“Not been checked out by McGee to make sure it’s not bugged. I’ll take it back to the Navy Yard, once it’s all checked out and clean, you get to play with it.”

______________________________

“And we’re on again,” Draga says to Bishop when she picks up her phone.

Bishop groans into her phone. “Really?”

“Yeah, I need back up. Should be quick. Get you home in time for a late dinner.”

Bishop’s not thrilled about that. Yes, things are hectic. Yes, the (as she calls it when talking to Jake) Case of DOOOM! is heating up. Yes, all of that’s true. She’d still like one twenty-four period per month (at least) off. “Is DiNozzo ever going to hire us a fourth agent?”

Draga shakes his head on his side of the conversation. He’d also appreciate a fourth man on the team. Make everything easier for all of them, but he gets why Tony’s dragging his heels on it. “He says he is.”

“Okay. Meet up at the Navy Yard?”

“Yeah, check in, find out what’s happened since we left this morning.”

“You just want to pet your car.”

Draga shrugs a bit. She’s not wrong.

“I’ll be in in half an hour.”

“Thanks, Bishop.”

It takes closer to ten minutes for Eric to get into the Navy Yard. One of the perks of their safe house. It’s in a crummy neighborhood that’s close to the office. He heads in, figuring he’ll swing down, see Abby, get the update, maybe get Baby back, then collect Bishop and their vests, over to Diane’s, which, with any luck (though his gut is feeling cold, so he’s not expecting luck) will be a quick visit where he grabs clothing and toiletries and the rest of it, and then back to his place for his stuff, pick up dinner, and a quiet night of mostly sleeping before getting back to it in the morning.

He’s following that plan. In he goes, Bishop’s not there yet, so he grabs his vest, straps it on, and heads down to the evidence lock up, where, once the doors to the elevator open, he whimpers audibly.

“Oh God…” escapes his lips, half horror, half prayer that it’s not really as bad as it looks.

That tattoo-covered, insane, Goth-woman took Baby apart.

He can see legs on a dolly, wearing long socks with spider webs on them, sticking out from under his Precious. The back seat’s been removed. The bumper is sitting on the work bench. All four wheels are off. Baby’s hood is sitting next to Baby. It takes him three steps to get to Abby, grab her ankle, and yank her out from under Baby.

“WHAT!” comes out of him loud and vicious. Everything that’s sucked for the last three days all poured out of him in that not quite question.

Abby holds her hands up, looking up at him from the dolly. “I know, Eric, and I’m sorry. We’ll put her back together. But…” She holds out a hand to him. “Come on, give me a hand up. I’m like a turtle on my back right now.”

He does, eyes narrowed, hand shaking he’s so angry, and he yanks a bit too hard getting her up.

“What?” She’s rubbing her wrist as she leads him over to the work bench, where a collection of electronic bits are staring up at him. “Last I checked, none of this sort of gear is standard for the sort of work you’ve done on your car, or the sorts of things you do with it.”

Eric swallows hard. Still pissed, really pissed, but not at Abby anymore. Some asshole touched his Baby and added, “That’s a tracker, and that…”

“ Lets whoever’s watching tell your speed and direction. Fine tuning for the tracker. This one here,” she gently taps a half crushed square of gray metal the size of a playing card deck, “was hooked into your NO booster. Looks like you’ve got a guardian angel. You knocked it on something bouncing along the train track, killing its receiver. If that hadn’t happened, boom. Whoever got a hold of your car went to a lot of time and effort to make sure you guys wouldn’t get home from that wedding.”

Abby touches another mangled bit of metal. “This was under your car, too, and from the looks of it got killed by whatever took out the detonator on your NO booster. It’s a cell phone jammer. If, somehow the crash, the train, or the explosion didn’t kill you all off, turn this puppy on and it would make sure you or anyone who stopped near your car couldn’t call for help.”

“Shit. Mom always said I had an angel on my shoulder.”

Abby nods. “Yeah. I’d say your mom was right. So, first off, this is not easy work, and it would not have been fast. Where does Baby live and how much time would someone have had to mess with her unsupervised?”

Eric rubs his eyes. “My apartment complex has garage bays. She lives in the one I rent. Anyone who can pick a padlock can get into it. You know my hours. I’m gone all day, every day but Saturday and Sunday, and with the way we’ve been working lately…”

“Do you stay at Diane’s some nights?”

“A lot of them recently.”

“And you don’t check in on her every day, even when you are home?”

Eric nods at that.

“You’ve got another car…”

“Yes. My Cobalt.” It’s old, cheap, and Draga uses it for just getting from point A to point B. It’s boring and not flashy at all. He doesn’t love it, or even like it that much, but it does what it needs to do for the price he needs it to do it. “Baby gets out… two or three times a month.”

“So…” Abby leads.

“Yes, if someone timed it right, they could have had as many as five days’ straight to work on her without me noticing.”

Abby nods. That’s more than enough time to do what she found. Then she gestures to the table.
“That’s probably everything. I haven’t found anything else in the last three hours, but…”

Eric nods. He’s not getting into Baby again until she’s been stripped down to her skeleton and put back together again. “I understand. How about we put her to the side, track down what you’ve found, and when we’re done with the rest of the evidence, we’ll, together, take her apart and make sure you’ve found everything.”

“Okay. I’m really sorry. She doesn’t like me poking at her, but she understood once I found the tracker.”

That’s a step further in the anthropomorphic personification than Eric usually goes with Baby, but he takes the sentiment as it’s meant.

“Got anything else?”

“Not yet. I’m off in an hour. Zelaz is on tonight. Then tomorrow morning, Corwin and I are going to get into it again.”

“Okay. Bishop should be here by now. We’re going to Diane’s.”
Abby sighs. “I bet you’ll find something interesting there.”

The cold feeling in Eric’s gut gets worse. “Yeah. I probably will.”

Gibbs wakes up as the sun’s sinking. Abbi’s next to him, which he appreciates. There’s a case, with stuff for him to work on, which is very good. Part of him wants to jump in immediately, part of him realizes that if he does that, lunges out of bed, grabs the first white t-shirt and golf shirt he sees, and heads over to the Navy Yard, he’s going to keep being upside down with everyone else.

Part of him realizes, that, unless something radically changed since this morning, there’s no one at the Navy Yard for him to intimidate into talking, and that’s pretty much the only part of the job he has to be there to do.

Part of him realizes (as he’s sitting up and moving around a bit) that he’s not feeling dead on his feet right now, but he’s not exactly feeling rested, too.

And part of him is thinking Tony told him Monday morning, and right now, Tony’s the Boss.

Monday morning is still twelve hours away.

So… Food. Food is good. Abbi’s still sleeping, but she probably needs/wants food, too. He pulls on some sweats, and heads down to his… their… kitchen. Make some dinner, and then get online. He can re-read everything Ellanza said, and spend some time doing the sort of thing they’ve asked him to do, putting together deep leads.

He’s puttering around in there, poking in his fridge, grabbing the pork chops, and thinking about drug cartels. It’s not something he ever did much with. Probably two reasons on that. First up, he’s been with the Navy his whole career as a cop, and the international drug trade doesn’t overlap with his jurisdiction all that much. Second of all, most people (okay Tom Morrow and Mike Franks) wouldn’t put a guy whose family was killed by a drug cartel in charge of investigating them.

Besides his tangles with the Reynosa cartel, it’s nothing he’s worked with.

He’s got some Mob experience. He supposes they’re a cartel of sorts. But some Mob experience isn’t a lot of Mob experience. Usually, if that’s where a case is going, he calls Fornell. The one guy he’s not calling for help, not now.

The briefing with Tony told him that the Bathenadas are a family out of Peru. They’re looking to take over the coke and heroin market, and then go into business with real drug companies when the US decriminalizes drug use.

He’s putting salt and pepper on the pork chops while thinking about that.

First off, these bad guys don’t think small.

Second of all, they’re paying everyone they can off to make sure that this works the way they want it to. So, small players right now, but deep pockets. Where’s that money coming from? Or are the pharmaceutical companies donating the cash. Of course, if that last account was anything to go by, they’re bleeding different governments for funds… Gibbs shakes his head, that sort of thing makes enemies in high places… Which usually results in dead bad guys. Unless of course the people in high places are the ones getting the pay outs, in which case they may be the ones offering intel on those black accounts… After all, black account ends up empty, who’s gonna fuss?

Third of all… Gibbs heads over to his TV and turns on ZNN. Talk about good timing. There’s a map of South and Central America showing little flames where different fights are going on. The news anchor is droning on about coordinated attacks. His official line is that the Allajanco family, out of Colombia, and the Tacana family out of Bolivia are attacking each other’s supply lines.

Gibbs listens to that, and to the much more excited reporters who are on the ground/in helicopters, gesturing to the buildings and/or fields on fire around them.

He takes out his phone and jots a note for himself. Bathenadas playing ends against the middle? A few well-placed and well-funded plants in the right places can make a huge mess, and once that mess begins the Allajancos and Tacanas can take over fighting the war against each other.

The info graphic of where conflicts are happening pops back up. Little flames are studding the map from Northern Mexico to Southern Boliva, with several more flames in the Caribbean. No flames in Peru. No flames in the US, or within fifty miles of the border.

He starts up a fire in the fireplace while watching a round table with a Senator, a ‘Drug Trafficking Expert,’ some sort of Pro-Legalization Wonk, and a Border Patrol Agent. They’re “debating” what’s going on and what the US should do about it.

The Senator and the Drug Trafficking Expert are both going on about how the US needs to be tougher on drugs, and how it’s vitally important that troops and DEA agents get sent south to help lock down the violence. (Gibbs glares at that. The last thing he wants is Marines and SEALS going into the jungles to die in order to make sure drug companies get rich.) The Border Patrol Agent (whose job Gibbs does not envy, at all) is talking about how they need more funding and more men, otherwise this violence will spread into the US. (Gibbs would prefer seeing those Marines and SEALS on the border, making sure said violence didn’t get across, playing defense instead of offense.) And the Legalization Wonk is making the point that in the states where marijuana is legal the crime rate dropped more than ten percent and if the US would just legalize the drug trade, none of this would be happening in the first place.

Gibbs writes down their names, wondering if he’s going to find out that they’re being paid by the Bathenadas.

“She’s going to kill someone,” Draga says two steps into Diane’s home.

Bishop’s looking at the extremely tidy home in the suburbs of Arlington. “Uh… why?”

Draga shakes his head. It’s obvious to him. “Someone’s been here, been through everything, and didn’t do a good job of putting it back in place.”

Bishop eyes everything. Nothing looks out of place to her. “You sure?”

He gives her his best snotty older brother look. Of course he’s sure. He’s the one they ask about where things were if they don’t have a picture handy. He remembers what everything looks like.

“The books are out of order. That vase is two inches too far to the left. The lamp should be on the other end table. The pink pillows go on the love seat, not the sofa. The house has been tossed. And they didn’t take pictures ahead of time to figure out how to put it back properly.”
“Or they wanted you guys to know they could mess with you, come in, screw with everything. Make you feel scared.”

“Where’s the computer live?”

“Should be on the desk in the office.” Draga says, pointing toward the back of the house, as he heads up the stairs to go get clothing for Emily and Diane.

A minute later he hears, “Draga!” so back down the steps he goes.

“What?”

“They took the computer.”

He books down the steps and into Diane’s office. Her laptop, her desk top, her router, her scratch pads, her accounting textbooks, everything even remotely related to her job, is gone.

“Shit.” He pulls out his phone a minute later Abbi picks up. “You at your office?”

“I’m home right now. What’s going on?”

“Someone cleaned out Diane’s home office. Everything attached to her job is gone.”

“And you want me to see if her office at work’s been ransacked?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ll give a call.”

“Thanks.”

Draga probably called at the right time. Too much more sleep, and she’d end up feeling like her joints are glued together and her brain muzzy.

Abbi’s rubbing her eyes, thinking about what she needs to do.

She can call Omagi, have him look in on Diane’s office, but he doesn’t know what’s supposed to be in there, and where. She could do the same thing herself, and run into exactly the same issue.

The fact is, the only person who knows exactly what’s supposed to be where in Diane’s office is Diane.

So, nothing, short of bringing Diane in that she can do about that. But, she can make one call and get a head start on the rest of it. As she’s dialing, Mona hops up on the bed and nuzzles her. Abbi pats her while the phone rings. After a moment she hears, “Manner.”

“Hi. Are you at the office?”

“Which one?”
Abbi supposes that’s a good question. Manner is in a sort of job limbo right now. “Mine.”

“No. I was home, actually.” There’s a hint of you know, they call them weekends for a reason, right? in his voice.

Abbi knows why Manner’s not Tim’s first choice for a computer tech leader or second-in-command. He’s good, but… this level of devotion to off time is unsettling to her. Still, right now, she’ll take any help she can get, and he’s better than who she’s got on tap.

“I need you in today or early tomorrow. Someone made an attempt on Diane Anderson’s life. We know her home’s been compromised, and I need to know her system at CGIS is safe.”

“Is she okay?” Manner sounds properly alarmed at that.

“Yeah. But we’re not taking any chances. She’s in protective custody, and…”

“Look, I know how this is going to sound, but this isn’t me ducking out of extra work. I’m not. Have her go to the Navy Yard. I’m one guy. I might miss something. McGee’s made sure we’ve all been through our system, top to bottom. It’s the safest system in the US right now. If she needs to work on a computer, that’s where she needs to be. I’ll get into her system and check everything out, but don’t have her work here.” Manner makes an annoyed sound. “Hell, we still don’t have all of your staff vetted, yet. For all we know, another ‘janitor’ is making trouble.”

“Okay.”

“I’ll let you know what I find. Maybe, we’ll luck out, and someone will leave a traceable calling card.”

“Yeah, if we’re lucky.” Her voice makes it clear that she’s not expecting anything along those lines.

“I know.” Manner says, and then hangs up.

Abbi pats Mona some more, and notices that she’s hungry, and she can smell something really yummy from downstairs. Food and then seeing what the awake part of the world did today sounds like a good plan to her.

Jimmy’s feeling human again when Molly pokes him in the back and says, “Mommy says ‘Dinner!’”

He rubs his eyes a little, picks up his daughter, giving her a long hug, and then looks around for his glasses. He does a quick double take when he sees two pairs sitting on his bedside table, and then comes to the conclusion that pair number two is Tim’s, and it’s on the table because he’s either forgotten to put them on, or not doing anything where he needs them.

“Okay.” He kisses Molly. “What are we having?”

Molly smiles. “Burgers!” They’re high up on her list of favorite foods. Jimmy smiles, too, he’s rather fond of them, as well. Especially if Breena’s making them. (Not any slight to Tim or Abby, but Breena’s the better cook.)

Jimmy stretches a bit, and slips on his fleece pj pants. He thinks for a second and decides it’s cool enough he wants a shirt too, so he grabs a long sleeve t-shirt and one of his fall sweaters. (Jeannie makes them. This one is gray with orange, maroon, and yellow leaves around the bottom. He may not love the style, but they’re warm, and it makes her and Breena happy that he wears them.)
“Starting to get cool.”

Molly nods. (She’s also got her own little fall sweater. Hers is a cardigan, and it’s pink with pumpkins on the hem and little pumpkin buttons.) “Uncle Tim found us red leaves.”

“Uncle Tim was really looking, wasn’t he?” The trees in their backyard are mostly green, with a few orange and yellow leaves right now. They’re still a week or two away from all of the leaves turning color.

“Three!”

Jimmy nods at that and picks Molly up. She giggles a bit as he tickles her while carrying her down to dinner.

It is starting to get cool. Probably in the mid-sixties right now. Unless they luck out and get one last gasp of Indian Summer, this is the last weekend of eating out on the porch. Abby’s lighting the tiki torches, and Tim’s putting the plates on the table. Breena’s getting Kelly and Anna in their high chairs. The burgers are finishing up on the grill, and right now, everything is excellent.

Jimmy gives hugs and kisses to everyone, puts Molly in her chair, and heads into the kitchen to get the pitcher of spiced cider Breena made.

Ice cold cider, spicy with cinnamon and nutmeg, hot juicy burgers, salty roasted potatoes to go with them, and the light of a dying day staining the sky crimson and pink, that’s good for the soul.

“So, what have I missed today?” Jimmy asks between bites.

For Tim and Breena, the answer is mostly domestic, playing-with-kids-stuff. Trip to the farmer’s market, looking for leaves that had changed colors, naptime for Tim (which Jimmy slept straight through) when the girls went down, maybe apple picking next weekend. (Molly’s enthusiastic about that idea, if somewhat fuzzy on the concept of next weekend.)

For Abby, that question has a much more detailed answer. She explains what she found in Eric’s car, which causes the adults to get tense. That’s a level of planning that means they’re dealing with pros, careful, dangerous pros.

“We shelved the rest of his car until we get done with the other evidence.” Abby looks over at Jimmy, takes a sip of her drink, and says, “You, or Allan, whichever one figured it out, was right. The ramming car was wired to blow. I found bits of detonator and explosive residue. What I didn’t find, and I’m sure this is intentional, is how the car was being steered. My guess is that charge was in there for the purpose of destroying how the car was getting its directions.”

“Great,” Tim says. “Nothing left?”

“Not that I found. Zelaz has everything from our ramming car, and the second accident, and he’s looking, too. Tomorrow morning Corwin and I’ll take another whack at it. We know that we did find the mechanical device that turned the steering wheel. So, low enough tech that they built something to move the wheel instead of re-doing the entire steering system.”

“If you’ve got a functional system, you don’t strip it out. Not for something like this. Use the system that works rather than build a new on that might not,” Tim says.

Abby nods at that. “I’ve got robotic arms, and gears, and a motor for moving them, all broken to bits and flung all over the place. But the thing that was getting the-turn-left-now message, that’s gone.”
Breena thinks about that. “Which means you can’t find who was driving?”

Abby inclines her head. “Not directly. Not with what I’ve got now. We’re going to have to go the long way. We’re printing and touch DNA checking everything. We’re scanning every part, digitally rebuilding them, so we’ll find out who made them, and who sold them, and with any luck who bought them. We’re going to find out who was in those cars, and from there, we’ll get to who was driving them.”

“And if you can’t?” Breena asks.

Abby looks mildly affronted. “There is no can’t. Someone modified these cars, and there’s no possible way they did it without leaving a single trace.”

Breena smiles at her. “And you’re going to find that trace.”

Abby nods.

Tim’s chewing, and then says, “How functional is the stuff you pulled out of Eric’s car?”

“Broken to bits, but I know where you’re going. The tracker and the cell jammer looked like they had a very long range. Satellite uplink range. The explosive had a very short one, probably supposed to get a signal from the ramming car. But we haven’t found anything on the ramming car to broadcast any sort of signal.”

“Want my team to go over the trackers?”

Abby nods. “They’ve already got them.”

Draga’s been a cop for less than two years. He still doesn’t really have the hang of the giving out bad news part of his job. Likewise, he’s not necessarily good at the when to tell and when to keep things quiet bit.

So, he’s sitting in the NCIS sedan that he’s using, a bag of Chipotle next to him, debating what the hell he should tell Diane.

For example, he’s certain she’s going to be unhappy (to say the least) to hear that not only has her home been tossed, but that, right now, Omagi and his guys are in her home, photographing, dusting, and touching everything.

He’s also sure that if he goes into the safe house and says everything is beyond spiffy, that she will call him a liar to his face.

And he’s not entirely sure how much she wants Emily to know about what’s going on. That’s part of what’s killing him about this. From everything he can tell, nothing was taken out of the house except Diane’s computer gear, but whoever was in there had gone through Emily’s room, and made sure that the changes in there weren’t subtle.

We can touch your daughter. He got that message loud and clear.

He’s also thinking, given that that is one of the messages, that whatever happened to Diane’s place happened after they didn’t get killed last night.
He’s been thinking about that for the last hour. Why after the wedding? Once Abby showed him the detonator on his NO container… They could have blown him and Diane sky high at any time. Why plan it for after?

The best answer he’s got is because no one was expecting to see any of them from the end of the wedding to Monday morning. That’s the longest stretch of unaccounted for time that the three of them had.

Blow them up bad enough, nothing left to ID… no one starting to look for them until Monday morning… How many hours until someone would put together the mangled car accident and the three of them…

Draga shakes his head, trying to stop thinking about that.

Omagi’s guys are canvassing Diane’s neighborhood. Seeing who heard what, but as of his last check in (ten minutes ago) no one saw anything. Of course, whoever wanted them dead, probably knew by 02:30 that the attempt hadn’t worked, so for all they know, by 03:00 someone may have been at Diane’s.

He sighs. They were probably supposed to be there last night. Sometime after dark. They wanted the computer equipment, and they wanted to get it when no one else was looking. Going into Emily’s room and leaving the sheets off the bed, the drawers open, and her clothing strewn around was probably added for effect, after whoever it was got news they weren’t dead.

He’s got to say something. He’s got clothing for all three of them. Bought new. (Everything at Diane’s is evidence right now, and going to his place is up first thing in the morning, tomorrow, when he’ll have his own crew to start on his garage bay and the explore from there.)

He puts the key into his ignition and gets ready to go.

---

Gibbs isn’t sure if this counts as domestic bliss, but he’s liking it. He and Abbi are both on the sofa in front of the fire, computers on their laps, working their respective parts of the case. (Mona napping on the floor in front of them.)

He wishes he had a white board or plasma screen, something to put all the pieces on so he can see them, but he’s doing okay with the little notes he’s writing for himself.

“Plastic.”

Abbi looks up from her own research.

“The Bathenadas were a rubber family. Plastic replaces rubber, they start to lose money. Simon,” Gibbs uses the American pronunciation of that, “Bathenada decides to move the family into security. That’s good for a while, but not getting the bills paid the way he wants them paid. From there, they start sliding into drugs.”

Abbi nods. “Okay.”

“They kept up their rubber plantations, too. Still some market for it. Simon’s son, Emilio, goes up to the University of North Carolina and gets a degree in chemical engineering.”

“To make the rubber plantation richer?”
“That looked like the basic idea. They worked on that for five years. But more and more rubber’s in decline, and the things he’s doing with it aren’t selling. Tires are pretty much the only thing still made with it, and Firestone and the rest own their own plantations. Then the ‘80s coke boom hits, and the Bathenadas decide to get into it full swing. They cut down the rubber trees, and start planting coca plants.”

“And the rest is history…” Abbi says dryly.

“Almost. They decided to go for the high end market. Uncut, pure, and extremely well-refined cocaine. They were selling as much to the party market as to the medical market.”

“Who uses coke for medicine?”

Gibbs had had to google that, too. He knows that opium is used in medicine. He didn’t know that cocaine had any use besides a good time. “Asia and South America, apparently it’s a very good anesthetic, and the stuff they were selling was medical grade. Enter Simon Jr., the grandson, who gets a medical degree at the Sorbonne in France.”

“He’s in charge now?”

“Him and Daddy. They’re taking out the competition and moving into the opium trade.”

“Great.”

“In South America, it’s the start of spring. They’re striking right at planting time, making sure that the competition won’t have a crop next year.”

“And they’re paying off anyone who might cause trouble?”

Gibbs still needs to get deeper into the money trail, but from what he’s seeing with just the one account on his computer… “They’re paying people off to get them to cause trouble. Everyone I’ve seen on the news tonight talking about how we’ve got to go to South America and wipe out every last cartel member is on their payroll, directly or indirectly.”

“And they’re paying now because it’s election season and this is when money makes the most friends?”

“Probably. Or they’re making sure their friends are still in place come January.”

“Yeah.” Abbi sighs. “I’m happier with this side of it.”

“What do you have?”

“According to Omagi, everyone at the wedding was on staff, and had been so for months. No one called out sick, no last minute replacements. If anyone got themselves in on this from the staff, they’ve been planning on this since before Diane got her hands on this job.”

“So, not a person on staff.”

“Yeah. Abby found trackers on Draga’s car, and explosive detonators. That car was not supposed to get home.”

“Why ram it if you’ve got it wired to blow?”

“Good question? Belt and suspenders? Get rid of more evidence. Keep watch, make sure everyone’s dead, and if they aren’t add an extra boom to take care of them?”
Gibbs inclines his head, those are all plausible reasons. "Why didn’t they blow it after Draga didn’t crash into the train?"

"Abby said the way his car went bouncing over the rocks next to the train track damaged the detonator."

Gibbs sighs. That’s a lot closer than he likes his close calls. "Where would they be watching from?" He knows they looked all over the place after the crash. Only one place anyone could have been watching from… "Did anyone get on or off the train?"

"Just the engineer and his crew. And yes, Omagi’s giving all of them a microscopic inspection."

"Nothing yet?"

"Nothing, yet. Manifest says they were carrying flour." Abbi’s eyes light up as she gets a text. "Zelaz just reported that he’s found a lens, so he can confirm that the accident that rerouted us had a camera in the car."

"What was driving it?"

"Can’t tell yet. Like with the car that hit Draga and Diane, the transmitter is missing."

"How did the explosive under Draga’s car work?"

Abbi nods at that. That’s a good question. She sends it back to Zelaz.

Diane’s eyes narrow as she sees Eric walk in. He has the correct bag of food in his hand. He does not have the correct bags of clothing in his hands.

She’s on the verge of having classic, full on, complete melt-down, starting with the fact that those are Target bags (Good God, what on earth is wrong with him, getting clothing from Target? She’s an adult with a real job and a sense of style and…) and moving on to why the hell would he buy them new clothing when there’s piles of perfectly good clothing at home!

She can feel the steam about to start pouring out of her ears when her second question really gets to the front of her brain.

Why would Eric buy us clothing? And it’s definitely clothing, and it’s definitely ‘us.’ He just handed one of the bags to Emily, who is also looking less than thrilled by this, but she’s biting her lip, and looking like this is just one more turd in the septic tank their life became yesterday.

"Thanks, Eric."

“I know it’s not what you usually wear, but…”

“It’s okay.”

Her daughter is handling this with more grace than she is. That pulls Diane out of rage mode, and makes her take three deep breaths, and take the bag from Eric.

“I’m going to hate the story behind this, aren’t I?"
He nods sadly at her. “Come on. Let’s sit down, eat, and we can get into it.”

He gestures to the table in the kitchen, putting the food on the table, waiting for Diane and Emily to come sit with him, and then he slowly tells them about the first part of his trip, about Baby (Emily’s properly horrified on his behalf for what happened to her) and as he gets into what was in Baby, both of them stop eating.

“They were really going to kill us,” Emily says, voice tiny, sounding very scared.

Eric nods. “Yeah. Your mom was right, you both need this. After the Navy Yard, I went to your house…”

Diane loses the details to the wave of rage sweeping over her. They were in her house? They touched her daughter’s stuff? She’s not eating, she’s shaking her head, eyes flashing, teeth gritted.

“They bastards don’t know who they messed with! Two of the toughest men to ever wear a badge are terrified of me, and by the time I’m done every single person who ever even heard of what they did to us will be, too.” She stands up, fast. “Get me a computer!”

Eric knows a war cry when he hears one. He grabs her the computer NCIS gave her, and hands it over. She nods, slowly, opens up the lap top, and gets to work.

Emily looks at him. “What’s she going to do?”

“Hit them where it hurts. In the bank account!” Diane replies.
Lining the Dominoes Up

It’s a good computer. Diane’s worked on a lot worse. Of course, it does seem like Chucky knows what the hell he’s doing with a computer and likes to make sure everyone has good tools.

While she and Emily waited for Eric to get back with clothing and food, she’d spent two hours reading up on everything that was in the computer on their case.

Not all that much. Lots of physical evidence. Great. None of it seems to lead anywhere.

And there’s all the drug war stuff, which is interesting, but she’s sure that’s not her case. Though the question of why those particular four accounts ended up in her hands has been dancing around in her mind.

Somehow, beyond just the fact that she’s the one investigating, there’s a relation in these four accounts. There has to be. She’s also sure that someone didn’t wire Baby to blow, let alone tried to ram her into a train because of the drug war stuff. Okay, wire Baby or her car to blow up, sure, Tobias had told her about Mob cases where that’s what happened to witnesses. She can buy that. But, rammed into a train? With a driverless car? That’s not someone shutting up a witness or sending a message.

She guesses, if the accident had happened the way it was supposed to, it would have looked like there were enough drivers, and the local cops would have put it down to someone hitting the gas instead of the brake at the train. And that would be that.

The drained account… That’s got something going on… Something more than Black Ops money ending up in the hands of an Ambassador. And how whoever gave her that account knew this was going to happen… Of course, maybe the anonymous writer didn’t know. Maybe he just wanted to highlight what else that account did. She makes a note to see what that account did before yesterday.

There’s the third account, which is behind a wall she can’t scale or break into on her own. She’s thinking she’ll need Chucky’s help on that one. Which means that’s the one they’re trying to keep her out of.

The fourth account. It’s old. Really old. Started up in 1932, and she’s got the records going all the way back.

The first bit that’s weird about it is that money goes in all the time, but only goes out every two years, and when it went out, it went out all over the place, hundreds, if not thousands of transactions going out. Then, come November of every even numbered year, it’d just stop. Another two years of money going in, and boom, round about June money starts going out.

That pattern stays in place until 1992. Suddenly money starts to exit the account all the time. It goes in, it goes out. There’s usually something of a pause in November of even numbered years until May of the next year, and then money goes flowing out again.

She’s tempted to start checking all of those accounts feeding into and out of that one, but there’s literally hundreds of thousands of them, and given how old they are, she’s sure a lot of them are closed accounts from banks that don’t exist any longer. So, she keeps scrolling back up to now.

In 2004, the pattern shifts again. Money keeps going in the way it always was. But, instead of lots of little payouts, it shifts to one big payout, and lots of little ones. 2006, one bigger payout, fewer little ones. 2008, is way bigger than 2006. 2010, smaller than ‘08, bigger than ‘06. 2012 was another huge year, but not as big as ‘08. By 2014, more than two thirds of the money going out is going to one payout, and that one payout is going to her mystery account. In 2004, the big payout was 83.6 million dollars, in 2014 the big payout was 1.6 billion. And, judging by what’s sloshing around in this account right now, next November’s payment will brush up against 4 billion. Whatever this is, it’s huge.

“What happens in November every two years?” Diane asks, the first sound out of her, besides the clicking of her fingers on her keyboard, in three hours.

Emily looks up from the card game she’s playing with Eric and says, “Odd or even years?”

“Even.”

“Mom… The elections, duh! First Tuesday of November every two years.”

Diane feels cold, and begins to nod. Drug cartels kill people right and left. Happens all the time. Two bullets to the back of the head, in, out, and done, fast. And when they do it, they usually want you to know they did it.

But this… This is a lot of money moving off the official books matching the election cycle. Of course there are spikes in ’08 and ’12, and, of course, ’16, with a Presidential election where no one’s running for reelection, will be even higher yet.

This is the kind of money you work very carefully, very methodically, to make sure that no one, ever, finds out about. This is the kind of case where you want to make sure that anyone who might have been investigating it looks like they died of an accident, like getting nailed by a car that doesn’t see the train’s flashers.

This is the kind of case where people, and things, computers, accountants, investigators, just vanish over.

She knows why a target went on her head as soon as she got those account numbers, and she knows why her Boss at the IRS basically sprinted down to get her off this case.

Time to find names to go with each of the accounts feeding off of this one. Who’s paying in, who’s paying out.

One other thought occurs to her as she starts going through them. The person who let her know about this had to know about it. Maybe s/he’s one of the names she’s going to find.

When Gibbs is making breakfast, he turns on the news again. ZNN is reporting about the drug war down south, and there are even more little fires on the map than there were yesterday.

He’s thinking that Simon Jr. is one hell of a strategist to have pulled this off. That, or the Allajancos and Tacanas are trigger-happy paranoid schizophrenics. Or some combination thereof.

“Everything still on fire?” Abbi asks as she comes into the kitchen.

“Looks like it.” He can’t see the TV in there, (he’s been listening as he cooks) so he pokes his head out of the kitchen and counts quickly, knowing he’ll get more detail when he heads into work.
“There’s seventy-six targets on there, over five thousand square miles, in two days.” He shakes his head.

She nods. “Give me a battalion of Marines and I can pull that off that fast, but not with any fewer men.”

“Yeah.” The flames on the infographic are color coded for fields, buildings, transportation. “You’d need a third of the SEALs to do that…” Gibbs gets an idea. Something he remembers about Tim’s Uncle Tom, the one who’s some sort of Black Ops kind of guy for the SEALs. He puts the eggs on plates for both of them and heads to his phone.

“What are you thinking?” Abbi asks.

“Tim’s Uncle Tom does that sort of stuff. He’s the kind of guy who would have had access to the Black Ops account, too.”

“Calling Penny?”

“Yeah.” He dials the numbers, wondering if he might be able to get some time with “Uncle Tom.”

A minute later he hears, “Good morning, Jethro. Up bright and early?”

“I’m always up now.”

“Ah. So, to what do I owe the honor?”

“Feel like getting some coffee or breakfast with me? My treat?”

“Interesting. Is this coffee or are you just hankering for my company?”

“I want to ask you about Tom.”

For a second, Penny doesn’t say anything, and then she does. Gibbs has the sense that she just put together why he’d want to know more about Tom. “Even more interesting. At the diner?”

“Yeah.”

“I can be there in half an hour.”

Monday morning. Tony’s up and ready to go. He’s got updates from Omagi about what he’s been working on; a full report from McCellan about Jared (yet another car accident. They’re still looking for the car that knocked him into oncoming traffic, resulting in a four car pile-up, and three dead people, including Jared.); on top of that, he’s got Draga and Diane, who have had their whole lives turned upside down; and down below it, a collection of “DEA Agents” (three of the five actually work for the DEA, the other two haven’t been IDed yet.) who’ve been sitting in holding all night, getting more and more annoyed by the minute.

The “DEA Agents” go first. Technically, he’s only allowed to hold them for 24 hours, and he’s had them for 27 at this point. He should be letting them go or charging them soon, but he’s also curious. Namely, no one’s called for them. He knows that if he was supposed to move a prisoner from the FBI to NCIS, and he went off the radar for more than 24 hours, the FBI would have several very irate NCIS Agents banging down their door, looking for him.

As of yet, he’s gotten not so much as a politely worded email, let alone a large, impolite man looming over him demanding he return his agents. (Which is exactly what he’d expect Draga to go do if he went missing at the FBI.)

He’s also noticed that none of the “DEA Agents” sitting in his holding cell have been reported missing. Now, it’s possible that spouses have been calling the DEA and are getting the official, “Can’t tell you where they are” line, but, once again, if that’s the case, why doesn’t he have a pile of DEA Agents on his doorstep looking for these guys?

This has led him to one major conclusion. The “DEA Agents” were not expected to come back, not anytime soon, after grabbing Ellanza and the money.

That conclusion has led him to do a bit of extra digging. Extra digging is showing him that Gil Dunerson, Director of the DEA, is on the board of about twenty-five anti-drug charities. Nineteen of those charities just got big payouts from the Bathenadas.

Tony does not think this is a coincidence.

Draga starts his morning at his home. It’s the smallest, least expensive two bedroom apartment he could find in any sort of neighborhood where he didn’t have to worry about stray bullets from gang fights if Kevin’s playing outside.

He doesn’t keep it particularly tidy, though it’s not a pigsty, either. It’s clean, but, because he has almost perfect visual recall, he doesn’t have to be particularly careful about where he puts things when he’s done with them.

If his keys end up on the coffee table instead of the shelf next to the door when he gets in, it’s not like he’ll have a hard time finding them again in the morning. This is true for his tools, kitchen supplies, computer things, clothing, and all the rest of his stuff. So, maybe he’ll put his frying pan back on the stove when it’s clean, or maybe on the shelf, or, say if he’s watching TV while he dries his dishes, it might end up on the coffee table.

So, unlike Diane’s house, where Bishop was standing next to him, wondering how he could possibly tell anything was out of place, she’s standing next to him at his house, with Omagi and his team, looking at his place, and says, “They tossed it, didn’t they?”

Eric shakes his head. “If they did, they took pictures first and put everything back.”

Bishop walks over to his sofa, and eyes the stack of folded jockeys and paired socks. “You keep your clean undies here?”

He gives her a You, Queen of the every paper in every file spread over the entire bullpen, are going to make a comment about how tidy my space is? look. And if it was just the two of them, that look would have done it, but Omagi is also looking at the mild chaos of his apartment, so Draga explains, “I live alone most of the time, so it’s not like I’m bothering someone if my skivvies are out. And no, this isn’t where my underwear normally lives. This is where I sort and fold it after I wash it, and before I put it in my drawers.” He gently kicks the basket of unsorted, clean laundry sitting next to his sofa. “Didn’t get done before it was time to head over to Diane’s.”
Omagi’s just watching the two of them. “Can we get to work?”

“Yeah. But, let’s start with my garage. We know they were doing something in there. It’s possible no one’s been in here.”

“That’s fine. We’re still going to go through everything. Given how far they went with your car, we wouldn’t put it past them to have a plan B that involves something nasty in your food or drink or toothpaste or something.”

Eric rubs his forehead. “Fuck.”

Bishop rests her hand on his shoulder. “I’m sorry.”

He nods, sighing. “I know. Let’s go check out the garage.”

“Weren’t you in it Saturday?” Bishop asks as Eric’s about to grab the key to the padlock.

Omagi steps in. “Nope.” He holds out an evidence bag, and places the keys inside, using gloved hands.

Eric slumps a little more. He snaps on gloves to handle his own things, and Bishop does as well. “Yeah. Nothing looked out of place, but I wasn’t really looking.”

He shuts the door to his apartment, and takes them across the parking lot to the enclosed garages. His is on the far left end. He watches as Saunders, armed with pink powder, goes to work dusting the lock, and the door. Lots of prints, but Eric assumes most of them are his, and then he groans because he knows Kevin’s prints are on there, too, which means he’s going to have to have a conversation with Kevin’s mom about why he needs Kevin’s prints. With the way this case is going, he’s never going to get custody of his little boy. Hell, he’ll be lucky to get to visit him. He can just see her lawyer pointing out the attack on Baby and why he’s an unsafe parent.

Bishop squeezes his shoulder again as all the prints get taped and saved for later. Once that’s done, Omagi’s got the bolt cutters, cuts through the lock, and, taking it off the door says, “I see some small scratches on this. Might have been picked.”

Eric looks at it, and there are some tiny scratches along the channel the key goes into. “They’ve been there for a while, but I don’t remember when they got there. I just assumed I made them when I opened the lock. That’s not the sort of thing that would set off my danger sense.”

“Not feeling wary on Saturday?” Omagi says.

“Why would I have? I was getting my car, to show off for my girlfriend’s daughter, and then going to a wedding. The only thing I was worried about was making sure I got there on time.”

Saunders lifts open the door, and they go in. Eric takes a few minutes to look, really look, at his set up. Like his apartment, it’s clean, but not tidy. His tools are organized using the ‘the things I used most recently are nearest the car, the stuff I haven’t used recently has been shoved to the back’ system.

There are only two things out of place.

One is his spare N2O canister. Normally, it lives under his workbench, in one of the shelves, behind a closed door. Namely, it’s the sort of thing he’d only see if he was specifically looking for it. It’s missing. Of course, if you were the sort of guy who does anything with explosives, having a spare canister of one of the best oxidizers on earth, that you don’t have to pay for, that’ll trace back to a COP if it’s found, is perfect.

The second is a drop of something on his floor. Omagi swabs it, but by color and scent, Draga knows that it’s not one of the fluids that would normally be in his car. By scent, he’s thinking it’s some sort of soda, and he’s really, really hoping it’s got DNA.

Everything else is exactly where it’s supposed to be. Unlike Diane’s place, whoever did this didn’t want him to notice something was wrong.

---

When Abby gets in, Zelaz is looking happy to see her.

“I know that smile,” she says to him.

He grins, nodding. “Oh yeah. Check this out.” He brings her over to the collection of non-standard hardware that they pulled out of both of the driverless cars. “Whoever did this built his own components, and he was picky and very well-funded.”

Abby looks at the wires Zelaz is showing her. “Those are high end stereo cables.”

He nods at her. “Yeah. Minimal resistance. Pure copper and silver, supposedly no oxidation. No lag, at all between telling the bomb to go boom and boom. Cost more than a grand a meter, and only three places make and sell them.”

Abby starts to do her happy dance. “Oh yeah! That’s the best news all morning.”

Zelaz is still smiling, and Corwin gets in, joining them. “We get a break?”

“Yeah.” He briefly tells Corwin the same thing he just told Abby. “Guess who was able to get all three manufacturers to donate a millimeter or two of cable so we can find out exactly who made this!”

Abby gives Zelaz a huge hug. As she’s stepping back, Corwin adds, “I was thinking, since these were wired to blow, we should be cross referencing these builds with our bomber database.”

“Excellent idea! You get on that, and I’m going to get into what’s left of the ramming car. Time to start looking for blood, sweat, tears, a hair, a fiber out of place, a little bit of snagged latex, something. There’s no way someone did this much work on a car without leaving a trace.”

Zelaz looks pleased by that. “I’ve got one last bit; that I’ve already sent to DiNozzo and Omagi. Both of these cars were stolen, within two months of each other, from the Philadelphia airport long-term storage garage.

Abby’s humming a happy little tune as she smiles to Zelaz, and begins to pull on her coveralls.

---

There are a lot of days where Abbi would much rather be in the field. Like right now. She really wants to be with Omagi, investigating an actual crime.
Instead, she’s in her office, still trying to get her own organization out from under-water.

Attempted murder of one of her team, doesn’t matter, she’s at her desk, doing her job, because investigating it isn’t her job anymore. Her job is sitting in this building trying to make sure her whole agency runs.

And then, at 10:00 she’s got another chance to go testify in front of Congress about the FUBAR CGIS was before she and Gibbs broke open the accounting scandal.

Once she sits down, Manner pokes his head into her office. “You got a minute?”

She nods.

“As best as I can tell, Diane’s computer here is clean. Doesn’t mean that it wasn’t, at some point, bugged, and it doesn’t mean that someone didn’t ransack her office and take one computer out and put a new one in its place.”

“Good.” She’s pleased to hear they have at least that minimal level of security.

“Eh…”

“Eh?” Shit, there’s some sort of cloud to go with that silver lining.

“I got looking upstream. There have been times when more than one person’s been accessing her computer at the same time. Someone else has her passwords. And if her home computer is gone, that’s probably where the keystroke logger was that let whoever it was know what her passwords were.”

Abbi’s eyes narrow. “Tell me you know where the second user was.”

Manner smiles. “Not yet, but I’ve got the trap laid. Today, I’m going to use her log ins, and do some… highly visible things, and it’s entirely likely that whoever is watching her will decide they need a closer look at what I’m doing. Once that happens, we’ll have who’s watching.”

Abbi looks very pleased by that. “Thank you. Have you given Omagi the heads up?”

“Yeah, he’s ready to stop processing in less than a minute and run if need be, to grab whoever it is, and I’ve got the no-knock warrant set, too.”

And, yes, Manner might not be Tim’s number one choice for a second-in-command, or Abbi’s for that matter, but right now, she’s very happy with him.

Tim finds Diane in his office, sitting at his desk, working on a laptop. She’s extremely focused right now, not noticing him at the doorway, so he takes a moment to just look.

Obviously, something happened that he’s not in the loop for. He’s never seen her in anything less than a perfectly put together professional outfit. Hell, he woke up next to her with both of her ex-husbands leaning over them, and she looked more put together than he does when he’s trying. Right now she’s in jeans, a t-shirt, and an NCIS sweatshirt. Her hair’s quite a bit frizzier than normal, most of it pulled back into a ponytail, and she’s not wearing any makeup.
“Stop staring. I know you’ve seen a woman without makeup before,” she says without looking up.

“I… uh… What are we working on?” He thinks that’s a safe answer.

“Making every single one of those assholes who tried to kill my daughter pay so long and so hard that they’ll wish their grandparents never met.”

Tim nods. That’s, in his book, a perfectly reasonable response to someone trying to hurt your child. “What do you need from me?”

“This one,” she says, pointing to an account number on a post it note, as he pulls out his chair and sits down.

He looks at it, remembering that that’s the account at the floating bank, the one no one can get into. The one that supposedly has ties to all sorts of nasty business.

“This is the account you know exists but were never able to get into,” Tim says to Diane.

She nods. “Leroy and I were arguing about it, and one thing I said to him is that the people we’re up against don’t take people like me out of the picture after we find whatever it is. I’d already gotten into the drug stuff before they went after me. They take me, and… shit… Jared, out before we get into it.” She got the heads up on Jared when she got in this morning and talked to DiNozzo. She’s intentionally not thinking about that. She can mourn for him after all of these people are behind bars and her daughter is safe. “They’re protecting something, not avenging it. I’m next to something, closing in, but until I can get into that one, I don’t know what.”

“You sure it’s not the drug war?”

She glares at him. “That’s a smoke screen or something. And that’s not the kind of guy who sends a drone controlled car after me. The cartels don’t do that. They show up when you’re sleeping and murder you.”

Tim would have to admit that he’s never seen a cartel go after someone with a drone controlled car, but he’s also a firm believer in a world where the bad guys adapt tactics to changing technology, so he wouldn’t put it past them. He also does not want to argue with the look in Diane’s eye right now, so he says, “All right. So…”

“So…” She flicks from one window on her computer to another. “This one. Tell me what you see.”

Tim’s eyes scan over the list of accounts. In and out, in and out… “November’s your drop dead date on whatever it is this is paying for.”

“Yeah.”

His eyes flick from the big payout to the mystery account. “Same number.”

“Uh huh. What happens every other November on even years, Chucky?”

His eyes start to go wide. “Shit. This is…”

“Something to do with the election.” She opens another window on her computer. This one is a list of account numbers with names and dates attached. “I’m starting to put names to who’s paying into this thing, and getting some names on who’s paying out.”

Tim’s eyes scan that list. After the Bathenadas’ payout list, he’s not in any way shocked to see who’s on this list. “Big names.”

She nods. “Yeah.” She taps two of them. “These guys make drones for a living. They have some impressively large contracts with the US government, and one with Amazon.”

Tim nods at that, too. “The Admiral probably knows them.”

Diane gives him the side-eye, she has no idea who ‘The Admiral’ is. He shakes his head at her, and she points to the next column. “And see this column?” It’s a spread sheet, so he’s not having a difficult time seeing the third column. He nods to her. “These are guys who were getting pay outs from the Bathenadas.”

“So now you’ve connected three of four accounts. What about the one with the Ambassador?”

“Even I have to sleep sometime.”

“Okay. Uh… If you go talk to Bishop or Ziva, you can get those accounts that the Bathenadas were paying into unfrozen, and then trace where the money goes.”

“Yeah, I know. Already done it for ten of them.”

“Because that’ll be easier to trace?”

She nods. Ten is easier than more than four hundred. “And because those ten had the biggest names on their boards.”

“Good point. Go for the big fish first.”

“Exactly. Now, get me into the mystery account. Moby Dick’s hiding in there, and we’re going whale hunting.”

“Okay, Ahab.” Tim gets his computer up and running, and as he’s doing that he says, “For the mystery account, you’ve got a routing number and an account.”

“Yeah, Chucky, I know that. I’ve been doing this for a while.”

Tim rolls his eyes. “I haven’t. Why couldn’t you get in?”

Diane looks annoyed by this. “Even incoming deposits need a key to break their verification system. You can’t just go over to your bank and ask them to wire money to this account. Won’t work. There are, as best we can tell, only six banks in the world that can send money to this one. You’ve got to wire your money to one of them, they use the verification software, and that gets the money to this account.”

“Okay. Which banks do you have to originate from?” Tim asks, getting into his computer’s stealth mode. It’s a proxy server that bounces thought sixteen levels of false IP addresses as well as two encryption systems. It’s possible that someone he hacks can trace back to him, but it’s snowball-in-hell level unlikely.

“What are you going to do?” Diane asks as she starts getting that information together.

“Check them out, find the one with the most lax security, hack it, steal the verification key, and get from there into your floating bank.”

“Isn’t that illegal?”
“So,” Penny says, taking a sip of her coffee, “I take it you’re curious about Tom because of what’s going on down south.”

Gibbs inclines his head, also sipping his coffee.

“What made you think of him?”

“Abbi and I were talking about it. How big. How fast. She said she’d need a battalion of Marines to pull that off, and I was thinking at least a third of the SEALs.”

“Which made you think of Tom.”

“Mike said something about you guys thinking he was a SEAL.”

“We do. I don’t know if he could be any help. None of us know what he does. Once he hit the SEALs, his work went from vague to never spoken about. We’re not even sure of his rank. The voice who picks up when you call his work number refers to him as ‘Commander,’ and has for the last twenty-five years.”

Gibbs inclines his head at that, too. “Yeah, but you know not to ask, right?”

Penny nods. That’s true. Part of why she doesn’t know for sure is because she never goes further than saying, “Anything interesting happening at work…” And that lets Tom know she’s interested, but doesn’t require him to give any details, and he doesn’t. For a while, Nelson was able to get her updates, and after him, John, but since the ‘90s, even John hasn’t been able to find out what Tom does. “From everything I know of what he does, all the rumors I’ve been able to get, he’s the kind of guy who would, if the US Government wanted to do something like overthrow a drug cartel, be sent in to go about doing it. But I don’t actually know if that’s what he does. So, what do you want to ask him?”

Gibbs glances around, but no one’s paying any attention to the two old people in the back booth.
having breakfast together. Even Elaine knows not to come too close right now.

“We know one of the cartels out of Peru has a lot of high ranking US government people on the payroll. Like Supreme Court Justices, high-ranking.”

Penny winces. She knows three of them personally, and is on nodding terms with two more. She really hopes her friends aren’t hooked into this. “The kind of people who could order that sort of attack, if they were properly bribed.”

“Yeah. Or loan men to train others to pull it off. But, if it’s off the books, those guys wouldn’t have official orders, so…”

“So you want to talk to the kind of guy who’s also sent on off-the-books missions, and see if he knows what’s going on?”

“Yeah, I want to know if our soldiers are getting killed to make drug barons rich.”

Penny nods at that. She pulls out her phone, and texts Gibbs a number. “That’s what we use to reach him.”

“Thanks. When was the last time you talked to him?”

“Ummm…” She thinks for a few minutes. “Bit after CGIS blew up. You were still in the hospital.”

“Okay. You think he’ll talk to me?”

“He’s heard your name often enough that he’ll say hello, and if you explain what you know, he’ll listen. I don’t know if he’ll talk, but if your case is convincing enough, he might take matters into his own hands.”

“Should I be scared?”

“No. But if what you think is happening is happening, the guys selling out our troops should be. Tom’s just as driven as I am. He’s never met a cause he’s ever let go. And he lives in a very black and white world. There are good guys and bad guys and the bad guys better hope they don’t come before him, because he takes care of them. If you ever meet him, I imagine you’d like him quite a bit.”

Gibbs nods, smiles. “Sounds like my kind of man.”

“Director Vance, would you care to explain why NCIS thought it necessary to use civil asset forfeiture to seize the bank account of the Partnership For A Drug Free Tomorrow?”

The voice on the other end of Vance’s phone is annoyed. Not angry. He has a sense that voice doesn’t get “angry.” That voice, which has been polished by years of high office ranging from Secretary of the Interior to Senator to Governor, is known for being eternally cool and collected.

“We froze the account, not seized, and beyond that I have no comment. You are not read in on this operation, and until you are, I have nothing to say.”

“Read me in.” Now annoyed is edging toward angry. From the transactions that Vance has seen, this voice gets close to $50,000 a month in “board fees” from various charities. The majority of those fees appear to come from the Partnership. And, if the information Diane’s been sending him is correct, the Partnership gets about half of its funding from the Bathenadas.

“I’m sorry, sir. This is need to know, and you do not.”

“Do you know who I am?” Still not angry, but icy cold and tense.

“Yes, sir. I do.” Joe Average might not know the name, but anyone hooked into DC political circles would. “Do you know who I am?”

“No. But I guarantee by lunchtime, I will, and then everyone else will know who you are, and we will make sure that by the end of dinnertime you will have been so thoroughly busted down that you’ll be begging the janitor for spare change.”

Vance smirks, that’s the most creative threat he’s gotten today.

“You are welcome to try.” And then there’s a dial tone. Vance rubs his eyes. Then he opens his desk drawer and breaks out the toothpicks. He needs something to gnaw on, and if he doesn’t get one, he’s going downstairs, finding someone who smokes, and bumming a cig off of them.

He buzzes his secretary. “Unless it’s someone who wants to talk to me about actual NCIS business, give them the polite brush off. Get their names, tell them I’m in conference with the Sec. Nav., and sound worried about it.”

“You want me to give them the impression that your superior is already handling their complaint?”

“Please.”

“No problem.”

“Thanks, Sharon.” He buzzes off and gets back to his computer. So far, he’s had nine calls along the lines of the one he just took, some high-ranked person calling on behalf of a charity that got its account frozen. He supposes it makes sense that he’s getting the calls now, it’s Monday, so business is open.

He writes down the name of this latest one, and gets back to what he’s trying to do, namely figuring out what Ellanza was going to do with that money. 500 million isn’t chump change, and with it not in the hands of whoever was supposed to get it, something should be grinding to a halt by now.

The question is, what?

Computer time. Not precisely Ziva’s favorite way to spend the day, but it’s useful, and it has to be done. Especially with Draga and Bishop out of the office, working on finding out what’s happening with the attack on him and Diane, someone’s got to do the grunt work, and that someone is her.

For example, right now she’s checking car thefts from the Philadelphia Airport Long Term Storage Garage. It’s boring as hell, but likely useful. For example, over the last three years, twenty-two cars, common, old makes and models have been stolen and never seen again.

Interesting cars that have been stolen, ones that are expensive or have valuable parts, aren’t of interest to her. They’ve got good market value and it makes sense that people would steal them.

No, she’s looking for cars like the ones in the accidents from Saturday/Sunday. The one that blocked the road was an eight-year-old Dodge Durango, the one that tried to run Draga into the train was a ten-year-old Ford Taurus. Good, decent, old, working cars. The sort of thing that no one looks twice at.

None of those 22 cases are solved. Part of that, Ziva assumes, is that the Philly PD has bigger fish to catch (she can hear Tony correcting her idiom in her head). Part of it is that, given how everything else in this case is going, it’s entirely likely that these cases were intentionally not solved.

So, what she’s doing is sitting there, listing cars, and going through the airport security footage, putting together screen shots of the people who stole those cars, so they can put them through facial recognition.

The shots are black and white, grainy, and at bad angles, but, to her eye, it looks like the same three guys have boosted all of those cars.

And while the guys stealing the cars are hard to see, the license plates aren’t. So, that’s her second job, seeing what those cars have been up to.

Tim glances over at Diane. He’s been at this for over an hour, broken into three of the feeder banks, and hasn’t come in contact with anything that looks like a way into the floating bank.

“Are you sure about the authentication key?”

She looks up from her computer. “That’s how we thought it worked, why?”

“No key. I’ve been through three banks that have transferred money to this account, but there’s no authentication key.”

“The money has to get in there somehow, and we’ve tried to wire money into this account. You can’t do it.”

Tim thinks about that. “You want to try an experiment for me?”

“Sure.”

“Unlock another one of charity accounts, and deposit Bathenada money from them into the election account, and from there into the mystery account. Obviously money has moved from this account to the other one before.”

“I can do that, but why?”

“There are two ways to make sure a system is safe, take it so high tech that no one can break your tech, or take it so low tech they can’t use a machine to do it. What if it’s a matter of some guy has to physically hand a check over? What if the verification code is two guys who know each other’s face? That’s the kind of security you can’t break with a machine.”

Diane’s nodding, seeing how that would work. “Banker A knows Banker B, and they do everything in person… Yeah… Okay, let’s see what I can do. If that’s how they’re playing it, can you get into “David R. Sammuels. Special Agent for the DEA for the last seven years. You’ve worked primarily in Peru for the last seven years, and only came back stateside six months ago,” Tony says.

Sammuels is sitting in interrogation, in front of Tony, looking annoyed. “You read my CV, great. Why am I still in here?”

“Because I’m not ready to let you leave.” Tony smiles.

Sammuels rolls his eyes. Asshole is written all over his face, but he doesn’t say anything.

“Tell me about your current job.”

“Call my boss.”

“I wanna hear about it from you.”

“Cut and dried, prisoner and evidence transfer. I was just about done for the day, then I get called in, and told to pick a guy and some stuff up from you guys.”

“Oh. So…”

“So…”

“There’s more to the story than that. Tell me all of it,” Tony leads.

Sammuels’ lips purse in annoyance. “So, I log out of my computer, lock up my desk, put my gun on, and head over to the motor pool to grab a van. Ed and Skyler were there, along with two other guys who I don’t know, but they had the right paperwork, so we tucked them into the back of the van and off we went.”

“Uh huh. What’s the right paperwork?”

“They’re with the US Consulate in Montevideo. Ellanza… the prisoner… he’s their Ambassador, and it’s their job to lug his ass back to Uruguay.”

Tony licks his lips. “Uh huh… And do you have any idea why we grabbed Ellanza?”
“No, and I don’t fucking care. Get him, get the evidence, give both of them to those two little shits, and then done with it. We’d be out of here if that one asshole hadn’t coldcocked your guy with the door and ran.”

While that’s not exactly true, Tony doesn’t mind if that’s why the DEA guys think they’re in holding. “And, do you routinely give prisoners and evidence away to US Consulates?”

Sammuels is giving Tony the quit being a jerk look. “I do whatever the hell my Boss tells me to do. And if some jerk shows up with the paperwork signed off by the Director of the Agency, I do what that paperwork tells me to do.”

Tony tries to not let his glee show when he hears the word ‘Director.’ “You still have that paperwork?”

“You guys should. The last time I saw it, Nash, the asshole who tried to run and got tackled, was tucking it into his suit jacket.”

“All right. Were you and your partners supposed to go to Montevideo, too?”

“No. Pick them up, take them to their plane, turn around, and done. I was supposed to be home in time for brunch.”

Yeah, something, to quote Abby, hinkey, is going on here. “Ah. Interesting. So, one last question, if you were expected back at the DEA within, what, three hours?” Sammuels nods. “Why do you think absolutely no one has called to enquire about what happened to you and your partners?”

That has Sammuels flatfooted. “No one?”

“No one,” Tony says with a nod. “Now here, if I go off and don’t come back, a pile of people come looking for me, but no one’s looking for you. Why?”

“My Boss hasn’t called?”

“No.”

“Frank Toner? He’s the fourth man on our team. He was out on Sunday. Nothing from him?”

“Literally, no one has checked in to see what’s happened to you.”

Sammuels’ eyes narrow. Tony can read that look. That’s Sammuels going from annoyed to scared. “Something just went very wrong.”

“I agree. Let’s start at the beginning, what did you used to do in Peru?”

“Easy day, today?” Dr. Allan asks Jimmy. Most of the time, when he comes in and they don’t have a case, or paperwork, or tests to run, Jimmy gives him a “provisional” day off. Namely, he’s free to leave, but he’s got to be able to get back in less than half an hour should a call come in. This helps to balance out the overtime he’d otherwise be accruing in large quantities when they have a long case. Because they didn’t have the paperwork software, he had fewer of them, but when Ducky had no customers and the work was done, Jimmy also had provisional days off.
“For right now. Dr. Allan, I know this isn’t part of our job description, but how would you feel about both of us heading upstairs to offer assistance?”

Allan thinks about it. “Slightly worried. What do you think I’d be able to do upstairs?”

“If what I’m hearing is correct, anything from getting coffee to making phone calls, to putting information into an excel spreadsheet. It’s not part of your job, so you certainly don’t have to, but they are swamped up there, and could use the extra sets of hands.”

Allan inclines his head. “I can type; I can make phone calls, and I’ve been known to get coffee on occasion. Sure. Let’s see what we can do.”

“The number you are trying to reach is not in service. Please hang up and dial again.”

That’s the second time Gibbs has gotten that recording by trying to call Tom McGee’s contact number. His gut is yelling. Something is going on, and Tom’s attached to it, somehow.

He doesn’t know how or why, not yet, but he’s feeling like he just unraveled the biggest damn knot of this case. Problem is, he’s got no idea what all the threads are trying to tell him.

Time to go talk to someone who’s got more of a view of the bigger picture than he does.

As he drives toward the Navy Yard, he turns his radio on, finding the all-news all-the-time channel. Since this morning, fighting has petered out in Bolivia, but is going strong in Colombia. He wonders if, perhaps, someone didn’t get the payment they were supposed to, and that’s why things are starting to calm down. Or possibly, that’s just the fog of war, and lag in reporting times.

Diane looks up from her computer. “Payment bounced. Wasn’t accepted by the mystery account.”

Tim nods. “Okay, so they’re playing it old school.”

“Or they know they’re only supposed to get one payment from that account, and it’s too soon, and not enough money.”

Tim inclines his head, Diane might be right about that. “Either way, means I can’t get in using a different bank. Time to go straight in.”

“How are you going to do that?”

Tim starts to get into it, sees her eyes begin to glaze and switches to, “Do you have a masters in forensic computing, fifteen years in the field, hacking, or a PhD in computer science?” His tone is a bit too smart ass for her liking, so she glares at him. Tim shakes his head. “It’ll be gibberish if I try to explain it. Just trust me, it’ll work, or it won’t, and if it doesn’t then I’ll move onto plans B, C, and D, but that account’s going to give up its secrets.”

Diane smiles at him.
As Chucky’s clicking away, and occasionally talking to his computer, Operation Hit Them Where It Hurts, has been churning along.

That little NSA trick of Bishop’s has allowed her to do some thoroughly nasty things to people who probably didn’t expect it. Add in civil asset forfeiture, where, unlike a person, she can just accuse the money of breaking the law, and then seize or freeze it, without having to come up with a warrant, and she’s tearing through people’s finances like Ghangis Khan on the plains of Asia in a bad mood.

For example, as of 10:34 eastern time, the Bathenadas are broke. Every account linked to them is frozen solid. Every account attempting to deposit money into the Bathenadas’ accounts have also frozen. Every account they’ve ever paid into is colder than Antarctica in July.

She’s begun the audit of her boss at the IRS, sure he’s part of this, and because he’s got the same tricks up his sleeve as she does, she didn’t freeze his money, she drained his accounts and put them into a blocked escrow account. Only two people have access to that account, her and Leon. Then she cancelled his and his wife’s credit cards, put him on the no-fly list, and stuck his name on the terror watch list for money laundering. No matter what else is true, he’s not going to be able to run away.

Then came the election account. It took her all of five minutes to find that her boss also, personally, vetoed audits of that account three times in the last ten years. A few more minutes’ work, found that two of the three IRS agents who requested audits of that account were no longer among the living, and number three was now the Director of the department that handles auditing other government agencies. (She empties his accounts and cancels his cards, too. Unless he’s got cash on hand, or generous friends, he’s not going anywhere.)

She drains the election account, too, but doesn’t freeze it. She wants people able to keep putting money into it, wants to see who’s paying in. But no one’s getting a payout.

Sooner or later, someone will notice that four billion dollars is missing, and they will come looking for it. That’s how she’s going to find who runs that account.

And from there, she begins systematically making a list of everyone getting payouts, and begins to freeze their accounts. In the next day or two, Leon’s going to start getting a lot of calls, and those people are going to have to answer some very sticky questions if they ever want to get their money back.

Stephen Manner is sitting in the office of the man who used to run Cybertech for CGIS.

He’s in jail now.

Stephen supposes he could redecorate, or do something to make this space more his own, but he’s worried that at any moment someone with a warrant might show up to take everything away. So, he’s sitting in this office, working on his laptop, taking up the smallest possible space he can.

He’s also feeling rather pleased with himself as he reaches for his phone. Right now, there are two different people using Diane Anderson’s ‘missing’ computer accounts to do things. One of them is him, and one of them is currently located in the IRS headquarters, being very, very naughty. (Diane is on an NCIS computer, using log ins from their own forensic computing department.)

He picks up his phone. “Omagi, time to go.”

“Where am I going?”

“IRS. Main office. From the looks of it, room 216. Move fast.”

“We’re on our way. Keep whoever it is at his computer.”

Manner smiles. “Don’t worry. I’ve got it covered.”

Omagi looks away from carefully labeling and bagging everything in Draga’s life. “We’ve got to move.”

“Actual bad guy to catch?” Eric says, wanting to finish up with this. He hates having all these other people, let alone Bishop, this far into his personal life.

“Yes. Someone’s who isn’t Ms. Anderson is using her computer.”

“Good! Let’s GO!”

Bishop’s nodding eagerly. She doesn’t want to be this deep into Draga’s life, either. She doesn’t need to know what sort of toothpaste he uses, let alone his lube preference. But, because whoever tried to kill them did so thorough of a job of it, they are scooping up everything to test.

They grab up what they’ve got packed and get moving.

Saunders locks up and places the tape over Draga’s door. No one in or out, not anytime soon.

Omagi’s driving.

“Where are we going?” Bishop asks.

“IRS. Room 216, apparently.”

“Good!” Eric’s voice is low and dangerous. Diane’s been telling him for months about how everything involving her boss felt off, and from what he’s heard he’s the kind of bastard who’d be connected enough to pull the sort of shit that just happened to them.

Eric can’t wait to get his hands on him. He’s happily fantasizing about a situation where Koskinigen runs and has to be beaten into submission.

“So, what can we do?” Jimmy asks Ziva, handing her a smoothie.

She smiles at the smoothie, pleased to get a little more energy, and even more pleased to see some help.
“I am on hold with the Kansas City police, trying to get a car accident report.”

Jimmy wiggles his finger for her phone, as he leans against the corner of her desk. “Hand it over.”

She does, and he waits on hold as she says, “I have six more departments to call to get accident reports, and twelve more stolen cars to check and see what they’ve done since they’ve been stolen.”

“How do you do that?” Allan asks.

She points him to Draga’s desk, and then logs him in. “License plate/VIN database. Put the plate number in, and see what comes up. Not every car on my list has been involved in some sort of accident, but six of the ten I’ve checked so far, have been. While you’re doing that, Jimmy and I will make calls. Once you’re done, we’ll get you making calls, too.”

Tim’s rubbing his eyes. This time they aren’t hurting. His stopgap computer glasses are doing their job. No, he’s rubbing them because this is the most complicated hacking he’s ever had to do. He got into the CIA easier than this. Compared to this, cracking Mossad was telling the computer to count from one to ten in Basic.

The problem is that this computer is only online for one minute out of ten. And once it’s offline, he can do bugger all with it. So, he spends nine minutes planning and writing the next attack, and hopes like hell that he can push it through during the minute it’s online.

Part of the problem is the computer the bank is on is slow. VERY slow. It takes almost the full minute to even connect, let alone send a command.

If he can’t get it through in less than a minute, then he’s got to rewrite, faster, more streamlined, fewest lines of code possible.

He’s trying not to think about what he’s going to do when he gets into this damn thing. Sixty seconds, minus getting in time, to ransack and download. If he forces the computer to stay online, whoever’s on the other end will notice that. Which means he’s going to have to plant a program in there to gather everything up into easily moved packets, and automatically start sending them off as soon as the computer goes live.

And he’s got to get that program so small and streamlined that it’ll get in in under a minute.

And then he’s got to pray that no one notices he’s got the computer doing it, and shuts it down.

It’s the tenth set of tiny fragments of car parts that Abby’s set into the superglue chamber to check for prints.

She’s working on the Durango. The SUV that cause the accident that re-routed Diane and Draga. So far she’s gotten some prints, but they all appear to belong to people who would have had reason to touch this car. The mechanic at the place that sold it and its owner, for instance.

As she fills the chamber with superglue vapor, her computer begins to chirp at her. It’s found something. She takes one look and smiles widely. It's time to head up and have a chat with Ziva.

“You going up?” Corwin asks as she’s walking through the lab.

“Yeah. I’ve got an ID on someone who steals cars for a living, or at least used to, and also touched this SUV.”

“Great. I’ve got some goodies to pass along, too.”

Abbi is in front of the combined Senate and Congress, answering annoying questions about how so many years could have gone by without anyone noticing what was wrong with CGIS.

She’s taking a sip of water while the Senator from… North Dakota, maybe, (Somewhere with a long and glorious tradition of Coast Guard service, she thinks, snidely.) goes on and on about how this is tragic and how obviously everyone was asleep at the switch and that Congress needs more oversight into what the different Federal Agencies are doing.

Abbi grimaces at that. The last thing she needs is more time in front of these bozos. And, if what she’s hearing from NCIS is right, more than half of them are on the Bathenadas’ payroll, and God alone knows who else’s. Giving them more inside information on what she’s doing so they can work even harder to cover up even more shit is not going to make things better.

The Honorable Blowhard keeps blathering on, and her phone rings.

She answers it. If Omagi’s calling her when she’s in court, it’s a big deal.

“What’s up?”

“Got something of a Mexican standoff here.”

Omagi didn’t think going into the IRS to grab who he suspected (rightly) was the top of the pyramid was going to be easy. He was fairly sure there would be a certain level of hassle serving this warrant.

So, when they went in, they did dispense with certain niceties, like say, telling people why they were in there. They go in, all of them in their official jackets, badges on display, walking like storm troopers about to take over the place, hoping to get to 216, and that computer, while the guy at the computer is still there.

They get to the second floor, and can see 216, when IRS security catches up to them.

Omagi can read the title on the door. John Koskinigen, Director IRS.

“You can’t go in there!” The guy in front of him is huge, and flanked by two other, huge, guys.

“I can and will go in there. I have a no-knock warrant for the arrest of whomever is in that office using that computer.” Manner made sure of that. They need to get in there, while the guy’s working, and before he takes a magnet or the like to his hard drive.
“Let me see that.”

Omagi hands over the warrant, still moving forward.

The security guard does not attempt to read the warrant. He does place his hand on Omagi’s chest, stopping him. “No one is going into that office until our legal department has had a chance to read that entire warrant.”

“They can read it once we’ve secured whoever’s in that office and his computer.” Omagis nods and Bishop and Drag flank the two back up guys.

“No sir. They will do it, now.” And as soon as he says that, the guns come out.

Before that “Now” is said, Bishop, Draga, and Saunders have their guns out. Omagi swallows, hopes Manners is good enough to have made sure whatever’s on that computer stays there, and holds up his hands. “I’m reaching for my phone.”

The guy in front of him nods, and Omagi dials. The other five of them still have guns trained on each other.

“I’m taking this,” the security guard in front of Omagi holds up the warrant, “to legal. Make sure they do not enter that office or remove anything from it.”

The two guards behind him nod, and take three steps, backs to the door.

Abbi picks up, and Omagi says, ‘I’ve got something of a Mexican standoff here.”

“Hold on.” He hears some rustling, along with, “You want more oversite? Listen in. This is my guys going after another part of this monster. Sit rep.”

He gives it. “It’s been four minutes since we got into the building, with a legal warrant, and we are currently being held at gun point by the IRS to prevent us from exercising the terms of this warrant. By this point there’s no possible way to know if the person who was in that office still is in that office, or if his computer is still in working order.” They hear a shattering crash from the background. “The odds of that computer still working just dropped considerably. We need to get in there,” they hear another crash, “now.”

He hears Abbi talking to someone else. Then she says to him, “Put it on speaker.”

Omagi does so. “All set.”

The voice on the other line says, “This is Joe Biden, Vice President of the United States, President of the Senate, and I am ordering an immediate bench warrant from Congress for the computer in room 216 of the IRS building, and for the person located in said room, using that computer.”

The two security agents at the door look confused. They slowly lower their guns. And then one of them opens the door.

“They’ve opened the door. Thank you, sir!” Omagi says. (Draga and Bishop are already heading in. “Step away from the computer!” “Get up! Hands behind your back!” Between them he can see that Koskinigen has been trying to beat his computer to death with his chair.)

“No problem. I’ll be interested to see what you find,” Biden says.

“Go get him,” Abbi adds.
“On it, Boss.”

Abby gets to Ziva’s desk just the same time that Gibbs is walking past it.

“Perfect timing, you’re almost all here.” She looks at Jimmy and Allan, both sitting around with phones up to their ears, waiting to get reports back from different police departments. “Shouldn’t you two be Tony and Eric?”

“We’re subbing in,” Jimmy replies.

“Wha’d’ya got, Abbs?” comes out of Gibbs before he can stop it. Yes, he’s here to talk to Leon, and see if he can hunt down Tom McGee, but Abby up in the bullpen means something’s going on, and for all he knows it’ll be the thing that puts the rest of this in perspective.

“I’ve got a print. And more than that, I’ve got an ID to go with the print.”

Ziva smiles at her, and Abby takes over on Tony’s computer, setting up her information on the plasma.

“Meet Michael Kenna—“

“I know him!” Ziva says, excited. “Here.” She hops up, takes two steps, and clicks up her own pictures. “We have to run the facial match to know for sure, but he looks like one of my car thieves.”

“He probably is,” Ziva hands the clicker back to Abby who gets Michael’s rap sheet up. “Joined the Army at 17 in 1988. Worked the motor pool for three years. Got out and spent the next decade in and out of jail for car theft. Completely dropped off the grid in 2003. No current address, no bank account, no nothing. A complete ghost.”

“A ghost who leaves finger prints?” Allan asks.

“A ghost who left a finger print on a car that managed to head-on crash into another car while its driver was Lord knows where.”

“Just one?” Gibbs asks.

“That I’ve found. I can only print twenty pieces at a time, Gibbs, and there are a lot of pieces. Here’s the other interesting bit, Corwin’s been checking the detonator pieces we’ve found against our bombers database and has found five other cars that have gone skyward with detonators that are very similar to the one we pulled out of the car that tried to ram Draga and Diane into the train, down to the same ridiculously expensive stereo cable, in the last three years.”

Ziva hands Gibbs her phone. “Stay on hold, get that case for me. I need to get looking at those bombings.”

“Okay,” Tony says, getting into Sammuels’ history. “So, the DEA sends you to Peru.”

“Yeah. First job as an Agent. I speak perfect Spanish, my mother grew up in Lima, my grandparents are still there. Officially, I was a bored rich kid getting my PhD in art history at the University of Lima.”

“And in reality?”

“I was taking classes, partying, a lot, and trying to get into the Bathenada family.”

“That was your assignment?”

“Yeah. And I was doing well,” his voice trails off for a moment, remembering, “the first year. Go to enough parties, flash enough cash and coke around, and you attract attention. I mentioned to some of my new friends that I had my own plane.”

“Very rich kid.”

“Professional dilettante. Failed out of two previous PhD programs, took just enough classes to stay on campus, you know the type. Those buddies hooked me up, and I rose fairly fast. I’m not going to say I was having dinner with Simon or anything, but every time I went back to the states to ‘visit my family’ they had me transporting drugs. I worked up from transportation to running my own crew, and stalled out. Couldn’t get any higher. A full year went by, and just nothing. No big jobs, no more trust. I think they were suspicious, but couldn’t prove anything. I was too useful to let go, and too dangerous to move up. The DEA was okay with what I was doing, because I kept a steady stream of low value intel flowing to them. Two years ago, my partners get sent down to work with me. ‘My own people’ for my crew. They got the same sense I did, the Bathenadas were using me to move drugs, and that was all it was ever going to be. So, we made our busts, took out my crew, and came back to the US.”

“And that’s when you got Frank Toner on your team?”

“Yep. Four man team. Now, we’re not doing much of anything. Six months of paperwork. Then Dunerson calls, he’s got a transfer for us, supposedly because I ‘knew the area.’ You’d think the head of the DEA would be able to tell the difference between Peru and Uruguay, but apparently they’re all the same to him.”

“Ah. Did you know that Ambassador Ellanza is in the pay of the Bathenadas?”

“No… That’s…” The picture is suddenly getting clearer to Sammuels. “Money… You said we were trying to take him and money? Were we sending him and the cash payout he was picking up back to the Bathenadas?”

Tony nods. “Gil wasn’t the Director when you started your job, was he?”

“No. He wasn’t.”

“When did he take over?”

“Five years ago.”

“About when you stalled out?”

Sammuels nods.

“And he’s the guy who called you down, told you you had the transfer job?”

“Yes.” Sammuels is looking very suspicious. “You know something I don’t.”
“Very likely. Let’s get this all written up. I would like to keep you and your partners here. For the time being, it’s better off if your boss doesn’t know where you are, and you three are much better off safe and sound, in here.”

“What do you think is going on?”

“Gil’s been getting payouts, big payouts from a lot of charities the Bathenadas fund. He takes over, and suddenly you stop rising up the ladder. You get sick of it, make a bust with your two partners, and then six months later, you get sent on a one way trip with an Ambassador who’s also in the Bathenadas pockets.”

Sammuels winces. “I’d bring the drugs up. Hand them over. They’d go into evidence. A few hundred kilos a pop. My cover was rich kid student with his own plane. I did that for almost four years before we made a bust.”

“What happened to those drugs?”

“Destroyed.”

“Hmmm…” After what CGIS was doing with their ‘evidence’ Tony’s got a good idea of where those drugs probably went. “Got a buddy who isn’t on your team, someone who’s log in information you know?”

“Yeah. You want me to check, but not as me?”

“We’re all on the same server. You can log in from our computers here.”

“Okay. If those drugs weren’t destroyed, I want to be in on making the corruption bust.”

Tony nods at Sammuels. “I’m eye deep in conspiracies right now. All the extra hands I can get are welcome.”

“Good. Go get a warrant for Gil’s communications. If he set up a way to make sure that the money and the Ambassador got to back to the Bathenadas, and they didn’t, I’m sure someone’s said something to him about it.”

“Tim!”

“Mmmm…” He slowly pulls himself out of the code. Diane must have spoken to him several times to get to ‘Tim.’

She’s standing by the door. “I’m getting lunch, you want anything?”

“Are you leaving the building?”

“Not without a babysitter. No, I was planning on calling out and having it delivered.”

“Uh. Yeah. Food, sounds good.” He notices that his coffee mug is not only empty, but cold. Time for more decaf. “You know Carlo’s? Less than a mile away, makes a decent burger, delivers.”

“I’ll look it up. What do you want?”
Tim thinks. Like his usual coding binges he’s either completely unaware of the concept of food, or grazing through anything salty or sweet nearby. Today, he’s unaware. “Grilled chicken salad, extra chicken, diet Coke, and fries.”

“Sounds nutritious.”

“My doctor tells me that if I’m doing hard work, I need calories, and protein and fat are better for me than sugar.”

“Coding is hard work?” she doesn’t look like she believes that.

“It is for my brain,” and saying that, he dives back into the code. This time, he hopes, he’ll get in.

Diane’s phone buzzes half an hour later. “Anderson.”

“Ms. Anderson, it’s Burt at security. Your lunch is here.”

“I’ll be up to grab it in a minute.”

She heads up to the front desk, feeling a twinge of wanting to go outside, it’s bright and sunny and glorious fall on the other side of the bullet and bombproof glass. But until this is done, outside is the place she’s avoiding.

Burt hands over the bag, and she checks, everything looks right. She goes back down, puts the food next to Chucky, but he’s completely absorbed in what he’s doing, so he doesn’t notice it.

She supposes she could go back to her computer, find more people to bleed, but… Until Chucky gets into his account, all she’s doing is harassing the underlings, and yes, the first four hours of that were satisfying, but she wants bigger game. She wants the guys calling the shots, and she knows she doesn’t have them, yet.

So, she takes her lunch, and decides to head over to the bullpen, check in, see what’s going on, find out from Eric if they found anything at his place. Her place has been ‘processed’ but the evidence is still in the CGIS lab.

When she gets up there, lunch in hand, she sees Palmer, who she didn’t think did this sort of thing, another young man in a conservative gray suit with a flashy fuchsia tie, both of whom are holding telephones and looking at Tony as he’s talking with Leroy and Ziva.

She catches, “Gil Dunerson, looks like he’s in on it. Getting paid by the Bathenadas,” from Tony.

That name is ringing a bell for her. She strides over, puts her lunch on Tony’s desk, and then grabs her phone, checking what she’s done, today.

“Dunerson, as of 10:58 this morning, saw all of his bank accounts freeze. He’s been being paid by the Bathenadas for the last eight years, and he’s depositing money into an account that’s doing something with the elections.”

Tony and the rest of the crew are staring at her. Finally he says, “Um… maybe we could get an update as to what you’re doing? On my end we’re teaming up with some DEA agents to start taking down their top tier.”

So, Diane does. “I’ve got those four accounts, and started to get really into them. The Bathenadas’ account, we shut that down yesterday. No problems. Today, I got into one… It’s really old, and the payout patterns suggest that it does something with the elections. So, I started to cross reference, where was the Bathenadas’ money going. It goes to charities, those charities have board members and pay them ‘board fees,’ and some of those board members are putting big chunks of cash into the election account, and the election account, pays out, pays out BIG to the account at the floating bank.

“Anyway, so far Dunerson’s on a bunch of boards, getting paid well for all of them, and shuffling money into the election account. Same thing with my ex-Boss.” Which reminds her of something. “Oh, right… Been getting lost in the details. Thomas Grason and Yvette Hereuch, both of them worked for the IRS, both of them attempted to audit the election account, and they’re both dead now. Car accidents.”

“I’ve got Thomas Grason’s police report,” Jimmy says. “Got off the phone with the Atlanta PD ten minutes ago.” He starts shuffling through the reports that have been popping up on Draga’s computer.

“Why were you guys investigating him?” Diane asks.

“Not him, specifically. We’re tracking down cars stolen from the Philadelphia Airport, just like the ones that were used against you,” Ziva says.

“And it sounds like it’s time to pay your ex-Boss a visit,” Tony says.

“Don’t bother,” they hear Leon say from the staircase behind the bullpen. All of them looking up to see he’s been listening in. “I’ve just gotten a call from Director Borin. Her guys have him, and what’s left of his computer, in custody. They’re bringing him here. Ms. Anderson, I’d like to chat with you.”

“Certainly, Director.”

She sees Leon do a double take.

“Gibbs?”

Gibbs inclines his head a bit. “Wouldn’t mind a word with you.”

“Come on up. I’m sure you two can behave for a few moments together.”

Leon opens the door, and ushers in Diane and Jethro. He notices that Jethro’s only slightly out of breath after climbing the stairs, so he appears to be healing up from his gunshot wounds.

“You said you have a very old account that does something with the elections?” Leon asks after they’re all seated at his conference table.

“Yes. Why?” Diane replies.

“I have confirmation that that one’s an off-the-books account to make sure that the right people get elected. According to my source, if you’ve been in office long enough, and you look like you’ve got a challenging election coming up, a checkbook, or these days bank card, shows up, and you use it to pay for everything you don’t want anyone to see.”

Diane nods at that. “That would explain the little payouts.”
“Little payouts?” Leon asks.

“Yeah. Until 2004, none of the payouts came to more than 500 grand, and a lot of them were much smaller, 20k here, 40k there, some of them were even as low as five thousand dollars. Just lots of different payouts to all sorts of different people.”

“What sorts of people?” Leon asks.

Diane shrugs. “I’m getting names. Some I recognize, especially the bigger payouts, like… Say $330,000 to a famous economist who writes a weekly column and tends to be very vocal about tax policy, and I’ve seen several news network heads on there, but most of them are smaller payouts to random people or companies or charities that I haven’t gotten deeply enough into yet to know who they are.”

“My source would say those are the sorts of people who help to shift perception about candidates and make sure elections go the way they’re supposed to,” Leon replies.

“Could be. I’ve been spending more time on the money going in side of the equation than the money going out side.”

“And who is paying in?”

“You know how magazines like Forbes have the 100 most influential people lists?”

“Sure.” Leon and Gibbs nod.

“The top ninety of them. And the top ninety of pretty much every other list like that you can think of. A lot of non-profits. A few corporations. I know the Bathenadas are paying in because I know they’re bankrolling a lot of the charities. But I had to have three sets of accounts to figure that out. I’m getting into who’s paying who, and how deep the money trail is buried, but, there are a lot of dark secrets in there.”

“Secrets people will kill to keep secret,” Gibbs says.

“Yes.”

“Tell me about the big pay out,” Leon says.

“One every other November into the floating account. Last payout was over a billion dollars, and if what I’m seeing is right, the next one will be close to four billion dollars.”

Leon licks his lips, nodding slowly. Jethro blinks. “Four billion?”

“Just about.”

“Who owns these accounts?” Leon asks, which is an awfully good question.

“Chucky’s still breaking into the one. The other… The official name is the ‘Greater American Prosperity PAC.’ Before that it was ‘America for Better Tomorrow.’ Before that ‘Americans For America.’ And before that—“

“We get the picture, Ms. Anderson. Who are the people attached to the Greater American Prosperity PAC?”

“Not on record with the bank. And it might have PAC in its name, but it’s not legally listed as one with the IRS or the FEC. In fact, it hasn’t paid taxes, ever.”
“Like a shell corporation?” Jethro asks.

“Not exactly. Shells are designed to do things like pay taxes and look like they officially exist while covering something else. This one hides by people choosing not to see it. By IRS protocol, we’re supposed to audit any account with over a billion dollars in it every five years, at least. I know people who have tried to audit it have died, Grason and Hereuch trying to audit that account. But, today, I closed that account, pulled the money out, and tucked it away. Sooner or later someone is going to start screaming about it.”

“With any luck, we’ll hear the yells, soon. In the meantime, in less than an hour Director Koskinigen will be joining us. I will be giving you and Mrs. McGee what’s left of his computer to do with as you like. In twenty-four hour, I want a report of what he’s been doing ready for DiNozzo, because he’ll be going in to interrogate him.”

Diane’s eyes flash at that. “Can I be part of that? I’ve done interrogations before, and Tony doesn’t have the background to ask the questions right or see where the lies are.”

“You can observe. We don’t allow outsiders to join in on interrogations of people who likely tried to have them killed,” Leon says, sounding very calm.

Diane nods in agreement, not happy, but understanding. “When we all got together, there was a lawyer in the bunch. Pretty Blonde’s husband.”

“Jake Malloy?” Jethro adds.

“Yeah. Unless you’ve got counsel here you prefer, you’ll want a sharp lawyer on this interrogation. I can guarantee that Koskinigen won’t say anything with a slew of his own lawyers, and they will be very precise in their answers. You’ll want another lawyer to wade through the BS and catch the nuances.”

“That can be arranged. Set up a briefing for DiNozzo and Malloy. Get them ready to go in and shred Koskinigen and his lawyers.”

Diane smiles with genuine pleasure, stands up, nods to both of the men, and heads off to get started on doing just that.

Leon turns to Jethro, “I assume you didn’t come here because you’re missing my company?”

Jethro shakes his head. He gestures to the TV. “Get this thing on ZNN, or better yet, whatever briefing you’re getting on what’s happening in South America.”

It takes Leon a minute, but he does get the latest briefings out of the DEA (which, after DiNozzo’s information, they’re both viewing with skepticism) as well as the sit rep from NCIS Cartagena, Rio de Janeiro, and Valparaiso, and the ‘for public consumption’ briefing from the CIA.

ZNN didn’t have the full story, by a long shot. It did have the right general shape of things. Bombings and arson attacks all through Colombia and Bolivia, with outlying attacks as far north as Mexico and as far east as the Caribbean. The DEA report highlights that these attacks are focusing on logistical targets. How the drugs get moved from point A to point B. Those attacks are making sure the drugs stop moving.

The CIA notes skirmishes of up to two hundred men taking place on the farms and in the jungles. These attacks are taking out production, either where the drugs grow, or where they’re processed from raw materials into salable goods.
According to the CIA, these attacks are swift, focused, and well-coordinated. Teams are going in, fast and quiet, destroying everything they can get their hands on, and then fighting their way out. Maximum damage for minimum effort. Weaponry and tactics are, in the words of the CIA, unusual for cartel violence.

Unfortunately, they don’t expound on unusual.

“Find what you were looking for?” Leon asks.

“Some. We know the Bathenadas were shelling out big money. We know their competition is getting killed right now. Unusual tactics and weapons. Are we doing this? Are those our guys down there?”

Leon stares at the map. “Shit,” he says it quietly, and gets on the phone. As he’s talking, Jethro points to his computer, a question on his face. Leon nods, allowing Jethro access.

It takes him a few minutes to find the right screen, and another moment to type it in. McGee, Thomas.

A moment later a record pops up. Gibbs blinks. Even his rank is redacted. The only bits he can read are: Thomas McGee, Annapolis class of ’76. SEAL training class of ’82. Everything else, including Tom’s sex and birthday, is redacted. If he didn’t know Tom was an Annapolis grad and SEAL, and be able to guess his dates, he wouldn’t be able to tell if this was the right Tom McGee.

His eyebrows shoot up at that. Leon’s on hold, so he’s watching Gibbs, and he’ll admit, he’s never seen a file that thoroughly blacked out before, either. “Who’s that?”

“Tim’s Uncle. His family thinks he works for the Navy doing Black Ops type stuff.”

“And you’re looking into him…”

“Gut feeling.”

Leon looks at the miles of blacked out information. “Keep looking.”

“Now what?” Allan asks as he puts his phone down. They have successfully tracked down and requested accident reports on the 14 cars that were stolen from the Philadelphia and involved in a traffic accident. Eight others either haven’t been involved in accidents, or like the car that caused Jared’s accident, weren’t left at the scene.

Ziva replies, “Now, you start looking through them. You’re looking for accidents where there wasn’t a driver. Read the medical reports and make sure that the right people are assigned to each car. You’re looking for mechanical devices in the wreckage that shouldn’t be there. You’re looking for cars that exploded.”

“And what are you looking for?” Allan asks.

“A bomb maker who works with a team of car thieves.”

“And Jimmy?”

Jimmy glances to Ziva. “I’ve got background on everyone who got hurt. Finding out why they were targeted.”

She nods.

“You can’t arrest me! I’m doing my job!” Koskinigen is extremely irate about this whole procedure. He’s been spouting off how he’s been running his own sting for the last three months and if they’d just talk to legal everything would make sense. “Everything on that computer is classified. I had to destroy it. You guys are trying to keep me from bringing this all to light!”

Draga is supremely unconcerned about Koskinigen’s comfort. “Doing your job? Killing people, that’s your job?” Draga leans in close to the handcuffed man, sitting in the back of the transport van with him. “Killing people is my job. I don’t even need a warrant for it. All I have to do is claim you got frisky, got your arms around my neck, and I had to shoot you in self-defense. And trust me, the only reason that hasn’t happened is because what’s in your head is worth more still in there and functioning than decorating the inside of this van.” That’s a lot hotter, and much more personal than the usual cop giving a suspect a hard time routine.

That gets through to Koskinigen. “Who the hell are you?”

Draga glares. “I’m the guy whose life you’ve ruined. I’m the guy who’s likely not going to see his kid anytime soon because I’m too damn big of a risk, because of you. I’m the guy who can’t go home because every scrap of my stuff has to be looked over for evidence.” Koskinigen’s eyes are blank, but they flicker with recognition when Draga says, “And I’m the guy who’s car is in ninety million pieces back in an evidence lock-up because you didn’t want Diane Anderson to talk.”

Koskinigen swallows hard. “I want a lawyer.”

Gibbs and Leon are having an interesting conversation. Right now, Leon can’t get confirmation of if there are any US forces on the ground dealing with anything that’s going on in South or Central America. He also can’t get confirmation that there aren’t.

In fact, he can’t get anything beyond shuffled around from one stuffed shirt to another. Though, each stuffed shirt he gets is higher on the food chain than the last one. But not much higher. He figures at this rate it’ll be the Tuesday after next before someone high enough on the food chain to give him an answer will talk to him.

After the third non-answer, Leon shakes his head and hangs up. This time he dials Jarvis. “Can you come in?”

“Kind of busy right now.”

“I bet,” Leon says dryly. “Do we have soldiers on the ground dealing with that mess?”

“That’s the million dollar question, isn’t it?” Jarvis sound frustrated as he says that.

“Do you mean you don’t know, or that you don’t want me to know?”
“Why do you want to know?”

“Because we know who the Bathenadas were paying off, and several of them are in a position to put soldiers or sailors on the ground, and the people I know who have run ops like this think this is looking awfully professional.”

Leon can feel Jarvis nod his head at that. “No one is willing to tell me. I used to run ops like that, and, yes, they do look awfully professional. Suddenly, I’m getting a lot of people who are deaf, dumb, and stupid.”

“They won’t tell you?”

“I know. I am… dealing with the situation.”

Leon comes, rapidly, to the conclusion that he’s very happy not to be “dealt” with. “I see. Okay. Here’s one for you, can you get me in contact with Commander Thomas McGee?”

Jarvis thinks for a second, placing Thomas McGee. “Your family tree has branches everywhere, doesn’t it?”

“Apparently.”

“What’s he do?”

“Rumor has it, he’s a SEAL Commander who does the sort of stuff that’s happening in South America right now. Without a permission slip from you, I can’t get any intel on him. He’s ‘above my pay-grade and clearance level.’”

“Interesting. Sure. I’ll have James write you up a permission slip. Think you’ll get something interesting out of him?”

“Maybe. And if not him, he may know who’s involved with something like this.”

Tony’s gotten his “hostage” DEA Agents together, and they’re happily tucked into the conference room, working on their computers, hunting down the finances of their boss, and where all the cocaine they were bringing in actually went.

Tony sighs, and then, finally gets a few seconds with his wife.

“I see you’ve got the Gremlin and the Mogwai working away,” he says very quietly, sitting on her desk.

She glances over. Allan’s pouring through his data, and Jimmy’s, from the looks of it, building some sort of visual web to show the connections between everyone. Tony’s being quiet enough that neither of them looked up when he said that to Ziva.

“With Bishop and Draga out, every set of eyes I can get is welcome.”

“I’d imagine.” He looks at the empty smoothie cup next to her. “They’ll be here soon. How about, between then and now, we get you and I something to eat?”

Which is when Ziva’s tummy reminds her it’s busying growing a small person and sends a massive wave of FEED ME to her.
“Yes! Fried chicken. I need fried chicken.”

Tony takes her hand. “We’ll talk bombs over biscuits.” Then he turns to the working MEs. “We’re on a food run, want anything?”

“Where are you going?” Jimmy asks.

“Elaine’s taking care of us,” Ziva says, knowing where the properly fried chicken and biscuits will be.

“Tell her I need food, and to make up whatever for me,” Jimmy says.

“You don’t have a specific order?” Allan asks.

“She knows what you need. You want to try a blind order, too?” Jimmy asks.

Allan shrugs. “Do I?”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah, we’re expanding your horizons today. Bring us food, and by the time you’re back, I’ll have this chart done.”

---

With Jarvis’ permission slip in hand, Jethro’s not having any problems getting into Thomas McGee’s file. And as military files go, it’s an impressive one. He, unsurprisingly, did well at Annapolis and SEAL training. He more or less leapt up the command rank, and lots of active duty helped with that. Pick a hot zone, and Thomas McGee was there.

What he’s having a problem with is when it ends. Namely, 1990. Twenty-six years ago. When Thomas retired at the rank of Commander.

He looks over to Leon, who’s getting in touch with everyone he knows in the logistical support services (because, if you want to know where something is happening, and no one will tell you, finding out where the food, uniforms, weapons, and machines go, and which ones went, can be enlightening) and nodding away as someone tells him something, and says, “He’s not in the Navy any longer.”

Leon raises an eyebrow, but turns his attention back to whatever it is he’s hearing.

Gibbs checks on one other hunch, going over to the CIA database. The SEALs and the CIA’s Special Activities Division work together sometimes, maybe Thomas transferred over. He gets another extremely redacted file, thought this one has enough legible details to know that Thomas stopped working for the CIA in 2003.

From there, he’s off the grid.

That feeling that he’s onto something big is hitting Gibbs even harder. He’s sure that on some level, Tom either is the key to this, or knows where to find it.

They don’t know anyone at the CIA who will give them un-redacted access to this file, and he knows that Tim’s beyond swamped right now. And Tim’s the only person he’d trust to try and take this file from the CIA.

He’s staring at the screen, looking at a lot of blacked out lines. Willing himself to free associate. Why does this feel like the lynchpin?
The updates Gibbs’s getting from downstairs have linked three of four accounts together. The one that doesn’t fit is the account that was emptied into Ellanza’s hands. It’s attached to the Bathenadas, now, but…

Gibbs checks the timeline on when those SEALS were captured. Before they got this account number. So, it’s possible they got this account number because whoever sent it knew it’d be going active soon. Or, they got it because there’s a message in there, somewhere. Could be whoever sent it didn’t like how those SEALS were treated and wanted attention on them…

Could be the account is a message, telling them who is sending this information.

Gibbs pulls it up. He hates running financials, but that doesn’t mean he can’t do it. So, he starts, slowly, having to double check each number, going back to the first entry on the account, finding where that money was going, and hoping that it’ll tell him who sent them this information.

An hour later, when Tony and Ziva are back with food, (and Jimmy’s happily tucking into a grilled tuna salad, and Allan’s looking pleasantly surprised to see chicken fried steak and mashed potatoes looking up at him) Tony herds everyone (but Tim, who was mid-hack and growled at him for distracting him, Tony backed, slowly, out of his office) into the conference room.

“Campfire, time! I want sit reps, status updates, and everything else, from all of you.” He tosses a dry erase marker to Draga. “You and Bishop, first.”

“We arrested John Koskinigen for lunch. He’s claiming everything he was doing was legal, and he’s got warrants for all of it. When I mentioned not appreciating his attempting to kill me… He didn’t say anything, but I could see it in his eyes, he knew what I was talking about, and it wasn’t a surprise. Then he immediately asked for a lawyer.”

Bishop chirps up. “He’s got a call into counsel, but we’re trying to put together a money laundering for a drug cartel link that we can somehow link to terrorism so he can’t get one.”

Diane shakes her head at that. “Let him have his lawyers, we’ll be ready for him, once Abby gets the data off of his computer.”

As they’re saying that, Draga writes IRS on the whiteboard, with Kos. under it and an arrow leading from Kos to Diane/Eric.

Diane bounces up, because that sounds like her shot. “I’ve got him, too.” She draws a triangle on the whiteboard. The top of it says, Floating account, the middle level says, Election account, the third level says money laundering charities, then she draws a circle off to the side Bathenadas, she draws an arrow from the circle to the money laundering charities level. “This is the basic way the money’s flowing. Here’s where John comes in.” She draws an arrow from money laundering charities to Kos. “Here’s where it’s going.” She draws from Kos to election account.

Then she adds: Thomas Grason and Yvette Hereuch and draws a line between them and Kos. “These are both IRS agents that attempted to audit,” she draws a line to the election account. “A third agent, Josh Rush, attempted to audit that account, too. He did not audit that account and is now in charge of IRS audits of other branches of the government.” She adds his name and another line to Kos.

“Here, let me butt in before we get lost,” Jimmy adds. He circles both of the dead IRS agents, and then adds lines from them to another circle, this one labeled, traffic accident. He adds another circle,
Philadelphia Airport Thefts. “Both of them were killed in car accidents.” He connects them to car accident. “Hereuch was a hit and run, so we don’t know for sure what caused that accident, other than it was a large car with white paint…”

“Anyone track down the paint?” Abby asks.

Jimmy shrugs. “Wasn’t in the accident report. By the time this is done, I’m sure you’ll have samples of it in the lab.” He stares at the whiteboard for a moment. “Okay. Grason was not in a hit and run. Grason was in a two car accident, the second car stolen from Philly.” he draws the line from Grason to traffic accident, to Philadelphia Airport Thefts, “The driver of the second car was never found.”

Allan looks up. “And the report says that they found a collection of gears and a camera that didn’t belong in the car.”

Jimmy nods, adds: self-driving car to the list, and links up the murder he’s talking about with it. And then, he quickly sketches in Diane’s case where it matches up with the other two IRS agents.

“You put a rush on getting that one back to me, right?” Abby asks.

“Oh yeah. Everyone who still has physical evidence has been told to get it to you as soon as possible,” Jimmy replies.

Abby stands up and takes the marker from him. “While you were at lunch, the photo recognition came back. Say hello to Michael Kenna,” she writes it on the board. “He’s in the videos that go with the thefts of,” she underlines Grason and Diane and adds Halson, the name of the victim of the accident that rerouted Diane and Draga. “And he’s in a bunch of other videos, too. Once, we do a full cross reference, I think we’re going to see that he’s the guy who lifted all of the cars we’ve caught up in this sting.

“Corwin’s been on the detonator side of this, and he’s found that the detonator in Draga’s car matched seven other ‘unsolved’ bombings.” She writes, Bomber??? “We’ve got samples of the wiring he used, and we’re nailing down who’s bought it recently, but don’t have that, yet. What we do have is the knowledge that each of the explosives he made were wickedly expensive, so he’s either insanely rich or the guy bankrolling him is.” Then she draws a dashed line between Bomber???. And the top of the triangle’s floating account. “They’d have that sort of money, right?”

“Four billion dollars went into that account, from just that one source, in the last twelve years, and they’re on track for another four billion to head in this year. Yeah, they’ve got the expense account of the gods. But… So do all of the lower levels,” Diane says. “Unless those detonators cost more than tactical nukes, you’re not talking about so expensive to put the lower down guys out of the running.”

“Not that much.” Abby erases her dashed line.

Ziva gets up, she’s been the one researching the bombings. “The bombings have, mostly, happened outside of the United States. Although, given the quality of the investigation into some of the car accidents—“

Allan adds in, “I’ve got at least two that don’t look like standard gas tank blew accidents that need to be double checked.”

Ziva nods at that, “It’s entirely likely that more have happened here that have been overlooked. The abroad ones have been ‘high value’ targets. They range from a British Finance Minister to a member of the UN Security Council. Interpol thinks that this bomber is talent for hire. The attacks fit into larger patterns of crimes, but not with each other. The Finance Minister, for example, was executed by bomb in 1978, and was a high value target for the IRA. The theory is that his death was farmed out, because local talent would have had a difficult time getting to him.”

“Yes. The first one goes back to 1969.”

“Probably explains the use of hi-fi equipment. Back then high-end stereo equipment was likely the best components you could get for this sort of work.”

“That would make sense.” Leon, who used to have an awfully nice stereo back in the day, says.

“Plus, stereo equipment might be expensive, but it’s easy to get through customs, and be can openly sent through the mail.”

Ziva nods at that as she says, “Four of the overseas bombings happened before 1988. One happened in 2006. The rest are in the US and have been in the last two years.”

“Long time off,” Tony says.

“Check the MOs of bombers in jail?” Gibbs asks.

“Yes,” Ziva replies. “Until the 2006 bombing, it was assumed the bomber was Jakob Hemmelich. But he was still in jail in 2006.”

“Copycat?” Tony asks.

“Too exact. This is the same formula down to the trace elements that came off the equipment used,” Ziva says. “So exact, they let Jakob go free.”

“That’s exact,” Bishop says.

“As of right now, no one knows who this is, just that he had a long retirement, and came back out of hiding recently,” Ziva says.

“If the detonators all match, it looks like he’s done at least five jobs for whoever’s planning the car crashes,” Tony says. “Where are you on linking Koskinigen to them?” he asks Diane.

She shakes her head. “If he’s handling the money, it’ll be virtually untraceable. Just like we can’t concretely say the Bathenadas are paying any given person on our list directly. Well, compared to how John’ll have it structured, they’re playing sloppy. There will be no direct connection between any money he controls and whoever is running this.”

“Indirect connections?” Tony asks.

“I froze more than seven hundred accounts today. It’ll take me and a legion of accountants months to get through all of it. What I can say, is that every cent he’s directly touched in the last six months has been recorded, frozen, and made so only Leon and I can touch them. My legion will find the link, but first, I’m going to need a legion, and second of all, we’ll need the time to get into it.”

“Who else did you freeze?” Leon asks.

“It’s possible you and Abbi are the only directors of Federal Agencies that still have liquid cash.” She smiles a bit. “Okay, not the only ones. I’m sure there’s a bunch of little ones I’ve never heard of and couldn’t identify if I had to, they’re okay, too…” She thinks for a moment. “Director of the FBI is in the clear. Jarvis is in the clear. Secretary of the Army checked out. The entire top tier of the DEA was getting pay outs from the Bathenadas, directly and through charities, and were paying into the election account. CIA’s up to its eyeballs in this thing. Everyone at the top is involved in this on every level I could find. Jeb and Hillary are both getting money from the election account, along with pretty much everyone who’s run in the last ten years. Both of them have connections to people putting money into that account, too.” Diane’s fidgeting a little as she says that, looking annoyed and uncertain. She swallows hard. “We’re going to have a real problem with this case shortly… judges.” She rubs her eyes. “Every federal judge on a bench was appointed by someone who got paid out of that election account. Some of them have paid into it. The three highest ranking Federal Prosecutors have been paid by the Bathenadas through the charities. We’re lucky enough that the FBI’s out of this, and they’re the guys who handle public corruption cases, but… This goes live, and we’re going to have a hell of a time finding people to prosecute it.”

Everyone else looks around the room. That’s not their usual job, and none of them quite know what to do with that.

“When’s Malloy coming in?” Vance asks.

“Soon,” Diane replies. “He wanted to grab everything he could find on tax law before he got here.” She looks uncomfortable, very uncomfortable. “Judge Harland is on the board of two of the charities the Bathenadas are paying. He’s only getting a few thousand dollars a year in board fees, but…”

Gibbs looks angry. “There’s no way he knows!”

“I hope not. But just like you didn’t give Sterling any slack on my say so…”

“Shit.” Gibbs nods. He wouldn’t take her word on it, and she was sleeping with the man, not a somewhat estranged Marine buddy. “Okay. I’ll go talk to him this afternoon. Who appointed him?”

Diane shakes her head. “He’s a state judge and the Virginia Senate elects their judges. No direct or indirect payments for him. From what I can see, no state offices lower than Governor got money out of the election account.”

“What does the ‘election account’ do?” Bishop asks.

“Money goes in, and then it goes out. I think it buys good press. There are a lot of payouts to bloggers and writers and reporters. But not all of them do that, and each year a really big payment goes to the top of the pyramid,” Diane says.

“And we don’t know what the top does,” Leon says.

“And McGee will bite your hand off if you attempt to distract him away from finding out,” Tony says, holding up an empty sleeve, his hand pulled back into the cuff.

“DEA?” Leon asks.

“Still hasn’t asked where their agents are, though by now they must have noticed that something’s gone wrong. At the very least whoever was expecting Ellanza and the cash to show up has, yet again, been disappointed. I’ve got their three agents on that. Last update, Sammuels has been investigating what exactly he was doing when he was a mole in the Bathenadas’ organization, and the other two are hacking into their boss’s communications, finding out how he got the message that they needed to go in and pick Ellanza up.”

“The guys with them?” Draga asks.
“Not in the system,” Abby replies. “At least, as of yet AFIS and Interpol haven’t matched their fingerprints, faces, or DNA to anything.”

Leon adds what he’s been able to find on the Bathenada situation, as well. “There’s a good possibility that the current fight in the South is not the Bathenadas alone. I can’t get anyone to comment on if we have men there, or who those men might be, but, talking to logistics was able to let me know that sat phones, APVs, demolitions equipment, munitions, and more than 100 helicopters have headed to South America in the last month. The missing 500 million was going to pay for something, and I’m not an accountant, but that sounds like about the right number for this sort of an incursion.”

“So, wait, they got the US to pay for a US incursion into a country it’s not supposed to be attacking?” Tony asks.

“Or they got one part of the US to pay another part of the US… The right hand and left hand may not know what each other are doing,” Leon says.

Gibbs thinks about mentioning Tom McGee, but… not yet, not when he’s got so little to go on.

Everything pauses for a second there, then Jimmy adds, “Everyone Allan and I looked up, everyone who was in a car accident with one of the stolen cars, was in a position to be a whistle blower. Couldn’t find what they might have brought to light, but they all had some sort of middle or higher level government job.”

Tony nods at that. “Get Draga and Bishop the list of them, and they’ll get on their bosses. They probably, like Diane, tripped a computer red flag when they checked into something, or they told their bosses they wanted to check into something.

“Diane, how hard is the accounting stuff you’re doing?”

“How hard?” she’s not sure what exactly Tony’s asking. It’s not physically difficult, and mentally it ranges from type number A into line B, to spending hours unraveling financial statements to find the devils hiding in the details.

“Yeah, is it like tracking down case numbers? Can I give you Jimmy and Allan and have them do something useful for you?”

Diane nods, number A into line B work. “Thousands of numbers that don’t have names, yet. And I still need to get into Koskinigen’s computer, and get you and Malloy briefed on what you need to be talking to him about.”

“We can add names to numbers,” Allan says.

“Okay. Bishop, Draga, find out about our dead almost whistleblowers. Ziva, you’re on our bomber. Abby, more and more evidence. I’m on IRS and DEA. Gibbs, you’ve got Murray. Leon, where’d the 500 million go? That cover everyone?” Tony says.

Everyone nods.

Gibbs heads out, hoping this won’t be too awful. He’s really, sincerely, deeply hoping that Bleach isn’t in on this, let alone for so little money. He might not like, but he can at least understand the guy who sells out for millions of dollars. The guy who does it for five grand a year… Gibbs doesn’t get Bleach is in court when Gibbs gets there, but he notices when Gibbs ducks into his courtroom, and reads the look on his face right. He calls a recess less than five minutes after Gibbs gets in.

A minute after that, he’s sitting in Bleach’s chambers, and Bleach is rolling in behind him.

“You look grim.”

Gibbs nods. He closes the door behind Bleach.

“Partnership For a Drug Free Tomorrow, what do you do for them?”

Bleach blinks, thinking about it. “Donate money. Put something expensive up for their yearly silent auction fundraiser. Go to the fundraiser and bid on stuff. Attend a meeting twice a year. That’s pretty much it.”

Gibbs doesn’t feel his gut tighten at that. “Hill Valley Drug Treatment Center?”

“I’m on their board, too.” Bleach offers Gibbs a rueful smile. “Sam, my youngest son, he was in and out of rehab in his teens. Alcohol, pot, coke, you name it, he took it. They got him cleaned up when the previous three places couldn’t shift him. I owe them for his life, because before they got him, he was on track to be dead in a ditch one day. We give them lots of money. I’m on their board, but it’s an honorary position. I don’t have the time to be involved day to day, but that’s one of my post-retirement plans. Why are you so interested in my charitable work?”

“You paying attention to what’s going on down south?”

“The cartels? Sure. You’ve got to be under a rock not to see what’s going on.”

“They’re funneling money into a lot of anti-drug charities. Those charities pay money to important people. Some of those people are getting—“

Bleach looks furious. “You wanted to know if I was on the take!”

Gibbs nods, silently. “Don’t think you are.”

“I’m… God! How much money?”

“Hundreds of millions of dollars in the last week alone.”

“Oh God.”

“It gets worse.”

“How?”

“Those important people put that money into another account, and that money gets uses to circumvent the election finance laws.”

Bleach looks like he’d collapse if he wasn’t already sitting down. Then furious comes back up again. “Give me a minute. I’m closing session for the day. Then you get me up to date on this.”

Gibbs nods. “Sure.”
And from there, there’s hunting down leads. There’s sitting on computers and adding hint A to hint B to find coincidence C and attach that to suspect D.

It’s long, it’s painstaking, and for every lead that goes somewhere there’s more that don’t.

By the time dinner comes around, everyone is looking weary and fried.

Tony, thinking about his day of sleep, makes the executive decision. “Break time. Go home, sleep. At it fresh in the morning. Tomorrow, we’ve got interrogating the head of the IRS, busting the head of the DEA, hunting down a crew of car thieves and a bomber, as well as figuring out who’s paying them, and who runs all of our mystery accounts.”

Jimmy sighs at that, rolls his neck, very glad to get off the computer. Yes, what he’s doing is useful. Grunt work, but useful grunt work. He doesn’t know how Tim does this day after day after day. “See you all tomorrow,” he says before heading down to the lab, to spread the word that the day is done.

A few minutes later, he finds Abby surrounded by car parts, all of her computers flashing through different searches. “Quitting time upstairs. Boss is sending us home.”

Abby looks at the slew of tiny and not so tiny pieces of metal around her. She’s got Kenna nailed on the car thefts, and has connected him with physical evidence to four more cases. She nods to Corwin, who’s going through bomb reports that are close but don’t quite match the mix of their bomber, looking to see if he’s expanded his technique and or range. She’s found three other attacks that are close enough that she’s willing to say they were by the same person.

“Zelaz’ll be here any minute,” Abby says to Corwin. “You can head off.” Then she looks to Jimmy. “Give me a few minutes, and let me get my stuff set, and I’m ready to go. You want to swing by the Dungeon, grab Tim, and save my poor tired feet a few steps?”

He smiles dryly at her and winks. “I live to serve your poor, tired feet.”

Abby smirks at that. “Meet me back up here in 10?”

“No problem.”

A bit further down, Jimmy stops in his own domain, and makes sure everything is properly shut down. Since he didn’t actually do anything in the morgue today, that didn’t take long, and then down to Tim.

He pokes his head in and sees Tim staring intently at his computer screen. For a moment, he hovers in the doorway, and then realizes that whatever he’s doing (and Jimmy isn’t sure, because Tim’s fingers aren’t moving) it’s all engrossing. He takes one step into the office and sees Tim’s face go hard with anger as a line of profanity comes out of him.

Tim finally looks away from the computer and sees Jimmy standing there.

“Been here long?”

“Less than a minute.” Jimmy shuts the door behind him. “So, does that mean it’s quitting time for you?”

“No!” Tim looks like he’s about to hit the computer. “This…” he looks like he wants to say something but can’t think of a swear word bad enough to describe it, “bastard booted me out with 87% of the program through.”

“Tim?”

Tim stands up and starts pacing around, he starts to rub his eyes, touches his glasses, remembers they’re there, then lays them on the desk and gets to it. “It’s the security system from hell. It’s only online one out of every ten minutes. Which means if I don’t get my program though in less than a minute, I’ve got to start from the beginning again.” Tons of agitated energy is pouring off of Tim right now as he paces fast.

“Ugh,” Jimmy says, trying to be sympathetic.

“Yeah. Fucker! Eighty-seven percent uploaded. I’m still rewriting…” He swings by Jimmy on one pass of his pacing, and Jimmy catches his hand.

“You want to go at if fresh in the morning?”

Tim blinks, from the looks of it, calming down a bit. “No. I’m in the zone. Just… Order me some food or something. I’ll be here until I break this.”

“Okay. Might want to give Abby a quick call…”

“Yeah. Okay. She doesn’t want to take an extra step, does she?”

“Not right now.”

“I’ll go up with you and say good night. Can’t even try again for eight more minutes. Might as well get up for a bit.”

Tim’s tired. His eyes are bleary and he’s not sure what time it is since he’s been down in the artificial light of the Dungeon for so long. (He could look at his clock, but he’s also been coding for so long, there’s nothing left in the world outside of the screen in front of him.)

Finally, finally, as he’s sitting in front of that screen, willing his program to go faster, to work harder, to slip in under the deadline, as he’s watching the timer tick down and the percentage of his program get smaller and smaller, finally, finally, he sees it hit 0 before the timer hits :00 and he whoops with pleasure.

He’s jumping up, adrenaline pouring through him, ecstatic.

In ten minutes, the first packet will come back to him, and he’ll finally get to see who all that money is going to. He gets up, stretches out all of the various kinks, looks at his watch (remembers that he wears a small piece of technology on his person that tells time) and sees that it’s only a little after 10:00.

Not nearly as bad as the thought it would be.

He grabs his phone and calls Abby. “I just got in!”

“That mean you’ll be home soon?”

“Yeah. In ten minutes, I’ll get the first packets. Just want to stick around long enough to make sure it works, maybe take a quick look and see how many other big names are in on this shit, and then “Excellent.” But she says it with a yawn.

“Don’t wait up.” He’s feeling very good right now, and he’d certainly like to blow off a lot of this adrenaline naked and with one of his favorite people. But he also knows said person is cooking their son right now, and likes lots of sleep. “Maybe, tomorrow morning, there’ll be a chance for some quick celebrating.”

He hears a little chuckle, and can feel her smile. “That sounds great. See you in my dreams.”

He makes a little kissing sound. “And in an hour or so, I’ll see you in our bed. Good night.”

“Night, baby.”

Tim heads over to the snack bar and gets himself a decaf coffee. He strolls (struts with a happy little bounce in his step) around the mostly quiet Dungeon. Just him and Connon and Ngyn right now. He says hi, tells them a little about what he’s been on, and asks about their projects, and then, watch beeping, heads back to his computer to see what’s popped up.

He stares at the screen. “This can’t be right. One packet?”

Okay, sure a minute isn’t long, but his program broke the data from that account into little bits that could just fly across the web. He shakes his head, wondering if something got caught or slowed down or what, and spends a minute writing up a diagnostic to see what might have happened, sets it to run, and then opens up the packet.

“Eight payees?”

The one packet mystery was explained. Every other year, since 2008, before that it was six accounts, eight accounts get one large, equal, payment. And though the numbers vary, every other year, somewhere between one and six people pay in.

This is the least active account he’s ever seen. His own, personal, savings account does more in a month than this does, and he’s never had billions of dollars in it.

With only eight accounts to check, he decides to run the financials. It’ll only take an additional ten minutes, so why not? Save Diane a few minutes, start the morning with a report for everyone, and they can roll from there.

So, he’s starts looking. After all the secrecy for this account, the protections to the accounts this paid out to are minimal. Probably because they thought this one was safe. You put the security system on the outside of the house, not on the closet.

He gets the names, feeling, almost let down. He’s got no idea who any of these people are. Given how big the names on the other accounts were, this is… anti-climactic.

Who the hell are you guys?

So, eight names, and again, it’ll take, ten minutes tops, so he googles. And when he googles, his blood starts to run cold. Jeffry Tanen, President of the Federal Elections Commission. William Burke, Vice President of the Federal Election Commission. Jaqueline Fordi, Chief Operations

The four men at the top of the Federal Election Commission, and the owners/operators of the companies that make 98% of the electronic voting machines used in the US are all getting massive payouts every November.

He says it out loud, almost silently, but he still says it, “They’re selling the elections.”
Rule 44

Tim’s been pants-wetting scared before. He’s felt fear hit so hard it’s paralyzed him. This is different. It’s colder, less gut fear and more mind fear.

They’re selling the elections.

His mind is reeling with it. Okay, yes, the first of the election accounts had hinted that something along those lines was going on. But not this. Sure, corruption, okay. He can deal with that. He more or less expects politicians to be at least a bit grungy, if not outright dirty, these days. Bending the rules, going outside the lines, nudging things right and left to their own benefit. Of course.

But this… This isn’t paying off your local news channel to skim over your bad points and praise your good ones. Hell, this isn’t even creating a scandal for your opponent to tank him the weekend before the election. This… This isn’t deceiving people to vote for you, this is taking their vote away from them all together.

They’ll kill to keep this quiet, and… Shit…

He thinks he’s in and out clean, but Diane drained the account that feeds into this one, and the people running that account have to know the people running this one.

And with multiple billions of dollars… They will find him. They found Diane.

The target just went on his head, too. He gets up, closes the door to his office, picks up his phone, puts it on speaker, and gets working on his computer as he calls home.

“Abby!”

“Tim?” she’s sounding sleepy.

“Grab Kelly, get our guns, get every scrap of cash we have and all of the credit cards I got when I thought we were going up against the IRS, and get out of the US.”

“Whoa!” She’s not sounding sleepy anymore. “Back up. What the hell just happened in the last half hour?”

“I found out what that account does. They’re selling the elections.”

“Tim? You’re… shit… no you’re not kidding. Okay, I can have everything set in… less than an hour. I’ll get you—“

“I’ve got to be here.”

“I’m not leaving you! If it’s too dangerous for me to be here, it’s too dangerous for you to be here.”

“Please! Look. I’ve got to stay here and hack like I’ve never hacked before to just bury what I’ve done. They’ve got the money to find me, and then find you, and… And that’s not going to happen. And someone’s got to… deal with this.”

“Then we’ll deal together. They’ve got safe houses and…”

He’s shaking his head while he tries to get into the log information for the banks he used to check who owned those accounts, hoping he’s not too late. “Jethro trusted a safe house and protective custody and it didn’t work out that well for him! I want you with me, but… They may already know I’m the one who got in. Tomorrow we might be under martial law, and those movies where none of the laws apply anymore, that could be here tomorrow. Remember how bad things got after Katrina? That could be the whole country tomorrow. The FEC’s been selling them since 2004. That’s every law passed in the last 12 years, gone… Maybe. I don’t know what happens when this breaks. At the very least, the market probably tanks… and people get mean when their money vanishes, and I want you and Jimmy and Breena, and all of you, out of here, safe.”

“Tim. Don’t…”

“Please! Grab what you need, leave your phone and computer… I’m going to start buying train tickets you won’t use… Just, go. Don’t tell me where. Get out of the US. Take the clean phone, leave it off—“

“I know how to not get tracked. If you’ve got to deal with this—“

“Zelaz and Corwin know how to do their job, and they won’t be a target the way we are. The way we might already be. If nothing else, get out of the house, as fast as you can. It’s been twenty minutes since I looked up the first account. They probably couldn’t have broken my system that fast, but…”

“You think they’re looking for you?”

“If they aren’t already, they will be. Please, please, I’ll call Jimmy, and all six of you, get going.”

Abby knows well-enough not to say to Tim, let alone over the phone, that he might be overreacting, especially not after what happened with Diane, but she’s certainly hoping that he’s having a moment of panic. (Though, feeling the cold spreading through her as she thinks through the ramifications of what ‘selling the elections’ actually means, she’s feeling like he’s probably not overreacting.) “Okay. I’ll let you know when we’re on the move.”

“Thank you. I love you.” His voice shakes on that.

“Don’t say it like that.”

“Like what?”

“Like you think we aren’t going to see each other again.”

He swallows hard. “I don’t know when we will. If this gets bad… I love you.”

“I love you, too. And soon. We’ll see each other soon.”

“Okay.”

He’s got the first account wiped, well, modified, by the time his phone is ringing again. He feels bad about doing this, but he switches his IP to Diane’s. Anyone checking who accessed that account will see that Diane did it. She’s already on the hit list, and in protective custody, so he’s likely not hurting her too bad by making the switch.

Jimmy’s phone is ringing, but no one’s picking up. “Come on, Jimmy.”
His fingers are flying over the keyboard, working his magic. But, and this makes him feel cold, if they dig deep, they’ll see that he changed the IP.

Still no answer. He hangs up when he hears the voice mail pick up, and calls again.

If they get to the next account before he’s got it switched, they’ll be able to see it was him. He thinks the stealth mode he set for his computer is good, and now’s the acid test of doom. More than a billion dollars each in the last twelve years, means any one of them has more than enough money to buy the talent that will find him.

Finally he hears a click and says, “Jimmy!”

And extremely crabby voice says, “Your timing is atrocious. This better be the most important call you’ve ever made.”

“It is. Abby and Kelly are heading to you. You and Breena need to grab the girls, get packed up, and get out of the US.”

For a second, there’s just shocked silence on the other side of the phone. “Okay, what did you get into?” Jimmy asks, sounding a hell of a lot less crabby at that.

Tim explains it, and Jimmy gives him less trouble than Abby about staying, which Tim appreciates greatly. He doesn’t want to have that conversation over and over.

“Don’t tell anyone—"

“Breena’s parents… My mom…” That reminds Tim that he needs to call his sister, and Penny.

“Shit, okay, yeah. If they’ll keep quiet.” He gets another account converted over. “Just… Don’t tell anyone, not even them, where you’re going. Or tell them, but lie. Just get out. Canada’s ten hours away. You can get there before Leon gets in, and I’ll sit on this until the morning. Give you a head start.”

“You think it’s going to be that bad?”

“I don’t know. But I’m not relying on hope, and even if they don’t track me down… What happens when every major position of power is filled by someone who bought their way in? What happens if the government actually, really shuts down? At the very least, we’ll see riots. And on this one I’d rather be overreacting than underreacting.”

“Okay. We can bug out for a while,” Jimmy’s sounding resigned, and he can hear sounds in the background that makes him think he and Breena are getting dressed and starting to pack.

“Thank you.”

“Stay safe, Tim.”

“I’m in a building filled with armed guys and Marines who know me. I don’t know who they’ll be taking orders from tomorrow, or if they’ll even stay at their post, but with any luck, some of them’ll think protecting us is worthwhile. You stay safe.”

“We will. Ditch the car along the way. Find a new ride, get new phones. We’ll get out.”

“Okay. I love you. Tell Breena, too.”

“Love you, too. Abby’s here.”
“Okay, get going.”

“Tim?” Sarah’s not sounding sleepy, or annoyed, just surprised to hear from him this late.

“You and Glenn need to get out of the country.”

“What?” She sounds literally stupefied by that.

“Just trust me on it. Something big and nasty that I can’t tell you about is going to go down soon, and you need to grab all the cash you can and get out of the US.”

Sarah laughs. “It’s not April fools.”

“Do I sound like I’m kidding?” Tim practically growls.

“No, but I can’t deal with this being real.”

“Can you tell me anything?”

“Keep your eyes on the news. You’ll know it when you see it.”

“That bad?”

“Tell mom and Ben to get out, too. She always said she wanted that Mexican vacation. Now’s the time to take it. Go!”

That. His request to get their mother to safety, convinces her more than anything that whatever is about to hit will be a complete disaster. “Okay. We’re gone.”

He’s got the last of the accounts buried as he dials Penny’s number. He’s not a praying man, but right now he’s intently hoping in the direction of any greater powers that could possibly be listening that his hack will hold, that whoever is behind this doesn’t find him until his loves are clear.

“I’ll do no such thing,” Penny calmly says when Tim tells her to get moving and explains why.

“Penny…”

“I’ve never run from my home before and I’m not about to now.”

Tim takes a deep breath, closes his eyes, and opens them slowly. “Put Ducky on.”

“Are you going to try to go over my head, make him make me leave?” She sounds angry.

“No. You’re not leaving, fine. I’m not wasting time on trying to talk you into this when I might get him to leave.”
A minute later he gets Ducky on the phone followed by, “I have heard what you told your grandmother, and I am going nowhere. Among other things it sounds like NCIS is short a Medical Examiner and could use a second set of hands. And if you are right about how bad this is likely to get, everyone who can do basic first aid, let alone any level of higher medical care should stay.”

Tim rubs his eyes and groans. He hears the echo and realizes he’s on speaker. “Ducky, Penny, please… You live in the city. You’re less than two miles from the Capitol. God alone knows what’s going to go down when this goes live.”

“I didn’t run away during The Blitz, and I very much doubt the ruffian elements of DC can hold a candle to the Wehrmacht.”

“You were seven when that happened, and I bet your father would have preferred you and your mother had been home in Scotland rather than London.”

“Nevertheless. We do not run.”

“Goddamned stubborn octogenarians! I’m boycotting your funerals if this bites you in the ass!”

“As will be your prerogative, Timothy, along with the ability to tell my ghost, ‘I told you so.’ We’ll be at the Navy Yard, bright and early tomorrow.”

Tim hears the ‘we’ll’ and assumes that Ducky or Penny has the sense at least to stay together. He knows they can both shoot, he knows there’s at least one gun in their home, and he knows they both don’t have the kind of eyesight where he’d want them to have to bet their lives on their ability to hit a moving target. If he’s very lucky, he might get them to agree to stay at the Navy Yard, not as good as getting out, but better than an unprotected condo.

“Fine. I’ll see you in the morning.”

He makes one last family call. “Senior.”

“Is this Tim?”

“Yeah. It’s me.”

“Oh, God! Are they okay? Gibbs said someone would come in person…”

“Okay. Everyone is okay. I’m… I haven’t told your son about it, yet. I want things to look as normal as possible, but… It’s…” Tim’s not sure if he should be calling Tony about this, yet. Not sure which works best for buying his loves the most time possible to get them out before they look like something is up. “Shit. Just, look, right now, you and Delphine need to get out of the country. Don’t ask me any questions. Don’t call Tony. Just, grab your cash, pack a bag, and leave.”

“Tim?”

“This is real. It’s serious. I can’t tell you why. I can’t tell Tony, yet, either, but I promise you, if the shoe was on the other foot, he’d be getting my family out.”

“Tim, we’re in Berlin this week.”

“Perfect! Stay there. Pretend I didn’t call you.”
“What…”

“I know. I can’t say. If you’re already there, change as much cash as you can into Euros.”

Senior sounds deeply disturbed as he says, “All right. You sure about this? Dollar’s doing better than the Euro right now, any sort of big change…”

“I don’t care what it is, just get your money out of US currency. You might end up bankrolling the rest of us soon, so be ready.”

Senior sounds much happier with a job to do. “Then I’ll be ready. Good idea to sell off any assets I have?”

“If they’re in the US… I don’t know. I hope I’m wrong, but… I’m probably not.”

“All right.”

“Senior, you can’t tell anyone about this. It’s not a hot tip you can give to your buddies. This begins and ends with you, okay?”

“Certainly, Tim. Let me get moving.”

“Thanks.” Tim’s really hoping he didn’t just start a run on the markets, and that Senior can do what he’s told to.

---

_Call Tony, don’t call Tony…_

He’s been making the calls from one of the clean phones, and with the exception of the one to Senior, he’s been calling the clean phones, too.

It’s not impossible to trace these calls, but no one should know who has what phone.

Rule forty-four, first things first, hide the women and children.

The idea that Ziva might qualify as one of the women to hide had never occurred to Tim before, but right now, it is.

He doesn’t think she’ll leave, but he needs to give them the option.

“DiNozzo,” Tony’s voice is thick with sleep when he answers.

“Hey.”

“Tim, you’re supposed to be home, asleep. You finally break that account?”

“Yeah. Wake Ziva up, you two have something to talk about.”

A few minutes later, Tim’s done explaining, and Tony and Ziva do have something to talk about. Tim leaves them to it.

---

He should try to sleep. It’s midnight, and all sort of hell is going to break loose tomorrow, rest would be good for helping to handle that. But he’s way, way too wired for it.

So, no sleeping. He’s gotten as much coverage as he can give himself for what he’s already done. What next? Next up, he picks up the laptop Diane’s been using, the one he just tried to pin all of his previous work on, and turns it on. Everything from here on out happens on this computer.

His “track covering” showed that Tim McGee logged out a bit after eight. Same time everyone else left for the night.

He’s got his tool, now what?

They don’t know who runs the election buying account. Diane drained it, so someone’s going to be checking into that soon, if not already.

There’s step one. They know who’s selling the elections, they don’t know who’s buying.

Ownership is hidden behind a dozen false names and a PAC that doesn’t exist. He doesn’t have the accounting chops to untangle that. So…

Tim groans. It’s stupidly easy.

He can’t get into the bank that handles that account’s records, and he doesn’t need to. Not it’s banking records, at least. He finds out who runs that bank, the board members are wanted for money laundering and illegal banking in most of the first world, but they’re openly living in a non-extradition country. Finding them, and the phone numbers attached to them, isn’t difficult.

Same with the bank. Using it is illegal as hell, and causes the IRS to drop on you (unless you’re these guys) like a ton of bricks. But it’s not secret. It’s not like you’ve got to know a guy who knows a guy to get into this. The phone number’s on the damn website. (And, yes, there is a website. It’s a very nice website, images of soothing beaches and promises of ‘security’ and ‘privacy’ for the discriminating customer. Minimum account balance, two hundred million dollars.)

Routine helps him feel more in control, more calm. He gets phone records. He’s done that thousands of times over the years.

Then he begins checking numbers. The first thing someone does when their bank account suddenly goes empty is call the bank. A bank account with more than four billion dollars in it going empty is going to produce some extremely irate calls.

It’s a bank, so when the list for the last day of incoming calls returns to him, it has more than a hundred entries. He gets the lists for the individual board members, too, and begins the first search, who called the bank and the board…

That narrows him down to four numbers.

Two of which called the bank five times a piece as well as the entire board. The country code for those two shows the calls originated from inside the US. He’s feeling awfully sure these are the numbers he wants.

Tim’s all but typing with crossed fingers as he punches those numbers in. He slaps his desk in celebration when he gets names to go with those numbers. No burner phones. Amen.

He doesn’t know who these people are, either, but some googling takes care of that.

Theresa Manedel, Chairman of the Republican National Convention and David York, Chairman of the Democratic National Convention.

He pulls up their phone records next. In the last three days, they’ve called each other a lot. Sixteen times since Sunday morning. He checks the month before that, and they didn’t talk to each other once.

The first call happened at 03:38 on Sunday. Shortly after the accident didn’t take out Diane and Draga. Who was Theresa talking to before that? She got a call at 03:35.

That one goes… Tim sighs. The case is unraveling here in the phone records. That number looks familiar, and a bit of extra checking shows him why. That’s Koskinigen’s number.

Who was he talking to?

Tim can’t tell. The number that called Koskinigen at 03:30 was from a burner phone.

Tim runs the burner phone, but that one call is the only one it ever made. He tries to trace it, but it’s out of service now. That branch of the conspiracy knew what it was doing.

He checks the other two calls to the bank, he doesn’t recognize them, and googling isn’t informative. He flags the numbers, see if they pop up again, but there are several hundred accounts with this bank, and some of their owners likely called with their own business.

Now what?

Start at the beginning. Abbi hands the mystery letter over to Diane. Diane starts to look at those numbers. Next thing she knows Koskinigen is in her office. Time to trace every call he’s made since Diane got those numbers.

He’s been at it for two hours when Tony leaning against his door, holding a suitcase, one of Tim’s suitcases, and a bottle of scotch filters into Tim’s mind.

“Take it you and Ziva had a chat?”

Tony nods. He puts the suitcase in the corner of Tim’s office, pulls up one of the chairs, and pours both of them a few shots into the coffee mugs Tim has in his office.

“Yeah. I made a few more calls to. She’s getting Emily Fornell, Lara, and Vance’s kids out.”

Tim nods. He hadn’t thought to do that, and that’s a good plan. “And that gets her out, too.”

“Yeah.” Tony sips his drink. He doesn’t have to say that’s the only way he could get Ziva out of the country. And he’s not sure if she’ll try to come back after she gets them out, or if she’ll decide keeping her and their child out of whatever comes next is more important than getting back to him. He hopes, if it gets bad, that she stays away. He fears she won’t. “Swung by your place. Figured that if the shit hits the fan as bad as I think it will, neither of us is seeing home anytime soon.”

“Thanks. I’ve got the feeling none of us are going anywhere alone anytime soon.”

“I wouldn’t.” He sits back, drink cupped between his hands. “You wonder if this is what it felt like to be on the Titanic after it hit the iceberg?”

Tim raises an eyebrow at him, and takes a sip of his scotch.
Tony’s looking tired, and contemplative. Tim knows this is the way he looks when his walls are down. A version of Tony almost no one ever gets to see. “You, and I, and a handful of others know that everything’s about to sink. Nothing we can do about it. Can’t fix the hull. Just got to sit here, and wait, and hope we get a lifeboat.”

“We got our families on lifeboats. That’s the best we could do. Come on, I’m tracking down who’s doing what. Once Vance gets in—“

“Maybe half an hour behind me. Diane should be here, with Draga, soon, too.”

“Okay, let’s run this down.”

Tony nods, grabbing a computer, and starting to hunt down who did what. “It’s kind of ironic,” he says as his computer logs in.

“What?”

“You know how they say your vote matters and it’s so important to get out and vote and all that shit?”

“Yeah.”

“I didn’t vote in the last… election before last. Couldn’t vote in the last one because I live in DC. The one before it. I was planning to. Swing by on the way home. Ended up running late. Didn’t make it in time. I actually felt slightly bad about that.”

Tim snorts at that, and then remembers… “I didn’t, either. The last one. I got to the one before that, but, I was on my honeymoon. Didn’t even remember about that, until now. Not sure I could have. Didn’t live at my old address, wasn’t registered at the new one.”

It’s a few minutes of quiet data surfing later when Tim says, “Penny might end up happy with this.”

Tony raises his eyebrows.

“Her Green buddies might actually get elected now.”

Tony scoffs. “You think there’ll be an election?”

“I like the idea of that better than the alternative.”

“How is anyone ever going to trust one, again?” Tony asks.

“I don’t know. Penny talked about this one guy she met who wanted to increase the number of seats in Congress to 5000, so there’d be way fewer people per Congressman, so each vote would matter more. That’d give more local control, too.”

“I suppose. Gonna have ten senators per state?”

“Something like that.”

“2004?” Tony asks.

“On this account. For all we know there’s an older one with the names of other guys attached to it.”

Tim drinks more of his scotch, trying to keep himself from thinking all the way through this, but he’s not willing to drink enough alcohol to shut down his brain, so the thoughts come. “At least the last two Presidents. And everyone they’ve appointed. That’s what… Four Supreme Court Judges?”

“You think the Military will stand for this? Think they’ll revolt? Put SecDef or some General in charge?”

Tony shrugs. “And if they did, would that be any less legitimate than what we have now?”

Tim doesn’t have an answer to that. He does have a list of people Koskinigen’s been talking to, so he spends more time on that.

Leon comes in a moment later, sees the bottle, grabs another coffee cup, and pours himself a large drink. From the way he drinks, he’s gulping down at least half of it. Then he sits down, shaking his head. “Jarvis will be in, soon.”

Tim shrugs, not sure what good Jarvis is going to be if the President’s out tomorrow.

Tony’s got the same look on his face.

“He knows where the bodies are buried,” Leon says.

Tony drinks again. “Dead rise tomorrow, Leon. Not gonna matter if some Senator took bribes or something. Not after this breaks.” Then Tony laughs. “Isn’t there a book or something where the head of the CIA becomes president?”

That’s ringing some faint bells for Tim, but not enough for him to put it together. “I know a show where the Secretary of Education ends up in charge when the President, VP, and the rest of the cabinet are killed.”

“This’ll take the whole cabinet out,” Leon says. “They’re all appointed by the President. Head of Congress?”

“That account works on off-year elections. ’14 was a big year. Lots of money,” Tim says.

Leon shakes his head and pours himself another. He looks at the alcohol in his cup. “It’s clarifying. Yesterday, we were on the biggest corruption case we’d ever worked. On the verge of taking down two more agencies. Today, who cares if the IRS was on the take? Doesn’t matter. Not really.”

“It matters,” they hear a second after the sound of the door opening. Jarvis heads in, with Lt. James. A second later James shuts the door, and settles himself, leaning against Tim’s desk as Jarvis takes the last of the chairs. “It matters because that’s our protection, and how we’re going to get out of this alive.” Jarvis takes the last cup, pours some for James, and then drinks his straight from the bottle. “So, what do we know?”

Tim proceeds to tell him.

Jarvis and the rest of them listen to Tim’s sit rep, nodding a bit, and then, when he’s done, Jarvis says, “Terri and Dave, huh? Well… That’s less shocking that I was expecting. Who else is buying?”

“Not into that, yet. Going through Koskinigen’s calls, seeing who he’s been talking to.”

“Okay. Any shot they know you’re onto them?” Jarvis asks Tim.
Tim shrugs. “I really hope not. But… That kind of money. They can hire the guy who’s better than I am. They probably already have. They can hire a bunch of him. They put their minds to it, and they will find me.”

“Okay… DiNozzo, you’re working the DEA angle, right?”

Tony’s not thrilled at Jarvis just waltzing in and taking over, but he answer nonetheless. “Yeah. Dunerson’s in the Bathenadas’ pockets.”

“Great. And you’ve got Koskinigen in custody?” Jarvis asks Leon.

“Yeah.”

He looks to Tim, “And you’ve got proof that what you say is happening is happening?”

“I’ve got the files. I suppose there could be some other reason why the head of the DNC and RNC are giving billions of dollars to the top four guys at the FEC and the top guys at the three companies that make 90% of the electronic voting machines in the US, but I’m damned if I can think of what it would be.”

Jarvis flashes them a very tight smile. “That’s good. Here’s the plan. We hunt down the buyers and sellers. SEAL teams. I’ve got ones I trust, are going to go in and grab them—“

“SEALs? Just grab them out of the blue?” Leon asks.

“Not like there’s a Federal Judge left to write a legitimate warrant,” Jarvis says.

“Shit. Diane mentioned that. That’d we have a hell of a time prosecuting any of this. The… avoid the campaign finance laws account. That touches almost everyone, and they appointed all of the judges and prosecutors,” Leon says.

“Yeah. I’ve got teams I trust. Men I’ve worked with. Men James has worked with, too. We’re going to distract the rest of the higher ups with a bit of buzz. I may have, on the way here, gotten a hold of Dunerson and told him that he’s about to be indicted for bribery, and several other higher ups have gotten that news, too. They’re in self-defense mode right now, burning evidence as we speak.”

“And this is going to help us, how?” Tim asks.

“Because you guys are going to get every member of the press you’ve ever met, and every single person who has a blog, and anyone who can get information out, and tell them that Leon’s got the juiciest story they’ve ever heard of. They’ll, if they’re any good, already have some feelers out that are noticing people are getting nervous, and they will show up to find out what we have to say.”

Tim starts nodding, and Leon and Tony are getting it, too.

“And then, when we’ve got every member of the press, inside NCIS, away from windows and direct line of sight…” Leon says.

“And checked top to bottom for explosives,” Tony adds, remembering Deering.

“You guys will drop the real story while my teams move in and take custody of everyone who’s buying and selling. We make sure all of us are on camera. All of us speak.”

“Snowden it,” Tim says. “Become so visible that if something ‘mysterious’ happens to any of us, it’ll be all over the news and the world’ll know why.”
“Yeah, it doesn’t guarantee they won’t try, men who lose everything are willing to do desperate things, but, with any luck, that’ll keep us alive,” Jarvis says. He puts the bottle down, takes off his jacket, and says, “All right, who are we grabbing out of their homes?”
Operation Get Out of Dodge does not start off smoothly.

It would have been nice if it did, but it didn’t.

Biggest Little Girl, who to date, has slept through every attempt to move her while sleeping since the day she was born, decided that tonight was the night for her eyes to go springing open as her daddy was carrying her into the car, and start wailing, inconsolably, about some sort of bad dream.

Jimmy, did, eventually get her shushed back into sleeping, but not before the three grown up members of the group were so stressed out that they’re practically vibrating with it. (Though, given the mood of this group, it didn’t take a whole lot of extra aggravation to get there.)

The second bit of not exactly going smooth as silk is that none of them have a map. That’s not true, they have smart phones, smart phones which have every possible map to have ever existed on them. Those phones, which Tim had said not to bring, are currently in the car with them, but they are turned off, and not being used as maps.

Breena’s not sure why the phones are with them. She doesn’t see any reason why they should be going along on this trip, none of their computers came along for the trip, but Abby keeps saying, ‘trust me’, she knows what she’s doing.

“And what are we doing?” Breena asks.

“Going to Walmart. You guys are going to buy a map, and new phones, and as many of those pre-paid credit cards as you can. I’m going to take care of our phones.”

“Take care of how?” Jimmy asks.

“You’ll see. Get me some duct tape while you’re in there, okay?”

So, Jimmy, with Abby and Breena’s credit cards goes in. And he buys a lot of prepaid cards. And then he understands why Abby said Walmart. Because, in the front of the store is a vending machine that sells pre-paid smart phones. Which means, as long as he uses cash, (which he does) he can get a phone, which has no connection to him, which has a map on it.

He buys three of them. And a bunch of little ones like the flip phone’s Tim uses for burners.

And then he remembers the one other thing he’d forgotten: insulin. He remembered his test strips and all the rest of that, but not the thing he needs if his sugar goes wonky.

Fortunately he didn’t forget his prescription pad. He writes himself a script for insulin and syringes, finds a good cooler, and stocks up. He probably won’t need it. He hasn’t had to inject himself in more than a week, but this is really the sort of thing he’d rather have and not need, than need and not have.
He gets the duct tape, and snacks, and more diapers and wipes, and heads out.

When he gets back into the car, he hands over the duct tape and says to Abby, “Now what?”

She takes the tape, cuts three long strips, and then tapes them to the back of their phones, their turned on and broadcasting their location, phones. “Now I go tape these to three semi-trucks. They’re big enough they don’t have to worry about someone trying to run them off the road or into a train, and anyone checking our phones will see us head off in three different directions.”

Breena looks up from trying to get the map working on the first of the new phones, and says, “That’s a really good idea.”

Abby grins at her, but it’s not as bright as it could be, too many people are back in DC for it to be her usual ‘everything is perfect and I’m getting petted for how brilliant I am’ smile, but it’s better than nothing.

“Back in a minute. Then off we go.”

By the time Diane and Draga get in and wander down, Tim’s fairly sure his, try-to-keep-this-as-quiet-as-possible plan has been shot to shit, so he calls Gibbs.

Gibbs sounds very awake when he answers, to the point where Tim wonders if he’s been working all night.

“Everything okay?”

Then Tim realizes that Gibbs must have seen his name on the ID, and thought something might be wrong at home, where he’s supposed to be.

“No. It’s not. Come to the Navy Yard, bring Abbi, and pack like you might not get home for a while.”

“You broke the case, didn’t you?”

“Yeah, and it’s rotten.”

“Okay. We’ll be in soon.”

As he’s doing that, Tony calls in Bishop and Jake. If they’re gonna war room it, they might as well have the whole crew in place.

By that point, it’s two in the morning. Leon, Tony, Diane, and Draga are hunting through the accounts, finding out which names go with which accounts and who needs to be, and can be, swooped up. Jarvis is calling in every commander he personally knows, and asking for troops on loan. James is calling in his SEAL buddies.

Tim looks around, thinks for a moment, decides that there’s nothing he can do right now that everyone else can’t just as well, and heads for the sofa. He lays down, closes his eyes, and forces his mind to clear. He can’t work if he’s fried, and if he doesn’t get at least a few hours of downtime, he’ll be fried.
When told to pack like he might not see home for a while, Jethro packs. And with Abbi next to him, also packing… It’s a very thorough job.

Not necessarily what Tim or Tony would bring, but… he’s the one who’s had to live off of just what he could catch or carry. Whatever it is, it looks like they’re going to make the Navy Yard their home base, so…

Blankets. He and Abbi clean out what they have and grab all the camping gear, too.

Matches, candles, lamps, lighters, everything in his house that burns is coming with them.

Abbi has a few days of MRE style rations; they’re coming too.

Water filters. (They don’t know what’s coming, but there’s never a situation where having an extra water filter or two is a bad thing.)

Batteries. Every battery in the house, even the ones currently in devices are coming with them. He’s eyeing his generator when Abbi says to him. “NCIS has a backup generator, and your motor pool has its own gas station. That little guy isn’t going to do much.”

Gibbs nods, unplugs it, starts to pick it up, and puts it down. Too heavy. “You feel like lugging that next door? The Reynolds don’t have one, and…”

“Sure. I’ll leave it on the back porch.”

He nods at that and gets onto other gear. The knives, the guns, the hand-cranked radio, they pack it all. If they have to bug out of the Navy Yard and head for the hills, they’re set.

They also, and this is more in line with what Tim was thinking when he said pack like you aren’t going to see home for a while, bring a few spare outfits, extra socks and undies, Mona, all of her food, her bowls, and their personal toiletries.

Tim’s asleep on the sofa, curled onto his side, looking very unpeaceful for someone who’s asleep, when Gibbs and Abbi get down to the basement.

They can see two very nervous looking techs, who don’t appear to know much more than they do about what’s going on. The shy one and the little girl, they’re sitting at one desk, and keep glancing over at the conference table. Tony’s taken over the conference table, and has his crew, along with Diane, Leon, and Jake working on something. The door to Tim’s office is closed, but the blinds aren’t drawn, so Gibbs can see Jarvis, his secretary, and a crew of men he knows are military by their posture, but can’t identify on sight, having a tense conversation.

He and Abbi stride over, Mona happily bounding along, really interested in this very new place with all these new smells and people.

Gibbs remembers the name of the one tech. “Brand, right?”

She nods.

“You like dogs?”

She’s flatfooted by that, but finally says, “Uh, yeah.”
“Good. C’mere, say ‘hi’ to Mona. You can come, too,” he says to the quiet one, who he’s seen before but doesn’t know.

Both of the ladies come over, and Mona does her best to be cute and charming. Brand pets her and says, “Aimee, this is Mr. Gibbs. McGee’s dad. Mr. Gibbs, this is Aimee Ngyn, she’s… awesome.”

Ngyn, who predates Brand by more than five years, smiles a little at that. She knows who ‘Mr. Gibbs’ is, by reputation if nothing more.

Gibbs offers his hand. “Hi, Ngyn. I know I’ve seen you around. I worked here before I retired, Brand.”

“Oh! Sorry.”

Gibbs waves it off. “They telling you anything about what’s going on?”

Both ladies shake their heads. “Top secret, and everyone’s nervous.”

“Let’s go find out. If they’re calling me back in, I’m sure you’re cleared for this, too.”

Abbi’s aware of the meet and greet going on behind her with Gibbs and the computer ladies, but she’s focused on what’s happening at the table.

Tony’s about a paragraph into the sit rep when Gibbs and both girls join in. But even with that one paragraph, she’s starting to feel sick. When Gibbs does come over, Tony begins again. He gets them up to date, and as he does so, more and more people keep coming in. None of them are in uniform, but they’re all military, and they all head straight for Jarvis.

Once he gets the sit rep done, Tony says to Abbi and Gibbs, “You two feel like running the feint?”

“How so?” Abbi asks. She’s still too shocked by the sit rep to really process. She’s run into her share of bad apples before but this…

“The ‘official’ reason we’re going to call the press conference is the corruption charges on DEA Boy and Mr. IRS.”

Abbi nods, slowly. “Gil. I’ve met him a few times. Hell, about… four weeks ago, he requested an hour to talk with me about what had tipped me off to problems in CGIS. I thought he wanted to make sure his organization was clean, not cover his own ass.”

Tony shrugs at that. “Yeah, well. Lot of ass-covering going on right now. Ours, as well. What I’d like, is for you and Gibbs to run a big, flashy, lots of men, my main team and yours, lots of press, lots of lights, both of you growling at the cameras, not really talking to anyone, being gruff as bears with sore paws, and grabbing Dunerson.

“Then I want you making the statement that the official press conference will be at the Navy Yard, tonight at 6:00, and that all members of the press are welcome and all questions will be answered.”

Abbi nods at that. “And that’s when the real news drops?”

“Yeah. Everything falls at once. We grab the buyers, the sellers, and as many of the big names on the election influencing account as we can get.”
Abbi glances over at Tim’s office. “That what Jarvis is doing?”

“Yeah. They’re calling in everyone who owes them a favor. We’re going to need men all over to do this.”

Abbi nods at that, too, standing up. “Jethro, you wanna plan grabbing Dunerson? I’ve got some friends to call.”

Gibbs looks up, his eyes blank, he’s still reeling from what he’s learned. How many lives… sent off to die by men who hadn’t earned the right to issue those commands? He lets out a slow breath, making himself not think about it. There’s a job to do. A real, concrete job. Think about that. “Sure. I’ll get the first sweep done while you call. Then you look it over, and I’ll call in my favors.”

Tony looks at the two Minions who have joined the conversation. They’re both looking shell-shocked.

“This isn’t supposed to happen,” Brand says, very quietly, very young-looking.

“I know.” Tony says gently, “Come on, grab an account number, and get a name to go with it. We won’t be able to get all of them, but it’s time to hunt down the biggest donors.”

Gibbs grabs Draga and Bishop, taking them up to the bullpen. If this is the public face of what they’re doing, it’ll be public.

“Okay, what do we know about Dunerson?” Gibbs asks, slipping back into Team Leader in a heartbeat.

“He’s been tipped off by Jarvis that he’s about to be indicted for bribery, and that we’re supposed to show up on his doorstep at 11:30, once we’ve got the warrant. He knows who the judge is, and we’ve seen several calls going between them. Probably a promise to let him know when the warrant is ready,” Bishop says.

“He’s called his lawyers, and from his phone records we know he’s still at home,” Draga adds.

“So, we’re getting our warrant from a different judge and showing up early?” Gibbs says.

“That’s our current game plan. And, we’re not indicting him on bribery, but on election finance violations and money laundering,” Bishop adds.

“He’s, from what we can tell, stuffed in his house with his lawyer, rapidly destroying anything that links him to any sort of bribe, and probably building up his this-is-a-witch-hunt defense,” Draga says.

“Okay. Let’s get a map of that house up, and see how to do this to provide the best possible show,” Gibbs feels really off saying that, but, that’s the job, and right now, it’s way easier to focus on the job than on anything else that goes with it.

Brand and Ngyn spend five minutes watching the account hunt. Then they spend a moment conferring with each other. After that, Brand asks Tony, “Are you really just going down the list and typing numbers in?"

Tony looks up from his own typing, a bit annoyed. “Yes. This is how cops work.”

“It’s slow.”

“Yes, Little Ms. Obvious, it is slow.” He says, tense and annoyed at her.

“Would you like us to speed it up?” Brand asks.

“That’s why you’re here, typing away. Two more people speeds things up.”

Brand rolls her eyes, every ounce a teenaged hacker dealing with a dinosaur who doesn’t know how to use a computer radiating off of her. Ngyn pokes her, and says very quietly, “Behave.”

Brand reins it in, taking a deep breath. “I mean, really speed things up. This is just asking a database for information. Give us ten minutes and we’ll write the script that takes everything from dataset A and runs it through dataset B. That way we can also sort by bank, by who’s sending how much, compile all of the payments together, stuff like that.”

Diane is all over that. “Can you do that with this?” She points out how the account information doesn’t look like a standard database to her. (For example, if this information had come back to her in an Excel spreadsheet, Diane would have already done what the girls are talking about.)

Brand waves her concerns off. “It’s all just bits. Just gotta arrange them right. Give us some time, and you guys can get onto tracking these guys down.”

Twenty minutes later, as Tony’s looking at names with total amounts of money next to them popping up, organized by amount, he says, “Brand, as soon as you can legally drink, I’m buying you a bottle of whatever it is you drink.”

Brand laughs at that. Then she says, “The twenty-one thing is a federal law. That won’t matter soon, right? I like Stoli Vanil. Ohhh and the Godiva Chocolate liquor… And Rum Chata! Oh my god, that stuff is liquid oatmeal cookies!”

As Brand is extoling the virtues of alcohols that are basically candy, her twenty-one comment shuts down what had been a slightly lifting mood in the rest of the adults. They all glance at each other, getting what Brand doesn’t.

Diane, watching names pop up, says, “Can you do this with the payouts, too?”

“No problem.”

“Instead of by amount, I want them organized by zip code,” Diane adds.

Brand glances at Ngyn, who shrugs and nods. “I can do it, but… why?”

“We know who’s paying in, and we know who’s getting paid, but we don’t know who is actually hiring these guys to do things. This won’t be definitive, but it’ll start to narrow down who’s using this service.”

“You mean like which senators?” Brand asks.

“Yes.”

“Cool! Sure, we can do that.”
Diane really wishes she could be that innocent. Brand really doesn’t get what they’re up against.

Diane does.

The first thing she did when she got in was transfer all of her money to an offshore account in Emily’s name. She’s had that account since the divorce with Sterling. Most of the money in it is from that settlement, and has been kicking round, collecting interest, waiting to become Emily’s college money. Once she had all of her cash in there, she converted that money into Euros and lifted the restriction on it. Yesterday, that account could only be accessed by her and Emily, or Fornell and Emily.

Now Emily can get into it alone. She’s got the access numbers.

She doesn’t know where Ziva’s taking her. “Safe.” Somewhere safe. Yeah, right. Safe is her baby, in her sight, in her arms, right here.

Except, unlike Brand, she knows what’s coming, and right here might be “safe,” in the sense that she doesn’t think anyone would be stupid enough to try to mob the Navy Yard, but it’s not going to be Europe or Canada safe. It’s going to be burrowing down here under ground and hoping there’s still some city left when they come out.

More anger at having to deal with this, at having her life tossed upside down, of her home violated, and her child driven away surges through Diane.

With her computer, she makes sure that no one on the payout list can move. She kills their bank accounts, destroys their credit, and puts them on the no fly list. Those voting machine companies are all bankrupt now. Financially, in addition to the morally they were yesterday. The FEC top dogs can’t even buy a cup of coffee, now, unless they’ve got cash on hand.

The account she’s tucking all of their money into is getting bigger and bigger in leaps and bounds. She just hopes it going to be enough to pay to rebuild the destruction that’s coming.

“So, we understand what we’re doing?” Ziva says, and the four people with her nod. “Good.” She doesn’t love this plan, but she’s getting four civilians out of a country with hundreds of miles between her and the borders.

Confusion is her best ploy.

Confusion and big bank accounts.

She’s bought bus tickets for every major city in the US for Lara and the kids. And she’s bought them departing tickets from four different DC stations, as well as three of the neighboring suburbs. She’s gotten them train tickets, and plane tickets, all using the same technique. And she’s gotten them, from all of their destinations, connecting flights, trains, and busses. Anyone trying to track them will have to use a lot of people to see who goes where, and which tickets actual people are using.

They’re all starting off at different transport out, and not rejoining each other until they’re in Puerto Plata. It’s not exactly the way she’d like to do this, but the kids are old enough to travel alone, and unlike Emily Fornell, every summer of their lives, they’ve gone with their parents on Leon’s different trips. They know how to do this. Lara’s spent less time out of the US, but since she’s been taking care of the kids, she too has been part of the summer trips.

Their passports are well-stamped, and the airport they’re going into isn’t as high tech as it could be. If anyone is looking for them, using a computer, it’ll be a while before they get the heads up.

From the Dominican Republic, they’re getting on a cruise ship. That’ll spend the next week cruising around, and then land in Europe. From there, it’s up to them where they go next. Hopefully, by then, they’ll be going home.

She’s not making them vanish, but given who they are, and their training, and the resources she has at hand, she can’t make them vanish. All she can do is make them hard to find.

She and Emily Fornell are going to vanish. She’s seen the pictures of what the people who are after Diane did to Emily’s room, and the message was clear.

Once she’s handed over all of the tickets to Lara, and dropped her off at one bus station, Jared at the train station, and Kayla at Dulles, she and Emily head to Andrews.

“Why aren’t the Vances coming with us on this?” Emily asks as they pull away from Dulles.

“Because one NCIS Agent and a witness going from NCIS DC to NCIS Rota is unremarkable. They’ll give us passage and that will be that. If I try to put the Vances on a Navy transport, there will be questions, first and foremost, why take the family of the Director of NCIS on a transport instead of the jet. And, why take them in the middle of the night? And why don’t they want their names on the docket? And why isn’t Director Vance going?”

“I get it. But you and a witness, moving fast, in the middle of the night, for a case…”

“Is unusual, but happens.”

“Okay.” Emily sighs, staring out the window as they drive towards Andrews. “I’ve never been on a C-130J before, that’ll be interesting.”

“Interesting is a good way to put it. Do you like rollercoasters?” Ziva asks.

“No. They make me sick.”

Ziva sighs, and makes a mental note to stop on the way, getting baggies, and some of the anti-motion sickness stuff McGee uses. “This isn’t going to be a fun flight.”

Emily shrugs. “I’m supposed to be writing college application essays right now. Going to Europe doesn’t sound too bad.”

Ziva nods at that, and squeezes Emily’s hand. Where in Europe, they don’t know yet. Military transport, unlisted on the passenger manifest into Frankfurt, and from there… Probably get a Euro-rail pass and be in a different country every day.

Do it all in cash, or as much as possible, and blend in. Just two tourists having a good time. She’ll notice someone watching long before they manage to pin down where they’ll go next.

“Ziva?”

“Yes.”

“When are we going to go home?” Emily sounds very young, and very scared as she says that.
“I do not know,” and Ziva’s voice is very sad as she replies. “Governments rise and they fall, and we will hope that the people in the United States do not wish to settle this with all out war.”

“But if they do? If it all falls apart and…”

Ziva gently squeezes Emily’s shoulder. She doesn’t have an answer for that. She knows what she would do if she were not pregnant, what she’d be tempted to take Emily along with, too. Ziva was Emily’s age when she started in the army. Not much older when she killed her first person. There’s nothing a soldier needs to do that a seventeen-eighteen year old girl can’t.

Shouldn’t possibly, but not can’t.

But she is pregnant. And she owes it to the life growing inside of her, and the ones she’s leaving behind, to find a place, a calm, quiet, peaceful place, a place where she can live to raise this child. Hopefully, in the not too distant future, that will be the United States.

As she pulls over into the parking lot of a drugstore, planning on getting motion-sickness remedies for Emily, she prays that both of them can come home, soon.

Abbi holds her phone and thinks. It’s been a long time since she’s been in touch with too many Marines. Her team, the people who she would have called for something like this in a heartbeat are dead. Her second and third runners up…

She just doesn’t know, not anymore. Not for something that needs to be kept this quiet.

She calls Omagi instead. He’s going to be part of the team going after Dunerson, and he’s got a wife and small child at home. Time to make sure her team is in play, and as safe as possible. They speak briefly, and at the end of that, she tells him to call in any CGIS field agent who’s even remotely competent. Doesn’t matter who’s “on” today, they’re all coming in.

She’s got a gut feeling of her own, and that’s that by this time tomorrow, DC is going to need every good person inside of it to hold the line.

Jarvis has called in every favor he can. That’s not true. He’s called in every favor he thinks he should.

He is, unfortunately, rapidly coming to the conclusion that even with his men, and James’ men, they do not have enough people to do this in one fell swoop. They can’t do a coordinated shock and awe campaign because between the two of them he’s got 114 men, and right now, more than 200 people who need to be picked up.

He knows he’ll get more warm bodies over the course of the day. He’s not sure he’ll get enough of them, let alone in the right places. Five bank accounts were involved with buying the last election, and the people behind all of those accounts will need to be grabbed before any of his people here can bring their families home.

Before he can see his own kids again.
Which means, instead of planning a single, multi-theatre attack for 18:00 tonight, he’s talking with a small squad of men about picking up the first two names on the list. Lucky for them, Manedel and York both live in DC, almost within walking distance of the Navy Yard.

With the girls speeding up the search for who’s getting paid, and who’s doing the paying, Leon doesn’t have much to do. He thinks for a moment, and then stands up.

Jarvis and James are in Tim’s office, and from the few words he catches before he goes in, planning the extraction of Theresa Manedel, who lives less than four miles from here. If they move fast, they can get to her before the sun rises.

Might be a good idea to have as many of them in custody as possible before they go live with this, rather than hit them all at once…

Jarvis appears to have already had that thought, because he nods to the men, and James, and they head off.

“Off to stock up my holding cells?”

“That’s the idea. Manedel and York both live in town. They’re going to grab them first. Quietly. In, out, and done, no witnesses, no sound. Then back here.”

“More guys coming in?”

“Yeah. I’ve got six of my own teams coming in, and two of James’ will be here before the sun rises. More across the country, moving into place for other targets. You’ve got holding cells in every NCIS building, right?”

“Yeah.”

“I think we’re going to be using a lot of them. We’re going to grab as many as we can, because when we go live with this, the ones we don’t have are going to get lynched.” Jarvis looks out at the cybercrime office, and Leon doesn’t think he’s speaking metaphorically.

“How much money do we have here, right now?” Jarvis asks Vance.

Vance shrugs. “I’ve got a thousand on me.” He’d grabbed that for him, and made sure the rest of his money went with Lara and the kids. The entire reason he didn’t get in the same time as Tony was he took a few minutes to get his money out of the country, and make sure they could access it. The grand in his pocket is his emergency stash.

“No. I mean in evidence. The banks will not open for at least a few days after this happens. And if the electricity goes, credit cards are worthless. Short term: is there cash on hand to keep your people afloat? If we have people sheltering here, for days, maybe longer, do we have the money to feed them? Longer term, who knows if Treasury is going to keep paying the bills.”

“Yeah. Not for too long, but…” He thinks they’ve got about two million dollars in cash on hand. Yesterday, when they didn’t need it, that was tons of money. Today, if he’s got to keep the thousand people who work here and their families fed for any real length of time, let alone make payroll with it, it’s not nearly enough.

“How about food and water?”
“I doubt anyone is going to lay siege to us, here, Clayton.”

“Grocery stores might not open tomorrow, either. Even if they do, it’s entirely possible we might end up under siege. The President probably will. How many pissed-off parents of men and women who have died in our service are going to respond well to hearing that the man who ordered them to Afghanistan or wherever, wasn’t really elected? And God help Bush, he’s way out in Texas with just him and a few Secret Servicemen.”

“You want to tip him off?” Leon doesn’t love Bush, but that doesn’t mean he wants to see the man, or more importantly his Secret Service detail, murdered.

“If we do it directly, he will let the others know we’re about to move on him.”

“One of the wonder kids can probably figure out how to pull an untraceable bomb threat. Maybe an hour before we go live? Hopefully that’ll get his security up enough they don’t manage to outright murder him.”

Clayton nods. “Good idea. It’s going to be open season on senators and congressmen. I honestly don’t know if the President will resign, or if he’ll gather everyone loyal to him and proclaim himself ruler of the US for life. Tomorrow we might be under martial law, we might be in the middle of a war zone, or everyone might yawn and decide to fight it out in court. I don’t know, but I’m giving long odds on fighting it out in court.”

Leon doesn’t think that’s likely, either. Not in the short term, at least. Longer term… Sure, nothing DC likes better than long and twisted legal cases. Though, now he’s wondering how many of those cases were for show, a way to make people think they had power, without having to actually give them power.

Another thought hits Leon, more related to making sure he’s got enough food for everyone. “Your teams, they’re not leaving here after, are they?”

“They can. I won’t say anything if they’ve got families they want to go to, but they aren’t reporting back to their units. They’re going home or staying with us. As many of them as I can get. The states all have a National Guard they can call out if the going gets rough. We’re in DC…”

“On our own.” They’re in the only spot in the US that is entirely under Federal control. There’s no State government here to offer redundancy, no National Guard or State Troopers to keep order, no state treasury to pay the bills if the Feds won’t. “Schools won’t open tomorrow, either.”

“First responders won’t be getting paid. No money going to the hospitals. It’s going to be a mess. So, yes, if they’ll take orders from me, I’m pulling them in. Hope to have at least 200 of them here by the time we go live. Thinking about how to give Metro a heads up, get SWAT ready, without tipping our hand. Your bomb threat idea might work. Get it called in as soon as our press conference goes lives.”

Leon nods at that, too. “Where’s your family, Clayt?”

“Not here.” He doesn’t know where they are, and that’s intentional. “Yours?”

“The same. I’m going to make some calls,” Leon says.

“Everyone you know who can shoot and will uphold some sort of law here if everyone riots?”

“Yeah.”
Jake Malloy has never, ever felt so useless. His wife is off getting ready to go storm the DEA and kidnap… arrest, right now, while they’re still doing warrants and the like, it’s an arrest, their Director. Everyone around him is studying something, looking something up, though with the girls (one of whom he suspects might not be old enough to even work a full-time job, and definitely should not have been waxing poetic on a cocktail of Stoli Vanil, Rum Chata, and whipped cream with cinnamon and a maraschino cherry on top) doing their computer magic, the thing he had been doing, that was useful, looking up names and accounts, has now been outsourced to a machine.

He’s basically staring at a computer screen, trying to look vaguely useful, and not doing much of anything.

DiNozzo seems to notice that. “You need a job.”

“Yeah, otherwise, I’m…” Jake shakes his head. He can’t… won’t think about what comes next. Because if he does, he’s going to grab Ellie, and run, all the way back to Oklahoma. Jake’s always been long on brains, pure, balls in charge, physical courage, not so much.

“I’ve got two of them. Take your pick. Tell me who takes over if the entire cabinet and all of congress gets knocked out of the running, or go wake up Koskinigen and make him tell you who he hired to kill Diane.”

Jake doesn’t have a legal answer to the first one, though he does have a realistic one. “Traditionally, when the elected government falls, the guy with the most guns takes over.” He’s feeling horrified and bitter as he says that, wondering who precisely that might be. One of the generals probably.

Of course, he also can’t think of a historical example where the guys taking down the “elected” government weren’t trying to step in and take over for themselves. He’s watching Jarvis, men coming in and out, and wonders. He looks like the kind of guy with guns at his disposal, maybe he’s the kind of guy who takes over when the “elected” officials fall.

Tony watches Jake’s gaze, sees who he’s looking at and says, “Not enough guns.”

Jake shrugs.

Tony nods. “Okay, Sunshine, get ready to question Koskinigen.”

They had spent a few hours prepping for that, last night. But Koskinigen’s computer had been badly damaged and they were playing catch up, getting bits and pieces of data as the techs downstairs got a drive here or there working.

“How?” Jake asks. His job was to listen to answers and give Tony points on where things were going wrong.

“They taught you how to ask questions in law school. Have at it.”

“Without his lawyer, it’ll…” He’s about to say, never stand up in court, but it hits him that Koskinigen may never get to a courtroom.

Tony nods. “Don’t go into any of the election stuff. We’ll keep that nice and clean and pristine, on the off chance we actually get to prosecute that at some point. Go after the attempted murder. Feel free to do whatever you need to to get it out of him.”

Jake raises an eyebrow at Tony. “Whatever?”

“He’s sixty-eight and has a bad heart. Don’t leave any marks.” Jake looks very disturbed. “And make sure he’s still alive when you’re done. Otherwise, feel free to use every aggressive cross-examination technique you can muster on him. At NCIS, we don’t take kindly to the attempted murder of our agents, and on my team, we’re especially touchy about attempting to kill little girls.”

Jake nods, stands up, and realizes he has no idea where to go. Up, going up. Ellie’s up, and can probably spare him a minute to help him get this set.

The sun’s coming up as Gibbs and Abbi have wrapped the attack plan for Dunerson.

As they’re getting geared up, Gibbs’ is thinking about how much he’d really like a cup of coffee right now. A big, deep, black as sin one. Bacon, eggs, and home fries to go with that coffee would be heaven. And he knows who cooks in heaven, and who else has to get out of town, as soon as possible. He drifts off to make one more call.

“Callin’ early, Hon?” Elaine answers.

“Yeah. Big order for you, and… and a request.”

“You’re sounding tense. What sort of request makes you sound like that?”

“Bad one. Things are about to go really bad. Tonight… Can’t give you details, but tonight’s not going to be a good night to be in the city.”

“Some poor Black kid get shot by a cop when he wasn’t doing anything wrong?”

“Worse.”

Elaine can feel how close to the surface all of the scared Gibbs is trying to keep down is, and she’s feeling it now, too. “How much worse?”

Gibbs wracks his brain, and then he remembers. “Were you in DC in ’68?”

He can feel Elaine nod. Anyone who was a native of the city remembers the almost week of race riots after Dr. King was assassinated.

“Get out of the city. Make sure the premium on your business insurance is paid, and get out.”

He hears a hand muffling the mouthpiece, and can feel her talking to her husband.

A minute later she says, “Can’t do it, Jethro. Would like to, but… This building goes, and that’s everything we have.”

“Elaine!”

“Business insurance doesn’t cover riots! That’s what you’re talking about, right?”
“Yeah.”

“We’ve gotta stay and protect what’s ours. Our apartment, they can burn that to the ground and we’re covered, but not the diner. That goes up, and we’re sunk. Now what’s that order of yours?”

Gibbs knows when a woman is not going to change her mind, and he knows Elaine is there. He also knows that he can try to protect them as much as he can. “Okay. Big order. Everything you’ve got in the place you don’t want to hold on for yourselves, cook it up, and have your kids bring it to the Navy Yard. Stuff to eat now. Stuff to heat up and eat later. Raw ingredients if you don’t have time to cook them. We’re going to have a lot of people in and out of here, and they’re going to want to eat.”

Elaine understands what he’s saying to her. What he’s offering. “Sasha, Allie, and Kenzie, yeah, they can bring it in, serve it up?”

“Yeah, your sons, too, if you want, for as long as we’ve got all those people here.”

“James and Danny got to stay here with us. Danny’s got a girl he’s sweet on; she might decide to help with the order.”

“Okay.” That makes sense to Gibbs, her “boys” are big men, the younger of the two is twenty-two or three, something like that, the older is twenty-five and was a Ranger until he ripped up his knee in Afghanistan. Like their father, they’re big, strong, quiet men. “Send your sons along on the first delivery. We’ll have some things for them, help keep your business safe.” He knows Elaine’s husband has a shot gun in the kitchen, and there’s a pistol under the counter. By the time they boys have picked up what he’s going to pack for them, they won’t be in danger of being outgunned. “And when this is all done, we’ll send the girls home with payment.”

“Good.” Elaine sounds very serious as she says that. But she knows just as well as Gibbs does that leaving that money inside the building with the armed Marines is a good plan, and worst comes to worst, having a pile of cash to rebuild with after… She hopes it doesn’t come to that. “We’ll get cooking and have that over to you as soon as we can.”

“Anytime before six tonight is good. Can’t be after six. After six…”

“All right. We’ll get the first batch over soon, and keep going from there.”

“Okay. You guys change your mind and…”

“Jethro.”

“I know. Stay safe.”

“You, too. I wanna see those big blue eyes at my counter to get coffee again, soon.”

“Amen on that.” While he’s hanging up, Jethro decides to make one more call. It’s probably a step too far on the keep-things-quiet front, but the Todd family’s already seen too much sorrow. He didn’t save one of their daughters, maybe he can save the other.

“Jethro?” Rachel’s voice is sleepy and confused.

“Hi, Rachel. I’m going to tell you something, quickly, and I want you to pay attention.”

“Okay. You’re sounding very grim.”

“Yeah, with good reason. Get your husband and kids and get out of the city. Better yet, get out of the country. But at the very least put a few hours between you and anywhere with a lot of people.”

He can feel the look Rachel is giving him, the one that knows he’s serious, but isn’t sure what to do with it nonetheless.

“Do I get to ask why?”

“We still have doctor patient confidentiality, right?”

“Sure. Anything you tell me doesn’t go anywhere else, unless you’re about to hurt yourself or someone else.”

“I’ve got intel that the last twelve years of Federal Elections were sold to the highest bidder. We’re going live with it today.”

“Shit.”

He’s never heard Rachel curse before, not like that, not to curse, and it’s shocking. He’s quiet for a second, stunned, and then says, “Yeah. Neck deep. We’re getting everyone who’s family out, and…”

“Thank you for thinking of me.”

“I’ve got to go start making some arrests. You want to get your extended family, your brothers out, fine, but you can’t tell them why.”

“I understand. You think DC will get… bad?”

“I hope not, but I’m not banking on hope.”

“Okay. Thank you.”

Gibbs says, “Give me a call when it’s over, let me know you made it through okay.”

“I can do that. Or you call me.”

“No problem.”

“So, I guess the six billion dollar question is, who are these guys?” Tony asks, pointing to the accounts other than the one from the US, that were buying the elections.

“The guys we have to grab before our families can come home,” Diane replies.

Tony nods. “So…”

She’s tapping the lines on her laptop screen. “This account looks like it’s from China. This one is from a bank out of Saudi Arabia. This one’s in the Caymans, and that last one is out of Switzerland. As for who runs them…” Diane lets that trail off. Like the US account, these accounts represent a collection of people, not just one lone guy with too much money and an interest in US politics.

“You can take six weeks and run the numbers and shell corporations and what not, or try McGee’s trick, empty them, and see who starts calling the banks?"

“I'll empty, you get the records?”

“Sounds like a plan.”

A minute later, Diane says, “If they’re outside the US, how are we going to grab them?”

“We’re going to hope that Jarvis really does know everyone.”

In the event of civil unrest, you and your families are welcome to take shelter in any NCIS office in the country. Should the Treasury stop paying our bills, make sure all money in evidence has been thoroughly recorded (photographed) and then use it. Petty cash survival expenditures get paid first. Wages next. Until we know for sure that Treasury will continue to pay us, only survival expenditures (food, shelter, utilities) and wages will be paid out. Vendors will have to wait. Make sure to record who gets what.

Leon stares at the letter he’s drafting for each of his outposts. He’s got teams located all over the world, and while he’s not too worried about the ones outside of the US, he needs to have some official policy in place for the ones inside the US.

He figures that around 16:30, he’s going to give word to everyone who works in the building about what’s about to happen. That way the ones who want to get out of DC can get out, and the ones who want to grab what they need from home and come here, will have time to do it.

He’d like to send that out wider, but he’s worried about being able to keep control of the message.

Of course, if he tells the people in his own building about it, they’ll tell their friends.

17:30. That’s time to get people out who want to leave, and a little time to get people in who want to come. The press conference will take time, and there’ll be some lag between him saying the words, and people starting to react. It’ll probably be close to 19:00 before everything starts to erupt.

He spits out the tiny nub of a toothpick, and grabs a new one. He hasn’t written up what he’s going to say at this news conference and he needs to do that. Hasn’t called the various news outlets, and he’s got to do that, too.

Abbi’s in the CGIS van. Gibbs is in the NCIS van. They each have a team. As they pull into a quiet, pre-dawn dark suburban neighborhood, there are scores of media vans.

Once Draga hits the brake on the van, parking, Gibbs nods to him. He and Bishop hop out, and begin setting up a perimeter. Gibbs gets out, and starts barking orders at the reporters, demanding they move back.

He makes sure they all get pictures of him looking tense and glaring at everyone, answering all questions with, “Press Conference, 6:00 pm, Navy Yard, everything gets explained then. Now move your ass back!

A lot of the press seem to like Bishop. Which makes sense to him, she’s cute and young and blonde. Extremely photogenic. They keep yelling questions at her. “Weren’t you supposed to be here at 11:30?” “Can you tell us who was being bribed?” “Why is NCIS and CGIS working this case?”

One of the more aggressive ones yells out, “Can you comment on rumors about your boss sleeping with the head of CGIS? Is that why this is a joint investigation?”

Gibbs comes down on that one like a load of bricks, getting right into her face and verbally abusing her until she backs up behind the line. (He wouldn’t admit it, but he enjoyed that. It helped to blow off some of the tension that’s building inside him right now.)

Draga notices that Dunerson and his lawyer keep peeking out the curtains at the front of the house.

A minute later, once they’ve got the perimeter secured, Abbi and her van pull up. She and her team hop out. She’s walking tall, in the middle, holding a warrant, on both sides she’s flanked. The two men of her team on the right, Gibbs and his team on the left.

Abbi doesn’t have to pound on the door. The lawyer opens it. He nods at Abbi. “Do we really have to have the press circus?”

She smiles slightly, and then says, quietly, so the media can’t here, “Gil Dunerson, you are under arrest for money laundering and election tampering.” Both Gil and his lawyer look stunned by that. The lawyer’s eyes go wide as he demands the warrant, scanning it over, as Gibbs and Omagi turn Dunerson around, cuffing his hands behind his back.

She then produces a new warrant. “Mr. Verger?” The lawyer nods, slowly. “You are also under arrest for election tampering and money laundering, please place your hands behind your back.”

He starts to sputter that this can’t be true. Gibbs and Omagi turn him, a bit more roughly than necessary, but they get him turned, and Abbi cuffs him.

“Draga, Bishop, Saunders, you’re on evidence. Bring me everything.”

They nod, and head inside. Gibbs, Borin, and Omagi herd Dunerson and Verger into the CGIS van, through the crowd of extremely excited press, arresting the lawyer set them off into an absolute tizzy. Questions pelt them as they move, and Gibbs and Borin keep telling them about the press conference at NCIS tonight as they move through, and take off.

Tim wakes to the sound of rustling bean bag chairs. He blinks a few times, feeling groggy and upside down, and sees Diane pulling two of the chairs together.

He rubs his eyes, and slowly sits up. “You can have the sofa, if you want.”

She nods at that, sitting down on the segment he just moved off of.

“Feel like a snuggle?” she says, dry and a bit sarcastic. Her walls are in place to make her look less vulnerable, but the need for contact, someone real to hold onto as the storm gathers on the horizon, is
He snorts a bit, smiles a little, and wraps an arm around her, resting his head on her shoulder for a moment. He feels her relax under his arm, and feels himself relax a hair, too. She squeezes his hand, and nods at him. He lets go of her and stands up, then drapes the blanket over her.

“Pleasant dreams.”

She laughs at that, caustic.

“Yeah, I know.” He rubs his eyes again. His own dreams had been jumbled and unsettling. Searching for the thing that can’t be found, and not having the thing the people around him need.

He shrugs at that as he gets himself a cup of decaf. Not too far from his waking life.

He looks over at the conference table, and sees the girls are working with Tony on something. So he drifts over to find out what. What, it turns out, is what he would have done if he’d been a bit less concerned with the big question, and a tad more rested.

Still… He shakes his head. Time to get them out. “Brand,” she looks up at him.

“Yeah?”

“Your apartment’s in the city, right?”

She nods. “Yeah, three blocks from American.”

“Okay, right now, you have two options. Option one, I will buy you a ticket on the next plane out, for you to go home to your parents in New Mexico. Option two, you can go home, grab your gun and whatever you don’t want to live without, and come back here. Things are going fall apart soon, and I don’t want you by yourself in your apartment.”

She just stares at him.

He shifts attention to the tech next to her. “Ngyn, you live outside of the city, right?”

She nods, too.

“Far enough, right?”

“Hour and a half commute.”

“Good. Slightly modified options. You can go home, grab what you want, and stay here, or you can go home. If you want a gun or two from the armory, I’ll sign them out for you.” He looks at both of them. “I’ll add one other bit to this, if you look around, you will notice my wife is not in the building. She and our child is also not in the city, or near the city. It would make me rest easier if both of you decided to get out of DC and stay out of DC. There’s nothing coming up you can’t remote in to do.”

Brand looks around, and then says, “Can Ngyn and Howard come with me? She lives in the city, too, and…”

“Give her a call. You want to go with Brand, Ngyn?” She nods. “I’ll get you tickets.” To Brand he says, “If you have time, get your parents and get into Mexico. There’s an NCIS outpost in Mexico City, and another one in Baja. Either of them will host you if need be.”

Both girls nod. “Okay, go, get packed. Call Howard. I’ll text you with ticket details. I’ll get you home before we go live. And, I’m sure I don’t have to stress this, but with the exception of Howard, you cannot tell anyone why you are going.”

“On it, Boss,” Ngyn says it, and Tim smiles at her. He gives both of them quick hugs, and watches them leave.

As they head out, another thought hits Tim, so he acts on it. Or tries to, Jarvis and a collection of very big guys who appear to be some sort of military, are located in his office, so he grabs one of the currently empty computers and gets to work.

Booking tickets takes a few minutes, sending Brand a text takes a minute more, and then he gets writing.

Half an hour later, he shows this to Leon:

Dear NCIS Staffers:

As of 07:15 this morning, NCIS has been informed that we are required to engage in a Metro DC Urban Chaos Emergency Readiness Drill.

What this entails is that all NCIS Staffers must write up, and then execute, a plan for what to do should a major riot/terror attack resulting in a week of ‘urban chaos’ occur in DC.

To help in this endeavor, should any member of staff feel more comfortable with a ‘shelter in place at the Navy Yard’ plan, you and your family should come to NCIS, with gear for a week, by six o’clock tonight. Everyone who is more comfortable within our walls is welcome. You are not required to come to NCIS, and if you have an emergency plan that involves getting out of the city, go ahead and do it.

Should your emergency readiness plan involve not sheltering at the Navy Yard, you must write up, and execute your plan for how to ride out an extended (at least one week) period of ‘urban chaos.’

By four o’clock all members of the DC NCIS staff will have to have on file, and be in the process of executing, their emergency plan.

Bear in mind, an effective readiness plan will involve all aspects of your life. It will make sure your finances are secure, you and your family have enough of whatever they need on a daily basis (food and medications, for example) to last through the week. Do not forget trivial things, like diapers or toothpaste. Imagine you are trapped in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina; what do you need to survive? If you need to buy things to make sure you have what you need to make it through a week of ‘urban chaos,’ keep the receipts, and you will be reimbursed.

In order to facilitate this, all DC staff members are excused from work immediately upon getting this email.

With any luck this exercise will go smoothly and be rapidly finished.

Thank you for your compliance,

Tim McGee Director of Cybercrime

Leon Vance Director of NCIS.
Vance nods at that. “One modification, can’t send it to the security teams.”

Tim nods at that. “Right. Can’t have them leaving their posts. Okay. I’ll modify it.”

“Then start making the rounds, I want you to talk to our security people. Everyone who’s in today, all of them who aren’t. By six o’clock, I want them, and if they want, their families, here. From 16:30 on, we’re going to double security.”

“I can do that.”

“Good.” Leon glances at the email and sends copies of it to Borin and Jarvis. That’s a solution for how to get their own people as safe as possible without a massive tip off. He glances up at McGee. “Can you make a version of this that looks official to send to the FBI, NSA, DC Metro, and the like?”

“If you want, I can invent, whole-cloth, a DC Urban Chaos Initiative, make up a website for it, and send out the most official looking letter you’ve ever seen to the heads of every agency in the greater DC area. I can’t do that and talk to all of our security people.”

Leon nods at that. “Do it. I’ll make the rounds. CGIS wasn’t the only Federal Building that was hardened to withstand an outside attack. The IRS might be dirty as hell, but that doesn’t mean we want those people’s families getting slaughtered in riots. Let’s get as many of them out of the city, or into a safe building, as we can get.”

“No problem.” Tim stands up, and heads into his office. Doesn’t matter if Jarvis is using it for his central command, Tim’s not about to do this sort of work on a borrowed laptop.

---

Cross examine the hostile witness. _No problem, you’ve done this… six times._ Jake, sighs, bitterly. Once upon a time, he thought he’d be a trial lawyer, and in law school he’d certainly enjoyed that aspect of it, but he hasn’t had to actually question anyone, about anything, in more than ten years.

For the last twenty minutes, he’s been standing in observation, staring at John Koskinigen. Koskinigen is not a happy camper. He’s fidgeting, looking nervous, and if the black circles under his eyes are anything to go by, he hasn’t slept well.

Well, that’s two of them. Jake was sleeping fine, excited about getting to be part of this investigation, dreaming righteous dreams, and then he got the 1:00 AM wake up call, and a bit later the news that the world was just about to fall apart, and now he’s in observation, all on his own, trying to figure out what the hell he’s supposed to be doing.

He knows what he’s doing. He’s got a very specific job. Who did Koskinigen hire to kill Diane? Find that out.

He just doesn’t know how.

Ellie had kissed him and said, “Don’t worry, it’s easy. Just get in there and start asking.” He rolls his eyes a bit at that memory. Ellie’s always been better at just winging things. She can hop on in and roll with the punches. He has to _plan_. In this, they occasionally get on each other’s nerves, but when they’re working together they get to play to each other’s strengths, and can handle just about anything.

But they aren’t together.

Jake looks at the clock. Half an hour. Koskinigen is pacing now.

He fantasizes a bit about trying to go in there all rough and growly, try to scare him into talking, and that just doesn’t work. The people who find Jake intimidating are the people who fear lawsuits. The people who don’t want to spend years in minute litigation and tons of red tape.

And while it’s true that might bother Koskinigen, he doesn’t think the Director of the IRS is about to wet his pants at the idea of being nibbled to death by FOIA violations, let alone admit to planning a murder to avoid it.

Forty minutes. Get moving. This is information they need, so go get it for them. Jake straightens his shoulders, takes a deep breath, and walks into interrogation.

Koskinigen’s eyes snap to him as soon as he’s in there. “Thank God! What’d they do, walk over to Harriman’s and ask for you in person?”

“Excuse me?”

“I’ve been here since yesterday. I asked for counsel almost eighteen hours ago. What took you so long?”

This would be the moment when it occurs to Jake that he does not look like a cop. He’s in a suit. A nice suit, with good shoes. He’s wearing glasses. He has a very nice pen tucked into his breast pocket. He doesn’t have a badge or gun. His hands are soft and un-calloused, much more accustomed to the use of a computer than a gun. He looks exactly like what he is, a lawyer.

He says a quick mental thank you to God, and smiles wide and bright. “Mr. Koskinigen, I’m sorry it took me so long to get here. It’s been less than an hour since I was told to come speak with you. My name is Jake Malloy; let’s start at the beginning… What have they told you they’re holding you for?”

“Some bullshit about attempting to kill someone.” Koskinigen’s lip curls in derision at the idea that someone might think he’d be behind a murder.

Jake runs with that. “That seems… unbelievable. You’re the head of the IRS not a mafia family; why would you attempt to have someone killed? Who do they think you tried to murder?”

Koskinigen looks ready to spit. “Little bitch named Diane Anderson.”

“Is she a Marine or sailor?”

“No. An auditor for the IRS.”

Jake does a good job of looking puzzled. “Doesn’t the N stand for Navy? Why are you here?”

“More bullshit. Some asshole tried to run her, her daughter, and her boyfriend, who does work here, off the road, and they’re trying to pin it on me.”

“Sounds very shaky. Are they just trying to embarrass you? Why not the driver?”

“How should I know? Anderson probably told them I’m out to get her.”
Jake’s actually starting to enjoy this. “Why would she do that?”

Koskinigen’s eyes narrow. “You’d have to ask her. One day everything is normal, next day she’s quit, a few weeks later, I’m here.”

“Mr. Koskinigen, I am here for you,” Jake says in a soothing voice, “and I can’t do my job if I don’t get the whole story. What you’re telling me right now, seems…” he looks for a delicate way to put it, “edited. If you really know so little of her, then you wouldn’t know she’s part of the problem. A good interrogator would have jumped all over that and strangled you with it. So, as you know, all communications between a lawyer and his client are privileged, so please, start over, tell me what’s really going on, otherwise, I won’t know how to answer the questions they are going to ask you to keep them away from what you don’t want them to know.” Jake thinks that does a good job of staying on the side of absolutely true while being completely misleading.

Koskinigen eyes Jake. “How long you been at Harrison’s?”

Jake doesn’t blink, and hopes this is the right answer to what Koskinigen really wants. “The job of a defense lawyer is to defend. Guilt and innocence do not matter. The job is to provide anyone, no matter what they’ve done, the best possible defense. A defense lawyer can’t do that if he gets caught in a situation where the prosecution, or the police, have information he doesn’t. Now, sir, tell me what’s happening, because until I know the whole story, I can’t do my job.”

“And you can’t tell anyone else what I tell you?”

Jake smiles, answering with extremely precise language. “Any communications between a lawyer and his client about something that has happened in the past, are privileged. So, should you tell your lawyer that you are planning a murder, or ask him for help in doing something illegal, he would, as an officer of the court, have to do something about that. If you tell your lawyer you planned a murder, that’s between you and him, and he cannot say anything about it to anyone without your express permission.”

Koskinigen nods. “Okay. There’s a bank account. It… you don’t need to know.”

“Are you sure? I wouldn’t want to end up blindsided when they ask you something about why Ms. Anderson was the target. I can’t tell you how to answer their questions if I don’t know what you’re trying to hide.”

Koskinigen takes off his glasses and rubs his temples. “It’s a national security issue. The money that does the stuff the rest of the country isn’t supposed to know about. Protecting it is my job. Anyone at the IRS looks at it, and I get an immediate note about it.”

“And Ms. Anderson looked at it?”

“Yeah. I don’t know how she even knew it existed. She was a mid-level auditor looking into business tax fraud. And then suddenly, her computer’s sending off the alarm. She’s got four accounts she shouldn’t have. I get them from her and call Miressa.”

“Who is Miressa?”

Koskinigen shrugs. “I don’t know. She asked me to call her Miressa. First name? Last? Made up? I don’t know or care.”

“Have you met her in person?”

“Once. She’s about my age. East German accent. Back in the day she was probably Stasi, or something like that. I don’t know what she does now.” He thinks about that. “She takes care of problems, now, that’s what she does.”

“All right. And what did you tell her?”

“That Anderson had the accounts and was looking into them. I gave her Anderson’s home address, phone number, and the rest of it.”

“Then what happens?”

“I don’t know. That’s where my involvement ends. There’s ten of those accounts, and my job is to make sure no one gets into them. If someone does, I call Miressa. That’s it.”

“All right. Who introduced you to Miressa?”

“Eli Jakobson. My predecessor. He’s the one who explained how there were certain accounts and we protect them, because they make sure things continue to work the way they’re supposed to.”

“Have you ever called Miressa before?”

“Six times.”

“And, do you know what happened the other six times?”

Koskinigen nods. “Four are dead, one vanished, and one I was told to promote.”

“All right. Did you hear from Miressa again?”

“No.” Jake sees the flicker in Koskinigen’s eyes, and he’s got the sense he’s lying.

“Does anyone else know about these accounts?”

“Depends on the account.”

“The one Ms. Anderson was looking at?”

“Yeah, a few people.”

“Who?”

“It’s not important.”

Jake remembers Tony telling him to stay off the election information, so he backs off on that.

“What phone did you use to call Miressa from?”

“Personal cell.”

“All right. Just one call that day out of many?”

“Yeah, probably made fifty calls that day.”

“Excellent. I’m going to go let them know that we’ve talked, and they can come in and ask questions now. I’ll be back.”

Koskinigen nods at him, looking nervous, but relieved.
Sam Allan couldn’t explain why he’s feeling nervous this morning. He just is. He woke up at 5:00 in a cold sweat and hasn’t been able to shake the feeling that something’s about to go wrong.

And it’s not getting any better when he notices that there many fewer cars in the parking lot than there should be.

It gets worse when he gets into the morgue, and he’s alone. Dr. Palmer doesn’t always beat him in, in fact about half of the time Allan gets in first, but today he would have appreciated coming in and finding the lights on and Palmer sitting in front of the computer getting ready for the day.

But, he’s not there.

So, Allan turns on the lights and the computer, and he’s just about logged into his email when he hears the doors sweep open.

“Good morning, Dr. Palmer,” he says as he sees an email that looks interesting. Something about an “Urban Chaos Preparedness Exercise.”

“Alas, Dr. Palmer is out for the next few mornings.” The soft Scottish brogue rolls across the Morgue, and Allan looks away from the computer to Ducky.

“Is he okay?” He wonders if something happened to Dr. Palmer. He’s found that he’ll often get nervous when bad things happen to people he’s close to, and while his relationship with Dr. Palmer isn’t exactly an intimate friendship, he does spend ten hours a day with the man.

“He should be fine. I see we have no clients today?” Ducky’s looking around, noting that none of the doors are open, and that Allan is logging into his email.

“Not today. Not yet. I was just about to read my email. Yesterday we were helping with the case upstairs, and I was thinking of offering my help again.”

Ducky nods at that. “I think that would be an excellent plan. What help did you offer last night?”

“Looking up car accidents. Has Dr. Palmer been telling you about this case? I know you two are close.”

“I’ve been keep in the loop, so to speak. Self-driving car, IRS conspiracies…”

“Drug cartels using anti-drug charities to launder money. I don’t know if that’s brilliant or insane.”

“Dr. Allan?” Ducky’s interested at the dichotomy Dr. Allan is seeing with this.

“Brilliant, because who would expect it, and if it comes out they’re working together, it’ll discredit the people trying to keep their products illegal. Insane because… How do you even start up that conversation? ‘Hello, Partnership for a Drug Free Tomorrow, I was wondering, could we use you to funnel piles of drug money into the US electorate!’”

Ducky nods at that, liking the way Allan is thinking. “I would imagine, that instead of a cold opening along those lines, that said charities were built for the purpose of laundering that money.”

“Oh,” Allan nods. “Yeah. That makes a lot of sense. Let me get through the emails, and then we can go up and see what help we can offer today.”

“Excellent, Dr. Allan.” Ducky hangs up his coat. If Allan were paying attention, he’d notice that it’s a bit warmer than necessary for the weather. Likewise, if he was paying attention to Ducky, he’d notice that he’s got more than a standard ‘go bag’ with him. In fact, what he’s carrying is much closer to a suitcase, than a backpack with a change of clothing and overnight toiletries.

But he’s not. He’s checking his email. A minute later, after Allan’s done reading the ‘Urban Chaos Preparedness’ email, he says to Ducky, “Dr. Mallard, you didn’t say where Dr. Palmer is.”

“No. I did not.”

“Uh huh. And, would his not being here have something to do with this?”

Ducky comes over and reads the email. Even before he sees the name on it, he can feel Tim’s hands all over that document. “Ah.”

“Yes. What’s going on?”

Ducky’s pleased to see that Allan is able to put the dots on this case together and draw an appropriate conclusion. “The case you were helping with yesterday has now been broken open. Sometime today, Leon is going to tell the world what has been found. It is likely to cause more than a mild disturbance. We are getting ready for it.”

“And Jimmy?”

“Rule 44, Dr. Allan, hide the women and children first. That rule presupposes that there will be someone assisting with the hiding, and providing protection should said hiding place be found.”

“He and his family have left?”

“Yes, with Director McGee’s family, as well. Ziva has taken Director Vance’s family, as well as Ms. Anderson’s daughter.”

Allan nods at that, wondering, at first, what this case opened to reveal. Then another thought hits. “And, am I supposed to hide, or stay here?”

“If you want to hide, I will understand. Being in the middle of a riot is not a pleasant experience. If you have someone you want to get out of town with to protect, I will applaud that decision. But, if it is just you, and if you are willing to stay here, and offer to use that medical degree you have to help the people who will be hurt in the days to come, I’d appreciate the help.”

Allan looks Ducky over. He sees a small man, one who is deeply calm, and as he looks he sees the sorrow in his eyes, the tiredness at the idea of having to go through something like this. He sees resolve to do his job and do it well. And he sees an old man. He sees a man who is in very good shape for his age, but that age is old, and he knows why Dr. Mallard is no longer the ME. He doesn’t have the eyes for the fine detail work any longer.

He nods at Dr. Mallard. “Give me a few hours to pack up my own things and get them back here. While I’m gone, make up an inventory of what we have, and set up a shopping list. If we’re going to be running an infirmary, we should be stocked for it.”

Ducky smiles at him. “Good choice, Dr. Allan.”
Penny had kissed Ducky when he left the elevator for Autopsy, and pressed the button for the basement.

When she gets down there, she sees Diane napping on the sofa, Tony at the conference table, working on something. Leon is pacing around, phone in hand, talking to someone.

Jarvis, she sees through the glass of Tim’s office, he’s got a phone between his shoulder and ear, and appears to be having two conversations, one with the people in front of him, SEALs if she had to guess, they’ve got the posture of Marines, but look more dangerous, and one with whomever is on the other side of the phone.

Behind Jarvis, at his computer, earbuds in place, and paying no attention to what’s going on in front of him, Tim is working on something.

The last time she was somewhere that felt like this, it was the Officer’s Club in Pearl Harbor on April 28th 1975. They knew the evacuation of Saigon was about to begin. The men on the ground… didn’t. Not yet. Everyone in the club knew it was going to be a disaster. They had to do it too fast, without enough resources, and people were going to get left behind and die.

They were angry. Angry to be put into the position of having to do it. Angry that the promises they made weren’t going to get kept. Angry at lives wasted. Angry at having to pick and choose who would get out, and who would face the mob.

And they were scared.

And this basement, which is fairly empty right now, has that same feel.

And there’s nothing she can do but go through it.

She strides over to the table, looks at Leon and Tony, and says, “How can I help?”

Leon looks up. “Dr. Langston, I’ve been told that you know everyone.”

“Just about.”

“Everyone is who I want at the press conference tonight, where we go live with this.” He pushes over a cell phone. “Six o’clock tonight. Free food and drink. Media people like that, right?”

She nods. “Free booze does tend to attract reporters.”

“Invite them. As many as you can, from every news agency that will send a crew.”

Penny nods. “I can do that.”

Not enough men. Jarvis’s using four men teams to grab the people on the list, and so far, that’s moving smoothly, but if he wants to put a dent on this list, he needs more men out, moving faster.

But he doesn’t have more men. He needs to do this with two men teams.
And then, he needs somewhere to put these people.

Leon’s calling his off-duty security people. He’s not talking right now, so probably listening to a phone ringing.

“How many people do you have room for in holding?” Clayton asks, stepping out of McGee’s office.

“We’re built for fifteen, can hold twenty if we absolutely need to, and maybe twenty-five if it’s not for long,” As he’s answering that, Leon he can feel the problem. “How many on the list?”

“Two hundred and sixteen more to go. One hundred and three of which are in the DC area, and every hour, we’re getting more names than we’re checking off.”

Leon looks around, imaging what the Navy Yard is going to look like once he’s got families stuffed in here. Readiness plans are starting to come in in response to McGee’s email, and it looks like he’s going to have at least four hundred civilians in here, in addition to his own staff.

“How many have your guys brought in?” Leon asks.

“Nine, so far.”

Leon glances at the clock, it’s a bit before ten. “At this speed, I don’t have to worry too much about where to stuff them.”

“I’m going to speed that up, but we need somewhere to put them.”

“Give Borin a call, she’s got holding cells, too.”

“Not that many,” Jarvis says.

“Nope, but she’s also low on staff, so she’s not planning on turning her building into a refugee center.”

Tony’s been listening to this, as he continues to hunt down who else was paying into the election buying account. “You want to speed things up?”

Jarvis nods.

“Most of these guys are lobbyists or money men. They’re not ‘criminals.’ You probably don’t have to swoop in with the Special Forces guys. Get two of your guys, put them in NCIS armored vests, and give them badges, have one of them carry another vest, they go over to whoever it is, say, ‘Mr. Soulsucking Money Grubber, we’ve received word of a credible threat on your life, we need you to put this on, right now,’ hand over the vest, ‘and get you to safety. You need to come up with us.’ Most of them should happily sprint out of wherever they are to go with you.”

Jarvis looks at Leon, they both look at Tony, and nod. Next thing Tony knows, Jarvis is on the phone.

“Yeah, Clayt, we’ve got…” Abbi thinks. “Room for thirteen more in holding, and I’ve got a basement that used to be full of files and evidence, and right now, it’s completely empty. It’d even work with DiNozzo’s security ruse, no windows, underground. It’s not particularly comfy, but…”

“Neither of us care,” Jarvis says. People who are going to upset his apple cart, pull him out of the job he had to claw his way into, and more importantly than that, send his family into hiding, can sit in a fucking dungeon, chained to a raw rock wall for all he cares.

“Yes. I’ve got ten people I can use for guard duty. You get them here, and I can hold them.”

“Like cake. His lawyer just about wet his pants when we arrested him, too. Whoever you tipped off did a great job with the media, there were at least twenty-five reporters there.”

“Perfect.” Jarvis looks over the list. “Wanna do another?”

“Sure, bring it on.”

“I’m going to give Marty Senuyn a call, let him know that Koskinigen just named him as part of a tax fraud scandal.”

Abbi’s nodding at that. “You want us to scoop up the Director of the CIA?”

“Him, and as many of his top brass as you can grab. That one’s going to be a complete media circus.”

“Have at it. Just tell me when we need to roll. And make sure it is a media circus so I’m not facing another armed stand-off like we got with Koskinigen. Enough bloodshed tomorrow, I don’t want any of my guys getting shot for this shit.”

Jarvis smiles. “I can arrange that. Say, 14:00?”

“We’ll be ready to roll.”

“Tony!” Jake is looking very excited as he walks, quickly, over to Tony.

“Is he still in one piece?”

That catches Jake flat footed, so he has to stop and think for a second before saying, “What? Oh. No, he’s fine. He thought I was his lawyer, and I very carefully didn’t say anything to disabuse him of that notion, while also not saying anything that confirmed that I was his lawyer. He’s got a list of ten accounts that he’s got a watch on, and Diane tripped four of them.”

“Did you get those accounts?”

“You told me to stay away from that stuff. I got the name and phone number of the person he called when Diane got into the wrong account. Anna Miressa. She was born in Schwedt back in 1958. Immigrated to the US in 1995. She worked for the Stasi from 1971 until 1989. I couldn’t find out what she did there, but she didn’t stop doing it until the Stasi was dissolved. I couldn’t find anything on her until ’95, when she immigrates here. Since then she’s run a high-tech security consulting company. She actually sells the fact that she used to be secret police, knows all the ins and outs of surveillance to prospective clients, promising them safety for their own secrets.”
Tony nods at that, pleased with what Jake’s come up with. “High enough tech to use a driverless car?”

“It’s not on their website, but… Maybe?”

Tony nods at that, too, remembering that the bomber they’d had in prison for a while was German, too. “Okay. I want you to go to the lab, ask if anyone at Miressa’s company has been buying expensive hi-fi cables, and if the answer is yes, then I want you to make an appointment to talk with Miressa. Get her out of her building, meet you somewhere, and we’ll snatch her up when she shows up.”

“You want me to arrange a kidnapping?”

“I’ll get a warrant. We’re thin on manpower as it is, and right now I don’t want to walk into a building filled with God alone knows what sorts of gizmos and explosives to attempt to arrest this woman. I also don’t want her hitting the panic button and having all of her employees go skittering away, burning evidence, before we can get who’s doing what for her out of her.”

“Oh. Yeah.” Jake nods. “I’ll… uh… see what I can do.”

“Good. Give me that number, okay?”

Jake hands it over. Tony stares at it, and sighs. According to Tim, the phone that made the tip off call after Diane’s attack had been a burner. This number is probably only attached to legitimate business. Still, it’d be good to know who else she’s doing business with.

Tony glances at the rest of the phone numbers he’s dealing with.

After. After he knows who’s buying the elections. Contract killers will still be there tomorrow. Probably. He’s got a hard deadline on this one.

Tim rolls his shoulders. Website done. The DC Urban Chaos Preparedness Initiative has a web presence, and collection of directors, official 501 c status, and even tax returns going back four years. It’s all complete bullshit. And if anyone were to spend more than a few minutes really looking at it, the BS won’t hold. But, for what they’re trying to do, it’ll pass muster.

And, of course, the only name on the list of Directors that’s “real” C. Jarvis, Secretary of the Navy, will be the voice answering the phone should anyone who’s getting this order give them an annoyed call.

Tim gets up and stretches, working the kinks out of his neck. He takes his glasses off, and notices that there are several other people in his office watching him.

He nods to Jarvis. “Got the ruse in place. Anyone calls about the DC Urban Chaos Initiative, you know what to do?”

“Yeah. I can BS that with the best of them.”

“Great.” Tim looks around. It’s only 10:00. “I’m going to get us something to eat. You all want food?"

The… he thinks this batch are Marines, with Jarvis look enthusiastic about that. Jarvis nods, too. And Tim heads up. His timing is good, because as he’s leaving, he sees Elaine’s girls, with a van, trying to explain to Burt that they’ve been invited to bring food in, by Agent Gibbs.

“Burt…”

He turns to face Tim as Tim smiles at the girls. Young ladies, the youngest of the bunch is probably fifteen. “Director McGee.”

“They’re fine. If they’re saying Gibbs has invited them, he has. They’re family friends, and they’ve got good food.”

“Mom’s cooking. Been at it since early this morning. We’re supposed to bring food in all day. It’s our second trip in, but he,” Kenzie, the oldest, nods to Burt, “wasn’t here before.”

“And, then you’re going to stick around and make sure everyone gets fed?” Tim asks.

“That’s the plan,” Allie, the youngest girl, answers. Tim nods at that, understanding what Gibbs must have done.

“Wonderful. We need food. Once you get parked, let me help you get it in.”

As he waits for them, he’s noticing many fewer than normal cars in the parking lot. His email is already starting to thin them out.

“Thought there were supposed to be a lot of people here today,” Kenzie, says, as she walks up, pulling a pallet with boxes of food on it.

Tim grabs half of the handle, and together they pull.

“There will be. Right now, people are heading out, soon they’ll be coming back with their families, and they’ll need to eat.”

“What’s going on, Mr. McGee?”

He shakes his head a bit. “Stupid bit of bureaucracy. All the Federal Agencies have to pretend the city is about to riot, and show that we’ve got plans in place for dealing with it. Big pain in the ass, but we’ve got to do it.”

The girls nod at that, not really understanding, but they get the idea of feed people who are grumpy because their routine is off, so they’re doing it.

They follow Tim in, and start getting things set up.

---

Tim comes down with several plates in his hands. They’ve got eggs, French toast, bacon, sausage, and fruit on them, he lays them down in front of the group at his conference table. He rests a hand on his grandmother’s shoulder, glad to see she’s here, wishing he wasn’t seeing her at all, and then kisses her cheek before saying, “About a third of the staff have left already. And Elaine’s kids are here, bringing in food. More upstairs in the main conference room.”
“How much food?” Leon asks.

“Apparently, Gibbs called them. They’re closed today, and cooking just for us. Steady stream of food coming in until 18:00, and then the girls are going to stay with us to make sure everyone gets fed.”

Leon glances to Jarvis, Penny, and Tony. “He couldn’t convince them to leave, could he?”

“Nope. But we’re getting the girls, and I’d say, guessing by how much food they’ve already brought, we’re putting at least twenty grand aside to pay them.”

Leon nods. “We can do that.”

Tim sits down and takes a bite out of a piece of pineapple. “It’s got me thinking. We’ve got the café, which has some food, and the snack bar, which has a little more, and the vending machines, we’ve got what the girls are bringing in, but, those emails coming in, we’re going to have a lot of people in here. They’ve got to eat something.”

Leon’s nodding.

“I’d like to grab a few of the security guys, and a few vans, and make the biggest Costco run NCIS has ever seen.”

“Okay. When you get back, go to CGIS, and do it for Borin. Prisoners are going there, so she’s going to need food and supplies, too.”

Tim stands up, and is about to head off as Jarvis says, “Tim, toilet paper. Do one load of food for each agency, and then one of toilet paper. Trust me, we do not want to be stuck in a building with hundreds of people when the toilet paper runs out.”

Tim nods. He hadn’t thought of that. Diapers, he figured he’d make sure they got some of them, too, because he knows there’ll be little kids coming along, and because he’s a dad, and taking care of baby butts is part of his job, but taking care of adult butts hadn’t hit him.

“On it.”

“One last thing,” Jarvis says, handing over his BJs card, “different warehouse stores. Get lots of stuff, but not all at the same place. Make it look like we’re getting ready for a party or something, not stocking for the end of the world.”

He’s at the elevator when Leon catches up with him, handing him three hundred dollars. “Morley’s. The ones in the red and white packs. A lot of them. If this goes the way we think it’s going to, I’m going to need them, and so will everyone else who’s ever smoked.”

Tim looks really surprised at that, but he takes the money.

Leon says, “If you think a building filled with people and not enough toilet paper sounds bad, try being stuck in one with a whole bunch of nicotine addicts all going through withdrawal at once.”

Tim nods, and then says, “Coffee. At least one run of just coffee.”

Leon nods at that, too. “Yeah.”
Gibbs and Abbi stand in front of the broken door to what used to be the CGIS file room.

It’s empty now. Acres and acres of nothing but cement floors and cement walls, and ghostly white fluorescent lights.

“All the comforts of home,” Abbi says with a mean smile.

Gibbs nods slowly, enjoying this. “One way in, one way out. You want a new door on it?”

“Maybe. No matter what they did, I can’t just leave them locked in there. Someone’s got to be watching.” She makes note of the lack of water or toilets. “Probably have someone on full time bathroom runs.”

“There any bathrooms on this floor?” Gibbs asks.

“Down by the stair wells.”

“No access to the armory from in here, right?” Gibbs says. He knows what’s on the floor above him, but if memory serves, you can only get into it from the stairway. And, while he’s not too worried about the soon to be army of pencil pushers, lobbyists, and well-connected moneymen who will be in here, he does know that desperate people do stupid things, and filling a room with them next to a huge collection of guns isn’t a great plan.

“Yeah, just files down here, at least, there used to be, and bathrooms by the stairwells.”

“We’ll block off the stairwells, and give them run of down here. Put some tables and chairs and maybe some bottled water and snacks, a few blankets or something, and that’s that. They’re down here for their own good.”

Abbi smiles a bit. “That’ll work. What do you need to get the doors set?”

Gibbs is eyeing the doors to the stairwell. “Gonna need a drill, some two by sixes, a saw… Won’t take long to get these set so whoever is outside can hold them as long as they need. Once that’s done, we can go grab the next one.”

“Yep, over to CIA Headquarters.”

“And I’ve got a name to go with a number!” Tony says, marking off the third of the four buyers from the last set of elections.

Jarvis looks up from trying to locate the next name on his list, a question in his eyes.

“Hi Yun Cho. Mean anything to you?”

Jarvis nods, curtly, picks up his cell, and heads into Tim’s office.

Tony looks at Penny. “That name mean anything to you?”

She shakes her head. She might know “everyone” but that’s not part of the “everyone” she knows.
She takes a moment and gets googling. “Not online, either.”

They both watch Jarvis pace Tim’s office. “Whoever it is, from the looks of it, he’s not going to be out and about longer,” Penny says.

Tony nods at that. “One more to hunt down, and then…”

“You think sending Ziva, Abby, and Breena away was a bad call?”

Penny puts her phone down and shakes her head. “I’m never going to suggest keeping pregnant women in a place where medical care will be iffy at best is a good plan. I’ve lived that and have no desire to make anyone else do that. And I do not think babies make riots easier to deal with.”

“Then what’s that tone for?”

Penny’s eyes close for a moment, and Tony sees the anger and sorrow shine through her ‘get it done’ attitude. “I’ve buried two brothers, my father, my husband, and one son, all in the service of the ideal of government by and for the people. I’ve spent my whole life working to make sure this country was a good thing. It’s heartbreaking to see how far astray it’s gone. And it hurts in my soul to think that it may have always been that way, and all I did was provide a show to make people feel like they had some control.” She looks away for a second, licking her lips, and then meets Tony’s gaze, looking resigned and ready to do whatever it is that needs to be done, her feelings on the matter be damned.

He’s seen that look from Tim, a lot, over the years. “Being a cop is all I know. All I want to do. But… What the hell sort of law have I been upholding?”

Penny glances at the phone records he’s working on right now.

Tony looks at those numbers, too. “I’m making myself not think about it. Can’t, because if I do…”

She gently squeezes his hand. “I know.”

“I’ve saved lives, and I’ve put away killers. That’s a good thing. That’s important. That’s what I want to do, keep doing. Been working a lot of terror cases lately… You know those crackpots who say we make the terrorists, go into their countries and kill people and turn ‘em bad. Go in there to make money and line pockets or because we hate brown people, not because we need to be there.”

In that Penny’s been known to say all of those things, she’s familiar with the basic idea. She cocks an eyebrow at him.

“Yeah, well… If the guys who made those decisions weren’t playing by the books to get into office, why should I trust they played by the rules when they decided to go into Iraq or Afghanistan or Lebanon or wherever? And if some asshole came into my town and killed my family, I can tell you that it would take about five minutes for me to get a gun and start planning on ways to kill his family, even if he was thousands of miles away.”

“Crisis of faith.”

Tony nods. “Yeah. For both of us. So.” He plasters a big, fake smile on his face. “We’ve still got the Swiss account. Let’s find how owns the damn thing and shut these fuckers down.”
As the Secretary of the Navy, Jarvis has connections. As a man who used to work for the Clandestine Services, he has connections that are used to getting things done without anyone else knowing about them.

He’s been calling in a lot of favors today. For jobs inside the US, he’s begged, borrowed, threatened, or outright stole troops to pick people up. Right now, he’s slowly filling up NCIS holding cells all throughout the United States.

But the intel DiNozzo is getting him is for people outside the United States. People who very much should not be involved in swaying US elections. Three of those sorts of people already, and Jarvis knows who they work for.

He is not capturing them. He is not ordering any attempts to bring them in. He is sending a very clear message to the sorts of people who employ men like Hi Yun Cho.

For Hi Yun Cho, who is an intelligence officer in the Chinese Army, with a specialty in destabilizing foreign governments, and two others like him, he’s placing kill orders. When DiNozzo digs up the number four, he will make one last call of this sort, to a team with jet, ready to go, and they will take care of it, likely before their news conference tonight.

Things might be about to go insane, but the message will be clear, Fuck with Uncle and die.

---

2:35. Jimmy, Breena, and Abby and the girls are finally, finally pulling up to the Canadian side of the Rainbow Bridge at Niagara Falls.

They made, for people traveling with an infant, two toddlers, and a pregnant woman, pretty good time.

They could have done better, but Jimmy, and then Breena, and then Abby drove exactly the speed limit the entire trip, if not slightly under. All three of them were extremely cautious about every other car on the road.

This is the last hurdle for getting out. Jimmy pulls up, and a bored looking border agent asks for ID. Jimmy hands over his driver’s license, and then Abby’s and Breena’s, as well.

He checks them over, peeks into the car, looks at the girls, decides they must look enough like the three of them that he doesn’t ask for ID or if they’re their children, and then says, “Reason for your trip?”

“Sightseeing.” Jimmy’s trying to sound really calm. “Want to see the falls from the Canadian side, and then up to Toronto, and east to Maine.” Jimmy nods to Abby. “She’s never seen the North East in the fall, so, here we are.”

Abby nods, trying to look like she’s the sort of person who’s deeply interested in fall foliage.
“How long are you planning on staying?” The guard is still looking bored, and Abby catches sight of another one giving Jimmy’s van a once over. (Turns out you can only rent a car or van with a credit card these days, and not a pre-paid one, which meant, short of stealing a car, there was no way for them to get a new ride en route. So, they still have Jimmy and Breena’s van. Not ideal, but better than trying to get across the border in a stolen van, or having a car rental show up on one of their credit cards.)

“A week.”

The guard nods, handing back the IDs. He eyes them for a moment, and Abby starts to feel a little nervous, but then he smiles and says, “You’re going to want some warmer clothing. We’re supposed to get snow the day after tomorrow.”

Jimmy nods, smiling at that. “Thanks. Don’t get snow that early in DC.”

The guard waves him through, and they’re on the other side of the border.

Abby pulls out her newest phone and sends a quick text.

Tim’s standing in line, next to a pallet covered in shelf-stable foods. Basic, easy to store, will last forever, and almost everyone can eat them, foods. Dried fruits, canned fruits and veggies, peanut butter, oatmeal, rice, dried beans, powdered milk, jerky (He got fresh meat, eggs, and frozen fruit and veggies at the BJ’s Club using Jarvis’s ID. Right now he’s at Costco, using his own.) pasta, and what feels like tons of sugar, salt, oil, and flour. He’s not much of a cook, but he knows what pantry staples are, so he’s getting them.

Burt and Clem, the two security guards with him, are looking extremely tense. As well they probably should be. They’ve been muttering about why they’re on this shopping trip the whole time, and if their grumbling is anything to go by, anyone who’s stood for election in the last ten years better vanish before this is done, because their days are numbered.

Tim is intentionally not listening to them quietly planning the murder of a particular senator they both loathe. Having spent a lot of time with people who did kill other people, he knows letting off steam grumbling from really going to do it, and this is grumbling.

As the checkout lady asks him how Kelly is, (his usual co-pilot for Costco runs) his phone beeps.

He pulls it out, sees a number that’s brand new, and reads Made it. I love you.

He takes a deep breath, starting to feel less nervous. His loves are out. “She’s doing fine. She and Abby are getting a little girl time in, heading down to North Carolina for the weekend.”

“That sounds like a lot of fun. You going stag?”

“Beer and football all weekend long,” he says with a smiles.

She looks at the pile of stuff on the pallet. Not a beer in sight. (Though, as he thinks about it, why the hell not? Next stop. Beer, or cider, or something, and more coffee, and hell, three hundred dollars of cigarettes really isn’t a lot of them, more cigs, too.) “Yeah, this looks like one hell of a party.”

He shakes his head. “Don’t you know it.”
Once he’s out of Costco he texts one line back. Good, love you, too. Keep your eyes on the news. Stay safe. Comes back to him.

I am. Love you, all of you. Gotta go. He doesn’t want to stop texting, but even though he’s fairly sure this is a safe phone (it’s his burner phone) he doesn’t know that for certain.

Abby gets the return text. Smiles a little, swallows, and then turns off the phone, tossing it in the nearest garbage can. They’re sitting in a McDonald’s playground, letting the girls crawl and toddle around, sipping drinks of their own.

“Okay, let’s find a place to stay the night.”

“Shouldn’t be hard to do,” Breena says. “Every third building here looks like a hotel.” The Canada side of Niagara falls is filled with businesses catering to all sorts of tourists.

Jimmy wraps an arm around both of them. “Naptime, for all of us, and then we’re going to take the girls and see the falls, and do something fun.”

“Jimmy,” Abby says. She wants to get into a room, and turn on the TV and start watching every news channel, at once.

“Fun.” He says quietly, but very sure. “We spend the whole time in a hotel room scanning the news, we’ll be insane before tonight’s press conference. That’s not good for us, and it’s really not good for them.” He glances at the girls, who are, right now, getting a chance to move around. After all night and morning in the car, Molly and Kelly are bouncing around with abandon, and Anna’s doing everything she can to crawl all over the place. “We’ve got an hour until naptime, so we’ll find a nice hotel, and then we all get naps. None of us slept much, so we rest, and then we eat, and for a few hours we get out, do something stupid and silly, and then we watch the news.”

Breena’s holding his and her hands as he’s saying that, and Abby closes and then opens her eyes again, nodding. “Okay.”

They went in to get Dunerson early. For Senuyn, they’re going in late. And if Dunerson was a media circus, it was a small, local, piddly two tent deal.

For Senuyn, they’re pulling out all the stops. There are literally hundreds of reporters, camera men, and sound guys pushing up close around them, pressing in, shouting questions, trying to be heard over the roar of other questions.

Gibbs gets snatches of them, “Is this related to the arrest of Gil Dunerson earlier today?” “We’ve heard rumors of bribery charges, who’s being bribed?” “What charges are being brought against Senuyn?” “Why is the Navy investigating this along with the Coast Guard?”

Over and over. He listens closely, none of the questions are hinting they know what’s really up, not yet. As he and Borin, Bishop and Draga, Omagi and Saunders push on through, they say, “Press conference tonight at 6:00, NCIS building at the Navy Yard, all questions answered.”

Senuyn is waiting for them, along with his counsel. His Assistant Director, two of the lawyers, and three department heads are surprised to be on the warrant, but they go peacefully enough.

They’re much less compliant when they get shoved into the basement at CGIS, instead of the cushy conference room they were expecting, but by that point, there’s no media watching, only scores of other surprised people who were expecting protective custody and got this instead.

Though from the grumbling Gibbs hears down there, they’re starting to realize what they all have in common, and why they’re all down there. And if the yells he’s hearing for cell phones and begging to call their families are anything to go by, they’ve got an idea of how bad things are going to get when this breaks.

“Wow,” Tim says, pulling a pallet on wheels behind him into Autopsy. The whole area’s been turned into a full trauma center.

“Wow, indeed. What do you have for us, Timothy?” Ducky asks. He and Allan have gotten everything set. Right now they can handle anything that does not require a blood transfusion. And the only reason they cannot handle that is that they could not get their hands on any blood or plasma.

“Meat, eggs, fruit, veggies. We’ve used all the cold storage in the café, and were hoping to take advantage of the shelves in here.”

“They are empty and you are welcome to them.”

Tim nods. “Thanks.” He slides the first of the drawers open, and begins to load food onto it.

Ducky heads over. “How is your arm handling this?”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “Not feeling it right now. Because I’m being careful and haven’t hurt it, or because I’m too focused on other things is up for debate.”

Ducky nods. “Be gentle with yourself, Timothy. Long days are coming. Dr. Allan, will you assist us?”

And with that, the three of them load the food that needs to be kept cold into the mortuary refrigerators.

NCIS has six floors. Cybercrime, in the subbasement, is the lowest of the bunch. Above ground, there’s the main floor, the second floor, where the bullpen is, and then the top floor, MTAC, Leon’s office, and a few conference rooms.

Once he’s got the groceries stowed, Tim takes a moment to wander around.

The building is filling up. Two hours until the press conference, and there are people setting up cameras and sound equipment in the main hall. He sees that, apparently, Jake’s taken over on that, and Penny’s helping him. He nods at them, happy to see them doing something that appears to be playing to their strengths.

On the first, second, and third floors, there are families milling around, mostly staking out locations for their gear, or hovering around the table in the conference room where Elaine’s girls are keeping a steady supply of food.

He hears a lot of muttering about this insane Urban Chaos Readiness Drill, and people wondering when the hell they’ll get to go home.

He’s thinking, with two hours to go, that the building is busy, but not insanely crowded. Of course, as of right now, all of those SEALs and Marines and whatever else Jarvis and James and Leon and anyone else who’s got a buddy to pull in have been in and out, grabbing people. Right now, they’re all out, by the time the next two hours are done, they’ll all be in.

And so will the rest of the families.

Very soon, it’s going to go from busy to crowded. Add in all the press they’re expecting, and crowded will become packed.

He heads down, checking into the lab, where Zelaz and his family are, along with Corwin, who’s on her own.

“Hey, McGee, you know what’s up with this?” Corwin asks.

He shakes his head. “Some sort of bureaucratic BS. I got the notice and wrote up the email.”

“How’s Abby?” Zelaz asks.

“Having a very pregnant sort of day. Woke up this morning, and just felt like crap.”

Both Zelaz’s wife and Corwin nod at that. They know how hard being pregnant is, and with the hours they’ve been working lately, Abby needing a down day makes sense to them.

“Hope we’re going home soon,” Tim says to them.

“Yeah, any idea when this is going to be done?” Mrs. Zelaz asks.

“Whenever those guys say it is.” Tim shrugs and heads down to his own level. For the first time all day, his office is empty. Jarvis is off doing something outside of it. Tim glances around, and hopes this won’t be home for too long.

________________________________________________

Rule number one might be don’t let suspects stay together. However, that’s Gibbs’ rule number one, and right now, Gibbs is not running the game.

Jarvis is standing in interrogation in front of Theresa Manedel, David York, Jeffry Tanen, William Burke, Jaqueline Fordi, and Thomas Pein. The Chairmen of both major US political parties and the top four members of the Federal Election Commission are not happy to be here.

Jarvis isn’t either. He’d also prefer that there were four more people in this room right now, but that’s not in the cards.

And while he does, sort of, have custody of the men who run the companies that make the voting machines, none of them are in DC. John Thomas Ralph and Lewis Gray, both of VoteTech, are in a holding cell in Alameda. James Ellroy, of Galveston Electronics, is in a cell at NCIS Texas City, and Rick Helmsorth, of Helmsort Voting Systems, is in another cell at NCIS Portland.

They’ve already been through a version of what their conspirators are about to taste, and he’s got copies of the confessions they wrote up. He would have liked to have been in on breaking them, but they were too far away.

Now it’s his turn though. For the last twenty hours he’s been cool, collected, in charge, and quietly killing their organization of vote buying and selling. He has been very professional. He’s been calm. He has been polite. And now, he’s done being professional and calm and polite. Now he has the people who have wrecked his life and what he’s been working for in front of him, and he intends to make them sweat.

He knows all of them, and is on a first name basis with the chairmen.

So, he leans in the corner as they sit around the table, looking nervous.

Finally he says, “In the next few days, Washington DC is going to burn. Hundreds, if not more people will die, and this will happen because you stupid fuckers got caught.” They all look appalled at that, and there’s a moment of fussing that’s shut down by Jarvis saying, “Now, you’ll see there are pads of paper in front of you. You are going to write on those pads exactly what you were doing, and how. You are going to tell me who was buying, who was selling, and who, exactly, knew what you were doing. You will spare no details and you will not stop writing until every single person involved with this is on paper.”

“What are you talking about? Why would DC burn?”

Jarvis sighs. He knew at least one of them would try to play stupid. “Terri, you are sitting in a room with David, Jeff, Bill, Jackie, and Tom, why do you think you are sitting here if I did not know exactly what you’ve been up to? It’s all coming out tonight. Every bit of it. We are going to go live with all of the account numbers, names, dates, locations, everything.”

David’s eyes narrow. “You’re fishing. You haven’t actually accused us of anything. You just want to see what we’ll write down.”

To an extent, that’s true. Jarvis does not know if the politicians know the elections were being bought off. This whole system had been carefully designed to make sure none of them were directly implicated, and he wants to see if they were useful stooges or part of the plan.

“Account number 0096846-3473-987.” Jarvis hands over his phone. He’s got a breaking headline up on it. Apparently the five top members of a venture capital fund out of Saudi Arabia all died when their private jet developed ‘mechanical trouble.’

Six sets of eyes all glance at the phone, and each other, and he can smell the fear starting to roll off of them.

He grabs his phone. “Account number 9797-0979634-8562.” Another headline, this one a nervous looking woman claiming her husband was just stolen off the street by masked men in black this morning.

“Do you want more? I have every account, and every name that goes with an account. I’ve got 148 of your conspirators in custody. 18:00 tonight, the whole story goes live. You’re all realists; you know how the world works. What, exactly, do you think will happen when I get up in front of every news organization in the world and tell them that every election in recent memory has been sold to the highest bidder?

“What do you think will happen when every man with a grudge against the government, when every mother mourning a lost child in our service, when every man with a ruined life because of a Federal conviction, when every person who lost a business to the tax man, or had to surrender the use of his land to the EPA, or any of millions of other little slights, all find out that the system that put them into those positions was a scam?”

Cold sweat, fear, and hopelessness rolls off of the six people in front of him. The whole room reeks with it now.

“Now, you have a choice, you can write those confessions, and then, when things calm down again, and for the sake of everyone outside of this building you better hope that happens soon, you will be tried, and then convicted, and then executed for treason. Or, if you do not fill out these pages, telling me every single detail of how this scheme worked, I will, tomorrow or the next day, when the mobs are burning this city to the ground, hand you over to them.”

Jarvis looks them all down, eyes like ice, making it clear, by his voice that he’d really prefer they don’t fill out those pages, as he says, “Now, are you feeling like filling out some confessions, or will I hand you to men who will, if you are lucky, kill you before they set you on fire.”

Six people scramble for pens and start writing, very, very quickly.

Diane looks at Tony, who’s exhausted. “Come, on. Get your nap. I’m on it now.”

Tony nods, rubbing his eyes, and heads to the sofa. He doesn’t think he’ll be able to sleep, but he needs to. Conference time is soon, and he needs some rest to deal with it.

He can hear rumbling from above, the sound of more voices than this building usually holds are filtering through the floors and ventilation.

He lays down as Jarvis walks past him, a collection of pages of yellow legal paper in hand. Looks like he got his confessions.

Diane lucks out. The last call. The final buyer of the elections, decided to make his call on her watch. She sees the number pop up and traces it easily, and heads into Tim’s office, where Jarvis is sitting heavily in Tim’s chair, head back, looking exhausted.

“‘You okay?’ she asks.

He shakes his head.

“Is there another level?”

“Maybe. I’m debating something.”
Diane sits down. “Want to talk about it?”

He shakes his head. “No.” It’s in the confession. Some of the politicians knew. Some didn’t. Some knew before they were elected. Some found out after. Some had to be ‘taken care of.’ And ‘taken care of’ meant everything from threats against their kids to payoffs to murder and attempted murder.

His dad knew. At least, he knew about the version that was in place before this one. He got confirmation that there hadn’t been a clean election in the US since 1932.

Jarvis shakes his head. “What do you have?”

“The last phone number.”

He nods. “Okay. Hand it over.”

She does. “It’s out of Norway.”

“Yeah. I know. I know who it belongs to. They gave it up a few minutes ago. I’ve already made the call.”

“Oh. Um… So…”

He shrugs. “I don’t know. Get ready for the show. Go talk to Leon, see how he’s doing with his press release.” He eyes her up and down. “Run out, get a real outfit and make up, and get ready to face the press as the Hell Bitch of the IRS who refused to roll over and die, and bit the head off this conspiracy.”

Diane smiles briefly and nods. “All right. What are you going to do?”

“Get a nap. Try not to look like death warmed over for the cameras.”

Last job of the night before settling down and waiting.

Jake’s in a café, having a coffee, looking slightly nervous. He’s trying not to. But, right now, he’s got an appointment with a woman who kills people for a living, and it’s his job to lure her out, and then let his wife and her partner arrest her.

Except this time, it’s not an arrest. It’s a kidnapping. There are no warrants, not anymore. Tony tried, but he couldn’t get one, not in time, and not without tipping off how they got this information.

He knows her the second he sees her. She’s tall, iron gray hair cut shot and slicked back, ice blue eyes watching everything around them, wearing a power suit right out of GQ.

And, she’s dangerous. He can feel it coming off of her, almost smell it like perfume.

He swallows, takes a deep breath, and then stands up, offering his hand. “Ms. Miressa?”

“Mr. Malloy, what can I do for the NSA?” she asks as she sits down.

He nods. He hadn’t mentioned he worked for the NSA, but she’s done her homework.
“Personal business, actually. I haven’t worked for the NSA in years.”

She laughs at that. “What personal business can a man who makes $46,000 a year, before taxes, have that requires my services?” She answers her own question. “None. An emissary from the NSA, one who is no longer part of official channels, he may have business.”

He smiles, and sips his coffee, thinking fast. “Then, let me put it this way, I have business the NSA would prefer was not related to them.”

She smiles at him, and takes a sip of the coffee that’s sitting across from Jake waiting for her.

“Tell me your business,” she says between sips.

So he does. BSing away, madly hoping the dope in the coffee works fast. It does. He’s less than two paragraphs into his ‘need for discretion spiel’ when he notices her eyes aren’t tracking well. And a minute after that, as she starts to slump to the side, Ellie pops up out of nowhere, and says, “Mom!” loudly.

“I’m so sorry sir, she does this sometimes. Come on, MOM!” she gets an arm around Miressa, helping her out of the booth. A second after that, Draga’s with her, and between them they help “Mom” out of the café and into a plain car.

A minute after that, Jake finishes his coffee, leaves a tip on the table, and then picks up Miressa’s cup, and carries it out of the café.

Three miles later, he tosses it out of the car.

From there, it’s time to head back to the Navy Yard and get ready for the storm.

“You got them?” Abbi asks Omagi.

“I’ve got them. I’ve got this. Everyone is inside. We’ve got supplies for weeks. Things get bad, and I’ll hit the emergency switch. If need be, there’ll be bombproof walls between us and the outside.”

“Okay.” Abbi gives him a quick hug. “See you on the news.”

“Kick their asses.”

“Yes, sir!” Abbi turns away from her number two, who’s just been put in charge of CGIS, because she’s not sure when, or if, she’ll be able to get back, and joins Gibbs, who’s already in the car, ready to get them to the Navy Yard.

There’s press waiting for them as they leave. They follow them, wondering if they’re about to pick someone else up, but they aren’t.

“You ever seen it this bad?” Abbi asks as they get three miles from the Navy Yard. Traffic is already starting to slow down. The streets are lined with news vans and TV crews.

Gibbs looks at his truck, thinking, and then pulls them over more than a mile from the Navy Yard. “Not gonna be able to park anywhere closer.”

“This might not be here when we get back.”
He shakes his head. “I don’t know if we can drive fast enough to get there before the news conference starts. I know we can walk it.” Unspoken is that he doesn’t want to be caught outside of the walls of the Navy Yard when the news breaks.

Abbi understands. She nods at him, and before they get out of the car, she gives him a kiss. He returns it, sweet and desperate. They’ve both been trying not to think about what comes next all day. But all day is rapidly running out. Less than an hour of ‘all day’ left to go, and then… Then there’ll be nothing left to do but think, and survive.

He leaves the key on the seat, and the door unlocked. Someone else might need a reliable way out of DC, might as well let them have it.

They work the crowd as they move closer to the Navy Yard. Gibbs mentions there’s free food and drinks inside, and that everyone’s questions will be answered. So does Abbi. Partially to make sure there’s as much coverage as possible on the press conference, partially because they don’t know how fast the unrest will start, and they want as many people inside as possible.

There’s a bottleneck at the main gates. Everyone and thing is being searched, thoroughly. That makes sense to Gibbs, and he’s fortunate that security is willing to wave him and Abbi in.

When they get in, NCIS is packed. It’s crawling with media people and families. The whole first floor has been turned into a news room, with people milling around. Gibbs knows he’s got nothing to say on this. He’s not going up and talking, and the number of people all pressed in right now is uncomfortable. He kisses Abbi one last time, and then she heads over to Leon, who’s standing up at a podium flanked tables, talking with Jarvis, Diane, and Tim.

Gibbs looks around, and then decides he knows where he wants to be.

He takes the elevator down to the basement.

Sitting on the sofas, in front of the big screen TV, which is tuned to ZNN and showing the scene upstairs, is Penny, Ducky, Tony, and Allan. They’re all looking tense and nervous, well aware of what’s going to begin in the next few minutes.

He watches Leon nod to the others. They all take their seats, and then Leon stands up at the podium and says…

Leon takes a deep breath, and then says, “I know you’ve all gathered here to hear about a massive corruption case involving the IRS, the DEA, and the CIA. I’m here to tell you that the IRS and the DEA and the CIA is the tip of the iceberg.” He glances over to Tim, who nods, and they hear a few beeps and chirps as phones tell people they have new mail in their inboxes, “Right now, in your inboxes is the unredacted, unedited proof that in the last twelve years, the Federal Elections Commission in collusion with the three largest makers of voting machines have been selling the Federal Elections.

“The Chairmen of the RNC and DNC have been conspiring with each other and others in both the US and outside the country, to buy winning positions in those elections. In your inboxes are copies of the bank records showing who has been paying Menedel and York, sending them the money that has been used to buy those elections. Among others the Directors of the IRS, DEA, and CIA have all been arrested for helping to fund this election buying scheme.
“In addition to this, in your inboxes, are the full financial records of a bank account that has existed since 1932. That account has been used by literally thousands of members of our government to buy their way into office. Two IRS agents who have attempted to audit this account have been murdered, and Ms. Anderson,” he looks to Diane, and she stands up, “her daughter, and her date, was almost murdered for this information. We have direct information connecting John Koskinigen to the murder and attempted murder of IRS agents who have tried to discover what that account does.” Diane is still standing. “Ms. Anderson…”

Leon sits down and Diane takes over.

“Several weeks ago, after Ms. Borin,” she nods to Abbi, who nods back, “took down the corruption at CGIS, she received a letter with four bank account numbers on it. I was the closest, and most discrete numbers person she knew, so she handed it over to me. Within ten minutes of beginning to look up those numbers, I had John Koskinigen in my office, demanding I cease investigating, and that I hand those numbers over. I handed them over, but did not stop investigating.

“I removed myself from the IRS and headed to NCIS, where I have connections, and a safe computer system, but upon getting there, I found that the Federal Bank Account Database no longer had the account numbers I had received on file. This led to bringing our computer expert into the investigation.”

Tim stands up, feeling a bit nervous, but knows this has to happen. “I began to work on the issue, first by attempting to secure our own servers, only to find that the Federal Intranet Server had been hacked, and access was being sold to the highest bidders, one of which was John Koskinigen, another of which was York, and the NSA, and many others. They used this access to see what we were doing, when and how.

“I was able to apprehend the hacker, and secure our own system. Upon doing so, Ms. Anderson got the idea that those bank accounts likely hadn’t vanished, just our ability to access them through our traditional routes. That proved to be correct.

“By going outside of the Federal servers, her friend, who was later killed, was able to get into those accounts and let us see what was happening with them. Once he did that, they were able to point me in the direction of the account no one could get into. I broke it open, and found what it was doing. All of that is in your inboxes, now.”

Tim sits down, and Diane gets back up again. “Once we got into those accounts the money trail was plain to see. We were given a black ops account, showing the US using money in jobs and operations all over the world that it was not supposed to be involved with. We received an account owned by the Bathenada Cartel, and watched it dump 500 million dollars in less than three days to hundreds of charities, and then we watched those charities pay their board members, and then those members turned and payed into the account that had existed since 1932 for swaying elections. That account showed a major payout every two years, in November, since 2004. That payout went into the hands of the FEC and the men who make the electronic voting machines.”

She sits down and nods to Leon, who returns to the podium. “You’ve all seen the news stories about machines that didn’t record votes correctly. You’ve seen the court challenges to the electronic machines. You watched, and some of you are old enough to have covered the 2000 election where everyone was so concerned about hanging chads and talked about how unreliable paper is.

“I do not know if that was a moment where the universe ended up in a grand place for evil men to take advantage, or if evil men decided to make a situation they could take advantage of. I do know, that as of right now, the last President elected without behind the scenes tampering, at least, tampering that I personally know of, is Herbert Hoover.
“We know of at least three people who are dead to keep this a secret. I’m standing next to another person who is only alive because her companion, one of my Agents, is an amazing driver. We know of fourteen other cases where it is extremely likely that those people were killed to keep this a secret. Because of the nature of this fraud, because of the extremely large amounts of money and power involved, because, previous to now, everyone who has attempted to investigate this is dead, all of our families are in hiding.

“I know one other thing, as of right now, 6:08 pm on October 5, 2016, NCIS is no longer taking orders from the Federal Government and will not do so until a properly elected regime is in place. Our mission is to serve and protect the men and women of the Navy and Marines, and their families, and we will continue to do so however we may.”

Leon sits down, and there’s a second of silence, and then suddenly reporters start to scramble, but are cut short a second later as Clayton Jarvis stands up. He also nods to McGee, who sends Jarvis’ last order live.

“My name is Clayton Jarvis, I am the Secretary of the Navy. As of 6:09, October 5, 2016, I am ordering all Naval and Marine personnel to stand down. Until such a time as there is a legitimately elected Commander-in-Chief again, all Naval and Marine units located inside the United States are to turn themselves over to the nearest local National Guard unit. My commanders outside of the United States have gotten their own, personalized orders, for what to do next.” Jarvis blinks, hard, and he has to stop to take a deep breath. “In that the President who nominated me and the Congress that confirmed me were not actually elected, as of 6:10, October 5, 2016, I am no longer Secretary of the Navy. Now, we are opening the floor to questions.”

There’s a second of silence, and then a roar of voices hits, hard.

Tim will later, much later, learn that the first shot was fired at 6:05. It was aimed at the IRS building, and no one’s sure who fired it, or if that shot was aimed at the IRS for the IRS’s specific actions in this endeavor, or just as a general anti-government movement. He will also learn, that by 6:35, the IRS building, which, like CGIS, had been hardened to withstand terror attacks from the outside, was in full defensive mode. It’s believed that’s the only reason it didn’t burn to the ground.

He will, after several days, learn that the neighborhood fires started at 7:46 on K Street. He learns in less than ten hours, when he goes out to help fight them, that Washington DC is a very flammable city. For the next three days he will go out each day, when he’s not on guard duty, to help fight those fires.

Either way, he won’t leave the Navy Yard without full body armor and armed with both a pistol and automatic rifle for almost a month.

He will, watching the news with one eye while answering questions during the press conference, see that a herd of TV reporters will more or less run from the Navy Yard to the White House, only to get there within minutes of a mob. Nine civilians and two reporters will be killed when the Secret Service, who have not yet gotten the message, open fires on a crowd that tries to scale the gates.

Within two hours, while the mob is still milling around, kept at bay by occasional shots. The Secret Service will learn of what happened. Three of them will be shot by other members of the Secret Service when they try to open the gates and let the mob in.
Within three hours, The President, his family, the Vice President, and any member of the Cabinet located in the White House will be evacuated by helicopter out of DC.

When they go, the mob breaks the gates, and burns the White House to the ground.

Congress, with much less protection, and many, many more visitors, is on fire before the White House perimeter is breached.

It will be two weeks before a full count of who survived that fire is available.

Tim learns, by reading, four days later, that it took less than an hour for the Army, two hours for the Airforce, to give formal notice to the White House that they were no longer taking orders from them, and until such a time as a properly elected Commander-in-Chief was to fill the seat, all offensive operations would cease, and each branch would, like the Marines, turn themselves over to the command of the local National Guard, or in the case of overseas forces, hold in place and only engage in defensive actions.

He’ll learn three days after the news breaks that the Virginia and Maryland National Guards have walled off the city, not allowing anyone who cannot prove they live outside of the city, out. This is to “curb the spread of riots.” They are also, and for this he is grateful, keeping anyone who cannot prove they live in the city from entering. It’s estimated that saves at least 50 lives. (Well, the lives of fifty people inside DC, a full scale battle on the southern border of DC takes place between a collection of ‘Anti-government Survivalists,’ and the Virginia National Guard, resulting in fourteen casualties.)

He’ll learn close to five months later that, upon hearing the news, Metro PD decided not to take calls from Congress or the White House, and to focus their efforts on protecting the citizenry of DC. Nineteen deaths are attributed to that decision, though no cases are brought. He learns from Jake, days after that, that it’s settled case law that the cops have no legal duty to protect any given person, and especially in a case like this one, as long as they were doing something like their job, they’re in the clear.

He won’t learn that his home comes through just fine for another ten days. He won’t think to even check for six. He won’t learn of the fate of Jimmy and Breena’s for fourteen days. It too, will come through fine. Likewise, Gibbs’ place in Virginia will be fine, too. Tony and Ziva’s apartment will be livable when this is done. There’s smoke damage, like everywhere else in the city, but nothing permanent. Ducky and Penny’s home will be broken into, every window smashed, everything of any value stolen, anything that can’t be moved will be destroyed, but, it will still be standing when this is done.

He’ll be with Tony when he learns of the fate of his house and Abbi’s as well.

He’ll hear the man who was called President say that he knew nothing about any of this as he resigns, a script that will be repeated over and over. He’ll watch a bit more than three hundred members of Congress and the Senate resign. They will all blame the heads of their two political committees, and claim they knew nothing of how this worked. Some of them will be telling the truth.

Eventually more than two hundred of them will be convicted of breaking Election Finance Law when it’s proven they were personally using the election swaying account to skirt the finance laws. Eventually, after hundreds of judges resign, and new (and many of the old) judges are appointed (or reappointed), there will be courts to convict them. The others will claim they knew nothing about their campaign managers/the local representatives of the RNC or DNC using those accounts. No one will believe them, but they won’t be able to make cases against them. (But, eventually, they will make cases again.)
In the end, fifteen Senators, and seventy-two Congressmen will be cleared of any election tampering. Thirteen of the fifteen Senators and sixty of the Congressmen were elected in ’14, and as non-incumbents, didn’t qualify to use the election tampering account. If their wins were part of what was paid for in 2014, it couldn’t be proven.

Angus King, as the only Independent member of the US Senate or Congress with no ties to the DNC or RNC will end up leading what’s left of Congress. Eventually, through different interrogations, it will come out that while the general elections were rigged, the nominations were not. Anyone who got on a ballot managed to do so through his own accord. The “Election Salesmen” as they would eventually be known in the news, decided that was as much say in the matter as the general population needed.

As a man with a gun and the training to use it, he will stand guard at the gates of the Navy Yard and make sure that the mob does not breach their perimeter and take any of the people selling the elections. He will stand at that gate, holding a loaded assault rifle and full body armor, and watch effigies burn while people carry signs demanding the conspirators be lynched. He will shoot into the crowd three times in four days, when they swell and rush the gates, and he will do everything he can to not think about those days. He will not talk about them.

He’ll think that’s the lowest point in his life, until the food runs out, and the mob is no longer calling for blood, but bread.

He’ll get dribs and drabs from the rest of the country, but as Jarvis suspected, within minutes they had the call out to their National Guards, and within a day (two in New York and Los Angeles), they had their rioting under control.

He will learn, because he’ll be in the building when it’s discovered, that York will commit suicide before charges are brought. Manedel will do so the night after. The remaining six will be tried, convicted, and executed for treason. There will be no fussing about the inhumanity of the death penalty in those six cases.

And he will learn, that, eventually, much sooner on a calendar than it feels living through it, that life will go back to “normal.” He will hold his loves again. He will kiss his children. He will go home. He’ll work cases, and he’ll retake his oath of office. Unless he knows the candidate, he won’t vote again, though.

But all of that is in the future, and right now, there’s sitting in the conference room, talking in depth with the reporters who have stayed here to talk about what they’ve found, and watching the ones who scurried to the White House get shot at on the big screen.

Right now, there’s still twenty-four days of martial law, to be run by a hybrid operation between the FBI and DC Metro, to live through. Right now, life is about to shrink down, bounded by walls and smoke, and the vision blocking lines of helmets and protective goggles, and stretch out, hours pulling like melting taffy into a sticky morass of unending time.
On the first day, not long enough after the news conference, Tim stares at the cherry glow of the sky around him, and says, “The man who wants to watch the world burn.” He’s not very loud, but he’s got a mic on to keep him in contact with Tony and Abbi.

“McGee?” Tony asks.

“Never mind.” Tim didn’t think that Jarvis meant it literally when he said it. It’s beautiful. That’s what the little part of his mind that liked fire a tad too much as a teenager thinks. It’s horrifying. The much larger part, that he’s trying to keep from screaming, is thinking. He, Tony, and Abbi, are all at the Reflecting Pool, with one of those ancient hand pumps, wetting down the grass. They’ve got a ‘great view,’ the whole Capitol is around them, lit flickering orange and smeared with breath-stealing black smoke. The sun should be rising, but right now, he’s got dawn on all sides.

Dry summer. Dry fall. Tim hadn’t noticed. Though, as he’s taking his turn working the pump he’s thinking the last rain he can remember was pattering on the glass room in Winchester. He can remember listening to it, wrapped around Abby and Breena, Jimmy nearby.

That was three weeks ago.

Right now, he’s surrounded by fire on all sides, and acres of withered, brown, dry grass. According to the last update they got from Metro FD, the fire’s five blocks east, and two south. Wind is coming out of the east. Pushing the fire toward them.

Supposedly, they’ll get them out before the fire gets to within a block. Supposedly, they won’t have to try to cross it to get back to the Navy Yard. Supposedly.

Enough of that. Pull the lever up. Push it down. Do it again. Tony’s got the other side. Abbi’s got the hose, wetting things down. They swap every five minutes.

If the fire gets here before they get done, the whole Mall will go up in a matter of seconds. Up. Down. Up. Down. Swap.

Tim can feel his lungs tightening. Smoke’s getting closer and thicker. They’re going to have to move soon.

There’s a wall in each man’s mind. It exists for a reason, to keep the societally acceptable, calm part functional when the emotional part wants to scream, rage, or break down into sobs.

It’s little things, not the big ones that tear that wall down. That wall is there to keep a man moving through the big things. It’s there as a survival tool.

The whole time they were out in the field, pumping water on anything that looked like it might burn, Tim’s wall stayed in place. He made it through ten hours of smoke and flames and hot. So hot. Burning hot air, getting hotter each minute they were there. Hot skin. Hot light pushing at them. Hot sweat.

Part of why they were out there was to give the Metro FD a hand. They literally did not have enough people to do the job.
Part of it was because when the FD tried to put out government buildings, the mob started shooting at them. For some reason, the crowd was less interested in shooting at guys in body armor who could shoot back.

But body armor was part of hot. So hot. No air on his skin. No room to breathe. Just hot skin, and hot sweat, tricking down his body between his skin and the Kevlar plates designed to keep his vital organs safe. Hot hair, matted down from the helmet, soaked through with sweat. Visor that, after a few hours, began to fog up from the heat and his sweat.

And he made it through that. Made it back to the Navy Yard. Even, and this is a testament to how much grit Abbi has, managed to respond to a few of the jokes she cracked as they headed back.

He made it through wanting to take the helmet off, only to have his hand on the strap, and then see one of the guys next to him crumple when he was winged by some idiot taking pot shots at anyone who got in range.

His wall made it through all of it.

He made it back to the Navy Yard, covered in soot, dripping with sweat and blackened water from the pumps. He made it through peeling off the armor, and giving it back to the guys in the armory. He doesn’t know what the hell they’re going to do with it. Dropping it in a vat of boiling bleach might get it clean enough for someone else to use, though Tim suspects that they’ll just try to find a place to let it dry, and then hand it over to the next reasonably tall guy who needs it.

He made it through waiting in line for a shower. Final count showed there were more than eight hundred people in the Navy Yard, and, including the emergency bio-chem attack showers, ten showers.

He didn’t bite the head off of the guy in the men’s locker room who told him no more than fifteen minutes. He can do the math, eighty people per shower per day.

Tim doesn’t make it through stepping in, and finding that there’s only a cold, limp, drizzle of water.

He’s in the shower, shivering after hours of overheating, watching the black soot slowly stream off his skin, crying.

The first day after the news conference, the Navy Yard runs out of hot water.

On the first day, when Jake gets back from chopping down trees with Ellie and Draga, (They’d been put on a different aspect of fire break building, clearing away things that burn. Pine trees, especially dry ones, are basically torches. They’d been chopping them down, as others loaded them onto trucks and drove them to the Potomac,) he starts writing.

As of right now, the Navy Yard has electricity and internet access. Parts of the city are starting to lose power. Fire burns electric lines, it burns the poles that hold those lines up. It burns trees and buildings that then crash into those lines.

He doesn’t know how long he’ll have access to the outside world. He doesn’t know what’s going to be happening with the government after this, but he does have a lot of ideas.

He remembers talking with McGee, when this was still a scandal about greedy legislators stuffing laws to benefit them and their friends into bills. He’d been thinking about the run for Senate after that. Now he’s thinking wider and grander. The whole system just fell apart, and people are going to be looking for someone with an idea of what to do next.

He’s got ideas. And he’s getting them down.

On the first day after the news conference a blog goes live: New Federalist: Thoughts From Inside the Flames.

On the second day after the news conference, Fornell is in for a rude awakening.

“Mr. Fornell, you are an American, right?”

Fornell has been having an excellent week. He and Wendy got to Antigua Sunday afternoon. And since then they’ve been enjoying, in no particular order, the beach, the food, each other, and a large quantity of rum based drinks filled with fresh local fruits.

There’s a little café, right on the sand, where they cook the fish less than 100 feet from where they catch it, and every evening he and Wendy have been eating supper there.

So, after four nights, the cook has gotten to know them some: has their names, that they’re here on their honeymoon, and a few details like that.

Fornell nods. “Yeah. We’re from Virginia. Why?”

“Is that near Washington DC?”

“Yes. Our place is about ten minutes outside of DC,” Wendy says. Both of them are starting to feel cold. The cook doesn’t look like he’s just asking to ask.

The cook nods. He packs up their dinner for them, and then says, “I think you need to go back to your hotel, and turn on the TV.”

“What happened in DC?” Tobias asks.

The cook shakes his head. “It did not make much sense to me. Something about vote buying and riots.”

Tobias and Wendy run back to the hotel, leaving dinner behind.

“WHAT DO YOU MEAN YOU DON’T KNOW WHERE THE FUCK EMILY IS!” roars through Diane’s phone.

“Tobias…”

“YOU DIDN’T CALL ME! YOU DIDN’T—” he hangs up.
A minute later, Gibbs hears, “WHAT? IS THIS FUCKING PAYBACK FOR FUCKING DIANE? YOU LET MY LITTLE GIRL GO, AND YOU DON’T EVEN TELL ME?!? WHAT THE FUCK IS FUCKING WRONG WITH YOU, GIBBS? I EXPECT THIS FROM HER, BUT YOU???”

Gibbs waits a few beats, making sure Tobias will let him talk, and then says, “We think they were watching you, too. Call you, you come running back, and they follow you right to Emily and Diane. You stay on your honeymoon, do what they expect you to do, you and Wendy stay safe, and so do Diane and Emily.”

Gibbs can feel that kick the wind out of Fornell’s sails. A second after that, he hears more cursing, and the sound of packing. “You coming back?”

“Next flight out.”

“To where?” They’ve got news, but right now it’s on ZNN, which is only reporting local coverage. Gibbs knows Reagan is closed, but the wider world, he’s not sure about.

“Atlanta is still taking flights,” Fornell says.

“Dulles isn’t?”

“Dulles, LaGuardia, Philadelphia, Richmond, Baltimore. Nowhere in the Mid-Atlantic is accepting planes right now. The FAA… I don’t know. How bad is it where you are?”

“The fire’s still a mile off from here, and so far none of the mobs have come for us. Either because they don’t know we’re here, or because we broke the story. I don’t know which.” He can feel Fornell nodding. “Tobias, don’t come.”

“Don’t come? You telling me that from your house on the Potomac, well out of danger, in Virginia?”

“No. But I don’t have a civilian wife, and I’m not on my honeymoon, either.”

Fornell snorts at that. The man on the other line was a goddamned Marine. He had the civilian wife and kid, and he left them behind to go into danger and save lives, and Fornell can’t do any less. “Wendy’s going to stay here. I’ll be there as soon as I can. And then I need to find out where Emily is.”

“Ziva’s with her. She’s safe. They were in France yesterday. And no one who’s looking is going to find her.”

“Thank God for small favors. Next time you’re about to blow up the fucking country, you call me first!”

On the second day, Fornell begins the trek to Washington DC.
On the third day, Gibbs feels useless.

It’s the most frustrating feeling of his life.

The whole world, well, DC, is on fire out there, the Metro FD is calling for help, his boys are going out, Abbi’s going out, the SEALs are going out, the Agents, even some of their wives, are going out. Jarvis and Leon are in full body armor, armed to the teeth, and going out.

And he’s not.

He’s here, inside the Navy Yard, with the women, and babies, and old men. Being useless.

He supposes it could be worse. He could be being a jerk in addition to useless. He knew well enough not to (sigh) beg the guys going out to help with the Fire Department. He knows he’s in no shape to be helping to pull down buildings and clear out trees, trying to build fire breaks. Let alone use the hand pumps. Enough of the city is on fire, and the summer and fall have been dry enough, that they’re pulling water from the river, and they’re using everything that will move water, even the hand pumps that have been sitting in storage since the 1950s. In some neighborhoods, they’re using buckets and garden hoses to try and get things damp enough that a loose spark won’t spread the flames.

He thought he could at least help Ducky and Allan. He knows basic first aid. And even if he didn’t he could have covered them. He can shoot. Ducky took one look at him, and then said, “Jethro, I have a finite store of Oxygen. If I take you, with your healing lung, out into the smoke, I’ll be using it on you instead of on people suffering from smoke inhalation.”

The worst part of that is that Ducky’s right. He hasn’t left the building, but he can smell the smoke, it’s creeping its way into the building, and he’s already starting to wheeze.

As he was leaving on the third morning, Leon said to him, “Keep everyone calm. It’s bad enough out there, we don’t need riots in here.”

He wants to smack Leon for that. ‘Keep everyone calm.’ He doesn’t know how to keep five hundred civilians calm. Right now, he’s lucky. The ones that are awake are glued to the TVs, watching the country fall apart, or on their phones talking to the outside world.

Some of them want to leave, and with the exception of Elaine’s girls, he’s letting them go. Idiots want to run into a mob setting fire to every government building they can reach, that’s on them.

The girls are a different story. They want to get home. They want their mom and dad, and they want to help defend the Diner. They aren’t happy when he won’t let them go. “We need to get home, Mr. Gibbs!” Kenzie is saying to him, looking him right in the eye.

“You think your mother and father didn’t know what was coming? You think you aren’t here on purpose?”

“But… They’re alone and the map…” He’s seen that map, too. The neighborhood the Diner’s in hasn’t burned, yet, but between the wind and the fact that it’s located in an area near where the big money lobbyists live (the second area, after Congress and the White House to burn) it’s in the path of the flames. Right now, he and the girls are praying the interstate (right next to the Diner on the east) will be enough of a fire break to protect it.

“They’re building fire breaks. And your mom and dad know where to go when it’s time to bug out. I’m sure they’ll be here soon,” Gibbs hopes he’s not lying. “Come on, let’s get everyone who can cook together. People are going to start coming back, and they’ll want to eat.”

On the third day, Gibbs, along with many of the rest of the civilians, watch a news conference. They hear Metro PD declare a curfew. Anyone out after dark not wearing Metro FD or PD uniforms will be shot on sight. No exceptions.

They watch and hear how right now, Metro will be scooping up anyone who’s even remotely trained with a weapon to join those patrols.

How, as of sundown, they hope to have eight thousand men combing the city, walking the streets, and keeping the peace.

The room goes quiet after that. For a moment. And Gibbs can hear two opinions starting to come out, those who are in favor of this, hoping it calms things down, and those who learned the lesson of what happens when men have too much power and no accountability.

Gibbs knows how this will work. Old scores are about to be settled at sundown. Metro’s going to clean house. Anyone they’ve ever not been able to make a case against. Everyone who’s been on their watchlist… They’re all going to be found ‘out after dark.’

On the third day, just before sunset, Elaine, her husband, and her boys get to the Navy Yard. They’re exhausted, singed, and emotionally battered.

All Elaine’s husband would say, holding a shot gun, is, “Can’t shoot fire. Could handle the mob. Scared them off twice. But fire don’t scare.”

Gibbs looks at them, nods, and says, “You’re alive.” A minute later, their girls are in their arms. Elaine looks over them as she’s holding them tight, and she nods at him.

He nods back.

A few minutes later, as Kenzie’s dragging her parents to the café kitchen, which she’s turned into their territory, he hears her say, “Whoever stocked this thing had something against flavor. There’s no herbs, no spices, not even pepper, just salt and sugar.”

Gibbs decides he doesn’t need to mention that to Tim.

On the third day, at dinner, sitting between Tony and Tim, both of whom are bone deep weary, neither of whom are talking, Gibbs starts to understand part of what he’s seeing.

Frayed nerves all around him. Tense people. Of course they’re tense. The city’s still on fire, they don’t know if their homes are standing, and most of them are not trained or used to this kind of work.

With the exception of the SEALs and Marines, all of whom have clumped together, and are doing their best to make sure everyone knows how much of a joke this is, and that anyone who’s having a rough time with this has never seen a rough time, the rest of the people in this building are civilians.

They aren’t trained for this. They don’t know how to deal with it.

And Gibbs remembers. Remembers what got him, and a lot of the rest of his different teams through Basic and then assignments around the world.

jokes. Little bits of the outside world. Those god-awful stupid movie nights and the USO guys.
Every place he’d been stationed that wasn’t an active front had had a morale officer.

On the third night, Gibbs finds a purpose. He heads over to Tony’s desk, rummages around for a bit, finds a few DVDs and goes up to MTAC.

They’ve got popcorn and butter and movies. On the third night, he starts movie night. And as a few hundred civilians and their families squeeze in to watch a show, he works on figuring out what else they can do. He’s got to keep them in the right headspace, or else they won’t just have to worry about the riots on the outside, they’ll have riots in here.

Just after 23:00 on day three, Jarvis gets confirmation that everyone who was directly involved in buying the elections, from the outside of the US, is dead. Everyone directly involved in buying them in the US, is in custody.

The immediate threat, that they or their families will be hunted down to keep the secret/revenge is over.

The wider threat, the riots, the chaos, that’s going strong.

No one comes home when Jarvis sends out word that they’ve taken down all of the main conspirators.

But, with that done, NCIS suddenly doesn’t have any jobs anymore. Not NCIS in the US anyway. If there’s no Navy, and no Marines, because they’ve all been swallowed into their local National Guards, there’s nothing for them to do.

In the off hours, between going out on humanitarian work, they’d all been trying to do their jobs.
Because it’s real. It’s something to do. It’s a way to stay attached to real life.

But right now, there are no new cases. Which means there’s a building full of people picking at old cases. And that’s going to wear thin, fast.

By the fourth day, the fires are out. Mostly. No one’s setting new ones, at least.
And by the fourth day, Ducky and Allan have come to several conclusions.

First and foremost, they cannot go out alone. They tried. Ducky waved off Jethro’s offer, mostly because he didn’t want Jethro out in the smoke, but also because he was thinking that if he and Allan showed up armed, that might attract the wrong sort of attention.

So, they got the van, loaded it up, and worked under the idea that they’d head toward where the people were and would find wounded people.

This did not work spectacularly.

They were in what looked like a police van, and within minutes of getting out of the Navy Yard, they started taking fire.

“Why are they shooting at us?”

“Because they can, Dr. Allan. It’s an armored van, the glass is bulletproof. We should be fine.”

“As long as we stay inside of it.” Allan began thinking he should have gotten out of DC when he could. He was the one driving, and he was sorely tempted to get them out of the city, and let Dr. Mallard get himself back.

That lasted for three more blocks, when Dr. Mallard said, “Stop. Here.”

It just looked like a random crowd to Allan, but he stopped. “You sure?”

“We are doctors, we go where the wounded are.” Ducky tightened his helmet, which says NCIS on it, and got out of the van as spryly as he could. Allan followed, not about to be outdone by an eighty-four year old.

Ducky started shouting, the medical corpsman voice he developed in Korea, and the MASH doctor tone from Viet Nam, loud and clear.

“Who needs medical attention? We are doctors! Queue up.”

And people started to shuffle out of the crowd. Most of them were lining up, nicely. Some were pushing, shoving, half mad from fear and pain. Ducky and Allan were in front of the back doors to the van, and several other members of the crowd pushed in behind them, trying to grab supplies.

Three times they got people lined up again, got them back away from the van before everything went south. They were treating a little boy with a head wound. Getting it stitched up while he cried and his mother sobbed when someone stole the van.

Fortunately, they were less than a mile from the Navy Yard. More fortunately, sunset was hours away. They made the walk back, through milling crowds, burnt smoldering buildings and cars, in a bit less than an hour.

On the first day out, The NCIS infirmary lost a third of it’s antibiotic ointment, a quarter of its bandages, half of its store of lidocaine, and all of Dr. Allan’s belief in anything approaching the goodness of mankind.

“We will do better tomorrow, Dr. Allan,” Ducky said as they get back into the Navy Yard.

“Tomorrow, we treat people who come to us.”

“If you wish to stay here, and see to our own wounded, that is fine. I’ll gather some extra hands and go out on my own.”

“We got lucky they didn’t kill us.”

“That is true every day, Dr. Allan. Tomorrow we shall prepare properly. Armed guards. Modify our outfits some. Full armor for us, not just helmets and vests. The van. I know we have white paint somewhere.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Paint it white and slap a big red cross on it. We have colored electrical tape somewhere. That will suffice to put red crosses on our armor.”

Allan was very shaken. “They’re going to kill us out there.”

Ducky looked up at Allan, and said, very seriously, “Dr. Allan, a good three quarters of the people who were hurt lined up. They needed our help and were grateful for it. They are not armed. They do not have an armed compound to go back to. They are out there, at the mercy of the savages around them.” His voice shifted deeper, and lower. “They are in danger, and because of how we handled this case, they did not have the time or warning to prepare. The very least we can do is go out there and help.”

“You feel responsible for this?”

Ducky shrugged. To a degree that was true. By then they were back in autopsy, so he went looking for the electrical tape while Allan took his helmet and vest off. “We had an idea of what was coming, and we prepared ourselves for it. I’m not saying I had a better idea for how to do this. Not given how dangerous this information was. And not given how little we truly know about who was in on it and how far they’d go to keep us quiet. But as we watch the news, and as we move outside and inside of these walls, I keep thinking there had to have been a better way to do this.”

Allan shook his head. “I don’t know.”

“I do not, either.” Ducky grabbed the tape. “Here, bring me your helmet.” Allan did, and Ducky neatly places a red cross on it. “Be pleased we have armor. The first time I did this, all that stood between my skin and bullets or shrapnel was army drab cloth, a heavy back pack, a flimsy helmet, and the hope that they wouldn’t aim directly at a the man with the red cross on his shoulders and helmet.”

It takes them a while to get another van set up, and set up properly. And, by set up properly, they mean handed over to the guys in the motor pool, who take the time to modify the top, so that, as long as they drive slowly, the three or so armed men on top with the assault rifles won’t get knocked off.

On the fourth day, Ducky and Allan go out, in head to toe body armor, in an armored van, with two SEALs and Tim on top, also armed to the teeth, and set up shop.

Three assault rifle wielding men covering the parking lot they set up in has a good effect. People queue up neatly. They do it quickly and quietly enough that Ducky gets the chance to triage, and Allan begins treating the worst cases right away.

By the end of the fourth day, Dr. Allan remembers what it feels like to save lives.
Over dinner, as he and Allan work on plans to streamline their system further, they hear everyone go quiet. Another news conference, this one with the Governors of Maryland and Virginia. They are refusing Metro’s request for National Guard troops to help keep the peace in DC.

They are placing those troops at the border between DC and their states.

Anyone who lives in DC won’t be let out. And the only people who don’t live in DC being let in will be those on ‘humanitarian’ missions.

The Mayor of DC, as well as the Metro PD Chief give a brief, and polite statement that boiled down to a ‘thanks for fucking nothing.’

It’s as they’re watching that conversation, that a thought occurs to Ducky, with limited supplies coming in, and no indication that anyone will be leaving, they are very soon going to have entirely new sets of riots on their hands.

After dinner, he and Penny head into the café, and take a look at the supplies on hand. He returns to Autopsy, and checks the refrigerator. Between the two of them, they do the math.

There are eight hundred and seven people in the Navy Yard right now, and at 2000 calories a day, they have three days of food for them.

He and Penny find Vance later that night, and says to him, “Director, I think it would be a very good idea to start sending out foraging parties.”

Penny adds, “And an even better idea to get everyone out of here who can leave.”

Vance, weary all over from a long day walking patrol around the Navy Yard, pulls in a deep breath on the cigarette that began to permanently live between his lips on the second day. “How bad is it?”

“We have three days of food left at this point,” Ducky says.

“That’s if everyone stays,” Penny adds. “They’re letting people who live outside of DC out. Right now, it’d be a very good idea to load up the vans with people who live outside, flank them with security guards, get them to the border, and then fill them up with every bite of food they can find on the way back.”

Vance nods, slowly. Then he asks the tougher question. “How do I get them out without setting up a panic over our own food situation? A lot of the families don’t want to go outside the walls, even to get home, because the trip out there isn’t a good one.”

Ducky looks to Penny, she looks back. Neither of them have a good answer for that.

On the fifth day, they start getting serious about hunkering down into survival mode.

It’s little things that’ll keep a man sane.

For Tim, those little things are texts/calls from Abby, Jimmy, and Breena.
For others, especially the ones who have their families with them, those little things are more concrete.

Tim would tell you he got tons of chocolate, cigarettes, alcohol, and coffee.

And, in an abstract sort of way, for abstract, ideas of people, he did.

He didn’t count on how many real people would end up inside the Navy Yard. He really didn’t count on the fact that by day five, they’d still all be in there, and that no one would be able to get out for more supplies.

On the fifth day, they made a lottery for what’s left of the beer, cigarettes, and chocolate bars. There weren’t enough of any of them for everyone to get one let alone more than one.

Within an hour of the lottery, as the goods are handed out, there’s massive trading going on inside the Navy Yard. A Hershey’s bar is going for $28 by the time day five is over. A bottle of beer is going for $46. The cigarettes aren’t trading for as much, because fewer people want them, but those that do, are hoarding them.

On day five, when Tim goes out with Ducky, he sees Leon coming in, cigarette between his lips, inhaling savagely, like that little hit of nicotine is the only thing keeping him sane. Tim strokes the screen of his phone. He’s read the texts on it a thousand times. They’re the only thing keeping him sane.

On day five, Jarvis claims that everyone with a family, who lives outside of Washington DC, has been offered safe passage to the border.

It takes all day, but they manage to get one hundred and seventeen people out of the Navy Yard. Though, given the fact that each and every single trip gets shot at on the way to the Virginia or Maryland National Guard, it doesn’t take long for the people in the vans to figure out that the ‘safe passage’ was a lie.

It still gets them out.

Which is good, because the scroungers aren’t coming back with much food.

After the first two sets of them return with nothing, Penny has an idea. “Vitamin pills, protein drinks, sports drinks, those weight loss shakes, anything with vitamins and calories.”

Ducky nods at that. Right now, they’re looking at malnutrition and calorie deficiency. If they can eliminate half of the problem…

It won’t be good, but it won’t be as bad as it could be.

The third set of scroungers come back with a van full of gummy multi-vitamins, and weight loss shakes. Not ideal, but better than the nothing they brought in the first two times.

“You need to go,” Abbi says to Gibbs.

He shakes his head.
“Jethro…”

“You can’t leave,” he says it with a wheeze. Tim’s lungs aren’t enjoying the smoke that won’t leave the air, that’s soaked into every molecule of NCIS. Gibbs’ are actively trying to crawl out of his body and go off, without him, in search of real oxygen.

He’s too pale. He starts to cough if he talks for too long. And if he tries to move around too fast, he gets tired and lightheaded.

And he’s still stubborn as a bull. “Not going without you. Not leaving you here.”

“I can handle myself.”

He nods. He knows that. He squeezes her hand, finger tracing over where he hopes to put a ring if they ever get out of here. “You and me, to the end of the road. I don’t walk the path without you,” he stops coughing, bad, “you don’t walk it without me.”

She shakes her head and glares, not happy with him about that, but sure she can’t get him to leave.

Tim is done with this shit. He’s sitting on one of the benches in the locker room, pulling off clothing that reeks of sweat and smoke. Everything reeks now. The whole building is foul. When this is done, he’s going to recommend they pull all of the windows out, because otherwise they’ll never get rid of the smell.

As of today’s dinner count, they’ve got six hundred and ninety people and two washing machines and two dryers. They run them twenty-four seven, but clean clothing is dwindling fast, and detergent is dwindling even faster. Tomorrow, all they’ll be able to do is rinse their clothing, in cold water.

Tim hadn’t had the chance to pack, so between his go bag and what Tony brought for him, he wore his last clean outfit yesterday.

And like almost everyone else who can, he’s been out, working hard and hot.

“McGee, gear up, night patrol.”

Tim glances up at the SEAL looming over him. He’s been back at the Navy Yard for maybe ten minutes. He’s been on medical patrol, all day. He’s tired, he’s achy, and he’s in what can charitably be called a ‘bad mood.’ (He’s thinking of it as ‘raging asshole’ mood personally, and has come to the conclusion that nothing sets up raging asshole mood like having to stare down people with a gun to keep them from mobbing fucking doctors for God’s sake.)

He’s also, intentionally, been avoiding night patrol.

“Shoot on sight after sundown order still in place?” he asks the SEAL.

“Yeah.”

The SEAL, who Tim doesn’t think has been out in daylight, looks like he’s enjoying that idea. “Then no, I’m not moving. I’m going to sit here, get a shower, and then call my wife.”

“Gear up. That’s an order.”

Tim glares up at him, sighs, then stands up. The problem with the SEALs and their big-swinging-dick style of life is that very few of them think he, or anyone else who doesn’t consider this a vacation from the usual grind of full on warzones, has anything between his legs at all, and if he does, they’re tiny, shriveled-little-raisin-sized balls, thus making him incapable of standing up for himself.

And so far, he’s been dealing with it in a reserved sort of way, just quietly ignoring it as best he can. They can’t actually order him around, and until now, none of them have been dumb enough to try.

So much for that. He’s staring right into (and slightly up, the guy’s huge) the SEAL’s eyes. Time to put a motherfucker in his place.

“You seem to be mistaken about a few things, so let’s start with this: first off, you and your order can go to the armory, grab a flamethrower, and fuck yourself sideways with it until you bleed. I am not shooting some poor asshole for sticking his nose outside of his house, not tonight, not tomorrow night, not any night. As long as the nighttime orders are shoot on sight, my butt and my gun stay inside. Second of all,” his eyes flick to the uniform, “Petty Officer, I am not military, and, since you didn’t turn your ass over to the National Guard of wherever the hell you’re supposed to be, you’re not, either, so you cannot order me around. Third of all, I am the number four man at NCIS, and with number two and three out of the building, and with Jarvis having handed in his resignation, I’m the second highest ranked man in this building. It may be a civilian rank, but we’re both civilians now, and it’s a damn sight higher than yours. Now you will turn around and go find someone else to ‘keep the peace’ tonight, are we understood!”

“Yes.”

“Yes, what?” He glares into the SEAL’s eyes, making it immensely clear that if he doesn’t immediately start getting the kind of respect he’s due, that he will flatten the man and enjoy doing it.

“Yes, sir!” The SEAL snaps into the correct attitude.

Tim nods. He doesn’t mind at all if these assholes call him sir. He waits for the SEAL to leave the locker room, and then collapses back into his chair, feeling shaky. Right now, everything gets to him. He has to take a while to calm down before he can call Abby, lucky for him the shower line is pretty long. He knows they’re worried, and right now, he’s doing everything he can to seem normal when he talks to them, including claiming skype video isn’t working.

He knows, if they see his eyes, or if he sees theirs, he’ll break, and not just for a bit of a cry in the shower.

“How’s the outside reacting?” Tim asks. It’s later. Nighttime, he thinks. Time is melting for him. Hours stretching on and on with no breaks in sight. He’s not on guard or walking a beat outside, so it’s probably night.

Abby answers, “I saw on the news today that Texas, Montana, Utah, California, and New Hampshire seceded. Well, said they weren’t sending another cent to the Feds, and their state assemblies are talking about it. Alaska and North Dakota formally requested to join Canada, and the local news says they’re seriously thinking about saying yes.”

Tim rubs his head. “Great.”

“New York is calling a new Constitutional Convention. What’s left of the Senate and Congress is there. They’ve got to stay under armed guard and move to a new location every day to keep them safe. They claim that they’re working on getting new elections set.”

Tim scoffs at living under armed guards. He hasn’t been watching the TV news, it depresses him too much, but he’s fairly sure whatever the hell it is they’re doing in New York, it’s not life in DC.

“Are you okay? We’re only getting dribs and drabs out of DC,” Abby says.

“We’re fine.” That’s his stock answer. If he tries to really talk about it, he’ll either start crying and won’t be able to stop, or he’ll choke on the words. If he doesn’t say it, it can stay a nightmare that’s happening outside of him.

He knows she knows he’s not fine. He can hear it in her voice. “We heard that what’s left of Congress is supposed to have a press conference tomorrow.”

“Lovely. I’m so done with this.”

“I know.”

“Tell me about Canada.”

“Okay.”

On the fifth day, Abby and Breena and Jimmy are getting well-practiced at painting pictures with words. They know Tim’s ‘Skype’s not working’ line is bullshit. They’ve asked if he’s ‘okay’ and Abbi’s told them (over Skype) he’s as good as anyone is.

From that, they’ve put together that seeing them will break him, or seeing him will break them. Or both.

So, they’re just voices on the line.

He doesn’t talk much. Can’t. He tried the first few days, but meaningless chatter wouldn’t come to him, and he can’t make himself say what’s really happening. So, they talk to him. They tell him silly stories about the girls. They send him pictures of their ‘trip.’ They are, slowly, moving east, stopping in little cities all over eastern Canada. They tell him about the food, and parks, and snow.

And they don’t want to hang up. But every night, as they pass the phone around, telling different stories, they stop hearing anything from Tim but slow steady breaths, and eventually, after a few discrete, “Tim, you still there?” questions, they come to the conclusion that he’s asleep.

And if all they can do for him is talk him to sleep each night, than that’s what they’ll do.

Day Six, the fires are “officially” out.

“You ready?” Tim asks Tony.

Tony nods. They’re in full body armor, both of them carrying pistols and automatic rifles. The van is armored, but they’ll only be able to drive two thirds of the way. Abbi’s with them. So is Draga and Bishop. Five man team, a bit lower than optimal, but they know what they’re doing. And where they’re going.
Ducky’s told them, that, at least in the United States, riots rarely hit well-off neighborhoods. In the US, riots are usually a combination of a bad situation touching off people in bad places, where hope is a thing rarely seen, and where there’s very much nothing to lose.

That has not been the case here.

Probably because, while these started as average run-of-the-mill angry riots, they didn’t stay that way. While people who lived in DC flooded out in the first few days, people who didn’t live here, and who hated DC, the government, and everything that it stood for, flooded in.

And they weren’t interested in burning down slums. Destroying the nothing the poor had didn’t scratch the itch for revenge, or answer the call of rageful violence.

They marched, drove, ran to the rich neighborhoods. To where Congressmen, Senators, and the men and women who sold power or lived off of those sales, lived.

And they burned them. In some cases, they took entire neighborhoods, circled them, shot anyone who tried to get out, and then lit them on fire.

So, it’s the five of them, walking in a diamond formation, pistols on their hips, and assault rifles cradled in their arms, swapping out who’s in the middle each block, heading away from the Navy Yard, to the historic district, where Tony’s house…

The whole neighborhood is gone. Tim had been expecting that. Tony’s house was on a street famous for connected people and lobbyists. Somehow, when it became clear who was involved in raising the money that bought the elections, Metro PD didn’t feel like doing much to protect where “those people” lived. The single tallest pieces left are the brick dividing walls, some of which are still two stories high. Most of them are crumbled to fewer than ten feet tall. A few chimneys still rise skyward. Cement staircases, blackened from the fire, and decorated with slumped, melted, wrought iron rails, still jut up from ash-coated sidewalks. A few of the trees are still standing. The active fires are out, but the street is hot, and so is the air. Hot, dry, ashy.

Everything’s ashy right now.

Tony can’t even tell which one was his.

They form square around him, looking out, away from him, not to give him privacy while he grieves, but to keep an eye on the street, make sure no one is coming. Darkness and the teams of armed men who will kill anyone out has made the nights “safer.” Daytime holds no such promises of “safety.” Tim reaches behind himself, and Tony takes his hand. He feels a forehead on his shoulder, and hears Tony start to sob.

There is exactly one area where Tim’s been pulling rank on anyone, and that’s his office. It’s his. He’s hogging it up, and using it for just him. And he doesn’t care if everyone else is whispering and hating how he’s got a little space of his own. (Though, by ‘his own,’ what they mean is that he’s slept in it once. The rest of the time he lets Ducky and Penny, or Gibbs and Abbi, or Bishop and Jake, or Diane and Draga, or Tony use it.) But it’s his damn office, and he’s close enough to snapping as it is, and if he doesn’t get at least some alone time, he’s going to go completely bonkers.

When they get back, he walks Tony over to it, lets him go in, and shuts the door.

“You want me to stay?”
Tony shakes his head. He hasn’t said anything since they saw his house.

“Okay.” Tim sees Tony curl up into a little ball on one of the chairs as leaves.

Gibbs is getting the update from Abbi when Tim comes over to him, flopping down, exhausted, boneless. He’s tired all the time now, but at least when he’s out there, he can keep moving. As soon as he gets inside the walls, he just crashes. Abbi and Gibbs are at the conference table, and he’s sprawled into a slump in a chair next to them.

“I didn’t think he was that attached to the place,” Gibbs says.

Tim shrugs, this is more emotional than he expected Tony to be, too. Not like he ever lived in the place. “Maybe it was what that place represented? Not like he can sell it fast now.”

“Not like he needs to. His homeowners insurance should cover it,” Abbi says.

“That’s why you weren’t devastated,” Tim replies. Abbi’s neighborhood was just as gone as Tony’s. Her home is down to three feet of blackened brick.

“Not saying it doesn’t hurt to see it burnt, but… I’d already pulled everything I loved about that place out. I can rebuild it or sell it as is.”

Gibbs is looking in the direction of Tim’s office. Tony’s got the blinds drawn, so he can’t see how he’s doing, but he can imagine it. Then he remembers something… “Tony’s never owned a house before. And he bought this one fast, not planning on keeping it. I wonder if he bothered to see what his homeowner’s covers.”

“Go in there, cheer him up some,” Tim says.

Gibbs had diagnosed the problem correctly. Ever since looking at a street of nothing but burned out hulks, Tony’s been dying inside. He’s on the hook for a 300K mortgage, a God alone knows how high tax assessment, though he supposes it’s possible he can get it argued down to way less than seven million dollars, what with the fact that he’s now the proud co-owner of a smoldering pile of charred brick. He’s got no equity to pull off of, and while he had enough to make repairs, he doesn’t have enough to build from scratch, let alone up to the city’s historic landmark codes.

Assuming the damn thing still is a historic landmark when they get around to trying to rebuild.

He doesn’t have enough money to fix it, and right now, he can’t sell it for more than he paid for it. He’s not sure if he can sell it for what he paid for it. Location’s meaningless when the entire neighborhood is gone and no one knows when anyone will be able to move in again.

He doesn’t even want to imagine telling Ziva about this.

She calls him every day, and that’s the only thing keeping him going right now. She thinks Jarvis is right, that whoever was running this is gone deep underground or dead. She’s caught no one keeping watch on them. And that helps. The fact that she and Emily aren’t coming back anytime soon helps even more.

No matter how bad this gets, she’s not here, not in the thick of it, not trying to keep their baby healthy on rations that are getting plainer and plainer, and starting to get smaller with each meal.
But it’s not enough. Nothing will ever be enough until he’s out of the city, out of the Navy Yard, and back with her, somewhere nice and safe. Somewhere he can get clean. Somewhere that doesn’t smell like char and death.

Everything in their apartment is going to need to be deep cleaned to get the smoke out, and even if they do get it cleaned back up, his son won’t come home to a pleasant apartment on a decent street filled with nice restaurants and interesting businesses, because he has no idea when or if any of them are coming back. Only reason his apartment only has smoke damage is because it’s too high up to vandalize. Everything on the first and second floors had been broken, ripped apart, shit on, literally and figuratively, and spray painted in his neighborhood.

And maybe it’s not just the house. No one’s sleeping, him least of all. He feels like he hasn’t seen Ziva in years. He hasn’t been able to get through to his Dad, though Tim told him he was in Berlin. The food is shit. The air smells and tastes like the inside of a crematorium. And he drank all of his booze two days ago, so right now, he’s way more sober than he wants to be.

So, he’s in Tim’s office, in a chair, which is not ideal for his almost fifty year old body, curled into as much of a ball as he can get, rocking slightly, making small sounds that might be referred to as a whimper, when Gibbs walks in and he freezes.

Gibbs puts a gentle hand on his shoulder, sitting next to him, and says, “It’s okay. You don’t have to stop.”

Tony sits up and wipes his eyes. “I’m…” He can’t make himself say ‘Okay.’

“I know. You’ve got renter’s insurance on your current place, right?”

Tony nods. “Yeah. It’ll pay for the cleaning.” He sighs, that’s something at least. Save a grand or two when he’s on the verge of financial collapse.

“You’ve got homeowner’s insurance, too. Bank wouldn’t give you the mortgage if you didn’t.”

Tony nods a bit. “Great, so, what… the fat lot of nothing I had in there can be replaced?”

Gibbs squeezes his shoulder. That’s the difference between renters insurance and homeowners insurance. Renter’s insurance covers the stuff inside the building. “It’ll cover the house. Pay to build it up new for ya. Then you can sell it like you planned. Or build to your price range and live there. Not sure if you’ll want to. No idea what the rest of the place’ll look like after, or what the taxes might be. Might get zoned different or something, but… Check’s coming your way. You can pay off the bank, leave it the way it is, sell the land, and pocket the rest.”

Tony blinks, slowly, a smile starts to spread over his face, and then he begins to sob. It’s been too damn much, and he needs the release. Gibbs nods and pulls him close, petting his back.

On the seventh day, Jimmy, Abby, and Breena hold each other as they watch the news. They aren’t getting ‘drips’ and ‘drabs’ out of DC.

They’re getting horror shows.

They don’t know how much information anyone inside the Navy Yard is getting. Tony won’t talk to anyone other than Ziva. Gibbs will say hello, but they can hear the wheeze in his voice and don’t want to keep him talking a second longer than necessary. He needs to get out of the smoke and into real air, but he won’t leave. Ducky hasn’t been in anytime they’ve called. He’s got Penny and Allan with him, and they’re running a mobile infirmary.

And when they get back, there are the people who have come to the Navy Yard seeking help.

Tim tells them that if Ducky doesn’t sleep soon, he’s going to drop. But they can’t make him sleep.
Not when there are battered, bleeding people in need of help.

Tim will only tell them he’s fine.

Abbi’s only chatted for a few minutes. They get the same line from her. They’re fine. Everything is fine. Try not to worry. They’ll be fine, and they’ll see them soon.

But they’re watching, and they’re scared. The IRS and CIA had already had the extra armor put in place to harden it from outside attacks. They’re still standing.

The mob burned out the DEA and the FEC. They didn’t have enough protection. And, having followed Tim’s Urban Chaos Protection plans, those buildings were stuffed with civilians trying to shelter inside.

The DEA put up a fight. The first four times the mob charged them, they shot back. Then someone in the mob came up with the idea of shooting out the windows, Molotov cocktails, and slingshots.

Which meant the people on the inside had the choice of run out into the mob, or burn inside.

They shot their way out, leaving a good two hundred casualties.

The FEC wasn’t so lucky. They weren’t armed to the teeth. The casualty count hadn’t come through on that one, yet.

Best guess, close to six hundred people had been in there, mostly civilians, mostly families of people who worked for the FEC. The mob surrounded the building, shot out the windows, and fired incendiaries. When the people inside tried to run out of the burning building, they were shot.

On the seventh day, it comes out that David York, Theresa Manedel, Jeffry Tanen, William Burke, Jaqueline Fordi, and Thomas Pein, are inside the Navy Yard. Leon wants to shoot the fucker in his building who decided to let that bit of information fly. They’ve still got close to forty journalists of all different stripes, and they are still reporting.

And one of them, who will, in a few minutes be given a gun and told to stand the line, thought it would be a really great idea to publish a live interview with Manedel, explaining what she thought they were doing, and why it was for the good of the country, and how evil the FEC/voting machine companies were for making them have to pay to do it. How if they hadn’t been greedy, they could have all agreed ahead of time, and no one would have ever found out.

On the seventh day, the mob, which had, until that point, been ignoring the Navy Yard, turned against it. Leon starts getting reports when they’re still two miles out. They’re coming, and they want blood. For a moment, Leon’s almost tempted to just give them who they want, and hope that’ll keep the mob off of them.

But he’s seen the news. He can’t trust he can buy the lives of his people with six of the prisoners he’s got.
Lucky for them mobs move slow. Like a swarm of locusts, they get wherever it is they’re going, and they leave nothing but destruction behind, but they don’t do it fast.

On the seventh day, Gibbs is not useless. He, McGee, fifteen of the SEALs, and every other agent who can hit an apple sized target at 1000 meters with a rifle, are on the roof, with rifles, looking for the men in the crowd with incendiary devices.

The mob is coming. The Navy Yard is not armored. And if anyone gets a good throw in with flaming gasoline, they will burn.

Tim hasn’t told Abby about what’s happened to three of their sister agencies. He doesn’t want them worrying if they don’t already know, but everyone at NCIS knows what happened to the men and women in the DEA, FEC, and EPA buildings.

And it’s not going to happen to them.

On the roof, there are the precision, distance shooters. Every car that had been in any of the parking lots have been driven out to create a two car deep ring around the Navy Yard on three sides (the Anacostia River is the fourth side). At 1000 meters out, that’s the far perimeter. That’s the line the sharp shooters are monitoring. At the walls, anyone who can use a pistol is standing, waiting. And on the river, Ducky and Penny are getting everyone ready. If the civilians have to try and float or swim for it, they will.

Tim is not surprised that Jarvis is on the roof with them, cigarette between his lips, rifle held light and steady in his hands, laying on his belly, keeping watch on the crowd.

“No one gets past the cars. Anyone steps over that line, one warning shot, and then take them out.”

Tim hates that order. He hates the fear streaming through him. He hates all of this.

But the crowd is coming, and he can see the effigies, already on fire. The city is running out of food, any water that doesn’t come from a bottle is gray with ash and turns your guts into solid knots, or loosens them so bad you spend the next three days shitting yourself bloody, but somehow everyone has gasoline to burn.

He takes a deep breath, coughs. He’s coughing all the time now. His lungs hate the smoke. Not as bad as Jethro’s, who they have to get out soon. His lips and fingernails are pale blue all the time now. But right now, right now they need him, here, on the roof, with them, sniper’s eyes sharp and ready.

Jethro’s (and the two other snipers) got his own orders. Any incendiary he spots, he shoots. Doesn’t matter if it’s past the car line or not.

Tim sights through his rifle, keeping watch. Up here his job is to shoot the people who are leading, take out the guys with the Molotov cocktails and the homemade mortars. Don’t let themselves get burned out.

They hear Vance’s voice through the loudspeaker, telling the crowd to disperse. Telling them that if they cross the line, the literal line of cars blocking the street, providing a steel buffer around the Navy Yard, that they will open fire.
For a moment, everyone stays in place. They’re restless, and Tim can feel the energy of the mob, feel the reckless, don’t-give-a-shit-about-life-or-death, everything’s-gone-so-there’s-nothing-left-to-lose power of it.

He doesn’t breathe, hoping they’ll break, hoping they’ll run.

They don’t.

The first person starts to scramble over a car, and Jarvis nails the hood less than six inches from his hand.

There’s another pause, a heartbeat where someone has the sense to not want to die, and then that sense flees, and then the mob surges, screaming for the blood of the men who put them here.

And Tim searches, finds his first target, and fires. And again. And again.

And with those shots, and Jethro’s and the SEALs, incendiaries burst, and gasoline, flaming, spreads through the crowd.

Soon it’s not just the lingering smoke in the air. It’s the greasy, sweet char of burned meat.

He’s been up on the roof for more than three hours. The mob’s shrunk back and regrouped twice. Tim’s not even sure where all these people are coming from. (He’ll later learn that they’re sneaking in from all over the country. Caravans of people have been streaking toward DC, out to hunt down their very own senator or congressman. As long as they’re coming in ones and twos, armed with what they can carry, the VA and MD National Guards aren’t doing much to stop them. They are stopping the guys trying to come through with trucks and vans full of weapons and people who want to burn and kill.)

On the third surge, Tim knows this is it. He’s down to his last magazine. The armory is low on bullets. The men guarding the perimeter can’t have much more ammo, either.

If they regroup for a fourth try, they’re done. Nothing left to do but throw the guns at them.

He watches the third wave break. Too close. Surge one they kept out of range of the wall guards. Two got to the far extents of it. Three breaks when the wall open fires, as well as the sniping from the roof.

Four bullets left.

So many men he can’t count them.

And fire everywhere. Licking through the crowd, on the street, the cars people parked outside the Navy Yard smolder.

If the wind turns east, they’re fucked. The fire on the ground will do what the mob came to do, whether they get to do it themselves or not.

If the mob tries one more run, they’re fucked. They’ll run out of bullets before they can break it.
Tim hears screaming, howling, the sound of beasts that lost their minds long ago, voices tearing through the air, demanding perfect justice paid out in blood and pain.

The mob is going to make a fourth run at them.

Four bullets.

Don’t waste them. It’s all a waste. Doesn’t matter if he shoots perfectly, or shoots into the ground. His four bullets won’t stop this.

Tim licks his lips and sights, looking for the flash of a flame. Once he’s out of bullets, he knows what he has to do, down to the perimeter. He’s got a pistol, and worst comes to worst, he’s got a knife.

More than three hundred civilians inside the building, and keeping them safe is where he’s going to live or die.

One shot. Glass busts and gasoline flames and slows a few people down as they try to move around it. He imagines he can hear the few that are pushed through it scream.

Two shots. That one snaps a head back, and the flask of fire falls to the ground, to be picked up by someone behind the first man.

Three shots. That time he hits the flask. And again, he imagines he hears the scream of the man holding the liquid fire as it bursts upon him.

Four shots. He doesn’t see what that one does. His target gets lost in the crowd. He closes his eyes for a second, grabs his helmet, and begins the run to the perimeter. More than two thousand feet, mostly stairs, to go.

His Sig carries fifteen bullets.

Not enough to stop the mob. Not enough to save his life of the lives of anyone in the building.

Just enough to make sure he’s got a good count on the men he takes to Hell with him. That’s all it’s down to now, the size of his honor guard when he gets there.

Panting, wheezing, coughing, standing next to Tony, who’s already firing into the crowd, his heart pounding, he figures this is how it’s going to end, trampled by a mob, defending strangers, hoping his loves won’t hold it against him that he didn’t leave.

He knows he holds it against himself, and if there’s ever another moment like this, he’s running the fuck away from it.

He hears Tony’s gun click, sees him reach for another magazine, and feels his own gun slamming back into his palm. Fourteen shots to go.

The sound changes. Maybe his ears are wrecked from the gunfire. Tony’s shooting next to him. He’s shooting. People are screaming all around, but he thinks he’s hearing clanking, followed by the ripping canvas sound of machine guns.

Lots of them.

And finally, finally the crowd runs.

As they scatter, still screaming, he sees what sent them off. Tanks.
Tim’s so relieved he starts to cry, and Tony does, too.

And then he starts to laugh, hysterical, insane, the whole world is about to go inside out laughing, because a hatch just opened up, and Fornell pops out. “Where’s Gibbs? I told that son of bitch I’d get here. Now, let’s get you re-armed and get those prisoners secured!”
Interlude: Night Seven

A minute after that, Fornell scrambles down, heads directly over to Vance, takes the cigarette from between his lips, and takes a deep drag, a look of pure, sublime pleasure on his face. “Thanks, Leon. Forgot how fucking good that feels.” He savors another long draw as the tanks circle the Navy Yard, setting turrets to face anyone who might come for them. “Haven’t done this since ‘Nam.”

Everyone on the NCIS side of this conversation is still staring at Fornell, still processing the idea that they aren’t all about to die in the next five minutes, and then finally, gasping for breath between laughs, Tony says, “Is Mike Franks about to come rappelling out of a fucking helicopter?”

Fornell shrugs. “Crazier things have happened. Like all of this shit. How the hell did you guys end up stuck in here without enough men to hold DC? I heard that Jarvis gave the Marines and Navy to the National Guards and didn’t think to keep the Goddamed SEALs in DC to keep the place from blowing up.”

In retrospect, that would have been a good plan. That’s also just about the point when Jarvis gets to Fornell.

He eyes the line of tanks bristling with huge guns and says, “What did you do?”

Fornell shrugs. “I borrowed some friends who didn’t leave the Army after ‘Nam, explained who was in DC, and who needed help. They decided sitting on their asses waiting for the National Guard to do something with them was boring, and helping here was a good plan.”

“You co-oped an Army regiment?” Jarvis says.

“Not quite that many of them, and it’s not like they were doing much. Once you get ten miles south of the border of DC, the National Guard’s pretty much done their work. There’s a bit of friction still going on in Richmond, and, I’m getting reports that Petersburg is a mess, but most of the state is quiet.” In 1966, twenty-year old Tobias Fornell was drafted to Viet Nam. His Army record shows he was a good soldier. His final rank, Sargeant, would have been a lot higher if he had been better at not telling officers what he thought about their orders. Jarvis, in his mind at least, is one of those officers, and he’s about to get an earful. “Why the hell didn’t you keep the SEALs, or hell, the Navy, under your command? Wouldn’t take more than five thousand guys who know what to do with the pointy end of the knife to keep this town under control.”

“Because I’m a bureaucrat, not a king,” Jarvis says sharply. That was his big decision. He knew he could have kept the Marines and Navy under his control, and probably could have rallied the Army, too, or at least worked out a good compromise with them, and ended up ruling. He also knew he wasn’t elected to anything, ever.

“Yeah, well, we’re gonna need a king, soon. Still no acting President, and things are getting hairy out there. You hear that the Governor of Texas got all of his senate and congress together, voted on it, and just declared them an independent country. Mexico recognized them this morning, and they’re already getting trade agreements set.”

Tim, finally, thinks of something to say. “Not the first time that’s happened.” Then he starts to laugh again.

Fornell looks at Tim like he’s insane, laughing at that, and then knows what he’s seeing, and his eyes go gentle. “Been a long week for you guys, hasn’t it?”
Vance nods. With each day it’s becoming clearer and clearer who’s a soldier or sailor, and who isn’t. And the civilians, even his police officers, are having a much harder time than the soldiers. “Come in. Let’s get moving, before someone else starts taking shots at us.”

Inside the walls, Fornell tugs off his helmet, and Tony and Tim stare at him. Tobias stares back for a second, and then rubs his hand over his newly bald head. “Did it this way in ‘Nam. Hate the way it’d get all sweaty and matted under the helmet, even when it’s short. As soon as I knew I was going to be in a tank, off it went.”

Tim and Tony don’t say anything to that. Too tired, too stunned.

A few seconds later, they see Jethro, slowly, rifle disassembled and in its case, walking toward them.

“God, Jethro, you look like shit,” Fornell says.

“Thanks,” Jethro says, with a wracking cough. “Love the new look.”

“Sound like shit, too.”

“Outside. It’ll get better when I go in.”

“You need to get out of the city. Go to McGee’s house. He’s far enough out that you’ll be able to breathe again.”

For the first time in days, Tim feels like vigorously agreeing with something. He nods. “Go. Abby told me last night she talked to Heather. The house is fine. Bit dinged up, and we’ve got a mess to clean up in the front yard, but no one broke in.”

“Can’t leave.”

“You can’t even say more than three words at a go,” Tony adds. “You’ve got a Virginia driver’s license. They’ll let you out.”

Gibbs glances at Abbi, who’s twenty feet ahead and talking with Leon and Jarvis about seeing if they can get more SEALs and Marines in here. “She doesn’t.”

“She’s a big girl, who’s doing just fine on her own,” Fornell says.

Gibbs shakes his head, coughing again. “Need every man who can shoot here.”

“They don’t need you dying here,” Fornell says.

“Too damn stubborn for it.”

Fornell snorts. “Yeah, we’ll see about that. What’s the FBI been doing? I’ve been getting nothing from them?”

They head into the building as he asks, and the air is a little better in there. But not much. What’s really better is that the O2 tank Gibbs co-opted for his own is at the door. He slides the cannula into his nostrils and inhales, deep. Then he can answer. “Dicking around with PD some. I think after the DEA building went up, they shut their own building down, sealed themselves in. Haven’t heard from them since.”
“Then I know what we’re doing next.” Fornell says, “We’re rearming you, taking the prisoners, and getting them into our custody, in a building that won’t burn and can’t be mobbed. And then I’m getting my guys and anyone else out there who’s sick of sitting on their asses, getting orders to twiddle their thumbs from the National Guards, and we’re going to stop dicking around. This is insane.”

“Not much leadership right now. Most of us are just keeping our own heads above water,” Gibbs says.

“Yeah, it’s not doing you much good.”

“I know. What took you so long, getting here?”

Fornell sighs, and rolls his eyes, and looks at Gibbs’ O2. “Go stand down wind. I want another cig and I don’t want to blow us up.”

Tim doesn’t stick around to listen.

Shower. That always comes first. That lets him put a little distance between what’s outside and his time with his family.

He’s in there, with his trickle of cold water, trying to get clean. Always trying. He doesn’t feel like he’s ever really free of the ash. Probably because it’s in the water. Probably because the smoke has seeped into his clothing and skin and hair and…

He runs his fingers through his hair. He’s been wearing it longer since their wedding. And Fornell’s right. It gets matted under his helmet, soaked and dripping down his back and neck, tangled in the padding. He’s overdue for a trim, so it’s starting to get in his eyes, too.

He grabs his razor. He’ll probably do a terrible job of it, the blade’s not sharp enough, but he’s not exactly thinking clearly right now. He just wants to get clean. He wants the stink and the sweat and the feel of death off of his skin. He wants the memory of the mob out of his head.

So he starts at the middle of his forehead and works his way back, shaving his hair off, focusing on the feel of clumps of hair between his fingers, and the sting of the razor when it bites into his scalp.

Whoever gets the shower after him will hate what he finds, but Tim doesn’t care. For the first time in days, when he gets out of the shower, he’s able to fully dry off. No damp hair clinging to his head or neck or ears. He rinses it all out after they get used, squeezed out, and hung to dry. The best he can do is blot himself off a bit with them.

There hasn’t been a dry towel in the locker room since the second day.

He’s standing there, naked, scalp bleeding from the six places he cut himself, staring at his clothing. It’s dirty. It smells like death. It’s crusty and rough. It’s damp. All the damn time. Just like the towels, he rinses it all out, squeezes it as dry as he can get it, and hangs what he’s not wearing to dry. It’ll spend hours, dripping and get to clammy and damp before he puts it back on.

The only dry, clean (The scroungers, when they couldn’t find food, came back with detergent and extra toilet paper. Both of which were welcome.) clothing he has is the same dry, clean clothing everyone else has, socks and boxers. That’s it. Washers and dryers running all day and all night... keeps them all in one pair of clean socks and undies a day.

That was Ducky’s idea. They had been doing a pick what you want to wash routine, but he ended that. They’ll start getting trench foot if they don’t keep up the clean, dry socks, and the less that’s said about what happens when you wear the same undies day after day after day, working hard, especially if you’re female, the better.

It helps, some. But they’re wearing the same shoes or boots, day after day. Tim knows he’s sweating through his socks, soaking the boots, too. The boots that never really get dry. And they’re using the same showers. Tim’s feet already burn and itch all the time, the skin between his toes is starting to crack.

Tony, who had eaten his ration before shower time sees him, standing next to one of the benches, looking at clothing he’d just as soon burn as ever put on his skin again, hair gone, defeat rolling off of him.

Tony’s so beaten down he doesn’t even attempt a joke. He just nods and grabs a shower for himself.

“So, what did take so long?” Leon asks Fornell as they sit down at the conference table in the small conference room they usually talk to next to kin in. Gibbs, Abbi, Jarvis, and Leon have not nearly enough food in front of them, and water that’s got a grayish tinge. (One of the jobs the kids do is pouring boiled water through coffee filters. It doesn’t make the water good, but it makes it better. Leon hasn’t been able to get word on what’s happened to the water supply. Obviously, if he turns on the sink, water comes out, but it’s dingy gray all the time now, and if it doesn’t get boiled before it’s drunk, it’ll make a man sick.)

Fornell doesn’t eat. He’s not taking a mouthful of their food away from them. Not if he can help it. He was sure, given what the news was saying, that they’d be low on things like bullets. He didn’t realize how bad the food situation would be. He’s not sure if he’s going to be able to keep going across the lines, but if he can, he’s bringing in food next.

He does, however, take another long, loving suck off of a cigarette. Nicotine and combat always go together for him. Plus it kills his sense of smell, which, looking around the NCIS building, he’s grateful for.

“Air travel’s crazy. We were in Mexico. Got in the air, headed for Atlanta, and they stopped taking flights while we were in the air. FAA walked out.”

“They just left?” Jarvis asks.

“That’s the story I got. Who knows what really happened? Re-routed to Miami. Which wasn’t too bad. Most of that city heard the news and shrugged. I don’t know if they’re the most jaded people on earth, or that’s just business as usual in Miami, so it didn’t faze them. Either way, getting in and out there went fine. Got a car… That was crazy. Day after the news broke, so no one’s sure what the money’s worth—“

“What is it worth?” Jarvis asks. Inside NCIS money isn’t worthless, but it’s value is extremely elastic. A chocolate bar is going for 100 dollars right now. Any food beyond the basic rations costs an arm and a leg. But a high end cell phone costs exactly what it did before this started. (Jarvis knows this because he ‘relaxes’ by playing poker. A condom goes for about $50 right now, and a candy bar or a shot of alcohol is a bet that buys off the whole table. A cell phone or a watch is worth exactly what it was before. At the end of the game, he always gives the watches and cell phones back. Not like he needs six of them a night. The alcohol he’s winning means he gets just enough to take the edge off for about ten minutes a night. And he’s got no use for the condoms, so he’s been discreetly handing them over to different people he knows are here with their spouses.)

“Depends on where you are,” Fornell says. “Right now, outside of the US, value is holding steady. Everyone else uses it to trade, so they’re just doing business as usual. Here… I’ve seen gas going for $58.89 a gallon outside of Atlanta, and for ninety-nine cents a gallon in rural North Carolina. Some stores are doing ‘We’re not paying any income taxes’ sales. Trying to rent a car to take out of state meant that they spent three hours debating if I had to pay in cash, or if they’d take credit, or… Right now, it looks like if you’ve got a credit card you’re fine. In ‘Visa we trust,’ or something like that. Some places will only take cash now, and some won’t take it at all.”

“You get a car in Miami,” Jethro says, trying to get him back on topic.

“Yeah, usually, that’s a fourteen hour drive, straight up 95. But that’s not the route you want to take right now. Miami took the news fine. Jacksonville, didn’t. Had to track wide around there. Then I had to get across the border. Give the National Guards a 500% increase in manpower, and they decide to man the state borders.

“Every state I went through wanted to check my ID, see where I was going and why. Took four hours to get across Florida to Georgia, another three across Georgia to South Carolina, and South Carolina… Nine hours, in line, trying to get to North Carolina. Those good old boys… They’re all loading up their pickups, and cruising north to shoot a senator.”

“Tell me the National Guards aren’t letting them through,” Abbi says.

“That’s the back up. Most of them are not happy about getting turned back, and a lot of the Guards didn’t trust that I was who I said I was.”

“But you got through,” Jarvis adds.

“Yeah. Took four days to get to Virginia. Another two to get the guys together. Then early this morning, we snuck out.”

“You snuck fifteen tanks ‘out’?” Leon says, dryly.

Fornell inclines his head a bit. “Some people may have turned a blind eye.”

Gibbs cracks a smile at that.

Then Fornell looks at Jarvis, seriously. “Call your men back. I know you’ve got commanders who are sick of sitting on their asses. Call ‘em in.”

Jarvis looks around, and quietly says, “If I can get them in, I can’t feed them. No supply lines, no way to get supply lines. I can only keep them as long as they can eat. What’s going on at the DC border, why aren’t we getting any food in?’

Fornell shakes his head. “Food’s there. Tons of it. Trucks are waiting in lines a hundred deep on every major road into DC.”

“Why aren’t we getting any?” Abbi demands.

“When they shut the border, they let were letting food, water, supplies in. The third truck had bottled water. Someone had messed with it. Twenty people died. Now they’re going through each truck.
Each package.”

“Each package?” Gibbs asks, astonished.

“They’re doing collections, food donations, clothing, blankets, everything, all over the country. Stuff is pouring in. But, some church has a food drive. Most of it’s fine. Most of it’s canned goods, pasta, stuff like that. But some asshole dumps ground glass into the protein shake mix. Or another one spikes the Gatorade with anti-freeze. It’ll be three canisters and two bottles out of a whole truck’s worth of food. And they are inspecting anything before it goes in.”

“How much is getting in?” Leon asks.

“Hundred trucks a day. They’ve got a refugee centers in the hospitals, and another in the stadium, that’s where those trucks are going.”

Jarvis groans. “There’s 600,000 people in this city.”

“Yeah. Clayt, if you can’t get your people back to patrol the streets, get them back to inspect trucks. The more people go through them, the more that get into the city every day.” Fornell takes another drag off of his cigarette, watching the ember glow and fail. End of that one. He exhales and says, more seriously. “Those yahoos in New York keep dickering around with their plans for a new government. In the meantime… News says China’s getting tetchy. Treasury isn’t paying out on the bonds. Which means a lot of the world right now is holding worthless US paper. Most of the country, from what I can see is pretty calm. Once you get outside of the cities, life is just churning along, and in a lot of the cities, things are calm now, too. But things are going to get bad, fast, if the rest of the world decides they want to see us pay our debts, now.”

“You’re telling me this,” Jarvis says.

“Yes, because I figure you’re the guy with the balls and the troops to get online, tell the Treasury to start paying the bills again, and they’ll listen.”

Jarvis nods. He didn’t want to be that guy, but if no one else is doing it…

He stands up and says, “Excuse me. Got some calls to make.”

---

Tim can’t take waiting another minute for the shot to talk to his family alone. Really talk to them. He’s about to tear into his office and boot whoever’s in there out, but, as he opens the door, he sees Ducky lying down, sleeping.

Ducky who hasn’t slept in days.

Ducky who they’ve been begging to sleep.

Penny’s laying next to him, gently stroking his chest. She looks up at Tim, eyes going wide for a second, and then she smiles gently, and he nods. He won’t rip them out of here, not tonight.

So he roams the building, desperate for a moment alone. For a space where he can shut everything but the voices of his loves out.

Finally, he settles into the morgue, in the back storage closet. There’s a door he can wedge shut, and the sacks of oatmeal he’s sitting on are softer than bare floor he’d have in his second runner up spot, another closet off of MTAC.

His hands are shaking as he dials, and a minute later he hears Breena’s voice, sweet and gold and soft in his ears. “Tim!”

His voice shakes as he says, “Hi.”

“Honey! We didn’t expect to hear anything for a few more hours. Are you okay? Did something change?”

“I’m… No… Nothing’s changed. Can you just… talk to me?” Can you make it go away? Can you vanish the images in my mind of shooting into the crowd? Can you erase the fire in my mind?

“Oh, baby. Yeah. Sure. Jimmy and Abby are getting the girls washed up right now. Here.” He hears the sound of moving, a door opening, and then wet splashy sounds and little girls babbling and laughing. “Say hi to Daddy, Kelly!”

“Hi, Daddy!”

“Uncle Tim!” he hears Molly chirp. “We miss you!”

He can’t make himself respond, his voice won’t hold for it. He can hear Jimmy and Abby adding their hellos, and how in a few minutes when they’re dried off, they’ll be on to talk. He manages to make some sort of sound.

The sounds of tubby time fades a bit, and then Breena says to him, “Big tub here. All five of them are in there. Abby’s got Anna and Kelly floating with her, and Jimmy’s washing Molly’s hair.”

“Where’s here?” he asks with a sniff.

“Riviere-du-Loup. We’re about two hours north and east of Quebec. Around here it’s either small towns, farms, or woods. We found a cabin in the woods. Lucked out, the farmer who owns it was willing to give us a break on it because we’re ‘refugees.’ It’s pretty small. Two bedrooms, the little one’s the size of the closet at my parent’s place down in OBX, but the girls don’t mind. Bigger one’s half the size of our room at home.”

He can hear her walking around.

“It’s got wood logs for walls, and a big stone fireplace. Jethro would love it. And right now, it’s cold outside, and kind of chilly in here. There’s six inches of snow on the ground. Molly loves sledding. Kelly’s not so sure. She only likes doing it with Abby or Jimmy. And Anna’s under the impression that snow is some sort of torture.

“We sat her down on it, and she batted it with her hands twice, picked a bit of it up, touched it to her face, and then yelled until I brought her back in.” Breena waits a second, sees if he’ll say anything, but he doesn’t, he can’t, so she continues on, “It feels crazy to be walking through snow before Halloween. But, apparently Halloween’s not a big deal up here. No pumpkins out, nothing like that. The guy who’s renting us the place says it’s a bigger deal in the cities, but out here, where you’ve got to walk half a mile to the nearest neighbor, trick-or-treating isn’t a thing.”

Tim nods. He’s trying to imagine snow, and cold, and… “Pine trees?”

Breena sounds very relieved to hear him say something. “Yeah, Tim. Lots of them. Cold fresh air, clean pine, cider with cinnamon and maple syrup in it, and snow. You remember how snow smells?”
He doesn’t.

“Warm, crackling fire at night.”

He makes a pained sound at that, and Breena knows she’s hit something fresh, and hurting.

“Blankets. Lots and lots of blankets. Three thick, nubby, wool ones, and then a down comforter on top of that. Flannel sheets. They’re dark blue with white snowflakes on them. And when we take the girls out, they’re bundled up like little snowmen.”

She’s lulling him out of today, calling his mind to them, and a place where the air is clean and cold.

“Shower?”

“Oh, God, yes!” She jumps on that, knowing that he hates the current set up. “The bathroom is huge. Little bedrooms, but a big bathroom. There’s plenty of room in the shower, and the water feels like it’s hot forever. Close your eyes, baby, shut it all out, just listen to me.”

He nods.

“You’re here, with us, and it’s cold and the air is clean. You’re free. You made the drive and you’re finally here, out of the car, walking to the cabin. You can see yellow light pouring out of the windows and feel the snow gathering in your hair. You feel it Tim?”

He nods again, makes a little sound. On his scalp. No hair left to gather in. He doesn’t say that, though.

“You can see us through the widow, hear the muted sounds through the door, and then you’re here, in the warm and the light, and we’re all here with you, holding you close, wrapped around you. You feel that? Me and Abby and Jimmy, and we’re all holding onto you.”

He whimpers a little, but she thinks that’s a sound of relief.

“The girls are here, and we let go, just for a few seconds, so you can sit down, and they can all pile on. Big, wet baby kisses, and warm little bodies that fit in your arms. Soft baby giggles, and fine silk hair against your cheek. You got that in your mind?”

“Yeah.”

“Good. It’s all there, all real. The girls all around you, and Molly’s asking questions and Kelly’s holding onto you, and Anna’s doing that little hug thing where she goes completely limp on your shoulder, just draping over you. Feel that? Little, baby breaths on your neck. For as long as you need, you’re there, with the girls, all wrapped around you.”

He’s crying, silently, he needs that so much right now.

“Abby’s next to you, your arm is around her, and under your right hand, you can feel Sean squirming around. He’s kicking, good and strong, letting you know he’s there, and can’t wait to meet his daddy and sister and cousins. He’s getting so big, got to be the size of a guinea pig now.

“Abby’s got her arm around you, her head on your shoulder, and she’s holding onto you. Jimmy and I stay close, where you can see us. And when you’ve had enough baby snuggles, we’ll put them to bed, and come hold you, too. All three of us, wrapped around you, for as long as you need.”

“Forever?”
“As long as you need. Molly’ll squirm away, and she’ll bring you the pictures she’s been drawing, and the scribbles Kelly’s making for you.”

He nods. He’s seen pictures of them. Molly’s starting to make drawings that look, kind of, like things. In that she’s still not quite three, that’s a feat. Kelly mostly chews on the crayons and whacks them against the page.

“The girls get sleepy. You’re going to help us put them down. Standing up, holding onto them. Jimmy’s singing, you hear it.” She must have switched onto speaker, because he can hear Jimmy singing to the girls. “You lay them down. Kissing them goodnight, tucking them in.”

He listens, imaging it. His girls all nestled down between dark blue sheets with white snowmen, and thick nubby blankets.

He hears murmured good nights. And clearer, Breena’s voice, saying goodnight, the sound of kisses.

“Good night, Kelly. Good night, Molly. Good night, Anna.”

They make soft, sleepy sounds at him, and he hears Jimmy’s lullaby winding down.

For a moment, there’s just quiet, and for a moment, Tim’s with them, in their cabin in the woods, but he shifts a little, and feels the oatmeal sacks he’s sitting on, and is pulled away from them, back to a storage closet.

This time it’s Abby’s voice that breaks the quiet. “Hey, baby.”

“Mm.”

“Sleepy?”

Not really, but talking takes too much effort. “Long day,” he manages to say.

“Okay.”

“I’m trying to get him here with us,” Breena says. “He’s come home, helped to put the kids to bed.”

He can feel the nod Abby’s giving Breena as she says, “Come, on baby. Food or shower? Which do you want?”

“Shower.” If he hears too much about food right now, he’ll want to eat, but he’d have to get up and leave to do that, and he doesn’t want to move.

“All right. I’m holding one hand, and Breena’s got the other. We lead you through the bedroom to the bathroom.”

“Tiny bedrooms, Tim, but the bathroom and kitchen are big. The guy who’s renting the place to us says he wanted a hunting cabin. And if it was just up to him, it’d be an empty cabin with a fireplace and a sleeping bag on the ground, but he wants his wife to come, too, so it’s got to be comfy.”

“Yeah, and she likes real plumbing and a good place to cook. Jimmy turns the water on, and Breena and I start to undress you. I’m doing your buttons, and she’s got your shoes.”

Tim makes a distressed sound at that. “Not… just…”

“What’s wrong, Tim?” Abby asks.
“Got a shower ten minutes ago, and I already smell so bad I want to claw my skin off. My feet itch all the time, and… It’s just…”

“It’s okay,” she soothes. “We don’t care if you’re stinky and worse for the wear. We love you and we’re going to take care of you. You let us take care of you tonight, okay?”

Jimmy breaks in there. “One moment. Practical care. Pee on your feet, or whatever else might be itchy, when you’re in the shower. It’ll kill whatever’s growing on them and making them itch.”

“Oh. That’s…” Tim’s not sure what to do with that. Kind of gross, but he doesn’t think it’ll hurt to try.

“Yeah. I know. It’ll work.”

“Okay.”

“Where are you?” Abby says, taking the story over again.

“Storage closet.”

“All right, get as comfy as you can, okay?”

He rearranges the oat sacks a bit, turning them into a wedge he can recline against. “Okay.”

“We’ve got you here with us, now. Jimmy’s getting the bed ready. He’s got the massage oil and making sure everything is nice and warm. Breena and I have you in the bathroom.”

“Big shower, Tim, plenty of room for all three of us. It’s gray slate, and the shower head is one of those really wide ones that pour down from overhead. And right now, I’m turning the water on, making sure it’s nice and hot.”

“And I’m in front of you, stripping you off.” Abby says, “None of this clothing is ever going on you again. We’ll get you new stuff tomorrow or the next day, and until then you can wear some of Jimmy’s stuff.”

He makes a sound of ascent. The idea of clean, really clean clothing sounds like heaven, even if it might be a little too short.

“Right now, I’m just getting the job done. Buttons unbuttoned, pants unzipped, socks and shoes and boxer off. Once we get you all cleaned off, we can play.”

“Good.”

They’re both happy to hear him respond with a real word.

“Come on, Tim, water’s good. Get in here with me.”

“Okay.”

Abby can hear his voice settling into the kind of quite that goes with him subbing. “Good job, baby. In you go. Let Breena take care of you while I get undressed.”

“Come here. Even if you are smelly and grungy, you’re never going to be too nasty to kiss. I’m under the water, with you, holding you tight, and right now, we’re kissing.”

“Mmm.”
“Yeah, just like that. My body wet and soft against yours as hot water pours over both of us,” Breena says.

“And a minute later, I’m in there, too. Can’t press in quite as close, but I’m giving you all the hugs I can. You feel that, Tim? Both of us holding you?”

“Yeah.”

“Good, baby, good,” Abby murmurs. “Breena’s getting the shampoo.”

“Abby got it new, for you. It smells really nice, pine and—“

He makes another hurt sound and then says, “Hair’s gone.”

“Oh.” Abby says it, as she and Breena stare at each other. They see Jimmy get up, quietly, and grab a phone. He grabs his jacket and heads outside of the cabin, going to call Abbi or Gibbs and find out what the hell happened today.

“Okay,” Breena says with a swallow, rolling with it. “Soap then. Good stuff. Lots of foamy lather, and it’s really gentle.”

“We got it in Quebec. It’s made with goat’s milk and honey and it smells sweet and creamy. I’ve got one sponge, and she’s got the other, and we’re going to rub all over you. Top of your head down to your toes and everything in between.”

“You feel that, soft, fluffy lather, all over your body, and my hands and Abby’s rubbing the sponge over you?”

“Yeah,” his voice sounds small as he says it.

Abby and Breena glance at each other.

“I’ve got you, Tim,” Abby says. “Just holding onto you. You rest your head on my shoulder, okay? Breena’s washing you off, and I’m holding on, lips against your forehead, one hand on the back of your head, other arm around your torso, hand on your hip.”

“Mmm.”

“I’m in front of you. Hands on your chest, rubbing gently, making sure to get you all clean. One pass, just to get the worst of it off, and then again. I’ve got a slightly rough wash cloth. We’ll get that all soapy and scrub you all over. Abby’s got you, keeping you close, and I’m making your skin pink up. By the time we’re done, you’re pink all over and nice and clean and smell good. All toasty warm and clean all over.”

“Breena shuts off the water, and then we get out. I’m still holding you, but she’s got the towels.”

“So many towels, and they’re all soft and fresh out the dryer, fluffy and sweet smelling and warm.”

Tim groans at the idea of that, but it’s a happy sound, so they run with it.

“I let go and grab one, and we both rub you all over. Every single drop of water gets whisked off of you as we rub you up and down,” Abby says.

“And when we’re done, you’re all warm, and pink, and dry.”

“And tired, right?” Abby asks.
“So, tired,” he says, quiet.

“Come on, baby, let’s get you to bed. Jimmy’s in the bedroom, and we’ve been waiting for you.”

Jimmy is, in fact, just walking back in, and he’s caught a little off guard with that, because he’s been getting the update from Abbi about what happened today, and why it would be hitting Tim so hard. He’s sure he’s gotten the ‘edited’ version of what happened, and he’s about to wet his pants at it, so living through it had to be horrendous.

“I’m here,” he adds his voice, not sure what he’s supposed to be saying, but just those words are enough, because Breena takes back over again. Though both she and Abby are staring at him, trying to get by his look what happened. He looks back and mouths, really bad.

“Come on, Tim, just lie down, on your front.” Tim shifts around until he’s on his stomach, which isn’t really comfortable, but it helps him get deeper into the story.

“Jimmy’s got the sheets back, and right now the bed’s waiting for you, open, a few towels on top of the sheets. You just lie down, full out. It’s a good firm bed, and more than big enough for you to stretch out in the middle and not have your fingers or toes hanging off.”

“Hop on, Tim,” Jimmy adds, figuring out where this is going quickly, and if anyone needs some pampering right now, it’s Tim.

“You feel it, baby?” Abby says. “Nice soft towels under your skin, air’s warm, we’ve got some candles burning, so it smells like pumpkin pies in here. I’m going to lie down next to you, okay. I’m holding your hand, and kissing you, okay?”

“Mmm…” that sounds like a fairly happy mmm.

“Good.” Breena says. “I’m at your feet, and I’ve got some ointment that’ll make them not itch. It’s cool and slick, and I take your left foot, holding under your foot, lifting your leg so it bends at the knee, and set in in my lap. I’m rubbing all over your foot, getting the ointment all over it, so it doesn’t itch anymore, and then I do the right one.”

“mmm…”

They aren’t sure if he’s getting sleepy, or just, like he often is when he’s getting a massage, not very talky.

“I’m kneeling over your hips, Tim,” Jimmy adds. “Hands at the base of your spine, one on each side of your spine, all slick with the massage oil, and then I’m going to lean into them, and just let my weight push them into and up your back.”

Tim groans at that. Jimmy’s done that to him before, and yes, he loves it when the girls do it, but Jimmy’s bigger, so his hands cover more of his back, and his weight makes Tim’s spine pop in all the right ways.

“Yeah, I know. Your spine sound like bubble wrap right now, doesn’t it.”

“Mmm…”

“Yep. Let’s get that all worked out. Slow, steady pressure, all the way up, light and soft back down again, and slow and deep on the upstroke again.”

“mmm…”
“Feet are done,” Breena adds. She doesn’t want to give too much detail on them. If Tim’s itchy, she doesn’t want him focusing on it. “Let’s get those calves. You’re walking all the time, right?”

“M.” That one’s very short. Not even a full exhale of sound. They hope that means he’s drifting off.

“I stroke the oil up and down your calves, nice and slick. Then I start to kneed. Thumbs rubbing into those sore muscles, whole hand squeezing them, over and over. I find all of those little knots and ripple my knuckles into them.”

He moans, quietly, at that.

“Still kissing, right?” Abby asks.

He nods but she can’t hear that. “Yeah,” comes out when he figures that she needs to hear him.

“You know it. Soft and wet. I’m stroking your face, fingers slipping over your eyebrows and cheeks.”

“I love you.” All three of them look at each other, happy to hear a full sentence out of him.

“Love you, too, baby,” Abby says back.

“We all do,” Breena adds.

“Me, too,” Jimmy says. He’d rather just kiss Tim, but he knows they all would, right now.

“And we’re going to make you feel so good,” Abby says. “All over good. Gonna make your skin sing.”

He doesn’t respond to that.

“I’m moving up to work on your shoulders,” Jimmy says. “You’ve been working hard, and I bet they’re sore.”

Jimmy’s right, they are. His left one especially, because it’s taken a lot of recoil shots today.

“How about you flip over, on your back. I’ll sit cross-legged, and you rest your head on my lap, then I can get into them deep enough to do some good,” Jimmy suggests.

“Mmm…” They hear Tim shift around. He’s a little more comfortable on his back.

“You settled?” Jimmy doesn’t wait for a response. “I give you a quick kiss, and then squirm my fingers under your shoulders, and curl them up into your traps.”

Tim can imagine how that would feel, and he groans at it.

“Yeah, I bet their sore. Breena and Abby each have a hand, and they’re going to work their way up while I work down, okay?”

“Mmm…”

“Your left in my right,” Abby says. “Just gently making your wrist circle around, giving your hand a little shake…”

“I’ve got your index finger in my hand, squeezing my way up it, and then rubbing my thumb along the inside of your palm. Gonna do that with each finger.”
“Tim, you up for more than just a massage?” Abby asks. She’s fairly sure he’s not. He doesn’t crave sex when he’s sad, and she knows he’s sad, but on the off chance he might want a happy ending, she’ll happily talk him through one.

“No,” and he sounds so tired when he says that. He knows it’s been on offer every night when he talks to them, and he knows what everyone else has been doing with the privacy his office provides, he’s been doing it, too, when he’s had his office to himself. Night two, they had a really nice four part story. That got him out of his head, out of the fires, out of all of it for a while, but right now, he just… can’t.

“That’s okay. You just relax,” Jimmy says to him. “Just close your eyes, drift, and let us take care of you.”

“mmm…”

It’s maybe a minute after that that they hear Tim’s breathing slow down, and he stops responding to anything they say.

“We’re all unloaded,” an Army Lt. says to Fornell.

“Thanks, Tom. Time to go see what’s happening with my people.”

Gibbs nods to Fornell, offering to walk him out. He sees that they have Manedel and York, but not the FEC guys.

“Only taking half?”

“Split them up, take some of the heat off of you guys.” Then Fornell says more quietly. “You’re hurting for food, I can see that. But I can also see you planned for this. FBI didn’t, did they?”

Gibbs shakes his head.

“Okay. Look, we’re going to be trying to keep the peace. And no one’s stopping a tank to search it, so we’ll be bringing supplies in.” They both know how little gear you can shove into a tank. “Might be a while before we can get back to you.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. “Ducky’s saying we’re at three days of food. So far the scavengers have been bringing something to eat in. Might just be vitamins, but they haven’t come back completely empty, yet.”

Fornell nods. “Gibbs, get out. You can’t breathe. And every mouthful you eat is something someone else who can’t leave can’t eat.”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Can’t. Won’t leave her. Won’t leave my boys.” His look to Fornell says a whole lot. “They aren’t military. They never trained for anything like this, and it’s wearing on them.”

Fornell nods at that, too. “McGee’s holding on by his fingernails, and I’ve never heard DiNozzo make so few jokes.”

“Someone’s got to keep them going.”

“Yeah, well…”
Gibbs nods again. “I know. This can’t last too much longer.”

Fornell shoots him a dry laugh. Then he thinks of something, “Where’s Diane? She was here, right?”

“When Jarvis got word they’d taken out all of the conspirators, we got her out. She took Mona, too. Last I heard she was home, cleaning up, and trying to get Emily home, between talking to every journalist on Earth.”

“Good. She doesn’t belong in a place like this.”

Gibbs inclines his head. None of us do written plainly on his face.

“Trying to get Emily home?”

“Ziva got them out on a Navy transport flight.” They both know that right now, that’s not an option for coming home. “They’ve got money, but, like you found, flights into the country are iffy right now. They’re working on it. No airport person in their right mind wants to tell Diane he can’t get her child back to her.”

Fornell’s look makes it clear that he doesn’t envy the man who has to tell Diane that he can’t get the plane to go. Then he hugs Gibbs, giving him a good thump on the back, and its sheer luck he picks the side Gibbs didn’t get shot on. He pulls back, re-buckling his helmet. “Stay safe.”

“You, too.”

“What happened?” Abby says, sounding scared after they hang up the phone.

Jimmy shakes his head, letting his own, second-hand, fear finally free. He rubs his face and says, “I got Abbi… Someone let slip who they had in holding, and the mob tried to burn them out.”

“Oh, God!” Breena says it while Abby’s breath sucks in fast.

“But they’re okay,” Abby says.

“Yeah. I didn’t have time to get all the details. Abbi got called away, but… He was on the roof, sharpshooting. Too many people were coming up with incendiaries, and his job was to shoot them before they got in range.”

“Oh…” That’s a pained sound. Abby knows Tim’s not cool about killing people. Even when it’s literally they die or he does, he’s not calm or collected, let alone happy, after that.

“He ran out of bullets for his rifle, headed down to the outside walls, and was shooting with his pistol.” Jimmy feels like he shouldn’t say these things, but they scare him so bad, he can’t see not sharing them. He can see the horror on Abby and Breena’s faces, too. “And then, apparently, out of nowhere, Fornell shows up with a tank.”

“A tank?” Breena asks.

“Yeah. He had more ammo for them. She says they’re safe, now. And should be fine. He rearmed them and then took the prisoners out.”

“A tank?” Abby squeaks. “A tank? They needed a tank to break the mob?”
“More like eight of them.”

Both of the girls moan at that.

“He’s got to get out of there!” Abby says. “He has to get out of there, right now! He doesn’t belong anywhere they need tanks to protect.”

“I said that to Abbi.”

“And…” Breena replies.

“She’s going to try to get him and Jethro out. Almost everyone else with a Virginia or Maryland residence is out.”

“She better get him out!” Abby says, looking very angry.

Jimmy nods.

When Jethro heads back in from seeing Fornell off, Abbi’s waiting for him.

He can see her watching, eyes flitting over everything. She’s making sure their walls are safe. He approves.

“This was you in uniform, wasn’t it?”

She nods. “I didn’t think I would, but… I missed it.” He nods at that, too, wrapping his arm around her. “Feel so much more alive right now, necessary.”

He looks out at the perimeter. He’d spent the whole assault up on the roof. His job was to stay up there and keep sniping until he ran out of bullets or someone killed him. But she’d been down here, on one of the corners, with a machine gun, laying down fire to the mob’s left flank.

“Combat beats paper pushing?”

“Yeah.”

And he always agreed with that, too. He can see it in a lot of the other soldiers, feel it in himself, too. It’s why he can’t leave. It sucks, it’s horrible, he hates it, but he needs it, too. This is being alive. This is putting his physical body, his skills, his mind, his rifle between the mob and the people he loves. This is what he was born for.

She’s looking at him, hard, really searching his face.

He gives her a what? look.

“Jimmy called. Tim’s hurting.”

Gibbs thinks and realizes he hasn’t really seen Tim, who hasn’t exactly been enjoying himself, since this morning. He nods to indicate that he knows Tim’s not doing all that well.

“I told him what happened today, and he wants Tim out of here.”

Gibbs thinks about that. Tim’s not doing great. It is wearing on him. “We’re better off with him
Abby nods. “I agree. There are a lot of people I want out of here before Tim.” She gives Jethro a hard look. She understands why he won’t leave, she knows what’s going on in his head, but she hears the coughing when they try to sleep, she sees the blue in his lips and nails.

He shakes his head. If she’s in here, he’s not going anywhere.

“If Jimmy’s not just being overly concerned, will you leave to get him out?”

Jethro looks at the walls. Today they pulled through by the grace of God. If Fornell hadn’t shown up when he did, all they would have been doing was buying time for the civilians to see how well they could swim for it.

“We need every man who can shoot on that wall.”

She nods. And more than anyone who can handle a pistol, she needs sharpshooters. She needs the guys who can take out the Molotov cocktails before they’re airborne. That’s the only reason she hasn’t pitched a full on future ex-wife fit and demanded that Gibbs leave.

“You gonna ask him to get me out?”

She shrugs. “See what happens, see how both of you do. We get wild fires again, and I don’t care if you’re the last sniper in the building, you’re out of here. I’ll tie your ass up, tape your driver’s license to your forehead, and have Ducky drop you on the other side of the border.”

Gibbs smiles dryly at that.

Jarvis makes calls late into the night. He finds out several things.

First of all, Fornell only had part of the picture. The reason why so few trucks are going through isn’t a lack of manpower. It’s that a man, on his own, can’t tell the difference between a twenty-five pound bag of flour, and a twenty-five pound bag filled with twenty pounds of flour and five pounds of rat poison.

Unless the packaging is obviously tampered with, and so far, it hasn’t been, there’s no way, by sight alone, to tell what’s been messed with.

They’re checking each and every single package with a mass spec. Only way to know for sure what’s in the bag, box, or bottle going into the city.

Right now, the only things they’re letting in, un-checked, are canned goods.

He could call up ever SEAL on the planet, and unless they know how to use, and have, a mass spectrometer, they can’t speed this up.

He does, however, volunteer their mass spec, along with people to run it, if the Governor of VA will be willing to let two DC families out of DC.

That deal gets made in a matter of seconds. He hopes that Zelaz and Corwin and their families will be happy to get out, and more happy to use their skills to get people fed.

That done, he makes a few more calls. He doesn’t want to be the ruler, dictator, whatever… of the United States. There are many reasons for this, but the most basic one is that he’s not sure if he’s the sort of guy who could give it up if he got it.

And he doesn’t want to find out.

He knows that the interest on the national debt runs at more than a billion dollars a day, so he can’t just use the money Diane tucked away to make this problem go away. The Treasury has to get back up and running again.

It’d be nice to say that reason and goodwill got the job done. That just explaining why that money had to get moving again would have gotten it moving, duly elected government support or no.

It didn’t.

Explaining, in extreme detail, how the same SEALs who took care of the people from outside the US who were buying off the elections would show up and hunt down the Treasury secretary, as well as all of his family and friends, did.

Jarvis glares at the phone as he puts it down. Never let it be said that violence doesn’t solve problems. Violence solves lots of problems, all sorts of problems. The Navy Yard is pretty quiet by the time he’s off the phone, but he’s too wired to sleep. He walks the walls, watching, seeing no one moving toward them, and then finds a poker game.

Maybe if he’s really lucky, he’ll win enough alcohol to put himself to sleep.
On the eighth day, Tim wakes up when the door he’s sleeping next to whacks him in the back. Fortunately, it’s a fairly gentle whack.

Tim sits up, groggy, and sees Elaine standing over him.

“Sorry, hon. Didn’t know anyone was in here.”

“I just…” He looks around, blinking in the sudden light of the morgue in his storage closet.

“I know.” And she does, right now, everyone is upside down all the time. Work’s still got to get done, though. “Feel like giving me a hand?”

“Uh… Sure.” He rubs his eyes and sees what she wants. The last twenty-five pound bags of oatmeal. Only four of them left. When he bought them, and twenty-six others, it seemed like more food than anyone could possibly eat.

He thinks about it, lifting two of the bags. When he bought them, this storage room was full. So was the kitchen. Now he can pick up half of what’s left in here.

“What’s left in the kitchen?”

She shakes her head. “Not enough.”

When he bought it, a pallet of oatmeal was enough food to handle everything. But right now, as he’s trailing behind Elaine, thinking it through, he realizes that 100 pounds of oatmeal, when cooked, is two hundred pounds of food. Two hundred pounds of food, split between almost seven hundred people…

“A cup a piece?”

“There abouts.” But he can hear in her voice that ‘abouts’ means less.

“Do we have anything else?”

“That’s it.”

That breakfast, Tim helps make the oatmeal, and, since this is his first time in the café, seeing exactly how little food is left, he makes a decision.

They’re all getting vitamins. Plenty of them. And the scroungers came back with more than a thousand protein bars, so they get one of them a day, too.

He keeps them for himself, and then he wanders through the first floor, where families are sitting around, waking up, getting ready for the day. Tim listens, his dad ears on, and when he hears the sort of whining that sounds like ‘hungry’ to him, he heads for it, and hands over his oatmeal.

Day eight is the day Tim starts sharing his food.
On the eighth day, the foraging parties come back empty. Not even protein bars.

On the eighth day, the Navy Yard goes on half rations for adults, three-quarter rations for children. At that rate, they’ve got enough food to last for two more days.

On the upside, malnutrition won’t be an issue. They’ve got tons of multi-vitamins. They’ve got vitamin enriched diet “meal replacement” shakes. Those two days of food includes two vitamin enriched protein bars per person.

What they don’t have is calories. At least, not enough of them.

Much to the surprise of no one, Tony DiNozzo is one hell of a scrounger. But even a hell of a scrounger has to have something to fucking scrounge. They’ve been coming up empty. Everything he can think of that might have food, they’ve been to, and been over, with a fine tooth comb. Supermarkets, restaurants, cafes, movie theatres, museums even. They’ve been going through office buildings to raid the vending machines and pull gum and snacks out of people’s desks.

Nothing. It’s all picked over. On day nine, he’s with Bishop, Jake, and Draga, all looking at a map of DC, trying to think of what might have food.

“What about hotels?” Jake asks.

“Picked clean,” Tony says.

“Not the restaurants or kitchens. The rooms. Those little mini-fridges.”

“Empty,” Tony says. Mini-fridges were day three.

“Keep listening,” Jake says. “They probably keep the snacks and mints and stuff in housekeeping, not with the rest of the food supplies, because the housekeepers restock them. Might just be a big bag of mints or something, but…”

Ellie looks around the ground floor, where kids are listless, whiny, and arguing, and adults are stressed to the breaking point, and rapidly comes to the conclusion that even one bag of mints would probably raise spirits. Even if there weren’t enough to pass out one for everyone, it’d be a new flavor of oatmeal or something.

Tony shrugs. That’s a better idea than anything he’s got for today.

They get a van, and head out.

The first three hotels are empty. At this point, pretty much everyone who can get out of DC, has. And that means most everyone who might be in a hotel, is in a hotel, somewhere else.

Draga’s walking next to Tony, rifle at the ready, as they check the second floor of the Hamilton, and says, “It’s like Fallout 3.”
Tony looks over at him, also with his rifle ready. “What?”

“It’s a game. Post-apocalyptic DC. In the game it’s after a nuclear war or something.”

“Tell McGee about it. I’m sure he’s played.”

Draga snorts a bit. “You spend the game scrounging around, looking for food and weapons.”

“But in the game, you find them, right?” Tony says, dryly.

“Yeah. In the game, you’ve only got to keep you fed.”

Tony nods. If all he had to do was keep himself, and the rest of their core group, fed, he could do it. And likely, he could keep doing it. One box of Twinkies divided by seven people can make a difference. By almost seven hundred… You might as have not found them in the first place.

If it was just him, his team, and his family… They’d be hungry, but not ready to eat the cold cases just to have something to chew on.

Bishop and Jake come running to them. “Tony!” her eyes are sparkling.

“You got something?”

“You got something?”

“Come on!” Jake says, also gleeful.

They wind through the hotel, fast, moving up and up the floors, until they find main house keeping on the sixth floor. Bishop stops at the door, and then flings it open, saying, “Voilà!”

Tony feels an awed breath go sliding out from between his lips. This is where they kept all the goodies they were stocking the mini-fridges with. Draga, Ellie, and Jake are already helping themselves to some of it. That’s part of his rule for scrounging, scroungers can have one of whatever they find for themselves. The rest has to go back.

He grabs his phone. “Leon, fast. Every van you can get, and security for them. Everyone with a gun. We’re at the Hamilton hotel.” Then he jumps into that closet, tearing into a bag of chips like it was a twelve course tasting menu at the French Laundry.

Unlike Fallout’s post-apocalyptic wastelands, most of DC, including where they are now, has power.
A lot of it still has internet, too.

Which means they’ve got to be ready to move fast. One van, that could be anyone scrounging around. And more often than not, that van is empty, save for the scroungers. But there are always people watching, and if it looks like a van has something in it, the mob will notice and they will tweet, and then they come.

Word gets out that someone’s found food, next thing you know, there’s a horde of people trying to get that food. Tony’s seen footage of it. Some scrounger finds food, and if he doesn’t have enough guys on his van, the mob comes, rocks it until it tips over, and then takes everything. Sometimes they don’t kill the driver.

He’s been too damn close to it, too. Twice he’s had to shoot over crowds to get his own van back to the Navy Yard. Usually, a few bursts with an automatic rifle over the crowd disperses it, and they go looking for easier prey, but as everything gets more picked over… Tony doesn’t think it’ll be long before he has to shoot into the crowd to break it.

They’re staging inside the hotel, getting things ready to load fast. They fill the carts that normally carry toiletries and cleaning supplies with bags of mints, chips, pretzels, granola bars, and peanuts. They load mini-bar bottles into laundry bags, and start humping them down to the ground floor.

Bishop stands watch. Close enough to the door to see when the NCIS vans come, far enough back that a casual onlooker from the street probably won’t see her. She keeps her finger on the trigger. Tony heads up again, looking for more housekeeping storage rooms. Jake and Draga keep bringing more stuff down.

The first van gets there in forty-minutes. Three guys on the top, armed to the teeth. One driving. Six of the SEALs come out, ready to move goods and move them fast.

They start grabbing food, getting it into the van fast. Less than a minute, they’re loaded up, and out of there. Bishop nods to them, she heads back up to scrounge more. Two SEALs keep watch, inside the lobby, fingers on their triggers, waiting for the next van. The rest of them go with her, looking to see what else might be hiding in these halls.

It’s not just a matter of loading up the vans and getting back to the Navy Yard safe. Though they do manage to get the first load in without any excitement.

Then it’s a matter of unloading. Inside the Navy Yard is as much of a challenge as outside. There are still more than 690 people in there, and making sure they don’t mob the van is an issue, too.

That’s part of where the Marines that Jarvis brought in are worth their weight in gold. With him and Abbi keeping them in order, discipline holds. They unload bag after bag of little chocolate covered peppermints, and then come the pretzels and peanuts. Crunchy, salty, sweet, junk food.

The civilians are getting restless, seeing that food starting to pile up.
“McGee.” Tim hears Vance’s voice. He’d been on the roof, keeping watch. He looks away from the street, toward Vance.

“Leon.”

“They’re bringing in food. I need another lotto.”

Tim nods. “Okay.” He stands up slowly, and hands his rifle to Jethro.

He drifts down to his computer. It’s an easy program, but it still takes him two tries to get it right. Somehow, he’s having a hard time making his fingers hit the right keys to create a random name generator.

He’s got the name of everyone in the camp. He just has to make his computer spit them out. Finally it’s up and running. Tim takes it up to the main floor, where people are milling around, eyeing the pile of snacks. His own stomach rumbles at the sight.

He hits the button and “Sylvi, Jamie” pops up. He calls it out, and five-year-old Jamie comes up and gets the first tiny handful of treats.

He’ll spend the next nine hours distributing mints, snacks, cookies, and any other food they find that way. The little bottles of alcohol he’ll modify the parameters on, adults only for that.

The rest of the goodies will be handed out one per family.

---

The second van doesn’t get filled with food. As Tony’s moving from room to room, he’s thinking about how much he wants to tell NCIS to fuck off, grab his family, and make their stand here. Soft beds, blankets, pillows, showers, God, showers. All the fucking showers with hot water and so much comfort.

Grab the top floor, keep guns on the stairwells, disable the elevator, and they can stay here, in comfort… until the mob burns you out.

So much for that fantasy. But he makes the decision to get as much of the hotel back to the Navy Yard as he can.

They stuff one van with just pillows, and send it back to the Navy Yard.

The next van, they load three industrial sized washing machines into it, and pad them with every towel they can stuff in there. They are going to start getting more clean clothing.

Another van of pillows and towels.

One more pillow run. Everyone’s getting a pillow. Everyone is getting a towel.

Toiletries. Everyone who brought a week worth of toiletries is washing themselves with the hand soap from the NCIS bathrooms, and that’s running out fast, too. One van full of soap, shampoo, conditioner, detergent.

One last van, this one filled with more food. All of it tiny snacks from the vending machines and hotel mini-fridges. None of it’s nutritious. It’s all got too much salt, sugar, or fat, and absolutely no one cares.

It’s food. It’s tasty food. And when they bring it back to the Navy Yard, they’re treated like gods.

They manage to get one more run in before the sun sets. More pillows, more towels, and boxes and boxes filled with those single serve coffee packs.

On the ninth night, everyone parties.

---

Day Ten, Abbi get word from Omagi, what’s left of Congress has set a bench warrant for everyone he’s got in custody. They want them brought to New York to stand trial.

Leon gets a similar call. The New York National Guard is sending a two platoons of men to come and grab every conspirator they’ve got in custody. They’ll be brought up to New York and publically tried.

Leon’s fine with that. Twenty-eight fewer people he’s got to feed. People he no longer has to protect. He does have one condition. “I need two hundred pounds of food for every man you take.”

The Marine Captain he’s talking to is confused by that request. “Like, just, anything?”

“I don’t care what it is, but we’ve got to be able to eat it. They aren’t letting citizens of DC out, and they’re only letting a dribble of food in.”

“Okay. I’ve got MREs, you’ve got thirty prisoners, right?”

“Twenty-eight.”

“Call it six thousand pounds of MREs?”

“Yes!” And for the first time in more than a week, Leon feels the knot of fear and pain and hopelessness in his stomach ease a little. And then, remembering what they’ve had to do to get food into the Navy Yard, it tightens back up and he says, “And you’ve got to make sure no one sees you bring it in.” If word gets out that they’ve got that much food, they’re going to have a mob at their door again.

“We can do that. It’ll take us three days to get there.”

“Three days!” He feels like he’s been punched in the guts.

“You aren’t the only people we’re picking prisoners up from. Your teams stuck conspirators all around the country, and we’ve got to get them all.”

Leon rubs his eyes, and inhales hard on his cigarette, the only thing keeping him from screaming. “Okay.”
He tells Jarvis about it later, and Jarvis raises an eyebrow, before letting Leon have a drag off of his cigarette.

“Your wife going to scream about this?” Leon asks.

“I think she’ll understand. Especially if I quit again after.” He doesn’t expect that’ll be too hard. It wasn’t the first time he did it, and unlike Leon, who seems to be craving them, the only reason he’s doing it is because nicotine is an appetite suppressant, and it’s keeping him from going bonkers on the food situation.

Leon scoffs. “Nicotine gum, two years, then toothpicks for another four… Lara’s going to hate this.”

Jarvis shrugs and hands Leon another pack. He’s been winning more than he can smoke himself at poker, and anything that keeps Leon from completely imploding is worth giving to him. Then he changes the subject. “A few platoons?”

Leon feels stupid that he didn’t see that earlier. “Yeah. He’s got no idea what he’s getting into.”

“No.” Jarvis rubs his head. “That food’s not getting here anytime soon. Where else can we look?”

“DiNozzo’s been through everywhere to go through. Your guys are fishing and I think they hunted the local pigeon and squirrel population down to nothing.”

Jarvis nods at that. Elaine’s kept ‘soup’ on the whole time she’s been here. Now, it’s mostly water, and they’re all better off not asking what the tiny scraps of meat in it are.

“Any news from Fornell?” Jarvis asks.

Vance shakes his head. “How about outside?”

“Treasury’s printing money again, so no one’s rumbling about not getting paid anymore. The group of Congressmen that got up to New York aren’t happy about that. Half of them seem to want to see if China really will attack if we default on the debt, and half of them want us to do it just to wipe the slate clean so they don’t have to figure out how to pay it off.”

Leon shakes his head. “Elections?”

“Nothing yet. King proclaimed himself head of an interim government until they can get an election plan in place.”

“You calling the tune they’re dancing to?”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Not the guy for that job.”

“You think you’d do a worse job than the ones we just got tossed out?”

Jarvis inclines his head at that. Leon’s got a point. “You’ve got a Virginia driver’s license. We can take you to the border, and you can head on up and take over.”

Leon holds up his hands. “Not for me.”
Jarvis nods. “Exactly.”

By day eleven, the treats are gone. And, even with several good ideas, the scroungers come home empty handed. Even the pet stores are empty. Tony thought, maybe, they should check out the zoo. But, in the end, none of them are willing to go into an enclosed space with massive, starving carnivores who are, in all likelihood, better hunters than they are.

On day eleven, Tony and the rest of his scroungers start scouting the DC/Virginia border, looking for a way to get over to bring food in and take people out.

He comes back distraught. Every road out of DC has Virginia or Maryland National Guardsmen on it.

On day eleven, Jake checks, and sees that his blog is up to 436K hits a day. He’s been writing about what they’re doing, how they’re living. He’s also been writing politics, and where he wants to see the country go, how to fix this mess.

In his writing, he was smart enough to not let on that he was in the same building with the FEC guys. Not that that helped. He was on the wall that day, firing blind, and he’s never going to forget how scared he was, how bad that hurt.

So, he channels that into his words, into his ideas for how to make things better. And by day eleven, he’s decided that he needs to know how they got here. Not like he’ll have all that much longer to find out. Rumor’s flying around that they’ll get to swap out the prisoners for food. (Though, personally, he thinks that rumor is wishful thinking, designed to keep people from going mad as they try to make due on 1000 calories a day.)

But, in case it’s not a rumor, and the prisoners really are going, he’s got to talk to them soon if he’s going to talk.

1932. That’s when this plan started. He knows that from looking at the finances of that one account. He knows, in general what was going on that year. He knows it was the Great Depression. He knows that’s when Roosevelt won. But… he doesn’t know why then. He also can’t figure how they decided to share power, or how they decided who would win what.

He asks Leon if he can go talk to the prisoners, and Leon just looks at him. “I’m not going to write about it. Not going to let anyone know they’re still here.”

Leon nods, slowly.

Jake heads down to holding. They’ve all been in the same cell for twelve days now. They’re all thin. If the people in the Navy Yard are getting short rations, the guys down here are getting less. According to Ducky, people can and have lived on significantly less food, with much less nutritional value than these four are getting.
According to the internet they can go somewhere around twenty-one days without food. Jake dearly hopes he won’t have to find that out first hand.

All eyes are on him, hopeful that he’s got something to eat. They see he doesn’t have food and slump back into inactive disappointment. When he says, “Tanen,” the one time President of the Federal Election Commission flinches away from him.

And Jake realizes why. He doesn’t look like a lawyer anymore. His beard is scraggly. (He didn’t think to bring a razor, and he’s not about to trade either of his tiny bottles of scotch, won in the lotto, or his last condom, won in a poker game, for one.) His suit is… not really a suit anymore. It’s a pair of slacks that might have been gray, or tan, possibly brown, but likely not black, and a similarly unnamable colored shirt, with ragged cuffs, and two missing buttons. His shoes… he’s not sure what happened to them. He’s been wearing armored boots since his first day out cutting down trees.

His hands aren’t soft anymore. Red, chapped, bleeding, with the start of some serious callouses, but not the smooth, soft skin he used to have.

“Now!”

And Tanen, looking afraid for his life, scuttles to the bars. “What?” he sounds timid.

“Talking. I’m working on fixing this mess, and I need to know how we got into it.”

Tanen shrugs a little at that. Jake sits down, back against the wall, and Tanen does, too, facing him through the bars.

“Why 1932?” Jake asks.

Tanen glances at the other three members of the FEC, they all look back, none of them happy with this. Tanen licks his lips and says, “You know much about the history of the late ‘20s early ’30s?”

“Yeah. That’s basically it. But, remember that didn’t just happen in the United States. The whole world economy crashed. And everywhere had different ideas for how to fix it. In the early ’30s the Democrats and Republicans tried a lot of different ideas, and they didn’t work all that well. At the same time the Socialists, USSR force everyone into collective farming Socialists, were getting popular. So were the Anarchists. Not the hippy-dippy peace and love anarchists, but the guys who throw bombs. Fascism… that was getting popular. Even a few monarchist-types were out there, all of them claiming they had the way to reform.

“So, the powers that were decided they were going to continue being the powers that be. Instead of allowing themselves to be nibbled to pieces by other ideologies, the Democrats and Republicans decided they were going to run things in perpetuity. They already agreed on most of how things were supposed to be done, and they could live with what the other side wanted to do, even if it wasn’t what they wanted.”

Pein, the one-time FEC Chief Technological Officer, pipes up, “It’s like ice cream. You go to the ice cream store, and you feel like you’ve got lots of choices. Fifty flavors. But they’re all ice cream. That’s how it was set up. You could pick any ice-cream you liked, as long as it was ice cream. No sorbet. No sherbert. Not a popsicle in sight. Certainly no cookies.”

Tanen inclines his head. “That’s the basic idea. We make sure you get to pick, but only from a certain range of ideas and opinions.” Tanen sighs, shakes his head. “You may hate this, but take a look at Europe’s history, look at how they made out.” He laughs, bitter. “You ever see those, ‘what makes America special?’ questions. Self-congratulatory crap about how a Hitler could never happen here. Hitler or his ilk, doesn’t happen here, because we don’t let him. Those…” he waves to indicate the outside world, “will vote for any twit with a nice voice and some charisma. God, you saw how far Trump got, right?” Tanen looks disgusted, and Jake’s got the sense that Trump apparently didn’t pay the right guys off, or didn’t pay enough. “We weed them out, take the worst of the crew out, make sure that the real outliers never get on the stage. And that keeps us safe.”

“So, what, this is capitalist wonderland?” Jake asks. “Don’t let the Wobblies take over?”

Tanen laughs at that. “Don’t say that to an actual Capitalist. Though they’re awfully rare. Corporatism. That’s what we have here. That’s what keeps us all fat and happy and living the dream. The rich get rich. The poor are richer than the middle class in more than half of the world. No one starves. Elections run nice and smooth, and we never have to worry about anything ever really changing. People think they have a choice and that keeps them happy. Markets know, more or less, what’s coming, so they stay stable. Everyone wins.”

“Until now,” Jake says.

“Until now. How are you going to fix things?”

Jake shrugs at that. “The less power an individual can accrue the less temptation there is to misuse it.”

Tanen laughs again. “Good luck with that.”

“Washington seemed to do well with it.”

Tanen laughs on last time. “Washington’s dead. So’s everyone like him.”

On day twelve, Ducky, Penny, and Allan are given a very special gift. Since they’ve been out providing medical care, they’ve been lucky enough to have some very grateful people in their care. Grateful people share.

Most of those gifts have been little, a box of cereal, a bottle of wine, whatever someone who’s not much further away from starving than they are can spare. Most of the time, they eat it while they are out. Three reason for this, first of all, it’s never enough of whatever it is to share with the wider group. Second of all, because they are out, they aren’t eating their rations back at the Navy Yard. And third of all, hungry people make bad decisions and miss details. They already aren’t getting enough sleep, any extra calorie they can grab means someone less likely to get substandard care. (Or more substandard care, they’re already working at a lower level of technological sophistication than Ducky had when he was in the bush in Tanzania.)

So, they are, in general, a little better (at least on calorie count, they get paid in candy bars and chips, a lot) fed than the rest of the crew.

But today was special. The child in their care had two broken legs, which they were able to set. Her parents were extremely grateful. They were also, apparently, fairly good cooks who took the idea of going to the local farmer’s market and stocking up on fresh veggies seriously.

Ducky, Penny, Allan, and the four Marines on security each got one jar of homemade pickles. As soon as they got back to the Navy Yard, they made a beeline for the conference room they use as their own canteen.

Tony is already with them. Abbi’s been told that she needs to get to the conference room, fast.

“Shut the door,” Ducky says, as Tim and Gibbs wander in. Gibbs does, quickly, seeing the treasure on the table, knowing that if the door stays open, the smell will get out, and they will have a lot of people looking to share. And Gibbs doesn’t want to share.

Tim speeds up a little as he finally recognizes what he’s seeing, little cucumbers sitting in a salty, garlicky, mustardy brine, pale green centers with frog green skins, just waiting for him.

Abbi gets in a second later, shuts the door behind her, and squeals with delight.

It only takes about a minute for them to gobble them down, they’re tiny little jars, maybe four ounces a piece. They even drink the brine, as Ducky tells them that this is what people used to do before the invention of Gatorade.

Tim nods, listless, the little spark of life at seeing the pickles vanishing with the weight of going back to work. “Back to the roof.”

Jethro nods as well, he coughs, hard, and then follows Tim, he needs to get back up there, too. Not enough sharp shooters left. In the last two days, half of the SEALs and Marines with non-DC IDs have left. Thirty-four fewer people to feed, which is… not enough to make much difference. Some. One or two more bites of food person who is left. Not so good from the perspective of they’ve lost three sharpshooters. Keeping people on the roof to watch from all sides means they’re on twelve hours shifts now.

When they leave, Ducky looks to Abbi. “Is that blood on his lips?”

Abbi nods. “Cough’s getting worse. We’re supposed to get real rain tonight, so that should help, but…”

“But he needs to be out of here,” Ducky says.

“He needed to be out of here a week ago,” Tony adds. “I’ve talked to him. Tim’s talked to him, only thing you can get Tim to talk about anymore. I know you have,” he says to Abbi. “But he won’t leave without you.”

She wiggles her hand a little, indicating that’s not all of it. “It’s part of it. He’s a Marine. This is what we live for.”

“This is what he’s going to die for if we don’t get him out,” Allan says. “If he’s coughing up blood now, he’s a massive infection about to happen.”

“And we’re down to seventeen antibiotics. Not types. Pills. By tomorrow’s second patient, we’re down to pre-World War II level medicine,” Penny says.

“Setting bones, stitching up holes, and cutting off limbs that can’t be saved,” Ducky’s not looking forward to that. He’s already had to take off four fingers, a hand, and one foot. And right now, all he’s got left for pain medication is NSAIDs and lidocaine. If he never has to do something like that again, it’ll be too soon.

“I’ll talk to him,” Abbi says.
On day thirteen, watching the sky that’s threatening rain, but not providing it, Ducky and Penny have a plan. They’ve been trying to get Jethro to leave. Asking hasn’t worked. Telling didn’t do it. Him standing there, wheezing all the time, lightheaded, gasping for air, didn’t get him out of the damn smoke that just refuses to leave. (Ducky and Penny have a running joke about which is more stubborn about staying, Jethro or the smoke.)

But them starving might.

It’s a two pronged plan.

They weed him out of the group, after the quarter cup of rice and beans with a protein bar that constitutes lunch, off to Tim’s office, and lay it out for him.

“Tomorrow, we run out of food. Fornell has not been able to get back with anything to eat. Our own foragers haven’t been able to scrounge up anything to eat. Leon hasn’t heard any confirmation that those men from New York will get here in time. It’s time for you to leave, Jethro,” Ducky says.

“Not leaving you guys here to starve.”

“Jethro, we’re not asking you to. First of all, if you leave, and take as many people as you can fit into a van, that’s fewer mouths for us to feed. Second of all, once you get enough time to catch your breath, you’ll start thinking clearly, and remember that you have a boat, and we are on a river.”

Jethro does start to see it when Ducky says that. And he rapidly comes to the conclusion that not enough food and too much stress is killing all of their brains for not coming up with that sooner. “We built her with smuggling in mind.”

“Exactly, Jethro,” Penny says. “Get out of here, take some of the others, anyone who’s got a Virginia ID, and can help steer a ship, and then fill it with food and get back here.”

Jethro likes that. A lot. It’s something he can do, beyond just keeping people sane. It’s saving lives. It’s risking the nightly shoot to kill order. It’s him and his boat and making sure his loves make it through. It’s the thing that matters. The thing only he can do.

“On it,” he chokes out, eye’s blazing, ready to go.

Ducky and Penny glance at each other. “Take Tim.” They haven’t seen a lot of him. He’s up on the roof and they’re usually out, but what they have seen doesn’t look good to them.

Jethro nods, but he’s not feeling steady in that. He goes, and that’s one sharpshooter down. Tim goes… That’s leaving Abbi, Tony, Penny, and Duck here, behind the walls, down two more precision shooters. No one’s mobbed a building in two days, but that doesn’t mean it’ll hold.

But he can see the look Penny’s giving him, so he says, “If he’ll go.”

He finds Tim on the roof, holding his rifle, watching the roads. There is a crowd, and neither of them like or trust it, but it’s still a good half mile off.
Gibbs explains the plan, watching Tim, the way his eyes are on that crowd, the way he’s sighting. He’s worried. If he goes, and takes Tim, they’re down to six sharpshooters. Not enough to keep someone up here twenty-four seven, properly alert, and watching each angle.

Though he sees the way Tim’s watching, sees the hollow look in his eyes, and isn’t sure if he’s really here, or if he should be.

“Tim.”

“Mmmm…” He doesn’t look away from the crowd.

“Quick test, take the rear view mirror off that car.” Gibbs points to a car at least two thousand meters away. The windshield is gone, so he doesn’t have to shoot through glass to do it. Just has to be able to find the car in question and aim.

Tim shifts slightly, sights, and, mechanically, blows that mirror off the car. Then he returns to his watch. “You go, Jethro.”

Jethro really doesn’t like the sound of Tim’s voice as he says that.

“Take Tony. Smuggle him out. He’s not doing all that hot.”

Tim’s not wrong about that. Two days of not finding anything is tearing up Tony. He hasn’t heard him say anything, let alone joke, in more than a day. And unlike Tim, with scrounging coming up with nothing, Tony doesn’t have a job.

“He can sail, too. You take me, and that’s one less guy you can use to get food back into us. You take him, he can co-pilot or whatever. Or you can take money out of evidence and buy another boat.” Then Tim stops talking. That crowd is moving closer. He’s watching, and uses a hand signal to get Jefferies, one of the Marines, over to his side, both of them watching.

The crowd moves slow, but they don’t turn down the road toward the Navy Yard. They go on past. Tim and Jefferies both relax a hair. Then Tim looks up at Jethro from where he’s lying on the roof.

“You go. I’ll be okay.”

“All right.”

Jethro would later regret that decision. Once he got out, got some food and sleep and air into himself, he was able to see what he was looking at, a man so depressed he couldn’t see the way out anymore. But he was so far in himself, he couldn’t see Tim was there.

Gibbs finds Tony walking the wall. Everything is so picked over, they aren’t even bothering to go out to scrounge. Don’t want to waste the gasoline and tempt the mobs.

So, instead of scrounging, Tony’s got his Sig, and his body armor, and he’s walking, up and down, along the length of the east wall. Between the sharpshooters and the perimeter guards, there’s not shot of anyone deciding to visit NCIS by surprise.

But it’s dull work. And unlike scrounging, which brought useful things back (until all the useful things were gone) it’s meaningless.

It doesn’t matter if he walks the wall or not. The city is hungry and hungry people are not very energetic. In his private thoughts, (these days, they’re almost all private thoughts, because he’s not saying much) Tony thinks that that’s probably why they aren’t letting food into the city. Starving people can’t put up much of a fight.

He figures in a few more days all the riots will have died down because everyone will be too weak to riot. Then the Virginia and Maryland National Guards can come in, “save the day” and look like heroes.

Gibbs finds him, watching over the wall, putting one foot in front of the other, over and over and over. He explains Ducky’s idea, and Tony leaps at it. He feels a little bad, because he can’t really sail. Not the kind of sailing he’d need to do to be useful for something like this, but he doesn’t care, it’s a way out. It’s food and clean clothing and not having to face people who glare at you for not finding what they need to keep their children fed.

“How are you going to get me out?” He knows they’re checking everything that goes in to and out of DC at the border. Checking close, too close. If there was a way to get through the lines, Tony would have found it, and he’d be getting people out, not walking back and forth like a marionette.

“Leaving within the hour. First run in tomorrow night. Food goes in, you and some others go out.”

Tony nods.

“Day after tomorrow, you start finding us more boats,” Gibbs also knows Tony can’t really sail, not sailing at night with no lights, not that kind of sailing, but he also knows that if anyone is going to get them the best deals on boats, and not let slip why they suddenly need cheap sail boats, it’ll be Tony. Plus, if he can get a big enough one, and if the river’ll work for it, he can keep a boat still. They’ll load and unload from that boat, and get more than one run in per night.

Gibbs heads to Jarvis next. And in a few minutes he’s got three SEALs who can sail and have IDs that say they live outside of DC.

Tony and Draga, with several more SEALs on the top of the van, take them to the border. They drive Gibbs and his SEALs down I-95 until they get to the tanks.

Gibbs looks at Tony and Draga, nods at both of them, and shuffles out of the van.

Getting through is annoying, but not painful. National Guardsmen wait for them, check their ID, check them again, grill them on why they were in DC, but they don’t press too hard. Gibbs is fairly sure that the people sneaking in to spread mayhem don’t look quite so thin, or ragged, or smell so bad, when they’re coming out.

“Why’d you stay so long?” a bored looking PFC asks Gibbs.

“My wife’s in there. Haven’t been married long. My ID’s got our home address on it. Hers still has her DC address.” He starts to cough, bad. The oxygen that’s been keeping him going stayed in the Navy Yard. Finally, he gets breathing again. “Didn’t want to leave her.”

“Looks like she had the good sense to make you go. You got a ride or something?”
Gibbs blinks. He’s so used to having a car, the idea that he’d need a ride hadn’t hit him. He fumbles for his phone, and takes a long moment, trying to think, who’s still here? He finally remembers that Diane is still in the area, and on the outside of the border.

He hits her number.

“Jethro? Are you okay? Have you heard from Emily? Or Tobias?”

“I’m on the Virginia side of 95, can you pick me up?” He gets that out and starts coughing again.

He can feel she wants to pepper him with questions, and he also knows that she knows if he’s outside, he’s gotten so bad they kicked him out. So, instead of pounding him with questions, she says, “Yeah. Half an hour.”

So Gibbs slowly, along with three SEALs, ambles over to a divider, and settles in to wait.

Fornell was right. There are lines of trucks. There’s piles of food. There’s mountains of drinks. There are makeshift testing areas, where each box and bag is getting checked and then carried over to new trucks. And the only reason he and the SEALs haven’t fallen on it like ravenous beasts is that as soon as they settled in, a PFC handed them blankets, which are welcome, October is starting to get chilly, bottles of Gatorade, and an apple each, and then said, “Eat and drink slow. You keep that down, we’ve got more for you, but eat this first, and eat it slow. Too many people get to this side, eat too fast, and end up puking up their first meals. Don’t be them.”

It’s the best apple in the history of apples. It’s blush pink and yellow and crisp and juicy and a little sweet and a little tart and he eats the core. The only thing left when he’s done is the stem, and he’s seriously thinking about it when his stomach starts to complain.

He didn’t eat it slowly enough because immediately after eating it, he does feel nauseous. But he keeps it down, and he keeps sipping the Gatorade.

When they’ve finished, and ten minutes goes by, the Private comes back, this time with what looks like coffee cups and Gibbs can feel his heart lifting. The coffee packs Tony found at the hotel ran out yesterday, so he hasn’t had any in more than twenty-four hours.

He grabs the cup, feeling it warm between his fingers, and almost starts to curse when he inhales and realizes it’s chicken broth, but he’s too hungry to stay disappointed.

Salty, savory, it’s probably a bullion cube in a cup of hot water, but right now, like the apple, this is the best chicken broth, EVER.

He’s still, slowly, (he’s coughing between sips) drinking it when Diane pulls up. She stops, looks at him, bedraggled, too thin, lips and fingernails still bluish from lack of oxygen, and says, “You didn’t say you were bringing friends.”

He looks at her car, slowly standing up, and the SEALs follow, piling into the back seat that’s made for three small people, and if they hadn’t just spent the last two weeks on a crash diet they’d never fit, but today they do. He gets into the front seat, and says to her, “Get driving, I’ll fill you in while we go.”

“This better be a hell of a story,” Diane says, throwing the car into reverse.
“It is.” And Gibbs starts to tell it.

He doesn’t do a very good job of it. Virginia’s just… unreal. He keeps stopping to cough, or just stare at trees that have gone gold and scarlet in the fall. They drive past very normal things, like gas stations and grocery stores and they’re all doing business. Prices look odd (12.99 for a gallon of 93 octane gas) but there’s nothing burnt out or broken. (Not actually true, but compared to DC, a building per block with a little graffiti and one boarded over window isn’t hitting Gibbs’ radar. In most of Virginia, the only places that got burnt out were local Congressmen’s offices, campaign headquarters, IRS outposts, and the like.) And people are just walking and driving around. No one’s wearing any sort of armor. No one is armed.

It’s civilian life and it looks like a dream. Finally, he snaps out of it enough to tell the rest of why they’re out, and ask to be dropped off at his house.

“No.”

“No?” Gibbs asks, confused at the idea of why he can’t go home.

“Nothing else is happening until you get food, sleep, and a doctor. You’re all about to drop, which means none of you are ready to go to buy food, let alone smuggle it in. You’re coming back to my place. All four of you are having a real meal, and then you three are getting cleaned up and sleeping. Jethro, we’re going to the hospital. I am not telling my boss that I got you out of DC just to have you drop over of lung failure ten minutes later.”

He glares at her. He knows he’s not in that bad of shape. But he doesn’t argue either, which is probably a very good hint that he’s not in that good of shape, either.

More food, showers, real showers, clean clothing. Okay, it’s Draga’s so it’s way too long, and even if he hadn’t just lost a ton of weight, too big, and it’s nothing he’d ever buy for himself, but it’s clean and smells good and feels nice on his skin. His clean skin. His skin that he scrubbed pink under pouring hot water. He doesn’t even care that the only soap Diane had in the house smells like vanilla and roses. Right now, anything that doesn’t smell like ash, BO, and foot rot is welcome.

All Gibbs wants to do when he gets out of the shower is collapse on the… Bed is out, there’s a SEAL there, same with Emily’s bed, and there’s a SEAL on the sofa, but hell, right now the plush carpet on the floor looks like soft, fluffy heaven compared to the bits of mostly concrete floors that he and Abbi had been laying their sleeping bags on.

He’s all but swaying on his feet, when Diane grabs him, wraps an arm around him, and leads him to her car.

“Doctor’s. You can sleep in the car.”

He nods at that. Once he got some food in him, and started to get out of the smoke, he started to feel how bad his lungs are. He feels like they’re stuffed with cotton balls, and like he’s breathing through a wet, fluffy mesh.

He does sleep in the car. He sleeps in the waiting room. He doesn’t sleep in the Doc’s office. As they’re waiting he says, “You asked about Tobias. I haven’t gotten to talk to him. He’ll call when I’m out, or I call him when he’s out. Do you know what he’s been doing?”

She nods. “Yeah. I know. Chucky sent out his Urban Chaos Preparedness thing, right?”
“Yeah.”

“So, on the upside, a lot of FBI employees and their families didn’t get caught out in the riots or get burned in their homes.”

Gibbs nods, coughing.

“Downside, there’s 1042 people in the FBI building. And they thought this was just some sort of little exercise, so they weren’t prepared for it. By the time he got there, they were on day two of no food at all.”

“He’s bringing food in for them.”

“Non-stop. Can’t get a lot of supplies into a tank. They’re convoying in and out. Food in, people out.”

“No one’s stopping them?”

“Tanks. Even the National Guard is looking the other way, letting them in and out. I think he made it clear to them he’d open fire if they tried to stop him. Once I get you home, I’ve got to go meet him.”

“What are you doing?”

“Someone’s got to buy the food.”

Gibbs nods, that makes sense. Then a thought hits. “How are you paying for this?”

She laughs, dry and bitter. “When I was done confiscating the money that went along with all of those accounts, it came to 8.9 billion dollars.”

“That’ll do it.”

That’s when the doctor comes in. He pokes Gibbs, prods him, listens to his chest, tuts a bit, and writes a prescription for strong antibiotics. He suggests that Gibbs rest, drink plenty of fluids, and take it easy on his lungs by using his O2 as much as possible.

Gibbs makes all the right noises, looks contrite, grabs the prescriptions, and gets out of there.

When he and Diane are in the car, she asks him, “You going to do any of that?”

“Some of it.” His eyes are drooping as his head hits the headrest in the car. “Sleep. Would you get the meds?”

“I can do that.”

After what seems like a minute later, Gibbs wakes up to the car slamming into a stop, and Diane shrieking with joy.

She’s already bounded out as he’s rubbing his eyes, feeling muzzy, wanting nothing more than to curl back in on himself and sleep.

But another sound keeps pulling at him, a familiar barking. He’s fumbling for the car door when he sees what’s behind it, and what’s got Diane shrieking.
Emily, wrapped in her mother’s arms, and Ziva, who is holding onto Mona’s collar, keeping her from running over Gibbs.

She’s smiling until she sees him get out of the car, and then the smile falls as she looks him over, deep worry and concern replacing it. Gibbs doesn’t care, he’s so happy to see her. He doesn’t run, he’s too tired to run, but he walks the few steps quickly and envelops her in a massive hug. He holds onto her, face buried in her hair, just feeling her in his arms, solid, real, plump and clean and whole, baby bump, which is definitely bumping along, nudging him in the tummy.

When he pulls back a little, he says, “I know someone who can’t wait to see you.”

“And I cannot wait to see him.” She gently touches his face. “You need rest.”

“I need to get people fed.”

She’s still staring at him, and then nods. “You sleep, and eat. I’ll start getting things ready. We are going to the house, yes?”

“Yes. I need to know what sort of watch they’re keeping on the Anacostia. Right now, there’s a shoot on sight order for anyone out after dark in the city. And the National Guards aren’t letting any food in that hasn’t been inspected during the day.”

Ziva nods. “You rest. Eat. Tomorrow morning, you come to the house, and I’ll have the river defenses scouted out.”

Gibbs holds onto her, tight. She kisses his cheek, hugging him back just as hard. He’s not letting go. After a moment, when she decides she’s not going anywhere soon, she asks, “How is he?”

“About to be much better.”

“Thin, like you?”

Gibbs nods.

“Tired?”

He nods at that, too. “We’re all tired and hungry. Smelly. He’s not hurt. And when he sees you, he’ll get better.”

Ziva nods, sure there’s volumes of information Gibbs isn’t giving her, but she also knows the only reason he’s still on his feet is that he hasn’t let go of her. “Come inside, let’s get you down.”

Gibbs nods. She gets him set up on a pile of blankets and pillows on the floor, with Mona snuggled in next to him. He’s asleep again almost before she’s standing up.

It’s late on day thirteen when Ziva DiNozzo begins to scout the river. She’s not worried about the shoot on sight orders. And won’t be an hour later when the sun finally goes down. Right now, she’s got time to move around in the open, and once the sun sinks, no one will see her.

Their home is two hours from the Navy Yard by car. A lot of those two hours are eaten up by DC traffic.

By ship… She doesn’t know. She’s not sure how fast Semper can go.
By ship, they’re going up the Potomac, and from the Potomac to the Anacostia.

She spent her first hour looking at maps, carefully, getting the sense of the river, and where she would put men if she didn’t want anyone getting in by ship.

Then she goes in live, driving carefully, and finally, walking. A black shape barely disturbing the cloud covered dark.

No one notices, no one sees her. But she sees them. The Maryland National Guard is camped out on top of 495, at the Woodrow Wilson Bridge, making sure no one gets past. She sees flood lights, and men that aren’t really paying attention. The bridge is down, so big ships can’t get through, and the little ones don’t seem to concern them, too much.

Of course, she’s not seeing any little ships trying to go upriver, or get past the bridge. Most of them appear to be heading downriver, south and east.

She comes to a few conclusions, namely, getting out should be fairly easy. Getting in will be problematic. Gibbs is going to have to dodge the spotlights, and Hashem help them if the clouds break. The moon is full tonight, or so close as to not matter, and if they try to move without clouds, they’ll be the slow moving black blob on a river lit silver by the sky.

It’s early on day fourteen when she gets back to their house. It’s not ready for people. But it’s got walls. She unloads her own sleeping bag, and settles down, tired, lonely, aching for this to be done.

She sends Tony a text. It’s a picture of her at the house, and says, “Tonight, you see this live.”

---

Tony’s almost asleep when his phone buzzes. He doesn’t recognize the number, but these days no one’s texting unless it’s important. He opens it up and sees Ziva sitting on the patio at the house, along with her words.

He can’t speak, can’t even begin to write to her his heart’s so full of joy.

He’s getting out, and she’s home again.

He can’t think of how to even begin to express how happy this makes him, so he calls her, but she’s already asleep by that point, so he leaves the sound of a kiss on her machine.

---

Gibbs wakes up alert, bright eyed, bushy tailed, and brimming with purpose on the morning of day fourteen. (He’s also exhausted, aching from head to toe, still wheezing, and ravenous. These sensations all get pushed out of his mind, because he’s got a job to do.)

He shovels as much food as Diane will give him into himself, and all the (decaf) coffee, too. He’s been drinking caffeinated since that was the only sort they had, and the water tasted too bad to drink on its own, but now that he has the choice, he’s going to back to following his doctor’s orders.

He tells himself that’s why he’s so tired. No caffeine.

Diane drops him at his place, and he grabs Abbi’s Taurus. He then takes each of the SEALs to their own places, where they pick up cars, and fortunately, a truck.
From there, it’s convoy time. Up to the house.

As he’s driving, he realizes that there’s a reason why, beyond them just being stuck up assholes, that officers hog up the food when rations get low. There’s a reason why, if you’re on short rations, the guy in charge keeps eating.

And that’s, in retrospect, a pretty sane reason. Namely, it’s a really good idea if someone in the group, preferably the guy making the decisions, has enough food in his system so he can actually think.

And one other thing becomes very clear. No one at NCIS has had this particular insight yet, probably because they’re all so damn hungry, they can’t think straight.

He makes a mental note to make sure that he’s got a pack of food for just Leon, Jarvis, and Abbi. Between the three of them, they’re running the place, and it’s about time they get enough food that they can start thinking again.

Though, he wonders if they’ll actually eat them, or just pass them out to everyone.

The SEALs have been… somewhat less than perfectly impressed with the old guy ordering them around. First off, he’s a Jarhead, and what the fuck sort of Jarhead has ever had two damn brain cells to rub together, let alone run an op?

And this particular one. Okay, yeah, he can handle a rifle, they know that. They saw him on the roof. And sure, he’s got grit, sticking around wheezing like that, but that’s all a Jarhead is good for. That’s how they make Jarheads, they take the brains out of ‘em and pump ‘em full of balls and then tell them to go kill, and they do it.

You don’t put them in charge of a smuggling operation, let alone one on a boat. That’s their territory. That’s why they trained for. Literally. That’s SEAL school, how to get you and your men and your stuff in behind enemy lines, without getting caught, and then rip things up so then the Jarheads can come in and break even more shit before the Army wanders it’s ass in to hold the place.

So, to say they aren’t particularly impressed by Jethro is an understatement. And they’re less impressed with him acting like he’s God’s gift to the river.

So, Lt. Hanne, who should be running this, says, “What the hell does a fucking Jarhead know about boats?” as Jethro’s opening the door to the boathouse.

Jethro gets his answer, and looks really satisfied, as the Squid sucks in a fast breath, seeing how sleek and beautiful Semper is.

“How to fucking build them for one, and I can sail her, too. All I need from you Squids is manual labor. Let’s get her ready.”

Gibbs can fit ten cubic feet of food into Semper and still have enough room to pilot her. Nine if he wants a co-pilot.

So, he’s standing in Costco, with Yunz and Bardinio, trying to figure out what to grab. As best he remembers, they have rice and beans. That and power bars are what they’re living on right now. (Though, and this is another sign of no one out there eating enough, he’s realizing all of his memories of the last two weeks are fuzzy.)

Shopping. Oatmeal, more beans, more rice. Not tasty, but it won’t go bad, and if he can’t get in tomorrow or the next day, it’ll last. That’s Ziva’s biggest concern, as long as the clouds hold, he can get in and out. As soon as they break, the moon will light them up, and he can’t get Semper under the bridge.

Can’t just do dry goods. Onions, cabbages, carrots. Good for you, lots of vitamins, good shelf life. Potatoes. As long as they stay cool and dry, they’ll last for weeks.

He’s down to two square feet at that point. He sees the country hams. They’re dried. They don’t need refrigeration. They’ll make everything taste better. They’ve got bones Elaine can add to the soup she’s been simmering this whole time. Three hams. That’s all he can get in there besides himself.

He hopes it’s a good start. Then he sends Elaine a text, telling her what he’s got, and asking what she wants for tomorrow’s run.

Once the SEALs have Semper loaded, they all look around, and then, Henne, who has decided based on how well built Semper is, that maybe this one Jarhead knows his ass from a hole in the ground, asks Gibbs if he minds if they head off.

“What are you thinking?” Gibbs asks. He and Ziva are getting ready to go over the map of the river she’s made.

“We’ll keep coming back to help you load, but we’ve got friends on the outside. When we trained to do stuff like this, it was with one or two men on an inflatable raft.”

“And you’re going to float down the river,” Gibbs says.

“Exactly. Acquire a few of those rafts, can’t put much on them, but we can get a person out on them. Start north of DC, float down the river to the Navy Yard, and then float someone else down to you.”

“That’ll take all night,” Ziva says.

Henne shrugs. “Maybe. Once we get past whatever they’ve got north of the city limits, we can probably use our engines, same for once we’re far enough south of 495 to be out of gun range.”

Gibbs and Ziva nod at that. “See you back here tomorrow night.”

Henne gives Gibbs a quick salute. “At least one of us will be here to load things up tomorrow morning.”

“I should go with you,” Ziva says to Gibbs as he unties Semper from her moorings.

“Ziver…”
She shakes her head. “Do not give me that look. We have a rifle with a suppressor. And you are going to have to tack right and left to get through the search lights. If the wind doesn’t behave, or if you can’t get her turned fast enough… You need a pair of eyes and a steady hand to kill the lights.”

He starts to open his mouth to say something about how he’s the sniper, but she says, faster, “You cannot pilot the boat and shoot at the same time. It’s a two person job.”

She’s right about that. He’s still not at all happy about the idea of her going along with this.

“Tony’ll head slap me.”

“No, he will not. He’ll be too happy to see me.”

He looks at her again, not sure what to do with this.

She looks back. “I was a good girl. I ran the way I was supposed to. I went into hiding and got Emily and Vance’s family out of the line of fire. And now it is time to make sure that you can get my husband out of there.”

Gibbs nods.

“Once we get past the 495, no one will be watching the river. From what I saw Metro does not care about people trying to get in and out by the river.”

Gibbs sighs. They wouldn’t care. They’re marching the streets trying to keep the peace. The only people using the river are trying to get into or out of the city.

“I want two vests on you.”

“I can swim, Gibbs.”

“I know. You’re still putting a life vest and a bulletproof vest on.”

“Fine.” She’s gone for a few minutes, and as she goes, it begins to rain again. Perfect weather for something like this.

“Gonna be cold and wet.” There’s room for him below deck, there isn’t for her.

She’s bundled up for the cold weather. Rain gear on top of her vests, rifle properly guarded from the wet, too. “I can take a little cold and wet. Get me to my love.”

“Yes, Ma’am.”

The first two hours go very smoothly. The wind is holding steady. The sun is sinking into the horizon. Clouds are deep and full. Gibbs is navigating by radar. Once the sun sets, he’s got no visibility. But, his GPS is showing him the way, and Semper’s doing exactly what she was made for, sweeping smooth and gentle up the river.

For some reason, he’s thinking of a scene in a movie he watched with Kelly back in the day. “Just a fisherman, at night, going for a pleasure cruise, in eel infested water…” Yep, that’s him and Ziva, just two sailors, at night, in the rain, going for a little cruise, toward the rioting city. No big thing.

He hears Ziva knock on the deck, and sees what she’s seeing. The bridge. He stops them well out of range of the lights, watching. Three spot lights, and they are playing them back and forth across the water.

The good thing about that is the watchers are so close to the light, they should be fairly blind to anything that isn’t lit up like a Christmas tree. The better thing is they’re probably only looking at the circle of river lit up by each search light.

All he has to do is not get caught in the lights.

This would be so much easier with a motor. He’d be able to go faster. Of course, with a motor, he’d also be making noise. Not much traffic right now, not around DC, they’d hear him and have those lights trained on him well before he could get through.

Ziva’s watching, too. “I can take the middle one.” Her rifle won’t make a noise, and she’s using small bullets. It should look like the light just popped. With the way the rain’s coming down. One drop of cold water on hot light... It would shatter.

Three lights, sweeping back and forth...

“Do it.” Gibbs begins to edge the Semper forward, he’ll tack left in a second, and start the zig zag that’ll hopefully get them under the bridge. He hears a tiny pop, and a second later there’s only two lights.

“I told you I’d be useful.”

“Yeah. You catch cold, he’ll kill me.”

“I doubt that.”

“Shhhhh...” He needs to concentrate. Stay out of the lights. Slow and gentle, just stay where they aren’t. A bit left here, a little right there, please wind, don’t fail now, a little more left, and a bit more beyond that. Just a few more degrees, and then hard right. A few more meters, just a little bit more, and then he exhales with relief. They’re under the bridge.

It’s another hour of slow sailing up from there. Mostly just staying out of range of the banks, keeping themselves far enough away that whoever’s looking doesn’t see them. But finally they see the lights on the Barry, waiting for them.

Jethro sails into the dock and finds many eager people waiting for them.

Unloading takes a few minutes. He personally hands three boxes to Leon. “Make sure you, Jarvis, and Abbi actually eat these.” He looks for Abbi, but she’s not there.

Leon answers his unspoken question. “She’s on the wall.”

“Excitement?”

Leon shrugs. “We don’t know yet. They’re still milling around at the corner. They haven’t turned towards us, but they might be thinking about it.”

“Shit. You need—“

“Don’t even think about it. I need someone to bring me food a hell of a lot more than I need a sniper.
I can pull a trigger myself. I can’t get these people out or bring food back in.”

Jethro nods. He knows where his duty lies, and he knows where Abbi’s is, too.

“Okay. Let’s get them loaded.” He looks at the ten people on the dock. They’re all exhausted and hungry. He makes a mental note for how he’s got to repack things tomorrow night. Right now, there is no food in Semper because he just unloaded it all. And they’re three hours from the house. Which also isn’t swimming in food. He sighs. “Leon, I need those boxes back.”

Leon sees the families staring at the food that just came off the boat, and the Marines and SEALs humping it inside. He nods, understanding what Gibbs forgot in his hurry to get as much food into the Navy Yard as he can.

“You need a logistics officer, don’t you?” Leon says.

“Yeah.”

“Penny’ll be on the boat tomorrow.”

Gibbs nods. She’ll be good at that. He wants to ask for Abbi, wants her out of there, too, but, he shakes his head. Anyone with a gun who can shoot needs to be on the walls.

“Come on. Get in and let’s get moving. We’ve got three hours before we’re back to our home berth, and some of the trip is going to be rough,” he says to the people on the dock. The number of turns he had to make to get through the lights wasn’t exactly an easy bit of sailing.

Tony’s standing on the dock, wrapped around Ziva, very quietly crying on her, so relieved to be going and happy to see her. Gibbs gives them one more minute, and then says, “DiNozzo, you can keep hugging her on the boat, but we’ve got to go, now.”

Slightly after midnight on day fifteen, Jethro takes the first load of people out of the Navy Yard. 656 people becomes 646. He brings in enough food for all the ones who are left to have 1500 calories, if they eat it all in one day.

Leon eyes the weather. Fifty percent chance of rain the next day. Supposedly, he should have three platoons of New York National Guardsmen taking twenty-eight people off his hands. Supposedly they were going to show up yesterday, but they didn’t, and they didn’t come today, either, and they are not returning his calls. Supposedly, those Guardsmen, will, if they show up tomorrow, bring him about 6000 MREs. Each one will run slightly over 1200 calories. Maybe, if he’s lucky, tomorrow, rain or shine, he’ll have three SEALs floating in with… Some amount of food. Maybe two hundred pounds per raft. Probably less.

He has, in his stores, enough food left for everyone to have 200 calories tomorrow. And then that’s it. They’re done.

He looks at the food the Marines are now guarding, and makes the decision. Rations will not be increasing until they’ve got enough of a buffer to last one full day.

For at least another twenty-four hours, unless those Guardsmen show up, they’re on 1000 calories a day.
His stomach rumbles as he looks at fresh carrots and cabbages. At least tomorrow, they’ll be something other than protein bars and rice and beans.
Hunger changes the mental landscape of the people experiencing it. By day 13, inside the Navy Yard, they're seeing what hunger does to people.

Cooking shows have replaced the news. No one’s watching the outside world anymore. There is no outside world anymore. There’s just images of glorious food, lovingly made by people who aren’t losing half a pound a day.

They talk about it, all the time. What they’re all going to eat as soon as this is done. What they used to eat before this. What they loved eating. What they loved cooking. What restaurants they want to eat at.

It’s all food, twenty-four seven, as they swallow down rice and beans and protein bars.

No one has any emotional resources anymore. Any little annoyance immediately explodes into argument. Fortunately everyone is too hungry to keep a fight going too long.

Long term planning is gone. Get through the day. That’s all that’s left.

The only reason theft isn’t rampant is the fact that there’s one SEAL, Marine, or Cop for every three civilians. But these days, Elaine is handing out rations, that are weighed to show that everyone is getting the exact same amount, in front of the people getting them, with four armed guards.

It’s the crying that’s killing Tim. The babies and little kids cry and whine all the time. He doesn’t blame them, he wants to curl up and whimper all the time, too.

But, blaming them or not, it’s wearying.

He gets his rations, eats his vitamins and protein bar, and then finds a crying kid and hands over the rest of his meal.

The parents will smile at him, and the kid will cry a little less. And he’s not, by a long stretch, the only parent, or person, doing it. Some people are only handing over a spoonful, some more, but most of them are trying to keep the kids from starving.

He’ll drift off, back to the roof, where he can’t hear the tears, or to the little nest of quiet he’s carved out for himself in the ballistics lab. In there he’s got the pillows Tony got for them, his “drying” clothing and towel hung off of the ballistics tank, and Abby’s music playing.

No one comes in there, not since Zelaz and Corwin left. So he’s alone, and he can talk to his family, or sleep. Mostly sleeping. He’s not hungry when he’s sleeping. Though, he’s starting to get to the point where he’s not hungry when he’s awake, either. As long as he doesn’t see the food, he doesn’t think about it. Too much.

Abby, Jimmy, and Breena keep begging him to leave, and he can’t get it through to them that he can’t leave. That leaving is impossible. No one can leave.

Because there’s no outside world anymore. Not for him.

Inside the Navy Yard, on day fourteen, when they learn that Gibbs is coming in that night with food, there’s something between a party and a riot.

No one can wait for him to come. They watch the clock and make bets about what he’s going to bring.

The riot almost breaks out when nine people and Tony are picked to leave. With the exception of Tony, they were picked at random. Tim’s name generator came up with the first name, and Sarah Maitz, one of the HR staff, and her family got a one way ticket out of the Navy Yard. Rhonda in accounting and her three kids got the second spot. When Connon, who works in Cybercrime got the last spot, a lot of whispering about the name generator being fixed started to flow.

Of course he’s getting out. He’s Cybercrime. Probably fixed the machine.

The whispers got ugly, but when it was time to line people up on the dock, no one rushed the Semper.

Breakfast on day fifteen hears more angry rumbling. Yes, the quality of the food just got significantly better, but the amount hasn’t. They’re still looking at a tiny scoop of potatoes, cabbage, and carrots with a few slivers of ham, next to another tiny scoop of oatmeal.

The food Jethro brought in was high in nutrients and good for them. It’s not high in calories.

Elaine asks him for powdered milk, powdered eggs, and fat. Butter, Crisco, oil, bacon, sausages, ground beef, whole chickens. The power hasn’t gone, and even if it does, they still have the generators to keep food cool. Shelf life doesn’t matter, most calories per square inch, does. If he had a shorter run, or any sort of refrigerated storage, she’d tell him to pack ice cream. As it is, she doesn’t want him to waste space by packing coolers to keep ice cream, ice cream.

Ideally, she wants a lot of rice, which cooks up to twice it’s size, and then she wants meat and fat to cook into that rice. She wants eggs, which are fat and protein. Nuts, if he can get them, lots of nuts.

On day fifteen, Gibbs has a very different shopping list.

And on day fifteen, it doesn’t matter. The clouds break, scuttle away. It’s October 20th, the moon is two days past full, bright and brilliant, and unless the guys on the 495 are blind, there’s no way they won’t see him.
“Watch your ring,” Jarvis says to Tim, voice listless on day fifteen, as he scoops up the last drop of ham and bean soup from his bowl.

Tim looks at his hand, slowly. His wedding ring has worked it’s way down to the tip of his ring finger and is one gesture from ending up on the floor.

For the first time in days, Tim really looks at himself, sees his knuckles too thick and fingers too thin. He sees his wrist cuff barely hanging on to his hand when he puts his hand down.

“You’re getting too thin,” Jarvis says, really looking at Tim.

“We all are,” Tim says quietly. “You need extra hands on today’s food run?” Tony’s gone, but that doesn’t mean they aren’t still scrounging. Though they’re not trying to take food anymore. The city is empty. Now they’re going out in parties, trying to hunt. Yesterday, they brought back two pigeons, for more than six hundred people. Elaine put them in the soup. Abbi made a joke about homeopathic pigeon broth. No one else got it.

“No. We’re burning more calories than we’re bringing in.”

Tim shrugs. He supposes he should be disappointed or something, but he’s not feeling it, or much of anything else right now. “I’ll be on the roof.” He shuffles the ring around, and finds that it fits on his index finger.

Jarvis looks at the SEAL next to him. “Did he eat anything?”

“Just had a cup of that crap they’re calling coffee and the vitamin pills.”

The Navy Yard had oak trees. The oak trees had acorns. Half of them have been roasted, ground up, and are now pretending to be coffee. They don’t taste like coffee, not really. But it’s roasted and bitter and the water tastes foul on its own, so it’s an improvement.

The oak trees had had chipmunks and squirrels and birds, too.

They don’t anymore.

They aren’t eating the rats, yet, but that’s likely because no one’s seen one.

On day fifteen, Ducky gets called back to his original NCIS duty. People sleep, a lot, inside the Navy Yard right now, which is the best thing they can do. Burn the fewest possible calories.

But Edna Purcell, previously of the accounting department, doesn’t wake up from her nap.

Ducky thinks it’s complications from diabetes. They ran out of insulin yesterday, and they don’t have the kind of food supplies to handle a sugar crash.

One of the morgue freezers goes back to being used for what it was made for.
“What the fuck is he still doing there!” Jimmy yells at Abbi on day fifteen.

“Keeping us alive,” Abbi yells back. “You don’t get it Jimmy. You’re NOT HERE. All the time there are crowds of people around us, just waiting to break in and kill us. As long as he can shoot, I’m not making him go.”

“Abbi, there’s no chance he can still shoot! He’s barely talking anymore.” The last two phone calls Tim said maybe six words a piece. They’re begging him to leave, and all he’ll say is that he can’t go.

“He can still aim and still pull a trigger. Jethro’s offered to get him out, and he told Jethro to take Tony.”

“WHY THE FUCK WOULD HE DO THAT!” No one had mentioned that to Jimmy, yet.

“Because Tony can sail, some at least, so he can get us more food, and Tim can’t! The most important thing Tim can do for us right now is man the roof!”

Jimmy wants to scream. Everyone down there has gone mad. He knows because he, and Abby, and Breena have been asking, then begging, then screaming at them to get Tim out. He knows why, too. He knows how food deprivation works. He knows that lack of calories compromises the ability of people to think, and on top of that it makes them depressed and anxious. He gets that they can’t see beyond their own noses right now. They’ve stripped down all the needs and wants to enough food to see the next day. They’re in full on nothing but survival mode.

But that doesn’t make it any less frustrating and terrifying. He’s trying to reason with animals. In most cases, depressed, starving animals.

He hangs up. He looks over to Abby who has Gibbs on the phone. He looks at her with a question and she shakes her head.

“Abbs, I can’t get him on the boat if he won’t come!”

“That’s bullshit, Gibbs! Pick his ass up and dump him on the damn thing.”

“That’s not why. Everyone in there is desperate. If I try to force him on there, they will riot. So many people want to get out, that if I take someone who doesn’t…” Gibbs knows, he’s seen it. The crowd inside the walls already isn’t happy with line jumpers, and a line jumper who doesn’t want to go… “At any given time, Leon’s a heartbeat away from having to turn the guns in instead of out. They had to have armed Marines to get Tony out.”

“Why would you get Tony out!”

“Abby…”

Abby’s too burnt with worrying for Tim, and too damn pregnant to be rational about that. “He’s… Tony didn’t need it! Not the way Tim did! Tony was probably sitting there, cracking jokes and making smart comments, all cool and Tim’s… he’s hurting so bad… Why would you abandon him? You’re his dad, and you left him!”
If Gibbs could have shot himself to get out of that conversation, he would have. He should have pulled them both out. He should have grabbed Tim by the hand and led him out. He should have…but he didn’t.

Abby’s verbally beating the hell out of him for not doing it, and he’s taking it, because he feels like he deserves it.

When she slows down, he says, “I’ll get him out as soon as I can. As soon as he’ll let me, I’ll get him out.”

“It’s not soon enough!” Abby spits back at him.

On day fifteen, Gibbs does not come. He can’t. The moon is too high, too bright.

Three SEALs do, and between them they have five hundred pounds of MREs. They get three people out, young and strong ones. Floating down the river in a mostly submerged inflatable craft, hugging the bank sounds fun, until you’ve got to do it in the middle of the night in cold water in October.

When they get to the house, they’ve got three civilians with hypothermia. Five hours in sixty degree water was too long, too cold. The SEALs had the gear for it, the civilians didn’t.

Gibbs and Ziva spend the night getting them warmed back up again, and pray for rain.

The weather channel says it’s coming. They can see it on the radar. They pray it’ll move fast and stay for a long time.

On day fifteen, NCIS is out of medical supplies. The mobile infirmary is done. Which means Penny, Ducky, and Allan have a whole lot of nothing to do.

For the first time in weeks, they’ve got breathing time.

And that’s a bad thing. Hours and hours of work broken by eating fast and exhausted sleep makes time melt into oblivion. It kept them busy and useful, and right now, busy and useful is the only thing keeping people going.

People with jobs that matter aren’t having a good time, but they’re not lost to depression and hunger.
People who don’t have jobs that matter, they’re turning into ghosts, drifting around, more and more tenuously tethered to life with each passing day.

For most of day fifteen, they sleep. And for much of day sixteen as well. But by nightfall, they are up, and more or less functional. As good, if not slightly better, than everyone else.

Leon finds Penny at dinner. “Dr. Langston, Gibbs has confirmed that he’s in the water. You’re going with him. And if you could get your grandson out of here, too, that would be a good thing.”

Leon shakes his head. “No.”

“I’ll find him.”
She tries to think back, and comes to the conclusion that she hasn’t seen Tim since the day with the pickles, whenever that was. They’ve been working flat out, outside of the walls. When they get back, they eat, fast, work with whoever needs help in the walls, and then sleep.

She checks her phone, which she hasn’t done in days, and sees a collection of messages from Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, all on the theme of get our man out of there.

She spends an hour looking, but doesn’t find him. Obviously, he’s hiding somewhere, but wherever it is, it’s outside of her ken. She sends Jimmy and Abby a text, asking where Tim would hide if he didn’t want to be found. She gets a flurry of excited texts with suggestions for places. Both of them are desperate to hear that she’s got Tim out of NCIS.

Am looking. Will talk to him.

She finds him where Abby suggested, curled up into a little ball back in the ballistics lab, sleeping.

She hasn’t actually seen him since they brought the pickles in. He wasn’t looking good then, and now… For a moment, she’s looking at him, and she understands what Jimmy and Abby and Breena have been begging him for. They need to get Tim out; he’s wasting away here. She lowers herself to the floor and gently shakes him. He comes awake very slowly, and even when his eyes are open, he doesn’t look all there.

“My name’s up. I’m out of here. Come with me.”

He shakes his head slowly. “Not enough sharpshooters if I leave.”

“Timothy…”

“Someone’s got to do it. I can. So I should.”

“Tim.”

He sounds so tired, and he doesn’t sit up, he’s still curled on his side, head turned toward her. “Take someone else. There’s got to be a kid or someone who needs out of here more than I do. The lady who died was diabetic. She can’t be the only one, go find someone who needs insulin or some medicine.”

“You eat more than a kid does. And right now, you need medical care, too.”

He laughs at that. Not these days, he doesn’t. “There’s got to be someone who needs it more than me, or someone who’s not doing something useful.”

“Timothy…”

He’s got that set look on his face. And between his hair gone, and his face gaunt from hunger, it looks atrocious. “Is Ducky going? How about Allan?”

And he’s got her, because they aren’t. Just because they’re out of supplies doesn’t mean they don’t need someone who can handle first aid in the compound.

“What I’m doing is just as important as what they’re doing. I’ll go when they don’t need me anymore.”

“Leon told me to get you.”

Tim snorts. “Because he’s sick of Abby and Jimmy and Breena begging him to send me home. He didn’t tell me to go. Abbi hasn’t, either. He knows he still needs me.”

“Jethro wants you to go.”

Jethro’s been calling and asking, and then telling, and then ordering him to leave. It’s working just about as well as every other time Jethro’s ordered him away from something dangerous to save himself. “He’s not here. He left. And with him gone, we need sharpshooters even more. There’s only five of us now. Eighteen hours on, just to keep the perimeter under watch.” He closes his eyes. “I’m tired. Let me go back to sleep. I need to be up there again in three hours.”

She spends the next twenty minutes talking to him, but he doesn’t budge, or open his eyes.

When she texts Abby, Breena, and Jimmy, Breena calls her and spends the next hour, until she steps onto the boat, begging her to do anything she can, including having a few SEALs literally pick him up and put him on it, to get Tim onto it.

Abby and Jimmy call Tim. He turns his phone on, but he doesn’t talk. He drifts, their voices upset, but still them, just a lull as he dreams.

Jethro looks disappointed when Penny steps onto the boat and Tim’s not with her. She just shakes her head.

“Get more food in,” Penny says. “Maybe if you can get enough food into him, he’ll see some sense.”

In addition to being one hell of a scrounger, Tony DiNozzo can talk a con up, down, left and right if he needs to.

He might not be a great sailor, but he doesn’t need to be. Not for this.

On day seventeen, he and the SEALs head over to where CGIS keeps the boats they confiscate. And with loads of paperwork, an I don’t have time for this bullshit attitude, and Abbi Borin on speed dial, he gets his hands on four daysailers of different varieties.

They don’t hold a whole lot, but they’re small and fast and can be sailed by one person. They’ve got tiny engines that don’t make much noise. He figures he can get four people out per boat.

At last count, they were down to 635. The next day they get anything even remotely like a cloudy sky, instead of Jethro’s ten people out per trip, they’ll get that up to twenty-six, more if they do multiple trips.

Ziva’s working on the logistics of getting more than one run taken care of. And once Penny’s gotten some sleep and more to eat, she’s on top of that, too.

It’s not exactly safe. Getting it set up works best at night, so Penny’s not scouting it out, but she’s getting it planned. Doing the math.

The Woodrow Wilson Bridge links the Virginia side of 495 to the Maryland side. Right now, there are three spotlights and a collection of Maryland National Guardsmen on top of the bridge. Those spotlights have a finite range. They can illuminate only so far out, and they cannot be turned too close to the bridge, either.

So, with Penny doing the math, and Ziva plotting how to get everything in place, they’re planning on setting up a spot to drop people off, under the bridge. Semper needs a deeper berth than they can get, but the new little boats can be pulled ashore under the bridge, people can get off, and then they can turn around and grab more of them.

As long as there is someone on the shore to lead those people off of the shore and to a… van or something… It’ll have to be far enough away from the bridge so the sentries don’t see it, but once they get there, Penny can pick them up and then drive them to a hotel or something.

---

On day eighteen, Leon is yelling, “Where the fuck are you guys?” The promise of food in ‘three days’ is now five days past. And right now, 6000 pounds of MREs would do his camp a world of good. Hell, right now, 300 pounds of MREs would make a real difference.

Gibbs brought in more food last night. The SEALS got more food in, too. And he’s been lucky enough to bring everyone's calorie count up to 1300. For today, and tomorrow. And then again, they’re out.

“Do you have any idea how hard it is to get prisoners out of DC?” Captain Craig says back to him.

“No, I’m totally fucking clueless as to how bad DC is right now! I’ve only been sitting in the goddammned middle of it since day one!”

Craig snorts. “Yeah. I’m sure. Try taking the 200 most wanted men out of the city. We had to fight our way in, and then fight our way out, and that was just with the first twenty of them. Then we had to regroup outside of the city and wait for reinforcements. We still haven’t gotten CGIS cleaned out, yet. We needed more men, we just got them yesterday. We’ll get to you tomorrow.”

“You better. Do you have any idea how low we are on food?”

“Yes… um… well…”

Leon goes cold when he hears that.

“What?”

“We… That’s part of how we got out. Twenty prisoners, forty of us, a convoy of jeeps… Thousands of them. We had to toss the food. Throwing it aside kept most the crowd so busy we could get out.”

Leon blinks, and then snaps the pencil he was holding.

“We don’t have any extras. Not until we get out again.”

“What are you feeding your men? You’re feeding them, right?”

Craig snorts at that. “They came in with rations. They’ll get more when we get out, but right now, the only ones who have something are the ones who didn’t give their rations away.”

Leon slumps in defeat. He knows how it works. He was doing it, in the beginning, when they still had more than an extra day of food. He’d give little bits out. He’s sure the soldiers did it, too. They know, at the end of the day, or in the morning at the latest, they’ll get something to eat. So, as they move, they’re tossing their MREs to hungry people.

“I promise. Tomorrow, we grab your guys, and we get them out. Then we’ll come back, with the food. Day after tomorrow, 6000 pounds of MREs, more if I can get it to you.”

Leon doesn’t respond. He hangs up and calls Gibbs. “Food’s not coming.”

“I’ve got better news.”

“Thank you!”

“Tony’s got four more boats. Light little things. I can get three of them in the water now, and if you give me one more sailor, I can get all four of them moving.”

“Next run, I’ll get you sailors.”

“Great.”

Leon hangs up, feeling… Awful, really. Because there’s one thing Gibbs and he didn’t say to each other. The sky is clear tonight. And it’s supposed to be clear tomorrow. No rain predicted until day twenty.

By day nineteen, it’s very clear who the military people are, and who the civilians are. The civilians are fried. They’re in varying levels of past what they can endure.

Leon’s getting them out by lottery. Gibbs can, safely, pack ten people on his boat. Twelve if enough of them are kids.

It’s slow. It’s not getting people out nearly fast enough. But it’s something.

Leon’s worried. It’s might not be enough. He’s got double guards on the food right now, and is passing it out with armed men.

Technically speaking, they aren’t starving, not the way the outside is. Right now, everyone in the compound is getting three tiny meals a day.

But he’s getting scared. He doesn’t know how long it’s going to be before he has riots inside the walls, to go with the ones outside.

On day nineteen the New York National Guard shows up and takes the prisoners. 618 people left to feed. Most of the camp lines up to jeer and throw things at them as they leave.

Once they’re out of the compound, Leon hears gunfire. Once again, the National Guard is having to fight to get these men out. All of DC blames them for what happened, and they do not want to see them stand trial. And by right now, he’s sure they’d rather just let the mob have them.

Either way, it’s not his problem anymore. Everyone gets an extra mouthful of food, and that’s a (tiny) victory, or sorts.
Day 20:

“What part of don’t let anyone see what you’re doing was unclear!” Leon screams at the Lieutenant in the New York National Guard who drove up in his APV, bold as brass, and visibly unloaded two pallets of food in front of the Navy Yard.

The Lt. flips him the bird, hops back into his APV, and drives out of there, fast. (An eventual inquiry will bring out the fact that said Lt.’s older brother was a Congressman until the day he died, two weeks earlier, when a mob lynched him. Said Lt blamed NCIS, because they’re the ones who broke the news.)

“Shit, shit, shit, shit!” Leon yells. It’s hundreds, not thousands of pounds of food, saran wrapped together, all in neat, tidy squares on wooden pallets, out in view of anyone who is watching, and he can feel them watching.

“Fast!” He’s got Marines running over, grabbing them, lifting loads that two weeks ago would have taken one, maybe two of them, and today takes four, manhandling what should be on a dolly (but there’s no time to grab a dolly) Leon can already see people starting to run toward them.

He hears warning shots from the roof, and that stops the people running toward them.

But they’re regrouping, and from the look of it, texting, probably tweeting.

When he’s behind the wall, he gets confirmation, twitter just blew up with #FeedDC #FoodattheNavyYard.

Right now, Leon Vance would happily give every penny he has in evidence (1.2 million dollars) and both arms to not make the decision he has to make.

In the Navy Yard, behind the wall, they are not starving. Technically. They’re hungry. But they are not starving, and tonight, if Gibbs gets through, they will get a little more food.

Inside the walls, they’ve seen the food, much, much less than was promised. It’s about five hundred pounds of MREs. Or less than one per person.

He knows, that if he tries to keep that food inside his walls, the mob will rush them, and it’s entirely likely they will break his defenses.

And he knows that if the tries to put that food outside the walls, his people in here will riot. He’s already got Marines keeping his own people off the food by gunpoint, and if he doesn’t let them eat soon, they may turn those guns on him.

“Vance, they’re coming!” He doesn’t know who yells it. He does know that last week, let alone last month, that yell would have been a hell of a lot louder.

Decision time.

He looks over the walls, and he can see them coming, dirty, hungry, slow, every nightmare of every Zombie movie ever. He made sure his people were safe, and he did fuck all to save them. Didn’t let them know to get out of DC, didn’t warn their families. They didn’t get to prepare.
And none of them expected to spend this long under martial law.

He closes his eyes, thinks for a moment longer, and then says, “Come on, get the pallets, we’re gonna feed people.”

Jarvis shakes his head, looking out at the mass of people pushing in toward the Navy Yard. In less than a minute, he’ll need to be on the roof again. “There’s at least five thousand people coming here right now. We give everything out, and less than one out of ten will get any food. The rest of them will rush us, or the ones with food.”

“Clayt…” Leon’s eyes are all but bleeding with the pain of this. “We’re going to have to shoot starving people.”

“Leon,” Clayt eyes the food in the middle of his lot, and the people inching toward it. “You try to take it out of here, and you’re going to have to shoot your own people.”

“Fuck!” Leon shouts. He turns to the Marines guarding it. “Hand it out. Fast. Everyone with a gun, on the walls. We’re gonna go, we might as well go fed!”

Jarvis whips his knife off his belt and cuts through the saranwrap. He grabs five meals, not bothering to look at what they are, and then runs for the roof.

Tim’s already watching the mob, and this time, it’s not about to turn away. This time… He can hope another tank will show up out of the blue, or that they can punch so much lead into the crowd that it breaks.

Supposedly mobs have been breaking faster lately, too tired and weak to really go bonkers.

But they’re also desperate, and hungry, and they know there’s food behind the wall.

Jarvis tosses an MRE at him before crashing next to him on the roof, setting his rifle into place. “Eat it. If we’re gonna kill for it, we might as well get to enjoy it.” He’s already ripping open his pack, and the smell hits Tim like a hammer.

It’s not enticing, he doesn’t want it, at least, his brain doesn’t. His stomach is screaming for food. He grabs his and eats, fast, shoveling something, he’s got no idea what, into his mouth as fast as he can, keeping his eyes on the crowd. They haven’t gotten to the cars yet, and Leon’s yelling on the bullhorn, telling them to disperse or they will open fire.

A minute later, he’s throwing up, and he’s not the only one. He hasn’t tried to put that much food into himself in weeks and his body won’t take it.

As soon as he’s done, he’s back at his rifle, and focused again. This is it, all that’s left of him, keeping the line intact.

There are no warning shots on this one. Leon’s been yelling warnings the whole time the mob’s been gathering. The first person past the cars drops, and Tim doesn’t know if he fired the shot that did it or not.

And worse, he doesn’t care.
Fornell might not have been able to get them food, but he did get them bullets.

Lots and lots of bullets.

Tim doesn’t have to run for the wall. He stays, safe (ish) above it all, firing round after round after round. On the fourth surge, when the mob once again falls back, they finally break. The back of the crowd begins to wander off. The front is littered with screaming people, and bodies that won’t ever move again.

When it’s done, and all that’s left is the sound of the wounded, Tim throws his rifle off the roof and leaves.

On day twenty, Tim shuts down. He killed people who wanted to eat. He did it. He knows he did it. He knows why.

And he doesn’t care anymore.

About anything.

They’re never getting out of this. This is it. The rest of his life is going to be stuck in this hell hole, chewing down tasteless gruel and staring, dead-eyed, at the people around him.

He’ll walk the perimeter, and he’ll kill starving people so that his people can starve at a slightly slower rate. And one day, he’ll vanish. Get thinner and thinner until there’s just nothing left.

Abby calls, and he doesn’t pick up the phone.

Jimmy tries a few minutes later, and he still doesn’t answer.

There’s no outside world anymore, and he’s not going to pretend there is.

“Turn on the news!” Breena says, sounding scared.

They try not to watch the news too much. Otherwise they’d be glued to a TV twenty-four seven, trying to see what’s happening. But, they are keeping watch, especially on Twitter, because that’s giving them live, up to the minute reports, and as soon as she saw #FoodattheNavyYard go live, Breena knew they had to watch.

So they did.

There’s some helicopter footage. Not much. They can see the roof Tim’s on, and five tiny people on it, lying down, presumably firing into the crowd, but they don’t know which one is him.

There’s more footage from people’s phones. Mostly bouncing up and down and people running. Some toward the Navy Yard, some away. They see people throwing Molotov cocktails. They hear screaming and gunshots and people moaning, begging for food. And it goes on and on and on.
The can see, from the helicopter footage that nothing gets near the roof, so they assume that Tim has to be okay, but as soon as it’s done, as the crowd breaks, they begin calling.

Tim doesn’t pick up.

Abbi’s their next call. “Kind of busy right now.”

“Tim’s not answering.”

Abbi grits her teeth. Yes, she loves Tim. Yes, she wants him to be okay. But A: he is choosing to be here. And B: she’s got more than six hundred other people she’s also trying to protect, most of whom are not choosing to stay here. She does not have time to be coddling McGee, who is a perfectly good soldier, who is doing his job as well as he can and if he doesn’t want to talk to these overprotective lunatics who keep calling every ten minute from the outside, that’s on him. She says as much to Jimmy, who hangs up in a snit.

(When she gets out of here, and gets to eat again, Abbi will be horrifically embarrassed by this.
Everyone had their own flavors of shutting down, and Abbi’s was to shift into hyper-competent officer mode. If it wasn’t directly related to keeping their camp safe, she just didn’t see it.)

When she does, finally, get a few minutes, once she’s made sure the wall is secure, and that her perimeter has been rebuilt, and that everyone still on the wall has their full compliment of ammo, and all of her wounded have been tended to by Ducky and Allan… then she takes a few minutes to go looking for McGee. (Because he is one of her soldiers, after all, and she looks out for her soldiers, so she does check on him.)

Abbi finds him walking the wall a few minutes later. She pulls him down to sit, and sits next to him, and wraps her arm around his shoulder.

Like the rest of them, she hasn’t really seen Tim in days. He’s on the roof. She’s on the wall. She doesn’t think she’s actually seen him in two days, and shit, Jimmy and Abby and Breena might not have been totally insane. He’s listlessly wandering around the wall in a t-shirt and slacks. Unarmed.
No armor, not even his helmet.

She knows combat fatigue when she sees it, and this is it. Shit, shit, shit, shit!

“You’re on the boat tonight.”

His eyes are dead as he says, “If I’m on the boat, a kid isn’t.”

Abbi shakes her head. “You’ve got four hours to grab your gear.”

“I can’t go.”

“Tim, if you’re not on the boat, you’re going to eat your gun or let someone shoot you.” The wall is, right now, fairly safe. But everyone who walks it should have body armor and a helmet on. Tim’s walking it in slacks and a t-shirt and it’s about fifty-five degrees out. “You’re out of here. Four hours.
If you won’t put yourself on it, in four hours I will have you carried onto it.”

She doesn’t mention, that as a person with a Virginia driver’s license, they can just walk him out of the city. She’s giving him to Gibbs, because she’s honestly not sure that if they get him out of the city on his own, that he won’t just end up wandering around, lost, out there.

She gets up. “I’ve got to watch.” With him not on the roof, she’s the next best sharpshooter. And she’s not good. But if he leaves, someone needs to replace him, just to watch, if not to shoot. And right now, she’s convinced Tim shouldn’t be holding a rifle.

Abbi makes one more stop on her way to the roof. “Ducky, I need you to get Tim, and make sure he’s on the boat.”

Ducky find him exactly where Abbi left him. Not moving, not really seeing anything, though his eyes are open. “It’s time to go, Timothy.”

He doesn’t respond to that. Then he slowly looks at Ducky. “Shouldn’t you be out there? With the wounded.”

That gets Ducky’s attention, in a bad way.

“Why do you say that?”

“They’re still crying out there.”

Ducky sits down, slowly, because that’s the only way he can get on the ground from standing these days, and he wraps his arm around Tim. “How long have you been sitting here, Timothy?”

Tim blinks and looks at the sky. It should be morning, but the sun is on the wrong side of the Navy Yard, barely hovering over the wall. He squints a bit. “Feels like ten minutes.”

Ducky holds him closer. “I’ve seen to the wounded. The dying have been sent off to rest, and the ones I could help have been helped. You’ve been out here seven hours, Timothy.”

“Oh. Where’s Penny?”

“She left with Jethro a few days ago.”

“Right.” He looks like he might be remembering that.

“It’s time for you to leave. You made it twenty days, and you did not have to be here for any of them. There’s no shame in going home.”

Tim’s eyes finally meet his. “You’re not.”

Duck shakes that off. There’s literally nothing he can do outside this building that’s more important than what he’s doing inside of it. “My vocation is here, and more than that, I didn’t have to man the sharpshooter’s perch. If I had, I’d be leaving, too. That’s a job that requires more training than just the ability to aim. I could not have done it. Let alone twice.”

“They were starving, Duck,” Tim says it flat, empty. He’s past crying now.

Ducky squeezes Tim to him. “I know, Timothy.”
“And they were going to mob us. I know it, but… They’re so hungry.”

Ducky nods, gently. “So are you, aren’t you?”

He nods, eyes empty.

Ducky can see how much weight Tim’s lost. They all have. But unlike some of them, he didn’t get into this situation with much fat to spare. “When was the last time you ate your full food allotment?”

Tim shakes his head. “I take the pills.”

“You need calories in addition to nutrients. The one without the other doesn’t get the job done. Come, now. Food. Shower. Sleep. Then you get on the boat.”

“I can’t go.”

Ducky’s gently rubbing his back. “Yes, you can. You are not a soldier and you never wanted to be one. You do not need to be one now. You can leave.”

“If I go…”

Ducky takes the time to watch Tim eat. And he makes the effort to tip some of his own food into Tim’s bowl. It’s not much food, but judging by how he’s eating it, it’s more than he’s had in days, maybe longer.

As he’s watching Tim slowly chew, it’s hitting Ducky how little he’s seen Tim lately. He’s thinking it’s possible the last time he saw him was when they were eating the pickles, and he has an unsettling thought, he has no idea how many days ago that was.

Looking at Tim, who’s chewing very carefully, making sure each bite gets ground into a pulp, that Ducky realizes how far he’s been in his own head, his own world. Anyone with eyes should have been able to see that Tim needed to get out of here days ago, if not more. But he didn’t see, because he wasn’t looking at anything beyond the next patient.

Ducky’s eye catches the glint of Tim’s wedding ring, on his thumb now.

Then an even colder thought hits Ducky, he holds up his own hand and notices that his wedding ring is gone. He’s lost enough weight that it must have fallen off at some point, without him noticing.

Ducky realizes he hasn’t looked at himself in a mirror in… He has no idea.

Tim’s not the only one who has to get out of here. They all do. Now.

But now isn’t going to happen. Not unless the outside world radically changes.

Tim drifts back to his office. Sleep. Time to sleep. Ducky’s gently steered him within a few feet of his office and told him to sleep. Then he went off to talk to Leon about something.
Eat, Ducky said, so he ate. His insides feel unsteady, unused to that much food at once, but as soon as his stomach shifted from incessant gnawing at him, his eyes started to droop, and he wants nothing more than to shut a door between himself and the rest of the world and sleep. He’s so tired, he’s even skipping his shower. He just needs to sleep.

Tim opens the door without thinking. It’s his office, he’s barely in the world right now, three quarters a ghost, so he just drifts in, and then stops.

It takes him a stupidly long time to figure out what Draga’s doing in there, with a woman, who’s name he doesn’t know. She’s one of the Marines Jarvis called in, and apparently she’s a natural blonde, and that’s all Tim needs or wants to know about that.

He shuts the door behind him, and walks out, all the way to the spot near the USS Barry, where Jethro’s been loading and unloading, and he lies down on the chill ground, to sleep until Jethro gets there.

He’s done.

It’s 23:48 on day twenty, when Jethro gets his boat to the Navy Yard. It’s 00:14 on day twenty-one when Tim gets on. He made it a full twenty days.

Jethro watches him as much as he can, while trying to sail by feel alone, with Semper in full black out condition for several more miles.

He hopes sleep and food and time with his family will pull Tim out of this. He’s afraid he left one of his men, one of his boys behind when he shouldn’t have, and he’s cursing himself the whole way back to their house.
Elysium

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Like everyone else who gets on Semper, Tim’s met with a warm blanket and a thermos full of hot chicken broth. He sips it, absently, feeling warm and dull. His eyes are heavy, and the soft rocking on the boat is hypnotic.

Like most of the people who get on Semper, he’s asleep in a few minutes.

He wakes up at some later point, still on Semper, still in the dark. He’s not sure what woke him up, but he’s hungry. So hungry. Ready to eat the other passengers hungry. He’s about to gulp down what’s left of his chicken broth, but he remembers what happened when he did that with the MRE, and right now he really doesn’t want to get sea sick.

So he keeps sipping.

And after a minute, notices he’s not feeling sick.

He’s not sure if he’s too fried to get sea sick, or the switch in his head finally flipped and boats don’t do it for him anymore.

Either way, he’s tired, and he drifts off again.

It’s still dark, and he’s still on the boat when he wakes up again. His phone is buzzing. That’s probably what woke him up the last time, too.

He blinks a few times at the wash of light his cellphone spreads below deck as he hits the contact button.

“Tell me Gibbs has you,” Jimmy sounds terrified.

“Yeah.” His voice sounds rough, weak, and very strange to his ears.

“We’ll be there as soon as possible.”

“Jimmy…” He’s so tired, even talking seems like too much work. He says the name but his voice trails off.

“Tim?”

He gathers up more energy and finally says, “I’ll come to you.”

“We can be there—“

“Abby’ll understand.” Explaining will take too much work. He’s so tired, all he wants is sleep and food. “Breena’s story. I want to see it. I’ll get there.” He yawns, loud.
“Okay. You rest. And… We’ll talk about the rest, later.”

“Mmmm.”

“He’s out.” Jimmy says, and watches both of the girls sag with relief. And then, in less than a heartbeat, Abby’s up, gathering their stuff, ready to get back to him.

“We can be there before lunch,” Breena adds, getting into it.

“He wants to come to us.” That stops both of them. Breena’s looking just as puzzled as Jimmy’s voice sounded when he said it. “He said you’d understand.” Now they’re both watching Abby.

She sighs, and sits down, hard. She wants to run to him. She’d fly if she could. She needs to see him and touch him and hear his voice and wrap herself in his arms and… She blinks hard, feeling the tears in her eyes.

He’s got to be in really deep if he wants that much alone time.

Jimmy and Breena move to her, petting gently. She sniffs a few times but gets it together. “You’ve seen it, too. When he’s had too much, he needs to pull back, get some alone time.”

“That defensive sleeping thing he does?” Jimmy asks.

She nods. “That’s part of it. Or, if you press him before he’s ready to talk, he just curls in on himself. Nothing comes out. The step past that is the need to be literally alone. Last time that happened was after things blew up with his Mom. He needed a few hours entirely on his own, in his head, to rest and reset.”

“You’re saying he needs time to… unfurl?” Breena says. “Is that what he said to you?” she asks Jimmy.

“He said Abby would understand, and that he wanted to see the story you told him.”

Abby nods, she can see that. “How’d he sound?”

“Dead on his feet. But he was talking. Some. And he sounded tired, not… detached. I told him we’d talk more later.” Jimmy looks at both of the ladies. “After this last adventure, I’m reserving our right to overrule him. We’ll talk to Gibbs and Penny, see how he really is, if he should even try to drive, and we’ll go from there.”

Gibbs can’t wait to get all of these people, most of whom are just nameless faces, off of Semper so he can get some time alone with Tim.

“Those people” are, like all the other people he’s gotten out, exhausted and starved. They are not setting any speed records for getting out of a boat. At least this time, all of them wake up when prodded. He’s had a few of them who wouldn’t, before. Apparently that’s a thing that happens where you have terrified, starved, exhausted people, and then you give them food, wrap them in warm blankets, and leave it dark and quiet for three hours.
That had been really spooky the first time it happened, but he’s getting used to it. Everyone’s woken back up sooner or later, but some of them ended up sleeping hard as soon as they were out of the Navy Yard.

Tim’s sleeping hard. He’s not even trying to get him up. Tim can spend as long in Semper as he needs to.

There are people on the dock. They started coming in about an hour after Gibbs was underway. When he was on the water, Leon set the lotto to go, and once he got names picked those people started making calls.

There’s a line of cars in the driveway, and strangers milling around, holding their friends and family.

They’re on the honor system right now. Gibbs didn’t have a person to spare. Tony, Ziva, and Penny are all running the landing under the Woodrow Wilson Bridge, and Gibbs had to trust that the notes he left at the house got the idea across.

It sounds like it did.

He sticks his head out for a few minutes, sees that everyone has someone waiting for them. He gets out, goes to fridge that they’ve got in the kitchen, grabs another thermos, this one full of cold milk, flavored with a little (decaf) coffee and a lot of sugar.

Each time he’s gone out, he’s made one up, waiting to give it to Tim.

By the time he’s back to Semper the dock is almost empty, Mona’s keeping watch, looking like she’s enjoying the rain on her fur, and cars are starting to pull away. Other than the dull patter of rain, it’s starting to get quiet.

Gibbs climbs back up, thermos in hand, and heads below deck, where Tim’s sprawled out, resting back against the hull.

Gibbs doesn’t add any light, between his night dark eyes and the faint glow of Semper’s navigation system he can see well enough. Gibbs sits down next to him, sharing the berth, and he gently nudges Tim until he’s lying on his side, head in Gibbs’ lap.

Tim doesn’t wake, though he burrows into the blanket more, and half nuzzles Gibbs’ leg.

Gibbs pets his head, feeling the barest blush of peach fuzz hair, and much too prominent skull bones under his head.

“I’m sorry,” he says it very softly. “Been doing a shitty job lookin’ out for you this last year. Gonna do better.”

Tim snores a bit.

The next time Tim wakes up, Gibbs is holding him, just the two of them in Semper, both rocking gently with the motion of the river.

Tim blinks a few times, not sure if he wants to get up, or just stay here. His bladder is suggesting that up is a really good idea. The rest of him is thinking that laying here forever is an even better idea.

“I should have made you go,” Gibbs says when he realizes that Tim’s awake.

Tim swallows. He nods. “I should have listened.” He sits up, slowly, feeling dizzy and exhausted and so hungry. Gibbs helps him, keeps him steady as he goes from lying on his side to sitting up, and then he reaches for the thermos, and unscrews the top.

“Slowly.”

Tim nods, taking a sip, his tongue lighting up with pleasure. It takes all of his self-control to not gulp down the whole thermos. But after one sip, he puts it down and says, “I know. Last thing I ate fast didn’t stick around for long.” That brings back memories of the roof, and Tim starts crying.

Gibbs holds onto him for a long time, rubbing his back and head, eventually getting him to drink the coffee. Eventually, Tim sleeps again.

It’s gray inside the Semper the next time Tim wakes up. And this time the pattering of the rain is gone, Gibbs is snoring slightly next to him, and Mona’s curled up against Tim’s back.

This time, he’s really got to get up, or his bladder is going to explode. So, he slowly untangles himself and stands up, kind of, he has to grab for the top bunk to steady himself.

He feels like his knees are only loosely connected to the rest of his body, and his grip on the top bunk isn’t nearly as secure as he’d like, and he wonders if he was this unsteady in the Navy Yard, or if this is a response to finally getting some real rest and a little food into himself.

As soon as he has that thought, he’s ravenous again.

But first things first.

They have one functional bathroom at the house. Mostly because none of them wanted to rent a port-a-john. So, the powder room off the foyer didn’t get ripped out, and won’t be until they’ve got at least one other bathroom up and working.

The house is a good thousand feet from Semper, so Tim’s thinking the local tree population won’t mind if he takes advantage of them. He’s right, the maple he’s leaning against doesn’t complain. He can just about smell the trees, the rain soaked air, and the river, but mostly he smells himself. Fear, sweat, hunger, ash, death, mildew. His skin is crawling at it, and whatever is left of the coffee milk is violently churning in his stomach.

It’s cool out there, but he doesn’t care. He strips out of everything he was wearing except for this ring and wrist cuff, leaving it lying on the forest floor, and then wraps the blanket more tightly around himself. He’s not sure which he wants more, a hot shower or food.

Then he realizes it doesn’t matter, there isn’t a hot shower out here, but there is food.

It takes him a long time to get back to the house, but he does, and once he’s there, he sees that it’s still not finished, but apparently Gibbs maybe, or… Ziva or Penny (It looks more comfortable than he thinks Gibbs would set up on his own.) has set up a little campground in the living room.

There’s cut logs by the fireplace, but right now it’s cold. Inflatable mattresses with sleeping bags and pillows and more blankets fill the floor. He can smell smoke, but clean smoke. The salty tang of wood smoke, and it’s not similar enough to burnt DC to flood his memory banks with images of the fires.

He’s moving faster, toward the kitchen. The floor is rough under his feet, and it would be because it’s bare plywood right now, but the fridge is plugged in and turned on. He stumbles over to it, and yanks it open, and finds himself crying again.

There’s so much in there. Fruit and milk and yogurt and thermoses filled with something, and cold cuts, and more drinks, and eggs, and there’s bacon, and there’s just so much.

He’s standing there, wrapped in the blanket, paralyzed by so much choice when Gibbs finds him.

Gibbs gently leads Tim back to the beds, and sits him down. Then he grabs a yogurt and a spoon, and gives them to Tim, before getting a fire going. It’ll be a little while before he’s ready to make toast, and a bit longer for decent eggs and bacon, but he’s got more than enough cold food to keep Tim fed.

But it’s a moot point, Tim finishes the yogurt, grabs pretty much every blanket in sight, piles them on himself, stretches out on sleeping bag, and is asleep again.

Mona pads over to him, and lays her head on his thigh.

Gibbs pats her head, and gets the fire ready for cooking. His boy is going to eat!

Gibbs is making eggs when his phone buzzes. Tony’s number. He texts back, because he doesn’t want to risk waking up Tim by talking, though, given how he’s looking right now, that’s unlikely to happen.

Count? Gibbs sends to Tony.

36. Had time for three runs. You got me another sailor, right?

Yeah. One of them is. Jarvis says some more should be joining you, with their own ships, soon.

Ships?

That’s what he said. Though Gibbs wonders about that. But Jarvis was looking well beyond fried when he talked to him, so he decided pressing the matter wasn’t a good plan.

Okay. Weather channel says rain all night. 70% chance tomorrow, too. We’re pushing off as soon as the sun sets. You?

Yeah. I’ve got to get more supplies, but I’ll be less than a mile from the bridge when the sun sets. What are you bringing in?

Henne brought me a truck-full of MREs. He and his buddies boosted them from the National Guard. He’s got it tucked under the bridge. If anyone looks under here, we’re busted, but right now, we’re ready to go. As many runs as we can get, people are going out and food’s going in.

Gibbs nods. He glances outside, rain is still spitting down. Everyone eats tonight.

God willing and the rain don’t stop! We’re going to crash at your place, and then back to it tonight.
You get McGee out?

Tim’s here.

He okay?

Don’t know yet.

Let me know if you need one of us to come.

You guys rest. Long night ahead. He’s sleeping now, and I’ve got him until Abby gets here. Can’t imagine it’ll be more than a few more hours.

---

I’ve got him isn’t precisely true.

It’s generally true.

But, when it comes down to it, no matter how much he wants to sit here and watch Tim sleep and then pour some more food into him, there are (as best as he can figure) 582 people still in the Navy Yard, including his wife and all of his best friends, and he’s got to get them fed.

So, with toast, eggs, and bacon made and sitting next to the fire, and a pot of coffee staying warm next to it, Gibbs writes a note: Costco run. Back soon. Eat. Sleep. Clean clothing in the bag on your left. Then we’ll get you home.

By the time he’s done writing, he can see Mona perk up her ears and hear the sound of trucks on gravel. His “manual labor,” the SEALs, are back and ready to help him move stuff.

He’s about to ruffle Tim’s hair, but there’s no hair to ruffle, so he settles for a gentle pet, and then Mona gets a firmer one, along with, “Keep him company.”

She gives him the look he reads as, What? You think I’m going to shirk my duty? Surely you’ve confused me with someone else. Gibbs pats her again, and heads out.

---

He’s in Costco, with his shopping list, when Abby calls. “How is he?”

Gibbs isn’t sure how to answer that. “Tired. Too thin. I… don’t know about the rest, yet. He’s been awake for less than an hour since I grabbed him.”

“Nothing a hot shower and a good meal won’t fix?” Abby sounds both hopeful, and like she knows that hope won’t pan out.

“I doubt it.”

“Nothing a hot shower, a month of good meals, another month of full nights of sleep, lots of quality time with his family, more quality time with Wolf, assuming we can find him again, and maybe a job where he never has to set food in the Navy Yard again, and possibly DC, won’t fix?”
“Probably closer.” Gibbs has seen people so broken they never bounce back, and he doesn’t think Tim’s there, at this point he doesn’t think Tim can get there. (If he could get that beaten down, the Stennis probably would have done it.) But he also knows this isn’t a light little kerfuffle that Tim’ll just brush off. “Might need some antibiotics, too.” Gibbs doesn’t like the way some of those cuts on Tim’s head looks.

“Gibbs?”

“Just some cuts. Nothing big.”

“What kind of cuts? He was on the roof, not fighting hand to hand!” Abby’s convinced the little blob in black at the North East corner of the NCIS building was Tim. And, though Jimmy pointed out that every single blob on the roof looked like every other blob, she has been unshakable in her opinion as to which one was her Tim.

“He shaved his head, Abbs. He’s got some cuts from that.”

Abby goes silent on the other end. The idea that things would go bad enough or that he’d be hurting bad enough to take his hair off is horrifying to her, in a much more concrete way than the previous bits they’ve been able to get about how Tim’s physical body is.

She pulls it together to say, “He wants to come to us.”

Jethro makes a confused look at that. “Uh…”

“Yeah. We wanna get a read from you and Penny on that before just ignoring it, ordering him to stay put, and coming home to him.”

“I don’t know. I’m pretty sure all he’s doing today is sleeping and eating. Maybe get a shower once I get him home. I can’t imagine him behind the wheel of a car is a good idea. Not today.”

“Nightmares?”

“Not that I’m seeing. But he’s sleeping hard.”

“How thin is ‘too thin?’” They’ve seen Tony and Penny, so they know the people getting out of the Navy Yard are thin, but they weren’t in there as long as Tim was. And, both of them went in with more of a body fat cushion to burn through. (If you didn’t know what happened to him, now that the haunted look from inside the Navy Yard is starting to fade away, Tony looks like he was on a really successful diet.) And, though Abby doesn’t know this, both of them, as people working outside of the walls, were getting more food than Tim was.

Gibbs isn’t great at eyeing that sort of thing. Jimmy could probably take one look and get Tim’s weight within three pounds. Gibbs can’t. “Remember back when he got really thin?”

“About five years ago?”

“Yeah. He’s probably another ten pounds down from there.”

Abby curses. Then she says, “You’re taking him to a doctor. And then I want to know what the Doc thinks about him trying to drive to Canada.”

Gibbs feels relieved by that, because that’s a very concrete order that he can and happily will take care of.
“When I get back, and he’s awake, that’ll be the stop after I get him a shower. Then I’ll give you a call.”

“Okay. Talk later.”

It’s early afternoon on day twenty-one when Tim wakes up and actually feels “awake.” It’s also the first time in probably two weeks that he feels clear. Like he’s really in the world and not just drifting through a nightmare.

He yawns, stretches, feels… hungry. Really hungry. Tired. Sore. And… home. He wants home, he wants it so bad he hurts, and that feels good to him. Not just because he’s, for the first time in more than a week wanting something, but that wanting it means he’s gotten back to the point where he thinks he can have it.

He sits up and sees that Penny’s grabbing a nap, too. He’s not sure when she got here, but judging from the fact she’s holding his hand, she may have shown up to see him. He gives her a little squeeze before thinking about how thin she is.

Apparently, his mental image of her didn’t update while they were in the Navy Yard.

Or he just didn’t really see anyone. That’s… distressingly likely. He’s also thinking his mental image of himself is likely to be proven wildly inaccurate should he get in front of a mirror. He already knows that if he closes his eyes, he thinks his skin should be pale, (which it is) but it should also be somewhere in the peach spectrum (and right now it’s gray.) His mental image of himself isn’t so slim he can push his wrist cuff almost all the way up to his elbow, and his mental image isn’t wearing his wedding ring on his thumb.

Nothing to do about that but eat. Which he wants to do.

He can hear things moving around outside, and is mildly curious about that, though he’s way more interested in eating.

He sits up, and the blanket slips off of him, and he’s cold. He thinks he should probably expect that. Even dressed, he’s going to be cold for a while. He knows (and he considers the fact that he, once again, knows stuff like this a good sign) that he’s going to be cold until he can regain some weight and somehow convince his metabolism to get moving again.

So, he tucks the blanket around him further, and goes in search of more food.

Jethro pops up out of somewhere, probably outside if his wet hair and clothing is anything to go by, when Tim’s sitting on the fireplace sipping coffee and eating some toast, (He made himself. His hands are a bit too shaky for cooking over a fire, so part of the toast is a bit singed.) with just a little butter on it.

He’d been really happy to see the toast, bacon, and eggs when he woke up last time, and, even though he ate them slowly, the first bite of bacon set his stomach rumbling in a way he didn’t like. Probably too much fat. Mona was happy to help him out with that, and the eggs went down fine.

And, once he was done eating, his eyes were drooping, so he pulled on the clean clothing, which felt… pretty good. He’s sure he’ll appreciate clean clothing even more once he’s got clean skin to go with it, and right now, warm is worth it’s weight in gold, if not calories.

“How are you feeling?” Jethro asks, sitting next to him, keeping his voice low so as not to wake Penny.

Tim shrugs a bit at that. He’s honestly not sure. A bit like when he was getting over the flu, and given that getting over the flu also involved all the emotional stuff that went with getting his relationship with his parents re-figured out, that’s probably the best comparison he could come up with. But it’s not right.

Gibbs nods. He didn’t feel right for days after getting out, either. Though getting the goop out of his lungs probably helped a lot with feeling ‘right.’ Getting more food took him the rest of the way. And having a real job to do pushed everything else out of his mind.

“Abbi’s running the defenses.” He figures Gibbs would like to hear how she’s doing. “She’s… I don’t know how… but she’s still going.” Gibbs nods at that. He calls her in the morning. They both get a little quiet time then. There’s no such thing as an ex-Marine, and Abbi’s living up to that. She might not be enjoying this, but… like with Jethro, this is her vocation. It’s who she is and what she’s meant to be doing. She wasn’t made for paper-pushing. She was made to man barricades and protect the people behind them. “And Duck wouldn’t leave. He’s gonna see it out, I think.” That sets his mind in a direction it shouldn’t go. Tim starts to feel nervous, panicky, afraid that it’s never going to end, that he’ll never see Ducky or Abbi again because they’ll never get out of there.

Gibbs grabs his hand. “We’re getting them out. All of them. At least fifty a night, now. And we’re starting to get enough of them out that we can get the ones who are still in there fed.”

That makes Tim nervous, too. If there’s too much food in there, people will find out, and they’ll attack.

Jethro sees it, and squeezes his hand harder. “We go in at night, when it’s raining. No one’s out. No one sees.”

Tim takes a deep breath and tries to banish the fear. “Okay.” He takes another big bite of the toast. Crispy, warm, slightly salty with butter. That flavor on his tongue does a good job of putting him here, at the house, with Gibbs, not back in the Navy Yard.

“I’ve got to get back here by six, get ready for the next run. Between then and now, I’m taking you home, get you a shower, and then you’re going to see a doc.”

Tim nods a bit at that. “Okay.” He’s suddenly feeling very tired again.

Gibbs gives him a hand up, and leads him to Abbi’s car.

The ride back to his house is quiet. Gibbs has news on, but Tim can’t really follow it. He catches something about the Texas Rangers taking custody of the Bush family, but it’s blurry.

He mostly dozes, but he wakes up as they get to his neighborhood. He’s watching, amazed. Somehow autumn happened when he was out of the world. (That’s how he’s starting to think of it. There’s his life, and then there’s this chunk of time where he was out of his life, out of the world, but he’s back, now.) The houses have Halloween decorations. There are carved pumpkins out.
“What day is it?” Tim asks Gibbs.

“October 26th.”

“Fuck!”

Gibbs looks at Tim, worried.

“Missed our anniversary.” He sees Gibbs look confused at that. “Not wedding. I’m with it enough I still know that’s the first. The 23rd. That was our second first date.”

Gibbs nods, understanding. He sees Tim’s fairly awake and with it right now, so he says, “Abby said you wanted to go to them?”

Tim nods at that, too, licking his lips, looking tense. “I… It feels a lot like a bad dream, right now. And… I know I’m going to need some time alone in my head. And… And… The last thing I really, clearly remember is Breena and Abby telling me about where they are. They’d do that for me. Tell me stories so I could sleep. I want to see it.”

“They want to see you.”

Tim nods at that, too. “If I can’t leave tomorrow or the next day…”

“Okay. You need to give them a call.”

“I know. I am… will. Woke up this morning and wanted them. First thing I’ve wanted in a while.” And saying that, he wants them so bad his eyes are starting to tear. He could just stay here, curl up in his own bed, and by breakfast they’d all be there, piled around him.

That’s sounding really good.

Gibbs nods at that, too. “Hard to want when you’re not getting what you need.”

“Yeah.” Need. He wants them. He’s fairly sure he needs time to think. That if he’s going to be any sort of… anything, he needs the processing time.

They pull into Tim’s driveway. And there is a bit of a mess in his front yard. Looks like mischief night came early this year. But if all the rioting in this part of the world boiled down to toilet paper in the trees, he’s not worried.

His house feels empty. Obviously, it is empty, so it should feel that way. But he’s been in it by himself before, and it didn’t feel empty.

He wanders in, almost feeling like it should be different. He’s different, the house should be, too. But it’s not. It’s just empty.

He spends a moment just circling around it. (After a detour to the pantry to grab a granola bar to nibble on.) Everything’s where it should be. Just like he left it. He picks up a pacifier from the coffee table, it’s pink with a little unicorn on it. Images of Kelly and Abby in the living room, Abby lying on her side, hand resting on Sean, and Kelly toddling around, sucking on her pacci, flood through him, and with those images comes the fear of not seeing it again, the feeling of being stuck, hopeless on the roof. He has to sit down, he’s crying so hard at that.
Gibbs stands beside him, rubbing his back. “You want me to make the call? They’ll be here before you wake up in the morning.”

Tim shakes his head, not able to talk, or get across the idea that he needs time to find his balance again, at least a little.

He’s still firmly convinced that showers and hot water are the single greatest inventions in the history of mankind.

Mirrors, on the other hand, which he’s normally rather fond of, are not. He’s moving through his room, wishing he hadn’t done quite so good of a job of making sure that every angle of a person in that room would be visible.

Even after a long, hot shower, and lots of scrubbing his skin is still pale gray. (Not from any sort of ingrained dirt, just the pale, sick look of someone who hasn’t been well for a long time.) Dark gray rings his eyes. He’s thinking he could have done a better job of taking his hair off with a weed whacker than with the razor he used. He’s got cuts all over his scalp and his face. (He also can’t believe he kept shaving with a razor that dull. But there’s a lot of things he can’t believe about his time out of the world.) He can see his ribs, and hipbones, and, shit, he’s got thumb-sized dimples where his sacrum and hips meet, but… okay, not his spine. He’s not that thin.

He’s thin. He’s not emaciated.

He’s thinking, hoping, that an extra day or two of getting to Abby and Jimmy and Breena might help him look somewhat better. Maybe get some color back into his skin. He knows they’ve seen him beat to hell and gone, but if they don’t have to see this, maybe they shouldn’t.

His clothing is all too big. He digs around for some of the stuff he had when he was really thin, but the Magic Clothing Fairies, (Breena and Abby will both go through their clothing and get rid of anything that doesn’t fit/hasn’t been worn in a while, and send it off to Goodwill) apparently decided he didn’t need his skinny jeans anymore. That annoys him, and like all other emotional things right now, that’s on him in a hot flash, but the rational part of his mind points out that he hasn’t worn them in more than five years, and he wasn’t exactly planning on going on a crash starvation diet, so maybe he didn’t need to be keeping them.

He puts on his regular clothing, pulls his belt tight, and then realizes that he doesn’t have a loop that’s small enough to keep his jeans on his hips, and changes into his PJ pants. They’ve got a drawstring, so he can pull them tight enough.

He’s thinking that right now would be an excellent time to crash into his bed and get another nap when Jethro comes up, and begins herding him back to the car, saying something about a doctor’s appointment.

Tim let’s himself be herded, to a point. He knows he’s not coming back here. He grabs one of Abby’s perfume bottles, and that pacifier of Kelly’s, tucking them into his pocket, keeping them close.

By that point, Tim’s fairly out of it. He sleeps in the car, and like Jethro’s first day on the outside, dozes through the waiting room.
“One fifty-eight. What were you before?” the nurse asks him as she’s going through his intake.

Tim sighs. He’d gotten to 178 before the Stennis and that was, he considered, a very nice mix of muscle and body fat. (A much smaller, tighter, and in his mind, better looking 178, than the 175 he was at when they got married.) A week in the hospital on a mostly liquid diet dropped his weight to 168, and no sort of real exercise meant he lost muscle. He’d gotten back to 174, with not nearly as much muscle as he had been before. (His left arm is… he looks, was visibly larger than the right due to him not having gotten completely over the atrophy from not moving. Moot point now. Both arms are very slim.)

“One seventy-four.”

The nurse nods at that. “We’ll do a blood draw, see what you’re low in.”

“Thanks.”

“Might have to stick around for IVs. Most of the people we’ve been getting out of DC have needed to stay with us for a few days. Get their nutrients and electrolytes up.”

Tim looks at Gibbs, who shrugs. Their people may have been to visit this doctor, but he hasn’t been taking them in. Besides Tony and Penny, neither of whom needed IV treatments, he hasn’t been bringing people to the docs.

“Are you seeing a lot?” Tim asks.

“Not as many as I’d like to be. Can’t believe those…” she edits herself, “are leaving people trapped in there. They say they’re moving food and medicine in, but the people who are coming out don’t seem to be getting it. I’ve heard stories of getting out through the sewers and the Metro.”

Tim and Gibbs glance at each other, most of the Metro lines leave the city, though Tim didn’t think they were running. Then he remembers that some of them are underground.

“Don’t they have guards on the Metro lines?” Tim asks.

The nurse, who’s nametag says Drea (Tim isn’t sure if that’s a first or last name) snorts at that. “I don’t think the guards like those orders any more than anyone else does. As long as no one can see, which is true underground, they’re turning a blind eye.”

“Great.” Though Tim looks at Gibbs, and he can see Gibbs is tucking that information away.

She takes his blood, and checks his blood pressure (low), asks about his other issues, and is about to head off when he says, “I want to drive.”

The nurse laughs. “Let’s see how you’re doing.”

Tim starts to feel a desperate. “My family’s in Canada, and I have to get to them.”

“And you will. Might be a few days. Right now, resting and eating, that’s what you need to be doing.” She leaves, and Tim looks at Gibbs.

“Unless they need to put me on an IV, I’m on the road tomorrow morning.”

Gibbs just looks at him.
“Don’t give me that. You were sailing blind the next day, right? And I can see you’re not coughing now, so you were on what, a ton of antibiotics?”

Technically, Gibbs still is on a ton of antibiotics. “Didn’t lose that kind of weight.”

“No, you were just blue around the gills because you couldn’t breathe.”

“I’m not gonna stop you, but I want you thinking long and hard about who’s waiting for you up in Canada, and realize the only reason they aren’t racing down here right now is because they think you’ve got enough sense to make good decisions. You haven’t been doing a great job of making it easy for them to trust that. Don’t prove them wrong.”

“I won’t.”

About twenty minutes later, a doctor does come in, and he handles diagnosing. Apparently, in addition to being a hair above “underweight” for his height, Tim’s got a raging case of athlete’s foot, and three of the cuts on his scalp are badly infected.

Other than that, he’s in, surprisingly, good health. “Who did you say oversaw what you were eating at the Navy Yard?” he asks.

“His name is Ducky Mallard.”

The Doc looks at Tim, making sure he’s not kidding about that. But right now, Tim’s fading fast. He’s too tired to be kidding about anything. “Well. Whoever he is, he knows his stuff. Given what you’ve been through, you’re in great shape. You don’t need a vitamin booster. You need rest, you need food, all the fruits, veggies, and lean protein, and good fats you can get.”

“Whole grains and complex carbs and all the rest of that. My husband’s a doctor and a diabetic, I know the drill.” The Doc looks slightly surprised at that, too, in that Tim’s already mentioned having a wife, but he doesn’t say anything about it, and Tim’s too tired to realize he said it. “I just want to get back to them.”

“Well… You’re not going anywhere tonight. Turn in early, sleep long and deep, keep eating, lots of little meals, and if you want to, and if you’re the kind of person who can get in a car, drive for an hour or two, and then stop, get a snack and a nap, you can leave tomorrow. I don’t want you driving for more than an hour without a break. One hour on the road, one hour resting. Long term hunger clouds thinking. You’re on the rebound now, but you’re still not going to be as sharp as usual.”

“I know. I can feel it. Rest, food, home.”

“Yep.”

“Home?” Jethro asks after they get a small dinner.

“Jimmy’s. Car’s there,” Tim says, voice quiet. Doctor’s, pharmacy, dinner, he’s pooped. All he wants to do is crash into a real bed and sleep until he can’t sleep anymore.
Jethro drops him off. “Don’t be stupid tomorrow. Rest if you need it.”

Tim nods, tired. “Good sailing, tonight.”

Gibbs nods back at that. He’s going to have to drive fast to get back in time, but he will. Like he said to Tony, everyone eats tonight. And, if the rain holds, and they can get a run in tomorrow, he can get some medical supplies in, too. And maybe, if he’s lucky, he can get Ducky out.

Tim doesn’t linger or wander in Jimmy’s house. He knows exactly where he’s going. Bed. Once up there, he sees the sheets still pulled back, there’s lube on the nightstand, and while most of his time out of the world is fuzzy, he does remember, clearly, how annoyed Jimmy was when he called to get them to run, and now he knows why.

He snorts a quick laugh at that, while stripping out of everything but his socks. He knows he’s supposed to let his feet air out, but he doesn’t want to get whatever nasties are living on them on Breena’s bed. He can wear flip flops when he drives up.

He collapses onto the bed, stretching out, feeling how soft and comfortable it is. His eyes are drooping, and he’s pulling the sheets and blankets all around him. Then he grabs his phone. He sets it on Skype, one way video call, he wants to see them, so badly.

It rings twice, and then he’s got the image of Abby in front of him, and for a moment he’s so overwhelmed by it, he can’t talk.

“Tim!”

He manages to make a little noise, and then gets his voice back. “Hey, baby.”

“Oh, God,” her voice is weak, too. He can see the tears in her eyes, and the concern, and smile on her face. “Where are you?”

“Bed.” His voice cracks on it, and he sees Jimmy and Breena rushing into the frame, too. “Hi.”

“Tim!” Breena’s voice, and Jimmy smiles.

“You have picture on your end?” Jimmy asks.

“Probably. Just… Don’t feel like turning on the lights.” That’s true, but also not exactly a useful comment. It’s 5:04, the sun’s still out. It’s dim in Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom from the rain, but it’s not dark.

He sees them look at each other and visibly decide not to press it.

“Are you okay?” Breena asks.

“I’ve been better. Got checked out. I’m in ‘amazingly good health’ for what I’ve been through. As long as I keep eating and sleeping a lot, I’m cleared to drive. Tomorrow, I’m coming home.”

“Honey, you’re home. We’re the ones who need to get back to you,” Breena says.

Tim shakes his head. “Home’s where you guys are, and I need to get to you. It’s… um… probably gonna take a while. I can’t just head straight up. But, I’m coming. Can you show me the girls?”

“Oh, yeah!” Jimmy says fast, and the image jostles around. Kelly and Anna are lying on the floor. Molly’s on a small sofa. All three of them are staring at the TV. “It’s Little Bear time,” Jimmy says, as if that explains everything, and for Tim, it does. Little Bear is one of the few TV shows they’re allowed to watch. It’s a nice, quiet bridge between afternoon nap and dinnertime.

“Kelly…” he says it, and she looks around, disturbed to hear her name but not know who’s speaking.

“It’s Daddy, on the phone,” Jimmy says, holding the phone toward her. “You wanna say ‘Hi.’”

Kelly doesn’t look like she buys it, so Tim says, “Hey, Kelly.”

Her eyes go wide, she knows that voice. “Daddy!”

“Hi. I’m coming to you.”

That doesn’t mean much to her.

“I’ll see you soon.”

“Daddy!” At not quite a year and a half old, she’s not exactly a conversationalist, yet.

He makes a kissing sound into the phone, and that she knows what to do with, she kisses back.

“Okay,” he says, voice breaking again. He wipes the tears off his face. “I’ve got to…” he sees the image swirl around the room again, and then he’s facing Jimmy, who’s walking back to Abby and Breena. “I’m tired.”

“Okay.” Breena says.

“You rest,” Abby adds.

“I will. I’ll let you know when I’m on the road.”

“Okay.” Jimmy says it, this time.

“Can you guys… just leave the phone on? I’m not gonna talk, and I’ll be asleep soon, but…”

“No problem,” Abby says it fast, she doesn’t want to hang up, either. Even if he’s not talking, just knowing he’s still there, still attached to them through the ethers. It’s not enough, but it helps.

And, before the sun sets on day twenty-one, Tim falls asleep to the sounds of his loves getting ready for dinner, a thousand miles away from him.

So, the whole point of this is time alone, in his head, processing.

Yeah. Okay. Sure.

Not much processing is happening. He gets dressed, pulling on Jimmy’s clothing, which doesn’t require quite so much pulling tight to get himself into. It’s a little short, but he prefers short to in danger of mooning everyone if he stands up too fast. (Not that, these days, he’s standing up, or doing anything else, fast.)

He takes his pills, washes himself head to toes, applies ointments to his cuts and feet, and is ready to go off in search of food, and home.

He’s in Abby’s car, putting his keys into the ignition, when the idea that maybe he should pack some things pops into his head. (Besides food. He packed food. He’s got bottled water, and all the snacks that Breena had in the house sitting next to him in the passenger seat. The idea of being more than a few feet away from some sort of snack makes him very nervous.)

Back in, he grabs clothing, soap, pillows. After this long with no one sleeping on them, they don’t smell like his loves, but he’s still got the feel of those pillows under his body and the feel of his family around him pretty firmly attached to each other.

He remembers the bottle of perfume, and he puts a little of it on him. Not much. He just wants the feel of it, the memories. Kelly’s pacifier he ties to the rearview mirror. He’s going home.

The first time someone asks Tim if he can pay for his meal before putting the order in, he thinks it has something to do with the financial system being upside down. So, he just quietly asks, “You want cash or a credit card?”

“Either’s fine, just making sure,” the waitress says, eyeing him.

“I’ve got both.”

“Okay.” And then the waitress takes his order, and leaves him in peace to drink his coffee and eat a muffin.

For as hungry as he is, he can’t eat all that much in one sitting. He does have to stop every hour and refuel himself. But they’re little stops. A cup of soup at one stop. An apple at another. Coffee (decaf, with lots of milk and sugar) at every stop.

He hasn’t tried eating any meat since the bacon, and as of yet, he doesn’t want any, but as he’s pulling into yet another diner, he’s thinking that won’t last all that much longer. He’s starting to think a bit of grilled chicken would be good.

But not yet.

The second time he gets asked if he can pay, two hours later, it’s actually lunch time, there are people sitting on his left and right at the counter at the diner he’s sitting in. So, he notices that no one else gets asked if they can pay. That strikes him as odd, but not particularly weird. Everyone around him might be regulars. (By that point, six hours into his trip, he’d gotten into Delaware and is in a small café. The sort of place that likely did have regulars.)

The third time it happens, he’s really starting to wonder what’s going on. Okay, yes, he is wearing Jimmy’s clothing, so it is a bit short on him and it’s a little bit too big, too, but it’s good clothing. His wedding ring (still on his thumb) is expensive. His flip flops are cheap, but he’d intentionally bought ten of them, so he could wear each one for one day, and then toss them at the end of the day. (Plenty of air, clean flip flops, the anti-fungal ointment, he should have his feet feeling better soon.)
He should look like he’s got some money. And if he doesn’t look rich, he should at least look like he can pay for a cup of coffee and a bowl of clam chowder.

But he keeps getting the side eye, and wait staff keep trying to get him out fast.

He’s wondering if he still smells like the Navy Yard, but he can’t imagine he can. Nothing, besides his ring and cuff were there with him. (Though he does take a discreet sniff at his cuff after he leaves, but it just smells like leather to him.) And he’s washed himself as thoroughly as a person can be washed. Plus, he’s wearing perfume.

It’s when he’s grabbing a nap in a mall parking lot in New Jersey that he finds out what the problem is.

There’s a cop, knocking on his window with his baton. Tim blinks a few times, sits up, turns the car on, and rolls down his window.

“Problem?” Last he heard it was legal to sleep in your own car in a public space.

“You got a license and registration?” The Cop is giving him the kind of look he used to give suspects who were trying to BS him in interrogation.

“Yeah. It’s my car.”

The Cop just looks him over. Then he looks the car over. “Can I search your car?”

“No! Not without a warrant.”

The Cop laughs at that. “Yeah, well, they’re still sorting out how that works. Let’s put it this way. You are going to get out of the car. You are going to take off your jacket and let me see your arms. Depending on what I find, I’m searching your car.”

“What the fuck are you talking about?” Tim sees the hand on the baton tighten, and the other hand move closer to his gun, and he decides right now is an excellent time to walk small. “I’m sorry. I’m opening my door, stepping out, and then taking off my jacket. I’ve got long sleeves, so I’ll have to roll them up. Okay?”

The Cop stands back and nods, and Tim does exactly that. He’s cold in the October air, shivering, rolling up his sleeves, and the cop checks his arms, eyeing Tim up and down, poking his wrist cuff down and scoffing at the tattoo, but he doesn’t see what he’s looking for.

“Let me see your ID.”

“Fine. May I put my coat on?” He’s way too thin to be out in this kind of cool without a jacket.

The Cop nods, satisfied with Tim being ‘properly respectful,’ and then just about shits himself when he reads the ID.

“I know you!”

Tim shrugs.

“You’re the guy… You were on TV. The whole… thing. You’re one of the guys who broke it open. God, man, you look like shit.”

“Thanks.” Tim says dryly. “You try living on vitamins and two protein bars a day for almost two weeks and see how you look.”
“Oh, God… sorry. Just… Oh man, you were in DC, weren’t you? They didn’t get you guys out? Shit. I thought…” He gives Tim a look, and it takes Tim a minute to understand.

“You thought I was a junkie sleeping off a high.”

“Something like that.”

“That explains a lot,” Tim says quietly.

The Cop looks at him curiously, and Tim shakes his head.

“You got a place to go? I mean, for you, our precinct, we’ve got money. We can put you up somewhere if you need a place.” Having identified Tim, Mr. Cop, who Tim notices is named Trevins, is now obsequiously polite.

“I’ve got a place to go. Just needed a little rest. Bit tired these days.”

“Oh, God, yeah. How’d you get out? Last I heard the blockade’s holding strong.”

Tim sighs; he just wants to go back to sleep. “Got some good friends who have skills.”

“Lucky you. There’s something going on down there. We’re getting reports that there’s a few battleships heading toward DC. Something about the Marines in the Virginia and Maryland National Guard mutinied.”

Tim has an idea of what might be happening, and he’s glad to see that Jarvis is finally doing something about this.

Tim just stares at the cop, and then asks, “May I go?”

“Okay. Yeah, sorry. Didn’t mean to hold you. Just… Look, you need to sleep, find somewhere inside. Until you… look healthier… you’re gonna get hassled.”

“Wonderful,” Tim says, getting into his car.

That conversation meant that Tim couldn’t keep drifting in the quiet headspace that was pulling him home.

Time to actually deal with some of the stuff in his head.

Time to deal with what they did.

That comment about warrants was chilling. But that’s Federal law, one each state has… had to follow. Who knows what they have to do now?

He doesn’t remember when he stopped watching the news. Probably the day Fornell showed up. He remembers the thing about Texas, and he thinks there was some muttering about someone up in New York, but he’d been too checked out to follow it.

He’d also been just blindly driving north, following whatever directions Google gave him. He’s looking at his map more carefully, and noticing that instead of heading straight north, through Pennsylvania to New York, into Canada, Google is taking him through New Jersey, to New York City, to Connecticut, and then up through Vermont.
He can’t image that’s the fastest way to Riviere Du Loup. And, after another minute of googling, he sees it’s not. He also sees, that right now, Upstate New York just declared itself an independent state from New York City, and that things are tense along the Upstate New York borders, so Google’s sending him around that mess.

Tim decides, that if he’s going to take the time to see what the fallout of what they did was, that he might as well be doing it in a nice warm restaurant or hotel room, preferably with something to eat. He turns on his radio (he’s been listening to a mix of Abby’s, Breena’s, and Jimmy’s music as he’s been driving) and catches a “Breaking News” story.

On day twenty-two, as he’s driving north, Tim hears Congressman King unleash his new government plan. Six weeks of campaigning. No political parties. No party fundraising. No primaries. No incumbents can run in these new elections, when the new government reconvenes it will be made up of all new people. All paper ballots, counted by hand, by citizens picked at random. One congressman per fifty thousand people, congressmen to be assigned not by geography, but popular vote. That puzzles Tim until it’s explained further. If a state has a million people in it, the twenty people on the ballot with the most votes become their Congressmen, and they are to represent the whole state, not just their neighborhood. Two senators per state to be appointed by the states, the way they used to be.

Presidential elections go the same way. Six weeks. No parties. No primaries. Everyone throws their hats into the ring at once, anyone gets a majority, and they win. If no one has a majority, then they can match up with another candidate to make a “President/Vice President team,” if that team gets over the majority, then they win. If no two candidates are willing to work together to make up a majority vote, or if none of them have a high enough percentage of the vote, the bottom fifty percent of the ticket gets lopped off, and they run again until someone wins a majority.

No reelections. One term and done for everyone.

The first of the new elections are set for December 12th.

Best Tim can remember, that’s been entirely lifted from Jake’s blog. He sort of remembers something Jake was saying to Ellie, about how as soon as they get ready for elections, he’ll be running. But Tim isn’t sure how much of that actually happened, or if he’s creating a memory based on him and Jake talking about the “October Surprise” they were planning.

“So much for that,” Tim mutters.

He supposes he can get to a poll by the 12th to vote for Jake. But right now, he’s not sure if he’s coming back. Maybe they’ll just stay in Canada. He makes enough writing for them to live on until they can get other jobs. Canada has to need funeral homes. Breena could open one, and Jimmy knows what to do to help out. He can’t imagine there isn’t something he could do to be useful at one. They can find a quiet little place somewhere off the beaten path, and be there, all four of them, together, all the time.

That little fantasy keeps him going until he finds a hotel that looks like it’ll have room service. Before the desk clerk can give him the side eye, Tim says, “I just got out of Washington DC.”

Suddenly side-eyes vanished, and he’s got his room comped.
His plans of thinking, and seeing what’s happening in the outside world all vanish with the pull of laying full out and sleeping.

On day twenty-two Tim makes it 215 miles.

On day twenty-three, he manages to drive another six hours. He’s getting closer. Almost to the border. He wants to go further, but he knows he’s too tired. So, Windsor VT. It looks like a nice little town.

It looks like nothing’s happened. Everything is rolling along just fine. He hears people talking about if New Hampshire’s going to secede, but they don’t think they will. People joke about how sure, big states like Texas and California can pull that sort of move, but little ones, like them, they need the rest of the country. He hears speculation on if the new government is going to try and make Texas and California come back. Tim hopes that won’t happen. His taste of warlike conditions had been more than enough war for him. (And if the Feds do try to make Texas and California, which as of this morning’s news had seceded, and Alaska, North Dakota, and Maine, who had successfully petitioned to join Canada, come back, he’s sure his family isn’t going back to the US. If Canada won’t take them, they’ll find somewhere else.)

Tim’s got no idea if their chattering about New Hampshire is true or not. He hears them talking about how every big money man who didn’t ever manage to win a primary have all rushed back into the election. He hears them talking about how anyone can even make a decent vote if they’ve only got six weeks to get to know the guys running.

They don’t talk about DC, and he hasn’t turned on the news to see what’s going on down there. He’s half afraid that if he does, he’ll find out something horrifying. Right now, he’s sure that if it’s going to be bad news, he can wait for Jethro or Penny to call and tell him about it.

He doesn’t talk to anyone, just listens as he sits at the counter of yet another diner, munching down a piece of pumpkin pie.

In his hotel room, he eyes the bathtub, thinking a long, hot soak would be great. He’s also tired, and fairly sure that he’ll fall asleep in there if he tries it.

So, he doesn’t. And he doesn’t call home, either. Not tonight.

The world is different. Completely different. And, he’s not going to say it’s all his fault because he’s not accepting responsibility for what other assholes did. But bringing it to light, that’s on him.

The man who wants to watch the world burn. Did Jarvis know? Guess?

He did not sell the votes. He just the guy who uncovered their sale.

He didn’t burn DC. He’s just the guy who stood up and spoke the words that made others want to burn it.

He did not starve DC. He’s the guy who killed other people to protect his own food.

He was not part of the mob. He’s the guy who knocked down the dominoes that set the mob in
He did not kill the people in the EPA, IRS, or FEC building. He is the guy who put those families in there.

He did not save the FBI or DEA. He is the guy who got those families into those buildings, where they could ride out the fires and mobs without burning.

He lies on his bed, curled into a ball, wondering if he held his own life, and the lives of his family too dear. He wonders if they should have gone through proper channels, opened themselves up to the risk of assassination, and taken this down one arrest at a time.

And he wonders if it would have mattered. One arrest at a time, one case at a time, warrants and custody and building a proper case would have likely meant the status quo continued as they got picked off with car accidents and faulty wiring fires and food poisoning or whatever “accidents” would have befallen them. And, if, somehow they managed to break this open, legally, correctly, without having to just dump the news on the world, would everything still have burned?

He thinks it would have.

And, as exhaustion pulls him away from the waking world, he doesn’t know if busting open the status quo was worth one life, let alone all the lives that had been lost over the last six weeks.

The more he eats and sleeps the more he feels like he’s waking up from an excruciatingly long and bad dream. The further he drives, surrounded by fall leaves, and then snow, the more the memories of the Navy Yard feel fuzzy and indistinct.

He knows it really happened. His wedding ring is on his index finger because he doesn’t yet weigh enough for it to go home. He’s wearing a hat, even in the car, because otherwise his head gets too cold, and even driving, his mind starts to wander after a few hours if he doesn’t eat and rest. He’s got no stamina, and his feet still itch.

It happened.

But it’s getting blurry. A different sort of blurry. Before it was indistinct, but any little thing would bring the feel of it back. Now, he’s not falling back into it too easily.

He thinks that’s a mercy.

And when he wakes up on day twenty-four, he’s feeling pulled north. He’s starting to feel like his heart is back within his grasp, and he knows where it is. He just has to get himself there.

On day twenty-four, when he sits down in his car, he flicks on the news and hears a familiar voice. It’s Jarvis, declaring open travel between DC, Maryland, and Virginia, and an end to Martial Law.

He feels like he should probably get online and see what made that happen, but he just wants to drive. Home is calling.
Google is telling him he’s got 409 miles to go, and if he was his normal self, driving like he usually does, he could do that in about seven hours.

Which means, if he drives hard and straight through, he could be there by this afternoon.

Actually, if he drives hard and straight through, he should run himself off the road and end up in a ditch by lunchtime.

Abby, Jimmy, and Breena know where he is. He’s keeping his phone logged in, so they can actually check his location. (He’s doing that both to keep them updated, and also to curb his desire to drive further than he should in one sitting. If he’s on the road for more than two hours at a clip, he’ll get a text from one of them telling him to take a break.)

Still, tonight. He should be there by tonight.

Most of the nightmare is getting fuzzier by the moment, but the image of Breena’s story, of coming home to gold light spilling out over snow, to opening a door and being hit with a rush of warm air and warmer hugs, that’s carved into his mind like words on a granite slab.

He’s ready to be there.

Just has to go.

---

Home by tonight. He sends off as he puts the car into drive, flicking on a mix of Abby, Jimmy, and Breena’s music.

Good. From Jimmy.

We’ll keep dinner warm. From Breena.

I love you. From Abby.

---

Taking an hour break every two hours is frustrating. He knows he needs it. He can feel his attention wandering, but he doesn’t want to need it.

Still, he does it.

And his first breaking point is fairly convenient. He’s at the border, so getting a second small breakfast and, grabbing a short nap in his car (This time, not wanting to get hassled by the local LEOs, he asks the diner owner if he can sack out in her back lot. She says it’s fine.) makes a certain amount of sense.

He’s glad he decided to break before the border, rather than trying for after, because he needs all his patience to deal with getting hassled by the border guards, who, for some strange reason, are not interested in letting someone who looks like a recovering junkie/cancer patient into their country.

They search his car, by eye and with dogs. He gets cross-examined about the antibiotic ointment for his cuts. (He’s been swearing up and down that he’s not strung out, he’s not sick, he’s just gotten out of DC, which does not sway them.) Then they find his gun, which he’d brought because he always has it in his car. That’s several tense minutes while he’s busy proving that he’s law enforcement before they relax about that. And, finally, after figuring out who he is, they relax some more, but he doesn’t get the hero treatment he did in New Jersey.

It takes close to two hours to get through, and he needs another break as soon as he’s in Canada, but they do, finally, let him in.

Traveling a distance of close to three hundred feet results in suddenly everything switching to French. He’s on the Boulevard Notre Dame, heading for a café, passing Rue this and Rue that.

Last time he was in Canada, he was in Toronto, which is very Anglo. Right now he’s rapidly running head first into the fact that his high school French is a million years old, and stored in a part of his brain that’s withered into oblivion.

He’s got the sinking suspicion that as he gets closer and closer to Quebec the less English people are going to speak.

Thank God for Google.

He’s also, as he heads further and further north, in a very rural part of the world. Not that Vermont is any sort of booming metropolis, but he’s driving through little farming villages and forests and more farms, and every third sign is for Sainte this or Sainte that.

It feels odd to run into culture shock less than a hundred miles from his own country.

He stops for another break before he gets to Quebec.

It takes him a long time to figure out why he’s feeling so nervous. Why he keeps checking the skyline and wanting to spring back to his car.

Once he figure it out, he wonders how long it’ll be before he’s comfortable near, let alone, in a city.

And after that, he wonders how long it’ll be before he can go back to DC, if ever, without breaking into a cold sweat.

So close. Another nine miles to go. The sun is down and it’s very lightly snowing as he drives north. He’s gotten through Riviere-du-Loup, which reminded him a lot of Winchester. A very pretty and small town surrounded by trees and farms. (Though, unlike Winchester, which was completely landlocked, the St. Lawrence River is right to the west of Riviere-Du-Loup.)

He’s surprised at how many farms there are. He’ll pass what looks like miles of flat, snow covered land, and then more miles of trees, and more farms. He’s got no idea what anyone would grow this far north, but whatever it is, they grow a lot of it.

The GPS directs him off the interstate. (? He’s not sure what they call them up here.) He turns onto a smaller road, and then another one, and eventually, he’s crunching along on gravel under snow, under trees so old and big they meet above his head.

And, eventually, like Breena said, there’s a small cabin in the woods, with snow on the roof, and falling gently around him, golden light pouring out of the two windows facing him.

He turns off the engine and sits there for a second, watching. He can see into the living room area, but there’s no one in view. The other window has curtains over it, so he can’t see much beyond light. Probably the kitchen area, and he’s definitely getting there about the time little girls eat, so… They’re probably over there.

He steps out of the car and smells cold. It’s biting at his ears and nose and scalp. The air is fresh and sharp with pine and snow and right now, he knows what snow smells like. There’s wood smoke from the cabin, and it’s not chicken, but he can smell some sort of roasted bird.

Then the door bursts open and Abby runs out to him. She’s bigger than when he left, round and plump and her skin is warm and pinkish. Her hair is down, flying behind her as she rushes to him, and then stops, a hair’s breadth away, knowing that if she does her usual enthusiastic tackle-hug, they’ll both end up on the ground.

For a second, they just look at each other. He drinks her in, feels his hands shaking as he starts to reach for her.

She’s breathing hard, so many emotions flowing through her, so many visions of this moment, colliding into it really being here, and none of them matched this. Her hands hover over his shoulders, as her eyes skirt from his four days of peach fuzz hair and the hallow eyes and cheeks, and he nods a little, eyes tearing up, biting his lip, hard, holding on to not crying by his fingernails.

She touches him, fingers closing around his shoulders, and his eyes close, savoring the touch, that it’s real, and he can’t begin to put everything into words. He’s so sorry he didn’t come with them. He hates that he put them through this. He’s so happy to see her again. He’s fragile over what happened. He missed her so much. He aches to hold her again. All of that and a million other thoughts and emotions whirl through him. He opens his eyes, and what comes out is, “They burned your car,” and then he starts to sob.

“Oh, Tim…” Abby pulls him close, rubbing her hand over the fine short hairs on his scalp, rocking him gently as he just collapses into her.

For a moment, they hold each other. Just the two of them. He’s clinging to her like she’s a life preserver. Like she’s life itself, crying loud and hard, every ounce of all the shit of the last three weeks rocking through him like it’s never going to end.

And a moment after that, he feels Jimmy and Breena push in, too. All three of them hold him, keep him grounded in the here and now.

At some point, they get inside the house.

The girls don’t recognize him. It kills him that Kelly’s got no idea who he is until he speaks. Then she looks really confused. Whatever mental image she has of Daddy, this gaunt, teary, bald guy isn’t
But when she hears his voice, she snuggles into him. He wraps his arm around her and presses his lips to the silk fine hairs on the top of her head as she snuggles into his shoulder and neck.

And when he speaks, Molly says, “Uncle Tim?” like she’s not sure about him, but he holds out an arm, and Aunt Abby’s holding onto him, too, so, he’s probably the right guy, so she rushes into the hug, too.

“They’ve been asking when you were going to get here for weeks,” Jimmy says, keeping his hand on the back of Tim’s neck. It’s just a little touch, just making sure he’s really there.

“I should have been here,” Tim blinks hard, trying not to completely lose it in front of the girls, because if he starts wailing, they probably will, too. They’re already a bit nervous with the sky high emotions running around them; he doesn’t want to make it worse.

He doesn’t want to let anyone go. He wants to sit here, hugging everyone (which is physically impossible) forever.

But it is getting onto bedtime for the girls, and he has been awake for hours, so he’s getting tired, too.

The whole house smells delicious. Food for them is coming once the girls are down. Breena’s doing something with it so they can lay a blanket on the floor in front of the fireplace, and all snuggle and eat, but that’s contingent on him letting Kelly go long enough to get her in jammies and lay her down to bed.

Eventually, the lure of the big bathtub and lots of hot water, and another bath (he already got a shower in the morning) pulls him away from sitting in the middle of the living room, clutching onto the girls and Abby.

Abby hands Kelly over to Jimmy. The girls will join them in a bit, but she wants her first sight of Tim, all of him, to herself. He understands that, and appreciates it, too.

She holds his hands as she leads him into the bathroom. He stands there, feeling very emotional about everything right now, hoping he won’t start crying again, but thinking that getting to see her naked will probably do it.

Abby turns on the water, and a little space heater. The cabin is cooler than they keep their place in Virginia, but it’s also probably about as warm as they can get it.

“You tell me if you get too cold.”

He nods and swallows hard. She pulls his clothing off one piece at a time. Not particularly sensually. This right here is just getting the job done.

Once he’s naked in front of her, too thin, and a bit chilly, but the bathroom is warming up fast, her touch shifts from functional to loving. Her hand skim over his skin, trace bones that jut too far from under his skin. She remaps his body, relearning the curves and flats, and he lets her.

When she’s done, she stands back up, and kisses him, long and sweet and desperate, her hands cupping his face. And right now there aren’t any words. None he could think of, and even if he could, they wouldn’t do the job. When the kiss breaks, he’s shaking. Not from desire, at least not sexual desire, but from so much love.

He carefully, with trembling hands, begins to get her out of her clothing. It’s very plain, for her. They didn’t bring proper winter wear, so they’re making due with clothing bought here. She’s in an oversized flannel shirt, and a sweater, and a t-shirt underneath. Below that there’s a skirt, and leggings, and thick woolly socks.

He takes each piece off carefully, reverently, and when she’s naked in front of him, he takes the time to re-learn her, as well, marveling at the feel of her under his fingers. And when he’s done, his hands settle on Sean’s bump. He can feel his boy squirming around a bit, doing whatever it is babies do three months before they’re due.

“He’s so big.”

She nods at him, her hands on his.

He kisses her again, fast, hard, desperate, pulling her close as hard as he can (not very hard). “I’m never leaving again. I don’t care if the fucking world is about to end, I’m ending it with you.”

“You damn well better. If you ever want to hang behind and--”

“I’m not; I won’t. I’m done. No more of… any of that.”

She steps back enough to really look into his eyes. “We protect each other by staying close, got it?”

“I do,” his voice breaks on that.

“Oh, god, Tim…” her voice is breaking, too. Too much worry, too much fear, heart in pieces seeing him so emotionally and physically battered. This time they pull each other close, and hang on for a few minutes, just feeling each other, knowing, mind and body, that the other one is here.

A fairly tentative sounding knock gets Tim to raise his head from Abby’s shoulder.

Jimmy pokes his head in, and it’s clear he doesn’t want to disturb them, and it’s also clear that little girls are getting dangerously close to overtired and if they don’t want to add overtired toddle tantrum to an already over-emotional night, that getting a move on on bedtime is a really good idea.

“Breena says food’ll be ready to go in twenty minutes. You two just want to hide out in here, and I’ll put the girls down, or are we doing tubby time?” Jimmy’s keeping his voice light, but his eyes are tracing over Tim, and his inner doctor is screaming at what he’s seeing.

“Tubby,” Abby says. She wants babies going down easy and sleeping through the night, and the most certain way to make sure that doesn’t happen is to mess up their routine.

“Okay.” Jimmy opens the door all the way, stepping into the bathroom. He’s got Kelly in his arms, and he hands her over to Abby, eyeing Tim, not sure if he should be trying to hold someone who’s twenty-four pounds and squirmy, if he’s standing up.

Tim sees it and shrugs. He’s not sure if he should be holding someone who’s twenty plus pounds and squirmy, too. His rifle had been (about) sixteen pounds (loaded), but most of the time he wasn’t carrying it. Most of the time, it was on a tripod, on the ground, while he was watching.

And it also, absolutely, did not squirm.

And that’s the heaviest thing he’s carried in weeks.
He does get into the bath, which is, like Breena said, huge. It’s a rounded triangle, the sort of shape that two adults could easily sit in, or four if they were lap sitting. The water feels great. He’s very nicely warm. Abby hands Kelly over, and in the tub, she might as well be a large, giggling pillow for all she weighs.

He spends another minute snuggling her, and then gets to work. Baby washing time.

His hands remember. Anna and Molly join them. Abby slides in, she’s got Anna, and between the two of them, they get all three girls washed off.

Anna half-swims, half-toddles over to Tim, and he scoops her up. “Looks like you’ve got a new trick. Is she standing up on her own now?”

Abby nods at him with a smile. She knows they told him about it when it happened, and she knows he was gone, just holding onto the sound of them, not able to process the words. “No walking. Not much crawling, either. But she is standing up.”

“Good for you, little girl.”

Anna stares up at him, and then shrieks, happy, her voice echoing off the tiles in the bathroom.

Tim inclines his head a little, remembering, wryly, that babies have two volumes, quiet and blow your ears off.

Breena and Jimmy take the girls from them. It’s usually easier for the dry people to stay outside of the tub with the towels and catch the small, squirmy, wet ones.

Tim’s knees feel weak when he gets out. He’s tired, too. Sleepy and weary.

But warm, dry, clean clothing is calling him, and putting it on feels excellent. Baby girl kisses as he leans over the bed they’re all sharing, and listening, in person, to Jimmy singing to them as Breena’s getting them tucked into jammies makes him feel good all over.

The food smells excellent, and his stomach rumbles, loudly, at it, causing the other adults to wave him into the living room area. “Go eat,” Breena says to him.

“I can wait. They’ll be down in five minutes.”

“I know you can, but you don’t have to. So, go nibble a carrot or something.”

So he does. Breena had a little picnic set up for them on the floor in front of the fireplace. There’s crisp green salad, and carrots cooked with ginger and cinnamon from the smell of them. (He does find a fork and take a nibble, and then sighs, loud, at how good they are.) A bird of some sort, maybe a duck, it’s definitely not a chicken, has been disassembled and is sitting on a tray in the middle of the picnic blanket, and there’s mugs of cider warming by the fire.

For a heartbeat, he wonders if he died in the Navy Yard. Maybe he didn’t make it through the fight when the mob wanted the FEC guys. Maybe the Catholics are right, and the last two weeks in the Navy Yard were a taste of hell, the trip here purgatory, and now he’s in heaven.

Jimmy comes out a second later, and sits next to him. “You okay? Dumb question. You more not okay than you’ve been?”
Tim closes and opens his eyes slowly, and then takes Jimmy’s hand in his. His fingers are warm, strong, smooth. He can feel both of Jimmy’s wedding rings, metal warmed by the heat of his body. Jimmy wraps his other hand around Tim’s neck, and gives him a quick kiss. “Where’s your head?”

Tim blinks, and shakes his head. “Just… It’s real, right? You’d tell me stories and I’d slip into them, dream them, at first at least. I stopped dreaming eventually, but…” He blinks a few times at that, too, pulling himself out of the feel of not being entirely sure if when he was awake or asleep. The lines between them began to blur toward the end. Jimmy squeezes his hand, hard, pulling him back. “I’d be here, with you, and then wake up… I’m not going to wake up back there?”

Jimmy strokes his face. “It’s real.” He hands Tim a mug of cider. “Drink. Dreams are built out of memories. You can’t remember this because you’ve never had it before.”

“I’ve had cider before.”

“Not like this. Breena came up with it a few days ago. Not a whole lot to do out here, so we’ve been cooking up a storm.”

Tim drinks, and Jimmy’s right, he’s never had this before. It’s mostly cider, with some orange peel and clove and vanilla steeped in it, sweetened with maple syrup, and there’s a kick of alcohol to it, but he doesn’t know what sort.

“What is this?”

“Cider, calvados, mulling spices, maple sugar. Local ingredients here are different.”

Tim nods at that, too. “How much calvados?”

“Yours and Abby’s, about a teaspoon. Just for flavor. Mine and Breena’s has a bit more kick to it.”

“Good. I’m going to crash soon, but I don’t want to literally pass out.”

Jimmy smiles at him, eyes tearing a bit, and then hugs him close. “Don’t scare me like that, ever again.”

Tim kisses his temple. “Not again. If I’m not willing to make you deal with it, I’m not doing it, either.”

“Good.”

A few seconds after that, Abby and Breena join them, and he realizes what they’re doing, making sure he gets at least a little time with each of them, alone.

They eat dinner, and he wishes he could eat more, everything is beyond delicious. (The bird in question is a goose, and it’s luscious.) But unless he wants to get sick, all he can do is nibble a few carrots, munch down some salad, and eat one slice (which he eyes nervously, the grilled chicken went down fine, but this is richer than that, though it does stay down just fine) of the goose.

There’s dessert. Chocolate puddings, but his is going to have to be a midnight snack. Actually, he’s thinking of making up a plate of everything, still small servings, for his midnight snack. Though making up a plate of anything would involve moving, and right now, lying on his back, head in Breena’s lap, he’s way too content and tired to move.
Jimmy and Abby are getting the dishes taken care of while she pets what’s left of his hair.

“You’re going to be asleep soon, right?”

He nods.

“Come on, let’s get you up. Carrying the girls to bed is one thing, none of us want to try to lug you around.”

He snorts at that, and dryly says, “Come on, you’d barely feel it.”

Breena glares at him, hard.

“Sorry, bad joke.” He lurches up to standing. She wraps an arm around him to steady him, and leads them into the bedroom. It’s a plain, functional space, but the bed is big and warm looking, which is all Tim needs.

“Sit down.”

He does, sitting on the edge of the bed, tugging off his shirt. Bed sounds really good right now. Once his head is out of his t-shirt, Breena cups his face and pulls his eyes toward hers.

“If I had wanted the kind of guy who hangs back to fight the impossible fight and die bravely, I could have had him. I didn’t want him, or that life. You don’t ever pull that shit again. If it’s so dangerous we’ve got to hide, you hide with us.”

Tim nods, looking very sleepy. “Behind the lines REMF-life for me, and maybe not even that.”

Breena sits next to him as he’s pulling off his pants, and then both of them get under the blankets. He’s not sure how long she’s staying, she didn’t get undressed, but for right now, she’s a beacon of warmth under cool sheets.

“What do you mean by ‘not even that?’”

“Can we stay here? Not just for a few days but…”

She kisses him, short and sweet, and then gets out of the bed. “That’s a conversation for when you can keep your eyes open.”

“Okay.” He takes a few deep breaths, starting to drift, and hears the sound of footsteps and rustling clothing, then Abby’s exactly where he needs her to be, in his arms, spooned up against him. He kisses the back of her neck, wrapped in her scent and the warmth of her body as they both quietly breathe against each other.

And that’s where day twenty-four ends for Tim, at the home he’s never lived in, wrapped around one love, and, though he’s asleep before they join him, he’ll soon be snuggled with the other two.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, we will be backtracking and following what's going on in DC in the next chapter.
Jarvis is done. He’s standing on a roof, holding a rifle, looking at a fleeing crowd and counting the bodies that either won’t ever get up again, or are too hurt to get up now. One hundred and six.

There’s a wall in his mind that’s been guiding his actions. A wall made of ideals like Rule of Law, and Representative Democracy, and Republic. And one hundred and six bodies shatter that wall like hot glass touched by a drop of ice cold water.

And while it’s true that at any given time his respect for any of these concepts has been… less than perfect, it’s also true that he has spent most of his adult life at least in the business of providing lip service, if not actual service to these ideas.

It is also true that Jarvis knows himself and what he’s capable of. He knows how he got to where he is, and what games he has played and will likely play again.

And he knows that while he’s not a White Knight, and that his past has more than its share of black and gray marks, that he’s never, intentionally let people fucking starve.

And after the roof, after shooting people to protect a fucking thousand calories for himself, he’s done.

It’s the sun is still high on day twenty, but he feels like it should be sinking. This kind of decision belongs in the night. But it’s not night.

The people he talks to say that they’re on it. They sound relieved. They’ve been waiting for someone to grow a set and end the problem, and apparently, Jarvis is the guy to do it.

He scoffs at that. They’ve been waiting for someone to take responsibility for what he’s set in motion. Any competent Captain could have planned it out. It’s not difficult. It just took someone willing to get shot for it, after it’s done, if that’s what’s going to happen. (And Jarvis is more than aware of the fact that it might. It’s entirely possible they’ll hang him for treason when this is done.)

Jarvis knows what he’s doing. He knows that if they need a dictator to get basic food and medicine into DC, then he’ll be the fucking Dictator.

And he doesn’t care anymore if he’ll be able to give it up when the emergency is done.

Or, as he says to Leon when he explains what’s about to happen, “And if we’ve got to fucking call it the fucking Republic of Jarvistan when we’re done, we’ll call it Jarvistan, so long as the goddamned food and supplies get here. Day after tomorrow, the food riots end!”

Leon looks relieved and then he says, “Long live the King.”

Jarvis rubs his eyes and groans, “God.”

“I believe that’s our call, Dr. Allan.”

Allan nods, tired, beyond tired, this is the sort of tired he didn’t think a person could survive. But he’s still putting one foot in front of the other each morning.

Because the people outside the walls have it worse.
Shots aren’t being fired, not anymore, which means it’s time for them to go.

Ducky’s told him this is how they did it in Korea, where he was a medical corpsman, and in Vietnam, where he was a doctor.

Go through the bodies.

The dead… They don’t have room for them. Not in the freezers. Once one of the two of them have declared someone dead, they slip a tag on that person’s ankle. Then one of the soldiers with them looks for ID. If there is ID, it gets put in a bag with a number that goes with the tag, and that person gets carried off to be buried in the far corner of the Navy Yard. Hopefully, one day, these people will be returned to whomever they belong to. The ones that don’t have ID have a lock of hair and fingerprints put into the bag.

Allan hates how many bags they’ve got sitting in the Morgue.

He hates what comes next, worse. According to Ducky, in Korea and in Vietnam, they had, usually, enough morphine to deal gently with the next group. But, they don’t. Maybe Gibbs will bring in some medical supplies soon, but right now, they’re down to surgical sutures, bleach, and alcohol.

Nothing to ease the situation for the next group.

The next group is too hurt to save. And that group gets larger every day, as they run lower and lower on supplies. The men who were left after Fornell’s tanks went through, they could help a lot of them.

Not now.

The man at Allan’s feet no longer has much of his head behind his eyes, but he’s still breathing. Two cuts, fast, sure, precise. It will take him less than ninety seconds to bleed out, and if his open eyes can see, Allan’s face is the image he’ll leave this world with.

Those aren’t so bad, even with a fully functional hospital at his disposal there was nothing Allan could have done for… No ID. He puts the tag around the man’s ankle and collects his hair and prints. The soldiers take him away.

The hard ones… Ducky’s been handling them. Cases where, if he’d had a fucking IV of antibiotics, they’d be able to save them.

The woman, teen really, that Ducky’s with has had her intestines chewed to confetti. In any sort of competent hospital, that’s a bad wound, but it’s not fatal. But for them, with no antibiotics and no way to feed her…

Ducky’s faster with his cuts. He holds her hand and whispers something soothing while seeing her off.

“I feel like the Angel of Death,” Allan says to Ducky as he straightens up, and they look for the next person they might help.

“The only thing we should fear is when the Angel of Death passes us by, for he may decide to visit our loves.” Ducky shakes his head. “I’m sorry. That is beyond grim. As doctors, we inhabit the liminal spaces, Dr. Allan. The line between life and death is where we do our work. As Medical Examiners, we offer our voices to the dead, and comfort to the living. I’ll admit to preferring bringing them in to seeing them out, but right now, this is the last mercy we can do these poor souls.”

“And, as Medical Examiners, mercy to the dead is our job.”
“Thus we offer it to the dying, too.”

Allan nods. Then he gestures. They see one of the last group. The group that gets smaller every day. Someone they can help.

“Take care of him, Dr. Allan.”

“Gladly.” He strides over and tells the man not to get up, not yet. Right now, this looks like a clear, through and through, calf shot. Rubbing alcohol, stitches, and one of the last sterile bandages. It’s not elegant, but it’s better than nothing. He just hopes the wound doesn’t go septic.

When he’s done, he looks up, and sees Ducky holding another hand.

The sun is almost down before they finish. But when they are, everyone who Jarvis had counted has been IDed and placed to rest, or patched up and sent off.

The door to the van Penny borrowed slams shut. It’s just before dawn on day twenty-one and she’s got the last load of refugees, six people. Getting these little boats in the water has been helping, a lot.

Thirty-six people tonight, ten more on Jethro’s end… They keep this up… And it’ll still be too damn long before she sees Ducky again.

He says he’s fine when she talks to him.

She knows he’s not. And she knows he’s not because she knows how much difference just a few days on the outside as made to her, and he’s still trapped in there.

She wants him out. She understands duty and honor. She’s lived it her whole life. She’s spent what’s felt like decades waiting for a man to get done doing his duty to come home.

And she’s tired of it. As she’s driving the ‘refugees,’ she’s thinking that when he gets out of the Navy Yard, they’re going to need to have a long talk.

Maybe it’s time they really retire.

Penny’s tired once she’s dropped off her charges. That’s not exactly new. She’s been tired since the beginning of October, and November is looming now.

She’s bouncing back “okay” from a little more than a week of not nearly enough food and too much work, and because Ducky knew how to minimize the long term problems, and Tony and his crew of scroungers managed to lay hands on lots of vitamins, her doctor thinks that with rest and more food, she and everyone else in there should be, physically, fine.

The doc was glad to see they’d been getting those vitamins. They’re thin, they’re tired, they’re emotionally balanced on a fine edge, they’re in need of lots of food, but they aren’t facing permanent heart, liver, kidney, and brain damage.

The same can’t be said for a lot of other people in DC right now.

Penny is also frustrated. Since she’s been out, she’s been spending every minute she’s been awake and not working on getting people out of the Navy Yard, talking to anyone and everyone who matters in both Virginia and Maryland trying to get the National Guards off the borders.

After a day, they stopped taking her calls. All she can get is bullshit about moving the food through as fast as they can.

And she knows they aren’t because she’s seen trucks full of sealed canned goods, sitting in line, waiting, behind the trucks that are being searched one item at a time. She knows there are MREs, sealed and ready to go, but not moving into the city. She knows that her little group is not the only one working on smuggling people out and food in. She knows there are news people from all over the world, showing footage from inside DC, and the piles of food outside of it. She knows there are people decrying the ‘humanitarian crisis.’ She knows that as of this point in time, there are teams from all over the world checking that food, but checking takes time. The Red Cross and Salvation Army are the only two organizations allowed to bring food in without getting checked, but from the looks of it, they’re also getting hamstrung on how much they can bring in.

If she were to plan a system to keep a population just a hair above starvation, this is how she’d do it. There’s no way this isn’t intentional. But she can’t get why this quagmire is going on from anyone.

And since she can’t, and since, right now, in the mid-morning, after everyone they got out last night has been deposited with friends or family, she can stew on what’s wrong until she can sleep, or she can go to the house and see her grandson.

On the morning of day twenty-one, she’s in the car and heading toward the house as soon as she can.

---

He’s so thin. She knows that a person can lose up to 10% of their body weight without any “serious” consequences, and if she had to guess, Tim’s probably under that, but not by much. He’s curled under a blanket, pretty well covered, but his hand is visible, as well as his neck and head, and she doesn’t like seeing the jut of his wrist bones, or hollows at his temple and cheekbone, let alone the wrist cuff loose or his wedding ring on his thumb.

(Of course, the only reason her wedding ring is still on her ring finger is that edema of the extremities, swelling of the hands and feet, can be a side effect of losing too much weight too fast. Her fingers are just getting back to normal size.)

He doesn’t stir when she comes in. He’s dead to the world asleep, spooning Mona, who’s looking like she’s not going to put up with that all that much longer. (At least, she’s giving Penny a very intense, So, we can go out and play, and I can stop being a pillow, right? look.)

And, as soon as she steps into the living room, the smell hits her. It wasn’t so bad with the people who they were pulling off the boats. Probably because they’re little boats, open to the rain and sky, so everyone on one of them got an hour of rinsing off and airing out, but right now Tim’s in an enclosed space, and he still reeks of the Navy Yard.

She doesn’t think she’ll ever be able to smell that combination of sweat, fear, rot, and mildew without wanting to break into a cold sweat again. She knows, even though she is perfectly safe, in a nice house, with a fridge full of food, that she’s feeling panicky, and it takes active work to make her heart slow down and her breath go back to a normal pace.

She also opens the door and all the windows. Yes, it's chilly, but... she can’t take that smell for too long.
Then she goes to the fridge, grabs herself a yogurt, and sits next to the fireplace, where there’s a good fire going, along with a pot of coffee, and a bare plate.

She sees Jethro’s note, and assumes that the plate had food on it at some point. Food that is, with any luck, located inside of Tim and not Mona, though she’s usually pretty good about not stealing treats.

Sitting on the fireplace, she gets thinking. First and foremost, Ducky, and getting him out. But those thoughts don’t lead to good places, (especially with the smell of the Navy Yard dull but present, she can feel those thoughts are going to spiral into panic.) So, she pushes them aside.

Here, in this house, slowly nibbling a cup of vanilla yogurt that she doesn’t exactly need, but very much wants (She’s noticed this with Tony, too, even when they aren’t ‘hungry’ they’ll keep nibbling or sipping on something, just to prove to themselves that they can), she gets thinking about the bigger case, and the loose threads. The bits that got lost in the huge mess they’re finally starting to pull out of.

That spins around for a bit. Last she saw the Bathenadas were imploding. Things are calming down in South America, but not fully quiet. (Of course, that’s the sort of news someone has to actively search out, local news has been dominating cable and the internet lately.)

Supposedly, if Congressman King actually manages to do what he’s proposing, there will be trials of everyone involved in the sale of votes. Supposedly. After they figure out the new election system. Rumor has it he’ll be announcing that system soon. After they’ve got a new government in place… because the new congress or whatever will hold the trials…

Rumor had it that, having taken all of the various players into custody, that whoever’s running the investigation in New York (and as of yet, no one has been named for that job, probably because they can’t find a Prosecutor who’s good at his job and clean) will be taking the whole system apart.

She lived through the Nuremburg trials, which is probably the template they’re working off of now. But they had an outside force running things while a separate group rebuilt. She’s not sure if both can be, satisfactorily, done at once.

She never heard from Gibbs if he got what he was looking for out of Tom.

Penny hasn’t spoken to Tom, or even thought to call him, since before those account numbers showed up in Abbi’s hand. She was planning on doing it when Gibbs got asking about him, and then everything went crazy. So, she didn’t, and for that matter hadn’t thought of him since then.

And lack of calls is not unusual. They can, and often do, go months without speaking. She’ll often send him an email or something, and he’ll send something back.

Still, given what’s going on, she’s been getting a lot of ‘Are you okay?’ emails, and invitations to stay for as long as she and Ducky need to, from friends all over the world. She’s thinking they should take some of those offers up. Get out of here. If or when DC opens back up again, they can hire someone to clean up their condo and then get rid of it. She doesn’t think she’s going to want to live in DC again.

(She hasn’t been able to get good information, so she’s got no idea if, or when, American University will open again. At the very least, the building her classes were in is still standing, but that’s not true for the whole campus.)

She checks her phone. None of those offers are from Tom. There’s not even a ‘are you okay?’ email. The last email from him is more than a month old.
She dials his number, and instead of the pleasant young Ensign who’s been handling his calls for the last two years, she gets a new message. “We’re sorry, the number you have dialed is out of service.” Of course, he’s Navy, so… Who knows what’s going on with his position?

She calls Lynne, Tom’s wife, next. This time the recording is in Japanese, but she’s fairly sure the message is the same.

Penny licks her lips, and then sends an email to both of them, as well as their three kids.

Tom and Lynne’s emails bounce back to her, no such address.

She gets back three versions of, “Dad wanted to surprise Mom with an anniversary vacation. He took six weeks off, and they’re bumming around in Bali,” from the kids. Along with more versions of, ‘Are you okay? Do you need a place to crash?’

Penny swallows hard. She knows three things are true. One, there’s not shot, at all, that Tom or Lynne are in Bali. Tom, just like his father and older brother, has never voluntarily taken a day off work in his life. Two: they’re on the run. Three: if they are on the run, no one is going to find them unless they want to be found.

She remembers one other thing, the last time she talked with Tom, he called her, and he steered her to talking about the mess at CGIS, and talk she did, she covered the excitement Abbi and Gibbs had gotten into with CGIS, and he asked a lot of questions about them. Most of them, in retrospect, boiling down to: Are they honorable people? Will they do the job, even if the going gets hard and it costs a lot?

She knows one other thing. She told him, yes. That between them Gibbs and Abbi and the rest of their family, would go to the ends of the earth to solve the case and put the bad guys away.

As best she can remember, four days later, Abbi had an anonymous note in her hands.

__

Between the MREs and the food Jethro got in on day twenty, Vance has enough food to get everyone four, small, but real meals on day twenty-one.

He never thought there would be a point in his life where he would define success by the ability to get almost six hundred people a full eighteen hundred calories in one day. (He’s also thinking that all the shit they gave the quartermasters guys about not being real soldiers back when he was in the Navy was extremely unwarranted.)

He gets a call about an hour before the sun sets. “I’m on the water,” Jethro tells him.

“Thank God. More food?”

“Yeah. Lots of it. Tony tells me Lt. Henne boosted a truck of MREs, so more of them are coming toward you, too.”

“Thank God! Today was the first day in forever that everyone got almost enough to eat.”

“I know. I got an idea for you.”

“I’m all ears.”
“Was talking to the nurse who was checking Tim out.”

“He okay?”

“Enough. Better than the other people getting out.”

That gets Leon’s attention. He’s been so focused on keeping his people in one piece, fed, and on the peaceful side of rioting, that he’s paid no attention to the larger world. “Other people are getting out?”

“That’s what the nurse said. The National Guard isn’t happy about the blockade, where they can get away with not enforcing it, they’re not enforcing it, and they’re not watching the Metro stations too closely.”

And Leon knows what to do with that. There’s a Metro station less than a mile from the Navy Yard. (It’s actually called The Navy Yard Station.) It’s not running, but people can still walk. Hell, he’s got SEAL teams and Marines on hand. The system that they can’t jerry rig doesn’t exist. Assuming there’s a train somewhere, he bets they can figure out how to make the damn thing move. And… yeah… He’s thinking now would be a really good time to send a few of them out to do some scouting, see if that’s an even remotely tenable option. Because, if Jarvis can’t make his plan work, they’re going to need a plan B, badly.

“Leon?”

He realizes he hasn’t said anything to Gibbs. “Jarvis has something in the works. If he can’t pull it off, that’s plan B.”

“What’s in the works?”

Vance tells him, and Jethro lets out a low whistle. Finally he says, “Tell me where, and I’m in.”

Leon shakes his head. The last thing this plan needs is a fifty-seven year old Gunny missing half a lung. “Keep doing what you’re doing. We don’t know if it’ll work. And if it doesn’t, we’re going to need you bringing food in and getting people out.”

“You’re sidelining me.”

“Jethro, he’s got hundreds if not thousands of guys who can do what you can do as a Marine. We’re really low on blockade runners.”

Gibbs nods at that, not happy about it, but he’s not wrong. “Three hours. Have ’em ready for me.”

“Will do.”

All through night twenty-one and into the morning of day twenty-two, reports filter through to the Governors of Virginia and Maryland that the newly acquired members of their National Guards, the former Marines and Sailors, and for that matter, a decent number of the ones who had been there for a while, were leaving.

They were just vanishing. Not showing up for duty. No one knows where they are or where they went.

They know something is up. But not what, not yet.
At 02:00, as Gibbs is sailing down the Potomac, back towards his house with a load of ten more refugees, he passes six US Navy gunships. Fairly small ones, they’d have to be, because the river isn’t that deep, but he’s pleased to see them.

He’s got a pretty good sense of what’s going to happen.

The sun is going to rise and the men on the Woodrow Wilson Bridge are going to get a very clear message to get off that bridge and raise it.

And if they don’t…

He hopes they aren’t dumb enough to do that.

According to Leon, Jarvis is bluffing with a busted royal flush. He’s got everything he needs, except the willingness to actually fire. If they stand their ground…

This is going to be over really fast.

---

At 05:00 on day twenty-two, Jarvis gets a call. General Evans and Admiral Keller tell him everything is ready to go.

Getting that call, he makes another call, this one to the Governors of Virginia and Maryland. They are not pleased to take his call, because it is not, by any stretch, the first one, however, unlike Penny, the man who blew the lid off of this scandal, and still has a modicum of control over half of the US Armed forces cannot be politely brushed off.

Even if they don’t give him what he wants when he calls.

“Gentlemen—“

“Clayt, we’ve already told you, we’re moving the food through as—“

“Stuff it, Ralph,” he says to the (brand new) Governor of Virginia. (As of four weeks ago, Ralph was the Lt. Governor of Virginia. His rapid promotion had to do with his predecessor having been the former DNC Chairman. And as of now, the man that Clayt used to refer to as Terry, is sitting in an undisclosed jail cell to keep him from being lynched.) “I’m done talking. This is an ultimatum. You pull the National Guard off the borders, you get them escorting the food and medical supplies in, and you start evacuating the people in DC out, or the US Navy and the US Marine Corp will, for the first time since the 1860s, fire on our own people.

“By dawn my men will have encircled yours to ensure that all aid moves into the city smoothly.”

There’s a moment of silence, and then, “What the fuck, Clayt? How can you even do that?” Larry, Governor of Maryland, asks.

“If you don’t do exactly what I say, you’ll find out, Larry.”

“It’ll take more than ten hours to get everything moving,” Ralph adds.

Jarvis is not playing around. “They are soldiers, Ralph. They are National Guardsmen. They are trained to go into dangerous places, keep the peace, and make sure people get fed. We’ve seen them do it during every major national crisis in the last fifty years, I’m sure they can do it, NOW!”

“Look, we know it’s rough—“

“No, Ralph, you fucking do not know that it’s rough here. No one on the outside knows. And do not give me any shit about how you’ve got to protect you own people, or how you’re protecting my people. My people are so hungry they’ll eat arsenic just to put something in their bellies. No one inside the city cares anymore if a bottle of Gatorade has anti-freeze in it, as long as most of them don’t.

“You pull them off the border. You get them out of the way. You get the food moving. And it happens, now.”

“We’ll talk—“ Larry starts.

“No. You’ll do. Dawn, gentlemen. As of right now, I am giving you formal notice that the District of Colombia has just declared itself and independent state, run by me, and while we may be short on resources right now, my military outnumbers and outguns yours. If your men are not off the border by dawn, if the food is not moving, I will consider your actions a declaration of war against us, and I will respond accordingly. Good night.”

And Jarvis hangs up the phone.

Gibbs is wired. He didn’t get much sleep last night. The few hours he grabbed with Tim was it. From there he ran the full day through. And, then, on top of that, he knows what Jarvis is putting in motion. He feels electric and jittery, having to watch it happen, without being part of it.

He’s back at his house. They all are. Not like Tony, Ziva, or Penny have anywhere else to go, right now.

He can’t turn the TV off. Penny’s sitting next to him, clutching his hand, almost vibrating with tension watching this.

Tony and Ziva are on the other sofa, also glued to the TV.

ZNN’s reporting that, right now, Richmond and Annapolis have been besieged, all of the interstates cut off by Marines, the cities ringed with tanks, with gunships on the James and the Chesapeake, while aircraft carriers wait just off shore in the Atlantic.

Jarvis has been on every major news outlet, looking gaunt and haggard, explaining how, if food doesn’t start coming into the city soon, that he will give the order to fire on the Governor’s mansions of both states, and starve their capitol.

But nothing is moving yet.

Neither Virginia nor Maryland’s Governors have responded, yet.

“You wouldn’t dare, Clayt!” Larry yells.
Jarvis turns the camera on his phone slightly. “You see that?”

Larry’s eyes go wide. He’s looking at the Governor’s mansion, which he is currently sitting in, on the big screen in MTAC.

“That’s my targeting software.” He makes a little gesture and the Governor’s mansion in Richmond pops up. “Yours burned once before, right, Ralph? I know you know your history. 1865 was a bad year for Richmond, let’s not see if we can make 2016 worse. Get that food moving.”

At 08:55, on day twenty-two, the blockade weakens. They open the interstates to the food trucks, National Guardsmen driving them in and trying to distribute them without riots breaking out.

They are, somewhat, successful at that.

Each truck has to go in at a walking pace, surrounded by armed guards. People are too hungry to queue up tidily, and the food in each truck is a crap shoot. One truck was filled with fifty pound bags of flour. Great for longer term issues, not anything you can hand out to starving people.

As soon as the interstates open, the Red Cross gets into it, as well. They do a better job, because this is their job. They’ve already got packs of food and clothing and tents ready to hand out.

The Salvation Army heads in as fast as they can, too.

By lunchtime, the line of trucks, vans, cars has expanded by a multiple of three. Different organizations, everything from Walmart to local churches, are lining up to bring help in.

“You aren’t taking people out, Ralph,” Jarvis says in a clipped voice.

“We can’t take hundreds of thousands of refugees!” Larry adds.

“We’re sending medicine and doctors in,” Ralph adds.

“Are you sending houses in, too? These people are homeless, their neighborhoods have burned.”

“Whose fault is that, Clayt? Not like you gave your cops a heads up,” Larry replies.

Jarvis blinks, slowly. “Larry, I am sitting here with my finger on a button that will literally kill you if I press it; do you really think right now is a good time to call my judgement into question to my face?” Jarvis laughs a little. “Let me make this even easier. I’m crazy and utterly ruthless right now, and I don’t care what I have to do to get this fixed, and if that means murdering you and everyone in the building with you, I’ll do it.”

Larry doesn’t look impressed by that, and Jarvis has played too many games of poker to see that look and let it pass. There’s a point, where the other players will suspect that you don’t have the cards you say you do, and that’s the point where, if you’re going to win on a bluff, you’ve got to raise.

“See, the thing is,” Jarvis says, “I got my family out. Even I don’t know where they are. That means, right now, I’m untouchable. But, Larry, I know where you are. I know you’re 127 feet under the ground in what’s supposed to be a bombproof bunker, and I want to you think about what the man, who has command of the entire Navy and Marines, might have pointed at you right now. And maybe that’s not enough, maybe, because you think your family is safe, maybe because you’ve got cancer and your days are numbered anyway, you think, that like me, you’re untouchable.

“I know where your wife is. I know where her daughters are. I know where her granddaughter is, and I have snipers on all of them. And Ralph, don’t you relax, I know you got your family out of Richmond when the Federal Reserve building burned, but guess what, I know where they are, too. And if you think I’m too good of a man to kill your family because you wouldn’t do what I told you to, you do not understand the situation.

“Here’s the thing. There is no downside on this for me. I can guarantee you, that the guy I deal with after you, the man who replaces your corpse, he will look at your murdered families, and he will give me what I want!

“Now, what’s it going to be?”

At 14:14, the trucks pulling into DC start unloading food, and loading up sick, hurt, starved people and taking them out.

On day twenty-two the Navy begins airlifting food into DC.

On day twenty-two, everyone in the Navy Yard eats.

On the night of day twenty-two, Jethro, Tony, Ziva, and Penny do not go to the Navy Yard. There’s no point. Between the Red Cross, the Marines, and open roads, DC is being evacuated.

According to ZNN, Governors Hogan and Northam have come up with a plan to get everyone out, with refugee camps being rapidly put together all over Virginia and Maryland. To start with, every homeless shelter, church, campground, and hotel with an empty room has been pressed into service. By the end of the week, the only people left in the city will be Marines and Sailors, keeping watch.

And after that… According to ZNN Jarvis will be holding a press conference at noon the next day, explaining what is going to happen with DC, and how the rebuilding process will work.

They’ve gotten calls from Abbi and Ducky. Sometime, hopefully early, tomorrow morning, they’ll be coming home. (Along with Bishop, Jake, and Allan, all three of whom are currently homeless. Gibbs asks about Draga, but apparently he’s going to Diane’s.)

And while they’d be happy to run in and get them back, they know the logistics on that won’t work. Right now every way into the city is clogged with people coming in to help, and every way out is filled with people fleeing.

Even Semper isn’t a good plan. According to Ducky every pier at the Navy Yard has a ship at it now. Nowhere for Jethro to tie up.

So they wait.

And somehow, with a set end time, one more night stretches on and on and on, longer than the nights before them.
There’s an image in Gibbs’ mind. One he’s trying to flip, to see from the other side. Shannon and Kelly waited for him to come home, over and over. They picked him up, dusty, grimy, after too long on the road. They met him in perfect uniform, standing at attention, waiting to be released. They waited at home for him to be dropped off by buddies. They waited at the dock, so they could see him the second his feet touched US soil again.

He’s seen that, over and over, from his side of it. From straining to find them in the crowd, to sitting up, straighter, eager, tall, feeling pulled toward home while the car he was in got nearer.

Now he’s trying to see it from their side as excited butterflies flitter about in his stomach and every single car on his road has his head jerking up to watch the road.

Penny’s on the porch swing, waiting with him. He’s sitting on the front steps of the porch, with a slightly better view of the street. Tony and Ziva are inside, making sure there’s more food than anyone can possibly eat all cooked up and ready to go.

He might not have sniper’s eyes anymore, but he doesn’t have any trouble identifying the truck that eases down his street the second it turns the corner.

It’s his truck. He can’t believe it was even still there, let alone still runs. The paint job is wrecked. It’s covered in graffiti, and it’s got burn damage on the one side, but it’s heading toward him.

Ducky’s driving, slowly. Too slowly. Although right now Jethro would consider anything slower than the speed of light too slow. But, really, he’s driving, too slow, until, that is, Jethro notices that there are people in the cab, and in the bed.

A lot of people.

Abbi’s riding shotgun. Though in this case, the term should be automatic rifle. No one uses a shotgun in that position, not anymore.

It takes him a moment to recognize who’s in the back. Jake, Ellie, and Elaine’s boys, all of them are armed, too.

Looks like things haven’t exactly calmed down in DC, yet. Or maybe they just aren’t taking any chances. Either way, at 100 feet off, he can count five rifles, and he’s sure there are more in there that he can’t see. And either way, he approves. He’ll be damned if one of them gets hurt this late in the game.

An excruciatingly long ten seconds later, he and Penny are right at the driveway, waiting, they pull in.

Penny’s already circling to the driver’s side, and Gibbs is all but vibrating with eagerness as Abbi opens the door and steps out of the cab.

She smiles at him, looking thin, so thin, and cocky. Homebound conquering hero, Marine in all her glory. She should be in fatigues, but she’s still in the same white button down, jeans, and vest she’s been wearing for days. They’re battered, stained, smell like… Gibbs doesn’t want to think about that, but she’s wearing them like they’re armor blessed by Jesus and decorate with gold and jewels.

He pulls her close, holding onto her in a full body hug, and she’s clutching him back just as hard.
They don’t pull back for a long time. Just holding one another, both of them better with actions than words, so that hug, those moments of bodies touching, seeking each other out, cover a lot of ground, but eventually, they do break the hug, and she nods toward Elaine and her family. “Figured you wouldn’t mind putting up a few friends.”

He takes three steps over and hugs Elaine, too, so happy to see her, and all of her family, have made it through, too. He’s feeling so stupidly happy, he hugs her husband and family, too.

And then there’s Bishop, Jake, and Allan, all of whom get hugs and back slaps.

And then, Duck. He waits on that, because like him and Abbi, Ducky’s sucking up the joy of the first moment back in the arms of his love. He’s standing there, holding Penny, who has her head on his shoulder, crying quietly, and Ducky’s crying, too. But they look like happy tears.

They do, eventually, break their hug, and Gibbs sweeps in to hug Ducky, and he supposes there are things he could say, but he doesn’t want to. Words can’t do anything with these feelings, won’t express them right, they’ll just get in the way.

And then, as they’re standing in the driveway, Ziva opens the door, and says, “Enough out there, come in, we have food, clean clothing, and hot showers!”

And that, surrounded by loved ones, is heaven.

---

Food is chicken broth. It’s toast. There are sliced apples, and Ziva made rice pudding. It’s very simple, easy to digest. There’ll be time for a real feast later, but right now is just about getting food into some very delicately balanced tummies.

Now’s just about making sure they keep the food down.

Bishop and Jake, and Elaine and her husband get the first showers. Gibbs only has two of them, and it made sense to get the people who could share washed up first.

There isn’t a whole lot of talking. Even Abbi and Ducky, who seemed to be pulling through on nerves and balls alone, as soon as they got some food and clean clothing on them, fell asleep in minutes.

For Gibbs and Penny, day twenty-three will be spent mostly hovering near a sleeping loved one, petting them, touching, just to prove they can, and in between moments of that, playing host to this crew of people who are now calling his house home.

Toward nightfall, Gibbs has a brainstorm. He rummages around through his things and finds it. “Ziva,” he hands the keys to Tim’s house over. “I know they won’t mind. Take Elaine and her family to Tim’s.”

Ziva nods at that. Gibbs’ place is not made to hold sixteen people for more than a few hours at a time.

“Tony!” He looks up at her. “I have lock picks. I’ll take Bishop, Jake, and Allan to Palmers’. Meet me there?”

He nods at that. Seven people at McGee’s. Five at Palmer’s. Four at Gibbs’. That makes pretty good sense.
By nightfall on day twenty-three, he and Penny share a quiet moment, watching their loves sleep, with the TV turned off, not caring about the outside world and what’s going on out there. Not right now. Everything that matters is inside this house.

Shortly after midnight, on day twenty-three, the Navy Yard is almost empty.

There’s a crew of Marines keeping watch. That’s true in a lot of the city right now. But all (most) of the civilians have been evacuated.

Leon is still here, and so is Jarvis. The job isn’t quiet done, not yet.

Six Navy SEALs bring in two struggling prisoners. Neither of the men in front of Jarvis want to be in this room. They’re visibly sickened by the smell. They’re outraged that SEALs broke into their homes and smuggled them out. They’re sputtering with indignation.

And Jarvis doesn’t care at all. He’s sitting in front of a holding cell, which as of this morning was being camped out in by a family looking for a little privacy, and is now empty.

Jarvis nods and both men are shoved into the cell, and locked in.

Jarvis stares them down. “I didn’t want to do this. I didn’t want to run this city. I didn’t want to spend twenty-one days stuck in this festering building, starving, watching people rot, and having to kill to protect a few mouthfuls of food from people who were hungrier than I was.

“As the current sovereign of the District of Colombia, I am charging both of you with crimes against humanity. As soon as we receive recognition as a state in the United States, or barring that, as a separate country, you will stand trial. Here or at the Hague. I’m not picky. Any person, with even the smallest shred of compassion would have gotten food in and refugees out. Both of you failed in that endeavor.”

Jarvis pushes away from the wall he’s been leaning against. “Goodnight, Gentlemen.”

And the Governors of Virginia and Maryland don’t know what to say to that.

Jarvis makes one last call before he can leave. He has General Evans and Admiral Keller on the phone. They know what he’s going to do tomorrow. They know that if he’s going to do it, he’s going to need the right setting.

They know how to provide it.

And they both know a man on the edge of collapse when they see one.

So, their job, which they have done before, is to take care of everything that has to happen between now and 11:00 tomorrow. That’s when Clayton Jarvis will stand up in front of what’s left of the Capitol building (charred steps and blackened rubble) and give the world the sort of show it hasn’t seen since the end of World War II.

They tell him they’ve got it. All he has to do is get there on time.

Once he’s off the phone, Leon comes closer. “Where can I take you, Clayt?” Leon asks, not realizing he doesn’t have a car to take Jarvis anywhere.

All of it finally hits Jarvis, he blinks hard, sagging, and then says, “I don’t know. My house is gone. My family is gone.” He shakes his head. “Your place. Take me to your place.”

Leon nods. “I can do that.”

A hot shower, a hot meal, a long, almost comatose sleep, all of those things help, but they can’t fix Jarvis. Though, to make as much impact as he can, he shouldn’t be “fixed.”

When he gets back to Leon’s house, James is waiting for him. Like everyone else who had been in DC, he’s thin, but like everyone else in the CGIS building, he got out when they took the prisoners out. Like everyone else in the CGIS building, he had to fight his way out, but he got his prisoners, and his SEALs out.

He’s happy enough to see Jarvis, that, even though they don’t have the sort of relationship that’s emotional or huggy, he does hug Clayton.

“I talked to General Evans. Everything here is ready. I’ve got food for you, new clothing for tomorrow.”

Jarvis shakes his head at that. He’d almost rather die than spend another day in the suit on his skin right now, but tomorrow, with all the cameras on him, he wants it clear to everyone in the world how bad things got.

Leon’s drifting through this. Both of them, suddenly relieved of command, able to relax, are all but asleep on their feet.

James sees it, nods, and gently gets them into the kitchen for the food he brought. From there, both of them crash out, and sleep, hard.

He pretty much needs a blowtorch to get Jarvis out of bed at 10:00 the next morning. That’s as late as he could push it and make sure that Jarvis got to the Capitol in time.

They let Leon sleep.

The last time he did this, he was surrounded by people. Now, it’s just him at the podium and that’s intentional. He doesn’t want anything blocking the view of what’s behind him. Charred, blackened, dirty, graffiti covered, rubble.

Crows and vultures are infesting the city. And he’s sure there are bodies in the wreckage behind him. He can smell them, and the birds wouldn’t be hovering around if there wasn’t anything to eat in there.

The first press conference had been packed.

This one is… and he realizes he’ll never use this phrase again lightly… mobbed.

He waits for General Evans to nod at him, letting him know it’s 12:00. He takes his breath, and then begins.
“Less than a month ago, this was a city, not a graveyard.” He smiles, ruefully. “Things change, fast. When I revealed the nature of the deceit the United States Government was engaged in, I did not expect what followed…”

“That people would be angry. That anger could spill into violence… I knew that was coming.

“That this would result in the Federal Government needing to rework itself. I knew that was coming, too.

“That the states that surround us would attempt to strangle us, and starve my people. That I did not expect. The country reached out to us, offered us food and medicine, and that food and medicine sat at the border, leaking into our city.

“I want you to look at me.” He slowly strips off his tattered and filthy jacket. He slowly unbuttons his shirt, too, and steps from behind the podium. Everyone can see a man who had been slim, in good shape, twenty-one days ago, and is now gaunt. “Thirty-seven pounds in twenty-four days, and I am one of the lucky ones. I got at least a mouthful of food a day. Look at me, and see what was done to the people of the District of Colombia.”

He pulls his shirt back on. “What’s behind me, that we did to ourselves, and we’ll clean it up, by ourselves. But this,” he gestures to himself, “and what is likely to be the deaths of thousands from the complications of starvation, that was imposed on us from the outside.

“I have, right now, in my custody, the Governors of Virginia and Maryland. I am holding them for trial for crimes against humanity.

“As for who will try them… I don’t know that, yet. Right now, the District of Colombia is declaring itself an independent state. We will, in the coming weeks, send representatives to New York to petition for full statehood in the United States. If we are granted full statehood, then I shall transfer custody of the Governors to the Assembly in New York, to stand trial with the rest of the criminals they are holding.

“Should that not be granted, we will seek to become our own country, and I will petition the Hague for the right to try them.

“Either way, the District of Colombia, as the unrepresented home of the United States Federal Government, is over. We are taking over our own future, now. We will, as part of our rebuilding process, develop a Congress and Senate of our own. For the time being, whoever is still alive in the DC City government will hold their positions, and we will begin to work on rebuilding the City into whatever future is coming for it.

“General Evans and Admiral Keller have agreed to provide protection and peacekeeping services for the interim. They have removed their forces from Richmond and Annapolis, but both Virginia and Maryland should keep in mind that we will consider any attempts to regulate the border between us an act of war.

“As of today, the District of Colombia is open to travel, though I would highly suggest that people who do not have to be here should not enter.” He gestures to what’s left of the Capitol building. “None of this is stable. There is no food. The water supply, where it is running, is not safe to drink. The Marines are here to keep human predators at bay. They will not be protecting people from unstable buildings, wreckage, down but live powerlines, and the like.

“If you have a home here, if you have friends here, I highly suggest now is not the time to decide to come in and see how things are doing. If you are in demolition, salvage, clean up, or construction, we need you.

“For now, I am asking everyone in the nation, if you have a spare room, extra food, clothing you aren’t wearing… More than 600,000 people lived here, and almost all of them need a place to stay. Most of the people getting out of the city left starved and with nothing but the clothing on their backs.

“Please, if you can, help.

“And I would like to take a moment to say thank you. As soon as the blockade broke, the District was flooded with help. People all over the world have been trying to help us for weeks. We are not unappreciative of that. We know that the only reason things got as bad here as they did were the criminal decisions by the Governors of Virginia and Maryland, and we intend to hold them liable for it.

“I will not be answering questions today. As we begin rebuilding, we will offer updates, and there will be other opportunities for us to talk, but today isn’t it.”

And with that, Jarvis is done. He nods to everyone, finds James, and returns to Leon’s house. He’ll sleep the next twenty-four hours straight though, and when he wakes up there’ll be a text from his wife on his phone.

See you soon.
Solace

Chapter Notes

Sometimes I have very intense sound memories attached to different chapters. This is one of them. Abby and Jimmy's sections go with Mumford and Son's Ghosts That We Knew, and Breena's goes with Believe.

For a moment, Tim’s not sure where, or when, he is.

He knows he’s not in the Navy Yard. He doesn’t know the smell of where he is right now, but it’s not the smell of the Navy Yard.

He thinks he might be in another hotel, and that he dreamed last night, So much for your ‘you can’t dream it if you’ve never had it before’ theory, and he’s starting to get a little annoyed at himself for arguing with a version of Jimmy who’s just in his head, but then he hears a toilet flush, and he knows where he is.

His eyes peel open, and he’s at the cabin, and for a moment, by himself.

He wonders briefly about that. He’d been rather hoping to wake up with someone. But little girls need to eat and the rest of the world didn’t vanish because he came home. And, at least they’re letting him sleep in.

God, he’s tired. So, tired. Yes, every day, every sleep, he’s feeling better as he wakes up, but better and good aren’t the same thing, and right now they aren’t even on speaking terms.

If they’re going to let him sleep in, he might as well take advantage. His eyes drift shut again, and he stretches out some. The bed is soft and warm, and he’s feeling comfortable, lulled by nubby cotton and thick wool. It won’t take much to send him back to sleep.

He’s almost there when the little, awake part of his brain notices it just heard a door open, and footsteps, and he can smell… something, hot chocolate, something else, bready, but he doesn’t know what, and then there’s a wash of cold as Abby slips into bed next to him.

She settles in next to him, spooning into her usual sleep position, trying not to wake him up.

He kisses the back of her neck, and his mind drifts off.

The next time he wakes up, he is definitely not alone.

And he is extremely pleased by this.

More than just the emotional joy of waking up with Abby snuggled in his arms, is that part of him, which had been showing no signs of life for at least the last two weeks, is waking up and taking notice, too.
Tim’s quite glad to see his dick is up and working, he’s been mildly worried to see that it’s just been lying there as he’d been trying to get home. He didn’t expect anything/didn’t pay any attention to it in the Navy Yard, but by day three of driving, he was starting to get concerned. Jimmy will later tell him that lack of food kills libido and causes depression, which in turn kills whatever bit of your libido the lack of food didn’t get. Namely, a human body will do what it can to avoid making more humans if the food situation is bad enough that your metabolism starts to shut down. But that’s still a ways off, and right now…

A happy, little sigh eases out of him as he scoots closer to Abby, rubbing against her insanely soft, plump, warm skin. An answering, and just as pleased, little “Mmmm…” slips out of her.

She squirms against him in an encouraging way, and he sighs at that, too. “Good morning,” he says.

“Hi,” she says back.

When she’s spooned into his arms, her neck rests over his right arm, and his left arm curls around her, usually ending up with his hand cupped around her right breast. Sean’s putting something of bump in that plan, so right now his hand is on her tummy. He strokes lightly over her belly to breast, and then traces his fingertips down her arm to take her hand in his. Left hand in left hand. Their wedding rings don’t touch with the slight metallic kiss that he has associated with holding her hand, fingers entwined, but… soon enough, they will again.

There’s a pause of just holding each other, of being aware of heartbeat, breath, heat, and the small sounds of two bodies snuggled under thick blankets.

“You know,” she says, stroking her fingers between his, “you owe me.”

He kisses the nape of her neck, teeth ghosting along the edges of the spider web. “I know I do.”

He can hear the smile in her voice. “I didn’t mean like that. A while back, you made me a promise, that we’d wake up, together, on our anniversary, and all wrapped up together, we’d go at it soft and slow and sleepy, the way we used to before you got hurt.”

He smiles at that. That’s the sort of owing he’s happy to pay back. “It’s…” He realizes he doesn’t know what day it is.

“The 30th.”

“Okay… I’m seven days late. So, every day for the next week?” He rubs up against her bum, giving her a few gentle thrusts.

She giggles a little at that. “Breena might get jealous.”

“Then you’ll just have to tell Jimmy to step up his game.”

“I meant about me hogging all the time with you.”

He hadn’t thought that part through… “That’s what naptime’s for?”

That gets a giggle, and a soft squirm that rubs up against him in exactly the right way.

He’d like to say he missed this, but for most of the time he was gone, he was too damn fried to miss anything, so he kisses her neck, and squeezes her tighter to him.

She lifts his hand to her lips, and kisses each finger.
“Any shot of you flipping over?” he asks, “or should I circle around?” She’s a lot bigger than he remembered, and she’s probably starting to get to the point where rolling over isn’t much fun, or easy.

“I can still flip.” And she does, in one swift move. “He’s not quite that big, yet.”

Tim smiles at that, and smiles at her. “Hi.”

“Hello, to you, too.”

He sighs, and his fingers slip over her face, taking in each detail. Morning Abby, with her hair haphazard, and her eyebrows and lashes still light brown, her lips pale, and the freckles on her face visible. He likes her made up, but there’s a delicious intimacy that goes with this, and he’s steeping in it, letting it soak in and fill him back up again.

He’s smiling as he looks, as he feels her against him, and she’s smiling back. After a moment of it, after heartbeats filling with contentment, she says, “There you are.”

“Starting to come back to myself.”

“Yeah.” She kisses him, sweet and gentle, and he lets himself be kissed.

That wakes his body up further, starting the urgent ache of wanting more. Face to face is a bit awkward with Sean between them, but a bit more bending and shifting around manages it. He cups her face in his hand as his lips move over hers and gives voice to this thought, “Coming back to life.”

She flashes him a quick grin and grinds into him. He hisses at the pleasure of that. Then she says, “Life, is that what this is?”

He nods, rubbing against her, well aware that on a biological level, this, literally, is the mechanism of life, and on a metaphoric level, this is the return of intimate contact with everything in the world that matters to him. There’s a little wry look in his eyes as he says, “It’s close enough. My life, it’s here, with you, and…” he nods toward the rest of the family outside these walls.

“I know.” Another kiss, long and deep, her hands stroking over his arm and back, his fingers trailing down hers. He shifts her leg over his, and reaches under her leg, finding her slick and waiting. Tim knows that he’s not going to last. He can’t remember the last time he had a hard-on, and the last time he got off is a vague memory, so this is not the day for endurance sex.

But it is the day for kissing, for lips wet and slick rubbing against each other. It’s a day for tongues that know when and where to lick. It’s a day for gentle sucks, and soft nibbles.

And it’s certainly the day for his fingers to find her clit and start with soft, gentle circles. Her hips begin the soft, rolling thrust that he knows means she’s getting into it, the movement that means he’s doing her just right.

He drinks that in. Her arousal feeding his. Her tummy’s rubbing against his dick, and she’s moaning (quietly) into his kisses, making him feel electric from fingers to toes and everywhere in between.

Her breath hitches and her hips roll faster, his fingers follow her, speeding up, keeping pace, showing her that he still remembers the moves to this dance.

“I love you,” he breathes it to her, kisses it to her lips, and rubs it into her skin as she begins to shudder against him.
He presses into her, wet and slick and soft and snug and welcoming, so welcoming as she’s still twitching on his fingers. This angle, this position, he can only get the top inch or two into play, but it’s enough.

It’s sublime. It’s another day of them together. It’s real, tangible proof that he made it home. It’s her lips on his and his body in hers and all of the love between them distilled into sharp tingling pleasure drawn out by slow, shallow strokes.

“Love you, love you, love you,” she’s chanting it back to him, in time with each thrust.

He’s trying to pace himself, trying to draw it out, to spend as long in this moment of slow slide and building pleasure as he can, but it’s a losing battle.

It’s been too long, and he’s still too emotionally raw to do anything but clutch onto her, pulling her as close as he can, burying himself in her over and over as her heart speeds and his breath catches, muscles pulling tight as hot pleasure washes through him in pulsing flows of physical and emotional love.

He doesn’t have the reserves, physical or mental, to stay awake for long after that, but the few breaths where his brain is still in the waking world are filled with her smile and all-suffusing love.

Breena Palmer is pissed. Once that first rush of “OH THANK GOD YOU’RE HOME! I LOVE YOU SO MUCH! DON’T EVER LEAVE AGAIN! I MISSED YOU SO MUCH!” passed, twenty-one days of agonizing over Tim crashes into her, and she is PISSED.

(Which is why she is not in the bedroom with Abby, giving Tim a proper welcome home. The way they had been planning.)

She loves Tim. She’s exceptionally grateful that he’s home in one piece, and she is pissed at him for putting them through this.

That’s twice in six months that she’s had to sit there, wondering if he was dead or alive, begging God that if he was alive, he come out in one piece, and she’s so angry at him she wants to spit. (And slap him upside the head for being an imbecile and making her that scared, but right now, she’s sure if she tried something like that, she’d really hurt him.)

She told him the truth, if she had wanted the guy who hangs back, covering everyone else’s retreat, takes stupid risks, and dies bravely, she could have had him. That’s the boyfriend before Jimmy. Her dad liked him. He was big, and tough, and very gung-ho about everything, and he (three years after they broke up) did manage to get himself killed in Afghanistan. (And worse, his parents were friends with hers, so they took care of his burial. She helped put him in the ground, which did nothing to convince her that she might have been misguided in her desire to not be with a guy who throws his body into the line of fire.)

She didn’t want that life. She intentionally did not get it for herself. And having to live shadows of it twice in one year is not making her happy at all.

And at the same time, she’s knees weak with relief that he’s okay.

Which makes her more angry because she had to sit there, stewing in full body fear, listening to Tim drift away, begging him to just get out. And he wouldn’t. And Jimmy can say all he likes about depression and how not enough food fucks with your mind, but at the end of the day, Tim could have come home, and HE DIDN’T.

And how he is home, and he’s apologizing all over the place, and he looks like a whipped puppy, a starved whipped puppy, and that just makes her more angry because he fucking did it to himself.

---

If he had to guess, Jimmy would say he’s somewhere between Breena’s wanting to take Tim’s head off for making them go through that three weeks of torture, and Abby’s immediate glom onto him as tightly as possible and never let him go.

Like Breena, he couldn’t be happier that Tim is back. And like Breena every time he looks at Tim he’s torn between wanting to cry at how broken down he is, rage at him for not coming with them, or not getting out when he could have, and wanting to make sure he’s got a hand on him at all times, so he can feel that he’s really, finally, home.

Like Abby, he knows that if Tim could have left, he would have. Something, lack of food, sense of responsibility, depression, something kept him walled in there, and Jimmy doesn’t entirely blame Tim for not getting out. (Even though he was chew through titanium frustrated and angry that they couldn’t get Tim out.)

He’s hoping, eventually Tim’ll “unfurl” enough that they’ll find out why he couldn’t leave. And he’s dreading that “unfurling” will likely involve having to hear how bad it really was, which will bring up complicated feelings of anger at the situation, and anger at Tim for putting himself through it, all with a thick layer of sorrow and grief for everything they’ve lost, and that Tim had to see it firsthand.

Watching it on the news was bad enough. Jimmy doesn’t want to imagine living it, but if he’s going to be useful, and if this really is a marriage, then hearing it, and helping Tim carry it, is part of the job.

And, rubbing the rings on his finger, he knows he’s going to do the job.

---

It’s a lot earlier than Tim expected it to be when he wakes up the third time. He feels like it should be after lunchtime, not barely 10:00.

But it is, so he’s got a good chunk of morning to play with little girls and be part of the rest of the world. Abby’s still napping, so he gently gets himself out of bed, gets dressed, fast, practically diving into his clothing because even inside it’s cold. (Actually, it’s 64, which is cool by Virginia standards, but isn’t exactly freezing. He’s just not in good condition to deal with it, yet.) And he’s busy cursing the inch of wrist that Jimmy’s clothing leaves bare, as he heads into the main part of the cabin.

Breena looks at him, her eyes narrow a little, and she quickly says, “Good, you’re up. You and Jimmy can go to town with the girls. Get us something for dinner.”

Tim knows he’s neck deep in the poo just by her voice, so he quickly nods and says, “Sounds great. Can’t wait to see this place.” A few seconds after that, he’s tucking a snack into his pocket, and helping Jimmy get the girls bundled up.
There’s a mall with an indoor playground, so they’re there. They’ve unbundled the girls, and let them free to toddle around. Anna’s on Jimmy’s lap, and Kelly is, right now, holding onto Tim’s knees, but she looks like she’s going to go after Molly (who’s running around with abandon) any second now.

Seems like a good time to talk. “So, Breena’s pissed.”

Jimmy nods at him.

“Do I wait for her to come to me with this, or do I go to her?”

Jimmy shrugs. “I don’t have a how to apologize for almost-getting-myself-killed-because-I-wasn’t-smart-enough-to-listen-to-the-people-around-me template. When horrific and meaningless death looms, I run the other way.” Jimmy wiggles his fingers while moving his hand away from himself, mimicking a man running away.

“You’re pissed, too.”

Jimmy gives him a no shit look.

Tim nods. He looks at Jimmy. They’re out, and rural, primarily Catholic Canada probably isn’t exactly the most hospitable place for gay rights, so he doesn’t take Jimmy’s hand, but he does say, with as much earnest, heartfelt eye contact as he can manage. “I’m sorry.”

Jimmy nods, and gives Tim’s hand a quick squeeze. “I know. You’re heads’s on straight again, and you can see the mess you got yourself, and all of us, into. I know. But we, all of us, still have a lot of healing up to do, and I have a feeling you’re on a damn short leash when it comes to making risky decisions for yourself for a long time to come.”

Tim sighs. “Given my current track record, that’s probably not a bad idea.”

“Okay. It’s just… Especially for Breena and I, neither of us ever wants to feel that fear again. We got more than six lifetimes of it with Jon, and… I think for her, especially, those days of fear mixed with not being able to do anything…”

Tim nods. Kelly decides now’s the time to launch off his knees, and she takes off with a swaying waddle after Molly.

Tim feel like he should say something, like, ‘You were right, I should have left earlier, I’m sorry…’ but those words won’t form, because he doesn’t feel like he should have left sooner. He’s not, in the dark of his mind, entirely sure he should be out now. But that’s the dark, and dwelling there probably won’t lead anywhere good.

“If she were just run-of-the-mill-mad at you, what would you normally do?”

“She’ll come to you when she’s ready. Try not to step on her toes too bad between now and then.”

Lunch is tense.

There’s a quote in his mind to cover this situation. He thinks Heinlein wrote it, but it’s not exactly an original statement, so a bunch of other guys likely did, too, but, as the quote said, “When you’re getting along, even the tightest quarters are plenty of room, and when you aren’t, there isn’t enough space on Earth.”

Right now, Tim’s living that.

Angry Breena is quiet and sulky. And Angry Breena has impossible standards. He can’t do anything to make her happy right now. Just the way he’s breathing is setting her off.

No one’s talking much. Which, on one level, is good, because he’s sure when the storm breaks he’s going to need some answers, and this is giving him time to think about them.

As soon as lunch is done, he sprints outdoors with Jimmy. He’s relieved enough to be out of there that the cold isn’t bothering him, and the slight flurry of snow is soft and pretty.

They need logs for the fire. There are lots of them, but they aren’t split, yet. Tim knows he’s in no shape to split logs. (Unless he wants to chop his own leg, and add to the excitement by a trip to the emergency room.) But he can pick up logs (one at a time) and carry them over to Jimmy, who splits them and dumps them into the basket that they live in.

Jimmy looks at him between whacks of the hatchet. “You’re fucked.”

“Thanks.”

“I’ve never pissed her off that bad.”

“You’re pretty good at not almost getting yourself killed.”

Jimmy gives him a tense little nod. “Maybe it’s time to take a minute and learn something from me.”

“I’m learning.”

“Good.”

He watches Tim slowly pick a log up, and then put it on the chopping block for him. “You okay with that?”

“Enough.”

Jimmy raises and eyebrow and splits the log.

“Everything makes me tired, fast. The first day on the road I could go an hour, and then I needed to rest an hour. Last day, it was two to one. Fourteen hours of sleep last night, and if I don’t get a nap, I’ll end up turning in right after dinner.”

“And if you do get a nap, you’ll probably do it anyway?”

“Yeah.”

“161?”

“Maybe. By now. 158 at the Doc’s office. Before this, the lowest I’d ever gotten to was 165.”

“You were too thin then.”
“Well, I’m really too thin, now.”

“God…” Jimmy puts the axe down and pulls Tim into a long hug. “I missed you.”

Tim nods and kisses Jimmy’s cheek. “I missed you, sort of. I didn’t want you there. It was a relief that you weren’t. And… I was pretty far gone when it happened, but the only person we lost was diabetic. Ran out of insulin, and we couldn’t keep her fed well enough. I think I spent that night curled into a ball, rocking back and forth, whimpering. I almost asked you guys to join me. I was a hair away from it. They were killing people in cars, and you’d be driving if you left, and safe in the Navy Yard, with me, if you didn’t, but we knew there’d be riots, not… not that bad, and… they worked for the government, owned it, they might have been able to get in… but… I almost said it. I almost said to you, ‘Get the girls and come to the Navy Yard, and that would have killed you.’” His voice is trembling, and so is his body by the time he gets to the end of that story.

Jimmy sighs, holding onto Tim, stroking his stocking capped head and his neck under a scarf. The idea that Tim could have left isn’t in his head. That’s absolutely clear to Jimmy with the way he’s talking. He’s out, been out for days, and the idea that he could leave still isn’t there. “We would have left way before it got that bad, and we would have taken you with us.”

Tim whimpers a bit at that. “There was nowhere else to go, Jimmy.”

Jimmy kisses Tim’s forehead and squeezes him a little tighter. “There’s here, Tim. You’re out. We’re out.”

Tim takes a deep breath, and another one, and one more on top of that. Then he nods and pulls back a little. “I know. I do… It’s… easy to slip back.”

Jimmy nods back at him. “Yeah, I’m seeing that. How about you go in and get a quick snack? Help get your head here, not there.”

Tim looks at the basket, not a lot of wood in there. He inhales, deep. Cold, clean air filling him up. “I’m good. I can stay out here. For a while longer, at least.”

“You start to shiver, you go in. You don’t need to be burning calories on keeping warm.”

Tim nods, and places another log on the chopping block for Jimmy.

Breena does come to him, during naptime. Jimmy and Abby decide now would be a really good time to head into town, gas up the van, and kill some time so Tim and Breena can have some privacy.

They sit quietly for a moment. Actually, he sits. He’s on the sofa. Breena’s standing by the window, looking out, as Jimmy and Abby bundle up, and for one more minute as they hear the van crunching through the snow, and then Breena turns to him.

She’s not glaring at him, but her look is very intense, extremely focused, and suggesting that right now would be an excellent time to listen and not talk.

“You said ‘til your last breath.”’ She takes the two steps to be standing in front of him, looking down at him.

Tim nods; he did.
“That implies that you will not do something stupid to hasten that breath. It implies that you value those breaths, and that you’re interested in having a whole lot of them.”

He nods, warily, at that, too.

“And I thought, silly me, that you actually did value your life. That you held it as precious as those of us who love you hold it. I thought, because your life is sacred to me, that it would be sacred to you, too!”

He’s thinking now would be an excellent time not to mention the move to Cybercrime, and getting out of the field, and how he’s gone from risking getting shot every day of his life, to only every now and again.

“You got on the Stennis. Abby and Gibbs, both of whom have the best guts you have ever seen, told you not to. You promised not to go anywhere alone, and then you let James just walk on off. You let them put you in a cage, and then you let the guy watching your back leave. And I didn’t think much about that until now, because that’s the sort of thing that can happen, sort of. You’re a normal sort of person, so you think that the people around you are playing straight. Fine. That can happen.

“But this time. We all know no one is playing straight. Straight flew out the fucking window. So, you have good instincts, you get us out, but you don’t go with us? Why?”

She pauses long enough that he’s cued into the fact it’s his turn to talk. He realizes he didn’t talk to her. He talked to Abby and he talked to Jimmy, but he didn’t say anything to her. He called, and then they were gone.

“I wasn’t sure if I got in clean. I needed to erase everything, make sure they couldn’t track us. I did some other things, too, pulling attention away from you, making sure you’d have time to run. If they were going to go after anyone, it was going to be me, in a building filled with armed guards. That’s part of why I didn’t want you guys coming to the Navy Yard.” As he’s thinking more about it, that’s a big part of what tipped him from come to me to get out of town. The people they were going up against were well-financed, well-connected, and knew the government inside and out. It probably would have been easier to buy a guard than it would be to find one car driving to God alone knew where.

“Uh huh.” Breena’s not satisfied with that answer. “What did you do that on, Tim?”

He’s not sure what she’s asking. “Like… a computer?”

She nods. “Like a laptop? That could have been sitting in your lap, while you worked on it, while all seven of us, hell all of our family, got out of town? While you made it send little signals out so whoever might have been tracking it thought you were in the Navy Yard.”

Tim’s mouth falls open, and he blinks hard. He could have done that in a heartbeat. Take two cars, him and Jimmy in one, the girls in another, they’d go straight through to Canada. He and Jimmy would take a circuitous route. He’d do the hacking in pieces, upload them in packets, piggy back off the local wifi, bounce it all over hell and gone, land that at NCIS, bounce it around between NCIS and the computer he was attacking, too. By the time anyone could have gotten through one packet, they’d be well away, and by the time they got through all of them, his computer could have been sitting at the bottom of a dumpster somewhere, and he and Jimmy could have been heading toward the girls.

“Shit,” falls off his tongue when he’s done working that through.
“You panicked! And when you panic, Jimmy and Abby do, too! He’s telling me to pack, and I don’t find out for days that we’re running without you because you didn’t think the damn problem all the way through! This was a cascade of bad decisions. And then you got stuck in there! No bars. No one pointing a gun at you saying you couldn’t leave. You got stuck in your own head! Everyone you loved tried to get you to leave, but you wouldn’t go! That’s terrifying, Tim!” Her voice cracks on that, and he wants to get up and comfort her, but her eyes and the emotions coming off of her discourage that, so he keeps sitting there, quietly. “What’s going to happen next? Who are you going to Don Quixote on next time?”

She doesn’t let him answer before starting up again. “You panic, and then you started ordering everyone around, and we panic, and it’s all a mess because no one sat down and thought. And we’re not doing that again! Next time something spooky comes up, we talk! You don’t give orders, again. Not like that. You explain what’s going on, and you listen to what other people have to say to you. We might still go with your plan, but not until everyone’s had a say, and everyone knows what the fucking plan is.”

Tim nods.

She looks like she’d prefer he’d fight with her, defend what he did, but he’s not touching that. Her laptop comment took a lot of the wind out of his get-the-hell-out-of-town-without-me plan.

For another minute, she paces around, jittery, periodically glaring at him. “You scared me, so bad.”

“I know.”

Her voice is hard as she says, “You’re supposed to say you’re sorry.”

“How about I say I’m not leaving you guys again? Camp out with the kids and Gibbs, and that’s it. Tents in the woods while you’re in the house. That’s as far away as I ever want to get.”

She thinks about that, and then says, “If you actually live up to it, that’ll do. But how many times have you told Abby that that’s the last time you’re almost getting killed?”

He tilts his head to the side; she’s got him dead to rights there. “Too many.”

“Yeah.”

“All I can do is live it.”

“You better.”

He holds out his hand to her, and she gives him hers. He married her with Abby, so they don’t have a set of vows all their own. He kisses her palm, and then says to her, “I will protect my life with the same devotion, same love, with which I hold yours, Jimmy’s, Abby’s, and our children’s.”

That starts to crack her anger, and he can feel some of tension slip off.

He stares up at her and pats the seat next to him, offering her a snuggle. She’s burned enough of the angry off to allow it, and sits next to him. His arm wraps around her shoulders, and she relaxes a little, but she’s still tense, not cuddling into him the way she does when she’s happy.

They sit there for a few minutes. Tim knows they aren’t done talking, but he doesn’t have anything to add right now, and she’s not ready to talk, yet.

After a few minutes, she says what else has been sitting unquiet in her mind. “I’ve already got to deal with the fact that Jimmy’s life expectancy is almost fifteen years shorter than mine, I don’t need you being stupid and killing yourself, too.”

Tim licks his lips, not sure what to do with that. The trouble he gets into is risk that can be avoided. Jimmy… that’s the fate that can’t.

“I’m not sure I want to go back.”

Breena raises her eyebrows, sees that he means it, and then nods. She gets that that’s as much avoiding a stupid accident as he can do. “What would you do?”

Tim’s not sure. Beyond his current gut-level aversion to the Navy Yard, he doesn’t know what comes next. “Write? Sarah does it fulltime. She likes it. She’s always looking for editors, too. I can proofread.”

Breena thinks about that. “You’d miss it. Miss what you do with computers.”

Tim shakes his head, looking out the window, not really seeing much beyond the mental image of his office before everything went sideways. “I might.” Then the image of it as he left it comes back, and he shivers. “But let’s see if I can walk into the building again without breaking into a cold sweat. Not sure I can do it. Not sure if there’ll be any sort of NCIS to go back to.”

“There’ll still be crimes to solve. Still threats to deal with.”

His face turns back to her, and his eyes focus on hers. “Thought you wanted me leaving them alone.”

She opens and closes her mouth. She doesn’t want people getting hurt or damaged because he’s too scared to work. She doesn’t want him in danger, either. “I want you dealing with them at a desk. Safe. I want you to have the job you love, but I don’t want you starving or dodging bullets or any of the rest of that…”

Tim exhales, a long breath to give him some time to think, and to get himself ready to say what’s in his head. “I can’t imagine I’m ever going to run into a bigger case than this last one. And if I do… Jarvis basically told me to leave it alone…” Tim shakes his head. “He didn’t actually say to leave it, but there were enough hints…” He licks his lips, very nervous, and holds onto her hand tighter. “Bad guys come, and we hunt them down. Doesn’t matter who they are or how dangerous or… whatever. We’re the good guys, we take down the bad guys. That’s the job. Except, what do you do when taking down the ‘bad guys’ hurts more people than leaving them in place?” He’s staring out the window again. “I should have left it alone. We all should have. I’m afraid to listen to the news, afraid I’ll get a new body count. We… NCIS… did okay, at least, while I was there. Only lost one person, but… if we’d just left it alone, just said, oops, no access to these accounts, let’s stop digging, she’d still be alive.

“The Capitol’s gone, Breena. I don’t know what you’ve seen, but… Like I said, I haven’t been watching the news, but… It’s gone. We couldn’t tell which one of the ruins was Tony’s place. Abbi’s is gone, too. Charred brick, melted glass, and black concrete stumps.

“They burned the people in the FEC building alive. Only reason they didn’t get us is Fornell showed up with eight tanks and open fired on the mob with them. I mean, what the fuck is worth that? Rich guys played their games, and no one died. I did the right thing and probably thousands are dead. Who’s the good guy?”

She rubs his back.
“I got stuck. And… I think I got stuck because I felt like I had to be there. I set the ball rolling. I opened the can of worms, and… as long as they kept crawling out, I had to see it through. I had to be there, take the beating, because it was my fault.”

“Hey,” she’s still stroking his back, “none of that. You weren’t the one fucking the system. And you weren’t the one setting fire to buildings.”

“I know. I do. I really do, and I keep telling myself that… But… We could have done more to prep the city. We went live with it on the news to protect our own lives. Keep quiet, build cases, and they’d kill us to keep it quiet, stop the case in its tracks. So, we sprang it on everyone, so no one could leak it and kill us before we got it out, but that meant Metro didn’t have time to protect anything.

“We knew there would be riots. We got our families out of town or into our buildings, and… And we didn’t do enough.

“We saved our lives, and our families lives, and how many people died because we didn’t give the rest of the world enough of a heads up? How many people did I kill, people who had nothing to do with this whole mess, who didn’t set it in action, didn’t even know about it until their world blew up, to keep you and Abby safe?

“And I’m in a building with starving kids, and I can’t leave because they’re in there with me because of me. They’re there because I literally wrote the words that put them in there. And I can’t leave the city because there are bodies everywhere, and some of them are there because I’m the one who pulled the trigger, and the rest of them are there because I’m the one who cracked the account and broke the case open. Tony and Ziva’s home is gone because of hacking I did. Everything Ducky and Penny own is broken or stolen. Elaine’s diner is gone. Abbi’s house is rubble. Bishop’s apartment building will be condemned if they ever get an inspector back to it. Draga’s place is standing, but it’s been looted.

“It’s all gone.” He swallows hard. “And… you know, past cases, other jobs, other kills,” he rubs his lips together, “I could say to myself it was worth it. I was saving my life, or my partner’s lives, or rescuing someone, or derailing a terror plot, or something… But this one? Billions of dollars of damage, thousands of people dead, the government upside down, for what?” Tim wipes his eyes.

Breena holds onto him.

He’s shaking, and has his head on her shoulder, crying silently. It takes a while for him to pull out of it, get himself together some. “That’s why I couldn’t get out. And… I’m never doing that again. I don’t know if I can go back to any sort of law enforcement, because I don’t know if law will ever matter to me again. Don’t know if I’ll ever trust it again.” He sniffs.

She kisses his head, stroking his neck and back, and exhales a long breath. That makes a lot more sense. That covers him not getting out, in a way she hadn’t understood, and doesn’t know how to fix. But it does kill a lot of her anger. At least, the anger directed at Tim.

When Abby and Jimmy come back, Breena’s sitting on the sofa, Tim’s head in her lap, as he snoozes.

“You two okay?” Abby mouths to her.

“Yeah,” she whispers back.
It’s after naptime, in the quiet bit of afternoon before dinner. Tim’s feeling a little groggy from his nap, but he’s also determined to get at least a few minutes of contact with the outside world, so he’s reading some news.

He’s half aware of Molly asking for a drink. It’s background as he’s reading about what Jarvis did to finally break the blockade of DC.

Molly’s a big girl, drinking out of her big girl cup, and she can even, as long as there’s a stool, get herself a glass of water.

So she does. She heads over to the sink, and Tim’s not really paying attention to that. He’s imagining the Governors of VA and MD in Holding, and thinking he might just be able to get over his revulsion of the Navy Yard to go visit them set fire to their genitals, and then he sees, out of the corner of his eye, one of his girls about to drink a glass of water that she just got from the sink.

He’s leapt up and swatted the cup out of her hands, sending water flying all over the kitchen, before his brain has the chance to check in and remind him that they’ve all been drinking the water here, just fine.

Molly’s extremely startled to see her cup on the floor and Uncle Tim looking scary and embarrassed. His mouth opens and closes because he doesn’t know what to say.

“I’m… sorry. I’ll clean that up and get you a new one,” comes out after a minute.

Jimmy’s picked up Molly by that point. She’s not too upset, though she does look extremely curious about this. (They will later see her decide it’s a game, and do it to Kelly and Anna, who have sippy cups. The, ‘Uncle Tim did it, why not me?’ argument will be the first instance of Jimmy whipping out, ‘Because I’m your Dad, and I said so!’)

Tim gives Jimmy a hangdog look, and says, “We had to boil the water. I wasn’t thinking, just saw her with the cup and…”

“What happened if you didn’t boil it?” Jimmy asks.

“If you were lucky, you didn’t sh… poop again for three days.” Molly giggles at that. She’s at the age where any mentions of poop are hilarious. “If not, you didn’t leave the head for three days. Some of the kids got really sick. Ducky still had stuff for them, then, and that’s before we ran out of Gatorade, so no one got dehydrated, but… not fun.”

Jimmy eyes Tim, seeing how thin he is. “You lucky?”

“Believe it or not, yeah.”

They’re not sure what they can, or cannot ask about. They see it, that the wrong association will drop Tim back into bad memories. But, unless they aren’t going to ask about anything, they aren’t sure what will trip him into the past, and what’s just talking.

It’s a few minutes past bedtime, and tonight he was on the dry side of putting little girls to bed, so he hasn’t yet gotten a shower. He’s tired, but he doesn’t want to sleep without one, so into the bathroom he goes.
He’s getting the sense that none of them want him on a slippery surface by himself, because a few minutes later, Jimmy’s in there with him.

Tim’s fine with that. He’s also fine with not being alone right now. He feels like he spent months alone in the Navy Yard and years alone on the road, so having someone at arm’s length feels good.

He’s in the shower with Jimmy, sudsing up, enjoying the new soap, when he feels Jimmy’s hand, tentative, on the back of his head.

“You can ask.” He knows they’ve been eyeing his now almost half-a-centimeter-long hair. Tim turns to face Jimmy.

“What made you decide to shave it all off? Lice?” (That was the only speculation that made sense to them, but now they’ve seen that Tim still has his armpit and pubic hair, it’s pretty clear that that’s not the right answer.)

“Thank God, no. Uh… Fornell shows up out of the blue in a fucking tank and saves the day.” He hasn’t told that story, though they know it happened. Just, not his version of it, not yet. “Once he got inside the walls, he took his helmet off, and no hair. He’d shaved it all off. He mentioned that he hates the way it feels under a helmet, hot, sweaty, gets tangled in the pads. He’s right. Feels… like shit, really. I’ve done it before. Afghanistan. And, for a day or two, or light work, it’s not bad, but if you’re pouring down sweat fighting fires… If you’re covered in dirt and ash and grit…” Tim shakes his head. “So, off it went. More comfortable, felt cleaner.”

“Dry?” Jimmy’s noticed that Tim scrupulously dried himself off after tubby time last night, and suspects he’ll be just as careful tonight.

“Yeah. You know how the locker room has clean towels in it?”

Jimmy nods. He’s used them before. His mental image is of three shelves with towels on them, maybe sixty of them live there.

“Imagine sharing them with 300 other guys, and you can’t wash them between uses, because the washing machines are running full tilt just to keep us in socks and underwear. And don’t even think about a dryer.”

Jimmy winces.

“It got a little better. Tony’s crew got more towels and washer. A few of the Marines were engineers. They built hookups for them out of nothing. But the towels were still damp all the time, mildew-y, but at least it was yours, and every few days you got a shot to wash it.”

Jimmy winces and glances through the fogged up glass door of the shower toward where there are multiple soft, fluffy towels waiting for them.

Tim shrugs a bit. “It’s stupid shit that gets to you. No clean towels. No pillows. Our people got told to bring what they’d need for a week. Only four of them brought an inflatable mattress, because none of them thought about it. Only reason I had more than one outfit was Tony had the good sense to pack for me.

“Toothpaste. Ran out of it about two weeks in. Still had a toothbrush so my teeth felt okay, but my mouth tasted like something died in it all the time.

“Just stupid little shit like that.
“And food. I bought a million pound of food. Felt like that, anyway. By day five we were getting low. And… garlic powder, hell, fucking black pepper. Elaine’s cooking for us and it’s all shit because I’m the idiot who didn’t buy any spices.”

“You’re also the guy who decided to make sure you had food in there. We saw the news reports. A lot of other people, even the ones who got your note about disaster preparation, didn’t think to bring food.”

“Yeah. I know. A lot of our people brought a box of granola bars or something. Almost no one brought an entire week’s worth of food.” He rubs his face. “I felt like I tried. Like… I could see the shape and the shadows of the problem, but I couldn’t see it, didn’t know how bad it was, and everything I set out to do with this wasn’t enough.”

“Better than nothing.”

Tim inclines his head. He doesn’t disagree. But the fact that he didn’t know, that it wasn’t his fault, that didn’t fill any bellies. “I feel like one of those weather forecasters who tells everyone that the hurricane is coming, but it’ll be small, and it’ll stay offshore, and so everyone buys a few gallons of milk and some chips, and they settle in for the storm. And then it’s a category five with a direct strike and they all fucking die in the flood. Doesn’t matter that he, or I, did the best we could, people still died.”

Jimmy snorts at that, and Tim looks at him, startled and amazed. He’d been expecting some petting on that and a bit of comfort.

Jimmy shakes his head. “That’s day one of your ER residency. And you hate it, and you feel like shit, but that’s the truth of being in the life-saving game. You will do everything you possibly can. You will check and double check. And you will still be wrong. And even when you aren’t, they will still die.”

Tim snorts back at him, eyes closing with a small roll. He’s not sure if that’s a comfort or not. But that’s also the first few months of being a cop, too. You can’t, won’t save them all. It’s not possible.

Jimmy holds his hands, give him a little tug to get him to look at him, and stares into his eyes, “We do the best we can, with what we have, and Gibbs and his gut aside, we’re not psychic, we can’t tell the future, and we have no control over the actions of others.”

Tim swallows, still looking into Jimmy’s eyes. “I know.”

“And you still feel like shit.”

“Yeah.”

“It’ll get better.”

Tim nods at that. “I know.”

They’re getting ready for bed, settling in, starting with light kisses and pets, just getting the feel for the four of them again, when Jimmy’s phone rings.

“Not again,” he mutters under his breath, and then picks up. He listens, face serious, makes a few non-committal noises, and then says. “I need to talk to my family, but, tentatively, yes, day after tomorrow.” There’s another pause and then he says, “My wife is a mortician… Uh huh… Yeah, Breena Palmer… Okay.”

He turns off his phone and places it back on the nightstand.

“That was General Evans, apparently he’s running the first wave of rehabbing DC.” Jimmy sighs. “They need every medical examiner, mortician, doctor, EMT, anyone who’s got any training dealing with the dead. They started getting people in to clear out the rubble today, and less than an hour into it they started finding bodies. They’re calling me back.” He strokes Breena’s cheek. “Calling you in, too.” He looks at Abby. “Can’t imagine it’ll be more than a few days before they get to you. They’re going to need people to run DNA and prints. He says there are th—lots of people to ID.”

“Thousands,” Tim says, voice thick. “You can say the word.” His eyes are hollow as he says, “At least a few hundred of them were buried in the Navy Yard by the time I left. Probably more. So, we’re going home?”

Jimmy glances at Breena and Abby. “If you don’t want to, I’ll stay here, but… I feel like I should. This is what I do, and there’s no immediate risk anymore. Plus, if I’m not there to take his place, they’ll have to duct tape Ducky to a chair to get him to sit out, and Allan must need to rest, too.”

Tim nods. “He lost so much weight his wedding ring fell off. I don’t know if he found it again. I don’t… I know Allan was there, but I don’t remember how he was.”

They’ve skyped with Ducky, so they know he’s thin, but they didn’t realize it got that bad. Jimmy’s seen Allan, too, and he knows that Allan needs a month off, at least.

Breena nods at the other three of them. “Thirteen hour drive. We’ll head back in the morning, start the day after. We can leave the girls here, with you, and you two come back slowly or…”

“Together.” Abby says. “We stay together.”

“I think Gibbs and I’ll be okay watching the girls,” Tim says.

“Maybe… Ducky and Penny and Tony and Ziva are going to need a place to stay. The house is almost done… Maybe that’s what you guys need to be doing, let the girls go back to daycare and Heather, and work on building a place for them to live,” Breena says, thinking that some quiet time building things, creating and doing something uplifting and useful would definitely be good for Tim, and would likely be good for the rest of them.

Tim nods a little, looking tired, but thinking. “It was my turn to take point, anyway. Time to do the wiring. Probably don’t want to do drywall with Gibbs, but Tony and I could probably handle it. It’s light, right?”

“And you’d build up strength working on it,” Jimmy replies.

“Take the girls to daycare, head to the house, break for the day at three or so, pick ‘em up, and then get dinner ready, all three of you come home, and… Make a haven for you. And, for as long as you can stand it, or until it’s done, I’ll guard the home front, and you guys take care of DC.”

Abby nods at that, and she strokes Tim’s face, “And if we can’t stand it, or if it can’t be home anymore, then we’re start looking for somewhere else.”
Sex has flavors, and colors, feels, and sounds. It has emotions and currents. What had started as ‘getting reacquainted sex’ shifts after that conversation.

It flows into comfort sex, into reassurance made touch. Tim can feel his own fear building at the idea of going back, and with that fear, resentment, at himself, for being afraid. He doesn’t have to go into the city, he’s not going to be digging bodies out of the rubble, but at the end of the day, when they come home, they’ll smell like it, and that has him unsettled.

So, he pulls as much comfort as he can out of here and now, out of kisses and strokes, out of skin growing pink and warm, swollen and flush. He takes solace in soft moans, and quick breaths, little grunts, and the slicker-y sounds of wet skin sliding on wet skin.

He lets pleasure and love and the feel of these people all around him banish tomorrow and yesterday. He lets kisses and thrusts, and images: Breena’s head back, mouth open, gasping. Abby laughing as Jimmy licks one of her toes. His fingers twined with Jimmy’s over Breena’s breast, as Breena kisses Jimmy, riding Tim slow and steady. Abby and Breena kissing each other… so many images, all of his favorite sights… They wash the rest of the world away, and plant him in a small, dim room, filled with soft words, love, and exquisite pleasure.

And for a few minutes, tomorrow doesn’t exist.
Inch At A Time

Getting home doesn’t take nearly as long as leaving did.

First off, the tension between… They aren’t sure yet. New York City and New York State, except that New York City is also attempting to become a state and two New York States right next to each other is going to be an issue… Tim’s referring to them as Upstate and Gotham… has been relegated to the lawyers.

Which means they can drive straight south.

Plus, he doesn’t have to stop to rest every two hours. He and Abby are swapping out. He does need nap/snack time after two hours of driving, but his trip doesn’t have to stop to accommodate that. That’s working out well for Abby, too, who also appreciates the downtime. She’s not as sleepy as she was first trimester, but trimester three means she’s also getting tired more easily than in trimester two.

They’re making somewhat slower time than Jimmy and Breena (more bathroom breaks), but every meal/snack stop they plan out ahead of time and they wait for them. They’ll get home the same time.

Going south, there are two main ways to get to Tim and Abby’s place. (Closer to DC than Jimmy and Breena’s and where they intend to land tonight.) The shorter way, which is again open, is to take I-95 south, and then skirt the city by taking I-495 around it, and then exit off of I-495 toward their neighborhood. (The longer way involves going through the city, which is currently legal, but a beyond stupid plan.)

Tim and Abby have both done this run thousands of times.

For the most part, they can’t see much of DC from I-495. Most of the view is trees. Or office buildings. The occasional mall. But… as they head south, they get to the Woodrow Wilson Bridge, the link between the Maryland and Virginia sides of right outside of DC, and from there, if they look west, they can see most of the city, with the Washington Monument jutting into the sky.

It’s night. They got on the road a bit before 08:00, and it’s almost 22:00 now.

Tim’s intentionally not driving. He’s not sure how he’ll react to seeing the city, and he doesn’t want to attempt to control an SUV while dealing with whatever’s going to go through his head when he sees it.

They’ve seen this drive, this time of night… more times than either of them could count. They should be looking a million little lights. They should see the monument lit white, a gleaming pillar into the sky. There should be houses and buildings aglow.

There aren’t.

Tim’s not sure if seeing nothing, except the crescent moon on the river, is a mercy or not.

“Oh God,” whispers out of Abby, as she looks out and sees nothing but black.

He nods.
“Is the Washington Monument still there?”

He nods again. “Yeah.” He shakes his head as he realizes he doesn’t know that for sure, but… unless the wrong guy got a tank, which certainly wasn’t impossible, it should still be there. “I haven’t seen it since the fires were burning. I… I might be wrong. Last time I saw it, I was with Tony and Abbi on the Mall, pumping out the Reflecting Pond, trying to wet everything down so the fire wouldn’t spread. When the wind shifted, the smoke would thin, and it was hazy, glowing orange and red.” He laughs, it’s dry, bitter sound. “Actually, it was kind of pretty.”

Abby squeezes his hand.

The first hint that something is wrong hits Tim when they pull into his driveway and see lights on. There shouldn’t be lights on in his house. While he could fully believe that he was out of it enough to have left all the lights on at Jimmy’s place, he was only in his house for an hour, during the day… So… There should not be lights on in his house.

He’s stepped out of his car, wary, gun already in hand, and Jimmy pulls up behind him. He sees Tim eyeing the house, sees the gun, and gets out of his car. He puts his hand on Tim’s wrist, making sure the gun keeps pointing down, and quietly says, “Remember my comment about meaningless death? Let’s go to my place. We can sort this out during the day, with Tony and Abbi along for backup.”

Tim’s in the process of nodding when his door opens and Elaine steps out.

There are a few minutes of hellos and hugs and a somewhat awkward discussion of “Gibbs sent us here because his house can’t hold us all, but we can leave,” followed with Tim and Abby doing their part of “Absolutely not, you keep your butts right here, we’re not throwing you out, we can go to Jimmy’s,” which ends with Elaine mentioning that Tony, Ziva, Allan, Bishop and Jake are all at Jimmy’s place.

This is followed by a moment where the four of them all stare at each other, and then look at Elaine and her husband. (The kids have headed back inside, moving things around to make room for Tim and his family.)

“I guess we’ll just… head home, then.” Jimmy and Breena are sort of staring around at Elaine and her husband. They don’t want to go home. They just got all of them together. Apart, especially after a long day of driving, is the last thing they want right now, but…

There’s no real reason why they’d stay at the McGees’. And, okay, they don’t exactly want to be out to Elaine and her family, but if they get outed it’s not the end of the world. But the people at Jimmy’s place all work with them, and that could get the rumor mill running, fast.

Assuming, that is, that one of these days there’ll be a job and a place for the rumor mill to run.

So…

Elaine looks them over, and glances to her husband, he nods back at her. “If the only thing you think I’ve noticed about the four of you after all these years is your breakfast order, you aren’t paying attention. The kids don’t know, and I’d imagine you’d like to keep it that way, but with tight quarters it’d make sense to share a room.”
None of them were expecting that, and it’s clear by the way they’re looking at her, and each other.

“Uh… Sure,” Tim says, feeling very odd about being told how to bunk in his own house. His eyes flit to the cross around Elaine’s neck; the one she never takes off.

She sees him do it and knows what he’s thinking. “A good friend of mine once said, that he who was without sin could cast the first stone. Well, that ain’t me. And He said something about not judging unless you want to be judged, and I don’t think He meant, ‘judge all you want in your heart, just don’t talk about it.’ And He said one other thing, and that’s to love each other, which I aim to do.”

That gets another round of nods. “Come on, Brian, let’s get our stuff out of the master bedroom, they’re gonna need it.”

It’s not quite eleven when they’re all settled into Tim’s room. Today was a long day, and tomorrow’s going to be longer. They turn in, just to sleep.

“So, what happens next?” Jimmy asks Elaine, at breakfast.

“Vera and Hec, my sister and her husband, are coming up from North Carolina to get us. We can stay with them until…” she lets that drift off.

“Until you know what you’re doing?” Abby asks.

Elaine nods. “Not sure if we’re coming back. Your Boss made sure we had money to land on our feet. We don’t have to worry about making rent or paying for food, and our apartment building is still standing, but…” her voice catches, and she has to stop, resettle herself, before she can go on, “The diner’s gone. The Marines have this satellite service up right now, so you can look up your street, see how bad it is, without having to go into the city.”

They hear Brian speak, for maybe the second time ever. (Why Elaine likes Gibbs isn’t a mystery.) “Scorch marks, ash, melted lumps.” He shakes his head. “All that’s left.

“We have a little money in the bank, but that’s for the kids, for college. Not sure if the land is worth anything anymore, might not have any equity to take out of it. Might start over again in Raleigh.”

Tim doesn’t have to think about it. “If you want to rebuild here, and if you need help, we’ll help you get the financing.”

Elaine waves that off. “That’s sweet, but I’m not going to put you out, you’ve got your own babies to raise.”

“It’d be an investment, not a gift, but… Think about it, figure out what you want to do, and, if you want to rebuild, we’ll help,” Breena says. “Actually, once we’re done,” they’ve explained, briefly, why they were back so soon, “you and I should have a chat. I’m always looking to diversify my holdings, and this might be a good partnership.”
As Breena, Jimmy, and Abby drive out of Tim’s neighborhood, Jimmy says to her, “That sounds like putting more roots into DC.”

Breena shrugs a bit. “Wouldn’t be any sort of hands-on management. I could do that from anywhere.”

“But you’d like to stay here,” Abby adds.

Breena nods. “My family is here. My business is here. Our home, the house… Unless we can’t stay, I’d like to be here. Maybe… just getting a bit further out of DC will be enough. Move closer to the house or something.”

“Or something… West… Lots of air and space,” Abby says. “Get a big ranch out in Montana or something.”

Montana isn’t one of Jimmy’s dearest hopes, so he says, “Or something.” They haven’t done any extensive searching, yet, but the first brushes of research they’ve looked into have let them see that immigrating legally pretty much anywhere would be a massive undertaking, made even more complicated by Jimmy’s diabetes. Most of the developed world isn’t interested in having someone with expensive medical issues become a citizen, and since ‘marry a citizen’ isn’t an option for them… Complicated is the name of the game.

“It’s a big country, lots of—” Abby’s saying, having picked up on Jimmy’s lukewarm response to Montana.

And then they all go silent. They’ve gotten to the part of the trip where they can see DC.

Breena swallows hard, a low gravelly “Fuck,” slips out of Jimmy, and Abby closes her eyes and looks away.

Eventually, Breena thinks of something to say, “It should be in black and white. All the bombed out World War II pictures, the shots of Dresden after the fires, London during the Blitz, they’re all in black and white.”

Getting into the city isn’t difficult. Not physically. The roads aren’t torn up. There’s almost no traffic, just a few cars, like theirs, and a decent number of truck going in to pull rubble out. And a long line of heavy trucks, filled with… stuff, are coming out, taking wreckage away.

Rock Creek Park. That’s where they’re going.

Jimmy’s been there… God, hundreds of times. Before he and Breena moved out of the city, that was his morning run. He’s pulled more bodies than he wants to count out of Rock Creek Park. He knows every street, every trail. He knows the hills, and the overpasses…

He knew them.

It’s bare now. The grass burned, the trees burned, the brush burned… This bit of driving might as well be in black and white, because he’s not seeing, (besides the other cars) any color. The “Creek” part of Rock Creek Park is sludgy gray.

The granite: boulders, and the rocks used to build overpasses so joggers could move through without having to dodge cars on the roads, had been gray. Now it’s gray streaked with black.
Everywhere else, the trees are brown, with the last few, stubborn leaves hanging on, also brown. Here, they're black, charred, leaning haphazardly or already collapsed.

When they finally see something in color, it’s a collection of huge tents on a fairly level bit of ground, that had been a nice meadow for Frisbee or lying about and catching some sun, and is now the single largest morgue he’s ever seen.

Neither Jimmy nor Breena are strangers to the smells of death. Abby’s not, either. But none of them have ever smelled it at this level.

The air is so thick with putrescence, they could chew it.

It staggers them when they open the car doors. Staggers them with the force of the assault on their senses, with an almost palpable hit of death and rot. Worse, there’s the surprise of it. They’d been smelling it, in the car, for miles. They thought they knew what they were getting into.

They didn’t.

There’s a very military order about the place. Likely, because the Marines are handling it. There’s a check in table, where Breena and Jimmy are both given name tags, bags to hold their clothing and personal items, and clean coveralls.

“Abby McGee.”

“You aren’t on the list,” a young Marine says to her while Jimmy and Breena head off to get changed.

“I’m not here to handle bodies. I’m a forensic specialist. DNA matches, fingerprints run, bloodwork. You name it, I’m your lady.”

He looks confused. “I don’t… Hold on.” He gets up and a few minutes later, she’s got a higher up Marine in front of her.

He’s also rather confused looking. The plan is to process all the bodies here, and then send off the packets for identification. “Ms. McGee…”

“Abby. I know, you’re not processing, yet. But you’ve got to have stuff to process. I’m the lead Forensic Specialist at NCIS.” She hands over her creds. “You name it, and I’m set to do it.”

“We don’t have the tools for you.” They don’t. They’ve got eight tents set up to process bodies. Refrigerated shipping containers to hold them. Generators a plenty to make sure they’ve got the power to run it all. But there’s not a single computer set with a scanner for finger prints or facial recognition, let alone anything to handle blood or hair DNA.

“I’ve got my own. You give me a guy to go with me, and keep me in prints and blood samples, and I can start getting names on your John/Jane Does.”

The Marine checks and double checks her ID. Then he thinks for a minute. “How many people do you need?”
“Someone to get me there and back.” She pats her tummy. “Don’t want to be going through DC on my own right now, but there are supposed to be Marines at the Navy Yard, so once I’m there, it should be fine. Then all I need is someone to make sure I don’t run out of information to process.”

The Marine barks a short, sarcastic laugh. “No fear of that. I’ll call over to the Navy Yard, if they’re willing to spare someone to shuttle you and the ID packets around, I’m fine with starting to get names attached to the Does.”

Half an hour later, Abby finds Jimmy and Breena, gives them both a kiss on the cheek, and tells them where she’s going, as two young Marines grab boxes filled with bags.

---

They have it set up as an assembly line.

The first stage are the people working through the city. Clean up crews are going through, pulling out rubble, pulling down buildings that won’t stand on their own. Every time they find someone, they mark it off, and call in what will eventually be known as The Morgue.

They send out the first set of handlers. The people bringing the bodies in are mostly EMTs or Medical Corpsmen, though some are volunteers from all over the spectrum of humanity.

Those bodies will be carried to a refrigerated shipping container. Before being put in there, the body will be laid in a bag with an identifying number on it. Then the body will wait until a table opens up.

From there, each body will move to a table. On that table, will be another bag (also with the ID number on it) that the person’s belongs will go into.

On that table, they’re photographed, their clothing and pockets are searched. If there’s an ID on them, it will also be photographed and go in the plastic pouch where all personal belongings will go. If there is an ID, the last name of the person will go on the bag in addition to the number. All people, IDed or not, will have hair and blood samples taken. With so many unknowns, and so many children, they’re hoping to use DNA to build webs of family connections.

This is the station where the number gets put into the computer, with pictures, and an ID, or Jane/John Doe.

The next table is Breena’s. Taking clothing off, photographing, again, the body under the clothing, and then washing everyone off. Once clean, if she has a name, she write it on the bottom of the person’s left foot. In all cases she writes the number on the bottom of the right. It’s less “tidy” than a toe tag, but there’s no chance of the number getting lost. It’s not all that different from step one of her usual job. What comes next is different, but that’s not her job.

The next table has a portable x-ray hovering over it. Each body will be x-rayed. For some, that will be about helping to determine cause of death. For others, it will be used to help ID the person.

Jimmy’s got one of the next tables. The first part of the line is fairly quick. The second part, not so much. Tentative cause of death is his job. He gets the body and does as much as he can with what he has. Some of them are fairly straightforward: bullet, blunt force trauma, smoke inhalation, fire.

He digs a lot of bullets out of people. He removes plates and surgical pins to help ID victims. He takes histology samples, to narrow down cases where there are no clear causes of death. Unlike NCIS, here, it’s not his job to follow up. It’s not his job to come up with final conclusions. He’s just a table, on a line, getting bodies processed.
But for right now, he’s the last table.

From him (and the other MEs), bodies go into new refrigerated shipping containers. One for those with IDs, and one for the Does.

There is one more station, after Jimmy, though the table at this one doesn’t have space for a body on it. This one is a place for people to sit, and wait. Most of them won’t wait long. This is where the names of the people they’ve been able to ID go. At this table, there are computers, and men and women, most of them older, all of them calm, peaceful, sad.

This is where the Chaplains, Ministers, Priests, Rabbis, Imams and Social Workers are.

They will get a name, and begin their search, find an address, and phone numbers, and begin the hunt for next-of-kin. And once they find one, it’s their jobs to go and spread the news.

The first day Tim’s home, after Abby, Breena, and Jimmy have headed into the city, he doesn’t have much to do.

That’s not true. He’s got three little girls under the age of three on his hands. He should have piles of stuff to do, but Elaine (who should also be sitting on her butt, healing up, along with the rest of her family) feels like she’s freeloadign if she’s not helping out. So, he’s in a house with eight people, any one of whom is fully capable of looking after a baby, and three babies.

Baby time seems to be good for all of them.

And, outnumbering them more than two to one keeps all of the adults, who are still tired, weak, and healing, from getting too worn out.

He does nap when they go down for their morning nap.

After lunch, when he’s playing with Anna and Kelly, a thought hits him. If the day before yesterday was the 30th, that would mean yesterday was Halloween, and today is his anniversary with Abby.

“Do you guys mind keeping an eye on them?” he asks, spooning mushed peas and carrots into Anna.

“Not at all!” Kenzie says, enjoying this. Taking care of happy, well-fed, babies who are going to get a nap soon is actually fun, and a very nice change from running the NCIS kitchens, trying to stretch ever smaller amounts of food to feed a crowd of people who are perpetually disappointed to see what you’ve got.

“Goin’ out?” Elaine asks.

“Yeah.” Tim shakes his head a bit. “I just realized what day it is. My second anniversary. You want me to get anything for you?”

Elaine shakes her head. “Vera and Hec’ll be here by four. Just make sure you’re back by then.”

“No problem.”
In the two years since Tim and Abby moved into this neighborhood, they’ve gotten to know people. Which means something as basic as attempting to go to the grocery store to get ingredients for a nice dinner and flowers for his wife, is exhausting.

Two people in the grocery store gush on about if he’s okay and stare in horror at his mention of being stuck in DC. His usual barista at the coffee shop (They’re out of coffee, so he’s picking up a bag for himself, and another one, with caffeine for Jimmy and Breena.) wants to know about breaking open the case. The florist wants to bitch about those “animals” in DC and how they deserved it if they were going to burn their own town.

Pulling into his driveway, the neighbor three houses down jogs over to say ‘Hi’ and gawk at him.

Everyone he ran into out there stared. He can’t imagine he’s the only guy they’re seeing moving around who hasn’t been out of DC long enough to regain the weight, but he feels like a tie-dyed unicorn in a herd of horses.

He’s out for a little more than an hour, and by the time he gets back, he’s ready for another nap, and debating not going out in public until he’s put on at least five more pounds.

Besides the smell, and the litter… no trash pickup for three weeks plus 600 people means lots of litter… Abby thinks NCIS really isn’t all that different.

Okay, that’s not really true. The ring of burned cars around the perimeter and the fact that everywhere she looks around the walls there are shell casings, is all the different Abby ever needs to see.

Besides the litter and the smell, inside NCIS isn’t all that different. Abby feels like the walls should be screaming. But they don’t. It’s just a wickedly smelly building that looks like it housed the mother of all frat parties. Clean it out, air it out, fix a bit of damage, and… it’s fine. It shouldn’t be. It almost feels like a betrayal of Tim and everyone else who was in here, but… really, it’s fine.

Down here, in the lab, with her music on… besides the smell, it really could be any day before she got her own team.

The Marines who are keeping watch aren’t doing much. Besides her and two Governors, there’s no one else to watch, and the Govs are locked in, so it’s not like they’re going anywhere.

So, she has a team of polite, young, overly courteous people who are willing to lend her whatever hands she might need, and are treating her like she’s made of spun glass. She doesn’t have to lift anything heavier than a blood vial or print card, they’ll more or less sprint off to fetch her something should she desire it (and when a smoothie craving hit, one of them did go all the way out of the city to get her two of them), and, because this is the easy stuff, she’s got another two of them entering prints into AFIS. (She’s thinking she’s got one of them interested in a career in Forensics when her hitch is up.)

If she was doing anything else, (and if her sense of smell would vanish) this would be one of the most pleasant days of her career.

But she’s not.

And she’s also, because they will not leave her alone in here, unable to do the one thing she most wants to do, walk fifty feet to the ballistics lab, and see where Tim was hiding out. She knows he wouldn’t want whatever is left of his nest viewed by these very pleasant strangers.

She wants to walk the whole building, feel it, see where he was, but… not with an audience. Abby’s fairly sure that the one thing she’s not going to get here is alone time, and to the extent that the whole city is upside down, not being alone makes sense, but to the extent that she’s in a mostly empty building that’s structurally sound, being alone here really isn’t much different from being alone at home.

Doesn’t matter. She can’t ask them to leave or let her alone without explaining why she wants the alone time, and she doesn’t want to do that, either.

So, she half perches on a stool, and feeds another picture into the facial recognition system.

Crunching gravel. That’s the sound that wakes Tim up. Someone’s pulling into his driveway. It’s a little after four, so he’s pretty sure who that someone one.

He pulls on pants and quietly heads down to say goodbye to his guests and hello to their kin.

Vera and Hec are, much like Elaine and Brian, middle class, middle-aged (though the exit from Middle-aged to Old is coming up fast for Vera and Hec.) and generally cheerful. There are a lot of long hugs as Elaine and her sister see each other for the first time since before everything fell apart. Tim gets a pretty enthusiastic hug for putting everyone up at his place.

He keeps a fake smile on his face, but his eyes are burning and his throat is thick as they drive off.

Another thing ending. Everything’s ending. Because he fucking killed the city.

His knees feel weak and loose, and he finds himself sitting on the stoop of his front porch, crying, wrapped in the sense that nothing will ever, ever be right again, because it can’t be right if there’s no Diner to get breakfast at on Sunday mornings. It can’t be right if they can’t all get together, have breakfast, go to church, do dinner at the Slaters, and then he and Jimmy and Gibbs head off, meet up with Tony and…

And it’s never going to be right again.

When one of the other neighbors ask if he’s okay, and if they need to call Abby, he pulls it together enough to say, “I’m… Just… She’s working. I’ll be okay,” and stumbles inside.

Once he’s in there, Tim starts looking for help. This time, he knows he’s in too deep over his head. His first idea, calling Wolf, doesn’t lead anywhere. And that makes him nervous, edgy. Things are already never going to be okay again because they can’t be because everything is changed, and that’s already spiraling out of his control, add the paralyzing fear that he got Wolf killed on top of that and he’s sitting in his office, shaking, holding his phone, willing Wolf to answer.

He has to bite his lip, hard, to get that under control. He’s the only adult in the house. He cannot fall apart.

He keeps telling himself that he’s got Wolf’s work number, which goes to an office in DC. Of course no one’s answering it.
But he thinks he’s seen Wolf only talk on a cell phone. And, hell, even Jethro doesn’t have a landline these days. If Wolf’s not picking up… Tim doesn’t know if he lives in DC or not. He could have been working late, he could have been in the city, gotten caught in the riots, his neighborhood might be ashes by now, or he could have been killed, or hurt, or still among the missing, or…

Fear’s washing over him, making him feel jittery in addition to hopeless.

That’s spiraling out of control, too, and he forces his mind out of it. He can make himself think about something else, but he can’t get his breathing to even out, or the prickly, cold nauseous fear to leave him.

So, he tries another number, and this one gets him an answer, “Agent McGee?”

“Hi.” He swallows hard, trying to get his voice under control, he sounds shaky because he is shaking.

“Are you okay?”

“I’m… No, Rachel, I’m not. Are you… Can you… see anyone right now?”

“I’m in Miami, Tim, so, not in person. What kind of not okay are you? Are you safe?”

“Oh,” he rubs his eyes. “Yeah. I’m home. I’m safe. I’m not going to hurt myself. Just having a really bad time right now.”

“Okay,” her voice is cool and calm. That helps him find some calm. “What sort of bad time?”

“Can’t shake the fear, and broke into a cold sweat when I couldn’t get to my usual therapist. I… I don’t know if he’s okay and…” He can’t finish that sentence.

“All right.” She sighs. “Why were you trying to get him?”

“Panic attacks… That’s probably the right word for it. I’ve been out of DC for a few days, but the wrong words, wrong thought sends me back. And… wrong thoughts send other ideas spiraling out of control, and pulling out is hard, so…”

“But you are pulling yourself out?”

“I have to. Can’t… Nothing good’s on the other side of those thoughts.”

“That’s good, Tim. Pulling out might be hard, but that’s probably the most important thing you can be doing right now. I’m going to be coming back up tomorrow. My neighbors say our street is in one piece. My husband used to work construction and would like to help with the cleanup. Would you like to talk in person tomorrow night?”

“Gotta be home for my family at night. They’re on cleanup, too. Jimmy and Breena, they’re processing the dead, and Abby’s IDing them. They’re gonna need help. They kept me going while I was in DC, least I can do for them is the same thing. But, the day after, morning?”

“We can do that. Do you have internet access?”

“Yeah. I’m at home.”

“Okay, good. Between now and then, I want you to get online and google cognitive behavioral therapy.”
“I can do that.” He can, and will. A concrete thing to do is helps him feel more settled.

“Good. There are even versions of it you can do online.”

A wry smile forms on his face, but he does feel a little calmer. “So, you’re saying it was made for me?”

“It might mesh with your style well.”

“Okay.”

There’s a quiet beat, and then, “Tim?”

“Yeah?”

“Is Jethro okay?”

“Oh, God, I should have… Yeah, he’s okay. We’re all in one piece. Worse for the wear, but nothing that time and food won’t fix.”

“Really?”

He says, “Yeah,” before he realizes what he’s telling her.

She sounds fairly satisfied as she says, “Good, Tim. Day after tomorrow, morning. How about I go to you if you don’t want to go to the city?”

“Thanks.” He hears some chirping from upstairs as he hangs up the phone. At least one little girl is awake, and that’s real and it’s now. He’s relieved to head up and start corralling babies.

Every time she finishes a box, Abby has one of the Marines go back and get her a new one.

She wishes that every time she finished a box, she could send a box filled with IDs back, but it doesn’t work that way.

By the end of the day, when she’s ready to go and get Jimmy and Breena, she’s got seventy-three people processed, and seventeen IDs. Better than nothing, but not as good as she hoped.

With any luck, there’ll be another thirty or so of them in the morning.

Her escort, Pfc Sierra Mann, is excited, really excited at seventeen IDs. Her escort is also, maybe nineteen, and like many young Marines, extremely enthusiastic about most everything. “We doing more of this tomorrow?”

“Yep. Until everyone’s got a name,” Abby answers.

“Good. Those…” she pauses, editing herself, “people at the National Guard, they stuck me in a squad keeping watch on the Lake Anna Nuclear Power plant. Three weeks of nothing. Didn’t do anything anyone would ever consider useful. This might not be what I trained for, but it’s the same kind of thing, helping people, you know?”

“Yeah, Sierra, I know.”
“I’ve got some friends who won’t be on duty tomorrow. Can I bring them?”

Abby nods. “Sure. We’ll hit the point where you just can’t stick any more information into the computers, but… Until then, bring ‘em. I can always use an extra set of hands to scan photos and put finger prints into the computer.”

Abby thinks about that more, if she can hand all of that off, she can work with just blood and bullets, the kind of work that Marines with less than an hour of training shouldn’t be doing.

“You guys’ll do photos and prints, I’ll work bullets and blood. We’ll get names for them.”

“Good, Abby.”

Cognitive Behavioral Therapy is actually, if the little bit of Googling he’s doing is accurate, fairly similar to what he does when he pulls himself out of a mood or spiral.

Get into trouble. Identify the trouble. Force yourself to rationally assess what your brain is doing and why it’s a trap. Explain why the trap isn’t real. (Supposedly this allows you to, gradually, control what’s in your head.)

It also, according to the bits of research he’s done, works.

He can see why Rachel would consider this a good fit for him. He only gets a few minutes of reading between baby wrangling and getting dinner ready, but he sees one tip, and takes it. Tim rummages around in his office, looking for a rubber band, and eventually gives up because why would he have a rubber band? He can’t remember using one for anything since he was twelve, on his paper-route, rubber-banding the papers into cylinders. So, he goes up to their room, and locates one of Abby’s ponytail holders. He takes off his watch and slips it over his wrist. Part of the idea is that if he feels himself slipping into negative/not true thoughts, is that he can snap the band against his wrist, and help shock himself out of the panic. Give himself a physical “stop it” reminder.

He doesn’t think it’ll hurt, and it might help.

Jimmy and Breena have never worked together before. Not this kind of work, anyway.

And, by the end of the day, it’s safe to say that they will happily never work together again.

Not because of any mismatch of styles, or they get on each other’s nerves, or anything like that.

It’s just the job.

By the end of day one, primary killers appear to be complications of starvation and bullets. (This is likely because they haven’t started cleaning out any of the really burnt out parts of town, yet.) Which means they are seeing old people, sick people, young children, and what should otherwise be healthy, young men.

Jimmy would say about half of the people he’s seeing died because they couldn’t get enough food. It’s true that a healthy person can go twenty-one days without food. Many of the poor people who lived in DC were not healthy. Likewise, a child cannot go twenty-one days without food.
Another third have obvious signs of violence upon them. A lot of bullets. He thinks he’s removed more bullets today than he did in his entire last year at NCIS. He’s officially listing them all as murders right now, but from what Tim said about the nighttime shoot on sight orders, and the size of the bullets he’s removing, he’s willing to bet that the majority of these bullets will come back to Metro LEOs.

The rest are burn victims or unknowns.

It’s grinding work, and they deal with it the same way people always have. Black humor. Deepest crevices of the Marianas Trench at midnight black humor. Jimmy lets all of his inner dweeb out, all the inappropriate comments, because here it helps. Anything that gets the people around him not thinking about the fact that they’re carefully cataloguing all of the injuries on a six-year-old who’s died from massive organ failure because she couldn’t get a few hundred calories a day, helps.

Bad jokes. Black jokes. Idiot puns. Long, rambling stories with wicked, dirty punchlines. Any and all of it. Even the chaplains and pastors are adding in with some of their own. (Theirs tend to be PG-rated. There is one Priest, though, probably about Ducky’s age. From his posture, and the uniform, he was a Marine Corp Chaplain, and he’s got the dirtiest jokes they’ve ever heard. Apparently, they told some absolutely filthy stories in the Corp back in Korea and Viet Nam, and he’s happy to share.) They tell the jokes to each other. They tell them to their clients. Anything to keep them all from just collapsing under the sorrow of it and never getting up again.

When Abby joins them, she hears one of the EMTs wrap up with, “And then the dad says, ‘Pool? We don’t have a pool!’” She looks startled when the people around her laugh, hard, too hard. Even drunk people in a good mood don’t find that joke that funny.

Breena’s wiping tears out of her eyes at it, and so is Jimmy.

And then Abby doesn’t have to ask. It’s laugh or cry, and if they start crying, they aren’t going to stop.

---

Haven. That’s Tim’s goal. Provide a safe haven for them at the end of the day.

He’s made the best meal he can make them. Steaks are on the grill, searing away nicely, next to the asparagus. He’s got potatoes roasting along with onions and radishes in the oven. There’s salad in the fridge.

He’s got red and white roses on the table for Abby.

And he picked up chocolate cake for dessert. (He’d thought idly about attempting to bake one himself, and decided even a box mix was way too much work when he was at the market earlier today.)

The girls are just about ready to eat. He’s got them all in the living room, chilling to Little Bear. Anna and Kelly are on his lap, Molly’s sitting next to them. Right now, it’s just a matter of putting food on plates and plates in front of people.

It’s a matter of one other thing, too. He smells them as soon as the door opens, and it’s a kick to the gut. It’s instant, full-immersion, balls-deep, cold-sweat, wanting to throw up, run for cover, full-body terror prickling through his skin and screaming along his nerves from brain to toes and back again.

He snaps the band hard, and it helps, a little. The sting is something to focus on besides the smell and fear. Repeating that he’s home, holding the girls, helps. Holding the girls, feeling small bodies against his, and focusing on the way that feels, helps. Going outside, where he can’t smell it, that’s even better.

Outside, steaks, asparagus, clean air, little girls… He snaps the band again, forces himself to count to three between breaths. He makes himself slow down.

At Jimmy and Breena’s place, they have a laundry room. It’s off the garage, and there’s a door between it and the rest of the house. They have a second washer, too. That one lives in the garage. This is intentional. That was the make or break feature of any house they looked at. With their jobs, they needed a door between the laundry room and the rest of the house, and they needed a place where the worst of it could be washed before it even got into the house.

At Tim and Abby’s house, the washing machine and dryer are off the hall in the middle of the downstairs.

Tim going white as a sheet and breaking into a visible, cold sweat as soon as they stepped in the house, before they even got to hello, let Abby, Jimmy, and Breena know the logistics of this aren’t going to work at Tim’s place.

Tomorrow they’re at Jimmy and Breena’s. Tony and Ziva and the rest of them can come here.

It doesn’t matter that they stripped out of their clothing and wore coveralls, or that those coveralls are back at the tents. The smell is in their hair and skin. It snuck into their clothing while they changed. It seeped into their shoes and socks. It’s in Jimmy’s van, soaking into the upholstery, lingering in the air filters.

And now, it’s in Tim and Abby’s house.

They don’t try to comfort Tim. Having correctly diagnosed the problem, they know getting closer to him is the last thing they need to do.

They do get undressed, showered, scrubbed and scrubbed again. Jimmy sneaks downstairs, naked, and sees Tim on the back porch with the girls. Tim sees him naked, in the kitchen getting trash bags and baking soda. He’s not sure what Jimmy’s doing, but he’s obviously had a shower, so Tim flashes him a less than perfectly enthusiastic thumbs up.

Upstairs he goes, and Breena tucks all of the clothing, and the shoes, into the trash bag, and sprinkles the whole box of baking soda on them. Then they tie it shut, and stick it in three more layers of trash bags.

From there, Jimmy opens the window, and tosses it outside.

They get all the windows and doors open, and after a few minutes, Tim pops his head back in, and the house just smells like outside.

He grabs Anna, bringing her in to her Mama, and then Kelly, and Molly follows them in. “Dinner’s ready to go,” he says, brittle smile on his face, pretending them getting home didn’t set off a massive panic attack.

They let him, kissing him hello, with long hugs, and tickles and giggles for the girls. None of those smiles, or giggles reach their eyes, but it’s better than crying.
“Pretty flowers,” Abby says, as she’s snuggling Kelly, with her other arm around Tim.

He kisses her, and if everything else about this meal has a thin veneer of cheer over it, the kiss, and all the confusion and fear and relief and love, that’s real. “Happy Anniversary.”

She smiles, also real, and kisses him back. She remembers them saying to each other, last year, that the next one would be even better. It wasn’t. She says a quick prayer, and then whispers to him. “Next year will be better.”

He nods and kisses her again. “Starting tomorrow, it gets better.”

“Amen.”

They don’t talk about their day during dinner. That’s different. Usually, no matter how bad or gore-y, they can talk, but none of them wants to spend another minute in today if they can avoid it.

So they eat, and Tim tells them about the girls, and Vera and Hec, and that Rachel made it through okay. (He doesn’t mention why he called her, but they’re relieved he did.) He talks about calling Heather, and that she’ll be here in the morning, and he’ll get Anna and Molly to daycare, and then give Gibbs a call and see if he’s up for messing around on the house some.

That sounds like a good plan to the rest of the group.

They put girls to bed, and then they’ve got a few hours to fill.

That starts what will be their pattern for the next few weeks. Tim picks first. He grabs the lightest, fluffiest, silliest comedy he can find. Breena makes them popcorn. They settle onto the sofa, all wrapped into each other, and they watch the first five episodes of the Muppets.

And, like with the jokes in the morgue, they laugh too long, and they laugh too hard, and sometimes they have to make themselves laugh, but they do.

Between now and when The Morgue shuts down, they’ll binge watch every light comedy they’ve even heard was good. They’ll check out goofy kids’ movies, or rewatch old favorites.

Princess Bride night goes over well. The Incredibles and it’s sequel, just fine. Tim realizes that apparently, while he wasn’t paying attention, Minions developed into some sort of small yellow things that don’t exactly speak Spanglish. He’s not sure if he can think of his underlings the same anymore. They giggle maniacally at John Cusack movies from the ‘80s. Abby and Breena get them watching the fluffy teen romances they grew up on, which he and Jimmy don’t exactly love, but they’re not awful. (And they do match them one for one with Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles and Transformers movies.) Legally Blonde (and it’s sequels) is also surprisingly good, and they all really like, But, I’m a Cheerleader!

They buy themselves at least two hours of a night of goofiness, spent wrapped in each other, and that’s enough to get them grounded in the here and now to let them make love, and then sleep.
Next Steps

Chapter Notes

I tried to get this out Monday, alas, the universe conspired against me. Happy Late Birthday, Suzanna!

Eat, sleep, eat some more, sleep some more, make love, eat, sleep…

For Gibbs and Abbi, it’s been a very low-key collection of days.

It’s abundantly clear by the way he crashes as soon as Abbi’s home, that the only thing that had been keeping Gibbs moving forward was a need to get his people fed and out. Given how Abbi crashes, just as hard, it’s just as clear that duty and honor were the only things keeping her going forward, either.

Gibbs knows that Duck and Penny are in the house, too, though they don’t see much of them. He assumes (He knows he shouldn’t, but he’s too damn tired to investigate.) that they’re doing pretty much the same thing. A collection of plates he and Abbi didn’t get dirty, wash, or put back in the wrong place tells them that Duck and Penny get up at least on occasion and are eating, and that’s all they need to know.

This morning, Gibbs wakes up with the sun in his face, Abbi on his one side, the feel of her warm against his body, and her hair draped across his arm and chest. He sighs, rolls over, and snuggles in closer. She murmurs something unintelligible to him, patting the hand that’s wrapped around her chest, and they both drift off again.

Gibbs wakes up again, later, sun high enough it’s not streaming through the windows of the ‘girls’ room.’ (Ducky and Penny have the master bedroom. Gibbs’ knees might not be great, but he can get up and down off the mattress on the floor okay. He figures Ducky and Penny had more than enough of that in the Navy Yard, and since they don’t have to sleep on the floor, he’s not going to make them.) This time, the lady who’s attracting his attention is carefully biting on the shoulder of his t-shirt, and making a very plaintive, bored whine in his direction.

He blinks at Mona.

She whines back at him.

There is food in her bowl, water in the bowl next to it, and a doggy door leading to the outside. All of her basic needs are taken care of. He pats her a little, and tries to go back to sleep.

She keeps nudging his shoulder and whining at him.

Gibbs sits up, blinking, rubbing his eyes, listening. He doesn’t hear anything. He doesn’t smell anything. There’s nothing springing to mind for reasons why Mona would want him out of bed.

She gives him a big wet lick, and bounds off the mattress, (carefully jumping over Abbi, she’s allowed to keep sleeping in) to the door, and then stops, looking at him, signaling, follow me.

Gibbs rolls his eyes a bit, but he needs to ‘dehydrate,’ as he put it to Kate once, so he might as well find out what Mona wants.

While he’s taking care of his business, she’s getting him ready for some of her own. When he steps out of the bathroom, she’s waiting for him, and so are his sneakers. Mona looks up at him, big, eager doggy eyes, practically quivering at him with let’s go all over her face.

This would be the point where it occurs to Gibbs that he hasn’t been out of the house in... He’s not sure. And yes, he’s been in need of lots of naps and more food, Mona has not. She’s been laying around the house, mostly amusing herself (Though he’s got a suspicion that Ziva’s been by. He thinks he heard her voice yesterday, and more food showed up, that he knows he didn’t buy, so she probably made sure Mona got out for a bit.) and now she’s BORED.

Gibbs thinks about it. Yesterday, this would have been a complete no-go. Today… He’s tired. But he doesn’t feel like he just got off ninety-six hours straight on.

He pats Mona’s head. “Okay. Let me get dressed.” No matter how out of it he may be, he’s not going jogging (optimistic, walking) in… November (?) in his boxers and t-shirt.

Ziva has been over to Gibbs’ place. And she’s been to Tim’s. And, of course, right now, she’s living at Jimmy’s, so she’s seeing to everyone there, too.

As the only member of the extended family who wasn’t in the Navy Yard, she’s the only one who’s not currently spending twenty hours a day eating or sleeping.

Like Mona, she’s bored.

Getting people out of DC and food into it, that was fun, and better yet, important. Scouting routes, smuggling people, making sure no one was watching at the right moment, that was excellent. Her daily run of buying groceries and making food for sleeping people, that’s important, but somewhat less interesting, and even if she goes all out on it, still doesn’t take more than three hours.

Tony’s starting to bounce back, but he still gets tired too quickly, and he’s not precisely enthusiastic about going into DC to help with the cleanup operation. She doesn’t blame him for that, but she does wish she had something… bigger… to be doing.

Once again, she’s in a house full of sleeping people. Everything she needs to do today is done. So… now what?

She spends several minutes thinking about who is up, active, and ready to do something. Last she heard, Vance and Jarvis were both resting as hard as they can. She doesn’t know the General who’s currently running the cleanup of DC, or anyone at the Salvation Army or Red Cross, and going in on her own would freak Tony out.

There are things she could be doing, practical things, like trying to get into contact with their insurance agent, but all of the information for that is sitting in their apartment. So, that’s on hold until they go into town, which she doesn’t imagine is going to happen anytime soon.

The news says that DC is calmed down, but it’s not ‘safe.’ (Mostly ‘not safe’ means structurally unsound, but there are still gangs roving around and looting.) If they’re going to go in, they’re going to want to make sure they’ve got extra guns watching their back. Which means that trip’s going wait for at least Gibbs and Abbi up and moving around enough to keep eyes on them, or, better yet, for Jimmy to get back. (She’d really appreciate having someone else who’s actually healthy to keep eyes on them.)

So, that’s not an option, at least not in the next five minutes.

She’s poking at her computer, reading the news feed, feeling frustrated by the current situation, when an Op Ed about who is going to be paying for fixing everything up catches her eye.

Ziva grabs her phone and begin dialing.

Diane picks up on the second ring. “Anderson.”

“Do you need help?”

“God, yes! I need a full department.”

“What do you have?”

“A very keen seventeen-year-old, and Eric when he’s awake.”

Ziva winces. “What can I do?”

“I’ve got everything from a complete audit of the Federal Government, to an audit of DC, to trying to find cash to repair everything—”

“Aren’t you using the vote-buying money for that?”

Diane laughs, and it’s a dry, bitter sound, laced with frustration and malice. “Eight point nine billion dollars sounds like a lot of money until you’ve got a city almost bombed off the map. Just security, cleaning everything up, and say, rebuilding the hospitals and schools will burn all of it.”

Ziva’s mouth drops. “How is that even possible?”

“A state-of-the-art hospital can cost half a billion dollars all on its own. One’s a complete loss, and another is so trashed it might as well be. A good high school’ll run eighty to ninety, if not more, millions of dollars. Middle schools and elementary schools cost less, but we lost a bunch of them. If we follow the EPA guidelines for cleanup…” Diane groans. She has entire thumb drives filled with nothing but EPA cleanup-reg. (That’s what she’s got Emily doing, looking them all up and finding the one’s she’s got to deal with.) “It’s expensive. Between the old buildings that might have had lead in the paint or asbestos, the gas stations that burned, anywhere that did any sort of chemical work, anywhere that did any sort of radiology work… Your local chiropractor has an x-ray. His building burns. EPA says we can’t just cart the waste away, we’ve got to make sure it’s safe and properly handled and disposed of. You want to guess how many hundreds of x-rays were in DC? And that’s just the one thing… There are thousands of things… Everything from any sort of doctor’s office to paint stores… And they all have to be cleaned up properly. And, the longer things sit, the more mold we’re going to have, so there’s even more crap that needs hazmat containment. I know Jarvis is thinking of telling me to go blind and stupid just so we can get rebuilding before 2020, and I’m really tempted to do it.”

The idea that it might be four years before they can even begin rebuilding strikes Ziva as insane.

“Blind and stupid doesn’t sound bad to me, either.”

“Yeah, well, that’s until there’s no crab harvest two years from now because some unnamed crap leaks into the Chesapeake because I went blind and let them just cart the wreckage off.” Ziva can feel frustration pouring off of Diane. “I don’t even want to think about the wrongful death suits. Metro’s going to get sued into oblivion because of the shoot-on-sight order. IRS, EPA, and the FEC… Whatever’s left of the Federal Government is going to get crucified because they didn’t have enough security.” Diane sighs.

“What can I do?”

“It’s boring, but… I need someone to okay payments to haul-away companies. Some of them are coming in and cleaning up on goodwill, assuming we’ll make it right in the end. Some of them are asking for funding, but they aren’t actually doing any work. And the specialists, the guys who deal with hazmat situations, they aren’t budging until there’s 50% in the bank. They’re not betting their companies on the idea that we’ll pay up when all is said and done.”

“I’ve got a computer. Send me what you have, and I’ll get on it.”

“Thank you!”

And, yes, reading up on different companies, asking for proof that they are actually cleaning something up, and then getting account numbers and money transferred isn’t exciting, but it’s useful, and that makes being stuck in a house filled with sleeping people easier to deal with.

If he could have, Jarvis would have slept the first three days straight through.

But he can’t.

One day. That’s as much rest as he gets. He’s sure he looks like death warmed over; he certainly feels like it. He’s at Leon’s still, and using his house as the Executive Office of Jarvistan (as he calls it when he’s talking to his family or Leon) doing as much as he can with what little he has.

The job calls, so he answers.

It sounds fairly easy, get everything cleaned-up, then fix stuff, and rebuild. But cleaned-up means pulling out all the wreckage, it means finding a places to put the wreckage, and finding that place means dealing with the fact that niggly bits of inter-governmental cooperation, like DC paying Virginia to take it’s trash, have all fallen apart.

Fix stuff… That’s beyond a headache. 90% of the city burned, rioted, or both. Assuming he can call every building inspector back, he’s got forty-seven guys who have to check 90% of the city to see if it’s still structurally sound.

Half of the city still has power. The other half… They’ve still got to get the wreckage out of the way before the electric people can safely go in to get the power under control. (At least, that’s what his power guys are saying. His cleanup guys are saying they need to get the power taken care of before they can get the wreckage out. He’s trying to get them to team up and work together.)

His water processing is in Maryland. They claim everything is fine at their end, but obviously, because the water isn’t potable when it’s coming out of the tap, something’s FUBAR somewhere in the system. They’re ‘getting to the bottom of it.’

Rebuild… Physical rebuilding… DC has reams of regulations on how and why and when and where things can be built. On top of that, entire neighborhoods are gone, but if they’re going to be rebuilt, assuming the laws are followed, they’ll have to be rebuilt to historical landmark standards.
Infrastructure rebuilding… His tax base is gone. Somehow he needs money to do this, and the people who would be paying those taxes have all left the city. The ones that come back… Not like a lot filled with charred brick and melted glass can be assessed at ninety-seven million dollars for tax purposes.

Right now, he’s rubbing his temples, sipping coffee, (Usually he takes his black, but right now it’s filled with cream and sugar.) chewing on a cinnamon toothpick, (His quitting smoking plan is not going as well as he had hoped. Last time he did it, he wasn’t moving from insanely high stress to just wickedly high stress.) and staring at DC building codes.

If he relaxes the building codes, he’ll get more people back into the city, faster. If he keeps them in place, rebuilding will cost more and take longer, but those buildings will assess for higher values, resulting in more tax revenue for him down the road.

Assuming that people stick around long enough to wait for slow… Bigger businesses and enterprises will likely run off if they don’t have functional locations… Of course, if the new Congress decides to stay in New York, or resettle somewhere else, a lot of those big businesses might not come back at all, buildings up fast or not.

He pushes that aside. He’s not an economist and never intended to be one. There’s got to be someone who can run the numbers on this for him. He snorts, sure Diane’ll shoot him if he drops another number question on her.

“Yes, anything.”

James checks his watch. “Jake Malloy will be here in five minutes.”

Jarvis nods. “That’ll be worth it.” He stands up. “You want anything?”

James shakes his head.

Jarvis wanders to the kitchen, feeling off because it’s not his kitchen. He still doesn’t quite know where everything is, and he’s trying his best to not mess everything up. When Vance and his family get back, he wants them to be able to find their stuff, again.

As soon as Lara and the kids got home, Leon loaded everyone up into the van, and off they went. Beyond a few texts to let him know they’re okay, Jarvis doesn’t know where they are, and he doesn’t blame them for getting away.

He’d do it himself, except he can’t. He’s got to be here. And ‘here’ would be even better if it was in DC. His wife is looking for a place for them, in the city, in move-in condition, that he can ‘run things from.’ Like any good political spouse, she’s a class A scrounger, and if there’s anywhere in the city that’ll meet their needs, she’ll find it, but he’s not sure it exists. Not anymore.

He sets his cup on the island in the middle of the kitchen, pours more milk into his cup, as well as a little coffee. The fact that he’s stuck here, running some sort of detail eighteen hours a day, barely seeing his wife and kids, having to oversee all of this is part of why he didn’t want this job. The Mayor of DC should be doing this, or the Chief of Police or… anyone else.

But they didn’t. And he did. He rubs his eyes again, they’re feeling achy; he probably needs new glasses. He takes a sip of his coffee, reaches for the sugar, but doesn’t grab it. Lots of small, healthy meals, that’s what the Doctor said to do, assuming he didn’t want to immediately put his lost weigh back on, and another fifty or a hundred pounds on top of it.
Apparently, one of the side effects of almost starving is once you start getting to eat again, your body decides that it is never, ever going to starve again, so every calorie you are not immediately burning (and it will do everything it can to not burn any of them) will be packed into fat. He’s got to keep eating, so that his body doesn’t decide it’s in any danger of starving, but do it in a low enough calorie way that he doesn’t turn into the Stay-Puft Marshmallow Man.

And since he’s on TV all the goddamned time, he can’t get fat. Jarvis growls a little at that, right now he’d happily get fat if it meant he could have a real, full, sit-down meal instead of ten snacks a day, but he’s got to project his ‘image.’ He sits on one of the high stools around the island, and helps himself to an orange.

He hears the doorbell, and then James is answering it.

“I’m in here,” he calls out.

James leads Malloy and his wife into Vance’s kitchen. “Mr. Malloy, Agent Bishop, good morning.”

Jake nods. “Morning, sir,” Ellie says.

Jake eyes Jarvis, and James, and the house they’re in. Jarvis knows that, before the Navy Yard, the only time Jake had ever shot a gun was ‘guy time’ with Ellie’s dad and brothers in Oklahoma. And he knows the way Jake is watching the place now. He’s checking for exits, looking for threats, and, possibly, making sure there’s enough food.

Jarvis does it every time he goes into a new building, now, too.

“Can I get you anything?” Jarvis asks. He gestures to the kitchen around them, filled with food. “We’ve got… anything. When she got home and saw me, my wife decided I needed every kind of food possible within hand’s reach.”

(That’s almost exactly what Ziva did as soon as she got them to Palmers’. They all crashed. She cleaned the ruined food out of the fridge, and then bought anything that might have been even remotely appealing at the grocery store.)

“Coffee,” Jake says, starting to relax.

Jarvis nods to the other stools around the island, as he gets up to grab a cup for Jake.

Ellie winces a little, settling on one of the stools. “Doesn’t taste right to me anymore. Is that… Do things taste weird to you, too?”

Jarvis hands Jake a mug, and pours the coffee, leaving a good inch at the top for Jake to doctor it how he likes it. “Oatmeal,” he says to Ellie. “Never eating that again.”

She nods, too. Hot oatmeal on a cold morning, bit of maple syrup and butter, used to be her comfort breakfast, but she doesn’t think she can make herself swallow it, now. “Stew. That’s another one. I know Elaine did everything she could with that, but… mystery meat in broth… Never again.” Then she spies the fruit bowl, and helps herself to a pear. Though that’s not exactly what she means by tasting weird. A lot of foods just taste off to her.

Jarvis and Jake nod along with that. Henceforth, all meals with meat will involve meat from some form of specific, named, domestic animal that was raised for the purpose of being eaten. Pigeon, squirrel, chipmunk, crow, and whatever the hell sort of fish those things were are never going on the menu again.
“So, you wanted to chat?” Jake asks as he sips his coffee. (Which tastes just fine to him. More intense than he remembers it, but he went from six cups a day, to none, and is easing back up to about two.)

“Yes.” Jarvis flashes a small smile. “In December, the rest of what’s left of the country will be voting for representation in the new Congress. Obviously, we will not be in any shape to vote by December. However, each state has the power to appoint two senators.”

“DC isn’t a state,” Jake says.

“Which is why you’re here. I understand what’s left of Congress has been fans of your blog. We are going to try to get statehood before exploring becoming an independent country. I’d like to put you in charge of heading up a delegation to go to New York and get us that statehood. Once that’s been achieved, I’ll name you one of our first two Senators. We’ll get Congressmen by the next election cycle.”

“In two years?” Ellie’s voice is making it clear that she thinks that’s an overly optimistic timeframe.

“I hope so,” Jarvis replies. “Realistically, four. But, if we’re lucky, people will move back sooner rather than later.”

“What sort of delegation?” Jake asks.

Jarvis shakes his head. “The details are up to you. It’s not much, especially at New York prices, but you’ve got a four million dollar budget for the next year. That’s to get you and whoever up to New York. You set up an official embassy. Work Congress. Get us statehood. If you don’t have a vote set on it by the end of the year, we’ll go independent.”

Jake glances to Ellie; she looks back at him.

“You’re talking about relocating,” Jake says.

“Yes. And if they move out of New York, I expect you to follow.”

Jake can guess what Jarvis isn’t saying. “A year is about as much money as the city has, isn’t it?”

“Less. Creative financing, you don’t need to know about, will get us to ten or so months, and with any luck, by that point we’ll be part of the United States, and getting FEMA money.”

“The vote buying money?” Jake asks.

“That’s not the creative financing part of it,” Jarvis replies.

Ellie winces. “Creative.”

“Pulling the gold out of the teeth of the skeletons in the closet.”

Jake and Ellie decide that Jarvis is right, they don’t need to know.

Jarvis can see they both need to talk. “Have your chat. Think about it. Agent Bishop, you are welcome to be part of the delegation, or go as a spouse. I know NCIS will, assuming it still exists, have a place for you when you return, and if you stay here, near DC, I will find something for you to do until NCIS is up and running again.”
Jake and Ellie are back in Jimmy’s car, key in the ignition, not going anywhere as they stare at each other.

“Well…” Jake starts, tentative.

“It be a good move, for you.” He’s been at loose ends since they broke ties with the NSA, and this would very much be the end of that.

“Is it a good move, for you?” he asks.

Ellie shrugs. “Would I be there as a delegate or as Mrs. Malloy?”

Jake’s face grows tense as he thinks through it. “It would look like nepotism if you’re a delegate.”

“And it’d be boring if I went as a spouse.”

“If your suspicion for why everything tastes ‘off’ is right, ten months of boring might be just the ticket.” They don’t know, yet, not for sure, but there’s better than even odds that baby Bishop-Malloy is in the works. ‘Pack for a week.’ She had nine days left on her birth control pills, no problem, right? They ran out of scrounged condoms long before they ran out of the need for comfort and a few minutes of not being hungry or scared.

She glares at him. “Do I look like the kind of lady who lays back, gets fat, and knits doilies when she’s pregnant?”

“I think you crochet them.” It’s a joke. Not a great one, but that’s part of who he is. When he doesn’t know what the next move is, he makes jokes.

“All the more reason I’d be bad at it, then.”

“You could work on your political spouse smile.” He smiles, wide, bright, plastic, when he says it.

“Just shoot me now.”

“On the upside, it’s an appointed position, so it’s not like you’d have to campaign.”

A sound reminiscent of ‘yuck’ issues out of Bishop.

“What do you want to do, Ellie? Between what I did on this case, and all the fallout, I can be happily writing books and litigating until the end of time. Congressman King’s offer is on the table, too.”

“His offer involves the exact same issue, you go to New York, do useful important things and I… go with you and sit on my ass, or stay here and… wait for NCIS to start up again, sitting on my ass.”

“It’s a very pretty ass, and sitting on it doesn’t show it off much, so obviously, we must do what we can to avoid that outcome.”

That one finally gets a chuckle out of her. And an eye roll. “I don’t know what I want to do. Not be apart.”

He nods. “That’s a good baseline. Wherever the next step is, we go together.”

“Okay. If you take King’s offer, there’ll still be time for Senate seats and the rest of it, after.”
He nods. “I don’t think I’d be good at it, though. He wants me as a prosecutor for the vote-selling cases. I haven’t done any sort of criminal or trial law, ever.”

She agrees, but with a kind smile on her face. “He wants you there to make things look good.”

“Which is why Jarvis wants me up there asking, ‘Pretty please, can we be a state?’”

“As least with that one, you’ve already been working in that direction.” He’s written a lot over the last month, and statehood for DC, Puerto Rico, Guam, any other US Territories, and any Indian Reservations that want it, is part of what he’s written about.

“On that one, I’ve got bona fides and know my ass from my elbow.” He stares out the window at Vance’s house. “They’ve got ships in New York. The Navy has a presence. DiNozzo had you doing analyst stuff before. Come with me, and when that gets started up again, be his long-distance analyst, and he can go find someone else to kick in doors and get shot at.”

Ellie thinks about that, and then nods. “We’ll talk about it when we get back to Palmers’.”

“That looks interesting,” Tony says when he looks over Ziva’s shoulder at lines and lines of numbers. “You on a case? Wrapping up an old one?”

“I am on a case, sort of.” She pushes back from Breena’s dining room table and kisses Tony.

After a moment, he breaks the kiss and sits next to her. “Tell me about this case.”

She smiles at him, happy to see him looking interested in something. Like Jethro, as soon as the need to run people out of DC vanished, he hit a wall and hit hard. For a full day, the only reason he woke up was to eat or go to the bathroom.

“This one, right now, is the case of the junk hauling company that isn’t.”

He glances from the screen, to her, and back to the screen.

“They want to be paid 50% down, for a bill of $500,000, to haul away junk and dispose of it properly. They claim to have all the necessary certifications. They have a very nice website. They have good reviews. They do not have any financials. I can’t find any history on the company. None of the people reviewing them appear to actually exist. From what I can tell, this company has only been around for two days, and only exists online.”

“I take it you’re not sending them $250,000.”

“I do not intend to.”

“Do I want to know how you got your hands on this kind of work?”

“Diane.”

Tony nods at her. “Of course.” He stands back up and goes to the kitchen to get himself a muffin. A minute later, he sits down next to her again, nibbling on a blueberry-bran muffin. “I’ve been thinking.”

“Okay.”
“Today, maybe tomorrow, whenever Jethro and Abbi want to go, let’s get to our place, grab our insurance information, document everything, get everything sent in, and then get out of here. You, me, somewhere warm and pretty. We’ll figure out what to do next. Our insurance company will have time to do whatever it does, hopefully send us a great big check. Vance and the Feds’ll have some time to figure out if we even have jobs anymore. And by the time we get back, we’ll know what we’re doing.”

Part of her thinks that sounds great. Beach time, for both of them, would be a good thing. Time for just the two of them is going to be awfully scarce, soon. And healing up time, physically and mentally, would be a very good thing for him.

Part of her, the part that didn’t get burnt out inside of DC, feels like she’s freeloading if she’s not doing more to help.

“This warm place. It needs to have internet access so I can spend some time on this.”

“Not more than four hours a day?” Tony half-says, half-asks. Part of the idea of this is to be together. If she’s going to spend it glued to a computer saving the day back in DC, they can do that, here.

“While you rest or watch movies.”

That’s more than good enough for him. He can feel she’s edgy, not feeling like she’s doing enough, but he’s done all the enough he can right now.

He kisses her. “Any particular warm place you have a hankering for?”

“Southern Italy? On the coast? Beaches, warm…” She feels an ice cream craving start up. “Gelato? Maybe Sicily or Sardinia?”

He grins at that. “I will find us a warm place with plenty of gelato.”

Ziva kisses him as she gets up, heads into the kitchen, and rummages around in the freezer looking for the pistachio gelato.

---

For Sam Allan, staying at Dr. Palmer’s house feels very odd.

He almost feels like he’s snooping.

Part of trying to keep work life and home life separate is that he and Jimmy don’t talk, too much, about who they are outside of work. They do some, can’t talk at least some about it. But, for the most part, if they’re talking about something personal, they’re light topics. Like his explorations of DC, or Dr. Palmer’s somewhat weekly martial arts workout/house building adventures, or what sort of music they like.

Light topics like that.

But he’s actually living in the man’s home right now, which automatically means pushing in a lot deeper than he’d ever wanted to, or for that matter, than Dr. Palmer may have wanted, either.

It’s the pictures he can’t keep away from. He should. It’s really not any of his business. But, especially late at night, when everyone else is asleep, he feels pulled toward them.
He assumes Mrs. Palmer is the one who likes to put pictures all over the place, and keeps albums of them, because Dr. Palmer doesn’t have that many strewn around work. Of course, he also might not have that many up at work because people come to the morgue to identify bodies, and a large collection of cheery shots of home might be off-putting for mourners.

There are framed shots of the four of them, Dr. Palmer (who, with each hour in his home, looking at the photos is harder and harder not to think of as Jimmy), Mrs. Palmer, and their girls. There are shots of the girls alone, and a few of the baby who was stillborn. (Sam doesn’t know his name, and hasn’t thought to ask Ziva or Tony, who do.) Some are formal. Some are clearly candid shots, taken by the rest of the family. There are collections of shots of people he assumes are Mrs. Palmer’s family. A few of a woman, who, by the curly hair and glasses, Sam assumes is Dr. Palmer’s mother. There are a lot of the people he thinks of as the ‘Gibbs clan.’

And there are a lot of shots of the McGees, on their own, and with the Palmers.

He wonders about that. There are just as many pictures of Kelly on the fridge as there are of Molly or Anna. (Someone who hasn’t seen Jimmy and Breena, or doesn’t know much about DNA, would assume all three girls are Jimmy and Breena’s.) There are shots of Director and Mrs. McGee on the mantle, along with the rest of the ‘immediate’ family shots.

He’s sleeping in what he thinks is Mrs. Palmer’s office. At least, it feels more like her than him, and there is a lot of funeral home related information and business in there. She has pictures of her parents, sisters, and her kids in there. She got shots of Dr. Palmer, and her and Dr. Palmer. And a shot of Director McGee and Mrs. McGee. A shot of the four of them at a lake somewhere, all standing together, arms wrapped around each other has pride of place. It’s a selfie, taken by Director McGee, just to the left of her computer, where she’d look if she’s glancing away from the computer.

One other shot keeps catching his eye. It’s Dr. Palmer and Director McGee, on the back porch. It must be from earlier on in the summer, because McGee’s still in a cast. Dr. Palmer’s sitting across one of the lounges, and McGee’s in front of him, sitting on the porch, shirt mostly unbuttoned, collar pulled wide to leave his right trapezius exposed, and Jimmy’s hand is resting on his shoulder.

It’s… to a visitor who knows that Dr. Palmer adores his wife… an innocent shot. A doctor helping a hurt friend with some muscle work. (Sam knows about the continuing education that Dr. Palmer did in rehab this summer. He even helped with a little of it.) As a kid who grew up gay in very conservative Iowa, he sees a lot of layers to that shot.

It’s little things, like the position of Dr. Palmer’s finger on Director McGee’s collar bone. There’s a sense of tenderness he gets from that placement that doesn’t go with just helping a buddy out. Or the fact that Director McGee’s other shoulder just casually rests against the inside of Dr. Palmer’s thigh. That makes sense, given the position, but again, it’s much more relaxed than he’d expect.

Sure, Dr. Palmer’s a doctor and medical examiner, so he can’t be especially nervous or hung up about touching people, but that’s more intimacy than he’d expect from two married, straight guys.

He’s had a theory as to what’s going on with Dr. Palmer and Director McGee, spurred on by the “burn” that is most likely a tattoo, and if that shot had been tucked away in Jimmy’s phone or hidden in his bedside table, he’d consider that theory confirmed.

But, sitting here, in his wife’s office, right next to the shot of all four of them...

He doesn’t know what to think.

Other than, it’s probably time for him to see about getting a place of his own to stay.
He pokes his head out of Mrs. Palmer’s office when he hears feet thump down the steps and waits for a moment as Tony and Ziva chat with each other. It’s clear, from their conversation, that they want a place of their own, too.

Once he’s sure they’ve moved on from romantic get-awaying, he heads to the kitchen, making enough noise to let them know he’s up, too.

“Hey, Allan,” Tony calls out.

“Good morning” he says, sitting down at the dining room table, a muffin and coffee of his own in hand. “Did I hear you talking about going back into the city?”

Tony nods. “You want to check out your place?”

“I checked online. I know it’s still standing. Wouldn’t mind getting back, grabbing some more clothing, figuring out how long I’m going to be homeless.”

“We should take Jake and Bishop, too,” Ziva adds.

“Where are they? Getting some quality ‘alone time’ in?” Tony didn’t remember hearing them when he was upstairs, but that doesn’t mean much.

Ziva gives him a quick poke. “They left to see Jarvis about an hour ago.”

Tony exhales, loud, shaking his head. “That can’t be good.”

“Last night, Agent Bishop said he wanted to talk to them about an assignment for Jake,” Sam doesn’t have any problems calling the people he doesn’t work with by their first names, though he can see Tony’s irked by his referring to everyone else by title.

“Wheels within wheels.” Tony says, “Though that’s making me think I should give Vance a call, see how long it’ll be before we’re back up and running.”

“I’d think it would have to wait for the election. Right now we don’t have any legitimate authority to do what we’re doing,” Allan replies.

“People keep dying though, and it’s our job to find out why.”

“It is. Though… are we Jarvis’ personal investigative service now? Some of the Navy and Marines are reporting to him, and the rest stayed with the National Guard. Who are we even serving?” Ziva asks.

Tony nods, slowly. “Sunny beaches, warm breezes, and all the ice-cold gelato you can eat. I don’t even want to stick my toes into trying to answer your questions, and I do not want to be Jarvis’ personal investigator. I did that once, and that was more than enough.”

Allan glances between them, waiting to see if either of them will elaborate, but they don’t, so he says, “Maybe, once Agent Bishop and Jake get back, we can see about going into town?”

Tony nods at that. “I’ll give Gibbs a call, see if he and Abbi are game.”
“Jethro, if it is safe enough for you and Abbi to go in, to say nothing of Ziva, then it is safe enough for Penny and me to go, too.”

“Besides, there’s no reason why we should make multiple trips. In once, grab everyone’s stuff, and then out,” Penny adds.

Which is how Jethro ended up driving lead car (truck) in a small caravan, with Penny and Ducky behind him in the cab, heading into the city.

They’re still armed, and still keeping close watch, but the sense that someone will jump out, tip the truck, and try to make off with everything they have has abated quite a bit.

Google has done a very good job of keeping up with which roads are open, and which ones are blocked by rubble. It’s got updates for where cleanup crews are working. It’s also telling them that the six mile long circle that will take them from Allan’s apartment to Jake and Bishop’s place, to Penny’s to Tony and Ziva’s house, and then out by Tony and Ziva’s apartment will take them four hours to drive.

If they weren’t hoping to take stuff out, Jethro would suggest they walk it.

But they are hoping to grab things, as much as if left to grab.

The road to the apartment building Allan rented a one bedroom out of is blocked at both ends. On the west, a less sound building had already collapsed, resulting in a mound bricks and broken detritus taller than Ducky. To the east there’s a line of nine cars, parked into a wall formation, blocking the street.

Anyone who wanted to get in would have been an excellent target.

“You have military neighbors?” Jethro asks Allan as they slowly pick their way between the cars.

He shrugs. “Not that I knew of.” He points up. “Six floors in my building, and who knows who was across the street.”

Abbi nods at the across the street building. There’s two windows that have been knocked out of the top floor. “I think that’s your strategist.”

“Could have been. Hope they’re not feeling trigger happy today,” Allan says.

Gibbs shakes his head. “I’d feel it if someone was watching. We’re alone here.”

Tony takes up position on top of one of the cars, his rifle very visible, and ready. He wants Ziva in his sight, but she’s back with their convoy with Jake and Bishop, making sure no one tries anything with Penny and Ducky. “Yeah, well, just because your gut’s happy, doesn’t mean mine is. In and out, fast. I don’t like us in the open like this.”

Allan picks up his pace. The door to the building is broken, probably so people can get in and out, it’s an electric one that slides open when it senses someone in front of it, and he’s in a part of town with no power. “No elevator.”

“How far up are you?” Abbi asks.
“Forth floor.”

Abbi nods to Gibbs, and he takes up a watching position at the doors, and Allan leads her up to his place.

It’s bizarrely unreal to unlock his door, open it, and see everything looking almost exactly the way it did when he left almost a month ago.

It doesn’t smell the same. It reeks of smoke. The food in his fridge and pantry is fetid, growing a collection of unspeakable molds, and swarming with flies. But, once he airs out and cleans up, he’s back to where he was before. Allan cracks all of his windows open to help with the airing out part of this. He grabs more clothing, his personal information and computer, bags up the rotting food for disposal, douses his kitchen in bleach, and is ready to go. Maybe twenty minutes all told.

That leaves the hour and a half it will take to go three quarters of a mile to get to Bishop and Jake’s.

---

Forty seconds. That’s how long it takes them to decide that attempting to go into their building is stupid.

Their street burned. The trees are vertical stacks of charcoal, waiting for a strong wind to knock them over. The cars parked along both sides of the streets are charred wrecks. Between Ellie remembering where they parked, and wiping soot off of what was left of three license plates, they were able to get shots of what was left of their Prius. Several of the buildings went up, completely gone. Theirs is still standing. It’s an old building, brick walls and iron beams. Not very flammable. Looks like those beams got hot enough to slump, though, because while their building is standing, it’s also listing about ten degrees shy of vertical.

Ellie’s tempted to try and get in. She just wants a few things. Their wedding album, the OU shot glass this cocky young law student sat down in front of her, and said, “Every other guy in this room is trying to get you drunk and in bed. But I’ve noticed something, you don’t get drunk.” He flipped it, bottom up. “How about, instead of trying to get you drunk and into bed, we dance and talk until you like me enough to try it sober…”, her mom and grand mom’s recipe collection. Just, stupid little things that she loves.

Gibbs shakes his head. That building is probably stable enough to handle Ellie walking through it. But he really doesn’t want to be wrong about that.

Jake looks relieved when he says no.
Ducky and Penny’s next. If it wasn’t for the litter, broken windows, and missing doors, their neighborhood would look like it always does. No fire touched here. The trees are still brown. Their condos are still red brick. The flowers planted around the bases of the trees are still sunny yellow and dark purple.

The fact that they’re all wearing boots, because the ankle-deep drifts of broken glass along the curbs would cut their legs to shreds if given the shot, says all that needs to be said about the neighborhood not being the same anymore.

Ducky and Penny do have power. Not that that’s easy to tell. Most of the lights are broken. The first two switches they flip don’t turn anything on. It’s only the clock over the stove, still showing the correct time that lets them know they still have power.

It takes every ounce of control Ducky has to not start railing against the lack of humanity that did this. His records, her books, their things were destroyed. He could understand people stealing them. Taking them to enrich themselves, but… He’s standing over a framed shot of his parents. The glass is shattered and the frame stomped, mauling it from a circle to an oval. That frame is silver. It has value, independent of the emotional value he attaches to the picture of his parents’ wedding day inside of it.

And it was broken just for spite.

Penny’s standing in their bedroom, cursing, loudly, at whoever did this to them, as she gently shakes glass shards off of photos.

He takes two steps over to her, and kisses her shoulder. He tries a quick smile, but it comes off more angry than comforting. Then he looks at the shot in her hand.

“Oh. I’d glad we still have that one.” The smile at seeing that picture undamaged is real. “That’s one of my favorites of you.” It’s Penny, in the late seventies, smiling straight at the camera, wearing a halter top, arms raised, resting against her head. A glamour shot of sorts, because she’s starkly beautiful in that shot, though she’s not wearing much makeup, nor is her hair especially well done.

She smiles gently at that, and the shot. “Nelson’s, too.”

“He took it?”

“Yeah. When it came back, he looked at it and said, ‘This is what you look like, to me, all the time.’”

“That’s why you kept it?” She doesn’t have a whole lot of pictures of herself. Lots of family shots, and books of places she visited and enjoyed, but not many of herself, let alone ones that she’s kept framed and on display.

“Yes.”

“I’m glad. I love this shot, too.”

Tony drifts over to look, and his eyes widen at the photo. Ducky thinks that look is not pure delight, and he’s sure he knows why, but Tony covers it well. “Oh, wow. That’s you?”

Penny shoots him a wry look. “Once upon a time, I was middle-aged.”

“Not in that photo, you aren’t!”

Then she laughs. “That’s the year Tim was born. I assure you, I’m past forty in that picture.”

“Oh huh, tell me another one!” Tony chides her, getting her laughing, making them think less about what’s been lost.

They take longer than twenty minutes because they are not coming back here. Most of what they rescue are photographs, a few books, several of Penny’s publications, and both of Ducky’s records that weren’t crushed, one golf club, and as much clothing as survived.

An entire home reduced to three boxes of mostly photographs.

Three boxes is an improvement over Tony and Ziva’s house. With the help of the GPS, they’re able to figure out which one of the charred ruins is their charred ruin, and they take pictures.
“DiNozzos! Oh, I am happy to see you!” Tony and Ziva get huge hugs from Mrs. Elthel, the lady who runs the deli on the first floor of their building. “I didn’t see you, and I was afraid. I knew you were in one of those buildings…” she continues to talk about what happened to several of the Federal Buildings while sweeping out her store.

“Did you stay?” Tony can’t believe she stayed. She’s round and plump as always.

“Ptthb… These…” she edits herself, shaking her head. “My parents would roll in their graves if they knew they had run me off. They made it through the battle of Stalingrad. This…” She shrugs, indicating the fall of DC was no big deal. She flashes Tony a smile. “Russian Jews… We always know where to hide when the going gets bad. The sub-basement. Food, power, running water. Had to boil the water, but still. You never know when you’ll need a panic room.”

Tony and Ziva just stare at her.

“Your apartment should be okay. I didn’t have a number for you, or I would have called. Hendersons and Guthries are already back. They’re talking about calling those… crime scene cleaners, right?”

Tony nods, slowly.

“They figure they’d be up for the smoke damage, and if all of you went in at once, you’d be able to get a better deal on it.” She waves to the door that leads to the first floor. “Have a chat.”

Everything’s the same. Except for the smoke damage. And all in all, it’s really not that bad. Tony’s fairly sure they don’t actually need more than a good cleaning and maybe some of that fabric deodorizer stuff.

It boggles his mind. Right now, in his apartment, nothing changed. All they’ve got to do is clean out the fridge, spray a boat load of Febreeze around the place, remember not to drink the water, and they’re… fine.

Their house is gone, but here… Nothing changed.

He starts to laugh, just at the sheet stupid fucking meaninglessness of it.

Gibbs clasps a hand over his shoulder, well aware that that’s not just mildly amused laughing.

Ziva’s going through their stuff, grabbing what they need for right now. She’s still thinking a week or two off somewhere warm, and then hopefully, by then, Tony’ll be healed up enough to do something other than rest.

She gives the Hendersons a spare key, and a check to cover their part of the cleaning.

It’s almost dinner by the time they get done, and, as they’re heading out of the city, Gibbs is thinking they should be going to the Diner.

But there’s no Diner to go to. He got a call from Elaine yesterday, letting him know that her family is coming up today. For all he knows, by now, they’re gone, heading to North Carolina, maybe never coming back.

Gibbs doesn’t like thinking about that.

His family is here. Almost. Got to get the McPalmer branch back, but… If they need downtime, he understands. Tony and Ziva have talked about getting away for a bit, and he can see the appeal. Maybe he and Abbi’ll get away, too. Let Penny and Duck have some alone time of their own.

Get Semper aired out and cleaned up, and go out… Though November isn’t the best month ever to be sailing the Atlantic.

Abbi squeezes his hand, seeing he’s thinking, feeling hard right now.

He flashes her a half smile, and then catches sight of a place. He’s never eaten there before, but it’s open, and looks like the kind of place that’ll be able to seat nine.

“So, what are the plans?” Tony asks once they’ve all got their dinner. “Jarvis come up with something juicy for you?”

Ellie and Jake glance at each other, and she decides to speak. “Yeah. He did.” She nudges Jake. “Meet the DC Ambassador to the US Congress.”

“He offered to have me set up a group of people to head up and get us statehood,” Jake downplays that with his voice, but the more he thinks about it, the more he likes that idea, and the prouder it makes him. “Actually… Dr. Langston, since you travel in those sorts of circles, but aren’t actually part of any active political group, would you like to be part of the delegation?”

Penny’s very pleased by that offer, and that also answers an issue she and Ducky have been dealing with. They know they aren’t moving back to inside of DC. They’ve been planning on moving their full time residence to the house on the Potomac. But, a lot of building has to happen between now and then, and neither of them love the idea of living with Gibbs and Abbi for the intervening months.

She glances at Ducky, but he’s smiling, so she knows he’s okay with the idea.

“Yes. I would. It’ll be interesting to see how this all shakes out. When are we going?”

“As soon as you and I can find two other delegates to go. It’d be great if we can get it done before the election, but realistically, we’re looking at working the next Congress.”

“I take it you’re taking a leave of absence from NCIS, then?” Tony asks Bishop.

She shrugs. “I can do my analyst work from anywhere. All I need is a computer and access. And you and Draga can probably handle the in person stuff between now and hiring someone else.”

Tony inclines his head at that. It’d be one thing if they were still mostly dealing with murder investigations and the like, but most of what they do now are multi-year long terrorism cases where they pull threads out of the tapestry and follow where they lead.
“How about you, Sam?” Ducky asks.

“Rest. Regain weight. Probably take a week off, and then back at it. They’re going to need MEs for a long time to come. You got the call, too right?”

Ducky nods. “Yes. But in a case like this, where talent will be coming in from all over the world, I don’t think my old eyes will be needed.” Everyone at the table knows that’s code for Ducky too needs more time resting and healing up. Ducky’s been old for a long time, but now, he’s starting to look frail, too, and that worries Gibbs and Penny, both of them are in favor of him getting a good long chunk of time to rest and heal.

Sam continues on, “Once my part of town has power again, I’ll head back and then see what I can do. If NCIS gets going again, I’ll return to my day job, but until then, I can assist with dealing with the dead as well as anyone, and better than most. Agents DiNozzo?”

“Day after tomorrow, we’re on a plane. Day after that, beaches and gelato, here we come!” Tony replies. “I’ll hunt down Vance—“

“Jarvis is at his place, but he isn’t. He and his family got away,” Ellie says.

“Then he can hunt us down. As Allan pointed out, we don’t exactly have a Navy to serve right now, so this looks like vacation time to me.”

“Gibbs? Abbi?” Ziva asks.

They just glance at each other. Plans for the immediate future are as of yet, unclear. Abbi shrugs a bit. “I need to start getting my sandbox back in order. Check in with everyone. Just because the Navy and the Marines are upside down doesn’t mean the Coast Guard stopped working.”

“Back to the grind tomorrow?” Tony asks.

“Not sure about that, gotta see if my grinding equipment is even functional, but that’s the idea,” Abbi answers.

“Have any of you heard from Dr. Palmer? I talked to him three days ago, and Director McGee had made it back to them, but that’s the last I heard,” Allan says.

“Probably resting then,” Ducky says. “I can’t imagine they’ll stay away for much longer. Not with the call for Medical Examiners having gone out.”

“I’ll give them a call tomorrow morning,” Gibbs says. “Check in.”

“If the Palmers come back, we can go to the McGees’ house. You said Elaine and her family headed south today, right?” Gibbs nods at that. “We can let them have some time on their own; I’m sure they’d want that by now,” Bishop says.

Abbi, Ziva, Tony, Gibbs, Duck and Penny all glance at each other at that.

“I would imagine they’d come back together,” Ducky says.

“And would likely stay together as long you five still need a place to stay,” Penny adds.

Bishop looks like that’s crazy; she and Jake can’t wait to have a place of their own again, but since it doesn’t involve her having to find yet another new place to live, she’s fine with it.

Ducky doesn’t miss the way Allan listens to that, or the fact that he caught the look going between the rest of them.

He also, from weeks of working with the man, has not missed the fact that Sam Allan is very smart, and very good at keeping his thoughts and suspicions to himself. Ducky makes a mental note to give Jimmy a call, and soon, because the likelihood of Dr. Allan not figuring out what’s going on with the four of them is minimal.
The plan, if it could be said that they have a plan, might be for Tim to do the heavy lifting on taking care of the three of them while they’re out and about, neck deep in desolation and death, it’s also true that Jimmy’s doing some taking care of Tim.

He’s shaving as Tim’s drying off, both of them done with the washing up part of the morning shower.

“Let’s get your weight,” Jimmy says.

Though they have a scale, Tim doesn’t use it all that much. Pants are comfy, he’s good. Pants are too tight, it’s time to cut down on the sugar. Pants are too lose, time to add a bit more sugar.

Granted, right now, he’s wearing Jimmy’s pants, and they’re still too loose, and getting back to the size he wants to be is likely going to be more complicated than adding an extra cookie (or three) for desert with each meal and having a drink with dinner.

Jimmy, on the other hand, does weigh himself every day. If he’s off by more than a pound a day, that’s a signal to keep closer watch on his sugar levels. He’s also, for the same reason, very good at keeping tight control of what he eats, how much he weighs, his body fat percentage and all the rest of it.

So, Tim stops drying himself and steps on. “163.4”

“Good. I want you doing that every day, and keeping a record.”

“One you can see?”

“That would be nice. Google Docs or something.”

“Okay. What’s my target?”

Jimmy puts his glasses on and looks at the scale, which also tells body fat percentage. “No more than three pounds a week, and I don’t want to see you at more than 15% body fat.”

“This really necessary?”

Jimmy just looks at him.

“Okay. You going to tell me what to eat?”

“Probably. You’re still making dinner for us, so I’ll give you portion size help on that. But right now, I’m thinking the target is five two hundred-ish calorie snacks between a real breakfast, and a bigger but still small dinner. You’re going to the house today, right?”

“That’s the idea.”

“I’ll pack food for you.”

Tim makes breakfast for them, and gets the girls fed while Abby and Breena get their showers, and Jimmy packs everyone’s lunches.

His involves way more food than he was expecting, but all of it is healthy, a lot of veggies and nuts, some cheese, a bit of fruit, leftover grilled chicken, a hard-boiled egg, (no cookies, that gets some mental pouting) all of it packed up into five little baggies.

When Jimmy hands it over he says, “Every two hours, you eat one of those. You get hungry in between, I’ll up your calories more for tomorrow, but make sure you’re genuinely hungry, and not just eating to munch on something.”

Tim nods at that. He’s also got a lot of bottled water. “All the water I can drink?”

“Good plan. Herbal tea if you want, too. No caffeine. Take it easy today. Just being awake all day’ll be more work than you’ve done in a while.”

“I’ll get a nap if I need one.”

“Good. Don’t forget to eat. Don’t scarf down two of them at once and go four hours without food. Your metabolism is shot, and we’re going to get it working again.”

Tim nods slowly at that, and wipes mushed carrots off of Anna’s chin.

The early part of the morning, getting everyone showered, dressed, and fed, that’s pretty hectic. They’ve got a good system for it, Team A in charge of getting little girls cleaned up and dressed while Team B gets themselves cleaned up and dressed, and then swapping baby wrangling as they get washed up and dressed while B gets breakfast ready and lunches packed.

Who’s on Team A or Team B swaps around, so no one gets stuck on a job they don’t love.

It’s fairly efficient.

And, by the time Heather is there, everyone is ready to get moving. They kiss and hug goodbye, and Tim waves them off.

Which leaves him to his own devices. Heather keeps watching him, looking like she’s ready to spring into babying him action, too.

And, while it’s true that he wouldn’t mind some additional babying, he’s not the baby they hired her to take care of, and Kelly seems to be very pleased to see Heather again. She’s babbling and laughing, tugging on Heather, trying to get her to the stroller for their usual morning walk.

He spends a long minute snuggling Kelly, while she squirms and tries to get out of his grasp. In her world, it’s playtime, not be-glommed-onto-by-Daddy-time. “Okay.” He puts her down. “Have fun.”

She’s toddling as fast as she can to the stroller.

“You okay on your own?” Heather asks.

“Yeah. I’m going to go do some work on our family house.”

She looks appalled at the idea of him doing anything other than eating or sleeping.

He rolls his eyes a little. “My doctor says it’s fine. He even packed me a special lunch to keep me “going.”

“Ah. Okay… Have fun.”

Tim packs a few extras for himself, too. Inflatable mattress, pillows, sleeping bag. He’s not sure how much he’ll get done today, or if Penny and Gibbs left the sleeping gear in the house, but if they didn’t, he wants somewhere comfy to stretch out should he get too tired.

(And, even if he doesn’t get too tired, he wants somewhere comfy to curl into a ball and hide if he needs that, too. He gives the ponytail holder on his wrist a firm snap at that. There’s nothing at the house he needs to be hiding from.)

He puts the key in the ignition, turns his car on, and then sets his phone to call Gibbs. As he’s pulling out, Gibbs picks up.

“You’re up early.” Gibbs sounds a little sleepy himself, and Tim wonders if he woke him up.

“Hi, Jethro. Been up for an hour.”

“Go back to sleep.”

“I’ll get a nap later. What are you doing today?”

“Only concrete thing on the list was calling you guys and finding out when you’re coming back.”

“Day before yesterday.”

“You’re home?” Gibbs doesn’t sound like he believes they got back without him knowing about it.

“Yeah. Jimmy got the call the day after I got up there. Spent one day, and then turned around. He and Breena are helping with the bodies. Abby’s working on IDing them. She tells me she’s got her own team of Marines helping her out.” Tim intentionally keeps his voice light on that, but the idea of Abby in the Navy Yard makes him nervous. He snaps his wrist at that, too. She’s surrounded by gung-ho men and women armed to the teeth. She is perfectly fine in there.

“Is she in the Navy Yard?” Gibbs sounds nervous, too. Tim finds that soothing.

“Yeah, but they don’t leave her alone there.”

“Okay.” That calms him down. “What are you doing?”

Tim sighs. “Right now, I’m driving to our house. Not sure how useful I’ll be, but the wiring has to go up, and it’s better than just sitting around and stewing in it, so… I’m off to go do something. You want to help? Maybe Tony and Ziva, too? Who’s up and moving around?”

“I’ll help. We’ve got some other people who might want something concrete to do today.”

“Okay. I’ve only got food for me, and I packed some sleeping gear, because I’m probably going to need a nap at some point, but…”

“Tim, there’s enough food in there for ten people. Penny and I stocked it.” He doesn’t have to say that no one who was in the Navy Yard will ever let their pantry get even close to bare again. “I’ll see you there.”
“Good.”

Tim’s standing inside the house, schematics rolled out on the floor, glasses perched on his nose, pencil tucked behind his ear, realizing that he’d over-estimated how far along they were. Namely, he can’t wire all that much when they haven’t finished framing the interior walls for each of the sections of the house.

They’re down to bare studs and insulation for the exterior walls, and just studs for load-bearing ones, but just like how his family had set up their section, all the other families had set up their sections as well, but beyond tear down, making sure they had a blank canvas to build in, they haven’t put anything up, yet.

He’s thinking he can start measuring and marking out where walls are supposed to go. That looks like fairly light work. (After all, lifting the pencil and a laser measure shouldn’t take that much effort.)

Even better than being light, it’s the sort of work that requires him to pay close attention to what he’s doing. Measure once, measure again, mark precisely, take a few more steps, and do it again. It might not be complicated, but it takes focus.

That’s what he’s doing when he hears Gibbs’ truck crunching over the gravel.

He’s somewhat surprised at who hops out. Mona and Gibbs and Tony he was expecting (and hoping for. He wants quiet time with them.) Ducky’s good, too. The idea of meandering stories in the background makes Tim feel more secure.

Bishop and Allan surprise him. No Penny or Ziva surprises him, too. He figures that if Abbi’s not here, she’s doing some sort of CGIS stuff, and though he’s ashamed to admit it, he kind of forgot about Jake, so his absence didn’t matter to Tim.

Though, all of that is secondary to pulling Gibbs, Tony, and Ducky into a long and tight hug.

There’s a long moment of the four of them just holding each other, and then Tony breaks it with, “Okay, McVila, what are we doing today?”

Tim pulls back, almost runs his fingers through his hair, but there’s no hair to do that with, so he grabs the pencil he’s been using and points out the marks he’s making. “I wasn’t sure what the next part would be, so, I just started marking out where the walls go.”

Gibbs steps back, but his hands don’t leave Tony or Tim’s shoulders, as he looks over to what Tim’s up to. He thinks about how much two by fours weigh, and the cutting and hammering that has to be done to get them framing.

He also thinks about the fact that Penny and Ducky want to move in here, so the sooner their part of the house is done, the better.

Still, with the six of them working, it shouldn’t take more than two days to measure everything, and two days means more rest, that’ll make getting things cut easier.
They measure. They share stories. Tim gets them up to date on his trip north and they tell him about what’s been going on down here. He asks if they mind swapping houses. He doesn’t want to explain too much about why they’re better off at Jimmy and Breena’s place, but, fortunately he doesn’t need to.

Everyone in this group has smelled DC, they understand the desire to not bring that smell into their home.

Tony tells them about how they’re going to start in Sardinia, and from there they’re going to Cyprus, and finishing up in Greece. He mentions how, according to what Ziva is saying, their insurance agent isn’t giving them any shit, and they should be getting the first payment by tomorrow.

Bishop gripes about how she wishes her insurance agent would do that. They need confirmation from whoever’s going to do building inspections that they can’t go in and get their stuff, before they’ll send money to replace anything but the car. (Which was obviously, visibly, totaled, just like Tony and Ziva’s place.)

Allan doesn’t say much, but he does ask about Jimmy, and what they’re doing. Tim can’t tell him much, because they haven’t seen any need to give him the gore-y details, nor does he want them. He does say that as soon as Allan wants to go in, they’ll be happy to pick him up and give him a ride.

Ducky talks about what Penny and Jake are doing, and how, by the end of the week, they hope to be heading to New York. Right now, they’re looking for a decent office building to turn into the Embassy of the District of Colombia, but once they’ve got that, they’re heading up.

Jake’s written about it on his blog, and they’re already getting offers for places to set up, and places to stay. Apparently, sheltering refugees who are trying to change the world, and were part of bringing down the old system, is extremely good press. Every hotel with an empty penthouse has sent them an offer of free or extremely reduced price lodgings. Right now Jake and Penny are going through the offers, looking for the one that saves them the most money while looking the least like being in the pocket of whomever is paying for their rent.

They start in the part of the house that will be Ducky and Penny’s. Standing in the house’s front door, looking forward, the house opens into a great room. That great room is huge, with the two story fireplace in the middle of it. To the left of the fireplace is the kitchen and what will be the dining area. To the right is what will be the main living area.

Flanking the far walls on the left and right sides of the great room are the stair cases leading to the second floor. Under those stair cases are two hallways, the one on the right leads to the McPalmer wing of the house, and the one on the left leads to what used to be a large study and a library, and will soon be the Mallard-Langston wing of the house.
Right now, the area that will be Ducky and Penny’s is an empty, lopsided, rectangle (ish.) The side that faces the front of the house is fifteen feet long, and twelve feet deep. That’s the bit that used to be a den. It has a stone fireplace along the far wall, and like the rest of the front of the house, big windows overlooking what will, eventually, assuming they ever mow it, be a long front yard and is currently a tangle of knee-high dead or dying grass, vines, and baby trees. There used to be a hallway against that room, and then there used to be a longer, twenty feet long, fifteen foot wide library on the other side of that hallway.

They’ve got the outside walls, a fireplace, and the studs for the weight bearing wall that used to be the right-hand side of the hallway. The rest of the space is empty.

Gibbs, who’s done more work along these lines than Tim’s ever dreamed of, watched what he was doing, and the got lights.

He sinks a few nails in different studs and hangs them up. Suddenly, it’s bright enough to really see what they’re doing. From there, they start drawing in where walls are going to go.

Penny and Ducky are keeping the basic shape and idea of the place. That one wall can’t really go anywhere, so that’s going to be the boundary between their bedroom, and their study.

The fireplace will eventually be in their bedroom. The extra length of the back side of the room will house closet space. Two doors will go in the weight bearing wall, one leading to that closet, another to a bathroom. The remaining space will become an office for them.

With other people measuring out where the walls are, Gibbs gives Tim a can of spray paint. He’s adding orange dots where electric plugs are going to go, and where any cables for “internet stuff” as Gibbs put it, needs to go.

Tony’s got the pink paint, he’s putting in lines where they’re going to running plumbing.

He gives Ducky the last color, blue, for where the HVAC needs to be.

It might not be the most elegant system for taking care of it, but after an hour, Duck and Penny’s rooms are color coordinated, and at a glance they know where everything is going to go.
Not too much measuring for the great room. The whole point of how the house is built, the two wings with different heights, no floors above this one, minimizing the weight bearing down here so they could have a two storey ceiling, huge windows to the outside, and no walls to block the light.

The walls here are all set. The plumbing is pretty well set, too. Ripping out the kitchen and rebuilding is likely the last job they’ll do.

Tim’s marking off where they’re going to want plugs and more ‘internet stuff.’ Bishop and Ducky are making sure the closets and powder rooms and whatnot are all properly laid out. Gibbs and Allan are talking floor options. (Apparently, Dr. Allan’s parents have recently redone their place, and he’s listened to about two years of dithering over hardwood floor options. The upshot of this is that he’s got a pro and con mental list of about fifty different hardwood floor brands in his head.)

Tim notices he’s not the only one who’s got a collection of snacks instead of meals. He’s not, by a long stretch, the only one who’ll be working, talking even, and just go blank for a few seconds, shudder a little, and then come back to the conversation.

And he’s not, by any stretch of the imagination, the only one focusing way too hard on this job, because it beats the hell out of letting the memories in his head run rampant.

Their section comes next. Tim’s doing pretty well with it, having an easy time imagining what will be coming next, but he does have a few moments where he snaps the ponytail holder to keep himself here and now.

The thing about doing that in a room full of investigators is that they won’t miss it.

Ducky knows why he’s doing it. Can’t get a degree in psychology and not recognize that.

But Gibbs and Tony don’t, and the second time it happens they both glance at each other, and back to Tim.

They’re in what will eventually be Jimmy and Breena’s room, and he’s marking off more places for plugs. Tony sidles over to him. “What’s with the rubber band?” he asks quietly.

Tim rolls his eyes a little. He’d been imaging what Jimmy and Breena are doing right now, and it was making him feel nervous. Nervous for him. That claustrophobic feeling that they’ll never get free of all the death and pain. Nervous for them, afraid that the mobs might come back, and that they’re in there with no way out...

Tim holds up his wrist. “Way to keep my mind right. Brain goes running off to places it shouldn’t. This helps me yank it back where it belongs. Supposedly, I keep doing this, reminding myself that the real world isn’t my nightmares, and I’ll stop having the nightmares.”

“Pinching yourself awake?” Tony asks.

“Something like that. I know…” he’s about to say they’re, but he notices that Allan and Bishop are listening, too, “she’s safe in there, but…”

“Too many bad memories,” Bishop adds. She and Allan come over and join them, all four deciding that right now is a decent time for a snack or drink. Tim can see Gibbs and Ducky working, but they’re listening, too. “Jake’s not keen on me ever going back into NCIS building.”
“Not exactly feeling any need for that, either,” Tony adds. “I know they’re relocating whoever survived the IRS, EPA, and FEC, think they’ll do that for us?”

Tim shakes his head. “Not with our budget. Not with everything else burned and broken. Cleaned up, new paint, maybe… otherwise, we’re stuck. The building’s in good enough shape that Abby’s working in it, so there’s no ‘reason’ for us not to go back.”

“Invest in rubber bands,” Tony says.

Tim shrugs a bit. He’s still not sure if he’s going back. “Work from home for a while, too. Nothing I’m doing that needs me in that building.”

“Yeah, well some of us have to actually deal with suspects,” Tim catches the sound in Tony’s voice as he says that. It’s not nervous, but there’s some… heat maybe… definitely a strong emotion, that Tony’s still working thought.

“You’re having second thoughts about going back, too?” Tim asks.

Tony’s eyes narrow a bit, and his face grows tight. “Not back. I might not love the building right now, but it’s not the problem. Look, no shade on Jake or Penny, but… You really think this’ll change anything? Who the hell are we going to be working for? I’m… right now… I’m thinking of looking for something else. We do terror cases now, but… so much of that’s those assholes we were dealing with pissing on each other, and people responding to it. And, since I don’t know that I work for the good guys, and since I don’t think I’m ever going to be comfortable with the idea that I’m working for the good guys again…” He spends a moment looking off into the distance, still thinking. “We get back, and I’m asking Vance to focus on actual crimes. Homicides, thefts, stuff like that. Things where our team makes a real, tangible difference in someone’s life. Something where I don’t have to worry that I’m on the wrong team.”

Bishop stares at him. That puts something of a kink in her analysis from New York plan. “What am I going to be doing then?”

“I can’t imagine we’ll stop working terror cases. NCIS that is. They’ll still need analysts. But, I’m done with that.”

Bishop sighs. “Been there, done that. Why I wasn’t with the NSA anymore. But the threats are still real, Tony. And even if the assholes run the circus, that doesn’t mean that innocent people don’t get hurt.”

“Yeah, I know.” He licks his lips. “But I don’t want to help prop up the ringmaster anymore. I’m a good cop. I can put assholes in jail for hurting people, and that’s what I want to do. If Vance doesn’t need me for that, I’ll find somewhere else.” He glances over to Allan’s who’s been listening, not saying anything, munching on an apple. “I kind of envy your job. You know who you’re working for and what you’re doing. There’s no doubt about who’s benefiting because of what you’re doing.”

Allan smiles a bit at that and then nods. “There is something to be said for the simplicity of my job. Be the dead man’s voice. Will Dr. Palmer be going back when NCIS is up and running again?”

Tim nods without thinking about it. “I don’t see why not.”

Later, he realizes what he’s said with that. He’s not just giving Allan some comfy BS. He might not be feeling any desire to go to the Navy Yard right now, but he’s tied to it. It’s still where his duty lies, and the only reason Jimmy might not have been going back lies in his hands.

But it’s not. Because he’ll go back. Sooner or later he’ll get the nightmares calmed down, and like Tony, he might not be feeling very secure about the larger mission, but the small one, serve and protect the Marines, Navy, and their families’, given the time to heal up, he’ll be all over that, and he will go back, because that’s where they belong.
Tim breaks for the day earlier than the rest of the crew. He’s got picking up all three girls, getting to Jimmy and Breena’s, and making sure dinner’s ready for them when they get home.

Ducky decides he’s had enough for the day, too, and asks to ride with Tim.

Tim’s alert enough to know that Ducky is legitimately tired, (He is, too, and he’s annoyed that six hours of light work has him wiped out,) but that he also wants to talk to him one-on-one, so he doesn’t say anything about how heading back with Jethro makes more sense.

Once they’re in the car, Tim says, “So…”

“I approve of your wristband technique.”

“Thanks. No, I didn’t think of it on my own. I called Rachel yesterday when I couldn’t get a hold of Wolf. She suggested I google Cognitive Behavioral Therapy. I’ll be seeing her tomorrow morning.”

Ducky smiles gently at that, happy to see Tim being proactive about taking care of himself.

“Good, Timothy. How are you doing?”

Tim barks a short laugh. “It’s been a shit year, Duck. Without Abby, Jimmy, Breena and our girls, I don’t think I’d still be standing up.”

“But you are standing?”

“Apparently. Not saying I can handle… pretty much anything else right now… but I’m up.”

Ducky gently squeezes Tim’s right hand. “You are looking a lot better than you were when we sent you away from the Navy Yard.”

Tim shrugs. “I don’t really remember. I know we talked… but… kind of like memories of a dream. It’s really scattered.”

Ducky nods at that, too. Tim seems to be pretty good at keeping memories he’s not particularly interested in dwelling on away. They’re both quiet for a few minutes before Ducky says, “I don’t know if this qualifies as ‘anything else’ but, I’m getting the sense that Samuel is developing suspicions as to the nature of your relationship with Jimmy and Breena.”

Tim’s mouth opens and closes. He’s not feeling much of anything on that, though, so he says, “I don’t think it qualifies, either. He’s been staying at Jimmy’s…”

“In Breena’s office. He’s quite sharp and very observant. You and Abby returning home, when you didn’t have to, with Jimmy and Breena, caught his attention.”

Tim nods. “And now he’s coming to stay at my house.”

“If you wish to do some last minute tidying before he gets there, I can pick up the girls.”

Tim appreciates the offer, though he wonders slightly at what Ducky may think they’d have lying around the house. Yes, they do have pictures that would spell everything out, but they sure as hell aren’t on the mantelpiece. “We should be fine. Nothing… revealing is out. We already knew he was coming over to my place when we left in the morning.” Tim half shrugs, and glances away from the road to Ducky, “He’s caught a few hints from Jimmy and I, so… we’re expecting him to figure it out sooner or later.”

“Will that be a problem?”

Tim shrugs, and then he says, “You know what? No. Even if he blabs all over the place about it. It’s not going to be a problem because we won’t let it be.”

Ducky looks very satisfied by that.

Swapping houses goes well. Jimmy, Breena, and Abby having a place to get changed before getting into the house is even better. To smooth it out even further, Tim sets dinner a bit later, so everyone has time to grab showers before sitting down to eat.

He’s thinking they’re going to be flipping the morning routine. He’ll still get a morning shower, but the other three will probably hold off until the end of the day for as long as the current job holds out.

Tim tells them about working on the house. He shows them pictures of spray paint marks and walls measured out.

They cuddle the babies, and put them to bed, and settle in for another night of light, fluffy, comedy.

As they’re heading to bed, he notices a text on his phone, from Rachel, asking where they should meet up. He sends her Jimmy’s address while brushing his teeth.

“This isn’t your house, is it?” Rachel asks as she looks at the pictures on the mantle. Tim, Abby, and Kelly are in more than a few of them, but the wedding picture is Jimmy and Breena, so are most of the other shots. There are newborn baby pictures of both of their girls along with a shot of Jon’s tiny little fingers curled around Breena’s index finger, and one triptych with all three (first trimester) ultrasound shots.

“No. We’re at Jimmy and Breena’s.”

She nods, taking that in, looking at the pictures. “Is your house okay?” she asks, turning to look at him.

Tim’s sitting on the sofa, watching her get the lay of the land. He probably should be standing up, too, but he doesn’t feel like it. He’ll get enough standing up when he goes to the house. “Yeah. Tony and Ziva’s isn’t. Jake and Bishop’s place is probably going to get torn down. Allan says he’s just waiting for power to get back to the part of the city he’s in. So, they’re staying at my place, and we’re here.”

Rachel thinks about that, too. Tim’s with it enough to realize that it probably seems odd for him to not be in his own house, and between him and the Palmers spread the guests around.

“Easier to keep all the babies in one place.”

Rachel shoots him a look, letting him know that she’s sure he’s right, and that she knows that’s not the whole story. “Have you heard from your regular therapist?”
“Yeah.” Earlier that morning. And that had been a massive relief. “Sheer dumb luck, he was visiting his family in London when it went down. He’s a crisis counselor for the Feds. He’s not sure when his job’ll be around again, but he knows there’s work to do. He tells me he’s coming back this weekend, and like a lot of people in DC, sleeping on friends and families’ couches for the foreseeable future.”

“I’m glad he’s okay. Do you mind if I ask what you were seeing a counselor for?”

Tim sighs. “How many hours do you have?”

She flashes him a curious look and sits down at the far end of the sofa. “I didn’t get the sense you were that complicated when we last talked.”

“I’m good at that.”

“Apparently.” She smiles at him, and it’s clear from her look that she knows what he’s doing, even if he may not. “You’re good at not talking about things, too.”

He nods, realizing that he’s filling the void with words that don’t enlighten. “The short version is a very bad relationship with The—” he’s about to say Admiral, but she doesn’t know who that is, and his voice catches, because he doesn’t want to say Dad, either. “my mom’s first husband, which resulted in him trying to have me killed at the beginning of the summer.”

He gets the sense that Rachel doesn’t often look shocked, but she is shocked now.

Tim gives her a curt nod. “Amazingly enough, in addition to spending the entire summer in casts and rehab,” he gestures to the scar through his eyebrow and the ones on his hand, and the shot on the mantle of the four of them from the OBX, “some fun new scars, enough metal in my arm to make sure I can never go through a metal detector without getting wanded, that left me with some issues to work out.”

Rachel blinks at that. “I’d say. Is that what you meant by it matches something you were already doing?”

“Yeah. As you can imagine the whole thing was traumatic, and involved an actual, physical, life of death, me versus four other guys, hand to hand, fight. Shockingly enough, that also left me with some issues.” He’s got his protective sarcasm well in place, and Rachel takes note of it. “Fear and anger mostly. What you had me researching is more formal than what I was doing. Normally, I’d do something like, This is irrational, stop it. Or just yank myself out of the thoughts and put myself back in the real world. I wouldn’t name why the thoughts were irrational.”

“Does it work for you?”

He half shrugs. “Better than nothing. I’m… I had been having fewer nightmares…” But he doesn’t know that for himself. “I don’t usually remember them. I was being told I have fewer nightmares. Right now I’m sleeping too hard to tell if nightmares will be an issue. Hit the pillow, close eyes, and I’m gone for the next ten hours, too tired to dream. I was feeling less angry. Got past the blood rage, got to the point where keeping my family safe mattered more than revenge, that’s moving forward, right?”

Rachel’s nodding. “You got that far in…”

“Five months?”

She smiles at him, a lot of kindness and some doubt in that look. “If it’s real, that’s what we in the psych world would call record-setting, unmitigated success.”

He answers her unspoken question, “It’s real enough.”

“Okay. How about right now? You’ve mentioned fear. Angry?”

“Not yet. It’ll probably show up sooner or later. It usually does. How much of the news did you watch?” He glances at the TV as he says that.

“Enough to know that you lived through hell, and you probably feel responsible for a lot of it, too.”

“That’s pretty much it. There’s a lot of guilt in there, too. I set a lot of it in motion, that’s the big level. The case. I’m the guy who broke the last line and spilled the full story. Micro level, in the Navy Yard, I got so mired in it, in the guilt, I couldn’t get out of the Navy Yard, even though they would have let me go, so,” he holds up much too thin arms, near skeletal hands she can see the slight protrusions from the screws in his bones, “a lot of this is entirely on me. I put my family through hell, they were begging me to get out, and I wouldn’t leave.”

She doesn’t ask who he means by ‘his family,’ but she does glance at a shot of the four of them with their girls at the beach in the Outer Banks. For a second, she just looks, taking in the casts, and how much weight, and hair, Tim’s lost. “Because you felt like you couldn’t, because everyone else deserved to get out more than you did?” she asks as she looks back at him.

“I didn’t feel like I couldn’t. I didn’t feel… anything really those last few days. I literally couldn’t. I was talking to them, but, they, the outside world, wasn’t real anymore. There was nothing outside of the Navy Yard. Would have stayed to the end if Abbi and Ducky hadn’t made me go. And now… wrong words, wrong smell, it brings everything back, leaves me in a cold sweat with my heart galloping.”

“They’re called triggers. Part of the idea of what we’re hoping to do is identify yours, and… have you ever had allergy shots?”

Tim groans. Oh, he’s had allergy shots, all right. “Remember what I said about a ‘bad relationship?’”

“Yes.”

“This is the kind of shit I’d go through as a kid. Navy family, so we move every two years. I’m allergic to all sorts of stuff, allergy shots take about two years to be useful. We’d move to a new place. I’d spend the first year being allergic to whatever it was. But we’d have to wait a year, see what set me off, couldn’t just assume that I was allergic to pollen every damn place we went. Then, a year in, we’d start the shots, and they’d be specific to whatever it was I was allergic to there. So, it was never ‘mold’ or ‘pollen,’ it would be ‘pine tree pollen’ or ‘ragweed pollen’ or ‘leaf mold’ because that would have the best chance of working. Except, a year into it, we move. I’ve had the first half of allergy shots five different times and am still allergic to pollen and ragweed and mold and a bunch of other stuff, just not as bad as when I was a kid.”

Rachel winces. “That’s… awful.”

“So, yes, I’m familiar with how the idea works. You get exposed to a little bit of whatever it is, small controlled doses, and your body decides it’s not the end of the world, calls off your immune system, and gets used to it.”

“That’s what we’re going to look for here. Find your triggers, expose you to them, in small, controlled doses, reinforcing that just hearing about it isn’t causing you a problem, and allowing you to build up the emotional calluses you need.”
“Sounds like a plan. I’d… I don’t know, maybe not like… but it might be nice if I at least have a choice about going back to work, as opposed to it just being too much.”

“Not going back because of the work…”

He shakes his head. “Work’s fine, probably. I’m not sure if I can walk into the building, but I can likely handle remoting in and running the department from home. I don’t know if I can make myself care about the job, or like Tony said, trust it. I don’t know if the big picture stuff I’m doing is going to help or hurt people. Little stuff, catch killers and thieves by their computer, I’m fine on that. Hunt down massive multi-national conspiracies that affect the whole world and get thousands of innocent people killed… not sure I want to do that again.”

That seems to make sense to Rachel. She asks, “What is the problem with the building?”

“I put 600 people in there to keep them safe from the riots, and then didn’t buy them enough food. Adults spent weeks on a thousand calories a day. A lot of us ate less, keeping the kids a little better fed. You don’t ever want to smell a building with 600 people, three washers, and ten showers… We had mobs come. One tried to burn us out to get our prisoners. Some asshole let out that we had the FEC election-buying guys in our custody. The other…” Tim shakes his head.

“The other?” Rachel gently asks.

His mouth opens and closes.

“Okay. The other was bad.”

Tim nods.

“And you stayed there until the end?”

He shakes his head. “After… It broke me. Abbi, Jethro’s Abbi, not my Abby, my Abby and Jimmy and Breena and our girls were up in Canada. Abbi ran the defenses. She made me leave. I think she said that if I stayed, I’d let someone shoot me,” he thinks she also said that if she let him say, he’d eat his gun, but he’s not sure anymore if she said it or he was just thinking it. He’s fairly sure he didn’t have a gun on him, and he thinks that’s why he threw his rifle away.

“Were you part of the defenses, Tim?”

He nods. “Yeah. Sharpshooter. I’m good with a pistol, too. Better with a pistol than most people, but pistols are short range weapons, and if you’re going up against a mob at short range, it doesn’t matter if you’re a good aim or not. You just fire. Anyone who could handle the recall was on the wall, trained to shoot or not.” He sounds clinical as he says that.

“And the first mob, were you part of the defenses?”

Tim nods at that, too. “Ran out of bullets for my rifle on that one. Ended up on the wall with my pistol.”

“You seem less traumatized by that. What’s different about those two cases?”

Tim licks his lips. He knows the answer, and he’s got no problem saying part of it. “The first time, they were coming to take our prisoners. Maybe burn us out. No one said it, but we were all thinking it. Just tie the prisoners up and leave them outside the wall. Save us the cost of the trial and the appeals. Let the mob take care of their execution for treason. But, we’re still the good guys, so we don’t… Like I said, no one said it.
“They come, and they’ve got incendiaries. That’s what I was shooting, mostly, Molotov cocktails. We’ve got the river behind us, so anyone who can swim has an exit, but we’ve got little kids. One ship, can’t fit everyone, and it’s a display, though we had a crew of Naval Engineers doing everything they could to get it ready to move if it had to. Wasn’t ready when the mob came, so if they surround and burn us, a lot of us are going to die. They’d gotten the IRS and FEC building a few days earlier. We know what’s going to happen to us if we let it.

“I don’t like that, but give me a gun, and I know what to do. We weren’t going to be the IRS.”

Rachel makes a quick note on that. “You have a moral framework for that, and it fits into it?”

“Yeah.”

“The second one doesn’t fit your moral framework, does it?”

Tim shakes his head.

“What happened, Tim?” She keeps her voice soft, comforting.

“I… don’t know what day it was. Abby or Jimmy could tell you. A while. Food’s scarce. Real scarce. We finally get rid of our prisoners. The deal was the National Guard would take the prisoners out and bring food in.”

“Oh, that sound like a good deal.”

“Leon should have made them get us all out. CGIS did that. Got everyone out. They had to fight their way out, but they got out.”

She knows a sophisticated evasion when she hears one. That’s a good one, but talking about what didn’t happen isn’t where she wants this to go. “That probably would have been a good plan, but it didn’t happen. What did happen?”

Tim feels the fear creeping up on him, and he knows it’s going to drown him if he tries to answer that question. Rachel sees it, too. She moves a little closer to him, and takes his hands in hers. “You are in Jimmy and Breena’s home. You are safe. This is just the allergy shot. Pain now to dull your reaction later. You don’t always want to be reacting to your triggers this way, so tell me as much of it as you can.”

He blinks, slow, licks his lips, and begins to disassociate himself from it. He’s telling a story, something that happened to McGregor. Rachel sees the switch in him, and right now, if he can only tell it as an abstraction, that’s fine.

Tim keeps his eyes on the trees outside, watching brown and red leaves rattle a bit in a light breeze through the window. “They’re all hungry. Everyone in there is hungry. The fucker who brought the food didn’t bring enough. Supposed to bring thousands of pounds, and he brought hundreds. And he didn’t do it quiet or subtle. Asshole dropped it in front of the walls. EVERYONE is hungry. They’re roaming the city, eating anything they can catch, and there’s not much left to catch. They’re online. Power still works. No one’s got food, but they’ve got Twitter and Facebook.

“They post it online. ‘Food at the Navy Yard.’ And the mob is back. No food, but gasoline. Tons of that. Empty bottles filled with it galore. And no one’s short on matches. Guns… somehow they’ve got guns. The ones who don’t, they’ve got rocks and knives and… Shit, one of them had a truck with a snow plow blade on it. He was going to drive through the cars we’re using as an outer perimeter, clear a path for the mob, let them move faster.” Rachel notes that detail, and figures out why Tim remembers him so well. She doesn’t need to ask what happened to the man driving the “Can’t let it go. It’s food. There’s no other food in the Navy Yard, and that sad little pile of it means the kids get a full belly and the grown-ups are a little less hungry.

“Can’t let it go. So, we didn’t.” His eyes are very wide as he says that, and he’s very intently not looking at her.

Tim looks like he’s trying to say something else, and Rachel waits for it, but the words don’t form. After a few more seconds, Rachel nods. That’s enough detail for right now. “Okay.” She’s holding his hand, so she can feel the sweat, and a little adjustment of her finger position means she can feel his pulse thrumming away too fast. “Where are you?”

“Here. Jimmy’s.” His voice is strained as he says that, and his body tense, ready to run.

“Okay,” she keeps her voice calm and soothing. “What are you doing?”

“Talking to you.”

“Yes, tell me all about it. We’re reinforcing that you’re home and safe, give me details.”

Tim looks away from the trees outside, his eyes really seeing again. He swallows, hard. “We’re in Jimmy and Breena’s living room, on the sofa. It’s beige and the pillows behind us are blue. The walls are light blue, the carpet and trim are dark brown.”

His heart is starting to slow down, the need to run lessening.

“Good. What else?”

“Umm…” He takes a deep breath, trying to get himself further under control. “You’re wearing perfume. It smells nice. I am, too. It’s actually Abby’s, but it’s got really good memories attached to it, so I wear a little of it sometimes, when I need a boost.” He licks his lips, thinking about where he is, what’s around him, what he’s feeling. “Ummm… I’ve got on jeans, a t-shirt, and a sweater. The jeans and t-shirt are Jimmy’s because mine are too big these days. My calves are a little cool where the jeans are too short. Actually, I’m a little cold all over, but that’s true most of the time I’m not holding onto someone else these days.”

“Okay, more details.”

“I can feel the softness of the carpet under my feet. Not the texture, because I’m wearing socks, but the floor is soft. Breena has a few of those ‘beach’ scented candles, and I can smell them. In a week or two, she’ll change to her fall scents, usually something spicy and warm. Outside the window most of the leaves have fallen, but I can see a few red ones still hanging on the maple tree.”

“Okay, how do you feel, emotionally?”

He licks his lips. “Not as scared as I was two minutes ago.”

“And that’s the plan. That’s how this gets beaten into submission. Adrenaline takes a while to work itself out of your system…”

“I know.” He’s nodding his head. He’s got more than enough experience with waiting for his body to calm down. “I’ll feel a bit shaky for half an hour or so.”

“Yes, but it will pass. It’s just the chemical remainder of what happened.”
“Great. Now what?”

“Now, we talking longer strategy. Are you going to want to keep seeing me when your regular counselor comes back?”

He hadn’t given that much thought. “Might see both of you. Maybe just you. I know he’s going to be swamped.”

“Just because other people need help doesn’t mean you have to forego it.”

“I get that. I’ve got the funds to pay you out of pocket, but right now he’s free to people who work for the government. Any hour I’m with him is an hour someone else who might not have a second option can’t have.”

She smiles at that. “Very rational.”

“Gotta be rational about something, right?” he says with a painfully dry smile.

“It’ll make this easier.” She lets go of his hands and stands up, looking at the photos on the mantle again. “How are you doing with your family?”

“Good. We’re good.”

“Can you talk to them about this?”

Tim thinks about that. “Yes, Jethro, definitely. He was there, he saw it. When I get done here… Did he tell you about our house?”

Rachel shakes her head. “Our house?”

“Ducky and Penny decided to get a place for our whole family. It’s on the river, big enough for all of us, and our kids, to fit. It was in terrible shape when we got it, and we’re still fixing it up. When we get done today, I’m heading there. I’ll be working on it with Jethro. I think Ducky’ll be there today, too. Maybe Penny and Jake, but they’re also working on some other stuff, so I’m not sure if they’ll be there. Bishop said she’d be there today. Probably Allan, he’s at loose ends right now. Tony and Ziva should be at the airport by now, so not them… Anyway, yeah, we’re working on it, and everyone who’s there was in the Navy Yard, and we all get it. Time doing something mentally intensive, where you can stop and grab a nap if you need to, and no one stares if you’re too damn thin… and everyone gets why you might just shudder for no reason… or why you get edgy if you can’t see where the snacks are… That’s good. And yeah, I know I’ll be talking to Jethro while we do that.”

“That’s good. How about your… more immediate family? Abby… Jimmy and Breena?”

Tim swallows. So far he hasn’t felt any need to drop many of the images or details of the Navy Yard on them. “I’m sure I could, but I’m not sure I want to. They’re in DC on clean up right now. Jimmy and Breena are in the morgue, dealing with bodies; Abby’s IDing the Does; they’ve got enough dark, and I don’t know if I want to dump mine on them, too. But, if I wanted to talk to them, I could.”

Rachel stops studying the pictures to look at him. “One of the things I’ve noticed, is that the more engaged you stay, with your friends, family, life around you, the better off you are likely to be. The more you fill your life with the things that light you up, the less room there is for the dark. Now isn’t the time to ‘protect them’ by not telling them what you went through, or what’s in your head. You do that, you’re building walls between them and you, and you’re denying yourself the opportunity to deal with these issues in a place you feel safe. So, don’t do that.”

Tim nods.

“Did you feel comfortable telling them about what happened with… is your mother’s first husband your father?”

“I prefer not to acknowledge that. Gibbs is my father.”

Rachel mentally winces. Issues. “Could you talk to them about it?”

“Yeah. I could, and did, and do. Abby went with me to some of the sessions with Wolf.”

“Good. You want to do that here, too. And if Abby wants to join in for any of these sessions I’m fine with that.” She glances from Tim to the mantle, eyes on a shot of the four of them from Tony and Ziva’s wedding. “If Jimmy or Breena wants to come, too, that’s also fine.”

Which is when Tim remembers that before everything blew up, Jimmy had started seeing Rachel. They hadn’t talked about what Jimmy’s been saying to her. He thinks they got maybe one, maybe two appointments in, and then the case went insane and they were on the run.

Tim can’t think of a good way to ask, “So, how much of what’s going on between the four of us has Jimmy told you?” so he says, “We’ll see. They’re working during the day.”

Rachel knows evasion when she hears it. “I show up at night, too.”

“I’ll float the idea past them.”

“For right now, I want you to keep pulling out of it, stay engaged with your here and now, stay engaged with your family. And, right now, I’d think that getting all four of you together to talk about this, with me or without me, would be a good plan.”

Tim nods.

“Based on just an hour of chatting with you, I’m guessing what we’re looking at is a whole lot of guilt, and that’s what’s setting the panic attacks into play.”

That sounds like a distressingly accurate read to Tim. He’s fairly sure that fear as just fear would have been a lot easier to beat. “Great. So…”

“So, you’re going to have to work on accepting that you did the best you could, and it wasn’t enough. And you’re going to be working on making sure you know that you are safe, and your fear can and will be tamed down.”

“Okay. When do you want to get together again?”

Rachel checks her phone quickly. “Same time, day after tomorrow?”

“Sure.”

After dinner, after girls are in bed, as they settle onto the sofa, Tim says, “Rachel suggested that maybe all four of us talk together… with her… Uh…” he’s looking at Jimmy… “how much does she know about the four of us?”
It feels like it’s been a million years since Jimmy talked to Rachel, so he’s got to think about it for a second, though he knows he didn’t specifically mention the particulars of their relationship. “We just talked about Jon and how I was doing with losing him. And no, I hadn’t gotten around to the killing the Admiral bit of it, just the MMA and blowing up on Tony part of it.”

“She ask about family support?” Tim asks. He’s sitting on the left side of the sofa, facing the right side, one leg stretched out along the back of the sofa, the other facing forward, foot on the floor.
Abby’s between his legs, back to his chest, head on his arm, which is also stretched out along the back of the sofa.

“Yeah…” and Jimmy remembers what he’d said… “And yeah, I did mention you and Abby…” he hands the popcorn over to Abby, and sits down on the right side of the sofa, his hip against Tim’s foot, while Breena snuggles across his lap, facing Tim and Abby. “Just that you two had been really important to keeping me going.”

“And she met you here,” Breena says, looking around the living room, taking a few pieces of popcorn from Abby. “She wonder why you weren’t at your house?”

“I think so. I know I mentioned you two being important, and when she asked about if I could talk to my family about this, I replied for all three of you.”

Abby feeds him a bite of popcorn, and asks, “Did she seem bothered?”

“Not that I noticed. I don’t know if she’s thinking we’re very close friends or what.” That’s when he remembers his chat with Ducky. “And Ducky’s mentioned that Sam’s on the verge of figuring things out.”

Jimmy shakes his head at that. “Nah. At least, I don’t think so. He’s on the verge of deciding we’re,” he gestures to him and Tim, “fooling around behind their,” he kisses Breena and gives Abby’s foot a squeeze, “backs.”

“Do you need to talk to him?” Breena asks.

“I don’t think so. Not now, at least,” Jimmy replies.

“He’s been working at the house with us. He seems intrigued by our layout, but isn’t asking me anything,” Tim says.

“And he won’t. He’s used to keeping his own secrets, and likely won’t poke into ours. I talked to him today, and he’s planning on joining our team on Monday. I have a feeling after he watches us,” he pets Breena’s hair, “work together for a few days, he’ll decide that he’s misread the situation and we’re…” Tim gets his foot stroked, and he jerks a little because it’s ticklish. Jimmy winks at him.
“Just good friends.”

“I’m thinking that if he does find out… It’s not a big deal,” Tim says.

“I doubt it’d be an issue for him,” Jimmy replies, “but, we didn’t think it’d be an issue for Tony, either, so, as long as he can stay in the dark, I’m fine with that.”

“Not exactly what I mean…” Tim licks his lips and rests his hands on Abby’s tummy. Sean’s still right now, probably sleeping. They’ve got an OB appointment tomorrow. Get new ultrasounds. “I know this sounds stupid coming from a guy who breaks into a cold sweat at the mention of his place of employment, but… I just don’t care what he thinks, or what anyone else thinks, not about this, not anymore. This isn’t on my list of fears anymore.”
“Not stupid at all,” Abby says, squeezing his hand. “After this last month…”

That brings a memory back. “I got out on Semper. And, I didn’t get seasick. After the Stennis, I figured I’d never set foot on a ship again without tossing my cookies, but it didn’t bug me at all. Might have been too far gone for it, but… And I’m not saying I want to hop on again anytime soon, and re-test it, but…”

“But it was better,” Jimmy says.

“Yeah.”

“Do you want to have all four of us talk with her?” Breena asks, pulling them back to why he mentioned this.

“I don’t know.” He presses his lips against Abby’s temple and hold her a little tighter. “I want to be functional. I want to be here, with you guys, not stuck back there. She’s happy with the idea of me talking to Jethro about it, but she’d also like me talking to you guys, and… I mean… I don’t really want to talk, but I probably need to, and I don’t want to dump this crap on you, because you’ve got more than enough of your own crap right now—“

“Tim, don’t ever shut up about something because you think we can’t/don’t want to take it,” Jimmy says.

“That’s the deal. We help each other carry the load.” Abby kisses him as she says that.

Breena strokes his leg. “Come on, pick something, we’ve got it, with you.”

Before he starts to think of something to say, he decides explaining more about the idea of ‘psychological allergy shots’ and why he’s making himself think of horrible things in a safe environment. They follow along with that pretty well, not like it’s a very complicated concept, but he’s getting into the details of it, and then the details of real allergy shots, and then Abby gently strokes his face and says, “You really don’t have to talk about it if you don’t want to. Not tonight.”

Tim winces slightly, his conscious brain catching up to what he was doing.

“I should. Uh… okay, no more evasion.” He licks his lips, thinking. “This one caught me at the house today. We’re up on the top floor, getting the kids’ play area measured out. I was thinking about our kids, older, up there messing around.

“There were kids there, too. A lot of them. And the first few days, it’s… I don’t know… vacation sort of. No school, not much work. The older ones did their schoolwork or were glued to their phones. Connon stuck around, and he got the computers wired up for a massive Minecraft party, and with the One and PlayStation they did tournament days. Vote on different games, and then anyone who wanted to play got 10 minutes to get the highest score possible. Winner got a candy bar or something.

“Because that’s when we still had candy bars, though they were starting to get scarce.

“Last tournament day was a week in, and that was it, last candy bar in the place. They played so hard for that damn thing…” Tim’s starting to get tense, thinking about it, and Abby’s gently stroking his hands.

“Pool parties. Did that the first week, too. We have a pool. Not like there was any reason to not use it. Day one or two even three, when everyone still had clean clothing… People went swimming. Trying to have fun and kill time. Cranked up the music. The kids liked it.
“But the water went bad, and you didn’t want to drink it. It was safe to wash in, but no one wanted to swim in it. Even with chlorine, we weren’t sure what would happen if you spent too much time in it.” Abby can feel his heart speeding up against her back, and Jimmy’s gently rubbing the bottom of Tim’s foot.

“You’re okay, Tim,” Breena says, voice soft.

“So, the first week… they’re bored, and tense, and whiny, some of them were sick from the water, they’re being kids stuck in a place they don’t want to be. But they’re still okay. They’re still, for the most part, round and plump, and they’re running around.

“And then we had to cut rations. Just the grownups at first. We went down to 3/4 rations first. Fifteen hundred calories. Most of the kids, especially the little ones, ate less than that anyway, so, they got to have all of their food.

“That didn’t last long. Whole city ran out of food at once. Ate its way through everything it had stored. Tony and his team was out scrounging, looking for food. Only reason more of us didn’t die was the first day they went out, they cleaned out a warehouse club of vitamins, protein bars, diet shakes, stuff like that. It’s not really food; it’s all ‘low calorie,’ but it’s got all the nutrients you need.” Tim has to stop there, take a few deep breaths to get himself back into the living room with Abby, Jimmy, and Breena. The taste of those bars, sweet, “chocolate” but not really chocolate, with a gritty, chalky tongue-coating under-taste floods through him. He gags for a few seconds and squeezes Abby’s hands, tight.

“You’re okay, baby.” She kisses him, making a mental note to find out what the hell he was eating in there and make sure it and anything like it stays off the menu until he puts it there himself.

“No new food is coming in, so we drop to half rations. 1000 calories a day. That’s… two protein bars and a cup of oatmeal or rice. Just to try and make something else, Elaine made rice pudding with the diet shakes, so… Maybe a half-cup of chocolate or strawberry rice pudding that… I don’t know, tasted like shit to me, but… It’s still food, and you eat whatever you can…” Shoveling too sweet, gummy, artificial-strawberry-flavored, which is something he can’t stand under the best of circumstances, gruel into his mouth, comes back. Comes back in a lukewarm wash of stomach curdling flavors. Tim buries his head into Abby’s neck, inhaling deep, smelling her skin and perfume, and then licks her, just to have another taste on his tongue.

He can feel firm pressure on his foot, Jimmy’s hands, and Breena slips around, behind the arm of the sofa, rubbing his shoulders.

“That’s when we started to cut the kids’ rations, too. And now they’re bored and nervous and hungry. They whine and cry and get into fights all the time. The few that were nursing did okay a bit longer than the toddlers, but… Mom’s not getting enough food, milk won’t be good, so…” He’s a dad. He’s the dad of a toddler, and the very involved Uncle of a baby. He’s spent hours listening to little people cry, and it’s the worst sound in the world. It’s a sound that has been, through millions of years of evolution, designed to make sure you, the caregiver, get your ass up and fix the problem.

And he couldn’t fix the problem.

“Six hundred people in there, and maybe two hundred and fifty of them are kids.” Tim swallows hard. “Maybe eighty of them are under seven. That’s a lot of crying.” His eyes are tearing up, too.

“I can shoot. That was the test to stand watch. Can you hit something the size of a softball at the edge of our perimeter? I can do that. I took watch over and over just to get out of the building. Just so I didn’t have to hear it. But, Abbi only lets you stand watch eight hours a day. At first, when we had enough people. Got it up to fourteen later, but that’s still too many hours left in a building filled with miserable people.

“I stopped eating my oatmeal or rice or whatever the mystery broth was. I’d line up, just like everyone else, sign my name showing I’d gotten my food, and then hand it over to whichever one was crying the loudest. A lot of parents did that. Some non-parents, too. I don’t know if it was to get them to shut up, or if it was about keeping them healthy.

“Didn’t matter much. They started looking like little skeletons. And they stopped playing. Toward the end, most of them stopped crying.” Tim’s voice cracks on that. “They’d just sleep all day, wake up a little to eat, and then go back to sleep. A lot of us were doing that. Sleep every minute you could. Hibernate, I guess. Ducky said that’s the best thing you can do when food is scarce… But… Shit…” He’s crying now, having a hard time keeping the words going. They hold onto him, let him have his cry, making sure he stays here, with them.

Tim supposes it’s working, he’s very aware of being here, in the living room, talking about it, not slipping back into reliving it. He guesses that the step after being tossed back into it is grieving for it. He supposes this is progress.

His voice is rough and shaky as he says, “We’re upstairs, measuring out the play area, and I just cracked, thinking about how close we were to having our babies in there, and… It didn’t happen to them, but I couldn’t shake the image of them starved and sleeping all day… Couldn’t shake the fear of them not waking up.”

He exhales slowly at that. “It didn’t happen. I know it didn’t happen. And even if it did, we live in Virginia, we would have left. It didn’t happen.” He works on holding onto that, while they hold onto him. And he’s doing, okay, with that. But guilt hops up, just as he’s starting to calm down some, and it spikes his heart rate, and rushes through him in an electric wash of adrenaline.

His babies weren’t here. His loves got out. And even if they had been there, they could have gotten out, but that wasn’t true for everyone else. Starved toddlers, sleeping on the floor, their parents exhausted, hollow-eyed and cheeked, wrecked, because the number one, first, primary responsibility of being a parent is keeping your kids fed, and their babies weren’t eating.

They didn’t have anywhere else to go.

And they were in the Navy Yard because of him.

It takes a very long time for Tim to get himself calmed back down from that.
Quiet Time

It feels surreal to Tim to do normal things. Like go to the OB.

Abby’s almost twenty-five weeks along, so they’re late for the twenty-week ultrasound, but no one gives them any crap for it. They aren’t, by a long stretch, the only people who had their schedule turned upside down.

Instead of their normal ‘Hellos’ from Dr. Draz, they both get hugs, followed by, “I saw the news conference, and then you guys didn’t show for your appointment. God, you two scared me,” that gets another hug. “So glad to hear you’re okay.” Then she pulls a step back from Abby, eyeing Sean. “And it looks like you’re better than okay.” She glances at Tim… “Did you not eat for a month to make sure she got enough food?”

Tim shrugs a bit. “Not exactly.”

“I was in Canada. Plenty of food for us,” she pats Sean. “He stuck around, like you saw with the news coverage. Made sure other people got fed.” There’s some edge to her voice, but not enough for Tim to react to.

“Are you going to be okay?” Draz asks.

“So they tell me. I’ve already got a Doctor watching my every move,” he nods to Abby and Draz takes the hint.

“Okay. So, you know the drill. We’re a bit late for the 20 week work up, so we’re going to modify it some. Today we’ve got an ultrasound, check everything out, as well as the glucose test, make sure you’re still doing okay with your blood sugar. Then the next two appointments will be at four week intervals. That’ll get you to 33 weeks, and we’ll start checking in more regularly, and start getting ready for little boy here to join the outside world.”

Dim room, Abby’s hand in his, the woosh, woosh, woosh, sound of Sean’s heartbeat, followed by the image of it pumping away, and then sepia-toned view of their little boy, who appears to be sucking his thumb, and that moment, right there, with Abby, Tim’s entirely engaged.

As they wait for the second round of blood tests, Tim sends a text to Jimmy with the ultrasound footage. Check out your namesake.

A minute after that, he sends another one to the larger group. SJ McGee.

Abby watches him text. “Are you really going to call him SJ?” she teases.

He shrugs a bit. “I don’t know. Don’t want the James part to only be something we whip out when he’s in trouble.”

She smiles at that. “’SEAN JAMES, you get in here, right NOW!’ You mean like that?”

“Yeah.”
She shakes her head a bit. “God... We’re gonna have five of them under the age of four.”

Tim laughs at that, then he smiles, genuinely. “Trick or treating. Next year only Molly’ll really care much one way or another, but five years from now... Can you see it?”

“Oh yeah, Molly’ll be almost eight. Kelly’ll be six. Anna almost six. Sean four, Dave four, and if Breena manages to catch again soon, next baby Palmer might be four or almost four.”

Tim smiles, mental images of Princes Darth Vader or whatever fluffy, counter-culture, nerd-chic costume Kelly will come up with, dancing in his mind. “Five years, there’ll probably be at least one more DiNozzo in the mix.” Tim adds, thinking of the picture that Tony sent them this morning. It’s one of Ziva, in a pretty white dress, on a bench, somewhere warm and tropical looking, munching on ice cream, looking gloriously happy and pregnant.

“And if we’re lucky, one more McGee. Breena and Jimmy talk about wanting four, so another Palmer. That’s what... nine kids under the age of nine?”

“Yeah. Halloween and Christmas are going to be insane.”

Abby’s still smiling. “Going to be amazing. Can you see Gibbs in... I don’t know, pirate costume or something, herding this troop of kidlets around his neighborhood, taking them Trick-or-Treating?”

Yeah, he can. “Hook Mona up to a small wagon, let her pull the candy around when it gets too heavy for them.”

“God, she’d be all over that.”

Tim’s hand rests on Abby’s belly. “Christmas. Fire in the fireplace. Huge damn tree in the corner. You and Jimmy and Breena decorating the ever-living snot out of every inch of the house. Kids all over the place, wrapping paper up to our eyeballs, house smells like pine and spice and turkey and roast beef and cookies, people coming over all day.” He blinks hard a few times at that, feeling tears forming, but they’re happy ones.

Abby smiles at him, and kisses him.
“When I drop you off, I’m heading back to the house. We’re starting framing today.”

“Good.”

“It’ll be rough, and close, probably won’t have everything done, but… I think we’ll have Christmas at the house this year.”

“Even better.”

“You sure you want to do this?” Abby asks as they head back to the car.

Tim shrugs. “If it’s too much, we’ll change plans. You’ll drop me off, and I’ll catch a ride home with Jethro.”

Abby nods, and they begin the drive into DC.

It’s not as bad as Tim was fearing.

On several levels.

On the first one, the city isn’t in as bad of shape as he remembered. He’s not sure if his mind made the damage worse than it was, or if the cleanup crews have been working miracles. Probably some combination of the two of them with a side of they aren’t taking their usual route in, because they aren’t coming from home.

They’re driving through a busted up, but not burned part of the city, taking a fairly circuitous route, when it hits him that part of why it doesn’t look as bad as he expects is that they’re driving, not walking, so Google is taking them through the sections of town they can still drive through.

They’re skirting the burned out parts, and going around the rubble.

He is pleased to see, that, at least in the bits they can drive through, that people are coming back, cleaning up, and getting back to life. He’s not feeling particularly hungry, but when he sees an open coffee shop he stops and gets them both drinks and a cookie for Abby. He figures if someone’s going to try and actually run a business right now, least he can do is pump some money into it.

He even drinks his tea. The first sip is tentative, expecting the sludgy-gray-metalic yuck of the water in the Navy Yard, but he doesn’t taste it. Maybe they’ve got the water system fixed, or maybe they used bottled water, either way, decaf Harvest Chai is just pleasantly creamy and spicy.

It’s also not as emotionally bad as he thought it might be. Of course, they aren’t to the Navy Yard, yet.

He’s driving, and that’s intentional. If he can’t handle driving to the building, he won’t be emotionally stable enough to handle driving away from it. So, he’s driving, that way there’s no shot of Abby getting him further in than he can stand.

He can feel his nerves creeping up on him. His jaw is starting to go tight. Tim’s not sure if he’s afraid of being afraid, or afraid of what’s coming. Not sure if the anticipation is the problem, or if there’s an actual problem lurking.
“You still okay?” Abby asks, aware of the fact that he’s driving pretty slow, which isn’t much of a problem. There’s some traffic, but not a lot of it.

He nods, just a slight up down of his chin.

“Really?”

“Yeah.” His voice is tense as he says it. “Little hurt now, less hurt later.” He’s convincing himself.

“Okay. But if you look like you get any deeper in than you are now, I’m vetoing this trip.” Her hand rests on his leg, and helps ground him.

“Thanks.” He exhales long and slow, and jiggles his right wrist at her. She snaps the band for him.

“I’m okay. In the car. You’re next to me. We’re turning onto Ruthers, and then we’ll drive a quarter mile and turn again…” He narrates the whole trip in, but he does make it to the front gate of the Navy Yard, without a panic attack.

But he doesn’t look past the gate. He doesn’t check the buildings. And he doesn’t watch Abby go in. (Though he does demand that she send him a text the second she’s inside and let him no she’s safe.)

As soon as she’s out, he whips into a fast u-turn and gets out of there, again narrating the ride out, until he’s past 495 and heading to the house.

He feels shaky, and tired, but he made it in and out. He didn’t let the fear stop him. And it wasn’t comfortable, but it didn’t hurt him.

As he tells Rachel the next day, “I was fine.”

It’s not until later that day, in the house, hammering away with Gibbs, that it hits him that he was in DC, but he didn’t smell it. He wonders if that’s part of why it didn’t hit so hard.

Work on the house follows a pretty relaxed and slow schedule, often with breaks where someone grabs a quick nap.

Gibbs has his saw set up outside on the back porch. That’s the spot where they really can’t talk while work is going on. Too loud.

But that part of the work tends to happen for an hour or so. Ducky measures. Gibbs saws. Tim, Bishop, and Allan move lumber in, one two by four at a time. (And none of them are pleased to be only carrying one in.) Then they lay them out where they’re going to go.

After all of the measuring, sawing, and moving is done, it’s hammering time. For the first bit of wall, the whole crew builds the wall section the way they did when they were framing in Gibbs’ basement. One chunk at a time. Then they prop it up, shove it into place, and get out the drills.

Tim’s the only one in the crew who can comfortably reach the ceiling without having to get more than two steps up on the stepladder, so he’s in charge of the screws that anchor the wall section to the ceiling. He’s also slow at it. And has to take breaks. The stupid drill weights about five pounds, but he’s doing it up, over his head, and he gets tired very fast.
Gibbs and Bishop’ll take the lower screws. Between the two of them, they’ll get the wall studs secured to the floor in about a minute, and then rejoin Ducky and Allan, working on the building the next section. Tim keeps working away, three or four screws at a time, take a little break, four or five more, another break, and so on and so forth.

Ducky’s taking a break from framing, and Tim’s getting a rest from securing the wall to the ceiling.

“Any news from Penny and Jake?” Tim asks.

“Oh, yes. They’ve found a place for us. And two more ‘Ambassadors.’ On the 14th, the ‘official convoy’ of the District of Columbia Diplomatic Corps is heading north. We even have shiny, new, to us, at least, cars.” They’re very gently used Nissan Leafs. Low emissions, and low price because they don’t have the ‘status’ that goes with a Prius. The District of Columbia Diplomatic Corps is attempting to set a tone for thriftiness and environmental consciousness.

“You going, too?” Tim asks Bishop, who’s hammering with Gibbs and Allan.

“Yeah. Penny found a building in Harlem that was willing to give us a floor of furnished apartments at a steep discount.”

“I thought every hotel in the city was offering you penthouses?” Allan asks.

“They were. That was part of the hold up, figuring out who owned those hotels, and what they might want. The guys in Harlem know Penny from back in the day,” Bishop replies, remembering Penny talking about being a Naval wife in the early fifties leading the integration charge for base housing and the like. She ended up good friends with the wives of the men who, once upon a time were Navy enlisted, and now own several apartment buildings in Harlem.

“She was also cognizant of the fact that the Harlem connection would… help to provide a visual reminder that the population of the District of Columbia is not just well-heeled lobbyists and congressional aides,” Ducky adds.

“And help remind that part of the population that things are changing.” Bishop shrugs at that, not sure how much anyone actually in the city of DC cares about stuff like that right now.

“Is Jarvis pleased?” Tim asks.

“We haven’t spoken to him. I think he’s so busy right now, he doesn’t care what we do, as long as we take care of it and don’t bother him with the details.”

Gibbs smirks at that.

Bishop shoots him a questioning glance.

“How he ran the Navy, too.”

When they wrap up for the afternoon, Tim’s tired, his arms are sore, but the good sore that goes with working out, and ready for a quiet night at home followed by a long sleep.

“Tomorrow night,” Gibbs says. “Shabbos at our place. Dinner starts at sunset.”

“I went back into the city, drove to the Navy Yard, and didn’t have a complete meltdown.” Tim tells Rachel the next morning.

“That’s good. And have you tried talking to your family?”

“Yeah… It’s harder than I thought it would be.”

“To make yourself talk?”

“No… I can talk to them about anything. It’s physically difficult. I feel wiped out when I’m done. Exhausted all over.”

“This is work, Tim. Healing is work.”

“Yeah, great…” Like he doesn’t have enough work in his life these days.

“At least you’ve got time to do this work, without having to try to balance it with all of your other jobs.”

He nods a little. “There is that.”

“So, why were you in the city?”

“Dropping Abby off…” Tim tells her about what they’ve been up to, and they talk more about what he did, why he did it, and how it worked out. Rachel doesn’t take him back to the last mob. She’s watched the news reports, which have it labeled as a food riot, though the level of detail is sketchy. She’s checked twitter, and saw the way it blew up when someone noticed there was food there. She’s seen pictures and footage from people in the crowd, and even watching it online is terrifying. She doesn’t want to imagine living it.

She’s thinking that getting Tim grounded on the rest of it is a good plan, get him on more solid footing, and then they can break into what’s going on with that last mob later, when he’s got a firmer foundation to stand on.

They meet at Gibbs’ place a bit before Sunset on Friday. Penny decided that if this was her last weekend at home for the immediately foreseeable future, she was hosting Shabbos, and that was that.

The whole clan is there. (Granted, this is accomplished by Tony and Ziva Skyping in, along with surprise Skype visitors Senior and Delphine. Their whole neighborhood is charcoal right now, so they don’t intend to head back to the US anytime in the immediate future.) As well as the extended clan.

Even Diane and Draga show up.

Dinner is loud, and boisterous, close to twenty people stuffed into one house, all celebrating that they’re alive, and whole, and there are pile and piles and piles of glorious food all laid out in front of Tim’s surprised to see Draga look nervous when he sees him. He can’t for the life of him think of why Draga, who made it through everything else the last month had to throw at him would find him unnerving, until he starts to really think about it and realizes what he saw right before he left.

Draga does get a few minutes alone with him later in the night, and very quietly asks him, “Are you going to tell Diane?”

Tim shakes his head. “You were on the wall, right?”

Draga nods.

“Close enough to see their faces?”

“They were so hungry.” Draga bites his lip, voice anguished.

Tim nods back. That’s the thing he hasn’t been able to make himself say, not yet. Not to Rachel, or to his family, or even himself, not really. Though he knows he did it. He killed starving people, a lot of them. He didn’t deserve that food any more than they did, but he had it, and he killed to keep it. He snaps his wrist band, hard.

He couldn’t see their faces, not well, not close enough to watch them die. He’d hit one, or he’d hit an incendiary, and they/it would just vanish in the crowd. Mostly. He could almost pretend that… But he won’t. He remembers some of them, like the plow driver, and that’s enough. “Yeah. I… Only reason I walked in was they were sending me home. I… couldn’t take it anymore. It broke me…” he snaps the band again, starting to feel the cold air, hear the screams, and smell scorched death, and the sting helps to put him back in Gibbs’ house. “And I… wasn’t as close as you were. So… whatever you had to do to get through that night.” Tim shakes his head again. “I’m not judging.”

“Thanks.” And Draga does look relieved, for a second. “Just… couldn’t stand feeling that way, seeing them…”

Tim nods at that. “I get it.” He inclines his head and adds, “Doesn’t mean you shouldn’t tell her, though. Especially, if there’s a shot this might come back to bite you later.”

That kills his relief. “I…” Draga looks very nervous at that.

“Doesn’t mean you should, either. I don’t know the answer on this one. I really don’t know the answer for Diane, who’s got a shit load of history when it comes to fooling around. But that’s between you two, which is somewhere I don’t intend to go.”

Allan finds Shabbos interesting. He’s finding all of this, interesting. His own family dynamic is straightforward, and somewhat tense.

He loves his parents. They love him. They’re “accepting of his lifestyle,” as well as they can be. (To the point where they cut ties with their church and his mother’s mother when he came out.) They don’t make stupid comments. They don’t make his boyfriends feel unwelcome.

They did the “good parent” thing. They are actively trying to be “good parents.” He loves them for it. He knows way too many people whose parents told them to, literally, go to Hell. He knows kids who were beaten and thrown out of the house. He knows how bad it could have been, and that he’s been blessed with people who love him and adore him.

And he absolutely knows they think him being gay is really gross. They think having a relationship with him is more important than their discomfort, so they work at it, but… They’re tense and nervous and spend every minute walking on eggshells because they’re afraid of saying or doing something that’ll annoy/embarrass/make him feel unwelcome.

So, when they’re together they talk a lot about neutral subjects, like them remodeling their house, or his job, or anything that isn’t about him or them, or him and them, or him and sex.

Right now, he’s in Gibbs’ house, at a formal religious dinner, that is, from what he can tell, a religion that no one physically located at this table is part of. (Though he’s not entirely sure about the McGees. Dr. Palmer has mentioned that the DiNozzos are Jewish, and he knows that Shabbos has been hosted at the McGee house, too, so he’s not sure.) He is sure they have a lot of practice at this, and practice brings ease, but… He can imagine his parents trying this. It would be perfect. All the details elegant and carefully designed, and it would be hollow and awkward.

But this isn’t. It’s warm and comfortable and the laughter is real.

This is also the first time he’s gotten to see all four McGees and Palmers interacting with each other in a relaxed atmosphere as a foursome.

He knows something is up. He doesn’t know what. They’re just too… easy with each other, in a way that people just aren’t. Not with their friends. Hell, not with their significant others, not usually.

He knows that everyone who is part of the intimate family knows what’s up, and though he can’t make himself wrap his mind around the idea that Gibbs or Ducky is wildly liberal when it comes to sex or the variations thereof, they seem genuinely comfortable with what’s going on.

In fact, the ease with which they treat the four of them, even when McGee cuts a piece of lamb for Breena and feeds it to her off of his fork, (which would have caused his mom to swallow her tongue) as she’s got her hands full of Anna, or when Breena’s rubbing Abby’s back as Tim’s off talking with Draga, or that one moment where McGee is having a hard time, and Dr. Palmer gently strokes the back of his hand, is making him think that whatever the hell it is he thinks he’s seeing, isn’t there.

“Leon, any news?” Tony asks over Skype. They’re in Sicilly right now, having a very late dinner, on an extremely early breakfast, in order to be up and with the rest of the crew.

“We’re officially off until after the election. Technically, right now, there is no United States Navy or Marines, so there’s no NCIS. Congressman King tells me that, technically, until there’s a clean election, there’s no United States so everything that possibly can be put on hold, like us, is on hold.” Leon chews a bite of his lamb. “He also tells me that as soon as the first election is done, before they’ve even got a count, we’re back. They don’t care who wins, it’s the election itself that conveys legitimacy.”

Jake nods along with that. “And, from what I’m hearing, until DC becomes a state and/or I’ve got some sort of reciprocity deal set with the Congress, you won’t be able to use anything in the District as a headquarters.”

“That’ll go fast,” Penny says. “They’re way more interested in getting that deal inked than anything else we’ve got to offer. They don’t care if the District ends up being a separate country, as long as they don’t have to pay to relocate everyone who used to be in DC.”

“The election is the 12th. You’ll be authorized to go back to work by 12:01 on the 13th,” Jake says.

“And they’ll expect us to be up and running by 12:02 on the 13th, right?” Leon says dryly.

“Probably not much later than that. We’ve got to see how many of the states are willing to give their Marines and Naval personnel, equipment, and bases back. California and Texas aren’t interested in letting the US have any of the equipment, bases, or ships back. The troops, that’s settled, they won’t hold them if they want to return to US service, and we won’t demand they serve out their tours if they don’t want to. But all the fancy, expensive toys…” Jake lets that trail off.

“They’re trying to get leasing deals. Same with the parks and historical sites,” Penny says.

“And, can I expect you back on the 13th?” Leon asks Tony and Ziva.

They glance at each other. “Me, yes,” Tony says. “Don’t get too comfy sitting on your butt, Draga!”

Draga flashes him a ‘how could I?’ sort of look.

“For right now, I’m still helping Diane, and then… Abbi…?” Ziva asks.

“Unlike the Navy, we’re up and running. I don’t know when, or if, the corruption hearings are starting back up again, but, it also doesn’t matter much. I’m claiming the fall of the government killed all of the contracts we had, booting anyone even remotely suspicious who’s left, and starting clean. By the first, I’ll have an all new slate of people, we’re up and ready to go.”

“How are you enforcing border law if we don’t have any?” Allan asks.

Abbi smiles. “Not touching that. We’re going after old-fashioned crimes. Murders, kidnappings, piracy. The rest of it, I’m turning a blind eye. I don’t have hard numbers yet, but since we stopped going after drug smugglers, we’re seeing murder rates dropping in the areas they usually bring stuff in. Don’t know if there’s actually less violence, or if they’re shifting where they’re bringing product in, but there are a bunch of port towns having a much less bloody month than usual.”

Tim’s glad to see at least some good is coming out of this.

“Looking forward to getting your house back?” Allan asks him as they’re both homing in on another slice of chocolate cake.

Tim feels unsettled by that question, and it must show on his face.

“Just, with Agent Bishop and Jake leaving on Wednesday… I figured, since I’m going into work with them, that we’d swap again. You’d get your house back, and I’ll go stay with Dr. and Mrs.
Palmer.”

He frantically thinks of something to say. “Uh… Yeah… that does make sense,” is what comes out. He saves quickly with, “But… don’t rush out of my place. I’m sure you want some on your own time, too, and four grown-ups and three kids is a lot easier than one kid and two adults.”

Allan nods, and Tim knows that question was a trap, designed to see what he’d do with it.

“Allan?”

“Thank you. I would rather like some on my own time. The power company has on its website that my block should have electricity again by Friday. The street cleaning crews say they’ll have the cars towed out of the way by Monday.”

Tim sighs, mentally. “That’s just a few more days. Stay at my place until you can go home. We’re fine at Jimmy’s, and he’s not sick of us, yet. No need for you to move again.”

“If you say so, Director McGee…”

“You know that when we’re not at work, it really is okay to use my first name? Hell, when we’re at work, you can use my first name. I’m not your boss.”

Allan thinks about that for a moment. “Okay, Tim.”

“And, when we’re not at work, it’s okay to use his,” he glances over to Jimmy, who’s on the sofa, talking with both Abbies, “first name, too. It’s about the line between work and home, and right now, we’re home. Dragging the titles into it now just blurs the line in the opposite direction.”

Allan nods.

Tim thinks about Jimmy’s comment about Allan keeping secrets and being very discrete. Then he adds, “I mean, unless you aren’t comfortable with it. In that case, call us by title. That’s fine, too. Just, don’t want you feeling like you’ve got to keep the walls up all the time.”

Allan smiles a little at that and nods gently. “Thanks, Tim. I get it.”

______________________________________________________________________________

Tim listens to Leon talking about going to St. Croix with the family, and none of them miss the engagement ring Lara’s wearing. Leon gets some good-natured poking along the lines of ‘took you long enough,’ along with a lot of questions, for both of them, about what sort of wedding, and when they want to do it.

He hears about plans for the DC Consulate.

He talks some about their house.

He intentionally drifts away from Jimmy, Breena, and Allan talking about The Morgue. On Monday, Allan’ll be joining them there. He’s still too thin, and slow, but he’s ready to be back doing his job.

Leon pulls him aside, and mentions to him that if they’re going to be up and running by the 13th, he’s going to have all the Directors get together on the 1st. Tim even agrees to go to it without feeling too unsettled.
Allan’s back at the McGee’s house. Bishop and Jake have headed up to bed. They’ve got the master bedroom now, and though he could have the guest room if he wanted, the soundproofing in this house is awful, and he doesn’t need to know any more about the intimate life of Agent Bishop and her husband than he already does.

So, he’s staying in McGee’s office.

It’s a very tidy space. He gets the sense that both McGees get very uncomfortable if their personal spaces are messy. It’s also very clean. (That’s likely part of why McGee was having such a hard time in the Navy Yard, clean and tidy were two things the Navy Yard wasn’t.)

Like with Jimmy’s house, there are pictures of both families, but not as many of them. Allan’s sure that those shots are likely buried in computers and phones here. And, though he sleeps in a room with two computers, he’s not about to attempt to use either of them.

He’s sitting on the futon in McGee’s office, thinking. About the layout in the house they’re working on. Two bedrooms for the adults, but one bathroom… Could be about saving space, making sure they had extra space in those bedrooms. Though the section of the house they’ve claimed for their own isn’t small.

If they were trying to… what… pull one over on the “adults?” He kills that train of thoughts dead. It might be possible to come up with something that Ducky literally cannot see. His eyes aren’t great anymore, but he’s not stupid, and there’s nothing wrong, at all, with Penny’s eyes, and Gibbs knows everything, so…

So… what?

Allan looks around, and notices the typewriter on the desk. Then he remembers something that Dr… Jimmy had told him about McGee. McGee writes. He bases his characters off of the people around him. If you read those books, you know what Mc…Tim thinks about the people around him.

Allan checks the bookshelf. There are five Gemcity books. He grabs the first one and starts reading.

He’s halfway through when he remembers Dr. Palmer’s comment about how nothing in the first book ever happened. He wonders a bit, as he’s reading the necrophilia dream, what the hell Dr. Palmer could have possibly done to piss Tim off that much. He also understands Jimmy’s comment about being a saint for putting up with McGee.

Allan smirks a bit, and keeps reading.
For the most part, November is a quiet month. Which they all need.

Tim regains stamina and weight fairly quickly. Though he knows it’ll be a while before he’s back to where he was before the Navy Yard, let alone the Stennis. He can feel it in how quickly he gets tired, or how his arms shake when he tries to do something too heavy. (Unfortunately, too heavy often means something that this time six months ago would have barely hit his ‘this is an issue’ register.)

But every day, he hammers a bit longer, and can carry more wood, (though he doesn’t yet have the control to trust himself with sawing) and as the days pass, the walls go up.

That first week after Allan’s joined Jimmy and Breena at The Morgue, it’s him, Gibbs, Ducky, and Bishop.

Ducky knows that he needs time with just Gibbs, or, at least, without Bishop, so he and Bishop tend to take one room, and he and Gibbs will work on another. Framing works better with a two man crew, anyway. There’s less shot of getting in each other’s way if there’s just two per wall section.

Mostly, they’re quiet, though sometimes, Tim will talk. Sometimes he doesn’t snap the band quite so fast when a bad thought or memory comes up, sometimes he lets those thoughts form, and then lets them out.

Gibbs listens. He doesn’t say much. There isn’t much he could say, but having someone listen, and more often on the first days, and less on the later ones, grab his hand or shoulder and physically pull him out of it when he gets lost, helps.

The second week, it’s just him and Gibbs. Ducky, Penny, Bishop, and Jake have headed to New York, ready to start their new adventures. Tony and Ziva won’t be back until Saturday.

Tim won’t, ever, talk much about that week. And not because it’s bad, or wrong, or anything like that. But because it’s his and Gibbs’, and because it’s quiet time pulled out of his hyper-verbalized life.

It’s a good week. Building things is useful, like writing, but different. When he writes he organizes the bad things, he arranges them in a way that allows him to deal with them. He’s not there, yet. (Though he has a feeling that writing it out will be the step between where he is now, and finally being able to really deal with what happened there.)

Right now, he’s organizing himself, getting his mind to the point where he can start to break down what happened and put it into context.

And so, as the walls go up, as he stands next to Gibbs, both of them hammering away, measuring and placing and driving nails, he’s building in his head, too, arranging the scaffolding that this story, the final draft of how he’ll understand October, will stand upon.

---

Reclaiming bits of normal helps, too. The first Sunday they’re back, they do some of their normal routine.

No Diner to go to, so that part’s out.
But, they get dressed up, and they meet up with Gibbs and Abbi at a Denny’s. It’s not nearly as good as Elaine’s, but it’s food, and it’s them together, getting ready for church. Finding a place where they can all grab breakfast on a Sunday morning, where three babies and the noise that goes with them isn’t a problem, where six (and often ten) ten adults can fit, goes onto Tim and Gibbs’ to do list.

Church is, like usual, quiet thinking time for Tim. Though, at this particular moment, he’s thinking thoughts that he knows Breena or Abby wouldn’t much like: namely, why worship a God who allows things like this to happen? He’s not much of a believer in the idea of God to begin with, but assuming there is a God, He seems to be sleeping on the job.

Tim’s sitting on a pew, surrounded by well-off, plump people, who by sheer luck, or if this whole God thing is real, divine design, ended up on the right side of a line. Being on that side of the line meant their lives have been disrupted, in some cases, severely, but not ruined, not the way the people in DC had their lives ruined.

And while Tim might, possibly, accept the idea that there is some sort of Creator, and said Creator may have unlimited power and the ability to move mountains and set the world in motion, he’s also sure that he’ll be damned (and likely is, if the Pastor’s right about the whole faith thing) if he’ll ever offer up a word of praise to a creature that can easily prevent suffering, and chooses not to.

He remembers catechism class, and the idea that God allows man free will, allows him to mess things up and torment each other. He entertains the notion of free will versus an omnipotent God, and glances at the man on his right side.

Nothing free will about what happened to Jimmy and Breena. Can’t blame Jon on perverse human cussedness.

He watches Jimmy, and wonders about how it felt to come here, not believing in a merciful God, after his heart had been ripped out by losing Jon, and have people all around you sing praises to the kindness and mercy of an entity that, if it was real, allowed, or in Jon’s case, set in motion, the most painful experience you’d ever have.

He brushes Jimmy’s hand, very aware of how much love he has for Breena, how he put himself through that, because the idea of a loving creator who makes it all right in the end was the only thing that gave her the strength to get out of bed those days.

To Tim, that’s love what love looks like. That’s selfless, concrete, active love. Not the invisible cloud of forgiveness and mercy taken entirely on faith that the Pastor’s talking about right now.

Jimmy looks up from Tim’s fingers on the back of his hand, and shoots Tim a curious glance that Tim shakes off. Maybe one day they’ll talk about it, maybe not. It’s not really important. Everyone else is standing up to start singing again.

At the end, when the service is over, and everyone mills around, chatting, he ends up with a lot of people all wanting to know what really happened, looking for the inside story. Many of them were self-congratulatory about ‘not believing in any of those SOBs...’ and ‘always knowing they were up to something’ though he knows he’s seen a lot of political bumper stickers in the parking lot since he’s been going here. (And he noticed a lot of them ripped off or blacked out now.)

Like usual, Sunday supper is at the Slater house, and there are more than a few moments where Tim feels significantly weirded-out by the fact that Ed really approves of what they did. He’s actually got kind words for Jimmy about dropping everything and leaving NCIS with the girls. He’s happy as a clam that Tim had the good sense to give them the tip off. Apparently running ‘his’ girls to Canada if there was any shot of danger struck him as a great plan. (Tim’s getting the sense that Ed’s counting Abby and Kelly among ‘his girls,’ which is also vaguely irksome.)

It’s months later when Tim realizes that Breena knew what was going to happen the day before it did. She made sure her family moved their assets around, got them out of the dollar, and sold all of their US and DC bonds. Of course, he’s a flipping hero to the Slaters, he’s the guy who made sure Breena had the information to keep them flush through all of it. In the long run, they ended up better off than they were before. Two of their competitors had to close, they were able to buy a new branch and set Breena’s sister Christine up with her own mortuary, and there was a bumper crop of people in need of their services. Put those together, along with every Chaplain in charge of doing family visits to inform next-of-kin knowing about Palmer and Slaters’ or Slaters’ and fall and winter of 2016 were very lucrative for the Slater clan.

Jeannie keeps trying to get him to eat more. Gibbs and Abbi, too. She’s actually handing them more food while they’re still eating the food they’ve got. If, at any point during the three hours they’re there, he doesn’t have a full plate in his hand, she rushes back and loads more food onto it.

Collin’s chatting with Tim and Jimmy, playing with Molly, and says, “I guess MMA’s out for a while, still?”

Jimmy nods at that. “Building won’t even be open again until after the election. But ‘round about New Year’s you want to go, and I’m game. Tony should be back by then, too.”

“You in, Tim?”

Tim shrugs. “We’ll see. I’ll probably come work out. I know Jimmy and Ziva have some plans for torturing me into ‘building up strength.’”

Jimmy smiles at him. “Exactly. Rehab on your arm and leg got derailed for a bit there, and that won’t do. Ziva and I have been talking about things for the two of you to do.”

“She’s not going to fight, right?” There’s an alarmed expression on Collin’s face at that idea.

“No. Even our Ninja doesn’t fight four… five… she’ll be almost six months pregnant by then,” Tim says. “They’re got weights and some sort of yoga stuff that she’ll be amazing at because she’s all pregnant and flexible, and I’ll look like a dried up piece of jerky trying to bend on.”

Collin smiles a bit at that idea. “Well, whenever you get back to it. I’m ready and willing. Even if it is ‘yoga stuff.’” He glances at Ed, and says softly, “Been missing the weekly Get-Out-of-Sunday-Supper-Early club meetings.”

Tim and Jimmy both laugh a bit at that.

Jimmy does have him doing more rehab work on his arm and ankle, neither of which are in particularly great shape after a month of not enough food and not doing anything to keep working on them.

All of the ‘heavy lifting’ strength work is coming from working on the house, but flexibility, range of motion, stretching out muscles that clamped down hard while he was in the Navy Yard, that’s a half an hour or so of work every morning.

While Jimmy does his usual morning asanas, he’s got Tim going through poses designed to get his right arm and left leg doing what it needs to be doing.

When Tim and Gibbs work on the house, there are things he can say to Gibbs that he just can’t say to anyone else. Not to Jimmy or Abby or Breena, because it’d horrify them, and not to Rachel, because he just doesn’t think she’d get it.

“You ever,” he says, quietly, as they lift the skeleton of what will be the back wall of Tony and Ziva’s bathroom into place, “feel like you paid too much for your life?”

Gibbs gives him the keep talking look.

“Like, it was you or them, but… the math doesn’t work out. And there were too many them.”

“You feeling that way?”

Tim sniffs a bit. They’ve got the wall up, so he sits down on the floor. “I don’t want to be dead.” And he doesn’t. He just, deeply, dearly wishes he’d made some better decisions. “But…”

“Why you?”

Tim shakes his head. He knows the ‘why me’ feeling. “That was when you requested that weekend off and Cassidy’s team was on and we weren’t. Why do we get to live and they don’t? You try to be good after that. Give more to charity, work harder, be better, try to… I don’t know, earn the chance you got. If you’re here, you might as well be worth it, but… That’s not this…”

He wishes they were in the basement. He could really use some scotch to make these words flow easier.

“They were hungry, Jethro. The first group… they were rage, coming to kill… just to kill.” He shakes his head, and Jethro wraps an arm around him. He remembers that group, and Tim’s description does a fine job of summing them up. “But the second… They were hungry… just… They just wanted to eat, to live. I didn’t deserve that food. I didn’t earn it. I didn’t find it. I didn’t grow it, or pay for it, or anything. I didn’t have any special claim on it. It was just there, with me.”

Tim doesn’t make himself pull out of the memories. He’s aware of being with Jethro, of sitting on a plywood floor, surrounded by the skeleton of a house. He’s also on the roof, feeling his own hunger, the gnawing acid pain of having just thrown up, bile in his mouth. He can see the crowd in his mind, the snow plow driver, the flashes of fire he shot at, the people who were coming, desperate, hungry, starving people who just wanted enough food to keep themselves going.

“I didn’t run out of bullets. Not that time. Shot and shot and shot and kept doing it, over and over, to break the mob. All they wanted to do was eat.”

Gibbs rubs his back.
“There were kids in the crowd, teenagers. I didn’t aim for any of them, but…”

Jethro nods, and keeps rubbing his back.

“You got in a few hours later, brought more food. Why’d we have to hold onto it like that? We weren’t going to die if… Maybe, if we’d put it outside the walls… Maybe they wouldn’t have come toward us. Just taken it and gone. I mean… If we’d done that, and they still came at us, I’d be okay, you know?”

Gibbs nods. He gets that.

“But we didn’t. I didn’t refuse. I didn’t step down. I killed hungry people. I killed a lot of them. For what? A couple hundred calories?” His voice is wasted as he says that, withered, and he’s past crying, distraught.

Jethro keeps rubbing his back.

---

Good days generally outweigh and outnumber bad days.

And, no matter how the day looks like it’s shaping up, Tim tries to pull some good out of it.

Good can be simple, time spent snuggling with the girls and his loves. It can be rewatching a movie he liked as a kid, and giggling hysterically with the rest of them as they finally understand the ‘grown-up jokes’ that blew right past them as kids.

Sometimes good is complicated. It’s satisfaction at working with Gibbs, figuring out how to make a particular line of wall in the house work with where he’s got to put the electrical and HVAC.

A lot of the time, good is about pure, physical pleasure. Sex and/or food.

In that the people he prefers to have sex with are all working during the day, that leaves food for his daytime pleasure pursuits.

He’s still got Jimmy dictating portion size, keeping tight rein on how much and when he’s eating, but he’s got complete control over what he’s making.

And what he’s making is, at least twice a week, a concerted push to go from an okay cook to a really good one. He’s never going to be Elaine, but he’s working on it.

Most days, he spends at least an hour reading about food, researching recipes and menus, and then, twice a week, he Gibbs only work until the early afternoon. Those days Tim’ll hit the market, and really get into shopping. Into looking at the food, smelling it, getting a feel for it. He’s starting to learn how to eat with his eyes, fingers, and nose, learning how to tell what will taste good before it’s all put together.

It’s mid-November, so it’s the height of comfort food season. Soups, stews, braises, mounds of fluffy mashed potatoes, fresh breads and pies, lots of hearty, filling, spicy food.

Gibbs goes with him. He doesn’t mind eating well, and when Tim’s on his Mission: Make Super Dinner, he and Abbi are invited, too. He’s… amused is probably the best way to put it, to watch Tim carefully going through every bunch of cilantro looking for the freshest/most flavorful one of them.

He’ll watch, and think about how he’s dealt with his own demons, and come to the conclusion that this is likely healthier than not sleeping, drinking like a fish, working until he’d drop, beating the shit out of any suspect who got out of line, fucking any woman who would let him, marrying a few of them, and building boats in his basement that he’d then set fire to.

Somethings you just have to live with, and if this helps ease that… It seems okay to Gibbs.

Tim usually goes for fairly simple dishes. He doesn’t yet have the knife skills to try his hand at anything that requires precision knife work, and he doesn’t have the patience yet to deal with something that has fifty ingredients all of which require some sort of different preparation and need to end up on a plate at the same time.

So, fairly simple, fairly basic, let the ingredients do the heavy-lifting style cooking. One night might be chili, for example. But he’ll have read seven articles and watched three videos about how to make excellent chili, and have gone through everything to get the highest quality meat, chiles, and spices. He’ll make the cornbread to go with it from scratch (and that will have involved nine more articles and two more videos), and he’ll spend two more hours looking for the perfect beer to go with what he’s made, and it will be served at the exact right temperature.

All in all, as ways to deal with anxiety and grief go, this is the one the family as a whole seems to like best.

(And, though Gibbs wouldn’t admit it, he’s rather liking all the Good Eats episodes he and Tim are watching, and is starting to make a list of the shows he wants to check out. Given Alton Brown’s attachment to cooking over live fire, let alone cooking at his hearth, Gibbs is thinking he might go so far as to actually buy some of this guy’s books. After the bacon episode, he’s also thinking he might be interested in making a smoke house for himself.)

Rachel thinks working on creating things is a good coping mechanism, too. And she tells Tim that his pumpkin spice muffins are delicious.

The next Sunday, as he sits quietly, barely listening to the Pastor, Tim thinks about forgiveness.

Supposedly, that’s why they’re all there. That’s the offer, endless, condition-less, all-encompassing forgiveness for everything.

All you have to do is sincerely ask and believe it will be given.

He looks at the scars on the back of his hand, the lines from his father’s crimes against him, and thinks of his own crimes against nameless strangers.

He doesn’t want to forgive, and he doesn’t want to be forgiven. This time he touches his own hand. This, all of it, the pain, the joy, the good bits, and the bad ones, it’s all him, and he owns every minute of it. Triumph and guilt are both his, both earned by his actions, they both define him and shape him.

He might not like carrying the weight of it, but it’s his, and he doesn’t want to hand any of it off.

Jimmy, Abby, and Breena don’t work every day. And there really is only so much comedy you can watch in any given month. And there’s only so much healing… working on healing you can do.
There’s time where they’re just being, together.

Gibbs and Abbi are still healing up, too. Still tired, but rebounding well. As they get to the middle of November, a month before Tim and Jimmy’s birthday, they offer to take the girls overnight. “Early birthday present,” Gibbs says, knowing exactly what the four of them like to do to and with each other, and that in another month Abby’ll be too pregnant to really enjoy much in the way of food or sex.

As birthday presents go, time on their own with their ladies is exactly what they want. They appreciate it, greatly.

Tim supposes they could go out dancing, but Abby’s hit the point where too much standing up means aching feet, and her left hip is unhappy all the time these days. And even with all of them together, he’s not feeling in a very clubbing sort of mood. (It doesn’t hit the front of his brain for months, though he does, finally, realize that all the clubs they like are in DC, and he didn’t want to know if they didn’t make it through.)

Home, in front of the fireplace, or in bed: that’s his idea of a celebration these days.

They go out for a nice dinner, and end their ‘early birthday’ celebration at home. In bed. The sex is good. He doesn’t know if this is a side effect of having been so close to dead, emotionally if not physically, or if he’s still riding the rush of having his loves back again, but the sex these days is really good.

Still, there’s only so much fucking four people can do, and that leaves a lot of time for other things. Like happy stories.

Tim turned the thermostat up so they could be comfy in just their skin, (even though it’s sleetimg outside) so they’re lying around, on top of the blankets, warm, flush, post-orgasmic but not sleepy. (Too early to be sleepy.) Nowhere to go and no one to tend to for hours and hours.

Tim’s on his side, Abby spooned against him, as he rubs her hip. Sean’s decided that he’d really like to get himself wedged into her pelvis in such a way that her left hip aches in almost any position. (She’s got a countdown on her phone, telling her exactly how long it is until Jan 28th, little boy joins the outside, and her hip stops aching.) Jimmy’s crashed out on his back, feet near Tim’s head. Abby’s holding his ankle. Breena’s on her side, back against Jimmy’s side, head on his shoulder, slowly stroking Abby’s foot.

Breena sighs, feeling warm and loose and happy. “First time stories. First time you kissed someone.”

Abby laughs a little at that. “Really kissed, or do you want the story about the nuns telling me not to smooch the other kids at church?”

“Really kissed, unless the little kid kiss stories are cute.”

Tim drags his fingers up Abby’s spine, and kisses the back of her neck. “There’s a picture of me, I don’t remember it firsthand, kissing one of the girls at my preschool graduation. I guess I’m four in that shot. I do remember telling my grandmother I was going to marry her.”

That gets a chuckle.

“The boys ran away from me when I tried to kiss them,” Abby says. “They thought girls were icky.”

“Did you catch one?” Jimmy asks.
“Yeah, but Sister MaryAnne made me let him go before I kissed him.” Abby mock pouts at that.

“I was… I don’t know, seven, eight? I had the biggest crush ever on David Ruch. I don’t think he had a crush on me, though, and he really didn’t want to get kissed. Cooties. He didn’t want any of my cooties,” Breena says.

“Appallingly bad taste on his part,” Jimmy adds.

“Yeah, well. We rode the bus together, and I’d always sit next to him, and he’d try to get away. I think I scared him. The windows would get foggy in the winter, and I’d draw our names in a heart, and he’d erase them.”

“Oh…” Abby pets Breena’s foot.

“Yeah, well, that’s as close as I got to kissing games as a kid.”

“How about you, Jimmy?” Tim asks.

He sighs, eyes warm. “In first grade, there was a little girl. Meagan Harahan. I was so in love with her. I’d write her notes… well, like Breena, draw her hearts, I wasn’t writing much then, and carefully fold them up, and stuff them in our mail slot… Took years to figure out why they never got to her. I don’t think she was really aware of me. We didn’t play together or ride the bus together or anything. But I’d sit on my side of the classroom and just watch her. I still have a really clear image of her hair. It was light blonde, almost white, shoulder length, perfectly straight and fine. It looked so soft. Pretty much the exact opposite of my hair. She’d wear these plastic headbands. Molded ones, little loops, like a chain, or butterflies, or flowers, and they were all soft girl colors, pink, yellow, purple, peach, like that. I can remember watching her, so in love, and wanting to pet her hair.”

“You get to kiss her?” Tim asks.

Jimmy shakes his head, “Nah, my first kiss was also my first real kiss.”

The other three watch him, expectantly.

“Uh… Seventh or eighth grade…” He thinks for a few more seconds. “Seventh. I was thirteen.”

“Eighth, we turned thirteen in eighth grade,” Tim says.

“Uh… no. I turned thirteen in seventh grade.” He might be a bit fuzzy about when that kiss happened, but he very clearly remembers his thirteenth birthday, which was something of a big deal because he was finally a teenager, and he knows that was seventh grade.

“You two have the exact same birthday, whose memory is off?” Abby asks.

“I had to live with Penny after getting out of high school because I couldn’t rent a place for myself because I was seventeen. I was thirteen in eighth and ninth grade,” Tim says. Like Jimmy’s he’s sure he’s got the age and grades right.

“Did you do two years of kindergarten or something?” Breena adds. They all know, college-wise, that Tim’s the class of ’99 and Jimmy’s the class of ’01, but until this point they’d all assumed that was because when his father died, Jimmy had to drop down to part time school and work to make enough to pay his tuition. They’ve never talked about what year they started college.

“I didn’t do two years of kindergarten, or two years of any other grade.” Though, as Jimmy’s thinking about it, he never was part of the Class of ’99. If he’d done the traditional four years, he would have been the Class of 2000. Granted, if he’d thought about it, he would have just assumed that Tim finished college in three years, rather than he started a year before Jimmy did. So… if Tim started… that’d be fall of ’95… “Where were you when you started kindergarten?”

Tim’s not sure about that, Maryland or California, but he does know that he wasn’t in Delaware with Jimmy. “Not Delaware.”

“Probably different birthday cut off dates. My elementary school best friend had a December birthday, the year before mine, and was in the same grade. In my school district you had to turn five before September 30th to start Kindergarten. In his, you had to turn five before Dec 31st.”

They digest that for a moment and decide it’s plausible.

“All right, we’ve determined that you two ended up in different grades, so, kiss story…” Breena says, leading them back to the topic.

Jimmy smiles and stretches some. He grabs a pillow and props it under his head. “Shelly Curroughs.
So, in Wilmington, in eighth grade, roller skating or blading was a big deal. If you had an extra three bucks, you could get into the rink, spend a few hours circling around, showing off if you were good at it, and having your ear drums blasted into oblivion with Nirvana, U2, and Red Hot Chili Peppers.”

“Smells Like Teen Spirit, One, Under the Bridge…” Tim smiles. He remembers that, well.

“Exactly. A lot of pop I don’t remember, too. Whatever it was, it was loud. I didn’t live too far away from the rink, I had my own skates, and I was good at it.”

“Skates or blades?” Abby asks.

“Blades. Skates weren’t retro, yet, they just meant you didn’t have the money to get blades. Took me a long time to save up for them, but I had blades.”

“For ten minutes until you outgrew them?” Tim asks.

“Just about. Eight months was as long as I could shove my feet into them. And by that point I wasn’t willing to spend another year saving up for a new pair. They looked really cool, and, though I had dork oozing out of every pore of my body when I was thirteen, when I was on the rink, I really could skate, and I had good skates.”

“And Shelly liked that?” Breena asks.

“She did.” Jimmy looks especially satisfied by that. “They had weekly races. She’d usually win the girls’ races. I’d win the boys’ ones. So, we’d keep seeing each other. And, after a few weeks, I worked up the guts to ask her if she’s like to skate with me during the couples’ skate.”

“I remember that!” Breena says with a grin. “That was the only reason to go skating!”

“For people who don’t like skating,” Jimmy adds, looking smug. He liked couples skates just fine, but he liked racing better. “Though, for me, that was the icing on the cake. Several couples’ skates turned into getting soda and snacks together, and then sitting there at one of the tables talking about… I don’t really remember anymore, probably school stuff, holding hands, munching on fries or nachos.”

“Shelly’s your first girlfriend, wasn’t she?” Abby asks.

“Yeah. I lived close enough to the rink that I’d skate there and back. Her parents had to pick her up.
So, I could stay until she had to go. A few weeks into it, we’d been sitting at the table, holding hands, and her Dad came in, gave me the evil eye, told her it was time to go. She got up, smiled at me, gave me a quick kiss, and then skated off to her locker while her Dad glared down at me like he was going to rip my head off, and I did everything I could to meld into the plastic seat and pretend I wasn’t there.”

That gets a bit of laughing from the girls, but Tim’s been there too, and didn’t think it was all that funny.

“Bad timing on her part,” Tim says, a memory or two of being stared down by dads who were less than thrilled with what he wanted to do with their daughters in his mind.

“Yeah, well that was who she was. She liked drama and tended to cause it.” Jimmy shakes his head a bit. Drama, and lack of new skates, is why they broke up about five months later. “I loved her, but… Anyway, later kisses, where… God, he probably wasn’t much bigger than Gibbs, but I was still like 5’4” and a hundred pounds… this bigger-than-life grown-man wasn’t staring me down, were a lot better.”

“Oh, that sounds like there are some good memories,” Abby says.

“Yeah. Let’s just say, I learned how to scout out dark corners of a building young.” That gets some laughing. “And you wouldn’t believe what I can do on a pair of rollerblades.” He flashes them a saucy wink. “So, that’s my first kiss, how about it, Abby?”

“Mmmm… Okay, first off, when I’m not pregnant anymore, we’re going skating.” Jimmy grins at that, he likes that idea. “Next up… kisses…By the time I was fourteen, the boys weren’t running away from getting kissed anymore, and we all had the good sense to do it where the Nuns weren’t watching. And, there were some boys I liked, but… none of them was my first. Okay… so…’ she gives them her naughty/innocent look. “I was fourteen and so was my best friend, Paulette, and we decided that New Orleans was only twenty miles away, and there was no reason at all for us not to go to Mardi Gras. On our own.”

“Oh! This is going to be a story, isn’t it?” Breena says.

“Yeah, probably the sort we don’t tell the girls, either.”

“Probably?” Jimmy says.

“Okay, definitely. Now, Mardi Gras has the advantage of being the sort of thing that you know when it’s going to happen well in advance of it happening. Which means we had planning time. Which we needed. First off, how to get there? Public transportation wasn’t a thing where I grew up. And, yes, we had bikes, but that’s a very long ride, and rolling up on a BMX isn’t going to do anything to disabuse people of the idea that we’re kids.

“Papa had the salvage yard, and some of those cars weren’t in awful shape. I’d been able to drive, at least on the yard, since I was tall enough to look out the windshield and work the pedals. Mostly a matter of moving the cars around, but, still, I knew the basics.

“So, my job is to get us a ride, and make sure it rides.”

“You stole one of your dad’s cars?” Breena asks, eyes wide.

“Tried. I worked that car every minute I could, but I still couldn’t get it running on time. We ended up having to hitch hike.”
“Oh my god,” Jimmy says, eyes wide, staring at Abby in amazement, with a healthy dose of amusement, too. “I did some dumbass shit as a teen, but this is going to blow it all out of the water isn’t it?”

Abby grins. “Oh yeah! You’ve got to remember, it was 1988, and Louisiana. Yeah, hitch hiking wasn’t a great idea, but it wasn’t nearly as stupid as it could have been.

“Paulette was in charge of making sure we blended even more. She… acquired… the 1988 Wet ‘n’ Wild cosmetic line, enough hairspray to make a Texas beauty queen envious, some bras that were not even remotely our size but would eventually be filled in, and the highest high heels we could possibly walk in.

“So, while I’m putting the car together, she’s practicing with the makeup and costumes, making sure that when we get there, we’ll fit in.

“Then came the coup-de-grâce. Permission slips. Paulette had a computer and a printer, so she made up permission slips for an overnight school trip. I forget what we were supposed to be doing, but she made them up, along with a twenty dollar fee, which was a lot of money back then.”

“You got your parents to pay for this trip?” Tim can’t even imagine having this level of brazen moxie.

“Yeah. And trust me, they took it out of both of our hides when we got caught.”

“You got caught!” Breena almost shrieks.

Abby holds up her wrist and shows off the P on her wrist. “Paulette has an A on hers. And… yeah… they noticed.”

“Wait, hold up, you got a tattoo artist to do you when you were fourteen?” Jimmy says.

“Jimmy, 1988, New Orleans, Mardi Gras. Huge party, everyone is drunk, including us, including him, and we probably didn’t look twenty-one, but I’m sure we were passing for eighteen or nineteen, which was old enough.”

“Oh Lord,” Breena sighs.

“Exactly. So, the day comes, we’ve got our backpacks packed, get on our bikes and head toward school. Next step, call in our sick days. No problem. I had extra change for the pay phone. My parents could talk, but they couldn’t hear so I’d been calling myself in for sick days for as long as I could talk. I faked Paulette’s mom’s voice well enough, and off we went!”

“Two hitches, less than an hour all told, and we’re there. We just walk around for a while. Finally found a place to stop, and spent the next hour in the bathroom getting dolled up. Do you guys remember what late ‘80s fashion looked like?”

“Oh God, yeah!” Breena says. “Every color on the planet as long as it wasn’t subtle, clothing in neon, leg warmers, hair teased and high…”

“Yep, we were both rocking our best Cyndi Lauper looks, and out we went. God, we did everything. It’s a street party, and if you’re a pretty girl, you don’t even really have to buy anything; people’ll give you beads and drinks and food and more drinks and… We had a BLAST. Best night ever! Well, up to that point.” She grins at the three people with her. “I’ve had some better nights, since.”
“I was dancing in the street, with Paulette, having the best time ever, and I kissed her. Really kissed her, and she kissed back. I’m never going to forget the taste of Hurricanes and Wet ‘N’ Wild lipstick. I really liked that. But… You know… Catholic. It’s the 80s… the idea that we were doing anything other than ‘practicing’ for when we had ‘a real boyfriend’ didn’t hit either of us. Okay, it’s possible, likely even that Paulette really was just practicing. I mean, I liked boys, and had grown up on the idea that love and attraction were all one thing, and I liked boys, so obviously, what I was feeling for Paulette was just… getting ready for the real thing, right?” Abby rolls her eyes a little. “I was in college before I ever heard the word bisexual. I just figured I liked kissing so much that it’d be awesome no matter who I did it with. Then we stumbled off to the tattoo parlor and got each other’s initials on our wrists.”

“And then you got home and your parents killed you?” Tim asks.

Abby nods. “Just about. We got our literal asses whipped. Hung over and getting your hide tanned is a special sort of Hell. And then we were grounded for the rest of the school year. And we had to pay back the money, times two, which for me meant working every spare minute in the salvage yard. We had to apologize to the school, Mr. Murton, who owned the store Paulette got the makeup, bras, and heels from, had to pay him back, times four, and apologize to each other’s parents. It was a mess.”

“But you still did it the next year,” Tim says, because he knows how those smiley faces on her finger got there, and the angels on her shoulders, too.

“Oh yeah. When they saw the smiley faces, that’s when our parents decided that short of locking us up, we were going, so we might as well have a ride that involved someone invested in making sure we got there and home in one piece. My mom went with us the next year. That’s… one of the last ‘special’ things we did together.” Abby smiles but it’s sad. “That’s the year we got the angels. She didn’t want a tattoo, but we convinced her to get a temporary one drawn on. So, for the rest of the party, we all had angels on our shoulders.”

“Your mom liked to party?” Jimmy asks.

“Both my parents loved a good party. Beneaux was mostly a shrimping town, cash poor, but poor communities that raise food generally eat well. We’d have shrimp boils… everyone over at someone’s house, big pile of shrimp and crawfish and corn and potatoes, jambalaya, collards, all sorts of good stuff, beer and moonshine, music, usually someone’s band… played loud so my parents could feel it. We did that a lot when I was growing up. Sunday dinner, too. That was every week. It’d put you in mind of Breena’s place, but the food would be Cajun, and people would be speaking English and Creole, and signing…” Abby smiles, softly. “Gators. Every year there would be a gator hunt. That was a big deal.”

“What did you do with them?” Jimmy’s somewhere between intrigued and horrified. Even though the alligator was his college mascot, he’s secretly afraid of them.

“Catch them, skin them, one of the old guys in town would tan the skin to make leather. Whoever got the kill shot got to keep the hide. Usually ended up being a pair of awesome boots and a belt. You eat the meat. Really, really good sausages. Mix them up with a lot of garlic and spices, a little pork for the fat. Gators tend to be too tough and gamy for anything else. Though some of the old guys liked to make gator jerky. And Maum Madeline,” she says that name with a deep Louisiana accent, “she was this ancient black lady who lived on the edges of town. Rumor had it she was a witch, and I’m fairly sure she was a voodoo priestess. She made the stew out of it that was blow your mind good.”

“Maum?” Jimmy asks, “First name?”
“Nah. Variation on Mamam. A long time ago she’d been a nanny for some of the better off families. And she had a crop of kids and grandkids and… And in the Deep South… This was more of a thing before I was born… Something the adults did when we were kids, and by the time most of the people my age grew up, you’d see less and less of it, but they didn’t call Black people Mr. or Mrs. ‘Uncle,’ ‘Maum,’ ‘Boy or Girl’ if they were young… She’d been ‘Maum Madeline’ as long as anyone could remember, and that’s what we called her.” Abby smiles at that, too, but it’s an uncomfortable smile. “Louisiana in the seventies and eighties really wasn’t like where any of you grew up.” She pauses for a moment as the other three nod.

“Anyway, gator hunting was always a big deal. The guys go out, and they come back with usually one or two. I mean, they’re really big, you don’t need a lot of them. And they’d skin them. Then the ladies clean them up, butcher them, make the sausages. Next week, best jambalaya ever!

“So, yeah. My parents liked parties, and when we were young there were a lot of them.” She sighs a bit. “Wasn’t the same after we moved in with Aunt Gert. She lived in a different town. And she lived in town. Totally different vibe.” That’s making her feel a bit sad, so she says, “Okay, enough of that… Tim, you’re up, tell us about Jessie Malone.”

“You remember that?” Tim’s surprised to hear that she remembers the name of a girl he’s mentioned once to her.

“Of course I do.” She explains to Jimmy and Breena, “When we went on our trip around the US, I got to see his grandparents’ house, where said first kiss happened. There’s still a spot on a tree where he carved their initials.”

“Awww…” Breena expression makes is clear she thinks that’s sweet.

Tim draws his leg up Abby’s, feeling her skin soft and smooth against his, and takes a moment to put himself back there. “Right before the start of ninth grade. So, I’m 13. We’d start school the Tuesday after Labor Day, so… That would have been the Sunday. Drive home on Monday, school Tuesday…

“My mom had us at my grandparents’ place that summer. The Admiral was God-knew-where, not with us, and she decided sitting around in base housing when we didn’t need to be there wasn’t worth it. So up to Redding we go.

“My grandfather was an amateur astronomer. He loved the stars, and they were far enough of from any of the major cities that you could see them pretty well from his place. He had a really nice telescope, and the two of us had spent a lot of time over the years charting and star gazing.

“That year, they had a new family a few houses down, the Mallones. Jesse and I were about the same age. We were both sarcastic little snots with too many brains and not enough to keep them busy over the summer. Pop took us under his wing and dealt with both of us being bitchy little twits.” Tim chuckles at the memory of them. “She liked star gazing, too. Or, at least, she liked getting out of her own house and coming to ours well enough. And he had enough of an idea as to what was going on that he’d keep a lenient eye on us. Close enough to make sure we weren’t ‘getting into trouble.’ That was the summer that involved the talk and an extremely uncomfortable two hours on what ‘getting into trouble’ meant, so, I mean, I wanted to get into trouble, and was more or less thinking about it non-stop. But the doing part of it wasn’t happening. We were pretty nervous and young and Catholic and sitting on his front porch, so he’d often ‘wander off’ or ‘turn in early’ or ‘go get some ice cream’ and let us have an hour or so to ourselves.”

“Anything interesting happen during those hours?” Breena asks.
“Complaining about our dads? Her dad was an executive with a drug company, and they moved them around every two years, too. Complaining about constantly being the new kid. Complaining about our little sisters.” Tim rolls his eyes. “And feeling put upon by being constantly forced to be free babysitting?” He winks. “Whiny little snots. But we were, that summer, in it together, which was nice. As for interesting, in the sense you mean, only happened once.

“Last night of summer, we’re sitting on the stairs of the front porch, looking up at the sky. Not a lot of stars that night. But, pretty much any night that didn’t involve rain actively falling from the sky we went ‘star gazing.’

“It’s the last night I’ll be up there, and we’ve talked about writing each other. She’s got my address and I’ve got hers and we’re both sitting there, not looking at each other, or the stars much, just feeling… I don’t know, sad… nervous… I’d been working up the courage to hold her hand, when her Mom yelled out that it was bedtime, and she had to come in.

“‘I’ve got to…’ she said, looking really sad.

“I nodded at her, and smiled a little, finally held her hand, squeezed it a bit, and she leaned over, kissed me, sweet and fast, and then stood up and ran off home.”

“You ever see her again?” Breena asks.

“Once. We went up for Christmas, and she was there. Didn’t get to see too much of her, because we were just up for the one day, and it was a ‘family’ day. But we got to spend an hour together. Next summer, we stayed on base. Summer after that, I was back at Gran’s, but her family had moved again.

“We wrote pretty regularly at first, but… Too much stuff… And I didn’t like writing about what was going on with the Admiral, so letters drifted off.” Tim shakes his head a bit, wishing he’d been a better pen pal. “Anyway, what’s your story, Breena?”

Breena smiles. “I snuck out. Sara Fischer was… ‘a bad influence’ and I wasn’t allowed at her house. But she was having a party and everyone was going to be there. Including my best friend, who was allowed to go. So, that night I had a convenient slumber party, and we spent the first four hours of the night at Sara’s.”

“What was a ‘bad influence?’” Abby asks.

“Nothing you’d raise an eyebrow at. Nothing I would, either. Her parents were divorced, so she was home alone a lot. That might have been part of it. She dressed more ‘adult’ than my dad liked. She’d cuss some, in front of adults, but hell or damn, not shit or fuck. So, maybe a bit loud and rough, but… for example, the party, her mom was there, and so were thirty or so other junior high kids, but there wasn’t any alcohol, no drugs, tons of sugar and caffeine, ear bleeding loud music, and… Truth or Dare!”

Jimmy smiles at that; he’s got a few good Truth or Dare memories, too. “You have a good wingman for that?”

She nods. “Of course. Truth or Dare isn’t any fun if there isn’t someone to dare you to do what you want to. Allie, my friend who I was sleeping over with, knew that I had a massive crush on Matt…” Breena pauses, thinking. “Shit… I don’t remember his last name anymore. On Matt… Something or Other, and finally, it gets to her turn, and in proper Truth or Dare fashion she calls me out, and I almost chickened out and asked for Truth, but he was sitting there, on the far side of the circle, floppy blond-brown hair, just long enough to brush his eyes, hazel eyes, ripped up jeans, flannel shirt, glasses—“

“So you’re saying he looked like a cross between Jimmy and I?”

Breena shifts up a little and carefully looks at them, trying to see their fourteen-year-old selves…

“Actually… That’s… You might be onto something with that. His face wasn’t similar, but coloring, build… He was pretty tall and lanky.” She chuckles a bit at that.

“So, you say the magic word, ‘Dare,’” Abby says.

“Yep, and off to Matt I go. I remember feeling really nervous, until I noticed he was smiling, and then I was okay. I made him stand up, and he was a lot taller than I was, so that part was kind of awkward, but I edged up on my tip-toes, and he bent down a little…” Breena’s smiling softly at that memory. “And it was soft and wetter than I was expecting, he tasted like Coke and gum, and when I pulled back I was grinning like crazy.”

“Sexy?” Abby asks.

“Wet. That’s really my main memory of it, really, really wet.”

The other three giggle at that.

“So, you leaped right to tongue kissing?” Jimmy asks.

“I hadn’t intended to, but I think he did, and… yep, wet.”

“Did that kiss lead anywhere?” Tim asks.

Breena shakes her head. “Nah. I wasn’t allowed to do anything even remotely like dating until I was sixteen. So, I couldn’t go to his house. He couldn’t come to mine…”

“You weren’t allowed to have guy friends?” Abby asks.

“Not one on one. If I had a squad of buddies come over, some of them could be boys, but I wasn’t allowed to do anything one on one with a guy. Even at home, with my parents there, I couldn’t have a guy over on his own. I got paired with one for a school project, which would have required one on one library time or at home time, and my Dad marched into that class and made my English teacher reassign my partner and I.”

Tim cringes. “People like your parents are the bane of teen boys everywhere.”

Breena grins. “That was the point, if memory serves.”

Tim sits up, back against the headboard of their bed. “So… are we going to have rules like that?”

“Dating rules?” Breena asks as Abby scoots a bit to rest her head in his lap.

“Yeah. I mean, I didn’t. I had the no-sex-until-you-get-married talk with my grandfather and the produce-any-kids-before-you-can-take-care-of-them-and-I-will-beat-you-so-hard-you’ll-never-walk-again talk with The Admiral, but no one ever told me I couldn’t spend time with girls, alone even. Though my mom would get snippy and drop by to ‘check in on us’ every ten minutes if I had a girl over.”

The other three are rapidly coming to the conclusion that that talk with the Admiral likely wasn’t hyperbole, and Abby’s starting to understand why Tim never had sex with anyone without a condom before her.
“I think we can leave off the threats of bodily harm,” Jimmy suggest. “And… I’d really rather have the girls on some sort of birth control. Let them know that as soon as they may want it, or better yet, before they want it, it’s an option. If we’re lucky, by the time Sean might want or need it, they’ll have something more reliable than condoms on the market. Beyond that, I’m not thinking we’ve got to try and keep them in purdah or whatever the hell it was your parents thought they were doing.”

“Making sure I didn’t get into a situation I wasn’t emotionally mature enough to handle,” Breena says with an arched eyebrow.

“Uh huh…” Jimmy’s not buying it. He can imagine how it went. Ed wanted his girls kept in a convent from the age of 12 until they were 30, and Jeannie looked at him, laughed, and said ‘sixteen,’ and sixteen it was. “And the magic Ready-to-Deal Fairy showed up for you and your sisters the night of your sixteenth birthdays’, bestowing upon you the good sense and poise to handle boys?”

Breena rolls her eyes. “You don’t have any sisters. You want to see a hissy fit to end all hissy fits, attempt to tell sister A she’s mature enough to date at fourteen, but sister B has to wait until seventeen.”

Abby laughs at that. “I wasn’t allowed to go on car dates until I was sixteen, and the rule was I had to drive. That horrified some of the potential boyfriends. Wasn’t allowed to do one on one dates with boys until I was fourteen. And I think we’re going to have to get to know these little people a bit more before we make any hard and fast decisions.” She shakes her head a bit. “Some of the guys I dated… They shouldn’t have been allowed alone with anyone, no matter how old. Some of them were wolves. Some were lambs. The only hard and fast rule I want is that we’ve got to meet whomever it is they want to go out with, really get to know him or her, maybe toss ‘em in the basement with Gibbs for a few hours, and then make our decisions from there. Might be some of them are only allowed at our place. Maybe some can go off on car dates or off on their own.”

Tim nods. “And for some of them, Jimmy and I will show off the ‘Fear of Dad’ skills Gibbs has been training us in on and see if we can run them off.”

“Exactly.”

Tim makes sure to periodically check in with his guys. Right now, NCIS is officially shut down. Because the Navy and Marines are officially shut down. The men who are stationed abroad, or afloat, are still on those ships/bases, and NCIS is still providing police services for them, but that’s skeleton crew work.

And it’s also not much of anything Cybercrime is doing. Yes, at any given time one of them may run an email check or hack a personal computer or phone, but no one’s got a job that’ll take more than an hour at a go.

He makes sure that if something blows up big time on one of the ships, or bases, that his skeleton crew can swing into action.

He also lets them know that if any of them want to leave, he won’t hold them to their contracted one month notice. (Technically, he will, because he has to, but he’ll jigger the paperwork to show they gave noticed before everything broke apart.)

Unfortunately, he has to tell them that he doesn’t know when, or if, they’re getting paid again. He doesn’t know if this down time is going to be treated as an unpaid furlough, or if, when they’re back, they’ll get paid just like usual.

He knows that Leon’s been burning through what’s left of their accounts to make sure that everyone gets at least something every pay period, but they aren’t getting any new money paid into their accounts. Treasury’s paying out as little as it possibly can, and NCIS not only isn’t on the top of the list of organizations getting paid, it’s not on the list at all. So that something is getting smaller and smaller each pay period.

He’s deeply touched when 96% of his team stays, and two of the ones who leave tell him that it’s just a matter of absolutely having to have a regular paycheck. He lets them know that once he knows what’s coming up, once he’s got stable jobs again, that they’re welcome to them.

---

Tony and Ziva get back the Saturday before Thanksgiving. They’re staying at the McGee house for the next few days, though they’ve been told that their bit of DC will be ready to go back to by Tuesday.

Ziva’s plump and round and lovely. Tony’s looking human again. Both of them are tan, hair lighter from time in the sun, and smiling more easily. They meet the rest of the family for Sunday breakfast and tell stories and show pictures of the Mediterranean.

It’s not the Diner. They’re on their third Diner alternative, and this one is looking like a possible, and hopefully temporary, replacement.

“Any word from Elaine?” Tony asks as he’s munching his eggs. (Scrambled, light, fluffy, a hair over-done. If he hadn’t had Elaine’s eggs, he’d think these were perfect. But he’s had perfect, so he knows these aren’t it.)

Breena shakes her head. “I hope she comes back. Even if she doesn’t take us up on our offer.”

Jimmy adds, “Her part of town is still a wasteland. I don’t think we’ll hear from her until it’s in better shape.”

“How’s cleaning up going?” Ziva asks. “I know way more about it than I ever wanted to from one side,” she’s still making sure people get paid, and that they’re doing the work they’re getting paid for, “And not enough from the other.” Making sure they do the work isn’t the same thing as seeing the finished product.

Abby’s eyes flick to Tim. They’ve been intentionally not telling him too much about what’s going on. And, it’s true that he’s driven her into work a few times, it’s also true that those routes have all involved the least damaged bits of the city. He also hasn’t been asking.

“Parts are looking fine,” Abby says. “Some neighborhoods came through pretty much unscathed. Some areas they’re bulldozing to the ground and starting over from scratch.”

“NCIS?” Tony asks.

“The Navy Yard is currently a Marine/Navy compound. Jarvis’ personal forces are making it home. Well, the ones who don’t have someplace else to stay. There are more in Norfolk and Baltimore, too. Anyway… They’ve done a lot of cleaning. I think Jarvis grabbed a bunch of drill sergeants and told them to make sure the whole compound sparkled by Thanksgiving. Everything’s been cleaned within an inch of its life. They’ve been repainting… The orange is gone. It’s a cheery light-green now. New carpets. You’ve got an ID so you can go in and check if you want. They aren’t keeping NCIS employees out, but you might get shanghaied into cleaning if you don’t have something else to be doing while you’re in there.”

“Abby’s got a small crew of Marines working forensics with her,” Tim adds. That’s a detail he does have, and one that amuses him. “They won’t stop calling her Ma’am.”

Abby rolls her eyes at that. She hasn’t been able to break most of them of that. “About five of them, and they’re turning into fingerprint uploading experts. They’re also getting handy with a bullet scanner.”

“You seeing a lot of bullets?” Abbi asks.

Abby nods. “And something like one out of three of them is coming back to a weapon owned by Metro PD. They won’t let me see which guns go with which officers, but I can see they belong to cops.”

That gets an angry look out of Jimmy and a frustrated one from Breena.

Ziva raises an eyebrow at them.

Breena shakes her head. “Most of the people we’re getting now are fire victims. They’re pulling them out of the rubble. At first… That wasn’t true at first. We’ve got to log where everyone was found. So, we’ve got maps of who was found where. It looks like Metro called the shoot-on-sight orders and then headed out and shot anyone and everyone they’ve ever had a problem with. We’d get four bodies all found in the same building, all with Metro bullets in them… Sh… Stuff like that.” She changes her word choice as Molly’s watching her carefully.

“And I’m sure none of those people were angels,” Jimmy adds, bouncing Anna, who’s acting a bit fussy, “but unless someone took the time to pull the bodies inside after, a lot of those people ‘breaking curfew’ were shot inside their homes. With rifles.”

That gets a collective wince.

“You’ve got maps, is anyone checking the crime scenes?” Tony asks.

Jimmy barks a short laugh. “Martial law. Metro gets to do whatever they want in the name of ‘keeping the peace.’ We’re logging them all, I’m listing them as homicides, and I’m certain none of them are ever going to be investigated.”

“Diane mentioned wrongful death suits,” Ziva says, sipping her tea.

Breena nods. “Yeah. That’s probably what’s going to happen. Some lawyers will round up the next-of-kin, they’ll file a class action civil suit, the city will settle, the lawyers will get rich, and the next-of-kin will get a few hundred bucks a piece to cover part of the funeral costs.” Breena takes a sip of her coffee, and shakes her head. “I’m sorry, this’ll make you cynical if you let it.”

“It’s not cynicism when you’re right,” Tim says.

Breena shrugs. “We’ve been told that Metro is starting to investigate the shooting victims whose bullets don’t go back to law enforcement or a federal building.”

Tim snaps his wrist band at that, trying to stamp out the sudden swamping sensation of guilt. He knows he fired more than a few of the bullets that go back to a ‘Federal Building.’ Abby squeezes his hand, too. And it helps, a little.
He doesn’t know if the people he shot have crossed Jimmy’s table, yet. He assumes, because they’re cleaning up the Navy Yard, and because the smell doesn’t hit him when he’s driven by, that everyone in the mass grave had been handed over to Jimmy’s crew.

He wonders if they’re going to be hit with a wrongful death suit. He wonders if he’d rather they settled or tried to fight it out.

He knows none of those thoughts will lead to a good place, so he says to Ziva, “So, when’s your next OB appointment? Are we going to get a shot of D soon?”

Ziva smiles a bit. “First week of December we get our 20 week ultrasound.”

“Still sticking with not finding out if he’s got all the bits to go with the ‘he?’” Gibbs asks.

Ziva nods; then she glances at Tony. “I do not intend to find out.”

Tony rolls his eyes a bit. “She doesn’t think I can do it. She thinks as soon as I’ve got the shots, I’ll be looking, trying to figure it out.”

“So, you mean she’s met you before?” Abbi says with a little smile.

On Monday, Tony joins Tim and Gibbs. Three sets of hands speeds things up. The fact that Tony’s taking fewer breaks than Tim does helps with that, too. They’ve gotten to the point where they’re stringing wires, and Tim’s hoping that by the time they break for the weekend, they’ll be ready to drywall.

Like always, Tony chatters away, and right now, Tim’s glad for the chatter. He likes hearing about Tony and Ziva looking for a house in move-in condition. (What she’s doing right now, between odd jobs for Diane.) He likes hearing about Sicily and Sardinia. They sound warm and beautiful and filled with yummy things. If it wasn’t for the fact that the only way to get there involves either a boat or a plane, he’d like to go.

He likes seeing Tony looking engaged again, likes seeing him looking like he’s interested in working, too. And he is. He’s working with them, which is good, but like Gibbs, and for that matter, like Tim when he’s not got other things on his mind, he’s starting to get that bit of an edge that goes with not having had a good case in a while.

Tim’s sure that whenever the first day back is, Tony’ll be there, if not sooner, and ready to start catching killers.

And, though he probably shouldn’t be, he’s also amused to see Tony griping about how much weight he’s gained. Two weeks of sleeping and eating everything that didn’t run away may be good for the soul, but it wasn’t good for the waistline. (Apparently Jimmy was dead on right about how if you don’t go back at it slow, with lots of little meals, your body decides it’s going to immediately turn every single calorie you eat into fat.) Tony makes self-deprecating crack about looking more pregnant than Ziva does, and Tim mentions to him that if he wants, Jimmy can help with that.

“We going back to working out?” Tony asks after Tim says that.

“Yeah. Probably. After the building’s really open again. Until then, you’ll have to make do with this.” Right now, this, is getting the ventilation system in place so that everyone has heat and AC. The ventilation shafts are light, (they’re aluminum) but in that they’re doing the AC right now, it’s work that’s up, over their heads.

“You coming, too?” Tony asks Gibbs.

Gibbs tentatively punches his right hand into his left, and his shoulder smarts at it. (It’s not been happy with all of this over-his-head work, but Jimmy tells him that he needs to keep stretching and doing things like this if he wants his full range of motion back, so he’s doing it.) “I’ll keep you company and let Jimmy figure out what I should be doing. Not ready to fight, yet.”

Tony looks at Gibbs and Tim. They both look a lot better than they did when he left, especially since McQueball’s got a decent half inch of fuzz on his head again, but… “Neither of you are. Still be nice to have you around. Get back into the routine, you know?”

Gibbs and Tim both nod, emphatically. They know.

Part of the routine is Thanksgiving at Tim and Abby’s place. It’s not, usually, a big holiday for their family, not the way Christmas is.

But this year…

Between Tim’s hardcore cook-or-die philosophy, and having a large crew of somewhat displaced people all interested in sincerely giving thanks, the McGee family is pulling out all the Thanksgiving stops.

Including going back to their home for the first time in two weeks.

It doesn’t feel odd or anything like that to go back. It’s still home, and it’ll always be home, just for the time being, while Jimmy and Breena still need to strip off before getting into the house, it’s the home that’s less well-suited toward their current work circumstances.

However, it is also the home with the bigger kitchen and the dining room/living room floorplan that makes feeding the extended Gibbs clan easier. Thus, it’s the home more suited toward having everyone over for Thanksgiving dinner.

And thus, Tuesday morning, Tim heads to his house, instead of the house, along with Gibbs and Tony, to do some baby wrangling and food prep.

Between the three of them and Mona, they have a pretty good time starting to get things ready, and Heather certainly doesn’t mind a few extra days to get to her Thanksgiving Dinner, in Minnesota, with her parents.

“Turkey’s brining, pie crust dough is chilling, pie fillings are freezing.” He may have gone a bit overboard on that, but… anyway, apple-cranberry, pear-blueberry, chocolate silk, and pumpkin pies are on the menu. “Sourdough starter is starting, cornbread is made and drying for stuffing, all of my two days out prep is done,” Tim says as Breena, Jimmy, and Abby sit down for dinner.

“Sounds like you’ve been busy today,” Breena says, putting some salad on her plate.

“Yeah. It’s been feeling good.” He looks to Abby. “Next time you talk to Luca, tell him I’ve been really enjoying the recipes he gave us as a wedding present.”

“Oh.” She pets his hand. “Or how about the next time I give him a call, I put you on for a few minutes and you talk to him yourself?”

“Hmmmm… actually interact with a person… Yeah, I could probably swing that.” He feels like he’s been having a good day, so he starts to push out of his comfort zone some. “So… how was today, for you guys?”

The other three glance at each other, a quick look of how much are we telling? Tim sees it, and knows what it means. “I’m okay. Unless you don’t want to talk about it. I’ll cut you off if it goes too far, but… I’m tired of being outside of your daily lives.”

They nod at that, and Abby starts. “Bullets, lot of them. That’s pretty much all we did today. Take them out of the little plastic containers, get samples of everything on them, clean them up, photograph them, put them on the scanner, scan them, and then load them into the database, put them back into the container, put the container into the folder and into the plastic mail box, ready to go wherever they’re storing all of the evidence. It’s not difficult work, but it takes time.

Tim’s helped out with that in the past, so he knows how it goes. “Careful, patient, nit-picky work.”

Abby nods. “Yep. Don’t get me wrong, I love it, but I don’t know…” She sounds uncertain, trying to find words for why this isn’t nearly as satisfying as it is when she’s working for her teams at NCIS. “It feels really odd to just collect data. I’m not really building cases. I don’t have suspects or leads or any of that. I’m… filling up packets. I get hits on bullets all the time. But, it’s not like Tony or Gibbs comes down and asks, ‘Wha-da-ya-got, Abs?’ I just update the file in the computer, and move onto the next one.”

“Are they going to investigate?” Tim asks.

“Sooner or later, but we won’t have jurisdiction on most of them. Unless I keep track of them and check back later, I’ll never find out what happens with most of them when I’ve got a name attached to those packets.”

“And with that, you’re still further ahead than we are,” Breena says. “Especially right now…” she sighs at that. “They cleaned up the easiest to cleanup parts of the city first. Now they’re moving into the burnt parts, so the people we’re getting… no IDs on them. No fingerprints. Seen a lot with no fingers.”

“DNA and dental records,” Jimmy says. “And at least three of the ones I saw today won’t work for either of those.”

“No teeth?” Abby says.

He’s shaking his head. “Heat gets too high, teeth crack and break, older fillings, gold ones, say, melt. If the heat’s that high, it’s also high enough to cook pretty much anything that could have had DNA. The buildings that burned, like in Tony’s neighborhood, they’re gone. They don’t even really know which house was where… Okay, that sounds stupid. They know which house was where, what they don’t know is how the houses collapsed, what direction it might have gone… So, they find John Doe “Facial reconstruction?” Abby asks.

Jimmy nods. “At least some.”

“And in some cases it won’t help. With as hot as some of those fires got, not all of them are complete bodies. Even in a crematoria getting a whole body to burn to ash can be challenging. In a house… You get a little cool spot, or something falls on one part, or the wind blows in the wrong direction. Next thing you know you’ve got part of one leg.”

Jimmy glances at Breena, both of them aware that that’s a somewhat sanitized version of their partial bodies. They’ve gotten more than a few partial bodies because something, and judging by the marks, it was indeed something, as opposed to someone, took advantage of the protein. They’ve made a lot of bad jokes about crows and vultures and rats, but no one who works in The Morgue will ever see one of those animals again, let alone in DC, without at least a mental wince.

Abby winces some. “Okay. I’m vetoing this.” She looks over to Tim. “You and Gibbs watching more Alton Brown?”

Tim rolls his eyes and smiles a bit. “Only four episodes. Tony really likes them, too.”

“You had Tony watching them?” Jimmy asks.

“He didn’t feel like working on the house by himself, so he joined us for Thanksgiving dinner prep. He’s firmly convinced I’m working on making sure he’s the size of a blimp by Christmas.”

“Yeah, well,” Breena glances at their dinner: braised short ribs, mashed potatoes, and salad, “I can’t imagine how he got that idea.”

“Gotta keep you well-fed,” Tim flashes her a sexy smile. “You’re going to need a lot of energy tonight.”

That gets a few laughs, and then Tim starts telling them about watching every Thanksgiving Good Eats episode, but mostly he’s thinking about what Jimmy, Breena, and Abby were saying, and how he’s not feeling much of… anything… really about it. No sense of guilt hits him.

When he tells Rachel about that, they agree it’s a good thing. There’s enough on his plate that he’s literally, directly responsible for, people acting like maniacs because of what he revealed isn’t anything he needs to feel responsible for.

On Wednesday, Ducky and Penny come back for Thanksgiving.

They’re still playing merry-go-round housing, but with the main meal at the McGee’s tomorrow, they’re staying with Tim and Abby, along with the Palmers. It’s a full house, in a good way.

It also means they’re getting updates on what’s going on in New York.

Apparently, what’s going on in New York is a lot of political wrangling, horse trading, and desperately hoping the whole thing won’t come crashing down in a minute when enough of the population decides it won’t take orders from the Feds anymore.
“How big of a worry is that?” Tim asks while cutting up little pieces of chicken for the girls. They’re getting dinner ready, and right now that means everyone in the kitchen, putting food on plates, or getting little girl washed up, or setting the table. It’s loud and boisterous, with bits of the main conversation flowing through the ordered interjections that go with trying to get kids ready for supper.

Penny, who’s pouring juice into plastic Disney Princess cups, (with something of an eye roll, alas Molly LOVES Sleeping Beauty, and as of yet cannot be convinced that Belle and Tiana are vastly cooler and better role models) says, “Big. Status quo is holding a lot of what’s left of the country together, but as the different breakaway states are getting set on their own, or becoming Canadian, they’re worrying we’ll see more split off. Especially once the Feds attempt to do something whatever state doesn’t much like.”

“They planning on doing much of that?” Abby asks, reaching between Tim and Penny to grab the little spoons for Kelly and Molly.

“They’re doing everything they can to avoid ruffling any feathers right now.”

Once they’re all settled, Tim says, “Before you two head north again, you need to come visit the house, and figure out what you want in terms of paint, flooring, bathroom stuff. We’re at the point where all we have to do is slap up the drywall in your section, and we’ll be ready to get it livable.”

“That’s if you’re planning on coming back anytime soon,” Jimmy adds alluding to the fact that they might be doing their political magic for DC in New York for a while.

“We’ll make certain to get you a list of what we need, but I don’t see much reason to press any harder on our section than on any of the other ones. I have a feeling we’ll be primarily residing in The Capitol until the first of the DC elections can take place,” Ducky says.

“In ‘The Capitol,’ you think they aren’t sticking with New York?” Abby asks.

“They’re not staying in New York, not long term. They’re talking about having a moving Capitol. Presidents will have a six year term, and they’ll get to pick which state will host them and Congress. Only rule, can’t re-do a state until every state’s been done,” Penny says. “That’s part of trying to keep the remaining States happy. They all know, that, sooner or later, they’ll have the whole machine move to one of their cities, bringing in a lot of money and power.”

“Three hundred years until you cycle around again?” Abby says, not really thinking. “Gonna be a long wait for, say, Utah.”

“Bit more than three hundred years. With the territories, Indian Reservations… We’re in talks with any Reservation that might want to become a state or part of a state. Especially the casino rich ones are interested in the idea of hosting the Capitol at some point. A few states are splitting. New York’s name problems aside, it’s been true for a while that they’re better off as two states. We’re going to end up with a bit more than fifty of them,” Penny says. “And yes, I don’t see anyone rushing out to Utah. Hawaii, on the other hand… This isn’t common knowledge, but they’re putting feelers out to Australia and Japan about becoming a protectorate of those countries. Honolulu being the Capitol after the next election might go a long ways towards keeping them in the US.”

“They want to keep it, that badly?” Breena asks.
“I think it’s a combination of wanting a nice place to work, and not wanting to give it up.” Penny glances at Ducky. “I don’t think either of us would mind being able to skip New York, or Northern Virginia winters for the immediately foreseeable future.”

“And if Hawaii won’t accept you guys, or Canada’s not willing to give up Alaska, North Dakota, Maine and Vermont? What happens then?” Tim asks.

“We’re not going to force it. Each state has been offered the ability to rejoin if and when they want to. Eternal open door policy to anyone who’s ever been a US state. Honestly, since we’re getting deals set for profit sharing and leasing rights for any mineral wealth found on what used to be Federal lands in those states, they’re treating the loss of them as a blessing. As long as the oil/natural gas money comes in, not having to deal with the needs of the citizens is making the new Congress happy,” Penny says as she lifts a bite of flounder to her lips.

Ducky adds, “Any territory that will offer income without the need to support and provide for citizens is exactly what they want right now. Hawaii, on the other hand, brings in a lot of tourism dollars, and that cannot be flogged off or leased out. Add in year-round warm beaches, and there is certainly hope going around that that’s the capitol the next president will chose.”

“Any word on who that next president may be?” Since neither the Palmers nor the McGees have live television, they’ve been, happily, missing the flood of political advertising when they’re home. They haven’t missed the non-stop, wall-to-wall political ads on the radio, though.

“What’s left of Congress is hoping for the Stewart/Colbert platform, if for no other reason than they’re famous enough they might get enough votes in the first round that we won’t have to do run after run of voting,” Penny replies.

“It does not hurt that, given the vote buying fiasco, the current attitude is that no matter who wins, they cannot do a worse job than any predecessor in living memory. Just winning a legitimate election will put whoever it is ahead of everyone else in the last hundred years,” Ducky replies as he allows Molly to sit on his lap to eat. (She’s been exuberant that ‘Her Duck!’ is back, and between tugging him around to show him everything she’s done, made, looked at, or been even vaguely interested in the last three weeks, she’s also made sure that he’s been in touching/hugging range the whole time. Right now Ducky has an extremely cuddlesome and chatty barnacle on his left side.)

“Add in the idea of these two fairly famous guys running, who are generally considered smart, and moderate, ish, and that adds a level of legitimacy to the whole thing,” Penny wraps up with.

“You voting for them?” Breena asks.

“I’ve got my own pet candidates. People I know personally. They won’t win, but I’ll support them,” Penny says with a smile. “Though, at this point, I haven’t voted for a winning candidate since Kennedy, so voting for a loser isn’t precisely a new thing for me.”

Tim smiles. “More like a badge of pride.”

“Yes. Rather vote for the person who reflects my principals than hold my nose and vote for the lesser of two evils, and if that means writing someone in, or leaving a race blank, I’m comfortable with that. I do not intend to change that pattern this late in the game.”

“Or this early,” Jimmy says as he gives Anna a bite of his roasted Brussel sprouts. “I swear this is the only twelve month old on earth who eats Brussel sprouts.” She gobbles down a quarter of a sprout and fusses at him for more. Tim looks smug, learn how to cook the damn things and kids’ll eat them all over his expression. “I’m cutting as fast as I can…” Jimmy says to Anna. “Anyway, early in the game. New game, right?"

Penny gives Jimmy a nod. “Or early in the game. Whatever else is going on, it’s certainly new.”

“What happens if no one wins 50% over and over,” Abby asks.

“They’ve already stated the ‘We’re going to do this until someone/some team wins a basic majority.’ So, that’s going to be true for the next election, no matter how many rounds of voting we end up having to do to get there. Right now, we’ve got eight thousand names in the running, and that was with a three week long sign up period. Next time, the sign up period will be longer, and if we have 20,000 names… It’ll be a mess. They’re thinking, depending on how the vote shakes out, that the next presidential election will work something along the lines of anyone with less than 5% of the vote in the first round gets booted, anyone with less than 10% in the second round, and if they still don’t have a majority by the third round, they’ll shift to a four person run off, and the top two will be President/VP.”

“Sounds like a mess, right now, Penny,” Abby says.

“I know.” Penny groans. “The printing alone for the ballots is insane. They’re books, thick books. Each booth gets one, you look your candidate up, and then write his name and number on your ballot. That’s their ‘cutting down on paper’ version of this.”

“I take it, since you haven’t mentioned it, that none of you have received a vote counting notification?”

The rest of the table shakes their heads at Ducky.

“This is what Eleanor and I have been working on. A way to mobilize voter rolls into a functional, nationwide, database, from which vote counters can be pulled.”

“What are you doing with that, Duck?” Tim asks. He can see what Bishop might be doing, but that doesn’t sound like Ducky’s sort of work.

“Mostly, I am sitting on the phone, politely requesting access to voter rolls from every state left in the country. There is no national database of this information, and to make it even more frustrating, each state is… lackadaisical in its voter role upkeep.”

Everyone groans at the idea of that job.

Ducky inclines his head, acknowledging it’s an obnoxious and frustrating job. “It is, however, useful. By the time this is done, there’ll be a master list that can be used to weed out voter fraud.”

Tim shakes his head.

The rest of the table looks curiously at him.

“Not worth it anymore. It’s a straight majority in a country with hundreds of millions of voters. Say the winner is one point ahead. That’s more than a million votes. On paper ballots, right now. Way too expensive. Add in the way Congressmen can’t run for reelection anymore… Not worth it. Hell, even electronically, even with the old system, those guys wrecking the elections didn’t bother with attempting voter fraud, not like that. They hacked the computers to show the results they wanted. They didn’t attempt to get dead guys to vote or send in absentee ballots for people who didn’t actually exist. The numbers were too big to make that worth doing.”

Everyone else looks at him like Tim’s either brilliant or insane or dangerously cynical, and he shrugs.
“Social Security and Medicare/Medicaid, whatever’s left of them when this is done, that’s a system where taking the dead/non-existant people out would make a difference.”

The official start time for Thanksgiving Dinner is 3:00.

But the family starts showing up early. Gibbs is there at the crack of 5:00 to get the turkey started.

In their quest for the perfect turkey, Gibbs and Tim might have gone a bit testosterone heavy. (With Tony’s eager help.) After all, if they’re going to make this damn thing, they’re going to cook like men.

And men cook with fire and smoke and with manly tools like a huge damn grill and real wood and beer. (Okay, cider. Tim’s had half of the wood they’re smoking with soaking in hard cider for the last two days. It’ll add steam and flavor.)

Abby and Penny are staring out the sliding glass door, looking at the smoker/grill combo thing that Tim and Gibbs have put together, and Gibbs loading the wood into the smoker as Tim wrestles the biggest turkey she’s ever seen onto the grate.

“They’re having a lot of fun with that, aren’t they?”

Abby nods.

“They need it, don’t they?”

Abby looks away from her guys turkey wrangling to Penny. “Yeah. He’s doing better, but…”

“But better isn’t healed.”

“Nope.”

Penny wraps an arm around her and gives her a gentle squeeze.

The DiNozzo branch of the family, complete with Senior and Delphine, show up a bit before noon.

“I didn’t know you’d be stateside!” Penny says, giving Senior and Delphine welcoming hugs. They all know that what used to be the Senior DiNozzo residence is currently a blackened block the cleanup crews haven’t even begun to go through, yet.

“Spur of the moment decision. Fortunately we’re able to bunk with Junior for a few days.”

“And what is spurring you to the US?” Ducky asks, as he takes Delphine’s coat.

Senior’s eyes sparkle. “Plans within plans that finally worked out. Thought you’d like to hear about them in person.”
There’s a moment of dread, because Senior and plans can be fraught territory, but those words do draw everyone to the living room to find out what on earth Senior might have been up to. He glances around, sees the whole crew, at least that he wants to share this with, is here.

“I figured you’d know what to do with this. And I figured you’d need it. When McGee gave me the call about the… recent unpleasantness, he told me that I couldn’t tell anyone.” Senior looks at Tim and gives him a little half smile. “Sorry, Tim, I couldn’t do that, but…”

Tim feels his shoulders slumping, afraid of what he’s going to hear next. He didn’t watch the market too closely after things got moving, but he knows it tanked. And he’s familiar with the fact that people like Breena’s family, who sold short, or moved their holdings around before it tanked ended up doing very well.

“Buck up, this isn’t bad. Because I did a good job of spreading the news, to the right people, and those people did extremely well with that information, we’re in a position to… offer some not insubstantial financial aid to the rebuilding of DC.” Senior grins. Huge grin. Blindingly white teeth and an edge of almost manic glee sparkling in his eyes. “I don’t want to talk specific numbers, but… I figured if anyone would know someone who could use a donation of cash and resources in the neighborhood of fifty billion dollars, you guys would.”

Northern Virginia does not have live crickets in late November. They’re all dead or hibernating by then. However, in the silence that follows Senior's comment, those ghost crickets, rubbing their spectral legs together, could be heard.

Two seconds later, Senior has Jarvis’ number. Five minutes after that, Clayton Jarvis was having a very good Thanksgiving.

By 3:00 everyone, the entire extended Gibbs clan, including Fornells, Andersons, Vances, and Slaters have gathered at the McGee house.

Like any of the extended family gatherings, its loud, people are in a generally good mood, and they’ve all brought food to go with the feast Tim and Gibbs have been working on. (Jeannie alone seems to have brought at least two courses.)

There’s a somewhat self-selected group of people hovering around the Eagles-Lions game playing in Tim’s office. Several more are on the back porch approving of the Turkey smoking contraption that Gibbs and Tim put together. Emily Fornell and the Vance kids blocked off a chunk of the stairs where they could text their buddies and hang out with each other. Kevin Draga and Molly are playing with each other in the kitchen, doing their best to be underfoot as often as possible, with Kelly toddling along behind, doing her best to keep up.

It's a family holiday, with a big extended family.

“Bishop and Jake off in Oklahoma with their families?” Jimmy asks between sips of spiced tea. (Kind of like chai, but no milk.)
Ducky nods, a smile on his face, and glances at Penny, she smiles, too.

“Okay, you two are beaming. What’s going on?”

Penny’s smile doesn’t falter. “It’s likely this is going to be an especially good Thanksgiving for the Malloy clan. Did you know Jake’s the oldest of three boys, and he has no nieces or nephews?”

Jimmy catches the glee in her eyes. “And you think that is unlikely to be a true statement for his brothers for all that much longer?”

“I’d say that will be a true statement for maybe another eight months, and then…” Ducky grins, too. “I’ve been spending quite a bit of time with Eleanor lately, and it has not escaped my notice that she has something of a tendency to skip caffeinated beverages and, if we are not actively working on a project, fall asleep in her chair.”

“But they aren’t saying anything, yet?” Jimmy makes sure he doesn’t stick his foot ankle deep into his mouth by repeating unconfirmed gossip to the wrong person.

“Not yet,” Penny replies.

____________________

Ed gazes at the smoker, a wide smile on his lips as he nods slowly. “That’s a piece of work!”

Gibbs is feeling pretty good about it. The smokers they found at the hardware store weren’t quite as big as they wanted for a turkey big enough to feed this crew, so, an oil drum, some time with Jack’s metalworking tools, a bit of welding, and boom! turkey smoker!

Cooking is a lot more interesting if you gear up for it at the hardware store.

____________________

“You guys made fifty billion dollars on those deals?” Tony asks his dad, when he gets a minute alone with him.

Senior laughs, a deep, rich, and somewhat condescending sound. “No Junior. We made closer to five hundred billion dollars, but I made everyone who got the news pledge 10% of their earnings to a rebuilding fund as a cost for the tip.”

“How many guys did you call, Dad?”

He waves that off. The correct answer is he knows he called fifteen people. He doesn’t know who they called, not precisely, but he has been spending the last month tracking down as many of them as he could and collecting on the finder’s fee. “Ten percent is a common finder’s fee. Instead of it going to me, or Tim, I guess, it’s going to DC. Least we could do.”

Tony’s not sure if he should be pleased or horrified. “How much did you make?”

Senior smiles. “Your Uncle Clive, he always thought I was small time. He wouldn’t anymore.”

Tony likes that idea. “You mean I can finally wipe that smirk off of Crispian’s face?”

Senior shakes his head. “Crispian was one of my first calls. That man knows money in and out. He made out very well. He ponied up his ten percent, and matched it with another ten percent to the DC Fire Department. However, given that tip, he now considers that IOU of yours settled.” Senior shakes his head. Crispian had enjoyed telling him about what Junior ‘owed’ him, and still hadn’t paid off. “What have I told you about signing contracts?”

“He brought that up? It’s been thirty years!”

“Junior, you signed a contract for $10,000 at 14% compound interest, thirty years ago. What were you thinking?”

“Dadd…”

“Hello, Stranger!” Abbi gives Ziva a hug when she finds her in the mob.

“Hello!” Abbi gets a kiss on her cheeks. “It has been a while. Did you just get here?”

Abbi rolls her eyes. “Yes, but for a good reason. A real case today, with an actual victim.”

“Ow.”

Abbi nods. “Suicide. Open and shut for us. But, I was the one on call until noon today, so I’m the one who got to drive to Norfolk and back this morning.”

Ziva sighs. “I have done that run, many time.”

“Oh yeah, and I’m sure I’ll be doing it again.” She takes a step away from Ziva and grabs herself a mug of spiced cider. It’s warm and sweet and spicy and exactly what she wants after a long drive. “You’re back, and Jethro’s been telling me about your recent adventures, so sounds like you’re all rested up, you ready to come back and help me get my staff in shape?”

Diane swoops in on that one, and wraps a protective arm around Ziva’s shoulders. “No poaching! I’ve got more than enough to keep every hour she wants to spend and beyond frantically busy.”

Ziva gives Diane a quick hug. “I take it you don’t have enough staff?”

“I’ve been able to get my own team and department, and I still have more work than any group of people can do. Plus, trained investigators, good ones, are hard to come by right now. Everyone in any of the Federal branches has a cloud hanging over them. The Batthenada stuff, the election fraud… that got a lot of other people starting to really look at their own departments and what they’ve really been up to.”

Abbi nods along at that. “Yeah. I’ve been hearing about that. It’s making it hard for me to find people, too.” She looks at Ziva, who right now is an extremely valuable example of ‘people.’ “And unlike you, I need real investigators, someone who can find me other real investigators. You need, what, accountants?”

That gets some stink eye from Diane, but Abbi isn’t wrong. “I need accountants. I need investigators. I need lawyers. I need EPA experts and chemists and… I need… hell, I need people to just handle invoices. Some of them are sending me paper bills and want to be paid with checks.”

And while it’s true that Ziva has felt what she’s been doing for Diane is valuable, it’s also something anyone with a computer could do. What she can do for Abbi, finding real investigative talent, isn’t something anyone can do.

“I’m sorry, Diane, but I think I will be returning to Abbi. However, if you have investigators you want me to interview, add them to the pile. I’ll be happy to go through whomever you want.”

That’s a functional compromise.

Ziva sips her cider, and says, “Bright and early on Monday?”

Abbi nods. “The building is open and cleaned up. You’re going to have to take a round-about route to get in, but as soon as you do, I’ve got people for you to interview.”

“You’re all cleaned up?” Diane sounds envious of that. She’s working out of the Navy Yard right now, with most of Jarvis’ staff.

“Pretty much. But we didn’t have too many people in there,” Abbi replies. “Any news on…”

Diane shakes her head, and for a moment she looks distressed, then she forces a hard smile on her face. “Um… I haven’t found anyone I was close to who wasn’t in the building. And… since I no longer for work the IRS, they aren’t keeping me in the loop on where they’re relocating everyone.”

“I am sorry, Diane.” Ziva says, and Abbi nods, laying a hand on her arm.

“As the person who’s running the cleanup operation, I can say that the block the IRS building use to be on is scheduled to be started on next week.”

“Where’s the Autopsy Mogwi?” Tony asks Jimmy as he and Tim and Gibbs all spend a moment outside with the turkey, eyeing it, checking the temperature to see if it’s really done.

“Sam’s home with his family.”

“What’s the deal with them? He didn’t go home when everything else went crazy…” Tim asks, well aware of the fact that people who don’t go home when they can and should is probably a flag of some sort.

“Not sure. He seems to get on well with them, but… He’s home now. He wasn’t home before.” Jimmy shakes his head a bit. “I don’t know all that much about them.”

“He’s okay with them, though?” Tim asks, watching the thermometer edging up toward 160 degrees.

“Seems so. I didn’t get any sense that he’s dreading going home. Might just be that ‘home’ is Iowa, so it’s not exactly nearby.”

They think about that, and then the thermometer beeps. “And she’s ready to come in!” Tim says, looking very pleased with himself, and the glorious, smoky, savory, mahogany skinned beast in front of him.

Jimmy brushes Tim out of the way. “I got her. No need for you to be trying to wrestle a hot thirty-five pound monster.”

“Thanks.”
Tim’s beginning to understand why Gibbs is the one who cooks the main dish for Christmas. Being the guy who made the food that everyone else is complimenting and treating like it’s the Platonic Ideal of food feels really good.

They don’t have room for everyone to sit at a table, so it’s buffet-style Thanksgiving. Tim’s thinking that, as much as he’s enjoying everyone here for this, next year he’s looking forward to just the close family. He’s only getting a few minutes with everyone, which isn’t exactly breaking his heart when it comes to, say, Ed, but he’d kind of like to spend more than six minutes with Abby and Breena.

Everyone will leave sooner or later, and then he’ll get real time with them.

And right now, spending five minutes chatting with Lara Vance about sweet potatoes is pretty nice.

Politics. Lots of conversations are revolving around it. Between their jobs and where they live, that makes sense. And, given the last month, politics is probably the main topic of conversation in pretty much every house in the nation today.

Jared’s in the living room, and because his Civics class is doing a lot of work with government in general and what’s going in right now in specific, he decides that, with Penny and Ducky right here, he might as well ask some questions.

He politely waits for a pause in the conversation. His mother’s ghost will whack him upside the back of the head if he just barges right into a conversation. Ducky, Penny, Ed Slater, and Draga are chatting right now, about politics, but not exactly about what he’s curious about.

“Don’t they need to… I don’t know… have a Constitutional Convention or something?” Jared asks when they pause.

That gets some huge smiles from Ducky and Penny. “The short answer to that is, yes, Jared. The longer answer is they are doing everything in their power to avoid one, because they fear the entire process will be short circuited by gun control and abortion.”

“The legal loop-holing they’re doing is calling these changes ‘Constitutional Amendments’ that will be set to be ratified as soon as they’ve got new Congressmen in place,” Penny adds.

Jared looks skeptical. Both Penny and Ducky are pleased to see it.

“In the longer run, at some ‘later point,’” he gestures elegantly to indicate that ‘later point’ is code for basically never, “they’re talking about a formal convention for a rewrite of the original document, though from what I can see, they intend to make that as long of a long run as possible,” Ducky adds.

“By the time they get a Congress of 6119 people, getting anything ratified, let alone on a two-thirds vote, will be a quagmire. So, they’ll move along as well as they can without patching the original documents. The Supreme Court will likely attempt to stop this, and…” Penny shakes her head.

“As Andrew Jackson said, in one of the more shameful moments of American history, ‘the court has made its decision, now let us see them enforce it,’” Ducky replies.

Penny inclines her head. “It looks like the Supreme Court may be a casualty of this. Between all of them having been nominated by people on the take, and half of them having connections to the Batthenada cartel… It’s a mess. All of the Federal Judgeships are.”

Jared thinks about that. “So… what happens?”

“It’s entirely likely that we’ll end up much like Europe, a common market, common currency, common defense, free travel, and leave the rest to the individual states,” Penny replies.

An hour later, Tim overhears Penny saying, “Texas won’t extradite the Bush family until the death penalty is taken off the table for George Senior, Barbara, and Laura. The only reason they haven’t tried to bring in Chelsea Clinton is she hasn’t run for anything. They won’t release where the Obama girls are being held, but we know it’s outside of the country.”

“Carter lucked out, then?” Abbi asks.

“Yes, dying in May is likely the best stroke of luck he could have had.”

He knows the death penalty is on the books for treason, and if anyone’s committed it, the people involved in the election fixing and vote selling have certainly committed it, but right now, he’s feeling like too damn many people have died. He doesn’t want to see anyone else have to.

He doesn’t think he’s going to get his wish on that, though.

“How are you not the size of a house?” Tony asks Tim, staring at the mounds of luscious food on his own plate. He’s on buffet return trip number three. The whole house smells like a dream of Thanksgiving, and everything is just sitting there, begging to be scarfed down. Tony’s happy to oblige it.

Tim glances at his own plate. It’s almost empty now. He had a few bites of everything, and that’s it. “Because this plate represents my whole dinner.”

Jimmy adds in, “You wanna splurge, go ahead, but you’ll probably feel cruddy after.”

Tim rolls his eyes. He, unfortunately, knows that first hand. Right now he really can’t eat too much at one setting or his stomach rebels. “Six or seven little meals a day, and this is probably two of them. More than that and Jimmy’s right, I’ll feel like crap.”

“ Keeps your body from thinking it’s starving,” Jimmy says.

“Yep.” Tim rolls his eyes a little. “It’d be nice if my brain could just get the message across and I could go back to real meals.”
“Give it time, you’ll get there.” Jimmy, who normally does three small meals and two snacks a day (part of keeping his blood sugar stable) has quite a bit more of… almost everything that isn’t a dessert… on his plate. He’d skipped out on the cranberries and sweet potatoes, and only has a taste of the stuffing. And, if it wasn’t for the fact that too much food will make him feel cruddy, too, he’d be all over that table, because Tony’s right, what’s sitting there is solid pleasure, just waiting to be consumed.

“Have you been back?” and variations is the most popular question of the night. Who’s been to DC? Who’s seen what? Tim’s fine with skipping those discussions.

But Leon notices him skittering away from that topic of conversation, and does grab him as the night is winding down.

“Nine AM, December 1st, the Directors are meeting, are you going to be there?”

Tim sighs, but he doesn’t feel the need to snap the rubber band on his wrist as he says, “Yeah. I’ll be there.”

“Have you been back?” Leon looks curious. He hasn’t. He knows he should, but he hasn’t had any desire to go in.

“Just to the front gate. I drop Abby off a few mornings a week. Helps to build up a thicker skin, or something.” Once he’d told Rachel about it, she’d suggested he keep it up. “You?”

Leon shakes his head. “Half the time I want to ask Jarvis to get us out of that building.”

Tim wholeheartedly agrees with that.

“But… The building’s fine. Whatever government we report to is going to be scrapped for cash. Can’t see asking for a new home when we don’t need one.”

“And other agencies do.”

They both look over to Diane. She’s talking with Draga, and they look okay. Tim doesn’t know if Draga just buried what happened in the Navy Yard, or if she was okay with it, and he’s not about to find out.

Tim makes himself think work thoughts, “So, what are we meeting about?”

“Getting back up and running. Seeing what shape we’re in. Figuring out who we report to and who we serve. Everything.” Vance nods to Tim’s grandmother. “I’m starting to hear rumors that whatever’s left of Federal Law Enforcement after this is going to be extremely reorganized. I’m supposed to get more about that next week.”

“And then you’re passing it onto us.”

“Yeah.”

“December 1st, 09:00. I’ll be there. Even wear a suit if you’d like.”
Leon shakes his head. “Don’t have to go that far, McGee. Just show up, ready to work, and ready to think outside the box. Who knows what we’re going to have to do to keep NCIS, NCIS.”

“It never ends, does it?”

“Nope. And here’s the other rumor, we’re going to be fighting off the reorganization, while you and I and most of this team, ends up being called up to New York to testify.” The first thing the new congress is going to do is begin the trial of everyone involved in the vote buying scandal.

Tim snorts. “Fuck that. They can talk to me by Skype.”

Vance inclines his head. That doesn’t sound like a bad idea to him. Especially as he thinks of what he’s got in his coffers and what lodging in New York costs.

“It’ll be something we’ll talk about on the First.”

“I’ll be ready.”

---

“Is it midnight?” Tim asks, flopping bonelessly onto the sofa next to Abby after the last of the guests leave.

She glances at the clock. “In the middle of the Atlantic. It’s 8:06.”

“It feels like midnight.”

Abby pets his hair.

Penny’s sitting by the fire, and laughs. “You realize that was Sunday supper, every week, cooked on a coal burning oven and stove, when I was a kid.”

Tim makes an exhausted sound. “I don’t even want to think too hard about that.”

Penny grins at them.

“Are you and Ducky staying long?” Abby asks, half listening to Penny, half keeping an ear on Breena, Jimmy, and Ducky putting little girls to bed. Kelly’s been fussing hard, and if she needs to go up, she wants as much advanced warning as possible.

“We’re going to drive back up again Saturday.”

Tim nods. “Wish you’d stay longer. Traffic will be insane until Monday.”

“We’ve got work to do.”

“I bet. Leon was telling me he’s hearing rumors of reorganizing Federal Law Enforcement?”

Penny nods. “That’s waiting for after the election to really come out, but yes, it’s on the docket. Too much overlap, too many cracks to fall through, not enough good communication. There’s some talk about focusing on types of crime. All the murders go to one agency, all the rapes to another, all the terrorism to someone else, yet another group gets cyber matters, with a master database that all of the groups can work with. Something sort of like your job software. People get a case, they put the particulars in, and it starts sorting things, moving it around as need be to the right people.”

Tim blinks at that thought. Done right, it’d be amazing. Done the way every other government project he’s ever seen… It’d be a cluster fucking. And given the current state of the art in AI, and machine learning… because something like this would have to have a very sophisticated AI, and it would have to learn, just to figure out how to categorize things and get the right people in on it…

“That project is still, at least, ten years off.”

“You couldn’t do it?” Penny asks.

“Yeah, I can do it. Get my team up and running, and we can build something that’ll do it. In ten years, when we can get our hands on a computer big enough to run the damn thing, and the cops in question all know how to use keywords, and they can all type, and…” He thinks about the errors his system had, has had, and continues to have. Ninety-nine percent of them are located between the keyboard and the chair.

“It’s a user interface nightmare, Penny. Computer can only use the data you give it. So, something like, AFIS, sure, that’s great. It’d be really awesome if it was bigger and faster and every single case had prints and DNA and bullets and facial recognition all uploaded and run.

“But that database would be so damn big… And it would still depend on Local LEOs to actually put their information into it, and do it right.

“And that’s just physical crimes, terrorism… cyber stuff…” Tim whistles low. “It’s possible, but I wouldn’t hold out any hope for the government, any government, building one that works.”

“I’ll keep that in mind,” Penny says.

“Hey!” Jimmy’s voice from upstairs. “Got some little girls looking for goodnight kisses.”

“We’re coming,” Abby calls up as Tim stands and helps her up.

On the morning of November 30th, before a day that will be spent at the house with Tony and Gibbs, working on getting the last of the drywall up, and if they go very quickly, starting on painting, Rachel asks Tim, “Going back tomorrow?”

“Yeah.” He nods as he says it.

“You feel ready?”

“I don’t know. I’m doing it anyway.”

She smiles at that. “Good answer.”

“Really? Kind of hoping this would be easier.”

“It will be, eventually, but not the way it was before.”

“Yeah.”
“Nine tomorrow?”

He nods again.

“I don’t have a client, and my phone will be on me. You call if you need to, okay.”

“Okay…” He thinks about it. “But… I don’t think I’m going to need to.”

“Good.”
08:50, December 1st.

For the first time in a month, Tim is driving through the gate at the Navy Yard.

He’s almost more apprehensive about doing it than experiencing any sort of negative feeling from doing it.

Of course, going through the gate isn’t something he did during his time on the inside. He went through it in October, and spent most of the next month on the other side of it. Even when he was on the wall that one day, he was on the east entrance, and right now he’s driving in through the south.

Beyond a million mornings of driving in, having a collection Marines check his car and ID, he has no memories, good or bad, of this.

He doesn’t recognize the Marine who checks the car and waves him in. But that’s not uncommon, either. Guard duty at the Navy Yard was (maybe still is? maybe will be again?) considered a prime non-combat posting, and people moved in and out on a regular basis.

Abby’s watching him as he’s doing this, keeping a hand on his right wrist. He flashes her a little smile as they pull through the gate. “It’s not bad.”

“Okay.”

He finds a parking place. Not too hard, there are maybe ten cars in a lot made for 200. “If we’re both going to be working regularly again, might be a good idea to get a new car.”

Abby nods at that. They received notification that several pieces of scrap with a VIN that matched Abby’s roadster had been recovered.

“Would you want to build another one?” he asks, turning the car off.

She shakes her head. “Take too long, and I’m not in any shape for it these days. When the kids get older, we can see about working on building a new one.”

Tim likes that idea. “Family tradition, pick out your first junker and rebuild it with Pop and Mom/Aunt Abby.”

She smiles, also liking that idea. The mental image of their girls, older, twelve-thirteen, hair pulled back, swaddled in coveralls, hands black with grease, putting a car together makes her really happy. (Little brother in the background, getting into everything, stealing tools, and getting yelled at intensifies that smile.) “Yeah. Might not be junkers.”

He gives her a look while they unbuckle. He supposes they could get a car in just rough shape and go from there, but that seems like a lot of effort for not much payout.

Abby gets what he’s thinking. “Okay, yeah, they’ll be junk, but we’re not going to be taking the time and energy to rebuild a Ford Escort or something like that. They’ll be cool cars.”
Tim nods back at her, liking that idea, a lot. “And for now?”

Abby shrugs. “Nothing I really want. We could get another of these,” she pats their Highlander, “and I’d be fine with that.”

“Want me to start doing some research when I get home?”

“You’re going to the house after here, right?”

“That’s the plan. Five rooms painted, way too damn many more to go. With any luck Gibbs and Tony are tearing through it without me this morning.”

She flashes him a look making it clear she’s not understanding. “I thought you liked painting. You’re good at it.”

“It’s okay.” And it is. Of the things they’ve done, he definitely prefers it to putting up drywall, let alone installing the HVAC system. But what he likes best about painting, namely get the rollers out and slap the paint on, is the part he’s not doing. “And I am good at it. Which is why they’ve got me doing all the precision work, the trim and edges, and my hands keep getting tired.”

“Ah.”

“Plumbing when we get done with that. That’ll be interesting.” They’ve got the pipes in. So, while the carpet guy shows up on Monday (None of them are interested in messing around with carpet glue or stretching anything out, and with the number of rooms they have, they got a good volume discount.) they’ll see about getting sinks, toilets, and as many shower/baths in as they can.

“I bet.”

As Abby says that, they’ve gotten to the front doors of the NCIS building. The outside looks the same as ever. But it would. Scrub off the soot stains, which the Marines and Sailors did, and it’s good as new.

The doors are just the same. They don’t loom with menace. There’s nothing sinister about them. Just two, large, smoked glass doors with metal handles, leading in.

He feels a brief frisson of... something, maybe fear, maybe nothing quite that strong, but it’s only a second, and then Abby takes his hand in hers, gives him a gentle squeeze, and lets go.

You okay? she signs as they step through.

He appreciates her not asking out loud. Sure, there aren’t a lot of people around, but enough. Probably. He flashes back to her.

The main entrance is beige now. It was off white edging toward light gray when he left, and now it’s not. A soft, sandy, soothing beige: sand on the beach in vacation photos beige. The floors are gleaming. He’s never seen them that shiny. He didn’t realize they were made of a material that could shine.

Even the metal detector’s been buffed to a shine.

Burt isn’t in his usual place. Inside security is civilian, and they’ve had the same ten or so guys for the last six years, at least.

Tim thinks about it. He knows Burt was in the building at the beginning. He brought his family in, and Tim remembers chatting with them before the press conference. Burt had been joking about how if he had to find ‘shelter from urban chaos’ nowhere was safer than a compound filled with armed Marines. Tim knows he can’t remember seeing Burt, or any of his family, after the first week. He thinks he remembers chatting with him about where home was, and that it was in Maryland. But he’s not sure about that.

Either way, he doesn’t know the Marine at the metal detector, and the Marine doesn’t know him.

The usual routine is to put everything in his pockets on a tray, put the tray through the x-ray, his go bag follows the tray through the x-ray machine, and then he goes through the metal detector. After…
Tim thinks it’s been nine years since Burt started there, so, after nine years Burt came to the conclusion that Tim really does work at NCIS, and has the good sense to not get in trouble. Which means, once he ended up with a small appliance’s worth of metal in his body, Burt let him just walk around the metal detector, rather than hold up the line by making him go through, set the damn thing off, and then wanding him.

This new guy isn’t doing that.

So, it’s the usual routine made slower by having to get wanded because he can no longer go through a metal detector without setting one off.

“It’s really okay for him to be here, Henry,” Abby says. (She gets to walk around the metal detector, with a quick frisk. Yes, they both know the radiation on one of those things is minimal, but she’s not interested in dosing Sean with a hit of it every day. She did the same thing, except, once again, Burt let her just walk around without the frisking, with Kelly.)

“Not taking any chances, Ma’am.”

“You know… Henry?” Tim asks Abby, as the wand Henry’s waving over him shrieks at his arm, shoulder, hand and ankle.

“He’s been checking me in for the last two weeks.”

“And I’ve got orders to check everyone, else, too.” Henry stands up, a look of respect in his eyes. If Tim’s got that much metal in him, and he’s up and walking, he’s recovered from some serious shit, and that’s the sort of thing Henry respects. “Even if their ID badge does have Director of Cybercrime on it.”

“Is that so?” Leon asks, coming up behind Tim and Abby. “How about if it says Director of NCIS?”

Henry straightens up, very tall, very grim looking, eyes narrowed. That look of respect falls, fast. He nods Tim through the check point. “I figure that means I check you extra careful. It was a lot of ‘Directors’ and ‘Generals’ and ‘Congressmen’ muckin’ things up.”

Leon grins at him. “Good to hear.” He hands over his ID. “Leon Vance, Director of NCIS.”

Henry doesn’t blanch at all. He just nods, checks the photo on the ID, and leads Vance through the metal detector. If anything, Henry looks disappointed that Vance checks out.

Abby takes the down elevator. They share a quick kiss before she steps in to continue evidence processing for “The Morgue.”

Tim and Leon wait for the up elevator. Both of them are tense, and dealing with it quietly.

As the doors open, Leon says, “Lara tells me I’m supposed to get your turkey brine recipe.”

Tim nods. “I’ll send it off to her.” He looks down as they step in. “I thought the floor in here was black.” It’s gray now.

“Jarvis got them really cleaning.” Leon looks almost afraid to touch the sides of the elevator, they’re as shiny as matte stainless steel can get. He looks at the floor. “I think they replaced the carpet, though.”

Tim thinks about that and decides that’s a good conclusion.

“Any more rumors?” Tim asks.

“And some confirmations. I’ll get into it, soon. Craig’s had his ear to the ground, and he’s been ferreting things out, too.”

“And Severin?” Tim asks about their Director of Operations.

“Got in from San Diego last night.”

The doors slide open, and they’re met with… “It’s like sunshine!” Tim says, wanting to wince away from the flood of bright light hitting him square in the face.

Leon stares at the almost blinding field of perky light yellow staring at them. “People are going to need sunglasses in here.”

“At least in the morning.”

They step out gingerly, looking around at the ‘new’ bullpen. The walls are now a daffodil yellow. With the morning sun streaming in through the windows, that yellow is reflecting light all over the place, resulting in an extremely bright room.

The carpets are a cheery leaf green.

When it became clear that people were going to be staying in here for an extended time, desks got moved around, dividers were used to close off small spaces for families, the floor plans were completely rearranged.

They aren’t back to where they were, yet. But Tim and Vance can see stacks of dividers, repainted in a creamy darker yellow, waiting to be collected by the teams that use them.

“Did the Navy have a store of yellow paint or something?” Tim asks.

Vance shrugs. He could very easily see something like that. Someone accidentally ordered fifty thousand gallons of yellow paint, and now everything’s daffodil colored.

“It’s cheery.” His voice sounds flat as he says it.

Tim shrugs, too. “It feels different. No smell.” That’s not precisely true. It smells like new carpet and paint. It doesn’t smell like six hundred people shoved into a building not meant to hold them. “No memories. Doesn’t look like my nightmares.”
Vance sighs at that. “Yeah. Let’s see what they did to my office.”

“T’ll have to get down to mine later today, see if I can still recognize it.”

They head up the stairs.

Craig is waiting for them in Vance’s Secretary’s office, with four cups of coffee and a bag full of pastries.

“Leon!” Leon looks slightly uncomfortable as Craig hugs him, but he responds with the appropriate back slap. Tim gets a hand shake. “McGee! Last time I saw you, you were still working downstairs. How are you liking the top tier?”

Tim smiles a bit. “It’s been interesting. The private jet was nice.”

Craig laughs at that. “Don’t get too used to it. That’s mine.”

“So I found out. We got some top flight talent out of that trip.”

“Glad to hear it. And really, yes, I’ll share if you need it, but I need more than a day’s heads up.”

“No problem.”

“When’s Bob getting in?” Craig asks.

A fourth voice, Bob Severin, Director of Operations, chimes in with, “I’m here. My body still thinks it’s six in the morning, but I’m here.”

Craig gives him a handshake, too. “Hey, Bob. Have you met McGee?”

“Not yet. Though I’ve been hearing a lot about what you do.” Severin offers his hand, and Tim shakes.

Tim flashes him a curious look. “Hearing what?”

“All of HR reports to me. This is the first year since I’ve been here that comp time is running under 20%, and we’re… we were, on track for hitting close to 73% of our staff actually taking their allotted vacation time. That paperwork software… We’re in way better shape than a lot of other agencies because of it.”

Leon leads them into his office, which is, with the exception of the walls and the carpet, exactly the way he left it. He sniffs tentatively, and Tim does pretty much the same thing, wondering if the smell had soaked irreversibly into the upholstery of his sofa, chair, and curtains, or into the pages of his books.

Apparently not. Or if it did, the smell of new carpet has beaten it into submission and made it cry uncle. All they can smell is carpet and the coffee Craig is carrying.

They sit around the conference table, the heavy, dark furniture looking out of place in Vance’s newly bright office, and Craig hands out the coffee. “Nothing too exotic today. Figured we could all use some normal.”

“That and the shop you used to get your Peruvian, Fair Trade, Organic, slow roasted over pine embers, and brewed in the tears of virgin unicorns blend, or whatever the hell it was you kept bringing in, is gone now.” Bob shakes his head. “Part of why I’m unconscious this morning. The closest place I could find a hotel room was in Richmond. Nowhere in the city to stay, and outside of it is packed."

Craig, a consummate politician, looks distressed at Bob putting it that blatantly.

“You can always find a berth on one of the ships if you’d like less travel time,” Leon adds.

“I’m tired enough; I’ll take you up on that for tonight.” Severin gulps down his coffee. “Okay, starting to feel human again.”

“What constitutes better shape?” Craig asks, putting a tray of muffins and Danish on the table between them.

“As of the next pay period, we’re broke instead of in debt. Fewer comp hours means we weren’t paying out nearly as much as we usually do, which meant we had more money to keep running on when Treasury stopped wiring us funds.”

“Jarvis tells me we’ll be getting enough to cover payroll, and our back obligations in the next few days,” Leon says.

“Wonderful,” Severin says with a weary sarcasm. “We getting any money to keep us going after that?”

“We should be able to make pay long enough to keep going until we know if there’s still going to be an NCIS,” Leon tells them. “One hundred million will hit our accounts soon.”

Severin’s shaking his head. “That’s not much of a budget.”

“It’ll do for the time being, and get everyone up to date.” Leon would have liked to have seen more, too, that’s barely eleven weeks of cash for them, but he knows that Jarvis is watching that money to the penny.

“Get back to, ‘if there’s still going to be an NCIS,’” Tim says. He’s figuring that’s a bigger deal than if they can meet payroll. After all, it doesn’t matter if there’s money, or not, if there’s no agency.

“That’s the question, on several levels. On the biggest level, is there still going to be Marines and a Navy after this? Is there going to be a US military force?” Leon says. The rumors he’s been getting have involved some ideas he’s not fond of.

“Yes.” Craig responds. “At least, there will be a military force. Reorganization is still up for debate, but even if ‘The United States’ becomes code for ‘The European Union of the Western Hemisphere’ some form of common defense will happen.”

“What sort of reorganization?” Severin asks.

Craig grimaces. “That’s for after the election. But, keeping track of the guys trying to get elected is part of why I get the jet. A lot of them are thinking that we don’t need four competing, overlapping branches of the military, and if everything came under one umbrella it’d be easier to scale down.” Craig sips his coffee. “And they want to do a lot of scaling down. Take planes for example, the theory is there’s no need for an Airforce, Army Flight Service, Naval Aviators, and Marine Pilots, plus a drone program, all overlapping and doing mostly the same stuff.”

“So, what… Everything that flies goes to an Airforce, if it floats it’ll be Navy, and if it marches/rides on the ground, it’s Army?” Severin says.

“Pretty much.” Craig hasn’t much liked hearing that, but he’s fairly sure a lot of potential voters have. “There’s no doubt we’ll still have a Navy, but Marines… Any sort of ground troop, they’re talking about mashing them all into one force. There’ll still be specialists, like the SEALs, but the people talking about this don’t see all that much difference between Soldiers and Marines.”

Though he doesn’t say it, attitude aside, Tim doesn’t see a whole lot of difference between Soldiers and Marines, either. Though he supposes that Marines tend to go in on boats, soften things up, and then the Army follows behind them and holds onto things. (Granted, that’s a very Marine way of understanding who does what. The Army probably has different ideas on that subject.)

“And thus, we end up with level one on will there still be an NCIS?” Craig says. “Literally, will there be a separate Naval system of justice for us to even work with? It’s possible we, ACID, and AFOSI might all end up wrapped into one service.”

“Coast Guard?” Tim asks, thinking of Abbi.

“Broken into land and sea defenses and mashed into the corresponding units. All of the land based border defenses may end up as part of the Army, sea ends up Navy,” Craig replies. He catches the look between Leon and Tim. “Oh, that’s right, you’re friendly with their current head. Trust me, none of you guys who were big on breaking this ever have to worry about job security again. Bob and I,” that gets an arch look from Craig aimed at Leon, “who were left to pick up the damn pieces after, without any advanced warning, we might be out with our asses hanging in the breeze, but whatever the hell it is they come up with next, they’ll be begging you guys to run it.”

There’s a moment of quiet that follows that. Tim watches to see if Leon’s going to apologize for not telling his two other top guys about what was going on, but he doesn’t. He gives them the need to know only, and you didn’t look.

Craig flashes him something that Tim reads as Don’t keep your damn cards so close to the vest. Do you have any idea what the fuck I had to do over the last month?

Leon raises an eyebrow slightly, and Craig notices how much weight he’s lost. Craig nods, and Leon does, too.

Tim decides to shift the topic of conversation a bit. “You said that’s one level of will there still be an NCIS, what’s the other one?”

“More than one,” Craig replies. “Terrorism. Just like with the military, the people who are running for Congress and President don’t see much need for a CIA, NSA, DHS, Border Patrol, FBI, and every other branch of Federal Investigation all running their own terror organizations.”

“Terror is more than a quarter of what we do. They going to expect us to hand it off?” Leon asks.

“Maybe? Like with everything else, we’ll have to see who wins, but… All of them are running on anti-corruption platforms, and the less overlap, the fewer organizations, the less chance of there being corruption.”

“My grandmother’s telling us—“ Tim sees the way Craig and Severin look at him, the Who’s your grandma to know? “Penny Langston—“

“Oh, I met her last week!” Craig knows what’s going on now. He smiles at the memory. “She’s a firecracker.” Severin still doesn’t know who she is. “One of the DC Ambassadors to the Congress.
What’s she saying?”

“Streamlining all of the Federal Law Enforcement into one system. Some of them are talking about automating a lot of it, getting a computer system up and running. Someone finds a body, someone gets kidnapped, terror threat, whatever, they put all the relevant facts in, and the computer calls up whoever specializes in that sort of case.”

“Like your job software?” Leon asks.

“Yeah, but much bigger, and it’d handle any sort of crime, and have everyone in it, and… Okay, look, I can do that for NCIS Cybercrime, because there’s fewer than 200 of us, and we only handle certain things. Try to make it much bigger and you’ve got a mess. Just getting information put into it correctly, every time… Most of the time when my system isn’t working, it’s because whoever keyed in the problem didn’t know what the problem was or keyed it in wrong. Now try to imagine that for every sort of Federal crime imaginable.”

There is only one thing, besides a y chromosome, that all four of the men at this table have in common, they were all, once upon a time, field agents. They know how field agents deal with technology. They know how it takes a good five years of regular use for even basic tools to be used properly, most of the time, by most users. And they can all imagine exactly how well some Local LEO back in God-knows-where-Arkansas or the like, trying to handle a sophisticated piece of electronic software to get the right guy to show up to handle his one murder a decade, will do. All of them wince at that idea.

“Yeah,” Tim says. “So, while I don’t mind that idea of, say, instead of nine different agencies all handling different terror aspects, having one that takes care of the whole thing, if we’re talking crime… You know how it works, starts as a robbery, turns into a kidnapping, ends up a murder. No one wants three agencies working on that, or a computer yanking the crime out of one set of hands to another each time it shifts parameters.”

“But we also know that what starts as a robbery, turns into a murder, and is in fact terrorism cleaning up loose ends,” Leon adds.

“Yeah, we do.” Severin says.

“Question is, are we just going to end up being one group, some sort of massive Federal Law Enforcement, or will we still specialize based on victims or location or something?” Craig asks. “I don’t know,” he answers them.

“None of us do. They don’t know, either,” Leon adds.

“I do know this,” Craig says. “While the new Congress is milling around, figuring things out, we’re going to be doing that, too.” He pulls out his phone and sends quick emails to everyone at the table. “Those are invites to different conferences all throughout January and February. We’ll be meeting with anyone and everyone next month, building our own alliances, figuring out how we think we’ll work best. By the time Congress is ready to start talking about reorganizing, we’ll have reports up and ready to go, written by all of us, about what we think will work best.”

Tim opens his email and sees that from January 9th to the 13th, he’s expected to be joining in on an Anti-Terrorism Tech and Cyber Resources Commission. From January 16th to the 20th, he’s on the Federal Cybercrime Initiative Commission. From the 23rd to the 27th, he’s supposed to be warming a seat with the Technological Innovations Streamlining Services Commission. And the list goes on and on through February. The only upside he can see is that they apparently intend to do this in DC. Each commission has a DC location.

“Unless my son shows up early, I’m on paternity leave from the end of January to the middle of February.”
“Congratulations on the baby, and make sure you’re second-in-command is ready to go. And, I know, legally, I can’t try to push you out of your family leave time, but try and pop in for at least a day or two,” Craig says. Get your ass to those meetings is clear on his face.

Tim raises an eyebrow at him. Maybe he’ll go, maybe not. But he does need a real second-incommand either way. Time to get his crew back.

Leon looks up from his own email. “Supposedly they’ll also be calling us in to testify before Congress soon, when are we supposed to fit that into this?”

“It’ll be February before the new Congress is sworn in. Then they’ll have to organize themselves, and assuming we end up with a President to go with the Congress, figure out where they’ll be meeting. If testimony begins before 2018, I’ll be stunned,” Craig says. “In the meantime, we’ve got meetings to get ready for.”

“Once the election takes place, what happens with our current armed forces?” Leon asks Craig.

“Ah… Yes. The nuts and bolts. I have been told that as soon as the election takes place our current armed forces go back into active duty. So, December 13, we’re open for business again. For how long? No one knows. Until the new Congress and President is sworn in, the Navy and Marines won’t be doing much, but we’ll be back working for them again, and everyone who transferred to a National Guard troop will be returning, as well as all of the cases they’ve been handling between now and then.”

“So, prepared to be slammed on the 13th,” Severin says.

Tim and Leon nod at that. “Everyone back on the 12th,” Leon says.

“I’ll have my guys up and ready to go,” Tim replies.

They chat for a bit longer after that. Mostly bits and pieces that don’t directly affect Tim, beyond the fact that his current set up better still be functional, because it’s not like he, or anyone else at NCIS, is getting any new equipment anytime soon.

Severin, Craig, and Vance talk about the Agents Afloat, all of whom have had no downtime since October, and making sure they get reassigned as needed.

They cover the Agents who have been stationed abroad, and they have a very long chat about what to do with the San Diego, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Texas offices. California and Texas are more than willing to let their people leave, as well as their personal equipment, they’re still dealing with issues of what’s going to happen to the land, buildings, and ’large equipment.’”

“You’re saying Texas wants to keep our arms?” Leon asks Craig.

“Basically. Personal weapons, fine. Those can go with our people. They want our APVs, gunships, and anything bigger than a .45 side arm to stay with them.”

Leon shakes his head. “Really?”

“Really.” Craig’s nodding his head. Yet another reason for the jet, he’s been in every state that’s left the Union in the last month, trying to make deals to keep hold of NCIS’s stuff. “They’ve suddenly got to take care of their own defense, and are under the impression that the National Guard and Rangers aren’t quite as well armed as they’d like. So, they’re grabbing everything they can lay hands on.”

“And if we try to just take it out?” Leon asks.

“You really want to try to run 1500 miles with the Texas Rangers chasing your men in an effort to keep custody of nine APVs?” Craig asks.

“Shit, no.” Leon immediately gets the logistics of what’s involved in trying to get his stuff out of Texas. Even if the Navy offers air support, that’s still a long time to be in ‘enemy’ territory for not a whole lot of benefit. “What’s California trying to do?”

Severin takes that one. He’s based out of San Diego, for the time being, and that time’s getting smaller and smaller each day. “We can have our men. Everything else they’re trying to confiscate. When Jarvis handed the Navy over to the National Guard, they decided that meant they got everything. Those offices are, personnel aside, a complete loss. We’ve got to be out by the 12th, when they officially become an independent country.”

“What are we doing with them?” Tim asks. “My guys can work from anywhere, but…”

“Good question. Depends on how many resignations we’ve gotten over the last month. Some of them are coming here. Some are going to Seattle and Portland. I know the New Orleans office is going to be expanding, as well as Mobile, and Yuma.” Severin looks at Vance. “All the more reason why 100 million dollars isn’t going to last long. We’ve got reimbursing relocation expenses in their contracts for anytime we move one of them more than 15 miles. And we’re going to have to re-outfit most of the ones who move.”

Tim winces at that, remembering all the cool toys in Los Angeles. “OSP in LA?”

“We’ve been pulling out what we can, which isn’t much. We’re allowed all of our secure data, but none of the equipment. We’re allowed to wipe everything clean. The National Guard has surrounded and been keeping watch on all of our offices. Same for the all of the military bases. We’re losing one of our premier tech centers. It’ll hurt. Wait until you see what Jarvis is going to have to do to try and get the aircraft carriers that decided to land in California when everything went haywire.”

Vance shakes his head, not sure what exactly he can do with that. He knows he had close to 150 people in California and Texas, and a handful of others in the states that decided to join Canada. “We’ll do as much as we can with what we have.”

More nits to pick, more details. Tim stays engaged, and pays attention, but most of it isn’t really in his wheelhouse. Finally, after three hours, they’ve got rough plans in place, and know what happens next.

Which means they break off, and can go to do their own things.

Which for Tim is a trip to the subbasement.

He’s not sure what to expect as he heads down. Unlike the rest of NCIS, his set up stayed fairly close to how it had been. They’d locked down all of the special features on the computers, and left them open as communication hubs, so everyone could talk to the outside world. The cubicles came in handy for allowing everyone a little privacy.
The doors to the elevator slide open, and... nothing. No memories. No palpable hit of agony and memory as he steps out. It's more bright, perky yellow and soothing green. This couldn't be less of a dungeon if it tried.

It's been cleaned to gleaming. The white LEDs cool down the yellow some, so it's not as warm as it is upstairs. And of course, as the subbasement, they've got no natural light down here. The floor underfoot, once gray concrete, has been repainted to match the carpets upstairs. It's... pretty. Could be the data center for a cosmetics company or something equally innocuous.

The gaming station is turned off, but functional. All the games are in a tidy pile on the shelf under the TV. His snack station is stocked. The Caf-Pow dispenser is whirling away, ready to give them frozen, churned caffeine in a heartbeat.

It's too quiet. The computers are off. Tim makes a note. Each computer had hundreds of people doing god knows what on it. His guys are coming back on the 10th, or earlier, otherwise they won't be ready to hit the ground running on the 13th.

He heads into his own office. The door is the same. Reddish, fake wood. It clashes with the yellow walls. His name is still on the black tag. Inside that door... He opens it with a sense of trepidation.

They cleaned but didn’t change anything. He guesses he had enough stuff up on his walls that they didn’t want to mess around with repainting.

He looks at the ceiling for a moment, feeling his breath starting to speed as memories of sleeping in here, or the feel of his keyboard under his fingers as he broke the last barrier to finding out what that account did. He inhales slow and deep, and lets it out just as easy. It’s just a room. His room. He’s spent a lot of time in it, and most of it’s been good.

He sits down, behind his desk, and flips his computer on. The chair's too high. He readjusts, trying to remember if other people were using his computer as a communications hub. Those memories are fairly vague. Laying on the floor, head pillowed on his go bag, trying to grab some sleep, before he found his little nook in the Lab, that memory isn’t vague.

Penny and Ducky, finally crashing in here. Jake and Bishop catching a quiet, alone, night in here. Gibbs and Abbi claiming this room for their own. He remembers that. And he knows, as he goes through those memories, that they’re all from the first week.

He shakes his head, fingers stroking his mouse. He spent so little time in here after the first week, it doesn’t hit, not the way he expects it will.

Tim know where to go if he wants the memories to beat the shit out of him. He knows where the psychic punch is. He’s not ready for it, and for that matter, he’s not sure there’s any reason why he’d ever subject himself to it.

Not like there’s any reason for him to go back up on the roof.

So, he gets his computer up and running, and begins the traditional anti-virus scans. God alone knows what everyone else might have done to his baby, time to get her working again.

You okay? It’s a text from Abby.

Yeah. Getting my computer up, dosing her with cyber penicillin. A lot of it.
“So… where is lunch these days?” Tim asks as he steps into the Lab. It feels really normal to do that. He’s even feeling well enough to skip the elevator, which had been his usual mode of up and down post-Stennis but had been something he’d been trying to avoid in order to stay in better shape before the Stennis.

Walking in and seeing Abby in her lab coat, all on her own, music blaring, that feels like home to him.

“We can meet Jimmy and Breena at the canteen they’ve got at The Morgue. We could venture out and see what’s open. We can head to the canteen here. Or we can eat what Jimmy packed for us. What’s your pleasure?”

Tim grabs her coat. “If you feel like walking, let’s go out.”

She pats her hip, then her hand trails over her belly. “Sean’s behaving today, so I feel like walking. Let’s go.”

“Where’s your troop of baby Marines?” he asks as they head off.

“Their ‘real job’ is collecting evidence from The Morgue and then taking my findings back to them. They’re on their three times a day information exchange.”

“Ah…” He wraps his arm around her as he says that, enjoying the feel of her solid against him.

“What’s open?”

“We’ll see. More stuff every day.”

“Carlo’s?”

“Not yesterday. Maybe today. Tell me about what happened upstairs…”

So he does.
Marines out to fetch her food, and, if it’s behaving, going out herself, to get into the city and spend money.

It’s hard enough to run a business. Worse when most of the people in your area are gone. And she knows, because she saw how it worked in her hometown, that the more businesses that fail, the fewer people will stick around, and the next thing you know you’ve got a ghost town.

So, sure, her fifteen or so dollars a day for lunch isn’t going to make or break a business, but it helps. And right now, that’s all she can do.

Carlo’s isn’t open. They walk by it, and that makes Tim feel nervous, because it, like many of the buildings nearby, are boarded up.

He thinks though, that he’s nervous because he’s primed to read a city like this, boarded up windows, no cars, very few people, as dangerous. Every video game ever has this scene, and, if it were a game, in the next minute someone would start sniping at them.

Abby, who’s been doing this for weeks now, isn’t tense.

She leads them to a building with boarded over windows, though this one has We’re Open spray painted, along with their hours, on the plywood.

“Diane mentioned that every window guy within five hundred miles is here, but it’ll be weeks before most buildings have glass.”

Tim can understand that. He opens the door (plywood nailed over what used to be a glass door) for Abby, and there are people inside.

It’s dim. The place wasn’t built with enough electric lights, because it’s supposed to have huge front windows. But the mood is… maybe not cheerful, but it’s not scared, and the construction workers in the back appear to be having a great month.

There’s not a lot on the menu. Apparently, in addition to glass, it’s also tricky to get the same range of ingredients as before. But his cup of ham and pea soup is good, and Abby enjoys her turkey club sandwich.

“You two save room for dessert?” their waitress asks as they’ve wrapped up lunch.

Abby glances at him, and he shoots back a I’ll have a bite of anything you want to order look. Abby smiles up at her. “What do you have?”

A minute later, they’ve got an order for a slice of apple spice cake headed their way.

Tim sips his decaf coffee, and says, “So, on a completely unrelated topic to anything else we’ve been talking about,” Mostly DC and work, “I’ve been thinking, we still don’t have a marriage present for Breena.”

“Jimmy and I have been talking about that, too. Wanted to get you in on it before we settled on something.”

“Good. What have you been thinking?”
“A pendant of some sort. She always wears Jon’s diamond on a necklace, and if we could find something to go with that, or around it…”

Tim tries to see that idea. “How do you mean ‘around?’”

“It’s a small diamond solitaire,” Tim knows that, “so… around… like, you’d thread the necklace through whatever it is, and the diamond would end up in the middle of it.”

“So, whatever it is has to be open enough to get the clasp through, and big enough to fit Jon’s diamond.”

“Yeah. And pretty and refined enough that she could wear it and still look professional.”

“And that’s where you hit a snag?”

Abby smiles some at that. Tim knows her tastes in and out, and he’s sure she could find dozens of absolutely awesome wrought gold/silver/steel wire work that Jon’s diamond could rest inside easily, however, finding something along those lines that would look appropriate resting against the chest of a mortician… not so much so.

“What’s Jimmy thinking?” Tim asks.

Abby looks up to their waitress, who drops off the cake as he’s asking that. “Thank you.” And then hands Tim the second fork on the plate.

“He’s thinking maybe some sort of heart-type thing.”

Tim should have guessed that. “You’re too Goth and he’s too cute.”

Abby shrugs a bit at that. Tim isn’t wrong. Though, given the choice between Jimmy’s heart, and her thought of some sort of cross, set so Jon’s diamond would rest where the bars connect, the heart idea is probably closer to something Breena would wear because she’d like it, as opposed to wear because they gave it to her.

Tim fiddles with his ring, thinking more about the idea of a pendant, because he likes that a lot.

Abby takes a bite of the cake, and nudges his hand. He has a bite, too. It’s pretty good. Sweet, spicy, the frosting has a little savory sourness to it to balance the sweetness nicely. It could use a bit more nutmeg, but all in all he’s pleased with it. (Becoming a better cook has made him a much more judgmental eater.)

“Three metals…” Tim says. “One for each of us.”

“Three of whatever the pendant is… Like circles. Three circles, all around Jon’s diamond…”

Tim pulls a pen out and begins sketching on his napkin. He comes up with something reminiscent of the Olympic rings.

Abby shakes her head and takes the napkin from him. She’s a better artist, so it takes her a little longer, but her sketch looks a lot more like jewelry. She’s got three, thin, circles, through the loops the chain goes through on Jon’s diamond’s setting, circling the diamond.

Tim likes it better than his sketch, but it still looks crowded and a little clunky. He can see his wedding ring, and the swirls of metals through it. He starts to take the napkin back from Abby, but he doesn’t have the sketching skills to pull this off.
“Okay, how about one circle, made out of three different metals, each one an elongated tear drop shape…” Abby’s not following him yet. “It’s round, and the same thickness all around, but each metal starts out thick, with just a little of the metal next to it, and then sort of bleeds off into the next color…”

“Like a three part yin-yang…”

“Are you thinking a solid circle, because I’m thinking a ring shape?” (And Tim also can’t wrap his head around the idea of a three part yin yang.)

“Not solid, but thick on one side, thin on the other, and like you said bleeding into each other.” Abby starts to sketch it out. Hers isn’t teardrop shaped, they’re a solid band that slips from more of one color to more of the next.

Tim likes that sketch. He thinks Jimmy might, too. Abby starts to shade the different colors in, and one of them is very dark. “It’s for Breena, you can’t have black.”

She almost pouts at that, then says, “I know. But… Okay, Jon’s diamond is on a white gold setting and a white gold chain, so… we want to be able to see the different colors, can’t do white gold, platinum, and silver, they’ll all bend into each other…”

“Different finishes of the same metal?” Tim asks.

“You and Jimmy pick one metal, one of you do shiny, the other matte…”

Tim’s thinking through that. He likes that idea. “What are you doing?”

“Rose gold. If I can’t be black, I can be pink. And Breena likes pink.”

Tim smiles at that idea. “We run it by him tonight, and tomorrow I can add a trip to the jeweler to my to-do list?”

“Yeah.”

They walk back to the Navy Yard, holding hands. It’s not the most direct route, but Tim’s willing to trust that Abby knows more about how and where they’re going. He trusts that if there’s something he might not want to see between him and the Navy Yard, that she’ll scoot them around it.

Even with the route they are taking, there’s a lot of boarded up buildings. There are very few cars. Very few people. Tim can tell the exact line of how close the fire got to them, because they cross it. They follow along three blocks where the buildings look scorched and there are no living plants.

As they go back, Abby says to him, “It’s like chemo.”

He gives her a curious look, not having made any leap along those lines in his own head.

“Okay…” tell me more, is clear in his tone.

“There’s something bad, something that, if you just leave it, it’ll kill you.” He follows that. Cancer, don’t treat it, you die, okay, he’s on the same page. He’s not entirely sure why she’s thinking that, but he gets the base concept. “So, you take this stuff, and it’s bad, too. It has nasty side effects, and it kills or damages a lot of the good things, but you keep taking it because you’ve got to kill the bad stuff.”
He glances around, they’ve turned the corner and are now on the same street as the Navy Yard. No more fire damage, but the marks of the last few months are clear on this street, too. “Is that how you see… this?”

They haven’t talked about what he did. Or why. Not on this sort of level. He’s kept his conversations about if this was worth it confined to Rachel and Jethro for right now.

She nods at him. “Yeah. You cut the tumor out. And it hurt, bad. And a lot of good tissue was lost, too. But you do it because if the tumor stays there, it’s going to kill the whole thing.”

He feels a wave of tired cynicism overtake him. “You really think this will help? Five years from now, is anything actually going to be better?”

She squeezes his hand. “I believe it will be. I have to. You do, too, even if you can’t find it right now. Because if we didn’t, we wouldn’t be here. There’s no point in doing this, any of it, if it doesn’t help. Maybe… long term… Maybe it won’t help. Maybe the cancer wins in the end. That’s true, and it’s real, and it happens. But we fight it. Because that’s who we are. Maybe we only win one tumor, one cell, at a time. Maybe one tumor is all the win we get. It’s enough. It has to be.”

He sighs, seeing the walls and the gate, knowing he’s going to be going back to it, soon. “And we fight the good fight, because it’s who we are.”

She stops, and he does, too. Abby turns to him, wrapping one arm around his waist, and the other around his neck, and kisses him. It’s not a romantic or erotic kiss. He can feel layers in her touch, kindness, sympathy, understanding. His bedrock, certainty in the storm, touching his cheek, and voicing a word, gently, “Exactly.”

Chapter End Notes

N/A: Some of you have mentioned an interest in eventually laying hands on a printed, bound, version of STAW.

I happen to have the skills to make such a thing possible. (Go to Amazon, check out Keryl Raist, and you can see the three previous novels I’ve designed. Layout is pro-quality.) But, given the length of STAW, and the time involved in doing this, this would not be an inexpensive proposition. At the very least, STAW will end up being 5 HUGE books (and maybe 6). Just printing and shipping alone will probably run $100 or more (for paperbacks).

So, if any of you are still interested in this idea, drop me a note with your email, and I’ll cost the project out, based on however many of you are interested, and we can see if this is do-able.
Getting Back Into the Old/New Groove

When Tim gets to the house, he finds Tony and Gibbs in the hallway to what will be his wing of the house. Which means that, as of now, Penny and Ducky’s rooms are painted, the great room is painted, the kitchen and dining area are done, and, if they really push, tomorrow by lunch they’ll have his section done.

Then onto the second floor.

“How’d it go?” Tony asks as he and Gibbs roll primer all over the walls.

Tim takes off his jacket and the nice button down he’s got on over a t-shirt. He’s got a ratty, old, too big MIT sweatshirt that’s been living here and getting covered in paint drips. That goes on, along with the ancient sneakers and jeans that serve as painting clothing for him, and, a moment later, he grabs another roller. He’s thinking that maybe they should just grab some coveralls for this. Though he’s not sure where the NCIS coveralls may be these days, or if they want to get them covered in paint.

“Pretty well,” Tim fills them in on what happened today. When he wraps up he says to Tony, “You should probably head in before the 12th, too. Make sure your work station is set up, if nothing else.”

Tony nods at that. “Gotta get some people to put in it, too. I can’t hire right now, can I?”

Tim shrugs. “I’m not. But, you can try to headhunt out of the offices that are closing and reorganizing. And I know we’ve got people here in DC who aren’t coming back. Probably have some orphan Agents here, too.”

“Great.”

“What’s happening with Bishop?” Gibbs asks as he pours more of the primer into the paint tray.

Tony shrugs. “Tech support? Analysis? I’m not going to fire her, but she’s up in New York for God alone knows how long.”

“Jimmy says that Ducky thinks she’ll be on maternity leave before ‘17 is done,” Tim adds.

“Yeah, I got that rumor over turkey day, too. So, for the foreseeable future it’s me and Draga.”

Gibbs nods. “Did a two man team for a long time. It’s not a bad thing.”

“I know. We did it, too, for… what was that? Six months?”

“Something like that.” Gibbs doesn’t remember precisely when Vivian left, but he does remember exactly when Kate joined them.

“Still, it’s a pain in the ass when you’re used to four.”

Tim starts rolling primer onto the walls. “You’re not entirely on your own. You’ve got all your computer work farmed out. Who knows when or if we’re picking up a terror case again, so the year-long cases aren’t coming up. Your paperwork’s been cut to the bone. Two with one out of the office… That might work.”

“Might. Probably will. And at least right now, when we’re just working crimes… Yeah. It’ll do.”
Tony’s not really seeing the wall in front of him. He’s thinking through his job.

“At least until you’ve got the time to go through the displaced Agents’ files,” Tim adds.

Tony nods at that, stroking primer up the wall. “Can’t wait to see what the cases we are going to get are going to look like. Can you imagine all the stuff the Local LEOs are going to be handing over to us?”

Tim and Gibbs groan at that.

“Red?” Tony asks as he’s prying up the lid on the first of the cans of paint for Tim and Abby’s room.

Tim glances down at the paint. It’s not supposed to be red. Dark, sultry burgundy. It’s got a name like Garnet Sunset or something equally poetic.

But in the can, it’s fire engine red.

He shrugs a bit. Every other color they’ve worked with has gotten darker as it dried. Though he’s really hoping that this is the right color. Everyone had figured out their square footage, come up with a list of paint colors and how much they needed of it, and then, over the previous weekend they’d gone through the house writing color numbers on post it notes and sticking them to every wall.

Jimmy and Tony had taken the list to the hardware store and gotten all the colors, so, if somewhere along the lines a number got flipped or something, this might be a can of RED!

Tim checks the lid, though he’s not sure what that would do. He doesn’t remember what the correct number is, and hell, he never knew. Abby and Breena were in charge of that part.

“So, what, Palmer and Breena have the real bedroom and this is your ‘red room’?” Tony asks with a smirk, as he starts to stir the paint.

Tim rolls his eyes and shakes his head a bit. “Didn’t I tell you not to read that book?”

Gibbs glances between them, unsure what a ‘red room’ might have to do with an unnamed book.

“I told you that.”

“You told me it was an awful book. I figured the movie would be better. Probably was.”

“How could the movie have been better?”

“Naked people and it was less than two hours long.”

Tim nods. Tony’s got a good point on that.

Gibbs watches them and decides he’s not going to ask. He does stir the red paint with a somewhat amused look on his face.

Tim catches it and says, “It’ll look cool.”
“Uh huh. Is this why you’ve got two bedrooms? Couldn’t agree on what it’d look like?” Tony asks.

Tim doesn’t roll his eyes. He does take a smaller container of the RED, a small brush, and heads to the ladder in the corner of the room. Just like with the rest of the rooms, he’s cutting in the edges.

“That just ended up being a perk. This is home, and it’s private, but it’s not… that private. The kids’ll probably have buddies over here. And we’ll have parties here. So… people might end up in here, and they might begin to wonder if there’s only one adult bedroom. So, two rooms. And that works out nicely because Jimmy and Breena can have their light and airy beach room, and we can have our dark and sultry harem.”

“Harem?” Tony hops onto that. “This really is a red room?”

Tim half grins and half rolls his eyes. “Like I said, it’s going to look cool. Ceiling’s going to be dark purple. Trim’s chocolate. Floor is wood, also dark, and there’ll be a lot of soft, sensual textures, pillows and rugs, and a lot of those little LED lights… It’ll be cool.”

Gibbs raises an eyebrow, trying to wrap his mind around what this room is going to look like.

This conversation gets Tim thinking.

On the first floor, there’s Penny and Ducky’s space, which will, when they’re done with being DC Ambassadors, be their fulltime home. Their space is a combination of close, warm rooms in autumn colors, and an open, white, cream and gold colored bedroom.

There’s the main living space, which has been done in cool light colors, grays so light they border on white, faint washes of blue, exposed wood, and gray rock. It’s not rough, but there is a rustic cabin sort of feel to the main space.

They’ve gotten the first coat of Jimmy and Breena’s room done, which really is a beachy sort of room. There’s a chair rail at waist high along the walls. Below it is a light sandy color. The rail is in a mid-toned blue-green that edges gray, and the top, including the ceiling is a light sky blue.

Tim knows that eventually there will be a sand colored carpet in there, and a white ceiling fan. There are plans for some large, leafy hanging plants, and light flowy white curtains. The bed they have picked out is similarly white, with flowy curtains hanging off the posts. The room is supposed to look, and feel, like an island retreat. He imagines they’ll spend more time there in the summer when it’s warm.

His and Abby’s room: that’ll be dark, close, intimate and sensual.

What he doesn’t know, though, and what has him thinking, is what everyone else’s rooms will look like.

“Aren’t you guys doing something like this? I mean… we’re… the four of us… setting this up as a comfortable play space. This is where we come when we’re relaxing and having a good time, so our rooms are functional, but they’re fun, in a way home isn’t, you know?” He’s fairly certain that a room this close and dark and red all the time would drive him buggy, but for a few days at a time? That’s just awesome.

Gibbs and Tony think about that. Gibbs nods. His room, like the main room, has a lot of exposed wood, and will, when it’s done, feel a whole lot like a little cabin off in the woods. Cozy, warm, in touch with the earth and the wood he loves.

Tony shrugs a bit. “Our bathroom is. I think Ziva went a little bonkers on that.”
That gets a nod out of Gibbs. He and Jimmy spent close to an hour lugging in boxes of tiles for that bathroom over the weekend. He doesn’t know what Ziva’s imagining, but whatever it is, it’s going to involve a lot of tile.

“Why the bathroom?” Tim asks.

Tony raises an eyebrow at him, and says, “Not everyone plays in their bedroom.”

Tim and Gibbs chuckle at that.

“Minds out of the gutter. She likes to read when she gets a bath.”

“Ahhh…” Tim says with a smirk.

They’re cleaning up for the day, when Tim says, “So, Jimmy told me that he noticed a piece of equipment going into the boat house.”

Gibbs looks up from can of paint he’s hammering the lid back onto.

Tim gives him the start talking look.

Gibbs shrugs a bit. “Project I’m working on.”

“Project you’re working on here? This whole thing is a project,” Tony says. “What’s this equipment?”

“Mini lathe,” Tim says. Jimmy’s mentioned it to the three of them the night before, and since Tim’s the one who was going to see Gibbs next, he was deputized to investigate.

“What do you do with one of them?” Tony asks. He’s never heard of a mini lathe before.

“Make pens?” Tim adds.

“Not makin’ pens.”

Now they’re both staring at him, waiting for an explanation. Gibbs isn’t forthcoming.

“What are you making you don’t want to do in your basement?” Tim begins. “Can’t be for the house. Too small for spindles on the banister or stuff like that.”

“Abbi. It’s got to be for Abbi. Right?” Tony adds, getting it. “She lives in your house now, can’t have whatever it is working away in the basement. But she’s only here on Saturdays…”

“Both of us. I hope.”

This has Tim and Tony very interested.

“Christmas is coming up. Got the engagement ring bought. Want to get the wedding rings done, too. Show her all of three of them at once. See if she likes ‘em.”

Grins spread wide over Tim and Tony’s faces. “You’re going to ask her on Christmas?”
Gibbs shrugs a little. “Thinking Christmas Eve, when it’s just us, instead of the whole mob on Christmas.”

“Wait!” Tony holds up a hand. “That implies that you’re thinking of doing this when everyone is around?”

Gibbs smiles some. “Yeah. Thinkin’ about it.”

Tim laughs, just so happy. “Oh man, you’re going to make the girls’ day! What’s the plan?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “You’ll see it when you see it.”

On Saturday, everyone, minus the Mallard-Langston branch of the clan, is at the house, and painting away.

Mona’s not happy about the smell, and the babies aren’t exactly thrilled, either.

Molly, though, has a blast, because her mama and daddy decide that she’s big enough to help get primer up. She’s even more pleased when she sees the little roller Uncle Tim got her. (Actually, it’s one of the tools he’s been using for cutting in. It’s a four inch long, one inch diameter, foam roller that’s good for getting tight spaces. And it’s exactly the right size for an almost three-year-old.) And, yes, there are some erratic stripes of primer on the walls, but nothing that a little smoothing out from Mama can’t fix.

Toward the end of that day, as every room in the house has at least the first coat paint up, and most of them are done, Tim’s thinking that he’s feeling… pretty good. He’s tired, but he’s not aching or sore or anything along those lines.

“I’m thinking, you need to get back into the office at some point,” he says to Tony, “and Collin can’t wait for us to start cutting out on Sunday dinner again, so… You guys want to hit the gym Sunday?”

“Is it open?” Tony asks.

Tim shrugs. He didn’t check it out when he was there. But it’s not like they’ve ever cared about ‘open’ before. They use it whenever they feel like it.

Abby nods, though. “Yeah, the Marines have been using it some. It’s probably the color of a daisy, but it’s open.”

Tony hears that and nods. He does need to get back in, start getting ready to work, and it has been a long time since he’s hit the gym. “You in, Jethro?”

Gibbs nods. He does not, at all, mind the idea of cutting out early from Sunday supper. Yes, he’s happy to see the various Slater branches are getting along well enough for everyone to attend Sunday supper, but mostly, that’s him being pleased that Breena’s family isn’t driving her buggy.

“Ziver?” he asks.
“I would not miss it. Abbi?”

A gleam lights up in Abbi’s eyes. She’s been doing too much paperwork and not nearly enough body work of late. “Oh, yeah!” She glances over to Jimmy. “You’re short fighters right now, right?”

Jimmy nods. “Me, Collin, and Tony. You want in?”

A slow, dangerous smile spreads across Abbi’s face, and a similar one lights Gibbs’. “Yeah.”

On Saturday night, Gibbs is sitting on the sofa, reading away, half-aware of Abbi puttering around the house, talking to someone on her cell.

She’s quiet for a bit, and then is standing next to him. He looks up from his book.

“You busy?”

“Nope.”

“Good.” She flops down next to him, holding up her phone so both of them are in the tiny window in the corner, and staring straight at him are two curious looking people who aren’t nearly as much older than he is as he would have liked.

“Hi,” he says, smiling, trying to look somewhat less like what he is, namely a much closer to sixty than fifty-year-old guy who’s got to wear glasses to read a book, and more like good husband material for their daughter.

“You must be Jethro,” her mom, Becky, says.

He nods. “Becky and Jeff, right?”

“Yes,” Jeff replies, a bit stiff, and for a second Jethro’s wondering if going straight for first names was a good plan. But really, he just can’t imagine calling them Mr. and Mrs. Borin. They’re at most, ten years older than he is, and likely closer to five.

He puts his arm around Abbi, trying to look less like a deer caught in the headlights, while frantically trying to think of what to say. Weather, weather always works. “Abbi was saying you guys are already snowed in.”

Jeff laughs at that. “No such thing as snowed in, not when you’ve got dog teams.”

Jethro nods at that.

Mona, hearing the word ‘dog’ appears to consider that a request and hops up on the sofa with them. That gets several minutes of easy conversation about what a pretty and good dog Mona is, which wraps up with, “Even without them, we don’t get too badly snowed in, ever.” Becky says, “They know how to handle snow out here, and we’ve got a plow blade for the truck. Gotta keep the drive open for the customers. Abbi’s told you this is our busy season?”

“Yes, she has. Mentioned you’ve got skiers, and dog sleds, and snow mobiles.”

“Five of the six cabins are already filled. Looks like this is going to be a busy winter.”
Abbi smiles. “That’s great, Dad.” Busy winter means enough money to live the rest of the year on, whether the price of beef is good or not.

“So, what do you do, Jethro? Abbi says you used to be an NCIS agent?” Becky asks.

“Used to. I’m mostly retired now. Back up for her or the kids if they need it.”

“And when you’re not back up?” Jeff asks.

“Construction. We’re building a house, so I do a lot with that. Been painting all last week. Sailing. I’m an active Granddad, so playing with babies.” He shrugs. “A lot of family stuff.”

They both nod at that. “How many grandchildren do you have?”

“Three on the outside, four’s due out end of January. Five’s due end of April.”

“Two in one year, that’s going to be a busy year!” Becky says, knowingly.

Gibbs jumps on that, grandparent to grandparent. “Oh yeah. And all five of them under the age of four. Abbi tells me your grandkids aren’t quite so on top of each other.”

Becky nods. “Have you met Miranda, yet?’

Gibbs shakes his head. He’s seen pictures of Abbi’s sister, brother-in-law, and niece and nephew, but hasn’t met them, yet.

“She and Drew haven’t gotten east lately,” Abbi tells her mom.

Gibbs feels like this is immensely surreal. He’s sitting on his sofa, meeting Abbi’s parents over the phone. Never in his wildest dreams could he have imagined this scenario last year.

“You mentioned helping out the kids, are they all cops, too?” Jeff asks.

“Not exactly. We, all met through NCIS, but only Tony’s a field agent any longer. The rest have moved on.”

“So, Tony’s the only one you’d be helping?” Becky asks.

Gibbs wiggles his hand. “Sort of. Tim’s on computers, and I’m not setting any records for working on that, but I’ve found some good stuff now and again. Abby’s in the lab, and that’s not my thing. Jimmy’s in the morgue, and again, not my speciality. Ziva’s—“

“Working with Abbi, we’ve been hearing about her,” Becky seems to approve of whatever she’s been hearing.

“She’s easing out of in the field work into stay-at-home motherhood. Though I’ll keep her in my office until she’s ready to go,” Abbi says.

“Investigators as good as Ziva are few and far between. Even behind a desk, she’s gold,” Gibbs says, sounding proud.

“So we hear,” Jeff says.

There’s a moment of quiet, and then Becky nudges Jeff. “I know you have a hectic schedule, and Abbi’s told us about the Christmas plans you’ve got this year, but, would you like to spend New Year’s with us?”
Gibbs knows that Jeff is making sure to invite him into his home, and he appreciates that, greatly.

“Yes. Unless our newest grandson decides to show up that week, I’d be happy to join you.”

Becky and Jeff don’t miss the ‘our’ Gibbs used to describe Sean. He and Abbi see them catch it, but he’s not entirely sure what that look on Jeff and Becky’s faces means. After a quick breath, Jeff says, “Okay. The 28th to the 2nd?”

“I’m free,” Gibbs says with a shrug, and glances to Abbi.

“As long as I don’t get shanghaied into another one of those ‘Commissions’ they’ve got going all January, I’m free. Hell, even if I do, I can skip a day or two. The first few days of those things are mostly meet and greets, anyway.”

Becky smiles. “Excellent. It’s been too long since you got home.”

“I know, Mom.”

Collin’s all but quivering with relief at getting out of the Slaters’ supper.

And Tim and Jimmy know why.

“Ed’s leaning on you pretty hard,” Jimmy says as Tim’s wrapping his hands.

“Yeah, Christmas is coming, and he wants a ring for Amy in the stocking,” Collin replies.

“So does Amy,” Gibbs adds. Tim and Jimmy know Gibbs well enough to know his tone means so get your ass up and buy a damn ring or break up with her and let her go, but Collin doesn’t seem to get all the nuances of those three words.

“Yeah, I know. She’s not being subtle about it, either.”

Now all three of the other guys are staring at him with an expression best described as, Well…

“Why should it matter? What we’ve got is great. I mean… I could use less in-laws hassles, but… I love her. We get on fine…”

“Then why does it matter?” Jimmy asks, stepping into his pseudo-big brother role for Amy. “She did her put up or shut up moment for you. Told Ed about what was going on, risked a lot with that. And we backed you and her. So, you love her and what you’ve got with her, so why does it matter?”

“Things’ll change.”

“That’ll happen no matter what,” Tony adds as he and Ziva walk up to them. “Abbi still in the locker room?”

Gibbs nods. It takes them less time to get out of church clothing than it does Abbi. Probably because they don’t wear makeup that needs to come off before a hard workout.

Ziva gives everyone a quick kiss. “I’ll say hello to her, and then you two,” she gestures to Tim and Gibbs, “are joining me.”
Tim and Gibbs share a moment of oh God what is she going to do to us and then refocus on Collin because Tony’s still talking to him.

“Look, there’s nothing going on right now with her that’s going to last forever. You’ll both change. Your lives will change, and that’s going to happen if you get married or if you don’t. So, you decide to ride it out together, or you head off. It’s been what, two years now?”

Collin nods.

“Yeah. You know her and her family and yourself well enough by this point to know if you want to be in for the long haul. And if you don’t, you don’t. That’s fine. You’re allowed to decide this doesn’t work or you can do better. But if it’s not working, then sticking around is a real dick move.”

Tim finishes up taping Jimmy’s hand as Tony’s saying that, and gestures for Collin’s hand. Collin gives it over, thinking, and Tony nods at him, hopping off the edge of the ring. “Gonna get warmed up. You and Palmer up first?”

Collin and Jimmy nod.

Tim finishes with Collin’s hands, and glances around, Abbi and Gibbs are chatting with each other, ready to watch this. Ziva’s not out, yet, so he stays leaning against the ropes, as Jimmy and Collin duck under to start their bout.

Jimmy nods to Tony, who turns on the music and gets a loud, heavy beat throbbing through the gym. The four Marines who are on the weights seem to approve, and one of them drifts over to see Jimmy and Collin go at it, too.

For a moment or two, both of them are just getting a feel for doing this again. Neither attacks. They bounce around a little, warm up, some, watch each other, and then it’s go time.

One swing. It’s not even a hit because Collin doesn’t even manage to land it on Jimmy before he’s flat on his back with Tim kneeling on his chest, hand clenched on his throat.

Jimmy’s yanking him off, fast and hard. “Woah, Tim! It’s okay. *I’m okay.”

And Tim more or less bounds up as soon as he realizes what he’s done, but… he did it. He doesn’t even have a clear memory of it. He was standing next to the ropes, watching, and then he was kneeling on Collin, bouncing back up as fast as he could. He knows what has to go between those points, but he doesn’t remember it.

Collin’s lying there, looking stunned, but he takes a hand up from Tim. “Damn, you’re fast when you want to be.”

Tim gives him a half smile, and says… “Uh… Sorry…” Tim shakes his head and swallows. “Probably came back too soon.” Which is a lie. He’s not back too soon. Back too soon indicates this is a side effect of the trauma he’s been through recently. It’s not, because that’s the exact same reaction he would have had ten months ago if someone had taken a swing at Abby. It doesn’t matter that it’s exercise, no one hits one of his loves in front of him.

Jimmy’s watching him, carefully, and Tim knows there’s a conversation coming up.

Ziva gently takes his hand. “Come with me. You need more strength training before you’re ready to get back to this.”

He nods. “Yeah.”
Collin shakes his head. “You just knocked me off my feet. Lack of strength isn’t the problem.”

Tim looks embarrassed. “Only because I bull rushed you, and you weren’t expecting it. I’d do more damage to myself than to you if I’d tried a punch. Okay, Ziva, what are we doing?”

What they’re doing is, first of all, finding out how far behind they are. Ziva remembers what they could do before getting hurt, and she’s seeing how close to that they are.

Compared to where he was in June, Tim’s moving forward in leaps and bounds. Compared to May, he’s a million miles behind. Finding out he can’t do a pull up anymore is somewhat disheartening, and the less said about weights, squats, and bench presses, the better.

And Gibbs… Apparently Gibbs has a place beyond silent angry. Tim didn’t know it was there, because he’s never seen beyond silent angry. But, as Ziva puts them through their paces, seeing where they are, Gibbs goes from silently glaring at the weights to outright cursing at them.

Really cursing. And not just in English.

Ziva’s impressed. Unlike Tim she can follow most of them. (The only language Gibbs speaks that she doesn’t is Japanese.) She even blushes a tad at one point. Which makes Gibbs growl a little and shut up.

She gives them a little pep talk at the end, talking about how they’re both better with flexibility and balance than they were when they started this, and because of that they’ll get it back faster this time.

Which is better than starting at square one, but it’s not exactly anything either of them want to hear.

Toward the end of the afternoon, after Gibbs and Tim and Ziva have wrapped up their exercises, they stop to watch the one on one on one on one brawl going on in the ring.

Abbi’s holding her own, and well. She’s smaller than the guys, but a bit quicker, and unlike the other three, she’s a trained Marine.

She’s also, from the looks of it, set up a loose alliance with Jimmy, working with him to make sure each other’s backs are covered while keeping Tony and Collin off balance.

And even with that, she does take several hits, some of them hard, just like everyone else in the ring.

Tim glances to his left and right. Ziva and Gibbs aren’t leaping in there to ‘rescue’ their loves.

“How are you watching this?” he asks quietly, because he has to keep himself from flinching when Jimmy takes a hit.

Ziva shrugs. She’s been doing this, seeing Tony fight, since long before they were a couple. She knows he can take care of himself. She thinks about it a little more. “It’d almost be an insult to hop in there for something like this. He’s got it. He doesn’t need my help.”

“It’s not real,” Gibbs says, voice soft. “If it was…” Gibbs doesn’t need to add that if this was a real fight, he’d be in there and working on killing anyone near Abbi.
Tim nods and sighs, licking his lips. “It’s not real.” He watches, sees the way Jimmy’s moving, the speed and strength, the way he slips out of the hold Collin’s got him in, and how, in slipping out, he sets Collin up to get tripped by Abbi, which takes him out of the match.

Tim swallows again, still watching. He can take care of himself.

“What was that?” Jimmy asks when he and Tim are alone in Tim’s car, heading home for the night. He doesn’t need to specify what that he’s asking about.

Tim rolls his eyes, turning on the ignition. “Stupid over-protective crap.” He sighs. “No one hits my man.”

Jimmy chuckles a bit. “Is this something that we need to work on?”

Tim shrugs. “We? When you decide to deck Tony or Gibbs because they take a swing at me in the ring, then we can work on it. Until then, it’s something I’m going to work on. If Gibbs can watch Abbi spar, and Tony and Ziva can handle it, I can learn to, too.”

“Uh huh. You sure?”

“Unless you want to stop?”

Jimmy shrugs a bit.

Tim isn’t expecting that. “Do you want to stop?”

Jimmy shoots him the half-confused, half-feeling defensive look. “I…”

Tim waits, watching him as well as he can while still driving.

“Before everything went bonkers, you remember, we were talking, all four of us, and Breena was pointing out how there was a time when I didn’t need this. Once upon a time, I wouldn’t have found this fun. Once upon a time, I never got this sort of angry, so…”

“So… Do you need this, or is this fun?”

“I don’t know. If we’re not killing the Admiral,” Jimmy flashes him a any change of mind on that? look, and Tim shakes his head. He’s had more than enough death in the last two months; he’s not signing them up for more of it. “I don’t know. Right now, I don’t feel like I have to do it. Today was just a good work out with a bit of an edge. But, sometimes I can feel the dark squirmy thoughts in the back of my head, and I need this, so… I don’t know. Keep talking to Rachel, see if that helps keep the dark and squirmy thoughts at bay. Maybe that’s enough of this. Not like getting pounded on regularly is necessarily a good plan for me.”

“Better than being angry and not having a way to get it out.”

Jimmy nods. “Yep. But if you don’t want to see this… Got to be other ways to do it. I used to run. Tony likes basketball.”

“I think I can learn to deal. From what Ziva’s saying we’re still probably at least three months out before I’m back in the ring. That should be more than enough time to get used to the idea that you’re really okay out there.”
Jimmy nods a bit. “I was, you know?”

“Yeah, the part of the brain that thinks knows that just fine. My balls and guts were a bit fuzzy on that concept.”

Jimmy gently strokes the back of his hand. He can imagine what he might do if someone took a swing at Breana or Abby. “Yeah. I’ll admit, though, it was pretty impressive. One second I’m warming up. Collin tenses, shifts weight, starts to move forward, and then you’d flattened him to the mat. Boom! Down he went.”

Tim sighs. “Yeah, thanks. That’s how I almost shot Mona, too.”

Jimmy chuckles at that.
Bright and early on Monday morning, Tony and Ziva have their 20 week ultrasound. Technically it’s 18 weeks, but that’s close enough.

Part of going in a little early is that the hospital their OB had been based out of is now half ash, and half torn down wreckage. So, they called Breena’s OB, and are now patients there. It’s a bit out of the way, but not too bad.

So, just like when they went in the first time, they’ve got all the paperwork to fill out, and all of the getting to know a new patient checking up. They talk about any concerns they may have. (Not too many, though Tony’s a little worried about what he’s been reading about links between autism and older fathers, but as Dr. Jun points out, that’s nothing they can test for, and even if they could, given how wide the Autistic Spectrum Disorder is, she wouldn’t recommend it.)

Then there’s waiting for the ultrasound and blood work.

They’re in a little room, covered in pictures of newborns. Tony’s eyeing them, sure that none of them will be anywhere near as pretty as David DiNozzo. Ziva’s eyeing them, too, with somewhat similar thoughts lurking in the back of her head, though her surface thoughts are different.

“How do you think Molly and Anna are on this wall?”

“Oh, God…” Tony looks at hundreds of small, pink heads, squinty-eyes, and wet, shiny lips. All of these little guys are brand new and swaddled from head to toes. He can exclude a bunch of them, because they aren’t Caucasian, but other than that… “Almost all of them are wearing caps. The only way I’d be able to even guess if one of Palmer’s kids were on this wall would be by the curly hair.”

Ziva’s staring at them all, too, and is also a bit amazed to see exactly how much one newborn looks like every other newborn.

They’re still looking, and Ziva’s thinking that maybe, one of those faces could be Anna, but she’s not entirely sure, when the ultrasound tech comes in.

“Checking out our wall of fame?” They both nod, as the Tech pats the table for Ziva. “Up you get.”

She smiles at the wall. “That’s just 2015. Every New Year we take down the old pictures and put up the newish ones. First day of 2018, you’re little one will be up there.”

That flushes through Tony. This is real. This little person will eventually make his way out of his wife and join the real world. He whistles low at that, and the Tech shoots him an amused glance. He’s not, by a long stretch, the first Dad to have that response.

“I understand you’re not finding out the sex of the baby?”

Ziva flashes Tony an amused look. “I am not finding out. We’ll see how he does.”

“She doesn’t think I can do it.”

“Okay. I’ll keep it to myself.” She arranges Ziva’s gown, and then says, “This’ll be cold,” before squirting the gel on her belly.

Ziva tenses for a second, but it’s not that cold. And a few seconds after that, she’s feeling the smooth, round head of the ultrasound wand rubbing over her belly.
“Okay…” They’re doing the 2-d version of the ultrasound right now. “Let’s see, bone structures look good. That’s a spine, and you can see ribs and arms…” The tech keeps talking them through it, but they know what they’re looking at, a baby.

Nothing about David looks like the grainy black and white salad shrimp he was the last time they did this.

“And those are fingers… Heart looks good, you can see the blood pumping through it, nice action on that… All right, let’s flip to the 3-D view…”

It sucks the air out of Tony’s lungs. He’s standing there, holding Ziva’s hand, looking at his… son… He’s sure it’s a boy. He can see eyes and nose and ears and little fingers and toes and… hmmm…. He’s not supposed to be checking that out… and look little legs and…

“God…” Tony’s not sure if that’s an exclamation or a prayer, but whatever it is, it’s intensely felt.

Ziva squeezes his hand back, blinking away the tears.

They’re in a ridiculously good mood as they head out of the Doc’s office with a clean bill of health, and a dozen ultrasound shots on their phones.

“Now what?” Tony asks.

“I was planning on heading back into work.”

“More investigators to go through?”

“I’ve got almost all of Abbi’s done. Diane has more for me.”

Tony thinks about that, holding her hand as he gets the car door for her. “How is Abbi hiring right now?”

Ziva shrugs. It has not occurred to her to ask how Abbi’s got the budget for it. Maybe because she just fired ¾ of her employees.

He shuts the door, heading around to the driver’s side. “I’m wondering if I need to be hiring, too. You’re gone. Bishop’s probably gone. Not sure how long just Draga and I’ll work.”

“Good question. Are you going to go in?” They’d talked about him heading back into the office today.

“Yeah. I think I will. Drag the desks back into place and put the dividers up, if nothing else.”

She smiles at him. “You just want a place to tack all of those pictures.”

He leans over and kisses her. “You know it!”

Tony does head into NCIS. And he successfully grabs a few Marines to help him get his work station back in place. It’s always easier to move furniture if you’ve got three eighteen-year-old hard-bodies around to do the heavy lifting.

(He makes a quick mental note to see if they can locate some eighteen-year-old hard-bodies for the house, because sooner or later they’re going to want to move some furniture into it, and given how much all of them were hurting after moving Abbi in, he’s thinking doing that on their own is a stupid idea.)

Tony takes an hour, gets the desks, two of them, set up, along with the big screen and their filing cabinets. It feels really odd to have gone from five guys less than two years ago, to just him and Draga now, but… That’s what it is.

He snaps pictures of their new set up, pretty much the area that had been his and McGee’s for so long, and sends it off to Draga with 12/12/16.

He gets Ready when you are. back from Draga minute later.

Tony sits back at his desk. Same old desk, same old chair, very different room and dividers. It’s… a very odd feeling. His heart knows it’s old, but his brain thinks it’s new, and he can’t figure out who’s right.

Or something like that.

He turns his chair to gaze at the pictures of his child on his wall. He stares lovingly at that tiny face, and imagine those bitty little fingers clasped around his, and looks at the full body shot… and then yanks his eyes back to Little Guy’s face.

The Tech said he’s, from butt to head, about the size of a green pepper, and weighs about that much, too. He’d fit right into Tony’s palm, now, but by the time he’s ready to come out, he’ll be six to eight pounds and twenty inches long.

Tony shakes his head at that. Five months and he’ll… she’ll… he’ll be out.

His eyes wander back to the full body shot. Why does he have this if he’s trying to not figure out if Dave really is Dave? God, it’s like a test, or a tease. Ziva took some pictures for herself and handed these over to him, and he’s sure she’s just counting the hours, giggling, about how long he can go without looking.

He almost takes the shot down. But he can’t do that. That’s his baby on the divider. He can’t take it down.

And… shit, he can’t not look. So, he does, and a wide, happy grin spreads across his face, because not only does that look like a penis, but… Holy shit, that kid is hung.

“Mothers hide your daughters, Dave DiNozzo’s in town,” he says under his breath with a grin. He keeps looking and starts to get a little nervous, because there’s taking after the old man in the well-endowed department, and then there’s… that actually looks like it’s tucked under Dave’s thigh, and that’s…

That’s too long.

Now he’s not sure if he’s looking at a too damn long penis or an umbilical cord. Little Person’s hand is in the wrong place to see where the structure in question starts.

“Shit.” He talks himself into just letting it go and no knowing for an entire five minutes. He gets up from his desk, packs up his gear, and decides it’s time to head back to the house, get at least a few hours in on painting today.

He’s fully intending to do all of that, and yet, once he’s in his car, he’s driving to The Morgue, where Jimmy, and his MD, are.

Cleanup has gotten far enough along that, as of this point, it’s been two days since a new body’s been brought in to The Morgue. They’re still going through the backlog, but this job will be done soon.

They’ve lost half of the staff. Different helpers and MEs going back to their other work. Breena went back to Slater’s today, for example. Jimmy and Allan will, if they haven’t gotten everyone done before the election, head back to NCIS when they reopen on the 12\textsuperscript{th}.

Two of the four tents they were working out of are packed up now. More than half of the refrigerated containers have been emptied out, their cargo sent home to different loved ones for burial.

What had seemed like an unending job will, eventually, end.

They’ve been told that after the election the DC ME’s office will officially reopen, and whomever is left will be transferred back to them.

But the election is still a week and a day away. And until then, Jimmy, and Allan, and seven other MEs are still at The Morgue, still cracking black jokes, and still doing what they can for their charges.

Tony’s able to get in fairly easily. Between his badge and ID, none of the Marines keeping watch are interested in stopping him.

He’s not sure he wants to go in, though. The Morgue still reeks of death, and he’s fairly certain this bit of Rock Creek Park will smell of it forever.

But, smell be damned, he’s got a baby to identify. And Jimmy’s told all of them that right now, he can use all the happy news he can get. So, in he goes.

There are more tables than Tony was expecting, but not as many as he feared. And right now, Jimmy and Allan are working together at one of the ones furthest from him. For a moment he has a hard time identifying them, because everyone in here is in scrubs and protective gear, but he catches the tail end of the dirtiest joke he’s ever imagined hearing, and the laughs following it.

He knows that laugh, and that helps him see the guy under the visor, who’s drilling something blackened and charred that likely was a person once upon a time.

He heads over, and Jimmy looks up, confused to see him here. “Tony?”

“You got a few minutes?”
Jimmy eyes the body on his table. They’ve gotten all the samples they can from her. (They know she’s a her from the hips.) The next step is to try and do a facial reconstruction, which isn’t part of what he or Allan does. “Yeah, we can take a break once we get Ms. Doe packed up.”

“Great. Can I get you a coffee or something?”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah. Head east. Middle tent. You’re buying. We’ll be there in a few minutes.”

Allan smiles at that. The canteen and all the food and drinks at it are free to anyone in there. They aren’t getting paid for this, so the least DC can do for them is provide free food.

Tony catches the ‘we’ll’ and asks Allan, “What do you want?”

“It doesn’t matter. Everything here tastes the same.” Tony looks a little alarmed at that, so Allan decides to make an actual order. “Coffee, black, three sugars.”

Tony nods, and then says, “Tastes the same?”

“You smell it, you taste it,” Jimmy replies.

Tony’s not looking forward to grabbing a coffee so much, as he heads off to the canteen.

“So, what’s got you here in the middle of the day?” Jimmy asks as he sits at one of the tables, across from Tony.

Tony slides the picture to Jimmy as Allan takes a sip of his coffee. “Is that” and he points to the protuberance in question, “what I think it is?”

Jimmy looks at the ultrasound and chuckles. Then he says, “I thought you and Ziva weren’t going to find out.”

Tony rolls his eyes. “She was right. I can’t not find out. Not when I’ve got the picture right here.”

Jimmy smiles again. “What do you think it is?”

Tony glares at him.

Allan’s looking pretty amused by this, too.

Jimmy nods and says, “Okay, no that’s not what you hope it is. That’s not the pride of the DiNozzos. That’s an umbilical cord.” Jimmy points slightly lower and a bit to the left. “That, on the other hand, looks like a testicle to me, so I’m going to say that’s a boy.”

Tony takes a quick, shuddering breath. “That’s my son!”

“Before you go out and get every piece of sports equipment on the planet, just remember, six week rotation on OB ten years ago. I’m not an expert on this, and there’s a decent possibility that’s just her thigh or something. But, yes, I think that looks like a boy.”

Allan gestures for the picture. “May I?”

Jimmy hands the photo over. “Certainly.”
“For more than a year, I donated at least a shift a week to Planned Parenthood. I’ve seen tons of these.” He’s looking at the shot. “Not a great angle, but that looks like a testicle to me, too. Congratulations, Tony!”

Jimmy grins at the waves of joy sloshing over and off of Tony right now. “So, how are you planning on covering why you’re strutting around all over the place, have no interest in girls’ names, and are suddenly ordering Ohio State Future Buckeye onesies?”

Tony laughs. “I’ve already ordered the onesies. My daughter can be an All-Star-Center Buckeye, too.”

It becomes abundantly clear, about an hour into Monday’s work, that Tim and Gibbs’ lungs cannot take the dual assault of paint fumes and carpet glue.

Okay, actually, it becomes abundantly clear to Tim, who is working on coat of paint number two in Tony and Ziva’s room, (warm cream walls, darker beige accents, and Ziva tells him there will be jeweled toned pillows as well as some soft cherry blossom pink bits, too. He thinks it’ll look cool. Right now it just looks very sophisticated and male.) that his lungs are not loving this, but he’s doing okay. Then it becomes clearer, as he notices the soft wheezing coming from Gibbs, along with the look of grim determination as he’s painting away, that the four fifths of his lungs that he has left are not cool with this situation.

So, Tim starts to cough. Not a lot. Enough. Gibbs jumps on it, and suggests they get out of there, which is fine with Tim, who experiences a miraculous recovery as soon as they’re out of the house.

They’re standing around outside, where it’s cold, but easier to breathe, watching the carpet guys going in with long rolls of gray, brown, sand, one patterned one of forest green and gold (Ducky and Penny’s office), cream, dove, and a multi-colored mix for one of the kid rooms that Breena called “Confetti” and Jimmy and Tim are referring to “Clown Vomit.”

“How long does it take for that stuff to outgas?” Tim asks one of the carpet guys.

He shrugs. “Can’t smell it anymore myself. Maybe a few days?”

Tim sighs at that. “Thanks.” The guy picks up another roll of carpet and heads into the house. Tim looks to Gibbs. “Well, we’re not going back in there today. So, show me your other ‘project.’”

Gibbs shrugs a bit, and turns away from the house to tromp on back to the boat house.

The light in there isn’t great, which is why he doesn’t love working in there. He’s thinking that when they get the main house done, he’s setting up a shop for himself, and with any luck, there’ll be some younger people who want to give him a hand with this sort of thing over the years.

Plus, he’s got little fantasies in mind of different sorts of furniture he wants to make for the place, and it’ll be easier to do if he’s got a shop on site.

But right now, he’s got a table with a tiny lathe set up on it, a collection of chisels, a few small saws, some padded clamps, a collection of glues and sandpapers, another work bench, and three work lights shining down on it, all of which are cramped into the far end of the boat house.
Tim follows him, and picks up one of the wood blanks. He doesn’t know what sort of wood it is, but even as a 1.5 by 1.5 by 6 inch rectangle he can see that it’s reddish and will have an amazing grain once it’s all buffed up.

“Are you making wood wedding rings?” For a second Tim’s amazed by that idea, but the more he thinks about it, the more he likes it.

Gibbs opens up the drawer in the table and pulls out the sketches.

Tim holds the wood in his hands. “What is it?”

“Rosewood burl.”

That doesn’t mean much to Tim, but he does have a mental image of dark whorls of reddish brown and lighter whorls of scarlet.

It’s mesmerizing to watch. The wood spins, fast, and tendrils of it fly off, curling into spirals as Gibbs gently touches the chisel to wood. Tim’s not doing anything, but he’s still finding this immensely satisfying.

“You ever let me play with this?”

Gibbs shuts off the lathe and looks over to Tim, pleased and a little surprised. “You’d want to?” he asks, pulling his ear protection off.

Tim shrugs a little. “Looks cool. Might be a lot like pottery. Looks amazing and easy, and then you try to do it and it’s a mess.”

Gibbs eyes the part of the ring he’s been working on, and nods at Tim. “This is try number eight. Hold it a second, half a second too long, and the ring doesn’t fit anymore, or it’s too thin to hold the inlay. Press just a little too hard and you’ve got a gouge in it you don’t want… But, you want to play, sure.”

“I’ll keep watching. So how do you get the mother of pearl in it?”

Gibbs eyes the ring, grabs his calipers, and gives it a quick measure. Then he flips it around, reattaches it to the chuck, and gets ready to smooth out the other side.

“Two possible ways. I’m hoping to try way number one, first, but I’m not sure if it’ll look right.”

“What’s number one?”

“Get this roughed out, cut it in half, then take the mother of pearl, cut it into a circle, sandwich all three together, and finish it up.”

Tim nods along with that. “Okay. Why don’t you think it might work?”

“Not sure how the cut edge of the mother of pearl will look. If it doesn’t buff up nice, then I need to start over, make a new ring, cut a groove into it, crush up the mother of pearl, and drop it in.”

“Won’t that be all rough and jaggy.”

“And finish it smooth.”
Tim picks up Abby’s ring, which for the time being, lives in here, where it’ll can help with inspiration. The mother of pearl inlay on the sides is curved. "You think it bends, or is this cut?"

“If it bends, I don’t know how to make it do that. I think it’s cut. That’s an option, too, I guess. Cut little squares, lay them in the groove, and run them on the lathe, keep grinding them down."

“Start off a hell of a lot bigger than you need and work it down?”

“And hope I don’t burn the mother or pearl or wreck the wood. It’s not very hard, but it’s harder than rosewood.”

Tim can understand that. Gibbs waits a few seconds to see if Tim’s got anything else to say, but he doesn’t, so Gibbs goes back to working on the ring. And Tim’s content to sit there and watch.

Tony joins them a bit after lunch.

“Why are you hiding out here?” he asks. He’d driven up, seen the cars, seen the carpet truck, and gone through the whole house looking for them before deciding to try out here.

“Lungs don’t like the fumes,” Tim says.

“And they like sawdust better?” Tony asks, sitting on the workbench next to Tim, remembering him just about dying in that one place with all the sawdust.

“It’s better.” And it is. Gibbs could turn the entire blank into a pile of sawdust, and that still wouldn’t be enough to really set Tim’s lungs off.

Tony glances at the ring turning on the lathe, and it’s possible that if he had something less interesting tucked into his pocket he might to know more about what Gibbs is doing, but he’s got Dave’s ultrasound in his pocket, so he’s not terribly interested in spinning wood.

He whips the picture out. “LOOK! David DiNozzo, in the flesh.”

“Oh, God, Tony! How are we supposed to not let on to Ziva what he is if you’re telling us he’s a boy?” Tim asks, while taking the picture and looking as his nephew with a smile.

Tony opens and closes his mouth. That’s a good point.

The lathe comes to a stop and Gibbs steps over, huge grin on his face as he takes the shot from Tim.

“You sure?” Tim asks as he’s looking at the shot with Gibbs. “I mean, I’m pretty sure that’s an umbilical cord.”

Tony rolls his eyes. “Yeah, I’m sure. More importantly Palmer and Allan are sure, too.” Tony points to a different spot on the picture. “They tell me that’s a testicle.”

That gets a laugh out of Gibbs and Tim, and Tim would have to admit that he does recall a similar shot, with a similar structure on it, for Sean, so… “Hello, Dave.” He grins at Tony.

Tony grins back. “So, what was that crack of yours about turning out some grandsons?” he shoots to Gibbs.

Gibbs is grinning too, staring at the shot. “Gonna be a few days before we can work in the house.
You want to get that room painted blue?”

“That okay with Abbi?” Tim asks.

Gibbs stops for a second. They aren’t using that room for anything right now, but he really should run it by her. “I’ll ask.”

“Good.” Tony’s smiling all over, looking at the shot. “God. Little boy. My son!”

Tim shakes his head gently, still smiling. “You’re over the moon.”

“Yeah. I mean… look, little girl, would have loved her, too, but…” his eyes are all lit up with ideas and fantasies of life with Dave, all the dad-son things he never got, Dave’s getting all of them and then some. “My BOY.”

Gibbs and Tim chuckle at that.

“Doesn’t feel real. Feels so good and… I’m afraid I’m going to wake up and…”

Tim gives him a quick pinch.

“Ow!”

“Looks like you’re awake.” Tim grins at him, too. He’s got much less in the way of boy-specific parenting fantasies, but he’ll admit, here, that he is rather tickled by the idea of his little guy, too.
“Sean and Dave… Can you see that?”

All three of them are smiling at that image. “Oh yeah!” Tony says. “Thirteen, fourteen years from now, football games, first dates…”

“Abby’s talking about wanting to work on building cars with them.” Granted Tim means all the kids, but he can see that being a ‘guy’ thing for Tony.

“Kelly and I did that.” Gibbs adds.

Tim hadn’t known that, but he does know this, “We were planning on you being part of the building committee.”

“Get Duck in on that, too. That Morgan was scrap when he got it.”

“You going to be a scout leader again, by then?” Tony asks. “Both of ‘em in the little uniform, while you’re teaching them how to track dead bodies by the buzzards?”

Tim smiles at that memory. “Maybe.” He nudges Gibbs. “Might be I’ll be too swamped for that, but maybe this guy’ll step up and lead some scouts.”

Gibbs is warming up to that, while Tony’s spinning more “guy” fantasies, like all of them out camping together, when Tim starts to feel a little off. He’s not sure why, unlike Tony he actually likes camping, and this is in no way related to anything that should make him feel sad. But, it does.

He tries to make sad go away while Tony’s talking about the idea cheering on their boys as they’re playing football when it finally hits: Jon. There’s supposed to be a third, older, boy in this group, and he’s not here.

He’s not sure how to enjoy the idea of Dad/Son stuff without making it all the more real that Jimmy’s not getting to do it.
Tony’s still happily talking away about Dad/Son stuff, like the talk and passing on the combined wisdom of the generations of DiNozzos, when Gibbs notices that Tim’s not entirely there.

He’s got a concerned expression on his face as he says, “You okay?”

Tim nods. “Yeah, I am. Just… For the three of this, this is fine, but… might want to lay off the joys of Daddy/Son bonding with Jimmy around.”

That drops everyone’s mood, which Tim hadn’t wanted to do, but… “Don’t get me wrong, he’ll be happy for you, but…”

Tony’s nodding. “Yeah. I get it. Until the future Donny Palmer is safe and sound on the outside, keep it to stuff we want to do with our kids.”

Tim nods back at him. “Yeah.”

Tony thinks for a moment. “Didn’t you tell me they were thinking of starting trying again when Anna hit a year old?”

Tim had mentioned something, sort of, along those lines. Though they is not precisely the correct pronoun. Still, he’s good with saying, “That’s the plan.” Then Tim grins, because he’s lost a bit of time over the last few months, but he’s coming to the conclusion that Anna’s birthday is the day after tomorrow.

Tony flashes them a wide grin. “Could be three of them in one year. That’d be amazing.”

Tim has to chuckle at the idea of three little guys, all within a year of each other.

And Gibbs just grins at it, wide and happy.
“So, I was thinking…” Tim says, voice low, conspiratorially, as Breena’s starting up the stairs for tubby time. She knows there’s something the other three are working on without her, because Tim wasn’t precisely subtle when he grabbed Jimmy and Abby as she headed up the stairs and said, “Be up in a minute.”

Jimmy and Abby are looking at him, waiting for him to finish that sentence.

“Does Breena’s marriage present have to be metal?”

They’d heard him talking about what Jethro was doing with the lathe during dinner, so they kind of know where he’s going with this.

“You want to make it?” Jimmy asks.

“I’ve got some time, and if it’s a disaster, then we can get a metal one, but… I mean… It didn’t look that hard, and I bet she’d think something we designed and made for her would be really cool.”

Jimmy nods; Breena would like that.

“How would it go together?” Abby asks. “Like, I get the basic idea, say glue your wood together and shape it into a circle, but, I mean, can you get the different woods to support each other, or would this just be a circle with three parts?”

Tim thinks about that. “Not sure. But the house won’t be done outgassing tomorrow, so we won’t be working in there. I can show the sketch to Jethro and see what he thinks. See if it’s doable.”

That seems like a plan.

“Work on some sort of mock up, with scrap woods, see if you can make it happen,” Abby says.

“Yeah, and then, if it works, we can each pick a wood, all different whorls and grains, and then make the ring.”

Jimmy hears that and says, “Should it just be a ring? I mean, part of the issue with this the whole way through’s been how to get it onto her necklace.” Because they have thought of that, and haven’t come up with a way to get it onto the necklace without marring the circle. (Not quite true, they could just put the ring on the necklace, but it’d just be dangling there, over Jon’s diamond, which wasn’t exactly how any of them were envisioning it. Unfortunately, the only way they can think of to get it onto the necklace, around Jon’s stone, is to put holes in the ring for the chain to go through, which, having noticed how big the clasp on the chain is, none of them is particularly thrilled with.)

“It’d be easier if it was a ring,” Tim says. He likes the symbolism of the unbroken circle made of three elements. “What size is her right ring finger?”

“I can find that out,” Abby says. “You want to try and get a mock up made for us, and I’ll do some recon on getting her size.”

“And with any luck we’ll have something special to give her for Christmas,” Jimmy adds, beginning to head up the stairs. It’s time for all three of them to catch up to Breena on the bedtime for little girls’ routine.
“Conspiring?” Breena asks as they get up there.

“Yep,” Jimmy replies, taking Anna from her mother, and working the zipper on her winter-themed snuggly open.

“Do I get to know what about?” Breena asks as she turns on the water and starts running the bath.

“Eventually,” Tim replies a moment later. He and Abby didn’t get up the stairs as quickly. She’s not moving all that fast these days, and he’s happy to move slow, keep a hand on her back, and make sure she’s steady on the stairs.

Tim decides to shift the topic a little. “So, while we were working, Tony reminded me that little girl’s,” he kisses the back of Anna’s head, “first birthday is the day after tomorrow.”

“Party!” Molly adds. She’s not following a whole lot of this conversation, but she knows birthdays mean parties, and she’s well aware of what you need to do at a party. Namely, eat cake!

“On Friday. When we all get together for dinner,” Breena tells her oldest daughter. Fortunately, that’s just fine with Molly, who doesn’t know when Friday is. It certainly could be the day after tomorrow, however, in that she’s not quite three, any day besides today and tomorrow are really sketchy concepts for Molly. In her world, things happen today, or they happen tomorrow, and that covers all the possible bases for her.

“Cake!”

“There will be cake,” Jimmy says to Molly, and Kelly rapidly catches up to this concept, too.

“Cake!” Kelly adds, equally excited by the prospect, as Tim’s tugging off her leggings.

“Cake on Friday, for both of you, and Anna, if you eat your supper,” Abby says, in her best ‘Mom-voice,’ returning from the linen closet with clean towels for little girls.

Both Molly and Kelly are giving them wary looks, and then Kelly bursts into tears. “NOW! CAKE NOW!”

And that pretty much shuts down any level of conversation not devoted to calming down the tired toddler.

An hour later, little girls are washed, dried, dressed, calmed down, read to, and in their beds, snoozing.

The adults are somewhat less calm, two of them are changing out of wet clothing, and all four of them are happily contemplating heading downstairs and just flopping onto the sofa to watching something funny and stupid.

They have flopped, with maximum boneless floppiness, and are eyeing the snag in the current plan, namely the remote is on the far side of the living room and none of them want to get up and grab it, when Breena says to Tim, “So, why were you bringing up Anna’s birthday?”
Tim rolls his eyes, right now he about as uneager to add another kid to the mix as it’s possible for him to be. “Uh… It sounded better in my head an hour ago.”

Breena raises an eyebrow.

“You were talking about trying for another baby after Anna hit a year old.”

She gently pokes him. “Horny bastard. Can’t wait to knock me up.”

He chuckles a bit and shakes his head. “Right this second, I can wait. Somehow getting soaked during tubby time, and then pooped on as soon as I got Anna out of the water, and the crying about cake killed a lot of that, but…”

Abby and Jimmy are laughing dryly at that, too. None of them are in anything like a sexy mood right now.

“But you want to know when the condoms are going back into retirement?” Breena finishes the sentence, dry humor in her voice. Like the rest of the crew she’s not feeling particularly, Yay! Kids! right now.

Tim nods. “In an entirely intellectual sort of way, now.” His expression makes it clear that in the not too distant future he’ll have a much more visceral desire to know.

“Wouldn’t mind knowing,” Jimmy adds. Like Tim, he’s not a fan of them. Doesn’t hate them or anything, and they’re certainly better than no sex at all, (He thinks Tim’s a little crazy on the preferring oral to condoms, not to say he doesn’t like oral, but… he really likes pussy.) but he’s also well aware of the fact that absolutely nothing else feels like having a crazy horny woman in your lap, and intentionally making a baby with her, even if, right this second, he’d happily skip off to baby-free land and spend at least the next six months there. (He’s the one who got the dripping wet kid more or less shoved into his hands when she decided to take a dump on Tim, as Breena pulled the other two out of the tub, fast, Tim worked on poop containment, and Abby waddled off to the linen closet to go find the bleach so the bath could get properly cleaned up.)

Abby’s been giggling at this, her hand on Sean’s bump. “Just think, little under seven more weeks, and we’ll be juggling four of them.”

The image of the work involved with four children under the age of three makes them all groan.

“You’re not helping the cause,” Jimmy replies, pointing at Abby. He kisses Breena. “Whenever you’re ready, I am. You want to wait longer; I can wait. Want to get pregnant now…” he thinks about that for a moment, he’s really not feeling like doing anything but snuggling, now. “An hour from now, and I’m in.”

He winks at her, and she kisses his smirk.

Breena’s been charting for years, so she knows where she is in her cycle. And, yes, right now, she’s not feeling any urge to make a new baby, but she knows that this morning as Anna was crawling around, pulling herself up on the coffee table and trying to stand on her own and Molly was dressing herself, that she wants to snuggle a newborn again, wants big, murky blue eyes looking up at her as little lips suckle at her breast and tiny fingers clasp around hers. “My period should start day after tomorrow, and that should mean next fertile period’ll be a little before Christmas. So, might be a very Merry Christmas,” she says with a big grin.
The house is starting to look like a place people might actually live at some point. All the walls are in place, they’re all painted (though several still need a second coat), the carpeted floors have their carpets. All that’s left is the non-carpet floors, and getting the plumbing fixtures in place.

Well, and furniture. That’d help, too.

Lights would be good. They’ve got the built in fixtures in place, but haven’t put in the bulbs, yet. (Still waiting for most of them to show up. LEDs aren’t cheap, and Tim went a little bonkers on finding the lowest cost, highest rated bulbs he could. The shipping tracking says they’ll be in by Tuesday.)

And maybe some appliances would be nice, also.

Possibly some art.

Maybe a few plants…

But really, they’re on the home stretch.

It’s December 6th, that leaves them nineteen days until Christmas, eighteen days until they want this place in shape for everyone to be over for their first Christmas and Chanukah celebration in their home.

Tony, who doesn’t love the smell of outgassing carpet, but also doesn’t have any problems with working in it, is in the house, getting those last coats of paint up.

Jethro’s on the back porch, cutting. All of those non-carpeted floors have either hardwood or tile on them, which means those pieces have to be cut to size to make this work out.

Tim’s the guy with the floorplans, the boxes of tiles and wood flooring, a pencil, a huge stack of graph paper, and the job of figuring out which piece of wood or tile goes where, and how big it should be.

So, Tim charts the floors out. He figures out square footage, and what goes where, and how to arrange the pieces to minimize the number of cuts. And then he takes each piece, writes the dimensions it’s supposed to be on the back, along with a number.

Jethro cuts them to shape and puts them back into a box. When the box is full, Tim tapes his graph paper chart onto the side.

The plan is, once Tony’s got his painting done, he can take a box, lug it to whatever room it goes to and just put the floors together like a jigsaw puzzle.

With any luck, by the time they’ve got everything cut, the fumes in the house will have died down enough to make it bareable for Jethro and Tim to get in there, too.

And, if Jimmy’s projection about them wrapping up at The Morgue by Thursday night are right, on Friday they’ll have another set of hands, and maybe, just possibly, they’ll have all the floors in by the weekend.

All hands on deck for the weekend, and maybe, if the housebuilding gods are kind, they’ll have everything in place by the time they all go back to work on Tuesday.
When they break for lunch, with all of the wood floor boards cut, half of the first of the wood floors in place, and schematics for the first of the tile sets roughed out, Tim explains what he’s thinking about for Breena’s ring, to Jethro and Tony.

To say that Jethro’s enthusiastic about this project is an understatement. He’s been studying mother of pearl and how to work with it during his off time, and getting back to pure, unadulterated wood is making his eyes gleam.

Plus, roughing something like this out, just with scrap, shouldn’t take more than a few minutes.

That sounds shockingly fast to Tim. “Minutes?”

“For the first bit. Cut the wood, glue it up. That’ll be pretty quick. Put it on the lathe tomorrow after it’s had some time to cure. Make a big one the first time. Just test the idea, see if it looks right.”

Jethro’s got his own pencil, and one of Tim’s pieces of graph paper, and is happily sketching away.

“Three pieces, slanted triangles, glue ‘em up, drill the center. Cut the outside with a jigsaw. Then shape it… Probably wouldn’t even use a chisel on it. Least, not for more than a few seconds. Do most of it with sandpaper.”

Tim and Tony share amused looks as Gibbs happily talks his way through the project, sketching away, mind buzzing with ideas.

On Thursday, Tim gets to the house early, and finds he’s the first one there. He doesn’t mind that. He pokes his head in, and the fumes are… his nose wrinkles at them. Still pretty stinky. They’ve got every window in the place open, so it’s not nearly as bad as it was earlier in the week, but he’s pretty sure taking Gibbs’ lungs into the house right now isn’t a good plan.

Tim inhales deeply, and doesn’t feel his own lungs grow tight. He’s fairly sure he can work in there if he needs to, though, as he thinks about how many tiles they’ve got to cut today, and the math he needs to do to get it mapped out… Probably another full day of cutting.

He turns to the right and heads down the hallway to his section of the house.

It’s really looking like a place people might live. They’ve got the hall and the main living area in light sky blue, off white, and dove gray carpets.

He checks into Breena and Jimmy’s room, and save for the furniture, it’s done.

The girls’ room is the next one down the hall, on the left, and it’s also done. Since Molly’s the only one with opinions about colors right now, they more or less bowed to her tastes on the matter. The walls are a soft dusty coral, the trim is rose pink, and the floor is more of the dove gray carpet.

The boys’ room or nursery or… he’s not sure how they’ll arrange the kids if Sean’s the only boy in the crew, (Though he is sure, that ten years from now, if Sean has a room to himself and the girls have to share, there will be squabbling.) is the next one down the hall on the right. Dove gray carpets, slightly lighter gray walls, cool green trim. It’s a very gender neutral sort of space.
The kids’ bathroom is also on the right, and it’s still a mostly empty space. The walls are painted cream, the trim is dark blue, but the tile, bath/shower, sink and toilet are still in boxes in the main living area.

He remembers what he’s doing and quickly goes through, snapping photos of everything and sending them to his loves. Then he heads into his and Abby’s room. Still no floor. Most of the first floor entry area, the great room, the dining area, both sets of stairs to the upstairs, Ducky and Penny’s hallway, bedroom, and study are hardwood. Tony got all of that done, by himself, yesterday.

Tim didn’t expect him to get his room done, too.

But the walls are dried, and he is looking at dark sultry burgundy, not fire engine red. His trim has been stained mahogany, like the floor that will go in today. Abby’s got some arabesque stencils she wants to put around the ceiling line in black and burnished silver that’ll look awesome once they’re up.

Tim smiles. It’s coming together. He can imagine the bed, a low mattress covered in pillows and sumptuous linens, the gauzy fabric and fairy lights that Abby intends to have cascade from the ceiling down around the bed. He shoots more pictures, and sends a note to the other three. Christmas Eve, here, all snuggled together for a long winter’s nap.

---

On Friday, the house still reeks, but, on Friday, they’ve also cut everything they can cut. The only jobs left are inside the house.

So, Gibbs heads to his workshop to start playing with wood, working on how to make the ideas he, Tim, Abby, and Jimmy have been bouncing around into reality, while the three younger male members of Clan Gibbs head inside to continue attaching flooring to the floors.

“So, he’s working Breena’s ring,” Tony says, as they lay down the tiles in what will eventually be his bathroom.

Jimmy nods, slapping grout onto the floor.

“Shouldn’t he be working on Abbi’s? He wants to give them to her on Christmas.”

Tim knows the answer to this one. “He’s trying to make the wood ring clasp onto the metal one. Become one ring for the wedding, and every version he’s tried so far has split.”

“That’s why he was spitting mad yesterday?” Tony asks.

“Yeah.” The less said about Gibbs on Thursday, the better. There were several moments where both Tim and Tony were convinced they were back at NCIS with a stalled out case and a rising body count. He’d be cutting tiles, thinking about the project, silent, annoyed, and then after an hour or so, he’d take a break, try something new, and then come back in an even worse mood.

Tim and Jimmy got in early today, found Jethro had crashed on Semper when he got too tired to keep working, and got him to talk about what was annoying him so much over coffee and eggs.

“So, he’s working on ours?” Jimmy says, gesturing with his trowel at the other two, who are doing a good job of chatting, but not lying much tile.
Tim nods, slopping a bit of grout onto his corner of the floor, and scraping it flat, flashing Jimmy a see, I’m working look, and then tamping the first of his tiles down. “The complicated part on ours is figuring how to cut the three woods so they look right once they’re scraped down.”

“So, he’s messing with that, and we’re in here, working on all fifty million tiles you’ve got in here.” Jimmy looks down at the tiny little one and a half by one and a half mosaic pieces Ziva wants in her bathroom.

“It’s just the border,” Tony adds. And it is. Small blue and green glass, some translucent, some sea glass opaque, and greeny-gold accent tiles sweep around the edge of the floor in a six inch border, surrounding ten by ten squares of what looks like, but isn’t, white marble with soft blue veins.

“And another line of it up in the shower, too.” Tim adds. This tile pattern is going up on the shower wall, and up the wall around the bath tub, too.

“Don’t ever slip in here, you’ll break something.” Jimmy adds. This whole bathroom is very hard.

Tony rolls his eyes. He slapped up two bathrooms worth of tile yesterday, and it was just as hard as what they’re doing right now. “It’s pretty.”

The other two veteran husbands nod. It is pretty. And it’s not like their bathroom is all that much less complicated on the tile front, but, they’re sharing one, so on a per bathroom user scale, it’s half as much work.

When they break for lunch, Gibbs hands over a small ring. It lays on Jimmy’s palm, buffed to a satin sheen. All the woods are pretty much the same color, they’re just bits of scrap Jethro had lying around, but he set them so the grains weren’t moving in the same direction.

It does exactly what Tim and Jimmy want it to. Each section slanting into the next one, all three woods supporting each other.

Gibbs looks proud of the work. He’s got a satisfied grin on his face. (Though that’s more than three quarters from figuring out his own problem. He’s got the answer to how to make the wood wedding band clasp onto Abby’s ring, namely he’s going to make the smallest pegs anyone’s ever seen, cut both halves so they cup around her engagement ring, and then make sure the bottom section, the bit that’ll go under her finger, is a bit thicker, and then he’ll peg it there. Sure, he’ll have to do some assembly post wedding, but he’s fine with that. This little thing here, which really did take him less than ten minutes of active working time, is just icing on the cake.)

“It’s beautiful,” Tim says, looking at the ring in Jimmy’s hand.

Gibbs nods at them. “What kind of wood do you want? I can hit the woodworking shop today. This is small enough I can use pen blanks for it, and they’ll have anything you can imagine.”

“Abby’s ebony,” Tim says. They’ve known that since the idea this might be wood sprang to mind.

“But I don’t think we’ve got any concrete ideas,” Jimmy adds.

Gibbs nods, expecting that. “I’ll take pictures.
There are some places Gibbs loves, and his woodworking shop is one of them. For a very long time, this was his favorite place on earth.

It’s a fairly small shop. Big for a woodworking place, but it’d be swallowed by a Target or Walmart.

It smells like heaven: fresh wood, kiln-dried wood, aged wood, tools, the oil used to keep tools in good shape, grinding stones for sharpening tools. And he likes the kind of guys who tend to hang out in there. They all get him, and most of them aren’t really chatty, unless you get them talking tools or projects.

If they sold drinks, he’d have been tempted to live here back in the day.

When he started working on Abbi’s ring, he had six other guys, all of them in his age range, with the same sort of hands, work calluses, but sensitive enough to tell the difference between wood sanded to two hundred grit finish or a four hundred grit finish. They all had opinions about what sort of lathe he should pick, which kind of wood would do the job, and how best to work mother-of-pearl. They talked him through different chucks, which sorts of glues to use, who made the best chisels and scrapers for what he wanted to do, and where to get good mother of pearl.

A decent number of the guys here like turning pens. It’s fast, easy(ish), a good way to use up little odds and ends of wood, and looks awesome.

And for those who don’t want to use scrap, or like something more expensive or exotic, they have a lot of pen blanks.

Gibbs takes about an hour of chatting with the other guys, explaining that one of his sons wants to make a present for his wife, and asking which sorts of woods (because, really, they’ve got pen blanks made of everything) would do that best.

Turns out that just about everything that will make a decent pen will make a decent ring.

That doesn’t narrow his options much. In ebony alone, they’ve got more than fifteen choices. He gets shots of all of them, ranging from tightly grained black on black, that when polished to a shine will look like jet, to the zebra striped Macassar Ebony, with its lines of yellow-white and black. He sends them to Abby, and begins snapping shots of the other options.

And there are a lot of them. Wood, natural wood comes in colors ranging from bone white to black, with shades of cream, yellow, orange, brown, and red to go with it. But this place doesn’t stop with natural colored woods, they have a huge stock of dyed woods, in every color anyone could possibly imagine.

(Gibbs is hoping he’s not going to get a note back saying this ring is going to end up being black, screaming green, and violent purple.)

He gets Abby’s text back first. She wants an ebony blank that is mostly black with a few whorls of white.

Jimmy chooses a maple burl. It’s cream with golden swirls and whorls. Gibbs picks the piece with the tightest grain and the most whorls to go with the streaks. After all, the ring is going to be small, so he’s got to get some really good grain in a very tiny package.

Tim send him a request for an East Indian Rosewood. It’s a dark red wood with almost black streaks, and though there are six blanks on display Gibbs knows which one Tim wants. One of the blanks has a streak of cream colored wood through it.

Gibbs takes the three pen blanks, and then fires off a quick text to Jimmy and Tim, Back to work.

On Friday, after work at the house wraps up early, there is cake. Cupcakes actually, because they’re just the right size for little girls, and because that way everyone gets their favorite flavor.

They’re missing Duck and Penny, who Skype in for a few minutes, but they’re spending the evening meeting with Congressman King, so their time online is short, but this is starting to feel like getting back to normal again.

Gibbs’ house, Shabbos dinner, little girls able to stay up late enough to join in for lighting the candles and the fun that goes with trying to eat with little people and a dog who’s very interested in having a bite of everything on the menu.

It feels good.

Add in cupcakes, one candle blazing as everyone sings happy birthday, and Anna grabbing her cupcake in both hands and smushing the hell out of before trying to eat it double fisted, and it’s a good night.

“Leon got you going to any of those Commission meetings?” Abbi asks Tim as they’re clearing the table.

“All of January. I don’t know if I’m going to set foot into the building that whole month.” He sets the dishes in a stack on the counter, for Tony, who’s scraping them into the trash can. “At least they’re nearby. Some of them are even in DC. Last thing I want to do is travel for this.”

Abbi nods, she knows that feeling. “Good. Can I call you my rep for the ones you’re at?”

“Low on people?”

She grits her teeth and nods. “Abysmally. I’m starting to get enough warm bodies to do the job and keep things running, but everyone’s new. Hell, I’ve got Manner going to three of them for me.”

Tim hasn’t gotten formal notice, yet, but he’s fairly sure Manner’s going to defect over to CGIS. Which works out fine, because he seems happy to be there, and Tim wanted another open desk. He’s got the desk now, but doesn’t know when, or if, he’ll get to fill it. “Sure, I’ll stick CGIS on my ID badge under the NCIS. I’ll send Manner an email, make sure we’re not going to the same ones. Actually, I might have him stand in for NCIS for some of them. He knows, probably better than I do, the ins and outs of the bureaucratic bits of the job.”

Abby nods in agreement. Manner jumped into her computer systems and got them up to code, and then some. Hell, he found codes she didn’t know existed and got them up to them, too. “He’s good at that. The rest of my organization is limping along, but my computer systems are up to code and fully re-staffed.”
“Excellent.”

“I’m thinking we need to do a Winter Birthday party,” Breena says as they’re driving home from Anna’s bash.

Tim raises an eyebrow at her, which isn’t very effective communication-wise because he’s in the back seat, and she’s driving.

“What are you thinking?” Abby asks, which does the job a lot better.

“Abbi’s the 30th of November, Anna’s the 7th, Tim and Jimmy are the 17th, Jethro’s got January 9th, Molly’s on the 14th of Feb, and somewhere in there we’re gonna have Sean, too.”

“Penny’s December 31st,” Tim adds.

Abby says as she caresses over Sean, “I’m perfectly cool with you showing up on the earlier end of that spectrum than the later end.”

“Okay, so, by my count that’s more than half of us have birthdays in one season,” Breena says. “I’m thinking one big party, get everyone’s birthday all at once, maybe do one more in late spring for Tony, Abby, Me, Kelly, Dave, and Ducky—“

“And Ziva with the oddball fall birthday gets a party all on her own?” Jimmy adds.

“Sure.”

Tim thinks about that for a moment and cracks a smile. “Okay, so apparently with this crew’s parents Valentine’s Day is pretty popular, given how many of us are Nov/December.”

Jimmy smirks at that. “Speak for yourself, I was supposed to show up in early January.”

Tim inclines his head at that. He can remember his mom talking about how he was due at the beginning of December but just wouldn’t get his butt moving.

Saturday morning. All hands on deck. And, in an effort to make a really concerted push to get everything done this weekend, Tim and Abby asked Heather if she’d be willing to do some extra babysitting this weekend.

And she was.

So, the full crew, minus Penny and Ducky, a house with in need of almost a thousand square feet of flooring, ten toilets, eight showers, five bathtubs, eleven sinks, two ovens/ranges, one extra-large fridge, two freezers, an extra-large dishwasher, kitchen cabinets and counter tops, three sets of washer/driers, a slew of bookshelves, and the proverbial partridge in the pear tree.

It’s going to be a busy two days.
This is, without a doubt, Abby’s least favorite part of being pregnant. She feels useless.

The floor is too low. She can get down on it, and work on tiles right around her, but the getting back up and moving somewhere else messes up the tiles she just got down.

The level of getting down on the floor necessary to help with getting sinks installed just isn’t going to happen.

Bathtubs and showers are too heavy to work with. She can’t fit close enough to the wall to get the washers hooked into the water supply or driers vented.

She gets the doors screwed onto the cabinets in the kitchen (Which gets a little bit of glaring from Tim and Jimmy because it requires her to be on a step-ladder, but they both back off on it when they see her about to melt down, and Gibbs decides to stick around in the kitchen working on counter tops and appliances with her.) but that only takes an hour and a half.

And, eventually, as bathrooms get closer to done, she’s able to screw in more doors on cabinets, but that’s almost more trouble than it’s worth, because in addition to not being able to move around too well, she also takes up a lot more space than she wants to these days.

If she’s in one of the powder rooms, screwing in the door on the cabinet below the sink, it means no one else can really fit in there and work.

And it still takes her two hours (okay, closer to a minute, it feels like two hours) to get back up off the floor once the door is screwed in.

The only upside is she’s got Ziva to commiserate with. Because, if Abby, round and waddling is having a hard time with this, Ziva, who’s not nearly as far along, but who keeps getting dizzy from the fumes, and can’t get on the floor easily, and has never had to deal with not being able to move the way she wants to is ready to rip her hair out and swearing under her breath in Hebrew about how this child is going to be an only child.

Breena, who has “Been there, done that” emblazoned upon her soul as she watches Abby and Ziva help as much as they can, and get increasingly frustrated with their pregnant bodies being willing to do less and less that’s useful for this endeavor, snaps off her grout encrusted gloves (she’s got a really fine hand for scraping down the grout off of the tiles, so she’s been on grout cleanup), grabs both of them as they’re griping at their future offspring, and leads them into the kitchen/dining area.

“You two want a job you can do, one that has to happen, the sooner the better?”

To say the looks that Ziva and Abby are flashing her are doubtful that she’ll be able to find said job is something of an understatement. They both look like they’d rather be sulking and griping with each other about how much being pregnant sucks.

But, they do nod, because yes, it would be nice to be useful, and they can gripe and do whatever it is Breena’s thinking needs to be done.

“See that…” she points to the oven/stovetop that Jimmy and Tony are gently pushing into place.

Again nodding. The dining area is open to the kitchen, so it’d be difficult to miss the guys.

“We have thirteen days until we want everyone able to spend the night here. So, between now and then, we’re going to need cook wear, because it’d be really nice to have some things to put between the food and the stove, like frying pans, and sauce pans, and maybe some pots. I know Gibbs and Tim are talking roasted lamb and turkey for Christmas, so it’d be really nice if we had some roasting pans, and it’d be even better if we had some knives so we’re not gnawing the meat off the bones, and maybe cutting boards, possibly a platter or two to stick the food on, and some plates and silverware and cups and glasses—“

Abby holds up her hands. “You want us to outfit the kitchen?”

“Might be a good plan, unless you want to see exactly how rustic Gibbs’ campfire cooking can get. I mean, even he uses plates, right?”

“Only when I’m feeling fancy,” shoots out of the kitchen, where Gibbs is puttying the drain into the sink.

Ziva smirks at that. Abby and Breena laugh gently.

“Unless they’re marshmallows over the fire, here, you use plates!” Breena shoots back to him.

“Yes, Ma’am,” comes back to them.

Ziva nods, and she and Abby creep over to the computer that’s sitting on three long two by fours suspended between step ladders. Time to shop.

Several moments later, the squabbling has shifted from complaining about babies in utero to, “We are not getting black goblets with blood red stems!” “But they look awesome!” “You can get them for your house, the rest of us don’t want to live in the Adam’s Family.” “When did you see the Adam’s Family?” and so on and so forth.

Breena feels like her job is done, so she heads back to their bathroom, where she and Tim are finishing up the tile that will eventually make up their shower.

By the end of Saturday, all the floors are done. All of the kitchen appliances, counters, and cabinets are in place. Stuff to put into that kitchen, as well as a dining table, chairs, sofas and loveseats for the main living area have all been purchased.

Sunday is plumbing day. One day to get all of the bathrooms done.

Gibbs and Abbi decide to stay at the house. Semper’s got a decent berth for two, (which is intentional) and there’s no reason, like three small people waiting to see Mama and Daddy, or sore pregnant bodies that do not want to camp out, for them to head home.
“Think we’ll get it done?” Abbi asks as she snuggles into Gibbs. It’s been a long day, and they’re turning in early. Well, going to bed early, probably be an hour or so before they “turn in.”

He nods at her, kissing her gently. She’s wrapped in his arms, and they’re rocking gently with the motion of the water. Their family home is almost ready to move into, and he’s feeling so content he doesn’t know what to do with himself.

“I love you, so much.”

Abbi smiles at him and gives him a kiss.

“Tomorrow. Yeah, we’ll finish. This weekend, you want to ‘break in’ our new room,” he’s grinning as he says that, “and it’ll be ready.”

Abby nibbles his lip. “Oh yeah. Must christen the new room.” She laughs. It’s the sound of a Marine with a really dirty joke in her head. “This is going to be one well-christened house.”

Gibbs groans, still laughing. “Oh God. Those hornballs are going to do it in every damn room, aren’t they?”

“Might be a good plan to not be stealthy over Christmas. Make a lot of noise before going into any room.” They’re both laughing at that idea.

Gibbs shakes his head for a moment, and then a gleam flashes in his eyes. “We gonna cover more territory than they do?”

Abbi grins back at him, huge smile on her face. “Eventually.”

On Sunday, shortly after three in the afternoon, the last sink (bathroom upstairs next to the kids’ area) is put into place.

December 11th, 2016, The House, their house, is done.

Tony was ready for it, and he has two bottles of Champaign and one of sparkling cider tucked into the fridge. So, as everyone else is standing around, looking tired, feeling amazed that it’s really done, that eight months of labor has made what used to be a painfully ugly, deserted shell into a home for them, he skitters down the stairs, and is back a few minutes later with three bottles.

And no glasses.

Because the glasses (not black goblets with blood red stems, but a well-stocked collection of round, clear glass tumblers, wine glasses, a few shot glasses, and for Ducky, several brandy snifters) won’t be showing up for another three days.

Still, he opens the bottles, with dramatic popping of corks, cider first, allowing the pregnant ladies the first “taste” of victory, and they share them, looking at what they’ve built, while Tim sends pictures to Penny and Ducky, along with the text: Just waiting for you to get back and make it complete!

He gets a quick response from Penny: Soon!
New and Old

Tim stares at the book in front of him. Okay, it’s probably only a hundred pages long, still it’s the biggest slate of candidates he’s ever seen.

He’s standing in his voting booth, doing his ‘civic duty’, feeling… he’s not sure. Not much of anything, really. Maybe a little relief that he and Abby are through the forest of campaign posters, past the ‘have you heard about Blah?’ electioneers, and finally done waiting in line. Certainly not hope, or a sense of doing something important. It’s Election Day; he’s voting, probably because he always does.

He understands the idea that Jake and Co. were going for in cutting down the power of the political parties. He approves of that, even, but this…

There are eight thousand candidates for president. Anyone with two hundred dollars for the filing fee and the free time to fill out the form got to run, so they all did. With the exception of the actors and the guys who managed to lose, over and over, politically, no one’s ever heard of any of these people before.

For this slate, he’s got two votes. One for Pres, and one, theoretically, for Vice Pres. Though he can give both votes to one person, and hope to nudge his favorite that much further up the list.

He copies the number and name that go with the guy he dislikes the least onto his ballot, noting the instructions that say to check and double check because if the name and ID number don’t match up, his vote won’t be counted, and then puts both votes with the one name.

Tim can’t imagine they won’t be doing this again in a month, with only 4000 candidates, because he can’t imagine any two of these guys will come up with 50.00001% of the vote. Then, again in February, with 1000, and probably at least once more with 500, and hell, probably a time after that to get it down to 250, and with any luck after that enough of these twits will have dropped out to get the numbers down low enough to actually elect a flipping president.

He glares at the ballot in front of him.

The next slate is smaller. Only 3000 people to pick from for Virginia representatives. 1 rep per 50,000 people. He’s got 128 votes. He gives all of them to Bleach, who decided that he couldn’t, in good conscience, be a judge, what with not really knowing if any of the laws he was supposed to be enforcing were legitimate, but he could, at the least, go about becoming one of the guys going over, making, and remaking those laws.

At least that race is done. No majority required. The top 128 become the next crew of Virginia Congressmen, and the rest go home, wait four years, and try again.

He wishes he could feel some sort of satisfaction at that, but it doesn’t come.

Vote recording is different, too. Before he’d take his ballot, stick it into the electronic reader, and accept the I Voted sticker, and off he went. Today, he handed his ballot over. The recorder is a person. She checks with him, makes sure his candidate and number is correct, and then, with him watching, finds the index cards that go with his candidates, and, using a calculator for both numbers, tallies the new vote number on each card.

It takes a long time.
“What happens when the polls close?” he asks.

“You remember Scantron sheets?”

He nods. He does remember the sheets with the little blank circles that got filled in with a number two pencil. He remembers being young, and very carefully filling in each any every circle, petrified that he might go over the line or not get enough pencil lead into the circle for the machine to read it.

“We take the ballots, and the cards, then fill in a Scantron sheet. The Scantron sheets get done twice. I’ll tally my numbers, and make my sheet. Then Bob,” she nods to the guy next to her, who’s handling Abby’s ballot, “and I will switch, going over each other’s numbers, creating a second sheet. We’ll,” she gestures to all the other poll watchers, “do that for every vote, so we’ve got two counts. Then we put them through the machine. And we’re going to do that until we get two matching counts. When we get matching counts, the numbers go to the state, along with the raw ballots, the cards, and the Scantrons. Then they all get scanned and put online, so anyone who wants to challenge the numbers can go through and see all the raw data.”

Tim sighs. “You’ve got a late night, don’t you?”

She laughs, bitterly. “They told us to bring sleeping bags. Just like jury duty, any registered voter might end up here. I’m a math teacher. Having to use a calculator to add two to a number is killing me.” Her voice drops, and she nods at one of the vote counters on the far side of the room, “He didn’t know how to use the calculator, and I’m not sure he can count to ten without taking off his shoes. We’re going to be here forever.”

Tim winces. He’d like to commiserate longer, but the line behind him is huge, and it’s not getting any smaller by him sitting there chatting. “Good luck.”

“Thanks,” she says, voice dry.

He waits a few moments for Abby, who’s not too far behind him. She and her vote counter had to double check to make sure the number on her candidate was right.

Finally, she’s done, too. Abby inclines her head at him as they head toward their new car. It’s another Highlander. They’ve got a red one and a black one now.

“You okay?” she asks once they’re settled.

Tim shrugs. ‘I’m not bad.”

She gives him a half-hearted smile. “That’s enough.”

The next matter for Tim is something he finds satisfying. Tomorrow, no matter what, NCIS is open again, which means he’s heading back in today, making sure that his crew are ready to hit the ground running.

Tonight they are going to get a metric shit ton of cases handed back over to them, so they’ve can’t be getting back online when the cases come in.

Fortunately, for him, his crew is all around the world, on 24/7, so making sure he’s got hands on deck and ready to work whenever the cases start coming in.
Abby doesn’t have that luxury. As soon as NCIS goes live, evidence is going to start coming in, and someone’s got to be there to grab it. Plus, some of her equipment is just getting back from its period out and about, and they’ve got to get it hooked back up, and ready to work again.

But at least Abby’s got a team. She might not want to leave tonight, but she does have people she can delegate the overnight work to.

Jimmy, on the other hand, will have to be in Autopsy, because they’re fairly sure he’s going to be expected to start taking possession of bodies as soon as NCIS officially goes online again. He and Allan have already been getting calls to let them know that morgues and PDs all over the Mid-Atlantic, have clients ready to go.

If no new cases pop up, they’ll be taking custody of twenty-two Sailors and Marines, which will be something of a challenge, because they’ve only got drawers for nine of them.

Fortunately, they’re both on good terms with some people who have more than a bit of refrigerated storage on hand. Jimmy and Allan’s job at The Morgue may be done, but there are still John Does, Jane Does, a collection of people with no apparent next-of-kin, and people they haven’t been able to contact any next-of-kin for. The Chaplains are still working full days there, and they still need the storage.

Since they are tight on space, they’re going to have to triage cases. The faster a case looks to solve, the higher the priority. Normally, that’s not how Jimmy would do this, but the quicker the case is done, the sooner the body can be released, the less time their bodies will spend at The Morgue.

Tim heads down to The Dungeon, which is no longer very dungeonish. Maybe it needs a name change. Daffodil Land? Sunrise Valley? Tim rolls his eyes.

He greets Techs left and right. Everyone, no matter what their normal shift is, is here right now, making sure their systems are ready to work. Tim sees a few I Voted stickers. (Those are still the same.) He hears a lot of clicking, some not so muffled cursing as people see what happened to their systems, and a decent amount of chattering about who did what over the last two months.

Ngyn, Brand, and Howard are back, setting up their own stations, complaining about how yellow it is down here now.

“Ladies…”

“McGee!” he gets an affectionate puppy-ish hug from Brand, but only for a second because Howard yanks her back with a look that Tim takes to mean, no molesting the Boss.

He nods at Howard, thankful for that. She nods back.

“What happened to your hair?” Brand asks.

Tim sighs. This is part of what happens when you hire teenagers. The filter between brain and mouth is not fully formed yet.

He gives her a grim smile. “It got shorter.” At six weeks out of the Navy Yard, his hair is slightly less than an inch long, and right now, he and everyone else can’t wait for it to grow back. Yes, both Abby and Breena had been amused at how soft and fluffy it was in the true peach fuzz stage, and he didn’t exactly mind them petting his head, but… He hadn’t been thinking about how silly he looks with a buzz cut when he took it off. Probably because he hadn’t been thinking of anything then.

Now that it is the future, and it’s cold outside, he’s stuck with stupid hair, and a need to wear warm caps when he’s outside. (Tony’s already gotten him a collection of blazingly ugly knit caps in awful colors with huge pompoms on the top. Bringing a new one each day he was outside working with Gibbs on cutting things seemed to make Tony’s day. Tim’s settled on a fleece lined, knit, NCIS cap, in navy blue, sans pompom.)

Brand’s eyes are wide, but he can see that Howard and Ngyn are looking intently, too. That’s not enough of an answer for them.

He runs his fingers through what’s left of his hair. “It was easier to keep clean if I shaved it off.”

That makes all three of them blanch. They’d heard rumors about how bad it was in here, but none of them knew for sure. But that one line is an extremely concrete concept. Ngyn touches her almost waist-long, black hair. They glance at each other, and Brand says, “Thanks for getting us out.”

“No problem. I told your parents I’d look out for you.”

Brand rolls her eyes at that, too. “They almost didn’t let me come back.”

Howard nudges her. “Like they could keep you away.”

Brand smiles up at him. “Not a shot.”

“Are you ready to go?” Tim asks them.

He gets nodding from Ngyn, and a long, complicated, two part story from Howard and Brand about what they’ve done to not just get their systems up and running, but to rev them up and get them working even better than they used to be.

Unlike when he gets going on one of his tech spiels, the girls don’t get cut short. Tim’s listening intently, enjoying what they’re thinking of doing. They’ve got good ideas, and if they work the way they, and he, hopes they will, they’ll pull more power out of their current systems.

When they get done, Tim’s smiling, feeling awfully good about getting back to work.

Manner’s request for a formal transfer to CGIS is in his inbox. Tim’s got no problem granting it. He wishes Manner well, and asks him if he minds doing some double duty on the Commission work.

Then he goes through the rest of his inbox.

He’s been keeping up with it, checking in at least once a day, so it’s not like he’s slammed, but he does have one new email that’s going to require some attention.

It’s the CVs of all of his staff who used to be in Texas and California.

Tim glances up. He’s got an empty desk, and seven techs in need of new assignments. Time to start getting in contact with people and seeing where he can shuffle them around.
Tim’s wrapping up for the day when Jimmy heads in.

“You look productive,” Jimmy says, shutting the door to Tim’s office behind him.

“I’m trying. You about to be productive?”

Jimmy nods. “They’ve been transferring files to me all day. Bodies’ll start coming in in an hour or so. We’ve got to get ready for it. Allan should be here any minute.”

“Then what?”

“Work until I fall down.”

“Try not to do that.”

Jimmy nods. “Bring me breakfast?”

“No problem.”

Jimmy gives him a lascivious grin. “Kiss the babies good night and give our girls a good tucking in for me.”

It takes Tim a moment to get what Jimmy means by ‘tucking in’ and that the girls in question in that case are not their daughters.

Tim chuckles back at him, and licks his lips. “It’ll be a challenge, but I’m sure I can rise to the occasion.”

Jimmy gently slaps his shoulder and heads for Autopsy.

The thing about being an NCIS medical examiner is that ‘regular hours’ isn’t part of the job description. For that matter, it’s not even a concept that anyone involved in this job is even vaguely familiar with.

Granted, if there was more than just him and Allan, it might work a bit differently. If there were two full MEs and two assistants, they’d have shifts, but in that they don’t have enough dead people to make that a feasible expenditure, he and Allan are pretty much on all the time.

Though Jimmy’s thinking, if he can get Allan to stick around long enough, that in two or so years, bumping Allan up to a full ME, and then sharing an assistant between them might make for a much more manageable work load for everyone involved.

But that’s a few years from now, and he’ll have to see what his budget is doing, then.

Right now, he’s heading in, finding Allan already sitting at the desk, staring at the four boxes of case work that’s already showed up.

“Ready for some light reading, Dr. Palmer?”
Jimmy hangs his coat and scarf up, pushes his glasses up on his nose a little, and pulls a chair over. He gestures to the files in front of them. “Where should I start?”

They’re an hour into the reading when the first call comes. Jimmy checks the clock, it’s nineteen hundred hours, seven o’clock to the outside world, and while no one knows who’s running it yet, the United States once again has a legitimately elected (they hope) government. Or, at least, the polls have closed in the Eastern Time Zone.

“Dr. Palmer,” Jimmy says, identifying himself to whomever is waiting.

“Dr. Palmer, this is Major Herbert Sloane, I’m the ME for the Virginia National Guard. I’ve got three of your Marines and four Sailors.”

“We’re open all night, Dr. Sloane, send them over and I’ll be here to sign for them.”

“All right. They’re heading up to you from Richmond, so about two hours from now…”

“We’ll be ready.”

“I should be at the office,” Abby says after they get the girls to bed.

Tim and Breena shake their heads, though he leaves it to Breena, who’s done this, to say, “You are eight months pregnant. The last thing you need to be doing is pulling all-nighters.”

“You were there all day, all your equipment is up and ready to go, the full handover back from the National Guard won’t be over until tomorrow morning, so all that’s going on right now is accepting and cataloging old evidence. Corwin and Zelaz are ready, willing, and able to do that. Tomorrow you and Benedict head in, take over, and start beating those cases into shape.”

Abby glares at Tim a bit. “Says the man with his phone strapped to his hip, his laptop up and ready to run.”

That is true. Tim’s home, and hoping he’s going to get a full night’s sleep. He’s not betting on it, though. 7:01, as soon as the polls closed in the east coast, cases started transferring over from every National Guard in the Eastern Time Zone. “I’m here, with you, not at the office. They need me they can call. Same as what they can do for you.”

“Uh huh…” Abby’s still looking suspicious. “Why do I think you sent an email to my guys telling them that if it’s after eight o’clock to leave me be?”

Tim looks slightly guilty. He did not, in fact, do that, though he did think about it. He did not, in fact, do it, because he did not have to. Everyone in Abby’s lab has either gestated a baby of her own or was the male half of the baby-making equation, so unless the lab is literally on fire, they are not calling the eight-months-pregnant woman in after hours.

Abby catches the look and shoots off to Breena, “You see that look?”

“I did not tell them not to contact you.”

“Then what’s that look?” Breena asks.
Tim rolls his eyes. “I may have thought about it, but I didn’t do it.”

“Fine.” Abby glares at both of them, and the sighs. “I’m sorry. I just feel…”

“Prickly?” Tim supplies.

Breena nods along with him. Abby’s definitely in porcupine-mode today. “Six more weeks. Little boy’s almost cooked, and then you get to be yourself again.”

“I cannot wait.” She pats Sean. “You hear that, get your butt moving.”

“In two more weeks,” Breena adds. Officially, Sean’s not fully cooked for another two weeks.

Like Jimmy, Tony’s day is starting at night. The National Guards and local LEOs are all sending in their cases as the polls close.

So, with ZNN blathering along in the background, keeping up running speculation as they wait for returns to come in, (They don’t expect to get any, except for the tiniest of counties, until well after midnight.) he and Draga are sitting in their new, two person setup, reading, as more and more casefiles start popping up on their systems.

Over the next twelve hours, fifteen of Jimmy’s twenty-two murders will end up on their desks, along with thirty-four thefts of greater than $500,000 value, twenty-two fraud cases, sailors are well known for working any angle they can, and it looks like several of them were taking advantage of the chaos to enrich themselves, and three terrorism cases that Tony’s not sure what to do with.

He fobs them off to Bishop, along with the third of the thefts that are money laundering cases, and a quick note that says, Vacation time’s over.

He gets a snapshot of her at her computer with the words, On it, Boss.

It’s a good thing that the Navy Yard is still hosting a slew of Marines and Sailors. Jimmy’s got them schlepping paperwork around, and bodies. Tony’s got them moving around more paperwork. Abby’s crew has them lugging evidence.

Just because NCIS stopped working, the Sailors and Marines did not suddenly become law abiding angels, and right now they’ve got more than two months of down time to investigate.

If Abby was prickly last night, she’s downright spiny now.

“How! How does this happen, Tom?”

Benedict shrugs. He’s just as spiny right now, too. They are both being reminded, as they sort through the evidence, that Local LEOs are a crap shoot. Some of them really know what they’re doing and they do a good job. Some of them… (And here Abby and Benedict are gritting their teeth) pretty much decided that their job is to look pretty and get elected and they gave fuck all attention to cases that ‘weren’t their jurisdiction.’

Abby’s looking at one case from Craword County, in western Virginia, where once the LEOs had identified the victim was a Marine, they just stopped investigating. It’s been eight weeks, the body sat in their Morgue, the crime scene was roped off, and everything they collected in those first few hours was packaged up, but then they just quit.

“Tony’s going to rip that LEO’s head clean off his body when he sees this one.”

“See’s which one?” Tony asks. He’s tired, been at it all night, going through case after case, getting a sense of who’s going to go first, how to prioritize what he’s got.

“Lance Corporal Jason Sedman,” Benedict says.

“You’re upping your Gibbs game,” Abby smiles at Tony, and really smiles at the green smoothie he’s got for her.

“I felt a tingle and knew you’d have something for me. Who am I killing?”

“The Craword County PD.” Abby clicks her remote and crime scene photos pop up on her screen. “They found Lance Corporal Jason Sedman dead out in the woods. They figured out he was a Marine,” she’s flicking though the shots of the body, where he was found, “packed him up, secured the scene, packed up their gear, and did nothing until handing him over to us.”

Tony thinks. It takes him a minute, but he remembers this case. Nothing in it had jumped out as high urgency, but if it’s an outside murder that’s been open to the elements for more than two months with only minimal evidence collection…

“Shit.”

Abby nods at him. “Exactly.”

Tony’s stalking out, phone open, “Draga, grab your go bag and a ton of Red Bull, we’re heading to Deliverance country…”

---

Tim heads for Autopsy with his bag over his shoulder, and another bag, this one filled with a thermos of sugar free chai, Jimmy’s preferred omelet (eggs, spinach, Swiss cheese, and ham), two containers of sugar-free yogurt, and several muffins and cookies for Allan.

(He’s not sure entirely certain what Allan likes for breakfast, but he’s not about to bring breakfast for Jimmy and ignore Allan.)

There are bodies on all three tables. Jimmy’s at the one closest to the door, signing quietly to himself. One of his keeping himself awake techniques. Tim smiles; he’s going through a medley of Christmas Carols that Molly’s daycare preschool have been teaching the kids.

Allan’s at the middle table, not singing.

Both of them appear to be checking the bodies in front of them and the reports that go with them, and both of them look ready to drop. At least, both of them are tired enough they don’t respond to Tim just walking in.
“Hey!” That gets both of them looking in his direction. “I come bearing food!” Tim holds up the bag.

And both Jimmy and Allan look happy to see that, too. They pause their work, stripping out of gloves and coveralls, quickly washing up, and heading toward where Tim’s laying out breakfast on the desk.

“Thank you,” Sam sounds extremely grateful. He grabs the vanilla yogurt and the multi-grain breakfast cookie, dipping the cookie into the yogurt and bolting it down.

He gets a quick smile from Jimmy, who also tears into his omelet.

Tim pours the chai for Jimmy, glances at Allan, who also nods, and pours for him, too. They don’t say much, mostly Tim’s just hearing chewing.

“You going to get home soon?” he asks Jimmy, when he pauses between bites to breathe.

Jimmy shrugs. “Might crash in your office for a few hours and get back to it. Dr. Allan, if you want to go, or kip out on the sofa in Cybercrime…”

Allan nods at that. “We’ve got three more to do. Once we’re done with them…”

Tim’s eyebrows narrow. He’s not sure why Jimmy’d be sticking around if they’ve only got three more to do.

Jimmy sees it, pauses chewing and says, “Checking them in. Right now, this is just the quick inventory: is the client who he appears to be, is the paperwork filled out, have we got full chain of custody. Once we’ve got that, we’re going to grab the three cases that look fastest to solve, and start trying to get these men and women home.”

Tim understands that.

“How about you, Director McGee?”

Tim shakes his head. “Long day coming up. Probably won’t see home until late, or early. Just checking off on cases is going to take hours.”

Jimmy and Sam nod at that. All they’ve been doing all night is just checking off on cases.

Having made sure that Jimmy got breakfast, and sending off a text to Breena to let her know he’d gotten it (She often gets concerned when Jimmy’s got to work as long as he is now. He can forget to eat, and that’s not good for him.) Tim heads to his own office.

He clearly remembers pouring himself a cup of coffee. He remembers seeing most of his usual daytime crew. He remembers walking into his office, setting the coffee down, logging into the job triage system, clicking on the first one that he could knock off on his own easily, and then…

And then he checks the clock, feelingly mildly hungry, and sees four hours have passed.

He grabs himself another cup of coffee, sees several techs, and Allan, all snoozing in his gaming zone, and, though it doesn’t occur to him until hours later, he doesn’t feel the need to snap his wrist band at that sight. He just grabs a bag of nuts to go with the coffee, tucks it into his pocket, pull out his phone, and sends a text to Abby, Jimmy, and Tony, checking to see who’s still in the office, and if they want him to get them some lunch.
He gets back, Yes! 10 min. Little boy wants pastrami on rye. from Abby. From Tony he gets: I’d love lunch, but I’m in west-middle-of-nowhere Virginia. I don’t think they’ve even heard of pastrami out here. Stick a sandwich on my desk, Draga’s, too. We’ll want them when we’re back. Jimmy sends him: I was sleeping. At home.

Tim hits him back with Good. Eat something and go back to sleep.

You getting home tonight? Jimmy sends him.

Hahahahahaha. Bring me breakfast.

Got ya.

And that, for all practical purposes is the next nine days for the NCIS-working members of Clan Gibbs. They’re playing catch up, hard.

But Tim would tell you, assuming you could drag him away from his computer long enough to get it out of him, that it was good. Tiring. God, so tired. But good. Working hard to solve concrete crimes with real victims and actual perpetrators feels good.

Tim would also tell you, that when he, and the rest of his crew, got the note from Leon that ten days straight was enough, and that they were all being mandated to take off Dec 23, 24, and 25, that he left the office with a very tired spring in his step and a grin on his lips, as he wraps his arms around Abby and Jimmy, pleased to be going home with both of them, at the same time, to have a real, sitting down, with all four of them and the girls dinner, and then collapse into a coma until sometime late on the 23rd.
These days, Breena’s never sure who will be home, when. Even Abby, who they are trying to keep to some sort of regular schedule, and who has double, super, pinkie promised to rest at least ten hours out of every twenty-four, has been catching at least one out of three of her rests on the Cybercrime sofa.

Some nights, Breena is on her own, with the babies.

Some mornings, she wakes up on her own, again with the babies.

But that’s fairly rare. She’s not sure if they’re trying to make sure there’s at least one of them with her when there’s kid watching to do, but it does seem like they’re doing an okay job of making sure someone is around.

This is not, by a long stretch the first bit of her life where she’s not been sure who would be home when, but since day one of: Attempt to Make Baby Number Four, and NCIS reopening happened to be the same day, it matters to her in a way that it doesn’t normally.

There is a fantasy Breena has, about how to go about making baby number four. It involves her and Jimmy and Tim, all of them on their sides, together, Tim behind her, Jimmy in front, lazy slow kisses, soft, sexy words whispered by Tim right into her ear, deep touches, both guys slowly rocking in and out of her.

The fantasy shifts as the movements get faster. Them on the side of the bed. She’s in Jimmy’s lap, him behind her, Tim standing in front of them, kissing, so much kissing. Both of them kissing her, and each other. There’s the sound of fast, deep sex, panting, grunts and moans, and filthy, dirty, sexy, blistering hot words as sweat and lube slick skin slides against more skin.

She can imagine the feel of them, both of them, deep, hard, moving fast, her moving fast too, chasing blazing orgasms that sweep over them in wracking pulses and deep-voiced shouts, and all of that hot, sticky, limb jelling pleasure making a new little person.

But, as she gets more details in the form of texts as to what’s going on at NCIS, she’s got the sense that that fantasy isn’t happening anytime soon.

Reality is a bit different than fantasy.

Take Thursday, for example. When she got home, Jimmy was already in bed, crashed out, sleeping the exhausted sleep of a Medical Examiner who’s had too damn many people to examine in not nearly enough time.

She poked him a bit at dinner time, which he didn’t much appreciate, but he can’t afford to sleep through meals, and then she let him crash again as soon as she had gotten some food in him.
It was a bit before eleven, normal bedtime for her, when she heard footfalls on the steps, and a damp, tousled, shower fresh, sleepy-looking, naked Jimmy headed into their living room and sat on the sofa next to her.

“Hey. You’re alive.”

He flashed her a dopy grin. “Apparently.” Then he snuggled in close to her. “You going up soon?”

“That’s the plan. You gonna stick around and sleep with me.”

He kissed her neck. “That’s my plan. Allan and I are off until tomorrow. Everyone’s catalogued, double checked, and stored somewhere.”

“Good.” She turned her face toward him, and kissed him gently. “You up for anything other than sleeping?”

He grinned again, much less dopy this time. “Kind of hoping.” Her hand skittered down his damp skin. He’d been working more than twenty-four hours straight, generally that means he’ll come home a little smelly, but not intolerable. If he was just looking to sleep, he’d have held off on the shower until the morning.

She grinned back at him, standing up, offering him a hand, and he took it, kissing her fingers and wrist. “Probably won’t be too energetic.”

“I can deal. First day of my fertile period, maybe if we have some slow, laid back, lazy sex, we’ll end up with a quiet, low key kid.”

Jimmy laughed at that.

And it was sweet, and slow, and gentle, with soft words and soft kisses. And Breena appreciated the extra build, the supple, slick glide that goes along with fertile period sex, where her body’s working on making a new body.

And after, they drowsed off, tucked under the blankets, in their normal sleeping position.

When she woke up on Friday, Tim and Abby were sacked out next to her, and Jimmy was already up and moving around, getting ready for an early start.

She doesn’t remember which afternoon it was that she got home, put her girls down for their naps, (Kelly was at Tim and Abby’s with Heather.) and settled in to go over the books.

She does know she jumped almost a foot off the chair when she heard her door open, at a time she wasn’t expecting anyone, but a second later she heard, “Hey,” from Tim, and calmed back down.

“You gave me a start,” she said as he came into the kitchen, looking pooped.

“Sorry. Wrapped one case, nothing on deck that’s specifically mine, thought I’d head home and crash for a bit.” He didn’t look like he was about to crash. He was roaming around the kitchen, jittering, and Breena was wondering how much caffeine was in his system.

At the same time, he looked exhausted. “You look like you could use it.”

Tim nodded. His eyes, ringed with dark circles darted around the room, and the fingers on his left hand keep twitching, working on an invisible keyboard.

Breena had heard about this level of caffeinated/exhausted Tim, but she hadn’t seen it before. “Uh… can you actually crash right now, or if you hop into bed, are you just going to vibrate and stare at the ceiling?”

A sheepish, and overly-caffeinated look crosses Tim’s face. “Uh… I didn’t think you’d be home for a few hours.”

“I get home every day at one. Then I work here while the girls nap.” She thought Tim knew that.

“It’s after one?”

She nodded, seeing the problem. “Yeah. What was your plan?”

He gave her a half-hearted grin. “Shower, take care of myself, and sleep. That’ll usually do it for me when I’ve been awake too long.”

“Ah…” Breena nods at that. She knows Jimmy’ll do something like that when he’s been on so long he’s having a hard time turning off, too.

And, while it was true that she didn’t remember precisely which afternoon she and Tim had that conversation, she does remember what she did next, which was think through how long of a fertile window she had left, and what the likelihood of getting any sex from Tim in the next few days was. “You going straight back after you wake up?”

“Eat, kiss the girls, and back, yeah. My inbox will be full again by then.”

Breena nodded. She stood up, grabbed Tim by the hand. His eyebrow raised at that, and she said, “I’d like to have sex with you at least once this fertile period, and I thought you wanted that, too.”

The light dawned on Tim, and he nodded, still looking jittery and sheepish. “God, yes. Just…”

“Yeah. I know. Five minutes if I’m lucky.”

He looked a bit more chagrined. “Maybe three.”

“You can make it up to me later.”

Tim kissed her, fast, and deep, tasting of coffee and fried nerves. “I will do that.”

And yes, both Breena and Tim had had significantly better times on their own, and together, but it got the job done. At least, it put Tim to sleep. No way to know if any other jobs got done for a while, yet.

The fact of the matter is that an egg is not viable for all that long. It pops out, meanders down the tubes, and if it doesn’t hook up with a sperm at some point during that meander, or, even if it does, but it doesn’t find a nice place to land and set up housekeeping in the womb, that’ll mean no baby that month.

So, it’s true that Ms. Egg is only on the stage for twenty-four hours.

However, sperm are a bit more… goal oriented, so they stick around longer, if given the chance.
Most women will produce a rather nice mix of fluids to help Mr. Sperm find Ms. Egg, and they start doing that anywhere up to a week before Ms. Egg makes her grand debut.

So, while it is possible that when the temperature drops and it’s ovulation day, that the sex that goes with ovulation day may produce the sperm that gets to the egg, it’s also possible that the quickie two days earlier got the job done, or four days earlier, the relaxed shag in bed before falling asleep did the job.

The point of this is, that a fairly sexually active woman who is not using a barrier form of birth control will, assuming she has sex at least once a week and her partner produces healthy sperm, have enough sperm wandering about her system to find Ms. Egg, whether she has sex on ovulation day or not.

Breena, with two husbands and a very pregnant co-wife certainly qualifies a ‘fairly sexually active.’ (If not a good bit beyond that.)

Which is a good thing because the only one of her spouses on the scene of her actual ovulation day was the one who cannot, physically, get her pregnant.

So, as her body does what it does, and releases an egg, that may or may not have hooked up with the sperm in her system, and may or may not have found a nice place to land in her uterus, Breena enters what Jimmy refers to as the Schrodinger’s Pregnancy period.

Ten more days before she can take a pregnancy test and find out.

January 1st might make for ringing in a very Happy New Year.

It’s also true, as Breena’s in the Schrodinger’s Pregnancy period, that she’s kind of hoping it’s Tim’s sperm that gets there.

And not because she wants his kid more than Jimmy’s, she’s indifferent on that matter. Either of them, doesn’t matter, she loves the idea.

No, it’s a much more practical reason. One Abby shared with her. Namely morning sickness is a combination of the lady in question’s body chemistry, and the guy’s DNA trying to make sure that it gets the best possible chance at producing a live baby.

The point of morning sickness is to make sure Mama doesn’t eat anything that might damage baby. If Mama’s healthy, she can coast on her own body weight until the most delicate period for baby is over, and baby will be just fine. So, the guy’s DNA part of the mix can get very aggressive (biochemically) about making sure that his baby doesn’t run into anything nasty while it’s gestating away in there.

And it does this by making sure that anything that could poison little dude gets thrown up long before it could be a problem.

Three times now Breena’s puked and puked and puked and lost weight and had no energy and felt like shit for months because Jimmy’s DNA is extremely aggressive about making sure his offspring don’t get poisoned, and she’s really hoping, seeing how little morning sickness Abby had, that Tim’s DNA is a bit more laid-back on the _don’t poison me_ front, and will allow her to experience a pregnancy where she’s not constantly keeping barf bags on her person.

Abby did mention that, of course, her own chemistry is a big part of this, too, and it might just be that her body really doesn’t like pregnancy hormones, but… with a new sperm donor, being pregnant might suck a hell of a lot less for her.

She can hope, at least.

“So… what’s your gut saying?” Abby says to Breena as they eat dinner together, without the guys, on the night of the 21st.

Breena just shrugs. “It’s at most one day. No way to know.”

“I’m not asking _know_; I’m asking _feel_!” For the first time in a while, Abby’s looking really happy. Probably because they’ve been ordered to quit work tomorrow evening, and stay quit until the 26th. So, not only will they finally get some real rest, it’s also almost time to get into Merry Christmas Mode!

Plus, Sean dropped yesterday, which means she can _breathe_ again, and that’s making her a lot happier about life in general.

Add in possible new baby on top of that, and she’s in a really good mood.

Breena inclines her head, in a somewhat less good mood. Yes, this weekend is going to be awesome, but they had an awful case today, a burial for a toddler, and those cases always kill her. “I’m not feeling it.”

“Really?”

Breena shrugs again. “Never got pregnant first try out before. Why would this time be any different?”

Abby gives her a naughty grin. “I got pregnant first time. Maybe…”

“Yeah. Maybe. We’ll see. I didn’t think I was pregnant with Anna, not really, until I started puking.”

Abby gets that, and gets what Breena doesn’t say. How Anna was something of a special case, and not really believing it was part of a defense mechanism. So, she shift the topic a little. “The killer part is how every little thing makes you wonder. Is that gas or is my body changing? Wait, am I tired because I had a long day, or is Baby starting to suck the life out of me?”

Breena chuckles at that. “Did I eat something my system doesn’t like or is this morning sickness day one?” Breena nods at that. “Yeah. And yeah, feeling it or not, I’m going to be doing that until my period shows up again, or doesn’t.”

Abby squeezes her hand.

They eat for a moment, and then Breena says, “So… what’s your gut saying?”

“That I can have one more bite of dinner, bringing my total up to six bites before I’m full.”
Breena gives her the quit playing look.

Abby shakes her head. “I’m not feeling it, either. Was kind of hoping you’d be feeling it and…”

Breena nods. “Yeah. I get it.”

“Just means more fun next time.”

“Assuming we aren’t all completely exhausted because little boy here decided to show up for next cycle’s fertile week.”

Abby pokes Sean. “You make sure to let your little brother get in the works. Hear that?”

She looks awfully surprised to get a series of quick kicks back. Breena sees her look shocked, and then watches as her stomach bulges under her goth-Christmas-t-shirt. (Skeleton reindeer pulling a bone sleigh with Santa Death sitting in it.)

“I guess we take that as a yes?”

Abby makes an amused face and says, “That’s how I’m reading it.”

Breena takes another bite of her dinner. “Little brother?”

Abby nods, smile on her lips. “Might not be feeling him in the works, yet, but I know he’s a he.”

Breena touches Sean’s bump. “Yeah. I think you’ll be getting a little brother, too.”

On the 22\(^{\text{nd}}\), all three of her spouses are home, at once, and all three of them are tired enough that after dinner, they all crash.

Breena’s not exhausted, so, after doing her nightly rounds, (every night she makes sure the girls are all properly tucked in and sleeping) she heads downstairs, turns on one of her playlists, and settles in with her account books.

Time to make sure that Palmer and Slater’s has everything on order that it’s going to need from March to June.

And, she’d have to admit, feeling it or not, boring work or not, she does wonder, and feel a little spur of joy, when half an hour into it, her eyes are drooping.

So, she heads up, goes through her own bedtime routine, and slips into bed, finally hearing all the sleepy time sounds that mean home to her.
The Night Before The Night Before

Tim supposes that they should be up bright and early on the 23rd, get the girls all packed up, and the presents, and then off to the House to make merry and get ready for their first Christmas in their family home.

And, he’ll admit, that about 6:55, he did open one eye, look around Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom, aware of the sound of Abby in the bathroom, and the feel of Jimmy’s arm against his back, and for a good second he thought about getting up and getting a start on the day, but then the toilet flushed, and Abby came back to bed, soft and sleepy in his arms, and he thought fuck it, and went back to sleep for four more hours.

There was something Tim had been hoping for when he drifted back to sleep at about 6:58 in the morning. Namely, it’s been a long time since he’s gotten any real loving in, and Abby was all warm and soft in front of him, and Jimmy was behind him, and he was certainly starting to feel almost frisky (in a rather passive, sleepy, how-about-I-roll-onto-my-back-and-you-take-care-of-me sort of way) as sleep stole over him again, filling his mind with some rather lovely dreams.

Unfortunately, for the sake of making those dreams come true, when he woke up again at almost eleven, the only other person in the bed was Jimmy, and while it’s true Jimmy was in his dreams, in the dreams he wasn’t the one Tim was fucking.

Tim rolls away from Jimmy with a groan, and a very hard erection. The noise and the sudden lack of a warm body pressed to his side wakes Jimmy up. He blinks a few times, feeling out of sorts. He’s slept too long, his dreams, the somewhat confused images that tend to fill his mind when he’s overly tired, and it’s about time for him to get another snack, so his blood sugar is starting to slip, are all combining to make him feel off.

So, he’s not being overly attentive to Tim. He’s paying attention to the mug of chai (mostly spiced, warm milk, not too much tea) and the handful of almonds that Breena has sitting on his nightstand for him.

Tim, meanwhile, isn’t entirely sure what to do with himself. He knows exactly what he’d be doing if he was alone, or if one of the girls had been in the bed. But, even though Jimmy’s… Jimmy, he’s not entirely comfortable jerking off while Jimmy munches down his mid-morning snack two feet away.

Finally, after a few bites of food, and several gulps of his chai make Jimmy start to feel human again, he notices that Tim’s just sort of lying next to him, staring at the ceiling, looking really pensive, with his hands very carefully on top of the blankets, crossed over his chest.

“You okay?”

That jerks Tim out of whatever’s going on in his head. (Namely, what the hell is the protocol for getting off when you’re alone with the spouse you don’t find sexually desirable?)

“Uh.” Tim swallows. “Yeah.” He shakes his head a bit as an idea finally hits. “Shower.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes. He knows what Tim’s looking to do. Hard not to. Not with the way the sheet was tenting, and the erection that’s leading the way to the shower as Tim heads in that direction isn’t subtle. It’s very much not normal, gotta pee, morning wood.

“Leave it alone,” Jimmy says as Tim’s getting out of bed. “The girls have plans for you tonight.”

Tim stops, two feet away from the bed. Several thoughts hit him at once, and they all sort of flow out together. “Tonight? That’s hours from now?” (he sounds a little whiny on that bit) “What plans? Why just for me? And you know, why?”

Jimmy smiles at him. He’s been in on this Christmas plan (originally Birthday plan, but that didn’t happen) for a while, now. “Just remember. If you shake it more than twice, you’re playing with yourself.”

Tim rolls his eyes, muttering about how he’s going to end up squirting the damn ceiling if he even tries to pee like this, hoping that the shower will help him deflate, because Jimmy’s comment is reminding him that he does have to pee in addition to being horny, and wondering if there’s going to be anything even remotely distracting enough today to keep him from being a horny jackass.

Fortunately, getting to the house, there are indeed distractions. Lots of them.

Jethro’s been making sure that furniture gets delivered, put in the right rooms, and working his way through some assembly.

As of yesterday, when Penny and Ducky got home, he’s had two extra sets of hands for that, too.

And, a good bit of the furniture in question came already assembled, and just had to be deposited on top of the Post-It Notes tagging where it goes. Or part of the price of having it delivered involved getting it assembled, and then deposited onto said Post-It Note, so it’s not like they’re walking into a house full of unpacked Ikea boxes, but… there’s still a lot of assembling left to do. (Attaching drawer pulls, putting books onto shelves, getting cushions in place, and in a few cases, actually putting furniture together. Ziva and Tony have a rocking chair in their room that had ‘some assembly required’ on the write up, that apparently was code for ‘you’re getting a box of wood and screws.’)

There’s getting the place ready to live in. Making sure all the beds have sheets, there are towels and soap in the bathrooms, glasses and plates put away in the kitchen, all of those little details that go into making a house functional.

There’s the Christmas grocery run, which needs to be planned and executed. And not just the food for the feast, which they’ve been collecting for a while, but little things like cream for the coffee, (Hell, coffee for the coffee. Yes, Gibbs has the kitchen stocked with the blend he and Abbi drinks, but in that the rest of this crew won’t touch that unless it’s at least ½ milk, it’d be a good plan to get some coffee they drink, and tea, real tea, not ‘tea dust’ for Ducky,) or butter to go on toast, and a toaster to make the toast in. They’re lacking the kind of staples that people generally don’t think much about until it’s too late. Say, 7:30 in the morning, and little girls are looking for their Cheerios, which is when the memory of a total lack of yellow Cheerio boxes in the grocery cart hits.

Babies looking for Cheerios isn’t happening on Pop’s watch. So, grocery planning is happening with Marine thoroughness and precision.

On top of that, there’s decorating. In the basic sense of put up pictures and add knick-knacks to make the place look lived in and in the less basic sense of decking the halls with boughs of holly.

It’s going to be a busy day.
The McPalmer branch gets home a bit after lunch.

So, first up on the list of “distractions” is getting little girls into a mindset where they might possibly be willing to sleep in this new place.

This means exploration time for them. Toddlers cannot be dropped into a new place and expected to sleep until they are comfortable in that new place. They get into the house, say their hellos to everyone, and, though it’s not the first time the girls have been here, it is the first time they’ve been here since it’s looked like an actual house on the inside.

Tim and Jimmy put baby gates up on the stairs, and then... “Okay, you can run around. Go check everything out,” Jimmy says.

Molly and Kelly are just standing in the main room, staring at this huge space. It’s loud, and bustling with people all moving around doing stuff. It’s almost too much new. Little pink lips are almost on the verge of quivering at this onslaught of new. Fortunately, there are some well-beloved old things, too, and Ducky takes Molly by the hand, lifting Anna in his other arm, as Penny picks up Kelly, and walks them around the house. (Mona trailing happily behind. She’s also enjoying finally being invited in to explore, too.)

Cuddled in Ducky and Penny’s arms, with Duck’s soft burr and Penny’s higher notes explaining where they are, and what’s around them, and who’s rooms are where, the girls start to relax and settle in.

Giving the girls some time to explore buys their parents a few minutes to check on their nursery. Abby and Jimmy sigh with relief when they get in there. Both cribs are put together and pretty much in the right spots. And Molly’s bed is tucked into the corner, looking ready to go. (Of all the furniture in the house, these are the pieces Gibbs paid the most attention to. Yes, he’d prefer the kids were all in beds he made, but, at the rate this is going, with a crib for Sean needing to get done fast, and more than a few other projects with looming due dates, he admitted that buying cribs made sense. He did hover, annoying the workmen, making sure they put them together right.)

All they have to do now is get sheets, pillows, blankets, and much loved stuffed animals onto those beds, and little girls will have their napping place set to go.

Tim and Breena come in, suitcases in hand, and that was all they needed.

It takes about ten minutes to get the room all set up. Molly’s got her bed in the corner furthest from the door, her little stuffed corgi, loved into matted, grayish, vaguely-dog-shaped lump, on her pink pillow. Kelly and Anna’s cribs are both on the opposite wall. Kelly has the cream colored crib, and her pet stuffed skull is ready to be snuggled up with. Anna has the coral crib, and as of this point, she doesn’t much care for stuffed animals. She does have a favorite blanket, which Jeannie made for her, and that’s in her crib.

On the far wall, between Molly’s bed and Kelly’s crib are three boxes for storing toys, and a low bookshelf, currently pretty empty, but there is a copy of the Night Before Christmas and Goodnight Moon on it. In the middle of the room is a large rocking chair, with room for a grown up and a few little girls. There’s a dresser with three large drawers next to the door, one for each girl. No changing table, because all three girls are at the point where it’s easier to change diapers with them lying on the floor or standing up.

And all of it is in shades of cream, pink, and coral.

Ducky leads the girls down the hall, toward their room, telling them that they’re about to see their room, and how everyone has a room here.

“Mona?” Kelly asks, twisting in Penny’s arms to see the dog walking along side of them.

“Mona shares Pop’s room,” Penny replies.

“Mona can sleep with us,” Molly adds.

“Yes!” Kelly says, very definite.

Anna gurgles in what appears to be an appreciative manner.

Mona’s not paying too much attention to this conversation, as she’s sniffing every inch of the hallway.

When they get into the room, and Penny and Ducky put the girls down, letting them explore the much smaller, and easier to deal with space, on their own. Mona apparently approves of the idea of this being a sleeping place for her. She hops up into the rocking chair, looks a little startled when it shifts under her weight, tentatively turns around a few times on the cushion, and flops down for a nap of her own.

It does take about twenty minutes longer than usual to get the girls down, but eventually they determine that all of their stuffies are where they’re supposed to be, and the soothing sound of Mona’s tiny snore helps them settle in.

(After all, as Tim points out after reading Goodnight Moon for the third time, if Mona can sleep in here, they can, too.)

Tim’s the last one out, quietly closing the door behind him, and then heads across the room to Jimmy and Breena’s space. No one else is in there, but he still stops for a moment to look around.

It’s done.

Soft, cool beachy colors. The off white furniture goes along with the colors in the room to make the whole place feel tropical. (Though the snowflakes he can see flurrying down through the windows are doing their best to negate the tropical feel.)

He flops onto the bed for a moment, just to get the feel of it. Firm, springy, a sinfully soft and fluffy microfiber plush blanket under his hands. Yeah, he approves.

“Feeling lazy?” Jimmy asks, heading in, carrying an extra two pillows, placing them at the head of the bed.

“Just testing it out. Gonna do it in my room in a minute.” Tim sits up and smooths out the blanket.
Jimmy smiles at that. “First thing I did, too.”

Tim nods, heading toward his room, getting ready to be useful.

If Jimmy and Breena’s room is the tropical get away overlooking the beach, his room is the dark, sultry harem, a gem of forbidden pleasures hidden away behind walled gardens.

It might not be done, not yet, but it feels right. It even smells right. (Though he notices that Abby’s got a cone of incense burning, which is likely why it smells right.)

Breena’s tucking the sheets, rich, satiny, amethyst, around the extra-large, low to the floor mattress. Abby’s unboxing and fluffing the scores of jewel-toned pillows. He looks around, seeing that the gauzy curtains that will flow around the bed from the ceiling haven’t been put up yet, and he goes off in search of the box holding them, and a step ladder.

Breena’s noticed, as she’s been working on getting the house set up. First their rooms, and then more of the house in general, that Gibbs keeps popping up and snagging her spouses. But not her.

She doesn’t know what those three are up to, but she’s sure it’s for her.

She smiles at that, happily humming, It’s beginning to look a lot like Christmas, as she and Penny get the Gibbs Clan crest up on the chimney.

Gibbs has been stealing Breena’s loves.

He may have been heavily involved in designing and figuring out how to put her ring together, but those three are going to make the real one.

So, one by one, he’s grabbed them, taken them to the boat house, and showed them the different stages of the prototypes he’s built.

First step is cutting the blank. Each blank is six inches long by 3/4ths of an inch square. The first set of cuts is to split it down the middle lengthwise.

Gibbs loves hand tools. That doesn’t mean he doesn’t have any electric ones. Sometimes, a power tool is the right tool for the job, and if the job is trying to get a ring done in less than a day, power tools come in handy.

So, he’s got his jig saw set, along with a guide. It’s a very easy first cut. Put the blank in the guide, turn on the saw, grab the pusher, and gently push the blank until it’s split.

Next cut, and again he’s got guides for this. He’s sure that all three of them have steady hands and can likely do this without a guide, but this close to wanting it done, and with this little room for error, he’s not taking any chances. Next cut, both the cut sides get stacked on top of each other, and the blank gets cut into six two inch by 3/8ths sections.

Then comes the tricky cuts. Miter box time. Angling the cuts so that all three pieces will slant into each other and form a triangle took Gibbs a bunch of tries to work out. He knew how to do it for a square, could see that pretty easy, but a triangle took some trial and error. Eventually, he got it, and he stands there in the boathouse, with each of them, showing how to slot each tiny bit of wood into the miter box, and this time, they use a small hand saw.

Gibbs finds it interesting to watch the three of them working at this. Tim, for example, didn’t need to be talked through how to set the angels. He, apparently, could see the damn things in his head (which would have been handy when Gibbs was working through the prototype. Alas, Tim doesn’t know that everyone else can’t, automatically, see how to slant the cuts to make them do what he wants them to.) But, he’s shaky on the cutting side of it, taking probably twice as long to get a good straight cut than either of his spouses.

Jimmy, on the other hand, needs help getting the wood into the miter box right. He can’t see the angles in his head. He knows what they need to do, but how to make them happen… Not part of what he can do. He can, on the other hand, whip through the cutting with ease. Once he’s got his bits of wood set, he just zips through cutting them. Apparently, years of going through bone means he’s pretty handy with a saw.

Abby’s the easy one. She can see how the angles work and does enough physical work with her hands that getting straight even cuts only takes one practice shot for her.

By the time the girls are awake, there are two, glued and clamped, triangles. After dinner, they’ll drill them, cut the circle, and hopefully, get it on the lathe.

Gibbs and Abby are heading back in from the boat house when Abby says to him, “So, I’m hearing rumors that Abbi might be in for a very Merry Christmas.”

Gibbs grins and nods, satisfied pride radiating off of him. “Got it done day before yesterday.”

Abby beams at him, and both of them watch as the last car pulls into their driveway.

“Speak of the devil… I mean, not that Abbi’s the devil… Uh…”

“We’re good Abbs. Go in, warm up.”

“You gonna go warm her up?”

Gibbs smiles again, waves, and heads off through the fine snowfall to Abbi’s car.

He’s standing by the side of the driveway when she parks, looking happy to see her.

“Hi,” Abbi says, stepping out, wrapping him in a hug and warm kiss.

“Hi, back. How was the drive?”

She nudges her snow tires. “Nothing I’m not used to. Little slippery, and some of the Virginia drivers are doing the annual dance of the snow morons,” He sighs at that. There’s something about Virginia drivers, they forget, every single year, how to drive in snow, even though, every single year, it snows in Virginia. “but, all in all, not too bad.”

“You’ve seen worse.”

“I grew up in Montana. They don’t even know what winter is out here.”

He nods at that, too. “So, you really off?”

She grabs her cell out of her pocket, and with gloved fingers, turns it off. “Omagi’s got the house number if anything blows up. Short of that, I’m really off until 08:00 Monday.”

Gibbs flashes her a big grin, grabs her go bag, and leads her into the house.

The warmth and light of the house after the cold dark of the driveway is almost blinding. It’s so bright. Apparently when Tim when through with the lighting schematic, he decided the house should be visible from Mars. Or maybe, as Abbi takes off her coat and looks around some, it’s just possible that some of merry makers in this crew decided that the house needed Christmas lights on the mantle, and on the banisters leading up to the second floor.

Add in the fire in the fireplace, and the regular lights, and it’s bright.

And loud! Little girls are running around, getting the lay of the land as Mona chases them, barking. Adults look evenly split between putting up pictures on the mantle and getting dinner ready. She can hear, dimly, symphonic Christmas music, so she’s guessing that’s Ducky’s addition to the noise.

Gibbs takes her coat, hanging it up in a packed full closet. (Hmmm… maybe they need a coat hanger or a rack or something, because thirteen sets of winter gear don’t fit well in a standard coat closet.) She kicks off her boots, placing them on the rug next to the door with the long line of boots ranging in size from Anna’s tiny, little mostly decorative knit, pink footie boots, to Tony’s size 12 work boots.

“Hey!” Breena sweeps over and hugs her. “Good! You made it. Lasagna’s just out of the oven. Dinner in ten, okay?”

Gibbs nods at Breena, taking Abbi’s hand, looking at her, eager to show off. “C’mon.” He tugs her gently toward the stairs.

He’s been sending pictures as he’s been getting their section done, but she hasn’t seen the grand reveal, yet, and Gibbs is eager to show it off.

Their section is on the third floor. Intentionally. His knees may not love all the stairs, but he does love quiet, and when he was looking at spots where their room could be, they had a choice between a section above the McPalmer wing, with lots of space, or take the top floor with the good windows, looking at the woods and, now in the winter, when the leaves are gone, the river. Given the option of listening into what’s likely to be loud, kinky sex (Though he did make sure there was extra sound-proofing in both the McPalmer wing, and his own area. Gibbs doesn’t want to hear his kids teasing him about being loud.) with lots of space, and a smaller space with a great view over the library section of the house, Gibbs told his knees to shut up and deal, and picked the smaller section on the top.

And now, as he’s taking Abbi up to finally see the space they designed together, his knees aren’t complaining at all. (He is a little short of breath, but it’s worth it.)
One thing he and Abbi agreed on, or had in common, is the fantasy of the little cabin in the woods, far off the beaten path to be out of the way, but close enough to the water to have a boat. (Ultimately, if it was just the two of them, some rocky, tree filled bit of the coast of Maine would be perfect, but there’s a lot to be said for being 1500 miles closer to your family.)

So, that’s what they built for themselves.

They ripped out the bit of attic above them, making their space high rather than wide. The whole inside has been done to look like exposed logs. Cool browns and blue-gray old wood. The floor is rustic, smoothed down wood, covered with a rag rug in front of the bed, and a fluffy, white sheepskin rugs on each side of the bed. Gibbs put in a gas fireplace for them, not quite what they were hoping for, but much easier than ripping a hole in the roof they just built to put a chimney in, across from their bed.

It doesn’t smell or sound right, but it’s warm and provides the right sort of light.

That bed is, this time of year, snuggly piled with thick blankets and quilts in blues and grays. White sheets and pillow cases peek out from behind those blankets.

Their bed is tucked under a loft, behind the ladder that leads up to it. Up there, there’s the slanted ceiling just below the roof, more exposed wood, two cushy, over-stuffed chairs, and an ottoman for foot resting.

Gibbs doesn’t love the furniture, not yet. It’s all decent, solid, inexpensive wood. It looks nice, and as long as the kids aren’t rough-housing up here, it’ll hold up okay. But his plan is to replace each piece (except the chairs and ottoman) with something made by his own hands.

Right now, with the lights on and the sun long down, the windows are just mirrors. But in the morning, they’ll have the view of the woods crusted in snow and a thin gleam of river flowing behind them.

Gibbs is standing in the doorway, watching Abbi looking around, huge smile on his face.

She finishes looking around and grins at him. “It’s home.”

He nods back, still smiling, “Yeah!”
Dinner for thirteen, at a table big enough for all of them, one booster seat, and two high chairs.

It’s the first meal they can remember where everyone has enough room that there’s no danger of sticking an elbow into someone else’s food or face.

Tony and Ziva ended up in charge of the meal, so it’s vegetarian lasagna, several loaves of savory garlic bread, huge piles of green salad, and strictly speaking, a bit more red wine than anyone needed.

And, it is the red wine, or specifically, who is drinking it, and who isn’t, that gets the speculation about possible Baby Palmer number four in the works. Because, of course, Breena does not know if she’s pregnant or not, and yes, it’s likely true that a glass of wine with dinner is unlikely to cause any harm if she is pregnant, but given her history, she’s not taking any chances. Any cycle she’s trying to get pregnant means no alcohol, no rare/raw meat or eggs, certain cheeses go off the list as well as certain sorts of fish, and granted, no one in this crew smokes, but if they did, they’d be exiled to the outer reaches of the house until her period started or she got to the second trimester.

Granted, with Molly at the table, and Breena and Jimmy’s history, that speculation is going to be happening behind closed doors, but Breena opting for a glass of cider instead of wine makes smiles that much brighter.

After dinner, Gibbs cuts out with Tim, Jimmy, and Abby, on some ‘last minute Christmas stuff’ which by this point everyone knows is code for ‘present for Breena, likely involving wood, probably a lathe…’

Both of his little triangle mock ups are nicely solid. Which means it’s drilling, cutting, and then lathe time.

Drilling goes fine. Abby’s got Breena’s ring size, and a little bit of googling lets them know what sized drill bit will go along with that. Gibbs grabs one just a tiny bit smaller, so they’ve got some wood they can finish off and not have the ring end up too big.

They fit the triangle into the drill, Abby presses it down, and in a minute the first cut that makes this look like something almost ringish is made.

Tim’s got the jigsaw for the circular cut, which makes Gibbs a little nervous. They’ve only got two of these, and if they both get muffed, there’s going to be a very long trek to get to the nearest mall for some last minute presenting.

But, he gets through the circular cut just fine. It’s a tad lopsided, but a few seconds on the lathe will take care of that.

And, though Tim wanted the lathe, Jimmy pointed out that using extreme delicacy with razor sharp tools is pretty much his day job, so maybe he’s the guy who should get the job where if you press too hard for a second with the blade you wreck the whole project.

Tim would have to admit that Jimmy has a point with that, and hands the chisel over as Gibbs shows them how to set up the lathe.

It is fun. The lathe is spinning. Jimmy barely touches the ring with his chisel and tiny tendrils of wood start spinning off. After what feels like less than a second, Gibbs stops him, and the lathe, and they look at it.

It’s a ring. Not finished yet. The wood is still a little rough, but it’s really a ring. Their ring. For Breena. Almost done.

They take turns on the sandpaper, each one doing a different grit, until the paper they’re working with feels almost smooth.

Abby looks up when they get to the second to last step. “Superglue?”

“I really works,” Gibbs replies, showing them how to use the superglue to finish the wood.

Jimmy drips a bit of it onto a cloth, and gets the lathe going again, rubbing it into the wood. This time when the lathe stops, the woods, flowing into each other, gleam.

One more sanding, one more layer of finish, and one last sand, and the outside is done.

The flip the ring, putting it into the chuck, and do it again for the inside.

Half an hour all told, and all that needs to happen is a bit more time to cure. Breena’s ring is done.

Tomorrow morning, one of them will smuggle it in, and at some point, tomorrow night, it’ll find a place in Breena’s Christmas stocking.

All four of them head back into the house, feeling giddy. This is the fantasy of Christmas they’ve all wanted.

They turn in pretty early.

Gibbs and Abbi have a certain look, and everyone in this group knows how to read that look. (A certain amount of smirking goes into wishing them a good night.) Ziva’s got the pregnant-and-in-need-of-sleep, look on her face. She’s fading fast, and Tony’s eager to break in smallish entertainment room they’ve got upstairs. Time to see if McTechy knew what he was talking about when he picked out the TV and sound system. He dangles his copy of The Man From UNCLE in front of Ducky and Penny, “Come on, you know you want to see it!”

Penny smiles at that, linking arms with Ducky and Tony. “You know, a long time ago I did have something of a crush on Illya. He was so mysterious,” she’s eyeing Ducky as she says it, thinking about some of the pictures of him they’ve put up on the mantle.

Ducky rolls his eyes at that, he’s been hearing about how much he looks like Illya Kuryakin for years now. “I never have seen the resemblance.”

Penny gives him a gentle shove.

Tim, Jimmy, Abby, and Breena, listen to them heading up, then they all look at each other, grinning, and head to their own section of the house.

Tim was sure they were going to spend the first night in their room, but, he’s sitting on Jimmy and Breena’s bed, as Abby fetches something out of the top dresser drawer.

It’s a box. A nice box. Maybe four inches on a side, white, with a black ribbon tied in a neat bow on top. Abby places it in his hands. Tim glances up from the box in his hands to the wide, wide grin on Abby’s face.

“Uh?” She’s still grinning. Jimmy and Breena, who have hopped onto the bed, are also grinning, too. “Abby?”

“Open it!”

“Okay… Um…” He’s tugging on the ribbon. “Not that I’m ever going to complain about presents, but… It’s December 23. What are we celebrating?”

“Your birthday, late.”

“Didn’t we do this last month?” They’d done their birthday celebration a month ago, when Gibbs and Abbi took the girls for the night.

She’s still grinning, and Breena and Jimmy have awfully happy looks, too.

“You weren’t up for this last month,” she says as he pulls out a length of black silk rope.

“Oh!” The grin spreads across his face as he remembers. It feels like fifty years ago, but it has only been a few months. The girls tied Jimmy up and played with him, and Tim wanted that, but he was too hurt for it. Abby promised him that on his birthday, he’d get to be the one tied up. And, of course, on his actual birthday, he worked until one, slept in the office, got home just long enough to grab a shower and change, and then back again.

Now he knows why they’re in Jimmy and Breena’s room. His and Abby’s bed is low mattress on the ground. There’s nothing to tie someone to in there. Jimmy and Breena’s bed is some sort of white coated metal. It has a beautiful headboard of vine-y twists and turns that offer almost endlessly customizable options for tying someone down.

He’s finally feeling rested again, he’s got a brand new bed with tons of tying options, black silk ropes in his lap, and a huge grin on his face.

“Baby!” Tim’s night just got a hell of a lot better. “What do you want me to do?”

Abby glances at the clock. “I want you in bed, in forty-five minutes, completely shaved bare, and ready to play.”

Tim licks his lips, feeling his dick starting to harden. “How ready?”

“All cleaned up, shaved bare…” Abby looks him up and down… “Collar and eyeliner.”

Tim thinks that through. He’s pretty fuzzy, well, for him, and he doesn’t think he can get it all done that fast. “Uh… Fifty minutes? Not sure I can get everything shaved and my eyes done.”
“Fifty minutes. Wrist cuff, too. You keep that on.”

“All right. Anything else? Scent?”

“I’ll lay it out for you,” Breena says.

It’s with a huge grin and a major spring in his step that Tim heads to the bathroom to get ready.

The Slater’s bathroom in North Carolina provided a lot of inspiration for their own bathroom.

It’s not quite a temple to all things water related, but it’s close. Most of the bath is in dark gray slate or brushed stainless steel. It’s very cool, very modern looking.

They set it up with two toilets, one on each side of the shower, tucked into their own little rooms for extra privacy. Across from the toilets and shower is a bank of three sinks with mirrors over them. The doors are on each side of the room, between the toilets and sinks, and all of it centers around the best part: the shower.

They had a lot of fun designing how they wanted it to work.

On the one end, opening into the bathroom, is a glass door. On the other end there’s frosted glass blocks to let in light from the outside window, a shelf for holding everything, and more dark gray slate. The sides are slate walls that have two shower heads each, and a bench for easy sitting, lounging, or storage.

In the middle of the ceiling are three more shower heads, pouring water straight down.

Tim managed to fit waterproof LEDs into a strip around the top, so it’s not dark in there.

When they were setting it up, Jimmy joked about that shower being bigger than his college dorm room. And, yes, it was a joke, but not by a whole lot. That shower is six by eight, plenty of room for all of them, and the dorm room in question was eight by ten.

And now, Tim gets to turn as many of those faucets on as he likes, and have at it.

He’s gotten the first step of “cleaning up” done, as well as running the trimmers over all of the hair below his eyelashes, and is in the shower, rinsing off, splashing away with glee at this much hot water just pouring over him from all directions in all sorts of different patterns (yes, they got the showerheads that offer different water settings), getting ready to shave everything, when Jimmy knocks and steps into the bathroom.

“Hey.”

“They send you to clean up, too?” Tim asks from his spot on the bench in their shower.

“Nope. I’m… researching.”

Tim has to think about that. He’s not sure if he heard that right. He turns off all but one of the faucets, which makes it a lot easier to hear in there, and then Tim turns around, so he’s facing Jimmy, wondering what the hell Jimmy needs to research.

Jimmy’s a dull shape through the fogged glass of the door, but with most of the faucets off, he’s significantly more audible. “Keep shaving, you didn’t get a time extension.”

Tim props his foot back up on the bench and gets working on taking the hair off his toes and feet. “What are you researching?”

“Okay, remember when they tied me up, it was just the girls playing with me. You were mostly watching.”

“Yeah.” Tim does remember that, fondly. He had a good time that night. Jimmy had a better one, but… Well, he’s got the good time coming for him tonight.

“And… okay. I know I’ve asked you not to Dom me.”

He remembers that, too, as he rinses off the razor, and starts on his right leg.

“Okay…”

“Can I help with running you? If it’s not cool, I’ll just watch, and get myself off, but…”

Tim’s eyebrows shoot up. “Are you asking if you can Dom me?”

“More like can I help them do it, and maybe… offer suggestions.”

His lips purse as he thinks about that. “What kind of suggestions are you thinking?”

Jimmy’s silent for a second and Tim inserts him shrugging into his mental image of Jimmy leaning back against the sinks, looking in his general direction. (He can’t really see more than a bluish outline through the fog.) “I don’t know. But… I mean… They’re both really good at this, but… I’ve got a more… concrete… idea of what dicks like than they do.”

Tim thinks about that. “True…”

“Not saying they don’t know how to play you, but… They were suggesting that if there was something that I thought you might really like… something they didn’t come up with…”

“Oh. Uh… Yeah, sure, chime in.” Tim licks his lips, feeling a quick flush of gratitude that he can’t see Jimmy all that well right this second. He’s thinking about the bigger question there, and he’s not sure how that’s making him feel. So, for right now, as he’s feeling a bit confused, the fog between them is nice. “Would you want to Dom me?”

He’s not sure what Jimmy’s doing out there, but his voice sounds a little startled as he says, “What?”

“Like… I mean… Uh… Shit.” Tim doesn’t know what he means, not really. He stops shaving for a moment to collect his thoughts. “Okay… I still don’t want to have sex with you.” He knows that part, though he’d be hard pressed, right now, to define where the line between sex and not sex is for him and Jimmy. Probably, like not really wanting to jerk off with him two feet away, the line has something to do with sex where the girls aren’t around. “But… It’s about trust, and release, and putting yourself in someone else’s hands, knowing they’ll do you right. So… Yeah. You want to Dom me, sure. I call you James, the game stops, but… Yeah. Just like Breena and Abby, you can play with me.”
Jimmy’s touched by the trust implicit in that statement, but he’s also wondering what Tim means by it. From what he’s seen of this with Abby, this aspect of the relationship might be based in trust and respect, but it’s also entirely sexual. Jimmy licks his lips, thinking hard. “If I were to Dom you, what would I do with you?”

That’s the crux of the question for Tim, too. “I don’t know. Anything you want. Live action porn? Or like you were saying, if you’ve got something the girls aren’t seeing, sure, have at it.”

“Okay…” That helps some, but it’s not precisely clearing up the issue for Jimmy. “Am… I having at it, or getting them to have at it?”

Tim shrugs, but Jimmy can’t really see that. “Would you want to have at it?”

“Uh… probably not,” there aren’t a ton of situations Jimmy can think of off the top of his head where he’d rather do, whatever it is, than have the girls do it. But he can think of some, especially if part of what he’s doing is turning the girls on, too. “But it’s not impossible.”

“If you’re running the game, delegating, or not, that’s up to you.”

“Yeah, I know, but…”

That but hangs there for a moment as both of them try to figure this out. Finally Tim says, “If you want to do it yourself. Like… doing it yourself would be sexy, make you or me feel good, or you think the girls really want to see it, or… I don’t know, you don’t want to try to explain it to them or… just… whatever. Sure, have at it yourself. I mean…” Tim opens the door, looking Jimmy in the face, gesturing with his fingers to come in. “Get in here. I’m not having this conversation without looking at you.”

Jimmy strips off fast, while Tim keeps shaving, and is in the shower a moment later, sitting on the opposite bench, turning another one of the faucets on. After all if they have multiple jets he might as well get some hot water, too.

“You do your armpits?” he asks once he’s got his water to the temperature he likes, seeing Tim going after his underarms.

“She said bare, not just pubes. I’ve done this before.”

“Wow, okay…” Jimmy’s eying Tim’s body, which is getting more naked by the second, as he shaves his right armpit. “God, that’s got to itch like hell.”

Tim half shrugs. “Not too bad, at least, I’ve never done them on their own, and compared to my balls growing back in, I just can’t feel ‘em. And… it’s kind of stupid, deodorant goes on better without the hair.”

Jimmy nods like that makes sense to him. “So… you mean…” Jimmy’s getting them back on topic. The clock’s ticking down, so…

“So… I don’t have to ask Abby’s permission to touch her, you know? Or Breena’s. I just do, and if they don’t like whatever it is, they tell me, and we do something else. That’s how they play with me, too, and you, right?”

Jimmy nods along. “Yeah.” They’ve talked about this some, before. For the sake of this relationship, bodies are community property, everyone gets to play, but the person in the body gets final say on what’s going on.
“Okay, so you’re part of that deal. Something looks good, sure, try it. You know my hard lines, don’t step over them, at least, not without asking first. I’ve got no problem telling you ‘no’ if I don’t like something.”

Jimmy nods at that. “That’s… We’ve talked about that, so that’s part of it, kind of but… It’s the being in charge part of it. If you want to, if you see something, sure, you can play with me, that’s not the issue. I’m not comfortable with you running me. Maybe, I will be eventually, but right now, that’s too…” Jimmy lets it trail off, trying to think of a way to describe it.

“Femme?”

“Yeah. No… I don’t know. Maybe?”

Tim sniggers at that as he finishes up with his right armpit. “He says to the guy shaving all of his hair off.”

“Okay, yeah, irony. Anyway. That’s more what I’m asking about than…” he trails his hand up Tim’s hip as Tim stands up and starts going after his pubes.

Tim inclines his head, understanding, rinsing off his razor. “Uh… Look, I don’t have a problem taking orders. I worked for Gibbs for how long? And, especially a scene like this, being told what to do, or having control taken away, that’s the selling point.”

“I get that part of it. I like it just fine when the girls are doing it. But… I’ve had every other guy around me give me orders, but you. You don’t give me orders. I kind of like keeping it that way.”

“Oh.” Tim stops shaving for a second and nods at Jimmy. “I can get that. But… that’s just not part of what’s in my head. So, sure, you want to run things, go for it. I’m good.”

“Really?” Jimmy’s not sure about this being lopsided between them.

“Yeah. If it’s weird, I’ll tell you to cut it out, and go back to the girls running the show, but I don’t think it’ll be weird.”

Jimmy hangs out with Tim as he finishes up shaving. He even gives him a hand by putting the collar on him while he does his eyes, thus saving a few seconds. Which was a good thing, because Tim hit the bed at 49:42, which was cutting it a lot closer than he likes for this sort of mission.

When he hops onto the bed, Breena’s lighting candles around the room, and wearing nothing but a string of pearls and a smile.

Tim smiles, too. He remembers what she did to Jimmy with those pearls, and what he’d like her to do to him with them. Abby’s in the corner, naked, getting some music going. It’s soft and syncopated. No voice, but at least two saxophones. Tim approves.

He sees the bottle of Satyr on his nightstand, and asks, “Shall I put it on?”

“Yes, little bit, just on your wrists and neck,” Breena answers.

“It’s pretty whiffy right out of the bottle.”

“That’s okay. Put a little on Jimmy, too.”
Jimmy steps over to him. “How whiffy?”

Tim drips a tiny bit on Jimmy’s wrist, and he winces. “This better be the world record holder for ‘smells different on skin than it does in the bottle.’”

Tim nods. “On me, at least, it really is.” Tim finishes rubbing it from wrist to neck, though he’s wondering if he really wants this scent stuck to his collar.

He doesn’t have long to think. Abby turns to him, and curls a finger at him, drawing him to Jimmy’s dresser.

“Take a look. I want you to pick one out.” She has three toys laid out. His prostate massager, a string of anal beads, and the strap-on.

Tim swallows hard, his dick beginning to lengthen just at the idea of what’s going to happen tonight. “Oh. Good choices.”

Abby kisses the back of his neck, sniffing appreciatively, the scent’s already shifting, adding to the mood, as her hands settle on his hips. “Yes. What are you in the mood for, my pretty boy?”

Tim picks up the beads. It’s been a long time since they’ve played with them, and Jimmy and Breena have never seen them in action. “I was thinking that’s what Breena was planning on doing with the pearls.”

“No.” Abby kisses him, stroking his face, looking into black-rimmed, bright green eyes. “Wrong sort of fiber on the string. Not risking the cord snapping. We’re not ending tonight in the ER.”

“Thanks.”

“They just look pretty,” Breena adds. She’s leaning against her dresser, Jimmy in front of her, petting her hands down his back and sides, both of them watching Tim choose.

“And might feel good on my dick.”

“They will,” Jimmy says. At least, they had on his. They aren’t real pearls, but they’re good quality fakes, and they feel awfully nice lubed up and sliding over sensitive skin in a good firm grasp.

Abby takes the beads from Tim, twirling them around her fingers. They’re hard red plastic on a soft plastic cord, each one about the size of a nickel. The far end has a ring to make it easy to keep a hold of them, even with lubed fingers, plus it’s large enough to make sure the beads don’t get “sucked in.”

Tim grins at her playing with them, very, very pleased at where this is going to go tonight.

“On the bed?”

“Yep. On your back. Hands and legs spread.”

He lays down, assuming the position. “Talking?” he asks, as Abby trails the black rope up his hairless leg, raising goosebumps on his skin.

“If you like.”

“You know I like.”

“Yes, I do.” She knots the first rope to Jimmy and Breena’s headboard, and begins looping it around Tim’s hand and wrist. Right now, she’s on his left, the side that didn’t get hurt, so she uses familiar knots, weaving rope between his fingers, around his wrist, making sure to get a good firm knot over his wrist, and then wraps the rope down his arm. “Lift up a bit,” and he does, so she can get the rope under his back, and started on his right. She takes more care with his right arm, making sure to keep the ropes off his shoulder and wrist. He’s got the knot at his elbow on his right side, with the rope just gently looped around his wrist.

They both know how to play the game well enough that he can clench his hand on the rope, or struggle as he likes, without putting too much stress on the parts of him that are still healing.

Abby then tucks a pillow under his head so he can have a better view of what’s about to come. Breena shifts the closet door a bit, so the mirror on it also gives him a great view of the bed. Abby trails the second rope down his chest, letting it barely touch his skin, just waking up his nerves, letting him know something good is about to come.

Tim purrs at that, arching into the caress.

His right foot is the one that didn’t get hurt, so she starts there, knotting the rope to the footboard, and then wrapping it into a cuff for Tim’s ankle. From there she loops it up his leg, wrapping it nice and snug. Mostly this is for how it looks, the part on his ankle’s what holding him. This bit up his leg just looks cool.

And feels nice. Silk on his skin, Tim likes that.

“She pats his hips and he does. Abby snugs the rope under his butt, and then wraps it over his hips, tying it back to the footboard. Not only can he not move his right leg, he also can’t scoot to the left.

He grins at that, too. She’s making sure he’s tied down, good.

She does a similar knot on his left, though this one is tied on his calf and knee. It probably won’t stay on as well as the ankle knot on his right will, but, like with his right arm, some concessions have to be made to still-healing joints.

Abby’s humming to herself, along with the music as she looks her work over. Breena’s getting pictures of it, Tim all stretched out and covered in knots, Jimmy’s pulled the armchair over, settling in to watch, and Tim’s feeling excellent.

“Ready to play?” Abby asks.

“Oh yeah!” he answers, eyes gleaming. Abby’s got him tied down, good, and his body loves it. He’s secure, can’t really move, black silk striping his skin. Tim wriggles a bit, seeing how much play he’s got, just enough. He can really struggle, but he won’t go anywhere.

Then Abby puts the whipped cream on top of the icing on the cake.

She turns away from him, heading to Breena’s dresser and picks up, a soft, thin red ribbon.

It’s new. He knows that, and he licks his lips because he can guess what’s about to get tied. And he’s right.

“Ah…” he pants as she carefully takes his dick in hand.

Abby grins at him, feeling him stiffen further as she gives him a few quick strokes. “Oh yeah. Gonna tie you up real pretty.”
“Yes. Please.”

She kisses the tip of his dick. Soft, wet, little smooch with just enough of a suck to make his hips thrust.

“So pretty, my love, all spread out like this for me.” She’s still grinning as she loops the silk behind his balls, and carefully twines it around them, and then up, twisting over his dick. It’s tight enough he can really feel it, but doesn’t hurt. She ties it with a tidy bow, and he’s fairly sure that when that bow gets untied and gently tugged, that lovely strip of silk will just slither over his skin.

Until then, it’s scarlet silk on skin that’s still white, but pinking up a bit more with each second. Skin that will probably be flushed red by the time that ribbon comes off.

Breena leans in, and with just the tip of her tongue traces the diamond pattern of skin visible on the side of his dick, and Tim groans.

He tries to come up, to touch her, but he can’t.

Breena looks slightly alarmed, and Abby says, “Timothy, explain the game to them, or we’re not playing.”

Tim bites his lip, hard, pulling himself out of play mode. He and Abby have played this game several times, but… especially if you haven’t seen it before, it could be disturbing.

“I’m going to groan, and struggle, and pull on the ropes, and try to get you to go faster, get me off sooner. I’m going to try to control this, but you aren’t going to let me. You’re going to take me over and play me however you like.”

“Go deeper, Timothy.” Abby says, making him explain further.

“By doing what you like, you’re doing what I want, too. I want to feel out of control. I want to feel my body, strong and primed and powerful, but out of my control. I want to fight it, and I want to lose this fight. At some point, I’ll surrender, give into it, but… I’m always giving into it. I want this. All of it.”

Jimmy and Breena glance at each other, and Abby, and she nods at them. “It’s still a game.”

“Best game ever,” Tim adds. “When you fight, it revs you up, and I like the way that feels. I like the way it feels to pull against the ropes.”

Jimmy takes note of what Tim’s saying there, and starts to come up with some ideas to kick that into hyper-overdrive territory. His job for tonight is mostly just watching, taking some pictures, too. He’s already talked to the girls about that, how, since this is Tim’s birthday present, he’s not exactly superfluous to the mix, but he doesn’t exactly need to be on the bed doing anything. Just being there, watching, adding his voice and pleasure to the mix is enough.

Still, if he does see something to add… And if it really is about kicking Tim’s biochemistry into overdrive…

Jimmy knows a little something about that. He settles in to watch, appreciate, and ponder.
Tim’s in heaven. He’s tied down good, and both girls are carefully dribbling warmed massage oil over his skin. One drop at a time, making sure he feels each hit on his skin.

He twitches at each one, pulling on the ropes, trying to move into the heat. But he can’t.

Then there’s hands. Warm, supple hands rubbing that oil into his arms and legs. Up his feet, around the ropes, slippery hands stroking deep into his muscles, circling light over his joints, fingernails trailing over his own, silk smooth skin.

God, and kissing. Abby’s kissing him. Soft wet lips on his, as four slick hands slip back and forth on his chest and stomach.

Abby’s mostly staying to his arms, hands, and lips. That makes sense to him, she’s really not very mobile right now, so getting the game in motion, and then handling the top third of him is a good game plan.

Breena’s got the rest of him, staying away from his dick as that pretty red ribbon gets tighter and tighter, and that tightness takes him a notch higher. Every heartbeat makes his dick feel more full, shifts his focus to it.

Tension and pull. Right now, hair gone, freshly shaved, Tim’s already sensitive skin is supercharged sensitive. He’s ultra-aware of every inch of silk pulling on his skin. He can feel the thread of the ropes across his arms and legs, snug on his hips, cradling under his completely bare balls and caressing up his dick.

The girls are kissing his now, slick, wet lips running over his flesh, flashing pleasure through his central nervous system, and he keeps trying to move into them, trying to up the pressure, which ups the tension in his body, ups the pull of his muscles against the ropes.

He’s holding that moment, the tight, hovering feeling of waiting for the gun to go off, as he keeps trying to buck his way off the bed and into their mouths.

Lips, wet, hot lips around his dick. Tim does buck up at that, and the ropes keep him down, keep him on the bed.

He’s watching Breena suck him into her mouth, groaning at how good it looks and feels, as Abby trails her fingers down his chest, and then shifts off the bed, getting the beads.

“Look at me, Tim.”

He does, pulling his eyes away from Breena’s mouth on his dick.

She pours a large dollop of lube into her hand and begins to work the beads through it. Tim groans again. He knows what’s coming next, and he starts to make himself relax. It’s not going to happen if he keeps straining the way he is right now.

Breena’s blowing him, fast and wet and lovely, and Abby’s rubbing slick hands over his hips, and inner thighs, it’s a maddening mix of building arousal, climbing tension, and lulling relaxation. His body enjoys the counter points as he tries to keep letting himself relax.
Hard to do when there’s a gorgeous woman with her dick in your mouth, and another one handing her a string of anal beads.

Breena lets his dick go, and Tim pouts, lifting his hips, trying to get her attention back on it, but she’s got other things to do.

“Hips down, baby,” Abby says, laying a slick palm on his hip.

Tim closes his eyes for a second, and complies. This part won’t work so hot if he doesn’t go along with it.

Abby moves his balls out of the way, gently stroking them, which is not helping him relax, but he’s sure as hell not going to ask her to stop, as Breena gently starts to push the first bead into him.

“Slow, gentle pressure, Breena, just hold steady, and his body’ll swallow it up.”

Abby’s right about that. Tim was a little startled the first time that happened. He was used to fighting his way through the getting anything into him part of this, but… Enough lube, gentle pressure, and, pop! in they go.

“You get the first two in, and he’ll take care of the rest.”

That’s true, too, and was also a surprise. The first one, once it’s in, doesn’t feel like much. It’s past the muscle, so there’s no real sense of fullness or stretch, but it’s not high enough up to get to his prostate, so there’s no pressure or pulse. Number two, that starts to get a little pressure on his prostate, which is really nice, and from there, his body will pull the rest of the string in on its own. (That’s why it’s got to have a wide ring at the end, otherwise, this is a disaster waiting to happen.)

That’s the game, he’ll pull them in, and then she pulls them out, as fast or slow as she likes. Each one going in provides a bit more pressure on his prostate, and pulling them out causes them to bump over it, each one feeling like a little orgasmic pulse.

It’s not cumming, no tingle, no more than a few drops of ejaculate, but it feels amazing.

“Feel good?” Abby asks as Breena gets the second one set.

“Oh, God!”

Abby kisses him, smiling, and heads back up to his face. “How about you put that tongue to good use?”

“God, yes!”

Pussy on his tongue, his dick and ass played with at the same time, this is all the happy birthday Tim could ever want.

He’s floating on it, feeling so good, all over.

When Abby starts to moan above him, Breena tugs the string, causing the beads to speed out of him, sending a quick succession of little jolts of pleasure through him, as she sucks his dick.
Jimmy’s wondering if the night just ended earlier than anticipated. The way Tim sounded when Abby got off is making him think Breena tipped him over accidentally, but she pulls back from his dick, and it’s not twitching, so…

Apparently not.

Jimmy’s been watching this, alternating between playing with himself and taking pictures, and deciding that he’s definitely got to try the anal beads at some point. He’d teased Tim when he’d stuck some in Tony’s honeymoon bag, but… now… seeing them in action. Might be fun.

Jimmy gets up to pet Abby some. She’s coming down, looking pretty happy, but Tim’s (obviously) not in any position to take care of her right now.

Abby’s feeling awesome.

That was an especially nice orgasm. It’s been way too damn long since the four of them have had the opportunity to play.

Once she’s calmed back down, as Jimmy’s petting her and playing with her hair, she gets her head back together on how to get Tim even more turned on.

She goes back to kissing him, both for her own pleasure, and because he likes it, too. And as she’s kissing him, a thought hits.

Tim’s nipples aren’t terribly sensitive. At least, not on a sexual level. (They can get somewhat irritated when his skin gets too dry, but that’s not any sort of good sensitive. That’s annoying sensitive.) By themselves they’re just two small, pink spots on his chest that, if he hadn’t just shaved, would be ringed with about ten fine dark blond hairs a piece.

Abby’s played with them in a lot of different circumstances, and so has Breena, and for the most part, not all the much happens. Unlike with the girls, his nipples aren’t really hardwired into his sexual response cycle. (He’s got four main erogenous zones: lips, genitals, ass, and thighs, and while playing with the rest of him feels nice, it doesn’t really turn him on.)

However, a lot of circumstances are not all circumstances. And there is one situation that Abby remembers from shortly after Tony and Ziva’s wedding, where she found that if she had an insanely turned on Tim, and went after his dick and his nipples at the same time, that got a good response.

Abby knows something else, given the chance to have someone touch his lips, or touch his nipples, Tim prefers his lips. They are hardwired to his dick. Any sort of sex is better for Tim if it involves kissing.

Which is why, if she’s got the option of kissing his lips or his nipples while they make love, she goes for his lips.

But there’s an extra set of lips, that aren’t doing all that much right now, and perhaps they could be volunteered to help out…

“Jimmy…” He glances away from Breena sucking Tim, and looks at her. Abby kisses him, then quietly explains her plan, and then asks if he’s cool with joining in, and Jimmy decides that yes, he’s cool with this. He grins back at her, and then heads to Tim’s other side.
Tim’s gone. There are no higher level brain functions left. There’s just exquisite wet slide on his dick, and the deep pulse of pressure on his prostate. There’s the feel of rope on his arms and legs, and the strain in his muscles.

Then, as Breena sucks the tip of his dick, keeping it well in his mouth with wet, little pulses around him, he feels another mouth, Abby, on his nipple.

Hard suck. Beena lets off, and Abby starts up.

He groans, hard, loud, trying to move, arms, legs, body straining against the ropes, and that shifts the beads, changes the feel of the pressure, shifts Abby and Breena’s rhythm, makes him moan again, makes the full, tingly, ripe, ready to burst sensation intensify, and then he’s kissing, too.

“Oh, God, Jimmy.” He’d forgotten Jimmy was there, but not anymore.

All three of them are sucking on him. Jimmy’s got his bottom lip between his lips, and Abby’s got his nipple, and Breena his dick, and he’s glowing with pleasure.

He’s gasping, and trying to move, trying to grab them all and fuck and fuck and fuck. He wants to drive his dick and his ass and his whole body into anything hot and wet, over and over building up to getting off.

His teeth are clenching, but Jimmy’s still got his lip, still sucking on it, rubbing his tongue over it, driving him insane.

His fingers have clenched, hands and feet tight, his back barely on the bed as he tries to force himself up, deeper into Abby and Breena’s mouths, but Breena keeps to the shallow sucking on just his tip, and his nipple’s already as deep into Abby’s mouth as it can get.

Breena tugs on the beads again, starting a long, slow, pulsing pull of them out of him.

He’s rocking into that, too. Each one nudges his prostate as they slip out, and she sucks hard with each pulse. It’s like cumming. No tingles, but each one matches the pulse part of climax.

Drier, sort of. He knows, can feel by how swollen his balls and prostate are, that he’s going to climax like a geyser, and he’s sure he’s leaking with each pulse, but they’re a drop at a time, no relief. Just continually feeling like he’s just fallen off the edge of an orgasm, without hitting the bottom.

Jimmy has a pretty good idea of how to take this up another notch. At least, he knows what would blow his mind (and load.) And he’s got explicit permission from Tim to do stuff like this to him.

But… he’s not sure.

Pain for the sake of pain isn’t part of Tim’s playbook. That’s one of his hard lines.

But, as he laps gently at Tim’s lower lip, alternating between sucks, what he’s thinking isn’t exactly pain for the sake of pain. It’s pain for the sake of endorphins. He’s fighting the ropes because that jerks up the endorphin level. He’s struggling because that increases the tension in his body. All of this is about maximizing the chemical cocktail his body can produce and riding the high.
And Jimmy knows how to add to the mix.

He’s seen Tim with hickies and love bites before. He doesn’t think Abby or Breena has ever put one on him intentionally before, though. And he knows he hasn’t seen one of them play with one before.

Tim didn’t mind watching Jimmy get bit. Though Jimmy was too far gone to remember if Tim enjoyed watching it, or was just dealing with it.

Jimmy sucks harder on Tim’s lip, and Tim moans into it. Long, ragged sound, past all rational thought and dwelling just in sensation.

He sucks a bit harder and adds a little tooth. Just a nip, but that gets another long moan, as well as feverish kissing back.

Jimmy decides that’s his answer. Right now, Tim’s liking this, a lot.

Jimmy pulls back and Tim tries to thrash against the rope. His eyes jerk open and look at Jimmy, mad. “Get back to it!”

Jimmy smiles at him, thinking that he’s never been ordered to kiss anyone before. “Abby, swap with me.”

This has both Abby and Tim looking interested. Though Tim’s interested because right now he’s so turned on he doesn’t care who does what to him as long as it gets done, and Abby’s interested because she and Breena, cannot wait to see him sucking on Tim’s chest.

Abby’s raising an eyebrow at him as she kisses Tim, who makes a muffled groan of pleasure to have the kissing back. Jimmy winks at her and smiles back. Then he drops his lips to Tim’s chest.

Both girls, and Tim moan at that.

Jimmy’s thinking he wants to get Tim revved back up to where he was before he broke play. Get him panting and cursing and groaning again.

So, for a moment, he’s exploring the fact that Tim’s got really tiny nipples. Not like he’s never seen them before, but there’s seeing and there’s touching, and he’s never had a guy’s nipple in his mouth before. And, not only is it a hell of a lot smaller than Abby’s or Breena’s, it also doesn’t have a breast underneath it. And, because the damn things are so small, and because there’s no give on the skin/tissue under it, and because Tim’s trying to flail his way off the bed, it’s rather difficult to keep it in his mouth.

Namely, if he’s got Breena’s nipple in his mouth, and she jerks, her breast will sort of flow or stretch, and the nipple says in his mouth just fine. If Tim jerks, his chest goes with him, and Jimmy ends up with his nose bonking into Tim’s sternum.

Jimmy places both of his hands on Tim’s shoulders, and leans into him, and Tim groans at that, too. More weight, more restraint, more being taken over. He’s liking that a whole lot.

And Jimmy decides, that with the way Tim is jerking and flailing, and the long steady stream of kiss dampened words spilling out of Tim, that he’s back to revved up and ready for more.

As Tim’s inhaling, and Breena and Abby have coordinated the way they’re sucking on Tim, Jimmy gives his nipple a hard, steady bite.

The only reason Tim doesn’t buck off the bed is that he’s tied down and Jimmy’s holding him down
The sound that rips out of him at that bite does not sound like pain. Jimmy knows how Tim sounds when he’s in pain, and that sound is not hurting Tim.

Jimmy flattens his tongue and go over Tim’s nipple in a firm, wet stripe, and that gets another groan, as well as an attempt to arch his back, get more pressure.

Jimmy lifts up for a second. “More?”

“FUCK YES!”

Abby pulls back from Tim’s lips, and kisses him one last time sweetly.

“Show me what you did,” she says to Jimmy.

He just glances to the bite mark on Tim’s chest.

She grins back at him, and gets to it. And like Jimmy did, before, they both wait a few moments, let Tim get burning ember hot, before trying again.

This time, Jimmy just sucks hard on Tim’s nipple, while holding his shoulders down. Abby bites, and again, Tim all but comes off the bed.

Breena’s got his dick in her hand. He’s thrashing around too much for oral to be enjoyable for her, and it’s bright red, skin stretched drumhead tight, swollen as far as it goes, every vein pulsing with his hammering heart.

Jimmy knows dicks, and he knows how that sort of erection feels.

“Fuck him, Breena! Get on top of our man and ride him.”

Tim groans at that, Abby does, too. Breena grins, tugging the wet ribbon, so it slithers off Tim’s dick with a loud groan from him, and then she slides down Tim hard and fast as he yells at the feel of it and Abby and Jimmy go back to his chest.

Pleasure and pain and pulse and breath and tense, so tense, and more pleasure and more tense and full, so full, his body’s like a squeezed water balloon, full to bursting with more tension, and every inch of him is ready to go off.

Tim’s not seeing. He thinks his eyes are open, but he’s not processing anything that might be happening.

Hearing, beyond the rasp of his breath and the thunder of his heart, kicked out a while ago, too.

Feeling… He’s all feeling. All over. Everything is feeling. Too much feeling. Every hair, every nerve, every… everything is feeling, all over. He thinks he can count the taste buds on Jimmy’s tongue as he laps at his left nipple, and feel each individual tooth with Abby on his right, and Breena… God above, Breena, rising and falling and slamming down on him in liquid heat. Rippling liquid heat racing toward the most epic climax ever.

He can feel the edge coming, feel himself teetering on it, ready to fall over, almost there, and then there’s four things all hitting at once, two sets of teeth, the beads rushing out, his body pumping in response as Breena slams down onto him over and over, fast and deep, and he’s thrusting hard, hips off the bed as it all hits at once, pulsing over him in hot rushes through his whole body, toes to scalp.

When Tim gets back to himself, he’s feeling amazing. He’s so high right now, he’s glowing with it. He’s twitching, and wet, and calm, and euphoric.

Abby eventually sits up, and starts to untie him, which, after that much fighting the ropes feels excellent. He’s still got Breena lying across his chest and stomach, and Jimmy’s on his side, and he’s kissing both of them.

Eventually, his hands and legs are free, and Breena and Jimmy move back so he can move a little, too.

Tim curls into a ball, letting his body move into the position it couldn’t get into and notices his side and stomach is wet, and so it part of the bed. He doesn’t think, there’s no filter between his brain and mouth right now. “Why’s my side wet?”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow at him. Abby got off riding Tim’s face. Breena was rubbing herself while riding Tim. Jimmy, on the other hand, had, well, his hand. Fortunately he was able to get across to Abby what he needed to do, so she took over holding down one of Tim’s shoulders, giving him a free hand. Jerking himself off while he was biting on someone’s chest was new, but it worked out okay. But, when he was doing it, he was way too turned on to think about who or what he’d end up spraying.

Tim sees that eyebrow, and says, “Oh… Ah!”

Jimmy flashes him a dopey grin.

Tim smiles back at him. “You’re right, my body can’t tell the difference, either.”

Jimmy smirks, remembering telling Tim his body couldn’t tell the difference between pain and pleasure endorphins. Then another thought hits Jimmy, specifically about what endorphins do, and he gets up, looking for his bathrobe.

“What are you going?” Tim asks, as he cuddles Breena in closer. He can hear Abby in the bathroom, getting them washcloths from the sound of it.

“Kitchen.”

“Hungry?” Breena asks.

Jimmy shakes his head. “No. You want me to get you something?”

“I’m good.” Her eyes are starting to get a little droopy. “Sleepy.”

Jimmy yawns. He’s pretty ready to crash, too. “Me, too. Back in a sec.”

Abby’s back after that, draping towels on the wet spots, and handing over damp washcloths to Tim and Breena. Tim purrs at her. Warm washcloths feel pretty damn good right now, too. She kisses him back. “Happy birthday, late.”

“So worth the wait.”
As Breena heads to the bathroom, Jimmy comes back, holding three ice packs, a glass of water, and a bottle of Aleve. He hands the water and pills to Tim, putting the ice packs on the bed, and gratefully takes a washcloth from Abby. He’s not too crusty, but a bit of clean up feels good.

Tim looks from the pills to the teeth marks around his nipples. “Doesn’t hurt that bad.”

“I know. The ice is for your shoulder, arm, and ankle, and so’s the pain meds. Trust me, you will feel this in the morning.”

Tim smiles, still really blissed out on the endorphins. “Good. I want to.”

Jimmy nudges the hand holding the Aleve, and puts the ice on Tim’s shoulder. “No. You don’t. You want to be a little sore tomorrow. You’re gonna be past that if you don’t do something now.”

Tim pouts, but takes the pills, and gets himself on his side, curled around Abby, with ice packs strewn around his body.

A moment later, Abby says, “You’re cold.”

“Thank Dr. Palmer for that.” Jimmy’s getting himself into his usual sleeping position and pats him on the back. “This okay?”

“I can deal. Not like I’m not running too hot these days.” Actually, she’s thinking, giving that Sean’s keeping her nice and toasty these days, that an ice pack or two in the bed might be a good way to deal with that.

A minute later, Breena’s out of the bathroom, too, and they all settle in for a long winter’s nap.
"Twas The Night Before

Gibbs would admit to having certain fairly specific and tame Christmas-oriented fantasies (He’s got some not tame ones, too. Abbi’s helping him out with them,) that have been bubbling up in his head since he’s had a good feel for how this house would work out.

For example, the last time he did the Christmas-tree-with-the-family thing, it just wasn’t right. It wasn’t bad or anything, and in that it’s his last Christmas with Shannon and Kelly, he treasures those memories, but as someone who grew up in the North East, Christmas in California is just… wrong.

First off, it was warm. Okay, yeah, it was cool for Pendleton, but still, highs in the mid-seventies are not what Gibbs thinks of when he thinks of cold. Christmas is supposed to be cold. Breath is supposed to freeze on the air. There should be large quantities of bulky clothing involved. Boots and wooly socks and scarves and hats and gloves are a must. One sweatshirt over a t-shirt while wearing cut-off jeans and sneakers is not going out to get the tree clothing.

Second off, they bought the tree. He gets it. He’s bought trees before, and especially in the desert, it’s not like pine trees, well… grow on trees. They’ve got to bring the damn things in. Okay, fine. Still, a Christmas tree is something you are supposed to go out into the wood, preferably with the other male members of your family, cut down, and bring home, through the cold.

Third of all, the house. It was a hacienda-style rancher. Totally appropriate for where they were living, but nothing that said “Christmas” to Gibbs.

Fourth of all, getting home, to the house, through the warm, spring-like weather, means there’s just no rush of home as you burst into the warm and light and have people all around happy to see the tree, helping you peel out of winter clothing and giving you hot coffee or cocoa. Nope, there’s just walking from one temperate zone to another temperate zone.

Christmas in California just isn’t right.

So, this year, when he’s got his family near, six acres of ground, and it’s snowing outside, he’s getting his, old fashioned, North Eastern, White Christmas, Christmas tree fantasy!

The land around the house is rough. The grass has not yet seen a mower, and it’s rapidly working on turning back into the woods it so wants to be. They do have plans for taming at least some of it back down, but that’s not starting until spring.

The woods, which are part of Gibbs’ fantasy Christmas plans, are mostly deciduous trees, with a good spattering of pine and spruce.

In the boat house, he has part of this fantasy plan set and ready to go. Namely, he’s got his chain saw, and he’s got a few ropes, and he’s got a sled with a rope pull. All he needs now are his boys, Molly and Kelly, and it’s time to go find their Christmas tree.

Christmas in DC can be pretty iffy on the snow front. January and February are the real snow months. And, though it was a pain in the ass for getting to the house and away from work, the four inches of snow on the ground right now are pretty sweet. Just deep enough for the sled to pull over easily. Not so deep as to make walking in it difficult.

Right now, Gibbs has the chainsaw in hand. Tim’s got the ropes slung over his shoulder, while Jimmy and Tony pull the sled with the girls in it.

Molly’s all over this. She knows what a Christmas tree is and is extremely eager to pick one out. Kelly’s just enjoying time in the sled, and pointing out every tree they pass.

“That one!” Molly’s pointing at an at least seventy foot tall pine tree in the deep woods. They can’t even see the trunk, but Gibbs knows pines in deep woods, and one that tall likely only has branches on the top fifteen feet.

“How about one closer?”

“And smaller,” Tim adds. “We can’t fit that in the house.”

Kelly points to a tiny one a few feet from them. It only comes up to Tony’s knee, and would be perfectly set to star in a live action remake of Peanut’s Christmas Special.

Tim shakes his head. “Mama and Uncle Jimmy don’t think that’s enough tree.”

Jimmy gives Tim a gentle shove. “If I’ve got to cut it down myself and lug it a quarter mile though a forest and scrub to get it into the house, that’s plenty of tree.”

“No! We’re grabbing a real tree,” Gibbs says, eyeing the forest. He hands the saw to Tim, picks Molly up, holding her on his hip, and points out a fifteen-foot-tall pine. They’ve got two stories of open space in the living area, time to take advantage of them. “How about that one, Molly? Want to put the star on the top?”

Molly’s eyes go wide. “YES!”

Gibbs looks at his boys. “Let’s move it.”

Though, as they’re heading off, Kelly starts to fuss about not getting her tree, so Tim heads back, takes the nine seconds necessary to cut it down, and then puts it on the sled with her. Her eyes light up, too, and she keeps petting it, then making faces because it’s prickly.

“What are we going to do with that?” Jimmy asks him.

Tim shrugs. “Stick it on the coffee table in our living area? Between you and Abby and Gibbs, we’ve got enough decorations to cover the whole house. Not like we don’t have a string of lights for it.”

Jimmy inclines his head, that’s true.

“We’re going to need a ladder to get the star on top of this,” Tony says as he loops one of the ropes around the bottom of the trunk.

Jimmy’s nodding along, looping the other rope. He hates to even think about admitting this, but he’s a little wary about them being able to move this thing. It’s huge, and heavy. If Gibbs and Tim were up to full strength that’d be one thing, but…

Doesn’t matter, they’ve got to get it in, and he’ll be damned before they go back to the house, empty-handed to grab Abbi and Ducky for extra muscle.

He tosses one of the ropes to Tim, and the three of them lean into it, getting their muscle working, and after a few grunts and some muttering about being slave labor the tree finally gives up, and starts sliding along behind them.

Gibbs follows along, grinning, pulling the sled with the girls while Mona frisks around them in the snow.

They’re about thirty feet in front of Gibbs when Tony quietly says, “Just for the record, you guys should keep it a bit quieter. I had to turn the volume way the hell up on the movie when Penny asked what that sound was.”

It’s hard to tell, because it is cold out, and they are working hard, and there are hats and scarves in play, but it’s possible that both Tim and Jimmy blush, and it’s definite they give each other a half-panicked side-eye glances, which is exactly what Tony was hoping would happen.

He chuckles. “You two are so damn easy! Didn’t hear anything. Old man did a great job with the sound-proofing. But, I take it you had a good time breaking in one of the bedrooms.”

Two smirking smiles bloom on Tim and Jimmy, followed with Jimmy saying, “Yep, and I take it you and Ziva had a pleasant morning, sleeping in.” Neither Tony nor Ziva were seen anywhere near the downstairs until well after 9:00.

Tony smiles wide. “What’d you say last year? Great outpourings of holiday cheer?”

Tim laughs. “Something like that.”

“Good Lord!” Breena says, looking at the massive tree the guys are trying to get wedged through the sliding glass door from the patio into the dining area. “It’s huge!”

Jimmy flashes her a saucy grin. “Love it when you say that to me.”

“Okay, you’ve already had too much eggnog.” Tony adds. “Come on, get pulling.” With another hard tug, and a bit of shoving from Tim and Gibbs on the other side, they manage to get the tree through the door, and sprawled onto the floor in the dining area.

“How are we going to get this upright?” Ziva adds, looking at how much space the tree is taking up, wondering how much of the furniture they’re going to have to rearrange.

“It’ll fit. We’d just have to shove things around,” Gibbs says, stepping in, lifting Kelly over the doorway and into the house. Tim follows, Molly holding one hand, the baby tree in the other.

“Tim! It’s so cute and tiny!” Abby says, seeing the little tree in his hand.

Tim can see the jokes flashing through Jimmy and Tony’s minds, ready to come spewing out, as both of them start wearing identical smirks. “Bite your tongues, both of you, or I’ll leave you to lifting the monster by yourselves.”

Jimmy, Tony, and Gibbs are sniggering away at that, as Tim says, “Our daughter wanted this one. Do we have an extra Christmas tree stand?”

“We’ve got at least three,” Breena adds.

“Great, point me to the smallest of them, and Kelly and I will go get this one set up.”

So, while the various members of Clan Gibbs push and shove sofas and chairs around to clear a space for the tree, Tim, Abby, and Kelly head into their living space.

In addition to their rooms, they have an open play area that terminates in the glassed-in octagonal room. That part isn’t done yet. It’s supposed to have soft cushions all over the floor, for looking at the stars at night.

It doesn’t yet, which is working out fine. Tim drags the coffee table into that room, finds Breena’s smallest tree stand, and sets it up on the table.

Then he sets the tree into the stand, while Abby holds Kelly on her lap. “Lights, baby girl?” Abby asks her daughter.

“Lights!”

Tim nods and gets a string of white lights. He wraps them around the tree, twice. It’s a small tree and a long string of lights. When he plugs them in, the tree explodes into a thousand points of light, and Kelly smiles.

Tim flashes a quick shot of that, his girls, all lit up by the lights on the tree.

Part of getting the house into a home is decorating. Between the dining area and the living area is a freestanding fireplace. It’s a huge expanse of gray stone, heading straight up to the ceiling, twenty feet above, with a mantle that wraps around all four sides.

Penny and Breena have already hung the family crest high on it, above the mantle, and yesterday they started to put the family pictures up. They’d asked the rest of the crew to bring family shots, too, and pictures of themselves when they were younger.

So, as the guys work on wrestling the tree into a vertical position, the rest of the clan is either cooking, or putting pictures up.

There are shots of their family. Their core group together. There are shots of each member at different ages, with their own parents (Save for Tim. He’s intentionally not putting any shots of himself up with his parents. Though he did find one of him and Sarah, ages sixteen and seven.)

Some of the shots feel… strange to look at. Tim doesn’t begrudge Penny wanting a shot of her with her husband and boys. It’s a picture from the early fifties, Christmas, and he’s honestly not sure which one of the four buzz cut boys in blue flannel PJs opening presents is his dad. And he doesn’t begrudge Ziva’s picture of her, Tali, and Ari sitting around a table, Eli smiling at them, as Ziva’s mother lights the Chanukah candles.

He doesn’t feel like they should have to edit their pasts, or shield the rest of the family from their memories of home.

But it does feel weird to look at them. To try and sort out happy memories from the pain. He wonders if there will be a point when he can look at shots of himself with his parents, and be okay with them.

Some of the pictures Tim finds fascinating.

Ducky as a young man. Intellectually he knows that Ducky wasn’t born in his sixties. He’s heard the stories. He met Mrs. Mallard. So he knows that once upon a time, Ducky was a young man, and then a middle-aged man. Once upon a time Ducky was his age.

Still, it floors him to see shots of a young man, barely a year out of boyhood, thin and sharp, hair buzzed short, wearing rumpled fatigues, an old, stained t-shirt, dog tags on his chest, massive cocky grin on his face. Or a somewhat less young man, a medical student, longer hair, pensive, frozen in black and white, looking into the distance. Finally a color shot, four men, Ducky in the front, all four of them in formal uniforms, smiling at a camera. There’s another shot, at least ten years later, Ducky’s in fatigues, still wearing his dog tags, slumped, looking tired, on a rickety chair in front of a tent, jungle behind him. He’s got long hair, a bushy moustache, and more than a few days of stubble on his cheeks. Tim guesses that Ducky has to be his age in that shot, and if Ducky’s his age, and he’s in a jungle, that’s his service in Vietnam.

And like with Ducky, Tim knows Penny was not always old. He gets it. It’s still a shock to see her in a proper 1950’s party dress, wearing heels and gloves, with perfect make up, a cigarette in a long holder elegantly held in one hand, martini glass in another. His grandfather, in his Captain’s uniform, hand on her back, grinning. He knows, by the clothing, that she can’t be more than twenty-five in the picture, and if she’s twenty-five, he’s just a bit younger than Tim is now.

He knows that there was a time before she became the liberal, revolutionary she is now. He gets it. But… He looks at pictures of her later, at different rallies, hair long and free, face devoid of makeup, setting fire to a bra, and he knows who that women is. The lady in the 1950s’ feels like someone else.

His eyes move two inches to the left. He’s seen shots of Shannon and Kelly, and he met Jackson, but he’s never seen this picture of Gibbs with his parents. It’s likely the mid-sixties, because Gibbs can’t be ten years old yet, but it’s a color picture, so he can see how much Gibbs favored his dad, with those big blue eyes and dark hair. But he knows the grin on his mother’s face, he’s seen it on Gibbs over the years.
“What was her name?” he asks Gibbs, as he straightens the shot out, tucking it between the shot of him and Shannon and Kelly, and another shot of him with Abbi.

“Ann.” Gibbs looks at the picture, smiling. “Dad had gotten the camera earlier that year. It had a timer. So, you could set it, and then hop into the frame. So we sat there, smiling at the thing, as he kept setting it and running back to us. He took a whole role of shots, and this was the only one where everyone had their eyes open, was looking at the camera, and smiling.

“Mom had copies made. This one;” it’s a big, eight by ten shot, “went up on the mantle, and all the little ones got put in the Christmas cards. That was a big deal back then. She had a folding card table, and from the day after Thanksgiving until the week before Christmas, she’d have it out in the living room, with a huge stack of Christmas cards on it. Writing out each one, and sending it off. Most of the town, all of Dad’s suppliers, every buddy they ever had… She’d send out hundreds of them.” Gibbs winces a little. “All of December, I never got the taste of glue out of my mouth.”

“You were the official stamp licker?” Tony says, putting his favorite shot of his mom up on the mantle, the one he took of her in New York when they were going to a movie, along with one where he’s a tiny little boy, maybe three, sitting on his Mom’s lap, with Senior’s arms around both of them.

Gibbs nods. “And envelop licker. What’s that?” Gibbs asks, looking at the shot Tony hasn’t put up yet.

Tony sighs a bit. “I asked Senior for shots, and he didn’t have a whole lot of them left, because…” Tony doesn’t need to fill in that the only pictures Senior still has are the ones he had backed up digitally and kept online, or kept physically on his person. Just like a lot of people in the very well-off sections of DC, Senior’s home was destroyed. “Anyway. This is one he keeps on him. He made a copy for me.”

It’s a small picture, wallet sized, and Tony’s got it in a little silver frame. It’s him and Senior, both of them in Civil War re-enactment costumes (Yankees). Senior’s in his Calvary Captain uniform, and Tony’s in his drummer boy outfit, complete with drum.

Tony can’t be more than eight, and no matter how much he protested having to be involved with this when he’s talked about it, he’s light-up-the-room proud in that photo.

“You look like you’re having a good time,” Tim says, waving Abby away from overseeing Jimmy, Abbi, and Ducky getting the now upright tree into exactly the right spot.

“Ohhh! Look at you!” Abby’s grinning, wrapping her arm around Tony.

Tony rolls his eyes. “Yeah. I liked the drum, and it’s in my boot, so you can’t see it in the shot, but that was the year I got the little derringer, too.”

“Senior got you a gun to go with the costume?” Abby asks.

“Little thing.” Tony points his index fingers and holds them a few inches apart. “A ‘girl’s’ weapon really, but I was a little guy, and it fit my hands. Single shot, derringer. And he made sure I knew how to load and shoot it. We never used bullets, just blanks, so it made a great bang and a huge cloud of smoke. I was still too little for a rifle of my own, and most drummer boys went into battle just on their own, no weapons at all, but I’d been begging for a gun, and that year he decided I was old enough for one.” Tony’s smiling at that memory.

“What about the ‘poo boy’ stuff?” Tim asks.

Tony sighs and rolls his eyes. “Way to put a damper on the good memories, McBuzzkill.”
“Sorry, just…”

Tony rolls his eyes. “Yeah, I know… An encampment has latrines. The lowest ranked guys, prisoners, or any Contrabands…” the rest of that crew doesn’t know what that term means in relation to this, “captured slaves. Confederate Armies used slave-labor. If we captured them, or they ran away to us, we didn’t just set them free.” Tim finds it amusing to see Tony referring to an Army that disbanded a hundred years before he was born as ‘we,’ and disturbing to realize he had no idea what happened to captured slaves during the Civil War. “They’d be used for hard labor, and digging latrines was part of that. Obviously, no one wants to play captured slaves, so, no Contrabands in the reenactment camps. And for the most part we’d have port-a-potties for longer reenactments. But not always, and Senior liked a certain level of ‘realism.’ Officers, and see those stripes, Senior’s playing a Captain, didn’t have to deal with smelly latrines if they didn’t want to. They got a chamber pot, and whoever was their valet, was in charge of dealing with it. It was part of my job.”

“So, you’re saying it was a literal shit job?” Jimmy adds, looking at the picture. “You ever think about doing this with our kids?”

Tony shakes his head. “A: yes, it was. And B: no! This is part of why I hate camping and being outdoors for more than a few hours at a time. We’re lucky enough not to live in the 1860s, and trust me, we don’t want to go back!” Tony looks over at the tree, and glances at Jimmy and Abbi, both of whom have pine needles and bits of sap glued to their skin, hair, and clothing.

“Looks like we’re ready to decorate!”

Jimmy tries to run a hand through his hair, and it gets stuck in a wodge of liquid pine. “Yeah, just give me a few minutes to change and grab a shower. I don’t want all the tinsel stuck to me.”

Abbi nods along, thinking that’s a good plan.

Abby eyes the tree, standing tall and proud in their living room. “How about we get lunch ready, you guys clean up, we’ll eat, do some decorating, and then put little girls down.”

Everyone thinks that sounds like a good plan.

For Breena, part of Christmas Eve is making sugar cookies and having them carefully decorated and ready to be put on the plate for Santa.
It’s just… not really Christmas without that. That’s one of her earliest Christmas memories, standing there with her Mom, who was pregnant with her youngest sister at the time, carefully squeezing frosting onto the cookies, so that Santa would have pretty cookies to eat. They did it every year, long past the point of knowing who Santa was. Long past the point of putting them on the plate, next to the fireplace, grabbing cups of eggnog, and nibbling the cookies while watching The Peanuts Christmas special before filling the stockings, putting the presents under the tree, and heading to bed.

But, living with a diabetic who tries to avoid carbs means the last few years, making a pile of cookies for Christmas Eve just hasn’t been part of the celebration. She might like doing it, but she doesn’t want to eat the whole plate herself.

But this year… This year she’s got Santas all over the place, and most of them are quite in favor of cookies.

Ziva and Gibbs are getting lunch gear ready. Mostly a lot of cold cuts, breads, sandwich and salad stuff, all laid out on the table, and everyone can make up their own meal. Meanwhile, she and Tim are putting the Kitchen Aid through its paces. He’s got his own contribution to the cookie making.

So, as she’s creaming butter and sugar, he’s a few feet away, chopping up Andes mints, both of them getting ready to make sure the whole house smells like cookies all day.

Ziva heads back into the kitchen. “Are you a good stopping point?”

“Let me get the flour mix in. Then I can get my half in the fridge to chill, and he can get the mints stirred into his half.”

Tim runs his knife through the mints one more time. He’s got nicely sized little chunks. “I’m all set, just need some dough.”

A minute later, Breena shuts off the mixer. She scoops half of the dough out, onto a piece of parchment paper, and pats it into a disk. “This just needs to chill.”

Tim nods, pouring his mints into his half of the dough. “Never done this without a spoon.” He gingerly turns the mixer on, and it grinds away for a few seconds, paddle turning though the dough. “This is faster.” He turns it off, removes the bowl from the mixer, puts a piece of plastic wrap on top of the bowl, slides it into the fridge, and then sets the oven to pre-heat.

“Hey, Ziva,” he says, as he heads into the dining area. “Did you see the cookie cutters Breena got you?”

Ziva flashes Breena a curious look. Breena smiles at her. “I’ve got my traditional Christmas tree, and the gingerbread man, and reindeer, but since today’s the first night of Chanukah, I got some candles, and a menorah.”

Ziva laughs at that. “We are celebrating Chanukah with Christmas cookies?”

“Yes.” Breena smiles at her. “We’re a proper interfaith family.”

Yule, which, as Ducky is happily telling them, is a traditional celebration of the sun returning. Thus, lights, and, of course, the biggest living thing anyone could find in the dark of winter, an evergreen, are vital to the celebration.

Chanukah, as Ziva adds, is also a festival of lights. The miracle of how The Lord allowed the oil in the lamps to burn on and on for eight full days, re-sanctifying the temple.

Thus, on December 24th, this blended crew of winter merry-makers, deck their home in lights.

The tree, all fifteen feet of it, is covered in them. Ducky’s talking about how when he was a boy the tree was covered in actual candles. Ziva really likes the idea of that. (Tim’s just glad that Ducky and Ziva haven’t made the leap to getting real candles for next year. Yes, it would have looked awesome, but he can’t image how long it would take to light, and more, he doesn’t want to imagine how dangerous it’d be.) More lights are hung by the mantle. They’re wound up and down the banisters on the stairways up to the second floor.
And in the middle of the table sits one of the few things Ziva removed from her father’s home when he died. It’s her family’s Menorah.

She sets the first candle in the middle of the old silver holder, and one more all the way to the left.

“My mother’s family left Russia with one bag between the four of them. Clothing, money, forged papers, and this.”

Tim’s sitting at the table, untangling another string of lights, as Ziva’s getting her menorah set properly. “I just realized, I have no idea where you’re from. Israel, but… Like, my family’s Irish originally… So, your mom’s family was Russian?”

“Refuseniks.”

Tim’s sure that means something. He knows he’s heard it before, but… he’s drawing a blank. Penny and Ducky both come over, very interested to hear Ziva talk about her family.

Ziva can see that Tim doesn’t know what that term means.

“Russia doesn’t love its Jews. And while many stayed, many more have tried to get out. My grandparents had been trying to get out for a while. They started trying to get to Eastern Europe, hoping to eventually get to the west, and that got them labeled as Refuseniks. In the sixties, they decided to try for Israel. The USSR wouldn’t let them leave, but, because they were Refuseniks, they lost their jobs. Dedu was a machinist. Bebbu was a dancer. They knew that charges of ‘social parasitism…”’

Tim’s looking at her blankly.

“It meant that you didn’t contribute enough to the USSR. You weren’t doing enough of whatever it was you were supposed to be doing. Of course, they couldn’t ‘contribute’ because they’d been fired from the jobs. If you were found guilty of ‘social parasitism’ they’d send you to a gulag.”

“That’s horrible!”

Ziva nods. Her Dedu had had some choice words about the USSR. “They knew trouble was coming. So they got everything they could together, sold everything they could, quietly, and used the money they had to buy forged travel papers. And then they got on a train, and started south. When it got too dangerous to go by train, they walked. My mother was thirteen, her brother eleven. Dedu had a friend from his Navy days who worked as a sailor, shipping out of Novorossiysk. They had to get to the Black Sea to get out of the USSR, and they did, finding Dedu’s friend.”

“Shipping?” Ducky asks.

“Officially. Smuggling unofficially. According to Dedu, he was taking caviar and vodka out of the USSR, and getting it into Turkey. No matter what he was taking, he did manage to get my mother’s family to Trabzon. And from there, they hitchhiked and walked to Israel.

“It took them a full year to get there. All four of them taking odd jobs here and there. They’d make enough money to eat and get a place to sleep, and then walk to the next town.” She gently touches the silver menorah. “They weren’t supposed to have this. No one in the USSR was supposed to have a religion. There were no legal synagogues there. They could have gone to jail just for having this. When Ima died, I packed this up and put it in my room at Abba’s house.” Tim can’t remember the last time he’s heard Ziva talk about her parents calling them the Hebrew equivalent of Mama and Daddy. “It’s been a long time since it’s been properly lit.” Ziva smiles at them, a few tears threatening to leak out of her eyes.

Tim’s looking a little disturbed by that. The idea of Ziva so happy she’s crying is unsettling to him. But her husband does well with it, placing his hands on her shoulders, and kissing her neck, quietly saying something, Tim doesn’t know what because it’s not English, to her.

Whatever it is, it makes her smile, and she wipes her eyes.

There are literal boughs of holly. After lunch, Abby and Breena headed outside, strode (waddled, in Abby’s case) toward the woods, found a holly tree, and cut branches off of it.

They wove dark green, prickly leaves with bright red berries between the pictures on the mantle. They circled them around the Menorah on the dining room table. It’s wrapped around the mailbox at the end of the driveway, and more of it circles the posts on the front porch.

“Falalalala la lalala,” Tim says, as they come back in, smelling like evergreens and cold.

Abby smiles at that, giggling a little.

He grins back at her, taking her coat, and the big, floppy, neon green with orange pompom hat that Tony had gotten him, that she decided she liked.

There’s a picture, being taken, right this moment, that will, in years to come, live on Gibbs’ mantle piece. It’s him, on the ladder, holding Molly by the waist, as she reaches up on her very tippie toes, and puts the star on the top of the tree.
Little girls DO NOT want to go down for a nap. So far, for them, today has been an absolute blast. There’s been playing, and decorating, and Aunt Ziva’s getting ready for a special treat tonight, and Mom/Aunt Breena’s been baking cookies all day, and they got to stick ornaments all over the trees, and it’s just been AWESOME, and they are VERY TIRED and FRAZZLED, and DO NOT WANT THE PARTY TO END.

This unfortunately means they are crabby, bursting into tears at the drop of a hat, and LOUDLY DEMANDING NO NAPS.

They are eventually cajoled by their daddies into their room, where they lie down (with much whining), and listen to their stories (with more sleepy whining), and then Jimmy starts softly singing to them (quieter, less verbal whining), and Tim adds his own voice in, both of them pulling off an okay version of Silent Night (though neither of them know anything past the first verse, and Tim can’t hit the high notes to save his life), and after only three versions of the first verse, and then two more softly hummed verses, they’re able to creep out, leaving Mona snoozing away with them.

Once the door is closed, Tim’s thinking he could probably use a nap, too, and Jimmy’s also looking a little frazzled. (There’s nothing like a chorus of screaming kids to shoot your nerves to hell and gone.)

“Well, that was fun,” Tim says dryly.

Jimmy nods. “Maybe a little more low-key next year.”

Tim nods vehemently in agreement. They’re heading down the hall, Tim rubbing his shoulder, as he says, “Two more of them next year.”

“Maybe three.” Jimmy’s thinking of the little person who might be calling his wife home right now.

Tim smiles. “I meant two of ours. Dave’ll be up in his own nursery, right?”

“Oh.” Jimmy smiles back. “Are we crazy to pack them in so close?”

Tim nods. “Yep. But think of it this way, nineteen years from now, we’ll have the house back. Spread them out more, and we’d have kids in our place until we’re Gibbs’ age.”

“You are fried, aren’t you? We’ll be Gibbs’ age in nineteen years.”

Tim laughs a bit at that. “Okay, yeah, we’re crazy.

Jimmy inclines his head, that’s a good point. “How’s your shoulder doing?”

“Sore. But I’m okay.” Tim winks at Jimmy. “My doctor takes good care of me.”

Jimmy wraps an arm around him as they head back to the living room. “Damn straight.”

With little girls down, most of the rest of the crew decides that now would make a splendid crashing time, too.

The afternoon is quiet. People napping, or resting, getting ready for the evening’s festivities.
It’s almost dark out when the girls wake up.

And night is when the Chanukah candles are lit.

So, once they’re up, and cleaned up, and ready to be sociable again, it’s time for the first night of Chanukah.

Tony turns off all the lights, save for the Christmas ones, washing the main living area in a golden glow. Ziva starts the blessing, and then lights the first candle. She says the next two blessings, and carefully hands that first candle to Molly, who’s in her mama’s arms, and together, both of them light the first candle of the Menorah.

Ducky tells the Chanukah story. The adults listen, most of them kind of, sort of, know how the story goes, but they don’t know the details. And, of course, Ducky’s got details.

He’s sitting on the sofa, Anna in his arms, talking about Maccabees, as Ziva, Tony, Abbi, and Gibbs work on getting dinner ready.

There’s a joke about Chanukah food. That it’s designed to make sure the kids eat.

It’s not just a festival of light, but of oil. The sacred oil that burned and burned and welcomed The Lord back to His home in the Temple.

And, to celebrate that blessed oil, comes fried foods.

Latkes are just the tip of the iceberg. There’s sufganiyot, which are strawberry jam filled donuts. There are apple fritters. Deep fried, golden brown, crispy goodness is all over the place tonight.

They made “real food,” too, so dinner wouldn’t just be potato pancakes and dessert. Beef brisket, challah, apple sauce, and roasted beets fill out the meal.

The dreidel is a big hit for maybe five minutes. Molly can sort of use it, but she’s got not-quite-three-year-old hands, and the motion necessary to make it really spin is beyond her.

Kelly swats hers across the room, never to be seen again. She really enjoys the way it goes flying, though. Anna approves, too, giggling as it flies.

Until the second one went skittering away, (Tim looked a little sheepish at that, but his right hand doesn’t have the dexterity to spin the top properly, either.) with Mona chasing it, the adults were having an okay time with them. Ziva got hers to spin for a full minute.

Chanukah Gelt is a huge hit for little girls. Those go over very well with everyone in the crew. Even Anna gets a little bite of it, and her eyes light up as the chocolate touches her tongue.

The candles are kept lit until they burn themselves out, and these candles are designed to last about two hours. So, as dinner and playtime wind down, they sputter out. For little girls, Christmas Eve is almost done.
Only one thing left, putting up the stockings.

There’s a layer of excited tension flowing through everyone in the group. They keep eyeing Gibbs, wondering when he’s going to make his move. And, as it gets later and later, they keep eyeing him more and more.

There’s no way Abbi’s missed the way they keep looking at him, or the approximately fifteen times he’s been nudged by the various guys, and his answering smile and nod. (Especially when Tony and Ziva exchanged Chanukah presents, that got a lot of, come on! looks aimed at Gibbs.)

Something’s coming, and she’s pretty sure what it is.

It’s had her smiling all day, too.

The plan for the night was: Menorah, play time, dinner, put the stockings up, little girls go to bed, and then their annual It’s A Wonderful Life screening.

So, as they get moving in the direction of stocking time, Molly heads out from the kitchen with her plate of cookies for “Santa.” The decorations on those cookies range from the near-professional looking job that Breena’s done, to Kelly’s splats of frosting on top. It’s all good, and they’ll all be tasty.

Santa, both of them, are eyeing those cookies eagerly. Maybe not literally licking their chops, but there does appear to be some figurative chop licking going on. Elf Leader makes a crack to Mrs. Claus about how Santa I might like some eggnog, heavy on the nog, with his cookies. Mrs. Claus thinks that’s a good idea and gets one for her and Santa I to share. Santa II mentions that he prefers brandy, his Mrs. Claus shoots him a I’m perfectly comfy here on the sofa, go get your own look, so he heads off to grab one for himself.

But once cookies are in place, the various family members head off to their bits of the house to grab the stockings, and Gibbs offers Abbi his glass, saying, “I’ll get ‘em.”

For a few minutes, there’s the fuss and confusion that goes with putting up thirteen stockings. And there’s a moment of quiet as they get several shots of it. And then Gibbs says to Abbi as he feels the toe of her stocking, “Yours isn’t empty.”

She’s sitting in the armchair, near the tree, cup of eggnog between her hands, smiling at him, and raises an eyebrow. “You saying I’ve got an early Christmas present?”

He smiles back at her, sitting on the base of the fireplace, as she gets up, putting her cup down, going to her stocking, reaching in and taking out the small black velvet box. The rest of the family is watching, eagerly, not making a sound, bursting with happy, seeing this. Even little girls, who don’t know what’s about to happen, can feel the excitement, and go along with it.

The smile on Abbi’s face is wide, open, lighting up her eyes and beaming off her skin. Gibbs, sitting on the base of the fireplace, back against the stone wall, tugs her hand, and she lands in his lap, still not having opened the box. He kisses her and says, “Didn’t want you thinking this one was from Santa.”

She kisses him back, gently, eyes alight, voice teasing. “Who’s it from?”

He strokes the back of her neck, eyes tender and on hers. “My hands to yours.”

She flicks open the box and, for a second, she makes no sound, just looking at the collection of rings sitting in there. She blinks, hard. “Jethro!”

He kisses her again. He’d spent a lot of time thinking about this, not sure what to say, not really liking anything he came up with. Mostly, he was hoping and praying that he could get himself into this situation, and just know what to say once he got there.

“The rest of our days, let’s spend them together. Be my last thought at night, and my first thought in the morning, and my happiest thoughts in between. Let me support you, and you support me, and both of us grow stronger and better for it. I love you so much.” He kisses her again, and then asks, “Marry me?”

Abbi blinks hard again, and nods, not trusting her voice. She kisses Gibbs, hard, his face between her hands, and for a long moment the only sound is the crackling fire and Molly whispering, “Why is Abbi crying?” along with Breena’s “Shush. You can ask her in a minute.”

When Abbi pulls back, she’s got control of her voice again, and she’s smiling, with teared eyes, as she says, “Yes.”

Gibbs’s face can’t hold the grin. His skin is too small to contain the joy. It beams off of him, from his eyes and skin and the smile writ large on his face. He takes her engagement ring out of the box, slips it free from the wooden wedding ring, and gently slides it onto her finger.

Abbi looks at it for a second, the pearl seeming to absorb the golden-rose glow of the firelight, shimmering it back at them. She kisses him again, and again, and Gibbs is happy to kiss back. And this time, when they break the kiss, the rest of the family slips in to offer hugs and congratulations, and just bask in the joy, adding their own to it.

(And eventually, Molly does get her answer, from Ducky. Sometimes, people can get so happy, that just laughing and smiling can’t let it out, and those times happiness turns to liquid, and it leaks out in tears.)

Tim’s feeling gloriously content.

They’re in the media room, all around the TV, watching It’s A Wonderful Life. He’s on the sofa, Abby’s lying on her side, head in his lap. He’s got his hand on her low back, gently rubbing as those little, annoying, just-getting-ready contractions punctuate the movie. Breena and Jimmy are sitting on the floor, in front of him. Breena’s next to his legs, hand wrapped around his ankle, shoulder against his knee. Her head is on Jimmy’s shoulder, and Jimmy’s got his temple pressed against Abby’s tummy. Like with Tim, he’s petting gently as her belly stiffens and relaxes.

There’s the soft glow of the movie flickering over the room. All around him are the people he loves. If Abby’s contractions play nice, they’ll go to bed, snuggled in warm and close, and have a restful evening.

And if they don’t, maybe they’ll have a Christmas baby.
He kisses her temple as he rubs her back a bit more firmly. That’s three this hour. Maybe…

Nope. That’s the last one. Abby falls asleep during the movie and given how rare solid sleep is for her these days, he just stays there on the sofa as everyone else heads to bed. He waves Jimmy and Breena off, too. They linger, but the floor’s not as comfy as the bed and little girls will be up soon enough.

Plus, these days, Abby never gets more than two hours of rest without having to get up to pee, so it’s not like he’ll be here all that much longer.

He rests on the sofa, drifting himself, stroking her hair, aware of the going to bed sounds filtering through the house. (Tony and Ziva are across the hall from him, so he can hear footfalls and creaking. Someone turns on the water, he hears the rush through the pipes. Little sounds like that.)

Then, after a bit, it’s just him and Abby, alone in the quiet, dull light from the hallway filtering though the mostly closed door to the media room.

That’s a good end to Christmas Eve.
Pictures On The Mantle

Chapter Notes

Pictures on the mantle and little bits of conversation that go with them. No real narrative flow for this.

 Pictures from The Gibbs Clan Mantle

Birthday Dinner with Senior and Delphine
"Is that South Africa?" Penny asks Ziva. It's one of the few places she hasn't been.

Ziva nods. "We had one day with nothing planned. Just laid around in the shade and read."
"I took this one, right?" Breena asks, looking at the shot of Ziva starting to relax after they'd moved her into Tony's place.

"That is how I remember it."

"God, look at you two as kids," Breena says, staring at the shots of Tim and Jimmy next to each other.

"Didn't I tell you, Wonder Twins! You all thought I was just BSing it, but I knew."
"When did you stop being blond?" Ziva asks.

"I was still blond when you met me," Tim replies.

Ziva shakes her head and looks at Tim like he's insane. "You weren't that kind of blond when I met you. Jimmy?"

He shrugs. "Seven, eight. I don't know. Here..." He shows her a shot of him from high school.
"Death of a Salesman. You can see it's dark by then."

"That's you and Grandpa, right?" Tim asks Penny. He doesn't have much in the way of memories of his grandfather, just a few vague images and the scent of bay rum aftershave. He certainly doesn't remember him being that whiskery.

"Yes." She smiles, softly. "This was the day before he left for his last float. Tom took that picture.” Penny stares at it, thinking of the missing husband and the son she can't locate. She says a quick prayer to see Tom again, at least find out what happened to him.
"What are you, twelve in that shot?" Tony asks, joking, with Abbi.

"Nineteen. One of my girlfriends took it. We were stationed in Germany then, had a bit of leave, and decided to go visit Switzerland. That was a good time." Abbi looks at one of Tony's shots. "Speaking of twelve..."
"Yeah, I'm nineteen, too. See, I did at least one thing besides sports in school."

"Selfie with the Mrs.?"

"Yep," Jimmy replies, putting up the shot of him and Breena.

"Gotta get this one up, too," Breena adds. "This is what... the day after Molly was born?"

Jimmy looks over her shoulder, looking at the picture in her hand. "Something like that."
"Same day, I think. That's my jacket in the background," Tony adds.

Tim nods. "Yeah, I think I took that one." He picks up Molly. "Look, that's the day you were born."

Molly looks at the bundle in the picture and says, "No! Anna!"

Tim decides not to get into an argument with the tired toddler about which little person is in her daddy's arms.

"Is this what I think it is?" Tony asks, glee lighting his face.

Jimmy nods. "Yes. I brought it just for you. Halloween. I'm eight-years-old, and yes, that's a Mogwai."

Tony grins.

"Merry Christmas, Tony."

He's chuckling, looking at the shot. "This is the best thing you could have possibly gotten me, Palmer."
Jimmy nods.

"Oh... you really... Wow!" Breena says, looking at one of Abby's shots.

"First year of college I shaved it all off."

"Is that Luca?" Tim asks, seeing the resemblance, but not sure. The only version of Luca he's met was more than twenty years older.

"That's Luca."

"Whoa! What's this one from?" Jimmy asks.
"That's the last year I went to Mardi Gras with my mom and Paulette. Here... this is us about twelve years earlier."

"Talk about winning at puberty. You're what, seventeen in that all dressed up shot?" Tim asks.

"Yeah."

"This is me at seventeen."
"You look fine!" Breena insists.

"I look like a teenager. She looks like a twenty-five year old model."

"Paulette was really good at makeup."

"Speaking of seventeen..." Penny brings a picture of Ducky over. "This is your last year at Eaton, right?"

Ducky looks at the picture. "I am eighteen in that picture, and that's the party my mother held to say goodbye to all of my friends and family before joining the army. Two days later, all that hair would be on a barber's floor, and I'd be wishing for something as warm and comfortable as that sweater as the nights grew colder and our drill sergeant had us out marching around."

"Why did you enlist, Duck?" Gibbs asks. In all the hours, all the stories, Gibbs realizes he doesn't know that about Ducky, and looking at the picture, he can't see why Ducky might have wanted to get free of that. Granted, looking at pictures of him and his Dad, it's not obvious that Gibbs wanted to get away, either.

"There have been Mallards in the King's Own Scottish Borderers since there's been a King's Own Scottish Borderers. My father and grandfather died in their service. It was expected that I would put my years in. Everyone was... disappointed when I ended up in the Medical Corps, but that turn of events opened me to a life outside of a military Commission.

Ducky picks up another picture. "Medical school. This has to be from my second year, because my hair has grown back."

Tony shifts over, looking at Ducky's pictures. "Diving?"

"Yes, though that's a good twenty-five years later."

"You still like it?" Jimmy asks.

"It has been quite a long time, but I imagine I would."

Jimmy nods at that. "Next time we get to the ocean, we'll have to see if we can get some diving time in." Breena grins in agreement at that. "Haven't done it since our honeymoon. That was a lot of fun."

Tim raises his hand. "I'm volunteering to watch kids here and now."

"You don't like it?" Breena asks.
He shakes his head. "Nooo... It's stupid, but I get freaked out at the idea of all the air I can get to is strapped to my back. I don't like being deeper down than I can up in a few seconds."

"Then we'll give you the kids and have a good time," Tony says. "Ziva's got a shot of me in my wet suit around here, somewhere..."

"I left it at home."

"Or not."

"How'd you get that one?" Tim asks Abby, knowing no one else was in the lab when they were doing that.

"I hacked the security feed and got a screen grab. That's why it's kind of grainy."

He smiles at her, and gives her a quick kiss, sticking a shot of them dancing in the lab up on the mantle.

"Is there a story behind this one? You look like you've got a bit of naughty smirk on your face," Breena says to Tim.

"Nah. Senior was in for something, don't remember what. Ziva got the shot of us together." Tim looks at the shot more closely. Then he waves Abby over. "This is from right after we started dating, isn't it?"

Abby nods. "Yeah. That smirk is him perky over the secret romance thing." Then Abby's eyes go wide. "Wait! Senior did come by, and he and Tony and Gibbs were doing something, so you snuck down to the lab..."

Tim's eyes light up. "You're right!" He chuckles. "Yeah, that is a naughty smirk on my face."
"Drinking on the job?" Abbi asks.

"Impromptu engagement party," Gibbs replies.

Abby looks at the shot. "Tony and Ziva's, you can see them in the background talking to..."

Ziva looks at the shot, "Dornaget was offering his congratulations."

"At the hospital after Anna's birth?" Ducky asks.

Abby shakes her head. "My hair's black. Has to be Molly."
"What's this one from?" Abbi asks looking at a picture of Gibbs lounging around.

"It's Breena and Jimmy's place. I know that from the furniture."

Breena hears her name and checks the picture. "Just a random Shabbos."
Jethro carefully places the shot on the mantle. That's his favorite shot of Shannon. No one asks, but they all know who this is, and why she's on one side of Gibbs lounging. Then he places another shot next to the first one.

His favorite pictures of his two favorite people.

"Oh, Good..." Tim strokes Abby's back as he sees the picture. He was hoping they'd get at least one with Kate.

Then he looks with surprise at the next shot. "What is that from?"

Abby smiles. "You know. I don't really remember. Ducky, what's this from?"

Ducky heads over and glances at the shot of him holding Abby and Kate. "Some sort of office party, I'd say Christmas, but none of us are dressed for it."
Gibbs looks over at it. "Fourth of July '03. Morrow wanted us to have some sort of 'team building' office party."

"You don't look like you believe that," Penny says.

"I think he had some extra money in the budget and decided to do something fun."

Penny's looking at the picture. "It looks like it was."

Ducky smiles. "I believe it was."

"Oh, that's a good one!" Penny says.

"Little blurry, but it's okay," Abby replies, looking at a shot of the two of them all dressed up for Tim and Abby's rehearsal dinner.
Pictures without stories:
There’s one image of Christmas that just didn’t happen in the Gibbs house. The tree standing there with mounds of presents under it, waiting for Christmas morning. It certainly would have been easier to put all the presents out once the tree was up, but they have two toddlers and a baby, and all three of them live in eternal now. The concept of later is, at best, for Molly, sketchy, and non-existent to Kelly and Anna.

Thus, making them spend hours looking at presents, but unable to open them, just isn’t going to be part of the Gibbs Clan Christmas. Not for a while, yet. When the youngest one is four, if they want to put all the presents out before Christmas morning, fine, but right now, that sounds like a recipe for whining and crying, and just not fun at all.

So, as he and Abby head to bed, Tim’s got one last job before they can sleep.

Time to do some Santa-ing himself. Abby heads into the bathroom, and Tim turns toward Jimmy and Breena’s closet, flicking on the light. (Jimmy and Breena are, likely, happily sleeping away in Tim and Abby’s room, in the dark.)

Presents… Grab them… or… Hmmm… Shit…

He’s standing in a very empty closet. Just him, a few pieces of clothing, and an extra blanket.

Well, he would be Santa-ing if he could find the damn things. They’re supposed to be in Jimmy and Breena’s closet, with the idea being that whoever went to bed last would put them under the tree.

But he is not seeing any presents. At all. He listlessly scoots Breena’s coat a few feet down the hangar rack, as if all the present might be magically hovering in the air behind the coat.

Tim decides he’s way too tired when it takes him a full two minutes to come up with the conclusion that if the presents are not where they’re supposed to be, they are likely already under the tree, and that Jimmy and/or Breena decided to buy him and Abby a few more minutes of sleep.

He heads into the hall and checks.

Little Girl presents are under the baby tree, waiting for whatever o’dark-thirty hour the girls decide to wake up. He heads into the living room, and the presents for the rest of the crew are tucked under the tree or into stockings.

And with that, Tim heads back into his own room, ready to settle in with his loves, for, hopefully, a full six hours of sleep before little girls decide it’s Christmas time.

These days Ducky doesn’t need a whole lot of sleep. Five and a half hours a night, and he’s in good shape. In some ways, this is good. He’s got a few extra hours a night to read and study. In other ways… He’s got a few extra hours a night to be bored and restless if he’s of that mindset.

Tonight is not a restless night, though.

Normally, he’ll sleep from eleven to two, and another sleep from four to six.
And tonight, as they each play Father Christmas, he takes advantage of his somewhat unconventional sleep habits to deposit presents.

He heads out, packages stacked in his arms, and finds Tony sitting on the sofa, glass in hand, looking at fireplace.

“Anthony, are you up late or early?”

Tony half smiles. “Both?”

Ducky nods, and begins to place presents under the tree and into stockings. “Are you of an unquiet mind tonight?” he asks, feeling that there’s something pensive about Tony right now.

“I am of an unquiet room right now. Ziva snores. Pregnancy makes snoring worse. If I fall asleep before she does, it’s okay, I sleep fine, but…” He gives Ducky a look, one that indicates a certain level of understanding as to why Ducky’s up this time of night. “You know. Can’t get all the way through the night without a pit stop anymore, and getting back to sleep… Sounds like a lumberjack convention’s showing off their chainsaws up there.”

Ducky inclines his head. He may not know about the snoring half of it, but he does know that it’s his bladder’s unwillingness to go more than four hours without relief that wakes him up every night.

“All part of the joys of getting old.”

“Apparently.” Tony quietly sips his drink, listening to the quiet sounds of Ducky depositing presents.

When he finishes that, Ducky spends a few minutes looking at the pictures on the mantle. There’s probably close to a hundred of them up there. Big ones, little ones, every size in between. He’s not sure which picture is the oldest. There’s one of his mother as a girl, and one of Penny’s parents’ wedding. Both would have to be from sometime in the late teens, early twenties, but he’s not sure which.

“Gotta be at least a hundred years up there, right?” Tony asks, standing up, joining Ducky next to the mantle.

“I was thinking that. Mother was born in 1912.” Ducky smiles at that. “Did I ever tell you how I found out about that? We had thought she was older… I thought she was older. She was a pianist. Quite accomplished. There was a musical conservatory in London she had wanted to attend, but they wouldn’t take any student under the age of fifteen. So, with the help of her parents, one night she went from twelve to sixteen. And, then that fall, she began her studies.”

“How did you find that out?”

“After she passed, I read her journals. Mother kept quite extensive journals. She, when she still had her faculties, willed them, and a considerable bit of memorabilia, to the Smithsonian. Historical documents about life and times in the twenties, thirties, forties, and fifties. Since she was interested in making them public, I figured she wouldn’t mind me reading them.” He smiles at one memory. “Apparently my father was quite irked that her family wouldn’t let anyone court her until she was ‘twenty-one.’”

Tony laughs at that, looking at a picture of Mrs. Mallard from the mantle. There’s also a shot of Ducky with his father, but no pictures of the three of them, or of his parents together. “No pictures of them together?”

“Not anymore. We lived in London during the first part of the Blitz. The house next to ours took the direct hit. We had time to get to the Tube, and shelter there, but anything we didn’t bring with us was gone. That included all but the one book of photographs mother made sure was in her bag, ready to go at any moment. She saved their wedding picture, and I had that, but it did not survive the damage to our home.” Ducky flashes hot for a moment, at the memory of his parents’ wedding picture, destroyed by some hooligan who rampaged through his home.

Ducky forces the anger down, and looks at the picture of Penny’s family. “Captain Langston,” Tony realizes that Ducky has to be talking about Penny’s father, “looks to be a Lieutenant in that wedding picture. He was probably born in the early 1900s or late 1800s.”

“More than a century, then.”

Ducky looks at one of the pictures of him and Penny. “And with any luck, a century hence, our great-great grandchildren will stand here, and look at pictures of us.”

Tony sighs. His kids’ kids. It’s an intense and heady idea. “They’ll wonder why the pictures are two dimensional and don’t move.”

Ducky smiles at that. “Probably.” Ducky gently, minutely readjusts his favorite shot of Penny.

Tony watches him do it, looking at that picture, trying not to feel weird about it. “That’s really your favorite picture of Penny?”

Ducky nods, but he knows what’s hitting Tony’s buttons about that shot. He heard Tim and Ziva gossiping about Tony all but turning white and swallowing his tongue when he noticed the park ranger he was hitting on didn’t shave. “Anthony, you need to remember that my erotic identity was born neither in the modern day, nor the United States.”

“Come on, Duck, you’re not that old. Women have been shaving their pits for a long time.”

“It is true that women shaving their under arms predates me by about twenty years. In the US. In Scotland, after the war, where the climate was cool and fuel expensive, women dressed from head to toe. At the height of summer, a woman might decide to slip into a lightweight blouse and forego her sweater. Underarm shaving wasn’t unheard of, but it still only happened if the lady in question expected to be wearing something that might show her underarms off. And that just didn’t happen in the part of the world I lived in when I was an adolescent. When I was still deciding what qualified as sexy, which was right after the war, while we were still in the midst of the rationing years, the swell of a bosom pressing against a blouse or a pair of actual nylons instead of woolen stockings was the height of sexual excess.”

Ducky smiles a bit at a memory, looking at the picture of his farewell party. “When I was eighteen, I went to Korea. In Korea, the ladies naturally didn’t grow much in the way of body hair, but what they did grow, they certainly didn’t shave off. Maybe the ladies who tended to the Americans had different grooming standards, but the ones I got to know were as nature made them.

“So, to wrap up a long-winded bit of blather, no, underarm hair has never bothered me. In that the first lady who allowed me the intimate pleasures of her body had never used a razor on herself, it’s associated with some extremely sweet memories of being a young man.”

That Tony understands. “Aqua Net hair spray. My first real girlfriend used to tease her hair up with it. That smell…”

Ducky nods. He’s got a few scents along those lines, too. “Chanel Number Five and formaldehyde.”

That draws Tony up short. “That’s a really weird combo, Duck.”

“There was a woman I was quite fond of when I was in medical school. She wore Chanel. Medical Anatomy class meant I always had a whiff of formaldehyde on me. After the first week of class, it’s pervasive, soaking into everything about you. It was so deeply ingrained into my life at that point that I didn’t realize I was smelling it. Until I smelled Chanel years later, on its own, I didn’t know that part of what I had associated with that scent was formaldehyde. I know now. Put those scents together, and I’m twenty-three again, lolling on the grass, studying with her.”

“What happened to her? I mean…”

“How did I end up here, not married with a medical practice in Scotland?”

“Yeah.”

Ducky shrugs. “She was in love with my best friend.” He taps the man across from him in the farewell party picture. “I asked her to come away with me. She stayed with him. The last I had heard of them, they were married, had a few children.” Ducky shakes his head a bit, contemplating the life that was and the life that could have been.

Tony catches the look. “I know that one. Had that look on my face a lot when Wendy invited me to Christmas at her place to ‘catch up.’”

“Alas, Maggie never looked me up again. I have, and do, wish both of them well. Though, I’ll admit, I sometimes wonder how it would have turned out if she had come with me.” Ducky half smiles. “I imagine I would not have ended up here, and that would have been a loss.”

“Yeah. It would have,” Tony yawns. “Okay. Come on, both of us, let’s get back to sleep. Rugrats’ll be up soon.”

The “Rugrats” are indeed up soon, but the rest of the family gets a bit more sack time.

The McPalmers had decided that, instead of trying to keep baby girls in bed, and instead of getting all the rest of the adults out of bed early, to stagger present opening.
So, at six thirty, which is actually about normal wakeup time for baby girls, Molly gets out of her bed, and goes off in search of her parents.

She is distracted from this mission by the sight of the little baby Christmas tree, all lit up, with PRESENTS under it.

At about six thirty-five, Tim wakes to the sound of shrieking giggles and ripping paper. He rubs his eyes, sitting up, poking his wives, and saying, “I think she got started without us.”

Jimmy nods. “I’m on it. Make sure she hasn’t gotten them all open.”

Breena blinks a few times. “Baby gate across the hall next year.”

“Probably a good idea.” Abby heaves herself up and heads toward the bathroom.

Molly does not appreciate having to wait for her sister and cousin. It takes Uncle Tim and Mama FOREVER to get them out of their cribs and cleaned up. But finally, they come out, and join her, Daddy, and Aunt Abby with the presents, and have at it.

Kelly’s a little grabby on the presents. She wants ALL of them. Molly does, too. Anna’s content to chew on one of the boxes.

Tim gets Kelly to one side of the tree. Jimmy’s got Molly on the other. And thus, the two of them, with their daddies, open presents like toddlers. There’s lots of ripping, loud shrieking, and they aren’t setting any speed records. Each present must be opened, and then opened, explored, messed around with, (chewed on in Anna’s case), and played with.

It’s loud. Loud in the sense of loud little girls, and loud in the sense that a bunch of the toys make noise.

Then, of course, Molly has to check out what everyone else got, and make sure that it passes muster. Anna doesn’t want to share her stacking rings, (Re-gifted from Molly who stopped playing with them a year ago, and forgot she had them. They recycle toys and clothing between the two families. So, each girl did get one new, small present, and several toys that one or the other of them had stopped playing with and forgotten about.) and there’s a minor melt down between the two of them over that.

Abby averts further distress by the judicious application of Cheerios.

By the time Cheerios are eaten, and little girls are again cleaned up, and their parents have gotten into some semblance of appropriate for the outside world wear, (brushed teeth and put pjs on) the rest of the family is starting to make sounds of moving around.

It’s time to move onto Christmas morning with the family at large.
Tim would have to admit, as he’s sitting on the floor, in his PJs, with a little girl in his lap, mounds of wrapping paper strewn around them, people laughing and talking and thanking each other, while a large black dog frisks around in said mounds of paper, tossing them in the air and trying to catch them, much to the delight of the little girls, that he’s becoming a Christmas-sort of guy.

He’s got the sense that next year, Abby and Breena probably will be able to get him into some sort of Christmas sweater. (Abby’s been wearing a collection of them for at least a week now, and Jimmy’s a few feet away, helping Anna open one of her presents, sporting a navy blue sweater with reindeer and pine trees on it, to go with his red and black plaid flannel pj pants. Tim’s got an NCIS sweatshirt to go with his gray fleece pj pants.)

He supposes it makes sense. If you don’t have the good stuff that goes with Christmas, like a family to celebrate it with, and people around you whose enjoyment you can partake in, it’s a rather flat holiday.

But now…

The magic isn’t in the lights or food or presents. Well, he supposes they’re part of it. They’re the spell components. But without the people around, you can’t cast the spell.

And opening his Christmas presents, by himself, in his undecorated bachelor’s apartment, he didn’t have what he needed to make the spell fire.

And now he does.

Abby and Jimmy catch his eye as the chaos of present opening starts to die down. There’s one present that isn’t under the tree or in a stocking. It’s not wrapped, nor does it have a box or bag. It’s sitting, in Tim’s pocket, keeping close to him, and holding the warmth of his skin.

Breena’s a few feet from Jimmy, wadding up some of the wrapping paper, getting ready to toss it so Mona can go fetch it for them.

Tim nods back to them, and Jimmy reaches his hand out, gently pulling Breena closer to him.

She sends him an amused look, tossing the paper, and Mona happily bounds off to chase it. “Yes?”

He tugs her down into his lap, and Tim and Abby join them.

“One last present,” Jimmy says, holding her close, kissing her.

“Am I going to like it?” Breena asks when she pulls back.

“Yes,” Abby says, with a kiss of her own.

Tim takes it out of his pocket, and slips it onto her right ring finger, and then kisses the pad of her finger. “We made it for you.”

“Gibbs helped,” Abby adds. “Showed us how to do it.” (Gibbs is quietly watching this in the background, appreciating the look on Breena’s face as she sees the ring. She looks up at him, and flashes him a wide smile. He smiles back at her with a nod.)

Jimmy’s quiet, watching Breena twist it around her finger, feeling the satin smooth wood, watching the different whorls and burls flow into each other.
She looks up at all three of them, and kisses each in turn before saying, “It’s beautiful.”

Jimmy kisses her again. “Just a reflection of what inspired it.”

Two main meals today. Brunch, (second breakfast for Little Girls and Jimmy. The rest of the adults are fine with brunch,) and then party food, which will be, like always, smorgasbord style. Everyone grabs a plate and eats what they like.

While Abbi, Tony, and Ziva handle getting breakfast ready, and while Abby puts Anna down for her morning nap, the rest of the adults clean up shredded wrapping paper or play with little girls.

Brunch is French toast (using up last night’s left over Challah), turkey sausage, eggs, and fruit. It’s not complicated cooking, or particularly intense, which is a good thing, because Gibbs and Tim are already in the kitchen getting a start on dinner.

Turkey has to hit the oven by 10:00 to be ready by two, and the lamb should come up to room temperature before it hits the oven, assuming Tim wants a nice crust on it as well as a medium center.

And he does. He’s been researching how to do a proper standing rack of lamb for weeks now. He’s frenched the bones, dry aged the meat, prepared the herb rub, and gotten the perfect stuffing researched. Assuming he pulls this off, it’s going to look awesome and taste amazing. Four crowns of lamb chops, sitting up, mounds of stuffing inside.

(He’s also giggling a bit, mad scientist-style, as he’s getting his mise-en-place prepped. Gibbs gives him a very gentle head slap as he passes by Tim.)

Breakfast is almost ready when they hear knocking at the door. The party starts at three, but Fornell and Wendy usually show up early to help with the cooking, so Gibbs doesn’t think anything about it as he yells out, “It’s open.”

The door does open, and a voice, very much not Fornell’s calls out, “Any room for a stranger at this Inn?”

For a second, Tim feels his heart stop. He literally drops the onion he’s laying out for his stuffing as that voice stops his world. He takes three steps, clearing the kitchen wall, looks over, sees the face, the size and shape, it’s so much like his father, fear floods through him, but his grandmother dropping the pear she’s slicing for breakfast and flinging herself into his arms, saying, “Tom! Tom! What are you doing here?” pulls him out of the panic spiral.

Tom McGee, youngest of the McGee boys. The mystery uncle with the job no one talks about. The man who vanished months ago. And right now, he and his wife are standing in their foyer, hugging Penny, and saying, “Last week we got to a place with Wi-Fi, read the news, and found out it was safe to come home. Everyone who could have put together who set this in motion is taken care of now, so…” He smiles at his mom, kissing her forehead. “We’re home. Can we come in?”

“Oh, God, yes.” Penny retreats from the doorway, pulling them into the house. “God, you’re here!” Her hands rest on Tom’s shoulder, and caresses his wife, Lynn’s, cheek. She hugs both of them.
When she pulls back she says, “How’d you even know…”

Tom shakes his head. “Don’t ask. I know. I can always find the kids, you, John, or Mike. Visited the kids on the way here, made sure they knew we were okay, and decided to drop by here, let you see we were alive, and say thanks.” His eyes skitter around the room, looking at a collection of shocked people all staring at them. Then he lets go of his mom, and heads over to Abbi. “You’re Abbigail Borin, Director of CGIS.”

She stands up and offers her hand. That comment about ‘everyone who could have put together who set this in motion’ got her attention. She knows who’s standing in front of her, even if she’s never met him before. “You’re my anonymous letter writer.”

Tom nods. “You don’t want to know how long I had to sit on that before I found someone who might actually act on it.”

“I can imagine.” Abbi smiles dryly. “How about we get introduced, then pull up a seat, and a glass of eggnog, and tell us all about it?”

“We can do you one better than that,” Breena says. “Breakfast’ll be ready in about twenty minutes. Jimmy, go put their stuff in our room, and let’s get you set.”

Tom nods, glancing around. He can use some introductions. Obviously, the guy who just stood up to grab his and Lynn’s bags must be Jimmy, but, the rest of them? “Yeah. I’ve seen… Uh…” he glances between the younger guys and successfully points out Tim, “your picture from at least fifteen years ago,” and he nods to Ducky, “and we’ve talked online,” he looks at Gibbs, “White hair, so I know who you’ve got to be, but I’m sorry, for the rest of you, I don’t know who goes with what names.”

“We’ll get you settled in, and you can find out,” Jimmy says, offering his hand. “Jimmy Palmer. The one with the good idea of getting you a place to land is my wife, Breena. Come on, we’ll dump you in the deep end in a minute.”

Tom and his wife follow Jimmy down the hall. “We’re not putting you out of your room, are we?” Lynn asks.

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not a problem. We’ve bunked with Tim and Abby before, and I know we’ll do it again. The girls are so close in age that they share a nursery, and we get on well enough our part of the house is shared space.” Jimmy opens the door to his room. “Bathroom’s that door. Take a minute, get settled in, and get ready to eat. More food than you can imagine is about to hit the table, and it’s going to be that way all day.”

When Jimmy gets back, Penny’s in the middle of a quick backstory of Tom and Lynn McGee. He finds out that Tom is, or at least was, maybe, a SEAL, that both Penny and Gibbs began to wonder about him some when everything went bonkers back in September and October, but neither of them managed to get anything definitive before he went underground.

Penny had been suspicious that he was involved in what happened, because she could remember him asking about Gibbs and Abbi after the Coast Guard blew up, but beyond wondering, she didn’t have anything solid to go on.

“Looks like we’ve got solid, now,” Jimmy says, sitting at the table.
Tom and Lynn come out a moment later, and Penny stands up to join them, to just lay hands on her son again, feel that he’s really here.

He kisses her cheek. “Hi, Mom.”

She smiles at that. “Hi. Where did you go?”

Lynn shakes her head. “Which day? We didn’t spend more than three days in any given place.”

“Not quite true, we were on that ship for two weeks.”

Lynn gives her husband the side-eye at that. “Okay, yes, we were on one ship for more than two weeks. And what did that ship do?”

“Started in Jakarta and ended in Port Moresby.”

Lynn nods. “We’ve been all over. Mostly the Pacific and Indian Oceans.”

“Easier to stay below the radar if you keep moving,” Tom replies.

Penny leads them to the table, where food is starting to pile up, getting ready for the meal.

Abby heads in from their wing, Anna successfully put down for her morning nap, saying, “Did I hear…” she sees two more people at the table. “I guess I did.” She stares at them, and like Tim, for a second she has a visceral reaction at seeing Tom, thinking he might be John, but she notices the tall woman with white hair next to him, and Penny watching him with love in her eyes, and says, “You’re… Uncle Tom and Aunt Lynn, right?”

“Yes. Okay. Introductions,” Penny gets on top of this and makes sure that everyone in the crew knows who everyone else is as they all sit down for brunch.

Once they’ve all got names and an idea of who is who, Tim asks, “How long has it been since you were Stateside?” Best Tim can remember, he’s never met his Uncle Tom in person.

“Mainland, more than twenty-five years. Hawaii, ten years, and only to visit John or Mike. My job… They didn’t want me to be on US soil. Kinda illegal.”

That gets some glancing around the table.

“Aren’t you supposed to be a SEAL?” Tony asks.

Tom nods. “I was a SEAL. I was a SEAL for more than ten years. Being a SEAL meant I was involved in some interesting assignments. Those assignments got me working with other organizations, like the CIA. The SEALs and the CIA work together on certain delicate operations that need more muscle than the CIA can easily bring to the table.”

“Destabilizing foreign governments,” Penny adds. “Your Dad talked about that, some. Especially during the Vietnam era.” She doesn’t mention that Nelson didn’t think that was honorable. He saw his job as out fighting the other guy, weapons against weapons, skill against skill, and who was the better sailor or soldier, not spies and stealth and killing countries slowly one person at a time.

Tom knows what his Dad thought about stuff like that. His own take on it had always been that Dad had noble (read: old fashioned) ideas, and in a world of nuclear weapons, anything that kept the body count down and the armies sitting on their collective asses was a good thing. He and Penny share a look, they tended to be in agreement on that. “After several, delicate missions, the CIA recruited me to work for them, full time. They moved us to Japan, gave me a team, and every month I got a collection of new missions. My operational perimeters involved everything from full-detail-planning, to move this envelope from point A to point B.”

“And then one day you opened the envelope?” Abbi asks, passing the French toast.

“In a manner of speaking. More like the envelope was opened for me. One day the guy grabbing the envelope assumed I knew what was in it. I’d been delivering it for nine years at that point. Same place, same time, always the two of us. We were friendly. He asked how I’d gotten into that sort of business. I rolled with it, and then started doing so research. I didn’t like what was in those envelopes. Took me two years to figure out what to do with that information.” Tom takes a sip of his orange juice.

“Saw what happened to Snowden. He leaked everything, and what… Nothing happened. No one lost their job, nothing changed, not really. He ended up on the run, not the guys spying on their own system. I knew if I just went live with it… I’d end up dead, my team would be screwed, and the guys we blew the whistle on would get away clean. Nothing would change. Maybe there would be hearings, but… They’d just shuffle it around, hide behind their lawyers, and bury it with panic-of-the-day stories of mass shootings and terror plots.” Tim hears that and begins to wonder how much of the media cycle guys like his Uncle had been responsible for. That’s a cold feeling in his gut. Tom keeps talking, “I had half of the puzzle. I knew what was wrong, but I didn’t have anyone to give it to who could make a difference.” He smiles at Abbi.

“And then you’re on ZNN and the Coast Guard is upside down. And if you had the balls to take on your own department, and do it right, none of this whistle-blowing, wait around for Congress to take care of it, and let it get buried shit. Mom had mentioned you before everything went up, and was talking about you and Gibbs right after, so I had some details that made me happy, and if Mom liked you, and knew you’d do the job... It was time to move on it. Lynn and I cut out of town—“

“You make that sound so simple!” Lynn gently whacks Tom with the back of her hand on his shoulder. “Oh, by the way Dear, remember how I’ve been telling you that I work for the Navy as an administrator... Yeah, that’s not quite true. Guess what? We’ve got to drop everything and run, NOW.” Lynn is still looking a tad miffed at this. Tom gives her a chagrinned smile.

“Anyway, a friend of a friend sent an envelope, and now…”

“A lot of guys are in jail,” Tony says.

“Or dead,” Tom says quietly. Suddenly they get the sense that they may not have grabbed everyone with their net, for example, they never found out who was accepting those envelopes, but it wasn’t a problem, not anymore. They also get a sense that Tom may have done a few jobs while he was ‘on the run.’

“So, how did you do it? We’d only get little bits and pieces when we were somewhere we could get online without anyone asking any questions. For a long time it looked like nothing was happening, and then the President’s in jail, the Capitol’s in New York, and we’ve got an election a month late with 8000 candidates,” Lynn asks.

“Last I heard we were down to 3,867,” Tony adds, in his best cute/bratty voice, followed up with a look of withering scorn.

Abbi sighs, of the people at this table, she’s the most involved in how it broke down. “You got a few hours?”

“No plans to be anywhere anytime soon,” Tom replies.

“Good, because it’s a long story,” and from there Abbi starts to tell it, with everyone else adding their bits and pieces.

Gibbs loves seeing the ring on Abbi’s hand. It’s probably stupid, but he’s just feeling so satisfied to see it there, warm pearl and cool mother of pearl, glistening against her skin.

She’s talking to Tom, and between the two of them, they’re putting together the pieces of how everything fell apart, and how many more layers of crap may still be out there, and he’s sitting back, smiling, occasionally petting the back of her neck, feeling her silk fine hair against his fingers, just so content to watch her, hear her, and know, deep in his heart that she’s his.

That of the 3.5 billion guys on the planet, he’s the one she picked.

He’s feeling giddy, if it could be said that Gibbs, when not under the influence of powerful narcotics, can be giddy.

It’s closer to noon when Fornell and Wendy show up, with presents and ingredients for sausage and penne.

“No Emily?” Gibbs ask as they head in.

Wendy shakes his head. “Not yet. She and her mom decided they’ve been working hard and deserved some downtime and a treat. They decided to take Friday off, and headed down to Williamsburg for a spa weekend. They’ll be back up here, later, for the party.”

“Sounds like fun,” Breena replies, looking at Abby, Abbi, and Ziva, and thinking that they’ve got some girl time coming up soon. “What do you think Abbi, we leave the kids with the boys and do a girl’s weekend for your bachelorette party?”

Abbi grins and nods. “I can handle that.”

Fornell and Wendy both look from Abbi to Gibbs and back to Abbi, seeing the ring. Fornell gives Gibbs a hard, congratulatory whack on the back, and kisses Abbi’s cheek. Wendy swoops over to see the ring closer. “Oh… Very nice! Good work, Jethro.”

Gibbs smiles.

“So… plans?” Wendy asks.

Gibbs and Abbi look at each other. They’re aware of the idea that that ring indicates that at some point there will likely be a wedding. Gibbs shrugs. He doesn’t much care one way or another what or how. It’s enough that it happens, and he’d like the kids there, but beyond that, whatever makes Abbi happy is good with him.
Abbi flashes him a look that indicates she doesn’t have any firm plans in mind, either. “Not Alaska in December.”

Gibbs laughs at that, while the people around him look surprised.

“My sister thought it would be fun to have a wedding that both sunrise and sunset happened during, so she dragged us all up to Alaska in December. Then it snowed so hard we didn’t get to see either. I’m thinking it’ll probably be around here,” Abbi says. “Most of the family lives around here. My parents were willing to go to Alaska for my sister’s wedding, I’m sure they’ll travel here for mine.”

“Does your family have a hard time travelling?” Wendy asks.

“Not exactly. They travel just fine. It’s finding people to take care of the stock and the property that’s tricky.”

“Stock?” Wendy asks. Tom and Lynn also looking interested in this.

“Cattle. My parents have a ranch in Montana.”

“Oh,” says Lynn. She knows all about that sort of operation.

“Yeah. Finding someone to show up for a week to take care of 500 head of cattle can put a kink in travel plans.”

“I’d say. My brothers and I grew up on a farm in Kansas. Wheat. We didn’t have much stock. Mostly chickens and a few cows, just for food, for us. But you can’t just take a weekend off when you’ve got animals,” Lynn commiserates. “Is your sister part of the farm?”

“No… That’s my parent’s pet business, and they are having a hard time figuring out who’s going to run it when they get too old for it.”

“That’s why my parents didn’t want my brother joining the Navy. He came back to run the farm eventually, and brought one of his good buddies home a few times to visit, too,” she winks at Tom, “so it worked out, but it’s hard to find people who want to do that sort of work.”

Abbi nods, and she and Lynn chat about growing up on a farm, and about parents who are getting older, and need help running said farm.

“So, this is the new place?” Fornell says to Gibbs, looking around approvingly as he piles his ingredients onto the kitchen counter.

“Got it done with a minute or two to spare,” Gibbs is looking fairly proud of that, too.

“Looks like you did this up right.” Fornell glances around the kitchen, seeing lots of room to work.

“We knew a lot of the meals that got made here would be for at least fifteen people,” Tony adds, heading in to grab himself another cup of coffee. “You want some?”

“Yes, please. Fifteen? There’s really that many of you?” Fornell’s doing a quick mental headcount.

“Once Sean and Dave are on the outside, yes,” Tim says from his spot at the counter, where he’s mincing garlic.

Tony hands over the coffee.

“DiNozzo, have you…” Fornell looks like he doesn’t much want to ask, but he also wants to know. “Do you know what’s going on with Diane and Draga? She’s not talking about it, and Emily’s sad. She really likes him, and he hasn’t been around for a few weeks. She’s hoping he’ll be at the party tonight.”

Tony sighs. He does know, and he knows Draga won’t be here today. “Spent fifty hours in a car with him over the last ten days, yeah, I know.”

“Do I want to know?”

Tony shakes his head. “Probably not. When he was in the Navy Yard, you know, when it was bad, he got stupid, and then got stupider by telling Diane how he was stupid, and now they’re ‘taking some time to think about things.’ On top of that, his Ex is trying to make sure that Kevin can’t come up here to visit. She’s suing for full custody and no visitation rights because Eric’s ‘too dangerous.’”

“Shit.” Fornell sounds like he just got a mouthful of something vile. From everything he’s seen, Eric’s a good dad, and getting screwed out of his kid because he’s a cop ties a knot in Fornell’s stomach.

“Yeah, he’s getting burned big time. Right now he’s in North Carolina trying to convince a judge that having a hit called on him doesn’t make him an unfit parent. Last I heard, he wasn’t doing too well with that argument. I’ll hear more about it tomorrow. If you want to tell Emily that he’s being run ragged at work and fighting to get to see his son, he’d probably be cool with that.”

Fornell nods in agreement. He’s fairly sure what ‘got stupid’ means, and well, Emily exists because of people ‘getting stupid,’ so that’s not an issue where he’s going to throw any stones, but he’d prefer not to get too deep into that story.

The idea that it would be something as simple, or, well, maybe not simple, Tim’s not cooking simple for tonight, but as… mundane, as a rack of lamb that gets Fornell to finally, really, warm up to him, stagers Tim.

But, it is.

He’s tying off his crowns, after having seared them nicely, sharing the range with Fornell who’s browning up the hot sausage for his sausage, peppers, and penne, when Fornell says, “Thought you were the cookie guy.”

“I am the cookie guy. Well, one of them. Breena made the pretty ones. I made the mint ones. You ate three of them, right?”

Fornell nudges his food, making sure it browns but doesn’t scorch. “They’re good.”

Tim nods, taking that as his due.

“Don’t remember you ever doing any real cooking before. Cookies are easy.” Fornell says as his spatula flips hot sausage.
Tim inclines his head at that, too. Cookies are easy. That’s why they’ve been his go to dish for years. “Abby and I split cooking. Been doing it for a while now. Someone’s got to cook if we want to eat, but nothing fancy. Got serious about it after…”

Fornell nods. Tim doesn’t have to finish that sentence. He’s seen more than enough people who got out of DC get “serious” about food after. Hell, Fornell got serious about food too, even though he got out of the city every night, because you can’t watch people starve, first hand, and come away from it unchanged. (Well, he supposes you could, but that’s not the sort of person he wants to be.)

“You’re looking better than you did the last time I saw you.”

Tim’s sure that’s true, too. He doesn’t remember much about how Fornell looked, other than like salvation and breath and another chance at life. He kind of thinks his mind added the halo around him when he burst out of that tank, but maybe he really was right in front of the sun when he popped out.

“You were in and out, right?”

Fornell nods. “Yeah, even the National Guard wasn’t willing to try and take on a force of tanks. They let us bring food in and people out. Mostly taking out kids and sick people.”

“Where’d you learn how to do that?”

“Back in 1971 I spent some time at Fort Benning. Got good at it in Vietnam. First tank I was able to ‘borrow’ was a museum piece, but I could still drive it.”

“Oh. Do I want to know how you ‘borrowed’ a tank?”

Fornell smiles, eyes bright. “It’s a good story. I always liked undercover work. Put on a role, be someone else. So, I got my team together, explained what we were going to do. They made a backstory for me, and I headed over to the Virginia National Guard training grounds with the transfer orders for an M60. Claimed the West Point wanted one for training purposes. They were going to have the cadets take it apart and rebuild it.

“They called to check the orders, got Sacks, he claimed to be General Sacks, told them it was a legit order, and they got one out of mothballs for me.”

“And let me guess, once you’ve got a tank, it’s a hell of a lot easier to get more tanks.”

Fornell nods, still grinning. “It really is. Show up in a tank with orders and the right uniform, and people just start doing what you tell them to.”

Tony’s been sipping his coffee listening to that, and adds, “Okay, let me make sure I’ve got this story right. You find a uniform, have Sacks, Mr. Law and Order, pretend to be a General, and then you steal a tank, so you can steal other tanks, to get food in and people out of DC?”

Fornell keeps smiling, and nods. “I gave them back.”

Tim and Tony laugh at that.

“How on earth did you sell Sacks on that?” Tony asks. “His knees go weak at the idea of breaking the rules.”

“You never did know him well. He was fine with breaking the rules, for himself. He just didn’t like you doing it. But, when people are starving and the ‘rules’ are keeping them hungry, Sacks had no problems with breaking the rules. His only regret was the he didn’t know how to drive one himself.

“Once we’d been at it a few days, other tank guys started deserting from the National Guard crews and joining us. After that… Ended up with twenty-five tanks under my command by the time Jarvis got the borders open.” Fornell looks both Tim and Tony over. DiNozzo looks like DiNozzo, bit fatter than he remembers, but so is pretty much everyone in this crew. McGee’s looking better, too, but he knows that Gibbs was worried about him.

“You really okay, McGee? Almost swallowed my tongue when I saw you step out with no hair.” Which is code for the fact that Tim was so far gone even Fornell could see it and was starting to get worried.

“I’m… okay… enough. Doing better than I was. You were right, it’s more comfortable.”

Fornell’s eyes skitter over to Wendy, who’s talking with Abbi and Penny and Gibbs. “Until you get home and your wife thinks you look like a dork bald.”

Tim smirks at that. “Yeah. I’m not allowed to get my hair cut again anytime soon.”

Fornell nods in agreement. “Yep.”

They put little girls down a bit early. Can’t get them down too early, or their little body clocks will let them know it’s not time, yet. But, half an hour… that’ll work.

Tim’s on naptime for this afternoon. He’s thinking he might get one himself, too. He reads stories, and cuddles girls, and spends a few minutes slowly rocking in the nursery, listening to their getting settled sounds. All of that is lulling, and he’s feeling awfully drowsy by the time he gets out of the nursery.

When he heads to his bedroom, he sees Abby and Breena also getting a siesta. The more he thinks about it, the more a nap feels like a really good plan. Lie down, curl up between the girls, catch a few zzzs. Yes, that sounds excellent, and he’s in the process of slipping out of his pants and going to do just that when the little, cautious voice in the back of his head pipes up and says, “There are a bunch of outsiders in this house, now’s not the time to be caught napping naked with both girls.”

So, with a sigh, he puts his pants back on, and heads to the sofa in their living area.

Which turns out to be a very good thing, because in an hour, Fornell is looking for him, letting him know it’s time to put the lamb in the oven, and if he’d been shocked when he walked in on Tim with Diane, Tim’s fairly sure that heading in and finding him spooned between Abby and Breena, all three of them half-naked or more would have given the man a coronary.

By the time Tim’s got the lamb into the oven, the house is starting to fill up with people. Sarah and Glenn are over, also talking with Tom and Lynn, getting caught up. Tim heads to the sofa, kisses his sister, and sits next to her and her fiancée. He’s not really talking. A word here or there where needed to keep the conversation going, but he is listening, and enjoying.

He’s at home, with his family, sitting around with them, and it’s been so damn long since he’s done something like this.
He loves his adopted family. They’re his life. But, sitting here, next to two other people who remember his past, who were there and part of it, he’s feeling less adrift.

He’s got history here, as well as present and future.

It’s a good feeling.

“Our building is open,” Ziva says to Sarah a few minutes later.

“Email me your landlord’s contact information. We’re hoping to stay in the city, but our place is gone,” Sarah replies.

“You’re staying?” Lynn asks. “Why? I’m sorry, that sounds bad. You can work anywhere, so…”

“She can do her work anywhere,” Glenn adds. “I’m a fire inspector. This weekend is the first downtime I’ve had since they started the cleanup, and, besides our wedding day, I don’t think I’m getting another day off until June.”

“And I don’t want him burning time on his commute,” Sarah adds. “So, right now, if it’s in DC and in fairly decent shape, we’re interested.”

“Our building is both of those things. And it’s got a lot of empty apartments. Many people are not coming back,” Ziva says.

“A lot of the people in our building worked for the government. They’re either in New York right now, or don’t have jobs period.” Tony and Ziva glance at each other. They don’t mention the apartments that are empty because the people who lived in them are dead now.

Senior and Delphine make it over just about the time little girls get up from their naps. And for all of Senior’s foibles and follies, he’s an awesome doting-Grand-Santa.

He’s got little girls crawling all over him while he’s handing out too many presents, grinning from ear to ear, collecting sloppy kisses and full body hugs.

Ziva’s watching him, on the floor, in front of the fireplace, covered in babies, laughing deep and rich while little laughs echo his. Tony comes up behind her, wrapping his arms around her waist, fingers stroking over Dave’s bump, and kisses her neck.

She wraps her hand around his neck, giving him a gentle squeeze. “Next year is going to be insane, isn’t it?”

“The pile of presents will be taller than Dave.”

“Taller than Miri.”

He smirks. “If you say so.”

She rolls her eyes. “How long before you had Jimmy tell you?”

“He already told you I asked, didn’t he?”
“Breena did.”

“I’ll have you know that I made it almost two full hours.”

Ziva nods. “That’s an hour and a half longer than I thought you would.”

The Vances make it just as the sun is starting to set.

“So, this is what happens when you don’t have a case to work on?” Vance says, looking around the house, and then back to Jethro.

“I had some help,” Jethro says dryly.

Ed and Jeannie, along with Amy and Collin get in just as Jethro’s saying that. Ed looks around at the place and nods approvingly. “Good work.”

“Thanks.”

Then Ed starts telling Leon about how the house was a shell when he was here last.

Gibbs takes a discrete look, and notices that Amy still doesn’t have an engagement ring. He glances to Collin, who’s looking around at everything while Breena hugs her family, and gives him a look. The returning look hopefully means something along the lines of ‘ask later,’ but might just be Collin fobbing him off.

Gibbs isn’t sure and whenever they get around to another Bootcamp at the gym will be soon enough.

With the setting sun, Ziva heads to the centerpiece of their dining table, her menorah. Tonight, Molly and Kelly each get to light a candle, which makes both of them very happy, and their collective parents nervous, but it goes without a hitch.

Jeannie looks at the ham she and Ed brought without thinking about, beyond travels-well and feeds-lots-of-people, and says, “Should we have not brought this?”

Ziva shakes her head. “Most of the food on this table is unkosher, or if eaten with other food on the table, will be unkosher. As long as you aren’t bothered by me not eating it, I have no problems with you bringing anything you like to the feast.”

Tony’s gazing at it, succulent pink flesh rubbed with honey and spices, studded with cloves, sitting next to spicy cranberry relish. “Though not tempting me past what I can endure is a kindness. That looks amazing Jeannie.”

“Uh… Thanks and sorry?”

Tony nods with a soft whimper and makes himself look away.

“No LJ?” Vance asks, looking around. He enjoys his yearly visit with Gibbs’ “uncle.”
“Not this year. He’s got a ‘lady friend’ and they’re off with her family.”

“Good for him.”

Gibbs nods. “It seems like he really likes Lorraine.”

Amy’s standing next to Breena, with Abby and Ziva and Abbi. She’s gotten the details on Abbi’s engagement ring, and has attempted to get some sort of girly talk going about wedding planning, but Abbi’s got nothing for that.

(Though, and she wouldn’t admit it, yet, but she is starting to think that a New Year’s wedding, next New Year’s, not the one next week, would be good. There’s a vague image of a long sleeved dress, and snow, and cold, and lots of white and silver starting to form in the back of her mind.)

So, after an unsuccessful foray into wedding talk, Amy does get them onto babies. “You look done,” she says to Abby.

Abby nods. “I am. He’s welcome to get moving anytime he likes.”

“And this little one?” she asks Ziva.

“Late April. Tony’s birthday is the twenty-second, so maybe he’ll share a birthday with his daddy.”

“Oh, God,” Abby says, “Can you just imagine that? He’s already going to be over the moon when Miri shows up, can you imagine if they’ve got the same birthday?”

Breena and Abbi snigger a little at that, and Ziva smiles with them.

Amy looks over her sister and Abbi. “Any other babies in the works…”

Abbi shakes her head. “No. Not going to happen. I’m good with being…” she looks at the ladies… “Uh… I’m younger than you,” she says to Abby, shaking her head, “not gonna be Grandma to your kids.”

Abby nods along with that. It would feel weird to have her kids calling someone two years younger than she is and only one year older than her husbands Grandma. “Then, like with Penny and Ducky, you can be their Abbi,” Ziva says.

“Pop and Abbi,” Abbi says it, feeling it. Not like it’s new, that’s what the girls that are talking call them anyway, but it means something new now.

She glances across the room, and sees Penny talking with Tim and Sarah. She can’t hear what they’re saying, but can watch the three interact. Thirty years from now, she’ll be seventy, and the little girls playing with Kayla on the floor will be adults. She tries to fast forward time, get a feel for Molly, Kelly, and Anna as adults, but even having seen pictures of all their parents as children, she can’t come up with an image of them as adults.

But, even without the image, she knows, that (with any luck) thirty years from now, she’ll be in this house, spending Christmas with them, and maybe the people they’ll add to the family, too. They’ll be just as much her girls as Sarah is Penny’s.

Abbi tunes in again, hearing Breena say, “Who knows? I’m not throwing up, so obviously I’m not pregnant now.”
“That sounds like you’re thinking about it,” Amy says, smiling at her sister, imaging another niece.

“Have them close together, and we get the house back sooner,” Breena adds.

Jeannie comes over, hearing that. “Good plan. It took nine years to get you all out of the house. Do them all at once, get each stage done in one sweep. None of this get done with potty-training one of them and then turn around and start all over again stuff.” Jeannie watches the girls for a moment. “Although there is something to be said for not having two in diapers at once.”

“That’s going to be us in a month,” Abby says. “Year and a half and newborn.” She groans, melodramatically. “What the hell were we thinking?”

Breena smiles at her, wrapping an arm around her shoulders. “Lucky for you, you’ve got some good friends to help out.”

Abby kisses her cheek. “Trust me, I know it.”

Tim’s eyeing the eggnog. Not like he’s got to drive anywhere tonight, and another one of them would be really nice.

Senior distracts him from his mental debate about another drink with, “McGee, your sister is here, your grandmother is here, and your aunt and uncle. Where are your parents?” Senior asks, finally realizing that he’s never met McGee’s parents.

Tim cringes a bit, mentally, but makes himself answer Senior blandly, “I understand my father is in Hawaii, and my mother and her husband live in Texas.”

“You understand… Oh, right. He’s Navy. Is that code for he’s on some sort of top-secret, you-don’t-get-to-talk-about—“

“Dad!” Tony grabs Senior’s arm, sweeping in. “Tim doesn’t know. Here, how about you ask Tom, if anyone knows, he probably does.”

Senior smiles blandly at Tim, sure that he’s just stepped onto some Navy thing.

Tim nods at Tony as he pulls his Dad away. The wider family doesn’t know about the drama with his parents, and he’s happy to keep it that way.

“So, do we have a President, yet?” Ed asks Leon.

“Last I heard twenty more guys got booted from the race. They still haven’t gotten the count done in New York, Illinois, or Pennsylvania,” Leon had been listening to NPR on the way out here, and they were, like every other news outfit, covering the never-ending election.

“Gonna be a long race. What happens with you guys?”

“We’re back up and running. Officially, we, the whole Navy, is under new management, though we don’t know who, yet. Jarvis handed in his resignation. He’s officially the Governor of DC right now.
I’ve heard that there’s a woman named Sarah something-or-other. She’s not Navy, but the company she runs makes things we use. Rumor has it she might get the nod.”

“You okay taking orders from a civilian?” Ed appears to have picked ‘civilian’ carefully, and Leon wonders if he means woman.

Leon shrugs. “Not like it’s the first time it’s happened. If they’re good orders, I’ll take them from anyone. If they’re bad orders, I don’t care how many ribbons are on your chest. If this last few months show anything, it’s that we’re done ‘just following orders.’” “How’s paying for the cleanup going?” Senior asks Diane shortly after she and Emily get in.

She groans and slumps. Hours of spa time had helped to unkink some of what she’s thinking are going to be permanent stress knots from what she’s been doing lately. Just talking about it is starting to bring them back. “The cash you brought in is a very good thing, but it’s still… I mean, we’re not in danger of bankruptcy, but…”

“It’s long and hard and everyone promises everything and very few of them deliver.”

Diane nods. “In a nutshell. And a bunch of the ones who are delivering are trying to rewrite the deal while it’s happening.”

Senior nods, too. He’s been there and done that, many times.

“On the upside, trash collection is back in full swing. We’ve finally got four full-time EPA inspectors checking the removal crews to make sure they’re taking things out in a way that’s up to code. I’ve got twenty building inspectors on the job now, so I’m starting to get full neighborhoods approved for tear down or renovation. It’s starting to get moving, but it’s slow.”

“At least a year before it’s done?”

Diane is sure that Senior’s looking for an angle on this, but she doesn’t care. If he’s willing to cut them in for a finder’s fee of whatever he makes on her tips, she’ll take it. She and Jarvis have talked long and deep about how he’s got no tax base right now, and if he wants people to come back, he can’t be jerking up his tax rates to make up for the deficit. So, she’s comfortable answering, “If not more. Probably eighteen months. Hospitals and schools are going to get the green light a lot faster than that, though. The real question is who’s going to come back when it’s all done.”

“There is that.” Senior waves Penny over. “Junior tells me you’re up in New York, working to get DC turned into a state.”

Penny smiles at Senior and Diane. “That’s the idea. We think it’s going to pass, too, but we’ve got to see who actually shows up for the next Congress before we know for sure.”

“Any idea where the next Capitol is going to be?” Senior asks. Both Penny and Diane can see he’s definitely angling for a tip with this one. Anyone who knows where the next Capitol is going to be before it’s picked, can make a lot of money on real estate.

“Not yet. I know some of the Congressmen would like Hawaii. I’d miss the kiddos, but I know Ducky and I wouldn’t mind getting out of New York in winter and going somewhere nice and warm. New York, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, Las Vegas, and Chicago are bending over backward to try and get chosen. I do know that given the way they’re lobbying, and the comments we’re getting from other states, that this President will get to pick where his Capitol will be, and where the next one will be, that way any State after this one will have six years to get ready. Take Wyoming, there’s nowhere in the state to house the at least 40,000 new people who will move in with the new government. Several of the smaller states have that same problem. They don’t have the housing capacity ready to deal with the influx of people. Don’t have the schools, don’t have the medical infrastructure, don’t have any of it ready to go.

“The idea is that six years will be enough time to get ready for the influx of people. And with a little luck, since none of them will be eligible for re-election, some of them will chose to stay in their new town, instead of just up and leaving a ghost town when the capitol moves on.”

“That sounds like a mess,” Diane says.

“We’ll see. It’s supposed to help shake things up and prevent too much power in one place at once time,” Penny replies, but she’s also well aware that for a lot of the more rural states, it likely will be a mess.

“Sounds like it’ll do that,” Senior says. “At least on the surface.”

Penny nods at him. “That’s how it always is.”

“Sounds like overkill,” Tom says, drifting over, handing his mother the coffee she’d asked for. “We did it this way, we fu—screwed it up. Sorry, sailor talk, I try to edit, but sometimes it doesn’t work so hot. Anyway, we screwed it up, now we’ll try screwing it up in a new and interesting way.”

Penny inclines her head at that. “Probably be good for helping the people in charge see that the rest of the US isn’t just a blank bit of map between New York and Los Angeles.”

“Maybe. My guess is that by the time they’re done with urban states that have big cities with civilized amenities’ to descend on, they’ll change the rules. South Dakota isn’t ever going to house the Capitol, let alone Idaho,” Tom says.

“Fortunately, that’s not a problem your mother or I will ever have to deal with. More than enough big population states to last out what’s left of our lives,” Senior says.

“What about us, I mean, what about the Navy? Have you heard any rumors on that?” Tom asks.

“The deal is set to lease all Federal buildings and landmarks back to the US. Just got to get the new congress into session to vote on it.” Penny shakes her head. “Half of the guys who we were dealing with wanted to start everything from scratch. Anything that the Federal government had ever touched was taboo to them. Another two-thirds think that most of what the Government did it didn’t need to be doing. It took a lot of talking to get them to decide that not starting over from scratch just because you’re miffed at people who aren’t in charge anymore is a good plan.” Penny sighs. She’s spent hour and hours and days and days going over numbers, pointing out how silly it would be to move anything that didn’t need to be moved. Money is tight, and there’s no reason to pay for anything that doesn’t need to be paid for.

“So, they’ll stay at the Navy Yard?” Senior asks.

“That’s the plan.”
“You pulled the trigger?” Diane says to Gibbs when they get a quiet moment.

He nods, looking pleased with himself.

“Good. You do right by her.”

“I intend to.”

Diane shakes her head a bit. “We all intend to.”

“I will.”

That gets a small smile.

“How about your boy, falling short of his intentions?”

Diane raises and eyebrow at him and sips her eggnog. “Are you asking about my love life?”

“I’m… giving you a chance to talk if you want to.”

“Yeah, you would. I take it you’ve got the story?”

“Bits and pieces. Overheard him talking to Tim a while back. He’s not here now. Might be doing the math and coming up with five for two plus two, but I think I’m close enough.”

“You probably are.” Diane licks her lips and shakes her head a bit. “Look, I don’t hold it against him. Not… I saw him when he got out… I mean, I know. I know the crap people do when they’re miserable, just to keep themselves going. I get it. I don’t love karma coming back and biting me in the ass, but I get it.”

“Him not being here isn’t about that?”

“It is, and it isn’t. He really does need to be in North Carolina right now. That’s why he’s not here. Him not being with me is about the long conversation we had after he told me about what happened in the Navy Yard.” She looks away from Jethro, scanning the room, seeing couples and families making merry. “My boy.” She copies Gibbs’ lead. “I’m almost fifty, Jethro. He’s twenty-nine. Yeah, he’s cute and fun and sexy but… God, he’s so young. What the hell does he need me for? And, more importantly, do I want him?”

“Do you?”

“Yes. No. I don’t… I like him. He’s nice. He’s pretty. He doesn’t want me to be someone else. Emily loves him. I’ve certainly done worse. But I don’t see growing old with him because when I’m old he’ll still be middle-aged. Hell, I’m not sure about anything long term with him because he’s still growing up.”

“You thinking I’ve got some insight into that?”

“Add ten years to the numbers and that’s you and Abbi, right?”

“Yeah. It is.” He rubs his face. “I don’t know. We’ve got now, right? Tomorrow isn’t a given, and yesterday was too damn empty and lonely for words, so we might as well enjoy now, right?”

Diane smiles a little at that.
Fornell’s on the back porch, smoking, with Senior, who’s got a cigar of his own, and Leon. Plans for Post-Apocalypse smoking quitting haven’t exactly been working as well as hoped.

“You’re almost done, aren’t you?” Senior asks Fornell between puffs.

“This fall was my last hurrah.” Fornell shakes his head. “Not going to top that, not ever again. I’m doing paperwork on it until the end of time, but officially the 2nd is my last day. Something of an anti-climax because I’ll be back again on the 3rd to write more reports, but I hand my badge in next week.”

Senior takes a deep puff of his cigar. “You’ll like it. More time with your family, time to do the things you always wanted to…”

Leon’s nodding on that. He likes the idea of more free time, but he wonders, if, like Morrow, within a few minutes of retirement, if he’ll be looking for a new agency to start up with.

Fornell shrugs. “Says the eight-eight-year-old who’s still working.”

“I like expensive toys. Gotta pay for them somehow.” Senior holds up his cigar. It’s not legal in the US, and very expensive.

“I thought you were quitting,” Gibbs says to Fornell as he heads outside to join them.

“I am,” Fornell says, inhaling.

“Yeah, looks like it.”

“Down from five to two a day now. It’s slow, but it’s happening.”

Gibbs eyes Fornell, Bullshit in his gaze.

“Quiet, you. Wendy, Emily, and Diane are already on me about it. Don’t need a third ex-wife ganging up on me.”

Leon and Senior laugh at that idea. “Don’t ever remember seeing either of you out here before.”

Senior say, part of his nightly routine is one cigar. He’s been out on Gibbs’ porch for them previous Christmasses.

“Quit the first time around when Emily was born.”

“Got done back in ’08,” Leon adds. “Probably the same reason you did. My wife didn’t want the kids getting lungfulls of it, and it’d be easier to keep them from doing it if I wasn’t.”

Fornell nods at that. “Exactly.”

“Then they decided to start up again,” Gibbs adds.

“Yeah, sit there looking at me all high and mighty, Sniper-boy,” Fornell says. “You spent the whole time outside in the fresh air. If you had ever smelled the inside of an M60, you’d know this is self-defense.”

Senior laughs at that. “Tank smell… Ooh… That stays with you.” He makes a disgusted face. “Haven’t been near once since Korea, and that smell…”

Fornell nods to Gibbs. “See, he gets it. Four guys, hot as hell, our ventilation wasn’t quite right, and we didn’t have the time to fix it, so we were getting gas and a bit of exhaust in there, too. It stinks. You don’t want a sense of smell in there.”

Leon laughs, long and hard. “Listen to the little kitten complain. Four guys? Who got to go home every night and get a shower? Oh, boo hoo! Six hundred.” Leon inhales deeply, remembering how nasty that was, even with his cigarette-dulled sense of smell.

Fornell bows to him. “Fine. You had it worse. We’re both coping the same way.”

Leon nods. “And our wives are both unhappy about it.”

“Dad!” Kayla Vance steps out, disapproval all over her face.

“And our girls.” He stubs out his cigarette. Kayla looks up at him, rolls her eyes, and hands him a pack of cinnamon toothpicks.

Gibbs smiles at it, seeing her mother shining through Kayla’s body language and eyes.

---

“It’s midnight, right?” Tim says to Jimmy as he hands Kelly over for her last goodnight kiss.

“At least,” Abby replies.

“Goodnight little girl,” Jimmy says as he lays her down.

Kelly murmurs something soft, could be ‘Uncle Jimmy’ might just be a few sounds. Anna and Molly are already down, also making their settling in sounds.

The adults creep out of the girl’s room, and head to their own. The party is still going, though some members have headed off. It’s actually only seven thirty, and they will rejoin it in a bit, but for right now, some quiet with each other is nice.

“So, your Aunt and Uncle in the next room,” Breena says, flopping onto the bed.

“Yeah, if there’s ever a night where we need to be quiet and restrained…” Jimmy adds, curling around her.

“He’s not quiet when he’s restrained,” Abby says with a giggle, patting Tim on the bum and sitting down on the bed heavily. She lays on her side, and he sits at her feet, pulling off her shoes and starting to rub them.

“Ah…” Her eyes close. “Feels so good.”

“Should we be… I don’t know… making something that looks like a bed on the floor?” Breena asks.

Tim shakes his head. “We don’t have anything to make something that looks like a bed with. Every blanket and sheet we have, we’re using.”

Abby’s eyes go wide. “Did the sheets in your room get washed?” They made the bed after the first night here, but Abby doesn’t know if the sheets got washed, and… yikes… Not the sort of thing you want your Aunt and Uncle sleeping on.

“Already got them,” Breena says.

“Good. That’d be way more information than they need,” Abby says.

“As opposed to the four of us sharing a bed… platonically?” Breena asks.

Tim shrugs. “I don’t think they’d just walk in, but we’ve got a lock on the door between us and the bathroom, so…”

“Besides, even if they did walk in, who are they going to tell? Your grandmother?” Jimmy says.

“Your dad,” Abby says.

Tim lets go of Abby’s foot to extend his middle finger. “Fuck him. Hell, if there’s anyone I’d like to be out to… Just to see that little vein in his forehead explode.” He flicks his fingers in an exploding gesture. “It’d twitch when he’d get pissed, and this… He’d stroke out.” Tim smiles at that mental image.

Abby wiggles her foot, a get back to that gesture, and Tim goes back to rubbing.

“I was going to grab a nap with you two, but thought better of it. Worked out pretty well, Fornell came looking for me, and speaking of guys who’d stroke out if he walked in…”

“He just walked in?” Abby doesn’t remember that.

“Tony thought you and I were gaming,” he glances at Jimmy, letting them know who you and I is, “And told him to just head on it. He found me on the sofa. I assume he would have knocked if I hadn’t been on the sofa, but… He didn’t before. And if he thought you,” he glances to Abby, “might have been sleeping, he might have gone in without knocking so as not to wake you up.”

“And you don’t need to hear him going off on the three of us?”

“Yeah, I imagine it’d be more impressive than ‘Holy Fourth of July Weenie Roast!’ Probably something along the lines of screaming for Gibbs and you,” he pets Jimmy.

“Then he likely would have been disappointed by the lack of sudden domestic turmoil,” Jimmy says with a yawn. “Why does it feel so late? We work longer hours than this all the time.”

Tim stretches a bit. “I don’t know, but it does feel late. Maybe it’s because we know we’ve got to get up early.”

None of them are happy about that. They’ll get up. Jimmy’ll ride into work with Tim and Abby. Breena will take the girls, dropping Kelly off with Heather, and then her girls to daycare, before her day starts. The only downside of the house is the hour and twenty minutes between it and their homes.

“We could just pack them up and go home,” Breena says, and her three spouses decline that offer, none of them want to do any of that, now.

She sits up, and offers her hand to Jimmy, “Come on, let’s do some more merry making.”

He smiles up at her, and takes her hand. “You two coming?”

Abby nods. “In a few. This feels too good to stop.”
Tom and Lynn had been in the south Pacific when they got the news that it was safe to go State side again. Their first leg of that trip had been to head to Australia, where good communications is a given, catching a plane to the US wasn’t much of a challenge, and Mike and Darla could put them up for a few days.

Having ended up on Mike’s door, and having explained their plan to head east, Mike had given them a heads up on the John situation, which Tom hadn’t been aware of.

He hadn’t even known John was out of the Navy. He really hadn’t known about the John/Tim dynamic. He knew John had kids, but he’d never seen them in person. But, apparently Mike had put some feelers out, and gotten his hands on the real reports of what happened on the Stennis (as opposed to the ‘official reports’ which have a somewhat different story). When Tom asked how bad it was, Mike just shook his head.

But he did know, after a late and somewhat boozy conversation, that Mike was concerned about the east coast branch of the family, enough to have sent John a note about them, one which John hadn’t responded to.

John hadn’t responded to anything sent his way. He didn’t write Mike back either, when he sent off a ‘So, now that it’s all coming out, I haven’t been in the Navy for a few decades, how are you doing?’ letter.

Tom’s concerned. Enough that on the trip back to Japan they are going to stop in Hawaii and check in on him. John’s not his favorite brother, that was always Mike, but he’s still Tom’s brother. And, once Tom got his half of the picture together with Mike’s half of the picture, a conversation with John about his future went on Tom’s to do list.

Tom’s half of the information was this: there are eleven Admirals of the US Navy. Eight of them were involved in the election buying scheme. Mike’s half added this to the mix: The US Navy is under new management and scrambling for talent. And both of them know that the people who knew what really happened with the Stennis, are, for the most part, out of the Navy now. The ‘official’ report shows that John’s battle group failed the test, and that he resigned in shame after. Anyone who casually knew John and his demands of constant perfection would believe it.

The party’s rolling to a close, people heading off because there’s work tomorrow. Tom is looking at the pictures on the mantle, thinking about his family, thinking about John. He knows there aren’t a lot of his family, partially because a lot of his mom’s pictures didn’t survive her home being ransacked. But he also knows that a lot of the pictures are missing because they contained John.

He can only find one shot with John in it. There are pictures of him, James, and Mike. He smiles, seeing the picture of James’ Annapolis graduation. John hadn’t been able to get leave to get home for it, but the whole rest of the family is there, standing next to James. Tom thinks that’s probably the last picture taken of James. He knows it’s the last picture they have.

They don’t have the shot of John’s graduation up on the mantle. He has that picture. It’s the last shot of their whole family together. The last time they were all in one place.

Penny sees him checking the mantle. She lays her hand on his shoulder, and he wraps his arm around her. “You okay?” he asks her.

Penny knows what he’s asking about. “I’m moving forward. But, yeah, I have bad days. It’s… I thought James was the worst thing you’d ever feel as a parent.” She swallows hard. “Turns out that’s not true.”

Tom keeps his voice low, there are people around, though none of them are paying attention to him and his mom. “Mike thinks Jimmy’s dangerous.”

Penny shakes her head. “He’s not the only one.”

Tom’s not sure it that means Mike isn’t the only one who thinks that or if Jimmy isn’t the only one who’s dangerous. He sighs, both interpretations are likely true.

“How dangerous?” Mike watches Jimmy. He’s on the far side of the kitchen, talking with Ziva, his arm around his wife, looking about as troublesome as a cotton ball.

Penny, who knows there’s steel under the fluff, says, “I don’t know. I hope never to find out. Why?”

“In a few weeks the new Congress will convene. They’ll appoint a new Secretary of the Navy. She’ll start appointing and promoting new talent. John and Admiral Siddons are on the short list to be brought back. They’ve got almost perfect track records, they’re both under seventy, and they weren’t involved in the recent mess. I don’t know who you’re talking to in New York, but…”

Penny swallows and nods. “Yeah. Okay. I…” She hates this. Swimming in Navy politics was her job for a long time, but part of her deal with Nelson was that once he hit flag rank, she wouldn’t have to do it anymore. Going back to it, and to torpedo her son… Hates this. “I can spread the word that John can’t come back.”

Mike keeps looking over the pictures. The lack of John should say everything that has to be said, but he still has to ask, has to hear it for it to be real. “Did he…”

Penny nods. “Yeah. He did.” She looks like she’s tasting something awful. “It wasn’t just a misunderstanding or something got out of hand or…” She nods to Tim, who’s by the tree, with Abby and Ducky. “Sheer luck he’s still with us.”

“Grace of God?”

“If you’re inclined that way.”

Tom kisses his Mom’s cheek. “Okay. Sorry to get you thinking about this now. Supposed to be a happy night.”

She hugs him back. “You get to my age, and all your happy moments have a shadow on them. Lost too many people for that not to be true. If you’re lucky, those shadows make the light a little brighter, and they keep you from being blinded by the dazzle.”

Unlike Tim and Jimmy’s late, it is legitimately late as Abbi and Gibbs are putting away the last of the dishes.

Tomorrow, she’ll head into work, and he’ll go home, get everything packed and ready for visiting her parents’ place. Then, on Tuesday, Mona heads over to… whichever house the McPalmers are at, and off they go to Montana.
“How about New Years’ 2018,” Abby says, tucking a wine glass into the cupboard.

“Mmm?”

“They’ll want to know when we’re getting married. Next New Years’, you like that?”

Gibbs thinks about it for a second. “Sure. Any day you want, I’m good with.”

She smiles at him. “You want a real wedding, or just roll over to the courthouse, pick up the papers, and dinner here after?”

He shrugs. “I think you get to pick on that.”

“I know I get to pick. I’m asking for your preferences.”

“Wouldn’t mind doing it here. We already know everyone we’d want to invite fits here.” He thinks about it a bit more. “Kind of want a real wedding. Doesn’t have to be a lot of people, but...” he’s not sure how to even begin explaining the desire to show her, and them, and what they’re doing off. He does know that he wants everyone he loves to be part of this, and see that the two of them are doing something important, something that matters. He rubs his lips together, thinking. “It’s not just a party. It matters, and... I’d like everyone to see that. But... I want to celebrate, too. It’s happy, you know?”

Abbi smiles at him again, and kisses him. “So... you might like something fancy?”

“I’ve been told I clean up nice. And I know a guy who knows a guy who makes a great tux.” He winks at her, remembering them playing with him dressed up, and the very good time they had at Senior’s wedding.

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

“Do you want something fancy?”

“Maybe. You’ve got your pension, and I’m getting my director’s salary. Not like we’re saving up to buy a house or fill up college funds. We could do something fancy.”

“We could.” Talking about that makes Gibbs think of something. “Are your parents going to try and pay for this?”

Abbi shrugs. “Don’t know. I think they paid for my sister’s wedding, at least part of it, but she was twenty-four when she got married. They gave me ten grand to put down on my house when I bought it, so that might have been them keeping the score even between us.”

“I’d feel... odd... if they wanted to pay for it. We’re not kids.”

Abbi nods at that. “Yeah. I think they might feel odd if we needed them to pay for it. We’ll talk. They’re pretty good about being open about things like this. I don’t think they’ll get annoyed if we say we’re paying for it. And if they were planning on paying, we’ll probably end up with a big wedding present.”

“Tony said Senior tried to do something like that.”

“I take it he wasn’t very receptive to that.”

“Not so much.” Gibbs sets the last plate onto its shelf. “What would fancy look like? Senior and Delphine’s wedding?”
“Minus four hundred people?”

“I don’t think, between the two of us, we even know enough people to get that many people in attendance. But, yeah, assuming our family and some friends, what would you like?”

Abbi sighs… “It’s silly.”

He takes her hand and they head up the stairs to their room. “I’m good with silly.”

“Do you remember when Grace Kelly got married?”

“I’m not quite that old,” Gibbs says dryly.

She blows a raspberry at him.

“I know it happened, but I don’t have an image of it in my head.”

“Okay. I do. When my sister was doing her wedding stuff, she had piles and piles of pictures of dresses and stuff. It was my job to help her sort it out. She had a picture of Grace Kelly’s dress, and… when we get back to our room, I’ll google it for you… Anyway, I liked that image. I could see doing something like that.”

“Are you asking me to check out the dress?”

“Only so you have an idea of what I’m thinking of as fancy.”

“Okay.”

In their room, she turns her phone back on, and is pleased to see that none of the 153 emails are urgent, and then she googles Grace Kelly wedding. She shows Gibbs the dress, and says, “Not lacy, but some sort of satin, maybe white with silver brocade… The kind of wedding you’d wear a dress like that to.”

Gibbs looks at it, imagining Abbi, sleek and elegant and beautiful in white satin, his bride. He feels a rush of pleasure and pride at that image. “I can do that.”
There are things Gibbs thought he was done with. Many things. Most of which, he really is.

One of which, he apparently isn’t.

Namely, as he pats Mona one last time, and kisses Breena’s cheek for agreeing to take care of her, he’s getting ready to pick up Abbi, drive the circuitous route of still open roads to Reagan, and head off to Montana to meet his finance’s parents.

He really never expected to do this again. He’d gotten to an age where, well, most of the women he expected to be dating weren’t likely to have parents anymore.

But it didn’t work out that way. Borin’s forty, and her back-to-the-land homesteading parents are… Sigh…Sixty-one and sixty-three. So… he’s closer in age to her mom and dad than he is to her. By a lot.

It’s been a damn long time since Gibbs has flown commercial as a civilian. (Speaking of things he thought he was done with…) He’s sure he’s had to have done it at some point, but the more he thinks about it, the likelier it is that it was before 9/11.

“Don’t suppose you could just whip out the badge and get us through this mess,” he says quietly to Abbi as they shuffle, in stockinged feet, closer to the security checkpoint.

“Sure, I can do that. For me.” She flashes him a cocky grin.

He rolls his eyes a little, taking another slow step forward. “We’ve got a jet. Don’t you guys?”

Abbi laughs at that. “CGIS does have a jet. Using it is supposed to be a perk of my job. And when you’ve got the $300,000 I need to get it in the air, we can take my jet. Until then, it’s in storage.”

Gibbs laughs grimly at that. He knows that the Treasury is starting to send out cash again, and that given her particular situation she’s not having any trouble at all getting promises of cash for CGIS. Actual cash is a somewhat different situation.

Like everyone else with a Federal Agency right now, she’s scrambling to make payroll and keep the lights on.

“You’re kidding me,” Gibbs says, voice flat, as he gets pulled aside for “enhanced screening.”

He even remembered his knife, which is in his checked baggage. (Not having it in arm’s reach is making him feel buggy.)
“I’m sorry, sir.” The TSA Agent, who probably hears variations on that, and often less polite, a thousand times a day stares blandly at Gibbs.

“Do I look like a terrorist? I’m traveling with the head of the Coast Guard’s Investigative Service.”

The TSA agent smiles weakly and begins to pat Gibbs down.

He’s staring at Abbi, who glided on through, with no problems, his teeth gritted, as he gets felt up by some twit who he would have fired from his team on the basis of this lackluster pat down. He could have a knife on his back, a gun under his arm, another one at his groin, and this twit would never have noticed.

“Why me?”

“Sir…”

“Come on. I’ve been law enforcement for decades. Why me?”

The TSA agent sighs and comes up with a half decent lie on the fly. “The canister in your baggage.”

“My oxygen? I got shot in the lung a few months ago. In the line of duty.”

“I’m sorry sir, anyone traveling with something like that gets checked.”

“Uh huh.” Gibbs whips out his don’t BS the Boss look, and the Agent pales. “Gotta keep the skies safe from people with emphysema.”

“Something like that, sir.” The TSA Agent gets done and says, “You’re clean. Thank you.”

Gibbs nods and heads off, looking for his shoes.

They got to the airport more than early enough that even with Gibbs’ extra-special attention, they’ve got two hours to kill before the flight leaves.

It’s true that Abbi wasn’t comfortable burning $300K for one flight. It’s also true that she didn’t mind spending a few hundred on CGIS’s dime to bump them up to business class, and get a direct flight to Denver. (She figures the fifteen hours of travel time they’ll save by going direct more than makes up for the cost.)

So, with a few hours to kill, they’re in the business lounge, having a drink, relaxing (Gibbs) or checking emails (Abbi.)

Gibbs checks their tickets. This first part of the trip looks pretty plush. Get on the plane, kick back and relax in the cushy seats, and a bit more than four hours later, they’re in Denver. From there, it’s puddle jumper territory.

Denver to Billings, that’s not too long, about an hour and a half. Then a three hour drive to the north east. Her parents live way off the beaten path, outside of Fallon.

Or, as she told Gibbs when he asked, “Fallon’s the kind of place that’ll make Stillwater look like New York City. Last census it was down to 150 people.”
“Blink and you’ll miss it?”

“Not quite that small, but only because it used to be bigger. Lots of empty space and buildings. It’s dying slowly.”

He hears the concern in her voice. “Another reason why you’re worried about your parents?”

“They’re half an hour out from something that’s barely a town. Fallon goes, and they’ll end up almost an hour away from the next town, Glendive, which at least really is a town, but… It’d be nice if they didn’t have to drive an hour for groceries.”

Gibbs can understand that. He got nervous with his Dad all on his lonesome, and all on his lonesome meant neighbors all of fifty feet away. Still, it’s not like her parents are ancient. Her dad is five years older than he is… Of course, he’s also not suggesting they go head off and live way the hell out in the middle of nowhere. He can imagine what Abby and Breena would say to him if he were to suggest getting a place an hour from the nearest grocery store.

“What’s ‘really a town’ mean?”

“About five thousand people.”

Gibbs shakes his head. He likes being away from the rest of the world, but there’s away and then there’s hermit-hood.

“People really go out there for vacations?”

Abbi nods at that, little smile on her face, and sips her whiskey. “Mom and Dad have six cabins full of them. If your lungs can take the cold, I’ll get a sled set up, and we’ll go out. Trust me, there’s nothing at all like it. A million miles of sky, wind whipping in your face… It’s pretty flat where we are, and you feel like you can see forever, feel like you can run forever.

“We don’t let the tourists go out at night, but you and I should. You’ve never seen stars like Montana stars.”

Gibbs doesn’t get a lot of time out with Abbi. These days she’s either working or she’s home. He’d certainly like to spend time out with her, and he’s looking forward to a time where she’s not working twelve hour days most of the time, and with any luck, if Christmas weekend off and this trip go well, she’ll start easing back, letting her second and thirds in command take over more of the duty.

But that hasn’t happened, yet.

So, it’s entirely likely, as they’re in the lounge at the Denver airport, that this is the first time he’s really been out in public with her since the fall of CGIS.

He’s used to being no one. Gibbs doesn’t want the limelight, and he’s happiest far away from it.
Tony might be bothered when another agency gets credit for whatever it is NCIS does, but Gibbs doesn’t mind. The less attention paid to him, the better.

Still, there’s not in the limelight, which he prefers, and there’s invisible, which is getting irksome.

Denver, by some perverse trick of God, is located on a mountain, and there’s no air there. As soon as they got on the ground and out of the carefully controlled atmosphere of the plane, Gibbs needed his O2. He doesn’t want to need it, but he can’t, with 4/5ths of his lungs, pull enough air to keep from feeling dizzy without it.

So, he supposes that, as the old guy on oxygen, sitting next to the super-hot redhead who’s been on TV right and left lately, who’s something of a national hero for her part in the recent upheaval, it’s fairly normal for people to overlook him, but as the third guy in an hour tries to hit on his fiancée in front of him he’s getting sick of being ‘low profile.’

They don’t even see him there. Two of them notice him halfway through getting their hopes of getting laid crushed into dust by Abbi and look startled, and the third didn’t notice him even after Abbi blew him off.

It makes a few uncomfortable thoughts about their age difference go flying through his head. And it makes a very possessive streak of him do something he usually doesn’t. Neither he nor Abbi are very touchy-feely in public, but if the ring on her finger isn’t keeping the guys off, it’s time to pull out the bigger guns. He scoots his chair over a bit, and wraps his arm around her waist.

“Getting snuggly on me?”

“It’s that or I start slapping these twits.”

Abbi chuckles at that. “I thought I was handling them fine.”

“You are. Doesn’t mean I don’t want to growl at them.”

She strokes his face and kisses him. “Thanks for letting me handle it.”

“No problem.”

They do stop hitting on her, but he does see a few of them give him a look, then look at her, and then back to him, and he can see them wondering if he’s extremely wealthy or what.

Gibbs smiles, cold and smug, at the one who’s openly staring at him with how the hell did you get her? on his face. He slowly strokes his hand up and down her back, feeling very possessive and a bit unsettled because he’s never going to look any younger than he does now.

He wonders, ten years from now, when he’s closing in on seventy, and she’s barely fifty, how many looks they’ll get. Too many. One would be too many.

He makes a mental note to have a good long chat with Jimmy when he gets home. And then another one with Ducky. He can’t get any younger than he is now, but if he’s going to promise to be with this woman for the rest of his life, the least he can do is try to live in such a way that he’ll be here for a good long time.

It’s cold. Montana in December, cold, really? The snarky little voice in the corner of his brain says. Or it would be saying, except it’s so fucking cold he can’t breathe.
It’s like ice in his lungs, and they won’t expand to let another molecule of this cold death into them.

Abbi, who’s also stopped dead the second they step out of the airport car rental in search of their truck, takes one look at him, and pulls him back into the airport.

“I always think my memory exaggerates how bad it is, and then I get back here.”

Gibbs nods, wheezing. He’s thinking of grabbing his O2, but he doesn’t think it’ll help. It’s not that there isn’t enough oxygen (which was the issue in Denver, and blessedly doesn’t appear to be a problem here) it’s that his body is refusing to inhale that gaseous ice masquerading as air out there.

He’s starting to get scared that this is going to be the shortest visit in the history of visits when Abbi rifles through their bags and finds the scarf that Breena tucked in there for him. Gibbs, who had been giving it the side eye because it had cute little red-nosed reindeer on it is now looking at it like it’s a lifeline.

He happily wraps it around his face a few times, eager for something to help warm that slow death by frigid suffocation out there, and wonders idly if Ducky had ever seen someone who asphyxiated on cold air.

Abbi holds up her hands. “You stay here. I’ll get the car warmed up.”

Normally, Gibbs would hate that, and a sliver of his pride is riled by it, but compared to heading out there into that cold again, into a cold car, and then waiting out there for the ten or so minutes before the car’s got enough heat to be bearable…

He’ll take it.

When he does get into the car, which is, technically speaking, a truck (With where they’re going, Abbi doesn’t want some sort of small, compact thing without a lot of clearance.) the thermometer says it’s -8.

Abbi shrugs at it. “About average for this time of year out here.”

“I grew up in Stillwater.” Gibbs is shaking his head. “It was cold there, but…”

“But this was that one really bad week in the winter, right?”

“The one where no one went out if they could avoid it, yeah.”

“You get used to it.”

“Hope so, if we’re going to do anything besides sit by your parent’s fire.”

Gibbs has been all over the world. He’s served on four continents and several islands. Jobs have taken him from Canada to Colombia. He’s been to most of Europe and the Western USSR and then Former Soviet States. He did tours in Iraq, Kuwait, and Saudi. Afghanistan, been there and done that.
And Montana is different from all of them.

Part of it is that it’s winter, and winter in this part of Montana means snow. Though, as Abbi tells him, it’s not like a ton of it falls, this is an arid area, but once it falls, it doesn’t melt until May. And right now, with the sun still an hour above the horizon, it’s sparkling bright. Gibbs is very glad he’s got sunglasses, because snow blindness is a real possibility here.

The only parts of the world where he’s done any winter work were in Europe or Russia. Which was cold and very snowy, but not like Montana.

In Europe and Moscow, there are people. There are buildings. There’s stuff.

Out here, Billings behind them, there’s sky and snow, and a million miles of rolling space. There’s some scrubby pine trees sticking up from the snow, and tufts of grass and sage, but mostly it’s snow and dirt and rolling hills that stretch on FOREVER.

“People run cattle out here?” Gibbs asks, seeing a few cold-looking cows nosing dried, withered tufts of grass. He can’t imagine anything the size of a cow getting enough grass out of this dry land to stay on his hooves, let alone plump enough for anyone else to eat him.

“Yeah. Though they usually try to stay close to the buildings this time of year.” Abbi nods to the two of them they’re passing. “Those two got free and are probably regretting it. Normally, this time of year, they stay where the wind can’t get them, and keep close to each other for warmth.” She shakes her head at them. “They’re pretty stupid animals.”

“Good thing they taste good, then.”

Abbi smiles at that. “Oh yeah. And trust me, for a carnivore like you, a cattle ranch is a treat.”

He raises an eyebrow.

“We keep the best of the best for ourselves. Trust me, you haven’t yet met a real steak, but you will.”

Gibbs is pleased by that idea.
Abbi wasn’t exaggerating. Fallon, MT makes Stillwater look like New York City. Or maybe Tokyo.

There are two paved streets, the rest of them are... he assumes dirt. Right now, they’re packed snow. Feed store, grocery store, gas station, post office... Not much else. Not even a diner.

“Is there a school?”

“Up in Glendive. That’s where the cops, fire department, and doctor is, too.”

“Don’t get in an accident out here.”

Abbi nods.

There are a few tiny houses, the kind of construction that reminds him of the post-World-War-II building boom back east. He sees several more trailers. “What do people do here?”

“Farming, some. Welfare. Social security. A lot of people who are still here are old, the town is vanishing around them, though Mom says it might be perking up a bit. Got a few families looking for a cheap place to land while Dad works oil and natural gas in South Dakota.”

“You grew up here?”

Abbi smiles. “Not really. I got feed for the animals here, did some grocery shopping, and picked up mail. Most of life was on the ranch or in Glendive.”

She turns the truck, and now they’re on something Gibbs had barely noticed was a road. It’s a depression in the snow with a few tire tracks on it.

“Just gets wilder from here out.”

“Lead on.”

She isn’t kidding, at all.

Back east, any land that isn’t kept clear reverts back to forest. Leave it alone, don’t mow for a few years, and next thing you know, you’ve got a bumper crop of baby trees trying to become grownup trees. That’s happening to the lawn at their place on the Potomac.

That isn’t how land works here.

Here the land goes on forever, rolling away from them in soft hills and depressions, there are some scrubby little trees, all of them some sort of pine. At the edge of his vision, there’s a small river or large creek, and there are more trees (cottonwoods according to Abbi) by its banks, but between him and them there’s got to be at least fifteen miles of snow covered scrub.

Abbi points out the dark branched edge of the river. “Another twenty miles, across the creek, and that’s the corner of Mom and Dad’s place.”

They’re bumping slowly over the packed snow road. It’s so cold, that to Gibbs, this feels like driving on sand, it’s shifting below them, but the liquid slip of melting slush isn’t part of the road feel here.
Shortly after Abby mentions where they’re headed, the sun sinks below the horizon. Sunset is different here, too. Back east, with the trees and the hills and the buildings, you can lose sight of the sun long before it slips below the edge of the planet. That doesn’t happen here. There’s nothing tall to block the sun from them before the Earth turns away from it. One minute, the sky is pink, the snow is rose gold, and the hollows of the hills are shadowed, and then the next, it’s dark.

One second, he can see where they’re heading, and the next, it’s gone.

They’re enveloped in dark, two small circles of light in front of them from headlights, and black all around.

Gibbs is sincerely grateful that Abbi knows where they’re going, because even with his history as a Marine, and his much better than average map skills, this would be disconcerting territory to move through.

After a few minutes, his eyes adjust, and Abbi’s do, too. She stops the car, not like there’s any traffic here, and turns the lights off.

Gibbs knows what she’s doing, and his gloved hand finds hers as they look up at the billion stars above.

And she’s absolutely right, he hasn’t seen sky like this. He’s gotten close, the sky over the desert in Iraq was similar, but when he was there they were burning the oil fields, so there was always the flicker of those lights, and a fine sheen of smoke.

But here, it’s just them, the stars, and the moon above.

Out here, in the winter night, he can see the Milky Way, and he can see why it would be called that. There’s a stripe of stars across the sky, lighting a glowing path.

“The Lakota call it the Trail of Spirits. It’s the path we all take when our fates have been met.”

“I can believe that. How did you ever leave this?”

She smirks a bit. “Even stars get old. Especially to a seventeen-year-old. Though, wait a few hours, and we might get Northern Lights, too.”

“Never seen them before.”

“Really?” Abbi turns the car back on.

“Suppose I could have in Moscow, but I wasn’t spending my nights star gazing.”

“They can be a bit temperamental, but with any luck we’ll get some while you’re here.”

They’re bumping down the road, going about fifteen miles an hour, when Abbi turns again, and for the life of him, Gibbs couldn’t have told you that this particular bit of snow was any different than any other bit of snow, but apparently this is the ‘drive’ that Jeff and Becky have a plow to keep clear.

He’s curious as to what constitutes ‘clear’ in this part of the world, because he’s guessing there’s six to eight inches of snow under them.

When they’ve been going for a few minutes, he sees what Abbi must have, the break in the trees up ahead. It’s a small bridge over a shallow run of water, about thirty feet wide.

On the far side of the bridge, there’s lights and buildings.

“Your dad and mom built this?”

“Most of it. It was a few trailers when I was little. They got the barn and kennel done first. Then the cabins. House has only been done for five years, but it’s exactly the way they want it now.”

They pull up in front of the ‘house’. It’s a two story square of stone. There’s a wide porch that wraps around it, and Gibbs assumes that in the warmer weather there are rocking chairs on it, but right now it’s bare. The windows are small and there aren’t a lot of them, but he assumes that has something to do with how cold it is. Each one is glowing gold with inside light, though.

“Wood’s expensive out here,” Abbi says as she parks. “Anything long and strong enough to build with has to be shipped from the west. Those stones… They’ve been digging them out of the ground for years. Each one of the ‘cabins’ is another acre or two of garden for Mom.”

“Your mom has acres of garden?” he unbuckles.

“Vegetable farm? Peas, potatoes, cabbage, lettuce, greens, carrots, radishes, rutabagas, blueberries and strawberries. Anything that’s low to the ground, happy with cool weather and lots of sunshine does pretty well out here. It’s too dry and windy for bigger plants, but,” Abbi gestures to the left, “she’s got acres of veggies using the creek for irrigation. If they could get better prices for the cattle, they wouldn’t bother with tourists. They want to be farmers, and this is what lets them do it.”

Gibbs winds the scarf around his face. He’s only looking at a twenty foot walk from the warmth of the car to the warmth of the house, but he’d rather not walk into her parents’ home wheezing away looking like he’s a million years old and sick on top of it.

Abbi’s tucking her hair under a hat and zipping up her coat. She smiles at him again. “Ready?”

He nods. “Yeah.”

Meeting people online is not meeting them in person.

For example, when you meet someone online, you don’t have to figure out what to do with your physical body, or their bodies, either.

Jeff and Becky Borin in person are a bit reserved. He’s not getting enveloped in massive hugs as soon as he walks in. Abbi is, and he gets polite handshakes. They aren’t hostile to him, but he can see, Jeff especially, is reserving judgement.

Jeff’s a cowboy. At least, that’s how Gibbs has this look and attitude cemented into his head. He’s wearing jeans and flannel and a vest. He’s tall and thin, skin weathered from sun and wind, with sharp green eyes that his daughter inherited, and maybe, once upon a time, he had the same red hair. It’s white now.

Becky’s a cowgirl. Same basic outfit. She’s missing the vest, but like her husband she’s wearing jeans and flannel and there are wide-brimmed Stetsons on a shelf near the door, along with two pairs of well-worn boots.

She’s a bit younger than her husband. Her eyes are soft brown, and her hair might have been blonde once. It’s a dishwater gray now, kept back from her face in a long braid down her back.

He knows from Abbi that her parents were from Seattle originally, a little too young to be proper flower children, though their older brothers and sisters were. They met when her mom was a senior in high school, fell in love, “married” young, (Abbi isn’t certain if they actually bothered with the ceremony and paperwork. All her life they’ve had the same last name, but they don’t wear rings, and she knows there wasn’t a wedding,) and then decided to drop out of the larger society to come out here, get ‘back to the land’ and build a farm.

Gibbs has an image of that kind of person, and it’s a hell of a lot more like Penny Langston than Jeff and Becky Borin. Penny does the flowy clothing and has the relaxed, touchy, organic sort of personality that Gibbs associates with people who do things like homestead.

“Well, come on it. Let’s get you unbundled. You must be frozen, Jethro,” Becky says as she lets go of her daughter. “Everyone who comes here from back east and isn’t used to it thinks Montana in winter is Dante’s ice Hell.”

Gibbs isn’t entirely certain about ‘Dante’s ice Hell,’ Ducky would know about that, but he nods. “It’s colder than I’m used to, that’s true. I grew up in the North, but it’s been a while since I spent a winter there,” he says as he’s unbundling, happy to have the heat of the room sinking into his skin.

A thought hits him as Abbi’s pulling off her gloves. They haven’t told her parents about the engagement, yet, thinking that would be a good thing to say in person, and as soon as that glove is all the way off, they’re going to notice, so his window for paying proper respect to her dad is narrowing.

“Was hoping to have a serious chat with you at some point,” comes out of Gibbs.

Jeff nods. “Figured you would,” and Abbi finishes pulling off her gloves, and his eyes flick down to her hand. “Moved a bit faster than I expected,” Jeff says, dryly, not offering congratulations.

“Dad!”

“You pregnant?”

He’s asking Abbi, but his eyes are on Gibbs.

“NO!”

He nods again and kisses his daughter. “Good. Don’t want you feeling forced into anything. Go on up, get settled, dinner’s whenever you come down.”

Gibbs grabs both of their bags, and waits for Abbi to lead the way. He’s sure there are several things he could say to her dad right now, but he’s watching to see how she handles it, and taking his lead from her.
She gives Jeff the stink-eye, and then nods to Gibbs, and up they go.

The downstairs of the house is as open as they could build it. Twenty-five feet on a side, square, with a huge fireplace in the center of the house, and several pillars to keep the floor above them up.

“Helps keep things warm, and cuts down on the fuel needed to light the place,” Abbi says, as they head up the stairs that rise along the back wall.

“They’re that interested in low energy?” He’s thinking along the lines of Penny’s green crusades, but Abbi shakes her head.

“They’re off the grid out here. All the power they use, they have to make. There’s windmills, and each structure has a generator. Once a season they get a shipment of fuel oil and gasoline to run everything. The less power they can use, the better. That’s why the walls are white and cream, it reflects the light better. Everything is insulated within an inch of its life, so they use less heat.” The top floor is four rooms, two on a side, along a long hallway. Abbi opens the first door on the left. “Guest room.”

“This wasn’t yours as a kid?”

“We were still in a double wide trailer when I left. Dad had started digging the foundation, but this sort of work happens when everything else is done. He’d get maybe a day or so a week to work on it, grabbed an hour here or there.”

Gibbs eyes the space. He knows the outside wall is rock, but inside is drywall. The ceiling and floor are wood. The furniture is nice, not handmade, but good quality, none the less. The bed’s piled with quilts, which he thinks are handmade, and if so, Becky’s a serious quilter. It’s not warm in there, but it isn’t cold, either. There’s a small oil heater, and he touches it, realizing it’s cold, and that Abbi’s dad and mom did such a good job building this place that just on the radiant heat of the rest of the house, it’s only cool in here.

“You’d have done fine with the classes.”

“I know. I like reading. I don’t, especially back then, like just sitting around. When Shannon was in school, I’d quiz her on her stuff, and she’d help me with mine.”

He places their bags on the bed, and starts to unpack. He’s glad to see that in addition to his jeans and cargo pants, that he’s got long johns (Abbi packed them, assuring him he’d want them). He looks at them as he tucks them into a drawer. “Feel like a kid. Long underwear and short days.”

Abbi’d put her long johns on before they left. “I know that feeling. Sometimes on a case I’ll wear them, but mostly slipping into them makes me think of being seven or eight, sharing a bed with Miranda, and when we’d go to sleep, we’d make sure that our long johns were under the sheets with us, so we could get into them without having to get out of bed.”

Gibbs nods along. “Our house had a furnace in the basement, and there was a heat vent in the hall outside my room. I’d put my long johns on the vent, jump out of bed, run over, strip out of my pjs as fast as possible and into my long johns as fast as I could.”

He’s got his clothing unpacked, and grabs his toiletries. Abbi gestures to the door by their bed. It leads to a small bathroom. Toilet, sink, tiny shower. No co-ed showers here.

Compared to the Corps, it’s the lap of luxury. Hell, compared to his parent’s home, which had one bathroom for three bedrooms, this is an extravagance. Compared to the bathroom they designed for themselves at the house, it’s Spartan. The sink has enough room for him to tuck his toothbrush into the toothbrush holder, and there’s room on a small rack in the shower for his shampoo, soap, shaving cream and razor.

Of course, as Gibbs is eyeing it, as both a guest and a man who just helped to build a ton of bathrooms, if he had to personally truck all of his equipment in from… Miles City probably, maybe this Glendive place, he’d be buying small things that he could fit as many as possible into a truck load, too.

Abbi’s waiting in the doorway for him to get out of the bathroom, so she can go in and unpack her stuff. Once she’s done she says to him, “So, ready to head down?”

“Yes.”

Since they didn’t know for sure when they’d get in, dinner was something that could sit on the stove and stay warm. It’s beef stew and biscuits, and Gibbs is in love.

“This is amazing!”

Becky smiles, happy to hear that. “Except for the salt, pepper, coffee, flour, and wine, everything you’re eating we grew here.”

“Everything?” Gibbs is drinking coffee, and he doesn’t see any wine at the table, and then it hits him that it’s in the stew.

Becky nods. “That was always our plan. Get out here and be self-sustaining. We got there about fifteen years ago.”

“Once we got the windmills up, that made a huge difference,” Jeff says. “The food… That’s just been a matter of figuring out how to preserve things. Meat is easy, keep it on the hoof, and it’s fine. First few years, before we had the cold cellars dug, those were touch and go.”

“You built all of this,” Gibbs opens, hoping they’ll be happy to talk about adventures in homesteading.

And they are, at least, Becky is. “Until 1976 anyone who wanted to farm out here could get land through a homesteading grant. Jeff did the research found the bits of land that were still available, and then we drove out here and began looking around. Lots that had water access were few and far between, but we found this one, staked our claim, and began to work it.”
“If you run cattle, for five years, they’ll give you 640 acres,” Jeff says.

“So we did. By the time we got this plot, the homesteading act was over. We’re some of the last homesteaders. Probably the last ones to get a deed in Montana. But this first bit of ground was ours free and clear, so we were able to turn it into loans for more land, and a bit at a time we got adjoining properties. 640 acres in 1975 is 38,000 acres, now.”

“Are you going to keep expanding?” Gibbs asks.

Becky shakes her head. “We’ve got anything worth having by now. Gotta have a certain amount of water per acre. Expand any further, and it’s just more scrub.”

“Land’s cheap out here. You need a ton of it to do much of anything.”

“Putting snowmobilers on it sounds like a creative use,” Gibbs says.

“That’s pretty recent. Last…” Jeff chews, thinking.

“Seven years,” Becky says.

“Dogsleds before that. Everyone who’s into dogs knows everyone else. Made for easy advertising. Three years in a row we had a top five Iditarod team training out here. That got other people interested, too. Didn’t get into snow mobiles until we got internet access,” Jeff sounds proud of that.

“You built all of this?” Gibbs asks, and gets an affirmative from Jeff and Becky, from there he asks them a fairly complicated building question about how they’d gotten the rock walls together, and that results in a pleasant half hour of conversation, in which stone, mortar, structural supports, and insulation are all discussed.

By the end of it, Jeff even cracks a smile at Gibbs.

“Take a walk with me?” Jeff asks Jethro once dessert (pound cake with blueberry preserves) is cleared away.

“Sure.”

There’s a few minutes of getting bundled up, and Gibbs really hopes he’ll be okay out there. He wonders if he’s being taken out as some sort of a test. See how tough he really is. Most of the time, he’s sure he can pass any ‘let’s see what sort of balls you’ve got’ exam, but this isn’t about will power, not right now, it’s about making his lungs inhale.

Fortunately, he does keep breathing. Maybe it’s a tiny bit warmer. Maybe the scarf makes enough of a difference.

They’re out for more than a few seconds this time, so Gibbs can hear that this is different from anywhere he’s ever been before, smell it, too. Five hundred cows are loud and smelly, lowing away somewhere out in the dark. He can hear barking, too. The sled dogs have to be around here, somewhere, though he hasn’t seen their home, yet.

Jeff’s out in a long coat, and thick gloves, knit cap under his Stetson, but he doesn’t have a scarf, and his breath plumes with each exhale.
They amble, mosey, meander, something, it’s not fast, which Gibbs appreciates, over to the split rail fence along the edge of the driveway about a hundred feet from the house. Jeff leans against it.

“Smoke?” he asks Gibbs as he pulls out papers and his… Gibbs’ nose wrinkles… very much not tobacco pouch.

Gibbs shakes his head. “Not for years, not down a fifth of my lungs, and not what you’re rolling.” He takes a few steps to the side, making sure he’s upwind of Jeff. Gibbs doesn’t have a whole lot of experience with pot, but he’s pretty sure he doesn’t want to be inhaling a lot of it second hand.

“It’s legal here,” Jeff tips dried leaves into the paper, licking the edge. His motions are practiced and steady. Gibbs is impressed that he can roll a joint in gloves that thick.

“It’s not back home, and even if it was, it’s not for anyone with a Federal Job.”

“Which is why we’re freezing our butts off out here and not doing this in the house, with her.” He finishes rolling the joint, and lights it, inhaling. “It’s about a third tobacco. Don’t really like the way pot feels, too… loopy. Becky’d kid me that I was a bad hippie because of that.” He shrugs. “Tobacco helps keep my head on.”

Gibbs has met plenty of people who like the way pot feels. He knows people who really liked it and just don’t use it anymore because of the job. (Fornell had some interesting times in Viet Nam. Though Gibbs has been sworn to never, ever mentioning them to Emily.) He’s fairly sure that all of the kids have tried it, though he never has. What he hasn’t run into before is someone who smokes it but doesn’t like it. “Why smoke if you don’t like the way it feels?”

“It’s a good anti-inflammatory. Helps with diabetes. Helps with the eye problems I’ve been having because of the diabetes. Rather take it in a pill, but my insurance won’t cover it, so…” he inhales. Gibbs wonders if they grow it here, then he really notices what Jeff said.

“Helps with diabetes how?” That’s got Gibbs’ attention. He knows Jimmy takes good care of himself, but he also knows that takes good care of himself won’t be enough forever, and if it’s a matter of keeping his job, or keeping his body working, he’ll pick taking care of himself.

“You diabetic?” Jeff is eyeing Gibbs like that would just be the icing on the cake, old, a bum lung, and diabetic.

“Nah, one of my boys is. He takes good care of himself, but… Always good to keep an eye out, right?”

“I’ve got some articles; I’ll make copies for you.” He inhales again. “Getting diagnosed was half of getting internet access. Too long of a trip to the Doc’s and we needed to stay on top of things.”

Gibbs nods at that. “Had one at work for years, got my first connection at home last year. Hate to admit it, but I like it.”

Jeff smiles briefly at that, and then looks him up and down. That look lets Gibbs know that he means business. “You’re too old for her.”

Gibbs nods. “I agree. Look, I know what you see when you look at me. I’ve got no illusions about what stares back at me in the mirror. I’ve got girls, and they’re married to great men, but if they weren’t, I would not have wanted to see one of them bring me home, so I get it.”

Jeff’s why the fuck are you here then? look is eloquent and to the point.
“But I get her, too. I get why she’s doing the job and how she has to do the job. I get the job. I’ve been there and done that and I get it. She’s not going to have to deal with me bitching at her about how much time it takes or giving her a hard time because she can’t tell me what she’s doing. I get the hours. I get the danger. I get the stress. I’m happy to go shooting or spar with her on bad days when she needs to beat it out, and I’m good with laying on the sofa reading together on good days when there’s calm in her heart.

“With me there’s never going to be a me or it moment. I’m never going to make her choose. I’m never going to give her crap about it being dangerous, and she’ll always know there’s an extra pair of experienced eyes to watch her back if she wants them.” Gibbs taps his chest. “I will, and have, put my body in the line of fire for her, and I’ll do it again in a heartbeat.”

He sees that Jeff knows that part of the story by the respect in his eyes for that moment.

“And if she ever gets to the point where she doesn’t need to do the job like that. If she can get to the point where she can rest without running after the bad guys, I’ll still be here.”

“You still gonna be here twenty years from now?”

“Hope so.” Gibbs shrugs. “Don’t have a crystal ball or anything, but I’m doing everything I can to be here a good long time.”

Bill shakes his head. “Look, you seem like a good, solid guy, and if she was fifty, forty-five even, we wouldn’t be having this talk, but she’s not. She stays with you, she’s never going to have kids. She’s never really going to have a family, ‘cause twenty years is pretty much your expiration date. You go and that’s it, she’s sixty and alone.”

Jeff is right and wrong about that, and Gibbs takes a moment to get it right in his head before he starts talking. “We’ve spoken about kids, and you’re right, we stay together, she won’t have children. I’m out of the kids business. Mine are grown. And yes, one of them is older than Abbi. Though only by a few years. But I’ve got some beautiful grandbabies. Three of the sweetest little girls you’ve ever wanted to meet, and we’ve got one little boy due any day and another due late April.

“So, if she decides she wants to stay with me, she won’t get pregnant, she won’t be nursing her own babies, but she will be a hands-on grandparent. She’ll get the fun part of kids, and it’s early enough days none of them will remember a time she wasn’t part of their life. She’ll help raise a family, even if it’s not day in and day out babies.

“And yeah, maybe I’ve got twenty years, maybe more, maybe not. My dad lived to 88 on a worse diet and less exercise. But no matter what happens, if she decides to stay with me, she will have a family. That’s what we are. Me, my kids, their kids, Ducky and Penny, we’re family. She signs on, and she will always have this web of people, who are all cops or people who love them, who all get the job because they’ve all been there in one way or another.

“I’ve been building a home for a long time, and it’s almost done, only part that’s missing is her. If she stays with me, she’ll have that home. And there will always be people in and out, and there will be children and dogs underfoot. And, in twenty years, if I’m not here anymore, she won’t mourn alone.”

“Spoken like a family man.”

“I hope to be, sir.”

Jeff looks appalled by that. “God, don’t call me, sir. I’m barely five years older than you are.”
Gibbs smiles wryly at that. “Haven’t done this in a while.”

“What’s a while?”

“1979.”

“She was three.”

“I was twenty.”

“What happened to your first wife? You divorced?”

That’s sticky. He wonders if Abbi hasn’t told that story, or if she has and Jeff wants to see how he deals with it. “She and our daughter were murdered in 1991. Yes, I am divorced, too, three times. I haven’t been married since 2001. Decided to take a lot of time and get right with myself before trying to do this for real again. Like I said, I know what’s looking back at me in the mirror. You want to send me packing, I’ll understand. I’m not going to leave your daughter unless she sends me packing, but I’ll understand you wanting to see the back of me.”

Gibbs would characterize the look on Jeff’s face as, fair enough. “You never talked to your other three wives’ dads?”

“Two of them didn’t have living fathers to talk to, the third’s father had started a new family and was pretending she didn’t exist.”

Jeff sighs, inhales on his joint, and shakes his head.

“My youngest son,” Though Gibbs doesn’t actually know which of the two of them was born first (Tim, by four hours), so he’s going by the one he adopted last. “He and his father-in-law don’t get on. It’s not the end of the world or anything, but it hurts Breena, his wife, and annoys him. And all of it’s about Ed, his father-in-law, being determined to be an ass to him. I don’t want that. Not for me, especially not for Abbi. So, we gonna make each other and her miserable, or we gonna get along and make our girl happy?”

Jeff thinks about it. That’s a good point, but he’s not quite ready to concede it yet. “You’re twenty first time you get married, she’s three, you’ve got one kid older than her… How’d that work?”

Knock up your high school girlfriend and have to wait a few years for her to get old enough for it to be legal?

“Not like you’re thinking. They’re all adopted. I was twenty and a Corporal the first time I got married. We were together twelve years. When we were twenty-four we had our little girl. Eight years later, they’d both been killed.”

“What’d you do about that?”

Gibbs doesn’t like talking about that, but he figures Jeff’s got a good reason to want to know. “Got drunk. Stayed drunk. The man running their case kept tabs on me. Made sure I didn’t follow them. He found the guy who did it. He was in Mexico. Wouldn’t extradite him. I took care of it. When I got back he told me to try FLETC. I put the bottle down, studied hard, graduated with honors, and started working with him. I was with NCIS until January when they made me retire.”

“Your kids? You just adopt strays?”

“Orphan Federal Agents. Started out as my team. And over the years ended up my family.” Gibbs gets out his phone. Last shot of everyone together is from Tony and Ziva’s wedding. “This is us.”
Jeff looks over the shot, sees Gibbs in the tux, and his eyebrows rise. “You gave away the bride?”

“Not kidding about them being my kids.” He flips through a bit. There’s a shot of almost all of them together that’s a lot more recent. He’s not in it, because he took it, but he figures it’ll be a good one. “Christmas morning, at our home.” He shows Jeff the shot of all of them (minus him) in their jammies, opening/watching opening presents. It’s early and everyone’s pretty rumpled (Tony’d die if he knew Gibbs was showing off a shot of him with his hair that disheveled) but there’s a lot of smiles and happy faces, and wads of wrapping paper all over the place.

Jeff nods and takes the phone from him. Gibbs flips through and finds one with him playing with the girls. “Molly, Kelly, and Anna. Sean’s still on the inside, but not for long. Ziva, the bride, is five months pregnant, now. She doesn’t want to know if it’s a girl or a boy, but Tony, her husband, he can’t take a mystery without finding out, so he got Jimmy, he’s the doctor, to check the scans, and he showed up bragging on his little boy an hour later.”

Jeff stares at the shot, and flips through more. He sees another one from Christmas, Abbi with Kelly riding her hip, looking very happy as Gibbs kisses her under the mistletoe. He swallows and closes his eyes for a few seconds. “We’re gonna get along.”

“Good.” Gibbs takes the phone back, and then says, “I know livestock means it’s hard to get away, but that house is huge for a reason. You want to be in those pictures next year, or anytime, come visit. You, your wife, Abbi’s sister and her family, you’re always welcome anywhere I call home.”

Jeff nods at that, too.

Farm work starts early. Really early.

For Becky, every morning begins with baking the muffins that they deliver to the guests, fresh. They only have four milk cows, and Jeff takes care of them. Then there’s taking care of the dogs, and making sure the rest of the cattle get fed.

They have hands that help with that, but it’s still hard work that starts early.

And Gibbs, when he wakes to the sound of a mixer buzzing away on the floor below him, and sees that it’s 4:30, is really grateful that his job doesn’t involve having to be up and working every single day at 4:00 AM.

Abbi says something sleepy, along the lines of, “Go back to sleep.”

So he does. Though he wonders if he should get up and offer to help.

Abbi feels his indecision, and pats him. “Sleep. There’ll be plenty of chores three hours from now.”

She’s not wrong about that.

With daylight, Gibbs can see the rest of the operation. There are cabins tucked into bits of woods around the creek, each one with a small parking place for a few cars. Inside the cabins, there’s views of trees, meandering water, and bits of grassland.

Behind them, on the far side of the water, is the more industrial aspect of this business. It’s kept ‘out of view’ because it’s a collection of large, corrugated iron, ugly, buildings. They do what they need to, but they aren’t picturesque.

There’s a garage that houses the sleds and snow mobiles, along with the larger farming equipment, and the lesser used vehicles.

There’s storage sheds that hold feed, fertilizer, and fuel.

There are windmills, to help supplement the farm’s power. There’s tons of wind out there, and as Abbi says, “Might as well take advantage of it.”

Becky shows them off, explaining how they just upgraded to those tesla batteries Tim added to their house. “That’s the last piece of being really self-sufficient. Once someone makes a battery that can hold a real charge for a good long time, we can say goodbye to these.” She pats the fuel oil tank.

Closer to the house, there’s the kennel. A dogsled team is six dogs. They’ve got twenty four of them. All of them big, affectionate, good-with-people huskies. And all of them start barking up a storm when Gibbs shows up. “We don’t usually let strangers back here. If you were out by one of the cabins, they’d be fine with you, but they don’t know you…”

Gibbs nods at that. “Mona’ll go a little crazy if she’s not properly introduced to someone trying to get into our home.”

Becky introduces Gibbs, and his quiet calm wins the doggies over pretty quickly. The fact that they’re extremely well-trained and used to people helps a lot with that, too. He give out petting, rubs ears, tells them all that they are very good dogs, and helps with making sure they get fed.

He thought that huge bag of dog food Mona goes through every other week was a lot of food. He’s realizing they go through two of those bags a day here, and that kibble is mixed with raw meat and fat. “They need a lot of food to be running around in this cold, pulling people along,” Becky says as she’s mixing bits of beef and fat and kibble together, as Gibbs is handing it out.

There’s a barn and a huge fenced-in lot for the cattle. “This time of year, we round them up, keep them close together so they don’t freeze. Once it warms up, they get the run of the land, but that’s a few months off,” Becky says as she and Abbi and Gibbs are wandering around.

Gibbs tries not to wrinkle his nose, but even in the winter, 500 head of cattle are pretty stinky. And loud. They keep talking to each other in longing-sounding moos. He sympathizes, he’d rather be out roaming around than packed into the winter pen, too.

There are four ‘less pretty’ cabins that are closer to the kennel and barn. “The hands live there.” Like the rest of the buildings here, they look like a combination of rock and structural steel. Seeing how many buildings they’ve put up in stone, Gibbs is wondering why they ever tried to grow anything here.

Behind the cattle lot is Becky’s newest project. “Greenhouse?” Abbi asks. She’s heard they were thinking about it, but hadn’t heard that it was finished.

“Got it done right before the snow started.” Becky looks pleased. “We put pipes through the manure composting piles and run the water through them, that warms it up, and then it flows into the greenhouse. Irrigates the plants, and keeps the temperature in there a few degrees warmer.”
"What do you have growing in there?" Gibbs asks, wondering idly if the answer is pot, and really hoping he’s not going to turn on the news and find the DEA raiding the place one of these days, assuming the DEA ever gets back up and running again.

"Mostly greens right now. It’s warmer in there, between just above freezing at night and fifty-five-ish during the day, so everything in there has to like cool. Year round salad. When it gets a little warmer, we’ll put in some plants that don’t enjoy frost. Might get cucumbers this year."

"Mom’s been trying to make cucumbers grow out here for decades. It’s too cold for them three quarters of the year, and too dry the other quarter."

Gibbs is about to ask why they don’t just buy them when it hits him that anything that gets eaten here has to be brought in from miles away. They don’t go shopping every day, or every other day here. So, even if Becky got herself a pile of cucumbers every time she went to the market, she still wouldn’t be able to have them every day.

"Can I help?" Gibbs asks Becky as she’s making them lunch.

"Sure." She hands over two loaves of bread and a knife. "Slices for the four of us and the eight hands."

"Everyone eats in here?"

"That’s usually how it works. They’re on their own for breakfast and dinner, but a good lunch every day and food staples are part of their pay."

"They here year round?" he asks as he slices.

"Four of them are. Bob, Sarah, Chris, and Kelso are here year-round. Sarah runs the dogs during the off season, and is in charge of them in the winter. The other three are cowboys. They keep the cattle healthy and on our land. Jack, Arlo, Fred, and Lizzie are just here for the season. They run dog teams, teach snowmobiling, provide snow shoeing and cross country skiing tours, and help take care of the stock and equipment."

Becky looks up from the roast beef she’s slicing. She watches Gibbs as he’s cutting the bread, making sure to keep the slices even and straight.

"You going to try to make her quit?"

Gibbs shakes his head. "Nope. She wouldn’t want me around if I was that guy."

"So, what, you’re good with alone? She works all the time."

He looks up from the bread. "I’m good with the job. I know it’s got to happen. I know why and how and all the rest of it. Certainly wouldn’t mind her having more downtime, but I’m not going to give her a hard time about it. Been on the other side of that, and I didn’t like it."

"That how you ended up with three ex-wives?"

"Part of it. I was hurting too bad to be good for anyone else those years. Work all the time, and you don’t have to feel the hurt. You get to focus it, do something useful with it." He shrugs a bit. "Past that now.”

“Is she?”

Gibbs nods. “Part of why we get on. We’ve both been there. When my son was hurt, she dropped the job and came out to California to be with me. That was back in May. Can’t tell you what that meant to me. I think we were both ready to move on, just needed to find someone to do it with.”

“And when her job called, and she needed backup, you dropped everything for her.”

Gibbs nods.

Becky watches him for a few moments, and then nods, getting back to getting lunch ready. A minute later, not looking up from her slicing, she says, “Why a pearl?”

Gibbs isn’t expecting that, and he’s not sure he wants to verbalize something that private to this woman he barely knows. But, barely knows or not, she’s also his soon to be mother-in-law, and she probably doesn’t want him to be a stranger to her.

She wants inside of his mind, just like he’s getting inside hers by seeing her home.

“Lot of reasons. Didn’t want to remind her of Liam.” Becky nods at that. She doesn’t know if Jethro’s seen Abbi’s first engagement ring, but she did, and it was a pretty little diamond in a yellow gold setting, and this new ring is as little like it as a ring could be. “Because I’ve given out too many diamonds over the years...”

Gibbs thinks a bit more. That’s why not-a-diamond, so ‘why a pearl?’... how to verbalize that...“Water. We’re Marines. We met because of a case on the water. NCIS, CGIS, we’re tied to the sea. Penny’s husband...” Becky’s heard of Penny, but she’s not understanding why Gibbs didn’t say Ducky, and it’s clear on her face. “Her first husband, Nelson, Tim’s grandfather, passed a while back, but he’d say we’re water given breath, and set to walk the earth for a while. It’s a good symbol of that. Because pearls come from something alive. The wedding ring is wood, because that’s alive, too. It’s not just cold, hard rock, it’s something that grew and changed... Something my hands shaped for her.”

Becky looks happy with that answer. Abbi and her Dad head in, Jeff saying, “Five minutes. Gotta get the food ready.”

Gibbs slices faster.

Early mornings mean early nights. Jeff and Becky go to bed a bit after nine, leaving Gibbs and Abbi on their own, downstairs, sitting in front of the fire. For a while they read, talk, enjoy being together.

Gibbs finishes his book, and is watching the flames leap, hearing them crackle, and petting Abbi’s shoulder. She’s on her phone, looking something up.

When she’s done, she tucks her phone into her pocket and looks at him. “You’re looking really content.”

“I’m feeling really content. I like this.”
“Somehow, I thought you would.”

“Not sure I’d want to live it, full time, but… It feels good.”

“If they’d started here, done, everything up and running, I probably wouldn’t have left. It’s a lot less satisfying when you’re ripping a living out of bare earth, sharing a room and bed with your sister, and watching tourists wrinkle their noses at you because you always smell like cow shit.”

Gibbs inclines his head. “I can see that.”

She settles into him closer, resting her head on his shoulder. “But it’s still a nice fantasy, isn’t it? Little place out in the middle of nowhere, make everything you need.”

“Yeah.”

Abbi turns a bit, kissing him, and then stands up, offering him a hand. “Come on, more fantasy time.”

Gibbs raises an eyebrow at her, and she smiles.

He feels like he can barely move. He’s bundled to his eyeballs, and a bit beyond. (Abbi found goggles for both of them, to help keep the skin around their eyes a little warmer.) There’s not a single inch of either of them open to the air.

It’s cold. But that’s the sort of thing that happens when you go out at 12:00 AM in December in Montana.

And it’s worth it.

It’s not the cold stealing his breath away. It’s the sky. He’s laying back in the snow, staring up at ribbons of green, yellow, pink wavering over every star in the universe.

She’s got her phone out, videotaping it, so the kids can see.

Between the moon, stars, and the Northern lights, it’s so bright it might as well be an overcast day. The snow around them is glittering with shimmering colors, and the sky above them looks like nothing he thought could exist in the real world.

This is a fantasy sky. This is a fifty-million dollar CGI budget on the big screen sky.

But it’s real, and he’s under it, holding his love close, feeling the weight of her body against his as they stare at the most glorious light show on the planet.

He wishes they could make love under this sky. Not so much in a hard-dick sexual want sort of way (though that’s also starting to kick around in the back of his mind as he thinks about it) but in a something this beautiful deserves some beauty in response.

Half an hour later, which is as long as he can possibly take out there, they do. Nestled in the warm cave under the quilts in her parents’ guest room, she makes the lights flare behind his eyes, too.

It’s way too early in the morning when Gibbs’ phone buzzes. He jerks up, flailing at the nightstand, electric sensation of anticipation, because there’s only one reason someone would be texting him at 4:47 AM and that’s to show off new baby pics.

He grabs the phone, swipes fast, and then growls at it.

Or, it could be that the people back east are not quite sure about what time zone he’s in, and while it’s true that he’d normally love an ultra-cute shot of Molly riding Mona, right now, after less than three hours of sleep, he’s not exactly bubbling with joy at it.

Abbi wakes a little more slowly, but she’s on the same page he was. “Sean?”

“No. People who aren’t paying attention to the time zones.”

“Oh.” She tugs his arm, pulling him back to her side, snuggling under thick comforters, drowsing in the warmth of her skin and breath.

He closes his eyes and slows his own breath, tucking himself against her back, and drifts back off to sleep.

“You have wedding plans yet?” Becky asks Abbi at dinner the next day.

“Starting to get some. You guys think you can make it east for New Years’ 2018?”

Neither of her parents look ecstatic about that, but Becky doesn’t hesitate to say, “Sure. A year’s more than enough time to get people in to take care of the place.”

“Good.”

“Big wedding?” Jeff asks.

“Probably not. Don’t know where yet, but just family and friends.” She glances at Gibbs, and he does a head count of his part of this.

“Twenty-five or so for me.”

“And about the same for me.”

Becky’s eyes light up a bit. “Dancing?” She always liked it, and it’s been a long time since she’s had the opportunity.

“Of course.” Abbi pats Gibbs. “He dances.”

Gibbs nods. “Even a few rumors that I’m good at it.”

Abbi gently swats him. “Always knew that. Surprised to see Tim could, but you…”
“Gotta do something to keep up with my pretty lady.” He grins at her with a quick wink and she nudges him a bit.

Becky laughs a bit, happy to see them enjoying each other.

It’s not all that much later when she says to Jeff, as they’re getting ready for bed, “Been a long time since we’ve seen that smile on her face.”

Jeff nods, brushing his teeth. “I know.” He rinses and spits. “Be nicer if the guy inspiring it wasn’t our age.”

“I know. But that didn’t happen, and this did.”

“I know. I’m not going to be a jackass about it.” He puts his toothbrush down, and pulls his wife close by the hips. “Gonna order you some new dancing shoes?”

She smiles at him and offers him a quick kiss. “Ready to give the bride away?”

“Yes.”

It’s dark when they get up to start the trip back.

But like every other day they’ve been here, Becky and Jeff are up well before them. So, in the cool dark of the house, the fire is burning bright, and the coffee is steaming hot, ready for the long drive back to Billings.

Abbi gets hugs from both of her parents, and this time, leaving, Gibbs gets a hug from her mother, and a handshake from her dad. “Want to see you both back in the summer. Show him this place when it’s blooming.”

“If we can, Mom.”

“Yeah, I know, you’re busy. Come anyway.”

“We’ll try.”

In the car, a few minutes later, Gibbs says, “I know it’ll depend on the work, but, I would like to be out here in the summer.”

Abbi nods. “If I’m not locked into testifying every hour of the day in New York, while running CGIS during my downtime, we’ll come.”

He squeezes her hand. “Good.”

Chapter End Notes
So, next chapter is a Christmas present of sorts. I'm wondering, since I know a lot of you have family things going on, when would it be best for a must-read Christmas present of a chapter to land, 23rd, 24th, or 25th?
Thursday morning, Tim gets into his office and finds an email from Leon, asking him up when he’s got a moment.

That moment doesn’t materialize for a while. There aren’t any hot cases of the sort that he was dealing with over the summer, but that doesn’t mean he’s just twiddling his thumbs. But, eventually, between jobs, he does get a break, and heads on up.

After a short wait, while Leon’s busy with whatever it is he’s doing, Tim heads in for his visit.

Leon looks up at him and grins. Tim gets the sense that grin is never a good thing. Like, there’s the I’m happy for you grin which has a certain sort of feel, and this is much more of an I’m happy for me grin and that’s got a very different look.

Then there’s this look, which is probably best described as I’m happy for me, because some of the shit I’ve got to deal with, I can dump on you.

“Leon...” Tim’s voice is wary.

“McGee.” That grin is still there. “Just got the roster of events for the first slate of Commissions.”

“Great.” Getting ready for being out of the office most of next week is part of why Tim’s working hard today. “What horrible thing are you going to make me do?”

Leon’s still grinning, and now the grin shifts a bit, indicating he’s enjoying the prospect of seeing, or Tim supposes, hearing about something. “Tech in Anti-terror is starting off with a formal cocktail hour and dinner. Meet and greet. Schmooze. Get your good kilt out of mothballs and slap your best plastic smile on your face.”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit and then grins at Leon.

“Perfect. The next four days are seminars, talks, coalition building exercises, and legislation crafting. Where the real work happens.”

Tim sighs. “This is what you pay me the big bucks for.”

Leon inclines his head, and smiles again. This time it’s a pure, happy for me smile. “That and getting to hear stuffed-shirts who haven’t had a new idea since GW Bush was in office gossip about my wonder-kid with the ink.”

Tim laughs slightly at that. Only way to know he’s got ink when he’s dressed for work is for him to be wearing the kilt. “So, you’re not kidding about the kilt?”

Leon grins again, nodding. “Craig got you set with all of the vaguely tech related ones. Time to shake them up a bit. We got a really good reputation for going outside the normal lines and thinking creatively recently, and I want you to protect that image. Abby’s welcome, too, for the reception. The ticket for that has a plus one. Though, unlike your situation, I have sympathy for hers, so if she’d rather not get dressed up and make small talk nine months pregnant, I completely understand.”

“I’ll let her know. And let me guess, short of Sean deciding to join the party or an all-out terror hunt, I can’t get out of this?”

Leon flashes him one last grin, and then hands over the tickets and information pack for the Tech In Anti-Terror Commission.

Quiet family Shabbos, this time at Jimmy and Breena’s. Ducky and Penny are back in New York. Gibbs and Abbi are still in Montana, so it’s just the six of them.

It’s been a while since the six of them have done anything on their own, at least, as much on their own as they get with three kids now, and it’s kind of nice.

Tony’s got Molly on his shoulders, bouncing her around the living room as the girls get dinner ready. Tim and Jimmy are riding herd on Anna and Kelly.

“So… five-years-old, six? How old do they need to be before we can do laser tag with them?” Tony asks, thinking a bit about what the six of them used to do together.

Tim thinks about it as he stacks rings for Anna to knock down. “Sounds about right. So, 2022-2023?”

“We going to do that with them?” Jimmy asks. He’s got Kelly, getting her changed and ready for dinner. He blows a raspberry on her belly before asking, “Does that sound like fun? You want to run around and shoot Uncle Tony?” He points his finger at Tony and says, “Pew, pew, pew.”

Tony shifts his hold on Molly, making sure she’s secure, and then grabs his chest, “Ah! You got me!” and crumples to the floor. Kelly toddles over, making more shooting noises as Tony continues to die dramatically.

“Anything interesting this week?” Breena asks. Four of the six of them work in the same building, but this last week their jobs haven’t intersected much.

Tony, Jimmy, and Abby are still playing catch up, wading through the huge backlog from their downtime. Tim’s playing ahead, trying to get his inbox cleared before 16:00 on Monday, when he’s got to leave to get home and dressed up for this shindig.

They tell different stories. Abby starting off with her case of twisting and intersecting suspects, DNA all a-tangle. Ziva gets them up to date on how CGIS is humming along without Abbi. (Okay, enough. It’d probably be a good idea for Abbi to not take any long vacations soon.) Jimmy’s been hip deep in bodies, and so is Breena, but for him, he’s got cases, and for her, it’s about making sure they get to their final rest.

Tony’s been pretty quiet, which is unusual for him. “Bad case?” Breena eventually asks him.

He shakes his head. “No. Staffing stuff. Bishop’s fine doing what she’s doing right now. She runs prints, and backgrounds, financials and communications, BOLOs and all the rest of that. She’s our intelligence hub, and she doesn’t need to be nearby to do it. But we need another person. Every lead gets taken care of with both of us, which means no one’s back in the office putting things together.
We need a third guy. Really, we need four, but I’m not getting Bishop back in the office anytime soon, so…” Tony looks frustrated.

“Don’t want to hire?” Abby asks, taking a bite of her chicken.

Tony fiddles with his wine glass. “Not sure what I’m looking for, other than language skills. The only one I’ve got who can speak any middle-eastern language is in New York. Great if I need intel translated, not so hot if we need to drop anything and get to Afghanistan.”

Then Tony takes a sip of his wine. “That’s part of it. Other part is, if Draga can’t secure visitation rights for Kevin, he’ll quit. He’s already told me that. The judge is dropping hints that if he had a ‘safe’ job that the custody hearing will go better for him. His lawyer’s fighting that tooth and claw…
Hell, he tells me Fornell went down to talk to the judge and be a character witness.”

Everyone winces at that. Breena says, “When will he know?”

“By the fifteenth. Not soon enough.”

Jimmy licks his lips, not sure if he should ask this or not, but they’re home, the kids are too small to repeat this, so… “Did he do something to piss his Ex off that badly, or is she just one hell of a piece of work?”

“Both. Big time. They were a few day long stand when he took some R&R in North Carolina. Two months later, he gets the letter. She didn’t like him asking for a paternity test, really didn’t like him offering to pay for the abortion once it was clear Kevin was his, didn’t speak to him for something like the next six months, but Kevin showed up, Eric fell in love with him, they tried to make it as a couple for six months, and then he got stationed in the Pacific. He wouldn’t leave the Navy. She didn’t want him off six months a year. They broke up and have been squabbling about custody of him ever since.”

Tim winces. “I can’t imagine how, ‘Hey, I’ll write the check to end this little guy’ didn’t immediately inspire confidence in his parenting abilities.”

Tony nods at that. Nothing says, ‘I’ll make a great dad,’ like offering to destroy the child in question.
“According to him he was twenty-three, terrified, and particularly stupid. He’s been trying to make it up ever since, but the only thing his Ex wanted was a guy who’d actually be there to help her raise this kid, and he doesn’t like her or her family enough for that.” Tony stops talking for a second, thinking… “He… Look, I’m not judging, but Kevin’s got a few half-siblings, with different dads…
From what he can tell, he’s the only one paying child support, which is part of Kevin’s mom fighting tooth and nail for Kevin, because that money helps keep the other four of them afloat. Eric doesn’t think that’s a good environment for Kevin to be growing up in. So, he’s been trying to get custody ever since.”

“Lovely,” Breena says. “Looks like growing up is helping him, quite a bit.”
“How’s mom affording this?” Jimmy asks, that sort of story doesn’t usually go along with the funds for a multi-year long custody battle.

“She’s a paralegal. Works for a family law firm.”

“And they’ll fight it until the end of time for her,” Breena says.

“Yeah. And are on good terms with most of the local judges. Anyway, it’s possible that I’ll be getting Eric’s two weeks’ notice soon.”

“That sucks,” Abby says. “No matter who he was, I like who he is.”

“Yeah.” Tony winks at Ziva. “He’s not my favorite Probie,” then he gives Tim a little nudge, “or my second favorite, but I was getting a good working grove going with him. Adding one new person to that was already going to be interesting, starting from scratch…” He shakes his head. “Anyway, between playing catch up, and our new stuff, we’ve got the personnel files open, looking for a new guy.” Tony takes a bite of his chicken. “So, what’s up in Cyberland?”

“Well… It’s not exactly Cyberland…” And Tim explains about what his next week will be full of.

On the way home, Tony’s thinking.

“That was really normal.”

Ziva looks at him curiously. “What were you expecting?”

He opens and closes his mouth. “Just… That’s the first time it’s been just the six of us since the McPalmers started McPalming and… it was just really normal.”

Ziva thinks about that, and realizes that was the first time it was just the six of them in months, and then something else hits, it was normal for Tony. It wasn’t normal in the sense of being exactly like it was when they used to get together. Tim kissed and touched both of the girls through the course of the night, so did Jimmy, and when Tim and Breena were putting the girls down together, Jimmy was rubbing Abby’s back and hips to help with her sore pregnant back.

Nothing out of the ordinary. Just the sort of little, every day physical affections and intimacies you expect to see in a healthy couple, at home, with their family.

And it was normal, for Tony.

She smiles brightly at him, and takes his hand in hers.

As weekends go, it’s a quiet one. It’s cool enough that they spend most of it inside, though, after seeing video of Abbi and Jethro with the dogsleds, they do jury-rig a harness up to the wagon, attach Mona to it, and see if she likes pulling little girls around.

She does. So do little girls.

It’s only after Breena hits send on the video of the girls shrieking with giggles as Mona pulls them around their cul-de-sac that she realizes that it’s like 4:30 where Gibbs and Abbi are.

She winces at that, hoping they sleep through it.

Saturday night. New Years’ Eve 2016. There are fireworks, but they all happen in Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom, well before midnight.

Sunday morning, when little girls are eating breakfast, Breena excuses herself. She comes back a few minutes later with a pregnancy test, and the four of them wait, not exactly on tenterhooks or with baited breath.

Breena’s not feeling it, so this is mostly a formality. Still, there’s a bit of excited nervous tensions flowing through them as they watch the first of the pink lines appear.

But the second one doesn’t.

They give it another moment, look at it from a bunch of different angles in several different light levels, but that second line is not there, at all.

She tosses the test into the trash and says to her husbands, “So, in about two weeks, you two know what you’ve got to do, right?”

Jimmy grins, and Tim whips off a fast salute, “Yes, Ma’am!”

By three thirty on Monday, Tim’s got his inbox mostly cleared out. He’s going to have his computer with him for all of this, so he’ll be able to keep an eye on things, but he’d rather be in the office, working, than out of it schmoozing.

He sends off his ‘Out of the office. Text me or talk to Howard if you need something’ email, and heads to the lab to collect Abby for their night of wining and dining.
So, for all his looking at Leon in horror, the fact of the matter is Tim’s never actually been a guest at one of these things. He’s worked security at them. He’s been on the edges, watching, but actually one of the people meeting and greeting…

That’s new.

“You get bored or tired…” Tim says as he opens the door to their car for her and offers her a hand up. He’s already told Abby about six times that screw what Vance says, if she wants to go, he’s out of there. He does not see, by any stretch of the imagination, how his presence at this part of the meeting improves anything in any way.

She’s nodding her head. “We’re good. Can’t imagine we’ve got too many more grown-up dinners for two in the near future, might as well enjoy it.”

That is true. Little Boy is getting bigger and bigger. No contractions today, which Abby appreciates, but any day now...

They’re at the Omni, which (obviously) survived the recent upheaval. He’s never been here before, so he checks the invite and points the way, through an ultra-luxurious lobby toward an equally lux dining area.

There’s security all over the place. Tim knows all those bored looking men at the entrances and exits in nice suits with earwigs aren’t party goers. (Though he assumes there are a few blending into the crowd as well.) They’ve got to go through a metal detector, which involves the usual fun of explaining he’s got a compact car’s worth hardware in his arm.

They make their way to a table at the doors to the dining room.

There’s a line of people in suits and nice dresses in front of three women sitting at the table, tablets in front of them, checking names off of lists. When they get to a free one, she doesn’t look up as she says, “Name?”

“McGee.”

She still doesn’t look up as she scrolls through her tablet and then says, “Admiral John or Director of Cybercrime Timothy.”

He feels something akin to an electric current spread through his body at that, and Abby’s clutching his hand. Apparently he’s quiet for too long, because the woman actually looks up at him, sees the man in the black suit jacket/kilt and says, “Ah, Director McGee, NCIS. And your plus one?”

Tim swallows and pulls himself together enough to say, “My wife, Abby McGee.”

She smiles up at them, types Abby’s name into the tablet, taps it a few times, and a second later two name tags print out. “You’re at table 126, along with the DOD Cyber-Cryptology team. Have a lovely evening.”

“Uh, thanks,” Tim says on automatic, taking the name tags from the woman.

As soon as he has them, Abby’s pulling him away, looking for a quiet nook where they can talk, and they find one, along with the gaze of one of the security guys, who’s noticed two very nervous looking people in his midst.
“Leon will give you a pass for this if you want to go.”

Tim doesn’t respond, feeling blank.

Abby’s scanning the crowd, anger in her eyes, looking for him. “Want me to head back to the lab? I can mix up a cocktail, and we can spike his drink, and he’ll spend the next month shitting his bowels out?” She looks like she’s really enjoying that idea.

Part of Tim wants to sprint out of this. Just leave, pretend it didn’t happen, and run. Part of him has… It’s not a plan, not yet, but he’s noticing how much security is here and… “Just… Let me think… Tony didn’t say he’d been on the move. Stan’s supposed to still be keeping an eye on him… Let’s find out if he’s even on the East Coast before doing anything. Just because he got an invite doesn’t mean he’s attending.”

Tim grabs his cell and taps Tony’s contact. “Hey.”

“McGee? Aren’t you supposed to be rubbing shoulders with the high muckety-mucks?”

“Yeah, I am. Muckety-mucks to the left and right. Wanna guess which other high muckety-muck with my last name and a history of innovative drone technology work got invited to this thing?”

There’s a second where Tony doesn’t respond and then, “Shit. FUCK! Really?”

“Yeah. I know you had an eye on his travels, is he still in Hawaii?”

“He should be. I’ll double check. We’ve got him on the no-fly lists, and I’ve got his credit cards monitored. Unless he decides to swim, I should know if he moves.”

“Okay. Just, double check for me?”

“No problem. I’ll call Burley and get him to check, too.”

“Thanks.”

“I’ll get back to you as soon as I can.”

“Thanks, Tony.”

Abby looks a little relieved, little disappointed… she heard enough of that conversation to fill in the blanks. “None of their watches went off?”

“Yeah. Nothing’s been flagged, and he’s on the no-fly list, so…”

“So he should be in Hawaii, and we can have a good night of rubber chicken, mingling,” she looks into the dining room, and notices they do have a band and a dance floor, “and tame dancing.”

Tim smiles at her. “Like any dance with you is tame.” He takes her hand in his, and wraps his arm in hers. “Let’s go.”

She nods.
They’re having a pretty good time. The DOD team is also fairly young, usually stationed out of Dubai, but stateside this month for both R and R, and to work on interviewing some new members. Their leader is a young woman named Delilah Fielding, who gives Tim a sense of… not exactly Deja Vu, he doesn’t think he’s seen her before, but… something. She keeps looking at him the same way, and at this point they’ve both been over their entire CVs, trying to figure out if there’s some possible way they could know each other, but neither of them is finding anything.

So, it gets chalked up to some sort of passing resemblance or something, and their whole table is happily talking about being little fish in big ponds enjoying seriously screwing over the bigger fish who think they know so much about what they’re doing, but they’re so damn big they can’t maneuver or see behind themselves.

It’s kind of fun to bitch about the big guys. (FBI has three tables. Former NSA has five. The guys who used to be Homeland have three. What’s left of the CIA are filling four.)

They’re half an hour into the mingling time when he gets a text back from Tony: No tickets purchased, no charges made in the last three days, no cell signal we’re picking up. Stan’s going to his place to see, in person, if he’s there. But, from everything we can see, he hasn’t left Maui.

He shows that to Abby, who visibly relaxes. Probably better for everyone and everything if John’s nowhere nearby. Tim texts back Tha- he’s mid-word when he feels Abby tense again, fingers digging into his arm. Tim looks over to where she’s looking and sees the Navy delegation coming in. He closes his eyes, swallows hard, and shakes his head.

For a second, he can’t do anything, at all. Everything just stops. The room, his thoughts, everything screeches to a halt, only to get rolling again when, “Are you okay? Bad news?” breaks into his head. Delilah’s asking.

“Yes,” he says, curtly. Tell Stan to go home. I’m staring at him.

His phone rings two seconds later. “What?!” Tony’s never sounded more shocked.

“He’s in the room with me.” Tim and Abby are watching as John greets people with firm handshakes and a wide smile.

“How?” Tony asks

“I don’t know! He’s with the Navy delegation. Did you check to see if he got a Navy flight?”

“No. Shit!”

He can feel Tony kicking himself on that. “Apparently, drones are part of their anti-terror-tech,” Tim says, watching the Admiral meet and greet a few former CIA members like they’re long lost friends.

The rest of his table is now staring at the Navy delegation, trying to see what’s going on, but nothing about it looks off. Just a bunch of men and women with enough ribbon salad on their uniforms to start their own organic grocery store and their posh-looking dates. Everyone is smiling, they’re grabbing drinks, and moving around. John’s chatting with the first NSA table right now.

“Shit! What are you going to do?” Tony asks.

“I…”

“Leave,” Abby says. “Now.” (Though Abby means get out of this room to somewhere no one else can hear them talking, not get out of the party.)
“I’m voting with Abby on that. Get out of there.” (Tony’s in favor of literally getting out of the party.)

“Just, wait, both of you.”

Now the whole table is really staring at them. He’s got DOD types trying to figure out the puzzle in front of them. Tim looks at them. “It’s ugly and classified.”

They all nod and start pretending they can’t see him. He and Abby get up and head out of the ballroom, once again looking for a quiet place.

“Tony, you still there?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay, I’ll call you back when I know what’s going on.”

“Fine. I’m letting Leon know he showed up.”

“Sure, fine, just… Not Gibbs,” who should have landed at Reagan an hour earlier, “really not Jimmy. Don’t want him showing up with a rifle.”

“Okay. Call me back!”

Tim turns to Abby, hangs up the phone, and tucks it into his jacket pocket, all the while looking at her, seeing the rage and fear on her face, trying to sort out how he is. He doesn’t know exactly what he’s feeling, it’s hot and cold and scared and reckless and… Dangerous. He’s feeling really, completely, knife edge, gonna kill tonight, dangerous.

“How married are we?”

She’s… he’s not sure. Supportive. Excited. Worried. He knows she can read the emotions coming off of him right now, and he can feel her own knife’s edge coming into play, too. “What do you mean?”

He licks his lips. “Will you back my play if I’m about to do something that’s probably very stupid, that Breena really won’t like if it doesn’t work, but, God, baby, if it works…” It’s all over his face, if it works… It’ll be everything he ever wanted and needed from the Admiral

She’s looking worried, gently stroking his forehead, fingers skirting the scar through his eyebrow. “Oh, Tim, what are you thinking?”

“Something I want more, and like better, than spiking his drink. Something less likely to get us in any sort of long term trouble than Jimmy up on the roof with Gibbs’ rifle. If it doesn’t go right, only skin in the game’ll be mine.”

Her eyebrow raises, silently asking.

“There’s at least fifty guys working security here tonight.”

She nods, looking at a few of them. Then looks back to him. “Last time, there was a whole damn ship of guys working security out there.” Don’t make a plan that relies on trusting anyone else.

“Yeah, but this time, they don’t work for him.” Tim keeps thinking, fast, planning it out, seeing the angles. “It’s a meet and greet, everyone’s relaxed; they’ll be drinking. He will, too. He always has two at parties. Never enough to get drunk, but it’ll loosen his control. He won’t be able to leave me alone, not once he sees me, especially in the kilt. He’ll come over, put me down a few times, try to pick a fight, and this time…”

“You’re going to get into a fight with him?” Abby looks like that’s every sort of bad plan she’s ever heard of. She wants John to hurt, not Tim.

“Not exactly. No. Tony’s letting Leon know what’s going on. He’s going to make sure security knows that NCIS is running an op, and that they need to keep eyes on me, but not engage. That I’m bait for an unnamed sting, and we need to capture the target after he moves. Gibbs once told me, if you can’t control your temper, control him, make him throw the first punch, and then you ‘can be the bigger man’ and decide not to press charges.”

He can see two sides of Abby warring on this, the I do not ever want to see you in pain or another bruise on you side fighting with the I get your plan and I can’t wait to see him throw a punch, then watch you level him as every security guy in the room piles on side.

She can see it on his face. Everything he thought he lost about being able to finally win something against his The Admiral on the Stennis just came rolling back in. He needs this.

“Okay, one condition, you’re going to press charges!”

There’s a gleam in Tim’s eye as he grins, “Fuck, yes, I am!”

It doesn’t take long to explain the plan to Leon, and though Tim cannot see the NCIS Director through his phone, he can guess there’s a grin on his face.

“Twenty minutes, our own security will be there, too.”

“Thanks, Leon. I’d recommend Agent DiNozzo’s team for the job…”

“Yes, I think that’ll work.”

Tim and Abby are both looking a lot more comfortable and relaxed when they head back to their table. “Everything better?” Simon Burlwicz, Delilah’s date, asks.

Tim nods, and smiles. “Yes. Everything is still classified, but somewhat less messy.”

Delilah smiles at that. “Know all about that.”

Thirty minutes later, Tony and Draga, in formal wear, looking like guests, enter the party. They linger and mingle, smiling, chatting, blending much more effectively than the rest of the security. From there, it’s a dinner. Buffet food. People talking. Dancing eventually. Tim and Abby settle in, waiting.
At one point, when Tim and Abby are in line getting their food, Tony’s behind them, and he quietly says, “Two o’clock. He’s just noticed you, eyeing the kilt, and Abby.”

“Okay,” Tim says back. “He’s got to swing at me. Can’t press charges for assault if he doesn’t. But once he does, I don’t care if you guys shoot him for resisting arrest.”

Tony nods.

“I care. Shoot him for resisting arrest!” Abby says, quietly, but very intensely.

Tony smiles slightly at that. “Gonna be hard to pull that off if we do it in here. If you can pull him away from everyone else…”

Tim nods. “We’ll see how it goes. I think I’d rather him embarrass himself by taking a swing at his son in front of three hundred people during a formal dinner reception. That hit to the pride’ll hurt him worse than a bullet.” There’s a very cold smile on Tim’s face at that. Then he says to Tony, a little more quietly, “If he even looks like he’s thinking of saying something to Abby, take him down, hard.”

Tony nods, snags a few bits of food, and heads back to the table he’s sitting at with Draga.

His job, tonight, is to mingle, make small talk, get an idea of who in their world is doing what, why, and how. He and Abby are supposed to be warm and charming and make NCIS look good, while getting a feel for how the world after the new Congress meets and starts rearranging things will work.

So, for the first hour, that’s what he does. Circles around with Abby, talks about NCIS and, in general, what they do. He listens, a lot. A big part of why he’s here is to see what the other organizations are hoping to accomplish. NCIS will, eventually, come up with its own plans for how crime and terrorism should be dealt with, but right now, it’s listening.

Some of the Navy personnel know of him from what he did with the Stennis group, so they come over and chat with him about it. He gets the sense they’re poking to see if they can get any hints about when or how their own commands are going to get hit, but, he can honestly tell them he just designed how the test should work, he’s completely outside of what happens next.

None of them know, or hint they know, about what happened after the test.

And if any of them are aware that he shares more than just a last name with the Retired Admiral in their midst, they aren’t letting on.

And almost everyone, once they see the name badge, recognize who he is in relation to why they’re even at this meeting. He’s one of the guys who took down the old government. That gets him a lot of attention. A lot of people want to come over and chat.

So chat he does.

He’s surprised to see how easily he can BS the small talk and keep an eye on both The Admiral and his team. He knows, at all times, where every security person on the floor is.

Mostly though, he’s watching, waiting, planning how this will go. He’s laying his trap, using himself as bait, and with each swallow of what he assumes is bourbon (It’s hitting him for the first time that that’s probably why he doesn’t like bourbon.) The Admiral spends more and more time looking at him.

He sidles over as Tim is getting more food for him and Abby. For a second, he watches Tim handle the tongs and plate. “Looks like your hand healed up.”

“Just about.” He can’t type quite as fast as he used to or as accurately, and Sarah can no longer count on him for pinpoint back up when they game. Tim’s quiet after that, falling into his traditional pattern of just answering direct questions, hoping the repeat will encourage his father to do what he always did, double down on him.

And he does, he eyes Tim’s kilt. “We’re not Scottish.”

“Before we went to Ireland in the 1300s, the MacGhees were Scottish. This is the correct tartan for our family. Your step-dad did the research for it.”

John’s eyes narrow, and Tim realizes he’s hit a nerve. Interesting. “He is not my step-dad.”

“Oh, come on, Grandpa’s been dead for thirty years, she’s allowed to get remarried.”

“Yes, she is. But they didn’t actually get married, so he’s not my step-father. Ben wasn’t your step-dad when he was just shacking up with Tori.” They’re both keeping their voices normal, so no one is paying any real attention to what they say. The fact that John keeps making eye contact with other people and smiling at them is helping with that, too.

“Please, they’re more married than you and mom ever were. Among other things, they’re located in the same hemisphere every day, and he actually loves her. As I said, he’s the guy who did the research to find that this is the tartan for our clan. If you like, he can tell you about it.” Tim thinks about that for a half second. “Actually, no, he won’t tell you about it, because you’re the asshole who’s made his wife miserable, tried to kill his grandson, wound his granddaughter, and attempted to deprive his great-grandchildren of their father and uncle. Anyway, if you do the research yourself, it’s a good story. But even if it wasn’t, if it was just a random collection of threads, I like it, so that’s what matters!”

For a second, that off foots John, he’s not used to Tim talking back. His eyes dart from Tim’s lingering for a second on the scar through his eyebrow, and the dart back to the kilt. “Of course you’d like skirts.”

Tim smiles, cold. He can see Tony hovering about twenty feet away, from the looks of it keeping one eye on Tim and another on his phone, where Abby’s probably texting him, verbatim, everything he and John are saying to each other. “Yeah, I do. They show off my pretty legs.”

His father nods, coolly, eyeballing the dragon tattoo. “Didn’t know you had any ink.”

“I have several of them now. Been collecting them since I was twenty-four”

His dad stares at the dragon for another second. “Overcompensating.”

“Goodbye.” Tim turns and leaves, knowing that will egg John on, make him feel like he’s won a small victory of some sort or another. He’ll come back for another round. Probably one after that, too. But soon…

Round two is when Tim’s getting a refill on his drink. He’s got sparkling mineral water with a twist of lime. It looks like a gin and tonic, which is intentional, he wants to look like he’s drinking, loosening his own control. John’s never seen Tim drink, has no idea what, if any, alcohol tolerance he has, but Tim’s fairly sure that since John is certain that Tim has no skill at any of the ‘manly arts’ which include putting away booze, that he’ll see Tim as an even easier target if he’s got a drink in his hand.

While Tim waits for his drink, he spends a few minutes chatting with an Army Colonel who works with big data and satellite images to track the movements of armed forces. That’s a good conversation, but eventually the Colonel gets his drink, and the Admiral drifts over to him.

“You’re thinner than you were last time,” he says to Tim as he orders another double scotch.

Tim isn’t sure if that’s the Admiral’s idea of a compliment or a put down. He also takes note of the fact that he’s ordering doubles. That’s new.

He nods at his father. “Hard to keep working out when you’re healing up. Lost some weight on that. Should have it back in a few months.”

“Chipped a clavicle back in ’89. Didn’t miss a day of training.”

Tim snorts and rolls his eyes. “Yeah. I bet you didn’t. Tell me about the time you spent a week in the hospital strapped to the bed in traction with more than twenty broken bones and didn’t miss a day of training.”

John looks him up and down, really looking, eyes lingering on the scars on his hand.

Tim sees him doing it and says, “Yeah. They had to cut me open to screw my hand back together. You should see the scars on my arm, shoulder, and foot. But, sure, chipped clavicle, beaten near to death, that’s pretty much the same thing.” Then he snorts and turns away, going back to Abby.

Close to an hour later, Tim’s in the head. Draga’s actually in one of the stalls, which is a bit more security than he’d like, but Tony’s not leaving anything to chance, and, when John walks in as he’s washing his hands, he’s glad to have another pair of ears lingering out of sight.

“Your wife is beautiful.”

Tim looks up from washing his hands and sees the Admiral standing behind him in the mirror. “I agree.”

“She’s a bit too plump, but her eyes are gorgeous.”

Tim glares at him. Of course he’d take a shot at Abby’s weight. “She’s exactly the weight a woman her height is supposed to be at nine months pregnant.”

“Your mother only gained ten pounds with you.”

Tim closes his eyes, takes a deep breath, and lets it out slowly. His mom was always slim, and always on a diet, always watching every bite, and suddenly that makes a hell of a lot more sense.

On top of that, he was a seven pound baby. Add in placenta weight, water weight, breast size increase… His mom, the parts of her that weren’t a baby factory, lost weight when she was pregnant with him. He shuts the water off.

He’s watching his dad in the mirror. “Pregnant women are supposed to be plump. If she’s plump, it means her husband is doing his job and making sure she’s got enough nutritious food easily available, and she’s getting enough rest that her body doesn’t have to burn through its whole fat reserve to keep his child safe and healthy. It means, that when that baby joins the rest of the world, he’ll be able to get all the nutritious food he needs, too. It also means she’s secure enough in his affections that she doesn’t feel like she has to starve herself to keep him from wandering off.” He turns to face his father. “So don’t try to sell me the idea that the physical manifestation of you abandoning my mother and I was some sort of fashion statement. If you had done your job and been the husband, father, and provider you were supposed to be, by six-weeks pregnant Mom would have been plump, and she would have stayed that way for as long as she was nursing me. Her gaining less weight than was necessary to bring me into the world means you failed!”

Tim grabs a paper towel and begins to rapidly dry his hands. He’s intentionally not looking at the Admiral as he does that, hoping he’d take it as a sign of weakness.

Looks like he does. Tim can hear (or imagine) that Draga’s keeping in constant text contact with Tony and Abby.

“She’s not what I was expecting. She’s why you’ve got the tattoos right? The neck one makes her look cheap. But, I guess you take what you can get.”

Tim tosses the paper towel away. He takes a second, debating engaging on him about Abby, but decides that’s a recipe for him throwing the first punch, and John ending up pressing charges, which is not how he wants this to go. Stay on target. Don’t let him control this. Time to commit to the whole plan, and then he does, knowing that if he’s going to really set the trap, he needs to use his best bait. “Well, judging by the fact you called me a fag three hundred times a year, I’d figure you’d have expected my spouse to be male.”

“I knew you liked girls, just didn’t want you be one of them,” John says staring at the kilt, disgust on his face.

“Lovely. You ever have a good heart to heart with Sarah about how you feel about women? Oh, right, she’s not talking to you anymore. How about Mom? I guess not, or is that why she left?” John looks stunned to see that come out of Tim, and Tim barrels on, keeping talking, “If you’re that freaked out by women, it’s no wonder you’re no longer married. Probably explains why you couldn’t stand to be in the same hemisphere with her. Take a hint, Admiral, straight guys usually like seeing their wives.” Tim leaves the men’s room, upping the tension by knocking his father’s shoulder with his own.

Tim stops, grabs his drink from the table he left it on, and settles in next to the dance floor, about ten feet in front of the doors to the room, where his father will have to walk past him to get in. He watches couples bob around, scanning for Abby and Tony. He’s just found them and catches Abby’s eye when The Admiral comes back, standing a step too close to him.

Tony’s slipping through the crowd, heading for Tim’s left side. Abby’s watching him, and he sees Draga heading toward her.

“You told your grandmother I abused you.” John says, voice very low, taking a sip from his bourbon.

Tim raises an eyebrow at him. “Really?” And then he clarifies in his best snotty, precise tone, “No. I did not tell her that. I have never told her or anyone else that. I did tell her what you said to me, and she called it abuse. In fact, everyone who hears what you’ve said to me calls it abuse.”

That’s not what John expects to hear. “I never touched you.”

Tim nods, curtly. “And I have never told anyone that you did. I have gone out of my way to make it clear that you have never raised a hand against me. I have told several people that you threatened to have me gang raped and mutilated, twice. And you know what? You hitting me would have gotten a less horrified reaction. Every man I know has had a moment where he’s just wanted to beat the shit out of someone, even, occasionally, his own kids. None of them have ever felt the need to say the words,” Tim’s voice drops even lower and he moves a quarter step closer to his father, “‘You wanna be a girl so bad? I will order my men to drag you into the hold, stake you down, fuck a cunt into you, and then cut your pansy ass little faggot dick right off of you and shove it into that bleeding maw of a cunt.’”

John snorts. He actually looks proud of that turn of phrase, and Tim can see that Draga just stopped dead for a second, too shocked at what he’s just heard to move. It’s only a second though. Draga’s easing right, getting into place.

“Just trying to scare you straight.”

Tim shakes his head, staring at John with malevolent disdain. “You know, for someone who claims to have known I liked girls, you seem terrified that I’d be gay.”

“It’s a figure of speech.”

Tim takes a big swallow of his drink, looking like he’s pulling up some liquid courage. His father smiles at that, takes a small sip of his.

Then he glares as Tim says, “It’s a Freudian Slip. When it came to following the rules I was so straight you could have used me for a level, so it wasn’t about that. So, what, you actually like guys?” The Admiral flinches, it’s very slight, and the only reason Tim catches it is because he’s looking for it. “Oh…” Tim smiles, cold and brilliant. “That your dark secret? That why you never remarried? It’s legal now, you know. Wouldn’t even keep you out of the Navy… Or is that why you put Mane up to taking me out, couldn’t stand to make an honest man out of him, so why not get rid of him and me in one move?”

John flushes, red, fast. It streaks up his face as, “Watch your mouth!” hisses from between his lips. They’re in public, so he keeps his voice low, but it’s hot and very angry, and he’s inched closer to Tim. Tony’s moving closer, too. And Tim’s noticed a few of the outside security are also moving in. They know they can’t do anything until John makes a physical move, but they’re ready and watching.

“Or what? You’ll have a fit? Cuss me out proper? Teach me some respect? Deal with me yourself? In public? There’s only two gods you’ve ever worshipped and that’s the Navy and proper behavior. You’ve already lost one of them, so I’m guessing you’ll cling like glue to the only one you’ve got left. Besides, when were you ever the man who got his own hands dirty where people could see him? Four men have asked me about the Stennis test, today alone. They all know what you did, that you cheated. How’s that feel, them laughing at you behind your back because you were outsmarted by your kid?”

John glares at him. His lips open, but he kills whatever was about to come out of them before it does.

“Only reason you’re even here is because I just fucking decimated the upper brass back in October, and the ones who were left weren’t well-enough connected to know what you did after I outsmarted you. You think you’d be here if they knew what you had them do to me after I won?”

John shifts his weight, about to step away, and Tim knows that can’t happen. If he leaves, Tim won’t get him back, won’t get him to lose his temper.

“You should go back to ignoring me. Go back to the other side of the room, sip your drink, chat with other drone guys about how killing people from the other side of the world gives you all hard-ons or whatever. And then turn your ass around and run back to Hawaii before this gets unpleasant. I do not want to see you here for another second of this Commission or any of the other ones, either.”

His dad doesn’t say anything, but he doesn’t walk away, either. Tim knows he can’t. Not now. By challenging him to walk away, he’s just cemented his father’s feet to this spot on the floor.

“Walk away, Admiral. Just walk away from me. I’ll go home and spend the rest of the night with my beautiful wife and beautiful child who you’ll never get to see. You can go back to being the retired, old blowhard who’s just here clinging to his old glory days. Just let it go and walk away from me. Do it now.” John still doesn’t move. Tim stares at him for a second, daring him with his eyes to back down. He doesn’t, and Tim smiles at him. “Good. ‘Cause I don’t really want you to go, either. I gave you one pass and didn’t raise a fuss because SecNav personally asked me not to, because we couldn’t prove you asked Mane to have me killed, but right now I’m the fucking golden boy of the Navy, and I’ve got all the ‘get out of jail free’ cards in the deck, so walk away before I forget myself and this gets messy.”

The Admiral still doesn’t walk away. He can’t. He doesn’t respond either. For once, his acid tongue is still, and Tim isn’t sure why, but he doesn’t care. He takes another deep breath and commits to it, hopes, for a second, that it doesn’t hurt, too much. “I’ve always wondered why you were so hung up on it. It was always the first thing you jumped to. Tim’s doing something I don’t like or understand, must be a fag. I mean, who makes that leap? Not like you found me reading gay porn or making out with another boy.”
The Admiral’s eye twitches at the mention of gay porn, and Tim wonders what’s going on in there, who might have caught him, but not enough to stop this.

“Had to get to know a forensic psychologist before I got the answer to that.” Tim flashes The Admiral a mean little smile. “You know what they say about people who fixate on things, right?”

“What?” John’s eyes are narrow, jaw clenched, and people are starting to move away from them. It’s not enough of a fight that anyone who isn’t security or Abby is really paying attention, but there’s a get-away-from-this vibe coming from both of them, so that even people with their backs turned to them are edging out of the way.

“That it’s what they are or want to be. But you’ve always known that about yourself, right? So, who caught you with the pictures of the naked guys?”

The Admiral grits his teeth. He’s noticed there are people around, people who would probably notice if he let fly with his usual loud, profane routine. Tim realizes that’s probably why this is a one way-conversation. That iron control is still keeping the Admiral’s tongue in check.

“But I should probably thank you.”

“You should.” His voice is cold at that. “But that’d be too much to expect from a self-centered, ungrateful…” He sees John drop the last word before he says it. “Three meals a day, roof over your head, best education money could buy. I did everything I could to make you into a man.”

“Oh yeah.” His voice caresses over the yeah, adding an obscene pleasure to the sound. “You always knew it, right? Knew I was a twisted, bent little fuck. Knew I needed to be straightened out.” Tim knows, exactly, how this is going to go, can see it all play out. He catches Abby’s eye, nods very slightly at her, she reads lips well enough that he knows she’s been following the conversation, and he wants her to know this is when to look away if she doesn’t want to see him get hit. She does.

“Walk away, Admiral. Walk away right now.” But he doesn’t step back, he doesn’t walk away, and Tim knows he can’t, and Tim smiles. “That’s your worst nightmare isn’t it, Dad? Me liking guys?” He smiles, eyes hard and cold. “Me sucking cock, spreading my legs like a girl, taking it up the ass, moaning like a bitch in heat when some guy drills my ass, hitting that sweet spot. Just like you, right? Guess what? It feels great! Makes me come so hard I pass out. That’s the real reason for the kilt, so he can bend me over and nail my ass whenever he likes and—”

He doesn’t get to finish that sentence before his father punches him, hard, in the face and shouts, “You God-damned faggot, I should have made them fuck it out of you! Should have cut that disease out of you when I had the chance! You are a disgrace to our name, and the Navy, an—”

He tries to follow it up with a second hit, an uppercut, but he’s not nearly fast enough, and for as sure as Tim is that he’s going to be in a world of hurt when the adrenaline crashes, he’s not there yet, so he grabs that hand, pulling his father’s index finger out of joint, quickly snapping it, while twisting his hand into a wrist lock that would have made Ziva (who taught it to him) proud, and jolting his legs out from under him with a fast leg sweep.

In a second, his father is pinned, on the floor, throbbing pain in his hand holding him immobile.

Tim kneels on him, knee digging into his shoulder blade as he holds his arm on the verge of dislocation. “I’m one man,” he’s not being loud, but the whole room is silent, so anyone nearby can hear what he’s saying as he twists his father’s wrist a bit further, “and I’ve broken one of your fingers. You are on the floor and completely at my mercy. You locked me in a cell and set four men on me, and in that cell, they broke my foot, dislocated my ankle, broke my nose, broke my teeth, ripped my wrist to shreds, kicked me in the balls, broke my arm and hand in ten places before one of them ripped my arm out of my socket and that’s what finally put me down. I may be a fag, but if I am, I’m the fag who dropped you without even landing one punch.”

Then he straightens up and says, loudly, “Admiral John McGee, you’ve just assaulted a Federal Officer, that’s a felony. You just assaulted me for coming out to you, that’s a hate crime.”

Tony comes over, pulling cuffs out of his pocket. He’s eyeing Tim, and Tim nods at him, letting him know to take care of John.

“Admiral John McGee, you are under arrest for assault on Timothy McGee, you have the right to remain silent…”

Abby rushes over to him, so angry at John and proud of Tim, she’s overcome with emotion, she’s shaking, but he smiles at her, feeling giddy, gleeful. “It’s okay. That felt way better than it should have. Way, way better! I can’t even feel my eye right now I’m so high on the endorphins.”

She very gently touches his eye, and he winces. “We’re going to the hospital. You’re going to feel that in a few minutes.”

“I don’t care! It was worth it.” He’s grinning from ear to ear, as his eye purples and swells. “Do you think someone at the bar could make me an ice pack for my eye?”
It'll Have To Be Enough

Chapter Notes

And even more Merry Christmasses to you all!

Draga watches Abby help Tim out of the conference, feeling shocked, and finally, when his brain starts working again, he says to Tony, “Holy fuck!”

Every eye in the room is on the two of them, a lot of them are shocked or pitying, and the susurrus of gossip is starting to swell.

Draga’s voice is part of it. “God, poor Abby…” He thinks for a few seconds about what he heard. “Shit, Breena, too.” He looks like he’s got a bad taste in his mouth.

“Draga, shut it. We will talk, later. Let’s get the Admiral handled.” Tony nudges the man in handcuffs kneeling in front of him.

“Fine. Just…”

Tony can see all of Draga’s respect for Tim and Jimmy crumbling into a heap of ashes. “It’s more complicated than you know.”

Draga snorts, gently helping McGee get standing. “It always it. That’s what I said to Diane, too. It’s complicated. Come on, you know that’s—“ “Eric! Later.” Tony glares at McGee between them.

“Fine.”

In the car, with McGee, behind them, Draga gives Tony the can we talk now? look.

Tony shakes his head. “Later. Uh… remember Tim’s car accident?”

Draga nods.

“Yeah… When we get in, I’m bringing him up to Vance. Get into my computer and read all of the emails between me and Agent Burley. Tim’s the Doe in that case.” Tony nods back to McGee. “He’s The Admiral in question.”

Draga starts to look really disturbed as he remembers how badly hurt Tim was. “There wasn’t a car accident, was there?”

Tony shakes his head. Then he shifts the rearview mirror to look at McGee, huddled into a little ball, skin gray with pain. “Eric, this was almost forty years in the making, and what you heard tonight…”
That’s the tip of an iceberg that’s only tangentially related to this.”

Eric exhales low and slow, and then nods. “Okay. It’s complicated. But when you’re done with this asshole, we talk?”

“You read; we talk.”

Leon sits at one end of the conference table in his office. John, shaky, gray, sweating, clearly in bad pain, slouches at the other.

Tony is leaning, back against the wall, watching this.

Leon is not smiling, not on the outside. On the inside, he’s got sunshine pouring out, and his only regret is that he didn’t get to watch it and get a kick of his own in. (He’d actually debated going in as part of the ‘security,’ but he’s too well-known for that. These days, at any sort of crowd like this, he doesn’t blend.)

But now is not the time to reveal that. “As Director of NCIS I don’t often get involved in individual criminal cases. That’s just not part of my day to day job.” Leon smiles, cold and brittle. “But for you, Admiral, I will make an exception.” Leon steeplest his fingers in front of him. “You see, I have a vision of the Navy, one where there’s no black or white or brown, where we aren’t gay or bi or straight, where male or female only matters in the sense of making sure the uniforms fit properly. In my Navy, the one I’ve been working to make, one case at a time, one priority at a time, there’s only Navy Blue, and every, single person on one of our ships, planes, carriers, bases, is just that, a person in blue.

“So, it should not be a surprise to you that people like you, who want to divide everyone into groups of your pets, and not your pets, are on my hit list.” Leon smiles again. “Add in the fact that you’re the dumb fucker who messed with my Cybercrime Director, the man who is my first choice for my successor,” Tony looks impressed by that, “and I’m enjoying this a whole lot.

“Now, this is going to go one of two ways. First way, you will plead guilty to assault and a hate crime. Agent DiNozzo will handle the paperwork, and then, by morning, you will be on your way to Leavenworth. Or, I will, as per your rights, call whichever lawyer you want, and allow you to take this to court. What is not on the list is the option of any sort of plea bargain whereby you agree to some lesser charge, and this goes away.

“So, either I get to enjoy seeing you sign the guilty papers, which I’ll admit, will be sweet, or I will watch you, in court, attempt to explain away what ‘You Goddamned faggot, I should have made them fuck it out of you,’ meant. And while my best lawyers are raking through your personal life, your professional life, why, before DADT your command had the highest rate of discharges for ‘conduct unbecoming,’ followed up by during DADT of having the highest rate of officers and enlisted being ‘outed’ and then booted, and then finally, once it was legal to be openly gay in the Navy, how it is that in two years with literally tens of thousands of troops under your command not a single openly homosexual sailor was promoted, and then Sam Burley will get up there and go over how suspected gay officers and sailors under your command had an unusually high rate of accidents, then they’ll grill you about Tim and the Stennis, and I’ll have them call your daughter and mother up to talk about how you are a child abuser with a nasty anti-gay sexual slant, while they do all of that in the court room, I’ll be having press conferences along with SecNav about how at the Navy we takes these issues deadly serious, and no one, not even a retired Admiral is outside the scope of the law. Either way, it’ll be sweet for me.”

Leon grins again. “So, shall Agent DiNozzo draw up the paperwork to process you? Or shall we call you a lawyer?”

McGee blinks, hard and slow, and chokes out, “Give me the papers.”

Tim is used to being next to the limelight. NCIS does the work, someone else gets credit. He helps break the US Government, but he’s one of the guys off to the side talking about one very specific part of the job. His book hits the best seller list, and his agent fobs off a few canned comments from Thom E. Gemcity, stuff like that.

And it’s intentional.

It’s not that he minds having people know what he’s done, but, really he’d rather just be doing it than talking about it.

So, he’s not exactly sure what to do when, while in an emergency room in Virginia, waiting for an open bed (though if he’s here for another hour, he’s going to ask Abby to just take him home to Jimmy, or if she really wants an x-ray, to NCIS, where they have an x-ray and a doctor), his phone starts ringing off the hook from numbers he doesn’t recognize.

Finally, about forty minutes into the wait, as his eye is throbbing along with each heartbeat and he’s feeling woozy and sick, a number he does recognize pops up. Penny’s.

He nods to Abby, who answers the phone. He doesn’t much want to talk.

“Is the scuttlebutt true?” she asks Abby.

“Depends on what they’re saying.”

“I just got calls from four high-ranked Navy wives saying that John hit Tim after Tim came out to him. They’re asking what’s going on.” Penny is, too. That’s clear from her tone.

“Yes, that did happen. John got one good shot in, and then Tim leveled him. Yes, he did ‘come out’ to that man, but… well, you know the real story on that. Then Tony arrested him for assaulting a Federal Officer and a hate crime. And, if you want to start spreading around the idea that this was a hate crime sting, we’d both appreciate it. It’s even, more or less, true. Once we found out he was invited, too, we got that sting set up with Leon on the fly.”

“Is Tim okay?”

“We’re finding out. I don’t like the way his eye looks. Too swollen for just a black eye.”

“How about you?”

Tim might have been floating around on clouds nine, ten, and eleven as they were heading out, but Abby could feel the ‘Oh, my god, that poor woman, she’s so pregnant and her husband is sleeping with other men’ looks from all over the room as they left. And though she certainly doesn’t mind sharing Tim with Jimmy and Breena, she’d prefer not to be seen as some sort of sad, stand-by-your-man victim in this case.

Abby knows that’s what Penny’s asking her about.

“I’ll live. Not like people haven’t stared or whispered at me before. We were out of there in less than two minutes. But both of our phones have been ringing nonstop.”

Tim looks surprised at that, he hadn’t noticed her phone going. Abby nods at him.

It’s a bit later, after he’s had a chance to think some, after the x-ray tech has gotten him in to get his eye zapped with plentiful rads, that he says to Abby, “I put you in a bad spot, didn’t I?”

She shrugs a bit. “For better or worse, right?”

“Yeah, but…” he feels sheepish as he thinks about it. People are going to talk, even if Leon does get up and explain the whole thing is a sting, the rumors will flow around.

“I don’t care. You took him down. You got him, and that’s worth more than any whispers… And I am willing to stand tall and proud next to you, and let the world know that whatever it is you are or want to be or do, that I’m in for the ride.”

He starts to smile, but moving his cheek muscles hurts.

“I love you.”

“Me, too.” She kisses him, soft, gentle, very carefully avoiding his eye. “And the rest of them can fuck off.”

“Yeah, well, we can hope, right?”

She nods, about to say something else, when the doctor comes in with x-rays in hand. “Mr. and Mrs. McGee, hello. I’m Dr. Ryl. We’ve got your x-rays back, and you do have a hairline fracture of your orbital bone.”

“And that means…” Abby leads with.

“In terms of what you do next, not all that much. It’s not anything we can cast. Pain medication, keep it protected, don’t let anyone else hit you in the face—“

“I know the drill. Got my nose broken a few months ago.”

Dr. Ryl looks really disturbed by that. “Mr. McGee… Uh…” he’s not sure how to proceed. Usually if a couple comes, and one of them has facial injuries like this… and then more of them recently…

Tim’s not with it enough to know why the Doc is looking concerned. Abby’s watching him eyeing the bruises on Tim’s face and trying to see if her hand is big enough to have made them. Abby shakes her head. She holds up her hands. “No bruises. He was in a car accident a few months ago. Got hit by a truck, broke his nose, hand, foot, ribs… We know the drill.” She points out the scars on Tim’s hand.

“Oh.” Ryl starts to look relieved. “I’m sorry. Yes, you would know, then, don’t you?”

“Yeah. Percocet…” Abby rattles off the pain meds that Tim had been on that worked fairly well for him, and wrapped with, “not sure about that dosage though, he’s ten pounds lighter now than he was then.”

“We’ll get to it. Probably another hour before we’ve got the release papers ready. Then you can go home. Rest. No work tomorrow, maybe the next day. The pain meds will make you loopy. You can’t drive on them…”

“We know. Really.” Tim’s feeling out of it, but he knows enough to say that.

“You need to sign, there, and there.” Tony says, pointing to all the spots on John McGee’s confession.

John looks at the pen in front of him. He reaches for it, tries to pick it up, but his fingers (black and blue and his index finger is pointing in a non-standard direction) won’t curl around the pen.

“I can’t sign.”

“Sucks to be you.” Tony’s giving him the I’ve got all the time in the world look. And for the sake of nailing Tim’s father, he does. “We’re just going to sit here until you do.”

John glares at him. “Maybe if I could get some medical attention?”

“You want a doctor? What, did you damage your hand breaking my friend’s face? Oh, you poor, poor thing. Does it hurt?”

John grits his teeth, and Tony can see him willing himself to ignore any insults offered to him. How this man got to Admiral is not a mystery. “Yes, I would like a doctor.”

“Then we’ll make sure you get one, Mr—”

“Admir—“

“Mr.” Tony draws it out, enjoying emphasizing the lost rank. “McGee. After all, we wouldn’t want you to complain about substandard treatment, or have any reason to believe that you aren’t being treated with proper professionalism. My Boss runs a tight ship, so we don’t have accidents in holding.”

And they don’t, and won’t. But Tony doesn’t mind if John gets an extra layer of shit dumped on him between now and Leavenworth. Tony gets out his phone and calls Jimmy. He figures by now that Jimmy has to know what’s going on.

Apparently Jimmy does, and he’s sounding awfully enthusiastic about heading off when he’d normally be getting ready for bed to offer Mr. McGee a little hands-on attention.

When Tony wraps the call he looks at Mr. McGee again and says, “You know, you should probably take that jacket off, otherwise someone might add a charge of impersonating an officer to your sheet.”

That makes John bristle. “I earned this jacket.”

“Oh, that’s right, you’re retired. Tell me about how that went, Mr. McGee.” Tony says with a cold smile.

John doesn’t reply.

“Wait… What?” Breena says, waving Jimmy closer, and putting the phone on speaker.

“He took John down. Flattened that fucker, kneeling on his back, broke his hand… It was beautiful!” Abby says. Tim’s lounging on the hospital bed, waiting. He’s already starting to get the loopy-gazed look he gets on Percocet. She wanted to know how bad it was before she called Jimmy and Breena. “Let me start at the beginning. We’re just getting a free second right now.”

So, Abby tells the tale, and Jimmy and Breena, knowing how it ended before how it got to that ending, cheer at the good parts, enjoying every verbal hit Tim was able to lay on the Admiral, and they growl at the bad parts, where John’s being an asshole.

She’s just about to the good part, reporting the third-hand version of the men’s room, when Jimmy’s phone buzzes.

“Tony just called.”

“Yeah, he probably would. He’s got John. I bet Tony’s looking for a doctor for John.”

Jimmy puts Tony on speaker, too. “Hey. Abby’s just getting us up to date. Tim creamed him?”

“Oh, yeah. God, Jimmy… I got it on tape. You’ll… You’ll see. The Admiral is complaining about his hand, needs medical attention. You feel up to offering him some?”

Jimmy’s smiling brilliant, hard, knife’s edge of rage in his eyes. “Oh, yes! I can do that. Give me half an hour.” Jimmy hangs up with Tony.

“Abby…” he says.

“I heard.”

“Give Tim a kiss for me, and tell him I’m about to give the Admiral our regards.”

He can feel Abby’s excitement at whatever he’s going to do next pouring through the phone.

“Will do. Doc’s coming back, got to go.”

Then it’s just him and Breena. She looks at him for a long time, weighing her love for Jimmy, and the desire for revenge, and Tim’s pain.

“Don’t get caught,” she says to him.
He kisses her, hard, that knife’s edge look still in his eyes. “Trust me baby; I’m not going to.”

She nods, slowly, and kisses him, too. “Remember, if needs be, we have a crematorium.”

Jimmy looks eager at that, and crushes it himself. “No. Not now. He’ll do jail time for this. And we know Tim wants that.” Jimmy smiles at that idea. “Bad things happen to men like him in prison.”

“And he deserves every second of it.”

“Yes, he does!”

Jimmy gets in about twenty minutes later. (Getting to the office at 10:00 is a whole lot faster than at rush hour.) He heads inside, texting Tony, finding out where he is.

He stops in Autopsy, grabs his medical bag, spends a moment messing around with a prescription bottle, and then goes to Interrogation.

“You called?” Jimmy asks as he steps in.

Tony’s in his usual seat, on the far side of the table, leaning back, looking lazy and complacent. “He’s complaining about his hand.” He gestures to the swelling and bruised hand in question.

Jimmy walks around John, to the side of the table closest to the camera, and then scoots up a bit, getting one butt cheek on the table, leaning against it, using his back to block the camera’s view of what he’s doing to John, and gently takes John’s hand in his. “Ew… That’s nasty. How’d you do this?”

“Punched a guy,” John says, voice sharp with pain, but there’s some relief at seeing a doctor, too.

Jimmy smiles at John, face kind, eyes obsidian hard, carefully cradling his hand, letting that moment of feeling safe build, and then he quickly flips his hand over, and John gasps a startled yelp of pain. “A guy, huh? Kind of impersonal. You must have really hit him to do this sort of damage to yourself, or you just suck at fighting? What’d this guy do to make you punch him? Wiggle your fingers.” He asks the questions in a fast line, so if John tries to complain, he’ll be talking over him.

John’s wincing but he tries to wiggle his fingers. All but his index finger wiggle.

Jimmy tsks. “Looks like you’ve got a few broken fingers.” He pulls out a small prescription bottle from his pocket, and grabs a pill. John’s watching it eagerly, leaning toward the pill that’ll make the pain start to go away. “Get some water for us, Tony.” He turns his attention, and his smile, back to John. “Well?”

John doesn’t answer. He does take the pro-offered pill and the bottle of water Tony hands over eagerly. “That’ll help with the pain and swelling,” Jimmy says.

Once he puts the water back down, Jimmy’s gently palpates John’s wrist. He shifts a little, moving so his upper body is closer to John’s face, making sure the camera won’t catch his expression. “Your wrist is broken. We’ll brace it up and get a film later just to make sure. Your thumb and index fingers are broken, too. You don’t really know how to throw a punch, do you?”
John’s starting to look alarmed. He’s fairly sure his wrist is dislocated and that his thumb isn’t broken.

“My wrist—“

Tony cuts him off, fast. He’s got a clue where this is going. But only a clue. “He used to be an Admiral,” Tony says dryly, talking over John.

“Oh, so you’re used to having someone else do your dirty work.” Jimmy also talks over John, who’s looking more alarmed by the second. “Looks like he’s got some sort of amnesia, Tony. What’d this ‘guy’ do to get punched so hard?”

Jimmy carefully palpates along each finger, and then calmly, without tensing or doing anything to telegraph he’s about to do it, he firmly grasps John’s hand and wrist, twists in opposite directions, hard, shattering at least three bones and pulling the joint apart.

John shrieks, all but jumping out of the chair, but a little added pressure from Jimmy’s thumb on newly broken bones takes John’s knees out from under him and he falls back into the chair.

“There, there, setting a broken joint really hurts, doesn’t it?“ Jimmy’s smile is wide and bright and razor sharp. “Usually I’d wait for the pain meds to kick in, but restoring proper blood flow to your hand is paramount. Once more,” Jimmy twists again, opposite direction this time putting the joint back in place, and John screams as he does it, trying to yank his hand back, but again, Jimmy just nudges the bones, and John goes limp, whimpering. “Getting your broken fingers correctly aligned is going to hurt even worse.” Jimmy knows his back is to the camera, blocking what he’s doing to John, so he smiles at John again, staring him right in the eyes, and grabs his thumb and wrenches it, hard, pulling it out of joint and breaking it.

John whimpers and starts to cry. The thing about holding a man by a broken bone is that you’ve got complete control over him. John’s not going anywhere Jimmy doesn’t want him to go.

Jimmy’s back is to the camera. Tony’s isn’t. Which means, even though he’s horrified at the sheer volume of hate and violence pouring off of Jimmy right now, he’s got to stay still and keep rolling with it, or he’ll give away the fact that Jimmy’s not just fixing up the Admiral’s hand. Tony thought that Jimmy might go hard on John, might… Hell, he didn’t know… might be mean to him. He sure as hell didn’t expect this. And now that he’s got this he doesn’t know how to get them out of it without letting the world know what Jimmy’s doing to John.

“The ‘guy’ is his son, and he came out to Daddy over there tonight, and Daddy punched the shit out of him for liking boys,” Tony finally manages to say, getting his role back in place.

Jimmy quickly wrenches John’s thumb back into correct alignment. John bites his lip, whimpering, skin gray, looking on the verge of passing out.

“Good thing for you that I’m sworn by the Hippocratic Oath, or I might have slipped on that. Got a guy I’m rather fond of, too. Let’s get your thumb and your wrist braced.”

John’s staring at him through his tears and finally says, “You’re the doctor.”

That makes Jimmy pause and stare at Tony, puzzled. Tony gives him the it’ll make sense when you read the report look.

“Peter Capaldi’s The Doctor. I’m a doctor.”

“You’re his doctor.” If John was gray before, he’s white now. Eyes hollow, horror pouring off of him. “Keep your hands off of me.”

Jimmy’s with it enough that he knows he’s being taped so he lets go.

“Tim’s doctor?” he asks, obviously by this point John knows Jimmy isn’t just some random medical professional. “Yeah, I’m Tim’s doctor.”

John nods, disgust replacing the horror on his face. “Get away from me you cock-sucking faggot,” spittle flies from his lips and hits Jimmy on the glasses, “and keep your goddammed fucking hands to yourself. Don’t you touch me! Don’t you ever touch me again!”

Jimmy steps back, holding his hands high. “As you wish. NCIS would never force medical care on someone. But I can absolutely promise you that I am the only doctor you’ll have any option of seeing until you get to prison. In fact, I might just make it my duty to head off to Leavenworth and make sure I’m the only medial professional you’ll ever have the option of seeing. My mentor, your step-dad, Dr. Mallard was a specialist in hands. He spent years doing remarkably delicate surgery to make sure that wounded service men regained the use of their hands. We’ve spent many, many hours talking about that, so take it as fact that if you wait the three days until you get to prison for someone to properly see to your hand, these breaks will have become so infected and badly healed that you’ll have lost any shot of regaining full function with that hand, and that’ll be if you’re lucky. If you’re not, they’ll have to cut it off to keep the blood poisoning from killing you.” Jimmy smiles at him, cold and mean, back still to the camera. “And trust me, you’ll want the use of both of your hands once you get there.” He leans in a bit closer to John and drops his voice, “because if you can’t fight, someone might actually do what you threatened Tim with. So, if you ever want to use this hand again, you will submit to my treatment and take it like a man.”

John blanches, whimpers, and then holds out his (shaking) hand.

“Good choice.” Jimmy pulls out some of his flexible splits, bandages, and tape out of his bag. “Of course, even if you can fight, it’ll probably happen. I understand there’s not a lot of tolerance there for guys who beat up their kids where you’re going. Sure, Tim’s 39, but no one there will know that. You’ll be the guy who clocked his son for coming out to you. Maybe that’ll get you some cred, but I’m sure there are enough guys there who got beat up by their dads that you’ll have to watch your back.” Jimmy fits the splint. He knows there’ll be a medical review when John gets wherever he goes next, so this part of it has to be perfect. “Hm… bend that a bit more.” He shapes the metal to match the curve he wants John’s wrist and thumb to have. “Better?” He doesn’t wait for John to answer. He starts tightly taping everything into place. “Of course, maybe you won’t want to watch your back.” Jimmy eyeballs John’s wrist and thumb. They look right. He gently palpates again. They feel right. Then he takes John’s index finger in hand. The only finger that was broken before Jimmy got a hold of it. “Yep, this one’s broken too, going to have to snap it back into place. This’ll sting.” He savagely shatters John’s index finger with a hard twisting jerk. John’s eyes tear, and he jerks back, staggering to the waste basket to throw up. Jimmy stands by, passively watching, waits for John to finish, and then points to the chair. “Sit down.” He leans in close to John, whispering in his ear, “Take it like a man, McGee. Only fags and little girls cry when they get hurt, right? And you wouldn’t want anyone to mistake you for either of those things, right?” John’s cradling his arm against his chest, and Jimmy stands up, starts gathering up his gear. “I don’t think he wants me to treat him, Tony. Have fun trying to defend yourself with a 101 fever while your arm’s about to fall off.”

John’s all but bit through his lip, Jimmy can see blood dripping down his chin, but he holds his hand out, again.

“Good boy.” Jimmy pats John’s head, and he flinches. “Let’s get this all taken care of, and then you’ll be all done and ready to go off to prison.” Jimmy starts to set John’s index finger with a splint. “Scary place, prison. You know, a lot of those guys are there because some officer kept telling them to do shit they didn’t want to do. I bet they’re going to have a lot of fun with an Admiral. I bet you’re going to be really popular.

“Maybe you’ll just close your eyes and pretend it’s not happening. Maybe you’ll just go passive and lay there and hope for it to end as soon as it can.” Jimmy begins to wrap the bandages around John’s finger, making sure everything is firm and still. “Sort of like you’re doing right now. Realizing that you’re small, and powerless, and all you can do is just take it, and if you’re lucky, survive. Okay, that one’s done.”

Jimmy pats the back of John’s hand, and again, he winces. “None of that, Admiral. Just take what’s coming to you. Maybe they’ll pass your ass around, fuck a cunt into you, break you open, and leave you bleeding, shit smeared, diseased, and covered in cum.”

Tony’s eyes practically fall out of his head at that. He knows Jimmy’s got a dark side. Hell, he’s felt Jimmy’s dark side come out and bite him, but… He sure as hell was not expecting this.

Jimmy gently places the splint under John’s palm, making sure everything is properly lined up again. “And you, weak little cunt, you’ll just lie there and take it, because that’s all you’ve ever been able to do. All talk and no fight.

“Tony, can you hold this here?” Jimmy’s finished wrapping the bandages into place, time to tape them. Tony gently holds the end of the soft cotton bandage in place while Jimmy gets the tape. Jimmy gently applies the tape, and then he pats the back of John’s hand again, getting another wince. “Karma’s a fucking bitch, John. What you sow, you reap, and it’s about to all come back to you! Have fun in prison, asshole.”

And Jimmy gets up and leaves.

He heads into observation and sees Vance staring into the space where he had been, eyes wide, mouth open. Vance turns to him and stares, stunned.

Jimmy blinks, he hadn’t realized that Vance was watching. He doesn’t regret what he said to John, and he’s sure that Vance couldn’t see what he did while he was “fixing” John, but he’s not sure Tim wanted Vance to know that much about his/their lives.

He shakes his head at Vance. “None of that leaves this room, right?”

Vance nods.

Tony bursts in a minute later. “Jimmy! You better ho…”

Vance is watching them closely, and Tony only just seems to notice he’s there.

“Director!”

Vance looks coolly at Jimmy and Tony. “And what should Dr. Palmer be hoping, Agent DiNozzo?”
“Uhhhh…” Tony’s backpedaling fast, not sure what exactly Vance saw.

“I’m sure Tony’s about to express an interest in the contents of our infirmary’s pharmaceuticals. And you’re right Tony, we don’t normally have the kind of pain killers a man like Admiral McGee would need to deal with the level of pain he’s in. Fortunately, I had the forethought to fill a scrip for him on the way over. I imagine he’d rather like some more pain medication, now.”

Vance and Tony are both staring at Jimmy as he produces a proper prescription bottle. “Instructions are on the bottle.” There are ten pills in there. “Should be enough to get him through to wherever he’s going next.” Jimmy stares through the glass at the Admiral; he’s curled in on himself, skin gray, sweating, shaking, moaning in pain. “He’s slipping into shock. It’d be a good idea to wrap him in a blanket, keep him warm, get him lying down, feet over his heart.” He hands Tony the pills. “These’ll help.” He looks at Vance. “He’s actually going to end up in some high-end, minimum security prison for guys who skip out on their taxes, isn’t he?”

Vance nods, staring at Jimmy, realizing he’s never seen the man inside the man before, never guessed at what might have been in there. “Probably. He’s an Admiral, or was, we can’t put him in general population; they’ll kill him just for kicks.”

“Great.” Jimmy shrugs. “He won’t know that for a while, so he might as well sleep bad for a few days.”

Tony’s still staring at Jimmy, who’s just watching John, looking coolly detached from the whole thing. He can feel the pill bottle in his hand, and really wants to talk to Jimmy without Leon around.

“Could I have a minute with Jimmy, Director?”

Jimmy turns to Leon and adds, “Probably a good time to go find a blanket for Admiral McGee.” Then he takes the pills from Tony and hands them to Leon. “Make sure he gets one of these.”

Tony yanks the bottle back, very worried about what might actually be in there. Then more worried because whatever it is, John’s already had one, but he threw it up, so… “I’ll handle that.”

Leon looks between them, nods, and heads off for the blanket.

As soon as the door is closed, Tony turns to Jimmy. “What the fuck is in this?”

“Nothing to worry about.” Jimmy’s still watching John, the monster that haunts Tim’s dreams, the man who almost stole him from them. Now he’s just something small and broken, scared, hurting, crying to himself in an interrogation cell. Jimmy smiles. This time there’s no razor’s edge, it’s just pure pleasure. Tony’s not sure which smile scares him more.

“Nothing to worry about? I’m worried about you right now. You just…”

Jimmy turns to Tony, staring at him, cold, eyes distant. “I broke his thumb, index finger, and wrist. And then I fixed it. His medical files will show he came in with all of those breaks, and they have all been properly cared for given the limitations of the first aid available here in the Navy Yard. The pills are placebos. The first one I gave him was real, but he threw it up. I’ll make sure he gets another real one. The rest are compressed baking soda. That combination, along with Leon treating him for shock means he won’t die. He’ll be stabilized by the time the real pain kicks in. As long as he’s taking these, they won’t give him any extra pain medication. It’s possible that just thinking it’s real medicine will take the edge off, but it won’t do any heavy lifting on his pain. Right now, his biggest risk is shock. Improperly treated shock may kill him, which is why I’ve mentioned it to you, why I’ll make sure he gets another real Percocet, and why Leon’s getting him a blanket.”
“Shock may kill him…” Right now Tony isn’t all that worried about “shock.” “What about you?”

“We decided” and the way he says we makes it clear to Tony that ‘we’ means Tim, “that he gets to live out the rest of his natural life.”

Tony nods, wondering if Jimmy means that he won’t do anything more than this, or that he’ll make sure Tim doesn’t know if he does anything more than this. They see Vance head in, wrap McGee in a blanket, get him lying down, prop his feet up.

“Take it like a man?” Tony asks.

Jimmy shakes his head. His eyes close and his teeth clench. “Comes out of Tim when he’s sleeping sometimes. You can tell from the nightmares that’s something John used to say to him.”

“Oh. Is he…” Tony knows they aren’t just fooling around, but it still strikes him as weird when he comes up against things like the fact that Jimmy really sleeps with Tim.

“Still having nightmares?” Jimmy finishes the question for Tony, and then answers it. “Yeah. Not as many, but yeah. Maybe once or twice a month now.”

“Oh. I didn’t know he talks in his sleep.”

Jimmy shrugs. He assumes that Tony’s roomed with Tim enough to know something like that. Of course, Tony sleeps like a log, so he might have just slept through it. “Enough. He’s pretty easy to get settled back down again, now.” Tony realizes that means he wasn’t back when they started sleeping together. “Still hurts, though, you know?”

That Tony knows all about. Rips his heart out when Ziva wakes up screaming. Doesn’t happen all that often anymore, but it does happen sometimes, especially with pregnancy dreams it’s been happening more often the last few months. She gets lost in a dream, starts yelling, never in English. It jolts him awake, and he cuddles her close, murmuring soft things to her, petting her gently, until she wakes up or settles back down.

“You help settle him down?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Whoever’s next to him does. It’s usually Abby, and about half the time, me.”

Tony’s just staring at Jimmy on that.

“What?”

“I just… I didn’t know it was like that.”

“What, you thought it was just all sex? That we fuck and then sleep apart?”

“No… Not that.” Tony looks uncomfortable, especially given what Tim said to The Admiral. “Just… Didn’t think you’d be next to him.”

Jimmy shrugs a bit at that. “Sometimes I am, sometimes I’m not. Not like we have to keep the girls between us or our dicks’l drop off and we have to hand in our man cards. If he’s having bad dreams and he’s next to me, I’ll rub his back or cuddle him, while Abby holds onto him, we’ll both talk him back to dreamless sleep, and then he’s good.”

“That’s…” Jimmy waits for Tony to figure out what to say. “Really domestic.”

Jimmy shrugs. “Yeah, well, sleeping at home, in bed, with your family tends to be kind of domestic.” He’s looking at John, whose color is getting better as Leon makes sure he’s in the right sort of position. “I want to go in there and kick him to death.”

“I know.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “No. I don’t think you do. Because until today, I didn’t know. I thought I did. I’ve spent months training with Gibbs to do it, kept practicing on my own when he couldn’t, so, I thought I knew, and I’ve been fantasizing about it, but… Nope. He’s here, and breaking his hand wasn’t nearly enough.”

Tony puts his hands on Jimmy’s shoulders. “I know, Jimmy. I really know.” And for the first time Jimmy really gets, in his guts and balls, what Tony was doing in Somalia, and how Tony and Tim and Gibbs had to let a lot of those guys go to get Ziva out. More than that, he gets how Gibbs and Tony didn’t expect Ziva to be there, so they weren’t going in for a rescue mission so much as a kill-everyone-who-gets-in-range mission. “He’s in our custody, and unlike his ship, we can’t just have some sort of accident in the jail cell.”

Jimmy nods. “And I don’t want him to. Not right now. Only reason I could stop from going further is because fear is more satisfying than death, and right now, he’s scared. Really scared.” Jimmy smiles. “But I really wouldn’t mind if he ‘accidently’ spent a few months in the general population at Leavenworth.”

Tony thinks about that. “You know, we can probably arrange for something like that to happen.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “No. We can’t. I mean, yes, it’s possible, but no… Like you said, he can’t have an ‘accident’ here. Everything’s got to be above board.” Jimmy takes a step toward the door. “I’ll get the report written up. We’ve got Percocet down in Autopsy, I’ll get some of that for John, too.”

“Take your time,” Tony says.

Jimmy smiles again.

Once Jimmy’s out of Observation, Tony sits down, heavily.

He’s not precisely sure how to process what he just saw, what happened tonight.

He feels like he just got dropped back into the deep end. Like, okay, yeah Ducky had mentioned that John had pulled any sort of shit he could on Tim, but somehow he hadn’t realized, until he was sitting there, listening, watching, exactly how deep the damn shit went.

That’s stupid. He knew. A guy doesn’t try to have you killed because he’s irked at you. And, he knows Ducky mentioned there was a sexual edge to it, but… He didn’t know. Didn’t imagine. Not until he saw the look on John’s face as he was shouting about ‘making them fuck it out of you.”

He didn’t realize how black those words thrown at Tim must have gotten, because obviously, this was not the first time Tim heard anything along those lines.

Threaten your own kid with rape. Tony’s seen a lot of sick fuckers in his day, and John McGee’s in the top ten.

And, God… Tim got up there and proclaimed himself a… Tony doesn’t even like to think that word. Not anymore. Especially not with Jimmy and Tim in his family.

And Tim didn’t just name it, he described it. To John. God, he owned it and served it up on a platter and took the hit and… And… And just leveled the fucker. Grabbed his hand and took him down! That was awesome.

Tim described it. That was more than he needed to know about what happens when the McPalmers are McPalming, let alone Tim’s role in the relationships.

And then Jimmy. Shit… Jimmy! He knows Jimmy’s got a dark side. He knows Jimmy can get vicious, and… Right now, he can’t for the life of him decide if he set Jimmy on McGee because he knew, deep down what Jimmy would do, and he wanted it to happen, or he blindly refused to know who Jimmy is deep down.

Too much shifting around for one night. Too many thoughts he really doesn’t like.

He likes neat and tidy and everything in safe and secure little boxes. And the whole McPalmer thing broke all of his boxes. His boxes for where the people in his life go, his boxes for how relationships work, his boxes for what’s acceptable behavior, hell, his ‘this is what love looks like’ box got shattered.

But they’re his friends, so he rebuilt, and he cobbled together broken boxes and he made some bigger boxes and he tried not to think too hard about the bits that strike him as icky and…

And now the damn things are broken again.

Jimmy’s in love with Tim. Beginning, end, middle: that’s what’s going on. That’s not what he thought was going on, but that’s it. Tony loves Tim, he could easily kill or arrange the murder of John McGee with nary a second thought, tucking himself into bed that night and sleeping the untroubled sleep of the morally just.

Jimmy looked John in the eyes while torturing him and smiled.

And Tony knows that he couldn’t do that. If he got his hands on the men who captured and raped Ziva, oh yeah, he could spend hours on wringing every drop of pain they could possibly feel out of them, but… no, not for anyone else, not Tim, not Gibbs, no one else would elicit that level of rage out of him.

When he reboxed everyone, with both Tim and Jimmy assuring him over and over that they were both straight, which was either true at the time, or a huge lie designed to… what, keep him calm? After he blew up about them as a foursome with the guys straight, he could see them deciding he didn’t need to know they were fucking each other on top of that… Except… Tony remembers telling Tim that he’d actually be more comfortable with it if they were fucking each other. Easier to buy that it was stable if that was true. So, it probably wasn’t true when he last talked to Tim or Jimmy about it.

Apparently, it’s true now. Given Tim’s history with this, with what John was threatening, Tony isn’t sure if he should cheer or feel vaguely nauseous.

Anyway, he arranged it in his head as a set of two threesomes, Abby, Tim, Breena, and Jimmy, Abby, Breena, where the sexual attraction and romantic feelings all moved along heterosexual lines for the guys, and he didn’t bother to try and define the girls because he knows trying to define Abby is useless and he’s got no idea what Breena gets out of this.

So, it took a while, but he reboxed everyone, and, sure no orgies happen in front of his eyes, but from everything he could see his new boxes worked. Tim and Jimmy don’t neck in public. They act like they always did, two guys who are very close friends. The only new stuff involved how they relate to the girls and how the girls relate to each other.

But those boxes don’t work, because this isn’t two threesomes, no matter what the hell those two were saying about being straight, this is a foursome.

“Never thought I’d say I’d be happy to see you with a black eye,” Breena says when Tim comes in.

Tim hugs her, sagging against her, and says, with a huge grin on his face. “Never thought I’d be happy to have one. But, oh man, I SO am!”

Breena pulls back a little, and Tim follows her, not steady on his feet. “Okay, come on, let’s get you to bed.”

He smiles along with that as Abby and Breena help his elated and drugged self up the stairs.

“Where’s Jimmy?” Tim asks, having forgotten most of what’s happened in the last hour as he keeps replaying standing over The Admiral, calling him out in his mind again and again.

“He’s with Tony.” Tim misses the look Breena and Abby share.

“Oh, cool. I bet he’s having a good time. You want to go, too?” he asks Breena.

She holds up a hand as they get to the top of the stairs. “I’m good here.”

“Okay…” Tim doesn’t say anything as they get him into bed. But, once he’s lying down, he says, “Did anyone call Gibbs?”

“Not yet. You want me to?” Abby asks.

“Yeah. I really want to see him.”

“Okay.”

Eleven o’clock phone call from Abby. Gibbs knows what this is.

And again, he’s wrong.

He listens as she gives him the story, electric something, pride maybe, joy, a little disappointment, because this means he’s never going to get his own shot in against John, all flowing through him as he gets the story.

He remembers, as he’s grabbing his coat, that Tim had said something to him, when he sat him down and showed him the rifle, that Tim wanted this on his terms, using his tools, his weapons. Gibbs remembers Tim saying that it needed to be his words that did it.

Gibbs smiles, shutting the car door behind him, hitting Abbi’s contact number to get her up to date. (She’s already back at CGIS)

His boy did it!

“You gonna be able to see out of that eye again?” Gibbs asks as he walks into Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom, seeing Tim in the middle of the bed, eyes closed, looking extremely satisfied and tunelessly humming something to himself. Abby’s next to him, holding his hand. He starts on her side and kisses her cheek.

Tim’s right eye opens and focuses on Gibbs. The left is too swollen to open. “Probably. Might have double vision when I look up and down. Good thing I’m not a field agent anymore, that would have ended it.”

Gibbs is shaking his head, and half-sits, half-leans on the bed next to Tim. “How you feeling?”

Tim isn’t looking at Gibbs. He’s watching… Gibbs isn’t sure, something… above and to the right of Abby. “Pretty loopy. I’m on a ton of pain meds, and they’re actually doing the job. It’s actually pretty nice, kind of floaty, and I’m in a really great mood. Abby’s right, morphine’s a treat. When we retire, Abby and I are going to do a lot of drugs. Gonna try everything.”

Gibbs isn’t sure how to respond to that, so he tries a tight smile and says, “Glad to hear it.”

“Bet Breena and Jimmy’ll like ‘em, too.”

“That’s great, Tim,” he says, patting Tim’s knee.

“And Jimmy can write scripts for a lot of them. He really liked Special K back in college, can’t wait to see how that feels. March or April, when Abby’s all healed up from Sean, Jimmy’s gonna write us a prescription for morphine and we’re gonna try sex like this.”

“Uh huh.” Abby’s shaking her head at Gibbs; she’s not nursing stoned. “You wanna get some sleep?”

“That might be a good idea. I’m not sleepy, but I’m sort of not really here, either.”

“No, you aren’t, Tim.” Gibbs is shaking his head. He squeezes Tim’s knee through the blanket on his bed. “Was it worth it?”

Tim seems to go clearer for a moment, and that grin spreads over his face as his eye lights up. “Oh yeah!”

“You sure?”
“Oh yeah!” That grin on his face is amped to eleven as he says, “I didn’t break him, Dad. I made him break himself. It was perfect. Told him I liked it up the ass and he freaked, shouting about me being a fag and how he should have made them fuck it out of me. All the shit he put me through, all that crap just boomeranged back onto him and took him right out of the game. Everything he ever loved is gone, and he did it to himself. ‘Admiral attacks own son in hate crime.’” Tim giggles. “He’ll do jail time. Can’t sweep this under the rug, not like what happened on the Stennis. Two hundred witnesses and the past means this is an airtight case. Even without the morphine I’d be feeling pretty damn good right now.” Tim thinks about it, remembering how he felt after the endorphin crash, and ended up throwing up in the waiting room because he hurt so badly. “Okay, maybe not good, this would really hurt. But very satisfied.”

“Okay.” Gibbs kisses the top of Tim’s head. “Okay.”

Tim reaches up and hugs him, spending a good long minute clinging to Gibbs, and he holds him back, gently petting his hair. “It was good, Dad. It was so good!”

Gibbs kisses him again and ruffles his hair. “You get some sleep.”

“Okay.”

Gibbs sits next to Abby, not saying anything, but she rests her head on his shoulder, knowing how much that moment mattered to Gibbs.

No one’s called him Dad, not like that, since 1991. Sure, Tony and Ziva and Jimmy’ll do it as an affectionate joke, but for real? It’s been too damn long since someone called him Dad for real.

And even if it was high as a kite on pain killers, it matters to him. He’s missed that so much, didn’t know how just hearing that word aimed at him would fill him up. Pop is good, and he loves when Kelly calls him it, but… Dad’s better, fills a different hole, one that’s been empty too damn long.

Eventually, Tim’s fully asleep, but she keeps her voice low as she says, “He probably won’t remember he did it, but if you tell him what it meant to you, he’ll do it when he’s sober.”

Gibbs shrugs. “I can wait until he can do it on his own.”

Abby shrugs at that, too. “Might be too much baggage with that for him to come up with it on his own when he’s sober.”

Gibbs nods. “That’s why I can wait.”

Breena comes back in a moment later. “Penny called again. It’s already starting to get some press. Just the fight, so far. No names, yet. Leon’s promised a press conference about it tomorrow afternoon.”
Once John is bundled up, and no matter what Jimmy wants on this, Tony’s not helping to torture the guy a second longer than he’s already been, so he quietly tells Leon the pain meds are a placebo so they can get him some real pain medication.

Leon’s looking at the bottle, then looks at Tony. It’s clear on his face that he knows what Jimmy did.
It’s just as clear that he doesn’t entirely know what to do with it, either. “I didn’t expect that.”

Tony swallows. He’s the guy who called Jimmy in. “If I’d known he was going to go that far, I wouldn’t have called him.”

Leon nods. He’s fine with John taking some of his medicine. That’s part of why, even knowing what sort of relationship Tim and Jimmy have, and having read what Tim said to John… Hell, because of the relationship Tim and Jimmy have, that having Jimmy walk in there and tend to him would be fine. Some insults, maybe slightly less than gentle treatment, John knowing that he owed his health to Tim’s “Doctor,” all of that was fine with Vance.

He slipped into Observation, looking forward to seeing Palmer hurt McGee verbally, and maybe, just a little, physically. Rough him up a bit. Like that first move, where he flipped John’s hand too fast.
Leon cheered at that. That was exactly the sort of thing he was hoping to see.

The idea that Jimmy would go in there and torture John did not occur to him. Watching it happen, from Jimmy of all people, was exceptionally disturbing, and now he’s on major ass covering mode.
“The files will match up?”

“Jimmy says so.”

“Okay. I could see it from where I was standing, but it’s not on the feed. He’s sitting in the exact right place so you can’t tell what he’s doing. I screwed the sound a bit, too. Once he got in there, the volume drops. Crank it up, and you can make most of it out, but not all of it.” He’d also been expecting some less than kind words. He was fine with covering for that. What he got and what he thought he’d get… Leon exhales long and hard, shaking his head.

“You didn’t stop him?” Tony half asks, half says. He wonders what Vance is thinking about this.

“Same reason you didn’t. It’d screw the tape. If McGee complains, he complains, and we all take the black mark for letting someone too close to Tim handle this. There’s no proof he didn’t come in with those injuries. Most they can get him, or us, on is that Jimmy says some really unkind things to him.”
Leon glances at the pills. “You think he’s telling the truth about these?”

Tony opens it and pops one. “He’s off the reservation, but he wouldn’t lie to me about them being poison.”

“You hope. Palmer doesn’t see McGee again.”

“On it, Boss.”

Tony knows it’ll take a bit for Jimmy to get that report done, so time to handle his other loose end.
Draga.
He heads back to their desks, and sees Draga hunched in front of his computer, looking sick.

He glances up at Tony and then back to the screen and back to Tony. “Is he in holding?”

“Yeah, now.”

“You mind going out for some coffee and turning a blind eye while I go in there and use his kidneys for target practice?” Draga glances around his desk. He picks up his stapler. “With this?”

Tony purses his lips and swallows hard. He’s tempted to say, “Jimmy already got there,” but decides that’s a bad plan. “No, I don’t mind, but no, you’re not going to do it.”

Draga almost pouts. Then he glances back at his screen, shaking his head. “That… I don’t have words. Nothing in my head is bad enough for this.”

Tony sits down, across from him. “I know.” He looks at the image of Dave, and on Draga’s desk where Kevin’s picture is. “I don’t… I’ve got a shitty dad. Took him seventy-five years to get in the neighborhood of decent parenting, but…” Tony shakes his head again. “Nothing, at all, like that.”

Eric nods along. “Yeah, I know I’m not getting Daddy of the Year anytime soon, either, but… Shit!”

Tony nods at that, too. He knows Eric’s got a big question left.

And he does. He gestures to the computer, “So… this, and the shit that came before and… Is McGee gay? Is that why The Admiral…”

Tony’s shaking his head. “No matter what may or may not be true about Tim, why The Admiral pulled any of this shit is entirely in his own twisted, fucked rats-nest of a head. It’s not on Tim.”

“Fine… You know what I’m asking.”

“What’s your gut say?”

Draga gives Tony the stink eye. “If I trusted it, I wouldn’t be asking you.”

“You’re an investigator, think your way through it.”

“Fine.” And Draga does think. “No. He’s not gay. I’ve seen him with Abby. Hell, I’ve seen him sneak off at a Christmas Party with Abby and wander back ten minutes later with his hair all fluffy and a shit-eating grin on his face. No one is that good of an actor or that deep in the closet.”

Tony nods.

“And I watched him level The Admiral and talk about… I mean… That was really fucking explicit!”

Tony nods at that, too. He knows and agrees on that.

“That’s not the sort of thing a straight guy says. It’s not the kind of thing a straight guy thinks. You ask me to play gay, and I’ll swish, but you’d never, ever hear… that come out of me.”

Tony keeps nodding. Ask him to play gay, and he’s sure he could pull it off, but what Tim said to actually get the Admiral to strike isn’t anything he’d ever say, let alone think. “So…”

“He’s bi?”

Tony shrugs. “Could be. He and Jimmy both tell me they aren’t, but that was a while ago… What else did he say?"

“Wife, husband, other wife… So… Abby and Breena know, don’t they? That’s why Abby didn’t freak out?”

Tony nods. “And are part of it. And approve. The family knows. You know. I’m sure Allan will know soon, because he’s my next call. Now shut the fuck up about it! This was a sting. We know gay things set The Admiral off; gay sailors have a hard time under his command, and this was designed to get him out of the Navy once and for all.”

“All right. I can… If anyone asks about the stuff that came before? About the Stennis?”

“You know nothing and are not authorized to talk about ongoing investigations. They want questions answered, they can talk to Leon.”

“I can do that.”

Tony hunts down Jimmy and finds him in Autopsy filling out John’s medical report. For a moment, he just watches Jimmy typing, reading over his shoulder, and so far everything looks up and up.

“Aren’t they going to wonder why you didn’t x-ray him upon initial examination?” Tony says to start up the conversation.

“He was in interrogation. Lots of places only offer first aid until they’re done working with a criminal. I’ll x-ray him in an hour or so.”

Tony shakes his head, very scared of what will happen when Jimmy x-rays John. “Nope. I shouldn’t have called you in. I… didn’t think you’d do that.” Though the more he thinks about it, the more he’s coming to the conclusion that some little part of him kind of hoped Jimmy would go batshit on John, and he’d get to watch. “I’ve already called Allan in, he’ll x-ray and do any secondary care that John needs.”

Jimmy blinks slowly, turns away from his computer and stands up to face Tony. He thinks for a moment, and Tony’s not sure what that look on his face means, but it scares him. Finally he says, “If I had shot him, you’d have been fine with it, right?”

Tony nods.

“And you’d shoot him yourself?”

“Yes.”

“So, what you’re saying is that murder is a lesser sin than pain?”

Tony puts a hand on each of Jimmy’s shoulders. “I am saying that I have a direct order from our Boss, who could see what you did to the man in our custody, and who did not stop you from doing it, to take you off this case and make sure you never see John again.”

Jimmy’s not happy about that, but he gets it, and gets the massive ‘Get Out of Jail Free’ card Leon just handed him. “Fine,” he says, voice flat.
“Finish up the report, go home, or go to Tim, I know…” that trails off. Tony’s just looking at Jimmy, trying to see him as a man who would rip another man’s hand apart to avenge his lover. His male lover.

“What do you know?” Jimmy says, looking at Tony curiously, aware something’s shifting in Tony’s head.

“I know you want to be with him.”

Jimmy does. He hasn’t seen Tim, yet, and he’d like to. But… right now there’s something (a copy of an x-ray of John’s hand) that he’d like to give Tim when he sees him, and it looks like that’s not going to happen. “Like to be able to tell him about several rounds with the Admiral. Better than flowers or balloons or some other stupid get-well present.”

“One round will have to be enough. He can complain, you know? Eventually he will get to Leavenworth and…”

Jimmy nods his head, turning back to his computer. He spends another minute typing, and then hits the enter button. “Notes are done. He came in here with all of those breaks. When Allan x-rays him, everything will look exactly the way it should. You guys got him in so fast, that short of McGee offering bone samples for a histology report, you can’t tell all of those breaks didn’t happen at the same time.”

“Fine. Go. Tomorrow morning, when you get in, after he’s been transferred out of here, I’ll head over to visit, with a copy of the x-ray.”

“Okay.”

Jimmy gets home to the sight of several cars in his driveway. The other one that belong to him, okay, that’s normal. Abby’s, makes perfect sense. Gibbs’… He supposes he should have expected that.

No lights on in the house. So… Gibbs is sleeping over? All right.

He heads in quietly, but sees that Gibbs isn’t sleeping. He’s in the living room, one light on, low, waiting up for him.

“How’d it go?”

Jimmy shrugs, heading into the living room. He’d like to just get to bed, but… Apparently thinking, in addition to doing, is in order.

“He still alive?”

Jimmy nods as he sits down on the sofa next to Gibbs. “Yeah. World of hurt… maybe… I think Tony pulled an end run on me on that. Vance might have… But I got a few licks in.”

“He gonna press charges?”

Jimmy shrugs. Calmer now, he’s more with it, and more able to see that John might be able to make a hell of a fuss. “He can. I don’t think he’d win the case if it went to court. Tony and Vance’ll lie about what they saw, the camera didn’t get anything, and any medical review won’t be able to tell what I did. Sometimes you’ve got to break bones to set them properly… And now, they’re set properly.”

Gibbs sighs. “Did it help?”

That’s what Jimmy’s been working on not thinking too much about. “I liked doing it.”

Gibbs lays a hand on Jimmy’s shoulder. “I’ll bet. But it’s not better, is it?”

“No. God, it felt… good.” And Jimmy’s not sure he likes how much he enjoyed that. “But… kind of like sex with someone you don’t much like, you don’t feel good, after. Doesn’t last.”

“Tony’s got him. Called in Allan to finish up his medical care. On Vance’s orders, I’m not allowed back into the building until John’s out of it. He plead guilty rather than face trial. Apparently, they got him on tape admitting he threatened Tim with rape, and they got video of him going batshit insane when Tim came out to him, so he doesn’t want any of that coming out in open court. He’s off to Leavenworth while a judge rubberstamps this and gets it swept away as fast as possible.”

“Now what for you?”

Another shrug. “Go upstairs, snuggle in with my loves, try to get some sleep between now and back to work. Longer term, be a husband and a dad. Keep talking to Rachel. Hope this doesn’t blow up too bad, apparently Tim didn’t just out himself, but mentioned enough details about his lover that anyone who knows both of us can figure it’s me… Got a conversation with Allan coming up. He’ll wonder why I started the treatment and he finished it.” Jimmy shakes his head. That’s immediate what he’s doing, not who he’s trying to be. “Love my family, raise my kids, be a better man tomorrow than I was today. That’s what’s up for me.”

Gibbs squeezes him a little tighter. “Good.” He stands up and gives Jimmy a hand up. “I’m heading home, snuggle my own love, she should be home by now. You need it, you call.”

Jimmy nods. “Goodnight, Jethro.”

“Night.”

After Gibbs leaves, Jimmy spends a moment or two downstairs, lights off, letting his eyes adjust. Then he heads up. He checks the girls. All three of them are snoozing away, little, round lumps under blankets, cuddling their stuffies, and in Kelly and Anna’s case, contentedly sucking away on pacifiers.

Then to his room. Tim likes to sleep on his right side. Jimmy can understand that, it leaves his dominant hand free for whatever he wants to do with it. He likes to sleep with his lips against the shoulder of whomever is in front of him, all curled around them the way Kelly curls around her Skully.

Tonight, he’s on his back. And, even in this light, Jimmy can tell why, his eye’s got to hurt like a bitch.

He feels a little more satisfied with what he did to John.

He takes care of his nightly routine, as quietly as he can, but he still wakes up Abby.

She drifts over to the bathroom, shutting the door behind her. “Hey.”

“Go back to sleep.”

“In a minute.” She glances at the toilet, and he knows what she wants to do. He brushes his teeth faster. “How was it?” He can see that gleam in her eye, and he knows she would have just as happily been in there with him, cracking bones, and likely adding a massive laxative dose to the placebos.

Jimmy smiles for a moment. “Doing it was great. Broke his fingers and wrist, felt the bones crunch and the joint rip under my hands.”

Abby’s eyes close and she savors it. “Good.”

He nods. “But it didn’t fix anything. Tim’s still hurt.”

Abby shakes her head. “No. I mean, yes, his orbital’s cracked, but… You’ll see when he’s up. He’s not hurt, not anymore. He got what he needed out of it.”

Jimmy smiles at that, a real smile. “Good.” He gives Abby a quick kiss. “Can I…” He’s not entirely sure what he’s asking here, but he wants to be close to Tim, but that’s her place on his left.

Abby does. “Yeah, go snuggle with him. If he was awake, he’d like that.”

Jimmy nods, and leaves Abby the bathroom. He strips off quietly, and pads across the room to their bed. He’s on Tim’s left, the side John hit, so he doesn’t try to kiss his face or touch it, but he settles in next to Tim, on his back, the same way he usually sleeps, scooting in close, so his flank is pressed to Tim’s, then he takes Tim’s hand in his and gives him a gentle squeeze.

Tim stirs a little, squeezes him back, and goes quiet.

A moment later Abby’s back, curled against Jimmy’s other side. Jimmy doesn’t fall asleep quickly, but he’s not wracked with guilt or pain or much of anything. Mostly, he’s very aware of the sounds of breathing, the soft shifting movements around him, and how much he loves this collection of people around him.

He wonders if tomorrow, they’ll be fully out. Probably not. Given how embarrassing that whole thing was, the Navy is going to do everything it can to keep it quiet. And he’s thinking that, were it not for the fact that Breena works with her parents, he doesn’t care. He’s ready to be open about this, wider world be damned.

He’s thinking as the night sounds of his home swirl around him, that they need to spend a few hours really going over their family finances, as a twosome and foursome, and figure a few things out. From everything he can see, their main vulnerable point is that Breena and her parents co-own Palmer and Slaters’. If, between the four of them, they’ve got the money to buy her parents out…

Then they’re free. No one, not Breena’s family, not NCIS, would have any leverage on them any longer.

He drifts off, thinking about that.
“Hey, Sam.”

“Tony?” Sam sounds fairly muzzy as he says that. This is not, by a long shot, the first middle of the night call he’s gotten from work. It is the first one where Dr. Palmer’s voice wasn’t on the other side of the line.

“Yeah. We’ve got a perp in need of medical attention. Could you come in?”

Sam rubs his eyes. He wants to say, “Why didn’t you call Dr. Palmer?” but he figures that’s kind of whiny.

“Great. Thanks. Swing by my desk, and I’ll take you to Holding, okay?”

“Sure.”

Sam’s not quite as well put together as he’d like to be for work, but he figures that if you want medical attention, fast and in a sweatshirt and jeans is better than slow and clean shaven with nicely styled hair and a suit.

He looks like what he is, a guy who got called in the middle of the night, did the absolute minimum level of grooming to be socially acceptable, and then got in his car and drove like a son of a bitch to get to work, fast.

He gets to the bullpen and finds both Tony and Draga at their computers, working away. Tony looks up to him and says, “Thanks. I know midnight calls aren’t fun.”

Sam inclines his head in agreement as Tony gets up.

“Who am I looking at?”

Ever since he called, Tony’s been wondering how to answer that question. He sighs as he leads Allan down, wondering how much to share.

“Admiral John McGee.”

Sam knows that name. His eyes go wide as he hears it. He’s not supposed to know all about The Admiral, but sometimes Dr. Palmer and Abby get talking when they think he’s not there. He knows exactly how unpopular Admiral McGee is among this group.

“Okay… And…”

“He decked Tim at one of the Commission meetings. Tim took him down, and he just pled guilty to assault.”

“Ew…” Allan winces. He knows the McGees have a messy relationship. Well, he assumes. He hasn’t been able to overhear what the issue is with the McGees, but he can’t imagine that Dr. Palmer or Abby could hate anyone that much unless he was at the absolute pinnacle of Tim’s shit list.
It’s also true that he didn’t think it was so messed up that The Admiral would take a swing at Tim. Though… Allan begins to feel a bit cold as he gets the idea that, just possibly, Jimmy and Abby weren’t just being mean and blowing off steam with some of those suggestions, and that they might have meant them.

Tony’s talking again. “Jimmy started with him. Took care of the first aid. But he was called away, and John still needs an x-ray, get the checkup finished.”

Allan looks at Tony curiously. Dr. Palmer has never, for any reason he’s ever seen, been ‘called away’ from anything. He supposed that maybe if Sean decided now was the time to show up, that he might leave in the middle of an exam of the person he likes least on earth for that, but Allan wouldn’t bet on it.

“All right.” It’s clear in his voice that he’s reserving judgement, waiting to get more information. “Is Tim okay?”

“Abby says he’s got a cracked orbital.”

Allan winces again. That was a hard hit. “So, John has a broken hand?”

“Something like that.” Tony opens the door to Holding. “Jimmy got him some pain meds, and set the breaks.”

Allan raises an eyebrow at Tony. If Jimmy had already set the breaks, then he’s already done the long part of this job. The x-rays would have taken, at most, another five minutes. “But he didn’t have time to do an x-ray?”

“Uh… No.” Allan finds Tony’s tone interesting. There’s a lot he’s not saying. “He was just getting John patched up enough so he could sign his confession and his guilty plea.”

“Huh.” Allan looks at Tony again, thinking about how very fast this is going. Best he knows, no one gets a plea taken care of the same day they get booked. This is getting shoved into a corner out of the light as quickly as possible, apparently. He’s sure that taking a swing at your kid would be embarrassing, and he is an Admiral, but… Something else is going on here. “And you want me to see him, finish up the full medical review before he’s transferred out of here?”

“Yes. We’ve got him booked on a flight to Leavenworth at seven.”

Allan nods, slowly, and looks through the bars of the different holding cells. He also glances to the left of the cells, seeing the portable x-ray and laptop, waiting for him.

“That was considerate.”

“Yeah, well… Jimmy said you’d need them, so here they are.”

Allan and Tony step closer to the cell, which Tony unlocks.

There’s only one man in it. He’s not what Allan was expecting, not from hearing Abby and Jimmy talk about him.

It’s just a guy, probably sixty-five-ish, sleeping, wrapped in a blue, wool NCIS blanket. He’s in fairly good shape for someone his age, tall, hair that’s the yellowish gray that makes Allan think it used to be blond or the sandy brown color Tim has. He doesn’t have Tim’s long face, but the eyes, lips, and hairline are similar. He does not appear, at least not lying on a cot, to be Satan incarnate, which, given what Jimmy and Abby want to do to this man, is what he was expecting.
“Admiral McGee?” Allan says quietly, hoping to wake him gently.

His eyes spring open, and he thrashes himself backward against the bars of the cell, cradling his arm against his chest, trying to get away from the voice calling him. So much for that plan.

“I’m Doctor Sam Allan. I’m here to finish your medical review.”

McGee’s eyes aren’t tracking well. It takes him a second to get eye contact with Allan, and then he jerks his eyes away, looking at Tony, looking around the room for someone, and then back to Allan and back to Tony.

“This one a fag, too?” he asks Tony.

“Oh, God!” Tony says. He looks horrifically embarrassed. “Jimmy gave him a pretty strong dose of Percocet.”

Allan, whose mouth had opened, but no sounds had come out upon hearing that, swallows, and then turns to Tony, and says with maximum sarcasm, “Yeah, homophobia’s a well-known side effect of Percocet.”

Allan, whose mouth had opened, but no sounds had come out upon hearing that, swallows, and then turns to Tony, and says with maximum sarcasm, “Yeah, homophobia’s a well-known side effect of Percocet.”

Tony winces again, and Allan can see he’s just now remembering that he’s gay.

Then Allan squares his shoulders, turns back to John, and takes two steps forward, crouching down so he’s eye to eye with the man on the cot. “I don’t know about ‘too,’” but yes, I am. And if fag’s the best you’ve got to throw at me, you need to go back to kindergarten and brush up on your technique. Sissy, nancy boy, cock sucker, shirt lifter, tea bagger, pansy… I’ve heard them all, and they were all old ten years ago. Though, if you’d ever seen me in a pair of heels and eyeliner, you’d know I’d the Fucking Queen. Now, if you want to talk about my sexuality, I prefer queer. If you want your hand taken care of, you’ll stop slinging insults, and let me at it.”

“Queen, huh?” John’s swaying slightly as he tries to keep sitting up. “La ti fucking da, your Majesty. You fucking my son, too?”

“Only on Wednesdays. Your hand.”

John snorts, mutters something Allan’s glad he didn’t understand, closes his eyes, unwilling to look at Allan, and holds his hand out. Allan carefully, and quickly, checks visually, and gently palpates to see if everything looks and feels okay. So far, so good. Jimmy did a good job. Allan carefully unwraps John’s hand, and removes the metal brace. “I’m going to put your hand on the x-ray, make sure all the breaks are properly lined up.”

“Yeah, sure. You going to snap a few of my fingers while you’re at it?”

“That’s doubtful, but not impossible. Sometimes you have to break bones to properly set them.” He places John’s hand on the x-ray. “Hold still.” He gets two shots. “I’ll check these, and then if you need your hand reset, we’ll see about getting you the proper care,” Allan says as he replaces the metal splint and re-wraps the hand.

Allan stands up, and nods to Tony, who follows him out, pushing the x-ray and computer.

Once they’re clear of Holding, Tony says, “I’m so sorry. I didn’t…”

“Tony… It’s not the first time that’s happened. It won’t be the last. Compared to some of the shit I’ve dealt with, that’s nothing.” He smiles grimly. “Besides, it always freaks them out when I don’t just roll over and cry when they call me nasty names.”
“Still, I’m sorry.”

Allan nods. “Let me get this back to Autopsy. I’ll check everything out, and let you know if he needs anything else.”

“Thanks, Sam.”

There are things that are true about Dr. Sam Allan. He is young. He is not terribly experienced in the ins and outs of murder (though he’s learning every day.) He’s almost a year into a new job that he’s enjoying, in a new city, which is a good change of pace from where he was before.

He’s lonely. He still misses the man whose murder put him on this path. He’s broken, but put back together, and if not healed, he can at least see where healed is. And, he’s found, in the course of the last year, that he’s stronger and more adaptable than he ever imagined being.

He is not stupid, nor is he blind. He is not bad at reading social situations, though he may not be good at it, either. But he’s been at NCIS for almost a year, so he’s getting the lay of the land of the relationships around him.

And he knows that something has gone very wrong.

He knows this because he’s reading John McGee’s x-rays and medical report, and can see that Dr. Palmer was called in to provide medical attention, which from the looks of everything he did a fine job of.

He also knows, by looking at those x-rays, that somehow John McGee appears to have gotten several torsion breaks from punching Director McGee. Granted, that’s an unlikely combination but, Allan supposes, given the fact that Director McGee, before he got hurt, used to be part of Dr. Palmer’s sparring party, it’s possible that Director McGee has some interesting tricks up his sleeve.

Though, given that comment about snapping fingers, Allan is doubtful as to the likelihood of that. What he said was true, sometimes you do have to break bones to set them, after they’ve healed into the wrong position. Which takes, at the very least hours into days, not… as he’s seeing in the medical files, 94 minutes.

What’s impossible is that John McGee was brought into this building, handed to Dr. Palmer, and then given appropriate medical care. And not because Dr. Palmer isn’t competent to handle first aid for those injuries. He’s seen the files, he did the X-rays, he knows Dr. Palmer did a splendid job of patching John McGee back up. (Actually, seeing the x-rays, Allan’s quite impressed, Dr. Palmer has some hard core palpation skills. He knows his sense of touch isn’t good enough to get that many breaks put back together, properly, by feel alone. Then another cold though hits Allan, setting breaks by feel alone is the most painful way to do it.)

No, the reason why it’s impossible that Dr. Palmer did what he was supposed to do the way he was supposed to do it is twofold: One, he’s in love with Director McGee, and two: he’s here doing the wrap-up for this job.

If Dr. Palmer had done the job he was supposed to do, he’d also be standing here, finishing that job.

There is one other thing Dr. Sam Allan is unsure of, and that’s what, if anything, he needs to do
He heads back up to Tony’s desk, with copies of the x-ray to put into his files.

Tony glances up at him as he heads in. “All good?”

“Yeah, the breaks are all properly set. I don’t think I could have done that by feel alone, but Dr. Palmer set them right.”

“Great.”

Allan looks at Tony, who appears tired, and then to Draga, who’s carefully not meeting his eyes. “So, have you heard from Dr. Palmer? Has whatever called him away been taken care of?”

Tony swallows, and Allan can see he knows he’s caught in the lie.

“Yeah. I think he’s okay, now.”

Allan looks at both men, who are glancing to one another, and then nods.

He’s watching the elevator doors shut when he hears Draga say, “So, you gonna tell me why Jimmy didn’t hand you those x-rays?”

“No.”

He could head home, grab a few more hours of sleep. That’d be the smart plan.

But Allan’s not getting ready to do that. He’s heading back to the Morgue, and to his computer.

Over the last year, Sam’s been trying to figure out how Dr. Palmer, Tim, Abby, and Breena fit together.

With the wedding rings, he’s sure how two of the relationships work. Given what McGee said, he’s feeling like he’s got confirmation on at least one more of the relationships. “Are you fucking my son, too?”

He’s damn sure that too didn’t refer to Tony.

At first, when he started working here, he thought Dr. Palmer and McGee were just good friends. That thought was bolstered by the fact that McGee and Abby appear to be the poster couple for ‘in love and married.’ Add in the fact that Dr. Palmer and Abby genuinely like each other, really get along well, and are just flat out fun to be around, and he was sure he knew what was going on.

Sam’s met some rock-ribbed bastards in the course of his life, and he’s sure Jimmy isn’t one, which is why, as things kept shifting with McGee and Dr. Palmer, he couldn’t believe they were together. Dr. Palmer’s not the guy who fucks the husband on the down low while keeping up a deep, warm, intimate friendship with the wife.
That’s just not who he is.

Summer wore on and the relationship shifted further. Tim got hurt, and that got Abby and Jimmy talking together about some really nasty things they wanted to do to The Admiral. And, by the end of the summer, Allan was willing to believe that Jimmy might have been involved with both McGees.

Nothing concrete. Just… looks. Or… Occasionally Dr. Palmer would hug Abby just a bit too long or close. Or, the way he pets Sean’s baby bump. And he and McGee stand a bit too close sometimes. Or… that ‘burn’ on McGee’s wrist. Whatever the hell that is, tattoo probably, it sure as hell isn’t a burn, and it means something to Jimmy and Tim, but…

But he doesn’t know. As best as he can tell, both Tim and Jimmy are straight. They might be very comfortable with each other, and a lot more touchy-feely than he expects two straight guys to be, but he’s never seen either of them check a guy out, not each other, not any other guys. He’s seen both of them check women out, but guys… Nope.

If it wasn’t for that, he’d have been sure the guys are in love with each other. They act like it. But…

“Are you fucking my son, too?”

That clears that up, doesn’t it?

Except it doesn’t. Because even if Jimmy and Tim are lovers, that doesn’t help him figure out the girls. He might have been able to buy that Jimmy was involved with both McGees. Since he rarely sees Breena, (though he hears about her, often) he could, sort of, believe maybe things weren’t all that hot… but… But he lived in Dr. Palmer’s home for weeks. He’s seen the pictures. There’s just… Too much. Too much love, too much affection, too much ease and joy between Jimmy and Breena for them to be in the sort of rough patch where he’d be seeking comfort from the McGees.

And he stayed at Jimmy’s while Jimmy and Breena were sleeping at the McGees’… While Tim trusted Jimmy with his wife and daughter, to get them to safety while everything fell apart. And he can’t imagine a situation where Jimmy would have the balls and the emotional calluses to make his wife go on the run with his mistress.

He supposes it’s possible that they share the girls. He knows swingers exist. He’s never met any, at least, not like this, not long-term relationships, but it happens, right?

And again, he’s not sure what the hell to do about that.

There is a practice, common among MEs, but something Dr. Palmer, and before him Dr. Mallard, frowns upon, namely reading the crime reports. Both of them think that getting too close to the investigating officer’s idea of what’s going on/reading what the suspects say happened can prejudice their investigation, and deafen them to what the body is trying to say.

So, even though, as the Assistant ME, Dr. Allan has full access to any case file, he’s never bothered to do more than upload his information into one.

Today though, he’s doing some reading.

Or, he would be, if he could find that case. He already knows it’s got to be sensitive as hell because Timothy McGee doesn’t turn up anything other than a really sketchy traffic accident report from last year that Allan knows is BS.

Fortunately, he remembers the numbers on the x-rays he took, and searches by them.

That gets him in a John Doe assault case.

His eyebrows lift as he sees the second charge on the sheet, hate crime. “Bingo.”

He reads Tony’s version of the assault first. It’s pretty accurate, covering when Admiral McGee interacted with Director McGee, what sorts of comments were made, where said comments were made, how both of them reacted, and on and on, until they get to the last bit, where all Tony has written is, “Words were said, and then John McGee pulled back, punched Tim McGee in the face. Upon being hit, Tim McGee immobilized John McGee with a finger lock, twisted his hand until he dropped, and we proceeded to arrest him.”

Allan’s eyebrows furrow at that. “Words were said.” Every other conversation, from the dragon tattoo to the Abby’s pregnancy weight were recorded, but not what set Admiral McGee off.

Allan sighs and flips to the next report, Draga’s version of the story. It’s awfully similar to DiNozzo’s, though he’s got a more in-depth account of what was said in the men’s room. Apparently Tony wasn’t in there, but was reporting what he was being texted.

Then comes the fight. McGees are drinking, talking, and… “Holy shit!”

Draga did not mince words. By the time he’s reading the bit about why McGee likes kilts, Allan’s blushing from his toes to his scalp, and he’s not sure he’s ever going to be able to look his Boss in the eye again.

As a medical doctor, Sam Allan is aware of the fact that bisexuality exists. As a doctor who’s done a lot of reading on this, he knows men and women do not, generally, work the same way when it comes to sex.

He’s aware of, and has met, several women who he’d classify as genuinely bisexual. His first, and only, girlfriend is bisexual.

In the course of his life, he’s known a decent number of “male bisexuals,” and as of this point, every single one of them deserved those quotation marks around the title. He’s come to the conclusion that genuine male bisexuals are like unicorns. Everyone’s heard of one, they all know what one looks like, but no one knows a real one.

In his experience, every “unicorn” he’s met has been a horse or a zebra, pretending, or easing from one identity to another.

Thus, this moment, sitting in front of his computer, reading Draga’s report, is the first moment where he’s considering the idea that Jimmy and Tim might actually be unicorns.

The idea that there are two of them, together, here, right where he works, is staggering to him.

But, perhaps that’s the answer. They’re married to women they love, but the girls, because they are girls, can’t scratch that itch. So… They’re good friends, they love each other, and… take care of each other when they need to…

He supposes that could be it. It’s not how he’d run a marriage but… If it keeps everyone happy… He supposes the girls have to know what’s going on… Maybe they’re part of it… Maybe they just look the other way every now and again…

Allan’s not sure if he likes that, but… But it doesn’t matter if he likes it or not.

He checks the clock. It’s getting onto three, and if he wants to catch any sleep between now and the start of the day, he’s got to get settled now.

He shuts off his computer and heads to Cybercrime, hoping the sofa will be available. He’s seen Jimmy and Tony nap on the steel tables in Autopsy, but they hurt his back, so if he doesn’t have to sleep on one of them, he won’t.

Jimmy wakes up to the gentle sounds of the girls getting up and moving around, and the not even remotely gentle sound of Tim cussing up a storm because his eye hurts like betrayal.

He hears Abby saying, “Take the Percocet,” and Tim saying, “I can’t work on that stuff.”

Abby adds, “That’s the point. You’re supposed to be home today.”

Jimmy opens his eyes and sees a very blurry Tim shake his head. “Gotta be there today.”

He decides that’s his cue. “No, you don’t.”

Tim turns toward him, and even without his glasses Jimmy can see his eye’s a freak show. “Yeah, I do.” Jimmy can’t see it, because she’s behind him, but he can feel Breena giving Tim her stop being so damn stupid look.

Tim sighs, dramatically. “If I don’t go in there, today, then I’m hiding out from what happened. The rumors’ll fly even faster, and it’ll get messy. If I do go in today, then I’m a cop who was working a sting, and it was just a job. Nothing that I’d even dream of being anything like ashamed of.”

That causes the other three of them to stop and think. Riding high on Tim’s victory felt great. Today though…

“How bad is it?” Jimmy asks, putting his glasses on so he can see what he’s thinking of offering medical advice on.

“It’s a broken bone,” Tim says, annoyed. “It hurts. What they’ll start saying if I don’t show up’ll hurt more. So…”

“What do you have to do at this thing?” Jimmy asks. “Not any programming, right?”

“I have to sit on my ass, make small talk, and listen.”

Jimmy nods. “Okay. I’m on the bench until they get the Admiral out of the building. Put some clothing on, and we’ll head to Target. I’ll write a script for Tylenol Three. If you can stand riding around with me, then you can probably handle going to the Commission.”
“Won’t let you back into the building?” Breena asks, and Tim and Abby are watching him, looking very interested.

Jimmy flashes them a small smile. “I’ll bring the x-ray home tonight and tell you all about it.” He kisses both of the girls, and continues to smile at Tim, “I had a good time last night. Not as good as I could have, but…” He steps over to Tim and very gently strokes the right side of his face, “You okay?”

Tim nods, something other than the pain in his eye filling his mind. “Yeah.” A smile lights his face up. “I really am!”

Jimmy gives him a very light, gentle kiss. “Good.” He hears the first of the fussing from the girls’ room. “I’ll get the girls.”

“When do you have to be at this thing?” Jimmy asks as he’s taking Tim to Target.

“They start at ten and go ‘til four. Easy days for me. Just got to get there, plop my ass down, and listen in.”

Jimmy’s looking at Tim, skin white, eye swollen shut, lips tight with pain. He knows he’ll look less pinched and unhappy once he gets some functional pain meds into his system, but…

“You really sure you want to do this?”

Tim turns to Jimmy. “No shame, right? Head high, back straight, deaf to the whispers, take it on. Abby did that for me last night, grabbed me up and walked me out of there while everyone around us was whispering. Gotta do the same for her. Got to talk to Leon, too, about getting it out there that this was a sting.”

Though, as he thinks about what he did after he dropped John, that ‘sting’ bit might not go very far.

Still… No shame. It won’t fly at all if he hides and doesn’t go back.

They’re waiting for the meds when Jimmy gets the call from Tony.

“He’s in the air. Feel free to come in and do your normal day.”

Jimmy nods on his side of the phone while grabbing coffees for him and Tim.

“See you soon.”

“Not me. Draga and I are off for the day. We worked all day, we worked all night; we’re done.”

“Oh…”

Tony knows what Jimmy’s sounding disappointed at. “Check your inbox.”
That makes Jimmy happier. He’d been expecting a physical copy of the x-ray, but an image of it would work just as well.

“Thanks.” Jimmy hangs up and sits next to Tim, who’s slouching in the back of the Target Starbucks, eyes closed, looking hurt. “Here.” He opens his email, and pulls up the letter from Tony, and there it is, in all its black and white glory.

Jimmy blows it up as much as he can on the tiny screen of his phone.

Tim’s looking pretty interested as he sees the scan. “His hand?”

“Yeah.” Jimmy traces breaks on the index finger. “These are yours. His index finger was broken and dislocated, along with his wrist, when I got him.” He touches several more breaks on his thumb, index finger, and wrist. “These are mine.”

He sees the grin spread over Tim’s face, as he rests his hand on Tim’s back.

“Wanted to give you more, but… Tony and Vance decided that was enough.”

“Decided?”

“Tony was in the room with me, and Vance was in Observation. I didn’t know he was watching.”

Tim starts to look concerned. “Is this going to bite you?”

Jimmy shrugs. “It shouldn’t. The tape is clean. I don’t think Tony or Vance would talk. I could see it in how they were looking, they expected me to hurt him, wanted me to, just… not as much as I did. If they talk, they’d have to admit they didn’t stop me. Have to admit they called me in, on purpose, hoping I’d harass him, when Allan was just as available and not involved with the victim.”

Tim inclines his head, looking away from Jimmy to the x-ray. He touches the breaks, tracing his fingers over them. Then he looks back to Jimmy, who’s sipping his coffee. “You okay?”

“I should ask you that.”

“Get some pain meds in me, and I’ll be okay. I got what I needed. God, Jimmy… It was…” That grin spreads over his face. “I think Abby taped it. I hope she did. I want you to see it. I want to see it, again!”

“I don’t know about Abby, but Draga taped it. It’ll go in the file.”

“Okay. You watch it at some point.” Tim’s smiling. “It’s beautiful, Jimmy. I told Gibbs…” Tim says that and starts to remember what he told Gibbs last night, and though he was loopy with pain meds, he remembers what he said, and the look on Gibbs face when he did it.

Jimmy sees Tim’s mind go wandering off mid-sentence, and he waits a moment, nothing else comes out of Tim so he says, “You told Gibbs…”

Tim shakes his head and gets back to the conversation. “I told him about it. I didn’t do it to him, Jimmy, I made him do it to himself!” There’s a wondering quality to his smile, like Tim can’t believe it ever happened. “He showed the whole world who he really is, and I got to drop him for it.” Tim doesn’t touch his eye, he stops his finger a few millimeters from puffy purple/black skin. “That moment was worth at least ten of these.”

Jimmy eyes Tim’s bruises. “Yeah, well, I’m glad it’s only one.”
Tim nods. “So… I’m good. I’m really good. Now, you?”

Jimmy shrugs. “I liked doing it. That was… really good in a very bad sort of way, you know?”

Tim doesn’t but he can imagine.

“In a I-can’t-ever-do-something-like-that-again sort of way. Like… Okay, you know how I told you I tried everything I could get my hands on in college?”

Tim nods.

“Cocaine, once. And that was enough. It felt…” There’s a dreamy/dismayed look on Jimmy’s face, and he’s sure that’s the kind of thing you just can’t explain to someone who’s never tried it. “Yeah. Anyway, I knew I could never, ever do that again, or it would own me. I’d spend the rest of my life chasing it. It was like that. Felt amazing, but it didn’t solve anything, it didn’t make anything better, but it felt really good for a bit, and I really liked showing you that x-ray.”

Tim brushes his hand against Jimmy’s. “I like seeing it. Probably in a I-shouldn’t-ever-get-a-present-like-that-again sort of way.”

“Yeah. That little, dark, bad, slimy thing in the back of your head sees it and cheers, and you know that you can’t feed that thing, or it’ll get out of the cage you keep it in.”

Tim’s not quite that far along on this, but he’s happy to support Jimmy with that. “Uh huh.”

Jimmy phone buzzes. It’s the text saying the meds are ready. Tim sees it and says, “Thank God.”

Jimmy gets up. “You stay put. I’ll be back with the meds in a minute.”

After several versions of, “Really, I’m okay, I need to do this,” Jimmy takes Tim to work.

They get a few curious looks as they walk in together, and that’s when it hits both of them that if there was ever going to be a day where Tim needed to go into work with Abby and not him, today is it.

Tim mutters a bit about it, and makes sure to look anyone who glances at him right in the eye. It’s a bit tricky to do with only one functional eye, but he pulls it off, and once they hit the elevator, together, because that’s what Tim and Jimmy always do, Tim says, “Looks like scuttlebutt’s been running rampant.”

“Didn’t expect it to get that far that fast. No shame, huh?”

“Back straight, look ‘em in the eyes, and dare them to bitch about it. This is what we do. What we’d do if it was just a sting, and we’re just buddies, because this is the sort of thing we do.”

Jimmy nods. They’re at his floor, so off he goes.

Tim’s got an hour before he needs to leave to get to the Commission meeting. That’s enough time to check in with Abby, then to his office to give his email list a quick run through.

Abby first.
He knows everything he needs to know about his “sting” from how Zelaz looks at him when he walks into the lab. There’s not quite open hostility in his look, but it’s not the warmish greeting he usually gets.

“She’s in ballistics,” Zelaz says, without asking how he is.

Tim nods, straightens his back a bit more, and heads into ballistics to see his wife.

She’s shooting when he goes in, so he waits in the doorway for her to stop. When she does, he says, playfully, “You keep that up, they’ll add that you’re aiming at Jimmy and I in your head to the rumors.”

Abby turns to him and rolls her eyes a bit. “Only because you’re too damn stubborn to stay home and rest, and he’s helping you get out of the house.”

“How bad is it?”

That gets another massive eye roll. “You remember how we got anonymous baby presents when people thought I was pregnant with Kelly but hadn’t mentioned it, yet?”

He nods.

“Yeah, three anonymous notes with the phone numbers of divorce lawyers on them in my inbox today.”

He winces at that. “Oh, God, Abby. I…”

She steps into him. “Hush.” She meets his lips with hers, and after a soft kiss pulls back and says, “Other than you getting hit, I wouldn’t have changed a moment of that.”

He shoots her a half-smile. “Still… I didn’t think that through, at all.”

“I didn’t, either. But, even knowing what you’d do, and what he’d do, and how it would spread like wildfire, I wouldn’t change it.”

“So, what did spread?”

“The nuances seem to have been stripped out of it, but you’re fucking Jimmy.” She shrugs. “The Admiral cold-cocked you when you told him about it. Then you kicked his ass for it. He got dragged back here, where he was processed faster than anyone’s ever been processed before. It doesn’t look like anyone noticed Jimmy coming in, but they have seen Sam snoozing down in Cybercrime, so they’re pretty sure you must have hurt him when you dropped him, and no one, at all, is buying that this was some sort of sting.”

“Great.” Tim’s voice is flat. He supposes it could be worse, they could have noticed Jimmy coming in, but that’s not much saving grace for the rumor mill.

“Everyone is suddenly remembering that vacation we took together, and a lot of them are speculating about Jimmy, Breena, and I not being here when DC shut down. A few of them actually have the right idea. Most of them have different versions of the wrong one. And more than half think Tony and Ziva might be part of our play group, too.”

“Sometimes reading lips isn’t all that hot, is it?”

Abby shrugs. “Better than them talking and not knowing about it. Breena sent me a text a while ago.
There’s a blurb in the local paper about a scuffle at the Tech In Anti-Terror Commission. No names, no details, just that it occurred and resulted in an arrest of a ‘high ranking Naval Officer.’"

“Well, that’s not wrong.” He holds her close, resting his chin on her shoulder. “Think Breena’s parents’ll find out?”

Abby shrugs. “That’s the only thing I’m worried about. I can take” she gestures to the outside world, “them nattering away. Not sure what’ll happen if Ed and Jeannie get wind of this.”

“I guess we’ll find out.”

Tim’s phone buzzes. He checks it. “Leon just found out I’m in the building. He wants to see me in my office.”

“Then off you go.” She kisses him again. Normally, if she was in the middle of a ballistics test, she wouldn’t stop to walk him out. Today, she secures the gun in question, and walks him out, holding his hand, and giving him a quick kiss as he leaves.

When she turns around, Zelaz looks at her and shakes his head. “You don’t have to pretend for me.”

“I’m not pretending anything.”

“Uh huh… Look. A guy may tell you it’s a one-time thing. He may say he’ll stay on the straight and narrow, but it’s bullshit. If he’s cheating, especially with another guy, your marriage is dead. Time to break it off and move on.”

Abby turns fully to Zelaz, “Roger,” she shakes her head, “when I want marriage advice, I’ll ask for it. In the meantime, that is my husband, whom I adore, who is back at work less than twenty-four hours after having his orbital bone broken for standing up for himself. You want to whisper and look at me with pity, fine, but there is absolutely nothing about that man I don’t know, nothing I don’t approve of, and when he dropped the Admiral, I cheered, and if you knew even a quarter of the story, you would have, too.”

Zelaz isn’t buying it, but Abby’s his boss, so he’s not arguing.

Sooo… how to start this… Allan thinks. Dr. Palmer is at work, looking, for all the world, like it’s just another Tuesday. He got in a bit late, apparently with Tim, who is wearing the black eye of all black eyes. But, other than a quick discussion about getting in late because they were getting Tim some lower grade pain meds so he could work, he hasn’t said anything to indicate that anything happened yesterday.

Right now, Dr. Palmer’s listening to the call from Dispatch, getting the details, as they’re getting ready to go take custody of a body, in Appomattox VA. That means a long drive is coming up.

“Who are we working with, this morning?” Allan asks.

“Agent Dornaget is on his first solo murder.”

“I like him.”

“He is a pleasant sort of fellow.” Then Jimmy looks over at Allan, realizing that ‘I like him’ may be more than just an expression of Dornaget’s a nice guy.

Allan shakes his head, if ever he’s got an opening… “Just meaning that he’s fun to talk to for a few minutes. We both like first person shooters and rpgs.”

“Ah.”

He and Dr. Palmer have talked gaming before, so he knows that Jimmy plays, but not to the level he does.

“He’s not my type, anyway.” Office romances may be discouraged, but that didn’t stop Allan from finding out who the pool of potential companionship was when he got here. There aren’t a lot of gay guys at NCIS, let alone single ones, and he and Ned did go out twice, which was often enough to see that they’re okay as casual work buddies, and not much more than that.

They head over to the van, and Jimmy slides into the driver’s seat. Allan knows his job; he punches the address into the GPS, and then quickly double checks their supplies.

“All set, Dr. Palmer.”

“Good.” He puts the key in the ignition, and off they go.

---

Once they’re on the road, Allan says, “So… ummm… I did the follow-up care on John McGee’s hand.”

Jimmy nods, not looking away from the road to Allan. He’s not specifically telling Allan to shut up, but Allan can certainly feel a deep unwillingness to talk about this.

So, almost a minute goes by before Allan says, “And… um… those x-rays looked a lot like… torsion breaks… Like… um… maybe someone grabbed his hand and wrist and kind of… twisted in opposite directions… And… Draga’s report… It doesn’t sound like Director McGee did that…”

Jimmy nods again, still not saying anything or looking away from the road.

Allan barrels on, feeling like he can’t just have this sitting in his head, untouched. “And… you know… there didn’t seem to be any reason why you didn’t finish the exam. Not… on paper, that is.”

Allan’s quite surprised to see Jimmy’s lips purse. He drives for a minute in total silence, pulls the van over in the nearest Starbucks lot, gets out, walks into the coffee shop, and gets them coffee. Each minute while Allan waits in the van, watching Jimmy, of all things, buying two cups of coffee, makes him feel a hell of a lot more nervous. Then he comes back, hands Allan a cup of his preferred drink, all without saying a word, takes a sip of his own drink, and then says to him, very carefully, his voice even and measured, “This is private, but not secret. Some people do know about this, our family, Leon, and that’s fine, but all of us would prefer this didn’t get spread wide around work. There’s more than enough gossip coming our way, and we’d prefer not to see more of it spread around. The official story, the story I’d appreciate you spreading about, is that this was part of a sting operation to catch Admiral McGee and other anti-gay figures. Tim was chosen as bait because he and his father have a difficult relationship, and Tim would be able to excellently push his buttons and get him to attack.”
As for the real story, Admiral McGee got about a tenth of what he was owed. You remember when Tim got hurt back in May?

Allan nods.

The Admiral ordered it. We couldn’t prove it, so nothing happened, but when a chance to bait him into trouble came, we jumped on it.”

Allan’s really surprised about that. Of all the possible reasons for this…

“So, this was revenge?”

“Justice, or at least, a taste of it.”

Allan blinks. “So… umm… The stuff Director McGee said about him and you…”

Jimmy mutters something about needing to read the damn report. Then says to Allan, “From what I understand he said, some of it is true and some of it isn’t. Tim, Abby, Breena, and I are together. Married. It’s all four of us together, and has been this entire time. It is not just Tim and I.”

“Oh. Uh…” Well, that answers that question. It certainly matches what he was seeing, and the bit that he read about two wives and a husband, but it wasn’t anything Allan expected. He knows it exists, sort of like how he knows mantis shrimp exist, he just didn’t ever expect to see one, didn’t think it was real. “That’s… Hmm…”

“Is that a problem?” Jimmy asks, eyebrow high, sipping his coffee, looking very calm, very placid, and very capable of killing Allan and losing his body between here and their crime scene.

“Uh…” It’s not that it’s a problem, it’s that Allan’s rapidly resorting everything he knows.

“I do not seek or require your approval for this, Dr. Allan, so if it is a problem, and you cannot work with me because of it, I will accept your resignation, and write your recommendation based on your work from yesterday and before, and nothing else. If it is a problem, but you can put it aside, and be professional, that’s fine, and I will be happy to continue working with you. If it’s a problem, and you cannot be professional, and you will not resign, I will have no trouble at all letting you go—“

“Whoa.” Sam’s hands go flying up in a stop gesture. “Just thinking. No, it’s not a problem. Just… so, you’re all what, bi? Didn’t know there were enough of you to form a decent twosome, let alone a foursome.”

Now it’s Jimmy’s turn to look confused. He wasn’t aware that bisexuals might be rare… Well, any rarer than any other variety of not straight person. “Uh…”

“Okay, look, I know this is over the line, but both? You like both? For real? I know women who really are bisexual, and I’ve heard of guys, like Allan Cummings, but all the ones I know in real life are ‘bisexual’ meaning they think girls like it, and that’ll get them laid, but when someone with an actual dick makes a pass at them they freak out, or they’re gay and just peeking out of the closet.”

Jimmy blinks. That’s a lot of information about the parts of the dating world he missed. But, somewhere in there, there’s a personal question, too, so he focuses on that. “Uh… Girls. I like girls.”

“You like Tim!” Allan’s nodding at him. “You love Tim. I’m not Sherlock Holmes, but I don’t have to be to see that.”
Jimmy takes another sip of his coffee and slowly blinks. “I do love Tim. And Abby. And Breena, and all of our kids.” He touches his second ring. “Our wedding ring. Yeah, I could see the questions you weren’t asking as I was very carefully answering the one you did. All four of us, together, until the end of our lives. That said, Tim’s just not terribly sexually interesting to me.”

Now Allan’s looking confused again. There’s helping a buddy out, and he’s heard about straight guys who’ll do that when they’re horny enough, and then there’s what Tim said was happening, which he’s never heard about any straight guy doing, ever, but… Okay, it’s not impossible. He’s never met a straight guy willing to do that, but… If he loves Tim, and Tim likes guys… “So, swinging?”

Jimmy shrugs. “That’s probably a word for it, but that conjures up images of bad ‘70s porn, sex clubs, and key parties, and that’s not us.”

“Tim said to his dad… that you and him… and…” Allan’s staring at the cars zipping down the road, feeling a blush starting. “He said he’s the bottom and the reason for the kilt was so you could bend him over and give it to him.”

Jimmy blinks, hard, licks his lips, puts his coffee down so he won’t spill it, and then burst out laughing. “Serves that fucker right! I bet that made his head explode.”

Allan looks really perplexed by that. “That doesn’t bug you?”

“Allan?”

“No… What Tim said…”

Jimmy shrugs. “The idea that I have sex with people I love doesn’t bug me. I try to do it as often as I can.” He adds a dry smile to that line. “You remember what Tim actually said?”

“Yes.” That blush starts to creep up Allan’s face. “And no, I can’t say it to you.” Allan’s shaking his head. He can’t think of any circumstance where he could make those words come out of his mouth. “It’s in the report.”

Jimmy laughs at that, too. “Yeah, he’s got a dirty mouth when he puts his mind to it. Besides my in-laws, and in their case it’s only because of how they’ll treat Breena, I don’t care who knows and what they think. Just, as a matter of fact, I’m not into guys. But, if thinking that makes us easier to classify or something… Fine. And if it makes John’s head explode, all the better. Hell, if I’d have been there, I would have felt Tim up just to see his eye twitch.”

Allan’s eyebrows shoot up at that, and then he laughs, too. “God. He’s…” He shakes his head. “First thing he said to me was, ‘You a fag, too?’”

Jimmy winces. “Oh, God, I’m sorry, Sam.”

“They won’t all be good guys.”

“Yeah, but that’s… He’s an Admiral for God’s sake! He’s supposed to be one of the good guys. I know his mom and daughter, and I love his son, and they’re all good guys.”

“But he’s not.”

“No, and he’s been fixated on Tim, and turning him into… Probably the guy he wanted to be, since he was a kid.”
“The guy Tim didn’t want to be. And let me guess, Tim liking boys didn’t go with his plan?”

Jimmy winces a little again. It feels… he’s not sure, weird to have this conversation with Allan. Like he’s protesting too much or something. But, he’s just now realizing that he’s managed to let Allan know that he’s not into guys, without specifying that for Tim, too. “Tim was… overstating the case, at least with the physical stuff. He’s straight… like me… sort of… his sister came up with the term heterosexual biromantic, and given how she explained it, it seems to work, but when it comes to sex, he’s into girls, too.”

Now Allan looks annoyed, and Jimmy feels even more off when he says, “Gay baiting.” Allan can see Jimmy’s just looking at him, not sure where he is or what’s going on. “Happens on TV shows all the time. You get these really intense, devoted, almost romantic relationships between guys, so gay watchers will root for them, but there’s never any payoff because they’re ’straight’.”

Jimmy shrugs. “Sorry. But… That’s who we are.”

“So, you two really don’t have sex with each other?”

“We fool around some, but, haven’t gotten past second base.” Jimmy figures that’s the most concrete way to put it without having to get into too many details. “The girls really like watching. But it doesn’t do all that much for us.”

Allan thinks about that for a moment. He’s got some of his own past experiences that match with that, so he doesn’t press any further. “And John McGee’s hand?”

Jimmy looks at him blandly and sips his coffee. Allan shivers a bit. That look is freaking terrifying. Finally Jimmy says, “It’s a bad idea to mess with Tim McGee. When Tim was hurt, John had him locked into a cell with four men, all of them younger and bigger than Tim, and all of them believing that Tim was responsible for an attack that had killed their loved ones.” Why Tim looked like he was run over by a truck is suddenly very concrete to Allan. “If John had paid attention to the reports on the four other men in that cell with Tim, he would have known attacking him is a bad plan.” Allan is sure that that is both absolutely true, but in no way answers his question about what happened to John’s hand. He’s also bright enough to know that’s the only answer he’s ever going to get on that subject.

They sit in the van for a moment, both sipping their drinks. Then Jimmy says, sounding a lot more like the laid back, somewhat goofy man he normally works with, “Sam, may I ask you a completely out of line, non-professional, way too personal, but not prurient question?”

Allan smiles at that, given the conversation they’ve been having, it seems in line. “Sure, Jimmy.”

Jimmy nods, and he looks like he’s feeling stupid asking, but he does it anyway because he doesn’t know anyone else well enough to ask this question. “Have you ever had sex with a woman?”

Allan chuckles a bit. Straight, my ass! “Yes. I had a girlfriend in high school, back before I had it figured out. I loved her very much, and she loved me, and… We’re actually still really good friends. Still love each other. She’s coming to visit in March. If we get a case, you may get to meet her.”

Jimmy smiles at that. “I hope to. Okay, now for the not-prurient, but way too damn far over the line, feel free not to answer, I’m trying not to be a creep, but—“

“It’s okay.”

“How’d it feel?”
Allan smiles at that, too, then he shrugs slightly. “It was nice. We dated until we went to college so we did it, not a lot, but often enough. It’s just… You know how guys talk about sex?” Jimmy nods; he knows. Been there, done that, and all the rest of it. “It wasn’t that. I’d had better times with myself, so that was a good hint something wasn’t quite right. And, I could take it or leave it. My girlfriend went away for a month one summer, and I missed her, but I didn’t miss the sex. But most of the guys around me were basically walking erections, joking about how we’d be in bed all week when she got back. So, that was different, too. But, it didn’t hurt. It wasn’t creepy. If I hadn’t been fifteen to eighteen, it probably would have taken a while to get started, but…” He gives Jimmy a look, and Jimmy nods, understanding, a breeze in the wrong place got him hard at fifteen, any sort of sexual stimulation would have done it, too. “It just wasn’t fireworks and the earth standing still and walking around like you’ve seen the sun for the first time. I liked the cuddling together watching the movie before-hand part better than the during bit. She did, too. We snuggled, a lot. We were quite affectionate, and we both felt like we were supposed to be having sex, so every now and again, we would. Actually, given all the affection, and the fact we were together for three years, it came as quite a shock to all four of our parents when we came out.”

Jimmy nods. “Okay, thanks. That’s… really familiar sounding. So… how’d you decide…”

“That I liked guys?”

“Yeah…”

Allan shrugs a bit. “Technically speaking, I’m somewhere on the asexual scale. I don’t feel sexual attraction until I really like someone on an emotional level. Which is why it took me so long to figure it out. I don’t remember ever feeling particularly attracted to anyone in middle or high school. All of my close friends were girls, then. I didn’t have pinups in my room. Pictures of pretty boys or tough guys or anyone really, never did anything for me. Anyway, I got to college, there was this guy in my dorm, and he rocked my world. We liked a lot of the same things, had a few classes together, and one night after a movie he kissed me, and then I understood the whole seen the sun for the first time thing.” Allan smiles at that.

Jimmy tries to imagine not feeling attracted to anyone for years at a time. He can’t. “Ah. So, what happened with you and your friend?”

“Sasha? We went to different colleges. I found Stephen. She met Maria, and then Stephanie, we’d kid each other about that, joking about double dates from Hell, and Hannah, and then Stephanie again, and Jennifer, and then Sally, and a bunch of others I’m forgetting. She had a really good time at Sarah Lawrence.”

Jimmy nods. “Sounds like it. So, you’re in this little town in the middle of Idaho dating a lesbian?”

“Sasha prefers queer. I do, too, for that matter. She’s gender fluid, usually more on the male end of things, but not so far over that she wants to drop she and her and move to he and him. She prefers girls. But she likes guys, too, especially pretty, little, femme ones.” Allan shrugs a bit at that. At 5’8” he is fairly short for a guy, and now he’s got ear length blond hair, but back in high school it came to his shoulders. Then, from the back, he could pass for a girl. And from the front, well, he’s never grown much of a beard, and he does have a rather pretty face. In heels and makeup, he really is the fucking Queen. One of his first hints that just possibly he wasn’t straight, was that he had no problem at all letting his girlfriend do his makeup. He even liked the results. And, one of her first hints that she might not have been entirely straight was that she really liked the results, too, and once she got him in her undies, she was even happier. “She really likes trans girls, too. That’s the icing on her cake. And she was the most butch girl I’d ever met, which was probably why I liked her as much as I did.”
“Okay.” Jimmy’s not sure what to do with that, but he is looking forward to meeting Sasha at some point.

“But when it comes down to it, she’s not a guy, nor does she want to be, and I’m not a girl, nor do I want to be, so we’re… how’d you put it? Not very sexually interesting to each other. But, unless we’ve got a boy/girlfriend with us, when we visit, we sleep together, the cuddling is still good, and if it’s been a long time for one or both of us, we’ll help each other out. We still know each other’s tricks, and laying back and having someone else do you is nice.”

“So, you’re gay, but you periodically have sex with a les—queer woman?”

“One of the reasons I prefer queer, too. It’s pretty rare now. Last time was after Ryan’s funeral.” Jimmy’s never heard Allan mention his murdered partner’s name before, and he hopes that’s a sign of him healing some. “It’s never been anyone other than her, and with us, now that we’re out of high school, it’s about affection and comfort, and sometimes, affection and comfort involves orgasms, but usually it doesn’t.”

Jimmy nods, that’s actually really reassuring.

Tim beats Vance to his office by about two minutes.

Once he gets in there, Vance just looks at him, carefully cataloguing his eye, while Tim looks back, waiting to see what Vance wants to talk about.

Finally, he offers Vance a seat, and Vance shuts the door, sits down, and keeps staring.

“Okay. You’ve got to tell me why you’re down here, because I’m not getting it by just having you stare at me.”

“How are you feeling?”

Tim shrugs. “I’m hurting. But, I’ve been a hell of a lot worse. I can still work.” He shakes his head. “I can attend meetings. I shouldn’t try to program like this.”

“Your eye gonna be okay?”

“Probably. I might have double vision issues, and maybe some sinus problems, but I should be okay.” At least, he thinks the Doctor said that as they were heading out, but he’s awfully fuzzy on that. Abby’ll know.

Vance nods.

“You down here to ask about my eye?”

“Not precisely.”

Tim looks at him in a Well, then? sort of way, or at least as well as he can with one eye swollen shut.

“I’ve read the full report, including the transcript of what you said to your dad before and after he hit you.”
Tim nods, waiting.

But Leon doesn’t say anything. He sits there, looking at Tim, trying to imagine him with Jimmy, but he’s having a hard time making the image form. Finally, he adds, “I was also sitting in Observation while Dr. Palmer and Agent DiNozzo dealt with your father.”

“Oh, okay,” Tim still waits, and then finally asks, “Is there a problem?”

Vance looks up at the ceiling, very uncomfortable with this. “Not really… Not to me, at all, and certainly not now. But… We’ve been over some of this, and I know what Jarvis offered you to shut you up after the Stennis. Beyond that though, I think you’ll be good at the job. I’m hoping that when I leave, you’ll take my seat. That’s part of why you’re going to Commissions, and as time goes on, I’ll send you to holiday parties, and meetings, and conferences. I’m getting ready to make you one of the faces of NCIS. When I retire, your name will be on the list of potential Directors of NCIS, with my personal recommendation. Because you’ve impressed Jarvis, your name will also have a personal recommendation from a former SecNav. Given you’re a big part of why she’s getting the job, you’ll likely have the recommendation of the next SecNav, too.

“Which means, in ten years’ time, assuming there still is an NCIS, your name will be on the top of the list for the next Director of NCIS. But you know that. Here’s the part you may not know. When your name goes on that list, the hiring committee looks through your life with a microscope. Anything that NCIS might find embarrassing gets you booted off that list. No one ever blabs about what they find, because that would look bad for NCIS, but… if there are details of your life you don’t want the hiring committee to know about…”

Tim nods, getting it. “So, you’re saying that if I might find having my personal life gone through with a fine tooth comb problematic, I could mention it to you, and then somehow my name would never make its way onto that list.”

“Yes.”

Tim nods again, understanding why they’re having this conversation, but not why they’re having it now instead of say, back in September. “Okay, here’s what I’m not getting. You knew all about my ‘personal life’ last week, too. Why bring this up now?”

Leon swallows, hard, looking a little chagrinned. “I did, but I didn’t. Whatever it is that’s between you and Dr. Palmer, I genuinely do not care. You’re good men, and you’re good at your jobs, and as long as that stays true,” that’s as close to an outright warning that things better not blow up between Cybercrime, Autopsy, and the Lab that Leon will get, “then I will never care what you get up to in your off time. However, I’m not the world at large. On the upside, the landscape of sexual politics has changed faster than I think anyone ever thought it would, but, this is the Navy, and there are still a lot of guys like your dad around. We’ll weed as many of them as we can out, but we won’t get them all.” Leon sighs again, very uncomfortable. “There’s another side of this. There’s not a straight man alive who hasn’t, at least once, been interested in more than one woman. As long as you stay discrete, that’s the sort of thing that doesn’t even make it into the file. The hiring committee will pass it around verbally, smirk a bit, probably tell a few rude jokes, pat you on the back a bit for having two girls, and that’ll be that. No one will mention it beyond that. A lot of the higher ranks, especially the ones who are away from home a lot, have a wife and mistress. And many of the single ones have several girlfriends in different cities at any given time. That won’t torpedo a career. A wife, mistress, and boyfriend—“

“Husband. Wife, wife, and husband. We’d make it legal if we could.”

“Husband then, that may be sticky. If you’re straight, you’re allowed to play around. If you’re anything other than straight, you better be the poster child for long-term, monogamous bliss. And who knows, in ten years, whatever it is you do may be entirely beside the point. But it might not just be about sex. As Director you’d be Dr. Palmer’s Boss. No matter what the sexual politics of the time are, being especially close a Department Head you are not legally married to may be an issue. And it’ll likely be even more of an issue if you happen to be legally married to a different Department Head.”

Tim nods at that, as well. Hard to avoid the appearance of favoritism when two of your employees are also literally two of your favorite people.

“And, if you are especially close to some people, and you’d rather not have the rest of the world know about that, it opens you to blackmail, which is one of the reasons potential NCIS Directors have their lives gone through with a fine tooth comb.”

“Never gonna happen.”

“McGee?”

“You’re being very delicate in this, and I appreciate that. But here’s the thing, and this is part of what happened with the Admiral, I’m done with bullies. And that’s all blackmail is, just another version of what I’ve spent the last five years ridding myself of. Jimmy, Breena, Abby, and I are a foursome, quadruple, whatever you want to call it. It works all four ways, which apparently we weren’t clear enough about before, and really that’s probably more detail than you want or need, and if that gets me booted out of the running for head of NCIS, I don’t care. What we have is worth more than the job at the top of the pyramid. But none of us will ever consent to blackmail. We’re discrete about our affairs because it’s easier and life runs more smoothly. I want the Minions working, not gossiping about how the four of us work.” Tim looks out at his team, right now, only one of them is craning his neck trying to see what he and Leon are talking about, but he quickly ducks back to his work when he catches Tim’s eye. “Granted, that may be more than I can hope for, today. However, if that’s ever not true, if the cost of discretion rises too high, then we’ll fully out ourselves and take the consequences. Easy enough to do. Especially given how yesterday went, and honestly, given some of the crap they’re laying on Abby right now, it might be easier to be out as a foursome. With any luck, she’ll stop getting the phone numbers of divorce lawyers in her inbox soon.”

Leon winces, shaking his head. “Sorry to hear that.”

Tim shrugs. “I didn’t have to spill that much information to get him to hit me. This one’s on me.”

Leon sighs. “Sometimes doing the right thing will smack you, hard. You and Dr. Palmer taking any crap?”

“So far, just dirty looks. But, I’ve only been here long enough to say hello to Abby and talk to you, and then I’m out to the Commission, where I can deal with more looks.”

Leon inclines his head.

Tim shrugs. “Yeah. So, here’s a question for you, given the nature of the politics of NCIS and the Navy, and the fact that rumors never, ever die, in ten years, assuming I want to keep my job, and Abby wants to keep hers, and Jimmy wants to keep his, are we better off with me as Director, and thus shielding us, or are we better off just quietly doing our jobs, letting whoever is your second best pick run things?”

Leon smiles at that. It’s a much more astute question than he had expected Tim to ask. “I don’t know. But, how about, in, say 2024, you and I have another chat about this, we’ll see who those potential second picks are, as well as have a better idea of how the sexual discrimination laws will work. For all we know, your situation may be protected by then, in which case the only thing that will matter is if you think you’d like to be Director of NCIS…” It’s not exactly a question, but it’s not a statement, either.

Tim shrugs again. “I don’t know. Right now, I’d rather stay in the basement and run computers. I love what I do, but… I want time with my family. I want little league games and gymnastics and home for dinner. I want to see my family every single day. I don’t ever want another month like October, and frankly, with the amount of travel you do, that looks like a lot of mini-Octobers.”

Leon nods. He had to cut back some after Jackie died, but he probably doesn’t get home a hundred nights a year.

“In ten years, my babies’ll be eleven and almost ten and maybe there’ll be one more of them, and Jimmy’s babies’ll be almost thirteen and eleven and maybe one or two more for him, too, and I don’t want to miss it. If it’s what I need to do to keep my family safely employed, then it’s what I’ll do. If I can pass on it, I’ll probably pass. Either way, I will take you up on that conversation.”

“A good plan.”

Since they’re talking about it… “If you could go back, would you do it again?”

Leon shakes his head. “No. I love Lara, but… No. This job cost me Jackie, cost my kids their mom, and… if I could go back to the day I got the call about Shepard… I’d turn it down.” He sees the way Tim’s looking at him. “But that’s not what you’re asking.”

Tim’s feeling pretty stupid about asking that question. Of course he didn’t want Jackie killed. Of course he’d take the route that would have protected her. “If I’d been thinking, I wouldn’t have asked. I meant about the home/work/life balance.”

Leon nods. “I think I’ve made the world a better place for my children to grow up in. I made it better for everyone else’s children, too. That matters. And I did it in a way I couldn’t have if I’d stayed a cryptologist. There’s a lot of power that goes with this job, a lot a potential to do good.” Leon looks at Tim’s computers. “Of course, you’re doing a lot of good down here. A lot more than I think anyone expected anyone in your shoes could do.”

“That’s just running with the ball after I caught it.”

Leon nods at that, too, acknowledging that part of what Tim’s done with this is a matter of being the right guy in the right place at the right time. “It’s possible, that down here, especially since your current scope of practice is much wider than anyone would have originally considered, you’re doing as much, if not more than you could in my seat. My job includes a lot more politics than yours does, and some days, a lot of them, that feels as useful as herding cats. But, some days, it’s not, and those politics don’t just shape NCIS, but all of the agencies we rub up against.”

Tim’s turn to nod.

“Doesn’t mean I don’t wish I’d been there for more basketball games and ballet recitals. My kids don’t hold it against me. They don’t feel like I ignored them. And, unlike a lot of other kids, they’ve had some amazing experiences that wouldn’t have been open to them if I’d stayed with the code breakers, or stayed with the Navy. All of the conferences and travel during the summer, they’ve come along for.”

Tim thinks about that, nods to himself, and says, “I’ll keep thinking, and, assuming you think me with my dashing black eye to go with the kilt cuts an acceptable figure, I’ll also continue to schmooze my way around, so if I do end up in your chair, I can do a decent job of it.”

“Good. In the meantime, we have a press conference tomorrow morning. I’ll be doing my ‘We’re cleaning up the way the Navy does business routine,’ and you get the stand there, nod, and explain how important it is that everyone, no matter what, feels safe in the Navy. If you feel like mentioning that we’ve got this huge computer system that could be looking for serial gay, race, or gender bashers…”

Tim nods at that. “We don’t have that yet, but I’ve certainly got the data and people to make something like that.”

“Good. You sit there, talk about that. They will ask why your father, and… any answer you like, that doesn’t touch on the Stennis, is fine by me.”

“Wonderful,” by which Tim means he’d rather curl into a ball and hide under his desk.

“That’s part of filling the big chair, too.”

“I guess.”

“We’ll be talking to the Post, AP, and the Times, and I’ve also got Out Magazine coming. I don’t want you getting caught flat-footed; I’m sure at least one of them will ask about your sexuality. I don’t care how you answer that, either, other than making sure we’re both parroting the party line, that this was the first arrest in an anti-hate crime sting.”

“I’ll parrot along with the best of them.”

Leon smiles at that, nods, and heads out of Tim’s office.

It looks like a pretty straightforward murder. There’s a guy, Petty Officer Jason Draq, in a room, with a knife sticking out of his chest.

Jimmy can feel nervous energy pouring off of Dornaget. He’s very carefully going over everything, pleased as all get out to have his own team, doing their first murder.

“Would you say that’s the cause of death, Jimmy?”

“Not without a further examination, Ned, but I’m sure it didn’t help.”

Dornaget looks Jimmy over, making eye contact a second longer than is comfortable, and smiles at him, laughing a little too hard at Jimmy’s joke.

“I’ll bet. Do you need any help?”

“Dr. Allan and I have this. Just make sure there’s a clear path between us and the van.”

Dornie heads off, making sure that every scrap of anything that might be considered evidence gets cleared out of the way, as Allan’s unloading the gurney.
Once he joins Jimmy, who’s getting the liver temp, Jimmy says, “Well, Dr. Allan, how do we proceed?”

“Get our own photos. Then… I’m thinking we take the knife out before we try to move him.”

“Good. What’s missing?”

Allan looks around, scanning the room, and then sees it. “About, what, two liters of blood?”

Jimmy nods. There’s a small pool, maybe a cup’s worth, of blood on the victim’s chest and floor. “What’s that tell us?”

“Possibly several things. It’s likely that stab is the only stab. Either one shot took out the man’s heart, or he bled out internally, or both.”

Dornaget is back, watching them talk. “The neighbors didn’t hear anything. One stab and done would go with that.”

“What else, Dr. Allan?”

“Mmm…” Allan keeps looking and thinking. “Stab’s not post mortem, too much blood for that, and the wrong position, but it could be very close to time of death. If something was already killing him, and this just finished the job faster…”

“Good thinking.” Jimmy nods, then shifts attention to the temperature that’s coming up on his thermometer. “26.4. Dr. Allan?”

“Time of death is, likely, five to six hours ago.” He gently nudges the body’s wrist, and the whole body moves. “Full rigor. Might as well leave the knife in, then.”

Jimmy nods. Getting a knife out of a body in full rigor is just as likely to slice up the tissue more than leaving it in place. “Let’s get him moved, Dr. Allan. Ned, we’ll be back to the Morgue a few hours, and I’ll start the prelim when we get back. Autopsy’ll be tomorrow morning, after he’s out of rigor.”

“Then I’ll see you tomorrow morning,” Ned says with another big smile. “What kind of coffee do you like?”

Jimmy smiles back at him, feeling a bit confused. “Plain coffee, no sugar, two creams. But, you don’t need to bring me coffee, doing autopsies is my job.” Ned’s a friendly guy and all, but this is a lot of smiling, and no one ever brings him coffee for doing his job.

“No problem. Just want you bright eyed and bushy tailed.”

It’s not until, as he’s helping Allan push the gurney back into the van, and he feels eyes on him, that Jimmy puts together what might be happening.

Once he’s in the van, with Allan at the wheel, he asks for confirmation. “Sam, was Ned flirting with me?”

Sam laughs. “Yeah. And watching your butt every moment your eyes were turned.”

“Uh…”

“I’ll let him know that you are extremely married.”

“Thank you.”
To the best of his knowledge, Tim has never walked into a crowded room and ended up with every eye on him.

So, stepping into the main conference room for the Tech In Anti-Terror Commission, whereupon every voice went silent and they all stared, is a new and unsettling experience.

No shame. He smiles brightly at people, as well as he can with a very swollen black eye, finds his seat, next to Ms. Fielding, who looks at him for a sec and says, “God, that’s got to hurt.”

“It really does!”

“You okay?”

“Broken orbital. I’ll live.”

“So… that your classified and messy case?”

“Yeah. The Admiral… He’s the kind of guy who’s smart enough not to get caught, and twisted enough to make real trouble. They were able to shuffle him out with early retirement before, but the guys who got rid of him, they’re mostly gone from the Navy, now. My boss and I… we know who he is and what he’s capable of, and that he had to go.”

“And now he’s gone.”

“Yeah. Should be in processing at Leavenworth by now.”

She looks away from him, seeing everyone still staring at them. She looks back to him, and then taps her wheelchair. “You get used to it, you know? Everyone staring at you, half of them curious, the other half pitying. Every day for the first six months after I got back to work, they stared. But, if you keep showing up and doing the job, they get used to you, and you blend back in again.”

He smiles a little at that. “Good. I’d rather not be the center of attention. Though, press conference tomorrow, so at least for a few more days.”

She chuckles a little. “I read up on you once I got home last night. You broke the code to find out what happened, where the money was going, right?”

He nods.

“And this is what you’re going to end up famous for?”

He rolls his eyes. “I’d rather it was the other way around.”

“I can imagine. Is your wife, okay?” Delilah certainly heard what Tim said to The Admiral, but she also got to see him being in love with his wife. She, for one, and possibly the only one, is willing to believe this was a sting.

“She is. She knew, as soon as we saw his name on the roster, that something like that was going to happen. You plan a trap, you need to use the right bait, and that was the right bait.”

“I’ll say.” They see the main speaker for the morning head up to the podium. “Come lunch time, let me tell you about trolling the internet for terrorists. Had a lot of fun being bait for that. Time to get into this.”

Tim nods.

---

By four o’clock, Tim is done. All he wants to do is grab an Uber, get back to the Navy Yard, curl up in his office with about nine Percocet, and wait for Abby or Jimmy to get done with their day and take him home.

He was right about what he needed to do today, sit on his butt and listen.

He was wrong about how hard that would be.

Tylenol 3 might not be Percocet, but it does make him sleepy, and today’s meetings… God, they’re boring. Yes, he should be paying attention. Yes, he needs to be aware of what these guys are looking to do. But, by half an hour into it, his eyelids were drooping, and he spent the rest of the day fighting hard to stay awake.

Okay, not the whole day, most of it. There was a lunch break, that involved moving around and talking to people, so that woke him up some, but once he’d eaten his salad and drank his coffee, with caffeine, just to try and help keep him up, he felt sleep clawing at him again.

The only upside is that he doesn’t think he missed all that much. The first set of guys talking were going over why it’d be a really spiffy idea to consolidate all anti-terrorism forces into one unit, and that they should be the unit that specializes in the tech side of it.

As he was trying, desperately, not to drift off, he found himself thinking that the idiot on the podium had never, ever set a foot into the field.

He’s got exactly one note from the first day. “Jamison Kalb is full of shit.”

Delilah, who is taking real notes, looks over, sees it, and laughs.

Tim jerks a little at the sound of her mirth, and she says, very quietly, “Well, you aren’t wrong.”

He chuckles, and then says, “If I snore, poke me, okay.”

She nods and pats his arm.

---

Trying to get out of there takes more effort than getting in. People want to talk to him. He grits his teeth, slaps a smile on his face, and works the crowd.

It gets easier after the first two or three. No one directly asks him about the night before. They hint at it, and offer some open silences to allow him to comment should he see fit to. He does, somewhat, talking about how, since the fall of the government, that NCIS has doubled down on not allowing the well-connected to get away with anything.
That his organization is done with looking the other way.

He’s with it enough to see that that makes a few of the other Navy folks look nervous. He tries to memorize those names, let Leon know that his ‘sting’ needs to go wider.

He’s finished with the last of the ‘interested’ attendees, and is walking through the lobby, looking for the Uber he’s called, when another man walks up to him. Tim’s fairly sure they don’t know each other, but his stride is direct, smile warm, and he looks like he knows Tim. He eyes Tim’s bruises, before offering his hand. Tim takes it, just wanting to get out of there, but he smiles, too.

“Matthew David.”

“Hi. I guess you know who I am?”

“Kind of hard not to, not after last night.” That’s the first direct comment about the night before, besides Delilah’s, that he’s gotten.

Tim smiles again. “All part of the job.”

Matthew gives him a knowing look. “Of course it is.” He hands Tim his card. Apparently, he’s with the Airforce’s satellite crew. “I’ve been where you are. And… It’s hard and it’s confusing and… Worse when you’re married with a kid. You ever want to talk to someone, give me a call.”

Tim’s not sure what to do with that. So he tucks the card into his pocket and says, “Thanks.”

Matthew puts his hand on Tim’s shoulder and leans into him, not too far, but very much in his personal space. Tim steps back a bit. As Matthew smiles again and steps a bit closer. “No problem. Really, give me a call.”

Tim’s one eye goes wide and the other cracks open a slit as he backs up again. “Uh…”

This would be the point where Matthew realizes that this is the least successful pick up attempt he’s ever tried, and he backs off. “Oh. Uh… Shit. Sorry.” He stares at Tim for a long minute, eyes curious, looking him over again. “Wait. Was that really a sting?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. It really was.”

“You’re one hell of an actor, then. Shit, sorry man. Uh…”

Tim holds up his hands. “You go undercover, you do what you need to to sell the role. Glad it looked good enough to fool people watching.”

“Yeah, I’ll say.” Now Matthew looks annoyed. “So, what, no real gay guys to go after him? You guys all straight over at NCIS?”

“No. There just isn’t a gay guy at NCIS that he’s so pissed off at he’d take a swing at one of them. He’s been very carefully not getting caught for forty years, it was time to end that, so… I was up.”

“Oh.”

“Anyway, thanks for the offer, but… I’m good. The only hard part about this is making sure my in-laws don’t flip out.”

Matthew nods again, and leaves, shaking his head.

Tim does likewise.
It’s getting onto normal closing time when Jimmy texts Abby You want to get them all talking more?

_Sure_ comes back to him a moment later.

_Then let’s, together, get our boy and take him home._

A big smiley face shows up on Jimmy’s phone.

He heads down to the Lab first, where Benedict, who from the way he’s watching Jimmy, has also heard the story, and not a flattering version of it, stares at both of them as Jimmy heads in, kisses her cheek, and says, “So, ready to wrap up today?”

“How about done.” Abby waddles into her office to hang up her lab coat, as Benedict flat out glares at Jimmy, and Jimmy can tell he’s about to say something to him, but Abby’s too quick, she’s back in the lab before he gets the first word out of his mouth. “See you tomorrow, Tom.”

“’Night, Abby.” He doesn’t speak to Jimmy.

When they’re in the elevator, Jimmy says, “Well, that went over great.”

“Zelaz told me my marriage was dead.”

Jimmy shakes his head, and then kisses Abby, soft and gentle. “Sorry about how deep in the shit you are.”

She shrugs. “How about you? Anyone being weird?”

“Dornie’s flirting with me.”

Abby laughs at that. “Yeah.”

“God, Allan did the exact same thing!”

“Well… You’re cute, and presumably a top, and apparently not averse to fucking around on your wife. But you’re also married, so you likely don’t want anything long term. You just got a hell of a lot more popular in certain circles.”

Jimmy sighs. “I don’t want to be more popular with gay guys looking for a quick hook up.”

She pats his cheek. “It’s good for the soul. See what it’s like to get hit on a lot. Lets you walk a few miles in the shoes of the average pretty girl for a while.”

Jimmy shakes his head a bit, and then looks up at her, eyes twinkling, and says, “As you well know, I’m fine with walking in a pretty girl’s shoes.”

“God,” she gives him a playful shove while laughing, and that’s what the doors open up on as they get to Cybercrime.

There are only four Minions on the floor right now, and two of them are watching them, closely. The others appear to be working. Abby wraps her arm around Jimmy’s waist, and they head out of elevator to grab Tim.
He’s sitting in his office, slouched back, head against his chair, ice pack on his eye, looking wrecked. Abby takes one look at him, letting go of Jimmy, and shakes her head. “Oh, yeah, this was a brilliant plan. You look fine.”

He sits up slowly, and pulls her close for a quick kiss. “Hello to you, too.”

“Hi.”

He looks over to Jimmy. “You got a comment, too?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Nope. But I’ve got a bottle of Percocet with your name on it waiting at home, a set of keys, and the ability to get you to said bottle of pills.”

The door to Tim’s office is shut, so he’s got no problem saying, “I love you,” as he slowly gets up with the help of Abby and Jimmy.

Four sets of eyes follow the three of them out of Cybercrime. More of them track them out of the building. Jimmy walks Tim and Abby to their car, and lets go of Tim once they get there. He quietly says, “I’ll pick up dinner. You pick up Kelly, then quiet night at my place.”

They nod. That sounds good.

The application of painkillers, and food, and being out of the wondering gaze of everyone around them, does perk Tim up quite a bit.

Listening to the blow by blow, along with what he said, report of Jimmy’s run in with the Admiral has everyone in a good mood.

Listening to what happened at the Commission, at the crime scene, and the lab droops that mood a bit.

“How about on your end?” Abby asks Breena.

“Nothing so far, though I’ll admit to being a bit nervous when my dad was reading his blogs.”

Tim shifts the icepack off of his eye, and Kelly picks it up, starting to gnaw on it. He looks at her first, “You got a new tooth coming in, or are you just so used to the idea of chewing on cold things, that that’s just what you do?”

She flashes him a drool-y smile and says, “Yes.”

He kisses the top of her head.

“It’s going to hit the news, with my name on it, soon. Don’t know how much detail will go into it, but tomorrow morning, Leon’s got me sitting in on a press conference.”
Breena exhales slowly. “Great.”

“Official story, this is a sting, and that’s the line we’ll both be singing.”

“Is that going to fly?” Breena asks.

Tim shrugs. “I’ll sell it the best I can. I’ve got to spend some time between now and then working on some BS about using our databases to determine who might be violating anti-discrimination regs.”

“Probably a good plan to get an answer for why you went after a retired Admiral,” Breena adds.

“That one I’ve got the answer to. He was given the ‘early retirement’ option before, I’m sure Jarvis will back that, and unfortunately, after the recent upheaval, most of the people who know why he was given ‘early retirement’ weren’t on board anymore, and anyone not involved in the vote buying scandal was getting grabbed back up to fill in the command holes.”

“And you and Leon knew what was up and made sure he didn’t get grabbed back up,” Abby says.

“That’s the plan.” Tim looks to Breena. “I don’t know how close of a quote they’ll have of what I said to him when I dropped him. Hopefully, not all that close. But… at least some version of it’s floating around, because everyone who knows the story going around NCIS knows Jimmy’s my guy.”

“They wouldn’t need any information besides the idea that you have a guy,” Breena says. “Not like they’ll go leaping to the conclusion that you’re hooking up with Tony.”

“Good point. Anyway, will the idea that I BSed that… will that fly with your parents?”

She shrugs. “I’m sure my dad would believe anything about Jimmy.” She flashes him a sad smile. “I’m not sure, especially since they’ve seen you with Abby, that they’d buy that about you. Who all is coming to this thing?”

“Leon told me, but the only one I remember in any detail is the Post.”

“Eh… Dad think’s they’re a rag since Bezoz bought them.”

“So… maybe he won’t get it?” Abby says.

“We can hope,” Breena replies.

Jimmy takes a bite of his fish. “I was thinking about that some. Not… not that specifically, but… playing defense. Your parents still own, what, 48% of Palmer and Slaters’?”

“42%. Amy’s starting to buy some of their shares, too.”

Jimmy thinks about that for a moment, and decides that can go on the back burner. “So, that’s a million in stock, right?”

“1.2, yeah. Why?”

“The faster we buy them out, the safer we are, right? If they find out, and don’t react well, they can make things unpleasant if they own that much of the company. If you own more of it…”

“You’re kind of right. Because of the fact that this is a closely held LLC, they’re able to add a poison pill to the sale of shares. I own 51% of this one branch. That branch belongs to the larger Slaters’ company. If the majority of shareholders in the larger company decide they don’t want one of us in the business anymore, they can force us to sell. It’ll be at full market value, and coming up with that much cash fast could be an issue, but even if I own my full branch, I’ll still be a minority shareholder in the larger company.

“We’d need… 8.7 million in shares before I’m the majority shareholder in the full company, and I know we don’t have that sort of money.”

She’s right. They don’t. Shifting around the kind of money necessary to buy out her folks, that they could probably do in a year or two, especially, as Abby’s thinking it through, if they were willing to use the money that’s earmarked for college.

“Fourteen years,” Tim says before Abby’s done thinking about it. “Find a new agent, turn out another Tibbs novel a year, between that and our jobs… We can get there, but not fast.”

“And that would require my Uncles to sell to me. They won’t. They’re selling to their own kids. What’s coming will come. The big thing is making sure we keep the girls safe. And I’m thinking plausible deniability, which is what Leon’s giving us, will do that.”

Later that night, after the pain meds really kick in, and they watch the video of Tim taking down the Admiral, as well as see the x-ray, Tim’s in an awfully good mood.

Lounging on the sofa between the girls, Jimmy’s thinking he’s never seen Tim in a better mood, and he’s seen Tim in some awfully damn good moods. But, between the painkillers and taking out his dad, he’s a big, bubbly pile of happy right now.

And he probably will crash soon, because he’s sleepy in addition to in a really good mood. Jimmy and the girls might play some, later, but right now, Tim’s drowsy, and snuggly, and really happy, and cuddly. Jimmy watches how Tim’s snuggling the girls. Maybe not that drowsy. His hands are wandering about, happily copping feels, right and left.

He’s acting a lot like a big, affectionate, sleepy, horny puppy.

Jimmy’s watching him touch the girls, and the way they’re playing with him, enjoying that a whole hell of a lot.

He’s on Breena’s far side, kissing the back of her neck, as Tim’s necking with Abby, one hand in her lap, the other on Breena’s breast. Tim switches which girl he’s necking with. Abby’s got her legs over Tim and Breena’s laps, she’s on Tim’s left, nibbling his ear, staying well away from his eye, with one hand on his chest, and the other in his hair. Breena’s on his right, kissing him, wet and deep, stroking his chest and Abby’s hand.

Jimmy’s next to Breena, half turned in toward her, his lips on her neck, and his hand on Abby’s ankle. He pulls back a little, watching, stroking Breena’s back and Abby’s leg. He likes this, a whole lot.

They’re just making out. All dressed, all on the sofa, warm skin and soft smooching sounds, and he still really like it.

He finds himself wondering why watching this is hot, but playing with Tim isn’t. Why is watching this man making love with the girls fun, but touching him directly less so? After everything that’s happened today, and what’s likely to happen tomorrow, he’s wondering if there’s just some sort of mental thing going on that means this isn’t just piles and piles of sky high erotic goodness between the two of them.

It’s just skin and endorphins. Breena’s hand on his thigh as her eyes trace down his body turns him on, Tim’s should, too, right?

He was biting the guy’s chest last week, sucking his nipples, and licking them. One third of the team making him come so hard he practically levitated off the bed. If he’d done something like that to Abby or Breena, he would have gotten off on it, possibly literally, but definitely metaphorically. Doing it to Tim felt emotionally good, but not particularly erotic. If he could figure out how get off on that physically in addition to the mental satisfaction of making his love feel so good…

So, if he could just break through whatever’s blocking this…

He pulls Breena onto his lap, and scoots next to Tim, gently turns his face to him, and (again, gently! He’s staying well away from Tim’s eye) very thoroughly kisses Tim. And just like the other times they’ve kissed, it’s nice. It feels good. He’s had significantly worse kisses from women. But it’s not kissing the girls. His body likes the sensation of lips on lips, and Tim knows what he’s doing with his tongue (in fact, drugged out of his head, with enough pain meds coursing through him that he’s not hurting, Tim’s an extremely enthusiastic kisser and this is the best kiss he’s ever gotten off of him) but nice is all it is.

The girls are having a great time watching this. He can hear them appreciating the scene. Breena’s rocking in his lap in an exceptionally pleasant sort of way. And, yeah, he’s getting so laid tonight, and if they can keep Tim conscious for another ten minutes or so, he is, too.

But… Yep. Dick’s not getting hard. It’s just laying there in his shorts. (Though given what Breena’s doing and the sounds the girls are making, it’s not going to stay that way long. It’s a very big fan of moaning women, and an even bigger fan of a woman rocking back and forth in his lap running her fingers though his hair.) He’s not looking or groping, but he’s fairly sure Tim’s not getting hard from this, either.

All in. Try. See how it feels. He kisses deeper, tongue stroking against Tim’s, and lets his hand wander down Tim’s body, stroking over his chest and hips, sliding up the inside of his leg, and… actually, Tim is pretty hard. He’s also had both girls playing with him before Jimmy got into it. But, maybe he’s liking what Jimmy’s doing, too.

Maybe… Shut down the part of his mind that’s all about what he’s supposed to be, and just the physical enjoyment takes over…

Jimmy knows, if he’s groping the girls, and he feels damp panties, that gets to him, hard. If he’s not already sporting wood, feeling wet undies’ll do it for him.

He figures that’s the girl equivalent of a hard dick through trousers.

And again, like with the kissing, hard Tim in his hand isn’t doing it for him. Both girls sounding like they’re about to get off from watching this, that’s getting to him. That’s doing some awfully good things for him. And, yeah, his thigh is a bit damp from where Breena’s grinding on him. She’s really enjoying watching this, and he likes that a whole lot, and the way that her hand is rubbing under his shirt, pulling gently on his nipples is just upping the ante.

If anything, though, Tim’s dick in his hand feels a little awkward. Like, he knows how a dick in his hand is supposed to feel, and this isn’t that. It’s not quite the right shape, and it’s in the wrong place.
He’s pretty damn sure he shouldn’t have to reach across himself to end up with a dick in his hand. It should be right there, in front of him, not over to the left.

But, Tim’s kissing him like his lips are every favorite meal Tim’s ever had, and he’s starting to rock into Jimmy’s hand, and that’s making Jimmy think that possibly this is a situation where the big head is way too much in charge, and letting the little head take over would shift issues and produce some excellent results.

And he certainly knows how to make the big head fuck off… It’s been twenty years since he’s had sex any sort of stoned, but it’s not like that’d be difficult to arrange. Maybe this weekend… See if Tim’s up for some experimenting.

He can’t see what Abby’s doing. His eyes are closed, and he’s kissing Tim, so even if they were open, he’d be looking at Tim’s face, but he hears the zipper, and feels her hand brush his, and he knows she’s about to slip his hand into Tim’s shorts, but Jimmy’s thinking, former permissions or no, that this isn’t a step he’s taking with Tim drugged out of his skull.

He pulls back a little, keeping his arm around Tim’s neck, and strokes his fingers through his hair, looking at him. Tim’s giving him something of a goofy smile, his one, visible eye not focusing or tracking well. Tim’s definitely turned on. He’s got sex oozing from his pores right now, and probably about a gallon of pheromones, too.

“I love you.” Jimmy knows that’s not the first time he’s said it to Tim, really said it, but he knows saying it feels good. Whatever else may be going on, that’s true.

The girls aren’t making any noise at all, but he can feel the happy pouring off of them.

Tim kisses the tip of his nose and flashes him a sloppy grin.

Jimmy kisses him (on the lips) again, and then gives him a quick hug, and moves back. “All yours, ladies.”

He watches the girls with Tim, once they get him upstairs and naked, and all three of them are having a very good time. He’s having a very good time watching, too. Kissing Tim doesn’t hit his erotic buttons, but this, all three of them petting, naked, and moaning, this hits him like a truck moving at full speed.

But Tim, on his own… nope.

He thinks of what Sam said, about it being about love and affection.

Maybe… That closeness, he wants that. He loves that. Afterglow with Tim is really good. And unlike the sex side of it, that’s something he actively craves with Tim.

It’s sensual, but not sexual, that’s probably the best way to describe it. It’s funny, because he’d thought he really got the difference before, but even when he was trying to keep them separate, they were always tangled together. He can’t give Breena a sensual massage without the SEX part of his brain being aware of the options. He can give a good sensual massage, without stepping over the line, without even giving a hint of wanting to step over the line, but he knows what’s on the other side of the line, and if there’s a woman involved, he wants what’s on the other side of the line.
With Tim, he knows what’s on the other side of the line, and it’s okay, but he doesn’t crave it. Big yummy pile of tofu. Great if you’re a vegetarian, like Breena or Sam, or an omnivore, like Abby, but it’s nothing he’s dreaming of. He doesn’t have to remind himself to stay on the sensual side of the line with Tim.

Abby’s riding Tim, slow, shallow, and gentle. It’s her third round with Tim tonight. Jimmy’s assumption that he’d conk out soon appears to be dead wrong. He’s going and going and going. Slow and steady and blissed out, but from the looks of it, not stopping anytime soon.

Breena’s kissing him as Jimmy fingers her. Tim’s making very pleased noises as the girls play with him. He’s pink all over, and gasping, moaning, babbling.

Jimmy’s lying on his side, watching the three of them, holding Tim’s hand and stroking Breena, getting her off again, making her moan.

Tim’s still going, and Jimmy’s coming to the conclusion that he’s on a boat load of Percocet, because he’s not usually this slow. Usually, if he goes this long, he’s showing signs of actively trying to not get off, and he’s not doing that tonight.

Jimmy lets go of Tim’s hand and kneels behind Breena, slipping into her, and she shudders a bit at the glide, straightening up and turning to kiss him.

Jimmy groans into her mouth, reveling on the feel of her lips on his and her body around him, and how much he loves this wet, slick slide. Unlike Tim, Jimmy’s not going to take an hour to get off. He’s been watching and playing too long to last for hours, and right now, he’s sure Breena isn’t looking for a marathon, either.

He plays off of what Tim was doing, providing a counter point to the long, slow screw he was providing, going fast and focused, snapping his hips against her as his fingers press firm on her clit, and she groans at that, kissing harder, sucking his tongue.

He pulls Breena back into his lap, a deeper position, and both of them can watch Tim and Abby, and be watched by them.

Abby’s watching them, grinning, and scoots over a bit to kiss Breena’s breast. Jimmy watches that, loving it, too.

So good, so good all over, beautiful women all wrapped around him and touching each other and touching his love and… God, feels so good. His eyes fall shut as he grinds deep into Breena, feeling the tingles building, grunting as they explode through him.

He’s coming down, relaxing with Breena on his lap, as Tim’s getting close, eye almost closed, body tight, gripping Jimmy’s knee, babbling about how much he loves all of them, as he arches, shudders, jerks, and moans.

Jimmy scoots a bit further back from Tim, taking his hand again, as Breena settles between them, and Abby curls into his other side. Tim’s lying between them, purring, kissing each girl gently, and if he got in range, Jimmy’d get a kiss, too, but he’s content with where he is. He does get his hand squeezed.

With Tim, the steak is these moments, the quiet, the closeness, getting to see someone you love wrapped in bliss, getting to enjoy it with them.

And maybe that’s enough.
Though, watching Tim, eyes closed, breathing slower, skin flushed, Jimmy’s thinking that he’s at least got to try to see if he get to the point where all of it is steak.
One Does Not Look The Other Way

Jimmy and Tim have shower time together this morning. So, once in there, with the water on, Jimmy asks him, “Did you like last night?”

Tim’s staring at Jimmy like he’s being exceptionally stupid as he grabs his soap. “Of course! That was awesome, felt like I went forever.”

“You’re on Percocet. You did. I was sure you were going to conk out like ten minutes into it, but you just kept going, really slow and easy for like, an hour.”

“Felt amazing. Really slow build, but it was good. Is that what you’re asking about?” It’s clear on Tim’s face that he’s not sure what Jimmy might have been curious about in regards to liking last night.

“No.” Jimmy’s eyeing Tim, who’s just staring back at him, soaking wet, rubbing soap absently over his chest and under his arm. He’s getting a pretty clear sense that Tim’s memory of last night might not be quite as well fleshed out as it usually would be. “How much of last night do you remember?”

Tim blinks, thinking, hard, and turns into the water to rinse off. After a moment he says, “Uh… Images… Feelings. Sensations mostly. Really loose and liquid and sleepy. Dream sex.”

“Remind me to check the dose they gave you. That sounds like too much.”

Tim feels alarmed at that. He turns back to Jimmy. So far he’s been really liking this round of pills; when he takes them, he genuinely doesn’t hurt. This is a novel experience after the summer, and one he’s not interested in giving up. “I don’t care! It felt great! Believe it or not, I don’t really like hurting, and this is the first time they’ve given me enough pain medication that I don’t hurt, at all.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Yeah, you’re on too high of a dose.”

“Don’t you dare mess with it!”

“Tim.”

“Shit.” He looks crestfallen. “Bad enough I hurt all day… Nice to be able to not hurt at night.”

“I’ll see if I can split the difference. You get too high a dose, and it’ll mess with your system. One time thing, sure, great. Day after day… Not so hot.”

“Fine. Why are you asking how well I remember last night?”

Jimmy almost blushes, and even with one functional eye, Tim can see something is up. “What?”

“You ever wonder why we’re straight?”

“I can honestly say no. If, I’ve wondered about that, but not why.”

“Why not?”

“For as long as I’ve known it was a thing, I’ve also heard people telling me why it happens. I don’t think they were all right, well, I really hope most of them weren’t, but it was never a mystery in my world. Pop… first time I asked what a fag was, he told me they were bad people doing bad things, same sort of thing like why there are murders and thieves. A year later, Penny’s telling me it’s a social construct, and my grad school girlfriend agreed with that. That was the line in college, we’re all naturally bi, but we get pushed one way or another. It never felt that way to me, but especially then, I wasn’t going to argue with them. I’ve heard Ducky and Penny talking about it, and no disrespect to her, but his argument about genetic determinism made a hell of a lot more sense to me.”

Tim shrugs, stepping away from the water, letting Jimmy have it. “I told Abby, if there had been any conditioning aspect to it, I probably would have been sleeping with guys in college, just to piss the Admiral off. It never happened, even when I was going crazy I was so horny, so… Yeah, I’ve given it just about as much thought as to why I have green eyes. That’s just how the DNA got together. Why? You thinking about it?”

“Yeah. Some. Last night, we were kissing, and it looked like you really liked it.”

Tim doesn’t have a particularly distinct memory of that, but he does know he liked last night. “I really liked everything last night.”

“You looked really turned on.”

“Stoned and fucking all three of my loves.” Tim nods. “That’s a situation where I’ll be turned on.”

Jimmy’s feeling like he’s possibly not being specific enough about the idea he’s trying to convey. “It looked like playing with me was getting you hot, felt like it, too.”

Tim shrugs, he doesn’t remember last night well enough to know if anything Jimmy specifically was doing was getting to him.

“And if it was…” Jimmy continues, “I mean… Doesn’t that kind of hint at a conditioning thing? Pump enough drugs into you, and the wall between straight and bi falls?”

“What the hell were you doing to me?” Tim’s starting to wonder about what he’s not remembering from last night.

“Had my tongue down your throat and felt you up.”

Tim looks alarmed, and for a moment Jimmy’s worried he crossed the line, but then Tim speaks, and he’s not alarmed about what Jimmy was doing. “Shit! Okay, yeah, I’m on too much Percocet.” Tim rubs his good eye. “I just remember you being close and feeling really good. Feeling me up, how?”

“We were still dressed, but I had my hand on your dick, and you seemed to like it. Rubbing into me, you know?” Tim nods. He knows. Might not remember it, though he’s starting to get some images along those lines together in his head, but he knows how his hips react to a warm, firm hand on his dick while he’s kissing. “Plus, you’re a good kisser sober, but you’re a better one stoned. Or, at least with me, you are.”

Tim’s eyebrows rise at that. “Huh. Uh… Did you like it?”

Jimmy steps away from the water, grabbing his shampoo. Just because they’re talking doesn’t mean he can take too long in here. The girls’ll want backup on breakfast and baby wrangling, soon. “I wanted to. I mean… Abby gets to get off on all three of us, Breena too, to a lesser degree, but, you and me, we’re kind of stuck. And I’m not saying what we’ve got is bad, but… It could be better, you know? Practically getting the girls off just by fooling around with you is great, but I’d like to get off on it, too.”

Tim’s eye narrows as he thinks about that. “So… what… you want to experiment?”

“Yeah. Some. I mean, if you’re cool with it. People drink because it lets them do things they normally wouldn’t do. You on Percocet seem to enjoy me more… Maybe it is conditioning. That’s the point of conditioning, right? It doesn’t just go away because you don’t want it anymore. It’s supposed to stay there and keep you behaving a certain way. So… I want to see what happens if I can shut that down for a night.”

“Shut it down, how?” Tim’s somewhere between curious and concerned. The science guy is interested in this as an experiment. The friend/lover is concerned about what Jimmy’s thinking he might like to try.

“If it wasn’t illegal, I’d suggest E. That shuts down your social conditioning, floods your brain with serotonin, and makes everything feel awesome. As it is, I’ve got to do some research. There’s got to be something I can write a prescription for that’ll do it.”

“If it makes everything feel good, how would you know that it’s not just the E doing it?”

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little, and also smiles at Tim, because he’s very glad that he’s cool with this and actually helping with good suggestions on experiment design. “Good point. The experiment should be about enjoying the sex, not the drug. But it’s moot because I’m not going to go grab a tab of E from the evidence lock up…”

Tim nods. “Yeah, I know. Sure, I’ll experiment with you. Just nothing that won’t be out of your system by morning, right?”

“I’m looking to get laid, not put myself into a coma. Once upon a time, I used to be really good at this. And that’s before I had an MD. Lots of chemicals out there I’ve got access to now, that I didn’t back then. I think I can figure out how to do it.”

Tim’s looking a little wary, beyond mentioning that he’d tried pretty much everything he could get his hands on, Jimmy’s never talked all that much about what he used to do drug-wise. “What does ‘really good’ mean?”

Jimmy finishes rinsing his hair and grabs his shaving cream, starting to lather his face. “I never wanted to get wasted, just nicely buzzed, and I didn’t exactly have piles of cash laying around. So, I wanted the longest, moderately intense high for the buck. I just wanted to glow for a while, take the edge off.” Tim looks like he’s following, but Jimmy takes the idea a little further. “Three beers, the way that feels, nicely loose and happy, for hours, without getting any further along.” Tim nods. That’s very concrete and he can easily imagine it. “I got really good at researching, and figuring out exactly what I needed to keep myself nicely toasted, without wasting any. Say you’ve got one tab of E. You take it, you feel weird for 40 minutes, you feel excellent for about six hours, and then you feel like shit for the next day. I’d figure out how much E was in the tab, dissolve it in water, give myself enough to get over the weird bit, and then keep re-dosing every two hours to stretch the high, after eight hours, half dose, then two quarter doses, to minimize the crash. You’ve got to drink a lot, but not too much, water with E, so I’d have a collection of water bottles, each with a dose in it, numbered, and my watch set to buzz every two hours. I just wanted to nudge the serotonin level, not spike it.”

Tim cannot imagine having had enough time to even begin to get that into anything that complicated in college, other than school work. “What did you do in college?”

“First of all, unlike you, I went to a second-tier school. A good one, but not Johns Hopkins. For the first two years, I did just enough school work to keep a 3.0. My scholarship would lapse if I ever dropped below a 3. Theater, chorus, PB&Js, I worked in a Vet’s office as an Administrative Assistant, so a lot of typing and filing, making sure everything they needed was ordered and in stock, and after hours, messing around in their lab.” Jimmy reaches for his razor, and adds, “I was still a music major back then. I had biology as my minor, and I had to take a few chemistry classes for that. I wasn’t exactly aimless, but besides the next good time, or the next concert, I wasn’t very focused, either. I got sick and my Dad died within a year, and that changed a lot of things.”

“Wake up call of doom.”

Jimmy nods. “Something like that. Had to work full time after that to keep myself in health insurance and enough cash to stay in school. That meant no more job with the Vet. Meant being the class of ’02 instead of ’00. But… my ‘tragic backstory’ got me into Georgetown’s medical school as a ‘non-traditional student’ when on grades alone I shouldn’t have been able to make it. Being a student there got Ducky to put my resume into the maybe pile, and here I am.”

Tim nods, touching Jimmy’s shoulder. “For which I am glad.”

While Tim’s toweling off, Breena’s leaning against her makeup table, tools out, and says, “How battered do you want to look for the press conference?”

Tim sends her a curious look as he hangs up the towel and steps toward her. “Uhhh?”

“I cover all sorts of issues all the time. Your eye is still really swollen, but it’s opening a little now, and if you want, I can cover the bruises.”

The idea of someone patting makeup on him makes Tim want to wince. But, he figures Breena has to know that, so he’s got to be missing something. “You have to touch it to do that, right?”

She touches something, a small plastic square that’s tucked onto the back of the table. Previously to this point, that’s something Tim’s never given any thought, and looking at it now he’s got it characterized as a ‘do-hickey.’ “Not if you don’t want me to.”

“How?”

“It’s an airbrush. When we go out and my makeup’s amazing, or, like in the videos we made you, this is what I use.”

“Oh… Uh…” He takes a moment to really look at himself. His eye is open, a smidge. He tries to imagine how he’d look with an eye almost swollen shut, but with it exactly the same color as the skin around it. Tim shakes his head. “When the swelling’s down… Like, Monday, I’ve not a new Commission to show up at, and by then it’ll just be covering the color, sure, that sounds great, but right now… I think it’d look weird.”

Jimmy adds, pulling on his boxer briefs, “Plus, you’re making the case that this guy needed to go to jail. Might be a good idea to look beaten up.”

Breena smiles at that. “I’ve got blues, purples, greens and browns. You want that bruise to look worse, I can do that, too.”

“Wait, is this paint?” Tim asks.

“No,” She flashes him a do you really think I’d offer to put paint on you look? Tim shrugs. “It’s makeup, but if you want to match someone’s skin tone, you need a lot of colors to mix with. I’ve got a full color palette. You wouldn’t believe how useful a drop of orange or purple can be in the right circumstance.”

“Is this from work?” Tim asks.

“The color palette is, the machine is mine. I mean, I only buy the colors I need for me, for my own use. And you and I don’t have the same skin tone. But no one minds if I borrow a few drops of my other shades for personal use a few days a year. What, am I going to yell at myself for grabbing fifteen cents worth of makeup?” Breena laughs at that.

“Monday. Unless I’m so healed up you can’t see it, I’ll take you up on it, then.”

Abby’s riding herd on the girls when they get downstairs. All four of them are at the kitchen table. She’s got a cup of tea for herself, and the girls have bowls of Cheerios, sippy cups of milk, sliced bananas, and small squares of cheddar cheese.

And that’s exactly as much cooking as Abby’s willing to do these days.

She glances at Tim and says, “No makeup, huh?” when he heads into the kitchen.

“Not today. Why, you want to glam me up?”

“Always,” she gives him a pat on the tush when he bends down to kiss her. “Can you get my black boots?”

“No problem.” He heads off to the door between the garage and laundry room, and grabs Abby’s boots. Though she probably can put them on herself these days, it’s easier and faster if he does it for her.

She pats Sean when he’s back, holding one leg out, and Tim slips the boot up over her foot, zipping it along her calf.

“Little boy having a quiet day?”

“Yeah. Second in a row with no contractions.” She pokes her tummy. “Don’t get too comfy in there. You’re getting evicted on the 28th if you don’t move out on your own.”

“You decided on when maternity leave begins?” Breena asks, sitting next to her at the kitchen table, taking over on making sure little girls eat the breakfasts in front of them.

Jimmy moves onto his usual place, breakfast cook, while Tim gets coffee ready for everyone.

“Maybe the 13th, maybe the 20th. I felt like I was going stir-crazy last time. Nothing to do but rest and wait.”

“You’ve got someone else who might want some quality Mommy and Me time before you vanish to the hospital for a few days and then this new person comes home with you.” Breena gives Kelly a little stroke down the back of the head.

Kelly looks confused, waiting to see if the adults want anything from her, and then shoves another bite of banana into her mouth.
Abby nods. “That might be a plan.” She’s about to say to Kelly, “Do you want some girl time?” but decides since they aren’t doing it today, that asking now would just be teasing her. “We need to get Sean’s nursery ready.”

Tim nods at that, taking cups of coffee, handing one to Jimmy, one to Breena, and sipping from his. “Does this mean we’re moving back to our place for a while?”

“Most of why we were here, the smell, is gone now,” Jimmy says, whipping eggs. “Your place is closer to your hospital… Should probably stay there for the time being.”

“Tonight at our place, then. We can get the new furniture set up,” Abby says. “And, quick reminder, Friday morning, we’ve got an OB appointment.”

Tim nods. “It’s on my calendar.”

“When does the press conference start?” Breena asks.

“Nine. I’ve got just enough time to get in, check my email, and then up to Vance’s office. If I’m lucky, it’s short and I get to show up at the Commission on time, and then spend the next six hours trying to stay awake, and if not, I get to show up late and have everyone stare at me again.”

Abby pats his hand.

Dornaget’s been waiting for a morning when he’s in the office, and Tim is, too. He got the word of what had happened two seconds after he got in on Tuesday, and if he hadn’t gotten a murder call about a minute after that, he would have been waiting in Tim’s office for him then.

He knows Tim is going to be in today, because they’ve got that press conference thing, and he’s supposed to go see Jimmy today, too, so he’s in, too.

Perfect.

He does feel a little disappointed as he’s taking the elevator down.

Tim… They aren’t very close buddies or anything, but especially after he came out to Tim, he felt like… Like Tim might be the kind of guy who’d trust him with something like that, too.

All in all, he’s a little hurt that Tim didn’t tell him, but, he knows how hard it is to say those words, and the fear that keeps a man silent.

He’s also a little pissed that Tim would do that to Abby. Dating a woman… hell, marrying a woman, when you like men, that’s a shit move. His next stop, after Tim, is to head to the lab and offer Abby a shoulder to cry on, too.

Still… They’re friends, and right now Tim’s got to be feeling really unsettled, really scared and vulnerable and confused, so the least he can do is offer an ear to listen and a sofa to crash on.

Tim’s at his computer, giving a quick check to everything else going on, as Dornie heads into his office, closing the door behind him.

“Hi.” Tim smiles up at him, wondering what on Earth Dornie needs. He knows how to use the triaging software as well as anyone, and he’s more than good enough with a computer to do a lot of his own workload.
Dornie winces a bit, looking at Tim. That eye is a mess. Then he moves to sit on the corner of Tim’s desk. “Hey, McGee. I… um… I know everyone’s gossiping and all that, but, I just wanted to say ‘good for you!’ I wish I had had the balls to deck my dad when I came out to him. He had some…” Dornie shakes his head. “Anyway. I’m glad you did it; I bet it felt really good.”

This one is new to Tim, and he’s not quite sure how to respond. “Thanks.” Seems safe enough. And, “Yeah, it did,” also seems safe.

Dornie keeps sitting on the edge of Tim’s desk. That’s not exactly the response he was looking for, but he also knows that Tim’s not exactly ebullient when it comes to sharing feelings. Finally he says, “Look, I know we’re not really close or anything, but… You could have told me. I wouldn’t have made fun or anything. I certainly wouldn’t have blabbed about it. I know how much is at stake when you come out. And… you know, been there, done that, it’s good to have support when you come out.”

Tim’s really not sure how to respond to that. He nervously licks his lips while absolutely no response at all to what Ned just said pops into his mind. And Ned is wondering why Tim’s staring at him like he’s speaking Klingon… scratch that, Tim would understand Klingon, like he’s speaking German.

Ned tries a slightly different track. “So, are you okay? NCIS has always been really good about anti-discrimination stuff, but there are a few guys here who can be pretty tricky. Stibbons in HR can be a real pain in the ass. He goes out of his way to make life difficult, though you outrank him by a mile, so he might not be a jerk to you.”

Okay, that Tim’s got a response for. “I’m okay, Dornie.”

“Good. I mean, it can be hard, and it’s really emotional, and not always in a—“

Tim isn’t sure how to handle this, but he does know that Dornie’s sympathizing with something he’s not actually experiencing, so it’s probably a good idea to try and set things straight.

“Dornie…”

Dornaget perks up, that sounds like something sincere is about to come out of Tim. “Yeah, Tim?”

“I’m not actually gay.”

Ned hears the words, and, God, like he hasn’t heard this fifty times before. He tries to keep it down, but he feels his lips quivering and then the laughing hits.

Of all the responses Dornie could have had, bursting out into laughter isn’t one Tim’s expecting. When Ned finishes, he shakes his head, smiles kindly, puts a hand on Tim’s shoulder, and says, gently shaking his head, “God, I was so there twelve years ago. You jump out, and then you realize what a big deal it is, and sometimes you want to jump right back into the closet. I get that. It’s a lot safer, especially for guys like you with a wife and kids, in there. But, it’s not the Hokey-Pokey Tim, once you’re out to a group, you’re out. You don’t get to go back into the closet. It’s kind of like being born; it’s a one way trip. Sure, you’ve got to keep making the damn trip every time you end up in a new group of people, but…”

Tim sighs. He knows that for the rest of his NCIS career, people here are going to think he’s at least bi and probably so far back in the closet he’s behind the skeletons. He’s fine with that. But, he’s trying to have a real conversation about this with Dornie, and Dornie looking smug and amused isn’t helping.
“I’m really not gay.”

Dornie laughs again. “Uh huh. Yeah. There’s a word for guys who have sex with other guys, and that word is gay.”

“I’m married.”

Dornie’s smiling. “So are lots of gay guys.”

“With two kids.”

“Yes,” Dornie nods, encouragingly. “It happens a lot.”

“I had sex with my wife last night.”

“That’s generally how gay guys end up with kids.”

“Five times this week.”

Dornie laughs again, giving him another gentle squeeze to the shoulder. “Uh huh. Come on, that’s Tony’s line.” He smiles kindly. “Look, I know it’s scary. Coming out is downright terrifying! With the way people are talking about you, that’s got to be a lot to handle, and I’m sure Abby wants a lot of reassurance that you and Jimmy aren’t getting ready to run off together. But, look, come on… Denial is not good for you. This is what I mean by support, you’re going to need help getting through this, you are going to need people around who are fine with you being who you are, and I just wanted you to know, I’m here.”

Tim would bury his face in his hands, but that would hurt too damn much. The kicker is, Dornie is being really nice to him. Everyone else is whispering away, and this is the first genuine offer of friendship he’s gotten… well… except for… that guy… yesterday, who he thinks was more hitting on him than being nice. He gets how big of a deal this is, and he appreciates it, but… he just doesn’t need it. He looks up at Dornie and sighs loudly. “Dornie, first off… I get what you’re offering me, and I appreciate it, I really do. You’re the first person to be really kind to me about this, but I’m not gay. I do not find men sexually attractive, and that’s kind of the definition of being gay, right?”

Ned sits back a bit. “It doesn’t have to be men, plural, Tim, just Jimmy is enough. Though…” Dornie gets a dreamy look on his face. “Hello, Jimmy! Oh my God! I’ve seen him in the locker room… Those abs! And the way he slings that towel low on his hips when he heads off to the shower. God, someone carved him out of a slab of marble. He is so ripped! Between you and me, and don’t get jealous, but sometimes, if I see him come in, I’ll slow down, so I’m still there while he walks to the shower, just to peek a bit, you know?”

Tim sighs at the look on Dornie’s face as he’s imaging Jimmy in a towel heading to the shower. “Actually, no Dornie, I don’t know, because I don’t look at Jimmy like that, because I’m not gay, or bi, or straight and making an exception for Jimmy. Don’t get me wrong, I love Jimmy to the ends of the world, but he’s not sexually attractive to me.”

Are you blind? Those ABS! Those big hazel eyes, and that smile! Okay, sure, he’s easy to overlook dressed, but once you’ve seen him, you keep looking! Unwrapping him for the first time must have been one hell of a treat!”

Tim’s rubbing his forehead, very carefully skirting the sore eye. “Breena certainly thought so, and Abby really didn’t complain when he offered to be one of her Rolfing Guinea Pigs. She and Breena agree with you that I’m blind, but… He’s not what I’m into. I like,” Tim gestures with his hands to illustrate the concept, “nice, soft, round butts, and boobs, and smooth skin, and pregnant tummies, all of which are features Jimmy doesn’t come equipped with. He’ll be glad to know you think he’s hot. But, I don’t. And he doesn’t think I’m hot. Because we aren’t gay.”

Dornie’s eyes flick away from Tim for a second. That sounds distressingly sincere, and then another thought hits. Everyone assumes it’s Jimmy. Tim, at least in the version he heard, didn’t actually say who the guy was. Another figure hops into Dornaget’s mind and his face lights up. “It’s not Jimmy, is it?” Then his mouth drops open. “Oh, God, don’t tell me it’s Gibbs! Oh my god, I’d be too terrified to even look him in the eye let alone—“

“It’s not Gibbs! It’s not any guy! ‘She’s every man’s type!’ Remember me saying that? Is that something that a guy who’s even remotely aware that every other guy isn’t necessarily straight says? Is that something a gay guy says?”

That gets to Dornie, and he stares at Tim more, watching him carefully, thinking for a bit, and then finally says, “You going to tell me you’re not sleeping with any guy? You got up in front of three hundred people, told your Dad you are gay, got hit in the face for it, and you’re not?” Dornie’s halfway between disbelieving and horrified.

Tim blinks again, thinking of how to explain this. “I love Jimmy, dearly. He loves me. We both love each other and our wives. When it comes to sexual desire, we want the girls, not each other.”

Tim’s staring up at him with those big, sincere green eyes, and finally, Ned starts to think that he’s not just BSing this. “But… You and your dad?”

“He’s a fucking monster, Ned, and I used the best bait I had to get him to strike. He’s been… It’s a long and complicated story, but no one who knows about him wanted him getting back into any position of power in the Navy, so… I took him down. And honestly, even though I don’t have sex with Jimmy, the fact that I’m willing to say I love him paints me as gay in The Admiral’s book. Talking about sex just freaked him out enough that he’d hit me.”

Dornie’s looking really confused by this. Coming out was not fun. Dealing with the stigma of being gay is not a picnic. He can’t imagine anyone voluntarily signing up for that if they didn’t have to. “Why would you…”

Tim looks tired. “If I could have gotten him with something else, I would have used it. I could feel it, when I was baiting him. I was pissing him off, but he wasn’t going to hit me with what I was using, and if he didn’t hit me, he was going to walk out of there and back into his ‘glorious Naval career.’” Ned’s taken aback by how much scorn is pouring off of Tim as he says this.

“He’s an Admiral. He’s really good at covering his tracks. He almost killed me and didn’t leave a trace. Stan Burley’s been looking into him ever since, and he’s got a really nasty history with gay and believed to be gay sailors under his command, but there was never enough proof to make anything stick. I got the proof. Call it an undercover mission if you like. Just a shame he’s only going away for a few years, he’s got a lot more blood on his hands than mine.”

“So… You’re really not gay?”

Tim shrugs. “I’m fine if people want to call me that because they can’t figure out or believe the sort of relationship Jimmy and I have, but, I like girls. And… I listen to you talk about Jimmy, and I know that’s how our wives see him, but… he’s just Jimmy to me. I’ve seen him naked, and I know, objectively that he’s attractive, but I don’t feel it the way you do.”

Ned’s aware that some guys aren’t into guys, at all, but… Jimmy. “Not at all?”
Tim shakes his head. “Got a shower with him this morning. Nothing. I like watching him fool around with the girls. That’s…” Tim smiles. “I like that a lot. Him on his own is a hell of a lot less interesting.”

Ned squints at Tim, then his eyes go wide when he realizes what Tim just said. Tim bites his lip and curses his pain meds, he’s not being as careful as he should be. He really hopes this press conference isn’t a minefield. Tim shifts the topic a bit, hoping that what he said is not about to go flying around the office, too. “What happened with your dad? You guys ever make it up?”

Dornie shakes his head. “He and mom divorced when I was a kid. I’ve been out to her since… since before I knew I was gay. She’s… She’s super spy woman, or she was, she resigned from the CIA in October. Anyway, she’s like Gibbs, she knows everything, she told me not to tell my dad, that he’d be a jerk about it.” He shrugs again. “She was right. I told him. He booted me out of his house, literally, I had to wait on the sidewalk for Mom to come and get me, and we haven’t talked in twelve years.”

Tim winces. “I’m sorry, Ned.”

Ned shrugs a bit. “Yeah, well, it happens. But… I wanted to run back into the closet and hide in there after I told him. My own Dad… So… What you said. It looked familiar, really familiar.”

“I’m sure it did.”

Ned’s thinking, looking a little behind and past Tim. “Being in the closet is safe, and… comfortable, sort of. Well, for me. I know people who feel like it’s killing them, but that wasn’t how it worked for me. It was like a piece of clothing that’s not quite right, but you wear it so often, you get used to it? Shoes that are stretched out… And, nothing really bad happens there. But, nothing good happens there, either.”

“That safe, comfy rut.”

“Yeah.”

“I know all about that. My life now,” Tim gestures to his office, and the pictures of his family, “None of this would have happened if I had stayed in my rut. Getting out of it was scary. I planned that for a few months before I made the first move, and if I had known how far getting out of that rut would have taken me, I probably would have dithered for a few more months. It’s not exactly what you’re talking about, but it’s the difference between getting along okay and joy, for me, at least.”

“Yeah, Tim, it is.”

Tim waits a few beats, checks the time, he’s got a minute, and then says, “So… Look, no one’s talking directly to me about this. All I get is looks and conversations that die as soon as I get within earshot. What the hell is the rumor going around?”

“First night of the Tech In Anti-Terror Commission. Your Dad shows up, and he’s bugging you all night. You keep brushing him off, and he keeps coming back, saying snide things. Draga let slip that he made a nasty crack about Abby’s weight, and then he almost decked him, wrecking the whole thing—”

“I almost hit him then, too. If your wife is skinny and nine months pregnant, something is wrong. And if you’re the asshole who thinks his wife is supposed to be skinny nine months pregnant you can go fu—” Tim sees the way Dornie is looking at him and says, “Sorry, I’m getting you off track.”

“No, I agree with that. Okay, sure, women aren’t my thing even in the best of circumstances, but I’ve seen the ones who are really pregnant and thin and it just looks wrong. Anyway, the rumor says he was looking to pick a fight, but he was trying to get you to hit him. But you don’t do it. Finally, you tell him you’re gay, he takes a swing at you, and you drop him and Tony arrests him for assault and a hate crime.”

“That’s it?”

“In one version you’re both drunk. In another you… well… It involves one of my least favorite words ever, but the way you used it made me hate it a little less.”

Tim inclines his head a bit at that. He hadn’t really been thinking about it when he said it, beyond the fact that that was the Admiral’s trigger word. “It was his favorite slur. Anything he didn’t like, he slapped that label onto. Like milk and sugar in your coffee, must be a fag. Allergy attack, fag. Didn’t complete the pass on the football field, fag.”

Ned’s wincing at all of that, and becoming a lot happier that Admiral McGee is never getting anywhere near a command rank again.

“I wanted to burn it into his head as a badge of pride, for me! I wanted him to know who took him down!”

Ned shakes his head. Speaking of things straight guys don’t say.

Tim adds, “So everyone knows Tony and Draga were there the full time, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Do you think they would have been there the whole time if it wasn’t a sting?”

Dornaget gives him a tight smile. “Tim, everyone knows it’s a sting. Of course Tony and Draga didn’t just happen to be there. They also think you were telling the truth about being gay.”

“Oh.” That was a combination that hadn’t occurred to Tim.

Dornie smiles and nods. Then he checks the clock. “And I’ve got to go visit Jimmy. He’s also, really, not gay?”

Tim nods. “Really. More importantly, he’s more married than you could possibly imagine.”

Dornie sighs as he stands up. “They always are. And Abby’s cool?”

“Yeah. But she’d love a visit from someone who isn’t offering her the phone number of different divorce lawyers.”

“I can do that.”

The last time Tim did a press conference he had a somewhat distracted collection of tech writer who were all very sympathetic to what he had just done sitting around him, listening less and less to what he had to say as the events at the White House unraveled on the TV behind them. Granted, he had less and less to say as those events unraveled, too.
By the end of it, they were all just watching the TV, seeing the Secret Service fire into the crowd.

And by then, no one much cared about how he got into the bank account that was selling the elections.

As of that point in time, that was the sum total of his experience with the press one on one in any sort of situation where he was expected to actually talk to them. Sure, as a writer, he’s done publicity, but as a writer, his publicist gives him interview questions, he answers them, lets them sit, edits them, rereads them, edits again, and then off they go along with his head shot, to be published by whomever wants them.

He’s never done any live publicity as Thom E. Gemcity.

So, this experience, in Leon’s office with four reporters and one photographer, is not what Tim’s used to. First off, they want pictures. Of him. Now. With no makeup (he is wearing some in his author head shot) and a full face shot. With his real name. He feels squirmy just thinking about it, but he manages to stick a smile on his face, and is then told by the photographer that it’s not that kind of picture. And that he should, “Just act natural.”

“I’d be in my office, working on my code, solving crimes if I was acting natural.”

Leon smiles at that, and so does one… he thinks it’s the one from the AP… of the reporters.

Once everyone’s got some coffee, Leon gestures for everyone to sit down at his conference table. “In the last two days, I’ve gotten requests for comments from all of your news services. I’d like to thank you for waiting to talk to us before reporting too much about this.”

That gets a bit of nodding.

“Come on, Leon, spill. You know what we want,” The Reuters reporter says.

Leon nods. “I do, Frank. First of all, introductions, Frank Murtaugh from Reuters, John Clamton from Out, Seelia Lingh from the AP, Jillian Wau from the Post. I’m Leon Vance, Director of NCIS, and this is Timothy McGee, our Director of Cybercrime.”

“Why is Cybercrime involved in a hate crime sting?” Clamton hops right into this.

“Because data is your friend when you’re looking for far reaching patterns, and part of my job is being the data guy,” Tim says, glad he’s been thinking about why Cybercrime would be involved in this sort of thing. “Leon?”

“Let me start at the beginning. As you all know, NCIS was integral with the recent governmental upset. I had a lot of time to think while we were on the shelf, about who we are, and what we do, and the world around us.

“It’s no secret that power provides a sort of ‘get out of jail free card.’ Part of why so much that went wrong with the US Government could go wrong was people looking the other way. We set a benchmark when we brought that story out, and we’re going to live up to. If there’s any legacy I want for myself, it’s that I cleaned up the messes I saw. And now, I’m making sure to look for the messes, and not just step over them.”

“Why start with hate crimes?” Lingh asks. “Wouldn’t corruption be a more logical target?”

Leon glances to Tim, and Tim nods. “Data. We have all the files in our databases, and we can use that data. Admiral McGee had already run into other issues, and had been being investigated, and while no one could find any proof, there was an unusually high number of issues under his command. Because he was being specifically investigated about LGTB hate crimes, we were able to get a good sense for that issue directly under his command. And the issues under him ranged from denied promotions, to, before DADT the highest rate of ‘Conduct Unbecoming’ discharges, to a frighteningly high number of men and women under his command being outed under DADT, to outright harassment, violence, and two missing sailors. I do need to stress, that until he hit me, we never were able to get any proof against Admiral McGee, and we do not, for a fact, know that he was personally involved in any of those crimes, but the numbers don’t lie, his command was not a safe place for an LGTB Sailor. We know, at the very least, he did a lot of looking the other way.”

“And, in the Navy, the buck stops at the top of the pyramid. It was his job, as an Admiral, and a Captain before that, to provide for the safety of his troops,” Leon adds. “He became an Admiral shortly after the institution of Don’t Ask Don’t Tell, it was his job to make sure his men weren’t asking, and given the number of sailors outed under his command, he was not doing his job.”

Tim takes over from there. “Having seen the patterns Agent Burley was finding on Admiral McGee, I realized we could do similar searches. My team is building the programs that will find out which commanders allow hate crimes to slide under their commands.”

“How will that work, especially with gay sailors?” Wau asks.

“We won’t just be focusing on LGTB personnel. Any form of discrimination charge or hate crime complaint will be looked at as part of this. I’ve got my database, which has every complaint in there. I know, from that database, what the average number of complaints per squad, platoon, up to battle division is. I can calculate standard deviations. From there I can start searching by command. If a command has more than a standard deviation of hate crime issues, I know we need to get into it and start looking, closely.”

Leon hops in. “I am hopeful, that as the Navy sees we’re serious about this, and as we work to make sure whistleblowers are not targeted for backlash, that we’ll get more information, and that Sailors and Marines will be comfortable letting us know where the problems are.”

“Once you’ve targeted someone with your program, then what?” Wau asks.

“Then it’s just like any other crime. Investigate. And if that means undercover work, it means undercover work.” Tim replies.

“Aren’t you afraid of charges of entrapment?” Lingh asks, eyeing Tim’s black eye.

Leon grins at that. “Entrapment is when you encourage someone to commit a crime. There is no universe where saying ‘I’m gay’ should encourage anyone to do anything illegal. Now, let me go further, if the words, ‘I’m gay’ makes someone want to commit a crime, I do not want that person in my Navy. That type of person is clearly not well-enough balanced to be entrusted with weapons and life or death decisions. And, if that person wants do something violent to one of his brothers and sisters in blue because they’re gay, that’s someone who is unworthy of wearing the uniform.

“We depend on each other. Social cohesion keeps us alive out there, and we cannot afford to have people in uniform who aren’t willing to die for every other man or woman on his team. So, we’re not. Anyone who can’t look at his fellow Sailor or Marine and feel respect, isn’t welcome here, not anymore.

“Black, white, gay, straight, male, female, we are all Navy and we’re going to act like it. No more looking away and winking at bad behavior. That ends, now.
“What happened with Admiral McGee is a signal. We intentionally began with someone very visible. No one is too highly ranked. No one is beyond reproach.”

Once Leon says that, he gets a few seconds of silence while the reporters digest that and think of new questions.

“Director McGee… I know it’s a common last name, is there anything more to that?” Murtaugh asks.

Tim nods. “It is a common last name, and yes, there’s more to it than that. Admiral McGee is my father, though we have not spoken, other than in the line of duty, since 2014. We do not get on.”

“So, you two have a certain level of personal animosity?” Clamton asks.

“Since I was a child. It got worse when I refused to join the Navy. I get crippling sea sickness, and didn’t think a career involving boats was a good plan. He disagreed.”

“And that’s the root of the problem?” Wau asks.

“No problem has only one root. However, if I’d gone to Annapolis, and was now Captain McGee instead of Director, I imagine all the other problems could have been smoothed over.”

“Is one of the other problems the fact that you’re gay?” comes out of Clamton, fast, sharp.

“I, and who I am, is not now, nor has it ever been, a problem. It didn’t matter who or what I was, his problems are his, and who I am is incidental to them.”

“You’re married aren’t you?” Lingh says.

Tim taps his wedding ring. “A bit over two years now, and our second baby is due any day.”

“And, you don’t routinely do undercover work. Not as the Director of Cybercrime,” Wau asks.

“Not routinely, not now or at any point in my career here at NCIS. But a good undercover op uses people who are well-suited for the operation. In this case, I was the perfect person for the job. When Leon got word about Admiral McGee, he knew who to call to make sure he didn’t get away again. And I was perfectly fine with helping out.”

It’s the reporter from the Post who finally flat out asks. Tim’d been thinking of answers all day, and talking to Dornie finally cemented what he wanted to say. “So, are you gay? Or was this just an act?”

Tim gives her his best smile. “A lot of people are asking me that. And a lot more are speculating about it. Here’s what I’ve found out, there is no answer to that question that doesn’t get me called a liar. If I say I am gay, people point out that I’m married with kids and have never dated a man. The ones who know my wife and I mention that we are deeply in love, and quite affectionate, and are on our second child in two years. If I say I’m straight, they point out that plenty of gay guys, especially in the military and military services, are married with kids and have never dated a man. The ones who know me and my best friend think that we’re too close to be ‘straight.’ If I say I’m bi, they tell me bi guys don’t actually exist and I should pick a side. So, I’ll say this instead…”

“I am married. I love being married. I will be married for all the remaining days of my life. Over the years, I’ve racked up a lot of titles, Agent, Author, Director, the two that matter most to me are Husband and Father. That’s who I am.

“I have a family I love beyond all reason, and that love is my bedrock. That’s what gives me the strength to be who I am, and the courage to become the man I want to be.

“My family knows all there is to know about me, and they’re the only ones who need to. Not to be too blunt, but you and your readers do not need to know everything there is to know about me.

“That said, if you’d like to ask more about our current policy shift, making sure that everyone who wants to serve in the Navy will be afforded respect and given the protection necessary to do their jobs, I’d be happy to talk more. If you just want to know about who I have sex with, I’d prefer to end this conversation.”

The reporters look remarkably unimpressed with that.

“Come on,” Clamton, the Out reporter says, “quit evading. Are you gay?”

Tim glances to Leon, asking silent permission to be a smartass. Leon grants it with a quick nod. “My sex life is an exceptionally exclusive party with a miniscule guest list. And if you aren’t on the guest list, you don’t get to find out who else is. And none of you are ever getting on the list. So, big data questions? Tracking algorithms? Active recruitment of the best talent we can find?”

“Guest list indicates more than one person,” Lingh says.

Tim stands up. “Bye.” He turns and heads out.

The reporters all stare at Leon after Tim leaves. He shakes his head. “I’m not even going to speculate. As well as I know, everything he’s told you is true.

“Now, as Director McGee said, policy chances, big data questions, recruiting outreach… What would you like to know more about?”

“Are you going to be seeking criminal charges against commanders that look the other way?”

Clamton asks.

“As of right now, looking the other way isn’t illegal. So, our first line of attack is to make sure we get the people who are committing the crimes. Second line is to see what sorts of patterns we have with command ranks. There’s a big difference between a squad commander looking the other way, and a Captain looking the other way. It’s possible the Captain might genuinely not know. He should know, but it’s possible he doesn’t. A squad commander, he knows. That’s where McGee’s standard deviation information will come in handy.

“Third of all, I will be working to make sure that looking the other way becomes the sort of thing a commander can be removed for. That will require a shift in our Code of Justice, but it’s one I’m going to be pushing for. In the meantime, if we have to ‘entrap’ people to get them to break currently existing laws, then we’ll do it that way. If you think violence is an appropriate response to someone coming out to you, I’m perfectly happy to put you in jail.

“Looking the other way, that’s ending, now. And I’ll kill it any way I can.” Leon smiles and begins to talk more about his ideal Navy.

There are indeed moments where Leon Vance has felt like he’s been on the side of the angels in his career. Moments where he’s made a real difference. But, until the point close to six weeks later, when he makes a separate trip to Barnes and Noble to pick up a magazine on his way home, he’s never felt like his actions on Team Angel have intersected with his home life well.

Today, though, it did.

That press conference had been long, and he talked about a lot of things. The work after it was longer, and it made him deeply happy to do. His new Sec Nav was rather happy with the direction he wanted to go, and offered her full support.

Today, he’s bringing home a gift for his daughter. It’s the article that ended up in Out magazine after his press conference. It covers how he’s hell bent determined to make sure that the Navy gets the top talent it can find, straight, gay, male, female, in between, any race, the only thing that matter is if the person can do the job and do it well. And then, once it has those people, it’s going to go out of its way to keep them.

And he is very pleased to be able to hand that interview to his daughter.

He wraps his arm around her, and kisses the top of her head, which he can only reach because she’s sitting down. She’s too tall for him to do it now, when she’s standing, and he wonders how the hell that happened.

She’s looking up at him, very curious as to why he’d hand her a copy of Out magazine, which isn’t part of her, or his, regular reading.

Leon smiles. “Annapolis is going to be hard. The Navy is going to be hard. But I hope, and I’m working, to make sure that by the time you get there, it’ll be the right kind of hard.”

His daughter grins at him, a huge smile, and he feels so proud he wants to burst.
It annoys Jimmy to no end that the drugs he actually liked in college are all illegal. Alcohol, which messes with his blood sugar and leaves him feeling like shit the next morning if he has too much of it, can be bought in pretty much every grocery store in Virginia. Cigarettes, which taste like crap, make his lungs hurt, and are so massively unpleasant he’s never actually smoked one, are cheap and easy to get.

They are also, for the sake of the experiment he’d like to try, the wrong tools for the job. Yes, traditionally, alcohol is the drug of choice for soothing social anxiety and weakening the bonds of ‘proper behavior,’ but he had as much alcohol as he ever should the night they went clubbing, and he was not noticing any desire, at all, that night, to jump Tim.

So, obviously, at the dose he’s willing to take, it’s fighting outside its weight class trying to drop that inhibition.

He’s not willing to push it any further than that. Like he told Tim, he wants to have a good time, get laid, enjoy it, and not end up in a coma.

He’d also prefer to be somewhat functional the next day. He’s sure they’ll give him a pass if he needs one, spend Saturday sleeping whatever it is off, but he doesn’t want to do that.

And, also, it’d be kind of nice if he remembered the experience, too. He figures if he can connect erotic sensation and Tim in his mind once, doing it again will be easier. If it doesn’t make any lasting impression, that’ll be defeating the point.

Thus, as he gets into the Morgue, and begins turning on the computers, lights, and equipment, he’s feeling rather miffed the tools he would like to use are not available for use.

E, Special K, and pot, what he really liked, which made him feel good, and (at the doses he was taking) didn’t (usually) leave him feeling like shit the next morning, are, of course, illegal as hell.

He’s sure that if he felt like taking a walk to the evidence lock up, he could easily get his hands on any pharmacological substance he’d like to play with.

He thinks about that for a moment.

Ketamine would be a bad tool for this particular experiment. The goal is to be in his body, not off floating around in a good mood.

Pot has similar problems. Yes, it’s very relaxing, and that might be good for shutting down the part of him that thinks guys (or at least, Tim) aren’t supposed to be sexually interesting to him, but he doesn’t remember ever wanting sex on pot. Granted, back in those days, having someone to have sex with when he was on pot tended to be an iffy proposition, but even when he did have a girlfriend, mostly he just wanted to lie around, watch movies, and eat everything in the room. Jimmy shudders, trying to imagine dealing with the munchies, now.

If he’s hoping to have sex, really good sex, without his brain getting involved in the picture and sending messages he doesn’t want to his dick, E is what he’d like to have on hand. He hasn’t done that since 1996, since before he was diagnosed with diabetes, but he really liked it. E just makes everything more dreamy and intense and just all around lovely, and it’s really good with sex. Touch, any sort of touch feels amazing, and best he can remember he never got off on E, but he didn’t need to. He and his girlfriend made out/made love for (what felt like) six hours, he’s not even sure if he got an erection, but he knows he didn’t come, and he still can’t remember that night without smiling. He imagines it’d be even better with sex with people you truly love.

More importantly than it makes everything feel good, is the fact that it makes you care fuck all about anything anyone else has ever said, done, or thought. If Penny’s right, and not being into Tim is cultural shaping, E will shut that bit of his brain down and let him play without it kicking in.

And it’s not going to happen. Yes, he’s got access, and yes, he’s got a lab where he can make sure the stuff in the pills really is MDMA, and, he’s sure that between his pharmacology background, and Abby’s Master’s degree in chemistry, they could come up with one hell of a finely tuned chemical cocktail made just for him, but between the illegal side, and the crash the next day, even with his system for minimizing the crash, he’s still achy and crabby the next day, he’s not going to do it.

He’s got all the lights and equipment on, and heads to his computer, getting it up and running, stopping his mental list of potential drugs, to get back to work. He pulls up the preliminary results on their victim’s blood work, as well as the trace evidence they removed from him. He gets that printed out for Agent Dornaget, and tidily tucked into a file.

That done, he’s in the morgue, by himself… He usually waits for Allan to come in to begin an Autopsy, and he’s due in soon, anyway, sooo…

Back to setting up his experiment.

Can’t grab something out of evidence. That means he’s got to stick with something he’s got on hand (Percocet, the bottle of Absinthe in his liquor cabinet), or something he can prescribe for himself.

So, he sits down, and starts reading up on Percocet. Just because it does good things for Tim, doesn’t mean it would for him, and these days, Jimmy’s extremely careful about anything he puts into his body that he doesn’t need to.

Just because Tim has a good time on it doesn’t mean he will.

And after a few minutes, he rapidly comes to the conclusion that it might work nicely with Tim’s biochemistry, but for Joe Average (or more likely, Jimmy Palmer) it’s a recipe for a sunny disposition, a limp dick, and a good nap.

He wants euphoria and relaxation, preferably without an anesthetic effect.

More reading. More researching for drugs he can legally get a hold of. He’s wondering if he just shot onto every government watch list by the research he’s doing. Then he starts wondering if there still are government watch lists. Probably. They cut the head off of a snake, they didn’t pull a St. Patrick and lead all the damn things out of the country. (That thought triggers Ducky’s voice in his mind, talking about how St. Patrick wasn’t Irish, and how snakes, being cold blooded, didn’t actually live in Ireland to begin with.)

More reading. He’s half paying attention to what he’s looking up, and half listening for the elevator. There are a lot of things he doesn’t mind Dr. Allan walking in on, him on a website searching drugs by the king of high they provide isn’t one of those things.

GHB… He missed that as a party drug. By the time it was getting any attention, he was already in law enforcement, so it’s not anything he seriously thought about.

Though… if one of its slang names is Liquid Ecstasy, it might be worth reading up on. So he does.
Ooohhh... This might be what the Doctor ordered. It doesn’t work the way E does, but it’s got a lot of the same sensations attached to it.

But, of course, it’s also, illegal as fuck. He’s muttering about what the hell it is the US government has against people having a good time when he hears the elevator bong, and turns off that search.

Jimmy’s morning flows along smoothly. He’s able to give Dornie his preliminary report without any flirting, though Dornie does ask if they’d like to get lunch with him and Abby, which sounds fine to Jimmy and Allan, so they agree, and then he and Allan get to the autopsy.

They work well together, each one knowing which part of the operation is his job. Jimmy thinks, that had it not been for the month in The Morgue, that Allan would not be this sharp at the job. In a usual week, Jimmy and Allan will see one murder victim, and two accidental deaths. Granted they will do a more thorough job than they were doing at The Morgue, and they will do quite a bit more reporting, but it would have taken Allan years to get the experience he got in that one month by just working at NCIS.

The lack of blood was explained, at least in part, by the preliminary report. The victim had a .4 BAC. He was in the process of dying of alcohol poisoning when he was stabbed.

He did not however, smell like alcohol, and when Jimmy and Allan got to his stomach, they did not find large quantities of anything, let alone alcohol, in there. They did find what appears to be a puncture wound in his femoral artery.

And thus, the mystery deepens!

After September, and worse, November, Jimmy finds it very settling to have a basic, straightforward, murder mystery to deal with.

Lunch feels bizarre on a few levels. It’s him and Abby getting lunch together. Happens at least twice a week usually. That part feels normal and easy. Like he’s been doing since they got back to work, she waits at the table in the cafeteria, and he (Tim usually, but if he’s not there Jimmy does it) gets lunch for both of them.

Craig, the guy at the register, gives him a long look as he rings up both lunches. As Jimmy steps away, he mutters under his breath, “Better do damn well better than a crappy lunch if you’re fucking her husband.”

For a second, Jimmy tenses, about to say something along the lines of, “What was that?” But he sees Abby waiting, sees a lot of people looking at him, and decides that now is a good time to go selectively deaf.

Allan’s behind him, and also hears the not nearly under the breath enough words out of Craig. He tenses, too, and then “accidentally” spills his drink on Craig.
Craig glares, hard, at Allan, while Allan batters him in apologetic bullshit. Craig’s just starting to relax, thinking that it might be an accident, when Allan quietly says, “So, so sorry. Got distracted by a jerk making a comment about something he knows nothing about.”

“You defending him?”

“I don’t need to. What he does is on him. I’m calling you out for being a jerk about it.”

Before Craig can say more, Allan follows Jimmy to the table.

“I take it you’re looking forward to more restaurants around here opening again?” Allan says as he sits down. He can well imagine they’d like to eat somewhere they could be anonymous.

Jimmy’s already told Abby what Craig said. “Wouldn’t mind it,” she says. “This is a pretty sad lunch.”

It’s a grilled chicken salad, probably made yesterday. The lettuce is limp and the croutons are soggy.

“Want me to get something else?”

Abby shakes her head at Jimmy. “Nothing else here is going to be much better.” Actually, nothing there was any better period. He grabbed the best looking thing he saw, for her. “It’s food, and I’ve only got room for three bites anyway, so…” she stabs a bite of the chicken with her fork and gets to it.

Dornie joins them a bit later. He’s looking awfully happy.

“Do I sense a break in the case?” Abby asks him as he sits down.

Dornie grins. “A good one. I’ve got the wife buying large quantities of 181 proof rum and syringes.”

Abby hadn’t heard that part. “She shot him up with rum?”

Allan nods. “Don’t know about she, not yet, but he’s got a small puncture wound in his thigh, leading to the femoral artery.”

“We can excise the tissue and see if there are any traces of alcohol in it,” Jimmy adds.

“Ewww... That’s cool, I guess. How’d she think she’d get away with it though? I mean, that sounds like a lot of premeditation for a really easy crime to track down,” Abby says.

Dornie nods at that, and then says, “And how’d she get him to just lie there and take it? Hey Honey, could you just lie here for a few minutes while I kill you?”

“That would be a hard sell,” Allan says, dryly, chewing his hamburger.

They sit there, the four of them, having a really normal, for work, conversation. Sure, most people probably don’t talk murder over salad and fries, but, they’re NCIS, it’s their job.

Jimmy can feel people watching them, and he wonders what they might think about this. If the rumors are true, he and Abby should be on the outs, not having lunch together, and they’re sitting there with the two most visibly out men in the building.

Every now and again, as they talk, he glances around, scanning the room, the sort of thing he’d rarely do before. Every time he catches eyes on him, most of them darting away as he looks in their direction.

Abby gently touches his hand and minutely shakes her head. “Don’t do it, Jimmy. If they know you care, they double down on it.”

He returns his gaze to her, Ned, and Allan, realizing that, on different levels, all three of them have gone through a version of this. He’s so used to Abby being Abby, that he forgets that every new place they go, her tattoos and clothing get looks. And Allan and Ned must have had something like this happen when they came out.

He shrugs a bit. “Feels weird to be out of a closet I was never in. How long does this part last?”

“Depends on how out you go,” Ned says. “You come out over and over and over. Every new group of people you interact with enough for it to make sense for them to know, you have to tell. In my experience, it takes about two weeks for the looks and whispers to stop.”

Allan wiggles his hand. “Depends a lot on where you are and who you’re with. The CDC was cool, but there were parts of Atlanta that my partner and I were always going to get looks, no matter how long we lived there. One difference, don’t ever move into a neighborhood blind if you’re gay. That was beyond stupid on our part.”

“I got a job with the CDC. Between the two of us we didn’t have a ton of money, but we found what looked like an okay apartment not too far away. I went to visit it, and it had what we needed. Run down neighborhood, but it didn’t feel dangerous. I mean, we lived in Chicago before, we knew dangerous neighborhoods. This one was just old and shabby. I signed the lease, and we moved in.”

“And you went on your own, no one noticed you were gay because you were alone, and when you showed up with a boyfriend…” Ned fills in the blanks in his mind.

“Yeah. We lived there for a year. The old lady who lived in the basement apartment stared every single time we went out. I’m still not sure which pissed her off more, that we were gay, or that Ryan was Chinese. That pissed off a lot of the neighbors, too. Here, though, yeah, two weeks. Of course, they’re all waiting for some massive, public explosion between you two and Tim. That’ll keep them watching longer.”

“At least until Tim’s back in the office and you two start really hanging out again. That’ll get a lot more attention. But… March, April… Can’t imagine it’ll go longer than that,” Dornie says. He looks at Jimmy, and Abby, and decides to ask anyway, “Really, they aren’t gay?”

Abby shakes her head. “Really not. Trust me, if either of them had been, I would have known, and if they’d been out, I would have mentioned it to you.”

Dornie sighs.

“You were telling him who was gay?” Jimmy asks.

“Yeah, when I moved here,” Dornie says. “You’ve got to find out some way, and contrary to public opinion we don’t actually have ‘gaydar.’ At least, I don’t. Sure, a guy pats your fanny at a club, you’ve got a clue, but just working, at work… I can’t really tell. There’s no gay way to file a report.
Abby looked like the kind of person who would know.”

“He was new, looked interesting, and liked my tattoos. I liked the look of him. Dinner, a bottle of wine, a lot of giggling, and a good time was had by all.”

Ned smiles at that memory. “And then Tim wanted to slap me the next day.” Abby giggles a bit at that, too. “You two weren’t dating then, right?”

She shakes her head. “Nah. But on again off again jealousy was part of our game.”

Dornie glances between Abby and Jimmy, remembering what Tim said, and wondering what exactly he meant by that. “But it’s not, now?”

“That’s the difference between real love and just fondness. Love doesn’t get jealous. It knows it has no bounds and that it’s not diminished by being shared.” Abby pats Sean, and then winces. “Ack… Yes, I love you, too, no need to kick me like that!”

Jimmy rests his hand on her belly, and feels little boy squirming around. He doesn’t look around, but he can imagine that made another ten minds explode. Two weeks. Or maybe twelve. You can do this.

---

As Dr. Allan finishes up with their body, Jimmy returns to his search. GHB… They made it to take care of specific medical issues. It’s not just something someone cooked up in his garage one day. There has to be a prescription version of it somewhere.

Finally, he finds something.

Xyrem. There is exactly one legal version he can write a script for. He’s grinning and happily looking this stuff up, reading more, obviously, since it’s a drug used to treat narcolepsy, he’s got to be careful about how to use it, but the damn stuff is basically pure GHB, so…

Oh, God, even better, it makes you horny! Causes euphoria, makes touch feel better, lowers social inhibitions… And then you sleep the damn stuff off. This is exactly what the doctor ordered. In the right doses, this might be a hell of a lot of fun on their next long weekend.

He gets his pad out and is writing away, extremely naughty fantasies running about in his head, when he runs into a snag in his plan. He keeps reading. A big fucking snag in his plan.

Xyrem, because it is GHB, is basically impossible to get. He’s got to register with the drug company that makes it, and get certified as the kind of guy who should be prescribing this stuff, which he can’t do because he’s not a sleep specialist, and then, whomever he prescribes it for, also has to register, with a full medical background showing sleep problems, and the only pharmacy south of Philadelphia and north of Atlanta they could get it from burned down in October.

Jimmy grits his teeth, muttering about how he’s going to register as a Libertarian before Dr. Allan reminds him there are no political parties anymore, and they were barely a party to begin with anyway, and thinks longingly of how easy it would be to head into the evidence lock up and just grab a pill from the to-be-destroyed pile. He’s even got his own tablet maker, so he could swap pill A for one of his own, that way the count wouldn’t be off.

He sits back, staring at the ceiling, thinking about the fact that in college he knew how to get this stuff. Of course, in college he wasn’t nearly as worried about getting arrested. Didn’t have nearly as much to lose.

And, while he does want to play with this, he doesn’t want to risk the life he’s got for it.

Back to what he’s got on hand.

Allan slides their victim back into his drawer and heads over to Dr. Palmer. He’s been researching something, and muttering about it, for the last ten minutes. None of those mutters sounded happy.

“What had you thinking about Libertarians, Dr. Palmer?” The computer is back to the victim information form, so whatever he was doing is done now.

Dr. Palmer shakes his head. “Drug regulations.”

Allan looks surprised by that. Jimmy’s never said anything to indicate anything along those lines before. Then he thinks for another moment. Jimmy’s diabetic. He’s seen him give himself shots every now and again, and occasionally check his sugar. Part of their ambulance kit is testing strips and a can of Coke. He also knows that there’s a lot of promising research coming out about the effects of THC on diabetes. “I’m sure the new Congress will legalize medical pot. And if they don’t, I can’t imagine DC won’t when it becomes a state. You’ll be able to get it soon enough.”

“I still live in Virginia.”

“Right. But at least you won’t end up losing your job for it. Saw another report linking THC to positive outcomes in diabetics.”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah. I’d like to see some thorough testing on that.”

“Hard to do when it’s illegal.”

“I know.”

Allan taps the small plastic container in his hand. “I should take this to Abby. She can check for traces of alcohol.”

“Thanks, Dr. Allan.”

In the morgue by himself, Jimmy supposes giving up on the drug hunt is also part of not feeding the dark, slimy thing in the back of his head. That he can’t, shouldn’t, in good conscious help put people away for doing the sort of thing he’s hoping to do for fun.

Part of disliking most politicians is seeing those smug bastards talk about how they used every drug under the sun, and then sat there and put tons of people in jail for the same damn thing.

He supposes he does that, too, though given the power, he’d pardon everyone in jail on a drug charge who didn’t engage in anything violent, and the only people he personally helps to put in jail are murders.

He’s not sure that’s good enough though.

He snorts at that, remembering something Ducky once said, “There is only one human condition, Mr. Palmer, and that’s hypocrisy. Everyone, if they live long enough, will get there sooner or later. The task is to try to keep it to the past tense. I used to do this, I learned from it, and that is why I do not think you should do it. If you do it in the present tense, it makes you an ass.”

He figured he was in his mid-twenties when Ducky said that, and it makes a hell of a lot more sense now than it did then.

More importantly, after he’s done musing in that direction, is that, if he can’t do it sober, he probably shouldn’t be doing it at all.

Though, he’s not trying to force himself to touch Tim. He’s sure he can do that. Hell, he has done that. He’s trying to see if there’s a circumstance where he can like it.

He knows one circumstance where he likes it just fine. Wrap Breena around both of them, and he’ll happily fuck Tim, too.

Once he got into that, it felt wicked good. That was a whole lot of excellent things all happening at once and it felt amazing.

So… maybe if he’s just turned on and horny enough… Add, maybe, a glass or two of wine, or one of absinthe… just to bump him over the… jitters? Maybe… whatever it is.

Well, that shouldn’t be too damn hard to arrange, and no one’s going to even suggest putting him in jail for a marathon sex session with his loves.

“Director of Cybercrime Tim McGee, who would neither confirm nor deny being gay…” Abby puts her tablet down. It’s after dinner. Babies are in bed. They’re back at the McGee house. The three more agile members of her family team are on baby furniture assemblage. She’s reading to them, letting them know what’s hit the wire. “I suppose that’s one way to put it.”

Tim looks at his wife as he and Jimmy sit on the floor screwing together a dresser. “I told you that Ned outright laughed at me when I said I was straight, right?”

“Oh, yeah, and he told me about it later,” Abby adds.

“He had lunch with the two of us and Allan,” Jimmy adds. “Want to talk about a lot of whispers. We sat down in the canteen and every eye in the place was staring.”

“How much of that was Ned being there, and how much of that was you with Abby?” Breena asks. “I need another octagonal screw.” Tim hands one over. Right now, she’s putting together the toddler bed that Kelly will soon be using as they get ready to move her into her own bed, and Sean gets the crib.

“All of it was Abby and I,” Jimmy says.

Abby nods. “My lab guys keep their eyes glued to us whenever Jimmy or Tim is in the lab.”

“Waiting for the blow up?” Breena asks.

“Probably,” Jimmy says. “They seem almost disappointed that we’re so damn normal together. Same with when I’m with Tim. That gets a lot of stares and whispers, too.”

“Anything else?” Breena asks.

“Really snide comment at lunch today,” Jimmy replies.

“But not much beyond that. I mean…” Abby shrugs a bit. “We’re each the Boss of our own department. All they can do is whisper. Not like we depend on these people for a good annual review.”

“Be a hell of a different story if we were lower in the ranks,” Jimmy adds.

“I can see a lot of them think I’m a prime, grade-A asshole now,” Tim adds, and nods at Jimmy, too.

“Him, too. One thing to have a boyfriend. Another thing to be having an affair with a guy while your wife is pregnant. A few of the Minions are changing their hours all of a sudden. I’m assuming that’s so they don’t have to worry about possibly working with me in person.”

“How is that going?” Abby asks.

He shrugs a bit. “I’m really just supervising. I haven’t worked a real project since Monday morning, and I won’t get on another one until March at the earliest. Mostly, the ones who are in when I’m in, keep watching me when I’m in the office, especially if I’m talking to anyone, but it feels mostly curious. Brand, Howard, and Ngyn keep looking at me, looking away, and giggling. That’s… disconcerting.”

Abby giggles a bit at that, too. “That’s Brand having a crush on you, and not knowing what to do with it.”

Breena snorts a little, too. “Remember when she and… Howard, right?”

Tim nods.

“When they came here, they were whispering about you and Jimmy being hot. My guess is the idea of you two together just melted their collective brains, and giggling is the only way to deal with it.”

Tim sighs. “So, you’re saying this is a natural side effect of hiring an eighteen and twenty-three year old, and letting them work together with minimal adult supervision.”

The ladies nod.

“I thought Howard was the one keeping your office going while you’re out?” Jimmy says.

“I don’t care if she’s giggly as long as she can do the job. And she’s good. Ngyn’s the better programmer, more grown up, but she hates dealing with people. So between the two of them, I’ve got a second-in-command. Brand’s tagging along, being the genius wonder kid. It works. At the very least, they seem to know when to text me for help, and when not to.”
“Have they?” Breena asks.

“Nope.” Tim smiles. “So, beyond the fact that I won’t say if I’m gay or not, what does the Post have to say?”

Abby picks the tablet up again. Her eyes skim over the paragraphs. “Most of it is about NCIS’s new commitment to anti-hate crime policing. You’re going to start using data mining to look for problems?”

“If I ever get back into the office long enough to actually program something, again. Yeah. It won’t be too hard. I’ve got all the information. I just have to use it.”

“Why not put it on your job queue?” Breena asks, fitting another slat into the bottom of Kelly’s little girl sized bed.

Tim thinks about that. He’s got more than half a dozen guys who could do this, probably knock the programming out in less than two days, and once it’s done, he’ll need someone to monitor it, and use what it finds… Organize who to go after, how, and when.

And thinking through it, he knows why.

“I don’t have a big job anymore. I manage. But… there’s no huge case, not like there was.”

“And you want one?” Abby asks him, laying a hand on his shoulder.

“Yeah. If I was in the office fulltime right now, I’d be feeling like I’m drifting.” He shrugs at that.

“Feel like I’m drifting at the Commission, too.”

“Another stupidly boring day?” Jimmy asks.

Tim rolls his eyes. “Okay. I don’t hate the idea of all the anti-terror tech guys in one bundle, but… It’s a logistical nightmare. Say… I don’t know, you’re LA PD, scratch that, say you’re the New York City cops. You’ve got a case. It looks like it might be involved in some sort of terror thing. So, you head on over to your Terror Tech system, punch your information in, and see what pops up. That part I’m fine with. But then, once you’ve punched it in, you’ve got to keep using it to get more tech. So, you’ve got to go outside of your own organization for wiretaps, chatter, whatever. Meanwhile, our tech guys, they don’t ever set foot in the field. The closest any of us would get to laying eyes on the guys we’re trying to catch is a drone hovering overhead.” Tim rubs his eye. “It’s half clusterfuck and half better streamlining.”

“So, what would you like to see?” Jimmy asks, leaning across Tim to grab another drawer front.

“I like the idea of a fast, strong, good database that everyone can use. If I’ve got half the case in NCIS, and you’ve got another quarter in the FBI, and Bob’s got a clue in the Metro PD… even if we all want to talk to each other,” Abby snerks at that, “Yeah, I know. We’ll pretend right now that we’re not having any territorial pissing matches. Even if we all want to talk to each other, we might not know we need to.

“So, sure, something where everyone puts in prints, DNA, weapons, MOs, locations, all of it. And we do it for every crime. And they all update in as near of real time as possible. That would be great.”

“Every crime, you’re not just thinking terror, are you?” Breena asks.

“No. One thing I’m seeing that I’m liking is the idea of shelving the idea of geographical jurisdictions. Hopping from town to town or state to state shouldn’t be a way to avoid detection.”

“Same things aren’t illegal everywhere,” Jimmy adds.

“Then we can keep it to things that are illegal everywhere. There’s no state where murder’s legal, let alone kidnapping, rape, or theft. Just… Okay. I could see that. This huge database that you put everything in, and it spits everything back out again. Serial killers, if they’re smart enough to move from state to state, we almost never find them. Just stuff like that. And with terror cases… same basic idea. FBI’s got one set of wiretaps. CIA’s got another. Homeland’s got video surveillance. None of them know the other is on the job, and they never talk to each other. We can fix that, and I’d be happy to be part of fixing that.

“But sequestering us off from everyone else? That looks like a whole new way for us to get annoyed at each other and squabble over who gets what information.”

“So, what are you thinking?” Abby asks.

Tim licks his lips. “I don’t know if we’ve got the talent or will to even try to pull it off, but… One group. Crime, terror, anything illegal. It all goes into the system. Teams go into the system like they do with my triage system, by specialty. Every case a team takes, that updates their specialty list.

“Crime comes in. Whoever’s on the ground grabs it. They do whatever it is they can, fit the case for all the preliminary data. The best, closest, unoccupied team for the job gets it. They take over, and keep adding data to the case. If it moves out of their wheelhouse, they pass it on to the next best, unoccupied team. If it stays in their area, they finish it, and then off to court it goes.”

“Anyone else like that idea?” Breena asks.

“I haven’t floated it around, yet. Right now I’m listening and watching. Add in the kind of database work I’m talking about for NCIS, and we’ve have a great system to weed out incompetence and bias. Hell, we could put a time stamp on it, too. If evidence gets entered, like a rape kit or something, but the results don’t show up in the system by a certain time, we could flag that. Move the evidence to a less-slammed lab if there’s just too many cases in place A, or find the kind of people who just let evidence sit because they don’t want to deal with certain crimes, if not.”

Abby smiles softly at Tim. “You would have made a hell of an engineer, you know that, right?”

He glances up at her curiously, looking at the dresser that Jimmy’s doing most of the putting together on.

“No. You build systems, Tim. Here’s a problem. Here’s a huge, complicated, elegant system for fixing the problem.”

“Oh…” That makes a lot of sense, but he hasn’t thought about it that way. “Yeah, well, right now, this system’s just an idea. Building it would be… Anyway, anything else, in the Post?”

“They talk about Leon’s ‘If I have to entrap them, I will…’ bit, and then explain about the Admiral’s history…” Abby goes quiet. “Fucker,” slides out of her quiet and violent.

“More?” Breena asks.

“Twenty-two questionable cases under him that Burley found. Two sailors who went missing. Twenty more with hinky, unsolved, assaults. Some of them go back to when he was a Commander. Most of them passed the statute of limitations. Only things they have in common, him, believed to be or gay sailors, ‘everyone looked the other way,’ and no conclusive proof was ever found.”
Looks of disgust fill the room.

Abby starts skimming again. “Okay, after the background, they get into what Tim did, pretty non-detailed version, just that Leon had decided that Admiral McGee would be the perfect figurehead for what he’s trying to do, so he calls Tim in because he and The Admiral have ‘long term issues going back to Director McGee’s childhood’, they meet up at the Terror-In-Anti-Tech Commission, and after Tim ‘who would neither confirm nor deny being gay’ came out to him, he hit Tim. It wraps with John pleading guilty, and that he’s currently in Leavenworth, awaiting formal sentencing, though the maximum time he can do for assault and a hate crime is five years.”

“That’s it?” Jimmy asks.

“Yep. Maybe a thousand words, and if this was a literal paper, it’d probably be three or four pages in, below the fold. Next round of voting starts Tuesday, and that’s got all the top stories.”

“Good,” Tim says.

Later that night, as they’re laying out the towels on the bed (period sex with Breena means a bit of extra prep work) Jimmy explains his experiment plans, and then pulls out the big gun.

He’s not getting off. Not tonight, or tomorrow, and on Friday, assuming Tony and Ziva are free, they’re handing in one of their babysitting night coupons they got for Christmas, and going to town.

“I figure if I spend days fooling around with you guys, without getting off, come Friday I’ll be horny enough to kill any sort of social conditioning that might be damping down eroticism.”

Jimmy doesn’t miss the look Abby and Breena flash each other. He’s been married more than long enough to recognize husband is being silly. “Comments from the peanut gallery,” he says, dryly.

Breena looks at him, and then kisses him slow and soft. “You really gonna do this, make out for days, and not get off, at all?”

“That’s the plan.”

She shakes her head a bit. “Okay. Tim?”

“I’m game. I know I liked the last thing he was doing to me that I clearly remember, and apparently I liked last night, too. So, sure… Experiment, play, see how it goes. It doesn’t work, it doesn’t work. Other than him being frustrated, we haven’t lost anything by trying. If it does work, might try it myself.”

Abby’s been looking like she’s thinking of something. “Friday night is Shabbos. If we want Tony and Ziva to take the kids, we’re going to have to push this to Saturday. So, you want to fully play tonight, or be that more worked up when we get to date night?”

Jimmy groans. The whole time they’ve been talking, he’s had a naked Breena in his arms, rubbing against him in a very pleasant sort of way, and suddenly getting an extension is really appealing.

He bites his tongue. “They’re all yours, Tim. Tonight, I’m just fingers and tongue.”
Dad

On Thursday, Tim sits in his place at the Commission feeling fairly awake. He’s coming to the conclusion that there’s a very large difference between one cracked bone and twenty broken ones. He’s not feeling any desire to work out, but he’s aware of the fact that if he had to, he could. And that was not even remotely true for more than a month after getting home from the Stennis.

One cracked bone is not, really, that big of a deal. Especially if that crack is located in a bone that’s not designed to move.

His eyelid opens the whole way now, which is nice, and he’s down to Aleve for the pain.

All in all, he’s feeling pretty good.

And bored.

Today’s been the counter arguments for why one big Terror Tech unit is a bad plan. He’s made most of those arguments, though they’re whipping out some he considers bad ones, like the need to keep the CIA off of US soil and the FBI on it, and the like. He scoffs at that. Old thinking following old laws that might not even be legal.

Then there are the good ones. It’d be expensive as hell. He agrees. Doing this right would not mean nickel and diming it while the lowest bid contractor turns out the Obamacare website 2.0. This cannot spend years being “fixed,” and then still not work all that well when it’s “functional.” For this to have any shot of working, it needs to be built, from the ground up, with decent equipment, and designed by someone who really knows how to work a database. His people, by which he doesn’t mean his personal team, but real, hardcore data guys, who live and die by their ability to search out patterns, need to design this thing. And then it needs to be tested into the ground by Gibbs-type guys, people who hate computers and can kill them with a well-timed look.

When it can work with both groups, it’ll be done.

Given a real budget, he’d headhunt Google, and get them to design it. If it worked exactly like the Web, with each case being a “web page” and then had a google-esque search system… Even Gibbs can use the internet these days, and anyone who can’t, can’t be more than five years away from retirement. Gone by the time this thing would be really up and running.

But, the more he thinks about a system for this, for all crimes, the more he likes it. Run it like the web. Set it so that every bit is built together, at once, integrated. They already have AFIS, and bullet databases, and knives, and tires, and all the rest of it, but they were all designed hodge-podge with various levels of functionality.

AFIS… Abby’s a wizard with it, and it takes her an hour to get each set of prints in. He understands that on average, it takes two hours per set of prints. There’s got to be a way to speed it up, and…

Again, it takes Google less than a second to come up with 50,000 matches for an image search. It takes AFIS hours or days and sometimes weeks to come up with something. (Yes, he’s fully aware of how useful a Google image search would be for something like a fingerprint, so he gets that this is the basic template for an idea, not the final concept.)

That said, there’s got to be a way to speed this stuff up.

He’s writing out notes, ideas, and bits of code as he’s thinking of it. Delilah looks over at his notes, since today’s the first day he’s really writing them, and then she says, “That’s not what he’s talking about.”

“Nope.”

She reads over his shoulder. “I like that.”

“Me, too.”

“My group would kill for that kind of information all in one place. It’d make trend analysis so much easier.”

He nods. “Got an ex-NSA analyst on my team. She’d love something like this, too.”

“Yeah. You going to present it?”

“Nope. I’ll keep working on the idea. Need cost figures and a lot of other bits before setting this in front of someone else.”

Her eyes continue to scan his notes, and he turns his computer toward her so she can scroll up and down to keep reading. “You want help with that, holler. My team would like to be part of something like that.”

“I’ll keep working on it. I’ve got the Federal Cybercrime Initiative Commission next week. If it’s anything like this, I’ll have a week to just work on this.”

“I’m not going to be at that one. Back to Dubai on Monday, but keep me in the loop.”

“No problem.” Tim thinks for another moment. “You want to co-design? I’ll be on paternity leave for at least some of the next few months, and effectively useless at anything that involves heavy thinking.”

Delilah smiles. “Yeah. Get your stuff as done as you can, and kick it over to me. I’ll kick it back to you when I get a version done, and we’ll volley it around until it’s ready to see the wider world. Bounce it to some of the other minds we know.”

Tim nods at her with a smile, too. “Good.”

Jeannie Slater doesn’t usually spend too much time in the “working” part of Palmer and Slaters’. She’s the front of the house manager. During funerals, she holds hands, pats backs, makes sure tissues are readily available. She takes care of people, and makes sure everything goes smoothly. When there aren’t funerals going on, she’s in charge of the showroom and sales.

But, given the call she got last night from her brother-in-law, she’s heading down to the basement, where Ed and Breena do their work.

Breena is down there, carefully washing off Mr. Keller. (Ed’s off with the van, picking up a new client.)

“Hey, hon.”
“Mom! Hey.” Breena looks up at her, expression annoyed. “Did we get another delay on the Millennium X caskets? I’m tempted to just cut them off and look for a new supplier. Someone else has to make a decent gunmetal gray mid-range casket.”

“Nothing with them.” She’s not sure how to start this conversation. Breena looks very normal. She’s in her working scrubs and apron, hair tied back, gloves on, hosing down their client. Jeannie’s sure that if something bad was happening with Tim and Abby, Breena wouldn’t look this calm or composed. “Ummm…”

“Yeah?”

“Are Abby and Tim okay?”

“Sure, Mom… Oh, you read the Post, didn’t you?”

“Your Uncle Wes did, and he called, wanted to know the story.”

Breena shrugs a bit. “First off, yes, Abby and Tim are fine. Abby was there when it happened, knew it was going to happen, helped to plan it, and approved of it.”

That was really not anything Jeannie expected. She was hoping that Wes misread and it was another Tim McGee. “So… she knows that Tim’s… gay?”

Breena snorts, looking extremely amused at that idea. “Please! No, he’s not! You’ve met him, seen him with Abby. Does a gay guy act like that? Come on!” She shuts off the water, and gently pats the shoulder of their client. “That’s it for now, Mr. Keller. We’ll get you dressed in a minute.” Then she looks back to her Mom, face and voice more serious. “Do you remember in the late spring when Tim went off on that secret mission and got hit by a truck coming home?”

Jeannie nods. She’s not expecting that kind of response from Breena, and she’s starting to feel cold, because she does remember how badly hurt Tim was. “He didn’t get hit by a truck?”

“No. He got hit by The Admiral’s men, four of them. They locked him in a cell with them, and… You saw the results. John ordered it. We all knew that. Everyone knew it. But, no proof. He’s an Admiral, so it had to be ironclad, so they couldn’t make the case. The Admiral shows up again, and Tim made sure to get the proof, and neither he nor Abby cared much what he’d have to say to get the Admiral to swing at him. John’s the most homophobic man on the planet, so that’s what Tim used. It worked. John hit him. And he’s in jail now, and we’re all tickled pink about it.”

Jeannie blinks, shocked, and for a moment says nothing before, “Oh… I didn’t… I knew they didn’t get on, but…” comes out. She remembers Kelly’s christening, and feels even worse about asking Tim if he wanted his parents there.

Breena smiles a bit at her mom, having a good sense about what Jeannie’s thinking. “That’s all Tim wants or needs people to know. We get to be a bit less circumspect about what happened in June, now, but he’s pretty private; he’d prefer not to have that spread around.”

Jeannie nods. “I understand.” There’s still one question in her mind, a question that she feels a bit off about, but… She’s seen how well Tim and Jimmy get along, and between that and the article, she’s starting to wonder if they’re just friends. “Why wouldn’t he say, though?”

“Say what?”

“He refused to say he was straight.”
Breena rolls her eyes and shakes her head. “He tried, twice. People outright laughed at him and told him to get out of the closet.”

“Oh.”

Breena shrugs again. “You know the story, but if you didn’t, and you saw that headline, and then read the article, and then saw, ‘Director McGee, who is married with two children, and claims to be straight…’ you wouldn’t believe it either, right?”

Jeannie sighs. “No. That’s not… usually… the kind of thing someone would say unless they were.”

“Yes. Still, he and Abby thought a little scandal was worth getting the Admiral into prison, and Jimmy and I and the rest of the family are happy to support them in it.”

Jeannie smiles at her daughter. “Then we will, too.”

Now Breena looks serious. “Will Dad? I’d rather he wasn’t making snide comments about Tim being gay.”

“He’s your Dad. You know words come out before he can stop them, but, not like he cares much one way or another about gay or straight, and on top of that, it’s Tim. Be one thing if it was Jimmy, but Tim? He’s not nearly so concerned that Abby might have a gay husband than you might.”

“Neither of us have gay husbands.”

“Well… good.”

Breena smiles at her, and then turns to the shelf where the towels live. “Time to get Mr. Keller dried off. Got to get him ready for the evening showing.”

“Dressed, made-up, and waiting. Just got to get her rolled out for the 11:00 viewing.”

“Good.”

——

Tony gets a similar, if less delicately parsed call, later that afternoon. He’s been waiting for it since he saw the news conference with Tim and Leon. And… as he’s filling in one of his reports, his phone rings.

“Hey, Dad.”

“Tim’s gay? I thought I could always tell, but…”

“I see you picked up a newspaper.”

“Pah! Who does that? Irwin Northmanon, he runs the Omni, was telling me about the dust up. He recognized you, told me you busted the guy, an Admiral who took a shot at his kid when he came out to him. At a tech conference. That’s Tim and his father, right?”

“Yeah Dad.”

Tony can feel his dad shaking his head. “How did I miss that?”
“You didn’t. He’s not gay.”

“Junior…” There’s oodles of patronizing schmooze in those two syllables. “You don’t have to do that. I don’t judge. That’s part of the DiNozzo code. The more of them there are, the better for us.”

“He’s married, Dad.”

“Of course, most of them are.”

Two thoughts go springing into Tony’s head, the first one is that his father’s logic on ‘the more ladies for us’ and ‘most of them are married’ doesn’t match up, and ‘most’ is making him really wonder about his father’s friends.

“Is Abby okay? I know a really good divorce lawyer.”

Tony sighs again. “Abby’s fine. They aren’t getting divorced.”

“Now that’s just plain wrong! It’s one thing if you do that sort of thing on the sly, but once you’re out, you’re just wasting that woman’s time by staying married to her. Do I need to come over there and have a chat with Tim?”

The idea of Senior having a heart to heart with Tim about marriage pointers makes Tony shudder. “Dad, if Tim were fooling around with anyone, let alone a man, behind Abby’s back, do you really think Gibbs wouldn’t have already killed him so dead that all of his individual organs would no longer be in the same zip codes?”

Senior thinks about that for a moment. “You’ve got a point. So, he’s really not?”

Tony’s nodding against his phone. “Really not. Undercover op. He was the bait; Draga and I were waiting for John to move. Tim got him to strike, dropped him, and then we moved in for the arrest.”

“And he played the gay guy…” Tony can feel Senior’s smirk. “Better him than you. Let me guess, he had the skirt on, right?”

“And was working it.”

“Well, good for him, then!” There’s a long quiet, where Tony can feel Senior’s mood shift, where what actually happened hits him, and then Senior says, “There’s a reason why I’ve never met Admiral McGee, isn’t there?”

“Yeah, Dad. You’ve never seen him at a Christmas party or a wedding for a reason, and that reason’s not that he’s far away. Same with Tim’s mom.”

“Oh.” That ‘Oh’ says a lot.

“Yeah.”

There’s another quiet moment.

“Dad…”

“Junior?”

“I love you.”

Tony can feel his dad beaming on the other side of the phone. “Me, too. Junior. Me, too.”
“You coming to Shabbos tomorrow?”

“You coming to Shabbos tomorrow?"

“Can’t, we’re in Vegas. Got a lead that the Congress after the next one will be here, and I’m looking at real estate.”

“Happy hunting, Dad.”

“Thank, son.”

While it’s true that Fornell is “technically” retired, so far that hasn’t resulted in any real change, beyond what he wears to the office, in his daily schedule.

But as he folds up his copy of the Post, it occurs to him that he doesn’t actually have to go in at any given time, and if he feels like it, he can so see his friend, who is probably on the verge of doing something really stupid, and prevent said stupid thing from happening. (Or help with it in such a way as to make sure it doesn’t bite his friend in the butt.)

So, he kisses Wendy, and says, “Gonna see Jethro for a bit. Lunch together, then the office?”

She nods up at him. “Sounds good to me.”

It’s a bit past half an hour later, when he, gingerly, opens the door to Jethro’s place, hoping that Mona won’t tackle him, but she just trots up the stairs from the basement and gives him a quick hello bark followed by some nuzzling and petting.

“He’s down there?”

Mona doesn’t nod, but she does turn to lead him down.

He hears Gibbs doing something with a saw, and before he’s halfway down the stairs says, “So, you need some help hiding the body?”

Gibbs puts down his saw (he’s getting slats cuts for Dave’s crib) takes off his safety glasses and looks up at Fornell. He’s looking frustrated.

Fornell looks back. “Okay, yeah, I know.” He finishes the walk down the steps and rests a hand on Jethro’s shoulder. “I know how much you love both of them. He’s your boy, and she’s your girl. Can’t imagine how much this sucks. Between the two of us, we’ve got to know a few good divorce lawyers. Try to get them split amicably.”

Gibbs shakes his head. He knows that Fornell isn’t on the list of guys who gets to know the full McPalmer story, but he figures Tim’ll forgive him spreading around why the Admiral was on his shit list.

Jethro’s only got one cup of coffee down with him right now, so he leads Fornell back up, to get him a cup, too.

“How bad is this?” Fornell’s asking. Jethro has a lot of flavors of quiet, but this one feels weird. Like he’s debating something.

Gibbs pours a cup for Tobias. “No one’s getting divorced. Just like the paper said, it was a sting.
They’re wrong about why it was a sting, but… Tim and Abby are fine.”

Tobias knows Jethro way too well to say, “You sure?” so instead he says, “What’s the sting?”

And over two cups of coffee, Jethro tells him.

Fornell listens, nods, listens some more, nods a few more times, and when Jethro’s done, says, “How was he even alive to get to this thing?”

Jethro’s eyes makes is clear that if it had just been up to him, John wouldn’t have made it to the Stennis test, let alone the Commission. “Tim said no. And Penny isn’t happy with John, but that doesn’t mean she wants him dead. Too many people to answer to.”

“You think Jarvis is still on it?”

Jethro taps his fingers against his cup. “Last I heard, Tim had told Jarvis not to go after him.”

Fornell shakes his head. “Look. I worked the Mafia for more than twenty-years. You want a guy who even I couldn’t catch; I know how to set it up.”

That startles Gibbs. “If you know how to set it up, why couldn’t you catch him?”

“Because I could never go from the set up to the guy doing the job. Set it up. That part I’ve got tracked fine. Person dies. Even in protective custody, the person dies. Got that. How? Usually could get that pinned down, too. Who did it? Twenty years, never got him. I’ve got open warrants for a John Doe with a certain set of finger prints and DNA, and that’s it.”

Jethro shrugs. He’s got unsolved cases like that, too. Some guys just are too damn good at this stuff.

“So, now what?” Tobias asks.

“Jail. Haven’t heard the sentence yet, but at least a few years.”

“Something bad going to happen to him there?” Fornell asks.

Jethro’s sure it could be arranged, but he hasn’t done anything about it. Mostly because he agrees with Jimmy’s assessment of exactly how much fun John would have in prison. “Why, you know a guy?”

“Not in Leavenworth, I don’t, but you do, right?”

Gibbs thinks for a second. “Three or four, probably. Not going to happen.”

“Sounds like a waste of opportunity.”

Jethro shrugs at that, too. “I never gave a second’s thought to Hernandez’s family. That he might even have one. Don’t have that luxury here. I eat dinner with his Mom every week, Tobias, and she’s a strong woman, but… Even in this case, she doesn’t want to bury another son. I don’t blame her.”

Fornell sighs. “It’s easier to just see them as scumbags, not people with lives and families and all the rest of it.”

Jethro nods. Then he puts down his coffee cup and says, “Shouldn’t you be at work?”

Fornell shrugs this time. “What are they going to do, fire me?”
It’s after Fornell heads off to work that a thought hits Jethro. He has a wedding to… okay, maybe not plan per se, but participate in, and if they’re doing this somewhat “fancy” wedding thing, he’ll be expected to develop a “Best Man” for this thing.

And five potential guys to pick from.

Okay, two really. He knows that none of the ‘boys’ will be bothered if they don’t get picked. He assumes none of them expect to do anything other than show up, or maybe groomsman duty.

Fornell or Ducky…

There’s a headache. He doesn’t think either of them would hold it against him if he picks the other one, but…

But they’re different aspects of his life, different sides to be honored. The older, cooler, wiser head that’s been able to provide council and solace, or the buddy in the trenches, the man who’s been there, done that, lifted the same weights and lived the same (mostly) pains.

Five years ago, this would be easy. And not just because it wouldn’t be an issue because there was no shot of him getting married. Just, five years ago, Ducky, hands down. But, like with the rest of his loves, he and Fornell have drawn closer, too.

He supposes Ducky would do a better job, and feel more comfortable with the Best Man’s speech. Fornell would probably do a better job with the bachelor party.

Then he smiles a bit, imagining what Mike Franks would have done with both.

Don’t need to imagine, Probie, you’ve seen me run that play.

Gibbs smiles. Like always, the voice comes to him from behind. But he turns, looks, and sees Mike. “Yeah, Mike, I did. But I don’t remember half of it.”

Sign of a good bachelor party. He can see Mike looking around his new living room, signs of Abbi all over. He appears to approve of the room, and then plops himself onto one of the chairs, looks at Gibbs and shakes his head. Probably a good thing I’m not here for this. Not sure what the hell I’d do with you and your troop of Boy Scouts. You’d all want to be home by ten, no hangover, and no naked women.

“Hazard of actually being in love.”

Mike laughs at that, fading away.

Friday is less productive than Tim would have liked. He was hoping to sit next to Delilah, open up his laptop, and between the two of them, quietly sketch out what CrimeWeb should look like.

Turns out the Commission had other ideas. They’re, once again, set loose on each other to mingle, chat, and develop ideas.

It’s six hours of small talk.

Tech small talk, so it’s not nearly as painful as it could be, and some of these guys have decent ideas, but by the end of it, he’s more than ready to go home.

He’s had enough of plastic smiles, of guys who shift away from a group when he joins them, of people who change the topic when he gets nearby. He knows some of that is because of the Admiral, and for the Admiral part of it, about half is uncomfortable at the gay aspect, and half of it is that he’s the kind of guy who’d take his own father down in a sting. Add in he’s NCIS, and the guy who broke the election buying ring, so presumably he’s some sort of hyper-vigilant white-knight on the lookout for tom-foolery, or something, and that makes people nervous.

Some of it’s just plain old, our team’s gonna do our thing and we don’t want anyone poaching.

Hell, he’s doing a version of that. It’s not that he’s unwilling to share his ideas, it’s that he’d like to have them rounded out before he sets them loose. He doesn’t (usually) let people read his stories while they’re in the rough draft stage for that reason, too.

But, enough of the people at this thing are playing their cards close to the vest, that he’s getting annoyed.

Thus, it is with a spring in his step, and glee in his heart, that he’s able to shake the dust of the Tech-In-Anti-Terror Commission free of his shoes, and head out of the Omni, back to his home, pick up everyone’s stuff, as well as Kelly, swing by Molly and Anna’s daycare, grab them, and then back to NCIS to get Jimmy and Abby.

It’s Friday night, and they’re going home, for Shabbos.

“You ready?” Jimmy asks Abby, as their day comes to a close.

She’s looking pretty tired. “Yes! Got one last set of test shots. You want to wait, or head up.”

Jimmy settles in to lean against her desk. “You’re talking about, what, fifteen minutes?”

“Ten. I’ve got the paperwork done, just got to fire, fish out the bullets, and scan ‘em.”

Jimmy grabs his phone. “Got an article on islet cell transplants I’ve been waiting to read, I’m good.”

Abby nods, and waddles off to ballistics. Jimmy sits back and opens the article. He’s about two minutes into it when Zelaz rolls a collection of new evidence into the lab and sees him at Abby’s desk, looking fairly relaxed, eyes skimming over his phone.

Zelaz also doesn’t see Abby.

He steps away from the evidence, stalks over to Jimmy, and demands, “What the hell are you doing?”

Jimmy jerks when he hears the voice and then sees Zelaz looming over him, trying to look… intimidating or something. It’s not doing anything for Jimmy, other than annoying him.
“Reading up on islet cell transplantation and thinking about if that’s something I need to talk to my endocrinologist about.”

They both hear the bullet fire.

“That’s not… What are you doing down here? What are you doing with Abby? That’s one of the sweetest human beings on earth and you’re… you’re… What the hell are you DOING?”

“I’m waiting for her to get done with her shift. Then I’m going to grab her purse so she doesn’t have to carry it. I’m going to walk with her to Tim’s car. Then, all three of us, and our kids will drive to the home our family shares and celebrate the Sabbath together. My wife, the DiNozzos, Dr. Mallard and his wife, Gibbs and Abbi will meet us there. That’s my plan for the next hour or so, after that, there’ll be praying, singing, eating, talking about the week. Then we’ll put the babies to bed. We got a new video game for Christmas, so Tim, Tony, and I may spend an hour or two playing it together. In other words, I’m getting ready for a quiet Friday at home with my family. What are you doing?”

Zelaz shakes his head, metaphorical steam coming out of his ears at the way Jimmy’s dealing with this.

“Roger, have you ever heard Abby try to tell a lie?”

Zelaz flashes Jimmy a very annoyed look. “Yeah, she’s terrible at it.”

Jimmy nods. “You think she’d be any better at it if it was non-verbal? Or you think, like with everything else, she’d wear it on her face and sleeve?”

“Yeah.”

“So, she’s cool with me, isn’t she?”

Zelaz looks really annoyed by that, too. “She shouldn’t be! You’re… you and Tim…” He can’t finish the sentence and just glares.

“Are having an affair? That’s the rumor, right?”

Zelaz nods, still glaring, hand fisting.

Jimmy pulls up the calm he tries to hold when he’s practicing yoga. This is going to get messier if he gives into wanting to slap this twit. “You really think a forensic scientist of Abby’s caliber would miss an affair right under her nose? I mean, yeah, Tim and I are bright, but… we’re humans. Sex is messy. It leaves trace evidence. You think she wouldn’t notice a stray hair, or smell something off, find semen in a place it doesn’t belong, something along those lines? Or are the two of us such incredible sexual masterminds that we manage to all work in the same building, spend our weekends together, go on vacation together, all of it with Abby nearby, and never, ever leave a single trace of the torrid affair we’re having?”

Abby steps out of ballistics. Jimmy can see her, but Zelaz’s back is to her.

“Come on, think it through. Stop being pissed and think. You’re a guy. You’ve had sex. You know how it works. So, when, in our copious spare time, do Tim and I have the time, and place, to go and do this without her knowing? Before I got married, I had an affair at work, and everyone found out. You can’t do stuff like that without leaving at least some marks.

“So, how do you think it works? We do it in her bed, and she doesn’t notice? Seedy hotels? I get out of the office a lot, so yeah, I could be ‘getting a body’ and… wait… What’d I do with Dr. Allan? I stop off at a no-tell motel and tell him to wait in the van? And, wait, I’m off getting that body, and Tim’s in his office all the time… Hmmm… Nope. Oh, wait, Tim’s got an office, maybe we go in there and close the blinds and… oh right, we’re guys, semen has a scent, sex has a scent…

“Maybe we wait until it’s after hours. Tim’s office still doesn’t work; he’s got guys down there twenty-four seven. Maybe they don’t notice him wandering off for a quickie. Morgue is empty then. Just the two of us and corpses. Nothing hotter than dead bodies all over the place. Come on! THINK, Zelaz. Stop being pissed and think. If she’s still cool with us, it’s because, unlike you, she lives with us, sees us all the time, and knows the real story. So, you don’t trust me, fine, but trust her. She is not stupid, not blind, and neither Tim, nor I are good enough liars to manage to run an affair behind the back of a woman we spend 85% of our waking time in the same building with.”

Zelaz stops glaring. Then he turns and sees Abby watching them. “They’re really okay?”

“Like I said before, yes. We’re all fine. Settling in and getting ready for little boy to join the show.”

“I’ve seen his hair on Tim’s shirt before.” Like Abby, Zelaz is one hell of a forensic scientist, and he knows he’s seen things between Jimmy and Tim that do not match them just being good buddies.

“We’re friends! We hug. God, you’ve seen Abby’s hair on my clothing for the same reason. Hell, you’ve had Abby’s hair on your clothing for the same reason!” Jimmy’s not having an easy time holding his cool, not anymore.

Zelaz is pretty much ignoring Jimmy at this point. Abby looks at Jimmy. “He’s right, Roger. I’ve never seen a hair or the wrong sort of hair, in a place I didn’t expect it. I don’t find Jimmy’s cologne on Tim’s clothing when it shouldn’t be there, or vice versa. The only place they could be doing it and leaving no trace at all is in the shower, and like with most people, Tim showers in our home, where I tend to be. You think Jimmy can get into the shower with Tim and I wouldn’t notice?”

Given the look on Zelaz’s face, that’s exactly what he thinks. “You don’t go to their fight club thing.”

Abby’s giving him the Oh, come on, now, look.

“His wife doesn’t, either.”

Jimmy’s eyes are about to roll out of his head as Zelaz says that. “Fucking in the locker room… Is the rumor that Tony and Gibbs are in on it, too? How about my maybe brother-in-law Collin? He fights with us, too. Ziva and Abbi? Or just us guys because we use the same locker room? This some sort of twisted family initiation ceremony? We get all hot and sweaty in the ring and then, what… help each other work out the kinks after? Rub out all those sore muscles. God, man, get a subscription to Porn Hub and do your stuff there, stop jerking it to my sex life.”

Zelaz goes white and then storms out.

“Elegantly handled,” Abby says dryly.

Jimmy grits his teeth. He stands up and steps closer. She hugs him, head resting on his shoulder. “That experiment of yours is putting an edge on you, isn’t it?”

Jimmy nods, and kisses her forehead. He’s still playing with them hard at night, but hasn’t gotten off in a few days, and everything that annoys him really annoys him today. “Come on, let’s get out of here before I bite someone’s head off.”

Abby nods, lets go of him, and they head off in search of her coat, and purse, which Jimmy does
They can see Tim’s car. It’s maybe twenty-five feet away. And then, Jimmy’s phone buzzes. “Shit!” He’s got a set buzz for Dispatch. He’s got a body.

Abby takes her purse from him, kisses him on the cheek, and hands him the keys to her car. (The ride they took in this morning.) “Get home when you can.”

He nods. “Give ’em my apologies.”

She squeezes his hands one last time, and turns to waddle toward the car on her own. Behind her, Jimmy answers his phone, “Palmer…"

Tim sees that Jimmy’s not coming along, so he hops out to open the door for Abby, and to give Jimmy a quick hug. Jimmy flashes him a fast smile, and then turns to head back into the building. Tim goes back to Abby, closing the door behind her, and slipping into the driver’s seat.

“We ready to go?”

She nods.

The first part of the drive is just talking about their days. Easy enough. His was less vexatious than the last ten minutes of hers, and she’s not exactly looking pleased with him when he’s grinning widely at what Jimmy said to Zelaz, but she understands that not smacking a bunch of twits is a bit more wearisome on Tim and Jimmy than it is on her.

After that, he says, “When Gibbs came after I took down the Admiral, I called him Dad a few times, right?”

“Yes. He really liked it.”

“It was cool? Not stepping on Kelly’s memory, or anything like that?”

She shakes her head. “No. You lit him up like a Christmas tree with that. It was linked to good memories, not bad ones.”

Tim thinks about that.

Abby adds, “I told him that if he told you how much it mattered to him, you’d probably be willing to do it sober.”

Tim doesn’t remember that. “What’d he say?”

“That he could wait for you to come up with it on your own, sober. You thinking about going in that direction?”

“Yeah. I kind of remember feeling… just feeling really warm and happy with it, and feeling like he was, too.”

“Oh, he was.”
Tim nods. “Been a long time since I had a Dad.”

“Baby, I don’t know if you ever did.”

Tim inclines his head at that.

They aren’t the first ones in, or the last ones, either.

Ducky and Penny’s new Tesla is sitting close to the house, plugged in, charging. Tim’s thinking they’re awfully brave to take the trip from DC to NY with that, because that’s got to be as far as it can possibly go on one charge. But he’s looking forward to the conversation on how they ended up with it. Ducky’s Morgan didn’t make it through the riots, and Penny’s Beetle, which they had driven to the Navy Yard, was used as part of the perimeter defenses, and didn’t make it through that.

Listening to the two of them argue about what sort of car to get to replace their previous vehicles, something that fit with both senses of style, history, labor practices, and environmental standards, had been awfully amusing.

He’s pleased to see they’ve found a compromise vehicle, and wonders if they’ll let him test drive it.

Ziva’s Mini is also in the driveway. He knows she cut out from CGIS early to get the cooking started, and depending on how today went, she may have picked Tony up and brought him along, or he might be making his way home from the Navy Yard on his own.

They park, and he gets the door for Abby, before they both go about getting little girls unhooked from various seats. Molly hops out of the car, and runs to the door, but between mittens and the fact that it’s too tall, she can’t open it on her own. “Knock, honey!” Abby yells to her as she’s unhooking Kelly.

Molly whacks the door a few times, but again, between mittens and being less than three years old, she’s not making much noise.

Tim’s got Anna and one of the bags, so his hands are full, but when he kicks the door a few times, “Like this, loud!” Ziva hears him and gets the door.

“Hello!” Molly gets picked up and given a big hug and kiss. Anna and Tim get kisses, too, as they head in.

“Can I give them to you?” He’s already looking back, watching Abby carrying Kelly, looking a bit nervous at the not nearly as well salted or sanded path between the car and the door as he’d like it to be for his pregnant wife and baby girl.

“I’ve got them.”

Tim hands over Anna and hurries back to Abby, and in what he considers a sign of extreme pregnancy, she’s not bugged by him taking Kelly and hovering nearby as she waddles across the snowy drive and path to the front door. Actually, lately she hasn’t been bugged at all by him and Jimmy staying close, and if there’s any sign of being ready to pop, he thinks tolerance of overprotective hovering daddies is it.
They get settled in, putting the baby gates on the stairs and letting little girls wander around, getting the lay of the land again. They seem slightly confused because the Christmas tree and decorations are gone.

Abby finds a comfortable bit of sofa and lands on it, talking with Ducky, while they keep eyes on the girls.

Tim heads to their room, to get the bags stowed, and Penny follows him.

They said hello and hugged when he came in, but he can feel the tension on her, and hugs her again. “Hey.”

She nods, looking sad, and very gently touches the fading green-purple bruises around his eye. “Hey, back. You okay?”

He nods, feeling how thin she is in his arms. “Yeah. I am. I really am. I… needed that. You?”

She sighs. “I’ve been better. I’m glad you… plural, all of you, didn’t kill him. That was a kindness, but…” Her fingers hover over the bruise again. “Don’t like seeing that. Don’t like…” she shakes her head and rubs her lips together, not voicing the ideas. He hugs her a bit tighter.

“I know… Well, I don’t, not really, but… It doesn’t have to be said.”

She presses her face against his shoulder.

He can feel her shaking, and he kisses the top of her head.

“I spend so much time wondering why.”

He nods.

“We didn’t raise him to be like that. He didn’t grow up in a broken home full of hate. Even after we lost James… He was already on his own then, but… What could we have done differently?”

“It’s been fifteen years since I got into this, and… Some people just are that way. That’s the best I’ve got. Anything else, it’ll just torture you. He is who he is. He’s got blue eyes and a nasty temper and a rat’s nest of a mind and that’s just it. It’s not your fault, not Grandpa’s, or Uncle James or any of it. It’s just who he is.”

Penny’s eyes are so tired as she says, “I don’t know if I can accept that. If that’s true, then some people are hopeless or helpless.”

Tim shrugs. “Some are. I don’t like that, but… That’s how it works out. Some people just aren’t right. And, I’d rather that be true than spend a second thinking this is on you or Grandpa or the Navy or any of it. Four sons, all raised in the same house with the same parents, all four went to the same schools and then university, all four picked the same career, and only one of them turned into… him.” Tim shakes his head. “It’s not you. It’s him.”

She hugs him a little tighter back.

“I don’t blame you for any of this.”
She sighs again.

“Penny…”

“Yeah?”

“Would it bug you if I started calling Gibbs, Dad?”

She hugs him a little tighter again and then pulls back to look him in the eye. Again she barely touches the bruises, and he realizes, a second later, she’s laying a finger gently on the scar that goes through his eyebrow. “Oh, honey, not at all. You call him whatever you want, and,” she’s looking at the bruises, “you don’t ever have to be kind or respectful or… anything… about anyone who does something like that to you. Not for me.”

Tim smiles at her, and nods.

Penny moves back, and leans against the dresser as Tim heads to the closet to grab clean sheets for the bed. “So, tell me about this week. How’s ‘coming out’ been treating you?”

Tim sighs long and loud. “Dornie flat out laughed at me when I told him I was straight. Okay, maybe I’m not the poster boy for butch, but between the wife and kids, I didn’t think I was that swishy,” he says it with a little smile, and Penny does manage a quick laugh.

Once he’s got the bedroom set up for them (clothing put away, sheets on the bed, cribs set up), and Penny up to date, as well as hearing about her week, (DC is on the fast track for statehood, all of the new Senate and Congress is due in next week), they both head out and find that Tony’s joined the crew.

They share hellos, and Tim heads over to see what he can do to be useful to them as they work on getting dinner set.

“Good day?” he asks as Ziva points him toward a knife and salad veggies.

“Slow. I interviewed eleven people this week as potential agents.”

“Any good ones?”

She smiles. “Tony has already asked me that. He’s got to start looking for a third partner at some point.”

“Third? Does that mean we know Draga’s staying?” Tim asks Tony.

Tony smiles. “He got word yesterday. Same deal he had before. Two weekends a month, and two full weeks a year. Kevin’s in school now, so Draga’s got one week of Christmas break and one in the summer break.”

Tim sighs. “Good. I know he’d like more, but…”

Ziva nods. “Yes, he would, but realistically, this is what he can do right now. He’s not home often and reliably enough to be a single parent of a small child.”
“So, a third?” Tim asks Tony as Tony stirs the spaghetti sauce. (Easy Shabbos this week, pasta, garlic bread, lots of salad, cheesecake and cannoli for dessert. Someone stopped by his favorite Italian bakery on the way out here and made sure they were swimming in Milchig desserts, which meant a vegetarian dinner. Fortunately, someone else, who’d had a long day interviewing people, was very happy with the idea of put pasta in water and mix up an easy tomato sauce as a dinner option.)

Tony nods, ripping up lettuce. “Got the pile of resumes. Think you can spend a week moonlighting at your old job, weed through them while Draga and I go out and bust guys?”

“I think Abbi will be okay with that.”

“Jimmy got a call out right while we were leaving. You know anything about that?” Tim asks.

“I’m on call. Dornie’s got an active murder… So… They didn’t call Draga and I, which means it is part of Dornie’s case.”

Abby hears that from her place on the sofa. “Oh… I wonder if they found the wife.”

“The wife?” Ducky asks.

“It’s a pretty twisted case so far,” Abby says, and gets them up to date on Dornie’s case.

Breena makes it in just as Abby’s saying, “So, Jimmy got us the excised tissue, and we tested it, looking for trace alcohol…”

She hangs up her coat, shaking her head, walking to the sofa to kiss her wife before saying, “Home sweet home, good food, happy people, and grizzly murder details!”

“Mama!” Molly notices that her mama has just joined the party, and runs over for hugs, which she gets. Anna starts to crawl over, too. Kelly looks up from the blocks and decides that Aunt Breena’s not that big of a deal, not when she’s suddenly got Ducky all to herself, and stays put.

“Okay, that’s one, two, and three,” Breena says after getting a kiss and a long, snuggly, whole body draped over her shoulder hug from Anna, “where are four, five, and six?”

Tim steps out of the kitchen, Tony and Ziva behind him, and picks up Kelly on the way. He kisses Breena, and Kelly gives her a hug. “I guess we’re four and five.”

“One!” Kelly’s not real up to date on a lot of things, but she knows she’s one-year-old.

“Okay, we’re one and five.” She’s also fussing to be let down to go back to playing with Ducky, so Tim does, and back she goes. No one makes a better giraffe noise than Ducky.

“And number six?”

“Six got called back just as we were leaving the building,” Abby says, and Tim kisses her again.

“From Jimmy, along with his regrets.”

Breena sighs, looking a bit annoyed. Tim nods at her, and Abby does, too. “How long ago?” she asks.

“Almost two hours. He should be on the road, maybe at the scene by now. We should get the call soon.”

When Jimmy gets called off during what should be their family time, he gives them an update as to when he’ll be able to join them. “Good.” Breena eyes the sky, and their clock. “Sunset soon. We just waiting on Gibbs and Abbi?”

“Yes,” Ziva says. “The water is boiling, all we need to do is pop the spaghetti in, and we’re ready to go.”

The candle lighting is supposed to start right at sunset. That’s when Shabbos begins.

And Gibbs and Abbi and Mona make it by about a minute under the deadline.

“Traffic got crazy on 395,” Abbi says as they step into the warmth of the house, while everyone else is gathering around the table.

They don’t even get their coats off, just head straight for the table and the beginning of the night. Tim pats the chairs next to him, and Gibbs and Abbi draw close. He hugs both of them, and says, “Hi, Dad,” as Ziva lights the first match.

He smiles as he sees Gibbs light up at that, and hug him a bit tighter in return. “Hey,” he gets a quick kiss on the forehead, and then they turn back toward the table, where Ziva touches the match to the first of the candles, beginning the blessing, and the start of their holy time, together, as a family.

Traditionally, at least in the home Ziva grew up in, adult parents did not bless adult children during the blessing of the children. She knows some families do it, but hers didn’t.

And, over the years they’ve been doing this, they’ve been playing from Ziva’s Shabbos playbook, because she’s the one who “knows” how it’s supposed to work.

It’s true that Senior doesn’t bless Tony when he’s been there for Shabbos, but it’s not his tradition. Not in any meaningful way. It’s something he does, when he’s in town, that makes his son happy.

It’s also true, that with the exception of Tony and Senior, they have no direct parent-child links with adult children.

But that doesn’t even register as they get to the part where Tim, Abby, and Breena all offer blessings for their children, and then Gibbs, jumping up as Tim sits down, stuttering a bit over some of the words, places his hands on Tim’s head and does it for Tim. He never thought he’d be in a position to say the words, so he’s working off of a half-remembered litany of syllables in a language he doesn’t speak, but he doesn’t care, because this feels good.

Feels right. He’s almost stupidly happy as he gets to do this. Tim’s looking up at him, surprise fading to so very pleased. Halfway through, he gently squeezes Gibbs wrist, and nods at him, huge smile on his face.

Ziva smiles a bit as he does it, and Tony giggles a little. Gibbs is about to offer some headslaps, but he sees it’s not about him doing it, or about him killing the Hebrew, it’s about something else. When he’s done he glares a little at them, and then says, “What?”

Tony smiles brightly at him. He’s happy for them, but amused, too. No real edges to this, but it is funny in his mind. “There’s a blessing for girls and another one for boys. You just told Tim that you wish the Lord would make him like Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, and Leah.”

That does get a bit of amused laughing.

Tim shrugs at that when he’s done chuckling. “I’m good with it. They were cool ladies. What’s the one for boys? We’re going to need it soon.”

It’s been a very long time since Ziva’s heard the one for boys, but she still remembers her Abba’s hands on Ari’s head. “Y’simcha Elohim k’Efrayim v’che-Menasheh. May God make you like Ephraim and Menasheh. The rest is the same.”

“Who were they?” Tim asks.

Ziva’s even rustier on that story, but between her and Ducky, they know.

She who cooks, does not clean up. That’s rule number… 24… That’s one that doesn’t have a rule as best as Ziva can remember.

So, she is not on cleanup duty. She’s on sitting on her tush, sipping a cup of tea, relaxing while everyone else cleans up or puts babies to bed.

Which suits her just fine. She wants a bit of thinking time.

She saw the way Gibbs and Tim clicked on the Dad thing. She watched Gibbs glow as he blessed Tim, saw Tim bask in a moment of unconditional parental love. And she feels a pull to that, too. Her relationship with her father is more complicated than Tim with his, but the want is still there.

She has an Abba, with all the complicated baggage that goes with that. Unlike Tim, she’s not looking to erase that, or minimize, or even replace it, she just wants something to compliment it. Wants a new relationship to go with the new life.

Her new life, the new life of her baby.

She wants a Dad, wants a ‘Pop’ for the child growing inside of her. Maybe she doesn’t need it, not the way Tim does, but she wants it, and she’s pretty sure that Gibbs does, too.

She levers herself out of the chair, and steps into the kitchen, where Abbi’s rinsing dishes and Gibbs is sticking them into the dishwasher.

“Dad?” she tries it, and it feels… odd, very American, a short, curt sound, tripping off her tongue, but very good, very right, too. After all, Gibbs is all of those things, short, curt, and very American.

Gibbs glances to her, sees she’s being real about it. Not the occasional half-joke way Tony or Jimmy use it when they say it, and again, he lights up at it.

Both of his lost kids… his kids.

He grins, eyes warm and bright, and maybe a little more watery than usually, though she wouldn’t say he’s crying. He steps closer to her, wrapping arms around him, and kisses her. “Next week, I’ll get you, too. And, I’ll get ‘em right.”

Ziva nods, holding tight onto him. “Just doing it’s enough.”
12:42. Jimmy opens the door to their room quietly, and exactly like he expects, no one moves.

Three sleepy, warm lumps under the blankets. Two of them are spooned together on the left of the bed, one’s in the middle, waiting for him.

He’s tired and annoyed, he’s got to go back in the morning. His whole evening was driving out again, getting the body, securing it, and driving back again. It was almost midnight when they got back, and he called time.

Autopsy tomorrow morning.

As he quietly walks past the sleeping people to their bathroom, he’s hoping date night doesn’t have to be rescheduled.

And if it does… He’s not proud of this, but he’s keyed up enough that if it looks like he’s not getting laid tomorrow night, he’s taking care of himself in the men’s room, and that’ll be that.

Sleep, well, bedtime, is gentle torture.

There are these beautiful people in his bed. Soft, warm, sexy people. Naked, soft, warm, sexy people. And he’s crawling the walls horny.

Yes, that was intentional on his part, and he thinks that if he does get to go out on tomorrow’s date night, it’ll work splendidly for his plan of enjoying sex with Tim, but right now…

He’s gritting his teeth as he eases into bed, and Breena, who even in her sleep looks for him, immediately scoots over to snuggle him.

She feels so good. Like always, he’s on his back, and she’s on her side, lips against his shoulder, arm across his chest, leg draped over his hip and leg.

He kisses her forehead and scoots a little closer into her. She sighs a bit and rubs against him. He’s extremely aware of her breasts against his arm, and her leg less than an inch from his dick. He can feel the heat, the subtle brush of her leg against the hairs on his testicle making him harden, and if he just rocked a bit, he could be rubbing against her.

Jimmy mentally groans, and makes himself stop thinking about that. He’s got to get up and go back to work again tomorrow, so he has to sleep.

If there’s anything a medical residency is good for, it’s making sure you learn to fall asleep fast and hard. If you can’t master the art of sleeping 55 minutes of the one hour long nap you get on a thirty hour shift, you’ll die.

It took him a few weeks, but Jimmy got it down.
And that’s the only reason he falls sleep that night.

Morning is worse. At least at night, he was tired.

Now he’s fairly rested, with a warm girl on both sides, and his dick basically couldn’t get any harder if it tried.

Okay, it could. Someone could be touching it, and that would do very good things for him. But they aren’t.

He could roll onto his side, and… Breena’s not in position for it, but Abby’s back is along his side, so if he were to roll over he could be rubbing up against her. Soft, full bottom right against his dick… Maybe, if she just shifted a little bit he could...

He feels Tim poke him gently. “Get up before you lose your resolve.”

Jimmy rubs his eyes and sees Tim leaning over him and the girls. “Come on. I’ve got the babies up. Dealing with them’ll put a damper on it.”

Jimmy eases his way out of bed, leaving the two sleeping women, and pulls on some soft jogging pants, a sweater, and his glasses. He’s about to step out of their wing and head for the kitchen to get some breakfast when he realizes that he’s not at home, and if he goes walking around here with his dick leading the way, he’ll horrify half of this crowd and cause the rest to break into hysterical giggles.

Tim knows what the problem is and nods. “Keep eyes on them, I’ll get us food and Cheerios for them. You working today?”

Jimmy glares at that. “Yeah. How early is it?”

“A minute after seven.”

“Just enough time to eat, dress, and then back on the road.”

“Sorry.”

Jimmy’s eyes roll again, and he starts to take a step toward the girls. Tim takes his hand just as he’s stepping away, and pulls him close for a good morning kiss. And it’s a pretty good morning kiss. Firm, nice glide, just wet enough, little prickly, neither of them have shaved since yesterday morning. This is working pretty well for Jimmy, and he’s leaning into Tim, kissing back, and starting to rub against him when Tim steps back.

Tim doesn’t normally kiss him good morning, let alone kiss him, so Jimmy gives him a curious (and slightly disappointed, he wanted to keep kissing) look when he pulls back, and Tim shrugs. “Getting into the spirit of it, right?”

Jimmy nods. “Sure. Hell, at this point, I’m so horny, you can do whatever you want, as long as I get to get off!”

Tim laughs. “Not for a while, yet. Our wives would pout if they missed it, and I’m not about to wake either of them up early on their day to sleep in.”
That has more than enough truth to it, so Jimmy heads off to the babies, who are on the floor, playing with their toys.

Two cups of coffee, a small handful of almonds, eggs, three bowls of Cheerios. Not too hard to make. Even before he got into cooking, this was the sort of meal Tim could handle.

Biggest issue is remembering which cup has the decaf with milk and one sugar and which one has full strength with cream and one Splenda. They both taste awfully similar and look freaking identical.

Tim’s thinking, idly, about how the first of the: we’re actually living here, we’ve got to switch things up modifications the house needs is coffee mugs that aren’t all the same. At any given time there’s at least two cups of coffee lurking around somewhere in this house, and it’d be nice to be able to tell who it belongs to without tasting it.

He and Breena are on grocery shopping tomorrow, might as well grab some extra mugs to bring over here, because he’s just poured Jimmy’s coffee, turned his back on both cups to put the milk and cream into the fridge, and is now clueless as to which one is his and which is Jimmy’s.

Tim rubs his good eye while contemplating the eternal problem, needing your morning coffee to be with it enough to actually make your morning coffee.

He figures the one on the left is likely his, takes a sip and… Yeah… That’s probably right. He moves it way to the side, and starts on eggs.

While he’s whipping them up, he thinks about kissing Jimmy. Not like today was the first time it happened, by a long shot. It is the first time Jimmy stepped into him and started rubbing on him.

That was… interesting… maybe.

Tim knows he’s the one who started it. And he knows Jimmy has a dick. He’s seen it in pretty much every form of action a dick can possibly have. Part of poking Jimmy out of bed was that when he woke up to the sounds of little girls he noticed that Jimmy was pitching a tent capable of sheltering a den of Boy Scouts, and Tim knows what he likes to do when he wakes up like that, and Jimmy’s trying to not do that.

And it’s not like that dick has never rubbed up against him before. Hell, it’s not like that dick’s never come on him before, but…

But…

It still felt kind of weird to feel it, to have Jimmy all over him, pulling him close, rubbing on him, without the girls being part of the picture. Felt a little odd to have Jimmy kissing him the way Jimmy kisses the girls. With… desire and intent, and a long, hard dick, rubbing against his tummy.

Tim’s starting to wonder how good of an idea this experiment is. And that’s making him think it’s probably a good one. Because, if this feels weird, that’s an emotional response, so that would be conditioning, right? If he was just indifferent to it, that would be biology… Maybe…

There’s supposed to be a genetic component to how emotional responses work, too…

He’s putting the eggs on a plate, and wondering what Rachel would say if he asks her about this the next time they see each other. Then he wonders about how he’d answer as to why he’s even interested in this sort of thing.

Jimmy’s laying on his back on the floor, holding Anna over his head, lifting her up and down. It’s a good way to start the day, he gets some light weight training, and she gets to “fly.” He’s already done sets with Molly and Kelly, too. All four of them like their morning fly time.

When Tim gets near, he puts Anna down and sits up, cross-legged on the floor.

“You ever talk to Rachel about us?” Tim asks as he hands over the coffee and eggs. “Hold on.” Back out to the kitchen to grab the Cheerios. A moment later he’s handing bowls of dry Cheerios to little girls. “Try not to get them absolutely everywhere, okay?”

All three of the girls have an expression best described as Who me? Obviously, you have me mistaken with someone else.

“Yeah, I know, you’re all angels. When you get a little older, you’ll be blaming everything on Mona. Eat up. Aunt Ziva’s got left over challah so there’ll be French toast later,” Tim says as he sits on the floor next to Jimmy. “We need a breakfast table or something in here.”

Jimmy nods. Molly and Kelly perk up at the mention of French toast. They really like Aunt Ziva’s French toast.

By the time Tim’s got that done, Jimmy’s halfway through his eggs. He sees that Tim’s ready to listen, so he says, “Not directly. I know she knows we aren’t just friends, but I’ve never confirmed anything, and I don’t know what flavor of not just friends she thinks we might be.”

Tim nods. “Same here.”

“What’s got you thinking about that?”

“Just wondering what she’d think about this experiment. Unlike either of us, this is her job, she’s got a degree in this sort of thing… Just… Thinking.”

“Feel free to think out loud, to her, if you like. She’s probably already read about the dust up in the Post, so she’s likely got a better idea of what flavor of not friends we actually are, and if she doesn’t, I doubt she’d be freaked out by it.”

Tim cracks a smile between bites of egg. “Or, at least, if it does freak her out, she’s way too damn good at her job to let anyone know.”

Jimmy nods at that, too. He pops an almond into his mouth.

“You talk to her about…” Tim pantomimes snapping a finger.

Jimmy shakes his head. “ Haven’t seen her since before it happened. Same with you, right?”

“Yeah. Next session is Monday morning.”

“Thursday afternoon.” Talking about that gets Jimmy noticing something. “You took the rubber band off.”
Tim nods. “Yeah. After getting done with him… Hadn’t used it in more than a week, and just, didn’t feel like I needed it anymore.”

“Good.”

Tim sips the cup of coffee closest to him. “This one is yours, right?”

Jimmy nods and moves the cup to his other side.

He’d like to sit there, linger with Tim and the girls, but… work calls. So, as soon as Jimmy’s got his breakfast done, it’s back to the grind.

At least it’s an autopsy day. Unless some other poor bastard ends up dead, he’s in the office all day, and in scrubs.

He’s hoping it’ll run that way because he doesn’t feel like heading back to his house to put on “professional” clothing. (Though he does make a mental note to make sure he’s always got a suit, button down, and tie at the house, should he ever get called away from here.)

Ten hours to go, and assuming all goes well, date night tonight!

As he’s leaving, he sees Tim on the floor, being “smothered” by little girls. He sits up enough to wave Jimmy off, and then… worktime.

While Jimmy’s off dealing with dead bodies, the rest of the family starts to settle into what will be their weekend routine for the foreseeable future.

Family members wander out of their own sections, grabbing whatever early morning snacks they like, and moving onto whatever the morning holds.

For Tim, who’s on baby duty this morning, that’s laying around, stacking up blocks, and listening to Molly babble about her dolls. Not exactly mentally taxing, but he’s enjoying it, for the first ten minutes. Bit boring after that.

He’s fairly pleased when he hears footsteps from above (Tony or Ziva) and the pitter of claws on hardwood, Mona. Thus, other members of the family are stirring. So, he gets his troop up and into the main section of the house, where little girls can play with Mona, and he can have coffee with Gibbs and whichever other adult is stirring.

Real breakfast (aka breakfast food for lunch. Some of the members of this crew will not set a toe out of bed before noon if they have their way. In this, he’s thinking of Abbi. Though Penny can really sleep in when she puts her mind to it, and Tony’s been known to linger in bed as long as he can, too.) will be a joint effort between him and Ziva, but that’s still a ways off.

Right now, it’s just him, Ziva, and Gibbs. All three of them are in the kitchen, hovering near the coffee maker. Tim’s already got his second cup of coffee of the day in his hand.

When Ziva’s cup is done, she says, “Sugar, please, Dad.”
Gibbs, who is closer to the sugar, reaches over and passes it to her, while she pops her K-cup out and puts his into place.

Tim smiles at her, seeing Gibbs react just as well to her calling him Dad as he did to Tim doing it.

“You, too?” he asks.

Ziva nods. “Feels right.”

Gibbs wraps an arm around each of them, just holding on for a moment, before he lets go to grab his own cup of coffee.

Tim nods back at her. “Yeah. It does.” Then Tim flashes his smartass smile at both of them, and says, “You think Grampa’ll let us borrow his car?”

Ziva’s eyes light up at that. She’s also been interested in seeing what a Tesla can do, though she’s fairly certain that Ducky won’t let her drive it until she’s got a few less points on her license.

Gibbs rolls his eyes at both of them and shakes his head.

---

“Are you okay, Dr. Palmer?” Sam asks as he lays out the autopsy equipment.

Sam’s noticed that Jimmy’s in something of a bad mood today. He’s also been a bit… irritable as well, the last few days. A side effect of preparation for tonight’s experiment that has left him somewhat less pleasant than usual to be around.

He’s trying to not be a jerk about it. Because he knows this experiment will be considered a fail if he ends up so unpleasant to be around that none of his loves will voluntarily fuck him of their own free will.

He’s rather hoping not to get to the point where they exile him to the bathroom with his phone and tell him not to come out until he’s gotten off and is suitable for human companionship again. (He can see where that is, and he’s a lot closer to it than is comfortable.)

He managed two years of making out with Breena without getting off with her, but… he took care of himself regularly during those two years. This full cold-turkey thing is rather unpleasant, and is nothing he’s looking forward to trying again.

Allan’s looking at him expectantly, and Jimmy’s thinking he’s likely coming to the wrong conclusion, that all the gossip around work is wearing on him.

“I’m fine, Dr. Allan, just… I want to be home.”

Allan nods at that. “I understand. I didn’t have any especially interesting plans for today, but I still would rather be doing them.”

“I did have plans, and with any luck, we will wrap up with Ms. Seera soon enough to get to them.”

“May I ask what?” Allan asks, as he hands Jimmy the scalpel for the y incision.

“Date night. Good dinner out. Tony and Ziva have the girls for the night. Probably the last one we’ll get in before Sean joins the party.”

Allan thinks about that for a moment, decides that Jimmy must mean all four of them, and then says, “That sounds like fun.”

“I really hope so! How about you? What are you supposed to be doing right now?”

“Nothing too exciting, just a hot date with Halo 4, but…”

“I understand that, too.” Jimmy catches a look at the clock, sees that it’s just about morning naptime, and then begins the incision. “If they we weren’t playing with Penny and Ducky’s new car, morning naptime was supposed to be Tim, Tony, and I along with Fallout 5.”

“Ohhh…” Allan looks impressed. “That one’s supposed to be good. You guys want a fourth?”

Jimmy thinks about it for a second, and about the wall he tries to keep between work and home, and what Allan already knows about them… “Yes. As long as the idea that the three of us occasionally act like… Blistering assholes Jimmy thinks but doesn’t say. (Not saying it is part of how he’s different at work from at home.) They’re not necessarily the nicest people on the planet when they game. Not cruel. No griefing. But the language can get a bit salty. There’s a reason, beyond not just dropping the girls on their wives, that they only game when little girls are sleeping. He swallows and says, “less than professional,” Allan flashes him a mock appalled look, “doesn’t bug you. Grab a copy, and I’ll let you know the next time we get a game up. Tim’s sister, Sarah, plays with us, too, sometimes.”

“Sounds like fun.”

“Good way to pass a quiet naptime.”

And from there, as Allan peels back the skin, and Jimmy grabs the bone saw, they talk gaming and autopsies.

---

Tim’s not a car guy. Not the way Abby or Ducky are car guys. He doesn’t build them from scrap. He can’t tell you how they’re put together. He’s, at best, shaky as to what the different trims mean. That said, he likes nice cars, mostly as speedy art that makes him feel good. Not as something he knows everything about and works with intensively.

And, as speedy art that makes him feel good the Tesla is perfect. “I promise to return with her in one piece. Please!”
He’s giving Ducky his best puppy eye look. Penny’s giggling at it, because she’s seen this since he was a baby, and those big green eyes, looking… down in this case, he’s more than half a foot taller than Ducky, begging away amuses her to no end.

“Like you promised to return my golf clubs…” Ducky says dryly. He knows he’s going to let Tim and Tony take her out, and Abby when she’s not quite so pregnant. Maybe not Ziva, she’s been one point away from losing he license for the last two years, though she hasn’t asked to take her on a test drive, yet.

He’s actually enjoying showing off his new toy. But this teasing is fun, too.

Tim opens and closes his mouth. “I got you replacements, eventually.” It took him a damn long time to hunt them down for under $1200, but he did. He thinks Tony still has the left-handed ones.

Ducky smiles at them, and tosses the key fob to Tony. “Both of you. Be careful with her. We need to get back to New York tomorrow.”

Tim and Tony all but bounce off, huge smiles on their faces, snarking over who gets to drive first.

“Why do you get to drive first?” Tim asks.

“Because I caught the key.”

Tim rolls his eyes and heads for the passenger seat.

Tony slips into the driver’s seat and sighs with pleasure. Tim makes a fairly similar noise. It’s a sweet car.

“You just decided what you’re doing with the insurance money from the house, didn’t you?” Tim asks as he buckles up.

Tony sighs. “I wish.” He checks the light, which says he has turned the car on, but there’s no engine noise so… “You think it’s on?”
“The little light says it is.”

Tony stares at that light. “This is weird. Cars are supposed to make noise. You’re supposed to feel them when they turn on.”

“Well, get your foot off the break and let’s see what happens when it moves.”

What happens is elegant and smooth and in Tim’s book, very nice. He’s not a fan of road feel or noise, so for him, this perfectly engineered cocoon of music and conversation that responds the second you tell it to do something is perfect. For Tony, who wants to feel the road, and the car, and the drive, it’s like sex with a condom, sure it’s nice, but it doesn’t feel anywhere near as good as it could.

“So, what are you thinking?” Tim asks as they find a bit of fairly empty road that doesn’t look like it’s covered in speed traps to really take the car through its paces.

“With the insurance money?” Tony’s been focusing on driving, so he lost the train of the conversation for a second there.

“Yeah. You moving or…”

Tony shrugs. “I don’t know. We could buy the apartment next to ours and remodel them into one unit. The landlady is fine with that. Get something else? Move out of DC all together.” He shakes his head. “The schools we’re attached to right now are terrible, but… Five years from now? Elementary school burned down, so they’ll have to rebuild. Who knows who’s going to come back? The whole neighborhood is going to change. But, even if it doesn’t… We’ve got the money for a private school now.”

And with that, Tim understands why the money can’t go to a fancy car, not now, not if it’s got to pay for a decent school for twelve years, possibly for more than one child. “Ed and Wes have been talking about property values in all of the DC suburbs tanking. If you want a place in the burbs, now’s probably the time. Schools in all of those districts are good. Or…” They’re good now. He’s not sure what they’ll be in five years when the neighborhoods resettle.

“The vultures are all moving to follow the Congress.”

Tim nods. “And they aren’t meeting in DC anytime soon.”

“Dad says they’re talking Las Vegas for the one after this.”

Tim can imagine what Senior’s doing with that information. “Good luck, then?”

“Yeah, let’s see how much useless desert he ends up buying.”

Tim sniggers a bit at that.

Tony glances over at him from the road. “He asked about you.”

“Your dad?”

“Yeah. He knows the guy who runs the Omni and heard the gossip.”

Tim nods. “Ah. How’d that go?”

“Before I got him straightened out, he suggested having a chat with you about how it’s just ‘plain wrong’ to stay married to a woman if you’re gay and out. Married and gay and in the closet is apparently just fine.”

Tim laughs a little. “Marriage advice from Senior… Uh…”

“Yeah! Though…” Tony smirks at Tim. “I probably should have let him get started on it, just to see the look on your face.”

Tim laughs at that, too. “I’m sure it’d be my absolute prize bitch face.”

Tony nods. “Oh, yeah.” He mimics his father, “Timothy, come out back and have a little chat with me… You see, son, there are certain things a man just doesn’t do. There’s a code, son, and…”

Tim’s laughing and shaking his head as he says, “Okay, just stop! I don’t need to imagine it that clearly.”

They both go quiet for a moment as the road gets twisty and Tony takes the speed up a bit just to see how she handles the curves.

Tony sees Tim enjoying the flow of the car. “Let me guess, this is your next book advance?”

“Who knows when I’m getting another one? Still got to write the damn book. But… probably not.”

“Sounds like you might have plans for that cash…”

“Might. Not sure how useful it’d be. The sooner Breena owns her branch of Palmer and Slaters’, the sooner Ed and Jeannie retire off to North Carolina… That might make things easier. We could be a lot more open, and a lot less worried about getting bit in the ass by this.”

Tony’s not sure about that, but he nods anyway. He realizes two things, this is the easiest time he and Tim have had together in a while, and that he hasn’t spent any time with Tim since they took the Admiral down.

“You okay?”

Tim’s watching the road. Just them, the car, a twisting strip of blacktop, and snow-covered trees and land zipping by. “You mean about everything, right? Not just this morning?”

“Yeah. You’re… lighter.”

Tim inclines his head in response. “I feel it. That was… everything I needed. Well, everything I needed out of a confrontation with him.”

Tony nods at that, too. “I… I didn’t know it was that bad.” He shakes his head. “I didn’t know it was that kind of bad.”

Tim shrugs. “It was what it was.”

“I’m sorry about all the crap I gave you about being gay when you were new.”

Tim snorts at that. “Just… Don’t. Long time ago. More than two years, and we forgive it, right?”

“Yeah. That’s the rule.”

“So, water under all the bridges.”

“Okay. Just… I mean…” Tony glances at Tim, and then back to the road. “I get why you didn’t want to talk about you and Jimmy. I’m sorry I was pushing so hard on that, too.”

Tim shakes his head a little. “Maybe. I didn’t get why I wanted to keep that walled-off. Why I had to make sure everyone was clear the two of us weren’t having sex. I do now, getting that figured out helped, a lot.” Tim’s quiet for a moment. “I probably had to get there before I could have taken him down. Had to own all of it, and then I could use it to beat him with.”

Tony nods at that. “So, it’s… all four of you? Like really, all four, now?”

Tim rubs his eyebrows a bit, and winces because it’s still pretty sore. “It’s always been all four of us.”

“But… you know… physically…”

Tim sighs, that’s the question now, isn’t it? “It’s… Evolving.”

Tony’s giving him his quit the BS look. “I heard what you said. How much more evolved can it get?”

Tim licks his lips. He didn’t realize Tony didn’t know he was lying. “Uh… all of what I said to my Dad… except the good kisser bit, none of it’s happened…”

That takes Tony back. “Oh.” He thinks for a moment, while Tim does, too. “So, evolving… Um… Does that mean…”

“I don’t know. We’re… experimenting.”

He thinks about everything Tim’s said to him about this and how he feels about Jimmy, and sex with Jimmy. “Do you want to… experiment?”

Tim shrugs a bit at that, too. “Jimmy’s got a theory, and if he’s right, then… That’d be great.”

Tony knows how Tim speaks more than well enough to know what Tim’s not saying. “But you don’t think he’s right?”

“Yeah, but I wouldn’t, if he’s right.” Tim thinks about that, too. “Of course, if he’s wrong, I likely wouldn’t agree, either, so…”

Tony’s eyes narrow, and he whips them through a few more fast turns, once he’s on a straightaway he says, “God, this thing has great action! Okay… Can you be a little less vague about this? Because I’m not sure what the hell you’re talking about anymore.”

Tim supposes that’s a decent request. “Okay. We like girls. Great. We’re not terribly interested in each other. Fine. What if we could get interested in each other? He’s thinking Penny might be right, and it’s just conditioning, and if it is, that’s something that can be broken. I’m thinking Ducky’s right, and it’s genetic, and all the conditioning or lack of conditioning on earth won’t help.”

Tony licks his own lips, closes his eyes for a second, and then jerks them open again. “Is sex always this complicated for geeks?”

Tony rolls his eyes at that.

“And let me guess the Lab Mistress and Autopsy Gremlin are all happy about the idea of running it as an experiment, too, because you three all get to enjoy your science hard-ons.” Tony rolls his eyes. “I don’t know how Breena puts up with you three.” He shakes his head at that, but Tim knows it’s a joke. The next bit isn’t, though, “Just do it. If you like it, great. If you don’t, don’t do it again.” Tony glances over at him. “There’s that prize bitch face again.”

“Yeah. I know how just do it’ll work out. The question is can we shift that?”

“How do you know how it’ll work out if you haven’t done it, yet?”

If anything, prize bitch face just intensified. “The same way I know I don’t like tuna fish and salami sandwiches. I can imagine it.”

Tony thinks about that. “It’s been a million years, and I probably failed that class, but I think back in school the idea was do the experiment first, and then come up with the conclusion.”

“No, I want you to get out of your head and just enjoy it. Jimmy…” Tony glances over to Tim again, and holds his eye for a second before looking back at the road. “He looked John in the eye, ripped his hand to pieces, tore him to shreds verbally, and smiled the whole time. I sat there and watched him do it, and absolutely knew that if he had had permission, he would have ripped the rest of The Admiral apart, and that smile would have never wavered. Jimmy is fucking terrifying when he wants to be. And he was fucking terrifying for you.”

Tim nods. That’s something he already knew about Jimmy.

“And you know how that story usually ends? The hero goes in and kicks the shit out of the bad guy. Then he swoops his gi—partner up, and there’s sex galore.”

Now Tim’s giving Tony a disbelieving look. “Are you writing my story?”

Tony inclines his head. “Not like you didn’t do it to me, first. Sparkling, white beaches of her homeland, right? And, hey… I saved her in that story, too, right?”

Tim rolls his eyes again. “You saved each other.”

“Seriously, though. I watched him do it. And… Okay, part of not being cool with you four was that it looked a hell of a lot like horny and bored, but… I know how horny and bored acts, and I know how love acts, and horny and bored doesn’t do that. That man loves you.”

“I know, Tony. I love him, too. We’ve been telling you that for a while.”

“Damn right, you do! So, you love him, you go into it with an open mind, and actually experiment, right?”

Tim can’t believe he’s hearing this from Tony, but, Tony’s not wrong, so he says, “Sure.”

They drive for a few more moments before Tony says, “Well, that was the most surreal conversation I’ve ever had.”

Tim nods. “GPS says there’s a bakery up the road. We stop there, get you guys food for dinner, and then I get to drive home.”

“Sounds good.”
“Oh, God, that’s a sexy little thing!” Tim says as he hops out of the car when they get home, grinning at his girls, who are out playing in the snow with Mona and Gibbs.

“You want one, don’t you?” Abby asks, giggling, as he kneels on the ground, kissing her, and scooping Kelly into his arms.

“In every color,” he winks at her and Breena. “And no, it costs too much, gas is too cheap right now, we can only stick two grown-ups and three kids in it, and there’s nowhere to charge it at the Navy Yard, but… Oh, it’s so pretty, and feels so nice!”

“Feels nice?” Tony’s shaking his head, grabbing a handful of snow and getting a snowball ready. Gibbs sees him doing it and starts to shift to the left. “There’s no road feel at all. It’s like being in a bubble hovering over the street.”

Abby shakes her head at that. “You’ve got to feel the road!”

“It’s silent, too. No engine noise!” Tony’s shaking his head, appalled that someone designed a car like that.

Now, Abby pouts a little, agreeing with him that that’s just flat out wrong. She also notices the snowball that’s forming, and the one that Gibbs is getting set with. She begins to ball up her own little mound of snow, while Breena and Tim stake out the position that a perfectly smooth, silent car ride is awesome.

Gibbs actually lets fly with the first ball. It gets Tony square in the arm. He whips around, firing back at Gibbs, who ducks fast, but not enough. He ends up taking the snowball in the cheek instead of the chest. Another one goes whipping, fast, out of nowhere, which is when Tim realizes that Abbi’s joined the fight, and he’s got to get armed… Abby hands him the one she’s working on, and he tosses it off, one-handed, throwing wide, missing everyone… Ten minutes later, there’re snowballs everywhere, a collection of red-faced, giggling adults, and some confused looking toddlers.

By the time Jimmy’s tucking their client back into her drawer, he’s fairly sure he’d be willing to fuck a reasonably compliant barracuda, so, Tim, who has the benefit of being both a bipedal mammal and someone he rather likes, should be no problem at all.

By the time he’s tucking their client back into her drawer, he’s still got about two hours of reporting left to do. Yes, the paperwork software means he’s only got to put what they’ve found into the computer once, but it’s still got to go in.

And, “What have you found?” as Agent Dornaget is asking Dr. Allan.

What appears to be another intravenous alcohol overdose. Allan and Ned are going to take the blood samples and excised tissue to the lab to confirm what they’ve found. (Jimmy’s thinking that with as moody as he is right now, he doesn’t need to be spending any time with Zelaz or Benedict, because he knows he’ll snap at them. He also thinks he should probably go apologize at some point, that jerking off comment was probably out of line, but that point certainly isn’t today.)

“So much for the wife did it, theory,” Ned says to Allan as they head out with the samples.
Jimmy sighs at that, feeling brushed by the reality that yesterday, this was a real, living person. One who had a life and loves and hobbies. He shakes his head at that, putting the wall back into place. He’s got a job to do, and then out of here, back to his own life and loves.

Six hours. It’s not a record for them. Neither fast nor slow. Just, another day, another somewhat complex case.

Jimmy puts the last bit of information into the computer, hits enter, and leans back. As long as everyone else in his jurisdiction manages to stay alive for a few more hours, he’s free for the night.

Done. He texts to his loves.

A moment later he gets a collection of happy responses.

Heading home. Meet at the restaurant?

Three more versions of yes fill his phone.

Great, see you then.

He shuts down autopsy, pulls on his coat, and is off before someone else can call him back in.

By going home instead of to the house, Jimmy’s got a bit of extra time to kill. Which is basically the last thing he needs right now.

He’s very tempted to just get off. He’s got a phone and free time and… God, he wants to get laid!

He gives his dick some firm orders about what’s happening in the next hour (getting a shower, washing off the scent of autopsy, and then into clean, nice, going out clothing) and what isn’t (a long, hot shower involving lots of soapy lather, his hand tight and firm around his dick, his favorite fantasies, and vigorous thrusting.)

He’s in the shower, washing off, carefully, and his hand is heading toward his dick, and just, maybe he could take the edge off a bit... “Stop that,” he tells himself. “You are an adult, and fully capable of controlling yourself.”

His dick doesn’t appear to agree with that. It’s sending him some rather urgent messages, and if it could pout about being denied, it would. He gently slaps the head. “Stop it. You’ll get yours later.”

The sting gets it down again, and he begins to run into the next issue, as he’s shaving. He’s got no idea about how to be sexy, on a date, for Tim.

For the girls, yeah, he’s all over that. He knows which shirts, (Breena’s favorite is a plum button down, and Abby prefers a black one with an emerald pinstripe. They both like his collection of vests.), what jeans, (They agree on which pair shows him off the best. It’s a slightly faded powder-washed finish in dark blue, and it tends to run a bit snug on his thighs and butt.), and what cologne (They have three favorites that he rotates through.), and how to do his hair, (Little bit of gel, and then run his fingers through it. Just enough for a little messy curl.) and if he should wear his glasses or contacts (contacts). He knows exactly how to package himself to for them.

For Tim? No clue. He supposes he could go hunting around and see if he still has that pair of pumps, and… Jimmy shakes his head. The plan for tonight isn’t to see if he can pull off half-decent drag. It’s to be who he is, and let Tim be who he is, and see if he can make himself feel attracted to him.

See if he can be attractive, too.

The goal is to see if he can like the tofu, not dress it up in a steak costume, smother it in steak sauce, and pretend it’s a steak.

Jimmy licks his lips and fights the urge to call Allan and ask for pointers.

Not like this is a blind date. He knows this guy, literally, inside and out.

Jimmy laughs out loud at that. It might not be a blind date, but it also is. This is blindly moving into territory he’s never been to and doesn’t know how to navigate.

He finishes shaving, and then carefully double checks. It might not be much, but he’s feeling like it’s safe to say that Tim won’t be looking for a big, rough, stubbly kiss. He likes smooth lips. Jimmy does, too. So… there’s something. Thinking about lips gets one more idea out of Jimmy. He hunts down the tube of uncolored lip balm Breena uses, and puts some of that on. He likes smooth, soft lips. He knows Tim does, too. So, might as well try to get as close to that as he can.

As he’s standing naked in front of his closet, Jimmy’s thinking more about what he’d consider a success for tonight. He wasn’t kidding earlier about being horny enough that if Tim got within range, he’d let him do whatever he wanted, as long as Jimmy got to get off. But, he’s also thinking that maybe he’s looking for more than up, in, and off. Not maybe. Definitely.

Right now, he could jerk it with anything even vaguely soft and warm, so… Jimmy sighs. He’s thinking he missed the sweet spot on this. He’s past I don’t care about social conditioning and onto just fuck me, please! (whimper, beg, beg, whimper,) please! The goal of this is to enjoy it, not just get off.

Not enjoy it. To enjoy Tim. He knows he’ll enjoy it. He’s enjoyed all the sex he’s had with Tim.

Time to enjoy Tim sexually.

He thinks about that a little further. So far, every time he and Tim have made love to Breena or Abby or both of them, he’s liked that. Making love to them with Tim is good. Tonight… tonight he’s making love to Tim.

He reaches for a forest green shirt. Tim’s favorite color is green. Probably. Jimmy realizes he doesn’t actually know that, and feels stupid for not knowing, but… He doesn’t get Tim pretty little treats in the colors he likes, because Tim isn’t a girl, and doesn’t have anything he’d consider a pretty, little treat, so, he’s never actually asked what Tim’s favorite color is.

His dragon is green, so… that’s probably close enough.

“You’ve got them, and you’re all good?” Abby’s asking Tony and Ziva as they get ready to leave.
“All set,” Tony says. He’s got Anna in his arms while Kelly and Molly play with Mona behind him and Ziva.

“We will be fine,” Ziva replies. “Go, have fun. Tomorrow morning we will bring them to your house, right?”

“Their house. Skipping church, but probably go to dinner with my parents,” Breena adds.

“Then we will have them home in time for that,” Ziva says as Tim hands over his car keys.

“All the baby seats are in there,” he adds.

“Good, go, have fun!” Tony says.

“Please!” adds Gibbs, shooing them out of the house. At the doorway, he very quietly says, “We’ve got eyes on them, too. Don’t worry.”

Tim shoots Gibbs an understanding look. It’s not that Tony and Ziva babysitting on their own is a problem. It’s that this is their first time doing it, and they’ve got all three girls at once. Three under three, all night, at once is a handful. Knowing Tony and Ziva have some backup is a comfort.

It occurs to Jimmy, as he waits outside the restaurant and watches the three of them walking to him, that there may be a tiny snag in his plan.

It’s cold out. January in Northern Virginia is, generally speaking, coat weather, and today is no exception to that. So, it’s not like either of the girls is showing any skin, besides their faces, at all.

But he can see faces, rosy with the chill, done up nicely, with soft, luscious lips, and waves of warm silky hair and he feels himself start to stiffen in anticipation.

And… Oh, right, and there’s a guy there, too.

A guy who is supposed to be the focus of his attention tonight.

Yes, he might find a barracuda, or Tim, interesting, if there weren’t two beautiful women there. But there are. They get closer and he can see more details, smell them on the cold breeze, and they’re beautiful, and warm, and smell perfect, and… he’s unaware of anything else on earth.

Once they’re within touch range, he kisses both of them, and not just friendly little pecks on the cheek. He pulls both girls close for deep, wet, horny, trying to convince them to skip dinner and just go home and fuck style kisses, and Jimmy is thinking very intense thoughts of maybe grabbing some sushi takeout and nibbling it off of the girls, when a set of very amused, smug green eyes, and a huge smile break through his horny, girl-clouded haze.

He pulls back from Abby, and looks around for a second. Hell, it’s a date, no one else is lingering out here on the sidewalk in the cold. They’re, intentionally, way outside of their normal stomping grounds, so he grabs Tim and kisses the hell out of him, too. Tim’s stiff in his arms for the first second of it, but he relaxes, and then kisses back.

This time, Jimmy’s the one who ends the kiss; he pulls away when he starts breathing fast and hard and his pants are too tight. Did it feel better than normal? He’s not sure. Kissing the girls did, but…
But he knew that would be true. Anything with the girls feels better than normal after time apart.

Tim might not have a lot of positive things to say about his parents, but they did train him in proper, polite male behavior. Jimmy does have a lot of good things to say about his parents, and they likewise trained him in proper polite male behavior.

Thus, when they’re out together, whichever one of them is closest gets the door. The girls do not get the doors. They will actively go out of their way to make sure that one of them is located in door getting position.

If, like tonight, they’re going to a good restaurant, they pull out chairs for the ladies, too. They hand menus over, and always get the check, too.

It’s just part of them on a date.

And Jimmy is on a date. This results in him practically hip checking Tim so he can open the door, for him.

And that results in another of those very amused smiles from Tim.

As soon as they get in, Abby starts looking for a bathroom. Between the cold and the nine month baby pressing on her bladder, she’s got to go, NOW. Breena goes with her.

Which means Jimmy and Tim standing around, waiting to be seated. None of them have ever been here before, but it’s quiet, dimly lit, and supposedly does good things with French-inspired small plates. It’s nice enough to have a coat check, and Tim’s handing over their coats.

Jimmy got the sense that normally, if the person next to him were his date, he’d be doing something other than just standing here so he says to Tim, “You look nice,” once he returns without their coats.

Because Jimmy is on a date.

Tim thinks about that for a moment; he’s just him in nice dinner clothes. Black leather jacket, crimson button down, no tie, nice (black) jeans. He looks a lot like he does at work, though his hair is a bit less tamed down. Then he remembers that Breena did his eye. So, instead of a blotted mess of yellow green and muddy purple, he looks, especially in light this dim, like himself. Hell, himself back in May. She covered the scar, too.

So he nods, and says, “Yeah, Breena did a good job.”

This would be when it hits Jimmy that Tim isn’t precisely on the same page with him here. So, as they stand there, waiting for their table, he steps a little closer, brushes his hand against the back of Tim’s, just a light little touch, enough to wake goosebumps on his skin, and says voice low, “You smell nice, too.”

That’s where the light turns on for Tim, and he… and he’s not precisely proud of this, but Jimmy’s flirting with him, so he giggles, half nervous, half… it’s just… funny.

This doesn’t exactly encourage Jimmy. He’s had dates where his date thought him attempting to flirt was amusing, and they generally didn’t go well. He’s not glaring at Tim, but he’s not really happy with him right now, either.

The hostess turns back to them. “Your table is ready, follow me.”

So they do.

It’s a four top off in a quiet corner, probably not a “great” table, but it’s fairly close to the restrooms, and with a very pregnant woman in the group, Tim’s extremely fine with that.

And then he’s a bit off-footed again, when Jimmy pulls out the chair for him, and then attempts to help push him into the table.

Tim doesn’t roll his eyes. He does, once Jimmy sits down, next to him, on his left, brush the back of his hand with his fingers, smile, and quietly says, “It’s okay. I’m a sure thing. You’re gonna get laid tonight.”

That’s not the reaction Jimmy’s going for here. He grits his teeth a bit and flashes him a You’re not helping look.

Tim hits him with a Really? You’re doing this? look. “Sorry, keep seducing me.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes. “Now, you’re really not helping.”

“I’m also not a girl. You don’t need to pull the chair out for me or tell me I look nice.”

Jimmy stares at him, feeling frustrated; he doesn’t know how to do this with a guy. “You like it when the girls tell you you look or smell nice.”

Tim squints a little, flatfooted. He does like that. “It’s different.”

“Why?”

“I don’t know! It just is. Just, treat me like you usually do.”

Now, Jimmy’s looking frustrated to go with feeling frustrated. “That’s the point of this, not treating you like I usually do. I’m trying to see you differently!”

“Well, can you see me differently and still as a guy?”

“You didn’t grow boobs while I was at work. I know you’re a guy! Just… the point of this isn’t just to get laid. I know I’m getting laid, trust me, I’m looking forward to it, I’m trying to… see you as someone desirable. So, I’m doing the things I do when I’m with someone I desire.”

Tim shrugs. That’s a fair point, but… “It feels weird to be on a date with you.”

“That’s definitely social conditioning.”

Abby and Breena catch that as they head back. “Experiment in the weeds already?” Abby asks. Jimmy leaps up to get the chairs for them, too.

“Revealing some interesting bits about Jimmy on a date,” Tim says.

“You, too.” Jimmy shoots back, tucking Breena into the table. “Someone’s not rolling with his side of this as well as hoped.”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “Okay, I’m fine with trying to shift things, but I’m not a girl. And if you have to treat me like one for this to work on your end, it’s not going to work on mine.”

Breena glances at Jimmy. “What did you do?” You were only alone for six minutes is a very clear subtext for that question.

“The same stuff he does for you,” Tim answers.

Now Abby and Breena are looking at Tim, This is a problem? clear in both of their eyes.

Tim’s not sure how he ended up on the defensive here, but he is. “It’s just… weird.” All three of them are sharing a social conditioning look. “Yeah, yeah, yeah. Next week, you get to be the girl, see how you like it.”

Breena and Abby do not look particularly impressed by that.

“I’m just digging myself in deeper, aren’t I?”

Three sets of nods. Two of them are quite vigorous.

---

Tim would have to admit that he was not aware he was signing up for this level of experimentation. He’d been, skeptical, to start with, on the idea that this might work, and he’d just been thinking about it as a sex game. The idea of being Jimmy’s… and yes, he feels a bit squirmy thinking about it this way, girlfriend, also feels weird.

But, unlike the gay or straight thing, this absolutely is social condition. He was trained to know what his role in this play is, and this is him stepping outside of that role, so…

He knows it, and he did agree to this, and…

And it’s weird. And it’s not entirely comfortable to be the object of desire of another guy.

Apparently this sex thing is a never-ending onion of layers.

Maybe it’d be easier if Jimmy were genuinely into him, instead of trying to make himself get into him, but the more Tim thinks about that, the more he decides that’s not it.

It’s just another level.

It’s desire. Being desired, desiring back, knowing that there’s anticipation of something sexual happening.

It’s not enough to fool around as a side show, or an appetizer. He’s gotten into those layers. Things we do because the girls like seeing them… check. Things we do because they feel good… half check. They’ve messed around with that a little. Things that make us feel good because we love each other… no check in that box.

The girls are talking with each other, giving both Tim and Jimmy processing time. Tim licks his lips, his somewhat uncomfortable version at first, then gives his lip a little bite, and commits to it. He signed up to experiment with this, so he’s going to damn well experiment.

He wiggles his toes out of his shoe and gently traces them up Jimmy’s calf. He flashes him a little grin as Jimmy sends a startled look back to him, and says, “Okay, experimenting, really experimenting, not me sitting here looking smug while you try.”

“That’s all I’m asking.”

“So, you actually like this cologne, or were you just being nice?”

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little. “It’s not bad, but mostly being nice. I think all of them smell better on the girls.”

Tim nods. “That’s because what’s under them smells better to you when it’s one of them. How’s it match up compared to bare skin?”

Jimmy leans a little closer to Tim, inhales, and thinks. “Indifferent. Makes me think of expensive shaving soap, and that’s nowhere in my erotic library.”

Breena shakes her head. “How about when he wears one of Abby’s?”

Jimmy looks at him. “Have I smelled you wearing one of hers or Breena’s… I mean, intentionally, not when you’ve been rubbing all over them?” Jimmy’s perfectly fine with Tim smelling like Abby or Breena because he’s been rubbing all over them. That mix, their skin on his mixed with sex and desire, yeah, he likes that just fine. If they could bottle that and slap it on Tim, that’d work a treat.

But, Tim in just one of Abby’s perfumes… He knows Tim does that sometimes, but he can’t remember the scent of it.

Tim shrugs; he doesn’t know. “Abby?”

“Don’t remember. But the one you’ve got on right now is really male. Bay rum, lime, and sandalwood doesn’t exactly scream femme. Great for Breena and I, because it telegraphs what we respond to, maybe not so hot for Jimmy.”

Jimmy’s nodding at that. Granted, he’s got one of his own usual date scents on, too, which is a bit less “traditional male” but certainly not femme on any level.

“I’ll try something softer next time,” Tim says.

“Next time?” Breena asks.

“Successful experiments need to be repeatable. Just because you can get cold fusion once doesn’t make it science. Gotta do it again,” Tim replies.

Abby giggles at that. “You might be pushing the experiment part of this a bit too far.”

“Not if I’m going to tell Penny about it,” Tim says with a wicked little smile. “Can’t you see it? Shabbos, maybe a year from now. Got the report all written up. Sexual Response Cycle in Males: Conditioning V. Genetic Pre-Disposition, a Brief Hands-On Study.”

That gets some laughing.

Then Jimmy ups it a bit, “Can you see Tony’s face if you actually do whip that puppy out at her? Between the subject, and an actual, written report, with statistics and charts and all the rest of it?” That gets the laughter several notches higher.

“Pictures,” Breena adds, sexy grin lighting her face. “Can’t do it without pictures. Which techniques worked best, stuff like that.”
“And then Penny and Ducky’ll be flipping through it, totally un-phased, criticizing my math, sample size, and lack of single, let alone double, blind.” Tim adds.

Abby laughs even harder at that, and gasps out a second later, “God, I just peed on myself a little, stop it!”

And, of course, that’s the moment the waitress shows up to see what they might like to drink.

Dinner moves a bit easier after that.

The application of wine helps, too. Jimmy’d gotten to the restaurant by Uber, so it’s not like he’s got a car he’s got to get back to Tim and Abby’s place. And for the sake up upping the odds of successful experimentation, Breena is more than willing to be the designated driver for the night.

So, wine, a collection of beautifully plated small meals, none more than a few bites each, and talking about the Tesla, the latest case, and what Tim’s hoping to get out of the next round of Commissions goes smoothly.

This, they know how to do. Life is, for most people, in most places, at most times, a series of scripts. Shifting those scripts can be uncomfortable, but… Probably worth it.

So, Tim goes with it when Jimmy offers him a bite of duck confit with sour cherry compote off of his own fork. They both do that for the girls without thinking about it. If he runs into something he likes, it takes precisely no thought at all to spear some of it up and offer it to Abby or Breena, but that’s not anything he does for Jimmy.

And he does try to remember to pet Jimmy over the course of dinner. He’s happily touching Abby, and with his foot, under the table (because she’s sitting across from him) Breena, but he doesn’t usually touch Jimmy, just to touch him, when they’re on a date.

So he does. Little brushes against his hand, or when he’s the focus of the conversation, occasionally leaning into him, stroking the back of his neck.

And Jimmy does, too.

At one point, during dessert, Tim’s licking a bit of crème brûlée off of his spoon. (And, yes, he is showing off for the girls as he does it. The crème brûlée does not need anywhere near that much tongue work to get it off a spoon.) Jimmy decides to take that up a notch, he catches Tim’s eyes, looks hot, eyes tracing his tongue and lips, licks his own lips, and rests his hand on Tim’s thigh.

And Tim’s sure this experiment isn’t going to work, because he absolutely knows that if Abby or Breena did that, gave him that look, and then started sliding her hand up his inner thigh, his dick would respond. It would feel all hot and shivery all over, and he’d have a lot of good sense memories attached to it, as well as the anticipation of getting home and naked and…

Jimmy just did it, and he knows how he should feel, and…

It’s a nice sensation. Jimmy hand is warm and large and cupping him in a very nice sort of way. And, actually, on a pure physical sensation level, having someone who has his own set of testicles and is somewhat more intimately acquainted with how they like to be touched doing this is rather pleasant, but… It’s not doing all that much for him.

He’s wondering a bit if this is what women mean when they say sex is a mind game. Like, it feels okay, it’s pleasant, but it’s not turning him on. It’s not making him want. Maybe that’s how the mind game part of it works? The kisses and touching still feels okay, but if the sex part of the brain doesn’t engage, nothing’s happening.

But that’s also the point. See if the sex part is just walled off. Try to get it out from behind that wall. So… maybe the experiment’s not failing… Shit, how complicated does this have to be?

Tim glances at Abby and Breena, and they both appear to be enjoying watching this a hell of a lot, and that gets the sex part of his brain online.

Ride home time. He and Jimmy aren’t usually in the back with each other, even if both of them do drink at dinner, by this point in a date night, they’d like to be near one (or both) of the girls.

But, tonight, they’re in the backseat with each other.

Jimmy’s feeling pretty good, well-fed, buzzed, horny… God, so horny! And there is a warm, friendly body right next to his, kissing… pretty good. But he keeps looking at the girls in the front seat, and thinking about making out with them.

Breena’s driving, so she can’t pay too much attention to what’s going on back there, though she does shift the rearview mirror every time they hit a stop light.

Abby’s watching, eyes glued to them.

And Jimmy’ll kiss Tim, and the kissing is good. Tim’s going at it a bit rougher than the girls usually do, and Jimmy’s liking that. He’s thinking there might actually be something to having sex with someone larger (or the same size) as you are and letting body weight and strength get into it.

He’s starting to, maybe, have an inkling of why some people might find wrestling erotic.

Mostly though, he’s getting off on being watched.

He’s always liked that. And right now, he’s putting on a show. He’s twisted in towards Tim in the backseat, one hand in his hair, other hand on his thigh, and kissing Tim back just as hard as he’s getting kissed.

Even in a moving car, he can hear the way Abby’s breathing, feel her eyes on them, and he knows she’s all but quivering at the sight of this, and that’s taking Jimmy awfully high.

“So, how do you see this working?” Tim asks as they’re heading to bed.

Jimmy has to stop kissing Breena to answer that. “God. Uh… Just naked in bed, and it’ll take care of itself.”
Abby laughs at that. “So, all we need to do is put you two on short sex rations and that solves the issue?”

Tim raises an eyebrow. “We’re not the same person, just because it works on him doesn’t mean it’ll work on me.”

She playfully swats his butt. “Yeah, right.” Then she wraps an arm around Jimmy’s neck and kisses him. Her belly’s too big for her to grind her hips against his groin, but she can still drag her leg up the inside of his, and he moans against her lips at that. “Come to bed boys, we’ve got plans for you.”

“And we’re also enjoying the idea of seeing what you’re going to do to each other,” Breena adds with a gleam in her eye. “Quick reminder though, it’s baby-making week, so I get you off, right?”

Neither of the guys have any problems with that, at all.

Once they’re in the bedroom, Tim’s first thought is to see about getting the girls naked. He’s happily got his hands on the clasp of Abby’s skirt, looking to peel her out of that high-waisted, clingy pencil skirt, and lay his eyes and hands on the butt he’s been fantasizing about all day.

He’s kneeling behind her, working her skirt over Sean, and saying, “Gonna get you on all fours and just lick that luscious ass of yours until you’re screaming, and I’m so hard I’m ready to pass out from it. Then get my fingers into you, three of them, curl ‘em nice and sweet, get that spot over and over while my tongue dances on your skin. You want that, right? Want to be clinging to the edge of coming all over again and again…” Abby’s breath is coming fast and she’s moaning gently at those words, feeling his teeth on her panties as she kicks her skirt off.

Jimmy’s pushing Breena’s jacket off of her shoulders, kissing along her neck as his fingers look for the hook and eye at the top of her dress. It’s on there somewhere, but he’s way too distracted by the feel of her skin against his lips, her scent, and those soft, needy little sounds she’s making to find it easily. He’s more or less tugging at her dress, and she reaches behind herself to get the clasp, then he’s got the zipper, ripping it down, fast, hands finding their way to her skin, and he groans, loud and long, crushing her body to his as the feel of her back, soft and smooth and naked under his fingers short circuits any higher levels of thought.

There’s just skin, and pressure and soft, sweet, sex rubbing up against him, undoing his belt, and all he wants right now is to get out of these pants and into his wife, and thrust and thrust and her hot and slick and rippling on his cock. He’s tugging on the dress, trying to get it down, over her skin, but that’s not going to happen, the neck is too small, and even if it wasn’t, he’s grinding against her with his leg between hers.

Breena steps back, and he groans, not a happy sound this time, but it shifts into a happy sound, a hot, ecstatic sound as she pulls her dress over her head and is standing in front of him in his favorite lace push-up bra, panties, little black pumps, and thigh high stockings.

They’re two minutes into this, and he’s already starting to leak, pressing the heal of his hand against the head of his dick, rubbing over the slick spot on his own belly feels amazing and plunging into Breena’s going to be even better. Breena circles behind him, stroking his back and shoulders, pressing up tight against him, and turns him toward Tim, who is also not at all interested in or paying any attention to the other guy in the room.

Abby, likewise, is really enjoying what Tim’s doing with her (biting gently on her left butt cheek), but she’s also wanting to enjoy him playing with Jimmy, so she turns, gets Tim by the hands, and pulls him up to her. For a moment, they’re just kissing. His hands find her hair and hip, tangling, holding her as close as they can get, as his lips make love to hers.

She’s got her hands on his shirt, unbuttoning, pulling it free from his jeans.

Breena’s on a similar mission, though starting with Jimmy’s pants. She brushes his hand away from his dick and slowly unzips him, making sure to trail her fingers over his dick as she does it. He groans at that, too, loud enough to get Tim’s attention away from Abby to see what Jimmy and Breena might be doing that feels so good to Jimmy.

He watches Breena finish unzipping Jimmy, pushing his pants down, as she rubs her hand over his boxer briefs and dick, light, teasing pressure, but her hand stroking over his dick, his hard, wet dick, desperately trying to get out of it’s cotton confines, that’s getting to Tim. His eyes follow her hand up and down on Jimmy and he feels himself go harder at it.

He’s watching that, breath coming faster, and Abby sees it, smiles, and gives him a gentle little nudge. “Go, play,” she says quietly. “I bet he’d like a kiss, right now.”

So, Tim does. He steps closer, cupping Jimmy’s face in his one hand, and holding Abby’s hand with the other, and kisses Jimmy.

Abby’s right. Jimmy desperately wants to be kissed right now. He’s rocking into Breena’s much too gentle touch, feeling her glued to his back, and wanting more pressure on his dick and lips and… everything.

And then he’s got it. Lips, hot, soft, plump lips all over his, and tongue. Tim’s more of a tongue kisser than Jimmy is, and right now he’s perfectly fine with that, because all that soft, wet tongue is slipping between his lips over and over and over, and Jimmy’s got that sort of sensation hardwired into his idea of sex, and he’s rocking between Breena’s hand and Tim’s belly.

“Skin,” he manages to choke out, and the girls are on that in a heartbeat. He’s not sure which one of them got his vest and shirt off, let alone his undies, but it’s not more than a minute before he’s feeling Tim’s skin against his own and probably, at most, another minute after that before they’re on the bed kissing and rubbing all over each other.

Kissing someone who’s basically as tall as he is is pretty nice. Jimmy’s well aware of the fact that Tim’s a little taller than he is, but that really only comes into play when they’re standing up. (Tim’s got an extra inch of leg.) Like this, lying down, his lips are at lip level, and his hips are at hip level. And that’s a new, and welcome sensation. Unlike with Breena, (and to a lesser extent, Abby) his neck isn’t getting scrunched and when he rubs against Tim and kisses.

And dick on dick is nice, too. It’s smooth and hard and feels… different. It’s not anything Jimmy’s ever done before and the sensation is good. As long as he keeps Tim in exactly the right spot, this is pretty sweet.

But… They’re not good at keeping in the right spot. Neither of them automatically wraps a leg around the other one, because they’re not, usually, the one who does that when it comes to sex. So, about half of the time, he’s happily rubbing against Tim’s dick, which is soft and smooth and nice, and half the time he’s rubbing against Tim’s pubes, which… It’s kind of prickly and really isn’t all that hot.
There are other distracting bits, too. Tim’s hard all over. Softer than Jimmy is. But he’s a lot harder than anyone else Jimmy’s ever rolled around naked with. He’s all long angles and plains. There’s a little swell at his belly, and lying on their sides, facing each other, his pecs are a bit soft, but Jimmy knows that if Tim was on top, those muscles would flex, and they’d be hard, too.

Jimmy’s hands are roaming around, but there’s no butt, no hips, no breasts, no curves. Nothing soft, or jiggly, or plump and fleshy for his fingers to dig into. Nothing fills the curve of his hand and makes his breath come fast as he cups and squeezes.

And yes, he’s horny enough that rubbing up against Tim feels good. There’s nice friction with this, and his dick is awfully smooth against Jimmy’s, which is nice, but… it doesn’t feel right. He’s too hard and not smooth enough and he’s thin enough his hipbone is poking Jimmy in the stomach, and…

And he’s really not a girl.

Jimmy’s losing steam on this, and he can feel Tim is, too.

The fact that he’s more or less just letting Jimmy do this, isn’t exactly helping. It’s awfully clear this isn’t on any of his top ten fantasy lists.

Jimmy pulls back. “A little more enthusiasm, please.”

Tim tilts Jimmy’s lips to his and kisses him, hard and deep.

Okay, that’s good. Apparently mentioning that he was a better kisser stoned has made Tim think about upping his kissing game, because he’s tonguing the hell out of Jimmy right now, which Jimmy’s appreciating.

The chorus of extremely excited women is really helping things, and if they’d quit just watching and actually get in on this, Jimmy’s sure he and Tim would both be having a much better time, but… Of course, they already know they like playing as a foursome. He knows that Tim plus the girls is a winning combination, it’s trying to get off on Tim alone, so… he supposes the girls should be hanging back.

He’s sure this would feel better if they were actively playing though.

Jimmy’s a hell of a lot hairier than he looks. That’s primarily what Tim’s thinking as the haze of SEX goes leaching out of his mind. Everything was good, and the sex was building, and there were girls and boy and Breena behind Jimmy and Abby nearby and they were taking off clothing and all of that was really good, but somewhere along the line the girls backed off and now there’s just Jimmy and…

He’s so… fuzzy… all over. His legs are hairy, his arms are, too, and chest and stomach and… his back isn’t, but… He’s just fuzzy.

And it’s really distracting to Tim.

The kissing is nice. He likes that. Jimmy’s sucking on his tongue like it’s candy and that feels great, but the rest of it is just… weird.

Jimmy’s knees are bony, and they keep bumping knees because neither of them know where their legs go when they’re together.

Tim finally figures what to do with his hand when he’s again being rubbed into Jimmy’s pubes, which are a hell of a lot rougher than anything he wants to be grinding naked into. He gets his hand around both of their dicks, keeping them rubbing in the right spot, and that helps.

That’s pretty nice. But, the feel of Jimmy’s dick rubbing against his, and both of them in his fist, is just reminding him about how much better he liked that when they were doing it with Breena. If they were doing this with Breena between them, everything would be wet and slick, and both dicks would have something hot wrapped all the way from tip to base around them, and thinking about that’s actually helping to get Tim more interested in what’s going on, so he thrusts a bit harder, imaging Breena between them, feeling her hair against his chest, and her kissing Jimmy, and then him, and… God… yeah, soft, full breasts in his hand, and wet, slick pussy gliding over them…

That’s working just fine for Tim.

Tim’s taking things up a few notches, and Jimmy doesn’t mind that, at all. This is easier if his partner’s acting like he’s actually having a good time.

They’re both on their sides, and Tim’s speeding his hand up, doing a good job with the friction and pressure. (Which, Jimmy idly thinks, makes a certain amount of sense. After all, he’s been giving himself hand jobs for more than twenty-five years, of course he’s good at it.) Jimmy knows if he lets Tim keep doing this, it’s going to be done way too soon, before Breena’s even in the picture, so he rolls Tim onto his back and starts kissing down his chest. That’s… still a bit weird. He misses breasts. And Tim hasn’t shaved his chest since the last time Jimmy did this, so this time he’s got hair on his chest and around his nipples, and sure, there isn’t a lot of it, Jimmy’s got more, but it’s just making him miss breasts even more.

Still, he’s done this before, and it was hot as all manner of fuck when Tim was moaning under him while he and Abby were biting on him and Breena playing with the beads. That was blistering hot. Jimmy’s keeping those thoughts and images in his head as he creeps down Tim’s body, kissing and licking, hearing Tim… be a hell of a lot quieter than usual.

Well, he knows how to fix that.

Hopefully.

He hurries, kissing faster, moving down Tim’s body, and nudges his legs apart. That feel weird, too. Jimmy doesn’t have to remind either of the girls where he goes if he’s going to do this. They know that legs get spread for this to work.

Tim doesn’t. But after getting his knee between Tim’s he gets with the program and spreads his legs.

Jimmy gets himself settled between Tim’s legs and just looks.

It’s a dick. It’s very much a dick. A nicely hard, well-shaped, not too long and not too short, pink-tipped, dick. Soft, lightly-haired balls are hanging loose below it. If there were such a thing as the aesthetics of male genitals, these would be a very pleasing ones.

But it’s still a dick.
Not like he’s never seen this dick before, or touched it for that matter, (his fingers are splayed on Tim’s hips right now) but… It’s… looking him right in the eye… and really… yeah… It’s a dick.

He looks up at Tim, hoping for… he doesn’t know, but Tim’s eyes are closed, and that… That’s not encouraging. The only time Tim closes his eyes during sex is when he’s kissing. Eyes closed, balls loose, that’s very much not how he’d be reacting to either of the girls in this position.

Try.

Jimmy shifts forward a bit. The body mechanics are wrong, too. The spot Jimmy’d normally be aiming for is about eight inches lower than where he actually needs his mouth to be, and… Okay, he’s seen both girls do this. He knows, good God he knows, it works, but he’s stupidly thinking about the fact that Tim’s dick is pointing in the wrong direction for it to go into his mouth easily.

Jimmy licks his lips, shifts even further forward, and very lightly, tentatively, licks Tim.

Tim jerks a little at the touch, and he doesn’t seem to have minded it, but he’s not making any noise. Both girls moan. He thinks that might be Abby’s just got off cry. They’re certainly doing everything they can to encourage the hell out of them in this.

He licks his lips again and tries a little suck. He slips just the head of Tim’s dick into his mouth. It feels… bigger than he expected. He didn’t think he’d have to open his mouth that wide, which is kind of awkward. When it comes to sex, he’s never sucked on anything bigger than a finger or nipple before, and… yeah… This is just weird. It’s not bad, but he’s suddenly very aware of the fact that he’s the one who penetrates, not gets penetrated, in a way he wasn’t when the girls were playing with him at the cabin.

Still, it’s weird, not bad. It’s smooth and feels nice against his lips and tongue. In some ways, it puts him in mind of kissing, wet lips have that same sort of smooth slide to them, too. It’s got pleasant, slick glide to it. He hears Tim sigh, feels him gently petting his hair, and this time he absolutely knows that’s Abby’s getting off cry (so at least someone’s really enjoying this) but…

But… It’s not a pussy. In this position, doing this to Abby or Breena, he’d be getting off on the smell and taste. He’d be tracing all over it with his eyes, probably stroking himself, savoring the flavor and wet on his lips.

He’d be holding himself back from diving in, not psyching himself up to do it.

And, it certainly doesn’t smell bad or taste icky; Tim’s good with hygiene, and right now he just smells like skin and turned on guy... which is also actually kind of nice… and he doesn’t taste of much of anything. But it’s not making Jimmy’s mouth water or his dick get harder. He doesn’t want to dive in, suck it deep, and see how it feels slipping in and out of his mouth.

Not the way he’d want it if Breena were splayed out in front of him like this.

Mostly what he’s thinking as he kind of half-heartedly runs his tongue over the head of Tim’s dick is that he doesn’t know what the hell he’s doing, and though it’s true he didn’t know what the hell he was doing the first time he gave head to a woman, he really wanted to learn back then, and right now, he’s just sort of… stuck. He doesn’t want to give up, but doing this isn’t turning him on, and he can’t imagine he’s even getting in the neighborhood of rocking Tim’s world.
Tim doesn’t think he’s ever received a less enthusiastic blow job, and he’s including the one and only one he got from his grad school girlfriend who didn’t like doing it and thought even wanting one was a horrifically anti-feminist statement of male dominance. (She asked what his fantasy was, and he was stupid enough to truthfully answer, and… yeah… she did it, but it was pretty clear she’d been hoping he had different fantasies.)

He gently pulls on Jimmy’s hair, drawing Jimmy’s lips away from his dick and says, “You’re really fucking straight.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes and nods. Tim pulls him up, sitting up himself, and kisses him.

They’re sitting next to each other at the head of the bed. Tim has his arm around Jimmy, and both girls are still at the foot of the bed, but moving up to them.

Jimmy shakes his head. “Yeah. Great. The point was to choke on it literally, not metaphorically.”

Tim’s eyes go wide at that. “God, I’m rubbing off on you in all the wrong ways, aren’t I? I can’t believe you said that.”

“You’re not rubbing off on me at all right now. Which is part of the problem.”

Tim smiles at him and gives him another kiss. “If you want to…” He gestures back at his dick. “I mean, for someone who’s never done it before, that was pretty good.”

Jimmy shakes his head and rolls his eyes. “You’re not going to magically turn into a girl. I’m straight, and you’re a guy, and this isn’t really working all that hot.”

Tim’s nodding along with that.

“You might be the first person in the history of men to be disappointed by that,” Abby says, kissing the back of Tim’s neck.

Jimmy gives Breena a gentle tug, pulling her into his lap. “You don’t flip out about stuff like this.”

Breena shrugs. If pressed, she would admit that she thought this experiment idea was kind of silly. She’s all in favor of the boys playing with each other, and any set up they had to come up with to get them moving in that direction seemed fine to her, but… She didn’t think this was how they’d go about it. She was envisioning them more just playing with each other some, and more active all four of them making love to each other sort of thing.

She hadn’t expected them to try and just run headlong into having sex with each other in one fell swoop.

Jimmy’s still staring at her, and she kisses him. And then Tim, and Abby just to round things out.

She’s never thought she might be bi, she still doesn’t, but she does know what she just saw, and how the guys basically ran out of gas when it was just the two of them, and that’s not the way she reacts to Abby’s body. When they were just messing around, the two of them, taking the Valentine’s photos, she had a great time and was so ready to pounce on Jimmy the second he got the girls into their beds.
Of course, she also knows she didn’t try to force herself to do it. She just went with the flow, and the flow started with kisses and eventually got to playing deeper.

“Jimmy, you aren’t flipping out. You’re in bed, naked with him, making out. That’s about as not flipping out as possible.” Tim nods as Breena says that. He knows flipping out, this isn’t even on the same continent.

“Plus, she’s a girl, Jimmy. Different brain wiring and chemistry,” Abby adds. “Literally, she’s got more connections between the sides of her brains, and study after study shows women react differently to sexual stimuli than men do.”

Breena kisses Jimmy, slow and sweet. “I also didn’t decide that making love with Abby was a wall I needed to barrel though all at once.” She smacks her fist into her hand. “Try to go through the wall at full speed, you crash into it. Got to go at it soft and gentle and worm your way through the cracks.” She kisses Jimmy, and then leans over and kisses Abby, and one more kiss for Tim. “Chip it down, one kiss at a time. C’mon, play time. Less thinking, more fucking. Just touch as feels good. That’s what I did with Abby.” She kisses Abby.

Tim feels his pulse shoot up as they kiss soft, wet, slow, open mouths and soft pink lips rubbing on each other.

“One kiss felt good.” Breena kisses Abby again, and it does feel good. She’s all soft, and smooth, and she does this little thing with her tongue where it just flutters over the tip of Breena’s and that feels amazing. “And then another,” she breathes to Abby as they shift into another kiss. Her hand finds Abby’s breast, long fingers stroking over full, plump, pink flesh. Abby’s just so soft all over, and all of that soft just feels amazing.

Jimmy’s feeling all the turned on from the last week come galloping back into play.

“And then a little touch.”

Tim moans at Breena stroking her fingers over Abby’s throat and breast. Breena turns and grins at both of the guys, who are ramping back up again, fast. She feels the added rush of that. Both of the guys looking at her like she and Abby are literal sex goddesses, ever flowing founts of beauty and desire. “And then insanely turned on guys, make me feel all flushed and ultra-sexy.” She traces her eyes over both of the guys, whose bodies are responding extremely well to this show. They’d both gone a bit soft when they stopped making out, but “a bit soft” does not in any way describe them any longer.

Abby kisses her again, running her fingers through Breena’s hair. She pulls just hard enough to get Breena’s attention, and then there’s that soft, soft mouth and her wicked tongue…

“And another kiss, and…” Breena gasps out.

Abby strokes her hand over Breena’s breast.

“Oh… Yeah…” she sighs long and low. Abby pulls just hard enough, with just enough friction and twist on the nipple, and a very light brush over the breast. Breena goes goosebumpy all over from that touch.

Tim kisses her shoulder, his hand stroking over her breast, and Abby’s fingers, as he grinds against her side.

Breena’s starting to pink up, breath getting faster. “Oh, God, more happy guys, and happy girl, and…”
Abby’s fingers slip down her belly, just lightly skirting over her pubic hair.

“Mmmm…” slips out of Breena. That’s really good. Such a light touch, mostly just friction over the hairs. Just enough to wake up her body, remind it that it’s getting played with tonight, too. Breena pulls Jimmy’s lips to hers, kissing him long and hard as Abby and Tim stroke all over her. “Just play with it, baby. If it’s a wall, break it down a kiss at a time. Don’t try to force it.”

She kisses Jimmy again, rocking against him, and that, her body on his, rubbing sweet and slick, has him moaning against her.

“Oh God,” Jimmy groans. Yeah, sex, real sex, the kind of sex he’s wired for, that feels amazing.

Jimmy keeps enough of his hope to play with what he likes in mind to try different sorts of playing with Tim, as well as Abby and Breena.

Like, kissing Tim while Breena’s riding him. Okay, that’s really good. The little rasp of Tim’s stubble is interesting, and a warm, and large, hand on the back of his neck, keeping his head in one place is really nice. He’s starting to possibly rethink letting Tim in on the domination games, because someone big enough to really hold him down might be interesting.

He’s completely understanding why Tim really liked getting kissed while he was the one tied down and being played, and… the idea rushes through him, hot and slithery and jolting to his groin. “Bite me!”

Abby’s on it, jolting him that much higher, as Tim sucks hard on his lip and Breena rocks back and forth on him.

Oh… that sting’s just perfect. Breena on her hands and knees, him behind her, Abby spanking him into her. His teeth grit at that fantasy. Next time Tim has late night, and they are so doing that.

Or, the feel of Tim’s hair between his fingers, and the sensation of leg hair against his leg, that’s pretty nice, too. Tactilely pleasant, in a way that’s different from the girls.

Breena lowers herself onto Jimmy’s chest. Tim moves away, and she takes over on the kissing, and Tim heads behind her, stroking her back and butt, taking a few minutes to kiss each cheek, and draw his fingers down her spine.

Jimmy can hear Abby moaning as she’s watching this. “I got some free fingers.”

She scoots over a bit, and his hand finds her pussy, all wet and hot, and just that sensation on his fingers, and Breena sliding on his cock. “Oh Lord, yes!”

Tim… Oh, God… he knows what Tim’s doing, shocked he’s doing it, but… “FUCK!” He thinks Tim might have just smirked at him, and then he slips into Breena, too, and, yeah better.

That’s really good, floating around on how turned on he is and sex, so much sex, all around and all over his body.

He’s building up slow because with Tim and Breena on top of him, he can’t move all that much, and both Breena and Tim are going, slow. Probably because they know he’s on a hair trigger tonight.
Tim’s a butt guy. He’s always been one. He intends to always be one, and right now, kneeling behind Breena and Jimmy watching them fuck, Breena’s ass high in the air, just begging to be kissed… “God…” He’s palming both cheeks. “So beautiful!”

Breena wiggles a bit at him, inviting him to taste, and he does, happily licking, adding the occasional little bite and kiss.

This hits so hard. So round and full and plump between his fingers, and he can hear and smell and if he shifts his head just a bit, see, the sex from an inch away.

It’s the smell… That’s killing him. That’s filling him up and making him ache and drip. He slips a little further down, licking Breena’s pussy, and of course, Jimmy’s dick, too. Can’t get the one without the other, and right now, out of his skull turned on, it’s all good.

Breena’s so wet, and pink, glistening as Jimmy’s slipping in and out of her, and Tim licks, again and again, getting all of that, savoring the flavor of her body and Jimmy’s together.

Then he moves a bit lower. Jimmy’s balls are slick with Breena’s cum, and he starts licking again. He feels dizzy with how hard that hits, and like Breena said, he’s just going with it. He opens his mouth a bit wider and slips Jimmy’s ball between his lips, sucking gently, laving every drop of Breena off Jimmy’s skin.

Jimmy and Breena have been moaning and gasping as they’ve been playing, but he hears that pause for a second as Jimmy shouts, “FUCK!”

Tim pulls back for a second, mouth wet, and smirks at him, and then winks to Abby who looks ecstatic at him with that.

Breena scoots a bit forward, so she’s just touching the tip of Jimmy’s dick, and Tim knows what she’s looking for. He shifts up to kneeling, and lays his dick on Jimmy’s getting a firm hold of both of them, and again, Jimmy groans, and another one, as Tim adds more lube, rubbing it over both of them, and rubbing against Jimmy a bit, too, enjoying the slick glide through his hand. Then, carefully, holding both of them together, he rubs the tips of both of their dicks against Breena, letting her know to move back, and she does.

“Fuck, fuck, fuck, FUCK!” So hot and tight and slick and wet and AMAZING.

She rocks back onto them, and a long, slow forward. All three of them groan at that, so tight and hot and so so so… no words for that… “Uhg…” slips out of Tim in a long breath.

He straights out, so he’s above both of them, and licks Breena’s shoulder, biting gently, and says, “You taste fucking amazing on him, and feel even better on me.”

She smiles at him, turning to kiss Tim, and together they start a slow, easy rhythm.

It’s the little smile that gets to Abby. More than the rest of this… And God, this is everything she ever wanted to watch, and she cannot wait for Sean to be on the outside so she can fully play with them… ideas about what’s happening when she can wear the strap-on again are dancing through her head… But, more than that, more than ripe, hot, Technicolor, surround-sound, XXXX fucking, it’s that smile, and what it means, getting to her.

She doesn’t even know if Tim knows he does it, but sometimes, when he’s kissing deep and present, he’ll pull back for a stroke or two and just smile. Lots of deep eye contact, and that little smile that lights up his whole face.

He’s kissing Breena, right now, each stroke taking his lips past hers. He’ll kiss, drag his lips over hers, both of them mouths open, breathing each other in, and back, lips brushing again. He’s still moving, just easing in and out, but he pulls back an inch and just smiles at her, and at Jimmy.

Breena arches up, pressing into Tim, and Jimmy’s hand slips up, tracing over Tim’s cheek. Tim turns his lips to Jimmy’s palm, and kisses again.

Tim’s arm and shoulder call time after a few minutes in this position. He’s getting stronger, but there’s only so long he can basically plank these days, and he’s there.

He slips back, and Breena makes a less than blissed-out sound, and Jimmy’s not exactly on board with that plan, either.

“She up, side of the bed. My arm’s about to fall off.”

That gets some rearranging, with Jimmy on the side of the bed, Breena in his lap, and Tim’s able to stand in front of them, slipping in again.

“Yeah…” hisses out of Breena. “God, baby, just keep that up.”

“No problem.” He snaps his hips, and gets his knees into it, pressing in deep, deeper than he could go before. “Uhn…” slips out of him as the pleasure of it washes over him.

Jimmy groans, too. This is all sorts of good. Extra friction, and the brush of Tim’s balls against his, that’s great. Breena’s back is to his chest, and he’s kissing her neck and shoulder, her breasts in his hands.

This combination is perfect. Right now, he’s got everything he likes about girls and boys. Soft curves, smooth skin, silky hair, wet pussy, and hard thrusting dick, all together. This is great!

Tim’s enjoying this, too, and figuring that after the last few days, Jimmy’s not looking for any sort of marathon. As soon as Breena gets off, they’re getting off, too.

And Tim knows, remembers, how to speed that up. He strokes his fingers down Jimmy’s face, fingers pausing under his chin, and then lifts his face from Breena’s shoulder. He leans in, kissing Breena first, plastering his body to Breena’s so with every thrust he’s rubbing over her entire front, then a few inches further, he wraps his arms around Breena and as much of Jimmy as he can get, and he kisses Jimmy, right over Breena’s shoulder.

Jimmy’s eyes slide shut. A long, happy sound eases out of him.

Another long groan, and Tim’s not sure if it’s his, Jimmy’s or both. He does know the higher pitched yip of excitement is Abby, as well as the hand that twines with his on Jimmy’s back, encouraging him. He can feel the rumbling moan of Breena’s voice, hear it too.
He keeps up a long, slow glide, making sure he’s grinding into Breena at the top of each stroke. “Come on, baby, sing for us,” he says, breaking his kiss with Jimmy and kissing down her throat.

She’s almost there, panting, soft, high pitched moans finishing off each exhale. Her eyes close, head falls back on Jimmy’s shoulder as his hands slip down her body, stroking breasts and then clit. “There you go,” Jimmy’s voice adds.

She’s biting her lip, starting to grind harder and faster, and Tim speeds up, too, hoping he won’t flip Jimmy off the edge too soon. Jimmy flashes him a quick nod, he’s good, for a few more seconds, at least.

And he’s good because he’s focused on Breena right now, he’s feeling her heartbeat thundering under his hand, watching the flush creep down her chest, and the gentle sway of her breast with each thrust. He’s feeling her hair, damp and wild against his chest and cheek as he’s kissing her deep and fast.

Tim’s biting his lip, hard, trying to keep himself from slipping over. That’s the hottest kiss he’s ever seen between Jimmy and Breena and he’s right on top of them, part of it, too. He can feel Breena’s pussy starting to twitch, not quite over the line, yet, but getting there. Her hands are grabbing at his butt, pulling him deeper and faster and harder, and he’s going with it, smooth glide replaced with staccato thrusts, hips and heart pounding together, chasing pleasure.

Breena shifts, kissing Tim, tongue so wet and soft, slipping between his lips, matching the pace of his dick, and he can feel Jimmy speeding up his fingers on her clit, working her faster as she grows tighter on both of the guys.

So close, just… Pounding hearts and fast slippery sounds and that bright glow growing between them, almost… just… there.

Breena goes first, with a loud groan and rippling pussy and jerking hips.

That’s almost all Tim and Jimmy need. Tim speeds up just a hair, letting himself really feel what he’s doing, feel Breena’s body all slick and wet and clenching and Jimmy’s cock hard and smooth against him, and he pulls his lips back from Breena, grabbing at Jimmy to kiss him, hard and fast, sucking his tongue, making love to him, finishing Jimmy off, too. He feels Jimmy’s arms go tight around them, and then another loud grunt, Jimmy’s dick pulsing, and there, against his dick, there’s the swell and twitch and more rhythmic pressure against Tim as he rocks, clinging to both of them, snapping his hips, faster, heart beating faster and… then… almost… there.

He comes with a shout, clutching both of them tight, and spends a long minute standing, quiet, heart thundering, legs shaky, slowly coming down from the high.

It’s probably a good five minutes before they move. Just quiet time, resting, kissing soft and gentle, light, easy petting.

Abby scoots in to join the afterglow, wrapped around them as well as she can get.

Gradually, hearts slow, and skin cools, and eyelids grow heavy. Tim knows he should step back, but he doesn’t want to. He’s wrapped in his loves, and that’s a very good place to be. But, eventually, he does move away, and they untangle and start to get cleaned up.
He feels limp and lose all over when he crashes back into their bed, and a minute later Jimmy lands next to him. He idly debates rolling all the way over to kiss him, and decides it’s worth the effort. Like everything else right now, it’s slow and lazy, sated and sleepy.

“So, when we write it up, was that a success?” Jimmy asks, tired humor in his voice.

Tim chuckles a bit. “I have no idea. I liked it.”

Breena gets back to the bed at that point. She snuggles in next to Jimmy. “I think that’s all the success you need.”

Jimmy turns his face toward her, and kisses her soft and slow. She lies down on her side, wrapping around him.

His fingers find her belly. “So… Think that did it?”

“Still got a few days on that,” she says with a yawn.

Abby doesn’t go to their bed, in fact, instead of turning off the one light that let them see their games, she’s turning on another light, which isn’t exactly making the day of anyone else in bed, but in a second, when she says, “You better hope it does, because my water just broke,” no one minds.

Chapter End Notes

I know some of you like to know. Tim is wearing Black Phoenix Alchemy Lab’s Alan McMichael, and Jimmy is wearing Dee. Google them for scent notes. Dee is one of my personal favorites.
Sorry about the long quiet time. I live in the direct path of last week's Snowmageddon, and for kicks and giggles, my county decided that closing school on Friday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and two hour delays on Thursday and Friday were an appropriate response.

Thus, I've been off wrangling my human babies, instead of this literary one. Hopefully more soon.

So sleepy. Happy and warm and sated and ready to sleep. That’s what Abby’s feeling as Breena heads out of the bathroom and she gets to the toilet.

Just a bit of clean up, pee, and then curl up next to——

There’s a sound. It’s a small sound. She’s not even sure she heard it so much as felt it, but, if she were to describe it, she say it was reminiscent of “pop” and, sound or not, the fact that she’s pretty sure she stopped peeing a few seconds ago but fluid is still coming out of her is a good hint that something important has changed and that she is not going back to bed to sleep.

She feels a small contraction, as well as another gush and… Okay, yeah, this is definitely not pee, and that means it’s baby time.

She pets Sean and says to him. “Thanks for waiting. Ten minutes ago would have been really bad timing.”

Then she… doesn’t know what to do next. She’s leaking, and… actually, this is pretty gross. Right now, on the toilet, this isn’t a problem, but the very tidy part of her is thinking about how she’s got to get off the toilet and… God… pads… Does she have pads? She’s got to have pads, but…

“Shit!” she says it very quietly and then tries to reach for a towel, that of course, she can’t reach because she’s got this huge belly in the way.

She tries not to think too hard about dripping all over the floor, and then stands up and grabs the towel.

Somehow in all the stories of how Molly and Anna came to be, Breena left out the part about waddling to the hospital with a bath towel stuffed between her legs hoping not to dribble all over the place.

And for as ready as Tim was to drift off into peaceful sleep ten seconds ago, right now he’s AWAKE, and out of the bed and…

“You cannot go to the hospital like that!” Breena says as he’s rapidly attempting to put on both Jimmy’s pants and his shirt at the same time. “Sean’s not coming out right this second,” she glances at Abby, making sure that’s true, and Abby nods. “Go get a shower. Both of you. We’ll get the car turned on, warmed up, and call to let your OB know you’re on the way, okay?”

In their bathroom, with the light on, Tim’s coming to the conclusion that Breena is right about not going to the hospital like this. They’re both covered in smeared lipstick, dried sweat, cum, and a few hickies. “Cleaning up” meant doing the absolute minimum amount of hygiene necessary to make sure they weren’t glued to each other or the sheets when they woke up.

Tim’s awake now, on the second wind of all second winds, and Abby is, too. Both of them feeling pretty giggly as they get into the shower and start washing off.

“Contractions?” he asks, shampooing her hair. He doesn’t remember her mentioning them all day, but…

“Just little ones.” And her belly obligingly stiffens as she says that.

Tim kisses her shoulder and lips. “Hell of a night!”

She nods. “Yeah, so… when we tell this story… We were just going to bed when my water broke?”

“Yeah, I have a feeling that’s the way to tell it,” he says with a smile. His hands drift to her belly. “Can’t wait to meet you, little boy.”

Abby’s hands close over his, and she adds her own voice, “Just a few more hours and you’ll be out and we’ll be holding you and kissing you.”

And when they do get out, they can see Breena’s on top of this. She’s got clean clothing laid out for both of them. Abby’s got panties that have a pad already in them, and then a towel, and then sweats.

“Yeah, I figured this out with Anna. Pad, then undies, then towel, the sweats. That way you won’t feel like you’re sloshing all over the place, and I put another towel on your seat in the car.”

“Thank you,” Abby says, getting dressed.

“No problem.” Breena’s got a huge grin on her face.

“Go bag?” Tim asks.

“Already in the car.” Jimmy replies, hanging up his phone. “Dr. Draz isn’t on tonight. You’ve got Dr. Siddons, and he says to take your time. The OR won’t be open until 4:30, so before then, unless something goes wrong, you’re just filling out paperwork and getting a room.”

“OR won’t be open?” Tim’s confused by that, and then he remembers. All of the hospitals around DC are slammed all the time right now, because there isn’t a functional one in DC.

Jimmy nods. “He said, if you want, and if you’re pre-registered, it’s okay to stay here and rest until 3:30.” He glances at the clock, it’s 11:34. “How are you feeling? Do you want to stay here or head in?” Jimmy asks Abby.

“Uh…” Not immediately running for the hospital hadn’t occurred to her or Tim. “You going to flip out if we don’t have an OR ten feet away?”

Tim’s not sure. But… the adrenalin is starting to crash, and all the tired is starting to come back, and if he can grab a few hours of sleep in his own bed…

“There aren’t going to be private rooms, are there?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Can’t imagine they still have them set up like that. Too many people, not enough rooms. Easiest fix is to just stick extra beds in the rooms they’ve got.”

That settles it for Abby. She’s got the choice of being here with her lovers or in a hospital waiting room with strangers. Here wins.

So, for all the excitement of the last half-hour, Jimmy heads back out and turns off the car, and then they all go back to bed.

Tim curls around Abby’s back. Breena is facing her front, holding her hands, and Jimmy’s next to Tim, hand resting on his hip.

Tim and Jimmy do fall asleep. In Tim’s case it’s not any sort of deep sleep. He’s dreaming about driving to the hospital and seeing his son for the first time.

Abby’s not dealing with much in the way of contractions. One here, another there. They aren’t very strong or painful, but they, and the excitement of what’s coming next, are keeping her awake.

Breena’s not sleeping either. She’s holding Abby’s hand, and occasionally, they’ll talk to each other. Just little words here and there. At one point Abby says, “So, magic bullet, get your husband to have sex with another guy, that starts labor.”

Breena giggles at that. “We’ll keep that in mind for when I’m ready to pop.”

Abby nods solemnly. “Oh yeah. You coming with me?”

“You want me to?”

Abby thinks about it and sighs. “They’ll only let Tim in the OR, and just sitting around waiting outside isn’t much fun. You guys stay here, rest up. Got babies coming home tomorrow. Be a good thing if someone isn’t exhausted.”

Breena nods at that. “And this time, you’re not nursing twenty-four seven. One of the other three of us gets the 3:00 AM feed. You get to sleep through that.”

Abby kisses her wife. “Thank you!”

“No problem. Lots of healing up to do, so you need to sleep, not just rest. Making sure you get at least one five hour stretch a night matters.”

“Probably the difference between surviving and living.”

Breena nods at that, too. “I know the feeling.”
Abby’s eyes close, and she winces. Breena squeezes her hand. “You okay?”

After a moment Abby says, “Probably. Strongest one I’ve ever had, so… probably an almost medium one.”

Breena shakes her head. “Only lasted fourteen seconds. You’re still in easy territory.”

“So, drugs, huh?”

Breena nods yet again. “Yep. Drugs are your friends. I highly recommend drugs.”

“Moot point, no one’s suggesting I try heavy breathing to deal with a c-section.”

That gets them both quietly laughing, too. Breena flashes a wicked smile. “I know that mom. She’s the one with the perfect Pintrest, organic, free range, kale smoothies who drops her daughters off at daycare the same time we drop of Molly and Anna. She’d be the one with the ‘all natural’ c-section, talking about using meditation and acupuncture to manage the pain.”

Abby smirks, and then sighs. They both go quiet, resting, waiting.

---

3:00 shows up way too fast for Tim, and way too slow for Abby.

They’re in the car, heading toward the hospital, when Tim says, “January 8th, 2017… That’s a good birthday.”

“The 8th?” Abby asks.

“Yeah. That’s the date, right?” Tim figures he might be off, but… He thinks that’s today’s date.

She looks at Tim, and then he gets it. “Oh.”

“Yeah.”

At 4:06 AM, two years ago today, Jonathon Palmer was born.

“Do you think…” Tim asks. He doesn’t know if Jimmy and Breena did an amazing job of holding it together for them, or if they just weren’t really aware of the day.

“They’ll realize what day it is sooner or later.”

---

They did get a private room. That’s a pleasant surprise. Granted, given the size, lack of windows, and (more importantly) lack of bathroom, Tim’s fairly suspicious that as of October, this “room” was likely a storage closet.

The nurse gives him scrubs, gives Abby a gown, and tells him to stow all of their stuff in one of the lockers in the hallway and not to lose the key. They’re only going to be in this room until the OR opens up. They won’t be coming back here.
“Have you eaten anything in the last twelve hours?” the nurse asks Abby.

“Yeah, dinner… about… nine hours ago.”

“Okay, we’re going to give you some anti-nausea medication. Once you’re all gowned up, and hooked up with your IV, we’re going to have the ultrasound tech come and check everything out. Your doctor should be in soon, and then, as soon as we’ve got an OR open, in you go.”

Tim and Abby are both nodding at that, feeling excitement cresting. Soon…

Tim carefully folds up their clothing, and he tucks it into his go bag, then he slips Abby’s wedding ring and engagement ring onto his pinky finger. “Got ‘em, safe and sound.”

“All right…” The Ultrasound tech says to Abby, Tim, and their doctor for the night, whom they’ve only met once. “Everything looks good. Little boy is head down, lungs look good, cord’s nowhere near his neck… Judging by what I’m seeing, I’m thinking he’s going to be about six pounds. I think you’re ready to have a baby!” He grins at the three of them, and then Dr. Siddons does his part, checking around.

When he’s done he checks Abby’s chart. “You’re at thirty-five weeks and five days which is a little earlier than we like to do this, but three centimeters dilated. Fully effaced. Water’s broken. So, doesn’t matter what we like on the subject, Sean’s ready to go.” He smiles at them, too, then his phone buzzes. He checks it and nods. “We’ve got an open OR. Mrs. McGee, you’re coming with me. Mr. McGee, you get to wait here for a few minutes, and then a nurse will bring you down to the OR. Time to get this show on the road!”

Abby smiles at Tim, and he smiles back, bending down for a quick kiss, and then they’re wheeling her out of the room, and he’s all by himself in a tiny closet, hoping that the nurse in question won’t forget about him in there.

Tim’s thinking that when they did this with Kelly, they waited around, a lot. This time, he’s feeling like he’s in the middle of a contest to see how fast they can get things done.
There’s a lot of hurrying going on. The nurse hurries him to just outside of the OR. She hurries off. She hurries back. She hurries through getting the little tag around his wrist, and through the directions for what he’s supposed to be doing. (Mostly just standing there.) He can see people rushing around all over the place, constantly checking and updating.

He wonders how many other people are trying to get into that OR tonight. Wonders about what has to be happening that when they called at almost midnight, there were four solid hours of surgeries booked. He wonders about the fact that they’re not in the maternity OR. Wonders if they’ll have a room in the maternity ward when this is done, or if they’re just shoving people wherever they can fit them.

And, for that matter, he wonders how tired all of these people around him are, because he knows he’s not, by a long shot, the only guy here with dark circles under his eyes from not enough sleep.

“Mr. McGee?”

He jerks a little at a new nurse calling his name. He knows she’s got to be the pediatric nurse, because her scrubs are pink and covered in small teddy bears.

“Yeah!”

“Okay, we’re ready for you, come on in.”

So, he follows her in.

This part is really familiar. Though, instead of a picture of butterflies above them, this one is a sandy beach.

There are people buzzing around them, talking quietly, doing… Whatever it is they do before they cut your wife open to get your kid out.

He’s on the same sort of little rolling stool, sitting next to Abby’s head, his own face bowed so he’s cheek to cheek with her.

Just like last time, he hates seeing her with tubes in her nose and more tubes in her arm, and strapped down to a table, but… It’ll be quick, and they’re getting their son out of this, so… He still hates seeing her like this, and he hates the idea of her getting cut open and…

“Okay, we’re starting now. Mrs. McGee, you’re going to feel some pressure, and maybe some jostling.”

“We’re good. Done this before.” She’s not laughing or giggling or talking non-stop. Tim’s guess is, by the way her eyes are closed and the soft, slow breathing, that the morphine’s pretty much knocked her out. It’s almost 5:00, pump a ton of drugs into his system this early in the morning, after the night they just had, and he’d be asleep, too.

So, he doesn’t say anything. He sits there, cheek to cheek, listening to surgical sounds, holding her hand, and waiting.

Abby squeezing his hand. She’s not asleep, just quiet, waiting. He kisses her cheek.

Right now, nothing seems to be in a rush, at all.
“Time of birth, 4:57.” Then Dr. Siddons holds Sean up, pink skin, eyes screwed up tight, mouth open, covered in yellowish-gray goo. He’s still too shocked to be out to be making any noise, but a second later he lets out a massive, annoyed wail, demanding to be put back in. “Hi, Mom! Hi, Dad!” Siddons says, smiling and handing Sean to one of the nurses.

Both he and Abby are staring at their son, and yes, objectively he looks like a flailing, slime-covered, pink raisin, but he’s the most beautiful slime-covered, pink raisin ever.

One of the nurses grabs Tim, so he kisses Abby, and then follows the nurse over to the little baby station watching his son get wiped off, weighed, measured, poked a bit, tested, APGARed and all the rest of it, before he’s able to touch him.

Tiny little fingers grab his index finger, and Tim’s watching him through tear clouded eyes.

“Hello, SJ.”

Sean stares in his general direction for a few breaths, and then wails, flailing his arms and legs around.

“Think he’s looking for a swaddle.”

The nurse looks amused. She’s already done this seven times tonight. “We’ll get him all bundled up in a minute.”

And a minute later, he’s got a tiny little bundle of much calmer baby boy in his arms, and is taking him over to Abby.

“Ohhh… Oh, God, Tim, he’s so beautiful!” She’s crying and smiling. “Hello, Sean… Oh… Love you so much, baby, so much!”

He holds Sean so she can nuzzle and kiss him. He’s got his eyes open now, murky dark blue looking at everything, but he seems to settle on his Mom. She kisses his forehead as her son stares at her.

Tim kisses both of them. “He is.”

Tim’s again, nicely surprised to see they’ve got the room to themselves. For how long? He’s got no idea. That bed on the other side of the room from Abby’s looks ready for someone else. But, at least, for right now, he’s got time with Abby and Sean, just the three of them.

Abby’s holding Sean, has him in her arms and on a pillow, seeing if he wants to nurse. Mostly he looks like he wants to sleep. He’s got his eyes closed, his mouth closed, and is just lying there next to her breast.

And both of his parents are just hovering over him, holding on, and so awash in love they can’t stand it. Just being there, watching him sleep is perfect.

Tim can’t really get on the bed with Abby, so he’s half leaning on it, one arm around her, his head on her shoulder, and his other hand gently stroking Sean’s cheek.
“He’s got perfect eyelashes.”

He nods as Abby says that. He does. Perfect little blonde eyelashes, on tiny closed eyelids, and a little button nose.

“He’s got your lips,” Abby says, trying to get him to open his mouth by rubbing her nipple against them.

“My eyes, too.” The shape at least. Probably a pretty similar color, eventually, but right now they’re blue. “But apparently not my enthusiasm for your breasts,” Tim says with a giggle and a kiss to Abby as Sean keeps sleeping, not at all interested in eating.

Abby’s eyes are drooping, too. They both want to sit there and cuddle their son, but they know how this works and how little sleep there’ll be soon, so Tim says, “Come on. I’ll put him down, and you can both sleep.”

She nods a bit. She doesn’t want to let him go, but she’s so tired right now, and she’ll sleep easier if she’s not holding him.

Tim picks Sean up again. He’s so little. Yesterday, Anna was little. Today… Most babies put on two or three pounds in the last month in the womb, which of course, he didn’t get. So, he’s seventeen inches long and 5 pounds 14 ounces. He’s tiny. Tim’s got a bag of coffee at home that weighs more than his son.

An entire human being who fits in both of his hands.

Tim can feel the tears in his eyes as he holds his boy close, lips pressed to the top of his cap covered head, and then puts him down in his bassinet.

The last thing he does before getting a nap himself is to snap a few pictures and send out the text.

Sean James McGee. 5lbs 14 oz. 4:57 AM. Mama and Baby are doing great. We’re in room 163. Visitors welcome!
This time, when his and Abbi’s phones buzz at a minute before 6:00, Gibbs knows what’s up, and more importantly, this time, he’s right.

There on his screen, in all his bright pink, bundled up, swaddled and capped glory, is Sean.

Abbi rolls over, opens one eye, sees Gibbs staring at the phone with a look of abject love on his face, and knows she didn’t just get called out. She sits up, and Gibbs heads next to her on the bed, sitting down and sharing the picture.

“Hospital visit this morning,” she says.

Gibbs nods, still staring at his grandson.

She reads the text, and though it’s true she doesn’t know a whole lot about babies, she knows her niece and nephew both weighed in at more than eight pounds. “He’s a tiny little guy, isn’t he?”

Gibbs nods. “Kelly was little, too.”

She’s not sure if he means Kelly McGee or Kelly Gibbs, but it doesn’t matter. She rubs his back and looks at the picture. She kisses Gibbs’ shoulder. “He looks so much like Tim.”

Gibbs nods. He’s gently touching the photo.

“Are we going now?”

He glances back to Abbi, thinking she might not be overjoyed at the idea of getting up at 6:00 on a Sunday, but he also doesn’t want to wait. “That okay?”

Abbi nods. “Yeah. I’m up. Let’s go see our grandson.”

By the time they’re dressed and downstairs, Penny’s up, too, and ready to go. Ducky’s getting coffee for all of them, but still in his pajamas and robe. “I was thinking that Ziva and Tony might like a bit of extra help getting the girls ready this morning.”

The other three seem to think that’s a good idea.

And thus, off they go, ready to meet the newest member of the family.

Ducky has one other reason for not immediately heading over, but he doesn’t want to mention it and bring down the mood of the three very happy people in front of him. They may not know what day it is, but he does.

And he’s sure that if they don’t yet know what day it is, Jimmy and Breena soon will.

So, his plan for the morning is to help get Ziva and Tony set, and then go to the Palmer house and see how they’re doing this morning.

He sips his coffee, wondering how he’s doing.
Decades as a doctor, more as a Medical Examiner, and he and Death are old friends. At least, as well as anyone can be the friend of Death. But he knows that none of them have touched him the way Jon did. He was there when Jon was born, held his tiny body cupped in his hands, and later held Jimmy’s much larger, sobbing one, in his arms.

And for all the perverse cruelty of life, and the horror humans wreck upon each other, tragedies like Jon, where there is no agency to blame, nothing to rail against beyond fate or God, they hit the hardest.

And now, two years later, they celebrate a new life, a new little boy, and for once, Ducky has no words.

Maternity wards don’t really have day and night. They’re fairly active all the time. So, even though it’s barely ten minutes past eight in the morning on a Sunday, the place is buzzing away.

Gibbs, Abbi, and Penny find their way through the long hall, past open and closed doors, hearing small cries and the louder shouts of women working on getting babies out into the world. Couples, with very heavily pregnant women, walk the hall, trying to get labor moving faster. There are exhausted and elated looking dads walking new babies around, trying to get them to fuss a little more quietly, so that the mom half of the crew can get some rest, and all over the place, there are rushing doctors and nurses.

Gibbs doesn’t remember it being quite so hectic when Anna was born, but… New year, new circumstances.

Some things are the same, though. He doesn’t knock on Tim and Abby’s door, and when Abbi’s about to, he takes her hand in his and gently eases the door open, glancing in, quickly.

He opens the door a bit wider, finger pressed to his lips.

All three of them are sleeping. Abby’s on the bed, pale, tubes attached to her arm, wearing a light blue gown, but, even in her sleep, smiling. Tim, folded out the small sofa, and thus is actually lying down, curled onto his side, small blanket wrapped around him.

And the star of the show is also sleeping. He’s on his back, eyes closed, swaddled and capped, only his face visible.

“He’s so tiny,” Abbi whispers it. She’s never seen a brand new baby in person before. She didn’t get to visit her niece and nephew until they were a few months old.

Gibbs and Penny are both smiling, and nodding. They don’t touch him. They don’t want to risk waking him up, but they do stand there for several minutes just watching him sleep.

Tim rolls over, mutters something, and for a second everyone freezes, but he settles back down to sleep, again.

Gibbs glances at the door. “They’re going to want breakfast soon. I’ll go get some,” he whispers.

“I’ll stay here,” Penny mouths back to them.

Abbi decides she’ll go with Gibbs on the breakfast run, and hopefully, by the time they get back, there’ll be an awake baby looking for some cuddles.
Baby boys are not, in any way shape or form, baby girls.

That there would be an appreciable difference between newborn baby boys and baby girls was not something Tim was anticipating.

No, as the veteran Dad of a year-and-a-half-old girl, and well-practiced Uncle of two more baby girls, he felt like he had this whole newborn baby maintenance thing down.

So, as Abby’s sleeping, and Sean’s crying that tiny cat meow squeak of the newborn, he lumbers (well, in his own mind he sprang, but really, he’s pretty tired, too, so at best it was a lurch, but really wasn’t springing) to the bassinet, picks his son up, and rapidly assesses that the issue is awake baby looking for food.

For a moment, he’s just standing there, watching Sean cry. Because he’s still punch-drunk with baby-love, his son crying at him, tiny little eyes closed, mouth wide open, itty-bitty little squawks of indignant sound is amazing to him.

But, after a moment of that, he swings into action.

Step one in the awake baby plan is change diaper, because stinky babies aren’t very pleasant to cuddle.

So, off with the swaddling. And this time he’s not feeling any nerves at all about this, he knows how to get him reswaddled as soon as Sean’s all nice and dry. Snag clean diaper and wipes. “So, this is how we do this around here…” Tim starts narrating the operation, just talking to Sean, voice low, as if him speaking quietly while Sean’s complaining as loudly as he can will help Abby catch another moment of sleep.

Tim’s leaning over Sean, carefully opening the diaper, making sure he’s keeping the edge well clear of the umbilical cord stump, pulls it back, and Holy fuck! What the hell was that?

Baby pee on his shoulder and neck was not anything he’d been anticipating.

Penny, who must have appeared from somewhere, because he doesn’t remember her being in the room, laughing hysterically, really doesn’t help.

But, still laughing, she comes over and says, “Here, let me get this. Do you have a clean shirt?”

“Yeah.” He takes a moment to find his go bag, grab a clean shirt, wash up, and change. When he’s put back together, Penny has Sean cleaned up and redressed and reswaddled. She smiles at Tim, while gently nudging Abby, “Time to wake up. Little boy looking for breakfast here.”

Abby begins to come to, moans in a less than perfectly happy sort of way, she really wants to be sleeping, and takes Sean from Penny.

Penny kisses Abby’s forehead and then gives Tim a hello hug. “You know, I hadn’t thought about how little boys like to keep you on your toes in a very long time.” She grins at Tim and chuckles. “Probably about thirty-nine years.”

“Wonderful,” Tim says dryly.
“I think it’s a pressure thing. Undo the straps, let off the pressure of the diaper, but don’t lift it off for a few seconds, it’ll minimize your chances of needing to duck.”

“I’ll keep that in mind. When’d you get here?”

“Not long. Twenty minutes. We peeked in, saw everyone was sleeping. I camped out on the bed.” Tim notices the other bed is a bit rumpled, and apparently that must have been where Penny was hiding. “And Abbi and Jethro went to get you guys breakfast. They’ll be here soon.”

She steps away from Tim and back to Abby’s side to watch her feed Sean. She’s stroking Sean’s cheek, and now, with a breast in his mouth, his eyes are open and he’s looking around.

“How’s he doing?” she asks Abby.

“Confused, I think.” She’s also petting Sean. He’s not sucking at all, and seems to be wondering why this thing is in his mouth. Abby’s squeezing her breast trying to get a bit of milk out. “There we go.” A bit must have hit his tongue, because suddenly he seems much more interested in this whole operation. He starts to suck and Abby winces. “Ow! Yeah…” She slips her finger into his mouth and shifts him around a bit. He looks irked and is about to cry when she gets her nipple back into his mouth. “Let’s try this again.” He’s sucking again, and this time it seems to be working better. “Okay. He’s not trying to give my areola a hickey now.”

“He looks so much like Tim,” Penny says.

Abby’s nodding. “Never seen a baby pic of him, but…”

Penny strokes her great-grandson. “You don’t need them. This is it.”

Abby laughs a little at that.

Tim watches the three of them, and then remembers he’s got a camera on his phone and gets a few pictures of his son, nursing with his wife, and his grandmother staring at both of them with adoration.

After a moment, Penny looks up and says, “Kind of surprised not to see Jimmy and Breena here.”

Tim and Abby glance at each other. “Wanted at least some of us to have enough sleep to deal with the girls,” Abby says.

And then Tim adds, “And, we didn’t remember until we were on the way here, but… It’s the 8th.” He can see that doesn’t immediately mean anything to Penny, but it wouldn’t, she wasn’t quite part of the inner family then. “Two years ago, today, they lost Jon, and… If they want some alone time… I mean… I’ll go home at some point… But…” Tim shrugs. “I don’t know.”

And Penny suddenly knows why Ducky isn’t here with them right now.

Once Tony and Ziva wave him off, assuring Ducky that they’re just fine with the girls, and that they’ll keep being fine, especially if they need to hold onto them a bit longer than planned to give Jimmy and Breena some on their own time, he heads off.

He half wants to call ahead, but if they’re sleeping he doesn’t want to wake them. The problem with This plan becomes apparent, when, halfway to DC when he realizes that he doesn’t know where they are. They might already be at the hospital with Tim and Abby. They may have been there for Sean’s birth.

He pulls into a McDonald’s parking lot and calls Penny.

“No. They aren’t here.” He hears her asking Tim where the other half of their quad is. “They’re at Tim and Abby’s. Hopefully sleeping in.”

Ducky hears a newborn chirp and smiles. “And are you getting a lot of baby cuddles?”

“I had to arm-wrestle Jethro for them…” He chuckles a bit. “Actually, no. All three of them were asleep when we got here. Jethro and Abbi went off to get breakfast for everyone, and haven’t gotten back, yet. Little boy woke up ten minutes ago, and he’s having breakfast, now. I’ve gotten a few quick snuggles, and intend to get all the snuggles when it’s burp time.”

That makes Ducky smile, too. “I’ll come visit with Jimmy and Breena.”

“Okay, we’ll look forward to seeing you.”

This time, Penny’s the one walking the halls with Sean, and Jethro’s the one walking up to her. She and Sean decided to go for a bit of a walk when the nurse came in to get Abby all cleaned up.

“He’s awake!” Jethro says, plopping breakfast on the floor to grab his grandson.

“Yeah, he is.”

He’s cradling Sean in his arm, staring down at tiny blue eyes looking around. Abbi’s stroking his cheek and watching Gibbs just melt into a pile of blissed-out Grandaddy-goo.

Jethro looks up at Penny. “Tim. This one looks like Tim.”

She’s nodding. “Very much.”

Gibbs holds Sean, smiling down at him. “Hello beautiful boy. So many things you and I are going to do!”

“Any news about when the girls’ll get to meet him?” Abbi asks Penny.

“Tomorrow probably. Current rule of thumb is no visits from the under four set until after Mom’s unhooked from the tubes.”

“Probably a good plan.”

Gibbs is still holding Sean, pretty much unaware of the rest of the world, but he does notice Abbi’s voice, and turns toward her. “You want to hold him?”

“Uh…” There’s a flash of nerves because he is very tiny and floppy and fragile looking, but only a flash. “Yeah.”

He very gently hands Sean over to Abbi, and helps to get him settled into her arms. He’s a tiny, soft weight in the crook of her arm, and he shifts his gaze from Jethro to her. He doesn’t smile, because newborns don’t smile, but Abbi feels a thrill of connection as he’s looking up at her.
“Hey, there.”

He chirps back at her. For a second, it almost feels like he’s saying hello back, but that chirp turns into a whine, and from there…

“Ten minutes, maybe fifteen. That’s all the awake and not eating time you get at this stage. Time to get him back to his bassinette.” Penny says, taking her great-grandson back. “Let’s see about getting the rest of us fed.”

And thus, they head back toward Abby’s room, and find Abby, eyes closed, shivering, hard, teeth chattering, mostly asleep, as Tim sits on the side of the bed, gently stroking her forehead and cheek.

The shivering alarms Abbi, who hasn’t seen this before, either.

Gibbs feels her tense. “Side effect of the C-section and pain meds,” he whispers.

Tim stands up and gets wrapped in congratulatory hugs as Penny puts Sean back in his bassinette. He continues to fuss for a moment, but eventually his eyes close, and the pacifier in his mouth works its magic, and he drifts off.

Asleep? Gibbs signs to Tim, looking at Abby.

Tim nods. Probably. Food?

Gibbs nods this time, and begins to unpack. Abby’s not allowed to have solid food for 24 hours, so he’d found a pho place that was willing to sell them just broth: beef, chicken, and seafood. His girl had a hard day, and she is going to eat. None of this bullion cube dissolved in water stuff for her!

For the rest of them, there are muffins, donuts, breakfast burritos. There’s also four cups of rich, dark coffee. One of them, especially for Tim, is decaf with lots of milk and sugar.

Tim takes it and drinks deep, like it’s a lifeline. Gibbs signs to him Gonna tell the story?

Sure. And then in a very quiet voice, Tim says, “Abby was just getting ready for bed…”

Nine o’clock is pretty much as late as Jimmy can sleep without risking blood sugar problems. So, like any other day where he’s “sleeping in” he’s up a little before nine, heading down to go get something to eat.

Breena’s still resting. He’s pretty sure she didn’t fall asleep until after they got the text saying Sean was okay, and he hopes she’ll be able to really sleep in, and that he’ll get a few more hours, too.

His eyes are feeling pretty droopy as he’s padding naked through Tim’s house.

Down to the fridge, grab a glass of milk, and then back up to crash again, good hot shower, (he feels a bit crusty and knows he absolutely reeks of sex right now), maybe if Tony and Ziva keep the girls long enough he and Breena can get a quickie in, change the sheets, and then off to see their boy!

To say that Jimmy practically has a heart attack when he hears Ducky’s voice as he’s reaching for the milk isn’t much of an understatement.
Ducky let himself quietly into Tim and Abby’s house. If they’re sleeping, he doesn’t want to wake them up, and if they’re up, well, a little shock never hurt anyone.

But, they’re asleep. He hears absolutely nothing coming from upstairs, so he settles himself in the living room, takes his phone out, and begins reading.

About an hour later he wakes up to the sound of footsteps in the kitchen. Someone’s up and moving. So, he heads toward the kitchen. The fridge door is open, blocking most of whomever is awake from his view, but he knows the fingers closed around the edge of the door, and says, gently, “Good morning, Jimmy.”

Several thoughts go flooding through Jimmy’s mind as he slams the door shut, none of them are the fact that he’s naked and covered in pink and red lipstick smears, bite marks, a few hickies, and has the scent of four very turned on people fucking like crazy all over him.

No, what’s streaming through his mind is that if Ducky is here, voice that gentle, and waited for them to wake up, that something very, very bad just happened. “Sean? Abby?” tears out of his mouth as terror jolts through him.

Ducky meanwhile, has come to the conclusion that Jimmy’s on the other end of an extremely good night, and likely couldn’t identify what month it is, let alone day, and that he’s the one who’s going to dump the gallon of ice cold water on him.

“They’re fine, Jimmy. Everyone is fine.” He takes Jimmy’s hand in his and smiles a little, which he can see is just freaking Jimmy out even more, because if they’re fine then... “Just... It’s the eighth, Jimmy.”

And the gallon of water drops. Jimmy blinks, very slowly. And... he doesn’t know... a shit ton of... something... goes crashing into him. He blinks again, not sure if it’s shock or his eyes tearing up causing that response, and he swallows a few times, too. Mechanically, he grabs a glass and fills it with the milk that’s still in his hand, and then drinks it down in a few quick gulps.

He’s past the ability to verbalize what’s going on in his head. And Ducky just stands there, being quiet, waiting.

“Not even two years,” finally comes out of Jimmy. He’d told Jethro that January 8th would never sneak up on him again, and less than two years later...

Ducky smiles at him. “It’s okay.”

Jimmy shoots him the saddest smile he’s ever seen. “I know it’s normal. But, no Ducky, it’s not okay. I forgot him.” He shakes his head. “It’s a Sunday. If Sean hadn’t been born today, I never would have seen the date and it’d be tomorrow by the time I got back to work, flipped on my computer, and noticed.”

Ducky nods. “I know.”

“That’s why Tim just put the time on Sean’s birth text.” All the rest of them, Kelly, Molly, and Anna, had had the full birthday.
“Probably.” Normally, when faced with a naked man who is blissfully unaware of that fact, Ducky would never bring it to his attention. Especially if, like right now, he happens to be dressed. (This has happened a surprisingly high number of times over the course of a long military career.) That’s just the height of rude. But now is not normally. He lets his eyes trail down Jimmy’s body, highlighting the condition he’s in, while lightly touching a bite mark, Tim’s judging by the size, on his shoulder. Jimmy’s not wearing his glasses, but he’s close enough to see what Ducky just did, and he certainly felt the touch. For a second, he does feel a bit embarrassed to be not just nude but naked.

“It’s okay, Jimmy. It really is. You and Breena are allowed to let the joy of your loves ease your pain. You’re allowed to be in the present and not the past. You are allowed to let the past be the past, and remember it when it suits you, not on some preordained schedule. You didn’t love Anna and Molly any less last night, even though you and Breena weren’t taking care of them and weren’t thinking of them. You’re allowed to have nights where being a parent goes on the back burner.”

“You think that helps?” Jimmy’s voice is harsh as he asks that.

“Not at all, but it’s true, and I think it’s important for you to know that absolutely no one thinks it’s your job to mourn forever.”

Jimmy slumps a bit at that, because Ducky’s right, and he certainly wasn’t thinking of his other two children last night, either. He fiddles with his glass and decides he’s not going back to sleep, so he starts to set up a pot of coffee. Again, he’s mostly blank right now, a lot of feelings but no way to express them, and Ducky doesn’t press him.

After the coffee’s made, and in mugs, one of them set in front of Ducky, Jimmy says, “It’s a good birthday, and I’m glad he shares it with his older brother. Nice to have something to be happy about today.”

Ducky nods at that. “Yes, it is.”

Diapering baby boy try number two seems to go a whole lot better. Tim follows Penny’s directions: lets the pressure off first, waits a few seconds, and lifts the diaper off with a certain sense of wariness while standing well to Sean’s side. There’s no fountain effect this time, so he’s not leaping away or slamming the diaper back down to catch it, so that’s a good thing.

Gibbs and Abbi both look very amused to watch him do this with the level of reserve he usually holds for dealing with live bombs. Then they get the story of why he’s acting like Sean’s diaper is a live bomb, and Abby wakes to the sound of Gibbs full-on belly laughing.

Alas, Tim does not quite have all the nuances of baby boy diaper management down, yet.

An hour later, when Sean’s done eating, and Tim’s putting him back in the bassinette, he feels a warm, wet sensation on his chest, where Sean was pressed up against him.

For a second, he figures it’s spit up, (but usually there’s a sound that goes with that) but no, Sean’s chin is dry, and there’s a wide wet spot along the Sean’s tummy area, soaked through the swaddling and his onesie, and Tim’s clean shirt.

Tim’s a bit embarrassed to say how long it took him to figure out what the issue was, but apparently, in addition to being ready to duck and giving it a few seconds before taking the diaper off, it’s a good plan to make sure that once your son is all cleaned up, that all of his equipment is pointing down, otherwise the diaper, no matter how absorbent, is fighting outside of its weight class.
He sighs, hands his now, correctly, diapered son to his grandfather, and heads to his go bag to find his last clean shirt.

Jimmy heads back upstairs and wraps around Breena. He’s still pretty blank when it comes to what to think or feel, but holding her close and feeling her breathe helps.

But doing this… He also can’t help but slip in time, feel her in his arms this time two years ago.

Their Doctor let them hold Jon as long as they wanted…

Not exactly, he said they could hold him for as long as they wanted. And probably, if it had just been up to them, they would have held him… Jimmy doesn’t know… Forever.

But not really. But at the time…

But, eventually… They were both so tired, and the nurses kept suggesting that they needed to rest, and Ed and Jeannie, neither of whom were calm, collected, or untouched by this, also kept suggesting that it was time for them to take him.

Jimmy doesn’t know when they let go of him, but he does know it was light, so, probably, around now.

He and Breena were holding him. He was so small he fit in their entwined hands. And finally, they gave him to Ed, who was also crying, and they let him go, and they never saw him again.

Breena wakes up to the feel of Jimmy curled around her and crying, and, just like he did, she’s frozen in terror for a moment, but he feels her wake up and says, “It’s the 8th.”

For her, it’s a low punch to the gut. “Oh,” slips out of her, exactly like it would if a fist had just hit her, forcing the air in her lungs out of her body.

After a moment, she’s able to roll to her side and face him, saying, “We forgot.”

He nods at her.

That feels sick and awful and just… wrong, so horribly, horribly wrong.

He tries a little, crying smile at her, and she tries one back, but they fall flat. And beyond that, there’s nothing to do. She holds him tight, and he holds her, and eventually, they’ll kiss and make love, because that may not fix anything, but at least the world doesn’t suck quite so bad when they’re doing that.

And by the time they’re up, showered, and moving around, there are messages on their phones from both sets of their parents, calling to check in, and see how they’re doing.

And, honestly, neither of them know.

Nurses come in. Nurses head out. They have lots of questions. How often has Sean eaten? How many diapers have you changed? (They’ve even got a chart they expect Tim to fill out every time Sean eats, pees, and poops.) They prod Abby all the time, checking her pain level, how she’s feeling, if she’s hungry, and all the rest of it. (Abby wants to sleep. That’s all she wants, sleep. She was up all night, and currently has a boatload of painkillers in her system, thus she’s not in the happiest of moods when, yet again, they’re asking what she wants.)

And, though Tim didn’t expect this, they’ve got one other question they keep asking. “And you won’t be circumcising?”

Every nurse who’s checked on Sean has asked them that. “No. For the third time, no.”

She’s a bit annoyed by his curt answer. “Just making sure.”

And, more awake, Tim might pull his annoyed in on this, but every nurse they’ve seen has asked, and he feels like it’s very judgmental asking. “You’ve asked us about that more often than if we’re breast feeding and who Sean’s pediatrician is.”

“Really, just making sure.”

“I don’t think we’re suddenly going to change our minds. He was born with a foreskin for a reason.
We’d like to see it stay attached to him.”

“Fine.” She’s moving over to Sean to pick him up. “We need to do a few more tests…”

“Okay.” And Tim doesn’t exactly want to let her take Sean away, but he knows this is part of having a baby in a hospital. Someone’ll keep trying to take said baby off to make sure he’s every sort of possible okay he can be.

Gibbs and Abbi had been sitting on the unused bed, just hanging out as he had that conversation. He turns and flashes them a tight smile.

“Didn’t think it was that radical of a position.”

Gibbs shrugs. That wasn’t something he’d ever thought about. When they didn’t know if Kelly was a boy or girl, that was something you just automatically did.

“You want to crash again?”

Tim shrugs. He’s pretty awake right now, and… “Not yet. Soon. Gonna give Breena and Jimmy a call.” He glances at the pull out sofa/bed. “You guys got up early. Want a nap of your own?”

Gibbs is good. He didn’t get up that much earlier than normal, but Abbi’s about six hours shy of her usual Sunday. She’s happy to take him up on that.

“Yeah, Mom, we’re… I don’t know. Better than last year?” Jimmy say to his Mom. She’s good about long-distance support. As long as it doesn’t involve leaving Wilmington, she’s ready, willing, and able to help. She calls fairly regularly, and they write every week. If he’d been more with it, he would have known that she’d call today.

“Oh… Jimmy.”

“Yeah. One bit of good news, our friends, Tim and Abby, they had their little boy today.”

“Oh…” That’s a fairly unsure oh. “Is it?”

Jimmy sniffs a little. “Yeah. It’s got to be.”

“You’re allowed to be sad about this…”

“I know. But, I don’t want to be. And it’s not like Sean… Sean James… they named him after me. Not like he’s doing it out of spite. This is just when he happened to show up.”

“Okay. Have you seen him?”

“Not yet. We had a date night last night, and got a slow start this morning, but we’ll get over there soon. I’ve got a picture. Looks like he’s a tiny, little guy.” Jimmy’s phone chirps to let him know he’s got an incoming call. He checks. “That’s Tim on the other line.”

“You go talk to your friend. Send me pictures of you and your namesake.”

“Sure, Mom.”

“Love you, baby.”

“I know. Love you, too. Bye.” He kills the one call and picks up the next one. “Hey.”

Tim sounds a bit tentative on the other line. “Hi… How are you?”

“Shouldn’t I be asking you that?”

“Beyond no sleep, I’m having a good day.”

Jimmy smiles a little, feeling the hurt, and joy for his love. “Yeah. You are. Here, let me get Breena on, too.”

“Enough,” Breena says. “He’s beautiful.”

“Yeah, he is. So tiny. I forgot how little they are. So far he’s a good eater and sleeper, but… You know… He’s only seven hours old.”

Breena smiles a bit. “We do. And our girl?”

“Sleeping. Shivering. Itchy when she’s awake. The pain medication’s doing its job. She made it through fine, but…”

“Yes, we know. Major surgery is not fun or easy,” Ducky adds.
“How about you guys? You want to come visit, or just… I don’t know. What makes this easier? I need to get home and grab some clean shirts.”

“You didn’t pack shirts?” Breena sounds like she can’t believe he’d leave them out of his go bag.

“I packed two shirts, plus the one I had on. Guess what, baby boys are exciting and messy in a way baby girls aren’t.”

There’s a second of quiet as Breena, Jimmy, and Ducky think about that, and then Breena remembers one of her mom buddies talking about her little boy, and she starts to giggle. “He sprayed you?”

“He sprayed me, and if you don’t make sure his dick is pointing down when you put the diaper on him, he ends up spraying himself, and you get your second clean shirt of the day wet when you’ve got him cuddled on your chest.”

That gets a bit of a laugh. “Oh, Tim,” Breena says, shaking her head a bit. “We’ll be over later today, and we’ll bring shirts. Got to call Tony and Ziva and coordinate with babies. It might be… God, I don’t know. It’s a hell of a day, but we still want to meet our boy.”

“And we can’t wait for you to meet him, too.”

“You guys need anything else?” Jimmy asks.

“If we do, I don’t know about it. Penny, Jethro, and Abbi are here, so they’ve been grabbing anything we might want or need. I think we’re okay, besides shirts for me, right now.”

“Okay. We’ll send a text when we head off.” Jimmy says.

“Good. See you soon. Love you guys.”

Breena makes a little kissing noise. “Bye.” Jimmy hangs up the phone, and for a moment they look at each other.

“We ready for this?”

Breena swallows and nods. “Yeah, we are. He’s still our boy, we still love him, we love his parents, and it’s time to get Tony and Ziva on the phone and get with the show.”

It’s a weak smile on Jimmy’s face, but he pulls it off. “Okay.” He dials Tony’s number, and they get with it.

Abby’s sleeping when their pediatrician carries Sean back in. Tim’s dozing, sharing the sofa bed with Abbi, but he hears her say hello to Gibbs, and starts getting up.

He’s expecting the usual We checked everything out and it’s all splendid, or another round of Are you sure you want to keep his foreskin attached to him questions.

So, between his expectations and the tiredness, he doesn’t immediately notice the look on the pediatrician’s face. But Gibbs, who hasn’t been napping, does. Tim feels a hand on his back as he takes Sean from the doctor.
For a second, he’s staring at Sean, who’s peacefully sleeping in his arms. Then Tim looks more carefully at their pediatrician, and sees the tension. Then it hits him, this is their pediatrician, Dr. Illn, who does not actually have an office in this hospital and though she does make routine visits here for her brand new patients, she’s not on call here.

“What?” He’s feeling cold, and Gibbs is gently poking Abby.

She’s slowly coming awake, and Dr. Illn appears to be waiting for her to come to before speaking.

Tim’s getting really worried. Sean looks fine. He’s little. But that was a textbook pregnancy followed by a textbook c-section. All his bits are accounted for. All of the scans were normal. He can’t think of why Dr. Illn is here, let alone looking so tense.

Abby’s blinking, trying to pull herself out of the pain killer, muzzy sleep. “I’m up. What is it?”

Abbi also, from her sleep, notices that something is going on, and wakes up, too. Sitting up, moving closer to the collection of people centered on Abby’s bed.

Once they’re all in place, Dr. Illn says, “It’s standard procedure to check every baby’s hearing shortly after birth. We always start with the Otoacoustic Emission test. We put a little microphone in Sean’s ears, played a sound, and in babies with normal hearing an echo comes back. For Sean, there was no echo in either ear. There are two tests, and that’s just one of them. And sometimes the first test just doesn’t work on everyone, so we always run both if a baby fails the first one. The second test is the Auditory Brainstem Response test. It’s a lot like the first one, but instead of looking for an echo, we put a little sensor on Sean’s head, then played the sound, and then measure for a nervous system response.” She gently touches Sean’s face, but he’s asleep and doesn’t stir. Then she looks back up at Tim and Abby. “I’m sorry. He’s failed both tests in both ears. Now, that happens. Sometimes newborns don’t pass the tests and their hearing is just fine, but…”

Tim’s staring at the sleeping baby in his hands. Abby sniffs, hard, and then signs, to Tim and Gibbs, It could be worse before bursting into tears.

Dr. Illn looks at the three of them. She’s been seeing Tim and Abby since Kelly was born, and had no idea they had any exposure to Deaf culture. “You already sign?”

Tim’s trying to cuddle with Abby and Sean, an exercise made more difficult by Abby currently not really being able to move and the huge incision he doesn’t want to jostle, but he’s nodding. “Abby’s parents were deaf,” Tim says, chin on her shoulder, arm around her, as they both hold Sean.

“This is likely a genetic—“

“I’m adopted,” Abby says, yanking the rug out of Dr. Illn. Though, adopted or not, almost all forms of deafness are genetics, so…

“Oh. Look, we don’t know for sure if he can hear or not. When he comes in for his week old checkup, we’ll test again. He might have vernix in his ears or…”

“Did you check?” Gibbs asks, voice rough, letting Dr. Illn know this is really not the time for feel good BS.

She responds to it. “Yes. And no, we didn’t see any. But… we still like to wait a week and retest. Even with both tests, we can get false positives. So, we always give it a little while and retest. But, if, in a week, he is still failing the tests, we’ll be able to do more testing to see how severe any hearing damage he might have is. If he does have hearing loss, it might be mild.”
“Why don’t you do that, now?” Gibbs asks. “Get a new machine or whatever and test again.”

Illn has a look on his face that Tim thinks of as intentionally being patient. “Because sometimes it takes a little while for these little guys to get fully online. Much before a week, and we get a decent number of false positives for hearing loss. Sean may be one of them. But… I want to make sure you schedule that first week checkup, because if he does have hearing loss, getting moving on it quickly is important. If he does have hearing loss, the sooner he’s fitted for hearing aids or cochlear implants, the easier time he’ll have with speech. That said, the only reason for even mentioning it right now, is so that, when we retest, you don’t get blindsided.”

Tim’s shaking his head. That’s… Just useless right now. “What…”

Dr. Illn smiles gently. “Right now, there’s not much to do. Right now, there’s no functional difference between him and any other newborn baby.”

“He won’t hear the lullabies,” Abby says, voice shaky, still staring at their boy.

Again Dr. Illn smiles gently. “Maybe. We don’t know that for sure, yet. But, even if he can’t hear you sing the lullabies, he’ll feel them.” Sean’s against Abby’s chest right now, sleeping, face against her breast. “He feels you breathe, and your heartbeat, and everything you say. Keep his head against your chest or throat, and whether he can hear it or not, he’ll feel everything you sing to him.”

“So, we just… wait?” Abbi says.

“I know, no one wants to hear that, but, yes, that’s the answer.” Illn glances at Abbi, who she hasn’t met before, and Gibbs, who has come to a few of Kelly’s check-ups, and says, “What you can do right now, you two, not the exhausted, sleep-deprived, brand-new parents with a toddler at home, but you two, can take the time to research cochlear implants. There are some really strong feelings about them, and if Sean’s a candidate for them, I don’t want you going into that, blind, either. Tim, Abby, what you need to be doing is the normal, new baby stuff. Get him on an eating/sleeping schedule, get as much rest as you can for yourselves. Abby, take it easy and heal up. Other than that, we wait.”

That’s not the answer anyone wants.

When Penny left to get lunch, all was good in the McGee nursery. When she comes back, she can feel the tension wafting off everyone in the room, see it in the posture, tense shoulders and faces. Something just went wrong. Her first thought is that they talked to Jimmy and Breena and it went badly.

Then she realizes that Gibbs and Abbi are sitting on the pull out bed, both frantically reading on their phones, as Tim and Abby hold Sean, looking at him. Abby’s crying a little, and Tim looks really resigned.

That’s not Jimmy and Breena having a hard time dealing with the timing on Sean’s birth.

Penny puts the bag with the food in it down, and says, “What happened?”

Tim sighs, long drawn out sound. “Our pediatrician just said that Sean’s failed his hearing tests. They ‘don’t know for sure’ but… he’s probably some level of hearing impaired.”

Tim’s phone buzzes. He checks and sees the text from Jimmy. En route. Half an hour away. Need anything?
Everything you remember about infant hearing testing.

TIM??????????????

He failed his hearing tests.

Okay, there soon.

“Our pediatrician told Gibbs and Abbi to get researching. Told us to rest up and take care of Sean. And now, we wait. They’ll retest in a week, and maybe he’ll be fine, maybe not,” Tim says.

“He’s fine!” Abby says it, voice intense and utterly certain. “Whether he can hear or not, he’s fine! He’s not damaged, or broken, or wrong, or… He’s fine. Just a bit different.” She wipes at the tears that are still easing down her face. “He’s fine. Deaf didn’t stop his grandparents from doing anything they wanted to do, and it won’t stop him, either.”

Tim nods at her, kissing her. “No. It won’t.” He looks back to Penny. “The pediatrician said something about people having a lot of intense feelings about cochlear implants. You know anything about that?”

Penny nods, sitting at the foot of Abby’s bed. “Yeah, I do. There’s deaf, and there’s Deaf, one’s a condition, one’s an identity. A lot of Deaf,” and they can hear the capital in her voice, “people aren’t fans of them. The idea being that they damage Deaf culture and identity. Many people who get them don’t learn how to be Deaf. They’re often the children of hearing parents. They never learn to sign. Can’t live in Deaf spaces. Things like that.” Penny shrugs a bit. “What would your parents have thought?” she asks Abby.

Abby just shrugs. “They met at a school for the Deaf. If they could have gone to a regular high school, they’d have never crossed paths. So… for the sake of the family I grew up in, all of that rests on being deaf, but… I think if I could have said to them, here’s this thing that will let you hear—“

“Doesn’t quite work like that,” Abbi says. Gibbs is on hearing aids, and she’s on cochlear implants. “The microphone picks up sound, it turns them into electrical impulses, and then sends them directly into the cochlear nerve. People who could hear, and then get one of these, have to re-learn what the information they’re getting means. So… it’s not the way we do it, but… because it goes right to the brain, if the bits of the ear that do the hearing aren’t working, it still allows the brain to respond to sound.” She pauses, eyes flicking over her screen. “And it’s not a magic bullet, either. What I’m seeing here is that yes, people with them hear sound, but we’re not talking pin drop level sensitivity, and they’re still only looking at 70-80% sentence recognition. Better than hearing aids, but not what you and I do.”

Abby the scientist is somewhat interested in that. Abby the exhausted, hurting, hormonally imbalanced new mom just lets it flow over her. “I think they would have wanted to try. But, there wasn’t Deaf, where I grew up. At least, not the way I think you’re talking about it. It was just something about them, not who they were.” Abby shrugs. “I don’t think it’s anything they ever wanted to be. Other people saw them as Deaf, and they just wanted to be Gloria and Tom.” She kisses Sean, who’s still asleep. “And you’re Sean, and if this is part of being Sean, then this is part of being Sean.”

There’s a lot of quiet studying going on as Tim eats his lunch. He’s got Sean laying on his chest, one hand on his back, as he’s holding chopsticks in the other, eating the chicken and broccoli that Penny brought for him.

He’s not sure what he should be feeling about this. Not sure what he is feeling either.

Abby’s It could be worse seems to sum it up pretty well. Assuming everything else works… it’s, and he’s not sure if he’s supposed to think of it this way, but… assuming Sean’s brain works just fine, it’s not a big deal. They can start teaching the girls how to sign when they get home, and…

They’ll cope. They’ve got money and family to throw at any problems that might come up. If he needs hearing aids or cochlear implants or speech therapy or… whatever… they’re set to do it.

So… more of a problem than being colorblind, less of a problem than being blind… He’s not sure if that’s how he’s supposed to understand this.

He puts the chopsticks down, and steps closer to Abby, who’s sleeping again) and kisses her. This is just who Sean is, and if they’ve got to outsource his hearing to a machine or something… then they do.

And that feeling lasts for a good… maybe three minutes. But, what if deaf, if he is deaf, is just the tip of the iceberg?

No way to know if there’s anything else going on. Not right now. Probably.

“Do they do newborn vision tests?”

Penny looks up from her phone, where she’s reading up on different types of deafness. “No idea, why?”

“Just wondering… They can test this, but… what else might be—“

“Stop that,” Gibbs says. “Nothing good on the end of that sentence.”

Penny nods. “From…” she checks her phone again… “ten minutes of research, it looks like in most cases, deafness is the only issue. And from what I can tell, when it’s part of something else, it’s usually bad enough you can see something is wrong.” Penny glances at Abby. “It’s usually genetic, and… my uncle Samuel was deaf, the family story was that he caught measles as a baby, and when he got better, he couldn’t hear anymore, but, he was a little baby when he got sick, and back then there really wasn’t a way to tell if he could hear before he got sick. He got sick when he was three months old, and everyone was amazed he survived. Gramma called him her miracle. They didn’t know he was deaf until he was a year old. So… it’s probably something lurking in our genes. Probably Abby’s, too.”

Tim doesn’t remember hearing about Penny’s Uncle Sam. “What happened to him?”

Penny shakes her head. “The Navy wouldn’t let him enlist, so he did what a lot of other big strong guys in Boston did to make a living, fishing. That lasted a year or two. He decided fishing out of Boston was boring, and went west. Ended up a prospector in Alaska in the ’20s. He didn’t have to hear to pan for gold. I don’t think he did very well. The boom had been over for a while by then. At least, I’m sure Gramma would have mentioned it if he’s struck it rich, but he stayed out there, and…
I don’t know. Gramma died a year after I moved south with Nelson, and after that I didn’t get any updates on the family that wasn’t in Boston. Mama probably stayed in touch, but…”

Tim sighs. “Bitten by a recessive. Great.”

“You want all the answer now,” Penny says.

“You don’t?”

“Yeah. I do, but… Wanting isn’t having. And having…” she doesn’t finish that sentence. He’s literally standing next to his wife and little boy, holding his breathing child in his arms. He’s got all the have he needs.

Tim nods.

Jimmy, Breena, and Ducky get in a few minutes later.

Tim’s walking Sean around. He’s fussing, and like new parents everywhere, Tim doesn’t know why. He’s fed, diapered, and burped. All of his basic needs at this point should be met, so maybe he’s complaining just to let the world know that he’s not appreciating his lack of womb.

Whatever it is, he’s fussing, and Tim’s humming, patting his back, pacing around as the rest of their family reads (or in Abby’s case, sleeps.)

He gets hugged by all three of them, and then Breena’s giving off the most intense I need to hold the new baby look, so she gets first dibs on Sean. Jimmy and Ducky hover close, watching their tiny boy cry, petting his back, and adding to the general shushing sounds that Breena’s providing.

Jimmy backs off a moment later, hugging Tim again, and very gently leaning over to kiss Abby. She murmurs a bit in her sleep, and settles back down.

“What do you want to know?” Jimmy asks, arm around Tim, as they watch Breena walking Sean around.

“Rate of false positives. Our doctor said sometimes they fail the test but they can really hear.”

Jimmy thinks about that. “They just do one test, or both?”

“Both.”

“One ear, or both?”

“Both.”

Jimmy sighs and shakes his head. “It’s not impossible, but… Unless all the other kids they’re testing today are coming up hearing impaired, it’s not likely.”

Tim exhales long and slow. “You ever…”

“Only two babies failed while I was on OB, and… I don’t know what happened with them. When I was on Pedes, I only did three retests, and none of them were false positives.”
Tim nods. “Okay.”

“That’s an exceptionally small sample size, Tim,” Penny says.

“I know.”

Breena’s bouncing Sean, and Ducky’s crooning something soft to him. He’s not fussing anymore, looks like he’s about to drift off, so Breena gently puts him down again.

Ducky looks up at Jethro, and says, quietly. “This afternoon, I start learning to sign. Sean’s not missing out on any of the stories.”

Gibbs nods at him, and sends back, No problem, you’ll pick it up fast.

“I don’t suppose there’s any signing equivalent of a Scottish accent?” there’s a little smile on his face as he says that.

“We’ll figure one out,” Gibbs replies.

______________________________

They’re getting settled in, talking quietly, just sitting, looking at Sean as he sleeps, holding Tim and Abby, when a new nurse comes in.

“We’re getting a new family in here soon. So, that means two visitors at a time, and being quiet.”

Nods all around, and by unspoken consensus, that means Jimmy and Breena, who haven’t gotten to see Abby awake, get to stay.

______________________________

The absolute last thing Tim wants to do right now is make small talk with strangers. He wants to stay wrapped in this cocoon of family.

Fortunately, the nurses seem to understand that, because the curtain that splits the one side of the room from the other, that Tim had not noticed, is drawn across. So, while they can hear bits of conversation, and from the sound of it, an extremely irate tiny person, he and his family are, at least, invisible.

Sean’s napping. Abby’s napping.

He probably should be, too, but he’s not. He’s sitting on the sofa, with Jimmy and Breena holding onto him. Breena kisses him. “You okay?”

He shrugs. “You?”

She shrugs back at him.

Jimmy gets up, and gently gets Sean out of his bassinette. “I’ll take getting him to sleep on his own duty.” They’ve all done this often enough to know that babies really like sleeping on people, and they tend to get annoyed if you let them sleep on you and then put them in a crib. But, if they start in a crib, it’s a lot easier to get them to keep sleeping in one.

Tim and Breena nod at him. He hasn’t gotten a chance to really hold their boy, yet.
Jimmy walks him around gently, feeling tiny, soft breaths against his collarbone. He gently slips off Sean’s cap, and places his lips on their boy’s head and begins to murmur, “Hello, Sean James. We’ve been waiting for you. So, you’re a little on the small side, so we’re gonna work on that, okay? Little guys like you tend to want to eat every two hours, and that’s a lot of lost sleep for your mama, so we got to get you big and strong and sleeping for three hours at a stretch…” He keeps walking around, just sort of babbling at Sean, telling him how much he’s loved and how much he’s part of the family. Towards the end, as the words are working their way out, he says, “You and your older brother have the same birthday. I wish you could have known him, grown up with him, but that didn’t happen. You’ve got some awesome sisters, you’ll get to see them tomorrow, and a cousin due soon, and you’re going to grow up with such amazing people.

“And, uh… sometimes, if your Aunt Breena and I are a little sad on your birthday, it’s not about you. We love you more than you can imagine, and we’re so happy you’re here. But sometimes life gets hard, and two years ago it got really hard, but your sisters, and your parents, and you… you’re making it easier, helping us get better.” He kisses Sean’s head again, and Sean sleeps on.

He looks up from Sean toward Tim and Breena, both of whom are watching him. They gesture for him to join them on the sofa, and he does, sitting between them, all three of them cuddling their boy.

Tim drifts off into a light doze, but he keeps holding Jimmy, Breena, and Sean.

And for Jimmy and Breena there’s a quiet time of holding this tiny little boy in their arms. He isn’t theirs, not the way Jon was, but he is theirs, too. They have and will be there for every day of his life, help raise him, hold him, comfort him, dry tears, and wipe up diapers, get up in the middle of the night with ear aches, and sing the lullabies, even if they do have to hold him a little differently so he can feel them.

Jimmy can feel Tim pressed into his side, drooling lightly on his shoulder, and he can look over and see Abby sleeping. Being a parent isn’t about providing some DNA. Tim’s did that, and Jimmy absolutely refuses to refer to either of them as “parents.” Abby’s provided none of her DNA, and he’s proud to know their daughter, and wishes he could have known them.

It’s the day in day out care. It’s the time and effort and love. And Jimmy knows he’ll be there for that.

Breena’s mostly holding Sean now, and Jimmy caresses his face. He gives Tim a quick kiss, and Breena. “Our boy.”

She nods and kisses Jimmy. “One of them.”

His return smile is a bit teary as he says, “Yes.”

She laces her fingers with his, and moves them to her tummy. He nods again. Not yet, but soon, maybe… Maybe three boys.
“He can’t hear?” Tony’s asking, phone sandwiched between his ear and shoulder, as he’s got Molly under one arm, and a plate of chicken nuggets in the other hand.

He sets the nuggets in front of Ziva, and returns Molly to the booster seat she’d somehow escaped from when the phone started ringing and he and Ziva were getting excited about baby updates.

Ziva’s chopping up the nuggets for Kelly and Anna, and giving Molly the you behave glare, while simultaneously staring at Tony with alarm at his words.

Tony sits down next to her, and puts the phone on speaker.

“They don’t know ‘for certain,'” Ducky replies. “But… If I were to guess, and Jimmy seems to agree, by ‘for certain’ they mean, ‘It’s possible but extremely unlikely that the test is wrong; however, we don’t want to hit you with too much distressing news on the day your son is born, so we’ll toss you a slim ray of hope while giving you time to get used to the idea.’”

Tony doesn’t think he’s ever heard Ducky be that sarcastically disdainful before.

“You are not thinking those tests are wrong?” Ziva says.

“I would put the odds of failing two different tests, that work in different ways, in both ears, while having intact hearing at exceptionally low. Like their pediatrician said, it’s not impossible but I would consider it so unlikely as to be unworthy of mention. Or, if it were likely, I’d consider those ‘tests’ to be no better than a crap shoot.”

“Ah.” That ‘ah’ out of Ziva covers a lot of ground.

“What…” Tony doesn’t even know what question to ask, so his ‘what’ just trails limply off.

“Exactly,” Ducky says, telling Tony and Ziva all they need to know about what’s going on at the hospital end of the equation. “Right now, we do not know. Right now, there’s nothing to do. Penny’s texting her colleagues at Johns Hopkins to see who might know what about deafness in infants, and I’m searching my list of contacts for anyone who might know someone. Beyond that… We wait.”

“How are Tim and Abby taking it?” Ziva asks.

“Admirably, I’d say, and shocked. They have rallied behind the position that if Sean is deaf, then deaf is exactly the way he’s supposed to be.”

Tony lets out a long sigh. He supposes that that’s the only healthy way to look at it, but… He knows he’s feeling disappointed, and he knows if it was Dave, he’d be sad for lost opportunities. Of course, he supposes Tim doesn’t have any fantasies of teaching his son to play the piano or guitar, no images of late night jam sessions and going to concerts together, and not having them, he can’t lose them.

“How about Jimmy and Breena?” Ziva asks.

“Stuck in the awful position of being elated and wrecked. I’d say they’re doing as well as they can. Happy for Sean, sad for Jon, a bit of guilt for being happy for anything today…”

“All the fun of long-term mourning,” Tony says, remembering how he felt when he enjoyed something with the first of the stepmoms.

“Exactly.”

“Do they want us to keep the girls until the morning?” Ziva asks.

“I do not know. They don’t have a private room, and the rest of us have been sent off. The medical staff may send Jimmy and Breena off at some point, or not. There’s a two visitor limit in effect, now.”

“We’ll call and find out,” Tony says.

Part of the idea of being in the hospital is to rest.

How they think this is possible to do when you’re a brand new parent, with a brand new baby, and thus on ultra-high-alert, and there’s another brand new baby, who makes an almost identical noise, on the far side of a curtain, Breena cannot fathom.

What she does know is that, with the exception of Abby, who is so thoroughly drugged that unless someone touches her, she’s not waking up, none of the three of them can sleep through any of the little sounds echoing out of Sean, or (they caught his name when they heard his Daddy walking him around) Danny, on the other side of the room.

Both of them have that little, cat meow cry, and they’ve got their schedules nicely set so that when one is just settling down, the other starts to fuss.

But this time, the meow is coming from Sean, who’s waking up on Jimmy’s chest. Jimmy gets up to get Sean cleaned up while Breena gently wakes Abby.

“Hi.”

Abby blinks a few times, and then holds out her arms for hugs. Breena kisses her. “He’s beautiful.”

“Yeah,” and a huge smile spreads across Abby’s face. She looks around, sees Jimmy getting him unsnapped from his onesie. “Tim warn you?”

Jimmy nods. “Yep.” He carefully takes the diaper off, and, again, there is no fountaining. “And now you get to keep all of your shirts,” he says in Tim’s direction, but Tim, having ascertained that Jimmy and Breena were on it, just went right back to sleep.

Holding Abby, seeing Tim snoozing away, realizing that he’s able to shut down because he knows that someone is on baby duty, gives Breena a plan.

“Okay. I’m on Sean fetching duty tonight. Jimmy, you’ve got tomorrow. Day after that you get home, right?”

“Maybe?” Abby’s not entirely sure what time or day it is, but that sounds right.

“We’ll say yes for now, and then Tim gets that night. We’ll all rest better if we know someone’s on top of it.”
“We’ll rest better knowing jumping up to get him isn’t our job,” Jimmy adds.

Breena nods, petting Abby’s hair. “What do you need?”

Abby blinks a few times again. “Uh… Maybe some food. Not really hungry, but…”

Without opening his eyes, Tim says, “Bowls of pho broth on the table. Gibbs made sure she’d have good stuff. Seafood and chicken is left.”

“Seafood or chicken?” Breena asks.

Jimmy’s got Sean all cleaned up, and is carrying him over to Abby. “Nurse now, eat when I’m done. Can’t do both at once right now.”

Jimmy hands their little boy off to Breena before getting a big hug from Abby. Sean, who is displeased with not being the star for the moment fusses even louder.

“Hush, you,” Breena says to him. “Food’s coming soon. Your mama gets to have some hugs and cuddles, too.”

Sean is not mollified by that.

Jimmy lets go after a moment, and Sean takes his place, looking annoyed at having to wait an entire minute to eat.

“Yeah, yeah, yeah, you want it and you want it now.” Abby says while getting her breast out. “Here you go, just… wait…” he might be tiny, but even tiny she doesn’t want any weight on her incision. “Okay, there you go. All the milk you want.”

Sean gets latched on and goes to town.

Breena and Jimmy hover close, watching, petting Abby and Sean. “Really good eater,” Breena says, quietly, hoping she’s not disturbing the people on the other side of the room, too badly.

“Yes.” Abby makes little sucking sounds at her son. “Good boy, eat up.”

“He really eating every two hours?”

Abby just looks at Breena blankly. It’s entirely possible that Sean is eating every two hours, but her time sense is completely fried.

She glances to Tim, but nothing comes out of him, so, this time, he’s probably, really asleep. “I’ll ask Tim when he’s awake.”

“What are you thinking?” Jimmy asks.

“That if he really is eating that often, you’re right, that’s not enough rest for Abby. Would you be okay with me getting two, not in a row, feeds tonight? Let you get enough sleep to actually dream?”

Abby nods at that. “Yeah. I’m… not feeling the world will fall apart if I don’t breastfeed every single meal the way I was with Kelly.”

“Good. You’ve got a lot of healing up to do, and that’ll work a lot better if you get to sleep.”

“How are you feeling?” Jimmy asks.
“Right now, I’m pretty good. Not as high as I was last time. I think I’m on different meds. Sore all over. My incision aches, and my shoulder is worse, but not terrible.”

“Want us to get you more pain meds?” Jimmy asks.

Abby looks over at the little button that summons the nurse, and it is on the wrong side for her to easily grab, so she nods.

“Shoulder aches?” That’s a new one on Breena.

“Docs say that air gets stuck inside the incision, and it makes your shoulder hurt.”

“Okay…”

“It happened last time, too.”

Jimmy lays his hand on her right shoulder and she nods, so he starts to gently rub it.

“Don’t get me wrong, that feels nice, but it doesn’t help.”

“Want me to stop?” he asks.

“Didn’t say that.” She sits there for a moment, just feeling taken care of. Then she spends another moment gazing at her son, so completely in love with him. Her finger gently traces over Sean’s perfect, little ear. On the outside, at least, it is perfect. Just like his sister, this is the Platonic Ideal for what an ear is supposed to be. Other than, apparently, for him, it’s only decorative. “Did they tell you…”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah, we know.”

Breena gives her a soft look. “How are you doing?”

Abby shakes her head. “I… He’s fine. His ears work; they don’t, either way, he’s fine. That’s just what he is and anything else…”

“It doesn’t have to be…” Breena starts.

Abby shakes her head again. “Nope. We’re not going there.”

“Okay.”

Abby looks up from her son to her spouses. “I wish you’d met my parents.” Her eyes are tearing at the memory, everything’s making her cry today, but that’s pretty normal. “They were amazing people. Papa was deaf as a post, no hearing at all. Mama could hear a little. Blast the fire alarm right next to her ear and she could just about make it out, that sort of ‘a little.’ They built a business, and a home, and raised two great kids, and…

“And if we’ve got to turn the music up so loud it vibrates the walls for Sean to feel it, well, that’s how I grew up, and it didn’t hurt me any, and it won’t hurt us.

“He’ll dance if he wants to. My parents did. I’ve got a movie of it, from their wedding,” she’s wiping her eyes as she says it. “They liked good, old southern rock and roll, Credence, stuff like that, probably because you could go to any concert or bar and they’d play it so loud they could feel it. It gets in your chest and makes your heart throb, and you get to be the music for a while. I’ve got a little spool of film from their wedding, the band is just whalin’ away on Sweet Home Alabama, and they’re right in front of them, dancing.”
She pets Sean, who’s nursing away, looking awfully content. “You’ll dance, or sing, or… whatever it is, if you want to.”

Abbi wasn’t around for Jon Palmer. He’s before her time with the family.

But, right now, she’s very aware of his shadow all over everything. And not just because of the date, though she assumes that’s part of why she’s feeling him so intensely.

The other part is, as Ducky put it, perspective.

She heard them say that the tests were indicating Sean can’t hear, and it felt like punch. That perfect little boy, not so perfect. He’s broken, and she just felt so disappointed and sad and sorry. Thinking of all the things he won’t/can’t do, and…

And none of the three other people around her are reacting that way at all.

She, Gibbs, Ducky, and Penny have found a coffee shop, and they’re researching, sending out feelers, learning, but… none of them are acting like this is anything more than a logistical problem in need of solving.

(Actually, watching Gibbs, who is going at this exactly the way a Marine trained in logistics is supposed to go at a problem, they could have been told by the pediatrician that 400 people would be showing up at Tim and Abby’s place a week from now and it’s their job to make sure they’re all fed, given a place to stay, and have enough clean clothing and showers.)

This is just… something to be researched, and handled and then… dealt with.

Maybe the other three are sad or disappointed or something, but… she’s not feeling it. All she’s feeling is intense learn everything/problem solving mode. What can happen? What should happen? Who should be doing it?

They’re on top of all of that.

And none of them are mourning, because this time two years ago, they were mourning.

She supposes, that if she had been here two years ago, and had buried one of their babies, she’d be able to look at this as just a hiccough. But she wasn’t, so she doesn’t.

Their boy can’t hear, and that makes her sad.

Ducky’s online, hunting down ASL software/videos. He intends to have everything he might want or need to learn this, by the end of the day.

He was only half joking about the ‘Scottish accent’ bit.

Sean can’t hear an accent, of course. But… It’s while he’s reading through and watching little bits of videos, that it’s hitting him that words won’t be sounds for Sean, they’ll be movements. He won’t live in a world of long vowels or short vowels, of sounds slipping past lips. A whisper will be a feeling, breath on a cheek, as opposed to a susurrated voice. Shouts will be emphatic gestures and the force of skin hitting skin.
He supposes that’s worst case scenario. If Sean has no hearing at all, and cannot use a cochlear implant.

If he can do hearing aids or implants, then… Sound will be something, but Ducky doesn’t know what.

Penny nudges him gently, and glances to the clock overlooking their table in the coffee shop. He nods back. “We have to get moving if we’re going to make New York before it gets too late.”

“You have a full charge?” Abbi asks. She remembers the guys talking about the range on their car.

“That’s why we came here,” Penny replies. “We’ve been charging the whole time.” The four of them stand up and share hugs. “Give us a call if anything comes up, okay?”

Gibbs nods. “We’ll call even if it doesn’t. I’ll be back again tomorrow, get more pictures.”

“Good.” Penny hugs him again. “I want all of them.”

“Penny’s in conferences all day tomorrow. I however, have free time. Skype me when you get a chance, and we’ll work on signing,” Ducky says to Jethro.

“Sure.”

With Penny and Ducky on the road, there’s not much reason for Gibbs and Abbi to hang around, either.

“You mind if we go back to the house. Back up for Tony and Ziva?”

“Not at all. I’ll send a text, and see what they want us to bring home for dinner.”

They’re on the road, Abbi’s driving, meaning they’re alone, in private. She asks Gibbs, “How can you be this calm?”

Gibbs knows she doesn’t mean how are you functioning on this level? They both spent years being trained to function like this under stress, and then spent more years honing those skills and teaching them to others. He shoots her a look of mute appeal. Don’t make me talk about this.

So, Abbi backs off, staring at the road, getting them closer to Tony, Ziva, and little girls. It’s about ten minutes later when Gibbs gets it together enough in his head to say, “Lot of reasons. If this is a tragedy, what does that say about our boy? That we’re not happy for him? That his birth wasn’t a joy because he’s not ‘right?’ Not going there. We have enough good reasons to be sad today, don’t need to add a bad one to the list.

“And… I never met Gloria or Thomas, but… how upset about this can I get and not insult Abby? If this is they sky falling in, then I’m saying her boy’ll do worse than her parents did. And do it with more technology, more money, and more extended family support than they did. Not going there, either.”

And both of those things are true, but they’re not the heart of it. And Abbi can feel that, so she listens, and by the tilt of her head and the crook of her eyebrow, lets him know to keep talking.
Gibbs sighs a bit, watching the road zipping by. “When Abby was pregnant with Kelly, we got a little scare, and… it was right after what was going on with Tim and John came out, and… I was talking with Penny, yelling at her some, but… Her point was that Tim wasn’t what The Admiral wanted, he wasn’t hard or tough enough or… whatever bullshit he wanted. We… I didn’t know if they’d ever have another baby. But I remember thinking about that, about Tim being a quiet, sensitive boy, who probably cried when he was upset, and wanted to read and play make-believe games instead of rough-house or play sports, and I was wondering how I would have done with that son.”

Abbi looks a little alarmed by that. Gibbs holds up a hand. “Not like John. I know that. But… Kelly, both of them, could or can be as fluffy and girly as they like. That never has or will bug me. All the pink lace and sparkles and tutus and… I’m fine. I’ve done tea parties in full dress uniform, and who knows, maybe I will again? Molly’d probably like that, and it’d tickle Breena pink.” Gibbs suddenly has a very intense sense memory of doing that with Kelly and Maddie, along with the idea of Molly, Kelly, and Anna, all a few years older, doing their own tea parties. He’s actually looking forward to it.

“You still have you dress blues?”

“Somewhere. Not sure I could get into them… anyway… I’d been thinking about Tim as a kid, and… How would I have done with a gentle little boy? And then, I didn’t know if I’d ever get the shot to find out, but I knew that no matter what, if that little boy ever came to be, he’d have a tough, old Marine Gunny who loved him no matter who he was.

“So, this is, maybe, who he is… Part of it, at least.”

That makes sense to Abbi, but doesn’t feel like all of it. “You can love someone unconditionally, and still be sad for what they don’t have.”

Gibbs shrugs. “I’m sure you can, but… Don’t want to think about it as he’s lost something.”

“But he has. What if he wants to be a big, tough Marine Gunny like his Pop?”

Gibbs sighs. Then he shrugs. “Lot of time between now and then. They’re letting amputees back into the service. If he’s thinking military, by the time he could enlist, who knows what they’ll have? Who knows what the Marines’ll be then? Might all be computer game controllers and drones. And if he can’t do whatever it is… Fuck that. He’ll do it! We will get him to where he needs to be to do the stuff he wants to do. Twenty-years from now, if he wants it, we’ll stand there at Annapolis and celebrate the… sixth?”

“Seventh?”

Gibbs shrugs at that, too. “McGee to graduate from there.”

Abbi smiles gently at him. “Hoorah!”

Gibbs nods and adds a prayer of his own. “Amen.”

Sarah peeks her head into the room a bit after dinner time. Glenn’s not with her, so only Jimmy ducks out so she can get some time with her brother and nephew.
Once Abby’s done nursing, and settles back into her sleep, Sarah’s snuggling the little boy, petting him, staring into big murky blue eyes that gaze up into hers, Tim’s not sure what to say.

It feels stupid. She’s been asking about when he was born and how the surgery went and how everyone’s doing, and he’s having this conversation, just like with Kelly, all the details and whatnot, and… There’s this huge thing that he doesn’t know how to say.

And, it’s not like other things he hasn’t known how to or wanted to say, it’s… He’s got no idea of how to put it into the conversation. He supposes he could have worked it in to the part where she’s asked, “And he’s okay, right?” would have done, but… He said yes, because Sean is okay. He’s the right size and weight and breathing fine and all of his bits are attached and…

And he’s deaf, (Tim’s already jumped to that conclusion. Maybe he’ll be pleasantly surprised in a week, but… that’s a week from now.) and for most people that is not fine.

He can feel Breena watching this, because of course, she knows, but she doesn’t know how Tim wants to handle this.

Finally, after another moment of watching his sister coo at her nephew, he sighs and comes up with, “How do you feel about learning to sign?”

Sarah, who had been carefully inspecting all of Sean’s fingers, each one of them clasped around one of her index fingers, looks up at Tim, shocked. “Tim?”

“That may be his main form of communication, and if it is, I’m wondering if you and, to a lesser extent, Glenn, will be willing to learn, so you can talk to him yourself.”

She licks her lips, looking back down at the little guy on her lap. Then she looks back up to Tim. “He’s deaf?”

“Probably. Retest again in a week, but…”

“Oh…” It slips out of her as her shoulders hunch in, and she looks back down at Sean. “Oh, baby.” Pity is oozing out of her voice.

“Eh! None of that,” Tim says, leaping into Protective Papa mode.

Now she’s looking at him, confusion on her face. “You just said he’s probably deaf!” They hear the people on the other side of the curtain just stop talking, and Sarah realizes that was probably too loud.

“I know,” Tim replies, quiet. “But I also know this is a no-pity zone.”

“It’s not pity, it’s just… He’s deaf! Everything is going to be so much harder, and he’ll never hear a ——”

“No! Not in front of me or him. Have that conversation with Glenn if you want to, but not here.”

“He can’t hear me say it!”

“But I can, Breena can, and if she wakes up, Abby will, so stop it! Only thing I need to know is if he needs you to go the extra mile so you can talk to him, will you do it?”

“Of course.” She gives her brother a bit of a shove. “Just because I’m not all happy about this doesn’t mean I won’t do what I need to.”
That’s a wall of frustration for Tim. “Sarah, there’s no line between this and him. You can’t be, ‘I hate you’re deaf but love you.’ This isn’t a bad habit he’s picked up, or something he can control. This is part of who he is.”

Sarah, who has a very clear distinction between Sean and Deaf, is not on the same page as Tim, but she’s willing to humor him. “Can I hate the fact that he’s going to have a harder time in life than his sister will?”

Tim sighs. He’s too tired and fried for this. “Just… whatever. I’m glad you’re willing to learn to sign.”

“But I might not have to?”

Tim shrugs. “A week before we’ll know. Maybe with hearing aids he’ll be able to hear well enough the rest of you won’t need to learn. Maybe. It’ll probably be a long time before we know that, so you might as well start getting it down. It’s not a cinch, but I thought it was easier than French.”

“Okay. He’s going to learn to sign the way everyone else learns to talk, one word here, another there… probably start doing it at what… eight months, a year?”

Tim nods; he assumes that’s right.

“I’m sure I can keep pace with an eight-month-old.” She flashes Tim a little smile, and he smiles back, not too warmly, but he appreciates that she’s trying to keep this from turning into a huge emotional scene.

Breena adds, “With any luck, he’ll also learn to speak that way, at the same time. Even before hearing aids and cochlear implants they were able to teach deaf people to speak, so… We’ll figure it out.”

That makes sense to Sarah. “So, he’d need to see the signing before he can do it, right? Babies understand before they can talk, and if no one’s signing at him, he won’t have anything to understand?”

That makes sense to Tim. “I think so. I have a feeling that as soon as his eyes are sharp enough to pick it up, every conversation at our home will be signed and spoken.”

“That why you’re not doing it now?” Obviously, Tim’s right here, and for the moment, Sean’s awake and with them.

“He can only see eight inches to a foot away. It’d just be a blur. Two, three months, and we’ll start. Get his sisters signing, too.”

Breena realizes something with that. “That would probably be good for Anna. She’s not talking yet, and we can see her get frustrated when she wants something and can’t tell us what.”

Sarah nods. “I’ve read about that, teaching babies how to sign because it’s easier than speaking.”

“Yep,” Breena says.

“Show me, ‘Hello, Sean’.”

So Tim does, and slowly, with some stumbling on his name, Sarah signs it to her nephew. By that point, his eyes are getting droopy, and it’s time to find his bassinet.
Sarah’s the last of the first day visitors. Tony and Ziva and the girls will be by in the morning. Tim, Breena, and Jimmy settle in, and get ready for their first night of hands-on parenting of Sean James McGee.

Time might not matter much in a maternity ward, but things do slow down a bit at night, especially once everything is stable.

Breena gets Sean’s 10 o’clock feed. She’s got him snuggled into the crook of her arm, the tiny two ounce bottle of formula in her hand.

For a moment he’s nuzzling her breast, looking for a latch, and seeming fairly confused by the concept of the shirt between them. But, eventually he consents to suck on the squishy thing she’s slipped between his lips, and… she laughs a bit, the look on his face at the formula is pretty funny.

“Not what you were expecting, huh?”

He gives another almost tentative suck, but apparently decides this is okay and gets down to it.

She hums quietly as he nurses. Unlike Jimmy, she doesn’t say anything to him, not because he can’t hear, but because she doesn’t have words. For a moment, there’s just content. Tomorrow there’ll be things to read and learn and work to do and the rest of life, but right now, she gets to hold a tiny little boy, inhale his new baby scent, feel his suede soft skin and feel the glow of this tiny, perfect life in her arms.

And right now, that’s more than enough.
Day Two

For Abby, the first day of Sean’s life is a fuzzy, achy, tired blur with tiny bits of very, hyper-real moments. She’s not sure if that’s a good thing or not.

What she does know is that there’s nothing wrong with her little boy. If he can’t hear, he can’t hear, and that’s that.

Day two, that’s when things start coming back into focus.

Unfortunately, day two starts way too damn early (4:00) and involves the dreaded get out of bed.

Breena got Sean’s ten and two feeds, which means Abby’s only really out of it as opposed to a literal zombie. But, out of it or not, as she’s wrapping up the 4:00 feed, and handing Sean back to Breena, a nurse shows up.

“It’s been twenty-four hours, time to get you unhooked.”

And, yes, Abby’s looking forward to not being tethered to a catheter or an IV, but the bit that happens after that, where she says, “Okay, now, up you get.” And then the nurse stands there, arms out, expecting her to somehow twist her poor, sad, cut apart body that’s only being held together by scabs and will power, to the side of the bed, and then stand up, and then walk around some…

Just like with Kelly, she does it, but… It hurts. She’s got this horrible feeling that everything’s about to come spilling out, and…

It’s just not good all over.

Breena’s watching Abby get up and hobble around some, and coming to a very rapid conclusion. A gazillion gallons of hormones have crashed into her girl, who appears to be in pain and emotional distress, and they’re about to cause some very bad crying.

“Come on,” she gets and arm around Abby, because like with every other brand new mom, the lure of the shower is held out like some sort of miracle bath that makes everything better, and she’s shuffling herself toward the bathroom.

They get in there, and Breena starts to strip off, too, planning on getting in with Abby and helping her get washed off. As she’s about to pull her shirt over her head, Breena pauses, and kisses Abby. She holds her hands on Abby’s shoulders, and makes sure she’s looking her in the eye. “You’ve got this!”

Abby nods, and then pulls off the gown, and looks at herself in the mirror.

This time she doesn’t immediately burst into tears.

It doesn’t hit that hard this time.

Abby looks, and she’s not thrilled by what she sees, more stretch marks, and bruises, and swollen, puffy legs, and a Frankenstein’s monster scar, but, she’s not wrecked this time.

She doesn’t feel ruined.

Maybe it’s just that having Breena around is good for the soul, or maybe it’s that having someone who’s got the stretch marks and the saggy boobs and butt, who’s stood exactly where she is, with the blood smeared thighs and the smell of antiseptic and amniotic fluid all over her, staring in the mirror, seeing the train wreck, and survived it, maybe that helps.

Of course, maybe it’s the fact that the woman looking in the mirror who’s done all of that, this time, is her.

Whatever it is, she doesn’t feel nearly as wrecked this time around.

By the time she’s gotten her shower, and dried off, and into soft, comfy clothing, by the time Breena’s brushed out her hair, which felt insanely good, and helped her get back to the bed, Sean’s just about ready to eat again.

“This every two hours thing can’t last.”

Breena nods. “He’s got to get bigger. Fast.”

“They look comfy,” Abby says quietly about Tim and Jimmy, who are in their usual have-the-bed-to-themselves positions, Jimmy on his back and Tim spooning them. For a second, Abby wonders what will happen if one of the people on the other side of the curtain were to come back here, but… The nurse already did, and she didn’t even glance at them. (At least, as well as Abby can remember.) “I’m up, and I can get him, you want to wiggle in between them and get a bit more sleep before Tony, Ziva, and the girls get here?”

Just the mention of that sets Breena yawning. She may have enjoyed her flickering blue hours with Sean, but she also wants to sleep. “Yes.”

Breena gets herself on Jimmy’s other side, and in a moment there’s the soft, almost snore of her breathing. Abby shuffles over to Sean, and he’s on his back, eyes closed, sleeping like a baby.

She wonders if he dreams, and if he does, what he may dream of. Warm, wet, the thudding of her heart and gurgle of her digesting food? Maybe.

His eyes don’t flicker, so maybe he’s in light sleep.

She very, very gently gets her hands under his butt and head, and lifts him to her chest. He doesn’t wake up, but he does snuggle in against her, tiny warm patch of skin, his face, against her neck. When she gets home, where she’s in charge of the thermostat, she’ll get to hold him skin to skin, but she knows she thinks it’s too nippy in here to not be covered in clothing, so she can’t imagine Sean would enjoy extended skin time, either. But when they’re home and warm…

Abby smiles, she’s looking forward to that.

She’s also looking forward to something else, in a few hours, Tony, Ziva, and the girls will be here, and they’ll get to see their little brother for the first time.

Abby hears them before they get into the room. Loud, happy signing, is echoing down the hallway as well as Ziva’s voice saying, “Molly, people are trying to sleep. Hush, baby.”

“I CAN’T! We’re gonna see Sean!”

“Molly Keira!” She’s never heard Tony attempt Dad-voice before, but it suits him. The singing quiets down, a little bit.

Abby chuckles at that, and stops fast, any sort of laughing hurts, but she holds the amusement, knowing what that sort of excited feels like, and not at all minding the fact that she’s only got to visit it today, instead of try to manage it on her own. The sound of the kiddos closing on their room, gets her three companions up. So, they’re all sitting up, looking various levels of disheveled and muzzy, as Tony, Ziva, and the girls round the corner.

Ziva’s got a good grasp on Molly, and Tony’s got Anna in his arm but they let Kelly go forward, and she’s picked up, rapidly, by her Daddy, who greets her with a huge, warm hug, and kisses, and then carries her to her mom.

“Oh, you’ve got to be really, really, really gentle. Mama’s very sore, and Sean’s really tiny, okay?”

Kelly smiles at him for a second, she’s pleased to see him, but he’s not the star attraction. She’s staring at her mom.

“Mama!”

Abby knows who her baby wants, and it’s not the new little interloper on her chest. “Hey, baby. C’mere.” She and Tim trade so that Kelly gets the hugs and Sean gets shown off to the girls who are somewhat more interested in him and less interested in Abby. (Well, Molly’s very interested in Sean, Anna’s pretty indifferent to this whole thing, beyond the fact that she’s in a new place and checking everything out.)

“Not home,” Kelly says, voice accusing.

Abby kisses her daughter again. “I know. Tomorrow. I’ll be home tomorrow. My tummy’s sore and I’ve got to stay here a little while longer for it to get better.”

“All better?”

Abby shakes her head. “Nope. But enough better. You want to meet your little brother?”

Kelly snuggles in closer to her mama. She doesn’t say no, but they’re all getting a clear ‘no’ sort of vibe off of her. She wants mama-time. But, wanting to meet him or not, he’s part of the family now, so…

Tim pries him away from Molly, who has decided that Sean is the greatest thing in the history of great things, and brings him over, half sitting on the bed with the two of them. He doesn’t attempt to give Sean to Abby, it’s very clear that right this second Kelly’s feeling very territorial about her mom.
He does angle Sean a bit so Kelly can see him easily, and says, “This is Sean. Your little brother. He’s going to come home with us. Just like Molly and Anna do.”

They’ve been over it before, but how much a one-and-a-half-year-old understands about these things is always kind of nebulous.

Kelly gives him the side eye; she’s not sure she wants a brother.

Molly, who is all in favor of a little brother, is trying to scramble up onto the bed as well, with limited success, because her Daddy is also on the job, and doing what he can to make sure that Abby and Sean don’t get swamped.

Jimmy quietly says, “How about I take Sean, and let Kelly soak up some Mommy and Daddy time.”

Tim nods, that seems to be the order for the day.

Ziva snags Sean from Jimmy about two tenths of a second after he got him. And, with baby girls occupied and the two visitor limit in effect, Jimmy and Breena go off in search of food, with Anna, who’s not terribly interested in anything besides Mama-time of her own.

Ziva sits down on the fold out bed with Sean, Tony on one side, Molly curling up against her on the other, and the three of them do the somewhat normal ‘brand new baby’ routine of looking at him, petting him, checking out finger and toes and all the rest of it.

Molly’s holding her hand against Sean’s, his palm just a fraction of hers, marveling in a (somewhat, for a toddler) quiet voice about how little he is.

Sean goes with the flow for a few minutes before bursting into tears, which has very little to do with the attention, and a whole lot to do with it’s time for him to go to sleep again.

Tony’s looking a bit panicky at the little crying person in his arms, but he does hum to him enough to get him calmed down, and then put into his bassinette, where, after a bit more fussing (and Tim saying, “It’s okay, just let him lie, he’ll settle down,” as Tony’s about to snatch him right back up again when he doesn’t immediately fall asleep) he decides to go back to sleep.

Ziva watched him do it, huge smile on her face. He was walking gently, little bounce in his step, humming, lips pressed to the top of Sean’s head, hand rubbing up and down Sean’s back, and for all that he doesn’t think he’s a natural at this, he’s doing an awfully good job of it.

Once Sean’s down, Ziva stands up, next to Tony, and both of them watch him settle down, eyes starting to droop, pacifier sucking slowing down.

“He looks so much like Tim,” Ziva says. She saw the pictures, and everyone else said that, too, but looking at it face to face…

Tony nods and kisses her cheek. Then he heads over and gives Abby and Tim hugs, as well. Now that Sean’s sleeping, they get attention.
With two girls in the room, there’s really not much in the way of time for adult conversation. A lot of the visit is managing the somewhat older babies, and making sure they don’t break anything.

So, while there are things Tony and Ziva might like to say to Tim and Abby, most of it gets wrapped up in, “Molly, stop that!” “Kelly, No! Mama’s sore there!” “Molly!”

After about half an hour, Jimmy and Breena are back with food, and Tony and Ziva decide to let them eat, and, for the first time since Friday night, get some time to relax on their own.

As they drive away, Tony turns to Ziva and says, “We are never having three kids.”

She throws her head back and laughs.

With Ziva and Tony gone, that means the McPalmer branch is busy handling their own little dudes, which A: they have more practice at and B: said little dude are somewhat aware (okay, Molly and Kelly are) that Aunt Ziva and Uncle Tony are sort of softies when it comes to them, but the various and sundry Mommies and Daddies are not, so it’s time to behave a bit better.)

It also means, that, assuming said Mommies and Daddies who did not suddenly go on new parent leave want to get to work, they’ve got to get moving.

Which is when the reality that Kelly does not, on any level, want to be separated from her Mama sets in. She’s in the midst of an absolute screaming fit at the idea of having to leave. So, plan A, which had been Jimmy and Breena take the girls home, Kelly stays with Heather, Palmer girls go to daycare, and then they go to work, switches up a bit.

For the time being, Breena’ll stay with Abby. Tim, who isn’t Mama, but is the most tolerable alternative, is going home with Kelly (and as they think about it some more, Jimmy remembers that Tim’s got his appointment with Rachel today, and given what’s happened this last weekend that he should probably go) and hopefully getting Kelly settled back into her normal routine with Heather, will help her calm down.

Jimmy’s got his girls and getting them off to daycare, and when Gibbs shows up (they’re a bit surprised he’s not here already, but they assume he’ll be in soon) Breena will head in to work.

All sorted out, the day, officially, begins.

“Are you on administrative leave, Tim?” Rachel asks as he heads into her office six minutes late. Tim’s never late. He’s either five minutes early, or she gets a text saying he won’t be coming because of some sort of work thing.

No text and late was actually making her worry some, and him in jeans, an old MIT sweatshirt, and sneakers, a faint bruise on his eye, plus what happened two weeks ago, she comes to the conclusion that he’s not visiting her from work today, and why. She is correct about half of her assessment.

For a second, he doesn’t know what she’s talking about, looking utterly startled, and then notices he’s in jeans, a t-shirt, sweater, and sneakers.

“Uh. No. As of 4:00 on Sunday, I’m on paternity leave.” He smiles as he says that, fishes his phone out of his pocket and shows her the pictures.

Rachel smiles with relief and takes the phone from him. And, flipping through, she’s got a dozen pictures of a tiny baby being held by everyone in the extended McGee clan. “Congratulations!” She looks at one of the close ups of Sean. “Oh, Lord, he’s your Mini Me!”

Tim inclines his head. “So they say. I won’t say I don’t see it,” he’s looking at Sean over her shoulder, and those eyes are really obvious, “but… I don’t see it as much as everyone else does.”

“No one ever does.” She hands the phone back. “Not that I’m not glad to see you, but… shouldn’t you be home, with your baby and wife?”

He inclines his head at that, too. “The brains of the operation suggested that, since my wife is sleeping, and Gibbs is with her, and my baby is a day old, and couldn’t care less if I’m in the room or not, that I should spend some time with my daughter, who cares very much if I’m around, and then come see you.” He takes his phone back and sits down.

“You’re not the brains?”

“Not today. Jimmy’s got that title for the moment. Let someone who’s getting some sleep make the decisions seems like a good idea.”

“At least, not a bad one.” She nods at him. “So… What did Jimmy think was important enough for you to come chat with me instead of rescheduling?”

She really isn’t expecting Tim to start laughing, but he does. “Uh… Well, on Saturday, it would have been about… Uh… Did you see the news about the admiral arrested at the Tech in Anti-Terror Conference?”

She nods. “Beyond that, I noticed which admiral was arrested, and who did the arresting, and the rather interesting press conference that followed it hosted by NCIS’s Director and Director of Cybercrime.”

“Yeah, well, on Saturday, that was the big thing.” He swallows. “On Sunday, we had Sean, and got the news that he’s probably deaf, and… you know, that kind of blew all the shit with The Admiral out of the water. Um… So… You’re the Pro. Where do we start?”

Rachel sighs. Tim’s right, that’s… “Are you okay?”

“Yeah.” He holds up both wrists, realizes he’s got a sweatshirt on, so all she’s looking at is the cuffs of his sweatshirt, pulls them down, and shows off his wrists. “No rubber band. Haven’t had a panic attack in weeks. And… It seems like people who aren’t part of the close family are more upset about Sean than I am. My sister had a more… intense… reaction than I did.”

“Intense how? Or better yet, tell me how you’re doing, and if you need to contrast it with her to do it, that’s fine.”

“I’m okay. Um… I mean… I get this is a big deal, but…” Tim winces, aware of how this might sound, “but it’s also not.” He sighs at that. “God, that sounds like world class denial, right?”

“Probably” says Rachel’s look. “Depends on why you think it’s not a big deal,” comes from her lips.

“From the reading we’re doing, it looks like he has some form of non-syndromic deafness. Meaning he’s just deaf. It doesn’t go along with anything else. So, all other systems should be normal. Just like his big sister he should be wicked smart, and curious, and interested in everything, and… Okay, you know? And, it’s not like being blind. Almost anything he might want to do, he’ll be able to do. He might have a hard time as a linguist because speech will likely be a problem on some level, but… it wouldn’t stop him from learning other languages and writing and reading and… I mean, if he wanted it… He’d probably have to work a lot harder for it, depends on how deaf he is, but… It’s not like he might want to be a blind test pilot. There’s pretty much nothing that being deaf makes you completely unsuited for. He could… be a piano tuner by feel if he wanted to.

“Unless he’s completely deaf, unable to use hearing aids or cochlear implants, he’ll be able to go to school normally, he’ll be able to ‘hear,’ he’ll learn to talk… So… It’s not a big deal… but it is… but…” Tim shrugs.

“And if he can’t hear at all?”

“Jethro, Abby, and I already sign, and the rest of us will, too. We’ve got the money to make sure he can go to a great school for deaf kids, or for an interpreter to translate speech into sign if the best school for whatever he wants to do isn’t set up for deaf kids. We’ve got Gibbs, who’s retired now, and is more than willing to kick extra time into this if he needs extra shuttling around to speech therapists or whatever. We’re invested in making sure he does okay, and we have the resources to do it. So… I mean… Is that denial?”

She flashes him her patient look. “It sounds like a very healthy way of understanding it. Is it real?”

Tim sighs at that, too. “Feels real. But, I haven’t gotten more than three hours of sleep in a row since Friday night, so…” Yes, Breena was getting up with Sean, but that doesn’t mean he didn’t wake up, at least a little, at each chirp. He’s hopeful that home, in his or Jimmy’s bed, he’ll sleep right through on the nights that aren’t his.

She smiles at that. “It’s always fun to work with people as self-aware as you are.”

“If you like that, try this one… So, um… I actually didn’t read most of the coverage of my fight with The Admiral. So, I don’t really know what you know about it. On my end, the Cliff Notes version is that I came out to him at the conference, he decked me,” Tim gently taps the almost healed bruises on his orbital, “and I dropped him. Then Tony arrested him for assault and a hate crime, and off to Leavenworth he’s gone.”

“You came out to him?” Rachel doesn’t look nearly as startled by that idea as she could, so Tim decides that idea isn’t completely out of the blue to her. He’s not shocked.

Tim licks his lips. “Getting into that will distract me from what I’m thinking about now, and if that happens I’ll never get back to it.”

“I’ll ask again later.”

Tim notices she doesn’t have to make a note to remember that. “Thanks. Anyway, I finally get to win. He’s down, I’m up, and besides a cracked orbital, all is right with the world. Sean shows up, and I guess we got eight, maybe ten hours before we knew about the hearing, and… There he is, my prefect little boy, looks just like me. Ten fingers, ten toes, big blue eyes, tiny bit of blond fuzz. Perfect.

“That was me for a while. According to my grandmother, in the almost literal sense, given how much alike we look. I mean… I was perfect to him for a while. Probably until I was two or three or something like that. Until it was clear that I wasn’t a water baby, and Admiral McGee The Third wasn’t going to happen. And, when I wasn’t perfect, he turned on me. He decided he was going to make me perfect, and if he had to break me to do it, then he’d break me.”
Tim shrugs. “Sean can’t hear. He’s literally not perfect. He’s broken. That’s how some of the nurses are looking at him, and I know I’ve heard the guys on the other side of the curtain asking quietly to one of them if Sean can be ‘fixed.’” Tim shakes his head. “And I can’t do that to him. I lived a version of it, and… No. My boy is perfect just the way he is. He’s perfect the way I didn’t get to be. So are his sisters and cousin. And, that’s all I need on that. I hope that’s all he’ll need on that, too.”

He smiles a little. “Um… I read somewhere that people with lousy parents tend to have issues with parenting themselves. No good role models for how to do it. Either fall into the same mistakes their parents made, or reject everything they did and make all new mistakes. So… Maybe this isn’t good, but I’m not making his mistakes. I’ll make my own damn mistakes on this one!”

Rachel smiles at that, nodding. “I’m sure you will. And it sounds like you’re on track to make healthier mistakes than your parents did.”

“I hope so, granted, that hurdle’s so low it’s in danger of melting from the heat of the Earth’s core.”

She chuckles at that, too. “Are you worried?”

“About making my own mistakes? Sean? Fallout from The Admiral mess?”

Rachel also looks pleased by him having that list. “Let’s start with Sean.”

“Not more than I was with Kelly at this age, and probably a little less. I’ll still drive them home ten miles an hour under the speed limit and try to swerve around every pothole, but I’m not afraid of breaking him if I breathe wrong the way I was with Kelly.”

“So, you’re officially not a virgin parent anymore.” It’s clear by her look that Rachel remembers how taking baby number two home was different from baby one.

“Yeah. Kelly’s a bit iffy about Sean, and not happy about missing out on her mom-time. I got her home, and fortunately Heather got there shortly after, and she’s Kelly’s second favorite person, so that went over pretty well, but if Abby’s around she wants to be glued to her.”

“All perfectly normal in an eighteen-month-old with a new little brother.”

“Yep. So, I’m not worried about it, but not looking forward to trying to juggle two babies wanting constant attention. I have the feeling that Kelly’s not going to approve of nursing time.”

“But you’ll handle it.”

“Exactly.”

“How about longer-term with Sean?”

Tim sighs. “Next week they’ll retest his hearing, make sure the first tests were right, and then… I don’t know what happens then. Lots of doctors appointments and tests and conversations about what to do. Lots of research. Ducky and Penny probably already have the list of every specialist we need to see in a two hundred miles range. And Gibbs and Abbi have been reading up on hearing aids and cochlear implants. So, at some point, we’re going to get a massive info dump, but I think that’s waiting for us to get past the ‘brand new baby!’ stage.”

“How about Jimmy and Breena? Jimmy’s a doctor, right? What are they doing?”

“Keeping us sane. We’ve been… mostly… we still have our own houses, but we swap between them… living together for several months now, so… Sean’s tiny. He eats every two hours. For the time being, Jimmy, Breena, and I are swapping nights. Each of us gets one night of Sean fetching, clean up, and two night feeds. That way Abby gets at least two stretches of four hours of sleep in a row. And honestly, if Abby can take the pain, I’d be in favor of all the night feeds being bottle feeds. He can nurse during the day, and then, once she’s healed up, all four of us can swap out nights. I have a feeling we’ll all be better off with three full nights of sleep for every night on baby duty.”

There’s a lot of information in that paragraph, and Rachel takes a moment to parse it. Finally, she says, “I take it this is connected to ‘coming out’ to your father?”

“Yeah. Since I got back from the Stennis the four of us have been together.”

She flashes him a curious and… not disapproving, but not entirely comfortable look, either. “Interesting timing.”

“Almost getting killed puts things into perspective.”

Rachel nods at that.

“You’re wondering if we rushed into something stupid because we were afraid.”

She raises an eyebrow at him. He said it; she didn’t. “Do you think you did?”

“No. I think, after the year I’ve had, that I’d still be wearing that rubber band and probably on medication without them.”

Rachel appears to think that’s an interesting answer, too. “How does Abby feel about that?”

Tim inclines his head, not understanding the question.

“That she isn’t enough,” Rachel elaborates.

“Why would that bug her? I’m talking to you, too. And Gibbs, and Penny, and… Is Abby supposed to be so territorial over me that those relationships are supposed to bug her? I mean, who in the world has just one person to cover every possible need they may have? And more than that, if I only had one person to cover everything, you would tell me that’s not healthy.”

Rachel gives him a long look before saying, “Good point.”

Tim has the sense that she’s thinking that highly-intelligent, self-aware people are also really good liars when it comes to spinning a version of an emotional life they want other people to believe they have, but she hasn’t said it, and all he can do is tell her what’s going on, and then live it, so he keeps talking, “She doesn’t think it’s a competition. I don’t, either. I’ve told you how when I was in the Navy Yard, Jimmy got Abby and Kelly out. Was I supposed to be… jealous or… I don’t know… upset about that? He protected them, got them out safe when I wasn’t in a position to do it. If I’d had half a brain in my head, I’d have gone, too.” Tim shrugs. “Four is easier. I mean, I wouldn’t want to try it with the wrong group of people, or the wrong sorts of relationships. This would be hell if you weren’t all in on it, but… More support, more time to yourself, more time with your loves, the kids get more attention, you get more rest. Hell, dollars and cents, if we ever scale down to one house, more money… It just… works better.”

Rachel doesn’t look like she knows what to say to that.

“So, to answer the original question, Jimmy and Breena are keeping us afloat. They’re making sure I do stuff like come see you. They spent the night in the hospital last night, when they certainly didn’t need to, just to make sure we were okay. When Kelly was born, I was helping Abby get moving around and washed off after they let her out of bed, and... It was okay, but... I'm a guy. I might be in line for Sensitive-Husband-of-the-Year award, but I'm still not a woman, I've never had a baby, I don't know what it's like, and all the blood meant I just about passed out the minute I got some alone time. This time Breena had her, and it went better. Abby gets the support of someone who's been there, done that, and knows what it's like. So, she's got better support, which means she's in a better place, and that makes us all better.

“And... we did this with teething, and depending on what sort of sleeper Sean is, we may be doing it again after he's home. Kelly and Anna were cutting teeth at the same time and completely miserable. So, two of us take the crabby babies, the other two take the healthy baby and get to sleep in a house that doesn't have screaming children in it. And then we swap around. Which means the crabby babies aren't constantly being parented by exhausted, crabby adults. The exhausted crabby adults know that in the next day or so there will be real sleep. Everyone is better off in that situation.”

Rachel does nod at that, and Tim has the sense that she's agrees, at least with the 'everyone being better when the grown-ups get to sleep' part of it.

“So, they're loving us. And in a bit, when we start getting hit with options and tests and piles of medical talk, I'll have a doctor who loves our son beyond all reason, who's looking out for him, helping to guide us on that.”

Rachel nods at that, too and jots something down. “Okay. How about making your own mistakes? Are you worried on that?”

Tim understands that she's asking if this relationship with the Palmers is potentially “making his own mistakes” as well as parenting mistakes in specific.

“Much less so than I would be as a single parent. I've got three co-parents who were raised by very good parents. I mean, I don't much like Breena's dad, he's a jerk, but he was a hell of a dad. That's not something I'll ever deny. And Abby's parents were awesome. Jimmy's parents... His dad passed on a while ago, but Jimmy loved him. I don't really know his mom or step-dad, and his mom seems pretty hands-off, but he thinks they did a good job. So, I know if I'm heading into the weeds, I've got people who have a better idea of how this works to pull me back in.” He shrugs again. “But, again, we're at the easy part of it. Teething rings, changing diapers, getting the ring of crud under their chins washed off, saying no to extra cookies, and enforcing bedtime isn't exactly parenting-existential-crisis-mode. We'll see how things go as they get older and start thinking more for themselves.”

Rachel smiles at that. “Okay, fallout from The Admiral?”

Tim shakes his head. “No. I'm aware there has been and will be some, but... Nope. Fallout of the government falling apart, reorganization of all of Federal Law Enforcement, that might prove to be interesting, but this... Nope.” Tim smiles at her. “He's gone. In Leavenworth for... who knows how long? They'll let me know what his sentence is, and when he's getting out, and once he's out, I don't think he'll be allowed within a hundred miles of me, so... Nope. He's gone. The dragon's dead, and now I get to grow old and tell stories about having slain it.”

“And will you?”

Tim knows she's asking about his writing. “Eventually. Been working on that one for a while. I've told you about that, right?”

“Your books, yes.”

“He's a man in the story. We're the dragons. He's just a man. I suppose dragon-slays-man isn't exactly a man-bites-dog story, but, in the tales, the dragon never wins, so… Why not?”

“Your dragons are men, too, though?”

“Yeah.” Tim’s eyes glance to the clock, an hour has run by. “And my hatchlings are looking for Daddy. Jimmy said he’s got a Thursday appointment.”

She nods.

“I’m sure he’ll fill you in with more of the details.”

Rachel stands up to see Tim out. “I’m sure he will. Congratulations on your new baby.”

“Thank you!”

Jimmy gets into work a bit on the late side. Not obscenely late or anything, but close to ten minutes, which is later than he’s been since he’s been in charge.

A very amused looking Dr. Allan says to him, “Good weekend?” as he hangs up his coat.

Jimmy smiles at him. “Yes, very.”

“Exciting date night?”

Jimmy grins again, thinking of how the night ended. “You have no idea!” And Allan doesn’t, because he’s not on Tim’s baby text list.

Allan, who does not know the punchline to this story but feels like there should be one, adds with a mildly salacious tone, “Yes, and I’ve worked hard to make sure that stays true.”

Jimmy shakes his head. Invite a guy to game with you, and suddenly he starts to get sassy. Though he is pleased to see a bit more snark out of Allan. “Not like… Okay, yes, like that, too… And I appreciate you working hard to maintain your lack of ideas on that subject. Anyway, the really exciting bit was Abby going into labor, and Sean James joining the party a bit after four on Sunday!”

This time there’s no hint of anything but joy on Allan’s face as he smiles. “I take it you have pictures?”

“Of course I do!” And Jimmy gets to showing them off.

It’s as Jimmy’s showing off the shots of his namesake that he’s running into the same problem Tim did. How to broach the subject…

Allan’s looking at a shot of Sean in Jimmy’s arms, smiling gently at it, and Jimmy is, too. He can’t wait to get back to the hospital and spend some more time with little boy.

But, there’s still this thing he should say, that should probably happen sooner rather than later, that he hasn’t yet done.

“He’s a beautiful little boy.”
“Yes, he is. Looks a lot like his Dad.”

Allan nods, and flashes another smile at Jimmy. But, Jimmy’s fairly preoccupied with what to say next, so he misses that smile on Allan’s face or how Allan understands what Jimmy just said.

He doesn’t however, miss the look on Allan’s face when he says, “There is one… thing…” Allan is suddenly looking at him very intently, and with a lot of trepidation. No one wants to hear about babies and things. “He’s probably deaf.”

Allan doesn’t go white, but trepidation slides into alarm. He obviously sees this as a much bigger deal than Jimmy does, but, of course, he would. He hasn’t lived Jimmy’s life or his sorrows.

“Probably?” Finally comes out of Allan. Then he gets with it. “Of course, probably. They gave you the same spiel we give everyone else. Test once, test again later…”

“I take it a baby failed the hearing test when you were on OB?”

“A few of them. And that was the line, give it a week and retest.”

“Did any of them have hearing when you were on Pedes and retested?”

Allan shakes his head. “None of the ones I did retests on did. And because you haven’t gotten to the retest stage, you don’t know how severe it is, either.”

“Right.”

Allan sighs. It’s a long, sad sound. “Oh, God, I’m so sorry. Are Tim and Abby okay?”

“We’re all okay. He’s whole, and alive, and…” And that’s where Allan puts Jon Palmer into the picture and feels like he’s got his foot shoved ankle deep into his mouth. “we’re all okay. This is just… challenging.”

Allan nods. “That’s a good way to look at it.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “No. That’s what it is. This isn’t a look-on-the-bright-side attitude, this is… fact. It’ll be challenging, but it’s not cripp—“ Crippling trails off mid word. Because that’s exactly what this is. Except, like Tim was saying to Rachel, it’s not. But it is.

And Jimmy, like Tim, isn’t sure what exactly to do with that.

Allan smiles gently at Jimmy, nods, and then says, “So which picture are you putting up? Or all of them?”

When Breena gets into work, her parents are waiting for her. Allan may not be on the baby text, but Jeannie certainly is.

“I want pictures, and I want them fast!” she says, in full-on almost-grandma mode. (She also can’t wait to get Sean over for Sunday supper. New baby cuddles, new baby scent, being able to hand the new baby off to someone else when he gets fussy. Yes, she’s very much looking forward to that.)

Breena hands her phone over, and there are shots of Sean on his own, and with Tim, and with Abby, and with Tim and Abby, and… actually every possible permutation of Sean with the family is on her phone, but the one that Jeannie and Ed stop to coo over is one they took this morning, with Molly in Breena’s lap, Sean in her arms, Breena helping to keep her steady, as Anna sits next to them looking on.

“Oh, my God! That’s ADORABLE! I want a copy of this!”

“You and everyone else. Jethro doesn’t know it yet, but the frame for that is one of his next projects.” Because he does make frames for the especially good shots, and she knows he’ll consider this one.

“He looks like Tim,” Ed says.

“Penny says that’s true. That this is exactly what Tim looked like as a baby.”

“How’d Kelly do?” Jeannie asks.

Breena sighs. “There’s a reason she’s not in that shot. She got into the room, and more or less grabbed onto Abby and wouldn’t let go. We had to pull her out, wailing away.”

Jeannie and Ed wince at that. “Amy did that when Christine was born,” Ed says.

Jeannie nods. “It’s normal. Is Tim making sure to get extra time with her?”

“Yeah, he is.”

“Now, she’s staying with you, right?”

“More we’re staying with her. Easier for everyone if she’s in her normal space. Jethro’s on it, too.”

Jeannie can imagine that. “He’s over the moon with his new little grandson, isn’t he?”

“Oh yeah,” Breena smiles at that.

“He should be, there’s…” Ed lets that trail off.

Breena and Jeannie understand. Ed had been especially looking forward to grandson time. He’s been sure that all the girls were boys, and unfortunately he was only right once.

Breena smiles at him. “We know.” She sighs, that note of Ed’s is bringing things down, so this feels like the right time to bring up the rest of it. “We did get some disappointing news. Sean’s probably deaf.”

There are times Breena’s parents surprise her in a good way. This is one of them. Jeannie just shrugs it off. “We’ll talk loud and clear. Make sure he’s looking us in the face,” Jeannie says. Breena’s surprised, so Jeannie explains, “Two out of five of our customers are old and can’t hear. Not like I’m not used to doing it. Not like we didn’t have to do that for your grandparents, and my grandparents.”

Ed shakes his head at Jeannie. “Your grandfather…” He turns to Breena, who only met her great-grandfather once, when she was seven months old. “He refused to get a hearing aid, or get his ears checked, and then spent every visit complaining about everyone mumbling.” Ed laughs. “He stood up and told the minister to speak up during our wedding, and to quit that damn mumbling. Your grandmom just about died when he did that.”

Jeannie smiles and laughs. It’s been enough years that she can find that funny, now. It wasn’t during the wedding. “She yanked him down so fast… face scarlet, apologizing to the minister. Ah… Poppop was trip, all right. And maybe that was a good thing, because Mom did get tested and got her hearing aids, and, you remember, talk slow and clear and make sure you’re looking Grandma in the face.”

Breena nods; she does remember that. They’re quiet for a moment, and Ed pulls the first of their clients out of her drawer. Breena heads over and helps to get her moved onto the table.

Once she’s settled, Ed comes up with, “Will he be able to drive? When he’s older?”

“Deaf, Dad, not blind.”

“I know! Christine got that speeding ticket last month, and they dinged her for wearing headphones, too. That’s not about being unable to see the road, that’s about being unable to hear it.”

That’s something Breena’s never thought about, so she grabs her phone and checks. “Yes, but they’ve got a special license designation so that if you get pulled over the cop knows you can’t hear and doesn’t shoot you for not immediately responding to him.”

Jeannie looks through the pictures again. “God, what a sweetie!”

Tim’s off with Rachel. Breena’s gone back to work. Which means Jethro’s got some alone time with his girl, and her little boy.

Abby’s not talking a whole lot, but this doesn’t feel like the silent she fell into last time. This feels more like just being very tired and on a lot of pain medication.

He’s sitting next to her on the edge of the bed, arm around her, as Sean naps. He nods over to their boy. “You should be doing that, too.”

Abby nods, tired. “Probably. Just… Thinking about him, and everything that’s coming. Gonna be a lot of work, and today… Today it really feels like it.”

Gibbs kisses her forehead. “Yep.” He squeezes her a little tighter. “You won’t do it alone. Just like with a case, split the work up, and too much becomes doable.”

Abby nods and begins to scoot back a bit to lying down. Gibbs stands up and moves around the bed, fast. Then he helps her get lying down.

Once she’s asleep, Gibbs gets back to reading. From what he can tell, they’ll do more testing, and unless Sean’s got absolutely no hearing, they’ll try working with hearing aids and see if they help. If they do, then that’s great. Depending on how much they help, they might be looking at a lot of extra work, or not all that much more. For all they know, he might be mildly hearing impaired, and turning the volume up on the world may take care of it.

If hearing aids don’t do it, then they’ll do more testing, and see if he’s a candidate for cochlear implants. If he is, they’ve got some decisions to make. If they go for them, then there’ll be surgery, healing up, turning them on, and training to learn to use them. Though Gibbs wonders how much training a little guy who’s starting from scratch will need. Not like he’s re-learning how to hear. For Sean, if he ends up with cochlear implants, whatever it is they do for “sound” is all sound ever will be for him. But, if they go that route, there’ll be training for that, and speech therapy, and lip reading, and more likely than not, signing, and… And a lot of stuff.
If he’s not a candidate for cochlear implants… Then the path is pretty well fixed. Signing, Lip reading. Speech therapy. What the best school for Deaf kids is. Whether that’s a better option than their local schools with an interpreter or not. And if it’s enough better to make moving there (Gibbs is fairly sure that whatever THE BEST school for Deaf kids is, it’s unlikely to be within thirty miles of them) worth it.

Finite number of options. All with ups and downs. And none of them actionable right now. He puts his phone down and goes to pick up Sean. He’s very slow and gentle about it, and Sean sleeps through it. So far, he seems to be a pretty easy-tempered little guy. He’s a good eater. He settles into sleep pretty readily. But, like Abby, he’s also a bit on the dopey side. After all, most of his meals are laced with pain killers, so he might be a bit more mellow than usual.

Gibbs heads back to the sofa, Sean on his chest, and picks the phone back up. He’s reading about different types of deafness, and… He stops. He kisses the top of Sean’s head.

When it comes down to it, it doesn’t matter. Not now. Possibly not ever. It is. How and why are, especially at Gibbs’ level of caregiver, a moot point.

He watches Sean sleep on him for a moment, and then looks at his phone again. There’s something he wants to do, and… he’s never done this before, but he’s seen the kids do it, so it can’t be that hard, and… He assumes his phone has to be able to do it. He can’t imagine Tim would have gotten him a phone that doesn’t do it.

So, he messes around with it for a moment, finds the camera ap (he’s used that before) and then mucks around with it some more, looking for the thing that flips the focus around.

Once he’s looking at himself in the mirror, he takes his first ever selfie, with Sean on his chest, snoozing away, and sends it to Fornell.

Look at you smiling like a son of a bitch! Comes back from Fornell a minute later.

Gibbs smirks at the phone.

I didn’t know you knew how to use the camera on the phone.

This time Gibbs gives the phone a quiet glare.

Texting works better when you don’t just look at the screen. You’ve got to put actual words in.

Gibbs laughs. No need. You know how I’m responding.

Don’t I ever? How old is he?

30 hours… Maybe a little older.

All fingers and toes accounted for?

Gibbs sighs. Yeah. Hearing may be AWOL, but all of his bits are there.

This time there’s nothing from Fornell, but Gibbs can imagine his reaction. It’s likely colorful, and better off not repeated in polite company.

May be? Eventually shows up on his phone.

More testing next week.
But it’s not certain, yet?

It’s certain enough. He’s already failed two tests. You know the happy bullshit the Director gives you to go with a shit case?

Gibbs can feel Fornell sigh. They both know that. Here’s hoping that, for once, the Director’s right.

Gibbs doesn’t mind that, but… They call them forlorn hopes for a reason. Sure.

Another quiet moment. Sean snuffles and chirps a bit, but he’s just shifting around some, after a second, he’s back sleeping.

So, what happens if he’s deaf? Fornell asks.

And, for the next forty minutes, the two of them go over it, like investigators, looking at a collection of options, trying to figure out what the best might be.

It doesn’t help, not really, they don’t have enough information for that, but Gibbs feels more settled after getting to lay it all out and have Fornell look it over, too.

Gibbs wraps it up with. He’s waking up. Gotta get him cleaned up and ready to eat.

He feels Fornell laugh at that. Better you than me.

Yeah, yeah, yeah. Enjoy it while you can. Bet you’ve got diaper duty again in the next ten years.

Bite your tongue! Thirty. No grandkids before she’s thirty! Gibbs laughs at that as he tosses the phone aside, gets his hands on Sean, and stands up, off to get him cleaned up and ready for lunch.

Tim’s back, with lunch, not too long after Sean wakes up. He sneaks in quietly, waving ‘Hi’ to the awake Dad and fussy baby on the other side of the curtain, and then over to his space.

“You’re up!”

Abby looks up from Sean and nods. She looks at the bag. “Tell me there’s something good in there!”

He grins at her, kissing her, and then giving Gibbs a hug, while putting the bag down. “Several somethings good.”

He gets his jacket off, tossed onto the sofa bed, and begins to unpack. “Wasn’t sure what you’d want, but I’ve got BLTs, and some chips, and chocolate cupcakes, and there’s a grilled chicken salad if you want something lighter, and some sushi rolls, too, and…” He holds up a plastic container like it’s a trophy. “I’ve got sweet potato fries in here. And there are some burgers in here, too.”

Abby’s grinning at him. “You went to eight places didn’t you?”

“Just about.” Gibbs is already sorting through, grabbing a plastic plate, and making up a selection for himself. “So, what’s on for you?”

“A little of everything and an extra chocolate cupcake!”

As they settle in to eat, Tim’s pretty relieved to see that Abby’s in an okay mood. Maybe she’s not entirely as bright as she usually is, but this isn’t that scary, detached sort mood she was in after Kelly was born.

“You’re doing okay?” he asks her to make sure.

She nods. “Right now. Give it five minutes and the hormones’ll shift, and I’ll be crying, but right now, I’m good.”

“Okay. We’ll try to keep you at good.” He takes a little swipe of the chocolate frosting on the cupcake and holds it out to her. She takes a lick and her eyes go wide.

“You…”

He nods. “Yep. The same kind I swiped from you all those years ago.”

She starts to laugh a little, but it hurts, so she stops, and just smiles.

Sean finishes eating on that side, so Tim takes him, easily, he knows where his hands go, and where Sean goes, and gets the spit up rag over his shoulder before settling Sean in for his pat and burp session, while Abby gets to use both of her hands to eat some of the burger.

They talk about how Kelly got settled in. (Pretty well, once Heather got there, but she wants her normal back, and that means Mommy at home, with her.) Their plans for the evening. (Jimmy’ll come here, Tim and Breena’ll go to their house, and once the girls are asleep, Tim’ll head back to the hospital.) What Gibbs plans to be doing. (Going to Tim’s house so Breena isn’t wrestling three babies on her own in the morning.) How the meeting with Rachel went. (Pretty well, in Tim’s opinion.) Work? What’s that? (Jimmy and Tony have sent updates, and they both have a million congratulations on their phones.)

And, eventually, Sean burps like a full grown man living on a diet of beer and beans, and is given back to Abby to nurse on side two.

And, eventually, he goes back to sleep, and Abby does, too. Tim and Gibbs spend some time with each other, and their new boy.

Eventually, Jimmy shows up, so Tim and Gibbs head home, where Kelly is extra-clingy, and Molly is extra excited, and…

It’s just life. One that, at the moment, with all ups and downs, and all the rest of it, Tim finds very sweet.

He gets back to the hospital, to see his husband on the bed with his wife, both of them holding their baby boy, as he’s getting yet another meal. Jimmy’s doing the same half-on, half-off perch on the side of the bed to make sure that Abby’s got plenty of room and is comfortable. But he’s also got one arm around her, and is very gently stroking the top of Sean’s head. Abby’s resting her head on his shoulder, eyes closed, probably drifting, as Sean suckles away. Tim snaps a shot of it and sends it to Breena, before going to join in on the other side.

She sends all three of them kisses, and pictures of sleeping girls.

And that, and moments like it, are the rest of their time in the hospital. It’s new, because it’s a new baby, and new circumstances, but it’s old because they’ve done versions of this before. They know what they’re doing, and with extra hands to help, it’s easier than it was the first time.

And on Wednesday morning, Tim packs up Abby and Sean, and brings them home.
More Adventures In Parenting

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Their pediatrician is absolutely right. At four days old, Sean is functionally identical to every other newborn.

He sleeps, eats, cries, poops, and behaves just like any other little guy who has just gotten home, is starting to get the lay of the land, and wants everything the second he wants it with absolutely no wait time involved.

Like with Anna, adding a new baby to the mix makes for sibling issues. Unless she’s asleep or playing with Heather, Sean getting any attention from Abby causes Kelly to immediately start fussing and glom onto her.

That sets Molly off, who thinks Kelly’s being mean to Sean, who is her baby, and good God, do not suggest to Molly that Sean is not hers. Jimmy’s still not sure how he fell into that trap, but crying newborn, and two screaming toddlers, with crying nursing Mama (because, like all newly post-partum moms Abby’s got the emotional control of a drunk toddler) is a special layer of hell reserved for people silly enough to attempt four children in one home.

So, for the time being, there’s a lot of crying coming from the baby end of things, which isn’t exactly making for relaxed and even-tempered adults.

Fortunately, as Tim noted, the adults can, and do, swap out, so at any given time at least one of them is not in the middle of the storm, which means, at any given time, at least one of them has also recently gotten a break, and at least one of them will, in the near future, get a break.

That makes life a lot easier. Even if, when you’ve got sniffles all over the place, and are wiping snot and tears off of one child while another tries to bite a third, it doesn’t feel all that easy.

There are moments of new baby that are just heart wrenchingly cute. When they’re all quiet, (which does, occasionally, happen) two little curly haired girls and two little blonde kiddos, all on the sofa, or sharing playtime (in Sean’s case, laying on his tummy-staring-at-the-carpet time) has made for some exceptionally sweet pictures.

And some of them have been hysterically funny. On Friday, they pack everyone up, and head off to the house for Shabbos and the weekend with the family.

Sean does his usual routine in the car. (If, at not quite a week old, he can be said to have a usual routine.) This routine is also aided by his Mama and Daddy planning the trip for right after meal time for him. So they get him strapped in, and off to sleep he goes.

They get to the house. And Sean sleeps through being carted by his Daddy into the house, but, after a while, he notices he’s not moving, and he’s in a place that smells different, so one little eye pops open, and it’s time to reset the clock and start over again.
Which means, diaper time.

Which is where hysterical comes in.

At a month shy of three years old, Molly Palmer has noticed something. Namely, she is now in possession of a baby boy cousin/little brother. (The adults haven’t quite figured out what the kids should be calling each other, and use both terms interchangeably. This will likely lead to some confusion in the future, but right now, they’re too preoccupied to care.)

And while she’s aware of the fact that there are people called boys, and people called girls, as of this point in time she’s been awfully fuzzy on what the difference is. (Though she does know if she’s watching cartoons, girls have long eyelashes and boys don’t.)

But, in that her baby needs to have his diaper changed on a fairly regular basis, and in that it’s her duty to oversee and make sure Aunt Abby or Uncle Tim is doing it right, she’s noticed that Sean’s not shaped like her, or Kelly, or Anna for that matter. He’s different.

Aunt Abby patiently explains that those differences are a penis and testicles, and that’s what makes boys boys.

Molly knows her daddy has them. She’s seen that. And she knows Uncle Tim has them, too, for exactly the same reason. And when she asked why Sean’s didn’t quite look like Daddy’s or Uncle Tim’s, Aunt Abby explained about circumcision, and that was overkill, because the difference that Molly had spotted was that Daddy and Uncle Tim are a hell of a lot bigger than Sean.

Eventually, Abby figures out what it is Molly’s asking about, and she gets an answer out that makes sense to Molly. By that point, Sean’s all dried off and re-diapered, which means nursing comes next, which is pretty boring, and Kelly will be right next to Abby the whole time, and tends to get testy if Molly gets too close. So, Molly decides to do something with this new information.

Molly knows that Daddy, Uncle Tim, and Sean are boys. She also realizes she’s not sure about everyone else in this group, who has what, so to speak, so it seems like some investigation might be in order here.

So, Molly marches over to the nearest grown up, (Uncle Jethro, who’s standing on the edge of the kitchen area, where he can see Abby and Sean easily, and the rest of the crew, who are working on dinner, explaining that Abbi will be late) and brightly asks, “Do you have a penis?”

She says it loud enough that everything in the house, except Sean nursing, goes absolutely silent. (Okay, not really, but to the adults in the group it certainly feels that way.)

The other adults are doing the best they can at not laughing. (Not particularly well. Tony looks like his brain is about to explode at trying to keep it in.) They’re all, with the exception of Ducky, parents, and they all get the idea that kids aren’t born knowing what’s a boy or girl. Still Leroy Jethro Gibbs being flat out asked if he has a penis is making them want to giggle. (It’s possible that Jimmy may have muttered something to Tim about it being the size of a baseball bat, resulting in a glare from Jethro, an outright gasp of a laugh from Tony, wide smirks from Tim and Jimmy, and a back of the hand ‘you behave’ swat from Penny, who is also trying, somewhat more successfully, not to laugh.)

Gibbs scoops Molly up, so she’s in his arms and face to face with the grown-ups, and says, as seriously as he can, “Yes, I do.”

Molly nods at that, taking it in. Then another thought hit her. “Is it a big one, like Daddy’s, or a little one, like Sean’s?”

By this point, the adults are vibrating with unvoiced laughter so hard they’re in danger of shaking the paintings off the walls, and Gibbs is looking down, eyes closed, biting his lip hard, shoulders shaking. But finally he pulls it together, looks up at Molly, and says, “A long time ago, I was a baby, like Sean, and when I was a baby, all of me was little.”

“Even your penis?”

“Even my penis.” He nods seriously at Molly, and with his free hand, without turning to look, gently whacks Tony for what he’s thinking. “And then I was a little kid, like you, then a big kid, and a teenager, and now I’m a grown up, and I’m big all over, just like your daddy.”

Molly seems to think that’s a good answer. “Can I see?”

Gibbs stops looking at Molly and starts looking at Jimmy, alarm in his gaze, not sure what the right answer is to that one. Jimmy just shrugs. Doesn’t bother him if Molly sees Gibbs naked. He’s supremely unconcerned about his kids seeing members of the family naked.

Gibbs doesn’t think Jimmy’s being particularly helpful with that, so he kicks it down the road. “Not right now. Next time we go swimming, you can help me get changed.” He figures that by the time it’s warm enough to swim, she’ll have forgotten, or he’ll have had the chance to have a real conversation with Jimmy and Breena about this sort of thing.

“Okay. Ducky—“

“Yes, I have a penis. So does Uncle Tim and Uncle Tony.”

“Really?” She knows about Uncle Tim, but starts to stare at Tony, who is grinning madly and nodding.

“Yes, my dear. We’re all boys, so we all have penises.”

Molly looks at Penny. “You don’t have one?”

She shakes her head, smiling. “No. I don’t need one. I’m a girl. I’m built just like you and your mommy, Abbi, Aunt Abby, and Aunt Ziva.”

That gets another minute of concentrated thought. Just as the grown-ups were getting ready to move onto a new topic, Molly adds, “Sean’s doesn’t have any hair.”

“No,” Jimmy says. “He’s a baby. Babies only have hair on their heads, and sometimes not even there.”

“But yours does.”

“Yes, that’s part of being a grown up. Grown-ups grow hair all over.”

“Sometimes Uncle Tim’s doesn’t.”

Tim’s blushing, waiting for the Earth to swallow him whole. (Gibbs looks perversely happy to see he’s not the only one getting to deal with uncomfortable questions.) And though he’s embarrassed as hell, Tim’s also pretty amazed at how well Molly’s remembering things, because it’s been a while since he’s been hair-free.

Jimmy laughs a little, nudges Tim, and then says. “Some grown-ups grow a whole lot of hair, like Uncle Tony and Uncle Jethro, and some don’t grow as much, like Uncle Tim. And sometimes, we cut the hair we grow off.” He puts Molly’s hand on his chin. “Feel the stubble? See the little black specks?” She nods. “Little tiny hairs. They grow on our faces, and all over, and sometimes we cut them off. You’ve seen Uncle Tim and I shave.”

She nods. She has.

“That’s us cutting them off.” It hadn’t ever occurred to Jimmy that Molly and the rest of the girls had seen them both shave, but didn’t understand what they were doing.

“Why?”

“It feels nice,” Breena adds. “All soft and smooth. No prickly kisses.”

“You don’t shave,” she says to her mama, touching her face.

“I do, but not my face. I shave my legs and under arms. Girls don’t, usually, grow hair on their faces or chests.”

Everyone waits for a moment, to see if Molly has any more questions, but she seems pretty satisfied by that.

Much later that night, when Abbi gets home, and Tony explains the situation to her, she just about hurts herself she’s laughing so hard.

Friday night at the house makes for another change, and another bit of streamlining this new baby wrangling thing. When she got home, Abby did drop all of the late night/early morning feeds. She figured that, since she’s already on serious pain killers for the c-section, she might as well make them do double duty and handle not nursing at night.

And, yes, that’s resulted in some sore breasts, but by the time they were getting ready for bed on Friday, she can stand going from her last feed of the night, 10:00, until her first feed of the morning, 6:00, without feeling like she’s going to die. (Though she does have to get up around 2:00 to pump and let off some pressure.)

The upside of this is she’s getting sixish hours of sleep a night. Which means she’s doing… okay. Her body is still swamped with too many hormones, and she’s still sweating off the extra water, and her incision itches (but isn’t sore or inflamed), and she’s bleeding, but…

It’s better this time.

At Tim and Abby’s, whoever’s on baby duty sleeps on the edge of the bed closest to the door, and hops in and out as needed to deal with Sean. Tonight, as Tim and Jimmy are putting the sheets on their bed, it hits him that they’ve got two bedrooms, and the three of them not on baby fetching would probably sleep better if they weren’t getting constantly jostled by one of them getting into and out of bed every two hours.

So, as he tosses Jimmy a pillow, in its case, he turns back to the closet, and goes hunting for the sheets for the bed in his room. (They’re sleeping in Jimmy and Breena’s room for the time being. It’s much easier to get a recently c-sectioned tummy into and out of a bed that’s butt high, than one that’s low to the floor.)
“What are you thinking?” Jimmy asks as he’s tucking the pillow against the headboard and Tim’s riffling through the closet.

“We’ve got two beds. Sean and I can camp out in ours, and you three can sleep all the way through without any wake ups.”

Jimmy grins at that. Knowing that he’s on or off makes it easier to rest, but he still wakes up a bit when whoever’s on gets in and out. (Probably because unless it’s his night, he’s usually in the middle of the bed.) So, the idea of a full night of just sleep (or maybe not just sleep, he’ll have to see if Abby’s interested in watching/petting/being part of whatever he and Breena might get up to. He wonders if Tim’ll be game, too, or if he’s just planning on trying to nap as long as he’s in the bed with Sean… It’s the last night of baby making week, and Jimmy’s feeling hopeful… Anyway, that’s an after the kids are down, tooth-brushing conversation.) sounds great to him.

Tim finds the sheets, and he and Jimmy head into their bedroom to get their bed made, too.

“Though you guys tried co-sleeping with Kelly and it didn’t work.”

Tim shrugs. “Woke up with every single chirp, gurgle, burp, shift, loud breath… But… first night home, brand new Dad, and there was no end in sight. This time… I can’t sleep, just got to hold up until tomorrow. Or I can put him in his crib.”

Jimmy nods. “You do that, don’t put him in your bed until after Kelly’s down, and back to his crib before she’s up, otherwise you’re co-sleeping with both of them.”

Tim tucks the fitted sheet around the corner of his mattress. “Good point.”

Jimmy grabs the other corner and gets to work.

“She’s less freaked out about sharing me than Abby.”

Jimmy nods.

“I don’t remember Molly doing that.”

Jimmy laughs. “You weren’t living with us then. She wasn’t as clingy as Kelly’s being, but she was also a bit older, and… She’s,” his voice drops a few decibels, “not Abby’s daughter.” Then he remembers a few of Tim’s more territorial moments, and says, normal voice, “Or yours.”

Tim says, voice dry, “So, like the green eyes, you’re saying she’s coming by this naturally?”

“Only if that story about you getting upset at Dornaget staying over at Abby’s is true.”

Tim holds up his hands. “I didn’t know he was gay then.”

“Uh huh.”

Tim does join in for the fairly low-key, relaxed, slow, gentle shag that night. Abby keeps them company, but isn’t interested in being involved on any level beyond some hand holding and cuddling. Among other things, she doesn’t even want to be naked for more than a few minutes at a stretch, so any sort of real playing is completely off the list.

Fortunately, with this group, there’s always someone who’s interested in providing some hand holding, cuddles, and warm, but not sexual, kisses.

As they’re lying about in the after sex glow, Jimmy’s fingers very lightly skirt over the crest of Abby’s hip. “We should make it a celebration, a ‘Welcome Back To Your Body Day Party.’ You tell us when you’re ready, give us a day or two of notice ahead of time,” he kisses Breena, too, letting her know this deal is for both of them, “And we’ll get it set to rock your world, or at least as much as said world wants to be rocked.”

Abby laughs a little at that, her world is supremely uninterested in any form of rocking at all right now, but she appreciates the idea. “If I ever get out of new mommy mode, I’ll let you know.”

Breena turns toward her (though Jimmy’s between them, so she’s got to lift up onto her elbows to have an unimpeded view of Abby). “You will.”

Abby sighs. She knows it’ll happen, but right now, sex is like some exotic meal she’s read about. It certainly looks interesting, but it’s not anything that’s involved in her real life. “Eventually.”

They hear a tiny wail, and for a second nothing happens. Breena laughs, and then pokes Tim, who jerks a bit (he’d been so content and sleepy, he’d all but passed out), rubs his eyes, and slowly gets up.

“I’ll report back in the morning with how this works.”

They nod, and he kisses each of them before heading off to grab his son.

Sean’s laying on his back in his crib, swaddled up tight, and fussing his little head off.

“You can’t possibly be that hungry,” Tim says as he picks him up. “We just did this two hours ago.”

Sean is unmollified.

“Yeah, I know. We’re going to try something a little different tonight.”

More crying as Tim lays him on his changing table and begins to get him unbundled.

“Once I’ve got you cleaned up, we’re going to take your bottles and stuff, and head over to my room. You’ll have dinner number three, we’ll get some quality time together, and then we’ll see if both of us can sleep in the same bed.”

More crying as Tim gets the onesie unsnapped and unzipped. “Yeah, I know it’s chilly. At least the wipes are nice and warm.” (Yes, he did go get a diaper wipe heater for Kelly after his own experience with the cold ones. She and Sean appear to approve.) And though he’s still fussing, Sean fusses a little less, and a little quieter, so it seems like warm and wet is better than cold and wet.

“Okay, there you go, all cleaned up and nice and snug in your blankets.” He picks Sean back up. “Okay. My room now. Then I’m going to lay you on the bed, and come back to get the other stuff. Food in like… maybe two minutes.”

Sean’s quiet as he’s being carried out of his room. Tim doesn’t know if he’s got ‘clean diaper’ associated with ‘food soon,’ and has thus decided that good things are about to commence soon, or if he’s just had his cry and is done.

He does expect what happens when he puts Sean down on the bed, and then leaves to get his bottle,

And soon he does have a bottle all set with milk (formula later tonight), and Sean curled into the crook of his arm, slorping way with abandon.

“You really like that, huh?”

Slorp, slorp, slorp.

“Good. Keep that up. They tell us that when you get up to sevenish pounds, you should start to go three hours between feeds, so gulp that on down.”

Slorp… slorp… Sean’s eyes start to drift shut, as the nursing slows down.

“Oh, no you don’t. You get me out of bed, and you better eat. None of this have a little snack and cuddle and back to sleep you go. Uh uh. I was perfectly happy back there, so…”

Sean cracks an eye and sucks a little faster.

“Good.” Tim gently pets Sean’s face. “You hearing any of this, or just feeling it?”

Sean’s face is pressed to Tim’s chest, and because he did just get out of bed, he’s undressed. Blankets wrapped around him, but Sean’s got unimpeded skin to skin, at least, on his face.

“Probably doesn’t matter. Not like I’m going to stop talking to you. Might have to do it with my fingers, but we’ll talk.” He kisses his son’s head. “People pay me money to talk to them with my fingers. Sort of… Wrote some books. Probably’ll write more of them. That’s talking with your fingers, too. I wonder if you’ll like that. If you’ll tell stories like your Ducky and I. I wonder what sorts of stories you’ll tell…”

Sean’s looking up at him as he’s eating away.

“I like mysteries and dragons. Stories where the bad guys die and the good guys win and everything works out in the end. Maybe they aren’t realistic, but… I live realistic, it’s nice to build a world where things end up ‘right.’”

He strokes Sean’s cheek again. “We’ll talk about that when you’re older. About right, and what that is. And, I hope, you’ll know that when I’m not with you, and when Abby and Jimmy are off, too, that that’s what we’re doing, or trying to do. And Breena, she does it, too. Different sort of right, but not any less important.”

Tim notices that Sean’s gotten through the first half of the bottle. “Good boy. Okay, let’s see if we can do this without me having to get out of bed.” He drapes the burp rag over his shoulder, and gets Sean out of nursing position and into burping position. Then he starts patting away. Gentle thuds against Sean’s back. It takes a minute before he notices that he’s tapping out a Coltrane beat.

“I wonder if this’ll be music for you.” Tap, tap, tap. “Vibrations and thuds and percussion. I wonder how melody will work, or guitar instead of flute or…” Sean belches.

“Good boy! Okay,” he shifts Sean back down, and dabs off the spit up. “Let’s get to side two.”

Tim grabs the bottle again, and gets it back into Sean’s mouth. “I guess this isn’t side two when I do it. Second half?”

Slorp, slorp, slorp…
“Yeah. Second half.” Sean’s in exactly the same position he was for the first half, so there’s no ‘side’ issue. Tim’s humming quietly, the same melody he was tapping earlier. “So, when we wrap this up, and you’re all done, I’m going to just put you down here, next to me, and with any luck we both get to sleep. That sound good to you?”

Sean appears to be indifferent to this concept.

“You don’t get to sleep on me, though. We do that, and you’ll be begging to sleep on us all the time, and we’re not doing that. So, you get your own little chunk of bed, and I get my big chunk of bed, and hopefully this works out.”

Sean wriggles a little, and sucks harder.

“Uncle Jimmy pointed out that depending on how this works, you might end up with your sisters wanting to join in on this, and… Not sure how that’ll work. And… you have a massive diaper blow out, like your sister did, and I’m going to be a lot less enthusiastic about this, too. This bed might be mostly a sleeping place now, but that won’t always be true, so… keep it tidy, okay?”

He’s not sure, but he almost thinks Sean’s taking that as a challenge, and now he’s thinking mentioning it was a bad idea. Which then makes Tim think he’s way too damn tired if he’s reading that into his… he finds a clock, it’s past midnight now, six-day-old son’s expression.

Eventually, Sean wraps up his bottle, and again, they do the burp thing, though second time isn’t quite so easy, so Tim does have to get up and walk him around some, but, after a few minutes, Sean lets fly with a huge belch, stops fussing, and it’s back to sleep time.

Tim plops him down, and Sean appears to be okay with the idea of sleeping next to the big guy. His eyes slide shut, and the sucking on his pacifier slows down after a minute.

Tim’s tired. It’s late, and he’d been in an excellent go-to-sleep space before Sean got him up, so he doesn’t have a difficult time settling down, either.

And, yes, in the morning he’s a zombie. Waking up to feed every two hours when it takes forty-minutes to eat is brutal, but in the morning, he can hand Sean off to the three adults who got a full night of sleep, and go crash himself.

Chapter End Notes

So, the Gibbs and Molly story is directly based on my oldest son asking my Dad, during Thanksgiving Dinner, if he had a penis.
Testing

Buzzing sound. Tim’s hand creeps from under the blanket to go find what’s making that annoying buzzing. His phone. He turns a bit, and pulls it close to see what it wants to tell him.

Leon’s number. AKA, the only person he’ll take a call from, on a Saturday, when he’s this tired, and 97% of his family is in the building with him.

Thus, he’s sitting up, cursing Leon for calling him this early... or not... the phone says it’s a bit after 1:00, on an aforementioned Saturday.

“What’s on fire?”

“McGee?” Leon was apparently not expecting quite this level of crankiness on the other end of the line.

“Yeah. What’s up?”

“Nothing’s on fire. Just needed to know what you’re doing with next week. It’s the CyberTech in Federal Law Enforcement Commission, and if there’s one of them I want you at…”

Tim rubs his eyes, and pulls himself more awake. “Uh… Yeah. That…”

“You can skip Monday night, that’s just the meet and greet, but…”

“Okay. Yeah.” Tim hasn’t said anything to the wider world about Sean possibly being deaf. “Uh… Monday…” And they do have the first of his doctor’s appointments on Monday. “Good. I…”

Apparently he’s not sounding cranky anymore, unplugged and half-brained, but not cranky. “Are you okay?” Leon sounds genuinely concerned.

“I was on night feeds last night.”

“Ah.” Tim can feel Leon smiling. He remembers those days. “And how is your little boy?”

“Hungry. Growing in leaps and bounds. And… I’ll be there as much as I can, but… They think he’s deaf, and we’ve probably got a lot of doctors’ appointments next week.”

He can hear Leon’s caught flat-footed. Technically, he’s on shaky ground by suggesting that Tim cut his paternity leave short. He’s on double thin ice by doing it if he’s got serious Family and Medical Leave Act stuff as well.

“Oh.”

“Yeah. First one is Monday morning, and… I don’t know when the rest will be. If we’re lucky, they’ll retest on Monday and tell us everything is fine, but… I don’t think we’re that lucky.”

“I’m sorry, Tim.”

Tim shakes that off. “Manner’s going to that one for Abbi. If I’ve got to stick a NCIS badge on him, too, we can do that. I’ll get there as much as I can, but… Hearing tests and talking to specialists wins out over hobnobbing.”

“Yeah… Okay. I understand.”
Tim thinks through his roster here in DC. “Might send Howard out, too. She cleans up nice and speaks bureaucrat.”

“Isn’t she twenty-three?”

“Not quite that young. I’d send Ngyn, but she’d collapse into an introvert coma or resign.”

Leon sighs. He really wants his top guy on this. If there’s any level where they need representation, this is it, and Tim’s the one who should be doing it. Which means he does not want the bureaucrat who was already doing everything by the book, or the… she really can’t be more than twenty-six… baby tech geek.

He needs the guy who’s got the bigger ideas, and who can work this room, see what’s coming up, and shape it.

Leon sighs. “What if I give Dr. Palmer carte blanche to show up or not as he sees fit next week?”

For a second, Tim doesn’t understand why that might help the issue. Then he does. “You mean, can Jimmy take my place at those appointments?”

“Yeah. If you’ve got one during Commission hours…”

“Uh… Let me talk to Abby and… Maybe. I’m sure he’d be okay with doing it, but… You know he’s the Medical Examiner, right? Dead bodies… That’s kind of important, and his job.”

“I’m well aware of what Dr. Palmer, and what Dr. Allan do. I’m well aware of what you do, too. Talk to your family, and get back to me.”

That stops Tim cold. Something big is up. “Why do you want me at this one so bad?”

“Because, from what I’m hearing, there’s a good chance they’ll try to spin all of you guys off to your own department, and that… It’s all intertwined these days. We can’t do our job without in-house computer guys.”

Tim remembers that he had his own thoughts along those lines. “Okay. I’ve got some ideas along those lines, as well… I’ll get them written up as soon as I can, and… Let me talk. I have no idea how much time there’ll be between Monday morning tests and the next round. This might be a moot point. 8:30 on Monday is our appointment, so, when I know, I’ll call in.”

“Thank you.”

““The first tests,” Dr. Ilhn says as she’s checking Sean’s vital stats, “were screening tests. They identify if there’s a possible hearing issue. Today, we’re going to do the first round of diagnostic tests.”

“Which are?” Abby asks.

“Basically the ABR, but we’ll do a longer one, at a bunch of different hearing ranges. It doesn’t hurt. He won’t even know we’re doing it, because he’ll sleep through it.”

“That’s why you told us to block out three hours?” Gibbs asks. Of course he’s along for this. First, because there was no way he wouldn’t be, and also because he figures it’s a good plan for someone who’s resting every single night to be on top of note taking.

Illn nods. “Exactly.” She picks Sean up, snuggles him a bit, and hands him back to Abby. “So, you get to hang out here until he dozes off, and then we bring in the equipment, hook him up, and run the test. By the time we’re done, we’ll know what, if any, hearing loss he has.”

“How about everything else?” Tim asks.

“He looks fine. Growing like a weed in sunshine. He’s at seven pounds one ounce, which is great. I’m not seeing any signs of jaundice.” She strokes under Sean’s chin. “You’re doing exactly what you’re supposed to be doing.”

“He’s eating every two hours;” Abby says.

“Is he really hungry or just being social?” Illn asks.

“Bit of both,” Tim answers. Little guy seemed to be somewhere between hungry and lonely when he was getting Tim up, Breena and Jimmy don’t disagree with that read, either.

“He’s big enough you can start trying to spread the feeds out.” She sees the looks on Tim and Abby’s faces. “I know. Lots of crying. But, if he’s calling for food as soon as he’s just a bit hungry, then he won’t eat enough to get him going longer. Start slow, 2:10, 2:15, and stretch them out. A few days, and he should be getting closer to three hours at a time.”

“So… He’s getting enough to eat?” Abby asks. She’s been nervous, with him asking to eat every two hours, that he might not be getting enough.

“Most babies lose a pound in their first week. He’s gained more than one. The problem isn’t on the getting enough to eat side of things.” She strokes Sean’s head again, and nods at everyone. “Okay, let us know when he’s settled down, and we’ll get ready for the rest of this.”

---

Auditory Brainstem Response. That’s the test. They did this, and another one, though Tim doesn’t remember what it was called, the day Sean was born.

And now they’re doing it again.

It’s... odd to watch. Part of him wants to sweep Sean up and grab him away from this person who’s sticking little electrodes on his head. The rational part of Tim knows this is perfectly okay. The nervous Daddy part thinks this looks like the start of a bad science experiment.

Sean, however, does not appear to be fussed at all about this. He’s in Abby’s arms, snoozing away, happy as a baby being snuggled.

The nurse gets the sensors in place, and put the tiniest little earphones Tim’s ever seen into Sean’s ears.

Then she turns back to the testing unit. “We’re going to play what’s called a click. A click is a series of sounds, at different volumes and frequencies. We’ll start off low volume, and then ramp up high, and see what he responds to. What we’re looking for is the softest sound he can hear.”

And so, they sit, and wait. She presses buttons, and the computer that the device is attached to records its finding. Whatever she’s doing, it’s soft enough Tim can’t hear it.

At least, that’s true at first.

They do get to a point where Tim can make out the sounds, and he’s trying to watch Sean, who isn’t responding, and the computer screen, which is useless because he doesn’t know how to interpret the data they’re getting. Gibbs is doing it, too, and Abby wants to know what they’re seeing, he can feel it, but they aren’t talking because they don’t want to make any noise which might… Skew the test somehow? Tim’s not sure why, but they aren’t talking.

It takes her about forty-five minutes to go through everything, and Sean doesn’t wake up at all.

When she’s taking the sensors off, and the earphones out, they all want to know, and she shakes her head. “I run the test. Dr. Illn reads it.”

She’s in a room with two investigators and one forensic scientist, they all know that’s hip high bullshit.

Illn’s back a half hour later, so… Maybe she’s seeing someone else, or maybe that data actually did need to be interpreted, either way, Gibbs has already paced the tiny examining room two thousand times, and Tim and Abby aren’t exactly calm or cool, either.

It’s one thing to be philosophical about the possibility of something. It’s a bit different when reality is staring you in the face.

Illn closes the door quietly, and, with the exception of Sean, who’s having second lunch, they’re all staring at her.

She smiles gently and shakes her head. “From what we can tell, he’s got no hearing in his right ear, and a ninety percent loss in his left. Next step, pediatric audiologist, who’ll be able to get into it deeper and start working on what happens next.”

“How does that mean… hearing aids? Cochlear implants?” Abby’s asking.

“That’s what you’re going to talk to Dr. Snyder about. He’s the specialist. He’s the specialist that I’d send my kids to. There are two kinds of deafness, conductive loss, which means something’s going on in the middle or outer ear. Could be how things are built or an infection or…”

“Too much fluid, maybe?” Abby says.

Dr. Illn shakes her head. “That, we know isn’t the case. His ears look fine. If he had enough fluid in them to cause this level of hearing loss, he’s be screaming all the time from the pain. Actually, their ear drums perforate before they lose all hearing due to fluid in the ears. If it was fluid, we’d know.”

“What’s your best guess?” Gibbs says.

Illn spreads her hands wide. “This level of loss, the question is, is there a dysfunction in the structure of the ear. Say, do the little bones not vibrate properly? That would be conductive losses. Or, is this a sensorineural issue? That’s a problem of the inner ear. So, does the auditory nerve not work properly? That’s the first thing that Dr. Snyder will work on figuring out.”

“How do they do that?” Abby asks.
“He’ll take the data we’ve just collected, and produce an audiogram, and depending on how it looks, that’ll explain what’s going on, and what the next step is.”

“What might those next steps be?” Tim asks as Gibbs is writing everything down.

“MRI? If it looks like a conductive loss. That’ll give us more information about what’s going on in there. It’s possible this might be an issue that can be corrected with surgery. If it’s sensorineural, they’ll start working on seeing if he responds to hearing aids. Usually, they start with hearing aids, see if they help, and go from there if they don’t. It’s possible, with the complete loss on his right, that he’s not a good candidate for hearing aids, but…”

“But you aren’t the specialist,” Gibbs says.

Dr. Illn nods. “Dr. Snyder will know.”

“So, when do we see him?” Tim’s got his phone out and is ready to start dialing to make the appointment.

“Already done. I figured you’d want as soon as possible, so we sent the information and got you booked. April 3rd is the first Monday in April, and you’ve got a first thing in the morning appointment. He’ll get back to you with the audiogram they produce from the information we’re sending over, so, if he wants Sean to get an MRI between now and then, you’ll have that ready to go, too.”

“April?” Abby says, sounding pissed.

Illn looks embarrassed by the wait. “Everyone is slammed these days. There used to be an entire department that did this in DC, but they’re gone, now, scattered all over the place. I don’t think you can get any sort of specialist in this area any faster, but if you can find someone you like further away, I’ll happily send the information on. I can get you names in Philadelphia if you want to make the trip. They’re got great pediatric medicine at Penn. Just let me know.”

Tim’s remembering the ‘functionally no different’ comment. “But you don’t think this is a rush situation.”

Illn shakes her head. “Sooner is better than later, but a few months, now, isn’t a big deal. Most places won’t do cochlear implants before a year, and the earliest I’ve heard of them was six months. Keep talking to him, keep signing, he’ll pick up a lot by seeing and feeling. When you get to Dr. Snyder, and you’ve got more of an idea of what’s coming next, they’ll get you set with social workers and support services. Read up on hearing aids and cochlear implants.”

“Been doing that,” Gibbs says.

“That’s right, you have been. So, you know what you’re looking at.”

He nods. “Enough.”

Illn smiles at them. “I know this is a lot, but… you’ve got a perfectly healthy little boy.” Who’s been busy munching down his lunch this whole time, paying no attention to the wider world. “He’s just a bit different. And that might make things more interesting in the long term, but right now, he’s a newborn, just like every other newborn. Enjoy him, enjoy his soft skin, silky hair, and new baby smell. Has he had his first bath, yet?”

Abby shakes her head. His umbilical stump just fell off this morning.
“Okay, today, swimming time. See if little boy likes the water. Get it nice and warm and I bet he will.”

And that’s that.

On the ride home, Abby says to Tim, “I suppose you can tell Leon you’ll be there for the Commission meetings.”

They’d all been quiet, living in their own thoughts. That wasn’t one that had been in Tim’s head.

But it is now. He nods. “You want me to?”

Both Abby and Gibbs nod. “Yeah, between Jethro and Heather, I’m good for the seven-eight hours you’d be gone.

Gibbs is driving, and Tim’s in the back with Sean. He strokes his little boy, who’s sucking away on his pacifier, actually awake, and watching the seat back avidly. “Feel a little weird about it. I was home for all of Kelly’s first few weeks.”

“Not shipping out, Tim,” Gibbs says. And that puts things in a certain level of perspective. Or at least puts who he should talk to about things like this into perspective.

Tim inclines his head, and holds Sean’s hand. Sean looks away from the back of the seat in his general direction. Tim’s still too far away for Sean to see him clearly, so he’s mostly just looking at a large vaguely person shaped blur of brown hair, pale skin, and dark gray coat. “I’ll be home in time for tonight’s feeds.”

Abby smirks at that. “So, you go to one of these drugged out of your head on pain killers, and the next one new baby exhausted.”

Tim shakes his head. “I don’t know what the hell Leon thinks I’m going to do with this, but…”

“But if he’s offering Jimmy time off to get you there, he thinks it’s important,” Abby finishes.

They drive quietly for another mile or two before Gibbs says, “This one’s at the Omni?”

Tim checks his email. “Yeah. Looks like they all are.”

“Omni’s a nice place, right?” Gibbs asks. He’s sure that over the years he’s been there, because he feels like he’s has at least one case drag him to every hotel in DC, but they’ve blurred in his mind over the years, and he doesn’t have a distinct image of the place in his head.

“Wedding coming up. Nice to have a place to have it.”

“Send me a text to remind me when I’m there, and I’ll grab you some brochures.”

Abby’s watching Gibbs. Sure, she, Breena, and Ziva have been chatting about the upcoming Borin-
Gibbs weddings since… oh their first date, but the idea that it might be that level of upscale hadn’t occurred to any of them. “It’s really nice, Gibbs.”

He nods.

“Like Senior and Delphine, nice.”

He nods again.

“So, you’re saying this may be the kind of wedding where Molly’s going to get her ultimate-fantasy-three-year-old-princess-dress-of-fluffy-flower-girl-pretteness?”

Gibbs flashes a quick little smile at that image. “More likely than not.”

_I’ll be there. Meet and greet starts tonight at 7:00?_ Tim text to Leon when he gets home.

A moment later he gets _Yes. Just like the rest of them, it’s at the Omni, and make sure to bring your work ID._

_I remember._ Tim stares at his phone, thinking through what he’s supposed to be doing, and fires off a text to Manner about meeting him at the Commission. By the time he’s done that, he’s got another one from Leon.

_Will Dr. Palmer be showing up for work this week?_

Tim supposes that Leon A: needs to know that, and B: that’s a somewhat delicate way of asking how the testing went.

_He should be. We got the first round of tests done, and--and for as fine as he claims to be with this, it still takes him a few seconds to commit the idea to words--Sean is deaf._ He swallows as he reads his own words on the phone screen, and realizes he hasn’t sent this out to anyone else in the family, yet, either. _There will be follow up care and appointments and lots of stuff, but not this week, and depending on what the specialist has to say about the test results, possibly not until April._

Tim hits send, and then sends out a larger, mass text, to everyone on the new baby text list. He figures he’ll have to deal with fewer uncomfortable silences, condolences, so sorries, and the like if he just gets it all out at once, online.

He pulls up the most recent video of Sean, laying on his back this morning, in his little blue and gray puppy pirate footy jammies, kicking his feet. He adds to it:

_A week ago we sent out word that Sean James had joined the party. On the day he was born, like all babies, he was given a hearing screening test, which he failed, and then another one, which he also failed. Today we’ve received confirmation that he is deaf, in both ears. We’re doing okay, and so is Sean. He’s growing like crazy and keeping us up at night, which is exactly what he’s supposed to be doing. We don’t exactly know what comes next, or why he’s deaf, though we’ve got an appointment with a pediatric audiologist set. That won’t happen until April, so we’ve got a few months before we’ll be able to answer any specific questions about what’s going on/happening next._

_We’ll keep you updated as we learn more. Thank you for all the congratulations and well wishes. It’s_ been a tiring week, and Kelly’s not entirely sure about this little brother thing, but Abby and I couldn’t be more in love with him.

Tim’s not sure if that’s elegantly done or not, but he hits send anyway.

I’m sorry, Tim. Come up from Leon as he’s writing his mass text, but he doesn’t have a good answer to that, so, again, he brushes it off.

We’re doing okay. He is, too. Anyway, working. I’ll get there, see what’s going on and... Go from there.

Thank you. Pops up a second later.

Tim got onto work stuff when he got home. Abby got Jimmy and Breena on the phone to talk to them.

“So, we just... wait?” Breena asks.

“Apparently. Unless Penny and Ducky have someone else, unless we want to pack Sean up and travel for... hours with a newborn.” Just the idea of that makes Abby feel overwhelmed.

“I’d say wait,” Jimmy replies. “We’re all tired, and I think your pediatrician is right, saving a few months here won’t matter much. Might as well settle into new baby hibernation. Rest, home, family.”

They hear Breena yawn.

“What’s that for? I had last night on,” Jimmy jokes, hoping to perk things up a bit. They’re all feeling... heavy. Maybe a little sad, but maybe trying to not be sad, too.

“Mom got a new coffee for the machine here, and I think it’s decaf. Been asleep all day.”

“Well, you get to sleep tonight, we all do,” Jimmy replies.

“I feel like I should be on night feeds,” Abby says. So far she’s getting to sleep “all night” which is code for no feeds between ten and six. Though she does have to get up to pump at least once during that stretch.

“No.” “Uh uh.” Both Jimmy and Breena veto that.

“Give it another week. You get all healed up, nice and solid, and then you’ll get your share of the night feeds,” Breena replies. “Besides, you get him at night right now, and what’ll happen? He’ll cry, your milk’ll let down, he’ll want it, and the idea of you not having to get all the night feeds’ll get shot in the foot.”

“Yes, Mom.”

Breena smirks a bit on her end of the phone conversation. “You really okay?” That’s the thing they haven’t been talking about.

“Enough. I hate not knowing what’s coming up next, but... that’s parenting, right?”

Tim walks over while she’s on the phone, and sits next to her. She puts it on speaker.
“Hey,” he says, as he settles in with Abby.

“Hey, back,” Breena says.

“Hello,” from Jimmy.

“You okay?” Jimmy asks.

Tim can feel Jimmy thinking, articulately put, but he doesn’t say it, and when it comes down to it blah covers the sensation pretty well. There are no sharp edges, nothing raw or urgent, just… blah. Abby snuggles into him. “Blah… That’s… Yeah, it’s kind of gray and mucky.”

“Jethro with you guys?” Breena asks.

“I’m here right now, so he’s heading over to spend time with Kelly and Heather, make sure she’s feeling properly doted on, and that Heather’s up to date on what’s going on.”

“What did she say when you first told her about it?” Jimmy asks.

“That she always thought ALS fluency would be a good thing to have on her resume. She already does the baby signing stuff, but that’s just basic words: eat, milk, drink, up. The kind of things an eighteen-month-old wants to communicate,” Abby says.

“You getting home soon?” Tim knows Breena’s usually done for the day in an hour or so, so he’s asking Jimmy.

“No dead bodies right now, knock on wood,” Jimmy replies.

In the background they hear Allan say, “Not feeling it today.”

“And Dr. Allan’s psychic vibes are saying we won’t be having any clients today.”

That gets a small chuckle out of Tim and Abby. They glance at each other, and the phone. They’d like to just sort of sit here and be with their loves, but everyone has things to do. “We’ll let you get back to it. See you at dinner,” Tim says.

There are goodbyes, and then it’s just, for the next moment or two, him and Abby. He holds her close, and kisses her neck. She snuggles into him. He holds her, and the feeling of peace that comes with being with her.

And, after a moment, Sean wakes up, calling for them. Tim kisses her again, and goes to get him. He’s back with Sean all cleaned up and ready to eat. Lying on her side is still a bit uncomfortable, so Abby’s on all sitting up feeds right now, which is fine for Tim. He sits behind her on Jimmy and Breena’s sofa, holding his wife and son, watching him eat, and her feed him, and he might be blah on the rest of this, but right now, this is bright and sure and steady.

This is love, and joy, and if there’s some dark, or gray, to go with this, then that’s just what it is.

Penny said something about when you get to a certain age, all of the bright spots have some dark to them, and that it makes the light shine just that little bit brighter in contrast. Maybe that’s true, maybe not, but he’s feeling it intensely right now.
They decided to wait until after they knew for sure that Sean couldn’t hear to tell the girls. Anna and Kelly really don’t get it, at all. They’re still learning what the senses are and what they do. Molly, on the other hand, responds in typical almost three-year-old fashion of rushing over to Sean and screaming in his ear.

He sleeps through it. Doesn’t flinch or give any hint at all that a toddler just yelled in his ear loud enough to peel paint from the walls.

And that, more than anything the doctors had to say, kills any hope that the tests were wrong.

So, from here, there’s just moving on.

As Tim’s getting dressed to go out, Abby’s got Sean in her lap, the girls in front of her, and they start to learn the sign for eat. Molly gets it in a flash. She watches Abby do it once, and has it down, and then wanders off to show Breena, and then ask for the sign for every other word she can think of. Anna, who isn’t talking at all, yet, watches, but doesn’t try to do it. Though Breena picks her up, holds her hand, and does the motion for her a few times. And after a few more examples, Kelly does it, too.

As he’s leaving, Abby’s showing Molly every word Molly can think of, and Jimmy and Breena get dinner put together with two little girls underfoot, and a baby boy in his bouncy chair on the kitchen table, dozing away.
There are tests, and there are tests.

Showing up Monday night is one of the latter.

He meets up with Manner outside the Omni, and says, “You sure you want to be seen with me at this thing?”

Manner blinks, shoots him a curious look, and it occurs to Tim that this might be someone who doesn’t actually know about what happened at the last one of these he was at. Or he’s so sure that Jimmy is Tim’s man, that the idea that anyone else might not know that hasn’t occurred to him. Either way, Tim shakes his head. He’s not explaining.

Manner shrugs. “Technically, you’re my boss for the next week until Abbi gets the paperwork and transfer done, so, you want me here, I’m here.”

“Great.” And in they go.

It takes Tim two minutes to spot the first problem, and it has nothing to do with the few people who were at the Tech in Anti-Terror Conference staring at him, and then Manner, and then back at him, clearly wondering who Manner is.

The problem is, he’s the youngest guy in the room. By at least five years. Manner’s the next youngest guy, and he’s got a good ten years under most of the other guys around here. Okay, they’re supposed to be the top brass for their departments, so it’d be weird if anyone was 22, but... This is Cyber. There should be more of them in the almost 40 range than the almost retired range. If he had to guess, he’d say that most of the people around him got their start in management during the Y2K compliance push.

It’s fossil central.

Tim’s also noticing, as he’s eyeing who he’s sharing a table with, Army CID, (And seeing it written out like that, he realizes why they don’t just go by their initials) and CGIS, he also realizes that there’s cybercrime and there’s cybercrime.

The big hitter here is the FBI, of course, they’re the main Federal Law Enforcement branch. From there, there’s what Tim’s considering the rest of the active crime teams: the ATF, DEA, and his tablemates, and then there’s passive crime teams, which makes up the majority of the non-FBI people here: Social Security/Medicare/Medicaid Fraud, IRS, Treasury, ACA Compliance. Those are the guys who make sure taxes get filed and fraud cases are followed up on.

And they’re all here in the same room because they use the same tools.

Literal tools. Computers.

He sighs. It’d be like going to a “Drill Conference” and having everyone from the local carpenter, to fine arts creators, to surgeons show up, and assume because they all use drills that, that being in the same room to chat would be useful.
Manner’s looking around, and he’s spotting the issue, too. “Umbrella’s too wide.”

Tim nods. “They let us have time on Thursday and Friday to give talks and plans and stuff, right?”

Manner nods.

“How do I get signed up for one of them?”

Manner rolls his eyes a bit. “You’re Tim McGee of NCIS, biggest Cybercrime wonk in the country right now. Go talk to any of the people running this thing, and they’ll give you all the time you want.”

So, Tim goes and finds one, and Manner is right. What the hell he’s going to do will all of Friday afternoon to himself, he’s not sure, but… He’ll be doing something.

There’s a thought that was hiding, far, far back in Tim’s mind when he was working on convincing Leon to let him hire without a college degree.

He’s been reading, and more importantly seeing, that the average age of Federal employees (except for military enlistees) has been going up and up. He knows that. He’s been with NCIS for 15 years, and he’s still one of the younger ones at NCIS. He shouldn’t be, but he is. His pet teams aside, new hires are more likely to come from another Federal Agency than from outside, and FLETC classes these days are more and more filled with people who have wrapped up military or law enforcement careers elsewhere, and are moving to the Federal level.

And, sitting there, chatting with Manner, watching the room, seeing all the gray hair, he knows a big chunk of the problem is that when the Feds try to recruit, they can’t find talent who can pass the drug tests. At 39, he represents, pretty much, the tail end of the generation that went to college where casual, regular pot use wasn’t a huge thing.

And he knows it’s worse among the people he wants to hire. That’s part of trying to get them out of high school. (Though it’s not a thought he’s articulated before, he knows it was churning around back there.)

It’s not that pot and computers necessarily go hand and hand, but… Casual drug use and not caring about rules do, and the kind of people who make really good computer guys are smart, driven, and don’t care about rules. Can’t get outside the box if you think the box is sacred, which is why Manner and his ilk can have fabulous skills, but are never going to be top tier talent.

Which means Tim and everyone else in their world is stuck with a multi-tiered problem.

There’s a small pool of talent they all want.

The top talent recruiters don’t care what a potential hacker puts into his body. As long as he can produce, what he does with the rest of his time is up to him. That’s the hiring model Tim would like to use. He eyes the DEA branch, who make up at least a quarter of the guys here, and figures the chances of him being able to say, ‘screw the drug tests’ is a non-starter.

Then there’s the work environment. Tim already knows that he can’t compete against Google, Facebook, or Amazon. Federal employees make more than their free market counterparts, as long as they don’t have any particularly specialized skills. He was at NCIS for five years before he hit what would have been his starting salary at any private company. And that’ll be true for anyone Tim wants to hire, too. He doesn’t have the money, location, or work place culture to compete with the big boys. The only way he can get Google quality people is by grabbing them before they’re Google quality, and hoping they grow into it. So far, having hired Brand, he thinks that’s working pretty well, but how far out he can roll that…

The second tier of computer talent recruiters does care what a potential hacker puts into his body, but they pay better than the Feds do, recruit more aggressively, and offer more attractive work environments. So, that’s where most of the talent who can pass a piss test ends up. (Which is why Tim’s the youngest guy in the room, at least to his own assessment.)

And that leaves Tim in the same situation as a lot of the rest of these guys. He can’t find clean talent, and he can’t afford the talent he wants, not if it goes to college.

So, not only are the people he’s looking at his age or older, but they’re fighting against the guys like Kahn. Lots of talent, and nothing tying his hands.

He feels like he’s watching a group of people intentionally going to gun fights with knives.

The hunt for talent and better tools is about ninety percent of the non-introductions conversations. They’re going on all around Tim.

On one level, he’s liking that, because the big build he’s interested in is something these guys would be very responsive to. Several of them are talking about the same basic idea, though they’re only talking on the Federal level. If the idea of extending it to the Local LEOs has occurred to any of them, they aren’t talking about it.

On another level… It’s butt covering. The government pretty much fell four months ago, and a lot of these guys, especially the FBI, should have been on top of it. They should have been nipping this crap in the bud for years.

Every group here had some sort of corruption thing going on, and these guys didn’t catch it.

That looks bad.

So, they can talk about being asleep at the switch, or talk about not having the people and tools.

Tim supposes it’s human nature to blame the people and tools.

