs gently pats his tummy.

“You want him sleeping with you until he’s eight?”

“Not really…”

Gibbs looks up from Dave to Tony. “He’s not going anywhere, Tony. You’ve got tons of snuggle time coming up. He doesn’t need to sleep on you, too, unless you want to set a pattern that’ll be harder to break every day you keep it up.”

“I… No. Earplugs.”

Gibbs nods.

Seven minutes. The longest damn seven minutes in the history of seven minutes. Tony’s been in armed standoffs that went faster than listening to Dave wail for seven minutes.

But, eventually, the crying slows down, and gets quieter, and Tony risks popping out one of the earplugs… nothing.

Just quiet.

He’s not sure how to feel about that. If he were less tired, he might ponder this, but as it is, his body’s screaming for sleep, and nothing needs his attention right now, so…
Sleeping time.

Gibbs stands next to Dave for a long period after he gets him down. He’s hand rests on Dave’s tummy, rising and falling with each breath.

Gibbs has often wonder what Tony was like before his mother died, what Ziva was like before Tali was murdered.

He gazes down at the sleeping infant with Tony’s eyes and Ziva’s hair, and wonders if he’ll get to see a version of both of them, and, though those tragedies built some amazing adults, he hopes this child will be able to skate through an easy life of average hurts and scrapes.

After a few more minutes, when it’s clear that Dave’s really out, Gibbs heads off to the living room. He takes a quick listen at Tony and Ziva’s room, but he’s hearing concert snoring, so it sounds like everyone who should be sleeping is.

Which means he’s got some time to get into his ‘assumption.’

For example, when he got the card that said, “Patty’s Papillions” he assumed that the lady in question was a fan of butterflies. Why she’d name a kennel after them, he’s got no clue, but… People are weird.

A few minute of googling informs him that Papillion is a breed of dog. They’re some sort of spaniel. Little things with big perky ears. Kind of look like butterfly wings if you’re very poetic and have never seen a butterfly.

More googling says they’re very smart, easy to train, tend to like people, and high energy.

Gibbs smirks. If that didn’t describe Tony when he first met him…

He doesn’t want to talk on the phone. Too many people are sleeping, so he replies to Patty’s email asking if he can meet with her about maybe socializing a puppy for hearing ear work.

He gets an email back an hour later, saying that sure, she’d be happy to meet him about it.

A bit after that, he’s got a date to talk to a lady about a butterfly, and a crabby little boy who wants first lunch, now!
When he’s not fussing, Dave DiNozzo is a treat. Between him being a tad bigger than normal for a newborn, and Sean having shown up three months earlier at a tad small for a newborn, thus resulting in both of them being almost the same size, he seems like a huge baby boy.

He’ll just melt into hugs. Pick him up, drape him on your chest or shoulder, and he just conforms into a soft, warm weight that likes to coo contentedly as you pat his back.

He’s also a bit drooly as he does that, but that’s normal for a little guy.

Ziva’s on day five of nursing all of the feeds, and while Gibbs would never, ever suggest that Abby or Breena should give up their system for maximizing everyone’s sleep, he can also say that a baby fed nothing but breast milk smells like… heaven. (Okay, a clean baby fed nothing but breastmilk… Dave can get a bit whiffy when he’s in need of a cleanup.) He likes to stand there, holding Dave, face against the top of his head, just smelling him.

(Which is not to say the Sean doesn’t smell good when he’s all tidy, too, but… He doesn’t have the magic, cuddle-me, milk-fed baby scent. On the other hand, his mama looks significantly less like a sleep-deprived Zombie, even though both of the little guys are on the eat every three-ish hours routine. There are tradeoffs in life.)

Gibbs has a good afternoon with Dave, and with Ziva, while she’s feeding him. She’s pretty much doing everything she can to be sleeping as much as possible when Dave isn’t eating. That makes plenty of sense. She’s still healing up, she’s making all of his food, and for all of the ‘newborns sleep twenty hours a day’ bit, none of the ones Gibbs has ever seen have done that.

Dave probably sleeps about eighteen hours a day. Maybe. But he does it in hour and a half (ish) stretches. Which isn’t really enough time for an adult to lay down, get to sleep, sleep, and then wake up and feel like a human again. Yes, Ziva’s well-trained to drop off to sleep fast, and sleep deep, but her body still thinks it’s supposed to get several ninety minute sleep cycles, in a row, each night.

And that’s not happening.

When Dave’s in the last of his afternoon sleepy periods, Gibbs makes dinner for the grownups and just before putting it on the table, he pokes Tony awake.

Tony’s been sleeping most of the day, and is looking significantly more alert than he was the last time Gibbs saw him.

“Better?” Gibbs asks.

Tony rubs his eyes. “Yeah.” He sniffs the air. “Mmm… Smells good.”

“Thanks.” It’s just baked chicken, potatoes, and veg, but it’s got a lot of garlic and oregano, so the house does smell awfully good. “It’s in the oven, on warm. Not sure if you want to wait for her, or eat in shifts.”

Tony stretches, and then gets up, quietly leading Gibbs out of his room. “Not sure, either.” His stomach rumbles. “I’m eating now. We’ll work the rules out later.” Tony blinks at the clock. “5:30. About time for you to get home to your own place if you want to feed your own lady, right?”
“She’ll forgive me if I’m late.”

“Got a good reason for staying out?”

“Exactly.” Gibbs grabs his jacket, and both of them hear the first chirp of Dave waking up.

“And there’s my call,” Tony says. Gibbs nods. “Tomorrow morning?”

“Probably lunchtime.”

Tony shoots him a curious look as he heads towards Dave’s room.

“I’ll tell you about it tomorrow.”

He’s telling Abbi about it later that night when she says, “Jethro, have you ever seen a Papillion?”

“I googled them. They’re fluffy little things with big ears.”

She nods, that’s right. “All right. You think Mona can look at one and not decide it’s lunch?”

Mona looks up from her spot in front of the fireplace when she hears her name, and flashes Abbi a I would never incorrectly assign a prey designation.

Abbi looks back at her. “Yeah, wait until you see one of those things.” Then she looks back to Jethro. “So, you’re saying we’re getting another dog?”

“Maybe. I need to learn more about it, but… would it bug you?”

She laughs. “The idea of you and Mona training a Papillion makes me,” she’s got a huge grin on her face as she’s saying this, “smile so hard, there’s no possible way I could say no to that. You really googled them?”

“Yes. Okay, yeah, their cute and small, but…”

Abbi holds up her hands. “If you know what you’re getting into, I can’t wait to see this.”

When Gibbs read that Papillions were part of the ‘toy’ dog class, he didn’t understand exactly how tiny that was.

It took a few minutes to sink in as he got to Patty’s, because he thought the little things frisking around him were the puppies. They’re active, lively, friendly, and tiny little things. He figures if one of them really jumped it could maybe hit his knee. He’s picked one of them up, and… she weighs less than Dave, she’s also not as long as he is.

But, she’s friendly, and appears to appreciate his laid back say hello to the pooches technique. She doesn’t bark a whole lot, though Patty says that’s part of the training. If they aren’t properly trained they tend to be yappy little things.

That was the first clue that perhaps the tiny, little ball of fluff and ears in his hand, his one hand, might not have been a puppy.
The second clue followed hard on the first clue’s heels.

The even tinier little furballs come skittering in, and Gibbs realizes that the three overgrown guinea pigs frisking about at his feet are the adults and these tiny things that actually are smaller than guinea pigs are the puppies.

He’s staring at them, and “I’ve got softballs bigger than these things,” comes out of his mouth.

Patty, who’s been vastly amused at this whole exchange begins to laugh. “How did you get here again?”

“I…” Gibbs mouth is open as he watches Patty scoop up a puppy who just fits into the palm of her hand, and gives him to Gibbs. Gibbs shuts his mouth and looks at the little guy. He’s tiny, mostly white, with brown and black splotches on his ears and back. He’s soft, with silky hair, and, Gibbs looks at the ears more carefully, and gently lifts one up, it flops back down. “His ears are wrong, aren’t they?”

“Not for a Phalene, but for a Papillon, yes. They’re supposed to be up, and his are floppy. They make great pets. They’re still very smart, and easy to train, and because they’re little guys, they live a good long time for a dog, but, when people buy from me they want Papillons, butterflies, not Phalenes, moths.”

“So, the Phalenes become service dogs?”

She nods. “That’s the idea.” She carefully watches Jethro with…

“What’s his name?”

“Jackson.”

Gibbs looks up from the dog on his palm to the woman in front of him. “You’re kidding me, right?”

“Nope.” She points to the puppy in his hand. “Jackson,” then to the ones on the floor, “Lee, Sherman, Grant, and Sheridan. When I’m not delivering puppies, I’m a civil war historian. Why?”

He shakes his head again, looking into the blue-eyed Phalene in front of him. “That was my dad’s name.”

“Might be destiny.”
Jackson yips at him. And then pees on his hand. And Gibbs remembers why he said something along the lines of, “I’m too old for a puppy,” when he got Mona.

“Let me get you a towel.”

“I take it they’re still being paper trained?” Gibbs says as he wipes off his hand, and then goes to wash them off.

“Yeah. They don’t normally get to leave the mudroom.”

“How old are they?”

“Six weeks. At eight weeks, Jackson would normally go off to learn how to play with other dogs and kids and everything. For pets, we keep them with us until they’re twelve weeks, but that’s because we want them to see home as pack number one, and then the new family as pack number two. With service dogs, they’ve got to be comfortable all over the place with a lot of different experiences, and a lot of different people, so they leave a bit earlier.”

“Except the person who used to do that for you is now…”

“In Atlanta. They moved all of the surviving IRS people down there.”

Gibbs winces at that, and Patty nods.

“Deidre said that socializing them isn’t exactly like training a pet.”

“It’s not. You don’t want a service dog to be territorial. You want him to be protective of his master, but not so protective that he causes trouble. You need him to be able to go anywhere and handle anything. Most of the people we place these dogs with are children, six to eight years old. We like them old enough to know the dog is a dog, and not a toy, but because they’re so small, agile, and smart, little guys like these do well in schools. If you get a Phalene as a service dog in first grade, he’ll get you through high school, and likely a bit of college.”

“How long does socialization training last?”

“I like to see ten months or so. Get them to a year old, and then they move onto service dog training.” She watches Gibbs eyeing Jackson, who’s playing with his brothers and sisters. “Which gets us to the hardest part of this. You don’t get to keep him. Ten months from now, you give him to a trainer. If you become the trainer, you’ll give him up when he’s two. When he’s about twenty months, you’ll find a new owner for him, and you, and the child, and the puppy will work together, and then you’ll say goodbye. I’ve lost more socializers on that last part than anything that happens on the rest of it.

“These are great companion animals. They’re lovely little balls of wicked smart fluff. They’re high energy. And they’re fun to be around. And you’ve got to shape this dog into something anyone would love to have for the rest of its life, including you, and then give him away.

“That’s the kicker, can you do that?”

Gibbs watches the puppies frisking around, on the other side of a baby gate, and nods. “Yeah. Rule eleven.”

“Rule eleven?”

“When the case is done, let it go. I was a cop for a long time. At the end of the day, you’ve got to let them go, or they’ll eat you.”

“Might not be exactly the same sort of thing, but, yes, something like that. You mentioned you’ve got another dog?”

Gibbs nods.

“What is she?”

He looks away from the puppies to Patty. “Big. The rescue said she was a Labrador-Doberman mix, but one of my kids thinks she’s a Rottweiler.”

“Rotties, Dobies, and Pitbulls have a hard time getting adopted. That wouldn’t be the first time a shelter fudged a dog’s background to get her a home.”

“Well, I didn’t care much one way or the other about that. She’s good with kids, protective of my house, and like you said, razor smart. One intro, and she knows who’s allowed in the house and who isn’t.”

“Good. Still, first few days, don’t leave a big dog alone with one of these little guys. They tend to look at them and think, lunch. And even if your personal dog would never do that, they also tend to look at them and think, toy, and it’s way too easy for a big dog to kill one of these little guys just playing with them. How big is…”

“Mona. Eighty-five pounds.”

“If she sits on a Phalene puppy, that’s the end of the puppy. You can’t accidentally step on him, either. They’re generally pretty good at getting out of the way, but you’ve got to be careful about that. You can’t let little kids play with them unsupervised, either. We don’t let children under five have one of our dogs, because they just don’t get that they aren’t toys. And unlike a Golden Retriever or something that sized a little kid can really hurt one of our dogs.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. “Got a lot of little kids at our place. Five grandchildren and one on the way. But one of us always has eyes on them.”

“Good.” She nods to the other side of the baby gate, into the mud room. “You want get in there and spend some time with Jackson, see if you two hit it off?”

“Yeah.”

When he was a kid, Jethro had had a pet guinea pig. Picking Jackson up, he’s surprised at how easily he can remember playing with Wayne. (He thinks he named him after John Wayne, but he was young enough it also could have been a Batman reference.)

Jackson has the same sort of soft weight, and fills out his palm the same sort of way.

He’s a lot more expressive than Wayne was. And way more energetic. He’ll run up to Gibbs, scamper into his lap, leap up on him, trying to lick his face (not gonna happen unless Gibbs lays on the floor or Jackson grows wings), then he chews on Gibbs’ fingers some, and runs back off to wrestle with his brothers.
When Mona wants to frisk, she likes to go for a jog/walk with them, or she’ll run around the backyard fetching tennis balls. Gibbs imagines tossing his tennis ball. For Mona, it’s dart off, grab it in her mouth, and bring it back. Jackson is two tennis balls high. Gibbs is fairly certain that if he tossed a tennis ball, Jackson would go tearing off after it, but what the hell he might do with it if he caught it, Gibbs has no idea.

Jackson comes bounding back to him, scuffling up into his lap, trying to climb up his tummy. Gibbs picks him up, letting him get to the face licking he wants to do.

After a few enthusiastic licks, Jackson settles back on his hind paws on Gibbs’ palm, and puts one of his front paws on Gibbs’ nose, looking at him, (from very close up) in the eye.

Gibbs can’t see that close up, even with his glasses on. He pulls his hand further away, so he can focus on Jackson. Little blue eyes are staring at him. A tiny furry head with floppy little ears is tilted to the side. If a puppy can appraise someone, Jackson is doing it.

“We gonna make some kid’s life easier?”

Jackson barks at him.

Gibbs gently pets the top of his head with his forefinger. He nods. “Good probie.”

Jackson looks confused.

“Right now, you’re a probationary hearing ear dog. A probie. We’ve got about fifty rules, and it’s my job to teach ‘em to you. You learn my rules, and you get to stop being a probie, and become a full-fledge hearing ear dog. Sound good?”

Jackson barks again.

“We’re going to meet a lot of people. We’re going to go a lot of places. You’re going to have to be okay with that.”

Jackson tilts his head again. He’s looking behind Gibbs.

“Probationary hearing ear dog?” Patty asks.

“Works with baby cops. Might work with baby dogs.”

She laughs. “Sounds like you’re in.”

“I’m in, assuming little guy is.”

Jackson barks again.

Half an hour later, in the midst of an eye-bleedingly boring meeting, Abbi gets a text. It’s a picture of Gibbs with Jackson. His name is Jackson.

She’s laughing as she looks at it. He’s a gerbil!

He’s a little bigger than that.

You’ve got to bring him home!
In two weeks, when he’s old enough, he’s coming home.

She sends him back a grinning emoji.
Getting ready to attend a Bris feels really bizarre to Tim.

It’s pretty much the same thing as the christening parties they’ve had for his kids and Jimmy’s. He gets that. But…

But a bit of water on the forehead is not the same thing as having your foreskin snipped off. Especially with an audience.

He knows, intellectually, that this is not a big deal. His own foreskin didn’t make the return trip from the hospital with him after his birth, nor did Jimmy’s, or Tony’s, or Gibbs’ or… actually… okay… Ducky wasn’t born in the US, which means he likely still does have a foreskin, which is something Tim’s thinking he doesn’t need to contemplate in too great of detail.

The point being, most of the men he knows have had this bit of surgery, and gone on to have fulfilling lives, great sex, father children, blah, blah, blah.

But, given the option for Sean, they decided to follow the sage advice of, ‘If it ain’t broke, don’t snip it off.’

Still, even though he’s personally gone through it, though he obviously doesn’t remember it, he’s not sure he can watch a Bris without wanting to curl in on himself and whimper.

Likewise, Jimmy’s not exactly a looking forward to watching this, either. As of this point in time, the plan is that all of Donny’s bits will remain attached to him, too, upon his arrival in the outside world.

And, Tony, whose conversion involved a few drops of blood from his penis, isn’t looking like he’s really enthusiastic about it, either. The three of them are helping to get Tony and Ziva’s apartment ready for the party. And though they’re “putting the snack trays together” what they’re actually doing is commiserating in the kitchen.

“It’d be one thing if I didn’t have to watch it, you know?” Tony says.

And they do. “I had to do two in medical school.” Jimmy winces a bit. “And compared to say, working with a baby who’s screaming from a perforated eardrum, a little guy who’s fairly chill until you give him the Novocain, and then he fusses for a bit, until he zons out, isn’t that bad, but… You’re standing there pretty much thinking, ‘God, sorry, little guy,’ feeling like the world’s biggest pervert because you’re holding this strange baby’s dick between your thumb and finger, while whichever Pede is in charge of teaching that unit hovers over your shoulder and talks you through it.”

“Whoa, they let med students do that?” Tony looks horrified.

“How do you think we become doctors? Gotta learn somehow, and that learning involves real people. On the upside, there’s no shot you’ve got the Mohel-in-training, right?”

“NO! He’s like sixty-years-old and has been doing it forever.”

“Good. You know how they give you those malpractice numbers…” Tony nods. “I’m not saying the older guys don’t screw up, but especially on ‘routine minor surgery,’ if you’re looking at a catastrophic screw up, you’re likely looking at a med student.”
“You didn’t…” Tony says.

Jimmy shakes his head. “NO! Both of them turned out just fine. I was so nervous I almost cut myself on the first one, but once I got over it, I did a tidy job. Still, I don’t think it’s an accident that most of the people who do them are women.”

“Wow, all of the food is still sitting in the fridge. You guys are setting some serious records for efficiency here, aren’t you?” Abbi says as she heads in to get ingredients for punch making.

Chastised, they get back to actually doing some work.

And, if the idea of watching this is bizarre, the idea that it’s a party strikes Tim as even odder. Okay, yes, he’s aware of the fact that inviting everyone you know to watch someone dribble water on your baby is in no way sane. It’s a tribal ritual designed to provide some sort of ceremony to show you’ve got a new tribe member, Tim gets that.

But, water, minor surgery…

It feels weird.

But the Rabbi is happy. The Mohel is happy. Schmiel, who’s been staying at their house, and pretty much won’t put Dave down now that he’s here, is about to burst with joy at seeing his favorite girl’s little boy and welcoming him into the fold.

So, it’s a party.

Where the people who see this as a rite of passage are having a blast.

And like with a christening, it starts with about half an hour of socializing, of showing off Dave, and letting everyone congratulate Tony and Ziva and pet the new baby.

That part feels familiar. And then it’s not familiar.

Tim and Jimmy have been picked to be kvatters, messengers. Once the Rabbi lets them know it’s ceremony time, it’s their job to hunt down the special ceremonial pillow (Jimmy), take Dave from Ziva (Tim), and then carry Dave, on the pillow, to Elijah’s chair.

Schmiel told them that Elijah, in spirit, attends all B’rit Milahs and Seders. So, Tony’s special comfy lounge chair, the only one in the house big enough that Dave’s parents aren’t nervous about Dave possibly toppling off of it, has been roped into hosting the Prophet.

As Tim and Jimmy take Dave to the chair, the entire group, says, in varying levels of approaching correct pronunciation, “Baruch haba!”

Senior, Dave’s only blood grandparent, then picks Dave up, and settles himself, with Dave, into the chair.

Senior’s looking… nervous about this. The Mohel recites his prayer of blessing for Dave, and then, with Dave being held in Senior’s lap, gets to it.

Senior looks away.

Most of the people who didn’t grow up with this, especially the people of a male variety, who greatly outnumber the people who did grow up with this, are doing their best not to cringe. (Even though a select group of said male people (Tony, Jimmy) know that Jimmy did not return the Novocain he got for Ziva, and has made sure that Dave is not going to feel this.)

Tim is mildly amused that Fornell, who has been in live fire fights, who has been in shootouts, who saved the damn day in a freaking tank less than a year ago, goes gray and almost passes out. His daughter also finds that vastly amusing, too.

Tim supposes, given his own, somewhat less impressive, but not miniscule history of daring-do, the fact that he’s watching Fornell rather than what’s going on with the Mohel, could also be seen as amusing.

And then, after a moment or two, it’s done.

Dave’s crying, but he was crying before it started, and he’s likely to be crying for a while after. And Jimmy’s right, that’s definitely a pissed off baby cry, but compared to Kelly with a double ear infection, fever, and first teeth starting to cut through, it’s not that pissed off.

And being immediately handed back to Ima, and a moment later, getting a breast in his mouth, seems to be mollifying Dave to some degree.

From there, there’s another prayer, and Tony’s Hebrew has gone from passable to good over the years, and he gets through the traditional father’s blessing with not just ease, but grace, and though almost everyone in the group knows this child’s name, it is a naming ceremony, so Dave’s name, and the meaning behind it, is announced to the group.

---

Once the deal is done, so to say, it’s basically a christening party. The whole family is here, including the collected Slaters. There are lots of blue and silver decorations. The food is good. And everyone wants to see, pet, hold, and love on Dave.

Though, everyone, is having an awfully hard time prying him out of his Papa’s hands.

DiNozzo Senior is over the moon. He is firmly convinced that the baby in his hands is the finest thing in the history of things and the sun rises just to light up the little person he’s holding.

He took his jacket off shortly after getting in, draped the spit up cloth over his shoulder, and has been providing Dave with a soft, comfy chest and shoulder to lounge on every minute Dave hasn’t been in the hands of the Mohel or Ziva.

He’s patting his boy gently, bopping up and down a bit as he walks the house, showing him off to everyone, and just glowing with him.

He’s not even talking all that much, something of a first for Senior. As often as he can, he’ll sneak off with Dave, find a quiet spot, sit down, and just hold him, gazing at him, gently stroking his ear or cheek, feeling his little fingers clenched around one of his big ones.

He is, as Ducky put it, with a huge smile on his face, “besotted with love.”

Tony watches it, wonders if that’s what Senior was like when he was a baby, and decides it doesn’t matter.

His son deserves adoring grandparents.
Senior notices Tony hovering, watching him, as he sits on Tony’s bed, with Dave on his knees, and waves his son over.

“He’s so beautiful, Junior.”

Tony smiles. “I know, Dad.”

Senior pries one of his fingers out of Dave’s grasp and wraps his arm around Tony. He bends down a bit to rub Dave’s nose with his own, and then straightens back up. He swallows before he says, “Your mother’s been gone for so long… I don’t think about her much, or miss her often, but… I wish she could have seen him. She always loved babies. She barely ever put you down.” He smiles softly at that. “I used to have pictures of her and you, sleeping together on our sofa. That thing Abby’s been using to carry Sean around on her chest, she would have loved one of those.”

Tony smiles at that.

“Do you… remember much about her?”

Tony shrugs and sighs. “I… This much time… How many of the memories are memories, how many of them are stories I made up? I’ve still got some pictures of her. I remember going to movies with her. I remember her vampire obsession…”

“You’ve got her eyes. Little boy here does, too. Your sense of humor, the willingness to be silly and clown around, that’s entirely from her. Basketball was her, too. There was a girls’ team at her high school, and she was the center.”

“Dad… what happened to her?”

Senior exhales a long, slow breath, and gently strokes Dave’s cheek, looking at his eyes. He sighs again. “She always had dark periods. That was just part of who she was. And… no one thought much about that. Some days she was in a ‘mood.’ Her mother used to say it was a ‘lady problem’.”

“But it wasn’t.”

“No. When she wasn’t in one of her ‘moods,’ she was the most sparkling, amazing woman. High energy, creative, spirited…”

“Bi-polar.”

Senior nods. “We didn’t know it then. And back then the term was manic-depressive. But her manic phase just looked really… healthy and accomplished. She could get so much done and have such a good time doing it on the manic side that no one knew it was part of the problem, at first.”

Senior licks his lips. Dave chirps at him, and he lifts him from his lap to his shoulder. “Better?”

Dave coos.

“Good.” He kisses Dave’s head. “When you were about three she fell into a dark period that she couldn’t shake. Before that, dark periods would never last more than a week or so, and this one just kept going and going. The doctor said we should reduce stress, get her somewhere less hectic. We got a nanny, and a housekeeper, and moved out of the city. And, for a little while, she came back. Bright and funny and active. She spent, maybe two months, on non-stop house decorating. And then the dark came back.

“We got new doctors. They didn’t have a lot of treatments for depression, but we tried them. And she hated them because they made her feel horrible. Probably because she didn’t actually have depression.

“And it took about three years for someone to finally ask what the ‘light’ times were like. And, we got her on the right meds, and you two went to see movies, and she evened out, and… I thought it was getting better.” Senior’s looking in the direction of the mirror on above Tony and Ziva’s dresser, but he’s not seeing it.

“On the meds, there are no lows, but there are no highs, either. She started to swing into a manic side, and she wanted to feel that good again. At least… that’s what we think happened. She didn’t leave a note or anything. But, we’d get three months of the pills at a time, and there were two and a half months’ worth when we found her. Should have been something closer to ten days’ worth. I didn’t know she wasn’t taking the medication. Until it was too late.

“I was working in the city. She was good on Sunday when I left, and on Wednesday, the housekeeper found her unconscious. She’d drunk a full bottle of vodka and taken five of my sleeping pills.” Senior swallows, hard. “I don’t know if it was intentional, or not. When she was ‘on,’ she always had a hard time sleeping. Too many ideas to work on. Less alcohol, two fewer pills, and she probably would have pulled through. The doctor thought she was just trying to get to sleep, but… He would have told me that, anyway.”

Tony’s watching Senior staring at nothing, and feels a hardness creeping up on him. That might not be a rose tinted glasses version of what happened, but it’s certainly missing some major details. “Didn’t help that you were never home and screwing anything in a skirt.”

Senior turns toward Tony, and looks him in the eye. “No, it didn’t.”

Tony’s stunned to see his father just take it. No deflection, no attempts to defend what he did. “That’s it?”

“When you know you’ve behaved like a jackass, Junior, and the person you’re talking to also knows you behaved like a jackass, there’s no reason to pretend you didn’t. She was sick, and hurting, and that hurt so bad… I didn’t know what to do, but I knew I didn’t want to feel it, so I ran away from it. I didn’t want to watch her fall apart, so I didn’t. I was home more, before she died, because she was getting it back together, but for a few years there, I saw her as little as I could.

“No highs, no lows. That’s why she didn’t like the meds. The lows were killing her, and she didn’t like them, but she loved the highs, and… And you can’t get the highs without risking the lows.

“I spent a long time running away from anything that looked like it could be a low. You never get the highs, either. Not real highs. Can’t do it without risking the lows. But that was okay, because the lows are terrifying.”

Tony nods. He knows everything anyone ever could about that.

“Losing her… when she was in the dark, and it didn’t look like it would ever end, that hurt so bad, scared me so much, I pulled away. Pulled away from you, too. Couldn’t risk the low, so we didn’t get to have any of the highs, either.” Senior strokes Dave’s cheek. “I did a bad job with your Daddy, but I’m going to do a better job with you.” He turns his focus to Tony. “And I do regret it. I’d make it different if I could. But I can’t. So I’ll be the kind of grandfather your son deserves.”

He still has an arm around Tony, and he pulls Tony a little closer, and kisses him on the forehead.
Most of the guests have left, and Dave is in his crib, snoozing, as Schmiel gets a moment alone with Ziva.

“And how are you, my Ziva?”

He’s caught the onslaught of emotions on her face through the course of this morning.

She switches into Hebrew. It’s not so much that she doesn’t want everyone to overhear this, it’s that… Moments like this are very full, and happy, and rich, and real, and… at the same time they are hollow, missing the people who should have been here.

And right now, Hebrew, the language she learned to speak as a baby, the first words that filled her world, are part of trying to fill that hollow.

“I do not know, Schmiel.”

He waits for her to keep going, to set her words and feelings into place in her head.

“We celebrate, and the celebration is good. It matters. But… So many empty chairs.”

Schmiel gathers her close. He smiles gently. He survived Buchenwald. His family did not. He, like Ziva, is the last member of the family he was born into. “We celebrate all the harder, love deeper, live more, for the ones who aren’t here. And we still miss them, still feel the holes where they belong.”

Unlike everyone else here, Schmiel knew her family before it fell apart. Before they lost Tali, before Eli went cold, and Ari went hot. He knows, better than anyone else, that even with all of the pain of her family, she still feels like her father and brother should be here, that she misses the sister she used to whisper secrets to, and above and beyond all of it, there should be a woman here, the one who gave birth to her, to help her be a mother.

So many holes.

“It is hard to stay on the happy side of it. Hard to keep up the smiles.”

He nods, kisses her. “That is normal. We laughed at Jacob’s,” his oldest son, “bris, and we cried, too.”

Tears are leaking from her eyes. She wipes them away, feeling a bit silly, and Breena can tell her over and over that being on a hormonal rollercoaster is normal a week after you have a baby, but she doesn’t feel like the kind of person who should cry at sad memories. Or at wishes for that which cannot be.

But should and are are not the same thing, and no matter how much she’s like dry eyes, they aren’t going along with her desires on this.

Schmiel cuddles her.

____________________

Tony had been seeing the Rabbi out, and when he turns back into their apartment, he sees Ziva sitting on the sofa, with Schmiel, crying.

Eight-day old baby, she’s been a bit… variable… as to her mood lately. It’s normal.
He heads over. “Hey…” He’s keeping his voice quiet and soft. Sometimes she likes that when she’s in a sad mood, sometimes she thinks it’s patronizing. He’s hoping he’s on the right side.

He is. She looks up and offers him a half smile.

“We are missing our lost loves,” Schmiel says.

Tony sits down with them, and wraps an arm around Ziva, too. She rests her head against his chest and shoulder. “Dad and I were talking about that, a bit, too.”

Schmiel, realizes that he’s never met Tony’s mother, and there’s a reason for that. “Your mother should be here, too.”

Tony nods. “But she’s not. And so should yours,” he says to Ziva. He forces a smile onto his face. “You knew them, right?” he says to Schmiel.

“Yes.”

“Tell us a good story about them. Something happy and fun?”

“I can do that.” Another smile spreads over Schmiel’s face. “In fact… About thirty-five years ago, I was invited to a celebration similar to this one.

“There’s a small kibbutz, ringed in orange and lemon groves. Only about fifty people live and work there at any given time. A young woman named Miriam had been born there, and as she grew close to the birth of her own daughter, she wanted to be near her mother and her grandmother.”

“Ima,” Ziva says.

“Yes, your Ima. You have much of your father’s face, Ziva, but always her hair and smile. She and your father, who in those days was still a Mossad agent, headed south to your grandparents. For what felt like a long wait.” He eyes Ziva. “Someone was supposed to show up around the end of August or the beginning of September.” He strokes her face. “Never patient. Always in a rush. As a child everything had to happen now, but when it came to your birth, you were willing to linger. Your Ima would say that was the only thing you weren’t in a hurry for.”

Ziva smiles a little at that. “I was comfortable.”

“Apparently so. But when you finally came, the word came out, phone calls sang through the country. ‘It’s a girl!’ ‘Miriam’s daughter is here!’”

“No name,” Tony says.

“We take not telling the name until the ceremony seriously back home. Only your parents knew your name. For the first eight days, you were beautiful baby girl, or Miriam’s daughter.”

“Not Eli’s?” Tony asks again.

“No. Our families are matrilineal. Ziva may have been a David by name, but she was a Jew because of her Ima. As the word spread, unless it was being given to someone who only knew Eli, she was Miriam’s daughter.

“And so, seven days after your birth, I and a lot of other people made the trip down to a Kibbutz ringed with trees full of ripening oranges and lemons. Because on the eighth day, we were going to celebrate!
“There is one way Israel and America is very similar, almost everyone is from somewhere else. It’s a bit more literal in Israel because the country is younger. It’s only the children who are the age of David who reliably have both parents born in Israel. And it will be their children who will have, on average, three grandparents born in Israel.

“But, like here, the way we celebrate new babies varies quite a bit depending on where those baby’s parents are from. And Ziva’s family, who settled from Russia to a communal, egalitarian, Kibbutz believed that every baby, not just the boys, deserved a Bris.

“So we came for the B’rit Milah.

“Your grandfather and I carried you to the Rabbi. And he announced your name, Ziva Azar David. The radiant flame.

“Your father stood up and told stories of his mother, Azar, and how he hoped you’d be strong and clever like she was.

“Your mother told us about her name choice, Ziva, and how you were a light in her life, and how she hoped you light the lives of others.

“Both of them held you, and blessed you.

“And we spent the day, celebrating, eating and drinking in your honor, at tables laid with fruits and pastry, amid the lemon trees.

“And you, beautiful girl, watched everything. You didn’t cry much as a baby, but you did watch. Eyes open wide, taking in, and thinking about, everything.

“Three years later, when we gathered together again to do it for Tali, you got to hold her while your parents blessed her. I have two very clear images from each B’rit. The first one, from yours, is your Ima holding you, and your father is standing behind her, his chin on her shoulder, looking down at you. Both of them,” Schmiel smiles gently at Tony and Ziva, “had dark circles under their eyes. Like your David, you weren’t exactly the greatest sleeper when you were brand new, but they were both so in love with you. The image from Tali’s is similar. Your Ima was again holding Tali, but you were in your Abba’s arms. He was holding you up so you could see her well… The oldest of the girls here… Molly?”

Ziva nods at that, he’s got the right name with the right girl.

“Her coloring is lighter, but she has the same build and curly hair that you did. Eli had you in one arm, and the other around Miriam. You were reaching over, trying to get to your sister. I remember your one little hand touching her face.” He chuckles a bit. “Eli had a very startled look on his face, because you moved fast, and he was afraid he was going to drop you, but Miriam was smiling.”

Ziva’s almost afraid to ask, worried that it will tarnish this image, but she wants to know. “And where was Ari?”

Schmiel can see the edge of fear in her eyes, and smiles again. “Taking the picture of it. There’s a reason why I have such a clear image of that moment. Your father had the picture of it up in his office for a long time.”

“Oh.”

“Ari wasn’t at your B’rit. It was held during a school day, and his mother didn’t want him to miss classes. Tali’s was during a holiday, so he was allowed to come. There was another picture from that day, your father took that one, of you and Ari holding Tali. You and Ari are smiling, and Tali’s wailing. I think, by that point, it was naptime for her.”

They hear a small cry coming from Dave’s room.

“And it sounds like naptime is over for your little boy.”

Ziva heads into Dave’s nursery. He’s lying on his back, flailing a bit, looking… crabby. Quite a bit crabbier than he usually is upon first waking up.

She gathers him up, and he fusses and glares at her.

“Clean diaper, a little baby Tylenol, and nursing time. You will feel better soon.”

He indicates to her that none of that is happening quickly enough to suit him. Her breasts, also responding to a crying baby, are letting her know to hurry up on getting Dave on them, too.

She does a careful job of getting him cleaned up, makes sure to reapply the antibiotic ointment, and gives him a few drops of baby Tylenol. None of that appears to be making him happy.

Sitting back in the rocking chair Gibbs made them, opening her shirt, and getting him settled in her arms on her breast, does.

Skin to skin, his little heart thumping against her stomach, his tiny hand resting on the top of her breast, as he’s blissfully sucking away, eyes open and looking up at her, Ziva feels new tears forming. These are happy ones.

Tony slips in, quietly, and kneels next to the chair. Ziva doesn’t look up from Dave, but her free hand finds his and squeezes. He kisses her forehead and and gently strokes Dave’s face.

And a day later, he finds an email in his inbox. It’s from Schmiel. No words, just a picture of that moment.
First day back. Tony peels his eyes open as his alarm wails at him, whacks it with the back of his hand, fast, hoping that Ziva and Dave have slept through it. He glances up, and sees both of them snoozing in the bed next to him.

If he had to guess, he’d say that Dave got his first breakfast, or second midnight snack, and dropped off right after or during. From the looks of it, Ziva did, too.

There’s a moment of him just staring at them. His woman cuddling his baby, both of them sound asleep in his bed, and a very primal sense fills him. He snuggles into Ziva, wrapping around her, and gently rests his hand on Dave’s tummy, holding both of them, and this tiny moment of quiet, for as long as he can.

Which isn’t very long at all. He already pushed his wakeup time as far back as he could and still get to work at something approximating “on time.”

So, out of bed, into the shower, into clothing, all of it done fast and somewhat haphazard, and then, stuffing a bagel between his teeth, he grabs his keys and go bag, and gets out of his home and back to work.

It’s stupid, but for a second, he feels like he’s in the wrong place when the elevator opens. His default mental image of the bullpen is orange and gray. But it’s not orange and gray anymore, and hasn’t been since last year.

Sunshiny (blinding) yellow, and green meet his tired eyes as he heads in to his desk. Draga’s already in, at his computer, working on something. As Tony gets a bit closer, he can see Johnson at her desk, too.

He turns into their quad, and finds that Spader isn’t in, yet. And he sighs, pleased by that, good not to be the last guy in.

Draga looks over to him as he flops into his chair. “Oh, I know that look.”

Then he stands up, roots around in his desk for a moment, and comes up with a Red Bull can. He takes it over to Tony. “Started drinking these when Kevin was born.” He places it on Tony’s desk, and then gently pats Tony’s top drawer, a grin on his face.

Tony opens the drawer, and there’s twelve more Red Bulls in there.

“Oh… Thanks.”

“No problem, Boss.” Draga just sits there, next to his desk, and a moment later Johnson’s right next to him, both of them waiting, expectantly, for something. It takes a moment for it to click. “Oh, right. You want pictures!”

“Haven’t seen the little guy since the Bris last week, so yes, we want pictures,” Johnson says.
Tony nods, and then opens the damn Red Bull, because he’s apparently so tired he’s getting stupid. He takes a sip and… It’s not a flavor he enjoys, but it does appear to be zinging through his system and making his teeth buzz with energy. It’ll do.

Then he grabs his phone, opens it up, and proceeds to show Johnson and Draga, and eventually Spader shots from home. (Spader apparently had gotten in before him, but got sent on the breakfast run, and was out getting him a bear claw and coffee, with extra sugar, which Tony appreciates. The bear claw is raspberry chocolate, and after a few sips of coffee, he pours the Red Bull into the cup, and that not only kills the taste but gives him enough caffeine he starts to feel alive again.) Most of the pictures are variations on the theme of Dave with his eyes open, or Dave sleeping, or Dave flailing his hands and feet around. He’s a not quite three-week old baby, they don’t do a whole lot.

He’s showing off Dave sleeping on his belly, on the floor, with Mona wrapped around him, muzzle on his back, (Ziva set that up, she wanted a shot of them together.) when the phone rings.

Tony grabs it. And he knows this dance, and his team does, too. Okay, they aren’t quite as smooth as could be, Johnson and Spader wait for him to get off the phone and say, “Grab your gear” before going back to their desks to get their stuff, but they do have everything packed and ready to go.

It’s a good first day back case. Apparently, there’s a tank missing from the marine base at Quantico. It’s so thoroughly missing that it’s now officially “stolen.”

They roll on out, in their NCIS jackets and caps, ready to get to the bottom of this. Tony takes notes of the few sets of eyes on them as they head to the motor pool in their blue jackets and caps. He’s behind the other three, and yeah, he smiles, they do look like LAW, out to go and set the world right. He approves.

“How do you lose a tank?” Johnson asks once they’re in the van.

“Yeah,” Spader says. “I mean, they can’t be easy to steal, can they? Not like you just put one in your pocket and wander off with it.”

Tony and Draga share a look. They both have a suspicion of where said tank might be. Or, a suspicion of who can tell them where said tank may be. Still, this is probably a good training exercise for their newbies.

“So, tell us what happened?” Tony says to Lt. James Segal, the poor quartermaster in charge of this problem.

“If I knew what happened, I wouldn’t need you guys!” He’s tall, harried, and looking so frustrated that he’s ready to chew through concrete. “All I know is that it’s on inventory documents until September, and then it’s gone.”

“When did you last do an inventory?” Johnson asks.

“We do them every month.” Segal is gritting his teeth.
“September was eight months ago,” Spader says.

“You aren’t from around here, are you!” Segal shoots back. “Just moved in from… anywhere else?”

Spader would have to admit that’s true. “Uh, yeah.”

“Things have been a bit…” Segal chooses to keep his language PG, and doesn’t say the words that are clearly in his head. “upside down lately. And the Virginia National Guard had one system, and we had another system, and we’re just getting things back to something approaching normal.”

“Okay. So, we’re getting back to normal. When did you notice the tank was missing?” Tony asks.

“In March, when we got control of this base again.”

“That’s still two inventories, right?” Johnson asks.

Segal nods. “First one, we just assume that everything is upside down and backwards. Because the first one, everything was upside down and backwards. The jackass from the National Guard didn’t know his…” Segal stops himself again. “Anyway, we were spending a lot of time rearranging, and figured that it was just in the wrong place.”

“A tank?” Draga says, with a smile. He can’t help it. This isn’t a spoon. It’s not like you can stick one in the wrong drawer or something.

“Cut it. Do you have any idea how big Quantico is? Or how about every other military base in Virginia, all of which ended up being run by the National Guard, who didn’t give a... about which branch of the military normally did what. We checked all of them, looking for the damn thing. We found three other tanks in the wrong damn place, but not ours.”

“I’m sorry. So, you find several tanks in the wrong place, but not your tank,” Draga says.

“Right. Some as...jerk apparently decided to play scatter the tanks, and then didn’t put them back in the right places. We aren’t the only ones missing some, but most of the AWOL ones belong to the Army.”

“Ah…” Tony says with a smile tugging at his lips. “So, do you think these are stolen, or just reallocated?”

“Right now, I don’t care. I’ve called everyone in Virginia who might have one, and mine is gone. So, I called in you guys.”

“All right,” Tony says with a smile. He taps a folder. “This is all the specs for the missing tank?”

“Yeah.”

Tony smiles again, flipping through the folder. He doesn’t know, not by sight, if this was one of Fornell’s tanks, but he’s pretty certain that only one “as...jerk” was playing scatter the tanks, and that he’s got said “as...jerk’s” phone number on his contact list.

He’s also, intensely, looking forward to tweaking Fornell on his “We gave them back” abilities.

“Guess who I was just talking to,” Tony says to start his phone call to Fornell.
“DiNozzo, do I sound like I’ve got time for guessing games?”

“You’re retired; I thought you’ve got all the time in the world.”

“I wish. I’m busier now than I used to be.”

“Ha.”

“Yeah, yeah, yeah. I’m in and out of depositions all day. The Calfalone case.”

“Oh, right. Jethro was telling me about that. Well, guess what, the Ghost of Cases Past is about to pop up again.”

“Great. What’s about to bite me in the ass?”

“Open your email for the tag numbers. Apparently, not all of those tanks got put back right.”

Tony hears Fornell cursing under his breath. A minute later he says, “Yeah. I know who was driving that one.” A long sigh follows that. “I’ll call you back.”

Spader and Johnson are looking at Tony as he gets off the phone and Draga drives them back to the Navy Yard. “You’re saying one of your buddies, a retired FBI Agent—“ Spader says.

“He wasn’t retired then,” Draga adds.

“Stole a bunch of tanks, and used them to shuttle food into DC and people out?” Spader finishes.

“And saved our lives with them. Technically speaking, he borrowed them, just without official permission,” Tony says, tucking his phone into his pocket. “As he said, he gave them back. Just looks like they didn’t all get back exactly where they belonged.”

“And, same question we had before, how do you steal a tank?” Johnson asks, disbelieving. “They’re not tiny, you don’t just slip one into your pocket. And they aren’t cars. It’s not like people park them on the road and you can hotwire one.”

“Paperwork, attitude, good posture, a lot of confusion, and eventually, if you show up with several other tanks, wear the right uniform, and act like you expect a tank, people will generally give you one,” Tony says.

“I don’t know if that’s the most depressing thing I’ve ever heard, or…” Johnson lets that thought dribble off. “Yeah… That’s just… So cynical.”

“Cynical works, especially in the military. Show up with a high enough rank on your shoulder and proper paperwork, and you can pull almost anything off,” Tony replies.

Cynical doesn’t even begin to cover it, as, three hours later, Tony, Draga, Johnson, and Spader pull the NCIS van up to a small parking lot outside of Rickets Hall at the Naval Academy.

Next to that parking lot, there’s a small triangle of grass.
With a tank on it.

As they get out of the van, moving toward the tank, wind from the bay sweeping over them as a small crowd of Midshipmen stare at them, in something that might be called awe, cynical goes whizzing by, leaving them miles back, in the territory of… Hell, Tony doesn’t know what’s past cynical, but this sure as hell is it.

He stares at the tank, and more specifically, the small bronze plate that’s been attached to the side of it.

“Ummm…” Spader strokes the metal in front of him. “Okay, I’m a know-nothing Squid, but… This tank isn’t that old, is it?”

Tony’s shaking his head. The tank in front of them can’t be more than ten years old, and might be younger. “Nope.”

“And…” Johnson pulls out her phone to check. “Yeah. My Daddy’s told me a lot about Vietnam. He was there. And, March 3, 1969, that’s a tank battle all right, but an Army tank battle. Who was driving this thing?”

“Fornell wasn’t saying, and I wasn’t asking,” Tony replies. He knows Fornell drove a tank for the Army. In Vietnam. But he also knows that the first people Fornell called to back him up on this also drove tanks for the Army, in Vietnam. And they got called in probably for the same reason that if Gibbs suddenly needed a bunch of snipers, a whole pile of Marines who saw action in Iraq or South America would pop up.

A small crowd of midshipmen are now gathered around them, watching. Tony nudges Johnson, and she turns to them. Several of them suddenly snap to attention and become intensely more interested in this endeavor.

“What’s the story with this?” she asks.

Three of them fall over themselves trying to answer her first. As words go spilling out she says, “Okay, you.” She reads his name badge, “Henadze. What’s the scuttlebutt?”

“Just showed up. School closed down when things went bonkers. It wasn’t there when we left. It was when we got back.”

“A tank shows up out of the blue, and no one asks any questions?” Draga asks.

“That’s a LAV-25. A Light Armored Vehicle, sir.” Another midshipman, this one with Ricard on his nametag says, “And, it’s got a little plaque on it.” He points to the plaque, nodding. “It’s a memorial. We get them all the time.”

Draga sighs. “All right, Skippy. Who’s in charge of keeping track of memorials?”

The midshipmen look around at each other, none of them having a clue as to what the answer to that might be. Finally, one says, “Maybe… the physical plant guys? I mean, someone’s got to mow the grass around it, and clean it up.”

Spader nods at that. It seems as good a place as any other to begin. “And they’d be…”
A moment later, they’ve got directions to the maintenance building.

By the time they’ve talked to the groundskeepers, and the physical plant guys, and the administration, and then the next higher level up of administration, they are absolutely certain that look like you belong and just do whatever it is, will get you everywhere in the military.

“Did you keep any personnel on base when everything shut down?” Tony’s asking (Ret) Lt. Commander Thom Sharpe, the Director of Campus Affairs.

“Like the entire rest of the military, we were given orders to turn ourselves over to the National Guard, so we did.”

“And, you leave, and when you come back, you’ve got an extra ta—LAV-25, and no one says anything?” Johnson asks.

“Ma’am,” Sharpe’s using his dealing with idiots/civilians voice, and it’s very clear that he’s doing it. “Between the time we left, and when the Maryland National Guard decided to post people back here for security, an undetermined number of people decided that looting our campus would be a wonderful idea. Everything was complete chaos for weeks. And it took months to get things back into some sort of order. So, no. When my people were busy scrounging up every bit of window glass they could find to replace damage to our buildings, a new monument was not on the list of things we were interested in.”

“Did anyone ever ask any questions about it?” Spader asks.

“If they did, it didn’t get to my desk. Do you have any idea how much time and effort had to go into getting the campus back into shape for graduation, let alone getting all of the lost hours of instruction in so the class of ’17 could graduate on time, and do it on a campus that’s worthy of them? We have been working 24/7 since January. Commencement is ten days away, and we are going to just barely pull it off.

“So, no. No one has given a feather’s worth of care about an LAV-25 sitting on the grass doing nothing, why?”

“Because someone stole that tank from Quantico,” Tony says, not seeing any need to fill in what the not-tank had been doing in the intervening time.

Sharpe blinks, hard, at that.

“And then decided to plop it on your lap,” Draga adds.

“But we don’t know why, and we do need to get it back to Quantico,” Johnson finishes.

He opens his mouth, and then shuts it, and opens it again to say, “Well… We don’t have the equipment to move it here, but, that shouldn’t be too hard to find. And… why here? I have no idea.”

“That was really fast,” Segal’s saying.
“Helps if you were in DC when everything went to shit,” Tony replies. He’s on his phone as Spader, carefully, in compliance with all of the traffic laws, drives them back to DC.

He can hear the cringe in Segal’s voice when he says, “You were in DC?”

“At the Navy Yard, and we got our butts saved by some tanks showing up at the right place, at the right time. Anyway, I need to know if you’ve got something that can move it from Annapolis back to you.”

“Yeah. I’ve got that. And some people to do it.”

“Okay, case closed.”

“Case closed? You’ve got the guy who took it?”

Tony decides that Segal doesn’t need to know that there is no way in hell he’s going to grill Fornell about how they got that tank or who was driving it. “We’ve got everything we need to to take care of him.”

“Okay. Call if you need me to testify.”

“I don’t think it’ll go to trial. He didn’t seem eager to make a big fuss about it.”

“Excellent.”

Home again go the conquering heroes.

Tony watches them moving into NCIS, heads high, shoulders back, the stride of the righteous and successful bounding about, and he’s feeling good about today.

Case is solved, no one got hurt, and Fornell is spreading the word that perhaps a few, “Hey, are you missing a tank? You should look here.” notes should be going out.

And, they’re done by 5:00.

It’s the perfect day.

He heads home, takeout Chinese in hand, looking forward to seeing Ziva and Dave.

Little man is snoozing when he gets in, so he and Ziva have, what feels like, their first uninterrupted conversation in weeks while, chowing down on bourbon chicken, garlic green beans, and fried rice.

“Mmmm…” she’s looking especially pleased as she munches on a bite of the sweet, savory chicken.

He agrees. It’s beyond yummy, and he didn’t have time for a real lunch on the road, so he’s hungry.

Once she’s done with that bite, she says, “Are you going to look into the plaque?”
He shrugs. “I don’t know. Obviously, whoever it was, was making a statement, but… If I look into it, I’m going to end up identifying him, and if I do that, I’m sort of bound to actually go arrest him for taking the tank and… I don’t want to do that. I probably owe my life to that guy, so…” He shakes his head.

“I understand that.”

He takes another bite, and watches her sip her water. For a moment, he just gazes, and then gently strokes her shoulder. She smiles back at him. “You are looking very content.”

“I’m feeling very content. It was a good day.”

“I am glad to hear that.”

“Good day for you?”

“Enough. Sleep, eat, feed baby, sleep, eat, feed baby… Jethro was over for a lot of the day. He is bringing home Jackson tomorrow. And the day after or so, he’ll bring him over here.”

Tony smiles at that. “I cannot wait to see that. Has he shown you a picture of him?”

“Oh yes. He’s so tiny. Dave is bigger than he is.” Ziva’s grinning.

“You’re going to get a picture of Dave with Jackson, aren’t you?”

“I was thinking of that. Like the one with Mona wrapped around Dave, this one with Dave wrapped around Jackson.”

Tony thinks of that, and of how much fun she’s been having getting some time to practice her camera skills. “I’ve got a few square inches of my cubical not covered in Dave pictures. I need at least one more.”

Ziva smiles at that, and then, because that put them dangerously close to an entire half hour of adult conversation, Dave calls out, looking for another meal.

Tony gets up. “I’ve got him.”

An hour later, Tony’s on his sofa, with Dave on his chest, enjoying the about ten minutes that usually go between end of feed and nap time. He’s stroking Dave’s back, telling him about his day, nuzzling the top of his head, and finishing up his third glass of wine for the night.

Tony’s not exactly the epitome of social media guru, but he’s spent enough time online to at least be aware of the concept of ‘squad goals.’

And, as he’s telling Dave about how Daddy and his team went marching through the Naval Academy, and the midshipmen watched them go through, eyes wide, staring at the metric shit ton of awesome his NCIS crew is, he’s enjoying the fact that they’re one fine looking squad.

Skin on skin is supposed to be good for babies. And Dave is under the impression that Daddy’s chest is the best nap location on earth. Something about warm skin and fuzzy chest hair just puts him out like a light. Tony’ll lay him on his chest, Dave’ll open his little fingers, spread them wide, and clamp them down into his chest hair, and not let go until it’s nursing time. (And honestly, if he could do that with Tony, he probably would.)
However, this means Tony’s spending way more time awake without a shirt on than he has at any time since his early forties, and he’s very well aware of the fact that he does not look like he did in his early forties.

He puts the glass of wine down, and really looks at himself.

He sighs. They are one fine looking squad.

He started noticing it when it was just him and Draga. The way people looked immediately at Draga. The way women stopped checking him out and started paying attention to the young, hot guy with him.

He pats Dave’s back gently. Gibbs must have had this experience, right? Back when it was him and Franks, he was the hot shit, pretty guy, and then…

And then Tony showed up, and Gibbs wasn’t.

He was the older guy with the white hair and a bit of tummy flub and the fashion sense from JC Penny’s and he had this young, pretty partner with the cheekbones that could cut glass and the ripped abs and the charm oozing from every pore.

The partner who was so young and pretty that his wife was hitting on him.

Now he’s the old guy. (Hell, he’s almost a decade older than Gibbs was when he joined up, and back then Gibbs was fucking ancient.)

He tries to remember how he looked in ’08 and ’09. It’s a kind of fuzzy mental image, but he does know that, while his chest may be an ultra-soft and comfy napping location for a baby boy, that once upon a time he could locate his pectorals by something other than his nipples.

And the less said about his belly, the better.

And he knows that there was a time when most of the suits in his closet fit.

And the less said about the condition of the jeans sitting in his pants drawer, untouched since before the fall, when he was losing weight and feeling hopeful about getting back into early 40s shape, the better.

Dave makes a content gurgling noise. He’s happy where he is and with Tony the way he is.

Tony’s not sure if he’s happy though.

He guesses that’s part of it, is he ‘growing old gracefully?’ (And would that involve stopping dying his hair? He’s been getting kind of lax on that. One cannot dye one’s hair and be a napping spot for a baby, and right now, napping spot wins out over brown hair. However, this means he’s starting to develop some interesting roots.) The Wonder Twins are both graying up, so it’s not like he’d be the lone gray hair of the bunch, but…

Ziva’s napping, too. She’s going to be getting up again at least four times tonight, so as soon as she finished feeding Sean, she hit the bed. That makes a lot of sense to him.

He’s sure she’s okay with how he looks. She signed on for the long haul and loves him and all the rest of it, but…

But maybe it’d be nice to at least make some effort to try and stay physically attractive to her. He can remember his younger self scoffing at the guys who got married and then immediately stopped making any effort whatsoever to keep themselves up. (And he really remembers a lot of extremely un-pc conversations about women who did the same thing.)

She doesn’t run every morning. Not anymore. Doesn’t have the time, and honestly, she’s not supposed to be doing that this close to Dave’s birth. Let everything get good and healed up before bouncing it around for five miles a day.

But, even with her hip hurting, even with her balance feeling off, she made sure to get out there every day until she was nine months along and her Doc told her to cut it out.

She did some sort of yoga thing, too. Pilates… And she kept up with Tim and Gibbs on rehabbing until the week before Dave was born.

She’s making an effort. He knows that part of it is about making herself feel good. She gets really crabby when she doesn’t get to move around enough. But part of it is also making herself look good. For her. And for him.

And he appreciates it. (Sincerely, as often as he can, and then he stops thinking about that, because right now that’s not on the menu, and he doesn’t want to get himself riled up when there’s nothing he can do about it.)

Dave chirps and squirms against him, letting Tony know he’s noticed the story has stopped, and he’d like a bit more please.

“That’s really all there was. I can’t wait for you to be able to tell me about your day.”

That gets a coo.

He kisses his boy again, and then reaches over to his phone, and sends Jimmy a text. We on for bootcamp on Sunday?

A minute later he gets back. Sure. I know Collin’s been itching to get a real fight on.

Then he takes another sip of his wine, soft, subtle red, blushes of plum and cherry on the nose, a bit of leather in the finish, he sighs at the flavor. He an Ziva would usually split a bottle of wine with dinner (or maybe two dinners) but when she got pregnant, he was on his own for that. Before the fall, he’d just have his one drink, seal the bottle up, and put it back on the counter.

These days, he’ll usually finish it.

He holds the phone, thinking of those awful rations in the Navy Yard, and thinking about how he’s been more or less eating and drinking everything that gets in range since. How he gets a bit nervous when he can’t see something tasty, because it reminds him of weeks of nothing tasty. How food, and drink, helps him to shut up the memories of being in DC.

He pokes his belly, feeling pounds of soft, hairy flub. Dave, who apparently feels what he just did, gives him a little kick to go with it, and then realizes he can get his toes curled into Tony’s belly hair to go with his fingers, and has at it.

“You realize that in, two minutes, I’m going to have to pry you off.”

Dave couldn’t care less.

Tony thinks a bit more about his current state, and the way those Midshipmen were reacting to his team. They weren’t looking at him like he was God’s gift to policing. They weren’t staring at him, thinking of upping their exercise game. That look was for Draga and Spader.

After Shabbos, can we talk diet? he sends to Jimmy.

Of course. Better yet, head on down to Autopsy during lunch. We can talk then.

Tony would rather put it off a bit, but he knows that’s just avoiding committing to it. And he knows that Jimmy knows it, too.

Barring a body, I’ll see you then.

Good!

Jimmy eyes Tony’s lunch, not saying much.

For this meet up, Tony even tried to go healthy. There’s an apple next to his hamburger and he skipped the fries.

Jimmy, of course, has one of those Tupperware containers from home filled with bunny food. There’s lettuce and green things, and he thinks it’s probably some sort of organic, kosher, free-range, grilled tofu or whatever other taste-free stuff Jimmy eats on there.

Jimmy looks at Tony’s lunch and shakes his head. He holds up another Tupperware container of bunny food and hands it to Tony.

“Even the apple?” Tony says, appalled, looking at leafy greens, protein, and good fats.

“It’s a nine month old red-delicious. You might as well dip a baseball in sugar and eat it.”

Tony rolls his eyes, but he tosses out the burger and apple.

Jimmy smiles at that. “You want lots of veggies. Any unprocessed meat you like. I haven’t seen your cholesterol numbers, but you haven’t had a heart attack yet, so I’ll say you can have fats, saturated and unsaturated. Nuts are your friends. Avocados, too. Cheese, cream, butter, oil, and salt make vegetables taste good, so put some on. But keep it at least five-parts veggies to one-part fat, by weight,” Tony had started to feel like maybe there was a light at the end of the tunnel with that, but nope, “fresh fruit has a lot of good things in it, but fresh. Apples get picked in the fall, that sad little thing you traded your fries for lost all of its vitamins months ago. This time of year, skip fruit. Next month into fall, that’s local harvest time here, and have at it. Winter, that’s harvest time in the southern hemisphere, so look for those ‘Product of Chile’ stickers, and have at ‘em.”

That makes a certain amount of sense. “Sugar?”

Jimmy shrugs. “I don’t eat much of it. You probably shouldn’t, either. But you don’t have to cut it out of your diet. It’s not actually addictive, not in the medical sense of addictive, and your body can’t tell the difference between glucose, fructose, and the rest of it. So swapping out sugar A for sugar B doesn’t do anything for you. If you want to count calories and just drop weight, you can cut back. If you want to drop a lot of body fat, reshape yourself, it’s a good idea to say goodbye to it, except as an occasional treat.”
Tony’s not a huge sugar fanatic, so, besides his coffee habit, he wouldn’t have to alter things too badly to deal with that. His next question though… “Pasta…”

Jimmy knows how much this next bit will hurt Tony. “Same thing. If it’s made from a grain, it’s probably better off not inside you. Wheat, rice, corn, rye, oats… all of them. Think about your end goal. If you want to look like me, you say goodbye to all of it and run or yoga or something, every day, and hit the gym three times a week for weights. You want to look like Draga, you say goodbye to all of it and lift every day and run or yoga or something. And honestly, I don’t know how you get to look like Spader. Tons of work, perfect DNA for it, and maybe a side of steroids. I could work out until the end of time, and I won’t look like Spader. I’m just not built for it, and you likely aren’t, either. If you want to look like Tim, have dessert once or twice week, be careful about how much you eat, work out every day. Big thing is fewer grains, less sugar, less alcohol, and more moving around.”

“Am I drinking too much?”

Jimmy nods. “Not from a getting drunk perspective. At your size, and the speed you go through it, you’re okay. But, calorie-wise, yeah. You want to look like you last year, drop back down to one glass of wine, and cut your coffee consumption in half, or start drinking it black, and that’ll take care of 2/3ds of it.”

“Potatoes?” Jimmy’s just cut most of what Tony likes to eat out of the picture, but maybe there’s still some hope.

“They’re actually pretty good for you, assuming A: they’re fresh, and B: you aren’t eating them by the pound. They’re still carbs, but they’re carbs with a lot of vitamins and fiber.” Jimmy eyes the wrapper from the burger he tossed. “The burger’s crap, but they cut their fries to order there, they’d be a fine treat.”

“Define treat.”

“Fewer than ten percent of your total calories per week.”

Tony groans.

Jimmy sighs and shakes his head. “If you think about it like that, you might as well just buy the fat clothing because you are never going to keep the weight off with that attitude. If this is a punishment, then you won’t stick to it, and if you don’t stick to it, you’re going to get fatter.

“So, your choice: fat clothing or attitude adjustment.”

Tony looks hurt by that choice.

Jimmy thinks for a moment about how to repackage this so it doesn’t sound like a jail sentence to the land of bland food. “Okay, your body needs pleasure. It wants it and will seek it out. Food lights up the pleasure centers of your brain, big time. Sugar, carbs, fat, they’re all easy energy. A million years ago when you had to run down your food and run away from something that wanted to eat you, your brain got programeed to shoot off a huge, ‘Oh, this is awesome!’ message to your body when you ran into a good source of easy energy.

“The problem in, you run about once a month, and you do it for, maybe half a mile, and more and more, you just let Draga do it, and you cut around the back and look smart when he chases the bad guy to you.”

Tony nods. He does that. He remembers Gibbs doing that, too.
“So, your body still thinks its job is to run away from lions and run down gazelles for supper. So, it rewards you with a lot of pleasure when you eat something that will help it do that. You need to replace that with something else, or else your body’s just going to sit there, craving pleasure, and every time you see a donut, your body will beg you for a hit. It is not a coincidence that Tim’s managed to keep the weight off since he and Abby got together and he didn’t before. His brain’s getting his pleasure hits from other sources now, which is making food less of a thing for him.”

“He’s not just burning off more calories… with Abby, and then with you guys?”

Jimmy laughs. “If you keep eating the way you are now, or if he kept eating the way he was then, you’ll to need to start running ten to fifteen miles a day to lose weight, and I can guarantee you, no one, especially not Tim, is that hot in bed.”

That gets another sigh from Tony. He’s in his own personal sex desert right now, so it’s not like he’s got that for lighting up the pleasure center of his brain anytime soon, either.

Jimmy nods, getting it.

“Should I even bother to start now?”

“Oh yeah. It’s a good idea to have something other than sex to light you up. Time to hunt down things that feel good, and reward yourself with them instead of cookies. Get moving more, too. Strap little boy to your chest and walk around with him. Ziva will rest better if you’ve got him out of the apartment, and an hour of walking around will be good for you, too. When he can hold his head up, I’ll show you my workout with a baby routine, which is good for upper body strength and babies like it.”

“Which is good for you because it seems like you’ve always got a new one around.”

“That does seem to be the case at my house.” Jimmy says with something of a grin.

Tony takes a bite of the bunny food in front of him. He supposes that Ziva would tell him it’s light and refreshing. To him it’s like chewing on water.

“So, what do you do? You already eat like a carnivorous bunny rabbit. Except for steak, everything that tastes good’s been out of your diet for years.”

Jimmy gently whacks him with the back of his hand. “I don’t look at it like that. You guys are just a bunch of deranged carb junkies who don’t know what anything actually tastes like.”

Tony shoots Jimmy a very dry look. “Uh huh… So, you’re not eating for pleasure, not the way we do.”

“Ish. I like food,” He’s got a really good salad in front of him. Kale, arugula, romaine, cilantro, avocado, red and yellow bell peppers, tofu, salmon, and cashews. Little balsamic vinegar and good olive oil drizzled on it. It’s yummy. “but no, not the way you do, not the way I used to, too. Once upon a time, I’d order the large pizza with everything on it, and a two-liter Coke, and eat it for dinner by myself. I can’t do that now.”

“So… what? You’re aren’t pestering Breena for sex, not with her puking every five minutes, and Abby can’t be all that hot on it right now, especially with two of you guys to deal with, and last I heard you and Tim were still ‘evolving’ which didn’t sound like going at it hot and heavy, so…”

Jimmy shrugs.
Tony catches that. “Or are you two ‘evolved?’”

Jimmy rolls his eyes a bit. He’s pretty sure what ‘evolving’ means, but, he didn’t have that conversation with Tony. “If evolving means that sex between the two of us is a shifting situation, and evolved means it’s done shifting, then yes, we’re evolved.”

“So, you and Tim are taking care of each other? You’re bi now?”

Jimmy doesn’t roll his eyes, though he wants to. “Probably not. You know the difference between how fucking feels and how making love feels, even though,” he adds an extremely descriptive hand gesture, index finger slipping in and out of an almost closed fist, “you’re physically doing the same thing each way?”

Tony nods. Like probably every other adult on earth, he’s gotten his rocks off, and he’s made love, and yeah, in both cases the physical part is all about slippery friction, but the head game is substantially different.

“Oh, fucking Tim doesn’t work all that hot. We get horny enough, and it’s an option, but we’ve got to get pretty damn horny before fucking works, and even then… We tend to run out of steam with each other. That, ‘climbing the walls, just gotta get laid’ feeling, Tim doesn’t do much to satisfy that, because he’s not a woman. Better than nothing, better than jerking off, but not a girl. So, if it’s just horny, we’re more likely to take care of ourselves.

“Making love… We’re better at that.”

Tony squints at Jimmy a bit, trying to imagine it, in a not very explicit sort of way. “You mean like candles and flowers and you two whispering love poems to each other?”

Tony’s halfway between joking and serious, so Jimmy flashes him the stink eye, and goes on. “So, yeah, evolved. But, just like you don’t make love every time you’re in bed, we don’t either. So, right now there’s less sex than either of us would like, but more than we’d have if it we were just two couples.”

Tony was halfway between joking and serious, so he’s also honestly curious about this. “Wait. Okay, I know what I’m doing when I’m making love. I know how it’s different from getting laid. I’m trying to wrap my head around how it works for you and Tim. You singing him songs and talking about butterfly kisses?”

“You’re going to beat me with that vow until the day I die, aren’t you?”

Tony breaks into a wide grin. “I certainly intend to. What do you do?”

Jimmy opens and closes his mouth. “It’s just… different. Some nights you go to bed and you expect to have your usual twenty-minute good night sex, and it just clicks and you’re in the right place and your mind and body and heart all gel, and it’s good. And other nights you’re just getting off with one of your favorite people. Well, the horny bit never triggers for the two of us with each other, so heart and mind have to be gelled in the first place before the body swings into action.”

Tony thinks about that. “Like, some nights, you just look at her, and you love her so much you feel like your heart can’t hold it, and you’ve just got to touch and kiss and…”

And Jimmy’s nodding along. “And some nights, she’s wearing a tight shirt, maybe without a bra, and you’re getting a really nice view and you don’t just want to look, you want to touch and taste. And, yeah, one of those things can happen for Tim and I and the other one doesn’t.”
“Huh…” Tony inclines his head. He gets that. Then he spends another moment really looking at Jimmy. “So…” he licks his lips almost looking embarrassed, but he is curious, too, and Tim doesn’t like to get into this much detail, but maybe Jimmy will, “who does what?”

Jimmy eyes Tony. “Who does what?”

“You’re both guys.” Tony extends both index fingers and bops the tips of them together a few times. “I already know that’s not going to do it for either of you, so… Who does what?”

Jimmy thinks about it for a moment and says, “Do you and Ziva always do the same thing?”

“On the level I’m asking about, yeah. We’re not built to switch that up.”

Jimmy shrugs. “The general rule of thumb is don’t ask for it if you aren’t willing to do it/have it done to you. That goes for all four of us. Beyond that…” Jimmy shrugs. “Anyone does anything any of the others of us are interested in having happen. That goes for Tim and I as much as it does for the girls.”

“So, you’re not saying.”

Jimmy smirks. “I just did.”

Tony eyes Jimmy, and Jimmy gets back to the main reason they’re down here. “Anyway, food, dieting, pleasure. I look the way I do because food isn’t the main thing lighting up the pleasure center of my brain. And, as you asked, yeah, I love sex, and yes, that’s my pleasure of choice, but it’s not my only pleasure. It’s just the one I like best. So, when the amount of sex runs low, I’ve got other things to switch onto. I like yoga. I like running. I like working out with babies and playing with them. None of these things are chores that I punish myself with. All of them are physical things that light up my brain with endorphins.

“I like doing this job. I get to do this and feel good about finding the bit or piece that breaks the case open. That’s a different sort of pleasure than what my body can do for me, the deeper feeling of having done something intellectually satisfying. The question is, are you here because you like it, or because you have to do it? If you have to, it’s not going to work as a way to feel good. It’ll just be something to get you to normal if it’s something you have to do.”

Tony thinks about it. “I had an answer for that before everything went to shit in the fall, but now…”

Jimmy nods at that. That’s true for a lot of the people who still work for NCIS, and likely, the rest of the government.

“Anyway, all of it makes me feel good, so I don’t need to grab a mound of deep-fat-fried-sugar-coated-carbs to make myself feel good. What do you enjoy doing? What makes you feel good? Movies? Music? How long has it been since you played that piano in your living room?”

That catches Tony flatfooted because besides work, and Ziva, and family time, it has been a long time since he’s done something that was fun for him.

He’s sitting there, trying to think of the last thing he did that was just fun. At least since before Dave was born. Not to say he hasn’t done things he’s enjoyed, but not the way Jimmy’s talking about.

“Fun… You mean… Uh…”

“Something you enjoy, preferably a physical something. Your body makes chemicals to hook your brain and body together and link it to the idea of pleasure. You cuddle Dave, your body produces more oxytocin, that ups the level of ‘good’ feeling you get from being with him. Sex does that, too. Some of the same chemicals even. Running around, working hard, physically, that all pumps your body full of endorphins. Those endorphins make you feel good. They literally make you happy. Food, alcohol, most drugs, they do that, too. So… When was the last time you did something fun?"

Tony shakes his head. “Shit. Besides cuddling Dave… or Ziva… I mean, I do things I love and all…”

Jimmy’s nodding. “But you’re a new dad, and during the day you’re all work all the time, and you go home and you’re all baby, and those weekend hours aren’t enough because you do family things, but it’s been a long time since you’ve carved some time out to do something you personally enjoy.”

Tony nods.

“It’s springtime. We’ve got a backyard. Maybe we mow that sucker this weekend, get some balls and gloves and play some baseball or something like that. We don’t always have to do MMA for bootcamp. You like basketball, we could play that. Besides sex and alcohol, what did you used to do that was physically fun?”

Tony shrugs. “A big part of basketball was showing off. I liked the cheering as much as the playing.”

Jimmy smirks. “Take your shirt off and play with us; I promise you the girls will watch and hoot at you. And, on a basketball court, compared to Tim and I, you’ll be an Olympic-level athlete.”

Tony sniggers at that. Then he shakes his head. “No one needs to see what’s under this shirt.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes at that. “Okay, I can promise you, no matter what you do with the rest of this, that’s not helping anything.”

“Says the guy with the ten percent body fat.”

Jimmy shrugs again. “I’m not wrong.”

Tony sighs. “You’re not.”

“Fifty’s next year for you. Forty’s coming in December for Tim and I. We’re all getting older. We’re all gonna get saggy. So what? We run around and play and do things that make us feel good. We show off and make our girls feel good, and that makes us feel even better. Keep thinking about it, and find something that makes you feel good. Something we can do this weekend.”

He gets home a bit after five again. (No bodies today, just paperwork. Officially, he got an anonymous tip as to where the LAV-25 was. He figures that Leon won’t blink at that.)

When he opens the door, a tiny ball of floppy-eared fluff comes running up to him, and attempts to climb his leg. Tony very gently picks this little thing up, holds him, firmly, because he’s trying to leap off of his hand and start licking his face, and says, “I take it you’re Jackson.”

Some excited yipping follows that, along with Gibbs heading out of the kitchen.

“Heingh you. Rule number three: only bark when you need attention. You’ve got it right now.” He Tony very gently taps the back of Jackson’s head (with the pad of his index finger) and Jackson hushes up. “Good boy.” Then he gently rubs Jackson’s ears.

Tony’s about to start laughing hysterically at this. He doesn’t because he’s afraid if he drops Jackson he’ll get really hurt. So he gently puts him down, and Jackson, once down there, scampers over to Gibbs, and sits on his foot.

“He’s so small,” Tony says with a laugh. “That’s… You said he was small, but… That’s not a dog… That’s a… guinea pig.” Tony’s giggling away. He knows one thing he’s going to do that’ll make him feel good. Later tonight, he’s getting online and finding one of those dog carrying purses that people like Paris Hilton have, and getting a pink, personalized one for Gibbs.

Gibbs nods. He has indeed gotten himself a tiny, high-energy, affectionate, vaguely-dog-shaped sort of thing, that could, in time, with some serious growing, become a dog. “Yeah. Smart though. He’s got my place down, and yours, and, before you were here, he was hanging out under Dave’s crib, keeping watch.”

Tony reaches down to stroke Jackson’s ears. “Good job, little man. Keep the babies in sight.”

Jackson looks pleased at that.

Tony sniffs, good smells are coming out of the kitchen, and Gibbs is heading back in there, Jackson frisking about around his feet, so he follows.

Gibbs has apparently gotten a heads up on the food situation because there’s a big bowl of roasted veggies sitting next to some steaks. Good looking steaks. Tony’s stomach rumbles some. He hasn’t been hungry since lunch, his body isn’t asking him for more food in its usual way, but it is begging him for some sugar.

He’s told it no.

Gibbs smiles at him, and nods, offering what support he can. “They’re just resting for a few minutes.”

“The steaks or my crew?”

Gibbs nods.

Tony’s really looking at Gibbs. None of his hair is dark anymore. All of it has gone gray. His face is wrinkled and his jaw is starting to sag. He didn’t eat everything that wasn’t nailed down since they got out of DC, but he put a fairly decent-sized dent in it, and it shows in the fullness of his face, and the roundness of his belly.

With his shoulder banged up, and his lung unhappy with him, he hasn’t been exercising hard. Well, he exercises as hard as he can, but that’s not the running he was doing before.

“Twenty-five pounds more than this time last year,” Tony says, also remembering that this time last year was right before his last, let’s get in shape attempt. “You?’

Gibbs shakes his head. “Don’t know. Don’t want to know. New pants don’t fit anymore.”

Tony nods. “We’re old. We’re not going to get any less old anytime soon.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. Both of them have gotten past any reasonable approximation of middle-aged.
“But, we’re getting you married in seven months, and I’ll be damned if the WonderTwins are going to be the only ones looking hot in a tux.”

Gibbs starts to laugh at that. “You’re getting in shape, and you’re dragging me along for the ride.”

Tony nods. “You game?”

Gibbs looks down at himself, and then he nods. “Yeah. I’ll get in a bit earlier tomorrow, and we’ll take the dogs, and Dave if he’s up, and get a walk, maybe jog some.”

“Palmer was talking about mowing the backyard, getting some ball gear, and playing.”

Gibbs flexes his shoulder. “Probably something I need to be doing. Ziver’d want to join the catch, too.”

“She would. Blanket on the grass, let the little guys chill out in the shade, throw a ball and run around some. Sound like fun?”

Gibbs smiles at that. “Yeah, it does.”

The last thing Tony does before getting ready to go to bed is sit at his piano. He’s got Dave in his snuggli, pressed against his chest. He strokes the keys for a moment. His fingers feel a bit stiff, it’s been a long time since he’s done this.

He spends a moment fooling around with a few soft medleys. Dave seems to like it. If a newborn can look pleased, he looks pleased.

Then he gets into it, fingers finding the keys and rhythm. “Your grandmother used to sing this to me,” he says as he begins to hum the theme to “Drift Away” while he plays it softly on the piano.

And, yes, it feels good. He still wants a glass of wine, or a pile of pasta, but this is… okay.

Good enough, for right now.

Dave chirps at him, and that look on his face might be a smile, and that’s much better than okay.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Nope, I’m not going to cheat you on Jackson coming home. It’s next chapter. When is next chapter coming up? Good question. It’s summer, so the kiddos are home, which slows down my writing, and next week we’re going on a nine-day long adventure to Wyoming, where Grandpa lives. I hope to have some writing time, but I don’t know how much.

Anyway, if I go silent, that’s what’s up. My pale, tender-footed, East-coast self is heading out West. If you follow me on twitter, @KerylRaist, you can get pictures.
“Okay, now you’re going to behave, right?” Gibbs says to Mona, as they’re sitting in his truck, in front of Patty’s house. “This is another dog’s territory, and you are a guest, got it?”

Mona shoots him a Have I ever disappointed you? look.

He pats her head. “No, you haven’t. Let’s go get our probie.”

Mona is immensely chill. The yapping storm of tiny furballs around her, aren’t. But, Gibbs figured that letting Jackson meet her on his territory, rather than just dumping him into hers, was a good first move.

After a few moments of removing Papillion puppies and their mamas from the living room, it’s just Jackson, Gibbs, and Mona.

Mona had been standing up when the swarm of little guys had been running around her, but once they’re gone, she lays down.

Jackson, who had been staring up at her, starts to come closer. With all of his brothers and sisters, he was fine with running around Mona, on his own, he’s a lot more cautious.

Gibbs hovers nearby, ready to lunge in and grab Jackson if need be, but hoping they can sort this out on their own.

Jackson closes the gap, and keeps watching Mona as he begins sniffing around her. Mona lifts her head and watches as this tiny ball of puppy circles around her, sniffing her all over. Once he gets back to her head, she cocks her head, and then licks him.

It staggers Jackson, and he’s got to sit back on his haunches to brace for it, but he seems to think it’s good, because once Mona’s let go of him, he springs back up and starts trying to climb her.

“It’s for a good cause. They all start out young.”

Woof.

Gibbs translates that as If you say so, but I’m humoring you.

He gently grabs Jackson, who’s standing on Mona’s back, tugging on her ear, and holds him up so he’s looking him right in the eye. “We’ve got rules, Jackson,” he’d like to call him Probie, but he figures that would just confuse him. “Rule number one: Don’t annoy your partner. Mona there, she’s your partner. She’s gonna show you how to behave. You watch her, and you do what she does.”

Jackson yips.

Jethro gently pets the top of his head with just the tips of his fingers. “Good boy. You ready to come home?”

What that question’s worth to a puppy who’s entire understanding of the world is three rooms in one house, Gibbs doesn’t know, but Jackson looks ready for the adventure.

“The Adventure” begins a bit rocky.

There are certain things Gibbs just doesn’t think about, and getting into his truck is one of them. He opens the door, Mona goes bounding in and…

Oh, right. Little guy is two pounds and four inches tall at his shoulder. He’s not bounding into anything. He looks up at the truck, and goes sprinting under it, running around with abandon, sniffing everything.

Mona looks at Gibbs, and then, if a dog could roll her eyes, she’s just about to do it, before hopping back out of the truck, corralling Jackson with a loud woof, and then (and this has Gibbs lunging for them before he realizes what he’s seeing) she picks him up by the scruff, and plops him into the truck.

On the floor.

In front of the seat.

The seat is hers, and she’s not sharing it with him.

And then, because Gibbs was aware of the fact that he couldn’t just plop a tiny puppy in the front seat of a truck, she picks up the little, towel-lined box he got for Jackson to travel in, and drops that on the floor next to him.

Gibbs decides that she’s made her lines awfully clear, and for right now, with Jackson having a fine old time investigating the floor of the truck, he’s good with maintaining those boundaries.

Might shake them up a bit later, but not right now.

For a second, it looks like Jackson’s in danger of attempting to “mark” the floor of the truck as his territory. Gibbs quickly gets him into that box. “Rule number two Jackson: The bathroom is outside.”

Jackson yips with excitement, does not pee in the box, and then spends the next moment hopping up and down, sniffing the entire box, before he stops, dead, yipping even more, when Gibbs turns the truck on.

“This is a truck,” Gibbs says. “It moves from place to place. You’re going to go in a lot of things that move all over the place.”

Jackson keeps yipping, and Gibbs has an epiphany.

He puts the truck back in park. (As of this point, he has successfully pulled out of the driveway.) Then he leans over and picks Jackson up again. “Rule number three, Jackson, only bark when you need attention. Right now, you’re fine.”

Jackson barks.

Gibbs isn’t sure if he’s agreeing or not, so he gives him a tiny bop on the top of his head. “Only when you need attention.”

This time Jackson doesn’t bark. Gibbs lavishly pets the top of his head. “Good boy.”
“Okay, this is your new home. Right now, we’re going to start with the kitchen and the backyard. You get to go explore as much as you like.”

Gibbs had blocked off the kitchen from the rest of the house. He wants to let Jackson get settled a bit at a time, and he really wants him to get the idea of where the bathroom is, as quickly as possible.

Mona came to him already trained.

Jackson’s about as reliable as Molly is. He’s got the basic idea down, but… If he gets excited, or he’s in a new place, both of which are true, accidents are going to happen. Add in the fact that he’s got a bladder that’s literally the size of a thimble, and Gibbs expects to be doing a lot of cleaning in the not wildly distant future.

So, there is sniffing. Jackson locates his food and water bowls, and happily chows down. He locates Mona’s bowl, and almost gives it a look before Mona growls at him, and he decides to stay away from that.

More sniffing, more walking around. He’s getting a feel for it. He sees Mona head out the doggy door, and looks to Gibbs.

“You can go out.”

So, he scampers over to it, puts his head against it like Mona did, presses, and… Nothing.

Gibbs sighs. The tension on the door can be changed. He’s got it a bit stiff because he doesn’t want the heat running out or the wind blowing cold in, but he’s got it set so stiff that little guy can’t open it.

“So, this time, I get it for you.” He opens the door, and out Jackson goes.

And for the rest of the afternoon, Jackson explores the backyard and kitchen, and Gibbs re-does the door, getting it set so Jackson can get in and out.

“You got him?” Abbi asks as she steps into their home. Then she spots the ball of fluff and floppy ears who’s leaping up against the small blockade Gibbs has in the kitchen, trying to see the new voice. She certainly hears the yipping.

Gibbs stands up from the chair he’s been reading in. He hugs Abbi, gives her a quick kiss, and takes her over to the kitchen.

Jackson keeps yipping as they head over, and once they’ve stepped over, and he’s still yipping, Gibbs picks him up and says, “Rule Number Three Jackson: no yipping unless you need attention.” He gives him another gentle bop. “You’ve got our attention. Time to quiet down.”

Jackson quiets down, and Gibbs follows up with “Good boy!” and gentle petting. Then he hands him over to Abbi. “Jackson, this is Abbi. She lives here, too.”

Abbi’s holding him up, trying to look him in the face, and he’s trying to leap around, out of her hands, and lick her face.
“This is going to work better on the floor, isn’t it?”

Gibbs nods at that. In some ways, this is a lot like playing with the girls. The world is a whole lot shorter, and more carpet/tile oriented. His knees are less than pleased, and his shoulder hasn’t loved the amount of grabbing onto things to lift himself up and down, and he’s told them all to stuff it. Up and down is necessary, so it’s going to happen.

He sits down, and she lies down, and like with Mona, Jackson circles around, sniffing at her, before he gets up to her face and starts licking.

“Hello to you, too,” Abbi says, grinning. “He’s even smaller than I imagined.”

“Full grown he’ll be eight to ten inches at the shoulder. Tiny for us, but… For a six-or-seven-year-old…”

Abbi can see that. Right now, this is a perfect-sized dog for Molly. Not that there’s any chance that Jackson and Molly will be getting any time alone. That’s a disaster waiting to happen, but with the grown-ups watching…

“How’s Mona doing?”

She looks up from her place in front of the fireplace and woofs.

“Reminding me a lot of how I felt when we first worked with Tim. Suddenly there’s a very young, enthusiastic thing roaming around her territory, trying to be helpful, occasionally peeing on the floor. We’re teaching him the rules.”

Jackson curls up on Abbi’s shoulder and licks her ear. “So, I noticed. Rule Number Three?”

“Only bark when you need attention. Not sure if this’ll be a rule for all of them, but Phalenes tend to be yappy, and that can’t be good for something that’s got to go to schools and businesses and everywhere else. Can’t have him barking up a storm in church.”

“Rule number two?”

“Bathroom’s outside.”

“And one?”

“Don’t annoy your partner.”

She smiles at them. “Any more?”

“I’ll think ‘em up when I need it.”

Abbi laughs at that.

After dinnertime, Jackson’s looking pretty tired, and he keeps going back to the door. If a puppy can signal by body language, “Ok, this was fun, but I’d like to go home now,” he’s doing it.

Abbi picks him up, and snuggles him, and he’s okay with that, but he keeps looking at the door.

“This is home now, Jackson,” Gibbs says, petting him.
Jackson whines.

“Yeah.” Abbi strokes his head. “I felt like that my first night in the Marines. It’ll get better. A year with us, maybe another year with us, or with another trainer, and then we’ll find your forever home.”

He’s still whining.

Abbi looks at Gibbs. He shrugs back. He’s got a lot of ideas for how to socialize a puppy. He’s done a decent amount of research on how to train them. How to comfort one that’s missing his pack… That’s a different kettle of fish.

He pets Jackson.

And if a crying baby is nerve-wracking, because you don’t know what it wants, a crying puppy, who is crying because he’s lonely, is killing both of them.

Mona woofs up at them, and they put Jackson down where she can get him. She nuzzles him, licks him a few times, grabs him by his scruff again, and takes him to her bed. She plops him down, and then curls around him.

He doesn’t stop whining, not completely, but it does slow down, and after a bit, he falls asleep.

Mona looks up at her people. She yawns, licks the puppy at her side, and then plops her head down. It’s bedtime for her, too.

Abbi watches that. “You think she had her own puppies at one time?”

“Rescue never said, but right now, I’d bet on it.”

Day two of Hearing Ear Dog socialization goes a little smoother.

Okay, maybe not, but when Gibbs wakes up, Jackson isn’t actively crying, so he’ll chalk that up as a win.

“We have a routine here,” he says, as he’s making breakfast for himself and Abbi. “First off, food.” Mona’s got her big bowl of kibble. Jackson’s got his tiny one. Gibbs is standing at the stove, whisking up eggs as his frying pan heats. A minute from now, he’ll get the English muffins out for toasting.

The sound of happy doggy chewing accompanies the sizzle of eggs in the pan.

Both Mona and Jackson are fast eaters, so they get done well before Gibbs is ready to take his eggs off the heat.

“Step two: outside.” He shoos Jackson out after Mona. This time, Jackson butts his head against the doggie door, and it opens. He cautiously heads out, and yips a bit when the door swings out and swats him on the tail. Gibbs decides that’s an allowable yip and ignores it.

“What’s on for today?” he asks Abbi a few moments later when she’s down.

“Research. I got my official summons to testify before Congress, and a copy of what the first level of questions are going to be. They want me up there next Monday, so right now, I’m prepping.”

“How long are you going to be in New York?”

She shrugs. “If it’s more than a week, I’m hitching a ride home with Penny and Ducky for the weekends.”

“How many questions?”

That gets a groan. “Fourteen pages, and that’s the first level. Half of it’s crap I already testified about when we thought it was just CGIS. I have to submit all my documents by Friday. Testifying starts on Monday, and they’re probably going to ask follow up questions for all of it.”

Gibbs grits his teeth. He doesn’t want her gone for weeks at a time.

She nods. “I know. They’re putting me up in a nice place. Come visit. Abby’d be happy to take the dogs for a bit.”

Gibbs knows that’s true, but he’s also not sure how much the rest of the McPalmers want a tiny puppy to go with a three-month-old, three toddlers, and a morning sick mama. Then he thinks about how long he wants to sleep in an empty bed.

“You’re up there too long, and I will.”

After Abbi heads off, it’s time for part two of Jethro’s day, and a new adventure for Jackson.

Upstairs.

This time, because he saw how well getting Jackson into the truck worked, Gibbs knows to scoop him up and just carry him up the stairs. It’s not that his steps are particularly high, but if you’re four inches tall at your shoulder, an eight-inch step might as well be a mountain.

He puts his baby gate up at the top of the steps, figuring it’d make sure Jackson wouldn’t try to get down the steps intentionally, or unintentionally. Gibbs doesn’t want to see him get running on the hardwood floor and find out that his little claws won’t stop him on a hardwood floor and go skittering off of the steps.

“Okay, go explore. When you get bigger, I’ll take the gate down, but right now, it’s making sure you don’t go off the edge.”

When he gets out of the shower, he sees two sets of eyes staring up at him from identical sitting positions on the bathroom floor. Big brown ones from about waist high, and little blue ones from about shin high.

“I take it you’re ready to start the day?”

Mona woofs. She knows it’s okay to bark when asked a direct question. Jackson watches her, notices she doesn’t get a repeat of rule number three, and then yips.

“Okay, let me get some clothing on, and then we’ll go see Ziva and Dave.”

Mona looks pleased and trots out of the bathroom. Jackson has no idea what a Ziva or Dave may be, but he follows her, and then continues to explore the upstairs.
Officially, pets are not allowed in Ziva and Tony’s building. But, when Mrs. Elthel met Mona for the first time, she made an exception. Especially because Mona doesn’t live at the DiNozzo’s place.

Gibbs didn’t ask if Jackson could come. He did tell her that he was expanding his pack, and why, and she thought that was a good plan.

He does keep both of them on a leash when he’s heading into the building. They can go off leash when they get into Tony and Ziva’s.

Mona leads the way. She knows where she’s going. Specifically, she’s going to say hello to Mrs. Elthel, who is, like usual, outside of the building, working on fixing it back up. She’s been pulling all of the rocks, rubble, and litter out of her flower beds and putting new dirt back into them. As she put it when she started, back in November, “This was a nice place, and it’s going to be a nice place again. I didn’t sneak out of Russia to let a bunch of hoodlums wreck my home.”

And today, six months later, she’s got most of the windows replaced (she’s fixing them as fast as she can get glass, which is still a slow process in DC), all of the graffiti scrubbed off, the trash cleaned up, two new doors in (also hard to get in DC), and all of her flower boxes replaced. Now it’s time to fill them with plants.

She’s planting pink and white begonia bulbs when Mona comes over to her and gives her a gentle nuzzle. “Well, hello you.” She pulls off her gloves and gives Mona a warm welcome. “And who do you have here?” she asks when Jackson comes up to say hello, also.

She looks up at Gibbs. “This is your new mission?”

He nods. “This is Jackson.”

She stares at Jackson, and then looks up to Gibbs, and starts to laugh. “I am sorry, he’s just… so cute!”

Gibbs looks irked and nods. “Yeah, he is.”

“And tiny!”

“Oh huh.”

She pets him, smiling. Then she pats Mona again. “Are you enjoying having a little brother?”

“More like baby, but she seems to be settling in.”

Mrs. Elthel pets Mona again. “Good mama. Speaking of which, you are here for Ziva and Dave?”

“Let her get some more rest. Get him out for a walk or something.”

“That is good. New mothers need rest.”

Gibbs nods, and takes a step, Mona follows, and Jackson, a beat later, realizing that he’s not supposed to be sniffing at the bulbs, follows, too.
Dave is sleeping, but Ziva’s up, and eating breakfast, when Gibbs lets himself in. She would, if later asked, blame what happened next entirely on the post-pregnancy hormones.

Mona leads the way, and Jackson follows, and she finds herself staring at this tiny ball of flop-eared fluffy cuteness, staring up at her with big blue eyes, and a little, bitty cocked head, studying her, and she… squee’d.

This high-pitched squeal of pleasure at the adorable, little ball of fluff came pouring out before she could stop it.

Abby would have been proud.

Ziva, as soon as she’s scooped Jackson up to cuddle him, notices that Jethro’s in the room, and immediately says, “That did not happen.”

He nods. “I heard nothing. Jackson and Mona didn’t, either.”

“How is training going?”

Gibbs nods. He pats Mona. “She’s doing a great job of showing him the ropes.” Mona looks pleased at being acknowledged. She’s a bit annoyed that Ziva, who is usually one of her two biggest fans, hasn’t given her her usual lovey reception, but she’s gratified that Gibbs remembers.

Ziva puts Jackson down and gives Mona the petting she usually gets when she comes over. “I didn’t not forget you.”

“And Jackson’s picking up the ropes fast.”

“Excellent.”

“So, what do you need today?”

“Five hours of uninterrupted sleep and groceries.”

“Don’t think I can get you the former, but I can do the latter.”

“That will be enough.”

It’s a few days later before she’s got the time to play with the color and light balance to get the shot the way she likes it, but everyone in the crew appreciates the photo she eventually sends out of Gibbs with the stroller, Dave in the main compartment, Jackson riding on the little shelf under it, and Mona strolling next to them.
Get in better shape. Gibbs sighs, pokes his belly, and sighs again.

Tony’s not wrong about that being a good idea.

Abbi hasn’t made any comments to him about his expanding waistline, but he knows she’s noticed. Hell, like him, she got out of DC and ate everything she could, too.

But, by New Year’s she cut it out. (If asked, she wouldn’t admit it, but getting into a wedding dress had a lot to do with that.) And by New Year’s she also got back to her full, regular exercise routine. Which Gibbs has gone along for as much as he can, but...

But his back is still not working quite right, and his arm isn’t as strong as it used to be, and his wind isn’t up to running with Abbi, and he feels like he’s dragging her down when he goes along.

So, instead of running with her, he’s been walking on his own, and it’s better than nothing, and his wind is better than it was, but he’s not running one mile, let alone five, and swimming… That’s just not happening. His lungs are unhappy enough on dry land, adding water into the mix just makes it harder.

Instead of his usual outfit of cargo pants and work boots, Gibbs grabs shorts and sneakers, as he gets ready to get out of the house earlier than usual to catch Tony for day one of: Do Better.

Ziva’s sleeping, but Dave is up when Gibbs gets there. Tony’s wrapping up breakfast. Gibbs raises an eyebrow at it, and Tony says, “According to Jimmy, I can have eggs, cheese, butter, and stuff like that…”

Gibbs looks at the plate. “Might want to get some ideas of portion size, too.”

“Four eggs can’t be too many. He’ll have three with all of his bunny food on the weekends. And bacon or sausage.”

Gibbs nods, that’s true. “You got bunny food for lunch?” (Which is why Gibbs thinks Jimmy’s breakfast on the weekends tends not to be an issue.)

Tony nods. “Yeah, and added more stuff to the grocery list for the week. Green, leafy veggies and stuff like that. Ziva was practically glowing at it when I got talking about it.” He opens the fridge and points to a water bottle full of green stuff. “She’s making me snack smoothies. That’s got like, spinach and kale and God knows what else in it.”

“That stuff Draga gave her. We put that in all of her smoothies, too.”

“Great.” Tony sighs. He pats Mona and Jackson, and peels Dave out of Jethro’s hands. “We running?”

“Or something.”

Mona has no problem keeping pace with Jethro and Tony. They’re not exactly running, or jogging, a bit too slow for either of those gaits, but faster than walking. Loping, probably.

She’s eating up the sidewalk next to them, looking awfully pleased to be out and running around.

Dave had a really good time in his stroller, watching everything, getting pushed a whole lot faster than he usually goes. He’s gurgling in a very pleased sort of way, for about ten minutes, until a slightly bumpy, fast-paced stroll puts him out like a light.

Jackson is having less fun.

The first block was awesome. He got to run full out, which he adores. For a little while, he was leading the way. Block two, he’s pacing them, starting to get tired. Block three… There’s only so fast and so long a puppy can go.

When Jethro feels like he’s dragging Jackson, he scoops him up and puts him in the stroller with Dave.

Dave gurgles at that, too. As much as a newborn can like anything, he seems to like Jackson. Jackson sits next to Dave, front paws on the bar across the front of the stroller, looking like a tiny masthead on the prow of the USS Dave’s Stroller.

And so they go for a two mile walk/jog/lope, Jackson running along them for about three blocks of it.

Gibbs is breathing hard, and both of them are sweating when they’re done. Tony checks his watch. “Twenty-four seven.”

Gibbs nods. “Tomorrow we do it under twenty-three thirty.”

Tony nods. That’s a goal he can get behind.

When they get upstairs, they put both the human puppy, and the dog puppy, to lay down for a good long nap.

---

The next day, Jackson gets to meet the McPalmers.

Quick visit. It’s getting onto dinner time, and Gibbs doesn’t want to interrupt anything too much.

Breena, Abby, and the kids are home. Tim and Jimmy should be home, with food, within an hour.

Abby also squees with joy, and Breena grins, really grins, like for a moment she’s feeling okay, as they see the little guy with his much bigger partner.

But, it’s the moment when Molly notices something’s up, and heads over to see what her Mama and Aunt are paying so much attention to, that steals the show. Her eyes go wide, and then light up. “Doggy! Baby Doggy!”

“This is Jackson, Molly.” Breena’s got Jackson on her lap. “Hold your hand out and come closer.”

Molly does, creeping closer, huge smile on her face. Abby’s got a hand on Molly, making sure she doesn’t go lunging for their newest family member. Jackson quivering on Breena’s lap, ready to leap up and lick Molly.

He settles for sniffing her hand once, and then slobbering all over her. She starts to laugh. “He’s soft!” He licks her more. “MY DOGGY!”

“Uncle Jethro’s doggy.”

“MINE!”
Abby lifts her up to sit between her and Breena on the sofa. And Breena lets Jackson scamper over to Molly’s lap. Kelly’s starting to notice something is up, and is toddling her way over, too. Jackson’s leaping up and down on Molly, licking her face, while Molly giggles with delight.

Kelly comes over. Dog she signs.

This is j-a-c-k-s-o-n. “Jackson,” Abby says, lifting her up and scooting over a bit so she can sit next to Molly. “Very gentle, both of you. He’s a very little puppy, and you could hurt him and not mean to.”

Jackson, noticing that someone new has joined the party, yips happily, and hops off of Molly to Kelly, licking her. Kelly starts to laugh. Molly starts to cry because Jackson’s paying attention to Kelly, and Abby and Breena glance at each other, and then Gibbs.

“Molly, stop that. He’s less than a foot away from you.” Breena reaches Molly’s hand out so she can pet Jackson while he’s in Kelly’s lap.

Molly stops crying, but she’s not looking thrilled at sharing. She’s alternating between glaring at Kelly and patting Jackson.

Kelly, having been licked about ten times by Jackson, decides to lick him back, and then spends the next few minutes making sounds along the likes of ‘ack’ ‘ick’ and ‘blrgh’ trying to get the fur off of her tongue.

Or, as Tim says to Jimmy as they walk into this maelstrom, “Situation normal: loud and crazy.”

Jimmy’s heading over to sit on the floor next to the sofa, in front of the girls, and says to Jethro, “A man walks into a room with a dog like that, and you know he’s fearless.”

Jimmy does get a headslap for that. Jimmy grins his smartass grin, and holds out a hand to Jackson, while kissing all four of the girls.

Jackson’s almost in excited-overload mode, this is too many new people, too fast, and he’s starting to go from good excited to meltdown excited.

Abby’s mommy sense catches that, and she hands Jackson to Jimmy. “Upstairs, maybe?”

Jimmy usually changes out of his work clothing when he gets home, even on days without bodies, he doesn’t like to smell like work when he’s home, so that’s not a problem.

“Come on Jackson, let’s see the rest of the house.”

He’s yipping like a banshee, and Gibbs takes him from Jimmy, planning on heading up with them. No need to dump Jackson in a strange place with a stranger. He holds Jackson, nice and snug, keeping him against his chest, and says, “Three, Jackson.”

Jackson tries to stop yipping, he holds his quiet for a good thirty seconds, but everything is too new, and too much, and he starts yipping again as soon as they get up the stairs.

Gibbs doesn’t give him a little smack. He just holds him snug, and tries to radiate calm. “That was too much too fast.”

Jimmy nods at Gibbs, and then gently strokes Jackson. “It’s hard to be a little guy in a new place and behave. Same reason why we don’t toss the girls in the deep end and expect them to be perfect.” He looks up to Gibbs. “You staying for dinner? Might want to keep him up here if you are.”
Gibbs knows that dinner with this crew is, at best, chaotic.

“Abbi’s supposed to be getting home tonight. I’m feeding her.”

“Good. Tony told me you two went jogging.”

Gibbs nods at that.

“Good?”

He inclines his head a bit, indicating it was okay.

Jimmy steps into his room, waving Gibbs in, and starts to pull off his shirt. “Use words. I don’t know what exactly about what you were doing didn’t work for you.”

“Annoyed at how slow and out of breath I am.”

“You hurt yourself?”

Gibbs shakes his head, and then adds, “Sore, worked hard sore, not injured sore.”

“Put ice on it, anyway. I’ll tell you the same thing I told Tony, don’t run tomorrow. Do something else. Different muscles. Let whatever you hurt rest, and give something else a workout tomorrow. Abs and arms is a good plan. Alternate it until you can run without getting sore, and then start doing that every day. I gave Tony a list of videos Tim was working out with when his arm was healing up. They might be a bit easy for your shoulder, but it’s a good starting place.”

Gibbs nods along with that, feeling a sense of… trepidation isn’t quite it. He’s not really scared or annoyed, but he knows that whatever the hell it is Jimmy’s got on that video, he and Tony’ll have a good time bitching about it.

In a quieter place, with only two voices, and a steady, calm heart beating against him, Jackson’s calming back down again.

He’s starting to look around again, and trying to squirm away from Gibbs, wanting to explore. Jimmy sees him doing it, and nods. “You can put him down.”

On the floor, Jackson scampers over to Jimmy, and Jimmy kneels down, and holds out his hand. Jackson sniffs him all over, and starts licking his fingers. “You’re a very friendly little guy, aren’t you?”

“He is.”

Jimmy lays his hand flat on the floor, and Jackson steps onto it, letting himself be lifted. Jimmy keeps him a few inches from his face. “No licking me. I’ll pet you all you want, but I don’t want to be slobbered on.”

Jackson yips, and Jimmy pets him. “Good boy.” He puts him back down, and gets into his laying around at home clothing. While he’s doing that, Tim comes up.

“Hey, food’s on plates.”

“Be down in a sec. Contacts.” Jimmy heads into the bathroom to swap out his glasses for his contacts, and Tim sits down on the floor, next to Jackson.

“Hello.” Jackson, who had been about to follow Jimmy, notices yet another new person and changes direction to say hello. Tim’s petting him, and rubbing the top of his head with one finger, when he says to Gibbs, “How’s it going?”

“Pretty well. We’re getting settled in.”

“Good.” He picks up Jackson, letting him lick his face. “Good doggie.” He pets him again. “You’ve got a big job ahead. You’re giving my dad a mission, again.” He looks up at Gibbs and smiles at him, the first time either of them have explicitly said anything about how this isn’t just about helping kids out. Then he looks back to Jackson. “And one day, you’ll be helping someone like my son. That’s a lot on your plate, and it’s going to be hard, but you’re going to be great at it.”

Jackson yips at that. Tim pets him again.

On Thursday, Abby stops over at Gibbs place with a little present for Jackson.

Gibbs is on the back porch, reading his paper, drinking some coffee, playing toss with both of the dogs. Mona’s got a tennis ball. Jackson has a ping pong ball (and Gibbs is thinking if he can find a smaller ball, he needs to get one). He’ll toss Mona’s, and she goes tearing off after it. Jackson’s ball, he balances on his palm, and flicks with his finger, sending it skittering off.

Both doggies are loving it.

Abby spends a moment watching the three of them playing. “You’re looking happy.”

“I’m feeling good.”

“How’re they doing with the woodworking?”

“Mona’s fine with it. Jackson sneezes when he’s down there. He stays up here when I’m sanding.”

Abby smiles at that, sitting next to Gibbs, taking the tennis ball from Mona to throw it. When Jackson skitters up with his little ball, she picks him up and pulls something out of her bag.

It’s a little vest that goes over Jackson’s shoulders and back. It’s black (of course) and has “Probationary Service Dog” written on it.

“Service dogs usually have something like this. Just needed to make one small enough for him.”

Jackson keeps trying to circle around and see what’s on his back. Abby takes it off so he can investigate it properly. He sniffs it, barks at it, chews on it a little, and decides it’s okay. Abby puts it back on him.

“You wear that like a crown, little boy. That tells the world that you’re a very special doggy with a very special mission.”

He stands in front of her, all two pounds of him, head high, ears alert, tail whipping back and forth, and basks in the petting he’s getting.

By Friday night, Gibbs has come to a few conclusions:
A: Jimmy’s a freaking sadist. Arms and abs… Yeah… He hasn’t felt that battered since day one of the Marines when he got to enjoy “calisthenics” for the first time. He’s got the suspicion that when Jimmy gets a hold of him over the weekend, and then “tailors” things to his shoulder and lung capacity, it’s not going to get any easier.

B: Bitching about it with Tony is fun. In fact, having someone to bitch about this with makes it a lot easier for both of them. And for as annoying as Tony moaning about things when he was the one telling Tony to do it was, when someone else is giving the orders, Tony moaning about it is awfully entertaining.

It occurs to him, as they’re wrapping up one-armed side planks, and Tony’s grousing about how he could at least sort of understand doing it one-handed when you’re stomach down (“After all, there might be a woman under you, and then you’d have something to do with that hand, but this… This is useless! When are you ever going to need to hover on one hand and one foot? Even Palmer isn’t enough of a pervert to come up with something where this’ll be handy!) that he and Tony have moved fully out of “Boss” and “DiNozzo” into friends.

C: Dogs are dogs. Little bitty ones, very big ones, they all want to be petted and praised by the alpha, which is him. Jackson is doing very well with easy, specific instructions, lots of petting for obeying, and a little bop on the head and a no, for not obeying.

He’s got a good feeling about this. Something he hasn’t felt since the last time he was working a job with his team. This satisfies the little voice that needs to have a goal, a vision for how to get there, and good people, well dogs, to get there with.

And D: It’s been a good week.

On Saturday, when he’s outside, in the backyard, watching the boys mow the grass down low enough so they won’t lose the kids or Jackson in it, as he and Ziva get the baseball gloves out, oiling them up, getting them ready for some play, he’s thinking this next week will be even better.
Supposedly, normally, for the “average pregnancy” (if such a thing exists, and Breena truly doubts it does) morning sickness ends ‘round-about’ week twelve. In that it’s the beginning of May, Breena is officially fifteen weeks along.

In that she’s never gotten it to go away a day before week eighteen (Jon), and it lasted to week twenty with both of the girls, Breena expects it to go at least that long this time, too.

So, she’s more than pleasantly surprised to wake up and not feel like complete and utter shit.

She also doesn’t trust it. Her first thought is that it’s a fluke, and that she’ll stretch or move or something and all of the nausea will come slamming back into her.

But it doesn’t. She gets up, and the room doesn’t spin, and her head doesn’t hurt, and her stomach doesn’t lurch. She goes downstairs, and the smell of breakfast doesn’t make her want to retch.

And that freaks her out. She goes running back upstairs. In other circumstances, this would alarm her spouses, but they assume breakfast is making her retch. She’s actually running back upstairs to see if they’ve got an extra pregnancy test lurking around. (They do.)

She’s already peed, but she manages to get an extra teaspoon out, and waits, on the verge of hysterical, to see if she’s still pregnant.

Because that’s something she remembers from Jon. She stopped feeling nauseous a few days before the ultrasound. At the time, she thought she’d just hit the end of morning sickness and had been really glad to see it come.

Afterward, she realized that’s when she’d lost Jon. No living baby means no more pregnancy hormones. And once those hormones go away, so does the morning sickness.

So she holds the test, hands shaking, praying hard, for the longest minute ever.

It flickers up at her, and the word positive pops up, sending a hot rush of relief through Breena.

So… Maybe… It could be… This is a normal-ish pregnancy?

Breena doesn’t say anything about it that morning. She doesn’t want to jinx it. But… As morning wears on, and lunch time goes whizzing by, and lunch is actual food, granted, bland, easy food, she hasn’t had a real, full meal in weeks, so she’s not about to run off and get a burger and fries first thing… (Though, God, a big, thick, juicy burger with lots of lettuce, and pickles, and a huge stack of hot, salty, crispy fries right next to it, maybe with a brownie, with vanilla ice cream, and hot fudge sauce, and some cherries, and…) It’s possible that Breena is genuinely feeling better as she’s fantasying her way through the meal she wants as she actually eats a bowl of chicken soup, with some rye bread toast, and an apple.

Her dad sees her slurping down the soup with a lot more speed than usual, and quickly goes through his memory of the earlier part of the day, where they did the heavy lifting on one embalming and the makeup for three of their guests, and rapidly comes to the conclusion that at no point did Breena leave the mortuary, nor did her trusty waste basket get any use.

“You’re feeling better.” He’s got a grin on his face.

She holds up crossed fingers at him, while chewing. Then she knocks on the wooden table they’re sitting at.

He knocks on it, too, and grins at her, not saying another word about it, also not wanting to jinx it for her.

Tim’s the first of her spouses to get home, so he’s the first to notice something different is up.

Specifically, Breena is up. As in sitting up, at the kitchen table, working through her P&L statements for the quarter.

“Good nap?” he asks as he heads in and kisses her.

She grins up at him, and her kiss back actually has a little heat to it.

“Very good nap?”

She smiles. “You’re on dinner tonight?”

“I got the long straw. Jimmy’s getting your girls. Abby’s getting our kids, and I’m here to make some dinner. Why? Anything you want me to avoid tonight?”

“Nope!” She’s smiling.

“Extremely good nap?” Tim asks, wondering what’s up.

“Extremely good nap. Extremely good morning. I woke up feeling good, I still feel good, and right now, I’m hungry!”

Tim lights up at that. “Well then, what do you want?”

“Everything!”

He starts poking around in Jimmy and Breena’s fridge and pantry. “Don’t know about everything, but I’ve got what I need for grilled pork chops, corn on the cob, and salad.”

“Sounds amazing.”

He digs around in the freezer a moment longer, and comes out holding up a familiar canister of ice cream. “And we’ve still got a pint of the Ben and Jerry’s Chunky Monkey!”

Her eyes light up at that. “Oooo!”

And as he tells her about his day, and she tells him about his, he gets to making the pork chops.
Breena feeling better produces a generally celebratory sort of mood among the McPalmers. Certainly there is the general feeling of relief that she’s not hurting anymore, and that they’ll get to enjoy the rest of Donnie’s in utero-time.

There is also a much more specific level of celebration that Jimmy and Breena, who remember this from Molly and Anna’s pregnancies, are looking forward to, intensely.

Once the morning sickness backs off, pregnancy horniness comes into play, and it hits hard.

Like Jimmy said all those years ago at Tim’s bachelor party, first trimester, not so good for sex. Second trimester, oh yeah! Jimmy very fondly remembers several weekends of Molly’s pregnancy. One in particular, that still makes him smile, was when they found out exactly how many times he could get off before his dick just looked up at him and said, “Nope.” (Correct answer, eleven between end of work Friday, and bedtime, for sleeping, Sunday night.) And there was one especially good one of Anna’s where they basically found out how many times the quickie master could get Breena off in one naptime. (Correct answer, they don’t know. They both lost count. More than four, likely less than ten. It was an awfully good nap.)

And so, it is with this level of celebration in mind, and with her body rapidly swinging from wanting nothing at all, to wanting everything, all the time, that Breena wants to ask her men for something to celebrate with.

They’re getting ready for breakfast the next morning, all of them in the kitchen, in that not exactly calm or serene morning routine of juggling four children, breakfast, lunch-making and all the rest of it, when she says, “How would you guys feel about me taking some pictures of you.”

“Is this gender neutral guys, or do you mean the boys?” Abby asks.

“I was meaning the boys.” She smiles at Abby. “Hoping you’d help me get the pictures.” She’s got some ideas of how she wants the final images to work, but she’s not sure how to get those final images.

“I can do that, what are we shooting?”

Both Tim and Jimmy are happily smirking at this idea. Both ladies have taken some shots of them they immensely enjoyed posing for, and they are both eager to do that again.

“Remember when we did those pinup shots for them?”

Abby’s got a huge gleam in her eye as she settles Sean in for his breakfast nurse. “Oh yeah.” She’s eyeing both of the guys, who are suddenly realizing this might not exactly be the sort of pictures they were thinking about.

“So… would you want us to dress up?” Jimmy asks, sounding a bit tentative about that. Yeah, he did have a lot of fun the last time they got all dressed up and went out, but he’s wondering how self-conscious he’s going to feel about getting dressed up, and then standing around, posing for something like this.

Breena licks her lips, eyes tracing over Jimmy, who’s at the stove, cooking everyone’s morning eggs. “Well… maybe not dressed up.”

Abby’s also eyeing him, and then Tim, who is cutting up bananas for the kids, and then back to Jimmy, and back to Tim. “Yeah, probably not… costumes… per se. But… maybe not entirely naked, either.”
Breena shakes her head. “Not entirely naked. I have those pictures, and I love them. Just want something different. Something, seductive, not necessarily outright porn.”

“Both of us in our boxers, him in my lap, making out?” Tim asks. After all, that was his favorite part of that Valentine’s present. He certainly likes the pinups, too, but… The girls playing with each other hit a lot harder.

That gets some happy smiles, and then Breena says, “That might just be for kicks, after. I want to get you guys all pretty and then take your pictures. And then,” she grins at all three of them, and switches to sign and shifts a bit so Molly and Kelly can’t see what her hands are doing, she doesn’t want to explain what certain gestures mean, we’re going to fuck like crazy all night long.

And yes, there are certain things that may make Jimmy feel a bit self-conscious, but fucking like crazy all night long goes a long way toward soothing that.

“So, tonight?” Jimmy asks.

Breena shakes her head. “Friday or Saturday. I know where I want you, and that’s in our star-gazing room at the house.”

First Shabbos dinner since morning sickness set in, and Breena is eager for it.

She gets done with work at her usual time, 1:00, picks up the kids from daycare, and heads to the house. The girls fall asleep in the car on the ride over, so it is, with the traditional prayer of the parent of the sleeping baby, Breena carefully picks up Anna, and very gently takes her in.

Ziva and Jethro are already there, and he sees her carrying in sleeping child number one, and gets up to grab sleeping child number two.

After a moment of silent please, please, please STAY ASLEEP, where Anna opens her eyes, looks around a bit, and then decides, ‘nah, not worth it’ and shuts her eyes again, Breena’s ready for Shabbos.

She heads into the living room with Jethro, and sees Ziva sitting on the sofa, on feed number who knows what for Dave. She closes in, and kisses Ziva’s cheek. “How are you?”

Ziva looks up from Dave and sighs and says, “I now understand why when I asked Abby that when Kelly was little, she said, ‘Mooo.'”

Breena nods, sitting next to Ziva, petting Dave’s cheek. “Yep. I know you want to do this, and I don’t want this to come off as pressuring you, but, like I told her, if the ‘moo’ gets too much, you don’t have to do every single feed yourself.”

Ziva flashes her a tiny smile. “It is good to have options, but like you said, I want to do this.”

“Then I’m backing off.” She looks around a bit. Ziva and Dave on the sofa with her. Mona on the floor in front of the fireplace. Jethro’s in the kitchen… She raises her voice a little so Jethro knows she’s talking to him, “Are we missing a little guy? Where’s your baby?”

He’s out a minute later, with coffee for him, and decaf with lots of milk for Ziva. Breena sees it and “Just, hold up on that. I want some…” And goes to get herself a coffee, too.

When she’s back out, Gibbs and Ziva eye the cup in her hand, and then her, and then the cup again. “Yes, I’m feeling better. Been about four days now. Other than I want to eat everything in sight, and I plan to go crazy cooking in a few minutes, there’s not much to say about that. Okay, tell me about Jackson.”

Gibbs sips his coffee. He’s about to say he doesn’t know exactly where Jackson is, in the house, somewhere, but hearing his name, he comes scampering out of Ducky and Penny’s part of the house and tries to climb Breena for pets.

She does give him the affection he wants, and then sniffs. Pregnancy also means her sense of smell is on hyper-overdrive, but even if it wasn’t, his back paws are wet. “Someone had an accident.”

Gibbs winces and heads to the kitchen for cleaning supplies.

“Isn’t be the first time we’ve had baby pee on the floor,” Breena replies to his wince. “Certainly won’t be the last. Kelly’s been watching Molly use the potty, and she’s indicating she’s interested, too.”

“So, you are saying we should not go anywhere in this house barefoot anytime soon?” Ziva says with a smile.

“We’re going to start diaper-free time at one of our own places, first. Right now we’re just asking her if she wants to use it, a lot.”

“Any success?” Jethro asks, mopping up a small puddle on the fortunately hardwood-floored foyer. Then he takes Jackson to the sliding glass door between the living room and patio, and points to the doggie door next to it. “Number two: Bathroom is outside.” Jackson butts his head against it and heads out. Mona goes out with him, to make sure he doesn’t wander off.

“Heather had some. We’re mostly just spending a lot of time in the bathroom, reading potty stories.”

Ziva looks down at Dave. “Are you done?” He’s been slowing down, and his eyes are awfully droopy. He, obviously, doesn’t say anything, just gives her a slow, easy suck, and closes his eyes.

“That looks like a finished baby,” Jethro says, tossing out his paper towel and washing his hands. “Hand him over.”

Ziva does, getting herself tucked back into her clothing, and yawns.

Gibbs gives her the naptime for you look, and she nods. “I feel like I should be doing more.”

Breena shakes her head at that. “You are doing more than enough. You sleep and eat. Let us take care of you while you take care of him.”

Ziva nods, and then begins the trek up to her room. Sleeping sounds really good right now.

Jethro’s got Dave on his chest, gently patting him, as he and Breena head into the kitchen.

“What’s on the menu today?” she asks.
“Got a few chickens. Though we’d roast them up.”

Breena smiles at that. Then an idea hits. “What’s a few?”

“Four.”

That smile breaks into a full faced grin. They’ve got enough oven space and cast iron frying pans for this to work. “Potatoes, carrots, onions, too?”

“Turnips, too.”

“Mmm… Sounds good. How about we cut up the veg, put them in the frying pans, then cut up the chicken, rub it with spices, lay it on the veg, and cook them all together.”

Jethro nod, that sounds good to him. David finally lets go of the massive blech he’s been holding onto. Jethro kisses the top of his head and says, “I bet you’re feeling better now.”

Dave gurgles a bit.

“Uh huh. Okay, time to head up for your nap, too.”

Jethro goes up, and Breena gets started on dinner. Mona pads into the kitchen, and watches her.

She’s cutting up the chicken, and Mona’s eyes are on her, very heavily.

“You enjoying training your Probie?”

Mona woofs.

A second later she hears much smaller feet, and feels another set of eyes on her. Her back is to them, but she can feel them watching her every move.

“Uh uh. No raw chicken for you.” Sometimes this sort of behavior will get an occasional treat in the form of a bit of beef or lamb, but no one in their house, even Mona, gets raw poultry.

Mona doesn’t whine or anything like that. She’s vastly too dignified for that sort of behavior. She does settle down on the floor and lie her head on her paws, looking up at Breena. Jackson, who at nine weeks old, is not particularly dignified, does yip about it. Breena turns to him, shakes her head, and he rapidly figures out that there will not be gifts of food, and thus goes back to running around the living room.

Jethro comes back down, and grabs a cutting board, knife, and some of the veggies.

“Good week for you?” Breena asks as she trims the second chicken.

He nods.

“Getting your full-time Saba award?”

He smiles at that, carefully turning a potato into nice, uniformly sized chunks.

“Mona at least woofed at me.”

Gibbs takes that as a ‘add some damn words, I’m not a mind reader’ and starts to talk. “It was a good week. We’re getting a routine. Get over to Tony and Ziva’s. Work out with Tony. He goes off to work, and then Ziva and I have little guy. She handles the waking up part, and then feeds him. I do burps and put him back down. Then they both sleep. And I… do whatever.”

“What’s whatever?”

“Anything from getting groceries, to walks with my crew, to puppy socializing, to researching more puppy training. I was watching this thing with a kid teaching her dog sign language, and that sounds useful. No idea if Jackson’s future human will speak or not, so, he should know words and hand signals.”

Breena nods, that makes a lot of sense to her. “Any more wedding stuff?”

“Invitations are ordered. DJ is booked. It’s starting to look like a party.”

“Flowers?”

Gibbs shakes his head. He’s perfectly fine with getting most of the wedding stuff on his own, but ordering flowers requires him to know colors, and to actually care about how the damn things are arranged.

“We’ll get that figured out for you this weekend.”

He nods at that. If he’s got pictures, and a list of what to get, he can comparison shop and order them just fine. He just doesn’t want to go at it cold.

“Are we going to be hosting Abbi’s family out here, or closer to town?”

Gibbs shrugs. “Probably closer to town. No idea how long they’ll take off for. Might just be here for two days, or something.”

“You going to try to get back out there this summer?”

“That’s the idea. Get to see it in bloom. Maybe bring the dogs. Probably have to drive to do that.” If he can pry Abbi out of work for long enough to do it, driving out with the doggies sounds like a lot of fun. Hell, maybe get a Winnebago or something, go see everywhere in between. He didn’t have any really hot honeymoon ideas (beyond not Cancun, again.) and that might be fun.

“They rent cabins, right?” Breena asks, bringing him back to getting dinner ready.

“Yeah.”

“Maybe in five, six years, we’ll all head out. Show the kids the whole world doesn’t look like Virginia.”

Gibbs smiles at that idea, too.

A properly roasted chicken, with a crispy brown skin, succulent, juicy meat, resting on a heap of golden, roasted vegetables is a thing of sublime joy and beauty, and Breena Palmer hopes to never go without it again.

She’s happily tearing through her chicken leg, as the rest of the family starts their normal, what-we-did-this-week conversation.

Abby’s got the floor, now. “I’m in the lab, working on recreating a scene for Dornie, when Corwin comes over and says, ‘Abby, Major Mass Spec isn’t sounding right.’ I roll my eyes a little, and get up. They all know that if you don’t go to Major Mass Spec with the right attitude, he’s going to complain, but…” Abby shakes her head. “I go over, and I give him a little pet and some sweet talk, and—”

“He magically got better the same way he always does when you go pet him?” Jimmy adds.

“NO! He kept growling!” Abby looks stupefied that this should have happened. “I talked to him. I explained what we needed done. And, just GRRRRRR…” She makes the sound of gears grinding on each other.

Tim, Tony, Ziva, and Gibbs all share a look. They’ve all heard the GRRR of the unhappy Mass Spec.

“So, I talk to him some more, and… He just wasn’t happy. I spent all day working with him. I took him apart top to bottom, pulled out his innards and…” Abby looks spitting mad at this. “Every season he gets a service call. And there’s a little spot on the inside, where the technician signs his initials and dates his work, and…” She’s shaking her head, looking angry. “They didn’t call him in while I was on maternity leave! ‘Get Major Mass Spec serviced’ was on the list of instructions I left, and they didn’t do it.”

“Oh, good God!” Tim looks a bit chilled. He, of all people, knows, intimately what an upset Abby is like. “You chewed them out, didn’t you?”

Abby nods solemnly. “You would have been proud Gibbs, I even applied head slaps.” Gibbs does smile at that. “First day the technician can get in is Wednesday, so we’ve got to hope what I’ve done’ll keep him running for another half week, but…” She’s shaking her head again. “You don’t get almost twenty years out of a piece of equipment like that if you don’t take care of it!” She’s got her I’m boiling you in my mind look on her face as she thinks of them, and then stabs her fork through a potato. “Okay, better news. Tony tell us about the newbies.”

“First day back, Draga sidles over, and hands me a Red Bull. He says, ‘Didn’t use to drink them. Then Kevin was born. He opens my top drawer, and he’s got two six packs in there. Then he pats me on the shoulder and says, ‘Good luck,’ and then smirks at me before sauntering back to his desk with a huge grin on his face.” Tony softens that with a smile. “I mean, come on, just because the black circles under my eyes were so dark they look like the black stripes football players put on their faces to cut the glare, doesn’t mean I need intravenous Red Bull.”

They haven’t heard that story, but Tony’s been back to work for a bit, so he’s got to be telling it for a reason.

“How was it?” Abbi asks.

“And your newbies?” Penny asks, getting him to lead to where this goes.

“Settling in. Johnson’s doing the job well. Attentive, good with details. Cool.”

“And Spader?”

Tony shakes his head. “I’m not sure what he’s doing, but it’s why I mentioned the Red Bull. I’d call it sucking up, but, I mean, I’m his Boss, so… He’s supposed to watch me, figure out what I want and need, and then get it for me before I ask, right?”
“Always hoped I’d get one of you that well-trained,” Gibbs says, with a bit of a smirk.

“Well, he’s coming along. Also, he smiles at me, a lot.”

“Like he’s got a sunny personality?” Breena asks.

Tony shrugs. “At work, he seems to. Kind of puts me in mind of your man, back when he was new, just, little less likely to stick his foot in his mouth.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes. “Having a sunny disposition can be a defense mechanism. Everything around you sucks, so you slap a smile on your face and look on the bright side.” That’s part of what drew him to Breena and vice versa. They both have, on the face of it, horrible jobs, and they both intentionally wear a smile and cheer to keep themselves, and the people around them, from drowning in sorrow.

“Which he could be doing. Or not. I don’t know, yet. I do know that it’s almost eerie to have the new coffee appear, with the Red Bull in it, almost before I finish the old one. It’s like he’s watching me, and waiting to do things for me I might like.”

“Is that a bad thing?” Tim asks.

“It’s just weird. Like… I don’t know, weird. Maybe it’s because he is who he is. I…” He glances at Penny. “You’re going to want to slap me for this, but, if Johnson was getting me drinks and smiling all the time, it wouldn’t hit my radar, but he’s huge, and a he, and…”

Penny nods to Jimmy, who’s sitting next to Tony, and he does apply the head slap to the back of his head.

She gets up and drops a few bucks in the ASSHOLE jar to cover it and then returns to the table. “You were right about that. So, are you uncomfortable with a big, muscular man playing a subservient role, or is he flirting with you? Is that the problem?”

Tony’s eyes go wide. There’s an option he hadn’t thought of, but… “Uh… I…” He licks his lips, staring at Penny, who likely has opinions about him being uncomfortable with both of those things. “I… am going to shut up now. Tim, I heard some scuttlebutt about one of the Cyberbabies, what’s up with that?”

“Uh…” To Tim the ‘cyberbabies’ are Howard (25) and Brand (almost 19) and he hasn’t heard any scuttlebutt about them.

Tony can see Tim doesn’t know what he’s talking about, so he expounds. “One of them’s taking over. I was hearing something like that…”

“Garbled translation,” Tim says. “Unless I’ve been too deep in my office. Are you talking about Ngyn?”

“Dark hair, shy?” Tony asks.

“Ngyn. Yeah. It’s not out yet that I’m leaving. Soon though. I’ll give proper sixty-days-notice, so that’s…” Tim thinks about it. “Uh… That came up fast. It’s next week. I didn’t think she’d want my job, but she’s the best combination of years in and talent, so I offered it to her, expecting her to give me an ‘are you insane look’ and then head off. But she didn’t. She stepped up, so I gave her the NCIS branch of CrimeWeb, and she ran with that, and then I kept giving her more and more of my job, and so far, she’s doing okay.”
“What’s okay?” Ziva asks.

“She doesn’t love the face to face stuff, but she’s delegating it well, or putting it into online communications. She can IM faster than I can think. Most of who she deals with is scattered around the globe, so… It’s working out okay.”

“Haven’t heard anything about CrimeWeb in a while,” Penny says.

“You got us funding, and the last report I had indicated they’d found a place to stick computers and some people, and that—”

“Manner gave me notice and buggered off to run the damn thing,” Abbi says, glaring at Tim.

“Not my fault. You wouldn’t have had him at all if it weren’t for me.”

That does not cause the glare to abate. “I’m scrambling for a computer guy again.”

“Probably a good idea to get more than one of them,” Jimmy adds.

“Ya think?” Abbi shoots back at him. She knows she needs more than one of them. But she doesn’t entirely trust her HR guys, and she doesn’t know what she needs in a Cybercrime guy. It’s frustrating. Manner tells her the people he got in play are good, and they may be, but…

“And I’ll go back to eating,” Jimmy says.

Gibbs strokes his hand up and down Abbi’s back. “I’m out of the office for at least the next week, and I just got the word from him today.”

“Sorry,” Tim says. “Long run, he’s doing more to make your life easier than he could in your building.”

“Sure. Just one more thing that’s got to be dealt with.” That’s not cheering Abbi up.

Gibbs knows Manner’s the tip of the iceberg. “How’s getting the testimony going?”

That gets a huge sigh and eye roll. “I’m wishing I knew something about computers so I can run off and go make law enforcement work better. I got word back yesterday that they don’t want copies of a lot of my ‘evidence,’ they want originals, but in half of the cases, I can’t give them originals because I gave the originals when I was originally testifying. The damn things are already in evidence. In DC. In burned out buildings.” She looks to Penny. “If I tell them to drag their own asses down to DC and go spelunking in what’s left of the Capitol building, will they hold me in contempt?”

Penny smiles a bit. “If they do, I’ll break you out. So far, at least for the ones I’ve been hearing about, if you’re giving evidence for the right side, and you’re on the right side, questions have been easy and gentle. We haven’t gotten to the point where defense has been able to cross-examine anyone, so that might not be so lovely, but right now, you’re looking at a lot of softballs and having to listen to speech after speech about how you and yours did such an amazing job of saving the day.”

“Not that I mind softball questions and praise, but I could be back in my office doing my job.”

“That’s how a lot of the people we’ve talked to have felt,” Penny says.

“Who have you talked to,” Breena asks. “Sometimes we have c-span on when we work, but most of the time we don’t.
“Not too much, yet. Abbi’s one of the first ones up because of how this unraveled. But, we’ve heard from your friend Harland. He got called up early because he’s a Congressman now, and his name was on a lot of the warrants you guys used. Jake already gave his testimony, for the same reason. I’ll be going up soon. Leon’s on the calendar for right after Abbi. Ummm… no one else you know, for a while.”

“Not calling me?” Tim asks.

“Not as of yet. I think Leon’s going to be getting your questions.”

“That’s a relief.”

“Of course, right now, this is just general admissions of evidence. Each individual person will get called up to be tried. So, with each new case, you’ve got another shot of getting called in,” Penny replies.

Tim nods. “They’ll bring me in for those. They always did in the criminal cases we used to handle.”

“And, eventually, these’ll be criminal cases. Just, not yet,” Penny says between bites of roasted carrot.

“You don’t get to sit in on them, right?” Ziva asks.

“Right. I was too close to the whole thing, so I’m not on any of the trials.”

“So, what are you up to?” Breena asks.

“Fun stuff.” There’s a lot of sarcasm in her voice. “North Dakota voted to join Canada. Great, we all know that. North Dakota also has several Native American reservations on it. They are not part of the state of North Dakota. They’re also claiming to not be part of the United States of America. So, I, and a few representatives of the Sioux, Chippewa, Hidatsa, Mandan, and Arikara, and representatives of North Dakota, and representatives from Canada are busy working out a treaty.”

“Uh, yay?” Breena asks.

“It’s important, but dull. What they want, to be their own country, isn’t going to happen. I and the Canadian representatives have been told in no uncertain terms that that’s not a deal we’re making. So, right now, we’re just seeing if they’ll opt to join Canada, or be little islands of America in Canada.”

“Why don’t they get to be their own country?” Jimmy asks.

“No one cares if the Native Americans have their own country, not for them as people. However, much of their land is on top of a treasure trove of oil,” Ducky says. And that turns the light on for everyone else.

Penny adds, “And the deal with Canada holds that they’ll pay royalties to the US for any oil money on land they got from us for the next fifty years. Which is why we’re perfectly happy to see them become Canadians, and since the Canadians get the bulk of that money, they’re fine with them being Canadians, too, but no one is going to let them become their own country.”

“So, they don’t get to hold onto their own wealth, and you’re the one negotiating this?” Abby asks Penny.

“With my teeth gritted. As a condition of the treaty I’m working on, we’re making sure they get to keep fifty percent of the money, themselves. Before the fall, the Feds used to keep that money ‘for them’ and then hand it out, as it saw fit, when it saw fit.”

“And use it as a private slush fund,” Ducky says. “All of that money was gone long before things went crazy last autumn. The reports on the Bureau of Indian Affairs indicates they were up to their ears in corruption. It is thoroughly distasteful to see exactly how…” he’s editing himself, “abysmally, run many of the government bodies were. ‘A few bad apples,’” he shakes his head. “We were living in an apple graveyard, staring at acres of rotted apples, crawling with maggots.”

“I remember Bishop saying something like that to me, about why she left NSA,” Tim says. “How’s she doing?” He hopes that’s a happier topic.

“Quite well. Baby Malloy is officially due toward the end of June, so she’s hit the ‘any day now’ part of the pregnancy. Between bouts of nursery painting and being crabby about being very pregnant, we’re continuing to try and figure out what Jarvis should be doing to get his tax base back into shape.”

“Fun?” Gibbs asks.

“Frustrating. Many ideas. No clear answers. Onto something lighter, Jethro, I do not see a tiny puppy scampering around. Where is Jackson?”

“I’ll bring him down to get acquainted after the… dinner.” The girls aren’t really paying attention to this conversation, but if he says he’s going to do something after they go to bed, he will suddenly have some laser-like focus on him, and that will be a bit of a problem. They’re all still young enough they think everything stops when they go to bed, and he’s perfectly happy to not disabuse them of that notion. “This is still way more excitement than he can handle at once. So, he’s in our room, hopefully not chewing anything irreplaceable or peeing on the rug.”

That gets a look between Penny and Ducky, who have not yet seen the little guy in person. They hit traffic north of Philly, and ended up getting in less than a minute before the blessing.

“He’s got a little nest of newspaper in the corner, that he’s pretty good with. And he… mostly…
knows where the outside is, but he’s still too little to easily get up and down the steps,” Abbi adds.

“And if we leave the door open, he’ll get himself down here. He’s social. He likes people. But he’ll end up running around like crazy, barking at everything, trying to jump on everyone, and…”

“Act like the over-excited baby he is?” Ducky finishes that sentence.

Jethro nods.

“So, he’s having some quiet time with Mona,” Abbi says. “And later, he’ll come down and say hello.”

“And will he put me in mind of Mother’s hounds?” Ducky asks Jethro.

Tony’s already shaking his head, no. “Only one of him to start with.”

“And he’s a lot quieter,” Jethro finishes. “Just as easily excited, but I’m hoping to mellow that.”

“Is that the first time anyone’s ever heard you use the word mellow in a sentence?” Abby asks Gibbs.

He sends her a smartass glance.
She holds up her hands. “Just saying, Gibbs and mellow aren’t usually complimentary ideas.”

That gets a bit of a laugh, and dinner rolls on.

“We ready?” Breena asks Abby as their guys get the girls all washed up with post-dinner tubby time.

Abby plugs the last of the nightlights into the wall sockets of their star-gazing room. “Yep.” She stands up and hands Breena the camera. “Basic digital SLR. Point, click, and boom, pictures. Or,” she touches the screen, and clicks the play triangle. “Hit that, and you’ve got video. Just remember, you want to stay,” Abby walks off a ten-foot patch of floor, “on this line, and everything will look great.”

Looks easy enough. “And if I do video?”

“Just like when we did the pinups for the guys. I’ll pull shots out of it after. Video will probably be easier, especially since you intend to have Jimmy moving around.”

Breena grins, wide, happy smile on her face. Oh, yes, she intends to have Jimmy moving around, and she intends to enjoy every second of it.

“Got some washed-up girls in here,” they hear Jimmy call out. Time to move onto tuck-ins.

Like Jimmy, Tim also feels mildly silly about pinup pictures. He shouldn’t. Both Abby and Breena have collection of vastly more explicit shots featuring him in a wide array of pornographic situations.

But, those pictures were taken as part of playing, while he was into it.

It’s fairly easy for him to look sexy while he’s having sex. He has no problem with come hither eyes when he’s naked, tied up, and he’s trying to get the woman with the camera to literally come hither and get him off.

This isn’t quite the same thing.

This is get dressed up, and pose, and… go at it cold? Maybe? He’s not entirely sure what the camera crew half of this is intending to do.

He does know that what’s in his hands isn’t exactly a costume, but it’s not his normal sort of clothing, either.

It’s an almost translucent white button down. The kind of thing he wouldn’t normally wear, or buy for himself. It’s linen, with a tropical sort of feel to it. He’s got the sense it’s meant to be worn at a beach or pool, probably unbuttoned, maybe with a t-shirt under it. Maybe not. He tries to imagine wearing a t-shirt under a button down that the t-shirt would show through. He’s not seeing it.

Knowing Abby, and her tastes, and Breena and hers, they might be thinking a shirt like that, soaked in water so it’d go from near-translucent to completely see-through linen plastered against his skin, is the look they’re aiming for. (That he can imagine.)
There’s only one other part to this, a pair of tight, black skinny jeans. Judging by how tight they are, they’re from wherever Breena got those red jeans Jimmy wore when they went clubbing.

He’s suddenly wondering if Abby and Breena intend to plop him in the shower or the river for this.

He hopes not the river. The moon is full, and Abby knows enough about how to use a camera to get some shots of him, but it’s chilly for early May, and yes, he can see in his head how this would look, him all wet in clingy, skin-tight clothing, lit by the moon, but he doesn’t think he’s going to be able to approximate anything like sexy body language or expression if he’s shivering.

Jimmy walks into their room. He’s just finished kissing babies goodnight.

Then he looks around the room. Tim’s costume is fairly obvious. It’s in his hands. Jimmy’s not seeing anything for him.

Tim’s got the sense that at some point the girls switched up the plans, because while he’s got a white button down and tight jeans, Jimmy’s got… nothing.

At all.

No costume, no makeup, nothing.

“So much for not porn,” Tim says to him, shucking off his (rather damp from tubby time) work clothing.

“Naked isn’t necessarily porn,” Jimmy replies, pulling off his shirt. He doesn’t need explicit instructions to figure out what Breena wants him in.

Tim has to admit that’s true, but… “So, what, you lay back on the bed and eat grapes seductively or something?” Tim supposes they could be planning on plopping Jimmy onto the bed in their harem room, maybe drape one of the satin sheets on him, carefully locate a pillow or two, and have him just lie around and flex some. Tim’s not, by any stretch, a connoisseur of pinup photos, but he thinks that’s a recurring theme.

Jimmy ripples his stomach muscles, wearing a cocky expression on his face. “They know where the good stuff is, and don’t want to cover it up.” Then he smirks at Tim’s shirt and pants.

Tim whacks him on the shoulder with the back of his hand as Breena heads in, a huge smile on her face, having heard Jimmy’s last comment. She pats him on the butt and then kisses him. “You know it, baby.” Then she glances at both of them. “Okay, you’re not undressed enough, and you’re still way too undressed. What are you two doing?” she asks as Jimmy starts pulling off his boxer-briefs and Tim begins to pull on the shirt.

“Speculating,” Jimmy replies.

“Well, get naked, follow me, and you’ll speculate no more.”

So, Jimmy does, and Tim, jeans in his hands (they’re way too tight to pull on quickly) follows, as well.
When Breena started up with this idea, she knew how she wanted Jimmy to look, and explained it to Abby, because she didn’t know how to make it happen.

Abby grinned and got to it.

She set the octagonal star-gazing room for pictures. It’s fairly dim. The overhead lights are off, and so are the hall lights. She’s got small votive candles in frosted glasses where the window panes come together. So, six tiny lights on the floor. And two of the kids’ nightlights carefully arranged to brighten the glow just a bit.

There’s Jimmy’s yoga mat on the floor, so it’s fairly obvious what they expect to happen, and who they expect to be doing it.

“All right,” Breena takes Jimmy by the hand, leading him over to his mat. “You’re up first.”

And then it clicks for Tim, all of the light will hit Jimmy from one side. Yeah, he’ll be naked, and… Breena’s carefully rubbing oil on him, making sure not to get any on his hands or feet, which Jimmy does not appear to mind at all. He’ll be dark on the side facing them, and the side away will reflect the light.

He’ll glow, with a sort of silhouette, or halo. And, if they angle the shots right, there’ll be the reflection of him in the glass behind.

If Abby can keep him moving slowly enough that the shots don’t all blur, this should look awesome.

He hears Breena say, “This setup okay for your moon salutations?”

Jimmy nods, looking around. “No problems. Is that what you want to see?”

“Yes. Say, slowed down to half speed.”

“Low light photography means we need longer exposures,” Abby says.

“No flash?” Jimmy asks.

“It’ll ruin the effect. We’re actually filming you, not taking still pictures, so don’t worry about ever going completely still, but keep moving slow so the camera can still catch you,” Breena says.

“You want some music or anything?” Abby asks Jimmy.

He shakes his head. The point of yoga for him is to go inward. The point of music is to get him out of his head. The two don’t go together in his world.

“You guys have anything you want me to do?” Tim asks.

Abby grins at him, eyes raking over him standing in his boxers and that shirt, currently unbuttoned. He knows she likes what she’s seeing. “You get to hang out and relax. Just make sure those boxers are off and the jeans are on by the time Jimmy’s done.”

“At half speed, that’s going to be about twenty minutes. It’s not a long routine,” Jimmy says.

Tim grabs a few of the pillows the girls had taken out of their lounging-about-looking-at-the-stars-area in the octagonal room, and settles in to watch them play.
The first few seconds are a bit self-conscious for Jimmy. He doesn’t do yoga to show off. Okay, not precisely true. He doesn’t usually do yoga to show off. Sometimes he is. But… Even if he is showing off, he’s not doing it to be watched, like, as entertainment, for anything more than a minute or two at a time.

So, yes, it feels a little weird to have all three of them just staring at him as he gets into this, let alone feeling the camera on him.

But, this is what his ladies want to see. After months of feeling awful, if what Breena wants is to watch him bend and flex and glow, then he’ll bend and flex and glow. Not like she’s asking him for something he doesn’t normally do.

She just wants to record, and enjoy, it.

So, he takes a second, pulls himself into his mind and body, and starts to breathe, slow, easy, calming his heart and head, planning this routine. He wiggles around a little, loosening muscles, and then brings his hands together in front of his heart, and bows to his ladies.

The first time Breena Slater saw Jimmy Palmer, what she noticed was the glasses. Well, the glasses, the dark, unruly hair, and his green (turns out they’re hazel, that day they were green) eyes.

She decided he had to look a lot like a grownup Harry Potter.

Which appealed to her. He caught her looking, noticed her smile, and when there was a break in the conference, came over to say hello.

She’s extremely glad he did. Granted, it wasn’t the smoothest come-on she’d ever gotten, but his eyes were soft and gentle, and a sort of pleasant goofiness radiated off of him. So, she said yes when he asked if she wanted to get a drink.

It was winter, so the idea that there was much below Jimmy’s neck really didn’t occur to her. Obviously, he had to have a body, but beyond noticing that he seemed nicely trim, she didn’t pay much attention to it.

Fast forward, through a successful drink, a few charming dates, and some very, very hot kissing she enjoyed immensely, and Breena started to wonder what was under his clothing. She could feel firm muscle, and the bits she could see, because, again, it was winter so nothing he had on was coming off, looked very good.

Fast forward a few months more, and bits and pieces of clothing started to get peeled off as the weather got warmer. A view of forearms first. (Her mouth went dry the first time she saw him in a t-shirt. She’s always been an arm guy, and HOLY SHIT! Jimmy’s got arms!) Then shorts. (And his legs were just as good.) And finally, they went to the beach, and she’s immensely proud of the fact that she didn’t pass out or drool on herself the first time she saw him in a bathing suit. (She was equally pleased to see him have pretty much the exact same reaction to her in a bathing suit.)

It was summer of 2009 the first time she saw him in a bathing suit. Almost ten years now. And she likes what’s under his clothing even more now. Maybe he doesn’t look that different, not below his neck, his face has certainly changed, but he’s more… him… and more hers… than he ever was.
before.

And she adores it.

And lit gold, glowing, he’s so beautiful it makes her heart ache, and giggles want to pour out. Too much joy, too much love, for it all to stay inside.

First off, Jimmy’s showing off. Tim is absolutely certain this is not his normal moon salutation routine. Granted, he’s never seen said routine, but Jimmy mentioned doing it on the beach, and he knows there’s no way Jimmy’s trying any of those arm balances on uneven ground, and especially not on uneven sand.

Second of all, the girls are enjoying the ever loving fuck out of this. He’s watching them as much as Jimmy because there are a lot of things he loves seeing in this world, and his two favorite women turned on and happy is definitely at or near the top of that list.

And he knows why they’re enjoying it. For the same reason he’s feeling insanely envious.

Right now, Jimmy is power, and strength, and control, and grace, and elegance and…

And Tim can see them lapping it up. Jimmy is the image of everything male strength is supposed to be about. Miles of glowing muscle, moving him carefully, precisely, slowly, through stupidly difficult positions.

He’d started with the more basic moves. Just standing still, in mountain pose, looks amazing when you’re lit gold, each and every curve of your body highlighted, and have maybe ten percent body fat. And then after a few rotations of his basic salutation, Jimmy starts to play.

And, third of all, Tim’s thinking that, with a lot of effort and maybe another one… His eyes go wide as Jimmy… Tim shakes his head; he can’t possibly be doing… Nope… He is… How the fuck is he getting his knee to stay there, with his skin oiled? … Okay two… No… Three more years, of serious practice, he too, may, be able to go from a bird in a basket, to a handstand, to planking without his feet touching the ground and then back into bird in a basket.

It’s clear, as he’s watching the girls that this hits them, hard. Lips are being licked, nipples are perking up, and it’s too dim in here to really tell, but it’s not like he just met either of these women, if their bodies are that far along, cheeks are pinking up, too.

It’s not just the strength. Though he knows both girls are digging that, but they’re just as into it when Jimmy’s not doing wildly impressive strength moves. It’s the control. It’s each finger in the right spot. The way he shifts from a lunge into warrior one, with a smooth twist and sweep of his arms and torso. Every inch of Jimmy is exactly where he wants it to be, doing exactly what he’s telling it to do, and every inch of Breena and Abby is responding to it, enjoying it, quivering, eager to see that kind of focused power spent on them.

This is male strength controlled, mastered, and the girls love it.

He’s wondering how good Breena’s camera work can be if she’s breathing that hard, watching their man bend and flex. He figures it doesn’t matter. She’s probably got at least a few shots to keep.

As Jimmy’s wrapping up, and Tim’s pulling on his jeans, he’s come to a conclusion: There’s no way he’s ever going to do the work he’d need to do to get as strong as Jimmy is. He knows himself, and it’s just not going to happen. It sure as hell isn’t going to happen between now and the minute and a half from now when Jimmy gets done and they start photographing him.

But that doesn’t mean he can’t find other male “virtues” to exhibit for tonight.

And if Jimmy’s going to slowly blend and flex and be the embodiment of strength, then he’ll set his gaze on fire, stuff himself into those tight jeans, and be desire.

“So, you didn’t feel too silly, did you?” Breena’s asking Jimmy when he’s done his routine.

He smiles back at her. “No. That went a lot easier than I thought it would. You get any good shots?”

“Oh yeah!” Breena says, as Abby grins, nodding.

“And they’ll be even better once I get done with Photoshop.”

“You’re going to Photoshop me?” Jimmy looks borderline appalled at that.

“Not the way you’re thinking. Got to pull out still pictures, and then tweak the lighting. I’m not going to mess with you, just how exposed you are.”

“Oh.”

“Ready for me?” Tim asks.

The ladies look over to him, having forgotten him while working with Jimmy, and their eyes go wide. Jimmy looks over too and mutters, “Show off.”

Tim rolls his eyes in Jimmy’s direction, shooting off a very clear, like you weren’t look, before focusing back on the ladies.

He did wet down the shirt, (with warm water) and put it on, unbuttoned, rolled up the sleeves, before fluffing up his hair a little, and adding the sort of messy eyeliner Abby likes. Then he turned on the lights to his and Abby’s room, made sure he was standing in the doorway, leaning against the door jam, the bed, quilts turned down, visible behind him.

He licks his lips, looking each of them up and down. He drops his fingers to the button on the jeans, lightly strokes over it, and then drags the tips of his fingers over the bulge in his pants.

“Good God, Tim, warn a girl before you do that!” Breena says, lunging for the camera. “I wanted pictures of that, not just the memory!”

Breena doesn’t remember the first time she met Tim. Or the second. Probably the third, too. He just sort of blended into the background. She knows he had to have been there, but between Tony and Ziva and Gibbs, he vanished.
So, when Jimmy told her that Tim wanted to get together with him for dinner to talk about some mysterious secret, she had to think for a moment about which one Tim was. (And, even at that point, she didn’t have much of a mental image of Tim, what she had was a memory of Jimmy saying that McGee thought the retro-tux idea for the wedding was cool.)

She eventually put it together. And when he got home with the story of the secret romance, and the guy who sought him out to get advice about said secret romance caught her attention. She’s always liked the idea of guys who decide to court a woman, and from what Jimmy was saying, Tim was getting his ducks in a row for some serious courting.

She knew Abby, of course. She was Jimmy’s best woman, and had been part of the wedding planning, and all the rest of that, and they’d gotten on fabulously. So, she approved of the idea of the guy who wanted Abby doing some work to be worthy of her.

The first time she can remember seeing him, really seeing him, attaching a face and personality to the name was at her “wedding.” Jimmy didn’t need to point him out. She knew who everyone else at the table was, and she certainly knew which one Abby was, and could see the guy with the heart eyes looking at her.

She remembers dancing with him, talking about Abby, and noticing that he was a much better dancer than she would have assumed. His hands were softer than she expected, too, and he smelled good. All of which she approved of, on Abby’s behalf.

Later that night, when Abby swung by, and was covered in Tim’s cologne, but hadn’t been gone for very long, or dancing with him, the way she would have had to to end up smelling like that, she and Jimmy enjoyed some naughty giggles, wondered if they’d found the same spot they had used, and her opinion of Tim went up a few notches.

From then until that second clubbing date, she got to know Tim better, and liked him more and more, but that was it. The fact is, plump guys don’t do it for her. And for the first almost year she knew Tim, he was still dealing with almost getting killed by Deering by snorking up every bit of sugar he could find.

She liked the guy well enough, but the body was just a thing moving a brain from point A to point B. Yes, Abby had some awfully good stories about what that body could do, and she really enjoyed those books Tim wrote, but Breena wasn’t terribly intrigued about Tim as anything that could be called ‘an object of desire.’

And, until that clubbing date, that stayed in place. She was an extremely happily married woman, and then a very pregnant one, or a new mom, and wasn’t looking for anyone else, so she didn’t look.

And while she wasn’t looking Tim started to lose some weight, and get into better shape, and then, they’re getting ready to go to a club and he’s in a freaking kilt with eyeliner and nail polish and Breena was looking.

She loves Jimmy’s wholesome, clean-cut, preppy look. He’s very tidy, and straight-laced, and actually wears the cute little sweaters her mom knits for him, and she loves that. But… there’s something to be said about the bad boy, too. Especially the bad boy you know is actually a really good guy. Someone who just looks dangerous, instead of is dangerous.

Tim kept the kilt and nail polish on all night. He tidied up the rest of himself for that date, but that was the first time she really looked, and with looking put together the sorts of things Abby would say, and what was in those books, and began to internalize that fact that the guy who could write a sex scene like that could probably actually fuck like that, too.
And then Ziva asks if the four of them are fooling around and…

And the floodgates in her head opened, and she started to really look at Tim.

He’s been getting better and better to look at over the years. She’s happy to admit that. But… when it comes to physical bodies, she likes Jimmy better. No slight to Tim, she likes looking at him just fine, but Jimmy’s just more of her type.

But the guy in that body… Tim’s a hell of a lot of fun. And he’s fun in ways Jimmy isn’t. (Not more fun, just different fun.) And put the two of them together, or get them trying to one up each other, and that’s even better yet.

So, when she and Abby sat down to talk about what to do with Tim for tonight, neither of them had much of a set plan for how to get pictures of him. Abby had an outfit idea she wanted, so Breena was good with that. And both of them came to the conclusion that if he was given something to play, he’d knock it out of the ballpark.

He’s standing here, hand on his jeans button, eyeing Breena like he’s going to eat her alive and relish every moment of it, and Breena grins, this is exactly the kind of fun she was hoping to get out of Tim.

Tim keeps his eyes hot, on hers, and says, “I’m not going anywhere. Well, except that bed, and I’m taking you,” his eyes flit to Abby, “and you, with me.”

Abby didn’t exactly have a script for what she wanted Tim to do. Or, more exactly, she was pretty sure that given the outfit they could improv this with some lovely results, and he is not disappointing her at all.

“And what are we going to do in that bed?” Abby starts walking toward him. She’s going to stay out of camera range, but the two of them can light a fire with several feet between them. That should get Breena any pictures she wants.

Again, Tim’s fingers find the button on his jeans, and again they flit over it. He shifts gaze from Abby to Breena, and to the camera, he raises an eyebrow at her, and she nods, this is what she wants from Tim.

His eyes linger on Breena’s and then drift down her body. Then he eyes Abby, and licks his lips. “I was thinking about how long it’s been since I got to lay back and have both of you ride me. Not sure who’s on top and who’s on bottom though… Maybe you’ll switch. Oh… No… I know.” A wide, lazy grin spreads across Tim’s face, as he strokes himself through his jeans, knuckles dragging over his dick, both Breena and Abby’s eyes following his hand. “Breena,” He looks to her, and she makes sure she’s getting pictures of that look, “You’re going to start with Jimmy, ride him ‘til you’re quivering for the first time, ‘til his hands are white-knuckled on our headboard, but you don’t let him get off. Just get him good and hot and bothered. Make him drip. And then you come over to me, sit on my face, and I’ll lick every drop of him off of you. Then you’re going to scoot down and ride me home.” Tim gently bites his lower lip as those long, elegant fingers of his stroke over his dick again. That gets a little whimper from Breena. That view, those words. Yeah, this is exactly what she wants from Tim. “And Abby, you start with me. I’m gonna spread you wide, and bury my face in your pussy, and get you off so many times, so you’re so wet, that when Jimmy’s about to snap he so turned on, you can just slip over to him and slide right down him like oiled silk.”
Abby’s grinning at him, enjoying this game. She runs her thumb over the bottom lip, gently sucking on the tip of it for a moment, enjoying the way Tim’s watching her lips, and then says, “What if I have a taste for something else?”

Tim looks away from Breena and the camera to Abby. “Then tell me all about it pretty girl, and I’ll see if I can make it happen.”

“Oh, I know you can make it happen.” Her eyes have a lot of promise in them as she says that.

“Even better.” He grins again, feeling and looking, in all manner of the word, cocky. Sometimes it amazes Breena when she thinks about who he was when she first met him. How the invisible man could become this.

“I want to see you peel those pants off.”

Tim glances to Breena, and she nods, so much for his pictures not being pornographic. The first ones aren’t.

He traces his left fingers from his throat, down his chest, over his few fine chest hairs, down his belly, to brush lightly against the few hairs trailing down from his navel to the button on the jeans, and then pops it. All while staring at Breena and her camera. A second of lingering there, before he goes to the zipper, easing it down, nice and slow.

The jeans are tighter than any he’s ever worn, so he’s hoping he can get the rest of the way out of them elegantly, because he’s got a mental image of godawful stupid-looking hopping around on one foot, trying to get free of them, but apparently the live-action-porn-gods are feeling benevolent, because he is able to shimmy out of them without looking like a twit, or breaking eye contact with Breena.

She’s devouring him with her eyes, watching his every breath, watching him mostly naked, dick hard, jutting out, arms and chest barely covered by translucent white fabric plastered to his skin.

He’s standing there, tattoos visible through the fabric, eyes smoldering with lust, and smoky with liner, hair tousled… Not tousled enough. He takes his left hand, still wearing his wrist cuff, and slowly runs his hand through his hair, closing his eyes, and flexing a bit.

And, sure, he’s not cut like Jimmy. He’s thin, but his belly has a gentle swell to it. And he’s working toward getting back to the muscle mass he had before the Stennis, but not quite there, yet. Right now, he’s doing an awfully good job of looking like the poster boy for sex, drugs, and rock and roll. He’s got that air of danger, and Breena feels her body respond to it. Throb at it.

He opens his eyes, and drops his hand, letting it rest against his hip. “Like that, baby.”

“Oh, yeah,” Abby says.

“So, now what? You got the pants off of me, want the shirt, too?”

Abby shakes her head. “Not yet. Got an idea for that.” She runs off, fast, and he hears the running water out of their bathroom. A minute later, she’s back with a wet hand towel.

“Breena, get closer so you’ll be able to see it on the camera.” Then she gently squeezes the towel, so he’s standing there, mostly naked, damp shirt plastered to his skin, with small rivulets of water meandering slowly down his chest and belly.

Breena moves a bit closer and does get those shots. “Very good idea!”
Tim’s enjoying this. He’s radiating confident and cool as both of the girls coo about how hot he is like this.

“You know, if you told me you wanted smut, I could have done smut,” Jimmy says. He’s... mostly joking… probably. No heat in those words.

“Oh, they were panting for you, too,” Tim says. “You were just too far into your head to notice it.”

“Well… good…”

“Do you want to do smut, Jimmy?” Abby asks. “Cause if you do…” She gestures to the fact that he’s naked and oiled, and Tim’s all by himself in that doorway.

“Next time. I got my twenty minutes. I’m not cutting his short.”

“Thank you,” Tim says. He shifts his gaze back to Abby. “So, wet, hard, barely covered. What else, baby?”

“A picture for me.” She crouches in front of Tim, and Breena gets the shot of her delicately licking one of those rivulets of water from just above his navel to his lips, and then brush gently against him with a wet kiss.

When she breaks the kiss, he says, “I like the pictures you want.”

“Good.” She runs her fingers through his hair, and kisses him again. Breena gets another shot of it. Abby wasn’t planning on being in these pictures, so she’s just in her hanging-around-the-house-wear, a pair of black pj pants with little skulls on them, a white t-shirt, and her black nursing bra visible through it. Not wildly sexy in and of themselves, but the shot of her hands in Tim’s hair, lips on his, as he’s holding her close, hands cupped over her ass, grinding into her, are red hot.

Her hands slide down from his head, trailing over his throat, arms, and come to his hips as she grinds back into him. “So, in your little fantasy, I didn’t get to play with Breena.” Abby mock pouts a little at that, and then turns to look at Breena with a lot of heat in her eyes. “And I don’t think you boys get to hog all the pussy. I think, we need to do everything we can to remind our girl about what she’s missed out on, and why she loves it, and why we’re so happy to have her back.” Abby’s standing, back against Tim, rubbing up against him, as she says to Breena, “I think, you get off three times tonight. I think we each try what we’re best at, and you get to just relax and enjoy.”

Then she turns to face Tim, kissing him long and slow with her tongue dragging over his lower lip. “And baby, I give better head then you do.” She flashes a grin at Jimmy. “And you, too. So you’re finding something else to do, because tonight, I’m the one licking pussy.” She steps away from Tim to Breena, and then rubs up against her, lips gently ghosting along her neck. “That is, if you want me to.”

By now Breena’s flushed down her neck, and her nipples are hard. She grabs Abby by the hand, tosses Jimmy the camera, and drags her into the bedroom.

____________________

Of all her lovers, Abby was the one she never expected. Even when she and Abby were dancing together to make the boy’s head’s explode (and dicks get hard) she didn’t think she’d ever move onto anything… like this, with Abby.

Yeah, maybe fool around some to turn the guys on, but, sex with Abby for its own sake...
That was the surprise.

But they were getting ready to take those pictures for Valentine’s Day, and Breena wasn’t exactly feeling like a sex kitten. Hard to do with a two-month old baby. She was mostly feeling like this was an exercise in futility. All the makeup and sexy clothing on earth wouldn’t cover how flabby and saggy and post-partum she was.

But Abby and Ziva did her makeup, played with her hair, and picked out sexy undies for her. Abby kept telling her how beautiful she was. Ziva was doing it, too, but, not the same way. In retrospect, Breena knows what the difference was. Ziva was telling her that she was aesthetically appealing. Abby was telling her she was delicious, and sexy, and desirable, because she desired her.

Breena hadn’t quite figured out what exactly Abby was telling her. Not when she was doing it. But she could feel it, even if she couldn’t name it. And those words, that soft, dark voice, telling her how lovely she was, and how Jimmy was going to pass the fuck out when he saw those shots, that got her in the right mindset to be beautiful.

Top that off with those soft, wet kisses...

Abby’s soft. Jimmy’s got smooth bits, but nothing about him is soft. He’s all long angles, and firm muscles, crisp, tickly hair, sometimes rough stubble. But not soft.

And Abby was soft. The softest, smoothest lips she’d ever touched, and skin that was a hybrid of velvet and suede, and… And kissing Abby was fun, and not just on the feel like a sex goddess getting a response out of Jimmy level.

But Jimmy did practically pass out when he saw those shots. That yanked the sex-goddess up to the stratosphere.

He told her later, a lot later, that once he got the pictures of them making out, that all of the blood in his body went galloping to his dick, and all he could see was the two of them together. He told her he ended up jerking off in Tim’s bathroom to it, couldn’t not touch himself, seeing her all pink and pretty and turned on and kissing Abby.

And that felt so amazing.

Still, it wasn’t until they were at the beach that Breena (along with Tim apparently) really got how a quarter of this affair was going to work.

And with all of the almost sex that weekend, all of the playing, and watching, and talking and thinking, what Breena was thinking about was Abby. She knew she wanted Tim and Jimmy, and was awfully sure they could keep the four of them happily balanced. She wasn’t entirely sure how much she wanted to be doing with Abby. Yeah, fooling around was fun but… more than that?

And the answer, once she actually tried Abby, as Abby, for her own sake, not to just turn on the guys, though that helped make everything more intense and better, but as a lover, was yes.

Because, at least for Breena, when it comes down to it, the skin doesn’t matter, it’s the person in that skin, and if that person is lovely, and loves her, and she loves her back, and, as that person’s gently tugging off Breena’s clothing, eyes roaming over her body, licking her lips and reminding her that she’s exceptionally good at giving head, the shape of that skin just doesn’t matter.
For a few moments, Tim and Jimmy just sort of stand there, looking like horny just short-circuited any higher level brain functions, watching Abby strip Breena out of her clothing.

Finally, with a jerk, Jimmy realizes he’s holding the camera, and he’s going to hate himself forever if he doesn’t get footage of both of the girls playing with each other. He leaps into the bedroom, and hops onto the bed, looking for a good place to shoot from.

What is he best at? Best at. Tim’s mind flails around as a million things he wants to do to Breena all go skittering through, each one making him harder than the last, each one something he’s sure she’ll like.

But… Best?

God, what’s best. What has she liked the most? What does he do that the rest of them can’t or won’t or just aren’t as good at?

Abby’s got Breena sitting on the side of the bed, slowly kissing her way up her leg, running the pads of her fingers gently, teasingly against the back of her knees. She’s taking her time, warming Breena up, probably longer than she’d like, but it’ll be so sweet when her lips finally touch Breena’s.

Marathons… Spinning a woman out. Keeping her an inch from getting off forever, until she’s shaking and begging. That’s what he’s best at.

And that’s, if his mental clock is even close to right about what time it is and when Sean’s going to wake up next, not going to work.

“What are you best at?” he asks Jimmy, who’s filming Abby playing with Breena. He looks away from that and smirks at Tim.

“Speed. Especially with Abby working her over like this. I’ll get in there next and get her off over and over and over.” Breena flashes him a thumbs up. She’s beyond okay with that plan.

“I get the picture. The Quickie Master at work.”

“Exactly. You?”

“Marathons.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not tonight.”

“I know.”

“Story time?” Jimmy asks. That’s what he thinks Tim is best at. Granted, Tim’s never spun him out, either, so he doesn’t have the full complement of experiences to pick from. Breena’s flashing a thumbs up as she kisses Abby.

That’s what she thinks Tim’s best at, too.

Then story time it’ll be.

And maybe he doesn’t lay a hand on Breena, not to get her off, maybe he leaves that to Jimmy and Abby tonight, but he can say the words that ramp her up that much faster, and that much harder.
Take her higher than just touch would alone.

And, as Abby kisses her way up Breena’s leg, her glorious butt high in the air, Tim’s got an awfully good idea of something that would make him very happy to go along with story time.

Jimmy’s got the camera on the dresser, and as long as they stay more or less where they are, it’ll get everything. And with it set, he’s heading back to the bed, getting behind Breena. Maybe he and Abby’ll take turns, maybe they’ll both go at once, Tim’s not sure if they’ve got a plan or not, but he’s got one.

He picks up the camera, and begins to take his own pictures. He should have at least one free hand all night, so, might as well use it to make sure they’ve all got every shot they want.

Abby’s gently nibbling on Breena’s thigh, her hands cupping her butt, and Jimmy’s sitting right behind her, kissing her neck, as his hands find her breasts. He makes sure to get still shots and moving shots of that.

He gets more shots of all three of them as he heads for the bedside table, grabbing the lube and a condom. He knows he’s going with Abby tonight, and yes, she’s breastfeeding, and Sean’s only three months old, so it’s not likely, but… Not risking two kids in one year.

“So, what we’re best at, huh?” he says, leaning over Abby’s back, lips an inch from the back of her neck. He kisses the back of her neck, and then Breena’s knee. “That’s talking you three off, right?”

Abby purrs at that, and Breena says, “Please!”

He stands up, so he’s behind, and over Abby, and kisses Breena. “Then thank your other man there, because he’s the one who had the good idea.”

She turns to kiss Jimmy, and he nudges her a bit, up into his lap, so her legs are draped over his. Abby lightly touches the insides of his thighs letting him know to spread a bit wider, she wants plenty of room to work.

He takes another picture of the three of them, of Jimmy’s hands stroking over Breena’s breasts, and Abby kneeling in front of her, her wet, pink tongue just darting out to lick the line between leg and pelvis.

Then he squeezes himself. Desire. “God, that looks so good. All three of you like this.” He keeps his eyes hot and sliding over them. Then he leans forward to kiss Jimmy, mostly just a quick buss, then Breena, a long, wet kiss, and he kneels behind Abby, knows he can’t get the t-shirt off of her in the position she’s in, but he can tug down those PJ pants, and lay a wet, soft, bite on her right butt cheek.

“And right here, where I can see and hear, and,” he strokes his hand between Abby’s legs, and she moans deep at it, “fuck… Best show on Earth.” He begins a soft, gentle stroke with Abby, just saying hello. She’s not very wet, not yet. Not for as turned on as the rest of her seems. Joys of post-baby hormones. “Gonna feel so good.” He wraps his hand in Abby’s shirt, and gently tugs her up for a moment, making sure she’s flush to him, back against his chest, holding her close, his arms wrapped around her, below her chest, and then, after another kiss, he pushes her forward a bit and tugs off the shirt.

“Look at her, Jimmy. Look at those pretty breasts, all round and succulent.” He turns Abby’s face and kisses her, sighing, feeling her melt into him. He’d like to be touching those breasts, too, but they’re still a ‘look, don’t touch’ sort of thing, so he drags his fingers down her hips. “Taste so good. Gonna taste even better soon.” He gently licks over her lips. “Just a hint of Breena here. More than a hint soon. You going to teach me all of your tricks?"

Abby grins. “Nope.”

“What if I tease them out of you?”

She’s got a mischievous look in her eyes. “You can try.”

“Oh, I will.” He strokes Abby’s face, and then reaches forward to trail his fingers over Breena’s belly and pussy. “Beautiful. Ripe and soft,” his fingers flit over her pubic hair, sending shivery sensations through Breena, “golden and pink. Love that. Love seeing you naked and spread like that. Love you in his lap. Love her lips on yours, and her tongue lapping at you…” he squeezes his dick and moans gently, “Can’t even think of it without touching myself.” He glances to Jimmy, “And we’ll get your other man into it. He’ll spread your gorgeous pussy wide with his dick, and Abby’ll lick you wet and coming, and I’ll… God… Don’t know what, not yet, but we’re all going to like it!”

Talk.

Tim’s going to talk. He’s going to say every hot, filthy, dirty, scalding sexy thing that goes flitting into his head, and with his three loves naked and splayed out and fucking in front of him, he’s not having a hard time, at all, thinking of things to say.

And he’s going to take pictures. Breena won’t see them until the next day, but she’ll love them.

He’s going to get Breena slowly easing down Jimmy’s dick, her arms high, wrapped around his neck as they kiss, his hands cupping her breasts as Abby sucks her clit.

He’ll get a shot of him and Abby kissing as he licks Breena’s cum off her lips, and then he’ll tell them exactly how good it tastes and how much he wants more of it.

He’ll get Breena with her eyes closed, mouth just a little open, face tight, shuddering through her second (maybe third) orgasm of the night. And he’ll get Jimmy staring at her, naked love and lust and adoration and tenderness all blazing through his eyes as his fingers just ghost down her throat.

He’ll get insanely graphic shots, Breena’s pussy twitching on Jimmy’s cock. Abby’s tongue, long and pointed, just tracing over Breena’s clit. His own dick sinking into Abby’s pussy (though his camerawork isn’t very good on that shot, it felt too good for his hand to stay steady.)

He’ll get romantic shots. Abby and Breena kissing, just gentle lips on lips. Or the play of Jimmy’s knuckles against the back of Breena’s neck. His fingers twined in Abby’s hair (keeping it out of the way).

He gets one she wishes she could display, put up next to the shots of her girls at her office or something. It’s Breena’s belly, the gentle swell of four months pregnant with Donnie, with Jimmy’s hand, entwined with Tim’s on the left, and Abby’s on the right. She doesn’t know where they might put it, maybe in the bedroom, here, but she wants a print of that one.

He’ll get the pleasure/pain look on Jimmy’s face as he’s just teetering on the edge of orgasm. And he’ll get the next shot, that glow of joy and relaxation as the first spasm eases off, and the pleasure rushes through Jimmy.

He doesn’t get the shot of Abby getting off, though he tries. (This one makes Breena giggle when she sees it.) He gets a shot of half of Abby’s face, Breena’s pubes, and the ceiling. She was going down on Breena when she came, and took him along for the ride. His hand, and body, jerked at the exact wrong time for that shot, but Breena doesn’t mind, much. She can remember how both of them looked at that moment, and yes, a picture would be great, but this shot, with the obvious loss of control, makes her happy.

And through it all, looking at those pictures, she’ll remember words.

“Fuck baby, so beautiful…” “God, spread her wide and lick!” “Wiggle those hips, ride our man, good!” “Oh, fuck, nothing looks like that, you all pink and wet and wrapped around him. Nothing! Best show on Earth!”

Some of them were whispered, hot breath against Abby’s ear. “I know you can’t see it, not from here,” she was licking Breena’s pussy, keeping her view limited, “but she’s so pretty right now.” Tim lifted his eyes from Abby to Breena, staring at her, as he spoke to Abby, “All pink, wriggling on Jimmy’s cock. Her hands are clenched on his, and he’s kissing her, that’s so pretty, too. His lips all wet, sliding on hers, sucking, soft and gentle, on her lower lip.” Abby moaned, and Tim gave her a little grind, rubbing his finger over her clit and thrusting deep and steady. “Feels good, right?” Abby moaned, again. “Yeah. Feels soo good to me, too. All tight and hot and smooth, so good, Abby.”

Some stutter. Breena doesn’t know if Tim knows that sometimes they don’t exactly come out smooth, but sometimes he gets so into it the syllables trip over each other. “Oh… God… fu…fu… fuck! OH!” (Tim and Abby were fucking, slow and easy, and Abby shifted up, scooting in closer, kneeling in front of Breena, and kissed her slow and wet, licking her lips, mixing that with little, ripe sucks, while shifting back, hard onto Tim. His words started to trip when she did that.)

Some didn’t exactly make real sentences. “Looks so… so… uh… uh… fuck!” Breena had her eyes closed then, just about to topple over for the last time that night. She doesn’t know if he was talking about how she looked, or Jimmy, or Abby, or all of them.

But he kept talking. Kept his voice and mind running. Kept lifting them higher with each word, giving desire voice and letting all of their senses and minds, get into the game.

And towards the end, as his camera work was getting shakier and shakier but the pictures he does manage to get are that much more intense, his voice shifted, lower, rougher, more grunts and groans, and the words that do manage to come are more about love and less about fucking.

“Loveyou…love…you…fuck…ah…uh…love!” That’s what was coming out of his mouth as his body jerked, and the camera didn’t get the shot of Abby’s face.

They crash after, sprawled across the harem room bed.

Tim’s on his butt, on the floor, Abby curled into him, both of them relaxing. He’s got his hand wrapped around Breena’s ankle, she’s mostly on the bed, her one leg is dangling off, with Jimmy, who’s entirely on the bed, so Tim can’t touch him from where he is.

He gives her a gentle squeeze. “You get what you wanted from that?”

“Oh yeah.” There’s a huge smile on her face. And then there’s a huge yawn. “And you know what’s even better?”

“What?” Abby asks.
“I’m not the one on baby duty.” She lifts her head up to grin at all of them.

Tim scoffs, slowly sits up, and gives her a quick kiss. He seems to notice he’s still got the (now dry) shirt on, and tosses it into the corner of the room. “Yeah, yeah, yeah.”

He finds his PJ pants and heads to the bathroom to get rid of the condom. A minute later he’s back in their bedroom, pulling them on, as Abby gets onto the bed with Jimmy and Breena. Now that they aren’t moving much, they’re all cooling down rapidly. He kisses Abby, and Jimmy, who’s already asleep, and then they hear the cry of a little boy looking for more food.

“And off I go.”

Abby and Breena hug him again, before they snuggle in, deep and warm into their bed.

Breena’s looking forward to good dreams.

Chapter End Notes

If you guys want to see the inspiration for Tim's shirt, google Sean Murray Heal The Bay. He's got that translucent white shirt on. (Alas, he's got a t-shirt under it.)
Leon heads down on Monday. Tim looks up from polishing his abuse reporting software, and says, “Trouble?”

“Not exactly. I got my summons from Congress. They want me up there week after next to explain why we toppled the old government.”

Tim inclines his head. Abbi went up yesterday, with Penny and Ducky, so he knew this was coming.

“They sent a huge stack of questions, and some of them, I’m handing right off to you.”

“They’re not calling me up?”

“They may do that, too. But they’re questions I can’t answer on my own, so you get them.”

Tim nods at that. “Fire away.”

Leon taps his phone a few times, and his computer chirps, letting him know he’s got a new email. And with that chirp, Tim’s well aware that this wasn’t something Leon had to come down for.

“Housekeeping out of the way… What’s really got you down here?”

“Checking the calendar today, and noticed you’ve got less than sixty days here.”

Tim winces a bit at that, he’s been… maybe not trying to not think about that, but… putting it off.

“Yeah. June 30th, last day. Feels…” He doesn’t finish that.

Leon inclines his head, and chews his toothpick harder. “Last time we talked you didn’t exactly have a second in command. So…”

“It’s gonna be Ngyn.”

“Didn’t you say she didn’t want it?”

“I was wrong. I offered it to her, like I told you I would, and instead of her turning me down, she jumped at it. That caught me flatfooted, so I’ve been giving her more and more to do, and… she’s doing it.”

“How well?” Leon’s got his very interested, scrutinizing look on his face.

Tim tries to think of a way to say this without sounding like an asshole, but he’s not coming up with it, so, “Better than Jenner, not as good as me. Competent, solid, good ideas, but she’s not going to turn everything on its head.”

“I can live with that.”

“My team likes her… Well, as much as they know her, they like her. They respect her, which matters more. And she’s doing okay with keeping Howard on her face to face work. Sort of like how Gibbs used to make Tony do anything that needed serious personal interaction.”

“Okay. I can live with that, too. What are you doing?”

Tim knows he’s asking about how he’s filling his last two months. “Getting your abuse reporting
“I’m not poaching on the field teams who get the jobs, just keeping tabs on it. Making sure they know what to do with the reports they’re getting. I don’t want to see any, ‘But, this says there have been no reports of abuse, why are we here?’ sorts of responses. I also want to make sure that they know a command with too many reports might not be a sign of things going wrong, so much as a place where people feel comfortable making reports. We’ve got data, we don’t necessarily know what it means, so these first cases will involve a lot of feeling around.”

Leon chews his toothpick thoughtfully at that. “And by the time you head off…”

“It’ll be up and running, maybe not as smooth as possible, but… You’ve got analysts, use them. Really, all Cybercrime is supposed to do with something like this is make it work. There should be a data wonk somewhere to dig into it.”

“Would somewhere be New York?” Leon asks. The only analyst, trained analyst, he had working for him is Bishop.

“That’s who I was thinking of, but… Ducky tells me that Jake and Penny keep them busy digging through numbers for DC. And on top of that Baby Bishop is due any day now, so, probably not. The NSA, FBI, CIA, all of them had people on staff who did nothing but look at numbers and figure out trends from those numbers, and a lot of them are looking for new jobs, so… Maybe it’s headhunting time.”

“Maybe.” Leon thinks about Tim’s program. “Feels like the future. Instead of waiting for reports to tell us where the crime is, we’re using lack of reports to figure out where there’s unreported crimes.”

Tim smiles at that. “Welcome to 2017. No flying cars, but we can do some spiffy things with numbers.”

Leon shakes his head a bit, and heads out.
their parents are very interested, too.

So, as Abby and Gibbs get into a signed conversation about what hearing ear dogs are and what they can do for Deaf people, and how to get hooked up with one, Tim’s holding Sean, who’s awake, watching everything. He’s also keeping track, as well as he can, of the little puppy and the girls playing with him.

Tim’s trying not to get his hopes up.

At a bit more than four months old, it’s starting to get clearer that something isn’t quite normal with Sean.

Like any other baby, he’s bright-eyed, and very interested in anything he can see. He’s got laser focus (for the minute or two anything can hold his interest) in anything he can see. But, it’s just there for things he can see.

Obviously, unlike a hearing baby his age, his attention cannot be had by making noise.

He won’t turn toward sounds.

And… he makes noises, but, he doesn’t sound like other babies. He’ll gurgle and coo and cry, and he babbles, too, but not the same sort of way any of his siblings did. Especially with babbling, his pacing is off. He’s not mimicking anyone’s speech patterns. And, he won’t do it back.

That’s probably the thing that gets to Tim the most. He remembers lying on the floor with Kelly, hovering over her, cooing at her and having her coo back to him. When he does that with Sean, he’ll mimic the mouth movements, but, no sound.

He’s really good (for a four-month-old) at mimicking facial expressions. He can stick his tongue out at someone like nobody’s business.

Tim’s holding him close, face to face. He sticks his tongue out, and Sean does it back. Tim smiles and Sean smiles back. He doesn’t coo, because Sean won’t.

“Sean McGee…” And it’s time for them to go in.

The nurse pays attention to Sean, though they can see she’s also eyeing Jackson. She reads his vest, looks at Gibbs, who’s radiating just try and stop us, and decides that she probably doesn’t want to attempt to keep him out.

If Sean could get the hearing aid out of his ear, he would. He doesn’t have the coordination to do it. His hand is flailing in the general direction of the side of his head, occasionally making contact somewhere near his ear.

“Think it’s a sign that it’s working?” Abby asks.

The nurse smiles a bit. “They all do this at first. Mostly, I think it’s a sign that it’s cold.”

“Oh.”
“Because of his age, we can’t just ask him how things sound, so, like the rest of his hearing tests, we’re going to wait for him to fall asleep, and test him again. It’ll take longer, because with each sound, we’ll adjust the hearing aid, to see if we can get a range where he’s got some hearing.”

They all nod, and then settle in for a long wait.

Watched pots never boil, and watched babies do not sleep.

At least, it feels that way. But, eventually, Gibbs creeps out of the little waiting room to let the nurse know that Sean’s ready for his test.

Then he creeps back, easing open the door, and stops halfway in, feeling stupid. Even if the hearing aid works splendidly, it’s not going to make things so loud that this child might be woken up by footsteps on a floor.

Especially given that this child is sleeping through Jackson enthusiastically saying hello to Gibbs as he heads back in.

Obviously, tiny barking dog is not in the range of sounds that will wake him up. Granted, that doesn’t mean he can’t hear it. All of the McPalmer kids are good sleepers. Once they’re out, they’re out, but it doesn’t bode well, either.

So, they sit, they wait, they watch the nurse put the little electrodes on Sean. They watch her run sounds, and then run more sounds, and adjust the hearing aid, and adjust it again, and again, and more sounds, and more adjustments and…

And at the end, she shakes her head. She slowly takes the electrodes off Sean’s head. “If I set the volume on maximum, and then play the sound at one notch below full volume, it barely spikes the reading. He’d be hearing it the same way you hear,” she drops her voice to a bare whisper, “this.” Her voice goes back to normal. “Anything less than a train blaring by won’t come through. Turned all the way up, he’d only be able to hear the guys screaming at the top of their lungs. Anything higher pitched, like your voice,” she looks at Abby, “or a softer volume, won’t come through for him.”

There’s trying to be positive. There’s slapping a smile on your face and saying, “It’ll be okay.” There may, eventually, even be believing it, but right now…

Tim’s been keeping himself, intentionally, in this cloud of ‘This is okay.’ ‘It’s not that bad.’ ‘This is a situation that can be fixed or… managed.’ He hates the word fixed in regards to his son.

And it’s not that any of that is wrong. And it’s not a bad place to keep himself. As coping mechanisms go, as a way to keep himself in a useful, non-depressed, non-panicked mindset, it’s a good thing, but…

But it’s not okay.
Sean’s not okay.

And this isn’t something they’ll just flip a switch and make better and…

And he’s finally letting himself feel the punch to the guts.

And it runs from everything from disappointment, to wondering if he’ll ever hear his son say, “Daddy.”

Sean’s sitting in his car seat, and today Tim’s in the back, with him. He gently lays his hand on Sean’s tummy, and Sean looks in his direction. Tim smiles at him, though his eyes are burning, wondering if his son will ever hear him say, “I love you.”

On the car ride back to their place, he’s not crying. Intentionally. Determinedly. Gibbs and Abby can both see what he’s doing, and they don’t press him. They know he’s more than comfortable enough with them, that if he wanted to break down, he could.

And if he’s not, it’s intentional.

 Mostly it’s that he feels this… sick… awful sensation all through him, and the little rational voice keeps telling him that it’s stupid.

Abby’s dad was just as deaf as Sean and it didn’t hold him back. Maybe. Who knows what or who he would have been if he could have heard? Among other things, alive. He might still be alive if he could have heard that car coming for him.

But… In the cosmic scale of things, Thomas Sciuto made a fully functional life for himself. He learned to speak. He ran his own business. He got married. He raised two amazing kids. He did everything most everyone wants or needs to do, and he did it in a silent world.

And Tim knows their doctor said the hearing aid probably wouldn’t do much. The guy who went to medical school and got the degree and spent years mastering this told them it wasn’t worth the effort, but…

But he’s staring at his little boy, currently in his little black onesie with the skull on it (hand me down from his sisters), little feet kicking at bit as he watches the seat back of their car, in his completely silent world.

And that stings.

Non-functional hearing aid means decision time.

Cochlear implants? Yay or nay.

One ear or two?

All at once, or one at a time?

There’s no ‘right’ answer.

He thinks that’s the part that hurts the most about having to make this decision. He and Abby spend the car ride back to NCIS bouncing this around, up and down and back and forth and…
“There’s no fucking right answer!” he finally spits out.

And she smiles at him, weakly, and nods. “And that’s killing me! All day, we find answers. We find the right answer. That’s… how we make the world, or at least a bunch of little worlds, better. And…”

“And we’ll spin on this forever because there’s no right answer. There’s just, tradeoffs. Both ears, and he’ll ‘hear’ better, have an easier time learning how to speak, but the nerves will be so damaged that if they come up with a way to regenerate those nerve cells, he won’t be able to get it. Just do one ear, he won’t be able to locate by sound, he’ll have a harder time pulling words out of a crowd, and there’s no guarantee ‘better’ is coming up anytime soon.”

“And no guarantee they’ll help all that much in the first place. Even if we do one ear at a time, not having much benefit in his left ear doesn’t mean that’s how it’d work for his right! I know!” Abby sounds frustrated enough to spit. And Tim’s not far behind.

“So…” he says, quietly, feeling almost overwhelmed by all of it. He realizes he’s paying way more attention to their conversation than the road, so he pulls over. The last thing they need is to boot this decision further down the road by getting into a car accident.

She opens and closes her mouth. Do the best they can for their child. That’s what they’re going to do, but right now, they don’t know what that is.

He bites his lip and his voice is not even remotely certain as he says, “I’m leaning toward all in. Do them both, do them at once, get it done, and go from there.”

“If they don’t work…” If they don’t work, that will limit his options for something else. If they do, that’ll get him as close to growing up hearing as he can get. Maximum risk, maximum possible reward.

They’re both just looking at each other. It’s not an argument, she’s not against doing it. She just isn’t necessarily for it, either. And neither is he.

They just… don’t know.

“If we do one… we’ll have more options,” she says.

“If we do one, and it works, we’ll do the other, and that’s taking him to be operated on twice.”

Neither of them like the idea of that, at all. Just sticking him in the MRI hurt, they don’t even want to think too hard about handing him over to be cut open, twice.

Both of them sitting there, their internal wheels spinning, Tim knows why they opted for the hearing aid, even though it wasn’t going to work. It put this conversation off for a month.

The Easy Answer Fairy does not deign to visit them that day.

Or the next.

Or the one after that.

They keep going over different courses of actions. The pros, the cons, the huge, massive, mind-dulling piles of information online.
It’s Thursday at lunchtime when Breena does something she doesn’t usually do, and that’s go find Jimmy to have a one on one lunch.

Before the kids, they’d have lunch together on a somewhat regular basis, because before the kids she’d just head back to Slaters and finish the day there. Since she leaves at one now, she usually eats there, eats fast, and is then back to work to get as much done as she can.

But right now, she wants a moment with her first husband, alone, to talk about her other two spouses.

It’s often easier to see the problems of a marriage from the outside. This is why people go to marriage counseling. Get an outside view of the problems.

Tim and Abby have a very solid marriage. That’s not the issue. But, they also have a deep, deep need to be “right.” This helps them get along with each other, and when there’s a “right” answer to be had, it makes them an unstoppable team.

If, for example, you happen to be innocent, and are being framed, you want Tim and Abby on your side, because they will go to the ends of the earth to find the “right” answer.

But right now, where there’s no right answer, it’s turning them into a whirling mass of “research” as they do everything they can to put off making the “wrong” decision.

“They’re dithering,” Breena says as she and Jimmy sit down at Carlo’s for lunch.

He holds his hands wide, agreeing with her, and also signaling he’s not sure, what, if anything, they should do about it.

“Yeah, that’s the question. I mean, should we… do something?”

“What’s something? We’re already telling them they’ll make the right decision, and it’s going to be okay.”

She sips her Coke. “Not that. That’s not helping. That might be making things worse, because they’re so caught up in the ‘right’ decision.”

“So…”

Her voice is tentative on this. “Maybe we could… have an opinion on something?”

They’ve been intentionally not having an opinion on any of the options because they’ve been trying to provide maximum support for anything Tim and Abby might want to do.

Jimmy sighs long and low on that, and then takes a drink of his water. “That’s…”

She nods. “Yeah.”

“Do you have an opinion?” Jimmy asks.

“The only one I’ve really got right now is that both of them continually going over the same information over and over and over, hoping to find some grain of sand they haven’t seen before, isn’t healthy.”

“Yes. You’re right on that.” Jimmy taps his fingers against the table. He’s read everything Tim and Abby have, and helped them with the bits they didn’t have the background to figure out for themselves. And, just like Dr. Snyder, all he can do is lay out options, he can’t tell them which one is right.

Because none of them are right. Or all of them are. They’re just different flavors of right.

“I’d probably lean toward one implant now, and if they haven’t started human trials for some sort of cellular regeneration, or are at least really close to them by the time he’s five, then go for the second one. Make sure he hits school hearing as well as he can.”

“That sounds reasonable.”

“Yeah, well, they’re all reasonable. Do nothing surgical, go for extensive speech therapy, and wait, hoping for something better, is reasonable. What makes Sean’s life easiest?”

“And we go round and round. Easiest how, and when?”

Jimmy groans at that. “On the upside, neither of us is carrying around a lifetime of ‘We did it for your own good.’”

Breena sighs at that, too. “How much of that is stalling him out?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Don’t know. Can’t read his mind, and he’s not really talking about it. All three of us know it’s there, though.”

Breena reaches across the table and squeezes Jimmy’s hand. “Yeah. Okay. One now, hold off for number two, that seems reasonable to me, however you want to define reasonable. Let’s just… indicate that sounds like a good plan the next time they bring it up. Maybe if instead of ‘everything is good’ we go with ‘this specific plan is good’ and they’ll have an easier time settling on a plan.”

“You gonna see Gibbs today?” Jimmy asks. He knows sometimes Gibbs’ll bring Dave and Jackson over to hang out with the girls.

Breena shakes her head. “Window of opportunity’s closing on that fast.”

If he’d been thinking, he would have realized that was true. “Right. Naptime starts at 2:00, and you’ll just be getting home then.”

“Exactly. Tomorrow at Shabbos. I’ll likely see him before you do.”

“And Ziva, too.”

“Yeah.”

“Okay, let’s see if we can get them enlisted in ‘project, provide approval for a specific course of action.’”

“I’ll spread the word.”
It’s much later that night, when Tim’s up, walking Sean around after his feed, that Jimmy gets up, too.

Maybe it’s because they tend to be tired at these late night walks, maybe it’s just easier to be scared and vulnerable and worried in the dark… Maybe. Jimmy doesn’t know. He does know he’ll have an easier time getting into the knots in Tim’s head now.

Tim’s got his throat against the top of Sean’s head, and he’s quietly humming. When he sees Jimmy, he says, “Go back to sleep. It’s my night.”

“I know.” Jimmy yawns and sits on the, rocking chair watching Tim pace. “He’s not going to hold it against you, Tim.”

For a second, Tim’s eyes scrunch into a curious look, and then smooth out as he understands.

“I’m sure my mom thought the same thing.”

“No. I don’t think she did. She might say that, but… No. I don’t think she ever got that far into it. She was doing the right thing, and she was going to make you do the right thing, and that was that.”

Tim nods a little. That fits.

“I’m not saying he’s gonna like what you and Abby pick. I don’t know that, can’t. But I do know you’re not going to spend your life torturing him, or covering for us torturing him, so when you say to him, ‘Here are the options we had, we looked at all of them, and then we made the best decision we could,’ he’ll believe it. Maybe not as a kid, but by the time he’s your age, he will.”

Tim pats Sean, who is fussing quietly about the burp he’s holding onto like it’s made of gold. “Just let it go, Sean, you’ll feel so much better.” This does not cause the fussing to stop, or a belch to appear. “I think there’s a hole in that nipple or something. He’s getting too much air sometimes.”

“Way to skirt the issue.” But Jimmy does get up, find the bottle in question, and toss the nipple out. “And now it’s taken care of.”

“What if we’re wrong?” Tim’s eyes are wide, and that’s the one thing he’s not been willing to say to Abby, and vice versa, because they both know that’s what scares both of them more than anything, and they’re both trying to not freak the other one out, too badly. He’s being strong for her. She’s being strong for him. And they’re both spinning their wheels.

Jimmy stands up and holds Tim, kissing him, and then kissing the top of Sean’s head. Sean squeaks and jerks a bit in surprise at this sudden, new, warm body against his. And that sudden jerk appears to dislodge the burp he’s been holding onto. A second after that, he’s soft, and snuggly, and not fussing at all.

As soon as the belch has died down, Jimmy says, “Then we’re wrong. God, Tim, we’re gonna be wrong! A lot. By the time they’re teenagers, I’m fairly certain they’ll think we live in the world of perpetual wrong, incapable of finding right with a GPS and both hands.”

Tim waves that off. “Curfew time isn’t putting him at risk of death. It’s not permanently hampering his ability to speak. It’s… bullshit. ‘Get your homework done;, not gonna matter all that much. ‘Make sure that skirt covers your ass,’ really, not a big deal. Possible allergic reaction to the anesthesia, or maybe a massive infection and… And, this is the possibility of wrong. Permanent, life-altering, wrong hovering on the horizon.”

Jimmy kisses him again. “Sixteen years from now, you’re going to let him drive, right?”
Tim rolls his eyes. He doesn’t really want to be comforted right now, and he doesn’t want to be rational, he just wants to not have to do this.

Jimmy sees it. And he sees Sean’s eyes drooping. “Put him down before he falls asleep on you.”

Tim steps over to the crib and lays Sean down. He spends a moment wriggling and scooting a bit, but after that, he’s on his back, with his eyes getting heavier and heavier, and… they close. Sleeping baby. Of all of them, Sean’s the easiest sleeper.

Tim’s standing there, next to the crib, looking down at Sean. “I should have to leave to do this. Say a word when Kelly’s this close to asleep, and her eyes’ll fly open, and boom, awake kid.”

Jimmy stands back up and walks over to Tim, laying his hand on his back. “I know.” Once Sean’s eyes close, the outside world vanishes for him.

Both of them are quiet for a long time, watching Sean settle deeper into sleep.

“It’s not going to just get better,” Tim says quietly.

“Nope. He’s got a long road, and it’s going to be difficult. It’s covered in brush and vines, and steep, and rocky, and he’s not going to like a lot of it, but it’s walk the road or curl up and die, and we’re not letting him do that, so… We take his hands, and we beat the path down as smooth as we can, and we’ll give him a machete to cut through the brush, and make sure it’s good and sharp for when he heads off on his own.”

“I feel like anything I grab for him will be a spoon, not a machete.”

“That’s not true.”

“I know that. Abby knows it, too. Knowing isn’t the problem.”

Jimmy gently strokes his back.

“And what if that machete ends up cutting him? I know it’s a longshot. I can read the reports. I know what they say. I know all of it. But I can’t feel it.”

“Once you’re on the other side of it, you’ll be fine.”

“Yeah, as long as the brain’s right and the heart isn’t.”

“Your brain is right.” Jimmy gently rubbing up and down Tim’s back as he says this. “This isn’t Gibbs’ gut telling you to keep wary on the Stennis. This is you looking at one of the two people you love beyond all reason, who you can’t imagine your life without, who just the idea of them hurt makes you want to curl into a little ball and cry, and your heart running away with that. This child is not allergic to anesthetic. He got some during the c-section, and more every meal he had the first few days. He’s not allergic to antibiotics, because again, he got some during the c-section, and more every meal he had for the first few days.” Jimmy’s not exactly lying, but he’s not exactly telling the truth here, either. With allergies, dosage, and number of doses matter. What he is doing is trying to get Tim’s brain back in charge.

“I know.”

“And you putting this off, dithering and dithering… You’re not making him any better off, and you and Abby are just torturing yourselves.”
“We’re not making him any worse off, either.”

Jimmy sighs. We carry each other when we can’t walk. “Do you need Breena and I to make the decision?”

Tim’s eyes close slowly at that, and Jimmy feels a tremor through his back. He inhales fast and sharp, and then bites his lip. Then he exhales, long and slow. “Monday, dinner time. If we haven’t made an appointment for something by Monday, then… yes.”

“Okay. Come on, he’ll be up again soon. Let’s get back to bed.”

---

Friday, lunchtime. This time it’s Tim and Abby on their own.

They’re in Tim’s office, with two untasted lunches, and Tim’s phone, on speaker, ringing.

Abby hits the off button, this time. Tim’s already done it twice, too.

“People can learn to speak really well just with speech therapy.”

Tim nods at that. She’s absolutely right about that. But, all the speech therapy on earth won’t let a person hear. “But we’re not going that direction. Not unless we have to, and…”

She nods again. If there’s any way he can “hear,” they want that. She again hits redial.

One ring, two, three, “You’ve reached Dr. Snyder’s office. If this is a medical emergency, hang up and dial 911. To speak to a nurse press one. To renew a prescription press two. To make an appointment, please stay on the line…” Soft, upbeat music fills Tim’s office.

“Dr. Snyder’s office, this is Brigitte speaking, how may I help you?”

Neither of them says anything for a long moment. Then they hear a collection of beeps. Probably Brigitte putting in the information a Deaf person would need for the talk to text device to turn words into text.

“Uh…” Abby says, letting Brigitte know there’s a hearing person on the line. “I’m here.”

“Excellent. What can we do for you?”

Tim exhales long and slow, making himself calm down. “We’d like to make an appointment for a pre-cochlear implant consultation.”

“Excellent. Let me check the calendar. Dr. Snyder has time on June 19th at 9:00 for a consultation. And if you like, we can pre-schedule a date for the surgery, today, too. That way, if you decide to go ahead with it, you’re already on the calendar.”

Again, silence from Tim and Abby. This time, she’s the one who speaks. “Yes. Our son is four-months-old now, so…”

“No problem with that…” Her voice is light and perky, like she’s talking about scheduling a vacation to BoraBora. Tim hates her. He knows he won’t tomorrow, but right now he’s pisses that she doesn’t sound like she’s scheduling this massively grave, important, possibly life shattering event. “We’re scheduling surgeries for November now. What’s your son’s name?”
“Sean McGee,” Tim says, squeezing Abby’s hand.

“We can’t give you an exact time, but early morning on November 6th is open.”

“Okay. We’ll take it,” Abby says after another long moment of her and Tim just staring at each other.

“Great. Okay, I’ve got Sean in the system for June 19th at 9:00 and November 6th in the morning.” Abby’s putting that into their calendar.

“Uh… Thanks,” Tim says.

“No problem, see you next month.”

“Yeah,” Tim exhales, hanging up. “Why do I feel like a bullet just whipped by my head?”

“Because your adrenaline spiked just as hard as mine did.”

“Yeah.” His hand is shaking, and he notices hers are, too. “Jimmy says this’ll be better when it’s done.”

“Then we’ve only got six more months of this.”

“Yay!” Tim says with vicious sarcasm. Then he looks at his food, and pokes it. He looks at Abby’s and slides it closer to her. “I’m allowed to skip meals. You need yours.”

She snorts at that, and pokes his food closer to him. “Together.”

He opens his salad. “Okay.”

Half an hour later, when the adrenaline’s finally burned off, he does feel a little better. A bit more settled.

By the time they’re at dinner, and Abby’s explaining what they did today, that aching, sick, morass of indecision doesn’t tinge every word he and she says.

He supposes that’s all for the good. And by bedtime, he’s able to sleep fairly well.

Fairly. There’s still that little voice in the back of his head that doesn’t know how he’s going to live with himself if Sean doesn’t come out of surgery okay.
When it rains, it pours.

Tony’s on the phone saying to dispatch, “You know I’m already on a case, right?”

“We know that, Agent DiNozzo, but you’ve got a four-person team, and the case you’re on right now is a rape, and we’ve got a double homicide in Blacksburg…”

“Dorney?”

“Currently on a murder of his own in Fredericksburg.”

“Sanders?”

“Two man team, handling an assault in Quantico. Agent DiNozzo, you can give me the whole roster, and I will tell you that all of them are already on assignment. You’re the Senior Team Leader for the entire DC branch, and you’ve got a team and the assignment that allows that team to be split most easily.”

Shit. “Okay. Text me the address and tell Palmer I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

“Thank you, Agent DiNozzo.”

Draga drifts over. Right now, he and Spader are bagging clothing, bedding, and taking fingerprints and swabs of Petty Officer Camile Rohdes’ room. Johnson’s at the hospital, Norfolk General, talking to Rohdes.

“Trouble?” Draga asks.

Tony wiggles his hand and says, quietly, “Maybe. Just got a murder call. Got to split the team.”

Draga winces. This is already a “sensitive” case. All rape cases are, but unlike a robbery or even a murder, making sure you’ve got a good, solid rapport with the victim, so she keeps talking, and feels safe and comfortable talking, is paramount in these cases.

“Johnson’s staying here,” Draga says.

Tony nods. That wasn’t the question. The question is, is he staying here with Johnson, or is Draga?

For the most part, Draga’s been doing a pretty good job of not acting like a love/lust struck idiot. And, in an effort to try and keep things copacetic, Tony’s actually spoken to Johnson and told her that if any of the guys (he kept it vague but they both knew who he was talking about) turned into a problem, or looked like they were going to turn into a problem, that she could talk to him about it, and they’d get it worked out.

He doesn’t know if that was the right way to handle it, but she smiled and said she’d keep it in mind.

Gibbs wouldn’t have thought twice about it. He would have kept Ziva or Kate on the rape case, and put him with her, because he was the senior agent, and then taken Tim up to handle the murder. And, Gibbs having done that, and Tony being who he was, means that both Kate and Ziva had to deal with some horribly inappropriate behavior.

Tony doesn’t think Draga would pull anything even close to hopping into the bathroom with Kate in the shower, wearing only his boxers, singing along with her, but, on the off chance the little head ends up in charge of the decision making, say maybe under the influence of a beer or two with dinner, because this is the kind of case where they will be here at least one night, something could happen. And Tony wants to avoid that.

So, he could stay here with Johnson.

Except, of course, it’s a double homicide up in Blacksburg, and, yes Draga is good, but he’s not sure he wants to trust Draga and Spader, all on their own, with a double homicide. Not yet.

He pulls Draga further away from Spader. This is not a conversation he needs to hear.

“Tell me, that if I leave you here with Johnson, you won’t get stupid.”

Draga doesn’t look insulted by that, so that tells Tony it’s enough of a possibility that he’s concerned about it, too.

“Good. I want you concerned. No booze. You don’t set foot into her room. She doesn’t go into yours. You work in the lobby or restaurant if you have to do anything after hours.”

“Sounds like we’re talking about a really strict college.”

“Well, unlike when I was pulling this shit, if she fusses…” Actually, with the sort of stuff Tim’s putting into play… “Even if she doesn’t fuss, if I know/see/hear about/suspect something happens, I’ll have to fire your ass, and I don’t want to do that. You are a good agent, and so is she, so… Can this work? Or do you and Spader need to head off on your own?”

Draga thinks about it for a moment, and that also comforts Tony. He would have immediately said yes, and been lying. Draga nods. “I can be on the straight and narrow without having a chaperon.”

“Good. Okay. Since she’s the one who’s actually interacting with the victim, it’s her case and her lead. Back her up, point out where she needs to go if she needs it, but pretty much, let her run it.”

“I can do that.”

“Good. Okay. Spader and I are going to take off. It’s a double homicide in Blacksburg…” Tony sees Draga crack a wide grin. “Why are you smiling?”

“You’re going up to the home of Virginia Tech for graduation weekend!” Draga suddenly looks a whole lot happier, and more comfortable, with the half of the team he’s got.

“Fuck!” Tony winces. “So, you’re saying, start trying to find the hotel room now?”

“You drive. Spader does his magic with a computer, and hopefully finds something. There’s a good shot there’s not a single hotel room in town.”

Tony groans.

“Oh, and by the way, Blacksburg is way the hell out in the middle of nowhere, so, no room in town, no room anywhere else, either. Just in case, take one of the vans and bring sleeping bags”
Tony shoots Draga a you’re enjoying this way too much look. Draga smiles at him, and gets back to processing the scene.

He and Spader get back to DC. (Three hour drive up from Norfolk, Tony put the flashers on and never got below 85 the whole way.) They get a van, they get everything geared up, they get a quick lunch, and then they drive. It’s supposed to be a four and a half-ish hour drive. It takes them six. (Spader follows every traffic law, doesn’t turn his flashers on, and they hit traffic as everyone else on earth heads to Tech for graduation weekend.)

By that point it’s after seven pm, and all Tony really wants to do is get dinner, talk to Ziva, and then crash for the night. But that’s not happening.

Jimmy’s been waiting at the scene for them, (hopefully not for too long) and they need to go and at least get the first brush of the lay of the land. At least, photograph everything.

So, off to the Sigma Delta Rho frat house they go.

Once they get there, they’ve got to shoulder their way in through approximately twenty-five guys, all of them irate. It’s the Friday before graduation. They are supposed to be having the last, great, epic college party of their lives, and instead, they’re being held, (together, Tony winces at this, but he supposes there isn’t a great place to stick 25 guys individually) in the frat house until the body has been collected, and the scene released.

So, through the scrum of yelling/grumbling/threatening (‘I’m pre-law, and my father’s a Congressman!’) voices, they go to the basement where…

“Allan, where’s Jimmy?”

Allan looks up from his phone. He’s in the basement all on his own, well, unless you count the two dead guys with him. “He’s in DC, doing the autopsy for Dorney’s murder.”

“Right,” Tony says. Dorney’s got a murder, too. Allan and Jimmy probably flipped a coin on who’d be going out here. “So…”

“Private Seth Anderson,” Allan gestures to the body on his right, who is lying, face up, eyes open and vacant, with a badly broken nose, “has been, based on rigor and body temperature, dead since around 1:00 am this morning.”

Allan gestures to the other man. Also, lying on the ground, though he’s face down, though Tony can see the bruising around his neck. “Private Clinton Tynn. Also, based on temperature and rigor, dead since about 1:00 AM.”

Allan circles around. “Based on bruising on their faces and hands, I’m going to guess they managed to kill each other, though, of course, we won’t know that for certain until I’ve got them back home.”

Spader’s already photographing everything, but Allan’s got his interest with that, so he stops taking pictures and asks, “Okay, how do two guys manage to beat each other to death. One or the other, sure, I can see that, but both?”

“Again, this is based on having sat here for the last few hours after pondering this case after I got done with my initial examination, and I may be wrong, so take it with a few grains of salt, but… My guess is Tynn hit Anderson hard enough to cause a fatal brain bleed, which is slow, and Anderson choked Tynn to death while he was also dying.”

“And they kill each other… Okay…” Tony looks around. “They aren’t students here, are they?”

“Nope,” Spader says. Looking at his phone. They’re squadmates, on leave until the 20th, uh… Nothing in their files to indicate why they’d be down here.”

“Down here this basement, or down here Blacksburg?” Allan asks.

“Either, both,” Spader responds.

“Wonderful,” Allan says, dryly. Then he looks around. “You have all the pictures you want?”

“Just about,” Spader says, and goes back to shooting the scene as it is.

Tony, knowing that Allan on his own can’t get these two out of the basement, nods and says, “I’ll help with the gurney.”

“Thank you, Agent DiNozzo. It’s a long drive back, and I want to get on the road as soon as I can.”

“Yeah, I know it,” Tony replies.

_____________________________________________________

It’s after nine by the time they’ve got the scene cleared, the bodies on the way back to DC with Allan, and Tony’s done.

He supposes he could, and probably should, push. He should get all of the witness statements done tonight, and then roll into their hotel around 7:00, catch a catnap, and then up by 9:00 to start working on the leads they find in those statements… but… nope.

Maybe if he’d been getting more sleep at home…

At this point, he figures that if someone were to do a blood test on him, they’d find that it’s already two thirds caffeine, and if he keeps going, he’s going to miss something, or do something stupid. Granted, not Draga-type stupid, but contaminate a sample or something like that stupid.

He calls time, and on the way out, much to the annoyance of the frat kids, he tells the LEOs, “Keep ‘em all in there, don’t let them go near the basement, we’ll be back first thing.”

_____________________________________________________

It’s a crappy little room in a generic knock off of a Motel 6.

It’s not the worst place Tony’s stayed, but, for the US, it’s in the top ten.

The beds are lumpy, creaky, and too small. The sheets look like they’re made of polyester, and low thread count polyester at that. But as Spader points out there are two of them, and that wasn’t true in any of the other options. And, for that matter, if they’re here tomorrow night, too, and it looks like they will be, that won’t be true then, either.

Tony groans again, grabs his go bag, heads to the bathroom, and gets ready for bed. He’s tired, and this place sucks, but, and he considers this a sign that it’s been a while since he had a full night sleep, he doesn’t care all that much because he’s got at least nine hours between now and when he’s got to move again, and during those hours there will not be a crying baby looking for a meal.

He has a moment to feel bad for Ziva, who’s on her own tonight, until she remembers it’s Friday, and she’s at the house, with all of the rest of the family, and about as not on her own as she can be.

He sends her a picture of the bed, along with Missing you, and then goes to sleep.

In the morning… Okay, it’s morning, no one’s had their coffee, and the last nine hundred times he was away when he didn’t room with Ziva he roomed with Gibbs or McGee or Draga all three of whom know how this works.

And look, he’s a guy, so having another guy walk into the bathroom when he’s peeing to start his shower, especially when there’s one bathroom and the schedule is tight, is no big deal.

And Spader’s young. Kid can’t be much past twenty-five. And there are things that tend to happen to guys, especially young ones, while they sleep, and those things are usually still happening to them when they head to the bathroom. Not like Tony’s never seen a hard-on before, let alone a guy scratching his balls through his briefs as he heads into the bathroom in the morning, still three-quarters asleep.

He’s seen McGee, Gibbs, and Draga do that. No problem. Because they don’t make eye contact and they sure as hell don’t watch him pee.

They head into the bathroom, get undressed, facing away from him, maybe mumble ‘Morning’ (Tim or Draga) or grunt (Gibbs), and then get into the water and stay there, behind the shower curtain until he’s out.

And they absolutely do not get undressed still facing him, talking to him, looking at his dick, and then, slowly get into the shower. Never.

Still, Spader’s twenty-three years younger, and he was a submariner, and Tony knows those guys get no privacy at all. So, naked bodies probably aren’t a big deal to him, and Tony doesn’t want to read anything into this that isn’t there. So, he finishes brushing his teeth, and heads into the room to get dressed.

Frat Boy Statement Number: Who Gives A Fuck. They’ve all had vastly too much time with each other, so they’ve all got exactly the same responses.

“Dude, it’s graduation week. So, like, Thursday, that’s party night. Finals are over, underclassmen are gone, everything’s done, time to let loose. House was rocking. I didn’t see either of those guys come in, but, hell, there had to be more than two hundred people coming in and out.”

“The basement?” Insert sound of derision or amazement. “It’s locked. It’s always locked. That’s where we keep the booze. Have a party like this, and keep the basement open, next thing you know you’re out of booze. Hell, even without a party, these guys, if they could get down there… we’d blow our whole budget on alcohol. Only Pat,” the bartender and the frat house president “has a key.”

“Hear a fight? You’re kidding. Have you ever been to a frat party?” That one kills Tony. He’s been to parties that would have made this one look tame. “They could have been dueling with jackhammers down there and we wouldn’t have heard it.”

“Know them… Uh, no. Our graduation bash is a big deal, people come from all over for it. Tyler worked the door, so he was checking IDs, he said he got one from Wyoming. Seriously, people who love to party, they come for our grad bash.”

Tony’s sitting in a kitchen last cleaned by… Shit, this kitchen has never been cleaned. It’s a place in a house filled with teen/early twenty-something boys used primarily to keep beer cold. He’s lucky the scunge on the floors and walls hasn’t gotten up to eat them.

Spader comes in. He doesn’t need to sit there and listen to exactly the same series of stories over and over and over. He does place a cup of coffee next to Tony, and then smiles at him, and sits down next to him. “Want me to grab the next one?”

“Sure. In a minute.” Tony takes a sip. It’s just coffee, no Red Bull, obviously Spader decided that sleep last night meant Tony didn’t need the extra caffeine. Tony rubs his eyes. “There was a time I loved this.”

“Thought you still loved the job.”

“Not the job.” He gestures to the frat. “This. Delta Beta Chi.” Tony names his own frat. “Back in the day I was the king of these guys.”

“Then you’re the right guy to be here and build rapport.”

Tony smirks at that. “Unless we’re at Ohio State, no I’m not. I’m too damn old.”

“You’re not that old,” Spader’s looking at him really intently as he says that, and then, and Tony doesn’t know what to do with this, he pats Tony’s hand.

Tony swallows, hard, pulling his hand off the table and putting it in his lap. “Uh, yeah. Thanks. Almost fifty. Might as well be dead to these guys.”

“Nah. They know some serious shit went down, and they’re closing ranks. That’s why we’re not getting anywhere. All of them know what happened.”

Tony nods at that. Spader may have fuck all for instincts when it comes to things like how to behave in the bathroom or touching other people, but he’s dead right on this.

Tony sits back and watches Spader get exactly the same series of answers, down to “dueling with jackhammers,” which, Really, what’d they do, write a goddamned script?

He gets up to check in with Allan.

As he paces around the grounds of the frat house, apparently kept up with a bit more attention to detail than the kitchen, though he supposes the college may do that, so the campus looks good for tomorrow, he hits Allan’s contact number.

A few rings, and then, “Good timing Agent DiNozzo, I’m almost done.”

“Great. Got anything good for me?”

“Not sure about good, but interesting. First off, strangulation and severe subdural hemorrhage are “Choking and a brain bleed, like you said.”

“Yes. Now for interesting part number one, no traces of alcohol or any other party drug in their system. They didn’t go to have a good time.”

“Sounds like there’s an interesting part number two.”

“Yes there is. Corwin in the lab is telling me that both of our victims have each other’s skin cells and blood on them, and Anderson has one other, as of yet unknown, male donor, as well.”

“Three people in the fight?”

“Only if Tynn never laid a hand on one of them and managed to not get hit by any flying blood, sweat, or saliva.”

“Two fights,” Tony says. He’s been in more than enough fights to know there’s no way to get three guys fighting and not have any of the two other guys rub off on guy number three.

“I’m thinking Anderson and Tynn fighting each other was the second round. It’s possible that Anderson’s brain bleed didn’t come from Tynn. It probably took about fifteen minutes to kill him, and we don’t know how long they were fighting for.”

“Great. Would there be any way to tell who caused the bleed?”

“Not from what I have now. We swabbed his face and head, and found samples from Tynn and one of the unknown males. Anderson’s blood was on Tynn’s clothing, and given the fact there was mucus in it, we know it’s from his nose, what we don’t know is if it came from when his nose was broken, or if he bled on Tynn afterward. If we can find what the other assailant was wearing, and it didn’t have nasal blood on it from Anderson, we could rule him out as having been the one who broke Anderson’s nose.”

“And the break is what killed him?”

“Not immediately. If you do that strike right, it’ll force the bones into the brain and kill the person quickly. The hit was off, a bit to the side, so instead of an almost instant kill, it took a while for the swelling to finish Anderson off.”

“Great. And that’s what gave him time to finish Tynn off?”

“That’s how it looks.”

“Okay, thanks Allan. Is Jimmy around, I’d like to say hi.” And find out how last night went, and also, have a moment to talk to someone about how flipped out he should be if one of his employees just patted his hand to comfort him.

“Not now. He worked way late, finished up, and then went home.”

“Okay.”

Statement, statement, statement… It takes a long time to go through twenty-five statements, but by the end of the day, they’re able to release the frat brothers, with the ‘don’t go anywhere’ caveat.
They all give Tony and Spader a look along the lines of ‘Are you stupid? Graduation is tomorrow, we’re not going anywhere.’

Tony asks the LEOs to keep an eye on the house and grab anyone who might try to run. Someone in there knows something, and if they’re lucky, one of them will get stupid and make a break for it.

“So, what do you want for dinner?” Spader asks as they get into their car.

“God, I don’t care. The stuff Jimmy’s got me eating all tastes like crap.”

“It’s good for you.”

Tony rolls his eyes. Especially right now, far away from everything he loves, not getting a hit of sugary, fatty, alcoholic pleasure hurts. “I could use a bit less good for me.”

Spader breaks into a wide smile. “I know that feeling. I’ve got a cheat day every week. Come on, let’s go get a huge pizza with everything, wash it down with a bunch of beer, and then go over the reports Corwin sent us.”

And that sounds good to Tony.

Fortunately, in a college town, it is not difficult to locate pizza or beer. There’s piles of it.

And Tony is groaning with pleasure as that first taste of cheesy, meaty (he figured if he was going to cheat he was going to cheat. He’s not only off his diet, but it’s not kosher, either.) spicy, crusty goodness floods his mouth and he’s in rapture. Washing it down with ice cold malty, hoppy, bitter, yeasty beer just makes everything better.

Spader laughs. “There’s a man who loves his food.”

“Haven’t had a pizza with everything since before I got married.”

Spader sighs. “She must be a hell of a woman.”

“Oh, you have no idea. Yeah, she is. Sometimes though, I miss this.”

“That’s long term relationships, right?” Spader smiles a little, and his blue eyes stay glued to Tony. “Give and take, and you do things to make the other one happy.”

“Exactly.”

“And when you’re on your own…”

Tony takes another bite of his pizza, grinning. “Yeah, what she doesn’t know, won’t hurt me.” It’s a few hours later when he realizes that that might not have been the best way to express the idea of It’s okay if I have a little food splurge now and again.

Spader takes a bite of his, smiles at Tony, and then switches around so he and Tony are on the same side of the table, his leg brushing against Tony’s, which has Tony feeling alarmed, until a second later, when he opens up his laptop and pulls up the reports from Corwin in the lab.
No way for them both to see it unless they’re on the same side, and the booth is small, no way for the two of them to sit on one side without touching.

The pizza is excellent. The beer is amazing. The case is… shit.

On the upside, they can call out everyone in the frat on one lie. There were tons of fingerprints all up and down banister to the basement. There were prints all over the door. Everything they printed, including the victims, had lots of prints on them.

That, of course, is a tiny thread to go on. It’s enough of a thread to print everyone, so there’s something.

Once they finish dinner, they head back to the frat, find that all of the members are still there, and explain that they need everyone’s prints.

This results in immediate requests for lawyers, and Tony and Draga head to their room (a new one, because last night’s hotel was booked for today) while the Sigma Delta Rho boys gather together a half-dozen legal-beagle parents to go head to head with them in the morning.

This is not a generic Motel 6 knockoff. It’s an AirB&B. They’re in someone’s home. A very interested someone in what they’re doing this weekend, but finally Tony gets his hosts to back off and leave them to crash.

The room is really nice. Clean, comfy looking, offers breakfast in the morning, and wifi.

So, of course, the only bed is a king. No double beds. (Why, why, why are they in Blacksburg during graduation week?)

“You want the sofa or the bed?” Tony asks, being, honestly, a lot more conciliatory than usual. But he’s nervous. Spader just… stands too close, smiles too much, and is way too eager to please.

“There’s more than enough room; we can share the bed.”

Spader steps a little closer to him, and for the first time Tony’s really aware of the fact that he’s 6’5”, more than twenty years younger, and probably 250 pounds of solid muscle. It's the first time in a very long time that he's felt, in his guts, that he's next to a guy he couldn't take down without a gun.

“I’m good with the sofa,” Tony says, fast.

Spader’s staring at the sofa, which is maybe five feet long. “You sure?” Like everything else in the room, it’s nice, but it’s small. It’s designed for a small person to sit on and maybe watch some TV or read for a little while. A kid could sleep on it, but Tony? Way too short for that.

“Well, yeah, but…” Tony looks at the bed. He’s a big guy. Spader’s a huge guy. And that might be a king, but it’s not one of the McPalmer-made-for-four-people-sized beds, which is about as much space as he wants between him and Spader if they’re going to be in the same bed.

Spader looks at the bed and shrugs. “Plenty of room. In a sub your berth is twenty-one inches wide and six feet long. So, I'm good. Or are you a bed hog?"

“No. Just…”

Spader turns down the covers and smiles brightly. “Then get in. No reason for us to be uncomfortable. And we’ll both work better tomorrow if we get good sleep. You've been rubbing your neck all day from sleeping on that slab of lumpy cement they called a mattress at last night's place.”

Tony hadn't noticed he'd been doing it, but once Spader mentioned it, he knows he has. His neck pops every time he's turned it too far to the left today. He looks at the sofa, and imagines that he'd have to sleep sitting up, back curled up, neck all the way on the head rest, or on his side, curled into a little ball. His body doesn't like either of those positions. He sighs.

“True.” So, Tony gets in and lays down, and was very pleased when he didn’t jump out of the bed when Spader said good night and patted his hip.

Tony loves pizza with everything on it. Pizza no longer loves Tony. His heartburn is bad enough it's about to chew through his stomach and eat his lungs alive.

He tries sitting up, and walking around, and anything he can think of, but it doesn’t help.

At midnight, he’s out at the 24-hour drugstore, buying all the antacids. He eats too many of them on the way back to his room, but he finally starts to feel a little better.

When he gets back to bed, he notices that Spader’s not actually asleep. His eyes are closed, he’s breathing normally, but… Not sleeping.

Two hours later, when Tony’s almost fifty-year-old bladder wakes him up to let him know it’s time for his nightly pit stop, Spader is still awake, still pretending to be asleep, and from the looks of it, watching him.

It’s creepy. And really uncomfortable. And he’s not sure what the hell to do about it.

“Good morning!” Spader chirps, bright and sunny, as Tony’s in the shower. “Sleep well?”

Tony growls at him, and begins to wonder if he was wrong about Spader not being asleep. No one should be that perky on that little sleep.

He’s also coming to the conclusion that unless he locks the door, Spader’s just going to keep wandering into the bathroom while he’s in there.

As Tony gets out, Spader is still in there, eyeing him, brushing his teeth, and looking vastly too chipper to be allowed.
“We got another report from Corwin,” Spader says, as he puts down his toothbrush and strips out of his boxers, heading for the shower.

Great, now I’ve got to stay in here and talk to him while he’s getting naked and into the shower.

“You read it?”

“Oh yeah, it’s short. Everything we sent back to be tested, has tested positive for blood. Trace amounts, not enough to ID, but blood nonetheless.”

“Everything?”

“Even the fingerprint tapes.”

“Holy shit! What were they doing down there?”

“Don’t know, but how about you deal with the lawyers and I get the Luminol?”

“That’s a plan.”

“We just want fingerprints to start ruling people out…” Tony’s explaining to what appears to be nine lawyers, all of whom are furious not to be having a big breakfast to get ready to send their kids off to graduate.

“You have no right to be…” one of the lawyers says.

“Stop it. All twenty-five of your kids said that door was locked and no one ever went down there but Pat. Well, guess what, there were literally hundreds of prints in the basement. Now, unless Pat somehow has hundreds of different prints,” Tony mockingly searches the room for Pat, and then looks at his hands, “Oh, wait, nope, just ten fingers, at least some of them are lying.

“So, we can get prints, and anyone who doesn’t match up to a print in the basement can grab his cap and gown and still make it to the graduation ceremony, or I can hold all of you here.

“So, who’s giving me a print?”

The cadre of lawyers talk with each other, and with their kids, and with each other some more.

“We’re going to need a court order before we hand over any prints.”

That’s when Spader comes up and says, “Sir, given what we just found down there, you might want to rethink that. I have a feeling the judges are going to be a lot more lenient if you at least try to cooperate.”

Tony’s eyes go wide. “You all stay put.” Then he heads back down with Spader.

Spader hands over the glasses, and begins to shine his light around.

“FUCK!” Tony says it loud enough to be heard upstairs. Part of it is genuine. With the exception of the staged scene with the President’s Daughter, he’s never seen this much blood, anywhere. And this time, he’s awfully sure it’s all human blood. Part of it is he wants those lawyers up there to feel their blood go cold.

Tony scans the whole basement, and everything down here, the walls, floor, ceiling, stair case, kegs, cases of six packs, bottles of harder alcohol, is covered in blood spatter.

Tony gets closer. He goes to one of the kegs. Hundreds of overlapping spatters. None of them are big. It’s genuine spatter, but it looks like someone put a sprinkler in the middle of the room, and somehow got it to spray blood, everywhere. He opens and closes his mouth. “This didn’t just happen on Thursday,” finally comes out.

Spader shakes his head. “No way. Both of our victims would have had to have been hung up like a butchered animal, drained, and then had some maniac with a toothbrush go and spatter the entire room in their blood, and then clean everything but a few blobs off the floor away.”

Tony heads upstairs to the lawyers. He points to one of them. “You’re the criminal defense attorney, right?”

He nods.

“You come with me and don’t touch anything.” Then he hands the attorney his glasses and takes him down to the basement.

The attorney’s eyes go wide. He mutters something that is certainly a curse, but Tony doesn’t know which one.

Tony says to him, “Now would be a really good time to make sure your kid’s prints aren’t down here.”

Within an hour, the flavor of the case has shifted, intensely. Defense Attorney Dad rapidly gets into an animated conversation with his son, which results in demands for a court order, but two of the other kids and their parents suddenly decide now would be a really excellent time to start cooperating.

Apparently, they may be ‘brothers’ but not the sort that are willing to go to jail for each other.

So, while Spader goes off in search of a court order for the fingerprints of everyone who lives at Sigma Delta Rho House Tony gets to sit down with Astin Settle and his friend Carson Hayden.

“So, am I finally going to get the story?” Tony says, as Astin and Carson’s parents glare at their kids for being so stupid.

Astin nods. “It’s… um… like Fight Club.”

“But, like, if we were always running around with bruises and cuts, people would notice, so we don’t fight,” Carson says.

“We just host them…” Astin adds.

Carson looks down at his hands, “And run the book on fights.”

Tony winces, illegal betting ring in the frat, along with a fight club, this is going to go over great.

“We make sure there’s a party upstairs, that way no one notices extra cars or the noise. So many people in the house, no one notices a few heading down. We film the fights, stream them live for $3.99 a minute, and run the book online, too. Fighters set their fights online, do everything online, then they show up for a party, ask Pat for a virgin strawberry daiquiri, down they go. Jace refs. No holds or strikes barred, winner’s the last one standing. He gets half of the take from the streaming, and of course, he can bet on himself. They can set it up for one on one, or melee, or however they like,” Astin says.

“What happened Thursday night?” Spader asks.

Astin shrugs. Carson shakes his head. “We don’t go down there. Haven’t seen Jace since Thursday night. Not a tech guy, so I don’t know what happens to the video after it streams, but I can give you our website.”

“Okay, stay put,” Tony says.

“You’ll note they cooperated, right?” Astin’s mom asks.

“I will make sure to let the judge know that after two days of lying to me, and not mentioning one of their brothers were missing, that once confronted with evidence that I’d be able to put them all away forever, your son was willing to finally stop lying to me.”

She doesn’t appear pleased by that answer.

From there the case unravels. Not as smoothly as Tony would have liked, for example, Jace was last seen getting on a plane to Moldova, (Of course he was! Goddamned Eastern European History major! Why can’t these little punks flee to somewhere easy to get to?) and the video wasn’t just offline, the whole damn website was gone, (McGee’s Minions got some overtime digging the whole thing back up again. The kid who took it down was good. They were better.) and when it became clear some seriously illegal shit was going on, not only did he end up having to deal with twenty-five legal teams (because a bunch of these parents got multiple lawyers for their kid), Sigma Delta Rho, also sent in a legal team and Virginia Tech sent in one, too.

But, and this was the part he was most pleased with, once everything fell apart, he could drag them all to DC, make them stay in hotels with uncomfortable beds and even less comfortable roommates, and go to his own home, snuggle his wife and baby, and finally get to relax.

It’s two days later, and Tony and Spader are watching the video of the fight. It had taken a while to get it back, but once they had it, all the answers, at least on who killed who were in the open.

Sort of.

Anderson had two fights that night. They don’t know who the first guy is. Though, since they have the video, they can see what he touched, and hunt down which prints are his, along with whatever online stuff he did to sign up.

They watch the hit that will, eventually, kill Anderson. He wins the match though, at the end of it, he’s the last guy standing. Swaying, but standing nonetheless.

He’s grinning, covered in sweat, dripping blood all over the place, looking like he’s having a good time.

It’ll take some time, but since the guy who lost that fight doesn’t know he killed anyone, he’s not hiding. They’ll find him. (Probably. With Tony’s luck, he’s in goddamned Moldova, which is not going out of it’s way to offer help finding Jace Frojers, too.)

They see Anderson go up against Tynn and it’s clear they’ve got some sort of beef. The reports they’ve gotten from their CO said things were ‘tense.’ Scuttlebutt all over the place, but no one knows for sure why those two didn’t get on.

It’s a short fight, angry, fast, hard. Anderson gets a good chokehold on Tynn. Keeps it going a bit longer than necessary, and then drops him. He does his little victory routine again. They see Jace congratulate him, and he does a bit about how that’s the last fight of the season, but summer session would start up soon, and they’d be back.

Tynn and Anderson’s buddies were betting on the fight, and apparently watched it, but there was no way to tell from the feed, which shuts off shortly after Anderson wins the second fight, that Tynn is dead or dying in that shot, and Anderson will join him in another minute or two.

“Think he knows what’s about to happen?” Spader asks.

“Which one?”

“Either of them, though I was thinking about Jace. I mean, look at him, he’s grinning, goofing around for the camera, palling around with Anderson. Then he shuts off the feed, and boom, two dead guys.”

“Play with fire, get burned,” Tony says.

“Yeah, I guess. Just… I remember being that young and stupid. Wasn’t all that long ago, you know?” Spader says.

“Yeah, I know. And I kept it up a lot longer than I should have. And I lucked out, and didn’t get burned, not like that, at least.”

Spader nods, and then pats his own knee. “If this hadn’t happened, I probably would have had a good long run of stupid, too. Kind of focuses your life when everything you planned on falls apart. Makes you decide what matters, and makes you want to go after it.” And then Spader just looks at Tony, heavy eye contact, for what feels like a really long time.

Tony, and he didn’t think he could do this anymore, blushes. Then he says, “Yeah, I know about that. We were bombed here. Ziva and I were in the elevator when the explosion hit. Fell ten feet, so that was a shock, couldn’t get out, trapped in there. Didn’t know when, or if, they’d be able to get us out. Didn’t know if any of our loves were still alive. The last time we saw McGee, he was out in the open, so…

“So, we’re in that elevator, saying stupid shit, just talking to kill time, and it’s hot. No AC. We’ve got emergency lights, but main power is dead. We’ve been trying to break out, get the top popped off the elevator, but something’s crashed down on it. We’re trapped. Just have to wait.

“So, we’re in there, smelly, sweaty, dirty, scared, and we’re talking in a way we normally don’t. Usually, we’re both so good at keeping our walls up, but then we were really talking. Not the way we would later, but that was one of the first cracks in that wall, and that was the moment I knew what I wanted.

“I wanted her, Zach. More than anything. Still do. And I didn’t know how to get her. Took a while to figure it out. Had to get me right. Had to break those walls down, mine and hers. Took almost a year before I even asked her out. But, it was good. It is good.
“And you’re right, it’s hard to be stupid once you know what you want, and you’ve dedicated yourself to holding and protecting it.”

Spader licks his lips, swallows, and nods. “I understand.”

Tony smiles. “Good.”

---

He doesn’t know if that’s taken care of whatever might be going on with Spader, but he really hopes it does.

---

And with that done, he’s got enough breathing time to see how the rest of his team is.

He’s checked in and been monitoring their case, too, but he wants more than the reports of what’s going on in the case.

“Johnson, come on the coffee run with me.”

She shrugs, gets up, and follows Tony into the elevator. A second, and maybe three vertical feet later, he shuts it off, and then says, “I’ve read all the reports, anything that didn’t get into them you want to talk to me about?”

She smiles and shakes her head. “Look, it’s sweet that you’re so concerned about this, but Eric’s behaving just fine. Yeah, he looks. Yes, sometimes he stands too close. But he doesn’t push it past that, he doesn’t make me uncomfortable, and he never makes me feel like if I draw a line, he won’t respect it. And really, that’s all I need.”

“Don’t you want… I don’t know, better than that?”

She laughs. “I might like better, but that’s as good as I can hope for. Can’t work with mostly guys and expect them all to be gay. Well, I suppose you could, but not in this sort of field. Be one thing if I worked at a gay bar or something. But…” she sighs. “Okay. Pittsburgh. I liked most of my co-workers just fine, but a few of them, they didn’t just look. Some of them would accidentally touch me. And the constant jokes. And god-forbid you call them out on a joke because if you do, you’re the bitch with no sense of humor. And if you swat a hand that accidentally brushes your ass, you’ve got some sort of anger management issues.

“So, look, compared to some of that, Eric’s fine. He’s allowed to think I’m hot. I am hot. I’m fine with him recognizing that, as long as he’s a good boy about dealing with it, and he is.”

“Okay.”

“And, really, I will let you know if there’s a problem. With him or any of the rest of them. You’re doing a good job of setting a good example here, so I won’t undermine that by staying quiet.”

“Uh… Thanks.” Tony doesn’t quite know what to do with that. Doesn’t know what to do with a lot of this, but… one idea springs to mind.
He hasn’t been here since the funeral. He doesn’t like to think of Kate, here.

Anywhere other than here.

Sometimes, he likes to pretend that the bullet missed by a hair, and she decided she’d had enough. She went back to school became a doctor, and now uses medicine to solve crimes. (This fantasy may have something to do with that TV show he can’t make himself watch, because the actress looks so much like Kate.)

But she is here. And has been for way too long.

Tony sits down next to her tombstone. His back is against the side of the stone, and he’s careful not to sit on the now flat and green grass above where the put her… shit… It’s almost exactly twelve years now. Twelve years week after next.

He’s not sure where to start. First time in a long time that he’s felt tongue tied, but that was part of what he liked about Kate. Sometimes he’d look at her, and she’d have that smile, and he’d start to blather, just spew words because real thoughts would go skittering out of his head at the sight of that smile.

He tells her about his week and adventures with Spader, and wraps up with, “I can hear you saying, ‘Karma’s a bitch, DiNozzo.’ I can see the way you’d smile at it.

“You’d probably make a crack to Abby about how some guys just can’t get it if it doesn’t happen to them. You and her would share that look, and smirk, and stare back at me and… and… Okay, guilty as charged. But, it did happen, a very mild version of it, and… I’m learning.

“And… I wanted to say I’m sorry. I am, really. And I’m embarrassed that I treated you like that. I look back at it and want to cringe.

“And it’s way too late, and I’m growing up slowly, but… It’s happening, and I wish I’d been a better partner for you. I wish I would have treated you well.

“I have a son, now. He’s a little guy. Not even eight weeks, yet, but I’m going to raise him to be a better man than I was.” He pats her tombstone again. “When you meet him, he’ll treat you right.”

He stands up, pats the stone one more time, and then says, “Time to go home. If you think I was a jackass with you, you should have seen the shit I pulled on my wife. I’m off to get her an excellent dinner, and apologize for about a week to her.”

He can see Kate smile at that.

A/N:

Some of you have been asking about the M'Gy Dragons.

September 15th, 2016, the first chapter'll go live on my Patreon. More information coming up as I get it. Until then...

Teaser image: Dae and Gabe.
Tim buckles his seatbelt, and feels almost bizarre. It’s been a long time since he’s done something like this, and it’s going to be a long time before he does it again.

He’s riding shotgun with Agents Setter and Caln.

Setter, a tall Black man, with a mother from Honduras and a father from Peoria is just as Navy as Tim is. Mom met a sailor, that sailor was the third generation of sailor in his family, however, unlike Tim, when Setter told his parents he wanted to go to college, and then law enforcement, and then NCIS, they clapped him on the back and petted him, and upon graduating FLETC, they had a party.

Caln, a petit white woman, has almost the same story, but instead of Navy, her family is law enforcement, back a long, long way. She’s the first Fed in her family, but her oldest son is in college now, and he’s looking at following her into Federal Law Enforcement.

So, between the three of them, they’ve got a lot to talk about in the ways of family traditions. Tim and Setter chat their way through growing up at half a dozen bases. The three of them talk about parents who want them to carry on the family tradition, though, Tim’s fairly quiet. (He talks mostly about Breena’s family in that case.)

And, eventually, they roll up to the Naval Surface Warfare Center. They’re here to have a chat with Commandant John Mahoney, who has the honor of being the only base commander on the east coast with no harassment claims, not one single one, in the last year.

Setter and Caln are as close to a ‘white collar crime’ division as NCIS has, which is why Tim picked them for this.

Harassment claims are fairly easy to deal with. They have a standard operating procedure for that. Lots of harassment claims are… not easy, but intuitive to deal with. If you’re looking at a base with two standard deviations from the norm on cases, then it’s time to get looking at those cases, pinpoint where they’re happening, who’s involved, and either start kicking some asses, or go and investigate and see what they’re doing that has people feeling comfortable enough to report abuses.

But they aren’t investigating any harassment claims right now. They’ll leave that to people who do it regularly. They’re investigating the lack of harassment claims, and looking to see if this is a higher level cover-up, or it’s a place where people can’t report issues.

Mahoney has more than six thousand people on his base.

There is no possible way that all of them get along perfectly and no one has ever made an untoward pass at another person, let alone got inappropriately touchy-feely. If numbers for the rest of the east coast bases are to be believed, he should be averaging at least two or three reports a month.

So, are reports getting hidden? Is this the kind of place where it’s clear that making a report will go hard on the reporter, so no one makes one? Is there some eagle-eyed staff member transferring guys before they cause problems?

They don’t know, but they’re going to.
Tim’s job on this is to mostly sit in the background and observe. Caln and Setter have done versions of this before, and they don’t need him butting his ass into it.

What he needs to do is pay attention, and write this down, and set up a ‘how to handle this’ instructional manual for the other teams who will be handling these sorts of investigations.

He does know one this as they wait for Mahoney, next time, a ‘perfect’ base comes up, they need to get someone, or several someones inside, to make a report, and then tell them what happens. Tim’s going into this cold, and he hates that. Any good investigator knows that you don’t start asking questions of the suspects until you’ve got at least an idea of the shape of the problem.

He makes a mental note to see about getting people onto that. They might still do it here. Tim’s sure that they’ve got more than a few people who wouldn’t mind a deep cover operation that won’t get them killed.

And, sure, Mahoney and Co. will be primed for it. With them coming here and asking questions, it’ll be on their minds, but… Give it a few months. Go find some young things, (and in this case Tim’s envisioning Johnson… Except she looks just about as ‘Navy’ as Jackson does… Okay, they might have to get some real sailors in for this,) send a few of them in, and stage some, ‘uncomfortable’ working environments to see what happens.

He makes a little note for himself to see when the next personnel transfer gets here, and how to go about getting a few ‘plants’ inside of that transfer.

“Commander Mahoney,” Setter extends his hand, with a wide smile. Caln is smiley, too, as she shakes his hand, and Setter introduces the three of them. “As you may know, at NCIS we’re cracking down on all forms of harassment. It’s our primary goal to make sure that our soldiers and sailors are as safe as possible when they’re on base.”

Caln takes over. “Your base has the best record on the east coast,” her voice is warm, effusive, and complimentary, “and we’ve been sent here, along with Director McGee, to see what it is you’re doing, so we can roll it out to the rest of our bases.”

Mahoney laps it up. He doesn’t know he’s being played, and he is genuinely proud of his camp’s record. All three of them have been doing this job more than long enough to know that if he were hiding anything, they’d twig to it. Mahoney genuinely believes that his base has some sort of magic that makes everyone get along.

“Anything you want to know, anyone you want to talk to, that’s fine by me. I like to think leading by example goes a long way, so all of my men see me treat everyone, even the newest privates, with kindness and respect.”

The three of them smile at him. They can also feel the unspoken message of that sentence, until kindness and respect isn’t warranted anymore, and then I come down on them like a ton of bricks.

But, that’s pretty much what they want in a military commander.
As they head out of Mahoney’s office, in search of his ranking MP, Caln says to Tim, “You know what would be useful for something like this?”

“Have at it, I’ll get it for you guys next time, if I can.”

“Numbers on the rest of the crimes going on here. Right now you’re just looking at sexual assaults and harassment. Okay, numbers for that is low. What’s the rate of every other crime here? Are they in line with everything else?” Caln asks.

Tim nods, that’s a good question. He adds it to his notes. “Let’s take the long way to the MPs’, I can’t get detailed data between now and here, but I can at least see if anything gets reported here.”

So, they stroll around the base, and as military bases go, it’s a very pleasant sort of place. Of course, it’s late May, the sun is bright, the air warm, and the trees and plants budding out with a vengeance after that long winter and cool spring.

“What do they do out here?” Setter asks Caln.

She doesn’t know, but Tim does. “Energetics. Things that go boom. Things that make other things go boom. And things that shoot things all over the place when they go boom.”

Tim’s always been pretty interested in what they do out here. If anyone is going to make a functional jet pack, it’s these guys here. If the X-Files were ever going to show up at a Naval facility, this is where they’d come. This is where the guys with the chemistry and engineering degrees get together to do fun stuff. Hell, there are rumors they even work on dematerialization here.

It takes two more minutes, and they’re ambling closer and closer to the MP’s office when he finds what he’s looking for. “Three reports in the last year.”

“Total?” Setter looks stunned. NCIS home office has more than three reports a year, and they’re the freaking cops.

“Total. Two thefts and one assault.”

“All right,” Caln says, “this stinks. There is no way you stick 6000 guys together and they all turn into angels. I don’t care if they are all getting their jollies off blowing stuff up every day. NO WAY! It’s not happening.”

Tim’s nodding. Sure, he personally would find the ability to blow stuff up on a regular basis a good way to let off steam, but… no… There are just too many people here for those numbers to be right.

Lt. Commander Marcus Jasten, the highest ranking MP, is more than happy to walk them through his technique for keeping calm and quiet on base. (Other than the thuds they can hear in the background, thuds that rattle the walls and they can feel in their chests. Apparently something is getting tested today.)

“It’s called peer mediation. We get lots of complaints, but every time we get one, we have all the parties get together with one of the chaplains or counselors, and a few members of different teams, same ages and ranks, those are the peers, and then everyone talks to the group about what happened, why and how, and they work through a plan for how to resolve the issue.

“If, after it’s been talked through, and the plan for resolution put into play, the complainant still feels like she or he’s been wronged, we take a formal complaint and work the case.”

Jasten feels shifty. But Tim can’t tell if he’s being shifty because this is so far off from by-the-book that it’s not even in the same library as “the book” or if “peer mediation” means “we make it very clear how bad it’ll go for you if you make a formal complaint.”

Jasten continues, “It’s a very effective technique for improving morale. Everyone knows that they might get called in to be part of one of the mediation groups, so they’re always working on and thinking of ways to get along better with each other. So, say two privates get into a fight. By involving the whole base it goes from a problem between two men, to something everyone has a stake in working out.”

Setter and Caln are nodding. “So, what sort of plans do your mediation groups come up with?” Caln asks.

“That’ll depend a lot on what the issue is. Say, again, we’ve got our two sailors fighting. First off, what’s the problem? Each sailor will have his own group to talk to, and they’ll find out what the problem is. For a lot of our men, it’s much easier to talk about getting their balls busted by a squadmate with someone who’s in the lines with them, than it is to tell an officer about it. The peer groups break down the idea that they’re ‘tattling’ or ‘can’t handle the problem themselves and have to call in Mommy or Daddy.’

“Both peer groups will elect a leader, and that person will report to the chaplain or counselor, and he’ll help them with a line of further questions to ask, and ideas for how to work things out.

“Then each peer group will brainstorm ways to work the problem out with the sailor. They’ll offer techniques to each sailor for how to get along with each other. They might suggest something like just making sure they aren’t on duty in the same place or the same time. Maybe they’ll end up with anger management classes. Stuff like that.

“The last step is to get the two sailors together, both with a plan for what to do, and have them, and their peer groups, come up with a final plan. They all follow the plan. And we’ve got the highest morale of a non-deployed unit.”

“That sounds really healthy,” Setter says.

“I hope so. So much of the military is focused on a punishment mode, and we want to change that. Everyone’s better off if we work problems out, rather than just keep slapping guys with black marks on their records,” Jasten says with a smile.

Tim’s privately wondering how the hell this guy got to be an MP. This is way too touchy-feely, hippie dippy shit (he can hear Tony calling it that in his head) to be believed.

On the other hand, if it works…

“Do you keep notes on the ‘mediations,’” Setter asks.

Jasten looks horrified at that idea. “Lord, no! All informal, all anonymous, all off the books. If we kept notes, we’d have to do something, and that gets us back into punishment mode. Only if everyone isn’t satisfied, do we move onto formal action.”

Setter and Caln look at each other, and Tim knows what they’re thinking, he’s thinking it, too. He decides he’ll be the one to ask, “And, how do you know if everyone is satisfied?”

Jasten looks like that’s the dumbest question ever. “If they aren’t satisfied, why wouldn’t they report it? We’re still here. We still take reports, and follow through on them.”

Tim nods at that. “Of course.”

“What about real crimes? Not just two seamen scuffling. Say… you get a rape case, would you send that to mediation?” Caln asks.

“Of course not! ‘Real’ crimes, something big gets stolen, drugs, someone gets really hurt, raped, killed, anything like that, we immediately go to our regular techniques. I’m not sending a rape victim in to go chat with her assailant about how to come to an understanding about what happened!”

“Okay, good. Just had to check,” Setter says.

“Moot point really. We haven’t had a rape in six years. Only one real theft this year. I mean, little stuff, a cell phone or watch or something, that we send to mediation, let them work it out, get their property back, but this one boosted a car and then sold it. Can’t just let them work that out.

“This system, it really helps. Makes it easier for the men to see each other as real people, not just a pain in the ass in a uniform. Here, we aren’t just brothers because we survived all the shit together, here, we lift each other up, and help each other out, too.”

“You mind if we talk to the chaplains and some of the men about what you’re doing? We’re looking to roll out systems that work across the Navy and Marines, so…” Caln asks with a big smile.

“Certainly. Father Sergio is usually on base this time of day, and he can help you find people to talk to.”

Tim, Caln, and Setter leave, all nodding along.

“So, do we believe that?” Setter asks once they’re out of the MP’s office.

Caln shakes her head. “Not entirely. I’m sure it works to an extent, but he was nervous about something.”

“Yeah, I got that, too. Don’t know if he was nervous about not doing it by the books, or nervous because he’s got a lot of crap hiding behind his peer mediation,” Tim replies.

“Obviously, whatever he’s got, he’s got happy upper management. Mahoney probably thinks the sun rises and shines on this guy’s ass because this plan has his complaint numbers down so low,” Setter adds.

Caln nods to the guys. “Go chat with the Father, I’m going to see if I can find some women to talk with.”

“Figuring a bit of one on one might get more information flowing?” Setter asks.

“Yeah.”

The conversation with Father Santiago goes well. He’s bright, forthcoming, and, as Setter puts it as they walk away, “Hip deep in the bullshit.”
That’s Tim’s impression, too. “You know Tony DiNozzo?”

“Who doesn’t?”

“Okay, he had a case last week. Twenty-five frat boys running a fight club and illegal betting ring out of their house.”

“Ow.”

“Yeah, he’s still trying to sort out all the lawyers. Anyway, he mentioned that the kids kept using the exact same words to describe their lies.”

Setter nods along, knowing where this is going, “And Father Santiago, and his ‘everyone has a stake in everyone getting along, building each other up, brotherhood, is setting off your lie detector?”

“Just sounds a little too polished.”

“To me, too. Think Caln’s getting anything interesting?”

“I hope so.”

While Caln’s off in the ladies’ barracks, Tim and Setter continue meandering around.

“So, what do you do with this?” Setter asks.

“If it really works, suggest it up the line.”

“If it doesn’t or if we can’t tell?”

Tim shrugs. “Undercover. I’ll admit, I was hoping we’d get a much clearer vibe just by being here. It might be cases like this, where the report numbers are too damn low, that we’ll have to stage something just to see what happens.”

“Stage how?”

“Grab two new transfers, make sure they’re both game, and have one of them harass the other one, then see what happens.”

Setter thinks about that. “Probably cleaner than what we’re doing here.”

“I’m thinking that’s what we’re going to recommend for this base. Find out who’s up on the roster and coming here, and send them in to see how well the peer mediation works.”

Caln catches that last line as she rejoins them. “I’ve got some insight onto that.”

“Does it work?” Tim asks.

“Sort of. If we’re talking about something where everyone in the group thinks it’s a problem, like say smacking someone or taking their stuff, it works fine. So, the ladies I was talking with, they were able to say that if someone was getting handsy, that was the sort of thing the other guys in the peer group could usually identify as a problem. None of them want another guy pinching them on the ass, either.”
“But… okay, and I don’t know if our current system could do much with this, either. Private gets her phone stolen. She doesn’t know who stole it, no idea. So she can’t do the mediation route. She reports it stolen, and a day later, it’s back. Awesome, maybe she just put it in the wrong spot or something, at least that’s what she thought, until all of her ‘private’ pictures ended up all over the base.”

“So, mediation group gets together, and they definitely are all over hunting down the guy who posted the photos. He gets hunted down, spends two months in the brig, or whatever they have here, has to apologize formally to her, gets busted a rank, and pays her a fine. Great. She’s good with that.

“Problem is, those photos are all over the base. And, as I said, private photos. And, said photos showed all of her, and… her personal grooming choices. So, now there’s a group of people calling her ‘Private Hardwood Floors…”

Setter squints at his partner. “Uh…”

“Does the carpet match the drapes?” Caln says, voice ironic.

“Oh… Yeah. No carpet, hardwood floors!” Setter looks like he’d blush, if he could, about not having gotten that.

“And she keeps getting assholes offering to ‘get down on their knees and wax her floors, get them good and wet and make them shine.’ So, what do we do with that? The mediators, who are firmly convinced that’s just annoying, are suggesting she work on anger management. Because to them, it’s not a big deal.”

Tim thinks about that. “Any chance she’d report it?”

Caln says, “Over her, and my, dead bodies. I offered to take the report and she got very adamant about not doing this on the record. She’s already done the mediation thing, saw no one in the group thought it was an issue, and got the message loud and clear, ‘this isn’t worth ruining a career over.’”

“Great,” Tim says, voice clipped. “Who’s career are they talking about ruining.”

“Good question, I didn’t think to ask for clarification. I’m assuming the assholes’, but she could have meant they’d start in on her, soon.”

“Better question, what do we do about stuff like that?”

That has the three of them staring at each other. Unwanted sexual advances, especially frequent ones, qualify as harassment. But if the harassee isn’t willing to report it…

“Got to work it from the top. Change the ‘this isn’t worth ruining a career over’ attitude,” Tim says.

“Your undercover stuff.”

Tim nods. “Got to get people who aren’t afraid to report it. I’ve got the feeling a lot of careers are going to get ruined soon.”

Back in his office, Tim starts writing this up. His undercover idea can’t take out individual harassers. It’s not designed for that. It will take out the people who look the other way, or encourage others to look the other way.
His report covers how to use his harassment software, how to find targets, and then he works out how to use undercover teams to weed out commanders who aren’t doing their jobs.

He’s sitting in his office, fingers zipping over his keyboard, and it hits him: this is it. This is the last thing he’s doing to shape NCIS. In five weeks, he’s done. He’ll pack up this office, and say goodbye and…

And he won’t be, Agent, or Director McGee, NCIS, at all.

He looks at the report in front of him. And again, this is it. It’s maybe twenty pages. A few pages of here’s what we found, and about fifteen pages of what to do about it.

And those twenty pages, and the software to go with it, will touch literally every single person in the Navy or Marines. If Leon will put the necessary resources behind this to do it, it’ll change a culture. Weed out the bad apples, and teach the other apples that they may want to be bad, but they’ll never know if the opportunity to be bad is a sting or not.

They can’t make men into angels, but they’ll keep them scared into staying on the straight and narrow.

Tim blinks. He can’t make men into angels, but he’ll keep them scared into staying on the straight and narrow.

Because this is it. And five weeks from now, he’ll head to the FBI, and he’ll start rolling stuff like this out for everyone.

He feels that rush through him, and for a moment he doesn’t know what to do with it. But only a moment, and then a smile spreads across his face.
“Tim, what brings you down here?” Allan asks.

“Looking for Jimmy.” Actually, he’s been working on his plans for NCIS, and the FBI, and everything else, and hit the point where his brain is just circling around over and over, so he knows he needs a break. He hit the lab first, but Abby’s knee deep in evidence right now, so he said he’d bring her and her LabRats some lunch, and he’s here to see if Jimmy wants to eat some lunch with him before bringing more of it back here. “So, he around?”

Allan glances at the door. “Should be back soon. He’s giving blood. Did you give blood?”

Every year NCIS has a blood drive, and every year they aim for 90% of the employees giving. Last year they got up to 84%. And every year prior to this one, Tim has given blood, because no matter how much he hates needles, he hates the idea of people dying because there wasn’t enough B negative to go around.

But this year he didn’t. And he catches that look on Allan’s face, and sees the little blood drop sticker on his scrubs. Then he thinks for a moment.

He knows from previous years that you go in, fill out the questionnaire, and then they take you over to the computer that asks you more questions, and if you answer yes to some of those questions, like “Have you had sex with a man who’s had sex with a man in the last year?” then you don’t get to give blood.

And since the answer for that is yes now, he just didn’t go.

Allan’s still looking at him, a very curious expression on his face. Tim knows that Allan knows he’s got some sort of relationship with Jimmy, and that he likely assumes it’s of a sexual nature. But with him not giving blood, and Jimmy out there doing it… There is likely something of a mixed message going on.

Tim was perfectly willing to go full bore on the woman who called from the Arlington Blood Bank asking him to give blood, explaining to her in vivid detail about how he’d like to give blood, and how he’d certainly done it every year before, and how because of the fact that they were morons who couldn’t get their homophobic heads out of their asses he couldn’t give blood anymore, even though he was perfectly healthy, and that as a result people might die. But, for some reason, he’s not feeling any need to have that discussion with Jimmy’s assistant.

Sigh. Jimmy’s gay assistant, who likely already knows this issue inside out and probably doesn’t need him venting about it with the newfound fervor of someone who never used to think about it until it suddenly jumped up and bit him in the ass.

So instead he says, “Not this time. Feel like I’m coming down with something. Don’t want to risk it.”

“Okay.”

Tim eyes Allan’s sticker. He licks his lips, and decides to jump into the deep end. “Uh…”

Allan sees Tim eyeing the sticker and shakes his head. “Been a long time since I had a boyfriend.”

“Oh. I’m sorry.”
Allan shrugs. “Me, too.” He sighs. “Nothing to do for it.”

Jimmy heads in a few seconds later, and yes, he does have a bandage over the crook of his arm, and the little sticker on his scrubs.

“Tim?”

“Wondering if you had time to grab some lunch?”

Jimmy looks around at his currently empty morgue. His eyes jot to Allan, and Allan nods, he’s more than capable of holding down the fort for another hour or so.

“I have time.”

“Great.”

They’re in the elevator when Tim says, “You gave blood?”

“Yeah, I do every year. Thought you did, too. I certainly remember us ragging on Tony about it.”

“I used to.”

Jimmy shrugs. “I’m clean. You’re clean. What they don’t know won’t hurt them, and what I’m giving will help others.”

“So, you just lied on the form?” Tim knows that Jimmy’s not exactly Mr. Honest To A Fault, but somehow the idea of lie on the form hadn’t actually occurred to him.

“Yeah. Look, it sucks, but I get it. It’s way easier to just exclude people. No test is perfect, and no one wants a compromised blood supply. Hell, they won’t let you give blood if you’ve had a transfusion or any other blood product. Or if you’ve set foot in Africa, or a bunch of other reasons…”

“Still smells like homophobic crap.”

Jimmy shrugs. “It might be, but it’s still the way it is, and no matter how much crap it is, guys who have sex with guys are still more likely to have some sort of social disease than any other population. And it’s not like it’s a slightly higher rate. It’s like seven times the rate for the rest of the population. They’ve got higher rates for HIV, AIDS, Hep A, B, and C, and no one wants their hemophiliac kid getting a dose of blood with something hinky in it.”

“Fine.”

“With the way the VD rate is skyrocketing in old people, they’re starting to talk about capping the age at 55.”

Tim hadn’t heard that, and something along those lines would actually make him feel a bit better about this. “Really?”

“Well, that was in one of the public health journals I was reading. Not sure if they’ll do it, but some people are floating papers about it around.”

“Huh…”
The elevator opens, and they’re on the ground floor, ready to head out. “So, besides being in a snit about the blood bank, what’s up?”

“Fried. Needed a break. Abby needs food. Thought I’d see if you had some down time.”

“And I do. For a few minutes, at least.”

“Medical examiner senses tingling?” Jimmy’s got awfully good upcoming case radar.

“Not yet, but I can see them starting soon. It’s just been too quiet lately. We got slammed in the beginning of the month, and now crickets. Something’s coming up soon.”

“It always is.”

“Oh, yeah.” Jimmy takes three more steps, and they’re almost out of the building when his phone buzzes. He gives Tim a speak of the Devil look, grabs his phone and, “Oh. Hey, Breena…”

Tim listens to half of a conversation, fairly sure that she and Jimmy are making sure they’re both free for Donnie’s twenty-week ultrasound. A moment after that, when they actually are out of the building, Jimmy’s wrapping up with, “Yeah, the 3rd at 3:00. No problems. I’m all over it. Okay. Yeah… Actually, Allan can take it on his own for a bit if he needs to… I’ll be there… Love you, too. Bye.”

“Ultrasound soon?”

Jimmy nods. “Our OB called, she had to reschedule, so Breena wanted to make sure she had a good time for us.”

“Barring a dead body.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “I’ll be there. Allan’s not a wet-behind-the-ears newbie anymore. He can take a few hours without me if he needs to. Hell, he took Tony’s whole case on his own. We just worked next to each other.”

“Feel good?”

“Yeah. Help is good, and a case is a lot easier with two sets of hands, but it’s really reassuring to know that I don’t always have to be here.”

Lunch is good. It’s just the two of them at Carlo’s munching through a few salads and drinks, but by the time it’s done, and Tim’s got a heavy bag full of lunches for the Lab crew, he’s feeling much closer to human again.

He’s ready to drop off the lunches, get a few minutes of talking/snuggle time with Abby in ballistics, and then he’s going to start getting ready, personally, for the transfer from Director Tim McGee, NCIS Cybercrime, to Tim McGee, Director of Public Corruption, FBI.

“And I have food!” Tim says as he heads into the lab. To a much less welcoming response than he’d hoped for.
It’s just Zelaz in there, and he’s been frosty since Tim took down The Admiral.

So, Tim gives him his box from Carlo’s and says, “Abby’s…”

“Upstairs. She found a big enough hole in the case she rushed up.”

“Okay. Back soon?”

Zelaz shrugs while opening his lunch.

Tim sighs. “I’ll put it in the fridge for her.” He sends Abby a quick, Lunch is in the fridge text, along with a Guess we’ll see each other on the ride home, note.

It’s Friday, so long drive home, and then all weekend, hopefully, with each other. That’ll be good. He’s smiling at it, as he gets ready to head back to his office.

“You didn’t give blood,” Zelaz says, pulling him out of his train of thought.

Tim glances up. “Uh, yeah. Sore throat.”

Zelaz is eyeing him, and wearing his little blood drop sticker. “Abby didn’t either.”

“Would you want your wife a pint down when she’s nursing?”

Zelaz shakes his head. Sure, Abby’s down to three feeds a day for Sean, dinner, second dinner, and breakfast, but even with that, Tim wants her in the best shape she can be for that. And apparently, Zelaz, as a veteran husband and dad, feels the same way.

“Did Dr. Palmer give blood?”

“Uh, yeah. Why?”

Zelaz’s eyes narrow.

It takes Tim a second to get it. “God, are you still on that? It’s been six months!”

“She’s an amazing woman, and she shouldn’t have to deal with you…” Zelaz won’t finish the sentence, but he’s staring at Tim, hard.

“I agree about the first part, and for the second, she’s not dealing with anything she doesn’t want to. We’ll be celebrating our fiftieth wedding anniversary, and you’ll still be pissed on her behalf. This can’t be about me and Jimmy and her, because we’re fine. What is going on?”

Zelaz is still glaring at Tim, not saying anything, and Tim’s about to leave because he’s got way better things to do than stand there with an annoyed lab tech when, “My wife left eight months ago. She met someone and… And she’s just gone, now. Took our kids, and… House is empty. And… I had no idea. At all. Probably because I spent more time here than with her.” He’s shaking his head.

“And things are not just fine with you and Jimmy and Abby. You and Jimmy are not friends. I have friends. I know how friends behave, and it’s not how you two treat each other. I may have been blind at home, but I am not blind here, and I am not stupid and… And Abby is a good woman, a good person, and she doesn’t deserve to wake up one morning and find her entire home is a lie.”

Well, that’s a punch in the guts. On a lot of levels. Tim rubs his hand across his face. “God, Roger, uh… Shit, I’m sorry. I really am.” And Tim also doesn’t know what to do. He knows what The Admiral would do, and that’s make Zelaz feel like he’s unreliable, like he’s not seeing what he is seeing, because of what’s going on in his home life.
Zelaz makes a small, dismissive noise. “Yeah. Sorry… I don’t need sorry. I need you and Palmer to man up and stop fucking around with each other. People see things, McGee. DiNozzo doesn’t just pop into your office for little chats all the time. He especially doesn’t do it, and then shut the door and blinds. You don’t go out to lunch with him every other day. You don’t come into work with him, or leave with him. She’s here, stuck in this building, with you two practically fucking each other in the lab, and people see, and they talk, and they’ve been doing it for six months. It’s great that you’re so far off the beaten path of gossip that you don’t notice, but I’m not, and I hear it, the questions, the gossip. I see the looks. And they’re all looking at her, thinking she’s some poor stupid twit with these two fucking assholes hanging around her, using her as a beard.”

Tim sighs at that. He can’t… no, he won’t gaslight Zelaz on this. He also isn’t going to out them any further than they already are. The problem is, knowing what you aren’t going to do isn’t the same thing as knowing what you are going to do.

He sighs again. “Well, they’ll have less to talk about soon. My teams know. Leon knows. It hasn’t been fully announced, yet, because my official 30 days starts next week. I’m heading to the FBI in the beginning of July.”

Zelaz’s eyes go wide.

“It’s just a career move. Nothing about Abby and I is changing, other than, as you note, I tend to come in and leave with Jimmy, but you left out, Abby’s routinely in the car, too. Because the three of us carpool to work. She’ll be coming in with Jimmy, or maybe not. Two cars, three people, because that way there’s always a car for late nights. Maybe they’ll move to full carpooling and rely on Uber for late nights. Might be a good plan.

“Anyway. Come the beginning of the month after next, they’ll be nothing to gossip about, unless tongues want to wag about the amount of time Jimmy and Abby spend together. You know, like those lunches I can’t make it to, because I’m swamped or out of the building. Like last week, when I was working on the harassment reporting system. They had lunch on their own, right?”

Zelaz nods. “What are you doing at the FBI?”

“Director of Public Corruption.”

Zelaz shakes his head. “You’re having an affair, and they hire you for that.” He snorts.

“I passed their background check, and trust me, they found all the skeletons in my closet.”

“Yeah. That’s why I’m not impressed.”

“You don’t have to be. But me gone, that should shut a lot of the gossip up, right? Can’t titter about what you don’t see.”

“I guess. You know what really shuts gossip up? Not doing the shit they’re gossiping about.”

Tim shakes his head. “I’m done rearranging my life to make malicious strangers happy. You don’t like how I love my family, I don’t care. There are exactly two people in this building who get to have input on how I treat Abby and Jimmy, and that’s Abby and Jimmy.”

“Of course.” Zelaz shakes his head.

Tim’s not sure what to do with this, but he’s pretty sure there’s nothing left he can do, so he heads back to his office.
He sits in there for an hour, tapping his finger against his desk, as he stares at his computer screen. Most of the time he’s ‘working.’

Some of it, he’s thinking about what he said to Zelaz. ‘Done rearranging his life to make malicious strangers happy…’

He can’t stop people from gossiping. He never can and never will.

And he’ll be damned if he starts behaving in a way to give them nothing to talk about. The things they might gossip about, like, apparently, coming into and leaving work with Jimmy (and usually Abby) matter too damn much to skip them.

His fingers fall to the crook of his arm. He’s healthy. He knows he is. The only person he fools around with who wasn’t tested for VD before saying goodbye condoms is the one who never had sex with anyone not in the party.

And he’s a guy who gives blood. It’s part of him. People need blood, and every year, he goes and gives it. Because he can. Because that’s who he is. If there’s an easy way to help, he does it.

And he’s not going to rearrange his life to make malicious twits happy.

Because that’s who he is now, too.

He clicks off of his reporting software onto the blood drive signup sheet. There are a few empty spots left, and he grabs one.

Two hours later, he’s also got a sore spot on his arm. No blood drop sticker, not after telling people he wasn’t feeling well, but he’s feeling pretty good about that small ache.
Yet another dim room, lit mostly by the glow of the ultrasound screen.

Jimmy and Breena are grinning. Some of it is genuine. Some of it is encouraging the good feelings that go with seeing Donnie, trying to get them to drown out the fear.

They know Donnie’s okay. The nuchal fold test came back clean. He’s doing great, and they are extremely excited about seeing him for the second time, but…

There’s always that tinge of fear.

For Breena especially, there’s the memory of cold, wet gel on her belly, and the tech scooting the wand around for a moment, looking for a good view. She was going to check Jon’s heart first. Because that’s how they did it. The important stuff gets checked first. (That’s what’s happening now, they’re watching all four of Donnie’s ventricles doing what ventricles do.)

And she sat there, excited, and for a second she didn’t get it. The tech was still, ‘looking for a good angle,’ and then she was standing up, calling in Dr. Jun, and Breena started to get very worried because this is not how it went with Molly, and from there it only got worse, because there’s only so long someone who does prenatal ultrasounds eight hours a day, five days a week can pretend she’s not using the wand anymore because she ‘can’t find a good angle.’

Real time, right now, not the past. More poking, more prodding, and… “Oh… look at him!”

Donnie’s sucking his thumb, but it seems like he knows the camera’s on him, because he stops. He drops his hand and they get a perfect view of his face on the 3d ultrasound.

And there’s cooing and pleasure and love, that tiny little face, looking at them, or so they’d like to think, and the memory of sitting in here, with Dr. Jun, in aching, terrified silence as she started with the wand, and then the Doppler microphone, and then the wand again, and there were no cute pictures of a face on the ultrasound screen. There were no pictures on the screen she could see at all, because Dr. Jun had tilted the screen away, so she couldn’t see what was coming up, and then there was more silence, followed by, “Breena, I’m sorry, his heart isn’t beating. When’s the last time you remember feeling him move?”

Right here, right now: “That is definitely a boy! Do you have a name, yet?”

“Well, Hello, Donnie,” the tech says.

They did this with Anna, too, and…

And Breena’s eyes are bright with tears, and some of them are happy ones. Most of them are. But some of them are from being here, literally here, in this same room, on the same table, when she learned her first son had died.

Jimmy intentionally didn’t plan on going back to work today. It’s one thing if they get called in on a case, but right now Allan’s just working on finishing up the final report of Heston Smith.
The girls intentionally are in daycare today, all day, too. Tim and Abby’ll get them and bring them home tonight.

This is time, just for them, together.

“Walk?” Jimmy asks.

She nods. For several moments, they just stroll around their neighborhood. Nowhere else to go, really. He’s got his arm around her, and they fall into an easy, matched pace.

“It’s why people have graves, you know, so there’s somewhere to go, to do stuff like this.”

He nods. The arm with the ID bracelet with Jon’s diamond on it is around her shoulder, so he can’t touch the stone or anything, but he’s very aware of it, right now. “We could get one.”

She shrugs. “Not ready to take him off, are you?”

“No. Not sure…” He licks his lips. “It doesn’t hurt the way it used to, but… not sure I’m going to ever want to take him off. Even… even if there’s ever peace, you know?”

She nods, because she does. “I thought it would be less intense this time.”

Jimmy nods at that, too. But it wasn’t. And if every time they do this, Breena relives those moments of fear, Jimmy relives the guilt of not having been with her for them. He feels his heart stopped, aching, fear rushing through him as he stumbled/ran through the hospital to get to her, knowing, all throughout his body that he was too late. The only time of their marriage she ever, really, truly needed him to be by her side, and he wasn’t there. And it was just as strong, sitting there, watching Anna come up on the ultrasound as it was for Donnie.

Jimmy kisses her, and then says, “Is it horrible that I’m a little relieved that this little guy is the last one, not because I don’t want more babies, but because I just…” he shakes his head a little. They both know that this child has to, eventually, come out. And they’re awfully sure how he’ll go about doing it. “Okay, I can do that, and you’ll do it, and he’ll be beautiful and we love him to bits, but…” he sighs, “I don’t think delivering him is going to be any less intense than Anna was, either.” And that was a rollercoaster of joy and pain, memory wrapped up with the physical and emotional highs and lows of a birth.

Breena kisses him back. “No. It’s not horrible. I can’t wait for him to be out, but… I’d happily skip the getting him out bit, and not just because of labor pains, and constant leaking, and all the rest of it.”

For Breena it’s not just the feel of it, though that’s always there, but it’s the smell. That’s a big chunk of not spending too much time in the hospital with Abby and Tim after Kelly and Sean was born. A big part of trying to get out as soon as she could after Anna.

The smell of dead bodies… That doesn’t faze her at all. The smell of post-partum bleeding, and antiseptic, and sweat, and amniotic fluid… That smell is eternally tied to sitting in a hospital room, with Jimmy, both of them holding Jon, who was so tiny he fit in their joined hands, not wanting to let him go, but knowing they couldn’t stay there forever.

His hand rests on her belly. Both of them can feel Donnie wriggling away in there.

He’ll come out, and he’ll be fine, and… They know it. But those memories are burned into both of them, and both of them need time, with those memories, and each other.
By dinner, they’re doing better.

By dinner they can really enjoy the shots of Donnie, and, enjoy showing him off to the rest of the family.

He is, and this, of course, is their totally unbiased opinion as his parents, the most beautiful fetus to ever fetus, and that’s all there is to be said on the matter. (This was also true of his siblings.)

3D ultrasounds don’t have the most realistic look ever, but they can make out enough of the details to see that Donnie has all the bits he’s supposed to have, and that he is very much a boy, and, as Tim’s looking at the scans, a huge grin breaking out on his face, he’s also got a certain pouty-ness to his lower lip that doesn’t look much like Breena or Jimmy.

But does look an awful lot like his “cousin” Sean.

---

Seeing Donnie for the first time, seeing Tim react to him, Jimmy was wondering if he’d feel… anything really.

It’s one thing to be aware that you might not be the sperm donor. It’s another thing to know it.

And, going into this, he was fairly sure he was cool with that, but that was his brain talking. And what happens when the brain is in charge, versus what happens when the guts are in charge, aren’t always the same thing.

But… He’s sitting on the sofa with Tim, who’s patting Sean’s back, working on getting him burped, as the girls get the first round of getting his older siblings ready for bed, and both of them are looking at the shots, and… Tim’s stroking his finger over Donnies face, and then says, “We’re okay, right?”

Jimmy nods at that.

It’s okay.

It’s really okay.

In a way Jimmy wasn’t expecting.

Tim appears to be expecting him to say something so he tries to sort the feelings out. “You know how some guys get weird about the fact that their wives are, necessarily, closer to their kid than they are. What with it being located in her body, and she makes all of their food…”

Tim nods, and the look on his face makes it clear that he thinks those guys have something seriously wrong with them.

“Yeah, I agree.” Jimmy puts his hand on Sean’s back. Last night, he was the one patting the burps out after Abby got done nursing, and Tim and Breena got tubby time for the older girls. Tomorrow night, he’ll be the one getting up to get him in the middle of the night. “So, Donnie looking like you… It just feels like Breena.”

Tim squints at Jimmy. Obviously his train of thought skipped the station Tim was waiting at.
“You’re just one of the other parents. I’m not the one who’s pregnant. I don’t need to be the one who’s pregnant for it to be my kid. And, apparently, I don’t need to be the one who offered up the semen, either. That’s still my kid. And getting weird about another parent having more of a ‘connection’ is stupid.” Sean squirms around a bit, so he’s facing Jimmy. Jimmy strokes his face and smiles at him. Sean smiles back. “I know what we said when we started this, that Abby’s kids were yours, and Breena’s are mine, and for legal reasons, that’s fine, but… They’re all yours and they’re all mine, and same for the girls.”

Tim’s nodding at that. He kisses the top of Sean’s head, and then Jimmy’s hand. “Yeah. It’s a family."

“Yep. And sure, I expect to hear at least once, per kid, at some point down the line, ‘You aren’t my father!’” Jimmy’s impression of a pissed-off teen is awfully funny, and Sean starts when Tim begins to laugh, hard. “But… I am. And if I’m Uncle Jimmy to half of ‘em… I’m still their dad.”

Breena’s leaning against the doorway to the living room, soaked, looking like steam is about to start pouring out of her ears. “Get moving, Daddy,” she says.

He and Tim get up, ready for their part of bedtime. “I take it bath time wasn’t as peaceful as it could have been?” Jimmy says.

She glares. Tim hands her Sean, who’s in cute, awake, cuddle time right now, and asks, “Do I need to get the mop?”

She nods. “And you,” she says to Jimmy, “need to grab a few more towels out of the drier.”

And with that, the Dad brigade heads up to work on tucking in kids and cleaning up the bathroom.

Tony looks at the ultrasound that Jimmy just proudly handed to him, huge grin on his face.

At first, Tony’s grinning along with Jimmy. That’s his boy, and he’s perfect. Small, but he’s only 20 weeks along, he’s supposed to be small at this point.

Draga’s slapping Jimmy on the back, grinning with them, offering his congratulations. Johnson’s cooing. Spader’s got a grin on his face and nodding.

Jimmy’s stroking his fingers along the face shot, which gets Tony really looking. Those 3D ultrasounds are awesome. He loves that he’s able to see shots of the little guys before they come out. Makes being a “pregnant Dad” more real.

But he’s looking at the face that Jimmy’s stroking, and then glancing through some of the other shots, he’s noticing something. Jimmy has wide, thin lips. Breena has full, wide lips. The little guy he’s looking at has narrow lips, with a very thin top one and a full, pouty bottom one.

Tony tries not to groan, because unless it’s just the fact that ultrasounds have shit photo quality, then this kid has Tim’s lips.

Draga and Jimmy are still talking, both of them happy, as Tony tries to figure out what to do with this.
Tony waits until he’s on his own to do a bit more thinking on this.

Okay, first and foremost, Jimmy has to know right? If the McPalmers are all McPalming around with each other, then he has to know. Theoretically he was… there… right?

And he’s not acting weird or anything, so… either he’s not seeing it or he’s just… okay… with that being Tim’s kid…

Tony’s not sure what to do with that. Well, he knows one thing, don’t flip out about it, because otherwise everything gets nasty and tense, and those two’ll close ranks on him and… yuck.

But… they say it’s a marriage, that it works all four ways, so… he supposed that part of that would be not really caring who’s donating the DNA.

Maybe?

But, shit, if he can see it looking at an ultrasound… Senior’ll see it, too. Same with the rest of the extended family. And God, they don’t want Breena’s folks to know… Shit… God, this is going to bite them in the ass!

Hell, this kid comes out, and if those lips look the way he thinks they will… Along with… God… Tony’s not entirely sure how the DNA works, but he’s absolutely sure that if Jimmy’s not part of the mix, then Donny won’t have the same curly hair that both Molly and Anna have. Give it a year and… Blue eyes like Breena, maybe, if they’re lucky, or green eyes, like Tim…

Everyone who knows Tim will be able to see this isn’t Jimmy’s kid.

Be calm. Check. He texts Ziva. You get to see the shots of Donnie?

A minute later he gets back a heart-eyed smiley emoji.

Am I seeing what I think I’m seeing when I look at them.

There’s a longer pause before he gets back. Yes. Breena's face. Tim’s lips, and maybe eyes.

Okay. Uh… Do we… say anything about this?

I wasn’t planning on it. Are you going to?

He stares at the phone for a long moment. Nothing that’ll piss ‘em off. Gonna find out what sort of damage control they’re planning.

That sounds like a good idea. See what, if anything, we’re doing about Ed.

_________________

Tony heads down to Autopsy on his own a bit later.

Jimmy and Allan are working on their yearly inventory.

“Feel like some coffee, Allan?”
Allan doesn’t need to be told twice that Agent DiNozzo wants a private word with Dr. Palmer, and given the nature of the ultrasounds that are now proudly hanging on the back wall next to all of the rest of the baby pictures, Allan has a clue as to what Tony wants to talk to Jimmy about.

“No problem. Want me to bring anything back for you?”

Jimmy shakes his head, and Tony waves him off, too.

And out Alan goes.

“Tony? Something pop up while we were working?”

“Not exactly.” He drifts back to the ultrasounds. “Donnie isn’t yours, is he?”

“Of course he’s mine.” Jimmy’s dead serious about that, and Tony can feel he’s getting defensive.

Tony holds up a hand. “Not… like that. Yeah, he’s yours. He’s a Palmer, but… He’s Molly and Anna’s half-brother, right?”

Jimmy glances to the pictures on his wall. “Probably. Those aren’t my lips, and they aren’t Breena’s, but we’re not planning on getting his DNA tested or anything to know for sure.”

Tony bites his lips and tries to think of how best to say this. “Okay… I’m not trying to be an asshole about this, but… what were you thinking? If I can spot this on an ultrasound, anyone who knows Tim will see it, too. Especially when Donnie’s on the outside. You guys go everywhere together. People will see Donnie with Tim! My dad will ask. Or he won’t, but he’ll get weird around you and Tim. Sooner or later Draga’s gonna ask, or at least start speculating about it, and he might not be speculating with me. Your father-in-law’s gonna shit a brick, sideways, and then beat you with it. Your parents… I mean, I know we don’t see them a lot, but… They aren’t blind, and they’ve seen your girls. Your church, where all four of you and the kids are every week… Are you guys coming out or... what?”

Jimmy smiles a bit. “Or what. Most everyone who can glance at Donnie and see that he’s not a mix of Breena and I also knows we lost a child to a genetic disorder. I don’t mind if anyone who’s speculating gets a story along the lines of we tried again with both of us, didn’t enjoy months of terror waiting to see if the nuchal fold test would come back clean with Anna, which we didn’t, and for our fourth child decided that a different DNA mix minimized the potential for issues, so we got a little help from our best friends.”

Tony nods and sighs; that’s not a bad story. “I can spread that story around.”

Jimmy inclines his head. “It’s not even false, you know? It’s just, misleading.”

“So… I mean… did you always know Donnie was Tim’s?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Ours.”

Tony just gives Jimmy a look.

“No. No way to tell until we got to see him. Depending on how he looks once he’s out… I mean, he’ll probably look a whole lot like Breena. Light hair, light eyes.”

“You mean he’ll look a whole lot like Sean. His identical twin cousin.”

Jimmy inclines his head. Tony likely isn’t wrong about that.
Sean causes another thought to spring to Tony’s mind. “And… I know it’s a long shot, but if there’s a curly haired McGee with dark green eyes… You’re… returning the favor?”

“Something like that. Though that’s not likely. If it happens, great, but Abby’s been dealing with pre-menopause issues for the last two years, add in nursing time, and she’s probably done. But, if she isn’t… We’re just dodging whatever combination caused Sean’s deafness.”

“Okay.”

Tony wasn’t wrong about Draga speculating. He’s been back upstairs from his visit with Jimmy for, maybe, five minutes, before Draga’s got an excuse to talk to him on his own.

“You got the official story now?” Draga asks, as they’re both leaning against the wall, behind the stairs, keeping eyes on the flow of people around them, making sure that if any of them get too close, they’re ready to change topics.

Tony raises an eyebrow.

“Come on. I’ve been here the whole time. I go to your family parties. I was here when the shit hit the fan. I was there when Tim took down his Dad, and then when Jimmy showed up to offer medical help and then mysteriously left in the middle of it. Apparently, I was wrong about all the ins and outs of what was going on, but in the right neighborhood, at least. That kid is McGee’s. What’s the cover story?”

That was more direct than Tony was expecting. “Uh… Shit. Okay, you know about Jon Palmer?”

“The pictures Jimmy’s got downstairs of a very tiny baby hand holding his finger?”

“Yeah. That’s Jon. He was stillborn at about 20 weeks.” Draga winces. “Trisomy 13. It’s a random genetic malfunction. It’s… It’s what gives pregnant parents nightmares.” He knows it was on his mind when Ziva was pregnant and they were waiting for the genetic testing. “Official cover story is they tried on their own again, resulting in Anna, and didn’t enjoy the period of waiting to see if she was okay. For Donnie, new DNA combo, no fear of another trisomy child.”

“If it’s random…”

“There’s one inherited version of it. Jon didn’t have that, but whoever you’re talking to doesn’t need to know that.”

Draga nods. “Got it.”

“And by cover story, that means, everyone gets that story. In this building, Allan’s the only other guy you can talk about the real story with, got it?”

“Got it. And… If I were to show up with some pre-emptive, hot gossip about the latest baby Palmer…”

“As long as it’s the right gossip, say, something about overhearing Jimmy and I talking about the semen donation being successful, that might go over well.”

“On it, Boss.”

Tony nods. “Thanks, Eric. From them, too.”
“No problem. There’s enough drama here, we don’t need people getting weird about stuff that doesn’t concern them.”

“Amen on that.”

“Abbie okay? I could see Palmer is. That man isn’t an actor, whatever he’s feeling is on his face, and that face was ecstatic.”

Tony blinks. It didn’t occur to him to check on that side of things. “I’ll find out in a bit. Can’t imagine she isn’t.”

Eric nods again. “Okay. Work?”

“Work.”

“Work” takes Tony down to the Lab in a few hours.

He’s got his answer before he’s even able to talk to Abby.

Since she got her new LabRats, they’ve each ended up with their own little personal areas. Abby’s in is the new computer lab. And in there, she’s got a collection of photos. All of their little guys are up on her wall. And, there, next to several shots of Dave, are prints of Donnie.

Tony’s eyes flick to the wall, and Abby nods at him, smiling, as they chat about the case. Zelaz and Corwin are in the Lab right now, so they can’t really talk beyond the case, but she knows what he’s doing, and sends him the answer he needs.

After he’s got what he needs for the case, she walks him to the elevator, and slowly signs, Checking up?

He nods.

We are all good.

He nods again at that, and then, slowly, spelling out a bit of it, signs back, Good. He is b-e-a-u-t-i-f-i-l.

Yes. He is.
What on earth does one get a two-year-old for her birthday?

That’s what Tim is musing about as he’s on his semi-weekly Target run, looking to make sure that his family is all stocked up on the little bits and bobs they go through in a week.

So, for example, he’s getting (even more) pacifiers, swimming diapers in an array of sizes, what feels like a few gallons of baby shampoo and sunblock, stuff like that. The stuff they don’t/can’t get at Costco and just split up between their homes.

And, of course, because June 16th is coming up, there’s sitting there, at the bottom of his list: Kelly’s Birthday Present.

He assumes stuff like this will be easier when she’s a bit older, and will, if she’s anything like him or Abby, be providing them with a list, broken down by category and price point, of what she wants.

Right now though, she wants pretty much everything she sees, for about five minutes. Longer than that is a challenge.

He’s standing in a very pink aisle, looking at reams little girl of stuff, getting the idea that in the future he’ll be in here a lot, but right now this is all too old for her, and goes off in search of the toddler toys.

Another aisle of stuffed animals, lots of little blocks, a kiddie kitchen… He’s in the right place now. Nothing’s exactly jumping out at him. Partially because they already have pretty much every toddler toy ever made, and partially because there’s only so many variations on the theme of knocks things over or put things in little holes that a toy company can make.

He’s pushing the cart slowly, looking at sets of blocks, and a collection of tubes that blow small balls around when he sees a little doctor’s kit. It’s probably for kids a bit older than Kelly, but it’s cute, and… He’s starting at it feeling… weird.

There’s a stethoscope, and a little x-ray looking thing with a broken arm, and a cast, and…

His breath is coming fast, heart starting to race, and he can’t figure out why. He doesn’t have the rubber bands he was wearing, so he pinches himself, makes himself stare at the little box, focus on the fact that it’s a child’s doctor’s kit, and that he’s standing in a God-damned Target for fuck’s sake.

He’s perfectly safe, nice and comfy. Or he would be if his heart rate wasn’t spiking and a cold sweat trying to break out down his back.

He breathes slow, easy, forcing his heart to slow, and then takes the time to figure out what the hell is going on.

It takes him, what he considers, a stupidly long time to realize it’s June 11\textsuperscript{th}. One year ago today, he got on the \textit{Stennis}, and he feels perfectly comfortable saying, what followed was the worst six months of his life. Some of the best \textit{days} of his life, but as a whole, that was an awful half year.

He looks at the kit again. Little girl, wearing a cast on her arm, as her little buddy, in the Doctor’s lab coat looks at the x-ray. No wonder it set him off. Tim flexes his right hand, moves his fingers through their range of motion.
Still not as fast or easy as it used to be. His wrist clicks in a way it didn’t used to as he circles it. And his shoulder and wrist and ankle are all perfectly happy to let him know anytime a storm front is coming in.

Tim doesn’t normally spend a lot of time just looking at himself. It’s not really who he is, but right now, he wants to. He should have probably held off for a day when he was at his place, better mirrors, but he’s at Jimmy’s, and getting to look now matters more to him than getting the view from every possible angle.

He digs around in his phone, looking for the pictures Abby took of him closest to getting on the Stennis. There are a few from two weeks before.

He’s got some bruises in the pictures. Faded yellow-purple knuckle marks… probably Ziva’s given the size and how close they are, on his chest, and a large yellow-green blob on his thigh. That one’s from Jimmy, he remembers taking that hit. But those days, he usually had a few on him. Can’t do semi-weekly MMA and not sport at least a few.

He likes his dessert and coffee with milk and sugar too much to be cut, but he’s slim, and his arms and legs, chest and shoulders have nice definition to them in that picture.

What a ‘fit’ guy used to look like before Jimmy’s no-body-fat physique became all the rage.

He’s still slim. Bit more tummy pudge than he had in that shot. And less definition. He probably weighs five pounds less now, and his clothing is a bit tighter.

More fat, less muscle. Between less exercise, and his metabolism still not recovered from last fall, he’s… okay.

But he’s not who he was.

He’s naked in the photos, and having a very good time, as he tends to do when he’s naked and Abby’s taking pictures of him.

No scars in the photo… Almost no scars in the photo. Of course he’s got the few faded leftovers of his first meeting with Jethro (his dog) and the almost completely invisible one on his side, where the glass got him after the Deering bombing, but…

It’s a year later, and the scars down his arm, across his wrist, over his hand, along his ankle, and through his eyebrow are all still pink.

Light pink. Lighter than his lips. And, maybe in another six months, they’ll fade and vanish, or close enough. The one through his eyebrow won’t vanish. It’s too big for that. But the ones on his limbs are all surgical cuts, from where they had to open him up to pin and screw bones back together, so, eventually, they’ll fade to the point where they’ll just be a line where skin meets skin.

Eventually.

But the man in the picture could walk through a metal detector without setting it off. He could be depended on for pinpoint sniping and fast reflexes when he gamed. Tim looks at his right hand, and he can still see where the lumps from a few of the screws are. He wiggles his fingers. They move. His hand is there, really there, still on his wrist, and mostly working.

He can still remember seeing his hand, wrist down, palm up, and the absolute terror that went with that. The burn of vomit in the back of his throat at the sight of it.

He didn’t lose his hand. Or anything else. Other than some unblemished skin and some time on his reflexes.

Other than the guy in that picture.

He runs his right hand and arm through its range of motion again. It could have been a lot worse.

He’s not sure if his family doesn’t remember. If Kelly turning two, and the job, and life with the four of them and all the kids is wiping it out, or if they’re trying to keep him from remembering.

No one’s mentioned what they were doing this time last year.

Sometimes he thinks he catches them watching him. Or a glance between Jimmy and Abby, or Breena and Abby, or something.

Or maybe not.

Somewhere, lurking deep in the depths of his hard drive, is the yoga video he was working with before getting on the Stennis. Like now, part of his morning routine involved getting some sort of exercise in.

Granted, with Sean not exactly on the same page as everyone else on the eat three times a day plan, all of their get up in the morning workout routines are a bit off. So, for example, some days his workout is before bed. Some days it doesn’t happen.

But, most days, at least three out of four of them, he gets some sort of workout in, and right now, he’s rummaging through the videos he’s got on his computer, trying to find the one he was doing before he got on the Stennis.

It was part of a series, he knows that. And, not the day he left, because he left god-awful early, but the day before that, he’d done the strength-training one, though he thinks there was a balance one, too, and some sort of meditation one, and a cardio one, but he ignored the cardio one. He got his cardio pounding on his buddies.

He finally locates it, and yes, there’s a balance one, a strength one, a flexibility one (Apparently his mind blanked that out, and judging by the position the person on the tag picture is in, he knows why. His hamstrings are aching just looking at that position) and then targeted ones for arms, abs, and legs.

It’s after dinner. Kids are in bed. He can hear Jimmy, Abby, and Breena downstairs, doing… something. He’s not sure what. They didn’t have any set plans for tonight, and when that happens, they’ll often wander off on their own directions to amuse themselves before regathering for bed.
So, he hunts down Jimmy’s yoga mat, puts his laptop on Breena’s dresser, he can see it easily enough from there, and gets the balance video up.

He already knows the strength one will kick his ass. It was kicking his ass this time last year, which is why he was using it. That was the goal: regularly get ass kicked by exercise video, and then, when it stopped kicking his ass, move up to the next level.

But he kind of remembers being able to do the balance one, okay. It was challenging, but good challenging. Hard, but he could do it. Wobble a bit, keep trying, and usually get it on attempt two or three. He was, probably, within a month or two of moving up a level on that.

He taps his mouse pad, and the video starts. Easy enough in the beginning. Even he can stand on two feet with his eyes closed, breathing slowly, with his hands at his heart, but it starts ramping up fast after that first few moments of mountain pose.

Abby comes up as he’s trying to make himself stand on his left foot, keep his knee straight, bend at a ninety degree angle at his hip joint, extend his hands over his head, and then keep his body in a long straight line from his fingertips to crown of his head to the tip of his right big toe. It’s not happening.

“Been a while since I’ve seen you try that.”

He’d nod, but if he nods, he’ll topple over. He’s already hopping a little to keep himself upright.

Tim stands back up and pauses the video. “Yeah.”

“How’s it going?” Her voice is gentle, and with that, it’s very clear to him that all of them know exactly what day it is, they’re just giving him space to deal with it.

Tim sits down. “It’s going.” He moves into one of the ab exercises Jimmy’s had him doing. Sit down, balance on his tailbone, stick his right leg out, and left one up, then alternate, while keeping his back straight and chest high. It’s easier than what he was doing a year ago, but challenging for right now. Supposedly, in the next month or so, he’ll add weights to it. Hold a dumbbell between his hands and then tap it on the floor, first on the left side, then the right, while moving his legs. Left leg out, tap on right side, and then switch. Get his abs and obliques.

Then he sighs. This is harder than it should be. And adding weights doesn’t sound fun to him.

“Slowly.” He smirks some. It was easier, mentally, to be getting in shape the first time. Plowing through virgin territory, where each new day meant getting to a new level. Now he’s trying to get back to where he was, and that’s… not futile, but not satisfying, either.

She sits next to him and balances on her tailbone, too. She can get her legs up if she holds them with her hands. “Yep. You’re ahead of me, just thinking about that makes me ache.”

“Yeah, well, they cut your abs to get little boy out, five months ago. That didn’t happen to me.”

“True.” She lets her legs go, and they stay up, but they shake. “But company is good, right?”

“Yeah, it is.”

She goes back to letting her arms take most of the weight. Tim watches her, adding the upper body twist to his leg extensions. “You okay?” he asks.

“I am. You?”

“I don’t know. Don’t know what I’m doing here, either. Taking stock, I guess.”

“Taking stock is a good thing. How are you adding up?”

He extends his left leg, feeling the burn in his abs as he pulls the right leg closer in. He used to be able to do this for more than a minute.

He shakes his head, feeling his leg shake. After another few seconds, he drops his legs, his abs feeling like Jello.

“Not well enough. Too many scars, not enough of my body back. I could do this, maybe not well, but I could do it, last year.”

“I know.” She stops working, too. “I could too.”

“And again, we got our son out of your being out of shape. Not to say I don’t love tight and toned Abby, but I’m feeling like that was a worthwhile trade.”

She rolls her eyes at that, and then shrugs.

“Yeah, I know.” He lifts his legs again, this time though, he’s looking at the scars on his left foot. “Just… sort of feeling like this was all so… useless.”

Abby strokes his face. Then she pokes her very not flat, tight, or toned tummy. “Got Sean out of that.” She lightly strokes the scar through his eyebrow. “And you got you out of it. Fearless you. Free you.” She kisses him, and then looks around, making it very clear that he’s doing this in Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom. That tonight, they’ll go to bed, all four of them together. They’ll probably have sex, and if he ends up playing with Jimmy it won’t freak him out. Tomorrow, he’ll go to work, and he’ll start getting ready for his move to the FBI, where he’ll start to really change the world, and… Abby’s saying, “This last year sucked, and it hurt, and… And I will happily never, ever do that again, but, look at where we are and who we are now.”

He holds her hands and kisses her. “And it was worth it. I know.” He kisses her again. “And you went with me through every step of it, even the steps I probably should have skipped.”

“Probably could have done without the adventure in the Navy Yard.”

He nods. “If there’s ever a next time, I’m running with you.”

“You damn well better.” There’s still heat in her voice at that.

“I will. Nothing left to prove.” And there isn’t. Really. He wonders idly for a moment if feeling like he had to… be man enough… stick it out… finish what he started… He doesn’t know. If something like that made him not leave the Navy Yard with them.

She kisses the scar through his eyebrow, taking his mind away from that thought.

His fingers find the line of her c-section. That’s a much better, happier line of thoughts.

“I love you.”

“I know.”
They hold that for a moment. Just being with each other, and touching, and then there’s something else that pops into Tim’s mind.

Something he hasn’t done in more than a year.

Something he’s a little hesitant to try, because if he can’t do it, that means he’s not just well back from where he was when he got on the Stennis, but he’s lost everything he gained over his entire relationship with Abby.

She’s watching him think about it, and her eyes narrow a bit. “That’s your tense wondering look.”

“No a bad term for it. I’m wondering, and feeling a bit tense about it.”

“Bad wondering?”

“No sure I want to know the answer.”

That gets one of her eyebrows up.

He scoots a little closer to her, takes her hands in his, and kisses her, soft, gentle, just lips on lips. No tongue yet, and not a lot of heat. Right now this is just comfort.

When he breaks the kiss she says, “Wondering about kissing?”

“No precisely.” His hand trails down her throat, and then rests, gently, on her breast before settling to her hip. He rubs his lips together, and she knows that look, too.

“You want more processing time?”

He blinks, and shakes his head.

She leans into him, and kisses him. Again, this is soft lips on lips, much more about reassurance and cherishing than sex. “Talk to me?”

He sighs. “Remember the first time we had sex standing up?”

That gets a wide grin on her face. “Oh yeah! Jimmy and Breena’s wedding.”

He nods. “Good memory.”

“Very good memory.” She’s still grinning. “Fast and dirty and up against the door and… Yeah… I remember that.”

He half smiles at her. “First time I’d ever done it standing up. Not that I had a lot of opportunity for it, before, but… Fast and dirty and up against the door and everyone could hear but not see, and all of that, but also, it was strong. I was holding you up. And, sure, didn’t go for long, but… I liked being able to do that. Almost like wearing a cock ring.”

She looks really confused by that.

“Not physically. Not on my dick. But… it felt very male. Strong, and powerful… Like having an eight-inch dick… Just, good. And every time after that, held you up longer and easier… Being able to do it was a kick. I didn’t just get you off; I literally swept you off your feet to do it.”

“And now it’s been more than a year.”
He nods. “And I’m not sure I can keep you up as long as I did when we were in the Adam’s House, setting the record for the fastest time getting me off.”

She kisses him again, smiling, gently. “That was after Afghanistan. Adam’s House was second runner up.”

He laughs a bit. She’s right on that. “Okay, second fastest time.”

Another kiss, slow and easy, and this time there’s some heat in Abby’s touch. “I loved after Afghanistan. Okay, maybe not the peak physical experience of my entire sexual history, but you were home, and with me, and so eager… I mean, if you got me off in thirty seconds, you’d take an ad out in the paper to brag about it.”

He gives her a Well, of course, that’s worth bragging about look.

“The point being, fast, slow, up, down, it’s us. Together. And if we start out on the side of the bed with me in your lap, and slowly work up to standing again, I’ll enjoy every minute of it, and you will, too. And one of these days, we’ll get it back. I’ll lose more baby weight, you’ll get stronger, and we’ll meet in the middle, and you know how much fun that is.”

He smiles at her, stroking her face. “You want to try?”

Her smile doesn’t fall, but he can feel the flavor change.

“Or not?”

“Standing up with you holding me is deep, and fast, and hard, and…” she shakes her head. “Not there, not today, but… remember after Kelly was born, you and Gibbs get back from that one case, and you were just holding me against the wall. We were naked and making out. I will gladly do that with you. And maybe we lay or sit down for the actual sex, but I’d love to hear you tell me about up against the wall.”

She stands up, and steps to the edge of Jimmy and Breena’s bed, patting it, as she pulls off her clothing. “You go here.”

So he does, sitting on the edge, and a moment later she’s in his lap, facing him, legs wrapped around his waist. This time, there’s real heat, from both of them, in their kiss. His hands trail down her back, and hers rest on his shoulders.

They continue their kiss, lips sliding easy and wet. He feels her tongue trace his bottom lip, and then a soft, little suck followed by her teeth grazing over his flesh.

He goes quiet, letting her kiss him, and then she retreats, her lips just touching his, letting him come to her, with light, delicate nips that send sharp shivers through her body. Then there’s tongue, just a brush at first, wet skin on wet skin.

She opens her mouth, and that gentle brush slides into a swift thrust.

Abby answers that trust with a suck, and a firm grind on Tim’s lap.

He breaks the kiss, smiling at that, feeling his body rising against hers. She grinds against him again, and he shifts his lips to her throat. No kisses here, just light nibbles. He doesn’t want to bruise or redden the skin, just wake it up.

The little moan he gets out of Abby makes him think he’s succeeded. Her nails, short and blunt, trail down his back. Not quite as intense as when Breena does it, but they still raise goosebumps on his skin.

Tim makes sure he’s got his hands on Abby’s butt, and then kisses her again. After a moment of that, of wet lips and soft breath, and skin on skin, he says to her, “Got a good grip?”

She laughs, wriggling against him, he can feel her pubes tickly against him. “Not yet, but I intend to get one.”

Tim smiles, and kisses her again. Then he makes sure he’s got a good, firm hold on Abby, and stands up.

She’s heavier than he remembers. Duh, she’s still got twelve extra pregnancy pounds, and he hasn’t done this in a year. But, he’s not feeling like he’s going to collapse or drop her, so that’s good.

He is feeling like extra support from a wall would be an excellent plan right about now. In fact, extra support from the wall would have been an excellent plant from the start. Which is when he really looks around Jimmy and Breena’s room and rapidly comes to the conclusion that he needs to slap Jimmy upside the back of the head, because there’s no comfortable chunk of empty wall. Everything has a piece of furniture, a mirror, or some sort of art attached to it.

So, he sits back down.

Abby looks concerned. She knows how it feels when he’s getting tired, the tiny muscle tremors, and that wasn’t happening. “Okay?”

“Yeah. Just noticing that Mr. QuickieMaster apparently didn’t plan on ever doing that in this own room. No empty bit of wall.”

Abby looks around and then giggles. “Hallway?”

“Not risking waking up the girls.”

Her eyes light up. “Bathroom. Next to the sink.”

His do, too. “That’ll work!”

It is true that Jimmy and Breena have a lot of cute pictures on the walls in their room. Some of them are family shots, some of them art shots, but it’s also true that the master bathroom is clean lines and uncluttered. The walls are tile halfway up, and then light blue paint from the top to the ceiling. So, besides the fact that the wall might be a bit cold, there’s nothing to hamper them using it for support.

Tim gets a good grip on Abby again, and she tightens her legs around his waist, and makes sure she’s got her arms around his shoulder, leaning in as close as she can without smooshing her breasts.

He does make a little “Uff” sound as he gets standing up, but he’s able to walk them to the bathroom without staggering, and he’s able to press her against the wall, but not crush her to it, or collapse into her when he does.

“You good?” he asks.

She nods. “I’m good.” She wiggles against him, and then kisses him again.

His lips meet hers, and they trade licks and sucks, each one taking over, and then retreating. The same dance their bodies do when they make love, just on a smaller scale.
By the time he breaks the kiss, she says, “Very good. Tell me about how you’ll make me feel better when I’m back to normal again.”

“When we both are?”

“When we both are.”

Tim kisses the base of her throat. He grinds against her, feeling her soft tummy against his dick. He’s thinking about what they’re going to do and when, and a grin lights him up.

“New Years Eve, 2017.”

A huge smile spreads across her face. “Gibbs and Abbi’s wedding.”

“Exactly, and we’ve got a tradition to uphold. Twice. Skipped out on Sarah’s wedding, so, we’ve got to make up for lost weddings.”

She gives him a quick happy peck on the lips.

“And will you be in your tux or kilt?”

“I haven’t gotten instructions on that, yet. I assume at least the top half of me will be in the tux. The bottom… for this story… I’m wearing the kilt. And you’re in…”

“They’re so pretty. Abbi picked out these long, dark plum colored dresses. They’re sleek, and kind of tight. The skirt is slit up to the knee though, so a little creative shifting around will take care of it.”

He shifts around a bit, and she adds a roll to her hips. Right now, of course, his hands are under her butt, holding her up, so there’s not a whole lot of good he can do her with them, and his dick is against her tummy, so it’s also not doing much, but she moans gently to go with that roll, so apparently she’s getting at least some good friction.

“Straps?”

“Nope. Just columns of plum silk, with a sort of silvery inlay over the bodice.”

Tim nods. That sounds good to him. “We’re at the Omni, lots of good nooks and crannies there, but anyone could walk by and see us.”

“Scandalous!”

He nibbles her lip. “I know. A Senior FBI Official and an NCIS Forensic Scientist, engaged in an illicit tryst, in public.”

She kisses him again. “Put those rumors about you being gay to rest.”

He laughs at that. “Oh yeah. They catch me with you, your dress hiked around your waist, breast out, my lips on your nipple, my kilt hiked up, too, balls deep and fucking like the world will end if you don’t come screaming before the clock strikes twelve. That might, just possibly, get your LabRats to stop thinking I’m about to leave you for Jimmy.”

She sticks her tongue out at that, and he sucks it, slowly sliding his lips down it, as he gently increases the pressure. That also gets a soft moan.

“Yeah, baby, just like that. You, me, a half-hidden nook. I’ll be quiet, and you’ll suck my tongue to keep your own voice muffled.”
“You’ll be quiet?” she laughs at that.

“I’ll be less loud than usual?”

She nods.

“There’ll be people walking down the hall, and they’ll hear a gasp, or maybe a wet slippery sound,” he nuzzles her chin and throat and groans, quietly. “Or maybe they’ll hear that. And they’ll look around, see my back, and your legs wrapped around my hips, and they’ll blush and run off.”

“Maybe.” She grinds against him again, tightening her legs around his hips.

“Maybe,” by this point his arms are starting to shake, to Tim turns them, so he’s back against Jimmy and Breena’s bathroom wall, and slides down it, so he’s sitting on the floor, with her still wrapped around him. “Maybe they’ll decide to watch.” His eyes light up. Sure, getting watched is Jimmy’s pet fantasy, but that doesn’t mean they can’t play with it from time to time.

She kisses his lips, and then his neck, and now that she’s down, she can take her arms from around his shoulders, and stroke his arms. “They going to like what they see?”

“Oh, I think so. I think they’re really going to like it. In fact, I think they’re going to run back to their room to get it on themselves.”

“Chain fucking throughout the Omni?”

He nods, and then licks her lower lip, his tongue dragging slow and firm against her. “Yes. You and I’ll raise so much heat that everyone around us won’t know why they’re suddenly horny, but they’ll want to grab their loves and get fucking as fast as they can.”

“In that case, I think I know who’ll be watching us.”

“Oh yeah. Maybe they’ll find their own bit of wall, and decide to pace us. You and I on one side, Jimmy and Breena on the other. You can watch Jimmy do her while I’m doing you.”

She kisses him again, and again, and again, rocking back and forth against him. He nudges the inside of her thigh with his hand, and she raises up a bit. Tim shifts his dick, so it’s against her pussy. Not time to slip in yet, but her rocking on him will do both of them good.

She grinds a bit, and he groans. “Yeah… Just like that.” And it does feel good, so good, but he’s also noticing she’s pretty dry, and yes, a lot of friction feels awesome to him, but he wants her to feel good, too, so, “Stand up, beautiful lady, let me lick you.”

She does, standing up, pussy at face level, hands in his hair, as he spreads her wide, and for a moment just looks. “So pretty.” He lays a tiny, quick kiss, just on her clit, and then starts in with wide, gentle licks over her whole pussy.

Her hips rock as he gradually narrows focus. Everything between her legs likes to get licked, and he loves hearing, feeling, tasting her respond to it. He gets his fingers into the game, starting with light little tugs on her pubic hair, and then stroking over her lips as his tongue gets to her clit.

Round and round and round it goes. His favorite dance and hers. He pauses long enough to suck on his fingers of his left hand, and slip them into her, and then grab himself with his right.

He can feel her, wet, silky, hot on his fingers, and his hand wrapped tight around his dick is good, too. Not perfect, but good.
And those sounds she’s making. Soft, little pants, her breath hitching as he crooks his fingers into her g-spot, rushing out of her as he sucks her clit, speeding up with a fast inhale when he goes back to those circles she loves.

Her hands are getting tight in his hair, and she’s grinding against his mouth, and he’d love to talk her off as well as lick, but he can’t do both at once, so he revels in her moans and savors her cum on his lips as his tongue moves fast and focused, taking her toppling off the edge.

Her knees are a bit shaky as she relaxes, and for a moment there’s just hot breath and thundering heart, as she stands in front of him, his lips gently pressed against her.

Then she drops to her knees and has him inside of her and both of them are groaning.

“Oh, fuck, Abby! Fuck!” Feels so good it’s blanking out anything but how good it feels. So hot and wet and rippling against him

She leans back just a bit. His dick can get her g-spot better in that position, and he can touch her clit, and she’s rocking fast, not too deep, but fast, rubbing herself against his fingers because right now he’s feeling so good he’s not terribly useful for much.

His head is back against the wall, neck long, mouth open, panting, soft little moans following each breath as she rises and falls in his lap.

He’s watching her, always watches, as she bounces along, skin pink, breasts swaying, hair flipping with each move, and he’s not going to last. This is just too good. His hands are clenching, eyes drooping to that three quarters closed position they land in when he’s about to get off, and the tingles are just, almost…

She shifts off of him, fast, and grabs his dick, pumping him twice, again, fast, and he’s spurting all over her, moaning because that’s a game she usually isn’t interested in playing, but he loves the sight of it, his cum striping over her hand and belly.

It’s only a moment later, as he’s coming down, and she’s kissing him, that he realizes they didn’t have a condom and that’s why she hopped off.

He kisses her again, and then says, “Sorry. Should have grabbed one when we were in the bedroom.”

She gives him one last peck. “It’s okay. I didn’t remember until you were a minute away, either.” She stands up and goes looking for a washcloth. “Saw an article a while ago saying it’s supposed to be as effective as condoms.”

Tim’s head thumps against the bathroom wall. He’s feeling warm and happy and good all over, and a bit sleepy, but that’s got his attention, and is waking him up, a little. So he stands up, and grabs his toothbrush. After this, he’s going to bed. “Really? I remember the ‘don’t ever even think of trying’ lecture we got back in school.”

“Yeah, me too. More research, turns out it’s got about the same success rate. The high school ‘Don’t even think of trying’ it lecture might have had a lot to do with high school boys not exactly being known for their control.”

Tim’s eyes light up at that. “Not an issue for us.” He puts toothpaste on his brush. “I mean, if you’re willing… I’m fine with finishing like that.”

Abby shrugs, tossing the washcloth into the hamper. “Messier than I like for anything regular.”
Tim nods. “Like with the rest of it, lady’s choice. But, if you want to skip them and just hop off, I’m not gonna say no to watching that. And Jimmy really isn’t.”

Abby shakes her head a little, and then reaches for her toothbrush. “Every porno with a guy in it ends like that, and you all like it, right?”

Tim shrugs a bit. He’d kiss her, but his lips are foamy with toothpaste right now, so he gently pets his hand down her side. “It’s a deeply entrenched visual memory.”

She laughs and gets to brushing her teeth.

He does go to bed after that, and crashes pretty quickly. Last night was his night with Sean, and he’s sleepy.

But much later… probably a bit after one, though he doesn’t feel like moving enough to look for the clock, he wakes up when Jimmy scoots back into bed.

Abby’s in his arms. Breena’s at his back. The feel of her shifting around to snuggle into Jimmy must have been what woke him up.

He wonders, a bit, drifting between half dreams, if he, they could have gotten here without the Stennis. He wonders if the scars striping his body were the fee he had to pay to get here.

That feels much too close to everything happens for a reason, which he doesn’t personally believe in, though he knows Abby and Breena do, for his liking, but… Maybe it does. Or maybe, like the rest of life, it’s just a progression of things, and if you’re working hard, paying attention, and learning from those things, they lead you to new things, better ones.

That’s more to his liking.

And laying here, in bed, between his ladies, listening to the quiet night noises of his family, Tim’s perfectly content with here, and now.
“So, you feeling ready for this?” Tim asks Ngyn.

She nods.

“Okay.” He reaches forward, grabs his mouse, and sets his computer to calling all of the Minons, world over, to log in and see the live stream about to start. Then he stands up, and yells out, “My office!”

It’s the middle of the day, so the Dungeon is as full as it ever gets, but that’s still not packed. Six of his guys come over. Most of them already know, or suspect what’s about to be said, but outside of the office, he doesn’t think much scuttlebutt has gone spreading.

Tim checks his computer. He’s got 78 people logged in world over, that’s basically everyone who could be logged in now. It’ll do.

He’s not a huge fan of talking to the camera on his computer, but that’s really the only way to talk to all of them at once. And faced with a (small) sea of eyes peering at him from all over cyberspace, he’s not entirely sure how to start this.

Which doesn’t much matter, because he’s got to get going, everyone’s waiting, and they all have work to do.

“Okay. Hi. It’s been a while since I did this, and, well, this time nothing drastic or horrible is about to happen. I wanted to let all of you know that as of the end of June, I’m resigning from NCIS.”

The Minions in his office are staring at Tim, not too shocked. They’ve seen Ngyn stepping up and taking over more and more of the job as the last few months have gone by.

And while he can feel the eyes on him around the world, he can’t actually see them, so he’s not sure how they’re reacting to this.

“In the beginning of July, I’m moving over to the FBI.” He gestures to Ngyn.

She takes a deep breath, and Tim can see her straighten her shoulders, slipping into Boss-mode. He smiles at it. “As of now, I’m taking up the position of Director of Cybercrime. For the next two weeks, Tim’ll still be around to help the transition go smoothly, work occasional cases, and make sure the ship keeps running properly.

“Unlike when Tim took over, we aren’t planning any massive changes to our roster or how we do our jobs.”

“Just got to get used to calling a new person, ‘Boss,’” Tim says.

Ngyn shakes her head. “Ngyn is fine. For the time being, I’ll still be in my cubicle, but eventually he’ll get his stuff out, and I’ll move in. If any of you know someone who might want my old desk, now’s the time to get resumes heading my way.”

Tim pulls back, and allows the rest of the Minions to congratulate Ngyn, after a few minutes, some of them start easing over to him, asking about the FBI. Tim doesn’t say all that much about it. He’s not sure why, it’s not like it’s a secret, but… maybe he’s not jinxing it? Maybe he doesn’t want to take the spotlight off Ngyn. Maybe it just still feels really weird to say, “Tim McGee, FBI, Director
“So, do we have a decision?” Dr. Snyder asks a day later.

This time, it’s just the two of them and the Doc. Sean’s not getting checked, and though he certainly might have an opinion on the matter (“Do not give me to the strangers who will make my head hurt!”) at five-months-old, he doesn’t get a vote in the matter.

Tim and Abby stare at each other.

“Jimmy, Sean’s Uncle, is a doctor, and he’s suggesting we go with one ear now, and then, if there aren’t any human trials going on for other therapies by the time he’s getting ready for kindergarten, revisit the idea of the second ear then,” Abby says.

Snyder nods at that. “That’s a completely reasonable suggestion.”

“Are we just putting off the inevitable?” Tim asks.

Snyder shrugs. “Five years is a long time, and, especially if things start changing at the FDA, it’s more than long enough for some really interesting things to come onto the market.”

“And if things don’t change?” Abby asks.

“Nothing that’s in the concept stage will be out in less than fifteen years. That’s just how they work. Everything has to be proven safe, and proven safe takes a lot of time. If I come up with a miracle hearing cure today, it will be 2031 before I can get it through the FDA.”

“Is anything closer than that?” Tim wants to know.

“Sure. And some of it may be on human trials by the time Sean’s ready for school, and he may qualify for those trials, and he may end up in the group that gets the experimental treatment instead of the control. I can say, that with things the way they are now, there will not be a guaranteed alternative available for him, in the US, in the next five years. Seven years, maybe. Ten years, likely. Fifteen years, I’d put good money on it.”

“Would you put him not hearing in one ear on it?” Abby asks.

Snyder thinks about it. “No. If he had more of his natural hearing in either ear, I would, but… He’s not going to end up with one implant, and then have good hearing in that one ear and no hearing in the other one. He’ll have… probably… okay-ish hearing in the one ear. He’ll get most words. He’ll have a much easier time lip reading because he’ll get most of the sounds with one ear.

“Really, I would make the decision about one ear or two based on how well he does in speech therapy. I’m guessing you want him to speak as normally as possible. If he’s picking it up well, and sounds like any other three-year-old when he’s a three-years-old, then keep putting the second ear off, and look for something better.

“If you get to three, and his speech is still lagging… Unless something is right around the corner, that’s when I’d say it’s time for the second implant. Make sure he gets to school hearing and speaking as well as he can.”
“Do both now?” Abby says. Three years doesn’t sound like a lot of time to her.

“Go for one now. There are cellular therapies in animal testing now. If everything goes well, and the FDA lets up some, they might be on human trials by the time Sean’s four or five. If he’s speaking well enough by then, we might as well see if we can get him in testing for them when they start with human testing. And, like I said, if things change with the FDA, and right now, everything’s changing with the new Congress, even if we can’t get him into a trial, there might be an available therapy on the market by the time he’s school-aged. If they let up and let therapies from Europe and Japan in, what we might be able to do for Sean will increase exponentially.

“If he’s doing okay with his speech, and he gets to kindergarten, and we still don’t have a better alternative, I’d say go for the second implant then.

“I can say, by then, the implants will be better. They’re constantly getting better. That’s just how technology works. If they’re enough better, we might swap out the side he’s already got when he’s five.”

Tim and Abby glance at each other, and then at the Doc. Then back to each other.

“So…” she says.

Tim nods. “Okay. We’ve got a plan.”

Dr. Snyder checks his phone. “And it looks like we’ve got a day set, too.”

Tim and Abby nod at that.

“Okay. We’ll see you in November.”

And, like with making the appointment to have this conversation, getting the plan set helps. Both of them are feeling a lot more comfortable, settled, right for lack of a better word, than they were going into this, but…

It’s still there, gnawing in the back of their minds, is this the right thing to do?

And, like with making the decision to do this, there’s no clear answer. The Good Parenting Fairy doesn’t show up as they drive back to work to pat them on the back and tell them they did good.

It’s a quiet ride back to NCIS. Abby holds his hand the whole way back.

Parenting is hard. Work is… easy…

No, it’s not.

Different. Work is different. Especially now. Ngyn’s doing most of the heavy lifting right now. He’s, keeping an eye on thing, poking people toward Ngyn when they need help, and realizing that moving to the FBI is getting dangerously close, and there are things he wants to do once he gets there.

He’s got the vague idea of his team of Untouchables. His ultra-straight-arrow,-cream-of-the-crop,- Mormon-Boy-Scouts, but beyond that…

Yeah, he wants snakes, too.

The more he thinks about it, (especially with that conversation with Dr. Snyder in mind, he’s been googling what the FDA does, and there are more than a few red flags popping up that make him think they might not be entirely on the up and up) the more he wants people who can go into organizations and set them up to fail.

He wants serpents. Serpents like he learned about in Catechism all those years ago. He wants Satan, with his apple, and his questions and doubts. He wants to tempt the “good guys” and toss the ones who fail off the wall when he’s done with them.

He can’t make men angels. He can make the chance of getting burned for setting a toe out of line so high that men don’t need to be angels to behave. They’ll just need a good sense of self-preservation.

But that means he needs serpents. And serpents bite.

Serpent handling 101: Protection.

Tim’s thinking about what he’s going to need to be able to do what he wants to do.

Expert watchers for one. If he’s going to hire people to break the law, and set them up to do it splendidly, they might start to actually try to do it for real. He’s thinking that’s where some of his Boy Scouts will come in handy.

He’ll keep them investigating his own guys as well as the outside.

Even better if they don’t know half of the team they’re investigating are his guys. He’s certainly seen other undercover teams use a variation on that theme. The sudden, ’Get out of jail free card’ lends credence to the idea that the guy in question is properly connected.

That’s a usable angle.

It’ll piss the Boy Scouts off. It certainly pissed him off when he was among the Boy Scouts and one of their bad guys got his get out of free card, but… His guys won’t be killing anyone.

Of course, the thing about serpents is that they don’t just try to bite the people around them. They’ll also try to bite their handlers.

That’s the idea that has Tim coding away. He wants to hire people he won’t trust. He wants to hire people he shouldn’t trust. And, he’s a man with things he’d prefer the rest of the world didn’t know about.

Which means, before he gets into this, his own, personal defenses need to be in tip top shape.

He’s got great cyber defenses on his own systems. But if the serpent he’s dealing with is as slithery and smart as he wants him to be, he’ll go after the Palmers, or Gibbs.

He’s coding away, building a mirror system for Jimmy and Breena’s personal computers, thinking to himself, What would Khan do?

Sure, if there’s a serpent he can get, that’s the one he wants, but he’s awfully sure that’s a serpent he can’t get. But, he can use him, or the image of him, for motivation. Khan’s out there, somewhere, hopefully gone far, far, far off the map.

Still, building his family’s cyber defenses like Khan’s about to get hacking, them, with a vengeance, seems like a good idea.

---

Saturday morning. Tim and Gibbs and the girls are out for their semi-weekly adventure to the Museum of Food. (AKA Grocery Shopping.)

 Granted, there’s usual grocery shopping with a Marine, which involves having a list set up by which aisle everything is in, followed by a tactical operation in which groceries are apprehended as quickly as possible in a lightning strike pattern that allows for no deviation from the list.

Then there’s “The Museum of Food” in which toddlers and tiny, excited puppy are allowed to wander, more or less, at random, looking at bright pretty colors, while the adults trailing along behind them put things in the cart as they go by.

Conversations at the Museum of Food, tend to go something like this: “Three sentences spent on main topic A”/“That’s an orange Kelly, can you say orange?”/“Wrangle!”/“Good job, baby. Orange. So, anyway, back to main topic A”/“Molly, put that down. You can look at the roses, but don’t touch!”/Pouting/“Molly…” (Done in Tim’s best Dad-voice.)/One more sentence, usually from Gibbs, on topic A/“No Anna!” Put small child attempting to lunge out of baby seat more firmly into baby seat./“Yes, he’s a service dog in training. He’s going to be a hearing ear dog.”/One more sentence on topic A.

And so on and so forth. These are not constructive, laid back, easily flowing conversations.

So, Gibbs isn’t expecting Tim to try to get into anything real as they’re standing around in the grocery store, going at toddler pace (slower than a glacier, but significantly more random) as Molly stares at the fountains for sale in front of the store, watching the water burble over the stone, and Kelly excitedly attempts to smell every flower in range.

But, Tim, who’s got half his mind still back at work, trying to get his FBI plans in order, says to him, “You’ve been sending me Untouchables for a while now,” and Gibbs has. He’s got a collection of Marine buddies and cops who have been on the lookout for WhiteHats and passing their names onto Gibbs, who keeps sending them to Tim. “What if I want some BlackHats?”

Gibbs is familiar with the sort of plans Tim has for this, so he kind of gets what Tim’s asking, but… “How black do you want them?”

“Like… Damon Worth. I mean, I don’t think he’s got skills I need, but, someone like him. DarkGrayHats? CharcoalHats.”

Gibbs pulls out his phone and checks. “It’s not on the list, but we need more charcoal.”

Tim nods, holds up one finger, and heads out of the store to grab a few bags. He’s back a minute later.

Gibbs nods back at him, approving the natural chunk charcoal he grabbed, and the fact that he carried the two twenty pound bags without any look of strain. “Shoulder’s getting better.”

“Yeah, slowly.” He steps forward and pulls Molly back from the fountain. “We look at the water, no splashing. You want to splash, you can splash in the river when we get home.”

She’s mollified by that, and decides to go check on the flowers next to Kelly. Gibbs and Tim follow along. Both of them keeps their eyes on the girls. They’re fine with them looking at the flowers, but neither of them want to buy a large collection of mangled flower arrangements today.

“What do you want me putting feelers out for?”

Tim sighs. He’s not even sure, not really. Maybe… “I’m going to need some guys who can convincingly play a sexual harasser. I’m going to put some ‘bad apples’ into a bunch of carts, and then see what happens.”

“Play one, or be one?”

“I’d rather they were playing, and the person they were going to harass knew it, but…” He shrugs. “It’s got to look real, you know, and… I guess that’s the sort of thing where you wonder where the line between real and an act is.”

Gibbs nods at that. “Bad apples…” He deftly grabs a bunch of roses, lifting them up into the air, above the small, chubby fingered grasp of his granddaughter. “No Kelly. Looking, not touching. Come on, let’s go check out the fruit.” They start to amble in the direction of the apples, and Gibbs puts the roses into his cart. Kelly didn’t mangle any of them, but he’s got them in hand, and Abbi likes them, and why not? “How about bad oranges and figs or something?”

Tim squints at Gibbs, that’s a bit more metaphorical than he’s having an easy time tracking.

“You’ve got the FBI, CIA, NSA, all the rest of the investigative alphabet soup under your jurisdiction. You want to stick some guys who’ll play fast and loose with perp’s rights, and rule of law, and all the rest of that, in there, see who comes down on them like a ton of bricks?”

“You mean my own brigade of undercover Mike Franks…es? See what happens when people are blatantly breaking the rules right and left?”

Gibbs nods.

Tim exhales, slow. That’s significantly less comfortable territory. Sometimes, and he knows he’s done this, personally, you break the rules to catch the bad guy, and the bad guy is bad enough you don’t feel bad about it.

But the rules are there because you may be getting the bad guy, but “Bob” over there is just getting his conviction numbers up. And “Bob” may not care if the guy he’s getting is bad or not. Or he may be convinced the guy is bad, but he’s not.

He thinks about that maniac they dealt with last summer, Clemens, the guy who brought Khan back onto his radar. There’s a case that started with a “Bob” who didn’t care about the laws, or the rules, and he screwed an innocent man just to make a case, and that innocent man turned bad because of it.

Which then, in turn, left Tim having to break the rules to take out a bad guy much worse than anyone ever wanted to deal with.

How many bad guys is he willing to let go, to keep “Bob” from going on the rampage?
Gibbs inclines his head a bit and gives him a nod, understanding the issue.

They’re a few more aisles down the grocery store, still ambling away, when Tim says, “So, Franks… How’d he end up at NCIS?”

“Did his time as a Marine, got out, did a bit more time as a cop, and shifted over to NIS after he had a few years under his belt.”

“I know he was a Marine, saw the coffin you made him, but… He never struck me as the type.”

Gibbs shrugs a bit at that. They say you can always tell a Marine, but… He certainly didn’t know that about Mike until he pulled out his best Drill Sargent manner and ordered Gibbs to eat and get a shower. (At that point, Gibbs was so beaten down missing Shannon and Kelly, that a voice barking orders got him up and moving without his brain engaging.) Eventually, after they’d worked together for a while, Gibbs asked him about it. “Got drafted at eighteen for Vietnam.”

Tim nods. “That’ll do it.” Tim rapidly shifts focus, “Good girl!” He grabs the bag of goldfish crackers Molly just brought him. “Okay, now, can you get the Milanos?”

Gibbs raises an eyebrow at that.

“Abby loves them. Breena does, too.”

“So does Tony.”

“I’ll keep ‘em in the car and take them home with us. Won’t wave them around in front of him. Not gonna sabotage him.”

Gibbs nods.

“How’s that workout thing going?”

“Slow. Same as with you.” He stretches his right arm all the way across his chest.

“Jimmy’ll be happy to see that.”

“He already has.”

Tim lunges over toward Molly when he hears a ripping noise. Breena and Abby aren’t the only ones who love the Milanos, and someone, a small someone with hazel eyes and shoulder length brown curls thought maybe she’d have one before handing the bag over to Uncle Tim.

She tries grinning up at him, and holds the cookie out.

Tim shakes his head and takes the open bag from her, and the cookie, which he puts back in the bag. He’s tense for a moment, waiting to see if this will trigger the toddler meltdown, but, apparently Molly knew it was a long shot, and she doesn’t fuss.

Tim sighs. “Okay, so… You ever… I mean, the first time we met Mike, we couldn’t tell which side of the line he was on, you ever… wonder about him?”
Gibbs shrugs. “All the time. But you would have wondered about me if you’d met me back in the day. We knew who the bad guys were. Probably. We didn’t have a problem dealing with them. Definitely. And, back in the day… I came in at the absolute end of the cowboy era. By the time I had Stan, and part of why I had Stan was to make sure I didn’t go completely off the reservation, ‘get your conviction any way you can’ had gone out. We were starting to pay attention to things like letting guys have their phone call and backing off when they asked for a lawyer and stuff like that.”

“But that wasn’t how it played when you started?”

“Not with Franks. Not with a lot of places. Tony’s got stories like that, too. That TV show…” Gibbs is thinking. He knows there’s one that Tony said was basically where he worked. It was even set in Baltimore. “Cops in Baltimore.”

“The Wire?”

That doesn’t sound right to him. He shakes his head, and Tim shrugs. That’s the cop show in Baltimore he knows.

“Anyway. They were the bad guys. You’re the good guy. You do what you have to take them out. End of story.”

Tim exhales long and slow at that. He’s been in this too damn long for that to work anymore. “Big changes between 1991 and now.”

Gibbs nods.

Tim’s strapping little girls into their car seats. Jackson, who got put into the van first, keeps running over to Tim and bonking his hip with his head.

Tim looks down at him. He’s about to say, “What do you want?” but it’s not like Jackson can tell him.

Jackson sees him looking down, and then scuttles over to the spot on the floor between Anna and Molly’s car seats, he puts both paws on the seat, and hops.

“Ah.” Tim lifts him up to the seat, and he hops onto Molly’s lap.

“Ready?”

“Yes!” from Molly. Kelly signs yes. Anna makes a small noise, probably ascent. Tim’s phone buzzes and he checks it, expecting to see that he needs to run back in and grab something that didn’t make the list, but he doesn’t.

On his phone is an email, forwarded from Ducky, with a picture of a tiny person, eyes shut, wrapped up snug, little cap on, with Taylor Mason Molloy joined us last night. 8lbs, 7oz, everyone’s tired but doing fine!

Tim shows the picture to Gibbs, and both of them look at it, nodding, until Tim says to Gibbs, “You think it’s a boy or girl?”

Gibbs shrugs. “Did they say over Christmas?”
“Not that I remember.”

Gibbs is watching the parking lot, shifting into reverse and getting ready to get them out of there.

“Abby was asking if we’re doing tuxes for your wedding.”

Gibbs nods. He’s still got to get one for him, but since all three of the guys still have the ones from Tony’s wedding, he’s just going to go with them. “You’ve already got them, seemed easiest way to go.”

“I appreciate that.”

“You can wear the kilt, if you want.”

Tim smiles. “Abby and Breena appreciate that.”

Gibbs smirks. “Just don’t let me catch you guys appreciating it.”

“You’re the groom. Last thing you’ll be paying attention to is us.”

Gibbs rolls his eyes, that isn’t precisely the we’ll keep our sexual adventures in our room he’d been hoping for.

Tim’s turn to smirk. “You haven’t walked in on me yet, and you’re not going to.”

“Good.”

“Jimmy’s another story,” Tim says with a little smirk.

Gibbs extends his hand and gives him a light whack to the back of the head.

They drive another mile before Tim says, “I’ll admit, this is a lot… fancier… than I was expecting.”

Gibbs inclines his head at that. It’s fancier than he was expecting, too, but… “Feels right.”

“Okay.” Tim leaves that open, if Gibbs wants to say more. Gibbs doesn’t. “Kind of thought you felt what Abby and I did, all the party and bling, was kind of silly.”

“Your money, you get to use it how you like.”

Tim laughs. “Uh huh.”

“Leon and Tobias in costume was worth the cost of admission.”

“Especially since it was free.”

Gibbs smiles.

He continues driving, able to feel Tim thinking keep talking at him, without saying anything. “You just gonna keep looking at me like that?”

“Like what?”

Gibbs glares at him. Tim smiles.
“Had enough disposable marriages. Had two weddings I didn’t care about, and a third I enjoyed mainly as a way to argue with Diane.”

Tim nods.

“Want to enjoy this one. I love what’s going into it, might as well love celebrating it, too.”

Tim smiles widely at that.

Gibbs swallows, looking a bit uncomfortable, but then glances away from the road to Tim. “You wouldn’t help Tony with his vows.”

“He wanted me to write them from scratch, before he figured out he didn’t need them.”

“You didn’t want to do it?”

“T ook me forever to get my own ones, and I didn’t want to write a script for him. I offered to work with him on them, though.”

Gibbs nods again, eyes returning to the road. “If I get an outline in place, would you help me with mine?”

Tim feels the grin spreading wide over his face. “For you, I’d write them from scratch.”

Gibbs ruffles his hair, and Tim gives him a gentle shove.
Goodbye

Tim’s not sure how it happened, but somehow, when he wasn’t looking, June went skittering off, leaving him walking in to work on the 30th.

His last day at NCIS.

It feels really bizarre.

Less intense than leaving his team for Cybercrime. Probably because he liked Cybercrime, and thinks he did good things with it, but it didn’t become his family. Shaking off Agent McGee was a much bigger deal than swapping out Director McGee, NCIS for Director McGee, FBI.

But it should be intense, right?

He doesn’t know. He does know, that way back when, when he was wrapping up MIT and every major investigative service with a computer team was begging him to join them, that he picked NCIS because he hoped The Admiral would approve. Would see it as a halfway point, compromise between the Navy and not the Navy.

That dream fell to ash within days of getting his assignment to Norfolk, and those ashes blew away, never to be seen again when he told The Admiral about making it onto Gibbs’ MCRT, and his response was, “Stop wasting your fucking time dicking around with that shit and enlist. You’re not too old, especially for an officer. You’ve got a master’s now, once you get done with Basic, you could go on to be a SEAL.”

Tim hung up, and given exactly how well he was doing with Tony and Kate those first few weeks, had made the decision that he’d do his two years, get his status up to full Agent, and then call the CIA and see if they were serious about paying for his doctorate as long as he was willing to get it overseas and keep his eyes on the other guys in the program.

Obviously, that didn’t happen, but the original plan, well, the almost original plan, was never a lifetime career with one organization.

By the time he’d been with NCIS for five years, he was certain he’d retire, old, from NCIS, unless they put in him a box before then.

Obviously, that plan didn’t happen, either. (Well, he’s got nine more hours as an NCIS employee, it could happen, but… He’s not feeling it.)

As he’s walking in with Jimmy and Abby, it occurs to him that part of why this isn’t as intense as leaving the team is he was the first one to go.

Sure, Gibbs left a week later, but… He’s the one who broke their team.

And, there just isn’t a team, not the way they were, anymore.

He’s got a really nice work environment, with people he really enjoys, but…

Normally, they take the stairs down to the Morgue, Lab, and Basement, but today he nudges them toward the elevator. Once in there, he kisses Abby, and Jimmy.

He doesn’t have a team, not anymore. He has a family. And back when what he had was a team he didn’t know the difference.

But he does now.

---

Jimmy gets off the elevator first. He winks at Abby as he heads off.

“Got a surprise for me later?”

“I’m not telling.” She grins, and then kisses him, stepping out one floor down from the Morgue, off to her own work, leaving Tim on his own to head down.

On his own, he steps out.

For a moment, he just looks. This is his. He built it; he made it work; he’s smiling at it. He did good here.

But, as he’s walking to his office, getting ready to box up the last of his things, and help Ngyn move her stuff in, he doesn’t feel like Director of Cybercrime was really him. Agent McGee, that was him. That was identity, purpose, meaning. For a long time, that was his life.

Director of Cybercrime is something he did. Something he did really well. But it wasn’t him.

His fingers find the lip tattoo on his wrist, dipping under his wrist cuff. Husband, father, son, friend… That’s the bedrock. That who he is. Architect, solver of problems, big picture guy, that’s what he does.

He looks around Cybercrime. It’s fairly quiet right now, which it tends to be this early in the morning. By ten, there’ll be more people in here. Tim heads to the coffee maker. The one he bought for here. The one that gets a constant, steady stream of use.

He pets it a little, and pops a K-cup of his blend in. While his coffee brews, he looks around again, and smiles, feeling awfully good about what he did here, and eager to see what he can do with a several thousand person department in charge of keeping the rest of the government on the straight and narrow.

---

He figures part of this not hitting as hard is the fact that he’s going home with two of these people, will see a third one shortly thereafter (it’s Friday night, so everyone is heading to their house tonight) and then, after that, on Sunday, they’ve got their Fourth Of July Bash, which, apparently, Gibbs decided needed to be one hell of a party, because everyone is invited.

So, he hands Leon his ID, again, and this time it doesn’t feel anything like handing in the badge.

This is just moving on to the next step.

He wonders if it’ll really hit on Wednesday, when he walks into the FBI.

He wonders if the fact that Leon’s on the list of guys working on reshaping Federal Law Enforcement, working it into what will likely be its future organization, everyone under one umbrella, each with their own specialties, that’s making this not hit all that hard.

From everything he can tell, in a few more years, he’ll be working with all of them again.

Not Goodbye so much as So Long, See You Around.

This time, there are more than three boxes. Granted, this time, he had a full office, not just a desk and cubicle.

He’s about to pull the target with the smiley face shot into it off of his wall, when Ngyn says, “Leave it.”

“You want Mr. Smiley?” (That’s what Abby calls him.)

“Yeah. I’ve still got a year or two of practice before I can do that myself, and… I don’t mind if people who come in here think I did it myself.”

Tim smiles at that. He looks over at Mr. Smiley, and realizes that, yes, if you have a target up on your wall that you shot a smiley face into, it’s possible that the people who come down here to deal with you may get a certain impression of what sort of person you are. Having that impression, they may be slightly less interested in giving you any crap.

“Plus, I’m planning on keeping up your requirement that all of the techs certify every year on handguns and physical combat. It’s good for us to know how to handle ourselves, if for nothing else than getting home from work at night.”

“Okay.” He looks around at a mostly bare office. The computer is still on the desk, but just about everything else is gone from this space. Except for five boxes, sitting on the floor.

She sees him looking. “I’ll give you a hand getting them out of here.”

He picks two of them up, and she grabs the third, and then puts it down. “You stuck all of your books in one box?”

Technically, he stuck all of his books, and the marble bookends Abby got him when she noticed some of his books listing on the shelf in that box. He points over a bit. “That one’s pictures.”

That one she picks up, and they head to Abby’s car, cleaning out his office.

There is cake. And champagne.

Tim idly wonders about that. Why, of all the drinks in the world, that’s the one people pick for celebrations. Bubbles? He supposes back in the pre-soda era, a drink that sparkled could be a big deal.

He’s got a cup of coffee.
It’s not that he hates champagne or anything, but if he’s going to drink something, he’d rather it be something that genuinely tastes good to him.

Plus, coffee and chocolate cake go together much better than champagne and chocolate cake.

He’s explaining how they’re basically turning him into the head of the IA of everyone, when Jimmy heads over. “Hey, just need you for a minute…” That gets a bit of smirking as Jimmy takes his hand and literally pulls him away, toward the elevator.

“Okay, I got Corwin out of the building, and Abby’s already down there, you’ve got maybe ten minutes. Make the best of them.” Then Jimmy grins and gives Tim a little shove into the open elevator door. He leans in and whacks the button that’ll get him to the Lab.

Tim’s grinning as the elevator doors close.

The Lab. It’s not the first place he went to in the Navy Yard, but it almost is. It’s why he ended up in the building in the first place. Delivering that report by hand was just overkill. He was really here to see Abby.

Kind of fitting it’s one of the last places he’ll go, too. (But not the very last.)

“Hello.” Abby says, grinning at him as he heads in. “No Caf-Pow?”

“Didn’t know I was coming down.” He smiles back at her, closing the space between them, wrapping her in his arms. “This is what you and Jimmy worked out?”

“Seemed kind of fitting. I want you leaving here with happy memories.”

“I met you here. I could have never come back here after the fall, and I’d still have happy memories of this place.” And that’s true. Everything he loves about his life comes from having decided to make a lunch date based on a few seconds of video footage and a voice. “You think Gibbs would have hired me if I hadn’t kept coming back up here to see you?”

She kisses him. “I’m perfectly comfortable never knowing the answer to that.”

Tim nods. Besides, he could ponder the vagaries of fate, or he could pay attention to the woman pulling him into the computer nook, and… “You brought them.” The white, fuzzy, lambskin rugs are on the floor.

“Yep. And we don’t have much time to put them to good use.”

He pulls her closer, both of them kissing hard and fast, as he undoes his belt.

In November, it would have been fourteen years. November 2003 he worked his first case with Gibbs. Almost fourteen years since the first time he did this, too.

Okay, not this. The first time they dated, they never did it in the Lab. Fooling around down here (Gibbs’ comments about ‘grab-ass in the Lab’ notwithstanding) was (is? hopefully this’ll happen again at some point) an entirely second round sort of thing.

But, it is getting onto fourteen years since the first time they met, touched, kissed. Since she slid her body down his for the first time.

And all of that started here… Okay, technically, all of that started twenty feet away, in the Lab proper, this little computer annex didn’t exist back then, but it’s nice to have an extra door between them and the outside world.

Especially since he’s on his ass, sitting, holding Abby in his lap as she rises and falls against him, both of them mostly dressed, but anyone who’s ever had sex before can tell what they’re doing.

Having a good time, a very good time.

Until Zelaz, who decided to come in early today, walks in.

They, obviously, weren’t paying attention to the door, until they both hear something akin to “Gurk!” And see a white-as-a-sheet LabTech staring at them.

Abby looks over her shoulder, and musters the best no shame Tim’s ever seen. “I told you, Roger, we’re fine. Be a dear and shut the door. We’ll be done in a few minutes.”

Actually, both of them would spend a few minutes giggling uncontrollably. A minute after that, though…

And, if he’s a bit pink, and slightly rumpled when he gets back to the basement, well, no one mentions anything.

A minute or two behind him, Abby joins the rest of the crew. He wraps his arm around her as he goes back to cake and coffee.

Tony makes it down a few minutes after that, and tells the entire crew a few tales of Probie McGee.

Tim remembers him doing basically the same thing when he left to go down to Cybercrime, but this time, just like the rest of it, it’s not as intense. He catches Tony’s eye as Tony’s talking about the little surgical mask he was wearing on that first case, and Tony nods a bit.

They’re going through the motions. They’re good motions. This is satisfying. Endings should matter, but the real end was a bit over a year ago, when he left the team.

And all of the ‘this isn’t as intense,’ all of the sense that this is just ‘moving on,’ all of that falls to shit as the coffee and cake are cleaned up, and Tim’s walking out of the building with Jimmy and Abby.

He feels the tears in his eyes as he turns to look at the basement for… probably not the last time, but the last time as Tim McGee, NCIS.

He steps into the elevator, holding both of them, and then Abby whacks the off button and lets him have his cry. Jimmy rubs the back of his neck, and Tim, quietly, lets how much this place mattered, matters to him, seep out in a flow of tears.

“You going to be okay?” Abby asks.

He nods, wiping his eyes. “Yeah. I was okay all day. It’s just… real now.”

Jimmy kisses him. “Yeah. It’s good to hurt when you say goodbye to the things that mattered. Even if better days are ahead.”

Abby strokes Jimmy’s shoulder at that, agreeing.

Tim nods again. And kisses both of them. And gets himself into some semblance of looking normal before Abby flicks the elevator back on.

Last day of June, that means long summer nights, but eventually, it’s bedtime for little people, and Tim notices that Abbi offers to help get the McPalmer kids in bed, and Jethro and Ducky herd him to the back patio away from everyone else.

For a few moments, it’s just the three of them and the lightning bugs. Eventually, Ducky says, “And how are you doing?”

Tim shrugs a bit.

Duck and Gibbs nod.

Tim realizes they, too left careers they intended to do for their entire lives.

Ducky taps his glasses. “Before I needed them, I could see the tiny tears, the minor bleeds, needle fine shards of bone or cartilage. All of the wreckage that needed precision surgery to correct. And then there was day where I couldn’t make them out anymore, not reliably.”

“That’s why you became a medical examiner?”

“I could still see, more than well enough, anything that was a problem with a dead body. And it wasn’t like I could possibly make things any worse for my new patients.”

Gibbs chuckles at that. He doesn’t mention why he left the Marines; they all know.

“Even when it’s time to move on, Timothy, pleasures of the past hold onto us.”

“Yeah. I know. I’m feeling it.”

“And are you feeling doubt, too?” Ducky’s voice is gentle as he asks.

Tim sighs. “Not consciously. But you say it…” He shakes his head. “No, not really. I’m going to own this.” He shakes his head. “Maybe some… trepidation for how it’s going to start, but I’ll get it beaten into shape.”

Gibbs smiles at that.

Neither he, nor Ducky, has to point out how amazing things can come from later in life career changes. Just the three of them standing on the back patio pounds that lesson home for Tim.
The world changes, people move on, things shift. He’s going to be doing something that matters, something he’ll do better than anyone else can. He knows all of those things, but it there’s still the ache of leaving something beloved behind him.

Gibbs lays his hand on Tim’s back, and they watch the fireflies glow.

It’s September 15th, that means my other project, the M'Gy Dragons is live on my Patreon.

https://www.patreon.com/KerylRaist

Please come check it out. Chapter one is free, and chapter two through who knows what can be had for as little as a dollar a month.

No, this doesn't mean the end of Shards To A Whole. I'm taking us to Gibbs' wedding, and will likely update sporadically with in-universe stories after that. But, for the time being, I'll have M'Gy dragons flying about on my Patreon, and McGee family saga going on over here.

The Dragons are HERE!
Fourth of July weekend.

And it’s a long one this year. Technically, the Fourth is on Tuesday, so rather than off for the weekend, and then on Monday, and then off Tuesday, all of the Federal buildings are closed for all four days.

And Tim’s been enjoying his long weekend.

Last stretch for who knows how long before he’s got ‘normal’ again. Wednesday is his first day at the FBI, and he’s not sure how it’s going to go, but he is sure it’s not going to be relaxing, easy, or ‘normal.’

Okay, rather than have their big bash on Tuesday, and then have everyone stagger off to work, at the very least tired, and possibly hungover, on Wednesday, Gibbs sent the invites for Sunday.

Technically, they’re having a 2nd of July party, or, as Ducky pointed out, the day the Continental Congress actually voted to succeed from Britain. The Fourth is the day they ratified the wording for the text, (‘Wrote the breakup letter,’ as Tony put it.) and let the rest of the world know what they were doing.

‘Did you know, that John Adams wrote, ‘The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epocha in the history of America. . . . It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward, forvermore.’?’ Ducky asks, as he chops up cucumbers for their salad.

“No, but I’m not surprised you do,” Breena replies.

“Well, of course, as a lad, I learned it from the British side, which, growing up in Scotland, is interesting…”

Breena raises an eyebrow, chopping her tomato.

“Scotland is not always under the opinion that it wants to be part of Britain. Thus… the lesson can be interesting. We’re supposed to learn it as the Colonials were being utterly unreasonable, with a side of King George being the lest competent monarch of his century, but… when your teacher is quietly hoping his homeland will manage to break away within his lifetime, the lesson develops a certain flavor of envy and sarcasm.”

Breena smirks at that and reaches for the carrots.

“And then, I learned it again when I became a citizen here. First, on the very surface level that all new citizens must learn, and then, because the story, as told here, is rather different than told in Britain, in greater depth.”

“And would you say the ‘Colonials’ were being unreasonable?”
Ducky smiles. “I have no comment on that. I will say, I agree with the statement that King George was the least competent monarch of his century.”

“So, you’re saying we didn’t go up against the A-Team?”

“My dear, no one who studies, on either side, the American Revolution thinks you went up against the A-Team. And many of us think that had Britain enjoyed the rule of a better monarch, you’d be part of the larger British umbrella, like Canada.”

Breena smirks at that, too. Nothing against Canada, but… It’s not very America. Australia though… Still not quite there, but closer. “‘Like Australia, maybe.’”

Ducky smiles. “Maybe.”

Gibbs wasn’t kidding about inviting everyone. Tim’s carrying the now finished salad to the dining table, noticing more and more people heading into their home.

He hugs Breena’s sister, Amy, and nods to Collin. Been a while since he’s seen them… He rubs his shoulder a bit, wondering if it’s time to try to start up MMA, or something like that, again.

He says hello to his Uncle Tom and Aunt Lynn. (Apparently, after things went bonkers, and then calmed down, his job in Japan was, obviously, no longer a thing, so they got a place (cheap) outside of DC. Tim hadn’t realized they were settling down this close, but, he imagines having at least one of her sons nearby will make Penny happy.)

He helps Jeannie Slater lug a tray of cannoli into the house, along with another tray of (of course) handmade Italian cookies. (He’s barely got them on the table before Fornell appears from the ethers to snack a few of them down, and it’s possible that not every single cookie made it from Jeannie’s hands to the table where Tim put them.) Trailing in behind her are her husband, his brother, and his wife. Apparently, the Slaters got invited, and Uncle Wes and Aunt Crissy decided to come along.

Sarah waddles into the house, Glenn a few steps behind, carrying two pitchers full of Virgin Mojitos. “Breena’ll be really glad to see those,” Tim says to Glenn as Sarah plops herself onto the sofa, groaning.

Glenn nods.

“Very pregnant sort of day?” Tim asks Sarah, sitting next to her.

She glares at him.

He nods. “The river is cool, calm, and you’ll be weightless down there. Want to get into a bathing suit…” that starts to get a glare, “or borrow a t-shirt and some shorts from Abby or Breena, and go float around? I’ll even bring you the mojito?”

That gets a bit of a smile, and Sarah grabs her bag, heading into Tim’s bathroom to get changed.

And from there… Vances… Emily, Seth (Emily’s new, parent approved, boyfriend), and Diane. Draga with Kevin. Johnson and Spader. And Spader’s date. (“Tony, why do you keep staring at her,” Tim’ll ask a few hours later. Tony’ll shake his head, and eventually say, “Because she’s a she.” “Uh…” “Don’t ask. Just didn’t expect him to have a woman for a date.” “Okay, I’m not asking.”) Murray Harlan’ll roll onto the back patio along with his wife.

Abby’s buddy Carol, who’d been transferred to the Atlanta branch of the CDC is in town this weekend, so she’s here.

Senior and Delphine roll in as Gibbs gets the meat on the grill.

Tim’s half expecting to see his editor pop up, because, after all, that’s a human Gibbs has spoken to and didn’t arrest, and apparently, he invited everyone that was true of.

The party has a few zones:

Inside the house. This is where people who are particularly fond of air conditioning, or really hate mosquitoes are. (Yes, they have bug spray and those candles. The mosquitoes are still under the impression that they’ve been invited to an all-you-can-eat buffet.)

The food is here, too, and everyone is bringing something to eat, and, of course, Gibbs is at the grill, showing off his meat mastery, and, and this is something that’s making everyone else smile, he’s got a partner next to him there.

Borin’s got the pizza oven going, and is showing off everything she ever learned about wood-fired pizza.

There’s the backyard. It’s been… tamed… maybe. Mowed into submission. Possibly. It looks like it’s ready to start turning back into wilderness if good rain and a week without the application of a lawnmower go by.

They likely won’t have enough people for a full softball game, but, balls, gloves, and bats are available.

As Gibbs and Abbi are at the grill, Jimmy, Tony, Jared and Kayla Vance, Emily Fornell, Seth Ska, Tom McGee, Tim, Ed, Wes, and Jeannie Slater, Collin, and Glenn, are all running a haphazard pickup game.

And there’s the river: The pier is cleared off. It’s July, so the water is comfortably cool, but not cold. At the end of the pier, the water is close to twenty feet deep, so that’s plenty of room for diving, and at the waterline, there’s a nice slope of land into a few inches of water, great for toddler splashing.

As the day winds on, it gets hotter and hotter. July in Northern Virginia is not a cool or breezy sort of place.

It’s a sweltering 94 degrees, and by the time everyone had eaten lunch, the party has moved to one of two zones, the river, or inside.

Jimmy and Glenn spend a moment enjoying the view. Right now, they’re both in the water, watching their ladies get into the water.

See, if you happen to be the sort of guy who appreciates a woman with pregnant curves. And if you happen to be the guy who wears the matching wedding ring of the woman with the pregnant curves, you are allowed to loudly, and sincerely, appreciate those curves.

(Tim is, from the river bank, where most everyone else can’t see him, also appreciating, quietly, Breena’s curves. After all, the other pregnant lady is his sister, and that’s fairly icky.)

And while it is true that neither Breena nor Sarah particularly enjoyed trying to squeeze a pregnant body into a bathing suit, both of them are appreciating being whistled at by their respective guys.

And they are really appreciating cool, wet, and weightless.

“End of August, right?” Breena asks Sarah as both of them, and Jimmy and Glenn, float about.

“Goddess willing!” Sarah answers. “You’re…”

“Beginning of October.”

“I’m guessing you guys have everything ready?” Glenn asks.

“Just about,” Jimmy says. “He’ll bunk with Sean until they’re big enough to need two cribs. Then we’ll see how to fold time and space to get more sleeping room out of the two kids’ rooms at our place.”

“Talk about needing extra space…” Sarah says.

“Well, I’ll admit that a three bedroom place didn’t seem small when we got it. Now… Yeah, we’ve got days where I feel like we’ve got kids coming out our ears,” Breena replies. “How about you two, all nursery’d up? Or are we heading over to your place to help paint things?”

Glenn glances at Jimmy. “Is help on offer?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Sure. You want or need it?”

Glenn nods. “I’ve got two weekends off between now and when she’s due, and it’d be nice to knock the whole nursery out on one of them.”

Jimmy nods at that. “Just fire off an email to Tim, and he’ll make sure we show up with brushes.”

Sarah laughs at that, and then says, “So… It’s just hitting. I got you as a brother, and you as a sister now, right?”

Jimmy smiles, and Breena says, “I think that’s how the deal works.”

So, here’s the thing. If you invite everyone you’ve ever liked to your home, and said home is on a river, and a bunch of said people are Navy, and part of said celebration involves splashing around in said river, this will result in a group of rather cocky Navy-types attempting to show off how they rule the waves.

(Or in this case current.)

(Even if one of them was an aviator.)
And, thus, as said Navy people are cannonballing about, pointing out their vast superiority, that a new Gibbs family tradition begins. The Inter-Service Fourth of July Cannonball Championship.

So, on one side of the pier, there is Vance (Leon and Kayla: okay, yes, Kayla is honorary Navy, but if Annapolis doesn’t happen, (extremely unlikely) she’s planning on enlisting after graduation.), Draga, and Spader, all thinking they are God’s Gift to Water. And strut about with their metaphorical dicks a mile out.

“You see,” Leon says, showing off for the assembled collection of people hanging about the pier (but especially for Lara, who claims to enjoy watching him splash about), “the heart of the perfect cannonball is in the leap.” And he goes running off the edge of the pier, doing a particularly impressive job of grabbing maximum air before splashing into the water.

“I remember that. We had this one instructor, and God forbid you couldn’t leap like Michael Jordan going for a three-pointer when you left off for a dive. I don’t think we even had to do it. I think he just liked screwing with us,” Spader’s saying.

“I had his clone,” Draga says. “But, Sir! I’m training to be an aviator. When am I ever going to need to jump off a ship?”

Draga mimics the likely entirely imaginary driving instructor, “Aviator, huh? You better go twice as high then.” Draga runs for the edge of the pier, and he does clear at least eight vertical feet before he starts to drop.

Of course, if there’s one thing that’ll get a certain personality type ready to throw down, it’s cocky Navy people. So, on side B, there’s a collection of Army-types (Fornell, DiNozzo Sr.) who, being a bit older than the Navy crew, are not just letting it be known that Squids don’t know shit about how to really play in the water, but, that they need to get out of the way and see how it’s really done, because they were all toddling about the sandbox back when Team Army mastered the cannonball. And when it comes down to it, a good cannonball is all about experience.

“Okay, Flyboy,” Fornell says, waving a now soaking wet Draga aside. He looks over to Senior, and says, “Come on, let’s show them how this is done.”

Senior, who’s peeling off his Hawaiian shirt, puffs up a bit, and says, “A cannonball is all about the splash. Height,” he makes a pah sound, “anyone can do high. But it’s the splash that matters.”

(Tony sniggers something about how if anyone in this crew is ‘equipped’ to make a big splash, it’s Senior.)

“I heard that, Junior. A splash isn’t just about mass, though that helps, it’s about style. Tobias.”

Fornell nods. He tears off down the pier (to the hooting and cheering of Wendy, Emily, and Diane), leaps, with, yes, not a lot of height, pulls his arms and legs in tight, and then, a second before he hits the water, he relaxes his hold, taking up more space, and making on hell of a splash.

His head’s barely broken the water when Senior goes barreling down after him, and like Fornell, he doesn’t produce a lot of vertical lift, but decades of good food and wine, in addition to his less that perfectly compact cannonball shape, do produce a massive soaking for anyone on the left side of the pier.

And, of course, if you go there, the next thing you know, you end up with some rather amused (and possibly slightly drunk) Marines, one of whom runs the freaking Coast Guard Investigative Service, pointing out that the whole point of being a Marine is to be able to do anything a Squid or Doggie can do, and that they all need to bow their butts down and acknowledge the vast superiority of their experience.

Abbi was more than holding her own in the metaphorical dick a mile out department when her backup shows up. While she’s explaining correct Marine cannonball technique (fast, deadly, you don’t even know they were there) Gibbs runs down the pier, and… Okay, Tim would have to admit that at this point in the party he’d had more than two ciders in the last hour, and well, he knows Gibbs did something but… whatever it was, at one point he was in the air, at the next point he was in the water, but for all Tim saw of it, he could have teleported between those two states.

What he does know is that, after Gibbs is out, Bleach has joined team Marine, and he’s not letting a little thing like two missing legs keep him out of the competition. “Grave, Red get over here.”

For a second, Tim sees the three of them get into a huddle, and then… Bleach has one arm around Gibbs, another around Abbi, and they run him down the pier and launch him. He goes flying through the air, hollering with laughter, wraps his arms around himself, and slips into the water with barely a ripple.

There’s much muttering of ‘show off’ around the bank as Bleach swims back, and Gibbs and Abbi give him a hand getting back to his wheelchair.

And that’s going great until the SEAL gets into the game, who, sure, is technically Navy, but they consider themselves a breed apart.

Uncle Tom doesn’t say anything. That’s part of the whole SEAL thing; they don’t make a big deal out of themselves. They just do whatever it is, better than anyone else. So he goes sprinting down the pier, gets more air than team Navy, and makes less splash than team Marine, and then vanishes (to the point where people are starting to get worried) before strolling back to them, not a drop of water on him, from the direction of the house.

He then sits on the bank of the river, sipping his beer, looking smug.

And, okay, look, if you’ve got all those branches of service talking big about how awesome they are, and how each and every single one of them is the King of the Cannonball, then next thing you know, a collection of Cops (Johnson, DiNozzo Junior) have to point out how sure, the military gets to head off on all-expense-paid-vacations courtesy of Uncle Sam, but they’ve got to stay back and keep everyone in line, and obviously they rule the river.

“Okay, yeah, you all did your bit, and made some big splashes,” Tony’s saying. “But while you were all off getting tans on the Fed’s dime, some of us were in dirty, grimy cities dealing with the least desirable elements on earth.”

“And eating a lot of donuts while you did it,” someone, who might have been Jimmy, but he promises he would never say anything like that, says.

Tony glares in the general direction of that voice, but there are several people floating about in that bit of river, all of them with stupid grins on their faces, so he’s not certain Palmer’s the one who said it.

“And while you’re all getting to go swimming, some of us had to work,” Johnson adds.

Tony’s back on top of that. “So, these are extra-curricular skills.”

“Honed on our off time,” Johnson says, heading to the end of the pier.
She and Tony both produce passable cannonballs. Tony’s got the mass for a huge splash, which he does with style. And Johnson’s sleek and elegant slipping into the water.

But, of course, it’s not enough for the cops to show off, because Glenn’s DCFD, and Team First Responder may be a tad skimpy, but it’s not about to sit this one out.

“Okay, out of the way, all of you posers. Yeah, you’ve all got balls the size of cantaloupes, even the girls, I get it. Watch and learn what happens when someone who voluntarily runs into burning buildings—“

“I did that once!” Tony chirps up, treading water near the pier.

“For a living,” Glenn specifies, “shows you how to run into something.” And Glenn doesn’t have a lot of style, but he’s got a lot of speed, and he goes tearing down the pier, launching himself off like he’s trying to outrun the flames of hell, and he goes further than anyone else.

Jimmy, Allan, Breena, Abby, Tim, and the kids have been hanging out in the shallows, keeping a collection of small people copacetic and happily playing before naptime. Having done that, they had an excellent view of the competition, and Jimmy and Allan have been discussing, quietly, something.

Up they get. Both of them with their best king of the land strut, off to win this thing for Team MD.

As they’re beginning their argument of who’s the awesomest in the land, a different argument breaks out.

Ducky appears, and well…

“Ducky, perfect timing. Team Doctor is about to show those twits how to properly cannonball,” Jimmy says, “Come join us.”

“Excuse me?” Fornell adds. “I don’t think so. Ducky, you’ve got a spot here on Team Army waiting for you.” (Senior raises an eyebrow at that, and Fornell says, “Royal Army Medical Corp.” Senior nods, that’s good enough for him. No one has said it has to be the US Army.)

Ducky is chuckling at this, looking at both of them, when Tony adds, “Wait. No, no, no. Team Cop.”

Ducky smiles, rolls up the cuffs on his linen drawstring pants, but doesn’t start to unbutton his loose linen shirt. (Looks a bit like Tim’s play shirt, other than this one isn’t translucent and really was designed to be worn on a beach, or river.) “Were I to join a team, it would have to be Team Doctor, however, I have no desire to throw myself in the river. I’m fine with wading.”

There’s some gentle cajoling as Jimmy and Allan prepare (with surgical precision) for their leap. They’re just about ready to go when Penny shows up. That gets another pause. Penny’s got a bathing suit on under her sarong, and that indicates she might be game for this.

“Honorary Member of Team Doctor. Doctorate in Biomedical Engineering is close enough. Get on over here, Penny, and let’s show ‘em how it’s done,” Allan says, and Jimmy’s waving her over.

Penny nods, grinning, unwrapping her sarong, handing it, and her big, floppy straw hat to Ducky. “Oh yes!”

And maybe she’s not as fast or splashy as some of the younger members of the crew, but she’s got a huge smile on her face as she goes running down the pier.
Jimmy and Allan take another moment to do some showing off on their “warmup.” (Given how Jimmy’s stretching out, mostly just letting Breena and Abby watch him, you’d think he’s about to run a marathon. Tim points out, loudly, that he’s not.) And both of them hurtle down the pier and land in a huge splashing mess.

It would be at that point, when Team Mossad, who had been nursing a little baby as the different branches of service in their family talked up their skills, finally got herself tucked back into her bathing suit, handed said little person over to his Aunt Abby, silently walked down the pier, stood at the edge, stared them all down, and then backtracked ten feet, running fast and silent, launching herself high into the air, curling into a perfect circle, flipping in the air, and splashing down into the water with basically no splash in the most excellent cannonball anyone had ever seen.

When she breaks the water, grin on her face, she says, “You must remember, Israel is on the ocean.”

And thus, the multi-service cannonball competition ends, with Mossad taking gold.

(Though Navy’s got plans for next year.)

Watching a certain Flyboy splash about in his board shorts, wet from head to toe, tattoos and muscles ripping in the sunlight, is making Diane wonder exactly why they broke up.

Okay, no it’s not. She knows, and with her current all-work-all-the-time schedule, it’s not like she’s really got time for anyone other than Emily.

Draga in the sun, tossing Kevin and Molly about in the water, and the collection of tasty beverages she’s consumed, is making her wonder if he might be interested in ‘blowing off some steam’ later tonight, possibly during the fireworks.

After all, most everyone will be in the backyard, or on the water, and if they were to head on back to his car… Not like anyone else will be back there.

Might make some sparks themselves.

Draga feels her looking, turns to her, and sees her lick her lips.

He raises an eyebrow, and she grins. Then his eyes drag over her body. She’s not exactly looking too shabby in her emerald-green, one-piece bathing suit. She smiles at him again, and is pretty certain he’s got the message.

Eric grins back at her, and gets back to playing in the water. Later tonight, when Kevin’s sacking out with the McPalmer kids, they’ll hash out the details.

Jimmy tosses the sunscreen to Tim. “You’re pinking up.”

Tim rolls his eyes. His uncle smirks at him. “Glorious Irish genes. Part of becoming a SEAL was about getting off the damn ships. They’d have us working on deck, in the full sun, in the South Pacific, all day long. Just about died out there.”

Tim laughs at that, squirting some of the sunscreen into his hand, and then tossing the bottle to his Tim’s rubbing it on his arms and chest, gets his shoulders just fine, but there are certain places he just can’t get on himself anymore. The arm he had that was flexible enough to get the middle of his back stopped being that flexible a year ago.

Jimmy sees it, takes the sunscreen, and gets his back, without being asked. “Okay, all done.”

Tim smiles at him. “Thanks.”

---

Tim’s sitting at the edge of the river, back against the bank, butt and legs in a few inches of water, while Sean sits between his legs splashing around, and Anna toddles about, a little farther afield. (If she gets past his toes, he pulls her back, both of these little guys have to stay in arm’s range.)

Fornell, burger in one hand, beer in the other, heads over and settles down next to him, butt on the riverbank, toes in the water. He tucks the beer into the water, too, keeping it cool.

“So, joining the big leagues on Wednesday?”

“Apparently. Any tips, I mean, besides show up with a tank?”

Fornell laughs at that, and sips his beer. “Yeah, that’ll get a reaction.”

“I’d imagine.”

“Bring a pen you like. You’ll have a lot of paperwork to fill out. And, maybe, if you’ve got one, you could wear a suit.”

“Don’t rock the boat too much on day one,” Tim says with a smirk.

“Just saying.”

“Anyone whispering about me coming on?”

Fornell snorts a laugh. “You’re not that big of a deal.”

Tim smiles, cocky little grin. “I will be by the time I’m done.”

Fornell laughs at that. “Oh, God… I can’t wait to see this.”

“You and me, both.”

Tim eyes Fornell’s shoulder, where the tattoo, never spoken of since Diane mentioned he had one, sits. This is the first time he’s ever seen Fornell without a shirt, and as he looks, he’s smiling. “So, a bumblebee?”

Fornell shakes his head and rolls his eyes. He picks up his beer and sucks down a long swallow. “Don’t ever get drunk, decide to get a tattoo, and do it in a country where the guy doing the damn tattoo doesn’t speak your language. It’s supposed to be a hornet.”

Tim’s happily sniggering away. (And planning this as a cautionary tale for the kids when they start to get interested in tattoos. He’s noticed Emily doesn’t have any, and wonders if that’s part of watching her dad walk around with a cartoon bumblebee on his shoulder for the last forty years.)
“Yeah, laugh it up. What the hell is that thing you’ve got where your cuff usually is? Lips?”

“The things we do to keep our wives happy,” Tim says. He’s in the water, so he doesn’t have his cuff on, though he had been doing a fairly good job of keeping a child or a cider bottle in front of the inside of his right wrist. He wants to splash around and play in the water, but he doesn’t want to draw attention to what’s on his wrist.

Fornell’s still looking in the direction of Tim’s wrist, so he shifts Sean a bit, so he’s got his left hand keeping his boy steady, and lets Fornell really look.

Fornell does, and then nods. Then he shifts the subject. “Gibbs says you guys made the decision about Sean’s hearing.”

Tim nods at that, too. “Yeah.” He goes back to holding Sean with both hands. Both Sean and Anna are splashing each other. Well, mostly just slamming their hands into the water and getting each other wet as a result. They like to do that at tubby time, too. “Come November, they’ll do the first ear, and then… We’ll see. Hopefully he’ll get at least some hearing out of the deal.”

“Hopefully. But, even if he doesn’t, you guys are gonna be okay.”

Tim smiles, touched at Fornell saying something to kind to him.

“Now, give that kid back to his Mama, time for Team FBI to get up there and show ‘em how it’s done.”

“I thought you were team Army.”

“That was round one. Team G-man’s up now.”

Tim glances over to Abby, who’s deeper in the water, and apparently heard all of this, and is grinning hugely at this idea. She holds out her arms, and Tim gives her Anna and Sean.

And, it’s true that Tim’s not giving Ziva a run for her money, let alone most of the rest of the crew, but running full speed down a pier to leap into the water is fun, and the sort of fun he’s not sure he ever really had before.

Absolutely no one was surprised that Mona loves to swim. Big black doggie, hot July day, people playing in the water… No-brainer.

In fact, if it wasn’t for the fact that Ziva owned all of them on the cannonball competition, Mona might have placed. (For enthusiasm, if not style.)

Jackson, on the other hand… Somehow the idea that itty-bitty dog loves to swim didn’t occur to anyone. Maybe it was the fact that getting to the river meant he had to somehow navigate the forest, which might as well be a jungle to his little self. Or maybe it was the fact that he’s got all of that pretty, long hair, which doesn’t exactly scream water-dog. It could be that he’s still shy of four months old, so he’s just a really little guy, and little guys don’t exactly swim. (After all, it’s not like Molly or Kelly are doing laps. Actually, right now, they’re in the water, with Jimmy and Abby. It’s about stomach deep on the grown-ups, who are holding little girls, helping them to float on their backs. So, yeah, they’re floating, with help, but not really swimming on their own, yet.

But, eventually, Jackson did make it out to the river, and he noticed that Mona would find a human getting ready to dive/leap off the pier, and run with them, launching herself into the air along with whichever human, land with a massive splash into the water, and then swim back to the side of the river, shake herself off (to a chorus, of “Ugh! Mona, not here! Move!” As various humans, mostly Tim, decide they didn’t want a shower of wet dog next to them.) and then do it again.

So, Jackson trots up to the pier, he notices that Tony’s getting ready for one of his leaps, and, he runs with Tony just about every morning, so this is just what they do, right?

Tony runs down the pier, and Jackson follows, quietly. He has learned not to yip unless he needs attention, and he doesn’t right now. But, as he launches himself into the air, he’s awfully excited, and starts yipping, which is when Tony notices the tiny ball of fur, that’s about knee high on him, also hurtling through the air, toward the twenty-foot-deep water, and he feels his heart stop, as he comes to the conclusion that he’s going to have to rescue Jackson or face explaining to Gibbs how his dog drowned on his watch.

Tony breaks the surface of the water, inhaling hard, looking around frantically, and, “Thank God,” sees Jackson happily paddling back toward the riverbank.

Tony swims next to him, and says, “Don’t ever do that, again.”

Jackson looks confused. Mona gets to do it.

“Scare me, not leap.”

Jackson yips, happily paddling back to the side of the river. Like Mona, he heads toward Tim. Unlike Mona, when he’s right next to Tim’s hip, he still in water up to his chest, and he also can’t get out of the water up to the river bank. (It’s a sixteen inch drop.)

Tim looks at him. “Didn’t think that through, did you?”

Jackson barks, and scampers over Tim’s leg to go play with Sean in the water.

Naptime. They’ve finally got all four McPalmer kids on, more or less, the same schedule for afternoon nap. (Sean still isn’t quite on the same morning wake-up schedule as the rest of them. At a week shy of six months, he still has a 4:00 early breakfast, and then sleeps until about eight for his next meal.)

And, by naptime, the adult McPalmers are ready for some air conditioning, and a bit less sunshine. Even with the application of sunscreen, and staying in the shade, both adult McGees are pinking up and need some time indoors.

They’re also, especially the kids, soaked, covered in river water, with muddy feet and legs, and practically waterproofed with sunscreen and bug spray. But the grownups aren’t exactly sparkling clean, either.

So, as they’re herding children into the house, and wiping up the muddy puddles left by said trip, the idea of just tossing everyone in the shower all at once comes to the fore.

Tim would have to admit, when they were building their shower, he wasn’t thinking of it as a practical solution to anything. It was just a big space for him to get wet, apply soap, and, on occasion, play. However, if you are ever going to attempt to put eight people, one of them six months pregnant, into one shower, their shower works a treat.

And, nope, it wasn’t the most relaxed shower he’s ever gotten, but it did get everyone clean, fast.

And when you’ve got a collection of tired kiddos, one of whom was loudly complaining about the idea of naptime (while rubbing her droopy eyes) fast matters for a lot.

By the time the kids are down, the adults are debating naptime, too. Not because anyone is massively tired or anything, but they’re all kind of hoping to stay up late. After all, they’re the ones with the star gazing room, which means they’ve got the excellent view of the fireworks, that won’t involve getting eaten alive by the mosquitos.

And, of course, since it’ll be dark, and everyone will be looking up, they might be thinking of adding a few of their own sparks to the mix, too.

Or, maybe they’ll hit the bed, all comfortably cool and dry, notice that no one falls asleep in the first ten minutes, and decide to make their own fireworks a bit early.

Lazy summer afternoon. Lunch is done. People are milling around, some of them inside, some out, and Gibbs is stretched out on one of his lounge chairs on the back patio, just in his swim trunks, and Abbi’s draped next to him, in a pair of cargo shorts and a bikini top, both of them sharing a cider and just gelling as the party whirls around them.

Wendy Fornell gets a shot of it, smiling as she takes it.

“Oh God, more food?” Tony says as he sees provisions for dinner being drawn out of the fridge.
“I’ve blown this week, next week, last week, and the week after on my diet already, and you’re going to feed me more?”

“Yes.” Gibbs says, huge smile on his face. (He’s on a pretty similar diet, and has just as thoroughly blown it today.) “Give me a hand.” He gestures to the pile of un-shucked corn.

Tony’s got Dave in his arms, and he’s not about to attempt to shuck corn and hold a four-month-old.
“I’ll find you some reinforcements. He strolls out of the kitchen and notices Tim, hair fluffy, t-shirt on backwards, shit-eating grin on his face, creeping out of the hallway to his room.

Tony smirks at him. “Get your shirt on right, and give us a hand with the corn.”

Tim looks down, realizes he’s not quite as put together as he thought he was, and follows Tony into the kitchen, turning his shirt around.

“Here, I found this one looking for something to do.”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit, and grabs an ear of corn. “How many of these do we have?”

“Five dozen.” Gibbs replies, shucking his.

Tim looks to Tony. “We’re gonna need backup.”
“On it.”

He’s back a minute later with Ziva.

Five years ago, if you had told Tim that there would be a time when he would be shucking corn, with his “team,” in the kitchen of what would be their shared home, while Tony gently bounces his son, as the four of them talk about Gibbs’ latest adventures in training a small dog how to help hearing-impaired people, and Ziva talks about learning how to use light when photographing things, he would have asked what kind undercover mission they’d be on, and who would have been crazy enough to give Tony a kid?

But today, he’s peeling back corn husks, tossing them in the compost bin, (Penny and Ziva are both big on them not throwing out organic trash. So it goes in the back, and occasionally, they poke it a bit. Mostly, Tim thinks, they’ve created an all-you-can-eat-buffet for the local raccoon population.) listening happily, enjoying this quiet a bit.

There’s something to be said for a life outside of work.

There are a lot of somethings to be said for a life outside of work.

But right now, in the kitchen, with his family, chatting and making a big job small, Tim’s way too damn content to try and think of any of them.

“Mmmmmmmmmm….“ Purrs out of Tim two hours later as he’s happily chowing down on fire-roasted corn with garlic-lime butter. Yeah, next year, they’ll get at least eight dozen ears, because he’s happily plowed through four of them, and the rest of the crew isn’t exactly going easy on ‘em, either.

Abby’s in his lap, agreeing. She’s got a few ears next to her, too. He kisses her neck, and she squeaks about getting butter on her neck, so he kisses her again. “There, all clean.”

She gives him a gentle shove, and laughs.

As the sky darkens, and twilight grows deeper, Abby gets more and more excited.

She would happily tell anyone who’s listening that fireworks are a wonderful thing. She’d also be happy to tell you about how to make fireworks.

And this year, she’s had access to a workshop, certain chemicals, and a boat to launch them off of.

“You made the fireworks?” Diane is asking, looking horrified, rethinking her date with Draga. If the boat’s about to explode, they may not get a decent amount of quality time.

“I’m not saying this is something that anyone who wants to should do, but, come on, I’ve got a Masters in Chemistry and work in a lab fulltime. Mixing up some things to make pretty booms, not that big of a deal.”

Diane still looks unsettled.

“Really, they’ll be awesome.”
“I’m not worried about awesome, I’m worried about burnt-down-boat.”

“Eh… Nothing I made will get a temperature high enough to make anything on Semper’s deck ignite.” Abby’s eyes sparkle with pleasure. “Really, it’ll be awesome!”

Diane sighs. “I don’t suppose you got permits for this?”

“Er…”

Diane looks over to Tim, who’s been lounging back on one of the deck chairs, nursing a hard cider. He says, “Hey, I’m not anti-corruption for forty-eight more hours. I’m not even law enforcement, period, right now.”

Abby rolls her eyes, realizing they’re all about to get a lot more visible. “Next year, we’ll get the permits.”

“You sure you’ve got it?” Abby asks Gibbs.

He gives her a really? look.

“Okay, yeah, I know. Not that complicated. Take the tarp off the fireworks, and then hit the button, and off they go. A trained monkey could do it. Not that I’m calling you a trained monkey, because you’re not. Though if—’

“Abbs.”

She grins at him. “I can come, too.”

Gibbs shakes his head. He, Abbi, and the Semper are heading off on their own. He’s enjoyed seeing everyone today, and now, he’s looking forward to enjoying some time with just Abbi.

And a few hundred small explosives.

He kisses Abby, and then waves her down the pier. Most of the crew is out on the riverbank, or on their pier, looking forward to a great view of what’s about to happen next.

Gibbs and Abbi are going to get a better view of the show.

Gibbs pulls the ropes off the pier, and gives Semper a shove, and they’re off.

It’s only a few minutes of sailing to get themselves away from the tree line. A few more minutes and Gibbs’ GPS is telling him that they’re right on the Virginia/Maryland line. A few more feet and… Over the line into Maryland, where vastly more in the way of fireworks are legal, they go.

He drops anchor while Abbi’s pulling the tarp off of the… contraption is the only word she’s got for this thing on the back of the boat. According to Abby, who designed it, and Tim and Jimmy, who built it, and again, Tim, who wired it, this thing is perfectly safe.

Perfectly.

Gibbs is holding the remote start.
“You sure you want to try this?” Abbi’s asking, thinking twice about the safety of allowing a bunch of people who aren’t professionals to load a few hundred pounds of fireworks onto the bridge of Gibbs’s handmade, wood boat.

Gibbs ducks below decks, and comes back up with three full-sized, professional strength, fire extinguishers. (Courtesy of Glenn, who’s only comment on the subject was, “I’m going to pretend I don’t know why you want them.”)

He hands the remote to Abbi, and says, “Go for it.”

She takes a deep breath, crosses her fingers, and presses the button. For a moment, nothing happens, and then there’s a hissing sound as the first of Abby’s rockets goes shooting skyward. A second after that, the sky lights up with brilliant scarlet sparks. Another second, another hiss, and then they start going, faster and faster, rocket after rocket spinning skyward in arcs of light.

On the Semper, it’s loud, and not bringing the doggies was a very good idea. Both Mona and Jackson would be melting down at this, but for Gibbs and Abby, both laying on the prow, watching the rockets fly overhead and explode in scarlet, cobalt, azure, rose, white, silver and gold, this is one hell of a show.

Further up and down the river, other light shows begin. Bangs and crashes echo over the river. They’re more than far enough away to not be able to see the DC show, but they can catch sound and glimmers of it.

When their own load of rockets is done, Abbi raises up on one elbow, looking down at Gibbs, and says, “So, gonna add our own bang to the celebration?”

He grins up at her and pulls her down for a long, deep kiss.
McGee, FBI

“Oh my, look at you!” Breena says as Tim heads down for his first day at the FBI. “My very own G-man!”

Abby comes up behind him, resting her hands on his shoulders, and whispers in his ear, “Mulder.”

Tim laughs, looks at the ceiling, kisses his first wife, crosses the kitchen, kisses the second, and says to both of them “You’re killing me, you know that, right?”

“And you love it,” Abby says, patting his ass.

“Yeah, I do. So, look the part?” He broke out his good suit for this. He looks cool and put together in his gray wool/silk blend suit. But, he’s not exactly a Fed, no white shirt. He’s got on a jade green one with a gray tie. So… he’s at least following the basic idea of the dress code, if not the particulars of the navy/black suit, white or blue button down, and navy or burgundy tie.

“Like you’re about to show up and turn everything upside down?” Breena says as she starts putting lunches together.

Tim nods, sitting down to eat his breakfast and take over from Abby on riding herd on the little guys.

Abby eyes him up and down, grinning. “Yeah, you’ll do.”

It feels weird to walk into a job where no one knows him.

Okay, that’s not literally true. Some of the people here know who he is in a general sort of way. There are rumors about McGee, some of them may even be true.

But this isn’t home, and it’s not family, and no one here knows Probie, let along Agent, McGee.

There’s no one lurking around here with a mental image of a wet-behind-the-ears, overweight geek, desperate to make everyone around him happy.

Tim’s not sure if he likes that or not.

Apparently, at the FBI, even Directors get badges. (Though his is only for a certain set of specific occasions outlined on pages who-knows-what to you’ve-got-to-be-kidding-me in the approximately sixteen pound stack of rules and regs they handed him before they gave him the badge.)

And there is an oath of office, too.

NCIS had a creed. And it’s a very NCIS sort of creed. It’s a very Gibbs sort of creed. It’s the sort of creed that might be seen as winking at the idea of laws and rules and whatnot.

“I am an NCIS Special Agent. My duty is to serve and protect the United States and our Navy and Marine Corps across global boundaries. As a criminal investigator, I vigorously pursue the truth and remain objective at all times. I recognize my badge is a symbol of authority and public trust. I will live my life above reproach, understanding my actions reflect upon my fellow Special Agents and our agency. Like those who came before me, I am always mindful that professionalism, integrity and honor are the very foundation of the NCIS.”

It’s pretty much Gibbs on paper.

The FBI has an Oath of Office. Which Tim is repeating, and as he does so, he feels like this, in a nutshell, is all the difference anyone needs to know about NCIS or the FBI.

“I, Timothy McGee, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter.”

He skips over the “So help me, God.” bit at the end, and accepts his new badge and ID.

NCIS was all about NCIS. It was about truth, and honor, and justice. About protecting your men and your family.

The FBI is about law.

Timothy McGee, his face staring back at him on the laminated plastic of his ID, Director of Public Corruption. FBI. Apparently, he’s all about law now, too.

He supposes, given what he just swore to, and the weight of the gold plated shield in his pocket, and the basically unnoticeable pull of his ID on his lapel, that he should probably go find a copy of the Constitution and read the damn thing.

Granted, given what they’re up to in New York these days, he’s got no idea how much any of this matters, or can matter, anymore.

Tim whistles softly as Janice (the HR lady who’s taken him in hand) leads him to his office.

“Wow.”

She smiles at him. “You got one of the good ones. Anyway, take your time, set it up how you like, and then, all of your intake paperwork is in your inbox, and there are a collection of resumes on a thumb drive for possible secretaries. You don’t have to pick one from that collection, but if you go outside of it, whoever you get will have to pass our background check.”

Tim nods absently, still staring at this space.

Janice pats him on the shoulder, and says, “If you have any questions give me a call,” before heading off.

Tim barely notices her go. He’s still staring at this space. This is an office.

He’s got… actually, he’s not entirely sure, yet. This is the space where his secretary goes, and it’s already nicer than the office he had at NCIS.

He’s on the fourth floor. His secretary has two huge windows overlooking what used to be a really nice view of DC, and is now an awfully stark reminder of why he’s got his job. She’s got a sleek black desk, a top of the line computer, books shelves, filing shelves, in boxes, out boxes, more shelves, a sink, a mini-fridge, a small sofa and a coffee table. There’s actual room for people to sit out here and wait for him. (Just the idea of which is staggering to Tim.)

And this isn’t even his office.

He starts taking pictures and fires them off to Jimmy, Abby, Breena, and Gibbs, along with I have an anteroom.

Tim decides to open the door behind and to the left of the desk where the secretary will go at some point.

He’s proud to say his eyes do not, in fact, jump out of his head. (But only because his eyelids can only open so far.) He does have a desk, with an awfully spiffy computer on top of it. He, like the secretary, has shelves galore. Like Leon, he’s got a sofa, and two more comfy chairs around a small coffee table. He’s got a conference table that’ll sit at least six. There’s a big screen in here, ready for him to… He’s not sure… Do something with it.

He’s got a full on-closet.

And… He wasn’t sure what the hell he was expecting door number two to open onto, but an actual bathroom, with a shower, wasn’t it.

That gets him thinking, and he checks. Yes, the sofa folds out into a bed, and there are sheets and a pillow on the top shelf of the closet. If he needs to crash here, he’s completely set up to do it comfortably.

He’s taking pictures and sending them to his loves when he hears a voice.

“Who let you in here?” Fornell asks from the door to Tim’s office.

“I keep wondering that myself,” he replies, looking up at Fornell like he can’t believe this is his.

“Yeah, pretty spiffy, huh?”

Tim’s mouth opens and closes. “I had no idea.”

“Wasn’t kidding about the big leagues. Wait until you see what kind of cars they’ll let you use if you ever need one.”

Tim’s eyebrow jumps up.

Fornell grins. “You’ve got no idea.” He glances around. “I don’t see any boxes; let me give you a hand.”

As Tim’s pulling pictures from one of his boxes, Fornell says, “So you do own a suit.”

“I wore one to your wedding.”

Fornell shakes his head. “I wasn’t paying attention to you.”
“Something’s seriously wrong if you’re paying attention to me at your wedding.”

“Oh yeah.” Fornell strolls around the office, nodding. “A million years and I never would have imagined this.”

“Join the club,” Tim grabs his box of books out of Fornell’s arms and starts putting them on his shelves. “So, aren’t you supposed to be retired? They own your soul or something?”

Fornell groans. “Or something. You lose a few tanks…”

Tim raises an eyebrow.

“Okay, five. They said they put them back, and I was a tad busy, so I didn’t exactly check to see that they all got back where they belonged.”

Tim winces.

“Yeah. No one sold one. Though one of the guys parked his in his yard and hung a Gadsden Flag on it.”

Tim sniggers. “There’s a guy who isn’t going to get tread on.”

Fornell nods. “Anyway, lose a few tanks, next thing you know you’re doing paperwork until the end of time.” Fornell keeps telling Tim about it, and Tim keeps working on getting his office into shape, when what Fornell is saying, really saying, finally filters through.

He looks away from his books, back to Fornell, turning to him. “Wait, are you doing actual paperwork?”

“As opposed to imaginary paperwork?”

“I mean, on paper, with a pen?”

“No, I’m dreaming it up and angels are transcribing it for me. Yeah, with a pen. I’ve got to do a goddamned incident report for every damn tank, and every damn guy in the tank, and every time the tank fired and on and on and on. I think they decided they couldn’t do anything to me because I’m the guy standing up, head out of the turret, using tanks to get kids and sick people out of the city, so they’re making sure that I’ll be filling out forms until I die of ink poisoning.”

Tim blinks and licks his lips. Then he goes back to the secretary part of the office and sees a stack of physical paper in the inbox. He turns back to Fornell. “I don’t suppose it’s just you filling out forms?”

“For the tank thing, it is.”

“No, I mean… Sacks, he gets a case, what does he do when it’s done?”

“Sit down with his pen and get to it. We don’t have that magic doohickey you set up at NCIS, though some people here know about that and are hoping you’re going to roll it out.”

Tim’s eyes narrow. He’d be among the people here hoping he’d managed to roll that out. “Uh huh… Any scuttlebutt that it might already be in the works?”

Fornell shrugs. “If there is, I’m not part of the loop.”

Tim nods, slowly, and Fornell wonders what that look on his face means. “Do you know the name of the head of IT? I’ve talked to him before, but I don’t remember it.”

“Nope. But I can show you how to find it, why?”

“You want to guess who I gave my magic doohickey to, and directly ordered to have it up and running by the time I get here?”

“Oh, that’s not gonna go over well.”

There’s a gleam in Tim’s eyes, and Fornell doesn’t know if he’s angry or getting ready to enjoy this. Fornell knows he’s going to enjoy this, though.

“Can I watch?”

Tim nods, again. He doesn’t mind if scuttlebutt goes wide and fast about what happens when you fuck with McGee.

It takes Fornell less than a minute to find the head of IT.

Apparently, there’s an inner-office directory online. If he’d used his own ID, he could have gotten it in less than a second, but Tim wanted to see how it worked, for him. So it does take Fornell a moment to hunt down Tim’s ID number and login from the pile of paperwork on the secretary’s desk. Tim then puts on his to-do list, ‘Do not let HR just lay your ID and login info on the desk, waiting for you, where anyone can pick it up.’

“Carney,” Fornell says, reading the screen.

Tim’s nodding, his memory filling in the blanks. Among those blanks was the idea that the FBI’s maintenance schedule was set two years out, and Carney didn’t appear to be particularly interested in putting the paperwork software at the top of the list.

He remembers what felt like the conversational equivalent of pulling fingernails out. He also remembers Carney agreeing that the software would be up and running by the time Tim got here.

Well, he’s here, and there’s no paperwork software.

Time to find out what happened.

He decides to get into fact-finding mode, and there’s one fact he wants to find before he gets into this. Tim makes a quick call to Comey, and waits on hold for several moments before he’s able to talk to him.

“Tim, how are you getting settled in?” Comey’s voice is welcoming.

“I’ve got three pictures and my books up. One of my friends stopped by, and, I want to check on something, I told you about my NCIS paperwork software, and I was under the impression that you were interested in having that up and running here.”

“You weren’t kidding about hitting the ground running.”

Tim waits for an answer.
“Yes, I am. Your last Director, and his budget numbers, brag about it all the time.”

“All right. And, as a Director, I can fire people, right?”

“With cause, yes. Do you think you have cause?”

“I may. Just to check, not doing something you’re ordered to, that’s cause, right?”

“Assuming the order wasn’t illegal or impossible, yes. Doing it badly or slowly, isn’t.”

“Okay. Yeah, I may have cause. Got to get into it deeper.”

“Good luck.”

“Thank you.” Tim hangs up, and Fornell, who’s heard half of that conversation, is smirking.

“You planning on having a chat with Carney?”

“I am planning on having a chat with Carney. I need to know why that software isn’t running.”

Tim makes an appointment with Carney’s secretary. He decides to go in on this with an attitude that something just didn’t work right, and the system is in play, just moving more slowly than anticipated. It would not be, by a long shot, the first time something got SNAFU in a government office.

An hour later, he’s got more of his office set up, Fornell’s helping him do it, and they’re talking about what Tim’s planning on doing with this office. He lets Fornell know that if he ever wants any sort of job, Tim will happily give him one, retired or not.

Fornell waves that off, he’d like to, eventually, not go into work four days a week. He talks about how there’s about a half-dozen places he and Wendy want to go to, and he intends to be doing it by winter. “Emily’ll go back to school for the winter, and we’ll go somewhere warm and sunny. We had a great time on our honeymoon, and I want to see all the islands.”

Tim smiles at that idea. “Yeah…” He does a little math, “Only nineteen more years. Get ‘em out of the house, and… Breena’s been talking about Croatia. We’re watching Game of Thrones, and that’s where they film King’s Landing. She wants to go see it. Looks awesome.”

Fornell stops putting up books. He turns to Tim, starting at him, hard. “Looks awesome for her and Jimmy, you mean?”

Tim shrugs at Fornell. “Come on, you aren’t stupid, and I’m not, either. Figured you asked about the tatt for confirmation.”

Fornell did, for exactly that reason, so it’s not like Tim read him wrong, but he is curious how Tim knew. “Jethro told you I was asking questions?”

Tim shakes his head. He didn’t know Fornell had gone that far. “You showed up when I was in ‘relaxing at home mode.’ I forgot you didn’t know, and petted Jimmy when you were asking about Emily’s boyfriend problem. I like Seth, by the way.” Fornell nods; they all like him. “Anyway, saw your eyes bug out of your head, figured there was no shot you didn’t put it together after that. You didn’t flip out or act weird after that, so I decided we were cool.”

Fornell looks Tim over up and down. “Cool enough.”
“That’s all I need.”

“All four of you, really?”

“All four of us, really.”

“How does that—” Fornell shakes his head. “I don’t need to know.”

“And even if you did, I’m not telling.”

Fornell shakes his head again. “God bless, ya.”

“You tell Wendy or Emily?”

“Nah. Just talked with Jethro. He wouldn’t tell me what was going on. He made me fill in my own blanks.”

Tim inclines his head at that. “Look, I’m not going to tell you to keep secrets from your wife, but we’d prefer it didn’t end up flying around Emily’s social media platform.”

“Got it.” A wicked smile crosses Fornell’s face. “I’ll admit, I’d love to see the look on Diane’s face.”

Tim starts to laugh at that. He nods. “Oh yeah. Not enough to actually tell her, but… Damn.”

Fornell is nodding, too. “Might actually make her speechless.”

“Mr. Carney, thanks for coming up,” Tim says with a smile as he offers his hand.

Mr. Carney is not looking like he’s in a good mood. He’s looking like he just got news that someone pissed in his soup, after he ate the soup.

“Director McGee,” he notices Fornell in the corner. “And…”

“Agent Tobias Fornell,” Tim says as Fornell offers his hand. “He’s just here to observe.”

“Observe what?” There’s definite fear in Carney’s voice, now.

“That’s the question now, isn’t it?” Tim says, gesturing to the chairs and sofa in front of his desk. Fornell, in interrogation mode, moves into the corner, standing, arms crossed, back to it, watching Carney. Tim, mentally grinning, sits across the table from Carney.

He doesn’t know it, but he’s about to be interrogated, and depending on his answers… Well, at least he won’t end up in jail.

Carney sits down, looking edgy. Tim nods to Fornell, and he goes to the K cup machine, and gestures to it. Carney shakes his head, no coffee for him. Tim nods, and Fornell makes a cup for both of them.

“Last time we talked, you told me the paperwork software would be up by now. I’d like a sit rep.” Tim sits there, looking relaxed and comfortable, in this barely put together office. Fornell hands over the first cup, and Tim takes a sip. It’s black, nothing added to it, not the way he normally likes it, but this is about the image of comfort and confidence, so he says to Fornell. “Perfect, thanks,” as he settles back into what is a remarkably comfortable chair.

“No problem.” Fornell takes his own cup and heads back to the corner.

Carney just watches that, not saying anything.

“So, sit rep? How’s it going?”

“It’s not.”

Tim nods slowly. “It’s not, what?”

“Going.”

“Ah…” He inhales and exhales deeply, nods, and takes another sip. Then he carefully places the cup on the table in front of him. “And, would you care to explain why it’s not going? Did you, perhaps, run into unexpected difficulty adjusting the already coded software I gave you.”

Carney swallows. “No.”

Tim nods again. “Then I fail to see why that software is not up and running.”

“I am the head of IT. It’s my job to keep literally hundreds of thousands of computers worth hundreds of millions of dollars running all around the world. I am not about to stick some unknown program into them based on your say so.”

Tim keeps nodding. He gently taps the arm of his chair with his fingertips. “Uh huh… You know, that’s not a terrible line. I’ve heard significantly worse lies in my life.” Fornell nods along with that. “In fact, I bet, if the person you said that to didn’t know anything about computers, they’d sit here and go, ‘You know, that’s a relevant and prescient bit of defensive computing. Only a moron sticks an unknown thumb drive into their system.’ But here’s the thing, I wrote that program. I am not a person you can spew tech speak at and beat into stupefied submission with a wall of words. I run… ran computers for a living. So, I know that all you needed to do was take one computer, unplug it from your system, and from there you could have dissected every single line of code on that thumb drive without any risk to your hundreds of millions of dollars of computers and seen it was exactly what I said it was. So, I’d like an explanation for why you didn’t do that.”

Carney licks his lips and blinks. “We have procedures in place. Those procedures are in place to keep our systems safe. I cannot just jump the line because you tell me to.”

“Oh.”

“And you didn’t want to hear that.”

“True. Do you think I want to hear it, right now?”

“No.”

Tim smiles again. “Good guess. So, explain those procedures to me.”

“First things first, you have to submit a report for what the software does and why we need it. Then we schedule a feasibility study. Once that study is done, we talk about it. If it makes it through that conversation, it goes on the schedule.”

“The schedule that’s two years out?”
“Exactly.”

“Uh huh… So, you want to tell me why that sit rep didn’t go, ‘I took your plan and gave it to the feasibility study people?’”

They sit there, waiting for an excruciatingly long minute before Tim says, “Perhaps you were thinking someone along the lines of ‘This jackass doesn’t get to walk into my office and tell me what to do?’ Or maybe something like, ‘We have rules for a reason, and I’m gonna make this guy follow them?’”

There’s a tiny nod from Carney.

“Ah. Okay, so in that six months has now been wasted, I’d like to know what has to happen to get this software up and running, yesterday, and barring that, as fast as possible.” At this point, Tim’s debating what to do with Carney. Trying to figure out if this is just stubbornness he can work with, or if he’s got to go. He figures the answer Carney gives him will tell him a lot about what’s happening next.

“I’d need another copy of the program, and we can get the feasibility study on the calendar.”

“Oh, and that would be for…”

Carney licks his lips. Tim can see he’s thinking about what date to give. He’s also trying to test out the bounds and see what he can do. “March.”

Tim nods. “It’d be done by March.”

“No, it would get started in March.”

“And it would be done by…”

“The March after.”

“So, you’re telling me the fastest you can possibly get this online is almost four years from now.” And Tim knows this is the question that’s going to kill Carney, or not.

“Yes.”

Wrong answer. “That’s slower than when I talked to you last. Did you somehow lose all of those extra techs who were twiddling their thumbs after the FBI lost all of those offices?”

“No, I still have my full force.”

“And what are they doing?”

“The same stuff they were doing before.”

“Interesting. The FBI is in charge of investigating fifty million fewer people than it was this time last year. You have all of your staff, and you’ve still got the same workload?”

“Doesn’t matter how much crime you’ve got, we’ve still got the same number of agents to support.”

“Of course you do. Mr. Carney, thank you for this chat, it has been informative. As you know, it’s almost impossible to get rid of a federal employee. In fact, pretty much the only way to do it is to have one disobey a direct order. Head back to your office, clean out your desk, and send your number two and three men up here. You are fired, Mr. Carney.”
“You… can’t…you…wait…” Carney looks like someone just pulled the chair he’s sitting in out from under him.

“As you saw the last time I showed you this badge,” Tim flicks the ID badge on his suit. “I’m the Director of Public Corruption. I’m here to revamp and rework how the entire US Government polices itself, and anything that stands in the way of the FBI doing a good job of that, I can get rid of. You had the time and talent to get that software in place. You told me you’d get it in place. And it’d be one thing if you couldn’t get it in place, couldn’t make it work, but you never got that far. You didn’t make it work.

“If it was in place, it’d be saving literally tens of thousands of man hours a day here, and millions of dollars in cash.

“You have wasted my time. You’ve wasted the time of every, single, person in this building. That is not acceptable. That is not doing your job. Get out of my office, get out of this building, and send your two best men up to me.”

Carney looks stunned as he stumbles out of the room.

Fornell whistles.

Tim stands up, goes to the mini-fridge that’s under his shelves, and grabs his milk, adding it to his coffee. A moment later, after sipping the coffee, now the way he likes it, he says, “You told me I’d be terrifying at this job, am I living up to expectations?”

Fornell laughs.

Amanda Covington and Rollin Heyes are in Tim’s office about twenty minutes later.

Neither of them look happy.

“You can’t just fire people—“ Amanda starts.

“For not doing their jobs, oh yes I can and will,” Tim eyes Amanda, “and if you don’t want to work for someone who expects you to perform, you can start sharpening up your resume and hand in your notice.”

Her eyes go wide at that, and she shuts up.

“In your inboxes is a copy of a piece of software. It’s already coded, designed, and tested. It’s a database. You fill in information, and then it puts that information into every form you regularly fill out, then prints out the form, and your people sign it and file it. It, on average, saves a field agent three hours a day in paperwork time. At NCIS it saved literally millions of dollars a year in overtime, comp time, and personnel costs.”

They’re both watching him.

“You two have an opportunity now. You can get that software up and functional, in the next month, or you, too can go hunting for a new job, and I’ll talk to your second-in-commands. And we’ll keep doing this until I’ve fired everyone in IT, or I have a running paperwork system.” Tim smiles at them.
“So, August 5th is a month from now. I expect to see you both up here, at 9:00, telling me how you’ve got my paperwork software up and running.”

“You gave Carney six months,” Heyes says. Tim can see his mind skittering around, frantically looking for a way to get more time for this.

“I wasn’t going to be here for six months. I am here now, and my plan was to hit the ground running. My guys are not running if they’re sitting at their desks filling out papers. I am not building teams, redoing the way people report corruption crimes, or investigating anything, if I’m filling out forms. So, make it work!”

“Can’t be done. I don’t think we can even find all the forms in a month!” Covington says.

“The last guy who told me something was impossible was talking about this system, too. It took my team six weeks to code it, a month to test it, two more weeks of coding, and another month of testing. You don’t have to do any of that because it’s all done for you. Literally, all you have to do is find someone to change the names of the forms. Three fairly decent typists could do it in less than a week.”

“Do you have any idea how many forms we have?” Covington asks.

“Where do you think I came from? I worked for a Federal Agency before I came here. I know exactly how many forms you’ve got. Unlike you guys, I used to spend hours a day, filling them out. The program is already set up for most of them, because most of the time, we fill out the exact same paperwork!

“Now, make it happen or hand me your resignations.”

He doesn’t get any resignations, but he also doesn’t have happy, excited, ready to go mess around with a new challenge, people skipping out of his office.

“So, besides ending up running IT, what are you supposed to be doing here?” Fornell says to Tim.

Tim sighs. “Not supposed to be in charge of IT.”

“Do you get the fact that lack of change is the design here, not a flaw? Things are supposed to be hard to change because that makes sure things keep working the same from one Director to the next.”

“Yeah, I’m fairly certain killing that is nine tenths of why Comey didn’t laugh in my face when I said I wanted the whole thing and not just Cyber.”

Fornell opens and shuts his mouth at that.

Tim sighs, and starts setting up the computer on his desk. Once he starts paying attention to the desk, he does notice a huge pile of papers in a literal inbox on his desk, too. His shoulders slump. “You weren’t kidding about paperwork.”

“Really wasn’t. You brought a pen, right?”

“No. I don’t do anything with actual paper unless it’s in my typewriter or I’m editing something from said typewriter.”
Fornell sighs, and hands Tim a pen.

“Thanks.”

Tim roots around a bit more, finds his printer, (which makes him wince. He shouldn't have a printer. There should be NO PAPER, at all, in any of this) and the paper that goes in the printer, and then roots around in the desk a bit more and locates a roll of tape.

He takes the paper, writes on it: ALL COMMUNICATIONS ON PAPER WILL BE INCINERATED UNREAD. SEND COMMUNICATIONS TO TMCGEE@FBI.ORG and then tapes it onto his door.

Fornell shakes his head. “You realize there are going to be papers that require your literal signature on them, right?”

“Nope.”

Fornell gives him the sweet, sheltered child look. His voice is cloyingly gentle as he says, “Oh, Tim… This is the FBI. We have rules here. We like rules here. And some of those rules mean you have to deal with actual paper.”

Tim shakes his head, “Nope. It’s been more than twenty years since it became legal to put an electronic signature on a document, that’s more than enough time for it to have filtered through to you guys.”

“Anyone can type your name on an email.”

Tim slumps even further; he’s about to end up on the floor at the rate this is going. “Please tell me your cyber security isn’t so bad that you can’t tell if someone really sent you an email or if they just faked an account.”

“You can do that?”

“I’m feeling a lot better about firing your top IT guy.”

———

By the end of the day, Tim’s come to the conclusion that if he never has to use a pen again, it’ll be too soon.

He knows that less than two years ago, he used to spend hours a day, most days, filling out page after page of forms, but now…

He’s feeling like he doesn’t just want Carney fired, but he wants to drag him back up here and punch him a few times, too. Six months, and nothing happened, but when it all comes down to it, it’s his fault for not keeping on Carney’s back.

Just because you’ve got the title doesn’t mean people will immediately say ‘how high?’ when you say ‘jump.’ Though tossing the head of IT out on his first day should get a bit more in the eagerness in the responses from people dealing with him.

Tim reaches for yet another piece of paper.

The paper has to be filled out. Somehow, the records have to be maintained, especially since he’s the damn guy making sure everyone else fills out their work, he’s really got to do his. (He mentally glares at Carney for a few more moments as his fingers cramp around the pen.)

Which means, until he can get someone in IT to get his software up and running, he’s got to fill out the damn paperwork, too.

He’s idly thinking of taping a picture of Carney on the target he’s going to shoot the next smiley face into, (that’s making him smile) as he fills in yet another blank.

Eventually, after, by conservative estimate, fifty-four hours of filling out papers, 5:00 rolls around, and Tim’s done for the day.

He lays all of his finished papers into the outbox, wondering if the magic paper fairy will make them vanish over the course of the night, bringing him new ones before morning.

He’s standing up, eyeing the unfinished ones, tucking his things into his go bag, when he senses someone at his door. He looks up to find Comey chuckling at the note on his door. “If I thought that’d help, I’d have put it on my door, too.”

Tim waves him in. Then he opens the top drawer of his desk, and pulls out a lighter. (After last fall, he's always got food, water, a candle, band aids, antiseptic ointment, and a lighter in his go bag and desk.) "Maybe if I actually light a few of them, they may start to take the sign seriously."

Comey laughs. And Tim isn't sure if what he's said is just funny, or funny because it won't work. “So, how’d the first day go?”

Tim holds up his left hand, smears of black ink are visible on the pinkie side. “This wasn’t supposed to happen.”

“Ah, and what did you do about it?”

“Fired your head of IT, scared number two and three into getting the paperwork software into play in a month. I don’t know if they’ll get it done, but I can’t imagine they’ll get less done than Carney did.”

Comey holds up both hands. “It’s the FBI. Change can be slow.”

“Fornell said that, too.”

Comey’s looking around his office, and Tim’s watching him.

“You going to give me any crap about Carney?”

“I hired you based in the idea that you’d do what you’d do, and if I didn’t like it, I’d send you packing. So far, you still have a job.”

“All right.”

“Granted, I would prefer you at least attempt to work with the rest of the organization.”

Tim's thinking he would prefer to at least attempt to work with the rest of the organization, too. “Given what I did today, that should be a bit easier.”

“It just might.” Comey continues to look around at what Tim’s done with his office. “Do I get to know your plan?"

“How detailed do you want to get?”

“How about you give me vague, now, while you head out, and we schedule a meeting to talk serious details for later this week.”

“I can do that.” Tim shoulders his bag and allows Comey to leave the office first. “In terms of general plans. Tomorrow, I wrap up paperwork. I hire a secretary. Then I start sketching out teams. I have ideas of who and what I want, and once I’ve got a secretary, we’re going to start working on a full re-org.” There’s something else Tim knows he’s going to do. “You had guys here investigating public corruption before, and I am going to be going through them, carefully. I’m guessing everyone who ever worked an election case, or any of the last few presidents, or the rest of that, is going to be out. Once I know who’s still in, I’ll have a better idea of what I’m going to need staff-wise.”

Tim catches that little swallow Comey does before he says, “Sounds logical,” but he doesn’t know what it means. Other than, he needs to look into it.

“Then, build up the staff, get them into teams, get those teams online, and start talking with your IT guys, this time run it through proper channels, to build up a system so that we can get whistleblowers complaining without fear of retribution. I’ll let them do their studies and all the rest of it, but we’re gonna do this fast. I want people able to report things to us, safely, within two years.”

“They’ll fuss about that.”

“I know, but I also know I’m not asking for the impossible. Not even improbable. Just challenging.”

Comey nods. “It’ll help that you can really talk tech with them.”

“I hope so.”

“Once that’s rolling, I’m going to start talking to your analytics department, and explain what we’re doing at NCIS, using crime reporting to look for patterns. Like, if we’ve got a base with too many assault cases, or not enough assault cases, we’ll send someone in to poke around and see what’s going on. We’re going to start doing that, too.”

“Poke around who?”

“Anyone we have jurisdiction over. So, other feds to begin with. Ourselves. Definitely start with ourselves. Can’t clean anyone else’s house when you’re sitting in a mess. I’ll have to get into the nitty gritty, but if we can go after state and local cases--”

“That’s playing with fire. They need to call us in.”

“Okay. Just working with the Feds should keep us going for a long time. Basically, with enough data, we can find patterns. When we find outliers, we can go after them. That kind of data use can be rolled out from everything from police brutality claims to benefits fraud. On the most basic level, we can just check what bank accounts and addresses all payouts go to. I could probably have five guys write a code that goes through each agency that sends out money, flags the accounts the money goes to, and then matches them against every other agency. Any account getting too many benefits gets red-flagged. Boom, we check into it.”

Tim starts to turn toward the stairs, and Comey’s heading for the elevator. He points, and Tim decides that taking the elevator is probably a good plan. A bit more private.
They wait for the doors to open. “We can reverse that, too. See where money comes from. That one’s a bit more tricky, but not impossible. Should make finding kickback schemes a lot easier.”

“I like the sound of that.”

“Me, too. So that’s my big data department. I’m going to want a bunch of lawyers…” Tim thinks for a moment, not sure if he wants to get into all the ins and outs of why he wants this. He decides that if Comey doesn’t already know about the Clemens case, he doesn’t need to. “And I’m going to have them going through each new law that passes. With a fine tooth comb. I want to know what those laws do, how, why, and who can scam them, and how.”

“It almost sounds like you’re working on ‘pre-crime;’ get them before they break the law.”

“I just want to know what they can do. Though, in the read all the laws case, part of it will also be a way to see who wrote what, and if it’s got any little perks or benes that make us wonder who they’re really working for. I don’t think I’m going to have to bust too many people for writing a special law just to benefit one of their pet donors before that’ll start to go out of fashion.”

Comey laughs at that. “It’s nice to see someone with some idealism. Trust me, you’ll never kill that.”

“Maybe not, but I might as well whack some heads off the Hydra if I can, right?”

“Go right ahead. Just remember, you’ve got to stuff molten lead down its throat to actually kill it, assuming you’re trying to kill it, and don’t consider whacking it’s heads off some form of cardio or something you do for fun.”

Tim takes the advice. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

“Good.” They’re down a floor. “And I get off here. Once you have a secretary, make the appointment to talk more.”

“Sure.”

---

In his car, Tim thinks about the Hydra. The thing is, he doesn’t know how to stuff the molten lead down its throat. All he can think of is ways to chop the different heads off.

He supposes, for right now, whacking off heads is good enough. Hopefully, if he’s got enough heads on his wall, he might encourage some other people to not risk getting their heads lopped off.

But Comey’s right. Whacking off heads isn’t enough. He’s got to find a way to kill the beast.

But, as he’s driving home, he’s afraid that corruption, that trading power for more power, money for access and special privileges, may be immortal. It may be that all he can do is behead the beast. Maybe make them have to work harder, smarter to do what they want to do.

Sitting in traffic, waiting for a light to change, Tim wonders if five or so years from now, when he’s got his systems in place, and he’s hit the point where he’s gotten all of the easy corruption, if he’s going to hit a wall.

And he wonders, if he hits that wall, if cleaning up the easy stuff will have been enough.
Hiring a secretary feels a lot like hiring a nanny.

He’s got a thumb drive, full of extremely qualified people, most of whom are women, many of whom are black or brown, and all of whom will… apparently… have a career built around taking care of him.

It feels really odd.

So, he dithers. And fills out more paperwork. And then checks his email.

417 emails. He’s had the job for fewer than eighteen hours.

Tim rapidly comes to the conclusion that he cannot do this damn job without someone who is dedicated to taking care of him, because if he doesn’t have that person, he’s going to spend all of his time on paperwork and emails alone.

Staring at his inbox, that he’s had for one day, he’s realizing that he could literally spend every minute of today just responding to emails.

“This isn’t going to happen,” he says to the room at large, and opens that thumb drive back up again.

Since he’s not entirely sure what a secretary does, he’s also not entirely sure what he should be looking for in this person.

Ask Tim what an ideal head of his sexual harassment division looks like, and he can talk about him/her for days. Who is his chief Untouchable? Yep, he’s got that in mind. The “spokesman” for his team and what they’re doing: he knows exactly who that is, and how she looks, what she sounds like, and all the rest of it.

But, a secretary?

Eventually, he grabs the five names on the list with the most experience, and asks HR to do whatever it is they do (another arcane subject with which he isn’t familiar) and get said potential secretaries to show up and meet with him.

They promptly write him back, asking when he’s available.

Tim stares at that email, sighing, again. If his email inbox is anything to go by a lot of people want meetings with him.

Then he delves into the software they set him up with, looking to see if he’s got some sort of calendar. There is one. He can edit it, other people can, too. All he has to do is link it up with his phone and he’s got something to tell him where he’s supposed to be, and with whom.

That’s a start.

He gives HR the link, and then gives them some time to mess around with it while he sets up his email auto-response.
It’s a vague “Hi, thanks for writing me. I’m getting settled in just fine. Here’s my calendar, schedule something if you want face time, otherwise, I’ll get to the emails as soon as I can” sort of note.

By the time he’s done with it, he’s got two interviews on his calendar. One in three hours. He smiles at that, and then he fills out some more paperwork while thinking about what sorts of things he’s looking for in a secretary.

Jennifer Malone is his first interview. She’s been an executive assistant (and Tim makes a note to use that title, and not secretary) for the last twenty-five years. She’s a bit older than he is, probably hovering just below fifty years old.

She’s wearing a tidy pantsuit, has short, curly blonde/gray hair, along with professional makeup, no nonsense shoes with a sensible heel, and everything about her radiates competence.

(Tim’s got the sinking sensation this will be true of all of them, and he won’t be able to cross anyone off the list on a glance.)

She’s worked in Federal offices before, has the highest security clearance assistant staff can achieve, but, again, that’s true of everyone he picked. (Actually, the security clearance was true of everyone in the thumb drive.)

As she enters his office, and shakes his hand, her gaze is direct, her touch firm, and she’s…

Perfectly fine.

Which is great, except he’s got to find someone who’s better than perfectly fine.

“Coffee,” he asks. “I think I’ve got a tea k cup lurking around in here, too, if you prefer that.”

“I’m fine, Mr. McGee.”

He nods, grabbing a cup for himself. “Just, McGee or Tim is fine. Unless you prefer honorifics.”

“Tim and Jennifer works for me, too. So…”

“Yeah…” He sips his coffee. “Okay, so, if this isn’t already abundantly clear, I’ve never had an assistant before, and am, at best, fuzzy on what your job is supposed to be. I know it’s not fetching me coffee.”

She offers him a wry smile. “I’ve been known to do that, too.” She glances at his K-cup machine. “Believe it or not, I’ve worked for men who didn’t know how to use one of those.”

“That’s disturbing.” Even Gibbs, without having anyone explain it to him, could master the basic concept of put coffee in one end, stick the cup on the other, and push one button.

She gestures to indicate it is what it is.

“Okay, so… How about you tell me what you think the job is, what you expect to be doing?”

She thinks about that for a moment. “Okay. There are a collection of things that I know how to do, and you don’t.” Then she looks more carefully at him. “Wait, how old are you?”

“Forty in December.”
“Hmmm… I usually like to research job opportunities before I interview for them, but I didn’t have time for it today.”

“Good enough. I appreciate you being here less than four hours after I sent down my go to list.”

“Anyway, I was going to say, I know how to do things you don’t, like how to do a mail merge, but… You’re young enough you might know how to do that.”

Tim smiles. “As of this point, it would be safe for you to assume that if there’s a version of it on Microsoft Office or Open Office, I know how to use it. I can also type faster than I speak.”

“Ah. Okay. In that case, there are a collection of things we may both know how to do. A collection of things I can’t do, that you can. And probably some things that I know how to do that you either don’t know how to do or don’t want to do. My job is to make sure you get to spend your time doing the things I can’t do, and I spend my time on the things we both can do, and the things you don’t want to do.”

Tim’s nodding along with that. “Sounds good to me. Concrete example time: I’ve been in this job less than twenty-four hours. There are already 417 emails in my inbox. What do you do with that?”

She smiles a little. “How honest do you want me to be?”

“Go for it. I’m not in the business of ignoring people who know what they’re doing when they give me good advice.”

“First off, tear down that sign on your door. Paper takes effort, email doesn’t. If someone has to write it up, print it out, and then have it delivered to you, they won’t bother for stupid stuff. An email takes thirty seconds, so they will fire it off for anything.”

That’s an idea that’s never occurred to Tim before.

“Second of all, your TMcGee address, that’s the one I run. That’s the address on your card. That’s a buffer account for people who don’t know you personally. Set up a TimothyMcGee address, or something like that, for people who you know won’t waste your time, so they can get directly to you.”

Tim nods at that.

“As for the TMcGee address… Going through that is my first job of the day. Most of those mails won’t matter. And most of the time, you probably won’t get more than 100 a day. Probably 200 of those emails in your box now are people saying hello and introducing themselves. I put them in a database along with some bit of information on them, so if one of them asks for your attention at a later point, you’ve got a CliffNotes version of who they are and how ‘you’ve’ interacted with them in the past.

“Of the remaining 217, some will have issues that need your attention. I forward them to the TimothyMcGee address, and if it’s a really big deal, I come get you in person and show it to you. Some of them don’t need your attention, and I take care of it, say setting up meetings and the like. Some of them really don’t need your attention. They’ll need someone working for you, but they don’t know whom. It’s my job to get them to the right person.”

That sounds great, but Tim’s not seeing how she’d do it. “How do you know which is which? How can you determine who needs to talk to me in person or not?”

“At first, I’ll send a lot more of your communications through to you. Part of that is you’re learning the job, too. Part of it, is when you handle it, you’ll let me know if that was something you needed to do, or if it could have been handed off. I make notes of that, keep track, and when I see that issue again, I know what to do with it.”

“You do that in your head?”

“Lord, no. No one’s got that good of a memory. I do it in Excell. I make databases like nobody’s business. Eventually I’ll have lists of issues, how you’ve handled them in the past, and when I run into something that’s not on the list, I’ll hit you up for more help. Or, say, if the same issue keeps coming up again and again, I’ll escalate it to you.”

Tim’s smiling. “You ever do any coding, say SQL?”

Jennifer shakes her head.

“I mostly work with Python now, but SQL is a computer language designed to build the kind of databases you’re talking about. It’s a bit more flexible and responsive than Excell.”

She’s not looking convinced. “The thing I can’t make Excell do is the thing that can’t be done.”

“Then I won’t poke you away from it. But, if you’ve got some spare time, it might be worth a bit of research.”

She inclines her head, and dares a little smile to go with some dry humor in her voice. “Well, now, whether or not I’ve got a bunch of free time coming up is in your hands now, isn’t it?”

“Right.” Somehow Tim had forgotten that. “How do you feel about working from outside the office?”

“I prefer to be at my computer, but I always have a laptop handy, and can get whatever you need at a moment’s notice. Granted, I prefer not to be woken up at two in the morning with a request for something you can do yourself.”

“No what I was thinking. I have a family, and I intend to see them, every day. Preferably when they’re awake. So there will likely be a decent number of days where I’ll work my normal eight to five, head home for dinner, and then get back to it after the kids are in bed. My last Boss, he preferred to be in his office, and his secretary tended to be in hers the entire time he was in his. I’m fine with you not being in the office, as long as you can grab me as needed, and vice versa.”

“I like the idea of getting home for dinner every night.”

“Even if it means being on call, maybe from seven to ten?”

“Better than cooling my heels in here.”

“Okay. Any night I don’t need you, you’re off. Other nights, we’ll likely be on all night.”

“It wouldn’t be the first time I had that sort of arrangement.”

“Do you have questions for me?” Tim asks.

“I got called in for this less than an hour before getting here, so… What are we doing?”

“The sign on the door says Director of Public Corruption. Basically, I’m the guy cleaning up the mess left over from last fall. We’ve got jurisdiction over the rest of the Federal Government, and it’s our job to weed out the bad apples. Don’t let them poison the rest of the bushel.”
“Interesting.”

“We’re going to piss a lot of people off. You will likely get yelled at by a lot of unhappy people. I will, too. I’m sure there are going to be people who will try and get you to muck up investigations. And, this isn’t a personal judgement or statement or anything like that, but if you have something that can get you blackmailed, I’m sure, eventually, someone will try to use it against you.”

She takes that in stride. “I’ve worked for a Virginia Attorney General before, and a Federal Judge, I’m used to that.”

“Okay. Just… Realize this time, we’re going against Attorney Generals and Judges. I’m thinking it won’t be likely, but crap like your kids are driving home late at night, and the DEA may show up to bust the for ‘drugs.”

“Be on the lookout for people playing hardball, got it.”

“Anything like that happens, first thing you do is come screaming to me. Seriously, no matter what the threat is, or how much pressure they put on you, come to me. We’ll get it sorted out. I spent twelve years sorting things like that out. I’m really good at it, and I’ve got a team of people who will drop everything to help me get my people out of those sorts of problems.”

“I can do that.”

Tim’s watching her, thinking about something. Namely, every story he’s ever read with a good secretary in it, that secretary has known everything about her Boss. He’s not willing to open up about his personal life yet, but he knows that it would be a deal breaker for some people. So, he edges around the question.

“We’re going to go hard on all forms of public corruption, including sexual harassment. And, again, this isn’t personal, I’m going to ask everyone I interview this, but, will you go to bat for people who aren’t ‘normal?’

“My sexual harassment team will involve people who have their jobs expressly for the purpose of being ‘different’ and then using those ‘differences’ to weed out people who can’t work with people who don’t fit straight, male, heterosexual norms.

“So, if I’ve got a six foot three person in here, who goes by xie/xim instead of her or him, wearing a skirt, with visible tattoos, an Adam’s apple, and breasts, will you be able to handle that? Can you welcome xie into my office, be polite and respectful, and work with xim as needed?”

“I might get tripped up on the xie/xim stuff, but I will try to use them correctly. I won’t be rude. Anyone who gets into this office has already passed through my screening, so they’ll be offered a warm welcome.”

“That’s good enough. Anything else?”

Jennifer shakes her head.

“Okay. I’ve got four more interviews. Get the job or not, I will call you back and let you know what’s going on.”

She stands up, shaking his hand. “I look forward to it.”

“Thanks.”
Interview number two goes much the same way. Polite, competent, somewhere in the range of fifty years old, Melissa Cartwright might as well have been produced by central casting when the call for “Perfect Administrative Assistant” came up.

When he asks her what she thinks the job is, she laughs and says, “What isn’t it? An Administrative Assistant is basically your Girl Friday. I do whatever you need.”

“Give me some concrete examples of what you expect to be doing?”

“I run your calendar, make sure you get to where you need to be when you need to be there, and are properly prepped for it. I handle the emails you don’t need to. I schedule all of your travel. I greet your guests when they come here. I buy thank you gifts and send notes when need be. I keep track of your wife’s birthday and anniversary and make sure you remember to send her something nice.”

“I’ve got that one down.”

“Good for you. The last person I worked for had a husband, three kids, and nine grandchildren. Keeping track of all of that and making sure everyone got a birthday card, Chanukah gift, Valentine, and Halloween treat from Nana was part of my job.”

“Our oldest,” there’s barely a pause as he remembers to stick niece in there, “niece will be four in February. Right now I’ve got minimal effort necessary to handle kid’s celebrations.”

“Do you have children?”

“Yes.” He heads into his part of the office and grabs a shot of the whole family. “This is us. These two little guys belong to Abby and I,” he points out Kelly and Sean, “Kelly’s just over two. Sean’s seven months old.” He points to the bit of family next to him and Abby. “Jimmy, Breena, and their girls. Molly’s the one that’s edging toward four. Little girl there is Anna. Baby bump is Donnie.” Then he points out Tony and Ziva, “That’s the DiNozzo branch of the family. Tony, Ziva, and Dave. The older couple in the back are Penny, my grandmother, and Ducky, her husband. The white haired guy is my dad, and the redhead he’s got his arm around is his fiancee, Abbi.”

“Two Abbies?”

“Makes things interesting.”

“Well, maybe I won’t be sending out presents to the grand kids, but making sure everyone gets a treat on their birthday looks like a full time job with this crew.”

Tim smiles a bit. “It might be. But if it is, it’s a job I intend to do for myself.”

Melissa gives him a look, and he thinks she’s thinking at him, “You can certainly try, but I don’t think it’ll happen.”

Tim finds that look disturbing. Not because it’s insulting, but because of what it may say about how much of one’s life this sort of job consumes.

It’s on the third interview that Tim realizes that any answer but, “Of course I’ll work with xie/xim and do it with perfect politeness and tact’ is likely illegal.

His third interview, Glynnis Bluchard, gives him that same answer, but he’s been an interrogator too long to not notice her eyes go hard, and her body language start to show off how uncomfortable she is with the idea.

That’s one he can boot off the list.

Interview number four: Katherine Willis. Again, perfect, polished, competent. She’s pleasant, and seems to know what she’s doing.

As she’s leaving, she looks out the window, and says, “I hate this view.”

Tim nods. He doesn’t exactly love looking out at destroyed DC, either.

“This is why we do our job.”

She nods, looking away from the destruction. “Yeah. It was a pretty picture, but the foundation was rotten.”

“Exactly.”

“You go in and tear out the rest of the rotted support structures.”

He nods again.

“Is anyone putting up any new ones?” Katherine asks.

Tim sighs at that, too. “I don’t know. That’s not our job. Our job is to clear out the rot.”

She gestures to the miles of wreckage and rebuilding. “You think we’ll end up with more of this?”

Tim shrugs. “I don’t know. I hope not.”

After she leaves, he wonders about that. Is it better to have people do the job badly, or not do the job, at all?

Interview number five, the last thing on his schedule before heading off for his weekend on Friday evening, doesn’t feel right at all.

Kristin James’ answers are perfect, she’s polite and polished and calm and… does not like him, at all.

He doesn’t know if it’s the fact that it’s Friday, so he’s in jeans and a purple button down, sleeves rolled up, wrist collar visible, and just doesn’t look like her idea of a Boss, or if there’s something about him or what he’s supposed to be doing that hits her wrong.

That’s two he’s managed to boot off the list.
“So, that’s two I was able mark off,” he’s saying at their family dinner, in response to the question of, “So, how did the first week go?” “but the other three?” Tim gestures with his hands to indicate he’s got no idea.

“No personal demons to help you decide?” Jimmy asks, eyes amused, chewing a bite of asparagus.

“Yeah, the universe didn’t see fit to gift-wrap me an assistant and plop her at my door.”

“Could you skip it?” Abbi asks. “I don’t have one.”

“I’ve spent all my time between interviews and meetings filling out paperwork and answering emails and I still have more than 900 of them in my inbox.”

The collected Gibbs clan winces.

Tim nods. “And from everything I can see, go yell at your higher ups and get some budget for an assistant of your own. You might be able to get home for dinner more than twice a week if you weren’t hacking through your inbox with a machete every day.”

“Not my inbox keeping me away right now,” Abbi replies between bites of grilled salmon. She’s been commuting to New York City to testify before Congress for much longer than she wanted to. “But, they tell me, and Penny, if they’re lying, don’t tell me, because I want to enjoy the fantasy,” Penny smiles at that, sipping her wine, “that I will be done with my commuting to New York and testifying as of Monday.”

“Last I heard, that’s true. One more day of questions for you, and then off you get to go until we start pulling up cases against individuals.”

“How are you doing cases if not against individuals?” Breena asks.

“All the cases are against individuals, but right now, for opening statements and evidence collection, we’re running the Congress of the United States V. Multiple Conspirators.”

Tony, who hadn’t been reading up much on that case, looks up from grinning at Dave, who’s in his lap, chewing on his finger. “That’s really the name you’re going with?”

“For right now,” Ducky says. “Once they get into individual cases, the name will shift to each person.”

“Any of the three you’ve got left who you really like?” Gibbs asks Tim a moment later, pulling him back to his assistants.

“Not in the sense of I met one and just clicked with her.” Tim chews one of his green beans, thinking. “Okay, the first one likes to build databases to do her job better, and that resonates, I guess.”

“Like calling to like,” Abby says, stroking his hand.

“Yeah. I guess.”

“Then give her a call and get her into your office on Monday! Every day this week, you’ve come home dead on your feet,” Breena replies, eyeing him. Her voice has a little joke in it, but only a little. He has pretty much come home, eaten, helped get kids to bed, and then crashed.

“Your paperwork tolerance dropped that fast?” Tony asks with a smirk.
Tim shakes his head. “It must have. I go in, I deal with stupid stuff, eat some lunch, deal with more stupid stuff, and I go home, dead. Three days, and I haven’t gotten to do anything. I’ve been on stakeouts that didn’t wipe me out this much.”

“Are you feeling well, Timothy?” Ducky asks.

“Yeah, Duck, and if I wasn’t,” he nods to Jimmy, who’s sitting across from him, trying to get Anna to try a bite of the fish, “he’d be all over me.” And, on day two of dead tired, Jimmy was checking him out. And Tim swatted at him, mumbling something about, ‘I’m fine, let me sleep.’ “Just tired.”

“What constitutes ‘stupid stuff’?” Ducky asks.

Tim rolls his eyes, and shakes his head. He’s about to add words to that, when Sean, who’s sitting on Abby’s lap, decides to try to lunge over toward him, catching both of them by surprise, resulting in him almost ending up on the floor if it hadn’t been for quick reflexes on both of their parts.

A moment later, when Sean’s in his lap, and Tim’s heart has calmed down a bit from the adrenaline spike of baby trying to leap into space, he says, “Stupid stuff. Paperwork. Okay. The forms have to be in ink, uncorrected, and original. So, I don’t put any dashes in my social security number. Because when I type it into a computer, it doesn’t need the dashes. But, some poor person is apparently taking all of my forms, and manually typing them into a computer, instead of having me do it in the first place. That person apparently wants dashes in my social security number, so I had to redo every page that number was on.”

“Ouch.” Tony replies.

“And no, they won’t just let me go down to HR and type the damn forms in myself. I could do that faster than filling them out with a pen, but they need the ink on paper version, too, for God alone knows what reason. So, it’s just stupid things like that. Rules, forms, and paperwork for the sake of rules, forms, and paperwork.”

“And you are hoping to change that?” Ducky adds.

“That’s the plan. Don’t know how well I’ll do at it. Hell, at this point I don’t know if I’ll even get a chance to do it. This is very much not a part of the military. Having someone show up who outranks you and tells you what to do doesn’t mean it’s going to get done.”

Gibbs smirks at that. “Spoken like someone who’s never been in the military. Not doing what you’ve been told to do is a high art.”

“Fine. Looks like it’s been perfected at the FBI.”

Abby rubs the back of his neck. “You’ll get them moving.”

“I hope.”

“But first off, go give Database Lady a call, and get her in your office Monday morning. You can hold off until after the weekend to call the rest of them, but you need someone to hand the paperwork off to, so get it done!” Breena adds. Granted, she’s been rooting for him to hire whoever showed up first, hand off the stupid stuff, and then once he could breathe and see what he’s doing, figure out what he needs in a secretary, and then, if lady number one wasn’t it, go hire a new one. When she told him that, Wednesday night, he laughed grimly, and then dropped the 250 page hiring and firing manual that he’s supposed to read and follow, in her lap.

That said, at this point, he doesn’t think she’s wrong. “After the kids are down, I’ll give her a call.”
“Good.”

“Hi, may I please speak to Jennifer Malone?” Tim’s thinking the voice that answered is her, but he’s hedging his bet.

“This is her.”

“Hi. It’s Tim McGee… So… um… If you were planning on spending some time on SQL, I’m thinking that’s not going to happen.”

“Really?” he hears the smile in her voice.

“Yeah. I’ve got some projects I’d really like you to get started on as soon as possible.”

She chuckles, likely with the mental image of him drowning in paperwork or emails. “Monday morning, eight o’clock?”

“Yes, please!”

“Wonderful. I’ll see you then.”

“Thank you!”

And, like every other night since he started with the FBI, he hits the bed, and crashes, hard. But, drifting off to sleep, he’s hopeful that maybe something useful will actually get done this week.
“Oh Fuck!” It’s somewhere between a whisper and a breath. Right now he feels too good to make too much noise.

Tim knows it’s dream sex. He’s seeing it from outside of himself, and feeling it, too. No way that’s happening in real life.

It feels like a dream, too. He can’t remember how he got here, and for that matter, he doesn’t care. He’s hot and hard and Breena’s spooned up in front of him and Abby’s behind and he’s getting done and doing to at the same time and his body is singing with the pleasure of it.

Dream sex… Feels better than real sex, but frustrating, he can’t come. God, he wants to. Wants to fuck harder and faster and he can, does, moving slick and liquid between the girls. Abby’s grinding into him, her hand on his chest, lips on his neck, and her plastic cock is hitting him exactly right. Breena’s in front, and she’s wet and slick, gripping onto him, rippling around him as he fingers her pussy and thrusts as deep as he can…

But deep pulls him away from Abby and the glorious pulse of that cock hitting just right.

But arching back onto Abby pulls him out of Breena, and he wants that tight, wet heat of her completely enveloping him.

He’s rocking back and forth, fast, whimpering at how good it feels. He’s so hard and wants to come so bad, and Buzzing…

The dream starts to fade away. Bits of it, the real ones, like he’s got Breena in front of him and Abby behind him, and the… Yes, that is definitely buzzing… And Jimmy groans, at being awakened again (he had Sean last night), that definitely wasn’t part of the dream.

Breena sits up, confused. “That’s my phone.”

And with that, every vestige, except for an extremely hard hard-on, of the dream is gone.

Breena’s getting out of bed, looking really puzzled. In all the years she’s been married, she’s never been pulled out of bed by an early call on her phone.

She gets herself out from between Jimmy and Tim, and to her phone by the third ring, at which point her other three bedmates are all watching, feeling wary, wondering what could possibly be going on.

She picks up, and it’s her Dad, and for a moment she’s feeling pretty scared, but then he starts talking, and it’s sad, but it’s not a hammer’s blow. He keeps talking as she nods, and when he’s done, she says, “I’ve got it Dad. I’ll drive her down and take care of it. Tell Mom to pack up, and that I’ve got Aunt Nancy. I’m at our place on the Potomac, so it’ll be about two hours before I get to you, but I’ll be there. Jimmy’s got the girls, and Abby and Tim can help out if he needs a hand.”

They see her nod again, and another moment of quiet before she says, “No problem, Dad. Give Mom a hug for me, and I’ll be there soon.” She hangs up the phone and sees her three loves looking worried. “Not as bad as it could be. My mom’s best friend died last night. We’re going down to Georgia for a few days to take care of her. Make sure she has a proper send off.”
And Breena’s right, that’s not nearly as bad as it could be, but… “We’ll miss you,” Abby says it first.

Tim’s nodding, and Jimmy’s up to give her a hug. “Just a few days?” He’s a bit edgy at the idea of his six months pregnant wife away for too long.

“Funerals are weekday affairs, so… Down today. Get ready tomorrow. Viewing on Monday, Tuesday at the latest. Our family has a friend down there who runs his own funeral home, he’ll let us use his place. Mom’s…” She shakes her head, trying not to see her own future in this. “They’ve been best friends, talked to each other every day, for… got to be forty years now. Mom’s wrecked.”

“Heart attack. Mom was telling me yesterday how Aunt Nance wasn’t taking care of herself right. She’d been feeling off for a while now, and that she’d been nagging her to go see her doctor.”

“You want one of us to go with you?” Jimmy asks.

Breena gives him that look, the one that says loud and clear that she knows why he’s concerned and that she’s fine.

“I know. Still, it’s a long drive with a tiny little bladder.”

Jimmy’s next to her, and she gently strokes his face. “I’m okay. Donnie’s going to be okay, too. You guys enjoy the kids, have a good weekend, and… make me some videos for after-hours viewing, okay? Get my mind off of how sad this for an hour or so a night?”

Tim and Abby perk up on that. “We can do that!” Abby says. “You go get your shower, and I’ll get….” Abby’s looking at what they keep here. “Okay, I won’t get you packed up because all of your work clothing is at home.” They hear Sean’s cry. “We’ll get the kids up and ready for the day, and have some breakfast waiting for you.”

“That I could use.” Breena kisses Abby, and the four of them break apart to start the day.

As he gets his morning shower, Tim decides to not take care of his dick. Yes, it’s looking up at him, begging for some attention, but, if they’re going to be filming for Breena, he might as well see about offering up something worth watching.

He doesn’t have too long to think about that, anyway. Kids are up, and Molly and Kelly are both in the bathroom, making it extremely clear that it’s way beyond time for him to get out of the shower, grab Uncle Pop, Mona, and Jackson, and take them on their weekly adventure in the Museum of Food!

As he’s brushing his teeth, trying to keep little girls quiet, he sees Jimmy in their bed, grabbing some extra sack time.

And, as much as he loves their kids, there are times where this whole family thing is vastly overrated, and what he’d really like to do is live in a bubble with just the four of them.

A bubble where they all get to sleep as late as they like and fuck as much as they can, and maybe go out to eat in restaurants that don’t have menus that can be colored on.
“A man can dream,” he mutters, picking up Kelly, letting her sit on their sink, and then asks, “What do you think, should Daddy shave?”

(He already knows what the answer will be.) “NO! Adventures!”

“All right, just let me get some pants and a shirt on, okay!”

“NOW!”

“If I go out now, they’ll arrest me.”

That flies right over Kelly’s head and Molly’s just staring at him. “Go find Uncle Pop and have him get your shoes on, okay?” He puts Kelly back on the floor. And with a job to do, that gets them closer to out of the house, the girls go.

Quiet rainy summer Saturday, made doubly quiet by the low energy time between afternoon nap and dinner.

Tim’s lying on the floor in front of the fireplace, next to Molly and Kelly, and the three of them are “coloring.”

Molly is starting to draw things. Blobby, impossible to interpret without help things, but things nonetheless. Kelly is just applying color to paper. Primarily his job is to keep them calm and prevent Kelly from eating the crayons.

So, on Kelly’s page, there are scribbles of blue and green and red. On Molly’s there’s… Tim’s betting they’re supposed to be people, but he’s thinking they look more like jellyfish, and on his paper is a collection of circles, with lines coming out of them, and words inside of them.

Abbi sits down on the floor next to him, grabbing her own piece of paper, and a few crayons, and then asks, “Lawful Good? You starting up one of those games?”

Tim shakes his head. “It’s just how I think of it, right now. This is, assuming I get to stop dealing with stupid stuff, what my department is going to look like.” He taps the circle at the top of the page. “That’s me.”

Abbi looks closer. “Hence, me in the middle of that circle.”

“Yeah, I know, I’m amazing at naming things.” He taps the three circles below his name, each one with a line drawing up to his circle. “Lawful Good. These are my Boy scouts. The guys who follow all the rules, dot all the is, cross all the ts. They get called in for straightforward investigations, and likely the formal arrest part.”

“Easy enough. Someone calls in saying a department head is taking bribes, in they go.”

“Exactly.”

“What’s Lawful Neutral?” She points to circle number two.

“These are my guys who work the data. They don’t have to be white knights, they just have to be good at the job. So, they’re the ones who do the analytics and look for places with too many or too few complaints. They’re my legal team, who go looking for how to break the new laws. They’re the ones who will program the software and build the infrastructure I need so team Lawful Good or Lawful Evil can get called into play as needed.”

“And Lawful Evil?” She taps the last circle.

“My snakes in the grass. My undercover guys. These are the guys I’m hiring to tempt other people into breaking the law, or to break it themselves and see what their supervisors do about it.”

“So, neutral handles all the tech stuff?”

“I’ll probably break pure tech, the guys building the tools I’ll need to do the job, off of LN, but yeah, that’s the current idea. I’m going to need someone to program software, and someone to work the data, and that’s likely not the same job.” Tim crosses out a few of the circles that led off of Lawful Neutral, and adds them to another circle directly off of his name.

“So, if I do this right, I should have four to six guys who report directly to me, and they’ll each have their own subspecialty.”

“Who are five and six?”

“Not sure about six, but five,” he draws another circle that comes off of his name, and writes PR in the middle of it. “They say sunshine is the best disinfectant, so here’s my human version of the sun.”

“Someone to do daily press updates?”

“Or the like.” Tim writes a name and Abbi looks at it with her eyebrows scrunched together.

“Jill Stein?”

“Not her personally, but that’s my image of what this person looks like. Attractive, polished, female, gray hair, somewhere north of fifty, but still looks vital. I want this person to radiate wholesomeness.”

“And Jill Stein makes you think of that?”

Tim shrugs. “Penny and Sarah like her. I don’t know much about her, other than she looks like the kind of person I want for that role.”

“Fair enough. I suppose for a spokesperson, image really is everything?” Abbi knows that since she’s been “the face” of CGIS she’s gotten some suggestions about how that face is supposed to look. And, in what she considers a moment of great restraint, she did not tell said suggesters to fuck off and die.

“I guess. Probably a good idea to make sure she’s got the clean background to go with the looks, but… Yeah. It’s a face job, so I want her to look the part.”

“And you don’t?”

“Even if I did, I don’t want that job.”

Abbi smirks. She doesn’t want that job, either, but right now, for the Coast Guard Investigative Service, she’s got it.

“I am going to want to hear how things go with the assistant.”
“I can’t imagine I won’t talk about it.”

She nods. “I think that’s why I didn’t want to let go of Ziva. She was doing… not things like my email, but taking over a lot of the bits of the job for me.”

Ziva’s upstairs, getting a nap with Dave right now, so Tim’s not too worried about talking about her. “I know I’m going to need a few Zivas, too. Janes of All Trades, able to do a bit of everything. There are going to be problems I can’t even imagine now, and I’ll need people to throw at them.”

Abbi’s drawing a ship. It’s a good likeness to Semper. “That’s why teams are easier. You might not be able to imagine the problems, but you know who you’ve got and who you can toss at whatever it is. I’ve got six hundred people under me right now, and… maybe I know fifty of them.”

“And you’ve got to trust that they know who to throw at the problem?”

“Yeah. That’s a… unsettling feeling.”

Tim nods along with that. “I have a feeling I’m going to know that all too well too soon.”

Sometimes the stars align all perfectly, and a drippy rainy day leads into a quiet dinner, where little people all actually eat, and then a fairly easy bedtime. Easy bedtime leads into grownups spending a few hours playing Trivial Pursuits (Team Medical Examiner won, to the shock of absolutely no one.) while munching on popcorn and fresh fruit.

Eventually, Sean, who’s on a somewhat different schedule than his sisters, wakes up for his last evening feed, breaking the game when the McPalmer contingent decides that’s bedtime for them.

And eventually, it is bedtime.

Abby’s heading back to their room from putting Sean down, finding both of her guys already in bed and naked, waiting for her.

“What are we filming for our girl?” Abby asks as she hops onto their bed.

Jimmy snuggles in behind her and pats her ass. “I know what I’ve been looking forward to for a while.” He kisses up her throat and gives her butt a gentle squeeze. “Want to sink into this, nice and slow.”

“Mmmm…” A happy smile lights her face and she wriggles her bum against him in an encouraging manner. “So, how about it, Tim? Oral, both of you guys at once, what do you want?”

Tim’s somewhat nervous asking for what he wants. ‘Cause… it doesn’t exactly go hand in hand with what Jimmy wants… Well, sort of. Ish.

Jimmy would get what he wants out it… Kind of. It can’t feel that different, right?

Okay, yes, his own ass isn’t nearly as plush as Abby’s, or as smooth, but… Okay, he’s making excuses now.

Granted, making excuses makes sense, because, he’s not entirely sure he wants what he wants. He was dreaming of Breena and Abby doing it, and woke up hard with the idea and feel of it, and that got the idea in his head, and yeah, every time they’ve done that, he’s loved it, and he’s got no reason to think it’d be that much different with Jimmy, but…

“He’s blushing,” Jimmy says, pulling Tim out of his thoughts. “How kinky is this?”

“It’s…” Tim feels the blush intensify.

“I’m not calling you Gibbs or letting you slap the back of my head,” Jimmy says with a huge grin.

Tim does whack the back of his head for that, gently.

“I didn’t know you still could blush,” Abby says, looking very intrigued. “At least, not about sex.
I’m going to really like this, aren’t I?”

Tim nods. “You will… Breena will, too. We film this and her phone and panties will melt when she sees it.” He looks at Jimmy. “Probably…” And he starts to feel a little squirmy asking for it, because… It’s… it. The line. Decades of sex with lots of other people have passed, changed how he thinks about and understands sex, but there’s still young Tim, deep inside him, and he feels like he’s on the edge of it. Real sex. Everything else is a warm up.

He may not agree with that, when his rational mind is doing the thinking, but judging from the blush, his guts still feel that this is a serious line to cross.

Tim inhales, exhales, swallows, bites his lip, and then says, “You want anal, I want to be in the middle tonight… Two guys and a girl. That’s got a fairly obvious answer. Just, not sure if you’re game, or, really, if I am.”

Jimmy’s eyes slip over Tim’s naked body. He spends a moment pondering as he gently strokes Abby’s hip. He’d been really looking forward to anal with her. It’s been a while since they’ve done it, and it feels amazing. Add Tim to the mix (he was hoping Tim would go for vanilla sex, because that feels even better, all sorts of moving and stroking) and he really liked that idea.

He also thinks it’s important that Tim’s actually comfortable enough with the idea of the four of them together to ask for this, and he doesn’t want to squash that flat the first time he manages to get up the nerve to ask. Plus, Jimmy assumes that it can’t be that different with Tim, at least, not on a physical sensation level. And Breena and Abby always look like they have a blast when they do him, and they aren’t even properly equipped to really enjoy it, so…

“You want me to fuck you?” Might as well make sure he fully understands what Tim’s asking for here.

Tim remembers how it feels. Full and tight and wet and slippery and everything he loves about sex wrapped around him from all sides, that gets his heart rate up, and his dick is starting in that direction, too. He can feel the flush across his face, and down his neck. He’s blushing to his collarbone, but god the feel of it. “Yeah,” slips out of him. Abby squeaks with excitement when he says that.
“Unless you don’t want to do it.”

Jimmy looks from Tim, who’s starting to really look into this, to Abby. “It’s not quite the same technique, right?” After all, he doesn’t want to be bad at it.

She nods. “More of an up-down motion with girls and a back-forth with guys. Fuck like you’re trying to hit a g-spot, and you’ll get it.”

Then he looks to Tim. “Might take a bit to figure out how to do much for you. And…” Speaking of still able to blush, apparently Jimmy can. “I mean… God, I feel stupid saying this, but… you’ve talked about being sore… I’m bigger than the dildo the girls use on you.”

That is true. Tim looks down. Jimmy’s still soft, so right now, he’s not bigger or longer than the dildo, but by the time he’s ready for action he will be, and not by just a little bit, either. It’s also true that the stretch bit isn’t exactly Tim’s favorite part of this, but… He’s starting to get the image of it and the feel in his head, Jimmy behind him, rocking back and forth, and he’d be warm, not cold, and firm, but with some give and… Abby with her leg hooked over both of them and slipping over him on the other side. Full, and slide, and wet grip, and that feeling of cumming with each stroke as Abby glides over him. Tim’s breath is coming even faster. Yeah, he wants that. “I know what I’m asking for, and I know you haven’t done it with a guy, but there’s no shot in hell of me lasting an hour in the middle, which is where sore tends to come into play, five minutes’ll be a stretch, and… well… you aren’t bigger than the first dildo Abby used on me.”

Abby doesn’t nod. As well as she can remember, Jimmy actually is about the same size as the dildo she used with Tim that first time. She does smile though, because they know how to prep for this now, which they didn’t then, not really, which is why that dildo felt so huge. Besides, Tim’s bigger than she is, and she can take Jimmy just fine. She knows for a fact that Jimmy feels excellent, and that Tim’s going to enjoy the hell out of him. So she says, “And, he’s bigger than I am, and we all know you fit in me just fine. You’re not going to break him. We just need to make sure to take our time, and go slow and gentle on the prep.”

Jimmy looks over to Tim. “You sure?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. But… I mean, you can back out if you want to. I’m not going to mope or pout or anything. It’s okay if you don’t want to. Abby in the middle, and I’ll be perfectly happy with that, too.” He smiles as he says it, and kisses Abby, because, yes, there is something he wants tonight, but if he doesn’t get it, it’s not a big deal. The three of them playing in their normal comfort zones will keep him awfully happy, too.

Jimmy gives him a little shove. “Same for you. Go hit the head.”

Tim prefers sex with all four of them. Even if it's just the as two couples in the same bed, having all four around feels, at least emotionally, better.

That said, especially if they’re all together, three is easier. Within a few seconds, Tim and Jimmy have slipped into one “team” focusing on Abby, which tends to hit everyone’s buttons nicely.

And, on a more practical level, Tim knows being in the middle feels so good, he’s pretty much useless there. He’s mostly just going to lay there and purr while they fuck him. Which works great, for Jimmy. He will have absolutely no problem, at all, getting off in that situation.

Abby requires a bit more work than him just being there, though.

Granted, with how pleased she seems to be with this idea, and both Tim and Jimmy know that gleam in her eyes, today may be the sort of day where she won’t need all that much more than him being there.

But whether she needs it or not, they’re giving it to her, double time.

Tim would absolutely tell you, that if he is going to be in the middle, and prep for that is going to be slow and gentle, that 69ing with his wife, both of them on their sides, his head pillowed on her thigh, while she slips bigger and bigger dilators into him, and his husband fucks her from behind, is his absolute favorite way to do that. (Plus, the idea of Breena, who’s likely had a pretty sad day, opening this up and watching it later tonight, or maybe tomorrow morning, is doing some awfully good things for him, too.)

There’s nothing on earth that looks like Abby’s pussy wrapped wet and slick around Jimmy’s dick while he licks her to a panting, cursing orgasm. Nothing tastes better than ripe, flushed pussy on a hard cock.

And the feel of it! He keeps focusing on Jimmy’s hair and face against his leg, because otherwise, the feel of Abby’s mouth, wet and hot and suck, as she’s slowly easing the dilators in and out, carefully making sure to keep bumping his prostate as she does it, might toss him over the edge, and no matter how amazing this is, he doesn’t want to come from it.

Abby’s gently twisting the dilator. He can’t feel the twist much, lubed glass is way too slick for that, but he can feel her moving it, feel his body soft and relaxed (as much as he ever gets) around it.

She kisses his thigh. “You two ready to shift around some.”

“Oh yeah!” He’s been expertly blown within an inch of his life and got to watch the best live porn ever while going down on his wife, yes, he’s ready. “You ready to see this?” he asks in the direction of Abby’s phone. He knows she’s recording this, and then he air kisses in Breena’s direction.

He grins, wiggles his butt a little at the phone, and Abby and Jimmy laugh.

Jimmy gives him a gentle slap to the ass, and says, “Stop wiggling it for her, she’s not here. Wiggle some for me.”

“You don’t like watching me wiggle.”

Jimmy sticks out his tongue at Tim. And Tim leans forward, pulling Jimmy into a kiss, and sucking his tongue as Jimmy moans at the taste of Abby on him.

“So, how are we doing this?” Jimmy asks.

This would be where it occurs to Tim that they’ve got options. Every time they’ve done it before, they’ve been on the bed, spooning.

But, especially filming it… Spooning gives Breena a really great view of their sides, which… Tim’s more visually oriented that Breena is, so he knows when he’s watching sex, he tends to like to see sex. Not three people rubbing against each other. And maybe a view of their hips and sides and whatnot might do it for her, given that she knows what they’re doing, but…

If they can arrange themselves so she’s got a view they may as well give her one, right?

He pats the head of the bed, tossing a few pillows against the backrest. “Okay, Jimmy, you go here.”

“And just sit back?”

“That’s what I’m thinking.”
“I can do that.” And he does. Abby’s already got an idea of what’s coming, and she’s moving her phone to get the right angle. She’s got it propped on a pillow, facing where they’re going to be. She’s adjusting it and says, “So, do we call it cowgirl when you’re the one in the saddle?”

“Only if I’m wearing the kilt and eyeliner.”

Jimmy smirks at that. “Just get down here, I’m getting lonely.”

“And we wouldn’t want that,” Abby replies, grabbing the lube and adding more to Jimmy. “There, all nice and slick.”

Tim turns, so his back is to Jimmy’s chest, and gets him into place. He’s done it before with a dildo, but it feels a little odd to grab something that twitches a bit when he curls his hand around it. Then he starts the long, slow descent.

“God, you’re tight!” Jimmy hisses, starting to slide in.

“No, you’re just big.” Which is part of it. Jimmy’s wider around than Tim, and a lot wider than the dildo that Abby or Breena use. “And I haven’t done this with something this big in years.” Which is also part of it. But, the more important part, which has Tim squeezing down, is that he’s never done this with someone who can feel it, and the way Jimmy’s holding him, the tremors through his body, the clenched jaw and white knuckles, is hitting Tim hard.

It’s different. Sex doesn’t work that way for him, not usually. Someone sinking into him, slowly, thank God, slowly, because Jimmy does feel a mile wide, and taking pleasure from his body is new.

Jimmy’s panting, soft, breathy, sounds right on Tim’s ear. That feels familiar. The feeling that goes with knowing you’re making someone feel good. He knows he loves that, but usually, unless he’s tied up, making someone feel that good involves him actively doing something, beyond just trying to relax and let gravity take care of things.

Right now, he’s trying not to clench down, though doing it makes Jimmy hiss and twitch, and he knows why Abby and Breena’ll do that, why they like that, now. He wants to make Jimmy hiss, and he knows how good having a tight little ass ripple over the top inch of your dick feels.

He also knows how sore he’s going to be if he keeps doing that, and right now this’ll go a bit more smoothly if he just lets Jimmy in.

Jimmy has his hands on Tim’s hips, just holding on. The grasp is gentle, though Tim can feel the tension in his fingers. Tim twines his fingers between Jimmy’s and bears down a bit, causing the head of Jimmy’s dick to almost pop into place, and from there, he just lets himself slip all the way down.

“Shit!” hisses out of Jimmy, and Tim agrees, though not for the same reason. On Jimmy’s end, this is hot and tight and just like with Abby it’s like a fist of hot, rippling gel around him, and that feels so good. For Tim, it’s a stretch, almost too much; Jimmy’s at least an inch and a half more around than the dildo they use for this, and even with the prep time, Tim can really feel the difference. He’s not in pain, too much prep for that, but his body definitely knows it’s not doing its normal routine. A moment of still works for both of them for very different reasons.

But, eventually the sensation of stretch lessens, and Tim relaxes back against Jimmy, feeling his breath hot against the nape of his neck, and hearing the low groan as he starts rock his hips a little.

Every little gasp and groan as he starts to move lights Tim up. Maybe not physically, not so much, not yet, but mentally… It’s that Sex God feeling. Like having his face buried in one of the girls’ pussy, making them gasp and sing and cream. That sets an image in his head. On his knees, Jimmy nailing him, mouth between Abby’s legs as Breena sucks him off. He whimpers at that and decides they are doing that as soon as they can.

Tim wriggles a bit, and that gets another grunt out of Jimmy.

“You all set?” Abby asks them.

“Oh yeah,” slips out of Jimmy, sounding a bit dreamy.

“Good.” She leans over Tim and kisses Jimmy.

Jimmy’s making some very happy noises, and Tim’s enjoying this because he’s got her breasts hanging in his face, so he gets to nuzzle and kiss. When she pulls back she says to Tim, “How about you? All good.”

He nods. “Yeah.”

She kisses Tim. “He feel good, all hot and hard inside you?”

Tim nods. “Big. Really big.” Tim can feel Jimmy’s pleased smirk at that, along with a kiss to his shoulder.

Jimmy cants his hips, trying to do Tim some good with that big, hard, hot dick of his.

“His aim needs some work.” Tim looks behind him and grins.

Jimmy rocks his hips again, but unless he wants to plant his feet and really get his legs into it, there’s not all that much he can do on the bottom. And yes, he can, with Tim and Abby on his lap, shift them around and probably bounce the life out of both of them, but that sounds like a workout, not sex, and he’s not looking to recreate his leg day workout, he’s looking to get off.

“You’re the on top. I think you’re the one who’s aiming.”

And Tim is, so he experiments a bit with what to do. It’s not the first time he’s done this in this position. But it’s been fewer than five times, and he’s still not entirely sure how to move himself to get Jimmy’s dick where he wants it.

He tries rocking the way he would if he were using his anal plug, but Jimmy’s too long for that to work the same way, and if Tim’s facing away from him, his dick curves in the wrong direction.

“When you’re not nursing anymore, we’re going to try this with you between us,” he says to Abby, rolling his hips a bit, still not finding exactly what he’s looking for.

“Why?”

“His dick curves, and I’m in the wrong position to do much with it.”

Jimmy likes the idea of that. Yeah, Tim feels good, but the way he’s moving isn’t involving any sort of meter or rhythm, and his back and neck aren’t exactly erotic delights for Jimmy, so having a lapful of Abby or Breena, and some breasts in his face, would certainly take this up a few notches.

“Next time,” Abby knows that if she gets into the middle, one or both of them will be touching her breasts, and she doesn’t need her milk letting down right now.

But she also knows, that her g spot is about the same place Tim’s prostate is, and she’s very happily ridden Jimmy before, back to chest, and had him get her just fine.

“Pull up some, and lean back, Tim, then go shallow.”

He does, and as he’s raising up and leaning further back the head of Jimmy’s cock gets him just right. “Fuck!” eases out of his mouth, and then Jimmy rolls his hips, rubbing over him again, and that’s exactly the right spot. “Oh!”

Abby grins at both of them, kissing Tim, and then Jimmy, and Tim again, before switching around, bum to Tim, on her hands and knees, and sinking back onto him.

Tim groans again, loud.

And he is ecstatically in the middle.

Rhythm with three people is more complicated than rhythm with two. Tim supposes that he should be doing this with Jimmy for the first time with just the two of them, because he’d be having an easier time figuring out how to do this, but… if it was just the two them, they probably wouldn’t do this.

Either way, he eventually gets an alternating rhythm, because the strokes that feel best to him, shallow, kind of miss the target for Jimmy. And the ones that feel best to Jimmy, long and deep, are okay for Tim, but they don’t spark that glorious, full, cumming, getting fucked through his goddamned dick feel that shallow gives him.

Abby eventually gets what he’s doing. And once she does, she mirrors him.

So, when he goes deep with Jimmy, she stays shallow. When he’s shallow on Jimmy, she goes deep.

And Tim more or less basks in it. With the way he’s built, shallow from Jimmy means his prostate’s getting all the attention it wants, and deep from Abby, means his dick is buried in her, and both together means he’s 174 pound bag of sexual pleasure, sparking from toes to head, moaning and cursing, loud, babbling about how good this feels and how much he loves both of them.

He can feel himself cresting, and is trying to control it, because he knows that once he gets off, the ride is done for Jimmy, too. He’s way too sensitive post-climax to take any anal after, and they didn’t think this through enough to get a condom on Jimmy, so it’s not like he can just switch to Abby when Tim’s done.

“Jimmy, come!” he gasps out.

If he was able to think, being told to get off would have confused Jimmy, but in that he’s all sex right now, he just goes for it, shifting rhythm again, faster, harder, deeper, pulling Tim onto him, and Tim’s far enough along that that’s feeling awesome, too.

Doesn’t take more than a few strokes, and he feels Jimmy pull him even tighter, biting on his shoulder, pounding into him, and then going deep and pulsing, and that…

He loves the way it feels when the girls get off, that tight, rippling clench, and feeling it from the other side, the twitch and pulse and Jimmy’s dick actually getting bigger and thicker and harder before he slams in one last time…
So close, just a little… Abby takes him deep, moaning. He can feel her hand moving fast on her clit, and… she starts to ripple and he’s gone.

Pleasure sparking, twitching, his whole body tensing and relaxing and glowing with it.

---

He doesn’t want to move at all. Tim would very happily spend the next ten hours in bed doing nothing.

Abby has a different idea on that. “Get up.”

Tim raises a sleepy eyebrow at her. He knows that when he’s on the doing side of anal (like Jimmy, who’s in their bathroom right now) that he’s got to do some extra cleanup, but… Other than being a bit sweaty and slippery, he doesn’t think he’s got anything that’ll need more than ten seconds with a Kleenex to take care of.

She nudges him again, and he finally gets why she’s poking him. Dildos don’t cum. Jimmy does.

He nods. “Oh.”

“Yeah. Bear down, and then use baby wipes. You might be a bit drippy tonight, so you might want to tuck a tissue between your cheeks.”

Tim pulls himself up, and notices he is wetter than he’d normally be. He’s not sure how much he likes that, but… The girls do some variation on this every single time they have sex, so he’s not feeling like he can complain.

He kisses Jimmy as he heads out of the bathroom. Just a quick peck, and then hears Abby saying to the recorder. “Okay, Breena, hope that keeps you all warm and happy tonight!”

Jimmy’s voice adds, ‘Love you, Baby, see you day after tomorrow!’

---

Sunday morning. Since Breena and Jeannie are in Georgia, there’s no Slater family supper today. So they decide to skip church, stay home, have breakfast with the rest of the family, and, come naptime, head back to Jimmy and Breena’s.

Sundays are always a bit bittersweet. Each weekend, they get basically a day and a half stolen from the rest of the week, time where they can be with their loves.

But Sunday is the day the real world calls them back. Ducky and Penny always have to leave right after breakfast. If traffic behaves, and it often doesn’t, the trek back to New York takes seven hours. But they’ve had that run take fourteen in the past.

Usually, on Sunday, the McPalmers stick around just a few minutes past Ducky and Penny, and then load up the kids for church with Breena’s parents and Slater family supper.

Some weeks Gibbs and Abbi come with them.

Some they stay at the house, with Tony and Ziva, who generally don’t make the return trip to DC.
until Monday morning. After all, Tony’s got to drive them past their apartment to get from the house to the Navy Yard, so for them it’s just easier to stay.

“What are you doing with all the spare time?” Tony asks as he’s laying lox on his bagel. (Sunday morning breakfast: bagels, lox, cream cheese, capers, and mounds of scrambled eggs next to them.)

Tim shrugs. He’s not got any plans, not really. “Write some, maybe, when the kids are down.”

“I’ve got a stack of journals I need to read,” Abby says. “So, come naptime, I’ve got a date with a forensics magazine.”

Jimmy looks up from his eggs. “I was going to hit the range. Been a while since I’ve been, and this one’ll jump on me if I get rusty,” he nods towards Gibbs. “You want to come?”

Gibbs shakes his head. Abbi’s actually home today, and he’s spending it with her. He strokes the back of his index finger along her wrist. “Got better things to do than watch you shoot.”

That gets a little chuckling.

“And what would that be?” Abbi asks.

“You, me, bottle of suntan lotion, and the bay.”

She grins. “Much better.”

Tim’s thinking as he’s chewing his own lox and bagel. “I let Ngyn have Mr. Smiley. Maybe instead of time with my keyboard, I’ll go with you.”

Jimmy nods at that, company sounds fine to him.

There’s something Tim hasn’t done in forever. Well, since the fall. It didn’t occur to him when he was packing up his office, and let Ngyn have Mr. Smiley, but in that he’s got to get a new one, for himself, it’s hitting him, hard, that he has not fired a gun since he dropped his rifle off the roof of the NCIS building.

He and Jimmy are at the range, loading up.

It’s his gun, so it doesn’t feel odd in his hand, but… It’s like his hand doesn’t want it any more.

He’s remembering Jimmy talking about not wanting to handle a gun after he’d been kidnapped and needed to shoot that guy. (Of course, the fact that Jimmy is standing slightly behind him might have something to do with why he’s thinking about that, too.)

So, he’s standing at the range, feeling… Like this is new. But not. His hands know the drill. They’ve done this hundreds of times.

But it still feels different.

He doesn’t feel fear, or nerves, but… He shakes his head. He can’t name it. It’s not revulsion, but it’s in that neighborhood.
He’s almost tempted to just pack it up, and head home, but, again he shakes his head. Like he told Jimmy, “Two more minutes and we would have never been more than friendly co-workers. You need to be able to rescue yourself.”

And Tim does. And that means not feeling, whatever this is, about using a gun.

He scrolls his target out. Black outline of a torso and head on white. He slips on his ear protection, and flips the safety goggles over his eyes, and fires.

And with that tiny explosion a lot of sitting on top of the roof at NCIS comes running back. What hits first is hunger, his stomach screaming at him, begging for food. Then literal screaming slams into him. The people on the street were screaming, and he may have been, too. The smell crashes into him, next. Appalling body order, mildew, and foot rot, all of it creeping through burnt smells. His rifle, hot, cordite smoke. DC, old, cold, wet char. Gasoline fire, acrid and chemical.

And above and through that, the gray, blank, watching-it-happen-to-someone-else disassociation of it pours through him.

Tim swallows hard, forcing himself out of that. He’s in the shooting range. Other people are firing, which is likely adding to memories. It’s been nine months. He doesn’t even think about being trapped in the Navy Yard all that often. Maybe once every few weeks now.

He reels in the target. Now, as then, he’s been able to do what he needs to do. No there isn’t a smiley face, but there is a bullet strike, dead center in the head.

Tim takes it down, deciding that that’s good enough for right now.

He doesn’t realize Jimmy’s hand is on his shoulder, or that he’s holding it, until he reaches to take the target off the reel.

Staring at the one, lone hole through the center of the target’s head, Tim realizes he’s never going to be able to make a joke like Mr. Smiley, again. It doesn’t matter if he wants to project the image of “I can kill you and laugh about it,” because he won’t, can’t do that anymore.

He knows what he’s capable of doing now. How far he’ll go to keep himself and his people safe. And that’s not funny.

“Want to tell me where you were right after you fired?” Jimmy asks as they’re walking out.

Tim only fired the one shot. Jimmy did his usual monthly or so practice rounds. He’s fairly certain at this point he’s never going to be able to make a joke like Mr. Smiley, again. It doesn’t matter if he wants to project the image of “I can kill you and laugh about it,” because he won’t, can’t do that anymore.

He knows what he’s capable of doing now. How far he’ll go to keep himself and his people safe.

That said… “You want to talk about it?”
Tim shakes his head. And from the set of his face, and the way he’s gazing at the car, Jimmy’s sure that he really doesn’t. That is not Tim’s, pry it out of me look.

So, Jimmy changes the topic. “Being in the middle is your favorite, right?”

Tim looks relieved to have something else to think about, and wiggles his hand. “Favorite when we’re not looking to spend a whole afternoon or night going at it. Getting spun out for an hour or more is my real favorite, that’s…” Tim’s got a huge grin on his face. Maybe it’s a little forced, but only a little. “Nothing else is like that. But, if we don’t have a few hours to play, then, yeah, being in the middle is my favorite. Why?”

“You sore at all?”

“No.” He gives Jimmy a gentle shove. Then opens the car door while Jimmy circles around. Once they’re in he says, “You’re not that big and we didn’t go that long.”

“Felt like you might have been in pain at first.”

“Okay, yeah, first little bit, yeah, that was tight. No worse than holding a pose a bit too deep though.”

“Did it feel different?” Jimmy buckles his seatbelt.

“Different than what?”

“When the girls do it.”

Tim’s nodding as he slips the key into the ignition. “Yeah. Even if you hadn’t been hugging me I would have known it was you, and not one of the girls with the strap-on. You’re… I get why they like it. It’s… The strap on is mostly just for me, you know? Abby gets off on it in her head, and Breena does, too, but fucking me doesn’t do anything for them physically, and it does for you, so that was different and… good… in a way I wasn’t expecting, and… Might just be the dildo we use, but, once I got used to the size, you feel better than it does.”

Explain more is on Jimmy’s face as Tim pulls the car out of their parking space.

“You’re warm, firm but with some give, not room temperature plastic. I can feel you liking what we’re doing. Feel you get off from it.”

“Better with me or one of the girls?”

Tim winces, because he’s not sure how to answer that. He keeps thinking. “Eh… I like your dick and their boobs.” That makes him think for a moment. “Those futa guys might be onto something. Because, at this point, if Breena and Abby came equipped with all the options, I’d really go for it. You thinking about trying it?”

“Yeah. Little wary, Breena really didn’t like it, and, okay tongue’s great, but she likes that, too, and… one finger is good, too, but…”

“Try it. You don’t like it, we stop. We all know what we’re doing these days, so if it hurts or just feels weird, mentally or physically, and that’s that, we stop.”

Jimmy nods. “Kind of want to do it with Breena.”

Tim nods, too, and smiles. “She’s good at it. Got this little grind thing that’s a treat.”
“That she can’t do until she’s done being pregnant.”

Tim thinks about that. “I figured out how to have sex when I had a hell of a lot more stomach than I do now.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not six months pregnant sort of stomach.”

Tim blows that off. “Guys with beer guts somehow manage to have sex. Abby’s done me, and done me good five months pregnant, Breena’s not that much further along. You tell her you want to try, and I’m sure she’ll become really motivated to find a solution for this.”

They’re about fifteen minutes from Jimmy’s, having picked up some dinner on the way home, when Tim and Jimmy’s phone chirps at the same time. Then they chirp again. Since Tim’s driving, Jimmy checks.

He’s grinning: a wide, happy, dirty look on his face.

“She saw the video. Sent us a recording of her watching it. Apparently we’ve got some good stuff for tonight.”

Tim smiles at that.

Jimmy’s fingers are flying over his phone.

“How’s the rest of it going?”

“I’m finding out.”

A moment later he says, “Sad. Long. No one got to say goodbye, and everyone’s walking around half-stunned, half-sobbing.”

Tim nods. “Tell her we’ll keep sending stuff to make her feel better.”

“What are you thinking of for tonight?” Jimmy asks.

“Sex-wise, don’t know yet. But tubby time pictures. You, me, the kids, naked bath time. She’ll like that.”

Jimmy smirks. “How about we get at least some footage where we’re both dressed. That way she can show babies getting tubbies to Jeannie, too, help perk her up some, as well.”

“Good point. She’ll probably find the two of us in charge of it funny, too.”

“Especially if we screw up a bit.”

Tim smirks at that, too. “I imagine the girls will do a good enough job of keeping us on our toes without either of us trying to be funny.”

Jimmy chuckles a bit at that.
As they’re heading home, and Jimmy’s thinking about what to send Breena, his mind keeps wandering off of possible sex tonight, to possible, future sex, with her.

In the months coming up to getting married… Actually from about forty seconds after she told him she was a virgin to waking up, finally feeling like a person again and remembering that at some point his wife would get home and they’d actually, finally, really, get to have sex, Jimmy had devoted a lot of thought to how to go about having sex with a virgin. (Both on the fantasy, wank fodder level, and on a mechanical, how do I do this well, sort of way.)

Wank fodder aside, the how to do it well aspect mattered more for actual sex with Breena. He’d done it once before, when he too was a virgin, and it’s a sweet memory. But… happy fumbling around, and then finally getting the condom on (he didn’t practice that part ahead of time, and it kind of got stuck under the head of his dick, so it took a bit to get it into place right, and it was a good thing he was with a girl he liked enough, and liked him enough to laugh it off with) followed by a lot of, “Good?” “Yeah?” “Here?” “There?” “Uh?” “OH!”, was not precisely what he was looking to do with Breena.

He was supposed to be the one who knew what he was doing. And he did. At least, as well as anyone can transfer experience with a bunch of other people to a different person.

But, even having a decent amount of experience in his brain, it wasn’t experience with Breena.

And the only thing he knew for sure was that unlike his first time ever, he wasn’t going to try it on top.

But that plan didn’t actually make it through to reality. He’d been between her legs, happily licking away, finally getting her on his tongue, fingers inside of her, dick so hard it was ready to explode, and he could feel how close she was to getting off, feel her body tight on his, legs around his shoulders, fingers clenched in the bedsheets, and he just knew.

He shifted up, fast, and slipped into her, giving her a good grind with his pubic bone, and got her off on the first thrust. He didn’t last all that long after, but he didn’t need to. They spent… felt like forever, lying together and kissing and petting after, and eventually he got hard again, and they did it long and slow… and he rolled onto his back, and she got on top of him and they spent a long time playing with what felt good, learning what she liked, showing her what he liked.

And he still can’t think about it without a huge grin spreading all over his face.

But there’s an image… It’s a lot clearer than sinking into her body for the first time, that’s… He doesn’t have an image for that, probably meant his eyes were closed, or the feel of it wiped the image right out of his mind.

But there is an image of her straddling him, and she’s the only thing in his world in focus, and it’s the look on her face as she’s slipping down his body. She was looking him in the eye, and biting her bottom lip a little, her hands twined with his, breathing a little fast, and so much love and wonder and new.

And he never got to give her that. It was new, with her, but not new in the sense of never done it before and…

And this would be new. He’s never done it, and… he could give that back to her.

Jimmy smiles, thinking she’d like it. And if she wants to wait until Donnie’s on the outside, he can do that.
“Speaking of not being here,” Tim says as they spend two full minutes in the car, with the engine stopped, in the driveway, with Jimmy just looking out at nothing, a dreamy expression on his face.

He jerks a bit at Tim’s voice and says, “Just… Thinking of Breena getting home.”

Tim smiles at that. “Yeah. Tuesday, right?”

“If everything goes well. Funeral Monday, drive home Tuesday.”

Tim’s seen video of dads leaning over the side of the tub to give their kids a bath, but he can’t for the life of him figure out how that actually works. Especially not with multiple kids, in the tub, at once. So far, every time he’s tried this, everyone gets sopping wet, and at least one child slithers away while he’s trying to soap them up and ends up underwater, looking really shocked to be there.

The first few minutes of tubby time, where he and Jimmy are corralling the kiddos while Abby films it is not doing anything to dissuade him from his conviction that this just doesn’t work. Babies, unlike normal humans, become completely frictionless when immersed in water, and can wriggle away in under a second.

Sean’s the one, who, literally, less than a minute into this tries to go leaping from Tim’s hands into the water, and he barely keeps a hold of him.

So, they get about two minutes of Tim and Jimmy getting soaked as small people splash around, and then send that off to Breena and her mom.

What follows is normal tubby time, where Tim strips off, and gets in the tub with the little guys. With Sean in his lap, he’s got much better control of the situation, and because he takes up quite a bit of the space in there, the girls don’t have quite as much room to roam around.

A few minutes after the first video goes out, Breena gets another one, this time, just for her. This one has Tim in the tub, snagging each child, washing them off, with lots of tickles and cuddles, and then handing each one over to Jimmy, who’s got each of their favorite bath towels. (Molly has the pink unicorn, Kelly’s got the green dragon, Anna’s got a brown puppy, and Sean doesn’t have a favorite, so he’s got the blue dinosaur.)

Jimmy takes each child from him, wraps them in their favorite towel, gets them all dried off, and then Abby’s in charge of video and brushing teeth.

Molly blows a kiss to the camera and says, “Good night, Mommy! We miss you.”

Jimmy’s not in the picture, but she can hear his voice adding in, “We really do. Haven’t watched your video, yet, that’s for after tubby time. We’ll send you more good stuff in a bit.”

Kiss sounds from Abby and Tim follow that.

Breena sees the second video, labeled “Watch on your own.” She pops her earbuds in, and angles the phone so her mom can’t see it.

She watches and smiles, and tries not to cry.
Her mom’s curious about what might be on the second video, that her daughter is watching with so much emotion, but Breena shakes her head. “From Jimmy, just for me.”

Jeannie nods, then swallows, hard. Breena tucks her phone into her pocket. Now’s about the time her mom and Aunt Nance would talk every night, and she knows Jeannie’s missing her love very much right now.

She gently rubs her mom’s back. “Tell me about how you two met, back in college…” She’s heard the story before, but figures it’s a good memory for her mom.

Jeannie sniffs again. She taps the pocket with the phone in it, and says, “Don’t let any of it just go by. It’s so sweet and so swift.”

“I know.”

“You want to give him a call?”

“It’s okay. We’ll talk later, after the babies are down.”

“Okay.”

They do get to talk a bit. Sean’s having the last of his “dinners,” and they’ve got skype set up while they get ready for bed. Kind of early for a Sunday, but Tim’s got an early morning, and he’s on baby wrangling tonight. Plus they all want to see Breena’s video.

And make a response piece.

Still, Tim thinks this, and time like it, is one of his favorite pieces of the day. They’re in bed, he’s got Abby in his lap, and Sean’s in her arms, having his last nurse of the day. Jimmy’s next to them, and they’re just talking about silly things.

He’s telling them about this weekend’s adventures at the Museum of Food. Ziva and Dave came along this time. The ladies at the store are used to Tim and Gibbs, but they haven’t seen Ziva there before. They were happy to coo over Dave, and when asked who Ziva was Tim put an arm around her and said, “Little sis.”

She smirked at him, and poked his side, but didn’t correct anything about that.

Tim’s telling the story, “Then the checkout lady eyed Gibbs, looks at me, green eyes, looks at Ziva, brown eyes, and back to Gibbs, blue eyes, and said, ‘How many kids do you have?’ And he says to her, ‘Collected a bunch of ‘em over the years. Got seven of ‘em now.’ And she shook her head and says, ‘Lord love you. It’s got to be loud at your place come Christmastime.’ Gibbs laughed and said, ‘You’ve got no idea.’”

Breena smiles at that. “That’s a good story.”

“Yeah, she’s from somewhere down south, and she was just about to start blessing our hearts, too.”

Breena shakes her head. “I’m getting a lot of that down here. Aunt Nance has a huge family. Cousins and in-laws coming out the ears, and they don’t exactly get on, so I’m hearing a lot of things like, ‘It’s not his fault, sweet thing, but Rodger, bless is heart, is dumb as a stump!’”
“Why are they badmouthing Rodger?” Abby asks.

Breena sighs. “He wanted red carnations for the funeral flowers.”

Tim will happily admit to not being the branch of the family that deals with the funeral end of things, but, he doesn’t see why red carnations would be a problem.

“And…” he leads.

“It’s not like they’re evil or anything, but a lot of people think bright, showy flowers at a funeral are tacky. Most people go for white, ivory, light pink, light yellow. Flowers that blend into the background.”

Tim nods at that, and then kisses Abby’s cheek. “You’re going to want black ones, right?”

She scoffs. “I’m living forever. I’ll bury you with the black ones.”

He laughs a bit at that, and sees that they’re getting too close to something that’s too real for Breena to joke about it comfortably, so he says, “Just remember, I want a special viewing for my FBI guys, face down, with a big sign on the small of my back with an arrow that points down and says, ‘Kiss HERE!’”

That does get all of them laughing, Breena most of all.

“You’ve been on the job for three days and you’re already turning into Gibbs,” Jimmy adds.

“Just you wait, I’m already measuring out the basement for a boat.”

“You’re measuring out the basement for a bed, if that last week was anything to go by,” Abby says, stroking his cheek. “Sleepy boy.”

Sean’s slowing down on his nursing. “That one’s the sleepy boy.” He pets his son, who blinks a few times, and sucks a little faster. “Not quite done, yet.”

Abby’s patting his back. “Not yet. How’s little boy mark II doing?”

They can see Breena laying her hands on her tummy. “Likely sleepy, too. He’s pretty still right now. Kicking up a storm earlier, but right now, he’s getting a nap.” Jimmy looks like he wants to pet her tummy, feel her warm under his hand, and his boy resting. She smiles across the camera at him, and nods. “I know.” She strokes her belly for him. “I should probably let you three go. Sean looks almost done, and I know it’s playtime once he’s down.”

So, as Sean wraps up, they slowly break away, and get ready for the next bit of the night.

---

They didn’t tell Breena what was on the video they sent. Obviously, given what they were doing to Tim, she had to have some idea of what was going to happen, but she had no idea of who was going in the middle until he started wiggling around.

She decided it would be fun to take another video of her watching what they sent.

Speaking of phones melting.

They’re watching her pace herself to the video, watching it hungrily, playing with herself, speeding up and slowing down to the rhythm they set. And she’s having an awfully good time watching it. She’s giggling when Tim gets up and does his little wiggle, and then they can hear Jimmy’s comment about wiggling for him, and her eyes go wide and her mouth drops and a moment later everything goes up about six notches.

Tim, obviously, hasn’t watched their part of the video. He was busy doing it, but watching Breena react to it feels almost as good as doing it the first time. And it’s making him wonder how good it looked. If the expression on her face, the flush spreading across her body, high hard nipples, wet, spread pussy is anything to go by, it looks amazing.

The three of them watch, petting each other, eyes never leaving the screen. They don’t kiss, because they can’t kiss and watch at the same time, but… None of them is missing that right now. They don’t want to look away.

What follows is a lot less coordinated than the night before. They didn’t plan ahead of time, just went with the flow. And the flow took them from petting to kisses to more petting. Flowing from sitting next to each other to spooned onto their sides.

This time Abby’s in the middle, with both of the guys focusing on her.

She’s facing Tim today, leg over his hip, with Jimmy behind her, her, and Tim’s necks over his arm. Tim’s got his arm across Abby’s body, with his hand cupping Jimmy’s right hip.

Maybe this isn’t as visually interesting as last night, but it’s close and warm, everyone touching all over, happily wriggling together.

And Tim doesn’t know how long they went last night, but this night is slow. Long, easy strokes. Both Tim and Jimmy drawing all the way out before easing back in. They don’t have all the time in the world, but they’ve got more than enough to set Abby alight and get both of them shaking with the need to get off.

Eventually, slow and easy fades to fast and urgent. Tim can feel Jimmy’s hand tight on his shoulder, and Abby’s heel tight on his hip. He knows he’s thrusting as fast as he can, arm tense, pulling Jimmy deeper into Abby, toward him.

He’s deep enough into it that he doesn’t know who gets off first, just that he’s wrapped in skin tingling love.

---

Last job of the night. A crying six-month-old, and he’s almost exactly six-months-old now, does not sound like a newborn. Sean’s a lot louder now, and more insistent.

Tim drags himself away from their snuggle, and lumbers toward Sean. “Hey, you.”

Sean doesn’t respond until Tim picks him up. Then he quiets down.

“I’m here.” Sean gets his wipe down, fresh diaper, and onesie put back on. Then Tim lays him back in his crib, Sean never likes that part, as he goes off to wash his hands and make up Sean’s bottle. But, a moment later, when he’s back with the bottle, and has Sean on his chest, slurping away, he says, “You know, when your sister was this age, she’s gotten to the point where she could sleep from ten to six.”

Mwuf, mwuf, mwuf… Sean’s utterly unconcerned as to what Kelly may have been doing at six Granted, she’d eat at seven, and again at ten, and that’d be it for the night. Sean eats at eight, midnight, and then five. He’s also three pounds smaller than Kelly was at this stage. He’s plumping up like a champ. He’s almost three times the size he was when he was born, but that still only puts him at fifteen pounds.

“You think when you hit seventeen pounds maybe we could get a full eight hours out of you?”

Mwuf, mwuf, mwuf…

“Yeah, I know, you’ll do it when you can.”

Sean looks up at him, big dark eyes in the blue nightlight glow of the nursery.

Tim rocks him back and forth in the rocking chair Gibbs made for Anna, feeling him slurping down his bottle, as he tunelessly hums to him.

7:00 rolls around a lot sooner than Tim would like, but even with the interrupted sleep, he’s feeling ready to hit the FBI, and take on all comers.

He’s not exactly perky in the morning. (He’s rarely perky on mornings that don’t involve sex, and pretty much never perky in the morning if it was his night with the kids.) But he’s ready.
Having someone to beat the paperwork into submission means that Tim can finally start to do some actual work for his work.

Which he’s looking forward to. First off, get that meeting with Comey on the board. It feels really bizarre to him to ask Jennifer to schedule it for him, but… That’s part of the stuff she can do, so, she’ll just… do it. Apparently.

Meanwhile, he begins to prep for it.

Two hours into it, while he’s putting together his presentation to show Comey how he wants his department to work, Jennifer comes in to let him know when they’re meeting, along with handing over a few pages that still need his signature, and she looks at what he’s got up on his big screen.

“You really weren’t kidding about knowing your way around a computer.”

He smirks a bit. “You should see what I can do when we need to get into the CIA on an hour’s notice without their permission.”

Her eyes widen a bit, and then settle back to their normal state as she says, “I’m going to pretend you’re just bragging.”

Tim nods, a little smirk on his face. “It’s probably better that way.”

“Anyway, what I meant was, I’ve worked for guys who couldn’t figure out how to use the clicker to put the presentations I put together up on their big screen.”

“Oh.” Tim’s looking at what he’s got up right now, more of his circles, this time all nice and tidy. “Yeah. This. I’ve been doing this since 2004. For one of those guys who doesn’t know how to use the clicker.”

She smiles at that. “You came up from the ranks.”

“Doesn’t everyone?” Tim supposes it’s possible to start off as an Executive Vice President or whatever, but every job he’s worked has required at least some time at the bottom of the pile to move up.

“I suppose they do. But, when you work for a Federal Judge, maybe he was a prosecutor for a while, maybe a private lawyer, but by the time he’s that high up, it’s been two decades since he did any of his own work. The federal prosecutor I worked for… He’d been in his position for twenty-five years. His secretary retired a bit before he was planning on going, so I was there for his last three years. He left law school in the ‘80s finished scutwork in the ‘90s, and by the time I was working for him, hadn’t done anything involving working for someone else in a decade.”

“It’s been less than three years since I was in the field.”

“How did you jump that far that fast?”

Tim shakes his head. “Google me if you want to. I’m not a big fan of talking myself up. Not like that.”

She nods. “Looks like you’re getting that done.” It didn’t take him a ton of time to make up the graphics he needed. After all, compared to full victim/perp dossiers, a collection of circles with lines on them is child’s play.

“I am. Next up, looking for talent.”

“What do you need for that?”

“To start with, the employment records of everyone currently on anti-corruption at the FBI.”

“I’ll get them.”

“Oh, God, they’re on paper!” Tim half-whimpers, half-shrieks when Jennifer begins to wheel in cart stacked high with boxes of personnel files his office a few hours later.

She gives him a very long look, slowly pushing the cart deeper into his office, and says, “You’ve just got to read them.”

He immediately hops up and begins to push the boxes in, and then groans when he sees four more carts in her office.

Seven hundred employment files. Twenty-three boxes, of paper.

He’s staring at her, saying, “Why?”

“Believe it or not, this isn’t nearly as stupid of a reason as you’d expect. Security. The employee service files are unhackable and require you to be able to get into the building, and then lug them out, if you want to steal them.”

Tim sighs again. “You’re right, that’s not nearly as stupid as I thought it would be.”

She nods. “And let me guess, you now want to fire our information technology security guy?”

Tim half smiles. “It’s tempting.” Really tempting. The job that should have taken a thumb drive, two hours of coding, and another four hours of processing just became a… month? (Please, no) long job. “But, no. I would like to set a meeting with whomever he is so we can go over how to drag this system, kicking and screaming, into the 21st century.”

Tim’s sitting at his desk, staring at the boxes. There is no possible way he can go through all of this on his own. He’s practically dialing before he’s realized he’s got his phone out of his pocket.

“Tim?” Gibbs asks, surprised to hear from him a bit before lunch on a Monday.

“What are you doing right now?”

“Walking around the park, tossing a ball around for Mona and Jackson while Dave chews on his toes.”
“Buying Ziva enough off time to stay sane?”

“That’s the idea.”

“Shit.”

“What?”

“I don’t want to take you away from her…”

“But you’ve got something for me?” Tim can hear the light sparking in Gibbs’ eyes at the idea of real work.

“Yeah. Before I got here, the FBI had 700 people working corruption cases. Obviously, a lot of them weren’t very good at their jobs. I need to weed out the deadwood from the actively corrupt ones, from the guys who just didn’t know what was going on.”

“And you need help.”

“I do. 700 files, on paper. I’d been planning on building a database, importing their employment files, and using that to do a fast sort, but… Paper. Someone’s got to read these damn things.”

“Dave’s got lunch in about half an hour. I’ll hand him off to Ziva, and be over.”

“Thank you. Tell her that she and Dave are welcome to come and read if they want, too.”

“I’ll pass it on. You need me to bring band aids?”

Tim grits his teeth. “Yes.”

Okay, one call down. Next one up. “Fornell.”

“Yeah.”

“Is your paperwork detail punishment duty, or is someone expecting you to actually finish it at some point?”

Fornell goes quiet on the other side of the phone line. Tim can tell he’s thinking.

“Why?”

“I need eyes. And if no one cares when your paperwork gets done, then come on up here and do something interesting for a bit. By the time we’re done with this, my paperwork software should be online, and then you can just put the information into the blanks and have a computer spit out the rest of the reports you’ve got to fill out.”

“I’m on my way.”

Fornell’s main concession to being retired is that he comes into the FBI usually without a tie.
Sometimes he’ll have on jeans to go with his jacket and button down.

And of course, he no longer has a badge. They make him wear a little visitor sticker now.

But with all of that, he still looks FBI, and Jennifer sees him come in, and when he does, she just waves him on in.

Fornell looks at the boxes around Tim and groans. “Did you just call me up here to do your paperwork instead of my own?”

Tim’s at his table, where he’s got three piles: fire, investigate, keep. “I wish. She’s here to do my paperwork.” He gestures to the boxes. “That’s everyone who worked FBI corruption as of last year.” Tim glares at the boxes again. He’s already got two papercuts. “We’re going through all of them, and figuring out who we’re keeping, who we’re investigating, and who’s too incompetent to keep his job.”

Fornell’s already pulling out a chair, and dragging a box over to it. Then he heads to Tim’s coffee maker, and gets himself a cup. “You got any snacks?”

Tim shakes his head. “Order out? But I’d thank you if you didn’t. It’s a lot easier not to eat the snacks if they aren’t in front of me.”

Fornell shakes his head a bit. “You’re already too skinny.”

Tim snorts. “Yeah, but Jethro doesn’t think he is, and he’ll be here in an hour or so.”

Fornell’s shaking his head, and getting on his phone. “Investigating takes fuel, McGee, not just piles of coffee. I’ll get something healthy.”

“You’ve got a sick idea of healthy,” Tim says, half an hour, one more paper cut, and two folders later.

“It’s good for the soul,” Fornell says as the delivery guy brings in a plate of antipasti and cookies/pastries. “And brains don’t work without food. And this,” Fornell smiles, pulling the lids off the platters, “is food!”

“You’re an enabler,” Tim says, snagging a mini pistachio cannoli, and then buries himself in a folder, trying to ignore the rest of the cookies, or the really yummy, spicy, garlicky smells coming from the antipasti plate.

“I’m sorry sir, you’re not allowed to have a dog in here,” Tim hears Jennifer say.

He’s getting up to go get Gibbs, and apparently Jackson, into his office when he hears, “This is a hearing ear dog, in training.”

“That’s a puppy. The only thing it’s being trained on is not peeing on the carpet.”
Tim heads out. “We’re working on that, too.” Tim gives Gibbs a hug, and pets Jackson, who not usually getting this warm of a welcome from Tim, yips. Kneeling on the floor, picking up Jackson, and holding him out so he can get a little pet from Jennifer, Tim says, “Jennifer, this is Jackson, who is a hearing ear dog, in training. Right now he’s learning how to go everywhere and be around people and not flip out at them. When he’s a bit older, he’ll start learning how to help Deaf people.”

She glances from Jackson, who is trying to be as cute a possible, which is awfully cute, to Tim. “Cleaning pee off of the rug is not in my job description.”

“Noted.” He nods to Gibbs, putting Jackson back on the floor. “This is Jethro Gibbs, my dad. He’s always welcome in here. Even if I’m not around.”

Jennifer raises an eyebrow at that, giving Gibbs, in his cargo pants, Marines t-shirt, and NCIS cap the once over. Then she nods. “Okay.” She extends her hand, and Gibbs takes it.

Gibbs smirks at Tim. “I like this one.”

“This one can hear you just fine. I’m a person, not a chair. Don’t talk like I’m not here.”

Gibbs turns to her and full on smiles. “Yeah, you’ll do.”

She rolls her eyes, and he nods, still smiling, as he heads into Tim’s office.

On the upside, Tim doesn’t have to explain what he’s looking for in the “keep” pile.

On the downside, they’ve been at it for four hours and there are three folders in there, all of them young agents, who noticed something hinkey with what they were doing, reported it up the chain of command, and then ended up transferred to a different department.

The bigger issue is where’s the line between incompetent and part of the problem?

Tim’s pacing as he reads. First off, he’s less likely to reach out and grab another one of those ridiculously delicious, damned, cookies if he’s pacing, and second of all, having something to do to burn off his frustration is a good thing.

He snaps the folder shut, tapping it in the palm of his hand. “Martin Bleewether, you know him?”

Fornell shakes his head. He doesn’t know most of these guys. He knows of some of them, but personally, nope. The one thing he’s never worked was anti-corruption.

Tim scowls. “His fitness evals are low enough I can’t tell if he’s just too dumb to chew gum and walk at the same time, or if he was intentionally blind to what was going on.”

“What was he investigating?” Gibbs asks.

“Complaint about election fraud in New York. Certain districts just magically ‘lost’ a bunch of registrations. He went in, gave it a once over, and let it go. So, did he not see anything? Did he get paid off? Was the election he checked out actually clean? We know on the national level they were screwing things right and left, but local?” Tim groans. “I do not want to have to reinvestigate every case these guys did to see if they were doing the job.”
“How are his other cases?” Fornell asks.

“Indifferent. He’s got an okay record. An okay number of convictions. Low, but passing fitness evals.” Tim tosses the file into the ‘fire’ pile. “He’s not one of my Paladins, I know that. And I don’t have anything screaming about him in his file to put him in the investigate pile, but…”

“Gut?” Gibbs says.

Tim shrugs. “Yeah, but it’s firing all the time with these guys. A steady drumbeat of Why didn’t you bastards know any better?”

Fornell stands up and stretches. “Feeling it, too.”

Gibbs nods. “And when Ziva comes tomorrow, she’ll feel it, too.”

Fornell shovels the pile of ‘fire’ folders into one of the boxes, and drags it off to what’s becoming the ‘fire’ corner of Tim’s office. “Want me to rain on the parade some more?”

Tim’s rubbing his eyes, remembering that he’s supposed to be wearing his glasses when he’s reading, but they’re hooked into the collar of his jade button down, not on his face. “Sure, dump some more gloom onto this.”

Fornell kicks the box, gently. “You can boot ’em off your team, but I don’t think you can fire them. I haven’t seen anything in any of these files that qualifies as ‘cause.’”

Tim groans at that, too. Then his phone buzzes. “Saved by the buzz.”

Gibbs raises an eyebrow at him, while rubbing Jackson’s ears. (Jackson, having decided the floor is boring, is sitting on the table, next to Gibbs, where he can see everything. He’s being very good up there, sitting quietly, watching, and being fed the occasional bit of cheese or cold cuts, which might have something to do with him being very good.)

“Meeting with Comey. I get to do something fun, namely explain what the hell I’m going to do with all of these guys once I’ve got them.”

That gets a smile out of Gibbs, and a ‘Have fun’ from Fornell, as Tim heads upstairs.

Meeting with Comey feels good. Actual moving forward, progress, that’s making Tim smile.

“McGee,” he offers his hand to shake, and Tim winces a bit at the grasp. “Are you okay?”

Tim holds up his hand and Comey sees the four band aids.

“What happened to you?”

“Your employment files are on paper.”

That gets a bit of a chuckle. “I take it you’re working then.”

“I am working. And not just filling out forms. I’m digging my way through who I’m keeping, and who’s going.”
“And…”

“And it’s not pretty. I’ll probably want to get together with you about that at some later point. Probably with our legal department, too. But that’s not today. I don’t have it all planned out, yet, and I’m betting your time is tight.”

“It is.”

“Then let me get to what I do have prepped.” He flips the first of his screens up. “Okay, anyone who’s worked with Thom Gemcity knows I’m terrible at naming things, so, all of these will have more ‘professional’ sounding monikers by the time I’m rolling this out for real. This is just shorthand to keep you and I in the loop and on track.”

“Game master?” Comey asks, looking at the first circle, as they sit in his office, in front of his big screen, Tim holding the clicker.

“Yeah. That’s the guy who—“

“I know what one is. I’m just… amused to see this.”

“You know?” That surprises Tim quite a bit. Nothing about Comey suggest “gamer.”

“Ten and thirteen-year-old grandsons. I know.”

“Great!” That will make a lot of this easier.

“I take it you’re the Game Master?”

“That’s the idea. So, I’m the guy who makes sure everyone else can do their job.”

“And those jobs are broken into four main categories.”

Apparently, Comey can read a basic chart. It’s occurring to Tim that he may have aimed his organizational outline a few levels too low.

“I’ll start with the really obvious one: Public Relations. I’m going to make sure we’ve got someone who keeps the rest of the world aware of what we’re doing. Two reasons for this, from what my grandmother is telling me, people lost a lot of confidence in the idea that the government would do the right thing. We’re going to rebuild that as well as we can. The second part is I want a constant drumbeat of people getting caught doing whatever it is they’re doing. That way, when someone else is thinking of breaking the laws, they’ll have this in their head.”

“People are less likely to break the law when they think they’ll get caught.”

“Exactly. That’s why people loot during protests. They know the cops already have their hands full, and they’ll blend into the crowd, so they take advantage of it. I want everyone to know the blending in and using everyone else as cover days are numbered.”

“Reasonable. How many people are you thinking of for that section?”

“Maybe five, possibly ten if it’s more work than I think it is. One spokesperson, someone to keep her up to date on everything we’re doing, and a few more people to be constantly working press releases and making sure our spokesperson keeps granting interviews to anyone who’s interested.”

“That’s your easy one.”
Other than he’s not sure how to go about finding a spokeswoman, yeah, easy… “That’s my easy one. Now for the backbone of how this will work.”

Comey looks at the next circle. “Lawful Neutral?”

“My infrastructure guys. They’re going to be broken into four subgroups. Tech. Those are the guys who are going to build, and keep running, our reporting system.

“When they’re done, they’ll have a system in place that will allow anyone, anywhere to report any issue in complete anonymity. That system will know the IP address of where reports come from, and that’s it. The system will triage reports, and then send them to whomever works best with that sort of issue.”

“How will it do that?” Comey’s got his own notepad and is actually taking notes on this, which impresses Tim.

“Complicated algorithms. With help from people, too. Each time an agent gets a case, he’ll also rank how important it is. If it matches the computer’s assessment, great. If not, the computer will learn that that type of case isn’t what it thinks it is, and adjust for later cases.”

“Again, how?”

Tim licks his lips. He didn’t budget two hours of explaining code into this meeting. “I don’t want to sound insulting, but unless you’ve got a masters in computer learning hiding somewhere, I don’t think the explanation will make much sense.”

Comey’s not buying that. “You don’t have one, and you know how it works.”

“True. I do have the masters in forensic computing, and more than fifteen years of work as a computing professional.”

“Okay. Give me the ‘For Dummies’ version.”

“The really short version is: key words, time frame, severity of the crime, proximity of the IP address to wherever the issue is, if that IP address has offered us good intel before, things like that. The program will mix it all together and spit out a severity rating. Our guys will correct from there, and tell the computer why it was wrong. The computer will then adjust how it weighs things like key words, and goes from there.”

“How many people will you need to build this?”

“The right ones, twenty. A mixed bag, thirty. The wrong ones, it won’t work, so let’s not get them.”

“People we already have?” Comey asks.

“I don’t know. Maybe. Seeing how your guys do with my paperwork software will help me know. And I’ll need to get into your IT employment files and see. Maybe. Or I may be headhunting from scratch.”

“They wouldn’t be coming out of FLETC though?”

“Extremely doubtful. If they’re good enough for this, and they’re out of FLETC, I’ll have something else for them to do.” If they’re good enough for this, and they’re out of FLETC, they’re going onto his Lawful Good or Evil teams, both of them will need people who can hack their way into and out of a tight situation.
Comey nods, and then says, “Big Data?” looking at the next circle.

Tim clicks on it. There’s the Big Data circle, with a bunch of little circles off of it, each one with the name of a branch of the Federal Government in it. “These are the guys who are going to get, and then use, reports from all the other branches of the federal government. Depending on how easy of a time we have prying those reports out of different branches, we’ll have one group that just does FOIA requests. The rest of them will collect and use that data.”

“Use it how?”

“We know that no branch of the federal government is made up of saints. Each branch should, with its own Internal Affairs, be getting complaints. Sexual harassment, roughing up suspects, due process violations, cheating on overtime, just, stuff like that. We’ll take that data, and use it to find outliers. Then we investigate them.”

“Great, but… Say ICE has a huge number of complaints in New Mexico and almost none in Montana.”

Tim knows where Comey’s going with this, and he’s impressed at this level of question. “I’ll make sure the algorithms work based on number of agents and number of engagements with the public. An ICE station in New Mexico should have more complaints than one in Montana, just because there’s four times as many agents down there. But, if it doesn’t, or if Montana’s redlining, that tells us something.”

“We’re going to investigate people for not having enough complaints?” It’s not that Comey doesn’t like the idea, but as he’s sipping his coffee, he looks like he’s staring the future in the face and not sure he belongs there.

“And for having too many. Come on, we’ve both been around too long to believe that any branch has such great morale, and does so well with the public, that it’s got no complaints. We see that, and something or someone is covering up.”

“Likely true.” Comey’s looking at all the little circles off of the Big Data circle. “You’ve got FBI twice.”

Tim nods. “Intentionally. I’m sticking one group of them here, and another in Portland or Denver. They will not know the other group exists. They’ll both work the data. With any luck we’ll get a lot of overlap, but if we don’t…”

“Built in redundancy,” Comey says.

“And making sure that if someone’s covering for someone else, the other team’ll get it.”

Comey’s nodding along with that as he says, “You’ve got a full ten percent of your people here.”

“Are you thinking that’s high or low?” Tim asks.

“I don’t know.”

“Right now, I don’t, either. We’ll see how fast they can move on this. I might end up shuffling some of these people around to the Money circle.” Which Tim clicks to.

“That one is pretty self-explanatory.” It looks a lot like Big Data, the same main circle with a bunch of little circles, one for each branch of the Feds off of it.
“Yep. That’s my crew that’ll be following the dollars. Again, depending on how easily we pry the data out of other agencies, I’ll have a collection of guys just FOIA-ing it. They’ll be doing pretty much the same thing the Big Data guys are, just following different numbers.”

“And your last Lawful Neutral circle?”

Tim clicks on it. “Law. I’m going to have twenty lawyers and all they’re going to do is read the laws, pick them apart, and tell me what to look for. Someone puts a paragraph in the middle of a three hundred thousand word bill, making his apartment a sovereign territory, they’ll find it.”

“There’s a reason you write fiction, isn’t there?” Comey looks really amused by the idea that such a thing could happen.

“Yeah, there is, but that case is real, and if you don’t know about it, you don’t need to.”

“Oh.” Amused drops, fast.

“We got burned, bad, on that, so it’s not happening on my watch.”

“Ah… So, that’s about 450 of your two thousand people.”

“Let’s call it five hundred, they’re going to have support staff, and it’s likely I’m underestimating how difficult some of this will be.”

“All right. You’ve got fifteen hundred left for Lawful Good and Lawful Evil. Are you going to split them up evenly?”

Tim shakes his head. “No. About six hundred of them will be Team Lawful Good. These are the guys who are going to go and investigate straightforward crimes. Someone blows the whistle on a bribery scheme, and in my Untouchables go.”

“They’ll work the crimes you get from the tip line.”

“Pretty much. They’ll also do the final step of Team Lawful Evil’s job, sweeping in for the final arrests. The Untouchables are going to get a lot of the credit. Part of their job will be looking good, going in, clean cut, pillars of law, and taking down the bad guys.”

“Why are they arresting Team Lawful Evil’s catches?”

“Because Team Lawful Evil are my undercover guys, and I want them to stay that way. I’ll have about nine hundred of them, and their job will be to go after whatever my Data, Money, or Law circles come up with. They’re going to offer bribes, they’ll go in to get sexually harassed, or do the harassing—“

Comey looks appalled at that.

Tim holds up a hand. “They’ll work in pairs or teams. If we’re getting complaints indicating the higher ups look the other way, we’ll send in someone to do the harassing and get harassed. And then team Untouchable will jump on Mr. Looking The Other Way when the reports don’t get filed or he winks and nods at the harasser.

“If we’ve got reports of an individual doing the harassing, we’ll send people in who fit what he/she likes to harass. So many people work with the idea of, it’s only a few years, this isn’t worth busting my career for, so they don’t report thing. We’re going to send people in to report things.”
“You’ve got a lot of attention on sexual harassment.” There’s almost a question there, but not quite.

“I feel like it’s the canary in the coal mine. The guy who thinks it’s okay for his underlings to be pinching asses and telling his assistant she’s got to sleep with him to keep her job is likely a bad boss on a ton of other levels. This is one we can get rid of him on, though.”

Comey nods at that.

“Team Lawful Evil will have hackers, conmen, snake oil-salesmen, you name the version of sleaze, we’ll have someone who can at least pretend to be it. And I’ll have all of them heading in and offering officials too good to be true deals, and then, if they say yes, Team PR will be shouting their names and playing the audio to the heavens.”

“Ouch.”

Tim flashes Comey a very satisfied looking smile, as he imagines Senior, or someone very similar to him, offering a Congressman a ‘deal’ and then busting said Congressman.

“Any ideas who’s going on which team?” Comey asks.

“I’ve got twenty-three boxes of employment records in my office right now. I’ve been headhunting team Lawful Good since before I started here. I’ve got a few ideas of who will be in charge of that branch, and they’ll arrange the Untouchables into teams. Team Lawful Evil… Again, I have some ideas. I’m not sure who runs it yet, but I at least know one Team leader if I can get her, and there’s someone I want, but I don’t know if I can find him.

“Team Lawful Neutral, right now, I’m the one directly in charge of that. I’m not handing that one off until I’m sure the blueprint is solid.”

“That makes sense. I’ll let you get to it.”

“And I’ll send you weekly updates.”

Comey shakes his hand, and as he’s heading out, Tim mutters, “What I wouldn’t give for AD Skinner.”

Comey stops. “Did you say something?”

Tim shakes his head. “Just being silly. Remember the X-Files?”

“You pretty much can’t work here and not be aware of them.”

“I was thinking of Skinner. I’d love a version of him to run the Lawful Evil Team.”

Comey laughs.

Two hours later, wrapping up day one of going through folders, there’s an email in Tim’s personal inbox from Comey.

Tim,

His name is AD Walter Karningham. Extension 4498. Not sure how much the show changed him, but he’s been on the shelf since our “Unexplained Illegal Phenomena Department” shut down in 2010.

Comey

Tim stares at that email, and then begins to laugh.
“You look like you’re in a much better mood!” Abby says as they’re sitting down to dinner that night.

“Other than missing our girl, I am! Shockingly enough, actually working at work makes me a happy guy,” Tim replies.

Jimmy grins at that. It’s a bright enough smile, but they can all see he’s missing Breena.

“News?” Tim asks, as he’s putting Anna in her highchair.

“The funeral went without a hitch. They’re at the wake now, and… With any luck, tomorrow morning they’ll be on the way home.”

“Good,” Abby strokes Jimmy’s back, and gently kisses the nape of his neck. “Not that we don’t want to see her, but, maybe, she gets home, loves on the kids until they go to bed, and we hold down the fort and you two get some alone time.”

Jimmy’s smiling at that idea. “We’ll see what she’s up to. She might want some loving on you two, too, time, but, maybe Wednesday…”

Tim nods along. He know he and Abby have been missing Breena, but not the way Jimmy is, and making sure they get some time to be married, with just each other, matters.

Molly’s watching them. “Mommy?”

“Tomorrow, honey,” Jimmy says. “Tomorrow we get all the hugs and kisses.” And Molly, with her hazel eyes and curly brown hair, lights up in a smile that looks so much like Jimmy, both Abby and Tim can’t help but grin back. (Abby gets a picture of it, and sends it on to Breena, later that night.)

There are people Tim knows he wants on his team. Some of them are easy to find, just a phone call and he’s got them. One… one’s going to take some effort to get a hold of but he’s determined to do it.

If this is going to be the best IA team ever, it’s going to need the best people, and he is going to find them. Even if that means tossing more than three quarters of the people he currently has.

While, he, Gibbs, Fornell, and Ziva go through folders, he hands off two assignments to Jennifer. One’s a phone number and a request for an interview. The other took him a while to hunt down. It’s a bank account number, and he needs a forensic accountant to locate the guy who emptied that account.

“Do we know the name of the guy?” Jennifer asks as she’s writing down the details.

Tim shakes his head. “Not now. Once upon a time, he might have been a college buddy.”

She’s eyeing him over her computer. “That’s cryptic.”
Back in the office, where, yet again, Fornell’s made sure they’re got piles of coffee and “snacks,” Ziva looks up from the folder she’s reading, and says, “I know one of them is Melanie Burke, who is the other?”

Tim shakes his head. He’s not saying the name in this building. “Like I told Jennifer, once upon a time, he might have been a college buddy.”

Ziva and Gibbs spend a moment thinking about that, and then Ziva inhales, sharply, and nods. “Once upon a time.”

Tim nods again, too.

“Might,” Jethro adds.

Fornell tosses a folder into the fire pile. “I’m better off not knowing.”

“Especially if I can’t find him,” Tim replies.

“You really think…” Ziva’s asking.

Tim shrugs. “Let’s see if we can find him. He’s likely vanished, but, maybe… I mean… If I could turn him, I can find him something to do, something useful. If I can’t turn him, I’m much better off knowing where he is and what he’s doing.”

Fornell dips an almond biscotti into his coffee. “I really don’t want to know.”

“He says, hoping someone will tell him,” Ziva replies. She also reaches for a biscotti, dipping hers into her chocolate smoothie, being careful to not drip any on Dave’s head as she takes a bite. (He’s happily nursing away as his Mama talks and reads.)

“Guilty. Who is he?”

Tim grabs his phone, puts the name in, lets Fornell read it, and then deletes it.

“Isn’t he dead?” Fornell says, a lot of doubt on his face. He knows that the reports he got had him listed as missing, and then found, but dead.

“Very,” Tim replies.

“Ah,” Fornell decides right now is a great time to have another bite of biscotti.

Tim doesn’t have the phone back in his pocket when it buzzes again.

“Another one?” Gibbs says.

“Maybe. I’m off to meet the guy who may, possibly, end up running the Black Hats.”
he’s Black.

Tim would have to admit that he’s having a blast at this. All of his little, latent, college boy geek fantasies are coming true. Karningham even works in the basement. It’s not exactly like the set from the TV show, but the drop panel ceilings, the filing cabinets, the high up windows, all of that looks the same.

Karningham doesn’t appear to have a secretary. He’s the one who opens the door and lets Tim in. He glances at him, rolls his eyes, and says, “Every third new agent comes down to gawk. So… Is it everything you wanted to see? The alien cases are over there,” he waves at a filing cabinet. “There never was any black ooze, the conspiracy was just a bunch of men who wanted more power, and every single case I ever had anything to do with had a completely boring, human, explanation.”

Tim sighs, and then smiles, and offers his hand, “Hi, I’m Tim McGee, and yeah, I loved the show, but… That’s not why I’m down here.”

“Uh huh… They all say that. You’re deeply interested in my opinion on whatever the hell case you’re on and next thing I know you’ll be asking about bees and who Mulder and Scully were based on.”

Tim would have to admit he’s curious about that, but… Now’s not the time. “Not on a case right now. How about I ask you, how do you feel about rules for the sake of rules?”

Karningham just looks him up and down about that. Looking more closely, he can see Tim’s young, but not brand-new-agent young. He’s also not dressed like a typical agent, he’s got on a jacket, but it’s leather, not part of a suit, and he’s not wearing a tie, nor did he refer to himself as Agent McGee. “Who are you again?”

Tim offers his hand again. The first time Karningham didn’t shake it. “Director Timothy McGee, Public Corruption.”

This time Karningham does, eyes going wide. “I didn’t have anything to do with… all of that stuff.”

“Good.” The idea that he might have didn’t occur to Tim, but given how many people he’s putting in the ‘fire’ pile, he probably should start checking everyone. He mentally sighs at that before saying, “So, how do you feel about rules for the sake of rules?”

“Why are you asking?”

“Let’s leave it at this, I’m not trying to waste your time, but I don’t want to tip my hand.”

Karningham gives Tim a long look, letting him know he’s doubtful about the time-wasting aspect of this. “I’d say it really depends on if they’re there really for their own sake, of if they’re there for another reason.”

“What would another reason be?”

“That would depend a lot on the rule.”

Tim thinks, “Say, dress code, for adults. Not like anti-sexual harassment stuff, but telling you what color tie to wear, stuff like that.”

That look of doubt has morphed into full on disbelief. Tim can only guess what sort of crazy has passed through this office, but right now Karningham is looking at Tim like he’s the king of it. “With something like that, I’d assume it’s about creating a uniform. The uniform helps to develop a ‘team identity.' The team identity makes it easier for your people to work together. So, to an outsider it might be seen as a rule for the sake of rules and kind of stupid, but it’s there to help your co-workers get along.”

Tim nods, that seems reasonable to him. That’s part of what he intends to do with his Untouchables. Though he hopes he’ll build the teams through mutual accord, and the reputation through the look.

“How about requiring forms to be filled out, in triplicate, in ink, with no corrections, and then tossing them into a hole for five years, shredding them, and making the person who filled them out fill new ones out.” Apparently the FBI can’t actually hold onto all of that paper forever. So, every five years, they shred everything, and if you still work here, you fill out the forms again. The wall of mental curse words that sprang up when Tim found that out would have made Gibbs blush, had they gotten out of his head.

“That’s a case of, we’ve always done it this way, so we always will do it this way. I don’t have much use for that.”

Tim smiles.

Karningham gestures to one of the chairs near his desk, and Tim sits down, while he returns to his own seat, behind his desk. “You going to tell me why you’re down here smiling at me?”

“Yes. One more question, how do you feel about working with people who might not be… entirely engaged in FBI approved methods?”

Karningham groans. “I don’t care what you’re doing, or who you are, I am never working with psychics again.”

Tim opens and closes his mouth. “I… didn’t know that you ever had.”

That gets Karningham thinking that maybe Tim’s not exactly there to fanboy at him. “A child goes missing; it’s bad. When you get a serial kidnapper, it is worse. The parents will try anything to get their kids back, and… I got a few of those cases, where the people doing it tried to cover it with spooky mumbo-jumbo. Make the kids look like they were ‘abducted’ by something ‘not of this world.’ It was all BS, but… The parents will bring in tips from psychics, and… after a few years, what the hell, it’s not like you’re going to make things worse.” He scowls. “Except, of course, it does. It always does. So, no psychics.”

Tim nods. He can begin to imagine what levels of worse a crew of ‘psychics’ could inflict on a case like that. “That wasn’t the version of not-entirely-FBI-approved methods I was thinking.”

“What are you thinking?”

“I need someone who can run a department, a big one, of undercover people. Their whole job will be to go in, investigate, find the bad apples, and root them out. They won’t exactly be using ‘traditional’ methods to do this, so I need someone who can tolerate people who break the rules that are there for the sake of being rules, and the rules that are there for the sake of making everyone look like one team, and, even, for that matter, the rules that are there for fairly good reasons, too. These guys are going to break the rules, they are going to encourage other people to break the rules, and when they do, we’re going to snap them up and toss them out. At the least, we’ll fire them, and with any luck we’ll be able to prosecute them, too.

“So, not only do I need a guy who can deal with that, I need one who will go to the mat for people who are sticking their necks out to take down powerful and well-connected people who wrote the damn rules to protect themselves in the first place.”

Karningham rubs a hand over his face, and nods, slowly. A look of… Tim’s not sure it’s wonder, but there’s a lot of desire in it. Tim smiles on the inside, Karningham wants this. “You want me to run that?”

“I want to know if you’re the guy who can. How’d you end up down here?”

Karningham makes a sound, somewhere between a hiss and a groan. “The eighties and nineties were filled with weird stuff. I was young, and new, and ended up with a kidnapping. Like I said, someone tried to cover it by making it look like a ‘cult’ had taken the kid, used it as a sacrifice, and then it just ‘vanished.’”

“But kids don’t vanish into thin air.”

“Exactly. Turns out Mom had custody. Dad wanted it. Dad and new girlfriend liked horror movies, and dreamed up this idiot plot. Babysitter was some sort of New Age Crystal-worshipper-type, so they pin it on her, get everyone in a frenzy about how a Satanic cult had stolen the kid, and the whole time, the kid’s in the girlfriend’s basement, just fine, bored, and wanting to know when she can go home.

“I’m the guy who decided to get the warrant and actually check the girlfriend’s house. And since then, they kept sending the weird ones to me. Next thing I know, I’ve got twenty guys working for me, all doing weird cases.

“Step on some toes to get them?”

“Maybe.” A small, tight smile lights Karningham’s face. “Might have crushed an instep or two, as well. Possibly kicked a few shins. I know a bunch of the guys I had did.”

Tim chuckles at that. He’s got a feeling Karningham and Gibbs are going to get on. “You’ve been down here for how long?”

“Seven years since they shut down my official department. Since then I… They can’t demote me. Can’t fire me, I do my job well. I’ve got twenty-five guys under me doing odds and ends. The cases no one else wants. I’m supposed to sit down here, babysit them, and while away the time until I hit mandatory retirement in three years.”

“Is that what you want to do?”

Karningham smiles. “Tell me more about your unconventional methods.”

So Tim does. When he’s done Karningham says, “Sounds like entrapment.”

“Is this my first assignment as the AD Karninghman, Public Corruption?”

“If you want it, I will absolutely have something for you to do. This though, is the last assignment before I decide if that’s where you’re going. You can see if you like working on the kind of things
I’m giving out, and I can see if you do the kind of work I like.”

“Fair enough, what’s the homework?”

“There’s going to be nine hundred people in this branch. I’ll send you a more detailed description of how I want this to work. Organize it for me. Set up the teams. Float names for some of them. I know I’ll make changes to it, and I’ve got some of my own teams I’ll want to set up, but… Show me you can organize more than twenty-five people.”

“When do you want it done?”

“End of the month?” Tim knows it’ll be at least that long before he’s ready to move on anything else.

“I can do that. My current guys?”

“If they’re up for it, bring them along with you, if not, figure out where to put them.”

Karningham nods. “I’ll get it done.”

Tim stands up and gets ready for his next appointment. “Good. Thank you.”

“Got a leader for Team Lawful Evil?” Fornell asks as Tim heads into his office.

“Maybe. More research to do. I want to make sure I’m not promoting him way above what he can handle.” He eyes the table. “I see the fire pile keeps getting bigger.”

Gibbs tosses another folder onto it. “Now I know why you had to work with us to finish anything, Tobias.”

Fornell glares at Gibbs. “Not in my department. These guys… We haven’t gotten to the guys in charge, yet, but I have a feeling there’s a reason why they kept picking these lackwits.”

Ziva’s nodding as she pats Dave’s back, strolling around Tim’s office. “This might not be a barrel full of bad apples, but it does look like this barrel was filled with apples that had already fallen off the tree, were lying on the ground, and were just on the verge of turning.”

“And if every apple in the barrel looks that way, it means the guy picking them is grabbing them off the ground, intentionally,” Tim fills in, as Gibbs sips his coffee, silently agreeing.

“And there’s only one thing you do with that sort of apple,” Fornell adds. “Make cider.”

“Great.” Tim steps out. “Jennifer, I’ve got another research job for you, who’s the FBI employee’s union president?”

“Tim?” From the bits and pieces she’s been hearing from her side of the door, she’s not immediately seeing why he’d want that.

“Trust me, it’ll make sense eventually. I’m going to need his name, and say, the top four guys in their union.”

“Okay…” Like Karningham, she’s got the “King of Crazy” look on her face, too.
Tim smiles brightly and says, “Thanks.”

Everyone heard what he said as he heads back in, and they’re all looking at him. Tim shrugs. “I don’t have cause, but I don’t want to shuffle them around and let them poison other barrels. That means I’ve got to get rid of them. As soon as I try that, their union will scream. Got to head that off.”

Gibbs smirks at that. He’s got the feeling he’s going to be doing some much less official, and significantly more interesting research in the not wildly distant future.

Tim nods. His little crew here may be doing a bit of not entirely above board snooping soon.

He laughs and shakes his head. “So much for being one of the good guys.”

---

Melanie Burke. She’s coming in, in a few hours, his meeting of the afternoon.

He’d written the name down when Tony and Ziva got talking about her, and now that he’s got this department full of empty seats, he might as well start looking for some people.

She does have three sexual discrimination lawsuits. Though two of them are closed now, and all three are sealed.

Which takes all of ten minutes for Tim to unseal. (And compared to his compadres, who are still going through files, significantly more fun and much more interesting.)

Burke V. Marietta FD. Six years on the job, four of them pretty good, then she gets a new supervisor. Burke starts getting bad shifts, and bad reviews, and their one-time fast-track-for-captain-star is suddenly ‘difficult, hard to work with, can’t take a joke, and obstructive.’ Promotions stopped coming, even though she outscored the men who were promoted above her on the standardized tests.

Marietta settled three years ago for close to $800,000 and offered her back pay and a promotion, which she didn’t take. Apparently they weren’t willing to do what she required, which was fire that supervisor.

Tim does a little more checking. He’s a captain of his own precinct now, and has… yep… only guys working for him.

After Marietta FD, she spent a four months working for a weight-lifting gym. The case against them is still open. She charges that the supervisor kept telling her to wear tight clothing, more makeup, and to provide sexual access to the wealthier clients.

There’s a three year band of nothing legally interesting, and then FLETC.

Burke V. Sothomoe. Tim winces, he remembers Sothomoe. Taught physical combat. He’d had a hard enough time with Tim, who was too ‘gentle’ and ‘tubby,’ he can’t imagine he did well with Burke.

She wasn’t top of any of her classes, but except for Physical Combat, she was in the top 25%. In physical combat, she was ranked at the bottom, barely passing. She brought suit claiming that her grades were based solely on Sothomoe’s dislike of her, and not her physical prowess when it came to combat. She claimed the low grade in his class had made it impossible for her to get any sort of field job.

Tim could see Sothomoe doing something like that. He had to personally wrestle the guy to the ground and pin him in less than a minute, and then keep him down to pass the class, and then, later on, when a new instructor was brought into the rotation, he retook it just to get his grade up.

FLETC settled that case in less than a year for $500,000. Sothomoe also ‘retired’ as part of the deal. Tim digs around a little more and sees that there were four other pending cases on Sothomoe.

“Good riddance to you!”

Tim checks his calendar. Jennifer’s got the appointment set with Burke at three in the afternoon, which means he’s got time to run to NCIS and chat with Tony, if Tony’s free.

He should probably call, see if Tony’s free, but… Nope. He’s heading over, getting a few minutes with Abby and Jimmy, and, if he’s lucky, Tony will be able to spend a bit of time with him, too.

“You’ve only been gone a week. You missing the place that bad?” Tony asks Tim, as he perches himself on the corner of Tony’s desk.

“Not exactly.” Though getting a few minutes with Abby and Jimmy certainly perked his day up quite a bit. But he can’t just hang around and play with his loves.

“So, what’s got you here?” Tony’s asking, but he can see the rest of Tony’s team watching him, wondering.

“Several things, first of all, getting away from Fornell, who is a freaking sadist.”

“Tim…” Tony’s looking pretty distressed by that. Tim can feel Draga grinning about that.

Tim shakes his head. “I’m sure Jethro and Ziva will tell you about it, too. We’re going through employment files, trying to figure out who’s staying and who’s going, and, okay, lots of coffee, great, we all need the coffee. But he keeps bringing in ‘snacks’ to go with it.”

Tony’s really laughing at that.

“Yeah, yeah, yeah, keep laughing. I don’t know how Jimmy does it. He’s around yummy food all the time, and doesn’t eat it. Me, I’ve got to keep it out of sight, but I can’t, because it’s sitting there, in front of me, while Fornell and Ziva happily munch away on it. And great for them. Wendy doesn’t care if Fornell ends up the size of a house, and Ziva’s nursing, she can have all the calories she wants. Jethro and I are just about whimpering because every day, he brings in something else, and now, with Ziva there, he’s getting all nurturing and protective of her, and making sure to bring in extra yummy treats because she needs lots of food to keep herself and little guy big and strong.”

Tony’s really laughing at that.

“Yeah. It’s freaking hilarious. Wait until I drag your ass in—“

“Oh no you don’t! I am not one of your little FBI toys. You get to ask me for consults, and that’s it.”
“Well, consult is the second reason I’m here. Let me buy you a coffee, and you tell me about Melanie Burke,” Tim says.

Tony rolls his eyes as he stands up. “Draga…”

Draga waves him off. He’s more than capable of holding down the fort.

“How frank do you want me to be?” Tony says as they’re standing in front of the elevator.

Tim’s got a good idea of how Burke must come off to a certain sort of person, he’s just looking for confirmation. “Go back to 2005 Tony and describe her.”

Tony waits until they’re in the elevator, and then stops it, making sure they’re as alone as they can be at NCIS. And he still, almost, looks around to check before saying, voice quiet, “Bull dyke, man-hater with a chip on her shoulder the size of Manhattan, who wouldn’t know a joke if it walked up and bit her on the ass.”

Tim nods at that. That’s what he expects a certain type of guy to see, judging from the lawsuits.

“Competent?”

“Passed every test we threw at her. Just, joyless.”

“Makes you want to haze her just for existing?”

Tony looks annoyed by that question. He’s out of the hazing business, and he hoped Tim had noticed that.

“Not now. I know not now. 2005 Tony, what about him?”

“Hard, and all the time.”

“Pretty?” Tim’s fairly sure that Burke is either too pretty or not pretty enough, but he doesn’t know which side she falls on.

“No.” Tony says with a head shake. “Intentionally not pretty. She’s never gonna be gorgeous, but a little makeup, a hairstyle that doesn’t match yours, and losing twenty pounds wouldn’t hurt, you know?”

“Kind of woman who makes the DudeBros’ skin crawl just by existing?”

“DudeBros?”

“Fratboys.”

“Yeah.”

Tim grins. “Excellent.”

Back at his office, Tim sets the stage. He doesn’t want to upend the work Gibbs and Tobias are doing, (Ziva went home with Dave about an hour ago) so he asks Jennifer if he can have her office for the meeting.

She grabs her laptop, and heads into his office, leaving Tim the run of hers.

Perfect. Plus, he’s got a bunch of extra ears in the next room over, so he’ll get some extra opinions on the situation.

Melanie shows up exactly five minutes early. And Tony’s right. She’s perfect for what Tim hopes to do. She’s still job hunting, and hasn’t, apparently, caught on anywhere else, and Tim can see why.

She might be great at what she does, and she might be more qualified than the people around her, but as soon as she walks into his office, she just sucks the life out of the room. Add in the fact that she’s almost as tall as he is, wearing a pants suit designed for a woman at least twenty years older than she is, about thirty pounds overweight, with a very plain, very round face, and short red hair that’s not doing anything to make her face any prettier, and Tim can see how this is a woman that just grates on a certain kind of man.

And he’s really hoping to take advantage of that.

She’s not glaring at him, but unlike most people who’d get a call out of the blue from the FBI asking for a meeting, she’s not curious or scared. She’s annoyed. Hiding it… not well enough. Most people might miss it, but Tim’s done more than enough interrogation work to see it.

He offers her a seat and coffee, getting her settled on the sofa in Jennifer’s office, asks if she’s comfortable, does his best polite, sincere-beta-male-routine, and can see her starting to, barely, relax.

“You interviewed for a job with one of my friends—“ he says as he pulls a chair over to the sofa, so he’s facing her, and sits down.

“Which one?”

“Tony DiNozzo, NCIS.”

He sees her face tighten slightly. Looks like she took to Tony about as well as he did to her, and Tim can see her opinion of him dropping at the idea that he has friends like Tony.

“And what did DiNozzo say?” Her fingers are a little too tight on the coffee cup. Yeah, she really didn’t take to Tony.

“You weren’t a match for his team, but you might be a match for mine.”

“And why is that?” She’s got a lot of walls up, and he can read her extremely defensive body language.

Tim smiles. “Because you’re a bull dyke with a massive chip on your shoulder, no sense of humor, and the DudeBros take one look at you and start plotting ways to make your life miserable because they can’t stand to see a woman who doesn’t fit their ideas of proper gender norms.”

Her cheeks go red and there’s a palpable flash of rage through her as she slams the coffee cup down on the coffee table in front of Jennifer’s sofa. “Are you trying to get sued?”

Tim’s still smiling, but she’s glaring. “Nope. I’m trying to offer you a job. All of that makes you supremely qualified for what I want to do. Did you check to see who I was when I asked to meet up?”
“You’re the guy who’s going to get the whole FBI settling out of court and apologizing to me for the next ten years! NCIS, too!”

Tim continues smiling, and she finds it unnerving.

“You think this is a joke?” she asks, voice hard, accusing. Her hand is in her pocket, and Tim is sure she’s recording the conversation, now.

“I think you don’t know who I am or what my department does.”

“Fine, who are you?” She sounds very annoyed. “What makes you so sure this is funny instead of career suicide?”

“I’m the head of public corruption investigations, which will include investigating all federal departments for sexual harassment and discrimination. I’m the guy who’s going to hire you to go undercover in departments that have bad track records, get hired, collect evidence, and then blow the old-school-frat-boys out of the water. I want someone who makes guys like that take one look and have their skin start to crawl, and then I want you to help me take them down. By the way, it’s illegal in DC to record someone without their knowledge. If you let me put a badge on you, that’ll change, because I’m a government employee and no longer have privacy rights when I’m on the clock.”

Tim’s very satisfied to see that’s left her flatfooted. “Now, you still want to sue me?”

And, though Tony didn’t believe it when Tim told him about it later, Melanie Burke smiles. She pulls out her phone, and lays it on the coffee table. Tim nods; she was recording. Then she makes Tim smile again by saying, “Maybe. We’ll see how it goes.”

“Good enough.”

“Why me?” she asks after a minute, picking her coffee back up. “You expect me to get harassed a lot?”

He shrugs a bit. ‘I’ve had some past experience with this, and it seems that, ‘This isn’t worth ending a career over,’ is an awfully common sentiment. Too many of the higher ups are willing to look the other way, and too many of the people getting harassed are willing to grin and bear it because they don’t expect to have to deal with it for too long. You’ve got a track record of saying, ‘I’m not going to take this,’ and that’s exactly who I need for this.”

She appears pleased with that assessment of her character. “So, how does this work?”

“Statistical analysis to start with. We’re going to collect data on everyone, and figure out what’s a ‘normal’ level of harassment. Anywhere with too much or too little, we’ll get someone into. Find out what’s going on. Too much might just be about getting rid of a guy whose balls are in charge. Or too much might mean it’s a department where people are actually comfortable reporting issues, so it looks like too much, but it really isn’t because other departments aren’t reporting enough. Too little might be a place where no one feels comfortable making a report. Or it might mean they’ve got a really good set up. However it works, you and your ilk will ’get transferred in’ and go to work.”

“Who’s ‘my ilk?’” She sips her coffee watching Tim over the lip of her cup.

“A bit of everyone. Since this is the sexual harassment team, I’m thinking any minority sexuality that’s visible, as well as some extremely young and pretty girls. Might even get a few guys who look like DudeBros, and stick them in there to see what happens when the higher ups don’t feel like someone’s breathing down their necks. That’s probably one of our plans for places with a lot of complaints. Don’t want anyone to figure out exactly what we’re doing or how we’re doing it.
“Once people like you have gone in and collected evidence, my face team, ‘The Untouchables’ will show up in their perfect suits, and perfect manners, and grab whomever it is, and then have a conversation with them about what’s going to happen next.”

“I’m not ‘Untouchable’ material?”

Tim laughs. “Hell, I’m not Untouchable material. I’m not kidding about ‘Face Team.’ These people are being hired to make criminals wet their pants when they come in for them. They’re going to look perfect, and be perfect.”

“Chiseled jaws, crew cuts, and Marine posture?” Tim can feel she’s leading him on.

“And whatever the female or non-binary equivalent of that is. I don’t care how they identify, just that they look like a Photoshopped Brooks Brother’s model of it.”

That gets a wary smile out of Burke. Almost like she can’t believe he’s what he looks like he is. “You did your homework.”

“My grandma would hang me up by my toenails if I didn’t.”

“I’d like your grandma, wouldn’t I?”

“Most people do.”

She sips her coffee again and thinks for a moment. “This is too good to be true.”

“I’m not saying it’ll be easy, or that we won’t face a lot of backlash, but the job, and the offer is real.”

She shakes her head. “That’s not what I’m talking about. I’ve got some ‘experience’ with this, as you say, and you need jurisdiction to prosecute a case. This is the FBI, why would you have jurisdiction for this, instead of each group’s Internal Affairs?”

“ Probably because right now, everything is upside down and no one wants their bit of the alphabet soup looking even worse than it already does.” Tim sighs. “It’s entirely possible I don’t have the jurisdiction to do this, but that’s not going to stop me from doing it. They’re members of the public, and public corruption is my beat.”

That gets a smirk. “You’re going in on a wing and a prayer, and hoping they don’t sue you into oblivion for wrongful termination.”

“That’s true, too. But in these cases, I intend to prosecute.”

Burke looks very pleased by that. “Even more interesting.”

“If they chose to resign, and never work for the Feds again, they may be able to avoid prosecution.”

“And that’s how you get around the wrongful termination suits.” She’s nodding along with that.

“That’s how I try. So…”

“When do I start?”

“I won’t have the sexual harassment team up and running for probably a few months. But I’ve got a lot of deadwood I’m clearing out now. If you feel like reading employment files and helping with that, you can start tomorrow.”
“Eight AM, bright and early.”

Tim nods at that, too. “That’s the idea.”

She stands up, and Tim does likewise. “I’ll see you then.”

Tim heads back to his office a few minutes later. “One down, eight hundred and ninety-nine to go. Tomorrow, we get another set of hands to help with this.” He glances to Gibbs and Fornell, “Best behavior, both of you. I’d like to see us not get sued for at least a week, okay.”

Fornell smirks. “Says the guy who called her a dyke.”

“Only to set the scene. That word’s not coming out again.”

“Hell, McGee, I didn’t know you knew that one.”

Tim rolls his eyes. “Find anything interesting while I was talking to her?”

Gibbs nods, and pushes a folder forward. “First of the higher ups. He’s mid-management, but built several of the teams we’re put in the fire pile.”

Tim grabs it, curses again, and sucks on his new papercut while flipping through the file with his other hand.

“How can your hands possibly be that soft?” Fornell asks while tossing Tim the box of band aids that’s been sitting on their table. “You’re off talking to people, working on your computer, visiting with Tony, and you’ve still got three times as many papercuts as the rest of us, combined.”

Tim applies the band aid (number eight) and debates about how badly he wants to shock Fornell. Ziva’s left for the day, Jennifer’s back at her part of the office, the door is closed, so it’s just the three of them… He could be a bit… risqué…

Tim wiggles his left index and middle finger at Fornell, both of which have several band aids a piece, and says, completely deadpan, “Cum. Especially the girls’. Keeps everything soft and supple.”

When Fornell picks his jaw back up off the table, Tim says, grinning, “See, I know lots of words.”

Gibbs smirks, silently laughing, as Fornell slowly shakes his head. Then, just as deadpan back, he says, “Yeah, well, if you want any more of it on your hands anytime soon, they better not be covered in band aids. Put some latex gloves on.”

That is actually awfully good advice. Tim goes off in search of some, and manages to end the day without cutting himself again.

He doesn’t end the day with a sense of the goodness of mankind, or that the FBI was in any way interested in actually catching corruption.

He’s going through the employment record of the first of the middle management guys, Bob Bergen, and decides to do some deeper digging.

Seventeen years at the FBI, fourteen of them on anti-corruption, ten in management. And, in every case he worked, if finding the person or thing he was investigating guilty would have been embarrassing for whomever was in charge, the case just died. If finding them guilty looked good for whomever was in charge, they were investigated.

Tim’s fairly sure he’s going to see that pattern, a lot.

That’s the first of the files Tim tossed into the prosecute pile, instead of fire. He’s not entirely sure if he can prosecute that, but, he’s going to try. He’s got a sinking suspicion though, that it’s not illegal to just drop cases. After all, there’s no hint of cover up, nothing to suggest Bob Bergen was taking bribes or anything, he just stopped working cases where working them might prove embarrassing.

Gibbs sees him put that file in the prosecute pile, and gives him the look.

“I’m hoping at least.”

Gibbs nods, and Fornell says, “You ever have anyone ask you to look the other way?”

Gibbs nods again. “Too many times, you?”

“Only had to happen once before I got the reputation that if asked that question, I’d throw everything I had at it.”

Tim thinks about the employment histories they’re looking at. “Probably explains a lot of the transfers out of this department we’re seeing.”

“Probably.” Fornell nods to the prosecute pile. “I don’t think it’s illegal to not go after a case. All of us have a bunch of them going at any time. And there’s nothing that says what order you have to work on them.”

“That’s what I’m afraid of,” Tim replies. “I’ll talk to legal tomorrow, see what I can do with it. One thing that talking to Burke reminded me of, the more of the fire pile I can toss in the prosecute pile, the more of them I don’t have to fight wrongful termination lawsuits on.”

“So, prosecute not to put in jail, but to get a resignation?” Fornell says.

“Yeah.” Tim shakes his head. “I don’t know how many of ‘em I’ll even be able to try it on, but…”

Gibbs nods toward the fire pile, it’s got at least nine out of ten of the cases they’re looking at in it. “But you’ve got to get them out somehow.”

“Exactly.”

Jennifer pokes her head in. “I’m done for the day. Do you need me any longer?”

Tim shakes his head. “Nope, and barring a fire, I’m off tonight, too, so no need to keep your phone on.” He’s off because Breena’s getting home today, and he wants to spend some time with her.

“Oh, okay. See you in the morning. You want new employee paperwork for Ms. Burke, right?”

“Yes, please. Thanks, Jennifer. And if you could get me some time with whoever’s in charge of our legal department, I’d really appreciate it.”

“No problem.” Jennifer heads back out, and when he hears the door shut, he says to Fornell and Gibbs. “Tomorrow, when Jennifer has the names of the Union reps, I want everything you two can find on them. Everything. I’m thinking the first thing the new office of Public Corruption is going to do is a press conference where my spokesperson goes over who’s going and why, and how we’re reorganizing, at the same time my Untouchables are going to be running into the Union offices and arresting them, exactly the same time I start sending those pink slips out.”

“If we can’t find anything?” Fornell says.

“You worked undercover in the Mob for how long? Did you ever see a clean union boss?” Gibbs says.

Fornell shakes his head.

“If, by some miracle, any of them aren’t up to their eyeballs in hinky dealings, though, given how badly the election laws were being fucked with, I’m willing to bet that just going through their finances for illegal campaign contributions should get us something, I’ll come up with another plan. But I want them focused on saving their own skins. And if they’re all under indictment, that’ll make those ‘Our poor boys are getting sacked for no good reason’ press conferences a whole lot less believable.”

Fornell’s watching Tim, slowly chewing a bite of his (last) biscotti. Then he nods and says, “So, this is what happens when a writer gets some power.”

Tim grins. He hadn’t been thinking of it that way, but, looking at it, he realizes he is orchestrating a story. Setting it up the way he would in one of his books. Swoop in and set the bad guys against each other, or distract them from what he’s doing.

His only hope is that it works as well as it does when he’s putting it on a page.
Harry and David’s Moose Munch is a real thing. It comes in several varieties, but basically it’s popcorn with a crunchy caramel coating mixed with chocolate and nuts. It’s ridiculously addictive.

Breena gets home a bit before dinner on Tuesday, and Jimmy’s so happy to see her he feels like he can float.

This is the longest they’ve been apart. He’s been on a few overnight jobs, and Tony’s bachelor party, but that’s it. Since they got married, three days haven’t gone by that they haven’t seen each other.

And while taking Tim and Abby up on their offer of sweeping Breena up and basking in time with just her is awfully tempting, he can see the girls, Molly especially, want a lot of mommy-time, and Abby and Tim have been missing her, too.

So, as Tim’s talking about his new hire, Jimmy decides that tomorrow, Wednesday night, that’s all theirs.

And Jimmy has plans.

It’s been a while since Jimmy’s done this, probably because he’s getting pretty good at this whole ‘being married’ thing, and this is something he used to do make up when he’d annoyed Breena.

It’s been a while since that’s happened, but she likes it, and it’s one of the arrows in his quiver of ‘romantic treats’ so…

Harry and David’s Moose Munch in milk chocolate. Check.

The latest episode of Outlander. Check.

He’s not sure when it started, but somehow Breena found the show, and she got Abby watching it, and then Abby started up some sort of girly afternoon TV treat on Saturday afternoons when they’re at the house, dragging Ziva into it, and next thing he knew Penny and Ducky were watching it, too. (Ducky claims he’s watching purely for the historical significance.) And then, somehow, he really doesn’t know how, Gibbs started watching, and he got Abbi into it, and, anyway… There’s been many a Saturday naptime when the majority of Clan Gibbs is watching the adventures of the Fraisers. (As Tim makes somewhat snarky comments along the lines of, if they want to ogle pretty boys in kilts, he’s got several.) So far, Jimmy doesn’t watch it, (these days he and Tim are usually doing something hard and sweaty with Tony, like one on one on one basketball) but, since Breena was on the road, she didn’t get the Saturday update, and, well, if Gibbs watches it, it can’t be that painful.

Soft, nubby blankets and pillows on the bed. Check.
Hot cocoa. Check. (This bit works better when it’s not ninety degrees out, but, hell, they have air conditioning; he can make it a cool, snuggly night, so he will!)

So, for date night, at home (technically, date night at Tim and Abby’s home, but more and more home is becoming untethered from a physical location), with his number one sweetie, Jimmy’s got Chick Flick and Snuggle night set. And he’s got some plans (which is why they’re at Tim and Abby’s, because the tools for said plans live at their place) for what might happen after.

And Breena, when she steps into Tim and Abby’s room, and sees that he’s got everything set up for Chick Flick and Snuggle, breaks out into a massive grin.

She curls into his arms, grabs a few of those caramel and milk chocolate coated popcorn pieces, still grinning, and starts the video saying, “Ziva texted me. She said this last week was amazing!”

Jimmy kisses her hair, holding her tight, happy to just be next to her.

An hour later, Jimmy’s come to the conclusion that he’s damn well going to have to watch this stupid show, and Tim and Tony will end up teasing him mercilessly for it.

Maybe he can get away with reading it. Breena says there are books.

Of course, unless those book are illustrated, he’s thinking he won’t be quite as interested in them. Whoever plays Sassenach is an awfully lovely woman, and he’s not minding the sight of her at all. The fact that the people who make this show seem to enjoy shooting her (at least in this episode) without a whole lot of clothing may have something to do with him enjoying this.

But he likes the view in front of him, even more.

They didn’t exactly get dressed up for this. He’s in his bumming-around-the-house-wear, this time of year, that’s just a light pair of cotton drawstring pants. Breena’s wearing a long t-shirt, given how long it is, almost to her thighs, even with Donnie’s bump adding to the amount of body that shirt’s got to cover, he’s thinking it’s one that’s been pilfered from Abby, or, since it’s fairly plain, just soft navy blue cotton, maybe Tim. (Jimmy knows it’s not his.)

Her hair is soft and loose, and she’s already washed her makeup off. She smells like chocolate and caramel, the moisturizer she uses on her face, faint traces of her shampoo, and the fabric softener Tim and Abby use.

She smells like home.

She’s in his lap, facing him, hands on his chest, as they cuddle and talk.

Some of it is about the show. Breena’s hoping she can get him watching. She wants to share this with him, too.

Some of it is about the weekend. Her mom is sad, and to an extent, Breena is, too. Aunt Nance, as she knew her mom’s best friend, didn’t live close enough to be part of her day to day life, but at least twice a year, she’d be up to visit, and at least twice more, her mom would go down.

They talked every day, so at least twice a week she’d get updates on Aunt Nance and what she and her family were up to.

“They were going to retire together. The house on the beach, that’s where mom and dad go. Aunt Nance and Uncle Bill have a place further inland…” she sighs at that.

Jimmy holds her close and lets her talk, feeling the same chill she is, of how short a time there is to love and be loved. They deal with lives cut short, or cut long, or just… cut really, every day, and on most days they can keep that wall between them and death, but her walls are very thin right now.

He’s kissing her, holding on, letting her talk, when she finally says, “This is too sad.”

He half smiles at her. “You’re allowed to be sad.”

“Yeah, but I don’t want to be, especially not right now. So… happy thoughts. Those videos… Did Abby put you and Tim up to that?”

Jimmy smiles at her. “She certainly didn’t put me up to it, and judging by the way Tim was blushing and almost stuttering when he asked, I don’t think she put him up to it, too.”

“He was blushing…” That also gets a smile on her face.

“I might have been, too.”

“Awww…” She strokes his chin. “So… was it good? I mean… You obviously looked like you were having a good time, but I still can’t believe you did Tim.”

Jimmy smiles a bit. “Is that a good thing or not?”

“Very good, amazing good, just about came watching it good, but… I didn’t think you’d ever… go there.”

“I wasn’t sure I would, either, but… You know. They’re both looking at me with those big green eyes, and I didn’t want to say no.”

She laughs at that. “Oh, yeah, I know those big green eyes. Both of them went to ‘Advanced Puppy Eye’ school or something.” She laughs a bit. “If he works at it, Tim can give Jackson lessons in puppy eyes.”

He smirks at that. “Yeah.”

Breena strokes his chest and curls into him as best as she can with Donnie in the way. “More seriously, though… God… Watching that…” Breena doesn’t curse a whole lot, so when she says it, laying a kiss on his collar bone to go with the word, it sort of shivers through Jimmy. “God, baby, so fucking hot.”

He’s grinning. “Glad you liked it.”

“I did. The bit where you’re figuring it out was cute, and then once you guys got it…” She shakes her head. “Did you watch it?”

“I was there.”

“I know, but… You couldn’t see your face, could you?”
“No. Even if I had had an angle for it, I didn’t have my contacts in.”

Breena kisses him, long and sweet. “So beautiful. I could have just watched your faces. Actually, I did. I mean, not the first time through, but the second…”

“You watched it more than once?”

“How many times did you watch the video of Abby and I making out for Valentine’s Day?”

He cups her face in his hand and kisses her, lips firm and with some real intent behind the move. “I couldn’t have counted it. More than five, less than a hundred.”

She laughs at that. “Not quite that many times.”

“You were only gone for three days.”

“There was the one bit, right before Tim told you to come, he’s kind of bouncing between you and Abby, and you’ve got your eyes closed, hand on his chest, lips on his shoulder, and… God, your face…” She’s smiling. “So beautiful. I mean, Tim and Abby were, too, but…” They’re face to face, and her eyes are searching his face, taking in the small wrinkles around his eyes, and the somewhat unruly hair, the way he’s smiling more with his right side. Her fingers follow her gaze, stroking over this face she adores. “I love you.”

He kisses her. “Love you, too.” He took his glasses off when they finished watching the show, knowing where they’d end up tonight, and not needing them for this. Even he can see a face from four inches away. He watches her face, too. No real wrinkles, not yet, though it’s rounder than it was when they first married. He feels his son squirming in her belly. Right now, all of her is rounder than it was when they met. “I was thinking about it, after.”

“Which part,” she’s gently stroking his chest hair, fingers slipping between the mostly black/brown strands. Though, like the rest of his hair, a few gray ones have joined the party.

“I’ve… never done what Tim did, and… I’d like to, with you.”

That takes Breena by surprise. She had been watching her fingers on his chest, but she looks up to his face. “Really?”

“Yeah.”

“With me? Not with Tim… I mean… I think he’d have a better time with it.”

“Uh…” Jimmy licks his lips. It certainly looks to him like the girls really enjoy doing Tim, but… yes, on a purely physical sensation level, he can’t see how Tim wouldn’t get more out of it than they do. But, this isn’t about purely physical sensation. “I couldn’t see our faces, not last weekend, but… I remember yours, the first time… okay, technically second time, we had sex. And, you’d rolled on top of me, and we were just sort of moving around, finding what worked and what felt good, and… You were holding my hands, and easing up and down, and your face was lit up with love and new and… and I wanted to give that back to you. I wanted to let you light me up with love and new. I mean, barring something that breaks one of our hard lines, this is the last ‘first time’ I’m ever going to have for anything sexual, and, I like it to be yours.” She grinning from ear to ear, eyes soft and shining at him, and he grins back at her. “It looks like you like that idea.”

“Well… I mean, yeah,” she gently licks her lips, the tip of her tongue trailing wet and pink over plump flesh, “and… I mean, you know, it wasn’t anything I’d been dreaming of, but getting to do it with Tim was a blast, so… Yeah, I’d love to do it with you, but… You don’t have to…”
“I know, but… I…” It feels odd to say it. “I want to give it to you.”

Breena smiles widely at that.

“And, okay, yeah, given everything else between us, it’s probably silly, but…”

“It’s sweet.”

Jimmy shrugs a bit. His hands trail over her hips and sides as they kiss. “I don’t know if I ever said it, not in so many words, but… you were right, it mattered and… felt really good, that your first time was with me.”

She smiles even wider at that. “Those magic words, ‘You were right.’”

He kisses her again. “I know, better than all the ‘I love yous’ ever, right?”

“Maybe not better, but awfully good.” She kisses him, slow and lingering. For a moment, they just breathe in each other. “Still, you really want to? I appreciate the sentiment, but… Part of why it mattered, at least to me, was putting off something I really wanted so I could share it with the person I wanted most, and…” she strokes his face, “I’ve never gotten the sense that’s anything you crave.”

“True. Tim really likes it though. Might turn out I really like it, too.”

“You might. You like one finger and tongue, so…”

Jimmy’s hand traces down her back, settling lightly on her butt. “Yeah. No reason to think I wouldn’t like it, but… It’s not the sensation of it. Not… I want this and I want you to give it to me. Not really. Not on a physical level, at least, not now, maybe I’ll feel differently about it after I’ve done it. Maybe I’ll really like it. But… um… Everything I’ve ever wanted sex-wise you’ve given me, and beyond. It’s… um…” He’s biting his lip, trying to put these feelings into words. “It’s the intimacy, maybe…” That’s in the neighborhood of what he’s trying to express. “I mean… Okay, it’s not like I feel like we don’t have enough intimacy and I want more of it… It’s… I’ve never done this, and I want to leap off the edge of the cliff and trust that you’ll catch me, and make sure I have a good time flying.”

“Even if you’re kind of scared of flying?” she says, gently. She knows that’s part of Jimmy’s one finger only rule.

He nods; his forehead brushing hers. “Even though I’m kind of scared of flying, and,” he sighs a little, “maybe I still have a sense that I shouldn’t like flying, cause, I’m… um… not a bird?” which is a much bigger part of it, “I’ve beaten that metaphor to death, haven’t I?”

She’s still smiling at him, and he kisses her again. Kisses her lips and the tip of her nose and eyelashes.

“Do you want to fly?” Breena asks.

“I want to fly with you.”

Jimmy’s not sure how exactly this’ll end, but he knows how to start it. Breena was gone for three days, and last night didn’t involve any oral sex, and there’s a pussy he’s been aching to kiss.

So, kissing and petting and more gentle words and touches eventually leads to them on their sides, tops to tails, with Jimmy very happily kissing away.

He may not be the most experienced guy in the world, or even in his circle of friends and family, but he does feel like he qualifies as a connoisseur of pussy, and this is one of his two favorites.

Breena’s keeping herself trimmed but not shaved these days, so he’s got a glistening wet pussy, framed with dark blonde hair, lips pink and pouting at him, a perfect little clit standing up and begging to be licked, and he is very happily licking every inch of it.

And she’s got him in hand, and mouth, and that’s making him happy, too.

He jerks a little when one of her hands moves back behind his balls, and she lets go of his dick to say, “You really sure you want this?”

He breaks his own kiss, and looks up at her. “Yes, just a little startled.”

“Oh…” He kisses her again, and then says, “I am kind of afraid it’ll hurt. You didn’t like it when I did it to you, so…” They tried anal once, not all that long into their marriage, and maybe they didn’t get the whole prep aspect down pat, but they did get slow and lots of lube, and he could tell she wasn’t exactly loving it, but he didn’t know it was hurting her, and she didn’t tell him to stop for a few strokes, hoping it would start to feel better, but it didn’t. When he tried to speed up a little, Breena jerked away from him saying, “Ow!” and that was the end of that. By the time they did have a better handle on the prep aspect, Molly’s birth had resulted in hemorrhoids that kept anal off of the menu for Breena.

She shifts a bit, so they’re on their sides, face to face. She kisses his lips, and he gives her tongue a gentle suck, before she says, “I remember that. Before we had sex the first time.”

“Being afraid it would hurt?” That surprises him.

“Yeah, I mean… Everyone said it could or would.”

“You never said.”

She shrugs a bit. “I felt like it was kind of silly. My own fingers didn’t hurt, so… why would your penis? But, yeah, I was a little worried about that. One of my best friends had had a story about having to get on top, sit on the guy, force herself down, feeling like she was going to die, and then bleeding for two days.”

Jimmy winces. If one of his best friends had had a first time story like that, it would have put him off sex for a while, too. Then another thought hits him. “It didn’t hurt when we did it, right?”

She smiles again. “No! If it hurts or is uncomfortable or whatever, I’ve told you. I wasn’t shy about telling you to stop when we were trying anal with me on the receiving time, was I?”

“Nope.”

“Or stopping for more lube and going slower after Molly was born?”

“Not at all.”

She kisses him again. “And you do the same.”

He nods. “And I do the same.”
Back heads to tails. He doesn’t know what he loves best about oral. Maybe it’s the glide. His tongue and her pussy and they’re both so wet. His tongue just whispers over her skin, barely any friction. So wet and smooth and easy. No drag at all.

Maybe it’s the view. He pulls back for a second to watch her, all pink and wet, and the way her body looks as he drags his finger between her lips. He slips it inside of her, and watches her body engulf him, and back arch into that touch.

That sight is too much of a good thing; he’s got to taste again.

It could be the smell, and taste. He’s got a mouthful of sex right now, and he loves that.

Breena moans, and right this second, it’s the sounds. Definitely. The sounds. He’s making her sound like that. He’s pulling those moans out of her. It’s his mouth, his fingers, his love, making her body quiver.

Once she’s done twitching, he can relax, let himself focus on what she’s doing to him, and… Good Lord!

She’s gently sucking on the tip of his dick, rocking her head just a little, just enough to slip her lips over the tip. She’s using the suction to pull him into her mouth, and keeping her lips wet and sealed around him.

And fingers. Well, right now, finger, one of them. She’s not doing much with his prostate, not yet. Right now it’s just about more of that slick, wet glide.

One finger fits just fine. No ache, no burn, and with the amount of lube she’s using, and the way she’s just using the tips of her finger, it’s… It’s almost that sensation of blowing Tim and getting blown at the same time. It’s almost like he’s fucking himself.

He’s making himself just float on it. Licking Breena gently, mostly just to enjoy the taste, and feeling her mouth and finger and the all wrapped up in pleasure sensation of it.

And then it’s a bit less comfortable. She’s slowly squirming finger number two in, and he’s making himself relax, breathing deep and easy, focusing down on the muscles that don’t exactly want to just open up and give her access.

She’s moving her head a bit faster, which feels really good, but his body likes to tense when he’s feeling really good, which is making his ass burn.

“Slower.”

She slows down what she’s doing with her fingers, which helps, but wasn’t exactly the idea he was attempting to get across.

“Mouth. Feels too good. Makes me clench up.”

She slows her mouth down, more of that wet, slick suction as she keeps easing finger number two in.

Jimmy makes himself relax, makes his breathing slow and easy, makes his mind calm down.

Honestly, it doesn’t hurt. Not really. It’s not amazingly comfortable or anything, but it’s not painful. So he feels like he’s tensing on the idea of the anticipation of pain. Like he almost expects it to hurt a lot worse than this.

But it doesn’t.

And Breena gives him a moment of still, not moving at all, before she starts a slow easy stroke and… It’s not his favorite sensation ever, but it certainly isn’t bad. She stops, adds a bit more lube, and slowly works those fingers in again. This time it’s pretty easy.

And when she starts to speed her mouth again, and match the glide of her fingers to what her lips are doing, Jimmy notices his hips are rocking with her, and after another thirty seconds or so he starts to appreciate the glide, on both sides.

He keeps rocking with her, and she starts slipping her mouth all the way down, and her fingers all the way in, twisting them a bit to give his prostate a little nudge and Jimmy moans, loud.

That’s hitting all of his buttons just right.

And that’s about as much of that as he should take, unless he wants to come from her lips and fingers. Maybe tomorrow or the next day he will, but that’s not the goal for tonight.

“I think I’m ready.”

Breena licks, wet tongue laving up the underside of his dick, before meeting his eyes and grinning at him. She lets him go and rolls over, grabbing the harness of the dildo.

“How do you want to do this?”

“Face to face, or as close as we can get. Want to see and kiss, too.”

Breena thinks about it as she’s pulling the straps on the dildo tight. “Face to face, on our sides.”

Jimmy grins at her. “Sounds perfect.”

---

Jimmy knows he’s not the most flexible guy ever born. He knows he’s not even in that guy’s zip code. That said, he’s still an awfully flexible guy. He can get into positions most guys can only dream of, but, even with all the good will and scooting and tucking his pelvis and butt under him, he cannot curl in on himself enough to do face to face sex with Breena, not almost seven months pregnant, not on their sides, not with her on the penetrating side of the equation.

This is reminding him a lot of the first time he had sex. A lot of poking about, looking for something that she knows has to be there, but can’t seem to find, made even more complicated by the fact that Breena can’t feel what she’s doing.

So… “Maybe if your leg was…” And they re-arrange…

He’s shaking his head. “How about…” He curls his pelvis under a bit more, and drapes her top leg over his bottom one, and… maybe… if the dildo was a good three inches longer… Mostly it’s just nudging him in the balls right now.

“Oh, okay, here…” She tries laying between his legs, on their sides, which just isn’t working. Not only is his left leg about to fall asleep, but that just isn’t comfortable for her, either.

She rolls away, frustrated, and he’s feeling something less than amazingly turned on. Mostly he’s wet and slippery, and not in a really good way. There’s lube smeared from his ass to his thighs because of all the places the dildo ended up that weren’t inside of him.

“How do we do this when you’re the top?” Breena’s asking. “It works, right?” There is a point where she’ll be so pregnant they just can’t have face to face sex, but she didn’t think they were there, yet. Not too far off, she feels like they’ve still got at least a week or two.

Jimmy slips her leg over his hip, scoots down a bit, drapes his top leg over her bottom one, and shift his hip a bit, twisting his pelvis to fit it snug against hers, and bending his back to give her belly a bit more room. Then one, long push, and they both groan with pleasure.

His eyes have slipped shut, and then laze open to meet hers. A smile lights his face. “Yeah, it works.”

She sighs, a deep, happy sound. “Oh, yeah, it does.”

For a moment they just rock, soft easy strokes. Wet, slick friction lighting both of them up. Her head is resting on his arm, and they’re face to face, kissing gently.

After another moment, she breaks the kiss. “Okay, what are you doing that I wasn’t?”

Jimmy rocks his hips. In this position he can’t get a lot of motion, just some gentle, shallow back and forth. But, doing so does illustrate the issue. “I’ve got two inches more dick, and I can kind of twist myself in below your belly.”

“We can raid the toy box for something longer.” Which they certainly can. This isn’t the only dildo Tim and Abby have. It’s not even the only one that fits the harness. It is the only one that’s this narrow though.

“But even if we do, and… I’m thinking no on that,” he and Tim have certainly enjoyed watching the other dildo in action, but that doesn’t mean either of them are enthusiastic about having one of them used on them, “you still can’t tuck yourself under your belly.

“Hands and knees?”

Jimmy figures that would likely work, but… “Want to see you, and not in a mirror. Can you lie on your back?”

“No for more than a minute or two.”

“Yeah, I’m going to need more time than that.” His hands settle on Donnie’s bump, his lips to Breena’s belly button as he says, “How do we scoot you up a bit?”

“Here…” She rolls back from him, and pushes some of the pillows into an incline. “Let’s see…” She’s lying on the incline, not exactly on her back, but not fully sitting up, which covers the dildo with her belly.

He smiles at that, leaning over her on his hands and knees, kissing her lips, and then sliding down to her breasts, and belly.

“So, just cowboy up?”

“Sounds like a plan.”
Sliding down the dildo is slow. Very slow. Apparently, it doesn’t matter how carefully you prep if you spend ten minutes fumbling around between finishing up with that and actually getting into a position where everything fits together.

It’s actually almost difficult to go slowly enough with this. Everything is so slick, and to a certain extent he just wants to get to the other side of this. (He’s remembering some of Tim’s comments about the penetration part not being his favorite bit of this.)

It would, probably, be fairly easy to just let gravity take control, and plop himself down.

Except he’s already feeling that sort of tight, stretched, holding a pose too deep sensation. And, while it’s true that Jimmy does like the occasional shot of pain, he likes it when he’s already all but out of his head turned on, and he’s not nearly there. (Though he is thinking about how to possibly use this on later occasions, because unlike a spanking, he knows this won’t trigger any bad memories for Tim.)

This is where years of yoga is coming in to help. He does know how to relax, and hold a position, and take the time to ease into something.

He might not want to, but he certainly can.

“You okay?”

Jimmy’s eyes are closed, but he can feel the way she’s watching him. He nods. “Just getting into it.”

“You don’t have to do this.”

He opens his eyes and smiles at her. “But I want to.”

She wiggles her right hand at him. “We could go back to fingers.”

“I’m good.” He’s about to say something along the lines of she doesn’t need to keep checking in quite this much when he realizes he’s just about all the way down, and by talking to him, she’s getting him focused on something else.

Jimmy decides to get focused on something even better. He leans in forward and kisses Breena.

She’s kissing back, and between lips, and the fact that in this position his dick is slowly dragging over her belly, it doesn’t take too long before he’s starting to feel good.

________________________________________

Going from good to better takes a bit of effort. He’s a medical doctor, so he knows intellectually what he’s attempting to do. Get prostate rubbing up against dildo. It’s not rocket science.

But it’s also the first time he’s done this, and he’s still learning what to do with himself, and with Breena.

She’s stroking his legs and hips, and it’s true, she does have this little circular grind that is a treat. And it’s actually one of those little grinds where she get the angle just right, and suddenly Jimmy’s flying, that puts him on the right track for how to move himself.

The dildo has a bit of a curve, and to take advantage of that, he needs to lean back a little.

And from there Jimmy’s experimenting with rocking his hips, short little thrusts, or long up and
The sweet spot is a combination. If he does a long up and down thrust, there’s this feeling, like… Words don’t do it justice. Like he’s getting fucked through his dick. Like there’s a dick in his dick rubbing his dick from the inside and that… That’s got him gasping.

And it’s got Breena grinning, very lightly stroking her fingers up and down his dick.

Then there’s short little thrust. They rub the tip of the dildo over his prostate, again and again. That makes him feel like he’s cumming. Like each stroke is another pulse on an unending orgasm.

An orgasm coming from inside of him, from getting fucked through his dick.

He’s dripping. A steady stream of pre-cum oozing down his dick, and that’s not… That’s not how sex usually works for Jimmy. Normally, if someone’s playing with his prostate, making him leak like this, his dick is happily located in a warm, wet mouth or pussy. So normally, he can feel the sensation of pulse, that almost cumming surge each time something nudges him, but he doesn’t feel the wet.

But he can now. Each shift he feels another drop, slowly meandering down his dick. He feels the slick, wet trail he’s left on Breena’s belly. He can feel the head of his cock gliding against her. And watch that line of dry skin and wet cum and…

FUCK…

Every shift, every time he pulls up, that little curve just hits him perfectly, and another bit dribbles on out, and he almost wants to just hold there, rocking on that one spot.

Then he wants to slam down, feel that rush through him again, so he does, jerking a little each time he settles himself all the way down before jerking back up again to rock right on that spot.

Breena jacks his cock, smearing that wet all along the length of his dick, slipping up and down and down and up and over and over, and he rocks just a bit, just keeping himself right in that spot, one more slam, down and up really fast, and it’s fucking, fucking flowing through him, inside and out, and then back up again, rocking on that spot and the stars all but dance behind his eyes, God, right there, just, rock, back and forth and up and down, and not a whole lot, when it’s all about his dick he’s trying to keep six inches moving up and back but all he wants right now is, maybe, an inch, maybe two, just, keep… right there… just, a little…

“God…” he’s panting it, over and over, leaning back, hands next to his feet getting just that bit more pressure, as he rocks his hips. Breena knows how to read that expression on his face, eyes closed, jaw tight, head back, and his bowstring tight muscles. She adds just a little more friction, all the way up, all the way down, hand gliding over her dick, just a bit harder and a bit faster.

He crashes down one more time, making his dick feel full to bursting, as her hand flies over him, landing down hard at the same time, and Jimmy shouts, eyes closed, body pulsing, pleasure coursing through him.

For… he doesn’t know how long, he rides the pulses and tingles, aware of spurt after spurt after spurt, and his heart pounding in his chest.

And for a moment after that, there’s Breena’s lips on his, and her hands gently stroking over his arms and back as his heart and breathing slow down.

He untangles himself and collapses after another moment, wet, high as a kite, way more sensitive post-climax than he ever remembers being, and feeling thoroughly fuckered. He can hear Breena doing some clean up, feel her mopping him up some, too, but all he wants to do is lay there and twitch a bit.

After a few seconds she’s back in bed with him, snuggling close, and he turns his face to hers for more lazy kisses.

“You fly?” she asks him.

He kisses back, and peels his eyes open to watch her. She traces her fingers over his cheek and down his throat. His pupils are still wide from the excitement, and his skin is still pink and a bit sweaty. He doesn’t just feel fuckered, he looks it.

Jimmy flashes her a goofy smile, and then says, “Maybe I’m not a bird, but I’m definitely a bat, or… a dragon. Dragons fly, right?”

She kisses him. “Dragons fly.”

“Then we’re dragons.” He giggles. “God, I love flying.”
By the end of the first week, the rumors about what McGee is doing up there in his office are starting to fly.

And Fornell is not in the least surprised when his old partner, Ron Sacks, is lingering at his favorite pastry shop as he gets their morning fuel.

“Tobias! Fancy seeing you here.”

“Yes, I know, it’s deeply surprising to find me here, at the same place I get breakfast, every day, for the last fifteen years.”

Sacks rolls his eyes a bit. “Okay, I should have known better than to try it like that. Though I did want to see you, out of the office.”

Fornell grabs his bag of bear claws, biscotti, and scones, and says, “And here I am, out of the office. What’s up?”

“With me, a whole lot of the usual. What’s up with you? People are getting jittery seeing you closeted away upstairs with McGee.”

Fornell raises an eyebrow. “What sort of jittery?”

“Not sure. Sharpening up resumes, jittery? Looking over past cases, jittery? Everyone saw all of those boxes go into his office, and that’s got everyone nervous.”

Fornell knows that A: Sacks is not telling him everything he knows. B: If he outright lies, Sacks will twig to it, and C: If he lets slip what they’re really doing, that will get preemptive wrongful termination suits in place.

Fornell steps closer to Sacks, and keeps his voice down. “You remember working with McGee?”

“Not really.” Though for the last month he’s been trying. “I know he did some hot shit stuff since we worked ‘together,’ but I don’t really remember him. He sort of blended into the background. Computer guy, right?”

Fornell nods. “Those boxes are employment records. He’s planning on breaking Public Corruption into two major departments. Untouchables and Black Hats.”

Sacks blinks. “I know what an Untouchable is, what’s a Black Hat?”

“Undercover work.”

Sacks nods. Then he quietly says, “Look, this doesn’t go through my boss, but… I look awfully good in a nice suit, you know.”

Fornell smiles. “Yes, you do, and if you want a reference as to your Untouchable qualities, I’ll be happy to give you one.”
"I do."

“I’ll pass the word along.”

Tim’s talking to Burke when Fornell gets in. “So, here’s the deal, right now we’re going through the employment records of the current people in the public corruption department.”

Burke’s eyeing the ‘keep’, ‘fire’, and ‘prosecute’ piles.

“I know what I’m looking for for the keep pile, and they know, too. What I want you to do is start going through the ‘fire’ pile, and see if any of them can be moved to the ‘prosecute’ file.”

She’s smiling at that. “What are we prosecuting them for?”

“I’ve got a meeting with Legal next Wednesday, but for right now, let’s act like we can prosecute them for looking the other way when a hot case falls in their lap.”

“I can do that.”

“Great. But first, paperwork.” He points Burke toward a huge stack of pages, and then says, “Tobias Fornell, this is Melanie Burke.”

Fornell offers his hand, and both of them are a bit wary, until he opens the bag of pastries and says, “I’ve got bear claws, scones, and biscotti, what do you like?”

She grabs a biscotti, and a cup of coffee, and gets to it.

As she’s getting settled, Tobias tells Tim about Sacks.

Tim thinks about Sacks. He’s a good distraction from the pastries Fornell’s laying out on a plate in the middle of his conference table. As he’s doing that, Fornell says to Burke, “Let him know what sort of coffee you like, or, whatever it is you drink, and he’ll make sure there’s some of it for that machine of his.”

“The darkest stuff you can find, and I drink it black.”

Fornell smiles at that. “Oh, Gibbs is going to love you. You weren’t a Marine once upon a time, were you?”

“No.” She’s still a little wary, but looks like she’s trying to relax. Then Ziva, Dave, Gibbs, and Jackson come in, and her eyes open wide. She looks over to Tim. “You work with a baby and a dog?”

“I work with my sister and dad. The baby is hers, and nursing, so he goes where she does, and the dog is a hearing ear dog in training, so he goes all over the place, too.” He turns to Ziva and Gibbs, “Ziva DiNozzo and Jethro Gibbs, this is Melanie Burke.” He looks over to Burke. “Melanie, this is Ziva and Jethro, or Gibbs, he goes by either. The little guy is Dave, and the even littler, furry guy is Jackson.”

Melanie shakes hands, and seeing Ziva, and Dave, seems to have finally eased whatever is making her feel wary. She actually relaxes as she sits back down to fill in more paperwork.
Everyone settled, Tim gets back to thinking about Sacks. He liked rules and laws and doing things by the book.

“How old is he?” Most of the people in the room have no idea what he’s asking about, and Fornell, who could, lost Tim’s train of thought between talking about Sacks and saying hello to everyone. Tim sees the blank looks. “Sacks?”

“Fifty-five,” Fornell says, looking up from tickling Dave’s chin.

“Not ideal.”

“You need team leaders. People with experience.” Fornell gestures to himself and Jethro. Tim gets the message loud and clear.

“Tobias!” A warm and cheery voice says as Fornell’s paying for Friday morning’s Danish and crullers.

“Seeley!” He turns and looks up at the tall man walking toward him. “Lord, man, I haven’t seen you in…”

“Five years.”

That sounds about right. Even though both of them work out of the same main building, the FBI has a lot of people in it, and they don’t usually go bonking into each other.

“What have you been up to?” Like Tobias doesn’t know. He’s getting the sense that as long as he keeps hitting up this shop for morning pastries, he’s going to keep finding people wanting to ‘bump into him’ to ‘chat.’

“Murders, unsolved cases, dead bodies, serial killer hell. The grind.” Seeley waves that off like it’s no big deal, but Fornell’s heard some rumors indicating there have been some very big deals for Agent Booth in the last few years.

Tobias nods. “Been there, done that.”

“Yeah, I know. Look…” Seeley draws a bit closer to Fornell. “Rumor has it you’ve got an in on the new public corruption department.”

“Rumor is correct, assuming you consider sorting through files looking for experience in undercover work an ‘in.’”

“You’re sitting next to the guy running the thing when you do that?” Booth asks.

“I am.”

Booth smiles. “That’s an in.”

“So, what do you want to do with my in?”

Booth grows serious. “I’ve got kids now, and a marriage that can’t take another…” he doesn’t fill in what else his marriage can’t take, but having seen how many law enforcement marriages die on the rocks of bad cases, and some of those rumors he’s heard, Fornell can fill in the blanks. “It sounds like your guy is going to fight the good fight, just a different good fight, and if I can get in on it… It’d be nice not to have psychopaths trying to kill my family, you know?”

Fornell nods. “Oh yeah, I know. But, look, we’re going to be going up against real power here, and those guys… This might not be the safest thing ever.”

Booth shrugs at that. “Nothing in this line is safe. Still, if these guys are in it for the power that probably means they won’t get stupid about what comes up when they’re in the crosshairs. We’re talking fighting with lawyers and blackmail, not guns and blood. My wife would certainly appreciate me getting shot at less, and I wouldn’t mind it, either.”

“I hope. But I can’t guarantee that.”

Booth nods again. “I got it. Still…” Booth’s eyes are far away, and Fornell doesn’t know what case he’s seeing, but he can fill in the blanks with his own personal list of hell cases.

“I’ll put you on the list.”

“Thanks.”

Tim’s looking up from his computer, where he is starting to put out feelers for the kind of computer talent he wants. “Seeley Booth, never heard of him.”

“He’s a good guy. I haven’t worked with him, but I’ve worked with people who have, and they all speak highly of him.”

“Is he an Untouchable or a Black Hat?”

“Probably an Untouchable, but he did spend years mostly working with the guys at the Jeffersonian, so he’s used to not-exactly-FBI-standard methods. You might be able to use him on either side.”

Tim’s nodding. He fires off an email to Jennifer, asking for Booth’s employment records.

Gibbs gets the next of the talent working its way out of the woodwork visits. Monday evening, after another long day of file sorting, he’s heading home, looking forward to dinner, and some quality time with Abbi.

Granted, unlike Fornell, he’s been actively looking for people, putting out feelers for the Untouchable’s team. So, it’s not exactly astounding that someone would seek him out. However, he’d been asking his web of Marine buddies for guys just getting out, straight arrows, young ones, to send to FLETC and turn into agents.

He’s gotten a decent-sized collection of them. Tim may have a bare bones list of people for the Black Hats, but junior Untouchables are coming along nicely. Granted, the Junior Untouchables all have to get through FLETC before they can join up. None of them will be ready to work before January.

He wasn’t expecting to see the man waiting on his doorstep, though, of course, he would have been a link in the chain of friends of friends looking for talent.

“Mac?”

“Hello, Gunny.” Mac Taylor says, standing up, smiling at Gibbs, offering his hand.

Gibbs hugs him, shaking his head. “Lord, it’s been a long time.”

“More than twenty-five years.”

“What’s got you on my doorstep? Last I heard you were… Chicago, right?”

“Ended up in New York.”

Gibbs opens the door and waves him in. Mac’s staring at Jackson, wondering about the little dog. Maybe it’s Kelly’s pet, but… He makes himself apply time to Kelly Gibbs, she’s not seven-years-old anymore, she’s got to be in her thirties now, and likely doesn’t live at home.

Mona, who’s coming over to say hello is much closer to his idea of what sort of a dog Gibbs would have. Mac pats Jackson, and then Mona, as he looks around Gibbs’ home.

Years as a cop means he notices the pictures on the mantle, and seeing them, very quickly comes to the conclusion that he shouldn’t ask about Shannon or Kelly. There’s only one reason why the pictures of them on the mantle match his mental image of them, and it’s not a good one. Maybe, eventually, he will ask, but not now.

“As for why I’m on your doorstep…” he says, scanning the room, getting more of an idea of who ‘Gunny’ became over the years, “You’ve been looking for people to join in on this fancy new anti-corruption department. I’m people.”

Gibbs blinks. “You are.” Mac Taylor, the Mac Taylor he remembers from the six weeks they were together in Beirut, and the six months in Iraq… yeah, he’d be the kind of guy for this team. “What have you been doing for the last twenty-five years?”

“Been with NYPD. Ran their crime lab.”

Gibbs heads into his kitchen. Last he talked to Taylor, he was thinking the Chicago Fire Department, or something like that. Obviously life didn’t take him where he was planning to go. “You still like beer?”

“I still like beer.”

Gibbs grabs two of them, and heads over to Mac, handing him one. Then he nods to one of the pictures of Abby on his mantle. “One of my kids. That one runs the lab for NCIS at the Navy Yard. She’s a great crime fighter, but… I’m not seeing her skills with the computers and test tubes overlapping with what we’re talking about doing.”

Mac sips his BlueMoon and looks at the picture. It’s Abby in the lab, working away. He also noticed Gibbs referring to her as one of the kids, and that’s got him wondering. But, that’s not the topic they’re talking about right now. “There are shots of me in the lab coat, too. And I do know my way around a test tube, but for NYPD, I was a field officer, too. I did crime scene work, chasing down bad guy work, all of it.”

Gibbs eyes Mac. He’s a bit younger than Gibbs is, but not a ton. He’s got the same white hair. The same lean-and-keeping-in-shape-but-fighting-time physique that Gibbs is working himself back to.
But his eyes are still sharp, and he looks like he’s able to work.

“What’s mandatory retirement age for NYPD?”

“I’m not that old, Gunny.” But he’s not that young, and he knows it. “But that’s part of what’s got me thinking. I got married again…” He stops, realizing that Gibbs missed out on Claire. Gibbs gives him a soft smile. They’ll catch up properly before this is done. He’s thinking a few steaks on the fire with Mac and Abbi sounds like a good night. “I still need to do something. Need to protect and serve. But I want to be able to spend time with her, too. And…” He pats his chest. Gibbs was there when he took that hit. He’s got more than a few of those scars, too. “I don’t bounce back as quick as I used to. But I can run a team like no one’s business. My department did their job, on time, and under budget. And I can hunt down leads. And I can, and will, enjoy hanging the guys who abuse their positions up by their entrails.”

Gibbs grins at that. “How long are you in DC?”

“A few days.”

Gibbs touches the photo of Abby. Tim’s in the background of that shot, working on the computer behind her. “That’s the one running the show. I’ll make sure you get to meet him.”

“Thanks.” Mac steps closer to the mantelpiece. “Okay, I see piles of kids here. Who’s who?”

Tim opens the file on Mac Taylor, spends five seconds glancing at it, and says, “Any job he wants, he can have.”

Gibbs smiles at that. “He probably wants to stay in New York.”

“I need someone in charge of my New York branch of the Untouchables.”

Fornell doesn’t recognize the next one. But she, apparently, knows him.

“Agent Fornell.” Her voice is low, deep for a woman, and… He’s surprised by the combination of accents, she sounds… almost… not Mexican… but south of the border somewhere… with a foundation of West Virginia.

Everything about her oozes class and taste. From her cream silk dress, to the elegant teardrop pearl earrings, to her perfume, which whispers around him with a haunting melody, she’s the physical embodiment of style.

He can’t imagine why he doesn’t know her. He’s fairly sure a woman like that would stay in his mind forever, but… He’s drawing a blank.

“Hello.” She offers her hand and he shakes it. For a second, he wants to kiss her hand, and he almost blushes at that impulse. “I’m sorry, you’ve got me at a disadvantage.”

She waves that off, perfectly manicured fingers gently flicking his words away. “We only worked together once. You were still a new agent.”
“Ah.” That’s not helping at all. Other than telling him that if he was a new agent, it would have to have been back in the early nineties or late eighties. He tries to erase time, rewind the gray strands from her auburn hair, sharpen the time-softened curves of her face, but he can’t see her. Can’t attach this woman, here, now, to any sort of past, let alone a past as an FBI Agent.

“A drug raid that went bad. The woman used an infant as a human shield.”

Fornell nods, slowly. He remembers that case. He was new. Not brand new, but far enough down the food chain that his job was to linger on the outskirts keeping eyes on the situation.

He doesn’t remember her, and he feels like he would. Her hair would have been red then, deep russet, maybe, clear blue-gray eyes, the little beauty mark high on her cheek… Add that to her style, and any straight man with a pulse should remember her. But he doesn’t.

“I got called into that one last minute,” and he had, someone had called in sick that day, so he was up, “they needed an extra person to blend in and keep eyes on the street, and grabbed me.”

The woman nods at that, and then she clasps his hand, offering him a thumb drive. “Much of this is old. Most of it you can’t use in court. Some of it you shouldn’t admit to having. But I imagine your department will find it… interesting.”

Then she steps away from him, heading to a table where an elderly man, white-haired, with a gaze that makes Fornell feel not just naked, but dissected, in an impeccably crisp linen shirt, sips a coffee. He stands up and offers her his arm, as he dons a fedora at a jaunty angle, a moment later, they both amble out of the coffee shop.

It’s a good two minutes later, as he’s taking his bag of pastries from the Barista, when Tobias feels the ice shoot down his back as he remembers who she is. The hair on the back of his neck literally rises when he puts the beauty mark, except it wasn’t a beauty mark; it was a powder burn, a powder burn earned shooting blindly, in a basement, with her gun too close to her face, to a name.

He looks around, frantically, to see if she’s still near, or, and he shudders, if her companion has lingered.

No. His shoulders slump as he feels like he can breathe again. For the moment. He knows he’s going to be looking over his shoulder for a long time. He knows he’s never setting foot in this coffee shop again. He’s also fairly certain he and Wendy are moving, as soon as possible.

He was new agent, barely involved in that shoot, but it went bad, and he had to give testimony as to what happened. One of the lead Agents was a woman, with red hair, and a powder burn on her face, that looked like a beauty mark. She shot a drug dealer, who was using an infant as cover, and that was the last domino that had to knock over to send her to the dark side.

His hand is shaking as he looks at the thumb drive Clarice Starling, formerly of the FBI, currently, and for the last twenty years, on their most wanted list, has handed him.

He remembers the elderly man who walked out with her, and prays that he was properly polite.

It’s about half an hour later when Fornell gets to Tim’s office. He’s there, so are Gibbs and Ziva, but Burke isn’t.
Fornell carefully takes the thumb drive out of his pocket, and places it on Tim’s desk, before rooting around in one of Tim’s drawers for the latex gloves. He tosses them to Tim and nods to the thumb drive. “Treat it like it’s made of nuclear waste. Get it onto a computer, and then that goes into evidence.”

“Fornell?”

He shakes his head.

“I don’t want to know what’s in there, and you don’t want to know who gave it to me. Just get the intel, wipe the drive clean, really clean, not they-can-find-the-data-again-later clean, and stick it in an envelope. I’ve got to see… God, Crawford’s been dead for decades; I’m not sure who even gets this case now.”

Gibbs and Ziva are staring at him.

“Is this like Tim’s ‘college buddy?’” Ziva asks, watching Fornell walk across the room, and begin rooting around in the cabinet under the coffee maker, where Tim keeps the extra coffee.

“Do you have any alcohol in here?”

Tim shakes his head.

“Why not?”

“Because I don’t drink on the job. Who gave this to you?”

Fornell shakes his head again. “She’s supposed to be dead. He is, too. And we’re all better off if they go back to being dead.”

“Uh…” Tim’s staring at the thumb drive, as he crosses his office, opens up the closet, and grabs one of his disposable netbooks.

Gibbs is staring at Fornell, never having seen him look so shaken, and Fornell’s dealt with some seriously messed up people over the years.

“Someone step on your grave?” Burke asks, walking in.

Fornell nods slowly. “Yeah! That’s a way of putting it.” He swallows, hard. “I’m going to get a bottle of scotch.” He points to the thumb drive. “Don’t touch it. Just grab what’s on it, make sure whatever that is is safe, wipe it clean, and put it in an envelope. I’ll… try to figure out what to do with it. The Behavioral Sciences Unit has to have someone lurking about still interested in them.”

“Wait, is it a she, or a them?” Burke asks.

“It’s a mess, and one all of you are blind, deaf, and dumb about, okay?”

No one’s ever seen Fornell this serious, except Gibbs, and the only time he’s seen this kind of energy off of Fornell, it was when Emily was in danger.

That gets several okays, as Fornell stalks off, Gibbs a few steps behind him, in search of a bottle.
“So, what’s on there?” Burke asks, as she and Ziva hover behind Tim, while he goes through the files on the drive.

They can all read, so it doesn’t take too long to come to the same conclusion.

“I guess if the people we’re investigating are the Powers That Be, these are the Powers That Were,” Tim says.

Ziva’s eyes are flicking over the screen. “There is nothing in here from after 2010.”

Tim keeps scanning. “Most of them are from before ’95.”

“Are these… medical files?” Burke asks, looking at the headers of some of the files.

“Psych evals,” Tim says, opening one up, eyes scanning the page, quickly. “Oh… Uh…” He closes it fast. He doesn’t recognize the name, but he’s awfully sure he doesn’t have the legal right to read privileged medical files, not of private citizens, not without a warrant. “I don’t think we’re supposed to be reading this stuff.”

“Nuclear waste…” Ziva says, copying Fornell. “I’ll take the list of names and find out who’s dead and who’s getting paid by the government. We can read those files…”

Tim sighs. That works for him. “And we can go from there.” He gently removes the thumb drive from his computer, lays it on the magnet he keeps precisely for this reason, letting it scramble whatever might be on it, and slips it into an envelope.

“Come on, the scotch is at my place. You’re shot right now. I’ll drive.” Gibbs shepherds Fornell into his car, and gets the engine on, and running, before giving Fornell a long look.

Fornell sits there, gently stroking Jackson, eyes far away.

After a minute, he says, “You weren’t on the job yet, not when this stuff went big. You were still off getting shot at in the desert. There was this agent, and she made a big name for herself hunting down a real psycho. Like, remember that case we worked on where the wife was killing people, but we found the victims’ toes in the husband’s stomach?”

Gibbs nods.

“Yeah, okay, that guy, times ten.”

He winces.

“She pissed a lot of people off with that. That big name, she made it as a trainee, and… It was the eighties, and a lot of the higher ups did not want to see a pretty, young woman knock it out of the ballpark. Especially not on a case a lot of experienced men had been stalling out on for years. A lot of them had a vested interest in making sure women failed as agents. So, when she knocked it out of the ballpark, they stuffed her in a corner and made sure no light would ever shine on her again.

“Anyway, to catch Mr. Psycho, she had to hook up with Dr. Even Worse Psycho, and in the course of catching Mr. Psycho, Dr. Even Worse Psycho got free.”
Gibbs is glaring at the road as he hears this. “She in on it?”

“Maybe? I don’t know. She stayed with the Bureau for years after Dr. Psycho went free. After a few years, the higher ups really screwed her over, and Dr. Even Worse Psycho, who apparently decided he liked her, or something, went after them. He caught the guy who’d fucked her career, cut his head open, took his brain out, and cooked it, and ate it, while he was alive. Tied the guy up at the dinner table and cooked his fucking brain in front of him.” Fornell shivers. He hadn’t been on that case, either, but one of his friends had been, and… There wasn’t enough alcohol on earth to erase the image of what they walked in on when they found Lecter’s house.

“She had vanished before that. But, from the prints, she was at the meal, too. That was back in ’93, and no one has seen them since. And we like it that way.”

Gibbs rubs his face.

“Dr. Even Worse Psycho, he… If you pissed him off, if you were ‘rude,’ he’d hunt your ass down and… God… One guy. He cut his back open, pulled his lungs out, and then tied him up like some kind of angel or something. Used his lungs as fucking wings!” Fornell shudders. “Decades. They’ve been looking for them for decades, and they’re just sitting in a coffee shop, tuned into the grapevine well enough to know who I am and hand me a Goddamn thumb drive!”

Fornell’s shaking his head.

“Every agency has horror stories. I know that, but ours… Shit, like she said, I even worked a case with her. Her last real case. Drug bust, went bust, she ended up shooting a woman, who was using a baby as a human shield… I testified about that.”

“What’d you say?” Gibbs asks.

“The truth, I was two streets away, watching the traffic flow, making sure no one unexpected was about to show up. I didn’t say Boo about her. I didn’t know her. I know the guy who was running the review, the guy who had his brain cooked, had a hard on for getting her out of the FBI, but if I’d lied, and if her people had seen it, they would have been free to start asking me about why I wasn’t at my post, and no matter how many times I got asked if I’d seen anything I wasn’t about to say yes.”

“If they’ve been gone since ’93… What could they have?”

“Lord alone knows. He was a hot shot psychiatrist back in the day. He’s probably got dirt on everyone who was anyone in the DC area from back in the ‘70s and ‘80s. Might be useless now. Might have information on how things that are biting us in the ass now got set up. I don’t know. I don’t want to know. I’m passing that on, and that’s that. I’m done.”

“You need to watch your ass on this?”

“God…” Fornell shuts his eyes and lets his head drop against the headrest of the truck’s seat. “I don’t… It’s… I don’t know. Twenty-four years of nothing. We figured they were dead. But… Obviously, not. So… Hiding out? Found a place that didn’t notice when the locals got murdered and turned into corpse art?”

“Quit?”

“Serial killers don’t just quit.” Fornell stares out the window. “Her accent sounded Spanish… He was tan. Maybe they’ve been in Guatemala or something.”

“Even Guatemala notices serial killers,” Gibbs says, quietly. “If they’ve been completely under the radar for twenty years, they move way too often to get caught, or they quit.”

Fornell looks out the window as Gibbs pulls them into his driveway.

It’s later that afternoon when Tim gets one who actually made an appointment.

Like the last time, he’s hijacked Jennifer’s office. His team is slowly beating the employment files into submission, but slowly is the operative word there, especially with no one actually working on them today (Burke’s on prosecute, so making no headway on new files, and Ziva’s searching the names on the thumb drive they just got) and he doesn’t want to move them around too much.

Another tall, thin, gray haired detective. This one has glasses, almost too big for his face, and a pronounced ‘New York’ style of speech.

“Sergeant Munch, it’s nice to meet you.”

Munch nods, and shakes Tim’s hand. “Good to meet you, Director McGee.”

Tim offers coffee, and Munch takes one.

“When my secretary said you wanted to meet, I did my homework. What does a retired NYPD Sergeant, specializing in murder, sex crimes, and conspiracy theories want with me?”

Munch looks pleased to see Tim looked him up. “A job.”

Tim thinks about that. He couldn’t find a birthday for Munch, someone went to some trouble to hide that, but his employment records with the Baltimore PD go back to 1972. If he joined the Baltimore PD right out of high school that puts him at sixty-three, but he looks older than that.

“As what?”

“Anything. You name the job in law enforcement, and I’ve done it. I’d likely be most useful these days finding connections. Give me case files, and I can pull out the threads that wind everyone together.”

Tim’s nodding. He can see how that would be useful. And, as he thinks about it, he can also probably find more than a few opportunities for a ‘retired NYPD’ officer to go into something and worm out a few bad guys.

“How do you feel about going undercover as yourself?”

Munch is curious about that idea. “How undercover can it be if I’m being me?”

Tim smiles at that. He’s writing down Karningham’s number on a card for Munch. “I’m going to have a collection of people whose entire job is to find public officials, and tempt them into breaking the law. Think you’d be good at that?”

“You mean, instead of piecing the conspiracy together from clues, I’d… go undercover and be part of it?”

“I’d like you to do both. Find the clues, figure out where they point, and then you’d hunt them down and worm your way in, or maybe even start a few from scratch. And yes, you’d definitely be bringing them to light.”

Munch grins, widely, as Tim passes him the card. “That’s Walter Karningham’s number. He’s the one who is working on designing that half of the public corruption department. Give him a call and have a chat. If you want adjunct work, undercover and keeping track of people, you can do that just fine. If you want a badge to go with what you’re doing, all those years as a cop won’t matter, you’ve still got to get through FLETC.”

Munch nods. “I’ll talk with Karningham, and see what he’s thinking about.”

With the addition of a shot of scotch, and then another one, some time playing toss the ball around with Mona, one more shot, a few more rounds of toss the ball around, calling Wendy, making sure she’s okay, and talking a bit more about the horror story the Lecter case had been, Fornell starts to come back to himself.

Eventually, he and Gibbs get back to the office, and while Gibbs continues along on the employment files, Fornell goes hunting around to figure out who he should be giving that thumb drive to.

Apparently, back in 2000, the Behavioral Sciences Unit became the Behavioral Analysis Unit. He calls down and says the magic words, “Hannibal Lecter sighting.” That kicks the hornet’s nest, and within a minute he’s looking at…

“Good God, you’re even younger than Skippy,” he nods at Tim, letting the sweater-clad not quite teenager in front of him, know who Skippy is.

“That’s Director Skippy, to you,” Tim adds dryly. “Unless you want to go back to your paperwork.”

Fornell shudders again, but this time it’s not real. “They said they were sending Dr. Reid up.”

Reid, who’s done this more times than he can count, says, “I am Dr. Reid.” He looks at Tim, “And, it’s extremely likely I’m within two years of the same age as Director McGee.”

Fornell and Gibbs share a look about a world filled with babies, but neither of them has to say anything.

Tim offers his hand. “We’re a bit informal up here, and he’s having a bad day. Welcome, Dr. Reid.”

Reid nods at that. “Director McGee. Agent Fornell said there was word of Dr. Lecter.”

As Tim hands over the envelope with the thumb drive, Fornell gets Reid up to date. He ends with, “I don’t know for certain that the man was Lecter, but the woman was Agent Starling, and unless she’s got a collection of old guys who can take a person apart with a look, that had to be Lecter with her.”

Reid’s listening, holding the envelope, thinking about it. “We’ve had a few cases over the years, all secondhand, none of them in the United States, which looked similar to the Chesapeake Reaper. But we never had enough information to confirm that it might have been him. And they always got to us well after they happened.”

“Spain?” Fornell asks.
“One of them. Buenos Aries, Santiago, Mexico City… Every major city in Latin America with a first rate opera and ballet. Never more than one or two victims. Not enough to make a pattern. And nothing in the last five years.” Reid’s voice gets very dry. “It’s almost as if he’s got someone with an intimate understanding of how law enforcement works along for the ride, now.”

“If it was Lecter, he’s… got to be getting close to ninety now,” Fornell adds. “Maybe even serial killers eventually get too old for it.”

“Perhaps,” Reid says. He holds the envelope, looking quite thoughtful. “We’ll get a BOLO out, and see if any of the cameras near the café were working.” He sighs. “After last fall, almost none of the surveillance equipment in DC works anymore. May I ask what’s on the thumb drive?”

“Nothing, now,” Tim says. “Its contents are classified. The drive itself isn’t. You’re welcome to anything it can tell you.”

“The contents could tell us where they are, or will be.” Reid looks annoyed at having lost what was in that little bit of metal and plastic, and Tim sympathizes. If he had been handed this dead thumb drive, he’d be ready to pounce on it the second Abby got done with trace. He doesn’t know if Dr. Reid has a computer guy in the wings, but he’s going to be pretty disappointed when he tries to get what’s on here.

“I understand, but, literally, you can’t use them. They were medical records; and we have neither permission from their owners nor a subpoena for them. None of them from after 2010. We’re hunting down which people are dead, and which ones work for the government, when we find that out, I’ll send you what’s in there.”

Fornell says, “We might still have the hard copies of some of what’s on there. When we raided his place on the Chesapeake, we found his medical records. But God alone knows where he’s trying to point us with this.”

Reid stands up, ready to head back to his unit. “That is the question now, isn’t it? Where is he pointing you? Why you?”

Fornell feels the shiver of those questions. “Trust me, I know.”

Tim’s the last one to leave that night. He spends a moment staring around his office, thinking, I’ve got everyone from ex-NYPD to serial killers offering me help. Either I’m doing something very right, or very wrong here.

He pulls on his jacket, checks his piece, with news of Lecter on the loose, he’s feeling a bit more secure with a gun on him, even if it is just for the walk from his office to his car in the parking garage, and then locks up.

As he heads off, he hopes he’s doing something very right.

Chapter End Notes
:) I had a lot of fun with this one.

It may be obvious to some of you, but maybe not so much to some others, that I'm using Hannibal and Clarice from the books, and not the TV show. If you haven't read the Silence of the Lambs books, go find a copy, they're awesome.

Also, I love the idea of Criminal Minds, but it's too grim for me to watch more than an episode or two at a time. So, I LOVE the idea of setting the BAU against Lecter, (Seriously Drs. Reid and Lecter, together! Mad fangirl squeeing!) but I don't have the time, or level of detail to write it. That said, if any of the rest of you do... PLEASE!

I hope this was fun for the rest of you, too.

And no, that's not the only cameos of other beloved law types, just the ones who are popping up now. :)}
Honestly... If you're feeling really emotionally unstable because of the election, you might want to skip this one and likely the next one. They aren't exactly apolitical or fluffy and uplifting.

More notes at the end getting into the nitty gritty, details. I can back up the shit I'm dishing out, though I wish I could have kept this all in the land of pure fiction.

There are moments of putting together this new team that make Tim feel really great. Like he’s on top of the world and making a real difference.

Like there’s a shot of actually cleaning out the bad apples.

And then there are days like Wednesday.

He’s finally gotten a chance to sit down with one of the guys from legal, and he’s got a very straightforward question for him. Several of them.

“Just to check, anything we talk about is in confidence, right?” Tim asks after Harold Kane offers him a cup of coffee and makes sure he’s comfortable in his office, a space filled with legal books, most of which Tim assumes have never been opened.

“Right.” Kane isn’t the top of the FBI’s legal talent, but he’s in the top five. He’s in his late fifties, a bit plump, with sharp gray eyes, short gray hair, impossibly white and straight teeth, and a tan that looks a tad deeper than necessary.

“Even from other members of the FBI.”

“Without your express permission, I can’t talk about any of this to anyone, even my assistant.”

Tim smiles. “Excellent.” He sips his coffee. “As you know, I’m reworking the Public Corruption Department, and I’m hoping to make a definitive statement about how things are going to change around here.”

Harold nods, sipping his coffee.

“Going through the employment files, and the cases these people worked on, I’m noticing a pattern. Very high visibility cases, whether they were embarrassing or not, got investigated. Anything that wouldn’t make the front page of the New York Times, though, if it was embarrassing, it just got dropped. I don’t mean covered up, or anything like that, the cases got logged, the investigator noted he had received them, and then they died.”

Harold nods again. “And your question?”

“Is that legal?”
“Of course.” He sips his coffee, looking Tim over, surprised that Tim would even ask. “You were a field agent not that long ago, correct?”

Tim agrees.

“You have more cases come in than you can possibly investigate, so the high priority ones get attention, the lower priority ones get mothballed for your non-existent free time.”

“NCIS made sure to investigate anything that crossed our path.”

There’s a smile in Harold’s eyes; he’s clearly looking at Tim like he’s hopelessly naïve.

“Ah. Yes, well, technically, the FBI claims that, too. But… Cases get old, they go cold, more important cases pop up,” Harold gestures, indicating ‘what can you do?’ “And sometimes something falls through the cracks. It happens. And it is entirely legal. This has gone up against the courts on the state and federal levels, and there is no requirement that any level of law enforcement actually investigate or involve themselves in any sort of crime.”

Tim sighs at that. “So, you call 911, begging for the help, the cops don’t show, you can’t sue them.”

“Exactly. And it’s the same for us.”

Tim sighs louder and longer. “Okay, do we have any regulations requiring that our people investigate every crime?”

“Yes—” Tim starts to light up. “But, in this case ‘investigate’ means the crime gets logged, handed off to an investigator, and that’s it.”

Tim slumps. “So, I’ve got people burying cases of corruption for decades, and I can’t fire them for it?”

“Were they getting paid or receiving any benefits for ignoring those cases?”

“Keeping their supervisor happy? Getting good performance reviews? People who kept investigating anything handed to them tended to get transferred out of Public Corruption.”

Harold’s shaking his head. “You might, possibly, if there was a direct, ‘you will look the other way’ order involved, have a case against the supervisor. But, if it was a matter of unspoken understanding that certain cases don’t get rigorously investigated, then no, you’ve got no case.”

“I don’t have anything like that. Their job was public corruption, and they were just… letting them get away with it. There’s nothing I can do about them?”

“Were they investigating other crimes?”

“Yes.”

Harold shakes his head. “No, you only have cause to fire if they don’t investigate anything, or if they were specifically told to work on a case and didn’t, or were specifically told to not work on a case.”

“What about the Boss who only promotes the guys who look the other way? He doesn’t specifically say anything, but he rewards less than vigorous investigation techniques.”

“Is anyone telling him to do it? Is he getting anything for it?”

“Not that I can prove.”
“Is he directly telling any of his people to only prosecute certain cases?”

“No.”

Harold shakes his head. “As a supervisor or director, at the FBI, you can promote anyone who does well on their evals and works cases in the manner you think most appropriate.”

“Shit.” Tim says it quietly, but it’s clear from the look on his face that this is not making him happy. “So… I can’t get rid of these people?”

Harold settles back into his chair, holding his coffee cup. “Not for this.”

Back in his office, with the rest of his team, Tim says to Fornell, “I don’t suppose the FBI has…” he glances at the fire pile, which grows higher and higher every day, “more than 250 punishment positions.”

Fornell shakes his head. There are more desirable posts and less desirable posts. There are extremely undesirable posts, but they don’t have a place to stick 250 guys. Let alone the six hundred they expect to have by the end of this. “No. I take it you didn’t get the answer you wanted?”

Tim slumps down into the seat next to Gibbs, and then grabs one of the Danish that Fornell brought in today. He takes a bite, chewing thoughtfully. “These are from somewhere new, aren’t they?”

Fornell nods. “You think I’m going back after they found me?”

“Good point.”

“You’re stalling,” Ziva says, and Burke, who isn’t quite clear what level of interaction she’s supposed to have with Tim, nods tentatively.

“It’s think about… what is this, almond cream?” Tim’s eyeing the bit of Danish he hasn’t eaten.

“Yeah.”

“It’s think about almond cream Danish, or the fact that I, apparently, can’t get rid of these twits.” He scowls, chewing angrily. “No, it’s not illegal to look the other way. No, looking the other way isn’t even cause to fire someone. No, there’s nothing you can do about a Boss who only promotes the guys who look the other way. And there’s nothing you can do about the bright boys who notice the guys who look the other way get promoted, so they do it themselves. Not only is none of it illegal, it’s not even against the FBI’s internal rules. As long as no one out and out said, ‘Don’t investigate X,’ there’s nothing I can do with them.”

“Change the rules,” Gibbs says.

“Yeah,” Tim sighs, not sure how to do that.

“Apply the headslap, Tim, make them ashamed of what they did, and a bunch of them may come around,” Gibbs says.

Tim sighs at that, too. The headslap he had intended to apply to them, loudly, and with much vigor, just got yanked out of his hands. “The entire country headslapped these assholes last year,” but it sounds flat as he says it.
“Slapped them as a group,” Ziva says. “You slap them personally. Shame isn’t motivating for groups. They can all hide behind each other, claim it wasn’t them, but the other guys, but for individual people…”

He nods, and again sighs; he’s got to get a new plan in place. Before he gets thinking about that, he notices the way Burke is watching him. Tim doesn’t get the sense that Burke often finds herself in a situation where she’s not sure what to do. But right now, she looks like she’s not sure.

“Go ahead and say it. I might not like it, but you won’t get a headslap for it.”

“We’re talking about metaphorical headslaps, right?” Burke asks.

The other four exchange glances as Tim says, “When they come from me, yes.”

“Ah… Well… If you want the headslap to matter, then you need to start at the top.”

“That’s what we’re working on,” Tim gestures to the files. They’re starting to move from middle management into upper middle management these days.

Burke looks confused. She knows for a fact that the person she’s talking about doesn’t have a file in this pile. “No. I mean the top. Comey.”

The other four of them glance at each other, not sure where she’s going with this.

Burke starts to look exasperated. It’s fairly clear no one at this table knows what she’s talking about. “Were you all under a rock last July?”

“I was in the hospital, then home recovering from more broken bones than you can count, and on a boat load of painkillers. Those two were starting to get into the conspiracy that unraveled in the fall, and Fornell was getting married. What happened last summer that we weren’t paying attention to?”

Burke continues to look exasperated as she grabs her phone, goes hunting along on it, and then plays Comey’s press conference from July, 5 2016.

He doesn’t look away from the tiny screen, but Tim knows all four of them don’t like what they’re seeing. Everything Comey’s saying is bad, everything he’s mentioned would get any one of them tossed in prison for years. For Tim specifically, who has broken some of the laws around these laws with his hacking adventures, Leon’s get-out-of-jail-free card has meant that if they got caught, Leon would go to jail for what he was doing. And, if they got caught, Tim wouldn’t have been prosecuted, but he’d have been fired and lost his security clearance, likely before they finished figuring out what stuff he’d lifted, from say, the CIA.

Classified stuff is classified, and you don’t mess around with it.

When they get to the bit where Comey says, “To be clear, this is not to suggest that in similar circumstances, a person who engaged in this activity would face no consequences…” all of them wince.

Once it’s done, Tim says, “So, look the other way came from the top down.” He fires off an email, his personal account to Comey’s asking for a meeting.

Two days later, he’s got it.
Having talked to Legal, Tim’s coming to the conclusion that the laws against Public Corruption are somewhat lacking in rigor. He’s not entirely certain that this is true, or if it’s just here at the FBI.

But, if there’s anyone he can talk to, off the record, who likely knows how to work those laws…

He punches up the number, and in a moment has a friendly voice on the other line, “Timothy!”

“Hi, Senior. Are you anywhere near DC?” Ever since his and Delphine’s place in DC went up in flames, they’ve been spending more and more of their time abroad, or in other parts of the country, scouting land deals for future seats of the new government. Last he heard from his grandmother, they’re staying in New York until the next Presidential cycle, when they’ll be moving to Chicago.

“Not right now, Tim. We’re in Barbados.”

“Then I’ll have to owe you the coffee. Can we talk?”

“Sure. What’s got you calling? Is everything okay?” Senior can tell by Tim’s voice that nothing is wrong in the sense of someone being ill or hurt, so he doesn’t sound urgent as he says ‘everything okay?,’ just mildly concerned.

“Somewhat. And…” He realizes that, ‘Could you talk me through how this corruption game usually works?’ might be a tad insulting if gone at the wrong way. “I need to ask you about something, because I think you have a pretty good idea how it works, and… I don’t want to sound insulting, but… It’s kind of sticky.”

Senior laughs at that. “Oh my.”

Tim sighs. “I’ve had the Public Corruption department for almost a month now, and I’ve gotten to talk to my legal guys and… It’s pretty clear the public corruption laws are written to catch only the most blatantly stupid people. The guys who can’t walk and chew gum at the same time. And at the very least, I want to tighten up my internal rules on this, so um… if you wanted to… bribe someone… or get them to do an inappropriate favor for you…” He feels like his foot is a mile deep into his mouth. “How would you do it?”

Senior laughs again. “Junior’s got you thinking I might be the kind of person who knows how to do that?”

Tim cringes. He doesn’t want to throw Tony under the bus on that. “More a longstanding prejudice against people with lots of money who wear good suits all the time.”

“Uh huh…” He hears Senior sigh. “Well, Tim, let’s start at the very beginning. By the time you get to my level, and that’s generally deals in the ten to fifty million dollar range, no one ever pays bribes. Like you said, the only people doing it are too stupid to walk and chew gum. And, just as a side note, Junior’s been telling me about you ‘Black Hats,’ and if any of them attempt to flat out bribe someone who’s higher up the food chain the county dog walker, they will immediately shut the conversation down, and likely call the cops to report your Black Hat because we all know that’s not how the game is played.”

So much for that plan. “So, tell me how to play the game.”

“First question, who are we playing with? For example, I have no idea what to do if I wanted an individual FBI employee to do something.”

“Okay. Who do you normally play with? Tell me how the game works for them.”
“I usually work real estate, but I did some work with the ACA as well, on behalf of some drug manufactures, and that got me involved with some big names. First things first, you cannot make someone act against his own interest. That’s why bribes do not work. If you offer a bribe, you are trying to get something to do something that could hurt him, and you will fail. So, step one of the game, find someone who is of the same mindset you are. Someone who already wants to do what you want to do.

“If I were working a real estate deal, I’d go looking for the City Council member who’s big on development and bringing in new construction jobs, and likely the one who has ties to the local electrical, construction, and plumbing unions if we’re in a Union town. He and I will get together, and we’ll have a chat about my project. I’ll point out how good it’ll be for him and his constituents.

“He’ll generally agree with me about this, because I’ve made the case that this is the kind of project that will make the people who give him a lot of money happy. If he’s in a Union town, I’ve already had a chat with the head of the Electricians, Plumbers, and Construction Locals, and promised them that I’ll only use their labor for the project.

“At some point in this conversation, he may mention his charitable work. That mention will flow naturally, because we’re talking about how what I want to do will improve the community, and he’ll mention how he’s working to make things better, too. We’ll agree about this, too. And because we’re agreeable guys working together for a common goal, this charity will be doing something I and my people will approve of, and it will be, at least tangentially, related to what we’re talking about doing. So, for this kind of thing, it might be an organization that helps high school drop outs get trained in the building trades, or something like that.

“In most cases, that charitable organization he’ll mention really does do some sort of good thing. It will also donate money to his campaign, and to the campaigns of the men who help support him. It’s possible his kids, grandkids, or nephews and nieces will have a cushy job with said charity, too. Maybe his wife will be on the board. Maybe he’s on the board. All of that will be true, but it will also be true that there are going to be large, visible projects with that charity’s name on it.

“Now, after we’ve had our meeting, my corporation, which has a charitable giving department, will give that charity a sizeable donation. My corporation will also donate the largest legal amount to his re-election campaign and the re-election campaigns of everyone he works with who shares his views. Back when we had political parties, we’d give them a huge donation, too, and generally there was no limit on how much we could give the party.”

Tim’s listening, nodding along, jotting down notes.

“But what you have to realize is, I’m not bribing him. It’d be stupid for me to even try. I’ve picked someone who already wants to do what I want him to do, and I’m helping him stay in power so he can keep doing what he wants to do. He wants my continued support, so he’ll kick me the occasional useful tidbit, like letting me know when the building inspector is on the way, and making sure I get the permits I need, because he knows I’ll be properly appreciative of it.”

“So, say you want a… I don’t know… lower tax bracket…”

“Again, it’s not a bribe. If there’s no tax break already on the horizon, I may, some afternoon when we’re playing golf, mention that other cities have ‘economic enterprise zones’ or something like that. I will never ask him to make one. I won’t even suggest that I want one. I will point out how well they work for the places that have them. And, he may, if it’s to his advantage, see about getting my building listed as part of said zone. But, only if it’s to his advantage.”

“And if it’s not, you won’t ask him to do it, because you’ve already got a pretty sweet deal with “him?”

“Exactly.”

Tim growls. “Okay, up the ladder. How’d the ACA deal work?”

“Similarly. Drug manufacturers want to make money on their products. Easiest way to do that is for them to have a lock on the market. The fewer people selling a sleep aid, or decongestant, or whatever, the more likely you are to buy their decongestant.”

Tim’s following along with that. “Senators don’t make decisions like that, right?”

“No, they don’t. This is the kind of case where you move up and down the chain. Up the chain, you find your Congressman or Senator who is interested in medical issues. Find the one who has a point of view amenable to whatever it is you want. In this sort of case, you wanted someone who really liked the ACA.”

“Why?”

“Because he’d be the guy who helped get it passed, and once it passed, you could go down the chain.”

“What’s down the chain?”

“Down the chain is a guy at a desk. It’s his job to decide which drugs go on the list of medications ACA compliant plans have to cover. The Senator will have an Aide, that Aide will know who’s on the committee to decide what drugs will be on the formulary. You and yours will never have direct access to him, but that Senator’s Aide may say something nice to him about how cost effective and reliable your drug is, but she will never ever suggest said drug should go on the formulary, or that other, similar drugs, shouldn’t. If you’ve done your legwork, and been properly attentive to the Senator’s pet charities and re-election plans, you may find your drug on the list.”

“Okay, why do you do this? You don’t work for or with a drug company.”

“Because I don’t work for the drug company. I don’t talk to the Senator, either. I talk to his wife, or nephew, or a few of his buddies and I get together at a bar or a show. Maybe I’m on the same jet his wife is on as we go to Paris. People like me plant ideas. People like them know who those ideas are supposed to get to.”

Tim growls again.

“Bad case, Tim?”

Tim shakes his head, but Senior can’t see that. “Just human nature.” There’s no way to write the law so likeminded individuals can’t work together to make the world look the way they want it to. That’s politics at its most basic. That’s the point of politics.

Move that idea around and… Most people who work for groups like the FBI have a certain set of preferences, about politics, and how they want their jobs to work, and… And if turning a blind eye to certain cases kept them safe and comfy in their own chairs, keeps the money flowing, and makes people think well of the right people…

No one would need to say anything. They’d ignore cases like that because investigating them wouldn’t be in their own best interest.
“That’s how it works, Tim.”

“Thanks, Senior. At some point, would you be interested in sitting down with my Black Hats and having a chat with them?”

He can feel the wide smile on the other end of the phone. “I’d be delighted to.”

---

“You know why I’m here?” Tim asks when he heads in to see Comey on Friday.

“Weekly update?”

Tim shakes his head. “I’ve been going through everyone who worked for the Public Corruption department, sorting them into three piles: keep, fire, prosecute. Nine out of ten of the employee files I touch involve someone who was happy to look the other way. A case would come up, they’d take it, glance at it, see who was involved, and if the right people were involved, that case would go into the ‘I’ll get around to it shortly after Hell freezes over’ pile. I tossed those people into the fire or prosecute pile. As I’ve been doing this, I’ve talked to our legal department. They tells me that I cannot fire, nor prosecute, almost everyone in that pile.

“They tell me that unless there was a direct order to not go forward on a case, there is nothing I can do.

“They tell me that strong hints, and an understanding that ‘this is how we do things’ is not enough.”

Tim’s silent for a moment, letting that sink in, watching Comey watch him. He’s looking… not interested, and not like someone just stepped on his grave, but… resigned, that’s probably the best way to describe it.

“I spent most of last summer on a lot of painkillers, or unraveling the corruption case that would take everything down. So, I wasn’t paying attention to what you were doing. But, that couldn’t last forever, and on Wednesday, I got to see what you were up to last summer.”

Comey looks him up and down as Tim sits down, across from him. “You’d like to know if there’s a direct case for you to investigate?”

Tim shakes his head. After that chat with Senior, he’s sure there isn’t. “I’d like to know if you looked the other way, got bought off, were threatened, or…”

Comey smiles, but it’s a sad one. “No one is so uncouth as to say anything. Certainly not to the head of the FBI. I sat down with the Attorney General, and we had a little chat. See, two weeks earlier, she had had a chat with Bill Clinton. I think they talked about their grandkids or something. She was out doing her job, and he just popped up.” Come half smiles again. “It was enough.”

After his conversation with Senior, Tim’s seeing how this worked, too. No one would need to say anything. She’d get the message loud and clear. If she wanted to keep her Party happy, this thing needed to go away.

Comey sighs. “That said, it was not said, or hinted, even in the most tangential, round about way, that if we wanted to see the Attorney General continue to support us in our cases, we’d suddenly develop an appreciation, at least on this one case, for the idea that it wasn’t enough to break the law, you also had to mean to harm the country by doing it.”

Tim’s following along with that, but he’s not seeing why Comey would take that deal. It looks back for the AG if the FBI’s cases just sit there not getting prosecuted. “So, you tell her to fu- kiss off and shame her into doing her job!”

Comey sighs, again. “There’s a reason why we were willing to go with a field agent for your job, and it was the hope of seeing versions of that response. However, when it comes to the entire FBI, that response is not appropriate. The Attorney General doesn’t just prosecute federal cases, they also defend them, specifically they defend us from cases suggesting that we shouldn’t be able to investigate certain things, get our hands on certain bits of information… You get the drift.”

Tim does. “So, say you want to… Force a company to put a backdoor into a product they make…”

“The AG handles that case. And all of the cases like it.”

Tim nods, not feeling good about this. “So, you got up there, wore the egg on your face, and…”

“And said very clearly that she was lying about pretty much everything, that she had classified documents on her personal servers, but we wouldn’t do anything because no ‘reasonable prosecutor’ would take the case.”

Tim nods at that, too. Then he inhales, long and deep. He lets it out slow and smooth, too. “That doesn’t fit with how I want us to run things.”

“I’m sure.” Comey’s watching him, intensely.

“The Attorney General went missing last fall.” Whether she ran because she was implicated in the political conspiracy, on several levels in the mess, or if the mob got her, no one knows. With everything else going on, hunting her down is a ‘low priority’ issue. He knows there’s a Congressional Warrant out for her, and maybe one day they’ll get around to actually looking for her.

“Also true.” Comey’s got a hell of a poker face, and Tim has no idea if he knows what happened to her. “Nothing was ever recorded, and there’s no possible case to be made. Trust me, everything between us was entirely legal.”

“Of course it was.” Which is part of the problem. A big part of how they ended up where they are. “In a month or so, I’m going to finish going through the public corruption employment files. At that point, I’ll have to figure out how to motivate these people I can’t get rid of to start truly doing their jobs.” Tim breathes deep again. “It would be quite a bit easier to get the message that this is not acceptable behavior across, if you weren’t sitting in that chair.”

“You’d…” Comey lets that drift off, interested in seeing how far Tim will take this.

“I can’t prosecute you. As you said, and as I’m seeing, pretty much everything I want to shut down is legal. I am asking you to resign, and to explain why you are leaving. I would like you to make an extremely public statement about failing at your job, and I would like you to encourage the people who behaved like you did to leave, too. I’d especially appreciate it if you were to add something about how things are changing, and how the old systems won’t work any longer.”

Comey cocks an eyebrow. “You don’t ask for much.” His voice is painfully dry, but he doesn’t appear to be angry.

“Nope. Just that you behave like an honorable man who made a mistake. Own up to it, and then get out of the way, so someone else who’s better suited for the work can take the reins.”
“You?” Comey’s looking him straight in the eye as he asks.

Tim shudders. “Good Lord, NO! I’m busy enough with what I’m doing. Pick a good man or better yet, two to replace you. I’d like you to write up a new set of guidelines before you go, making it, at least, against the regs to ignore a case because it would embarrass the wrong people. I’ll make sure we get the software that triages cases; I just need you to make sure that ignoring a code red because it would annoy the powers that be is a firing offence. I can’t fire them for that now, but I damn well want to be able to next year.”

“I can change the regulations, but you’ll still need to get them into the Union contracts, and they are exceptionally resistant to anything that makes it easier to fire anyone. I don’t get to pick my successor. The President does that, and Congress approves.”

“Change the regs, I’ll take care of the Union, and suggest some good names to whoever you know in the government.”

Comey stand up, looking out his window, at the rebuilding of DC. “I don’t suppose you look out on it, and think about what more you could have done?”

Tim stands next to him. Eyes flitting over construction sites, rubble, and empty lots. “No. I wonder if it was worth it. If I should have looked the other way. That hits me all the time. But, no. I did everything I could.”

Comey nods. “Let me know when you’ve got your list ready.”

“Okay.”

“What exactly are you going to do?”

“I’m thinking I’m going to call them all in, lead them on a guided tour of the Capitol, show them hours of youtube clips of the riots, more clips of starving people scavenging for food, I’m going to sit each one down, and beat into their thick heads that what happened was their fault, that it was their job to stop us from getting to a place where this could have happened, and then, I’m going to have them sit in the audience and watch you resign. If I’m lucky, a lot of them will fall on their swords, too.”

Comey sniffs, and then swallows, and nods again. “I’ll make sure it’s a good speech.”

Tim’s quiet during dinner. It’s Shabbos dinner, so the lack of his voice barely makes a dent in the general chatter. The rest of the family lets him mope a bit, without too much poking. Gibbs and Ziva are there, so they’re filling in the blanks with the general frustrations of trying to beat the FBI into shape, and the wider fears that if getting the FBI into shape is this hard, what the hell are they going to do with the wider world?

It’s that evening, after the kiddos are in bed, when the rest of the family is laying around the living room, that Tim starts talking.

He’s lounging with his head in Abby’s lap on the sofa, while most of the rest of the crew plays scrabble at the dinner table when he says, “I hate law.”
Him finally starting to talk gets a lot of attention aimed at him.

Breena’s the one who says, “Uh… That’s… a pretty impressive statement from an FBI Director.”

Tim groans. “Yeah well…” He’s rubbing his eyes, looking pretty lost. “Rule 13, never involve the lawyers. Okay, fine. We’ve always known that law and justice don’t walk hand in hand, but at NCIS we were in the justice business. We knew who the good guys were. And Leon did something to make sure the bad ones went to jail, and the good ones went home again and…” Abby’s gently rubbing circles against his temples. Tim snorts, and it’s an extremely jaded sound. “But I’m playing Law now, not justice. The game is rigged. Unless I want to go vigilante, I can’t do anything about so much of this.”

“You afraid there’s no point to it?” Abby says.

“I’m afraid I can’t change it. I’ll stand up there, and make a pretty picture, and put a coat of whitewash on a structure of shit.”

None of them like hearing him sound so defeated.

“I should… I don’t know… feel better than this. I got Comey to say he’d resign today.” That’s one bit none of the rest of them knew, and they’re all staring at him. “And I’ll put on a dog and pony show, and probably only get the people I could have given a decent second chance to will be shamed into leaving. And then I’ve got… I’ve got to somehow make this work, with the people who let it happen the first time.”

He’s licking his lips, staring past Abby, to the ceiling. “And it’s not like they’re particularly bad guys or anything. Not really. They just protected their own. And ‘their own,’ they weren’t necessarily doing anything illegal. Just working with other people who all wanted to see the same things happen, and… And what the hell do I do about that? If my job is law and they aren’t breaking any, what can I do? Hell, with the way Senior explained it, I can’t even change the laws to make what they’re doing illegal because that would make doing pretty much any other working together to change things illegal, too.

“I’m not stupid or naïve. I know evil is eternal. I know all we can do it fight it one battle at a time, but… With murders and hacking and things like that, I had tools to fight with. If I caught you doing it, I could make you not do it again. I can’t even fire these guys. Best I can do, is maybe, make them feel bad about themselves.”

He sits up a bit, to look toward Penny and Ducky. “Anything? You guys have anything? Any spiffy new laws I can use? What does it matter if I’ve got free rein to investigate whatever I like if none of this stuff is illegal?”

No one says anything.

“Come on Ducky, no words of wisdom, or bon mot, or…”

“Timothy, there was never a law that was ever worth more than the man enforcing it. As you said, evil is eternal. But law is not the tool we use to fight it. It’s… a system that gives us guidelines for how to fight it, but it’s not the fight, nor is it the weapon.

“Our weapons are literal weapons, and they are metaphorical ones. We fight with guns and knives and our physical bodies. And we fight with culture. A gun is easy. Put a bullet in the right place, and the threat is gone. Culture is hard. Culture is you changing how people think and feel about the game, so that it doesn’t matter what the rules are, certain plays become unthinkable.
“Change the culture. Find better men. That’s your job. Make it so the idea of looking the other way is so shameful that no one at the FBI would even dream of it. Shifting it, especially since you cannot fire people, will be difficult, but I do not believe it will be impossible.”

“Feels like it.”

“I’d imagine so,” Penny adds. She feels versions of this all the time in Congress. “We’ll work on backing you up with better laws, but for right now, find them men who can enforce them and give them the system to do it well. That’s what you can do, so do it.”

“I don’t think it’s enough.”

Unfortunately, it doesn’t matter how many times people tell him it is, when Tim goes to bed that night, he’s still feeling hollow, realizing he signed up to kill the Hydra, and the Hydra, unlike in the myths, can’t be killed.

Chapter End Notes

Sometimes I make decisions that bite me in the ass.

I didn’t expect using the real head of the FBI for this story to be one of them, but… Oh well. I did, and things went bugfuck insane with him this summer in a way I really didn’t anticipate.

So, I started writing this chapter long before the Clinton email stuff was even on the horizon. In the original version of this, Comey was loosely involved in the bigger corruption blow-up, and Tim and Co would notice it going through the employment stuff, and that would be that.

Anyway, between this chapter going live, and its original version, the Clinton Classified Email scandal went live. In late June, Bill Clinton had a chat with Attorney General Lynch. “A chance meeting.” July 5th Comey got up live on national television and literally told the world that if anyone other than Hillary Clinton had had a pile of classified documents on an insecure, personal server, that person “would have faced consequences” but because “no reasonable prosecutor” would take the case, they wouldn’t suggest charges. (Seriously, I’m not kidding. Those are word for word quotes. Google: Comey Remarks July 5th 2016. If you told me to write a speech where Comey lets someone get away with breaking the law, and he didn’t want to do it, that’s what it would look like.)

Then because we live in a rotten system, between then and getting to the next draft of this chapter, Christian Saucier ended up sentenced to a year in jail for having six classified (at the lowest possible level) pictures from his submarine on his phone and for attempting to destroy the evidence of having said documents on his phone. (Again, go reread Comey’s remarks about what Clinton had on her devices. Oh, by the way, did you know that lying to the FBI is a felony in and of itself?)

And you know, suddenly, I had a bit more focus for this chapter, and how things would work. As long as doing your job and going after people who broke the law worked out well for the guys doing it, they’d do a great job of it. And if looking the other way worked out, then maybe they’d look the other way.
That said, I still feel, tentative about putting this out here, especially today. Ripped from the headlines and what all.

Everything in this chapter about legal stuff, that’s legit. Cops don’t have to investigate any given case. They may have internal rules about doing it, but it’s not illegal for them to just not investigate. And, even if the cops do choose to investigate, Prosecutorial Discretion (coming soon to a STAW chapter near you) means the Prosecutor has the choice to go after a case or not, and again, is in no way required to prosecute any given case. (Hence Comey’s remarks about no prosecutor taking the case.) Bribery, and pay for play, and quid pro quo all require a specific request of a favor for money. Everything Senior talks about, completely legal.

All but the last bit with Tim on the sofa was ready to go as of Tuesday. Just had that last bit to write yesterday. Of course, like everyone else, I got the election results yesterday.

I wish I’d pushed a bit harder and gotten this out on Tuesday, because on Tuesday I could have written a happier ending.

I had planned a much less grim end, with a lot more rousing, buck-upping from Ducky and the power of a good man in a good place and all of that shit, but… I’m sorry, I couldn’t write it yesterday, and today didn’t do it, either.

On the upside, when you’re as jaded about politics as I am, and you firmly believe the whole system is corrupt, nothing comes as a surprise. But, I have to wonder, if we didn’t have two systems, one where laws are optional for powerful people, if maybe Wednesday wouldn’t have been so sad. I wonder what would have happened if Comey had done his job, Clinton had bowed out, and Kaine had headed their ticket without her. Somehow, I can’t imagine that we’d be worse off it that had happened.

Okay, I’ll pull it together and hopefully get back into kick the shit out of the corruption mood soon. Tim’s got some more fun chapters coming up soon, and I think we all need them.

Love you all. Keryl
“Rule Number 13: Never involve lawyers.”

Well, Tim’s stuck. He needs some damn lawyers because if his job is enforcing the law and if what he thinks of as criminal corruption is in fact legal then he needs help.

Yes, he can stand up and do his dog and pony show. That’s him changing culture. Lovely. He still needs something for all of his Untouchables to do, and he’s coming to the conclusion that unless he’s got a lot of extremely stupid people engaging in corruption, his Untouchables are going to spend a lot of time sitting on their asses, twiddling their thumbs if they can’t come up with some law that these people are actually breaking.

Yes, he’s looking forward to busting those sexual harassment cases, but he was kind of hoping his department would do more than that, and right now, he’s got the sinking suspicion that’s the only thing on his horizon that’s actually illegal.

Having come to that conclusion, Tim’s sitting at his computer, staring over the heads of the rest of his team, stuck.

They don’t involve the lawyers if they can possibly avoid it, and they really don’t involve civil law lawyers. The lawyers he’s most often dealt with have been JAGs or the like. Guys who specialize in military law.

Which means he doesn’t know a whole bunch of them to call.

Jake.

Okay, great, he’s a Congressman now, and likely a tad busy, and also didn’t specialize in this sort of law.

This sort of law… Shit… Who the hell am I looking for?

That’s level one of this. He can’t just call up the first lawyer in the book. He need someone who really knows the ins and outs and all the rest of this.

He needs a… and he feels squirmy thinking it… a defense attorney.

On the upside, that realization gives him a place to start looking.

The downside is, when they talk about lawyers what they really mean are defense attorneys. Who are, in general, just slightly below Satan in the eyes of most cops.

Because, of course, the job of a defense attorney is to make sure the cop doesn’t get to do his job.
That’s how the system works. Doesn’t matter how guilty a person is, his defense attorney’s job is to make sure he gets off. Better a hundred guilty men go free than one innocent one rot in jail, or something like that.

It’s supposed to be an adversarial process.

And it is.

So it’s not like Tim’s got a pile of defense attorneys he can buddy up with, and he’s not entirely sure one would even want to do what he’s hoping to do.

He fires off an email to Bleach, asking him if he knows any really good defense attorneys who work on this sort of stuff, and decides to spend more time with his LinkedIn profile looking for computer guys to build the software that’s going to make the system work.

The upside about hunting for computer talent is that Tim actually knows what he wants and needs for this. Two hours spent carefully combing through the list of friends, friends of friends, former professors, and other hackers, leaves Tim in a much better place.

A hopeful place where he feels like he can actually add some value to this situation.

Okay, sure he might not be able to find people breaking the law, but by God, he’ll have a system in place to triage their cases as soon as they get one!

His day gets even better when he gets an email from Covington saying that the beta test of the FBI’s version of his paperwork software would go live on Monday.

Tim checks his calendar and realizes that Monday is August seventh, or, since there’s a weekend in play, as close as he can get to a full month on the job.

He’s glancing around his office, and Gibbs, Fornell, Ziva, and Burke chat. He hasn’t gotten as much done as he wanted to, but he’s done… something.

He checks the email again, the beta version test is going live.

He glares at the pile of people he can’t get rid of. A lot less done than he wanted to.

They’re eating lunch when his email chimes, and glancing at his watch, he sees that this one is from Bleach.

He’s greatly disheartened to see a long line of HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA as the topic.

Inside he finds:

Tim,

The kind of person you’re looking for is the kind of person I never saw in my courtroom. He’d be on retainer, and he would arrange everything ahead of time so I never saw him. These kinds of cases, even if, by some miracle, they find something to prosecute, never get to court. They’re settled long before that’s even an issue.

That said, give your grandma a call. They caught a lot of Lobbyists when they swept through who was involved in the corruption scandal. They’re the people who, for a living, legally (to an extent) packaged money and power into nifty little units and then sold them to whomever needed it.

I’m sure she’s got to know someone who’s desperate for some sort of deal and would happily talk you through whatever you want, if the Director of Public Corruption were to put in a good word for him.

Murray

That’s disappointing, but also helps.

“Do we know any lobbyists, ones good enough they aren’t in jail?” Tim asks.

They all glance around, yeah they know them, in the sense they’ve all been in the same room with one, feeling distinctly uncomfortable with the pervasive sense of sleeze oozing off of them, but… know one?

“Senior does,” Ziva says.

Tim nods, and writes up a note to Penny and Senior, hoping they’ve got someone he can talk to who specializes in buying and selling politicians.

Tim’s not sure, early the next morning, when he’s the first one in, if the fact that Senior and Penny both sent him the same name is a remnant of the fact that K Street, and everything it stood for burned to the ground, so there just aren’t that many Lobbyists, total, left in the Greater DC area, or if, when it comes down to it, the guys at the top of the power game make up a very small group.

Either way, he’s calling Perce Masters, a man he’s never heard of, and asking for an hour or so of his time.

Which he gets two days later.

For this meeting, he does give the rest of his crew the afternoon off. He’s not sure if it matters, not really, but he wants the image of power and control and… professionalism for this. He’s not just in his office, his tidied up office (all the files have been shoved into his closet), on his own, wearing his best suit, he’s also borrowed a really good watch and tie from Tony. (When Ziva asked for said watch and tie, Tony sighed, shook his head, and said, ‘Tell him to get some real shoes if he’s going to do this, right.’ Tim’s made a mental note of that, and on Friday, they’ll have a chat about what ‘real shoes’ are. He has a feeling that at some point, he’s going to get Senior in and have some sort of symposium about how to dress like a guy who makes more than a grand a day.)

At the stroke of 1:30, Jennifer walks an older gentleman, and that’s the word that springs to mind, this is a gentleman, in.
Right now, Tim’s wearing his made for him, gray, date night suit. He’s as spiffy as he ever gets, at least, in this direction.

Perce Masters, with his perfectly done steel gray hair, and charcoal suit with a thin maroon pinstripe, and perfect, crisp, Platonic Ideal of a white silk shirt, and probably five hundred dollar maroon silk tie, and freaking cuff links, expensive cuff links (Tim thinks they’re platinum; they’re small and subtle, but that sheen looks familiar) that match his tie pin (of course he’s got a tie pin), blows Tim so far out of the water, he’ll land in Kansas.

Rewind time a hundred years, and this is the guy who could, with perfect ease and comfort, wear a silk top hat, tails, white gloves, and carry a cane.

Tim shakes Masters hand, notices the perfect manicure, and swallows any feeling of being vastly overshadowed. He does make another mental note that, yes, he does need to learn how to swim in these waters, because without that, he’s not going to do a good job hunting in them.

Once the pleasantries are over, and Masters is sitting in front of Tim’s desk with a cup of coffee, he says, “I’ll admit, Director McGee, I’m a tad nervous about this. People in my… position, aren’t exactly popular right now, and you run the Public Corruption Department.”

Tim offers up his most disarming smile. “You’re not here because of any investigation. At least, not of the criminal variety. I’m a computer specialist. I worked as a field agent. I can spend the next year telling you ways to hack systems and kill people. I know how to play that game inside and out.

“I don’t know how to play this game. I’m doing this job because I’ve got ideas of how to do a better job of building a system to play the game, but… apparently the stuff I think shouldn’t be legal, is. So, I’m asking you for a crash course on what the laws are, how they work, and how do I catch the guys who are selling us out?”

Perce laughs, suddenly looking a whole lot more approachable. “In an hour?”

“Give me the Cliff Notes version.”

“Do people still use them?”

Tim scoffs. He never did. “I don’t know. I know that I can build a system to do this better than anyone else ever dreamed of, but if the best system on earth won’t help if they aren’t actually breaking the law, so…”

Perce smiles a bit. “Okay. Let’s start here, what do you think corruption is?”

Tim’s about to whip out a very basic ‘you get rich off of cutting corners and selling out the people’ sort of answer, but decides he needs to actually think about it some.

And that leads to some very uncomfortable thoughts.

“Shit.”

“Well put,” Masters says, dryly. “It’s like pornography. You know it when you see it, but defining it so it doesn’t bite your pet projects is tricky, isn’t it?”

Tim grits his teeth and nods.

“I’d say the first bit of this is: everyone who’s in this game is working on someone’s pet project. Your corruption is someone else’s idea of how a good world works.”
Tim grits his teeth again. “Let’s start with what I can see. Developers are scrambling right and left looking to grab up real estate wherever the next seat of Government is going to be. Senator Whomever knows the answer to that before everyone else does, and lets a few of his buddies know, too. They buy up the land, get rich, and put money in his re-election campaign.”

Masters sips his coffee and then says, “Totally legal. At least, it was back when people could get re-elected. Now… I assume they donate to his hand-picked successor’s campaign. However they do it, it’s not illegal. It’s possibly against the internal rules Congress has in play about revealing secrets.”

Tim sighs. That’s not his jurisdiction. “How about this? Senator Whoever has a pile of property located wherever, I don’t know, Peoria. He then lobbies like hell to get everyone else to think Peoria is a great plan, too. Some of them also buy up chunks of Peoria ahead of time, planning on selling high when Congress gets there. They vote, Congress goes to Peoria, and Senator Whoever and his buddies clean up.”

Perce smiles. “Again, legal, but maybe against their internal rules. Not your sandbox. Congress could sit down, look at a map of the US, find the most run down, inexpensive city on the map, each of them buy huge chunks of it, and then vote to move the Congress there, and once there, enjoy long and wealthy retirements bankrolled by the land they bought, and that’s legal.”

“Great.” Tim’s really gritting his teeth. “The Peoria Board of Supervisors or whomever goes to Congress, and talks up Peoria, and then gives piles of money to any Congressman who will take it —“

“As long as it’s below the campaign finance limit, legal.”

“And their wives and kids…”

“As long as they declare it on their taxes as a gift, legal. As long as there’s no ‘I will vote for Peoria if you give me this money…”

“It’s legal.” Tim’s still gritting his teeth. His jaw is starting to ache, so he forces himself to unclench. “Okay, fine, what isn’t legal?”

Perce sighs. “That’s a difficult one. The laws are written by Congress for the purpose of making sure Congress can safely get and stay rich. If there’s a direct statement of, pay X get my vote. That’s illegal. We had some cases a few years back where Congressmen were silly enough to have a… menu… for lack of a better word, where for donations of certain amounts, they had whatever favors they were willing to offer, listed.”

“Too dumb to walk and chew gum at the same time,” Tim mutters.

“If you can prove a pattern where votes on certain matters are only available to the person who pays for them, that’s something you can go after.”

“And let me guess, I can’t because everyone gets offered funds for everything these days.”

“Actually,” And Perce has a little grin now. “Now, you might have some luck with that. Before the fall, all of Congress was fewer than 600 people. So, of course, all of them had someone offering them money for anything they could possibly want to vote on and any way they could vote on it. Now though… we’ve got so many new ones, and everyone is scrambling around, trying to figure out who is in charge of what, so… It’s possible, you might be able to find patterns where someone is getting careless about how they vote.”

“What patterns would I be looking for?”
“In this case, if you’ve got someone who only votes for issues they’ve been paid for, that’s a good hint that something is wrong.”

“Great. That should be easy to find.” Tim’s sounding sarcastic on that, though not as much as he could be. He figures it would take all of an afternoon to write the program that would cross check voting patterns with donations.

“You’ve got your law team, have them check over voting records. People who abstain a lot, and there are some, might be worth your attention.”

Tim perks up a little to hear that, not because of the way to do it, he’d automate it, but because it can be done. “So, it’s one thing to accept funds from people who want you to do things, it’s another thing if you only do things when you’ve been funded?”

“Exactly. Now, I don’t know how much longer you’ll be able to make a case like that, with time, I’m sure they’ll all end up with their crowds of followers tossing cash at them right and left, but at least for now, you might have a window of opportunity.”

“I’ll take whatever I can get,” And right now, Tim most certainly will.

“What else looks like corruption to you?”

“Um… You vote for something that directly benefits you?”

“Be more specific.”

Tim spends another moment working on an idea. “Um… I don’t know. You own a… funeral home, so you write a law that funeral homes don’t have to pay income taxes.”

“If you can get it through Congress, totally legal.”

“Really?” Though given how the thing with Clemens worked out, Tim’s not particularly hopeful about being wrong on that.

“Google Gallo Winery Estate Tax Law one day.”

“That’s going to make me want to rip my eyes out, isn’t it?”

Perce offers him a grim smile. “Probably. Writing laws to benefit you and yours is not only not illegal, it’s, to a certain extent, encouraged.”

Tim’s head thumps onto his desk and he bangs it there, softly, for a moment, before looking up and saying, “Encouraged?”

“Well, yes. That’s why you got elected. To make sure the people who elected you get the things they want. And in many cases, you were elected because you know something about… whatever it is, because you were one before you got into politics.”

“Isn’t ‘the people’ supposed to be a… broader category?” Tim feels like a child getting his hopes dashed as he says that, but… He can’t not say it.

Perce smiles again, this time gently. “It should be, but it isn’t. Unless you can find a way to… dissociate the people voting from the people getting elected… That’s how the system is supposed to work.”

“Tell me what I can go against.”
“Deliberate pay for play. Deliberate bribes…”

“People so stupid they aren’t in the game.”

“Some of them are, and with as big as Congress is… You will certainly find them. Before the fall, the average member of Congress had been there for more than twenty years. He or she knew how to play the game. Now, they get four years, that’s it. You are going to have a much easier time catching Congressmen. Senators will be a bit more difficult because they get to stick around long enough to learn the ropes, but instead of thirty years, they’re out in six.

“However, and here’s the first thing I think I can give you of value, you’re looking at the wrong targets. Yes, Congress and the Senate can be problems, but they come and go. The Bureaucracy is eternal, nameless, faceless, and that’s where the real power to make actual change lies.

“Those are the guys you need to be looking at.”

Tim smiles. That’s useful, and matches something Senior said. He smiles even wider, that’s the sort of thing he can send his Black Hats into.

“Congress passes laws, those laws go into committees, those committees sprout departments, those departments create the mechanisms that enforce those laws. A lot of those guys are so far off the radar, they may be getting direct bribes.”

“The guy who decides who to buy the bolts that get used to build the airplanes. Go looking at him for kickbacks?” Tim asks.

“Most certainly. He and his ilk make up hundreds of thousands of mostly unknown people all over the Federal Government. The people who write the actual regulations. Again, Congress passes the law, but usually some subcommittee actually writes the regs. Go through those guys’ taxes with a fine tooth comb. They tend to be so far out of the limelight that techniques tend to be a lot less hidden.”

Tim makes a note that he’s going to need accountants. “What else is actually illegal?”

“Many companies will offer ‘stock tips’ to people in the right places at the right time. Technically it’s insider trading. Which is illegal, but not the sort of thing that tends to raise ‘anti-corruption’ flags. There’s no law against a Congressman buying a stock, selling it short, and seeing it go tumbling the next day, thus he cleans up. It’s an easy way to funnel funds to him, without triggering the campaign finance laws.

“On the theme of insider trading, say you’re on the congressional subcommittee that approves some sort of deal. If you buy up a pile of stock, bonds, or whatever right before that news goes live, that’ll qualify as insider trading, and is illegal.”

Tim can’t tell why that should be illegal but his real estate idea from earlier wouldn’t be, but… He shakes his head and makes a note to send to Penny. If it’s illegal to do it with stock, shouldn’t it be illegal to do it with land?

When he’s done writing he says, “And let me guess, if you’re good at this, you never do like that?”

“If you’re good at it, you’ve got a corporation that is only tangentially attached to your wife’s cousin’s brother-in-law, and it does all of your investing.”

“And that’s completely legal.”
Masters smiles. “It is until they can hunt down where that corporation is getting its stock tips from.”

“Lovely. Accountants, huh?”

“Assuming financial corruption is what you’re looking for, yes. Lots of them. Good ones. Get yourself some money launderers while you’re at it, too. They’ve got tricks I don’t, and trust me, they use them.” Perce puts his cup down and continues on. “Speaking of tricks… Banks will often offer financing on especially good terms. For example, your congressman’s brother gets his mortgage at 0% interest with 100 year terms, and no down payment. Okay, no, it won’t be that obvious, but it’ll be in that neighborhood. That’s not technically illegal, either, until you go looking through their taxes to see what they’re doing about their mortgage interest deduction.”

Tim’s writing that one down. A lot more accountants. And maybe a lot fewer Black and White Hats. Though, he is thinking that a bunch of Senior-type guys who are pretending to be working for… whomever… could be offering hot stock tips… Get them for attempted insider trading if nothing else. That’s a start.

A wicked little thought lights through Tim’s mind. He smirks at it. Get his Senior-type Black Hats to offer bad stock tips. Maybe he can’t bust them for taking that kind of tip, but he might be able to burn them on it.

He sighs. He might be doing a lot of burning people. That gets him thinking about those boxes of people he can’t fire.

Change the culture. If he can’t bust people, maybe he can shame them onto the straight and narrow.

“What else can I do?”

“This is a perennial favorite. Ask questions they don’t want to answer, ‘Just to clear things up’ and when they lie to you, go after them. Lying to the FBI is a felony offense. They do have to know you’re FBI, though. Can’t use your undercover guys on that. But, even if whatever else you are doing is completely legal, lying about it, even accidentally, is a felony. You have the right to shut up or answer truthfully, you cannot lie to the FBI.”

Tim thinks about that, and comes to the conclusion that he will make that be useful. Especially if the people in question might be feeling a tad guilty about how they got those great terms on their mortgage. He’s nodding as he jots that down.

“Here’s my last bit of advice, with no more re-elections, the game has changed. Everything we’re talking about is based on the idea that someone will be around for decades to help you out. And I honestly don’t know what and how people are going to shift their patterns to go with this new reality.

“The first job of any member of Congress was getting re-elected, so people who wanted dibs on his second job, making laws, had an easy lever to move him with. Now… I just don’t know how it’s going to work.”

“But you know people are going to want Congress and the Senate to do things for them.”

“The sun rises in the east and sets in the west. Yes, I know that won’t change. The game goes on. The players and the rules just shifted, but the game didn’t end. If you’re looking for help with this, I’ll suggest you hire a bunch of Congressmen at the end of this session and the next one, and squeeze their brains for what was going on.

“Traditionally, Mr. McGee, this isn’t a young man’s game. Traditionally, it took years to build the networks to get money and power to coalesce in ways a politician wanted them to. Traditionally, a first term senator or even third term congressman would be shut out of this game. They’d need to prove they can stick around before they could even get in on this sort of thing.”

“Are you still in the game?”

Perce doesn’t respond.

It takes Tim a second to realize what Perce is doing. “Right! You can not answer or tell the truth. Okay. Here’s a question for you, would you be interested in taking a massive pay cut and working for me, brainstorming ways to play the game, so I can use your skills to catch other players?”

“You ask leading questions Mr. McGee.”

Tim thinks over what he just asked. Finally he realizes ‘interested in taking a massive pay cut’ is a trap.

“Can I hire you to brainstorm ways for us to catch people in the corruption game?”

“No. I may, on occasion, be available for a pro-bono consult, like today. But you absolutely cannot hire me for this.”

Tim sighs. And then it clicks. “Government employees have no privacy rights.”

“And, as one of the six successful lobbyists currently not in jail, I am loathe to give mine up. However, felons have no privacy rights anyway, and some of the hundreds of lobbyists now in jail may be interested in offering you aid.”

“Do you have recommendations?”

“I do. I’ll email you a list of people who may be helpful.”

“I’d appreciate that, greatly. Especially if you know any really good accountants.”

Perce smiles about that, and stands up, heading out of Tim’s office.

Tim sits back, thinking for a few moments, the bureaucracy is eternal. Nameless, faceless, and able to do this forever because no one sees them.

He shakes his head. There’re more than a million federal employees, double that if he counts all the military and military adjunct people. There’s no possible way for him, or anyone in his position to go after them…

Not using people. That’d be blindly flailing around, hoping to hit someone breaking the law by luck alone.

He thinks about his reporting software. How he’s going to be sending in his tech guys and their FOIA requests to pry incident reports out of different branches of the government. And once he’s got those reports, he’ll find the outliers. And that’s how he’ll know where to look.

He needs another version of that. Government employees, tax records, real estate records, credit card statements. No privacy rights, and he’s going to use that. He’ll build that system, and if someone is living way beyond their means into the spotlight they go.
It’s a hell of a lot less sexy than his Black Hats sneaking in, pretending to be someone else, seducing them to the dark side, and busting them for going dark.

But it’ll work.

Slow, boring, numbers. Databases, algorithms, and tax law. The future of law enforcement is numbers.

And Tim’s good with numbers.

One last thought hits him as he’s sitting there. A long time ago Diane had mentioned the tax laws were set so everyone was breaking them.

They got Al Capone for tax evasion.

“Numbers.” He shakes his head, and sends Diane an email. Topic line: I Need Accountants!

Chapter End Notes

Alas, the Gallo Winery thing is real, too. They managed to give money to pretty much everyone on both sides and were able to get estate tax laws shifted so their personal fortunes could be passed along at a much lower tax rate than everyone else's.
There’s an actual, physical note, in paper, on his keyboard when Tim gets in. He smirks at it. Leaving him little, paper notes is part of Jennifer getting snarky with him. He appreciates it. And it’s also a good shorthand for THIS IS IMPORTANT! If it’s on paper on his desk, he knows she really wants him to see it.

Prince Imin Adid Abdullah  347 Flamento Dr. Coral Gables, FL.

It takes Tim a second to realize what he’s looking at, and then he’s got it. His maybe, sort of, could have been college buddy is pretending to be a member of the Saudi Royal Family down in Coral Gables Florida.

Tim’s slowly shaking his head, of all the places and names Ajay Khan could have used to hide, a Saudi Royal Prince, and Florida weren’t on the list of possibilities Tim could have imagined.

Oh well, that makes it easier for him. Getting down to Florida should be a breeze. And, besides, he doesn’t mind the idea of spending a day or two in South Florida. After all, unlike some of the people he’s wanted to talk to, he’s certain Khan won’t come to him.

Tim smiles, sends an email to Jennifer, asking her to set up travel for him to Miami ASAP, along with getting him a few moments of the time of whomever is in charge of the Miami field office.

Then he pulls out on of his numerous laptops, sets it at the table, where Fornell usually sits, and gets it up and going.

After all, he’s stolen Fornell for the last month, without any paperwork getting done, so, since, supposedly, the paperwork software is up on its Beta Test, he knows just the guy to take it for a spin.

Harold Keller is head of the Miami field office and he’s more than a tad confused to get a cold call from the Director of Public Corruption.

Confused and nervous.

Tim’s noticing that’s a thing these days. Most people, especially ones he’s cold calling, are nervous talking to him.

Probably because of what happens as soon as he can tell Keller is nervous, he goes into the check this guy out pile.
Tim wishes he could be more trusting about this, but he’s got the feeling that for a long time to come, if he gets a nervous vibe off of someone, that someone is going to have his life dissected.

But, Keller doesn’t know that, yet, and Tim still needs his help. He explains his “Saudi Prince” issue, and that he should be in Miami the day after tomorrow, and he needs someone to just keep an eye on the him and his home. Make sure he’s actually there. Stuff like that.

Of course, as they keep talking, and Keller finally asks, “Sir, shouldn’t we have a warrant or something like that?” it occurs to Tim that it could be that Keller’s actually a decent guy, and he’s afraid he’s getting caught in a trap.

That makes Tim smile. Soon enough, this may be a trap.

“I just want to drop by and give him a job offer. So, no we don’t need a warrant for that. I do, however, want to know what I’m walking into, and he’s in a position where a visit from the FBI would be bad for him, so… Don’t talk to him. Don’t let him know you’re doing it. Hijack a local camera, or pop an eye on his place. I’m going to need to go visit him, and I just want to know what I’m walking into before I do it.”

“You’re going to offer him a job?” Keller doesn’t sound like he believes that.

“It’s a long story. And depending on what you guys see, that plan might change. But, if what I think is going on is going on, it’ll be perfectly fine for me to just drive up one day.”

“Is he… expecting you?”

“I very much doubt it.”

“And you want how much backup?”

“Get eyes on the place, send me a report, and we’ll figure it out from there. But, in all likelihood, I’ll tell you where I’m going and when, and if I’m not back by a certain time, you come and get me out. Otherwise, no backup.”

“Okay… Sir.”

“Thanks. I’ll be down in the morning—“

“Your secretary already sent the details. We’ll have someone to meet you at the airport.”

Tim’s in a really good mood when he gets home that night. And while he’s not relishing a night away from home, he is looking forward to this particular job.

Okay, so… He never got to do this when he was in the field, and… for as much as Tony likes to play James Bond, Tim’s wanted to play Michael Westin. It’s not just that this is as close to undercover as he’s going to get for, in all likelihood, the rest of his life, but, he gets to go into uber-cool Florida, visit a fifteen million dollar house, and (and this bit makes him smile) tweak Khan’s nose.

And, if the gods were ever going to set up his little Michael Westin fantasy… This is it.

He got his surveillance report just before heading home. That address is a mansion outside of Miami. And from the looks of it, Khan’s got a party going 24/7.
This is great for him, because all he’s got to do is show up with a flash car, and, and this is the important bit, not look like a cop.

Easy enough, right?

Well, for him.

Abby and Breena are looking at what he packs that morning. Half of it is his normal (ish) somewhat professional clothing. Nice khaki-colored suit pants, light blue button down, belt, sensible shoes. The other half is a pair of sandals, (borrowed from Jimmy, they’ll do for the few hours he intends to wear them) his black kilt, the almost translucent shirt Abby and Breena got him, and his favorite eyeliner. He figures in that outfit, he’ll look as little like a cop as it’s physically possible for him to.

And, sure, maybe it’s not exactly Burn Notice chic (his ‘regular work clothing’ is as close as he could get it), but he plans to go in there with proper Michael Westin, blend in anywhere, be cool with everything, style.

“Going undercover?” Abby asks. She expected his best Burn Notice look, she knew how to read that gleam in his eyes when he said Miami, but the kilt has her asking.

“Or just planning on having a hell of a good time without us?” Breena adds.

He kisses both of them. “No such thing as a good time without you. And yeah, way undercover. From the intel I could get, anyone who wants to can drive up and head in, as long as the security at the gate doesn’t think you’re a cop.”

“So, you aren’t a cop,” Breena says.

“Nope, just an old college buddy looking to catch up.”

“That’s stretching the hell out of the truth,” Abby says with a grin.

“But it’s not a complete lie, either.” He grins back at them. “Should be home tomorrow.”

Okay, this is fun.

On several levels.

First up, Jennifer saw no reason to book him a seat on a commuter flight out of Dulles. She did whatever magic she does, and then shortly after the rest of his family headed off to work, an Uber showed up at his house, took him to a private airfield, where there was a jet waiting, and an hour later, he was at another private airfield in Miami where Agent Fasial is waiting for him.

Tim still doesn’t love flying, but it’s a hell of a lot nicer when he’s got the jet more or less to himself and can easily stretch out and work while a very kind woman offers him vastly more food and drinks than he could possibly need.

And yes, stepping out of the plane, into the humid Miami air, in a crisp blue button down, khaki suit pants, khaki jacket, and sunglasses does hit all of Tim’s playing Michael Westin buttons.

Next of all, Keller just about swallowed his tongue after Tim stepped out of the men’s room having changed into his “undercover” gear. There’s a very clear expression of How the Hell did YOU get this job? on his face, and Tim, may, just possibly, be smirking internally at it.

On top of that, no one at the Miami office has ever met him before, or for that matter, anyone else in the higher up levels of the FBI, and they’re all scurrying around, waiting for him to say ‘jump’ so they can all leap up shouting ‘how high.’ He’s starting to understand that almost perpetual smirk Gibbs would wear when underlings would scurry around trying to do anything he wanted.

And best of all, he did get a flash car. The FBI has confiscated a lot of pretty toys over the years, and they let him borrow one of them. (Though, even the Director of Public Corruption has to spend an hour signing releases about how he’s got to be damn careful with it, and that if he damages it, the FBI will own his soul until he’s paid them back for it.)

It’s a silver Audi R8, white leather interior, handles like silk, and looks like a car guy’s wet dream.

He loves it unreservedly, and is coming to the conclusion that it’s a good thing he doesn’t regularly get to play with stuff like this, because otherwise he’d start seriously thinking about trying to buy one, and they don’t have the money for that.

Khan lives in a nice neighborhood. Though Tim’s not entirely sure he’d call this a neighborhood. He’s thinking about Tony talking about Halloween as a kid, and the houses being really far apart. What’d he call that? A compound? An estate? Something like that.

None of these houses are on less than ten acres. And they all have walls with gates, and security at those gates. (Why the surveillance footage he got of this was aerial makes a bit more sense. There’s nowhere in this neighborhood to stick a van or the like without anyone noticing something being very wrong.)

He drives up to Khan’s gate in the Audi, rolls down the tinted window, and the security guy sees a youngish man with tousled hair, eyeliner, a mostly unbuttoned, translucent shirt, wrist cuff, and the ghosts of a few tattoos through the fabric of the shirt.

“ID?”

Tim hands his driver’s license over, and the guy at the gate just writes down his name. He hands it back and gets waved through.

He pulls up to a long roundabout driveway. There are cars line up along the edges, and Tim doesn’t immediately see where to stick his, but after ten seconds he realizes he doesn’t need to. There’s a man waiting by the front door, and a rack of keys sitting next to him.

A second after Tim’s noticed that, that man is heading to his car.

Valet parking. Khan’s got personal valet parking at his home. Tim tosses over the keys, and just walks on it, strolling along, feeling pretty awesome.

Tim can see how Khan would love this. He’s basically got his own fully-staffed luxury hotel at his disposal. As he heads in, he sees it’s not just fully staffed, but filled with “beautiful people” most of whom appear to be partying.

Within seconds of getting in, someone hands Tim a drink, and he takes a small sip, basically just letting the liquid touch his tongue. It’s a mojito, a good one. He approves. He’d drink more of it, but he’s here to work. Plus, just because he walked in easy, doesn’t mean the rest of this will be easy, and there’s no way he’s getting roofied and kidnapped.

Then he heads further in, walking around, greeting people like he knows them, and making sure he looks like he knows where he’s going. It’s an amazing house. He’s seen pictures of houses like this, on TV and in magazines, and he knows intellectually houses like this have to exist, but he didn’t think they were real. Not on any gut level.

But here he is. In one. It’s practically a palace, bigger than their place on the Chesapeake, and apparently decorated by someone with exquisite taste and an unlimited budget. The entire first floor opens out onto a huge swimming pool flanked with long green yards, and all around the pool, and on the grass, are more beautiful people laying around, tanning, and playing.

Tim’s not sure who the band is, (of course there’s a band) but he approves of them. Tony mentioned Khan was into music, and this is good stuff.

He’s smiling at a gorgeous woman wearing a practically translucent sarong wrapped around her hips, not really covering a bikini bottom so tiny he has no idea why anyone would bother wearing it, and apparently Khan’s place is perfectly fine with topless sun tanning, because that’s all she’s wearing.

She smiles back, breezes by him, kisses his cheek, and calls him Chet. He’s got no idea who Chet is or may be, but he doesn’t care. That’s not an issue. It’s all about the appearance. So he keeps his head high, keeps “sipping” the drink, without actually swallowing any, swaggers about, and scans the crowd. Smiling, chatting, saying hello, looking really pleased with himself and the world in general.

Khan’s got to be here somewhere, but, he doesn’t appear to be anywhere on the first floor. Or at the pool.

Tim keeps looking, and realizes there’s a private balcony on the third floor, overlooking the pool. He can’t see anyone up there, but he’s feeling like that’s where Khan would be.

Upstairs, other side of the house. Up he goes, making sure he looks like he belongs. He gets an occasional glance, but a wide smile seems to take care of them. Khan may have security on the outside, but Tim can’t see anyone who looks like security on the inside.

Of course, if the guys on the outside are good, he wouldn’t need extra people on the inside.

 Granted, anyone who was looking for Ajay Khan knows he died last summer. Right now, Tim’s sitting in Imin Adid Abdullah’s house. Officially, Khan is now a much lesser known Saudi Princeling. There are so many members of the Saudi Royal Family that no one knows all of them, and here in the US, Khan’s black hair, black eyes, and brown skin means he can call himself pretty much any ethnicity he wants, and no one will blink.

The whole house is posh. It’s cool and clean in whites and creams with marble floors and lots of wide open windows. The furniture is modern and pretty. Maybe not wildly comfortable, but it looks right out of a high fashion magazine.

He heads down a long hall, trying to figure out which one of the doors will lead to where he wants to be. His first two choices don’t pan out, but the third… Tim grins, catching sight of the man he’s looking for.

The room is empty. It’s a bedroom, huge bed, huge TV, bathtub a man could swim laps in, and behind all of it, are two French doors, opened to the balcony Tim had spotted. And on that balcony...

Khan, on his stomach, on a massage table, getting what looks like a really good rubdown from two extremely lovely ladies.

Tim quietly eases through the room, made a bit quieter by taking off Jimmy’s sandals. He doesn’t want the sound of his feet on the marble floors to announce him. The ladies are focused on Khan, and he’s face down, small towel over his butt, occasionally purring at them.

Sort of a shame to interrupt that massage, but… Tim smirks at it. He intends to enjoy this. He tucks his sandals behind one of the French doors, steps onto the balcony, which is when the ladies notice him, and stop rubbing, watching him, eyes very curious. He puts his finger to his lips, and they both relax a little, expecting him to be a friend in on some sort of joke.

It is a joke, but not what they’re expecting.

He’s still smiling when he says, “You weren’t kidding about finding some beautiful women.”

For a second, he sees Khan’s back and shoulders tense, and then hears a long groan as they slump down into the table. Khan slowly levers himself up, resting on his elbows, so he can meet Tim’s eyes.

Tim smiles at him. Khan rolls his eyes. Tim can feel that he’s annoyed, and not scared, and… not shocked, either. Tim’s interested in that.

“Ladies, this is a private conversation,” Khan says.

He’s changed a bit since Tim saw him last. His hair comes down to his shoulders, and he’s wearing a short and tidy beard. Tim’s not sure if Khan is Indian or Pakistani, but he knows he’s one or the other, so he can’t see him as Arabic, but… If he didn’t know… Yeah, he’d probably believe it.

The ladies look like they’ve done something like this before. They quickly wipe the oil off their hands, and then head out, all without saying anything.

Once they’re gone, Khan says, “Did you just sneak into my house?”

Tim blows that off. “Please! I gave my car to your valet. Your security sucks. I even used my real name to get in. Two seconds of googling should have put me on the do not let in list, but your guy saw the car and the ink and let me in.”

Khan sits up. He’s naked under the towel, and the towel is next to him, now. “You’re like a bad case of the clap. You just keep coming back.”

Tim shrugs, pulls one of the seats over from the corner of the balcony, and sits with his feet propped up on the corner of the massage table. Khan gets up, finds his shorts, and pulls them on. “You here to bust me?”

“Nope.”

Khan eyes him, and his outfit. “You go dark side when everything went bugfuck insane last year?”
“Nope, not that, either.”

“What, are we having a college reunion?”

“That’s how I got in the door. Flashed my driver’s license and told him I was a buddy from your MIT days, Prince Abdullah.”

“I’ll have to have a chat with my security people.”

“Probably a good idea. Apparently a hundred and fifty grand car and visible ink is all they need to decide that a person isn’t law enforcement.”

“Let’s start here, are you still law enforcement?” Apparently his outfit, and his leg, with the almost full sleeve dragon tattoo, along with what Khan can see through his shirt, is making Khan wonder, too.

That gets a chuckle out of Tim, too. “Oh yeah. Bugfuck insane was good for my career. And, it might be good for yours.”

Khan smirks. “I don’t have a career. I have a pile of money and a mansion in South Florida. I don’t need a career.”

“Oh, come on, you’re bored.”

Khan sits on the massage table. “I was about to have two beautiful women give me the happiest ending ever, and you think I’m bored?”

Tim nods. “I’ve been all through here, didn’t even see a computer. You’ve got to be getting itchy by now.”

“Okay, either you’ve got to unplug more often, or your idea of fun is so far off the charts the only reason you’ve still got a badge is they haven’t caught you, yet.”

Tim shrugs a bit. “Not to insult either of your ladies, or the party, but yeah, this is a bit vanilla for my tastes.”

And for a moment, it looks like Khan might believe that, then he shakes his head. “Sure.” Then his eyes scoot back to the ink, and the wrist cuff... He shakes his head again. “So, you’re here because you think I’m ‘itchy,’?”

“Not exactly. I’ve got some rules, and a change in position allows me to put one of them, regarding you, into play.”

“Oh God. Really, you going to try and bring me in, now?”

“No. Rule number five: don’t waste good. You’re good. I don’t want to waste you.”

Khan just stares at Tim, and then blinks, then he squints at him a bit, and blinks again. “Uh... Are... What the hell are you talking about?”

“In January I got a job offer. The FBI is nominally in charge of all public corruption cases. They offered me control of their Public Corruption Cyber Department. They wanted me to go in, worm my way around, and find all the hidden skeletons.”

“Are you offering me a job? For you? As one of your... hackers?”
“Yes, but not as one of my hackers. I’m not the head of Cyber Department of Public Corruption. They offered me that job, and I countered with head of the entire Public Corruption Department. They took me up on it. I’ve got jurisdiction over basically everyone in the US Government, and everyone who works with them. And right now, I’m offering you a team, of your own. We pay out tons of money to different contractors to make sure the government systems are safe. I want you to break them. We’ve got idiots thinking they can hide whatever they’re doing in their private servers. I want you to break them, too. Some of those asshats had bank accounts lurking about all over the place. Go find them.”

Khan stares at Tim for a long moment with wide eyes, and then laughs, loudly, for a long time. When he finally stops he says, “Did you go insane? I am a cyber-felon. I’m not legally allowed to be within ten feet of a computer. I am not one of your white-hatted Dudley Do-Rights.”

“First off, if you’re using the computer for me, you sure as hell can be within ten feet of one. Secondly, I already hired Dudley, and a bunch of his buddies. I’m on the lookout for even more of them, too. I’ve got entire teams of them getting ready to go out and be the Untouchables. But that’s only one front of the battle. I want some snakes in the grass, too. I want you to break the unbreakable systems. I want you to crow as loud as you like about all the hypocrisy you can find.”

Khan runs his fingers through his hair. “You woke up insane. Got on a plane, still insane. Came to my house, totally bonkers. And are offering me a job? Reality no longer has any hold on you. Look, I don’t care about the system being corrupt. I never did. In fact, the system being corrupt was good for me. Money. I like money. I like what money gets me,” he gestures at the house, “a corrupt system got me a lot of it, and unless things have really changed…”

Tim smiles at that. He knows he doesn’t have the budget to pay Khan. He’s fairly sure he’s got a work around for that, though. “You go in once, break everything open, and write up the report. They get six months to make as much of a fix as they can. After six months, you can go in and ransack the place. Take what you like, sell what you can.”

That was exactly what Khan was doing before he got arrested. Well, not the six months of downtime bit. But break into systems and steal the goodies, that’s what he made his first fortune doing. Khan licks his lips. “You can’t make that deal.”

“I’m offering it.”

“Yeah, for five minutes, until they put my ass in jail. Maybe actually toss me in Gitmo this time.”

Tim shakes his head. “Go ahead, sell to the highest bidder. A bit later, we’ll take them down, too. As long as I keep getting reports of what you’re getting, and where you’re selling it, you can do whatever you like with it and you get to keep everything you can take.”

Khan’s eyes narrow. That’s way too damn good to be true. “Whatever I like?”

“Hell, you can hack me, if you can get in. Don’t think you’ll find anything terribly interesting, besides some racy photos. And everyone who might be willing to pay anything for them already has copies.”

Khans eyes skitter over Tim, lingering on what Tim’s wearing before heading back up to his eyes. “I really don’t want to know, do I?”

“I really doubt it, unless there’s a male masseuse hiding around here, too.”

“Uh… No.” He’s glancing at Tim. “Last time you said naked ladies.”
“I did.” Tim grins, remembering when Khan asked how he slept, and he said naked between two beautiful women. “Like I said, your set up here is a bit vanilla for me. Never said I didn’t like vanilla, though. Mmmmm… vanilla. It’s just better with some coffee and maybe a bit of chocolate, too. Variety is good, right?”

Khan looks slightly disturbed. His eyes flick to Tim’s wedding ring. “Okay… So… anything?”

“And you’ll have your own spiffy new badge to go with it. I mean, if you want one. One of the new changes is that anyone who works for the government gave up their privacy rights as soon as they accepted the job. So, no warrants. No having to muck about with getting permission. You want to go through the president’s financial statements? Have at it. You’ve got to toe the line with civilians, unless it’s part of an investigation of a government official. Personally, first order of business, I want you to hack the FBI. I haven’t had the time to really see what sort of a fortress I’m in charge of.”

“So, I hack you guys, and if you can’t figure out how to fix the holes I find, I can go back in and drain the US Treasury?”

“Sure, but…” Tim’s not seeing much point to that. “They print the money. They’ll just keep adding more zeroes to their accounts. Not like they go broke, and inflation will eat up everything you’ve taken.”

Khan’s annoyed by the fact that Tim’s right about that. “Okay, I can hack you, and drain the FBI accounts?”

“If me and mine can’t keep you out, yes. Consider it a bounty on a job well done.”

“I can take all of your undercover guys and sell that to the Mob?”

“That one I’m going to want a heads up on before it happens. But once I know about that, go for it. I’ll follow the money, see who gets told about what, and bust them before our guys are in any danger. Go hack the CIA, find their assets, sell them to the Taliban, just make sure I know who you’re selling before you do it. I’m not leaving my people out there naked, but I’m fine with Ajay Khan returning from the dead, getting back into the hacking game.”

Khan thinks about that, and Tim can see he’s got him interested. Then his eyes narrow. “If everything I sell results in people getting busted, I won’t have any buyers soon.”

“Then come up with a dozen names and bios. Get a bunch of IDs to sell from, hack other hackers IDs if you need a history to work with. We’ll make sure to use what you sell judiciously. Some of it we’ll set up as a way to watch things. Some of the time we’ll give you bad intel to fob off, just to see where it goes and who does what with it. Plus, you’ll know what we’re doing with what you have on offer, before you offer it. No selling bad intel to the Mob if it’ll burn you.”

“If I sign up for this, I end up a government employee, and say goodbye to all my privacy rights, too.”

“You’re a convicted felon; you have no privacy rights.” Tim shrugs. “I can bust you right now and toss you in a hole. Not like the ace up your sleeve matters, not anymore.”

Khan sighs at that. “Fuck. I never should have let you slide on that.”

“But you did, and because of that, if you tell me, ‘Nope, I just want to lay around on the beach, pretend to be Saudi Royalty, and get hand jobs from beautiful ladies,’ I’ll get up, finish my mojito, and head back to DC, and burn any trace of you and how I found you.”
“How did…”

Tim shakes his head. If Khan can’t figure it out, he’s not going to help.

“And if I say, yes?”

“You’ll get an ID, a budget for a staff of ten, you pick them yourself, you can work here, or move to wherever you like. Every week we have a little chat about what you’re up to—‘

“And you’ll be up my ass with telescope making sure I’m doing what I’m telling you,”

“Definitely.” Tim drops the fun, smiley persona he’s been using for this conversation, lets the fact that he knows he’s trying to put a saddle on a tiger come through. “I won’t waste good, but we’re not friends, and I don’t trust you.”

“Ditto.”

“You’ve still got your lawyers, so you can run everything by them.”

“Yeah, because that was worth so much for Clemens’ guys.”

“Irony, huh?” Tim’s smile comes back. It’s even half real.

“Yeah.” Khan pads into his bedroom, and then opens what Tim thought was a closet. Inside there’s a huge, beautiful computer setup. “I’ve just been using it to game.” He strokes his keyboard lovingly. “Be kind of nice to do something interesting with it.”

Tim heads over to him, eyeing the setup. “You could be hacking the FBI before I get on the plane back.”

“But I can’t do anything with what I find for six months?”

“Yeah. Six months from when you report it. You’ve got to give me, and anyone else, a shot at keeping you out. But, go ahead, build the backdoor into the code. You’ve got to say you built it, but not how, and not where. If they can’t find it, have fun.”

“This can’t be legal.”

Tim shrugs. “It might not be, but if it’s not, that’s on me, not you. We’re not getting another Clemens on my watch, and you’re going to help me make sure it doesn’t happen.”

“Shit. I… Why the hell am I even thinking about saying yes?”

Tim has a cocky smile on his face as he looks at the setup in front of him. “Because, you might be a mercenary, but you can’t get as good as you are without loving it. And you’ve been on the shelf too long.”

Khan sighs. “My own ID?”

Tim nods. “You’ll have the chance to build your own team, ransack anyone who’s a government employee, use what you find to enrich yourself, but you’ll have rules, too.”

“Report to you, that’s one.”

“No screwing your team, that’s two. They’re employees, and you’ll treat them well.”
Khan waves that off. He’s got a few people he’s thinking of.

“And you’re going to make sure they play by those rules, too.”

And he’s thinking finding people for this is going to be harder than expected. “They’ve got to find the holes and then just… leave them alone?”

“For at least six months. In some cases, if things are really bad, a year. Got to give them a chance to get things patched up before you go back in.”

Khan rolls his eyes. “What if I want to do this on my own?”

“Smaller budget. Find some people, or don’t, we’ll work with what you’ve got.”

“Will I be on the books?”

“Nope. Ajay Khan is dead. We’ll get a name and social security number for you, but it won’t be your name then, and it won’t be the one you use now. The only people who will know you’re an employee of the FBI is you, me, the new Director of the FBI, and a few congresspeople. And anyone who catches you. You’ll have a get-out-of-jail-free card, and as long as you stay in the USA and keep working with government employees, it’ll work.”

Khan touches his computer again. “I want it in writing. I want my lawyers to look at it. And if the deal is what you say it is…” He blinks looking like he can’t believe he’s doing this, “I’m in.”

Tim smiles. “Excellent.”

“I’m hacking the shit out of you as soon as this goes through.”

Tim shrugs. “Enjoy the pictures. I really liked taking them.”

Khan eyes him again. “I’m going to find six thousand gigs of baby pictures, aren’t I?”

Tim grins one last time. “Those, too.”
Six weeks into his new adventures at the FBI, Tim feels like they’re getting into a routine.

He likes to think of it as: The Same Thing Happens Every Night. (Though it doesn’t.)

These days, because he’s the one who isn’t coming home from the Navy Yard, he’s usually the last one home.

Where home is… That’s a moving target. Sometime in the afternoon, he’ll get a text suggesting his place or Jimmy and Breena’s, and that’s where he’ll head. (Usually, a bit later in the afternoon, he spends some time fantasizing about some of those really big houses in the swanky neighborhoods outside of DC. Someplace with a lot of space for all nine of them. Real estate prices are, as Ed keeps mentioning, and looking pointedly at Jimmy’s place, very reasonable right now. The downside of that is, the value of their homes has tanked, too, which is why he’s fantasizing about the big house, instead of looking through Zillow for one.)

Tonight, home is Jimmy and Breena’s. They’ve been doing that more often of late. Donnie’s growing like a weed, and he’s got his head pretty well wedged into Breena’s hip. So, if she doesn’t have to be moving around, she doesn’t want to be moving around.

Thus, they often go to her, instead of having her come to them.

A bit later in the afternoon, once they know where they’re going to land for the night, another series of texts comes out.

Kids? Me or you? This time Abby’s sending that to him.

They’re more on my way than yours, so I’ll get them.

Thanks.

Generally, if they are going to the Palmers’, he’s on get their kids’ duty. It is less of a trip for him. That said, it doesn’t always work that way, some days he’s on until he’s walking out the door. Some days, even if he is on until he’s getting into his car, he’s still getting the kids, because Abby’s on even longer.

Today, he’s pulling up, seeing Heather’s car in his driveway, and heading inside to the sound of small people laughing.

Heather’s on the floor, in the living room, building up the blocks for Kelly and Sean to knock down. Both of them adores that game, and would happily spend every waking moment knocking down blocks, whacking them hard enough to send them skittering across the room, and (for Kelly) kicking them.

(It’s still a few months off, but Tim knows they’re getting some of those soft, ultra-sized blocks, the ones that are about as big as her head, for Kelly for Christmas. She’ll be able to build towers as big as she is, and run through them. She’ll love it.)

“Daddy!” Kelly’s facing in his direction, so she sees/hears him come up, and leaps up, running for a
Tim scoops her up, and gets a few wet slobbery kisses. (And gives a few back.) While he’s kissing her hello, he scoots around to the other side of the room, so Sean can see him, and once he does, he smiles at his Daddy.

Tim kneels down, putting Kelly back on the floor, pulling Sean into his arms, while saying, “Hi, Heather. Good day?”

“Yeah, it was. Pretty quiet. We went to Petsmart to pick up some extra dogfood for Gibbs,” sometimes bits of Gibbs’ grocery list ends up at the McGee house. Since he’ll see Gibbs tomorrow, he might as well just take him stuff. “and Kelly and Sean both watched the fish for twenty minutes. I’ve never seen anything keep him interested that long.” Heather says/signs everything these days, which Tim appreciates. These days, whenever they’re around Sean, they say/sign everything, too. Tim would be doing it right now, except he’s using his arms to snuggle his boy.

“Kittens!” Kelly adds. She’s got the sign for cats down, and uses it.

“And there were kittens,” Heather adds.

“How many kittens?” Tim asks.

“Lots!”

Kelly’s razor sharp for a two year old, but she still counts like this: one, two, three, many, lots, more. She does hold up all ten fingers, and Tim doesn’t know if that’s her being enthusiastic, or if there were ten cats.

“You’re allergic to cats, right?” Heather asks.

Tim nods. “Why?”

“Well, there was this amazingly sweet little gray one, and since Mona and Jackson can come over as much as they like…”

“You were thinking you could adopt a cat and it could hang out over here while you’re working?” She nods, looking hopeful.

Tim dashes that one. He’s not just slightly allergic to cats. “Sorry. The cat hair gets into everything, so even if you made sure she was out of the house before I got here, I’d be sick all the time.”

“Scratch that plan, then.”

“However, I’m good with dogs, especially small, cute ones, who in a really vicious fit could maybe leap to my mid-shin.”

Heather smirks at that. She’s heard rumors that Tim doesn’t exactly love dogs. “Did we see any puppies needing a home when we got food for Jackson?” Heather says/signs to Kelly.

“No puppies. Kittens, turtle, FISH, hamsters.” Kelly’s very enthusiastic about that and gets about half of it signed, too.

Tim nods at that, too. He glances to the clock on the wall. “Okay, so, it’s time for us to get going.”

“I’ve got their overnight bag packed,” Heather says. Of all the futures Tim could have imagined, the one where his kids have their very own go bags wasn’t in it. But, it’s working out pretty well for them.

Tim shifts Sean a bit, so he’s only in one arm, gets Kelly by the hand, and in a matter of minutes, he’s got them in the car, and is heading toward Jimmy’s.

For all of the kids, there’s an afternoon nap. Molly and Kelly are usually down from a bit after two to five. Anna and Sean still get a morning nap, nine to ten-thirty (ish) and then a shorter afternoon nap. (They usually go down 3:00ish). But no matter when they went down, they all get up about the same time, and for all four of them, post-nap to dinner time is generally quiet time.

When Tim opens the door to the Palmers’ house, quiet time is in full swing. Anna and Molly are laying on the floor, watching Little Bear. (Kelly goes tearing over to join in. She’s seen every episode about nine times, but she loves them all.)

Tim, with Sean in his arms, and two kiddie-sized go bags over his shoulder, heads in a bit more slowly. He kicks his shoes off, lining them up next to Breena’s, Jimmy’s, and Abby’s (he’s the last one in, tonight), and quietly calls out to Kelly, “Shoes, Kelly!”

She meanders back to the mudroom, and puts her flip flops next to Molly’s. Tim’s glad for the flip flops. It’s a lot easier to just tell her to take the shoes off, than it is to get Sean situated, and then get her shoes off.

He heads into the TV room quietly. Like usual, Breena’s taking advantage of quiet time to grab a quick nap. She’s lying on the sofa, dozing. In addition to hip pain, Donnie’s making sure she doesn’t get to sleep for more than an hour or two at a time. (Yes, Breena does have a calendar counting down to two weeks after Donnie’s due date. She knows when her induce labor date is, and how far away it is, to the minute.)

Tim crosses the room, walking quietly, and kisses Breena. She murmurs and shifts a little, and Sean squawks a bit at the amount of dipping he gets as Tim bends down.

“Shhhh…” He doesn’t so much say it, as hum it against Sean’s head, and he does stop fussing. Though stopping fussing likely has more to do with being upright again than Tim’s shushing.

From there, he’s heading to the kitchen, to say hello to his other spouses.

Tim can hear voices, the sound of something sizzling, and small clinking noises that go along with getting the table set for dinner.

“Hey!” He keeps his voice lower than normal, but not the bare hum he was using in the living room.

Abby’s moving toward the sink with a pot of boiling something, so Tim decides she can get the second kiss. He crosses the room to Jimmy, pecks him on the lips, and offers up Sean for some snuggles. Jimmy takes the boy from him, and Tim heads over to Abby, who’s no longer holding a pot of boiled potatoes.

“Hi,” she says smiling up at him.

“Hi back,” he replies, pulling her into a full hug, and a deep kiss. The sweet pressure of her body against his warms him from toes to ears. Maybe, if the stars all align right, tonight will be a really good night.
She pats his ass as he steps back, another hint in the direction of a really good night. “You need any extra hands for this?”

Jimmy says, “Nope, we’ve got it. If you want to begin rounding up the kids…”

Tim nods, knowing what comes next. He takes Sean back from Jimmy, gets him into his highchair, and goes to find one of the wetnaps. Before meals, each child gets a hand wash. For the little guys, Sean and Anna, it’s just easier to grab a pre-moistened towelette and mop them off.

“Kelly, Molly, wash hands,” he calls out. (Breena knows that’s her cue to lever herself up out of lying down, and start blinking, readjusting to awake life.)

Once Sean’s taken care of, Tim heads back to grab Anna. At twenty months old, she does walk, but if you want her in a specific place at a specific time, it’s easier to just pick her up. He found her sitting under the dining room table, which is not precisely en route to the kitchen.

“Come on you, getting ready for dinner!” Crouching under the table, reaching for her, Tim’s speaking and signing, too. At this early in the process, he’s got no idea if this is of any use, at all, for Sean, but it is making it easier for the rest of the family to pick up signed vocabulary, and… Good for Sean or not, it feels rude to talk in front of him without him being able to “listen” so to speak.

She snuggles against him as he picks her up. As he’s carrying her in, he sees Abby mashing the potatoes. “We’ve got mashies!”

Anna can talk, some, but generally doesn’t, so she doesn’t say anything to that, but Tim’s fairly sure she’s smiling. Mashies are the highlight of her dinner.

He plops her down in her highchair, and begins wiping off her hands. She responds by trying to yank her hands away and shouting “NO!”

Tim stares at the ceiling and grabs her other hand. “You’re not going to win this one, love. Hands will be washed before you eat.”

“NO!”

They do this every other, sometimes every third time he wipes her hands off, so it’s not unusual, and at least this time her hands aren’t too dirty, so he gets them done before a high pitched shriek joins the “NO!”

By this point, Jimmy’s got the table set, and he’s heading into the bathroom to monitor the two older kids and see how handwashing is going. In that none of them can hear the water running, Tim’s betting it’s not, as of yet, going.

“This doesn’t work without water…” from Jimmy confirms Tim’s theory on what’s going on. Then there’s the sound of water rushing and simultaneous cries of “Too hot!” “Too cold!” Along with, “It cannot possibly be both at once! Hold still, let’s get some soap on you… Wait, no! DON’T RUB YOUR EYES!”

Tim tries not to laugh, but that’s also about par for the course with their nightly handwashing routine. The girls seem to be under the impression that if they make this miserable enough, the adults may stop demanding it. It’s not going to happen, but he’s still rather pleased it’s his night for wiping off instead of washing off.

Since hysterical crying doesn’t come hard on the heels of ‘Don’t rub your eyes!’ it sounds like Jimmy prevented that catastrophe.
And a minute later, an only slightly soaked Jimmy gets Molly and Kelly into their booster seats, and they are, finally, ready for dinner.

There is nothing in the world all eight of them eat. Okay, not literally true, there is nothing in the world that all eight of them should eat.

So, for example, those mashed potatoes. Those are for the kids, Abby, and Breena. Tim can eat them, but generally doesn’t. Jimmy can eat them, but generally shouldn’t.

The sizzling sound Tim heard as he was heading into the kitchen was kale getting a toss in a hot frying pan with some bacon and pine nuts. All four adults will eat that. (Jimmy would happily eat a plate piled with just that.) Sean will smush it between his fingers if a small piece is put on his plate. The girls will complain, at maximum volume, if any greens show up on their plates. (Though Molly will pick the bacon out, and eat that, while complaining about the green stuff.) So, each adult has a good sized serving, and the kids don’t.

The microwaved bag of mixed veggies (corn, carrots, and peas) the adults will eat, but don’t enjoy. The kids will eat them, too, which is why every, single night, one of those bags gets tossed into the microwave. Sean, whose definition of “solid” is baby mush, or one single kale leaf cooked soft, doesn’t get any of this.

The meat of the night is pork chops, which everyone but Sean eats. So, for a few minutes, Abby, Breena, and Tim are all cutting tiny pieces out of their pork chops to put them on little plates belonging to small people. Jimmy, meanwhile, has the little plastic tub of mashed peas and carrots, and he’s feeding them to Sean.

They came to the conclusion, long ago, that there’s really no point in trying to have a functional conversation during this part of the meal. Right now is about managing kids. So they manage.

Eventually, Kelly, Molly, and Anna will finish their food. Having done so, and gone through another mopping off, they are free to go play.

Sean would likely want to join them, but they’ve noticed that if they put him on the floor, he can’t see the adults on the far side of the table, and that freaks him out. He’ll start yelling if the people he expects to be around get out of eyeshot.

Tim supposes that makes sense. If Sean can’t see you, you suddenly cease to exist, and that’s got to be spooky.

With the three oldest kids down, and Sean working on grabbing his puffed cereal stars and getting them into his mouth, they finally get to talk to each other.

“So, good day?” Tim asks.

Breena nods. “Easy day. Everyone got along.” They all know she means the customers. Her family may have its tangles, but they generally behave at work. Some of their clients… Yesterday, she had a story about the family where the two sons got into a fist fight over who got better flowers for Mom.

“I’m sorry for your loss, hand over the tissues, It’s time to get Mr. Blah to the graveyard, and the “Exactly. The only drama we had wasn’t on my watch. They get to the gravesite, and the grave wasn’t open.”

“Uh…” Tim says as Abby looks appalled at that.

“Yeah. Apparently, and it took us a while to figure this, there are two headstones with Hartman on them, and they opened the wrong one. Fortunately, it was a cremation, and the pastor who ran the gravesite service had a shovel, so he was able to get it open, fast, but…”

“Nothing says professional like ‘I opened the wrong grave,’” Abby says.

“Oh yeah. Mom was pointing out that we’re not the ones in charge of the grave digging, but that wasn’t the happiest client ever. You guys?”

Jimmy takes a bite of his chop. “Dead body this morning, no apparent cause of death. No blood, no wounds, nothing we can see. None of the hints we usually get with an overdose. So, when we pick up Lt. Morgan, we think we’re looking at natural causes, which is weird in a twenty-seven-year-old, but not impossible.”

Abby takes over, because half of this story is hers. “So, I get the bloodwork, and there’s nothing. I mean, Morgan’s in pristine shape, and has not been drugged or messed with on any level. But, he’s also not showing signs of a heart attack or infection, or anything. All of his levels are perfect.”

“I get Abby’s report, and now I’ve got a corpse who shouldn’t be dead. As Duck once said, perfectly healthy people do not just drop dead. Allan and I spent hours going over every inch of Morgan. We checked every organ. No congenital issues. Finally, there’s nothing left to do for it, we’ve got to get his brain out.”

They all know that if that can be avoided, they avoid it, because when Morgan’s family gets his body back, it’s going to be a lot more work to make him look right. Granted, Breena and her family know what to do, any good mortician does, but if they can skip it, they do.

“So, we make the incision at the hairline, and that’s when we see it. A tiny puncture wound right at the nape of the neck. Someone pithed him. Did it just right, too. The spinal cord was soup, but the brain was fine, so there wasn’t anything to see on the brain scan, and since the spine wasn’t broken, we hadn’t bothered to scan the cord.”

“Which means Tony, Draga, Johnson, and Spader are out looking for a primary crime scene, because there was no blood or synovial fluid at the scene, and trying to figure out who knows how to kill a guy like that,” Abby finishes.

“Wait, how do you pith someone without sedating them?” Tim asks. They’ve had some weird cases in the past, but he’s not seeing any situation where someone sits still for that.

Abby takes over, “We did a blood test to see if he’d been drugged. Those came up clean. Once Jimmy found the puncture wound, we tested his synovial fluid. He had enough anesthetic in his spine to put down an elephant.”

Breena shakes her head, and Tim sighs. Some days he doesn’t miss being in the field at all. Yes, what he deals with is frustrating, but he’s fairly sure none of the half-wits he can’t fire intentionally murdered anyone.
Probably.

How many people died because of what those fuckwits did unintentionally is a different story all together.

“Tim?” Abby asks.

He takes a sip of his iced tea. “Beta test of the software program is going well. Fornell’s managed to break it twice, but only twice, and Gibbs had to help him on one of them.”

“How did Gibbs help him?” Breena asks, looking alarmed.

“I think he touched the computer and it froze up in revolt. The netbook I gave Fornell hates Gibbs. If he gets too close to it, it goes on strike.”

“I didn’t think you believed computers did things like that,” Jimmy says, smirking, having seen Tim do his standard lecture, This is a machine, it just does what you tell it to do…

“They shouldn’t, but I know a computer with an attitude when I see one, and that one’s got attitude. Once Fornell’s done with it, it’s going back to IT to get scrubbed.”

“Uh huh…” Jimmy’s giving him a mock stink-eye.

“Or Gibbs really does have anti-computer cooties.”

That gets some sniggering.

“And what happens with Fornell when Fornell gets done?” Breena asks when the giggles subside.

Tim shrugs. “I hope he sticks around for at least a few hours a day, but if he wants out…” Tim spreads his hands wide. “He’s retired. I can’t make him stay if he doesn’t want to. And Wendy’s been beyond understanding. They’ve been married ten months, and he was supposed to be retired for them.” Tim shrugs again, “Hell, if he does stay, he’s volunteering. I know we’re not paying him for anything.”

“How close to done are you?” Jimmy asks between bites of kale.

Tim shakes his head. “Pile’s getting smaller, but I spent today hunting for computer guys and sketching out the base architecture for the triaging system I want for our cases. Ziva, Gibbs, Burke, and Fornell sounded like they were whipping through, but I don’t know how far they actually got.”

“What’s smaller?” Breena asks.

“We’re down to the last two boxes.”

“That’s good!” Abby lights up at him.

Tim nods at that, but the responding smile on his face is limp. “Yeah. Soon we get to see how well I can put the ‘Fear of McGee’ into people.”

“It’s going to be fine,” Breena squeezes his hand.

He inclines his head a bit, and takes another bite of his chop. Then he swipes a bite of Abby’s mashed potato. He likes them just fine, but he doesn’t need the calories, especially with Fornell on a mission from God (apparently) to make sure that Ziva and Dave stay round and plump with a steady supply of cookies and pastries in front of them. Basically, if they’re on her plate, he has a much easier time just having a taste.

And it gives him an excuse not to respond for a few more seconds. Finally he says, “Yeah… Sure… Okay, something else… How’s Allen? I haven’t heard much about him lately.”

His three spouses glance at each other, knowing there’s got to be a big old lump of emotional crap in there if he’s going to shift topics that blatantly, but Jimmy does fill them in on the continuing adventures of Sam Allen, AME (Assistant Medical Examiner) and how he’d signed up with a group that helps to haul rubble out of DC on the weekends.

Jimmy’s shaking his head as he fills in the details, “Almost a year later, and they’re still working on cleaning bits up. Right after it happened, they just lugged stuff to any open spot they could find, just to get it out of the streets, so he was telling me how last week they were clearing out a community garden, stuff like that.”

“Sounds useful,” Abby replies.

“It is. He likes doing it. He’s talking about maybe getting a truck so he can help lug more stuff. And, I’m noticing a certain spring in his step, so maybe he’s met someone while doing it.”

Abby looks up from petting Sean and says, “I have noticed that. He’s been a bit perkier over the last week.”

“If anyone deserves some perk, it’s him,” Breena says.

Jimmy nods. “Oh, that reminds me, his friend is coming in to visit next week. I suppose that could be a source of perk, too. She sounds like an interesting character, and he’s promised to let me take them out to lunch. Should be fun.”

“Is this the lesbian sometimes girlfriend?” Breena asks.

“He tells me they’re all queer, but, yeah, something like that.”

“If they don’t have anything else planned, invite them to Shabbos. I bet Ducky and Penny would like to see Sam again,” Abby adds.

“They’ll probably have something else planned.” Jimmy flashes them a not everyone finds hanging out with their boss and his family the highlight of their week sort of look.

“You saying we’re not exciting enough for them?” Tim asks.

“Yes!” Jimmy says back.

They all laugh at that.

Dinner, the part where the adults get to eat, lasts about twenty minutes. Long enough to talk a bit and touch base, and then it’s back to the managing the kids.

Playtime is next.

Two adults, and tonight they’re Abby and Breena, are on cleanup, and two, Jimmy and Tim, are on playtime. (Since playtime is generally more fun than cleanup, they swap through it.)

Of late, the girls’ favorite game, originally dreamed up by Jimmy, is flying.

Jimmy lays on his back, sticks his feet up in the air, flexing them so they’re parallel to the ceiling, and Tim grabs a child (Sean’s up first) and plops said child on his/her belly on Jimmy’s feet. Jimmy grabs his/her hands, and then rocks back and forth, and lifts his feet up and down, all to the raucous laughter of little people.

The three who aren’t flying are being corralled by Tim. Otherwise, they tend to try and crawl/barrel onto Jimmy, and that only had to knock him off balance once before that went onto the NOT HAPPENING AGAIN list.

They’ve made that a game, too. Tim’s at one end of the living room, and the girls try to run/toddle/crawl past him. He swoops them up, almost tosses them (he doesn’t actually let go of them) and then plops them back by the wall. Eventually, after one of them’s had a few minutes of flying, Tim “fails” to catch one of them, and Jimmy puts whichever child had been riding him down, and grabs the next one.

And on they go.

That’s an easy (if somewhat tiring) way to burn the time where the other half of the team is cleaning up from dinner.

Next up, tubby time.

They’ve broken it into two parts now. For a while all the kiddos were going at once, but that just doesn’t work. Sean’s still small enough that everyone is better off if there’s an adult in there with him, and one grown up, plus four kids, even if, combined, there are fewer than 100 pounds of child, doesn’t fit well into one standard-sized bath tub.

So, first off, Sean and Anna. Tim knows it’s his night with them.

Sean’s on his back, near Jimmy, his feet in the air, grabbing at them, and, often with a surprised squeak, flopping over to his side as he tries to roll.

He grabs Sean, and Abby gets Anna, and up they go.

Tubby time, at least this part of it, is technically speaking, a misnomer. Sean still hates the bathtub. Why? None of them have a clue. But, if an eight-month-old can have a phobia (Jimmy and Ducky assure them that he can’t) Sean’s got one about bathtubs.

However, he’s fine with the shower.

So, step one, Tim’s out of his clothing and the water is on, warming up.

Step two: remove Sean from his little blue onesie with the huge drool spot on the chest and a few mostly dry (ish) smears of dinner. If it was cooler out, they likely would have put some more clothing on him, but no one in their home cares if Sean’s got pants on, and little guy seems to overheat pretty easily, so he doesn’t need extra layers in August.

Step three: remove diaper and deal with localized clean up.
Step four: take small, snuggly little boy, cuddle him against your chest, head under your neck, step into the shower, back to the water, while humming away. (Tonight Sean’s getting a medley of Blue October’s Greatest Hits. Jimmy likes them, so he’ll often have them on when he’s in charge of cooking. Breena really likes some of their songs and absolutely loathes others, so she’s edited the mix. Tim doesn’t know any of the songs all the way through, so Sean’s getting a verse here and a verse there, all sort of mangled together.)

Step five: slowly turn so little guy is in the water and then wash off his back, enjoying the soft, pleasant little cooing sounds he makes because, as long as he’s not in a bathtub, he’s a huge fan of warm water and being gently petted with a soapy hand.

Step six: crouch down onto the base of the shower and end up sitting cross-legged in there. Turn Sean around so he’s face up in his Daddy’s lap, looking at Tim, kicking his feet up, and apply soap all over his front. Sean’s less fond of this part, and absolutely abhors when Tim (or anyone else) attempts to wash under his chin. (Tim’s wiggling his fingers under Sean’s chin, saying, “Yeah, I know. But you smell like Jimmy’s used workout clothing after it’s been cooking in the car for the afternoon. You’ve got to get all clean so you smell sweet for Mama.” Sean is not mollified by that.)

Step seven: stand up again, holding Sean out to the water, so he can get rinsed off on all sides.

Then comes the swap. Abby, who’s been keeping him company, has gotten Anna naked, tidied up, and ready for her shower, takes Sean from him, wrapping him in his brown puppy towel, and hands Anna over for the second shower of the night.

The steps stay the same, but Anna’s a lot easier to get clean. She likes shower time, and though she doesn’t like having her hands wiped off, she’s just fine with getting washed off in the shower. She especially likes it when Uncle Tim washes her hair, because he makes sure to get a lot of suds and then shapes her hair into a unicorn horn, and steps out of the shower, holding her up, so she can see her horn in the mirror.

With the two littlest members of the crew all washed up, and dried, and in their diapers and jammies (this time of year, they’re both in onesies.) it’s time for real tubby time. Tubby time with an actual tubby.

Tubby time where Tim doesn’t have to literally get into the bath with them, though he does sit on the edge, ready to lunge over fast and grab someone if they slip.

And sitting on the edge of the tub, naked, turning on the water, knocking the (by conservative estimate) 40,000 tubby toys into the tub, Tim calls out “Molly, Kelly!” and eventually, he hears Molly scrambling up the stairs, and Kelly’s on her way up with Jimmy’s help.

Jimmy hands the oldest two off, and more or less skips downstairs, looking forward to some quiet, alone time with Breena. Abby chuckles at that, and catches Tim’s eyes. But they both know that, assuming Breena’s not hurting too bad for tubby time, tomorrow night, they’ll do the exact same thing.

Molly can get out of her clothing on her own. She’s got on a t-shirt, shorts, and big girl panties (which she’s still very proud of because she gets to wear them all the time, and Kelly’s only on training diapers). So, to begin their tubby time, Tim’s watching an almost four year old get almost naked, and then wiggle her pink unicorn clad butt at the twenty-six month old while loudly proclaiming her potty superiority.

“Stop it!” The voice of adult authority says, trying hard not to giggle.
Kelly’s not happy about the wiggling, and she’s trying to bite Molly in response. He grabs Kelly. “Really, stop that. No biting!”

Of all of the toddler sibling battles, this is one Tim never dreamed of. Though, they’ve had versions of this over the last few months, and Penny tells him it’s perfectly normal, at least all of her boys did versions of this, and so did a decent number of the grandkids who were close enough in age.

Tim’s absolutely certain nothing like this ever happened with him and Sarah, but… nine years apart. (Though he does have a memory of Sarah working on her potty skills, and being really shocked when standing up to pee didn’t work for her the way it did for him.)

Molly, stopping it, scrambles into the tub, as Tim helps Kelly get undressed. She does have her training diaper and if someone suggests using the potty to her, she’s pretty good about it, but it’s nothing she seems to notice on her own. Which is, apparently, pretty par for the course for this age group.

He plops Kelly in a minute later, and they both do an okay job of claiming different sides of the tub, and different toys, and pretty happily entertain themselves.

Molly’s starting to hit the age where kids actually really play with other kids. Kelly’s still pretty firmly in the age where other kids are just things to her. So, they get along as well as it’s possible for two little people who are in vastly different developmental stages to get along.

They get ten minutes of playtime. That’s about as long as any of the adults want to hover on the side of the tub on lifeguard duty. Then comes washing off time, which both of them are, generally, pretty good about.

Molly’s in charge of application of her own soap, and as long as an adult is around to point out things like, ‘Get your hair’ she’s pretty solid on her own. Kelly still needs to be lathered by someone else.

And both of them love the last part.

“Okay, you two, up against the wall!”

They know what comes next, and they scamper into place against the back wall of the tub.

“Arms up.”

And arms go up. Tim grabs the shower hose, makes sure the spray is warm enough, and gives the magic command, “Twirl.”

He’s got two little, soapy ballerinas twirling around as he rinses them off. He makes sure they do it slow so no one gets dizzy or falls over, and by the time he’s done, they’re giggly, and all rinsed off.

By this point, Anna and Sean, who have been hanging out with Abby, are in their room, in their crib, usually quietly chilling out. It’s not quite sleepy time, but it’s close enough, and as long as Anna’s close enough that Sean knows he’s not entirely alone, he’ll allow Abby to leave the room without having a meltdown.

Which means Tim’s got a second pair of hands to get little girls dried off and into PJs. Getting the girls into their jammies seems to go easier when whichever adult was on hovering duty also gets into his/her jammies.

So, as Tim pulls on a soft t-shirt and a pair of boxers, both of the older girls get into their summer sleep sets, which are also t-shirts and soft shorts. (Tim was under the impression that nightgowns were a thing, but apparently, they’re a major fire hazard, so nothing even remotely like that is going on their girls.)

Then teeth brushing. Molly’s on her own. Abby’s kneeling on the floor in front of the sink getting Kelly’s teeth. Anna’s on Tim’s arm as he uses a tiny, pink toddler toothbrush to get her teeth. Sean’s sitting on the bathroom floor, watching. His three teeth get the last bit of attention for the night.

It’s a lot of people to shove into one average-sized bathroom, but it’s a lot faster than doing each kid one at a time.

And, finally, once everyone is clean, brushed, and dressed, it’s time to hand the kiddos off.

“Storytime,” Abby calls out, and a moment later, Jimmy and Breena are up, and ready to take over the next leg of bedtime.

“Hi,” Tim says to his wife as they finally get a moment alone with each other.

“Hi, back!”

They’re in the living room, on the sofa, enjoying a few minutes of quiet before they head up for final kisses and tuck ins, and then, theoretically, save for Sean’s last nurse of the night, they are more or less (because at least one of them wakes up at least once a night) done with their major parenting jobs for the night.

“You actually free tonight?” Abby asks, some concern in her voice. Tim’s putting in a lot of hours to get his version of Public Corruption up in the air, and most nights, once the kids are down, he’s into his office, or when they’re here, in Breena’s office with his laptop, working away.

Tim shakes his head. “Like I said, I did nothing with thinning the herd today. They’re going to be done with those boxes soon, end of the week at the latest, and I need to get what I want Comey doing set in my head. I need to get this whole dog and pony show set.”

“You need thinking time?”

“Writing time. I’ll start it as a scene… How would I like it to look if I was writing the dramatic payback scene? Then figure out how close I can get to it.”

“Sounds like a good starting place.” She’s kneeling next to him on the sofa, gently petting the back of his neck.

“I hope.” He leans his head back, letting it rest in her palm, and closes his eyes. He’s sincerely looking forward to this weekend. That’s the promise he’s made to himself and his family, Friday night and Saturday, he’s off. He’ll work extra on weeknights and Sundays to make sure he gets those hours with them.

So far, it’s working.

“Good night!” He’s kissing little, sleepy, shampoo-smelling heads, and creeping out of the dim bedroom Sean and Anna are sharing.

He, Breena, and Abby head down. Jimmy’s going to spend a few more minutes up there, lurking around, waiting for the traditional post-bedtime request.

There’s always at least one, and as Tim’s closing the door to Breena’s office, he hears a tiny voice asking for water, and Jimmy responding with, “There’s a sippy cup with water in it in on your bed.”

“I dropped it.”

Tim smirks, feeling Jimmy’s sigh, and hearing heavy footsteps crossing the upstairs, and the sound of the door to the room Kelly and Molly share opening. “Molly, you know you’re allowed to get out of bed to pick things up off the floor. Get your cup, and then go to sleep.”

---

Writing. Tim’s got his earbuds in, and his music going, as his fingers go flitting over his laptop. It’d feel better on his typewriter, but these days, that lives in his office at work.

He pauses, eyes skimming what he’s just done.

It makes him smile. It’s the wanton destruction of pretty much everyone who used to work in Public Corruption. It’s a massive, bloody festival of firing, with a lot of these assholes going to jail, too.

None of that’s going to happen. But, it did feel good to get it all written down. It was lovely to imagine.

Back to the beginning.

He checks the clock, it’s a bit after nine. He’ll give himself another hour, and then call it a night.

A “realistic” plan takes a lot longer.

When he calls time, as the soft sound of Sean crying for food fills the air, he’s got a few paragraphs.

Mostly, he’s staging Comey’s resignation. He’s got that first right now, but… He’s not loving it there.

As he heads up to grab Sean and bring him down to Abby, he’s debating how to do this. Should all 700 of the Public Corruption guys be there to watch it? And does there mean, literally physically in DC?

An image pops into his head. Congress, the ruins of it, is still closed. People can go on the steps, visit and see what’s left, but they can’t get any closer than that.

He wonders, as he’s lifting Sean up, if Jarvis would be willing to let him get a lot of people a whole lot closer to the destruction, if it were for a very good cause.

Another thought, as he’s bringing Sean down to Abby, is that if he offers Jarvis a large amount of slave labor on punishment duty, say… for 24 days or so… Jarvis may give them access to the White House grounds, what’s left of them, anyway, for a few hours.

Tim likes the idea starting to form in his head.

He’s got the sense that Comey resigning in front of the burned out hulk of what used to be where the President lived would be an awfully picturesque sort of moment.

Last (usually) (if they’re lucky) parenting task of the night.

And this is one of Tim’s favorites. Granted, he doesn’t have to do all that much for this one. He’s just on transport duty.

Sean’s first and last meals of the day are nursing with Abby.

And, as often as he can, Tim makes sure to wrap up what he’s working on so he can get back to his family for this.

They’ve been watching Westworld, getting ready for season two to begin. He’s seen, maybe, if he adds all the bits and pieces together, a combined total of two hours. It sounds like the kind of show he’d like to watch, but if he makes them wait for him, it could be 2019 before they get around to it.

He catches however many minutes as he can during this bit of time.

Tim hands Sean over, and snuggles in next to Abby. All four of them fit on the sofa, as long as they’re happy to be close in and snuggly, and they are. Jimmy’s got one arm around her, and one around Breena, and with Tim snuggled in on her other side, his cheek is resting on her shoulder, against Jimmy’s hand.

From here he can relax, close his eyes, doze a bit, or watch Sean nurse, petting him some, or, sometimes, especially if he got to see the earlier bit of the episode, actually watch the show.

He’s mostly resting against Abby, helping to keep Sean in place, and thinking about what sort of “help” Jarvis might still need on fixing up DC, especially, dirty, hard, messy, and nasty jobs.

He’s got a feeling that his people, if they want to keep their jobs, are going to be doing some “volunteering.”

“It sounded like you were really typing away in there,” Breena says as they start getting ready for bed.

Tim nods, brushing his teeth.

“Breakthrough?” Jimmy asks, taking out his contacts.

“Maybe, your comments about Allan got me thinking some. If I can swing it, I think I’m going to make them all come to DC, stick them in whatever little hellhole I can find, and then give them to Jarvis for three weeks of ‘volunteer’ labor.”

“Punishment duty so bad they resign rather than do it?” Abby asks as she reaches for her toothbrush.
"That's the idea. I've got to make sure I can do it, but… They're FBI Agents, as long as it’s legal, if I tell them to jump, they're supposed to say ‘How high?’ and if they don’t, I can fire them."

"You think making them clean up DC is legal?" Jimmy asks.

"I really hope so." He finishes up his teeth, puts a note to investigate that into his phone, and then begins to pull off that t-shirt and boxers.

It's bedtime.

---

Snack sex, meal sex, and banquet sex. Tim’s had, and loves, all three, but most nights are meal sex.

And, given how the rest of life works, that’s probably about the balance he likes. Sure, a bit more snack sex would be nice, but… He doesn’t work in the same building with any of his loves any longer, and little kids have made the morning quickie more or less a thing of the past. (Or a weekend only treat.)

Tonight is another meal sex night.

This is sleepy, tucked in, relaxed and slow sex.

Usually, he and Abby stay together for this, and Jimmy and Breena do, too. Sometimes they switch things around, and (more often these days as Breena gets more pregnant and her hips want less and less to do with sex) Jimmy joins Tim and Abby for a three-way.

But, for all the many ways bodies can fit and slip together, if what you’re looking for is a soft, relaxed, end the day with a happy glow, that works best with two bodies.

Breena’s looking to play today, so it’s each original couple on their own.

He and Abby start off facing each other, kissing, petting, talking a little. Mostly they’re just basking in each other, reveling in the slide of wet tongue on wet lip, taking pleasure of skin on skin.

She’s sucking on his bottom lip, and he’s gently stroking her butt, enjoying the smooth heat of her skin, and the very pleasant fullness of her bottom in his hand.

Abby’s leg slides up his, and his hand trails down her back. And both of them make little happy noises as they rock against each other.

Tim would like to be rocking a bit more intently, and maybe a bit more of an in out sort of motion, but they’re still in the using condoms phase of sex, and neither of them wants to roll over and grab one, yet.

So, for right now, this is good. Warm skin, the brush of Abby’s pubic hair against his skin, kissing, so much kissing, all of that sparkles through him.

He hikes her leg a bit further on his hip, so he can reach around, get to her clit from behind, and adds a soft roll of his fingers to the mix.

Abby shudders all over, making a soft uhn sound. Her eyes slip shut, and her mouth falls open. He moves his fingers just a bit faster, swallowing another of those little, breathy moans with his kisses.

She’s rubbing her thigh against his dick, and he’s making a few uhn sounds of his own.
Abby rolls him over onto his back, and sits up, straddling him. For a moment, Tim grins, enjoying the view. He enjoys it even more when she leans forward, breasts hanging in his face, grabbing a condom and lube. He happily nuzzles her, gently, looking forward to the time when her breasts are fully back in play again.

She slips back, straddling his thighs, and gets everything set. He still doesn’t love the cool, clammy sensation of a condom being rolled down his dick, but a moment later when Abby follows it, everything is good.

She’s hot and snug, wrapped around him in exactly the right way, and rising and falling on top of him. It’s his favorite sight, along with one of his favorite sensations, and he gets to bask in her body, and the pleasure of it.

And with widening the circle between them, Jimmy and Breena come back into view, too. They’re on their sides, about a foot away, rocking slow and easy. Tim’s right hand is toward Breena, and it’s not like he’d be doing much with it for Abby, anyway. So he takes that hand, and holds Breena’s, as he gets his left hand back into the game, finding Abby slick and ready, and making those little circles she loves so much.

Abby leans forward, hands on the bed next to his shoulders, her hair falling around them and he groans low and deep, happy to be kissing again.

Wet lips, wet tongues, wet pussy, wet dick, all of it slipping and sliding, slow and easy, just creeping toward bliss.

He can feel it building, just an inch or so beyond him. His thighs get tighter as he moves faster, hips rocking harder. Abby’s moving faster, too, taking him deeper. He can feel her growing tighter, too, more grip, more friction, more pleasure, more everything.

His right hand tightens, left working faster, thumb flying over Abby as she slams down on him. She’s sucking, hard, on his lip, and his jaw’s clenching.

Everything goes fast and tight, heart pounding, galloping, racing for the edge.

There a second where it feels like everything pauses, though Tim knows they don’t pause, and then he’s over the edge, tingles coursing through his body, hot, wet, pulses making his hips jerk staccato, and Abby groans, loud, twitching on him.

A few seconds later, as Abby’s lying on him, and both of them are breathing hard, resting, they hear two more come cries, high and low, and feel the bed shudder again.

Tim smiles, very sleepy. Abby kisses the tip of his nose, and apparently has enough energy left to lean over and kiss Breena and Jimmy, too.

Tim squeezes Breena’s hand, and pets Jimmy’s side, and, after a minute of clean up with a tissue, he’s snuggled back in next to Abby, and ready for a good long rest.
“Gotcha!” Fornell says, slamming down a file.

The rest of the crew looks up at him.

“This one! This is the bastard you fry!” He’s looking especially pleased with himself, as he reaches for a biscotti and dips it in his coffee.

“And who are we frying?” Ziva asks, looking pleased at the distraction from her own case file, which is just depressing. Apparently, the guy in her file was just fond of the IRS, and did whatever he could to prevent anyone from making a case against them.

“Murdock Harris. He’s a mid-level supervisor, and a case fell into his lap. Apparently, an anonymous source in the FEC gave the FBI a tip that things weren’t exactly on the up and up.”

“What’d he do with it?” Gibbs asks, and Burke watches, eyes bright, as they talk.

“Nothing. He took possession of it, listed himself as the agent in charge, and just left it alone. No follow up, no questions, nothing. Someone gave us a tip that the FEC wasn’t investigating financial irregularities in Congressional elections, and we killed it.”

“The Welcome to Congress slush fund?” Ziva asks.

Fornell pats the folder. “Looks like it. The tip is vague, but it does specify that it was system wide, and the people involved were extremely well-connected.”

Tim nods. “Stick him in a new pile, call it the ‘Crucify’ one. Anyone who’s got a case that directly relates to everything falling apart, goes in that one.”

Fornell gets up and grabs a new box, tossing Harris in there. Gibbs also gets up, and starts going through their prosecute file, which is where most the people who had cases that directly tied into everything falling apart ended up.

Tim’s staring at his computer screen. Up on it is the name of the head of HR. The person who’s supposed to know all the ins and outs of what he can do with his employees.

She’s not a lawyer, so there’s no expectation of privilege.

He supposes he could talk to a lawyer, but… Tim shakes his head; he doesn’t want a breath of this idea getting out, and right now, he’s got no one he trusts on this.

Better to apologize after than seek permission.

His eyes flick to Gibbs, who is shuffling files around.

Fuck it. Worst they can do is fire him. And right now, if he can’t fire these guys, and he can’t discipline them effectively, he doesn’t want this job. He’s here to change things, not just put a smiley face and a new coat of paint on the same old wreck.

He pulls up Jarvis’ number, and makes the call, asking for an appointment. The first Governor of the State of Columbia can squeeze twenty minutes out of his schedule in two days. That’s long enough for Tim, so he signs on for it.

Then he starts googling the FBI Employee’s Union. If you know you’re going to get into a fight with a dragon, you might as well try to defang the dragon before it bites.

―

“Director McGee!” Jarvis has what looks like a genuine smile on his face. His much older face. The lines are deeper, the circles under his eyes are darker, his hair is whiter, everything about Jarvis looks old. If you were to ask Tim how long it’s been since he’s seen Jarvis, based on how Jarvis looks, his best guess would be fifteen years.

But, if he’s remembering correctly, and he may not be, the real answer is ten months.

Apparently it’s been a long ten months, and on Jarvis, it shows.

Except his eyes, they’re still bright and focused.

Granted, he’s got a cigarette between his lips and appears to be mainlining caffeine, (the only time the cigarette leaves his mouth is when the coffee cup replaces it) so a lot of that focus may be artificially enhanced by the careful application of chemical aid.

“Governor Jarvis,” Tim replies, also smiling, and offering his hand. Even with the shock of seeing how much he’s changed, Tim’s still pleased to see him. And he’s got the feeling he’s about to make Jarvis’ day, which brightens his smile.

The twenty minutes Tim could grab are the ones where Jarvis is walking from his office to a lunch meeting.

And Tim’s got his suspicions that part of why they’re strolling across DC, (He supposes that one day he’ll start calling it SC, because it’s not a District any longer. Since May, it’s the State of Columbia, not the District.) is that no one can keep an ear on them. Tim didn’t specify he was looking for that, though he did request a private chat.

“Looks like your fortunes have been on the up and up,” Jarvis says. He may look old, but his pace is fast.

“So far, so good. And I’d like to talk to you about making them better, for both of us.”

“Both of us, I’m intrigued.” It occurs to Tim that part of why he’s enjoying this is that Jarvis isn’t nervous. Just about everyone he’s called to deal with, out of the blue, has been jittery about having the FBI Public Corruption Director give them a call. Jarvis is acting like Tim’s an old buddy here to see him.

Tim supposes, to a degree, he is.

“I’m guessing by the Director you’re familiar with what I inherited.”

“The Anti-Corruption Department That Couldn’t.”

Tim inclines his head. He appreciates Jarvis’ play on the Little Engine That Could. “Sounds about right. 700 people, most of them were willfully looking the other way, and the rest were incompetent, or got transferred out of the department within six months.”

“Wonderful.” Jarvis’ dry sarcasm is still intact, and if anything, made sharper by the rasp of cigarette deepened voice. “And how is this going to benefit me?”

“Apparently, I cannot fire people for willfully looking the other way or basic incompetence.”

Jarvis keeps his eyes on Tim, inhaling fast and deep on his cig. “Maybe. There might be a way around that. I’ve certainly got my people testing it out.”

That’s interesting to Tim, but he knows their time is tight. “I’ll ask you about that in a minute before I lose my train of thought.”

“Okay. Where are you going with this?”

“Discipline. If I can’t get rid of them, I want them to leave. And I want the ones who are serious about staying to do some major penance. They are going to prove to me that staying matters to them.”

“Okay…”

“I’ve got seven hundred warm bodies. I want to drop them in the city, and make them help clean up. What could you do with twenty-four days of slave labor?”

Jarvis’ eyes light up and a grin flashes across his face. “Besides kiss you?”

“Yeah. NO. Lips that touch nicotine don’t touch mine.”

Jarvis smirks. “Uh huh… Yes, I could find stuff for them to do. I can beyond find stuff for them to do.”

“I also need a place to keep them. I don’t think I can put them in direct danger, but if you’ve got an un-air-conditioned building a hair’s breadth on the right side of condemned where I can make them camp…”

That smirk morphs into a grin. “Oh, yeah, I’ve got one. I’ve got hundreds of them. So, the city was nailed down for 24 days, they’re going to fix it up for 24 days, is that what you’re looking for?”

“Yes. I can’t burn them out, shoot at them, or starve them, so they won’t get the full experience, but I can give them a taste of it, and I can make them help to clean up the mess they helped make.”

Jarvis is very pleased by that idea.

“Okay, tell me your employment thing,” Tim adds, before he forgets that. Jarvis gets out his phone and texts Tim a court case that means nothing to him. Tim looks up from it and says, “I’ve got nothing.”

“I didn’t think you would. Before I ended up in charge here, I didn’t know it either. Amalgamated Transit Union V. WMATA. That’s the test case that makes everyone else wet their pants when it comes to trying to get rid of incompetent employees. The Metro wasn’t doing its maintenance the way it was supposed to. Things get screwed up, train fills up with smoke, ninety people got hurt, someone died.”

“Great.”
“So, they fire the guy who was supposed to do the maintenance. You’d think, ‘multiple people hurt and one died because you didn’t do your job’ would be enough to get you fired, but, no. The courts found that because no one was doing their job properly, they couldn’t single out that one guy for not doing his.”

Tim sighs. He’s not immediately finding that useful. Jarvis is looking at him expectantly, so he thinks about it, hard, for a moment, and then finds the twig he can stand on. “You can’t fire one guy for not doing his job if everyone else isn’t doing it. There’s no test case about what happens if you fire all of them.”

Jarvis smiles. “Now, I’d rather like it if you waited until after you made them all work for me before firing them all, but I think, if you’re willing to take out the entire department, they will not be able to bring a counter suit against you.”

“Or, at least, I can bluff with it, if the Union screams about my brand of ‘discipline.’”

“You can certainly do that.” Jarvis is looking ahead, and Tim can see they’re less than a block from the restaurant he’s got his meeting at.

“One more favor, I’d like to get them up to the White House, and yell at them mercilessly about how they fucked over their whole country by not doing their job.”

Jarvis smiles at that. “I like the way you want to do this, but, can I make a suggestion.”

“Suggest away.”

“You’ve got FBI Agents. Almost across the street from the Hoover Building is the National Archives.” Tim’s aware of that the same way he’s aware of the fact that the house across the street from Jimmy and Breena’s is white. He knows it, but never thinks about it. “The building is, as you said, a hair’s breadth on the right side of condemned. It was looted and the fire damage is cosmetic, but ugly. But, it’s also made of steel and stone, so it’s stable.”

Tim’s following along, but other than an easier to manage location, he’s not immediately seeing why the Archives would be better than the White House.

“When we finally got people into there, we found that hundreds of thousands of documents were gone. In fact, the only two we know are still there, we can’t get to. The original Constitution and Declaration of Independence are in their vault, under the ground, and as of right now, we can’t get them up again. Those vaults were designed to survive a nuclear attack, so we’re awfully sure that everything is safe down there, but the mechanism that gets them back up is destroyed beyond repair, and getting an excavation unit to dig those documents up is so low on the list of priorities, no one’s even remotely interested in doing it. Right now, I think rescuing those documents is on the calendar for some time around ’22.’”

Having said that, Tim gets it. His people all swore an oath to uphold the US Constitution, and because they failed, it’s trapped under the earth in a burnt out building.

“That’s a fabulous suggestion.”

“The rotunda should be big enough for them all to squeeze in for your dressing down. It was designed to have people in and out of it. And unlike the White House, it’s still structurally sound.”

“Jarvis, thank you. I’ll let you know when I’m ready to do this. All I need from you is someone to oversee where my guys will go and what they’ll do.”
“I’m certain I can find someone for that.” They’re at Jarvis’ next meeting. Tim nods at him, Jarvis heads in, and Tim heads off feeling a bit of lightness in his heart.

“Is that really…” Burke says.

“I think it is,” Ziva replies as Gibbs sets it on top of the table.

“The last box,” Fornell adds.

“I didn’t think we’d ever see it,” Burke says, pretending to look around the room for more of them. “You’ve got one hidden in the closet, right, Ziva?”

Ziva smirks at that. “I had Jackson bury one in the backyard.”

That gets some laughs.

“One folder maybe.” Fornell pets Jackson’s ears. Jackson looks up from the nap he was taking on the top of the table. Like Dave, he’s growing fast. Unlike Dave, he’s supposed to max out at eight pounds. He’s probably threeish these days, but he’s at least dog-sized (very small dog-sized) instead of guinea pig-sized.

Having been awakened, Jackson gets up, trots over to the box, and looks into it.

Gibbs reaches in, takes the top folder off the pile, and places it in front of his chair. He looks over to Tim, who hasn’t been part of this for days now. “You ready for what comes next?”

“Getting there. How long for this one?”

The four at the table all glance at each other, “A week, tops,” Ziva replies. They’ve been working backwards, lower level employees to higher level ones. This box is it, the top brass. The longest careers, the most cases, the most connections. It’ll take longer than the previous boxes, and has fewer folders in it, but with all of that, it’s still twenty employees, and there are four of them working on it.

Not more than a week.

Tim nods. He begins writing the email, requesting time to talk to Comey.

Email written, plans with Jarvis starting to gel, it’s time for Tim to get into the rest of this.

This.

The dog and pony show of all dog and pony shows.

And he’s got to be the ringmaster.

The Director.

There are layers here, identities Tim’s had and has and cultivated over the years. This one here…
He’s hoping this is something he can wear, like a suit, and just as easily take off.

Tim, Probie, Thom, McGee, Boss, those are all ideas and ideals of himself, and they’re more importantly, all him.

But he doesn’t want this one to be him. He may need it, especially for this, but… It’s a role. Something he’s playing for a few days.

He hopes.

There’s a fine niggling sensation that The Director may be him, too. A part of him he doesn’t like. A part he can’t, shouldn’t let out all that often.

A part that’s vastly too close to The Admiral for his comfort.

He knows it’ll take time to properly build The Director. This isn’t going to be the sort of thing he can do on a whim. And he hopes, that if he does this right, and builds it in steps, that when he’s done with this, he’ll be able to take The Director off, stuff him in a closet, and with any luck, never have to take him out again.

“Hey, Tony.”

“Tim?” Tony’s voice sound surprised to hear Tim. “Not that I’m not happy to hear from you, but it’s ten on a Thursday.”

“You mean, why didn’t I just ask Ziva about whatever it is, since she’s sitting fifteen feet away from me?”

“That would be the subtext.”

“Because she told me to call you.”

“Interesting. This isn’t a case is it?”

“Not exactly. You know the put-the-fear-of-McGee into them thing I’ve got to do with these twits I can’t fire?”

“Yeah.” They’ve been talking about the basic ideas of it for months now. And specifics for days. “Ziva told me about your meeting with Jarvis and the Archives idea. I’m buying popcorn, giving the team the day off, and Draga and I are going to go watch from the back.”

Tim rolls his eyes a little at that, but… actually, it might be nice to know there’s at least a few friendly faces hiding back there. “Yeah, thanks. Look, I need to look the part for this. You still in touch with Dominic Lawson.” It had taken Tim a while to remember the name of Tony’s tailor, the man who had made his good date night suit, and the tux he’ll wear to Gibbs’ wedding. In fact, he’d been wracking his brain about it, when a little idea popped into his head, go look at the label and lo and behold, there is was, Dominic Lawson, Men’s Fine Tailoring

Tony groans. “Shit. No. His whole street is gone. After it all fell apart, I looked for him, googled him, and used the resources we’ve got. You know, just wanted to see if he was okay. Can’t buy a suit from a man twice a year for more than a decade and then leave him high and dry, but… Nothing.
I checked with the records to see who owned the mortgage on the property, and who was insuring it, and neither of them have had any contact from him, either.”

“Damn.” Tim’s feeling cold at the idea of that man, who he knew, at least a little, destroyed in the fires.

Tony tosses him a thin hope, one he’s been holding onto, too. “Only upside is that he’s not officially among the dead, either. I keep telling myself he went back to Milan. He’s safe and fine in Milan.”

“Okay.” Safe and fine in Milan sounds good to Tim, too. “You got a number two guy?”

“No, but I’m sure Senior does.”

“I’ll give him a call.”

“So, what does look the part mean?” Tony’s been enjoying the secondhand bits and pieces he’s been getting on how Tim intends to stage this, and if he can help, he wants to. He’s got a feeling that all of their family who lived through the fall, want a hand in the smack down that’s coming.

“That’s part of what I was hoping Dominic could help me with. But, I’d imagine it means finally breaking down and getting the traditional navy blue power suit with the red tie.”

Tony smiles at that. “It’s good to know you’ve at least got the basics.”

“Yeah, I figure for the FBI, especially, all of them should have that look emblazoned somewhere in their subconscious as BOSS.”

“And if they don’t, by the time you’re done, they will.”

“That’s part of the plan.”

“You busy for lunch tomorrow?” Tony asks.

“Not as of right now.”

“Good, meet me at the Archives tomorrow, and we can talk about making this look right.”

Tim appreciates that. He works with words, sounds. Tony works with images. He’s got how things should look to make them grand in his head. Between the two of them, they should get this staged within an inch of its life.

Like many of the buildings in SC, the Archives looks awful.

Unlike many of them, it just looks awful. From what Tim can see as he’s waiting for Tony, there’s nothing wrong with it (that he can see from the outside) that a power washer, the attentions of a team of talented glaziers, and a few good masons couldn’t fix in a week.

It’s covered in soot, smoke damage, and graffiti. There are still drifts of broken glass on the grand staircase leading into the rotunda.

The whole building is a large marble rectangle, with a bunch of architectural do-dads (Once upon a time, Tim knew the difference between a Doric or Corinthian column, and he knows that he used to know what the fussy looking bits all around the top of the building were, but he’s not coming up with them, now.) added to the edges. It probably doesn’t matter that he can’t name what those things are, or more rightly, were. It looks like someone with a rifle thought it’d be fun to use them for target practice. There are bits of marble littering the ground around the Archives, and small chipped holes all up and down the walls that Tim knows were made by bullets.

Up the stairs, there’s a piazza, fronted with huge columns. He’s standing in the middle of it. Right in front of him is where the doors used to be, and above and around them, there used to be windows. Right now, there’s a huge collection of plywood boards, hammered into place.

According to Jarvis, as long as he’s got his badge with him, and puts it back when he’s done, no one will give him any flack for prying his way in. So, he’s got a crowbar, too.

Tim sets the crowbar to the most likely piece of plywood. A moment later he hears, “You’re not wasting any time.”

“Hey, Tony.”

Tony walks up to him, and gives him an extra hand pulling the plywood down.

They duck through the small opening in the wall of hastily put up wood. Inside the air is dank, dusty and dim. They can see the places where the plywood isn’t flush, because fine lines of light stream through. Tony pops on his flashlight, scanning the rotunda. Tim mentally curses at himself for not having one. He’s out of practice at this sort of adventure.

“This feels familiar, doesn’t it?” Tony says.

Tim smiles at that. “Oh yeah.” His nostrils flare at the scent. “You think we’ve got a body in here?”

Tony shakes his head. “Not the kind we’ll get concerned about. I’m thinking that’s a bunch of birds or squirrels.”

Tim inhales again. He can smell unwashed person and sewage. “Squatters, too.”

Tony nods. “No power, right?”

“No power, no water, no gas. Everything’s turned off, and supposedly boarded up.”

“You walk the perimeter?”

Tim shakes his head. He really is out of practice. He should have, but he didn’t.

“You’re getting rusty, Probie,” Tony says with a smirk.

“That’s Director Probie, to you.”

“Uh huh. So, we gonna get the power on?”

“Nah. I’m thinking we’ll take the plywood down, and use that for light.”

Tony turns to face where the windows used to be, running his flashlight over broken windows. “It’ll be light enough to see.”

Tim’s nodding at that. He taps Tony’s shoulder, and gestures to the rest of the rotunda. Tony obliges him by slowly turning around, and playing his flashlight over everything.

The first thought in Tim’s mind, as he catches little glimpses of the rotunda in Tony’s tiny circle of yellow light is that there’s no possible way that many leaves could have gotten in here. There just aren’t enough trees in the downtown for the floor, especially in the corners, to be filled with leaves.

It takes a moment for him to realize those thin, crinkled, mostly brown and yellow things are paper.

He swallows hard. “God.”

Tony nods. “Yeah.” He’s not anything like a history buff, but even he can look at this, put together what he’s seeing, and feel the ache of it.

Tony pulls the light closer to them, pointed to the floor in front of them, which is clear of paper. His voice is rough, not on the verge of tears or anger, but tired, as he says, “You know, you think it’s in the past, mostly it stays there, and then…”

“Then it jumps back up and grabs you by the throat.”

“Yeah.” Tim can hear Tony grabbing something from his pocket. He hands Tim the flashlight, and there’s the soft crinkle of a wrapper opening. A moment later, he can hear Tony chew. Then he hands the granola bar to Tim, who also takes a bite. It’s food, real food, and that helps with the wave of feeling stuck in the past.

Tim holds the light up, looking higher. The walls of the rotunda had murals. He can still make out a few details, but mostly he’s looking at graffiti.

Tim heads over the reason there is a rotunda, to the display cases where the US Constitution, Bill of Rights, and Declaration of Independence used to be on display.

They’re shuttered and empty. “Jarvis says they’re down there. The vault is designed to handle anything anyone can throw at it, so they’ve got to be down there, but no one’s got the time or money to get them back up.”

Tony nods at that. “One of my buddies at Metro says that just the missing persons’ cases alone are eating up a third of their time. They took their entire Vice department and put them on missing persons’, and they still don’t have enough people on it. No one’s sparing a second for this sort of thing.” Tony sighs shaking his head. “Come on, let’s get out of here. Talk where there’s air.”

“Sounds like a good plan.”

Once they’re on the steps, the Tony that he wears as his own armor slips back into place. “So, I’ve been thinking about your put the fear of McGee into them technique. Have you ever seen Glengarry Glen Ross?”

“I don’t even know what that is.” Tim assumes it’s got to be a movie, but that’s all he’s got on it.

“That’s what you’re looking for. It’s got the ultimate Boss chewing out the underlings, explaining what they’re going to do and how they’re going to do it scene.”

Tim shrugs. “I think I’ve got that part of it.” After all, he’s already experienced, first hand, all the Boss chewing out underlings any man needs. He’s got an awfully good idea of how to do this.

“No, really. I mean, you need to see it. Alan Baldwin’s pretty much only in that scene, but he’s got it. He’s exactly who you’re going for. You want them about to wet their pants and he just nails it. The power suit, the attitude, the—“

“Tony.”
“Seriously, Tim, this is the—“ “Tony…” That time it gets through. Tony stops talking about Glengarry Glenn Ross, and watches Tim. “I’ve got it.” He keeps his voice soft as he says that, and for a moment Tony’s just watching him, not getting it, and then he is.

“Oh.”

“Yeah.”

“You’re going to do… him.”

“Yeah.” Tim nods, teeth gritted. “By the time I’m done, each one of them should be ready to disembowel himself just to get me to stop.”

“Should you go there?”

Tim shrugs. “I’d rather just fire them.”

“I know, but…” Tony glances away from Tim, and then back to him, “You gonna be you after this?”

“I hope so.” Tim’s looking across the street and down a bit, to the Hoover building. “I think it might be like fighting. It’s me. And keeping it tucked down, tied up, and tossed in the attic might not be the best way to deal with it. Learning how to control it, use it for something good… That might be important.”

Tony follows his eyes, and imagines the guys in there. “There’s a difference between knowing you’ve got some dark squirrely bits in there, and using them, and cruel for kicks. Sometimes those dark bits need to stay in the attic.”

“Maybe. Probably. Somehow I have a feeling that if all I do is verbally smack them on the wrists, this won’t really sink in. I need them ashamed. I need them looking in the mirror and not liking what looks back at them. I need to crush any lingering, ‘I did what I could,’ ‘Everyone else did it,’ ‘Letting things slip isn’t a big deal,’ kind of thoughts.”

“You sure?”

“No.”

“What do you want? What’s the win condition on this?”

“I want them gone! I can’t get that, so somehow I’ve got to turn these guys into people who do their jobs, all the time. I need them to understand that what we do has echoes bigger than they can possibly imagine.” Tim kicks a bunch of the glass aside, and sits down on the steps. Tony sits next to him, and hands him the last bite of the granola bar.

Tim’s still watching the building as he chews. “It never really hit his eyes, you know?”

Tony doesn’t know, but he can guess, so he nods.

“My Uncle Mike said that, too. He’d be screaming you out, words that make you want to die, really die, and it never hit his eyes. It was an act. A good one. One that hurt. But… he could have been buttering his toast for whatever was going on in his head.”

“Okay.”
“I’ve been thinking about that for the last few days. He had these people, and he couldn’t get rid of them. You’re on a tiny ship in Vietnam, and you’re stuck with whoever you’ve got. You can’t just dump ‘em and get new people. And your life depends on making them do what they’re supposed to do.”

Tony nods again.

“He couldn’t dump me, either.”

Tony puts a hand on Tim’s back. “Yeah, but his life didn’t depend on making you into a sailor.”

“I know. I don’t think he ever got the idea that not every problem is nail, so you don’t always need to bring out the hammer.”

Tony’s watching Tim, and he quietly says, “But you’re thinking it’s time to bring out the hammer?”

“I think I’m looking at a lot of nails.”

“A slap to the back of the head is a wakeup call.”

Tim nods at that. “Oh yeah. This is going to be the headslap of all headslaps, and once it’s done, it’s done. That’s the difference; I’m not doing this again. I don’t know if I can do this again. Right now, it looks like I’m going to have to slap more than six-hundred of these bastards.”

“Ziva said you may have a way to get rid of all of them.” He points to the building behind them. “Just leave this and get rid of them.”

Tim shrugs. “Maybe. If I fire all of them, the way I wanted, I may be able to win the court cases, and there’s my blank slate. Five years from now. You know as soon as I send out those pink slips my Union will have their pet judge give me an injunction requiring me to put a hold on that until they can take the case. And, especially, if it looks like I may win the case, they’ll toss up every pause they can find to drag it out forever. So, best case, I get them off my payroll before you retire, but not by much.

“Worst case, if I try to get rid of all of them, and fail, I’ve got nothing. There’ll be no reason for any of them to investigate anything they don’t feel like, ever again.

“If I surgically pick the ones I really want to get rid of, I can use the threat of getting rid of all of them to get rid of the worst of the bunch, and leave the ax hanging over the heads of the rest of them.”

“Thread the needle.”

“Yeah.” Tim swallows. “And if I can dig up enough stuff about the guys in our union and their finances, I may be able to get a wider definition of ‘cause’ the next time we renegotiate the contract and finally be able to start firing people for screwing up.”

Tony snorts at that. “Uh huh.” He leans back, staring at the sky. “You know, it never, ever occurred to me that Gibbs couldn’t fire us.”

Tim lifts his hands in a I didn’t know, either sort of way. “Never hit me, either. I was terrified of putting a toe out of line the first… five years… sure he’d slap that pink slip upside the back of my head, and life would be over.”

“Exactly.” Tony glances behind him, getting back to why they’re here. “Open up those windows, light streams in… You go where the Declaration of Independence used to be. Get a stage or something, make sure you’re at least a bit taller than the rest of them.”

Tim’s nodding, he understands what Tony’s planning.

“I talked to Senior.” He takes a bit of paper out of his pocket, handing it to Tim. “This is the guy who makes the suit you want. You’re going to need to go to New York, though I suppose for the Director of the FBI’s Public Corruption Department he may come to you. And while you’re up there, you get shoes. Don’t put on a four thousand dollar suit and eighty dollar shoes. You get the tie, the pocket square, and the watch. The guy you’re pretending to be for this doesn’t wear a smart watch.”

Tim likes his watch, and more than that, he’s not feeling any desire to buy an expensive watch. “Think Senior’s got one I can borrow?”

“Probably, and if he doesn’t, Ducky does.” Tony looks behind them again. “It’s a shame they can’t smell it, you know?”

Tim nods along at that. “Yeah. It’s not exactly minty fresh in there, but it’s not…” Tim’s not even sure he could find the words to finish that sentence, capture the way DC smelled after the fires and before they got out, but he doesn’t need to. Tony was there; he knows.

“No, it’s not.”

“You really going to come watch?”

“You want me to?”

“Yeah. It’d be good to have someone in there who remembers Tim. Might need a headslap or two of my own when it’s done, just to get back into myself.”

“I got ya.” Tony stands up, and smiles. “You can always count on me to apply any headslaps you may need. Come on, let’s get that piece hammered back in place, and then I’m taking Ziva out to lunch.”

“I think she’ll appreciate that.”

As they’re hammering (with Tim’s crowbar, proving that just because the problem is a nail, that doesn’t mean you need a hammer) the plywood back into place, Tony says, “You know, the Pirates are doing well this year.”

Tim sort of nods while making an affirmative noise. That basically means he’s aware of the fact that the Pirates are a baseball team, and as such, they probably played some ball this year. Beyond that, he’s been clueless.

“Like, really well.”

Tim nods again.

“Earth to McBlivious. The Pirates. Gibbs’ favorite team, playing his favorite sport.”
“Right!” And the light begins to dawn. At least, Tim’s understanding why Tony might mention this.

“And here we are, in need of a bachelor party idea.”

And the sun crests the horizon, fully lighting up the sky in swirls of pinks and orange. Now, Tim fully sees the light.

“And if they were to get into the World Series…”

“Ah!” That sounds like a good plan to Tim, who, because he is not Fornell, has given no thought to what Gibbs’ bachelor party will look like. Then another thought hits, “Isn’t that, like, Halloween-time?”

“Yeah.”

“So, we go to Pittsburg, for what, a night, when we’ve got a not even month old baby at home?”

Tony’s starting to look a little worried. “When was the last time you did anything that wasn’t the job or your kids?”

Tim shrugs.

“Yeah, you need to unplug some. You’re getting so into this, you’re losing the wider world. Which means, in addition to taking Ziva and Dave out to lunch, you’re coming, too. Tim, you have access to a jet. We could leave at three, head up, have dinner, catch the game, and be home by midnight.”

Tim rubs his eyes. That’s a relevant point about the wider world. And then the narrow one comes crashing back into Tim. “And we’re talking about bringing Leon, too, right?”

“That’s the plan.”

“Who also has access to a jet, and unlike me, isn’t going to have a bunch of people watching him with a microscope for anything untoward, like using his jet access for a family party.”

“Okay, that’s a good point, I’ll talk to him. But you’re also proving my point about unplugging. So, if the Pirates hit the World Series?”

“Get the tickets.”

“And no matter what, this weekend and next weekend, you’re on a work-free zone, okay?”

Tim nods. “Okay.”

Tim gets to talk to Comey later that afternoon. It’s not a pleasant chat. There’s an air of finality about the whole thing. But he explains his plans for the Archives, and Comey nods along.

“We’re within fifteen employees of being done,” Tim says, getting the ball rolling.

Comey nods. “How many passed?”

Tim sighs. “Of seven hundred and twelve employees, I’d outright fire six hundred and thirty of them if I could.”

Comey shakes his head, staring out of his window. He doesn’t have clear line of sight, but, if he did, less than half a mile down the road would be Congress, or what’s left of it.

“And given what you can do?”

“I’ve got at least twenty-two I’m going to put on leave immediately and attempt to prosecute. Tuesday we should wrap up with the review, and first thing on Wednesday I’m chatting with our legal department to get the ball rolling on them.”

“That’s six hundred and eight left.”

“There’s another thirty I will outright fire, and if the Union screams about it, I’ve… hopefully got an ace up my sleeve.”

“Do I want to know?”

Tim shakes his head.

“And even if I did, you wouldn’t tell.” Comey still hasn’t looked away from the window. Tim’s not entirely sure what he sees when he looks out there, but Tim knows what he sees, a lot of battered, blackened, plywood covered buildings.

This time Tim inclines his head in agreement.

“Five hundred and eighty-eight,” Comey adds.

“Yeah. Five hundred and eighty-eight employees I need to figuratively beat into shape. I’m hoping I can get at least half of them to resign.”

“Good luck.”

“You standing up there and falling on your sword will make it easier.”

“I imagine it will.” Comey’s voice is listless as he says that. Tim gets the idea that this really ending is sinking in for Comey, and he’s not sure what to do with himself as a result.

“What will you do after?”

Comey shrugs. “I’ve got subpoenas from Congress coming, so I can’t leave the country. Patty and I might go West. We haven’t been to the mountains in decades. I’d been telling her for years that I’d take more time off. I guess it’s time.”

“Yes, it is. Suggestions for your replacement?”

“I have several, but you don’t get to know about them ahead of time.”

“Lovely.” Tim’s voice is also flat. He’s not sure who he’s getting next, or if he’ll be able to work with him.

“They’re all straight arrows. You’ll be able to work with any of them who may get approved. They know who you are, and approve of what you’re doing. As long as the President goes along with someone from my list, you’ll be able to keep doing, as well as you can, what you’re doing.”

“Thank you.”
“So, when?” That’s the question all right. When…

Tim likes the poetry of October. He likes the idea of a year to the day. He loves the idea of all of his people stuck in some mostly wasted building, chilly, overworked, and stuck having to relive those twenty-four days.

He also knows that this is going to be, at best, emotionally difficult, and as he sees every time he looks at Breena’s due date count down, a certain little boy is supposed to show up sometime around October 5th, and the last thing Tim wants to do is miss that because he’s busy summoning up his inner asshole to go yell at other assholes.

No, when Donnie shows up, he wants all of this behind him. The wants The Director to be a memory when he’s snuggling their youngest boy, not something he’s dreading.

“First week of September. We’ll start then.”

Comey nods. That gives them two weeks.

“Send out the email calling them all in.”

On Friday, August 18th, 2017, almost every member of the FBI’s Public Corruption Unit gets an email telling them they are to report to the National Archives, September 1st, 9:00 AM. They are to bring at least a week’s worth of gear, and any leaves not covered under the Family and Medical Leave Act are cancelled.

Tim decides that anyone who lived in DC through last autumn is off the hook for punishment duty. They’ll get called in for the formal dressing down, but they won’t have to be on clean up duty. As Fornell put it, ‘They were here, McGee, nothing you can do to them will lay a glove on that.’

Tim figures Fornell is right about that.

Once he hits send on that email, he’s done for the week, and off for the weekend.

They can sweat it until Tuesday.

Chapter End Notes

And, I’m sure none of you will be shocked to hear that Amalgamated V WMATA is a real case. Technically it’s pending right now, but I’m jaded enough to assume that the courts will not overturn the decision of arbiters, who decided that not doing your job, even to the point of people dying because of it, is not grounds for termination.
The Fear of McGee: Props

Chapter Notes

Sorry it’s a bit late, so, instead of Merry Christmas, I’ll wish you all a Happy Boxing day, or just a good Monday if it’s not your celebration.

:)

Tony was absolutely right. Tim’s not been doing a good enough job of unplugging. And he can feel that on Monday, when he gets back to it, after a weekend where he was really “off.”

He’s feeling a lot more human, much better rested, and much more firmly himself, than he has in a while, and he’s got the feeling he’s got to find a better anchor, some sort of touchstone he can access when he’s at work, because nothing about the job is going to be getting any easier soon.

But right now, he’s feeling pretty good, and about to go do some, at least marginally, fun, stuff.

Technically, today he’s ‘working,’ but he’s also ‘out of the office.’

He’s on his own until 11:00, then up to New York, where, apparently Senior’s waiting for him, along with Ducky, and between the two of them, they are going to make him look like the kind of guy who belongs in the four thousand dollar power suit.

(According to Tony, Senior’s been happily planning this for over a week now, looking like Professor Higgins about to get his hands on Eliza Doolittle. Tim’s not sure if he should be scared or relieved. He is pleased that Ducky intends to drop in for this, too.)

The first part of today is about setting the scene. As Tony said, if only they could smell it.

Tim’s not sure if he can get what he wants, but if anyone can do it, he knows the lady who can.

This is also, firmly, in the territory he’s comfortable with.

There’s only so fast a man can go through cologne. Tim thinks about some of the people he’s worked with, arrested, or been in the same room, or worse, car with over the years. People who had all but visible smell rays of cologne pouring off of them. Okay, there’s only so fast Tim will go through cologne. So, after that first spasm of getting every scent that looked fairly interesting to him, Tim settled down to use the ones he’s got.

Which means he’s set, cologne-wise, until roughly 2028. The girls might get him some new ones if they pique their interest, but he’s in no danger, at all, of running out.

So, he hasn’t been by to Janice’s perfume shop in the last year, but he’s looking forward to the trip.

She’s still in the same small boutique in a strip mall. Her main sales area is still small, still very clean, still doesn’t smell like much of anything. The only thing that’s really changed, that Tim can see, is Janice has purple hair now.

“Hello Writer Cop,” Janice says to him as he looks everything over.

He smiles at her. “You really have a great memory for people.”

She waves that off. “So, what are we doing for you today?”

Tim heads to her glass counter. “I’ve got a few, odd, and very specific requests.”

That gets a grin out of Janice. “I like odd and specific.”

“Yeah, well, once you hear these you might think twice about that.”

“Intriguing.” She’s eying him up and down, trying to imagine what he might be about to ask for.

“I hope.”

“So…”

“Dead bodies.”

He is satisfied to see Janice blink at that.

“Yeah. I need eau de corpse, a lot of it.”

“Ehhhh…” She rubs her lips together, looking like she’s about to run away. “Well… Uh… What’s a lot?”

“Say, enough to make about 500 people feel like they’re going to choke on it.”

Now Janice is looking really horrified. She blinks a few more times, just staring at Tim, who’s trying to do his best, I’m not a serial killer expression. He’s fairly sure this isn’t going to get any further without some explanation from him. “Okay, without getting into the specifics… Were you in DC after everything went crazy last year?”

She shakes her head a bit, somewhere between a ‘yes’ nod and a ‘no’ shake. “Our apartment was in DC. We lucked out, were here when everything went crazy, and couldn’t get back in. At first, that was terrifying, and then as more time went on, and they put the barricades up, we were both thanking the Goddess that we’d stayed at the shop. As soon as they opened the borders, we went back, but only stayed for a day.”

Tim makes a compassionate sound, and then says, “Sorry. I was at the Navy Yard. Couldn’t get out for three weeks.” They share expressions of how fucked up that was, then Tim goes on, “Look, I’ve got a bunch of people who weren’t in DC, and I have to make what DC was like real for them. And I figure I can do pictures, and I can put up recordings, I can make them talk to survivors and clean up the mess, but until they can smell it, until it’s in their clothing and hair and skin, it won’t be real.”

She thinks about that, and finally says, “You’re right. But you’re not looking for eau de corpse. You’re looking for a layered scent. Dead bodies, yes. Smoke, too. It won’t be right without the smoke. Wood smoke, tire smoke, chemical smoke. Rotting trash. No pickup for weeks. Shit. In a lot of areas when the power cut out the water stopped working right, too, and that meant sewage got out of hand.”

“You offering to make it for me?”
She thinks about that. He can see her doing the mental calculations of how long it’ll take, and what she’ll need to make it, plus the hazard pay for having to subject herself to putting it together. “You have an expense account? ‘Cause this is going to make Thousand And One Nights look like that dollar a gallon ‘cologne’ you get at Walmart.”

He smiles. “Yeah. I do. And I’m going to need enough to make an area big enough for 500 people reek of it.”

“A few pounds should do it.”

“Good. That’s the first part,” Tim says.

“What’s the second part?”

“I’ve got your Lightning cologne, and that storm scent makes some people nervous.”

Janice seems pleased by that response. “It’s supposed to.”

“Can you make something to push that up a few notches? Something not just storm-like, but predatory, but also subtle enough that they don’t know what they’re smelling?”

She shakes her head. “I can get you two out of three. If you want to stick with subtle enough so they don’t know what they’re smelling, stay with Lightning. I can add animal musk, or other predator notes, but it’s going to very quickly get into an extremely distinct scent, one that people don’t usually wear. Pretty much, you’ll end up smelling like the big cat house at the zoo.”

Tim shakes his head. “Yeah, I don’t need that.”

“Can I ask why you want something that unsettles people?”

“On a very general level, because I need a lot of people to be unsettled.”

She flashes him an I’m not being nosy, I’ve got a point here look. “Unsettled, or scared?”

“Why?”

“It sounds like you want a bunch of people to feel pretty awful, and… there’s this thing you can do. You’d have to test it on yourself first, make sure it doesn’t freak you out, but… Infrasound. Sound waves around 20 hertz. You get that frequency, and people freak out. That’s the theory for why people feel cold spots, hear voices, see things moving out of the corners of their eyes. That’s the idea of what ghosts are. That sound, we can’t hear it, not really, but that’s what big cats growl at, and that’s the thrum of an oncoming earthquake or tsunami. We’re not aware of it, consciously, but for something like 25% of people, that’ll push their freak the fuck out buttons. It’s designed to make people, animals too, run away from it.”

Tim smiles. “That’s interesting. They think that’s what triggers ghost sightings?”

“It’s one of the ideas.”

“Huh…” He grabs his phone and writes a note for himself to research that further. “Yeah, I’m going to have to look into that.”

“You want people associating ghosts with you?”

He’s serious as he says, “I want people associating ghosts with not doing their jobs.”
“That’s likely the way to do it. Again, only works on some people, though.”

“Some people is better than none.” And Tim’s fairly sure that if he sticks five hundred plus people in a building that’s in as bad of shape as the Archives, lit only with the sun coming in from the front windows, hits them with that smell, and then makes some of them feel the heebie-jeebies, all the rest of them will, too.

---

Next stop of the day, New York City, except, of course, it’s not. The Five Burroughs and Long Island are now New York. To the North and West of him is North York, which given the shot to get free of (or rid of, depending on who you ask) it’s urban neighbor, it did.

Everyone seems to think they made out pretty well on that deal, but the dust hasn’t exactly settled, yet.

For Tim it means very little. The names may have changed but the layout still looks the same.

Like with his Miami trip, he’s deciding having someone else plan his travel is really nice. First off, once he was done with Janice, he hopped onto one of the FBI jets, and then, an hour later, he was at LaGuardia.

Not having to get to the airport two hours early, and then wait is rather nice.

Not having to strap himself into a Herc is even better.

Being able to sit down, comfortably, and actually work on a plane is fabulous.

Granted, he’s not loving the work. Janice handles his email, so he knows that the batch he’s looking at is just the cream of the crop. But as he’s scanning through the pile, he’s noticing a certain theme, along the lines of “WHAT THE FUCK DO YOU MEAN DROP EVERYTHING AND SHOW UP IN DC FOR A WEEK?”

He’s tempted to write a one line response, “Did I stutter?” and fire that off to all fifty-six of the emails asking him this.

He actually does write it, looks at it, smiles a bit, and then deletes it. Most of the people emailing him are ones he’s likely going to have to work with again.

So he writes another email, a professional email, making sure he’s got a firm, no BS tone, stating again that, unless you or your immediate family is in the hospital (and yes, he will be requiring a doctor’s notes), your butt better be in DC on the 1st, or the 2nd is your last day at the FBI.

He adds that everyone who needs to be there has gotten the email, and if (because there are some) one of your employees didn’t get the email, that’s perfectly okay, no that person was not overlooked. He/she just doesn’t need to be in DC.

Any cases being worked on need to be wrapped up by then, and if they can’t be, they are to be put on hold.

He gets one email he thinks is especially valid, where three of the people, fairly low on the totem pole of screw ups, are currently undercover, so he adds that anyone who is undercover can stay that way, he’ll handle the issue with them when they’re back with the rest of the FBI.

The emails asking why they all need to get there, and what’s going to happen, he ignores.

The fall of DC hit everyone by surprise, and he’s not about to give these guys time to prep.

Ducky and Senior are waiting for him at LaGuardia.

Giving Ducky a ‘hello’ hug is easy. He doesn’t automatically fall into a hug with Senior, but he also doesn’t leave him with arms open wide, just waiting.

Once Tim steps back from Senior, he rubs his hands together, looking Tim up and down, smiles and says, “Oh, Tim, this is going to be fun.”

Ducky chuckles a bit at that, as Senior leads them through the crowds, toward his car. “And how is the ‘put the fear of McGee into them’ plan going, Timothy?”

Tim shrugs. “Well, maybe? I have the feeling I may be about to hit it out of the ballpark, or miss it completely, and I won’t know until I actually swing at the pitch.”

“You’re going to hit it out of the ballpark,” Senior says. “And we’re going to get you ready to do it. Junior says this isn’t your normal style…”

“I wear suits.”

“Not your normal management style,” Ducky adds.

Tim hadn’t thought about it like that, but, he’s right. “Yeah. If it’s up to me, I either find a way to nudge people into doing what I want them to do, ignore them and work around what they’re doing, or get rid of them.”

“The management style of the second or third-in-command,” Ducky says.

“Or the man with a small enough job he can do it by himself,” Senior adds.

“Yeah, probably. I’m afraid that if I use my usual ‘nudge them in the right direction’ technique, I’ll just get more of the same problem I’ve got now. The last time I took over a department, I was able to get the people I wanted to work with to stay with me by making it a better work environment, the ones who didn’t left, and the iffy ones, I was able to work around by creating that better work environment.”

“And that’s different than this time…” Senior leads.

“Yeah, the last group I got was about 150 people, and I’d say 100 of them were solid, twenty of them were iffy, and the other thirty were dead weight. I’ve got 700 people, and maybe 200 of them are iffy, and another 400 are dead weight, thirty of them are going no matter what, and twenty-two are going to jail. You can’t change a culture by letting your good people flourish when they’re outnumbered seven to one.”

“So, you wish to provide the proverbial slap to the back of the head,” Ducky says.

“A hard one. And, given how some of these guys behaved, I want the slap to the face, too.”
“That’s dangerous territory, Timothy,” Ducky says. “A wake up call is motivating. An insult…”

“Tim, you’ve got to let them save face,” Senior adds. “If you ever want to get anything out of them again…”

Ducky nods. “The headslap lets you know you’ve screwed up, but not so badly that you can’t recover from it. If they can’t recover, there’s no reason for them to ever try.”

Tim thinks about that, not entirely sure where that line is going to be. He’s not sure if some of them should ever be able to recover. “I’ll keep it in mind. Any concrete suggestions?”

Ducky shrugs. Senior nods to a car, it’s a black Lincoln, and a driver has just hopped out to open doors for them. Once they’re in, he says, “Make sure you talk to each one in person. That’ll give you a much better idea of if you need to go for the back of the head, or the face.”

“Thanks. So, where are we going?”

Brooklyn. They’re going to Brooklyn.

“Mr. Huong and I go way back. His father bought this building from my father, and for a few years we both worked on the crew.”

Tim still has a hard time wrapping his mind around the idea of Senior doing anything more strenuous than folding his money or seducing heiresses, but… he wasn’t born 80 years old, obviously he had to have a life before Tim knew him.

“How did Mr. Huong go from construction to tailoring?” Ducky asks.

“He was always a tailor. His whole family. However, during The Depression, the market for bespoke men’s clothing dried up. Huong Senior moved into construction. His sons did, too. It was the early fifties before he was able to scrape up enough money to reopen his shop. Once he had it running, and enough clients to keep the bills paid Mr. Huong left construction and went back to tailoring.”

“You’ve known this man for… sixty years, and you still call him Mr. Huong?” Tim asks.

“When you see him, you’ll understand. He was sixteen when I met him the first time, and he was still Mr. Huong back then. Granted, part of that was because a lot of men would call him Charlie, or Chink. That name was armor for him.”

Tim nods slowly and blinks. 1952, or whatever year, probably wasn’t too welcoming for a Chinese-American.

Senior’s old. No two ways about it. Ducky’s old, too. They’re both well past the point of pretending to be middle aged.

That said, Mr. Huong is ancient.
He can’t weigh more than a hundred pounds, if he’s got more than nine hairs on his head, Tim wouldn’t believe it, and his spine has started to curve, so his head comes to just a bit above Tim’s elbow.

But his eyes are bright and steady, and he moves easily. And, of course, he’s dressed impeccably.

“Mr. DiNozzo,” he says with a small nod and a tiny smile. Tim gets the sense that Mr. Huong likely doesn’t smile much, and that this is an effusive greeting, for him.

“Mr. Huong!” Senior’s voice booms, and he wraps Huong into a less than comfortable hug.

Once Senior lets go, Huong says, “You’ve brought friends.”

“I have. This fine gentleman is Ducky Mallard, and the young one is Timothy McGee.”

Huong focuses on Ducky first, which Tim figures is par for the course. Ducky’s older and gets more respect from any culture that values age. Then Huong turns to Tim, looking up at him, critically eyeing his outfit. “Is this what you normally wear?”

He’s in black jeans and a gray t-shirt. His computer and gear is in a go bag, draped over his shoulder. It’s August, and he’s not going into work. He didn’t see any need to pile on the clothing.

“It’s what I normally wear when I don’t go into the office.”

“It’s what you’re comfortable in?” Mr. Huong asks, still eyeing him.

“One version of it. I’m comfortable in most…” he stops at that, he might be making more of a statement than he wants to, “anything you’d be likely to make for me.”

Huong seems amused by the way Tim edited that comment, and a tiny smirk crosses his face. His eyes land on Tim’s wrist, but not the one with the cuff. “Your normal watch?”

“Only one I own.” It’s a navy blue Apple watch with the gold frame. “Tony… Junior… told me I should borrow a better one for what I want to do. And I’m going to need a recommendation for somewhere to get shoes.” Tim’s wearing sneakers right now. They’re very comfortable, but nothing about them says, Look upon my works and weep!

“You’ll need a tie, too?” Huong says.

“Probably a few of them. I’ve got to wear this get up for at least two weeks.”

Huong nods, and then, as if conjured by magic, two more men show up, and if Tim had to guess, they’re Huong Junior and Huong III.

Huong III gets to work measuring him, while Huong Junior takes pictures of him. Tim doesn’t remember that being standard suit getting procedure, but he doesn’t have much time to dwell on it.

“You work for the FBI, right?” Mr. Huong asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah. I think I need to look like the Archtypical G Man.”

Huong seems to think about that, while Senior says, “Think?”

“Yeah. I’ve got some very clear ideas of how a lot of this works, but that one… I’m less sure of. Do I need to be the platonic ideal of THE FBI or do I break the rules?”
Huong’s eyes flit to Tim’s wrist cuff, and the bit of tattoo he can see peeking from under his t-shirt sleeve. “Two weeks?”

“Yes.”

Huong nods again. “What color suits do you already own?”

“Black and dove gray.”

“How do you feel about vests?”

“My wife likes them. I like her liking them, but on my own I don’t much care.” Tim turns toward Senior and Ducky. “If I was writing it, I’d leave this bit blank. I’d just have, ‘puts on suit’ and let the reader fill in the blanks. So… I say ‘Jump,’ and I want them all to leap up shouting, ‘How high?’ what do I go for?”

“What’s your mental image of that?” Senior asks.

Tim has two images that pop into his head at that idea. “Not appropriate for this. It’s a naval uniform or a polo shirt under a jacket.”

Ducky seems amused by that answer.

“We could give you a more military cut,” Huong Junior says.

“No,” Tim replies. Even if that does up the ‘toe the line’ factor, he doesn’t need to be wearing anything that looks like a uniform. “I know that.”

“Wouldn’t look right,” Huong III says, and gets a tiny smile from his grandfather. “Doesn’t have the posture for it.”

“Thank you,” Tim replies.

“Slim cut, long, elegant lines. Draw the eye up your body, make you look even taller,” Mr. Huong says.

Tim smiles, amused by that. He supposes that if he looks even taller, he’ll be somewhere in skyscraper territory for Mr. Huong.

“The traditional power suit is navy blue or charcoal gray,” Senior says. “That’s the ‘do not mess with me, I’m about to destroy your business with a merger you don’t see coming’ look. But, by traditional, I mean, it’s what Ducky or I would wear. Perhaps you don’t need to go for such a… traditional look.”

“At least, not for the whole time,” Ducky adds. “Begin with the classic suit.” Ducky eyes Tim. He’s never spent any time thinking about what colors might flatter Tim, but he is now. “Charcoal, not navy blue. Start with the crisp white shirt and the maroon tie. The classic image. And from there, begin to make it your own.”

Tim nods at that, he likes that idea.

Huong Junior has left, and comes back a moment later with a book of fabrics. Tim associated those with buying furniture, but apparently this is also something for suits, too.

“Some of our younger, less classic clients prefer a vibrant pattern,” Huong says as his son shows off the fabrics.
Vibrant is right. These are retina thrashers. Tim’s looking through a collection of colors and patterns, that, were they not being handed to him in a tailor’s shop, he would have thought were supposed to be furniture. He supposes, maybe, some of them, might, possibly, be in the running for a suit… Assuming that suit was for a Louis the XIV cosplay.

Tim rubs his lips and chin. “I’m not that adventuresome.”

Ducky laughs, and Mr. Huong flashes that tiny smile again.

“Oh, so one in basic charcoal gray. I’m good with that. No vest on that one.” Because in his mental image, a power suit doesn’t have a vest. “How about medium gray with some sort of pinstripe?”

Huong Junior heads to the back again, and returns with another book of fabrics. Everything in this is gray, ranging from, the only reason he knows it’s not white is because it’s in the book, to the only reason he knows it’s not black is because it’s in the book.

Tim flips through it, trying to imagine a full suit of any of these. He comes to a few conclusions. A: He likes his pinstripes not all that much wider than a pin. If it’s bigger than his finger, he doesn’t want it on his suit. B: No checks. Hounds tooth may be great for Ducky, but not on him. C: Classic charcoal gray doesn’t have to be just one color.

There’s a tight pattern of small squares. Tim supposes it might be sort of plaid-like, other than the fact that there’s only the two colors and they’re charcoal gray and slightly lighter charcoal gray.

“Oh, this is for the classic suit.”

Another fabric seems to jump up at him. It’s not “classic.” It’s probably not something too many guys would get, but…

“This one for the not-classic look. With a vest.”

Mr. Huong seems to approve. It’s a medium gray with a slender pinstripe in a soft, dusty jade green that looks a lot like Tim’s eyes. Tim’s fairly sure it’s not a traditional suit fabric, but he doesn’t much care. This one can look like him.

Or a version of him. Maybe he wears the charcoal on the days he meets with the ones getting their faces slapped, and he wears this one on the days when he’s slapping the backs of heads… Different looks for different effects… He can see that.

“How are you set for shirts?” Huong Junior asks.

“I’ve got more than enough, I do need good ties, and handkerchiefs, and… whatever else.”

Mr. Huong seems doubtful about Tim’s shirt situation, but he’s not willing to challenge him on it. He does shoot a pointed look at Senior.

“Timothy, do you have anything with French cuffs?”

Tim thinks about that. “No.”

Senior and Mr. Huong share a look, and a nod. And without a word being spoken, Tim’s fairly certain he’s getting some shirts, too.

Ducky’s been wandering around the shop, looking over the ties and other accessories. The suits may be made bespoke here, but the ties aren’t.

After a moment, Ducky’s back with four of them, maroon with a navy diagonal stripe, an emerald and gold paisley, cobalt with tiny navy checks, and black with a jade diagonal stripe. There’s also a bowtie.

Ducky smiles up at him, as he offers that, and Tim shakes his head. He cannot imagining himself in a bowtie. Maybe Jimmy, but not him. “But if you want it for you, I’ve got nothing against buying early Christmas presents.”

Ducky chuckles and puts the bowtie back. Though a moment later, Tim does notice him grabbing a different one, this one a dusty gold color with what appears to be small maroon elephants on it.

Mr. Huong circles around Tim a few times, eyeing him. “Normally, I wouldn’t suggest this, because there’s something about a clean shaven man, but…”

Senior’s got it and is starting to nod. “Haircut, too.”

“Yes. Mr. McGee, you have a very young face, and you’re also wearing a young haircut. Which is, in most cases, perfectly fine. But you’re about to make sure that everyone in the room knows you are at the top of the pecking order, and looking a bit older would help.”

Tim inclines his head, he figures Huong isn’t wrong about that. He does run his fingers through his hair. Abby and Breena, and (maybe) Jimmy like it on the longer side, and it’s really only gotten back to where it was before he shaved it all off last year.

But, unlike the last time he buzzed his hair almost all the way off, his face isn’t nearly as round as it was, so he didn’t look nearly as much like a fluffy cue ball as it grew back in. Shorter hair didn’t look stupid, and maybe if someone who knew what they were doing were to get a hold of his head…

“A good haircut, and in your case, growing out a goatee or beard would likely help you to look older,” Mr. Huong says.

“The few times I’ve seen you wear one, I thought it made you look older, too,” Ducky adds.

Tim doesn’t like the idea of growing the goatee again. Though, as he thinks about it, part of not liking it was having everything with the Stennis associated with that look. That’s the face he was wearing when The Admiral won.

But he’s not winning any more.

And if it helps…

Another layer of this hits. If he cuts his hair, he can’t change that quickly. He’ll still look like The Director when this is done. If he grows the goatee, and… fills in his eyebrow… once he’s done, he can peel The Director off of his face and go back to being Tim.

He likes that idea, a lot.

There’s not much left to do at that point. He’s measured. The styles for the suits have been picked. The fabrics chosen. Ties and pocket squares purchased. Supposedly, at the end of the week Huong III will join him in DC with the roughed out suit, and once the fit’s been fine tuned, the pieces will be sent to Hong Kong, fully assembled, and sent back to his door.
He should have everything by August 29th.

Tim’s not shocked that Senior has a barber. He’s less shocked that the man is able to get them in on short notice. He is surprised to see the gentleman in question is somewhere in his early thirties, apparently specializes in hot towel shaves, and does not appear to own a pair of scissors.

Tim asks about that, because he can see the man has some sort of small holster on his hip, and there’s what looks like half a pair of scissors sticking out of that. His name is Henry Mack, and he not only isn’t Mr. Mack, he may have never heard of the term Mister before. He takes the razor out of his holster and whips it around his finger.

“Razor cuts, Tim. More control, more precision, and, well, you feel like a total badass wielding a straight edge.”

Tim imagines that’s so. And Senior happily smirks at the idea, while he and Ducky chat about there’s nothing like a proper hot towel shave.

Tim’s somewhat intrigued to attempt that as well, but A: he’s growing out his facial hair, and for him, every day counts, and B: he’s getting low on time as it is.

Mack’s got Tim in the barber’s chair. He’s running his fingers through Tim’s hair, playing with it a little, and if one of his loves was doing this, Tim would think it feels pretty good. Okay, even with a stranger doing it, it feels pretty good. It would feel better if Abby or Breena or Jimmy were doing it.

“So, what are you thinking?” Mack asks.

“Older,” Senior says.

Mack nods. “Yeah, your current cut isn’t helping with that, at all. This almost has a nineties kid surfer vibe going to it.”

Tim shrugs at that, too. He was a nineties kid, and actually, back then, his hair did look a bit like this, only he wore it a few inches longer back then, and at least these days, his hair doesn’t have any natural blonde in it any more.

“You don’t use any product in it, do you?” Mack asks.

“Right now, gravity does the job. Sometimes when I’m going out, I put a little gel on my fingers and mess it up.”

Mack fluffs his hair a little more, nodding again. “You don’t have much shaping in this. It kind of looks like someone cut all of your hair off and just let it grow for a year.”

Tim glances up at Mack in the mirror. “Ten months.”

“Oh.” Mack swallows, and it’s clear he doesn’t want to know why Tim lost all of his hair, and Tim’s not feeling like telling. “Well, I’m thinking, how about we give you something that’ll make you look a bit older, but not old. Want to keep some edge to this. So, shorter all over, but much shorter on the sides, a bit shorter on top, I’ll show you how to use a little styling wax to give you some lift. If you want to be more clean cut, you can just comb it down and let it dry, and when you want more height, you fluff it up.”

“Sure. Go for it.”

And Mack does.

Tim holds very still. Yes, Mack gets a plus 17,000 on his BadAss score, whipping several inches of bare steel all around Tim’s head, but Tim’s afraid he’s going to sneeze and end up like VanGogh.

By the time he’s done, Tim’s not sure if he looks older, but, he probably looks cooler. He doubts either of his ladies will complain about his hair. (He knows Jimmy won’t. He’s not entirely sure Jimmy will, on his own, notice that he got a haircut.)

And, looking at it, he can imagine himself in the suit, and with the goatee, and… Again, maybe not older, but colder, and he flashes his ‘hard’ look at the mirror, more stern. He’s certainly got that going.

Any traces of Probie McGee are gone from his face now, and with a bit more work, Tim should start to blend into The Director.

---

They wrap the day on the last details, the shoes. (Apparently Senior has a shoe broker, which is A: Something Tim didn’t know existed until today, and B: Involves shoes that cost more than his car payment. None of those shoes are going home with him.) He does have some very nice Cole Haans now.

He’s got a pair of good cufflinks. They aren’t platinum like Perce Masters’, but they are small circles of silver around black enamel. And maybe they aren’t the most traditionally “Boss” looking piece of an outfit ever, but they go with his wedding ring and cuff, both of which aren’t going anywhere for this.

And, with that, Tim’s back on the FBI jet, heading toward DC.

---

In the air, Tim can work. He’s got even more nervous emails in his inbox, many of which involve people crying about their vacations, family reunions, and in one case wedding, that are all set to go during the time he wants them in DC.

Sucks to be you. Tim thinks while writing his, “You can bump your plans, or you can resign. Take your pick” email.

Once he’s done that, he shuts his computer, and watches… Probably Philadelphia, it’s big and gray and looks like a city, below him.

“Did you think you did enough…” Comey asked something like that.

He did what he could. He’s at peace with that. These days he knows, not just thinks, that he did everything he could have done.

“Was it worth it?” That’s the question that keeps echoing through him.

Most of the time, the Navy Yard, and what he did there, is far away. It’s buried back in his head, and it can stay there, resting in… not peace, but not torment, either.

But right now, watching whichever city it is passing under him, it’s not far under the surface.

It’s been almost a year. D…SC is… better. But it’s not back to where it was, and it likely won’t ever get back to where it was. He shakes his head; Jarvis and Co. could rebuild it perfectly. They could put everything back the way it was, and it wouldn’t matter. It wouldn’t be the same because no one can rebuild the people.

He glances up at the ceiling of the jet, and then closes his eyes. He’s here, literally, here, right this second because of someone who isn’t in DC anymore. Someone who might not be on Earth, any more.

Was it worth it?

He opens his computer back up, and begins to google. He’s done his best to not find out how much it cost. He’s intentionally faded out when Diane is chatting about what she’s doing, and Jimmy and Breena and Allan didn’t tell him how many people they processed.

There’s no final count, not yet. It’s been ten and a half months, and they’ve still got missing people. They’re still pulling bodies out of the rubble, and they still don’t have a final figure for what rebuilding will cost.

But they’ve got estimates.

6,428 people died. Maybe. That’s how many they’ve counted.

19,478 are still listed as missing.

200,000 refugees are still ‘displaced,’ living somewhere else in the US, unable to get back to SC because they don’t have the funds for it, or there’s still nowhere for them to go back to.

Diane went up to New York, talked to Congress about the need for emergency funds. She explained how much the cleanup may cost, and how much they’d gotten through ‘creative financing’. Her best guess figure, which she stated was likely too low, was 108 billion dollars. Fifty billion of which, they’re still scrambling for.

Was it worth it?

Tim’s seen ‘BTFSTTG’ on different chat rooms and social media posts. Burn This Fucking Shit To The Ground. Basic enough statement. Can’t work for Federal Law Enforcement and not, at least occasionally, run into someone who thinks that’s a great plan.

Some of it literally, all of it figuratively.

Was it worth it?

He’s looking at a new city coming up on his horizon. Baltimore, probably. They’ll be over SC soon enough.

There are images that he’s done his best to kill. Things he doesn’t need in his mind, not on any regular basis. All of them are from his time on the roof, in the Navy Yard.

He can still feel it, if he lets himself. Lying on his stomach, shoulders sore, elbows rubbed raw from supporting his weight hour after hour, the dull pressure of the scope against his left eye.

Jarvis tossed the MRE at him, and he remembers gobbling it down. “If we’re gonna kill for it, we might as well eat it.” Something like that. He ripped it open, grabbing with his fingers, shoving the food in as fast as he could. He still doesn’t know what it was. He didn’t then. He doesn’t now.

He remembers feeling embarrassed to be gobbling it down. And then worse, more shame, he threw it up. People were starving, he had food, a little at least, and he immediately threw it up. He wasted it.

And then the mob was on them.

There was a man with a snow plow on his truck. Red Ford F-450. Big damn thing. He’d probably been a contractor or something. The truck, and the blade were big enough, powerful enough, that it could have broken their perimeter. It could have pushed those cars out of the way.

And it’s not like the cars were a solid wall or anything, but they slowed the mob down. Tangled them up, made them easier to hit.

Tim doesn’t know if his bullet did it. And it doesn’t matter, he aimed, he pulled the trigger, and the man driving the truck died.

Molotov cocktails. Little flickers of light and smoke in the crowd. Tim would aim for them. Maybe he hit them, maybe he didn’t. But that’s what he’d look for. Burning gasoline would do more damage than any one, or ten even, people. So he’d shoot for them.

6,428 people. He figures at least thirty of them are directly on him.

He doesn’t want to think about how many of them are indirectly on him. All the people who were hiding out in the IRS building, or the EPA, or any of the other buildings that weren’t properly hardened.

Those people were there because he’s the guy who sent out the note, telling them to get into them, thinking it’d be safer in a building filled with armed men than outside in the city.

For some of them, they were.

Was it worth it?

He licks his lips, DC is coming up. From the air, as the sun’s setting, it looks fairly close to normal. But it’s not. And as the jet descends, he can see, more and more clearly, exactly how not normal it is. The sunlight flees, and I-95, which should be a parking lot filled with lights, is just zipping along, a few lights glowing as they move from wherever work was back to home.

Was it worth it?

He lays his hands on his laptop and quietly says, “Only if something changes because of it.”

If everything stays the same, or if they just rearrange the chairs to make everything look a little prettier, then it wasn’t worth it. If the same people stay in the same positions, making the same decisions, then it didn’t matter.

His jaw tightens. He’s going to change this, or he’s out. If he can’t wipe the slate clean, then this isn’t worth it. He’ll write novels, and take care of kids, and that’ll be it. He can’t stay on just to make things look good. He won’t stick around to put his fingers in the cracks in the dyke. Either they rebuild, for real, or it wasn’t worth it.
And if he’s got to be hard, and angry, and cruel. If he’s got to pull shit to get shit done…

6,428 dead.

He’ll be atoning his whole life for that, so two damn weeks of The Director…

Shouldn’t even be worth thinking about.

But it is.
When Tim got back from the Stennis, Abby shaved off his goatee, and Tim said he was never growing it back again.

So much for that. Rule… 72? Something like that. Rarely ever say never. Tim thinks as he brushes his teeth and gets ready for at least a week of Fornell making cracks about him forgetting to shave.

He glances at his razor. And then makes himself not reach for it. Part of this is encouraging more of a line between him and The Director. As soon as he’s done with this, he can scrape it back off his face, and not have to see The Director in the mirror.

He has a feeling that’s going to be important when this is done.

---

Tim is not nervous when he gets in on Monday morning, and Jennifer tells him Comey’s called and wants him upstairs as soon as he gets in.

Curious, certainly. Defensive, yes, there’s some of that, too.

Mostly, he’s feeling, as he climbs the stairs… fatalistic. That’s probably it. The rest of the FBI and the Feds probably looked at what he wanted to do, said, ‘Fuck this!’ and he’s about to get the ax. They’re inching toward putting everything into motion, but if Comey calls a halt now, nothing will really change. They’re less than a week from the drop dead point, the moment where they can’t change or go back.

So, as he climbs the last step to Comey’s floor, he’s got his ‘If that’s how you feel, here’s my resignation,’ speech in his head.

As he opens the door, and Comey’s secretary gives his nice black jeans, scarlet button down, and leather jacket the side eye, a snarky, You couldn’t have done this before I spent the eight grand on clothing for this? pops into his head.

He smirks, grimly at that. At least he’ll still be able to wear the new goodies. (Maybe to interview for whatever the next job is. Though he’s fairly sure Manner would take him on for CrimeWeb, as a programmer if nothing else, in a heartbeat.) This won’t be like bringing in his first really good jacket to NCIS, and having Abby cut it apart literally the third time he got to wear it.

“Director,” Tim says, entering Comey’s office.

“Hey, Tim.” Comey’s at his desk, typing away, fast. He nods to the door, so Tim closes it. Comey stands up, grabs a large folder, which has Tim’s attention, because he knows what goes into a folder like that. Warrants. Comey looks back at his computer. ‘I’m… working on my resignation speech. And… If this is going to matter, and it’s got to matter, it’s got to be more than just making things look good. Anyway, my last, or almost last, project as the Director of the FBI, is greenlighting a full-on investigation of ourselves, anyone we work with, our suppliers, our union reps… If we do business with them,” he hands over the folder, “you’ve got authorization to check into them.”

Tim opens the folder. It’s a Congressional Warrant. From the very quick skimming he’s doing, it looks like he’s got authorization to investigate everything the FBI does.

A massive grin spreads over Tim’s face. “I’d kiss you if I weren’t so married.”

Comey smiles at that, just a little, before saying, “And I’d duck even if I weren’t. Start with Public Corruption, next up, Internal Affairs, and then… Top to bottom. We clean house before we start trying to clean anything else up.”

Tim nods, looking Comey in the eyes. “I will.” He’s also rapidly coming to the conclusion that cleaning up the FBI first will give him the time to get his computer systems in place, before he moves onto the outside world. Yet another reason to want to kiss Comey!

“Good. How’s the show going?” Comey asks.

Tim smiles a bit, and Comey gestures to a seat. Tim nods, realizing he’s been invited to take a while to explain the deal. So, he does.

---

If this plan is going to be real, and if it’s going to work, Tim needs a few more players.

And he needs to delegate.

He sighs. He’s got this gorgeous new warrant in his hand, and he really wants to use it. He’s itching to go out and start digging into personal lives, finances, connections, and all the little niggly bits.

As soon as he got it, he had some ideas of what was going to happen next. Namely, he kept running headfirst into the fact that A: He is going to have issues with his Union soon. B: His Union does not, technically, work for the government, so he didn’t have a free pass to investigate whatever he liked with them. And C: Without that free pass, the power differential is significantly stacked in their favor.

But now. He grins, sunshine pouring off of him as he heads to his office; he’s got the freedom to go fishing. Oh, and how he wants to fish. He’s got the image of the new pole in his hands, bait next to him, and the perfect cast, all of it bright and shiny in his head.

Which stops him.

He’s supposed to go after people for breaking the law. He’s supposed to have a crime, investigate that crime, and then follow the evidence to the person or people who committed that crime. He’s not supposed to go fishing, hoping people have broken the law, so that it’s easier for him to do his own job.

After all, what’s he going to do if he finds his Union is hip deep in crap? Pretend they’re not if they look the other way when he starts firing people?

Those ethics courses back at FLETC are no match for moments like this.

Shit.
“I’ve got goodies!” Tim says as he heads into his office, wiggling the folder.

Everyone at his table, except for Burke, recognizes what’s in his hand.

“Who’s it for?” Ziva asks.

“Congressional Warrant, for everyone who works with, for, or near for that matter, the FBI. We are cleaning house, and now we’ve got the right to go looking for dirt.”

He flicks it to the center of the table, turns to his big screen, and feels a desire to grab a clicker. He has one, but he doesn’t have pictures or anything up and ready.

“You remember a while back when I suggested we needed to look into our Union?” Tim asks, specifically Fornell and Gibbs, but the rest of the crew knows it’s an issue.

That gets nods.

Tim glances at the warrants. “Have at it.”

“What are we looking for, McGee?” Burke asks.

“Right now, anything. I know less-than-scrupulous compliance with election finance laws is awfully common, so start there. September 1st, everyone is coming in, so anything you can find by August 27th, I need.”

“That’s not a lot of time, McGee,” Fornell says.

“I know. Less than I’d like, but… We’ll need it by then, make sure we’ve got our cases begun, and then by the 1st, I want whoever we can grab, in jail.”

“We’re going to prosecute?” Ziva asks.

Tim nods. “Yes. And if that means they dig in their heels and fight us, then they fight, but… We’re cleaning house. Top to bottom. I’m… almost hopeful that I can get them on tape, trying to barter them complying with what I want to do for us not prosecuting.”

“What will you do with that?” Burke asks.

Tim smiles. “I’ll admit, I’m not entirely sure if that’s illegal. But if they try it, I’ll call it a bribe and toss whoever I’m talking to into jail. Then, it’s sunshine time. Let everyone see who represents them.”

Gibbs, who’s been quietly watching this, smiles. “Come on, Tobias, let’s go make some calls.”

Fornell nods. He knows exactly who they need to talk to, first.

“Who are we talking to?” Gibbs asks as they head to the parking garage below the FBI building. This is very much not making a call, but Fornell’s the one who’s worked for the FBI for more than twenty-five years, so Gibbs is filing this under Rule 38: your case, your lead.

“Friend of a friend of a…” Fornell shakes his head. This is Gibbs he’s talking to. “Remember how many cases I worked undercover in the Mob for?”

“Of course.”

“Yeah, well, you can’t do that and not get to know some people, and… Okay, I’m not proud of this, but… Sometime everything worked better if information could flow smoothly, so…”

“You made some friends?” Gibbs doesn’t look like he likes that, but… Over the years, he’s certainly made a friend or two, as well.

Fornell nods, clicking open the lock on his door. “I made some friends. They’re, like me, retired. But they know who’s who. So, I give them the occasional tip. They give me the occasional tip. Nothing big. Nothing that would make either of our higher ups annoyed. Just enough so that… if we need an in, especially for something like this, the lines of communications are open.”

“I really don’t want to know, do I?” Gibbs replies, sitting in the passenger seat.

Fornell smirks, turning on the ignition. “Well, maybe a few years ago, back when Borin wasn’t on your radar, you might have wanted to know. Now…” Fornell takes off his wedding ring and rubs his ring finger to make it look like the other ones. “You remember how to flirt?”

“You think I forgot?”

“I’m not sure you ever knew.”

Gibbs sighs. “How old are these ‘friends?’”

Fornell chews his lips. “Remember that thing DiNozzo said about turkey buzzards? They still like meat, but can’t hunt?”

“Oh God… Are we going to a nursing home?”

Fornell smiles. “It’s a retirement community, Jethro. And these ladies love their little boys, and want them to be successful, and out of prison. So…”

Gibbs looks to the ceiling and shakes his head.

While Gibbs and Fornell go shake up whoever it is they’re going to shake up (Tim decides that if he knows, he’s going to want to go along, and if he goes along, he’s not doing the seventy other things he needs to get done) Tim gets to the next task on the list.

That spokesperson.

He’s had a list of headshots and resumes, all sitting around, but… It’s not like he’s had the time to go through them.

But, he’s fairly certain that when Comey resigns, that’s going to be a bomb, and if he wants to control where it goes off, what damage it does, and to whom, he needs someone to shape and produce this message.

And unless he wants it to be him…
Tim actually does think about that for a good minute. No one, literally, has a better understanding of how he wants this to work than he does. But, as he thinks about it, if he’s the one managing the press, he’s not the one managing everything else.

So, this person. When he talked to Jennifer about it, he explained, in vague terms, who he was looking for. A fifty-ish, white/gray haired-woman. Kind of like Jill Stein. Experience was a plus. But, for the right look, voice, and manners, he’d take no experience.

She did whatever it is she does, and over the next few weeks a collection of video clips and CVs wandered into his email folder.

“Want to watch some video with me?” he asks Ziva and Burke. Extra opinions are good things.

“What are we watching?” Burke asks.

“Spokespeople,” Tim replies. “I need a press secretary, and this is the list of potentials.” He gets the first of the video clips going.

“What exactly are we looking for, Tim?” Ziva asks.

“Dependable, trustworthy, honest…”

“Female Gibbs?” Ziva says with a smile. She also knows about Tim’s mental image of this person, and she put together his ‘ideal’ with his reality a lot faster than Tim did.

Tim closes his eyes and sighs, a little. Then he looks up, and nods. “It’s that NCIS ad campaign, isn’t it?”

Ziva smiles back at him. “Trustworthy, integrity, reliability…”

Burke’s got the question on her face.

“A while back, at NCIS we were looking for a new spokesmodel. Someone to go on the recruiting posters. My husband was the first one they picked, because he is very handsome. And he…”

Tim’s chuckling at this. “He’s not unaware of being attractive, and back then, that pretty much was his favorite thing about himself. He was being an insufferable twit. ‘Make sure the light is right.’ ‘Get this side.’ ‘Oh, how about right here? This is where the best light is!’”

Ziva spreads her hands wide. She won’t say she agrees, but she isn’t disagreeing either. “He was eagerly awaiting the results of his photoshoot, but the photographer kept putting him off.”

“Turns out, since Gibbs sat across the office from Tony, the photographer had seen him, and decided that he had more of ‘the look’ that NCIS wanted. So he snapped a few shots, and put Gibbs on the brochures, and, yeah, the tagline was something like: Honor and Integrity.”

“Something like that,” Ziva adds.

“Apparently, I internalized that. Because, yes, my mental image pretty much is female Gibbs with some manners and the ability to talk on her feet.”

“Not a bad image to have,” Ziva adds. “Let us see who we have to go with it.”

And so, they watch.

She’s the third woman they see. And Tim just knows. And he can see from the look on Ziva and Burke’s face that they know it, too.

She’s not beautiful and likely never was. Handsome: that’s the word that springs to mind. Her features are broad, wide eyes and wide lips, but more perfectly symmetrical than he’s ever seen in a real person before. She’s… it’s hard to tell, this is a video, but probably tall, with Marine straight posture, close cropped steel gray hair, and the ability to rock a pants suit.

Tim’s guessing she has at least one African American grandparent from the tight curl of her hair, but her skin is a color light enough that if her hair was long and straight, especially with her green eyes, he’d just assume she was tan.

And she is perfect. Her voice is soft but commanding, the kind of tone that just makes people pay attention. Tim thinks there might be a hint of New Orleans in her speech, but he’s not good enough with accents to know for sure. She smiles easily enough to look relaxed and comfortable with the press, but there’s enough seriousness in her face that she can’t be easily discounted.

Tim pauses the video, and looks to Ziva and Burke. “That’s her, isn’t it?”

Ziva’s nodding.

Burke adds, “Make sure to see her live, but if she can do this unscripted, yes, that’s exactly who you want.”

Tim hops out of his office to find Jennifer. “Hey,” he says to her as she’s beating his email pile into submission, “Vivianne LaCroix, can you get her in here, the sooner the better?”

“I can do that,” Jennifer replies, glad to see him getting another piece of the team into place.

“Thanks!”

“Mrs. D!” Tobias says with a lot of enthusiasm, and a lot more of his New York accent than he normally uses as he and Gibbs walk into the sun room in the “assisted living center” at Bloomsworth Retirement Community.

Mrs. D is at least eighty-seven, surrounded by a collection of other octogenarian women, most of them in wheelchairs, all of them in outfits Gibbs would refer to as ‘flashy’ and ‘polyester,’ though he has no idea what the fabric may actually be. They’re all wearing makeup, and their hair is done, and they’ve got flashy jewelry on fingers and around necks, and several of them have bedazzled glasses frames, too.

It’s a sparkly group.

And they LOVE Fornell.

“Toby!” Mrs. D comes back with, gesturing him close for an enthusiastic hug. “What brings you down here?”

Fornell drags a chair over, as the other ladies also wheel themselves in closer. “I can’t just visit?”

She looks at the other ladies, eyes bright. “He says, like he ‘just visits.’ Have you ever ‘just visited?’”

“I keep meaning to.”
“Uh huh.” She and the ladies share a look. “We hear versions of that, a lot. What’s going on, Toby?”

“You been paying attention to the outside world?”

“Do I look like I want to be depressed?” Mrs. D says, hands gesturing with each word.

“No.”

“I hear enough about that from my grandsons and their sons.”

“Great. Well…”

“Who’s your friend?” another one of the women has wheeled herself up to Gibbs, looking up at him through black framed cat eye glasses that put Jethro firmly in mind of the ‘60s. “Fine, tall fella.”

“This is Jethro, Mrs. R.”

“Jethro…” He smiles down at her. “You can call me, Maria.”

Tobias takes over. “He could, but four of you are named Maria. The only way to tell you apart is by your last names.” He starts introducing Jethro. “That’s Mrs. R, Mrs. J, Mrs. D, Mrs. P, and in the sunny patch by the window, that’s Ms. A.”

Jethro nods. “Pleased to meet all of you.” He pulls out the bag he’s been holding behind his back, and the reason why this trip took five hours.

The ladies see the name on the bag, and their eyes perk up.

“You’re a good boy, Toby,” Mrs. J says.

Jethro hands over the cannoli. Once they got out of DC, he drove. Tobias navigated. Add that to the use of their flashers, and they were able to get up to East Hanover, home of the single best Italian American bakery on earth, according to the ladies around them, and pick up a few dozen cannoli, in under four hours.

Mrs. D, happily chewing away, gets them back on track. “Not that we mind the company…”

“Or the cannoli!” Mrs R, adds.

“But you don’t come just to visit, Toby.”

He inclines his head.

“Whaddaya need?” Ms. A, who had been quiet until now, asks.

“I always bring presents when I come, right?” Tobias says.

“That’s how this works,” Mrs. D adds.

“So, here’s the present. The FBI is doing some spring cleaning. Top to bottom.” The Ladies in this group are sharp. They don’t need any more heads up that than. Jethro, seeing the looks on their faces, is figuring that in the next week, a decent number of people are going to cease engaging with the FBI.

“And the present you want in return?” Mrs. R asks, eyes sharp.
“I need to know who you’ve got in our Union.”

The ladies all glance at each other. There’s a long moment of what appears to be silent confabbing. Then Mrs. J says, “My granddaughter, Maria, her husband, Robbie, he’s got a cousin, Sal, and Sal would know.”

Fornell kisses Mrs. J on the cheek. “You have Sal’s number?”

“No, but Maria does. She’ll get it for me, and I’ll get it for you.”

“Thank you, ladies.”

“How do you feel about second chances?” Karningham asks Tim. Because, of course, in the midst of all of this, Karningham is delivering his plans for how the Black Hat team will work. So far, Tim approves of what he’s seeing. He especially approves of the fact that every member of Team Black Hat will, at random, be assigned to review the work and caseload of another member, every season.

“Uh…” He’s fairly sure that Karningham can’t know about Kahn. There’s no way he knows who he really is. That said, though, he’s not sure who else Walter could be talking about. “I’d say, in general I believe in them. Probably depend on what sort of second chance we’re talking about.”

“I’ve got a guy for your White Hats. Probably. I haven’t talked to him, yet, figured I’d send it by you, first.”

“Well, send him by me. Who are we talking about?”

“His name is Aaron Hotchner. He used to be part of the BAU—“

“Team Brain-bleach.” Ever since Lecter went back on the radar, Tim’s been getting little heads ups from the BAU, and he’s awfully glad he doesn’t work for them.

“That’s a way of putting it.”

“Used?” Tim asks. He’s wondering why that’s past tense.

“Last fall, he just up and left. Everything seemed like normal and then… poof, gone. They checked in enough to make sure he was okay, and he was. He just hit his limit. Then everything went insane, and he fell off the radar.”

“You think he might want to come back?”

“He was an exceptional team leader. Sharp, bright, organized, good at motivating people. But, honestly, I think there should be a time limit on how long you can stay at the BAU. That place eats people alive, and he was there too long.

“However, I think cases where people don’t kill his ex-wife while he’s on the phone with her,” Tim full body winces at that, “might appeal to him, and if we can get him back, you want him.”

“Float the idea past him. If he’s interested, have him make an appointment with me.”

“Thanks.” Walter glances at the computer in front of him, that Tim’s been checking his plans for Team Black Hat on. “So…”
Tim nods. “Yeah. Congratulations Mr. Karningham. Or should I say, Director of Public Corruption: Undercover Ops.”

Walter smiles, a wide spread of teeth against dark skin, and then nods. “Thank you, Director McGee. So, who do I have to work with?”

“Right now, we’re very short on people, but I can introduce you to your head of Sexual Harassment.”

“Then introduce away.”

Tim hops back to his office, and says, “Burke, come meet Karningham. He’s the one you’ll be reporting to.” As Burke gets up, Tim says to Walter, “For the time being, she’s still mine, but come Monday,” Burke sits next to Tim on the sofa in Jennifer’s office, “I want both of you to go through the people who did pass muster, and find the ones you want to work with. The first thing we’re doing is cleaning the FBI from the inside, so… Sit, have a chat, get to know each other, and talk about how you want to do that.”

Gibbs and Fornell leave Bloomsworth with a phone number, and an introduction.

When they’re in the car, Gibbs said, “You making our job easier, or harder?”

Fornell shrugs. “Generally speaking, we already know who’s working with who. It’s just a matter of proving it. And a matter of them actually doing something illegal. Tim’s not the only one who keeps running into the issue of whatever it is he wants to bust not actually being a crime.”

Gibbs sighs.

“That’s how it’s been since Prohibition. Periodically, we sweep them out, and burn the bridges, but they always get rebuilt. They’re too useful to not have them. We know a certain amount of crime is going to happen no matter what. We know that if we’ve got a relationship with the men in charge, that we can work together to shape things in a… copacetic sort of way. They help us take down the real nut jobs, and we look the other way on the stuff most people don’t much care about.”

“Then what did you do? Why go undercover?”

“Everything in the area between nut jobs and stuff most people don’t care about. That’s fair game.”

Gibbs sighs again. NCIS was a lot cleaner than this. Then he thinks a bit more about the different assets they’ve had over the years, especially in the anti-terror and overseas departments.

Maybe not.

Sal, who Gibbs was expecting to work construction, or sanitation, or at a bar or bakery, or… just some sort of “Mobbish” job, actually works as an accountant.
They’re walking up the steps to an attractive brick house in a plush suburb in southern New Jersey. Apparently Sal works from home.

Fornell notices Gibbs noticing and smirks. “They don’t all, or at this point, even mostly, resemble Jimmy Napolitano.”

“Last of a dying breed?”

Fornell says, “Maybe not the last. You ever watch the Godfather?”

“Can’t spend much time with DiNozzo and not see it.”

“Okay, well… You remember how Michael’s trying to get them all legit?”

Gibbs nods.

Fornell gestures to the house. “A lot of it is. Most of it… At this point, it’s legal. Spend seventy years making sure judges, congressmen, and senators are all on your payroll, and suddenly a lot of what you want to do is legal. And the bits that tend not to be… They aren’t legal because being legal would drop the profit margin too much.” He rings the bell. “Still, for most of it, running a real business, and then getting really good accountants to hide your cash and invest it well, that’s a whole lot more lucrative and safer than many of the illegal options.”

“Tax evasion?” Gibbs says, almost sounding disappointed.

“That’s what I meant by ‘stuff most people don’t care about.’”

Gibbs rolls his eyes. He’s had little enough use for going in guns blazing against tax cheats. “You think that’s what this guy does?”

“I think, it’s entirely likely, that everything Sal does is legal, and a small army of lawyers and accountants will attest to that under oath.”

“Ah.” Gibbs shakes his head again, but stops as the door opens and a girl, probably about eight years old, answers.

“Hi. My name is Tobias Fornell, and this is Jethro Gibbs, and we were wondering if we could speak to Sal Carini?”

She nods. Then shuts the door, and they hear, “DAD!” echo through the house.

A moment later a man, probably in his early thirties, opens the door. He doesn’t introduce himself, but he does say, “You’re Maria’s Gran’s friends. Come on in.”

So, they do.

He leads them into his kitchen, where his computer is on the kitchen table, and a cup of coffee next to it. He doesn’t offer them anything to drink, though he does gesture to the seats around the table. “Mrs. Juetti says you’re looking to do a little internal housekeeping?”

“That’s the idea,” Tobias says.

“Just your own guys?”

“That’d likely depend on exactly what they were doing. Not like I can look the other way if they were ordering hits or anything like that.”
“Nothing like that.” Sal taps his keyboard a few times, and then grabs for a thumb drive. “You’ve got some guys who were living way beyond their means.” He hands the drive over.

Fornell smiles. “Thank you.”

“Anonymous source, right?” Sal asks.

“Always.” He hands the drive to Gibbs, and they both stand up to leave.

In the car, on the way home, Gibbs says to Fornell, “You realize, unless this is something like here’s a mob boss bank account, here’s a transfer from that account to whoever owns this second account, nothing on this thumb drive will make a lick of sense to either of us.”

Fornell nods, not looking away from the road.

Neither of them say anything for a moment.

Then Gibbs says, “She’s got to be too busy.”

Fornell nods. “There’s no possible way she isn’t. Emily tells me that the last time she had a day off was the Fourth of July, and she’s been working at least sixteen hours a day since then.”

“Do we know any other accountants?” Gibbs asks.

“We just left one.”

Gibbs flashes his smartass look at Fornell.

“Supposedly, we’ve got an entire department that does nothing but forensic accounting at the FBI.”

“You ever use them?”

“Enough.”

“Got anyone you trust with something hot?” Gibbs asks, wishing he could just dump this in Diane’s lap.

“Yeah, but we know she’s busy.”

The gets the smartass look, double barreled.

“You miss when crime meant murder and robbery?” Fornell asks.

“Every damn day!” Gibbs replies.

The next morning, Tim stares at his computer screen. And yep, those are numbers. From bank accounts. To other bank accounts. Some of those bank accounts belong to the FBI’s Union reps.
Some of them belong to their friends and family. Some of them he doesn’t know who owns them, not yet. And some of them appear to be shell corporations and the like. And were he to guess, those shell corporations do nothing but move money, anonymously, from person A to person B.

He sighs and rubs his forehead. He’s actually not bad at this stuff. When Gibbs wanted someone to go through financials, that was his job.

But he’s not good at it, either. He’s not an accountant. He’s really not a good one. And these… Might as well be gobbledy-gook for all they mean to him.

He hands the drive to Ziva. “Get your father-in-law on the phone and find out who his accountant is. I want him, here, before the end of work today. Burke, you see those final numbers.” She nods. “Good, go get a hold of these guys 1040s’ and see if they declared anything close to that on their taxes.”

Burke smiles.

He turns to Gibbs and Fornell, and then turns to yet another pile of employment records. He lays a hand on the top of the stack of the FBI’s Forensic Accounting Department. “Find me accountants.”

As his team moves off to do its job, Tim looks up Aaron Hotchner.

Too long at the BAU… Yeah… Just the ID picture is giving Tim some concerns.

Tim is intimately familiar with the concept, of ‘Good, Lord, please, someone get that guy a sandwich!’ The first time he fell into it, he’d been eating very healthy. No meat, no sugar, no carbs, all organic, and he lost a pile of weight.

Too much.

It took his body a bit of time to re-adjust to real food again, and then, once he started back at it, he remembered that he really liked how sugar and carbs and meat tasted and felt, and… Then there was the explosion, and he went kind of overboard in the opposite direction.

The second time wasn’t voluntary, and he lost even more weight, and… Honestly, he looked pretty awful for at least a few months before his body got back to ‘nourished’ again. (Granted, quarter inch long hair didn’t help that endeavor any.)

Hotchner looks like he needs a sandwich, or six, more, per day. The man is gaunt. And not in a ‘this is healthy and he’s just naturally skinny’ sort of way.

Tim’s afraid he knows that look. That’s he’s staring at a picture of someone who works so hard, and so long, and gets so into his cases he forgets to eat. (Part of why it took Tim a while, the first time, to notice he’d overshot his mark.)

Of course, it might be more the eyes than the cheekbones and sunken cheeks. Even in his ID photo, those eyes are dark, haunted.

This is the man who’s seen way too much shit.

And Tim’s a bit nervous about his appointment with him tomorrow.
But... The file is great. This is a man who knows what to do and how to do it. He’s the man who can run the team that’s got to do the impossible, and do it well. And... if he’s not nearly as burnt out as his picture suggests...

Maybe...

---

Several hours later, Tim smiles. This appointment he’s been looking forward to. She’s even more perfect in real life. She walks in, head up, shoulders back, gait graceful and easy. He stands up and offers her his hand. “Ms. LaCroix?”

“Mr. McGee…”

_God, that voice!_ Tim almost feels star struck. He did his homework. She’s the public relations head of a small non-profit specializing sewage engineering in the third world. Not glamorous, but important.

He shakes her hand, and then gestures to one of the seats in Jennifer’s office. He’s still got everyone working in his, so apparently, this is his interviewing spot. “Your CV fell into my lap a few days ago.”

She smiles, eyes warm, gracefully sitting. “And why were you sitting down, lap ready, waiting for it?”

He likes that way of asking the question. “I’m the head of the FBI’s Public Corruption Department. We’re about to change how the FBI does business, how anti-corruption does business, in a big way. Part of the change is visibility. I want the world to see what we’re doing. Which means I need a face and, more importantly, a voice, letting everyone know what we’re up to.”

She looks pleased at that idea. “And you’d like me to be that voice?”

“Yes. The question is, do you want to be eaten alive by the press day in day out, on a range of topics from the mundane to extraordinary?”

That amuses her. “How many languages do you want me to do it in?”

He looks a little startled.

“Mr. McGee, I’m used to having to speak to irked donors, hostile politicians, bored press, and obsequious contractors, in four languages, on any given day. Assuming everyone is yelling questions at me in English, and they are only doing it for an hour or two at a time, I will consider this a vacation.”

Tim certainly wasn’t planning on running press conferences for more than an hour or so at a go. “An hour or two of yelling a day. I’m not sure how much prep work time you’ll need.”

“That was the full-time job that went with the other full-time job I was doing.”

“Oh.”

“I loved SOIL,” the name of her non-profit, “but there is only so long you can work ninety-hours a week.”
Tim would admit he’s sketchy, at best, about what exactly is involved in Press Secretary-ing, but he can’t imagine it takes that long. “I don’t think this should take that long.”

“Excellent. When do you want me to begin?”

“The show starts next Friday, so if you’re here Monday, that should be plenty of time to begin prepping.”

She smiles at that. “Then I will be here, bright and early, on Monday.”

“Thank you.”

Thursday morning. This week is starting to wrap up, and Tim’s starting to feel like he may have a handle on what needs to be done.

Maybe.

He scoffs at that. Like he’s ever going to have a handle on this.

Do as much as you can, with what you have, as well as you can. That’s all you can do, and if it’s not enough, it’s not. Breena said that to him when he was complaining last night about how this is never going to get done.

He smiles at the memory of that. Sometimes it’s good to have people who are not part of Team Gibbs, who always get the job done, no matter what, around. Sometimes, it feels very comforting to be reminded that the world will not end if he fails at this.

And sometimes, it’s terrifying.

But, at least for this particular second in time, he’s on an upswing, and about to meet someone else, who may indeed be a case in point, about how, if you hit the point where it’s too much, the world does not in fact end. Sometimes, you’ve just got to go somewhere else.

He hopes. Or maybe he’s about to spend a few minutes with a burnt out husk of a guy who used to run the BAU.

Either way… He’ll find out.

As a man who used to read women’s magazines, Tim’s more than familiar with “Before” and “After” shots. Normally, said shots involve some sort of miracle diet, spa treatment, or makeup. And normally, the woman in the before shot looked like she’d been run over with the ugly truck, and was a model by the time the after shot happened.

Aaron Hotchner, walking into his office, compared to his ID photo, looks like he’s been taking all three options, and done well with them. This is clearly the ‘after’ shot of Hotchner.
Hotchner is still trim, but the gaunt look has left his face. He still has bags under his eyes, but the shadows and haunted look has eased off. He’s added a beard, which softens his face, and right now, he’s in jeans and a t-shirt, which probably go a long way toward making him look less dead on his feet than the severe black suit and white shirt he wore in the ID photo.

Aaron shakes back. “Aaron Hotchner. People around here called me ‘Hotch.’”

Tim nods to Jennifer’s sofa. Hotch seats himself as Tim says, “McGee, that’s usually what they call me,” and then he looks to the coffeemaker. “Coffee?”

“Only if you have decaf.”

Tim smiles at that. “Actually, yes, I do.”

“Sure.”

Tim gets the drinks settled, and then crosses the office, offering Hotch his cup.

Hotch takes it, and looks up at Tim, who’s sitting on the far side of the coffee table. “So, why does Walter think you’re the one who’s going to get me to want to go back to this?”

“Well, first off, ‘this’ is not what you were doing before. While it’s true that people will kill to stay in power, and it’s true that we’re going to burn a lot of bridges and piss off a lot of the high and mighty, we should, mostly, be dealing with white collar, non-violent crime.”

“Mostly.” Hotch sips his coffee. “I suppose that’s as good as you can hope for, anywhere in law enforcement.”

“In my experience, at least.”

They both share a look about that.

“Still, if I had wanted to,” Hotch says, “I could have transferred to our white collar division. What do you have to offer that makes semi-retirement, being home for my son when he’s done with school at the end of the day, and living anonymously in suburban DC worth giving up?”

Since that’s a variation on the theme of Tim’s back up plan for if this all goes belly up, Tim respects that, and understands the appeal and value. “Honestly, I’m not sure I do. I can say that if you want to make sure you’re home in the afternoons for your son, that I do not mind at all how you set your schedule as long as the job gets done. You want to work nights and mornings or whenever, I’m fine with that.”

“That’s a start.”

“I’d see your position as the guy who runs the teams, coordinates who does what, and how. Right now, as we’re getting started, you may be doing some field work, but once you’ve got your people under you, you’re here, in the main building, moving the pieces on the chess board. So, you want to show up in jeans and a t-shirt, I don’t care.”

Hotch is bright enough to catch what Tim didn’t say. As the man running the game, no one will know his name or face. Anyone looking for revenge won’t come seeking him, or his son. He nods at that.
“So, you’ve got some perks. What’s the actual job?”

Tim eyes Hotch, and thinks about what he read… This is supposed to be a stand-up guy. One of the best of the best. Honor and integrity, right?

“On Friday we begin an operation to clean up the FBI, from the inside. I’ve already vetted the Public Corruption team. Of the 700 people on it, fewer than one hundred and fifty of them made the cut. You, them, and with any luck, some top notch accountants, are going to start sweeping through the FBI, looking for trouble.

“If you take it, when you begin, you move fast and silent. The first strike is our Union, because I don’t want any trouble firing the people who are on the take, incompetent, or working for the other team.”

Hotch exhales low and slow, and then sips his coffee.

“The second target is our IA department. And from there, hopefully I’ll have more people for you, and you’ll go wider. By the end of 2018, I want every Agent vetted, by the end of 2021, I want every employee, every contractor, every subcontractor, I want the janitors at Quantico, I want the guys who sell the janitors at Quantico their soap, all of them, vetted.”

Hotch blinks. “Full clean up.”

“Full clean up.”

Hotch swallows, and stares out the window.

“For this first strike, you’re actively investigating. But,” Tim produces a copy of the information he got from Fornell and Gibbs. He doesn’t slide the thumb drive to Hotch, but he does tap it. “once this is handled, you’ll be out of active investigating and into management. You’d be the guy keeping the big picture in mind. You’d move the teams around, make sure they’re doing what they need to be.”

Hotch looks at it, still thinking. Then he nods, takes the drive, and says, “Who else is on this?”

“Right now, you’ve got two retired Federal Agents at your service. They’re hunting down some good accountants. Once we’ve got them, you team up. They will have the CVs of everyone in the Public Corruption Department who passed. You get to confab with my man in charge of undercover ops on who gets whom among them. Grab whoever you want or need for legwork of your former associates, including anyone on the BAU who they can spare, and who can keep a secret. But I need these guys in custody by August 31st.”

Hotch nods again. “Short time frame, but… I’m in.”

“Monday morning. Be here Monday morning. That’s when everything gets set into motion.”

“I’ll be here.”

Tim feels really good about that meeting as he finishes his cup of coffee. Once it’s done, time to head back into his side of the office.

It feels a bit bizarre to be the one who walks into the room where everyone is working and demand, just by being there, an update.
Which doesn’t mean Tim doesn’t enjoy it.

Ziva’s got the clicker. Fornell’s on point with the voice work. Burke’s got the folders with the employment records, and Gibbs is watching, smiling, enjoying this.

Ziva clicks up the first face.

“Thomas Rothwell,” Fornell says. “Been with the Bureau since ’92. He’s spearheaded three major organized crime stings, worked on teams with the DEA and the ATF, head accountant for teams that were taking down the money moving operations for different cartels. He’s got a reputation as the straightest straight arrow to ever be shot by an FBI bow.”

“And if he isn’t, there’s no way we’d ever be able to figure out how he’s doing it,” Gibbs says.

Fornell glares at Gibbs.

Gibbs shrugs.

Tim says, “Gut?”

“Gut. He may be, probably is, a straight arrow, but he’s the FBI’s straight arrow, and he’s not going to want to be aimed back at them,” Gibbs says.

Fornell inclines his head. “Unfortunately, I think Jethro may be onto something. He’s been here too long and has too many friends. You want to send him to the outside world, this is your man.”

“I’ll keep that in mind. Next.”

“Nancy Marsh. Been with the Bureau since 2000. Like Gibbs, she does her work on a key pad calculator with the roll of tape on the back. Says she likes the sound of the numbers, helps her think,” Ziva says.

“She’s run cases against traffickers—“ Burke starts.

Tim raises an eyebrow at that, not seeing sex trafficking and accounting going hand in hand.

“Labor traffickers. Moving people, a lot of them, into and out of the country for domestic labor, harvesting crops, stuff like that, is a big money job,” Burke clarifies.

“She’s the one who breaks into the cash trail for that,” Ziva adds.

“Something of a reputation as an oddball. Good at what she does, but this is her job. Her life is outside of the FBI,” Burke adds.

Tim thinks about that, someone like that could be useful. “Put her in the maybe pile.”

Ziva clicks up the next face, and Fornell says, “This is the one Diane recommends.”

“Oh, put—“

Tim’s ready to take him on Diane’s rec, but Fornell cuts him off, “It might not be, precisely, his accounting skills she’s recommending.”

Gibbs smirks. “He’s probably a fine accountant. She liked other things about him, too, when we asked.”
They did get Diane away from being the Chief Financial Officer for the State of Columbia, for about twenty minutes. Jeremy Chaffin is the guy she recommended. Looking at the picture of him, Fornell and Gibbs know why her eyes light up when she talked about him.

He’s not young, probably fifty-five-ish. But he’s in good shape, jaw still firm, waist trim, with a head of salt and pepper hair and bright blue eyes. Gibbs and Fornell share a look at his picture. Apparently, just like Gibbs has a type, so does Diane.

“He was at the IRS for years, decided he didn’t like the culture, and moved to the FBI back in ’10,” Fornell adds. “Not sure if we can get him over here, though. He’s in the Cheyenne office.”

“Cheyenne… Wyoming? We have a Cheyenne office?” Tim asks.

“Every state capitol in the US,” Burke adds.

“Okay… Um… Is he out there because he doesn’t know his ass from his elbow?” Cheyenne, Wyoming sounds like it might be a punishment post to Tim.

“He’s out there because he likes the West,” Fornell says. “At least, according to Diane.”

Tim thinks about the lines of numbers and money moving from point A to point B, and rapidly comes to the conclusion that even if this guy isn’t the best accountant in the history of accounting, he was smart enough to attract Diane’s attention, and Diane doesn’t like stupid.

“Bring him in. Bring in Marsh, too. Ziva?” He eyes her, waiting to see what happened with Senior’s Accountant.

Ziva shakes her head. “Busy. Out of the country. Maybe dead. I talked to five people, all of them with different answer for where he was. I think it is safe to say he does not want to talk to anyone from the FBI.”

Tim decides to let that go. “Monday morning. I’ll have Marsh and Chaffin meet with Hotch, and see if we can get something moving.”

Friday evening, Tim’s feeling like he’s got his cast in place. He puts his keys into the ignition in his car, sighs, and lets his head rest against the headrest.

Two days, Saturday and Sunday, completely off. And he knows he needs that.

Monday, the dress rehearsal begins.

And Friday, the show goes on.
Time knows, and regrets, that this is likely his last weekend for a while.

He’s scheduled to take Thursday off, too. Before everything goes live, he wants, and needs, a day to collect himself and get ready for it. But once next Friday comes around he’s on, for… Unless they end up resigning en masse, probably at least the next fourteen days. Maybe more. His twenty minutes per dressing down schedule may be vastly optimistic.

It’s not like he’s never worked half a month, or more, straight before, but… It’s the first time he’s looking at doing something he has so little desire to do, for that long. He thinks about last autumn. Voluntarily. It’s the first time he’s spend this long doing something he detests this much, voluntarily.

So, this weekend. His last two and a half days of pleasure before tossing himself, voluntarily, into Purgatory.

He’s arming himself for it. Pulling every second of joy out of this weekend that he can. He’s trying to say hyper-present, in the moment as much as possible, because he’s sure that he’s going to be pulling these memories up, anchoring himself to them, using them to keep himself going.

He doesn’t take the time to write them down, but he does organize them as words in his head. Sense memory poems.

Cold, smooth vanilla; hot, bittersweet dark chocolate; salty, crunchy pretzel bits; rich, sweet-salt peanut butter, bright burst of sweet-sour cherry at the end. Cold and hot on his tongue, smooth/crunchy on his palate. It’s the best ice cream sundae ever, at least, that he’s ever had.

It’s August, Breena is, by conservative estimate, 185,000,000 months pregnant, and even with the air conditioning on so high that the other adults in the crew are wearing long sleeves, she’s hot and achy and all over uncomfortable, and just… Grrr…

Full-on porcupine mode.

With a side of some fairly intense cravings, for sugar, and salt, and fat, and cream, and…

Anyway, long story short, his extremely pregnant wife is in a very hot, very crabby, very pregnant sort of mood, so their not pregnant wife got up and made her a sundae as everyone’s been lounging about in the living room, post-dinner, relaxing for the weekend.

Vanilla ice cream, chocolate ice cream, chocolate sauce, peanut butter, crunched up pretzel bits, whipped cream, with a cherry on top.

And Breena really appreciated all four bites of that sundae that she was able to eat. Judging by the moaning coming out of her while eating it, that sundae is an orgasmic experience in a bowl. But, as has been previously mentioned she’s 185,000,000 months pregnant, and Donnie has decided that she really doesn’t need room for a stomach, let alone food in said stomach.

So, there’s a good bit of sundae left. In a bowl. A bowl now sitting on the floor, next to Tim, because he’s on the floor, leaning back against the sofa, petting Breena’s sore feet, while she rubs his shoulders, and the whole crew talks about… everything, though right now, they’re talking about Penny’s latest adventures in New York.

It’s just sitting there, looking up at him, calling to him. (And it’s possible he’s staring at it with the same big puppy eyes that both Jackson and Mona have aimed at that bowl, but Gibbs has already let them know that chocolate ice cream is off limits for them.)

He’s not exactly hungry. And he certainly doesn’t need the calories. But… God… It looks really good. Breena scoots forward a little, and quietly says to him, not interrupting Penny’s tales, “Go ahead and eat it. Might as well load up on pleasure now, it’ll be scarce enough in the coming days.”

And that sounds like good advice to Tim.

He eats the sundae, and it’s amazing. Abby didn’t just knock that one out of the park, she hit the grand slam when the bases were loaded, bottom of the ninth, in the seventh game of the World Series.

No, he doesn’t need it, at all, but he likes it, and it makes him feel good.

---

Glide. Wet tongue on wet clit and the effortless slide of his body on hers. The impossible wet slip. The heat of Breena against his face. The thrill of his tongue slipping over her. More glide, his dick moving against Abby, so slick and hot.

Taste. Sharp, a little sour. That’s Breena. There’s a bit of Jimmy in the mix, too, though that’s more a scent than flavor. He’s moving slow, savoring right now, just rubbing his tongue over her. Moving slow enough he can focus on flavor and feel, not so wrapped up in how he’s moving, or chasing his own orgasm.

Smell. He’s wrapped in her scent. Up close and right in his face, but there are other scents here, too. Abby, she’s wearing Thousand and One Nights. Her scent is further way, rubbed into his skin from earlier, hovering a bit behind and under Breena’s scent. Jimmy’s here, too. The scent of his body on Breena’s. Tim’s licking, and Jimmy’s fucking, and every few thrusts he gets a good whiff of Jimmy slipping over, or maybe through, the scent of the girls.

But mostly though, he’s aware of the glide. His body moving effortlessly. No real friction, just back and forth, and slippery touch lighting him up.

He doesn’t often think of his tongue as an erogenous zone, but right now, sliding it over and over on Breena’s skin, he feels like he’s fucking her, and fucking Abby at the same time. Maybe it’s not the same intense pull of pleasure that he’s feeling from Abby, but it’s good. It’s sharp and focused and keeping him right here, right now, right in his body, feeling pleasure and giving pleasure and floating through that moment of building joy.

He’s not about to come, that’s still at least a minute or two off, but he’s enjoying this, right here, right now, riding the wave before it crests.

---

Sound. Soft, sucking sounds. Gentle humming. He’s almost as much feeling the humming, the rumble of Abby’s voice, through the cheek he has pressed against her back, as he’s hearing it. He’s mostly asleep. Awake enough to be aware of what he’s hearing, but his body feels heavy, unwilling to move. He can see red/brown behind his eyelids, so it must be morning, but… He doesn’t much care.

Eventually, he’ll have to get up, but right now he doesn’t.

Which means he can lay in bed, curled around Abby listening to her hum, and a soft mwuf, mwuf, mwuf sound of their son having his breakfast.

Sean’s down to two nurses a day, and most nights (much to the joy of his extended parental units) he’ll sleep from eleven to six, and then wake up, looking for breakfast, a bit before his sisters get up.

Tim curls into her a bit more closely, his hand laying on his son’s back.

“You awake?” Abby asks.

“Mmmm…”

He feels her chuckle. Apparently part of him is awake, and he feels her scooting a bit, rubbing against him. That gets a slightly more alert, “Mmmm?” out of him.

“He’s got about another fifteen minutes. You nap.”

He nods a little, and adds, “Mmmm.” (Because he’s amazingly articulate at a bit after six on a Saturday morning where he’s not on kid duty.)

Tim’s awake enough to be aware of the sounds around him, the heat of Abby’s body, soft cotton sheets around him, but given permission to nap, his mind wanders away from that, drawing pictures behind his eyelids.

He didn’t notice when she left the bed, but he feels it when she comes back, snuggling in close. Soft hair against his cheek, a warm shoulder under his chin, and her silk smooth skin all along his.

He drifts for a while, holding onto her, enjoying the quiet of the morning. She’s not moving much,
