Tony shrugs. "Ziva knew. I'm sure Ducky did, too, he was still my medical proxy then. Didn't want it getting out beyond that. You do need them for balance, and I didn't want to find out that NCIS would sideline me for missing toes."

"That makes sense."

"But I can't really hide them in a locker room, or anywhere else I'm supposed to be barefoot."

Tim nods. "Look, Jimmy and I aren't going to say anything about them to anyone. And I'm sure if you tell the instructor you're missing eight toes, shoes won't be a problem. And if you don't want to… Yeah, we were both thinking beating you over the head with how hard yoga really is would be funny, but if you don't want to go, that's fine."

"Oh… it's fine to make fun of me for being clumsy but not for being a cripple?"

Tim flashes him a look best described as Duh! "Well, yeah. I thought everyone knew that."

Tony rolls his eyes. "I'll be there."

"Ziva's invited, too."

Tony shakes his head. "Remember when she got that third speeding ticket?"

"Yeah."

"Saturday is driving school for her."

"Oh. Wow."

"Yeah. But if she can manage to not scare the instructor into early gray hair, then she can get some of those points off her license."

"Cool."

Tony pulls into a parking spot. "So, what do I need to bring for this?"

"It'll be hot, like hundred degrees, so something light and easy to move in, but probably not shorts."

"Why not shorts?" Tony always works out in shorts.

"Because you don't wear briefs and if the legs on your shorts are tight enough to keep you from flashing everyone when your leg is up, they're also tight enough that you won't be able to move easily."

"McGee, assuming there will not be people lying on the floor between my legs, I don't think I can get into any positions where the leg of my shorts will result in me flashing anyone."
"Then wear shorts. Bring lots of water. Don't feel embarrassed if you can't get into most or even any of the positions, I probably can't either, just keep trying."

"Great."

Saturday morning they walk into the studio and are greeted by a rush of hot air.

Tony takes one look at Tim and Jimmy and says, "Okay, doing this in a hundred degree room is cheating on the sweating thing. Playing poker in this heat would make you sweat, and that doesn't make it exercise."

"It's hot to help you loosen up and stretch," Jimmy says as he heads to the front desk.

"Uh huh."

Jimmy grins at him. "And trust me, you're going to need all the help you can get."

Tim had told Tony to wear something light, cool, and easy to move in, and then promptly forgot about it because they got to the location of Colonel Phelps and he switched out of weekend mode and into case mode.

So, it wasn't until that morning that it occurred to him that he didn't have any good hot yoga clothing.

Well, that's not quite true. But as he's changing Tony looks at him and says, "Your pajamas?"

Technically the answer to that is yes. He's in a pair of very light cotton knit pants and an MIT t-shirt with the sleeves ripped off. He has, on occasion, slept in them.

Jimmy's in something that looks a whole lot like boxer briefs, and nothing else. It's really tight, pretty short, and Tim, even if he was as cut as Jimmy, could not possibly image ever wearing anything that revealing in public.

Tony's got on gym shorts and an NCIS t-shirt, and from what Tim can tell, is trying to not look directly at Jimmy, who is, for all practical purposes, naked.

"You sleep in that?" Jimmy asks.

"No, I watch TV, lay around the house, and write in this. I sleep naked, unless I'm on a case, which is why he knows these are my pajamas."

"Ah."

Tony's looking at Tim. "I thought this was something you do."

"Yoga is something I do. Yoga in public in hundred degree heat isn't."

"You do it in your PJs?" Tony asks.
"No. I do it at home, first thing in the morning, with Abby. So, it's not like I get out of bed, put clothing on, do it with her, then take the clothing off, get a shower, and go put more clothing on. Unless it's cold in our room, I do it naked."

Jimmy's nodding at that. "Easier to make sure your form is good that way."

And while Tim's sure that's true, that's generally something he's not paying all that much attention to. Naked Abby doing yoga is vastly more interesting to him than what his own body might be doing.

Jimmy looks at both of them and shakes his head. "Leave your shirts. Really, it's going to be hot in there."

While it's true that the front desk area was hot, the actual studio where they'll be doing the yoga is sweltering.

It's really, really hot.

It's like a sauna with good lighting and mirrors.

And Tim's not entirely sure that the sixty-four ounces of water he brought are going to be enough. And Jimmy was right, this is definitely a shirt free zone. And he's certainly debating stripping out of his pants, too. There's a little button on the fly of his boxers… He'd probably be covered enough, and in that his boxers aren't tight, he'll still be more discreetly dressed than Jimmy.

He's reaching for his waistband when two more members of the class walk in. Girls. From the looks of it, they're fourteen and seventeen. So, pants are definitely staying on. And, in what he's thinking of as his first 'Dad' moment, he's feeling a very strong desire to wrap Jimmy in a towel and not let him come back until he's got some pants on.

Apparently this Groupon was for an introductory class, purposely kept small so that each member could get lots of one on one attention, so it's the three of them, the two girls, and the instructor, who is also female and maybe twenty-two.

So, it's not like he can hide in the back or sort of blend in. But Jimmy's looking pretty loose and comfortable as the instructor gives them the little get-to-know-Bikram pep talk, Tony looks ready to die from a combination of heat and embarrassment, the girls keep staring at them (especially Jimmy) and giggling. Tim guesses he's somewhere in between and that's okay.

It's starts off easy enough, even Tony can handle Half Moon pose's easy side bend, but it ramps up pretty fast from there.
There are twenty six poses used in Bikram yoga, and for the vast majority of them Tim is hearing Tony muttering under his breath, "You have got to be fucking kidding me," along with "Ow ow ow ow ow!" and "My God, Palmer, how the hell are you doing this!"

And Tim sincerely agrees with the last of those. Okay, yes, he's only been doing this for five months, and Jimmy's been doing it for years, but still… How? Human bodies were not meant to get into some of these positions and yeah, he can see Jimmy's struggling a little with some of them, this isn't his usual discipline, but all of his moves are slow, controlled, and graceful. And sure he may not have the full range of extension the instructor does, but Jimmy also isn't a twenty-something girl.

Meanwhile Tim's mostly just pleased he hasn't managed to fall on his ass (or in the case of the Standing Separate Leg Stretching pose, his head), yet.

And he's fairly certain Tony's just pleased that he hasn't died.

They're about half an hour into it when Tim notices something else. Yes, this was designed to make sure they all get a decent amount of one on one attention, and yes, the instructor, Jamie, has been working with each of them, and okay, it's true that Tony's worse than the other four of them, but he gets about five times as much attention as the rest of them.

And he's not that much worse than Tim is.

He's bad at it, no two ways about it. And even if he wasn't eight toes down, the fact that he's got all the flexibility of a piece of plywood is not helping things, but even without the toes he does have a decent sense of balance, is generally good at any sort of sport, and is pretty strong. So, there's no chance that he's the worst yoga student Jamie's ever seen.

But he's getting a lot of one-on-one attention and some really intensive encouragement.

After they wrap up, and are heading back toward the locker room, Jamie comes over to Tony, looking up at him adoringly, standing a little too close, and says, "You know, if you ever want some one on one help—"

Jimmy cuts in with "He's getting married in April."

"Oh." The expression on her face falls, and she shrugs and walks off.
Tim rolls his eyes. "You know, I was almost as bad as you were at this, and no hot girls are coming up to me to offer tutoring."

Tony grins at him. "When you've got it—"

"And the it he's talking about is a naked ring finger," Jimmy adds.

"She'd have hit on me even if I was wearing a wedding ring!"

"Uh huh… That's why she sprinted off when I mentioned you were engaged. One thing you're going to have to get used to, women rarely hit on married men. They see that ring and run away. And if you flirt with them while wearing it, they get creeped out."

"You speaking from a lot of experience here, Palmer? Do a lot of flirting behind Breena's back?"

"No, I've got a better source than that. Breena's book club meets at our place every six weeks, and they have a really easy time forgetting I'm around. I listen in."

By that point they're in the locker room, and Tim drifts off, looking forward to, for the first time he can ever remember, a cool shower.

No, it isn't like he'd been planning on looking. He's been in a locker room plenty of times with Jimmy and never looked. Just like in the restroom, not looking at the other guys' privates is part of the guy code, but it's a tiny locker room, so, he's practically changing on top of Jimmy, who is, of course, also naked. Which means when he turns to grab his shirt, he does see naked Jimmy.

And suddenly why Jimmy doesn't have a problem with the zipper on his fly when having sex in public is very apparent. His pubic hair can't be more than a quarter of an inch long, so obviously getting snagged in the zipper isn't an issue for him.

"Oh."

He doesn't realize he's said it out loud until Tony, who is limping out of the shower, says, "What?"

"Nothing." He pulls his shirt over his head and finds his wrist cuff.

"Didn't sound like nothing." Jimmy adds, looking at him curiously, finishing drying off.

Tim rolls his eyes, looks down pointedly, then looks away and snaps the cuff shut. "Just realized why zippers aren't a problem for you."

Jimmy follows what he means and shrugs a little. "A side benefit of not being wild and woolly."

"Side benefit?" Tony asks.

"Well, the main one is that she's not picking my hair out of her teeth, which means her mouth heads down there a whole lot more often."

"Ah." Both Tim and Tony nod at that.

"And well, it makes everything look bigger, which is kind of nice, too."

"I suppose you do what you have to," Tony says as he starts to dry off.
"Oh please, Tony, you're not setting any records." Tim says.

"You've seen enough dicks to know, McGee?"

"Not live, but yeah, I have." Both Jimmy and Tony stare at him. He shakes his head and rolls his eyes. "Don't you two even try to tell me you don't watch porn. Remember, I'm the guy you call when your computers mysteriously stop working after visiting certain sites. I know all your dirty little secrets."

Jimmy just sort of shrugs, and Tony looks really disturbed by that, which Tim finds amusing because, well, Tony has nothing particularly troublesome on his computer (the kinkiest he gets is trios with three girls), but Jimmy's got some pretty wild stuff on his.

"Oh, and on that subject, google whatever it is you like plus Tumblr, and then don't leave Tumblr. You'll end up calling me a lot less often about your computers being clogged with malware."

They nod and go back to getting dressed.

"What's Tumblr?" Tony asks a minute later.

"Fandoms and porn."

"So, geek heaven?" Jimmy says.

"Yeah."

"No wonder you knew about it," Tony adds.

A minute later, while Tim's tying his shoes, Tony asks Jimmy. "Isn't it kind of prickly?"

"Huh?"

"You know, you trim down there, is it kind of itchy?"

"Only if you trim it too short. Shaving is where prickly and itchy becomes an issue."

"You shaved it all off?" Tim asks. Yeah, he knows some guys do that (once again, he watches porn) but he never thought any guy he knew would.

"Yeah. And, the first eight hours after were really, really good. Everything is so soft, and so sensitive, and well, Breena really liked it, and… if she's bare, too…” Jimmy appears to be remembering something he really enjoyed. "Anyway… Until it started to grow back, it was incredible. Then it started to grow back, and imaging wearing skin-tight briefs made of sandpaper, that scrape against you every single time you move, and I mean every time you shift, step, hell, breathe, and it feels that way for like three days."

Both Tim and Tony are cringing at that idea.

"So you never did it again?" Tim asks.

"Not saying that." Jimmy smirks. "Really, those first eight hours, excellent. But I don't do it if I've got work anytime soon. And Breena did find some lotion that makes the hair grow in slower and softer, so that helps. But, ummm… if she's not willing to lick or suck all of you, it's probably not worth the growing back in period."

Tony nods. Tim does, too and decides he's dressed enough to head out of the locker room.
They got coffee after. Well, they went to a coffee shop, but all three of them got cold drinks. Tim's thinking that even after drinking the whole bottle of water he brought with him, refilling it, drinking that, and spending a good ten minutes just letting cold water run over him, that he's still a few quarts low on his hydration.

"So, Abby got a Groupon for that?" Tony asked as he sat down, heavily, looking like he was fairly sure he was never, ever going to move again.

"Yeah, back before she got pregnant. The original idea was to do it with him. But pregnant means she shouldn't get her temperature over 102, and it's 105 in there."

"We'd go do yoga day once a month or so, Breena usually comes, too." Jimmy got out his phone and showed them a shot of him and Abby posing at the last place, then flicked to the shot of the girls together, and one of the three of them. "This was last time. Haven't done Bikram in years, but that was fun. After McSciuto's on the outside, we'll have to do that again."

"I'm volunteering for babysitting duty right here and now," Tony says, face serious.

"You really hated that, didn't you?" Jimmy says, shaking his head. He'd had a really good time, and managed to go two full hours without thinking about anything Trisomy or Jon related.

"Jimmy, parts of me I didn't know existed hurt on a cellular level right now. Each and every single nerve in both thighs are screaming at me."

"You didn't have to go quite that gung ho on it. Part of the idea is patience and easing into the poses," Jimmy answers.

Tony took a sip of his shake, shaking his head, obviously Jimmy's never spent any time with anyone who was ever serious about competitive athletics. Ease into it. Tony sighs and changes the topic a little. "So… Abby and Breena can do that?"

"Some of it," Tim replies. She's not as into it as Jimmy is, and he's got no idea how devoted to yoga Breena is.

"Breena's really bendy," Jimmy says with a fairly dirty smile on his face.

Tim grins. "So's Abby."

"Huh." Tony appears to be grasping some of the reason why you might want your spouse to be into yoga, even if you're under the impression that it's some sort of torture.

"Ziva's pretty flexible, too, right?" Jimmy asks.

"Oh, yeah. She likes… pilates. So, why did you start doing it?" Tony asks Tim. They both know Jimmy started in college after he was diagnosed with diabetes.

"Found out on my honeymoon that there are some benefits to being flexible."

Jimmy sits there, nodding, looking really smug.

"Like what kind of benefits?" At the beginning of the class Jamie had gone over the "benefits" of yoga, and Tony's pretty damn sure neither McGee or Palmer would be looking that smug if they were thinking about blood pressure, stress relief, or better posture.

"Have sex when you get home, see how it feels," Tim says with a smile.

"McGee, I hurt all over. The last thing I want to do when I get home is move."

"Then don't. Lay back and let her do you. It'll be worth it."

Tony stares at him, eyes slightly narrowed, while Jimmy nods and grins, saying, "The looser you start off, the more you can ramp the tension up, the harder you'll come."

Tim turns to Jimmy quickly. "Wait, Abby said she read that. Did you tell her that?"

"Yeah. She might have read it, too. I gave her some of my books five-six years ago. She finally test that out on you?"

"Uh huh."

"Good?" Jimmy asks.

"I'm doing yoga, and kept doing it even when she was sleeping every possible minute instead of doing it with me. Yeah, it's good."

"How did you even learn stuff like this?" Tony asks.

Jimmy shrugs. "Cosmo. Back when I was dating Melissa," he sees that Tim and Tony don't know who that is, so he clarifies, "in college, I saw one of hers, read something on Tantric sex, decided that was worth looking into further, and well, fifteen years later, I'm pretty good at yoga."

"I thought you started yoga after you got sick," Tony says.

"I did. I was dating her after I got sick. Look, Breena was with us when I said that, and it is true that I got interested in it and started doing it about eight months after I was diagnosed with diabetes. Just, diabetes wasn't precisely the motivating factor for why I started or why I kept doing it."

"You like tantric sex?" Tim asks. He's familiar with the idea, but hasn't felt any need to try it out, too much religion-y stuff to be really attractive to him.

"Meh." Jimmy wiggles his hand to indicate it was so-so. "Tried it, but never got into it much. Don't get me wrong, the positions are interesting, and the increased strength and flexibility are very good things, plus it was the first thing I ran into that really got into the idea of sex as an art, which I really did like, but I don't believe in Chakras, and don't feel any need to try and meditate during sex, I mean, I like to be paying attention to the sex when I'm having sex, so that part of it wasn't doing anything for me."

"Sex as an art?" Tony asks.

"Sure," Jimmy's nodding away at this. "I can't paint, write, or sculpt to save my life, but I'm a damn good lay. And I got that way because I studied and practiced. You weren't just born great at basketball, right?"

"I was born good at basketball."

"And then you really worked at it to get a whole lot better?"

"Yep."
"Well, on raw talent alone, I'm good at sex. And, in some ways almost dying was a very good thing for me, because it helped me figure out what was important to me and what and who I wanted to be. But I was also twenty, so basically, what I really wanted to do was have a ton of sex. And look, I was built like Tim, kind of tall and scrawny—"

"Hey!"

"Tim, you look a lot better than you did this time last year, and a ton better than this time two years ago, but you've got a ways to go."

"No I don't. I'm healthy. I look fine. I get enough exercise to keep me quick and limber and eat well enough to keep me trim. I do not need to be so cut that you can use me as muscular anatomy display."

Jimmy just sort of shrugs. "Anyway, I knew I was always going to be kind of goofy and a little awkward, and that I was never going to be broad shouldered or classically handsome, so I'd never be really hot at getting a woman in the first place, but I also figured that if I got great at sex, and looked really good naked, the chances of a girl deciding to sleep with me a second time would raise dramatically. And having sex a whole lot with one girl would work perfectly for my goal of getting laid a lot. So I read up and practiced. And suddenly, I was getting laid a whole lot more. Especially in college and my early twenties when the rest of the guys my age were still clueless. I've been shot down left, right, and any other direction you can imagine, but since I decided sex was worth studying and learning how to get good at, no girl I've been with has refused a second date."

"None of them?" Tim's kicking himself for not having figured that out on his own. Once Jimmy said it, it was blindingly obvious, but that was an idea that never crossed his mind. Yeah, he did eventually get good, but he was a hell of a lot closer to thirty than twenty, and really it wasn't until he started dating Abby again that he had the opportunity to really learn another person well enough to jump from good to great.

"None. Not saying I've never been dumped, but date one has always lead to dates two, three, four and on."

"So, you really did dump Lee?" Tony asks. Sure, he heard about it. And yes, Lee was using Palmer, but even with all of that, he never really believed that Jimmy ended it.

"Yeah, I really did. Look, I'm not going to say I minded the sex, because, I mean… it was great sex, and who doesn't like that? But I wanted more than to be her weekly booty call. I love sex, but I love women too, and I wanted the whole package. Getting off at work is great, but I was still going home to an empty apartment, and that wasn't."

Tony takes another drink of his shake and just stares at Jimmy for a long minute, like he's really not sure he wants to ask this or not, but finally he does. "Okay, so how do you get good at sex if you don't have any pickup skills? Isn't step one find a woman to do it with you?"

"Nah. Don't get me wrong, you can read until your eyes fall out and you're never going to figure it out without a girl around, but still, step one isn't grab the first available girl. Step one was learn anatomy and some basic technique. Step two was read things girls write for themselves—"

"I told you that!" Tim says to Tony. "He saw me reading Ms and couldn't figure out why I'd do that."

"I told you that if you wanted to get to know more about women, you needed to get to know some women," Tony says.
"I'm close to my mom, sister, grandmother, my best friend was a girl, and one of my partners was a girl. I wanted to know about the stuff they wouldn't tell me."

Jimmy nods in agreement with that. "Women will not tell you that you can't find a clit, even with a flashlight and GPS. They won't tell you your technique sucks. They really won't tell you how they like to be kissed or touched. They expect you to magically know that stuff. What they will do is complain to each other about the fact that you suck at sex. And if you read them complaining, you start to pick up some tips real fast. And if you want expert level tips, go find erotica written for girls, by girls, preferably lesbians, and pay attention. Then, once you've got that set, you go find a real girl, and you start playing, and you pay even more attention to how she responds to what you're doing. I have had women compliment me because I can actually figure out when what I'm doing isn't working, like it's some sort of magic trick, and it's really not difficult, you've just got to get your brain doing the thinking. But especially in college, that made me the wizard of sex."

Tim laughs at that. Back in college and grad school his brain generally wasn't involved in sex at all. It was certainly very interested in it, but tended to check out once the actual sex happened.

"So, you're what, sitting in your girl's room, and you just pick up her Cosmo and read it?" Tony asks.

"Yeah, pretty much. I'd finished my homework, she was still working on hers, I hadn't brought anything else to read, and it's Cosmo, so it's got a three-quarters naked women on the cover next to a headline that reads something like 117 Tips to Make Him Come So Hard His Ears Melt—"

"Those things are always so overrated," Tim adds.

"They really are. I don't think any of the girls who write those things have ever had sex with an actual man."

Tony's just looking at them like they're both some sort of strange insect and he's not sure if he wants to study them or run away shrieking.

But Jimmy just continues on, "So, I was all in favor of coming so hard my ears melted, so I got reading. And yeah, dumb tips, a girl tries to rub my dick between her wrists like she's starting a fire, especially without lube, and I'm getting the hell out of there."

"What?!" Tony says, stunned, holding his wrists in front of him, about two inches apart, staring in stupefaction.

"Really dumb tips," Tim says as he nods. "You know, the 117 Ways to Make Her Come So Hard Her Ears Melt things they have in Maxim or Men's Health might be just as bad." Tim's seen Tony's copies of those magazines, but never been bored enough to read one.

"Nope." Tony's pretty certain about that.

"Nope? You know for sure?" Jimmy asks. Last time he read a Maxim he was in college, and like the Cosmo he thought there were lots of sexy pictures and not much worth reading inside.

"Ziva reads Maxim as well, and she's let me know which ones are good and which aren't."

"Ah. Well, anyway, I'm reading her Cosmo, enjoying the pictures, seriously that thing's like soft porn, laughing really hard at the suggestions, and a few pages later I found the stuff on Tantric sex, and that actually looked good, but it was only three pages long, so off to the library I went, and a few inter-library loans and two weeks later, I had some stuff worth reading, and a girlfriend who was actually pretty interested in seeing what we could do with it."
"Twenty-year-old-you walks up to the counter at the library and asks them to put sex books on hold for you?" Tim asks. Twenty-year-old Tim McGee would have spontaneously combusted if he tried to ask for help finding sex books.

"Twenty-year-old-me was bound and determined to get great at sex. Plus the girl at the counter was a freshman and really cute, so I practiced my flirting technique. She still thought I was a dork, and probably a pervert, but I got the books I was looking for. And then I had a whole lot of fun with them. I wasn't flexible or strong enough for a lot of the stuff in there, so next semester I signed up for the yoga gym class and have been doing it regularly since." Jimmy drinks some of his iced tea and stretches. "I should probably be getting home soon."

Tim checks his watch, it's a little after one. "Yeah. Bootcamp tomorrow?"

"See you then." Jimmy stood and headed off.

Tony took another sip of his shake. "I am so glad I'm not doing that tomorrow. I'm going home, filling the bathtub with cold water and ice, and not moving for a week."

"If you're hurting that bad, your body may be telling you more exercise is in order."

"What it's telling me is that I'm forty-eight and trying to become a pretzel is a bad plan. I don't feel like this after jogging or sparring."

"It was for a good cause. He didn't check his phone once the whole time we were out."

"I know. And I could see he was really smiling when we were talking. After I get back from my honeymoon, we'll bring Ziva and Breena and do it again."

"Good."

"Why couldn't you two be basketball fans? You know, normal guys do things like go to a game."

"This is better for you."

"Yeah." Tony got up very slowly and began limping toward the door.

"Did you really hurt yourself?" Tim asked, yeah, he's sore; he knows he did something that's not part of his usual routine, but he's not aching.

"I hope not."
For their fifth bootcamp, Gibbs ended up with two more kids.

He hadn't been expecting Ziva and Breena to show up, but if they wanted to come, he was fine with it. Plus, having Ziva's eyes and skills would make this more effective for everyone. He'd be able to get input from her for training for all three of them, which would be a very good thing.

He was taping up Breena's hands when he asked, "Are you… should you…" He's tripping over the question because it's kind of delicate and he's never actually had a direct conversation with Breena. Sure he's smiled at her, kissed her cheek, offered hugs when congratulations were in order, and told her to do things when that was necessary, and they've been part of the same conversation, but he's never actually spoken with just her.

But she seemed to get what he wasn't asking. "Do you think he'd let me anywhere near this if my doctor didn't say I'm healed up enough for it."

He nods. "Okay. Molly with Abby?"

"Yep. Rumor has it she and Tony are making dinner for the rest of us. Did Abby invite you for dinner?" Gibbs nods. "I'm thinking it might be just her cooking. When we left, Tony was trying to convince Molly she wanted to play games that didn't involve him having to move because he hurts all over."

Gibbs furrows his eyebrows.

Breena understands that he doesn't know why Tony's hurting. "They did yoga yesterday. Tim and Jimmy are fine. Tony pushed too hard."

He nods at that. He's had a few conversations with Tony over the last year along the lines of Tim and Jimmy are a decade younger than he is, in awfully good shape, and if he wants to keep up with them he's got to take better care of himself. "What sort of fighting have you done?"

"I punched a guy in sixth grade." That was about what he was expecting.

"Make a fist."

She did. It didn't look too bad. Someone, and here he's thinking Ed, taught her how to make a fist, and probably how to throw a punch.

"Ziver?"

"Yes, Gibbs."

He pointed to Tim and Jimmy, who also started pay attention to what he was saying. "Watch those two spar. First round, they do whatever they want. Second round, Jimmy, your job is to focus on following where Tim's going. Figure out where he's going to hit you and block him. Tim work on hitting exactly what you're aiming for, right hand or either foot." Jimmy's accuracy was solid at this point, but he was still having a hard time anticipating where a hit was going to come. Meanwhile, Tim had gotten his accuracy up to one hundred percent with his left hand, but right and feet were still iffy, especially on anything other than the first round. "Ziver, by the time they're done, I want a training plan from you for each of them."
Ziva smiled and led the boys to the ring.

"Okay." Gibbs turned his attention back to Breena. "You sure you want to be here?"

She looked very determined. "Do you think I'm any less angry, less sad, or less frustrated than he is?"

"No." Gibbs shook his head.

"Do you think I shouldn't be able to try and beat it out?"

"No."

"Then why are you asking? Because I'm cute and a girl?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm done sitting at home and crying. Taking down that wall felt good, going to the range felt good, and this might too, and maybe it won't help, but I've got to try."

"It'll help, maybe not enough, but it'll help. Come on." Gibbs led her to one of the punching bags. "Show me what you've got."

She looked at him, eyebrows high, apparently she'd been expecting something else. "Just hit it?"

"Yep. Hard as you like. Right now I just want to see you throw a punch."

So she did. Walloped it. No control. No finesse. Lots of anger, lots of force.

"How's your arm?"

"Shoulder hurts, wrist hurts."

Gibbs nods. "Watch." He made a fist and punched the bag. He didn't tape up his own hands because he didn't think he was going to be doing any punching, so he doesn't put much force into it. Then he put her hands on his hips, which startled her, and punched again. "Feel what I'm doing?"

"Yeah."

He did it again, slowly, very little force, with her hands on his shoulders, elbow, and then his wrist. "Now you."

She hit again, very hard, but this time her form was a lot better.

"Hurt?"

"Not as much."

"Good. Now, do it slow and do it right. When you've got your form mastered on your right arm, we'll move to your left, and once you've got it down, then you can beat on anything you want as hard as you want as long as you want. Until then, soft, slow, easy." He cocks his head at Tim and Jimmy. "Just because those two idiots were dumb enough to beat each other into a pulp does not mean hurting yourself is a good idea."

She smiled a little at that, and then focused on the punching bag and hit it, slowly, but her form was perfect.
Gibbs nodded, small smile on his face. "Keep doing that. I'm going to see how your man's doing."

He stands next to Ziva, who's leaning against the ropes watching Tim and Jimmy intently.

"You suggested she come?"

"Jimmy suggested she go shooting with them. Apparently that went well. Tearing down the wall went well, too. So now she is here. When I heard she was coming, I suggested coming with her so she would have someone to spar with. Neither of them will fight her."

Gibbs kept an eye on them while Jimmy ducked under Tim's punch and got him in the ribs with his elbow. "Probably a good plan."

Ziva watched them spar for another thirty seconds, Tim sweeping Jimmy's legs out from under him, and nodded. "Neither of them has enough control to fight someone without possibly injuring them."

"Yep."

"What sort of training plan do you want for them?"

"Little bit of everything. Started elbows and knees with Jimmy last week. Still working on fist and foot with Tim. He's better on defense. Jimmy's better attacking."

"I can see that. McGee usually wins?"

"Usually. They fight until one of them hits the canvas. Tim wears him down, defending, and then takes his legs out from under him. Jimmy still can't tell when he's not really going to punch and is about to trip him. How about when they finish their next round you and I show them how to really do this?"

"You want to fight me?" Ziva's shocked. They've never sparred before.

Gibbs grinned.

"You sure?"

He nodded.

"Okay. Rules?"

"No eyes, no balls." He didn't expect to be fighting today, so he didn't bring a cup, and he'd really prefer not getting nailed.

"I can do that."

There are a few things Gibbs knows going into this fight, the most important of them is that he is going to lose.

There was a time when he could have probably taken Ziva David.

But that time was twenty years ago, when he was as fast as she is and could use his size to his advantage. Now, he's too slow. He knows it. Has been too slow for a long time. And while it's true that age and guile beat youth and innocence, age and guile lose when they go up against youth, guile, experience, and superior training.

There's a reason why he's never actually sparred with Ziva before. Kate, sure, he sparred with her, because he knew he could take her, and that was that. But he saw Ziva David walk in, saw her moves and confidence, and knew he couldn't take her down without a gun, and knew that'd look awfully bad for his position.

So they've never sparred. As the Team Leader, part of his job is to be God on Earth, unassailable and unchallengeable. None of the three of them could ever see him go down. When he got to the point where he wasn't entirely sure he could still keep taking Tony down in hand to hand, he stopped making them do bootcamp.

But it's March. In ten months Tony'll be the Team Leader. Tim'll be moving along soon, too. There are other employees around the gym, and it's time to get the word out that the balance of power in the MCRT is shifting.

Ziva's their combat specialist. She's their fighter. And, honestly… he'd almost rather promote her to Team Leader. It's not anything against Tony. He's earned the position many times over and he's a great cop, with very good instincts, but Ziva's a little more focused, more dedicated, and a lot more dangerous. Basically, Tony's the better cop, but Ziva's the better leader. Ultimately, he'd like to see them share the leadership position, and he hopes that's how they'll handle it.

But for now, it's time to pass at least some of it on. And as he thinks about it, he does need to have a long chat with Tony and Tim and Ziva about what's coming up next year. They've got to start looking for replacements, getting a plan in order.

But all of that is for later.

The guys are finishing up. Breena's already come over to watch them, and Ziva wants to know if he'd like to tape up his hands.

He nodded, and she taped up his hands. He looks at her untaped hands, offering to tape her up, and she just shakes her head.

"No eyes." He's seen what she does with her fingers in a fight, and he wants to make sure they're clear.

"No eyes, no balls, and I will not touch your throat, either."

He sighed, sees Tim and Jimmy watching them, looking both amazed and a little scared, and gestures to the ring for Ziva. She headed in, and waited for him.

"Pay attention. This is what it looks like when someone who knows what she's doing fights. Anything she's willing to teach you, you learn." Tim, Jimmy, and Breena all nodded.

Gibbs' time sense slows down when he fights. That's always been true. It's part of what made him a good sniper, he could slow things down, see what was happening and anticipate what would happen next and then pull the trigger. But even slowed down, she is shockingly fast.

He's just trying to keep standing long enough to not be horrendously embarrassed. He got three solid hits on her and a few near misses when she did this thing where she was standing on one foot, kicked at his head with the other, forcing him to dodge back, shifting his weight onto one leg, and while her foot was whispering a quarter inch from his temple she hooked her forearm behind his weight-bearing knee and yanked hard, toppling him to the canvas.

His ears were ringing a little when he hit, but he was fairly sure the entire gym had gone silent at that. He knows Jimmy, Tim, and Breena were just staring at them, eyes wide and beyond shocked.

Ziva offered him a hand up, and he took it, wrapped his arm around her and kissed her on the cheek, big, fond smile on his face.

"Jimmy, how do you defend against that?" Gibbs asked. If he's going to get his ass kicked, they're going to learn from it.

"Don't get into a fight with Ziva."

That got a dry smile out of Gibbs. "Tim?"

"My Sig. I don't get into fist fights with people who can kick my ass that badly."

"Overkill. Breena?"

"One second you were standing up, the next you were on the canvas. I have no idea what happened in between."

"You're going to learn how to watch a fight so you can see what happened. Ziva?"

"Catch my foot up by your head and push backward. It's possible we both would have gone down. I may have gotten the hold I needed on his knee, but my balance was far enough off that it definitely would have taken me down." She turned away from Gibbs to speak to the other three. "I spent the first minute learning exactly how fast Gibbs is. The kick/grapple combination I took him down with takes split second timing, and after the first minute I was sure he couldn't match that speed, so I was safe to try it."

Gibbs nods at that. "Ziva, you're with Jimmy, you attack, he defends. These two are going to watch. Breena's gonna tell me what's happening. Tim's gonna tell me what to do about it."

"Come on, Jimmy," Ziva said. He ducked under the ropes, looking pretty nervous. "If you have a choice between defending or attacking, you want to defend. The defender has the advantage of responding. This is why, even though it looks like you are actually the better fighter, McGee keeps dropping you…"
Nothing Lasts Forever

Dinner had wrapped up an hour before. Jimmy, Breena, and Molly had gone home. Which meant Gibbs was alone with his core team, sitting around the McGees' living room, and it was time to have a serious conversation.

"We know I'm leaving in January." Gibbs said, and looked to Tim.

"I don't know when, yet. I have to talk to Vance, let him know I want Cybercrime when it's open."

"Is it going to be open?" Ziva asked.

"I've heard enough rumors about Jenner not being happy to think it will be, probably in the next year. And I think if I tell him I want it, Vance will give it to me. He offered Okinawa when it opened up, and that's actually a better team than DC. I don't think he'll have a problem with me taking it when Jenner leaves."

"So, in the next year you're going to make me break in two probies?" Tony asks.

"That's the question, isn't it?" Abby adds.

"We can start bringing in new people now, see who fits. Make sure you don't end up with a new team all at once," Tim says.

"Dornaget." Gibbs says.

"Yeah, I know he's been waiting five years for a spot on our team," Tony said. "And… look, he's not bad, but I'm not sure I want him. He's been in the evidence lock up for years, getting rustier and rustier. I'd rather have someone who took a field assignment than waiting around for us."

"You sure it's not just that he caught you out on the Probie crap?" Tim asks, smile on his face.

Tony gives him a little glare, trying to figure out how to recover from losing half his team is something that keeps him up at night. "I'm losing my tech specialist, half of my precision shooters, my sniper, my connections to three quarters of every organization with initials, my interrogation specialist, my hacker, my only person who speaks Marine, my Gunny, my 'Gut', half of my intimidators, and two men who have my back in any and every situation, can read Ziva and I with a glance, will back any play either of us comes up with, and have been there for me every single day for the last decade. Dornie fills none of those holes."

Gibbs nods, feeling a whole lot better about Tony being in charge of the team.

"You've given this a lot of thought," Tim adds.

"Yes. At a bare minimum I need tech and an interrogator. Precision shooting and intimidation are my next highest skills. Quick enough on the subtle clues to back Ziva and I no matter what comes next. I'll give Dornie a shot, he's earned that, but I don't think he's got what we need."

"Between the two of us, Tony and I have charm, evidence gathering, questioning skills, fighting, leadership, explosives—"

"Two-thirds of my explosives team, too. Forgot about that."

"Lock-picking, precision driving, intuition, and tactical planning. We're short a lot of skills if it's just
"I can find you your hacker," Tim says. "Either out of Cybercrime or fresh out of FLETC."

Tony looks at Ziva. She nods a little. "FLETC. Get me someone young, who hasn't been around long enough to learn anyone else's bad habits. Filling your shoes is going to be almost impossible, but I've only got two slots, and I can't have someone who's just a desk jockey."

"They graduate in May. One of my classmates is an instructor now, I'll see who he recommends."

Gibbs smirks at Tony, and Tony turns to him, "What?"

"You'll be twenty, maybe twenty-five years older than anyone out of FLETC. Same difference between me and Tim."

Tony winces. "Oh God."

Gibbs nods, looking really smug.

"Were you really Tony's age when I started?"

"I was four years younger."

"I thought you were older than God," Tim said, shaking his head.

"And I was. And if you don't want just Probies on the team, ask for the rosters on the Agents Afloat. One of them might want a land based assignment."

"Burley," Ziva said. "Where is he stationed?"

Tony's eyes lit up. He knew they worked well together, they'd all come out of the Gibbs school of criminal investigating, and Burley knew what they were doing.

Gibbs shook his head. "Running his own team out of Pearl. Don't think he wants to come back here and take a demotion. Really don't think his wife wants to move."

"You could ask him if he's got someone who wants to be on the mainland. Borin's moved up at Coast Guard, maybe she can give you a lead on someone who's not happy there but would be a good fit," Abby suggested.

"Maybe, but if you're not a good fit there, you're probably not going to be a good fit for us, either," Tony says.

"Are you kidding? I'd have been miserable with the Coast Guard, but I'm happy as a clam at NCIS. We do really well with round pegs, go ask her who they've got that's not fitting into their square holes."

"Fornell could give you some names from the FBI as well. Guys who don't quite fit in there might work really well for us," Tim suggests.

"So, you're scouting the best and brightest FLETC has to offer. We're headhunting Coast Guard, NCIS Pearl Harbor and Agents Afloat, and the FBI for talent. And for either side, I'd prefer someone who was a Marine or Sailor," Tony said.

"Monday, I'll make the appointment to talk to Vance about moving on, and send Geoff the email about who we want out of FLETC. Hopefully by June I'll have some people who we can start working with.
Monday morning Tim fired off two emails. One to Vance's assistant asking for an appointment and the other to Geoff Carter, who, once upon a time, had been one of Tim's classmates at FLETC.

These days Geoff taught Civil Rights law to the new Probie wannabes. He made sure they knew what was and what was not legal when it came to dealing with the wider world. Back in the day he'd been one of Tim's study partners.

He asked Geoff if he could get the CVs of two or three guys who were hot on tech/computer skills, preferably ex-Military, young, and with no previous law enforcement experience.

He got one back saying: "Want a unicorn while you're at it?"

That made him smile.

He sent back:

_If you've got one._

_Our team is losing half of its members soon and I need a tech guy who can shoot or ask questions or speak military or something like that. And if he can do all of that, even better._

Half an hour later he got back.

_Does this unicorn have to be a he?_

Tim quickly sent back:

_No. Male, female, undeclared, somewhere in-between, doesn't matter. Knows his/her way around a computer, that does._

Two hours later he'd gotten an email back with some interesting looking attachments. He was just about to open them when Vance's assistant buzzed him and let him know that Vance had some time.

So he shot the email to Tony, said, "Let me know who looks interesting, and I'll set up the interviews," and then headed up.

There was a time when he found dealing with Vance to be deeply intimidating. That time is not now. He's not entirely sure when it changed. Somewhere between taking down Bodnar and his wedding. But no matter how it happened, it did.

Which is not to say he finds dealing with Vance particularly comfortable.

The man is still his Boss, still the head of their agency, and still deeply formidable.

So, while it's true that he doesn't have to give himself a little pep talk or anything, he does pause for a second before opening the door to straighten up and get himself into the right mindset for this.

"You wanted to see me, McGee?" Vance asks as he walks in.

"Yes." Confidence, his job is to tell Vance what he wants, and then make sure Vance knows he's got the balls to deal with whatever gets tossed at him. A little voice in the back of his mind keeps telling him to channel Gibbs. Talk more than Gibbs would, but project that same air of there's nothing you can throw at me that I can't handle.

Vance gets up from his desk and gestures to the seats at the conference table. They both sit.

"Well…"

"Back in '11 you offered me Okinawa's Cybercrime department. I assume you did that because you knew I could handle not just a team, but a department. I'm better now than I was then. Everyone knows Jenner's not happy here, and when he leaves, I want his job."

"Uh huh…" Vance has that hard to read look on his face, pretty much the only thing Tim knows for sure is that he's not in any way, shape, or form surprised by this. "And what do you suggest I tell William Sumtor, Jenner's second-in-command, who is also under the impression that he'd do a good job with DC Cybercrime and has been waiting for Jenner to leave so he can take his place?"

"That I'll do a better one."

Vance smiles a little at that, which makes Tim happy, then says, "Are you sure?" which is less fun.

"Yes, I know Will, he was down in the basement when you sent me there the first time. He's great. He's competent. He's a really good second-in-command. And he's got the imagination of a bucket of cement. He will follow orders perfectly. He will do exactly what you tell him to exactly the way you tell him to do it. He's probably the most reliable man I met down there. But he can't think outside the box, doesn't innovate, and you know that about him, otherwise you would have offered him Okinawa when it opened up."

"That so?" Vance appears to be amused by this.

It bugs Tim when Vance does this. He's fairly certain that Vance will give him Cybercrime, but this testing thing, proving he's up for it is annoying. Still, as hoop jumping goes, this is child's play compared to his first five years with Tony and Gibbs.

"Yes, Sumtor's a good symbol for DC Cybercrime. Competent, technically skilled, decent at the job, but no spark. LA and Okinawa are high-tech, cutting edge, on the front lines of the cyber battles. We're playing clean up in the back. And it's because there's no one in the basement who knows how to give orders. No one's figured out that we are not supposed to be playing defense, but that it's our job to go out and find the bad guys, catch them at their own game, and tie them in knots."

"And you're the guy to do that?"

"Yes, because in the last ten years you've needed tons of secure systems hacked, you've needed feints, Trojan horses, and decoy systems, and not once have you ever called any of the guys in the basement, whose job it is to do precisely that. You've called me. Because you know I'm the guy who can take an objective, catch the bad guy, and figure out what needs to be done and do it without someone telling me what to do."

"I do. But running yourself is very different than running a department."

"It is."

"And Okinawa, which you are right, is the premier cybercrime division at NCIS is four people. It's a team, and a department in name only. And DC Cybercrime is twelve agents and two support staff. It's a real department."
"True."

"And in fourteen years, you've taken point on fewer than ten operations."

"Also true."

"And for all his lack of imagination, Sumtor is a fantastic bureaucrat. He knows how to manage people."

"I'm sure he does. And I'm sure his paperwork is always perfect. Of course, mine is, too." Tim smiles wryly at that. His is. And so is Tony and Ziva's when he does theirs. In fact, the single biggest change that'll happen when he leaves the MCRT is that the quality of the paperwork is going to drop like a rock tossed off a cliff. "And it's true I haven't taken point often, but the last time I did, I was managing more than two thousand people. But it wasn't keeping all those people on a leash, making sure they did the right things at the right time that ended that manhunt, it was having enough imagination to be able to flush Blen out. It was being able to think outside of the box and then rebuild the box so that he couldn't hide in it. And if you want DC Cybercrime to ever be anything beyond a tech center that plays catch up, then when Jenner leaves, you'll give it to me, and I'll turn it into the best cybercrime division on the east coast."

Vance looks mildly amused by that. "It's the only cybercrime department on the east coast."

"Only one for NCIS, but CIA, IRS, FBI, NSA, and fourteen states all have cybercrime departments here, and if you give me three years, I will have them all beat."

Now Vance looks honestly amazed. That's a whole lot more than he expected Tim to come up with. "And how are you going to do that?"

"By rebuilding the box we all play in."

Leon sits back, steeples his hands in front of him, and smiles. "I like the sound of that."

"I thought you would."

"When Jenner gives notice, you'll be the next head of DC Cybercrime."

"Thank you."

"And when he gives notice, your first job as Boss is to tell Sumtor you're his new Boss."

"Of course."

"And I assume you are helping DiNozzo and David find a suitable replacement for you."

"Trying. Just got started on that this morning. Looking to find someone to replace me and Gibbs."

That got a grin out of Leon. "Good luck on that."

"Yeah."

"Well, don't let me keep you from it."

Tim knew a dismissal when he heard it, so off he went.
When Tim decided to start getting into better shape, he stopped taking the elevator. Sure using the stairs wasn't a ton of exercise, but he figured every little bit helped, and it didn't add all that much more time to getting from point A to point B. MTAC to Abby's lab is four flights of stairs and that's usually about as far as he goes in any given day.

So his feet are more or less on automatic, taking him toward the stairs as he gets out of Leon's office, but he stops, turns and heads for the elevator.

He wants to say it to Abby first. More importantly, he wants another moment where it's just his, and if he takes the stairs, then he has to go through the bullpen to get to her lab, and he knows they all saw him head up, so they'll want to know how it went.

He's going to be a department head. He'll have guys calling him Boss.

Wow. He takes a deep breath, lets it out slow, and tries to let it settle in, then hits the button for the lab.

He’ll be handing in his badge and his gun, sitting at a desk every day, coding until his eyes fall out, and filling out even more paperwork.

He's not going to see Tony and Ziva every day. He won't see dead bodies, either. No more running down suspects, at least, not with his feet, with his fingers will be a whole different story. He won't set all of his computers to searching for something, and then hop down to Abby's lab and use hers as well.

He won't be heading down there for updates on cases (and a quick smooch).

No more stakeouts.

No more long drives to go get suspects, or question witnesses, or talk to C.O.s.

No more bad take out eaten at his desk at ten at night while going over the clues with Tony and Ziva.

No more desk.

No more looking up and seeing the three of them working away on their paperwork.

He let out another long, slow breath.

Hopefully many fewer late nights. And even if he is on a case and it needs overtime, he'll be able to do it from home. Kelly's going to need someone at home, and he'll be there.

No more close calls. In the fourteen years he's been at NCIS they've lost exactly one Cybercrime Agent, and he was killed when Kahn leaked him. Not going to happen on his watch.

The elevator opens and his thinking time ends.

He pauses at the door to her lab, watching for a moment as she dispenses some sort of liquid into the tiny vials Major Mass Spec uses.

Learner's team is working on a drug ring case that got hot recently, so she's probably doing something for that.

She looks up from her pipette, jumps a little when she sees him lurking, and says, "So?"
He heads over to her, gently kissing her lips, and waiting for her to put the pipette down before hugging her. "You're looking at the next head of DC Cybercrime."

She squeezed him tight and shrieked. "When?"

"Whenever Jenner gives notice."

She was doing an excited little bouncing sort of thing, but his voice caught her attention, and she stopped and really looked at him. "You okay?"

He shrugs, holding her close, feeling her head against his shoulder. "I think so. Just, on the way down, I was thinking of all the things that are never going to happen again once I make the switch. And some of them are good and some are bad."

"You regretting it?"

"No!" He shook his head vehemently. "It's just… I won't see them every day anymore. I probably won't see you every day anymore, not here at least. There'll be no reason for me to come down, I guess once I get to Cybercrime, up here to work. It's going to be really different."

"It's going to be really good. You're going to be the Boss."

"Yeah, that's sort of freaky, too."

"Tell me about it."

He nods, understanding her own issues with this. Norfolk was supposed to close its lab in January. That didn't happen, emergency funding showed up from the ethers, but that funding was only going to keep Norfolk going until June. Supposedly, for real this time, come June 1st Abby would have two more forensic scientists working under her. And sure, that worked out really well from a maternity leave perspective, but she was pretty nervous about being the Boss all of a sudden, let alone sharing her lab with new people.

"You want to celebrate?"

"Not yet. Let me actually get the job. Want to keep this quiet. Among other things, Sumtor doesn't know he's not the next Head of DC Cybercrime, and when Jenner gives notice, letting him know that is my job. So, for right now, I want to just keep this in the family."

"No problem." She kissed him, sure that he needs the extra time to let it settle in. Then she kissed him again, suddenly understanding part of why he looks so out of it. "You're still you, Tim."

He nods, seeing her get it. Special Agent Tim McGee is a good third of his core identity, and soon, he won't be Special Agent Tim McGee anymore.

"I know." And he does know it, but feeling it is a different story.

She kisses him again.

"I should probably get back up. Paperwork's not doing itself. And I got Tony a list of guys from FLETC to look at, got to see what he's thinking about them."

"Okay." One last kiss, soft, gentle, supportive, and then he heads toward the stairs.
When he got to the Bullpen all three of them were staring at them. He gave a tiny nod which they all caught, and Tony was about to start asking about it when Tim also shook his head slightly, signaling not here. They understood that, as well.

Two seconds later, before he had even gotten all the way to his desk, Gibbs' phone rang.

And they all know how this works, before Gibbs even has the phone put down they're snagging their go bags, saving and closing computer work, stashing paperwork, and by the time Gibbs had the phone hung up they were ready to go.

"Gear up." It's a formality now. It's probably been years since Gibbs has had to say the words.

But like a mantra, or a benediction, those words start a case. They mark the team swinging into action. And today they mark something else, the beginning of the end of Team Gibbs.
"Did you get the results?" Tim asked Jimmy on Tuesday at lunch.

Tim knows the answer is yes. He can see it by the way Jimmy hasn't checked his cell, and the fact that he looks a lot more relaxed. Not necessarily happier, but more at peace, so the results on the genetic testing for the Trisomy 13 gene must have come back.

"Neither of us." He stabs a bite of his chicken breast. "It was just bad damn luck. If we want to do IVF and have the embryos screened ahead of time, we can, but since neither of us are carriers the chance of it happening again isn't any higher than it was the first time."

"So..."

Jimmy shakes his head. "No. We're not going to do that."

"Just gonna close your eyes and jump off the cliff again?"

"Hoping and praying for a soft landing the entire way down? Yeah."

"You sure..." Tim's not sure how to say this delicately, so he goes for blunt as hell, "if it's a money thing... I mean, I know our insurance won't cover that... Abby and I could help." He and Abby talked about, so he knows she's okay with it. It's not the sort of thing he'd just whip out on a whim.

Jimmy just blinks at him. "Uh... wow! That's just... Do you have any idea what that sort of thing costs?"

"Yeah. Which is why I brought it up."

Jimmy's looking at him in confusion. "How would you even know that?"

"When something scary happens to me or anyone I love I research the hell out of it."

"Oh."

"So... ummm... yeah..."

"It's not a money thing. It's a... Neither of us wants to make babies by me jerking off into a cup while pumping her full of hormones to bolster egg production and then suck them out, mix in a pitri dish, let them grow a little, test them, and then put them back in. I mean..." He pokes at his food some more, gathering his thoughts. "It's supposed to feel good. It's supposed to be about joy and love and ecstasy... Making them is the fun part..." Jimmy shakes his head dismissively at that. "Making them is a fun part. Making them is supposed to feel as good as having them, and since it won't really change things, we're not willing to give that up, let alone go broke doing it."

Tim nods. He's not entirely certain how to reply to that. He gets what Jimmy is saying, and completely agrees with it, but "Good luck" seems flip and hollow, "I hope it works out" seems lame, but he does want to say something.

Finally he comes up with, "I can't wait to meet Molly's little brother or sister."

"You and me both."

"You going to start trying again right away?"
"Oh yeah. Tossed the condoms out last night. With any luck it'll be a really exciting Christmas at our house this year."

"I really hope so."

"Me, too." Jimmy took another bite of his grilled chicken salad. "Abby said you had news, too."

"Yeah. Don't want this getting around work, though." Which was probably half of why Abby decided he and Jimmy needed to have lunch out today and set it up. "When Jenner in Cybercrime gives his notice, I'll take his place."

Jimmy smiles at that. "Department head by forty, who knew you were so ambitious?"

"Yeah. Well, assuming Jenner doesn't decide to stick around forever. Scuttlebutt has it he's been job hunting, though."

"You don't exactly look ecstatic."

"Don't get me wrong, I'm happy, but… the badge and the gun and running down bad guys… That's a really big part of who I am. I'm a cop."

Jimmy nods, getting that. "You're a dad."

"Yeah, and husband, and that comes first, and this is necessary to put that first. I can track cybercrime from home. I can sort financials, and hunt down the bad guys with my computer while Ke—McSciuto—"

"Ke—McSciuto?"

"That family name we haven't been telling anyone about."

"Yeah, Tim, I hate to break this to you, but all of your friends are cops, and even if they weren't, they aren't idiots. Absolutely no one hasn't figured out your mystery 'family name' is Kelly."

Tim sighs a little, rolls his eyes a little, and takes a bite of his flounder. "We're still going to wait to see if she's actually a girl, and then ask Jethro to make sure it's cool with him."

Jimmy nods and smiles. "You know, for a guy who'll wear a skirt and eyeliner to Shabbos, you're shockingly conservative about some things."

"I only did the eyeliner once." Which is true. Penny was at last Friday's Shabbos and… he's fairly sure it was fall out from rethinking everything that happened with his Dad, but he went all out on the Goth version of himself. Penny just looked at him when he and Abby came in, smiled, kissed his cheek, and asked what brand of eyeliner he liked, listened to his answer, and then acted like him in makeup was no big deal at all.

That had actually felt insanely good.

"I know."

"Just wanted to freak Tony out and let Penny see what it looked like."

"And you did a fine job of both of them. Last I heard, he was muttering about instituting a dress code, and had told me that if you try to wear makeup to his wedding that I'm to wrestle you to the ground and scrub it off."
Tim laughed at that. "I hadn't been planning on it... Anyway... McSciuto can be sleeping in her crib, and I can be hacking away in my office. I can be home at six every night. Sure, I might be chained to my computer and cell once I get there, and I might end up with three other Cybercrime Agents in my living room, but unlike Abby, my job can come home."

"Yep. You're a dad."

"Yeah. And I want to do it right. But... it still feels weird."

"Feels like you're changing. Like you don't quite know who you are?"

"Yeah."

"Welcome to the club, Tim. Give it a few months, once she's on the outside, you'll get settled again."

"I hope so."
I, Anthony

I, Anthony, take you, Ziva, to be my lawfully wedded wife.

Tim looked at the one line of text in Tony's handwriting on a pad of legal paper, and then looked back up at Tony. At his wedding Tony had talked about the two of them working on his vows. And now, with Tony's wedding not quite three weeks away, they were getting to it.

Though as Tim remembers it, he'd specified that Tony should have a rough draft that they'd work with together, because he was not going to ghost write Tony's vows.

"One line?" He's glaring a little at Tony. Not really angry, but a little frustrated. "The idea was you'd have a rough draft, and we'd work from there."

"It's really rough."

"It's non-existent. This is the part the Rabbi will say for you, and you'll just repeat back!"

"Actually no. The vows are in Hebrew. But… I wanted to write something for her. Something personalized. They don't have to be vows but…"

Oh. So not vows at all. Something different. Something Tony's never done before and probably feels completely lost dealing with. "Are you saying you want help writing a love poem?"

"A vowish love poems."

"Wow!" Tim's got an expression of wonder on his face, possibly with a tinge of teasing condescension as well.

Tony catches all the layers of that look and says, "Stuff it. Since no one in her immediate family is still alive, a 'traditional' wedding is important to Ziva, and she'd never say it, but I can see it, it's that last thread of home and family for her. So I'm fine with doing the traditional Hebrew vows, but… I want to give her something from me, as well. And I don't want to sound like an idiot doing it. So, McPoet, I am asking you for help."

Tim smiles; he understands that completely.

"Hey, can I come in, or is this a guy only party?" Abby asks, sticking her head into Tim's office.

"Please come in," Tony replies. He's sitting on Tim's one desk chair, and Tim is in the other one, so she settles onto Tim's lap. And Tony watches as, apparently, without him even noticing, Tim's hand comes to rest on her belly, while he kisses her neck.

"Good nap?"

"Yeah. I just hate being tired all the time." She turns to Tony. "It's better than it was, but I still need eight to ten hours of sleep a night, and I've never needed that much sleep. It's insane."

"Your body is working hard," Tim says, fondly stroking her tummy.

"And making me sleep hard, too." She looks at the piece of paper in front of Tim and Tony. "So, working on vows?"

"Sort of," Tony answers and then explains what they're doing.
"You want to call Jimmy?" Abby asks.

Both Tim and Tony say "No" in exactly the same tone of voice at exactly the same time.

Abby looks puzzled by this.

"Look, I love Jimmy, but he's terrible at this stuff," Tim says.

Tony's nodding. "The man had his testicles surgically removed when he was writing his vows. 'And each day I will shower you in a thousand butterfly kisses and thank the Lord you were born.' No!"

"Breena loved it! And it was so sweet."

"And if I was getting ready to marry Breena, Jimmy'd be the first guy I'd call for vow help. But, I do not want Ziva bursting into hysterical laughter when she reads this."

Abby takes the pen and crosses out Tony's name. "She doesn't call you Anthony. Only Ducky does. Tony's more personal."

"Okay, see, we're getting somewhere. Is that why you two did Tim and Abby for your vows instead of Timothy and Abigail?"

Tony looks up from where Abby scratched out his name when he notices that neither of them have said anything. He sees the smile on Abby's face is wicked glee, and Tim's looking pretty smug, as well.

Finally Tim says, "Remember the last ropes and things conversations, when you asked me what other help you might want?"

Tony's nodding, looking really disturbed, but he says, "Yes."

"Why you'll never hear me call her Abigail or her calling me Timothy is part of the lesson that comes after our last conversation."

"So you're saying I really don't want to know?"

Abby's grinning very happily right now. "You don't want to know about safewords? So much fun and so many cool—"

Tony closes his eyes and cuts in, "No, I don't want to know that you and McGee have or need them."

Abby shrugs. "I didn't know you were so vanilla."

"When it comes to mental images of McGee naked, I'm whatever makes vanilla look dangerous and kinky. So, can we talk vows, now?"

"Sure. Here." Tim hands Tony the pen, and pushes the pad of paper back to him. "We're going to get something to drink. You're going to spend the next ten minutes writing anything and everything that's comes to mind when you think of being married to Ziva. It doesn't have to make sense. It doesn't have to be vows. Just turn your internal filter off, and put anything that comes to mind on that piece of paper."

Ten minutes later Tim walked back in and saw Tony sitting in front of what looked like a much more filled in page. Unfortunately, as he got a few steps closer he saw that much more filled in was a collection of little interlocking squares and triangles.

"Do you really want to do this?" Tim asks.

"Where'd Abby go?" Tony replies with, not answering.

"Bowling practice with the Nuns. She'll be back in two hours."

"Oh."

"She also thinks you'll have an easier time of this without her hovering over your shoulder."

"Maybe."

"So, really, either you have no clue what being married is about, or this isn't a good fit for you. What's going on?"

"Look, I know I can be smooth and sweet talk this. But I don't want it to be a line. I don't want it to be… that exterior veneer of 'DiNozzo.' And every time I start to come up with something, it's all smooth."

Tim wrote down:

With you, for you, I will always be real.

I will not hide my mind or heart.

"Oh, that's good. I like that."

"Good, then translate that into however you'd say that to her."

"It sounds more earnest in your voice."

"And when Ziva comes to her senses and decides to marry me, that'll matter. This might be my wedding present to you, but it's not my wedding present to her, so it better sound like you by the time this is done."

You make me want to be a better man. Tony wrote that under the first two lines, and Tim scratched it out.

"What?"

"Movie quote. Don't use someone else's words, find your own." But Tim stopped on that idea. "Actually… you love movies. You love her. Come on." He hops up and drags Tony in the chair to his computer. Two seconds later he's googled Blank Books, and he's got pages of empty books up on the screen.

"Find a beautiful one. Get a good pen. And write them all down. Fill the book with the quotes that now mean something to you because she's in your life. She loves books, so write her a book. You love movies, so fill it with movies. It doesn't have to be your own words; it has to be your own feelings, and if someone else has the words, use theirs."

Tony grins, wide smile stretching across his face.

"That I can do."
"McGee, DiNozzo, gear up. Dead Marine out of Chapel Hill," Gibbs says as he puts his phone down.

"Gibbs?" Ziva asks, perfect inflection of why aren't you bringing me along in her voice.

"Gonna be at least overnight, and I need someone here to keep an eye on things."

Tim glances over and sees Tony grabbing his go bag looking mildly pouty. He's been talking all day and all yesterday about how Ohio State is playing tonight and he can't wait to see it. Stuck in a crappy motel room dealing with a murder is not the way he wants to see that game.

When it hits him that Ziva's not coming, mildly pouty switched to downright unhappy.

"Boss," Tim says, hoping he sounds convincingly whiny. Ziva had gotten her part right, he's got to do his.

"One night alone won't kill her, Tim. Ziva's here, and so is Palmer. She'll be fine."

"But…"

"Head down, say goodbye, and we'll meet you at the van."

He glares a little at Gibbs before grabbing his go bag and heading down to the lab.

Abby sees him and bursts into a huge grin. "Does Tony have any idea?"

"None." The smile that's been trying to break out since Gibbs' phone rang (Palmer calling to let him know he was on the road.) spreads across his face. "We pulled it off perfectly. Utterly clueless. He's silently pouting about missing the game and sleeping alone." He steps in close and kisses her. "Are you going to be okay on your own?"

"Are you kidding? Ziva, Breena, and I have a fabulous night planned. It's going to be an absolute blast. There's a new gay club out on 10th and we are going to dance until our feet won't hold us up anymore. You guys go, have fun. See you tomorrow."

He kisses her again, slow and deep. "Tomorrow."

They were driving past UNC's stadium. Tony eyeing it longingly as Gibbs drove. "This is so wrong. I'm supposed to be at home, with Ziva, watching this game in high def on a sixty inch screen. Cold beer in one hand, Ohio State t-shirt on, cheering my guys to victory. Of all the bad times to get murdered. Where is this guy supposed to be?"

"Tony, check your go bag."

"McGee?" He stopped gazing at the stadium and flashed Tim his annoyed and confused look.

"Just do it."
Tony did, and his eyebrows drew together. He always keeps a change of clothing in there, they all do, that's the point of a go bag, but his has… "My Ohio State shirt?"

"See an envelope in there?" Tim asks as Gibbs pulls into the UNC stadium parking lot.

Tony dug around for a minute longer, and Tim started to get a little nervous, getting everything packed was Ziva's job, and he didn't get a chance to double check and make sure everything was in there the way it was supposed to be.

But Tony came up with it after a minute and looked inside.

For another minute, as Gibbs parked, Tony just stared at the tickets, eyes wide and disbelieving. Finally he looked up at them and said, "Four court side seats?"

"Jimmy's waiting for us at the gate." Tim smirked at him. "Still think you don't want Jimmy or I planning your bachelor party?"

Tony looked back down at the tickets in his hand. When Ohio State made it to the final eight and got slotted into the UNC stadium, he had tried to get tickets, and they were completely sold out. "How did you get tickets to this?"

"Remember, I've got that cousin, and he knew a guy, and… I don't pay attention to basketball, but Jimmy noticed Ohio State made March Madness this year, so we put this plan into action."

Tony turned to Gibbs. "You knew?"

His expression said, of course. "You didn't think they'd take you out to a strip club and buy you lap dances, did you?"

"Well, no. That's why I didn't want them planning this."

"You'd rather be watching strippers?" Tim asked. He'd been hoping Tony'd like this.

That jerked Tony out of his shock. "No. I mean, this is beyond awesome." And Tim can see that's genuine. He just hadn't been expecting anything even remotely like this and it was taking him a minute to get his head out of pouting mode into celebrate mode. "I just… Jimmy came up with this?"

"Yeah, so let's get him so you can say thanks, and then watch this thing."

"McGee, do you even know enough about basketball to follow a game?" And that sounded a whole lot more like normal Tony.

"It's soccer with hoops. I'll do okay."

"Soccer with hoops?" Tony looked appalled and launched into a detailed exposition on the finer arts of basketball while stripping out of his work clothing into his fan clothing. He had half-noticed that Tim and Gibbs had both been a little more casual than usual for work clothing today, but not so much so that it was worth mentioning.

They found Jimmy a few minutes later, looking fairly relaxed, tucking his cell back into his pocket.

Tony smiled at him and said, "Tim tells me this was your idea?"

"Breena's really."

Tony nodded in appreciation of Breena. "You have the coolest wife ever."
"I agree."

"McGeek thinks this is soccer with hoops. Do you need a primer on basketball, too?"

Jimmy looked at Tim like he's a twit. "Soccer with hoops?"

Tim shrugged. "Eleven guys, start in the middle, run to the end, get the ball into the target, don't tackle each other, don't pick the ball up and carry it. Soccer with hoops."

Jimmy sighed and shook his head. "Lord, someone messed up your education. I played in junior high. I wasn't good or anything, but I at least know it's not soccer."

"Good." Tony said with a very wide and happy grin.

By conservative estimate there are nineteen million people in that stadium and they are all rabid UNC supporters. Home team at the home stadium and they are going bonkers.

To say they've gotten a few dirty looks, and some choice verbiage as they head to their seats due to Tony's shirt is an understatement.

But they are courtside, and luck had it they are on the Ohio State side of the court.

They get settled, comfortable, beer and dogs in hand, and are watching the pre-game show when the Ohio State Coach turns around to talk to one of the players and notices them.

"Tony DiNozzo?"

"Mark Ratham?"

Mark came forward and wrapped him in a back slapping hug. "What are you doing here, man?"

"Watching the game." He pulled back from Mark holding his shoulders. "Are you coaching?"

"Yeah, Bob Gilman got hit by a car last night, so I'm up."

Tony looked worried at that. Anything this close to a big game can mess with the cohesion of the team and that's a very bad thing. "Is the team going to be okay?"

"Oh, yeah, he'll be fine, so they'll be fine, but they want to keep him under 'observation' for twenty four hours. Those bastards at the hospital are UNC supporters."

"Oh." Tony nodded along. "Guy driving a UNC supporter, too?"

"Can't prove it, but I wouldn't doubt it. Look, game's starting in five, but if you want me to introduce you at half time to the team, I'd be happy to."

"That'd be great."

Tim, Jimmy, and Gibbs are all giving him the fill us in look.

"Mark was my roommate sophomore and junior year. Seniors got singles in our house, so we split up then, but… yeah… a lot of my better college memories involve him. Wow. Haven't seen him in...
"Spring break in Mexico?" Tim asked.

"Yeah. He got married and stopped coming. He was assistant coach for... I don't remember, some little school in corn country. Looks like he's moved up in the world."

Tim's, of course, heard all about Tony's college exploits. Everyone has. He'll talk your ear off about them. Though Tim has noticed the focus on what Tony did in college has shifted over the years. When he first started NCIS, he heard a lot more about partying and girls, and these days he hears a lot more about basketball.

Actually, these days, he hasn't heard a whole lot about Ohio State, period. It's probably been four years since Tony's brought it up, though he'll mention it when they're talking college type stuff.

Still, there's hearing the stories, which, Tim had figured were about two-thirds bullshit, and then there's seeing the guys on the team stare at Tony like he's some sort of mythological figure stepping out of the book and shaking their hands.

Twenty college kids are looking at Tony like he's some sort of God. One they pray to regularly. And Tony is basking in it.

"Haven't seen you in forever, what are you doing these days?" Mark asks after introducing Tony around.

"Believe it or not, I'm a cop."

"You're a what?" Mark looks like he'd more readily believe Tony was a woman than a cop.

"Work for the Navy. I investigate crimes involving Navy or Marine personnel."

"You became a cop? Tony 'let me see how many laws I can break per night' DiNozzo became a cop?" Mark's laughing like this is the best joke ever.

"Not that many!" Tony's looking a little embarrassed.

"Dude, you didn't turn twenty-one until the end of your junior year, and good two-thirds of those girls were under eighteen." A little embarrassed had morphed to distinctly uncomfortable. Gibbs' eyes narrowed a little, and Jimmy crossed his arms. And Tim is suddenly understanding that there is a very big difference between having a daughter, and possibly having a daughter. Because while he definitely considers fooling around with underage girls a problem, he doesn't appear to be having the same sort of visceral reaction Gibbs and Jimmy are.

"So who are your buddies?" Mark asks, finally noticing there are three other guys here and two of them don't look even remotely happy about him.

Tim grinned. But there's no warmth there, and anyone who knows him knows that's not a friendly gesture, and he's kind of hoping Mark takes the hint to pull back after this. "Two more cops," he gestured at himself and Gibbs. "A medical examiner." Pointed to Jimmy. "And, oh" here he pointed back at Gibbs. "His father-in-law."

"You're married? You gonna tell me you've got the house, the dog, and the white picket fence next?"

"Not that far along yet, it's my bachelor party. Last I heard, you were married, too."

"Married didn't work out. At all. And, not that we aren't happy to see you here, but this is a lame-ass bachelor party. Hell, bachelor party is the best part of getting married. A bachelor party is the reason to get married! I was still drunk at the reception from mine… and the girls!"

Tim was deciding that Mark was the kind of guy he hated in high school, and fortunately didn't see much of in college. Tim can also see Tony's trying to figure out how to get out of this. There's only a few minutes more of halftime, and then they can get back to watching the game, hopefully without this clod hanging onto them.

"I'm having a great time."

"Oh." There's pity on Mark's face, and he's got a very clear expression of you're so whipped. "You want to come with us after the game? Turn this into a real bachelor party? There'll be pretty little girls begging for attention and booze galore. And I'm sure the boys would love to see you in action."

"Not my thing anymore." Tony flashed his patented DiNozzo charm smile and had stepped back from Mark.

Mark said, "Come on man, your pic, the one with the six girls and the beer bong, is still up on the wall of fame at our frat house." Mark turned toward the Tim, Jimmy, and Gibbs. "This here is the only man who made the wall of fame every single semester he was at Ohio State. There's still a little shrine to him at the Delta Beta Chi frat house. So, come on, relive the glory days with the team? You're a hero, well, a myth, to these kids."

Tony sighed. "Mark, you see these three guys? They love my fiancée, almost as much as I do, and if I fool around on her, they will kill me and lose my body somewhere between here and home."

Tim and Jimmy are nodding and Gibbs is just coolly staring at Mark, very clearly signaling Get the hell out of here before I arrest you for statutory rape, and probably shoot you for resisting arrest along the way.

"Two-thirds of them under eighteen?" Gibbs asks Tony quietly, as Mark backs away from that stare and returns to his team.

The look on Gibbs' face is terrifying, so Tony answers honestly, "Yeah." Jimmy looks ready to hit Tony, too. "It was the '80s. We lived in a party frat. Girls are what make the party fun. ID checks were shaky at best back then and we were famous for never, ever doing it. As long as you were cute enough that the guy at the door liked you, you got in. And Bob never saw a girl he didn't like. And we were all drunk, too. And when you're nineteen the idea that fourteen or fifteen is too young is silly because you still remember being fourteen and all you wanted to do then was get laid, and she's there, rubbing against you, kissing you, tight and tiny little skirt, low cut top, clearly she knew what she was doing, so why not make some sweet young thing's night?"

Gibbs looks at Jimmy and Tim, letting them know they were about to see a practical application of instilling the Fear of Dad in someone, and then says, "You're gonna have girls. And so are they. Daughters and nieces, and they will be the light of your life, and you will love them more than you can even imagine, and assholes like the guy you used to be are going to be chasing after them. I hope you get an ulcer from worrying about them for each and every single one of those little girls you Tim's heard Gibbs swear before, he's fairly sure Tony has, too, but not sure about Jimmy. But, it's one thing to say fuck and mean I am irritated by the current set of circumstances and want something to express that and a whole other thing to say it and mean I am thirty seconds away from smacking the living hell out of you and the only reason I don't is because I know the man you are is not the man you use to be but so help me God if it ever looks like you are going to revert back to that guy I will kick your ass so hard you will limp for the rest of your very short life.

And Tim is deeply, sincerely, fervently glad that he's never had Gibbs that pissed at him, and that he's never done anything that will ever get Gibbs that pissed at him.

Tony looks really disturbed and tries to laugh that off. "Come on, you were a Marine, you must have __"

"Stayed a virgin until my wedding night, when we were both twenty? Yeah, I did. And those two weren't fucking any little girls, either."

Tony's a little irked by that. He's fairly certain Tim or Jimmy would have happily slept with a fifteen or sixteen-year-old when they were nineteen if there had been one available. "Those two weren't fucking anyone period."

"Hey! I had a steady girlfriend junior and senior year of high school, and two more in college," Jimmy says. Tim cringes at that, now really wasn't a good time for Jimmy to forget his mental filter.

"Your high school sweetie, was she twelve?" Gibbs asks, eyes on Tony, very intense expression of pissed off not wavering. He's not looking at Jimmy at all.

"What? No!" Jimmy's utterly horrified by that idea.

"You love her?"

"Yeah."

"You go to her house, look her dad in the eye when you talked to him, and treat his daughter with respect?"

"Yes."

He glanced at Jimmy for a second, face relaxing a little. "Then we don't have a problem." Then he turned back to Tony, eyes hot and angry. "You do any of those things, Tony?"

"No."

"You get their names?"

"Some of them."

Gibbs looks disgusted as he says, "You at least make sure they had a good time?"

"Too drunk and too full of myself to ever think they might need more than me just being there."

Gibbs eyes narrowed even further, and Tim can see the muscles in his jaws clenching. "You treated them like blow up dolls and jerked off in them, probably hurt at least a few of them doing it."

Tony nods.
"Get 'em sick?"

"Some of them gave me gonorrhea, crabs, and the clap, and, yeah, I passed them on as well."

"Get 'em pregnant?"

"No one ever showed up with a kid that looked like me, but I know for a fact that I'm not shooting blanks, so I can't believe that I didn't get at least a few of them pregnant."

"Did they say yes?" Gibbs' voice is very low, very dangerous when he says this, and Tim is really hoping that if the truth to that is no, that Tony has the good sense to lie and lie more convincingly than he's ever lied before.

"None of them was ever unconscious or said no. But a lot of them were very drunk."

" Barely walk on their own, don't remember anything in the morning drunk?"

"Yeah."

"So yes, that's a problem."

"I know." And Tim thinks he really does, thinks that's why there haven't been any tales of the DiNozzo Party Machine in years.

"Good! And if need be, we are beating the idea that this is a problem with a two by four into any sons you, or they, may have."

"Yes, sir."

Gibbs looked satisfied that he had properly instilled the Fear of Dad into Tony and nodded. Then sat down in his seat, and looked in the direction of the now wrapping up half-time show.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Okay, I'm not trying to hate on Tony, but... well... okay, on one level I do want to deal with the massive character changes we've seen in Tony over eleven (and in Shards world 14) years. And I want to spend a little time on what sort of guy Tony likely was in college and as a cop. It gets glossed over now, but Tony was still going to Spring Break in Mexico at the age of 35. That's the land of the drunk, borderline unconscious, underage girl looking for a good time, and he happily took advantage of it. And I guess I wanted to make clear that to honorable men, that's just not cool. And it took a while, but Tony finally got there and became one. I have a feeling the way he treated Kate that first year (like walking into the bathroom while she was in the shower) is likely to come back to haunt him, too. He was the classic, sexually aggressive-harasser who covered it with a lot of charm and good looks, and Kate put up with a lot of bullshit from him that these days would get him fired so fast time would move backward.

Oh well, light, fluffy fun sexy bachelor party stuff tomorrow.
Two quarters of a game to cool down, get their minds off of Tony's past, and relax back into the idea that this is supposed to be fun, and that there's nothing he can do about the man he used to be was a good thing.

And it was a good game. The Buckeyes were evenly matched with UNC, so the game stayed close the whole time, keeping the four of them interested.

And when Ohio State won it with a three pointer that whispered through the hoop less than half a second before the buzzer, they were all shouting (Tony jumping up and down) with excitement.

Late night drinks and barbecue went very well with basketball.

Honestly, it looked like a dive. It's the dive-y-ist dive Tim's ever seen. A ramshackle, beat the hell up, the only reason the health inspector hasn't closed it down is they spend more money bribing him then they do on décor shack of a place. He's honestly nervous about bringing them here, let alone eating anything.

But it also came up over and over again on the list of barbecue joints you absolutely had to go to if you were anywhere near Chapel Hill.

And it smells like absolute heaven.

And they are men, engaging in a sacred male ritual, and sacred male rituals need meat that has been cooked over fire.

And since Tony is convinced that barbecue is hot dogs and burgers on the grill, Tim is considering it his duty, as both his friend and best man, to make sure he gets introduced to the joy that is spice rubbed slow cooked pork.

So it's late. They're in a dive. But the beer is cold and delicious, and the pulled pork and ribs are come-in-your-pants good. Tim loves food. He really does. But this is the first time he's ever honestly considered food to be almost orgasmic experience, and he's also very glad that this place is eight hours from home, because otherwise he'd be 210 again in about six weeks.

Tony is sucking the rib bones it's so good. (He'd tried to follow the rules. He started with the chicken, and that was awfully tasty, but he saw Gibbs' ribs and decided that God would probably forgive him some decadence for his bachelor party. Especially since there were no strippers involved.)

Gibbs, who usually isn't a big eater, has ordered seconds and thirds.

And it's not that Jimmy can't eat sugar, it's just that he has to adjust his insulin levels to do so, and thus usually avoids sugar so he doesn't have to inject himself. But he was happily gnawing away, telling them that this was totally worth the shot.

And, as in the past, when a certain amount of beer has been consumed and the girls aren't around, the conversation turned to sex.

Tony's looking at Gibbs and finally says, "So… not until your wedding? Really? Just, twenty years, seems like a really long time."
Gibbs just shrugs. He was eighteen when he met Shannon, and while it's true he was ambivalent on the yes sex or no sex before marriage issue (He's Christian and his church had been pretty clear about the only with your wife thing, but he was also eighteen, so having sex was something he was deeply interested in.) Shannon wasn't, and once he met her, the idea of doing it with someone else just made him sad.

They wait another beat, but Gibbs doesn't say anything, just eats more of his rib.

Then Jimmy elbows Tony and says, "You can't miss what you've never had. You want to talk about a long time, Breena made me wait until we got married. So, at thirty-two, long after I had thought I was done with terminal blue balls, I was back to being bestest friends with my right hand. That was hard."

"I think you mean you were hard," Tim says.

"That, too." Jimmy smirks and takes a drink. "Anyway, waiting until you get married when you get married before you're even old enough to drink, please."

"Drinking age was eighteen then."

Jimmy flashes Gibbs a you're missing the point look. "Great. Still, no sex to lots of sex, easy. Somewhat regular sex, start dating the hottest, most desirable woman on earth, and knowing exactly how good it's going to be and what you're missing, and because she's evil, making out with her on a regular basis but not having sex, that's har—difficult."

Tony's laughing at that. "I didn't think she was that religious."

"She was deeply religious, but that wasn't why she made us wait. Our first date she said to me, I've known a lot of guys over the years, and one thing I've noticed about all of you is that you're pretty possessive and you like to know that when something is yours it's really yours.' So I nodded at that, because, well, yeah, that's true. So she says, 'Look, I love guys. I love the way they feel and smell and look and touch me. I love kissing and making out and rubbing up against them, but I'm a virgin. I'm not having sex with any guy until I get married. That's my wedding present to my future husband. He'll know, absolutely, that I'm his and only his. And when that ring's on my finger I'm going to absolutely rock his world.' And she just smiled at me, and wrapped her lips around the straw in her drink, took a sip and finished up with, 'If that's not something you respect, well, this was fun. If it's something you do, then I'd like to see you again.'"

"What did you say to that?" Tim asks, smiling.

"You mean once some of the blood got back to my brain and I could form words?"

Tim nods.

"Marry me."

All three of them laugh at that.

"Then she said, 'How about we go on a second date first?' And we did, and it was the longest most sexually frustrated two years of my life. And then because God hates me, Dearing blew up NCIS on my wedding day, and since I'm a decent guy who wanted her to have a good time, too, we waited another week, until I was able to crawl out from under the mile-high stack of paperwork I had to deal with, get enough sleep so I could keep going for more than two minutes, and take the time to do it right."
"It was worth it," Gibbs says, sharing a look with Jimmy, one that understands what waiting for something you desire above everything else and then finally getting it is like.

"Oh yeah." He grins and shakes his head in wonder. "And, yeah, there's a real kick to knowing she's only been with me. It's stupid, because we aren't supposed to feel that way, but... I do. I'm the only guy who's gotten to see her naked. Only one who's ever enjoyed her body. And she was dead right, that was one hell of a wedding present."

Gibbs nods at that, too, agreeing. "It was expected when we got married. You'd be her one and only. And yeah, maybe you fooled around before you got married, but she didn't, or if she did, it was with you. And you didn't feel bad about liking it. Didn't feel like there was something wrong with you if you got a kick out of letting her learn what to do with a guy on you. Didn't feel like it was wrong to say she was yours. Bunch of guys were jerks about it, and that wrecked it for the rest of us, but we all feel it. Hell," he tips his head at Tim and Tony, "those two feel it, even if it's not quite the same."

Tim nods along with that, swallowing his beer and putting the glass down. "Certainly got a kick out of everything I've done with her that no other guy has."

"What have you done with Abby that no other guy has?" Tony asks, rib paused midway to his mouth. Sure, he knows that Tim's not vanilla about sex, but he's also fairly sure that if Tim's ever imagined it, then Abby's done it.

Tim smiles wide and fairly dirty. "Got her pregnant among other things, and 'other things' is all you get to know about that."

Tony, Jimmy, and Gibbs laugh.

"And there's definitely a thrill to everything I've done with her and no one else. It works both ways."

Gibbs smiles at that, eyes the waitress, looking like he might be thinking about fourths, but decides against it. "Yeah, it does."

Jimmy's phone buzzes. He reaches for it, taps the screen, and smiles. "Speaking of the girls who make our lives worthwhile. Breena just sent me these." He turned the screen so they could all see. The first shot was Abby and Ziva, looking like they were taking a break from dancing. The next was Breena with Ziva, putting a little sparkly tiara on her head. There was a dim, grainy shot of all three of them dancing together.

Tim's looking at them, and says, "So it looks like a good time and minor hearing damage has been had by all."

"Yes."

"So, they home, or just taking a break?" Tony asks.

Jimmy flashes a quick text to Breena and thirty seconds later says, "Home. The pregnant matron of honor needed some sleep."

Tim checks his watch; it's 12:48. "She's going to be pissed about that. She hates how tired she is these days."

Tony notices that their waitress is sort of glaring at them. "I think we're overstaying our welcome."

So they settled up and headed to their hotel.
"How are you doing?" Tim asked Jimmy after they got back to their room and began to get ready for bed.

"You mean besides the fact that I'm not supposed to be here tonight because my wife is supposed to be eight months pregnant."

"No. I mean about that."

Jimmy shrugged, pulling his shirt over his head. "I've only texted home three times."

"I noticed. You're getting better on that."

"Yeah. According to Gibbs I can't let the fear own me. So, I'm trying."

"If anyone would know, it's him."

"He always looks fearless."

"Easy to be fearless when you don't value your life."

"Really?"

"Not anymore, not for years. But back when we all started? Yeah."

Jimmy seemed to think about that as he headed to the bathroom. Five minutes later, he was back in a pair of flannel pajama pants that looked very similar to what Tim wore for hot yoga. That triggered the memory of the conversation they had post-hot yoga, so Tim asked, "If I wanted to try shaving it all off, what would you suggest?"

"Tim?"

He rolled his eyes a little, signaling that yes, this was a little silly, but he's curious and comfortable enough with Jimmy to ask about it. "We've got that long weekend after Tony's wedding, and we like to celebrate weddings, so, something special might be in order."

Jimmy laughed. "Why didn't you google it?"

A really wicked grin lit up Tim's face. "Oh, I did. On Ziva's computer. And I left a really obvious trail of breadcrumbs for her to follow. Next time she searches anything that starts with sh it'll pop up."

Jimmy laughed at that, too. "That's your elf porn revenge isn't it."

"Yep, it took a while to figure out the right thing, but I think that'll work really well." Tim looked deeply satisfied at that.

Jimmy shook his head and grinned. "He's going to wet his pants when she shows up with a smile and a razor."

Tim's got a really smug and pleased expression on his face. "That was the plan. So, tips?"

"Do it as close to having sex as you can, and leave at least an hour for it. You shave your face every "day?"

"Nah. Every other. Don't really get stubbly until the second day."

"That's about where I am. 'Round about a day and a half I end up with a five o'clock shadow. So, maybe you'll have ten or twelve hours where it's not an issue, but it's really going to itch when it starts to grow back in."

"Got it."

"Cotton boxers or better yet, wear one of the kilts after. You've got pubic hair for a reason, and dealing with hot and sweaty is that reason, so keep yourself cool and dry."

"All right."

"Brand new razor, a good one, you want it sharp as sharp can be. Good shaving cream or gel or whatever, not soap." Tim's nodding at that. He doesn't like shaving his face with soap, and can't imagine his privates would be any less sensitive. "Trim first, as close as you can get. And for the love of God, pay attention to the go-with-the-grain thing. I know none of us do it when we shave our faces, but really, do it. First pass with the grain, second across it, no third pass. Pluck anything that's left after two passes, because your skin doesn't want a razor going over it more than that. Wash off, pat dry, spray with a little Neosporin, you're good to go."

"Why am I spraying with Neosporin?"

"Because no matter how good at it you are, you've probably got a few hundred tiny, microscopic cuts, and maybe a few you can see as well, and that's one area you don't want an infection, and between the sting and how it tastes, you don't want to be splashing aftershave on it."

"Good points."

Jimmy stretched out on his bed, hands behind his head, still on top of the blankets. "You going to tell her about it or just surprise her?"

"Not sure yet. Probably a surprise."

Jimmy nodded, looked like he's thinking about saying something, and finally decided to say it. "You tell her about it, and she might offer to do it for you. And… well, that's fun and easier, 'cause, she can see what she's doing better than you can."

"Uh huh…"

"And… you know, she's a whole lot more used to shaving delicate places."

"True. So… you let Breena…"

He rolled onto his side to face Tim, who's sitting cross-legged on his bed, unpacking his go-bag. "Not the first time. But, as she pointed out to me, and I'm pointing out to you, she knew what she was doing, and was in a much better position to do it. I mean, are you good at figuring out how to do something by looking in a mirror? I'm not."

"Actually, yes, I am good at that."

"Okay then. Still, it's more fun if she does it."

"You really get off on danger, don't you?"
Jimmy just looked at Tim curiously.

"Look, I trust Abby with my life. Hell, I let her put eyeliner and mascara on me, she even does the waterline—"

"What's the waterline?"

"The little part the eyelashes grow out of, right next to your eye." Tim pointed to it as he said it. Jimmy winced at that idea, and Tim continued. "But I don't want her holding a razor to my balls."

"Meh." Jimmy was supremely unconcerned about that. "I'm way more likely to slice the hell out of myself than she is. So… do you do the whole makeup thing a lot?"

"Besides that Shabbos, a couple of times a year when we go to one of her clubs. Sometimes when we're playing. Call it ten times a year, max."

"Does it feel weird?"

Tim thought about that for a few seconds, not sure what Jimmy's asking. "How do you mean feel, like physical sensation or emotional?"

"Both, either?"

"First few times, yeah, it felt weird. I kept wanting to rub my eyes. But the first couple times I was in college playing live action Vampire, so by the time I met Abby I was sort of used to it."

"Live action Vampire? Like, you running around sucking people's blood?"

"In a nutshell. Though lots of Vampire politics and intrigue, as well."

Jimmy laughed. "You're the biggest nerd ever."

"Uh huh." Tim just nodded, dryly amused. "You're the one asking me about it."

"True enough. So, you're, what, nineteen, and running around in your vampire costume, complete with cape, fangs, white skin, red lipstick, and eyeliner?"

Tim had a pretty good idea of the kind of vampire Jimmy was thinking of. "You're watching way too much Sesame Street. I looked nothing like The Count. I was seventeen and eighteen, and I played a Brujah."

"That means literally nothing to me."

"Brujahs are anarchist vampires. They started out philosopher warriors and by the time the '90s had rolled around their big thing was destroying the system. Black trench coat, raggedy jeans, t-shirt, wallet on a chain, hair long, scraggly, sprayed black and electric blue, eyeliner, fake tats on face and neck, combat boots, overly fond of Nine Inch Nails. His name was Elijah, and I played the hell out of that character."

"Oh, I remember you guys. Our school had a building called the Campus Center, and it was a cafeteria, meeting space, classrooms, theater, and coffee shop, all in one building. But the middle of it was wide open with these huge staircases, and every Friday nights all the freaks came out and kept wandering around doing stuff in tons of black and makeup."

"Yeah, that would have been us."
"Then on Saturday they'd gear up with homemade nerf weapons, armor, and dart guns and play something that looked like capture the flag. And Sunday was live action chess."

"You had a really serious gamer community at your school, didn't you?"

"I think there was only something like thirty of them, but yeah, they were really gung ho about it. I'd be practicing with the rest of the Choir, and a few of them would come running through, brandishing their weapons, yelling something, and twenty seconds later, three more would follow."

"Yeah, that would have been me. And when the role required makeup, I wore it. And since I started doing it with other gamers, and we were already, as you so kindly put it, freaks, wearing it on didn't feel weird on any sort of emotional level. It was just part of the game, like putting on headgear for wrestling."

Jimmy nodded at that.

"Why are you asking?"

"Breena was really… enthusiastic… about the idea of me in makeup after seeing you wear it."

"Huh." Tim's eyebrows shot up. He supposed that shouldn't be a surprise, Breena does seem to like the more rock and roll look, or at least she's always approved of it when he plays with it.

"Yeah."

"And you didn't do it?"

"It's kind of weird."

Tim rolled his eyes. "Your dick's not going to fall off because you put on mascara."

"Yeah, I know. It's just…" Jimmy kind of looked like he's hoping Tim will cut in so he doesn't have to finish that sentence, but Tim just waited for him.

"Just…"

"Kind of girly."

Tim snorted at that. "Says the guy who shaves off his pubes."

"Guys do that!"

"Last I checked, I'm a guy. Your girl likes you in it, what's the deal? It's fun. She's happy. The sex is good. Who cares if you've got on eyeliner?"

"So, how do you do it and not look like a clown?"

"Are you asking me for makeup tips?"

"A: Yes. B: Nothing about this conversation is ever, ever repeated to Tony. C: You started this."

Tim nodded. Hell, this conversation likely wasn't getting mentioned to Abby, let alone anyone else. "Abby does mine. She's a whole lot better at it than I am. The only thing I do for myself is my nails."

Decades of model building, followed by his different electrical/computer projects mean Tim actually has steadier hands than Abby. So, between that and the fact that she doesn't wear nail polish regularly, he does his own, and on the few occasions she wears it, hers.
"It's not much of a surprise if she does it, now is it?"

Tim laughed at that. "Youtube has videos on how to do everything. There have got to be makeup videos on there. Buy good stuff, because you don't want to end up having an allergic reaction."

“What’s good stuff?"

“I like Urban Decay."

“You have a brand?"

“For eyeliner I do. It's soft, goes on nice, stays put forever, and unlike the stuff Abby likes, it doesn't bug my eyes. First time she did my eyes, we had to skip going out that night because both eyes swelled shut in like five minutes."

"Ew." Jimmy winced, and Tim nodded in agreement.

"Yeah. And it's not impossible that I like Urban Decay because, well, it's a punk brand, so a guy walks in in a kilt and grabs some black eyeliner and nail polish they don't look at me like I'm weird. And, sure this is dumb as hell, black is black is black, but I'm a lot more comfortable buying a color called Perversion, Zero, or Oil Slick, than something called Midnight Orchid or whatever other girly name the other companies come up with."

Jimmy laughs at that, then thinks about it, tries to imagine buying something like Sable Kiss or whatever, and says, "Good point."

"Anyway. Videos, then if you want to surprise her, get your own stuff, or swipe hers, and practice right before you get a shower. Wash off, and when you think you know what you're doing, let your inner rock star out."

Tim grabs his toiletries and jammies and heads to the bathroom. A few minutes later, he's brushing his teeth when a thought hits him, so he heads out of the bathroom. "You know—"

"Are you really having a conversation with me while you brush your teeth?" Jimmy was under the blankets, just staring at Tim, like he couldn't quite believe this was happening.

"That a problem?"

"We're not married."

"Oh sorry. I didn't realize that after talking sex and makeup while we're sharing a room and you're in your pajamas that brushing my teeth in front of you was too intimate. I've shared a room with Tony seventeen million times, and even he can take this. Gibbs'll walk in on you naked, without knocking, and just stand there, talking to you like it's no big deal."

He ducked back into the bathroom to finish up and came back out when Jimmy said, "Why would Gibbs walk into your room naked?"

"No. He'll walk in while you're naked."

"Okay, that makes more sense. So, what great revelation just hit you?"

Tim got into his bed. "Lipstick."

"Lipstick?"
"No matter how Gothed out I go, I don't wear it. I just... really didn't like the idea of it. It took Abby two years to get me into it."

"And you're bringing this up why?"

"Just, I get it. It took a minute, but I get it. That was my bridge too far. The thing that was too girly."

"But you did it?"

"Yeah. Couldn't get that tattoo on her neck without my lip print, and no way to get that without it."

"Eyeliner didn't bother you, but lipstick did?"

"Not saying it wasn't silly, but yeah."

"And am I correct in noticing you using the past tense?"

Tim looked a little sheepish. "I still don't love it. Won't look at myself in it, cause it has to look dumb as hell. I'm not pretty enough to pull off glam. But... she really does like it. And leaving lip prints on her is a lot of fun. And my dick didn't fall off. It was still perfectly fine and had an awfully good time when I was wearing it."

"Uh huh." Jimmy was quiet, and flipped off the light as Tim got settled in bed. Then he asked, "What color?"

"Black the first time, like the tattoo. Then she found this stuff online, Obsessive Compulsive Cosmetics Lip Tars, they're basically lip paint, and you can mix them together to make lots of colors, and they come in a lot of colors, too. So she got like every color you can imagine: blue and green and purple and gold and silver and one weekend we tried them all out, and I covered her in lots of different colors, and she did me."

"That was fun?"

"Yeah. I never got hickies. Never understood why you might want to suck on her so hard you left a bruise. Pain, inflicting it or receiving it, just really doesn't do it for me."

"Says the guy with three tattoos."

"That's different."

"How?"

"I don't know; it just is. Anyway, looking back and seeing all those little marks, knowing I put them there, and that stuff stays on like, forever, if you don't wash it off, that was a kick. Like the tattoos, but not nearly as expensive, you don't need another person, and you can get places you don't want a tattoo gun going anywhere near. That was a lot of fun."

"Huh. So you're saying you had a two person rainbow party?"

"I guess. You ever wonder if stuff like that is real? Or just urban legends. I mean, the girls I knew in high school and junior high weren't doing stuff like that."

"Let's put it this way: when I was seventeen I would have given my right nut for it to be real. Now, with a year-old little girl, I'm hoping it's an urban legend."

Tim laughed a little at that. "You and Gibbs looked ready to kill Tony."
"I love Tony, but… There was just this sense of rage. And there's nothing he can do about it. And I know it was the '80s and the rules were different, but, yeah, I wanted to hit him, really hard. She's going to grow up and there'll be guys out there who'll be aggressive jerks, and it's scary."

Tim nodded.

"It was probably easier when Gibbs was a dad. You could just take a stand: No sex until you get married! Go put that caftan on and enjoy your education at St. Mary’s All Girl School for Extremely Catholic Virgins!" Jimmy stopped and thought about that. "I don't want to be that guy. I don't want to be Fornell. I see the way he watches Emily and how his blood pressure goes shooting up every time it looks like she's getting interested in a guy or sex. I want Molly to have boyfriends and to enjoy them. I just don't want her to get hurt. I don't want her to get sick. I really don't want to be a grandfather any time in the next two decades, and three would be even better. I want her to know about what her mother chose, and why it was a good thing, but I also want her to know about Abby and Ziva and… I want her to own her body, own her sexuality, and I'm so scared some asshole's gonna try and take it away from her or hurt her for making her own decisions."

Tim sighed. "There's nothing you can do about that, not now. But, the good thing is you probably don't have to worry about it for at least a decade. And by then, we'll have our own Fear of Dad razor sharp."

"I hope so. But we'll only be able to scare the ones we know about. We won't always be around."

"Nope. But unlike Fornell, and I'm going to guess a lot of the girls Tony was fooling around with, we are going to be there every day, every night, showing our girls by how we live how a man who loves a woman treats her. Our girls are going to know what respect looks like because we'll live it. And our girls aren't going to be acting out, craving Daddy's attention, because they'll have it."

He can hear a slight rustle from Jimmy's bed, and assumed that was him shrugging.

"And I'll wire them with GPS trackers so we can swoop in and save the day if need be."

That got a laugh out of Jimmy. "Good night, Tim."

"Night."
Once again, they're sitting next to the ultrasound machine, waiting for the tech to show up and start taking pictures.

It's the third time, so it's starting to get a little routine, but there's also the buzz of excitement that comes with finding out if Kelly really is a girl.

"You know, we're gonna feel silly if Kelly's a boy," Tim says, holding Abby's hand, looking at the currently blanks screen.

"You might. I won't."

"Okay. What are we calling him if he's not a girl?" They've been so certain that Kelly's a girl they haven't even talked about boys names.

She thinks about that as they wait for the ultrasound tech. "Not Tony."

Yeah, he can get behind that. Maybe as a middle name, but not a first name. Tony McGee, no matter how much he loves DiNozzo just sounds bad. "Definitely not Tony."

"Sean?" Abby asks.

He thinks about that. "Sean McGee is really Irish."

"Is that bad?" Abby's noticed that Tim doesn't identify as Irish. He's just American. But she's never dug deep enough to know if it's part of him not being his Dad, or if, like the Sciutos weren't Italian in any meaningful sense, the McGees weren't Irish.

"No. Just pointing it out. I kind of like it. Sean James..." He lets that roll around in his mind for a second, the image of a little boy with sandy blonde hair and green eyes clicking with that name.

"Sean James McGee sounds really good," Abby says, and he's thinking she's probably got a pretty similar image in her mind.

"Yeah."

Then the tech came in, and discussion of what Kelly might be called if there was indeed a penis stopped.

And once again they watched as different features revealed themselves. Heart first, thrumming away, strong and steady; veins and arteries doing the jobs they were built for. Liver, kidneys, lungs and brain all looked good. Arms, legs, hands, feet, fingers and toes were all accounted for.

And two minutes later, possible boys names became an entirely moot point as the tech says, "No testicles, that's a little girl."

Gibbs was staring at the ultrasound picture. They'd headed over to his place after work, wanting to show it to him first, and ask him a serious question. Sure, they'd been calling her Kelly when they were alone together, but now was the time to find out if they could keep that name.

For a few minutes, he just looked at the picture. Sure he's seen ultrasounds of babies and they all look pretty much the same, but this is his little girl, so that adds to it. Doesn't matter that he couldn't pick her out from a collection of other ultrasounds unless he could see the McGee on the upper left corner, it's his girl, and that's what matters.

Abby was sitting next to him on the sofa, leaning her head into his shoulder, (he has his arm around her) looking at the picture with him. Then she started the question. "She's a girl, and we were wondering... Well, Tim was wondering... I was going to just go ahead and do it... But he wanted to make sure it was okay..." Tim notices her eyes are tearing up, and she's putting more and more phrases between now and the actual question, so he squeezes her hand and takes over.

"We'd like to call her Kelly, but we also wanted to make sure it'd be okay with you."

Gibbs smiles, eyes warm, looking at the black and white image in front of him, fingers lightly stroking the tiny white hand on the picture. "Yeah, it's okay."

Abby took Gibbs' hand in hers. "We'd also like you to think about what you want her to call you. Gibbs or Jethro is fine if you like it, but Grandpa or Pop, which was what Tim called his grandfather, or if there's something you really liked, something you imagined your grandkids calling you, that would be even better."

The smile on Gibbs' face grew even wider. He kissed the top of Abby's head before looking at Tim and saying, "I like Pop."

They were on the way home, having grabbed a quick dinner and Abby's maid of honor dress, when Abby said, "Kelly what McGee."

"Huh?" Tim wasn't really paying attention, he was merging into traffic, and an idiot in a blue Suburban kept trying to stay exactly in his blind spot.

Abby can see he's focused on the road, so she waits for him to get into the lane he's aiming for before saying, "Middle name. You whipped James out to go along with Sean in like three seconds flat. What goes with Kelly?"

"Uh..." Tim's drawing a blank. Kelly Ziva doesn't sound right to him. Kelly Sarah., not bad, but he's already got four Sarahs in his family. "Does something have to go with it? I don't have a middle name."

"Nope. But most people have them, usually honoring family or something like that. Like, you know, whipping James out nine seconds after Sean."

"About half of that is honoring Jimmy. A quarter is that James sounds really good with Sean. The other quarter is that Jethro's names are pretty awful so I'm not saddling any boys we have with them."

"Gibbs' names are fine!" Abby looks appalled that Tim would insult Leroy or Jethro.

"Says the woman who only refers to him by last name." And yeah, he loves Gibbs, but well, there are family names and family names, and if someone you love has a god-awful name, you find another way to honor them, like naming your kid after their kid.

Abby sticks her tongue out at him.

"Okay, fine, his names are great," lots of dry sarcasm on that, "for the 1950s. When have you met a "Leroy or Jethro that was under fifty?"

"Never."

"And you know everyone on the eastern seaboard. So, what do you like for a middle name?"

"I don't know. Elizabeth?"

"Kelly Elizabeth McGee… Not bad. Not in love with it, but it's not bad. Anne?"

"That's Breena and Jimmy's number two girl name."

Tim tapped his fingers on the steering wheel. "So you're thinking we shouldn't snag it and leave them looking for a new one?"

"Yeah. With any luck they'll be having a conversation pretty similar to this real soon. Something fiction-y? What girl characters do you love?"

"You mean, besides the ones I've written?"

"Yeah, I do not want Amy, Lisa, or Gail to show up on the list."

"Okay… Willow, Fred, Zoe, Kaylee…"

"Whedon-verse, good first pick. No on Fred or Kaylee."

"I know, I'm just going through the list. And really Kelly Willow doesn't work, either." He glances to the left, the lane is clear, shifts over, and speeds up a little.

"Yeah, not good. Kelly Zoe is too many ee sounds."

"How about you, what girls characters do you love?"

Abby sighs and pets her belly. "Do we need to have that argument about the lack of awesome female characters in the kinds of things I like to read or watch again?"

"No." They'd gotten into a pretty heated argument about whether there were or were not any good strong female characters in recent fiction, with Abby claiming they were horribly rare and Tim saying they were all over the place if you just looked. It wasn't pretty. And probably wouldn't have been nearly as passionate had she not been hopped up on pregnancy hormones or he a writer. The makeup sex was fun, though. "Just, kind of annoying to be told there are no strong female characters out there when every single thing I write has them."

"I know. How about that series you gave me a while back… Autumn. I like her."

"Autumn was a psychopath, and the villain."

"Yeah, but she had a lot of style."

"Because she was a Fairy. Style is sort of a racial trait, what with the whole glamour thing. How about Claire? She was cool."

"Claire was cold. And Kelly Claire McGee… nope. I liked Sarah, too. She certainly fit the kick-ass, take-names strong female mold."

"I was thinking about that. Naming her after my sister is fine, but I've already got four Sarahs in my family. Probably don't need a fifth."

"Good point."

"Eowyn?"

"Yeah, I'm good with an out there name, but maybe not that far out."

"Leia? Queen of the kick-ass female heroes?"

"Kelly Leia McGee… Eh. Kelly's a really normal name… something too far out on the middle name isn't going to work."

"Probably right. We've got time. Don't need one tonight," he says as he pulls into their driveway. "Really, we don't need one at all. I like Kelly McGee."

"Unless we can find something we both love, we'll skip the middle name." She thinks about that for a moment as they walk in. Timothy McGee… Something was missing there. "Tim, why don't you have a confirmation name? Everyone else I know who got confirmed has one."

He slouches a little, tilting his head to the side and sighing. "I have one. It's just… kind of silly and embarrassing."

"Worse than Teresa?" Abby asks as she sits on the bottom step to take her boots off.

"Teresa is cool. Lots of good Teresas. Which one were you thinking of?"

"The mystic."

He laughs at that, approving. "And I am less than shocked. She ran a convent, and went into ecstatic trances, and was a major player theologically, right?"

"And wrote music and poetry too."

"That's not dumb at all." He unzips his coat and hangs it up. Then holds out his hand for Abby's coat.

"So what was yours?"

"Raphael."

She stops in the middle of taking her coat off and looks at him. "Why would you think that's silly or embarrassing?"

"Probably because these days all anyone knows is the Mutant Ninja Turtle."

Abby smiles at that, handing him her coat. "So, which one was he?"

"The sulky one with the sais."

She adds a little roll of her eyes to go with the smile. "Which angel? I know he's one of the big ones, but I besides Michael being the warrior, I don't remember which ones do what."

"The healer. I still thought I was going to be a surgeon then."

"Then it's a great name."
He thinks about that for a bit while kicking his shoes into the closet. "My dad didn't like it. He never went full out on me for it, maybe because I was seven. Maybe because he was sure I'd actually tell the priest who ran the confirmation class why I'd suddenly decided to change it. So he was just disdainful of it, and really talked up Nicholas and Brendan."

"Why those two?"

"Patron saints of sailors. But Penny and my mom really liked Raphael. And I really liked MASH, thought being a trauma surgeon would be the best thing ever. And since Father Sam kindly told me that no, there was no Saint Hawkeye or BJ, I went with Raphael."

Abby's nodding. "It's a good name."

"Thanks."
"I'm getting so fat!"

"Abby?" Tim had been in the bathroom, brushing his teeth, getting ready for bed. He stepped out and saw Abby staring at her backside in the mirror on her closet door, well, glaring at it in the mirror, but he couldn't for the life of him figure out why.

On the way home from Gibbs' they'd picked up her maid of honor dress, and she was trying it on.

Back when Ziva picked bridesmaids dresses out, she'd had one pregnant bridesmaid and one who had just miscarried, so to say that she had no decent way of figuring out how her ladies would look in a month, when the dresses would be ready, was an understatement.

So, she had pulled all of her tactical thinking skills together, along with all of her fashion skills, and decided that anyone of any shape looks good in a strapless dress with an empire waist and a flowing crepe skirt that fell to just above the knees.

And, Tim would completely agree with that. He thinks Abby looks great in the ivory gown with a band of baby pink beading just below the breasts.

But she's staring at herself and scowling. Shifting from the back view to the side view, and scowling even more.

So he turns to look at her in the mirror. Maybe she looks different reflected. Nope.

"You look great."

"I look fat!"

He stared at her intently for a few seconds. "Nope. I can still see your tarsals, carpals, and clavicles. Not fat. Trust me, I'd know." At least on his body, being able to easily see his wrist, ankle, and collar bones is a very good sign of not having crossed the line between fit and plump.

"I have two chins when I tilt my head down." She says, head down, wiggling the offensive flap of skin.

"So does everyone." He demonstrates by looking down, and then tilts his head up. "You wouldn't be able to look up if you didn't have that skin there."

"My butt is huge!" She's looking at her backside again.

He's realizing that this is not a discussion where rational argument is going to help. They just went to the doctor today, so he knows she's gained fourteen pounds which is exactly where she should be for twenty weeks pregnant. So he retreats to the bathroom, puts his toothbrush back, and quickly rinses his mouth. Then he came out again, (she appeared to be studying her thighs and not liking what she was seeing) stepped behind her, and placed on hand on each hip, and began gently caressing the butt in question.

"It's soft and round and curvy."

"Stop that!" She looks like she wants to sulk, but he's not playing along, not on this. No one calls Abby ugly or fat, not in front of him, not even Abby.
"Nope. You, and this butt that appears to be annoying you, are absolutely delicious." He'd press up tight behind her, but he's naked, and though he's fairly sure his skin is dry and clean, this is a white dress so he can't risk getting any stains on it, so he stays a step back as his hands trace from her butt to her belly and breasts. "You are not fat. You are exactly the shape you're supposed to be right now, and I adore it."

He very carefully unhooked the top of the dress and pulled the zip down, then lifted it off of her, and draped it over her dresser. "Can't risk getting that stained or rumpled."

She's not exactly looking happy at him, but she's not as annoyed as she was a minute ago either.

He closes on her again, and turns her toward the mirror. Under the dress she had on a strapless bra and nothing else. He stood right behind her, and undid the bra, tossing it in the delicates hamper.

Then he pressed in close, erection rubbing against her butt as his hands stroked from her neck down her arms, fingers twining with hers.

"You're beautiful, Abby. And yeah, you're bigger than you used to be, but you aren't fat. You're all round and soft, ripe, succulent, and it drives me crazy because all I want to do is constantly rub up against you." He kissed her shoulder, and stroked her thighs, then ground his pelvis against her. "Feel that? Your body does that to mine." That got a smile out of her. "Half the time I'm in the lab these days, I've got a hard-on from watching you. You in those little dresses or skirts, tummy and breasts all plump and round. If Gibbs didn't have a habit of wandering down every ten minutes when I go down there, I'd have you bent over your desk, panties round your ankles, balls deep inside you, feeling you bite my hand to muffle your screams, my mouth on your shoulder for the same reason, every single day, twice on paperwork days."

She giggles a little at that, perking up as his fingers find her nipples.

"I have noticed that. You come down, and these days within ten minutes he does, too."

"Yeah, well, he's not blind, so he's noticed how good you look. And it's not like he just met me, so he's not exactly having a hard time figuring out how I'm responding to it or what I'm likely to want to do about it. And not to put too fine a point on it, but he was here once, too. I'm sure he remembers what it feels like to have a delicious pregnant wife."

That got another laugh, and she looked at herself again, less critically, but still less than thrilled at her current shape. "Not fat?"

"Not fat. Round, soft, ripe, succulent, scrumptious, exquisite... fertile. Think about it, on its most basic level that's what female beauty is to a man. Signs of fertility." His hands ghost over her breasts, belly, and hips. "Biology means I want to make babies. So you pregnant with my kid is going to hit all of my buttons, hard, fist slammed down on them pressing your full weight into them. Nothing is ever going to get to me the way this does. And it does, it really does, in a pure, balls in charge, brain isn't even checking in, oh god, SEX! YES! level. On a pure biology level, the only reason I exist is to get you pregnant, keep you pregnant, and make sure your and our kid survive. So... I guess what I'm saying is, I'm going to be a really unsympathetic audience for complaining about how you look, because all I see is SEX!, sex, sex, sex, sex, with a side of MINE! My woman. My baby." He kissed her neck, hands cradling her belly. "So, no, not fat. Not fat at all. Perfect. And if you asked Jimmy or Tony or Gibbs they'd tell you the same thing, not fat at all."

"I still think my butt looks huge."

He shook his head. "You're welcome to think that, but I don't."
"And your opinion is the only one that matters?"

"Damn right! My opinion on the subject seems to make both of us happy. Your opinion makes neither of us happy. So let's stick with mine."

She rolled her eyes a little. "I don't look like me."

Ahhh… Identity issues, not just changing body. That makes sense to him. It's something he's facing as well. But it's nothing he's got a set or easy answer for.

He kissed her shoulder, and Kelly took that moment to start kicking. The soft, fluttery sensation beneath his fingers helped him get his thoughts in order.

"I'll hand my badge and gun to Vance, but I'll still be me. You'll get rounder, look less like Abby, but you'll still be you. But you and I won't be the Tim or Abby we were. Just like Jimmy and Breena aren't the people they were before Jon and Molly. But they're still Jimmy and Breena, and we still love them and want to be with them."

She smiles a little at that, wrapping her arms around his neck. "It feels really weird to look in the mirror and have to take a second to realize who I'm looking at."

"I bet it does. I feel that way when I see pictures of myself over the years."

"But not when you look in the mirror?"

"I gained and lost the weight slowly enough that there was never a 'who the hell is that' moment. Okay, once… Remember when I buzzed my hair off?"

"Yeah. I love you, and I will always love you, but please, don't ever do that again."

"I'm not intending to. Anyway, for about a week after that, I kept wondering who that guy with the really round head was. I felt like I looked like Charlie Brown."

Abby laughs at that. "That was a pretty bad look for you."

"Yeah, I know I knew about a third of the way through that haircut, but by that point I was committed." He trailed his fingers down her arm, over her ribs and down to her hip. "I love you. I love this version of you. I'm going to love the version you'll be in three months, and the version you were three months ago. Kelly comes out, and everything is going to be droopy and saggy and I'm still going to love you."

"Don't remind me of that part. Breena's got horror stories of how bad she looked after Molly came out."

"Breena looked fine after Molly was born."

"You didn't see her naked."

"True. She still looked fine."

Abby turns in his arms to face him, placed a quick kiss on his lips and says, "Tim, besides her nursing breasts, did you notice anything, at all, about Breena after she gave birth?"

He flashes her his innocent look. "I kept up a strict policy of never looking below Breena's neck when she was nursing."

That gets a smile out of Abby. "Liar."

"Yes." He smiles back, and kisses the tip of her nose. "They really were fantastic."

"I agree."

His fingers find her breasts, and gently stroke over the sides. "And I'm going to be staring at yours all the time, too. If what Jimmy tells me about nursing breast being a look but don't touch sort of thing is true, I'll be looking and probably taking pictures, too."

"Horny bastard."

He smiles and kisses her. "For you, always."
Cherry Blossoms and Tuxes

For the second time in six months, the extended Gibbs Clan gathered for a wedding.

But Jewish weddings don't exactly work the same way Christian ones do.

They're a two-step process.

And while in a Christian or secular American wedding the night before is the rehearsal, rehearsal dinner, usually followed by Team Bride and Groom heading off for separate merrymaking, a Jewish wedding begins the night before with the signing of the Ketubah, the official marriage contract.

So, in order to give this ceremony proper honors, they're at the park Gibbs found for them, a little, out of the way place, probably popular a hundred years ago, but mostly forgotten now. But it's in okay (if somewhat wild) shape, it's not filled with other people, and the clearing they're in is ringed with blooming cherry trees, setting up for tomorrow.

The most important part, the chuppah, is up, and mostly decorated. (The girls are doing the flowers with the florist tomorrow.) But for now it's burnished rods of oak, finished to look like all the warmth of the sun has solidified into wood, woven together into four pillars. Gibbs and Breena attached the top supports, while Jimmy, Tony, and Tim dug the holes in the ground to keep the posts steady. Ziva and Abby straightened out the yards of gauzy cream and snow-colored fabric, and then draped it over the supports, weaving it through the posts.

Gibbs and Jimmy have lawn mowers so they're in charge of getting a path to the chuppah, and enough of the space in front of it to hold eighteen people trimmed down so that guests won't have to worry about being eaten alive by the grass and weeds.

Abby and Tony are in charge of posting signs. This place is pretty far off the beaten path so DiNozzo-David Wedding signs are going up. It's not that the GPS can't find it. Punch where you're going into your GPS while you're still in DC and it's got no trouble at all locating the place. It's that for most of them their GPS stopped working about three miles from the park, leaving them driving about on smaller and smaller roads in the middle of pretty rural Virginia, so old fashioned signs need to be set up.

Tim's wiring the lights for tonight. Technically, it's the Sabbath and they shouldn't be working at all, but setting up now works better for everyone's schedule, so they're here. The Rabbi on the other hand, won't be coming until the Sabbath is over, after sunset. So Tim's making sure that when he gets here, they'll have enough light to actually see the Ketubah, read it, and sign it.

Of course, off the beaten path means there's no electricity here, but he's hoping that the car battery he's got rigged to the lighting set up will do the job.

Ziva and Breena are setting up the chairs, putting them in place and making sure the satin covers are secure. Sure, they're probably asking for a freak thunder storm to show up and wreck everything by setting them up today instead of tomorrow morning, but they want to get as much done ahead of time as possible.

It's a small enough group they aren't bothering with a bride's side or groom's side. So they're set in three rows of six.

Two tents, one for team bride and one for team groom for the pre-wedding waiting about finish off the site.
It takes about two hours, but the site is (except for the flowers) all set and ready to go.

The downside of beautiful little park out in the middle of nowhere is that… It's in the middle of nowhere. So they got everything done, and then drove an hour back to DC to get ready for that evening.

The signing of the Ketubah is a big deal, and being invited to witness it is an honor reserved for close family and friends. So, you can't just wear the same grungy jeans, work boots, and button down you had on for setting up the chuppah.

And that downtime in the middle of the day gives Tim a little spot of time to run that last errand he'd been putting off for a week, namely grabbing his tux.

He got home with it while Abby was still damp from getting out of the shower. She's sitting on the bed, toweling off her hair as Tim walks in with the suit bag.

"Do I get to see?"

"Yes." He answers while putting it into his closet.

She flashes and exasperated look at him. "Do I get to see before the wedding?"

That got a grin out of him. "Do you want to see?"

"Yes! When do I not want to see you get dressed up?"

He laughs and begins to unbutton his shirt, pulling it over his head when he got the first three buttons undone. "Everything else all set for tonight?"

"According to my list, you getting a shower and dressed are the only two things left."

He nods, pulling off his socks. "Don't let me forget a pen."

"Good point."

Tim and Gibbs had been chosen as the witnesses to sign the Ketubah. Though many friends and family may be called to witness the signing of the Ketubah and the reading of the contract, two especially close friends are called to sign the contract in addition to the bride and groom. Traditionally the witnesses are men, though Ziva and Tony's congregation is egalitarian, allowing anyone who isn't a blood relative to sign. But when Tony and Ziva sat down to talk it over they chose the two men who had their backs, who would die to protect them, and kill to avenge them. They chose their team, and that's Tim and Gibbs.

Abby gets up, leaving their bedroom for a moment, and returns with one of Tim's pens, tucking it into the breast pocket of the suit he'll be wearing tonight. Once done, she heads to the bathroom to do her makeup.

A few minutes later, as she was putting on her mascara, Tim stood in the doorway to the bathroom and said, "Well?"

Abby turns to him, a wide, pleased, slightly amazed smile on her face, and says, "Oh." She put the mascara wand back into the tube and then put it on the sink, just staring at him. Tim's standing in front of her, expectant look on his face. Her eyes take him in from glossy black shoes to ebony cufflinks, midnight tie to sable wool-silk blend jacket. She blinked slowly, and exhaled, "Wow!"

Expectant broke into a wide grin.

"If I had known you looked like this in a tux, we might have gotten married with you in one."

He shifts the door, so he can see himself in the full-length mirror. "If I had known I could look like this in a suit, I might wear them more often. I'll say this for Tony, his tailor really knows what he's doing."

Abby's slowly circling Tim, looking at him appraisingly, hand trailing over his low back. "He really does. Yeah, I'm thinking you should do suits on occasion."

See, if you were to ask Tim, he'd tell you that he generally looks, well, kind of gaunt and lanky in suits. (At least over the last year. Previous to that he's looked plump and round in them, and he didn't love that look, either.) And not in what he considers a good way. He's never worn one that he thought really looked good on him. Which is why he rarely wears them. Weddings, funerals, testifying in court, and occasional nice date nights, and beyond that, they live in his closet and collect dust.

He's seen guys who do suits well. Tony, he always looks great.

And now he knows why. Apparently having someone who knows how a suit is supposed to fit go and actually make one for you results in you looking like James Fucking Bond, and not the Daniel Craig version, but Sean Connery.

Though as he looks at himself in the tux, he's thinking he's got more of a Loki in Germany look going than James Bond. A killer scarf and overcoat, and he'd nail it. (Well, at least as close as a guy who bears absolutely no resemblance at all to Tom Hiddleston can… though if he grew his hair out five more inches and slicked it back… Nope, face isn't sharp enough for that.)

The fact that custom clothing has never occurred to Tim seems like a glaring error right this second. His bed was custom made, so were his tattoos, wedding rings, and Abby's engagement ring. And it's not like he's adverse to spending money on clothing. He's got some good clothes that were pretty damn expensive.
And, if three grand on a suit can make him look like this, well… maybe he might want to get another one. Not for every day wear or anything, but maybe a gray one for hot date nights…

"I think you're right about that." He looks at the suits in his closet. He'd been intending to wear the dark gray one for tonight, and suddenly he's really not wanting to do that. "Well, suits made by Dom. My regular ones all look like utter crap now."

"No they don't."

"They don't look like this."

"True." Abby circles to face him, hands resting on his chest, and looked at him more closely. "Did you do an eldritch knot in the tie."

He smiled, a tinge of naughty playfulness pulling at the corners of his lips. "I can't look exactly like Tony and Jimmy, and this is subtle enough Tony won't flip out."

She laughs at that. "I like you in vests, too."

"I'll keep that in mind."

"I bet the top half of this would look great with the McGee tartan."

"I bet it would, but I've already been told that Jimmy will pin me down and beat me into submission if I try to wear makeup or a kilt to tonight or the wedding."

Abby laughs at that. "Kilt, that vest, shirt, and tie, black nail polish, eyeliner, your boots." She looks at him, eyes warm and sparkling, trailing up and down his body. "Damn!"

He's smiling at that idea, enjoying the look of sexual hunger on her face. "Okay, yes, that will happen, but not tonight. I was thinking that maybe we'd do something special on Monday. That could be part of it."

The wedding, like many Jewish weddings, is on Sunday, and barring a catastrophe requiring all hands on deck, team Gibbs is off the Monday after the wedding. "What are you thinking of for Monday?"

"It's a surprise. But I think you'll like it, and that could definitely be part of it."

"I am intrigued."

"Good, and we're gonna be late if I don't get showered and changed fast."

And yes, after the tux, the suit he had intended to wear just looked sad. But he put it on, made a mental note to call Dom about a date night suit, and got ready for the reading and signing of the Ketubah.

They returned to middle of nowhere park as the stars were beginning to prickle through dusk, and found they were the last ones there. (Tim was quite pleased to see the solar switch he set turned the lights on when the sun sank. He'd really been hoping he wasn't going to get here and find everyone using their headlights to avoid wandering in the dark.)

For the signing the usual core group attended along with a few new additions, Senior, his date, and Ziva's Schmiel.
Senior with a date isn't anything new. Senior with a date who appears to be over sixty, a very attractive, polished, self-assured over sixty, but over sixty none-the-less, pleased Tony to no end.

Tony had been dreading meeting Daphine since his father mentioned he'd have a plus one. Probably because he assumed Daphine would be younger than Breena, twice as pretty and half as smart. His father's type. From Tony talking about it, Tim had certainly expected young, pretty, simple, and looking for money. So older, refined, a soft voice accented with something that sounds like French but he doesn't think actually is French, was a pleasant surprise.

One he didn't have much time to ponder.

The Rabbi is waving them forward, and he's still got to grab a hat from Ducky.

Tim doesn't own any hats. Scratch that, he's got one knit one for doing cold things outside in winter, and one super fuzzy furry one for doing really cold things, and unless his ears are in danger of frostbite, they stay in his closet. And he's got his NCIS ball cap, which is required for when he's at a crime scene. He hates the way he looks in hats. But covering his head is a sign of respect. And while tomorrow they'll all be wearing yarmulkes, today he's snagging a fedora from Ducky.

He kisses Penny's cheek, grabs the headgear, sets it on his head, and joins the Rabbi, Tony, Ziva, and Gibbs under the chuppah for the reading and signing of the Ketubah.

Tony whispered to him, "You're late!"

"I'm on time. You're all early."

"On time is late."

"Fine."

Then the Rabbi began the ceremony, explaining what was going to happen and why.

It doesn't take that long. And while the actual Ketubah is in Hebrew (Ziva told him that in Orthodox congregations they're in Aramaic, but their Reform congregation does Hebrew.) the Rabbi reads it in English since most of this group doesn't speak Hebrew.
Basically, there's no point to witnessing a document if you have no idea what's in it.

It's a very… functional is probably a good word… document. It basically lists the responsibilities of the husband (food, clothing, sex), what happens should there be a divorce, what sort of monetary settlements would be made, stuff like that.

In any other circumstance he'd call it a pre-nup. But apparently, since the dawn of Judiasm, the idea that in addition to vague and nebulous concepts of love and cherish (that's part of tomorrow's ceremony) there would also be an actual document stating exactly what is expected of the husband, and precisely what would happen should he not live up to it.

Tim thinks that's awfully cool.

Plus he's very amused by the idea that providing sex to his wife is the husband's duty and he can't just wander off without her permission thus cutting her off. He makes a mental note to mention to Gibbs that he can't just drag Tony off to the ends of the earth without getting Ziva's okay. Then he thinks twice about that, because if Jethro's not taking Tony or Ziva that means he'll take Tim, and he wants to stay close to home, too.

At the end of the reading came the signing. Since it is a Reform congregation, both Tony and Ziva sign it, followed by Gibbs and Tim.

The document was illuminated by hand. What Tim thinks of as traditional Hebrew script, black ink with silver and gold highlights, decorated with cherry blossoms twined together up and down the sides. It's beautiful, and that's intentional. Apparently it's a mitzvah to make things that glory God as beautiful as possible.

Tim's actually a little nervous about sticking his signature on it. Once upon a time it was a fairly tidy collection of left slanting letters, but these days it's messy scrawl with only three legible letters. It's not, even remotely, beautiful.

But it's his, and he's been chosen to put it on there, so he does.

And doing so means this part of the wedding is over, and it's time for dinner, and the party to start.
A party staring Schmiel, DiNozzo Sr., and Ducky is a thing to behold. It's like the world's great story tellers all got together one night to see who could spin the longest, most intricate yarn.

And then they started playing off each other.

Tim watches the three of them and hopes that when he, Jimmy, and Tony are all older than dirt, that they'll be half as entertaining to the people around them, and a quarter as vital.

Middle of nowhere park was located not too far away from a fairly decent bed and breakfast, one that was willing to rent out their entire downstairs (and several rooms) for the party. (Off night, off season, it wasn't too hard to convince them to do a kosher dinner.)

So the twelve of them are around one large table, dinner served family style, but there's an open bar, and cleared space near them. (Tim's thinking the table they are at is probably a few tables together, and the other tables have been removed.) The main course is over, and they're lingering over stories, coffee, and dessert when Schmiel says, "Enough talking, it is time to dance," he stood up and held out his hand to Ziva.

That's greeted by silence, and Ziva staring at his hand. Sure, there's room, but… no music.

Finally Jimmy says, "Breena and I are in, but… music?"
Gibbs with the camera

Schmiel looks amused and irked. "You mean to tell me, with all of your fancy phones, none of you has something that will play music?"

Which caused all eyes to slide over to Tim, the tech guru. "Give me five minutes."

It took three. The proprietor did have a port that would work with his phone, and some speakers she was willing to donate to the party.

Tim figured that with this group, some of his peppier jazz would be a good choice, and set it to playing.

And with that, the party got really started.

He found Jimmy waiting for him after he got out of the restroom an hour later. Jimmy's grinning at him, and for a second he's wondering if he's got toilet paper on his shoe or something. He checked. Nope. Next thought that sprang to mind was whether or not that grin was about his possible long weekend shaving plans, but he doesn't think that's it.

Finally he said, "Okay, you're freaking me out just standing there and grinning. What's up?"
The grin got wider. "We're not telling anyone else besides Ducky, not for a while at least, but, we're pregnant again."

A huge smile spread across Tim's face as he pulled Jimmy into a hug. When he stepped back he said, "I'm so happy for you."

"Yeah, we are, too. Scared…"

Tim nodded, seeing that there's not just happiness on Jimmy's face. Mostly joy, a little tipsy, and a tinge of fear, but mostly joy.

"But really happy."

"How far along?"

"Nine days? Just found out this morning."

"Breena telling Abby?"

"Probably already has."

"No wonder you've been in such a good mood today." Yeah, they're prepping for a wedding, and that tends to result in happy people, but Jimmy's been in a really good mood.

"Yeah." Jimmy's grinning and Tim hugged him again, just so happy to see a smile on his face that lights up his eyes again.
"When do you think you're telling everyone?"

"The earliest they can do the nuchal fold test is week ten day one, so, assuming everything is good, week ten, day one and a half. If not... It'll just be you guys and Ducky."

"Okay. Penny know?"

"She was there when we told him, so yes. Feels a little strange to get used to the idea of Ducky as half of a couple."

"You think that's weird, with the way this is going, he might literally be my grandfather at some point."

"Step-grandfather."

"Close enough."

"Course these last few years he's pretty much been this hybrid grandfather/big brother/boss for me, so I'm kind of used to that."

Tim was nodding absently while he did a little math in his head. "New Year's baby?"

That got another grin. "December 24th actually."

"You and holiday babies."

"Says the guy whose daughter is due on the Fourth of July."

"Once is a fluke, two in a row, that's a pattern."

"Sure." Jimmy wrapped his arm around Tim's shoulders. "Come on, let's get back to the girls."

"Very good plan!"

Tim was dancing with Penny when she said to him, "So, your mom called me."

"Ah." He's been avoiding her. Not that it's too hard what with her living 2000 miles away. But usually he calls once a week and emails a few times, but since he had the flu he's been quiet.

"Seems she hasn't heard from you in a bit more than a month."

"That's likely true. I have sent a few I'm-busy-will-write-more-later emails."

"Yeah, she said that. She's worried. Afraid that becoming a dad is scaring you and you're drawing in on yourself." That's plausible. Given what she knows, that's really plausible, and a very in character way for him to react to something like that. It's just not true.

"What did you say to her?"

"That you're busy. Working hard, getting everything all set for your career change. She hadn't heard about that, so I filled her in on the impending switch to Cybercrime. I told her you were also helping to get a friend married, and no you aren't having a soon-to-be-dad panic attack."

"Thanks."
Penny has a searching look on her face. "You aren't, are you?"

His answering look says Come on, you know me better than that. "The only dad issues I'm having these days don't relate to my ability to be a dad for Kelly. Not directly at least."

"Good. You're going to have to talk to her sooner or later."

"I know. Did you say anything to her about…" Penny shook her head. "No. There are things I want to say to her, but you get first dibs."

"Thank you."

"You'll let me know when you talk to her?"

"Yeah. I will. Just, not right now. As Abby pointed out to me, I may be able to cry silently, but not invisibly, so my she-didn't-know rationalization fell apart, and I don't know what to do with that, and I don't want to talk to her until I've got a plan."

Penny smiles up at him. That's a very, very Tim way of handling something.

The song ended and he led her to the front porch, wanting to talk a little longer without everyone else right nearby. There was a comfortable porch swing, and it was unseasonably warm for early April, so it was quite pleasant out.

"Do you know why they got divorced? I mean, in specific, what the trigger was?" He sitting facing the porch, staring out at trees, a garden, and a gently sloping lawn.

Penny takes the other side of the swing, and sits facing him. "No. Just that your mom had had enough of it and was done. Might be that your grandfather finally got sick enough he wasn't attached to the rest of the world. It wasn't a secret he didn't think your dad was a good match for your mom, and he did all he could to convince her not to marry him, but he also believed that once you got married you stayed married, no matter what. He was pretty well gone when she filed the papers, right?"

Tim thought about that, rubbing his forehead. He didn't like thinking about his grandfather's last two years. The only good thing, if it could be called that, was that his Alzheimer's hit hard and fast. They didn't have decades of him slowly fading away. "Yeah. The Alzheimer's had gotten bad enough he didn't know who anyone was any more."

"If I had to guess, that's why it happened then. Even your grandmother and I were telling her it was time to get out, had been for years. No one was happy."

"Were they fighting, the way my Dad and I were?"

"If so, I didn't know about it. You lived with them, what do you remember?"

"Not that. But I was also a kid and pretty self-centered back then. I know she wasn't happy. But my sense was it had a lot more to do with being abandoned, left alone with two kids six to ten months a year."

"That was my sense, too. Your mom wanted a husband, not just a ring and a name." Tim nodded at that.

Abby poked her head out the door at them. "Can I join in?"
"Sure," Tim answered. She scooted into the space between Tim and Penny on the swing, her back resting against his side, his arm draping over her shoulders.

He kissed her neck. "Talking about my mom."

Abby nodded, expecting that was up when they wandered off.

"I was thinking about the Ketubah, a little, too. Liking that it's spelled out that your job is to stay at home with your wife."

"Sometimes you have to leave, Tim." Penny said.

Tim often forgets that for forty years Penny was a Navy wife, forgets that she built weapons, forgets that it was the fall out of that that made her the pacifist he's known his whole life. "I know. Sometimes you have to fight. Sometimes you have to kill. I'm a cop. I get it. You put your life between your home and danger because it keeps them safe. I really do get it. But I don't think he cared one way or another what Mom thought about it, and I'm certain he didn't care what I thought about it." He shook his head. "That's grim." He squeezed Abby's hand. "Did Breena get ahold of you?"

"Yes!" The grin on her face is bright and happy.

"So, what are your psychic vibes saying, boy or girl?"

She thought about it, holding his hand, her fingers playing along his. "Girl, but I'm not getting any strong feeling on it. How about you, Penny?"

"No psychic vibes for me, but I'm leaning girl, as well. Tim?"

"Little boy. He'll be named after his grandpa."

"Thomas? Ed?" Penny asks, which blindsides Tim. Off the top of his head, he doesn't know the name of Jimmy's dad. The fact that Penny pays enough attention to Ducky's pet people to know that sort of thing pleases him greatly.

"Donald."
"You're not up, yet!"

There are many ways that Tim likes to wake up. There are quite a few more that he tolerates. And some he actively loathes.

Tony looming over him less than six hours after he got home, jogging his shoulder, annoyed he isn't up yet and worried about being late, is closer to option C than A or B.

He's still a little fuzzy as to why Tony stayed at their place last night. He caught something about ritual purity, something else about really celebrating the wedding, Breena said something about bad luck, and there was also something about them having a fully functional guest room that didn't have DiNozzo Senior in it. But it was pretty late, and he was feeling awfully mellow (scotch, good news, and a wedding to celebrate made sure he was feeling pretty happy), so he hadn't been paying all that much attention to what was going on, just that Tony was in the backseat of their car as they pulled away.

But now, as he focuses one eye on the clock on his bedside table, and saw 7:05 glowing away on the readout, he's very temped to flip Tony the bird and tell him to go back to sleep.

What he instead did was sit up, rub his eyes, and say, quietly, (Abby's still asleep.) "Tony, you aren't getting married until 5:15. I am assuming you've got things you are going to want to do after that happens. I know for a fact you don't want to be sleepy for them. So, go back to sleep!"

"Too excited."

Tim sighed, very much wanting to go back to sleep himself. "Tony, go back to sleep. Otherwise you'll crash right around dinnertime, which you don't want to do. There's scotch in the kitchen if you need something to take the edge off. If you can't settle down, go run it off. But you need to go back to sleep. I don't want to see you again until you've had at least three more hours."

Until I've had three more hours.
Tony glared at him, but headed out of his bedroom, and Tim went back to sleep.

"You're not dressed!"

Tony is. He's got the suit on, tie perfect, pocket square pointy, hair in pristine shape. The only thing that's missing is the boutonniere, and that's because they're getting delivered to the wedding site. He's ready to go, vibrating with purpose and excitement.

Tim feels like he just did this. Though he knows it's been four hours.

Tim and Jimmy are in jeans and t-shirts, sitting on Tim's sofa, looking very relaxed.

Jimmy flashes him a this is a job for the best man look. Tim takes a deep breath. "We don't have to leave for another four hours."

So, apparently for his wedding, Tim asked Tony something like ninety-seven times in three hours if he had the rings. Fixating on some little detail and going bonkers over it is apparently traditional groom behavior.

Tony's groom-freak-out has been focused on being late.

They're due at the park at 5:00. The wedding is set to begin at 5:15.

They are going to leave at 3:00 to get there with plenty of time to spare.

It's 11:00.

Tony checks his coat for his keys for the eleventh time, and Tim gets up and pours him a scotch.

He finds it vaguely amusing that he doesn't remember this part of his wedding. Obviously at some point on November 1st 2014 he got out of bed, got a shower, brushed his teeth, probably ate some sort of breakfast, definitely had some coffee. At some slightly later point, Tony and Ducky showed up at his house. Eventually Gibbs came over. He knows he talked with Gibbs, wrote Abby a poem, but the rest of that chunk of time between waking up and getting dressed was pretty blank.
Drink.

Tony stares at the proffered drink like he's never seen one before. "I don't want to."

"Too bad. If you don't relax you're going to snap. So relax."

"Can't be late!"

Tim smiles. "Trust me; they aren't going to start without you."

"Can't let her down."

He puts his hand on Tony's shoulder and squeezes gently, trying to get his friend back in touch with the real world. "We are not going to be late, and you are not going to let Ziva down. The only thing that can happen by going now is us showing up while they're still setting up, and then Breena will yell at you for seeing Ziva before the ceremony. So, look, get out of your tux, put some jeans and a t-shirt on, and let's go see a movie."

Jimmy's just sitting on the sofa nodding. "If you don't cool down, you'll pop a blood vessel before the wedding, and that will make you late. As your doctor, I am prescribing you an ounce of forty proof ethyl alcohol. Drink."

"When did you become my doctor?" Tony asks, and shoots back the liquor.

"Day before yesterday. Now, you need to relax, sooo..." Jimmy's got his phone out and is googling what movies are showing and when. "Deadpool came out Friday."

"Ooohhh..." Tim looks pretty excited at that.

Tony rolls his eyes. Tim and Jimmy geeking out seems to have helped focused him on something other than pre-wedding jitters. "You want to take me to a Marvel movie?"

"An NC-17 one that's only showing in one theatre in the greater DC area," Jimmy says looking at his phone. "Got a showing at 11:30. We can grab a fast lunch, watch it, and still have plenty of time to get dressed and to the park."
Two hours later, they're back in the light, Tony is blinking a little, and saying, "That's the sort of stuff in those comic books? No wonder you're constantly reading them."

"Deadpool's something of a special case, Tony. He's not exactly Batman or Superman or Wolverine or Professor X," Tim says.

"By which Tim means this is the only character who constantly breaks the fourth wall, let alone starts the movie by slaughtering everyone involved in making the last movie he was in."

"Gotta admit that Hugh Jackman-Deadpool fight was awfully cool," Tim replies. The guys who made this thing really got Deadpool, it was a massive, meta-breaking, self-referential, no-holds-barred fan-fest. He's fairly sure no one expected to make a cent on it and they did it for the fun of the characters. He does know that he was reacting in a manner that was rather inappropriate for a thirty-seven-year-old man, and that Abby would have probably referred to what he was doing as 'mad fangirl squeezing.'

"Yeah. So are those movies usually that violent?" Tony asks.

Tim laughs. "Nothing says contemplating binding my love to yours for the rest of my life like 220 corpses in the first ninety seconds of the film."

"Yeah, it wasn't exactly just-about-to-get-married material."

"Got your mind off of it, didn't it?" Jimmy says, sliding behind the wheel of his car.

"Talking about movies," Tim says, bucking his seat belt. "Did Gibbs get the book to Ziva?"

"Assuming everything's going right with the girls, yeah. I gave it to him last night."

"Good."

Ziva woke to the sound of knocking at her door. It took her a second to figure out where she was, but then it clicked. She, Gibbs, Ducky and Penny, and Schmiel had stayed at the B&B. Heading all the way back into DC when you didn't want to go home (because home had the empty bed in it) didn't make much sense.

So they stayed.

And at exactly ten o'clock, way after her usual wake up, Gibbs was doing exactly what he told her he'd do, give her a wake up knock.

"I'm up."

He poked his head in tentatively. "Can I come in?"

"Certainly."

"Got some things for you." Things appeared to be a steaming hot mug of coffee and a small rectangle wrapped in white and silver paper.

He sat on the side of the bed, next to her, handed her the coffee, kissed her cheek, and then laid the package in front of her.

"Wedding present?"
He nodded. "From Tony."

That got a smile out of Ziva. "What is it?"

The expression on his face said, open it and find out. So she did. It was a book. A journal really, a nice one, hard bound, black leather, white satin ribbon between the pages. She opened to the marked page and saw the page was covered in Tony's handwriting. She flipped through the pages seeing all of them, every single page of the entire book, was covered in his handwriting.

She returned to the marked page, figuring he had marked it for a reason and read: "Have you never met a woman who inspires you to love? Until your every sense is filled with her? You inhale her. You taste her. You see your unborn children in her eyes and know that your heart has found a home. Your life begins with her, and surely without her it must end." –Don Juan DeMarco.

At first she felt the rush of those words. An almost hot thrill through her body, knowing that he had found them and written them for her, for a second she floated on it, eyes lingering over the curve of his letters, the image of him writing it down, filling her mind's eye.

Then there was curiosity. "Who is Don Juan DeMarco?"

Gibbs shrugged. "I think it's a what."

"A what?" Ziva looked taken aback. Don Juan DeMarco did not sound like the name of a what.

"Tim and Tony were talking about this. Movie quotes. All the ones that make sense to him now you're in his life." He'd been there when the two of them got talking about if they had to be quotes from movies Tony had actually seen. He'd found some he really liked that were in movies he would never voluntarily watch, and they were debating over if it was enough that he just really liked them or if he actually had to have a connection to them. They'd gotten to the crime scene before they finished that conversation, so Gibbs never heard how it ended.

Ziva inhaled quickly, felt the sting of tears in her in her eyes, and exhaled slowly. "Oh."

"Yeah." Gibbs smiled. "Abby and Breena should be here in an hour. Thought you might like some time to read."

Ziva wiped her eyes, nodding, and flipped to the first page. "I love that after I spend the day with you, I can still smell your perfume on my clothes. And I love that you are the last person I want to talk to before I go to sleep at night...I came here tonight because when you realize you want to spend the rest of your life with someone, you want the rest of your life to start as soon as possible." – When Harry Met Sally

Gibbs kissed her one more time and got up to leave her with her present.

As he prepares for his third wedding in two and a half years, Tim's come to a few conclusion.

A: It is much easier to be the best man than the groom, and easier to be a guest than the best man. This is not to say that he didn't love his own wedding, but he can feel that he was much more 'present' at Jimmy's wedding, and he can feel that's going to be true for Tony's as well. That outside of himself feeling that was with him all through his wedding isn't here today, and he appreciates it, because he can really be in the moment now and enjoy this.

B: He doesn't love public speaking. Which is why guest is superior to Best Man. Though he does think his speech is pretty good.

C: Small weddings are better than big ones. They had thirty-eight people at theirs, and part of the whole Groom thing was working the crowd, seeing everyone, talking to them, spending some time with them, and honestly, it was exhausting. Which is, once again, not to say he wasn't happy to see everyone, but still, it was tiring. If he and Abby ever renew their vows, it'll be their family and that's it. Tony and Ziva got the guest list down to twenty-two, and Tim's thinking that's a pretty good number of people for a party.

D: He is deeply, profoundly grateful that the people he loves have found their own loves.

In all honestly, McGee and Palmer laughing at him about the whole being nervous about not being on time thing aside (because it's 4:30, the wedding doesn't start for 45 minutes, and now they've just got to sit there and wait), Tony's a whole lot less freaked out right now than he expected to be.

Really, he was fairly certain he'd be on the verge of throwing up right now.

But he's not.

He's sitting in a fairly small tent with McGee, Palmer, Ducky, and Senior, and feeling, honestly, pretty cool. It's like now that he's here he can't mess it up. He owns it, and it's time to get going.

He's ready for this.

He's playing with Ziva's ring. As per the tradition it's a plain, gold band. White gold so it'll go with her engagement ring. It's his, because the gift must be something belonging to the groom. On the inside of it, he had inscribed at lo levad/you are not alone. He'd wanted the symbol of the promise in both languages. Wanted a somewhat nebulous idea that started the day she left for Israel to bury her father and was coming to fruition today, to rest against her skin for the rest of her life.

And in a little over half an hour, it will.

"Can I get a minute with Junior?" Senior asked the others. That surprised Tony, yes, they have been getting along better this last year but one on one heart to hearts are still really rare.
Okay, non-existent. Of course, getting married is not-well, for him at least, Senior's a different story, he thinks his dad was married five times by the time he was his age—an everyday sort of thing.

"Dad?" Tony asked after the other guys had filed out.

"She's a beautiful girl, Junior. She's strong and capable and doesn't take any of your bullshit and loves you dearly and I am so happy you found a woman like that. She looks at you the way your mother used to look at me. So take some advice from a man who had the love of his life and screwed it up: you will be vastly better off if you put her first. There are things you're going to want, things that will bring a quick flush of pleasure or make you happy for a few days, there are things she is going to want that will scare the living hell out of you, and avoiding those things might make you feel good, make you feel safe.

"But that's happiness. And happiness is shallow and easy. But for you, Ziva's the path to joy. You stay with her, you put her first, you be the man I know you can be, and you will find joy and peace and a home and family worth having.

"I screwed things up with your mom. I screwed them up with you. And I spent fifty years chasing happy, because it was easy, and avoiding joy because it was hard and scary. Don't make my mistakes. It looks like you've figured that out, but, I wanted to say it to you. Wanted you to hear it."

"Thanks."

"You're a better man than I am, keep it up, and you'll build a marriage and life that when you're my age, you'll look back at and cherish."

"I intend to."

His father is smiling, a genuine, warm and loving smile. "Good. Everyone talks about the vows, the promises you make her, and they matter, matter more than almost anything, but you also need to make some promises to yourself, promises to support your vows to her. Promise yourself to avoid temptation. Promise yourself that you will commit to lasting joy and not transitory pleasure. And promise yourself to remember that she is what makes your life worth living."

"I will, Dad."

"Good. Okay, enough seriousness." Senior checked his watch. "Ten more minutes to go."

"Almost ready?" Jimmy asks. Having been booted out of the guy's tent he wandered over to see how Team Bride was doing.

From the looks of it the correct answer was, almost done. Abby and Breena are dressed. Gibbs has everything but his tie done. Ziva's almost ready to go, probably just finished her makeup and needs to get into her dress.

They look like they're within five minutes of being ready for show time.

Breena kisses him, twirls a little, flaring the skirt of her dress. "Almost ready. Just a few finishing touches. How are things on your side?"

"All ready to go. Granted, Tony's been ready to go since 5:15 this morning if what Tim tells me is true."
"Should have had him here then. Could have gotten the site finished and let us sleep longer." Schmiel adds.

"And what are they doing now?" Ziva asks as she drapes Gibbs' bow tie around his neck.

"Senior wanted a moment alone with Junior, so off we went. Tim and Ducky are checking in with the Rabbi making sure everything is set on that side."

"Good." Abby says.

"I should probably head back to the guys. Let them know things are all set over here." Jimmy kisses Breena one more time, then heads to Ziva, kissing her cheek, and to Abby for one last smooch. He smiles at Gibbs, wraps his arm around his shoulder and says, "You know, it's a very fine thing to spend your life surrounded by beautiful women!"

Gibbs grins and gently shoves Jimmy toward the entryway.

Tim would say this for Tony and Ziva's wedding, it is, without a doubt, the most beautiful and elegant wedding he's ever seen.

April in DC can mean everything green and pink with cherry blossoms, or it can mean gray and cold.

They got green and soft pink and warm spring breezes.

The chuppah is in a grove of Cherry trees. It's covered in gauzy white fabric and daisy chains of baby pink, cream, and white roses, ivy, and more cherry blossoms.

Team Bride (The girl part of it at least. Abby told him Gibbs and Schmiel are in black.) is in white. Abby and Breena are in cream, strapless, empire waist gowns, each with a light pink band of beading under the breasts, and both of them with more cherry blossoms in their hair.

Team Groom is in black, broken only by white dress shirts and cream rose boutonnieres.
And the festivities are about to begin.

Traditionally, the grandparents would go first. But there are no grandparents, so the procession is beginning with the Rabbi.

He takes his place under the chuppah and is followed by Tim and Jimmy. Usually the groom would be escorted by his parents, or his father and the father of the bride. But this group is short on parents, too. So Ducky and Senior walk Tony to the chuppah and stop a few steps away. Both of them hug him before going to their seats in the front row, next to their ladies. Tony steps beneath the chuppah on his own, showing that he is entering this marriage of his own free will.

In his left hand, Tim's holding a glass in a white velvet bag. For his wedding Tony held the rings. For Tony's he's holding a glass. The objects change, but the job is the same: be the guy holding the thing that says, 'we're married.'

The girls come next. Breena and Abby, and Tim lights up to see his wife, beautiful in white and pink, light breeze fluttering her skirt and the tendrils of her hair. He smiles at her, and she smiles back at him. And he knows they're here for Tony and Ziva, but like with Jimmy's wedding he knows that today he'll make, remake the promises that bind them together.

Thoughts of that are sidetracked by Ziva, escorted by Gibbs and Schmiel.

And it is true that to Tim, Abby is the most beautiful woman on Earth. Heart, mind, soul, and body: she is his definition of beauty.

It is also true that Tim is not blind, and appreciates feminine beauty in its many forms.

And Ziva, in a long, flowing spill of... he's not even sure what color it is, ivory or cream with little silver threads maybe, hair long and loose, decorated with a few cherry blossoms, a translucent veil of shimmering silk skimming over her face and shoulders, is gorgeous.
He hears Tony see her. There's a fast, sharp, almost whistling intake of breath. And he's behind Tony so he can't see the expression on his face, but he sees his shoulders go tight, and his posture straighten up a little further.

The three of them pause about ten feet before the chuppah. Both Gibbs and Schmiel kiss her cheek, then they too go to sit in the front row, Ziva takes three steps on her own, showing that she too comes to this marriage of her own free will. Then Tony joins her, takes her hand, and leads her into the chuppah, a space designed to represent the home they will share for the rest of their days.

He lifts the veil from her face and the ceremony begins.

Once again the Ketubah is read, and this time wine is drunk to go with it, celebrating the union.

Unlike the Christian tradition the rings are not blessed, and the vows are only one line, but as Tony takes Ziva's hand in his, and repeats the Rabbi's words, "Haray ata mekudash lee beh-taba'at zo keh-dat Moshe veh-Israel,/* he's smiling brilliantly, crying a little, and more deeply, sincerely happy than Tim's ever seen him.

The gesture repeats, Ziva placing the ring on Tony's finger, repeating the words, glowing with love and joy, and Tim catches Abby's eye, and tries to send all of the love, all of the joy, all of the contentment and peace and euphoria that life with her has given him in a look, and maybe he didn't quite get it all across, because how could anything get all of that across, but he sees the answering love in her look, and the gentle slide of her fingers across her tummy, and he's not even sure it's possible to accurately sum that feeling up.

What he does know is that if he doesn't stop exchanging googoo eyes with Abby he's going to be late with the glass, and since he's only got one job during the ceremony, he can't mess it up. After all, he doesn't want Tony wishing he'd picked Jimmy for best man. Of course, Jimmy's probably giving Breena the exact same look and is probably paying even less attention to the proceedings that Tim is, because he doesn't actually have to do anything other than stand there.

So Tim flashes her a quick smile, starts paying attention to the ceremony again, watching the two of them kiss with both tenderness and passion, and made sure the glass was where it needed to be so Tony could smash it.

"Mazel Tov!"

Chapter End Notes

* Behold, you are consecrated to me with this ring according to the laws of Moses and Israel.
The Yichud

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Tradition holds that the bride and groom have a few minutes alone after the ceremony, so as the guests milled about and the photographer got shots of everyone, Tony and Ziva got to actually see each other, alone, for the first time today.

Tony actually feels a little silly. There's this huge grin on his face that won't go away, and he almost wants to babble at her, she's so beautiful and he's feeling so… so something, so much of whatever it is he can't dig individual feelings out of it.

She's smiling at him, brilliant joy on her face.

He stands in front of her, hands on her waist, and for a long second just looks, his eyes trailing from her hair to lashes, lips to throat.

Finally he got it together enough to say, "Hi."

She started to giggle at that, peals of laughter, gasping breath, tears streaming down her face and pulled him close, holding him flush against her, her face pressed into his chest, arms tight on his waist. That set off his laughter, he felt it bubbling out of him.

Eventually they calmed down, and she looked up at him, warm, bright smile on her face.

"Hi?"

He kissed her, lips soft and gentle on hers, eyes sparkling with joy. "Hello, Mrs. DiNozzo."

She brushed her fingers through his hair, and then over his lips. "Mrs. DiNozzo. It's hard to believe it is real."

His fingers found hers, stroked over her wedding band. He took her hand in his and kissed her it. "It's real." One more kiss, to her lips again. "I love you, Ziva."

"I love you," she murmured against his lips.

For a long moment they stood there, holding each other, enjoying the closeness and intimacy the outside world rarely gets to see. They could hear the buzz of conversation outside of the tent, but for a little while longer it would just be them, together, in love, and now, married.

Chapter End Notes

Just a quickie today. More wedding stuff tomorrow!
A Reception

They returned to DC for the reception. The Ruther’s Estate Country Club had the advantage of being located not too far away from everyone’s homes, having a small, intimate space they could eat in, and beautiful gardens (more blooming cherry trees) set with a dance floor.

Which was when it occurred to Tim that there is a downside of a small wedding. When you’re the best man and maid of honor in a wedding with twenty-four people, it’s pretty hard to just slip away for ten or so minutes.

Everyone can tell at a glance if someone is missing.

So you need a distraction.

Unfortunately Tony and Ziva’s wedding seemed to be really short on distractions. Scrumptious food, swing music, beautiful settings (cherry trees wrapped in white Christmas lights, tea lights flickering in crystal vases, and everything decked in white and pink roses and more cherry blossoms), an elegant white on white cake, all of that was available aplenty. Ten minutes where no one was looking for them, not so much.

He’d scouted the terrain two weeks ago when he and Tony showed up to pay the last deposit and make sure the arrangements were all set. The garden was more or less made for trysting. It had about six little alcoves, some even with benches, tucked away from the sight of pretty much everyone else.

He’d found an especially nice one: maybe ten by ten, high stone wall covered in ivy on two sides, hedge on the third and half of the fourth, two weeping willows bracketed a small stone koi pond, and a wrought iron bench sat right next to it. All he had to do was get them there.

Apparently Jimmy was having a similar issue. The girls were dancing with Schmiel and Gibbs, when Jimmy drifted over to him and asked, “How long is your speech?”

Tim thought it through. “Three minutes, maybe a little faster if I talk quickly.”

Jimmy thought about that. “Too fast. What if you talk slow and ad lib some.”

“No! I’m horrible at ad libbing. Talk slow I can maybe get it to five. Why?”

Jimmy smiled dryly. “The same reason you want me to do something to draw attention away from you and Abby.”
Tim laughed at that. “Properly celebrating the wedding?”

“Yeah.” Jimmy’s grinning. “This is so much easier when there’s fifty people around.”

“I’m noticing that.” He thought about something else for a second. “Did you slip off during my wedding?”

“Of course. No one’s looking at anyone other than the bride and groom during the cake part.”

“Good point.” Tim eyes the cake. “That’ll probably take a few minutes.”

“Schmiel tells me singing is traditionally part of celebrating a Jewish wedding.”

Tim nodded. “You could probably get him to sing something with you right after that.”

“I probably could. You could probably get Abby to come up with a quick, off the cuff toast to go with yours.”

“I probably could.”

They’ve both got wide smiles on their faces, satisfaction at having a plan in place.

So, five months pregnant means the traditional up against the wall quickie is out. (Which was why Tim was scouting the territory ahead of time. Every building on Earth has a chunk of wall in a somewhat-less-than-easily-accessible location, finding a place to sit or kneel is more of a challenge.)

But when the MC called everyone together for the cutting of the cake, he took Abby’s hand, whispered in her ear, “Jimmy bought us ten minutes,” and they edged away from everyone else, deeper into the garden.

And like the last two times, it’s fast, and naughty, and so wrong, and feels so good, and he’s just so incredibly in love with this woman.
He’s sitting across the bench, and she’s in his lap, one leg snug between his hips and the back of the bench, other foot on the ground, and that position’s intentional, he wants to look her in the eye, touch her face, kiss her. Face to face sex is getting rarer as Kelly gets bigger, but this still works for the time being.

He’s babbling a little, telling her how much he loves her, how good she feels. But he feels her breath on his thumb as he draws it across her lower lip, and that focuses him, makes him very aware of his own breath, and he remembers a promise he made to her silently at Jimmy and Breena’s wedding, and out loud the day after he almost froze to death, one he modified a little for his wedding vows.

“From this day to my last, I will be here and I will love you.” He kisses her, holding her face in his hands as she stills on him. “This breath to my last and all the ones in between are yours, Abby.”

She’s smiling brilliantly, then kisses him, slipping against him, spreading a flush of pleasure through him. “This life and the next, Tim, I will always love you.” Those words carried him over the edge, and a second later she joined him, shuddering in wet, joyful pulses.

Namaste. They’d been talking about it a few days ago. Abby had gotten a new yoga video. They’d both decided it was time to try some new moves. The video started and ended with that, and he’d been under the impression it was more or less Hindi for hello/goodbye. Abby thought it was a bit deeper than that. Thirty seconds of googling later and half an hour of reading showed they were both right. But, deeper meant something like the (insert good thing here, love, joy, intellect, whatever) in my soul recognizes yours. For the most part for Tim it’s just a word, but right now he feels it.

The love in his soul rejoicing at the love in hers, floating in Tony and Ziva’s, Jimmy and Breena’s, and reveling it. That’s probably as close to metaphysical as he’ll ever get, but that’s fine.

They’re here, together, celebrating the love that makes life rich, vibrant, and glorious.
“And how does it feel to know you have gotten all of your ‘kids’ married off?” Ducky asks Jethro as he sits next to him.

“Not bad at all, Duck, not bad at all.” He’s got a soft smile on his face as he watches Tony and Ziva dance with each other.

“I’d imagine it is satisfying to have all your dear ones settled.”

“Not all of them.”

Ducky sends Gibbs a questioning look.

Gibbs’ gaze lands on Penny, who’s dancing with Tim and Abby. “Might be nice to be the best man at one of these things.”

Ducky smiles at that, then shook his head a little. “I’m afraid best man duty will be confined to Fornell’s wedding.”

Gibbs’ eyebrows shot up. He had thought Ducky and Penny were getting on very well. Ducky sees the alarm in his expression and says, “Nothing like that Jethro. We are old. Our estates and wills are set, and a marriage would only complicate things. Her semester at the University of Pennsylvania will be ending in May, and after that, Penny will be buying half of my home, and we will vest full rights of survivorship upon each other.”

Gibbs nods. That makes sense to him.

“Beyond that, we have comfortable retirements set up. She does not need my money, nor I hers.
However, if you were to feel like hosting an intimate family celebration in our honor come May, I can assure you that would be welcome. If you like, you can even give a speech.” There’s a slightly teasing tone in Ducky’s voice as he says that.

“Just might.”

“Perhaps you’d set the record for the shortest best man’s toast?”

“Maybe.” Gibbs grins.

Ducky watches as Jimmy cuts in, whirling Penny away from Tim and Abby, Breena joining them. He looks away from them to Jethro’s hand, where his wedding band is still on his fourth finger.

“I find it somewhat amusing to think that this late in my life, I’ve found, for all practical purposes a wife, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. I find it more amusing to see how intensely happy it makes me, and how stupid I feel for not having sought it out sooner.”

Gibbs nods, looking away from the dance floor to Ducky.

“Jethro, do not wait until you’re my age to go after it. You’re so close to having what you want out of life. Don’t keep waiting until your days are numbered in years and not decades.”

“I’m getting there, Duck.”

“Good.”

One of the upsides of a twentyish person wedding is that it’s pretty easy to get everyone’s attention when it’s time for the Best Man toast. Likewise, Tim knows everyone in this group, it’s family and close friends, hell, the only person here he doesn’t know is Daphine, so it’s not like this is nerve wracking.

Which is good, because he really doesn’t love public speaking.

But it’s time. The DJ gives him the microphone, which seems a little weird, there’s not a lot of people and they’re in a fairly small room, but messing with it buys Jimmy and Breena, who vanished ten seconds ago, another forty seconds.

Tony and Ziva are watching him, Ziva sitting in Tony’s lap, Tony’s arms wrapped around her, her head resting against his shoulder.

Tim smiles at them and begins. “Sometimes you can look at two people and know. They just fit. Where the one zigs the other zags and you can line them up like the edges of the jigsaw puzzle.” He puts the mic down and twines his fingers together, demonstrating the idea. That being exactly as far as he’s willing to go when it comes to ad libbing. If he goes any further off script, this’ll become a rambling disaster.

“And then there’s Tony and Ziva, who did everything they possibly could for as long as humanly possible to deny it.” Tim had been addressing the room, but he turned to face them. “I’d like to take this moment to say something to both of you, something I’ve been waiting almost a decade to say…

“I told you so!”

Tim was very pleased to see that get a laugh. He’d been fairly nervous that line would fall flat or they’d take it wrong, but fortunately, like Abby said it would, it went over well.

“Ten years ago my first book came out. And in that book ‘Tommy’ and ‘Lisa’ took one look at each other and fell madly in lust. Two books later it had grown into love. Meanwhile these two were doing everything in their power to pretend that’s just so not happening. To the point of this one,” he pointed to Ziva, “actually called me up, made me come to her home, and hit me upside the back of the head with the book when they first said, ‘I love you.’ Hard!”

He paused again, letting the laughter run down, and heard Tony say quietly, “Hello, Pot, it’s Kettle, you’re black.”

He smiled at Tony and nodded, acknowledging that technically, he and Abby had taken even longer, then continued, “And the only reason he didn’t do exactly the same thing was because he didn’t read that book until after they had hooked up.”

Tim paused again, let the laughing die down, and finished up, “So, I’ll admit, standing here at your wedding, having spent more than a decade watching you two finally own up to the fact that you fit, perfectly, to feeling, well, a little vindicated and a whole lot smug.” Tim grinned, laid his hand on Tony’s shoulder, and kissed Ziva’s cheek, his voice shifting to something less humorous, more sincere. “And I’m also feeling deeply, profoundly grateful that you two did figure it out, and that I am here to see you celebrate your love and your commitment to spending the rest of your lives together, because if there ever were two people who deserved the joy of finding the one who fits, it’s you two.”

Tim lifted his glass. “To Tony and Ziva and the love and life they’ll share.”

They’d all drunk, and he was getting ready to hand the microphone to Abby to stretch it out a little longer when he saw Jimmy and Breena sneak back in. He raised his eyebrow, and Jimmy nodded. Tim smirked, that was, at most, four and a half minutes. He doesn’t know if he should be jealous of Jimmy or pity him.
He got Jimmy alone an hour later. “Four and a half minutes?”

“Four and a quarter, had to get there and back.”

Which made Tim realize that fifteen seconds of getting there and back meant they were literally right outside the dining room, probably about two feet away from the sliding glass door that separated it from the garden, and in full view of anyone who might have walked outside.

“How do you even do that?”

Jimmy grinned, wide, happy, no filters in place, vast wedges of TMI about to come sloshing out, and Tim quickly held up a hand saying, “In general, don’t need specifics.”

Jimmy’s grin didn’t waver. “Practice.”

Tim laughed. “Time to grab Tony and give him his present?”

Jimmy checked his watch: 10:35. They’d probably want to wrap things up sooner rather than later. “Yeah, I think so.”

“I’ll get him. You get it. Meet at my car?”

“Sounds good.”

Tony was dancing with Ziva, and Tim decided to wait for the song to end before wandering over. “Can I borrow your husband, Mrs. DiNozzo?”

Tony’s looking at him curiously, wondering what’s going on. Ziva’s smiling. “And will you return him promptly?”

“Won’t take more than fifteen minutes.”

Now he’s really got Tony’s attention.

“Then you may have him.”

“Good. Come on.” He’s smiling brightly, really enjoying the wary look on Tony’s face as he follows Tim into the parking lot.

“Okay, why are you dragging me out here?” He sees Jimmy leaning against Tim’s car. “Okay, why are both of you dragging me out here?”

“He’s dragging, I’m lying in wait,” Jimmy says.

Tony notices the bag sitting next to Jimmy on the hood of Tim’s car.

“What is that?”

Tim slaps him on the shoulder, and Jimmy laughs, both of them really enjoying this.

Tim starts: “We know you wanted something a lot sexier for your bachelor party, and well, neither of us may be big on strip clubs and lap dances from strangers, but we’re also firmly in favor of you having a hell of a good time with your wife. So…”

Jimmy hands him the bag. It’s a plain, brown paper, Whole Food’s bag, and it’s heavy. “Honeymoon fun pack.”
“Oh God, what the hell is in there?” Tony’s looking halfway between really disturbed and ready to burst out laughing as he looks into it.

“Fun stuff,” Jimmy says, “Lube—“

“Good stuff, lasts forever, won’t dry out,” Tim adds.

“Condoms—“

“Why do I want condoms? What am I, fifteen?”

Tim rolls his eyes, and Jimmy gives him a really, you need us to spell it out look. Tony stares at them and then seems to get what they’re talking about and a very dirty smile spreads across his face as he says, “Oh.”

“More lube that actually tastes good,” Jimmy’s talking, but Tim’s shaking his head no. Of course, he doesn’t like any of the flavored ones just as a matter of principle, but Breena liked the variety pack they got, and Abby said it was good, too. And, well, yeah, he didn’t mind the ‘homework’ that Abby did on multiple brands to see what the good ones were. And he’s assuming Jimmy likewise approved of Breena’s test of lube flavor. Jimmy’s still talking and Tim think’s he missed a few sentences there, but caught back up with, “…Tim added some satin ropes. Cock ring, since you’ve mentioned the can’t-get-it-up-six-times-a-day thing, that’ll help with that. Fourteen little blue pills, too, don’t take more than one of them a day, okay?”

Tony’s stunned by that. “Wait, what?”

“You forgot Jimmy can write prescriptions, didn’t you?” Tim says, while Jimmy just keeps grinning.

“I don’t need—“

Jimmy cut in, “Neither of us think you do. Just, assuming you, or more importantly Ziva, doesn’t want to leave your hotel room, you’ve got back up now.” Jimmy’s having way too good a time with this, his smile is so big his face looks in danger of cracking.

Tony’s staring at him curiously. “Is that what you meant by ‘day before yesterday’?”

Jimmy nods.

Tim takes over on the inventory. “Let’s see, three different vibrators, batteries for them, that’s part of why it’s heavy. There’s an adaptor for the one that plugs in.”

Tony’s staring into the bag. “How many batteries are in there?”

“You guys know I’ve had sex before? A whole lot of sex.”

“Sure. Hence this stuff, you’re going to have to go deep to find new stuff, and we’ve made sure you’ve got everything you need to whip something new out on Ziva,” Jimmy says.

“LED candles for mood lighting.” Tim picked up a small, nicely-wrapped rectangle. It’s even got a bow on it. “What’s this?”

“No idea. Breena stuck it in there.” Jimmy sorted through a bit and came up with another, larger, also wrapped square. Tim recognized the wrapping paper on this one. “Abby added one, too.”
“Huh. We don’t know what the girls thought you’d need, but it’s in there.”

“What is this?” Tony’s holding something that looks like a collection of small to larger spheres on a flexible plastic rod.

“Tim’s idea.” Jimmy adds, clearly signaling wouldn’t touch it with a ten foot pole let alone buy them for you.

Tim catches that and says, “What? They’re fun.”

Tony drops them back into the bag. “If I’ve already got condoms for that, why do I want those?”

Tim looks really cocky, and Tony’s wondering exactly how much he’s had to drink. “Who says they’re for her? I mean, I guess you could use them on her, but she doesn’t have a prostate, so…”

Tony closes his eyes and winces a little. “Okay, that’s way more than I needed to know about you.”

Tim took one last thing out of the bag. “And, this took a little hacking and is not the most strictly legal thing ever, but pack your stuff, put one of these stickers on it, and TSA and whatever they’ve got in South Africa’ll leave them alone.”

“You got me diplomatic clearance for my sex toys?” Tony’s holding the stickers, staring at them, and then burst into hysterical laughter.

“Hey, there’s a reason we didn’t honeymoon anywhere we had to fly to. You don’t want them messing in your stuff,” Tim says when Tony stops laughing.

“Yeah, some of our toys, the expensive ones, got stolen when we went on our honeymoon. I mean, who steals sex toys? I’d assume that’s not the sort of thing you want used,” Jimmy adds.

“Ullg.” Tim replies, shuddering.

“Yeah.” Then Jimmy hugs Tony. “Congratulations. Go have fun.”

Tim joins the hug. “So happy for you. Really.”

Link

He’s dancing with Abby when an idea hit. “How about Dana?”

She didn’t look like she was following him with that. “Dana?”

“Kelly Dana…”

Abby thinks about that for a minute, seeming to hear it in her mind, then something else hit. “How about we don’t name our daughter after a woman you fantasize about having sex with?”

Tim laughs at that request. “You asked me for strong, kick-ass, female characters I love. Guess what? I fantasize about all of them.”

“All of them?”

He’s nodding. “Strong, kick-ass women I love, why wouldn’t I?”
She thinks about that and smiles. “Good point.”

“Kelly Abigail? Name her after the strong, kick-ass woman I love the most?” He kissed her as he finished that sentence.

She’s smiling, pleased by the idea, but it’s not something she wants. “No. One Abby’s enough.”

“It means father’s joy, and that’s certainly true. Sounds good, too.”

“Your right on both of them, and I’m still using my veto on it.”

“Fine.”

Breena came over a second later. “They’re getting ready to go, so time to get the bubbles out.”

Abby nods.

“I’ll get them,” Tim says, they’re in the trunk of his car.

It was well past midnight when they gathered under the cherry trees, blowing bubbles, sending Tony and Ziva on their way.
The Wedding Album

Bits and pieces that didn't quite make it into the story/images with no plot that I wanted to share. All captions have a link embedded and that link will take you to the original source.

Middle of Nowhere Park before set up.

After signing the ketubah.
Gibbs dancing with Ziva at the reception, the father/daughter dance. Him in a black tux, her in the white wedding dress. He has his hands cupped around her face, kissing her forehead.

Ketubah close up.

At the post-work impromptu David-DiNozzo engagement party.
Picking up the marriage license.

Close up on Tony and Ziva’s face during the first dance, and the look of all-encompassing love in both of their eyes.

Tony and Ziva’s last dance, he’s holding her close, and they’re moving slower, less flirty, much more intense, ready for the next part of the night to begin. His fingers rest against her cheek and lip, and her eyes are open with an invitation to touch more.
Hugs and smooches for the soon to be FIL

After the signing of the ketubah, at the B&B, Senior dancing with Ziva. Her head is back, eyes closed, she’s laughing. He’s got a wicked smile on his face, having just told her a very dirty and completely inappropriate joke.

Schmiel, Ducky, and Senior, sitting at the table, talking about something, all of them happy and laughing.
Ducky and Abby all dressed up for the Ketubah signing.

Ducky twirling Penny away from him on the dance floor. If it was video you’d see him take one step over, and Penny spin under his arm, coming flush to his chest again. The bodies get older and slower, but they remember the moves and the joy of them.

Tim and Abby dancing together at the reception. She’d kicked her shoes off. His tie was loose, top button undone. Her head rested on his shoulder. Both of them had their eyes closed. She had one hand on his shoulder, and he was holding her other one (though you can’t see that in the shot), his other hand rested against her belly.

When he got a copy of it, it went behind his desk, below the sonogram, with “Dancing with my girls” written on the bottom left.
An hour to go, time to head to the site.

Gibbs and his girls. He’s standing in the middle, Abby on his left, arm around him. Breena’s on his right, head on his shoulder. Ziva’s in front, he has his arms wrapped around her. The photographer forgot everyone’s names almost before he’d been told them, but no one corrected him when he called Gibbs “Father of the Bride.”

Tim made sure to get a copy of it. Abby framed it. Come Father’s Day, Gibbs was getting a present.

Gibbs and his boys. He’s got an arm around Tony, his hand on Tim’s shoulder, and Jimmy’s leaning against Tim’s other side.
Tim made sure to get a copy of that, too. It’s also getting framed and wrapped. If Kelly co-operates and shows up a little early, he’s going to get one of Gibbs holding Kelly and Molly to make up a triptych for him.

Full shot of the Gibbs clan. Jimmy and Breena on the left, Ducky and Penny next to them, Tim and Abby, Gibbs next to her, Ziva on his other side Tony beside her, and Senior taking the right.

Bridal bouquet ready to go.

Profile shot, Tim and Jimmy leaning against the bar, drinks in hand, looking away from the camera.

It’s out of the shot, but they’re watching Abby and Breena dance with each other. But it’s very clear on their faces they’re seeing something deeply satisfying that they enjoy immensely.

Abby and Breena dancing. Abby’s leading. Breena has her head on Abby’s shoulder. Both of them are smiling.

About three minutes later, all four of them dancing together.

Tony holding a bite of cake, wide smile, eyes sparkling, Ziva leaning very far back, wary expression on her face, not sure if he’s going to try and smush it into her face or not.

Half a minute later, Ziva kissing the tip of his finger after eating the bite of cake, pleased that he didn’t try to smush it on her.
The garden/dining/dance area
Shaving

It's not until he's attempting to take all of his body hair below his eyelashes off that it occurs to Tim that he has a lot of it.

In fact, until he's standing in the bathroom, trimmer in hand, he'd considered himself to be a very hairless guy.

This is probably the result of having roomed with Tony or Gibbs hundreds of times, and both of them are fuzzy. Tony's practically got a pelt, and Gibbs is certainly covered in hair, too. (Granted, that hair is white, so it's a little more subtle than Tony's, but still, there's a ton of it.)

Meanwhile Tim's got, (or so he thought) about seventy-three chest hairs (three quarters of which are blond and practically invisible) all in the center of his chest, maybe twenty-two more that trail from his navel to his pubes, a fairly small and soft patch of pubic hair, about six stray hairs on his balls, two, small underarm tufts, thin and fine light brown leg hair, and that's pretty much it. Not much hair, at all.

Of course, his self-assessment on this might have something to do with how rarely he really looks at himself in a mirror. Especially looks at himself naked, actually trying to see how much body hair he has.

And, really staring at himself, he suddenly seems to have tons of it. (Seriously, when did he get hair on his feet, let alone his toes? Sure it's like two hairs per toe, but when the hell did that happen? He's fairly sure he didn't always have hair on his toes, but for the life of him he can't remember the last time he really looked at his naked feet.) And suddenly taking it all off seems like an insane idea. He knows Abby can shave her legs in like, six minutes, but as he's looking at his, it seems like it should take a whole lot longer, and maybe he doesn't need to take it all off, he's a guy after all...

On the other hand, her legs feel great after she shaves them… And it's not like there'll be a lot of time for stuff like this in the future… And he's not thinking about making a real habit of it, he just wants to see what it feels like… So…

He fires up the trimmer and gets to work.

Abby is supposed to be out for another two hours. That's the plan. She'd be go out, he'd get himself all hairless and naked, and then they'd spend the rest of the afternoon in bed, get dressed up, head out to dinner, then more sex before the hair starts to grow back in and gets all prickly.

And he is very diligently working away on that goal. He's decided that one pass with the trimmer over everything is a good first step, then he'll get the razors and go to town. He's gotten his legs, under arms, chest, and two thirds of his pubic hair trimmed off when she walks into the bathroom.

A few relevant facts of the McGee household:

A: While it is true that Tim isn't exactly an exhibitionist when it comes to his bathroom habits, he's also not particularly shy, either. He's a guy, and is used to peeing with an audience.

B: Abby, however, is not a guy, and does not appreciate an audience.

C: Since it's just the two of them, they do not lock, and very rarely close, doors.
D: Closed doors mean do not come in, and are respected.

E: Tim was alone in the house and thus did not bother to close the bathroom door.

So, he is sitting on the edge of the bathtub, one leg propped up high on the shower wall, trimmer in hand, getting the hair between his leg and testicle. He's covered in tiny, little, just clipped off hairs that he hasn't rinsed away yet, sitting in the midst of thousands more tiny, little, just clipped off hairs, unable to hear much over the buzzing of the clipper.

He does; however, hear it when Abby yelps, "Tim!"

He looks up, startled, (fortunately he doesn't accidentally stab himself with the trimmers) and says, "You're home early."

"Yeah." She's staring at him, eyes very wide. "What are you doing?"

He's assuming this is a rhetorical question because it's got to be pretty damn obvious what he's doing. He's got trimmers in hand and is sitting in a forest of just clipped hairs, not like he's doing his taxes in here.

"I thought it'd be fun." He's smiling, looking a little uncomfortable, suddenly aware of the fact that he's never actually talked to Abby about her preferences when it comes to male fuzziness and that she might actually find this appalling.

But a slow, wide grin spreads across her face, and she says, "Can I watch?"

That isn't something he's expecting. "You want to watch?"

"Oh yeah!" Her pigtails are practically vibrating she's so excited by this prospect.

"Okay." He contorts a little more, suddenly aware of the fact that his pubic hair goes all the way back to his anus, and that's going to be tricky to get, even without an audience, and that this a whole lot less dignified than he'd been hoping. "So… ummm… weren't you supposed to be watching Deadpool?"

"Movie sold out. I messed around a bit, but then decided to head home."

"Ahhh…"

She's noticing he's got the trimmers off and isn't doing anything. "Would you rather I didn't watch?"

"Sort of. Can't figure out how to do this without looking like a porn star."

That gets another wide smile out of her, and he's fairly sure he knows what she's remembering, because he's remembering it too, and yeah, that was a lot of fun. "I like you looking like a porn star."

He grins at that.

"And it's not like I haven't seen, touched, licked, and sucked all of you already."

"Okay, true."

She steps up close behind him, trails her fingers down his spine (one of the few bits of him currently not covered in tiny, little, newly clipped off hairs). "And, I'm guessing, you were kind of hoping I was going to touch, lick, and suck all of you again, otherwise that trimmer wouldn't be anywhere near there, right?"
"True."

"So…"

He nods to the toilet seat and turn the trimmers back on. "Get comfy and please don't distract me."

She grins, and he gets back to work.

---

Rinsing off feels really good. Trimming results in an itchy, prickly, slightly sweaty combination he doesn't much like. Rinsing it all off, on the other hand, means that he's now wet, very naked (Jimmy wasn't kidding about things looking bigger after trimming the hair away, and he's almost embarrassed to admit how much he likes that.) and not smooth yet, but much less fuzzy than he's been at any point in his life since he was thirteen and started growing real body hair in the first place.

Abby tosses him the shaving cream, and he starts to lather up his left leg. On one level, it's kind of weird: he's shaving his leg. On another level, it's soft and foamy and feels pretty nice. So, he focuses on soft and foamy while reaching for the razor.

Abby shaves her legs once every three days, and Tim really appreciates the day she shaves. He's even more enthusiastic about the day after she waxes. Very soft, hairless skin is something he really likes. It feels excellent, and given the opportunity he'll just sit there, petting her, enjoying her skin.

Still, he isn't prepared for how good his skin would feel when he rinses off the last bit of the shaving cream residue from his right leg. In fact, wet, smooth, hairless legs blows his mind, and he's cursing at himself that he didn't figure this out sooner, like, say during all those years he was single, because he really could have had a whole lot of fun with this.

He's standing there, rubbing his left leg against his right, enjoying it, and Abby's giggling at him. "Think you're going to do this again?"

"Depends on how accurate Jimmy was about how it feels when it grows back. But right now, this is awesome."

"Legs growing back in isn't an issue. At least it isn't for me." She stands up and gently strokes her hand over where his pubic hair is now a whole lot shorter, but not yet shaved off. "However, I'll tell you I think waxing it off is more comfortable than having it grow back in."

"Ummm…" That has Tim's attention, and he looks really alarmed because having someone yank his pubic hair out sounds like torture to him. "It's that itchy?"

"Not so much intense as it lasts a few days."

"Errr… Should I do this?"

She just shrugs. "How good to your legs feel?"

He rubs them together again. "Really good."

She just looks at him with a smile on her face. "Want me to lather you up?"
"Yeah."

Okay, having someone rub shaving cream over your pubic hair is actually really nice. And kind of distracting. It takes him about thirty seconds to remember why she's doing that. He remembers Jimmy's comment about having Breena shave him and, yeah, it didn't sound great when he heard it the first time, but right now it's sounding really good.

He pops a new blade onto his razor and hands it to her. "You wanna shave me?"

Her eyes go wide, light up with joy, and a huge, bright smile spreads across her lips. "Really?"

"Yeah."

"Oh yes!" She's sitting on the side of the tub, he's standing in the tub, facing her. "Legs a bit further apart." So he widens his stance and she smiles up at him, turning on the faucet in the tub. Then she seems to realize that she's still dressed, so she flicks off the faucet.

"Okay, hold up, let me get out of this. Because I'm going to guess this is going to involve getting wet and probably foamy."

He's still grinning. "Certainly wouldn't mind if it did. After all this stuff is designed to make a blade slide over skin easily, probably makes bodies slide over each other pretty easy, too."

She's pulling her shirt over her head when he says that. Once she gets it off she says, with a wicked smile, "Down, boy. Let's get the hair off of you before trying that."

Okay, yeah, he likes the thrill of almost getting caught. And yeah, with as hard as he got driving 130 with her next to him, he's sure there's a straight danger kick as well. But it's not like Tim actively seeks out danger for thrills. Sometimes dangerous things just hit him right, and they're awfully fun.

But this is just... Fuck!

It blows them all away.

She's holding his dick and balls with one hand, keeping them out of the way (made somewhat more difficult by the fact that he's rock hard) as she carefully runs the blade over his pelvis. After each stroke, she washes the blade under the faucet, carefully cleaning it, and then heads to the next area, making sure to do long, gentle pulls.

It feels amazing. Very soft, very smooth, very dangerous, and God he likes it way too much.

Having someone shave your balls is... just... fuck... okay, it doesn't matter how annoying the growing back in is. It could feel like red hot ants are crawling all over his testicles and biting him, and he will still ask Abby to do this again.

And for as much as he didn't love the position he needed to get into for her to get the hairs around his anus and between his butt cheeks, the way having them shaved off felt... Holy Mother of God! that was all sorts of good.

Then Abby said, "You know, if you're all clean shaven, you should probably do me as well."

And... yep, it's a kick from the other side, though, since she waxes, he was only doing her legs. Still, smooth skin, sharp shiny blades, foamy shaving cream, and lots of hot, wet, nicely-scented skin touching.

It's all kinds of good.

And he did get the grow-back-in-softer-and-slower lotion as well, and rubbing that all over each other was a lot of fun, too.

So, yeah, he's a total danger junkie, and he's got no idea how he's ever going to be able to look at a razor again, let alone use one, without getting a hard-on.

They're out of the bathroom, laying on their bed, and he's more naked than he's ever been as an adult. He trails his fingers over his dick and balls and the skin around them, absolutely marveling at how good that feels. And she's grinning at him, really getting off on watching him enjoy himself.

"Okay, honestly, I could spend a few hours just playing with myself. This is just..." He rubs one of his legs against hers. "God! If I could blow myself..." Cause he knows how much he likes the feel of her bare skin on his lips, so he assumes it'd be just as good on his. He rubs his legs together: soft, silky skin on skin. "Damn!"

Abby's petting him, too. "Wanna make it better?"

"How could this possibly be better?"

"Silk."

His eyes suddenly narrow and the blissed-out look on his face vanishes. "Errr... you mean like..." Because while it's true that he owns a few pieces of silk clothing, he's fairly sure she's not thinking about his tie collection.

She's still grinning away, looking really hopeful. "Like stockings or my kimono or one of the negligées."

Okay, yes, he wears a kilt in public, and makeup when they go out, but that's not cross-dressing. That's just different modes of being a guy. Stockings and her undies, that's very much not just different modes of being a guy. And it's very true that he'd have an extremely difficult time explaining why it was okay to shave all of his hair off and wear a kilt, but not okay to put on some of her clothing, he's also very aware on a gut level that this is a really squirmy idea and not in a good way.

"No."

She can see how uncomfortable that idea is for him, so she just smiles, then heads to her dresser, and puts on a pair of silk stockings and a silk negligee then comes over and drapes herself all over him, and yeah, she was right, that feels amazing.

"I don't suppose you'd tie me up and just rub all over me?" Because right now, he can't think of anything that'll feel better than that.

"Of course, baby. Tie you spread eagle, get lots of good pictures, fuck you 'till you can't come anymore."

"Oh, God, yes. Please!"

She did get him tied, and got lots of pictures, and started to rub all over him, when it became suddenly very clear that not only can Abby not lie on her stomach anymore, it's not all that easy for her to bend at the middle. Which makes getting to certain bits of him, specifically the bits he's really hoping she'll get to, almost impossible if he's tied to the bed.

So, he was untied, and then retied using the ceiling hook. And maybe that's not quite as easy as lying in bed, but he's pretty sure it'll work out just fine.

And she is rubbing up all over him, hot skin under silk all over his skin, and Tim knows there's a difference between sensual and sexual but right now, this is the perfect combination of both of them.

It's not just that he's so hard he feel like he's going to pass out, though that is true. It's also that all of his skin is so happy it's singing, buzzing with pleasure. It's a surfeit of stimulation on any level his body can take, and it's so good he's just floating through it.

Then it got better.

"Up on the dresser."

He does as she tells him, and it's a little tricky to do without the use of his hands, but he does manage to get seated on top of the dresser while Abby heads to the closet and finds a pair of platform boots.

After all, the dresser is waist high on him, but she needs a few extra inches for that to be true.

She leaves on the stockings, but takes off the negligee, and then straps on her boots.

"You all clean?"

He nods his head eagerly. Tim loves having her eat him out, but since she's been pregnant he hasn't been willing to let her do it unless he's clean inside and out. No orgasm's worth risking her coming down with a nasty bacterial infection, especially when she's pregnant. But he'd certainly been hoping that if he shaved everything off, she'd be willing to lick every inch of hairless skin, so, yeah, he's clean enough for surgery. That was step one in this whole plan.

"Good."

She went to the toy box, got the lube, dilators, and strap-on. "Want the cock ring, too?"

"Abby…"
She looks up from sorting through their toys. "Yeah?"

"I love you."

She takes a step over, and kisses him gently. "Damn right you do!" She grins, and he grins back. "So, cock ring, too? Or you think you've got enough control on your own for this?"

He exhales long and slow. "Choices, choices… Grab it, and if I need it, I'll tell you."

"Sounds good."

She does, and then lays them all out next to him on the top of the dresser. He loves the anticipation of this, he can see them next to him, imagine what's going to come next, as her fingers trail from his lips to his cock, gently stroking over his skin.

"So, pretty little love, what exactly did you hope I'd do with you when you decided to take all your hair off?"

"I was hoping you'd rub all over me." He's sitting on the edge of the dresser, her standing between his legs, and she rubs her body along his, hips between his thighs, belly sliding over his cock, breasts against his chest, lips stroking over his neck and shoulder, as her hands rub over his arms.

He exhales slowly. "God, you feel so good on me. I love your skin."

She continues to slowly undulate against him, keeping up gentle slide and subtle friction. "And was this all you wanted? Just my skin moving on yours?"

"No. But if that's all you want to do, I'm good with it."

"Tell me what you want."

"Pull those two top drawers out a little." The top row of his dresser has three drawers. Pull the left and right ones out and whoever is on top of the dresser has a nice little foot rest. He hadn't been thinking about that when he bought it. He'd been thinking convenient place for boxers, socks, and ties, but it worked out really well for sex, too.

She did, and he propped his heels up. "I was hoping you'd tie me up, lick and suck my ass, then fuck me senseless."

"So, are you saying you want me to work you open with my tongue, then when you're all wet and soft, start with the glass, slipping them in one at a time, until you're wide open, then strap one on and fuck you until your cock's so hard I can see every single vein, and it throbs each time your heart beats?"

He inhales hard at that idea, and his eyes almost slide all the way shut. "Yes!"

"And how should I get you off once I've got you that hard? Pull out and suck you off? Jerk you off while I thrust? Grind against you, belly on your cock while I just keep pressing your prostate with my cock?"

"Grind, please!"

She lays a soft, wet kiss to his thigh, then stands between his legs, lips an inch from his. "And what will you do for me if I do that for you?"

"Anything, at all!"
"Anything?"

His eyes are glazed with lust and pleasure and focused squarely on hers. "Anything." It came out as a soft hot breath against her lips. "Tell me what you want, and I will do it."

She's grinning and then says, "Good. Stay put, I want to get a chair. I'm going to fuck you good and slow so something to sit on would be nice."

One thing Tim has noticed about when Abby's in charge is that she's really good at pacing. He felt the bead of pre cum slip down his cock when he said 'Anything,' but she took her time getting a chair, and that wilted him a little, took the edge off.

And she knows that. Knows that if she starts this with him too close to the edge, he'll slip over too soon and it won't be nearly as fun.

But if she works in little breaks, bits of down time, she can ramp him up so hard he'll be literally unable to see when he comes.

So, by the time she's returned with a chair, he's still very hard, but not quivering or leaking anymore. He's eager, anticipating, and very, very turned on.

She's standing between his legs, eyes sparkling with sex, mischief, and joy, and says, "Where to begin?"

"Rhetorical question?"

"Not necessarily."

He wrapped his legs around her waist and pulled her close for a long, wet kiss. "This is always good."

She returned the kiss, running her fingers through his hair and down his back. "Yes, it is." Her hands cupped his ass and slid over his legs. "Very good indeed."

She began the long, slow trail of kisses down his throat and chest, nibbling and licking the now smooth skin. "Feels so good. Any time you want to do this, and I'm all in favor of it."

"Trust me, this is going into the regular rotation."

She rolled her tongue over his nipple, and he hummed a little at that. It feels okay. It doesn't do the same thing for him that him doing it to her does for her. But it's nice, and certainly looks pretty, and when she pulls it with her teeth while rubbing against his dick with her tummy, that certainly gets his attention.

He hissed at it, and she looked back up at him.

"Good?"
"Yeah, both at once, very good."

That got a grin. "How about this?" She stepped back a little, and then took his cock in her mouth while pulling her fingernails over both nipples.

"Fuck!"

"You like that?"

He's nodding yes, but says, "Maybe you could try it again, just to make sure?"

She laughed at that. "Maybe I could, but probably not today. I think today I'm supposed to be fucking you."

"That could be part of it."

"It could be, but not today," She patted his hip. "Got other places you want my mouth."

"True."

She kissed his knee. "Like here."

"That's good."

She trailed her tongue down the inside of his leg, pausing to carefully lick the crease between his leg and pelvis. "And here."

"God, yes, here is very good." And it is. It really is. His leg flopped over, giving her better access, and he twisted a little, trying to get more of her mouth against him.

She steadied his hips with her hands. "Calm baby, I'll get all of you, eventually." Her breath on wet skin sent another flush of pleasure through him. She caught that, the way he squirmed a little when she spoke, so she licked a wide, wet stripe, achingly close to where he wants her to touch, but not quite there, and then gently blew on it.

"Ohhh…" He arched into it. Silly really, not like you can get more pressure with breath, but his body wants it, so it tried to move into it.

Another soft, wet lick, this one across the crease where leg becomes buttock, followed by a happy squirm-inducing breath.

She nibbles along that line, interspersing little wet licks with tiny not quite sharp bites, and his hands clench against the rope. He leans back, lets it take his weight, pushing his hips a little further over the edge of the dresser, anything to give her better access to his body.

"You're eager for this, aren't you?"

"God, yes!"

She shifted to his left leg, giving it the same treatment as his right, and he whined a little as she got closer and closer without actually touching where he wanted.

"Please, baby!"

"Please what?"
He spread his legs further apart. "Please stop teasing me."

He watched as she laid her hands on the insides of his thighs, hot skin on his, spread him a little further apart, and lowered her head. He jerked, cursing in a very pleased sort of way, when she licked from the tip of his tailbone to the back of his balls.

It's a hard position to move in. He can rest his feet in the drawers, but he can't really press down against them, and he's sort of balanced on his second to last vertebrae, so he can't really thrust, best he can do is curl his abs, pull up with them, get a little motion. But that doesn't mean he doesn't want to thrust. He wants to grind into her, feel her tongue go deep and hard, and god, it's wet and squirmy and feels so goddamn good he doesn't know what to do with himself.

She's pulling him apart with her hands, giving herself better access, and it's all wet, hot, nasty, dirty, feels so good, and he can't believe she'll do it for him, and it's just so wrong and so right, and nothing else feels like this, wide open, completely vulnerable, with her tongue lapping away at him, nose and forehead rubbing his balls, it even sounds dirty, and makes him so hard. And he can't really see what she's doing, but he can see his dick, and it's rock hard, leaking, vibrating with each heartbeat, flushed purple he's so turned on, and like anytime she does something like this, he knows it's not enough, it won't get him off, but it'll drive him crazy with wanting, take him so high he's not all there anymore, burn off all of him that isn't lust and desire and pleasure and…

"Oh, fucking God, Abby!" she'd switched from lapping to working her tongue into him and that's just another level of so good all he can do is float on it, suffused with pleasure, glowing and babbling with it.

He whimpered when she pulled back and said, "Stand up."

He did it, though his legs and abs felt like Jello.

She reached up and untied him. If he was more with it, he'd notice that both of his arms were completely asleep. But really all he was doing was moaning quietly at not getting fucked any more.

"Lie on the bed, hips flush with the edge, feet on the floor."

He got it together enough to do that. And was finally starting to come down enough to realize his arms were on fire and his legs and abs knew they'd had a work out.

She stood between his legs, holding the lube and the first, smallest dilator. Lubed glass means almost no friction, and what she'd been doing with her tongue meant he was already pretty lose, well, for him, so he barely felt it slip in. Just a tiny bit of stretch, and she went back to licking him.

Her tongue lapping at his perineum, the dilator gently easing in and out, and once again he's so high there's not a single thought in his head beyond just feeling all of this.

It feels like it's taking forever. Like he's floating in a sea's worth of gently, steadily increasing pleasure.

She's rolling his balls on her tongue, and he feels like he's wide open, no idea how close to stretched out he is, but he feels loose and open, wanting nothing more than the feel of her flush on him, hard in him, riding him higher and higher as his muscles grow tighter, inching toward climax.

There's a little burn to go with the full, stretched feeling as she slides the next (last?) one in.

He's whimpering, head back, hands clenched in the blankets, trying to get her to touch his dick, desperate for just a hint of friction to get him off, and she stopped dead, flipping around so her pussy's at eye level.

He grabbed at her ass and hips, pulling her onto his mouth, licking and sucking like he's starving and she's the best meal he's ever seen. She's not touching him anymore. There's just the stretch from the glass and the taste/feel of her on his lips and tongue as she rides his face. And it's almost enough.

Anything would do it for him right now. A well placed breeze would get him off.

Abby moaning, crying as he eats her out, spreads her legs wider, touches with fingers, tongue, lips, and nose, and all of it goes straight to his cock. He's absolutely rigid, leaking, he can feel each drop of pre-cum ooze down the length of his dick, pooling on the naked skin at the base of his dick.

Her legs go tight on his shoulders, and he feels her shuddering over him. He slows, gentles his licks, but doesn't stop. He wants her taste, wants to bury himself in her, revel in the feel of her body hot and wet on his.

She pulls away after a few minutes, and he wasn't exactly on board with that plan, but he let her go, licking her juices off his lips.

"Watch."

So he does. Keeping his eyes on her as she steps into the strap on, pulling it snug over her hips. Sure, it fits a little oddly over her pregnant body, but they're fairly creative, and he's pretty handy, so adjusting the straps wasn't too much of an issue.

It's fairly thin, not very long, and she's stroking her hand over it, smoothing on the lube, and he has to look away because watching her jerk it off is going to make him come.

He's not sure if the fact that her wearing a fake dick turns him on so hard because he knows how what she'll do with it will feel, or if he loves the way it feels so much because of how it looks when she does it. Chicken, egg, no idea. But he does know that if it had been possible for him to get harder, it happened.

And he also knows that he was begging, flat out, no holds barred, pleading, with her to fuck him. Whimpering for it.

She knelt between his legs, and he propped himself on his elbows to watch. She eased the dilator out, and went back to licking him, rimming him, tongue slipping over and in and around in slick, wet, soft, sensations.

He's moaning, completely beyond words, beyond all thought past the need to get off.

Tim feels her shift his leg over her shoulder, and the hard, cold, thick feel of the plastic dick sliding into him. And usually the slide doesn't do much for him. Usually that's just part of getting to the feel of it rubbing his prostate and the gonna squirt, almost cumming feel of that pressure. But he's loose and open enough that it just slides in and that slide is delicious, taking him higher than he thinks he's ever been.

He has one leg over her shoulder as she thrusts up and in, hard, fast, tummy rubbing over his dick with each motion and he can't take much more of this, it's so good and so hot, and he's so hard, so gone in pleasure and violin string tight muscles clenching hard, begging for just a little more friction to spill him over the edge and one more thrust and a sort of grind and Tim was gone, replaced with a burning, sparkling ball of pleasured drenched nerves, twitching, shaking, yelling her name as he comes in long, wet stripes over his stomach and chest and hers.
By the time he's up, showered, and more or less himself again, dinner is looming on the horizon, so instead of a second round, getting dressed and going out becomes the next thing on the list.

When the idea of romantic Monday started to solidify in his mind, he hadn't had anything planned beyond lots of naked skin and sex. But when Abby started talking about the suit/kilt combo something beyond just playing at home went on the menu.

And before Abby left to go out, before he cleaned up or fired up the trimmers, he had made reservations for them to go out to dinner. After all, a good chunk of the fun of getting dressed up is going out wearing whatever it is you just put on.

So, out of the shower, towel around his hips, he's feeling very relaxed, very, very good, and awfully sassy. Kilt and top half of the suit are a must. Rock and roll vibe is definitely going to be part of this, too.

So, first things first, nail polish. He wishes there was a faster way to do this. Or given that it takes him a good fifteen minutes to get it on and properly dry, that he could wear it for more than a day at a time. But, while he's willing to push the edge on the NCIS dress code with his wrist cuff, showing up with nail polish on is a step too far.

Though it occurs to him, when he's head of his own department, he might be able to get some more wiggle room on the whole dress code thing.

Abby's putting her hair up while he waits for his nails to dry, so he asks, "How'd you go about getting out of the dress code?"

She turns to him. "What has you thinking about that?"

"If I'm going to take this much time to get polish on my nails, it'd be nice to keep it there for more than two hours."

"Ahhh… I told Jenny that khaki makes me break out in hives and cried on her until I got a life-long dress code exemption."

He laughs at that. "Somehow I don't see that approach working for me."

"Vance might believe you're allergic to office casual."

"Yes, but he won't care."

"True."

Once the polish is set, comes dressing.

He never wears underwear with the kilt. That's just not how you wear them. So, he's got an idea of how a kilt is supposed to feel, and today it's a rather different sensation. Rough, slightly nubby, it's not bad, but it's not normal either. He's a hell of a lot more aware of the fabric than usual.

Shirt, vest, he's looking for a tie. The black one that comes with the suit is fine, but he's got a hunter green one that goes with the tartan really well. He's figuring he'll tie it loosely, leave the top button undone and then have Abby do his makeup when he notices she isn't wearing a collar yet and another idea hits.

On her dresser, she's got a t-shaped stand that all the collars, bracelets, and cuffs live on. He spends a moment sorting through them and finds the collar that goes with his cuff. She sees what he's doing and grins.

"Oh… I like that idea."

"Thanks. Let's see if it looks as good for real as it does in my head." He hands it to her. "Put it on me?"

She kisses the nape of his neck. "Anytime you want, baby."

He always likes the way it feels when she puts one of her collars on him. Sure, he knows what it's supposed to be about, and for them it's not really, but there's still the soft weight of it, and the smooth sensation of leather drawing tight on his throat. It's just… nice, in a tingly sort of way.

The collar's fairly subtle. Like the cuff, it's just a strap of black leather embossed with an arabesque. Black on black. It's under his shirt collar, so all anyone can see is an inch or so of a band of black at the base of his throat.

"Good?"

"Yeah, it is." She looks him up and down. "You still have Ducky's hat?"

"Uh… yeah, I think so. Why?" Okay, yeah, he still doesn't love himself in hats, but she'd certainly enjoyed him in the fedora. And a decent dose of enthusiastic compliments and petting as a result of the hat is softening his opinion of how he looks in them. (To the point where he kept it on all night after the signing of the Ketubah.)

"Where would it be?" Abby asks.

"Downstairs, closet."

"Okay. Put the jacket on and push the sleeves up a bit."

"All right."

He's still messing with his sleeves when she gets back up with the fedora. They look good scrunched up a bit, but it's hard to make them stay that way.

It's just a basic black hat, lighter gray hat band. Abby sets it on his head and steps back. "Oh yeah."

He checks himself in the mirror, polished black leather boots, McGee tartan, white dress shirt, top three buttons undone, black leather collar visible under it, black vest, buttoned up, black tux jacket, sleeves pushed up enough so his wrist cuff is visible, black nail polish, and a black fedora.

Oh yeah. Is certainly right.

"Eye makeup?" he asks Abby. He's liking this look a whole lot, and doesn't want to venture into overkill land.

She's nodding. "Yeah. Sit down; I'll do it subtle."
He's sitting on the bed and notices the eyeliner in her hand isn't his usual one.

"What's that?"

"Green."

"I thought you said subtle."

"It will be. Look up."

He does, and feels her color his waterline. A second later, she's done the other eye. This is usually when she's finished, but she turns and grabs another pencil and a little brush.

"Okay, what are you doing?"

"It'll look good. Hold still." He can feel the pencil smoothing under his eyelashes, and then the brush slipping back and forth.

"What color is it." It's too close to his eye to focus on, and all he can see is a gray blur.

"Medium gray."

"My eyes aren't going to swell shut, are they?" He is allergic to several popular brands of makeup, among them Abby's preferred brand.

"Nope. Bought these for you."

He hadn't known that. "Thank you."

"No problem. Okay, almost done, mascara."

"This really doesn't sound subtle."

"It will be; it's brown."

Tim's eyelashes, like his eyebrows, aren't actually black; they're dark brown. So when he wears black eyeliner or mascara it's not subtle at all. It's very clear that something is different. Meanwhile, dark brown does draw more attention to his eyes without making a clear "Look, I've Got On Eye Makeup!" kind of statement.

He holds perfectly still for another minute while she finishes up.

"All pretty?" he asks, something of a wry smile on his face.

She kisses the tip of his nose. "You're lovely." Then gets up from his lap. "Go look."

She's right, it's subtle, and he's surprised at this, not very girly, either. His eyes just look bigger and greener.

She's standing behind him with her chin on his shoulder. "You like it?"

He's nodding. "Yeah, I do. It's cool."

"Yes, it is. Now, out of here. I'm going to get dressed and want it to be a surprise."
He whistled when she steps into his office, eyes tracing her body from head to toe. "Oh Abby!"

"A surprise" is a black cheongsam with green and silver dragons worked over the... it can't be silk, it's stretchy over her belly, but it's got a silk sheen and looks silky. Her hair's up in a bun, and she's got black lacquered chopsticks in it. She's done something with her eye makeup so they look more almond shaped than normal. And to top it all off, (bottom it all under?) is a pair of dainty, little, black silk slippers.

He more or less leaps to his feet, closing on her fast, licking his lips, wrapping his hands around her waist.

"God, you're so beautiful."

She grins widely at that, the gasps when he picks her up and sets her on his desk.

"Tim?" she asks as he's kneeling in front of her, pushing the skirt of the dress up.

"Dinner can wait, this can't! Look so good, got to taste you."

So, they're running fifteen minutes late as they walk, (both of them looking awfully relaxed, slightly rumpled, and very sassy) from the Metro stop to the restaurant.

They pause at the door, waiting for the people inside to come out. Tim's barely paying any attention to them, he's looking at Abby. But she is, so she sees who's coming out before he does.

"Sarah!"

Tim's sister looks away from her friend, sees Abby, sees Abby's tummy and says, "Abby, oh my God! Look at you! Tim posts pics, but..." Her hand is hovering over Abby's tummy, waiting for permission. Abby nods. "She's really in there," Sarah says as she feels Kelly moving.

Abby and Tim are grinning at this. "Yeah, she really is," Abby answers.

Sarah's still looking at Abby's tummy as she says, "I can feel her kicking! That's so cool." Then she seems to notice there are other people with them. "Abby McGee, this is Amber Greenwalt, my editor. Amber, this is my sister-in-law." Abby offers her hand and shakes, wondering why Sarah didn't introduce Tim, but that question is very rapidly answered as Sarah says, still focusing on Kelly, "You going to introduce your friend?"

Tim laughs at that, and the sound of his voice causes Sarah to jerk, looking up and really seeing him. "You've known me your whole life, Sarah."

"Holy shit, Tim!" Granted the lighting isn't too bright, and he is wearing a hat, and she didn't really pay all that much attention to the guy next to Abby, having homed in on the pregnant belly, but still, not recognizing her brother feels really weird. "Are you wearing a kilt?"

"Yes. I do get dressed up for date night, you know."

"Oh my god!" Her eyes are on the verge of falling out of her head they're so wide open right now, and he's smiling, a second from laughing.

"Good oh-my-god or the whole-world-is-about-toimplode oh-my-god?"
"Who the hell are you and what did you do with Tim!"

"It's really me."

"No, it's not! Tim tries to be cool and ends up looking like a dork who's trying too hard. Pseudo Tim or whoever you are actually looks cool, thus, who the hell are you?" she says with a wink.

He laughs at that. "So, where's that man of yours?"

She smiles. "At home, this was a working dinner for me."

"Working how?"

"Oh God, sorry. Amber, Tim McGee, my brother. You know him as Thom Gemcity."

He shakes Amber's hand. "Final edits?"

Sarah shakes her head. "Super top secret writer stuff. If it works, I'll tell you about it."

"Uh huh… And when will you know if it worked?"

"Round about Christmas-time. This works out, and I'll have a big announcement for all of you."

"Cool."

She steps back and really looks at him again, nodding. "Looks good."

"Thanks."

They're tucking into some really delicious miso soup when Tim asks, "So, what did you add to the honeymoon pack?"

Abby grins. "Not sure I should tell you."

"Really?" Tim's grinning and very intrigued, soup forgotten.

"Yeah, I'm fairly sure that's not the sort of thing Ziva told Breena and I about to have it blabbed around."

He sighs, exaggeratedly loud. "Well, if you shouldn't tell… You shouldn't tell… But you know, he is the guy who picked the lock to my apartment, heard us having sex, and still walked in on us so he could see the action. He's got a lot of bad privacy karma to work off, you know…"

Her smile widens. "Yeah. I do. Okay, you cannot say anything about this."

He's grinning. "I never do. What was it?"

She takes another sip of the soup, then says, "Everything you ever wanted to know about oral sex. You said it had to fit into the bag, so it's three mini books of basic, intermediate, and advanced technique. He, like a lot of guys, isn't nearly as good at it as he thinks he is."

Tim laughs, really, really hard at that. He's practically crying by the time he calms down. "Tony Motormouth DiNozzo's not all that hot with oral?"
Abby nods.

Tim starts laughing again.

"It's not that uncommon of a problem, lots of guys think they're a lot better at it than they actually are."

That stops Tim cold. He's staring at her, voice sounding very wary as he asks, "What do you mean by lots of guys?"

That makes her laugh. "Not you."

His look is questioning.

"Really, not you."

"But you'd tell me, right, if it was me?"

That makes her laugh even harder. "Have I ever had any trouble telling you how to get me off?"

"No."

They stop talking for a few seconds as the server clears away the soup and puts several sushi rolls in front of them. Abby takes that break to switch from sitting across from Tim to next to him. Not only is it easier to share food that way, but they can talk a little more quietly.

Once settled, she says, "Look, back the first time we dated, you mainly had enthusiasm and a willingness to take orders going for you. And that'll get you pretty far. I've yet to meet a woman who wasn't thrilled by a guy who'll dive in and eat pussy like he's starving and it's every favorite meal he's ever had, and who doesn't act like it's a fatal insult to his masculinity to be told that he needs to adjust his technique. But, you might remember, I was telling you a lot of left, right, harder, up, use fingers, sorts of things, too."

He nods, chewing. He does remember the first few times he went down on her that yep, she did give him a lot of directions, and he was more than cool with that, because the idea was get-Abby-off, and anything that made that more likely was something he was in favor of.

"Am I still doing that?"

"Nope."

She picks up a piece of their Tokyo roll. "Between then and the second time we got together, you got some technique to go with enthusiasm, and baby, you give head like a woman… Like a lesbian."

He thinks about that for a second, taking a sip of his sake. "That's a compliment, right?"

"Oh yeah." She grins and nods.

That got both of them thinking, which meant they both started their questions at the same time, followed by a few seconds of you-go-first-no-you, finally they settled on Abby going first.

"So, you didn't really date, not a whole lot, how did you get that good?"

"I didn't get a lot of hands… mouth on practice, but I did research the hell out of it."

"Research?"
"I'm not a woman, and when I wrote the T.M. Gee books I needed to convincingly write one, so... I watched and read a ton of porn by and for women. Lots and lots and lots of it. For a few years there, I had a lesbian porn collection that would have made Tony jealous. Or maybe not, cause it was real lesbian porn, not lesbian porn for men, which is, well, not really the same at all."

She's laughing at that. "And you would know."

He's nodding, grinning. "Oh yeah, I would know! Anyway, lots and lots of lesbian porn and the main thing I learned about oral was: your tongue isn't a dick, so don't use it like one; no woman ever got off from tongue thrusting. If you're a guy, and you're doing that, it's because it gets you off. Also, there's a whole lot more to a pussy than just a clit, so play with all of it, and don't narrow focus until you've hit endgame. Once I had the theory down, practice kind of took care of itself."

"Ah... So, what did you want to ask me?"

He's looking a little sheepish at this, but he is curious, and he's never actually asked... He eats another bite of their dinner, putting it off for another few seconds.

So, the thing is, Tim knows Abby likes girls, at least on a theoretical level. They occasionally check out the same girl at a club, and tag team story telling sometimes involves other women. (Like Breena, for example, or the girl they're both checking out at the club, especially if they happen to be at the club while telling the story.) But he's never flat out asked if she's had sex with another woman, and she's never flat out said.

So he smiles, hopes learning the answer to this isn't going to bite him in the ass, and asks, "How do you know?"

"How do I know what?" She licks a drop of the sauce off the tip of her chopstick.

"That I give head like a lesbian."

Her eyebrows shoot up, and she looks shocked. "Did you not know that?"

He rolls his eyes a little. "Would I be asking if I knew?"

"Practical experience."

He nods, noticing a complete and utter lack of jealousy, files that under interesting things he'll think about later, and says, "So you've had girlfriends, too?"

"Never with one of them long enough to qualify as a girlfriend. Not that I was ever great with relationships before you, but... basically, I like sex with girls and boys, but do friendships better with girls and relationships better with guys."

"So, you really are bi?"

"I couldn't care less about the label. It's just skin, you know? And it feels good rubbing against mine, so if I like the person inside the skin, we're good. And about one out of five times that skin was shaped like mine. I guess whatever you are is your default idea of normal, because, like, I can see you don't like guys, but I can't figure out why."

Tim's never thought about why he's not into guys, just that he isn't. "Just don't."

"Yeah I know." She'll looking a little perplexed by this, but settled at the same time. Like she's talking about a puzzle she's come to terms with never solving. "You love Jimmy. He's objectively attractive. You're both good at and very enthusiastic about sex. And, nothing, from either of you."

"Yep." Tim's nodding away at that, because, well, yeah, he agrees with it. He's never felt even the slightest desire to do anything sexual with Jimmy even though he does A: love him, and B: as guys go, Jimmy's in really good shape.

"You'd rather watch Breena and I make out, no touching on your part, just frustrated watching, than have him get you off, even though that would actually result in an orgasm."

"Again, yep."

"And somehow that makes sense to you," she says sipping her tea.

Tim shrugs. "I'm not sure it makes sense. It's probably not logical. It just is how it is. I mean, I read things, back in college, about how we're born bisexual, and get shaped into straight or gay, but if that's true, I can't ever remember a time where I felt that way. I can; however, remember being three and having a crush on one of the girls in my preschool."

Abby smiles at that.

"So, yeah, like girls. Love girls. " He strokes her face. "Love you. And yeah, I'm well aware of what we did this afternoon and the fact that I've got on eyeliner, nail polish, no body hair below my eye lashes, and am wearing a skirt as I say this, which means I'm probably the swishiest straight guy you know. I'm certainly the swishiest straight guy I know. But, yeah, no interest in guys. Just, none. And given how my first semester of college went, if I had had any interest in guys, at all, I probably would have been sleeping with them just to piss my dad off."

That makes her chuckle, and he kisses her gently, enjoying this conversation.

"But you don't think it's icky?" Abby asks.

He thinks about that before saying, "Not sure what you mean."

"You got a really uncomfortable look on your face when the idea of putting my clothing on came up."

"Okay, yeah." That does it for him. He knows what she means by icky. "And honestly, I don't know. If I've ever been hit on by a guy, it was subtle enough I didn't notice it."

"You got felt up by one when we were in New Orleans."

"Okay, true, and yeah, I remember that feeling weird. Mostly because it took me so damn long to figure out it wasn't you doing it. But I was also kind of drunk, insanely turned on, and in a serious party mood. Hit me with that sober, and I might not be so cool about it." He thinks about that some more. "Okay, honestly, it was about on par with hugging Diane."

"Gibbs' Diane?"

"Yeah. It was just weird. Someone I didn't want in my personal space pressed against my body. Not fun. It wasn't gross or anything. Like, I think Tony threw up after he kissed that transsexual, and there was nothing like that. I just didn't like it."

"Fair enough. I'm just glad you don't think it's icky that I like girls."

"You know, I don't think that's ever going to be a problem for me. Not sure I want you bringing any real live ones home…" He thinks about that and the fantasies they tell each other. "Okay, yeah, I want you to do that… But when my dick isn't doing the thinking, I realize that might end up being a lot messier than I'd like."

Abby nods and smiles. "I love you. That's never, ever going to change. If just us is what makes you happy and comfortable, then just us is fine. But, the offer for more is always open. It's just got to be a two way street. Any time you're willing to play with a guy; I'm all for bringing home a girl. Or both at once: Jimmy and Breena would be willing to play with us."

His eyebrows shoot up. He's not entirely sure what the feeling surging through him is. A whole lot of surprise, but there's something else there, too, and he doesn't know what it is. Finally, he pulls himself together enough to say, "You know that for a fact?"

She wiggles her hand a little, signaling sort of. "Breena's interested. Like you, I'm not sure if Jimmy's cool with it. We've talked about it, but I don't think she's talked to him about it."

"Oh." That idea, Breena and Abby talking about the four of them having sex together makes his mouth go dry and his dick twitch. "You two talk about us…" He's not sure what the right word is, not even sure what precisely they're talking about, so he tries a few. "Foursoming? Swapping? Swinging?"

"A few times. And as a foursome. Either all of us or none of us."

The flash of that image, all four of them tangled together in bed is simultaneous very sexy and terrifying. "Like just messing around talking, or like talking?"

Abby's eyebrows furrow, and she eats another bite of her sushi. "I don't understand what you're asking."

"Are you guys serious about it?"

"Enough to have figured out that it would have to be all four of us together. If it's all four of us, well… On the good side, we all get to see and touch and play. On avoiding the bad side: no jealousy, no wondering, we'd all know exactly what the others are doing."

Tim swallows hard, takes a drink of his water, swallows again. He's honestly not sure if he's so turned on he's going to fuck her through the wall here and now, or if he's so scared he's going to wet his kilt.

Abby strokes his face. "What's going on? I have no idea what that expression on your face means."

"Probably because I don't, either. You two really talk about this?" There's a hefty dose of amazement in his voice.

"We talk about lots of stuff."

"Yeah, but… Do you talk with Ziva about stuff like that?"

Abby smiles at that. "No. Though she's the one who got the conversation between Breena and I started. She saw how we were playing with each other to wind you guys up and asked if the four of us were sleeping together."

"When was that?"

"Remember the girl scout fantasy?"
He nods. Yes he remembers that, fondly.

"Remember how we were dancing with each other before that?"

He nods at that, too. Yep, he liked that a lot, as well. All three girls all close up and rubbing against each other. He could be dead, and he'd still like that.

"So, we're dancing, you're looking like you want to eat us alive, and she asked."

"Oh."

"Next day Breena and I got talking with each other about it."

"Huh. That was almost a year ago. You're just mentioning it now?"

"Didn't come up before now. Not like there's any rush, is there?"

"What? No… At least, I don't think so… No. Shit..." He spends a long minute just looking at her, kind of confused, partially wondering if this is a game to wind him up. "Really, you two talk about this?"

"Yeah, we do. Last time was when we were getting Tony's presents. You look really confused."

"That's probably a good word for it." He feels like, maybe, if he could get some more rules in place, some more of an idea of exactly what's going on, he can find his footing again. "So, like a one off thing, or regular, like, just playing or… what, becoming a…" he flounders around for a word that would cover this, "quadruple?"

"We were talking about it as a one off thing, with an understanding that if it was fun, we'd probably do it again."

The fact that Abby and Breena have it this far planned out stuns him. Then he realizes what she said, and he's able to identify part of why this scares the hell out of him. "What if it's not fun?"

She smiles, and he can see that's a concern for her, as well. "And that's why we're not in any rush. That's why we talk about it. Do you think it'd be fun?"

"God, I don't know! Yes? Have your best, hottest fantasy come true, sure, that's good. Assuming Jimmy or I didn't freak out. Big fucking assumption there. I mean, you and Breena and… But Jimmy'd be there too… Really, I don't feel any need, at all, to have sex with him watching. Joking around about it or talking is one thing, doing it with him… I don't know. I mean, yeah, I love Breena and… but…" He's gesturing with his hands like they can somehow fill in the blanks in his sentences. "Okay, the night before we got married, he was joking about sleeping with you, and I almost hit him. Seriously, my hand was in a fist, and I was going to punch the shit out of him. And, I'm not feeling that right now, but he's also not actually here."

Abby nods. "I think when they lost Jon, something shifted with you two."

Tim thinks about that, remembering holding Jimmy as he cried, and realized that that's the most intimate he's ever been with another guy, and not only did it not freak him out, but it felt really right. Same thing with sleeping with him and Breena when they got home. Someone he loved was hurting, and touch is comfort, so it didn't matter that the body in question was male. "I think you're right about that, but… still… that's a huge leap."

"I know. And look, nothing we do is going to upset this. We love them. They love us. We love each other. They love each other. Anything ever happens it'll be because of that love, not in spite of it."
She touched his face again. "You okay?"

"Yeah. I am. Just, lots to process."

"Well, don't think about it too hard. Still got stuff to do tonight." Her hand slips up his leg. "Oh. Hard might be the operative word. Seems like at least part of you likes this idea."

"Yeah, well that part of me isn't in charge for a good reason. It likes lots of stuff that might not be great ideas."

That gets a laugh out of Abby. She leans in close, licks his ear lobe, and says, "And it really likes the idea of me and Breena, sitting on the sofa, talking about sex with each other and our favorite guys, doesn't it."

He groans at the idea of that. "Oh, fuck yes!"

"Wanna hear more about it?"

"Yes, but not right this second. We took the metro here, and I'm wearing a kilt. Everyone in DC doesn't need to see me with a hard-on."
Surveillance

Having half of your team gone means you spend a lot of time on rotation. Tim and Gibbs are playing backup for the other teams or doing paperwork until Tony and Ziva get back.

And backup means they're sitting in a van on stakeout.

And stakeout is boring enough normally, but today it's god awful torture because it's not interesting enough to distract Tim.

Okay, so by this point in his life, Tim should know that endorphins make him do stupid things. They certainly shoot his ability to determine if immediate pleasure is worth longer term consequences to hell and gone.

God the shaving was so worth it, and they are definitely doing that again. But, as long term consequences go... He's never had any form of VD, but he figures how he feels now has to be close.

Apparently he's squirming because Gibbs finally says to him, "You go roll around in poison ivy again?"

Actually that's a pretty accurate comparison. The last time he felt like this he did have that case of extremely unfortunately located poison ivy. Though, best he can figure, baking soda paste won't help this. (If he was at the Navy Yard instead of in a van listening in on a smuggling ring, he'd try just to see if it would help.)

"No."

"Gotta use the head?"

He's staring at Gibbs like he's insane for asking. "No!"

"Then quit squirming like a barely potty-trained kid."

And for what he thinks is a good half hour, Tim focuses on the case, keeps an ear on the stuff they're recording, but, well, it's boring. Really boring. Yes, this is important intel. Collin's team has been working on this smuggling ring for eight months, slowly building up a mountain of evidence to take at least twenty-five people down, and they're all thrilled to have two extra bodies to keep an eye on things and get them a bit of down time, but God, it's boring!

So, he starts squirming again because he can swear he can feel it growing back in. Every single hair, and by now he's pretty well convinced he's got fifteen million of them on his balls alone, and they are all razor sharp and slowly creeping through his skin.

He feels the hand connect with the back of his head a split second before he hears Gibbs say, "Focus."

"Focusing, Boss."

Unfortunately he's focusing on the hair growing back in.

Jimmy was dead right, this is like wearing a coat of liquid sandpaper. Sharp sandpaper.

But he's trying. He's keeping at least a quarter of an ear on the discussion the mic is picking up, but right now they're talking about getting groceries. Nothing even remotely interesting. Though it does remind him they're getting low on tea (in addition to everything else, they didn't do their usual Saturday morning grocery run this weekend), so he flashes Abby a quick text about that.

So, all in all, there was a good forty-five seconds he wasn't thinking about it, but as soon as the text is done, there's nothing else to pay attention to, so the scratchy, irritated, squirmy sensation comes back.

Three minutes later, Gibbs stands up, kicks the swivel chair Tim's in so he's facing him, and leans down toward him, hands on the arms of the chair, more or less the only position where Gibbs can tower over him.

"What the fuck did you do?"

Okay, Tim knows that's the Fear of Dad coming out, but he's got no clue why. Okay, yeah, him squirming around is probably annoying, but he doesn't think he needs this.

"Jethro?"

"There's only one reason a guy squirms like that, and it's a fresh case of crabs. What did you do?"

"Whoa! No!" He's pushing the chair back, but can't get any further away from Gibbs because the chair is back against the desk, and waving his hands in front of him in a don't attack gesture.
"Nothing like that, at all! Shaved all my hair off."

Gibbs steps back, looking really confused. "What?"

Tim rubs his eyes, looking horrendously embarrassed, though he'll take this over Gibbs killing him for fooling around on Abby.

"We like to really celebrate weddings, so, Abby and I shaved it all off." He pulls up his pant leg a few inches, showing off a very smooth calf.

"Why would you do that?" Gibbs is somewhere between horrified, stupefied, and Tim thinks there might be a hint of titillated curious in there, too.

"It felt really good." He shrugs a little. "You know how her skin feels really good right after she shaves or waxes?" Gibbs nods. "Well, yours does, too. It's… um… really soft and smooth, and girls really like soft and smooth, too, so… yeah… anyway… Good weekend." Tim sighs. "This part now, growing back in, not so much fun."

Gibbs nods at that, too. "Save it for the beginning of the long weekend next time."

"Yes, Boss."

Another minute passes, and with it the adrenaline spike of Gibbs about to attack. And when that passed, Tim starts to get pissed. He looks at Gibbs and says, "Crabs? Why the hell would you go there? You really think I'd fuck around on Abby?"

Gibbs looks embarrassed, and Tim thinks that's the first time he's ever seen that expression on Jethro's face. "This is why you don't assume. Seen the way you're squirming more than a few times back on active duty, and it was always the same thing. First two guesses were wrong, so…"

"Well, not this time." His eyes are narrowed and he's feeling really insulted. "I love her, you know that, right?"

"Yeah."
"So…"

"Guys do dumb things when they're scared. Even guys in love. Kid on the way, less sex at home, wife's changing. It can be scary."

"I'm fine. Not scared, at all. I love the way she looks right now, and judging by the fact you won't let me be alone with her for more than three minutes when we're at work, I figured you had noticed that, too. As for sex, I'm the most-fucked guy you know. Got laid seven times over the weekend. Friday morning, Saturday night, Sunday morning, at the wedding, and three times yesterday. Tony, who is on his honeymoon with enough Viagra to put him into a coma, doesn't have those kind of numbers. When would I have even had time fuck someone else? Been a bit busy this weekend."

Gibbs nods.

Tim thinks about it. "Did you fuck around on Shannon when she was pregnant? Is that why you thought that?"

That gets the Gibbs glare of death aimed at him.

"And me even asking it is pissing you off, isn't it?"

Gibbs nods.

"Back at ya."

"I'm sorry I asked."

"Damn right."

They're sitting in the van, staring at the monitors, listening to more random chatter.

"Why'd you become a cop?"

"Huh?" Tim isn't paying attention to Gibbs so he misses the question the first time he asked.

So Gibbs asks again. "Why'd you become a cop? You didn't train for it. No one in your family is a cop. You had options that paid better and would have been a lot easier."

"Jethro?" He doesn't know why Gibbs is wondering this. Seems pretty random given where they are and what they're doing. Granted, stakeouts tend to lead to pretty random conversations.

"Fornell asked me a while back, and I realized I didn't know. I know why Tony's a cop. I know why Ziva is. I know why Abby's in her lab, and why Ducky's in Autopsy. I know why I'm here. But I don't know why you are, or Jimmy for that matter."

"Jimmy's here because he really likes it. When he started here, it was a gig to help pay for med school. He stayed when he graduated because he likes it here."

"Oh."

"I'm here because I didn't have the balls to break the law."

"Tim?" It's clear by the look on Gibbs' face that that's not the answer he's expecting.
"I figured out really quick that what I liked about computers was the fact that I was better at them than almost anyone else. It was the first time in my life that was true about anything. And at my level, you don't keep score by money, it's about what systems you can crack, who you can take down. You've got two options, you can be Anonymous, breaking into other people's systems, blowing secrets away, or you can be me, keeping the secrets safe, going after guys like Anonymous.

"I'm a realist. I'm good. I'm damn good. I'm probably in the top 1000 hackers on the planet. And if I did it full time, I'd probably be in the top hundred. But that means there'd still be plenty other guys who could catch me.

"And catching each other is also how to keep score. The guy who takes out Anonymous wins the big prize. And I didn't have the balls for it. But stick a badge in my pocket, and suddenly I can do what I like, and not have to worry about going to prison for it. Sure, there's still a target on my back, but it's pretty small because no one knows who Tim McGee is. But since I've been at NCIS, the number of times our systems get hit has gone way up because they have noticed that someone at NCIS knows what he's doing. Eventually someone will take me down, count coup on me. But I've got a badge, so I'm on the side of the angels."

Gibbs just stares at him, amazed.

Tim shrugged a little. "Eventually, once I got out in the field, started working with you guys, it became about saving people. Originally, it was about not going to jail for doing what I liked to do. That's probably true for a lot of the guys down in Cybercrime."

He smiles at Gibbs. "Like in the westerns. The guy who puts on the badge doesn't much care about law, he just doesn't want to hang for his crimes. And eventually he decides that justice thing is important, and the badge changes him, but that's not why he got it in the first place."

---

Two more hours creep by. Tim's back with fresh coffee for both of them. He's been wondering something, and since Gibbs just asked him about his life…

"Why didn't the shaving thing freak you out?"

"Tim?"

"If I told Tony that, he'd be cracking jokes right and left, watching me out of the corner of his eyes like I'm radioactive, and almost as squirmy as I am. It just rolls off of you. I get the fact that nothing I do bugs Jimmy, nothing bugs him period, but… why doesn't it bug you?"

Gibbs shrugs. The look on his face saying, It just doesn't. The fact he's periodically done his chest and back to make different girlfriends happy has a lot to do with it, too, though he's never gone that far.

"Would have bugged my dad."

Gibbs shrugs at that, too.

He touches the cuff on his wrist. "Those bruises didn't bug you, either."

"Wouldn't say that."

"You know what I mean. You were concerned, not disgusted. Only time I've seen you disgusted when it comes to sex was Tony using those girls."

"That's disgusting." Gibbs takes a sip of the coffee, gives Tim a pay better attention look, and hands the cup back to him, taking the one Tim was about to drink from.

"Not disagreeing. But get a hundred guys together, ask them which is gross, taking all the hair below your eyelashes off or having sex with a fourteen-year-old who wants to have sex with you and snuck into a frat party to do it, and my guess is eighty or more of them will side with taking all the hair off over the girl."

"Tim, what are you actually asking me?"

Tim thinks about that; he is kind of beating around the bush here. But he's also having a kind of hard time figuring out how to get closer to what he's wondering about. "I'm not sure if I really am."

"Try it. I don't like the question, I won't answer."

"How did you know about padding the cuffs?" Okay, still not on target, but a lot closer.

Gibbs smiles at that. "Became a cop in '91. Worked with guys who came up in the '70s and '80s. Rules were a bit different then, but one thing stays the same, leave no bruises."

"Oh."

"Expecting something else?"

"Yeah."

"Didn't even own my own cuffs until after Shannon passed. The thing with the ropes I learned with her."

Tim raises an eyebrow.

"Her parents had a place in the mountains. We had some good weekends up there. Bed was metal, tended to squeak if you pulled on it too hard, wasn't as sturdy as I would have liked. We tried a few things, and she figured that if you put the rope under the mattress, that worked just fine."

Tim chuckles at that, smiling. "That why you don't get freaked out? Been there, done that?"

Gibbs shrugs at that, too. It's probably related to why it doesn't bug him, though he suspects he's been there and done that because it doesn't bother him, not the other way around. "Always figured bodies were bodies and it didn't matter what you did with them as long as you got the job done. Back in basic, I had a friend, Mattheson, and she—"

"She?" Tim's eye's widen. Best he knows, Gibbs was in basic back in '76-'77, before there were women on active duty.

"Yes. One of the first female Marines. She was a damn good Marine, fast, strong, knew what she was doing, took a ton of shit from the other guys and just kept going. She didn't much like me at first, either, thought I was hitting on her, just being subtle about it—"

"Were you?"

Gibbs shrugs at that, too. "Already loved Shannon. Knew I was going to marry her. But she was far away and letters didn't come every day, and Mattheson was there. I just… liked talking to her."

There's a soft look on Gibbs' face as he remembers his friend.
"Liked the fact she was there and not a guy?"

Gibbs nods.

"I get that." And Tim does. For as much of his life as he's spent in male-oriented activities, he genuinely likes women, and just having them near is nice.

"But, point is, she was a good Marine. And it didn't matter that she didn't have the same kind of body I did. And ever since then, guy, girl, gay, straight, whatever, just didn't matter if you did your job the way it needed to be done."

"What happened with her? She a general somewhere?"

Gibbs shakes his head sadly. "No. KIA."

"Oh, I'm sorry."

"I was, too. Got the news two days before leave. Couldn't even tell Shannon why I was so down. My other girlfriend got killed? Finally told her a buddy bit it, never told her the buddy's first name."

"Would it have bugged her?"

"I don't know. Didn't want to risk it. Things were going so good; I wasn't about to do anything that might have messed that up."

Tim thinks there's some warning in that sentence, maybe his conversation with Abby last night has him primed for that, or maybe Gibbs really does know and see all that happens to those he cares about.

"You still talking about you and Shannon?"

"Mostly." For once, Tim's having a hard time reading the look on Gibbs' face.

"You talking about me and Abby, too?"

"Am I?" And Tim gets the sense that he can't read the look on Gibbs' face, because Gibbs also isn't entirely sure what's going on.

"This part of why you were thinking crabs?"

"No. Just a feeling."

Keep talking, Tim's expression says.

Gibbs shrugs.

"Okay, this won't work if neither of us talks. What's the gut sensing?"

"Just, not blind. I know you" And Tim understands he means him and Abby, not just him personally, "and the Palmers get on well. Get on a whole lot better than most couples ever will. Saw the way you and Jimmy watch the girls. Saw the way the four of you dance."

Tim nods, drinks some of his coffee, realizes at the wedding was probably the first time Gibbs ever saw the four of them play with each other, and goes back to listening to the feed. Lots to process all right.
One of the reasons he loves Gibbs is that Gibbs just lets him think. Sure, he'll pressure Tim for answers, fast, if it's about a case. On the case, he's Scotty, Gibbs is Kirk, and it's his job to get the Enterprise flying in three minutes flat. But if it's personal, he doesn't have to come up with snap opinions and decisions, he can take the time to weigh out what's happening and try to really wrap his head around it.

More than two years ago, when he was getting ready to start courting Abby, Tim hunted down advice to do a good job of it.

And he's not done processing. Lots of thoughts still bopping around. But maybe some advice would be a good thing, too.

"We do get on well. I love Jimmy and Breena and they love us. And I love Abby. She's my world. And we don't want to mess it up. This is beyond really good. It's excellent. Living the dream. Got the happily ever after, you know?"

Gibbs nods.

"We talk about it… With them." Tim's expression silently asks if Gibbs is getting what he's saying.

The look on Gibbs face lets Tim know he's following along without Tim having to be more explicit.

"And until yesterday that was just a game. Hot stories for each other. But, it turns out that Abby and Breena talk about it, too. In a maybe-we'll-actually-do-it sort of way."

Gibbs' eyes widen a little at that, and Tim nods.

"And look, I've got everything, I mean everything, I could have ever possibly wanted. And more than that, I know I have it. I've got the cake, the ice cream, the whipped cream on top, with the cherry and sprinkles, but, it looks like there might be a possibility of coffee to go with it.

"And I do not want to fuck this up. At all. I mean, how often do we get called in because some moron couldn't just be happy with what he had?"

Gibbs nods at that, too.

"But, I'd be lying if I said I don't want it. It's my two favorite women on earth, together… What guy doesn't want that? And if it works… I mean… amazing sex with two gloriously beautiful women who love me… But if it doesn't..." Tim's shaking his head. "You got any advice?"

Gibbs' turn to think, and he does. Tim gets the sense that this is miles beyond the sort of providing fatherly advice he ever expected he'd have to deal with.

But, after about ten minutes he asks, "This wouldn't just be sex, would it? There's a big difference between the girls do something special your birthday, and making this a real relationship."

"I don't know. But, I kind of feel like if we could do it once, then we'd probably want to do it a whole lot. And I feel like if we could do it… then yeah, it'd be more than just a way to blow off steam on the weekends."

Gibbs smiles at that, sighs, and says, "Go slow. You guys become a foursome, none of us are going to care. Have fun, enjoy it. If it blows up, we're all gonna care. It goes sour, and you might rip our whole family apart. And if it goes great, we'll be happy for you.

"Wait until after Kelly's on the outside and you're settled into being parents, and Jimmy and Breena know the new baby is healthy."

Tim's eyebrows shoot up.

"Any of the girls suddenly stop drinking at celebrations and the gig is up. I take it they aren't telling anyone yet?"

"Just us, Ducky, and Penny. If things aren't right, and they have to terminate; they don't want to have to tell everyone."

Gibbs nods, that makes sense to him. "When'll they know?"

Tim does some quick math. "Middle to late June."

Gibbs seems to file that information and gets back on target. "Biggest problem I can see is you flip out when Abby flirts with someone else, and she does it for you. I can see you're generally okay with her snuggling with him. And I can see she doesn't mind Breena cuddling on you. And I could see both of you were happy as clams at the idea of the girls with each other."

Tim nods at that. He and Jimmy had spent a good five minutes just watching them dance with each other at the wedding, enjoying it a whole lot. Anyone who was watching could have seen that, and apparently Gibbs did.

"So, if you're gonna do this, have him kiss Abby, really kiss her, and you watch. You don't want to deck him; you kiss Breena. He doesn't want to hit you; maybe you can do it. Same for the girls. Make them watch. And then take the time to really think about it. Make sure you're really okay."

Tim gives him a self-deprecating look. "Good to get input from someone who can think about it with his brain."

Gibbs snorts a short laugh at that. "Tim, whatever you do, take your time and don't be stupid about it. You've got good instincts, trust 'em."

"Thanks."
Grocery shopping is traditionally a team sport for the McGee family. There is a very good reason for this: impulse control.

Non-pregnant Abby generally has no problems going into the grocery store, getting what she needs and leaving. Pregnant Abby is a somewhat different story. She has a very difficult time walking past the frozen food aisle and not buying every flavor of Ben and Jerry's. As for Tim, well, a big part of his staying in good shape diet strategy is not being around large quantities of delicious, fatty, sugary foods.

Once again, it is vastly easier to not eat a pack of Nutterbutters if there is no pack of Nutterbutters to eat.

Plus, it's a lot faster to split the list, which Tim has organized by aisle, grab everything on the list, and get out of there.

So, he handles the food on the outside ring of the store, meat, veg, bakery, dairy. She gets the inside area.

Then they meet back up, take the stuff out of each other's carts that they don't actually need, make sure they got everything on each other's list, and out they go, all the food they need for the next week.

It takes about an hour.

It also happens, traditionally, on Saturday morning after breakfast (or lunch, if they had a lay in) when neither of them are hungry.

So, it is with a sense of trepidation that Tim is entering the grocery store, alone, on a Tuesday night, not yet having eaten anything.

With all of the wedding stuff this weekend, they didn't get any shopping done, and while it's true they're not unused to eating out, they're also down to a quarter inch of milk, one serving of decaf coffee, no fruit, and no breakfast food.

So, shopping really does have to happen.

And Abby's got about another hour of work to go. (The upside of long-term surveillance is regular hours. Eight to five for two more days, they'll be sitting in a van.)

So he's grabbing a cart and checking the list, hoping he doesn't go too far off the reservation with this.

An hour and a half later he pulled into the Navy Yard parking lot, and Abby hopped into the car. She kissed him, buckled in, and then looked around in confusion.

"Thought you said you were going to get groceries."

"I did."
Traditionally I-got-groceries in her roadster means grocery bags in the tiny little back seat. She looks behind her to make sure she didn't somehow miss them.

"Trunk?"

"Not exactly."

And suddenly she knew exactly why he's twenty minutes late getting to her. He'd gotten the groceries and taken them home. "Did you get five hundred dollars worth of groceries again?"

"No." He's staring, very resolutely, at the road in front of him.

"Tim?"

"Four eighty-six."

He can feel her roll her eyes. "Oh, Lord."

"You'll like them."

"Not liking the groceries has never been the problem. Not eating all of them over the course of two days is the issue."

"It's mostly organic and healthy."

"Yeah, I remember you shopping organic and healthy last time. Just because it's organic, responsibly sourced dark chocolate-fudge with sea salt ice cream topping doesn't mean we need a ton of it."

He shrugs. They'd run out of that two weeks ago, and yeah, he did get more. No ice cream, though. They don't eat it with ice cream.

When he'd gotten home with the groceries he'd done two things. A: he put some rice on to cook. B: he tossed the cold stuff in the fridge and freezer, and then, having freed up enough space in her car to pick her up, back to the Navy Yard he went.

So, all of the grocery bags were still on the kitchen table when they walked in.

It was an awfully impressive mound of grocery bags.

Abby took one look at it and said, "Oh, God, Tim! What did you get?"

"Stuff we need."

She's staring at the mountain of bags on the table as he grabbed oil, steak, salt, pepper, ginger, and broccoli, and started on dinner.

"What could we possibly need this much of?"

Traditionally, he lugs the groceries in and then gets making whatever they're going to eat next. She puts them away.

He was cutting the steak into small pieces for the stir fry when he heard her open the first bag.

"Oh."

He looked over at her and grinned.
Apparently there are ways to sublimate the desire to buy every snack food in the entire grocery store.

See, Tim has always been vaguely aware of the fact that diapers, bottles, pacifiers, etc. had to come from somewhere. He's even put together the idea that people buy these things and grocery stores sell them. But since he's the guy who does the outside ring of shopping, he'd never actually been in the aisle with the baby stuff before.

And yes, he did get more snacks than were strictly necessary. (They don't actually need five kinds of Pepridge Farms cookies.) But he didn't buy every snack food in the store. He did, however, go a bit bonkers in the baby aisle.

And by a bit bonkers, well, he bought basically two of everything a newborn could possibly need.

He did leave most of it in the bags for her to open up and discover. But there was one thing he had in his pocket, and he wanted to show her special.

"Hey."

Abby looked up from a package of preemie diapers. (Because, just in case, you know. And if they don't need them, they can return them.)

He crooked his finger at her, signaling come here. So she did, big, wide smile on her face.

"I thought you'd like this."

"Like what?"

"It's in my pocket. Don't want to touch it with raw steak on my hands."

So she reached into his pocket, petted him a bit more than was strictly necessary, but he enjoyed it, and pulled it out, and, well, squeed, is probably the right word. It was a loud, very excited, and very cute, joyful shriek of a sound.

He laughed and kissed her forehead as she looked at the tiny, sparkly, pink pacifier with a skull with a bow on it.

"Saw that and couldn't not buy it."

She kissed him, grinning, bouncing. "Looks like you saw that and bought out the baby aisle."

He nods, little sheepish. They probably don't need three different kinds of diaper rash ointment or both baby Tylenol and baby Motrin. But, still, the basics are all in there. "We really will need most of it sooner or later."

"I know. Just, wow, that's a lot of stuff."

"Yeah."

Chapter End Notes
I've been bouncing this idea around for a while, and got some interesting comments along these lines as well... So readers, I'd like to get a better idea of how you understand this story and what you're hoping for how it goes.

How many of you are feeling like the interest in possibly being more than friends with Jimmy and Breena thing has been plucked out of thin air? It's been more than a hundred chapters since Tim and Abby started playing with the idea, but maybe it's been a bit too subtle? Also, polyamory is something I want to play with and explore (in a slow, gradual, nothing's happening for at least a year, yes, I'll do the proper build up, sort of way) but I also don't want a bunch of you unhappy about wrecking a perfectly good two person romance, so comments from the peanut gallery are more than welcome on this subject.
Long, lazy Saturday at home.

Tim sat as his desk, paper in front of him, pen in hand and started writing.

For Kelly:

You are:
love made breath
desire given form
ecstasy set free to walk the earth
From joy you came and joy you return

He’s staring at it, tapping his pen against the paper. Not really loving the last bit. It’s the right idea, the circle of joy, how it was their joy that made her and how she brings joy to them… but it’s still clunky.

It also doesn’t look right.

He crossed out You are… and spent another moment staring at it. Better.

And joy you bring

Nah.

He snagged a new page, wrote Kelly at the top of it, and circled the other lines around it.

Okay, that looked good. Began and ended with Kelly. He’s still not loving the last bit.

There needs to be something about joy in there. But it needs to be parallel construction with the first four lines.

Kelly
love made breath
desire given form
ecstasy set free
hope made joy

He stares at that, nodding. Then grabs another piece of paper and writes it in a circle. Yep. Much better. Still not right. Too many mades.
Kelly
love into breath desire into flesh ecstasy into mind
joy into life

Nope. Maybe not enough mades…

Kelly
love made breath
desire made heart
ecstasy made mind
joy made life

Closer. Not mind… But mind is important. Yeah, but not for this. Breath, heart, life are intangibles. So’s mind. Not the same sort of intangible. Really, heart is less tangible than mind… Okay, not intangible… feeling type things. They’re all feelings into physical representations of feelings. Ecstasy made soul…

Kelly
love made breath
desire made heart
ecstasy made soul
joy made life

He wrote that in a circle and looked at it for a long minute, almost… not quite there.

love made breath
desire made heart
ecstasy made soul
joy made Kelly

He circled that around, looked at it, tapped his pen on the side of the paper, and decided he liked that a whole lot.

He found a paintbrush, warmed up the dark chocolate fudge with sea salt ice cream topping, and found Abby.

“Can I borrow your tummy for a few minutes?”

She looked up from the Journal of Chemical Forensics. “Okay. Do you need the rest of me as well?”

“Wouldn’t hurt, but you can keep reading if you like. Really just need Kelly.”

Abby eyeballs the small paintbrush and the ice cream topping in his hand.

“What are you doing?”

“Poem.”

“In fudge on my tummy?”

“I could do ink if you like. Thought the clean up on this might be more fun.”

She smiled at that. “You got it on paper or in your head?”

“Head.”

“Tell it to me. I might want it on my skin for more than a few minutes.”

He sat next to her, lifted up her t-shirt and laid his fingers three inches above her belly button. “It’ll go in a circle, here.” He traced the circle on her skin. “love made breath/desire made heart/ecstasy made soul/joy made Kelly. Once written on there, I figured I’d get some pictures.”

That made Abby smile. “Get a Sharpie. I want to keep that. Can I add to it?”

“What do you want to add?”

“Not sure. Let me see how it looks, might be inspired.”

He’s nodding as he heads off in search of the Sharpies.

It’s true that Abby has a five by eight by three jade box that lives on her dresser. It’s true that in that box is a collection of poems Tim has written her. It’s also true that the majority of those poems are words on paper written by hand from him to her. But not all of them. Some of those poems are photos of his words written across her skin.

Some in ink.

Some in chocolate.

But if it’s a photo, the actual poem is also written on the back, pen on paper.

Since they got back together again in October of ’12, he’s written forty-six of them.

They’re overwhelmingly blank verse, though there is the occasional haiku, and one sonnet. They range from very good to okay and sincere to silly. Some have made her laugh, others cry, and they’ve all made her smile.

She loves all of them. And though Tim doesn’t know this, there is only one thing she wants to be buried with, and it’s those poems.
If the house is on fire, the baby and the poems are the two things she’s carrying out.

So, a while back, he’s not sure how far, Tim saw The Pillow Book. He doesn’t even remember why he saw it. But somehow, he ended up watching it.

And it turns out that it was a good choice.

He really liked that movie.

No, he couldn’t tell you what the plot was or the names of any of the characters (though he vaguely remembers Ewan McGregor was in it). What he does remember was how hard the idea of slowly, carefully stroking someone with a calligraphy brush made him, and how much he really wanted to do that/have it done to him.

So, in 2001 he finally had a real girlfriend, someone who was willing to play with him, and he wanted to try it out. Which was when he found out that if you do not, in fact, actually know how to write with a calligraphy brush, you end up with a VERY big mess, and an extremely irate girlfriend who is monumentally less than thrilled by the black ink you got all over her bed.

Eleven years later, he tried it with Abby, this time on the receiving end, and yeah, he liked it, a whole lot.

But Abby can paint. She can draw. She’s good with a brush or a pen or a marker. And if the scene she drew from his ankle to the nape of his neck was a little smudged in some spots when he wriggled because it tickled, well, she didn’t mind.

When he tried it on her, he made a mess.

Which was a problem, because for him, it’s not just the application of ink to skin, but of words to flesh. For him the words mattered, and a drippy, spotty, streaky illegible mess wasn’t the end goal he was looking for.

So the next time he tried, he subbed out ink for liquid chocolate, which had the advantage of being tasty and thick enough that he didn’t drip it all over the place. He can’t make the letters as small as he might like, but still, it worked pretty well, and everyone was happy with the result.

The time after that, he wanted the words to snake across her whole front. Which was when Abby reminded him that chocolate might be tasty, but yeast infections aren’t, so anything with sugar doesn’t go anywhere near her pussy.

But she did have markers.

And markers were good, too. He had better control. His letters were small enough he could get a whole poem on her. Tidy enough they could both read the words. All in all for anything with more than 100 characters they would do the job just fine.

Which is why they own one of those massive, every color they make, Sharpie packs.

He snagged it, drug all 100 markers back to the sofa where Abby was reading, and spent a while contemplating colors.
And, like always, he went with black.

Sometimes, rarely, (okay, once) if he’s feeling really into the work, he might add red highlights. He’s seen enough pictures of illuminated letters to know how that works. And it looked okay.

But really, it’s the words. And they’re clearest, easiest to read in black.

So, the ninety-nine other colors hang out in the pack, and he takes the lid off the black one, kneels in front of Abby, and contemplates the easiest way to do this.

“Think you can lay on your back for a few minutes?”

Last week she started feeling like it was hard to breathe and heartburn-y on her back. According to Breena being able to lie on your back for twenty-one weeks is something of a record, but since it’s the position that feels best for her back after a long day standing, having to say goodbye to it was not making Abby happy.

“How many is a few?”

“I think I can have this done in less than two.”

“I can do that.”

He held the marker between his teeth and gave her a hand getting horizontal. Yes, she can still lie down and get back up again without help, but it’s nice, and makes things easier for her, so he might as well do it. Especially since she’s going out of her way and doing something uncomfortable to humor him.

Once she was down, he got writing, fast. Sure, he’d like this to be a sensual experience, but he’d also like to get it done and let her breathe. So he wrote as fast as he could, while keeping his letters clear, shifting around her to get the angles right, and in less than a minute he had a perfect circle of legible black words slipping around her belly building on each other.

He helped her back up and she looked down, nodding.

“You feeling inspired to add to it?”

She shook her head. “It’s done.”

He pulled out his cell and began to take pictures of her.

“How are you going to give it to her?” Abby asks, looking at the markers.

“No idea. Are we going to do baby books?”

“Uh…” Abby looks alarmed by that thought. “Are you expecting either of us to have time for something like that?”

Tim sighs. “Not really. But we will give it to her, when she’s old enough to understand it. Maybe when we become grandparents?” He grins as he says that and sees Abby start to tear up. “Oh no. Nononononono! We’re not crying about that.” He kisses her, petting her tummy and face. “That’s a happy thought.”

“They’re happy tears.” Abby sniffs a little, kissing his hand which is resting against her cheek. “Thirty years from now, we might be showing her this.”
“Yeah, we might.” His thumb strokes over her cheek, wiping away a tear. He smiles again, and scoots back a few inches. “Let me get a few more shots, make sure it’s clear.”

She nods. “You want to get some new ink to commemorate this?”

Tim looks up from her tummy. “Hadn’t thought about that, really. Like what?”

“Not sure.” She’s playing with the sharpies. “We got tattoos when we got serious, got another when we got married, seems like having a baby would warrant some new ink.”

“Probably right about that. Granted, having a new baby also probably precludes spending hours in a tattoo studio or dealing with the upkeep they need as they heal up.”

“Good point.” She’s picking out the green sharpies, the black one, and a few blues.

“You look like you might be getting an idea.”

“Maybe. It’d be really big.”

“How big is really big?”

“Your whole back.”

“You want me to wander off for twenty hours when we’ve got a new baby and spend a month rubbing lotion on me while it heals up?”

“You could get it before she’s born.”

“Huh.” Somehow that hadn’t occurred to him. “What is it?”

“Get naked, lay down on the sofa, and you can see what I’m thinking,” Abby’s grinning now, looking like this’ll be fun, and well, he’ll happily be a canvas for her anytime she likes. Not like he’s got to be anywhere in the next three hours.

He pulls his shirt over his head while asking, “So, how big are you thinking? Am I getting naked because this’ll be on my legs, too?” He’s got three tattoos now, so he can pretty definitively say he doesn’t want one on his ass or the backs of his thighs. Anything he’s got to sit on is staying ink free.

“Nah. Just want that inch or two of your back below your waistband.”

“Okay.” His pants and boxers hit the floor next to the shirt.

He lays down, and she drapes a blanket over his legs and tush, which he appreciates because it’s a little cool out. April is rapidly warming up, and real spring seems to have come to DC, but that’s still about twenty degrees cooler than what he considers comfortable hanging out naked weather.

They spend two hours chatting, her drawing, him relaxing. He dozes a little, when she’s concentrating hard, enjoying the feel of the markers on his back. Some of it is a little ticklish, but mostly it’s just a very pleasant tingly sensation. She started the drawing up by his right shoulder and finished it by his right hip.

He started to get up but Abby said, “Stay put, just a little longer. Want to make sure it’s good and dry before you go scooting around.”

“Okay. Take a picture, let me see it.”
She did, showing him his back a second later.

It’s a dragon. European style, wings and claws and longer front legs than back ones. The drawing is a cartoon outline type of thing, no shading or shadows, no scales or real details. It’s mostly light green, with darker green eyes and darker green wings. The head is on his right shoulder, and the tail starts on the left side of his back, curling around the dragon’s legs and ending on the right hip. The wings are down, relaxed, and if a dragon can smile, it’s smiling, looking down, at the very small, mostly light blue (she’s got little green wings) dragon sleeping, head on the big dragon’s tail.

He’s propped on his elbows, expanding the picture so he can see it better, and smiling at it.

“I left room for other baby dragons,” Abby says, sitting on the sofa next to him.

Tim nods, seeing that there was extra tail space, room on the neck, and a spot between the front legs where other babies could be added.

“I love it,” he says kissing her. Then adds, “But I thought I was an Asian style dragon.” She’s been working on the headboard for Kelly’s crib, and there’s a sort of stylized family portrait on there. The guys are all dragons, and he’s a jade-green, Asian-style one.

She touches his face, looking into his eyes. “Your eyes are the color of jade. So they make me think of the carved jade dragons. But your back works better with an European dragon shape. More room for baby dragons to play, too. Either way, you’re still green.”

“Am I dry enough to get up and see it in a mirror?”

She tentatively swiped her finger over one of the spines on the dragon’s neck. “Yep.”

“Good.” He heads into their bedroom, opens her closet door, and hops onto the dresser. One other good thing about the mirrors being set for sex is that no matter what part of yourself you want to look at, there’s a way to set the mirrors in their room to do it.

Up close, personal, and a lot bigger, he still likes it. But it’s not something he necessarily wants on his back for the rest of his life. It’s cute, really cute. And big. It does cover his whole back, and that’s just the outline version, colored in and shaded and this would be literally days of tattooing. A few hours is one thing. Days of ink work, something else all-together.

Mostly though, it’s really cute. It’s vastly cuter than anything he wants burned into his skin for the rest of his life.

“Will you hate me if I say that’s way more work than I want done?” Which is both true and doesn’t hurt her feelings about how cute it is and how he just can’t take that much cute on his skin.

“No.”

“Thank you.” He kisses her. “But if that ever found its way to paper. I’d happily mount and frame it and put it up in Kelly’s nursery.”

“I like that.” Abby glances at the clock. “Don’t you have bootcamp in forty minutes?”

He looked over, jumping off the dresser. “Yeah. Gotta get dressed and go!”

Chapter End Notes
Okay, so after getting some input from you guys off in readerland, here's what's going to happen with Shards:

As a professional writer, (shameless self-promotion) I'm a firm believer in the idea that a good writer takes account of the likes, dislikes, and desires of the fans and provides them with a product they love.

As an artist, I'm a firm believer in the idea of being true to your artistic vision, exploring the topics you feel need to be dealt with and taking your characters where they need to go.

And as a member of the internet age, I get to do both.

The general consensus of Archive of Our Own readers was: Bring on the McPalmer! More McPalmer! Yay!

But general consensus isn't the same thing as everyone loving the idea, and Archive isn't the only place I post this story. I also post on FF.net

Apparently the general consensus of the readers on FF was: McPalmer! Ick! No! Please, no! Nooooooo!

So, I’ll do both. Here on Archive I’ll post a McPalmer version of the story. They’ll get to that cliff and jump off. On Fanfiction I'll keep the story McPalmer free. (Well, not totally, there'll still be the build up, but they'll decide not to go down that path.)

Now, obviously, I like the McPalmer idea, and since you’ve stuck with me through what is now literally a thousand pages of this story (Seriously page one of this chapter is 1001 on my word doc.), I’ll hazard the guess that you might actually like how I write a story. So, if you don’t find the idea of McPalmer to be disgusting, you might want to see how I do it. (Trust me, I haven’t lead you wrong yet, or taken any of my characters OOC, and I’m not gonna. I will make this work!)

But I also get that for some of you McPalmer a visceral yuck of a storyline, and I don’t want to turn something you enjoy, something you look forward to every day into this: Hey, did you read that Raist story? Yeah. (shudder) Shame the damn thing went off the rails 1300 pages in. It was so good until the author went bonkers.

So for those of you who want a classic romance, off to fanfiction with you.

Those of you who are interested in a less traditional romance, and a deeper exploration of sex/love/orientation/family/position/politics, stay here.

And like when this story went from T to E, I’ll give you lots of warning ahead of time for what’s going to happen.

Meanwhile, we’re at least a year (in story time) before any of this will come to a head.

As for the greater arc… The shards will find their wholes. And we’re getting fairly close to that. The current official last chapter of Shards is set in 2019. Right now, we’re in 2015. We will, before the end of this, meet all of the Palmer, McGee, and DiNozzo babies, and see all of them as parents, finally put Tim and the Admiral to rest, get Gibbs at peace with his past and moving on to better future, and see Tim, Tony, and Jimmy take on new career rolls.

There is a sequel in the works as well. It will be a whole lot shorter, and set when Tim is 49-45 and Abby 53-58. It’s called Five Years.

And one final short (ish) story that’ll wrap the whole thing up. That one’s set in 2036 or 37 and… well… most of it is written, and I think it’s hilarious and can’t tell you more without spoilers.

Maybe, if I can write it, and I don’t know if I can, there’s one last short story.

This is a story about lovers, fathers, sons, brothers, and friends, the families we’re born with and the families we make. But mostly, it’s about love, in all its colors and flavors and how that intersects with sex and friendship. No matter which version you read, it’ll keep being a story about those things.

Anyway… Thanks for the input.

More good stuff tomorrow or the next day!

Keryl
My Little Dragons

He was only three minutes early, which was, by Team Gibbs standards, two minutes late.

"Hopin' we'll start without you?" Gibbs asks as he drops his bag by the ring and toes off his shoes.

"By all means, you want to have a go at Jimmy, I'll hang out and watch," Tim says pulling out the tape and getting started on his hands.

Gibbs looks at Jimmy and seems to think about it. Then he nods. "Tim, pay attention. Jimmy, you're on defense."

"Again?" Jimmy's getting bored on defense. It's not playing to his strengths, and he finds it frustrating.

"You're on defense until you can figure out how to read someone's moves. You're so used to doing this with Tim you're getting lazy. No more of that."

"So, I'm on defense until I can read a fight. I finally get to the point where I've got a guy I can read, and you sub him out."

"You're not reading Tim. You've memorized how he fights."

"Tomato, tomahto."

Gibbs gives him the enough sass, get the hell in the ring and let's fight look. "Tim, watch, pay attention. You're getting lazy, too. You've got a routine, and he's got it memorized, so learn some new tricks."

Tim nods, leaning against the ropes, and settles in to watch and learn.

Having done this for two and a half months now, Tim's come to the conclusion that, as exercise goes, he actually likes Bootcamp. It's not boring. He's honing useful skills. The endorphin rush is nice. It's time with Jimmy and Gibbs, which is good, too. And it burns more than enough calories so he can have some sort of sugary treat after.

Just because he didn't use the dark chocolate fudge ice cream topping for the poem doesn't mean he doesn't have some ideas for it for later tonight.

He's thinking the reason he likes Bootcamp now, because it was just as much of a work out when he started at NCIS, is that he's finally doing it with someone who's about evenly matched to him. Or maybe it's the fact that he's relaxed enough with Gibbs now that he's not terrified of looking like an idiot.

Either way, as he, Jimmy, and Gibbs hit the showers, he's soaking wet with sweat, tired, a little sore, and all in all feeling really good.

Really, he doesn't remember what they were talking about. And by they he means he and Jimmy, Gibbs was mostly quietly listening, adding an occasional word.

But he does know that he pulled his shirt over his head, starting to strip off for the showers when he hears Jimmy say, "That's cute."
Which was when he remembered he had a whole lot more skin art than usual. "Yeah, thanks."

Gibbs looked up from unlocking his locker, but by that point Tim's back was to the lockers. One look from Gibbs got him to turn around. When he turned back, now sans pants and towel wrapped around his hips, Gibbs was shaking his head, looking like he was about to roll his eyes.

"It's not real, is it?" Jimmy asks.

"Abby drew it on me this afternoon."

"This is what you do when you're home alone?" Jimmy's got a sort of cocky my god you're such nerds look on his face.

"I wrote a poem for Kelly on her. We got talking skin ink to celebrate the baby. This was her idea for me."

"That supposed to be you and Kelly?" Jimmy asks.

Tim nods.

"You're so not a dragon."

"Uh huh. Okay, what am I?"

"I don't know," Jimmy shrugs, thinks for a moment, then grins, "a koala?"

"You want koalas, look in the mirror. I'm not that cute or fuzzy."

"Especially not today," Jimmy broke in with smirk. Yes, his body hair is growing back in, and thank all that's good and holy, is past the god-awful itchy phase, but it's still pretty clear he shaved it all off.

"Not ever, really. Cute and fuzzy, that's you and Breena. If Abby thinks I'm a dragon, I get to be a dragon."

"Uh huh…"

Gibbs is still looking at his back. "When Kelly was little she had My Little Ponies." Jimmy's grinning, he knows what they are and where this is going. "That thing on your back is a My Little Dragon."

Jimmy and Gibbs laughed. Tim flashed them a I am so done with you idiots look and headed for the shower.

Twenty minutes later, he's out, drying off (carefully, he doesn't want to smudge the dragons too much). Yeah, they're cute. Sure, he doesn't want them burned into his skin forever. But Abby did spend two hours drawing them on, so he'll do what he can to keep them in good shape for as long as possible.

"So how long would that take?" Jimmy asks.

"Oh, god, no. Not actually getting this tattooed on. Just the outline was two hours with a Sharpie. It'd be even longer with a tattoo gun." He touches the knot on his right arm. "That was four hours and nine minutes, and that was long enough."
Jimmy looks at Gibbs, who is sitting down on the bench, putting his briefs on, and thus, very naked. "Why don't you have any? Getting them is traditional military, right?"

"Nothing I ever wanted burned into my skin."

"Not your unit insignia?" Tim asks.

"Thought about it. Never got drunk enough to do it. Shannon didn't like 'em, either."

"Breena likes them. You ever going to get one?" Tim asks Jimmy, while pulling on his boxers.

"Nope. My body already has a hard time fighting off infections. Last thing I need to do is open myself up to one by getting an intentional flesh wound."

"Good point."

"I liked the way the henna one looked before my skin broke out in hives."

Tim buttoned his shirt. "Sharpies might be an option."

"Got enough on my plate, don't have time for lying around letting her draw on me."

Tim shrugs. "Feels nice. Doesn't have to take hours."

Gibbs is just watching the two of them have this conversation, pretty stunned to see them actually talking about this. It occurs to Tim that this is the first time Jethro's actually worked out hard enough with them to join in on the locker room conversation after.

"How nice?" Jimmy asks, grabbing his jeans from the locker.

"I've got My Little Dragons on my back. How nice do you think?"

Jimmy nods, pulling his pants up. "So, you let her shave you, or you do it yourself?"

"Both of us. And you were right, totally worth it."

Gibbs has a look on his face best described as, mildly surprised but feeling like he should have known Palmer would be into that, too.

Now Jimmy's nodding sagely, slipping on his socks. "You get Abby to tell you what she put in Tony's present?"

Tim smirks, reaching for his wrist cuff, enjoying the memory of that. "Yep."

"Gonna tell?" Jimmy looks up at him, pausing in his dressing to pay attention to the answer.

"Can't. Sworn to secrecy. Breena tell you what she put in?" Tim asks, fastening his wrist cuff.

Big, wide, somewhat condescending but very happy smile on Jimmy's face. "Oh yeah."

"You got sworn to secrecy too, didn't you?" Tim asks as he grabs his jeans out of the locker.

"Yep."

Tim's combing his hair when he notices something, Jimmy's getting ready to leave, with no glasses. Then it hits him, Jimmy wears contacts to fight, and he must have kept them in.
Then something else hit him. "Which do you like better, glasses or contacts?" He wears the glasses at work, but as Tim thinks about it, he's noticed that Jimmy's been wearing the contacts on weekends and off time.

"Why are you asking?"

"Got my eyes checked Friday. Twenty/thirty in the left, twenty/thirty-five in the right. I don't need them yet, but corrective lenses are on the horizon for me."

"Once I could get them in and out fast, I liked the contacts better, but, when I'm at work, I never know what we're going to run into, and I like the extra layer of protection the glasses offer. Plus, I get something on them, and I can get them off in a tenth of a second."

That made sense to Tim. "You don't wear contacts, do you?" he asked Gibbs. They've all seen Gibbs’ glasses for close up work, but he's not sure if Gibbs has distance vision issues yet or not.

Gibbs shakes his head and hands Tim his glasses. He squints through them, noticing that Gibbs is awfully farsighted. "They're trifocals. Top does distance. Bottom close up. Middle's plain glass. And I don't usually wear them because anything further than eight feet and closer than fifty is still in sharp focus."

"Add sniper to the list of skills we're replacing."

Gibbs glares a little at that, not enjoying being faced with the fact that he can no longer hit a target at 3000 meters, but nods because it's true. "We're seeing the first of the FLETC candidates Monday, right?"

"Yeah. Catherine Howard."

"Can she shoot?"

"Don't think so. Not like that, at least. She's the computer wizard."

"The baby out of CalTech?" Before the wedding the four of them had gone through the five names Tim's contact at FLETC had sent over, and decided on three to get to know better.

"Yeah."

Gibbs nods, takes his glasses back from Tim, and says, "See you Monday."

The three of them were dressed by that point, so they headed out of the locker room and went their own ways.
Interviews

Having your team be on the shelf also means you’ve got time to do some interviews. Get to know some prospective new team members.

So, for week two of Tony and Ziva’s honeymoon, between paperwork, and running down leads for other teams, Tim and Gibbs start interviewing possible replacements.

Technically, they’re replacements for Gibbs, since Tim is trying to keep his moving to Cybercrime on the quiet, though they don’t actually know which one of them will go first.

Tim’s handling most of the preliminaries. The get to know NCIS speech, tour the building, explain a little of what they do. He figures it’ll be good practice for when he’s in charge of Cybercrime. In spare minutes, he’s been thinking more and more about how he’s going to whip it into shape. It’s one thing to tell Vance he’s going to turn it into the premier Cybercrime division, and a whole other thing to actually do it. Best he’s got so far, without really getting to see what they’re up to, team building and better hiring are going to be his two main strategies.

Catherine Howard is the first of the interviews. She’s younger than Tim thinks it is possible for a person to be (which he figures is a good sign of his having become middle-aged) but somehow she’s managed to get her Masters in Forensic Computing from CalTech by twenty-two. No military background, but according to Carter, she’s the best hacker FLETC’s seen in, well, ever.

They’re both a little nervous. It’s the first interview he’s given, and he’s got the sense it might be the first one she’s ever had, either.

He tries to remember the last time he had an interview; he thinks it was for MIT. NCIS recruited him out of MIT, more than four agencies got into a bidding war over him, so the nervous, proving he was good enough thing didn’t happen.

Query letters for Deep Six is probably the closest he’s ever come to the traditional apply for a job/interview thing, and that was done entirely by mail. He didn’t have any face time with his agent until after he’d gotten his manuscript accepted.

So, it’s not like this is something he’s familiar with, or has done a lot, but he does know what it’s like to be on the wrong foot, feeling overwhelmed and a bit out of place. And Howard looks out of place, overwhelmed, and like she really wants to make everyone like her.

So, that’s not something he has a hard time empathizing with. Plus he read her thesis over the weekend, and got talking to her about it, which got them both into a pretty comfortable place, and for a fairly pleasant half hour they chatted about smarter search algorithms. And once she seemed settled, or at least started to smile some, he led her to his desk, handed her a thumb drive and said, “It’s a closed case, but here’s all the raw data we had. Have at it. Show me what you can do with it.”

She stared at it. “Here?”

“Yep. These are the tools you’ll have, unless you bring your own.”
“Okay. What am I looking for?”

“It’s a murder. This is everything we found about the vic. The killer’s buried in the data. Go find him.”

She nods. “That’s really vague.”

“Yes. But I picked this case intentionally. It’s one where we caught the guy from the data. Nothing about the scene or how he died was useful. It’s all in there. Find me a killer.”

“Okay. Any parameters for the search?”

“Nope. Do whatever you like with the data, just find the guy.”

Tim’s rapidly coming to the conclusion that Carter is right. He’s used to being... well, not the best and brightest, but he is the guy who can follow what the best and brightest are doing, figure out why they’re doing it, and what they’re going to do next.

He plays damn good computer defense.

He can tell she’s nervous because he’s hovering, watching her, but even with that, her code is simple, elegant, cutting away the chaff in long, clean strokes.

She’s faster than he is. Not as well-trained, no instincts, yet. She’s skimmed over the trouble spot twice now without seeing it, but for pure technical skill, she’s phenomenal.

The question is, can instinct be learned?

He flashes Gibbs a text. Did I have any instincts when you hired me?

Gibbs very slowly texts back: Knew not to piss me off.

He looks up and glares at Gibbs. Seriously. She’s killing the code. I’ve never seen skills like this. But she’s missed the problem three times now. Can’t seem to see it. Trying to remember if you learn instincts or not.

Both. You start with some, and then learn how to use them. Which case is she hunting through?

Salazo.

Weekly meeting with the killer, being blackmailed, ran out of cash, and got killed for it?

Yeah. It’s in his calendar, financials, and email.

And she can’t see it?

If she does, she hasn’t put it together yet.

Then what’s she doing?

Right now, analyzing cell phone data.

That was a dead end, right?
Best I remember.

How long you going to let her work?

I got it in an hour. Gonna give her four.

Okay. Go get a coffee. Stop hovering over her. You’ve seen how she’s working, now let her work.

It takes Howard three hours to find it, but find it she did. He's sitting at Tony’s desk, filling out paperwork when she jumps up, springs, kitten-like over the twelve feet to where he is and says, “Got it! It’s jakeb@brinny.com. Some sort of blackmail thing that went wrong, right?”

Tim nods, smiling. “Yep. What do you do next?”

“Track down jakeb.”

“Good. So, you like doing it?”

“Yeah! That’s so cool.”

“Glad you liked it.”

“Any questions?” Tim asks Gibbs as Howard stares at them, looking, for the first time, fairly pleased with herself and confident.

Gibbs gets up, stands behind her, blocking her view of Tim’s cubicle and says, “Tell me about McGee’s wife.”

All the blood drains out of Howard’s face. “Excuse me?”

“You sat in his cubicle for three hours. Tell me about her.”

“Uhhhh…” They can both see blind panic in Howard’s eyes as she desperately tried to think up anything about the mysterious Mrs. McGee. “I’m sorry. I didn’t notice. Unless you’re married to your computer…” She smiles, hoping that would go over.

“Okay, Howard. Thanks,” Tim says. That is actually a pretty good question. Because it’s not just computer skills they need. The ability to see what’s around you is vital for this job.

“I just totally bombed this whole thing, didn’t I?”

Tim smiles gently at her. “Not the whole thing. You’re great with a computer, any of the Federal Agencies would be glad to have you on their Cybercrime teams. You want to apply for our Cybercrime team, I’ll put in a good word with Jenner for you, but you do need to pay attention to the world around you in this job.” And as he says that, he makes a mental note to keep her contact information. If she doesn't apply for it on her own, he’ll look her up when he was in charge.

Wednesday, Eric Draga comes to visit.
Twenty-eight years old, once a Navy flyboy, honorable discharge when an accident left him with a need for glasses. His vision is more than good enough to be a cop. Not good enough to fly a fighter jet three times the speed of sound.

Tall, relaxed, seems to see everything, asks lots of questions, takes to Gibbs fast, and doesn’t really pay much attention to Tim. Reminds Tim a lot of most of the other soldiers they get in here.

His computer skills are passable. Tim’s are better. Howard’s are much better. But he knows what he’s doing, and he’s got the pattern pulled out in two hours. Tim’s pretty impressed. This one might be a good match for their team. He can see Ziva liking him.

And like with Howard, Gibbs asks Draga, “What can you tell me about McGee’s wife?” when they get to the end of the practical skills test.

“Black hair, tattoos, tall for a woman but not as tall as McGee, pregnant, congratulations by the way, first baby, right?”

Tim nods, impressed.

“She’s his daughter,” he nods at Gibbs, “and it’s your first baby but not his first grandchild, right?”

“Close enough,” Gibbs says, smile tugging at his lips.

“How close?” Draga looks interested in the answer to this.

“None of us are blood, but you’ve got the basic relationships right. How are you figuring first baby?” Tim asks.

“Ultrasound pics, no baby pics, means she’s pregnant but baby isn’t on the outside yet. Little curly haired girl on…” he turns to Gibbs and points to the shot of Molly on Jackson's lap. “That’s your dad, right?” Gibbs nods. “Obviously family, she’s on your wall, but not his, so not his baby. So, she’s one of your grandkids, but not from his wife.”

Draga turns to look at Gibbs’ desk and the cubicle behind it, quickly finding the snap of Gibbs giving Ziva away. (Jimmy had taken it, and Breena made him give Gibbs a copy the day they got back to work.) “She your other daughter’s child?”

“Nope.” Gibbs looks over his cubicle. “Don’t have pics of her parents up. Probably should get some.” He scans Tim’s cubicle and finds Jimmy and Breena in one of the wedding shots. “She belongs to those two.”

“Ahhh…”

“So, do you have any questions for us?” Tim asks.

Draga thinks about it. “Agent Gibbs is retiring, but he’s not the tech guy on this team, you are. So, why are you looking at me for the job?”

Tim and Gibbs smile at that. “Baby’s due in July. I’ll be in and out for a few weeks, maybe longer.”

“You don’t need me for just a few weeks.”

“Nope. But it’s a good place to start. I’m the only one with tech skills. Back in ’02, when I started, that wasn’t a big deal. These days, those skills have to be redundant. Put plainly, I’m tired of being irreplaceable. I went on vacation, and it took Ziva ten hours to do a job I do in twenty minutes because she was looking by hand.”

Draga looks horrified by that. “By hand?”

“Yeah, sorting phone records by hand.”

“Ugh.”

“Yeah. And from what Carter’s sent me, you can shoot, which is a skill for both of us, pick locks, he’s better at that than I am, you speak Navy, which we lose when he goes, and we’re gonna guess that with a background in aviation, you can probably handle a car well.”

“That’s true. Used to drag race as a kid.” Both Tim and Gibbs get the sense that by ’used to’ he means 'I've never stopped' and 'as a kid' means 'the week before last.'

“You and Ziva are going to get along so well,” Tim says.

“Ziva?”

“His other daughter. She and Tony are on their honeymoon right now.”

“So, wait. I join this team and it’s you, and your brother and sister-in-law?”

“Sort of. It’s me and my partners. We’ve been working together for more than a decade now. They’ve been married ten days.”

Draga thinks about that for a moment before saying, “New man in after that much time together’ll be tricky.”

“Yeah, it will,” Gibbs says. “The question is, are you the guy to do it?”

“Honestly, I don’t know. But if you think this went well, I’d like to meet Agents… DiNozzo and DiNozzo?”

“He’s Tony and she’s Ziva, but yes, the Agents DiNozzo,” Tim answers. He notices Gibbs looking around, realizes neither of them have said Tony or Ziva’s last name, then sees the name plate on Tony’s desk and nods again. Yeah, Draga is winning lots of points on this interview.

Friday they see Shaun Aubrey. The twenty-seven year old former Marine, did one tour, used the GI Bill to go to college, got his degree in forensic accounting then hit FLETC. Carter had said he’d been looking at the FBI and IRS, but seemed intrigued with the idea of NCIS when he mentioned it.

He looks significantly more the traditional geek than Howard or Draga. Not so much clothing, he’s in the more or less required male uniform for an interview, navy suit, white button down, conservative tie, but there’s a sort of fussy air to him.

Tim has a hard time imaging how he survived in Afghanistan in the dirt and grime. He looks like the kind of guy who carries hand sanitizer. If anything, he’s a few steps beyond Tim on the everything needs to be properly organized front.

He’s the first one to look at Tim’s set up after being offered the thumb drive and actually ask, “May I rearrange it? I’m not left-handed.”

“Sure, do whatever you like to make yourself comfortable. Just put it back when you’re done.”

Ten minutes later, Tim’s workstation is more or less completely rearranged, and Aubrey has subbed out Tim’s mouse and keyboard for his own, which he had brought along with him.

Tim hovers behind, watching him work. Forensic Computing, Tim’s specialty, and Forensic Accounting, Aubrey’s, are not actually the same thing, though there is a large overlap. Tim’s having no problem following what Aubrey’s doing.

When Tim works a case, he starts with phone/email records, then moves onto financials. Usually something in the first two give the others some leads to hunt down, and while they do that, he sifts through bank accounts, looking for more info to connect the dots.

Aubrey starts with the financials, finds the payments, highlights them, then hits email and has the case solved in twenty minutes.

Which, if he had started with the financials and not the cell records, is only slightly faster than Tim would have done it.

Then he took five minutes and put everything back, exactly the way Tim had had it.

He, Aubrey, and Gibbs confer at Ziva’s desk, and Gibbs asks his question: “What can you tell me about McGee’s wife?”

Aubrey shakes his head, looking at Tim. “I noticed you had some wedding pictures up, but beyond that, I didn’t really look. She was in white and red? You were in gray. I think her hair is black… Sorry.”

“It’s okay, you weren’t there very long.”

“I can, however, tell Agent Gibbs the specs for all the equipment on your desk, including the stapler. After all, that was a question to see how well I pay attention, right?”

“Yes. What you see of the things you aren’t focused on. You never know where the clue that tells the real story will be. The body may get all the attention, but sometimes it’s the pictures on the mantle that let you know who the killer is,” Tim replies.

Gibbs keeps staring at Aubrey. ‘You really want to be a field agent?”

“Do I not look like a field agent to you?”

Gibbs shrugs. He’s seen all sorts make it at this.

“I wouldn’t be here if the idea didn’t hold some appeal. I prefer a combination of desk work and getting out in the real world. The Marines was too much field. School was too much desk work. I think NCIS may provide a balance where I’d thrive.”

“Just might,” Gibbs agrees, especially given that Aubrey would most certainly be taking Tim’s place on the team. Even with a Marine background, Gibbs can see this isn’t the kind of guy that’ll automatically command respect from other military men.

“You have any questions for us?” Tim asks.

“What is the field/deskwork balance?”
Tim smiled at that. “With your skills, it’d be about seventy percent desk work, thirty percent field. We all process the crime scene. You’d head back to run the data,” because Tim’s sure that if they end up with him and Aubrey on the team, he’ll be out in the field while Aubrey runs the data, until they could get someone with more of Gibbs skills/Aubrey picked up more field skills to round out the team. “While you run data, we round up leads, deal with the evidence. Few hours later we get together again with the preliminary data, and work up a plan from there. But, until you’d been in the field more, you’d mostly be on crime scenes. Over your probie year, you’ll get out in the field more, start learning interrogation, talking to people, eventually dealing with perps. But at least at first, you better like orange, because you’ll be seeing a lot of it.”

Aubrey smiles at that. “But, eventually, I’ll get out there?”

“Soon as we catch a case, you’ll be out there. Everyone does crime scenes.”

“Good. There’s something more… satisfying about going after killers than tax evaders.”

That gets a smile out of Gibbs.

“Yeah, there is,” Tim says. “I turned the IRS down for exactly that reason.”
Grass

With the exception of the past six months, for the entirety of Tim McGee's adult life, he's been an apartment dweller.

Now, usually this wouldn't be an issue, but with April edging toward May the weather's getting warmer, and he's noticing something: namely he is now in possession of a large amount of grass. A very large amount of grass, and none of the neighbors have knee high grass, so it's probably his job to do something about this before he does.

So, what to do?

There are two ways to handle this. The easy way, namely pick up the phone, make a few calls, and hire someone to deal with it.

But for some reason that's just not hitting him right. He's a homeowner damnit! He might as well mow his own grass at least once.

So he takes the hard way, spending a week researching lawn mowers (between interviews and paperwork. And every day when he gets home from work, the grass is taller.), while Abby gently teases him about nesting, which, well, that's probably true, there's no other reason why he'd suddenly be in a take care-of-grass-or-die-trying mindset.

But the fact that may be true is in no way diminishing his need to manage the grass.

And so, bright and earlyish, because he doesn't want to be the bad neighbor who's mowing at 7:00, he's in their yard, mucking about with the mower, getting ready to embark on his first mowing experience since he was seventeen.

It's not like riding a bicycle. Mostly because it's not a damn bicycle, and the thing he's pushing around right now is about ten light years more advanced than the old push mower his mom had had.

And honestly, this isn't that bad. It's cool and pleasant out, still a little damp from the night. And it's not terrible exercise. Granted, he's not thinking this is ever going to be something he likes, but it's not bad either. Better than shoveling the driveway when it snows.

It takes a lot longer than he expected it to. Until he was pushing the mower back into the garage, he didn't think he had a huge yard.

Walking through the house he smells bacon, and between that delicious smell and the fact that, yeah, he is a bit on the hungry side, he's suddenly wondering what Abby's up to.

He heads into the kitchen. "What are you making?"

"Your favorite."

"Really?" He looks her over from head to toe, she's in a black t-shirt and a pair of loose, drawstring, flannel jammie pants, left over from when he was still heavy, licks his lips, grins, and says, "You're looking way too dressed for my favorite."

She laughs. "BLTs. Ready in about five minutes."

"Oh! Those are good, too. How about ten, let me hop in the shower."
"That works."

He doesn't need to really scrub or anything, he's just rinsing off the sweat and the little bits of grass that are stuck to his legs. So it's pretty quick. When he gets out he changes into a pair of pajama pants and a t-shirt, they aren't going anywhere else today, and heads back down.

She's got the door to the porch open, and is dragging out chairs. He glares at her a little when he sees that and takes the chair from her.

She sticks out her tongue back at him. She's six months pregnant, not helpless. But she'll usually humor him on things like this, because she doesn't like seeing him worry, and he does worry when she does anything even remotely exerting.

"Thought it was so nice, we could eat out."

He nods at that, it is really pleasant out, mid seventies, the porch is shady this time of day, and then goes and grabs some of the folding tray tables they got as wedding presents.

Sitting on the porch, pregnant wife by his side, freshly-mowed grass perfuming the air, it hits him, he's really not single anymore.

He wonders idly if Palmer felt this way. If, like him, there was this second where he just finally realized that yeah, he's not in any way shape or form single. He's a suburban dad, with a beautiful pregnant wife, and a house, and a yard, and hell, the minivan is probably on the way.

He smiles at that, Abby looking at him with a question in her eyes, so he explains, and she smiles, too.

Her hand rests on her belly, and she says, "It's real."

And from that day until Kelly came, the McGees had the best kept yard in the neighborhood.
"You're home!" Tim said to Tony and Ziva as he walked into the Bullpen on Monday morning.

"We are home," Ziva said with a smile.

"Good time?"

Tony smirked. "Oh yeah. You want to see the pictures?"

Tim raised an eyebrow and grinned, "Do I want to see the pictures?"

"Get your mind out of the gutter, McPerv!" Tony says, shoving Tim gently, as Ziva grabbed her phone and started to show off their honeymoon shots.

"Where's Gibbs?" Tony asked. It was nine thirty, an hour and a half after Gibbs usually got in to work. They'd gotten into looking at the pics, (really cool animal shots, amazing views, Tony with a beard, because apparently he can grow one in like, six days, them snuggling, beach shots, they took a lot of pictures) telling stories of South Africa, safari, getting through customs with the diplomatic pouch (No problems, but Tony had been pretty nervous about it.) and the general good time that had been had by all.

Then Tim caught them up with what he had been doing, and how the interviews had gone, and they all confabbed for a time to have a second interview with Draga and Aubrey.

Between those two things an hour and a half had slipped by without them noticing.

"No idea." Tim checked his phone, no messages. "He didn't call you guys?"

"No." Ziva answered, checking her phone. Tony shook his head, nothing on his, either.

It's not that Gibbs never misses work. He's missed, well, at least five days in the last five years at this point, but that he always calls his team to let them know where he is and when he'll be back.

Tim's firing off a text. Where are you? Everything okay?

Ziva picked up her phone. She asked for Vance, and then waited, and then asked if the Director knew where Gibbs might be. Her eyes went wide after a minute and she said, "Thank you, Director."

"He's asked for four days personal time."

That sent Tim and Tony into action. Tim pinged his phone, finding out where he is, while Tony called him.

Gibbs didn't answer his phone, but in a minute Tim's got his location.

"He's in Stillwater."

The three of them stare at each other. Jackson is 88. And Gibbs didn't call. And he's not answering his phone. And he's in Stillwater, with four days of personal time.
Tim had Stillwater General hacked in about ten minutes, looking through the medical records. Ziva and Tony were standing behind him, watching what he's coming up with. He's actually pretty glad they're standing behind him, because they can read the screen as well as he can, so he doesn't have to say the words, not yet.

Though in a minute, when he goes down to Abby, he will.

His voice is shaky when he says to Ziva, "Call Vance. We're gonna need some time off."

She nods, tears in her eyes. Tony's already heading toward the elevator. "I'll tell Ducky and Jimmy."

Tim feels like the Angel of Death. Less than four months ago he came down here and told everyone about Jon.

Now it's just him and Abby. Which he prefers.

She's bopping around the lab, music on so loud the computer screens are vibrating. Must be a song she really likes.

He knows where the remote lives, and flicks off the music, seeing her little combo dance/data hunt come crashing to a halt.

"Tim?" Over the course of one word he hears her voice go from irate to afraid as she sees and reads the look on his face.

"Jethro didn't come into work this morning…" He's explaining what happened, what they did, like somehow extra words between now and how this paragraph has to finish will make it easier, or make the pain at hearing this paragraph's end lessen. Or maybe he's giving himself a little more time to work up to actually saying it. But he can see her eyes tearing up, saw her stiffen when he said Stillwater, and he knows the only real question is how bad is it and how fast are they going to get there. And the answer is, it's bad, and they'll get there as fast as they can. Finally he's run out of filler words, stretched this moment as long as he can, so he says the words he doesn't want to say, "Jackson died last night.

"I hacked his medical records. He was in the shop and had a stroke. Dead before the ambulance got to him. Probably before he hit the floor. It looks like it was fast and painless." And he's got no idea if that's true or not. But she's crying, and he's trying to be comforting as he holds her, and even if it is a lie, it's a lie he wants to believe.

He kisses her, soft and gentle, and she cuddles into his shoulder, holding him. They stand there, like that, for a long minute, until they hear Jimmy say, "We'll take my car.

Ziva, Tony, and Ducky took one car. Leaving the Palmers and McGees in the other. With Ziva driving the trip between DC and Stillwater is six hours. With a seventeen-month-old and a pregnant woman, both of whom do vastly better with a break every hour and a half for either the bathroom or to run around, it's a lot slower.

They take turns driving. Not talking much as Palmer's Odyssey eats the miles between DC and Stillwater.
Maybe the others are thinking of their grandparents or parents. Tim knows he's thinking about his.

Nelson McGee died of a heart attack on his ship. He was sixty-four, had been feeling a bit off, but brushed it off as having slept on his shoulder wrong, and in the middle of an inspection tour slumped over and died.

Penny gave permission for him to be buried at sea. He remembers his grandfather talking about how all life came from the sea, and how, for those who were lucky enough, they'd get to return. Penny let his final resting place be the element he loved.

His father was well enough connected at that point to get helio-ed in for the burial, but the rest of them gathered at Penny's home for a memorial service.

Tim doesn't remember it much. He was ten at the time. Mostly he remembers the way Penny looked shell-shocked. Thinking about it now, he realizes that Nelson was probably about a year, maybe three, tops, away from retiring. He realizes that they'd been married for forty years. That they probably had plans for life after the Navy. He realizes that Penny and Nelson must have been very different people, but they built a marriage that survived her becoming a pacifist while he became an Admiral.

And driving north, his turn at the wheel, it occurs to him that Penny never got to say goodbye. One day her husband left for a float, and he never came home.

Pop died slow. Though, from everything he's read about it, actually, all in all, it was pretty fast. Christmas of '94, the Annapolis Christmas, the one where everything went wrong, was when they also first noticed he was fading.

At first it looked like stress. That was a bad holiday for everyone, so if Pop asked the same question a few times, well, who cared? It'd get better when things calmed back down again.

But it wasn't stress. And he didn't get better, and by the time Tim was leaving for college six months later Pop kept calling him Michael, his Mom's brother's name. Summer of '96, he lived with his grandparents, the last summer he wasn't on his own, and Pop was gone.

He spent that summer with them, helping out, trying to be useful, but mostly he was babysitting a 76-year-old who looked like a man he loved, but wasn't. The fire in his eyes, the memories, the life that had enriched all of them was gone, and all that was left was a body too stubborn to die.

When he caught pneumonia that October, Gran didn't seek treatment for it.

And he felt like a coward for it, but Tim claimed he had midterms (which he did) and didn't go home until after Pop had died.

He didn't say goodbye, mostly because he couldn't handle it, but if you had asked him, (and one of his friends did) he would have said there was no one left to say goodbye to.

His mom doesn't talk about that last week, other than to say it was very hard.

Driving to Stillwater, he's thinking that Nelson and Jackson got off easy.

He hopes he does, too.
They found Gibbs sitting on the sofa in his dad's house. Ziva, Tony, and Ducky were already there. Ziva was cuddling with him. Tony and Ducky were just there, being quiet and supportive.

He stood up and hugged all of them when they came in. Molly was asleep in Jimmy's arms, so she got half of Jimmy's hug.

He went back to the sofa. Abby cuddled into his other side. Gibbs kissed her forehead.

Breena sat in front of Jethro and rested her hands on his knees. "Tell me what you want done, and I'll take care of it. I'll make sure he gets sent off properly."

Gibbs nodded, tears in his eyes, not saying anything.

Two days later, Gibbs, Tony, Tim, Ducky, Jimmy, and LJ carried Jackson to rest next to his wife.

And if Jon's funeral was the dull, crushing pain of horrific fate, this was more the sharp, mercifully brief cut of quick and done. It hurts. There are tears here and the ache of not enough time, because when it comes down to it, there's never really enough time, but the shell-shocked, stunned horror of the loss of Jon caused isn't here.

And like with the funerals for both of his grandfathers, after this service, there was a house filled with somewhat inebriated people telling stories, laughing while they cried.

Gibbs listened to stories, smiled a little, cried a little, got a little drunk, didn't talk much. Tim's fairly sure the eulogy was the only time he said more than five words in a row that day. Abby and Ziva more or less kept hovering protectively around him, herding people away from him when it looked like he'd had enough of them.

Breena ran the whole thing, planned it from beginning to end. She'd asked Gibbs the morning after they got there what he wanted, again, and he shrugged, so she kissed his cheek, hugged him, and took over. It was beautiful, tasteful, a little generic, because all in all she didn't know Jackson all that well, though she was able to get his favorite hymns out of Gibbs for the service, and maybe the actual funeral director wasn't thrilled with dealing with her, but the end result was as comforting as a funeral can be.

When the last of the guests left, and the food had been put away, the downstairs cleaned back up, and Molly fed and put to bed, there was just this sort of hollow emptiness. A sort of blank, now what? feeling.

Gibbs got up and headed upstairs, looking determined.

He came back a few minutes later with a Monopoly box, that he laid on the coffee table in front of the sofa. "Used to play with him and my mom and grandparents. Want a game?" His voice broke on the last word, but he was half-smiling, and very carefully counting out the money.

The game lasted 'til three. Ducky won. And no one said anything about the fact that even though they had to scrounge a few pieces (Tim was playing a battery from the TV remote, and Tony had a quarter) Gibbs kept the top hat in his hand the whole time.
In the movies, the story ends when the character dies. That's just how it is.

Or maybe it keeps going, but there's just sadness and some sort of epiphany of the value of life and holding your dear ones close for as long as you can.

And that's true.

Jackson's story is done.

Jethro, Leroy as his dad called him, has been holding his loves close these last two days, literally as well as figuratively. He's spent more time snuggled up to something warm and female then any time since his first marriage.

And it helps, some.

But mostly, now, as the funeral is over, and he's more or less beating his kids back into their cars to get them to go back to DC, there's just this huge pile of stuff.

Literal stuff.

A lifetime of stuff.

Sitting in a house.

And it's his job to deal with it.

Abby and Tim are giving him puppy-dog eyes, offering to stay and help. Tony and Ziva are being cooler about it, but pretty much because they know they aren't cute enough to pull off puppy dog eyes, but just as insistent. Ducky has declared he's staying and helping. The only ones he's not having any problems with are Jimmy and Breena, namely because an open-ended trip with a seventeen-month-old isn't much fun, and for Ducky to stay, Jimmy needs to get his butt back to DC and handle Autopsy.

"Really, Jethro, I can stay—" Tim's saying as he's putting their bags into the back of Palmer's van,

"Maybe I wasn't clear enough the first three times, I do not want Abby a minute farther away from her OB than absolutely necessary. I don't want you five hundred miles away from her, either. And I don't want either of you wasting your off time with me. You're gonna have better things to do with your personal days than help me sort things very soon. Go home. I'll be fine."

"You sure?"

He's staring at Gibbs with big, worried eyes, and Gibbs is wondering if he's been taking lessons in cute from Abby. "Go home."

Tim nodded, hugged Jethro for a long time, and then handed him over to Abby, who'd been pouting at him through that whole conversation. She squeezed him tight.

"You call us. You need anything, you call. Even if not to talk. You don't have to talk. Just to see a friendly face on the other side of the Skype. You call."

Gibbs nodded and kissed her forehead and then firmly guided her into the Odyssey. He shut the door and said to Jimmy, who had his window open, "Get them out of here before they change their minds and I have to shoot them with tranquilizers to get them back into this van."

Jimmy saluted Gibbs and pulled away.

He felt Tony behind him, in the few seconds before he said, "We've got personal days and vacation days, and don't need to be near a doctor."

"I know, Tony. Go home. You're basically still on your honeymoon."

"Are you certain?" Ziva asked.

"I'm sure. There's nothing in this house Duck and I can't handle. I'll be back in a week or so."

Tony claps a hand on Gibbs' shoulder. "Like Abby said, you need anything, call. We're six hours away, faster if we use flashers."

"I'll be okay."

"I know." Tony hugged him.

Ziva cuddled in as well, reaching up to kiss him. "You will be. You really will."

He rests his head against her dark hair, aware of how, out of all of his kids, this is the one most similar to him, the one carrying many of the same burdens. He kisses the top of her head. Eli David died less than three years ago, and he's sure the memory of doing this, alone, is still very fresh for her.

"We should have gone with you."

She smiled at him and shook her head, understanding what he meant by that. "No. Not then. But never again will any of us mourn alone."

He knows that's true. Driving up on his own, not telling anyone, that was shock forcing him back into the patterns of old. He spent so many years on his own, the idea that there were people who would worry, who would travel five hundred miles just to sit with him, didn't occur to him.

And he didn't know how relieved he would be, how a flash of love and gratitude would spread through him when he heard the sound of a car pulling up, three doors opening and closing, and opened the door to see Ziva, Tony, and Ducky on his father's porch, and to be immediately wrapped in Ziva's arms.

He nodded and kissed her one more time, holding both of them tight, then let go. "I'll call if I need anything."

"Good," Ziva said as they headed to her car.

He watched them drive off, waving, and then walked to the front porch, sitting down on the steps. A moment later Ducky sat down next to him, handing him a cup of tea.

"Where shall we start, Jethro?"
Gibbs put the cup on the step next to him and rubbed his eyes. "I don't know, Duck, I don't know."

They started in the basement. Three piles: donate, toss, keep.

There aren't many things here he wants to keep. The last eight years were better, but this house isn't a bastion of good memories for him.

Ducky kept up a gentle stream of chatter. Mostly talking to himself. Gibbs is only half-listening, but he finds the sound of it comforting.

But it hits him, as he boxes up his dad's dishes, that there will be a day when Ducky's voice goes silent. That one day, he, and he assumes, Tim, will do this for Ducky and Penny, and he has to sit down for a minute to keep from bursting into tears. Ducky sees it, quiets, and just rests his hands on Jethro's shoulders.

He kept the Monopoly game. An old but well-loved baseball glove. Someone'll need to teach those girls how to play catch, and he's not feeling overwhelmingly optimistic on Tim or Jimmy's skills when it comes to that. Two end tables Jackson made, and his dad's tools. Gibbs doesn't have any use for Jackson's tools, his father was a mechanic first and then moved into electronics, but best he can tell, Tim might find them useful.

He kept a bundle of letters. They belonged to his parents. He hasn't read them. Won't read them. Before they head back to DC, he takes a few minutes and buries them with his parents.

He kept his dad's computers. Somewhere in there is his accounts, and he needs that information to handle the business. So they've got to go back to DC, where Tim'll sort through them and find what he needs to take care of the store.

And the rest of it got boxed up and given to Goodwill or tossed in a dumpster.

It took three days to empty the house.

He's not even sure what to do with the general store. He knows his dad owns the building, but it's got to have bills and suppliers and all sorts of things, but he doesn't know what they are. Back when he was a kid, Jackson had tried to get him interested in running the store, but even if they had gotten on back then, he still would have found it painfully boring.

Fortunately the lawyer seems to have an idea of what to do with that, because he doesn't.

It took six days, but when he was done, the house was empty, and up for sale, the store was closed, and also up for sale. He loaded the few things he was keeping into his car, waited for Ducky to get his seat belt buckled and started back to DC.

"Thanks, Duck."

Ducky nodded. "When Mother died, I wanted the quiet of our home to grieve in. Her last few weeks had been so loud and traumatic..." Victoria Mallard lived to 101, which was about five years longer than she should have. That last month, when she was conscious she was out of her head, delirious from the Alzheimer's, often screaming, raging at imagined insults, or drugged into an almost comatose slumber. The Corgis, all six of them, upset at the strangers, hospice workers who had descended on the house to help him, spent hours barking. Nothing about their home was quiet those last few weeks. "That I wanted nothing more than quiet. But I think now that sharing it with a dear friend would have been a good thing."

"Yeah."

As they pulled out of Stillwater, it occurs to Gibbs that this really is the last time he'll come here. This chapter of his life is really over, and all that's left is memory.
3:00 AM Fuck In The Lab

It was three in the morning when Tim got done with his part of the case, so he headed, slowly, down to the lab.

Abby was sleeping on the rugs. Even though she's not falling asleep every moment she's still, Tim still doesn't want her driving herself home at night, and she's been kindly humoring his insane overprotectiveness, both of them aware that this was pretty insane. But they work in the same place, so waiting a bit for him to get done to take her home usually isn't a big deal.

And nights like tonight, well, it's not like they haven't slept in the lab before, and it's not like they won't do it again...

And it hits Tim, as he drapes his jacket over her desk chair, that this may be the last time.

He's slipping off his shoes and belt, watching her sleep, when he realizes that once the tiny person inside her gets on the outside, one of the two of them will have to get home every night. They won't be able to work all night, crash, fuck, snag a ton of Caf-Pow, and go back to catching killers.

In two months, and really, one probably, he can't see her doing this nine months pregnant, this chapter of their life will end. And who knows, in twenty years or so, when this kid is out of the house, maybe they'll start doing it again, though he'll be 57 then, and she'll be 61, which is just too hard to wrap his head around.

He lays down next to her. Scooting his arm under her neck and snuggling in close around her. These last two months she usually sleeps through that, but today she stirred a little.

"What time is it?"

"Three."

"Okay. You find what you needed?"

"Yeah. Ziva and Tony are driving to Virginia Beach right now." Just because Gibbs is gone doesn't mean they've let up on the pace they work at. Two days ago they caught a case, what looked like a straight up murder, and after sixteen hours of sorting through the main suspect's tumblr and youtube videos, Tim thinks he's found the actual crime scene. Tony and Ziva are off to process it.

"Good." She rolls over to face him, and kisses him gently. It's soft and sleepy, and he was fairly sure they were just going to sleep, but her tongue slipped out to lick his bottom lip, and that got his attention in a good way.

"How sleepy are you?"

She smiled a little, though her eyes are closed. "Sleepy, but not so much so that I don't want to have sex."

He's stuck between that wired space that happens after more than ten hours on a computer and ready to drop from exhaustion. Sex'll certainly help with that.

"Pretty fried right now."

"You want to just sleep?" she asks.
"No, just letting you know I'm not up for anything energetic."

"Me either."

"Okay." He stood up and pulled off his pants and boxers, while she scooted out of her panties. He smiled at her.

"What?"

"Last of the red-hot lovers."

"Even Don Juan phoned it in at three in the morning after working all day."

He lays down, snuggles up against her back, and kissed her neck, enjoying the comfort of her skin on his, the warm weight of her body against his, and the scent of her hair. He sighed. "Mmmmm…"

Inhaled long and slow, felt her rock against him gently.

His hand found her breast, gently cupping and stroking under her shirt. Her hips set a slow, steady roll, rubbing soft and easy against his dick, and in a few minutes her leg hooked back over his, and he slipped into her.

Quiet moans, deeper, faster breathing, and slow, easy, sleepy motion set them alight and quivering.

A few minutes later, as they were drowsing in the afterglow, still spooned together, Abby asked, "Why have we never done this at your desk?"

That gets a smile out of him. He's certainly thought about it, and sure she has, too. He kisses her shoulder. "Because while I might like the danger of maybe getting caught, actually getting caught doesn't get me off. There's always someone wandering through the Bullpen, and I know for a fact there are security cameras up there."

"There are security cameras down here, too."

His eyes went very wide, and he looked like he was about to start grabbing for his pants.

She kisses his hand and smiles. "No one's gonna watch them unless something goes missing. And I have a feeling right now you're awfully motivated to make sure the lab is safe."

"That's one way to put it. When did they get security cameras down here?"

"After Chip."

So, the entire time they'd been together. Which means NCIS basically has its own porn channel starring them. Might be time to do a little hacking and deleting. After a full inventory of the lab. "Makes sense."

"And right here, we're pretty much out of range. They're focused on the doors, so you can see who goes in and out. I think they can see you from the knees down and my feet."

He thinks for a moment, wondering why she knows exactly what the camera feeds are. Finally he asks, "So what can you see of my desk?"

"The whole thing, from two angles. There's one in the corner behind Ziva's desk, so the front of yours is in plain sight. And there's one above and behind, so you sitting at your desk is awfully visible, too. Honestly, you might just have the worst possible desk when it comes to surveillance."
"Think they're watching me? Making sure I don't hack the Pentagon again or something?"

"Maybe. Or maybe who ever watches these things before archiving them is hoping to see something good."

He smiles wryly. "Then why are only the doors covered in your office?"

"I moved the cameras."

"Really? So, you don't want to get caught, either?"

"Not exactly. We do this often enough that it's not just a treat, so..."

"Okay." He gets that. This isn't just the place for the occasional fast screw. This is, besides their home, this is the most common place they do this.

"And we sleep here. We talk here. We have dinner here some nights."

"This is a private space, or as close as you can get at a place where two hundred people work."

"Exactly."

"I was thinking about that, sort of, when I was getting undressed." She arches an eyebrow, he's still got his shirt and socks on. "Okay, as I was taking my shoes and belt off. We're probably not going to be doing this a whole lot more. Two more months and one of the two of us will have to be home with Kelly every night."

"Oh."

"Yeah. The days of the 3:00 AM fuck in the lab are numbered."

"Maybe kids weren't such a good idea," she says with a smile, so he knows she's joking.

"Yeah, terrible idea." He's grinning too. "If I had realized how badly they'd cut into our sex life, I would have been in favor of skipping this."

She laughs, reaching up for the tissues that for some strange reason always live on her desk now. She hands him a few of them, and slips off of him, both of them wiping up quickly. He pulls on his boxers and pants. Sure he might prefer sleeping naked, but he's not about to do it at work. A quick glance at the clock shows him they've got four hours until the time he's normally up in the Bullpen again.

Abby pulls her panties on, and then snuggles back into his arms. "Good night."

"Good night."
So, part of this whole having a baby thing is that, eventually, the baby comes out, and you need a place to put said baby.

Later that night, after dinner and calling Gibbs, officially to give him an update on the case, but really just to check in on him, they head up to Kelly's nursery and get working on furniture assembly.

Gibbs is making the crib. And had made the rocking chair.

But she needs more than a crib and a rocking chair.

Abby's on décor duty. She's putting up tree and flower decals. Tim's assembling the dresser/changing table combo thing.

"So, hospital or the birthing center?" Tim asks. Because the other thing about having a baby is that you've got to pick a place where you intend to have said baby come out.

"I was thinking about here."

He puts his tools down and stares at her, perplexed, wondering if he heard right. "Here? You mean, here? At home?"

"Yeah. Here, in our home."

He stares at her for a long minute, waiting for her to smile or something to indicate she's kidding. But she's just looking at him expectantly.

"You're not kidding." He can tell from the sound of his voice and the way Abby's looking at him that he'd gone completely white at that idea. He looks down and sees his hands are shaking. And in a sort of disassociated way, he realizes this is fear.

"No. I'm not."

Which is when the disassociation crumbled and he went back to actually feeling what's going on with him. He looks up at the ceiling and tries to think of something more constructive than shouting, ARE YOU INSANE! The whole idea of it terrifies him on a level he can't even put words to, but he's not so far gone he doesn't know that's a bad idea. Finally he came up with this, "You know how we each have veto power over names that we don't like?"

"Yeah."

"Because we respect each other and want each other to be comfortable…"

"Uh huh."

"Okay. If you think I've been insanely overprotective over the last seven months…" He pauses, takes a few deep breaths, because just the idea of this makes him want to yell, and he knows that's not helpful, either. "I will completely fucking lose it if there aren't exceptionally well-trained medical professionals less than thirty seconds away from us when you're in labor. I'm vetoing this."

"Tim…"

"Midwife, doula, water birth, whatever else you want, I'm fine with and will get for you. But not that. Anything happens and there have to be people who can deal with it around. And not just a twenty minute ambulance ride away. If Kelly needs to come out NOW, someone's got to be there to do it."

She's looking at him like she's being completely reasonable, and he's insane, and she's finding it annoying. But she's the one being sane, so she offers, "What about having Jimmy and Breena come, too? He's a doctor. They've done this before. Twice."

"And they are more than welcome to come. You want them along as labor support, and I'm fine with that, as long as we and them are in a hospital or birthing center. Yeah, Jimmy’s a doctor, and you know what? He didn't deliver his own babies! Ducky came over when Breena went into labor, so there were two doctors there with tons of experience, and that tons of experience told both of them they aren't obstetricians so all three of them went to a hospital where there were obstetricians."

"We go to the hospital and the rate of c-sections and interventions skyrocket."

"They skyrocket because you can only get a c-section in a hospital! It's called cherry picking the data, and you know that. The rate for home birth c-sections is zero because you can't get one at home! The only people who give birth at home are people who are likely to have uncomplicated deliveries, and the only ones who finish at home are the ones who actually have uncomplicated deliveries." This isn't going well. She's on the verge of crying, and he can feel himself getting more scared any angry with each word. "Okay." He blows out a long, frustrated breath. "Tell me why you want to do this here."

"Why do you care? You've already vetoed it." And now she is crying, and he's feeling like a complete asshole.

"Because if I know what you want, we can try and find a better compromise."

"I don't want a compromise! Right now your definition of compromise is do it your way."

Okay, that's true enough that he doesn't have a good response for it.

"Look, I can't do this at home. You will be in pain, and I have a bad time with that to begin with. There'll be blood, your blood, and that's gonna freak me out, too. I'm a firm believer in the idea that you are not supposed to be in pain and all of your blood is to be located inside your body at all times. So, even in a hospital with lots of people who know what they're doing, and the fact that this is all perfectly normal, I'm already going to be in bad shape. I'm so scared I'm yelling at you right now," and he is, with every word his voice has gotten louder and higher pitched, "just at the idea of this, so I think it's fair to say that I will not handle the real thing with any sort of grace!" Another deep breath as he tries to calm down, and his voice was fairly normal when he said, "Just, please, tell me what about here at home it is you want."

The problem of the two them arguing about things like this is neither of them has the emotional cool to just back off. So he gets upset. She responds by getting upset. Her upset jacks his emotions up a few notches. That in turns ramps her up. And him losing it has sent her into blubbering, crying mode.

So her face is red, her eyes teary, and she's speaking between sobs as she says, "I want to be home, with you! I want Jimmy and Breena and Ziva. I want the people I love around me. I don't want to be constantly poked and prodded by strangers. I want to be able to move and eat and not be hooked up to machines. I don't want to be pumped full of drugs. I don't want to get sliced open. I don't want someone else deciding that it should go faster than it is and try to make my body speed up. I'm not sick, so I don't want to be treated like a patient."
"Okay." And if it wasn't for paralyzing fear, all of that would make a lot of sense to him.

"I want to be able to hold Kelly the second she's out. I don't want her whisked away to be poked or prodded either. I want you and me to do this together, and I want all three of us together as much as possible!"

"I want that, too. But if something goes wrong…" He stands up to go over to her, and wraps his hands around her waist, his belly against hers, his forehead pressed to hers. "We're not set up to deal with that here. Even with Jimmy here, we're still not set up for it. Please. I'll scour DC, Virginia, and Maryland for a birthing center that'll get you what you want. And we'll stay home for as much of the labor as we can… But…” his hands cup her belly, stroking gently over their daughter, "If anything ever happened to you… I can't lose you. Everything I can't live without is right here in my arms, and I can't take risking that."

She's staring at him as he says that, and gently touches his face. "Okay."

He takes a very deep breath, lets it out slow, and kisses her. "Thank you."
Closer To Whole

Tim looked at Penny as he loaded a box into the back of Jimmy's van.

It boggles his mind how little stuff she has. Of course, that probably makes a certain amount of sense. When Nelson died, she sold the house and most of their stuff, and got a small place in Annapolis. She gave notice at John's Hopkins (where she'd been a Professor of Bio-Tech. There are reasons beyond his grades and SAT scores why Tim got such a good deal from John's Hopkins, though he doesn't know that and has never suspected it, either. Though the fact that that is true was a source of friction between John McGee and Penny for several years.) and started to travel.

In the military there are grunts, officers, and then there's God's Country, in the land forces, God's Country starts at Light Colonel. In the Navy, get your Captain's bars, and you've hit God's Country, and in God's Country, you and yours are very well taken care of.

As the widow of an Admiral, money, medical care, housing, all of her tangible needs would be taken care of for the rest of her life. So, for three years she just wandered around, saw the world, went the places they had planned to go. Went the places Nelson never wanted to go.

It was fun, but didn't keep her brain as active as she liked.

In academia, there are grunts (grad students), associate professors, and God's Country: the Tenured Professor. Penny had tenure at John's Hopkins. And as a Tenured Professor in a hard science with lots of good publishing creds who also happened to be female, she had absolutely no problem at all getting back into academia. Universities were more or less throwing wads of money and honorary doctorates at her, trying to get her to come join them.

Three years at the University of Virginia reminded her that she liked traveling.

So she found a way to do both.

From 1994 on she became a traveling lecturer. She'd bop from university to university, spend a semester or three, soak up the culture, get to know the upcoming generation of females in bio-tech and work on fostering them.

And now, more than twenty years after deciding to float, she's looking at settling down again. August 24, 2015 marks the start of fall term at American University and what is likely to be her last job at a university.

All of her worldly goods fit in the back of Jimmy's van, with room to spare. Okay, not all of them, she does still have that apartment in Annapolis, and there are a few things in there, but the stuff that matters, the things she uses every day, took Tim four trips to carry to the van.

Four trips where she just stared at him, very clearly signaling, I can handle this for myself.

As he put the fourth box (clothing) into the van, Tim turned to her and said, "We buried Jackson ten days ago. We're all kind of clinging to our grandparents, okay? Jimmy's over helping Ducky get ready for you. Tony's been calling his dad every night. Abby's more or less glued to Gibbs. I know you can do this. I know you don't need me to drive you. I just want the time with you."

"Okay."

"According to Abby, this is also me nesting. Nursery is done, except for the crib. Grass is mowed and trimmed. House is clean. Got nothing left to mess with in my nest, so I'm working on yours."

"It's fine, Tim. Just don't want you treating me like I'm old and frail."

His looks said, Penny, you're eighty-four. That's basically the definition of old.

"I'm not frail."

"Never said you were."

He closed the rear door on the Odyssey. "Come on. If we want to get to DC before dinner, we've got to get moving."

They get buckled in, and in a few minutes he's south bound on 95, Philadelphia fading behind them, DC inching closer.

"You know, we've got to start paying Jimmy mileage on this thing. Seems like every other weekend one of us ends up borrowing it."

"You could get one yourself." She seems to realize she may have just endorsed buying a minivan, so she backtracks on that. "Well, maybe not a mini-van, you don't need this much space or pollution for one child, but you do need something with a backseat."

"The roadster has one."

"Does it have anything to hook a child seat into?"

"No. Doesn't even have seatbelts back there."

"So, you're saying the backseat is entirely useless for your purposes?"

"Yeah. Been thinking of a hybrid Highlander. The real question is is Kelly going to be the only baby. If so, an SUV should be plenty of room. If not, don't want to get one car and then have to upgrade two years later." There are things Tim likes less than buying a car. Having cavities filled, that's one. Cold and dark places, that's another. But all in all, if he can possibly avoid buying a car, he'll avoid buying a car. And really, once you've gotten your mechanic scared into submission, it's really easy to avoid buying a car.

"You want more than one, right?"

"Yeah, we both do. But we're still on the don't actually have kids yet side of things. Might feel different after we have one. And we might run out of time before we can have another one. We'd both like Abby to be able to nurse for a full year, but a full year puts her at forty-three, and I know that's not impossible, but the chances drop like a rock each year we put it off."

Penny nods at that. "Plenty of people have gotten pregnant while nursing. There's a reason your Aunt Cassie's only thirteen months younger than I am."

"I know. But if memory serves your mom wasn't forty-two years older than you."

"True. She was when your Uncle James was born."

"He's the youngest of the seven of you, right?"

"Yeah."
"Not comforting."

"It was 1944 when he was born. Things were a little different then."

"I know."

She rests his hand on his arm as he drives. "Relax, Tim, whatever happens with this, you've got options. Egg donors and in-vitro, surrogate mothers, adoption, if you and Abby want more than one baby, you'll have more than one baby."

He rolls his eyes a little. "Kind of like making them the old-fashioned way."

She laughs at that. "I like a man tall enough I can look up into his eyes. We don't always get everything exactly the way we want it."

He smiles. "I guess not."

"You still dodging your mom?" Penny asked as they stopped for gas.

"Every chance I get."

"She's worried and badgering Sarah about you, now."

Tim focused on watching the digital numbers rise on the gas pump. "I'm sorry she's worried, but right now, I've got enough stuff on my plate. Don't need to add big, messy confrontation with her."

"You could try not having a big, messy confrontation with her."

He looked at Penny, exasperated. "Hey, Mom, you parenting technique sucked. It was your job to protect me, and you didn't do it. How is that not going to be a big, messy confrontation?"

Penny shrugged. "Just remember, she was trying to do her best for you."

"You saying I shouldn't be pissed?"

"No." And she shook her head at that. "Just that you need to remember there was never any malice on her part."

"Doesn't help. But it is one of the reasons I'm dodging her rather than yelling. Because from her point of view I just suddenly went bonkers. After all, not like anything changed. Just how I think about it. Which means it's my problem, right?"

"Maybe. It's all of our problem, really. And she's your mom, she's been deeply invested in helping with your problems from before you were born."

"Sure." The gas stopped pumping and he put the nozzle back into the cradle. "You want any snacks or drinks?"

"I'm good."

"Gonna get some coffee. Back in a bit."
They'd driven for five miles before he said, "You talk to my dad?"

"Yeah. He's going to be overseeing a joint war game with Israel and Italy and Spain next weekend on Med naval drone tactics, so he called early for Mother's Day."

"How considerate."

"Yes. He's always been good at birthdays and anniversaries. Or his secretary is. Either way, he wasn't thrilled with how that call went."

"Uh huh." Tim's watching the road very carefully. Intentionally not looking at Penny. Part of him want to know how it went, he asked after all. Part of him doesn't. So he's listening, but not looking at her.

"He's under the impression that I am hysterical and overreacting and that's just the sort of thing that happens between guys." She's leaving out the part where John called Tim a pussy for complaining about it, and considered complaining about it proof that it, and likely more, had been necessary. "When I pointed out that his father had never done anything even remotely like that to him, he was less than happy." She's also leaving out the long, self-defending tirade on how Nelson never needed to do anything like that because John got with the program and did what he was supposed to do, and how it was Tim's duty to follow in their footsteps and uphold the family honor, defend his country, and put his life on the line for things that really mattered.

It was a monumentally uncomfortable conversation for both of them, and she's not feeling any desire to talk with John again anytime soon.

"Good."

"I did find out that he has actually read your books and that Lisa is his favorite character."

"How'd that come up?"

"Before we got talking about the other stuff, I told him a new one was due out in the fall, and asked who his favorite character was."

"Oh."

"I wanted to see if he actually reads them, or if he's asking me for copies just to look good. He reads Sarah's too. Though he's not sure what the appeal of a wraith as a main character is, let alone why little girls would find him romantic."

"Great, he reads mysteries and young adult paranormal romances if his kids write them. He's not a complete and utter asshole. Yippiee."

There wasn't much to say after that, so they drove for several more miles in quiet.

"How's Gibbs doing?"

"As well as can be expected. They got home three days ago. Just about everything's taken care of or in the process of being taken care of."

Penny nods. "You're helping?"
"Yeah, I've been going through Jackson's computers and financials. Got everything settled. That was actually a little creepy. He had a note for me in there. Knew I'd be the one doing it for Gibbs."

"Nice note?"

"Yeah. Thanked me for taking care of it. A little gentle poking at Jethro about how he's hopeless with this stuff, though he was glad I got him using a smartphone. Told me to take care of my girls, for my sake and Jethro's."

"Doesn't sound creepy."

"Well, no the content wasn't, just voices from beyond the grave. Nothing in there he couldn't have just emailed me before he died. Not like we weren't Facebook friends."

"Jackson had a Facebook account?"

"For all Jethro hates tech, Jackson loved it. Gibbs brought his tools home, gave them to me. He had some really nice stuff for electronic work."

"Feeling like you lost another grandfather?"

Tim thought about that. "No. Not really. I feel like my dad just lost his dad. I'm mostly hurting for him. But it's not like when Nelson or Pop died. I just didn't know Jackson that well." He glanced away from traffic toward Penny. "Ducky feels like another grandfather… I suppose he is…"

Penny smiled at that. "Are you fishing to see if we're going to get married?"

That got a quiet laugh out of Tim. "I could be. I could also be trying to avoid a discussion of patriarchal marital roles and the comparative value of the labor of females once they marry."

Penny smiled at that, too. Of all the grandkids, nieces, and nephews this is the one who knows her best. "How about a lecture on the absurdity of Navy Pensions, last wills and testaments, and how marrying complicates the hell out of this stuff?"

"I can probably avoid that, too."

"Along those lines, I do have a serious question for you."

"Fire away."

"John's currently the executor of my will, but if I go before Ducky, I'd like someone who gets along with him to handle my estate. Someone who won't try to force a sale of the condo because it's just easier to deal with the finances that way. Would you be my executor?"

"Yeah. I'll be your executor."

"Thank you."

"Ducky's not that fond of John?"

"Shockingly enough, no."

"I know that makes it harder for you, but I can't say that bothers me."

"I know, Tim, and it's okay. I'm not feeling all that fond of him right now, either. "
They were in Annapolis, picking up the last of Penny's stuff. (Three more boxes. Books, the originals of each of her publications, a lot of old photo albums, and some small knick knacks.
everything else was being donated to Goodwill.)

"You talk to Jethro about your dad?"

"As little as possible."

"Why?" Penny seems surprised by that. She figures that if there was anyone Tim would talk to about this sort of thing, it'd be Jethro.

"I don't actually like talking about it, you know?"

"Okay."

"I'm pretty good with just you, Ducky, and Abby knowing. Obviously, at some point, I've got to talk with my mom, but... I had a good, long time of not dealing with it, and that seemed to work pretty well. I could probably happily continue to not deal with it."

"It'll bite you if you leave it there."

"But it's not biting me now. One day I'll get calmed down enough to talk to Mom, and hopefully that can be the end of this. Just, go back to normal."

"I don't think it works that way, Tim."

"I know."

When his mother died, Ducky sold the Mallard estate. That left him well off, and in need of a new home. He found an upscale condo in Chevy Chase, Maryland. It's less than an hour from work, in a very posh neighborhood, requires no maintenance or upkeep from him, and had more than enough space for an old man living on his own who occasionally entertains a lady friend.

It is, however, a bit small for two people.

Even if one of them has less than half of a minivan's worth of stuff.

So as Tim and Penny headed down from the University of Pennsylvania, Jimmy and Ducky began seriously looking at his home, and figuring out how to squeeze more space out of it.

Jimmy's answer, an iPad, was met with something less than perfect enthusiasm from Ducky. He loves his books. He likes his records and CDs. But, as Jimmy pointed out, he's got a room full of them, and more of them on the walls, in storage around the place, eating up all his space, so upgrading would certainly clear up enough space to have room for Penny's things.

His other solution, namely that any clothing purchased before 2000 could come live at his house, and be visited/worn when Ducky felt the need for it, (which is code for quietly dragged off to Goodwill or a vintage clothing store when Ducky isn't looking) was even less thrilling for Ducky, but it's true that he does have a more than a few suits that were purchased during the seventies, eighties, and nineties, and it would be one thing if they were excellent pieces in timeless classic cuts that fit, but these aren't and don't.

So, Jimmy and Ducky are in Ducky's library, sitting amid a huge pile of boxes, loading books into them. Each one Jimmy takes off the shelf, reads the name, Ducky checks to see if it's available in electronic form, and if it is, it goes into the donate box. If not, it goes back onto the shelf.

Not nearly as many as he'd like are going back onto the shelf.

Not nearly as many as Jimmy would like are going into boxes.

It's a perfect compromise, no one is happy, but they're moving toward the goal.

Tim hasn't had an asthma attack in close to six years. He doesn't even have an inhaler anymore. He is, however, sensitive to dust.

So, of course, he walked into Ducky's home, box of Penny's books in hand, inhales once, feels the years of old, dusty, bookishness that's been permeating the house since Ducky and Jimmy began their work close his lungs down tighter than a pickle jar fastened with a wrench, and walks back out again, wheezing.

It's not that Ducky's book and record collection aren't kept clean. It's just, they're books. They sit there, collecting dust and making more dust. Dust mites move in and munch on them and breed, and when you take them out and move them around, you fill the air with dust.

A minute later Jimmy's out sitting next to him. "You okay."

"I will be. Just can't go in there. Too much dust," he coughs as he says that. "And you're covered in it."

Jimmy steps further back, noticing for the first time that he's light gray from head to toe. "Oh, sorry."

"I'll take her boxes out, put them on the front step, and then head home."

"Good plan. Get a hot, steamy shower."

"Yeah, I know."

May 2nd, 2015 Penny Langston and Ducky Mallard officially set up housekeeping together.

Standing in the shower, hot, steamy air helping him breathe, Tim found himself thinking Gibbs was the only one still single, and hoping that maybe one day they'd be helping him make a space in his home for a woman he loved.
"Hey, Jethro." Tim stopped at the second from the last step down to the basement.

Gibbs sort of grunted in his direction.

Tim pulled up a stool and sat down next to Gibbs.

Gibbs kept working on the crib, rubbing something into the legs. He kept it up for a good twenty minutes before saying, "I'm fine, Tim."

Tim nodded. "I know."

"You and Tony don't need to babysit me." He and Tony hadn't talked about it, but since Gibbs got home one of the two of them had come over for at least a little while after work.

"Know that, too."

Gibbs put his rag down. "Then why is it one of the two of you is here every single night? I'd think you'd both have better things to do than watch me build a crib."

"Don't know why Tony's doing it."

"You both just sit there and watch."

Tim shrugged. "Can I help?"

That took Gibbs by surprise. "Can you help?"

"I've never done any woodworking before, but I'm good enough with my hands that your phone is a lethal weapon."

Gibbs nodded, found another rag, and handed it to Tim. "Hand-rubbed oil finish." He poured some of the oil into the rag, and demonstrated what he was doing. Tim took the rag from him and got to it.

"You going to do this for the whole crib?"

"Just the legs." Abby had decided on a forest themed nursery, one with dragons and unicorns and fairies, and all sorts of magical critters. Gibbs, hearing that, came up with a crib that looked like it belonged in a forest.

The legs of this crib were tree trunks, growing out of the floor. The headboard was a collection of mission style slats joined together in a wide curve at the top. The foot was similar, but with a flat top, because that was the side they'd be putting Kelly in the crib from.

Abby had painted trees on the wide curved piece that made the top of the headboard, and then added unicorns and dragons frolicking about between them. One of the dragons was an Asian-style green one with green eyes, standing near another, traditional European one, in silver, with blue eyes. He thinks the red Asian-style dragon next to the unicorn with the blond mane is supposed to be Jimmy and Breena. He guesses the copper-colored European style one is Tony, but that's based entirely on what he remembers about the personalities of Copper Dragons. The unicorn with her head resting on the green dragon's neck had a black mane and green eyes, and the one near the copper dragon had brown eyes and a dark brown mane. There was an owl who looked suspiciously like he had on spectacles and was wearing a bow tie sitting in one of the trees. A fairy with brown, almost black hair and brown eyes, and beautiful green and gold wings, mostly hidden by the trees, watched all of them.

As family portraits go, he really likes it.

Gibbs pointed to the head piece. "That'll get varnished. Want something to protect Abby's art work."

Tim nodded at that. And for a while the two of them kept working.

He kept one eye on the leg in front of him, rubbing the oil into the wood, matching Gibbs' movements, and the other on Gibbs.

Finally Gibbs said, "I'm really okay. Yeah, it hurts. But it should hurt. I'm not drinking myself unconscious down here."

"I know. That's the same bottle you've had the last two times I was here."

"You sure?"

"Did you get a new bottle and redo the little red hash mark Tony put at the bottom of the label?"

"No."

"Then it's the same one."

"Are you guys measuring how much I'm drinking?"

"No, he puts those marks on them so he knows which year he gave which bottle to you. He alternates through three different brands, and that way he knows which year which one is up."

Gibbs shakes his head a little, that's just way too involved. He goes back to working on the crib, and Tim adds more oil to his rag.

"Things okay at home?"

"Yeah. She's in a porcupine mood, but that's not why I'm here."

"Why are you here?"

Tim doesn't know how to answer that. He knows why he's here. The huge sticky mess of Jackson died and his own dad is gone and Kelly'll be on the outside in eight weeks and the real work part of being a dad will begin, and he just needs time with a dad. With his dad. And even if Gibbs isn't really his dad, he's the man he's chosen for the role, and he needs this time. What he doesn't know is how to put that into words that won't sound stupid to Gibbs.

So he shrugs again. "You want me to leave?"

"Didn't say that." Gibbs put down his rag and looked at Tim. "What's today's porcupine mood?"

"Everything on Earth, including me, smells bad to her today, and I can't help or change it or do anything about it."

Gibbs shakes his head.

"Yeah. I mowed the grass, hoping that would help, that smells good, right?"
Gibbs nods.
"Not today."

Gibbs winced. "She'll be herself again soon."

"And I am sincerely looking forward to that."

They sat there for a few minutes.

"You scared?"

"Sure. Might be part of why I'm here. Whole world, well my whole world, changes soon, and from there it's just going to keep changing."

"You're going to be fine."

"I know that, I really do. But it's still new and scary and different, and…"

"Yeah."

"It's good to have you and Palmer around. Have family who's on the other side of this."

"You do. For whatever it's worth, I'm here."

"It's worth a lot to me."

They kept working for a few more minutes, working the oil into the wood, creating something that would be beautiful, durable, and non-toxic should a small person decide to chew on it.

"Tim."

Tim looks up from rubbing the oil into the crib leg.

"My dad and I didn't talk for almost thirty years. I wish I had had that time now. The last eight years… they weren't enough."

Tim nods. He can see where Gibbs wants to go with this. "Why'd you two fall out?"

"Lot of reasons. My mom died… She was sick, with cancer, and she intentionally ODed on her pain medication, and I blamed him for that. There was nothing he could have done, but I was fourteen and angry at everything, and he was around and easy to be pissed at, because I couldn't bear to be pissed at her. I wanted to join the Marines. He got drafted into Korea and hated the military. And after Viet Nam, he didn't trust it, either. Things got better when I married Shannon, but fell apart again after she died. He brought a date to their funeral and…” Gibbs shook his head. The look he sends Tim clearly says, okay, your turn.

"He ever call you a worthless fag?"

Gibbs looks mildly surprised at that. "Nope."

"Tell you you were a massive fucking disappointment when you got one answer wrong on a spelling test? And how if you kept fucking up like that you'd never become anything?"

"No. They got hung up on the refrigerator."
"Only the A+ with all the extra credit got on the fridge at our house. He tell you you were wasting your life?"

"Told me the Marines would. They'd ship me off to die somewhere."

"Yeah, not quite the same thing. My dad was trying to get me to let the Navy ship me off to get killed somewhere. I watched MASH as a kid, and wanted to be a surgeon, but it turns out I really don't like blood, so that's how I got to biomedical engineering. I was going to build better artificial hearts and lungs and stuff like that. Save lives. Johns Hopkins had the best program in the country for that, and I got a full scholarship for it. That was his definition of me wasting my life."

Gibbs thinks about that for a moment, and Tim can see he's trying to fit this into what he knows about John McGee, and what he knows about Tim and John McGee, and what he knows about both being a father and being a son who is mourning his father.

"It's been a really long time, Tim, things change."

Tim shakes his head. "This doesn't. He's not in my life. He's not going to be in my life. He's not ever seeing my kids."

Gibbs looks a little frustrated at this, and Tim can see he doesn't have enough information to really get it. He's probably imagining something like Tony and Sr., a relationship that's been damaged by lots of disappointment but repairable.

"If he had hit me, would you still be trying to get me to rebuild that bridge?"

"No." And Gibbs starts to really get it. His eyes narrow a little and his hands tighten on the rag he's holding. Classic Gibbs anger signs. "Did he?"

"Leaving bruises would have looked bad. Would have hurt his chances of making Admiral. So he used words instead."

Gibbs nods. Tim can see he's keeping whatever is going on in his head in check, trying to keep Tim talking.

"I know sailors cuss, but… It was over the line. You can be pissed at someone without threatening to tie them down, mutilate them, and have an entire battleship rape them."

Gibbs eyes go wide, and his fist clenches so hard around the rag he's holding his knuckles go white.

"Wanna hear a really not funny story?" Tim feels himself detach from this. He's talking about it, but treating it like a story he read or a dream. He thinks part of that is that if he has a big emotional fit about it, Gibbs will go ape shit and probably kill John, and that's just not going to be good for anyone. But at the same time, he want's Gibbs to get it. He wants his chosen father to understand who his biological father is.

Gibbs nods once more, looking really disturbed and very, very angry.

"So, I'm eleven and he calls me a faggot because I was… I don't remember. Something he thought was too girly. Probably playing D&D or writing or had an allergy attack or something. Turned out he liked that one, called me it a whole lot over the years whenever I wasn't living up to his standards of proper maleness, which was pretty much all the time. Anyway, I didn't know what a faggot was. Probably another sign of not being properly male. Men are born knowing how to cuss, right? So I looked it up, because, that's just me. And the dictionary we had didn't have what it meant, not really. It had the 'real' meaning, a bundle of kindling, and that just made no sense at all to me. He'd been" pissed, but calling me a collection of sticks was just... dumb, and no matter what else is true about him, he isn't dumb. I thought I might have heard wrong, so I read the definitions of all the words near it, and any other alternate spelling I could think of, but nothing made any sense.

"I was at my grandparents the next weekend, so I asked Pop what it meant because it had to mean something other than that. And he looked really concerned, asked where I had heard it, and I could see the look on his face, so I lied and told him one of the kids at school had said it. And he got really serious and told me there were some guys who had sex with other guys..." Tim stops there, backs up a bit. "I loved my grandfather dearly, and he was a really good guy, but he was born in the twenties and very Catholic, and died in '96... so yeah, not big on gay rights... He told me how that was a really, really, really bad thing, an abomination, and those guys went straight to Hell for all eternity, and that if I ever heard a kid say that again I needed to tell the teacher because that was a very rude word and that kid needed his mouth washed out with soap until he learned some manners.

"And then it made a whole lot of sense."

Gibbs doesn't smile. There's no humor on his face, and Tim gets the sense that he's doing everything he can to control his own emotions because he's trying to keep himself at the same level Tim is. So he swallows hard and his voice is very dry when he says, "Yeah, that's really not funny."

"No. It's not. Maybe it's okay to try and toughen up the guys who enlist. I mean, look, I wasn't that sheltered, I knew how Navy guys talk, we lived on base housing, and even then, I knew what gay was, I just didn't know what a faggot was... But I didn't want to be that tough, I don't want to be that tough, and I certainly didn't need to be that tough when I was a kid."

"No. No one needs to be that tough."

"You were a Gunny. You do things like that to the guys under you?"

"Didn't need to. Mike taught me the," and he very lightly tapped the back of Tim's head, "but I already had something pretty similar to that worked out. Most guys only need a light whack to the pride to get them moving in the right direction. The right look and a few words, in front of the other guys, usually got the job done. I worked with the idea that you didn't want to disappoint me, and you really didn't want to disappoint your team. I made them want to make me smile at them. But there were a lot of guys who worked on the idea that they'd be so scary you'd do whatever you could to avoid getting on their bad side. I always liked carrots better than sticks."

Tim flashes him an are you kidding me look. "You were terrified. The first few years I was constantly afraid you were going to kill me."

Gibbs smiles a little at that. "Made you want to please me, didn't it?"

"Yeah."

"Never cussed anyone out. Not to say that some choice words didn't come out, usually in regards to idiot orders or even dumber officers, but not the kind of thing you're talking about. Gibbs is leaving out the fact that, well, he doesn't talk, and he didn't talk much as a Gunny either. He's also leaving out the three cases where he did have to literally beat guys into doing the right thing. But there's a huge difference between dealing with an eighteen-year-old-know-it-all who is going to get his team killed if he doesn't shape up and your eleven-year-old son who wants to pretend to be a knight or cleric or whatever.

"Yeah, not the same thing at all. Like I said, I grew up on base housing, I remember Army/Navy games where Navy lost. You could hear the yelling through the whole neighborhood. We had this next-door neighbor when we were in Alameda... after a few weeks my mom wouldn't let me play outside when he was working on his car. I don't think I ever heard him say a sentence that didn't have the word fuck in it."

Gibbs nods. "I remember those guys. Served with a bunch of them. Functional vocabulary of about 200 words and twenty of them were different versions of fuck."

"Yeah." Tim lays down his rag and turns to face Gibbs. "Jethro, I've got you and Jimmy and Tony and Ducky. I've got men who love and respect me for who I am and who I want to be. I don't need him. I don't want him. I don't miss him. I don't wish he was here. I don't even wish things were different, anymore. He's just... gone, and I think that's a good thing. I've got my family, and he's got no part in it."

"Okay."
Gibbs very rarely finds himself in a situation where he doesn't know what to do. Knowing what to do is his job. It's part of his core identity. He's the guy who knows. But this one…

His first instinct is to find John McGee, a nice vantage point a klick or so away from him, and put a bullet through his brain. Then shoot him a few times just to blow off some more steam, and maybe, if he's far enough away from everyone else, piss on the corpse and kick him until his feet ache.

It's not even rage, not the way it usually feels, it's just this cold lump in his heart and mind that wants to wipe that man from the face of the planet, destroy every cell of his body.

But Tim didn't say he wanted his dad dead. And if he suddenly turns up dead, shot in the head by a sniper, not only will their team have to investigate it (unless this happens on the west coast) but Tim will know, without a doubt, what happened.

And he's not sure if John McGee suddenly ending up dead would be a good thing for Tim or not.

He does know going to jail for killing him would very much not be a good thing, for anyone. Of course, if John McGee were to end up mysteriously dead on the east coast, his team would investigate it. And yeah, Tim would have to stay out of it, but he and Abby could make sure it was done clean.

It's a really satisfying fantasy. Maybe set fire to him after kicking him until his toes break. Or acid. Acid does horrible things to a body.

But he's fairly sure it'll have to stay a fantasy. Because Tim has a gun, the computer skills to track where the Admiral will be when, and a forensic scientists to make sure he gets away with it clean, and his dad is still breathing, and if he didn't want him breathing, he could take care of it himself.

But he's still not sure what to do with this. Tim's angry, but he kept himself under control, so Gibbs did, too. But he doesn't want to stay under control. He really, really wants to break John McGee. Not treating your kids properly is a hot button issue for him anyway, add in it happening to Tim…

He's not even sure who he could talk to about this. Tim never mentioned it to him before, which probably means he hasn't said anything to anyone else about it, besides Abby, and the way she refers to John as that man suddenly makes a whole lot more sense.

A thought hits him, and it's not exactly comfortable, but… If there was anyone he could talk to that wouldn't be a violation of Tim's privacy and make it worse…

He finds his cellphone and calls Ducky.

"Jethro?"

"Yeah Duck, can you give me Penny's number?"

"You want to talk to Penny? Jethro, have…" Gibbs is fairly sure Ducky was about to say something like, have you two even had a conversation before, when the light flicked on, and Ducky got it.
"555-028-1863. Would I be correct in assuming you wish to speak to her about Timothy?"

"Yeah, Duck."

He's fairly sure Ducky is nodding on the other end of the phone, thinking about what to say next. "Timothy was my patient not all that long ago, and anything I learned about as a result of that will always be kept in confidence. However, if you were thinking that talking to someone about how to help a survivor of abuse, or how to handle your own feelings about something horrible happening to someone you love, I'm always available to listen."

Gibbs appreciates how delicate that answer is, but he's also frustrated by it, because this isn't delicate and he's not in a delicate sort of mood. "Thanks, Duck, but I'd rather not talk in hypotheticals, and I don't want to put you in an awkward position."

"You'd rather call Penny and yell at her."

"I'd rather shoot John McGee and do violent things to his corpse. I'll settle for yelling at her."

"He doesn't blame her and neither does Abby."

"Someone should."

"Someone does. She blames herself, and his mother, and his other two grandparents, and most of all, John. You could yell at him."

"If I get within yelling distance, I'll kill him."

"Then avoid him, because killing him won't help anything."

"It'd feel good."

"Yes, it would." And the tone in Ducky's voice, icy and dark, makes Gibbs realize that he's probably got a much more detailed understanding of what happened to Tim than he does, and much more detailed makes this even harder to deal with.

"What do I do?"

"Exactly what you have been doing. Be a good father to him. Let him know that if he wants to talk, you will listen. Don't kill John unless he tells you it's okay, and if he does, let the rest of us know, because John McGee is a high enough power target that it'll take all of us to do it clean."

"If we ever do anything, what happens with you and Penny?"

"If we ever do anything, I will never breathe a word of it to anyone, including her. She is deeply conflicted about this. He's her son, Jethro, and she loves him. And she feels like she should have done a better job protecting Tim. He's her grandson, and she loves him, too. She adores both of them and is utterly horrified by the idea that she raised a monster. So, if there is ever a need for me to support her while she mourns her son, I will stand next to her and be her shoulder to cry on. And if there is ever an opportunity to avenge our Timothy, I will happily take it. But, I think this is a moot point, because he does not appear to want that, and if he does not want it, we are not going to do anything about it."

"I want to do something about it."

"Then tell Timothy that, and ask what he wants you to do. But don't just go off and do it. This is enough of a burden without you adding to it. Keep this in mind, too, John McGee is still his father. Timothy may be done with him, but there are still going to be a lot of complicated lingering feelings there. He still loves his father. Penny tells me that as late as '11 he was still trying to fix things. He still wants his father's approval, even though he's resigned himself to never getting it."

"He never talks about it."

"Jethro, you of all people should understand burying the unpleasant aspects of your life."

"Yeah, Duck, I know."

"And am I correct in assuming he has now told you about it?"

"Enough. No real details. I was stupidly suggesting he try to patch things up with his dad, and didn't take the first three hints he gave me to back off."

"You've just lost your father. It's natural you'd want to see Timothy get as much time with his father as he can. I'm sure he understands that."

"I know. Still…"

"You feel bad for pushing."

"I feel bad for not figuring it out! Think about all the crap he took from Tony, and Kate, and hell, me, and he just kept on going, smiling at us, doing the job, taking more of it. How bad did it have to be that he stopped talking to John? When I found out they weren't talking that should have been a red flag."

"But it wasn't."

"No. I worked with him for eight years, spent every Christmas and Thanksgiving with him, and it never occurred to me that this kid has two living parents and never spends any time with them. Didn't even know he wasn't speaking to John until Penny showed up. I saw the way John looked at Tim back when we caught that case with him, and besides being pissed off at him for not respecting Tim, the idea there was more than that never touched me. How did I miss it?"

"Because Jethro, phenomenal gut aside, you are not, in fact, psychic. He did not tell you. You never saw any bruises. You only saw the two of them in the same room for less than twenty minutes. You knew they had issues, and that's all you could have known."

"I knew about Ziva. I took the time to really see her. I just, didn't, with Tim."

"I think, if you were to study how Timothy behaved before he and Abby started dating again, and since, you'll notice one of the biggest changes is that he is no longer hiding. For the first nine years we worked with him, he had an amazing talent for blending into the background, quietly doing whatever was necessary, rarely drawing attention to himself. Penny believes that's one of his defense mechanism. He's brilliant, Jethro, but he doesn't show it. Even his writing is under another name, and the picture on his book jackets is in profile and looking away, hiding his full face. It's only been since he's been with Abby, and even with that it's really only the last year we've seen the real Timothy come out regularly. Those kilts of his are as much a fashion statement as they are a way of signaling that he's finally comfortable enough with us to be himself."

"Ziva however, saw you, saw a kindred spirit, and let you see the real her. She did not hide from you."
"I think, if Timothy had been less rebellious, he would have ended up a version of Ziva. Their fathers are, from what I can tell, very similar men. Powerful, controlling, focused on a goal and willing to use anything at their disposal to achieve it. Ziva was a tool in her father's box, a tool he spent her whole life honing. Timothy was supposed to be that for his father. He chose not to be, and has been dealing with the fall out of that for thirty years, if not longer."

"Fascinating Duck." And while that's not entirely sarcastic, Gibbs is a little frustrated with Ducky waxing psychological on his kids' birth dads.

"Jethro, what I want you to remember, why I am bringing this up, is the look on Ziva's face when she saw her father dead. Eli David was not a good man, and he was an appalling father. He sent her to die in the desert. He left her in the hands of men who tortured and raped her for four months. He destroyed any sort of 'real' childhood she should have had. He ordered her to kill her brother. He tried to make her a sociopath. And when he died she had not spoken to him in months, not seen him in years, and she had just learned he had murdered a man.

"I want that image, Ziva collapsed on the floor, cuddling her father's body, crying over him, burned into your mind when you feel the desire to hurt John McGee. Talk to Timothy, but no matter what he says, keep that image in your mind, and be aware that under that anger, no matter how well-deserved, there is anguish, disappointment, and a broken heart that loves and wants to be loved in return."

That got through. "Thanks, Duck."

"Are you still going to call Penny? She'll be home in an hour or so."

"Not right this second, but eventually."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So, back a million years ago (or last April, really was it only five months ago?) we got Squall, where we finally got to see The Admiral. Now, I'm fine with Squall. It was a solid episode. And yeah, I get that NCIS is all about troubled father/son relationships getting better. I got it. We're good. But it was OOC for Tim. There's no way what's going on with him and John was as mild as what we saw in that episode, because Tim's core character trait is forgiveness and turning the other cheek. (To the point where I know some people consider him a doormat.) So, yeah, I don't buy that he cut his dad out of his life because he was neglectful and somewhat unkind. I think NCIS pulled the punch to keep with it's core themes and PG rating.
It lives in his gun safe. In the back.

It has its own case. It's black, steel, thin to keep it light, but strong and durable. The case is old. He got it in 1988, when the M40A1 became the standard issue sniper rifle for the US Military.

He picks it up and takes it downstairs, putting it on the coffee table in front of his sofa, and calls Tim.

"Hey, Gibbs. What's up?" Abby's voice on the other end. She sounds pretty perky, so hopefully the porcupine mood has vanished.

"Hoping to talk to your husband."

"Okay, I'll put him on."

He hears Abby moving around, the sound of water in the background and then, "It's Gibbs" along with the water shutting off.

"Jethro?"

"You doing anything right now?"

"Dishes. Why?"

"Wanna come over?"

"Okay…" he sounds a little uncertain. "Ummm… why?" It's true that Gibbs has actually never asked Tim to come over before, let alone less than three hours after he left in the first place.

"Want to talk to you."

"All right." There's definite confusion in Tim's voice. "You want me to bring Abby?"

"Rather just talk to you."

"Okay. You're making me kind of nervous."

"You're not in trouble."

"Okay. I'll be there in half an hour or so. That work?"

"Yeah."

"You want me to bring anything?"

"Just you."

"Okay… See you soon."

Gibbs hangs up, smirking a little at that, a very clear image of the look on Tim's face as he said that. Then he opens the case, leaving his sniper rifle visible.

The talk with Ducky was helpful. The bit about Tim and Ziva's fathers, once Ducky spelled it out for him and he took the time to think about it, very useful.
His fingers trail over the rifle. He and it have a lot of history together.

He hasn't taken it out because he intends to kill John McGee. He's fairly sure that would hurt Tim. But he wants Tim to know, absolutely, in his bones and soul and gut, that there is a man who loves him enough that he would commit murder for him.

Driving to Gibbs' place, Tim's fairly certain that he knows what Gibbs wants to talk about.

Not like you can say to a man like Gibbs, 'Oh, by the way, my dad used to abuse me, but let's pretend it's not a big deal.' Once he made the decision to say it to Gibbs, he knew there'd be more to it than five minutes of conversation in the basement.

Still, he wasn't expecting to walk in, see Gibbs sitting on his sofa, his rifle out in front of him.

Tim sits next to him, eyes wide, looking at the gun. "Haven't seen that since Somalia."

Gibbs shakes his head, fingers caressing the stock. "Haven't seen most of it. The stock, sight, and trigger went to Somalia. The barrel's new."

"Okay." Tim flicks his eyes away from the gun to Gibbs.

"Melted the old barrel down a few years ago. Leon… lost… some bullets and a report, but if they're ever found again, they won't match anything test-fired by this rifle."

"Ah."

"I heard you and Abby talking about a book a while back, something about the ax of my father's father, is it still the same ax if the blade or the handle's been replaced?"

Tim nods, he remembers that, though it was years ago.

"And if I remember right, the answer was yes. It was the spirit of the thing, not necessarily the parts that made it."

Tim nods at that, too.

Gibbs strokes the barrel. "This is the rifle I used to kill the man that hurt my girls. I looked through this sight, watched him drive up, and put a bullet through him. Say the word, and I will do the same thing to the man who hurt you."

A rush of… something, Tim's not sure if it's rage, fear, or joy flashes through him. He finds himself thinking about the fact that it's hot and tingly; that the physical sensation of whatever this is is so strong he cannot name the emotion. But he can see that Gibbs is waiting for him to say something, but nothing is coming to mind, there's just a whirling blank of whatever this feeling is.

Finally he says, "Jethro?"

The look on Gibbs face is somehow loving and terrifying. The love is aimed at Tim, and terror at the imagined version of his father. "A long time ago, I told you you were mine, and I've done a piss poor job of living up to that. But not anymore. You're mine, Tim, and I take care of what's mine, and if you want, I will end him."
Gibbs waits for him, lets the thoughts and feelings skitter around, lets him collect his words which vanished with that flash of feeling.

Mostly there's just the blank of it. A void of… something… whatever it is he can't, maybe won't, process it. But it takes shape eventually, forms coming clearer in the void. Since Tim's been an adult, he's had no desire to do violence to his father. That's the beginning and end of it. He's a man capable of using violence as a tool, but it holds no joy for him. If he ever does something to or about his father, he has to own it, his tool of choice: his mind, his words, something like that.

So, eventually, he says, "No. I mean, it's tempting. It's really tempting. And I'd be lying if it didn't want to see him look scared or in pain or…" and all of that is true, too.

"But he's my sister's dad, too. And she loves him. They've always gotten along. He's my grandmother's son, and she loves him, too. Though she's very much not happy with him right now. And I've seen enough people bury their parents and children… Hell, just helped you with your dad, and he was old and went in peace and… And I don't want to watch two of the women I love best go through that." And that is true, too. Anything he does or has done about his father will reverberate through other people he holds dear.

"And like with Hernandez and your girls, nothing will change. Nothing will get better."

"You'll have justice."

"I'm still alive, Jethro. And with the exception of when he was teaching me how to fight, he never, ever hit me, and even then it wasn't out of line."

"Vengeance then."

"I don't need it. Not like that. And I don't want to risk you going to jail. You came close enough with Hernandez. I don't want them carting you off to prison when you're seventy and some new NCIS team gets called in to check out our cold cases."

"But mostly… If something ever happens to him… I want to be the one who does it. And, I'm not saying I ever will. I think it's probably better for all of us if I don't ever do anything like that, but… If it's going to happen, it's going to be me."

Gibbs closes up the rifle case. The anger in his eyes is, not gone, but held under better control, and Tim knows it's not aimed at him for turning Gibbs down on this. Next to, or through the anger, is respect. "If you ever change your mind, or if you ever want any help with anything you might want to do for yourself…"

Tim nods.

Gibbs looks him straight in the eye. "I am sorry I didn't pay enough attention to see what was going on with you and John."

He raises an eyebrow at Gibbs, and sees Gibbs understand that it's in relation to being apologized to.

"Most of the time, you apologize to cover your own ass or try to minimize the impact of something you've done. You fuck up; you need to own up to it, none of this sorry crap. Usually, I'm sorry is about pretending you didn't understand you were about to fuck up, or trying to deny the person who you fucked up his right to be angry about it. This is none of that. I am genuinely sorry that I did not actually see who you were. I am sorry I didn't look hard enough to see it. That was my job, and I didn't do it."
Tim shrugs. "You weren't exactly in California in 1987 to '95, and since then I haven't been in the same room with him for more than two hours. There was nothing for you to see."

"There was you. You get along with everyone. You get along with people who make a habit of tormenting you. Ziva and Tony super-glued your face to your desk, I let them do it, and you forgave all three of us. But you don't talk to your dad. Whatever was between you was past your ability to forgive. And you tell me he never hit you, fine. But whatever he said to you hurt you worse than years of being hazed by your partners.

"You never go home. You never talk about your parents. You almost never talk about your childhood. Ziva talks about her childhood more than you do. I talk about my childhood more than you do. The only reason I knew you weren't an orphan was because everyone knows who John McGee is. The only reason I knew you had a sister was because she was in that case, and that's the only reason we knew you got those books published. You keep your cards so close to the vest that people don't even notice you're in the game.

"That should have been a red flag to anyone paying attention. No one is that private. And I really should have known because I spent a decade not talking about anything other than my present and my work. I know the signs. I know what hiding something looks like because I did it. I let myself believe you were shy—"

"I am shy."

Gibbs flashes him a cut the bull look. "You're not that shy. And you certainly aren't that shy after years of knowing someone."

"That's true."

"And that's not why you never told anyone but Abby anything about you."

Tim shrugs. "Didn't actually tell her about it, either. Not all of it. She knew about the fighting, but I never got into specifics. She knew details because apparently I started having nightmares after that case and talking in my sleep. And then I was sick, and out of my head, and when they sponged me down to get me cooled off I let fly with a bunch of the Admiral's greatest hits, and... Well, it was let Ducky think I talk to Abby that way, or explain why I've got words and phrases like those in my head. And I didn't want him thinking I'd talk to her like that. I don't mind if everyone knows we're kinky, I mean, that's pretty obvious, but... not that. I don't degrade her. Never."

"So, why don't you talk about it? Not, to the wide world, but to us."

Tim shrugs and shakes his head. "I've got to think about it, remember it, to talk about it. I'm happier not doing that. Before this, years could go by without it crossing my mind. I like my life now. I love it. And I'd rather be living it, now, than stuck in the past. Maybe I took enough psych/read enough to know the right thing to say, but Wolf keeps thinking I'm okay, and I'd rather just be okay."

"How okay are you if you're having nightmares about it?"

"More than okay enough. I don't remember them. The ones about the freezer I do remember, and if I'm going to go up against my past, that'll be the chunk I tackle first, because that's the part that still wakes me up in a cold sweat."

"Still dream about that sometimes, too."

"I know Tony does. I'm fairly sure Ziva does, also."
Gibbs nods. You can't do this job and not end up broken on some level. Every cop he's ever known who was any good at it had at least a few cases that haunted him.

Tim sits up, touches the rifle case, fingers idly tracing over it. "I meant what I said earlier. I have the family I want. When I was younger, Penny used to encourage me to develop attachments with other men. She knew my dad and I didn't work, and after my grandfather died, she thought it wasn't good for me to only have intimate relationships with women. Not that having close female friends/family was bad, but that I needed some men in my life, too. And she was right. Though I'd say neither of us knew why I spent so long avoiding a truly intimate relationship with a guy. But I'm not doing that anymore, so I have them, now. And I'm glad I've got you and Tony and Jimmy and Ducky. It was something I needed. I've been feeling a lot more… I don't know… whole… or real maybe, these last two years, last year especially, and I think it's just going to keep getting better from here."

Gibbs nods, smiles, eyes warm and fond, and rests his hand on Tim's shoulder. The last time he said this to a guy, it was his Dad, and it was years ago, and now he wishes he had done it more often, but that ship's sailed, but this one hasn't.

"I love you, Tim."

"I know."

"Wanted to make sure you actually got to hear me say it every now and again."

"Thanks. That's… ummm…” And that's when Tim loses it and starts crying. It's not the sentiment. He knows Gibbs loves him. Seen it every day for years now, and even if he hadn't, the rifle and the promise attached to it would be a pretty good hint.

No, it's the fact that Gibbs said it. He opened his mouth and gave it voice. He put it in the form Tim responds best to, and offered the gift of it to him.

That's what did it.

Gibbs scoots up closer to him, wraps his arm around his shoulders, and just holds him while he cries.
Carpe Diem

Chapter Notes

A/N: Okay Lovies, today we've got multi-media fan fiction. Off to youtube (or wherever you find free music) and put in Frank Turner Tell Tale Signs (If you do youtube, this is the one I suggest: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TgmgfDWfOd4). Okay, got it? Good. Turn that puppy on and get reading!

Come to the lab.

The thing about being an expecting father is that, when your wife sends you a somewhat cryptic text, you end up responding to it almost before you got it.

So, it's roughly forty seconds after Tim gets that text that he is in the lab, nerves jangling with the adrenaline rush. But once down there, nothing looks out of place. Abby's at the computer working away, apparently fine.

"What?" That sounds kind of annoyed, mostly a I ran down here for nothing? sort of vibe.

She turns and smiles at him. "Dance with me."

"What?" This time it's clear disbelief in his voice.

"Found a great song. Want to dance to it. Need a partner."

"We're at work."

"We have sex in here, and you think dancing is going too far?"

"We don't do that during business hours. And it's..." he checks his watch, "1:43. Very much business hours."

"Come on. Anyone asks, you're humoring my insane pregnant hormones."

"You can say that again." He holds out his hand and she takes it, stepping into him and clicking on the stereo.

"This is dance music?" he asks, his hand settling on the small of her back. It's a steady, quiet little guitar riff. Not bad, but nothing making him think, gotta move.

"It will be."

And in a few seconds, when the drums come in, he catches what she was thinking, and begins a slow steady two step. It's a classic slow dance beat.

"Is this a song about self-mutilation?" he asks as a few of the lyrics stick in his mind.

"Shhh... Pretty music," she says, swaying against him.

She's right, the music is pretty, nice steady beat, the singer's voice is pleasant, and British accent is... strong enough he's not having an easy time following exactly what the lyrics are, and that's probably a good thing.

They're maybe two minutes into the song when he hears, "Agent and Mrs. McGee, what are you doing?"

Agent Tim McGee has a pretty standard response to this, namely leaping back from Abby, blushing, looking embarrassed, and focusing his full attention on Director Vance.

Tim McGee, soon to be head of NCIS Cybercrime, DC Division has a somewhat different one. One that is, hopefully, respectful enough of Leon and his position, but demonstrating he's no longer willing to be cowed by the man: "Humoring my pregnant wife, Sir," he answers Vance without stopping dancing.

Abby slaps him on the shoulder, and he dips her back, gently, can't go too far back seven months pregnant. The two step beat has shifted, so a holding move seems to be worth putting into play.

"Seizing the day, Leon," Abby says when he pulls her back up. "Never know when I'll get my next chance to dance with my husband. We'll be done in about two minutes."

"Fine." Leon looks exasperated, but heads out of the lab.

They're still dancing, but Tim's looking worried. "You said that to him?"

"If anyone would understand, it's Leon."

"Well, yeah, but isn't that rubbing salt in the wound?"

"I hope not. Rumor has it he's dating again. I hope it's a reminder to go for it."

"I hope he takes it that way."

"He will. Now shush. Dancing with your girls, not worrying about Leon."

"Yes, dear."

Abby kisses him gently, smiles, and he smiles back, shakes his head a little, and kisses her forehead, then she rests her head on his shoulder, two stepping away with him as the song wraps up.
May 8th marks yet another doctor's appointment. They had been once a month, but this is the first of the every two weeks appointments, and it, like a few of the others, begins with an ultrasound.

Jimmy asks Tim about that. Best he remembers, seven month ultrasound isn't standard operating procedure.

So Tim tells him what Dr. Draz had told them back at the 20 week ultrasound, Abby's placenta was a bit low, and they just wanted to check on it.

Jimmy's staring at him, confused and amazed, and finally asks, "Why haven't you been freaking out for the last ten weeks?"

That draws Tim up short. "Should I have been? Doc said something like one in three women have that issue at twenty weeks, but they check again later, and it's like one in two hundred by the 30th week. Uterus grows, shifts its shape and it pulls up and everything is fine."

"It's probably not a big deal." But Jimmy's not exactly sounding confident on that.

"Okay, you're starting to freak me out."

Jimmy rolls his eyes. "Yeah, well, I'm a little sensitive on things like this."

"So, is this you being overprotective or was she feeding us happy bullshit because there's nothing we could do about it?"

"Overprotective. She's right, placenta previa is really common mid-pregnancy and almost non-existent by the time you get to full term. They'll check today and see where everything is?"

"Yeah."

"Okay."

So, sitting in the ultrasounds lab, Tim's feeling a bit more nervous than he'd like to be. He really didn't like the look on Jimmy's face when he mentioned the placenta was low. Yeah, Jimmy's sensitive to things like this, but…"

The tech comes in and begins the ultrasound. And 4d images of Kelly more or less shut down his ability to worry. Overwhelming awe: that face, those tiny fingers curled into her mouth, they could even see her lips sucking gently on the forefinger.
They're both floating on that image when the tech says, "I'd like to get some more images of the placenta. I can get better quality from a transvaginal scan."

And cute and love and drifting along on clouds of happy baby joy come crashing to a halt.

"Why do you need a better image?" Abby asks.

"It's still low, and we need to know exactly where it is."

They won't let you use your smartphone in the doc's office. This is deeply annoying to both Tim and Abby right this second. They're sitting in an exam room, with nothing but fear to keep them company.

The Ultrasound Tech, Julie, wouldn't tell them anything beyond, 'low.' What does low mean? 'Talk to the doc.' Is this a big problem? 'Dr. Draz'll read the scans and let you know what's going on.' Can you at least tell me my wife and baby aren't in danger of dying in the next five minutes? 'No one's dying today.'

Abby's dressed again, and sitting on the examination table. She's so nervous she isn't moving. He's pacing.

"Fuck it!"

There's a computer on the desk in the office. It's for the doc to use. Not him. Right now, he doesn't care about that, at all.

In less than a minute, he's into it, and searching the internet for whatever the hell a low placenta is and what it means. He's trying to remember, Jimmy called it something, but he's so scared it's slipping his mind.

So he googles low placenta and finds reams of information on placenta previa. He's reading to Abby about how it means the placenta is over the cervix and as the cervix gets softer and opens it can tear the placenta and hemorrhaging can occur.

To say they are both less than thirty seconds away from hysterical fear when Dr. Draz walks in would be a very accurate description.

She sees both of them, hovering next to the computer, skin white, faces tight, Abby clutching onto Tim's hand as they're reading, takes a deep breath, reaches over, turns off the computer and says, "It's not that bad. Sit down, take a few deep breaths, and start to calm down. Abby's not going to be bleeding to death in the grocery store."

She gives them a minute to sit down, both of them on the exam table. Tim has his arm around her shoulders, and she's snuggled into him, gripping his knee.

"Okay, let's start at the beginning. Obviously you both know about worst case placenta previa now. That's not you. Right now, your placenta is at 2.5 centimeters away from the cervix. Anything lower than two centimeters and we get nervous. Basically as the cervix thins and softens the placenta can rip and result in bleeding.

"First and foremost, right now we're at watch and wait. Hopefully, as your uterus continues to grow, the placenta will end up further away from the cervix and this won't be a problem."
"But even if it stays where it is, this isn't something to panic about. We know it's an issue. We're going to keep monitoring it. The biggest thing we're going to be dealing with is how fast your body changes in relation to how fast Kelly grows. If your body stays at full thickness and no dilation, up to 37 weeks, then this will be very easy. We'll schedule the c-section, and one morning come the middle of June you'll come to the hospital and a few hours later, you'll be holding Kelly.

"If your cervix starts to ripen and dilate before that, we'll start something called pelvic rest, no internal exams, no sex, you take it easy. It's not exactly bed rest, but if you don't have to get up to do it, you don't go do it. Pretty much, no jostling the uterus. Thirty-six weeks is officially full term, but we like to see babies get to thirty-seven weeks, the outcomes are a bit better, and their lungs are usually in better shape.

"If you start bleeding before that, we'll use medication to try and make the bleeding stop. If that works, then you go on bed rest." She checks their information. "You live close enough to the hospital that you'd probably be able to go home for that. Bed rest means exactly that, you lay in bed and catch up on your TV and reading. The only thing you get up for is to go pee. You'll stay on bed rest until Kelly hits thirty-seven weeks."

"What if the bleeding doesn't stop?" Tim asks.

"Emergency c-section. The placenta has a lot of blood flow, but it's not an artery. You're not going to bleed out in five minutes if it ruptures, no matter what those morons on the internet say. Sure, now is a bad time to decide to go on a cross country trip. Right now you don't want to be more than twenty minutes from a hospital. But everyone in this practice can get a baby out in less than seven minutes if need be, so no one is going to bleed to death.

"The biggest thing to keep in mind right now is that if you start bleeding, get to the hospital right away."

Tim and Abby are a little calmer with that, but a little calmer and calm aren't precisely the same thing. Abby pulls it together enough to ask, "What do we do to avoid bleeding? I mean, do I need to start pelvic rest now, or…"

Dr. Draz shakes her head. "No. You don't need pelvic rest now. I'm not saying you want to start running marathons or anything. Take it easy. If it weighs more than fifteen pounds, have someone else pick it up. But that's fairly standard seven months pregnant advice, anyway. Right now, while your cervix is full thickness and shut, everything is perfectly fine. Given where your placenta is, the most likely story is that it'll continue to scoot out of the way as your body changes, and by the time Kelly's ready to come out it'll be far enough out of the way to not be a problem. In most cases like this, if we were back in the pre-ultrasound days, we'd have never known there was an issue."

"What does 'most' mean?" Tim asks.

"In my experience, about seven out of ten. I'm thinking we'll keep an eye on it, see how and if it moves, and by the beginning of June we'll make a decision as to whether you want to try and deliver vaginally or if you'd rather schedule a c-section. It's entirely likely that by the time you're at term that it'll be a good three inches away from your cervix and this won't be an issue at all."

"Is there anything I can do to try and… encourage it to scoot up? Stretching or anything? Hang from my knees, inversion table, anything?" Abby asked.

"No."
"Is sex okay?" Tim asks.

"Right now, yes."

"I mean, we have a whole lot of it."

"Good for you. Yes, it's okay. Obviously, don't do anything that hurts, but I'd assume you already know that."

Tim's nodding. "It's really okay?"

Dr. Draz sighs, she's seen this before, knows it's a normal, scared male response, knows that this is basically the only part of this issue that he can control, but well, her sympathy for it is somewhat limited.

"Is your penis a foot long?"

"No." He's looking at her like she's completely insane and says, "Orgasmic contractions are kind of like labor contractions, right?"

Her respect for Tim jumps up about ten notches. Poking the placenta and breaking it is the usual guy fear. He's the first guy she's seen who's put together the idea that orgasmic contractions might move the uterus in a bad way. She smiles gently.

"It's really okay. For right now, and likely the next month, everything is going to keep being exactly the same as it was before. We're just watching more carefully. As the cervix starts to ripen, and we've got a better idea of what is going on, we'll be able to plan from there.

"I'm thinking we'll keep with the every two weeks appointments, but once you start having any contractions at all, we'll move to once a week. You will, eventually, start to have little contractions. They call them Braxton-Hicks, but really, they're all the same thing. It's just your body getting ready to get the baby out. You don't need to sprint to the hospital as soon as you feel them, but once you do, it's time to give me a call and schedule an appointment for the next day. So, we all okay with this plan?"

Tim and Abby nod absently. That's a ton of information, and no, they aren't really ready, or okay. They just aren't in a blind panic anymore, and while that's better than being terrified of breathing wrong for fear of bleeding to death on the way home, neither of them are particularly happy or calm on the ride home.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Okay, I'm playing a little fast and loose with placenta previa. Most of the stuff you'll see in here will be factually true(ish) or at least not beyond the bounds of possible. Mostly, I'm toning the danger level down a tad. Happy reading all, more good stuff tomorrow!
Being a pregnant father is very different than being a pregnant mother.

And not just on the obvious levels of your body doesn't change and you aren't swamped with hormones that make you insane.

For example: if you are a pregnant dad, other dads, upon finding this out, will occasionally tell you horror stories. These horror stories usually involve things like your wife going absolutely insane in a Jekyll/Hyde sort of way, being forced to rearrange every piece of furniture in the house at 2:00 in the morning as a result of this insane, and how you never, ever get to have sex again.

They very rarely involve stories of how the baby goes from being inside your wife to getting out. (Or that there may, just possibly, be a causal relationship between how this happens and the whole no sex thing.)

This might have something to do with the fact that most guys, especially with casual acquaintances, would rather cut their own tongues out with a pair of chop sticks than admit to being really scared about something.

However, veteran moms seem to have absolutely no issues at all with telling perfect strangers exceptionally gory stories of how they went into labor, dealt with twenty hours of excruciating contractions, had the baby go into distress at nine centimeters dilated, and then had a terrifying emergency c-section that took months to heal up from. But they don't tell those stories when there are men around. So, Tim hasn't heard them. Sure, labor forever, lots of pushing, hurts, yep, he's heard that. Vaginal prolapse, fourth degree tearing, pushing so hard the blood vessels in your eyeballs burst, emergency c-sections where you almost bleed to death, not all of the placenta being delivered and massive infections, nope, those stories don't get mentioned when he's around.

Likewise, there is no 'Labor Olympics' for dads. Dads don't compete with each other over who had the 'best' labor. They don't tell stories of how they didn't need any pain meds and had an all-natural, organic homebirth awash in love and joy and nesting complete with soft focus, glow-y, happy stuff all over the place. (Or if there are guys that do that, none of them are in Tim's social circle.)

Women do. And since she's been visibly pregnant women have been telling Abby one of two stories: the perfect love-fest natural birth, or the went to the hospital and every possible thing that could go wrong did.

Now, it is true, that the birth she knows most about, Molly's, was an uncomplicated hospital birth, where nothing went wrong, no one was treated like an animal about to be slaughtered, followed by a fairly standard healing up time, and Breena has been telling Abby for months now to ignore those cows who get off on scaring pregnant moms, but, it's hard to shut those stories out. Especially when more and more of the keep piling on.

It's also true, that while Tim's been reading The Expectant Dad Guide, What To Expect When You're Expecting, and things like that, Abby's been reading/watching The Business of Being Born, Gentle Birth, Gentle Mothering, and lots of other things that flat out say that if you go to a hospital they'll cut you open at the first hiccough whether you need it or not because the profits are better.
And lastly, while they are both aware of the fact they aren't reading the same things, they are also not aware of how radically different the content of the things they're reading is.

All of this is relevant because, having gotten home from being told by their OB that Abby has what's called a near previa, and googling the ever living snot out of it, they are both coming to some very different conclusions.

For example, Tim's thinking that more or less bubble wrapping Abby from head to toe and keeping her in bed from now until a scheduled c-section at 37 weeks is a brilliant idea. In that he does not have to personally do it, five weeks of bed rest doesn't strike him as a problem.

And sure, Dr. Draz, who he is currently thinking is being insanely reckless with the health of the two most important people in the entire history of the Earth, says they don't need to do that, but the stuff he's reading seems to be indicating placentas are made of tissue paper and can rip at a second's notice if you even look at them wrong, and there's no such thing as a safe previa, and really the only way to deal with this is to keep Abby as still as possible from now until the minute Kelly's lungs are developed enough for her to be on the outside. And just to be on the safe side, they should start doses of steroids at 34 weeks to get her lungs developed that much faster.

Abby, meanwhile, is dealing with having been DQed from the Labor Olympics. (She has not internalized any sort of idea that this might kill her, in this respect she's doing better than Tim at rationally assessing the risks, in other respects, not so much.) She had had an idea of the kind of labor she wanted, and sure, at home was a long-shot, but she'd been taking such good care of herself, and being really careful, trying to get to a low-intervention, no drugs, hands off, doing this naturally, the way her body was designed to, at her own pace sort of birth, and that just got shot to hell and gone.

She likes Dr. Draz, but having her hover around the whole time isn't what she wanted.

And a c-section… from what she's been reading, they're almost never really necessary and have so many bad side effects, everything from massive infections and death, to punctured bladders and permanent incontinence, to babies with weaker lungs and missing out on the all the useful bacteria of the vaginal canal, and it's just a huge mess. (This would be where Tim is doing a more rational job of assessing risk, and Abby's freaking out unnecessarily.)

Of course, a lot of the stories she's been hearing, and things she's been reading, indicate you sure as hell don't want to try a vaginal delivery in a hospital, either. They'll pump you full of Pitocin which means ultra-painful contractions, more or less forcing you to take pain meds, leaving you way too woozy to properly bond with your new baby, and possibly drugging the child, harming her ability to bond with you, followed by an episiotomy (whether you want it or not, because it makes things easier for the docs) and of course that makes the tearing worse and the healing up more painful.

And don't get her started on MRSA and all the superbugs that live in hospitals.

So, Tim is terrified. Abby is sad and feeling hopeless, like all the good options just got yanked away from her. And both of them are thinking the other one is completely bonkers because they're both dealing with this with a radically different set of assumptions about what is going to happen.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: My youngest boy is almost five now. So, it's been a while since I was in the Labor Olympics. (DQed on the first round due to the fact that I couldn't give a crap about how the kid got out, as long as he did eventually get out.) However, every horror story I listed is something some "kind" person decided I needed to hear about in vibrant, gory detail, because, hell, I don't know why. I mean, why would you tell a woman who is seven months pregnant something like that? It's not like these are cautionary tales designed to help you anticipate pitfalls and avoid them. And I did have strangers come up and more or less tell me I was abusing my kid because I wasn't gung ho on an organic home birth. And I've got buddies online, who are still, years later, mourning the fact that they "failed" to have a "natural" birth.

Okay, not sure why I'm ranting here. Probably annoyed that so many women get so caught up in doing this the "right" way, that they lose sight of the bigger goal.
When they put Molly to bed, and Jimmy still hadn't heard anything from Tim, he goes from nervous to really worried.

So he does something he'd never done before.

Technically Jimmy is a doctor. He's kept up with his continuing education units and made sure to maintain his medical license in Virginia. Mostly it's just a point of pride. He had to finish medical school to be a Medical Examiner, he didn't actually have to do his residency and get his MD. But he did it.

And as a registered doctor in the state of Virginia, he has access to the Federal Medical Database. And sure, the bugs aren't all worked out, and the backlog on old data is about ten years long, but back in January, all new casework, test results, consultations, and notes are supposed to be uploaded so any doctor can get full medical records at a moment's notice.

So, he goes online, registers with the database, and checks.

He spends a good half an hour studying the ultrasounds, reads Dr. Draz's notes, and her suggestions, thinks they're fairly reasonable, and comes to the conclusion that he has not heard anything from Tim and Abby because they are probably at home getting hysterical about this.

Breena sits next to him, reading over his shoulder, looking concerned.

He stands up, kisses her, and says, "I think I'm going to go make a house call. You feel like sending that to Ducky, so I can get them a third opinion, fast?"

"Sure. You want me to have our OB look at it?"

"Might as well. I'm guessing Tim's gonna need to be talked off a ledge, and Abby's probably feeling pretty disappointed."

"Yeah, she was hoping for an unmedicated, home birth."

"At home?" Jimmy's never gotten that. He knows some people do it, voluntarily. But he wouldn't get a cavity filled without pain medication and properly trained medical professionals right next to him, let alone anything longer or more painful than that. And having both delivered babies (he, like everyone else who was a medical intern, had a six week long OB rotation) and been there for the delivery of both of his own children, he's pretty comfortable with the idea that it really hurts, lasts a hell of a lot longer than a filling, and is way more dangerous.

His personal theory, that the whole natural childbirth thing is women being just as macho as men, if not more so, (because he doesn't know any guy, anywhere, ever, who would sign up to spend twenty hours having his testicles stretched to ten times their original size without a ton of drugs) and this is their way of proving who has the biggest dick, is one he hasn't felt any need to share with Breena or Abby, though given that this was something Abby's in favor of, he may decide to share it with Tim.

"I kept telling her that the hospital isn't that bad, and that the drugs are really very nice, but apparently there are a lot of girl in HR and Accounting and a few other departments who came by the lab, dropped off cute little presents, and proceeded to tell her absolute horror stories about how bad their births were. She's pretty scared."
"Okay." He picks up his phone, hit Tim's contact, and before Tim can say anything says, "I'll be there in twenty minutes. Put your computer down, pry Abby away from hers, and go watch a sit-com while you wait for me, okay?"

"Jimmy?" He can hear the fear under the surprise in Tim's voice.

"You didn't call. That meant something was wrong. I stole Abby's medical records, wanted to know what was up before I called, and from there it wasn't too hard to figure you'd be scared. Sit tight. I'll be there soon. We'll go over everything together, and hopefully get you off that ledge your about to jump off of."

"I'm not that bad."

"Sure you're not. Look at your right hand."

"Yeah."

"It's shaking isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Go. Get on the sofa, put something stupid and funny on, I'll be there soon. If you want, I'll grab Ducky on the way, and be there in about an hour."

"Rather have you here alone, faster."

"Sit tight, I'll be there soon." He hangs up and looks at Breena. "He's terrified." Then he hits Ducky's contact button on his phone. "Hey, Ducky, Tim and Abby didn't get good news from the doc today. Breena's sending you the scans and everything. Feel like looking them over and heading to his place?"

Ducky's voice is grave as he says, "How bad?"

"I don't want to prejudice your opinion. Take a look and head over to their place. Tim's terrified. I'm sure Abby's sad and scared. They could use some handholding from people who know how this works."

"Certainly. I'm opening my email." He can hear Ducky messing with his computer. "I'll be there in an hour or so."

"Thanks."

Breena looks up from forwarding everything to their OB, and gestures for Jimmy to come closer. He does, and she kisses him. "Give them my love and a kiss."

"Tim, too?" Jimmy's not looking thrilled at that.

"Especially, Tim. He needs one, and it might shock him enough to help break the panic."

That's a good point. "If he hits me, it's your fault."

Breena smiles. "He's not going to hit you. At least, not until Bootcamp on Saturday. Get over there, talk them off the ledge, and give both of them a smooch from me."

"Okay."
Bedside manner has never been one of Jimmy's strengths. Mostly because of his skill at saying whatever the least appropriate thing for the given moment. But, he's been getting a lot better at that over the years.

And right now, he's got one main guiding principal going: Do Not Scare Them Anymore Than They Already Are.

He's thinking that shouldn't be too hard. He's also thinking that what likely happened was their Doc explained what was going on in a rather soothing sort of way. They both sat there, pretty scared, not really taking it in, and not knowing what sorts of questions to ask. Then they got home, researched the hell out of it, and got really scared, and had no one to ask anything besides the internet which is more or less the worst possible place to study anything that you find personally scary.

Family, especially family that's expected, doesn't have to knock at the McGee house, so he just walks in when he gets there, and sees the two of them following his directions. They are on the sofa, looking in the direction of the TV, and he can hear a laugh track.

He's absolutely certain they aren't actually watching it, though.

"Hey."

Tim hops up to greet him, and Jimmy gives him a hug. Abby starts to get up, and Tim glares at her, so she stays sitting.

It's true that Jimmy will never, ever call Tim out on overreacting about possible dangers to Abby or Kelly. He will never say Tim is being unreasonable, or that he's got no right to be scared. It's also true that he can feel Tim shaking and this level of scared isn't good for either of them. So, arm wrapped around Tim, he says, "Come here, Abby, join the hug."

And she does, looking fairly pleased that he's not treating her like she's made of glass. And now Tim's glaring at him.

"You carried her to the sofa, didn't you?" He gets that out, and then Abby's there, nodding yes, rolling her eyes, so he pulls her close, too and takes a moment to hold both of them, trying to be calming just by being there.

He kisses Abby's forehead, looks her in the eye, and says, "You're going to be fine." He pets her tummy. "Kelly is going to be fine." Then he turns his head two inches to the right, kisses Tim on the cheek, which he looks horrified at, but it does seem to have shocked him out of his fear, at least, he's not shaking anymore. "The kisses are from Breena. She thought you'd need them." He stares Tim in the eye. "Tim, your girls are going to be fine. Come on, let's sit down and go over this. Abby, can you get us some paper and markers."

"I can get it," Tim answers.

"I know you can. But you need to know she can walk around and not break, so Abby's gonna get us the supplies, and you and I are going to sit down and wait for her to do it." When Abby heads upstairs, Jimmy quietly says, "Look, I know you two; your emotions feed hers and vice versa, so you have to keep it together. That's your job: be the man, and that means playing cool, especially if you aren't. You wanna have a full-on freak out with me and Gibbs, that's fine. We will support you through it, and if it takes more than a day, we'll come up with a lie for why you aren't home. But from now until that baby comes out, you absolutely cannot panic in front of her. Scared is fine. Sad is fine. It's good for her to see this affects you, too. So terrified you're treating her like a light breeze'll hurt her, that isn't! You're just making her more upset, and that makes you more upset, and you end up with a positive feedback cycle from hell."

"What if it was Breena?"

"Then I'd be exactly where you are if not two steps further down the panic line, and you'd be telling me to calm the fuck down and not lose it in front of her because not losing it is my job! Only one of the two of us needs to be sane at any given time, but both of us have to be able to fake it. So, until you can handle this on your own, I'm here to help you stay cool. But you've got to be able to grin and bear it."

Abby heads down, puts a few markers on the coffee table, and heads into Tim's office for paper. Once she was out of earshot again, he asks, "We good on that?"

Tim grits his teeth and narrows his eyes. Jimmy takes that as consent.

Abby's back half a minute later with a stack of typing paper. Jimmy kneels in front of their coffee table, and waves them to come close. "As I told Tim, I stole your medical records, checked the scans, and sent copies to Ducky and our OB, so third and fourth opinions'll be heading your way soon. In fact, Ducky'll probably be here soon, maybe with Penny, and possibly having consulted with a few of his buddies as well."

Jimmy takes the black marker and draws a circle on the paper, then stuck two small, vertical lines right next to each other at the bottom of the circle.

"Okay, this is a really awful drawing of a uterus. Those lines are the cervix. Normally, as the third trimester wears on, those lines get shorter and further apart." He adds arrows pointing right and left.

"Now, usually, the placenta is up here." He adds a red blob at the top of the circle. "And when you go into labor the contractions pull the cervix sort of up and apart." He gestured with his fingers with a drawing up motion.

"Both of you with me?"

They both nod.

He snags another piece of paper, draws another circle, two lines, and a red blob right at the bottom over both of the lines. "That's a placenta previa. As you can see it's lying right over the cervix. Placentas are pretty tough. If you've ever seen one in person, they look like an evil bloody jellyfish from your worst nightmares. They're rich in blood, lots and lots of vascularity, so like your lips, if you cut one it bleeds like crazy. They also don't stretch. So, if one half of the placenta is over here, and the other half is over there," he's circling each side of the placenta pointing out even more clearly that it's straddling the cervix, "you've got a ticking time bomb, because the parts of the uterus it's attached to are moving further and further away from each other. And, not to put too fine a point on it, it's also between the baby and the exit. This is a bad thing."

He grabs another sheet of paper. Draws yet another circle and two lines, and this time puts the placenta blob three centimeters up and to the left of the cervix. "If I'm reading the scans right, and it looks like Dr. Draz thinks this is what's going on, too, this is what your uterus looks like. First and foremost, you don't have the placenta waiting for the floor under it to rip apart and it's not blocking Kelly's way out. So that's the very good news part of this."

Jimmy gestures with the marker while he says, "Okay, so possible trouble comes when everything thins out and starts moving. The cervix and walls of the uterus move up and back, great. Well, there's this big blob of blood sitting there, and it's attached to that wall, so it sort of smushes as the contractions continue, and that can cause bleeding issues."

He grabs the drawing of the normal uterus. "Also, usually, after the baby's out, you keep having contractions to expel the placenta, and stop the bleeding. Most of the contractions come from up here." He's circling the top of the uterus where the placenta is. "Which makes sense because it's pulling everything up and out. Likewise the hardest, strongest contractions aren't at the cervix end of things, because that's got to be soft and flexible enough to get the baby out." He looks up at Tim and Abby, who are staring at this ridiculously inaccurate drawing like it's the revealed Truth of God. "With me so far?" They nod, not looking away. "So, the mechanism that gets the placenta out and shuts off the bleeding doesn't work all that well because the placenta isn't in place to take advantage of it. So, once again, potential bleeding problems.

"According to Dr. Draz your body hasn't really gotten the message that the baby's gonna come out anytime soon. The uterus is a big, strong, thick muscle, especially at the cervix end, because it's got to keep that baby in there." He draws a quick and dirty, but significantly more accurate, sketch of a female pelvis. "So right now, you've got this pile of muscle, skin, and bones all working together to keep everything inside you in there. So, yeah, you don't want to take up bungee jumping, but for right now, there's not much risk of anything happening. You've got a nice, contained unit, and it doesn't much matter one way or another where your placenta is."

The fact that Abby hasn't just flashed Tim an I-told-you-so look tells Jimmy exactly how scared both of them must be.

"But starting soon, your hipbones are going to spread out. Your uterus and cervix will thin out and spread. After all, the final goal is get the baby out, and that won't happen if everything stays shut tight. And as things spread out, the possibility of tearing gets higher."

"What's higher?" Tim asks.

"I don't know. Not an OB. Dr. Draz had in her notes something like 7 out of 10 women she's seen with your kind of previa do just fine, and I've got no reason to think she's wrong."

"What's fine?" Tim wants to know.

"Not a mind reader in addition to not being an OB, but I'll guess she's thinking that in seven out of ten cases the uterus keeps growing and the placenta moves far enough out of the way to not be an issue."

"Did you ever deal with something like this?" Abby asks.

"No. I delivered twenty-two babies solo, and helped with seventy-three more during my OB rotation. Nothing like this, though. Of course, they don't let Interns work on the high-risk patients."

"But it is a high risk," Tim adds, staring at Abby, terrified, stroking the back of her neck.

Jimmy squeezes his shoulder. "Yeah, but there's a huge difference between high-risk and get-your-affairs-in-order. If it was 1950, hell, 1980, this would be a huge freaking deal. But it's not. Your OB knows this is an issue. You know it's an issue. You go in, you get the c-section, they take everything out in one fell swoop, pump some Pitocin in to make sure the bleeding shuts down, and if it doesn't, they've already got you typed and matched for more blood, possibly your own if you want to do that, pints of it on ice waiting for you, clotting factor at the ready if need be, and if worst comes to absolute worst they can have a hysterectomy done in a matter of minutes. But you don't die. Kelly doesn't die. Four or five days, ten tops, you're home from the hospital with her and get to see how well you function on no sleep."

And while Tim finds that reassuring, it wasn't the right tact for keeping Abby less scared. "I don't want a c-section, let alone a hysterectomy!"

Jimmy nods, realizing his tactical error on this. Tim's worried about losing the loves of his life, and Jimmy, who is also a husband, and Abby's best friend, is feeling the same sort of thing. Abby's worried about being cut to shreds, mutilated, and losing Kelly. She's not looking at this as a life or death situation for her.

Jimmy tries a different tact. "Look, this isn't likely to happen. Kelly's about two pounds now. She's going to triple in size, maybe quadruple, possibly more between now and when she's ready to come out. Your uterus is going to grow like crazy. By the time you hit regular contractions everything will have likely moved out of the way.

"But if it doesn't, if it was Breena, I'd say get the c-section as soon as they'll do one. But you're not Breena. I've done four c-sections, and yeah, they aren't minor surgery. It's not getting a few stitches. Your abdominal wall does not appreciate being cut open. But, assuming Dr. Draz actually knows what she's doing, and my guess is, since you're still going to her, she does, the risk levels for a planned c-section should be minimal.

"But again, I'm not an OB, I'm not your OB, and it's not my body getting cut open, so I've got a somewhat different take on what's going on here. What I do know is that the last thing you want is the emergency, bleeding all over the place, get-that-kid-out-STAT c-section…"

They all hear the door open, footsteps, and a gentle voice saying, "Dr. Palmer, I concur," at the same time.
At the age of eighteen, Don Mallard, not yet nicknamed Ducky, was a medic in Korea. (Coming into contact with large numbers of American soldiers, who universally called him Duck or Ducky, eventually caused the name to stick.)

As a medic, he became a talented medical jack of all trades. In a pinch he could, and did, take off limbs, tie off bleeders, fish shrapnel out of wounds, debride burns. In many cases he did those things under fire, or during the transport part of moving wounded soldiers from the front to the back.

He also, and this is something most people would assume to be true if they thought about it, but generally don't think about, dealt with delivering (or helping to deliver) a lot of babies.

A general rule of thumb is that if you are located in a place with a very large number of young men, IE an army, and if that very large group of men has limited access to birth control/is unwilling to use said birth control (condoms) you will, in nine months' time, end up with a large number of babies. The fighting part of the Korean War lasted three years, and there were numerous fairly long truces. This resulted in lots of babies, and while it's true that usually, in less medically advanced cultures, the local midwife is in charge of these things, Koreans are (or at least were) pretty well convinced they were the superior race on Earth, and half-Korean/half-Anglo babies and their mothers were scorned and treated horribly, so being a medic, and often the only guy many of the soldier knew with any medical training, he got called in to help with deliveries when the woman's family and village shunned her.

He returned to Scotland after the war. Studied medicine at Edinburgh. Joined the RAMC, and spent the next thirty years in every hot zone the Queen was involved in. Over the course of that time, he's delivered a whole lot of babies.

He's not an obstetrical expert, and he knows that. But he also knows that for many years and in many places he was the only one around who had any medical training beyond that of the local midwife, and when things got hairy, he'd get called in. At the very least he could perform a tidy c-section and make sure the woman didn't come down with childbed fever after.

So it is with this background that he's looking at Abby's scans, Penny standing next to him, forwarding the information to one of her friends, Dr. Gladys Monroe, the current head of Obstetrics at John's Hopkins, (add opinion five to the list) and thinking about how much he enjoys living in a world where you can find this out ahead of time.

The entirety of his baby-delivering career was spent in a world where, should the placenta be badly located the only way to find that out was for the woman to begin hemorrhaging, or depending on the level of badly located, come down with a nasty infection when all of it was not properly delivered.

So, it is true that he's thinking this is not happy or joyous news, he's also greatly relieved to know this ahead of time.

Granted, he's been out of the game long enough that he has no idea what current standards of treatment are. Back in his day the standard was c-section followed by hysterectomy, desperately trying to stop the bleeding in time, hoping and praying the whole way through that the mother came through alive with the (almost always premature) baby written off as tragic collateral damage.

That's why Penny's emailing her friend. If anyone does know what the cutting-edge standard of care is, she will.
So, in this, Ducky is expecting his value as comforter and cooler, wiser head will be what comes into play.

And as such he has two goals, first and foremost to manage Jethro, who will probably be just as scared as Tim, if not more so in that he's already lost his wife, daughter, lover, and pseudo-daughter in Kate, and will feel like he has fewer options in dealing with that fear, because he'll want to be a rock for Tim and Abby. Secondly, no matter what actual medical advice Jimmy comes up with, he'll back that. Jimmy's OB residency was after the invention of ultrasound as a obstetrical tool and Georgetown's Medical School is a more than adequate program. So he's going to agree or defer to anything Jimmy has to say about this.

They head to Gibbs' place before going to Tim and Abby's. Ducky wants to tell Jethro himself, and give him a little time to get himself under control.

Penny stays in the car. While she may think that Patriarchal emotional norms for males are silly, she's also fully aware that that's the operating manual Jethro functions under. He can't allow himself to express any emotions in front of her other than anger or happy. Fear and sorrow, the likely response to this news, is private for him and can only be expressed alone or with very, very dear friends, like Ducky, and certainly not in front of a woman he barely knows.

She also knows, because Ducky told her, that she's on Jethro's "shit list" right now. He has not yet called to yell at her about Tim, but that's probably still in the offing. So she does not want her presence to give him something other than Tim and Abby to focus on, not right now at least. Depending on how scared he gets, having something to get angry at may be useful. (After all, forty years as a Navy wife means she's got a few tricks up her sleeve when it comes to managing scared men who feel like they're not even allowed to feel fear, let alone know how to deal with it.)

So she texts with her friend, sees that Dr. Draz is on the ball and knows what she's talking about, and that right now, wait and see is the wisest course of action.

"Jethro."

"They got you checking up on me now, too?" Gibbs asks, sanding the slats of the crib. This is the last, final sanding, then there'll be some buffing with a soft cloth, but by this weekend (barring a hot case) it'll be done.

"If you mean, have I been recruited into Anthony and Timothy's conspiracy to keep you from spiraling into self-destructive behavior, no. They are 'looking out for you' on their own."

"So, what brings you down here at nine on a Monday?"

"Unfortunate news, I fear." And he explained, calmly and gently, what he'd seen in the scans, what Dr. Draz had put in her notes, and how all of that seemed reasonable to him.

He watches Jethro take it in, the slow realization that not only is this scary, but that there is nothing he can do about it, and unlike running into the radius of a bomb blast, there's no way he can go with her if this goes bad.

It's Abby, his darling girl—because for as much as he loves Ziva, and he does truly love her, and for as rapidly as Breena is becoming his, as well, Abby's his little girl-in danger, and he can't protect her from it.

It is, literally, his worst nightmare.
Jethro's leaning against the crib, clutching the edge of it hard, not looking at Ducky, and Ducky can see he's immediately jumped to the worst case scenario. So he steps closer, puts his hand on Jethro's and says, "Jethro, they are going to be fine. The doctors know about it. They're keeping watch and giving Abigail and Timothy very good advice on how to proceed."

"If it's going to be fine, why are you down here?"

"Because they are scared, Jethro, and should be. Just because it will be fine in the end does not mean getting to the end will be easy or pleasant. And because you are scared and need a friend right now."

"I can't lose another one, Duck."

"I know, and you aren't, not like this."

"You ever deal with something like this?"

"No." A long and varied medical career taught Ducky that if the truth can do no good, if it can only bring pain and worry, then you lie and you lie convincingly and you feel no guilt about it. "First, do no harm," doesn't only mean avoid treatments that will make the case worse. It also means not scaring the patient or the patient's family with out of date information that has no bearing on the situation at hand.

"If they terminated, would she be okay?"

"Jethro! Stop it, right now. Abigail is going to be fine. She's never more than twenty minutes away from medical care. If something happens at work, Jimmy and I are less than two minutes away. At home, they are three miles from a hospital. And I have a feeling Timothy will be unwilling to let her get much further from a hospital than that. She will be fine. This is upsetting and scary, and may involve a rather unpleasant and bloody birth experience, but she will be fine. Kelly will be fine."

Gibbs is staring at the ceiling of the basement. Ducky isn't sure if he's bottling everything up or praying. Probably both.

"Doc says she'll be okay?"

"Her doctor's notes indicate that right now they're just waiting to see what happens next. She's not even on bed rest, Jethro. Jimmy sent me her notes and the scans, and her advice seems reasonable to me. I think he concurs. Penny has emailed everything to one of her friends, who is the head of Obstetrics at John's Hopkins, and should be hearing back soon."

He inhales deeply and says, "Okay," exhales slowly through gritted teeth. "And you're here because we're going over there, right?"

"Yes."

Ten minutes later, (Gibbs drove. Ducky and Penny both have mild whiplash from the speed he was going.) they walked into Tim and Abby's house and caught Jimmy explaining about possible worst case scenarios.

As Ducky said, "Dr. Palmer, I concur," Gibbs headed for Abby, kneeling on the floor next to her, glancing once at the sketch in front of them, and then wrapping around her, kissing her forehead.
Abby hates this. Tim and Jimmy are looking at her like she's being a petulant child because she doesn't want to automatically jump to letting the doc hack her open to get Kelly out.

She can see Jimmy backpedaling, trying to figure out how to manage this, because, of course, he's all 'c-section-no-big-deal.'

Major surgery, bleeding all over the place, maybe never have babies again, maybe instant menopause, no big deal. Ten days and then you're all better. Yeah, he might heal up from being castrated in ten days, too, but that wouldn't mean he was better!

_Fucking men!_

And yeah, Jimmy's pretending he gets it, but she can see he's with Tim on the whole get this kid out as fast as possible, screw the consequences, we'll pump you full of antibiotics and drugs and who cares what you wanted as long as it's taken care of nice and tidy?

There are times when having men for your two best friends is an issue.

Granted, she's not sure Breena or Ziva would be much better right now, either. Breena flat out told her that the whole 'bonding' thing is total crap, and that when you've got a little lamprey eel attached to your boob every three hours, for two solid months, you're bonded. Literally.

And she just has a hard time seeing Ziva getting excited about any particular path for getting a baby out.

But…

Okay, maybe this is a little whiny, but it's not what she wanted!

She's not sick. Pregnancy isn't a disease, it's not a 'condition' to be 'managed.' And she should be allowed to be sad about not getting the fantasy. And it's not insane to think that wait and see might actually mean wait and see so maybe we don't need to schedule the c-section right this minute (Jimmy) or go on bed rest (Tim!).

But mostly, she's scared. She doesn't want a c-section, at all. Twenty to forty percent infection rate. Triple the rate of maternal death. Increased rates of blood clots, heart attacks, uterine embolism. None of that sounds like something she wants to sign up for if she can at all possibly avoid it, and it sounds like this is something she can avoid.

Then Gibbs and Ducky and Penny were there, and Gibbs is holding onto her like she's a life preserver, and she's fairly sure she's never seen him this scared.

Tim's on her right. Gibbs is on her left. And being clung to by 300 plus pounds of terrified male is not helping her composure at all, and if they don't back off and just let her breathe she's going to snap and do something really rash.

This was not going well.
Penny was sure that Jethro could take on a machine gun nest, armed with only a pen knife and Hoorah attitude, without blinking. He'd go, do it, and that'd be that. And if he didn't make it back, then he didn't make it back, and that would also be that.

But he can't kill this. He can't fight it. And it's not danger to him.

She knew from Ducky that he's got bad personal history with this sort of thing, too.

So, it was understandable. It made perfect sense. The problem is, Tim's holding onto not panicking by his fingernails, and scared Jethro next to him is not helping that control at all.

And last but not least, you didn't have to be a forensic psychologist to see that Abby was about to melt down. Pregnant women are rarely known for emotional fortitude, and with two of her best guys one the edge of panic, and the third treating her with kid gloves and lots of concern and she's about to start yelling and crying.

Penny smiled gently at Ducky, and he nodded at her, aware that she's about to do what Grandmas have been doing pretty much since the invention of Grandmas, and that's slapping some sense into people who are being silly.

"Jimmy, could you scoot over a bit?" Penny asked, and then settled in front of them, sitting on the coffee table. She then leaned forward and gently whacked Tim and Gibbs upside the back of the head.

"No one's dying. Not today, not tomorrow, not two months from now. So calm down, both of you." Then she handed her phone to Tim and Abby. "This is from Gladys. She's the head of Obstetrics at John's Hopkins. Which means that she's one of the top five obstetricians in the world. And if I knew any of the other four, I'd have cc'd them on the email, as well. She's thinking watch and wait is good advice. Basically, exactly what your OB said to you. It's a borderline case, and likely won't cause any issues. That little girl is going to double in size between now and when she's ready to come out, if not more than that, so there's a lot more growing that's going to happen, and your placenta will likely be out of the way by the time you're ready to deliver. But no doctor, let alone one in a high risk specialty like OB wants to get sued. Everyone is being cautious because one or two lost cases and jerk your malpractice insurance so high it puts you out of business."

And right that second, Abby loved Tim's grandma more than anything. The look on Gibbs face was worth having to go through this whole thing. No one besides Franks had ever head-slapped him, and he didn't know how to deal with it.

But she was going on like she hadn't noticed the look (Shock, outrage, anger, and mostly more shock, but, and this was Penny's plan, fear was gone, or at least shifted to the side.) he had aimed at her.

"There's only one thing a woman is designed to do, and that's squeeze out babies. And Abby's going to be fine, so is Kelly. I've done it." She looked at Gibbs. "Your wife did it," she turned to Jimmy, "and yours, too. It's not fun. It isn't easy, but it's what we're built for, and these two," she petted Kelly, "are going to come through just fine."

Then she turned toward Abby. "And you are going to stop pouting about a possible c-section and get down on your knees and thank both God and science that they're available because if you need one, it will save your life and your daughter's life. And that's all that matters on this.

"I've done this four times, and I can tell you, there's no magic in doing it any given way. You don't get a medal for no meds or no interventions. Anything that gets you and Kelly out of this in one
"That's not the problem," Abby starts, though it actually is part of the problem, sort of, well, at least, giving up on an ideal is the problem, "it's so much riskier."

"No one's talking about you having one for kicks and giggles. And so much riskier is, according to Gladys, for healthy women without other complications, three out of 100,000. So if your OB says get one, you get it."

"I've seen thirteen out of 100,000."

Penny shoots her an I'm done with this look. "And did you look into the maternal mortality rates for women who need c-sections and can't get one? Did you research how many babies die when they get into distress and can't get out fast?

"You're a scientist, Abby, start acting like one and get into the data. That thirteen number includes all c-sections for all reasons, including the ones where they did the c-section because the mother was dying or already dead. You want Gladys' email, and I'll happily give it to you. You can talk it through with her, but you know that anyone can mess with the data any way they want to make it prove whatever they want. And I want you to get out of panic mode and into data mode and realize thirteen out of 100,000 is about your chances of getting hit by a car driving home from work, which you do every single day without a whimper, so calm down about it!"

The next bit was aimed at Tim and Jethro. "And if the OB says it's okay to try for a vaginal birth, and that's what Abby wants, you two support her in it. A c-section is more dangerous, it's not easy, it can take a long time to heal up from, so avoiding it if at all possible is a good plan.

"So, we all on the same page? Abby and Kelly will be fine. Baby's coming out however the highly trained medical providers you have hired to provide you with their expertise think will result in the best outcome. And we're all done panicking. Right?"

Jimmy smiled, saluted, and said, "Yes, Ma'am."

She's still staring at Tim, Abby, and Jethro.

Jethro nodded first, then Abby, and Tim finally yes, "Yes."

"Good. You get any new ultrasound pics?" Tim rubbed his eyes, got up, grabbed Abby's purse, and found the shots, handing them to Penny.

Unlike the previous ultrasounds these were 4-d and provided enough detail to see what Kelly actually looked like. And unlike the previous ultrasounds, they'd been vastly too scared to really look at them.

Penny gazed at them for a moment, then handed the clearest of the face shots to Gibbs and said, "What do you think, Jethro, Tim's lips and Abby's chin?"

He stared at the shot, his arm around Abby, hand resting on her tummy, feeling Kelly squirming around. He closed his eyes, resting his forehead against her temple. "Yeah, Penny."
After Penny got done with snapping some sense into them, they spent a while looking at the pictures, and by then Tim, Abby, and Gibbs had calmed down enough to start asking more questions, and Abby started showing them what she was reading, and it's not so much that it's factually wrong, (Though Jimmy's pretty sure that's true, too, but he hasn't done the research, so he doesn't actually know.) just really spun in a very anti-western medicine sort of direction.

Jimmy walked them through how a c-section works, which Ducky found fascinating, the last time he did one they still cut straight through everything in one long line down the abdomen. So the idea of multiple crossing incisions to minimize scarring and long term abdominal weakness struck him as awfully cool. He'd certainly seen the technique used for tracheotomies, had done it back when he was a medic, and was feeling intensely stupid that it took so long for anyone to think of using it for a c-section.

Eventually though, the conversation wore down, and just sitting around trying not to be scared was pretty useless, so Penny, Ducky, and Gibbs went home.

Jimmy stuck around a bit longer than that, wanting to make sure Tim was good before he left.

"Walk me to my car," Jimmy says to Tim. Abby's looking at him curiously, wondering what he wants to say to Tim without her around, but he just winks at her and kisses her cheek, saying, "Stupid husband stuff. Don't worry about it."

She raised an eyebrow at him.

"Come on, I know you talk to Breena without me. I know, tomorrow, you're going to call her and complain about how Tim and Jethro went bonkers on you." She shrugged a little and smiled a little at that. "And you'll cry on her about how Penny was being sort of mean, and how the rest of us just don't get it when it comes to this whole natural birth thing."

"Well, you don't!"

"Of course we don't. And you're going to talk to her about it tomorrow. So, give me a few minutes with Tim. He'll probably tell you all about it when he comes back in."

"Fine."

Tim walked him out, and they both stood next to Jimmy's Tuscon. (Yes, they have an Odyssey, this is the smaller, going places without a kid car.)

"So, you okay?"

"No. Gibbs isn't, either."

"I know. You okay to be on your own and not freak out?"

"Yeah." He held out his hand, and it was pretty steady. Not as still as normal, but not as bad as two hours ago. "I'll probably head up, wrap around her, and not let go until Kelly's out."

"She's going to be okay."

Tim flashed him a quit the bullshit look. "You don't actually know that."
Jimmy squeezed his shoulder, smiled weakly, and said, "You're right, I don't. And I know all about rolling snake-eyes on the one in 10,000 chance. But I do know, no matter what happens next, we are here to get you through it. And I absolutely know that by the end of work day after tomorrow at the latest Ducky and I will have everything on hand to deal with an emergency c-section if she needs one at work, let alone whatever it is Dr. Draz recommends for stabilization-type things to get her to stop bleeding long enough to get her to real obstetrical experts.

"And I know that it's okay to be scared about this, because it is freaking scary, but that if you do go up there, wrap around her, and not let go for the next eight weeks she will be miserable. She loves you, but she doesn't want to be your conjoined twin.

"And I know one other thing, when I leave, you need to go back up there and make love to her." Tim's eyes go wide at that. "Look, I know you, and I know you're planning on not having sex with her again until Kelly's on the outside. Bad plan. All that'll do is make both of you miserable, so don't do it."

"I can't risk it." Tim doesn't even know how to begin putting into words how scary he finds that.

"You can and will because it'll make both of you happier, and it's probably the only thing that'll really get it through your head she's not going to break."

"But…"

"No buts, I've seen you walking around in your boxers with morning wood. You're really not that big. But if that makes you too damn nervous, I know for a fact that both of you have mouths, and hers is located nowhere even remotely near her placenta."

Tim looked at him, annoyed. "Why would you jump straight to dick? Dr. Draz did that, too. I'm not a moron. But… muscle contractions are muscle contractions, right?"

Jimmy grabbed Tim's arm and squeezed, hard, really hard.

"Ow!"

"Exactly. In medical terms that's a mild contraction. Usually, you don't even go to the hospital until you can't talk through them and they last for a minute."

"Shit."

"Yeah, they aren't kidding about the whole it-hurts-thing. But, my point is, you're not getting her off that hard."

"I get her off hard enough her whole body shakes for minutes after and she blacks out."

Jimmy just stares at Tim, dumbfounded. For a good minute he seemed to be thinking of things to say without saying them and finally settled on whacking Tim's shoulder and saying, "Well, don't do that! If she blacks out it means you've messed with her heart rate, respiration, and muscle tension to the point where her brain isn't getting enough oxygen. So, just… don't do that when she's pregnant." He spent another minute looking at Tim, shaking his head, exasperated, and then said, "But I'm willing to bet, that if you try really hard, and maybe spend a little while studying, you could, just possibly, locate some middle ground between no sex at all and orgasms so hard you black out. And if push comes to shove, I bet Tony could give you some pointers on how normal sex works."

Tim rolled his eyes and shoved Jimmy. "But you couldn't?"
"Nope. Wouldn't know normal sex if it bit me on the ass." Jimmy smiles at him, looking cocky. Trying to jolly Tim a little, lift his mood some.

"Everyone tells you that sex can trigger labor."

"Bullshit. Labor starts when it starts, and sometimes you happen to have sex before it does. Seriously, we did it every single day for the last three weeks, twice, sometimes three times when Breena was getting really desperate to get Molly out, and nothing. If the first thirty times we did it didn't set her off, that last one wasn't the magic bullet. It just happens, and there's nothing you can do short of pharmacological intervention to speed that up."

"I can't."

"You need to. She's not going to break. And you need to know that."

"Jimmy…"

"Tim, you did not just meet this woman last week. You know she can only take so much overprotective bullshit from you. She's been humoring you for months now, and unfortunately you've already probably cashed in the I'm-scared coupon a few times too often. And on top of that, Gibbs is likely to go all Papa Bear on her. Hell, he's probably already calling Vance to see if the Norfolk guys can be transferred tomorrow or the next day so she'll have help in the lab that much faster.

"Under the absolute best circumstances, she was going to be prickly and annoyed over the next two months. You two hovering over her like she'll drop over dead if she puts a toe out of line will just make it worse.

"So get your ass up there and act like this is the most important person on earth, and that her happiness is more important to you than your comfort. Make love to her, treat her like a woman, like your woman, and not a child. Prove to yourself and her that she won't break."

Tim's staring at the windows of his bedroom, still dark. From the looks of the lights, Abby's still downstairs.

"Come on, you're not going off to face a firing squad."

"Thirty times and nothing?"

"Nothing."

"I don't know if that means you're lame at sex or if it really doesn't work."

Jimmy punched his shoulder. "Really doesn't work. Did her water break the last time you made her pass out? Did she start bleeding? No, she didn't. And it's not going to today, either." He turned Tim to face him. "Look, I don't know if she's going to be okay, I just don't. But I do know that absolutely nothing you are, could, will, or even might imagine doing with her tonight will cause a problem. And I know that because it didn't cause any problems yesterday, and everything is exactly the same today as it was yesterday, you just know about it today."

Tim sighs, looking back at his house, like he could see Abby through the walls. "Story of my life."

"Tim?"

He shook his head. "Long story, not for tonight."
"So?" Abby said when he came in. She was laying on the sofa, on her side, looking at the ultrasounds of Kelly, one hand holding the shots, other one gently resting on the baby bump.

Tim sat on the floor in front of her, kissed her tummy, then leaned so his forehead was resting against it and his arm draped over her stomach and hips. He didn't feel any movement, and figured Kelly was probably napping.

"I'm scared. I've never been this scared in my life, including every time I've almost died, including when Cade was running around killing us, including dragging you out of the lab when it was filled with cyanide, and when that maniac was holding a gun on you, and every bad fight with my dad, and just every shit thing that's ever happened to me or me and you, and this is worse. And Jimmy knows it, because he's been here, and he was reminding me that if I don't want to end up miserable in addition to terrified, I've got to suck it up and not annoy you so bad you want to shoot me."

Abby smiled at that. "Wise man."

"Last week the idea of doing this at home was terrifying, but I'd trade this in a heartbeat for that. And I'm trying not to be a jerk. I'm trying to keep in mind that this was something important to you, in a way that it wasn't to me, and that you just lost that, too."

"Thank you."

"And I'm trying not to be totally insane about this, but I know I'm going to be a little insane."

"You and me, both."

That got a half-hearted smile out of him. "Yeah."

"And Gibbs is going to be a lot insane."

"Yeah. Jimmy's betting he already has Vance on the line and is trying to get Norfolk shut down that much faster so you've got people in the lab all the time, and my guess is that he won't be able to swing it, so my new workstation is down there."

"That's his idea?"

Tim shrugged a little. If Gibbs didn't think of it on his own, he'd certainly agree to it once Tim started moving his stuff down there. "I'd imagine we're both on the same page with this. You're down there on your own for hours at a time. That's a lot of time for something to go wrong before someone might pop in and see you need help."

"This is your definition of a little insane?"

He smiled very dryly, a wild, scared look in his eyes. "Yeah, because I know what a lot insane looks like. I can feel it. Trust me, you don't want to see it."

She petted his face, and he took her wrist in his hand, kissing her palm, feeling her pulse under his fingers. "So, that was Jimmy's pep talk? Don't freak out?"

"Mostly."

"Mostly?"

"It was focused on a pretty specific aspect of freaking out."
"Ahh… And that would be?"

He looked at their sofa. It's really not wide enough for both of them to spoon on anymore.

"Not enough room here." Tim kissed her lips soft and sweet, stood up, and offered her his hand. "Come upstairs with me, and I'll show you."

Sex can be comfort made touch. It can be hot, shuddering, sweaty orgasms. Or sweet, gentle reprieve. It can be pleasure, or anger, or rage, or love.

It's the ultimate shape-shifter, capable of filling whatever vessel it's poured into.

And comfort, reassurance, surcease, all of those are available options.

It's true that Tim's scared enough he wasn't able to get hard. It just didn't happen. His dick was showing some mild interest in what was going on, but it never got past that. Abby certainly noticed, but didn't say anything.

But his fingers, tongue, and lips still worked, and they're all firmly under the control of his brain, so they did exactly what he told them to do, and the results were pretty good.

And yes, Abby arching against his mouth, the taste of her on his tongue, her hands clenching in his hair, shuddering in a very happy sort of way was very good. Nothing besides warm, happy, sleepy feelings after that was better, and Jimmy was right, it did help, and he's thinking that come morning time, he'll be able to get his dick into the game, which would be a good thing.

But at the same time, her body on his, her skin under his, warm and alive and vibrant, the sound of her voice, and the feel of her breath, the pleasure of her body, all of that sharpens how much is at stake. The only person in the world he can't live without is sleeping in his arms, and the idea that he might have to, might need to find the strength to go on without her kept him awake until the sun rose.
Privately, in his own internal monologues, Ducky considers Jethro to be a force of nature. He's retribution and determination made flesh and set on the Earth to go, single-mindedly, after anything that takes his fancy.

Likewise, Penny is a force to be reckoned with, as well. Intellect and determination set loose to break molds and overcome expectations.

What precisely it says about Ducky that he prefers the company of people who are almost larger than life and capable of near super-human feats of determination is something he has not spent much time mulling over.

What he does know, is he's driving a car with Mohammed and the Mountain, and he can feel by the flavor of the silence that it's time for the confrontation, and he's completely unsure of how this is going to go.

But he's also sure that when you've got two massive, rock hard cliffs of personalities about to rub up against each other, it's an awfully good idea not to get between them if you don't want to be ground into a pulp.

So, he says, in a somewhat conversational tone, mostly as a reminder that there are people who would really appreciate it if both Penny and Jethro were to get along well. "Timothy and Abigail love both of you, and the three of us are, for all practical purposes, the only grandparents Kelly has."

And though he added nothing else, nor did he preface that comment with anything to give it any context, neither Penny nor Jethro seemed to have any issue figuring out why he said it.

Penny glanced at Ducky, nodded to him, then half turned in her seat so she could see Jethro more easily. "Have at it, Jethro, I know you're angry."

Jethro's quiet. He doesn't want to talk. He hates talking about stuff like this. He just wants to… glower, that's probably the right word.

Because when it comes down to it, Ducky's right. He can see it. Tim and Abby don't blame Penny. So as angry as he is, and as much as he'd like to kick someone, she's not the person who needs to be kicked.

And yeah, he doesn't love getting slapped upside the head, but it was similar enough to Mike that it got the part of his brain that actually thinks back online and he could see it was exactly what he needed.

Tough love is his job, and he blew it.

He's the guy who's supposed to be the rock. He's the one who Tim turns to when he needs someone calm and in charge and able to keep the fear away long enough to function, and he lost it.

So, yeah, he's angry. At himself for panicking. At Penny for not protecting Tim better. At John for being John. At God, because dammit hasn't he gone through enough danger with his girls? He's got to live with Ziva in the line of fire every single day. Couldn't just this one thing be easy and simple? Is it too much to ask to have at least one of his girls safe and secure and her baby healthy? Really, God is that too fucking much? And all of it together in less than a week, it's just too damn much.
"You didn't protect him," he says it quietly, because in the car, while Ducky's driving isn't the place to yell.

"I know." And that was all Penny said.

"You know? That's it?" What's worse than kicking something when it's not what you want to kick? Seeing it just roll over and lay there, no fight at all.

"What else is there? I failed him. His mom failed him. His dad…" she doesn't finish that thought. "He was one of the sweetest kids I've ever met, and my favorite of the grandkids, the one I was most involved with, and I still failed him. So, you going to yell at me about it? Tell me I should have paid more attention? Gotten him out of there sooner? Done a better job raising John? Go ahead, not like I haven't said it to myself already. Might make both of us feel better."

Gibbs closes his eyes and curses very quietly. Because, no it won't make either of them feel better, not really, because she's not the target he wants or needs for this. So instead of yelling he asks, "When did it start?"

"I think when he was six."

"Six? How do you not notice something like that happening to a six-year-old?"

"Because I lived three thousand miles away and it turns out 'Dad took me sailing, and I hate it!' said during the five minutes we'd talk on the phone each week when he was little actually meant 'Dad dragged me onto a boat for ten hours, I spent the whole time throwing up, and then he did it again every Saturday for the next month trying to get me to like sailing.' No one said anything like that until February, and then it was thirty-one years too late."

"Did you ever live near them?"

"Yes. The year Tim was born, when he was three and four, and the year he was eight. They were out of Annapolis those years. They spent a lot of time out of California, moving from Alameda to San Fran and back again, two years out of Pearl, and a year out of Brisbane when Tim was a baby and John was working on a joint project with the Australian Navy. And he lived with me the summer before college began, but for most of his life we'd visit during winter and summer holidays, talk on the phone, write letters, and email once that became an option."

"And as you know, if something unpleasant is going on in his life, he doesn't talk about it. And that's not something he picked up recently. That's been true since he was little. And maybe it's because no one ever let him complain and people like me would say things like, 'Honey, it's okay, give sailing another try, I'm sure you'll like it if you try again,' not knowing what was really going on."

Gibbs grits his teeth, because that's right and true, and he knows he did it with Kelly when he thought she was being overly sensitive about something, and still he just wants to hit something.

"When did they stop talking?"

"First time was after Tim turned down Annapolis."

"Tim got into Annapolis?" Gibbs tries to wrap his mind around that. Not that he wasn't smart enough for it, and he's sure Tim had the grades, but… Tim's not a sailor, he's not a solidner, and he can't think of anyone who would have been more miserable dropped into the Naval Academy than Tim would have been.

"Yeah. Would have been the fourth McGee in a row there. His spot had pretty much been reserved since the day he was born. All he had to do was get the grades, and he was in. He was something like twelfth in his class of fifteen hundred. So, he had the grades.

"John made him apply. I know he didn't want to go. I know he intentionally bombed the interview and wrote a terrible essay for the application. But a 3.97 GPA, 1560 SATs, and three previous generations of McGees meant that he was in.

"He'd also applied to half a dozen other schools with great bio tech/medical engineering programs. Got into all of them. I'd been a professor at John Hopkins so he got a good deal there, too. Got a good enough deal that John's if-you-don't-do-Annapolis-we-won't-pay-for-your-schooling,-and-we've-got-enough-money-you-won't-qualify-for-financial-aid wasn't able to scare him into submission.

"So he got in, and then apparently he showed John his acceptance letter and ripped it up right in front of him. And once the fight was over, they didn't speak again until Tim's grandfather died, two years later.

"The second time was right after he got on your team. He was really excited about it. Less than a year at NCIS and a place on the best team. I guess that's when John had to come to terms with the fact that Tim really wasn't ever going to enlist. I think John was gearing up for a huge fight, but Tim just hung up on him and didn't call back for seven years."

"And that call didn't go well."

"Nope."

"But John and Sarah are fine?" Which is something Gibbs doesn't get at all. Tim mentioned it, but he doesn't understand how that could be true.

"Yeah. He never had any expectations for Sarah. Never expected Sarah in the first place. Tori miscarried several times after Tim, and they'd hit the point where they were never expecting to have another child. And she's just as smart as he is, maybe not at as sweet, but smart, sassy, funny. She's a lovely girl… but you've met her, right?"

"Few times."

"John's enough of a chauvinist that the idea that the fourth McGee at Annapolis could be a girl never crossed his mind. Sarah's not tied to his idea family pride or carrying on the name or however he's got that… crap… labeled, so for her whole life, she's gotten to be brilliant and pretty and the apple of her daddy's eye, because anything she's done has been more than good enough for him."

"And nothing Tim did was?"

"No. That's not true. Though I'm sure that's how it felt to Tim. Anything that distracted away from the goal of being the third Admiral McGee was never going to be good enough. Anything that moved him toward that goal was fine. Math camp, science fair awards, anything like that was good. Time spent writing when he could have been studying something else, that wasn't. Wrestling was good. Scouting was good. Roleplaying wasn't. Reading was fine, as long as it was properly 'male' type things, mysteries were fine, Tom Clancy was even better, fantasy, not so much so, but even with that, if it glorified warrior culture, then it was good.

"I talked to John a few weeks ago, and he had this sort of hyper-masculine ideal of who Tim was supposed to be, and anything in line with that was encouraged, but there isn't a whole lot of Tim in line with that. And that was always where the friction came in. He got John to play D&D with him once, rolled up characters, and of course John's playing this huge fighter with lots of muscles and a sword bigger than I am, but Tim rolled up a wizard, and at first level those guys are more or less useless. You've got to keep them safe, carry them around for a while, and eventually they can wipe the board clean with a spell, but you've got to keep them alive long enough to let them get there. Anyway, John had been hoping that he'd be able to run that like a lesson in combat tactics, and instead it ended up being a massive lecture about strength and power and how men are supposed to act and both of them had an awful time and never played again.

"What John didn't know, and Tim wasn't able to express because he was ten, is that a fighter is a tank, they wade into battle and take out whatever's nearby, relying on force to kill and heavy armor to protect them. A magic user is artillery, raining fire down from a sheltered location. Put both together and you're in better shape than you'd be with two fighters. And if either of them could have figured that out, they could have had a pretty good time, but they couldn't. And then because they couldn't, John poisoned it."

Gibbs thinks about that, realizes that somewhere along the line Penny must have played with Tim, and the something else hits. He latches onto 'anything that distracted away from the goal of being the third Admiral McGee' and mixes that with the few specifics he's got from Tim from what John used to say to him. "He was terrified Tim was gay, wasn't he?"

Penny shrugs. "He was terrified Tim was feminine. Come on, Jethro, you've been around long enough you know gay/straight isn't how it works. Not in the Navy, probably not in the Marines. No one cares if you like boys or girls as long as you 'act like a man.' A mouth's a mouth and it doesn't matter who's mouth it is as long as it's not yours, right?"

Gibbs blanched at that. He'd never, ever expected Penny to be that frank. But she's also right. That's always how it played when he was in. You were only "gay" if you were the one doing the sucking/getting fucked.

"Yeah."

"So, no, I don't think he was ever afraid that Tim liked boys. It's always been blatantly obvious that he doesn't. He fell in love with his first girl when he was three. So, no, not gay. It was entirely about him not being John's idea of a man. Tim walking around in a kilt and eyeliner with his pregnant wife is vastly scarier to John then him sleeping with a new man each week, as long as Tim's the top and he's wearing a uniform when he heads home."

Gibbs doesn't quite know what to do with that. Because he knows that he feels, well, felt, the same way, granted a much milder version of it, but it's definitely there. Male, female, gay, straight, somewhere in between, none of that mattered as long as you weren't 'girly.'

Or as Ziva put it, "I am not good with the crying and the women."

It's not as strong as it used to be, but yeah, that's something that's true about him, and something that used to irk him about Tim and Jimmy.

First time he saw Tim wear the kilt to one of their family gatherings he just sort of sighed. Same thing with Jimmy being a bridesmaid. There are just some things men don't do, wearing skirts and being a bridesmaid are two of them. And they should know that, but they don't seem to, and it's not bad or anything that makes him angry, it's just… kind of weird.

But his identity and hopes and dreams aren't tied into any idea of how Tim or Jimmy are supposed to act. At least, not in that regards. It's tied to them being good husbands and fathers, but that's something he doesn't worry about when it comes to them. So he can sigh, shrug, catch Tony or Fornell's eye and flash a quick, What the hell? look across the room and be done with it.

They're sitting in his driveway, probably have been for a while, but he's finally just noticing it. So he grunts an absent-minded goodbye to Ducky and Penny, thinking about how he would have handled a sensitive little boy, not like John did, certainly, but whether he could have been properly supportive.

He walks into his house, realizing no one said anything about if Abby will be able to have other babies after this, and that suddenly he has no idea if he'll ever get to find out how he'd handle a gentle little boy.

And suddenly he's wishing, praying, that he'll get the chance to find out, because he's bound and determined that Tim's son will have men around him that love him no matter who he chooses to be.

He can't fix or change what happened with Tim and John, but he can be a the tough, old, gruff Marine who loves Tim's boy-and the image of that child, should he ever exist, is suddenly achingly clear in Gibbs' mind-the way Tim should have been loved.
Habit

A case might be a godsend. Or it might been a very bad thing. After all, someone got killed, actually three someones, so there’s a perspective issue and all, but still, something to think about other than Abby and Kelly is a good thing.

Either way, Tim's been in the bullpen just long enough put his go bag down, flick on his computer screen, get a third of his password in, and then Gibbs’ phone rang, and a minute later they're gearing up and heading toward Georgetown.

Very Special Agent Anthony DiNozzo doesn’t mind at all if most people think he’s something of an intellectual lightweight. In fact, he’s spent years cultivating a personality designed to make people who just casually know him think he’s got about fifty fewer IQ points than he actually has.

This usually works to his advantage, especially as a cop.

People who think he’s stupid slip up. They say things they shouldn’t. They’re less careful about keeping the details of their stories straight. And all of that is a good thing.

And sure, Tim’s smarter than he is, Gibbs is more intimidating, and Ziva’s danger sense is so well-honed she can tell when people are watching her from two hundred feet away behind her, but even with all of that, he's not a moron, and does not appreciate being treated as such, so the fact that Tim and Gibbs are both doing the worst job in the history of worst jobs of trying to act like everything is okay, when it clearly isn’t, but neither of them are talking about why, like somehow they’re managing to pull one over on him, is awfully annoying.

He gets Tim by himself as they’re systematically going through the crime scene. Tim’s bagging. He’s shooting everything.

“Okay, what the hell happened? Yesterday you were all, ‘Yay! New baby pics.’ Today, there are no baby pics, you and Gibbs are communicating entirely in monosyllabic grunts and looking pleased that we’ve got a triple homicide.”

Tim, not saying anything, takes out his phone and shows Tony the pictures.

“They look great! So, what’s going on?”

So, Tim tells him.

And Tony stops bagging and just stands there, looking pale and very worried. “Are they going to be all right?”

Tim flashes him the same haunted look he’s been wearing all day. “Everyone says so. But no one actually knows. And we won’t know until something happens or Kelly’s born.”

“Shit.”

“Yeah. So, best case scenario, two months of constant fear followed by an uneventful birth with the Doc hovering over us the whole time because even if her placenta does move further out of the way, it’s not going to end up all the way at the top the way it’s supposed to be, so she could start hemorrhaging at any moment or not stop bleeding the way she’s supposed to after Kelly’s born.”

“Great,” Tony says with a lot of sarcasm and a sigh. “But, Kelly’s far enough along that if she needed to come out, she’d be okay, right?”

“Probably. She’s tiny, but lots of preemies are born at thirty-two weeks and do just fine.”

“So the real risk is Abby?”

“Yeah.” Tim nods a little. “Jimmy and Penny and Ducky are all saying that she’ll be fine, but you go online and see stories of women who went to do the grocery shopping and bled out before they could get it stopped, and the baby lives… sometimes… but…” Tim shudders, feeling the fear arcing through him again. He stops that sentence, forces it back down, picks up another shell casing, there are tons of them around them, and says, “So, yeah, three dead bodies, lots of leads, huge, heaping stacks of intel to go through, bring it on, Gibbs and I both need something else to think about because otherwise we’ll sit there, hovering over Abby, driving her buggy.”

The single greatest adversary of fear is not courage, nor bravery, not even distraction, not really, it’s habit.

The same thing happens over and over and the worst doesn’t come.

Habit lulls the little, screaming voices, clutching their collective blankets over their heads, trembling at the unknown.

Because, really, the heart of fear is the unknown.

And habit is its antithesis.

Habit is the known, the known so well and so often that without conscious thought or effort actions take place, motions are gone through, and a web of well-known comfort wraps around and supports you through your daily endeavors.

And it’s true that no case is really routine. There are always twists and turns and unexpected bits and pieces, but there’s also a routine to a case, a comforting, lulling pattern of actions.

And, so, it is a case that Gibbs, Tim, and Abby desperately need.

Once they get back to the bullpen, Tim has a set routine of what happens next. First off, phone records and financials, and for this case, that’s times three. Well, technically, two. They haven’t been able to ID the third vic, yet, and no ID means Tim doesn’t have anywhere to start with victim number three.

Tim’s phone records search is set to handle as many variables and databases as he might want to throw at it. So, first hunt, see if the vics were calling each other, if so, how often and when.

Next hunt, any numbers they had in common.
Third hunt, any numbers called more than five times in the last week.

Fourth hunt, IDs on all of those numbers.

He sets his first computer to slicing and dicing the data on that and then moves to his second computer.

Financials are trickier, first and foremost, he’s got to get the rights to go into them. Unlike Verizon and Sprint, most banks aren’t willing to give him blanket permission to go poking around in people’s financial records. So, getting his permissions in place to go in and build the database he needs takes two hours. And proof of death, requisition forms, requests for data, all of what he needs to get those permissions, he can do in his sleep he’s done them so many times.

From there, once he’s gotten into their data, he sets a database of the two IDed vics’ financial records and begins to cross reference them.

Like with phone records, he starts with payments between them, and branches out from there.

Unlike with the phone records, he actually has to look at the financials as well as set his computers on them. So, he loads his data onto a thumb drive and heads for Abby’s lab.

This is not habit. Sitting at his desk, going over the financials while his computers slice and dice, and then heading down for the next part is habit. But, no one says anything when he heads down to the Lab about an hour earlier than usual. He’ll be back up for campfire time, and that’s all that matters.

Spending a moment standing by the door to the Lab, watching Abby bop around as she prepares trace for Major Mass Spec, that’s habit. Stepping in, turning the volume down five notches, (He’s been teasing her for years now about how she’s going to be deaf as a post by the time she’s fifty. She usually signs something back to him, and he thinks it might be rude but hasn’t shown it to Gibbs or looked it up online to see if it is, but one day he will, and he’ll learn something to sign back, because he wants to see the look on her face when he does it.) it’s still loud, but he can’t feel the music anymore, kissing her on the neck, petting Kelly gently, and then heading for the computer on the right of her desk, that’s habit.

“You’re early,” Abby says as he logs in and loads up the financials.

“Yep.” Usually he comes down for the third part of his search. It’s not standard policing technique, but it should be, and that’s social media. That’s a more hands-on search, because while it’s true that he can automate it to a degree (find the vics talking about each other, who are their good friends, what were they interested in, where were they when, who’s been stalking them, etc… etc…) it’s still useful to actually go through by hand to get a better feel for who they’re dealing with. You never know when it’ll come in handy to know the vic was a diehard David Bowie fan. “How’s it going down here?”

“At least three co-mingled blood sources. DNA all over the place. Four sizes of bullets. Two guns. Six unknown substances on swabs from Ducky. It’s peachy!” She grins at him. “You?”

“Just getting started. Three vics, two sets of phone records, two sets of financials. Right now I’m at sit down and see what jumps out on the money trail.”
“Who’s broke?”

“Yep.” He nods. "Then it's Facebook time, and eventually you'll get done processing their phones and laptops and I'll go play with them, too.”

“Any ideas yet?”

“Four sizes of bullets and two guns means someone else had to have been there. But who and when and where… We don’t even have an ID on the third vic, yet. Waiting for you to do your magic with that.”

She points to the computer next to him. “She’s working as fast as she…” and then it beeps, and they get the red flag of doom. Abby goes to the computer, puts in her information and clearances, and then they've got the info.

Tim sits back as he looks at it. “Great.”

“What’s great?” Gibbs asks.

“Seriously, do you have the lab bugged or something?” Tim asks him.

“Just good timing.” He glances at the computer, sending Abby the what's up? look.

“The chances of you seeing your other Abbi.”

Gibbs sends her the tell me more look.

“Your third vic is John Henrids, CGIS. He’s one of Borin’s guys. And she’s probably about to jump out of her skin because her man is way off grid.”

Gibbs nods, pulling his phone out, and heading up the stairs.

Tim’s back at his desk, ready for the campfire; they’re just waiting on Borin.

It occurs to him, the last time he saw her, the four of them were getting drinks, Tony and Ziva were playing darts and Borin asked if he had been serious about going out. After all, she knew about the bet, but going far enough to get tickets was more of a step than she’d expected either of the guys to go, which was making her think that Tim might have actually been interested. And yeah, he did a piss poor job of asking her out, but they’d worked together enough times that the idea that seeing him relaxed and playing was interesting to her.

Since he’d intentionally done the worst job he possibly could have of asking her out, the idea that she might have been interested in saying yes had never, ever occurred to him.

This resulted in him genuinely tripping all over himself, trying to explain what he’d really been doing without sounding like a jerk who was using her, and without Tony and Ziva noticing what was going on.

Fortunately, Borin thought it was amusing and wished him the best of luck.

They haven’t seen her since, because, like many people who have the drive to live a job 24/7, the skill to be good at it, and any political skills at all (unlike Gibbs) Borin got booted up the food chain. She’s now the head of the Chesapeake CGIS office.
The idea that Abigail Borin is mild-mannered or laid back is not something that has ever occurred to Tim. The fact that compared to how she is right now, ready to avenge one of her team, every single time he’s seen her before she’s been a paragon of mellow isn’t shocking, but it is still hard to deal with.

No hello, no chatter, no coffee even, just hit the ground running and find the bastards that did this.

Settling in, working the data, he’s very aware of the fact that no one at NCIS or Coast Guard is sleeping anytime soon.

Murders are like jigsaw puzzles with a missing lid. You start with a mess of pieces, and no idea what goes where. Get one piece in place and it's easier to see the whole picture. Get enough of them, and you’ve got a feel for what you’re dealing with. Eventually, you get enough to see what the picture is, and then it’s just a matter of slapping the last of the little buggers into place.

Getting Henrids and CGIS into place is a major piece of the puzzle.

It’s a smuggling ring.

Cloe (Pvt. First Class, Marines) and Jensen (Petty Officer, Navy) ran the first and second steps of the process. Cloe got the raw opium out of Afghanistan and into the custody of his buddy, Jensen. Jensen made sure the drugs got to their processor in Barbados. Henrids, who was replacing Jensen’s younger brother, was in charge of moving the product out of Barbados and into the States. From there, they had a collection of at least seven other guys who moved it up and down the eastern seaboard in tiny boats, and then fifteen more guys who handled sales and distribution.

It’s a small ring, but there’s not a lot of people who trade in pure heroin.

Borin’s people had been running this with the DEA for close to a month, building a case, and when Jensen’s younger brother died, they found a chance to get their own man into it, so they did.

So, they’ve got motive. They’ve got opportunity. They’ve got a massive mess because the three links at the top of the pyramid are dead, and close to 2000 kilos of heroin are missing.

To say that Gibbs and Vance are less than pleased at the idea that this op had been going on for more than a year at DEA and a month at CGIS, under their noses, focusing on their guys, would be an understatement.

To say that Borin couldn’t care less about that would also be an understatement.

To say that all three are pissed at DEA, who couldn’t even be bothered to send someone to see what was going on is an even bigger understatement.

And when Tim finds the next big chunk of the puzzle, that the reason why no one at DEA showed up is that no one at DEA was actually involved in this, the proverbial shit hits the metaphorical fan and spatters on everyone even remotely nearby.

Really, all in all, it's a very clever plan. “Harkness” and “Milo,” the “DEA Agents” are, in fact, members of a rival smuggling group, who had infiltrated Cloe’s group. Triple agents.
And with as big and unwieldy as DEA is, and how bad it is at actually co-operating with other agencies, it wasn’t hard for two guys to put on some bad suits, get some fake badges, and walk right into CGIS, lay out all the information about this “sting” they’d been working on for over a year, and then, the plan was, give CGIS all the info, wait for them to swoop in and arrest everyone, and then they’d just walk in flashing badges and paperwork, confiscate the drugs and the info on who the processors and producers were, and take over.

The problem is that Cloe and Jensen figured out who “Harkness” and “Milo” are, resulting in a five person fight/shootout in a cabin with Henrids in the middle.

It takes two days, two solid days, two days where the only person who got any down time was Abby, mostly because Gibbs and Tim forced her to rest. (Okay, Tim got a cat nap. She made some very pointed remarks about how if she needed rest he did, too, so he agreed to lay down with her, and as soon as she was asleep he drug himself back up and went back at it.) But by the end of day two they’ve tracked down “Milo.”

Unfortunately, in that he's deader than Marley, (as Ducky says, which gets Jimmy talking about reggae, and Ducky looking at him like he’s a twit, but Jimmy links it back to Dickens and popular media, and from there Ducky takes over, and the rest of the team just stands there, exhausted and dead-eyed watching them chatter away) he isn’t providing any useful information on finding Harkness or the drugs.

At least, he wasn’t until Ducky and Jimmy got him back, got the trace to Abby, Abby got the trace into Major Mass Spec, and from there came the voila moment that breaks the case wide open.

Sometime Tim wonders what it must have been like to try and do this when you couldn’t take dirt samples from the vic’s clothing and find out they’ve been cavorting around somewhere in a ten mile circle of ground on the southwest shore of the Chesapeake where that one particular sort of moss grows.

But, by that point, he's too tired to care much.

They close in on Harkness, a small boat, 2000 kilos of heroin, and this is a nice coup, four of the guys who belong to Harkness’ own drug ring.

Sunday, ’round about noon, both Tim and Abby having slept basically ’round-the-clock recovering from that case, Tim finds that routine helps, work helps, and most of all, nothing going wrong helps.

And it’s not that fear is gone, because it’s not. It’s just living the routine over and over and seeing that the world didn’t end, another day went by and the worst didn’t happen, pushes fear back, increases the expectation of yet another day of just… normal.

And he figures that’s probably about as good as this is going to get.

So he gets up and makes them breakfast, like he usually does on Sunday morning (even if it’s technically afternoon), and the rhythms of life go on.
There are Alpha Males, the leaders of the pack, Beta Males, the followers, and Omega Males, the ones who don't fit tidily into those groups. They don't generally lead, but can if they need or want to. They follow only when it suits them. And, they tend to care very little about whatever it is the rest of the pack is interested in. They're the creators, artists, jokers, misfits, loners, and dreamers.

Omegas range from Steve Jobs and George Carlin to that guy in the back of the bus station in bad need of a shower complaining to himself about how no one understands him and his art. Basically, it's the entire range of guys who never had any interest in being on the football team. (Not the ones who couldn't get onto it, the ones who didn't want to.)

Tim's spent his life slipping between Omega and Beta (depending on the relationship and period of his life, he's currently firmly in the Omega category and unlikely to leave it again.) His whole life he's been surrounded by Alphas and Ascendent Betas (the guys who will take over the pack when the current Alpha leaves).

So, as an Omega, especially an Omega who won't be part of the team for all that much longer, watching Draga, who used to be a test pilot for the Navy, namely someone who is used to being part of an elite team of Alphas, try to figure out where he fits on Gibbs', soon to be DiNozzo's team, is vastly amusing to Tim.

The first time they met, Draga knew how to behave. Gibbs, by virtue of white hair, Marine bearing, and the fact that he just commands respect is The Alpha, and as such Draga knows his place: roll over, switch into Beta mode, and show due respect. Tim, as the Tech Guy, is the Omega, and treated like an equal and potential ally.

But Tony and Draga…

Let alone Tony, Draga, and of course, Ziva, (because the addition of women always makes male pack dynamics more interesting) is, well… Tim's excused himself three times because he was about to burst out laughing in a remarkably unprofessional way. (And he did notice the corner of Gibbs' lip quirk upwards twice.) He did however get video of it, and spent lunch with Abby and Jimmy, all three of them giggling hysterically.

Basically, Tony has, for the first time ever, run into a Geek he finds threatening. He's never met an Alpha Geek before, probably never dreamed any of them exist, let alone a young, strong one with physical courage coming out the ears and decent looks. Tony's default way of dealing with people smarter than he is to focus on the fact that, like Tim, they're usually kind of awkward and less conventionally attractive.

Neither of those things are true about Draga.

The fact that Ziva's being nice to Draga is making it worse.

And on top of that, Draga's ability to see pretty much everything, thus instantly proving he'd be useful to them, means Tony can't just blow him off, either.

Likewise, Draga doesn't know what to do with Tony, either. Tony with strangers is smooth, polished, a little too pretty. Namely, nothing Draga respects. But Tony is the Alpha-To-Be. But he's done nothing to look like he's earned it, at least, not that Draga's seen. And right now, Draga's coming to the conclusion that Tony's a Beta who's getting promoted higher than he deserves because he's the senior man.

So, Draga's showing real respect for Gibbs, that too polite, pseudo-respect (putting on the Lt.) for Tony, being friendly to Tim, and friendly and charming (without crossing the line, she's married to the guy who'll be his boss if this goes well) to Ziva.

Abby's watching the video, giggling with him and Jimmy, and says, "If they could just pull 'em out and measure, this would be done so much faster."

Jimmy's watching and says, "They'd end up with this passive aggressive being too polite argument about what sort of ruler to use and if the damn things are accurate."

Abby grins wide and happy at that idea. "They so would. Tony'd suggest the ruler, because he's old school. Then Draga'd be all that's not nearly accurate enough, really we should go by mass, looking at Gibbs and saying something about how important accuracy is..."

"And if either of them said anything like that to me they'd get headsplatted so hard their ears would ring." Abby, Jimmy, and Tim all jerk at the sound of Gibbs' voice, looking embarrassed and slightly guilty.

"Got a body out in Faluvia County. Draga's getting some in the field time. Palmer, head up and grab him. Let's see how he does with you and Duck. McGee, get moving."

"Moving, Boss," Tim says.

They're in the van, heading toward the dead Marine that Faluvia PD just called in. Tim's driving. (When they want to talk, as opposed to sit there clutching their seat belts in terror, Tim or Tony drives.)

"What's Aubrey like?" Tony asks.

"Lot more like Tim than Draga is," Gibbs answers.

"Precise, fussy, he's a forensic accountant. Why, you already want to knock Draga off the list? Look, Aubrey might be a better fit, but Draga will be able to hit the ground running."

Tony winces at that. "I can see that. He's not going to take a ton of training. Just... not sure if he'll mesh well."

"You mean you will not be able to Probie him," Ziva says with a smile.

Tony sighs and flashes his I'm done with you look at her.

Gibbs nods with that. He gets this in a way Ziva doesn't. By virtue of being female, she's outside the "official" line of command, though Draga, due to deeply ingrained chivalry, will always treat her with respect and if given orders by her, follow them. Tony's not a girl though, and the two of them may have issues. "It's a concern. As long as I'm here, he's not going to give you any trouble. But he's not going to just accept you as the leader. You'll have to prove to him you're worth it."

"Aubrey won't give you any problems along those lines." Tim's sure of that. He probably won't let himself be bullied the way Tim did, but he'll fall into line easily. Tim knows a good Beta male when he sees one, and Aubrey certainly is one.
"So, easy to work with or photographic memory," Tony says.

"Not sure it's a photographic memory, Tony. He's got some serious visual processing skills, but he'd have to be a fighter pilot. More importantly, we asked him if he had any questions, and his first one showed he'd already put together the fact that he's not really replacing Gibbs."

"He's sharp," Gibbs adds.

"I can see that. Aubrey's in day after tomorrow, right?"

"Yeah," Tim nods. He's basically in charge of the whole interview thing.

"He's better with the computer stuff?"

"Yeah. It's what he's trained in."

They pull to a stop in front of long strings of yellow tape and cop cars with flashing lights.

"Work time. I'm on point for this one, and he's with me," Tony says. Gibbs, Ziva, and Tim get out of the van and start gearing up, getting into coveralls and crime scene booties while Tony grabs Draga from Ducky and takes him over to the local LEOs to get the whole story.

"Step one of an investigation, take custody of the crime scene from the local LEOs."

Draga's nodding as they head over to the Faluvia Co. police.

---

Two hours later, they're still bagging and photographing. The body, Corporal Holly Page, has been taken back to NCIS, and Team Gibbs is working with the scene.

Draga's hovering around the edges. He's not allowed to touch anything, but he can look. He hasn't been saying anything, and no one's really paying attention to that. They were all pretty quiet at their first crime scenes. After all, five hours ago (ish) this was a real person, alive and doing whatever she usually did, expecting to have a normal day, and then, from the looks of it, someone broke in and killed her.

As Tim's photographing the foyer, Draga says to him, "None of the witnesses saw the break in, right?"

"Ziva and Gibbs did witness statements, but yeah, I think that's right."

Draga looks at the door more closely, the lock is busted, broken inwards. Looks like the door was kicked in.

"No break in," Draga says.

"Huh?" Tim's still shooting the carpet and stairs.

"No footprint on the door. It's one of those cheap doors, and if you kick one of them you leave a mark. No mark on the wall. Kick a door hard enough to break it in, it swings back and slams into the wall, or…" he kneels and points at the little door stopper at the base of the door, "or that thing does. But nothing. No mark on the door from hitting the door stopper. No mark on the wall from the door stopper hitting it. The carpet is out of place, and that doesn't happen when you kick in a door. The door got pulled in from the inside, hard enough to make it look like it was forced."

Tim nods. That works, and also works with a bit of the case that he doesn't think Draga's gotten, namely the patio door had been unlocked.

"Good work. Go tell Tony about it."

And Draga does, carefully skirting the edges of the scene, making sure not to touch anything.

Yeah, he may have a hard time with Tony, but Tim's really liking the idea of someone who sees that much, that well, on the team.

Tony has a much easier time with Aubrey. Because Aubrey fit his expectation for a Geek. And because Aubrey knows his role and how to play it.

Tony tries a little mild hazing on him, and Aubrey just looks at him, a long, calm look, up and down, suddenly making it very clear that this man is a Marine, and then turns to Tim and says, "You know, the IRS has been gearing up for ACA compliance officers. They're offering fifteen thousand a year more than you are and a company car."

Tony doesn't haze him after that.

Aubrey shows up on a paperwork day. So they don't get a chance to see what he'd do out in the field.

After lunch, Tony and Ziva take him shooting, wanting to see him handle a weapon. They come back an hour later, and Aubrey is slightly green. Tim looks up at him. "Single biggest threat to anyone on Team Gibbs is Ziva's driving. Congratulations, you've survived the first test."

Aubrey sits down heavily. "How does she still have a license?"

"Cops look after their own. They see the plates and usually won't pull her over."

"Great. Does she usually drive?"

"'Bout a quarter of the time."

"Oh, God!"

Tim hits the enter key, finishing the form he's working on, and stands up. "Come on. Time to head down to meet the rest of the team."

As they're heading to the lab, Aubrey asks, "If I take this job, how much crap will DiNozzo give me?"

"As much as you'll let him, and then just a tiny bit more."

Aubrey shakes his head. "I didn't like that about the Marines."

"From what Gibbs has said, DiNozzo's not exactly on the same level as Marine hazing. More pranks and nicknames than anything really dangerous, but I have had my face superglued to my desk."

"Great." Aubrey looks like he's seriously reconsidering this job.

"The way you looked at him shut him up a lot faster than usual. Reminding him that you've got other options seemed to work. And he's grown up a whole lot since I was the Probie."

"So, you were the Probie, Gibbs was team leader, and DiNozzo was more or less in charge of training you?"

"Basically."

"So, I join in, Gibbs retires, DiNozzo will run the team, and you'll be more or less in charge of me?"

No. But he can't say that without letting out that he's not going to be around all that much longer. "I think Ziva will be in charge of you."

"Why not you?"

Great question. Tim thinks up a quick lie. "Low man takes the Probie, and that's her."

"Oh." They don't say anything for the rest of the ride down to the lab. Once the elevator doors open, Aubrey asks, "Is it always this loud down here?"

Tim smiles. "Not always. It's usually quieter when I'm down here."

"And you're down here a lot."

"Yeah. Remember when Gibbs asked you about my wife?"

"Uh huh." Aubrey nods, looking slightly confused.

"You're about to meet her."

"Oh. She works here?"

"Yeah." They step in. Abby's back is to them, working on her computer.

"Don't turn it down, Kelly likes this one," she says without turning around, so Tim puts the remote in his pocket, as soon as this song is over the volume is going down.

"Who's Kelly?" Aubrey says to him, not seeing anyone else, as they walk to the computers.

"Our daughter." Which is when Abby turns and Aubrey figures out where Kelly is and why she might require the music this loud to appreciate it. Tim kisses her, and then says, "Abby, this is Aubrey, he's applying to replace Gibbs."

She nods and offers her hand. "Hi. I'm Abby." She gestures around her. "And this is the lab. All the magicky science stuff happens down here."

The song ends, and Tim turns the volume down. "Blowing out your own ears is one thing. It'd be nice if Kelly could hear," he says as a joke.

"Uh huh." She signs at him quickly. But he finally did ask Gibbs what it meant and had prepped a response. Abby's eyes go wide when he signs back at her.
"What was that?" Aubrey asks.

Tim smiles. "You don't need to know." In reality she'd been signing at him, Then you'll just have to learn sign language, and he'd finally flashed back with, working on it. But he kind of likes the mystery of what they might have been communicating to each other.

"So, how are you liking NCIS, Aubrey?" Abby asks.

"So far, so good. Kind of quiet."

"We tend to work in two modes, everything all at once, pedal to the metal, and laid-back not much going on. Yesterday we closed a case," Abby says.

"Yeah, not much in the way of middle gears here. It's either full-out run or lay around and fill out paperwork."

Aubrey thinks about that for a moment. Then he looks at Tim. "You said you work down here?"

"Yeah, I've got two computers up on my desk, so I set them searching, then head down here to use one of hers, as well."

"So, how will this work? Gibbs retires and…"

"He's not retiring until January, so for the first bit, you'd be covering my leave when Kelly's born. Then there'll be a few months of the five of us. Then Gibbs goes, and we settle into whatever the new normal is."

"All right." Aubrey looks at Tim, and then Abby, and Tim again, but he doesn't say anything. Tim's fairly sure that he's putting together that two plus two isn't exactly the four he's been told it is, but unlike Draga, he's not asking about it.

On Friday, at Shabbos, after dinner is over, they talk through who they are going to offer the job.

Tony still isn't sure who he wants. In the short run, Draga will be more useful. When it comes down to it, they don't know when Tim's leaving, though the discrete ear he's got down in Cybercrime is indicating that Jenner's been interviewing lately, so it'll probably be sooner than later, and the possibility of both Tim and Gibbs gone in quick succession is real. The possibility of Tim gone before Gibbs is real.

And if that happens, someone who can pull his own weight as both a tech and a field agent matters.

But, if Tim's there for another year, having someone who will fit more easily into the dynamics of the team, someone who isn't used to being in the limelight, that'll lend itself to a happier, and maybe, in the long run, more-effective team.

In the end, it's Tony and Ziva who have to make the decision. Gibbs won't be there. Tim won't either.

"So, the guy I have to prove myself to, or the guy who sees but doesn't ask?" Tony says.

The fact that it appeared that Aubrey had also figured out this wasn't about replacing Gibbs, but didn't say anything about it, stuck with Tony. He's not sure he wants someone who plays his cards that close to the vest.
"Looks like it, Tony," Tim says. "If you want, we can call Howard back, too, but… I mean, she's really green."

"And that's saying a lot, coming from you," Tony replies.

Tim doesn't take that as an insult. "Yeah. Do you have the patience to break in another Probie, one that'll make Dornie look sophisticated and experienced?" Tim asks him.

"Ugh." Tony rolls his eyes and shakes his head. The infamous line from Lethal Weapon bright in his mind. "No. Ziva?"

"No." And while it's true that Ziva's not feeling too old for any variety of shit, she also doesn't want to start on square one. "I'll do fine with Aubrey or Draga, and am probably leaning toward Aubrey. Nine years from now, when you run into mandatory retirement age, Tony, I have a feeling he and I will work together well as the core of that team. Draga would challenge me for leadership of the team."

"He won't stick around that long. He's good. He sees everything, and puts it together fast. He'll have his own team in five years," Tony says.

Gibbs sits in his chair, quietly drinking his wine, listening. He sends Tony the you've made up your mind, stop dithering and go with it look.

Tony nods. He has, but he's not sure this decision isn't going to bite him later. "He's the better agent, and we're the strongest team at NCIS. I'll send Draga the job offer on Monday."
"Palmer, where's your head at? It's certainly not here," Gibbs asks as Tim sweeps Jimmy's feet out from under him for the third time in seven minutes.

"Sorry, Jethro," Jimmy says, standing up slowly.

"Focus, Jimmy, get your mind here."

"Yes, Gibbs," Jimmy says, voice flat.

Jimmy's not sounding all that good today. Gibbs flashes Tim a quick what's going on? look to Tim, and Tim sends him a quick no clue look back.

"Switch it up, Tim, you defend, Jimmy, go after him, get yourself back into it."

Tim figures out what the problem is halfway through that round. He hasn't been hit that hard, that many times since January, and he's thanking Gibbs that they've been training because he's good enough to at least deflect most of the blows, now.

Finally, he just stops, steps back, holds his hands up, and says, "Look, I need some padding. I am not coming home to Abby looking like I got run over by a truck again. Okay?"

Jimmy nods, breathing hard. "Okay."

That's when Gibbs starts to figure out what's going on. He does a little math that confirms his suspicions, so while Tim gets into some padding, he leans against the ropes and says to Jimmy, quietly, "You want to be here?"

"Here, home, doesn't matter. It's gonna be a shit day no matter where I am. At least this way, I get to work some of it out."

"Okay. Breena all right with this?"

"Yeah. She'd be here herself except…" And Jimmy runs headlong into the fact that they aren't telling anyone other than the McGees, Ducky, and Penny that she's pregnant again.

Gibbs nods, not making him come up with some sort of lame excuse. They all know Breena's pregnant. When pregnancy equals violent, all day long morning sickness from about twenty second after the test comes up positive to about week fifteen, it's really hard to hide. But they all respect them not saying anything about it, yet. So, if Breena's been looking awfully green, skipping out on most gatherings, and occasionally has to excuse herself when she does attend, no one is saying anything about it.

"You got anything other than this planned?"

Jimmy looks down, rubs his forehead, might be tearing up, and then gently, almost reverently, strokes his forefinger over the tiny diamond embedded in the medic alert bracelet he wears. Gibbs had noticed he had a new one. That's not true. He noticed Jimmy kept it on. He usually takes it off when they fight. But today he didn't. Gibbs assumed from the fact that he kept it on, and from the way he's touching it now, that it's new.

"There weren't a lot of remains. He was… too small for that. And we didn't have a place to scatter them, no memories of him anywhere. So… there's a company that'll take the ashes and make diamonds out of them. Carbon is carbon. We got them last week and started wearing them today." He wipes at his eyes. "Shit, hate doing this with contacts in." He pretty much runs off.

Tim stands next to Gibbs and says, "Jon's due date, right?"

"Yeah, think so."

"I'll go keep him company. I don't know if we're gonna fight again or not."

Gibbs nods at that, too. "I'll wait."

One of the great things about the NCIS gym is that at 2:00 on a Saturday it's pretty empty. The men's locker room is basically deserted. There's Jimmy, and some guy actually showering, and that's it.

And the great thing about NCIS is that it's small enough, and Jimmy's well-enough known, that if he's sitting on the floor in the back corner of the locker room sobbing, no one is going to ask him any questions or give him a hard time.

Tim sits next to him and puts his arm around his shoulders, not saying anything.

After a while, Jimmy calms back down. He looks at Tim, eyes bright red, face puffy and wet. "It was supposed to be easier than this."

Tim doesn't know if Jimmy means, life, fatherhood, or loving in general, but it's true for all of them, so he nods. "Yes, it was."

"I'm supposed to be snarking at Breena about how…" his voice breaks, and he can't finish that sentence.

Tim rubs his back, saying, "I know, Jimmy. I know."

Several more minutes go by. Tim's quiet, holding his friend. Jimmy's crying.

"There was five minutes this morning where I didn't remember. Woke up, snuggled with Breena, Molly started fussing, so I got her, and we all piled into bed, together, and it was good, you know? It was really good. Then Breena had to get up, because she was feeling sick, and I turned on the TV, watch some of the Sunrise show with Molly, and every morning they do the time, the day, and the date, and for a second there it still didn't click, and Molly's giggling, watching that little squeaky bird, and then they did the 'Who's having a birthday today?' thing and it did click, and I lost it.

"Molly's scared because I'm crying, so she starts crying, and the last thing Breena needs is both of us sobbing, but that's still what she walked in on."

"Tomorrow'll be better."

Jimmy takes a deep breath and exhales slow, head back against the locker behind him, looking up at the ceiling. "Yeah."
"You two want to come over tonight? Don't have to talk or anything, just, not be alone? Snuggle on the sofa, get lots of Abby hugs, eat take out, watch some sort of dumb movie?"

"Maybe."

"Or we can take Molly, and you can really be alone."

Jimmy's shaking his head. "I don't know. The only thing I want is to not feel like this."

Tim nods.

When they come out, Gibbs has packed everything up.

"Tim, you're done. Go home. Jimmy, with me."

Tim's a bit surprised by that, so's Jimmy really.

Gibbs flashes both of them a it'll be okay look.

Tim checks with Jimmy, and he nods. So, Tim heads off, reminding Jimmy that if he wants to come over later, or wants them to watch Molly, to let them know.

Jimmy turns to Gibbs. "I'm with you?"

"Yeah. He's not in a good place for this right now. He doesn't need any extra reminders that it doesn't always work out, not right now, otherwise he'd come, too. We're going to my house."

"You gonna tell me what we're going to do there?"

"Say goodbye to dreams that never happened."

That's way more poetic than Jimmy expects Gibbs to be, so for a second he just stands there staring. Gibbs starts off, and Jimmy quickly follows a few heartbeats later.

"What do you drink?" Gibbs asks when they get to his basement. It's empty right now. Kelly's crib got taken to Tim's Tuesday night. He'd been seriously debating opening the basement back up and lugging the Shannon back in, but it's summertime so anything he wants to do he can do outside, and, he's feeling awfully sure he's going to have another project down here in the very near future.

"Girly mixed drinks that actually taste good. Stuff you'd find horrifying."

Gibbs shrugs, that's a pretty accurate read, though he reminds himself he's trying not to be the guy who winces at other guys drinking a… whatever those fruity things are. "And when you don't get a mixed drink?"

"Rum, Gin. Is absinthe a mixed drink? It's just poured over a sugar cube and water."
Gibbs closes his eyes and opens them slowly. Absinthe, trust Jimmy to come up with something like that. "Don't have any of that." Though at the rate this is going, he's going to end up with a small bar down here.

Jimmy sits on one of the stools. "You don't need it. I don't need to be drugged to talk. I actually prefer to enjoy myself when I'm drinking."

Gibbs pours himself a bourbon and gestures to the two bottles, but Jimmy shakes his head.

"Maybe one day you'll come down here and drink with me when you're enjoying yourself?"

Jimmy smiles at that. "I hope so."

"Traditional to do this at least a little drunk," Gibbs says, taking a sip.

"What tradition are we upholding?" Jimmy looks around the basement, wondering about what sort of male bonding experience Gibbs is aiming for.

"It's a wake. Back a bit after Molly was born, Tim dragged me down here and poured enough bourbon in me to get me talking. It... helped."

Jimmy sighs. "Been talking, Jethro. I don't bottle things up."

"Yeah, I know. You're... you and Breena... are doing a lot better than I thought you would."

Jimmy nods at that. They're doing better than he thought they would be, too. But there are still bad days, and likely will be for a long time, though he's thinking today, and maybe, January 8th next year, will be the worst.

Though maybe, since Nikki (what they're calling the new baby when talking to each other) is due at Christmas time, they'll be too busy to even notice January 8th when it rolls around.

He can hope, at least. Jimmy takes one of the mugs and pours himself a little of the Scotch, sips some, winces a little. "How does Tim drink this stuff?"

Gibbs shrugs at that, too.

Jimmy takes another sip. "So, are we talking for me, or for you?"

That's a better question than Gibbs was expecting, and he realizes that they are here for both of them.

"Both of us."

Jimmy nods. "The dads sans kids club?"

"Something like that."

"But not exactly. I've got Molly and, we're calling the new one Nikki for now, and you've got Tim and Abby and Ziva and Tony."

"And you and Breena."

Jimmy looks curiously at him. "Didn't realize you were that attached to me."

Gibbs shrugs. "Breena's a package deal. Love her, gotta love you." Then he smiles to show he's kidding, that it's not just fondness for Breena that's binding him to Jimmy, and maybe to underscore exactly how much he isn't Ed Slater.

Jimmy laughs at that. Then he sobers. "So, tell me what dream you miss most."

"I was going to teach Kelly how to drive. Had been looking forward to it for years. Already started a little. Her sitting on my lap, steering, while I worked the pedals. We were going to get some sort of old junker when she was fourteen and rebuild it. That's the one I still dream about. Kelly, sixteen, seventeen, she'd look like Shannon did when we first met, but brown hair instead of red. Old Mustang or Impala all fixed up. Check the mirrors, put the key in, turn in on, look around, foot off the break, okay, let's go!"

Jimmy smiles at that, nods, eyes tearing. He doesn't say anything for a long minute, then finally gets out. "That's a good one."

Gibbs reaches for a few sheets of paper and one of his pencils. He starts sketching while Jimmy says, "We didn't know if he was a boy or a girl yet, so, not much in the way of dreams yet, not really. Just, images, you know? But… the clearest one was Molly seeing him for the first time. Tim and Abby would have taken her while we were in the hospital, and brought her to see him. I had this image, Tim holding her, putting her on the bed next to us. I'd be holding Jon so that she could snuggle in with Breena, all four of us together, kind of cramped because those hospital beds are pretty small." He bites his lip, hard, but gets his voice back under his control and then says, "But, I'd be the one who got to say, 'Molly, this is your little brother.'"

Gibbs looks up and smiles gently at Jimmy. "Had one kind of like that myself, once."

"What happened to it?" Jimmy's never wondered why Kelly was an only child. Never thought to wonder, either. Now, he is.

"Shannon had preeclampsia. Bed rest at 32 weeks. Trying to keep Kelly in long enough for her lungs to get strong. Moved into the hospital at 34 weeks. And at 35 and one day her blood pressure spiked so high she couldn't see. They got Kelly out in an emergency c-section, but they had to do it so fast there wasn't time for anesthesia. I helped them hold her down while they did it, and both of them came out fine, but before they were home from the hospital, I'd had a vasectomy. Just, couldn't do that again. Couldn't risk it."

Jimmy sighs. That puts a lot of Jethro's response to the previa news into perspective. "No wonder you were white as a sheet when you heard about Abby."

"Didn't help. But before that, before we got Kelly, we'd both been hoping for more than one."

"Never thought of adopting?"

"No." He shakes his head, not looking up from the paper. "Don't know if that was a blessing or not." He erases a line and re-does it. "Jimmy, that story's not for Tim, not now. He doesn't need that image in his head."

Jimmy nods. He knows how bloody a c-section can get, and the image of an emergency one in that sort of rush... No, that's not for Tim, not now. "I get that."

Then Gibbs looks at him, and takes another drink. "Ducky and I, walks in the park with Molly, Jon, and Kelly. Thought he was going to be a boy, and was looking forward to taking him shooting with you and Tim and Tony."

The idea that Gibbs had fantasies of his child hits Jimmy, hard. He's crying at that but eventually says, "We're not taking the girls shooting?"
"We are, but it'll be different. Gotta have some things we do as guys, right?"

"Yeah. Camping."

Gibbs laughs at that. "Is that gonna be just you and me and the kids? Don't see Duck, Tim, Tony on that trip."

"Tim likes camping."

Gibbs' I don't buy it look lights his face. "I've heard him say that, but he can't seem to figure out what the hell poison ivy looks like, and best I know, he hasn't been out in the wood for fun the entire time I've known him."

Jimmy wipes his eyes. "Good point."

Jethro hands Jimmy a sketch of a crib. It's all square corners, somewhat plain, but there's room for change.

"Early Christmas present, say, at your place 'round about Tim and Abby's anniversary. We'll talk more about it when you and Breena know more about Nikki."

Jimmy looks at it, fingers ghosting over the lines of slats and legs. He sniffs a little, and nods. "Yeah."
May 18th is the first of the childbirth classes.

And yes, Tim feels kind of stupid standing there with Abby in front of the elevator at the hospital with two pillows, but it’s kind of obvious why they’re there, so it’s not like he’s some sort of weirdo who just likes sleeping in a hospital.

Privately, he’s feeling like this is probably not going to be a very useful way to spend every Thursday night for the next six weeks.

It’s just, since everyone and their cousin all said, basically: “Don’t worry about it, the placenta will probably scoot out of the way,” he’s got this bone deep feeling that that’s soothing bullshit designed to try and keep him and Abby from freaking out.

If placenta previa really is a problem in one out of three cases at mid-term, and down to one out of two hundred by seven months, and they’re still right next to the danger zone, he’s just feeling like it’s unlikely to suddenly get better when it didn’t before.

But Abby’s still really hoping this won’t be a c-section, so they’re in the hospital, waiting for an elevator that’ll take them up to their OB’s office, where they offer Lamaze classes.

And, as Breena said to him, when he was being a bit of a dick about this being a waste of time, (Not in front of Abby. Jimmy and Breena were there, though.) that even if they don’t use it for actually getting the kid out, the calming, focusing, breathing stuff is all good for the very long time after the kid comes out when you’re so annoyed at her you’re ready to blow your top and you need to remind yourself that you love this tiny creature more than anything on earth, even if you don’t feel that way this particular second because you haven’t slept in a week and are wiping poop off of what was your last clean shirt two minutes before you need to leave the house.

Tim laughed for a second when she said that, and then realized she wasn’t kidding.

And so, Lamaze classes.

Abby had liked the idea of the Bradley ones, but they were a bit behind the eight ball on that, because they take twelve weeks, and Kelly’s due out in six.

The classes aren’t bad or anything.

Their instructor is very perky, and can say things like ‘mild discomfort’ and act like she means it.

And she’s not vehemently anti-pain meds which Tim appreciates. And, okay, maybe this isn’t cool, but he hates the idea of Abby in pain and knows he’ll be using pretty much every coping method he can think of to try and not push meds on her she might not want. (Maybe the Lamaze techniques will be good for that.)

So, they spend an hour talking about focusing techniques, working on centering, which he figures the yoga is good for, but mostly this is a more in-depth discussion of how the baby goes from being inside of your wife to outside of her, and well, he felt like he already had a pretty good handle on how that happened.
Though he did feel a little silly when they passed around a ten centimeter circle and he found himself suddenly realizing exactly how big that is. He knows what ten centimeters is, but somehow no tangible image of a ten centimeter circle had formed in his mind in relation to actually getting Kelly out. Though the fact that Abby also looks mildly horrified at this idea, like she’s also never managed to get that idea into her head makes him feel a little better.

It’s a delicate question, and he’s sure Jimmy won’t mind, but… It is kind of personal…

They’re grabbing a quick coffee, killing a few minutes together during a paperwork day. “So… we’re in the Lamaze class and they were talking about after the baby comes…” Tim can feel himself blushing as he gets ready to ask this, which is kind of dumb, not like he and Jimmy haven’t talked about stuff like this before, but… yeah, really personal. “And… the instructor was saying that sex after is different… and I was wondering… how different is it?”

Jimmy laughs, which makes Tim feel a bit more comfortable. Then he shrugs. “Different. Like first time back at it different or lasting different?”

That there’d be levels to that question wasn’t something Tim had thought of. But he is now, so he says, “Both?”

Jimmy takes a sip of his coffee. “First time back… Okay, look, her body does not want to get pregnant while she’s nursing. So, part of that is that nice, easy kiss her just right and she gets wet and eager, that vanishes. That’s evolution trying to make sure mama and baby have their best chance of survival. So, first time back, even with lots of lube, and slow, and gentle, you aren’t going to rock her world and the only reason she’s rocking yours is because you haven’t gotten laid in months.”

That’s not very encouraging. “How long did you two wait?” Maybe Jimmy and Breena just hopped back into it too fast. After all, Molly was born in February, and Breena was pregnant with Jon in late August.

“Two months, both times.” So much for that theory. “Everything heals up sooner than that, but… she’s still going to be dry, and it’s still going to hurt a little, and you’re both tired, and if she’s nursing you can’t really touch her breasts because they hurt, too, and honestly, if you’re like me and jerking off in the shower every morning you’ve gotten enough sleep to function, those’ll be better orgasms.”

Really not encouraging. “Wonderful.”

Jimmy shrugs. It is what it is, and not all that fabulous is what sex is the first few times back at it after a baby. “It gets better. Just first few times back, treat her like a virgin.”

That’s not helpful for Tim. “I’ve never had sex with a virgin.”

“Never?” Jimmy looks really surprised at that.

“Only virgin I’ve ever had sex with was me.”

Jimmy laughs. “Ah. Well, lots of foreplay, lots of attention, make sure she’s on top and in charge of speed and depth, and if you’ve got the time, and you probably don’t because babies eat every three hours and it takes them an hour to eat, get her off before you get into her.”

Sounds like a decent strategy. Tim makes a note to remember that. “What about looser?” Having held that stupid ten centimeter plastic circle in his hands, he’s now got a very concrete idea of what ten centimeters is and well… okay… yeah… that’s really pretty big. He’s got a nicely sized dick and all, but it’s not ten centimeters wide.

Jimmy shrugs and then nods. “She’ll heal up. She’s not going to stay that wide open, but you’ll be able to feel the difference. It’s not bad. It’s still sex, you know, sex with her, but if you had hair trigger issues before, you won’t anymore.”

“Not a problem.”

“And likely won’t ever be then.” Jimmy thinks about it. “Look, you’ll get back to it, and you’ll ease into it, and after a few months you’ll catch back up on your sleep and it’ll go back to being great. And, she’ll feel different, but it’s not bad, just different. The biggest thing, the glowing-neon-sign, watch-the-hell-out, danger-ahead, steer-clear-of-the-rocks thing is how she thinks she looks after she has the baby. You look at her and think ‘Yay! Boobs! God, I wish I could touch them!’ Seriously, they’ll be bigger than Kelly’s head at first. It’s really impressive, and you get to see them all the time. That part’s great.

“But she looks at herself and sees droopy skin and stretch marks and spider veins and thinning hair and flab and black circles under her eyes and red-chapped nipples and if we’re been really frank, floppy vaginal lips and hemorrhoids, and wants to shoot herself in the head because she thinks she looks so bad. And do not tell her that her breasts are so incredible that you haven’t looked at any other part of her body because she will hit you, hard, for being an idiot!”

That made Tim laugh. “You did that, didn’t you?”

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little. “I finally got Molly to sleep, and she was in the bathroom, and normally, she’s in there, I don’t go in, but I could hear her crying, so I knocked and poked my head in, and she was looking at herself naked, and she was absolutely appalled.”

“Breena’s beautiful.”

“I know. And I told her that. In very graphic terms. And she hit me and called me a liar.”

“Ow.” Tim winces.

“Yeah, I have no idea how to deal with that and not get hit. Because the one thing you absolutely do not want to do is go, ‘Yep, you look like you got hit by a truck. But it’ll get better, and even if it doesn’t, you can get a tummy tuck.’ I mean, I may have some issues with finding the appropriate thing to say, but I sure as hell knew that wasn’t it.”

“Yeah.” Tim’s trying to think of strategy for this, and so far is coming up with a great big blank.

“I really think it’s an evolution thing. Her body does not want two kids in one year and does everything it can to avoid it. So, for about four months she’s got no interest in sex, thinks she looks revolting, and even slow and gentle with a lot of lube is uncomfortable.”

For Tim, this is a pretty easy formula, if her body’s not into it, wait. “So why not wait four months?”

Jimmy gives him a you’re kidding me, right? look.

“I’m serious. Not like I haven’t gone four months without sex before. Why not wait that long?”

Jimmy’s look has morphed from you’re kidding me to please tell me you aren’t this stupid. Tim’s still looking at him blankly, not getting it. “Just because you became a dad doesn’t mean you stop being a husband. It is your job to walk a tightrope of making her feel desirable, loved, and adored, without pushing too hard in the ‘I want to get laid’ direction. But I can tell you this, if you go four or six or however many months and don’t make a pass at her, she’s going to think you think she’s hideous, and you aren’t getting any husband-of-the-year awards for that.”

“Ah.” And Tim gets that, really gets that.

“Yeah, and guess what’s the easiest, clearest way to let her know you still want to have sex with her?”

“Yeah, I think I got that one figured out.”

Jimmy grins. “Nothing says I-want-you like an erection.”

Tony stops, stares at them looking pretty disturbed, shakes his head. “Please tell me that was just the worst possible moment I could have walked in on this conversation.”

Jimmy grins at him, too. “Just passing on the wisdom of the veteran dad. Two years, you and I’ll be having this conversation.”

“Oh God.”

“Well, I suppose you could have it with Gibbs,” Jimmy says.

Tony’s eyes go wide.

“Or your own dad,” Tim adds with a smile.

“No! I’m not even sure what you’re talking about, but I do not want to have a conversation about anything involving erections with my dad or Gibbs.”

That gets Tim and Jimmy laughing.
First Time Father

May 22, 2015.

Another doctor’s appointment.

Another ultrasound.

And yeah, the 4d picture show complete with thumb sucking and kicking is awfully cute. There is indeed cooing from both parental units at that. Close ups of little feet and hands result in even more cooing.

But the transvaginal wand comes out again, and the placenta is still “low,” hasn’t moved at all.

But Abby’s still at no effacement and no dilation, so for the time being everything is still, okay.

They make another appointment for June 5th, with the understanding that if contractions start, any of them, at all, they’ll make one sooner.

There is a point in every first-time pregnant father’s life that can best be described as, “Oh Shit! That kid’s gotta come out, and it’s going to happen soon! I don't know what to do. Shit!”

This moment comes in many styles and flavors.

Gibbs remembers it very clearly. He’d gotten home, and found Shannon in Kelly’s room, surrounded by doll clothing. And he just stood there, staring at her sitting on the floor, surrounded by this huge pile of doll clothing, that she had very carefully laundered and was folding up, thinking how absurd it was that a twenty-three-year-old woman, who was about to be a mother of all things, would start playing with dolls all of a sudden.

And he stood there, watching her fold them up, not getting it for a good, solid two minutes, and it slowly dawned on him there was no doll in the room, and that all of that tiny clothing was going to go on a real person, a real person who would be making her way out of his wife’s body, and his knees went weak and he had to sit down or he was going to pass out.

He still feels a little stupid when he remembers it.

But, anyway, he's expecting that sooner or later (and as the weeks go by later got bumped off the menu and all there is left is sooner) that Tim would show up with that scared and determined look he gets when he runs into something uncomfortable but he's going to master it on his face.

And Gibbs is ready for it. He’s been prepping for it since they told him Abby was pregnant. He's bound and determined to be useful and calming for this.

So, of course, that’s not how it worked. Abby shows up in a blind baby’s-coming-soon-what-the-hell-am-I-gonna-do panic.

This, of course, shot his plan to hell and gone. Among other things, step one is offer scotch, and that certainly isn’t going to work.

She’s pacing (well, waddling) around his living room, rambling on about how this kid is going to come out and she doesn’t know what to do or how to be a Mom and this little girl is going to be entirely dependent on her for everything and nothing’s ever been entirely dependent on her and what if she screws it up because sometimes she does that and it’s not okay to screw things up, she can’t screw it up, Kelly’s gonna depend on her, and Tim does too and she can’t—

Gibbs finally figures out what to do. He gently takes both of her shoulders in his hands, his lips pressed against her forehead, and he just holds her still, stopping the spinning of her mind and body.

When he feels her start to relax, he pulls back a little, smiles, and kisses her forehead.

“You’re gonna screw up. Tim is too. I’m gonna do it. Penny is. So’s Ducky. We’re all going to screw things up with Kelly. But she’ll be fine. And so will you. And so will Tim. I screwed up with my Kelly and so did Shannon. My parents screwed up with me. Yours did with you and Luca. It happens to everyone.”

And Abby bursts into tears.

So, he cuddles her against his shoulder and rubs her back.

It turns out that is probably the right answer.
Mom

Tim feels his phone buzz and checks it. One word on the screen. _Mom_.

The call he's been dodging for weeks. He checks his computer, sees the date, okay, technically more than three months.

The conversation he isn't feeling like he wants to have. At all.

On the other hand, it's night, after dinner. He's on paperwork, but Abby's working late, so he's just hanging out in her office.

He has time to take this now. He's not home. No excuse to avoid it, like he could be writing.

He's just not entirely sure he wants to do this. No, that's not right. He doesn't want to do this, but he's also fairly sure that putting it off forever won't make anything better or different.

So, on the third buzz he picks up and says, "Hi, Mom."

"Tim? I thought I was going to get your voice mail again."

"Not today. What's up?"

"What's up with me?" She sounds surprised that he's talking like they just chatted three days ago.
"Nothing new. What's up with you? You've been hiding since before Valentine's Day. Penny says you're busy, but I'm not buying it. You work ninety hours a week, write, have a wife, and before February still managed to talk to me every week. What's going on Tim?"

He sighs quietly, catches Abby's eye, she can see him holding his phone to his ear. He mouths the word 'Mom' and she nods. He heads to the ballistics lab. That way if someone not Abby wanders in, they won't hear/see him on the phone.

"Tim?"

"Just finding a better place to talk. Still at work, waiting for Abby to get done and head home."

"Okay."

He drags a chair in and shuts the door. It's not wonderfully comfortable, but it's probably the most private place at NCIS.

"So…"

He's still not talking.

"Is everything okay with you and Abby?"

"We're good, Mom. Real good."

"And Kelly's fine?"

"Yeah, kicking up a storm." He doesn't want to get into what's actually going on with Kelly and Abby.
"Your friends that lost the baby? Are they okay?"

"Yeah, Mom. Breena's pregnant again."

"Oh, that's so good!" She waits for a few beats, hears Tim very much not saying anything, not volunteering to say anything, and says, "So, everything in your world is fine, but you aren't talking. What is going on? Last I heard, you were looking forward to Valentine's, then you dropped off the face of the Earth."

He sighs, and begins with, "A few days after that I got the flu…" And like with Penny he doesn't censor himself, doesn't pull any punches, and wraps up with, "And since then I've been thinking about it. Well, really trying to not think about it, because mostly, I'm just really fucking pissed at you. You knew. The shit he pulled on me. You knew, and you let it happen. That summer he dragged me on a boat every damn day, you didn't stop it until I had lost thirty pounds. He spent two solid months terrorizing me, and every morning until August you let him take me out and do that to me. And all of those shooting practices. And the constant fighting… And, did you think that was normal or okay or… You're the grown-up. You were supposed to protect me from that!"

His mom is just silent. And he knows this flavor of silence. He's felt it before, been on both sides of it. It's the everything is sideways, the rug just got yanked out from under you but you haven't hit the floor yet, _oh shit oh shit oh shit, keep it together, got to think_, silence.

So, he waits. He lets her think.

And finally she says, "I never thought about it like that."

That's a remarkably not comforting answer. He's not sure what a comforting answer would be, but it sure as hell isn't that. His voice is hot as he asks, "Well, how did you think about it?"

She pauses again, thinking, and then says, "We wanted you to be the best you could be. We wanted you to be strong and tough and capable of doing anything and everything you might want to do. You have so much talent, but you'd second guess yourself or get worried or let other people talk you out of things, and we wanted you to be able to stand up for yourself."

"So, you… agreed with it? He's threatening to have me gang raped by his sailors, and you thought that was appropriate?"

"No. No!" He can hear she's upset, but he's not getting the sense she's surprised. The idea that John might have told her about that makes him feel sick. "That was too far. And I told him that." _Fuck._ It hits with a physical rush of pain. She had known. He can feel his control slipping away, and he's scrambling to hold it. "But we were both afraid that you were so sensitive that life would beat you down. We thought you needed a thicker skin to survive and thrive."

"So you thought letting him do it to me instead was a good plan?" He realizes he just yelled that, and takes a deep breath, trying to stay calm.

Torri's voice is patient. "He's your father. I knew he wouldn't really hurt you. Knew he'd never push too far."

Unfortunately that broke Tim's exceptionally tenuous hold on calm and he's yelling again when he asks, "What the fuck did you think was too far? Actually having me raped?"

"Tim, he never hit you. And the one time I was afraid he might, I made sure he wasn't alone with you."
Tim realizes he's shaking from head to toe and is actually so mad he is having a hard time seeing. So, before he throws the phone against the wall hard enough to break it, he says, "I've got to hang up, throw up, shoot something, and cry." And he hangs up before she can say anything else.

There is a sink in the ballistics lab, and he does throw up in it.

Then he empties his gun into the ballistics tank.

He's crying and looking for something not too expensive to break into a whole lot of very tiny pieces when Abby runs in.

She comes to a short stop, stares at him, eyes wide, and says, "You are not okay! What happened?"

His eyes land on a plastic test tube rack. He's got no idea what it's doing in the ballistics lab, but it'll work. He puts it on the ground, hands still shaking, and methodically stomps it into about ninety pieces.

"Talked to my mom."

"Oh God."

"You see anything else I can break?" he asks, grinding bits of plastic into much smaller bits of plastic.

She looks around, but it's the ballistics lab: there's a tank for shooting bullets, the catch net they use to grab them back out again, a sink for refilling the water in the tank, a desk for taking notes, a shelf with ear and eye protection, several gun safes for holding weapons that are about to be processed or just were processed. Beyond that, it's a seven by ten closet of a room with one tiny window up by the ceiling.

"Back in a sec."

It takes longer than a second, but when she comes back she has two more magazines for his gun and half a dozen glass beakers.

"Oh, good." He grabs a beaker and throws it, hard, against the wall. Having it shatter into seventeen million pieces is satisfying. "Maybe you could go outside for a few minutes? I don't want you to get hit by flying glass."

He can see she's thinking about saying something along the lines of she'd prefer he didn't get cut by flying glass, but he can also see that she knows him well enough to know it's just not going to work, so she heads to the safety glasses, grabs one, puts it on him, and leaves.

He's simultaneously feeling very hot, rage, anger beyond anything he's ever felt before, and very cold, outside of himself. He's having a very precise, very determined, exceptionally destructive but controlled temper tantrum. He shatters each beaker, flinging it against the wall, breaks it into thousands of pieces and then grinds the pieces into dust. Then reaches for the next beaker and does it again.

He's not sure it's really helping, but it feels good—ish. Well, not bad. And short of calling up Jimmy, who is probably sleeping and would likely want to continue to do so, and asking him to fight, which would mean explaining this whole thing, again, and he doesn't want to, he's kind of out of ideas on how to burn some of this feeling off.

When he's down to two beakers he seriously debates shooting them. He's got lots of bullets, but he decides against it. The walls in here are just drywall, nothing that'll really stop a bullet. So, he goes back to throwing them against the wall.

Then reloads his gun, empties it again, reloads again, and empties that magazine into the tank, as well.

And when he's done, when he isn't shaking anymore and feels like he could probably put together complete sentences, he opens the door, and finds Abby standing in front of it, starring at it, looking more worried than he's ever seen her, holding Bert tucked under her chin.

Her eyes go very wide and she says, "Do not move at all."

Two minutes later, she's back with a small broom, a dust pan, and Ducky with a first aid kit.

Ducky just looks at him, horrified. He swallows hard and says, "Oh, Timothy! Please, hold still."

Tim's feeling like he should probably be a lot more worried about how they're acting, but he's not hurting, and his eyes are protected, so it can't be that bad.

Abby looks at Ducky. "Do I sweep him off, or..."

Ducky's looking him over, and he's just standing there, not really feeling anything. Like he's detached from everything and just watching with a vague, academic interest in the subject.

"Abigail, I think we need a comb."

"I have one in my purse."

"Good." Ducky nods as she goes to get it. "We'll start at the top and work our way down," he calls to her as she moves into the other section of the lab.

Abby's back a second later with her comb and begins to very carefully, very gently comb his hair, saying over and over, "Please, baby, don't move."

It occurs to him that he might still be shaking, but he doesn't think he is. He thinks he's still. Though he's mildly curious why she's combing his hair, but not enough to ask about it. He's also mildly curious about the fact that Ducky has left, come back with scrubs, and is laying out both a lidocaine syringe and sutures.

Finally he asks, "Am I bleeding?"

Abby pauses in combing out his hair. "Yeah."

"Oh."

He almost nods, apparently telegraphs that he's about to do it, and she says, "Stay still."

"Why are you combing my hair?"

"You're covered in hundreds of bits of glass. We're trying to get if off of you without getting you cut to ribbons."

"Oh." She might have just said that he was covered in flour, or cotton balls, it doesn't matter to him, at all. "Shower?"

"Eventually, Timothy. But for right now we want to get the bigger pieces off."
"Okay." He passively stands there, waiting, letting them do whatever they want or need to.

Abby finishes with his hair, which is when he notices that she has thick, protective gloves on. She carefully peels off his shirt, watch, and wrist cuff, gets his belt off, and as this is happening he's aware of soft, gentle tinkling sounds as more and more pieces of glass fall off of him and hit the floor.

Abby stops with his belt. "Can't get your pants off without taking off your shoes."

"That's fine."

"No, it's not, look down."

Hundreds of glass fragments glint up at him from the floor. He also, for the first time, notices the blood dripping down both arms. He'd had his sleeves rolled up in there, and apparently gotten cut.

"Just keep holding still. I'll get this swept up, and we'll move onto the bottom half of you," Ducky says.

"Okay." He just stands there and waits, lets them undress him. The good thing about the bottom half of him is he has on jeans and thick shoes, so a quick glance shows the bottom half of him is fine. Once he's clear of his glass encrusted clothing, he's able to put on the scrub pants, and Ducky has him sit down at Abby's desk.

Abby stands next to Ducky while he carefully removes fourteen slivers of glass from Tim's forearms and hands.

On the fifteenth one, Tim stops counting and says, "This should hurt, shouldn't it?"

Ducky glances at Abby, looking very worried. "Yes, Timothy."

"I can't feel it."

"You might be in shock. As soon as we get your wounds dressed, we'll get you wrapped up and laying down."

"I should probably clean the glass out of the ballistics lab."

"I've got it, don't worry about it," Abby says.

"Okay." He nods a little, sighs, and says, voice very flat and matter-of-fact, he could be reading a weather report out loud, not talking about what got him here, "So, my mom called, and instead of dodging the call, like I did with the last ten of them, I answered." He's not looking at them, not watching Ducky take yet another piece of glass out of his arm. Really, he's not looking at anything at all. He's thinking that if he could see himself, he'd probably have a thousand yard stare. He keeps on talking in that same eerie calm voice. "That was a bad fucking plan. Should have let it go to voicemail." His voice is still very calm as he says this, but he's starting to feel a bubble of hysterical building under that calm, and he's not sure if he should try to tamp it down or let it out. "And I talked to her about it. And apparently all of that crap with my dad was some sort of make-sure-Tim's-tough-enough-to-deal-with-the-real-world thing. Apparently, they were worried I was too soft or sensitive or something."

He watches Ducky ease another long shard of glass out of his skin. He can see his own blood on the glass, and the way his skin pulls against it as Ducky tugs gently with his surgical tweezers.

"Apparently I wasn't hard enough then. You're pulling an inch long piece of glass out of my arm, and I haven't even winced. You think I'm hard enough, now?"

That's when Abby starts crying. She circles around behind him, pressing her lips to the top of his head, he's guessing that's one of the few places she's not worried about ground glass rubbing into his skin. The sound of quiet sobbing, and the feel of her lips on his body, her tears in his hair, brings him back, snaps him out of the numb, shocked, dead sort of place he'd been.

And first and foremost is the sensation that he's been an utter idiot. It washes over him, blotting everything else out. He's married, with a pregnant wife who could go into labor at any minute, who could start bleeding any second, and the last thing she needs is him having a massive destructive fit. He has a family, and they come first, and he cannot be doing crap like this. Tim looks and really sees his arms and they look like he had to fight his way out of ten miles of thorn tipped vines.

"Oh, God, Abby! I'm so sorry!" He starts to reach up to comfort her, but Ducky holds his arm fast.

"Don't move. We still have a lot of glass to go."

He can definitely feel it now. It looks like his shirt did a good job protecting his arms and chest, there are only a few long scratches on them, but his forearms, hands, and face feel shredded.

Abby's murmuring against his head, "It's okay, baby. It's going to be okay."

He closes his eyes, realizing he's crying, might have been doing it the whole time. "She knew Abby." That bubble of hysterical breaks, and he starts to sob. "She knew and approved."

"Shhhh… You've got to stay still a little longer, baby." She's kissing the top of his head, petting his sides. "Shhhh…"
Aftermath

It takes Ducky an hour to get all the glass out. And though there are long cuts, none of them are deep enough to warrant stitches. An entire box of butterfly bandages and half a roll of surgical tape, but no stitches.

Abby takes him home, holds onto him until morning. He may have slept. Mostly he remembers just hurting all over. Mental pain that hurt so bad his body aches along with it.

They both take that next day off and rest. And he works on trying to heal.

The problem with a big, messy more or less public hissy fit is that it's big and messy and public. And if you get out of it looking like you got into a fight with a ream of paper and got seventy million paper cuts, and you don't want everyone to know why you ended up in that shape, you need some sort of cover lie.

And it's not even so much that he doesn't want everyone to know… Well, that's part of it.

And not everyone. It's just… He's sensitive to the fact that Ziva's dad makes his look like a good guy, and 'Hey your Dad dropped you in the middle of the desert to be tortured and raped and left you for dead,' and 'Mine said mean things to me, and I'm handling it with less than a quarter of the grace you did,' just feels really nasty.

So, he doesn't want to get into that with Tony and Ziva. It's not even that he thinks they wouldn't understand or sympathize, it just feels like he's complaining about a sprained ankle to a double amputee.

And part of it is just not wanting to say it. Not wanting to keep talking about it. Gibbs' quiet seems like a really good plan now. He's liking quiet. Quiet is his friend. It's warm and comfortable and maybe this is a response to not being quiet and then really not liking what talking got him, but right now he's not in a big let's-talk-about-this sort of place.

He takes two days off to let the worst of the swelling go down and the cuts start to heal.

But Abby goes back to work, because officially he was "putting up a mirror," accidentally dropped it, and cut the hell out of himself. And she wouldn't stay home with him for something like that.

Officially, that's a plausible lie.

Officially, no one like Vance is going to say anything or question it. Tony and Ziva might wonder how he got his face cut up by dropping a mirror, but they aren't asking about it. They're probably assuming he was doing some sort of stupid sex thing, like trying to install it on the ceiling or something, and got hurt like that.

It'll hold until they actually see him, and since that's all it's got to do, he's fine with that.

Or, he was until Jimmy comes over.

Jimmy hasn't been in the house long enough to get through his first sentence. "Ducky wanted me to —" And then he sees Tim and stops dead. "Oh God, what the hell happened to you? No way you did that by dropping a mirror."

Tim, who'd been sitting on the sofa, watching the second to last episode of Supernatural, stops it, looking surprised to see Jimmy in his house. The don't-talk-about-it plan is a whole lot trickier to pull off if people who love you can see how damaged you are. "Why'd Ducky send you?"

"Supposedly to do a wound check, but I'm getting the sense it's not your cuts he wants me looking at. What happened?" Jimmy says as he sits down.

"Long damn story, and I promise, one day I'll tell you, but right now I don't want to talk."

Jimmy's looking him over, voice worried, nervous expression on his face. "Okay. Let me check your cuts."

"I'm fine. Abby's already doused me in Neosporin and changed the band-aids this morning. She'll probably do it again tonight. Neither of us want any of this to scar."

"Good." He pauses, looking at the cuts. "Did you do this to yourself?"

"Yeah."

"On purpose?"

"Not exactly."

Jimmy gently touches his jaw, tilting his head a little to see the long cut across his cheek better. "Might want to see a plastic surgeon on that one if you don't want it to scar."

"I'll keep that in mind."

"Ducky and Abby know the full story of what happened?"

"Yeah."

His hands are gentle and competent as he looks over Tim's cuts. Tim can tell part of what he's doing is making sure Ducky didn't miss any glass. His eyes aren't as good as they used to be and glass can be awfully easy to miss. "None of them are very deep. That's good. I'm fairly sure Ducky's sent me over to just be here with you."

"Yeah. He and Abby are sort of keeping watch on me."

Jimmy nods at that, looking pretty disturbed. "You at least want to tell me how you did this to yourself?"

"Broke six beakers by throwing them as hard as I could at a wall less than four feet away from me."

Jimmy's eyes go wide. "You are so lucky you didn't lose an eye."

"Abby put safety goggles on me."

"Oh." Jimmy thinks about that for a moment. "When I needed to do something stupid and violent you were there for me. I am here for you. You need this, you pick up your fucking phone and you call me! You can't/won't talk, fine, I won't press, but you get off your ass and call me, okay?"

Tim nods. "I thought about it. Didn't want to wake you up."
Jimmy raised his hand, like he was about to headslap Tim, looks at all the cuts, and drops it. "Wake me up! If there's ever a next time, you wake me up!"

"I really hope there won't be a next time."

"Good." Jimmy sits next to him for a moment, not moving or saying anything. He looks like he's trying to figure out how to say whatever's in his mind.

"Just ask."

"Are you… hell… I don't know what to ask. I'm scared. And angry. Something hurt you bad enough or pissed you off so hard you did that. I don't want to make it worse by demanding you talk, but I don't know what's wrong, so I don't know how to be comforting, and I'm worried."

"You're here, so that means it's a paperwork day, right?"

"Yeah."

"Call Gibbs and pour me a scotch. Big one. I don't want to do this twice."

Jimmy's back two minutes later with a much smaller scotch than Tim would have liked. "That's a big scotch?"

"You're on pain meds, right?"

"Oh."

"So, yes, that's a big scotch. Much more than that and all Jethro and I'll be doing is tucking you into bed for a nap."

"Might like a nap."

"We don't have to do this. I mean, I want to know, but…"

"I know. Just… might as well." He blows out a frustrated breath. "'Course, 'might as well do it now' is why I'm in this shape, so maybe that's not a great plan."

Jimmy's looking at him, eyes wide and earnest, pain for his friend clear on his face. "Tim, talk to me."

He drinks half of the scotch down. "This should be fully kicked in by the time Gibbs is here. I'll give both of you the whole story."

Gibbs gets to his place in eighteen minutes, which means he's channeling Ziva behind the wheel. Like Jimmy, he checks the cuts, hands gentle and careful on Tim's skin. Abby's already told him why Tim's in the shape he's in, but actually seeing it makes his eyes go wide, and then narrow in anger.

"You've both offered to listen, so here's the story…"

He finishes up by telling both of them about talking with his mom and how he'd spent basically his whole life blaming his dad, pretending his mom had been outside of it... "But she wasn't. Maybe he made the rules, but he was gone all the time, so she upheld them. She knew. She might not have approved of every tactic he used, but she was with him on the general plan of verbally beat the living shit out of Tim until he's tough enough." Disgust radiates off of Tim. "Though God alone knows what the fuck tough enough is. I couldn't get it together enough to ask, and I'm honestly not sure I want to know."

Tim shakes his head. "In a lot of ways, this is worse than what actually happened. That was anger and pain and rage, and this is… betrayal."

Jimmy and Jethro are just looking at him. There's nothing either of them can do to change or help this, so they sit there, trying to be comforting, and let him talk.

"I don't even know what to do with this. Since… Annapolis… she's been nothing but supportive and encouraging of me. She's not the one who called me names or belittled me. She never was. It was like good cop/bad cop from Hell.

"The Admiral didn't go to any of my graduations. He was pissed about turning down Annapolis, so even though he got home the day before, he skipped the high school one. Mom and Penny were nervous enough about us being together that the day after graduation I was on the other side of the country. He was afloat for Johns Hopkins and MIT. Hated the idea of me at NCIS, so he refused to attend FLETC. She was at all of them. She's got a wall covered in pictures of us kids… I mean, how the fuck do you do that? I get him. I wasn't who he wanted me to be and disappointed the shit out of him, fine. I get it.

"But… I mean, what the hell did she think she was doing?"

Unfortunately, Jimmy and Gibbs don't have the answer to that. And right now, the one thing Tim knows he doesn't want to do is get on the phone and talk to the person who does.

After Jenny died, Ziva had explained the idea of sitting Shiva to them. She had told them, that after everything had gone wrong, after God had ruined Job's life, his friends came to comfort him. They didn't say anything. They didn't try to fill the air with useless words. They just came, saw Job in pain, and sat with him, sharing his pain in silence, only talking when he was ready.

And thus Jews sit Shiva. They go to the home of the one who mourns, sit with him, and only speak when he wants, about what he wants.

When Jimmy told him about the "comforting words" people kept abusing him and Breena with after they lost Jon, Tim thought he got the idea. He thought he understood the power and value of comfortable silence.

But now, sitting on his sofa, between Jethro and Jimmy, both of whom aren't saying anything, because there's nothing to say, because right now words would be hollow, meaningless, almost an insult to the gravity of this pain, he gets it. He truly, deeply understands the gift of silence. Words might make this easier for Jimmy or Gibbs, but it won't for him, and they're respecting that.

Sitting on the sofa, Gibbs' arm around him, they are allowing him the space he needs to grieve, and providing him the safety and love he needs to do it.
An Adult

Usually, Tim checks his email about five times a day, if not more. Due to rule number three, (never be unreachable) he's always got his phone nearby. But, after talking to his mom, he's fairly sure she'll call again or send an email or something. And, maybe get a hold of Sarah or Penny (Though he trusts that Penny will be a dead end for her. Ducky's certainly told her about what happened. The fact that she's in San Francisco this week is probably the only reason she hasn't been over to visit.) to try and reach him.

So, he turned his phone off, put it on the little table beside their front door, and went off the grid for three days. The people he wants to have contact with know where he is and how to get him if need be, and that's enough.

He writes, a lot. Burying himself in jazz and the sound of his typewriter clicking away. Like with being trapped in the freezer he starts as MacGregor, lets himself have the distance he needs and works it out, plot point by plot point. He organizes it, gives it shape, treats it like character backstory.

And, after a few hours of that, and a few confrontation scenes ranging from MacGregor killing all of them in an extremely messy and gory way to just yelling at them, he slides into his own voice and spends most of that day free writing, just letting it out.

He isn't exactly feeling sexy that night, mostly just tired and wrung out, but they go to bed, and Abby wraps him in her body, gently making love to him, reminding him, vividly, that he is adored, and that no matter how bad this hurts, and that she understands that it hurts, that there is still pleasure.

And it helps.

Nothing changed, but it makes him feel good, let him not hurt for a little bit, so that's a step forward.

Saturday morning he opens his phone and begins to go through the huge pile of email, texts, and calls.

Seven from his sister, so yeah, his mom must have called her.

Three from Penny.

But only one email from her.

The voicemails from Penny confirm that yes, Ducky had told her what was going on, and yes, his mom and sister had called her, and that she'd more or less let loose on his mom double-barreled and had told his sister what was going on and that he'd give her a call when he could talk.

He flashes her a quick text. Thank you. Still feeling pretty quiet. Will call you soon.

A minute later he gets one back. I know. Love you. He closes his eyes and sighs.

Then he reads through the texts from his sister, mostly along the lines of: What the hell is going on? Mom's hysterical, you've dropped off the face of the planet, Ben's pissed because she's so upset, and Dad's currently unreachable. What happened? The last one read: Talked to Penny. I get it. Call me when you can.
He sends her one back that says: Not feeling very social right now. We'll have lunch soon, though.

He gets back: With Penny, too?

Yeah. Probably a good idea.

His fingers hover over the button for his mom's email for a good minute. He's not sure he wants to see what's in there. But the subject is Why with no question mark, so the only thing he wants to know might be in there.

Of course, knowing might rip the very fragile peace he's got right now to shreds. But not knowing means he can't focus on anything else. So, he hits the button and it opens.

It's a picture of him and Abby. Sarah must have snapped it, though he doesn't remember that. It's the night they went to the Japanese restaurant, him all shaved and kilted, her in the cheongsam. He's holding the door open for her, and she's stepping into the restaurant.

It's a close enough shot that it's clear he's wearing makeup, but far enough back to see the kilt, too.

His mom attached it to a short message that said: The goal was for you to be strong enough to be a man who could do this. The summer you were fourteen, I didn't step in until it was clear that you wouldn't say no to him. Once it was, I ended it. When you said no to shooting practice, he stopped it. It was always about making you strong enough to stand up for yourself.

You needed to be able to stand up for your interests, for your loves, and say no to anyone who would push you around.

You had to be strong enough to say no to him.

And when you ripped up the Annapolis letter, you were.

His first response, a flare of hot, blinding rage, isn't very useful. He feels it pulse through him as he reads the email, and then he tries to let it go.

Big, destructive, angry hissy fit isn't good for anyone, and he's got people who are depending on him right now. He forgot that, got too lost in himself and the anger before, and lucked out because nothing bad happened on all the other fronts of his life, giving him the time he needed to heal up. But it would have been so easy for things to just go sideways.

He can't knock himself out of commission. Abby needs him, so he can't be healing up from anything.

And maybe he doesn't do a great job of letting it go. But it's better than last time, so that's progress.

He heads for his computer and writes a reply, a long reply, most of it angry ranting along the lines of how when a guy who has literally hundreds of other guys at his disposal who are all trained to follow orders and kill people, threatens you, voice cold and certain, with having those guys grab you, drag you onto a ship, cut your genitals off and rape you, you sure as hell don't say 'No' to him. You do whatever the hell he wants you to do and you do it exactly the way he wants it done. There was maybe a two page long run about how what stopped the shooting practice was him being three seconds away from killing John and if that was their definition of "saying no" something was very seriously wrong with them. Five pages of see that woman next to me in that photo? Yeah. Think it's easy to be her? Think it takes strength to dress counter culture and act even further counter culture? You know why she could do it? Because she grew up with people who cherished and adored her.

He looks at it, fifteen pages in total, hit ctr-A and ctr-C, puts it into a different document, for him to keep for himself, and then deletes it from the original email.

Then he writes a shorter note.

_Bullshit._

_It doesn't work that way. Never has, never will._

_I can be that man because I'm surrounded by people who love and encourage me._

_I was not that child. I was scared and nervous and timid because the people I loved most, trusted most, thought it was their mission in life to terrorize me._

_I could have been that child, wanted to be him, curious, fearless, able to be who I wanted, but you and Dad made sure that didn't happen._

_I don't care what you thought you were doing. I'm not interested in any justifications. Who I was should have been good enough, but it wasn't, and you and Dad decided I needed to be someone else._

_Sarah or Penny will tell you when Kelly's born. They'll send pictures._

_We'll talk again, eventually._

_I'll call when I can._

_I am extremely angry._

_I still love you._

_Tim_

He looks at it and knows it's true. He loves his mom. And maybe it's habit, he's used to loving her, so he does. Maybe she doesn't deserve it. But no matter what it is, it's true.

But mostly, he realizes that a huge part of the pain of this is mourning for the fact that they will never get back to normal. The easy relationship, the trust they had is over.

He's lost the ability to hold her blameless, and she's lost the protection of his father being the only bad guy.

And he realizes something else is gone, too. That by holding her responsible for her actions, he's lost the last shred of his childhood.

Seeing things as they are and going from there, at its core, that's adulthood.
Tim bolts out of bed and is in the bathroom before his brain wakes up enough to even know he's moving or why.

Once in there, blinding white light searing through sleep dark eyes, he hears Abby cry, and figures that's what got him up and out of bed.

That sounds a whole lot more like emotional distress than pain, and these days emotional distress can be anything from memories of long distance telephone commercials to a bad case.

"What? Are you okay?" he's saying as his eyes slowly adjust to the light.

Abby's standing in front of the mirror, lights on, crying, clutching the sink, and staring at herself.

She sees the fear in his eyes, because he hasn't been able to burn off all of the adrenaline of bolting out of bed, yet, and says, voice shaky and cracking, "It's broken." She tries a reassuring smile, but it doesn't come off at all, and another sob wrenches out of her.

He doesn't know what she's talking about, at all. But there's no blood, no amniotic fluid, so his first two guesses must be wrong. It takes a good thirty seconds before he sees what she means.

Kate's memorial tattoo on her hip. Three stretch marks, ones he didn't remember being there when they went to bed, crossed the tattoo, breaking the wrought iron cross, splitting the roses, cutting the C in half.

He wraps her in his arms, feeling himself relax, and says, "Oh, Abby."

She's crying on his shoulder.

"Shhhh..." He kisses her forehead, and gently strokes her hip.

"My skin was itching, burning, so I went in to rub some of the cocoa butter on it. I turned on the light and..."

He nods, staring at the broken cross.

"I didn't realize I was so loud until you came bursting in."

"It's okay." He kisses her again. "Kate would laugh at you right now."

She smiles a little. "You think so?"

"Yeah, not in a mean way. She'd be happy your little girl touched how you remember her. She'd like a symbol of life eternal marked by new life forming."

"Yeah, she would. Kelly still needs a middle name."

He knows where she's going with this. "Yeah, she does."

"But not Kate. Kelly Caitlyn sounds wrong. But Kate's middle name was Marie."

"Kelly Marie McGee." That makes him smile. "I like that. I like that a whole lot."
"Good."

It's something he's wondered about for a while now, something he's never been entirely sure if he wanted to know the answer to, which is why he's never asked. And it's also why, though Kate was a glaringly obvious choice for a middle name, he didn't suggest it.

But, he knows she loves him and will always love him, knows it in his bones, in his soul if he has one, and he's pretty sure enough time has gone by that talking about it won't hurt Abby. And hell, this week has been a whole pile of confronting things he doesn't necessarily want or need to know, so why not just toss one more on top of it?

"Were you in love with Kate?"

He's spooned up behind her, so he can't see the expression on her face, but her feels her squeeze her hand.

"Does it matter?"

"Probably not. I'm just curious."

"As much as I could let myself love anyone then, yes."

He nods, kisses the back of her neck. "Is that part of why you and I didn't work the first time?"

"No. We didn't work because I couldn't handle us working. Same thing with falling for Kate. She was basically my perfect woman, straight, Catholic, in love with someone else… I could have her friendship and the fantasy without any fear of it ever going anywhere."

"In love with someone else?" That's gotten his attention. He doesn't remember Kate having any sort of steady guy.

"She had a massive crush on Gibbs."

"Gibbs?" His voice is beyond shocked. That idea had literally never, ever formed in his mind. Whispers of hints of that idea had never formed. Nothing even remotely related to that idea had even considered forming in his mind. It's completely out of the blue.

"Yeah."

"I thought her and Tony…"

Abby laughs a little at the surprise in his voice. "Gibbs did, too. But she didn't like guys who nailed anything that moved. Thought it was a sign of low self-respect, and she didn't think a man could love her the way she wanted to be loved if he didn't love himself properly first. I'm fairly sure Gibbs thought she and Tony would get together because that was a really good way of not having to deal with the fact that he wanted her, too."

Tim smiles at that. "Rule Number 12 exists for a reason. He told me that once."

"Yeah. I think that's one of the reasons why he prefers to work with younger women these days. That way he can just stuff us into the daughter file and not have to worry about it again."

Tim shrugs. "If it works…"
"I don't know if it does, but... I do know he does it."

"What do you think would have happened if she hadn't died?"

"With Kate and I, you mean?"

"Yeah."

"Nothing." She lifts his hand to her lips and kisses his fingers. "Which was a big part of loving her. She wasn't hateful about it or anything, but she was very clear on homosexuality being a sin. It wasn't a problem if I wanted to play with girls or boys or both at once. She really was a good Christian, so she wasn't going to judge me or hold it against me, or treat me with anything but love, but it wasn't something she was willing to do."

"You actually talked about it?" Tim tries to imagine that conversation, and comes up with a blank.

"I kissed her once, and she was cool about it, but very clear."

"When was that?" He doesn't remember any hints of that, either.

"About three months before she died."

"Good kiss?" Okay, yeah, he probably didn't need to sound quite that turned on by the idea, but, well, he really likes that mental image, a whole lot.

Abby shrugs. "Awkward. She was pulling back about two tenths of a second after I touched her." Which squashes turned-on flat. He's got too many memories of kisses like that to feel turned on by it.

"I've had kisses like that."

"Yeah, but she was really great about it. Told me she loved me, wanted to be my friend, but really didn't swing that way at all. And I knew that. I really did. But we were a little drunk, and I wanted to try my luck. It wasn't like I got burned. As long as I respected her boundaries, we were cool, and just went from there like nothing happened."

"Yeah, she would have been like that."

"Yeah, she was. How about you? Ever make a move on her?"

He laughs at that. "No. Not saying I didn't think about it, a lot, but no. She wasn't just out of my league; we weren't even playing the same sport."

Abby laughs at that, thinks it's a very good way to put that. "She thought you were cute and sweet."

"Yeah, like a puppy," he says dryly. "And like I said when you said that to me, no man wants to be thought of as a puppy."

He can feel that's making her smile. "You certainly aren't a puppy anymore."

"Thank you."
In almost any way, Gibbs would tell you the world has been getting to be a better and better place. He firmly believes that, but there are some things he finds… perplexing.

Like, when did it become expected for men to attend baby showers?

He knows it wasn't when Shannon was pregnant. When she was pregnant, it was his job to drop her off at her best friend's house and then come back four hours later and lug presents into the car and into the house, and then assemble any presents that required assembly. That was a job he felt fully capable of doing not just well, but with a certain level of style.

And Tobias (upon hearing he's attending a baby shower) told him it wasn't when Diane was pregnant.

But somehow, over the years, that's changed, and he found himself at Molly's baby shower (hosted by Abby and Tim), and is now in the process of putting the finishing touches on the decorations at Jimmy's place because Breena's having a surprise shower for Tim and Abby, and somehow he and Ducky got roped into setting this thing up.

And it's not that he doesn't love Tim and Abby, let alone that he doesn't love Kelly, it's just that standing on a chair tacking up pink skull bedecked streamers as Ducky arranges little sandwiches on a tray feels really weird to him.

Ducky looks up at him from the tray, and says, "Did you ever think, Jethro, that we'd be here?"

"No, Duck. I really didn't."

Ducky laughs at that.

Breena bustles in with a tray covered in tiny cupcakes with little pink skulls on them. She checks the sandwiches and the decorations. "Good work, guys."

Gibbs shakes his head, bemused. At least he's doing it well.

Goth baby shower probably isn't a contradiction in terms or an oxymoron per se, but like with Goth maternity clothing it just doesn't seem to be something that anyone plans for.

Of course, this isn't a baby shower in the traditional sense. Usually the idea of a baby shower is the same idea behind wedding presents, namely the family all chips in to get the couple the stuff they need, but presumably can't afford because they're young and don't have any money.

Which is, of course, not the case, for Tim and Abby.

So, really, this is more like a birthday party for Kelly. A real first birthday.

Presents are tending toward small and cute. (With the exception of the Bissell Little Green Steam Cleaner Jimmy and Breena got them, which is, according to Breena, the single most useful appliance
Tony pulls Tim aside as the party was winding down. "Look, you don't have to tell me what's going on. If it's private, I'll leave it alone. But, just, don't lie to me, okay? We're worried about you. Both Ziva and I can see you didn't do this to yourself with a mirror."

Yeah, he's healing up, band aids are off, but he's got a lot of fine pink lines/scabs on his face, neck, forearms and hands.

Tim suddenly gets that Tony really will leave this alone. That in the last three years he has grown up enough to be able to do that.

Tim nods at him, saying, "I'm not okay, not on this, but I will be, eventually. It's nothing you can change or help with. And one of these days, when I feel like talking about it, I'll tell you, but not right now. Right now, I just want to let it lie. I've got a lot of bigger, better things on my horizon and I want to focus on them."

"Okay." Tony's voice is serious, and he's looking at Tim like if he stares hard enough he can figure out what's going on. "Everyone who does need to know, knows?"

"Yeah. It's not a secret, it's just, literally," Tim adds a limp half smile, "I don't want to say the words. Don't want to think about it. You can ask Gibbs about it if you like. He'll fill you in."

Tony gives him an understanding half-smile back and puts his hand on Tim's shoulder. "I'll wait for you. It's not anything with Abby or Kelly, though? You guys didn't get more troubling news?"

"No, nothing with them. Right now they're keeping me afloat. Just… stuff I didn't deal with a long time ago coming back and biting me in the ass."

"Okay. Look, you need to go get drunk, or fight, or run, or whatever, give me a call and I'm in."

"Thanks."

Much later that night, after the presents had been put away, and they're settling in for sleep, Tim kisses Abby's neck, hand cupping her breast, body snugged close to hers, very much telegraphing this is not just a good night kiss.

"Not tonight," she sounds pretty tired and kind of annoyed as she says that.

"Okay. Can I spoon you?" Normally, Tim wouldn't ask. Normally, he'd just cuddle up and go to sleep, but since they got home Abby's been in one of her porcupine moods, and his current Rule Number 3 is 'Do not unnecessarily poke the porcupine.'

"Sure."

He cuddles up close, hoping to find a position that lets him snuggle her but also doesn't annoy/make her more uncomfortable.

And, for a few minutes, he thought he had. He's relaxing, fantasizing a little, but planning on just going to sleep. He likes thinking about sex as something to fall asleep to, tends to lead to good dreams. He's about three quarters asleep, where the line between fantasy and dream is pretty blurry.

"I said not tonight."

That yanks him back to the fully awake side of the line. "And I'm fine with that."

"You're poking me."

He sighs dramatically, and rolls his eyes a bit, too. Literally, don't poke the porcupine. Stupid body. "You're warm, soft, naked, and pressed up against me. I'm enjoying that. I'm not intending to do anything with it."

"Better not." Another quiet minute. "Do you want to do something with it?"

That gets a smile out of Tim, and he kisses Abby's shoulder. "Not twelve anymore, when I have an erection it's because I want to do something with it."

"Or you're just waking up."

"Once I'm awake, I want to do something with it."

She laughs a little at that.

"Why are you asking? Want me to do something?"

"No. Not really. I'm tired, irritable, and everything hurts."

"You might feel better after some sex." He can feel her glare. "Not pushing my luck. Just, endorphins, you know?"

She rolls over to face him, a fairly long and complicated procedure, but finally she's laying on her left side. "You really want to have sex?"

"Ummm… yeah. As you noticed, I'm poking you. Or would be if your back was to me." His tummy is against hers, his hand on her hip, and these days that means his dick's nowhere near her body.

"With me?" She's looking awfully doubtful at that.

"You see anyone else here?"

"I'm the size and shape of a killer whale: a stretch-marky, irritable, pregnant killer whale."

He grins and kisses the tip of her nose. "Then add stretch-marky, irritable, pregnant killer whales to the list of things that turn me on."

She laughs.

"Look, I want to have sex with you. No matter what. You may think you look like a whale, but I'm not seeing that. You're all soft and round and that's my kid in there, and I really like that. Come on, you know I get off on other people knowing you're mine, and eight months pregnant with my kid is more or less the ultimate symbol of that."

She nods.

"And I get that you're not all 'Yay! Sex' right now, and that's cool. But whenever you are, for any kind of sex you want, I'm game. And I will always be game. If I end up a quadriplegic, and you want sex, I will talk to you until you're dripping down your legs and lick and suck your pussy until you're quivering and screaming. No matter what, Abby, I want you, and I want to be with you, and I want to feel you get off just as hard as I do."

She squeezes his hand. "Thank you."

"That's like thanking me for breathing. No matter what, as long as I've got higher-level neural functions, that's going to be true."

He's quiet for a moment, breathing against her. Then he grins. "Sooo…"

"Uh uh." Her head shakes.

"Not a problem. Wanna keep me company while I take care of this myself?"

She smiles at him. "Sure."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So... Baby showers. If, on the off chance, you've got a buddy who is going to be a parent anytime in the soonish future, may I suggest those little steam cleaner spot cleaning vaccuum things as a present? (Most popular brand I know are the Bissel Little Greens.) My boys are seven and four, and we've outgrown, finished, used up all the baby shower presents, but the Little Green one of our buddies was kind enough to suggest as something we had to get is still going strong and gets used at least three times a week and a whole hell of a lot more often when little dudes were really little.
Memorial Day Weekend

On Friday, after the meal, when they were all hanging out at Tony and Ziva's, Abby's sitting, straddling one of the kitchen chairs while Tim rubs her back and hips.

Kelly's due in five weeks, so everything loosens up, and hips and back hurt, but the fact that it's normal doesn't make it feel any better.

Jimmy's watching them while talking with Ziva, but when that bit of conversation wraps, he looks at them and says, "You know, our gym has a pool. It opens tomorrow. We," he gestures to let the rest of the group know this is an invite for everyone, though Abby's the main reason he's thinking this, "could go tomorrow or Sunday or Monday if we don't get called in for a case."

It's Memorial Day weekend. They are on call for this one. Gibbs set it so they'd be off Fourth of July, thinking that it was likely his team would appreciate the off time. After Molly, it was pretty hard to get his guys to pay attention to the work at hand. So, assuming Kelly shows up on time, not having to worry about a case to go with new baby struck him as a good idea.

Okay, that's bull. He set it for him. He doesn't want to have to be worried about a case. Kelly shows up, and he wants to be able to take off and enjoy it. He's planning on being there more or less all the time the first week or so. More and more this is looking like Kelly's coming out by c-section, so an extra set of hands around the house will be a very good thing.

The fact that it works out well for the rest of the team is just a nice side-effect.

Neither Tim nor Abby appears to get why a pool would be a good thing. Tim's looking at Jimmy like he's insane because, while it's true he's got nothing against swimming, cold and wet is still awfully low on his list of fun activities. Abby's thinking about how little she wants to try and get into a bathing suit, let alone waddle around almost naked with everyone looking at her.

Jimmy sees their confusion and he looks at Breena, shaking his head, flashing her a look that says, Amateurs. She grins back at him, veteran parents sharing a kind laugh at the newbies.

Jimmy scoots over to kneel in front of Abby. He looks up into her eyes while saying, "Abby, in a pool you're weightless. Nothing hurts in a pool. And it's cool. No more hot flash."

"Oh." And the light dawns on Abby, and with it a smile of delight spreads across her face.

"Yeah, I would have lived in the indoor pool the last six weeks with Molly if I could have. Feels so good you don't care how you look. Trust me, pool this weekend is a good idea."

"Then take me to the pool!!"

Tony and Ziva are in. Pool sounds great to them. Ducky and Penny decide no on the pool, but they do offer to make dinner for everyone and have them over that night. Gibbs doesn't say anything one way or the other.

'Course, these days, Gibbs isn't talking a whole lot. At least, if he can avoid it. It's been a pretty intense six weeks for him. But as things slide back into a new version of normal, the loss of his dad keeps creeping back to the front of his mind. He's functional but sad. And they get that. If anyone gets that, it's this group.

But before heading off at the end of dinner, Tim pulls him into Tony and Ziva's kitchen.

"Come with us on Monday."

He does that half-shrug, don't want to commit to anything gesture.

"Sunshine and playing with your girls is good for you. You're spending plenty of time in your basement, time to get in the light for a little bit, an hour, two if you can take it. If you want, you can call it bootcamp and make Jimmy and I swim laps, but come with us. Splash with the girls, snuggle Molly, lay out and suck up some vitamin D. It'll help."

Gibbs sighs. "Fine."

"Good."

"You're both doing laps."

"Of course."

---

It's cold. Really freaking cold. Back when he was a kid, Tim used to listen to Bill Cosby stand-up recordings, and one of the stories he told was about jumping in a lake with water that was like 34 degrees Fahrenheit, and getting into the outdoor pool at Jimmy's gym is reminding him very strongly of that story.

Of course, the rest of the crew seems to be liking it.

And Abby... she's ecstatic. She's been running hot for a while now, and apparently being dropped into a vat of what is basically liquid snow is making her really happy.

"I love the pool! The pool is awesome! You can take me out again when labor starts! I'm not moving 'til then."

That makes Tim laugh. "You want us to get a pool membership?"

"Yes!" she says, ecstatic at the idea.

He smiles and nods at that.

---

Officially, Breena's not pregnant yet. Though everyone in this group has figured out that she is, but those who haven't been told are doing a good job of pretending to have not noticed. Nuchal Fold test is 4th of June. But while the others are playing in the pool, she's lying on a lounge. Looks like she might be napping, but Tim's thinking she might not be. There's a bit too much tension in her face for napping.

Like with Molly and Jon, the Morning Sickness Fairy has come to visit, and is hammering her, hard.

He kisses Abby's ear and says, "I'm gonna check on Breena. I don't think she's feeling well. Offer her a ride home if she wants to go."
Abby nods at that and smiles, also knowing that Tim's looking for an excuse to get out of the water. Just because she feels like her body's running at 101 all the time doesn't mean he finds being stuck in cold water particularly comfortable.

He heads to the lounge next to Breena and starts drying off. His teeth are starting to chatter, because now that he's out of the water, the wind is making him feel even colder. "How are you doing?"

She opens her eyes to look at him. "Blech."

"Sorry to hear it. You want me to give you a lift home?"

She listlessly shakes her head. "Won't be any better at home. The meds I'm on keep me from throwing up, but it doesn't make the nausea go away."

He nods at that and sits on the edge of her lounge chair, wrapping his towel around his shoulders. "Give me your wrist."

"Tim?" she asks, rolling onto her side to face him.

"The summer Ziva was in Israel, Tony took some off time, so it was just me and Gibbs, and we got called onto a case on the Reagan, for a week, in heavy seas. I get sea sick. I get really sea sick. Lost eight pounds over the course of that week." He takes her hand in his, eyeballs the size of her fingers, and finds the spot on her wrist he's looking for, pressing his thumb gently into it. "Trust me, by the end of that week, I knew every nausea remedy on earth. Most of them don't work, but this one was... better than nothing."

"How does it work?" Breena asks, looking at her wrist in his hand.

"Three fingers down, inside of your wrist, between the tendons, gentle pressure until you feel better. There are a bunch of them, and if you want, I'll show them to you, but this is the easiest one to hit."

"And what does better than nothing mean?"

His looks says, didn't do all that much. "Let me get a few hours of sleep every night."

"Better than nothing." She understands that look.

"Yeah. The medic tried to give me some anti-nausea meds, but I had to swallow them and keep 'em down. Didn't work."

"The stuff I'm on is a tablet that dissolves on the tongue. That's pretty nice. And I'm not getting dehydrated, so that's good too, but I still feel awful."

He holds the point on her wrist, talking about the other ones, sympathizing, a little, over how awful being nauseous all the time is. After a minute, that conversation wears down.

"Can I ask you something?" Tim says to Breena.

"Sure."

He takes a deep breath, not entirely sure if he wants to do this, but... he doesn't know the answer, and it's nagging at him, not the sort of thing he thinks about a lot, especially not these last few weeks, but sometimes it'll just sort of creep into his mind, like right now as he's sitting next to her holding her wrist, and he feels like he could get a better handle on this if he gets the answer, so...

"Abby tells me you and her talk about the four of us having sex."
That gets a bright, happy smile out of her. Apparently, Breena likes talking about sex, because it looks like this is perking her up. "Yep."

Tim has a quick and firm mental discussion with his dick about how it is not going to notice this conversation, or the fact that Breena's in a bikini, and it's really not going to notice the fact that she's smiling at the idea of having sex with him or that he's touching her, because unless he wants to shift that towel from around his shoulders to around his hips, all he's got covering him is wet swim trunks, and if there's an outfit that does a worse job of concealing an erection, he doesn't know what it'd be.

He isn't entirely sure if his dick is paying attention to him or not, but it doesn't feel like it's getting past the first flush of thinking about getting hard, (possibly because the pool water was so damn cold it froze him into submission) so that's okay.

"I understand why Abby and I have talked about it. She made it clear very early on that as long as we were both happy and comfortable that anything was on the table. It just had to be fair and both of us had to be part of it. As long as I was cool with another guy, she'd be cool with another girl. And we're both jealous enough, and I'm way more than straight enough that we knew it'd never happen. But we had that conversation, probably, given some of the stuff we like, needed to have it. What I don't get is how you and Jimmy got there."

She has a knowing smile on her face. "You mean, how did I go from 'no sex with anyone who isn't my husband' to 'hey, maybe our best friends would be fun, too'?"

"Um… yeah." He nods a little. Virgin until her wedding day and swinging or swapping or whatever the hell this is doesn't exactly sound like a normal combination to Tim.

"I was fourteen and had a boyfriend I was completely in love with. Loved everything about him. Head to toes. One of the other girls in our class liked him, too, started a rumor that I'd been fooling around on him, and I saw how pissed he got. He beat the hell out of the guy I'd supposedly been fooling around with. Sheer luck, Doug, the other guy, didn't press charges."

Tim winces, but keeps quiet, letting her keep telling the story.

"There were a few good lessons in that. I didn't want a guy who wouldn't talk to me first, let alone one who believed in some rumor instead of the life we had together. But, I also learned there was real power in the idea of MINE. So I watched, and paid attention, and every guy I've met has had a MINE kick. Stronger in some guys, weaker in others, but all of them have it. I decided that there was something I could give my future husband, an act of love that'd rock his world. And I also knew that a guy who would respect me enough to move at my speed, a guy who would put his desire for sex on the shelf long enough to get to know me and make me his wife, a man who would fall in love with me, and not my body, was a man worthy of me. And a man who wouldn't pressure me, wouldn't belittle me, wouldn't try to make me feel bad for wanting to wait, was a man worthy to raise my daughters and the kind of man I'd want my sons to become." She's smiling at that, watching Jimmy, who's gently tossing Molly to Gibbs in the pool. They're all soaked, and Molly is shrieking with laughter.

Her eyes slide away from Molly, Gibbs, and Jimmy, back to Tim. "But it was never a sex is bad or icky or sinful and somehow marriage suddenly wipes it clean and makes it pure kind of thing." She sorts at that, derisive look on her face. "That's the stereotype, right? Frigid Christian virgin afraid to get dirty?"

She's looking at Tim like she expects an answer, so he nods, more signaling keep talking than I agree with that.
"That's not me. Never was. Sure, I'm Christian, and I believe that we're all sinners, all the time, in all things. That's our nature, and through Christ's grace we are able to experience love and joy and peace. And what we do, whatever it may be, if it's an act of love, then it's okay. It's blessed by God because without Him we wouldn't be able to feel that love, because all love is a reflection of Him. Because love is how we know Him.

"And for the four of us, love isn't the problem. We've got love. Best I can see, the sticking point for the four of us is the whole MINE thing. Namely, you and Jimmy have a somewhat different interpretation of how that works than Abby and I do.

"But, from what I can tell, Abby isn't any less yours because she's had sex with lots of other guys. Ziva isn't any less Tony's."

Tim nods; he agrees with that.

"Because it's not sex that makes someone yours." And now he isn't agreeing quite so much, but he is listening. "Because sex may be an act of love, but it's not love. And love isn't something that goes away. It doesn't break into pieces. You don't have less of it to give because you love someone else. You won't love Abby less when Kelly's born, you'll love her more, and you'll love Kelly more than you think you can possibly love anyone, and it all sort of wraps up into itself and makes both loves stronger and brighter."

Okay, that sounds good, too, he's nodding away.

"You don't love Abby less because you love Jimmy. You don't love Jimmy less because you love me or Tony or Ziva.

"And I've gotten to the point in my life where MINE when it comes to Jimmy isn't about sex. Not really. It's about love and trust and the life we've built and our home and family. And you and Abby don't threaten that. You're part of it. He wants to go off on his own and pick up some random 22-year-old with perky breasts and twenty-five inch waist..." Breena's eyes leave his, and he knows she's looking at all of the pretty, young things in tiny bikinis wandering around the pool. "And I'll be pissed, big time, because that would be a violation of that trust and love." Her gaze returns to him, then flicks over to the water where Jimmy and Abby are playing with Molly, while Gibbs talks with Ziva, and Tony's about to leap in, cannonballing next to them. "But you and Abby? You held us when we mourned our son, carried us when the pain was too great to walk, and if there's any greater act of love than that, I don't know what it would be." She blinks, wipes away the tears, steadies her voice, and touches his fingers on her wrist. "Even that's about love and comforting each other. Anyway. If that love is ever expressed as sex, well, yeah, I'd like that." She smiles warm and a little flirty at Tim. "And I know you would, too."

He's about to speak when she gestures with her finger to let him know she isn't quite done.

"I realize that all the love stuff may just be bull. I might be rationalizing this. Might just be horny. Might be curious. You three all tried other people, got to see what it was like. I haven't. But, I do know this, I love Jimmy, body, soul, mind, any way you can love a man, I love him, and I'm never, ever going to do anything that hurts him. So, if he's not completely into this, too, then it's never going to happen. I love you and Abby, too, and I won't do anything to hurt you, either.

"So, maybe this will stay a fantasy. Maybe it'll never go further than Abby and I dancing together slow and close to make you and Jimmy stare at us like you want to eat us alive. Maybe, for the rest of our days, we'll be dear friends who flirt a little too hard, hug each other a few seconds too long, dance a little too close, but we laugh and enjoy it, because it makes us feel sexy and good."
"And if that's all this ever is, that's fine! It's more than fine." She takes his hand in hers and squeezes it. "I never thought I'd have friends like you and Abby. But I do think it's better that we're open about wanting each other, and choose, eyes open, to either explore that further or not, rather than pretend it's not there." She lets go of him, and goes back to watching the rest of the family playing.

"More than a year ago, Abby and I were dancing, and Ziva asked if the four of us were sleeping together, and that got me thinking about it. Jimmy's loved her forever. I liked you. She wanted us. You're hot for me. And, I thought about how that could go. Secret fantasies, jealousy, Abby and I annoyed at each other, thinking we're trying to seduce each other's husbands. Thinking of you while sleeping with him. Jimmy wondering where my mind goes when we're together. More jealousy. Infidelity. Anger."

She turns back to Tim, who is staring at her intently, amazed at how much thought she's put into this.

"And I didn't want that. That's not love. That's poison! So, when we got home that night, I told him a story about the four of us at the club, and it was melt-your-brain-hot! Turned out he really liked the idea of it. And then it was a game. And we were okay. Because thinking about you and him and me and Abby together doesn't mean I love him any less.

"I talked to Abby the next morning. And instead of the usual story of suspicion and anger, I flat out said to her, 'It'll probably never happen, but I would like to sleep with you and Tim and Jimmy. I'm sure he's got tricks Jimmy's never dreamed of, and you've never been kissed until you've been kissed by Jimmy Palmer. The things that man can do with his tongue!"

"And she just smiled at me, you know that smile, the one that makes everything seem good and happy, and then hugged me, and said, 'I don't think the guys'll ever go for it, but if they do, oh yeah! We are so on for that!'

"I don't know, but somehow that seems a lot healthier than constantly watching each other, snide remarks, lack of trust, and worrying that something is going to happen. I know what page she's on. She knows where I am. You're rubbing my wrist, and she's seen it, and she's not bothered or worried, because she knows what's going on. We can both sit here, with you guys, flirt a little, mess around a little, and it's not a problem, because nothing is ever going to happen without all four of us agreeing and wholeheartedly jumping into it."

Tim waits another second, making sure she's done, then leans over and kisses her cheek. "I love you. You and Abby are the most beautiful women on earth. And Jimmy and I are insanely lucky to have you in our lives. And yeah, for me, love and sex and MINE are all sort of tangled together, and I really like the idea of what you're saying, but I don't know if I'll ever feel that way. And, look, completely honest, I've been fantasizing about you since the first time Jimmy showed us a picture of you. If you ever want to sleep with me and Abby, there's always room in our bed for you." He flashes her his sexy smile and very intentionally lets his eyes drag down her body before sliding them back up to meet hers. "And you're right, I've got tricks he's never dreamed of, and Abby and I would make you feel so good!"

Breena giggles at that.

"But she's MY wife. And Jimmy's the sticking point."

"He feels the same way about me and you."

"Of course."

"You guys should probably talk to each other about this."
Tim runs his fingers through his hair and sighs, looking over at Jimmy who is now splashing Tony with Molly's help while Abby and Ziva laugh at them. Talking to Jimmy about this means walking into pretty dangerous territory that he'd rather stay away from right now, but, yeah, it'll have to happen sooner or later, so he answers, "Get enough alcohol into us, and maybe we will. Anyway… maybe one day I'll be able to get over that enough for both of you to come join us. I mean, when she was first pregnant he was joking about sleeping with her, and I wanted to hit him, because she's MINE and he didn't even have the right to joke about it. And I don't feel that now, at least not in regards to him. Some asshole was eyeballing her the other day, and I could feel my pulse in my ears while he was doing it…” Tim takes a breath, he sounds pissed as he's talking about it. "Okay, off topic…”

Breena laughs at little, giving him a knowing look. "Or not so much."

"Or not so much." He shakes his head and switches from holding the pressure point on her right wrist to her left. "But yeah, right now, MINE is attached to sex, really attached to sex, attached to sex the same way I'm attached to my arms. And, like you noticed, that does seem to be a guy thing, and I'm not going to stop being a guy at any point in the future. And I really doubt Jimmy's gonna stop being a guy. So, I guess the question for me is: can Jimmy and I get from MINE to ours? Can we share you with each other? I mean, I can guarantee there is absolutely no shot at all of me ever being cool with anyone other than Jimmy, and there's probably better than even odds I'll never be cool with him, either. But, there's still the idea, I guess… Can you be ours, can Abby be ours, and can I even wrap my head around ours?"

"I don't know."

"I don't either. But I'm thinking about it. Because you're right, the idea is melt-your-brains hot."

That gets a very sexy grin out of Breena. "Good. He is, too."

Tim looks at her wrist in his hand, deciding now is probably a good time to change the topic. "So, is this helping, at all?"

"Tiny bit." Breena smiles, understanding he's changing the topic, letting himself have time to think. "The conversation's good. It's keeping me distracted."

"Yeah, I didn't find it very useful when I was on the Reagan."

"Better than nothing."

"That's true. And you at least feel like you're doing something."

"Yep. So show me the other points."
June 1, 2015 marked the first of the major work changes. The lab was no longer Abby's and Abby's alone.

While it's true that the Navy Yard hosts the premier MCRT and the hub of all of the ins and outs of NCIS, it didn't host the best lab. (Not saying anything about the talent of the Navy Yard lab, just the physical layout and technology.) The best lab was at Norfolk.

And it's not that Norfolk was any sort of a major NCIS hub. Yes, there are tons of Navy Personnel out of Norfolk and Hampton Roads, but not so much as to require their very own state-of-the-art lab with three techs.

What Norfolk's lab did was the processing of any trace for any Agent Afloat floating closer to the east coast of the United States than Europe.

So, when Sequester hit, and Vance had to sit down with the NCIS Accounting Department and find the least painful ways to tighten his budget, one thing that stuck out was he had two NCIS bases less than 200 miles apart. One of them already covered any major crimes that happened in the territory of the other, and while it's true the other had the better lab, he could move the equipment and people to DC, shut down Norfolk, and save fourteen million dollars a year by consolidating.

After all, if you're already floating five hundred miles east of Norfolk, the added half hour of helio time to get your trace to DC instead of Norfolk really isn't an issue.

Plus, since Dearing's bomb more or less went off right in front of the lab, when they rebuilt that area, a few extra storage spaces had been added, and converting them into extra lab space only required knocking down some walls, installing better ventilation and lighting, and moving the lab from Norfolk up to DC.

So on June 1st, six months after it should have happened, (Because one thing politicians are good at is getting their own pet projects funding extensions, and Virginia's senators might not agree on a whole lot, but keeping plush Federal jobs in their state is one of those things, so miraculously additional funding for six more months showed up out of the ethers.) Abby McGee walked (waddled, it's really hard to look particularly dignified and in command when you're so pregnant you feel like the kid is dangling between your knees) into what was no longer her lab, and got ready to start a new job.

Boss.

Zelaz, Corwin, and Benedict have been transferred up. Technically she and Benedict have the same rank, but she's got seniority, so it's still her lab.

But it's also not her lab. It's no longer her space. It's not home away from home. Now it's just the place where she works. And that, along with other voices, the lack of music, and a collection of little dohickies that aren't hers is disconcerting.

And she's no longer Abbs. Not down here. Not anymore. She's not a pet. She's not the NCIS mascot. Not to them. She's… McGee. Which feels kind of weird. She's gotten used to it being her last name, but until today, no one besides Leon (and occasionally Tim when he's feeling frisky) calls her that.

But now… "McGee, where do you want…" "McGee, is it okay…" "McGee, how about we…"
Finally she'd had enough of that. "Okay, all of you, right here." And her new techs (Lab rats? Assistants? God, she hates this.) gathered around.

"Look. I know you all call each other by your last names, but I'm Abby. And, unless you really hate it, I'm calling you three by your first names, too. There's one guy I call by his last name, and that's Gibbs. And none of you are Gibbs, so unless you hate your first names, I'm using them. Plus, my husband works here, and works down here," She points at her second computer, though it's occurring to her that might not be as easy to do, what with three other people down here now. "and everyone around here already calls him McGee, because he's been McGee his whole life and I've only been McGee since November."

They nod. "Okay, Abby." Zelaz… Roger, says.

"Good."

She hates the fact that Roger, Eva (Corwin), and Tom (Benedict) are all lugging and unpacking but she's not. It's not that she's doing nothing, but, in that she can't move anything heavy, and right now, everything is heavy, so instead of moving she's keeping track of the new inventory.

And yeah, it's kind of neat that they're slapping bar codes on everything and scanning them all in, but still, it feels lazy to be the one waving the scanner around when they're all carrying in heavy boxes.

And while she hadn't enjoyed the period while they were getting the storage space up to lab capacity, (they tried to keep the dust under control, but she did end up with a few contamination issues) she would have to admit that the extra space is nice.

And, okay, yeah, it's not exactly painful to admit that Norfolk did have all the cool toys and she can't wait to play with them.

Tim came down in the afternoon, was introduced to everyone, ("Tom, Roger, Eva, this is McGee!") and also came to the conclusion that just popping down to do whatever it was he wanted workwise wasn't going to happen anymore.

Mainly, he'd gotten down there, sat at what he thinks of as "his" computer (after all, it's got the little black hearts she put on the keyboard for him) and noticed that it was already turned on, and working, and running a search.

And, if that computer's already working, then, well… It's doing lab work, for the lab, in the lab, so pre-empting that to do casework isn't cool.

So he looks around at four scientists all mucking about with science-y stuff, and realizes that the days of him being the back-up lab tech are over.

If he's ever down here to read Major Mass Spec, run trace, help with an experiment, or do the computer stuff, it means something's gone very wrong.

And if he's down here doing his job, just sharing the space with her, then one of the other people down here aren't doing their job.

So he kisses Abby, smiles a little sadly at her, and she sees it, understands, nods and smiles back, also a little sad, and heads up to MTAC, where he'll commandeer one of their computers so he can work faster.

They weren't on an active case, so it wasn't too hard to get out for dinner at a reasonable time. So they were heading toward food (neither of them felt like cooking) when Tim asked, "So, how is it?"

"Honestly, weird with a side of feeling left out."

He doesn't say anything, but his look gets across tell me more.

"I imagine I'm feeling a lot like Draga's gonna feel when he starts up. They're a team. They've got systems and rhythms and know how to read each other and how everyone works. And I'm not part of that."

"You'll get there."

"Sort of. I'll get, at most, a month with them, then three off." NCIS offers twelve weeks of maternity leave, and as of this point, Abby was planning on taking all of them. "By the time I get back, they'll have the new lab all set, and I'll be the outsider, in my own space."

"Sorry."

She shakes her head. Nothing she can do about it. "At least I know none of these guys are psychos."

"True."

"And they do good work."

"Also true."

"And with four of us, we'll have trace processed faster, and I'll be able to get done working at a reasonable time more often."

"Yep."

"So why does this suck?"

He squeezed her hand and gave her an understanding smile. "It'll get better. You all looked pretty happy setting up the scanning electron microscope."

"That was fun. It can actually get micron level detail."

"That's cool."

"Yeah, it is."
June 3rd, Team Gibbs caught a case, and for the first time ever, the new lab set into action.

And, it was bumpy. Abby's used to doing everything, not delegating. At her absolute most collaborative, she works with Tim, the guy she can read at a glance and the only person on earth she can type in tandem with on the same keyboard. Occasionally, she had deigned to allow other specialists into her lab to help her with something, and generally they work on separate parts of a project together.

But breaking down a task, giving everyone a different part, actually delegating, that's not in her skillset.

Likewise, she's got her evidence handling system in place, and to say that it's complicated and works only for her is something of an understatement.

And the worst part is, she can see this isn't working. At all. So it's got to change. She can't just sort of share a space with them, let them handle Afloat business, and her Navy Yard business. They've got to be a team.

"Okay." The other three look up at her. They'd been milling around, sort of watching her, because she wasn't really letting them into the job. "How do you guys do this?"

"Tom's on intake. He makes sure everything is accepted, registered, cataloged, and then sorted into what we'll be doing with it. Eva handles prints and computer searches. I do the testing, and when Tom's done with intake he helps out with whichever one of us needs the help," Roger answers.

"Okay, who does mock-ups, re-creations, blood spatter, and the like?"

The three of them just look at each other. "We don't," Roger answers.

"You don't?"

"No. The medical guys on board handle blood spatter. And we don't do mock-ups or re-creations of the crime scenes."

"Okay. Then I'm on that if need be. How about audio or visual processing?"

"Last time we had any of that, we sent it to you," Eva said.

"Good point. I'm on that, too. So, I'm thinking for right now you guys keep doing it your way. I'll float in and out and lend a hand on whatever needs extra hands, and if we've got any of the stuff you don't do, I'll handle it."

They nod.

"When I get back from leave, we're going to start from the ground up and figure out how to do this the most efficient way. It sounds like you've got a good system in place, but any system can get better, so we'll figure out what that is."

Tom smiled at that. "We like better."

Abby smiled back at him, and yeah, if he knew her better, he'd know that was a forced smile, but she's the boss and it's her job to make this team work. "I like better, too."
June 4th

June 4th Jimmy and Breena had their Nuchal Fold test scheduled for the late afternoon.

Tim and Abby took off for it, too.

If there was bad news, they wanted to be there, able to comfort right away.

And if it was good news, well, that's even better when shared.

So, instead of sitting in their own OB’s office (next appointment, tomorrow afternoon) they're in a different OB’s office.

Tim's thinking there's got to be a warehouse somewhere that sells OB office waiting rooms. The shape's a little different, and the colors are taupe and mauve instead of taupe and cream, but this is pretty much the exact same place, down to the same magazines.

"You'd think an OB's office would have better chairs," Abby says to him.

They're on this little sofa-like thing. It might be a love seat or a settee, Tim doesn't know precisely what the difference between those things is. She's sitting next to him, back to him, as he rubs gently over her low back and hips. They've been hurting on and off all day, and usually sitting down helps with that, but today's just being obnoxious and it's not really helping at all.

It felt like a lot of waiting. It always does.

"You think they're okay?" Tim asks her.

"Yeah." She squeezes his hand, and maybe she's not sounding all that certain, after all, it didn't seem like it took this long when they got their Nuchal Fold test done, but…

They've got to be okay. They just have to. Please!

When Jimmy and Breena came out, all smiles and soul deep relief, Tim felt the grin spread across his face, and saw Abby hop (well, if she was less pregnant it would have been a hop, it was more of a lurch) up enthusiastically to hug them both.

When they got home, after a very happy, very fun, almost giddy dinner out, she flipped on the TV and settled in front of it, kneeling behind the exercise ball, leaning against it, rocking gently.

"I just can't seem to shake this," she said, forearms crossed over the top of the ball, her head against them. Yes, dinner had been a blast, but her back just kept aching. Not all the time, but enough so that it was really annoying.

"You're pregnant."

She just looks up from the ball at him, flashing her so done with you look. "Thanks, that's something I somehow wasn't aware of."
Tim realized that might have been unnecessarily poking the porcupine, so he retreats. "Sorry. Captain Obvious here. You want me to get you some Tylenol?"

"Yes."

He was back a minute later with a glass of ice water and two Tylenol. "What do you want to watch?"

"Don't care. Just want to veg."

"Okay. Want me to rub your back some more?"

"Please."

He sat cross-legged behind her, pressing his palms into her sacrum.

She sighed. "That helps. It's been coming and going all day."

"Umm…” He's not really listening, just hearing her voice, paying attention to his hands on her skin, finding the tight spots and working on them.

"Like…” Her voice trailed off as he hit something especially good. "Oh, that's nice."

He smiled, happy to have found a good spot.

"It's not like it's knives in my back or anything. I mean, when I'd get working or paying attention to something else, it'd kind of go away, but it just kept coming back."

He nodded. He'd had that kind of pain before. Low grade yuck that you can banish to the background by keeping your brain busy and then as soon as you don't have something else to pay attention to it jumps back to the foreground.

"A few times, I'd be loading up samples, and I'd have to stop for a minute, but then it'd ease up, and I'd go back to it… Oh, holy shit…"

"Abby?” He was getting a little worried because that 'Oh, holy shit' didn't sound happy.

"I am too stupid to let out of the house. I'm pregnant. With low back pain. That's been coming and going all day."

Tim's eyes went wide as what that was dawned on him. "You mean contractions."

"Yeah. Sometimes you feel them in your low back."

"Well, how many, how long, when?” He sounded awfully panicky as he says that.

"I don't know. All day?"

He leaped up, getting ready to grab the go bag and head directly to the hospital at whatever the highest rate of speed his car can obtain is.

"I don't think we need to race to the hospital this second."

He looked at her like she's insane. "I think we do. I think we need to be there right now!"

"You remember Dr. Draz saying that eventually I'd start to get some contractions, and that that was when we should make sure that we had an appointment for the next day?"

Okay, yeah, he did remember her saying that. And they do, in fact, have an appointment for the next day. But he was under the impression she meant something different by 'some contractions' than what Abby's been having, so he says, "Yeah. Braxton-Hicks contractions. That's like one here, one there, maybe a few more and then they stop. Not on and off all day."

Abby thought about that for a second, and seemed to be focusing on how long she's been feeling this way. "Okay, good point, help me up."

"Thank you."

They live three miles from St. Francis Hospital. Normal drive time (assuming you follow the speed limits) is about seventeen minutes. Tim got them there so fast Abby hadn't even gotten off of holding for the OB that was on call with their practice.

So, it was about nine seconds after walking in that chatting on the phone became something of a moot point, because they were able to see Dr. Draz face to face.

"Lucky thing I'm on call for tonight. Tell me what's going on."

So Abby did.

"How often have they been happening?"

"I don't really know. Didn't put it together until five minutes ago. But, maybe three times an hour for like the last eight hours, maybe all day."

"Okay. Let's get you in a gown and checked out."

This time Dr. Draz did the ultrasound herself, and a quick internal exam as well, took off her gloves, then spent another moment feeling Abby's belly.

"You're at negative two station," she said as she helped Abby sit up. "Which means Kelly's as far away from the cervix as she can get. Half-way effaced, so that means your cervix is thinning out, and you're one centimeter dilated. My guess is this is just the starting round. Sort of like when you turn the key and the engine revs a few times but nothing happens. Your placenta is still right near the cervix." She checked her notes. "You're at thirty-five weeks and four days right now, and we'd really like to see Kelly stay in there until thirty-seven weeks, thirty-eight is better."

"Well, yeah, it probably is, but Kelly seems to have a different opinion about that," Abby said.

"And well she might. But my guess, having seen this roughly seventeen thousand times, is that this is going to peter out. Tomorrow there'll be no contractions. Usually the baby's all the way down before your body gets really serious about trying to get her out. This is just a warm up round."

"So what does that mean?" Tim asks.

"It means you're going home. It means you're going to go to sleep. It means…” she flips through her calendar, "that unless the contractions pick up before then, come 8:00 AM on June 18th you two are going to come in here, and I'm going to deliver Kelly."

"It means a c-section," Abby said, very sad.
"Yes. She's probably about four, four and a half pounds now, and your placenta hasn't moved. It's not going to. With where your placenta is, this kind of warm up labor isn't a major risk for hemorrhage. Real contractions, the kind you need to push a baby out, they are."

"Okay, what else?" Tim asked.

"Pelvic rest from now until then. No sex." She looks at Tim and decides that extra clarification is probably in order. "No orgasms at all. No strenuous activity. No mildly exerting activity. If you don't have to do it, don't do it."

"Can I work?"

"Can you do your work sitting down? You don't have to spend all day, every day lying down, but I don't want you up and walking around all the time, too. So, it's an honest question, if you go to work, will you stay sitting down? If you can say yes to that, then you can go to work."

"How much walking around can I do?"

Dr. Draz thinks about it, realizing that if she comes up with a specific number Tim will get Abby a pedometer to measure it, making sure she takes not one step more than that, but if she's vague about it it'll just panic them worse. "Call it a thousand steps a day, give or take a bit. And the lower you can get that number the better, and no, days aren't cumulative. You do seven hundred steps one day, you do not get to do thirteen hundred the next.

"How about the pool?"

"If you mean, 'Can I go to the pool and lay around in the water feeling cool and not hurting?' Yes. Go, do, enjoy. Anything that helps you stay comfortable is a good thing. If you mean, 'Can I dive and swim laps,' no.

"If your water breaks, you come in. If you have more than three hours in a row of contractions every ten minutes, you come in. If you start bleeding, you come in, immediately."

"Okay."

Dr. Draz checked her calendar again. "We've got an appointment tomorrow afternoon. We'll cancel that. We'll schedule for the 8th, if that works for you?"

They both nod. Like either of them is going to say, "Nope, too busy. We'll just skip it and hope for the best."

"We'll do another one on the 12th, and one more on the 17th, and if everything remains on track, 'round about 10:00 AM on the 18th you'll be holding Kelly."

That takes Tim's breath away. Just that level of specific, this is going to happen when and how, hit him really hard. He's holding onto Abby, and squeezes her tight while inhaling fast.

"Wow."

Dr. Draz grins. "Yeah. So get dressed. Go home. Rest. Come back if the contractions get regular. It's not likely, but it's possible this time tomorrow we'll have Kelly out."
The ride home is quiet. Very quiet.

They get to a stop sign and Tim gently strokes her face. She turns into the caress and kisses his palm.

"How's your back feeling?"

"Just regular sore right now."

"Okay."

Two more minutes and they're home. He crosses to her side of the car to open the door for her and give her a hand out, but leaves her maternity bag in the car, not feeling very certain about the whole go to sleep and everything will just keep going on like before thing.

By that point it really was go to bed time. So they headed to their bedroom, and started the traditional nightly routine of settling down.

He knows this flavor of silence. She's scared. Really scared.

They get into bed and he curls around her, holding her close, her back snug against his chest, his arm under her neck, and his other hand resting on Kelly's baby bump. "Talk to me?"

"I'm so scared."

"I know." He kisses her shoulder. Having a pretty deep basket of irrational fears of his own, he's not about to call her out on hers. But he doesn't want her panicked, either. "But it's going to be all right."

"You don't know that! And even if it is 'all right,' we're still defining all right as Dr. Draz slicing me open."

"I know."

There's anger and irritation under the fear when she says, "And look, I know why we're doing this. I get it. I understand that it's safer to go in, get her out, and get everything taken care of fast. I get not wanting to have uncontrollable bleeding. Okay, I get it. I do. But I'm still scared. And I hate being scared because it's stupid, but I'm still scared and it's still my body that's going to get cut open. It's my spine they're going to shove a needle into. Something goes wrong with this, I may never walk again, may never feel anything below my chest. Lots of women end up with pain shooting down one leg for the rest of their lives after a slightly messed up epidural and a really messed up one..." She shakes her head, and he squeezed her a little tighter.

Tim thought for a moment, holding her, stroking her stomach, chin resting on her shoulder. "General anesthetic?"

She sounds annoyed, not at him, mostly at the idea that there really isn't a better option than an epidural. "More risk for Kelly. The epidural is safer for both of us, and I'll come out of it faster... I know that... But I've still got to sit there and let them shove a needle into my spine. And if I'm not perfectly still or if something gets messed up...

"I'll be with you."

"Not for that part. Before and after, yeah. But they don't let the Dad in for the epidural."

"Oh." He hadn't known that, and the idea of having to sit out there and wait while someone sticks a needle into Abby's spine hits him pretty hard, too. He's realizing that's not going to be a fun couple of minutes for either of them.

She seems to understand him finally really getting that and says, "Yeah."

He's not sure what to say, so he holds onto her, snuggling her close to him, and hopes his touch is comforting.

"At least we know what's going to happen."

She shrugs at that. Yes, that's a bit of a comfort. Instead of a huge host of unknowns, for example trying a vaginal delivery and ending up hemorrhaging is now off the list of potential outcomes, there's a pretty specific list of unknowns, and a good, hard deadline two weeks from now.

"And we know it's not going to happen any later than the 18th."

She nods.

"Get to see her in not more than two weeks. This time, two weeks from now, we'll be in the hospital, holding her. Maybe you'll be nursing. Maybe we'll be snoozing. But this time two weeks from now, she'll be out."

That gets a little smile. "I know. And I want it. And I can't wait. And I'm still scared."

He kisses her again. "I'd make it better or take it from you if I could."

"I know."
Preparations

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

So, instead of an appointment with Dr. Draz the next afternoon, they ended up having a chat with Leon.

Like every Friday a case hasn't gone hot, they've got Shabbos at Tony and Ziva's so that's soon enough to explain what's going on to the family. Let them really talk about it.

But, since they know maternity leave starts no later than the 18th, Abby talking to her boss about it sounded like a good plan, and for while he's off, Tim has a few ideas of something he'd like to do, but he needed to float them by Vance before doing them.

"Agent McGee, Mrs. McGee, what can I do for you?"

Tim looked at Abby, but she didn't seem to want to talk, so he said, "We had another doctor's appointment last night. So, we now know that no later than 8:00 on 18th, Kelly's coming out."

Leon raises an eyebrow. Abby had let him know that things were not going as smoothly as they had hoped a month ago. So he's not sure if this is good news or not, but whatever it is they're still here and not in the hospital, so it can't be all bad news. "Congratulations. I take it you are up here to revisit your maternity leave plans?"

"Thanks, Leon. And yes. They'd really like it if I didn't move around more than strictly necessary. So unless she decides to head out sooner than expected, I'm thinking the 12th will be my last day. That should give Tom enough time to get a feel for the lab and up and running on his own."

Vance nods at that.

"And we need to re-do the job offer for Draga, hopefully he'll be able to start on the 15th instead of the 1st like we'd agreed," Tim adds.

Vance nods at that as well. "And you're still thinking of taking four weeks off?" he asks Tim.

"Yeah. I've got the time, might be more depending on how things go, but I don't assume I'll be entirely off."

"I thought the reason we hired Draga was so you could be completely off."

"Well, yes, among other things. It's not MCRT work I'm thinking of doing."

Vance looked at him curiously.

"I figure I'll need permission from you to do this. I want to hack Cybercrime. And everyone who works down there. On any device they work with. So, here, at home—"

Vance laughing cut him off.

"Sir? Bad plan? Privacy issues?"

Vance smiled at him and shook his head. "It's a fine plan, and I'll be very interested to see what your results are, however, it's not a plan you are going to execute with a brand new baby in the house."

"Sir?"

Vance smiles, shaking his head, chuckling. "Take it from someone who's done this before, McGee. You're not going to want to do anything more complicated than buying the groceries those first few weeks. So don't. I especially do not want you trying to hack Cybercrime when you're not at your full potential. Wait until you're rested again, then go after it, because I am intensely interested in seeing what you'll find when someone with a real A game goes up against them."

"Yes, sir."

"If I remember correctly, you're the one who built the main protective firewall that NCIS's systems hide behind."

"Yes, sir."

"So, shouldn't that tip them off to who is doing this?"

"If they're paying attention. I'm very interested in who comes to visit you about being hacked by the MCRT."

"And if anyone does?"

"Tell them it's a security check. The only ones who notice I've been there will be the ones who are really on the ball."

"Then I hope to have twelve people come visit me."

Tim highly doubts that will happen but he says, "Yes, that would be nice, wouldn't it?"

He kissed Abby, who headed for the elevator and from there down to the lab, and then went to his desk. He was standing on the landing, leaning, forearms against the railing, looking down at the Bullpen, and something hit him: where were they going to stick Draga?

Sure while he was out, Draga could use his desk, but theoretically he'd come back and it'd be the five of them for at least five months. So, they're going to need a place to put him.

And really, there are only two spaces, next to his desk or next to Gibbs' because it's not like the far side of Tony or Ziva's desks can be modified.

He's thinking that if they take the divider out between Gibbs and the empty space next to him, push the flat screen and printers flush against the back wall, and angle the desk in the empty space toward them, that would give them…

A really awkward work space, and the only good thing about it would be that Draga wouldn't be exiled off from the rest of the group.

Take the divider out between his desk and the next one…

And it's still awkward.

And he likes his divider, damn it. It's got all his stuff on it, and it's not like Gibbs uses his.

Square off Gibbs and Ziva's desks, shove them both closer to the dividers and squeeze one in between them?

No. They'd be tripping over Draga and his stuff and it'd be a mess.
He more felt Tony stop next to him than saw him. "What you looking at?"

"Figuring out where we're going to put Draga. We'll have to stick him somewhere for half a year."

"Good point."

"You gonna take Gibbs' desk again?"

"No. Don't need the symbol of it this time. He'll take yours or his, whichever one of you leaves first."

Tony scans over the space. "Do we really need two big screens? Let alone four printers?"

"What are you thinking?"

"The big screen and printers behind Gibbs's desk. I've never seen us use the printers. And he's got what, a fax machine back there? When was the last time we used that?"

"Good point. Ziva doesn't need that TV behind her desk either. I certainly don't use the one next to my desk."

"Yeah, not like we need it to catch the news anymore. We've all got live streaming on our phones."

"So, get rid of the desk behind his with all that stuff. Move the big screen next to the other big screen. Square her desk off so it's flush against the divider. Shove his desk over a bit toward hers, and stick Draga's desk flush against the divider, facing it?"

Tim thinks about that, it'll do. "Sure. And when Gibbs leaves Draga can fully unpack and just expand into the space."

"He'll be back toward us."

"Nothing's perfect, and it's better than the first four plans I came up with. So, feel like helping me with some rearranging?"

"We don't have to do it now, do we?"

Tim shrugs. "Well, no. I guess not." Draga won't be there for at least two more weeks, maybe, if he can start sooner, he might not. They'd agreed on the first, and he might be busy until then. So, it doesn't have to happen right this second.

Tony looks at him. "You're nesting again, aren't you?"

"Probably. But that's not all of it." They stood there, staring over the bullpen, as Tim told Tony what had happened last night.

"This is good, right? Kelly on the outside, we're all happy and excited, right?"

"I am, or would be, but Abby's terrified, so that's hard."

"Oh."

"Yeah. And I get a c-section is more dangerous." He looks up at the ceiling. "But, it doesn't feel that way to me. Surgeons and precision and everyone knows what they're doing and…"

"You've got a set game plan, know what's going to happen, and there feels like less of a shot of unexpected."
"Yeah. Three incisions, reach in—"

"Okay, you can stop that right there. I do not need nearly that much detail on how this works. Talk to Jimmy about that."

"Jimmy's the one who told me that. He's actually done three of them."

"Of course he has. I'm perfectly comfortable with the idea of being the guy who goes nowhere near the business end of things when it comes to how babies get out."

Tim laughs at that. "Ziva's gonna love that."

Tony bumps Tim's shoulder with his own. "Ziva doesn't want to get anywhere near the business end of things, either."

Tim laughed at that, too.

"Come on, lets let Gibbs and Ziva know what's going on."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So I don't know how many of you have seen the stills that just came out for Anonymous Was A Woman, but the feature McGee in a button down, top few buttons undone, sleeves rolled up, jeans, and belt. (And combat gear!) Anyway, well, if they were going to give me McGee dressed in my go-to sexy outfit for him, then I had to do a little photoshopping.

If you feel like wandering over to:

(And yes, that's my tumblr, feel free to follow if you like.)
There are many things Tim McGee is very good at. And he quite enjoys a large percentage of the things he's very good at. (Cleaning. He's very good at it, doesn't much like it, but his mom made sure he knew how to keep a tidy house.)

And as the first weekend of pelvic rest dawned on them, he was ready to combine the fact that he loves pampering Abby with the fact that he's very good at it, hopefully producing something that is a lot of fun for both of them.

They're on call, but the phone didn't buzz, so they slept in.

Well, he slept in. She dozed and rested. She's hit the point where she has to wake all the way up to roll over, and she's big and uncomfortable enough she can't lie in one position for more than an hour and a half, so, not a lot of solid, deep sleep for her.

But when he did wake up, she was sleeping, so he quietly grabbed some clothing and crept out of the house in search of treats.

An hour later he was back with her favorite breakfast goodies, stuff for lunch and dinner, more snacks, flowers, and some massage oil that smelled good.

He put breakfast on a tray with the flowers, tucked the oil into his pocket, and headed up. He's hoping that he can keep them in bed for a whole lot of the weekend. And he's aware of the fact that spending a weekend in bed without having sex is going to be... difficult, but still, resting is important, Abby's supposed to be taking it easy, so he's grabbing any and everything he can find to make her want to stay in bed.

When he got up there, Abby looked like she was still dozing, so the tray went on his dresser, the massage oil went on the bedside table, and he shucked off his clothing and snuggled back into bed with her.

"Where'd you go?" she sounded sleepy.

"Out, got some goodies."

She started the laborious process of rolling over to face him, and eventually got flipped over and asked, "What sort of goodies?"

"Food." He pointed behind him at his dresser. "Breakfast is over there. Got you hazelnut croissants and chocolate ones for me, some fresh berries, honeydew melon."

That got an excited look out of Abby. She levered herself up to look and smiled. He grinned, kissed her, and rolled out of bed to get the tray.

With breakfast over, he moved onto part two of the plan, movies. Somehow they hadn't managed to see any of the Captain America movies (somehow means Cap is fine, but not either of their favorites, so watching his movies got booted to the bottom of the list, but Black Widow, who Tim does like and Abby really likes, is in Winter Soldier, so, anyway, Captain America movies,) and well, there was likely never going to be a better time to rectify that, so he was ready to swing into action.
But he also knew that right now, hours and hours of lying in bed really doesn't feel all that hot to Abby's back or hips.

So he had a plan, one he thought was a pretty good.

Namely, they don't have the greatest bathtub on earth, but it's big enough for both of them to sit in, especially if she's between his legs leaning back against his chest.

Granted he hasn't checked to see how much water displacement both of them in there with her pregnant will produce, but he's fairly sure they'll be able to get enough water in there to make her feel more comfortable, and that's all that matters.

Meanwhile, his Kindle doesn't have a huge screen, but it's really high def, and they've got a little rack that the soap and scrubby goes on, and that rack should work just fine for movie viewing.

So, he cleaned up breakfast and asked her to run a cool bath for them, which she did, and then surprised her with movies in the tub.

That got them to afternoon nap time. He wasn't feeling very sleepy, and had the sinking suspicion that she wasn't either. So instead of just snuggling up and snoozing he began gently nuzzling along the back of her neck, placing soft, wet kisses just below her hairline.

"What are you doing?"

He kissed her one last time before saying, "Making love." They hadn't been touching each other… Okay, that's not true, several hours of snuggling shows they've been touching, they hadn't been touching each other since the pelvic rest diktat. Part of that is just well, it's really frustrating to get into it and have to stop. But, he's missing the closeness of it. Cuddling is fine, but he'd like to take the time to make her feel good, as good as he can, and if that's not sex, well, it's not sex, but it's still making love.

"Think that's a good plan?" Because she knows how frustrating this might be, too.

"Yeah. Wanna make you feel good. Doesn't have to be sex. We can still kiss and pet and cuddle. Got some new massage oil, though I'd rub you all over, ease the sore bits. It's every woman's fantasy, right? Hours and hours of cuddling. No sex, no having to have sex, just lots of cozy adoration."

She laughed and tugged on him enough to get across the idea that she wants to be facing him, and these days it's just easier for him to scoot to the other side of her than it is for her to roll over. So he did, and she smiled, saying, "Baby, you're good at sex. That's the fantasy of women who hooked-up with men who are bad in bed."

He laughed at that. "We'll get through."

"We'll? I didn't notice Dr. Draz saying you couldn't get off."

"She didn't say I needed to cut caffeine out of my diet, either. I did that. I'm doing this, too. You don't get to get off, I don't, either."

"You're going to give up sex? For twelve days?" Abby looked stupefied by that.

He grins his sexy grin at her. "Unless you want me to give you a show, yeah, I am."
She closes her eyes and seems to be thinking about that, then sighs, and says, "No. Too much temptation, too frustrating." She's quiet for a minute. "Why?"

"Why?" He's not getting why this isn't self-evident.

"Yeah. Why? Last I checked you really, really like sex, and you don't have to do this."

He strokes his palm across her cheek, tangling his fingers in her hair, then trailing his fingers down her throat to her shoulder. "Last I checked, you don't like it any less than I do, and you're right, I love sex! But if you don't get to have it because it's necessary to keep our baby safe, then I don't either."

She smiles at him, sweet and warm, and then kisses him, gently. "You think you can go twelve days?"

"Fourteen really, and two down, twelve to go, and we'll find out. I mean, just because I haven't since… God… 1989 doesn't mean I can't. You think you can make it?"

"I have to. And I have done this before, that one Lent."

"Let me guess, that was a really good Easter for you."

She smiles. "I remember enjoying it."

He laughs at that. "Look, I know exactly what I'm doing that first shower after Kelly's on the outside, but… You're already going through a whole hell of a lot more on this make-babies thing than I am, so, well, I can do this."

She kisses the tip of his nose and then grinned. "Eight days."

"What?"

"That's how long I think you're gonna last."

"I'm not going to cheat!" He looks mocked appalled. He knows that mostly they're kidding around. Though he is going to do this, because he can, and because it matters, and just, well, it's really not fair and it really sucks that she has to do this, so she shouldn't have to do it alone.

"Sure. You're going to sleep naked, cuddled up against me every night, and not jerk off when you're alone."

"That's the plan."

"Uh huh." She's not buying it.

"Your faith in me is overwhelming," he says dryly.

"Hey, you're the one telling me you haven't gone more than a week since you were eleven."

"Well, okay, yeah. But I haven't had any reason to not go more than a week. I've got a reason now."

"Okay."

"So, massage, kissing, petting?"

"Definitely massage. Play kissing and petting by ear?"
He hasn't really made out, just messing around, no expectation that sex would result since... high school. And he's never been a jerk about it, basically his set of rules for sex go something like this: she sets the boundaries, I follow them, and if she set the line at no sex, then he took what she was willing to give and didn't push.

But since high school, he's pretty much dated girls who followed the first-two-dates-expect-kissing-and-if-things-are-going-well-sex-on-the-third rule, and just making out wasn't really part of the experience.

Pretty much, if he got to second base, he was going to slide into home, too.

And for the most part that made him awfully happy.

So, this is different.

And it's not like he and Abby aren't affectionate in non-sex ways. Not like there isn't plenty of kissing and cuddling and petting and it doesn't result in sex.

Or maybe it's like all of it results in sex. Like for them sex is just an ongoing constant with highs and lulls, but all of it is sex.

And perhaps this is a redefining of sex. Abby moaning breathily while he rubs her calves, taking the time to really get into those sore muscles and work on helping the swelling go down certainly feels good to him. And it's not the same sort of good as hearing her moan like that when he slips into her, but... it's not precisely different, either.

It's all pleasure and love and the bond holding them to each other no matter what might come.

He smiles up at her, looking away from her leg, and asks, "When you were in school did they have those lists of like 100 ways to show love that aren't sex?"

She gives him a very perplexed look. "You know, California and Louisiana really aren't the same place at all."

"I'll take that as a no."

"Why would you need something like that? When I was in school they didn't think we needed help to figure out how to express affection without sex."

"Supposedly to help cut down on teen pregnancy and combat STDs or something."

"Did it work?"

"I remember us mocking it viciously, and those of us who could more or less running out to get laid as quickly as possible out of spite."

That gets a laugh out of Abby. "And the next two weeks has you thinking about that?"

"Yeah."

"Any good suggestions on the list?"
"I remember making cookies together and buying diamonds was on the list."

"I'm in favor of cookies. And really, buying diamonds? Because sixteen-year-olds always have that kind of cash laying around."

"I'm not sixteen anymore, got some cash now." He smiled at her on that, and then added, "And yeah, mocked it viciously! It did appear to have been written by people who had never had sex or had never been teenagers, let alone teen males, but, the main idea, that sex wasn't the end all and be all of love, I was thinking about that."

She nods. "And…"

"And maybe there's not really a line. Maybe that's what they got wrong, and why that list felt so stupid. Maybe it's all sex, or all love, or… I don't know." He's having a hard time coming up with words for the nebulous concept bouncing around in his head. "I know this is going to be frustrating, but pulling completely away, not touching at all, not making love, it'd be so lonely." He ran his hand up her leg, rippling his knuckles along the belly of her calf, coaxing another happy moan out of her. "That's so good. And okay, it's not the same good, but it is the same good, right?"

"Different branches of the same tree."

He smiles, liking that idea. "Yeah." She'd been sitting, back against their headboard, and he'd been sitting cross-legged at her feet, one foot in his lap, the other leg bent at the knee as he worked on it. He gently took her foot out of his lap, and scooted around so he could sit next to her, right arm and leg behind her, cuddling her close, left hand on her face, left leg stretched along hers.

"My body craves yours." He stroked his hand along her shoulder and arm. "But it's not just that, not just this," and the way he's touching her leg gets across the idea that "this" means her body, "I wouldn't crave it, wouldn't need it, if you weren't in it. But since you are, I do, all the time."

She traced her fingers over his face, feather light touches across his cheek and jaw, thumb trailing over his lip. He's not a lot taller than she is, but most of the difference is in torso length, so her face is a good two inches below his, but light pressure on the back of his head got across the idea that she wanted to kiss him, so he lowered his face to hers, and she did kiss him, soft and slow and thorough.

And like anytime they really touch he feels it, the gathering of pleasure, the desire for more, the electric joy of her skin on his, the comfort of another heart that cherishes his, all of it is there.

And it is frustrating, because limits are frustrating. But the sweetness of making love to each other is worth the frustration.

"You're staring." Abby says, not opening her eyes. It's hours later, post dinner, post cookies (and yeah, it wasn't sex, but it was fun and awfully tasty), they're lying in bed (again). She's trying to sleep, but the small squirming person inside her is making that difficult, and the feel of Tim's eyes glued to her stomach (he had been writing) isn't helping.

"She's moving."

"I know, I can feel it."

"Yeah, but I can see it, and that's new." His hand lands on her stomach, resting gently. Then his finger traced down the outside of her stomach as Kelly kicked or stretched or whatever at the same time from the inside. "She's really in there."

Abby smiles a little, filing this under things guys don't really get because it doesn't happen to them, and says, "Yeah, she is."
Sublimation

Sublimation is the ability to divert your desire for something, say sex, into some other action.

Tim's been sublimating the ever living shit out of his sex drive.

He's got protocols set for all of the computer searches he usually runs for when he goes on leave. Draga may not be able to jump into investigating and crime scene work ten minutes after getting to NCIS, but he will be able to run any search Tim usually does. (Actually, with the level of detail Tim's got on these protocols, Gibbs will be able to run the searches.)

He's really going after their case. He's even leaving Gibbs in the dust on occasion, which is actually kind of frightening to Tony and Ziva, because Tim's supposed to be the laid-back one, and right now Tim couldn't locate laid-back with a GPS and a team of skilled trackers.

If they gave out modern, sensitive, caring, doting husband awards, he'd be in the running for gold. (Seriously, the three new LabRats keep staring at him as he continually bops down with little treats for Abby, wondering how he's got time for it all, when they aren't wishing he wasn't trying to teach them how to do their jobs. Yes, Major Mass Spec is tetchy, but they're lab techs, all with multiple advanced degrees in this subject, they do not need some field agent hovering around telling them how to talk to the equipment.)

He's gotten sixteen chapters of the latest Deep Six written.

And he's gotten really obsessed about making the perfect glass of iced-coffee.

And okay, he's not quite as annoyed or tense as he was in Afghanistan, but it's also only day six.

Shower time is the hardest part of the day, and he means that in the sense of both difficult and stiff. Traditionally, if he's still got a hard on by the time he gets into the shower, he takes care if it while washing up.

And he still needs to wash up.

So, it's not like he can just ignore it and let it wither.

And really, it's not like he can just sort of wash around it and hope getting wet is enough. Okay, he could do that, but he's personally fastidious and finds that idea really gross.

So, he's found himself thinking, several times, of the sage advice: that if you shake it more than twice, you're playing with yourself. He assumes that's true for washing off, too. So the application of soap has been somewhat perfunctory, but enough to get the job done. And, he has noticed that he's keeping the water temperature a lot lower than he likes as encouragement to get out of there fast.

Male physiology and female physiology is not precisely the same thing. Specifically women do not have prostates.

And, granted, he's not a women, so he's not sure if there is some sort of female analog to this (though he doesn't see how there could be) but his body is sending him some very clear signals along the lines of 'Gosh, now would be a very good time to just clear the pipes out' by way of what feels like a very full, very swollen, and very sensitive prostate.

Now, normally, when he's feeling this, it's because Abby's playing with it and he's maybe, at most, an hour or two away from getting off. Usually he's a whole lot closer. And when Abby's playing with him, this is a very welcome sensation because he knows it means he's going to cum like a geyser when he gets off, and that's always a very good thing.

And, look, he read Cryptonomicon and thought that section where Waterhouse didn't get any privacy for six weeks in a row which resulted in him being very aware of his prostate the whole time was really funny.

Living it, feeling this way 24/7 is significantly less funny.

It's also producing some side effects that are highly reminiscent of junior high, and he's really not appreciating the fact that just standing up too fast can result in his clothing rubbing against him in a way that will produce a hard-on.

And while it's true that he's actively sublimating the hell out of his sex drive (or trying at least) it's also true that he's letting Breena and Jimmy head to the pool with Abby, because he'd rather gouge out his eyeballs than do anything disrespectful toward Abby, and well, if he's at the pool, where the girls in the tiny, wet bikinis are, he's going to have to gouge out his eyeballs to avoid that, and really, he needs his eyes.

Jimmy asks him about it on Saturday after dinner. (Nine days down, five to go.) He'd taken the three girls to the pool. Tim stayed home to "write" and was in charge of dinner. After the meal, he and Jimmy take care of dishes while the girls commiserate about how not fun being pregnant is while Molly sleeps in what will very soon be Kelly's room.

"So, really, you stayed home to write?" Jimmy asks, taking a wet pot from Tim and starting to dry it.

"Yes. Been writing a whole lot lately." He scrubbing away on the forks. (Doing dishes by hand also got added to the sublimating to-do list.) "I've got hard deadlines for my books, you know."

"Uh huh."

"And I don't know how much time I'll have for it after Kelly's born."

Jimmy nods. "True."

"So. I want to get as much done as I can."

"Makes sense. Total bullshit, but it makes sense. Come on, why are you hiding?"

Tim puts the scrubby down, and starts rinsing the forks. "Because I'm the idiot who swore off sex when his wife went on pelvic rest, but didn't stop making out with her."

Jimmy laughs. "God, no wonder you're climbing the walls." Jimmy rubs his shoulder, which is still sore from last week, realizing there's a reason why Tim was so… energetic… at Bootcamp last Sunday. That leads to the sinking suspicion he's going to get killed tomorrow.
Tim smiles, appreciating that Jimmy gets what he means by swore off sex. "Just got to make it to Thursday."

Jimmy laughs at that, too. "Nothing says classy like running off two seconds after your kid's born to jerk off. Friday, Tim, maybe Saturday. Trust me, you'll be busy."

"Wonderful." Tim hands over the forks, and Jimmy sticks them in the dishwasher, flashing him a look that says you've got one of these for a reason. Tim rolls his eyes. "I'm suddenly feeling some empathy for Tony. Wonder if he just never takes care of it himself. 'Cause I know I've been looking at all of them, all the time, and thinking about every woman I lay eyes on. Not just the pretty ones, I mean, if there's better than even odds the person in front of me doesn't have a penis, I'm interested."

Jimmy laughs, full out, wiping the tears from his eyes, laughs at that. When he calms himself down he follows the logic of Tim's statement, stares at him, eyes slightly narrowed, as he says, "Wait, you're really watching Breena?"

Tim shoots him a look of bewilderment that Jimmy even needs to ask that. "What, did you just meet me? Of course I'm watching her! And Ziva. Vance's secretary. Gladys in Accounting. All of those nameless girls that wander about the building. And Abby, mostly Abby, but yeah, all of them."

He takes three steps to the left, and drags Jimmy along. There's no direct line of sight from their kitchen into the living room where the girls are. There is a good view of the dining room window which reflects whatever's in front of the TV, and in this case, that's Abby and Breena on the sofa, Breena's rubbing Abby's hips, and they're both in the sundresses they changed into after leaving the pool. Abby's is long and black, but pretty low cut. Breena's is short, pink, with a halter top. Lots of beautiful soft, round, succulent pregnant female anatomy in light-golden tan and rose tinged cream is on display, and it's killing Tim. "You tell me you're not looking at that and liking it, and I will hit you and call you a liar. And if you even try to tell me you spent four hours in the pool with both of them in little, wet bathing suits and didn't look and didn't like looking, then you're not just gay, you're dead!"

Jimmy smiles, looking amused and a little guilty. "Okay, yeah, that was nice. Breena's got a new bikini. Shame you missed it."

Tim groans quietly, eyes closed, trying not to imagine it, which is just as successful as not imagining the pink elephant after someone tells you not to, and finally says, "Yeah, well, unlike you, I'm not getting laid tonight, so I don't need to be any more wound up than I already am."

Jimmy laughs at that, too. "So, nothing at all?"

"Fooling around, but she can't get off, so I'm not either."

"I'm sorry, I shouldn't laugh, but…"

"Hey, it's not easy for her, either."

"I guess not." And it occurs to Jimmy that it might not just be being eight months pregnant that has Abby on such a short fuse lately. "So what are you going to do tonight?"

"Pray she goes into labor."

That makes Jimmy laugh, too.
There is a point in every pregnancy, though it differs from woman to woman and pregnancy to pregnancy, where everything becomes uncomfortable.

This point is when pregnancy stops being measured in weeks and starts to be measured in years.

And thus, somewhere around twenty years pregnant, which may have felt like thirty or thirty-four or whatever weeks the day before, everything on earth becomes an annoyance.

Everything.

And clothing, which must press up close against the now multiple years-long pregnant woman's body, is the worst offender. No matter how sheer, how light, how comfortable the clothing looks, wearing it is sheer torture. The item of clothing in question could be a caftan made of spider silk, and it would still be annoying.

And only two things make that torture worse: A: summer heat, which just adds to the general desire to say fuck it, I'll go naked, and B: looking at your pregnant-self naked and deciding you'd rather scratch out your eyes than see yourself like that again.

And fine, maybe not every woman goes through this. Abby's not exactly conducting a scientific poll here, but she certainly is going through it, and Breena certainly did, and that's enough for her to declare that this is a universal constant, and one that sucks mightily.

And if Breena's right, it isn't getting better anytime soon, because, sure Kelly could show up any day, but really, she's still five days off. Or, by the way time is passing right now, eighty-seven years.

Having gotten to this point in the pregnancy, Abby has come to several conclusions: A: She's never doing this again. They want more babies, Tim can figure out how to get himself pregnant. B: Clothing manufacturers are sadistic assholes. C: Summer is evil. D: Their air conditioning is not nearly powerful enough. E: Kelly better hurry the hell up and show up soon. F: Tim needs to stop giving her big, sad puppy dog eyes every time she snaps at him because that just makes her feel sad and guilty on top of mad. And G: EVERYTHING IN THE ENTIRE UNIVERSE SUCKS!

She's expounding on this topic at great length when Breena gives her a long hug, rubs her back a little, and says, "I've thrown up four times today. The pharmacy ran out of my anti-nausea meds, so I'm on the second best version until Monday. It'll get better soon, and it's not nearly as bad as it could be." And that kind of took the wind out of her sails.

Abby looks at Breena, sighs, and says, "I know. I just hate this!"

"Every woman does. This part has to suck otherwise you won't decide that trying to get the kid out, which isn't a walk in the park, is worth it no matter how much it hurts."

The sound of Jimmy laughing hysterically in the kitchen stops their conversation. Breena looks at Abby, shaking her head. "What do you think they're talking about?"

"That kind of laugh? They're talking about sex or making fun of Tony, or making fun of Tony when it comes to sex. Did I tell you Tim laughed so hard he cried when I told him what I added to the honeymoon pack?"

"Yeah. So did Jimmy. Though Ziva told me they had a good time with those books."

"Yay! I didn't hear back on if he used anything from what I added."

"He did. She approved of that, too. Though, I think she told him it was us adding the things we liked best and thought any guy really needed to know how to do."

"Ahhh… If it kept his ego happy and let her have a good time, it's all good."

"Yep."

A few seconds later, Tim and Jimmy come into the living room from the kitchen. Breena looks up at them, smiling, and says, "Sounded like you were having fun in there."

Jimmy sits next to Breena, wrapping his arm around her and kisses her. "Always. So, we should probably get going. Molly wakes up at six no matter what. She doesn't get the idea of Sunday."

"Sounds good. You wanna go grab her?"

"Sure." Jimmy scoots next to Abby to give her a goodbye hug, and then heads up to get Molly. Breena hugs Abby and Tim, and a minute later they head off, quietly, sleeping toddler snuggled onto Jimmy's shoulder.

Tim sits on the sofa next to Abby, hand resting on her belly. Her fingers lace with his. And as annoying as being pregnant is, as much as everything hurts and five days from now some really scary stuff is going to happen, she can see Molly on Jimmy's shoulder, and the image of Tim carrying Kelly is hitting her really hard. So, she's crying a little, snuggling against him.

He pets her hair, not sure what's going on, but that's not exactly something new these days. She'll tell him when she gets herself under control.

And she does. The c-section is scheduled for the 18th. Assuming it goes well, they'll get to go home on the 21st. Which means eight days from now, Tim will walk into this house with her, carrying their baby cuddled against his chest.

And damn if that doesn't make his eyes tear up a little, too.
It's so good.

She's hot and wet and wrapped around him, and it's just so fucking good. He's standing up and has his arms under her legs, his body and the wall keeping her up, and it's hot and fast and deep, so, so deep, balls deep, buried in her body, every millimeter of his cock in soft, wet, hot, glorious, tight pussy, and they're going full out against the wall and she can kiss him and her hands are clenched in his hair as her lips move over his and her breasts rub against his chest, and it's all so good.

It's better than good. This is just ten million shades of marvelous, and it's better than sex has ever been and he's just so high and tight and turned on and hard, so hard, never been this hard, his eyelashes are hard, pounding into her, and she's riding him back just as fast, moaning his name, scratching his back bloody as she cries against him, coming in hot, clenching waves of pleasure.

She's on her back, missionary style, one leg over his shoulder, the other wrapped around his back, heel on his thigh. It's as fast as he can go, relentless, thrusting over and over, burying himself in her, chasing a blazing orgasm that's barely inches away.

And he feels so incredible. Like his whole body is going to come. Like every cell's about to tingle and pulse.

So tight, she's a hot, slick vise, perfect friction, perfect pressure, so incredibly good, so close, wanting, moving, so hard he hurts, not quite there, almost, almost.

Her hand slides behind him, rubbing, cupping his balls and he's a whole level higher. Didn't think he could get more turned on than he is, but he was wrong. So hot, so hard, so wanting, needing.

Fast, hot, slick, wet, velvet, silk, tight and thrust.

Her fingers find their target, slicking and rubbing, pulsing him from the inside as her body slips over his on the outside. Blinding white hot pleasure pressure to go with fast and hard and hot and slick and tight and it's just the best orgasm ever, he's riding high on wet, thrusting pulses and scorching tingles through his whole body and God he's never, ever felt this good and…

"Tim! Wake up! Water broke!"

He's still three quarters in the dream, aware that something really important is happening, but he's also still coming and between that and sleep he's having a really hard time figuring out what's going on so, blinking at Abby, he says, "Huh?"

Abby pokes him, hard. "Water broke. Kelly's coming. We have to get to the hospital now!"

Okay, that gets the brain re-engaged. "Okay," he's springing into action, hopping out of their bed, crossing over to her side to help her out, when something hits him. Namely, he has a piece of information that Abby, who had also been sleeping, probably doesn't. "How wet are you?"
"What?"

"Is it just your ass and the back of your thighs?"

She thinks about that, seems to be doing a little mental checking. "Yeah."

It's dark in their room so she can't see the fact that he's blushing like crazy. (Of course, even if the lights were on, he's also covered in a sex flush, so she would have missed the blush, but would have seen the cum dripping off of him and figured this out a little sooner.)

"Taste it."

"What?" Her voice sounds like he's completely lost it and she's not appreciating him going utterly insane right this second of all seconds.

"No orgasms. You cheated."

"Huh?" He can't begin to think of what she means.

"No orgasms. You cheated."

"Oh. "I was asleep."

She's not buying that, and he can feel it coming off her skin without her having to say anything.
"If I had cheated, that wouldn't have happened. That hasn't happened since before I figured out how to jerk off, and trust me, that wasn't something that took me long to figure out."

She snorts a quick laugh at that. "Good dream?"

"Oh, God, yes!"

"How good?"

"Well, I got off without any touching, so pretty damn good."

"What were we doing?"

"If I answer that, is that a good thing, or is that a-get-you-horny-and-frustrated type of thing. 'Cause, if I fall off the wagon here, nothing happens. You do, and the results may be more troublesome than wet sheets."

She groans. "Give me a general answer, and then I'll try to go back to sleep."

"Fucking each other so hard we were shaking the paint off the walls."

"Oh." That's a half moan half sigh all yes I want that NOW!

"Yeah. One day, soon, Kelly will be out, and you'll be all healed up, and Breena and Jimmy are going to babysit, and we're going to fuck until we can't anymore."

"That sounds go good."

"It will be." He kisses her shoulder. "And, sooner yet, when she's out, and there's no more danger, I will tell you all about it, every, single, scorching hot detail, and that time, we'll go soft and slow and just get used to it again, and that's going to be good, too."

She kisses him back and says, "Soon."

They lay together quietly. He is settling back into sleep again when she asks, "So, how did you figure it out?"

"Huh?"

"How to jerk off. Said it didn't take you long to figure it out. How'd you figure it out?"

He rubs his eyes. "Ummm…" And thinks back. Obviously, there was a time he didn't know how to do it, but the memory of that time is awfully fuzzy. After a few seconds, it clicks. "Oh. Yeah. So, would have been eleven, and…well…okay, look, if you're an eleven-year-old guy, you're basically an erection on legs. It's poking up all the time and anything and nothing at all will cause one. And the whole time that's happening it feels like there's a massive spotlight on your crotch showing everyone on Earth that you've got a constant hard-on."

She laughs at that.

"It really wasn't fun."

"I believe you. Still, I was at a sleepover when I got my first period, with all my friends, and bled all over the place, and of course my friend's mom wasn't home, just her dad, so…for some reason I'm just not feeling overwhelming sympathy to what was, in fact, a not wildly visible problem on your part."
"Fine, you win the puberty sucks contest. Still, wasn't much fun."

"Okay."

"Anyway, eventually, your eleven-year-old-male body takes care of the issue with some fairly intense dreams and waking up, horrified, with your pajamas glued to you. Oh, and yeah, telling your friend’s dad 'I just started my period' probably wasn't fun, but I suddenly had all of this extra laundry, and the person who did the laundry was my mom, my Catholic mom, my Catholic mom, who has never, not once, in the almost 38 years I've known her, mentioned sex in my presence. In fact, the only reason I knew what was going on was one, brief, and horrendously uncomfortable conversation with my very Catholic grandfather about the 'facts of life' and how certain things would start happening to me soon, and that I should really just try to ignore it and channel my energies in 'more constructive directions.'"

"Okay, I'll give you a tie on the puberty sucks award."

"Thank you. So, it's the middle of the night, I'm in wet, sticky, clammy pajamas, and have to do something about it. Can't just shove them in the laundry hamper because she washes my clothing and, well, it's got a pretty distinctive smell, and… yeah… got to figure something out. We were in this little bungalow house and her room and bathroom were downstairs. So, I creep off to the bathroom I shared with Sarah, pushed her tubby toys out of the way, put the pajamas in the sink to soak, and just wiped everything off.

"Okay, another thing about eleven-year-old-boys, they're not great on personal hygiene. They're usually still in the I-hate-baths phase of life. In fact, if I had to guess, this is the moment that ends the I-hate-baths phase of most guys' lives. So, first time it happens I take care of it with some toilet paper and leave it be.

"But I'm a eleven-year-old guy, so this isn't just a one-time thing. Second time it happened, I did sleep through it and woke up, usual time, awfully crusty and literally glued to my pjs. And if there's something you don't want to do, it's yanking PJs that are cemented to your privates off.

"So, second time, into the shower I go. Thinking that if I get the PJs wet I can sort of peel them off. Anyway, I'm in there, slowly peeling the PJs off, and I noticed that felt pretty good, so once they were off I kept messing around.

"And, soap, warm water, hard-on, and yeah, it didn't take too long to figure out that if I was…” he pauses for a second to think of a good way to describe this, "thorough and vigorous in my washing technique that showers were a whole lot more fun, and I stopped having problems with sticky pajamas."

Abby laughs at that.

"And suddenly I no longer needed to be badgered to get showers. I was perfectly happy to do it as many times a day as I could. In fact I was starting to get lectured about using up too much hot water and how washing up three times a day wasn't good for my skin, which decided right about then was a good time to turn traitor and make my life miserable, but that's not really related to this."

Abby laughs at that too, taking his hand in hers and kissing his palm.

"Thank you."

"For what?"

"I needed a good laugh."
He kisses her shoulder. "Anytime, baby, anytime. So, how about you? How'd you figure it out."

Abby sighs. "It's a dumb story."

"I like dumb stories."

"Okay. So, I'm eighteen—"

"Hold up. You were eighteen when you figured it out?"

"Yeah."

"You were having sex with other people before you started having sex with yourself?"

"I was eighteen before I got myself off. I'd messed around before that, but didn't manage to do it."

"How is that possible?" He gets up, circles around their bed, and settles in front of her, wanting to have this conversation face to face without making her have to roll over.

Once he's on his side, facing her, she says, "Everything I could find focused on penetration, but that didn't do it for me and no one I knew had any real information about girls getting off."

"Really?" He looks utterly stunned by this.

"No, I'm making this up because I enjoy you staring at me in stupefaction. Yes, really. Quick, off the top of your head, tell me some pop culture reference about a girl masturbating?"

It takes a second but he comes up with something. "That song, 'When I think about you I touch myself.'"

"I was a sophomore in college when that came out, so that's got to be '91 or '92."

"Huh."

"Can you think of anything else, let alone anything that might be specific enough to be useful?"

He really thought about it, but… he was fourteen the year she was eighteen and his mom and dad were awfully strict about what he was allowed to watch or read. Sure, he snuck things, but nothing is springing to mind. "Ummm… nope."

"Yeah, and if there was, I didn't know about it. I mean, we all knew guys did it. Plenty of jokes about that. But, not so much on what to do about if you're a girl."

"Didn't you… get horny?"

"Sure. A lot."

"What'd you do about it?"

"Be really frustrated. Read Anne Rice books, which since I didn't know about the Beauty books, was pretty frustrating too. Probably should have read romance novels or Cosmo or something, probably would have let me know what target I should have been shooting for, but, they just always seemed so dumb, I couldn't make myself do it. Made out with boyfriends, also frustrating. Got some tattoos. Partied with Paulette. Messed around with myself, but didn't find the trick to it. Lots of 'intense dreams' as you put it. Got to college, met a guy, liked him enough to have sex with him and it was, well, okay. But if you're a girl, the idea is that sex, penetration, is supposed to get you off, but for most of us it doesn't work that way. So, when I was messing around with myself, I didn't know what target I was aiming for.

"But while I didn't have much on female masturbation, pretty much everything agrees that sex is supposed to be a whole lot of fun. And I knew I wasn't frigid. I wanted it to be good. I was certainly eager for it. I knew there had to be a way to make it better. And he did, too, so one day he asked me to show him what I did with myself, and I didn't have an answer for that, because I really wasn't doing myself, which blew his mind, because, like you, he'd been doing himself for years and couldn't believe I wasn't."

"Yeah, well, it's kind of hard to believe. If you're a guy it's like figuring out how to breathe or blink. We're all pretty good with it on automatic."

"Wonderful. I'm taking back the puberty sucks award."

He nods along with that, saying, "And I think it's clear you absolutely deserve it."

She sticks out her tongue at him, and he very lightly licks it.

"Look, I would have gone insane if I hadn't gotten off until I was 18."

She smiles at that. "Yeah, well, I probably wouldn't have had any trouble figuring it out myself if it had been six and a half inches long and sticking straight up in front of me."

He flashes her his self-depreciating look. "I was eleven, not nearly that big then."

"Was it the size of a clit?"

"No."

"I rest my point."

He chuckled a little at that, resting his hand on her belly, feeling Kelly squirm a bit. "So, you're 18. He's asking you for pointers, and you didn't have any."

"Exactly. But New Orleans was only a few hours away. So one Saturday we caught the bus, headed down, found a sex shop and bought out the instruction manuals."

"Jimmy's got a story like that, too."

"Really?" Her eyes light up at that idea. "I haven't heard that story."

"Yeah, though his version of it involves hitting on the library girl while asking her to get the books on inter-library loan."

"Oh, God! I am so going to have to ask him about that. Anyway, we got the books, we read, we tried, and finally knowing what to aim for, figuring it out got a whole lot easier."

"Huh. Never thought about that."

"Yeah, well, when did you figure out how to get a girl off?"

"This might be another difference between California and Louisiana, but Sex Ed class in eighth grade had full-on sketches of the anatomy, what was what, and what it all did. I mean, I didn't know what to do with a clit until I was twenty-one and actually had a real girlfriend, but I knew they existed and why they existed long before that."
Abby thinks about that. She did have health class in eighth grade, and remembered the curriculum being mostly how babies were made, menstruation, and don't ever have any sex at all until you get married because there's his horrible new disease out there and we don't know a whole lot about it but if you get it, you'll die. "Or it could be our age difference showing. For all I know, that might have been standard for eighth grade, when you got there, but that was the year I was a senior in high school."

"Could be."

"So, really, three times a day?"

He smiles at her, chuckling. "More than that sometimes; that's just what I was doing in the shower. All of us have a story about the time we decided snag mom's Victoria's Secret catalog and locked ourselves in the bathroom to see how many times we could do it until we couldn't anymore."

That makes her laugh. "So, if we ever have any boys, I'm thinking they'll be in charge of doing their own laundry about the time they turn ten."

"Yeah, that would have headed off a lot of embarrassment. Or at least not asking them about it if they suddenly feel a burning need to do their own laundry. You ever hear Tony's story about that?"

"Tony's got a story about that?"

"Oh yeah." He's got a wicked grin on his face. That was a pretty late-night (somewhat inebriated) conversation between him, Tony, and Palmer, and it was awfully funny and made Tim very glad he'd never been at boarding school. "Dealing with mom is one thing. Boarding school, where you've got no privacy, and get issued two pairs of pajamas and one set of sheets per week is a whole other story."

That gets another laugh. "Poor boy."

"Yeah."

She squeezes his hand. "I should try to get some more sleep."

"Okay."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So, in Shardsverse Tim would have hit eight grade in the '90-'91 school year, which means Abby got there in '86-'87. The biggest difference between those two years is that Abby would have hit 8th grade at the height of the AIDS panic when basically no one really knew what the hell was going on but lots of people were dying, and Tim hit 8th grade at the beginning of the Safe Sex trend. So, while it's possible she would have gotten information like 'Gay Cancer' and 'We don't know exactly how it spreads, but it seems to have something to do with sex and blood,' Tim was in the class that was putting condoms on bananas.
Maternity leave feels really strange.

Abby's not sick, she's not doing something else like vacation or getting ready for a wedding or taking care of Tim.

She's just home.

Resting.

And it feels really odd.

Like usual, a minute before the alarm goes off she hits it and spends a few more minutes snuggling with Tim, and then they go off script. Usually they both get up, some mornings (depending on how long and intense snuggling was) they get a shower together, some mornings he gets his shower while she handles breakfast for them, then gets hers after they eat. But usually somehow the clock rolls from 6:20 to 7:30 when they leave for work.

This morning, he gets up, gets his shower, and she just lays there, dozing. She's tired. She'd really like to be sleeping, but everything hurts after a few minutes in any given position and getting from one position to another is such an effort that she can't really keep shifting around easily enough to stay comfortable, so she can't really sleep.

She watches him get dressed (always a treat) and he brings her some breakfast, and then heads off to work.

So she's home, alone, with nothing to do, and it just feels really weird.

She thinks about going to the pool, but getting dressed, getting into the car, driving all the way there, and then walking across the parking lot seems like more effort than it's worth. Though that does remind her of movies in the tub, and without Tim in there, she could probably get the water deep enough to float a little, and maybe that would let her get a decent nap.

It's worth a shot.

"The set up right now is temporary. Once Gibbs retires we'll rearrange again," Tim's saying as he shows Draga his new desk.

"It'll work. Now what?"

"Paperwork." Tim already has the stack of mandatory paperwork all new NCIS hires have to fill out on Draga's desk.

Draga looks at it, and cocks an eyebrow. "Let me guess they want everything but my cholesterol count?"

"I think that's on the 55-88-A."

"Purple one, half way down. They also want your resting heart rate, blood pressure, height to waist ratio, and a few other things, something about the Federal Wellness Initiative," Tony adds as he and Ziva walk into the bullpen. Draga doesn't look like he's sure if Tony is kidding or not. Tony got that line off deadpan enough that if it wasn't for the fact that Tim knows he made up the 55-88-A he'd have bought it. "Everything look comfortable?"

"Yeah. Compared to a cockpit this is tons of space to work in."

Tony nods. "Then get to it. Until those are done, you're not allowed to be on a case."

Gibbs breezes by, clipboard in hand, dropping it on Draga's stack of paperwork. "Bring 'em with ya. Dead sailor in Appomattox."

And like every other time, they all grab their go bags.

Gibbs looks at Tim and shakes his head. "Not you. You're staying here. Appomattox is three hours away." Gibbs hands Tim a sticky note with the vic's name, Robert Simms, on it. "Financials, phone records, you know the drill."

"On it."

Abby gets a text around lunchtime. Gibbs grounded me.

Sent you to your room?

:) Dead body out of Appomattox. They went off to investigate. I'm here running data.

Keeping you close to home.

Looks like it.

Anyway, for once I'm going to have the data dealt with before they even get back with a body. Looks like I've got a pretty good shot of being home for dinner, anything you want?

Not really. Been feeling kind of nauseous all day.

Sorry to hear it.

Yeah.

Contractions?

Nothing worth mentioning. Two in the last hour. It's just often enough to keep me from really sleeping.

All be done soon.

Thank GOD!

Let me know if you think of anything you want.

Will do. XOXOXOXO

Love you.
An hour later, he's flashing a text to Tony. Simms kept sending texts to a burner phone.

What about?

No clue. It's a code I haven't cracked. Looks like a book code though.

So you want every book in the house, too.

Wouldn't hurt. Though if you feel like really looking, narrowing it down to the books that look like they get used a lot would be worthwhile. There's a ton of these texts, so unless Simms had the book memorized, he had to use it a lot.

You know, I think you've just found Draga's first real assignment. I bet he'd be good at that.

I think you're right on that.

Anything interesting in the financials?

Still working on it. BofA's being pissy about not having a proper notification of death since Ducky and Jimmy aren't back yet.

Half an hour later, Tim gets a text from Draga. Anything to suggest Simms had any connection to Iowa?

Iowa?

Yeah. I'm looking at a Fodor's Iowa and either Simms was exhaustively researching vacation plans or this is the code book.

Nothing in anything I've got suggest any connection to Iowa. Give me the ISBN.

Ten digits flash up on Tim's phone.

Thanks. I'll go see if there's a copy locally. Be careful with it, we're going to go over it with a fine tooth comb for trace and prints.

No problem.

He sends the next text to the whole team: Broke the code. Simms was buying something, a lot of it, and selling it, probably on base. Financials show he had storage unit in Norfolk.

Tony: Norfolk?

McGee: He's stationed out of Norfolk.
Gibbs: What was he doing in Appomattox?

McGee: Mom died two years ago. It used to be her house. He inherited it.

Ziva: Any ID on the burner phone?

McGee: Nope. And its old enough I can't even trace where it was sold. Whoever has it bought it like ten years ago.

Draga: Flip phone?

McGee: Maybe or a really old flat one.

Nothing pops up on his screen for several minutes so he sends another one to the whole team: ???

Ziva: Draga noticed that the bystander who found the body had a flip phone.

McGee: Got a name?

Ziva: Alvin Burns

McGee: Send me a picture of him. I'm on it.

Half an hour after that, he knows one thing, whoever the bystander was, his name isn't Alvin Burns. No one even remotely resembling the guy he has a picture of is called Alvin Burns. But he has Tom and Co. in the lab searching the facial recognition software for a match.

He sends his next text to Gibbs. Guy who found the body isn't named Alvin Burns.

Got an ID?

Not yet. Lab's working on it. He touch anything?

Borrowed Ziva's pen.

We can run prints when you get back.

Good. Go home Tim.

???

Day's done for you. Go home.

Only six, Jethro.

I know. Go home.

On it.
“You want me to stay home?” Tim asks.

Abby shrugs. It’s June 16th, she’s been having annoying contractions all night, one here, another there, three in four minutes, two hours of nothing, six more in an hour, nothing for two more hours, one every twenty minutes, nothing.

Pretty much the only thing that’s happening is she’s not sleeping and she’s irritable and annoyed.

They’re not even hard enough to hurt, not really. Just enough to jolt up the adrenaline, with “Now? Are we ready, now? Is it hospital time, now?” But they always keep petering out before three hours of somewhat steadyish contractions.

“Go. Catch bad guys. No reason for both of us to be sitting here going stir crazy.”

“Okay. You get to two hours of them, let me know.”

“Trust me, if it looks like we’re getting close to go time, I’ll text.”

“Good.” He kisses her, pets Kelly, and heads toward the Navy Yard.

They’re on day two of an active case. Which is kind of interesting because Gibbs won’t let him leave the Navy Yard. To some degree it makes sense, the crime scene is in Appomattox, which isn’t exactly a ten minute drive away. But he’s never been quiet so firmly tied to one place.

So, Ziva and Draga are off in western VA, picking up “Alvin Burns” aka Patrick Harper, their current number one suspect for the guy who pulled the trigger. He’s searching through Harper’s financials, finds something hinky, and then gets to sit there and wait until Gibbs and Tony go fetch Dick Sharpe, who may indeed be the linchpin of this whole thing.

Since he’s the one who found the money trail, he’s the one who’s getting to run interrogation on this one.

Sharpe doesn’t exactly have the hardened criminal look. But Tim doesn’t exactly look like a veteran cop, either.

Pretty much they’re two tech guys, in a small room, with a table between them. Tim’s got what looked like a murder but was rapidly turning into a drug running deal gone bad. Sharpe wants to make sure Tim never gets the confirmation on that.

Time to play.
Time to play.

They spend a good hour of just messing around. Getting their feet wet. Sizing each other up. He’s gotten confirmation that Sharpe does get paid for something, but he’s sticking to the story that he’s an herbologist producing homeopathic remedies.

Tim’s cell chimes.

He pulls the phone out of his jacket, looks at it, hopes that his eyes lighting up looks like excitement about the case, and tucks it back in. Then he stands up, leans forward on both of his hands, towering over Sharpe, stares him right in the eyes, waits a second until he sees the fear, and says, “You are so fucked! Harper broke,” and slowly walks out.

Behind the mirror, Tony falls off the stool he was leaning against.

Tim runs in a second later. “Two straight hours of contractions. Let him sit for an hour, and then hit him with a prisoner’s dilemma. I’m out of here.” And runs back out.

Tony looks at Gibbs, eyes still wide. “Have you ever heard him say that word?”

Gibbs nods, bright, wide smile lighting his face. “Couple times. Never in here, though.”

“I wasn’t even sure he knew what it meant.”

That gets a laugh out of Gibbs.

---

Half an hour later, he’s back at his house, and Abby’s contractions are still limping along at one every nine minutes. The bag is packed. The crib’s set up. Car seat is installed. All that’s left now is actually driving there.

She’s talking to Dr. Draz on the phone as they head toward the hospital. Almost baby time!
For Tim, there’s a very surreal sort of calm to parking and walking in. It’s an intense awareness of this being the last thing they will ever do as people without children.

Standing in front of an elevator, fairly heavy bag on his shoulder, left arm wrapped around her waist, her head on his shoulder, waiting, all of it wrapped in crystalline stillness.

They’d filled out all of the paperwork, all of the consent forms, everything, weeks before. If Abby had needed to get in and get treated fast, neither of them were willing to wait to have all the forms filled out.

So it’s done.

He’s leaning against the treatment table, watching her take her street clothing off. Each thing she takes off he carefully folds and places in the bag.

Then she puts on the blue gown (opens in the front) and they wait again.

“Okay, Abby, you’re at three centimeters dilated, zero station, and Kelly is ready to go. You’re going to get rolled over to the OR, and Dr. Flanen, the anesthesiologist, is going to get you set up with an epidural. Tim’s going to stay here with me, get changed into scrubs, and in about fifteen minutes we’ll all be in the OR getting Kelly out. About ten minutes after that, you’ll be saying hello to your baby,” Dr. Draz says.

One of the nurses hands Tim a neatly folded pile of scrubs, and he’s about to leap off and set the world record for stripping off and getting into surgical scrubs when Abby stops him, holding his hand.

“Not allowed to wear any jewelry in there, right?”

Dr. Draz nods.

She works off her wedding and engagement rings, which takes some effort because her fingers are swollen, and hands them to him. “Keep ‘em warm for me?”

“Yeah.” He slips them onto his right pinky. They’re a little snug, but not so bad he’ll have a hard time getting them off. He kisses her. “Have ‘em back on you in an hour.”

She sighs. “I hope so.”

He kisses her again. “It’s going to be fine.”

“I know.” But her voice is limp with fear.

“It really will.”

“Sure.” She doesn’t sound sure about that. The nurses are waiting to roll her toward the OR, so she reaches up, gives him one last kiss, he squeezes her hand, and pets Kelly gently.
“See you in a few minutes.”

She nods, tears in her eyes, and it’s killing him that she’s that scared and there’s nothing he can do about it.

But they take her away, and he may not be able to make her less scared, but he can get changed very, very fast, so he does. It probably doesn’t help anything, but he’s standing there, outside the OR, a few seconds faster than he would have been otherwise.

A few minutes of standing there later, a cheerful looking woman in pink scrubs with little purple hearts all over them heads out and says, “Mr. McGee?”

He nods. Not like there are any other soon-to-be-dads out here. Of course, one guy in blue scrubs looks a whole lot like every other guy in blue scrubs, so maybe it’s not an entirely stupid question.

“Hi, I’m Beverly Carter. I’m the pediatric nurse here.” She holds out a small strip of plastic then takes his right hand in hers and begins to fasten the id bracelet above his watch. “You, Abby, and Kelly are all going to get one of these. Kelly’s has a little tracker in it. It’ll make sure she can’t leave the maternity ward with anyone other than you or Abby.”

He looks at it, and it’s got Abby’s info on it.

“Everything look right?”

“It’s Abby’s information.”

“Yep. We do everything here based on Team Mom. Yours has a 2 on it, right?”

He looks again. McGee, Abby, 2. “Yep.”

“Okay, good. Abby’s almost all prepped. One of the nurses will head out in a minute or two and fetch you.”

“All right.”

“Hold tight. It’ll be show time soon.”

And after two of the longest minutes ever, another nurse does come out, this one in blue scrubs, like his, and ushers him in.

He knew he was scared. He knew he was nervous. He didn’t realize how bad it was until the wash of relief hit when he sees Abby smiling, and talking, and joking, and actually, she’s in a damn good mood.

“McGee! You’re here.” She’s smiling brightly at him, just absolutely grinning from ear to ear.

He wonders at that for a second, but, she called him McGee for ten years, and judging by the glow-y, euphoric clouds of bliss hanging about her, she’s probably pretty high right now, so if that’s what comes out, it’s what comes out. Not like it isn’t his name.
“Yeah, baby.” He’s standing next to her, petting her face. She’s strapped down on the surgical table, arms extended, tubes all over the place, and if it wasn’t for her smile, that would be making him panic, but she’s in such a good mood she’s giggling, and it’s catching, making him smile.

Another nurse offers him a rolling stool, so he can sit down next to her, so he does. Face close to hers, lips against her temple, hand twined with hers.

“They gave me morphine,” she sings.

“I take it you’re liking it?”

“Oh yeah. This is fabulous. I can’t move anything below my chest, and that was trippy, because I could feel it happen. Like first, I couldn’t move my toes. I kept telling them, move toes, move, but they wouldn’t. And then it was my knees, and then thighs and stomach and that was just really weird, but then everything stopped hurting, and oh my God! This is just sooooooooo good! I forgot how good not hurting was. This is just perfect, and I love it, and I’m going to figure out how to go back in time and slap myself upside the back of my own head because this is so good and I can’t believe I was freaked out about it, I mean how could something that feels this good be freaky? Breena tried to tell me about it, but I was too scared to listen and God scared was dumb—“

“Inhale, baby.”

“Oh right, yeah, probably a good idea. Look!”

He has no idea what she wants him to look at, but the only direction she can see is up, so he looks up. There’s a poster of butterflies above them.

“It’s sooooooo cute!”

“Yes.”

“You know what?”

“What?”

He didn’t think it was possible, but the grin on her face got even wider. “Jimmy can write us prescriptions for more morphine.”

Tim’s getting a little nervous about that. What with the fifteen or so other people in the room.

“Umm… Yeah.”

“He really should, because this is so great, McGee, you’ve got to try it!”

“Okay, Abby. Just, not right now.”

“Oh. Good point. When we retire. We’ll do Burning Man and try everything and it’ll be so much fun.”

“All right.”

“We’re ready to start,” Dr. Draz says. Tim suspects she might have a smile on her face under her mask.

Tim nods, not sure what he’d say to that, but Abby’s happily babbling away about getting this show on the road and how that phrase came to be in the first place and it’s it kind of weird that people say things like that even though there is no show, and he just sits there, lips pressed to her temple, fingers twined with hers, letting the words wash over him, keeping an ear on the quiet things the docs are saying to each other as well.

“McGee...”

“Yeah, baby.”

“I love you.”

“Love you, too.” He kisses her. “Love you so much.”

She giggles at that. And months of tension break. He feels it just crack. Six weeks of fear and worry and this is it, they’re here, in the hospital, and sure, things could go wrong, but he can feel in his gut that it won’t, the worst is over, the worry is done, and from here on out this is going to go right.

He starts to giggle with her, squeezing her hand, hard.

“You’re laughing,” Abby says.

“Yeah. You were, too.”

“I was?” She looks really confused by that.

That makes him laugh a little harder.

“Yeah, you were.”

“Huh?” she laughs a little more, and he kisses her lips.

“You’re going to feel some pressure now, and we’ll have her out in about a minute,” Dr. Draz says.

“Okay,” Abby’s smiling, then looks startled. “Oh, that’s trippy. I can kind of sense I’m moving, but I can’t feel it. Sort of like my brain knows but my body doesn’t. Oh my God! This is so cool!”

Tim laughs at that, too. Which sets Abby off. When she takes a breath she says, “The first thing Kelly’s going to hear is us laughing.”

He feels the tears in his eyes, and makes himself laugh a few seconds longer, and then stops dead when he hears a small, squeaky cry.

Abby inhales fast and hard, holding his hand, fingers curled tight into his. He looks up from her face, wondering when they’ll get to see her.

“Not quite yet, she isn’t all out. Your little girl’s pretty eager to meet you. One more second... Got her. Time of birth, 14:14.” Then Dr. Draz is holding Kelly where they can see her, over the drape and saying, “Hi Mom! Hi Dad!” She’s kind of grayish and squawking, unhappy about this, and before he can do more than register one very fast image, of a tiny face screwed up and crying, Nurse Carter comes around, takes Tim by the hand, and gathers Kelly up in a soft blanket, taking both of them to the warmer.
Carter’s rubbing the grayish goo and blood off a Kelly, and she’s yelling, staring at both of them, looking really confused, and Tim stands there, staring, astounded that she’s really here, tiny, and bright pink, and loud, and wet, and… just… here.

His hand is hovering over her arm. “It’s okay, you can touch her.” He traces his finger down her arm, feeling how soft and warm and a little damp she is, and that seems to get her attention. His eyes focus on hers, and hers point in his general direction as five tiny fingers close around his and she stopped yelling.

“Hi.”

Her head tilts a little, like she’s taking him, or maybe everything, in.

He wipes his eyes with his free hand, aware he’s crying because he’s having a hard time focusing on her. Then Carter says, “Do you want to cut the cord?”

This strikes his as a weird question because it looks pretty cut to him. There’s like, four inches of it still attached to Kelly, though there’s a clamp right where her belly button will be, and another one at the top of the cord.

Tim shakes his head. His voice isn’t going to hold for saying anything right now, and her hand is curled around his left index finger, so he’d have to let go to cut it.

She’s all dried off, cord trimmed flush with the clamp, and has a little tag on her ankle.

“Okay. We’ve got to weigh her. Did you want to get any pictures?”

That gets Tim’s attention, broke through the feel of her fingers on his, of this first moment of touching his daughter. He gingerly starts to pull his hand away, but she isn’t letting go, so he takes her wrist in his right hand, staggered that it’s the same width as his thumb, and holds her hand in place while he pulls back.

He watches as they weigh her, carefully put a diaper and onesie on, a tiny little cap, and wrapped her into a tidy bundle. Maybe it take two minutes, maybe three, but very soon he’s standing there with a person so tiny her whole body can rest against half of his chest.

He reaches back to pat his pocket for his phone, and realizes he isn’t wearing his jeans, so he doesn’t have it with him.

He stands there, holding her, not sure what to do next. Carter takes him in hand and leads him back to Abby, skirting the doctors who are stitching everything up and finishing off the surgery.

He sits back down on the stool next to Abby’s head. Her eyes are closed, and she’s humming gently. Red Hot Chili Peppers if he’s right, and absurdly he’s wondering when she would have heard them last, not like they’re on either of their playlists.

He kisses her again, tries to think through the easiest way to do this, because he’s really, awfully, heart-clenchingly nervous about possibly dropping Kelly, but then he remembers that Abby can turn her head to the right, and… yeah, that’ll work.

“Abby, open your eyes and turn toward me.”

She does, looking pretty glazed, but she sees Kelly and lights up fireworks-going-off-on-a-starless-night-bright.

“Oh!”

He scoots close enough so she can kiss and nuzzle Kelly. She does for a moment, and Kelly squeaks at it, then starts sucking on Abby’s nose. That makes her laugh. Makes Tim laugh, too. He gently pulls Kelly back, cuddling her against his chest, and offered one of his fingers for her to suck on, which she did, vigorously. And then he leaned and slouched enough so she's still face to face with Abby.

Carter sees that and says, “Might have a hungry girl there. Once you’re all stitched up and back in your room, I think she’ll want to nurse.”

Tim’s really, really tempted to say, “Ya think?” But he doesn’t. Carter doesn’t need him channeling Gibbs.

Abby’s got her lips pressed to Kelly’s forehead, whispering, “Can’t wait to hold you.”
Eventually, and Tim’s sort of fuzzy on how this happened, and Abby’s really fuzzy on it (if you ask her one minute they were in the OR and the next they were back in their room, and while she’s got a good excuse for that, he doesn’t, but he still doesn’t have much detail beyond that) they were back in their room, having ascertained that Kelly is six pounds two ounces, eighteen and a half inches long, in possession of ten fingers and ten toes, murky blue eyes, and that, once it is dry, her hair (not that there was a whole lot of it) would probably be sort of dark blondish.

It took a bit of manhandling, but the nurses got Abby onto the bed in their room, little bassinette/warmer thing for Kelly to sleep in next to her, explaining to Tim that they’re supposed to keep track of every time Kelly nurses and each diaper they change and that’s what the paperwork under the bassinette is for.

But finally, Abby is settled, sitting up, and he wants to be able to snuggle up and sit behind her for this, let his body support hers, but between the IV tubes, the catheter, the fact that she still can’t feel anything below her chest, that’s not going to happen. So, he hands her Kelly, and kind of half-leans, half-perches one hip on the side of the bed, (It’s not wide enough for him to lay next to her if she’s in the middle, and she’s in the middle.) stroking Kelly’s cheek while Abby holds her for the first time.

Her lips are pressed to the top of Kelly’s head, and she’s inhaling deeply, babbling about how tiny she is, and how warm, and she just smells amazing, and so, so tiny, she certainly didn’t feel that tiny when she was on the inside, and Tim kisses Abby’s forehead, basking in this.

Eventually he pulls back enough to realize that maybe some pictures would be a good idea. So he hunts down his jeans, finds his phone, and begins to take pictures of Abby and Kelly snuggled together.

Kelly starts crying again, which makes both of them a little nervous because now that she’s here they’ve got to figure out what to do, but after about two cries and some fairly determined wiggling from Kelly, the idea that she may want to eat comes through loud and clear.

Tim takes Kelly from Abby while she gets herself clear of the gown she’s in. Which Kelly did not appreciate. Moving further from the food was not something she wanted to do, so the crying gets louder, but a few seconds later, Abby had her breast out, and the pillows Tim had given her arranged into something that would hopefully be useful for nursing, and after that Kelly is in her arms, finds the nipple with no problem, and very enthusiastically nursing.

“How’s it feel?” Tim asks Abby, watching Kelly gulping away.

“Really weird.” She thinks about that. “Ohhh… not sure I like that.”

“What?”
“You know how your foot feels when you sit on it too long and then get up?”

“Yeah.”

“It feels like that.”

Tim winces. “Ow.”

“Not really ow, but, hot and tingly and just weird.”

He snaps a few more pictures. Then notices there are thirty-five messages on his phone, (Five from Gibbs. For a moment he wonders if there’s a Marine Grandpa getting ready to storm the hospital.) so he hunts through the pics he’s just taken, finds one he likes (not a nursing one), and sends that to his entire family list with: Kelly Marie McGee 2:14 6/16/15 6lb 2oz. Abby and Kelly are doing fine. Kelly's having her first meal.

When he looks up from his phone, Abby's gazing down at Kelly, eyes filled with happy tears, gently stroking her very tiny ear, as she suckles away.

Screw it! If half of him ends up hanging off the side of the bed, so be it. He gently got himself onto the bed with them, half-sitting/lying on his side (and yes, his back half was dangling off) but he could rest his lips on Abby’s shoulder, offer his arm as additional support for Kelly, and just hold both of them close.

And eventually there would be the whole: when do we switch sides thing, and does she need to be burped in between, and wake up Kelly, please wake up and finish nursing, you’ve only done one breast, but right now there’s just this golden moment, wrapped around his girls, with no fear and no pain, just awash in perfect, content love.
Family

Gibbs stands quietly in front of the door. He listens carefully and doesn't hear anything on the other side, so he doesn't knock. He opens it, peeks in, and then slips through, walking silently.

They're sleeping. Which he expected. He knows he and Shannon certainly crashed pretty quickly after the excitement was over, and he figured Abby and Tim would, too.

Even without hours of labor, or a terrifying and painful emergency C-section, just the days, weeks of waiting are exhausting.

He walks over to Abby, lying in a hospital bed. Hospital gown, exhausted sleep, IV tubes, all of that looks familiar, but it's the smell, that sweet combination of blood and amniotic fluids with an undertone of Lysol that whips him back in time by more than thirty years.

He blinks, clears his eyes, and kisses her on the forehead. She murmurs something, shifts a little, and settles back into sleep.

Tim's crashed out on the sofa. It's too short for him to lay across it, so he's sprawled out, head lolling on the backrest, both hands protectively clasped around the tiny bundle snoozing on his chest.

Gibbs gently sits next to him, looking at their little girl. Or not snoozing. Two bleary blue eyes are wide open and staring around.

"Hi," he says it very quietly, finger tracing down Kelly's cheek, the feel of her skin under his finger also whipping him back in time, and Tim stirs, opening one eye. "Go back to sleep, Tim. I'm going to take her for a walk."

For a second Tim's hands close a little more tightly around his daughter, and then he seems to realize it's Gibbs, so he mumbles something like, "Okay," and closes his eye again.

Gibbs gently picks up Kelly, cradling her against his chest, and heads into the hallway. Once out there he says, "Let's let your parents get some sleep. They'll need it." He's bouncing her a little as they walk, humming something tuneless.

He's amazed at how this brings him back. It's been thirty-three years since he held his daughter for the first time, and right now he'd tell you it was yesterday.

He kisses the top of her head, memories of kissing his own Kelly like this bright in his mind. "You were named after two incredible girls, Kelly Marie, and one day, when you're a bit bigger, I'm going to tell you all about them."

Right now he's the only one at the hospital. Sometimes it's good to be the Boss. Tony, Ziva, and Draga are still on the case, though at last update Sharpe had fallen for the Prisoner's dilemma, and Tony was just on clean up with his confession.

Meanwhile, once Ziva and Draga got back, they'd have a signed confession to show Harper, so that should break him pretty fast.

Ducky and Jimmy had agreed to both stay at Autopsy. Working together they can finish everything up faster and get here that much sooner, and more importantly, stay that much longer. He hasn't heard anything from Breena, but assumes she and Molly will be coming soon.

And yeah, it's not Jimmy's meet your little brother fantasy, but meet your cousin will be awfully good, too.

He identifies the dark-haired woman walking toward him by her stride and attitude before he can make out the details of her face, after all, his glasses are in his pocket.

Penny.

She stops in front of him. "Is that her?"

Okay, it's a kind of dumb question. Not like he'd be here, walking the hall with someone else's kid.
But it's easy to get rattled when you're excited, and he might have just as easily asked her the same thing if she'd gotten here first.

"Yeah. They're getting a nap, so we're getting a walk." He stands at an angle so she can see her great-granddaughter's face.

She pets Kelly, a wide, happy grin that puts him very strongly in mind of Tim on her face. "She's the spitting image of Sarah."

That confuses Gibbs. He was thinking this is what Abby must have looked like as a baby. He shifts his hold, cradling her so he can look at her face, finding a place to sit down so he can really look at her. He slips the little crocheted cap off her head, finding a fine fuzz of blond hair.

"Abby. Abby looked like this as a baby."

Penelope sits next to him, leaning over, staring at her. "Maybe. I still think she looks like her aunt."
She fits the cap back on Kelly's head. "Did you get any details?"

"Nah. They were both asleep when I came in. Got the same text you did."

She smiles at that. "They look okay?"

"As okay as two exhausted, sleeping people can."

That gets a laugh out of Penny.

Gibbs realizes Kelly hasn't been properly introduced. "Kelly, this is your great-grandma." He looks up from the baby to Tim's grandmother. "What is she going to call you?"

"Penny. They all do."

He nods. "Kelly, this is Penny. And when you can talk, you can call me Pop."

"Can I hold her?" Just like Tim, he feels his hands curl around this little girl, not wanting to let her go. But he forces them to relax, he's got to share.

"Sure."

Penny cradles Kelly to her shoulder. "God, it comes back. I haven't done this since James was a baby."

"James?"
"Tim's youngest second cousin. Three years."

"I was thinking the same thing. But thirty-three years for me."

Penny nods. Kelly begins to squawk, and Penny bounces her gently, patting her back, making shushing noises.

"She's been awake a while. I'm thinking it's naptime for her." Gibbs holds out his hands, wanting to take her back, but Penelope doesn't look like she wants to let go.

"You got to carry her out. I can take her back in. Show me where their room is."

"Okay."

Penny stands up, her chin pressed against the top of her head. She pats Kelly's back, walking with a little bounce in her step. Gibbs watches, approving of her technique, and Kelly starts to settle down.

"It comes back easy, doesn't it?"

Gibbs nods at that.

They sneak into Tim and Abby's room. Penny lays her down in the clear plastic bassinette next to Abby's bed. He kisses Abby once more, whispering, "She's beautiful, Abbs," and heads back into the hallway.

A second after the door shuts, Penny's phone buzzes. She takes it, and Gibbs hears, "Hello. Yes… Just saw her… Room 207, but everyone is sleeping now, so maybe an hour or so is a good idea… Uh huh… Call when you get here." And then hangs up the phone.

"Who was that?"

"Sarah. She just got the message. Tim isn't answering his phone, so she called me."

Gibbs nods. "Get some coffee?"

"That sounds good."

They're in the cafeteria, at a table, with no coffee. Several seconds after stepping in and smelling the coffee, both Gibbs and Penny had opted for other beverages.

Gibbs sips his. "Anyone tell his parents?"

"John calls every few weeks. I'll tell him the next time we talk. And I don't know if it's habit or if things are getting better, but he sent that text to Tori, too."

"You're still talking to John?"

Penny shrugged. "Arguing. Yelling. Trying to pound it through that thick, stubborn head of his that what he and Tori did was not appropriate. She got it. Or is smart enough to pretend to get it. Or at least was crying when I got off the phone with her. But she's also never been disappointed in Tim. He's still firmly convinced he didn't go far enough because he couldn't turn Tim into a sailor."

Gibbs feels himself tense at that. "And if yelling doesn't do it?"
Penny's holding her coffee tightly and stares up at the ceiling, then looks back to Gibbs and shakes her head. "I don't know. I'd like to think I know what I'd do. I know what I did in the past. Joining the peace movement could have killed Nelson's career, and he wasn't thrilled about me doing it, but when he saw what we were building... That wasn't warfare. It wasn't honorable, and it wasn't about defending people. He didn't stand in my way, but if he had, I would have gone.

"John's my son, and if he can't... If I need to, I'll let him go."

Gibbs nods at that.

Penny takes another sip of her tea. "This is almost as bad as the coffee smells."

Gibbs sees her change the subject, and since there's nothing else to add, he goes with it, taking a sip of his own drink. He has lemonade, which he suspects has never met a real lemon, or real sugar, and it's entirely possible even the water is artificial. "You think they feed this to the patients?"

"I really hope not," Penny says, getting her phone out and texting.

Gibbs raises an eyebrow at her, and then a few seconds later her phone chimes with a return text. "Doesn't matter if this is what they feed them or not. I've got Ducky and Jimmy on bringing real, delicious, and nutritionally appropriate food for them."

That got a smile out of Gibbs.

The rest of what he's taken to thinking of as the Mallard branch of the family showed up next, without Molly.

He flashed Jimmy a curious look as Penny hugged Breena, and he said, "She's still at daycare. She'll want to hop all over Abby as soon as she sees her, so waiting until all the tubes are out is a good plan. Tomorrow or the next, we'll bring her."

Gibbs nods. Granted, he hadn't thought about that, but it made sense.

"Are they receiving visitors?" Ducky asked.

"Everyone was asleep when we were last in there, but I'd imagine quietly poking your head in to check wouldn't be a problem," Penny replied.

"I'll go." And Gibbs was off, headed toward their room, so he missed the smiles passing between Jimmy and Breena and Penny and Ducky.

This time when he got nearer to the door he could hear quiet crying and voices, so he poked his head in and said, "Feel like some company?"

"Sure," Tim said, mid-diaper change. Which was apparently the reason why Kelly was crying.

"Gibbs! Oh, you're here! Have you seen her, yet? She's beautiful!"

Gibbs paused next to Tim to tickle Kelly's tummy, which didn't stop the crying, but did make her look away from Tim to him, and then took two more steps to Abby, kissing her gently. "Yeah, Abbs. She is beautiful. I was in here two hours ago. You were asleep. Kelly and I went for a quick walk, met Penny while we were out there. She thinks Kelly looks like Tim's sister."
Tim stares at his daughter, and tries to remember back, but the image of what Sarah looked like brand new just isn't forming in his mind. "She might. Can't really remember, right now." Then he finished wiping her off, and got the new diaper on and snug, followed by the onesie, which Kelly seemed to appreciate, because she stopped crying.

"All nice and warm now?" Tim asked her, picking her up and taking her over to Abby. "So who's here?" he asked Gibbs as Abby started getting ready to nurse.

"Penny, Ducky, Breena and Jimmy, Sarah should be here any minute, and whenever they get Harper taken care of Tony and Ziva will be along," he answers, keeping up a very tight line of direct eye contact with Tim. Since Molly, he's been aware of the fact that one of the biggest changes since he was a dad with a baby is that these days the girls will just whip out a breast and nurse babies like it's no big deal.

And on an intellectual level he gets it. First and foremost it's a sign that he's family and part of the inner circle. Because while they will nurse in public, this is a lot less stealthy than how they behave when out and about.

And he can understand that it can't be fun to have to excuse yourself from whatever is going on to feed the baby. And beyond all that, if anyone is going to leave because of nursing, he's the one with the two working feet who didn't just get cut open five hours ago, so he'd be the one to leave the room.

So, yes, he understands this and how it works.

And he doesn't want to leave, but... okay, it's still a little squirmy. So like with when Molly was getting a snack, he is keeping up a very strict not looking policy.

He's staring at Tim, filling him in with how the prisoner's dilemma worked, when Abby said to him, giggling, because apparently everything is awfully funny to her right now, "It's okay Gibbs, you can look. You don't have to pretend I'm not nursing. This is what they're for."

And, okay, looking back his reaction probably wasn't the most mature thing he'd ever done. Or the kindest. And he was aware of the fact that Abby had to be on some sort of painkiller, but it hadn't really hit him that she didn't have any filters between her brain and her mouth.

But he is kind of uncomfortable, and he's awfully good at spreading uncomfortable around. And, honestly, kind of giddy on grandbaby joy. So, still keeping up eye contact with Tim, he very gently smacked him upside the head and said, "If she thinks that's what those are for, you aren't doing your job."

"Gibbs!" Abby sounded utterly horrified. "Oh no you don't! You apologize to McGee right this second! If there was ever a man who knew his way around a breast it's McGee. He's practically a lesbian he's so good with them. Some guys just don't get it, they pinch and twist, like the dials on those old radios, you remember them, right? Of course you do, you're old enough to remember those radios, but not McGee, not that you don't remember those radios, do you? Off topic. He gets that different parts of the breast respond to touch differently, and he knows how to use the texture of my clothing to play with me, and you know nipples respond to touch differently than the flesh around them, and he figured out how to do this thing with his teeth, and how the flat part of the tooth feels different than the sharp part, and since I've been pregnant my nipples have been really sensitive- Do you have sensitive nipples, Gibbs? Anyway, he figured out that he could do this thing with his eyelashes, oh my god, if you've got sensitive nipples, you've got to get someone to try it on you, feels —"
Which was when Tim finally jerked out of the frozen, watching-the-train-wreck-happening-but-unable-to-do-anything-about-it,-blushing-so-hard-his-hair-was-going-to-turn-red space he'd been in to say, "Abby, I don't think Jethro needs that much detail."

"I don't, Abbs. And Tim, I am sincerely sorry I doubted your skill with breasts."

"Uh… Thanks. Let's not ever mention this again."

Gibbs nodded emphatically at that, and then, already in possession of vastly more information than he ever wanted about Abby's breasts, looked down to watch Kelly nursing away. Tim's on Abby's far side, half sitting on the bed, stroking Kelly's head. Abby's cradling her in her arms. And Kelly lay there, eyes closed, blissful expression on her face, sucking away.

"She's a good eater."

"Yeah. I was really afraid this was going to be hard, you read so much stuff about how hard it is, and how babies don't know how to latch on, and how if you have a c-section they end up doped up and too drugged to eat properly, but other than the fact it feels really weird, it's going pretty smooth."

Gibbs strokes her cheek and arm, feeling her tiny fist under his fingers, that too jerks him back in time, to standing like this, next to Shannon watching her nurse their Kelly. He wipes his eyes and after a second to pull himself back to the present he remembered why he'd popped in. "Do you want everyone else to come in?"

Tim looked to Abby for the answer. "Sure, bring 'em all in, time to celebrate, and celebrations are more fun with lots of people."

"I'll go get them."

There are universal constants. Gravity. There are local constants. The sun rises in the east and sets in the west. And there are social constants, and how people act upon seeing the new baby is one of those things.

So like in everyone else's family, there are hugs and congratulations and "She's so beautiful!" and requests for the full story of how Kelly got on the outside and speculation as to who she looks like.

Jimmy having a bag filled with really delicious smelling food might have been a little off the beaten path, but it reminded Tim that's it's getting onto dinner and he hasn't eaten since breakfast. Abby's still not feeling very hungry, but she does take a little plain (but yummy smelling) beef broth, while Breena holds Kelly and Penny and Jimmy pet her. (Ducky hovering around, beaming, getting pictures of everything.)

When Sarah got there Penny looked from her to Gibbs and Gibbs sort of shrugged indicating, that, okay, yeah, he can maybe, sort of see the resemblance. (But he still thinks Kelly looks like Abby must have as a baby.)

Eventually Ziva and Tony got there, and Ziva's holding Kelly the way Abby held Molly when she was brand new, and Tony stepped back from slapping Tim on the back and watched Ziva do it, then crossed to her, wrapping his arms around her waist, head resting on her shoulder and whispered to her, "Looks good on you."

And a bit after that, when Kelly was drifting off, and Abby was drooping, the rest of the family headed out to find their places in the waiting room. Like with Jimmy and Breena, the whole of the next two days will have someone here, ready to leap into action and fetch whatever they may want, or offer whatever help they may need, but they'll retreat far enough back to give them time to rest alone as well.
The thing about morphine is that it feels really good. It's a good painkiller too, which is why they use it for major surgeries. What's not obvious is how much pain it's killing. The other thing that isn't obvious is how much of that euphoric feeling good is because of the morphine.

So, on the day Kelly was born, Abby was feeling super-duper spiffy, and really, was awfully impressed by how great she was doing with this whole just-had-a-baby-thing. Yeah, she was sore. (Especially her right shoulder, that really hurt. They told her that was a side effect of trapped air in her abdomen, but she was on morphine so the idea of air trapped in her abdomen and having to wait for it to be absorbed didn't bother her, at all.) And no, she didn't even want to think about doing anything that involved her abs, but for the most part this was nowhere near as bad as she thought it was going to be.

All in all, really, she was feeling awfully good.

Which is why morphine is an especially nasty double edged sword.

So as the morphine began to wear off, Abby didn't opt for nearly as many of the other painkillers as she should have. Because when the nurse asked about her pain on a one to ten level she figured she was at a two, so she didn't need much to deal with this, right?

Wrong.

By the morning, everything in the universe sucked. There was not an iota of morphine left in her system, whatever they were giving her to combat the pain was fighting way, way out of its weight class, the chemical euphoria the morphine provided had gone, and the tsunami-sized waves of post-partum baby blues hormones were starting to crash into her.

So, in the course of one day, she had gone from everything is as good as good can be, nothing hurts, new baby, wrapped in ecstasy and love to the entire world and everything in it is one horrible drudge of unrelenting physical and emotional pain.

The nurse came in again, once again asking about pain levels, adjusted the dosage she was on, so supposedly soon she'd be hurting less, but then, because apparently this women was utterly insane, she unhooked Abby from all the tubes and asked her to get up and walk around a little.

So, she did, and fucking God that hurt! While she was up, tottering around a little, she got to see the vast, bloody mess that was the pad she'd been lying on, and the idea of exactly how ruined her body might be came crashing into her.

She felt the tears in her eyes, and the nurse smiled at her gently, said to her, "Do you want to get a shower? You'll probably feel a little better when you're all cleaned up."

Abby nodded, numbly, and headed toward the bathroom. Shower did sound good, but as she stood in the little bathroom, slowly peeling off her gown, she got to see how she looked.

And burst into sobbing tears.

She just felt ruined. That's the only word for it. There's an image of a woman she has in her mind, the woman she is, and this beaten down, swollen, bruised, blood smeared, exhausted body staring back at her in the mirror is not that woman.
It's not even a ghost of that woman.

Or her shadow.

It's just the used up dregs of a destroyed vessel.

She's staring at the wreckage of her body, feeling like every shred of her intrinsic Abbyness was gone. She doesn't even smell like herself. There's this cloying, sweetish blood smell that's suddenly making her want to rip her skin off in an attempt to get away from it.

She heard a soft knock on the door, and wanted to say stay away, but couldn't get her voice together well enough to do it, so after a second Tim stepped in, and she winced as his eyes hit her body, not wanting him to see this ruin of who she used to be.

He smiled gently at her, and pulled her into his arms.

Tim heard the crying about a minute after Abby slowly, carefully headed to the little bathroom attached to their room. The nurse had said she could get a shower, and she certainly wanted one, so in she had gone.

And he remembered the thing about baby blues, and even if he hadn't remembered if from their somewhat shortened series of Lamaze classes, both the nurses and Dr. Draz have mentioned it in the last day so he gets that her crying might be normal, but just because it's normal doesn't mean he wants her sitting alone in a room crying.

He looks at Gibbs (who had just come back in. He has a tendency to wander off whenever one of the nurses or doctors is doing anything with Abby) and his daughter and says, "Can you…?" holding Kelly toward him.

"Tim, snuggling a baby girl is never going to be a job I'll turn down. Especially if it frees you up to deal with the crying woman."

"Thanks."

He knocked gently on the door. "Can I come in?"

No answer, just quiet sobbing. He decided that was a yes.

So he eased the door open and found Abby standing in front of the mirror sobbing. "Hey." He took one step to her and wrapped her in his arms, holding her and petting her back.

She cried harder, and he didn't ask what was wrong. His best guess, that she does look like she was hit by a truck, isn't going to be helpful at all. Holding onto her, being there, cuddling against her, that's helpful (or so he hopes.)

After several minutes of that, she starts to pull it back together, calming down a little. He kisses her forehead. "You still want to get that shower?"

She nods.

"Want some company? I'll wash your hair."

She nods at that, more tears starting in her eyes. He lifts her face and kisses each eyelid. "Love you so much." Then he reaches over to turn the water on and quickly strips out of his clothing.
He looks down at the bandage over her wound. "Does that need to come off before you go in?"

"Just the top part."

"Top part?"

"I don't know." She carefully peeled the pad off the incision site. It didn't look nearly as bad as Tim was afraid, about six inches across, two lines of skin pressed closed with a collection of small pieces of tape. It was… surprisingly bloodless. Which given the blood on her legs, the yellow, bruised scabs on her arms and back from the IVs/epidural, the stippled, purple-blue bruises on her skin where they peeled off the tape that had held those tubes in place, the scarlet stretch marks, which apparently decided to come out in force all over her belly and hips and breasts over the last twenty-four hours, and the fact that everything is swollen and puffy, StayPuff marshmallow puffy, (he's actually still wearing her wedding and engagement ring because she's so swollen she can't get them back onto her own fingers) was actually a nice surprise. Good to see at least one of these things wasn't a total horror show.

He tested the water, "It's good," and stepped in, helping her in. It's not like it's a hard climb or anything, but an extra hand is probably useful.

She sighed when the water hit her.

"Good?"

"Yeah. Feels good. I feel like someone beat the hell out of me, and this is good."

"Okay."

For a long minute he stood there, holding onto her, letting the water slip over both of them, just feeling her in his arms. He looked around, didn't see her soap or shampoo, and realized it had to be either on the sink or still in the go bag.

He started to step back, but she followed, so he spent a few more minutes just hugging her, but eventually she said, "Did I forget the soap?"

"I think so. I'll be back in a minute."

"Okay."

Gibbs looked mildly surprised when he hopped out of the bathroom a few seconds later soaking wet with a towel around his hips, but didn't say anything when Tim snagged the go bag, rummaged through it, grabbed a scrubby and three bottles, and vanished back into the bathroom.

"Got 'em."

"Good."

He stepped back in, balanced the toiletries on the handrail, taking the shampoo in hand and pouring some into his palm.

"Wasn't there something you were going to be doing now?" she asked, leaning against him, sighing with pleasure, relieved to see some things, like his fingers rubbing into her scalp, still feel good. Still feel like her.

"Doesn't matter. I'll get round to it sooner or later."
She smiled at that. "Kelly sleeping?"

"Maybe. She wasn't making any noise and was snuggled on Jethro's tummy."

"Okay." Another long sigh from her.

"Feel good?"

"Yeah. Nice to know at least my hair's still mine."

He doesn't quite get that, but doesn't exactly know how to expound on that either. So he lets the water rinse away the shampoo, and grabs the scrubby, "Do your legs for you?" He figures it can't be easy to do anything that involves bending right now, or using her abs, and he's fairly sure washing her legs has to involve one or the other of those options.

"Sure."

Kneeling down, washing her legs and feet, he's coming face to face with what "moderate bleeding" means, and is trying to not freak out about it, because while the docs and nurses have all said this is normal, and the pads Breena brought for Abby were certainly awfully thick, the idea that this much blood might be coming out of Abby is making him want to hyperventilate, and he's fairly sure that isn't a good thing for anyone.

So it wasn't the most thorough wash ever, but he got the job done, stood up fast, and asked, "Did you bring fresh clothing in?"

Abby slumped a little more, just one more layer of everything sucks on top of all of the other ones, and he kissed her.

"Painkillers, baby, anyone would forget."

That got a nod out of her.

And once again, he headed out, wrapped in a towel, grabbed the go bag, and then smiled. Once he was back in the bathroom he said, "At least you remembered to pack fresh clothing. Totally slipped my mind."

That got a little laugh out of her as she stepped out of the shower.

"You feeling a little better?"

"Little. Can you get my legs and feet again?"

"Sure." He gently dried her off and helped her get dressed.

When she was dressed, he said, "Go snuggle with Gibbs, I need a minute," and if she took that to mean he needed some bathroom time on his own, that was fine, that was better than fine.

She nodded and headed out, and he quietly let himself melt down over how much blood there was. Smears of it on her legs, and a pink ring around the drain in the shower, and the wet, red stains on the towel, and it was just a whole lot of blood. And he knows she's fine. He knows they keep checking her iron levels, and he knows it's supposed to happen, but it's still a whole lot of blood, Abby's blood, all over the place, and it's just really, really hard.

He's shaking all over and wants to throw up.
And eventually he got his breathing back to normal, and got over the desire to throw up, got himself dressed again (in the same clothing) and headed out, finding Gibbs on the sofa, little baby girl sleeping on his chest, bigger girl leaning against him, arm around her shoulders, also asleep.

Gibbs looked at Tim, caught the fact that he was feeling pretty low right now, and said, "Go home for a bit, get some fresh clothing. Take Jimmy, I think he's in the waiting room. I've got 'em."

Tim nodded. "You need anything?"

"I'm good."

Jimmy was hanging out in the waiting room, when Tim headed out. He saw the look on Tim's face as he sat down next to him, and said, "What happened?"

Tim shook his head. "Helped her get washed off." He swallowed hard. "It was a lot of blood."

Jimmy nodded, smiled gently, very much understanding the pain of seeing your love hurting, damaged, and unable to do anything about it. "Yeah. I know. It's normal."

Tim nodded back. "Gibbs told me to go home, get some clean clothing."

"Good plan. I'll drive. We'll get some more food on the way back. Bet Abby'll want some real food soon."

"Probably."
"So, how are you doing?" Jimmy asked Tim as he pulled out of his parking place. It's the first bit of time they've had alone since before Kelly was born.

"Besides freaked out by the blood?"

"Besides that. There's something wrong with you if your wife is bleeding in front of you and you're cool with that."

"That's normal, too."

Tim nods, not paying too much attention to Jimmy or the car ride. His mind's pretty firmly back at the hospital with Abby and Kelly.

"When we get to your place, get a nap. I'll check your kitchen, do a grocery run for you, but you get a nap."

"Don't want to be gone that long."

"Trust me, you need it. You'll sleep better in your own bed. And there's absolutely nothing going on over there right now that Jethro can't handle."

"I know but—"

"Doctor's orders. Get that nap. She does the heavy lifting on taking care of Kelly. You do the heavy lifting on taking care of her, and you can't take care of her if you're fried. Besides, I'm the one with the car, so you're stuck there until I take you back. Might as well get a nap."

"Did you and Gibbs plan this?"

"Didn't need to. That sofa in your room folds out into a bed. You're out of it enough you haven't figured that out. That means you aren't safe to drive, and you really need some sleep."

"Fine."

Jimmy's smiling as he watches the road.

"You're looking awfully smug."

Jimmy reached over and squeezed Tim's shoulder. "Just enjoying this. Welcome to fatherhood."

Tim laughed at that.

They got to Tim's house, walked in, and Jimmy pointed up the stairs. "Go, sleep."

And, well, yeah, bed felt good. Laying full out felt good. (He quickly reminded himself to give both Jimmy and Gibbs a heads up for not pointing out the sofa folded out, thus leaving him with a kink in his neck from sleeping on the too short sofa.) And for about a second he noticed that not worrying about needing to leap up and tend to Abby or Kelly was pretty nice too, but only for a second, because the second after that, he was asleep.

Waking up a few hours later, feeling like he's been drugged and is trying to pull through a murky haze of physical and emotional tiredness, Tim realizes that part of what is happening is that humans are, more or less, diurnal.

And he's adjusting to naps 24/7.

Laying in his bed, rubbing his eyes, he's got no idea what time it is. Daytime, but it could be 10 in the morning or 5 in the afternoon.

But after a moment, he realized the nurse came in in the morning, gave Abby the all clear to get up, so it can't be earlier than late morning. So he finally looked over, saw 2:55 on his clock, and realized he'd been asleep for four hours, and that Kelly was now a full day old.

Jimmy was right, he did sleep better in his own bed. Enough room to actually lie down was good. And that might be part of feeling drugged. He'd actually slept instead of dozing.

But he did slowly get up, and dressed, and snagged clothing for tomorrow. When they'd go home. Together.

He noticed something, he still had on Abby's wedding and engagement ring. He shuffled through her collars, wrist cuffs, and other jewelry and found what he wanted, it's a plain, white gold chain. He worked off her rings, threaded the necklace through them, and then put it around his neck. When he got back she could wear her rings again. One step closer to normal.

He headed into Kelly's room, fingers resting on her crib. Tomorrow, afternoon maybe, she'd be sleeping in here.

He heard the footsteps, but didn't turn until Jimmy put his hand on his shoulder. When Tim turned, he said, "Tomorrow."

"Yep. Feeling better?"

"Nope. Feel like all my joints are glued together."

Jimmy laughed a little. "That'll be true every time you wake up for about two months."

"Wonderful." Tim held up the bundle of clothing he needed to put in his go bag. "I'm ready."

"Let's get you back, then."

Tim turned toward the door and then noticed something. Previously the room had been set with the crib against the far wall, changing table/dresser on the wall to the left, rocking chair in the middle a few steps from the crib. But something new had wandered into the nursery.

It was one of those tray table things they'd gotten as wedding presents from Fornell.

And sitting on it was several bottles of water, some apples, protein bars, a little bowl with nuts, and a bag of M&Ms.

"Jimmy?" He knows he didn't put it there, and he's awfully sure there is no such thing as a snack fairy, which means Jimmy must have done it.
"Nursing mamas need to eat. A lot. Since she won't be able to go up the stairs more than once a day for the first week, when she's up here, she'll be up here, can't sprint down for munchies. And when you're up here, you'll hopefully be sleeping, and won't want to be running down to fetch munchies. So, I stocked up the nursing station for the first shift. Did the same with your sofa. Wasn't entirely sure where'd she want to be, but right now your sofa, right in the prime TV watching spot, is hers."

"Thanks."

"No problem. Breena's mom did it for us while we were still in the hospital. I remembered Breena really appreciated that, so I did it for Abby."

"Molly coming to visit today?"

"Breena's bringing her over with dinner. She's been babbling non-stop about the new baby. Can't wait to see Kelly."

They were in the car when Tim asked, "What'd you get?"

"Stuff you need. Stuff you don't know you need."

"Like what?"

"About six half gallons of ice cream, protein bars, fresh and dried fruit, lots of nuts, eggs, milk, basically lots of fat, calories, calcium and protein, all the building blocks of good milk. 'Course, if Kelly's allergic to any of this stuff, it'll make her miserable, but let's not try to jump that hurdle until you know if you need to or not."

"Great."

"Doubled your store of diapers, tripled baby wipes. Trust me, you're gonna go through them way faster than you think you will. Cloth diapers."

"We weren't going to—"

"Not for that. Use them as spit up bibs/clothing protectors/handy wipes for anything that might come out of Kelly. They're cheaper and more useful than seventy million paper towels. Think we've got like 100 of them and never seem to have too many, and we've never actually used one as a diaper."

"All right."

"Didn't see any nursing pads, so I got them, too."

"Some went with her to the hospital. Rest are in our room."

"I know Breena was going to pick up some nursing bras for her. Can't really get those ahead of time."

"She told me they had that planned. So, what do I owe you?"

Jimmy shook his head. "Year from now, pay it down the line to Tony. Looks like they're gonna be working on a little DiNozzo awfully soon."

"Yeah, it does."
When they got back, Gibbs was walking the halls with Kelly. She was awake, fussing a little, but not full out crying.

Gibbs handed her over without having to be asked, and said, "Just finished eating. The doc's in doing a wound check for Abby." Tim doesn't need an explanation for why Gibbs didn't stick around for that.

He takes Kelly, who decides this is a prime moment to go from fussing to full on crying, and heads back to their room, patting her back, shushing away. "Help me out, is this the I need to burp cry or the I'm sleepy cry?"

She cried louder. It wasn't much help.

"Diaper change?"

Three more steps got them back to their room. The wound care specialist was in, checking Abby over, he caught the tail end of, "...everything looks good but if it gets red, hot, or starts leaking any sort of discharge you need to see your doctor."

"Okay."

The specialist looked up at Tim. "I was just telling your wife that everything looks fine..." and then proceeded to give him the full wound care instructions and things to look out for, as well. "We'll do one more quick check tomorrow morning, but assuming everything looks fine, you're going home tomorrow around lunch time."

It's a bit difficult to have a conversation with a small crying person in his arms, but he's got the feeling the specialist has done this more than a few times before. So he nods, repeats back the instructions, and feels a general sense of pleasure at the idea of getting home with Abby and Kelly.

When the specialist left, he sat on the end of Abby's bed. "Did she burp?"

"Yes."

"Diaper changed?"

"Gibbs got it when she woke up."

Tim grinned at that. "So he does change diapers."

"He does when I give him puppy eyes about grabbing three more minutes of sleep."

He outright laughed at that. Then laid Kelly on his legs, looking up at him, and said to her, "You're fed and burped. Is all this about a wet diaper?" as he began unswaddling her and checked.

"Nope. Dry diaper. Sleepy?" He followed the how to swaddle directions and ended up with a very loosely wrapped baby who could kick her way out of the blankets.

Abby watched his efforts, not saying anything, but after a minute he handed Kelly over, and she did a... better job. Neither of them produced the perfectly smooth and snug bundle the nurses or Gibbs managed.

But, not having managed it, they stumbled onto the issue. Too hot. Babies might in general like having a snug little bundle to keep all their limbs in place, but they also don't enjoy overheating. And having gotten a bit of extra ventilation, the crying stopped.
Abby took her cap off. "It's what, ninety out there?"

"Probably."

"Maybe she doesn't need a hat."

"Maybe not." He noticed Abby was looking awfully sleepy. "I think we're gonna get a walk. How about you get some more sleep?"

"That sounds really good."

He kissed her and headed for the waiting room area. He doesn't know how they set it up, but at any given time at least one someone who wants time with an awake Kelly will be out there.

Sarah. She sees him and smiles, and he goes to sit next to her.

Kelly's laying on his lap, and he's trying to get this swaddling thing worked out. He's guessing a big chunk of the current fussing is based on little arms and legs flailing around and supposedly swaddling is the answer to that. It shouldn't be hard, but for whatever reason the neat, tight little bundle the nurses and Gibbs and Jimmy and Breena can all produce with basically no effort at all turns into an adventure in remarkably ineffective origami when he's in charge.

"You want me to do it?" Sarah asked.

"When have you ever swaddled a baby?"

"Let's see… How about nine thousand times over the three years I was babysitting for the Millers?"

"Oh." He tucked the blanket over Kelly, snugged it in close, and managed to get her into a rather lopsided bundle, but she at least wasn't flailing anymore, and he could claim the hole at the bottom was additional ventilation for her so she didn't overheat. "And no. I don't want you to do it. I need to learn how to do this, and I'm not if you guys keep doing it for me."

"No problem." She sits next to him, gently stroking her niece's cheek. Kelly turns toward her, looking in her general direction, with an expression Tim thinks means, this is nice, where's the milk? But it could also be, feeling sleepy or mild pique.

Understanding entirely non-verbal communication from someone he's just met is tricky.

"So… Mom was pretty happy you sent her a picture of Kelly."

He rose his eyebrows, feeling a little surprised. He hadn't realized he'd done that, but thinking back, he knew she was on the family list and he hadn't taken her off.

"I'm guessing by that look it wasn't intentional."

Tim shook his head. He picks Kelly off his lap and holds her close, his chin on the top of her head, feeling her in his arms, hands really, inhaling that sweet, milky, baby scent.

Sarah watches them, waiting to see if Tim will say anything, but he doesn't, so she says, "What do you want me to do?"

"How do you mean?"
"With mom and dad. Penny filled me in and…" Sarah squeezed his shoulder. "Whatever you want or need. I'm here."

"Oh." They'd never gotten around to that lunch with Penny, so they haven't talked about this, and to some degree he'd rather not. For another long moment he held Kelly, feeling the soft, warm weight of her against his skin, and with that comes a level of clarity. "He held you like this, you know… Well, not exactly like this, you were a few months old when he got back. But mom certainly did…"

"And you did."

"Yeah. We were both a lot smaller then." He sits there, holding Kelly, hearing her breathe and the soft, little chirpy sounds she's making. "This sort of focuses things. They're your parents, and they didn't fuck you over, so… Do what you like. I'm not going to hold it against you or think less of you if you keep a relationship with them. I'm not going to make you pick, me or them.

"Not gonna do that to Penny, either. She did this, too, for him. Felt his fingers close around hers and fell instantly, unbreakably in love." Her hand is out of the swaddle, and his finger strokes over the back of her hand, flits over her fingers, still amazed at how tiny her hand is, and feels four fingers clasp around his.

"What about you and them? Mom was pretty excited to get your text."

"That was an accident. I forgot to take her contact off my family list… I'll forgive her eventually. I'm angry, really angry, but I don't want to cut her out completely. Yesterday was my daughter's birthday and she should be here for this, but..." He lets it trail off. It hurts that she isn't here, in a way he wasn't expecting, but he knows that right now, seeing her would hurt even worse.

Sarah wraps her arm around him.

"Things will stay the same with Dad. Penny tells me that he asks you for updates on me, pictures and stuff… No pictures for him of Kelly or any other kids we may have. He doesn't get to be anywhere near my children. He doesn't get to know them, even second hand. That's something you can do for me."

"I can do that."

"Maybe he'd be okay with Kelly, because she's a girl, but I'm not risking it."

"It's okay. I won't pass anything on. Won't answer questions about you guys anymore."

Sarah's hand rests on his, her fingers between his on Kelly's back. "He did this for you, too, you know?"

Tim closes his eyes, feeling those words, and the sensation, the emotions of this, brand new baby, his child, in his hands, and all the hopes and dreams and fears and love. "Yeah. I do. But it didn't work. He didn't fall in love with me. He fell in love with an idea." He kissed the top of Kelly's head, silently promising her that no matter who or what she wants to be, that he'll be there for her. He looked back up at Sarah. "So, what are you going to do?"

She shrugged. "I don't know. Watch him a lot more carefully if I have kids. I don't think he'll get to go on one on one sailing trips."

"Good plan."

"He'll be stateside again in a few months, probably see him then."
Tim nodded at that.

"What about you and him? Glen and I get married, can both of you be at the wedding?"

Tim shrugs. Spending time near his dad's really low on his to do list. Napalming his sister's chance at her daddy giving her away for her wedding also isn't something he wants to do. "I promise you I will not start anything. I can't promise I won't end it if he does. I'm pretty much done with taking shit I don't have to, and he's at the top of the list of guys I'm not taking any more shit from. Last time I saw him we were in the same room for less than five minutes, with Gibbs, investigating a murder, and he still decided to make a few cracks about my weight and love life. I'll play by the rules if he does, but if he doesn't…" There's something else he probably doesn't need to be thinking about.

He shifts the topic, to something a little more relevant right this second. "So, are you and Glen getting married?

Sarah shrugged. "Talking about it, a little. Not entirely sure if he's the one."

"Unless you want to have five or six of these little dudes, I don't think you need to rush."

"Nah. How'd you know Abby was the one?"

"Spending almost a decade dating other people and having them come up short compared to her was a clue. But for that almost decade it didn't much matter because she didn't want the same thing I did, so I did date, and looked at other people, because we were never going to be happy if I kept wanting this," and he kissed Kelly's head, "and she kept wanting a collection of friends with benefits. I lucked out, eventually she decided she liked the idea of where I wanted to go, and agreed to go there with me. But that was just luck. It doesn't work that way for a lot of people, maybe even most of them. So, is Glen the guy, or is there a guy who kind of looks like him that you haven't found yet, or he hasn't become yet?"

"Don't know. Good question to think about."

They sat together for a few more minutes. "You gonna tell me about your super top secret editor's meeting?"

That got a smile out of Sarah. "Super top secret. Like, really, not to be spread around."

"Who am I going to tell?"

"Your agent? Your publisher?"

"I'll keep quiet."

"In December I hand in the last of the Levi books, and with that my contract's over. My editor, agent, and I are breaking off and starting our own imprint."

Tim's eyes went wide. "You're starting your own publishing house?"

"Yeah. Multi-media, all web-based, all social media, podcasts, ebooks, mini-movies. We're going to cater to the tumbl'r fans, and give them everything they want. Tons of content and we'll run it as a subscription service, like cable. We'll let the fans play, too, not just consume. Tons of fan created content. If we can get it off the ground, it'll be awesome. Right now we're setting up the list of authors we're going to headhunt."

"Wow."
"Yeah. You know who Amanda Hawking is?"

"The little girl who wrote those troll books? Sold a million of them on Amazon before she was twenty-six?"

"Yeah. We're studying her playbook, and going to work it, but with professional production values."

"Very cool."

"I really hope so."

"And you're the brand name star?"

"One of them."

"You've got takers?"

"A few."

Tim smiled at that, very happy for Sarah. She stroked Kelly's cheek. "I think she's asleep."

"Then we're going to go lay down."

"Good plan, you look like you need a nap."

This time, he headed back to their room, gently put Kelly in her bassinette and noticed that yes, the sofa did fold out, so he spread it out and got to lie all the way down and that was a whole lot better than trying to sleep sitting down on it.

"Feel like another visitor?" Breena's voice this time, though he's heard a variation on that question from everyone in the family now.

"Sure," Abby says, which was when he really woke up enough to notice she was up and nursing Kelly.

He noticed the scent of egg rolls and broccoli and chicken, and sat up rubbing his eyes. "Visitors with food are especially welcome."

"You have to be really gentle with Aunt Abby and Kelly," Jimmy says to Molly as they walk in. She's in his arms. Yes, she can walk, but these days seems to have two speeds, running like crazy or ambling along at toddler speed, which is really, really slow.

So, assuming they want to get somewhere and not have her get into everything around/bump into other people, Jimmy usually carries her.

Molly's nodding at that, eyes wide, bright smile on her face, Jimmy and Breena's smiles wrapped together and amped through the innocent joy of a life untouched by any real sorrow. Tim felt around for his phone and started to film this, figuring that they'd all want footage of the first time the girls met.

"Baby!"

"Yep. There she is." Jimmy gently put Molly down on Abby's bed, next to Abby, who was holding Kelly. He kept a hand on her, ready to yank her back fast if need be, but letting her get close on her
"Baby!"

"Molly, this is Kelly," Abby said.

Kelly kicked free of the blanket and Molly saw her foot. Thin little foot, narrow sole, tiny toes. She looked at it, very gently, very slowly traced her finger over Kelly's foot, said, "Baby foots," and started to laugh.

Tim felt himself laugh in answer. Abby smiled, might have wanted to laugh, but that hurts too much right now. Jimmy kissed the top of Molly's head, and Breena grinned at her.

"You were that size when you were born," Breena said to Molly.

"No." Molly's shaking her head emphatically. The idea that people change, that she's been changing is just way beyond Molly's 16 month old mind.

"Okay. You've always been this size," Breena said while setting down the food.

Tim almost says something like your little brother or sister will be this size, but remembers that Jimmy and Breena haven't told Molly about the new baby yet. Mostly because she just won't really get it. Plus the idea of waiting six months is another thing completely beyond her sixteen-month-old mind.

Jimmy's taking her shoes off and then holds Molly's foot up to Kelly's foot. "See how much bigger you are?"

That Molly gets. She's about twenty-five pounds now, and compared to Kelly looks like a giant. Though three days ago Tim was awfully convinced that Molly was the tiniest little baby girl on Earth.

Kelly finishes the breast she'd been working on, and Abby holds her up to burp. Molly inches a little closer, standing, little wobbly (Jimmy still has a hand on her, making sure she won't fall into Kelly or Abby) and kisses Kelly's forehead. Kelly twists her head and sort of squints at her.

For a second there, you could feel the collective 'Oh How Cute!' from all the adults.

Then Molly noticed the remote to Abby's bed, and that was the coolest thing ever, which resulted in some less than happy moments while she had a bit of a melt down over not being able to play with it. And Kelly started fussing, having to burp and not burping is uncomfortable and this whole eating thing was a lot easier when the food was just directly deposited through her umbilical cord.

And like with everything else in life, the precious moments are just moments, and parenthood is a whole lot more cleaning up messes and managing the desires of small people than basking in the glow of cute baby joy.

And so, the four of them, now all parents, got to it.
First Day Home

Tim is never, ever going to curse the guy going fifteen miles an hour under the limit out again. Okay, not like he ever walked up to the guy and said anything, but he often had some pretty choice words floating through his mind.

But not anymore.

No, if he's stuck behind a car creeping along, dodging pot hole, with a white-knuckled guy at the wheel, he's going to assume there's some insanely precious cargo in that car, like, say, a two-day-old-infant, and maybe a woman who just gave birth to said two-day-old-infant.

Honestly, he's actually more nervous about Abby in the car than Kelly. The huge stack of regulations for taking care of your just-had-a-baby wife included no driving for two weeks, which struck him as weird, so he asked about it, and well, yeah, apparently Kelly’s in a tiny seat designed to keep her in place and protected if anything happens, but Abby's insides are currently being held in by slowly dissolving stitches and a car accident right now would be a really bad idea.

He's also nervous about the fact that this is a new car. Okay, not brand new, he's had it for a month. But he had the Porsche for almost a decade, and he could drive that in his sleep. His body knew how it moved, understood it's idiosyncrasies. He was one with that car when driving it.

The Highlander is big, way too damn big, and compared to the Porsche really unresponsive, and he's just nervous about it because he doesn't have a good feel for what precisely is going to happen when he presses his foot down on the gas or break or exactly what sort of lag he's going to get between beginning to turn the wheel and the car actually moving.

So, to say that he is driving carefully, bordering on paranoid, is not in any way, shape, or form an exaggeration.

They'd gotten the car seat that supposedly fits all ages, and Kelly looks ridiculously tiny in it. He'd also, finally, gotten a good, tight swaddle on her, just to realize that the little strap goes between her legs, so that she can't be swaddled in there.

So, to add to the general fun of trying to get home with a new baby in the car and a healing wife, he's also got this small person who is complaining, loudly, about the fact that she's got no motor control and these weird things that are attached to her keep flapping around and she finds it just really unnerving and would very much like it to stop, please.

They finally got home. Only took him forty-five minutes to drive three miles.

Gibbs had an awfully smug smile on his face when they pulled in.

When they got home, Gibbs snagged the prescriptions and headed off to fill them, giving them a while at home, alone, just the three of them.

Abby had found the little nest on the sofa that Jimmy had made for her, and crashed into it. Right now if she's not actively talking to you (and sometimes when she is), she falls asleep. (Jimmy says that's the pain meds.) Which left Tim, holding Kelly, standing in his home, not entirely sure what to do next.

But, after a minute, when it occurred to him that Kelly appeared to be asleep too, that there was something he wanted to do, and hadn't been able to really do comfortably because of the lay out at the hospital.

But he could here.

So he sat next to Abby, snuggled in close to her, (carefully, she's still awfully sore) and held both of his girls in his arms.

And a minute into that, feel asleep, too.

Half an hour later, when Kelly decided it was meal time, he was able to sit behind Abby, support her body with his, really be there with her for this.

Comments with Jimmy about nursing breasts aside, it's not erotic.

Might be eventually. Like if his libido ever kicks back in again. Right now, it just feels unplugged. Best he can tell, he hasn't thought about sex, at all, since the morning before Kelly was born, and that's got to be a record for him. And he does have to admit the fact that each of Abby's breasts are bigger than Kelly's head and that even with her mouth wide open she's still not getting much more than just the nipple blows his mind, but not in any sort of a ohhh sexy sort of way.

Mostly just in a Wow, that changed fast sort of way. With a side of gosh, that can't be comfortable.

So, there's no sense of titillation at watching this, being part of it.

But there is a soul-deep sense of primal satisfaction at his. His woman, his child, both of them wrapped in his arms. He's ready to go off and kill the saber-toothed tigers that may threaten them, and return with food to keep them strong and healthy.

Or since the saber-toothed tigers are extinct and the fridge and pantry are already full of food, he can sit here with them, his chin on Abby's shoulder, his arms under hers, helping to keep Kelly's weight off her abdomen.

He kisses Abby's neck, pets Kelly's cheek.

Like before, he finds himself wanting better, stronger, more powerful words than I love you, but right now, especially with as tired as he is, he doesn't have them.

"I love you."

Abby nods, resting her head against his.

It feels like sleepwalking. Probably. She's never actually sleep walked, slept walked?, no matter, whatever it is, she's never actually done it before, but if she were to assume what it's like, it's like right now.

Time's gone. Just vanished. It gallops by in two hour runs that take up only seconds when she's asleep. It drags out into day long minutes of hyper-aware, nervous worry when she's awake. And then slides away again when Kelly's at her breast or she's trying to listen to something but her eye slide shut and she's asleep again.

Abby's honestly not sure what day it is, let alone time. Daytime, probably, she can hear rain and it's pretty gray behind the artificial light of their living room, so it could also be evening or morning but probably not the middle of the night.

The only solid thing in her life right now is pain. That's always there. Stronger sometimes, weaker others, but always there, waiting for her to laugh or cough or try to lay on her side or get up or something. Sometimes, for a minute, when she's sleeping, it feels like it slips away, but that's a lie, it's just hiding, waiting for her to get comfortable, so it can jump out and pounce on her like a cat playing with a wounded mouse.

But the cat does that because it doesn't want to get hurt. It has to make sure the mouse is too far gone to really fight when it takes a bite, otherwise it might get bit in return and end up with a nasty infection that kills it.

The pain's just doing it for kicks and giggles.

It likes seeing her almost relax and then jump back out again, reminding her she's not whole. It enjoys rubbing her nose in the fact that she's wounded, damaged, broken, ripped shreds of a pulp of the woman she used to be.

Her breasts ache. They hurt as they get full when she needs to feed Kelly. Then they feel like streaming fire when her milk lets down. Her nipples scream when she nurses. The lactation consultant said Kelly was doing it right, she had a good latch, but that 'it could be a little uncomfortable at first' while her nipples toughened up.

Supposedly it'll get better.

The doctor says the incision is healing up nicely. Supposedly that'll get better, too.

But she doesn't see how it can. Life's stuck in this blurry, eternal gray now. Kelly was born seventeen years ago, or maybe two days, she doesn't really know. She jerked a little, aware of the fact that she'd fallen asleep in Tim's arms, while nursing Kelly, and she can't do that.

Yeah, this time he was there, so Kelly didn't get dropped, but she can't sleep, she could have dropped her, could have broken her, so she can't sleep, if she sleeps then something bad could happen.

Gibbs loomed up out of somewhere, asking what she wants for lunch, and she just doesn't care, at all. Now that Tim's holding Kelly (he was behind her a second ago, but now he's not, now he's standing in the middle of the room next to Gibbs, holding Kelly. God, did she drop Kelly? Did he have to pick her up?) safely out of her reach, she can sleep.

She's half aware of Tim petting her head, saying something about setting some food out, as she slipped out of awake back into sleep.

Tim looked back up at Jethro. "I think the pain killers are really knocking her out."

"What's she on?"

"Toradol in the hospital, and I think you got Percocet for her."

They headed into the kitchen. Tim offered Kelly to Gibbs, but he shook his head, signaling, you “cuddle the baby, let me learn my way around your kitchen and make you two some food.” Tim nodded at that.

“You want some coffee?”

“Yeah. There's some old stuff with caffeine in it in there, do it a third caff two thirds no caff, I'm thinking I'm going to need some help with the new sleep schedule.”

Gibbs smiles at that, finds the coffee bags and sets up the machines. Then he takes out his phone and adds a note.

“What's that?”

“Reminder to get you some real coffee.”

“Thanks.”

“Got cold cuts. Club sandwich?”

“Sounds good.”

“Thinking I'd make some burgers for dinner.”

Tim nodded, noticing that Kelly seemed pretty droopy. “Think she's almost asleep. I'm going to put her in the crib.”

Gibbs smiled at that. “Good luck.”

He got up the stairs, got her very gently laid onto the crib, and got almost all of the way back out of the nursery before the fussing began.

So, three minutes later, he was back in the kitchen with Kelly, and the little bouncy-seat snoozing thing they had. He set that on the table, put her in it, and she decided to conk out.

“Don't think she likes the quiet.”

Gibbs looks up from slicing a tomato, his amused expression on his face.

“What?”

“Works better if you leave her in there more than thirty seconds. They usually fuss a little before falling asleep.”

Tim shrugged. “Want Abby to sleep, and she doesn't sleep if Kelly's fussing…”

Gibbs nodded at that, too. “Yeah.”

Tim crosses to the dining room door, looking in on Abby in the living room. She's sleeping, but doesn't look peaceful, at all. He wants to go kiss her, pet her some, but he's afraid he'll wake her up, so he heads back into the kitchen.

He tilts his head toward where Abby is. “This is normal, right?”

Gibbs shrugged. “Back when I did this, they didn't let Shannon out of bed for three days. Didn't go home for a week. Kelly did bottle feeds every other feed for the first three days so she could get more rest.”
"Might have to try that. She looks so tired."

"What'd Jimmy say?"

"That this is normal."

Gibbs sent him a then relax about it look, and handed him a plate with a club sandwich on it. Tim took it to the sofa and put it on the little table next to Abby. He's thinking that if she doesn't wake up on her own before Kelly’s next meal, he'll feed her himself, and let Abby get six straight hours of sleep. She needs it.
"Okay, Honey, I know it's not Mom's, but she's really tired, so let's try this and see if it'll do."

Gibbs was holding Kelly as he made up the bottle. She didn't appear to be too thrilled with either of them right now. At two days old she knows where the food comes from, and while both of these two might be good for napping on, they are not the provider of food.

But, since the provider of food is still dead asleep and both of her guys think she needs the rest, they're on mealtime for Kelly.

He got settled down at one of the kitchen chairs, Kelly in his arms, bottle in hand, nipple in mouth, and she was sucking away, expression on her face indicating that this was not what she was expecting, but it's not entirely unwelcome either.

Honestly, it's really nice. He's liking this, and can see doing it again, actually looking forward to it.

"What are you doing!" Abby shrieked at him.

He was so startled by that he almost dropped Kelly. He did drop the bottle. Which set off Kelly, who had been appreciating the food, and began to cry as a result of it suddenly vanishing.

"Feeding her." The look on Abby's face is terrifying. She is red hot furious at him right now. "You're so tired… I just… wanted you to get some more sleep."

"You can't do that! It's bad for her! She has to breastfeed!" Abby's trying to take Kelly away from him, crying, saying something about bonding and allergies, and Tim's feeling like the rug just got yanked out from under his feet.

It takes him a second to get his bearings back. "Okay, okay. Go, sit down, get yourself settled, and I'll bring her over to you." He's flashing Gibbs a help me look, but Gibbs is also looking like he just got the rug yanked out from under him, too. Gibbs just shakes his head a little, acknowledging that backfired spectacularly.

Tim flashes back a, yeah, I guessed that, look.

Abby's sitting on the sofa, sobbing, breast out, rambling about how if you bottle feed, even just once, that some babies never go back to breastfeeding and how bad formula is for them and something about micronutrients and how formula feeding means Kelly won't get the benefit of Abby's immune system. Basically it's a huge, hysterical, teary, snotty fit cumulating in trust issues and how could either of them possibly think it was all right to just decide something that immense without even talking to her about it.

Tim very warily approaches the sofa with Kelly, who is also crying, and gently hands her to Abby.

And Kelly, at least, calmed back down again when she got a hold of a nipple and some milk, but Abby's still on a massive crying jag.

He tries to sit next to her, wrap his arm around her, and she flinched away from him, probably still yelling at him, but she lost pretty much all coherence a few paragraphs ago.
So he knelt on the floor in front of her, made sure to wait until she took a breath, and said, slowly, and as calmly as he can manage, "I am very sorry. I didn't know it was that big of a deal. I just wanted you to get some sleep. I will not try to feed her again without talking to you about it first."

That barely made a dent in the crying jag, but he sat there, hands on her knees, looking up at her with an earnest expression, trying to hold his own calm, which very much wants to run away and break into a thousand crying pieces as well, because he's awfully tired and emotional right now too, but that won't help anything, but maybe his touch and just being there can help her find her own calm. Eventually she did calm down a bit, and unfortunately calming down meant she started to see what she had done, and that started another crying jag, this time embarrassed and angry at herself for going off the deep end.

But at least with the second crying jag he could sit next to her, rub her back, and interject occasional comforting sounds along the lines of 'it's okay' and 'this is normal' and 'you're on a lot of drugs.'

The main thrust of the second jag was that, no, he did not need to seek permission to feed his own child. And that it was totally irrational for her to expect that. And that she was a horrible person for even suggesting it, let alone getting mad about it. (He tried to curb that one with extremely limited success.)

When Kelly got done, he was very relieved to hand her over to Gibbs and ask, "What was the last thing you ate?"

Her eyes are bright red, face puffy from crying, and her voice rough. "I don't know."

"Okay, let's deal with that first. Jethro made you a sandwich, and look at all the goodies Jimmy left for you."

"I'm not hungry."

"You've got to eat, baby. Anything you want, at all, I'll get it for you."

"I don't want anything. Just want to sleep. I'm so tired."

"Soon. Just, eat the sandwich, okay. Sandwich, more meds."

"Don't want them, they're making me crazy."

"New meds, not the same stuff you were taking before. This one's an opiate, like morphine."

She just gave up and slumped deeper into the sofa.

"Just a little food, and I'll take you upstairs, you can lay all the way down, and sleep as long as you want."

That got a tiny nod, and she reached for the sandwich.

Tim headed into the kitchen to get a dose of Percocet. Gibbs was walking Kelly around, working on getting a burp out of her.

"Storm over?"

"I don't know." He grabbed a glass and filled it with water and headed back out to the living room. Abby had taken a few bites of the sandwich and was lying against the sofa with her eyes closed.

"Come on, baby, just a bit more food."
She opened her eyes and took another bite, then took the pills and water from him, swallowing them down.

He sat next to her while she silently finished the sandwich. When she did, he asked, "Upstairs?"

She nodded again. He picked her up, carefully, very gently and slowly, and she still winced. "Better walking?"

That got a headshake, so he took her up to their bedroom and laid her on their bed. That got another wince, and it took him a moment but he figured out the problem might be that she hasn't lain flat since... hell, since she was six months pregnant with Kelly, and right now especially that's probably more stretch on her abs than feels good.

"You want pillows to prop up?"

Headshake. The not talking thing is really unnerving to him.

"Can I get you anything?"

Another headshake.

He's flailing around for a question that doesn't have a yes or no answer, but by the time he came up with one her eyes were closed again and she was looking asleep.

So he headed back downstairs.

"That can't be normal! Can it?"

Gibbs shrugged. "Shannon never did that." Tim's getting out his phone. "You got her for a few more minutes?"

"I've got her. Calling Jimmy?"

"Breena."

"Good plan."

He got Breena on the third ring. "Hey, what's up?"

So he explained and wrapped up with, "Is this normal?"

"If it lasts more than a few hours a day or more than a few weeks, no, it's not. Otherwise, welcome to baby blues."

Tim's eyes went wide. "This is baby blues?"

"Yeah, it sounds so cute, right? Oh, you've got baby blues, you'll cry a little and mope. Try full on raving psycho for a little bits of time every day for about two weeks."

"Shit."

"Eloquently said. The first two weeks I was generally okay when anyone else was around, and more or less sobbed uncontrollably during all the night feeds."

Tim sighs.

"It will get better. And if it doesn't they've got medication for it."

"Wonderful. Okay, what are danger signs of not okay?"

"Not sleeping. Crying more than like three hours a day."

He closed his eyes and swallowed hard. "Three hours a day? Three hours a day of this is normal? I really need to read that pamphlet they gave us."

"Yeah, you do."

"Okay, what else do I look out for?"

"If she wants to hurt Kelly or goes the opposite direction and won't let you or anyone else touch her, thinking you're going to hurt her."

"She's not talking."

Breena thought about that. "I'd keep an eye on that."

"And do what with it?"

"Go with her to her post-partum check-ups and make sure the Doc knows about it. When she's a little more healed up, make sure she gets out of the house and some baby free time every day. Right now there's not much you can do, she's exhausted and her body's going bonkers. Just turn the other cheek and deal."

"I can do that."

"Good. She flips out too much, give me a call, and I'll be there. Some things she needs to talk to another mom about."

"Okay."

"What's she doing now?"

"Sleeping."

"Probably the best thing for her."

When Tim got off the phone, Jethro was looking at him expectantly. "Might be baby blues, might be post-partum depression. Won't know for sure for a while. Got to read up."

Gibbs shook his head. "Not right this second. I've got Kelly. I'll put her down. You go get a nap. Part of why I'm here is so that you can sleep during the day, and then help Abby at night. So, go, sleep. I've got this."

"I should…"

"Go to sleep. You'll have plenty of time to research tonight when you're walking her around trying to coax a burp out of her. Go to sleep."

"Okay."

He woke up to the tiny, cat meow cry of a newborn, took a second to figure out where and when he is, and then hopped up fast, hoping to get her before Abby woke up.

It looked like his mission was successful, he looked back as he headed out of their room and Abby was still asleep.

Two seconds later, he was picking Kelly out of her crib. "So, Pop got you to sleep in here, huh? He made it for you, you know that?" Tim said as he laid her on her back on the changing table. He set about unswaddling and unsnapping her onesie, getting onto diaper maintenance. "I helped, a little, with it. When your eyes can focus more than five inches away, you'll see your mom drew a beautiful picture of our family on the back of it. I didn't help with that." He got her out of the poopy diaper and began the clean-up. It's really not that bad, especially compared to handling one of Molly's diapers. Of course, these days, the biggest challenge with Molly is getting her to stay still long enough to get her clean. (He's seen both Jimmy and Breena chasing a half-naked Molly through the house, clean diaper and wipes in hand.) He's not having that problem with Kelly, she's just laying on her back, kicking around a bit, looking pretty alert and peaceful.

He got her cleaned up, in a fresh diaper, and buttoned back into the onesie. (For her first day home, she had the one that Jimmy and Breena gave them the day after their wedding. The first of the baby presents.)

They usually, if at this point in time anything involving Kelly can said to be usual, feed her right after diaper change, but she's pretty calm, and he hasn't actually had a chance to sit with her in the rocking chair, yet. So he settles down, his baby on his chest, rocking gently, and of course the chair has great action, smooth and easy, and it's very comfortable.

Sitting there, he's feeling very connected to Gibbs, who he just knows is behind him, watching, and this sense of family, and maybe for his line it's not unbroken the way it's supposed to be, but it's his, and it's real, and with Kelly in his hands, breathing gently against his neck, and Gibbs behind him, watching, it stretches through his life to time before him and time after.

"Doing it right?"

He feels the nod, unable to see or hear it, and a second later Gibbs's hand is on his shoulder. Tim squeezes it for a second, then wipes his eyes, and stands up. "Probably a good idea to feed her before she starts crying."

"That's always a good idea."

This time feeding her went without a hitch, and shortly after Jethro sent Tim up for another nap, and since the idea of sleeping during the day when Jethro was there, and then being there for Abby at night struck him as a good plan, he got the nap.

The next time he woke up he didn't hear anything. For a minute he just lay there enjoying not feeling horrendously tired and the fact that he didn't need to leap up and do anything right this second.
But after a few seconds of that, his inborn Dad skills perked up and decided he needed to investigate. Gibbs is down there. Everything is probably fine. But he can't just trust that. So, after checking Abby, seeing she was still asleep, and this time looking fairly peaceful, like she might have dropped out of exhausted sleep and into restful sleep. He got up and headed to the nursery.

No Kelly.

Downstairs.

He found Gibbs on the sofa, stretched out, bare feet, t-shirt and jeans, his usual off work summertime outfit, gently humming something as he stroked Kelly's back while she slept.

He remembered vaguely that he'd had some sort of father's day present planned for Gibbs. (Pictures were put together, wrapped, and delivered to Tony and Ziva, who were not expecting to take a brand new baby home on Father's Day and thus could be trusted to deliver the present to Gibbs without forgetting about it.) And that, if there was time, he wanted to add a shot of Gibbs with the baby girls to it. So he backtracked a few steps, grabbed his phone, and shot Gibbs cuddling Kelly.

Gibbs looked up at him as he did that.

"Hope that's not a' take a picture and die, McGee' moment."

Gibbs shook his head as Tim headed to sit on the end of the sofa. "Want a copy of it."

"You'll get one."

"Good." Gibbs kissed the top of her head. "Shouldn't let her get to used to sleeping on people."

"It's okay."

"You might not think that when the only place she wants to sleep is your chest and you want to do something besides be a pillow."

Tim smiles. "I'll call you. You're good for pillow duty."

Gibbs laughed at that, then checked the clock. "Should get started on dinner."

"I got it; you be a pillow."

Gibbs shook his head and slowly started up. "I'll go back to work soon enough. Let me take care of you guys while I can."

And like speaking of the devil is supposed to bring him near, Gibbs's phone began to ring. So Tim took Kelly, and Gibbs got the phone call. He can tell by Gibbs' posture that it's a work call, likely Tony. He hears the traditional Gibbs on the phone routine of "Yes... Uh huh... Ya think? Go do it..."

Gibbs tucked the phone back into his pocket, and headed into Tim's kitchen. "How fast does your grill heat up?"

"For burgers, about ten minutes."

Gibbs headed out and turned it on, and was back a minute later. "Nice grill."

"Jimmy and Breena got it for us."
Kelly shifted for a few seconds, stretching, and both of them went silent and still, not wanting to wake her up, but she seemed to settle deeper into sleep, so Gibbs got the ground beef, and Tim sat at the table, holding her against his chest, enjoying this.

"Jethro, don't you need to be at work?"

Gibbs looked up from mixing hamburger with A1 sauce, salt, and pepper. "Don't want the help?"

"God! No! Love the help, very happy to have you here, just… It's an active case. I've never seen you take off in the middle of an active case before."

Gibbs shrugs. The reason behind it is… well, kind of touchy-feely, not the sort of thing he's comfortable really saying, but this is Tim, and he does better with words than looks, so…

"It's Tony's team, Tim. I'm just making sure the transition goes smooth. He doesn't need me hanging around, too much. There's got to be life after NCIS. Can't just lay on a beach drinking cervezas."

"Like Mike."

"Mike had more irons in the fire than anyone knew about, even me. Yeah, there was a lot of booze and senoritas, but he wasn't just lying around."

"Okay."

"More to life means having a life outside of work. This," and Gibbs look filled in that he means this family, "is a lot of it. I'll be the anchor. And there'll be other stuff, too. Has to. Don't want you and Abby and Tony and Ziva and Jimmy and Breena getting sick of me. Don't want to be that guy who just hangs on."

"You're not."

"Try that again when I've been retired for a year." He shakes his head, he's getting close to it, but not getting to the heart of it. He can feel the presence of Shannon and his Kelly very strongly, and closes his eyes, because seeing them here would be disconcerting

"Jethro?" Tim sounds concerned.

He opens his eyes, goes back to working on the hamburger patties. "I was supposed to be a dad. Supposed to be a granddad." He looks at the ring Tim got him to put back on. The ring he thinks he's getting closer to ready to take off again. "I'm getting back to being the man I was supposed to be. This, being here, for you and Abby and for Tony and Ziva when they have their babies, providing back up support for Ducky with Jimmy and Breena's, this is being the man I was meant to be."

Tim smiled at that. Over Tim's shoulder he catches a quick glimpse of Shannon smiling at him, too.
Abby woke up feeling, clearer, better, more attached to the real world.

She was still sore, but that unhinged, unteathered feel was gone.

She made a mental note to find out whatever pain meds she had been on and to avoid it in the future, because obviously she didn't get along well with that one.

Then she had to deal with a new challenge. Getting up.

She's been sitting or lying on her back since the c-section, and at first it was brilliant and novel because it'd been months since she'd been able to lay on her back, but now, after three solid days of it, she's sick of it. But (as she found out when she tried in the hospital) lying on her side HURTS.

Getting from her back to her side, HURTS.

So, she's on her back, and needs, wants to get up. She's feeling pretty hungry, her breasts ache, which means Kelly is probably due to eat soon, and she can smell hamburgers and that's making her ravenous, so she has to get out of bed.

She gingerly places her hands on the mattress, tells herself that the more she moves the more functional the scar tissue will be, and slowly, gently pushes up, and… yeah, these are better pain meds because that wasn't nearly as bad as she was afraid it was going to be, but it really wasn't a walk in the park either.

She's really tempted to get a shower as she heads to the bathroom to change out her pad. She hates the smell of blood that just clings to her, but at least right now that wanting to rip her skin off revulsion seems to have passed.

But hungry is winning out over clean, so she heads downstairs, realizing she's walking better, and maybe lying flat out wasn't a comfortable position to get into, but it may have helped make walking easier.

When she got downstairs, Tim was setting the table, Gibbs was on the porch tending the grill, the rain had stopped, (it's not sunny or anything, but at least there's no rain falling.) and Kelly was in the bouncy seat at the far end of the table, snoozing.

Tim looked up at her. "You're looking better. You feeling better?"

She nodded. "A bit. How long did I sleep?"

"Six hours." He hugged her, from behind, very gently. Mostly he just pressed up against her and laid his chin on her shoulder. He didn't need to be told her entire front was really sore. "We fed Kelly, but she'll probably wake up and want to eat again soon."

"Good, my boobs are killing me."

He glanced at them. And they do look really swollen, and hard, and not in a good way, at all. "I'd imagine so."
She headed outside, for a moment standing on the porch just sucking up the early evening air. Gibbs saw her and kissed her cheek.

"Feeling like you again?"

"Feeling like I might be able to pick her out of a lineup."

"That's good enough."

"They smell good."

"Good, made you two, hoped you'd be hungry."

"Yes! I am!"

He smiled at that, flipped them over. "Five minutes."

"Okay." She gently lowered herself into one of the porch chairs and just rested in the warm, honeysuckle and burger scented air, listening to the hum of cicadas and the hiss of fat hitting flame.

Kelly slept through dinner.

Of course she did.

At first that was great. Time to actually eat. Talk a little. Enjoy the fact that Gibbs is really handy with a grill and beef. (He's telling them that once upon a time he was good with chicken and ribs, too, but hasn't done that in forever. Though it seems like Fourth of July might be at his place this year.)

And Kelly slept through it all. Blissfully out of it in the bouncy seat.

She made a little noise, fussed for a second, opened one eye, and looked around, as they were eating dessert (Abby and Gibbs had ice cream; Tim looked at it longingly and had one spoonful of Abby's.) and Abby was feeling pretty hopeful that Kelly would wake up and she could nurse, because at that point she was starting to understand why cows moo when they need to be milked, because she's feeling like moaning, too.

But nope, that one eye closed and back to sleep she went.

And while, in general, she's all in favor of Kelly having a long sleep, she'd A: prefer it was at night, real night, the part of the night she'd like to be sleeping, too, and B: it wasn't right now.

Then comes the quandary. If she's going to be awake, and she's going to be awake, this hurts way too much to sleep, and the idea of getting into any position other than upright, where her breasts would have to move, hurts to even think about, so doing it would be insane. What, is she going to do?

She could pump and go back to sleep. That's tempting. It might not feel good per se, but it would certainly be a relief. But she's almost certain that if she does that, Kelly will wake up two tenths of a second after she pumps and then that'll be another bottle feed and she doesn't want Kelly getting too used to the idea that food comes out of a bottle.

Plus, she doesn't want her body getting out of whack with Kelly's eating schedule. The idea is that boobs swell up, baby takes care of it, and they match each other in a perfect supply/demand curve.
She could get that shower, but like with pumping she's fairly certain that as soon as she's covered in soap, Kelly will wake up screaming for food.

But eventually the kitchen was cleaned up, and Gibbs headed home. Apparently the plan is he'd be there during the day. It's even entirely possible they had a conversation about it, planned it out, but if they did, she doesn't remember it.

And of course, the longer she puts off any decision of what to do next, the more likely Kelly is to wake up while/right after she's done it.

Tim's listening to her dither. "Just get the shower. It'll make you feel better, and it won't kill her to wait the two minutes it would take you to get rinsed off and out of the shower."

"What are you going to do?"

He thought about it, because, yeah, free time… Huh… "Haven't been online in three days. Probably post some baby pictures for the family. Maybe, if she keeps sleeping, I might game a little."

"Ohhh…"

"Yeah, living dangerously." He winked at her.

It wasn't until she was upstairs, in the bathroom, starting to get undressed that she realized that was her one trip up and down the stairs for the day. Anything else she wants or needs from down there either Tim's got to bring to her, or he's got to bring her to it.

Oh well.

She gets undressed, not looking at herself in the mirror. She doesn't want to see herself right now. Yeah, she's healing, but she's also pretty sure she's not looking incredibly different from how she looked yesterday, and she didn't like the way yesterday looked, at all!

So, she's not looking, not looking as much as it's possible to not look at yourself while getting a shower, but right now her breasts do hold a sort of sick fascination for her, so she does look, and… fuck. How does that even happen in three days?

They're the size of grapefruits and just about as hard, too. Covered in veins, which wasn't precisely new, all of the major veins in her chest have been really visible since she got pregnant, and stretch marks, which were. She's really, really hoping those heal up because it's one thing to have stripes on her hips and tummy, but she'd like to be able to wear things that show some cleavage eventually. On the left one she can see… she's not entirely sure what it is, a milk duct, maybe? Whatever it is it looks like a vein, that same sort of vascular appearance, but this one is swollen and not the blue of her blood veins.

She very gently, because she knows it'll hurt, dabs a little foamy soap on, and her boobs responded to that by deciding that was a call for milk release, so it was squirting everywhere. Which is kind of fascinating, kind of horrifying. First of all, it's probably a good thing Kelly's not trying to drink this, because she's at least eighteen inches away from the wall of the shower, and she's squirting it, hard. Her two day old daughter might not need quite that much high pressure milk being poured straight down her throat.

She'd never really thought about how the milk comes out. Apparently the correct answer is take a water balloon, poke a whole mess of holes into one spot, then squeeze. Milk is squirting from all over the nipple in a whole lot of different directions.

She watched it, amazed, milk still flowing out, for probably a good minute, and then she started to get scared. What if Kelly woke up in the next few minutes, and her dinner was now circling the drain? Any second now, Tim could be bringing her up, hungry, and there'd be no milk for her.

This is stupid. Each breast is practically bigger than Kelly is. Both of them together have to weigh more than she does. There's more than enough milk in there for you to let off some pressure and still feed her.

That didn't make her less nervous, and it didn't quell the fear, but it did feel good to hear that little, quiet, rational voice and know it hadn't died.

Would have been nicer if it had managed to shut up the panicking baby's-gonna-starve voice. It didn't, couldn't. Rational wasn't so much fighting out of its weight class when going up against new mama hormones, as bringing a knife to a tank fight.

And maybe it would have been better—as she was standing there, crying, trying to figure out how to make the milk stop, to not have had rational sitting there telling her that getting upset about this is stupid and that she's a scientist for God's sake, so stop being stupid—if it had just shut up. But it didn't. So she cried and felt like an idiot for it.

But she's been a mom for two days and is drowning in frenzied hormones. And the little rational voice, in addition to telling her that freaking out about milk production is stupid, is saying that freaking out about milk production is also normal.

Eventually the milk slowed down, and her breasts felt better. Sore, they knew they'd been stretched too far, but that anything-touches-them-I'm-going-to-scream sensation was gone. Eventually she got washed up, and while the blood smell didn't vanish, it did get beaten into submission, so that was good.

Eventually, she stopped crying, put some clean clothing on, (okay, it's Tim's, but it's clean, and soft, and smells like him, so that's good.) and tried to figure out what to do next.

Sleep.

Or not. She was eyeballing the bed (most of the time having it hip high is a good thing, but right now it'd be a lot easier if she could sit down onto it) thinking through what and how exactly she'd have to move to get into it on her own and lying down when she heard footsteps and baby cries.

"Good timing," Abby said as Tim walked in with Kelly.

"She woke up a few minutes ago. Got her all cleaned up and thought she might like some Mom time."

She held out her arms, took Kelly into them, and just having her right against her chest and crying set her milk to letting down. See, plenty of milk.

Tim sees her staring at the bed, holding Kelly, looking a little uncomfortable, and after a second the problem hit him. "Do you need help getting into bed?"

"Probably."
"Not a problem."

He took Kelly from her, and carefully set her smack dab in the middle of their bed. (Just because she's the size of a loaf of bread, can't roll over, and they've got a king-sized bed does not mean he wants her anywhere near an edge.) She squeaked at that, signaling displeasure at once again being teased by being allowed to get close enough to smell the food, and then having it cruelly taken away.

Abby stacked the pillows against the headboard. Then Tim carefully picked her up and set her on their bed. She scooted back a little, turned, winced. Twisting at the waist hurts, too.

"I can get the pillows, too."

"No. The more I move the more functional the scar will be."

"Okay."

She got herself set, and picked Kelly back up again, and a little more juggling, trying to get arms and pillows and baby all comfortable, but eventually, she unbuttoned the shirt (one of the reasons she grabbed one of Tim's, she's awfully low on button-downs of her own) peeled off the nursing pad, accidentally squirted Kelly in the face before she got latched on, (Got a startled look out of Kelly, and a laugh out of Tim as he whipped out a cloth diaper to blot off Kelly. Abby's not sure when they appeared, but suddenly they seem to have a ton of them, and they're really useful.) and finally got into Hallmark card, idealized mama-nursing-baby-daddy-looking-on-everyone-happy-and-blissful-doing-exactly-what-they're-supposed-to-do mode.

Kelly's so tiny, and perfect, and her little mouth is wrapped around Abby's nipple, pulling gently, and it's not even hurting all that much this time. Her eyes are open, looking up into Abby's, really there, with her in this moment. Her skin is so soft. She's just in a onesie right now, so warm little arms and legs are resting against Abby's arm and breast, and one tiny hand is curled around Tim's finger.

Abby's with it enough right now to really see this, really soak in the details. Tiny little lips, shaped like Tim's, and the way Kelly's looking up at her puts her in mind of Tim very strongly, too. (Of course, coming from Tim, she'd call that look mild confusion.) She stroked Kelly's cheek, and nose (probably looks like her nose, but she's not sure about that), finger slipping along her ear. It's a perfect ear. When God designed ears, this is what He had in mind.

She studies the fingers wrapped around Tim's. Kelly's just so little and perfect. Each little fingernail has this minuscule crescent, shaped exactly right, and all of the little wrinkles around her knuckles are there. How can something so tiny have that level of perfect detail?

Abby pets Kelly's hair. She knows she's done this before, but memories of it are all sort of blurry. This time it's sharp. Silk fine hairs, not a whole lot of them, and they're pretty short, blondish brown, or brownish blonde, whatever that in between color is.

Tim's free hand strokes over hers, and over Kelly's head, and he leans down to kiss her head. "Looks like we're gonna have to wait a while before we can put all those little bows we got in her hair."

Then he sat up a little, and kissed Abby, gently.

He pulled back, looking her in the eye, palm of his hand stroking over her cheek. "I love you so much, Abby. Love her so much. Thank you. Sarah was asking me how I knew you were the one, and I was telling her that for a long time it didn't matter if you were the one because we didn't want the same things… and just… Thank you. Thank you for deciding to do this with me. Thank you for becoming my 'the one.'"

And for what felt like the fiftieth time that day, Abby burst into tears again. Tim held her close. And Kelly continued to nurse.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So, one of you commented about this looking like possible pregnancy mania for Abby... And you guys have also probably noticed that they rate of updates has been slowing down a tad as well. So, here's what's going on. I do want to explore how having the baby isn't always all love and prettiness. I'm working on trying to set up a pretty realistic look at how right after a baby you can be doing fine one minute and the next your mind feels like a rat's nest of snarled badness, and then good again, and back into the dark, and how precariously balanced that is, and how easy it can be to topple over the edge, how hard it is to claw your way back out. But I'd also like to not dump 700 pages of grinding, unrelenting awfulness on you, either.

Some of you know I've got kids. And if you've read my other stuff, you know that in the last seven years I've written about 1.7 million words of fiction, and in those words I've written about pregnancy and having kids but I've never written about that five or so year span that happens right after you have the baby. Why? Because I did about four years of pretty awful postpartum depression.

On the upside, dealing with that gave all of you literal metric shit tons of fiction. On the downside, living through it wasn't much fun.

Anyway, the fiction that's coming out right now has required a lot more editing than usual and a lot more, Do we really need this?

But, anyway, just as a gentle reminder, if in some of the future chapters Abby's acting like she's insane, it's because, for all practical purposes, she is. She's not trying to be mean. It's not that she's ungrateful or doesn't appreciate Tim or love Kelly. She's just unbalanced and may need some help getting back. Or she may not. I'm not entirely sure how far I can take this. I may pull the punch because I can't write the full force of this hit.

We'll all have to sit back and see how it goes.

Happy Saturday everyone.
By the time Kelly finished eating, and got burped, it was nine thirty, so, bedtime. Early bedtime, but right now nothing sounds better to either Tim or Abby then a good long sleep.

So, when he finished burping her, Tim got up and started heading toward Kelly's nursery.

"Where are you going?"

He stopped, looked at Abby, bit surprised. "Putting her in her crib?"

"I thought she'd sleep with us."

"Oh."

"Yeah. Just. I know we didn't talk about it, but getting in and out of bed is awfully hard right now, and if she's right next to me, that'll make nursing easier."

"Good point." So he turns around and lays Kelly in the middle of their bed, she's all swaddled up, and her eyes are pretty droopy, so he's hopeful she'll fall asleep soon. And then stops. Normally, he'd go brush his teeth, strip off, and go to sleep. He looks back at Abby. "Is this really okay?"

"People have been sleeping with their kids since before there were beds."

"Okay, yeah, I know that, but… They've got to sleep on their backs, and they can't have any blankets or stuffed animals or pillows in there because they can get trapped in little CO2 pockets and SIDS and… And in our bed she'll between us, and we're a lot bigger than stuffed animals, and…” he points to their bed, "blankets, lots of blankets, and we've got five pillows."

Abby thought about that while very slowly twisting around and getting out of bed, going to join him on the whole brushing teeth getting ready to sleep thing. She pointed to the bathroom, so they could talk while Kelly drifted off.

He joined her in there, half closing the door, like that would cut down on the noise some.

"I think SIDS rates are supposed to be lower for babies who co-sleep," she said, reaching for her toothbrush.

"How does that work?"

"I have no idea. But you've got several computers less than a hundred feet away, so I'm sure you could go find out if you're really curious."

"Fine." Brush, rinse, swish, spit.

"Are you going to?"

"Not tonight. I got online, and it took me three tries to successfully upload pictures. Brain's not exactly firing on all cylinders today. Probably a good thing Jethro's sticking around during the day, because I know I wasn't aware of how fried I was until I tried to do something more complicated that mix water with formula."

Abby laughed a little at that, then winced, laughing still really hurts, and said, "Leon's don't hack NCIS thing making more sense."
"Oh, God. I wrote the damn firewall, left a path for myself, and I couldn't get through it right now."

She smiled and made herself not laugh at that.

He headed off, giving her some alone time in the bathroom, and began to get ready for bed, namely taking off his clothing. He makes a quick mental note that laundry needs to be done, and that since she's the one who usually does laundry, and there's no way in Hell she's doing laundry tomorrow, that he needs to take care of it.

And having taken note of that, and divested himself of his clothing, another thought hits, Kelly's in their bed. He's naked.

Is it okay to sleep naked with your baby daughter?

"You're glaring at the bed," Abby said as she got out of the bathroom.

"Do I need pajamas?"

"Why would you need pajamas?"

"'Cause it's not just you in our bed?"

"I don't think Kelly will mind."

He flashes her a could you miss my point more completely look. "You're wearing pajamas." Sort of. She's got on soft, cotton drawstring pants (his) and one of his button downs, as well.

"I'm bleeding, my boobs are leaking, and one of the more endearing bits of just having had a baby is night sweats."

"Good points."

"Yeah." She looked down at her feet, realized she still can't see them when standing up, but she remembers how swollen they are, and how each individual toe looks like a little sausage, and how if she pokes herself in the leg, it'll leave a dent. "All of that fluid has to come back out of me again."

"Okay. Just… we're pretty casual about being dressed, you know?" In that either of them is likely to be naked at any given time assuming it's warm enough, that's true.

"Yes." She's standing next to the side of the bed, and once again he gives her a hand into their bed. When he's done, she's sitting up, and staring at the place on the bed where her torso would go if she was lying down with something of a scowl.

"What is it?"

"Psyching myself up to try to lie down."

"Can I help?"

"Nah. Gotta do it on my own."

"Not today you don't, not if you don't want to."

"The less I move the more it'll hurt and the less functional the scar will be." She planted her hands behind her, rested as much of her weight as she could onto her arms, and slowly lowered herself down, and yes, even with that it hurt. A full, pulling, burning near rip sensation that doing anything that involved her abs these days produced.

"At least let me help you get up."

"I like that plan." She stared up at the ceiling while saying. "That last two months I would have given my eye teeth to lay on my back. Now I really wish I could lay on my side again." Because right now, laying on her side involves her insides feeling like they're going to fall out, and that's not precisely a comfortable.

"Soon."

"Yep." She looked away from the ceiling and back to him. "So, it's not so much sleeping naked with her, as you're looking for what are our we've got-a-kid-now naked rules?"

"Yes. You want blankets?" She nodded, and he pulled them up over her. He sat down on his side of the bed, got under the covers, made sure they were up over him, and Abby, but pushed down in the middle so they weren't over Kelly, and rolled to face Abby, Kelly laying between them, snoozing away.

"I think as long as you're in your own room, you can wear whatever you want and as much or as little of it," Abby said.

"Sounds good. And our bed is in our room, so this is a clothing optional spot."

"I think so. I mean, I don't want Kelly thinking there's something weird or icky about bodies. And I don't want her thinking we're sexless buddies who just share a home."

He smiled at her, a hint of sexual heat, tired heat, but it's there. "We're not going to be those people."

"But, yeah, the days of sex on the living room floor and naked breakfast in front of the fireplace are probably over."

He very gently touches Kelly. "You better be worth that. I really liked naked breakfast."

Abby tried not to laugh, and he smiled at her, trying to figure out how to kiss her over Kelly without moving so much as to wake her up. He settled for squeezing Abby's shoulder.

So, if you tied him up and tortured him, Tim would admit that he wasn't exactly excited about Kelly sleeping in their bed.

Yes, there is a good practical reason for having the kid two inches away from you if you are nursing, because that way you don't have to get up and wake all the way up.

Fine, that's true.

But he's not exactly enthusiastic about the idea.

Part of it's the fact that he's not good at sleeping with other people. The first few times he slept with Abby it took him a good three hours to fall asleep. And he's certainly noticed from three nights in the hospital that anytime Kelly makes any noise or moves he's just about ready to leap up and do whatever it is needs to be done. Basically, he can't relax much past doze stage with her right next to
Part of it's the fact that he wants primary snuggle position with Abby. And even though Kelly cannot roll over, there is absolutely no shot she'd be sleeping on either side of the bed. No, because if there was a massive earthquake or something, she might fall out of the bed if she was on a side (and yes, he feels that just as strongly as Abby does, and no, it's not going away, and yes, it is awfully stupid, Virginia not precisely being a hotbed of tectonic activity, but he's been a dad for three days and is awfully tired so cut him a little slack) so Kelly would be sleeping smack dab in the middle of the bed, between him and Abby, which means in addition to limited daytime cuddle time, all night time cuddle time would also be cut off.

Part of it is the fact that she's smaller than the challah loaves Ziva bakes for Shabbos and he's terrified that if he lies down in bed he might actually fall all the way asleep, roll over, and smoosh her. Yes, the Lamaze teacher said something about that basically being an urban legend, but he knows how hard he can sleep when he's really tired, and he knows he moves around in his sleep, so it makes him nervous.

Part of it is that he's not entirely sure he wants to share his bed with a tiny, incontinent poop machine that spits up all the time.

And part of it is that she's got a perfectly good, hand-crafted, made-specifically-for-her-with-lots-of-love crib and it'd be nice if she got to see the inside of it more than once.

But even with all of those things being true, he's trying to support Abby on this, because really, brand new c-section and nursing wins out over him being nervous.

Whoever came up with the phrase sleep like a baby, has never, ever slept with a baby.

First of all, babies make a lot of noise. Somehow he hadn't really noticed that the first three nights. Tim thought he had. He thought he'd been on edge and aware of all the little chirps and snuffles and grunts, but nope, he hadn't been. Probably because the bassinet had been on the far side of Abby's bed and he'd been on the sofa, thus, about eight feet away, and right now he's about ten inches away from Kelly, so he's aware of everything.

Secondly, because he's ten inches away, he's very aware of the fact that she sleeps in little stretches, then fusses a tiny bit, a few chirps, a little wriggling, and goes back to sleep. But because she's been on the outside for three days and he's never spent this much time this close to her, every time she makes a sound or moves he jerks from dozing to full on awake.

And then, on top of it, he's terrified that if he moves, he'll wake her up. Yes, if the rational part of his mind was functional, it would remind him that she's spent the last nine months inside another person who was moving all the time, and that in fact, moving is generally what lulls babies to sleep and they tend to wake up when things go still, but the rational part of his mind is currently in a sleep-deprived coma and not reporting in for duty right now.

And while it's true that the whole nursing thing, in general, may indeed be easier if the baby is in the bed next to you, first off, Abby can't just roll over and stick a boob in Kelly's mouth right now. Secondly, as an incontinent poop machine, every time Kelly does, actually, wake up (as opposed to that little chirpy, wriggling, not really awake thing) she's in need of a new diaper, so someone (in this case Tim) actually has to get all the way up, take her to the changing table, remove poop and apply a new diaper. Which from the looks of it, takes about as long as it does for Abby to go from asleep to propped up and nursing.
Then post nursing, someone (in this case Abby, because while Kelly was nursing Tim was able to drift all the way to asleep) has to stay in a somewhat upright position to burp her, and then deal with the resulting spit up (Thank you Jimmy, cloth diapers are a blessing.) and then finally, Kelly and Abby and Tim were all in one bed, asleep.

For about nineteen seconds, because as soon as she hit the mattress, Tim jerked out of asleep and back into hyper-vigilant mode.

He's had worse nights of sleep. But never when he was this tired, let alone in his own bed.

Morning doesn't really mean anything when you were more or less awake around the clock. Sky went dark, it got lighter.

Kelly ate at nine, midnight, three and now, again at six.

Tim had just gotten back into bed from taking her for yet another diaper change. He's lying down, begging for sleep, but thinking he's got to say something about this because he's exhausted and Abby's exhausted and both of them exhausted is a really bad plan.

So he rolls onto his side while she nurses and says, "I can't sleep with her in the same bed. Just can't."

Abby's so tired, and is looking at him like he just added an extra fifty pounds to the already much too heavy back pack she's lugging around, and he feels like a jerk for saying it.

She doesn't say anything to him. Doesn't even cry, and he's got the feeling she's past crying, and now he's feeling like an even bigger jerk, but the only other alternative he can think of is him sleeping on the sofa, and if he does that he really will sleep and she'll be on her own for all of it, and that's just not cool, at all.

"I will go get her when she cries, bring her to you, and bring her back to the crib to sleep, you won't have to get up any more than you would if you were nursing in bed... will that work?"

Abby thought about that for a moment and nodded.

He nodded too, closed his eyes, and said, "I'm going to nap while she eats. Just poke me when it's time for her to go back to her crib, and I'll get it."

"Tim, it's morning. After she eats, we want her up a bit."

"Then poke me then, and I'll be up with her, we'll make breakfast or something, and you'll sleep."

"Okay."
Every home has its own patterns and rhythms, ebbs and flows of action, habits, and routine. Tossing a new baby into that home doesn't so much disrupt those flows as knock them over, shake them up, recolor them, and then put them back in the wrong place.

And for as close as Gibbs is to Tim and Abby, he's been to a greater or lesser extent, outside of those rhythms.

But not anymore. With the addition of Kelly to the mix, and him stepping into full Grandpa mode, he's slipped fully into Tim and Abby's home. He's not an outsider anymore, at all, he's home.

And he's very welcome here.

He waited until 0630 to head over. And getting to their house, he crept in, if they were sleeping, he wasn't going to wake anyone up.

Gibbs didn't hear anything, so he hoped everyone was, for the moment at least, asleep.

Then he headed to the kitchen to make some coffee. In there, he noticed nothing that looked at all like breakfast had been attempted, so he started rooting around for something to make them for breakfast.

When he's not eating take out/at the diner, Gibbs is a toast or oatmeal, eggs, and bacon guy. It's not complicated, or for that matter particularly good for him, but it's hot, easy, and he doesn't feel hungry half way to lunch like he does when he tries the 'better for him, low-fat' stuff that various wives and girlfriends have attempted to feed him over the years in an effort to keep him alive longer.

His dad made it 88 years on a more or less all fat, all protein, all caffeine, all bourbon diet, he's figuring it won't do him any harm, either.

Tim wandered down a few minutes later, looking like the walking dead, the naked walking dead. Apparently pants really are optional at the McGee house, or Tim is really so tired that it just didn't click that if he could smell coffee and bacon that someone else had to be in the house to provide those things.

Gibbs smiled at him, chuckling a little, and handed over the cup of coffee (one third caf/two thirds de-caf, good, hefty slug of milk, just the way Tim likes it.) and took Kelly from him.

He held her, noticing she was wide awake, looking pretty perky, and said, "You didn't let Mom or Dad get any sleep at all, did you?"

Tim sort of grunted at him. Took a long drink of the coffee, sighed, seemed to notice he was naked, and headed right back out of the kitchen without saying a word.

When he headed back down, about five minutes later, having not just remembered that conversation with Abby about shifting their rather relaxed dress code a bit, but also having located some pants, he found Gibbs in their kitchen, Kelly held securely to one shoulder, while he, one-handed, scrambled eggs.

Tim had to admit he was pretty impressed by that.

Then he swooped over and grabbed Kelly because no one, not even the all-knowing, all-competent Gibbs is holding his daughter one-handed near a hot stove.

Gibbs laughed at that, too.

Tim just looked at him and said, "You're lucky I'm not Abby, she would have yelled at you and cried."

Gibbs nodded at that. "Rough night?"

"Let's put it this way, we are never, ever trying co-sleeping again."

Gibbs rose an eyebrow, not sure what co-sleeping was.

"Baby in the bed with us."

Gibbs winced a little at that. "They don't like sleeping alone. You do that and they'll decide they want to sleep with you every night until they're seven."

"Is that the voice of experience?"

"I was home when Kelly was born, but got sent to Germany when she was four months old, for four months. We were out of Lejeune then, and Shannon's family was still in Stillwater back then. So, little baby, no real support for Shannon, and Kelly was never a great sleeper. Was just easier for the two of them to sleep together. And of course I get home, and I want my wife back, but my daughter had other opinions on the subject and wasn't happy at the idea of sharing Mom or being exiled out of the nice warm bed where Mom was because this strange guy showed up and wanted all of her attention."

Tim smiles a little at that, holding his Kelly, petting her back.

"Probably four solid years where I'd be off, and then come home, and Kelly was always happy to see me until bedtime when she was less than thrilled to suddenly have to share Mom. I wasn't winning any husband or father of the year awards on that one, couldn't have been easy on Shannon, stuck between us, and I wasn't exactly sympathetic to Kelly wanting bed space with Shannon."

Tim laughed at that. "Rumors about Marines home on leave are not unfounded."

"No, they aren't. Especially since, unlike a lot of the other guys, I wasn't hitting the red light districts."

Tim rose an eyebrow at him.

"Most of the world isn't too uptight about working girls. Prostitution is more or less legal in Germany, and it's a less than two hour long train ride, depending on where you are, to Amsterdam where it was full on legal. Germany's was the staging point for pretty much anything that happened in the Middle East, where there's no booze, no women, no fun, so yeah, most of the guys partied pretty hard when they had off time in Germany."
Tim smiled at that, too. Gibbs put two plates on the kitchen table, breakfast for both of them, and set a third plate in the oven on warm for Abby.

"She's sleeping, right?"

"I really hope so. The nighttime deal we've got is I'm on baby fetching and poop removal duty, and she does the feeding and burping part."

Gibbs nods, eating a bite of his eggs.

"So right now, with any luck, she's sleeping, and I'm dealing with her." He set Kelly in the bouncy chair, still on the kitchen table from last night, and she sat there, kicking around a little. Tim's keeping an eye on her, having her arms and legs free to kick and play is good, but if she gets too much of it, she'll get agitated. So he's watching to see when she'll want to get swaddled again.

"She doing better from yesterday?"

Tim shrugged. "Pretty quiet this morning. Didn't look happy about Kelly not being in bed with us.
But seemed resigned that if I was getting her, it wouldn't be more work for her. I don't know, maybe her sleeping with us is the right plan, but I won't sleep if she's in bed with us, and I just don't see anything good coming out of both of us being exhausted all the time." Then a thought hit him, and Tim got up, grabbed the plate out of the oven, dropped it back onto the rack, because it was hot, found a hot pad, and grabbed it again. "She can only go up and down the stairs once a day. Gonna take this up, that way she doesn't have to come down if she doesn't want to."

"Okay."

He was half way out of the kitchen when Gibbs said, "Fork."

Tim made a u-turn, grabbed some cutlery, and headed back up.

During breakfast, Kelly fell back to sleep. Shortly after that, Tim finished his food and Gibbs sent him to go sleep some more, too.

Eventually, while Kelly was still sleeping, Abby wandered down.

"Feeling better?" Gibbs asked. He was sitting at their kitchen table, cup of coffee next to him, reading something on his phone. Abby knew Tim had stuck a Kindle ap on there last year. She didn't know that Gibbs had ever used it.

Abby shrugged. "Hungry."

"Let's get that fixed." He got up. "Sit, rest, what do you want?"

She shrugged again. "Don't have a taste for anything. Just hungry."

While it's true that Gibbs knows everyone's drink orders, and a few little treats they all like, he's not getting a drink or a little treat. So, he's sort of floundering here with a request for something as vague as "food."

Well, he's floundering because he wants to get her something to remind her why she likes eating and that food is attached to pleasure and pleasure is a good thing. Sure, he can whip up a sandwich and a glass of juice easily enough, but he wants this to be something she wants but just doesn't know she wants.

For a moment there, he was thinking now would be a really good time for Tim to wake up and take over, but Tim doesn't have Gibbs' near psychic level of perfect timing, especially when he's dead asleep, so Gibbs is puttering around their kitchen trying to figure out what to feed Abby, who is sitting, quietly, looking awfully listless, at the kitchen table.

"Need more pain meds?"

She nodded at that.

So he got a dose, (had to fish out his glasses to read the dose and directions. That's the real reason he's willing to read on the Kindle app Tim stuck on his phone, he can make the text big enough he doesn't have to use his glasses to see it.) and the glass of cran-raspberry juice Abby likes, and gave them to her.

Finally, he decided that speed was probably more important than taste when it came to feeding Abby, so he used the last of the bacon he made and put together a BLT with lots of thick slices of tomato and three slices of bread.

He knows that part of Tim staying in good shape is not having lot of junk food around the house, but chips are really good with a BLT, and they just don't seem to have any, though he thought the cashews might do pretty well in their place. Crunchy and salty.

Abby tore through the sandwich and nuts, and he could tell from the speed she was eating that that wasn't enough food. There were peaches, and apparently Palmer had bought out every sort of ice cream in the store, so he dipped up a bowl of vanilla ice cream and cut up the peach, serving them up, too.

She tore through that pretty fast, too.

"More?"

"No. Eat too much more, my stomach will start to ache."

"Okay. Want more to drink?" He sort of remembered that nursing was thirsty as well as hungry work.

"Yes!"

He looked at the glass next to her, and then went digging through their cabinets. "Do you not have any Caf-Pow glasses here?"

"Nope."

He filled up three regular sized glasses for her. "That should do you for a little while." Then he made a note on his phone, next to the coffee note, to get some bigger cups. "You wanna go sit on the sofa, maybe be a little more comfortable?"

She nodded, got up, slowly, and headed in that direction. Gibbs took the glasses first, and set them on the little table next to the sofa. Then he carefully picked up the bouncy chair, and took it to the dining room table, where they could still easily see and hear Kelly. She stirred a little when he moved the chair, but didn't wake up.

Then he headed over to the sofa, pulled the recline lever for Abby, so she could lean back easily, and sat next to her, realizing that part of why she didn't recline it back for herself was that you have to use your stomach and back muscles to push it back, so he pushed it back, wrapped his arm around her, kissed her forehead as she snuggled in, and said, "Talk to me, Abbs."

She was quiet for a long minute, and then finally said, "I feel like I'm splitting in half. Like I can feel the little voice that's calm and rational and knows that none of this is the end of the world and everyone throughout all of history managed to do this just fine talking to me, but it keeps getting drowned out by this huge, scary, emotional, terrified, nervous voice that feels like if I ever close my eyes something horrible is going to happen."

"I know how that feels. As long as it keeps talking, you're still okay. It's when it shuts up that you're in trouble."

Abby looks up at Gibbs, suddenly getting that Gibbs has been far enough gone that little voice completely vanished. "What if it shuts up? I'm so scared I'm going to lose it."

"We're here. We'll help you find it again. We'll keep you and everyone else safe until we do."

"What if I can't find it, what if it just goes?" She's looking up at him with big, scared eyes.

"It won't. It's always there somewhere. Just sometimes it's hard to find. And if you need it, we'll carry you until you can find your way again."

"I feel like, if I stay quiet, I can still, sort of, faintly, hear that little normal voice."

"Then you be as quiet as you need to be." He kissed her again. "Tim and I can deal with it. Wanna go get more sleep?"

"Not worth it. She'll wake up and want to eat soon." Abby looked at Kelly and back at Gibbs. "I swear I know why the cows moo, now. I'm so sore, I'm about ready to start mooing."

Gibbs kissed her forehead, smiled, and said, quietly, "Mmmoooooo."

For a second Abby just stared at him, utterly shocked, then she felt the laugh start. "God, Gibbs, don't make me laugh. It hurts!"

He hugged her a little tighter. "Sorry. Just wanted to see you smile."

"You're making jokes and apologizing? Who are you, and what did you do with Gibbs?"

"Grandpa's prerogative. I'm allowed to be goofy when I'm home with my family."

Abby smiled at him, tearing up. "Yeah, you are."

"Hey, stop that. Don't want you crying over me."

"Too bad. New mommy prerogative. I get to cry when and wherever I want."

He kissed her again. "Yeah, you do."

Eventually, Kelly did wake up, and Gibbs noticed one snag in the set up at the McGee house, changing table and diaper stuff is upstairs.

Abby can't go upstairs.
Tim's sleeping.

So, once again he's on diaper duty, which was never his favorite baby-oriented chore, but small crying person wants food and feeding her is going to be a lot more pleasant if she's clean, so he grabs
Kelly and heads up to the changing table.

It does shock him how fast it comes back. Before Kelly was born, he's sure he hadn't thought about the mechanics of a diaper change, let alone for a little baby, in more than thirty years. But his body remembers this.

His hands know the routine.

It seems like the wipes and diapers are better than they were. More snug. Less leaky. But the basics are all the same.

He was never a huge music fan. Most of the time it was just there. But humming or quietly singing something seemed to make his Kelly happy, give her something to listen to, maybe made him feel like he was communicating with her, when neither of them had much to say.

Shannon had always been a Simon and Garfunkle and John Denver fan. He has very clear images of her sitting in the rocking chair, nursing Kelly, gently rocking, humming Scarboro Fair or Leaving on a Jet Plane.

He tended to go back further. Elvis and memories of the days when his parents were happy, healthy, and getting along.

So, as he's lifting up little legs, and wiping off a tiny tush, he's quietly singing: "Wise men say/Only fools rush in/But I can't help/Falling in love with you..." Kelly's watching him, squirming a bit, crying a little, probably doesn't like how cold the wipes feel on her skin.

He smiled at her, looking amused. "Yeah, my Kelly was never very impressed with my singing, either." But he kept it up, moving to the next verse, wondering where the hell they kept the baby powder, because he's not seeing any of it, and step three, after remove soiled diaper, remove baby poop, was apply powder, but if they've got it, it's not here. So he puts the clean diaper on, snaps up the onesie, and swaddles Kelly nice and snug, holding her against his shoulder.

"Ready for lunch? I know your mom's ready to feed you."

He found Abby on the sofa, watching... something. He's got no idea what it is, but there are two guys who are very clearly not FBI agents, not even TV's idea of what an FBI agent looks like, they're both way too pretty, investigating something, asking some really non-standard questions.

He sat down next to her, and handed Kelly over. "All cleaned up and ready to eat. Do you guys have baby powder?"

"No. Not good for them. They breathe it in, and it's bad for their lungs."

"Of course." He and all seventy-million of his baby boomer compatriots all grew up just fine with baby powder and all of them managed to keep their kids alive while using it, but if it's bad for babies, he's not going to argue. (He may, however, mention to it Fornell, who he's sure will sympathize.
And, it occurs to him, Penny might, too.)

He got up, washed his hands, brought down some diapers, wipes, a few blankets, and set up a makeshift changing table on the dining room table, and sure, it might not be the most sanitary thing ever, but he's figuring that's the most functional place for him to do it.
Then he sat down next to Abby, wrapping his arm around her, watching her nurse Kelly and basking in this, being home, wrapped around his girls, feeling really, right, for the first time in years.

Two days later, Tim gave him a copy of the shot of all three of them snoozing on the sofa.
The Fifth Day

So, in one of the books he read, and no, at this point Tim has no idea at all which one it was in, there was something about how for the first three days babies more or less sleep all the time, and you get to this point where you’re feeling a little cocky about how easy it is to get them to sleep and that just possibly you’ve got this sleeping thing down and really, it’s not that hard.

And then they wake up.

And the universe laughs long and hard at your idiot-new-parent hubris.

And so, on day four, when Tim was starting to feel like maybe he did have a handle on this baby thing, Kelly woke up.

It amazes Tim how one tiny person, a person smaller than the bags of sugar he used to buy for his coffee, can suck the energy out of the three adults currently devoting their time to managing her.

Even Gibbs keeps falling asleep holding her.

It’s like she’s some sort of energy sink. Like the food and sleep isn’t what’s giving her the energy to grow. Psy Vamp, Psychic Vampire, a term he hadn’t thought about since college, like she’s some sort of tiny Psy Vamp draining them of any and every desire to do anything other than sleep.

Or maybe it’s that she slows down time. The constant buzzing distractions of life fade away when caring for a newborn, and with the distractions that keep your mind busy offline, all you want to do is nap.

He’s worked around the clock many times. Worked flat out, just catching cat naps, subsisting on caffeine and adrenaline for days at a time.

But this is different. He can feel his time sense slipping away, not sure if it’s day or night. The fact that it’s been gray and rainy isn’t helping, no sunrise, no sunset, just gray and darker gray and then occasional thunder storms to liven up the dark or not so dark gray.

Life’s slipping into three hour shifts, long, long, long three hours shifts when he’s awake for a full one, dealing with a tiny person who is now very awake and interested in letting everyone in the universe know that, and much, much, much too short when he’s trying to sleep.

And at least he and Gibbs can share them. Abby’s got to get up for all of them, and he can’t imagine how she’s doing this because he feels wrecked, and he’s not the one who got cut open, he’s not the one healing up from major surgery, and he’s not the one who’s providing food 24/7 for this tiny person.

He crashes most of the day, when Gibbs is there. Gibbs heads home to his own place at night, so Tim is on for those hours, and poor Abby’s got to do them all.

She’d been crashed out, utterly exhausted at four AM, so he’d headed down to get a bottle, let her get some more sleep, which she really, really looks like she needs, and she just about bit his head off, because apparently skipping a feed hurts like a son of a bitch, so while he’s got permission to feed
Kelly, apparently it’s not a great plan to actually execute.

“Come on, Kelly, sleeping time. Please, baby, sleep.” He’s pacing around their downstairs, patting her back, begging her to sleep. Done about twenty-five circuits of their floor plan, desperately trying to get her to settle down. Somehow, Kelly decided that her really-active-let’s-play-with-Dad-time would be from 4:00 to 7:00.

She’s alert, awake, crying, for God alone knows what. She’s fed, changed, burped, comfortably warm, and he’s stripped her down twice to make sure nothing was pinching her or uncomfortable.

If she wasn’t five days old, he’d be thinking she’d doing it just to piss him off.

And honestly, he’s awfully tempted to think she’s doing it just to piss him off even though she is five days old.

“Fuck it.” He headed into the living room, booted up the Playstation, turned on Twisted Metal Black, which he hasn’t played in forever, laid down on the sofa, Kelly on his chest, still complaining about life in general, and started to play.

He’s terrible at it. Hasn’t played in years and completely fried to boot, but the music is loud, the controls are easy, and by some miracle (perhaps putting his DNA together with Abby’s means he’s got a proto gamer on his chest) Kelly shut up and in five minutes fell asleep.

He played for ten more minutes, making sure she’s really asleep, then kissed her forehead, turned off the game, and crept up the stairs to put her in her bed and catch a few more hours of sleep.

He hit their bed, almost asleep, and heard Abby say, “Were you gaming?”

“Yeah. Needed some distraction. I was starting to get pissed at her and that’s not good.”

He feels her nod.

“What were you playing?”

“Twisted Metal Black.”

“Old school.”

“Yep. Were you able to sleep at all?”

He felt another head shake from her. Tim’s better at sleeping through a crying Kelly than Abby is, but neither of them are good at it. He looks up and sees it’s 5:55, an hour before Kelly’s due to eat again. “How about you pump now, and I’ll take the next feed, see if we can get you four solid hours of sleep?”

One more nod, then the feel of her getting, very slowly, out of the bed.

Abby’s silence is disconcerting.

He knows she’s more tired than she’s ever been. (He sure as hell is, too.)
But baby blues (he hopes, please let this be baby blues, please let it get better and soon) are hitting her hard, and she’s not talking much at all. She’s sort of ghosting through the day, sleeping every minute she can, not smiling, not laughing, not speaking.

The pain meds probably aren’t helping her mood or sleepiness all that much. Though she’s starting to take less of them. Just two doses yesterday, so that’s good, right?

But… he doesn’t think she’s actually said more than ten words to him today.

He tried to get her to talk a little, but she just looked at him, so, so tired, and headed for bed, where he tucked her in so she could get another nap.

He headed downstairs, to where Gibbs is, and said, “This’ll get better, right?”

Gibbs nods. “Only been five days. And she’s still on meds. Go get a nap yourself.”

Abby and Kelly are, for the moment, sleeping. He should probably be sleeping, too. He’s certainly tired. Really tired. Amazingly tired.

But he’s also pretty smelly. Hasn’t gotten a shower in… Two days? Three? He rubs his face, like that could tell him, but he hasn’t shaved since the morning before Kelly was born, so it’s not like the length of his whiskers is illuminating on this particular subject.

He knows it’s been longer than he likes. A lot longer than he likes. Mostly because, for the last five days, if given the chance, he sleeps, which means he hasn’t been in the shower a whole lot. And Kelly hasn’t exactly been kind when it comes to keeping him smelling good.

So, yeah, he needs to get a shower before he wants to rip his own skin off or knocks Abby out with his funk.

Hot water felt good. Felt really good. Even woke him up a little, helped to shake the sort of round the clock, no sense of time, Zombie shuffle he’s been living in for the last however long.

Soaping up, thoroughly, because it has been a while and he really does prefer to be clean, reminded him that part of his body had certainly wanted some attention lately and he’d just been too tired and preoccupied to deal with it.

But, in that it’s standing at attention, and his hand is curled around it, he’s thinking that maybe he’s awake enough to take care of this, and the whole you-can’t-get-off-I-can’t-get-off-thing is over, so…

Yeah.

Oh, that’s...

And done.

He’s honestly kind of relieved that Abby wasn’t there for that, because at no time did he ever want her to get to enjoy a re-play of his first time with the glorious fun of got off before it was all the way in.

And it did feel pretty good, though mostly in a he’d probably been one day, maybe two, tops from another wet dream, so just dealing with the backed-up, swollen, really dude, get off and do it soon, sort of sensation was awfully nice.
But more than that, just being clean and warm felt good, and getting out, toweling off quickly, and then crashing into their bed for another cat nap, was okay, too. Sure, hours of sleep would have been better yet, but, well, like with jerking off, these days he’ll take what he can get.

When he headed back downstairs, Gibbs was nowhere to be found. Abby was sleeping on their sofa. And Tony was sitting at the kitchen table, initialing his way through a stack of paperwork while Kelly cooed and kicked her feet in the bouncy chair.

He was a bit surprised to see Tony there, and Tony read it on his face. “Gibbs and Ziva are off killing Palmer at bootcamp.”

That gets a little smile out of Tim. He picks up Kelly and tilts his head toward the back porch. For once, it’s not raining: really warm and humid, lots of wind, the sky is still gray, and it looks like another thunder storm is probably due in the next hour. But him and Tony and Kelly on the back porch means more quiet for Abby, so outside they go.

“Working hard?” Tim asked, sitting next to Tony on the bench that’s tucked against the back of their house.

“Signing all my stuff. Signing all his stuff. Forgot how much more paperwork goes along with Team Leader. Looks like you’re napping on the job,” he says with a grin and a little shove.

Tim laughed. He knows exactly how black the circles under his eyes are right now.

“So, how is it?” Tony asked Tim.

“Tiring. Like… running a marathon.”

“When have you ever run a marathon?”

Tim flashed him his exasperated look, and Tony grinned at him, enjoying joking with him. Tim rolled his eyes. “Just go with me. Any given step of it isn’t a big deal. It’s just moving forward. One step. Another step. Two more. And on and on. But you don’t get to stop. And you don’t get enough down time. Gibbs and I can at least swap, but Abby’s on all the time, and she’s so fried.”

Tony nodded at that. When he and Ziva came over to fetch Gibbs and make sure Tim and Abby had someone else in the house, Abby was feeding Kelly, and he’d never even imagined that she could possibly look that tired. His little Energizer Lab Bunny needs new batteries.

“None of this is hard. Some of it’s pretty gross. Been a dad…” he had to think, figure out what day it is, and then count, twice, to figure out how long he’s been doing this, “five days, six if you want to count Tuesday, and I know vastly more than I ever wanted to about all sorts of fluids that I’d really prefer stay located inside Kelly or Abby’s bodies, but it’s not hard. It’s just… twenty-six miles of steps, and that’s hard.”

Tony nodded at that. “Still think it was a good idea?”

Tim kissed the top of Kelly’s head. He was holding her back to his chest, so she can see the leaves waving around. (Well, really, for her, it’s just a dark gray blur, but it’s new and moving, so she’s fascinated.) “Oh yeah. Whether or not Abby still thinks that is up for debate, but assuming she ever gets six hours of sleep in a row again, I think she’ll come around. How about you? How’s team leader?”
Tony smiled a little. “Any given step of it isn’t hard, but all together…”

Tim nodded back.

“I’m ready for it. I know what I’m doing. Draga’s slipping into the groove pretty easily. He’s working really well with Ziva. He still thinks I’m the idiot who’s been promoted above his station, but that’ll get settled eventually, and he’s not actively challenging my control.

“Three instead of four is a little more of a challenge, but not too much more. We’re just a little slower because I’ve got one fewer guy to put on different leads.

“The fact that I’m not actually the team leader and have to keep getting Gibbs’ approval for some things is kind of annoying, and I can see he feels that, too. ‘What’re you calling me for, DiNozzo? You know what to do. Just go do it.’ But I’ve still got to whip it past him, so I do call.”

Tim’s noticed Gibbs wandering off to take the occasional call.

“How’s he doing?” Tony asked.

Tim smiled at that, too. “He’s happy. In a way you’ve never seen him happy. I know he’s going back to work tomorrow, and you’ll have him back again, and he’ll go back to being Gibbs, but, well, he’ll be back for dinner tonight, stick around, see for yourself.” He paused for a second, and then said, “Stick around and meet Pop.”

“Pop?”

“That’s what Kelly’s gonna call him.”

Tony had an especially satisfied looking smile on his face at that. “Happy Gibbs… You mean that smiley, goofy guy we got back from Mexico with the mustache?”

Tim laughed a little. “Times six. He’ll walk her around, singing her Elvis songs, with a big grin on his face. And yeah, I don’t think he’s touched a razor since Kelly was born.”

“Hmm… That some sort of new dad dress code?”

Tim rubbed his own, rather whiskery, face. “I’d cut the hell out of myself if I tried it. You know the biggest difference to life with a kid?”

“Nope.”

“A week ago, a lot of little shit mattered. Stupid, little, niggly things that don’t have any real importance, like shaving or putting the laundry away, mattered last Monday. And today, they just don’t. In some ways, it’s really liberating. The dishes don’t get put away, what happens? Oh, nothing. We take them out of the dishwasher and eat off of them.

“And really focusing. Kelly, Abby, food, sleep, diapers, enough clean clothing to keep us somewhat dressed, and that one might get dropped when Jethro goes back to work, and that’s it. Nothing else, at all, matters.” He laughs a little at that. “Right now, my whole job is keeping Abby rested enough to maintain a fingernail hold on sane. Everything that doesn’t contribute to that isn’t important.”

“How’s she doing?”

“I don’t really know. We get little glimpses of her, so she’s not totally gone, but… She’s had major surgery, so she’s healing up from that, she’s still bleeding—” Tony looks alarmed at that, so Tim adds, “It’s normal, after you have a baby, you bleed for like a month. Kelly eats every three hours, and it takes almost an hour to feed her. I try to take some of the feeds but not nursing really hurts, so I might get her a few more hours of sleep, but then her boobs start to scream at her. She’s on pain meds, and they make her sleepy, which can’t be good on top of how tired she is. It’ll be another week at least before her hormones even out...

“I’m worried. Breena’s saying this is still normalish, but to keep an eye on it. On Tuesday we’ve got a doctor’s appointments. A final wound check for Abby, so I’ll bring it up then, and see what Dr. Draz has to say about it.”

“Okay.” Tony looks at Kelly, hanging out on her daddy’s chest, watching the oncoming storm clouds, looking pretty calm. “You think you’re gonna do this again?”

“I would, in a heartbeat. Yeah, I’m exhausted, but…” Tim’s got a tired, but soul deep smile on his face. “Nothing else is like this, at all. We made a person. I mean, look at her…” He stroked her face, and she turned toward his hand, sucking on his finger. “This is love turned to life, and my life devoted to nurturing and protecting that. This is… all the purpose I’ve ever wanted or needed.

“But, I’ve got the easy job. So, I think Kelly having a little brother or sister is Abby’s decision.” He looks up from Kelly to Tony, thinking, hard. “Okay, I know my short-term memory is shot right now, but have you actually held her, yet?”

Tony shrugged a little, not signaling that he didn’t know, more an admission that he’s not really comfortable with babies.

“Come on. She’s not gonna bite you. Here.” Tim put the spit up diaper over Tony’s shoulder, and then handed Kelly over.

“Now, be nice. Uncle Tony’s a little nervous,” he said to Kelly. She looked up at her Uncle, that mildly confused look on her face.

Tony looked from her to Tim and back to her. “You look at me like this, sometimes.”

“Abby’s said that, too. Besides the lips, I think she looks like Abby. Jethro does, too.”

“Was he wearing his glasses when he was looking at her?”

“Don’t think so.”

Tony nods at him, reminding him that Gibbs’ up close vision isn’t exactly what most people would call good. “So now what?”

“Just hold her. Hang out. She likes being sung to. ‘Bout five minutes her eyes’ll get droopy, and I’ll take her to her crib and devoutly pray to any and every god listening that I can successfully lay her in the crib and get her to actually close her eyes and sleep in there.”

Tony laughed at that. “Didn’t know you were a praying man.”

Tim smiled back at him, then leaned back against the house and closed his eyes. “I’m usually not. Poke me in three minutes.”

“Not a problem.” He looked at Kelly, and said to Tim, “I’m a bad singer.”

“Neither of us care.”
Ton stood up, Kelly snuggled on his shoulder and sang quietly while pacing, “I can only say these things to you while you’re sleeping/I hear the hum from the wire as the sounds of the morning creep in/I lie awake and pretend you can hear me…”

And Tim caught a three minute cat nap listening to Tony butcher the Airborne Toxic Event.
"Everything still on schedule?" Jimmy asked Breena as he hopped into their car after Bootcamp.

"Tony texted three minutes ago. Abby's awake. Kelly's awake. Tim's awake."

"Good. You got the present?"

Breena rolled her eyes at him. "You think I'm going to forget the Father's Day present when I'm driving to the Father's Day gathering?"

Back in the beginning of June, after they had the c-section scheduled for the 18th, with, supposedly, the day they'd be coming home the 21st, Father's Day, Abby had given the Father's Day present she'd gotten for Tim to Breena, along with a promise to make sure he got it. Abby had been pretty certain that they'd be a bit too pre-occupied to remember it, otherwise.

Jimmy'd been talking to Tony about it. (Tony had asked what his weekend plans were, so he mentioned bootcamp, and that Breena had something special planned for him for Father's Day breakfast, and then over to Tim's to drop off his present.) And Tony mentioned that he and Ziva had the present that Tim and Abby wanted to make sure that Gibbs got.

And from there a plan was born.

It'll be a pretty fast visit. Presents, quick dinner (Penny and Ducky are bringing it), and off again. They don't want to cut too much into Tim or Abby's rest time, or do anything that might stress Abby out, but an hour to exchange some presents, enjoy each other's company, and have a good meal seemed like it'd be welcome.

And, of course, the dads in question do not, (they hope) know this plan is in the offing.

Jimmy shrugged at Breena. "Just checking. Getting her out the door can take a lot of attention, and I know I forget things," he said, looking back at Molly, sitting in her car seat, babbling about going to Uncle Tim and Aunt Abby's house and seeing the baby.

Jimmy flashed a quick text to Ducky, waited a few seconds for the response, and said, "Ducky and Penny are about ten minutes out."

"Okay, and Ziva's got Jethro, no problems?"

"None at all."

"Great. So how was Bootcamp?"

"Fun. Different. I feel like I need instant replay when I go up against Ziva; she's so fast."

Breena smiled at that.

"She tells me Draga would like to join in, but wanted to see how we felt about it first."

"And how do you feel about it?"

"Eh. I'd rather he didn't join in, but can't think of a good way to say it without sounding stupid."

Breena was surprised by that. "Why not?"
"It's just… If it's just us and Gibbs or Gibbs and Ziva, it's… not a pissing match. We're bad at this. Maybe not on a cosmic level or anything, and we're getting better, but, Tim and I, we're still bad at it. And just the three or four of us is fun. It doesn't matter that we're bad and they're better, and… Look, Draga's probably a great guy. Ziva likes him. But I don't need my ass handed to me on a weekly basis by some twenty-nine-year-old flyboy. But I don't know how to say that and not be a jerk."

Breena nodded.

"And on top of it, he's new to DC. His last posting before FLETC was Colorado, so he's not close to any of his friends, and is probably looking for something to do on the weekends, so I get why he might want to come along, but…"

"What'd Gibbs say about it?"

He didn't. Just kind of looked at Ziva and shrugged. I'm sure there was more to that look than I was getting, probably something about their team dynamics and leadership and something with Tony, but Ziva seemed to get it, so I don't think it matters if I got it all or not."

"Okay."

"You sure it's okay we stay for dinner?" Tony asks Gibbs as he and Tim 'start to get ready for dinner.'

"Just making chicken on the grill and salad. Adding two more chicken breasts isn't a problem," Tim answers, though he's the one on salad duty.

Tony heard a car pull up and grins. Tim's talking to Gibbs about Bootcamp, so he missed the sound of car doors opening and closing, but he didn't miss the sound of his front door opening, and Jimmy and Breena's voices, as well as Molly shrieking, "BABY!"

Tim and Gibbs are both looking pretty surprised. Tony put an arm around each of them, steering them out of the kitchen and into the living room. "Or, how about we handle dinner, and you two relax and enjoy your Father's Day."

Of all the things Tim might have expected, surprise Father's Day celebration was nowhere on the list. Sure, he'd decided he wanted to do those pictures for Jethro, but somehow the idea that Father's Day would roll around and he would be a Dad hadn't occurred to him, at all.

But he is a Dad, and he's home, with his family, sitting next to Abby, who's holding Kelly, opening a card, with, ohhh… He really likes that.

It's a tattoo idea. A small green dragon, this one properly fierce looking, not a 'my little dragon.' It'd go on his calf, with a slim knotwork band circling the rest of his leg. If they have other children there'd be room for other bands. Eventually, when they know they're done with babies, they could close it off, with two bands, one above and one below the main design, that would circle his leg completely, one for each of them.

Yeah, he likes that a whole lot.

There's a gift certificate for it, but no set appointment date, which makes sense because he knows this'll take a while and he's got no desire to wander off long enough to get it done, not now. But eventually… Oh yes.

He kisses Abby. "I really like it."

"Good." She nods, and there's a hint of a little smile on her face. He hugs her tight and kisses her again, trying to get across how pleased he is, and hoping maybe some of his joy could rub off on her and light her eyes back up. But the best he gets is a little glimmer of… something, maybe it's joy.

He passes the sketch around, and everyone seems to approve, though Tony makes a crack about never getting him out of the kilt once he's got something on his leg to show off.

He laughed at that. "No point to having them if no one ever sees them."

Ziva looked at him, amused, cool smile on her face. "I wouldn't say that. Sometimes it's nice to have a secret that only intimate friends get to see."

Tony smiled at that, looking a little cocky, and Breena added, "That's right, you have one, too, don't you?"

Tim takes a minute, thinking about exactly how much of Ziva he's seen, and how he's never, ever seen a tattoo, so where said tattoo would have to be, and laughed a little at that.

"I stand corrected, Ziva. So, what is yours?"

Ziva smiled wide and mysterious. "Like it's exact location, what it is, is a secret."

"This started as McGee's idea," Ziva said as Tony handed Gibbs a nicely wrapped rectangle.

"Then he passed it off to us," Breena added, "Because there was one bit that they weren't able to get for themselves."

"Then we got it for safe keeping and timely delivery," Tony wrapped up.

Gibbs slipped his finger under the pretty silver paper (He's thinking Breena was in charge of wrapping as well as whatever the last bit was, because he cannot imaging any of the boys, let alone Abby or Ziva owning or using silver paper with little pink and white flowers on it.) and carefully ripped it apart at the tape.

Under the paper, he found a three part frame, and in that frame was three pictures. The first one was him with the boys at Tony and Ziva's wedding. The last one was him with his girls, also at Tony and Ziva's wedding. And the middle one, the one Jimmy and Breena must have taken, was from the hospital. He's holding Kelly in one arm, and Molly is sitting in his lap, his other arm around her, looking at her cousin, very gently touching her face.

All the girls got kisses (including the two baby ones), and the guys got some affectionate hair ruffling. He got to Tim last, and looked at him with a combination of thanks and what inspired this?

Tim just shrugged a little, and said, quietly. "You mentioned not having pictures. I know we're not them, but… Thought you might have like having some."

Gibbs nodded, smiling, and sat down, looking over the shots again.

Ducky, sensing this was probably too much emotional touchy, feely stuff for the guys in this crowd to be comfortable with, suggested that they grab some dinner, which seemed to make everyone more comfortable.

And so, dinner, grilled chicken (not cooked by Gibbs), salad (not made by Tim), watermelon, and cupcakes were had and enjoyed, as well as some adventures in fathering stories from Gibbs and Jimmy.

As they were cleaning up, Tony pulled Gibbs aside and said to him, "You don't need to come in tomorrow."

Gibbs gave him the Really, you sure? look.

"Unless someone turns up dead, I'm good with Ziva and Draga. Stay here, be a Dad, it's good for you."

Gibbs looked from Tony to Ziva, not able to put the idea into words, but still getting across, Tim and Abby aren't my only kids.

"Yeah, but they're the ones that need you right now. I've got work. Someone dies; I'll call."

Gibbs nodded at that.

And of course, less than ten seconds after that nod ended, his phone, Tony's phone, Ducky's phone, and Jimmy's phone all rang at once.

Tony got his first. Dead Marine out at Quantico.

And so, as quickly, and as much of a surprise as Father's Day was to start, it ended. And to Tim it does feel pretty weird to watch them head out, getting ready to go and find the dead man's killer, and not go along.

Breena, Molly, and Penny stuck around to make sure everything got cleaned up. Penny mostly kept an eye on Abby and Molly, keeping the little girl occupied and making sure she wasn't too rough with Abby or Kelly.

Tim was putting away the extra food while Breena rinsed off the cutlery, sticking it in the dishwasher.

"She been like this the whole time?" Breena asked, and he didn't need any clarification that she's talking about Abby.

"Pretty much."

"When's her next doctor's appointment?"

"Tuesday."

Breena nods. "Make sure you mention it to her. This isn't normal."

"Okay."

"She still bleeding heavily?"
"Maybe? Why?"

"If her iron levels are off, that can depress mood."

"I'll mention that, too."

"Good. She's going to get better, Tim."

"I know. But the girl who designed that tattoo's not here right now, and that scares the hell out of me."

Breena nodded. "You gonna be okay on your own tomorrow?"

"If I'm not, I'll call."

"Even if you are, give me a call anyway. After nap time we'll swap. You take Molly, and I'll get Abby out of the house for a bit."

"Please!"

Breena gave him a hug. "No problem."
Help

One of the facts of the funeral industry is that you rarely have off time, per se. Funeral homes don't really close. But, like with any other business, every person has their own specialty, and those take place at different times.

Breena's a mortician. (Her mom is the Funeral Director, so she handles the front of the house, along with her sister. She and her Dad take care of the bodies.) So her part of the job usually takes place over a fairly set number of hours. Usually in the morning.

So most days she works from eight to one, maybe two if they get a lot of people in.

Which means most days she picks Molly up from daycare, they play a little, then nap time, more playing, eventually Jimmy gets home, dinner, and then they have some time with each other once Molly goes to bed.

It works pretty well.

And it also means it's fairly easy to swing by Tim and Abby's once Molly's up.

Because Breena's mommy senses are tingling, hard. Something more than just baby blues is wrong with Abby, and that needs to get nipped in the bud.

Tim's looking awfully glad to see her when she comes over. Abby's nursing Kelly, and Breena goes to sit next to her. She's not talking, not really all there, and it… it just hurts so see her so out of it.

Breena goes to get Abby an extra drink, and Tim tags along. "What sort of meds is she on right now?"

"Tylenol 3, now. It's got codeine in it, but she was like this yesterday on Percocet."

"Okay. She sensitive to opiates?"

"Not that sensitive. Morphine just made her really happy."

"All right. When was the last time she was out of the house."

"Day we brought Kelly home."

"Once she's done nursing, we're going for a walk."

"Sounds good. I'll keep the girls busy."

And so, post-nursing, Breena gently cajoled Abby out of the house, and started a slow amble around the neighborhood.

Once they got out of sight of Abby's house, Breena said,"Talk to me, Abby, come on I've been there, done that, got the milk and spit-up stained commemorative t-shirt."

Abby just shrugged a little, looking awfully listless.
"I'm not Tim. You aren't going to say anything that horrifies me. You probably aren't going to say anything I didn't think myself. Just let it out, because it's never going to get better if you keep it inside."

She shrugged again.

"Come on."

Abby slumped a little, and Breena wrapped her arms around her.

Finally Abby said, "It's never going to get better. It can't get better. This was the biggest mistake I've ever made, and I can't fix it or make it better because she's a person and Tim adores her so if I want him I've got to keep her, and I just don't..." and from there Abby lost her words as she sobbed on Breena's shoulder.

"Hey... It's okay to feel like this. It's okay," Breena said quietly while rubbing Abby's back. "It's okay."

"I don't want anything bad to happen to her. I just wish she was gone. Wish we had never done this. I feel like I set fire to myself. Everything hurts all the time. It's unending, a constant, sucking black hole of never-ending need that I'm feeding myself into, breaking into millions of pieces, and it just never ends."

"It's okay, Abby."

"I'm so alone on this. I can't really sleep, can't really relax because there's just me. If something goes wrong, I can't count on him."

"Oh, honey." Breena keeps petting Abby's back, hating seeing her so gone and desperately hoping they can get her better.

"I can't ever turn off. I don't want her. Don't want him. Don't want me, even. Don't want anything. But I can't turn off, can't relax, can't fail." Abby sounds utterly crushed as she's saying this. "Too many people expect me to be perfect, so I've got to do it. It just never ends. There's no breaks. No free time. I'm trapped, chained to a seven pound person who needs me all the time, and there's nothing I can do about it."

"I felt the same way when Molly was little." No she hadn't, not even close, but right now Breena figures Abby needs someone to talk to who's been there way more than she needs the truth. "This doesn't last forever. You are going to get through this."

"No, I'm not."

"Yes, you are. If I have to pick you up and drag your ass through, you're going to get through. Look, you may need medication for this. And that's okay, too, but maybe, first, we could try getting you some sleep?"

"Can't sleep." Her eyes are wasted, dead, staring off into the distance, not seeing the tidy houses and neighbors going about their summertime. "If I sleep something might happen, so I've got to be there and able to deal with it."

"No, you don't. Tim's got this."

"I lay there, eyes closed, trying, but I can't sleep. They think I'm asleep because I'm so quiet, but I can't sleep."
"If you came to my house, do you think you could shut down?"

"I can't go to your house; I've got to feed her."

"No you don't."

"But formula—"

Breena knows they've been over this once, and she knows how Abby got on the c-section thing, so she's assuming this is just a symptom of not having the rational part of her mind in charge. "No. You do not have to breastfeed every single meal. She will not starve, and you need the rest. She's doing a one AM and four AM feed, right?"

"Yeah."

"Those two. You'll do a bottle for them. Tim'll get the first three nights, and if you have to stay at our house to let him do it, we'll do that, but you have to sleep. By three nights your breasts won't be killing you, Kelly won't be expecting to nurse those feeds, and then you two can alternate nights, which means at least three nights a week you'll get eight straight hours of sleep. And with any luck, once you get closer to rested you'll remember why you love Kelly and why you wanted to make babies with Tim in the first place."

"It'll hurt." She just looks so defeated by that. Like one more pain on top of all the other pain is the straw that'll not just break the camel's back, but kneecap it, hamstring it, and then slit its throat and piss on its corpse.

"I know, honey, but we have a breast pump at my house. You pump enough to take the edge off, it takes ten minutes, you go back to sleep. Next night Tim's got milk for one of the feeds and formula for the next, and by the time three days are up, your body is used to it. You need the sleep. You need the down time, and if you have to come to my house to get it, you come to my house. We've got a perfectly good guest room with a very comfy bed and absolutely no little babies that need to be fed every three hours."

Abby doesn't look like she's buying it. But she also doesn't look like she's going to fight with Breena about it.

"Come on, we can't figure out if this is just you so tired you can't see straight or something worse until you get some sleep. And maybe, if you can get that sleep, you'll start to feel like you again."

Abby doesn't look like she's buying that either.

"Tell me about hurts all over. What's going on with that?"

"I just ache, all over. The incision aches. My breasts ache. My joints ache. Hell, my teeth ache."

"Okay, that's not normal. You've got a doctor's appointment tomorrow, right?"

"Maybe."

Breena sees that answer and suddenly gets that Abby has no idea what day it is. "How's the bleeding going?"

"Still pretty heavy."

"How heavy?"
"New pad every two hours."

Breena places her hands on Abby's forehead, but doesn't feel any fever. Of course, Abby's also on Tylenol, so if she did have an infection, that might be stopping any fever she might have.

"You and Tim have to make sure to tell the doctor that. If you've got an infection or if you're getting anemic, that'll mess with how you're feeling."

Abby nods, listlessly.

"Come on, we're going around the block, at least once, getting you some fresh air, some sunshine, and a few exercise endorphins."

Abby shrugs, letting Breena lead her.

When they got back, Tim had Kelly in her crib, sleeping, and was watching the Muppet Show with Molly. Elton John was belting out Crocodile Rock while Muppet Crocks danced around.

Breena walked Abby up to their room, got her settled and said, "Rest. Tonight you come to my place, and we'll get you some solid sleep."

Abby nodded and laid down.

Then Breena headed down. Tim looked at her expectantly.

"She's not sleeping, at all," Breena said to him as Molly hopped into her lap.

"What? She's in bed all the time."

"She might be, but she's not sleeping. She can't shut down. She's on constant alert. But we've got a game plan. She's gonna rest, do the dinner feed and the bedtime feed, then she's coming over to my place tonight, where, with any luck, she'll be able to shut down and sleep. You're on tonight, tomorrow, and the night after, and if she's got to stay at my place to sleep, she will."

Tim nods along with that. "Not a problem."

"If we're lucky she's just so tired she can't find her way anymore. If not this is full on post-partum depression maybe edging onto psychosis, so I want you to take this very seriously. If a few nights of sleep isn't perking her up, both of you are going to the doctor to see about some medication for this. Don't just let this slide, and if she's still not talking to you after a few nights of sleep, I don't care how much she doesn't want to go, you're taking her to the doctor's. Kelly can come to our place, we'll keep watch over her, but you make sure Abby gets whatever help she needs."

"Okay. That, I can do. I will carry her in if I need to."

"Good. She's telling me she's still bleeding heavily and aches all over. Make sure the Doc knows that. She might be anemic or have some sort of low grade infection and that could be knocking her for a loop."

Tim nods, grabbing his phone and taking notes.

Breena checked the clock, 5:30, getting onto dinner time. "Molly and I are going to head home. You bring her over to our place after the 10 o'clock feed, and Jimmy'll bring her back in time for the 7:00 AM one."
"She'll be over at your place around 11."

"When's her appointment tomorrow?"

"One thirty."

"Give me a call when you get back."

"Will do."

And plan in place, Breena gathered up Molly to head home and get ready for dinner time.
The Rollercoaster

This is useless and futile and stupid.

They’re driving toward Breena’s house. Kelly’s in the backseat, asleep. Tim’s not saying anything, and Abby’s drowning in failure.

Feed the baby.

Everyone else in the whole damn world manages to do this just fine without going bonkers, but she can’t. Breena didn’t need to run away from Molly to cope with this. She did just fine.

But Abby can’t. Her mind won’t shut down. So instead of lying, tense, in her own bed, watching the gray night get darker and then lighter, and the red glow from the numbers on the clock, and the green glow from the baby monitor flickering away, she’s going to Breena’s so she can spend the night staring at an entirely different set of glowing lights, not sleeping, aching, drowning in overwhelming failure.

And tomorrow they’ll go to the doctor and she’ll get poked and prodded and it’ll just be more futile. There’s nothing wrong with her besides epic failure.

Beside the fact that she can’t do the one thing every woman on earth was designed to do.

Tim drops her off, leaves the engine running, Kelly in her seat, and walks her into Jimmy and Breena’s, kissing her gently, whispering, “Sleep well,” and heading off.

Like I’m not sleeping by choice. Like all I have to do is just change my mind, and then I’ll be able to sleep.

Breena takes her upstairs, and yes, the bed is soft, and comfy. And there’s some chamomile tea, which smelled pretty good, and was actually fairly tasty, and…

“She asleep?” Jimmy asked when Breena came back in from checking on Molly and Abby. It’s their pre-bedtime routine, while he’s brushing his teeth she goes and just looks in on Molly. This time she added Abby to the list.

“I think so. What’d you put in the tea?”

“Very mild sedative. Low dose, too. She’s already on pain meds, so I didn’t want anything to mess with that. Just enough to take the edge off and help her brain shut down.”

“Looks like it did. She was saying that she’s not been sleeping, and that everyone thought she was because she’s been so quiet, but right now she’s snoring…”

Jimmy nods, rinses out the toothpaste in his mouth, and says, “Let’s hope that’s a good sign. Breast pump already in there?”

“Yeah, and extra bottles. Hopefully she’s tired enough she’ll sleep right through and just be really happy to see Kelly come morning feed time.”

“Let’s hope.”
Trying to sleep and still be awake enough to get up for each feed is fucking impossible.

Tim is getting very, very clearly why Abby was having such a hard time shutting down. With him being the one who’s got to wake up enough to grab her (because before, when she started to ask for food, Abby would poke him, he’d go get her, get her cleaned up, and then bring her to Abby.) means that every time he hears a little chirp or squeak through the baby monitor he jerks back to full on awake trying to figure out if it’s food time.

He did that straight through the 11:00 to 1:00 AM sleep time.

Finally, at close to 2:00, having just laid down again after the 1:00 AM feed, as he was staring at the flickering green light of the baby monitor, seeing it light up brighter every time Kelly breathes or sighs or makes some sort of little noise, he turned the damn thing off.

She’s less than thirty feet away. Her door is open. His door is open. He will hear her when she cries. He does not need to hear every baby sigh.

And with that he was able to sleep from 2:30ish to 4:00, when, shockingly enough, he was indeed able to wake up at the sound of Kelly requesting breakfast.

 Granted, he was feeling just about numb with tired by the time he had the bottle made up and in her mouth, and he might not have done the most thorough clean up job on the diaper change, but he did get out of bed, get food into her, get her burped, and then got her back into her crib and him back to sleep a bit after five.

And apparently at some point Abby got home, and must have fed Kelly, but he slept through that, waking up at close to nine with a panicked jerk, found Abby in bed next to him, dozing from the looks of it, but she opened one eye when he jerked awake.

“Hi,” he said when his heart stopped pounding.

“Hey.”

“Feeling any better?”

She shrugged. “Little bit.”

“Did you sleep?”

“Yeah. Think Jimmy slipped me a mickey. I was awake. There was tea. Next thing I knew it was 6:30, my boobs were going to explode, and Jimmy was gently poking me to get up.”

Tim smiled at that. “You got home, fed her, and…”

“And we hung out for a little bit after, I had some breakfast, and she went back to sleep about eight thirty.”

Tim’s nodding, that sounds about right.

“You want to go back to sleep? I’m up and on duty now.”

“Gonna try.”

“I turned off the baby monitor. That helped. Maybe we could get you some ear plugs, too.? See if that makes it easier for when you don’t need to be on?”

“Maybe.”

She didn’t look enthusiastic about that, but it’s also the longest conversation he’s had with her in… maybe two days, so he’ll chalk that up to things moving in the right direction, and headed downstairs to see about getting himself some food.

If you haven’t slept for a while, and then you do sleep, you tend to feel really awful after you wake up. Abby had read something about that’s your body’s way of screaming: ‘Please, give me more sleep. I want the sleep. Sleep is good! More sleep!’

Her body is screaming for more sleep, and maybe it’s because she was able to finally shut down, maybe it’s just left over whatever the hell it was Jimmy stuck in that tea, but, hearing Tim bustling around downstairs, she was able to fall back to sleep again.

And then woke up at noon, feeling still out of it, still mired in hard sleep and sick and aching and God, her boobs really were going to explode, and when she saw the clock there was a stab of utter, blind panic; she’d slept through a feed. Which meant Kelly had to have been crying, fussing, and she slept through it.

Her baby needed her and she slept.

There was a drowning wave of guilt that went with that. A paralyzing sensation of even more failure, and once again, sobbing.

Which got Tim’s attention. She doesn’t know what he’d been up to, but suddenly he was there, holding onto her, petting her back, saying something, she doesn’t know what, doesn’t care. It doesn’t help, can’t break this pain.

Her baby needed her, and she didn’t wake up.

Okay, Tim’s good on the idea that getting Abby more sleep is an excellent plan. He’s right on that one.

He’s not sure if her sobbing uncontrollably on their bed, saying something about Kelly needing her and failing, is good.

She’s making noise, and communicating with him, so that’s… better? Ish? Maybe?

Or that little, quiet voice Gibbs had mentioned to him finally died and she’s full out gone.

Either way, they’re going to the doctor’s in an hour, so hopefully they can put a plan beyond get more sleep into action, and please, please, God, please, find something to make this better.
The Plan

So, when they made the appointment for 1:30, two days after she was born, they didn't know that Kelly would want to eat at 1:00.

Which means, in addition to getting Abby calmed down, there's still the fact that Kelly will wake up soon and want to eat, and it takes her about an hour to eat.

And, if he's understanding the bits of words he's getting between sobs, suggesting formula for the next feed is unlikely to go over well.

If it was any other appointment, he'd say fuck it, reschedule, and just let Kelly wake up and Abby feed her.

But there is absolutely no shot, at all, of them missing this appointment. Come Hell or high water, Abby's getting to the doctor.

So, when Abby inhaled between sobs, he turned her face toward him, and said, "You haven't failed her, at all. She's fine, and right now, we've got to get moving on feeding her again. She's gonna want to eat when we need to be heading to the doc's, so if you could pump now, then you could be feeding her when we're in the car."

He stopped after that, hoping he'd not just set off another wave of massive emotional flailing, but… nope… That seemed to go well. A plan of action seemed to be working for Abby. So he hopped up, found the breast pump and a bottle, and she got to it.

He sat next to her, watching her do it, and, since previously, Kelly had always been on her breast when she's done this, he hadn't seen how it looks from the outside and… Wow. She doesn't even need to pump at first, just petting the breast a little and holding the bottle over her nipple sends milk squirting.

It's really impressive, and he's awfully glad that nothing of his is that full or swollen, because that's some highly pressurized milk.

Abby's not talking again, but at least she's not crying either.

So… Maybe… Worst it can do is fall flat. Probably won't make her cry.

"You taste it, yet?" he asked with a little smile, hoping it might lighten the mood.

That startled her a little, and he can't tell if the you're insane look she's aiming at him is because he didn't just assume she'd tried it, or that he'd even ask if she would.

But after a few seconds of that, she nodded at him and said, "Yes, first day."

"What's it like?"

"Sweet. Doesn't taste like much of anything really." She'd hit the point where it wasn't squirting right out, so she took the bottle away, snagged a drop on her finger and held it out to him.

Tim smiled at that and licked it off her finger. "Yep. Sweet. Not much beyond that. Kelly really likes it, though. When I give her formula, she just looks at me like, 'Nope. Not Mom's. I'll consent to eat this 'cause I'm hungry, but it's not the real stuff.'"
That got a little hint of a smile out of Abby. He kissed her, arm around her shoulders, cuddling close to her.

"You taste the formula?"

"No." He shook his head. "Doesn't smell good to me."

Mood swings. That's what the little voice is saying. On one level hearing it again is something of a relief. On another level, she's not feeling much in the way of a need for an extra narrator to tell her she's being irrational.

She knows she's being irrational.

Or maybe not. Five minutes ago…

Well, she knows it now. And, the wasted, despondent, the whole world's awful feeling has passed, so that's good. And at least right now she can also feel that Tim asking about breast milk is kind of funny, maybe, if you squint a little. It doesn't feel funny. She's not wanting to laugh or anything. But at least she's a bit aware of the fact that someone else might consider that funny.

She wipes her eyes again, while Tim screws the bottle into the breast pump.

"I hate this."

He looks back up at her. "I know. We're gonna get you fixed."

She rose an eyebrow at him and said, "Last I checked, I wasn't a puppy."

He almost spilled the milk he hugged her so fast and hard at that. Then he looked sheepish about it, made sure it was secure, and far enough away that he wouldn't spill it, and hugged her more carefully. When he pulled back he said, "It's been a long time since you made a joke."

Abby nodded at that.

As per standard NCIS operating procedure, they are in the doctor's office five minutes earlier than need be.

Trying to feed a baby in the car while getting to said appointment was interesting.

All Tim can say on that is that he's glad he wasn't the one who was doing it.

Kelly found the whole driving, moving, noise, thing unsettling. Add in hungry on top of that, and she was in a less than wildly pleasant mood. Then Abby got the bottle out, and Kelly was under the impression that bottles are a Dad, or maybe Pop, thing and having Mom, giver of milk, offer her one threw her for a loop. A loop she did not appreciate.

But eventually she did get a little of the milk on her tongue, and decided it was the real thing, and went to work on her bottle.

Thus ending up with her madly sucking away, enjoying her meal quite a bit, right when they got to the doctor's office, so there was quite a bit more complaining about having said bottle removed from her mouth while transitioning from car seat to stroller.
So, yes, they did get to the appointment five minutes early.

They were also pretty frazzled.

And Kelly wasn't exactly thrilled with them, either. (Though when Mom picked her up as they were walking through the parking lot and let her finish up her lunch while they headed in improved her mood.)

Janice, the receptionist, took one look at them as they headed in, smiled kindly, and then cooed appreciatively over Kelly, doing a very good job of sounding like Kelly was indeed the most beautiful baby girl in the history of baby girls.

Then she dropped the bombshell on them. "Dr. Draz called in a few minutes ago. She's in a delivery right now, so she's going to be at least an hour late. If you like we can resch—"

"No," Tim said it flat and fast. "We'll see whoever can see us first, and if that's Draz, that's Draz, but Abby is getting seen today."

"Okay. You can wait here, or head to the cafeteria where there's wifi and snacks. If you want to go, we'll text you when someone can see you."

Tim looked at Abby, and she shrugged, very visibly not caring where they ended up. "We'll try down there, maybe head back up here if it's too loud for Kelly."

An hour and twenty-seven minutes.

Okay, it's not the end of the world, but that was a much longer wait than they had been hoping for.

They went to the cafeteria, got some drinks, walked Kelly around a bit (there's a pretty nice garden area right outside of the cafeteria) but by half an hour of that Kelly was asleep and Abby was looking pretty droopy again.

So, back up to the Doc's, and settling into the waiting room. Abby rested. Kelly slept. Tim felt nervous. What if this isn't something with an easy fix? Worse, what if this isn't something that has a hard fix? What if she's just… broken?

But eventually, the nurse called Abby's name, and there was more cooing about how darling Kelly is, which Tim certainly appreciates, but… He knows she's the cutest baby girl in the history of baby girls, what he doesn't know is what's wrong with Abby and how to fix it, so he's not exactly focused on how cute Kelly is.

But the nurse gets them set, and they go through the traditional motions of getting Abby's weight and blood pressure (higher than usual) and asking what's going on, so Tim told her, and the nurse did seem to think this was serious, writing everything down, telling Abby to get into a gown, and that Dr. Draz would be there in a minute.

Getting into the gown was the first time Tim had seen Abby mostly (she kept her bra on) naked since the day after Kelly was born. He's not a doctor. Beyond his first aid badge as a Wilderness Scout and the CPR/First Aid training all NCIS Field Agents are required to have, he has no medical training, but even with all of that, he really doesn't like the way her incision looks.

It's a lot more red and puffy than he thinks it should be.
He touched it, very gently, and yes, it's hot.

"Abby?"

She just shrugs a little.

"Has it been like this the whole time?"

"Don't know. Haven't looked. It's been sore the whole time."

He just nods at that. Part of him wants to yell at her for not taking care of herself, scared and angry and tired all want to bubble up and out at once, but he clamps down on it. First of all, that'll be worse than useless. Second of all, he saw she was sliding away, knew she was drugged, and didn't think to check, either.

"Okay."

Dr. Draz knocked quickly and came in. Since Tim was already looking at the incision, there didn't seem to be much need for hollow pleasantries, so she got right to it, which Tim appreciated.

She checked the incision, and when she gently palpated it, Abby shrieked and almost levitated off the examination table. "I take it it's tender?"

The glare Tim sent her indicated that joking wasn't going to go over well.

She listened to Abby's symptoms, made a lot of notes, nodded a lot, and then said, "You've definitely got an infection. You might be anemic as well. So, in a few minutes Amanda will be back, and she'll get a blood sample. We'll run a full test on it, see how you're doing. You're going on antibiotics when you get home, but the CBC will give us a better idea of what sort. We might give you an Iron booster while you're here. Are you still taking your pre-natal vitamins?"

Abby shook her head. "Don't think so."

Tim knows he hasn't been giving them to her. "No. Should she be?"

"Wouldn't hurt. We'll see how her red blood cell count is." Dr. Draz gently squeezed Abby's knee. "We're going to see what's going on with you, and hopefully some antibiotics and iron will have you feeling better."

Abby didn't smile at that. Tim did.

And then Dr. Draz turned to Kelly, cooed over how big she was getting, how pretty she was, and thanked her for being such a good sleeper so she could have that conversation with her parents without interruption.

By the time Dr. Draz was back with the results of the CBC, Kelly was once again awake, and nursing away (which involved some interesting contortions, because there are no pillows here, no arm supports, and Abby's now got a brand new sore spot on her left arm from the blood draw), because it had been three full hours, and you can't tell a seven day old, now's really not a convenient time to eat, how about in an hour?

So, soft suckling sounds went along with, "We've got the results back, and yes, your white blood cells are high, red cells are low, and your blood sugar is a bit off, too. We're going to give you a shot of iron to get your red cell count up, and for as long as you're still bleeding I want you taking iron supplements and eating high iron food."
"Red meat; leafy, dark green veggies; milk…" Tim said, making sure he's remembering what to get correctly.

"Yeah, if it comes from a cow or Popeye sang it's praises, you're good." Draz fished out her prescription pad. "I'm also going to write you a script for Cipro. If the heat and swelling on your incision hasn't gone down in two days, I want you back here."

Nods from Tim and Abby.

"When was the last time you ate before seeing me?"

"Food, or anything?" Tim asked.

"Real food."

He looked at Abby, she'd mentioned having breakfast, but he knows she slept through when he ate lunch, and then there was crying, pumping, and off to the Doc's…

"Have you eaten anything since breakfast besides that shake?" He'd gotten her a vanilla milkshake at the cafeteria.

"No."

Draz made a note of that. "Okay, hopefully that explains the low blood sugar. With any luck, the iron and antibiotics will have you feeling better and you won't need the reminder, but, you have to eat. Kelly eats every three hours, and you should, too. Some sort of snack, and at least three real meals. You're down twenty pounds from the last time I weighed you, and yes, I know you're holding seven of them and that between the water weight and the placenta, that's most of that twenty pounds, but given how much bigger your breasts are, that means you've probably lost seven pounds of fat. That's too much weight loss too fast.

"Keep eating. A lot. Even when you don't feel like it. Especially when you don't feel like it. If you're nursing and back to your pre-pregnancy weight in a month, something is wrong. As long as you're nursing you should be no less than five pounds heavier than you were pre-pregnancy."

Tim and Abby nodded at that, too.

"I want to see you back here in a week. If you're not feeling significantly better, we're going to start talking about post-partum depression and how to cope with that. I'm not a fan of medicate first and ask questions later, mostly because anti-depressants are very serious medications, so we'll start with lifestyle changes, but if medication is where we need to go to get you enjoying being yourself again, that's what we'll do. Yes, being upset post-baby is normal. Yes, being exhausted is normal. But you're supposed to enjoy this, too. So let's get you back to the point where you can enjoy this."

More nodding. Tim's very much on board with this plan. Abby doesn't precisely look like she thinks enjoying anything ever again is on the menu, but she's also not looking like it's impossible either.

"For now, as much rest as you can get. Your friend who came up with the alternate nights plan, go give her a hug from me; that's a really good idea. Eat. Take the meds. This is a really hard job, and you're doing it sleep deprived, sick, and loopy from pain medication. That'll make anyone feel horrible."
Tim McGee with a plan is a much happier guy than Tim McGee without a plan.

It doesn't even have to be a good plan. Though he certainly prefers good plans to bad plans. But the here's what's-going-to-happen, here's-why, here's-how, and when thing provides him with a very nice and secure safety net.

So, driving home, prescription in his pocket, grocery list on his phone, step by step plan to put into action on Operation: Getting Abby Feeling Like Abby Again he's feeling a whole lot better than he was a few hours ago.

Abby on the other hand, is just really tired.

Right now, for her, everything else is just drowned in joint-gluing tired.

So, he dropped her home, got her settled on the sofa for a nap, hoping that being home alone will let her sleep, and decided today was the day he was going to attempt to run errands, on his own, with Kelly.

There's a story Jimmy has told both Gibbs and Tim, but not Breena, (and certainly not Abby or Ziva, though, should Tony join the Dad club, he will eventually get this story, as well) mostly because he'd appreciate not having his wife think he is a complete and utter idiot when it comes to caring for their children.

But, when Molly was a week old, and Breena's parents had returned to their own home, he found himself in the house with an exhausted spouse and (because this was before the discovery of Mylicon) an extremely crabby baby who had been crying for, basically, every single second she'd been awake that day.

So, in an effort to get Breena a little sleep, he packed up Molly, got in the car, and went to get some groceries.

While driving to the grocery store, Molly did, finally, fall asleep.

Now, at this point in the story, Jimmy always stresses the fact that he had gotten, maybe, six hours of sleep in the previous four days, and he also stresses the fact that it was February, so it wasn't too hot out.

And by the time he's finished stressing these things, most people (by which we mean both Gibbs and Tim, since they are the only ones who have heard this story) have figured out what happened next.

Namely, that with a sort of single-minded determination that only comes from being so tired you can't remember your name, Jimmy got out of the car, carefully shut the door (didn't want to wake Molly), quietly opened the trunk, got the stroller out, set it up, and was three quarters of the way through the parking lot, toward the grocery store when it occurred to him that he did not, in fact, actually have Molly with him, and she was, technically, still located in the car.

Gibbs does not have a story like that. And not because he was so amazingly on top of everything that he just did everything right.

No, he does not have a story like that because he did not, in fact, go out alone with Kelly until she was eight months old.

Now, part of that was being deployed from the time she was four to eight months old. Part of that was they lived on base, so there wasn’t a huge need to really go places. And part of it was it was 1982, and people didn’t much expect dads to be off, on their own, with brand new babies.

But, by the time he did go off on his own with his Kelly, he was well past the stumbling, blind tired newborn in the house part of the experience, and thus, that first trip to the park with just the two of them went awfully smooth.

So, Tim’s not exactly feeling like he’s got much of a hurdle to jump to do better on his first solo outing. Just doing it in the first place, and then successfully getting her out of the car will rank him above Jimmy and Jethro on this.

He does get her out of the car, into the stroller, and from there into the grocery store. She’s cooperating with this endeavor by sleeping.

Which he’s thinking sounds like an awfully good plan, get home, grab a nap…

Oh.

Yeah.

He can’t get a nap when he gets home. Pharmacy says it’ll be half an hour to get the prescription ready, then check out, fifteenish more minutes to get home again and…

Yeah.

He’ll get them home, and it’ll be nursing time for Kelly again. And while Kelly eats, he’ll need to get food for him and Abby. (He makes a bee-line to the meat counter and stacks as many steaks as he can in the little storage area under the stroller. Then puts half a dozen of them back because he needs to get Abby more than just piles of beef.) Once that’s done, maybe he can get a little rest until the ten feed, and driving Abby to Breena and Jimmy’s. (That reminds him. He checks his phone. Yep, message from Breena, asking what’s going on. He flashes her a quick text back.) So, he and Kelly will probably be home around 11:30, and maybe he can catch another quick nap then, but really, he’s not looking at any solid sleep until… shit… 2:00.

There’s a Starbucks attached to their grocery store, and he’s staring at it as he heads toward the frozen veggies, planning on getting spinach, kale, broccoli… Is broccoli high in iron? He googlesthat on his phone and finds that, well, no it’s not great, but it’s got lots of vitamin C which makes it easier to absorb iron from your other food, so he tosses a few bags on top of the steaks, next to the spinach. Then he checked the spinach, saw it had even less iron than broccoli, and decided that he probably needed to recalibrate what he considers a ‘good source of iron.’ After a minute of that, while another shopper, gently, pushed by him, it occurred to him that he’d completely lost track of what he’d been doing.

Which was not supposed to be standing in the grocery store, thinking that if you can get 6% of your daily iron requirement from a serving of broccoli and 41% of it from a serving of beef that calling broccoli an iron-rich food is insane.
No, he had been pondering applying a dose of caffeine to his system in an effort to get to 2:00 AM. But, as he looks back in the direction of the Starbucks (no longer visible behind the frozen food) it occurs to him that if he does have a real coffee, he's not going to be able to sleep, even though he'd like to be sleeping, for any of those little bits of downtime he might get.

And, more importantly, it's not going to help him focus. He might not feel so tired, but he's not going to be any less scattered.

Still, coffee, black, rich, strong coffee with lots of milk and sugar. He's got the image of coffee beans, the ones dipped in dark chocolate in mind…

Wait… is chocolate a good source of iron? More googling. Fuck! Yes it is, well, maybe not fabulous, but twice as good as broccoli, so, off to the candy section he goes.

He's shoving bars of dark chocolate next to the steaks when something about beans (coffee beans, cocoa beans) triggers a faint memory.

He googles edamame, which Abby not only will eat, but actually likes, and bingo!

And off he headed for more frozen veggies.

Tossing them under the stroller, he's pulling up the number of their favorite Pan-Asian place, ordering beef and broccoli, roasted edamame, and beef lo mein, he can grab that en route home, and have dinner done that much faster.

Okay. So, game plan on.

He's in line, waiting to pay for his food, pretty out of it, kind of just staring into the distance, when he noticed the lady behind him had said something.

"Excuse me?"

She smiled kindly at him, looking pretty amused. "Babysitting?"

He thinks about that for a moment. Jeans, ratty t-shirt, black circles under his eyes, hasn't shaved in a week, or gotten a shower in two days (he's suddenly aware of the fact that he forgot deodorant after his last shower, and isn't sure if he brushed his teeth this morning, so he grabs a pack of gum, popping a piece in his mouth, putting the pack on the checkout belt), God alone knows what his hair looks like (well, God, and everyone else at the market, but he doesn't.), the bottom of his bicep cuff tattoo is visible, so's his wrist cuff, and he's got a black leather diaper bag over his shoulder.

He knows he wouldn't pay anyone who looked like him to take care of a child.

"No. She's mine."

He gets the sense that he's missed some of the context of what the lady behind him had said, because it looks like that wasn't the response she was expecting, but she regrouped and said, "She's beautiful. How old is she?"

"Seven days."

"Letting Mom get some rest?"

"Yes."
Then the cashier was ringing up his purchases, so he grabbed his wallet, dropped it, tried to pick it up, dropped it again, and finally managed to locate his credit card and pay.

Driving home, he thinks he might have the context for what the lady behind him at the grocery store was saying, namely, "This isn't really your job, is it? You're just helping out, so here's a cookie for trying."

That pissed him off enough he wanted to turn around and go find her and yell at her.

This is his job; he's not just helping out, and any bitch who wants to act like he's not really a fucking parent because he's the dad can just go straight to Hell, and God help the next woman who calls him a babysitter, especially if it happens before he gets some real sleep.

Home again home again.

He leaves Kelly in the car while he takes the groceries in. She's sleeping, though probably not for all that much longer, so he doesn't want to disturb her until the last possible moment.

Abby's on the sofa, eyes closed, and… yes, fluttering, good. He's making sure to look really carefully when it comes to checking if she's actually sleeping, because he'd certainly thought she'd been sleeping before.

The food he'd put next to her before sleeping, however, was un-touched, so that didn't thrill him.

Food, sleep, medication. It really shouldn't be that hard, should it?

He brought dinner in. Then carefully got Kelly out of her car seat, but carefully wasn't good enough, she did wake up, and by that point it was close enough to her next meal he didn't think she was going to be going back to sleep until after she ate.

"Okay, sweetie, let's get you cleaned up. Then dinnertime. Sound good?"

Kelly kept fussing.

To change her diaper outside, or take her in…

He circled to the other side of the car, laid out a blanket on the seat, and took care of it in there. Maybe Abby was already awake, but if she wasn't, buying her three more minutes of sleep seemed worth it.

He made a mental note to restock the diaper bag. They'd been out a whole lot longer than expected and were down to one diaper and no wipes.

When they came in, Abby was sitting up, looking awfully sleepy, and rubbing her eyes.

He sat next to her, Kelly in his arms. "Feeling any better?"

"Meh. Hungry."

"Good. I've got food. And you know what?"
"What?"

"Dark chocolate has lots of iron in it!"

That got a smile. A real smile. Sure, not a light up the room, everything feels better smile, but there was actual, genuine pleasure in her look, and it lit him up.

He kissed her. "I love you."

She nodded at that, and squeezed his hand, and said, "Sounds like Kelly's hungry, too."

"Yep."

Abby rearranged the pillows and got into nursing position. Tim handed Kelly over.

"I got us beef and broccoli, beef lo mein, and roasted edamame."

"Sounds good."

"Let me get the groceries put away, and I'll get us dinner, too."

Three minutes later, he was on the sofa, next to her, feeding both of them bites of dinner (Yes, Abby will eventually learn how to nurse one handed, but it hasn't happened, yet.) when Abby asked how the trip had gone, and looked interested in his answer.

And right that second he's just so happy he can barely stand it.
The Path

Breena came over on Friday afternoon.

Abby certainly looked better Tuesday evening, and even more better on Wednesday, but last night was her first night home, her first night on, so Breena wanted to check in and see how it had gone.

When she got there, Abby was up, so was Kelly, and as much as a ten day old baby can play, they were playing.

She doesn't know where Tim is, but guessing by the disjoined, this-is-the-hardest-thing-on-earth, I-can't-believe-people-do-this-on-their-own text she found on her phone Wednesday morning, she's going to guess he's crashed out in their bed, sleeping.

Kelly was looking fairly alert. Molly wanted to be running around and loud, which assuming Tim is actually sleeping probably isn't a great plan, so Breena said, "Let's get a walk."

"What is it with you and walks?" Abby got up slowly. Standing up from sitting down is still a somewhat ouchy proposal if she doesn't do it carefully.

"They're good for you. Come on, time to get out of the house."

Once again, they're moseying along on amble speed. Breena's got Molly's stroller with her, but right now Molly's tearing around, running all over the place. Fifteen minutes from now, though, she'll probably want a ride.

"Soooo…" Breena asks as they get to the end of the driveway.

"Yeah, it's better. Maybe not great, but better."

"Still hurting all over?"

"Just my boobs, and just when it's getting onto feeding time."

"That'll be true for a while longer, and then every time you scale back a feed, too."

"Lovely."

"Eh… Just part of the job," Breena says dismissively. "So, really, you doing okay? You look better, but…"

"I am better, but…" Abby looks up at the sky, then back at her house, but not at Breena. "But I'm not me."

Breena nods at that. "After Jon died… after I got pregnant again… I felt better, but… the woman I was before he died, she's gone. Because I'm not that woman anymore. You aren't the Abby you used to be, either."

"I liked that Abby. That Abby… I don't know… Could hook into a sort of easy happiness. And I still can't find that."

"You might still have some sort of low level depression. Might just be tired."

emotions are still all over the place. Mood swings like crazy."

"But they are swinging? You're getting highs and lows?"

"Yeah. Well, not as high as I used to get, but moderate highs, and none of the lows are as low as they were either, but still crying over stupid stuff."

"That's normal."

"It might be, but it's not normal for me. It's just... I liked the person I was."

Breena shrugs. "I liked the old Breena, too. But both of those women are gone." She thinks about that for a moment. "They were steps to being the women we're going to be. We were girls, and lovers, wives, now mothers. There's a cycle... a path I guess... And each step takes what came before and adds to it, but..."

"But the old steps are gone and can't come back."

"Right." Breena put her arm around Abby's shoulders. "And if the new you is more serious, less playful, we're still going to love you."

Abby leaned her head on Breena's shoulder. "Even Peter Pan had to grow up eventually."

"Huh?"

Instead of a stroller, Abby had put Kelly in the Baby Bjorn so she was strapped to her chest. She tilted her head down and kissed the top of Kelly's head. "Peter Pan was always my favorite. And I had a good, long run of being twenty-eight forever. But I'm forty-two. I'm married, with a baby, and when I get back to work a whole department of people to run. The days of just being me are over. And maybe that's part of this post-baby freak out. There's no aspect of my life anymore where I'm just me. Everywhere I look someone is depending on me."

Breena smiled at that.

"And it's not bad, maybe... Just... Different."

"Responsibility with a great big R."

"Yeah. The one thing Tony and I always had in common, that fear of having to be in charge of anyone else. That's why he's skittish about kids. That's why he's not the team leader."

"He's getting there. On his own path."

"Yeah. And I guess I am there."

"Yep. This is the new you, new life."

Abby patted Kelly's bum. "This is the new life. Me... I guess I'm feeling pretty old right now."

Breena laughed a little at that. "Not that old. Still got Tony beat by five years. She kissed Kelly's head. "And one of these days, she'll decide to sleep through the night, and you'll get rested back up, and you'll feel like playing again. The new you has more responsibility, and the new you is a mom and a wife and a boss and all of that, but you're still Abby, still into black and skulls and music so loud your teeth vibrate. And maybe in the late spring, when this one's getting onto a year," she stroked Kelly's hair, "and this one," she petted her own belly, "is about six months old. You and Ziva and I are going to get all dressed up, and we're going to take our guys dancing, and we're going to have a blast at it."

That got a smile out of Abby. "It's our turn to pick the club, right?"

"Yeah. You'll finally get to see Jimmy in eyeliner."

That got a small laugh.

"I told you he finally did that, right? Apparently Tim convinced him that his dick wouldn't fall off if he tried some makeup," Breena says with a wide grin. "He's so pretty."

"Don't tell him that; he'll never put it on again."

"I know that. I was… enthusiastic… in my approval of that look," Breena said with a giggle. "Positive reinforcement and all."

"Pavlov's eyeliner?"

"Something like that."

"What color did he pick?"

"He's a guy… Black."

"Of course. Did I tell you I got Tim into some green and gray?"

"No. When was that…"
Tubby Time

Tim's pooped.

Three straight nights of all baby all the time has convinced him of two things: A. He does not ever, for any reason, want to be a single parent. B: It is significantly easier to go for a few days with no sleep and then crash and sleep round the clock for a few days than it is to just get little one hour, two hour long naps for days at a time. Three: He will never scoff at sleep deprivation as a form of torture again, and D: His ability to maintain a consistent train of thought is shot to shit.

So, yes, last night was Abby's night, and he did sleep from basically dinner until right after Kelly's 7:00 AM feed, and then got up so Abby could rest, knowing he was on duty. Mostly he got himself some breakfast, put some more food on the bedside table for Abby, and then spent the next hour dozing on the bed next to her.

And yes, alternating nights is a lifesaver. He's fried. Really fried. But he suspects he was a lot closer to insane yesterday than he is now. (When he saw what he texted to Breena, apparently during Kelly's 4:00 feed on Thursday morning, he decided he was really out of it. Not just because it makes no sense, but also because he has no memory of doing it, at all.)

Round about ten, Kelly started chirping again, so he got out of bed, grabbed her, cleaned her up, and brought her to Abby, who was looking awfully tired, but that haunted, dead, listless look is gone, so he's thinking that is a good thing.

Tim brought Kelly in for her second breakfast. (Who knew having a baby was like suddenly getting a helpless Hobbit? Breakfast, second breakfast, elevenses, luncheon, tea, dinner, supper. Were it not for the lack of furry feet, she'd be ready to start calling Kelly, Merri.)

Abby rolled onto her side (which she can finally do without pain, thank you antibiotics!) facing both of them. Kelly's on the bed, laying on her back, kicking and squirming a little, doing what Abby considers her, I-just-woke-up-let's-move routine.

Rumor has it, there's a way to do this that doesn't involved having to sit up, find pillows, and rearrange everyone. Something about side-lying nursing.

Worth a shot.

She scooted a bit closer to Kelly, got her breast out of her bra, and gave it a try.

And once again, Kelly's giving her that this is different, I'm not sure I like it look. But she's very much in favor of getting fed, so she latches on and gets to it.

Tim's laying on his side, watching them, very gently stroking Kelly's tummy.

"You do that."

Tim looks up at her.

"Huh?"

"She was giving me the I'm not sure I like this, but I'll try it anyway look. Seen that on you a whole bunch of times. Like, you gave me that exact same look when I was trying to get you to eat fried pickles."

That got a smile out of Tim. Part of him is thinking that he's not the only one who needs occasional extra coaxing to try new things, but he's also actually rested enough to realize that saying that out loud might not be the best move in the history of husband-hood. So, instead he says, "Looks like she's decided this works. How about you? This comfy?"

"Not sure. It's different." Kelly kept sucking away, and Abby lay there, relaxing a little, dozing a little, and eventually decided that yep, she likes this.

"I was thinking…" Tim jerked a little when she said that, apparently he'd been a few steps past just dozing.

"Yeah."

"I can do the 1:00 feed. Still want to swap on the 4:00 one, but I can get 1:00."

"You sure?"

"Yeah. I'm feeding every three hours the rest of the day, and as much as I love the sleep, going from ten to seven without nursing is really uncomfortable. I wake up, and they're rock hard and ache."

"Then I'll fetch Kelly for you for the 1:00 feed. But if you start getting too tired, let me know. It's really scary when you stop talking, so… just… Whatever you need, I'll do, but you do have to tell me what it is."

"Okay. Right now, I need to get into a set routine for this nursing thing, and I think getting that routine will help."

"All right."

"And when I am completely fried, and she's yelling, I will poke you and send you in on feeding duty."

"No problem. But to be clear, it's my night for the 4:00 AM feed?"

"Yep. Every other night, one of us gets six straight hours of sleep in a row."

"I am on board with that. One of the books was saying that usually the 4:00 feed is the one that usually goes first. So, when she starts sleeping that long, you want to swap on the 1:00 feed?" Tim asked.

"Yeah. If it works that way. Breena told me the first feed Molly dropped was the 10:00 PM one. But if she cooperates, let's get at least one of us a full night of sleep."

He stretched a bit, and sat up. "I'm actually feeling rested enough that I might want to do something."

Abby rose an eyebrow. "Really?"

"Well, nothing complicated. I'm still not sure I could type my password in right. But, maybe Kelly and I'll go get some more groceries when she wraps up. You wanna come? Get out of the house for a little while?"

"Tempting, but… If you're going to take her out, I'm going to do something wild and crazy."
"Really?" he asks with a little smile.

"Yeah. Gonna get a shower."

"Ohh… you wild woman." Tim ran his fingers through his hair and cringed at how greasy it was. "I'm thinking I should do likewise. I probably don't need to be quite this scruffy. Don't want strangers calling child protective services on me."

"You don't look that bad."

"Don't look that good, either."

Abby shrugged. Tim stood up, heading toward the bathroom. "Maybe, if the water really wakes me up, I'll shave."

"Skip it," she said as he stepped in.

And having said that he turned around and stepped back out. "Really?"

"Yeah, you've told me part of why you've never done a beard is because it comes in kind of scraggly, and you don't want to look like that at work. You're not at work. Unless you hate it, might as well let it grow in and see what happens."

He rubs his face, and ten days without shaving means he looks like, well, Tony, on day three, sort of. It's long enough that it's not scratchy. The big thing is that while the goatee area is pretty well covered in hair, his cheeks and jaw line has about, from the feel of it, fifty or so hairs, and that's just not a beard, at all.

But he probably could manage a fairly decent-looking goatee between now and heading back to work.

"Doesn't bug you?" he asks. He has thought about growing a beard on occasion, but usually by about day five he gives up because it looks stupid (and he runs out of vacation time).

"Nope. It's not sharp anymore, and especially if you aren't going to be doing your regular every other day shave, you might as well keep it long and soft."

"Then I won't shave."

That got a smile out of Abby.

When he got out, Abby had rolled to her other side, Kelly was still nursing away, and they were both listening to some of Abby's music. Abby rocking gently to it. From what he could tell Kelly wasn't aware of it.

Of course, he's got no idea how a baby would react in a way to indicate it's happy with the music being played.

Laugh maybe? He doesn't think Kelly's laughed yet. Coos, babbles, chirps, cries, and occasionally sounds so much like a cat he wonders if the neighbor's cat somehow got into their house, but no laughing.

It'll come.
She's only ten days old.

He sat on the bed toweling off his hair, feeling a lot better. Clean, somewhat rested, all of his various and sundry basic needs taken care of, and yeah, he's feeling like a real human again.

"While I was in there, I was thinking of something else we could do."

Abby looks up at him. "What kind of something else?"

He smiles at her. "Several, but only one is relevant right now. Her umbilical cord stub fell off yesterday. We could try giving her a real bath. See if we've got a little swimmer here."

"Hmmm… We could do that."

"Yeah, she's getting a little smelly. And she doesn't like getting wiped off." Which is an understatement. She screams bloody murder if you try to apply a damp washcloth to her. Which, on a gut level, Tim sympathizes with. But, they're not letting her get crusty, so she does get wiped off, and just has to deal with it. "So… tubby time?"

Abby flashed a smile at him. "Sure."

Technically, Kelly has her own bathroom. (At least for the time being.) They have their own bathroom attached to their room, and then there's another full bath down the hall between what is now Kelly's room and the guest room.

That's the one with all the baby gear in it.

And in a few months, when she can sit up on her own and play, having a bathroom with all this stuff in it for her will probably make sense, but at ten days old Kelly really couldn't care less if there are tubby toys.

So, post feed, post burp, they're ambling down the hall to that bathroom, slightly nervous (like all first time parents getting ready to give the baby a bath) ready to try out this whole bathing thing.

And like two somewhat nervous people who, just possibly, went a bit bonkers on the child safety gear, they have a wide collection of things located in Kelly's bathroom devoted to getting her wet and soapy in the utmost safety.

And, like two nervous people who have never done this before, they are noticing that, well, the thing with giving a baby a bath in a tub is that, the tub's kind of wide, and deep, and even if you've got this little thing that looks sort of like a recliner for a baby that you can strap the baby into so she doesn't slip into the water, you're still in a really awkward position, and it's hard to get the back wet on a person who's strapped down, and well, this just doesn't work.

They didn't even have to get Kelly into the water to figure that out. Abby had started the water, making sure it was nicely warm while Tim was getting her undressed. She set the tub safety thing up, and just doing that was awkward. The leaning, reaching, twisting thing wasn't comfortable at all, and wasn't making her feel like she'd be in a good position to wash Kelly off, let alone grab her fast if need be.

She looked at it, shook her head, and said, "Yeah, this is just not going to work."
He's holding Kelly against his chest. She's doing her traditional, I'm not swaddled, let's flail around, and seems to be enjoying it right now.

"So…” Tim's wondering what he solution to this is going to be.

Abby just looks him over. Tim realizes that, having finished his shower less than twenty minutes ago, he's not dressed. "Okay."

She takes the baby bath seat out, and he gets in. Water feels good to him, so it's probably okay for her. He's cradling her head in one hand, tush in the other as he gently lowers her in.

"This'll probably feel pretty familiar. You used to spend all your time wet," he says as the back of his hand and her feet hit the water.

She's squinting up at him. Not looking particularly alarmed or displeased, but not sure if she likes this, either. Her feet and legs are in, and she kicks around, sending drops flying, one of which got her in the nose, and that got an indignant chirp out of her.

"Yeah, well, if you splash you're going to get wet," Tim says while Abby laughs. "Your cousin Molly will very happily teach you that lesson over and over when you two get to the pool." Then he finished lowering her so that all of her but her head was in the water. She scooted around a little, which Tim found nerve wracking because she's really slippery and the absolute last thing he wants to do is drop her.

He looks up at Abby when a thought occurs to him. If he's holding her in place, he's using both of his hands, so he can't really apply soap. "Help?"

Abby leans over the side of the tub, cups her hand, and begins to trickle water over Kelly's head. And while Kelly does not appear to mind the water on her body, she's finding the water on her head bothersome and lets them know she's not fond of that sensation by crying and trying to move her head around so she can see what's happening.

Abby speeds it up a bit, rubbing a tiny dab of baby soap into her hair and rinsing it off fast. Then they try to get the area under her chin, which she also doesn't approve of. Her head tilts down fast when Abby tries to get that washed off.

Tummy washing got some cooing. Feet were also deemed to be an appropriate washing venue. Legs were met with approval. Hands went over well. Armpits, not so much.

Which left them with Kelly's back. And it's not like Tim's going to just flip her over, face down, in the water. Nope.

He's been kneeling in the tub, holding her in the water, when something finally occurs to him. He's got legs. And legs might be a more handy version of that baby bath chair they had. So he rearranges himself so his legs are in front of him, bent up a bit so his knees are out of the water, and he set Kelly on her tummy on his legs, looking over his knees, and said, "So, I'd really appreciate it if you didn't poop on me, okay?"

Abby laughed at that.

Then she got more soap, rubbed it all over Kelly's back (also an approved washing area) bum (Tim wonders if that tickles, because she's flailing at it, but doesn't sound unhappy) and legs (happy, baby cooing at that).

A minute after that, she was rinsed off, wrapped in a dry towel, and Tim and Abby were feeling like they had successfully cracked the case wide open, caught the killer, and won a Nobel Prize for it.

All in all, it was a good morning.
They were in the grocery store, and this time Tim was a bit more focused on something besides all the iron he could stack in the little storage area under the seat in the stroller.

Well, maybe focused isn’t really the right word. Not like he's got any great plan. He's just looking to grab some things to eat and give Abby some quiet time in the house.

But, for the moment at least, Kelly's actually awake, eyes wide, staring at everything, so he's holding her against his chest, pushing the stroller with his foot, ambling forward at about two feet a minute, and more or less showing her everything. A quiet, steady stream of things like, "Look, Kelly, Oreos, you'll like them when you're older. I like them, too. Which is why we don't buy them a lot, because when we have them, I like to eat the whole box," and other little bits of not exactly riveting conversation. But she seems to like it, so he's doing it.

Halfway down the housewares aisle, (They need more trash bags, lots more trash bags) his phone chirped at him, so he fished around for it, found it, and saw from Ziva: Just wrapped case. Everyone heading home to rest. Shabbos tonight? Sunset is 8:37.

He sent back. Shopping right now. Abby's not here. Will ask if she's up for it when I get home. Will let you know then.

Good. Hope you are coming. Want to see our girls.

What? Not me? ;)

:) We know you're okay. Want to see the ladies.

Then I shall try to bring the girls.

Good. Though I have the feeling see will be the operative word. $10 says Gibbs doesn't let anyone else hold Kelly.

Not touching that bet with a ten foot pole. Don't like setting my money on fire.

:) Let me know when you can.

When he got home, Kelly was napping, and so was Abby, but she was downstairs, showered, dressed, and from the looks of it had eaten, too.

All good.

He carefully put Kelly in her crib, begging her, silently, to stay asleep, and this time she did. So he headed down, put the groceries away, and for the first time in ten days felt… normal. Well, tired normal, but this could have just been any other weekend day after a long week.

That was kind of nice.

A few minutes later, Abby wandered in, yawning, rubbing her eyes, then sat at the kitchen table, watching him stow the grocery bags.

"Ziva wants to know if you want to come to Shabbos tonight?"
Abby thought about it for a few seconds. "Yeah. I think so. Haven't been out in too damn long."

_Amen_, Tim thought. "Sunset's 8:37."

"So, we'll aim to get there around eight?"

"Errr…" Kelly eats at seven, takes her about an hour to eat, forty minute drive to Tony and Ziva's… "Want to try feeding her in the car again, or be late?"

"I'll text Ziva."

Or, at 5:15, after the four o'clock feed, burp, and clean up, they can be in the car, heading toward Tony and Ziva's.

They haven't attempted to take Kelly anywhere that isn't baby friendly before, so, by conservative estimate they've got enough stuff packed into the diaper bag to last roughly six months. But, you know, if you don't bring a whole pack of diapers and five clean outfits you end up with a baby with explosive diarrhea and it'll just be a hideous mess.

Better safe than sorry.

Hugs, kisses, Tony staring at him and saying, "Here, let me get you a wash cloth, you've got something on your face," and Tim wondering for a second if he did have something before realizing Tony meant his facial hair, and then shoving him, maybe a tad harder than was strictly necessary, took care of the first few minutes at their place.

"So, you're what, growing a beard?" Tony asks while Ziva snuggles Kelly (and suddenly Tim understands why they're here early, not only is it a bit easier on the transport, but Ziva doesn't have to wrestle Gibbs for baby cuddle rights.)

"Maybe. See how it looks in a few weeks."

"I like it, McGee," Ziva says.

"Easy upkeep. Sure, we're only talking about saving me fifteen minutes a week, but still—"

"Free time is really important, now," Abby finishes.

"What do you think Gibbs is gonna say you show up to work with that on your face?"

Tim rubs the eighth of an inch long, scruffy goatee he's got right now. "If it still looks like this in July when I'm coming back, I'll shave it off. Don't need the guys in interrogation laughing at me."

Ziva chuckles at that, handing Kelly to Tony, who holds her like she's a bomb with a mercury trigger and if he so much as breathes wrong they're all going to die. He sees Ziva take the challah dough out of the bowl it's been rising in, and says, "I'll get that; you play with Kelly."

She smiles at him, looking amused and cocky. "I am fine with the bread, Tony. Enjoy some quality time with your niece. She won't bite you."

"In fact…" Abby took Kelly from Tony, and he visibly relaxed, and then stiffened back up a second later when he realized she was just draping a spit-up rag over his shoulder, and rearranging Kelly so she was facing his shoulder. "Okay, just hold onto her, and keep rubbing her back, and in about five minutes you'll have a sleeping baby on your shoulder, and that's awfully nice."

Okay, Tony's never going to admit this to anyone other than Ziva, but yeah, small person sleeping on his shoulder is kind of nice. It's restful and sort of lulling. He could easily see doing this, popping a game on the TV, and just quietly zoning out into a nap.

But, as he knows from that afternoon he was at Tim's place, and all the time with Molly, who will be over in less than an hour, babies don't sleep all the time.

They get loud, and erratic, and sticky, and messy, and... And he's still really skittish about this. Sure, this part right now is going well, and yeah, he'll play with Molly, she likes getting tossed around, and will just light up when he starts to chase her around the apartment. And, yeah, if pressed, he'll say he enjoys it, but...

But it's still freaking scary.

They've been talking about a baby of their own more. The kind of talking that's supposed to have a plan attached to it, not just a 'sure, sooner or later' sort of thing.

And tentatively, they're thinking of starting on baby making in January, when Gibbs leaves. That way he'll have close to a year as team leader to let that get settled in. Draga will have had over a year on the team. Tim'll be... probably gone by then. So with any luck they'll've had their new fourth for at least six months. Draga and the fourth will have had time to learn each other. Ziva will be able to take the time she needs, and he'll be able to take a few weeks at least...

Sort of...

Kind of...

God, it's a mess. If he could get his staffing taken care of... If he knew when Tim's leaving... If he could get his team fully sorted... But if they wait that long, he is going to be seventy when this child goes to college.

Not that sixty-nine is much better.

He's wanted his own team, with his own people, for ten years now. But, of course, as soon as it looks like he's going to have his team, half of it leaves, and the other quarter is talking about having babies, and tearing him between her and it.

Okay, gotta stop thinking about this, because Ziva, and Abby, and Tim are noticing he hasn't said anything in a few minutes, and they're going to start asking what's up soon.

So he hops back into the conversation with, "Abby, did Ziva tell you about what happened in the lab yesterday?"

And Abby, all but visibly leaping to defend her territory, was on that story in a heartbeat.

Gibbs pulled into the parking garage under Tony and Ziva's apartment building, and was pleased to see the McGees' Highlander there. He'd purposely come a bit early, hoping they'd also be early, hoping to have a little more time with his kids and grandkid.

He smiles at that, locking up, and heading for the elevator.

It's been a long, long time since he got done with a day at work (Tony and Ziva went home, he and Draga stuck around and waded through the paperwork) and found himself looking forward to going home. Okay, technically not home, technically Tony and Ziva's home, but really, home is where your family is, and tonight the family'll be at Tony and Ziva's.

There's this… sensation… right now and he sort of, kind of, vaguely remembers feeling something like this when he'd get home from deployment and have off time. It might be satisfaction. Job's done, bad guy's in jail, all the major paperwork is done. It could be peace. He's not feeling any need to run back to work to hunt down the next bad guy.

He's actually pleased to have down time. Down time means he can have a good dinner, play with the kids, go home, sleep some, probably time to go get the wood for baby Palmer's crib, they'll know if it's a boy or girl soon, right? Maybe see if Jimmy and Breena want to come over at some point tomorrow and talk about designs for it. Definitely going to make sure he gets over to Tim and Abby's for at least some of Saturday and Sunday. And Sunday means bootcamp, got Jimmy and Ziva for that, though maybe if Breena feels like spending some time with Abby, he can get Tim along on that, maybe not, got to see how tired he is…

And as he's thinking that, as he's planning his weekend, it hits him this is the first time in… really, since Shannon and his Kelly died, that he's not focused on the next case. First time he's not chasing retribution. First time he feels like he can really rest.

He thinks about Mexico with Mike, and about how whenever he called, Mike came back, and he feels the difference. When he was in Mexico he bounced from one project to the next to keep himself busy. Yeah, he liked the work, but he wasn't doing it because he liked it, he was doing it to shut his mind up.

And Mike came back every time Gibbs called for the same reason. Sure cervesa and senoritas made Mike happy, but the work gave him purpose. And he needed that purpose. But when the work wasn't right anymore, he couldn't do it. But family comes first, and you always go in when your family needs you, and if Gibbs calling gave him that loophole, he jumped on it.

The door to the elevator opens and Gibbs realizes that his purpose is shifting, he's moving from cop to grandpa, and the need to shut down the bad guys will always be there, that this job is good and useful and… just… right. But it's not his whole life anymore.

And more than that, he's thinking he might like this new life.
Gibbs was right, babies prefer to sleep on other people. They do not particularly like cribs, bouncy seats, car seats, or anything that isn't warm and breathing, with a gentle pulse.

And, of course, during all of Shabbos, Kelly did not get put down once. She napped on Tony, and then Gibbs (and Ziva was right, he was a complete and utter baby hog.), then Penny and Ducky got some cuddle time, Ziva took a round of it, Breena got about two minutes before Molly got jealous about her Mommy playing with the new baby, burst into tears, and spent the rest of the night glued to Breena, and Jimmy rounded out the crew, though Molly was acting pretty territorial about him, as well.

Now, at the time, this was a lot of fun. Tim and Abby got to enjoy real adult conversation, a few hours of not being furniture, the restful sensation of knowing that they didn't have to be on high alert every single second, and everyone else was enjoying baby time, so the idea that this might come back to bite them later was nothing that occurred to either of them.

But right now, at 10:55, as they're driving home, and Kelly is screaming in her car seat, they are rapidly realizing that maybe letting her spend the entire time on someone else, or maybe just that much time out with that many other people, wasn't a great plan.

If they weren't going 70 on the Beltway, he'd be really tempted to pull over, get her out of that seat, and try to figure out what was wrong, but he's got a suspicion, because she had happily nursed, let out a huge belch, then snuggled onto Jethro, and fell asleep in like two minutes, the picture of perfect contentment.

Then Gibbs put her in her car seat, and two seconds later the screaming began.

Her little body noticed the warmth of Gibbs was gone, her eyes shot open, and then there was wailing.

And it didn't stop.

And funny faces, humming, and promises of 'Pop'll be over tomorrow,' did absolutely nothing to abate said crying.

And ten minutes (the longest ten minutes in the history of time) later, she's still going strong.

"Walk me to my car," Gibbs said to Tony about half an hour after the McGees left.

"Sure..." There's a breath while Tony decides if this is personal or work related. He settles on personal, and finishes that sentence with, "Jethro."

Gibbs nods. He guessed right.

They're a few steps out of the apartment when Tony says, "What's on your mind?"

Gibbs tilts his head a little. "What's on yours? You're looking… like you're thinking hard."

"Might be."

"Want to talk?"
Tony reached out, placed a hand on Gibbs' forehead, and said, "No fever. You look like Gibbs, but Gibbs doesn't talk, so who are you?"

_Quit being a smart-ass_ Gibbs' look replied.

"Yeah, who the hell are you? That should have gotten a head-slap."

"You want a head-slap, DiNozzo?"

"Better, Boss."

"Don't have to be Boss on this. Not if you don't want."

Tony shrugged. Sometimes Boss is easier than friend. Friends give you advice, but in the end you have to make up your own mind. Boss tells you what to do, and the responsibility for it lands on him.

They get to the elevator, and Tony absently notices there isn't an off switch in this one.

Gibbs doesn't say anything. Just inviting him to talk is enough, and he'll wait until Tony's ready to say something, and if that's not tonight, it's not tonight.

As they're sliding down the floors to the parking garage, a thought hits Gibbs; he and Tony don't really talk, not in a put thoughts and feelings into words and expressly communicate verbally sort of way. And they very rarely do it about anything personal. Best he can remember, the last really personal conversation he had with Tony was when Tony asked permission to marry Ziva, and that didn't involve Tony having to express any doubts about anything.

So, Gibbs decides to broaden the offer. "Sometimes it's good to have someone who's done it around to bounce thoughts off of. Tim and Jimmy aren't the only ones welcome in my basement. Still got that bottle of bourbon you gave me for Christmas down there, you're welcome to help me drink it."

"You haven't opened it yet?"

"Not saying that. Just it's not done, yet."

"You're slowing down."

Gibbs shrugged at that. "Don't need so much anymore."

"Guess not." The elevator doors opened, and they headed over to Gibbs' truck. For a few seconds Gibbs waited before opening the door, but Tony didn't say anything, so he opened the door, and finally Tony said, "Did you and Shannon plan to have Kelly?"

He turned back to Tony. "Not exactly. Knew we were going to do it sooner or later, and weren't exactly careful. Next thing I know, I've got a letter from home that's making me grin because I'm so happy I can't hold it in, and so nervous I wanted to throw up."

"But you were nervous?"

"I was terrified."

Those words, the unshakable, unflappable, undauntable Gibbs was terrified seem to make Tony start to re-think. Gibbs smiles a little at that. He's been watching Tony with Tim and Jimmy, and noticing that the fact that the two of them took to this whole fatherhood thing so easily, leapt right in, happy as little clams, is disconcerting for him.
Especially watching Tony watch Tim and Jimmy with their girls, the easy, comfortable way they handle the babies, how they both look like they've been doing it forever, and every time he picks up Kelly or Molly there's that second of hesitation and am-I-doing-this-right.

All of that was making Gibbs think that Tony could probably use a reminder that not every guy just hops into this easy. And it doesn't mean you'll be bad at it if you're hesitant. And that it's big and scary and it's okay and normal to think it's scary.

"Before Kelly was born, I'd never held a baby. Most of my buddies didn't have them, and the ones that did... Well, that's what girls are for; they do the baby stuff. At least, back then. First time I held her, I had to sit down. I was shaking all over, and my knees weren't going to hold me up." And yes, Jimmy knows that full story, but like with Tim, who probably could take that story now, he's thinking that Tony doesn't need that one.

But he does think, that even if he hadn't been helping to hold Shannon down for the emergency c-section for the five minutes previous to getting Kelly out, and even if they hadn't handed him Kelly while they were still trying to get Shannon's blood pressure stabilized, that he would have been awfully shaky.

Tony nods at that, thinking. Gibbs gets into his truck. Tony closes the door for him, waves, and heads back to his apartment. Gibbs watches him in the rearview mirror, hoping that was useful.

Kelly's screaming.

That's the only word Abby can think of to describe it. Screaming at the top of her tiny, little lungs.

Abby had been sleeping, for what felt like less than ten minutes, and a quick check of the clock showed that it had been close to two hours.

Kelly's not due to eat again for half an hour, and, thank God, this feed is Tim's so she can go back to sleep, so she pokes him, and realizes that Tim's not there. Which means Tim already has Kelly and a briefly whispered, 'thank God' slipped from her lips as Abby tried to get back to sleep.

Because she's tired.

So tired.

She should have known better, but they were having fun, and a glass of wine with Shabbos dinner is traditional, so she had a glass, not thinking of how completely knocked out she'd be with a glass of wine in her system after not having any for nine months and being this tired.

It hit her, hard. It's hours later and she's still feeling woozy with tired. Like she'd just managed to take charge of the baby exhaustion thing, had gotten a handle on sleeping in shifts, and now she's back to day three of feeling like she's mired in exhausted.

Add Kelly crying straight through from her 10:00 feed to the 1:00 AM feed, so neither of them slept, means she just feels wrecked. So the fact that Tim's got this, that he's got Kelly and a bottle and she does not need to get out of the bed is making her deeply happy.

But she can't sleep.

Because Kelly is screaming.
Part of her wants to jump up and take care of whatever it is.

Part of her wants to stay in bed. After all, the next best thing to sleeping is laying down.

And all of her knows that Tim is a perfectly competent father, and if she wants him to have a decent relationship with their daughter, she has to treat him like a dad, not just a babysitter, and that means letting him do the hard stuff as well as the easy stuff.

Or, as Breena said, 'You might be better at this than he is, but you still have to let him do it. 'Cause A: he's never going to get better if you always swoop in and B: you stop being equals and partners if suddenly everything's got to go through you. You don't want to be the Boss of your house, so don't be the Boss.'

But the screaming is killing her.

It feels like it's been going on for hours. (Quick check, three minutes.)

Okay, she'll wait for fifteen minutes, and if Tim hasn't gotten her settled down, she'll go see if she can help.

After the twelve longest minutes in the history of time she went downstairs to offer help and rapidly assessed not only what the problem was, but began to seriously reassess the whole competent parent thing.

Tim was lying on the sofa, dead asleep. Kelly was lying on her back, cuddled between his arm and side, screaming to the heavens.

And while it's true that Abby's heard babies in general do not care about if their diapers are wet or dirty, she's thinking that since the smell of that diaper is so strong that there are practically visible poop rays emanating off of Kelly, that it is just possible that her diaper is so nasty she is complaining, loudly and emphatically, about it.

And it's true that later, when she was less tired, Abby wasn't exactly proud of what she did next, but she's so damn tired, and if Tim were to wake up, she could get more sleep.

So she kicked him in the hip, and he jerked awake at that, looking like he'd been hit by a truck. (He'd also had wine with dinner, two glasses, and it's probably hitting him just as hard as it hit her.) It took him a minute to figure out what was going on, but once he did he said, "Shit."

She glared at him. "Fix it. I'm going back to sleep."

One second he was warm, comfortable, and thank God, asleep.

He'd spent hours and hours and hours walking Kelly around the house, trying to get her calmed down but she wasn't having any of it. Finally it was food time again, and she fell asleep nursing. Then he took her, put her on his chest, and let her sleep on him because he was too fucking tired to care anymore and anything that resulted in a sleeping baby was fine by him.

The next second he was on the sofa, Kelly was screaming and, from the smell of it, covered in poop. His arm and side are wet, and Abby was glaring down at him. Then it occurred to him, he's not wet with sweat. June baby means you get used to having a damp, sweaty spot where said baby snoozes on you. It's just part of a warm weather baby.
But that's not what's happened. He's very gingerly getting up, holding Kelly, and coming to the conclusion that there has been a catastrophic failure of diaper containment.

"Shit."

His side, Kelly's back, hell it's in her hair, and on the sofa, and…

Abby glares again. "Fix it. I'm going back to sleep."

He's not even sure where to start. And Kelly's screaming.

"Okay. Come on. We're getting a shower." He's rubbing his eyes, wondering how the hell this could have happened. It's all down his arm, and into the waistband of his pants. He didn't think there was enough space inside Kelly to even contain the volume of poop necessary to produce this level of mess.

He gets them into the bathroom, and she's still very not pleased with him, and Abby probably said something very rude when he walked Kelly through their bedroom. (Thus cutting into her sleep time, but right this second he's having something of a hard time sympathizing. She's in bed, and he's not. The next morning when he found out that Kelly had been yelling for fifteen minutes before Abby woke him up, he felt bad about that.)

Once in there, he didn't really know where to start. He's got to put Kelly down, but she's a tiny, screaming, squirming poop bomb, and anything soft in there will end up needing to be cleaned, and he doesn't want to put her on anything hard.

Finally, and it took an embarrassingly long time to figure this out, (he blamed exhaustion for that) it occurred to him that he could take the towel off of the towel rack, lay Kelly on it, take off the poop encrusted onesie, put his own poop covered pajama pants into it, (He's not wearing a shirt, and if he was more awake he might be debating as to whether that's a good thing or not, but really, he's too sleepy to care. At least skin is easy to clean.) and then fold it up into a nice little ball, and once they were cleaned up, he could toss it in the washing machine.

So, he got the towel down, got both of them naked, and turned the shower on. Once the water felt comfortably warm to him, he stepped in, and let the spray wash over both of them. Kelly seemed to like that. Well, she looked really startled and stopped crying.

Which was when he realized this is his shower, so he doesn't have any baby soap in there. And while it's true that he's got the organic, ultra-gentle for dry-hair shampoo he uses on himself in here, and the organic, all natural, hand-made, unscented, castile soap Abby uses sitting next to it, it's also true that he's a new parent and hasn't yet gotten to the point where he realizes soap is soap and that using the stuff he uses on his own skin and Kelly rubs up against every day on her will not result in disaster.

So, sopping wet, but at least no longer covered in poop, he and Kelly headed out of the bathroom, tromped back through the bedroom (More cursing from Abby. Really, he felt like an ass the next morning when he got the whole story.) grabbed the baby body wash, tromped back through the bedroom again, to the shower to finish washing up.

And thus, at ten (eleven? Fuck it, he's too damn tired to figure that out) days old, Kelly got her first shower.

Once they were both clean, he got her into a fresh diaper and onesie, and put her in the middle of their bed to hang out for a few minutes. And yeah, he was less than thrilled to be using the steam cleaner on the sofa at 3:48 in the morning, but he figured that was probably not a stain they wanted to set.

And running yet more laundry at 3:52 isn't his favorite thing, either. But he moved the wet stuff into the drier, and brought the dry stuff up, not caring about putting it away, just getting it out of the way.

None of that is fun or particularly satisfying. It's just got to get done. But once it was done, he snagged a bottle, filled it with formula and water, and headed back to their bedroom, where Abby and Kelly were.

Abby's lying on her side, eyes closed, looking awfully sleepy, hand on Kelly's tummy, gently rocking her back and forth. Kelly's quiet, kicking a little, looking like she's in a pretty good mood right now. Maybe whatever caused that poop was what had her so unhappy, and now that it's out of her system she's back to being a fairly pleasant person.

Tim lays down next to them, extends his right arm, propping Kelly on his bicep, and Abby scoots a little so her neck is on his forearm. He shakes the bottle one last time, and holds it so Kelly can eat.

And he might not be in the best mood ever, and Abby's not either. Kelly's eating, so she's happy. But it's his girls in his bed, cuddled against him, and that feels awfully good. Abby kisses his arm, and gives him a little smile before closing her eyes and going back to sleep. He gently strokes the back of her neck, and would kiss her, too but he can't do that without dumping Kelly off his arm. So Kelly gets a kiss to go with her formula, and he closes his eyes, resting while listening to tiny gulping sounds.
Eventually, even with a new baby in the house, you start to develop a new set of patterns. Habits reform, and with them a new sense of comfort appears.

Eventually, you get better at determining what has to happen when, and what little bits of life pre-kids are necessary to keep you feeling at least vaguely tethered to sane.

And at two weeks of parenthood, Abby's feeling like she's getting a handle on this.

Showers.

It boggles her mind how much more real and normal and she feels when she gets a shower every, single day.

She'd never felt particularly tied to showers before. It wasn't like it was any sort of ritual for her. But now, twenty minutes a day, usually after the dinner feed, of alone time, of doing something that hasn't changed, of doing something that scrapes off the accumulated crud of being a new mom, because a fourteen-day-old baby means that you've always got something, somewhere on you, that you'd rather not.

After shower time, forty minutes of sitting on her bed, reading or watching something, something not very complicated, while she puts her skin lotion on and brushes out her hair is a must. She has to have that little bit of time where she doesn't smell like milk or baby or blood. That little chunk of time where she can just focus on something completely unrelated to her own life is vital to her.

It recharges the batteries enough to make it possible to get through the rest of the day. And yeah, Breena says that she won't be clinging to that little hour of time like a life preserver for the rest of her life, but for the time being, it's doing its job, and that's all she needs.

For Tim, the pattern that's keeping him sane involves getting Kelly to sleep on something other than a person. Between Abby's c-section and not being able to go up and down the steps the first ten days, and then him being on night time baby fetching duty, he's been in charge of a lot more of Kelly's naps than anyone else.

The pattern, walk Kelly to her room, patting and singing to her, get her to burp, pat and sing a bit more, wait for pacifier sucking to slow down and eyes to get droopy, and then put her in the crib, and walk out again (the hardest part) is, when it works, the best feeling on Earth.

He has never, ever felt more accomplished than when he successfully manages to get her into her crib, still slightly awake, pat her one last time, and then walk back out again without her yelling at him.

It happens about one out of four times.

Sometimes, especially at night, he's sleepy enough that he drifts off while patting and singing. Next thing he knows his neck is sore from sleeping in the rocking chair, and she's looking for her next meal.

The other two times, he puts her down, her little eyes spring open, and suddenly she's annoyed and very awake, so he picks her back up again, gets her calmed down again, and puts her back down again (hopefully still awake, but not always) and then she just drifts off.

But when it works (and it's working more often today than any previous day) he feels like they will get a handle on this, and eventually they'll get more and more of their life back as she sleeps in her crib on a regular basis.

And for both of them, there's another pattern, the return of which will make a huge difference.

One of the realities of sleeping with a woman who has just had a baby is that, no matter how comfortable sleeping naked might be, it just doesn't happen. Night sweats, nursing, bleeding, all of that means clothing. Panties to keep a pad in place, bra for the same reason, some sort of night gown/jammies to deal with the sweat.

But as he was sitting in bed, waiting for Abby to get out of the bathroom and join him, he noticed something changed when she stepped out of the bathroom. No pajama pants. T-shirt, yep. Panties, he can't tell, the shirt comes down to her thighs, but he still occasionally catches the scent of blood on her, so he's fairly sure she'd have on panties and a pad. Bra, definitely. Her breasts are way too big to be comfortable without the extra support.

She climbed onto the bed, and he smiled at her, then bent down and kissed her knee.

"Hello knee, it's been a while." Then he looked up at her and grinned.

That got a ghost of a smile out of her, so he straightened up and kissed her lips gently. Nothing demanding or forceful, mostly just reminding her that he's something other than the father of her baby.

That got a little smile, too.

A bit more sleep, getting her iron levels up, and antibiotics knocking out the infection means she's acting a bit more like herself. But a thought hits him, and he wonders… she's been complaining about being short on time, and not really feeling like herself, and she wasn't sleeping for so long… The idea of something else that probably wasn't happening hit him. So, he sat back against the headboard of their bed, legs wide, and patted the bed between them.

She sat between his legs and rested against his chest. He cuddled her, chin on her shoulder, holding her close and tight for a moment, and then he kissed her neck, slowly dragging his lips along her flesh, and biting very gently on the little bit of shoulder right next to her neck.

"How long has it been since you got off?"

Her eyes close and she sighs. "Day before pelvic rest."

He kisses her shoulder again. "Oh, Abby. Come on, let's make you feel good."

She looked really alarmed by that.

"Is that okay?"

She's not looking enthusiastic. "It's only been two weeks. What were you thinking?"

"Not thinking sex. Not like that." He thinks he might have an idea of part of why she was looking so alarmed. "We don't have any birth control do we?"

She shook her head. After all, why would they? It'd been more than two years since they'd used anything that wasn't hormone-based.

"Not a problem. Just want to touch you. Soft and slow and gentle. Want to make you come. Make you remember that your body's good for something besides feeding Kelly." He tilted her face towards his and kissed her long and deep. "Want to remind you you're more than just a mom. Want you to know I adore you and crave you and want you. Want you to know you're beautiful—"

She laughed at that, and he kissed her again. Stopping the laugh with his lips.

"None of that. You are beautiful. You are my wife, my love, my life, and you are beautiful."

She rested her forehead against his, eyes closed, letting him hold her. Then she kissed him, first time she's taken the initiative and kissed him, really kissed him, in weeks. His hand traced over her hair and neck, down her arm, settling on her hip.

"I've missed this," she said, voice quiet.

"Me, too." He twined his fingers between hers, and lifted her hand to his lips, kissing each finger. "At least five minutes, every single day, we do this. Five minutes together, alone, thinking about each other, touching. Might just be snuggling when we're falling asleep, but every single day we need this time."

"Yes." She flipped her hand, so his hand was on top, and kissed his fingers, then trailed her fingers over his, stroking his wedding band. She reached up to stroke his lips, and the goatee around them. "It feels soft on my fingers, but prickly on my lips."

He smiled at that. "Feels kind of itchy to me. Still want me to keep it?"

She tilted her head to the side, and he kissed her neck at that invitation. "For now. That feels nice." He stroked his chin gently along her shoulder and she shivered. "That's good, too."

"If your shirt came off, it could be good in a few other places."

Now she looked very alarmed. "Not my breasts!"

"Wasn't planning on going there. I know they're a look, don't touch sort of thing right now." He started to edge the hem of her shirt up, and she shifted a bit to help him. "But, you'll let me know when I can touch, right?"

"Yeah."

"And whenever you feel like more than just messing around. Well, let's just say, I am ready, willing, and able to hop to and help you out with that. In fact, it's entirely likely that I'd happily drop everything, including a murder investigation, and come running as soon as you call."

That got a little laugh. "So, you're telling me you can't be trusted to hold Kelly?"

"I'm telling you, you should make sure not to say, 'Let's have sex,' to me while I'm holding her. 'Cause I'll be on you in a heartbeat."

"Didn't realize you were that hard up."

He bopped the tip of his finger against her nose, signaling no bad mouthing yourself in front of me.
"It's your gorgeous body wrapped around mine. Of course I'm gonna leap at it." He finished getting her shirt off, and lightly stroked from her ears to her fingertips, making sure to gently scrape his fingernails along her to make her squirm.

"I love you," she said with a kiss. And he smiled back at her.

"Damn right you do."

"You getting sassy with me?"

"Trying, too sleepy for full on sassy, but I want you to feel good all over, and I know you like some teasing."

"Uh huh." She kissed him again, and he wrapped his arms around her waist, enjoying a long, slow, wet kiss, her tongue slipping along his, making him sigh. She pulled back for a second, nibbling lightly on his bottom lip. "Much better use for them than sassy."

He kissed her again, showing her exactly how good he was with his lips when he's not talking, and this time she moaned.

"Favorite sound."

So she moaned again, soft and breathy.

"Want to make you sound like that, a lot." His hands slid to her panties, lightly stroking over them, getting her hips, the bottom of her tummy, he knows she's wearing a pad, so he doesn't think there's much use to trying her pussy, so he stays to the edges.

"I'm still bleeding."

He nodded. "I know. We've fooled around when you were on your period. It's not a problem. I mean, unless it's one for you?"

"No… Just… You looked like you were going to pass out the day after Kelly was born."

"That, you remember?"

"Yeah."

Of course she does, and yes, just thinking about it does make him feel a little shaky, but bringing it up does flash him back to those images. "That was a whole lot of blood. There was enough that we ended up with puddles of it in the shower." And it was running down her legs, and there was that one clot the size of his thumb, and he's got to stop thinking about that or he's never going to get hard again. "If you're still bleeding like that, I think we need to take you back to the doc to get checked out again."

"It's not that bad anymore."

"Okay."

She got up, and he wasn't exactly on board with that, Abby close and warm and in his lap had been a good thing, but after a second, when she returned with a towel, he figured out why she'd left.

"Me between your legs?"

"That's what I was thinking, unless you've got something else you want better?"
"That'll work. Get up for a sec?"

He did and she laid the towel at the head of their bed.

She was standing next to the bed when she asked. "What about you?"

"Let's take care of you. If you feel like giving me a hand after, great. If not, I can handle this," he said, getting back onto their bed.

She's still standing beside it, in her bra and panties, arms crossed over her chest. "I haven't shaved or waxed."

He flashes her a seriously? look and then rubbed his chin. "I know. I haven't, either."

"Yeah, but you not shaving isn't a big deal."

"Abby, I know you have body hair. I know you're bleeding. I know you don't like the way you look right now. I know you hate the stretch marks. I know your breasts hurt. I know you're feeling a bit insecure with your body, and like it's not really yours, and I can't change any of that, or make it better, but I can say this. I love you. You are beautiful. You were beautiful before and you still are. And I can, if you'll let me, make that body you're less than perfectly thrilled with right now feel awfully good."

"I just… feel so fat and flabby and saggy and… just… wrong."

He kissed her forehead, hands settling on her hips. "I know. But you're not wrong to me. I mean… Look, I was 205 the first time we dated. I got up to 220 before deciding it was time to lose weight again. I like this version of me better, and I think you do, too, but I was still me and you still loved me when I was fat."

"You weren't fat!" And she does look indignant at that. "You were big… and cuddly!"

"Uh huh." That was awfully sarcastic. Then he kissed her again, long and slow, kneeling next to her, slipping her panties down her legs. "I see you the same way you see me Abby. The same way." He sat back against the headboard, made sure the towel was between his leg, and then patted it. "Come on, settle back, relax, let me take care of you." She sat between his legs, chest against his back, head resting on his shoulder.

He takes his time, petting her legs and hips, kissing soft and gentle, remembering what Jimmy said about a woman's body not wanting to get pregnant and not really getting into it. And Jimmy didn't exaggerate. Abby's looking pretty happy, her face and chest is flushed, and she's moaning, but by the time he got to her pussy, she still wasn't wet.

Well, lubricated. She's wet. There's blood. But they have done this before when she's been on her period, and yeah, it's been a while, but he knows the difference by feel. So he wipes his fingers off quickly, and sucks them, getting them good and slick, before going back to her pussy, lightly grazing over the hairs that are almost fully grown back in, and yes, he loves her skin bare, but there is something to be said for how hair transmits sensations.

She's rocking against him, arching against him for more pressure, so he finds her clit and settles in for long, slow, focused circles, just rolling over her skin, like they've got all the time in the world. Stroke after stroke, taking his time for a good, steady build.

He takes his cues from her hips, speeding up when she speeds up, slowing when she slows. And eventually she is moving pretty fast, legs tight, head back against his shoulder, eyes closed, mouth open, gasping each breath, right hand clenched on his, and he sped up just a little more, nibbling her earlobe, and in a second she was crying out and twitching.

Then they both stopped dead, wondering if they'd woken Kelly up. But after a minute with no crying, Abby relaxed against him again, and took a few minutes to enjoy the glow.

"Good?" he asked when her breathing had slowed down.

Her eyes were closed, but she looked awfully happy and peaceful, pretty sleepy, too. "Yeah. I needed that."

He grinned at her. "Good."

A minute later, she squirmed a little, rubbing her back against him, and that felt awfully nice. There may, possibly, be a day when Abby getting off doesn't get him hard, but he's fairly sure he'll be dead before that happens.

"So, can I help you out?"

"Probably."

"Any particular help you were thinking of?"

"Yes… It's a little messy, but… should be quick." And they're both tired enough that quick is a real selling point these days. Especially since, if quick means less than five minutes, they could both get an hour of sleep before Kelly's due for her next meal.

"What are you thinking?"

Tim wiped off his fingers, then leaned over to his bedside table and grabbed the lube.

"I was thinking of both of us on our sides, facing each other, able to see and kiss, my dick between your legs, rubbing off like that."

Abby nodded at that. "I like that idea."

"Just, tell me if your breasts are too sore for it."

"Don't press up against me too hard, and we'll be fine."

She got up and they rearranged themselves, and yeah, getting the lube in place, and him situated was pretty mechanical, but… well… quick…

But once they were situated... Well, soft and wet and slick and hot, and he can kiss her and look into her eyes. God, he'd missed that. Been… probably three months since they've been able to have face to face sex. And it doesn't matter that he's a few inches away from full on sex, this is good, this is warm and close and pleasure and love and being happy with his favorite person, making her happy as well.

And sure, it wasn't the best orgasm he's ever had. But they're together, and it's her body doing it, not his hand, and it's all good.

Maybe it's not what it was, but it wouldn't be, because they aren't who they were. But it was good. And the promise of better is out there. And eventually, as they get more patterns set, they'll find their groove again, and figure out how to be parents and lovers.
"Jethro?" Not that Tim isn't pleased to see Gibbs in his living room, but it's 2:00 on a Wednesday.

"Closed the case. Now it's a paperwork day. Tony's got it."

Tim nods at that, thinking that by 'Tony's got it,' Gibbs means that Draga and Ziva are filling out massive reams of paper, and Tony's making sure they've got a steady stream of wisecracks and coffee to go with it.

"You mean Tony's keeping them in coffee while Ziva and Draga fill out the forms?"

"Draga doesn't drink coffee."

Tim's eyes go wide. "That's not gonna last long."

"He's got these little silver cans… Goes through like ten of them a day."

"You mean Red Bull?" Tim's looking horrified at that.

"Something like that."

Tim whistles softly. "He might like Caf-Pow then."

Gibbs nods, filing that away for possible later use, then he asked, "So, did you mean it when you said you liked baseball?"

"Yeah." Tim nods, trying to remember when he'd said he liked baseball, but he does, so… Oh, yeah, that maniac with the bomb and Ziva going undercover as Ziva.

"Not just spinning a line to keep Tony off your back?"

"I like baseball."

"Good. Which team?"

"Whoever's on. Never hooked into a particular team."

Gibbs grinned. "Even better. Would have hated to hear you're a Yankees fan."

Tim's still feeling like this is a pretty surreal conversation. He was sitting on the sofa, checking his email while Kelly hung out in his lap, (Abby's getting a nap) and then Gibbs wandered in, snagged Kelly out of his lap, and now it's the middle of a work day and Gibbs is asking him about baseball while cuddling his daughter. "Why?"

"Pirates are playing the Mets. It's on in ten. You, me, baseball, sleepy little girl, sound like a plan?"

"Uh… Sure… let me see what I can do."

"Do? You turn the TV on. Should be on ESPN."

"We don't have cable."

"Huh?" Gibbs looks stupefied at that. Even he has cable. (Mainly so he can see ZNN and ESPN.)
"Got rid of it when we moved to the place before this one. Just wasn't worth it. Watch everything on streaming."

"How does that work?"

For a second Tim's tempted to explain how it actually works, but he realizes Gibbs isn't asking him to explain streaming video but is asking how it's working out. "Just fine, everything we want to see is on streaming, and it costs a whole lot less. It's great, as long as you don't want to see live sports."

Gibbs is squinting at him. "How can you like baseball and not watch it?"

"I like playing it. I mean, I'm not good at it or anything, not like Tony, but I liked to play."

"Oh."

"There's a reason I hopped into that catch you had with Ziva about two seconds into it."

Gibbs nodded, he remembered that. Once the boys got over the shock that Ziva did know baseball, and that she had played as a kid, they grabbed gloves and joined in. Tim first, he found one, called out to Ziva, and she fired the ball off to him, and he sent it back to Gibbs, little wide, but not horrible. A minute after that, Tony hopped in, perfect form, very accurate aim, and they got to hear some of his stories about how he played in high school and college before he got his knee ripped out.

"You gonna be a little league coach?"

Tim smirked at that, then headed to his computer to see what he could do. Maybe ESPN offered daily passes or something…

"I think it's softball when girls play."

"Softball coach then."

"Maybe. Let's get her up and walking and talking before planning out her sports career."

Gibbs stares at Tim for a second, and suddenly realizes that in addition to a glorious Navy career his dad probably did have a sports plan set for him from the day he was born, and he probably took a lot of crap for not being good at sports.

And it occurs to Gibbs that Tim probably wasn't terrible at baseball. He was probably okay at it, especially if he worked hard enough at it to get on a team, but he was probably second string, dependable but not fabulous, and that wouldn't have been good enough for The Admiral.

"You play in high school?"

"Nah." He doesn't look up from the computer as he answers. "Little league. Did that for a few years, then we moved again, and I never picked it back up. Didn't exactly have a baseball build as a kid. Football for one year of junior high, then we moved again, and I couldn't make the new team. Wrestled for a year in high school, but didn't like what I and the rest of the team needed to do to make weight. Not healthy, at all. Moved one last time sophomore year, and was on the intermural football team as a Junior and Senior." He fiddled with his computer a little more. Okay, so… this wasn't going to be technically legal, but… one game… They do this more often; he can get cable. "Got it. So, are we rooting for the Pirates or the Mets?"

"The Mets?" The look on Gibbs' face is saying are you really asking me this? "Bite your tongue, Tim. Pirates."
Okay, that makes a certain level of sense. Stillwater was about an hour and a half north of Pittsburgh, so… yeah, he can see that.

"You play as a kid?" he asks Gibbs as he connects the TV to his computer so they can see the game on the big screen.

"Born in '59. We all played. And watched. And listened to games on the radio. And once, twice a year, LJ, my dad, and I would head down to Pittsburgh to watch a game. You ever been to Pittsburgh?"

"Just as a layover, or break points the few times I was up in Stillwater."

"It was a steel town, then, pretty grungy, but… You go in for a night game, and Three Rivers Stadium's down on the point…"

He sees that Tim doesn't know enough about Pittsburgh to get what that means.

"Three rivers come together, shaped like a Y. So the city's the shape of a slice of pie. The tip of the pie is where the business district is. All the high rises, and also where the stadium was. And that part of Pennsylvania is mountains and hills. Pittsburgh's down low, because it's between the rivers. To get there from the north you've got to go through a mountain, the Tunnel they call it, and almost immediately after that, you've got one of the rivers, so through the Tunnel, over the river on a huge suspension bridge, and if you go in at night, it's dark in the Tunnel, and you come out on the bridge with the whole city lit up and sparkling in front of you."

Tim smiles at that, liking the image of Jackson, maybe eight year old Jethro, and LJ, all in the front seat of… knowing Jackson, it was a truck, probably a Ford, and Jethro's eyes going wide at the first sight of the city.

Gibbs nods. "Pittsburgh during the day was gray, and covered in soot, and ugly as sin. It was a steel town, and the sky was smoke all the time. At least then. But at night…" He's been holding Kelly this whole time, and she's been quietly chilling out, enjoying voices and her pacifier.

He shifts his hold so he can look her in the face, "Maybe one of these days, you, me, and your Dad'll go up to Pittsburgh, and I'll show you the view out of the Tunnel, and we'll catch a game."

Tim flipped on the TV. "Let's see if this works."

It did. Not the highest definition ever, but probably better than what Jethro has at home. Definitely bigger, and the sound is good.

They watched for about ten minutes. Sitting quietly on his sofa, but every minute or so, Tim looks over to see how sleepy Kelly is, and now her eyes are starting to droop, and the pacifier sucking is getting slower.

"Jethro?"

"Mmmm…" He's lounging on the sofa, very sleepy baby on his chest, beer in hand, game on in front of him; he's looking really content.

"Gotta put her in her crib. Otherwise she'll be a bear about sleeping on her own for the next two days."

"Okay." Gibbs handed Tim his beer, and reluctantly headed up to Kelly's nursery. She startled a little when he stood up, and fussed a bit as he headed up, also not thrilled with the idea of her nice, warm, Pop-bed going away. But she's being sung to, (Suspicious Minds) and patted gently, and carefully laid on her back, and she is really sleepy, and…

A minute later, Tim's handing Gibbs his beer again, and Gibbs said, "Did I miss anything?"

"Mets scored three runs."

For a second Gibbs' eyes went wide, then Tim smirked, and Jethro shoved his shoulder. "Smart ass."

Tim quirked his head, smiled a little, took a drink, and settled back to watch a game with his dad.
Visiting NCIS/Director McGee

Three weeks into this whole fatherhood thing, and Tim's starting to feel a whole lot more like himself again. Kelly's reliably (by which he means three out of four naps) sleeping in her crib, and getting six straight hours of sleep every other night helps a lot.

In fact, with Kelly sleeping, and Abby sleeping, he's feeling like, maybe…

Well, he's feeling like maybe messing around with the guys in Cybercrime really, but the two foot high stack of laundry in need of washing, and the dishes that really could use being put away, and no one's vacuumed anything since June and…

So, Kelly's sleeping, and Abby's sleeping, and he's doing chores. But while he's working, he's thinking. He doesn't actually need a computer in front of him to write code. So, he puts clean dishes away, loads dirty ones, and thinks through what he's hoping to do.

Eventually, the downstairs is a whole lot cleaner, and he hears quiet crying from upstairs, and he's on his way up the stairs when he hears Abby moving from the bedroom toward Kelly, so he heads into his office, and starts to put his plan into action.

He's a little nervous about this. Not the plan. He's good with the plan. No, he's a little nervous about bringing Kelly into work.

And not because the whole baby at work thing is unheard of. Yes, it's been awhile since Molly's been in to visit. Molly had been by a time or two in the last year (mostly the basement, because that's where Jimmy is) but not very often because a toddler in Autopsy (or the lab) is not exactly a recipe for great things.

But at this point in her life, Kelly is basically a loud pillow. There is no shot of her getting into anything she's not supposed to get into. (Unlike Molly who has gotten awfully wily about getting away from the grown-ups and into things she's not supposed to be in.)

So, it's not her getting into something, breaking something, or distracting someone that has Tim nervous about bringing her in.

Hell, it's not even anything for him personally. He's already pretty well-known for being soft and goofy. Not like he's trying to maintain a reputation for heartless efficiency.

But Gibbs and Ziva do not have the sort of reputation that involves them melting into little puddles of goo when in the presence of a three-week-old infant.

Gibbs is cold, distant, terrifying. Pop is warm, cuddly, smiley, and kind of goofy, too. Ziva's the Ninja: silent, deadly, able to kill a man eighteen different ways with a paperclip. Aunt Ziva coos at babies, cuddles them, and ends up in silent staring wars with Gibbs over which one them gets primary cuddling rights.

And if Tony was the only other guy in the Bullpen, this would never cross Tim's mind, but he's not the only guy. There's Draga and all the fun that goes with trying to figure out how much of who they really are he gets to see, and all the other co-workers.

But for the plan to work, he's got to go in. And he's got to see Leon. And he needs a reason to see Leon that does not raise any scuttlebutt and bringing his brand new baby girl in to see work does that just fine.

So, he takes her out of her car seat, puts her in the stroller, and into NCIS they go.

Technically, he's paying a little visit, showing Kelly where they work.

And he did do that. Headed in with the stroller, sleeping baby, walking her around, letting the co-workers coo over her.

Most of them had no problem with exchanging a few words, mostly along the lines of how beautiful she is (for which he always gives Abby all the credit). And he ends up seeing more than a few baby pictures belonging to co-workers he didn't even know had children, so he does his part, too, remarking on how they too have babies who are utterly brilliant, and on his way he goes, heading toward the elevator.

Up into the bullpen.

He'd called in ahead of time, so they know he's coming. Gibbs and Ziva and Tony know why he's there for real. So, if they just sort of nod at him, while he makes the rounds, and exchange a few words, he'll get it. He doesn't expect them to be the people they are at home while they're at work.

So, of course, he gets up there, and they stop everything, crowding around the stroller. (Cause, you know, it's been four days since Ziva last saw Kelly, and two for Gibbs, so they need their baby fix.) Maybe that wouldn't have happened if it hadn't been a paperwork day, but he wouldn't have done this if it was an active case day.

"You're missing us, already, McLayabout?" Tony asks as Ziva carefully takes Kelly out of the stroller, snuggling her close, face against the top of her head, inhaling deeply.

"McLayabout? Can't wait to see you three weeks after your first baby, Tony."

Draga was standing right next to Ziva, looking at Kelly, he catches Tim's eye, silently asking permission to touch, and Tim nods, he gently pets her cheek, and she half opens one eye, then shuts it, snuggling into Ziva closer.

"I was a zombie three weeks after Kevin was born."

Tim's eyes went wide. "You have a son?"

"Yeah, he's four. Don't get to see him as much as I'd like. Anything less than every day isn't as much as I'd like, but... Long story. He lives with his mother."

"Oh." Tim glances at the other three wondering if they knew that, and if they did, why they didn't mention it to him. Gibbs nods at Draga's desk, and he does notice there are several shots of Draga with beautiful, cocoa-colored little boy.

Draga half-shrugs. "It is what it is. Part of why this job was attractive. I'm a hell of a lot closer to North Carolina than I was when I was stationed out of Colorado."

"Yeah. Is she in the Navy?"

"No."
"Ah." The lack of any other comments from Draga makes Tim decide this isn't anything he needs to know more about right this second.

"So, you two getting out of the house and letting Mom get some quiet time?" Draga asks.

"That's the idea. Show her off here, run a few errands, then home again for her next meal."

"I remember those days." Draga pets her once more. "Little guys are a whole lot of work. Whole lot of work and a whole lot of no sleep. Four's a lot of fun, though. Really liking this part. He's still really cuddly, but independent enough to do fun things, and no more afternoon naps so we can go out for the full day."

Gibbs nodded along with that. "Hand her over, Ziver." He got his own cuddles in while saying, "I liked four. Liked all of them really. But, yeah, three and four were awfully sweet." He looks over to Tim. "You were going to show her off to Leon, right?"

"And down to Autopsy, too."

Gibbs nudged the stroller toward Tim, and he just kicks it over to his desk, not like he needs it for heading up to see Leon or a quick visit with Jimmy. "Let's go."

"You're coming?"

"Grandpa's prerogative. I can show her off, too."

They're in the elevator, Kelly snuggled against Gibbs, and Tim spent a second staring at him, and then flipped off the elevator.

"You're carrying a baby around work?"

Gibbs half shrugs.

"Big, bad, terrifying, Leroy Jethro Gibbs is carrying an infant around?"

That gets the death glare aimed at him.

"Just, you're blowing my mind. I wasn't expecting you to act like that."

"What, was I supposed to growl at her?" He holds Kelly up and says to her, "No growling at you. Pop'll bite anyone who growls at you."

"Something like that. Or growl at me for distracting you from work."

That got a little laugh. "Rule Number One."

Tim blinks slowly. "Do we really need six versions of Rule Number One?"

"Six?"

"Don't screw your partner. Don't screw over your partner. One of those is yours. One was Director Shepard's, and I don't need to know the specifics behind why they're almost word for word the same but mean something very different. Never leave suspects alone together. That was Franks', right?"

Gibbs nodded. "Don't lie to Gibbs. That's mine. Don't lie to Abby. That's Abby's. And now whatever this one is."
"No shame."

"What the hell does that mean, and who's is it?"

"Joe Armant."

"I have no idea who that is."

"Mike's first partner."

"We're going that far back on this?"

"Yep. And it means that you can do whatever you want as long as your bold as brass about it. Or as Mike put it, 'Probie, even if yer butt naked with your balls flappin' in the ice-cold breeze, you walk tall, give orders like you mean 'em, look everyone dead in the eye, and tell 'em to go straight to Hell if they don't like it.'"

Tim flipped the elevator back in, laughing a little at that, he can hear Mike's voice through Gibbs' and suddenly wonders what he would have thought of this, probably would have approved, Franks had a soft spot for baby girls. "I bet there's one hell of a story behind that one."

Gibbs smiled. "There is. One day, I'll tell it to you."

"Does it involve you or Mike Franks naked?"

Gibbs' smile morphed into a wide and somewhat dirty grin. "It might."

But the real reason for his visit was waiting for him upstairs.

Apparently, for this sort of visit, or for what this sort of visit looks like, Gibbs does wait to be shown in by Vance's Secretary. He spent several minutes chatting with her about Kelly, and it… amuses and pleases Tim to see Gibbs refer to her as 'our girl.'

But eventually Vance and… SecNav… of course, wander out. And having Jarvis coo over his daughter, and then share a story about his daughter when she was first born was surreal. Having all three of them chatting about being Dads was surreal, too, but eventually work got back on the docket.

Jarvis looked away from Kelly and Gibbs, and said to Tim, "Leon's filled me in on what you're doing here. I'll be very interested to see the report on what you find. And, if you have time," which Tim took to mean, make some time, "I'd love to see a report on the feasibility of rolling out this sort of test on a larger scale for the Navy."

"Thank you, sir. I'll get on that. Has Director Vance mentioned this is a multi-step test?"

"Yes, he has. I don't expect to see anything until after it's done."

"Probably four or five months, maybe longer depending on how they do. Want them to have time to relax between tests."

"I understand."

"Okay. As soon as I have my data set, I'll make sure you get it."
"Good. She's beautiful, Agent McGee. Leon, Gibbs," he nodded at each of them before heading off. They headed into Vance's office, and Tim's getting things set up when he realizes that there's more than just showing off a baby that Gibbs is on top of. Making sure she's tended to while he's doing this is also what Gibbs is doing.

He catches Gibbs' eye as he's getting the show online and mouths, Thanks.

Gibbs nods at him.

And then it was show time.

Tim has Vance's private phone number, though before yesterday, he'd never used it. When he dialed it, little after lunchtime yesterday, Leon was awfully surprised to get the call. (In that he had not personally ever given that number to Tim. And no, Tim isn't telling how he got it because, strictly speaking, it wasn't exactly legal.) But a few minutes into the call, as Tim outlined what he was going to do, and what they'd learn from it, Vance got on board very quickly.

And at 1030, the show began. He'd set things up so that he was not only recording everyone's computers and what they were doing, but he also had the security cameras set so that they could watch what was going on.

"Okay, this is the biggest, dirtiest, least subtle attack I could think of. It's hitting all of their individual computers. Right now, it's saving everything they're working on. Then it's just going to start messing around with their settings. For the next five minutes it'll get less and less subtle. Right now, for example, it's changing their date and time settings. By the time it's over, their fonts won't work, the background will be a different color, stuff like that. It's really visible but completely harmless."

Vance is staring at the big screen in his office, currently showing four different views of the Cybercrime techs.

"Why are we watching this?" Gibbs asked. It's not a great view. They can't see the computers, just the faces of the techs and what they're doing.

"Want to see how they react. Want to see who notices what, when. Like… Oh, that's good. Who's that?"

Tim's watching an Asian female, maybe thirty-ish, staring at the screen, poking the monitor a little, squinting.

He brought up what she was doing with her computer. "Okay, she's trying to figure out what's going on. The rest of them haven't noticed anything is up yet. She's running a basic diagnostic. Because all of her fonts just got a little bigger while the open windows got a little smaller."

A few seconds later, two more of the techs were poking their computers starting up diagnostic sweeps.

Ngyn, the first of the techs to notice something, was bombarding her computer with code, trying to figure out what was going on.

Three more techs started to work on their computers. Which meant as of this point, six of them had noticed something was up.
"What just happened, McGee?" Vance asked.

"Right now all of their margins moved an inch to the right."

Vance just stares at him.

Tim shrugged. "I wanted it to be really visible, mess with them, but not actually damage anything they were working on. That left me with cosmetic issues. The last two steps is their font switches to thirty point Comic Sans and the background color switches to orange."

"You weren't kidding about visible," Vance said.

"Not at all."

"Then what happens?" Gibbs asks.

"Everything goes back to normal. In five minutes, they won't even be able to tell something changed. And if none of them have figured out what's happened in that time, they're going to have a very hard uphill climb figuring it out. While this is happening, I didn't so much leave a trail of bread crumbs as a yellow brick road leading to Kevin Hussein."

"He used to work for us, right?" Vance asks.

"Yes. He's at IBM now, left at the end of '14. Anyway, I let him know what I was doing and he agreed to be a dummy. He'll give me a heads up if anyone tracks him down. I also left a real trail of bread crumbs, subtle but not invisible, leading to me. Next attack there won't even be that. Anyone shows up wanting to know why I'm messing with their fonts..."

"That's classified," Vance supplies.

"That works," Tim answers. "Anyway, once this ends, the brick road, and the breadcrumb trail will vanish. There'll still be some hints of it, but it'll be hard to find."

"You're giving them an out of the blue timed test." Gibbs seems impressed by that.

"Yes. Okay. That's interesting." He pulled up the logs for the tech in the back row. "He just killed his internet connection. Not sure how that'll effect things. He might be able to find the trails I left a lot longer and more easily than anyone else..." Tim kept watching... "Or not, he just rebooted, which'll wipe everything."

Two minutes later, all but one of the techs were messing with their computers, trying to make them stop acting weird.

One of them though, was still working away, appearing to be completely oblivious to the fact that his font was different, his margins were screwed, his background was orange, and the date and time had suddenly shifted. "Okay, who is that?" Tim's searching around through the logs and located Stephen Manner. "He's either got amazing focus or is the worst person I've ever seen when it comes to noticing things. Maybe both." Tim dug through what he was working on. "Wow... Okay, lots of focus. He coded straight through. I don't think he even noticed anything happened."

"Is that a good thing?" Gibbs asked.

"I honestly don't know. Maybe. Depends on what needs to happen. You ever want a guy to come up with code while he's got a gun to his head, this is probably the guy. So, good offense, no defense?"
And now, as the test ended and everyone's computer went back to normal, eleven of twelve techs were messing around, staring at their computers, running scans and diagnostics, but, and this was very disturbing to Tim, not talking to each other. He double checked their computers, shifted the angle of the cameras, they weren't texting or IMing each other, either.

"That's not good."

"McGee?" Vance asked.

"They aren't talking to each other, at all. I mean, look at them, all in their screens, focused on their own computers. I don't think any of them know anyone else got hit, yet. That's not bad teamwork; that's there isn't a team down there at all." Tim cringed, watching them work, still seeing no one talking to anyone else. What was he getting himself into here? Herding cats. "Look, this happens to Tony's computer, and less than ten seconds later, I've got Tony on my desk asking what's going on. Five seconds after that, I'm running diagnostics on all of our computers. Ziva's on the line to tech support. Gibbs is looking annoyed that the stupid thing isn't working the way it's supposed to, and barking at us to get it fixed."

That got a smile out of Leon and a glare out of Gibbs.

"Finally!" One of the techs, he doesn't know which one, but made a mental note to find out who he was, got up to talk to Jenner. Jenner (who had also been hit and had also, on his own, been messing with his computer) looked up, listened for a moment, and then, instead of asking anyone else if they had a problem, changed the way he was searching his own computer to see if the fact that both of them got hit was intentional.

"Well, I think I know why we don't have the premier Cybercrime division here in DC," Tim said, shaking his head. At that point Kelly, who had been snoozing on Gibbs decided it was wake up time, and started to fuss. "And my alarm clock is telling me it's time to get onto the rest of today's chores." He's taking Kelly from Gibbs, while he says, "So, the interesting bit comes later, when they decide what to do about this. Not loving the first brush of teamwork here. And Jenner doesn't seem nearly concerned enough about this. Not too put too fine a point on it, but anyone gets that far through our firewall, even for a dinky little thing like this should cause a four alarm, code red, all hands on deck, response out of Cybercrime. Anyway. That was the first test. Let me know what, if anything, trickles up to you. I'll be keeping an eye on how they respond. Next test'll be in a month or so, and it'll be subtle."

He detours on the way to the elevator. There's a restroom upstairs, and Kelly's in need of a fresh diaper. Gibbs follows, just watching, not offering to help.

Mostly, he's just leaning, back against the door, because it's a small restroom and there's no changing table, so Tim's got her on his little portable changing mat, on the floor, and Gibbs is making sure no one opens the door and hits them with it.

"What are you thinking?" Gibbs asks Tim.

"Men's rooms need changing tables."

"About Cybercrime."

"Wanna know if they don't work together or they can't."

Gibbs nods at that. "Looked like a good test."
"Thanks."

"If they can't?"

"You know just as well as I do that it's almost impossible to fire a federal employee for incompetence. Maybe Accounting and Human Resources could use some computer guys? I don't know. Gonna give them time to try and start working together. Gotta reshape the area, too. They're tucked in little cubicles, hiding away, need to get them facing each other. I do know one thing, after Jenner, they aren't going to know what hit them."

Gibbs nods. Tim finished with Kelly's diaper, gets her onesie snapped back up again. "Okay, got to get her home soon, otherwise she's going to be very unhappy with me."

"Then get going."
No Shame

One more errand before he takes Kelly home. Quick one.

They don’t have any birth control in the house, and while it’s true they haven’t specifically talked about trying for another baby, if or when, or if Abby’s going to want to go back on Depo or something similar, Tim’s thinking that they will, sooner or later, want to have the kind of sex that can result in babies again, and having something on hand would be a good idea for that.

Because, while it’s true that dealing with two back to back babies ten months apart does not bother him, he’s also thinking that likely wouldn’t be a good thing for Abby.

So, en route home, he and Kelly are stopping off at Target to pick up about ten more pacifiers (That being his official errand. What the hell happens to those things? He could swear they had them in every single room, located on most of the horizontal surfaces, but as soon as Kelly wants one, they all vanish. They’ve lost so many of them at this point he’s almost tempted to start thinking that Tony’s gas lighting him.) and a box of condoms.

He knows where the pacifiers are. No problem on that. Feet head on automatic to the baby section, he grabs pretty much all of the ones in the style that Kelly likes, tucks them into the little storage area under the stroller and off they go…

Targets are really big. Somehow that hadn’t occurred to him, because in general, he knows where what he wants is. But right now he doesn’t know, and Kelly’s getting restless, and he’d like to do this fast, sooo…

Probably near the pharmacy. That’d be a logical place for condoms. So he heads in that direction and spends five minutes wandering around the aisles, finally locating them.

They either don’t sell or don’t make the kind he likes anymore. He thinks for a minute and comes to the conclusion that since it’s July that it’s probably been two and a half years since he’s bought condoms. So don’t make any more is more likely than they just don’t have them.

Great.

This isn’t the sort of thing he ever enjoyed shopping for in person. There’s a reason the internet exists and buying things like condoms and porn is the number one reason.

And Kelly, who’s been up since they headed in, decided this was the moment to go from restless to fussing.

So, he’s standing there, fussy baby in his arms, patting her back and humming, trying to figure out which of the nineteen different versions of Trojans are most like the ones he used to get, idly wondering if this is what they’d call situational irony, or just a commercial for why you buy the damn things in the first place.

Finally, like he did when he and Abby got together the second time, he decided that standing there dithering about it was a waste of time, grabbed the variety pack, which would be good enough for the short term, and eventually he and Abby would have a chat about what they’re actually going to do about this.
If he thought having a woman behind him in line call him a babysitter was irksome, standing in line with a collection of three teen and tween girls, all cooing over how cuuuute! and tiiiiinnny! his baby is while he’s buying ten pacifiers and a six pack of condoms was a boat load of fun.

Obviously, if you’ve got your three-week-old baby on your shoulder, sucking away on her pacifier, watching said teen/tween girls intently, you’ve had sex at least once in the last year.

But, still… He has the sense that most people (especially of the teen/tween girl variety) don’t look at babies, and then look at their parents, and think, Gosh, you had sex. Even very visibly married parents, like Tim (though it occurs to him that most people can’t read all the marks on him that indicate married, but the wedding ring isn’t exactly subtle, and just about everyone in America knows how to read that mark), probably do not inspire the idea of, I bet there has been and will be lots of sex.

He inches forward in the line, gets to the cashier, so he’s got to actually load the stuff he’s buying on the belt, which, because he had what he’s thinking are an eleven, twelve, and fourteen year old girls all riveted by Kelly, paying intense attention to him, he’s been keeping under the stroller and out of sight.

He has never, ever, in the entire almost thirty-eight years he’s been alive, felt more tempted to shoplift than he does now. But he knows that if he just puts the pacifiers on the belt and attempts to walk out of the Target without paying for the condoms, that there will be one of those stupid trackers in his box, and explaining to Gibbs why he needs to get bailed out of jail will not be fun.

So he grabs the pacifiers, (takes four handfuls, after all, he’s still holding Kelly) and then puts the condoms on the belt next to them.

He sees all three of the girls notice the pacifiers, not really looking twice at them, then notice what else he’s got, and three sets of eyes go very, very wide.

He shrugged a little as all three of them suddenly stopped talking and just stared.

No shame. He stared them all in the eye and said, “Want her to be an only child for at least a little while longer.”

They nodded and broke into hysterical giggles.

He laughed a little, too, and then said hello to the cashier and swiped his card.

He got home a few minutes later, a very hungry and fussy Kelly indicating that she really would have appreciated not stopping en route home, and that if there was not a breast in her mouth in the next two seconds she was going to go nuclear.

Fortunately, for both Kelly and him, Abby was awake, downstairs, and from the looks of it, eagerly anticipating letting off some of the pressure of milk build up.

So, before he’d even gotten the bag put down, or shoes kicked off, Kelly was in Abby’s arms, rooting away, looking for a nipple, and then as Abby got her breast out, was one very happy little girl. And Abby was looking a lot happier once Kelly was on her breast, too.

“Test run long?” she asked as he got his shoes put away.

“Not too bad.” He answered, heading into the living room, putting the bag on the coffee table, and sitting down next to her. "Jarvis sends his congratulations and wants you to know she’s the prettiest little girl ever."

"Jarvis was there?"

"He was Leon’s ten o’clock."

"Ah."

"He also wants to see how this goes, and wants a write up from me, once it’s done, about the feasibility of doing it Navy-wide."

Abby looked pleased at that. “Like a cyber-war-game?”

“Yeah. But when they war game everyone knows it’s a game. They’re all on red alert and ready to go. This would see what happens when they’re sleeping.”

“Sounds good.”

“Yeah. It’ll be interesting.” He thinks about that for a second, then makes a frustrated sound.

“What?” Abby asks.

“We do this Navy-wide, I’ll be the tech geek whipping out a surprise test on my Dad’s men.”

“Oh.” There’s concern on her face. She can feel why that’d be an issue for him. “Is that a good thing?”

Tim shrugs. He’s honestly not sure. “Depend on if I’ve got to do it face to face. Depend on if his guys pass. I mean, this is a good plan. I like… okay, I don’t like what I’m finding out, but I need to know it. And that’s got to be true on a larger level, as well.”

“What are you finding out?”

He filled her in on the test, the complete and utter lack of any teamwork down in Cybercrime, and the fact that, while he was tracking it, no one figured out what had happened. Though talking about that reminded him that he needed to get his computer up and monitoring what was going on down there. He headed off to do that. A few minutes later, he was out of his office again, shaking his head, (Eight of twelve moles were back doing exactly what they’d been doing before. Four were trying to figure out what had happened. At this point he still wasn’t sure any of them knew anyone else had been hacked.) and sitting next to her.

“I mean, look, I’ve hacked their feeds. I’ve got spyware on all of their computers right now. I’ve hacked the security camera feed, and at least as of right now, none of them have noticed.”

“Not good at all.”

“No!” He’s shaking his head. “And they’re the guys who are supposed to be protecting the rest of NCIS from attacks like this. On the upside, I’ve got a very clear To-Do list for my first few months as Boss, and seeing how well they did, Vance was looking awfully convinced I was the right guy for the job.

“Hell, he’s looking so convinced, I’m thinking Jenner might be getting some not so subtle hints about how speeding up that job hunt might be in order.”

“Ew…”
“For Jenner.”

She nods at that.

“How about you? Good couple of hours?”

“She slept. That felt really good. You’re off doing that, and I’m… missing my brain. I had one. I clearly remember that I had one. But right now, I don’t want to do anything more complicated than make dinner, and honestly, by make dinner, I mean order it takeout.”

He smiled gently and stroked her neck, snuggling into her. “I don’t need as much rest as you do right now. It’s not my body feeding her. I’m not healing up from having her. I’m rested enough I’ve got a few spare brain cells to rub together. Though, only a few. You’ll appreciate this. I get ready to head up, and Gibbs comes up, too, which surprised me, but he’s read in, so no biggie. He remembered the one thing I’d forgotten, namely someone needed to take care of Kelly while I was doing this, which had, somehow, completely slipped my mind.”

That did get a little chuckle out of Abby.

“Yeah, running the show would have been a bit tricky with her in my arms.”

“Vance has held a baby before.”

“And if Gibbs hadn’t come up, that might have been how it worked out. Oh, imagine this, Vance, Gibbs, and Jarvis, all cooing over Kelly, Gibbs is holding her, and they’re commiserating, with me, over being new Dads.”

“Wow.”

“Yeah. Jarvis and Vance were teasing each other about being grandfathers.”

“Not anytime soon, I hope.”

“I don’t think so. Jarvis’ daughter is sixteen, and Kayla’s…”

“Fourteen right now.”

“Okay. It was a really surreal morning. Oh. Draga’s got a son.”

“Ziva mentioned that on Friday.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.” She’s looking at him like she can’t believe he didn’t already know that.

“Speaking of only a few brain cells to rub together. How’d I miss that?”

“I have no idea. We were sitting at the table, eating, talking, and she mentioned it. Apparently there was some sort of messy break up and the custody battle is still going on, made more complicated by the fact that they were never married.”

He looks stupefied. “I completely missed that.”

“Okay, I’m feeling a little better about not being all there.”

“Now I’m getting worried about that test. God, I hope it really did what I said it did.”
“It did.”

“How can you be that sure?”

“Computers means playing to your strengths. Paying attention to second-hand stories about strangers, not so much.”

“I’m a cop; that’s supposed to be one of my strengths, too.”

“Not that tired with two glasses of wine in you.”

“Okay, good point.” He leans back against the sofa, watching Kelly nursing away, his left arm around Abby’s shoulder, right hand stroking Kelly’s cheek.

“What’d you get?” Abby asked after a minute, nudging the bag on their coffee table with her foot.

“Every pacifier in the store, and a box of condoms.”

That got a smile out of Abby. “Feeling hopeful?”

“Feeling like we haven’t talked about this, so having some sort of birth control kicking around the house might not be a bad idea.”

She nodded then detached Kelly. “Come on, baby, time to burp and switch sides.” A bit of patting, a very loud belch, and some rearranging, and Kelly was once again happily sucking away.

“That’s getting a lot smoother,” Tim said.

“Yeah, we’re getting a pretty set pattern down. So, besides hoping to have sex again at some point, what are you thinking?”

“Huh?”

“Condoms. Probably means you aren’t thinking another kid right away.”

He kissed Abby. “Baby, that’s up to you. Yeah, I want more than one, but… I’ve got the easy job.”

Abby’s watching Kelly, feeling her nursing away, Tim snuggled in close, and right this second tons of babies sounds like a brilliant plan. Lots and lots and lots of them. Like, cursing at herself about not jumping Tim seven years ago and starting back then.

Jokes about not having enough brain cells to rub two together aside, she is aware that this could possibly be a side effect of the massive waves of hormones and oxytocin washing through her system right now.

Or it might just be that holding this perfect, tiny person they made together, feeling her whole body snuggled in close to her, knowing she’s a mixture of the two of them with almost infinite possibilities ahead of her, just feels really good, and she’d like to feel it for more tiny people, too.

And while she’s liking the idea of lots of babies, she’s also very aware of not feeling any desire to get pregnant again right this second. (Hell, beyond on an academic level, she’s not feeling any interest in sex, either.) She’d like the time to enjoy this, just one baby, nursing, getting used to this being a mom thing.
But… and there’s always a but… But she’s forty-two. And every month nursing is another month of decreased fertility. And yeah, jokes about Irish twins and all, and she does know that decreased fertility is not the same thing as no eggs at all, but if they want to have more than two, and really, this late, even two is iffy, they need to get on it fast.

Fast enough to make stopping nursing worth it?

Eh… right now, in the middle of the day, when everyone is awake and content, and she’s got a happy little girl gently sucking away, this is really nice. Tonight, when all she wants to do is sleep and Tim’s bringing Kelly in, yet again, maybe not so much. Because if she stopped nursing all together, they could fully alternate nights.

God, that’d hurt so much. Tim was, maybe, four minutes late on getting Kelly home, and her breasts were already starting to ache. She doesn’t even want to think too hard about how much going cold turkey would hurt.

Okay, not stopping nursing.

“You all right?” Tim asks. “She bite you or something?”

“Huh?” Abby looks up from Kelly to him.

“You were wincing.”

“Just thinking about the logistics of another baby. Thinking about stopping nursing and how, well, ouch! that would be.”

“Oh.” Tim’s looking pretty concerned and kind of nervous, like he wants to say something but isn’t sure if he should.

“What are you thinking?”

“Not sure I should say.”

“They’ll be your babies, too.”

“Yeah, but it’s not me getting pregnant or nursing.”

“True enough. Say it anyway, you look worried.”

“I want to have babies with you. I do want more than one. I’ll admit, I love you pregnant, and I can’t wait to meet Kelly’s little brother, and I’d love it if he looks as much like you as Kelly does. But… I don’t know if having them right on top of each other is good for you. And… I want Kelly to be able to nurse as long as she can… And if giving you more time to heal up and get back to normal before doing this again means we don’t have any more biological children, then, we don’t. Doesn’t mean we won’t have other babies, egg donor or adopt or whatever.”

She nods at that, it sounds reasonable, though, there’s something that hurts, really hurts, at the idea of this being their only biological child or never being pregnant again. But at the same time, everyone does say nursing for a year is best for them, and she doesn’t want to rush this, and she’s not all healed up yet, and… “Not less than a year apart.”

“Okay.”

“I was hoping to nurse Kelly for a year, so… use the condoms for the first three months and then…”
if it happens, it happens, and… if I get to forty-four and we aren’t pregnant again, try fertility treatments, and if we get to forty-five with still no baby, get working on adopting.”

He strokes her neck. “I can back that plan.”

“So, what’d you get?”

He grabbed the bag. “Blue, green, pink, yellow, unicorn, frogs, stars, I think this thing’s a sea horse,” he held up a white pacifier with something, that could be a sea horse, or maybe a sea monkey, or possibly some bizarre mythological creature he’s never heard of emblazoned in pastel blue and green on it, “more stars, and kitten pacifiers.”

“You weren’t kidding about buy all of them, were you?”

“Nope.”

“And…”

He held up the box. “Trojan sensitive variety pack. Apparently they don’t make the kind I liked anymore, so back to square one.”

“And let me guess, you’re hoping I’ll help you test them out.”

“Maybe not right this second, like I said, ball’s in your court for that one, I just want to be ready to return it when you are, but testing them’ll be a lot more effective if you help out. Can’t imagine you can feel much of a difference jerking off with them.”

Abby laughed at that. “I wouldn’t know.”

“Me, either. For some reason I’ve never felt any need to try that.”

She shoved him gently, smiling, and he kissed her shoulder, then stood up, “I’m getting hungry. You want any lunch?”

“Yeah.”

“I’m on it.”
Story Tim With Grandpa Gibbs

Technically, Kelly was supposed to show up today. And technically, they're off this weekend. Fourth of July is a Federal Holiday (and supposedly they've got all of them off) but it's on a Saturday this year, so they all got Monday off as well.

Granted, long weekend doesn't mean much to Tim and Abby right now. Tim's not due back until the middle of July and Abby's not due in until the middle of September. But, for Gibbs and the rest of the team, long weekend does mean something.

And Gibbs is taking advantage of it. Cook out. His place. The extended Gibbs clan has been invited. (It's entirely possible he's showing off his grandbaby to LJ and Fornell and co.) Even Senior's in town, so the whole crew'll be there.

Or as Ziva had put it, Christmas in July.

Previous years, the Forth has just been the core group of them, and bounces between the Palmers' or Gibbs' house. It's not much of a big deal. Mostly an excuse to eat something tasty, drink some beer, blow a few things up. (Okay, yeah, technically in Virginia, you're not supposed to have the kind of fireworks Abby makes, but for some reason, everyone turns a blind eye when the party is at a cop's house, attended by a pile of other cops, and the cops who were called out to check the party were given a large quantity of beer, grilled chicken, and some fireworks to take home. And no, that's not a bribe. That's one branch of Law Enforcement showing proper respect for another branch, and bite your tongue for even thinking it!)

But this year is more of a big deal. Well, less of a show up in your jammies and hang loose sort of thing, so Tim's actually shaving. At least, he's getting rid of the stray hairs on his cheeks. The goatee is staying.

He's running the razor over his face when Abby comes into their bathroom and says, "You know Draga'll be there."

Tim nodded. "Ziva mentioned that last night."

"Just, you've got the kilt laid out, wanted to make sure you knew."

"I do. It'll be 93 today, not wearing jeans. Too damn hot for that."

"Okay. You have shorts right?"

"None that fit. Unless you mean my swim trunks. Why? You think it'll be a problem?"

"Just thinking about last night." Last night they'd been talking about how fully into the family they were going to let Draga. He's invited to this, because everyone's invited to this. But just like Gibbs didn't let any of his team see any of his private life until he'd gotten himself good and cemented into Boss territory, Tony's not entirely sure how much of him he wants Draga seeing, yet.

"This is who I am, and I don't care who knows. Not anymore. He thinks it's weird… Well, not like I've got to work with him all that much longer. He's not my Probie."

"Would you wear it if we had a pile of Cybercrime Techs coming?"
"I don't know. Wasn't planning on doing it first day as Boss or anything." Since women can wear skirts, NCIS can't prevent men from doing likewise without opening themselves up to a sexual discrimination suit. Tim's never worn his kilt to work because it's not practical in the field. But behind a desk? He's been thinking about it. "Need to get a feel for them. Never realized until recently how much of 'Gibbs' was about holding control and projecting that image. Not sure how much of that I'll need for my guys. But I do know I don't need it for Draga."

That got him thinking as he finished up with his face.

"You know… I'm going to ask Vance if I can get the dress code revoked for my guys."

Abby looked interested in that.

"Just, I know I want to get rid of a bunch of them. Which means I'm going to need new hires. Can't change my pay scale. Can't offer different benefits. The basement's ugly as sin, so I can't give them a spiffy environment. But, maybe I can at least make it look a bit more like a place where actual computer guys work. And maybe, for some of them, looking more like the traditional tech guy when I'm head hunting will help."

"Good way to think about it." They heard quiet crying coming from Kelly's room. "And I think that's my cue," Abby said, heading off to get their daughter.

Just like at Christmas, the cars are lined up and down the street. Unlike Christmas, most everyone is outside. It's hot and sticky and humid, but the food is on the porch, and so is Gibbs, keeping watch over the grill, burgers and chicken sending delicious smells into the wood-smoke scented air.

They were the last ones to get there. Though he's thinking that Jimmy and Breena probably haven't been over for long. Molly still gets an afternoon nap, and it's not much past naptime.

It's, with the exception of Gibbs at the grill, pot luck, though when he asked what they should bring, Gibbs just glared at them and told Abby to bring Kelly and make sure everyone was awake enough to enjoy the time out. So he doesn't actually have a plate of anything in his hands. (Diaper bag over his shoulder, with baby monitor in it, and one of those little bouncy seat/swingy things for Kelly to nap on when it's time for her to go down. But no food.)

They'd been there for maybe four seconds when Gibbs saw them and headed over, hugs and kisses for Abby and Kelly, (backslap for Tim) then he handed Tim the grill tongs ("Don't let 'em burn.") and swooped up Kelly to go show her off to Fornell.

"Maybe I could put the baby stuff down first?"

Gibbs half-waved in his direction, heading toward Fornell and Wendy with Kelly and Abby

A second later, Draga was over. "Here, let me help." He grabbed some of Tim's baby gear.

"Thanks. Don't know why we need twenty pounds of gear for an eight pound person…"

"But if you ever leave any of it home, you'll need it."

"Yep." After a minute, he had everything tucked into a tidy pile under the table with all the food. "Okay." Tim looks at the tongs. "Apparently, I'm in charge of the grill."

"Apparently. Probably a good plan to get over there before anything burns. Don't think he'd like Tim nods and heads over. He looks down at the food, and says, quietly, to himself, "Great."

"McGee?" Draga asks.

"Wood fire. Never cooked on this before."

"Just like charcoal. Keep flipping things over and moving them around so the food doesn't burn. Like, that..." A quick flare up sent flames jumping. So, Tim reached over with the tongs and flipped over that chicken leg. When he did, Draga said, "I thought so."

"Hmmm?"

"That you'd have skin ink."

"Oh, yeah. Three of them now. Four soon."

Draga nods. "Figured you would when I met Abby. What do you have?"

Tim's right sleeve was high enough that it didn't take much pushing up to show off the knot around his bicep. "Abby's got one that matches this." Draga nods, and Tim realizes that of course, he's already noticed that. Abby's wearing a dress with no sleeves. He pushed up his left sleeve and showed off the code. "That's my master's dissertation."

"Nice."

"Thanks."

"Here." He handed Draga the tongs and undid his wrist cuff. "That's number three."

"She's got one that matches that, too. On her neck?"

"Yeah. Wedding tattoos." He snapped his wrist cuff back on. "Number four'll be on my right leg. Waiting for a bit more time and a bit more rest before that one."

"Baby tat?"

"Yeah. You have any?"

"Oh, yeah. Wasn't sure..." Tim notices that Draga's wearing a pair of shorts and an unbuttoned Henley with the sleeves pushed up to his forearms. It's got to be warm. Too warm. But if he wanted something that would cover his arms... it'd do the job.

Tim gestures to his kilt. "Dress code's pretty informal here. Pretty tolerant, too. At the office, you can't have ink that shows, but this isn't the office." As he took the tongs back and flipped a few wings, Tim did notice Leon and his family was here, too. "Though I can understand not necessarily wanting to show everything off to not just your new Boss, but to his Boss, too."

Draga nodded at that and asked, "DiNozzo give you any crap about your ink?"

"Not too bad. He was so stunned when I got the first one, he didn't know what to do about it. Calls me McInked every now and again, thinks the one on my wrist is kind of femme, but not much more than that."

"He doesn't have any?"
"If he does, it's new and he hasn't said anything." Tim decides that since Ziva keeps her tattoo under wraps that he doesn't need to mention it. "So, what do you have? No need to show it off if you don't want to."

"They're not going to flip out? You know some people can get kind of…"

Tim nods, he knows. "I've got three. Abby's got sixteen. And we don't exactly dress like everyone else. They're pretty good with people who don't fit the mold. But, yeah, it does depend on what it is you've got. You got something nasty chewing the head off a baby, and yeah, probably keeping that under your shirt is a good plan."

"Nothing like that."

He's not sure if Abby was following their conversation, reading lips, or just noticed him showing off his tats and decided to come on over and join the conversation, but as Draga said that she and Breena edged their way over.

"So, what do you have?" she asked.

A few seconds later, Ziva had wandered over as well as Kayla Vance. Like somehow, by some form of psychic female communication, all the girls decided that something interesting was about to happen on the porch, so they closed in.

Breena's grinning at Draga, and Tim realized he didn't know if they'd been introduced yet. "Do you know Breena?" Tim asks.

Draga smiled at her, offering his hand, and Tim caught sight Jimmy and Tony, who had been tossing a Frisbee around with Jared and Vance, edging closer, as well. Paying close attention to what their ladies' are doing, but not wanting to look like they're feeling threatened. Vance, on the other hand is just coolly staring at his daughter, waiting to see where this is going to go.

"Not directly. I've seen your picture and your little girl's picture down in Autopsy."

Breena smiled back and shook.

"Breena, Draga, Draga, Breena"

"Tim, we're not at work," Breena says to him. "They get so used to calling everyone by last name they forget the rest of the world doesn't usually work that way."

"Draga's fine. Everyone's called me that for the last ten years."

"You ever change your mind, let me know, and Abby and I'll call you by your first name."

"And even if you don't, I'm still going to call you Eric," Abby added. "Only one man I call by his last name anymore, and you aren't him."

"You always called me McGee."

"Yep. You and Gibbs, my two favorite guys, and no one else. But it's my name too now, so calling you McGee is just weird."

He nods as if to say, If you say so.

And Abby turned her attention back to Draga and smiled bright and wide. "Soo... Come on, we like skin ink here."
Draga pulls his shirt off, over his head, and turns his back to the girls. It's a cool design. Stylized wings stretching from bicep to bicep and down his back. The pattern is tribal, Maori in style but not a replica of any of the traditional designs. All of the fliers in his unit got it done when they were stationed out of New Zealand as part of a joint naval aviator Pacific theatre task force.

And he's going on about it, about what it means, how the wings are made out of lines that look like waves, blending sea and air. Ziva, Breena, and Abby are listening intently, and looking intently, and as he's talking about warrior traditions, Ziva gets into the conversation, and they chat about that.

Okay, great. None of that was funny. But Tim's having a hard time not laughing. And he feels like he shouldn't find this so amusing. He really shouldn't. And Abby keeps shooting him, what the hell looks as he tries to keep a straight face, but he can see something she can't, and it's hilarious.

So, no, he shouldn't have been laughing. Draga and Ziva comparing honor cultures is not funny, at all. No, funny started when Tony began to... amble... in a very nonchalant sort of way toward the group of them. He's trying to look cool and failing, badly. Probably because he's glaring daggers into Draga's back. And after a few more seconds of relaxed ambling he does manage to come on over, drape an arm around Ziva, pulling her close to him, flush against his side. "Enjoying the conversation, Mrs. DiNozzo?"

Abby sees it, and he sees her get what he was trying to not giggle at.

Ziva turned to him and smiled. "Yes. Learning a lot about American and Maori warrior culture."

Tony looks at Draga. "Didn't know there were Maoris even whiter than McInked over there."

Tim shrugs at Draga, who with red hair and freckly skin actually is paler than he is.

"You join the cultures that call to you," Draga says, pulling the shirt back over his head. He is pale enough that ten minutes in the sun is probably about as long as he can safely take. "This one called to me. Actually, if you've studied the sorts of marks that my ancestors, and, likely McGee's and Dr. Mallard's, as well, used to wear, you'd see this isn't too far off. Granted, if it was in proper traditional style, they'd be done in woad…"

And somehow the mention of that woad conjured Ducky, and between the two of them ten minutes of the history of tribal marks passed, which, honestly, Tim mostly filtered out.

No, he was paying attention to the chicken, and to Tony, who was, to put it mildly, whipping out his own personal fifteen on the one to ten scale of overreacting.

If you didn't know Tony well, which, of course Draga doesn't, he looks fine. Annoyed, but still within the limits of okay. But Tim can see the clench in his jaw, the slight narrowing of his eyes, the way his hand isn't actually casually draped over Ziva, his arm and hand is tense.

And that's aimed about fifty-fifty at Ziva and Draga.

Tony doesn't like Draga showing off, and he doesn't like Ziva appreciating it.

For a second, Tim wonders about that. Abby was certainly looking at Draga, carefully, she was even very lightly tracing some of the more complicated bits of the work on his back, but he wasn't feeling any… anything about it. She likes skin art. Draga's got cool skin art. She's looking. He's not bugged.

Tony's glaring at Draga, and Tim's wondering if he should be bugged.

He's awfully sure he would be bugged if Abby was showing off, say, her entire collection. And he'd be quite a bit less than thrilled if she decided Draga needed to see her crosses. But her looking at him isn't bugging him.

It's just not.

But Tony looks ready to rip his head off.

And finally, he figures out why. At least, he develops what he's thinking is a pretty good suspicion.

Draga's young. Draga's attractive. Draga's got dangerous looking ink all over his arms and back. He's in rock-hard Navy shape, probably runs fifteen miles a day and does PX-90 or Insanity or something like that when he gets home.

And these days, Tony's none of those things. Tony's used to being the best looking, fairest of them all, and now he's not.

And it's also why this doesn't bother Tim, and to some degree, he's thinking this is why Jimmy's not flipping out either. (Though it could be that Tony's doing such a good job of it that it's keeping Jimmy in line.) But right now, Tim's in pretty much the best shape of his life. Okay, sure he hasn't worked out in three weeks, but he's tight and trim, and no, he's not cut or built like Draga is, but, he doesn't need to be.

He looks as good as he's ever going to look, and he knows that his wife adores him, and so, if she wants to look at Draga's tats, he's cool.

But Tony doesn't look as good as he ever has. And it's not that he's terribly old or anything. But he's forty-eight. He's got a good ten (fifteen? Tim's bad at estimating things like that.) pounds of pudge around the middle. He's got lines on his forehead and around his eyes.

Pretty much he's a college athlete who kept himself in awfully good shape for a good long time, but that's the thing, it was a good long time, and time is catching up to him.

And right now, his wife, his NEW wife is looking at the NEW guy, who is younger, fitter, and hotter, and Tony's not taking it well, at all. It's not like Ziva was ogling Draga or anything. Okay, that wasn't just polite interest, either. But she wasn't doing anything over the line. She wasn't flirting. She wasn't saying anything inappropriate, and she wasn't undressing the rest of him with her eyes. But, it's also, at least to Tim, pretty clear that she's not really looking at the ink, she's looking at the guy and the muscles under the ink.

Which might be another reason why Tony's flipping out and Tim isn't. Abby's looking at the ink. Ziva's looking at biceps, delts, traps, and lats.

Of course, as Tony's standing there, arm around Ziva, adding a few snide remarks here and there as Ducky talks, one other possible reason for Tony flipping out hits Tim. And if he's right… Well, he certainly flipped out just like this a bit less than a year ago, and back then… Yep. He feels a grin creep across his face, and flips a few more chicken wings before calling out, "Gibbs!"

Gibbs wandered back to him.

"How long have they been on?"

Gibbs gives him his daughter back and hollers, "Dinner's on!"
It's an hour later, before he and Jimmy get a few minutes alone with Tony. But eventually, the sun was starting to sink, the torches were lit, and he, Jimmy, and Tim were all lounging around on lawn chairs in the back corner of the yard.

Jimmy looks at him, amused, takes a long drink of his beer, and shakes his head, clicking his tongue in a shame on you gesture.

Tim says to him, very smug, finishing up his burger. "That wasn't cool, at all. So, when's the baby due?"

Tony glared at them.

Jimmy, still grinning says, "It's July, so that'd be what? April? No April birthdays yet."

"Ziva's not pregnant."

Jimmy and Tim flash surprised looks at each other and Jimmy says, "You're saying that you just about walked up and pissed on her to mark your territory because… she was looking at another guy." Jimmy laughs. "She's allowed to look. You look at other women all the time."

Tony glares again.

So, back to his first idea. Tim shakes his head. "Don't think looking's all of it. That's only half, a third maybe. Tony's not the prettiest one anymore." Okay, Tony really is glaring daggers at them right now, and Tim shouldn't be enjoying this so much, but…

"Oh, that's it!" Jimmy says, poking Tim. "Tony, you were never the prettiest. Have you ever looked at me?" Jimmy gestures to himself and his hard, cut, toned body, significantly less of which is hidden under clothing than usual for work. (He's in shorts, flip flops, and a t-shirt.) "Sure, you're cool, but I've got a much better body."

This does not appear to be comforting to Tony. Metaphorical steam was bubbling out of his ears.

Jimmy shakes his head and shoves Tony gently. "You get a pass for being a jerk when she's pregnant. You don't just because there's a new guy who's younger and hotter than you."

*I'm his Boss. She's my wife."

"She's also his partner, and neither of them did anything even remotely out of line." Tim adds.

Gibbs came over, sat down next to them, and handed Tony a beer. "Really sucks when some new young guy shows up and flirts with your wife."

Tony's not saying anything. He's staring at Gibbs, looking pretty alarmed, defensive, and pointing at him. But finally he gets out, "That's why you liked him? Is this twenty-year-old payback?"

Gibbs smiles, relaxing back, popping the cap on his Sam Adams, he's watching Draga talk with Jared Vance. "He's got the makings of a good agent. Payback is just the cherry on top."

"Look, I told you then," Tony says, emphatically, "I did not know she was your wife."

Jimmy holds up his hands, "Whoa, okay, we are stopping right now and rewinding to the beginning of this story."

Tim nods along with that. He very much wants to hear this. He catches Abby's eye, (she's across the backyard, talking with Breena and Wendy about something) and flashes her a little *pay attention to Tony's looking like the entire universe is out to get him today, but eventually he says, "It's my first week at NCIS. Gibbs and Burley were in interrogation, and I was running down a few leads. This..." and here Tim's expecting words like smoking hot or gorgeous or something but there's just a beat of silence before Tony says, "woman, came up to my desk, looked around and then asked if Agent Gibbs was in.

"I told her he was busy, and she smiled at me, and we got to talking, and I was doing my usual routine, just talking..."

Gibbs' eyes narrow.

"In a somewhat flirty sort of way. And I asked what she wanted with Gibbs and she said, 'Nothing.' I asked if she wanted to leave a message, and she said 'Oh, I am.' And yes, that didn't make a whole lot of sense to me, but she's beautiful and sitting on my desk, and her legs..."

Gibbs eyes narrow even further.

"Were nothing I was looking at. So we kept talking, and she was sitting on the corner of my desk leaning into me, interested in the conversation, and I asked her name, and all she said was 'Stephanie,' and in my defense El Jefe over there had not only never actually said he was married, he had no pictures on his desk and had never mentioned her name. Only reason I knew he had a wife was the wedding band, and it was the same plain gold band twenty-seven million other couples have. And it's possible that if her skirt had been a bit longer, I might have noticed she had a very similar gold band on, but it was a really short skirt, and at that point in my life I was a firm believer in the idea that if you couldn't keep your wife happy enough so that she didn't go out seeking other guys, you got what you deserved. So, she was... um... writing down her number for me, and I had noticed there was a ring, just not what other ring it matched, so I was asking what times I shouldn't call when I heard Burley say, sounding really stunned, 'How long have you been watching this?' and I realized Gibbs had been on the stairs the whole time."

Tim and Jimmy are staring at Gibbs now. Tim looks from him to Tony and back again, and finally say, "It's obvious you didn't kill him, but..."

"She was sending a message. I got it. Not Tony's fault he was a horny idiot caught between the two of us."

"Hey!"

Gibbs just stares at him.

"What message was she sending?" Jimmy asked.

Now Gibbs is just staring at him with a I can't believe you asked that expression on his face.

"Beyond the fact that she wasn't happy," Jimmy adds.

Gibbs is still staring at him.

"You know, teachable moment. Don't make the same mistakes I did... No?"

Gibbs shakes his head. "No."

"All right. So, Tony, you do know what you can take from this?" Jimmy says brightly.
"No. What can I take from this?"

"Your own advice. If she's looking somewhere else, you've got to do a better job of making her happy. Go hit the gym. Sure, you'll never be as pretty as me, but you could probably stand to lose some weight." Jimmy smirked and looked to Tim. "You know, I don't think Draga was flirting with Ziva."

Tim rose one eyebrow. "You say Abby, and we're going to have issues." He's joking about that, because he does want to know how that looked to Jimmy.

"No." Jimmy flashes him an are you kidding look. "It wasn't Abby he ran right up to to offer help. It wasn't Abby he started talking skin ink with. And it wasn't Abby he was offering to show his tats to. She just happened to be there by the time he got to that part of the conversation."

Tony started laughing at that, loud and happy.

Tim thought about it for a minute, cause those are all good points but… "Nah. Didn't feel like that. He spotted me as the only other guy in the group with ink. New guy in the group, it's easier to figure out how to fit in if you can find someone else who looks similar. Same reason I gravitated to Abby when I first got to NCIS. Same reason you did, too."

"You think?" Jimmy asks.

"Did that really look like flirting to you?"

"How would I know?" Jimmy asks. "Haven't been hit on by a guy before."

"I think it works about the same for everyone," Tim said to Jimmy and then turned to Tony, "You fill Draga in on twelve? You know, just in case."

"Four hours in a car with him on his second day, we got them all."

"Good." Tim turns back to Gibbs. "So, speaking of rules. We're all here. Gonna tell us the story of Rule 1: Version Six?"

"Six?" Tony asks as Fornell heads over.

"What are you four cackling about? Gossiping like a bunch of old ladies." Fornell asks as he sits down.

Gibbs smiles dryly at him, and takes a bite of Fornell's cake. "No Shame."

"Hey. Get your own cake." Fornell says, swatting Gibbs' hand and then grins. "No Shame! That's a good one."

"You know this story?" Tony asks.

"Everyone knows this story, DiNozzo!"

"It's the sixth version of Rule Number One," Tim says.

"First," Gibbs says. "This version of Rule Number One is probably older than you are, Tim."

"But the story about how you got it, isn't," Fornell adds.
Gibbs sighs, looks down, remembers Mike, practically able to feel him, smiles a little, looks away from them, to where Kayla and Amira are talking with each other, and then scans the group, seeing Leyla holding Kelly while she chats with Abby.

Well, Probie, you gonna tell your boys the story, or just sit there lookin' pretty?

Gibbs smiles at Franks voice. He doesn't turn to his left to see if Franks is there. He's not. Can't be. At least, not in any way anyone else will notice. But he can feel him, see him, even if only in his mind's eye, settling in, sitting back, sipping his beer, ready for the story.

So, he starts the story. "Back in '93, Franks and I were stationed in Okinawa. For enlisted singles that's considered a hardship post. Basically, no women. The Japanese girls aren't terribly interested in catching an American service man. Back then there were probably twenty-five guys for each enlisted woman, and most of those ladies weren't exactly looking for a husband…" Gibbs' look filled in the if you know what I mean that followed those words. The boys nodded; they got it.

"But, Japan also isn't too uptight about hookers. So, it wasn't hard to find company if you had extra money and some time off."

Fornell jumped in, aware of the fact that in '93 Tim and Jimmy were still kids, and probably didn't know how this worked. "Japan may not be, but anyone in any of the US Forces stationed overseas had their CO's breathing down their backs about it. The AIDS scare was still going strong, so… no fraternizing."

"But they're soldiers and sailors," Gibbs says, "And soldiers and sailors and hookers get along pretty well."

Tony smirks at that, laughing a little.

"Most of the time, we didn't hear anything about that. They weren't supposed to be doing it. But everyone knew they were, so we'd turn a blind eye.

"One day this Light Colonel shows up at the door, and he wants to have a private chat and see if we can help him out, discreetly."

That got a smirk and a laugh out of Fornell, who of course already knows this story. "As Mike put it, 'This bantam rooster shows up, thinks he's a foot taller than he actually is, feathers in a bunch and squawking like a maiden aunt who's fanny just got pinched.'"

Gibbs smirked a bit, too, look on his face clearly saying Idiot Officer. "He'd found a house that aimed at an upscale clientele. And he got rolled."

"Isn't that the point of going to a place like that?" Jimmy asks.

Fornell shakes his head, amazed at how innocent Jimmy is. And Gibbs can hear Franks saying, Good Lord, Probie, where'd you find Skippy over there? Kindergarten?

"Robbed, Palmer," Fornell adds, making sure Jimmy's on the same page with the rest of them.

"Oh."

"Yeah," Jethro says. "He'd gone in, had some tea, started to pick out a girl, and woke up naked on the street."

Tim, Jimmy, and Tony are all quietly laughing now.
"His theory was that since he was American, and an officer, and married, that they'd rolled him, assuming he'd never complain because he'd be hip deep in shit if he did. They stole everything he had, but his wedding ring, so he'd be able to pretend it didn't happen."

_Goddamn stupid son of a bitch. Still can’t believe he came to us. You’re that stupid, you deserve what you get._ Gibbs is feeling tempted to tell Mike to shut up, because having him commenting in the back of his head is distracting. But he doubts it'll help.

"So, in we went to investigate, because you can't just roll an officer and get away with it, even if he was goddamn stupid," Gibbs says. "'Course the first part of a deal like this is figuring out what happened. And, if there was a pattern, it'd be easy enough to spot.

"We needed bait. Someone who could convincingly act the part of a married officer."

"Hoorah!" Fornell says.

Gibbs nods at that, looking amused. "So, I get all gussied up, ring on, and head off to go find a geisha for a night. Supposedly, Mike's got an eye on me. I wasn't wearing a wire because, well, nowhere to put one if you're going to a place where the first step is a bath."

"First step is a bath?" Tony sounds intrigued.

Gibbs looks pleased. "Nice place. Head in, one of the ladies escorts you to the bath, she washes you off—"

"Doesn't sound like this op was a hardship," Tony says.

That also gets an amused grin. "I've had worse assignments. She gets done with you. You're all nice and clean, wearing a robe, then over to the tea room, where there's refreshments waiting, and you tell 'em what you want, and what kind of girl you want to do it."

Tim's staring at him, looking really amused. "So, you're sitting there, in a room, in a robe, and… those little sandals?" Gibbs nods. "With a bunch of girls, actually saying, out loud, with _words_, what kind of sex you want?" Tim asks, trying not to laugh and failing miserably.

Gibbs glares at him _stop being a smartass_ very clear in that look. "You go undercover, you do what you need to. So not only was I doing it, but I was doing it in Japanese."

"Okay, then. I'm officially impressed," Tim says.

"Any redheads?" Fornell asks.

That also got the _smartass_ glare.

"The point of this wasn't for me to get laid, it was for me to get rolled, make sure it's really happening. So, I'm drinking the tea, chatting with the girls…"

"Chatting?" Jimmy asks.

"If you're gonna pay a thousand dollars for a night, you take the time to talk to them."

"Just, never… thousand dollars, huh?" Jimmy says.

"Yeah, high end house. And I was chatting with this very pretty girl, and, no she didn't have red hair. Black hair, went all the way down to her hips. And then I was coming to in the back alley, Mike patting my cheeks, getting me sitting up, naked except for my 'wedding ring.'"
"I want to get some clothing on, but he doesn't want to wait that long. But I don't want to go storming into the place naked, and he looks at me and says, 'Rule Number One: No Shame. Probie, even if you're butt naked with your balls flappin' in the ice-cold breeze you walk tall, give orders like you mean 'em, look everyone dead in the eye, and tell 'em to go straight to Hell if they don't like it. You're a Marine. Now get your ass up, and get in there, and let's get your clothin' back.'"

Always was good at the pep talks, right, Probie?

"So I stormed in, back straight, naked from head to toe, swinging in the breeze, barking orders, and by the end of the hour I had my clothing back and we'd busted the whole ring of them. Been fifteen thefts in the last year alone. They'd been right about the idea that married officers weren't going to complain."

Fornell sighs. "You're terrible at telling stories, Jethro." Fornell turns to the boys. "No one told stories the way Franks did, but I'll try. Jethro's leaving most of the good parts out."

"Most of the good parts?" Tony says.

"Oh yeah." Fornell has a very amused, very dirty grin on his face. He scans the crowd, finds Ducky, and yells out, "Ducky, we need you over here." Then says in his normal voice. "Ducky's heard this story, too, between the two of us, we'll do it the justice it deserves."

Thank God. You really do suck at stories, Probie. Whole not talkin' thing gets in the way.

"Tobias?" Ducky asks as he drags a chair over.

"Jethro's telling the No Shame story, and he's butchered it. I'd called you in for backup."

"Oh." Ducky lights up with amusement, as Jimmy scoots over on his seat, making room for him. "Jethro's first adventure in undercover work."

"That wasn't my first undercover job!"

"It was according to the version of the story I got," Ducky says with a smile.

"Mike's version of the story is at least seventy percent bullshit."

"But it was entertaining bullshit, and it got the point, No Shame, across so much better," Fornell adds. "He left out all the training."

"Oh, Jethro! That's the best part."

Gibbs rolled his eyes, and all three of the boys are staring, very interested in what's coming next.

"Ducky, Fornell, why do you know this story? I mean… I know Franks didn't have a problem with telling a juicy story, but…" Tim asks.

"But this seems a tad inappropriate for a work conversation?" Ducky finishes.

Tim nods.

"His bachelor party… that'd be for Diane, right?" Fornell answers.

"Like you don't remember," Gibbs replies.

"I was there for the one with Hannah, too, and both of those nights are pretty blurry."
"That sounds like a story, too," Tony says.

"Oh, it is." Fornell patted Tony on the cheek. "And one day, when you're old enough, we'll tell it to you. So where was I?"

That was one hell of a night, wasn't it? Gibbs feels very tempted to say back, "Like you remember that night. You finished the Tequila on your own."

"Setting the scene," Tim answers.

"Laying down bullshit," Gibbs adds.

"Sure. Bullshit or not, it was fun. So, you've got the basic story, but he's leaving a few details out, like, for example, thousand dollar a night place means that they're not rolling the customers for income. This isn't about making a few extra bucks to keep the pimp off your back. This is something personal about Americans. And honestly, place like that, back then, most of the clients are well-heeled Japanese business men. They might work with Americans, but they also probably don't mind seeing them, especially the ones in the military, get theirs. And when Probie-"

"Mike could call me that, you can't."

Fornell just smirks at that and continues on, "And Mike got in there, they were keeping the uniforms and medals as trophies."

"So you're saying rolling service men might be a selling point?" Tony asks.

"Might have been," Fornell answers. "And often, in a house like that, the proprietress is older, has been around for quite a while, and as I believe Mike said, 'Now, you've got to remember, Mama San's in charge of this joint, and she's old enough she remembers the bomb.'"

"I don't think she was that old." Gibbs says.

"According to Mike she was a crone," Fornell says.

"Because Mike was spinning a yarn. She was maybe forty-five-ish!"

Hush, Probie. Let 'em tell it. It's a good story. Gibbs goes quiet and lets them tell it.

"Next up, place that expensive, Light Colonel is about as low on the totem pole as you can get and still afford to go."

Ducky cuts in, "Due to the bizarre American proclivity toward Puritanical values in regards to sex—"

Jimmy hops on that, he was just reading about that a few days ago. "You do know the Puritans weren't actually that uptight about sex…"

Ducky's eyes narrow as he says, "Mr. Palmer," the verbal equivalent of Gibbs' smartass glare, "I believe we can get to that another night."

"Yes, Dr. Mallard, tell us more about Puritanical Americans."

Tim nudged Jimmy shoulder and said quietly, "You getting sassy?"

"It's a party, I'm allowed."
Ducky sends both of them a long look. "Whether actual Puritans were particularly reserved in their private behavior with their spouses, they did frown upon prostitution, and the American armed services, unlike every other western military, has kept that tradition. So, while most sensible countries arrange for the needs of the soldiers to be met, and offer condoms to try and limit the damage from meeting those needs, the Americans believe that hard work, cold showers, and moral fortitude will get the job done. So, unlike a British outpost where there would have been entertainment for the enlisted and officers, the American service men were left at the mercy of the ladies of a country that didn't necessarily love them."

"Entertainment?" Jimmy asks.

"They call them red light districts because in World War One the French and British Officers' brothels had red lights. Blue lights for enlisted men. So a red light doesn't just designate a place where there are prostitutes, but also indicates a certain level of comfort, cleanliness, and service."

"New meaning to the Blue Light Special."

"Indeed, Anthony."

Fornell takes over. "Now, Japan doesn't have or need red lights. The price tag on this place weeds out the enlisted, and honestly, if one of them did scrape up enough money to go, Mama San's going to show him the door because he's not the right kind of guy. No, the right kind of guy is at least middle-aged. He's got money. He's got taste. He's done this before and knows the ropes.

"So as Mike said, 'I'm sittin' here with two options: Pure as the driven Probie, who can pull off the Marine part of the job just fine, but he's never been with a goodtime girl, let alone a high class one, or me, and I know my way around a place like this, ya know… past adventures, but I don't look like a soldier, and these girls, readin' a guy, knowing who he is and what he wants in one glance, that's a good third of their job. That's why they get paid the big money.' Fornell attempting to do Mike's accent was making all five of them laugh.

"So, finally, Mike decided that Jethro would be the more attractive mark: 'I can do the Texas Businessman route. Hell, anyone who doesn't sound like they're from New York qualifies as Texan in Japan. But we've got no complaints from them. And hell, I walk in there, they're not going to roll me, they know I'll fuss. No, I walk in, and NIS is out a thousand dollars, and I'm in a good mood for a week. We've got to send Probie in.'" Fornell says, mimicking how Franks told it.

"Can I just add how bizarre it is to hear a story where Probie keeps getting mentioned, and it's not me," Tim says with a smile.

"We could tell the story about you, Probie," Tony says.

"What story about me?"

"You remember, Thom," Gibbs says.

"Oh, come on. That's barely a story."

"Then the digression won't take long." Ducky adds, grinning.

Tim sighs, rolls his eyes a little and says, "Back in what, '06?"

"Probably," Tony says.

"We're hunting a serial killer. He's acting out of an exclusive club. Can't get a warrant. Metro hasn't been able to get a cop in, none of theirs have been 'hot' enough. So, my first book's out, hitting the New York Times top ten. So, Thom E. Gemcity and his lady friends decide to go clubbing."

"At that point the only link we had was this girl, and the whole point is Thom is going in to get her out of the club so we can question her," Tony adds.

"I get in, we're scanning the place." Gibbs gives him a cut the shit look. "Okay, we go in, we're scanning the place by getting a good spot on the dance floor, and I'm dancing with Abby, Ziva, and Lee. And Abby and Ziva are into it, but Lee's sort of hanging back, clearly never done this before —"

"And you had?" Tony asks.

"Maybe." He gives Tony a knowing look. Because at that point in his life, actually, yes, he had done that before, with Abby the first time they dated. "Anyway, while we're doing that, it occurs to me that Thom isn't a cop and can't just barge on up and arrest this girl, so I ask Probie Mark One over there how to get her out of the club, and you said…"

Gibbs sighed the same way he did when he heard Tim ask him how to get her out and said, "Well, Tim, she's a hooker. Use your imagination."

Fornell snorts a laugh. "You didn't know how to get a hooker out of a club?"

"What can I say, Tobias?" First time he's ever called Fornell by his first name, but as Jimmy pointed out, they are at a party, and he is allowed to get a bit sassy. "Even shy, awkward, and a bit plump, I never had to pay for it. Some women, some older, hot, redheaded women, just dig me." He flashed Tobias his best cocky grin, and Fornell glared daggers at him. Gibbs gave him a quick headslap for that, but it was worth it. "And that's it. My sum total experience with hookers and undercover ops."

"How about the bullshit version?" Jimmy chirped.

"The bullshit version would focus on what Lee, Ziva, Abby, and I did when we got back to the lab. And between you having dated Lee, and Tony married to Ziva, I'm thinking we don't need to get into the bullshit version of it."

"Ah..." Jimmy turned back to Ducky and Fornell. "So..."

"God, okay, where were we?" Fornell asks.

"Still setting the scene," Tim answers.

"You've picked Gibbs as the mark," Jimmy adds.

"Right. So somehow they've got to figure out how to make him look like he's done this before." Fornell is grinning at that point. "And Franks is... giving you pointers?"

Gibbs can hear Franks laughing in his head. He nods. "That's a way to put it."

"What kind of pointers?" Tony asks.

Fornell answers, "I think he said, "God, Probie, if you can't ask me for a blow job without blushin', how the hell are you gonna walk in there and ask Mama San for one while five girls are rubbin' all over you?"

The story stopped for a moment there while the boys laughed hysterically at that.
Gibbs waits for them to get calmed down, and says exactly the same thing he said to Mike, "Mike, I don't want a blow job from you. I'll do just fine with the girls."

Fornell got right back in there, playing Franks' part. "'You're still blushin', Probie. Trust me, you ain't got nothing they've never seen, and you don't want nothing they've never done. No Shame, man. That was Arment's number one rule. No shame. You need to walk in there tall and proud, and if you're doing this job right, you will be tall and proud, and tell them exactly what you want and exactly what kind of girl is going to do it for ya.'"

Once more the story stopped as Tim, Tony, and Jimmy laughed so hard they couldn't breathe.

Eventually, Tim got enough breath back to say, "You're right, Fornell, this is much better version of the story."

See, they appreciate the details.

Tobias nods, looking satisfied, and Ducky takes over. "So, after much coaching on how approach a lady of the night—"

"Or as Mike said, when he told us, 'God, Duck, what I wouldn't have given for you on this op. You'd have done it right without weeks of practice. Couldn't get Probie to stop blushin'."

Gibbs rolls his eyes.

And once again Ducky takes over on the story. "The night in question came. And the newly commissioned Colonel Gibbs was off to get rolled."

"Which I did just fine."

"Indeed. Franks told us that the first Lieutenant Colonel had come to in the alley behind the house, so he stationed himself there to wait. And wait. And wait. He was beginning to get nervous because this was taking much too long. The idea was go in, get drugged, get dropped in the alley, then back in again to bust them. But time is passing, and there's no unconscious Gibbs."

"Girl in the bathroom took a shine to me," Gibbs said with a smile.

"Uh huh," Fornell didn't look like he bought that. "Franks probably underestimated how long the preliminaries were going to take. For all his talk, he never had a thousand dollars to see what really happened in a high class Japanese brothel."

That's what you think, Tobias. Bored servicemen play a lot of poker, and I'm great at poker. There were some mighty fine girls in Japan, and they were worth every penny. Gibbs almost turns to Franks and tells him to be quiet, but he catches himself, Franks isn't really here.

Tim sees him almost turn to his left, like he's hearing something, and files that away with things to ask about later.

Fornell continues on, "For whatever reason, this was taking longer than Franks had anticipated. But he had no way to see what was going on. He can't just barge on in. But if Jethro had fumbled this, then he might be in trouble and in need of real backup. He was pacing up and down the alley, having made the decision that if Gibbs wasn't out there in five minutes he was going to break out the Texas Businessman and head on in."

Four of the longest minutes of my life, worryin' about your sorry ass. I'm thinking you're getting killed in there, and turns out you're playin' hide the sponge. Gibbs smiles.
"Okay, what's that smile for?" Tony asks.

"Like I said, bathgirl took a shine to me."

"That is part of the service you are paying for at that price. Trust me, Jethro, had you gotten past the refreshments, everyone there would have taken a shine to you."

"And you would know?" Jimmy asks Ducky.

"Jimmy, you have not yet even scratched the surface of all the things I know," Ducky says with a grin. "As Fornell said to Tony, someday you may get old enough to hear some of those stories. However, in America, at that price, you are paying for discretion in addition to excellent service. In Japan, where geisha tradition holds that this is part of any civilized business deal, you are paying for enthusiastic service catering to all of your needs and wants. The point of this is not just sex, but to be pampered, coddled, and taken care of on all levels. Food, music, excellent conversation, massage, relaxation, and… how did Mike put it?"

Fornell knows that Ducky hasn't forgotten the turn of phrase, but isn't willing to say it so, he adds Mike's description, "Gettin' your brains sucked out through your dick."

"Ah, yes… is all part of the experience."

"Mike really liked oral, didn't he?" Jimmy says.

 Damn straight, Skippy!

"Like you don't." Tim says, shoving Jimmy a little.

"Not saying I don't just… you know… if you're going to…" Jimmy seems to notice that it's not just him and Tim here so he wraps with, "This probably isn't the time or place."

Tim nods.

"So, eventually I do get out there, and the story stays pretty much the same from there to the end."

"Pretty much," Fornell says. "But the whole thing was about no shame, not just the last five minutes of it. When Franks was telling it, it wasn't just about a two minute pep talk, it was about actually learning how to do it."

Gibbs shook his head and sighed. "Yeah."

Fornell turns to Tony. "DiNozzo, you worked vice, I'm sure you've got a story or two."

Tony grins. "Oh, I do. I've got lots of stories. Some of them might have even made Franks blush."

Yeah, right. Ain't nothing you've ever even heard of that'll make me blush. Gibbs smiles at that, and is tempted to say, "Wanna bet?"

"But in that I am now extremely married, and also not an idiot, none of you are going to hear those stories."

"Come on, just us guys here," Fornell said.

"Abby reads lips, and she's been watching us, keeping up a running commentary for Breena and Ziva. No way I'm saying anything else."
Fornell looked like he wanted to swallow his tongue, and both Gibbs and Ducky look distinctly uncomfortable at that idea.

And less than ten seconds later Ziva was over, in his lap, and saying, "But what if I want to hear those stories?"

"Told you Abby was watching."

"She was. Sooo…"

"Then I will tell you them. When we're alone. But let's leave it at this, no one ever needed to coach me on how to pick up a woman."

Ziva kissed him on the nose and got up. "I'll leave you to your man stories."
Tim quietly eased the door shut behind him, and found Jimmy lurking in the upstairs hallway at Gibbs' house.

"Molly still asleep?"

"Oh, yeah. Two baby girls, right in the middle of his bed, snoozing away."

"Good. One of the neighbors started blasting off with something that was pretty loud. Wanted to check on her."

"Nothing. She didn't notice me singing, or the little chirp Kelly let off when I laid her down, or…" Tim fished out his phone and showed Jimmy a pic of their girls sleeping together.

Jimmy smiled, took Tim's phone, and sent himself a copy of that shot. "Good."

Tim sat down, back against the wall. Jimmy raised an eyebrow at him.

"Always hang around for five minutes or so. Make sure she's really asleep. Nothing worse than get her down, lay down yourself, close your eyes, and boom, she's crying again."

"Didn't take you too long to figure out how to skip that."

"Nope. Put her down, sit outside her room, count to three hundred, and then if she's really down, back to bed."

"That works." Jimmy sat down next to him. "I don't get it."

"Jimmy?"

"Paying a grand for sex."

"Not as enthusiastic about oral as Franks?" Tim asks Jimmy.

Jimmy's look indicates he's a very big fan of oral, so that's not exactly the issue here. "Just… you know… If you're gonna spend a grand you'd want something… exotic, right? Not the same thing you got last Tuesday."

"I get you." Tim thought for a moment. He can't think of anything he wants, exotic or not, that he'd pay a grand for. Hell, he can't think of anything, exotic or not, that he wants that he doesn't already have, or at least wouldn't have once Abby's all healed up again. "What would you pay a grand for?"

"I don't know. That's why I don't get it. I mean… Look, I've got great food, conversation, relaxation, and my brain sucked out through my dick at home. I really can't think of anything I want that I don't already have."

"Yeah." Tim nods. "Like the bachelor party and the lap dance thing. I've already got that."

"Exactly. Of course, Franks and Gibbs were single then. Might have made a thousand dollar blow job more appealing."

Tim shrugs. "Maybe. I mean. I've had the thousand dollar blow job. Hell, I've had the five thousand dollar blow job. And if there is such a thing as a ten thousand dollar blow job, I've had that, too. But, you can't get that from a stranger. You just can't. Unless a woman really knows your body, and she wouldn't if it was a once or twice thing, the sex isn't going to be that good. I mean, okay, she's a professional, she does it a whole lot, so lots of experience, and let's say she's got tons of natural talent, and okay, I've obviously never done it, but, let's say blow jobs really aren't that complicated, and that the basic technique is more or less the same for every guy, and the real skill comes in knowing how to apply that technique, but even with all that she doesn't know me inside and out, and hell, add a condom on top of that, so it just can't be that good."

"Maybe." That seemed like a good point. Breena can play him like Mozart with a piano. A stranger, not so much. Jimmy laces his hands in front of him, and looks at his watch. It's a decent Timex.
Looks good, tells time, does everything he needs it to do. It cost about seventy dollars. "Maybe it's like the shiny, gold watch. It's not that it tells time that much better, it's showing off that you can afford to buy it."

"Could be. And if usually you'd do that with buddies or business associates, you're showing off how much money you'll drop on them for their comfort."

"Makes a bit more sense. I'll blow five grand making you happy; you'll sign the fifty million dollar contract; everyone wins."

"I guess." Tim's not feeling particularly convinced by that, but he's also not the guy who's ever signed the fifty million dollar contract, and it wasn't like he needed any real persuading to sign the seven hundred and fifty thousand dollar one for the last three Gemcity books.

"So, you've never..." Jimmy asked.

Tim shook his head. "No. You?"

"Spring break, freshman year of college, the Choir went on tour in Europe, and we spent two days in Amsterdam. I was still partying pretty hard back then, and stoned off my ass and laid sounded like a great Friday night."

"And?" Tim's curious about this. Not like he's never thought about it. He's been awfully lonely and horny in the past, but he's also a cop, and never lived anywhere it was legal.

"And it was."

Tim's silently saying, okay, tell me more.

Jimmy shrugs. "More fun than jerking off, but, honestly, not that much better. Not worth possibly getting busted for. Got back here, and never tried again. And at least when you do yourself, no one expects you to get up and leave right after. And, okay, just, remember, I was eighteen, so it's not like I was in danger of setting any endurance records, so that was probably the fastest hundred dollars I ever spent."

Tim smirks, laughing quietly. "Well, if you get paid per customer, instead of by the night, you're probably trying to get it done fast."

"Could be."

"Like you had a thousand dollars to blow back then, but if you had..."

Jimmy thinks about it. "Probably still not worth a grand. Too lonely for a grand."

"Yeah. Maybe it's because I'm not so hard up I'm climbing the walls, but, sex with a stranger, even a beautiful one who knows every trick there is... seems kind of beside the point."

Jimmy nods, acknowledging that. "So, really, you never..."

"No." Tim shrugs. He doesn't want it to sound like he's standing on some high moral ground here. Sure, teasing Fornell with it was fun, but that's not why he's never done it. "But, I also never lived anywhere it was legal."

"Never been to Europe?"

"Only on work. Got stuck in Germany overnight with Tony," Tim rolled his eyes. "Sure as hell wasn't even suggesting it. Germany again, with Gibbs, and just... no. Mexico, where I managed to poison myself. Mexico a second time, where I was supposed to be looking out for Abby and managed to poison myself, again. Canada I was on my own, sort of."

"Sort of?"

"Not all of the Mounties are male."

"Ah." That got a smile out of Jimmy.

"By the time I got to Nevada, Abby was with me, and we did blow over a grand a night, but together."

"Do anything interesting?"

"Yeah, but not like that. Penn and Teller, Cirque du Soleil. Went dancing. Played the tables. That was fun. I mean," it feels a little weird to say this, but, "we've got the kind of money where we can blow a grand or two a night on fun. Can't do it a lot, but every once and a while, sure. And it was a lot of fun."

Jimmy nods at that. They don't have the kind of money Tim and Abby do, but the occasional lavish night out isn't out of the question.

"So, you're in Vegas and all you did was shows on the Strip?"

"Only there for two nights. We did Cirque the first night and had a date with Penn and Teller the second night."

"Nothing risqué?"

"Cirque was risqué, lot of fun for a date night, but we didn't do anything like a strip club or show girls. You know, I've never actually been to a strip club, except for work."

"It's overrated. I don't know about you, but my idea of a good time isn't looking at naked girls with a whole bunch of drunk guys. I like looking at naked girls just fine, but I don't need a dozen or more other guys with me when I do it."

"Yeah."

"And if it's spend a few hundred dollars on a woman I don't know or on Breena, Breena wins."

"Yep."

"And if you aren't willing to spend that kind of money, you feel like a jerk, because they're dancing for tips. So, I can come home with a present that makes her day, or go spend it on some lackluster sex where I don't even get to get off. I just don't get why anyone would pick the sex."

"Not everyone has great sex at home."

"I guess. But..." Jimmy squints a little, looking at the wall across from them. "You think that's it?"

"For some guys, sure. Why?"

"I don't get Tony sometimes."

"Join the club."

"Ziva's beautiful. She's smoking hot. I cannot imagine anything involving her is lackluster, and he still tried to take us to a strip club for your bachelor party, when he was engaged to her."

Tim nods.

"And it's not like he just met us, so he had to know neither of us are strip club type guys."

Tim nods at that, too.

"So, was he looking for an excuse to go himself, or was he just going through the motions? This is what a bachelor party looks like, so this is what we're going to do."

Tim shakes his head. "I don't know."

"If she's really not pregnant, I don't get him flipping out on Draga, either."

"She's not. She actually drank the beer she was holding. Two of them."

"You think they're okay?"

"Yeah." Tim thinks about that. He hasn't been paying much attention to anything outside his immediate family right now. "I mean, have you seen anything else?"

"No. Just that."

Tim leans his head against the wall behind him. "They're okay. Maybe starting to feel their way through that space where you realize you're together forever, but there's still a whole lot of attractive people out there."

Jimmy smiled at that. "And you're going to look, and you're going to think about it, but you're not going to do anything about it because you love your wife, and she trusts you, and you're not an asshole."

"Something like that. I know it's something he's nervous about."

Jimmy looks curious.

"Back when they were first dating. He was worried about looking. 'Cause, he's more or less doing it all the time. And maybe it's because looking always used to lead to touching for him. Or maybe he just hasn't gotten to the point where he really gets that Ziva loves him, and that's not going to stop being true, and sure, she might like the view on another guy, but that he's still her world."

He thinks about that for a second and says, "Oh."

"Oh?"
"His mom died. Wendy… he's never said, but I think she left him. Jeanne left."

"Any sane woman in Jeanne's position would have left."

"Not saying you're wrong, but, I'm getting to a point here."

"Okay."

"For months he thought Ziva was dead. EJ just vanished one day. Maybe it's not insane that he can't rest as easy in the idea that she'll be around forever as you and I do with Abby and Breena."

"Good point. I've been broken up with, but, no one ever just vanished on me."

"Yeah. I've been dumped my fair share, and honestly, a few other people's fair shares as well, but, I've only had two serious relationships, and I ended the other one."

"You broke it off with…?"

"Helen. Grad school girlfriend. She didn't want me in law enforcement. Wanted me to be a full time writer. Or if I had to have a day job, the IRS was a good compromise. I wanted to carry a gun and put bad guys away. I wanted it more than her. So I signed with NCIS and headed to FLETC, and she dumped me when I told her I'd taken that offer. Which was exactly what I expected her to do."

"Okay. But, I get your point, a history like that means it's easier not to get worried when our girls look."

"Yeah, at least, I'm assuming that's why you and I weren't flipping out."

"Yep. This time last year, you would have flipped out."

Tim thinks about that. It's not entirely unlikely. Definitely would have been true two years ago. "How long ago for you?"

"Three years? Breena can look at Draga, Abby can too, not an issue. Now, if he had asked to see them…"

"Yeah, that would have provoked major flipping out." Tim checked his watch, ready to get up, but Jimmy stopped him with a question.

"Could you have gone undercover like he did?"

"Huh?" He hadn't followed Jimmy's leap to that question and isn't sure what he's asking.

"The thing with Jeanne."

Oh. "You mean, play Thom, get close to a girl, try to make her fall in love with me, and use her to get close to her dad?"

"Yeah."

Tim thinks about that, and decides there are two parts to that question. "Like play the role, or use the girl?"

"Use the girl. I already know you'd muffed the role a day or two in."

Tim sent Jimmy a quick glare. Not really angry. He would have muffed it.
"Just, you know… She was a doctor. Nice girl from everything I heard. She didn't break any laws. She never hurt anyone. Not like she was running guns for her dad. Just, seems like a real asshole thing to do. I mean, we're supposed to be the good guys, right?"

Tim shrugs. He'd never thought about it like that. "What's got you thinking about that?"

"Just dad stuff, probably. All the guys out there that one day Molly and Kelly, and this new one…"

"Thinking she's a girl."

"Yeah, leaning that way. Get to find out for sure in the beginning of September."

"Anna, right?"

"Yeah, if she's really a girl. Hadn't thought about Jeanne in probably nine years, but you mentioned her, and… I don't get that either. I don't get how you pretend to be someone else and worm your way into someone else's heart. I guess, that's not you paying for sex, that's you being the hooker. But it's not, because if you're a hooker you don't expect the John to fall in love with you. You aren't trying to gain his trust and affection, just get him off."

"Are we still talking about Tony and Jeanne or are we talking about Lee and you?"

Jimmy shrugs. "At least Lee was trying to protect her family. Someone takes Molly, and… I don't know what I'd do… Anything, probably, and God help the poor son of a bitch who gets in my way. So, yeah, for Lee, I was the poor son of a bitch. Wasn't fun, but I get it. But Tony was… what? Advancing his career?"

"Trying to put an awfully bad guy away."

"How? You saying we couldn't have put Jeanne under surveillance and just grabbed her father when he stuck his head out to go visit her?"

"I think he was supposed to get evidence on him. We knew who he was and where he was. Grabbing him wasn't the problem."

"Then that's worse. That means the plan was to get Jeanne so into him that she'd take him home to meet her dad. This wasn't just get close; it was make her fall in love. Make her want the ring and the home and the kids and… And if her dad was that careful, then he wasn't going to just leave things lying around for Tony to find. This was build trust, become part of the family, and then, what? Marry in? Be useful? Hope daddy offers you a job? Three years and a kid later leave with the information they needed to nail this guy?"

"I don't know."

"So, could you have?"

"No. Especially, not after you put it like that. That's not something you do to a person. But a target, for someone who's selling guns all over the place and killed my dad—"

"Killed my dad?"

"That's why Director Sheppard wanted him so bad."

"That's even worse. I'm a damaged daughter, so I'll do it back to your kid? And Tony went along with that?"
"I don't think he knew that. I hope. I think he had a target in mind, and she was beautiful, and fun, and charming. He spent time with her and she became a person, he fell in love with her, and didn't know how to get himself or her out of it."

Jimmy shook his head. "That's grim." Then looked at his watch. Ten minutes. "I'm guessing she's really down."

"Yeah."

"Let's get back to the party."

"Sounds good."

They were heading down the stairs when Tim asked Jimmy, "Did Gibbs look distracted to you?"

"When?"

"During the story."

"Not that I noticed."

"Okay."
Ghosts That We Knew

So, he knows Gibbs mentioned it once, and it's not something Tim thinks about much, because, well, thinking about it too much leads to other somewhat uncomfortable thoughts, but it's twice now in the last few weeks that he's noticed Gibbs looking at/hearing something.

Like he was sure Gibbs was looking over his shoulder that one day in the kitchen with Kelly, but, he knows the layout of his kitchen, and there shouldn't have been anything back there worth looking at, not that intensely.

So, as the party was winding down, and Kelly was getting her last feed in before they go home, he found Gibbs in the kitchen starting to clean up.

He stands next to Gibbs, and helps him load plates into the dishwasher, not sure if he's going to say anything, but he's feeling pretty curious right now, too.

"Out with it, Tim." It was awfully clear to Gibbs that Tim was very much not asking something.

"Wondering about something."

"Yeah."

He quickly scans the room, but it's just the two of them. "You really see ghosts?"

Gibbs looks up at him, pretty startled for a second, and then relaxes as he remembers that he has already mentioned this to Tim. "Yeah."

"Hear 'em, too?"

Gibbs smiles a little. "Sometimes."

"Uh huh… So…" Tim doesn't finish that sentence, hoping Gibbs'll just volunteer the information.

"So? Gotta ask if you want to know."

"How many of us were there for the No Shame story?"

"I'd say seven."

Tim quickly counts in his head and comes up with six. "Uh huh." He nods at that, remembering how Gibbs almost turned twice. "Someone sitting behind you, to the left."

"Felt that way to me."

"Okay." He's not entirely sure what to do with that, other than be glad that he wasn't imagining Gibbs seeming distracted.

"Think I'm losing it?"

Tim slowly shakes his head. "Not touching that."

Gibbs smiles at him, looking very amused by that answer. "So, why are you asking?"

" Noticed a few times you were looking like someone else was talking to you."
"Yep."

"You really think it's a ghost?"

He can see Mike behind Tim, leaning against his kitchen counter, enjoying this. Well, Probie, am I a ghost?

Gibbs laughs a little, looking down, shaking his head. Trust Mike to ask. So, he's answering Mike as much as he's answering Tim. "It's as good a word as any. Maybe I just know the story well enough, I can hear his voice. Maybe I just miss my friend. Maybe it doesn't matter."

"Maybe."

And maybe it doesn't matter, but he can see Mike standing in his kitchen, sipping a beer, and Tim's asking him about it so… "Can you feel him, at all?" Gibbs asks. Might be good to at least get a clue if this is entirely in his head.

"No." Tim shakes his head. "I never was that guy. If he's here, Abby might feel it, but not me. I just noticed you noticing him. Just like I can see you keep looking behind my shoulder."

Franks smiles at that. He's onto ya.

"But you've got to remember. I also can't tell if someone is lying just by looking at them. I'm better at it than I used to be, but I still don't have your gut. You always seem to know more about what's going on than anyone else around you, and you never have let slip how you do it."

"Good point."

"So…"

Gibbs tilts his head a little, shrugs a little, might as well let it go. "Better hearing than anyone knows. Until a few years ago, great distance vision. I can read lips. With the perps, it's split between reading their faces and a gut feeling. And it always has been. When I was active duty, I usually knew when we were walking into a trap. Was good with that little tickle on the back of the neck screaming danger. Doesn't always fire. Didn't notice the thing with the freezer until we were in the middle of it, but I've always been able to feel when I'm in the crosshairs."

"Ziva can do that, too. Maybe you should ask her if she's got a sense of him."

"Nah. I don't need to know."

"You don't want to tell her about it?"

Gibbs shrugs, that's part of it. Not that it's personal to Ziva, just that this doesn't need to go wide. It already feels weird that someone else knows this, and honestly, kind of nice that Tim's not looking at him like he's completely insane.

He shuts the dishwasher and takes a drink from his beer, mostly just feeling the quiet, Tim's standing there waiting for him to say something, and Mike's in the background looking like this is the funniest thing he's ever seen.

"The day he died, he told me about how we make ghosts. Not just with our guns, but… He looked at me and said, 'You do hear ghosts, Probie.' And he was right, probably heard them himself. ' Mike nods at that. "He was talking about how we fill our lives and spaces with memories, ghosts. How the longer we stay in a place, the more we fill it." Gibbs smiles at this memory, Franks winks at him.
"He said, 'That's why I've always tried to make sure, that where ever I live, the longer I live there, the spaces become filled with memories… of naked women.'"

Tim laughed at that. "Sounds like Franks."

God, Probie, you've filled this place with me? That's just depressing.

"I'd told him how I see them, and he walked out of the basement and died in front of my house. We buried him in the box I built for him. I've got his old files, gun, flask, and badge. And he pops up every now and again, been doing it since the day he died." Gibbs takes another drink. "I've never been sure what Mike is. He always played fast and loose with the rules, so, if anyone could do it…"

Franks smiles. Tim nods. "If anyone could… Does it worry you? Not being sure?"

"No."

"Then it doesn't matter. Do you mind if I mention this to Abby?"

Gibbs shook his head. No it doesn't bother him, but it also doesn't seem like something Tim would just bring up. "Why would you?"

Tim smiles a little at that, shakes his head a little, takes a sip of his own drink. (Iced tea. Time to head home soon.) "Haven't believed in anything like that for a long, long time. But if you've got a sense of him, and she does, that'd be… interesting. Not enough to turn me into a believer, but… it'd be interesting."

"What would be interesting?" Abby asked, sleepy Kelly resting on her shoulder.

Gibbs eyes flicked past Tim again, before settling on Abby, and he's got the sense Gibbs is still seeing Franks, so might as well see how it goes… "Who's in this room?"

She stares at Tim like he's insane then looks around at them. "You mean, besides you, me, Gibbs, and Kelly?"

"Yeah."

"Franks is behind you and to the left. He's smiling, looking pretty shocked that I just said that."

Mike did look pretty damn shocked by that. Your girl's good, Probie, I'll give you that. I didn't think she could do that!

Tim and Gibbs are looking awfully shocked at that, too. She smiled big and kissed both of them, then said, "Come on, we've got to get her home."

Tim and Gibbs just stood there, staring at her, eyes very wide, jaws dropped to the floor.

Abby smiles big and warm and starts to laugh. "Okay, I can't actually see him, and I've been listening in for the last minute, so I knew what you were talking about, but even with that, I do keep feeling like he's here tonight." She snuggled into Gibbs. "And maybe it's the fact that you keep looking over there, but, yeah, I've got a very clear idea of him leaning against the counter, he's got all his fingers again," And Gibbs notices that he does. "but it's not like I'm seeing with my eyes. And I did feel like he was with us for a few days after he died. He was following you around, right?"

"Yeah."

"So, either he's here, or you're thinking about him so hard that I get the sense of it off of you. Doesn't matter how it happens. Seems like you find having him around comforting, and that's all that matters."

Gibbs takes a deep breath, nods, and kisses Abby's forehead. Then he very gently takes Kelly from her. "I'll get her in her car seat." Which both Tim and Abby understood meant that he was going to get some baby snuggles in on the way to getting her strapped in and ready to go.

Tim's still just staring at her. So she walked up and pressed against him. "You okay?"

He shook his head, then nodded, and finally said, "Sure. Why not?"

She smiled and kissed him. "Meet at the car?"

"Let me get the stuff from the porch." He stepped out of the kitchen to the back porch, and said, very quietly, "Goodnight, Mike."

They were on the way home when he asked, "Have you ever seen a ghost?"

"Sure."

"Like, with your eyes?"

"Yeah." She nods at that. "Feel them mostly, but I've seen them, too."

"Gibbs told me he does. Sees them, hears them."

"And Mike showed up to help with the storytelling tonight and stuck around?"

"I guess. Gibbs was showing Kelly off to everyone who hadn't met her yet. Franks would be on that list, right?"

"Yeah, he would."

"So, what's it feel like?"

"Phew," she smiled, shaking her head. "Ask me an easy one next time, okay?"

"I'll try."

She thinks for a while as he passes a slow Taurus.

"Okay. There was a way I used to feel when I was with my mom or my dad. Happy, content, love, all of that, but it was still… different… distinct for each of them."

"Okay."

"And, especially since Kelly's been born, I've been feeling that a lot. My mom mostly. Late at night, when I'm nursing, and it's all dark and gray and blue, and there's just that feeling of her nearby. And sometimes I feel like I can smell her. That hint of her soap and shampoo."

"Oh." He drives for another mile, not saying anything.

"What are you thinking?"

"Not much of anything." Which is true. Long day, lots of… stuff. He's just absorbing it. "Just, knowing it."

"Ah."

"Who did you see?"

"My dad. The day after we buried them I was sitting downstairs in our house, supposed to be packing up, because we had to go, and… and I wasn't. I was sitting on the sofa, staring at the stereo, thinking about how when he'd have it on, the subwoofer would vibrate so hard you could see it. Like really," she waves her hand back and forth, "thumping away. And he came in and sat next to me, told me I needed to get packing, and this was hard for everyone, and me laying around wasn't going to make it any easier. So I got up, put one plate in a box, and he smiled, kissed my forehead, and said it was going to be okay. That as long as I kept moving forward it'd be okay."

"Wow."

"Yeah. Saw Kate after she died. But I told you about that."

"No." He's fairly sure he'd remember something like, 'I just saw Kate.'

"You were in the lab, looking distracted, and I said to you that I felt like Kate was there. I'd been seeing her in the lab all day."

That startled him enough he jerked the steering wheel a bit, and quickly corrected.

"What?" Abby's looking at him concerned.

"I never realized that's what you meant by that. I thought…” But he doesn't finish that sentence.

"You thought…"

"I just… I thought I was imagining it."

"What? Were you seeing her, too?"

"Yeah, and it was… it was just horribly inappropriate."

"What did you see?"

He sighs. "It was so bad."

"Bad as Tony ogling her in a catholic school girl uniform?"

"What?" Yeah, that sounded like Tony, but just… she'd just died. Of course, compared to what he was seeing… "He told you that?"

"No, she did."

That's got him a little worried. "She didn't say anything about me, did she?"

"No. So what did you see?"

He shook his head. "Just her. In the lab. And… No. I had to be imagining it, because there's no way she would have dressed up like Trinity from the Matrix, let alone…"

"Let alone…"
"Nope. That one's private."

Abby looks pretty interested in that, but doesn't press. "She was wearing a long black dress, with long white hair when I saw her."

"So, she didn't look like herself?"

"No. Well, yes. Just not dressed like her."

"Oh."

"So, Trinity?"

"My superhero. All cool and sleek and dangerous."

She smiled at that. Kate would have liked to be the hero. "I like that."

"I wonder if Gibbs did."

"Go to Bootcamp tomorrow and ask him."

"Maybe. See how tired I am." It was getting onto midnight. They'll get home, he'd be able to sleep 'til four (because it was his night for the four AM feed) and from then to ten maybe.

"If you're not too beat, I'd like to go to church."

They hadn't been for a month, so, why not?

"Sure. See how we're feeling."

"Okay."
Bad Day/Bad Month

Tony is not having a good day.

Okay, honestly, he hasn't been having a good month. Three weeks technically. Since Draga showed up, and McGee left. But today should have been a good day. It should have been a great day. Long weekend, not on call, cook out at Gibbs', should have been great.

Last night had been great. Okay, didn't start great, he's been trying to figure this whole Draga thing out, and it's stressful, so he's been stressed by it. They'd been talking about where Draga'd be in the family, how much access he'd get, and talking about it was making him tense, because Draga's not family, and he's already overstepping his lines, but they don't want to shut him out, but bringing him in even closer isn't going to help teach him what the lines are.

First time he's been Boss in almost a decade and it's already going badly.

And he's not sure how to fix it.

So, yeah, stressed. For three weeks.

But after everyone went home, Ziva'd offered to help him relax, and that was excellent. He was awfully relaxed by the time they'd finished with that. He was so relaxed he couldn't have named his problems, let alone worry about them.

So, sleeping the sleep of the very relaxed and extremely satisfied.

And then it's morning. The morning of what should have been a fine and bright day, and fine and bright days tend to start a certain way, but…

But then the thing happens.

Or more precisely it doesn't happen.

And it's never not happened before.

Ever.

And okay, yeah, it's been less than twelve hours since the time before. And yeah, he's forty-eight. And he has been stressed. But, that's never happened before. That's something that happens to other guys. Old guys. Usually, he's awfully reliable in the morning, (cause, sure, that's never happened before, but he has noticed that things are slower than they used to be) and, God, making it worse, she'd taken care of him, and he was planning on returning the favor with great vigor and enthusiasm, and he did, but part of returning the favor didn't happen, and she had to notice, even if she didn't say anything.

So, he isn't exactly dancing about with a spring in his step and joy in his heart that morning.

But, okay, it happens. Eventually. To every guy. At least that's what they say. So get over it. Party to go to. Delicious food to eat. Fun to be had. Maybe by the end of the night Little DiNozzo will be showing signs of life again, and all will be well with the world.

And they get to Gibbs place, and it's going pretty smooth. They're having fun. Tossing around the Frisbee, showing off the fireworks he'd gotten for later, (As residents of Maryland, they can get legal fireworks, and as cops they had no problem getting them back across the state line to where Gibbs lives in Virginia.) just happily chilling out with his family on the Fourth.

Great.

Leon and his family shows up, and okay, that makes things a little less relaxed, but still good. He might be the Boss but that gets put on the back burner at parties. At least, Leon's always been good about not making everyone toe the line when he's a guest at Gibbs' place. But Tony's not perfectly comfortable with his full goofing-off self when Vance is around. He can't fully relax and be fun and silly the way he likes to be.

But Jared heads over, and he's just shooting up. Kid's got to be fourteen now and at least six feet tall, and even better, he's a rabid basketball fan and player. He has a Wizards t-shirt on, so they get talking. Jared's looking at trying to play for college (has Duke in mind) so Tony is happy to talk about that. After all, if there's anything he knows a whole lot about, it's a good long college ball career.

Senior and Delphine show up a few minutes later, so he spends some time chatting with his dad. That goes well. Though he's confused as to why Senior's in DC right now, chasing some vague business deal, something to do with contracts for the ACA, but usually his dad handles real-estate-type deals, and he's got no idea how that would work into the ACA.

Though maybe he's just looking for an excuse to get together.

Jimmy and Breena and Molly are there a few minutes later, and schmoozing the girls always makes Senior happy, and Molly certainly seems to enjoy the attention, so that works out. (Until Ducky and Penny get there about ten minutes later, and Molly decides she wants her Duck, toddling off to him as fast as her little legs could get her there, shrieking 'Duck-eee!')

Then Draga gets there. And Flyboy's just been looking for an excuse to show off. What sort of single guy brings a cake to a pot luck? A homemade cake. A nicely decorated homemade cake. Single guys bring drinks, chips, and maybe, if they're feeling really frisky pre-made vegetable trays to pot lucks. They do not stand in a circle of the ladies explaining how they like to bake and swapping recipes.

They sure as hell don't do it looking like… like one of the extras from Top Gun, one of the extras about to shoot the volleyball scene.

Fornell's standing next to him, shaking his head, elbows Gibbs and says, "Where do you keep finding these guys? Palmer was a bridesmaid, McGee'll show up in a skirt, and this one bakes?"

"Test pilot for the Navy, Tobias. Flew experimental planes at six times the speed of sound. Off an aircraft carrier. At night."

"I swear they started putting something in the water in 1975 and men haven't been the same since." Fornell shakes his head, and Tony sighs, nodding, exactly on the same page with him. "How's he working out?"

Tony's about to answer that, but Gibbs shakes his head a little and says, "He's settling in."

Tobias catches that shake and looks between the two of them curiously.

So, instead of blowing off some steam Tony just nods and says, "He'll do."

Fornell looks at the two of them, catches something else in Gibbs' look and decides he needs to go check on Emily and see what she and Wendy are up to.
"Not outside the family, Tony," Gibbs says quietly. "Fornell'll likely work with him a time or two before he retires. Don't poison the well."

"Fine." He picks the Frisbee back up. "Toss it around?"

"Gotta get the meat on. Grill's hot enough for it. Bet Jimmy and Jared'd be up for it."

And they are, and that is fun. Tossing around the Frisbee with the guys, while the girls lay around on the porch, chatting with each other, occasionally making appreciative comments or whistling when he or Jimmy made a good catch, that's always good.

The backyard is filling with the scent of very yummy grilled things.

All is well.

Then Draga gets free of Penny. (Who knows what they were talking about, but he, Penny, and Ducky seemed to be having a lovely chat.) And he came over to join the toss. Kayla wings the Fribsee right at him, and he is in the game, laughing with them.

It's not even that Draga's a bad guy or anything. No, he's too damn smart to be a bad guy. He never does anything over the line. He's always helpful. Shows up early. Stays late. Kind of like McGee back in the day. But unlike McGee, he doesn't know his place and won't stay in it.

Speaking of McGee, he shows up, and…

And Draga's not stupid. He's been looking for a chance to show off for Ziva for weeks now, and McGullible fell for it. Like anyone besides Abby gives a shit about his tattoos? No, Flyboy just wants a chance to show his own skin off.

And Ziva twists the knife deeper, staring at him, eyes dragging all over his skin, just about oohing at him, and Tony just wants to smack the living shit out of Draga.

Warrior culture, woad, (what the hell is woad?) tribal marks, sacred honor of trust among warriors, blending the power of sea and sky and the eagle into his skin. Bullshit. Ziva's lapping it up, but he knows it's crap. Draga's just laying it on with a trowel trying to impress her. Probably told that line to a million girls in every port the Navy's ever landed at.

And it's working. She's impressed. He knows what Ziva looks like when she's watching a guy she likes, and she's liking what she sees.

Then, to make matters even worse an hour later the wonder twins are laughing at him over it, saying he's flipping out because Draga's younger and hotter and fuck, okay, that's not wrong, but it's not right, either. He's worked with younger, hotter guys, that's not a problem, no it's the fact that Draga's trying to fuck his wife, that's the problem. But they're just chuckling away 'cause he's not hitting on their wives, so it's all a fucking laugh riot to them.

And Gibbs, who is supposed to understand this, who's supposed to be in his corner, just lays down even more crap, and it is not his fault that Gibbs didn't once mention his wife was named Stephanie, and look, you start dating a new woman while you're still married to the old one, and you're dumb enough to get caught doing it, she is going to get pissed, and she is going to do something about it, and if that means picking up your new hire in front of you, well… you fucking deserve it, asshole.

The No Shame story helps, and he thinks Gibbs knew it would, that's why he told it. And being the only guy to notice Abby is listening in is good, so he starts to perk up. Ziva on his lap being all warm and soft is nice. And maybe there are a few stories he wouldn't mind telling her later that night.
So that's good.

Firecrackers, sparklers, dessert, (And damn it, yes, Flyboy's cake is good. It's really good. It's some sort of white chocolate, pistachio, raspberry mousse thing, and it's delicious, and yes, he had seconds, or he was going to until he remembered Palmer's comment about losing some weight, and damn it if he isn't getting soft around the middle. So he gives Ziva the piece of cake, making it look like he'd grabbed it for her.) and more stories are good. He is starting to feel pretty relaxed and mellow again.

He is relaxing on one of the wooden porch chairs, Ziva on his lap, beer in hand, watching the kids blow stuff up, all is good. Vance and Gibbs get talking about past military adventures. Then Draga adds a few of his own. Ziva starts to talk about her time in the IDF. Fornell has stories from his time in the Army during Viet Nam. Ducky's talking about his time in the Medical Corp. Even his dad has a few stories about Korea, which got him and Ducky talking about it, because they'd both been there.

So, he's on the porch, the only adult (well, male adult, somehow, the wonder twins have vanished) with no military stories to tell. Then Delphine gets into it, with stories of how she used to help sneak people out of the USSR. (Of course she did.) And Penny used to design cutting edge weapons for the military while being married to an Admiral, and when Draga got talking about night landings on aircraft carriers, she asks about it, and turns out Admiral McGee (Nelson, not John) actually was one of the guys who designed the damn things in the first place (and she was the person he showed the designs to first, get a second set of eyes to look and see if it was worth sending up the line), and Senior had been in the Air Force during Korea, so they're all talking daring do with planes and battles and crap, then Gibbs starts adding in some of his Dad's stories, and he's sitting there like Breena and Abby with nothing to say because, something like, 'This one time, I was in Afghanistan, and I was close enough I could hear the battle' just doesn't cut it.

He's a cop. He's saved lives. He's been in gun battles. He should not be feeling inadequate because he hasn't gone off to war.

But he is.

And maybe it's not just about not having served. It's that he's the only one. (Even though he's not. Where the hell are McGee and Palmer?)

And it's that Ziva's sitting in his lap, idly stroking his shoulder, staring at Draga, looking at him with respect. And fuck. That's worse than lust.

Because that's the kind of respect that took him years to earn from her.

The kind of respect he had to go to Somalia to get.

Wrap the party up with the wonder twins finally coming back, and finally he's not the only guy in the group who didn't enlist. But, that's a badge of pride for McGee. So he's not bothered about not having anything to add to story time. He's happy as a clam to sit there with Abby, snuggling her, keeping an eye on the baby monitor. Laughing at the funny stories, and acting impressed at the dangerous ones, asking good questions to keep the stories going.

And Jimmy makes a few sharp remarks in his direction, and glares twice, but wouldn't say what's up when he gets him alone. "Nothing you can do anything about." What the hell does that mean? And if he can't do anything about it, why is Jimmy glaring at him? He was fine before they vanished, and now he's pissed. What, do those two talk about him behind his back?

An hour later, he gets McGee on his own, and asks what the hell is wrong with Palmer, and he says, "Jeanne."
Tony couldn't believe he heard that right. "Jeanne? Benoit?"

"Yeah."

"What?" Of all the myriad things that could be wrong with Jimmy, a decade old case he hadn't even been part of is ridiculous.

"Long story."

"Why are you telling stories about Jeanne?"

McGee shrugs a little, which is completely useless. "That's a long story, too."

"Well, why would he be glaring at me about that? It's been a decade."

Tim's staring at him like he's a moron for not putting it together, but he's not seeing it, at all. And then he did. Jimmy was Jeanne. "Fuck." Someone played Jimmy, tried to get him to love her so she could get access to what she needed. He figured out something was off and broke it off, but it still had to hurt like a son of a bitch when he learned what was up.

"He say anything to you?" McGee asks.

"Just that I couldn't do anything about it."

"Well, you can't." Yeah, that's useful McHelpful.

"It's not like her dad was selling candy. He was a bad guy."

"I mentioned that. Jimmy mentioned there were ways to get him that didn't involve screwing his daughter, literally and metaphorically."

"Fine."

"Talk to him about it. Not tonight, it's getting late, but, eventually."

"Great." Jeanne might not be his least favorite topic, but she's up there. Every cop who's been in it for more than a year has a case he regrets. One that was screwed from top to bottom and makes it hard to look in the mirror.

Jeanne was that case for him.

So, yeah, he is not in anything even remotely approaching a good mood when the party wraps.

And picking the fight with Ziva is stupid, and he knows it while he's doing it, but she's talking about Draga, smiling about something he'd said, talking about how nice he'd been, and he just flips out and starts ranting about it.

"Nice? You think he's being nice. Here's a hint, Ziva, this is what he's actually saying to you: Look at how young and hot and dangerous I am. Look at my tattoo, Ziva! It's huge and blue and commemorates how I used to fly experimental planes for the Navy and kill people in interesting ways, just like you did. Oh, you like motorcycles, I like motorcycles. Fast cars, I love fast cars, did you know I used to drag race? What, you don't know what drag racing is? Oh honey, let me tell you this complicated story about me driving in the streets at 150 miles an hour with nitrous oxide boosted car I built myself. You love driving fast? One day I'll have to show you my really fast car. You can drive it, too! Then we'll have sex, maybe while driving it! Check out my muscles, and the muscles on top of those muscles, and here, let's talk some more about how I've got the biggest dick you've ever imagined seeing, and I can't wait to show it to you. Bet your hubby's looking awfully limp and soft and boring and old compared to me, right? God, he's so dumb, he's just letting me do this. I don't think he's even noticed. So, wanna hear more about how awesome I am? My shirt's already off, let me get my pants too, look at how cut I am! And maybe after that, you'll suck me."

"Are you done?" she asks, eyebrow high.

"Not really."

Ziva just looks at him, shakes her head, and then shuts the door to their bedroom behind her, very clearly signaling that whatever the hell game he's playing, she isn't interested.

So, he gets back in the car and drives around, eventually finding himself at Gibbs' place, and sure, Gibbs isn't exactly his favorite person right this second, but he'll be awake and he won't ask questions, so, he parks and in he goes.

He'd actually gotten two steps down into the basement before it hit him the lights are off, which means, for the first time ever, he'd managed to show up when Gibbs is actually sleeping.

Since when does Gibbs sleep? Gibbs doesn't sleep. Gibbs lives on coffee, bourbon, and cases.

Except he doesn't now, because he's changed.

Because everything is changing.

And really, when it comes down to it, that's the problem.

Tony doesn't like change. Granted that can be pretty hard to tell since most of the time he's standing next to McSameThingHappensEveryDay and Leroy Jethro Wouldn't-Know-A-Change-If-It-Walked-Up-And-Bit-Him-In-The-Ass-And-Took-His-Leg-Clean-Off Gibbs. Compared to them he's an exciting cauldron of happily bubbling opportunities and change.

You know, in that he hasn't had the same breakfast order for the last ten years. (Okay, two, technically, for McDiet. He's switched twice and is back on his skinny breakfast.) But still, not like he's been getting the same meal at the same diner at the same time on the same day every day since God spoke and diners were invented.

He wanders over to Gibbs' sofa and lies down.

Nine years, ten in September, since he turned down Rota, hoping for his own team, but it had to be HIS team. Not some random collection of strangers.

And he's here again, but it's not HIS team.

He knows Gibbs will have to go for him to move up. That's just the way it works. Can't be the leader if the old leader's still there.

But Tim isn't supposed to go. And Abby isn't supposed to just vanish. And sure, there would have to be a new guy, but the new guy wasn't supposed to give him any crap. The new guy was supposed to do his job and realize that he was the Boss, damn it!

"Can't give me better people." He'd said that to Borin, and he meant it. But his people are leaving.

Because everything changes.
Okay, it's stupid to expect Tim to be his right hand man forever. He got eleven years. That's a hell of a lot longer than most partners last.

But it's not stupid to expect some sympathy about this. It's not stupid to be annoyed at him and Jimmy cackling away, completely missing what's going on, because neither of them are part of the day in day out of this right now.

Sure, they're going to be doing something like this, sooner or later. Tim's already moving in, silently killing Jenner without Jenner having a clue. (It never occurred to Tony that Tim might actually have political instincts. Their team, because Gibbs is in charge, has always tried to avoid the politics. Can't avoid it entirely, but they try to stay out of it. But in one move he watched McGee cut Jenner off at the knees, and Jenner still doesn't know his feet are no longer attached.)

Ducky and Penny sound like they're making the kinds of plans that require more off time than you get at NCIS or American, so, yeah, Palmer'll be stepping up soon, too. So, sure, they're going to be doing this, too, developing their own teams.

But they're not doing this. They aren't balancing their wife with their underlings and dealing with some kid who thinks he knows everything there is to know.

No, they aren't going to get cocky little bastards who used to fly experimental planes and manage to work in how dangerous their last job was into at least one conversation a day, with their wives. McGeek's gonna get twelve little McGeeklets, who may, if they get really frisky, flash him a snide smile while defraging his computer. And Jimmy'll have one guy, who he'll hand pick for this. And knowing Jimmy, it'll be another Ducky wannabe, some quiet, timid guy who'll stay down there listening to the blather while making sure the pipettes are sterilized.

They're not going to deal with asshole adrenaline junkies who couldn't define the word fear if held at gunpoint.

They're not going to have to manage guys who look at them like they're bleeding twerps who don't have enough brains to do a crossword, let alone solve a crime or handle anything particularly difficult. (And worse, they aren't going to deal with guys who see every fucking detail and make them feel like ancient idiots because they can't memorize the entire layout of a crime scene with all the details in one glance. Who the fuck is this guy, Sherlock Holmes?)

They're not going to be sandwiched between a Boss and an underling, with no real place in the team because the slot up hasn't opened yet, and the slot down doesn't know it's down and just

FUCK!

Part of the problem is, he knows he fucked it up the first time.

Part of the reason he didn't take Rota, beyond wanting HIS team.

Handling McGee was easy. He was so thrilled to finally be a Senior Agent that he gave Tony no trouble, and Hell Lee couldn't have picked trouble out of a line up. (Well, okay, she could, but they didn't know that then, and she was awfully meek sitting in McGee's desk, carefully nibbling carrot sticks and making sure every scrap of paperwork was perfect.)

Managing Ziva… Because like Draga, Ziva didn't just roll over and take his orders. She always had to challenge him. Had to make sure that he knew she was better, stronger than he was.

So he found a way to cope. To even the playing field. A technique that played to his strengths.

It was stupid. It was massively stupid. And he's not sure if she was using him or if he was using her, or if they both used each other, but a campfire turned into movie night. (Because none of the three of them had seen the movie he was using as a reference to help make the case make sense. So he got McGee to put it up on MTAC that night. McGee and Lee watched and went home. Ziva spent an hour talking to him about it, and by the end of that they had a date for another movie.) Movie night turned into movies and beer night, and movies and beer night turned into drunk kissing night, and drunk kissing night turned into 'This isn't a big deal, happens all the time in Israel, helps build trust and teamwork,' night, and he'd almost backed out but she said, "Your team, Tony, your rules."

And it was his team, and Gibbs wasn't there, and…

And his team, his Ziva, was in trouble, and it was his job as the leader to save it, and instead of turning to him, instead of knowing that the team came first, she went to Gibbs.

And Gibbs looked at him, and basically told him to his face that not only had he fucked up, but that he knew how he'd fucked up. Called him McGee, and said that he wouldn't have messed it up, like that. On the fucking case for two damn seconds and he knew.

And then Gibbs was back. And the last thing she said to him about it was, "His team, Tony, his rules."

So, he took the assignment with Jeanne, and purposely let Ziva wonder and worry. Let them all wonder. And God that was a clusterfuck.

And they never talked about it, or Jeanne, or Somalia, or Paris. Not until the night after they killed Bodnar, and he was aimlessly wandering DC, looking for something, and something was her place, and they sat on her floor and just talked. No walls, no bullshit, no… them… covered in head to toe emotional armor. They let it go and just talked.

And things changed, for the better that time.

And they're changing again.

There are things about himself that Tony hates to admit, though he knows they're true.

He's deeply insecure.

He'd rather follow than lead.

He hates change.

He's terrified of failing.

And it's easier to be angry and lash out than to deal with any of the above four.

And Draga's really not a bad guy, and he's not doing anything over the line, and neither is Ziva, but he can be pissed about it, or he can try to deal with the fact that isn't easy, and on top of difficult, it's terrifying.

So he'll be angry and try to keep his head above water, and hopefully figure out how to run Draga before the whole thing falls apart.

Gibbs is halfway down his steps when he hears snoring. He rubs his eyes and shakes his head a little. Someone got into his house, onto his sofa, and is sleeping on it, and managed to do that without waking him up. Time to get his hearing checked.

He waits for a few seconds, listening, and decides he knows that snore.

Tony.

He turns around and heads back up to his room to get his phone. It's a bit after nine, which is a very late morning for him, but he's sure Ziva's up by now. So he flashes her a text.

_Got your man on my sofa. Everything okay?

Two minutes later, and he thinks it is that late because she's deciding how to respond, not that she didn't get the text, he gets back, _Well enough. Sleeping?

_Yep.

_He can come home when he's done sulking.

_What's going on?

_I don't really know.

This is not, by a long stretch, the first time Gibbs has found a sleeping Tony on his sofa.

It is the first time it's happened since he started dating Ziva.

But they've got a routine for this. And Gibbs knows his role.

So, down to the kitchen. He's not being especially quiet, but he not going out of his way to wake up Tony, either. He gets the coffee going and knows Tony'll be up by the time it's ready.

Back to the front porch, grab his newspaper (he's noticed he's the only guy on the street that still gets one) and back to the kitchen to see what's going on in the world. (Not all that much.)

Tony stirs, seems to notice Gibbs, and turns to face the back of the sofa, settling in for a few more minutes.

The coffee starts to perk, and the scent of it begins to wander through the house. Gibbs has his first cup, and begins putting together breakfast. Nothing fancy, just eggs, but as the sound of them hitting the hot skillet fills his kitchen, he also hears the sound of Tony getting up, and then pouring himself a cup.

Gibbs stirs the eggs in the pan. He's feeding Tony, so he's scrambling them.

"One to ten. How stupid was the fight?"

"Am I judging based on fights with Ziva, or my own personal history of stupid?"
"Doesn't matter."

"Seven?"

Gibbs turns from the pan and stares at Tony. "They're partners. They have to have this. They need to get along. They have to trust and respect each other. They need the in jokes. They need that space between them that you can't be part of. You're the Boss, not the buddy, so you can't be part of it."

"I know. But…"

"But?"

But I'm better at being the buddy. I know how to be the buddy. "It was supposed to be Tim."

Gibbs shrugs.

"It was supposed to be a guy I trusted. It was supposed to be someone safe. And it was supposed to be someone Ziva didn't look at…"

"Supposed to be someone she wasn't attracted to."

"Yeah. Tim, Ziva, one other, hopefully a woman. Or a newbie for Tim to latch onto. Let him have the Probie."

"And the Probie was supposed to be a geek, quiet, easily intimidated..."

"At least right now."

Gibbs shakes his head, and dumps some eggs onto Tony's plate. "Like I said, sucks when some new, young guy shows up, thinks he's hot shit, knows everything there is to know, and hits on your wife."

He's flashing Gibbs the you're pissing me the hell off look. "I did not know she was your wife."

"And you didn't have to work with her, either. I get it. But you were the young, hot shit punk who thought you knew everything there was to know and that I was a dinosaur you were going to show some tricks to."

"I did not."

"Please. At least Draga knows he's not God's gift to investigating. I had to break twelve years of bad habits from you."

"I was a good cop."

"No, you had the makings of a good cop. Wouldn't have hired you if you didn't. But you weren't when you started with me. You'd been coasting in a sewer of lousy to okay cops and had never actually seen what a really good one looked like until you signed on with NCIS. Now, you're a good cop. You're a great cop. You are going to be a good leader, too. You picked a challenge to start with. And any guy with any spine is going to fight the guy on top."

"He's not fighting you."

"He's not stupid. He knows I'm on my way out."

"McGee never fought."
"He did. Took me four years to figure out he was doing it."

"Jethro?"

"I barely know how to turn the damn computer on. You can send email, and that's it. You think he's spending five minutes explaining what's going on, in front of other people, like Abby or Vance or Borin, because we needed to know? No. He's making us shut him down and admit he's the brains."

"Oh."

"They all do it. Even Jimmy's playing off Ducky now."

"Great."

"Draga's going to be the better cop. Aubrey was going to be the easier teammate. We're the best team. You picked the better man. It was the right decision. Managing him's the new challenge. But eventually, we will hit a case where you will pull out the stops and save his ass, and he will see you. Just like you finally really saw Tim after we got Ziva back. Just like Kelso case."

"Long time ago." That was the first case where he got to see that Jethro wasn't just phoning it in, killing time between bottles of bourbon by showing up at work.

"Yep."

"I didn't think you were a dinosaur."

Gibbs smirks at that. "You thought I had to be some sort of massive burnout to be my age and working as a Navy Cop."

"Jethro, you were."

That got a head tilt, acknowledging that. "Might have been. Still a good cop."

"Yeah." Tony took a bite of his eggs. "What the hell am I going to do with him? Yeah, he's getting along with Ziva great, but he still thinks I'm a fool."

"Don't be the fool. Class clown only works when there's a teacher to play off of. The buddy only works when there's a Boss breathing down your neck."

"I don't want to be you."

"You don't have to be, and it wouldn't work if you tried."

They both eat quietly. Gibbs knows where this needs to go, but he also knows he can't make the suggestion, Tony's got to get here on his own.

He'd finished his eggs, still not saying anything, and is standing up to get another refill on the coffee.

"Jethro?"

The tilt of his head tells Tony to keep talking.

"I can't be the Boss if you're still the Boss."

Jethro nods at that.
"I'm not the Leader if every big decision has to go through you."

He nods at that, too, leaning against the counter in his kitchen, sipping his coffee.

A very long minute passes and he can see Tony thinking about it, getting ready to commit to what has to logically come after that.

"Jethro, I want you to step down as Team Leader."

Gibbs nods, and smiles a little. "Not calling you Boss."

"You don't have to. That's going out with you. Ziva'll break me if I even suggest it, and McGee won't do it, at least, not without a ton of sarcasm."

Gibbs nods at that. "Until Tim gets back, I'll work more on breaking in Draga. Can't and shouldn't keep him away from Ziva, but if half of the time I'm with him, that'll be fine. Tim'll be back week after next, get him into the mix. Draga's doin' okay on the computers but he's not smooth, yet."

"Okay."

And there's the biggest change of all. Leroy Jethro Gibbs has given his last order as the Boss of Team Gibbs.

Tony exhales low and slow, simultaneously terrified and excited at the prospect of Team DiNozzo.
They were getting ready for church for the first time since Kelly was born. Honestly, Tim would much rather skip it and sleep, but Abby wants to go, and he can sort of zone out there, so they’re going.

And zone out he did.

There is literally not one single idea in his head as to what the service might have been about.

But he did notice when Father John came over to pet Kelly, coo over her, and ask when they wanted to do the baptism.

And thus, August 2nd 2015 became the day that Kelly was going to get baptized. They made an appointment to bring in the potential godparents to meet Father John before and get everything set up, and went home.

It wasn’t until driving home that something hit him.

“Abby…”

“Yeah.”

“Breena and Jimmy aren’t Catholic.”

“Yeah, I know.”

“Father John’s not going to like it. Godparents are supposed to be Catholic, good Catholics, right?”

She thinks about that for a moment and comes to the conclusion that since the whole point of Godparents is to promise to renounce Satan and sin in the place of the kid and then promise to help raise them Catholic that yes, being Catholic is usually a pre-req for being a Godparent.

He sees her understand that.

“How important is getting her baptized to you?” Because it’s something he could very easily just take or leave.

“Important.”

“Okay. Will you let me try to bluff him? You can get dispensations or something, right?”

“Maybe. What’s the bluff?”

“That if he won’t go for Jimmy and Breena we’ll walk away and not get her baptized. If it doesn’t work, we can… Get Luca and Melody up? Hell, who else do we know? Sister Rosita?”

“Kyle’s Catholic.”

“You both got adopted by Catholic families?”

“We both got placed with Catholic Charities, so, yeah.”

That made sense. “Okay, but he’s not going to work for the same reason my sister and Penny won’t, he’s living with someone he’s not married to. So, will you let me try the bluff?”

“Sure.” She knows the symbolism of family is more important to him than any of the rest of this. “I’ll back you on it. Maybe, if we’re lucky it won’t be a big deal at all and you won’t need to bluff.”

“We can hope.”

“Abby!”

A second later she’d gotten up and grabbed their daughter from him, holding her at arm length.

It’s possible he could have been more covered in baby pee, but it would have required a concerted effort and likely more than one baby.

“What happened to you?” she asked, trying not to laugh at the look on his face.

“I don’t know. I was putting her down, singing the lullaby, and then we were both soaked.”

Abby broke and started laughing. “How about I finish up with her, and you get a shower?”

“Thank you.”

A few minutes later, she slipped into the shower behind him.

“She’s down?”

“Yeah. Diaper was on backwards.”

He sighed, feeling world-class stupid. “Maybe I am too tired for Bootcamp.”

“Go and hang out. You don’t have to fight. I was just going to get a nap. Bring us home some Thai.”

He nods, rinsing the conditioner out of his hair. “Feels weird to get a shower before Bootcamp.”

“Yeah, guess that’s not how it usually works. Still, don’t want to go covered in pee.”

“Nope. Get smelly enough working full out, don’t need to add baby pee on top of that.” He rested his hands on her hips, and switched them around so she was in the full stream of the shower, and began to soap up.

She’s watching him soap up, rubbing foamy bubbles all over his skin, and he’s not playing with it, not showing off or anything (because Abby knows what getting the job done looks like, and what showing off looks like, and right now, he’s just getting the job done) but it’s occurring to her, in a way it hasn’t since before Kelly was born, that Tim’s an attractive guy, and wet, naked, soapy Tim, hands rubbing all over his own skin, is certainly reminding her that once upon a time, there was this thing they used to do on a very regular basis, and she really liked it, and it might be nice to do that again, and soon.
Though, she’s still bleeding, so, probably wait a bit longer before getting fully back to it, but still, some messing around would be good. They’ve been doing good on making sure to get at least some cuddle time in every day, but it’s been a week since there’s been anything that produces orgasms, and right now, she could certainly go for one.

So, she steps a little closer to him, nipples rubbing lightly against his chest, hands on his hips. “I like how you smell when you work out.”

That got an amused smile out of Tim. He put the soap down and wrapped his hands around the small of her back. “Really?”

“I like how you smell all the time, but hot and sweaty, flushed, working out hard, yeah, I like that. Like all of it.” Her hands trailed up his arms, and over his back, mapping his muscles.

“Huh.” He’s grinning.

“Huh?”

“Maybe I won’t race to the showers after next Bootcamp.”

She smiles and kisses his bottom lip, gently. “Won’t Jimmy and Gibbs wonder what’s up?”

“They might.” He licked his lips. “Of course, if you were to call and ask me to get home sooner rather than later…”

That got a grin out of her. “Some sort of unspecified ‘family emergency.’”

“Some sort of itch that only I can scratch.” His hands, which had been on her hips slipped down to stroke over her bottom.

“I imagine I could think of some need that only you could fulfill. Something that had to happen right that second.”

“You could call with a very specific request.” He kissed her throat, licking her earlobe, and said quietly, “The sort of thing that I’d be willing to drop anything to attend to.”

She looked into his eyes, enjoying the heat and wicked joy lighting them. “Yeah, I think I could do that.”

“Uh huh.” He kissed her lips, soft and wet, and she kissed back, tongue slipping against his, encouraging more depth and pressure.

“Mmmm…”

He wriggled against her, rubbing his whole body along hers. “Good?”

“Oh yeah.”

He traced his hand up from her thighs to her shoulder, and stroked along her chest. “Can I?”

She got what he was asking, and it has been less than half an hour since she finished nursing, so probably okay. “Sure, just, might squirt you.”

He grinned. “Not a problem. Not like I’ve never done it to you.”

She laughed a little at that. “Never from having your nipples played with.” Then his fingers slipped down, gently mapping out the curves of her breasts, and she sighed, head resting against his shoulder, purring softly. She’d forgotten how good that felt.

“Missed that?”

“Oh yeah.” She met his lips with hers, enjoying his skin on hers, and the delicious things his fingers were doing. Then the familiar, foot fallings asleep tingle that meant her milk was letting down hit, so she took his hands in hers, resettling them on her hips.

“Abby?” He looked concerned, eyes searching hers, afraid he’d done something that hurt.

She pointed down. After all, they’re in the shower, he can’t feel the difference between the spray of the water or a spray of milk.

“Oh.” But he can certainly see it. “You want to stop?”

She kissed him long and hard, rubbing against him, holding his hands. Then broke the kiss to say, “Does that feel like stop?”

“Nope!”

“Exactly.” She took him in hand, stroking slow and firm. He groaned at it, hips moving along with her hand.

“You’re not going to tell me to go get a condom, right?” he asked between kisses.

“Wasn’t planning on it.”

“Okay, I’ve got an idea. Turn around.”

She did, her back to his chest, and he pulled her close to him, his dick between her legs. He started with long, gentle thrusts, rubbing his dick against her, and she sighed at that, rubbing in counter point, keeping everything slow and steady.

It’s not exactly their usual play, but it’s close enough, he can read her body more than well enough to know when just gentle brushing isn’t enough, so his fingers slip between her legs, adding more pressure, more directly applied. And she knows the way he’s moving, feeling the tension in his legs and arms, and thrusts back harder, squeezing her legs a bit tighter together.

She feels the build, his fingers slipping over and over, cock rubbing just right below them, his mouth biting gently on her shoulder as her body goes tighter and tighter, drawing in, focus clamping down to his fingers on her clit and the aching pleasure of being on the edge of spilling over.

God, so close, just a little more, little faster, and it’s hard to move because she doesn’t want to risk losing that delicious slide of his fingers, but it’s not quite fast enough. She can feel him jerking against her, knows he’s on the line or falling over it, and a hot, wet rush hits her clit, separate, different from the spray of the shower, and that was enough, that wet pulse in addition to the slide of his fingers sent her over, tingling and purring.

A minute later, she’s feeling very calm, very happy, and he’s flush against her back, making that soft, almost purr sound which always means she’s got a very happy Tim on her hands.

He gently kissed the nape of her neck. She squeezed his left hand and said, “Yep. Naptime sounds awfully good right about now.”
She could feel him smile at that.

“I’ll admit, I’m not feeling particularly motivated to go anywhere right this second.”

She stepped back, turned, and kissed him.

“Bootcamp not sounding so hot right now?”

“Get pounded on by Jimmy and Gibbs. Snuggle with you in bed…” He smiled at her while snagging the soap again. “For some reason, Jimmy and Gibbs just aren’t winning that one.”

She giggled, and he began to soap up her back.

“Well, it wouldn’t break my heart if you decided to stay here.”

“Good.”
Monday morning. Abby's napping. Kelly's almost checked out. (She's hanging out on his chest for the time being, but he'll be taking her upstairs soon.) So, theoretically he's got time to do some stuff.

Like, maybe take a glance at his computer.

Maybe wade through the mess of emails and data that's been accumulating.

Sounded like a plan.

He has to admit, he thought the baby sling was kind of dumb at first, and was absolutely certain he wasn't going anywhere near it, because wearing something that looked like a baby hammock across his chest and shoulder just seemed silly, but having two free hands to work with while Kelly settled down was awfully nice.

Computer on, booted up, gmail up and… Wow, ton of emails. He runs two fast searches through them. Okay, three of them are interesting. Two from Vance, and one from his editor looking for a clue as to when the next book will be done. He's about to fire off the response to that when he noticed Kelly's awfully still. He looked down. Her eyes were droopy and she's barely sucking the pacifier.

So, taking Kelly to her crib put a pause to handling his email. But getting her down only took a few minutes. While he wouldn't have believed it when she was brand new, he's now starting to agree with Breena that Kelly's a good sleeper.

Kelly down meant he had probably a good two, maybe two and a half hours of free time.

So he got to work. First things first, he sent that response to his editor. He had about twenty-thousand words to go on the next Deep Six, and he's got no idea when he'll get it done. Before October 1st, which is his deadline for the rough draft, but beyond that, no clue.

Next up, emails from Leon. The first one wasn't terribly interesting, just housekeeping stuff, likely written by his secretary, a reminder that they were switching to a new system for handling their paperwork, and that once again NCIS would be hosting Virginia Blood Services and that last year 82% of NCIS had donated and this year, they'd really like to see that number get up to 87%.

Tim made a note of that, if everything was going well, he'd stop in and give blood. So far he's given every year.

The next email was much more interesting.

This one was a personal letter from Vance concerning the information he'd been getting about Tim's test.

At the end of each month each Department Head sends a report to Vance listing what's happened, what needs to happen, how things are going with their departments. As June faded into July he'd been especially interested in the report from Cybercrime. It was, as Vance put it "disappointing." No mention of the test. No mention of all the computers going bonkers all at once. Nothing.

The other interesting bit was that Stephen Manner had asked for an appointment to see the Director, and had asked him why he'd been hacked by "Kevin Hussein." Vance had told him it was a security test, and that between the Port to Port killer getting access to their building, and Dearing's attacks on Navy weaknesses, he periodically has different branches of NCIS check up on each other. As a former NCIS employee who left in good graces and had a great security clearance, he had "asked Kevin" to run periodic checks on Cybercrime.

Tim tried to remember which one Manner was… Then it clicked. He was the one who programmed straight through the attack. Good. Someone noticed, checked up, and actually found the trail of bread crumbs he'd left.

He kept reading: The thing I found most fascinating about my conversation with Manner was that, from everything I could see, he had no idea that anyone else in Cybercrime had been targeted. Likewise, he appeared to have never thought this was something worth mentioning to Jenner. He took this straight to me.

He left my office under the impression that "Kevin" had chosen him at random.

Hmmm… Okay. No communication at all in that department. He made a note to pay especially close attention to Manner's logs so he could see how Manner tracked his attack, and wondered if he'd noticed he was still being monitored.

He sent that as a follow up question to Leon, along with a few lines about how he was getting ready to wade into the data to see what exactly they'd all done in response to the attack.

Then came all the rest of his email. Tons of it.

He was cruising through it, deleting most of it as stuff that didn't matter, redirecting a few to Tony or Ziva with a quick note about how he'd be back in the office on the 20th.

The two from his mom he hovered over with his mouse and decided not to open.

Not today. He's in a good mood, he's getting useful stuff done, he doesn't need to know what's in those emails. If it was really important, Penny or Sarah would have told him about it.

He was in the process of forwarding another one to Ziva when he took the time to really read it. And really reading it, he smiled.

Ngyn, Cybercrime tech who noticed the attack while it was happening, had emailed him to find out what was going on.

So, he told her a variation of the same story Leon had spun. Namely, as the best guy with a computer outside of Cybercrime, he'd been picked to run the occasional check on them. He didn't elaborate on who'd been checked, but did let her know he was pleased she had noticed she'd been hacked and found he'd done it.

He blind forwarded Ngyn's letter and his response to Leon.

He added her logs to the things he was going to check first, and continued to slog through his emails.

Okay, he's moving a lot more slowly than anticipated, (or maybe there was a hell of a lot more email) or Kelly's not sleeping as long as normal, but the soft cry of a small person looking for her next meal curtailed his progress.

He stood up, got to the doorway of his office, and then heard Abby heading to Kelly's room, so back to his desk.

Data time.
At some later point Abby poked her head in, and he thinks he sort of grunted in her direction. Then coffee materialized next to him, and he was awfully happy to see it. (Decaf or not, the act of drinking coffee is part of the rhythms of how he processes data.) And though he wasn't paying any attention to it, apparently the Magic Coffee Fairy kept providing refills for him because at no point did he reach over and find an empty cup. (Which is usually the trigger that lets him know to get up, walk around, stretch, go to the bathroom, get a snack/meal, do something other than work the data.)

At some much later point he noticed that: A: He was hungry. B: It was dark out. And C: He hadn't gotten any naps and it was his night for the 4:00 feed so he was going to be hurting for sleep.

He wandered out of his office, blinking at the light coming from the living room, and found Abby sitting on the sofa, Kelly in her lap, patting her, must be post nurse burp time, watching some sort of TV show. Abby looked over at him as he flopped onto the sofa and paused the show.

"Haven't seen you that buried in a computer in a while. Good stuff?"

He rubbed his eyes and forehead, and scanned the room for a second, checking the clock. After 10:00, great.

"Yeah. Sort of. Got into the raw data from my test." Kelly decided to punctuate that statement with a burp.

"Here." She handed him Kelly, and he settled her on his chest, in the baby sling. (He was a little surprised to still be wearing it, apparently he didn't take it off after getting her down.) She looked from her mom to him, seeming a little confused at getting shifted all of a sudden. But Abby got up, and gestured for him to follow her. He did, ending up in the kitchen, sitting at their table (where Abby pointed to) and less than a minute later was looking at salad and left over Thai style chicken fried rice from the night before. "Eat, before your blood sugar completely tanks."

He nods, taking a bite. "Thank you."

"I made it up for us, called out to you, you didn't answer, so I headed into the office, said your name twice, you still didn't answer, so I figured I was on my own for dinner."

"Oh, God," he shook his head. "Sorry about that."

"Tonight, it wasn't a problem."

"Maybe not, but don't let me do that. Go in there and poke me. It's not good to be that deep into it."

"House wasn't on fire, you weren't alone, and Kelly wasn't bugging me. We're good."

He exhaled heavily, then ate another bite.

"So, what'd you find."

"Let's put it this way, if there was any little nagging voice in the back of my mind that thought this wasn't fair to Jenner, it died this afternoon."

Abby rose an eyebrow.

"How are you going to track down Cybercrimes and protect people if you can't keep your own department tight?"

"That bad?"
"Worse? I don't know. From what I can tell, Jenner decided the test had to be some sort of prank. Okay, given that everything was saved, and what actually happened, that wasn't an insane take on the subject, but he barely checked anything, just made sure none of their data had gone missing. Two of his guys mentioned that their computers had gone wonky, and he checked them, too.

"No follow up." He grabs another fast bite of the rice, the smell and taste of it reminding him, vividly, that he hasn't eaten since breakfast. "He didn't check in with anyone else. He checked enough to see that the hack had come from NCIS, which was one of the false trails I laid. It didn't actually; I fired it off of my computer here. And then he just let it lie. He didn't even bother to go through and see who'd pulled it. I mean, imagine for a moment that all of a sudden our team had our guns stop working properly. Can you imagine Gibbs looking at them, and then deciding that Tony must have just pulled it as a prank, and then did nothing about it?"

"I can imagine him thinking Tony might have pulled it as a prank, but Tony's head would ring for a week from the force of the headslap."

"Exactly. And you can bet we'd all get slapped for letting him mess with our guns, too."

"Yep. Nothing happened to the techs for letting themselves get hacked?"

"Not that I could see. Now, maybe they do have a prankster down there and things like this have happened before, in which case I picked the wrong damn test case. But… Anyway… No leadership on this. From the looks of it, they aren't talking to each other, either.

"Seven of twelve of them just let it go. Once everything went back to normal on their systems and they realized they hadn't lost anything, they went back to work. Five of them decided to see what was up. All five of them used exactly the same technique for the first three levels. Three of them decided to let it go when they hit enough dead ends. One found "Kevin." He went straight to Vance, and I wonder if he's also got Jenner's job in his crosshairs. The other emailed me directly.

"Ngyn, the one who emailed, also buffed up her internal security. Manner, the one who went to Vance, didn't. Though he might decide to, because Vance told him the test was a sort of internal audit, that he has different branches of NCIS check each other periodically to see how good we are."

"So, you're not taking over the A-Team."

"They may not qualify as the Bad News Bears. I've got to see if I can get into HR and find out how Jenner was hiring."

"Why?"

"Help me figure out if he's just not good at locating talent. Or if it's so bad down there it just sucks the life out of them. Or… I don't know. I just want to know what made him think, hey, you, person who had your entire system go insane for ten minutes and then you did nothing about it, you're the guy I want to put in charge of hunting down criminals."

"I can see that."

He took another minute to just eat and then said, "Next test'll be interesting. Right now Ngyn's the only one in position to even notice it happen."

"Wonderful."

"Oh yeah."
Abby stole one of his cucumber slices. "How good is the security on your work computer?"

"Good, at least, I think it is."

"Might want to buff it up. If you're making them look bad, and any of them figure it out, you might get a nasty surprise."

"Good point. I'll have to add an extra layer of defense or two."

"What's the next test?"

"Once I've finished sorting through the data and what exactly it was each of them did, I'm going to give them enough down time so Manner and Ngyn aren't on edge, maybe a month, and then I'm going in and breaching whichever cases they're working on. Not going to screw anything up, but I am going to snag at least one bit of classified info off of each of their computers."

"After that?"

"After that, I'm going after their personal computers and phones."

Abby squinted at him, thinking for a minute. "That's illegal, right?"

"Probably. Might have to find a way to deal with that."

"Lots of jobs are requiring prospective employees hand over their social media so they can check up. That's considered legal…"

"Good to know. I'll have to send it by Leon. Don't want to end up in jail for testing how good my soon to be employees are."

"Yeah, I'd prefer you didn't end up in jail, either. I mean, I still have the McGee defense fund that I set up back when that guy was sniffing around from you hacking the CIA—"

"Really?" That had to have been close to five years ago now.

"Okay, I've got the bucket I was collecting it in. Remember we went out to dinner after you caught him, I paid—"

He laughed, understanding. "You mean my defense fund paid."

"Yeah."

"Wasn't that take out Chinese?"

"Defense fund had $32.57 in it."

"Great."

"Gibbs put in twenty."

"Even better." He laughed at that. "Good to know that you all were willing to pay the big bucks to keep me out of jail."

"Anything for you, baby." She leaned over and kissed him. "So, what happens now?"

He looked down, checking Kelly, who had been sucking away on her pacifier, adding little burbles and coos to their conversation, but was looking like she might be starting to think sleepy thoughts.

"Were you planning on going to sleep when she went down?"

"That was the idea."

"Okay, I'm still too wired for that. So, I'm enjoying your company, but if you want to go to sleep now, I'll put her down."

"I could use the extra down time." She stood up and kissed him. He wrapped his hand around her neck, and kissed back, soft and gentle, not sexy, just saying I-love-you without voice.

She was heading toward the stairs when he said, "Abby."

"Yeah?"

"Thank you."

"For what?"

He stood up and crossed over to her, resting his hands on her hips, and his forehead against hers. "All of it."

She smiled, pecked his lips, and headed up to get some sleep. He looked down at their daughter and said, "So, feel like hanging out with me while I finish dinner?"

She didn't say anything.

"We keep kind of odd hours here. It'll probably get more regular as you get older, but right now, sometimes I work all night, and sometimes Mom does, too, but we're going to make sure we spend some time with you, when you're awake, every single day."
"So, who are the Godparents?" Father John asked when they met the next Sunday. Once again they were in his office. This time in the daylight. (Tim was right, it did get good light.) He and Abby were on the too hard sofa, Kelly was in her car seat, snoozing.

"Breena and Jimmy Palmer."

"Okay, good. Which church are they with? I'll call their Priest and check up on them."

"St. Mary's Episcopal."

Father John looked up quickly from the piece of paper he was going to write their information on. His expression was disappointed. "That's not a Catholic Church."

"They aren't Catholics," Tim replied.

"Then they can't be the Godparents. One or both of them can be a Christian Sponsor, but you need to have an actual Catholic in good standing for a Godparent."

Tim took a breath; he doesn't like doing this, especially cold, it's a lot easier to do something like this pissed off, but, now or never.

"No. It'll be Jimmy and Breena or it won't happen at all. They are involved in Kelly's everyday life. They are good people. They are her guardians if something happens to us. They're her godparents."

Father John settled back in his seat, smiled gently at them, and said, "I'd like to do it. I met both of them at your wedding. They seem like lovely people. But I can't do it. Cannon law states that Godparents have to be Catholics in good standing. They have to be living role models of what a true Catholic life looks like. To be perfectly frank, if one of my parishioners were to come in and ask if you" he was looking at Tim, "could be godparent, I'd have to turn him down. This needs to be someone who can, by example, show how to live a Catholic life. So, no, it's not enough to be a good person. It's not enough to be a Christian. You have to be Catholic. You have to be dedicated to it. I know some priests don't take this duty seriously, but I do. As you saw, when I get a request for someone I don't know, I call their parish and talk to their priest and make sure they're up for the job. So, I'm sorry, but it can't be Jimmy and Breena. What about your sister? I remember giving her communion at your wedding."

"Anyone else is a moot point. As I said, it'll be Jimmy and Breena or it won't happen at all."

Father John smiled again. "Tim, I understand what you're trying to do here, but it's not going to work. I cannot give you what you want. I wish I could, but I can't. You can find a good Catholic to stand up as a Godparent, and if none of your family will work, I can absolutely guarantee you that Sister Rosita will, and will be happy to take on the job, and Jimmy and Breena can be Christian Sponsors, but that's as far as I can go on this."

Tim shakes his head. "Look, if you can't bend or get a dispensation, that's fine. You'll do what you can do. But there's only so far I can bend on this, too. It's them or it's not at all. Godparents should matter. It shouldn't just be a meaningless title. And if it's anyone other than Jimmy and Breena, it will be a meaningless title."

"You'll put your daughter's soul in mortal danger—" Father John is making that appeal to Abby, but Tim pulls his attention back to him.
"No, you will." Tim stares at Father John, expression cold, but he's feeling pretty jittery on the inside, really he hates doing this when he's not feeling pissed. "I don't believe in souls. That I'm here at all, that I'll go this far, is out of love for Abby." He squeezed her hand, as much to take comfort from her touch as to let her know that he hopes this'll be done soon. "I don't believe in magic water that washes souls clean, and I certainly don't believe in a God that cares about the application of said water, let alone a God who would hold anything I do against Kelly. If all of this is real, I highly doubt he'll blame her for me being an ass, and if He does, He's not worth my faith. But if you believe this, if you want the chance to do your job and save the soul of a helpless infant, you'll find a way to make Jimmy and Breena her Godparents."

John holds his gaze, not looking away, not blinking, and he very calmly says, "Then it won't happen."

Tim can feel there's something… wrong… in the way John says that, but he doesn't know what. He's being played, but he's not sure how. So he says, "Fine."

He looks at Abby, and they got up, and head out of Father John's office, and normally, about now, as they're walking through the church and to the parking lot, is when John should fold but, oh shit, they're getting in the car and pulling away, and yeah, that didn't work at all.

"Shit."

Abby's looking amused. "So, you're officially calling that a failed bluff."

"I'd like to give it a day or two more, but, yeah."

"If it's the rule, and he really can't…"

"I know. There was something hinky in the way he was looking at me, though. Like there's a part of this that I'm not getting."

"There might be."

They drive another mile before Tim says, "Do we have to be Catholic?"

That really surprises Abby. But after a bit, because he does just sit there quietly, letting her think about it, she says, "Is this about not having to fold on that bluff?"

He nods, looking a little embarrassed by that, but he's not going to try and play her. "Honestly, yeah, some. Maybe a lot. No one loves going in and saying, 'I was wrong.' But, it's not entirely about that. Okay, Jimmy and Breena are our first choice. We love them. They're going to be involved in Kelly's life. They're basically her back up parents. Great. But they aren't good enough because they aren't Catholic. Gibbs isn't good enough, because he's not Catholic. My sister and Grandmother who at least live in the area and will be involved in her life, they don't pass muster because they aren't Catholic enough. We've got to pull in your brother-who is a fine man, but will probably spend less than three hours with Kelly in the next five years-before we've got someone who qualifies in our family, because he's a 'Good Catholic.' He won't be there for her. He's not going to be a major part of her life, he won't be an example of anything, because he lives a thousand miles away, but he's okay. And… I just hate this meaningless shit. I hate this it has to look right rather than be right crap.

"And sure, going back and saying, 'I was just kidding, Luca and Melody Sciuto'll do it,' will sting my pride, but when I asked you to back the bluff, I meant that I'd go through with folding if it came to it, and I will, but… Do we have to be Catholic? Maybe we could go somewhere that's more focused on the Christian part of it and less on the doctrine? I mean, Jimmy and Breena's Pastor didn't give us any crap about being Catholic. He knew we'd be there day in and day out, and that's what mattered. That just makes a lot more sense to me."

Abby thought about that, too, and Tim let her. He's not going to rush this. She's been a member at St. Sebastian's for fifteen years and actually Catholic her whole life. He knows this matters to her, but which brand of Christian they are doesn't matter to him. It's like soda. Since he doesn't drink it often, he doesn't care if the stuff in their cupboard is Pepsi or Coke.

Of course, it doesn't matter to him because that's how he sees them, as brands. His identity isn't attached to it in any meaningful way. But hers is… so, if it matters, he'll go back, and Luca will get the job, but… maybe it doesn't matter.

It was a day later, (Father John hadn't called, looks an awful lot like he knows this is a bluff and he's going to let Tim fold on it) when Abby asked him, as they were eating lunch, "If we weren't Catholic, what would we be? I mean, how do you see this working?"

"I don't know. I mean, I know you're Christian, I know you want to be part of a church, and I know that point isn't negotiable."

She nods at him.

"And I know I've promised to do this with you. That because it's important to you, I will do it. So, I'm certainly not thinking about dropping it all together."

"Good."

"And I know there are things we don't like about being Catholic."

"Also true."

"Plenty of rules we just skipped."

She nods.

"And I was in the car, driving home, and it hit me that I don't know what it means to be Catholic to you. I know what it means to be Catholic to me. It means I'm with you, and you're Catholic, but… We're pro-gay marriage. We've got condoms in the dresser. We're not vehemently pro-life. I mean, neither of us would have blinked if Jon's heart had still been beating and Jimmy and Breena had decided to terminate. And, not to put too fine a point on it, but I've killed people, more than ten of them. We started having sex, lived together, and made Kelly all before we got married. Neither of us like the anti-woman stuff. Sister Rosita's got, what, three master's degrees in different religious topics and both of us think it's ridiculous they won't ordain her. And sure, both of us like Francis, but I can't imagine you think he's infallible. So, just… What does it mean to be Catholic, for you?"

Abby didn't answer that, and he can see she's thinking.

"So, if it was just up to me, Jimmy and Breena's church. Our family is there. Some of them at least. If Gibbs had a church, I'd be fine with his church, too. But that's all this is to me, a place where our family gathers. That's why I slipped into Shabbos so easily, if you were going to ask me to design a religious service, that's how I'd do it. At home, with your family—"
"And good food and wine." She smiles at that.

He nods a little, acknowledging that's definitely part of the draw. "That doesn't hurt. You're never going to have a hard time selling me on celebrations centered on good food. But, I know this is more to you than just a place and family, so, what do you need from this?"

She shrugs. "Still thinking about it."

"Okay.

They decided to head in for the Blood Drive on Wednesday, which worked out pretty well on several levels. First of all, it gave him a chance to drop off a thumb drive with his report and all of the data on it for Leon. Secondly, giving blood is always good. Third, dropping in to say 'Hi' to everyone was good. Fourth, Abby wanted to make sure her lab was still in one piece. And, fifth, it let him bounce an idea off of Ducky.

Abby hasn't said anything else about the baptism or being Catholic or anything along those lines. But he still can't shake the feeling that he's being played and as per Rule 36: if you feel like you're being played, you probably are, so he wants to check up on this.

But he can't spot the con. No idea how it'd work. Obviously there's something in there he can't see, but he can't see it. But if anyone could see it, would know how he's getting played on this, it'd be Ducky.

So, while Blood Services got a hold of Abby, he and Kelly headed down to Autopsy.

Quiet day. No murders on tap, so Autopsy isn't up to much. Several years ago Jimmy had asked to get up to speed on the sorts of psychological profiles that Ducky does, so on quiet days like today, when the paperwork is done, and the bodies are settled, he snags a textbook or two and starts reading.

But an excuse to quit the books and snuggle a baby girl are certainly something he doesn't mind.

And Ducky, who had been drinking his tea, listening to a symphony, and working on a report of his own, certainly didn't mind a diversion.

"Not that we aren't thrilled to see you, Timothy, but what brings you down?" he asked while setting his cup of tea on his desk.

"Thought Kelly needed to see her Uncles." Tim smiled, handing Kelly off to Jimmy. "Well, that's part of it. There's another part as well..." He explained the situation to Ducky and wrapped up with. "I felt like he was playing me, but I don't know how. I figured that since you know everything about everything, that if anyone could spot the con, it'd be you."

Ducky smiled at that. "I appreciate your confidence in me, Timothy, and while it's true that I can 'spot the con' as you put it, I do not actually know everything about everything."

"Well, I suppose it doesn't matter if you can tell me the secrets of the universe, but I would like to know what he's got going on."

Ducky smiled in a manner that seemed to indicate he had more than a few of them on tap, as well. "A formal baptism is not, in fact, required. Catholics, and for that matter, most Christians, believe that any follower of Christ can baptize if necessary. Back in the pre-scientific age, holy water and oil was part of any midwife's kit. If it looked like the baby wasn't going to survive until the Priest got there, she was empowered to take care of it.

"My guess is that he's planning on taking care of the matter behind your back, because from everything I've seen, he is a good man, so he is not going to leave your daughter in mortal peril because you are being a stubborn fool."

Jimmy shook his head. "How crazy has the world gotten when your priest is planning on conning you?"

Tim nodded absently at that. Good point, but not what he's focused on. "You think I'm being a fool?"

"I think that's how he would understand it."

"Ah." Tim waited a few beats, looking at Ducky, silently suggesting that he's still waiting for the answer to his question.

Ducky smiles gently at him. "I do not think standing up for the things that matter to you is foolish. I do think placing this much weight on something that, in the long run, likely does not matter, might be. And I do think that if this is causing any friction between you and Abby, then it is definitely foolish."

"No friction. We're fine. Just… figuring some things out. Mostly about symbols and how much they matter and… Do you believe in God? I know you and Penny go to church every now and again, but I don't know if you did before."

Jimmy's watching this, interested, somehow in all the hours, all the stories, all the conversations, that's one they hadn't gotten to.

"I believe in God. I do not believe in dogma. I believe that for most of humankind religion is a tribal marker. It's a way we sort ourselves into in groups and out groups. I believe that for much of human existence religion has made a place for itself by providing a useful order to the universe and a system of laws to produce some level of functional society. And I believe that those laws are, for the most part, and with many exceptions, a positive good. The basics of almost all systems of morality come from religious grounds. And I believe that the idea of sacred is important, vital, to a properly functional life. Is that helpful?"

"Yeah. Thanks, Ducky."

Gibbs took that moment to head into autopsy. He didn't even have to say anything. Jimmy just handed Kelly over straight away.

Gibbs smiled, kissed the top of her head, and gave her back to Tim. "Not why I'm down here."

"Jethro?"

"You haven't released Bufford's body, yet?"

"No, he's still enjoying our hospitality."

"Good. Need to double check something…"

Tim waved goodbye to them and headed up to find Abby.
Nannies

Back in grad school, Tim's girlfriend was a sociology major, specializing in feminine gender roles among pre-industrial societies.

Between Helen (said girlfriend) and growing up with a hard core, sex positive, second-wave-feminist, pacifist grandmother, he's still got something of a specialized vocabulary bouncing around his head that he very rarely uses.

One word that springs to mind is 'liminal.' The spaces on the edge or inbetween.

Politically he inhabits a liminal space of being simultaneously vastly more conservative than his grandmother/sister (and a few degrees to the right of Abby and Breena) and being wildly more liberal than Gibbs, Tony, or Ducky (and a few degrees to the left of Jimmy).

Mostly it's not the sort of thing that he really thinks much about. It's just something he's aware of, and occasionally takes some gentle ribbing about when election time rolls around. (From both sides, on one day in November of '12 he managed to get called a McBleeding-Heart by Tony and The Tin Man (no heart) by Sarah. They didn't much mean anything by it, beyond the fact that he wasn't voting for the same guy they were, but still…)

But right now he can feel years of liberal race/class/gender consciousness training creeping up and demanding he pay attention to it.

And the reason he can feel it, sitting there in the back of his mind, is that he and Abby are looking at the list of resumes that Anderson's Child Care Services sent over. It's the same agency that Vance used to find his nanny, and all of the women… people… one of them is a guy… appear to be highly trained, very competent, well-educated professionals determined to provide exceptionally good child care.

Great.

But he can't shake the idea of wealthy, career-oriented, white family hires brown woman from a less well-educated, less-affluent background to take care of the babies.

And it feels weird to even mention the fact that he's aware of it. That as he's looking through the resumes he can feel himself checking names, wondering about racial background and thinking about how the woman on the resume in front of him has a Latina name, but a master's degree in early child development, so hiring her isn't really a paradigm of privilege, right?

And it's not like they're planning on paying a sub-minimum wage to a woman who's here illegally and barely speaks English. These are hard-core professional women… people who have devoted their lives to providing top flight child care.

If this was a stack of resumes for the next member of his team, it wouldn't be an issue. If these were new hires for Cybercrime, he'd barely be aware of anything about them beyond the facts of the CV. But it's not.

They're nannies. The pinkest of the pink collar jobs, and he and Abby are so damn white they're practically translucent, and…

"Who do you like?" he asks Abby, figuring the easiest way to deal with this is to just let her pick.
She looks up from her computer. "So many good choices. But, it'd take forever to interview them all."

"We've got nine weeks. That's time to see twenty applicants. Compared to Vance, as long as we don't interview the entire agency, we're doing well."

Abby smiles at that. "There is that." He sees her flipping through the documents. "Marissa Allen, she stood out."

Tim flips through his own to find her, and scans her CV. "What…" Then he sees it. "Drummer for Twisted Puppies from '08-'11."

"Saw them live a few times." She grinned at him. "Besides, we want Kelly to have a sense of rhythm."

He chuckles at that, and adds her name to the call back list. "Okay, that's one."

"You know, this might be easier to just weed out the ones we don't want to see."

He nods. That's sensible. But… "None of the resumes we got said, 'Nope, Not Me!' to me."

"Me, either." Abby starts to type rapidly.

"Abby?"

"Sending Lara a note."

"Makes sense." Lara came from the same agency. And while it's true that she's been with Vance's family for more than three years now, she might have more of a sense of who the people they're looking at are than they can get from their resumes.

Tim kept reading through his stack, while Abby scanned hers. After a few minutes he said, "Okay, found one we can discard."

"What?"

"Looking for a live in position."

"Hold up on tossing that one." He's giving her the tell me what you're thinking look. "We both work insane hours. You aren't settled in Cybercrime, yet. We don't actually know how much having the other techs in the lab will change my schedule. We've got two bedrooms we aren't using, and a bathroom we almost never use. So, someone here all the time might be a good thing."

And, sure, that's logical but… It's a stranger, in his home, all the time.

His discomfort with that must show on his face because she nods and says, "Okay, no live in help."

"Thanks."

Kelly started to cry, letting them know she was awake and would appreciate some tending, so he went up to grab her.

"Good nap?"

She stopped crying when he came in, but didn't look pleased.
"Yeah, I'm usually not in a great mood right after I wake up, too." He picks her up, snuggling her close as he takes her over to the changing table, and gets started on changing her diaper. "Well, at least that was true until I started sleeping next to your mama all time. Tend to be in a pretty good mood when I wake up next to her."

The look Kelly's giving him is best described as, Dad, I'm sure you find this amusing, but I'm hungry, so speed up on the diaper change and get me to Mom.

He kissed her tummy and said, "Yes, love."

A minute later, he's downstairs, handing Kelly to Abby. "I think we've really got to see them. See who jells best with us, and with her. It's not about who's got the masters from the spiffiest university; it's who gets Kelly, and to a lesser degree, us, best."

"Yeah," she says as she gets Kelly settled on her breast. Kelly makes a pleased little sigh of a sound as she starts to nurse. "So, I guess I know what we're doing from now until you go back to work?"

"Guess so. I'm back on the twentieth, so that's ten days of interview time."

Abby thinks about that. "Five really. Doubt they want to do weekends, and I doubt we'll be able to get anyone in tomorrow."

"Good points. I'll go give them a call. See how many we can do."
On Saturday night, as they were getting ready for bed, Abby asked Tim, "How serious are you about Jimmy and Breena's church?"

It'd been almost a week since they saw Father John last, and Tim had informed Abby of Ducky's idea of what was going on, so they'd settled on skipping church for the next few weeks, see if that'd up the pressure and make John fold on the Godparents issue.

"Making sure that wasn't just 'I don't want to fold' talking?" he asks, putting toothpaste on his brush.

"Yeah." She reaches for her toothbrush.

"I'm serious." He hands her her toothpaste.

"I talked to Breena today. Service is at eleven tomorrow."

"Okay."

"Sunday dinner is at Ed and Jeannie's after."

That got a startled look out of Tim, he put his own toothbrush down. They've had hundreds of half-garbled conversations that come from talking while brushing their teeth, but he wants this to be clear. "So… we go to church, and we're… joining the extended family?"

She smiles at him. "That's what you said, right? A place where our family gathers? We're already part of the extended Slater family. But yeah, that's the tradition. Church, then supper at the Slaters', according to Breena there's football or baseball on the television after, they're Redskins and Nationals fans, but Jimmy usually runs to Bootcamp before that. Breena and both of her sisters, and their guys, and Ed's brother Tom, and his family, and Jeannie's brother and sister, and, yeah, the whole clan'll be there."

"How many Slaters attend that church?" Tim asked after picking his toothbrush back up.

"I don't know. A whole lot of them." Spit, rinse, brush some more. "Breena says they've been part of that congregation for a very long time, like since her great-grandparents got married, and it's also part of their business model."

"Guess that makes sense," he says, and grabs the mouthwash. After all, if you run a funeral home, it's probably a good idea to have deep ties to the local community. And it probably doesn't hurt if you're close to a Pastor or two, who may, should the need arise, suggest someone to take care of the dearly departed to the grieving family.

It occurs to Tim as he heads in, that with the exception of a few weddings, funerals, and Molly's christening, he's never actually been to a Protestant church service.

Sure, he's heard people call Episcopalians Catholic-lites but, at least at this church, it looks a lot different.

First and foremost, the Pastor is a woman. That's an awfully unsubtle hint that he's not in a Catholic church. The décor is quite a bit more restrained than St. Sebastians, but St. Sebastian's was old and in They'd been around long enough to have the Stations of the Cross carved in ivory on the walls. There's nothing even remotely like that here. (Of course, from the ten minutes of googling he did this morning, Tim got the sense this was the sort of place that would find having ivory anything, even if they were antique objects of art specially made by one of the parishioners back in the 1850s, horrendously embarrassing.) No Confessionals that he can see, and he makes a mental note to ask Jimmy about that.

They're waiting in the entry of St. Mary's when the Pastor heads over to welcome them. And just like at St. Sebastian's she's warm, pleasant, (spends a minute cooing over Kelly) lets them know all are welcome. She asks about their religious background, and Abby says they're Catholic. The Pastor, Emma Brons, (Mother Emma? Obviously Father Emma isn't going to work.) smiles, lets them know that a lot of the service will look familiar, and the biggest practical difference is that everyone is welcome and encouraged to take Communion.

Abby's smiling and nodding, making polite conversation, asking questions. Tim's mostly standing there and holding Kelly.

Finally Jimmy and Breena find them, but Molly's not with them.

"Oh, good, you've found everything," Jimmy says to him while Breena joins the ladies' conversation. "Do you want to take Kelly to the nursery?"

"Nursery?" Tim asks. There was an idea that hadn't occurred to him.

"They've got a nursery for babies under three. It runs the whole length of the service," Jimmy answers, gesturing behind him.

"Oh." Tim looks a little doubtful about that, but if Jimmy and Breena are comfortable with Molly being there… "Lead the way."

They're halfway down a long hall off to the side of the entry, one filled with what looks like brightly decorated classrooms.

"So, you guys don't do the nursery at St. Sebastians?" Jimmy asks.

"Don't have one. Kids come for the full Mass."

"Oh." Jimmy winces at that. The idea of a church service filled with small, loud, squirmy people, let alone having to be the guy making the small, loud, squirmy person behave isn't anything he'd relish. "Not here. Little guys stay in the nursery. Older kids attend the service for the first ten minutes, then they have the children's sermon, and then they go off to nursery school."

"Hmmm… That's different."

"Keeps them from going bonkers."

"I can imagine." Tim had personally spent what felt like ninety million hours of being a very small, very young, very squirmy person trying to listen to some old fart drone on and on and on while his Dad glared daggers at him for not 'behaving.'

"Okay, here we are." Jimmy opened the door to a brightly lit room and the sound of twenty babies and toddlers rolled over Tim. There were six women in there, taking care of the kids, and right that second he was immensely glad to not have their job.

Molly, who was playing with some blocks, saw them, and ran over. "Uncle Tim!"
He knelt down and kissed her forehead. "Hey, Molly."

"Kelly?" She's not really talking in sentences, yet. She's got most of her sounds, (Though th is a problem. Gibbs is Uncle Jetro.) and tends to talk in one or two word questions/statements.

"Yes. Kelly's going to stay with you today. You going to show her the ropes?"

Molly didn't appear to know what that meant, because she was looking around for ropes. (She understands, at least on a literal level, way more than she can express.) He kissed her head again. "Not real ropes. We're going to go to church with your parents, and then come to dinner at…" He looks to Jimmy, "What are Ed and Jeannie?"

"Poppie and Gramma."

"And then we're going to dinner at Gramma and Poppie's house."

Molly nodded, looking very pleased by this development. Then she scuttled off, found who Tim is assuming is her favorite of the nursery ladies, dragged her to them, and said to her, very seriously, "Uncle Tim, Kelly."

"Hi, I'm Melissa James. First time at St. Mary's?"

"Yes."

"Well, your little girl is going to be just fine with us. All of our caregivers are certified in CPR, and if you want to take a moment and fill out this form..." She led him over to one of the tiny tables and grabbed some paperwork en route. "We can get your Kelly settled in."

"Okay, thanks." He handed Kelly over, little nervous, but if Jimmy and Breena trust these people with Molly, they know what they're doing, and got down to filling out the paperwork.

A minute later, Melissa was handing him small sticker with a number on it. "Kelly has the matching number. Don't lose it, because that's how we know which parents go with which babies."

"How do you make sure it stays on the baby?"

"Put it on the diaper. That way, even if it falls off, it stays in her clothing."

"Makes sense."

"Did you come with your wife?"

"Yeah."

"I'll get you another number."

"Thanks."

The service was… a service. More than familiar enough. Bits and pieces (like the kids all leaving after the children's service) were different, but not so much he couldn't zone out.

Being stuck in what was one of four pews filled with Slaters was different.

Church attendance was a sticking point with his dad, so every single week until he got out of his
But he's never been part of one of them.

Meanwhile, being stuck in a sea of Slaters, being introduced to all of them (For the second or third time. He met, at least for a second, most of them at Jimmy and Breena's wedding and Molly's christening, and probably most of them at Jon's funeral, but he wasn't paying enough attention to notice anyone he didn't already know, then.) and watching them spend half an hour after the service catching up, because, apparently not all of them were going to dinner after, felt really strange.

There are more people here in these four pews than were at his entire wedding.

They joke about the Gibbs clan. But this mass of Slaters really is a clan. And to some degree it is a bit intimidating. This if family in that massive sticky wodge of intertwined relationships and history that goes back before everyone standing in this church was born.

Tim suddenly gets exactly how much tradition Jimmy and Breena bucked by having them as Molly's godparents. And knowing that, he's feeling very, very sure that returning the favor matters, a lot.

Jeannie and Ed's place was the land of carbs. The whole house is filled with beautiful food, and none of it looks edible for Jimmy.

Tim chooses to usually avoid carbs, he feels a bit better and has an easier time managing his weight when he avoids them. But, it's a choice. And surrounded by piles of luscious food, he may decide to reverse that choice for an afternoon, and work extra hard at Bootcamp.

But it's not a choice for Jimmy, not really. He can but shouldn't eat them. Especially not in the heaping piles that are covering every horizontal surface in the Slaters' dining room.

Tim actually pulled Jimmy aside and said, very quietly, "Are they trying to poison you?"

Jimmy rolled his eyes. "They think diabetes is some form of bizarre idiosyncrasy."

Tim stares at a table laden with lasagnas, beautiful golden brown garlic bread loaves, something that might have been baked manicotti, the green beans were in some sort of casserole with crunchy bits on top, the only other vegetable he could see was baked carrots, and the salad was generously studded with croutons. On a sidebar, there's a collection of fancy cookies, two different cakes, and cannoli. He can feel his mouth water and stomach rumble at all of that lovely food, but he's feeling really bad for Jimmy.

"Thank God, you don't have Celiac."

Jimmy sighed at that. "They think I should just up my insulin and deal, and Ed'll make a few cracks about me not eating enough to keep a bird alive."

"What do you do?"

"Salad, veg, some weeks they'll have a turkey or roast beef, too, and I'll eat that."
"Too?"

"Yeah, this is the smaller version of the spread. At least once a month, Ed's other brother and the rest of Jeannie's family shows up. There's at least seventy people here that week."

"Wow."

"Yeah."

By the end of the meal, Tim knew a whole lot more about the funeral industry than he ever expected to. Apparently, most of the "family owned" funeral homes were, once upon a time, family run businesses that had been bought out by large chains that kept the local names. Competition was, to put it mildly, deadly fierce. And the Slaters were one of only two multi-location family businesses still standing in the greater DC area.

From what he could gather, the reason they were still around was that they basically ran their own chain. Ed and his brothers each had at least one location under their control. They expanded with their children, waiting until one was old enough, focused enough, to run their own branch, and then bought/built a new location.

Breena, as the oldest of Ed's kids, was expected to take over her father's primary shop. He also ran one smaller funeral home (one of his Uncle's original shops) that would go to Amy or Christine, depending on which one looked up for it soonest. The other would have a shop built for her when she was ready for it.

So, basically, Ed's shop was the training ground for his kids. Add in experienced hands to make sure they learned the trade properly, recognition value from the name, and a huge pool of collected capital for expansion when the next generation was ready, and they were a very stable business.

And, as much as he thinks Ed is a massive jerk, Tim is pretty impressed with the level of organized providing-for he's done for his girls. (Though he's curious as to what would happen if one of them didn't want to be a funeral director. After all, his dad had that level of planning done for his career, too. He filed that away for something to talk to Breena about when they aren't at her parents' home.)

The crew (including Abby and Breena) was settling down for baseball when Jimmy said, "Time for us to be heading off."

Tim checked the clock. It's an hour earlier than he'd have left for Bootcamp, but he also wouldn't have needed to grab lunch before getting there.

"Oh, yeah, that thing where his boss tries to beat some spine into you, right?" Ed says.

Jimmy grits his teeth and pretends Ed didn't actually say that. "Yeah, Ed."

"I like Gibbs. Man's got character, grit. You guys should invite him for next Sunday."

Tim tries to imagine Gibbs in this crowd. He figures Gibbs would be out of here in less than ten minutes. "He's usually busy early Sunday, but we'll pass it along."
"Busy?" One of the assorted Uncles, (Will? Wes? Tim has no idea what his name is.) asked.

"We're on call one weekend a month, and the other three he spends working on his boat," Tim replies.

"I told you about that, Dad," Breena adds.

"Right, he's the guy who uses his own house as the bottle he builds boats in." That got the rest of the crew interested in the Amazing Gibbs who says nothing, builds boats in his basement, and beats Jimmy to a pulp (to hear Ed tell it) on a weekly basis. Jimmy and Tim use that as an excuse to slip away.

"And now I understand why you're always so happy to pound the crud out of me on Sundays."

Jimmy flashed him a quick, and not particularly happy, smile, as he puts his key in the ignition. They're taking Jimmy's car to Bootcamp. Abby and Breena are going to carpool home in Abby's car.

"How do you do that every week?"

"Valium." He says it deadpan enough that Tim's honestly not sure if he's kidding. Jimmy sees the confusion and shakes his head. "No, not really. I love Breena. She loves them. So, I've at least got to tolerate them. I mean, I knew I was getting into this when I married her. Honestly, I spent a good six months really thinking about it before I proposed, because she made it clear she was a package deal. If I wanted her, I was getting all of them, too. And, it's worth it... but..." Jimmy lets out a long sigh. "Yeah, Bootcamp. I love Bootcamp. Before Bootcamp, I'd get home and run for at least two hours."

"And I can see why."

"Believe it or not, they're actually being nice to me. Rod, Christine's last boyfriend, didn't pass muster, and, God, that was horrendously uncomfortable."

"What's horrendously uncomfortable?" Tim's curious about that, because if Jimmy's the pet son-in-law, the idea of what must happen to guys they don't like is terrifying.

"Okay, Ed doesn't love me, but the rest of them treat me okay. I think they're under the impression that a properly functioning father-in-law is supposed to be constantly putting the Fear of Dad into you, making sure that you know, every single second of every day that you are not worthy of his daughter and the entire reason for your existence is to continually strive to be worthy of her. This happens until some sort of magic switch flips and suddenly you're deemed worthy of helping his daughter take over the family business. And since I turned that down, my guess is I never get to be treated like a real human by him. But all the rest of the guys can treat you like a human."

"All right." Tim silently thanks Gibbs for not being that flavor of bastard.

"So, Rod shows up for church, and first of all he's in shorts and a t-shirt." And yes, Breena had indicated that dressy casual was the way to go here, and a suit wouldn't be considered out of line. So, Tim donned his usual church suit. "And all of them ganged up on him. And, look, Rod wasn't my idea of a good boyfriend, either. He didn't show Christine enough respect. And I've got no problem smacking a guy who calls out to my wife, 'Hun, grab me a beer,' when he's standing ten feet from the refrigerator, and she's on the other side of the room and has to walk past him to get it. So, I'll admit, I joined in on it. But that poor guy was like a side of beef in a tank of irritable, hungry, snarky piranhas, who earned points with each other by who could take the biggest bite out of him."
"I'm deeply glad not to be a perspective in-law."
"Yeah. So far we're the first ones to bring friends to this, but they seem to be treating you pretty well."
"Compared to my dad, Ed's a piker—"
"So's Charles Manson."
Tim smiles, appreciating that. "Not saying you're wrong, but I had a point there."
"Okay."
"Just saying, between my Dad and Tony, and hell Kate, or Ziva... Well, no one at Ed's is going to superglue me to a large, stationary object. Two snide comments about my wrist cuff and goatee... Tony used to give me more crap than that in the chunk of time between fetching the first of the morning coffee and finishing it. Everyone treated Abby well, and behaved like Kelly was the second-most darling baby girl on earth." Molly and Kelly are the only babies in the Slater clan right now. Though Molly does have several older cousins who start at age five and range up to fifteen. "So, yeah, that was more than I ever needed to know about funeral homes, but not really a problem."
"Okay, I guess it did go well."
Tim chuckled sarcastically. "Easy to have a nice family gathering when your standards are as low as mine... So, since they sort of approve of you, you only have to deal with Ed being a jerk and Jeannie trying to kill you?"
"Yeah. Though in her defense, I honestly think she doesn't get it. 'Cause, sure I can have an extra dose of carbs or sugar from time to time, but I feel pretty nasty after, so it's got to be amazingly good food to make it worth it."
"Like those ribs at Tony's bachelor party."
"Oh my God, yes, like those ribs! That was worth it. Hell, driving to North Carolina, shooting up insulin, night without Breena, and the sugar crash after was worth it. And one of these days, when we actually manage to have no pregnant wives between us, we're taking the girls and introducing them to those ribs."
Tim's nodding. He's on board with that idea. "Good plan."
"Oh yeah. Anyway, Jeannie's a great cook, and I actually do love Italian food, which I basically can't eat anymore, but I will, on a rare occasion, when we don't have Bootcamp after, snag a cannoli, because those are just amazing. She makes the whole thing, including the shells, from scratch."
Tim made a quiet mmmm sound. He'd had two (promising himself to work extra hard at Bootcamp), and they were little wads of creamy, chocolate-y, crispy heaven.
"So, she's more under the impression that I'm being an ultra-sensitive pain in the ass by not eating her food. And Ed, who will go to the wall to defend his girls, which includes Jeannie, will pick on me for it, because he considers it an insult to her."
"Great."
"Yeah."

"So, what are we getting you for lunch?"

"You're back!" Ziva said, pleased smile on her face when she saw Tim walk in with Jimmy.

"And looking awfully fancy," Gibbs added. "You just visiting?"

Tim usually shows up dressed to work out: t-shirt, sweats, and sneakers. (Jimmy usually shows up dressed for church.) He'd worn a suit to church, and sure, the tie and jacket are back in Abby's car (It's July, and hot, so all the guys got rid of the jackets and ties and rolled up their sleeves about two minutes after getting out of the St. Mary's), but that means, like Jimmy, he's in a button down, dress slacks, and dress shoes.

"Went to church with Jimmy and Breena. They don't take kindly to showing up in your workout clothing." Jimmy just nods at them. Showing up and taking a few minutes to change is his usual routine, and Tim follows.

Five minutes later, he's warming up with Gibbs, while Ziva puts Jimmy through his paces, and mentions, "Jimmy and I are supposed to pass along the invite to church and Sunday dinner with the Slaters to you. Apparently, you have 'grit,' and Ed likes you."

Gibbs lets go of the punching bag. (He'd been holding it steady while Tim worked it over.) He's just watching Tim.

So, Tim continues, "And neither of us will be in the least insulted if you develop some sort of massively time intensive hobby that eats up every Sunday for the rest of your life. In fact, Jimmy might encourage you to develop one."

"Run away, Gibbs, run!" Jimmy says, smiling, ducking under Ziva's arm, catching her hand in his and nicely spinning her around.

"He's getting a lot better at that," Tim says to Gibbs.

"Yes, he is." Gibbs is smiling. Actually, Tim's finding that smile a bit unnerving, because he doesn't know what it means. Gibbs gestures to the punching bags. "Elbow and knee strikes, right side."

Tim gets to it, mostly paying attention to Gibbs heading over to the boxing ring where Jimmy and Ziva are sparring.

Gibbs leans against the ropes, letting them wind down. Sure, Ziva won, but Jimmy can go a good six minutes with her now, and hold his own. (Well, not get too badly killed.)

"That a serious invite? Or was Ed just blowing smoke?"

Jimmy leans against the ropes, panting. Ziva's watching them, gulping down water.

"I think it was serious."

"You want me there?"

"You'd come?" Jimmy looks stunned by that idea. "It's church and a gathering of up to seventy people just standing around, talking funerals, and eating. And, Ed's not exactly your favorite person."

"Nope. But he's your kids' grandfather, your wife's dad. Like it or not, he's family. Not like I've never been to church before. Used to do it regular when Shannon and Kelly were alive. Used to do Sunday dinner, long time back, with my grandparents."

Gibbs shrugs at that. "You want me to invite him to Bootcamp? Let him see what you can do?"

"God. No! You do that, and I'll have a day where I trip over my own feet just getting into the ring. This is fun. This is how I blow off the stress of Sunday Dinner. I'd like it to stay that way."

Gibbs nods, and then a slow smile spread across his face. "You ever want to put him in his place, and if he comes, you will put him in his place, he's more than invited to join us."
Dinner at the DiNozzos'

Apparently there are some problems money can solve. And looking at an email with a schedule for interviewing all nineteen of the potential nannies over the next four days reminded Tim very clearly why he was happy to write a check that big to Anderson's. (And reminded him that he needs to be spending as much non-interview time writing over the next week as he can.)

Tuesday to Friday, they've got interviews. A ton of interviews.

Possibly sending a note saying, 'We're free all week, fit as many as you can in,' wasn't the best idea ever. He was thinking they'd see, maybe, five.

But nope, all nineteen. In four days.

Wow!

Okay, time to write up some questions.

Sometimes people just fit.

It would have been nice to say that had been the case with any of the perspective nannies. Just like with their resumes, they're lovely, talented, devoted people. But none of them felt like, 'Yes, this is the exact right person I want in my home taking care of my child.'

As Tony put it when they were talking about it at Shabbos, "No Pah!"

Abby shook her head, "Not even a…" She made a soft p sound.

"There's nothing wrong with any of them. They're all charming, driven, focused, professionals. They'd all probably do a great job. But none of them click."

"What happens next?" Jethro asks, holding Kelly on his lap while eating a bite of the cold cucumber-dill soup Ziva had made for supper. Shabbos supper is sushi (Which is apparently Kosher. That was a surprise to Gibbs, but fish is parve, and as long as it had fins back when it was swimming, it's okay to eat. So sure, no octopus, squid, or clam, but tuna, sea bass, and salmon are fine.) and the soup. So, fancy enough to be a celebration dinner, but no heat needed to make any of it. He never thought he'd go for cold soup, but with as hot as it's been lately, this is awfully nice.

"Call ten of them back, and pick them out basically by tossing darts at the board," Tim answers.

"What do you want out of a nanny?" Jimmy asks.

"Same thing you would, Palmer, thirty-six, twenty-four, thirty-six, right, McGee?" Tony says with a smirk as he's returning to the table with more sushi. Tim whacks him in the hip, glaring.

Tony laughed.

"The problem isn't what we want," Abby says. "Looks like they'll all provide excellent care. It's some way to tell that one of them will do a better job than one of the other ones."

"Yeah, besides having a knee-jerk aversion to tweed—"
"What, Timothy, is wrong with tweed?" Ducky says, looking amused.

"Nothing, on you or Jimmy, during winter or fall, but on a fifty-year-old woman with a proper British accent, in the middle of summer, it just makes me feel like I'm about to be taken to the Principal's office and reprimanded."

Abby chuckles. "Okay, yeah, that one was funny. The whole time we're doing the interview he's staring at her like a deer in the headlights, looking like he wants to run away. He didn't ask a single question, and just about sprinted to go get it when she asked for a glass of water."

Penny's smiling at him, nodding. "Sister Mary Bernadette."

"Yeah," Tim says, shaking his head.

"Is there a story behind that name?" Jimmy asks.

"Oh yeah."

"Is this your agitated nuns story?" Ziva asks.

Tim stares at her for a second, and then he remembered the Doyle case with the image of the bleeding nun statue buried in the video.

"Nope, agitated nuns were from California. This was Annapolis. Second time we lived there?"

"Third. You were born there, too." Penny nods.

"Right, second time I remember living there. Anyway, I was eight. Public schools were okay, but the gifted program was too easy, so I'm at Saint Mary's Elementary. She was in charge of our class, and was very, very strict, very British, and very fond of year round tweed. Huge woman, at least, it felt like she was ten-feet-tall and six hundred pounds, with a perpetual glare on her face. One of those women who had every ounce of joy surgically removed from her personality."

"She taught third grade for thirty years. That'll suck the joy out of most people," Penny adds.

"Anyway, cardinal rule of the class, thou shalt make no noise, at all, ever. You didn't want to even breathe loud in her class. And I had a friend in the desk next to mine, Michael, and he really thought it was absolutely hysterical to get me in trouble. So, she'd be writing things on the board, droning away about whatever, and he'd start flashing goofy faces at me. I'd be staring at the back of her neck, trying not to see it, but you can't not see the guy with the two pencils up his nose sticking his tongue out at you. So, invariably, I'd look over, and start to laugh, and within a second I'd hear the crack of her pointer slamming down on my desk, she had this way of doing it so that it'd land less than a hair away from your fingers, but she never actually hit them. And then six hundred pounds of ten-foot-tall Nun was looming over me, saying," Tim tried a British accent to go with his impression of Mary Bernadette, but killed it, and not in a good way, "'Mr. McGee, do you need to leave class?' or 'Mr. McGee, do I need to tell your father that you couldn't behave?" He shuddered for effect.

"And as a result you're scarred for life?" Brenna asks, joking.

"As a result, I apparently find large women with British accents and head to toe tweed disconcerting. Ms… Corday? River Corday?" Abby nods. "Anyway, she looks like a great nanny. She's practically Mary Poppins. The only thing going against her is the fact that I've had issues with tweed-wearing authority figures in the past. But that's the thing, they're all great. The best we've been able to do in weeding them out is one needs a live-in position, and one likes tweed."
Jimmy stares at them for a moment. "Talk about your first world problems."

"Oh, yes, we know. We really know," Tim says.

"Yeah, 'Oh no, we've got tons of really ultra-qualified people who want to take care of our baby. Boo hoo!'" Abby adds with a hefty dollop of sarcasm.

"But, the fact that it's a stupid problem doesn't make it any less real. So, next few weeks, Abby'll see ten of them longer, see how they do with Kelly, and we'll both hope—"

"Pray," Abby adds.

"That one of them will finally click."

A bit later, Tim asked Tony, "So, how was the first week as Team Leader?"

Gibbs grinned, Ziva rolled her eyes, and Tony groaned.

"So much paperwork!"

Gibbs smirked. "Haven't had this much free time since '97. Managed to get to bed before midnight every night this week. Cut two cups a coffee a day because of that."

"Jerry," the man who runs the coffee stand outside of the Navy Yard, "wanted to know if you were sick or something. Tells me he's got a new Harley he's paying off, and you're not doing your part," Tony says, making the other's laugh. Then he switches topics, a bit. "You're back on Monday, right?" Tony asks Tim.

"Yep."

"Good."

Tim sees the gleam in Tony's eyes and says, "Oh no. No. No. I am not your paperwork boy anymore. No. I've got more than enough on my own plate right now. SecNav wants my next report. He outranks you by a mile. I've got tests to write. Just finished the latest Deep Six rough draft, so now I've got to go back and beat it into shape for my editor. I'm not doing your crap, too. You wanted Team Leader, enjoy it."

"Come on…"

"No."

Tony's aiming puppy eyes at Ziva. She shakes her head. "McGee's better at your signature."

"McGee's better at my signature than I am."

"Probably because a good two-thirds of them come from me. It's not hard. There were only two things I knew cold by the end of my first week on Gibbs' team, Tony's signature and don't mess with Jethro's coffee."

That got a laugh.
"You want me to train Draga on it?" Tim asks. Just because he doesn't want to do the paperwork doesn't mean he wants the team's ability to do the work bogging down in unfiled reports.

"Already tried. I dropped a pile of paper on Flyboy's desk, he looked at it for a second, flipped through the pages, and then said, "I'm really pleased with your confidence in me, but until I've got the title of Team Leader, I'm not doing the Team Leader paperwork."

"Give it to me on Monday. I'm not filling it out, but I'll explain to Draga some of the glorious joys of being the tech guy, let alone the probie tech guy." And, it's possible the smile of Tim's face may have indicated a certain level of mean pleasure at the idea of foisting that job off to someone new.

"Aren't you the senior agent, now?" Abby asks Gibbs.

Gibbs shrugs. None of them are claiming the spot right now. He's got the years, but is leaving in January. Tim's senior to Ziva, but also leaving at some time in the not wildly distant future. Ziva's the one who's really going to get the job, but she doesn't seem to mind being in limbo until the three of them get fully settled.

"Isn't the paperwork your job?"

Gibbs just shakes his head. "Tony only thought I was tossing it all on him."

"You mean me. You don't think he did your paperwork, did you?" Tim adds. "Took an extra three weeks, but I can do your signature, too. Ziva's the only one who does all her own paperwork."

"If I knew you would fill out any page that hit your desk…" Ziva says with a smile.

"Don't even think about it. I don't have your signature down, and I'm not feeling any compelling reason to learn it."

"So, besides a massive paperwork backlog, how's it going?" Penny asks.

Tony smiles a little. "Better. Draga still doesn't love me, but he's a lot clearer about where the lines are now. That Jethro will take orders from me makes a lot of difference. Basically, since he's not second guessing me, and he's been around longer than dirt. No offense." Gibbs shoots him the you're being a smartass look, but doesn't whack him upside the head. "Anyway, if Gibbs, with his vast experience, thinks I know what I'm doing, that's good enough for Draga."

"He is asking more, why do we do it like this questions and fewer do you know what you're doing questions." Ziva says.

"How's he doing on tech?" Tim asks.

"Fine." Tony answers. "Not as fast as you are, but he's doing the job. He's better in the field, but he's handling tech."

"That mean I'm riding the desk Monday?"

"Maybe. Let's see what comes up. I want him handling all the basic tech and working with you for the advanced stuff until you leave. Field time isn't going to vanish anytime soon. You are. So we're going to make the most of it."
Dinner was breaking up when Gibbs asked Breena, "What time is church tomorrow?"

"You're really going to come?" She also looks amazed by this.

"Sure." They're in Tony and Ziva's bedroom, she's getting Molly, and he just wanted a shot to talk to her alone.

"It's at eleven."

"I offered to invite Ed to Bootcamp. Jimmy said he didn't want that."

Her eyebrows shot up.

"He ever changes his mind about that, are you okay with it?"

"Uh… Inviting him to Bootcamp to do what?" Breena looks very concerned by this development, because she's awfully sure this isn't a friendly offer to workout.

"Learn firsthand that Jimmy deserves his respect."

"Jethro?" She wants to make sure she's absolutely clear what they're talking about here.

"Beat that fact into him if need be."

She looks disturbed by that, but doesn't immediately say no. "Tell me how you think this'll work."

"Your father and your husband are the two most important men in your life. In your kids' lives while they're little, too. It's not good for you to be caught in the middle. And it's not good for them to see him disrespect their father. I was sure, after Jon died, that he'd ease up on Jimmy, see that he was a good man, a good husband, and a good father. But it sounds like he still doesn't get it. If he doesn't respect that, maybe he'll respect force."

"He respects money, Jethro. He's worried that Jimmy doesn't make enough to support our family."

Gibbs thinks about that for a moment. He's never asked and doesn't actually want to know, but…

Okay, you don't get fabulously rich on a government salary, but you also pretty much can't be fired, the benefits are gold plated, and your family gets taken care of after you die. Whenever Ducky retires, Jimmy'll be going up about five pay grades. (The jump between Assistant ME and ME is huge at the Navy Yard branch because ME also comes with Director of Autopsy.) He knows Breena is making money, too, so…

"Won't be able to support you, or won't be able to buy you diamonds and vacations in Switzerland?"

She smiles wryly. "Is there a difference?"

Gibbs gets it, and it shows on his face.

She nods. "Yeah. Add in Jimmy not wanting to work for Slater's, which I completely support and approve of… but… In my family that's almost divorce insurance. Guys don't leave when their whole life is wrapped up in the family. We're like the funeral home mafia, once you're in, you're in, and there's no getting out. But Jimmy's not in, not the way my uncles are, not the way my cousins' husbands are, and that worries my dad. But, mostly, I think it's money. And I don't know if you and Jimmy punching him into a pulp will help with that."

Gibbs smiled a little and inclined his head, indicating that he understood what she was saying. "Might make Jimmy feel better."
That got a smile out of Breena, too. Then a sigh. "They're both adults. If they need to fight it out, fine. I think it's stupid, but if it happens, yeah, I'll be okay with it. I'm not going to cry on Jimmy if he coldcocks my dad. There have certainly been times I've wanted to do it for things he's said to Jimmy, too. And if my dad cries on me, I'll remind him that getting into fights with guys who are thirty years younger and use fighting as a way to workout is a really bad idea. And I might then suggest to him that a certain level of politeness is due to the guy who knocked him flat."

"Okay. Just wanted to make sure it wouldn't cause trouble with you and Jimmy."

"No. He's my dad, and I love him, and I know he wants the best for me, but his idea of the best and mine didn't exactly match. I want kindness, love, and joy. He wants wealth and security."

Gibbs nods. Then he kissed Breena and Molly's foreheads. "Thanks. Won't let anyone get really hurt if it comes down to it."

"Good."
When Gibbs was a child, church, Sunday dinner, and gathering with the whole family had been part of every week. It wasn't a huge gathering, not like this never-ending crowd of Slaters, but his parents, his Aunt, her family, his grandparents, and their siblings, all got together.

But in his family, the women were the glue. His grandmother died, and Sunday dinner limped along for a few years, his mom and his aunt keeping it going. But his mom got sick, and then she died, and his aunt didn't have the heart to do it on her own.

Shannon had lived in Stillwater when they were courting, and when he was in town, he went to church and Sunday supper at their home.

They'd moved around a lot, finally gotten settled in DC, and his mother and father-in-law eventually moved down, wanting to be closer to Kelly and Shannon. His dad even made it down a few times a year.

For two years, Sunday dinner was at his house. He doesn't think about that too much. Not that they aren't good memories. They are. But like a lot of his good memories, they hurt. Though that's starting to get better. Maybe not good, but it's not an open wound held together by tendrils of avenging anger and numbing booze anymore.

But like his birth family, the women were the glue, and when his girls died…

This time though, he's here for his boys. He's glad to see Tim giving Jimmy some back-up on this. Visiting your in-laws shouldn't be walking into a lion's den, but if it is, it's good to have friends at your back. And if they're going to invite him to come along, he'll come along and keep an eye on Jimmy's flanks.

Like with Tim's first visit, he's very aware that no one in this family is going out of their way to make Jimmy welcome.

Not that Gibbs is known for hospitality, but there is a bottle of Gin (And a bottle of Absinthe is in the works for a birthday present. No, it's not legal in the US. Some favors are in the process of being called in, and buddy of a buddy who'll getting home on leave soon should have a few bottles stowed in his luggage.) in his basement next to the Scotch and Bourbon.

There's black coffee strong enough to peel the tar off the roof, and it was handed to him by Jeannie within seconds of him entering her home. And sure, it may not be there for just him, but he doesn't notice anyone else drinking it.

So, he's welcome, and judging by the fact that no one else is drinking coffee, they have gone out of their way to extend a welcome to him.

But not to Jimmy.

The girls are mingling easily. Abby's been getting some interested looks. If he had to guess, she's explained her tattoos about nine times. But it's mostly curious, not much hostile. Though Abby being Abby tends to smother hostile with warm happiness.
And Kelly's got an adoring collection of bigger girls cooing over her. Something about tween girls, they like babies, especially darling little ones in a tiny pink sun dress. (Apparently Abby and Tim decided Kelly didn't need to break out the goth-wear for church.)

Of course, this is probably a very girl friendly house. His always was. Kelly and her little tribe of buddies giggling in his backyard, he can remember that very clearly, smiles a little at it.

Tim and Jimmy tend to stay together, and near him. They don't mingle as easily, but conversation around this group tends to range from business issues, to the Nationals, (Turns out Jimmy's a fan. Gibbs takes some ribbing for the Pirates, but the look of death killed it pretty fast. Then the idea that Tim doesn't have a team percolates through, and apparently that had about the same effect as walking into the Slaters' in a skirt and eyeliner. Wedding ring, baby daughter in his arms, wife who he's kissed a few times, it doesn't matter, the collection of Slater Uncles and Cousins are fairly sure he's gay. Can't be a man without a team. Tim just rolled his eyes.) and back to the business.

They spend so much time in their own little NCIS world, where everyone knows everyone else, that Gibbs has never had to really think much about who he is in relation to these people he's collected into his family. But, this isn't NCIS. The various Slaters have met him maybe three times.

He's a vaguely familiar face somehow attached to Jimmy.

And of course, there are some stories, and they can see who he came in with, but, "Oh, you're Tim and Abby's…” and that's how that sentence goes. It just sort of trails off, because they don't know where he fits.

First time it happens he just lets it go. Doesn't answer. Smiles, nods, shakes hands, moves onto the next introduction.

Second time, he catches Tim's eye, (Wants to make sure this is okay with him. He knows Abby'll be good with what he wants to say.) and Tim nods, knowing what that look means. So he says, "Kind of complicated, but Dad'll cover it."

"I thought you were Jimmy's boss." Breena's cousin says.

He shook his head. "Duck's Jimmy's Boss. I'm Tim's, or used to be, until last week."

"Long as you're there, you're still my Boss," Tim says.

"Something happen?" The cousin, Fred, asks.

"I'm retiring in January. He's taking over his own department soon. New member of the team just joined up. Slid Tony into the Boss slot to make everything run better."

"Oh." Fred doesn't seem to get that, but he's willing to nod and smile.

"It's disappointing, right?" Ed says. Gibbs had been standing on the back porch, leaning against the railing, watching the kids run around the backyard, grabbing a few minutes of quiet. (Okay, it's not quiet, there are five shrieking kids playing something tag-like, but it's also not making small talk with strangers. Maybe restful is a better word.) Ed joining him wasn't exactly what he was hoping for for this moment.
Ed's looking at him expectantly. Gibbs raises his eyebrows a bit.

"You have girls, and you want something for them, a kind of future, a man strong enough to be a…
man. And they bring home these cute, fluffy things and expect you to think that they'll make great husbands."

It's possible that Ed isn't talking about Jimmy, though Gibbs doesn't think that's the case, but he might as well make sure. So he looks, pointedly, through the sliding glass door separating them from the dining room, at the twit that Amy's got hanging on her arm. Handbag, that's what Tony'd call him. And, really, he's probably not a bad guy, but as a cute, fluffy thing goes, he'll fit the bill.

Ed sighs. "Yeah. Him, too. He's a 'consultant' for graphic design firms. I think that's code for unemployed. I run a successful business, and she brings me a long line of unemployed or barely employed guys. But, you're a Marine, all Hoo Rah, and… your girls brought you the Clown and Tech Support. At least DiNozzo looks like he's got some backbone hiding under that Clown exterior."

Gibbs gives him a long, cold look.

"You, me, we aren't going to be around forever, and they pick cute. Cute doesn't keep the wolf from the door."

Gibbs' look was nearing absolute zero.

Ed is watching Amy talk with the Handbag, leaning into him, hanging on his every word as he strokes her back. "I worry for them. Don't want push to come to shove and for them to find out they've got no one to back them up."

And, yes, that resonates with Gibbs, but, nope, no one is saying that about his boys. "You think I know tough when I see it?"

Ed looks away from Amy to him. "Sure."

"Think I've seen my fair share of losers and creeps?"

"Probably yours are a few others."

Gibbs nods; that's true. "I am not disappointed in Jimmy, Tim or Tony. There are five men I trust with my life. Four of 'em I want at my back in a fight, and two of them are in your home right now, one's married to your daughter. Wolf comes to the door, Jimmy'll snap it's neck, and before it stops twitching, Tim'll shoot it between the eyes from 200 meters away with a hand gun. All of my boys are capable of defending their own nests, and they watch each other's as well.

"He was a cute, fluffy thing." Gibbs remembered Jimmy from 2002. Cute and fluffy, good way to describe him. "I thought Jimmy was goofy as Hell when I first met him. But he's not anymore. He's as strong as any man needs to be. Losing a child ruins men. It breaks them, wounds them so they never get back up again. You see the funeral. I see what happens months, years, later. Jimmy didn't leave when they lost Jon, he didn't break, and he didn't let your daughter or granddaughter down.
Push came to shove, and shoved him hard enough to flatten another man. Jimmy stood through it.
You're worried he's not strong enough to be the man your daughter needs, then you're not looking.
Man's made of steel. He wasn't when they started dating, but he is now."

Ed doesn't look like he knows what to do with that. Finally he says, "You can pick anyone in the world at your back, and you'd take Jimmy?"
"Any man in the world: Jimmy for hand to hand. Tim for a fire fight. Tony if there's a shot of talking our way out. Tobias if it's time to go out in a blaze of glory. And I want Duck somewhere safe, but able to see it all, for counsel."

Ed thinks about what Gibbs said for a moment and then says, "Any man. Let me guess, if we're talking anyone, it's Ziva for hand to hand, Ziva in a fire fight, Tony for talking his way out, and Fornell for the last stand."

Gibbs shrugs, that's not precisely wrong, but… "Not anymore."

That stuns Ed, more than anything else Gibbs has said.

"She's still a better fighter than the boys. Should be too, she's younger and trained for it her whole life. She's a better fighter than I am. Better than Tony. Jimmy can go six minutes with her, which is four more than I can—"

"Four more than you could have at thirty-seven?"

"She was thirteen when I was thirty-seven."

Ed gives him the, I know what you're doing look, but doesn't say anything else.

"I'm pretty sure she's not. But these days, there's always a shot she's pregnant, so, if there's any chance of getting her out of the fight, of making sure she's not the one at my back, I'd take it. Not gonna happen because she's stubborn as hell, but if it's my choice, she won't be in the line of fire."

Ed nods at that. He understands that in his bones. Women and children first, even if the woman in question is Ziva DiNozzo.

The sermon popped into Gibbs' mind. "You paying any attention to the sermon?"

Ed nods. "Enough."

"God gives us the lessons we need to learn in the people around us. That was the point of it. I don't think He forgot you when He was handing out lessons."

Ed smiles at that, acknowledging the point. "So, what am I teaching you?"

"Same thing He's trying to teach you with Jimmy, see the man inside the man."

"And what's your gut saying?"

"You're a jerk, but a good dad."

"Back at you."

"You could be a good father-in-law, too. Could be a great dad and make that daughter you love beyond anything else a whole lot happier by not treating her man like the enemy."

Ed shrugs at that. And Gibbs gets that as much as Ed does worry for his girls. As much as there is genuine concern, there's also a very large serving of him not wanting to be a good father-in-law, of him not wanting to share his daughters with another man. There's absolutely nothing wrong with Jimmy; other than the fact that he's not Ed.
Jimmy headed out a few minutes later. "'Bout time for us to head off."

Gibbs nods. He turns to Ed. "Thanks for the invite."

"You're welcome. Any and every Sunday, we're here."

This time the nod is aimed at Ed, not Jimmy.

Then Ed checked his watch. "Thought you said Bootcamp was at four?"

Gibbs nods, yet again. Ed had been asking about what it is they do on Sunday afternoons.

"It's ten past two."

"Yep."

"Doesn't take you that long to get downtown."

Jimmy lifts the corners of his mouth in a manner that could be called a smile, if you weren't paying attention or didn't know him well. "Gotta eat first, Ed."

"Of course. You're in a house full of food, but you've got to go out to eat."

Jimmy stiffened slightly. He could just take it, let it roll over him, like he does every week. But Gibbs is standing right next to him, watching, and he catches the faint, do it, you need to flavor of his look.

So he does. "Yeah, Ed, I need to eat. I need to eat every few hours when I'm awake, otherwise my blood sugar crashes, and that's a bad thing. And I'm standing next to a house full of food. Food all over the place." He looks at the cup in Gibbs' hand. "I see you've got Gibbs' drink. He's never been here before. You've only met him four times. But you've got exactly what he likes." Jimmy nods again, that not quite smile still on his face. He sighs. "But, yes, I have to leave your home to find food that won't make me sick. And I've got to do it soon, otherwise I'll start to feel woozy and won't have the energy for Bootcamp. So, it's time for us to go." Jimmy turned toward the patio door.

"Fine, go find food that doesn't make you sick." Ed rolls his eyes. "But really, how much energy can this take? According to Gibbs you mostly fight with Tim, and he's the precision shooter, not the muscle. Gibbs and Ziva train you, not fight you. When it's time to fight, you go up against the other skin and bones toothpick who's best skill is a gun."

Jimmy turns slowly back toward Ed, exhaling quietly. Gibbs is still flashing him the do it, you need to look at him. "Okay, Ed, you want to see what a workout looks like when a Marine and a Mossad-trained assassin are in charge of putting you through your paces? You want to see what training looks like? You want to see what us skin and bone toothpicks can do? Want to see how good even the least talented member of our team is when it comes to fighting? Hell, you want to take a shot at me? We meet up at four. Get your ass over to the Navy Yard and find out for yourself."

They're walking out of the house and Gibbs says quietly to him. "Glad you did it."

"Wonderful. Let's see if I can do this without embarrassing myself."

Gibbs puts his hand on Jimmy's shoulder. "You won't."

"Who are you texting?" Tim asks as he and Gibbs grab a table, and Jimmy orders himself some lunch.
"Letting Ziva know what's up."

"Stacking the deck in Jimmy's favor?"

Gibbs nods. "Like you're not going to pull your punches?"

"Not too much, I mean, I don't have to, not anymore. When we play to our own strengths, he's better. But he's going to be nervous, so I'll make sure it's close, but I don't intend to win any of our fights today."

"Exactly. Ziva's not going to throw any of them, but she'll probably move a little slower, telegraph her moves a little clearer."

Jimmy sits down, grilled salmon salad, bowl of three bean soup, and a diet Pepsi on a tray.

"How crazy is it that I can find a better low-carb lunch at a bakery than at my in-laws' house?"

Tim shrugs. They did this last week, and he had to admit, pulling into a Panera after leaving the land of carbs seemed strange to him. But, it is one of the few places Jimmy can get a decent lunch, fast.

"So this is what, fight club for geeks?" Ed asks, two minutes after finding Tim, Jimmy, and Gibbs at the NCIS gym.

"Come on, Ed, if you know enough to ask that question, you know the first rule of Fight Club." Tony says as he and Ziva enter.

"Tony?" Jimmy asks. Both Tim and Jimmy are pretty surprised to see him here today. He's never come to Bootcamp, probably for the same reason that Gibbs rarely fights. He's got a position and getting his ass kicked is not conductive to keeping it.

"Heard Ed was coming, decided I had to see this," he says with a big smile, clapping his hand on Ed's shoulder as Ziva gives each of the guys a hello hug.

"Great." Last thing Jimmy wants for this was a crowd.

Tony smiles. "Want to see the Gremlin take a bite out of his old man."

"The Gremlin?" Ed looks startled by that.

"What Tony calls Jimmy," Tim adds, you really don't want to know why on his face.

"Why?" Ed asks, starting to sound a little concerned.

Tony just shook his head and looked stern. "You ever see that movie? Sure, Jimmy looks like a stuffed animal, all cute and harmless, but hit the wrong trigger, and he'll mess you up! Breena ever tell you the story about how he drove a car into a suspect who was running away from us?" Ed shook his head. "Nope? It's a good story." Tony nods to the rest of them. "Go get started. I'll keep an eye on Ed." Tim, Jimmy, Gibbs, and Ziva headed off to warm up. "You know, Ed, Fight Club really was a great movie, but so many people forget the twist. Well, not forget it. Everyone knows the twist. They don't internalize it. They watch it and then stuff it in the cool story file, but don't change because of it. Kind of sad really.

"Edward Norton was brilliant in that movie. Starts off so soft and mild, letting everyone push him around. You never expect the twist. He's so good at just blending in and taking it that you never even suspect he's got Tyler Durden hiding in there." He smiles some more at Ed, who's staring to look a little nervous about this.

"Oh, well, enough movie trivia. So, what's your background with this? Jimmy got to this kind of late, but he's catching up, fast. And Tim, well… you've got to be able to fight to be a field agent. Can't pass FLETC without a martial arts proficiency. Me, I played every sport you can think of, and then boxing on top of that. First time I went up against Gibbs, I was dancing around, showing off, telling him how I used to box. I asked him if he'd ever boxed in the Corp, and he said no. So I was thinking I'd take it easy on him, and ten seconds later I was on the floor, and he had my arm pinned behind my back with his knee on my kidney. Then he told me, 'They taught us to fight.' And Ziva, well…" He looks at his wife, who is stretching with Jimmy and Tim, and smiles fondly at her. "Hey, Ziva," he calls out.

"Tony?"

"If you had to sum up your training, how'd you do it?"

She's loosening up, leaning forward, her ankle on the top rope of the ring. "You said, 'They taught Gibbs to fight?'"

"Yep."

"They taught me to kill."

He smiles back at her and says to Ed, "They taught her to kill. And she's good at it. We ever need someone to go in unarmed, it'll be Ziva. So, Ed, you remember the last rule of Fight Club?"

"No."

Tony smiles, he's enjoying this way too much. "If it's your first time at Fight Club, you have to fight."

And while it's true that Tyler Durden's Fight Club turns men from cookie dough to carved wood might not be precisely true, it's close enough. Right now Jimmy and Tim are in the best shape of their lives. (Sure, Tim's not giving Pitt a run for his money muscle-definition-wise, but Jimmy is. This might be the difference between no carbs and just not a whole lot of them.) And Ziva's awfully lean and strong right now, too.

Gibbs has been looking better these last three months. Sure, he's not the guy he was in his Marine days, but… well, he's not getting there, yet, either, but he can see where getting there begins from where he is right now, and hopes to have gotten back to who he used to be within a year (okay, year and a half).

But, with Tony prattling on next to him, filling him in on exactly what they do at Bootcamp (Tony's making a lot of it up, telling a good story, because, that's what he does. Compared to Somali terrorists, playing Ed's like riding a tricycle. But Ed doesn't know that.) Ed's noticing that Jimmy and Tim are indeed thin, but they are not toothpicks.

And they are very, very much not skin and bones.

And he probably, no definitely, doesn't want to get into a fight with either of them.
Jimmy's focusing on Ziva.

He's decidedly not focusing on Ed.

Not at all.

He's not seeing Tony standing there, next to Ed, hand on his shoulder, narrating the action, filling in bits and pieces of stories of how Ziva used to kill or disable men with the moves she's using, and how he's dodging, evading, using her momentum against her.

He's not hearing about how a second slower and that kick would have gotten him in the jaw or how the thumb lock he's using on Ziva right now is something she taught them as a way to easily disable an opponent.

Nope. He's focused on "Ziva." He's so focused on "Ziva" that it's only now occurring to him that she should have handed his ass to him a few minutes ago.

And that actually does snap his attention away from "not focusing on Ed" to really focusing on Ziva. She sees it when she has his whole attention and ups her game to go with it.

That's when he gets it. They are not going to let him look bad. He doesn't have to worry about this, because they've got his back. Ziva's not going to let him win, that'd be way too obvious. But they won't let him look like a twit, either.

And with that he does start to relax and enjoy himself.

That's also, as he spinning on his back leg, landing a kick that Ziva dodged, when he realizes exactly what this is and why Tony's here, too. (And honestly, he wouldn't be shocked if Ducky, Fornell, or Vance were to decide to come play, too. Though he's kind of hoping they don't.)

It's a show of clan strength. The same way dragging the potential son-in-laws to church is for the Slaters. This is his clan, showing off that its strength means the literal ability to end your life should they desire to do so.

He catches Ziva's knee, blocking that hit, planning to use it to toss her off balance, but apparently that's what she wanted him to do, because by doing that, he's got both hands occupied and can't block the punch the follows up. He did manage to get her off balance, but dodging the punch sends him down, too. She's up faster than he is, so it's her round. She offers a hand, and pulls him up.

"Good round. Another?"

"Sure."

"This what they usually do?" Ed asks Tony.

"Sure. Warm up time…"

"That's warm up time?"

Jimmy's on his third round with Ziva. Gibbs and Tim are working with each other.

"Yeah, that's warm up time. Jimmy's better attacking than on defense. So right now, he's up against Ziva. Main thing he's doing is learning how to see what she's going to do next and block it. Tim's thing is precision. Give him a gun and he can hit a dime on the goal post from the fifty yard line, but when it comes to fist and foot, he's not quite that controlled. That's what he's doing with Gibbs, working on making sure he can hit a dime at full speed with his off hand in close combat. I imagine in a few months they'll get to knives, but right now it's all fist and foot."

"Why aren't you doing this?" Ed asks Tony.

Tony shook his head a little. "Do I look stupid to you? I don't want to get into a fight with them. Hell, I don't even like running after perps anymore. You hit a certain age, and you don't want to be a punching bag. Okay, sure, Gibbs is insane, and he likes this stuff, and Tim and Jimmy are endorphin junkies, but I'm not. I like not having bruises. I mean, do you really want to get into a fight with them? Actually, I guess you do, that's why you're here. So, you better start getting warmed up and ready, because if you go at this cold, they'll kill you."

Usually, after working with Ziva, Jimmy and Tim go up against each other. These days those are free fights, no holds barred (Okay, not really, by mutual accord and respect, eyes and balls are off limits, but there's no set rule against it.), do whatever you like, first one to hit the floor loses.

Usually, that's when Gibbs and Ziva regroup, go over strategy, watch what and how they're learning, and plan out what sorts of things the guys need to work on.

But this is very much not a usual week.

And Gibbs already has a plan in place.

He and Tim finish up, and as they're heading toward the ring he says, "You and Jimmy, two rounds, take it easy, Ziva and I'll keep Ed busy. He won't be watching you two much."

Tim nods. He doesn't know where this is going, but he gets the basic instruction here is conserve your energy, more stuff coming up later.

Usually, they go for an hour, hour ten if things are going well, and he knows today is going to run longer than that.

So, as Ziva slips out from between the ropes, Tim joins Jimmy, quietly giving him the heads up, and they face off.

Ziva heads over to Gibbs, her usual plan, but sees that Gibbs is heading over to Ed.

"Tony taking care of you?" Gibbs asks as they get closer. Ed's working on one of the punching bags. Tony's keeping it steady for him. His form is good, speed decent. Gibbs is getting the idea that Ed probably boxed in college or high school, remembered what he learned, but hasn't used it in thirty or forty years.

"Yes."

"Great. You're up with Ziva next."

"Ziva?" Ed stops dead and just stares at her.
"Yes," Ziva says, looking pretty happy at this.

Gibbs gives Ziva a stern look. "Ziva, no eyes, no balls, no throat, no finger locks. Ed's got to be able to use his hands tomorrow."

"Yes, Gibbs." She's smiling pleasantly at Ed.

Ed's looking terrified.

"You start with Ziva because she's good enough and has enough control to not accidentally hurt you. Even if you are swinging wild and don't know what you're doing, she won't let you accidentally hurt her. You start with Ziva, and once you get good, you end with Ziva, because she's the one who knows what she's doing."

"I can't hit a girl!"

Ziva just grins at him. Gibbs claps his hand on Ed's shoulder and smiles. Tony says, "If I was you, I wouldn't worry about hitting a girl." He fishes a fifty out of his wallet. "This is yours if you can manage to lay a hand on her."

Gibbs laughs. "Come on, Ed. Time to see what Bootcamp really looks like."

Ziva puts Ed through his paces. Gibbs and Tony watch Tim and Jimmy work with each other.

"What's the plan?" Tony asks Gibbs.

"I'm up against Jimmy next."

"Really?" Tony knows where Gibbs is going to take this, and… He gets it, but that Gibbs'll do it takes his breath away.

"Yeah." Gibbs turns to Tony. "You make sure Ed gets it."

"Not a problem, been doing that all day. So, you're really gonna let him win?"

"Let? Have you been watching what he's doing?"

Tony shrugs. "Not exactly what I meant. Until I started letting you win, you made my life a living Hell. Once Ed's gone, you gonna give Jimmy any crap?"

Gibbs shakes his head. (He has a somewhat different memory of how that went down, and DiNozzo letting him win isn't part of it. Though as he thinks about it, it's probably a good idea that Tony hasn't decided he needs to go toe to toe against Draga, and just possibly Tony learned that from his own experience of being the young half of the equation when it came to working with him.)

Tony's watching him think about it and says, "You're going after him after he's been up against Ziva and McGee."

"Gotta do something to even it up. Won't look right if he drops me one minute in."

Tony shakes his head. Palmer creaming Gibbs a minute in isn't anything he's ever going to believe can happen, even if he does actually get to see it live. It's like the sun rising in the west, it's just wrong.

"When did we get old?"

Gibbs laughs at that, very amused. There's a huge difference between ten and twenty years old. But not so much between twenty, thirty, and forty. But forty and fifty, which is where Tony is, oh yeah, lots of difference. Fifty and sixty, where Gibbs is, not as much, but he can feel it. "After Jimmy and I are done, we'll see if Ed still wants to take a swing at him."

"And if he does?" Tony asks.

"I don't think he's that stupid."

That got a chuckle out of Tony.

"Okay, Jimmy, you and me."

Both Jimmy and Tim are flashing very clear are you sure about this expressions at him. Gibbs nods at both of them.

Tim stares at both of them. Be careful aimed at Gibbs. And Abby'll pout at me if you hurt him aimed at Jimmy.

Jimmy's looking back at Tim with What the hell is wrong with you? He's going to eat me alive and pick his teeth with my bones, and you think Abby's going to pout at me?

Tim smiles at that. He's a bit more immune to the aura of Gibbs than Jimmy is.

Gibbs heads in, and Jimmy's looking warily at him.

"Gonna be okay, Jimmy."

He looks at Ed. He's close enough to see, but not really hear.

"Sure?"

"Yeah."

"You gonna take a dive or something."

Gibbs shakes his head. "Won't need to."

Jimmy's not looking like he believes that.

"Focus on me. Enjoy it. Then go have a chat with him."

The Marines teach you to fight and kill. All four limbs working together to drop your opponent as fast as possible. It's not fancy. Not (especially in the '70s when Gibbs was learning it) elegant. It's the martial arts equivalent of napalm. The point is overwhelming, conquering force. As long as the job is destruction, it gets the job done.
Mossad teaches you how to strike fast and precise. Maximum damage for minimum effort. How to get exactly the target you're aiming at and no one, nothing else. It's the fighting style of a small force, that must, because of its size be stronger. The fighting style of David who's facing a never-ending line of Goliaths. A group of men who have to be able to take ten, fifteen, maybe twenty men off the board for every man they can afford to lose.

If Tim has a fighting style, it's watch and wait. See the moves coming at you, look for the hole, dart into it, and knock the other guy on his ass.

And if Jimmy has a fighting style, it's a hybrid of the above three.

Gibbs is fighting fierce and fast. He's been conserving his energy for the last hour, intentionally not fighting until now. He makes sure Jimmy is on defense, the weaker of his skill set. But, Jimmy's spent most of his hours getting beaten by Tim when Tim is on defense. He knows how to play it, even if it's not his best skill.

Defense is a patience skill. At least that's how Tim plays it, how he uses it to take Jimmy down. But fighting isn't about patience, not for Jimmy. He's got yoga for that. Fighting is speed and aggression and pumping blood and fast breath and spiking adrenaline and endorphins.

He'd dodging fast, hard punches, using his legs and forearms to block kicks, his extra two inches of reach keeps Gibbs from getting too close, and while he's at it, he realizes this is the shot Gibbs is giving him. Gibbs was a sniper. Gibbs kills with a knife. Gibbs is patience and defense, and attacking fast and hard isn't his best skill. He's matching his weakness to Jimmy's, but he's got to be sure that Jimmy's better playing to his weak side than he is.

Because Jimmy does spend hours a week doing yoga. Because he can focus when he wants to, focus hard and tight, and slow the world down to beating heart and aware breath. It's not that he can't do it when he fights, it's that he usually doesn't want to.

But right now, more than ever, he wants to take the time to do this right. So he's focused, more focused on a fight than he ever has been, and he channeling the patience he needs to do this right, to see where to hop in, and use Ziva's precision to hit exactly what he's aiming for.

And he sees it about two minutes in. Gibb's is balanced on his left leg. He saw Ziva do a version of this, kicking at his head and taking his ankle out from under him. He doesn't have Ziva's speed, can't do it in one move. But he thinks he can pull this off in two fast moves. The punch toward Gibbs' head is a feint, pushing him a little further back, forcing more weight on that back leg, over balancing him just a bit further, and from that punch he immediate drops into the sweeping kick that takes that leg out from under Gibbs, and a second after that he's up and standing and Gibbs is on his back on the ring, looking up at him, and, there's an awfully pleased smile on his face.

Jimmy feels the smile on his face as well.

Which means it's time for part two of this, have a "chat" with Ed.

Getting into a fist fight with your father-in-law is probably a ridiculously stupid idea. On the list of top ten stupid ideas, it's probably on par with going up against a Sicilian when death is on the line.

And Jimmy isn't immune to iocane powder.
On the other hand, there's no shot Ed will respect him less for it. Unless he loses. But he just beat Gibbs. Just figured out how to own his defense. So he can't imagine Ed winning unless he was secretly a ninja back in the day. (For example, he's pretty certain he could take Ducky, but not enough to bet on it. He saw what Ducky did to those three Ninja wannabes. Ed, however, is a rather different story.)

So, as he gives Gibbs a hand up, sees the pride in his eyes, the go on, get him, in his look, he's ready for this. He faces Ed, makes sure he's looking at him. Then he checks with Gibbs. "You good?"

"Fine."

"Good." He headed to the ropes, leaning, forearms against them. He's hot, heart beating fast and hard, bright pink, dripping sweat, bit tired, and high as a kite on endorphins right now. For a few heartbeats he just stands there, staring at Ed. Then he runs his hands through his hair, mostly just moving it around a little, cooling off a bit, then wiped his face.

"Well, Ed, it's been an hour. I'm tired, so that'd even the odds some. You're all loose and warmed up." He sighed, stared down at Ed for a few more heartbeats, shook his head a little at how ridiculous this is. "You've wanted to take a shot at me since Breena brought me home the first time." He spread his arms wide, palms up, his hands are taped, so he can't exactly use his fingers to gesture, come on up, but he's getting the point across. "I'll even give you the first shot free." And then he smiled, cold, brilliant, challenging.

It's the smile of a man who just realized he can kill you with his bare hands if he feels like it. And he might decide he feels like it.

Tony said to Tim and Ziva, very quietly. "He's fucking terrifying when he wants to be."

"Indeed." Ziva said.

Tim nodded. He doesn't want to be on the other end of that smile. Ever. And if Ed's got more than three brain cells to rub together, he's about to shit his pants. (Gibbs standing behind Jimmy, arms crossed, grinning, insanely proud, is probably also not a comfort for Ed.)

The smile fell, and all they can see is cool contempt on Jimmy's face. "Well?"

Ed slowly shook his head. "Nope."

Jimmy nodded. "Good." He slipped between the ropes and headed down. Ed backed away from him, but in less than two steps found Tony and Tim immediately behind him, cutting off any chance of escape he might have. "Long time ago, I told you you didn't have to respect me, and you don't. No one gets respect by demanding it. Me telling you to do it won't make it happen." Jimmy smiled again, and hell, it's not aimed at him, but Tim's feeling a distinct desire to get the fuck away from that smile. "But you should respect me. I treat your daughter like a queen, my queen, and your grandchildren have been and will be adored every single day of their lives."

Ed nods, looking very nervous. He's got no idea what Jimmy'll do next. For that matter, neither does Tony or Tim, but they're on high alert to back any play he comes up with.

"Like, I said, I can't make you respect me. But just like I fake it and am always polite to you, and you are always given a proper welcome in my home, from now on you will treat me with basic politeness. No more snide remarks. No more inviting me to a meal and then only serving food that will make me sick. We clear?"

Ed nodded again. "Yes."
Jimmy smiled one more time. "Great. Time to hit the showers."

Abby got a text about half an hour after that. It's from Tim. Everyone's fine. Jimmy stood up to Ed. Didn't have to hit him to do it. Details and celebratory dinner is at Ducky and Penny's as soon as we can get there.

She was at Jimmy and Breena's, heard the chirp of Breena's phone, probably showing a very similar message from Jimmy, and sent back a quick. Be there soon.

Two hours later, when food had been consumed, and celebratory beverages drunk, and the whole crew was in a very mellow, possibly even silly mood, when Jimmy said, "We should have a crest."

"A crest?" Tony's giving him the you are such a geek stare. But Tim's nodding, and Gibbs isn't horrified by the idea, but not sold on it either. Ducky warmed to it immediately, and ramped up into a full on history of heraldry.

Eight minutes later, after the cursory Crests For Dummies lecture by Dr. Mallard, Jimmy's sitting back, nodding along.

"A crest, or a tartan, or something. We don't have a name in common. But, something that says, Clan Gibbs would be good."

Abby's listening to this, not saying anything, but she's definitely paying attention.

Christmas is coming (well, in five months), and a symbolic gesture of family... Oh yes, she's listening, paying attention, and thinking.

They'd been home for a bit over an hour when Abby sat next to Tim, holding out a piece of paper to him.

It's a sketch, colored in with Sharpies, but he can see what she's thinking with this.

It's a shield, which makes sense, crests are done of a shield. It's broken into quarters by a solid gold line. Top right quarter is sable on argent. Top of that quarter says Palmer. In the center is the black cross of mortuary services, the black caduceus, (also of the mortuary service) outlined in white over top of the cross. Top left quarter is argent on sable. Across the top of that quarter is McGee. It's a computer sitting next to a microscope. Bottom right quarter, sable on azure, DiNozzo across the bottom of that quarter, below a knife leaning against a badge. Bottom left quarter Vert over Gules. At the bottom it read Langston-Mallard, and it's an open book, one page covered in equations the other page with a story.

And in the center, where the golden lines crossed was a partially unfurled scroll, silver over argent. At its top was Gibbs, then below that Rules, and below that 1. Never... it's small enough you can't read anything beyond the never.

Tim looked over Abby's shoulder, at her finished crest, and said, "So, I guess I know what everyone is getting for Christmas."

She smiled up at him. "You like it?"
"Oh yeah."
And That Was Monday

Monday morning. Back to work.

Usual start up time is eight, so usual heading off time is seven thirty. Which means the last sight of his family, before heading out into the hot July air, was Abby nursing Kelly, and leaning in close to kiss them both goodbye.

Ah yes, the glorious orange hue that means justice and work.

Yippiee.

Somehow he's significantly less gung ho about being at work than he normally is. Draga's already at his desk, and he can smell Gibbs' coffee, so he's around here somewhere. Ziva and Tony's desks are empty. But Tony's on breakfast treats/drinks on Monday, so they get in a little later than everyone else.

Looks like it's a normal Monday.

He sits down at his desk, pulls the baby pictures out of his go bag, tacks two on his wall, one on the back of his computer, (so people can see without having to hang all over his desk) and fires up his computer.

Only 274 new emails since the last time he checked.

Maybe, if he's lucky, there won't be a body today.

Not that lucky. Usually, when Tony's on snacks, he comes in, doles them out, and then sits down. Today he's got the snacks, but instead of putting the bag on his desk, and handing them out he keeps hold of them and says, "Eating on the road today."

Gibbs chooses that second to appear out of nowhere. "Where to?"

"We're heading for the Reagan. Van to Norfolk. Heilo from Norfolk to the Reagan." He looks at Tim. "Bet this is what you were hoping for for your first case back."

Tim shoulders his go bag, rolling his eyes. "You know it."

Draga's looking at him, wondering.

"I get seasick."

"You get seasick and signed on to be a Navy Cop?" Draga asks as they head to the elevator.

"Long story."

"You know there are these pressure—"

"Got 'em all memorized. And a special bracelet that's supposed to help with it in my bag."

"Does it help?" Draga asks.
"Not really."

"Dramamine?"

Tony winces. "No."

"No?" Draga's looking at Tim, wanting to know how bad the experience that prompted Tony's 'no' was.

Tim shakes his head. "Like mainlining speed. It's not pretty."

"He was awake for three days the last time he tried that," Ziva says.

"Not three days, but yeah, didn't like the side effects. I wasn't sick to my stomach, though."

"Nope, not sick," Tony adds. "But you could hear his heart beating from the other side of the room."

"I thought it was supposed to make you sleepy," Draga says.

"It might, but that's not how I react to it." That makes Tim remember something, so he grabs his phone and starts texting.

"Letting Abby know what's up?" Gibbs asks.

"Good plan, need to do that, too." He sent her a fast text as well while saying, "Asking Jimmy about the stuff Breena's on for morning sickness."

A minute later he'd gotten one back from Jimmy. Motion sickness is usually more of an inner ear balance thing than a hormonal thing, but the stuff she's on works for chemo patients, too. Might help you. How much do you weigh?

Tim sent back 171.

I'll write you a script and bring some if we get called out to join you.

Thanks.

They were getting the van ready when Tim said to Tony, "Never thought I'd be around to see this again."

"Had to happen. Wasn't working stuck in between them."

"That's fine. Still not calling you Boss."

"Gibbs said the same thing to me."

Tim laughed at that. "So, campfire when we come back?"

"Think so. That seemed to work well last time." Of all of his changes from the first time, the one that stuck was how he rearranged everything so it was easier to get to. The one he would have liked to have seen stuck was the campfire. Okay, sure Gibbs likes the report in style, but Tony thought his report in, and then talk through what you think is going on works better than Gibbs' report in, and then Gibbs somehow magically comes up with the answer. And it'll sure as hell work a ton better than Gibbs magically figures out what's up next when Gibbs isn't there anymore. Plus, it is doing a better job of keeping Draga in the loop, which means he's getting fewer, do you really know what you're doing style questions.

"Yeah, I think it did. Gibbs actually talking at them?"

"Uh huh. He's a really good second-in-command."

"Shouldn't that be Ziva?"

"At this point it's basically everyone who isn't Draga."

"Ah."

Gibbs tossed Tim the keys. "Let's go."

Tony's handing out the snacks while he fills them in. "So, according to the call, 1800 hours, day before yesterday, three sailors: Ender, Simmers, and Blake didn't show up for roll. Since the Reagan was in the middle of the Atlantic, and since they had been at their posts as of 1700, the higher ups started searching for them. As of 2200 yesterday, they still hadn't been found."

"Isn't the Reagan an aircraft carrier?" Draga asks.

"Yes, it is, Flyboy. Hoping you'll be able to help us find all the hidden nooks and crannies where three sailors might hide."

"Yeah, but… Carriers have NCIS Agents Afloat, right?" Draga asks.

"Good point. Why are we heading to Norfolk?" Tim asks.

"Yes, they do. But, at 0600, when Agent-oh you'll love this McGeek-Mulder—"

"Really?" Tim looks away from the traffic for a second to see if Tony's joking. Tony's not. "Really. Three missing persons, and Agent Mulder's in charge."

"Oh, this is great," Draga says with a grin. "Scully on board too?"

Gibbs shoots a quick less fooling around more working look at the three of them.

"No pretty red-heads for you, Flyboy. Gibbs has that market cornered."

Draga looks curiously at Gibbs. Gibbs just shakes his head.

Tony continues on, "As of 0600, Mulder was running the search for those three—"

"How are they searching?" Ziva asks.

"Don't have details on that."

"Do we know if they went for a swim?" Gibbs asks.
"Report says they didn't, but I don't see how they could know that," Tony answers.

"All carriers have sensors and security on the decks. Anyone tried to go for a swim, and it'll set them off," Draga answers.

"Is that new?" Tim asks. He'd never heard of that.

"Think they got done installing them on all the ships in early '15. Pretty cool system. There's a series of lasers around the perimeters as well as cameras. The cameras are always on, and if one of the beams gets broken, it immediately sounds an alarm, the footage gets replayed, the computer can tell if it's a bird or something, and if it's a bird or something, no one does anything, but if it's a guy, then all hands onto rescue mode."

"Cool." Tim replies.

"McGee, Flyboy, once we're done with the scene, you two'll be making sure the sensors worked properly."

"Why do we have a scene? This is a missing persons case," Ziva asks.

"As I was saying before we got onto whether or not our sailors took a swim, Agent Mulder had been running the search. He notices something, quote, smells really off, unquote. He's in the process of checking it out, and was, 'pushed' down one of those ladders/stairway things they have between decks. So, Mulder's in the infirmary, with his left leg broken in three places, and we're being heiloed in to take over the search."

"What does 'smells really off' mean?" Ziva asks.

"Dead body? Dead bodies? That's what Mulder thought. Could be little green men for all we know, though. Whole area's been roped off, waiting for us. Supposedly, no one's been allowed nearby and a watch has been set to keep the spot clear."

"So three missing sailors, maybe dead, and two hours before we get there," Gibbs adds, maybe just stating the obvious, maybe giving Tony a hint.

Either way Tony followed up with, "Okay, Flyboy, pad out, I want a list of every non-standard hiding place you can think of on a Nimitz-class aircraft carrier that'll fit a person. The more out of the way, the better. I want wherever you'd take a girl if that girl was the Captain's wife."

Draga grins. "If I'm gonna fool around with the Captain's wife, I'm taking her off his ship."

That got a headslap from Gibbs.

"Non-standard hiding places, working on it."

Setting foot onto the Reagan after the helio ride, Tim was awfully pleased to see the seasickness didn't hit him nearly as hard as it usually did. They'd actually been on there for twenty minutes, working their way below decks to 'smells really off' and he was only feeling mildly nauseous, which given the fact that it'd been less than a day since Tropical Storm Helene blew through and the sea was still rough was a miracle.
He was wondering a little if maybe actually talking some about what had happened with his Dad was part of why he wasn't massively sick. Maybe, since almost twenty-five years of fear about what might happen to him on a ship had, not precisely died, but been put into some better perspective, his stomach wasn't quite so upset by the prospect of being on a ship.

So, he was thinking that he might actually get through the case without tossing his cookies when they got to the 'smells really off.' And it does. They all know that smell. Been there, done that, got the commemorative t-shirt in every color they make it in. There's something, likely someone, very dead down here.

Gibbs is already texting Ducky, letting him know to come out. "Ziva, this smell like less than three days to you?"

She shakes her head. "No. I'd think what we're going to find has been dead longer than that."

Draga's not look happy at this conversation. He's decidedly green around the gills right now.

"Of course, it could just be hot down there. That would speed things up," Ziva adds.

Draga swallows hard at that.

Tim takes pity on him and gets Draga fingerprinting the ladder Mulder fell down. Sure it's not likely to be too useful, probably twenty men a day go up and down that ladder, but he needs to work on his fingerprinting skills, and it's not impossible that something useful might come up from those prints.

Plus, he remembers his first time finding a decomposing body. That was bad enough. Trapped in a small area with recycled air… much worse. Draga can skip that until he's got a few more miles under his belt.

Meanwhile, the ladder leads down to a storage area. Which is where the smell seems to be coming from. They circle around to a different ladder, and down they go.

On the upside it's bright. Mostly. There are overhead lights, but tall boxes of… Tim doesn't know, something in stacks of tall boxes, cast deep shadows.

So, flashlights out, following their noses, but after a while the smell is so thick, so omnipresent, suffusing every molecule of everything around them, that they can't navigate by it.

They split up, each one covering their own area between the rows of boxes. He's got the last row, between rough wooden boxes piled up to well over his head on one side and the steel of the bulkhead on the other.

Of course he found it. Why wouldn't he find it? That's how the universe works, right? He's finally not feeling like being on a ship is going to make him throw up everything he's ever eaten, so he's the one who finds the body.

The body slowly being eaten by thousands of wriggling maggots.

No one was saying anything. They're spread out and searching between the boxes. And while it's true that aircraft carriers aren't precisely quiet, it was quiet enough. There's a sound that goes with thousands of maggots eating, it's very soft, and it's entirely possible that he imagined it, but when the wet, squelchy, rustling hit Tim he spun on his heel and sprinted away.

That he kept it together long enough to jerk his thumb in the direction he came from as he whipped past Tony and get clear of the crime scene before throwing up is something he's rather proud of. That he didn't make it to the head, wasn't.

"You weren't kidding about seasick, were you?" Draga said a few seconds later, handing him both a bottle of water, and a box of wetnaps. He's got no idea why Draga would have them, but it was certainly convenient.

Tim shook his head. He took a sip of water, swished it around his mouth, and realized he didn't have anywhere to spit, so he swallowed and hoped it would stay down.

It took a few minutes, but he got the mess cleaned up, and then found Ziva, gave her his camera, because of all the scenes in all the world, that's the one he can't document, and decided now would be a very good time to go have a chat with Mulder about exactly what he was doing when he got pushed, and all the details of the case he could get from him.

Didn't take him too long to find the infirmary. The medic took one look at him (one smell probably, he has to reek of corpse and, assuming you could smell it over/through corpse, puke) and was getting ready to treat Tim. Tim cut him off, showed his badge, and asked where Agent Mulder was.

"Back here. Can I get you anything?"

Tim shook his head, few minutes too late for that. "Just Mulder."

"Okay." Tim followed the Medic back behind a large partition to a collection of beds. "Dave, got a..." He looks at Tim, wondering who he is.

"NCIS, DC Branch." Tim extended his hand to a guy who couldn't be less Fox Mulder if he tried. Dave Mulder was probably six three, ebony skinned, and lying on his back with his leg in traction. "I'm Tim McGee. You talked to my partner earlier."

"DiNozzo. You all got here, and from the smell of it, you found what I was looking for." Tim nods, looks around, no chairs, so he half sits/half leans against the bed next to Mulder's. "Take it you found a body."

He doesn't want to think about that, but he does answer, "Oh yeah. How long have your men been missing?"

"Two days come 2200."

He doesn't want to see it. Would really prefer not to have that image in his mind, but the image does flash back into his head, and he feels the queasiness rising in his stomach again, along with a panicky cold sweat. Deep breath, calm, you're nice and safe, here in the clinic. He's pressing the point on his right wrist as he says, "We found someone. I really doubt it's one of your men. At least, I don't think you'd get that many maggots that fast."

"Maggots?" Mulder asks.

Tim winces. "Lots of 'em."

"Huh."

"Anyone else missing?" Tim asks.
"No."

That's when the fact that Mulder was looking confused about the maggots worked its way through his fear. "Why huh?"

"Just… You need flies for maggots, and we don't have a lot of them out here. Not none of them, can't have none. But we're not on land, and Captain Zackles is vehement about running a clean ship. This is my third float, and ships have a smell to them, lots of men, lots of food, everything all close together, and this was the first ship I ever stepped on that didn't have that smell."

Tim thought about that, and Mulder is right. Ships do have a certain smell, and thinking back, he didn't notice that once they got below decks here. He makes a note of that.

"We headed down the ladder, into the storage area," Mulder is nodding along, "found the body between the bulkhead and the boxes, about two hundred feet back."

"Okay."

"What's stored down there?"

"Maintenance stuff. Everything you need to fix something if you're a thousand miles from the nearest port."

"Lots of raw materials." Tim jots that down.

"Yeah."

"So, not a lot of people going down there?"

Mulder flashes him a knowing look. "Either no one is down there, or a whole lot of them are."

Good to know. "When was the last time a whole lot of people were down there?"

"Don't know, but we can find out."

Tim made a note of that, too. He taps his fingers against his phone, thinking. "If not a lot of people are down there… How often do those boxes get opened?"

"Some of them, like the ones with paint in them, pretty often. The ones with screws and nuts, pretty often, too. Back up pressure gauges, o rings, sheet metal, probably not so much."

Tim makes a note to find out what's stored where they found the body.

"You guys sure they didn't fall/jump overboard?" he asks.

Mulder shrugs. "Only an hour between missing roll and last seen. I've watched every inch of the footage from every angle. If they went over, it's because they cut a door for themselves."

"Okay." Tim stops to think about that. "Could you do that?"

"Sure, it's possible, but you'd need some really serious cutting tools. Arc welder of the gods or something."

More nodding from Tim, that's a good point. Still, weirder things have happened. "But… I mean… It's a huge ship. Has anyone laid eyes on the whole thing to make sure it doesn't have any holes it's not supposed to?"
Mulder's looking at him like he's insane. "No, none of us checked. But, look, the outside is designed to withstand missile attacks, depth charges, and, you know," Mulder slams his fist into his palm, "planes crashing into it. It's not inch thick sheet metal. You'd need some really serious power to get through it, and a lot of time. You couldn't whip through it in less than an hour."

"No. You'd have to have it set ahead of time. They store tools down there?"

"Yeah."

"The kind of tool that could cut through the side of an aircraft carrier?"

"No idea."

"Would there be something like that on board?"

"Maybe." The expression on Mulder's face seems to be saying, Maybe you could try asking someone who's actually an expert on aircraft carriers this? But he does answer, "Since Pearl Harbor it's been pretty standard to try and have something that can cut through a bulkhead somewhere on board."

Tim remembers his grandfather telling stories of being able to hear the men trapped in the ships that had rolled over. They kept tapping out distress codes, but no one could get through to them. Ships that could shrug off a depth charge were ships you couldn't cut through, not then. Eventually the tapping stopped. And according to him, being stuck, hearing them, unable to do anything, was the single worst part of the battle of Pearl Harbor.

Back on track. "You ever cross paths with Ender, Simmers, or Blake?" Tim asks.

"No. Clean records. Not even particularly close to each other from what I could get. But Ender was part of the engineering crew."

"Great. Three unrelated crew members vanish. One dead body. One injured NCIS agent. I've got to ask, is there any chance you slipped?"

Mulder smiles grimly. "There's always a chance, right? But there's a boot print on the back of my jacket that says it's awfully unlikely."

"Is that all bagged up and ready to be processed?"

"Yeah, I made sure the medics were careful about getting me out of my clothing. Everything's ready for trace."

"Good. Any security footage of that area?"

"No. I've got people going in and out of that hallway, but…"

"But lots of people go in and out, it's the actual doorway that you'd need footage of."

"Yeah."

Tim had one last question. "Is anything, besides the men, missing?"

"Nothing that's crossed my path. But, there's more than five thousand people here, and the Reagan's the size of a small city. Unless it was something we use all the time, no one's going to notice something missing."

"I get that. We got a case where shells were being stolen off battleships. Inventory was every six months. Deep storage. Took a long time before anyone noticed them missing."

"It's every three months here, and the answer to your next question is, yes, we just wrapped up the inventory ten days ago."

"Long enough to cut a hole and take something."

"If a hole can be cut."

"Okay, thanks, this has been useful."

"Yes, it has. Let me know what you find out?"

"We'll keep you in the loop." He shook Mulder's hand again, and gave him his card. "Hope you heal up fast."

That got a frustrated snort out of Mulder. "I'll be in this damn thing for another week. Doc's thinking it'll be three months before I'll get to the walking cast part."

Tim winced. "Sorry to hear it."

"You and me both. We're heading back to Norfolk. I was supposed to have shore leave this week. Now all I get to do is sit on my ass and read."

"Really sorry."

"Thanks. Well, go see if anyone cut a hole in the ship."

"On it."

"What happened?" Gibbs asked him when he finished updating the team on what he'd found out from Mulder.

Tim rubbed his temples, and pressed hard on the point on his wrist. Really not helping at all. (He checked his watch, only an hour until Jimmy and Ducky, and maybe some of those pills, would be here.) Only reason he hasn't thrown up again is because his stomach is already empty. "Every nightmare I've ever had that didn't involve Abby or Kelly getting hurt."

"I've seen you sicker than that and not lose it."

"I know." And he has been sicker than that, way sicker than that, and kept his food located inside his body until he found the head.

"So, what happened?"

"Maggots."

Gibbs squinted, remembering. "You hate them."

"More like terrified."

Gibbs sent him the keep talking look.

Tim rolled his eyes a little, and pressed the point on his wrist again. "I did acid in college, had a full body, full sensory hallucination of being eaten alive by them. It lasted eight hours of real time, and about three days of subjective time, and I could see and feel the whole thing. Walking into that was pretty close to a flashback and add in seasickness and the smell on top of it, and... honestly, we're all pretty lucky I didn't puke on the corpse."

"That's why you hate maggots?" Tony asked, stepping back from sending Ziva and Draga off to find out what sorts of cutting tools might be on an aircraft carrier.

Tim nodded.

Tony winced.

Gibbs just stared at both of them, not sure what to do with that.

"You really meant it when you said you didn't like them," Tony said.

"Yeah I really meant it."

"Can you go back there?" Tony asked.

"Put a gun to my head and I will, but..."

Tony nods. He and Gibbs have made McGee do more than enough shit end of the stick stuff over the years. He can get a pass on this one. "When Ducky and Jimmy head back with the body, you go with them. Phone records, financials, personal histories, all your usual stuff for right now. Take Draga, too, and go through each of the missing men's lives with a microscope."

"Thank you."

"And when you helio out, go around the ship, make sure there aren't any new holes in it."

"Will do."

"Good, Jethro, I'm not liking the vibe I'm getting off the XO when I started asking about what they keep back there. He's acting hinky. Time to go put the fear of Gibbs into him."

Orders in place, Tim found a quiet nook, took his computer out of his go bag, plugged in, and began to get the permissions he needed to start going through Ender, Simmers, and Blake's lives with a fine tooth comb.

Norfolk to DC is three hours. The helio ride from Norfolk to the Reagan was another half hour. So, they got there, called in Ducky and Jimmy twenty minutes in, which means they'd been on board for four hours by the time Jimmy and Ducky showed up.

By that point they'd made several suppositions.

A: Whomever was being eaten by the maggots was not Ender, Simmers, or Blake.

B: Ender, Simmers, and Blake were still unaccounted for.

C: There did not "appear" to be anything missing, but the higher ups were acting awfully hinky about something.

D: If they weren't on the ship, where the hell were they? (In the water, yes, great. With what? And where were they going? Middle of the freaking ocean, either someone had to pick them up, or they had to awesome swimmers.)

E: A Nimitz class aircraft carrier is only slightly smaller than a city

F: There are only (hahahahaha) 5700 people on it. And it's floating in the ocean, so compared to searching Lejeune… It's still a huge fucking mess, and this time they aren't going to get extra people to help.

By the time Jimmy and Ducky got there, Tim knew that Ender had been part of the engineering crew. Blake had been on underwater demolitions/salvage before joining the Navy. And last, but not least, Simmers had a sealed juvenile record for gang related issues, but had "gone straight" and joined the Navy out of high school.

He was reporting that to the team as Ducky and Jimmy joined them.

Without stopping his report, Jimmy handed Tim a bottle labeled Zofran, one of which he downed about two seconds later. And no, Zofran's not particularly good at treating motion sickness, (It's awfully good with morning sickness, which is why Breena takes it.) but Jimmy and Ducky both know it's extremely unlikely that the motion of the ship is the problem. Which is why the pill he downed is actually just compressed powdered sugar and baking soda, with a label for Zofran on it. Two hour long ride, more than enough time for Jimmy to put together eight placebo pills.

Tim wrapped up with the report on their missing sailors and Jimmy and Ducky were able to add one more piece of intel to the collection. There was indeed a rather non-standard looking hole, about twentyish feet above the waterline, a bit below what looked like a small deck protruding from the port side.

"It's really well hidden." Jimmy was saying to Tony and Gibbs. "You basically can't see it from the ship. You've got to be on the outside looking in, and it's on the side the planes take off of, not land on, so they wouldn't see it coming in," Jimmy said as they headed down the ladder toward the body.

"Great. Got a time of death for me, Ducky?" Tony asks.

"Anthony, I understand that you're taking after Jethro on this, possibly one upping him, but could you at least wait until I see the body before asking how long it's been dead?"

Tony smiled at Ducky. "Thought by now you'd be able to tell by the smell."

Ducky inhaled, deeply, "I'd say, Anthony, based on smell alone, assuming we are looking at the same temperature here as where the body is, that this is at least six days, if not longer."

Jimmy's nodding along, concurring with that assessment. "So, where is our John Doe?" He offers Ducky a hand getting down the last step. "And do we have a way to get him out of here more easily than the ladder?"

"Come, now Mr. Palmer, you know it's never that easy."

"No, Dr. Mallard, it never is. Lead on, Tony."

Draga nudged Tim. "They always that formal?"

"Only here. Off hours they're Ducky and Jimmy. Ducky would tell you it's useful to have markers that block off your work life from your home life, and especially when you do what they do, I have no reason to doubt him. It's a lot easier to live Rule Eleven if you've got a wall between here and home."

"Eleven: when the case is done, walk away?"

"Yep. That's the idea. Of course, that's a bit harder to do when you're, literally, married to your job the way we are."

"I can see that."

"Anyway, it's not going to take them all that long to get this handled. So get your stuff packed up and then we'll head down and offer a hand. Not fun to try and get a body up a ladder."

"Great."

It's not just a body bag that has to go up the ladder. Tim's not a great fan of moving corpses around, but he's done it. No it's the two buckets next to the body bag. Pretty big buckets, and what's likely in those buckets is making his body feel tight and cold, fear sweat creeping down his spine.

Jimmy sees the way he's staring at them, and it doesn't take him more than a second to decide what to do.

"Fish."

Tim looks away from the buckets to Jimmy. "What?"

"I don't know what the hell we've walked into, but the John Doe was lying on a pile of fish."

Jimmy's staring right into Tim's eyes, lying his ass off. Of course there are no fish, but Tim's freaking out just looking at the buckets the damn things are in, and being stuck in a van with them for three hours isn't likely to be pleasant, so time to double down on the placebos.

"Huh?" Tim stares at Jimmy, baffled.

"Yeah, weird, huh?"

Tim nods slowly, appreciating what Jimmy's doing, but wishing he was better with off the cuff lies.

"Lids down good and tight on those fish?"

"Oh, yeah, sealed up good. Can't risk losing them. May have useful evidence. Did you know scales don't decompose at the same rate flesh does, so it's possible we might be able to get prints off of them?"

"Good to know."

And, thus, both of them were a whole lot happier.
"Pill help?" Jimmy asks Tim as they head back to the ME's van.

"Yeah. Still off, but don't feel like I need to keep a baggie with me all the time."

"Good." Jimmy nods. He knows that's what Breena's told Tim they do for her. So, he's just fine with the results.

"Being back on land helps a whole lot more."

"Yeah, it would," Jimmy says as Tim helps him get the body lifted into the van, while Draga hangs way back, as far behind them as he can get, and still be part of the group.

The ME's van can carry eight people in great comfort. As long as six of those people don't mind traveling horizontally with less than fifteen inches of vertical space between them and the next person. But as of this point, no one has ever complained.

It's a little less comfortable with four people all of whom prefer to remain upright.

And it's quite a bit less comfortable when the reclining visitor smells the way their John Doe does.

The thing about a body bag is that it's designed to move bodies from place A to place B without the contents of the bag spilling all over.

They are not however, air tight. And while it is true they do have hazmat bags, that are, in fact, airtight, those bags are for hazmats, and if you use them for what is just a very smelly corpse, you end up paying the six thousand dollars to replace the hazmat bag out of your own pocket.

(And right this second, Draga's looking like he'd happily write the check to cover it, if only he had six thousand dollars laying around.)

Jimmy got the John Doe strapped in, and gestured for Tim and Draga to get in. Tim did. He's not exactly skipping to get in there, but as long as he doesn't think about the "fish" sitting next to the John Doe, he's okay. Draga looks in, goes white, and shakes his head.

"Can't do it."

"It's get in or hitch hike," Tim says.

Jimmy and Ducky had been settling who was going to drive, but Jimmy seems to have noticed what was going on with Tim and Draga and heads back to them.

"Here." He heads into the van, searches for a second, and comes back with a small tub of Vicks Vap-O-Rub. "In our job, the smell gives us ideas about what happened, but you don't need to be that in tune with it. This'll kill your sense of smell long enough for you to adjust. You'll get used to it."

Draga's staring at the tub. "What if I don't want to get used to this?"

Jimmy hands it to him. "Then you need to keep job hunting. At least once a season we get one that's in this shape."

"Welcome to the glorious world of law enforcement, Eric," Ducky says to him. "Now, in you get. We have to be off."
Draga got in, rubbing the Vicks under his nostrils. Tim took the tub from him. It's better than how the John Doe smells.

They're about a mile into the trip when Tim pulls out his netbook.

"What are you doing?" Draga asks.

"Checking to see if I've got the court orders that'll let me go through the missing sailors' financials."

"In the van?"

"Sure? All the 4G I need is on this thing."

"Not what I mean. You're in the back of a van, with a corpse, reading, and okay?"

"Yeah." Then it occurs to Tim what Draga's really asking. "It's just seasickness. I'm fine in cars. Not a big fan of planes though."

"Oh."

"They don't make me sick or anything. I just don't like them."

"Never been a problem for me."

"No. I'd imagine not." Probably not too many Naval test pilots who don't like planes. "You bring your laptop?"

"No."

Tim squints at him. If Draga's back up tech, they need to work on this. "They go over what should be in your go bag?"

"Yeah."

Of course they did. And they gave him what they carry because Tim's always got all the other stuff in his bag. "Okay, here's the version from the guy who actually does the tech stuff, and from now on, this is what I want in your bag, too: full set of clean clothes, three pairs of socks, three pairs of underwear, toothpaste, toothbrush, deodorant, razor, comb, comfy shoes, batteries for everything you use, fully charged. Batteries for everything they use, fully charged. At work, I've got two main computers on my desk and my lap top." Tim patted his netbook. "This little guy right here lives in the bag, it's not great for any heavy lifting, but can at least get the job started. Chargers for all the batteries/devices. Extra power cords. Note pad. Pencils. Pens. At least one highlighter. Five empty thumb drives. I go through them like gum, always restocking them." Tim pats his pocket and comes up with his clasp knife. "This one stays on you. Rule Number Nine, always have a knife, and one extra magazine for your gun. That's what's in a properly stocked go bag."

"Okay. This why your bag is twice the size of theirs?"

"Probably. For days like today, you want to have a clean set of clothing in your desk, too.

Everything on us smells like death right now. The jumpsuits help, some, but not enough. So, in an effort to not make the entire rest of the office sick, we go in with Ducky and Jimmy, grab some scrubs from them, hit the showers, bag up our current clothing, and honestly, unless I love it, and I don't love anything I'm wearing today, I just toss it, but if you don't mind the idea of that smell getting into your house, you can take it home and wash your clothing. Anyway, put on the scrubs, then up to your desk where you've got clean clothing."
"What about the stuff in my go bag?"

"When you get your sense of smell back, you'll realize why you don't want to wear it. Won't be as strong. Won't knock the people around you out. But you'll be able to smell it. Tonight, unpack everything and let it air out. Wash the clothing. Send it through twice before you dry it, because if you dry it smelling like this, you'll never get the smell out."

"I don't have any clothing in my desk."

"Won't be the first time there was a guy in scrubs working in the bullpen. I've done it a few times."

"What do I do now?"

"Think. If you were going to take something off an aircraft carrier. Something so important you'd cut a hole in the ship and jump off, what would it be?"

"Launch codes. Not sure why you'd jump off, though. Thumb drive, bury 'em in your phone or laptop, then just walk off."

"Right. So, what don't they want to be on the ship for?"

"No idea."

"Keep thinking."

They were an hour out of the Navy Yard when Draga said, "You've got the camera with all the pics on it, right?"

"Yeah."

"Can I see?"

"Sure." Tim fished through his bag, found the camera, and handed it over.

Draga spent several minutes going through the pictures. Then, sounding excited, he said, "Thought so!"

"What do you have?"

"See these boxes around the body?"

Tim's very carefully not looking at to body, so focusing in the boxes was something he was happy to do. "Yes."

"They don't look like the other boxes."

Tim looks closer. Box is a box is a box to him. He's not seeing it.

"Look." Draga blows up the picture, sounding really excited.

Tim's shaking his head. "Still not seeing it."

"The wood's different. Those crates are two by fours, the other crates are lighter. There's something very heavy in those boxes."

"Send it to Tony. According to Mulder, it's storage for raw parts down there, so for all we know there's extra anchors or something in there, but send it along anyway."

Draga got his phone out and started texting.

It was well after seven by the time he was back at the Navy Yard, scrubbed up, dressed, and back at his desk.

Draga had beat him to it, and was also at his desk (in borrowed scrubs. Tim resisted calling him Aqua Smurf.) on his computer, working away.

"Now what?" he asked Tim as he headed in and sat down.

"Now I email Tony everything I've got," Which was a heaping pile of not much. Financials, clean. Emails, boring. Phone records, the same. He'd already told the computers to start digging deeper, and come morning time he'd start going through what, if anything, they found. "And then I go home."

"Home?"

"Yes."

Draga's startled by that. "I thought we didn't go home when the case was hot."

"We didn't used to. I do now. I'm having dinner with my wife and daughter. I'm getting some sleep. And 'round about four, when I'm on pre-breakfast for Kelly, I'll turn the computer on and get at it again. But for now, I'm off."

"Okay."

"Call or text if you need anything."

"Will do."

"You're home." Abby sounded pretty surprised to see him when he walked in. Then she took a breath and winced. "And you got to play in dead bodies, too."

He put his go bag on the porch. "Yes, and yes. Another shower?"

She nodded, following him up to their room. "I was sure I'd be on my own tonight."

He would have kissed her, but he's guessing he's smelly enough it'd be unwelcome, so he said, "Unless it's literally life or death, I'm coming home every night," while stripping off. She grabbed his clothing and rushed them to the washer, and a minute later was back up in their bathroom.

"Tell me about it?"
So, in the middle of his third shower of the day, shampooing his hair, he did.

An hour later, he'd eaten, told her about it, snuggled both his girls, and decided that since four AM was likely his wake up time, that getting to sleep would be a good thing.

At nine he was asleep.

And that was Monday.
Tuesday began with crying. Tim's gotten pretty good at sleeping through the non-four-AM-feed-me cries. But it's his day, so the not very quiet waa waa feed me waa got him up and moving.

Get up, toss on a pair of boxers, head over to Kelly's room, pick up Kelly.

"Morning baby." He's still three quarters asleep, but this is getting more and more routine. (Though he's looking forward to this particular routine ending.)

"Waaaa!"

"Yeah, I know. Food's up soon."

He put her on her back on the changing table and got her cleaned up. Then he took her, and her bottle to the bathroom. He's got her snug against his chest, holding her with the one hand, while he fills the bottle with water (the powdered formula was already in there) then tightens the lid and shakes it up.

Normally, he'd head back to her room, get her situated in his arms, and then feed her while he dozes. Sometimes, when he's feeling really energetic, he'll hum a little to her, but for the most part he tries to keep it so both of them stay as far away from awake as possible.

But since he's not going back to bed, he takes them to his office, (Kelly fusses at this. She knows the routine, and this isn't it. Plus she can smell the formula, knows it's close, but it's not in her mouth, and this is not making her morning.) turns on his computer, and then gets her settled, bottle in mouth, (About time, Dad! I'm starving!) and gets to work.

He reads over what his search parameters have been returning. "There has to be something here. Three guys do not cut a hole in a ship and then vanish and have nothing to do with each other."

Kelly's staring at him.

Tim shakes his head. "Nothing. Big pile of nothing. No calls. No emails. No money…"

Gentle slurping and a confused look accompany Tim talking to himself/Kelly about this.

"They're on the ship together, so okay, they talk to each other, in person. Great. No records of that. But they got off the ship. So they had to have a plan to do something once they got off… What do you think? You hop off a ship. Why do you do it?"

Slurp, slurp. Dad, I don't know what a ship is.

"I know. Okay. So you hop off. Why? You've got something that'll go missing so fast that you can't wait the twenty-four hours it'll take to get to Norfolk." He thinks about that a bit. Feels right. "But nothing's missing. At least nothing they'll tell us about…"

He goes through the records again, looking to see if there's any links between his missing sailors and any of the higher ups on the ship. Nothing's jumping out, but of course, he's got nothing of the higher ups to compare anything to.

"Blackmail? They take something that'd make the Captain look bad? Hop off? He keeps quiet and then pays up. Back in port he gets it back…"
He starts to go upstairs to grab his phone, but Kelly squawks again, not appreciating this eat and go style of feed. "Okay, I'll let you finish before I give Pop a call."

He starts typing one-handed, requesting permission to search through the financials of the… XO… What was his name? Snader. That was the guy Tony was saying was acting hinky about this whole thing. See if he's made any recent payments to anyone interesting. See if he had the money to be worth being a target.

That really wasn't working. Yes, he can type one handed. Yes, he can feed Kelly one handed. No he can't do both at once at 4:17 in the morning without ending up with formula in Kelly's hair or every third letter wrong. So he pushes the chair back from the desk, gets a two-handed hold on his daughter, and feeds her while working different ideas.

By a bit before five, when Kelly was fed, burped, and settled back down, (Mental note: don't take her downstairs, it wakes her all the way up, and then he had to spend even longer getting her to sleep again. In seven hours, when he'll tell Jimmy about it, he'll just laugh at him.) he was really liking the blackmail angle.

That gave them a reason for why the XO was acting hinky. It'd answer why they couldn't find anything missing. It'd explain why they had to get off the ship. (Can't get information off a ship if the guy in charge of the ship doesn't want you to. Radio silence may not be the correct term anymore, but it gets the idea across. If the XO doesn't want anything getting off, he can make sure nothing gets off.)

And, by a bit before five, he'd gotten the clearance to do some hunting in the XO's private life, and found that not only did he have a pretty hefty sum of money in the bank, but he was also in the middle of a divorce.

So, playing hardball, the wife hires these guys to get some dirt…

Maybe…

He picked up his phone.

"Tim?" Gibbs doesn't sound particularly sleepy, but best he knows he's usually up and about this time of day.

"Yeah, just found—"

"DiNozzo's team leader, now. Call him."

"Oh. Yeah. Right."

He hung up, and hit Tony's contact info. Six rings before he heard, "McGee. It's five in the morning."

"I know."

"Not all of us are on baby time. We just got to bed two hours ago."

"Sorry."
"Can it wait until eight?"

"Yeah. Probably even more to build on then."

"Great. Tuesday is your day for snacks now."

"Fine. What's Draga eat?"

He heard the long low null of the dial tone and hung up.

Okay, so, nothing on the phone records. They aren't talking to anyone particularly interesting. Nothing in their emails. Nothing on the financials. He likes the idea of the blackmail but... He can't connect them to anyone. He can't even connect them to each other.

There's got to be more to this than that.

But he's done everything he can from home. He needs to get onto their own machines.

It occurs to him that he doesn't know if they even had Simmers, Ender, or Blake's computers or phones.

This time he texted Gibbs. Did we find phones and laptops?

Yes.

Okay. Gonna grab some food, and I'm heading in. What does Draga like?

Wheatgrass/banana smoothie, two shots of protein, B5 vitamin shot, RedBull chaser.

Wow. That was both an insane jolt and vastly healthier than anything anyone on their team was accustomed to.

Yeah.

When you heading in? He flashes to Gibbs.

Be there round seven. What'd Tony say to your idea?

'Tell me later.' He just got to sleep. Late night? He could feel Gibbs giving him the don't ask stupid questions look. See you soon, Tim texted and then headed to his room to put some more clothing on.

The coffee/snack cart outside of NCIS usually has a collection of agents around it, fueling up for... whatever it is they're going to do that day.

Jerry's known all of them awfully well for a good long time. He pretty much always has a pot on just for Gibbs, and he's got the rest of their orders pretty well down, too. So it doesn't take much effort for Tim to get everyone's drinks/morning snacks taken care of.

"You in early or staying late?" Jerry asks.

"Early. Have a feeling I'll be doing a lot more early and a lot less late these days."
Jerry nods, remembering. "Come on, picture time."

So Tim shows him baby pics, and collects up the cups and pastries, and heads on it.

Draga's still at his desk, still in scrubs, head on his desk, dead asleep.

"Draga."

"Mrghf."

"Got a smoothie and Red Bull."

One eye opens and their newest teammate looks at him. "Time?"

Tim hands over the smoothie and Red Bull, and then checks his watch. "Six oh three. Wake up enough to move, and then home, shower, change. You can work at your desk like that, but if we're in the field, you need to look up for it."

Draga nods, very slowly, pops the Red Bull, chugs it in one long swallow, tosses it, and then starts in on the smoothie.

"You ever hear of Caf-Pow?" Tim asks.

"Yeah. Too much sugar, not enough caffeine."

Draga waves a bit while heading off, sucking on the smoothie.

Tim unpacks Gibbs' coffee, Ziva's mango smoothie and blueberry muffin, Tony's coffee and bearclaw, and his own coffee. Okay, time to get into the evidence.

Technically there's supposed to be someone on staff 24/7 in the evidence lock up. But, budget cuts and all, so instead of a live person they upped to level of surveillance, and added weekly audits to the evidence logs.

So, he's in the basement, on his own, looking through the boxes, finally locating the one he needs. Two cell phones, three lap tops, okay, looks pretty good so far. Why only two phones…

He signs out the box and heads to the lab.

It's empty. Of course it's empty, it's six fifteen in the morning. Still, he's got the feeling that if he's here, Abby's supposed to be here. That's just how it is, right?

Except right now, it's not. And won't be. Until September.

He shakes his head. Work to do.

Normally he and Abby would set everything up, rig the cords he'd need, hook the computers up to work in tandem, and then go to town on them. But, she's not here, and the computers are… Working. On something. Something not his case.

And the workbench has stuff on it.

The workbench is supposed to be clean and clear. It should be a long expanse of gleaming metal, ready to work, not… What the hell is this? Evidence of some sort but… Looks like some sort of experiment on electroplating. Long metal wires extending over a plastic tank filled with some sort of liquid, things that could be coin blanks danged from the wires, submersed in the liquid.

He heads into her office, looking to hook into her private computer, but someone's got stuff all over there, too. Someone has been using Abby's computer, and for a second he feels a desire to go find said person and explain to them in extreme hard-ass detail that no one messes with Abby's computer, let alone…

Her desk! The chair's wrong. It's got a cushion on it. And… there's… pictures, but not of them. And… he looks around some more, Burt's missing! Burt should not be missing. Burt should be on top of the filing cabinet ready and willing to leap into action as a comforter for anyone who may be down here in need of a snuggle and laugh.

"Can I help you?"

Tim rounds on his heel ready to chew out whomever has the nerve to interlope down here, only to realize that, damn it, that's Zelaz, and he works down here, now.

"Where's Burt?"

"Burt?" Zelaz is looking at him like he's insane. No one named Burt is supposed to be in the lab.

"The hippo?"

"Oh." Finding out who Burt is is not alleviating the you're insane in his look. "We moved him to the expanded area."

"Why?" Moved Burt? No. No. No!

"Corwin kept playing with him, driving us crazy. Most of Abby's stuff is in there. So, can I help you… Agent McGee, right?"

Tim sighs, glaring a little. Zelaz looks pretty disturbed at that. Then he shakes his head and waves it away. "Yes. McGee, we met a few times before Abby had the baby. I've got computers and phones to go through. Usually I come down here, hook in, and do it on the table, but you've got… stuff, on there."

"Ah. Yes. For the counterfeiting case. How is Abby and your daughter?"

"Just fine. Sleeping when I headed in here. So… got phones and computers I need to crack. No place to do it." Tim's looking long and hard at the stuff for the counterfeiting. Isn't that something the Secret Service usually handles? Sure we got that one case… And what sort of moron counterfeits coins? Never mind. Not important.

"You have to remember, your team isn't the only one. We do process evidence for everyone here."

"Of course." Okay, this is just flat out wrong. Everyone else takes a back seat to their evidence. Things his team need done get done right this second. Someone needs to have a chat with these guys about this.

"But, if you want, there's two extra computers, and an extra table in the newer space."

"Thanks." He heads through the new door next to Major Mass Spec, quickly patting it, at least something still looks the same, and realizes that yes, this is pretty close to the set-up he's used to, though whoever did it wasn't paying too much attention to the lay out, both the table and the computers are facing the windows, so the sun is rising in his eyes.

Not gonna work.

He pokes his head out. "Zelaz, get in here."

"McGee?"

He's not usually the guy who tries to trade in on close relationships to people in power, but if I'm married to your boss can make this easier, he'll whip it out. "We're moving this. Anyone trying any real work here in the morning's going to go blind. Let's get everything unplugged and rearranged."

"McGee, I've got evidence to run and an experiment to monitor."

Zelaz does not appear to be understanding the unspoken context here. Tim tries again, putting a little more stress on the words, acting like he expects immediate compliance. Always works for Gibbs. "I'm sure you do. Give me a hand."

Zelaz is still staring at him, boggled at this. Apparently furniture moving isn't part of his job description. "Isn't this why we've got maintenance and physical plant guys?"

Tim takes three steps to the doorway, and grabs Zelaz by the hand, pulling him to the desk. "No. We wait for them it'll be three weeks before they get to it. We do it, and it'll take twenty minutes. Now give me a hand."

"But…"

"Are you running the evidence for Vance?"

"No."

"Is it a murder?"

"No."

"Dead body and three missing sailors trumps whatever else it is you're working on." Tim points to the cords. "Get unplugging. Sooner they're moved, sooner you get back to trace."

He's used to quiet for work like this. Once they'd get set up, usually he'll do the legwork, while Abby does something else. Sometimes they talk, gossip a little, (okay, a lot sometimes) but usually they both get into the zone and do their own thing.

Still, feels weird to be down here, by himself, breaking into these computers, and not hear her music, and the clomp of her boots on the floor as she moves from one job to the next.
Feels, just, bizarre, to not smell Caf-Pow.

And, honestly, it's kind of lonely to not occasionally feel a hand brush his neck, or to give her a quick kiss when he hits a lull of his own.

Burt's on top of the filing cabinet. "She'll be back in a few months."

Burt doesn't say anything. Tim gets up and takes a quick shot of him and Burt and sends it to Abby along with: Missing you.

A minute later, as he's breaking the password protection on the Simmers' computer, he gets one back. Miss you, too. Home for dinner?

I hope so. No idea yet.

How's it going?

Slow, this part always is. What are you listening to?

Right now, Kelly nursing. That gets a smile. The picture she sent him of Kelly looking awfully happy as she chowed down on breakfast number two gets a bigger one. Just put on Animal Collective.

Tim nods at that, and queues them up on his phone. Not his favorite, but it'll do. It's the kind of music he's got associated with 'working.'

Got 'em on. See you tonight.

Love you.

XOXOXOXO

By eight thirty, when he was fairly sure everyone else was in, Tim headed upstairs. By this point he'd dissected the computers and phones and found, once again, not much of anything interesting. No file marked "Secret Plan, DO NOT OPEN" or anything like that.

"Coffee's cold." Was the first thing Tony said when he saw Tim.

Great. Really late night. Tony's never much fun on four hours of sleep.

"Was nice and warm when I brought it in."

That got a glare. "So, since you've finally decided to join us, campfire time. Gather round."

So, gather round they did. The report in part looked a whole lot like when Gibbs was running the show, aside from everyone sitting down in their chairs in the middle of the bull pen.

The sum up led to this:

A: The USS Reagan had a five by two foot hole in the side of it.

B: That hole was located behind a stack of boxes in a deep storage area.

C: It can only be seen from the outside, (or right in front of it on the inside) so they had not more than two days of time where it'd be undiscovered. (Maybe less if someone had to circle around for a better landing approach, Draga added.)

D: The equipment needed to make that hole had been on board. It did not appear to be on board any longer. And cutting said hole would have taken close to fifteen hours. Letting the hole cool off so you could go through it safely would have been another three days.

E: They were no closer to having any idea if anything, besides the cutting tools, were missing.

F: The only things Simmers, Blake, and Ender seemed to have in common was an interest in computers games, a lack of friends, and a socially awkward personalities. ("Kind of like you, McNerd." "Stuff it, Tony.") All three were good, but not excellent, at their jobs. Besides one drunk and disorderly for Simmers, none of them had anything on their records.

G: The XO, Carl Snader, was definitely hiding something, but none of them knew what. (Tim's blackmail idea struck all of them as plausible.)

H: Next up, going to visit their homes, talk to next of kin, try to get more of an idea of what was going on.

They're getting ready to leave, but Draga's still staring at the pictures of the crates. "Something's just wrong about these."

Gibbs drifted over, looking at the shots on his screen, squinting. "Put 'em on the plasma."

Draga does, flashing them up. On that screen, they're practically life size. Gibbs looks them over more carefully. Then he point to the area on two of them where the cross planks are flush with the side walls. "Pry marks. These have been opened."

"Opened?" Tony says. "That's not good. There's not supposed to be anything in those anyone's ever needed to get into. Ziva, Gibbs, we're heading back to Norfolk to go over Simmers' place anyway. We'll swing by the ship and see what's up with that. McGee, Draga, you're off to check out Blake's place."

"On it." Tim said to Tony as Ziva and Gibbs grabbed their bags.

"So, let me guess," Draga says a few seconds after they pounded on the door, announcing themselves. "They never actually leave the master plan laying out?"

No answer, so Tim's picking the lock. "You know how to do this?"

Draga shakes his head. "Passed the class, but I'm bad at it."

"Have Ziva or Gibbs work with you on it."

"Not you?"

"You want to try to learn how to pick a lock from a lefty?" Learning how to do it from his right-handed instructors at FLETC hadn't been much fun. He'd gotten to the point of being mediocre at it. Give him enough time and eventually he'd get through the lock. Then one day, when Ziva was watching him grind away at it, she gave him a tip, do it with his eyes closed, don't worry about where your hands are, just feel it, don't try to see. That helped, a lot. But he's got the sense that he does it pretty much upside down and backwards from how right handed people do it, and they would have a hell of a time following his technique.

"Good point."

"And yes, sometimes they have left the master plan out, and we walk into it, but, in thirteen years, I'd say it's happened four times." He feels the last tumbler slide into place. "And we're in."

Draga's about to step in, but Tim stops him. "Tell me what you're seeing."

"McGee?"

"Before we go tromping in there, tell me what you see. What sticks out. What it makes you think."

"Okay…" Draga stares in. "Small house, one, maybe two people live here, tops." Makes sense. They're in a neighborhood of small, post-World War II bungalows. "Air feels stale. Hot. Air conditioning is off. No lights on. Shades are down. No mail." There was a mail slot in the door, but no pile of mail on the floor. "Whatever, wherever Blake is, it's not here." Tim nods in agreement. Of course, the foot tall grass, the lack of car in the driveway, and the fact that none of the neighbors had seen him in months also suggested that.

Draga looks around further, from where they are, they can see a small living room, part of a kitchen, and another doorway that probably leads to the bed/bathroom area. "No clock. No TV. Sofa, no chairs. One lamp, next to the sofa. No pictures on the mantle. No art on the walls. I've lived in DC for five weeks and have more stuff than this up. How long has he had this place?"

"It's been his listed residence since 2011."

"Great. Doesn't look like he entertains."

"Nope. Anything else?"

"He likes beige?" Beige carpet, lighter beige walls, darker beige sofa.

"Why not." Tim shrugs. "Let's see what else is in there. Keep telling me what you see and what you're thinking."

"Okay. Really hot in here." And it was. Only in the mid-80s outside today, but closed up house, no AC, full sun beating down on it, and it was sweltering in there. Draga looks around further. "Not getting anything else off the living room."

"Kitchen next."

They head in, look around. " Doesn't cook much."

"Maybe. He's been on a float for ten months. Might not see any need to keep any food in here that long."

"Not just bare pantry." Though the pantry is bare. No staples. "No microwave. No pots or pans."

"Could be in the cupboards."

"Not feeling it." Draga opens the cupboard, there are plates, bowls, glasses, and two pots. "This guy eats takeout, makes himself ramen now and again, and probably has a recipe for girlfriend spaghetti, and that's it."

"Girlfriend spaghetti?"

Draga smiles at him. "You've been married so long you don't remember that? It's that one recipe every guy has that he can whip out to feed the girlfriend that one lone home-cooked meal to prove that he's not completely and utterly helpless."

"Tony calls it camouflaged takeout."

Draga smirks. "Of course he does."

"You thinking there's ever been a girlfriend back here?" Tim asks. He's thinking awkward personality may be code for has never been on a date.

Draga's reserving judgment. "Let's see the bedroom."

As they're leaving, Draga looks at Tim, "What was yours?"

"Mine?"

"Your one meal?"

Tim shakes his head a little. He never had a version of girlfriend spaghetti (though he has, on occasion, engaged in camouflaged takeout). "I'm not now, or ever was, a great cook, but as my mom said, 'You're not a prince, and you're not a pet, so you've got to be able to feed yourself, now get in there and make dinner.' So, I can make an okay version of a whole lot of things."

"Your mom and my mom would have gotten along."

Tim shrugs at that, not wanting to get into it. "Yours?"

"My parents run a bakery back home. I make a mean quiche/soup/salad combo."

"That explains the cake."

"Yeah, I'm good with desserts, too. Worked every night, morning, and weekend in their bakery growing up."

"Where's home?"

"Portland."

"Maine or Oregon?"

"Maine."

Tim nods at that and opens the door to his left. Bathroom.

Draga winces. "That's just nasty. I'm voting no on any woman ever coming back here."

Like the rest of the house it's empty. Unlike the rest of the house tidy in here doesn't mean clean. Both the shower door and the toilet look like they've never been scrubbed, and Tim's devoutly hoping those rusty-brown stains all over the shower wall and the toilet bowl are, indeed, rust stains from hard water, and not something more... organic.
They do however find the first sign that at some point an actual person lived here. There is toilet paper on the spindle. One toothbrush, old tube of toothpaste, mouthwash, deodorant, razor and shaving cream appear to live in the medicine cabinet.

"Insight?" Tim asks.

"Guy's tidy. Puts everything in its place. Doesn't like to see clutter." Tim nods at that, sounds good. "Bedroom?" Draga asks.

"Sure."

Like the bathroom there are at least some signs of life in here. Clothing in the closet, more clothing, towels, and linens in the dresser. Alarm clock and lamp on the one night stand next to the full size bed. The mattress was bare, pillows with no cases on top.

Tim and Draga home in on the desk in the corner, but besides being set up for a computer that wasn't there, it's empty.

"So, no landline, no tv, no desktop computer. Either this guy is a luddite or his whole life is on his phone and laptop."

"We've got both at in evidence." Tim shows him a thumb drive he had in his pocket. "And I brought their contents along."

"Interesting. What's left?" Draga asks.

"There was a garage," Tim replies.

"Let's see what's in there."

It's a detached garage. Probably added after the house was built. Probably added recently. The siding is vinyl and the door is some sort of composite, both of which Draga points out while Tim lets him take his time going after the lock.

There aren't any windows, but there does seem to be some sort of ventilation system.

"Think he's a wood worker?" Tim asks. Only place he's seen an exhaust system like that is Gibbs basement, and Gibbs only fires that up for when he's working with his band saw to rip larger pieces of wood into smaller ones or when he's doing any sort of spray finishing.

"Nope."

"Keep talking…"

"Upholstered sofa. Cheap metal kitchen table and chairs. Ikea bed, night stand, and dresser. Particle board desk. Whatever he's doing in here, it's not wood working."

Eventually Draga got the lock open, and Tim eases open the door. They both stare into the shed, and Tim feels his mouth go dry. Draga's staring in the shed, and back to Tim, and back to the shed.

"Not good?"

Tim shakes his head. "Not good." He's got his phone to his ear before he's finished shaking his head.
"McGee?" Tony asks.

"Draga and I are at Blake's. We're staring at a shed filled with bleach bottles, gasoline canisters, empty Vaseline jars, and bags of what I bet used to hold potassium chloride."

He hears Tony groan. "How much?"

"There's," he counts quickly, "twenty one gallon-sized bleach bottles, and about the same amount of the other stuff."

"Great."

"You get to Simmers' yet?"

"No. We're just south of Richmond. Any fertilizer?"

"Not that I'm seeing."

"Anything else interesting?"

"House was empty. Barely looked like anyone had ever lived there. I'll send the pics when I get off the phone. Be careful when you get to Simmers'."

"You, too, Tim."

Tim started to shoot pictures of the interior of Blake's shed. Draga was about to step in, but he grabbed his arm, and kept him out. "Those are the ingredients for homemade C-4. We don't go in there. Once I've got pictures of everything, we call Vance, he sends the explosive experts, they take everything apart."

"You wait for the bomb squad?" Draga didn't believe that; maybe he's been hearing too many stories of their past exploits.

"I wait for the bomb squad, and you do when you're with me. When you've got your own team... But you don't, so we sit here and wait."

An hour later, they're sitting in the car, having roped off the place, and waiting for the bomb techs when Tim felt his phone buzz.

He checked; it was Tony.

"You finally get to Simmers'?"

"Finally. Wanna guess what we found?"

Tim sighs, of course this case has to get messy. "Nothing good."

"That's putting it mildly. Everything you need for homemade det cord. No homemade det cord."

"Wonderful."

"It gets better."
Tim rolls his eyes. "Really, how does this get better?"

"We've got twenty blank books filled with incoherent ranting, and biographies of every whack-job, school-shooter from the last hundred years."

Tim winces. "You're right, that's better. You contact the Reagan?"

"Yeah. We're starting to get an idea of why they might not have wanted to stay on the ship. They're getting everyone off, calling in the bomb squad, and getting off shore, more or less all at once."

"Once we get the bomb squad here, we'll head for Ender's."

"Okay. Keep us in the loop," Tony says.

"Will do."

It occurs to Tony, as they sit, on the dock, nice and dry, not in the middle of what is probably the biggest bomb they've ever seen, watching the feed of the bomb squad checking things out, that once upon a time, Gibbs would have decided they needed to be on the ship in the middle of this investigation.

Say, this time ten years ago, hell, five years ago, he probably wouldn't have been satisfied with the idea that just letting the guys who do this for a living clear the thing out, and then go in. No if they were going to be in danger, he'd want to be in danger, too.

Tony catches Ziva's eyes as the three of them watch the feed. She nods slightly, understanding his unspoken thought. He notices that her hand is on Gibbs' shoulder. Just a brief touch, but it seems (to Tony at least) to say, I'm glad you've hit the point where you value your life.

Gibbs squeezed her hand back, and then all three of them focused on the techs, who were opening the boxes where the body was found.

Tony felt his blood go cold when he saw it. They'd all been standing there. Right next to what looked like a good twenty pounds of c-4.

Ziva was already looking at the specs of the ship.

Below the storage area were the tanks that held the jet fuel.

The techs opened (carefully) the boxes above and to the sides of the bomb. They were filled with sandbags and concrete.

It was a shape charge, designed to force the explosion down.

By the time the dogs and the bomb techs were done, they'd found charges set across the whole ship. Twenty seven of them in total, set so the one would set the next off, and so on down the line, and it was only blind, dumb, excellent luck that the stupid idiot who set the damn thing up didn't double check to make sure his battery had enough life count all the way down to 18:10.
Unlike Blake or Simmers, Ender lived in an apartment. Which means, unlike Blake or Simmers, just looking at the place doesn't give a sense of how long it's been since someone's been around. Of course there are cars in the lot, other people live in the building.

On the upside, there is a landlord, who was able to tell them that he hadn't seen anyone go in or out, and that while the lease on the place was good until September, a month earlier he had gotten a letter from Ender saying he wasn't going to renew.

"He say anything about grabbing his stuff?" Tim asks.

"Nope." The landlord shakes his head. "Just that he wasn't going to renew the lease, and that everything was tidy if I wanted to show people the place."

"Okay. Mind if we look around?" Draga asks.

"No." It took a moment but the landlord came back with a set of keys.

It's unlikely anyone is there, but after what they found in the other two places, they're not taking any chances.

"Standard room clearing for this one. Go in, check everything first, then we search," Tim says.

"Sounds good. You in first or I?"

"I'm in first, you stay behind, cover me. Then you hit the next door way to your right, and I cover you, and on and on until we've gotten all the rooms."

"Lead on, McDuff." Tim turns to Draga, giving him a long steady look. Draga looks embarrassed. "It's a quote… From Macbeth…"

"Uh huh." Like Tony didn't hit him with that one at least once a year. "'Lay on, Macduff.' Don't do it again."

Draga looks a little sheepish. "Okay."

Tim hammers on the door, "NCIS, we're coming in," and leads on.

Once cleared, they found a residential apartment in the middle of an apartment building with nothing out of the ordinary about the place. There were pictures on the wall, enough furniture to indicate an expectation of other people being in this home at some point. Nothing to indicate a girlfriend or boyfriend, but family shots, and some pictures that certainly looked like buddies goofing around were visible.

It's just… normal. Really normal.

"Does this make any sense to you?" Draga asks.

"Not really."

"There should be stockpiled weapons or something here, right?"

Tim shrugs, looking around at a perfectly normal apartment. "I'd assume so. But nothing ever just fits into tidy little boxes like that. Maybe… Maybe he's a red herring? Maybe he's missing and it's unrelated."

"What do you mean by red herring?"
"They grabbed him to make us think it's all one big thing and distract our attention from the real thing... I don't know. This is where we head back, talk it out, and try to make sense of it."

"We still don't know who John Doe is," Draga says, closing the door to Ender's apartment.

"Good point. Let's get back."

By five thirty they were back, and campfiring again.

There was a schematic for the Reagan up on the big screen, along with the location of all of the charges the dogs had found.

Tony also had the detonator for the first charge on his desk. Tim had glanced at it, looked pretty standard. Nothing about it jumped out at him, beyond that ice down the spine feeling of knowing he'd been right next to it.

Tony sees him staring at it. "It was set to blow at 18:10."

"So, it was supposed to blow the ship sky high ten minutes after someone noticed they went missing?" Draga asks.

"Great." Tim's shaking his head. "It's a nuclear aircraft carrier with more than three million gallons of jet fuel on it, and they gave themselves an hour to get away."

"Fair to say, they didn't intend to swim," Gibbs adds.

"Yeah, I'd say no to that one. Something really fast picked them up," Tony says.

"Sea plane?" Draga asks. "Nothing on the water moves fast enough to get you far away enough from something like that. But, if you're in the air…"

Tim's eyes light up at that. "And if it flew low… might not hit the radar."

"Or might just look like a blip," Draga finishes.

"McGee…" Tony doesn't have to finish that sentence. Tim knows what needs to happen next.

"Already checking all the radar feeds from every ship in the area, as well as any flight plans that had been set. Draga, I want you checking every company that rents seaplanes, maybe, if we can get lucky twice, they rented a plane."

"How'll we know it was them?" Draga asks Tim.

"We won't, not to start, but let's get some leads."

"On it."

Tim was getting access to every radar feed he could find. He was sort of aware of the fact that Ziva and Gibbs had headed down to see what Jimmy and Ducky had found.

While he waits for the data he wants, he continues to go through the phones. He figured Blake's would be a very good place to start. And, as a start, he's sitting back and reading through all of the texts.

Minecraft. Great. Minecraft's fun and all, but Blake's a hardcore Minecraft player. Tim's learning way, way, way more than he ever wanted to about the game. (And yes, he does play, a little, every now and again. He's more a first person shooter/spellcaster gamer than sim games.) Blake keeps texting with MDeed about it, what they're building, where they're mining, when they're taking down the Ender Dragon.

He makes a note to hunt down MDeed, and keeps scanning the texts.

Two months back he sees a collection of texts from Blake to Simmers and back again. Apparently they were in leave in Cairo and were having a hard time meeting up. Then MDeed got into the text, he was also looking for them. Then it ended with one last text with them all meeting up at a Hookah bar.

He highlighted all of those texts and got them ready to go on the big screen. Might be useful, and figuring out who MDeed is went to the top of the list.

"Draga?"

"Yeah."

"How's the rental hunt going?"

Draga stares at him with dead eyes for a second and then says, "Do you have any idea how many companies rent seaplanes on the eastern seaboard."

Tim grins, happy that for once this isn't his job. "Nope, and I don't want to. But, focus down to Virginia and Maryland, that's home base for these guys. Anyway, while you're on hold, I want you to run this number: 555-124-9834."

"Okay." Draga holds up a finger. "Hello, yes, I'm Eric Draga with NCIS, I was wondering if I could speak with the manager of this shop. Yes, I'll wait. Thanks." He looks back to Tim. "Why am I running this number?"

"One of Blake's Minecraft buddies."

"Really?" Draga doesn't look very impressed by this, but he also doesn't ask what Minecraft is so, that's something.

"It's worth a shot. Blake, MDeed—"

"MDeed?"

"The buddy, all I've got is a number and a handle, and Simmers met up in Cairo two months back. Might be something."

Eric nods. "Hello? Is this the manager of Sea and Sun Air Tours? Great. I'm Eric Draga with NCIS… We investigate crimes involving the Navy… Yes, I'm a cop…"

Tim tunes Draga out and goes back to the texts. He stares at the ones where they were trying to hook up in Cairo, and then decides to check the personnel logs from the Reagan.

Blake and Simmers had leave, and hooked up with each other, and MDeed. Ender was supposed to have leave, but he covered a shift for another sailor… Maybe Ender was supposed to have been at the hookah bar, too…

He keeps hunting further back. It was a ten month float. Lots of time all in the same place.

Tim was buried in the texts when Ziva and Gibbs came back up.

There's a sensation, it gets him right in the back of the neck, a sort of cold prickle, that goes with pissed-off Gibbs. It's just… Pissed-off Gibbs somehow projects pissed-off, and does it hard enough that the people around him can feel it without him having to say a word.

And Gibbs is pissed.

Tim thinks he felt that wave of pissed hit as soon as the elevator doors opened.

Gibbs stalks back to his desk, and Ziva says, "We have a complication."

"Complication?" Tony asks.

"Yes. Jimmy and Ducky checked both the DNA and the dental records to make sure. Our John Doe is James Ender."

That got everyone staring at her.

"Been dead for at least seven days, too," Gibbs adds.

"He's only been missing for three," Draga says.

"Yep," Gibbs says slowly, nodding, PISSED!

Tony rubs his eyes. "Okay. We have three missing sailors, one of which died four days before he went missing? He showed up for his shifts, right? I mean, how does someone go missing on a ship for four days and no one notices?"

Tim's already got the personnel reports up, so he double checks. "He's listed as serving all of his shifts until he went officially went missing…" Then he laughs a little. "All of his shifts under Snader."

"That's why the XO was acting hinky? He was covering for Ender. Why? Ziva, Gibbs back to Norfolk, drag him up here, stick him in interrogation until he's ready to crack and then don't be gentle on him. Draga, how are you coming on those planes?"

"Seventeen rental places down. Fifty-six more to go."

"Keep going."

Ziva and Gibbs are once again gearing up. "Hold up," Tony barks. They pause, looking at him. "Ducky have a cause of death?"
Gibbs shakes his head. Ziva fills in the details. "Nothing conclusive. The maggots did too much damage to the soft tissue for Ducky to see what it might have been. The tox screen came back negative for all common poisons. Ducky's best guess is suffocation because there are no signs of trauma to the body, but the usual sign of that is petechial hemorrhaging and…" She looks to Tim, not sure he needs the details on exactly why they don't know if Ender had petechial hemorrhaging.

Tim finishes her thought anyway, cold creeping up his spine and settling in his joints as he says it, "But they couldn't tell that because he didn't have eyes anymore, right?"

"Yes."

Draga swallows hard.

"If he was stabbed or shot it was in the soft tissue. No spatter where we found him, but that doesn't rule out a gut wound," Gibbs adds.

Tony nods at that, and Ziva and Gibbs head off.

A minute later, Draga says, "I got that number for McGee."

Tim looks up from the texts. (The intricacies of obsidian creation.) "Good, what is it?"

"Pay as you go phone. Last transmission was at 18:00 on Saturday."

"Supposed to set the charge off?" Tony asks.

"Maybe. What's the number on that thing?" Draga asks, looking at the detonator.

Tony rattles off the digits.

"Nope," Draga answers, and before Tony could ask, he says, "And I'm finding out who that call went to."

"Can you find where it was sold, McGee?" Tony asks.

"I can try," Tim replies, meaning that, because it looks like this phone got used over and over for at least a year it was probably charged again and again, and if he could get the search warrant, and if he could get Verizon to play ball, and if it didn't get paid for in cash, he could get a credit card number to go with it. He starts writing the request for the warrant.

"What do you have on the radar?" Tony asks Tim.

"I've got the FAA asking me for a warrant. I've sent the note to Vance requesting he have a chat with them about letting me see what they've got. I've got the radar from the Reagan, with nothing on it. Nothing at all. It looks like they shut the damn thing off. And I've got the Navy being less than perfectly forthcoming about what was in the area and letting me see what they saw. Supposedly Vance is going to have a chat with Jarvis about that as soon as he gets done with the FAA. Normally, one of their ships almost blows up, we've got no problems, but they're being stubborn today. While I'm waiting for that, I'm going through texts."

"Okay, good."

"You got anything interesting?"

Tony's reading through Simmers' journals.
He looks up from the composition book in front of him to Tim and Draga. "Mostly I've got an intense desire to wash my brain out with bleach. This guy was ninety-five levels of crazy."

"How'd he pass the psych evals?" Draga asks.

"Good question." Tony reads a few more lines. "That's a really good question." He grabs the journals. "I'm going to visit Ducky. Keep hunting, campfire in an hour."

"Hi Abby."

Tim got a few minutes free from combing through texts and radar read outs and was using them to bolt down some food and call Abby. The FAA finally gave him the flight plans of everyone who registered one in that area for that day. Only 187 of them. Most he can glance at and toss out of the pile. For example, there's no way that 747 touched down. But there are a lot of little puddle-jumper type planes out for fun. And there are a lot of smallish private let's-go-on vacation planes taking people to the islands. And he's got to check each and every single one of those planes to see if any of them are capable of a water landing.

"Hey, baby."

"I don't think I'm getting home tonight."

"No?"

"No." He fills her in on what they'd found and he can feel that she gets this, completely understands, but still, it's his second day back, not coming home is disappointing.

"I've got to get back to it. Still got seventy planes to check out. And something's wrong with the Navy, Jarvis is stonewalling Vance about something. Or Vance is stonewalling us. Either way, they want answers fast, without telling us what's really going on."

"Wonderful. I'll see you when I can."

"Love you," he says.

"You, too," she answers.

He's sitting in front of Tony and Draga, all three of them reporting in.

"FAA is a dead end. Lots of planes, none of them could have landed on the water."

"No one rented a plane to anyone who looks like our three sailors." Draga adds.

"Okay, so they cut a hole..." Tony's tapping his fingers on the arm of his chair. "The found one hundred and twenty three pounds of the homemade C-4 on the ship. What if they weren't getting off, but getting it on..."

"That works," Tim says.

"Makes sense, you get one duffle of stuff you can bring on. And it's not like they check it, but even spread between three duffles that doesn't leave much room for your own kit. Plus you've got to store it, and, well, at least with the guys in my unit, you better not bring anything you didn't want them to know about onboard, because they were going to get into it."

"No privacy." Tony says.

Draga shakes his head. "Nope. I mean, sailors and soldiers have a reputation for stealing anything not nailed down, and they didn't get that reputation by accident. Though in my unit we called it 'borrowing,' because stuff usually found its way back sooner or later."

"So, they cut the hole, and then lower a ladder or something, bring the C-4 up. Simmers and Blake then stuff it all over the ship. Ender's dead. But he's still doing his job according to the XO. How does Ender tie into this?" Tony asks.

Tim and Draga shake their heads. "I got nothing," Tim says. "I can find texts going back between Simmers and Blake during every leave for the last two years. But Ender's the one I also don't have a cell for."

"Did he have one?" Tony asks Tim.

"According to his financials he was paying for one. I've got a number. I just don't have it popping up anywhere on Simmers and Blake's phones."

The three of them were sitting there, thinking, trying to put the pieces together. Something is missing. Something big. And without it…

"Splendid! I was hoping to find the three of you confabbing," Ducky says as he grabs Gibbs' chair and joins the circle. "The journals you gave me were fascinating, Anthony."

Tony just looks tired at that. "I'm glad you enjoyed them."

Ducky grins. "Oh, indeed. Those were the work of a very focused mind."

Tony stares at Ducky like he spent too long reading the journals and the crazy rubbed off. "Focused?"

"Oh, yes, Anthony. The author of those journals went to great lengths to manufacture the picture of a disturbed mind, but I am fairly certain he is not, in fact, a disturbed mind, at least, not in that direction."

"Keep talking, Duck-man."

Ducky does not appear to be thrilled at being called Duck-man, but he does, as Tony requested, keep talking. "The journals paint a portrait of a man suffering from paranoid schizophrenia, with a hefty dose of megalomania to go with it. They are letter perfect in their madness. The problem is, they're too perfect, too text book. In fact, a man so eaten by madness would be unable to function in any larger society. His conspiracy fantasies are so complete, so perfect, that if he had actually believed them, he would have been incapable of preforming his daily duties.

"According to Mr. Simmers' personnel reports and psych evals he was functional, as recently as the day before he went missing. So, the question is, why is he going so far out of his way to provide us with an image of madness?"

"Good question…" Tony trails off as they watch Vance head down the steps, over to the elevator, greet Jarvis, Vance nods at him, so Tony joins them and they head upstairs.
"The plot thickens," Ducky says.

"Oh, yeah," Draga replies.

"There was one other thing I found interesting in his journals. He repeatedly mentions a place, his 'safety nest' where 'no one will be able to ever touch me again.' I believe this place is real. He mentions enough clues to get a fairly good idea of where it is. However, I'm also sure that he wants you to go there, and that it is, at best, a waste of time, and at worst, a trap."

Tim sighs. "Give me the clues. I'll hunt it down."

An hour later, Tony comes down. Tim and Draga stare at him expectantly. He shakes his head. "Not allowed to say."

"That big?" Tim asks.

"Bigger. What do you have on the MDeed guy?"

"The cell was bought in Schenectady, NY. It's been refilled with 1000 extra minute every month. Those minutes have always been bought in the US, but pick a random Podunk city, and that'll be where it happened. Never the same city twice. All paid for with cash. With the exception of that last number called, it's only been used to call Blake. And something like 99% of the texts from it have been about Minecraft."

"Minecraft?" Tony doesn't know what that is.

"It's a computer game." Tim fills in. "You mine stuff, then you craft things out of the stuff you've mined."

Tim nods, that's a good way of describing it.

Tony's weary. "I've got a bomb maker with no motive to blow up his ship talking to another guy we can't track down, about Legos?"

"Basically."

Tony's head hits the top of his desk. "Shoot me now." After a minute, he pulls his head back up. "Tell me about the new number?"

Tim shakes his head, he wishes he had better news on that. "Also a burner phone. No calls to or from besides that one. If I had to guess, I'd say the ship was supposed to blow up, and when it didn't these guys stopped talking to each other."

"Great."

12:06 Ziva and Gibbs got back.
"What took so long?" Tony asks.

Gibbs growls.

"The Bay Tunnel Bridge," Ziva says it like it's the filthiest swear word ever. "We hit rush hour traffic on the way down, and it took two hours to go seven miles. Then on the way back, there was an accident. Four hours, just sitting there, under the Chesapeake, breathing in the exhaust of hundreds of other cars. And then, we finally get free, I finally get the car up to ninety, and we get pulled over by some..." Ziva pauses, not saying whatever it is she wants to say. "LEO for 'driving erratically.' And the badge wasn't enough, he decided he needed to actually check in with Vance to make sure we were legit."

"Snader in interrogation?" Tony asks.

"Yeah," Gibbs replies.

"Good. Leave him there. Let me get you two up to date." And Tony did.

"McSleepingBeauty."

Tim jerks when he hears that. It's been twenty hours since he slept. He wasn't actually asleep, just close. Tony was going over stuff he already knew, anyway.

"What?"

"You locate the 'safety nest'?"

"Yeah. Probably. It's either in Hampton Roads or Nebraska."

"No financials to back that up?" Tony asks, sharp, tired.

Tim glares at him, he's awfully tired, too. "If I had financials to back it up, I wouldn't tell you probably. Someone, probably MDeed, has a pile of cash, and they are doing this off the record. But, if you want a forensic accountant..."

"We're good." Tony rubs his eyes. "Okay, go home. Back at eight."

"Snader?" Ziva asks.

"I'm going in there." Tony grabs a manila folder at random off of her desk. "And I'm going to stare at him for a few minutes, look like I'm reading this, and then leave. We're going home in ten minutes, and he can spend the rest of the night in that room."

When Tim got home, Abby was up with Kelly, doing the 1:00 AM feed. He kissed both of them, walked, slowly, so tired, up to his room, stripped out of his clothing, and crashed into sleep.

And that was Tuesday.
Abby's jogging his shoulder.

"Mmmm."

"It's seven. Gotta get up."

He looks at the clock. Ten more minutes. He'll cheat on his shower. His hair doesn't really need to be washed. "Mrphgm."

He feels her lips on his shoulder. That's nice. Warm body pressed against his back is awfully nice, too, in a very comforting, sleepy sort of way. Then there was crying, and the soft, warm, pleasant weight of her body against his back vanishes. A very short bit later, he feels it again. Sort of. She's sitting back against the headboard. Her leg is along his back. She pulls the pillow out from under his head, he groans, and she uses it to prop her arm. That gets a half-awake glare from him.

"You've got to get up." Abby says with a half-smile as Kelly settles into her arms to nurse. (Something about being a nursing mom means she's not perfectly sympathetic to him being tired.)

"I know." He pulls himself up, spends a moment with his cheek pressed against her shoulder, enjoying the feel of her skin, his finger idly stroking Kelly's cheek. Then he levers himself out of bed and toward the shower.

He's brushing his teeth when he says to her, "I feel like I used to do this a whole lot easier."

"You used to have a sleep reserve."

He nods at her, heads back into the bathroom, turns on the shower, and gets in. Then he notices his toothbrush is still in his mouth, and that's not precisely the order he usually does this in.

8:03, the elevator doors open, and he's once again back at work.

And there is, thank… Gibbs (he thinks, he's not entirely sure what the new snack schedule is) coffee, on his desk.

Tony's already at his desk. He looks up at Tim. "Good. Come on, interrogation time."

Tony stands up, before Tim's even had a chance to get any of the coffee he's staring at longingly into his body, and says, "Draga, you're with us, too. McGee, I want you watching. Draga, you're with me. Just stand there and look disapproving. Don't say anything."

Draga nods.

Tim grabs the cup and follows along.

"And when I say stand, I mean it literally. I want you standing over him, little to the side and behind. He'll be able to see you in the mirror and his peripheral vision, but not dead on."

Draga nods again.

"You got a weak stomach?" Tony asks.
"Why?"

Tim shake his head. He doesn't mind being on the watching part of this interrogation. "He's been in there eight hours. Trust me, Gibbs and Ziva didn't let him have a bathroom break on the ride up. It's gonna smell bad in there," Tim answers.

Draga laughs a little. "My son didn't finally get potty-trained until he was three and a half. I can deal with wet pants."

"Perfect." The grin on Tony's face is ice cold.

Snader looked awfully broken by the time Tony and Draga got in there. Broken, jumpy, deeply ashamed. He'd been tidy about it, but there was a puddle in the corner, and the way he's squirming suggests he'd really, really like to get to a toilet.

Tim can't see the expression on Tony's face, but Draga's looming over Snader, looking at him like he's a puppy who just pissed on the rug, and he hasn't yet decided if he needs his nose rubbed in it or whacked with a newspaper.

Tony doesn't say anything for a long minute, then he carefully places the full color pictures of Ender's body in front of Snader.

"What I want to know is, how this man was, according to you, doing his job."

Snader just stares. "Who is that?" he finally asks, eyes glued to the pictures.

"Don't get cute."

His head shakes slowly. "Who… Is that… Ender?"

"Yes, that's Ender," Tony bites out. "How many dead men usually show up on one of your shifts?"

"But…" Snader's expression is somewhere between shocked and confused, and right this second, confused might be winning.

"You gonna tell me he's got an identical twin?"

Snader's jaw drops. "How long…"

"Like you don't know. So, what's the deal? Guy doesn't show up for five days, and you say nothing. Then suddenly you change your mind and report him missing? What's the game?"

Snader is still staring at the shot. "This is really Ender?"

"DNA and dental evidence don't lie. That's Ender."

Snader flips the shot over. "Not an identical twin."

"Huh?" Tony asks. He wasn't expecting that.

"I didn't report him missing until Saturday because until Saturday someone always showed up. If we had been on land, I would've laid into him, but… we were in the middle of the ocean. We weren't picking up new crew."

That throws Tim for a loop, he sips the coffee, trying to figure out the angle on this.

Tony says, "Back up. Someone worked all of Ender's shifts?"

"Yes." Snader's nodding. "Someone who looked a whole lot like him. The first time I saw him, I remember thinking, this isn't right. I kept looking at him. It was like he'd gotten taller maybe, skin a little darker. But we're at sea, more than a thousand miles from the nearest port. On land, where there's plenty of other people, fine, you see something like that, and you call it in. But, there are no other people. We were floating in the middle of the ocean. He knew the job. He knew his co-worker's nicknames and everything, got the in-jokes. He spoke the same way. Voice was a little too deep, but he had all the same speech patterns. He, just… didn't quite look right."

Tony rubs his temples, and Tim's texting this to Gibbs and Ziva, asking them to pull up James Ender's picture and run it through facial recognition, see if anyone interesting looks a whole lot like him.

An hour later, they're back in the bullpen. Ziva's got two pictures up on the plasma.

"This is James Ender." She gestures to the man on the right in the Naval Uniform. "And this Hiri Al-Said. Not his real name. According to the facial recognition software, the two are a ninety-three percent match. James' mother is Iranian. His father is an American. Hiri is believed to be Iranian, as well."

Tony hears that and jogs up the stairs.

Ziva and Gibbs watch him go. Ziva raises an eyebrow.

"He got read in on whatever it is the Navy won't tell us. Apparently, this is relevant to that," Tim answers.

Gibbs nods. "Al-Said's been on the terrorist watch list since 2009. He was captured once in Afghanistan, but got free after a few days. We've been looking for him for years without a hint of him."

"Any relation between Ender and Al-Said?" Draga asks.

"Unknown," Gibbs says. "We called Ender's parents, and Ziva emailed them the photo."

"It's 5:00 where they are. They're probably not awake, yet," Ziva adds. "What we know about Al-Said's life prior to 2009 is sketchy at best. And what we know about since is even less detailed."

"Wonderful." Tim's staring at the photos. "Don't terrorists usually want some credit?"

"McGee?" Ziva asks.

"We've got Simmers, who's trying to look insane. Make it look like this was the worst attack of someone hearing voices in his head, ever. We've got Blake, who's got the skills for it, but no motive. Ender who appears to have just looked right for Al-Said to hop in and take his place—"

"And do what?" Draga adds.
Gibbs nods, that's a good question. Why did Al-Said even need to be on the ship, let alone for a few days…

"It would have taken days to get all the charges in place," Draga says.

"Yeah, but Blake's the demolitions expert. What was Al-Said playing Ender adding to the mix?" Tim asks.

"Does engineering run security sweeps on the places they put the charges?" Ziva asks.

Gibbs, Draga, and Tim nod. If they do, that'd be an awfully good reason to have someone on the engineering crew.

"Is Al-Said MDeed?" Draga asks.

"Be a huge coincidence if he's not. Al-Said was supposed to have been in Egypt for a few years," Gibbs answers. Just as his voice trails off, his phone chirps. He picks it up, answers, nods, hangs up. "We're invited up to get the details on this."

So up they went.

Tim recognized the short hair and posture, but didn't have a name for the first few seconds. Then the man facing Tony and Vance turned toward them.

Kort. Trent Kort. Of course the CIA was involved in this.

The glass eye looked really good. If Tim didn't know one of them wasn't real, he wouldn't have noticed.

Vance gestured to the conference table and sat down, deep, weary, I'm-so-done-with-this-shit, clear on his face.

Gibbs is bristling at the existence of Kort. "More messes you didn't get cleaned up?"

Kort flashes Gibbs a wry smile. "In a manner of speaking, Agent Gibbs. More precisely though, this is an op we were running smoothly, and then the Army made the mess of it, and we've been trying to fix it for six years."

"Let's have it," Gibbs says.

"Hiri Al-Said, or as he was known once upon a time, Thomas Ender, the older brother of your James Ender, was recruited by the CIA in 2007. He was proficient in Pashtun and Farsi, with a mountain dialect we were in need of. We sent him in on a deep cover mission in 2008, and by 2009 it was clear that he wasn't up to it any more. We arranged to have him removed from his mission. The Army succeeded in getting him out. They did not succeed in keeping him out."

"Not up to it anymore, how?" Ziva asks.

"Stockholm syndrome?" Kort spreads his hands, indicating a mystery. "His sympathies were shifting in an inappropriate manner."

Everyone winced.
"He was 'captured' in 2009, and we had arranged for him to be 'transferred' to Gitmo, where we'd break his cover, debrief, rehabilitate, and probably return him to civilian life."

"And watch him for the rest of his life," Vance adds.

Kort nods tersely. "That was the plan. And it was going swimmingly until the Army fell asleep at the switch, his convoy was hit, successfully, and the Taliban managed to recapture him. We had three back up positions for reclaiming him set. He didn't use them. We spent a year trying to get him out, but he had gone deep underground. At that point Thomas Ender officially went from MIA to KIA."

"Oh…" Ziva's face goes white and her posture slumps.

"Agent DiNozzo?" Vance asks.

"We emailed his parents a picture of him, asking if they knew who he was."

Tim can feel the eyes on him. "No. I can't delete an email once it’s sent. I can hack their account to erase it. I can't promise to do it before they read it." Vance is staring at him. "Who's their provider?"

"Gmail," Ziva replies.

"I'm on it." Tim stands up, making sure he doesn't need to be there for the rest of this. Vance nods at him, and off he goes to try and unsend that email.

Half an hour later, as he's hitting delete, and destroying any trace of Ziva's email, the rest of his team heads down.

"Give me the short version," Tim says as he logs out of the David Ender's gmail account.

Tony replies, "Here's the short version. We've got a CIA-trained operative who joined the other team. The reason Navy wouldn't give us any info on what was nearby was because a several submarines that aren't supposed to exist were going to be very close to a certain aircraft carrier at 18:10 on Saturday. If something were to happen to those submarines people sympathetic to the Taliban would be very happy. If some maniac with a grudge and too much C-4 happened to be involved in taking those subs out, then certain other people would be embarrassed, and yet a third group of people wouldn't feel a need to bomb Iran in retaliation for it."

"So, this is war, not terrorism?" Tim says.

"Yeah. Fear's a great side effect, but that wasn't the tactical upside of this move. You get the email?" Tony asks Tim.

"Yeah. Mom and Dad aren't waking up to, 'Hey, guess what, your kid's alive and a wanted terrorist.'"

"You think they know?" Tony asks.

"Already got the request for permission to go through their phones and financials in the works."

Tony adds, "Vance has sent word to the LA branch. They'll be sending agents in to talk to the Enders in person. See if Thomas has visited them. Meanwhile we've got three missing terrorists. You said you found Simmers' Fortress of Solitude?"
"Yep," Tim answers.

"Gear up. Let's see what's there."

The Fortress of Solitude was a warehouse. Not a huge one. Probably fifty feet by one hundred feet. Just another flat-roofed cinderblock building among a bunch of other industrial flat-roofed cinderblock buildings.

They were careful about it. Drove by once just looking around, checking for any sights of anyone there. Didn't see anyone or any cars.

They took one of the non-descript vans. So it's them in a white van. Inside it, Tim's got the tech working, scanning to see if anyone is transmitting anything nearby. But there are no radio signals, no wifi in range. If there's a camera or something, it's transmitting by wire.

One more circuit, slow, looking like lost delivery guys. (Tony actually stopped the van and left a brown box on the door of one of the other buildings and then pulled them away.) No one spots any obvious cameras. Tim and Draga get pictures of the layout, and they take their time going over them. They're in the parking lot of the nearest coffee shop. Tony's inside, just hanging out, drinking his coffee, keeping up the appearance of a delivery guy, as the four of them huddle up in the back of the van, planning their attack. And like any layout, there are places that would make for a good ambush, and other spots that look like they were made for a trap, so at least they can avoid them.

One last step. As Tony pulls the van up close to the warehouse again, he hits the switch that jams radio, cell, and wifi transmissions. If someone is watching, they won't be able to just flick a switch and blow them up.

Unless, of course, that switch is hardwired.

Time to go in.

They clear it first, fast, careful, watching each other's backs and all around. But it's empty. Really empty.

It's just a warehouse, filled with crates.

And God alone knows what's in those crates.

Tony headed back to the van, killed the jamming, called Vance, let him know they wanted the bomb squad, and then turned the jamming back on.

"Experience is a great teacher. We've had four different cases where the perps tried to hide what they were doing with a fake wall," Tony says, staring at the wall in front of him.
"And you think there's a fake wall?" Draga asks.

"You're the one who sees everything. Tell me how big the outside of this warehouse is compared to the inside."

Draga trots outside, eyeballs the warehouse, and then heads back in again.

"You're right."

Tony rests his hand against the wall. "Think if we go knock on this, we'll find at least one section, maybe all three, are hallow and hiding goodies."

Draga knocks, and it does sound hollow. He, Gibbs, and Tony start hunting for the latch. There has to be a way to open this.

Draga spots it, high up, just where the wall meets with the support beam. He stretches up onto his toes, pressing into it, as Tony yanks on his arm, saying "Wait." He and Gibbs and Tony all heard a click as the wall swung out, and then a much softer snick sound.

Tim isn't paying much attention to what Tony and Draga and Gibbs are doing. He's getting pictures of the whole layout. Hundreds of boxes to go through. Any of them could be filled with C4.
Gasoline canisters toward the back wall, lots of them, and from the smell of it, they aren't empty.
He's sure bleach and petroleum jelly's around here somewhere, too. He and Ziva are very carefully going through, mapping everything out, looking for tripwires, pressure plates, anything that could spell disaster.

Draga heads out, looks around, and then goes back in, calling out, "You're right."

He gets a few more shots and then feels his blood go cold when he hears Gibbs yell at the top of his lungs, "Tim, Ziva, run!"

He doesn't hesitate. His body is running before Gibbs has even finished the words, moving as fast as he can to get away.

"McGee, go." "Get out of here, McGee." "Go on, McGee. Go!" Many variations, many places, many dangers, but one thing has always remained constant. That's the one order he has never, ever obeyed.

Until today.

And he hates it. And he's got no idea how he's going to live with himself if whatever set off Gibbs hurts them.

But he's running, because, in the end… Because this won't be the end, not for him, not today. And because no matter how well earned it is, a name, a pension, a badge, and a flag are not enough.

Each pounding step, getting him closer to cover, is a promise to Abby and Kelly, that no matter what, he will come home to them.

He's a husband and a father and that comes first, but right now, hiding behind the cinderblock wall of the nearest building, begging God that his loves come through, son and brother aren't very far behind.

There was a slithering roar, and he doesn't know what that is, but it scares the hell out of him, followed, maybe two seconds later, by a blast that left his ears ringing, his heart pounding, and though he's ashamed to admit it, he wet his pants, too.

He pulls himself up, looks around the corner, sees the ruined building, crumbled walls, smoke pouring through the shattered roof, flames dancing between curtains of black, and collapses, sobbing.

No way anyone got out of that.

The second he hears the snick, Tony knows it's a trap.

It's a stupidly easy trap. Open the wall. If you know it's trapped you only let it open an inch, slip the pin off the string, and then then the detonator doesn't go off.

Stupid, stupid, stupid. Beat Draga up later, if you live.

It didn't blow the second they heard the snick. Angels on your side. Hope today isn't the day your luck runs out.

McGee runs away from it.

Ziva runs toward them.

"Go!" Tony's screaming it, can't see how it works yet, hoping there's a shot of killing it before it kills them. But she's by his side.

"You go. I go."

"Fuck."

Timer, counting down, fifteen seconds. No time, not nearly enough time to figure the damn thing out and dismantle it.

"It's a detonator." Gibbs has the knife out, getting ready to cut wires, at this point it's just a blind hope that he'd get the right ones, and Tony knows it's just a hope and a prayer.

It's a detonator.

He grabs Gibbs' hand. Detonators work by making a smaller explosion that sets off the bigger one. It'll blow, maybe hurt them. But if it blows the C-4 tucked into that wall, it'll kill them.

Boxes all over the place. Who knows what's in them. Wall of C4 next to them.

"Fuck it. You can only die once." Tony grabs the detonator, yanking it out of the wall of C-4, and tosses it as far as he can.

Tim wasn't ashamed of the fact that when Tony found him, he was rocking back and forth, sobbing.
The only thing he was sure of, no way they came through, and the pain of that, the shattering, crashing, searing pain left him unable to do anything but sob.

Tony dropped down next to him, wrapping his arm around his shoulders, and said, very loudly, his ears are fucked right now, "Booby trapped with a bomb. You ran away. Ziva ran to us. Second after you left, I said, 'Fuck it, you can only die once,' and threw the thing as far as I could while we hugged the floor. Think I blew the gasoline. Big rush of fire went straight over us. Kind of cool really."

Tim's staring at him, eyes wide, tears streaming down his face. Then he grabs Tony, pulling him into a full body hug, clinging onto him.

"Looks like only a few of the boxes had explosives in them. That went next. Big boom. Haven't heard anything since. C-4 next to us didn't blow, thank God. Ziva's splinting up Gibbs, he might have broken his ankle. Blast picked us up and threw us. And Draga's pretty stunned, got him lying down. But everyone's alive. None of us can hear. You think you could call 911?"

Tim nods, taking as many deep breaths as he can, trying to pull himself together.

He holds onto Tony, hands on his shoulders, testing, making sure he's in one piece. Tony flashes him a lopsided smile, and then crumples.

Tim's frantically frisking him, trying to figure out what's going on, but his eyes slowly open, his focus shaky. He looks up at Tim and says, still very loud. "I think something hit my head."

Tim nods. He doesn't try to talk to Tony; he can't hear or read lips. Tim just gestures with his hands, trying to get the idea of stay lying down across, and hopes he does. He spends a full minute pounding on his phone, cursing at it, slamming his fingers down on the screen, as if hitting the numbers extra-hard will make the call go through faster, but nothing happened.

Then he remembers the jammer and sprints to the van, rushing in, slamming off the jammer, and calling with both his cell and radio for all available back-up.

After this sort of accident, usually agents aren't allowed back on the case until they've been medically and psychologically cleared.

As the only one of the group who got clear of the explosion, Tim's answering a lot of questions.

First there were the questions of the first responders, mostly EMS, but Fire, too. Lots of what happened, who's hurt, how bad, questions. Mercifully, there was a minute between them and the first wave of the NCIS techs hitting the scene, where he could get cleaned up.

Then there was everyone out of Norfolk, several members of the local PD, and eventually half of the DC branch of NCIS all milling about, wanting to do their job, but the explosions set the place on fire, and they had to wait for the fire trucks to get done. And Fire had to wait for the bomb squad, because burning building filled with C-4 was nothing anyone wanted to walk into. So, instead of investigating the place, they're investigating him, peppering him with questions.

But once EMS got Gibbs in an ambulance, he hopped in, too.

Which means now he's in the emergency room, near his team, but still answering questions. Vance is standing next to him, getting the play by play. Tim thinks he's doing a pretty good job of it, though he's not really there. He's staring at the beds where Gibbs, Ziva, Tony, and Draga are, willing the doctors to show up faster, get answers quicker, and tell him his loves are going to be okay.

Ziva's announced (loudly) to everyone who will listen that she's just fine, nothing wrong at all, but she hasn't been cleared. (Apparently both Tony and Gibbs jumped on her to try and keep her safe.) She's being kept for observation for right now, making sure that she's not so high on adrenaline that she just can't feel the pain.

Gibbs has been into X-ray twice. His left knee and ankle are... They don't know yet. X-rays aren't back. But his leg is splinted and propped up, ice on his knee and ankle, pain-killers dripping through an IV into his arm. He's dozing.

Tony's on his bed, laying there, looking awfully listless. Ziva's holding his hand. Tim knows that the current diagnosis is mild concussion, but they're taking him for a CAT scan whenever the scanner gets free.

Draga's sitting on his bed, looking shell-shocked, also diagnosed with mild concussion, holding his phone, staring at it.

After yet another question, Vance is either satisfied or has given up on trying to get useful information out of Tim. (If he was paying less attention to his team and more to Vance, he might know which of those two options is correct, but he wasn't, so he doesn't.) And Tim's able to return to his team.

None of them can hear, so he doesn't try to talk to them. He holds Gibbs' hand for a moment, but he's out for right now, so that's more to comfort him than to comfort Gibbs. More than any words, any sight, the touch of real, warm flesh is proof of life.

A nurse takes Tony for his scan, and Ziva goes with him.

He sits next to Draga's bed, using Ziva's as his seat. Draga's still staring at his phone. Tim can see the screen is shattered. He takes his own out, still working, and wrote on it. Use it. Text whoever you want.

"Want to hear my son's voice." Also loud. He probably thinks he's whispering, but he's not.

Not until you can hear. Can he write?

"Just his name."

Skype? See him for a bit?

Draga shakes his head, looking very sad. "He's in daycare right now."

Tonight, then.

"Not until we can talk. His mom sees I'm hurt, she'll use it against me in the custody case. Say my job is too dangerous for me to be allowed to have custody."

I'm really sorry.

Draga nods at that.

"Mr. Draga?" a nurse asks.
Tim nudges Draga, who looks at the woman. She's got a whiteboard with her and writes on it. "We're ready to take you for your scans."

He nods, hands Tim the broken cell phone, and waves as she and a few others in scrubs push his bed away.

He goes and sits next to Gibbs again. Holding his hand, watching him breathe, trying to not think about the blast. Second time in his life he's been a whole lot closer to an explosion than he's wanted to. Even behind a cinder block wall he could feel the force of it. Sound that tore through him, made his bones vibrate. He doesn't want to think what in the middle of it was like.

He looks at his own phone, thinking of calling Abby, but doesn't. She'll worry. He's at least three hours away, no matter what. And that's bullshit because when it comes down to it, if he tries to talk about it right now, he'll cry, and he doesn't need to be doing that in the middle of the emergency room, not when he's literally the last man standing on his team.

They're all alive. They're fine. (Maybe. Tony's being scanned to make sure his brain isn't bleeding. Draga's being scanned to see if his ear drum ruptured.) They're in a hospital with doctors hovering over them. They'll heal.

He supposes right now, if he was the uninjured one, Gibbs would be up, single-handedly solving the case, making sure the bad guys didn't hurt anyone else.

But Tim isn't Gibbs. And maybe it's just his conscience making him feel better about not jumping up to solve this, but he's feeling pretty sure that wherever Blake, Simmers, and Al-Said/Ender are, they're not about to do anything else. Not for right now. Not if madness is a front and they prefer military targets that require top secret clearance to find.

His phone buzzes. Vance. Fires are out. Got teams collecting evidence.

_Good. Make sure they get photos of everything and send it all home. First thing tomorrow morning, I'll start on it._

_Tomorrow?_

_Gotta make sure my team's in one piece. Do you know how Ender knew the subs were there?_

A minute goes by. _I'll ask Kort._

_Thanks. Might get us a better handle on how to find them. Keep an eye out for traps. He can feel Vance rolling his eyes at that._

_See you tomorrow._

He takes Gibbs' hand in his again.

"Not dying, Tim," Gibbs says, turning to look at him, too loud.

_I know._ Tim signs back.

Gibbs looks really startled by that, and then starts something fast and complicated, and Tim can't follow it.

_Slow. Learning. Can you hear?_
Everything's... Another sign Tim doesn't know. Gibbs sees he doesn't know it. "Buzzing. Loud."

Okay. Tim doesn't know the sign for X-ray or scan so he spells it out. X-R-A-Y not back yet. They don't think your knee is broken. Not sure about ankle.

Not broken. Doesn't hurt like broken

He figures Gibbs would know. Then he notices what Gibbs signed. Are you hurting?

Yeah.

More medicine?

No. Don't want... More signing Tim's not following.

He shakes his head, letting Gibbs know he's lost again. Better signing than reading sign.

You think? Slower, more deliberate hand gestures. Tim still doesn't know what they mean. "Don't want to get loopy."

Only thing you are doing tonight is coming home with me and sleeping. Take the pain medicine.

"Tim."

Tim hit the call button. I am leader until Tony's cleared. You are on the bench.

Gibbs looks past Tim and sees only Ziva's bed is still on the floor, and none of the rest of the team is next to him. Tony?

Tim fills him in on the other three. By the time he'd done that, another nurse had come around.

"What's going on?" she asks.

"He's still hurting."

Gibbs glares at him and the nurse, but doesn't say anything until directly asked, "On a one to ten scale, what's your pain level?"

He thinks about it. "Five-six."

"Okay, we'll get you some more pain medication."

"Thank you," Tim says to the nurse.

Happy? Gibbs signs at him.

There are a lot of lovely, sarcastic responses Tim could say, but Gibbs wouldn't hear them, and just lip reading them doesn't get it across the way voice does. There aren't a lot of lovely, sarcastic responses he can sign back. So he settles for, Yes.

It's another twenty minutes before the Orthopedic specialist shows up with Gibbs' leg scans. Gibbs is laying in his bed, drifting, whatever they're giving him is hitting him pretty hard.
"Mr. Gibbs," the doctor offers her hand. "I'm Sarah Grunwelt." Gibbs slowly focuses on her. "The good news is you don't have any broken bones." She can see Gibbs isn't really all there. She looks at Tim. "Are you next of kin?"

"Yes. I'm his son." It won't hold up if anyone investigates, but he doesn't think anyone will. He's the right age, in the right place, and Gibbs isn't disputing it, so no one should ask any questions.

"Okay. Nothing is broken." She puts the X-rays up on the light board. "It looks like something large and hard hit him here." She turns back to them and circles the area between Gibbs' ankle and calf. "It's a very deep bruise." Yes it is. Tim can see it. They cut the leg of Gibbs' pants off, and he's looking at a patch of purple-black larger than his hand, blue, green, yellow extending from his ankle to his knee. "And it'll really hurt, but it should heal up just fine. His knee is more of a problem. Do you know what an ACL or a PCL is?"

"Yeah." Anterior and Posterior Cruciate Ligament, the main bits of tissue that keep the knee stable. New and better ways to deal with ACL blowouts was one of the issues they actually played with back at Johns Hopkins. "Degree in Biomedical engineering." Dr. Grunwelt looks surprised by that. He's a cop, in his NCIS gear, with a bunch of other cops, biomedical engineering wasn't anything she would have assumed he'd know anything about. ACL blow outs from sports or the job, sure. But not that he'd have studied it.

"Okay. His ACL and PCL aren't torn, but another ounce of pressure and both of them would have gone. They are both very strained, and right now, any little thing will rip them free. I get the sense your dad's not much of a laying around sort of guy…"

Tim looks amused and shakes his head. "No. He's not."

"Then glue him to his sofa. Use duct tape if you have to. His knee needs time to heal up. To heal all the way. At his age, you blow those ligaments and you're looking at a lot of pain, a lot of surgery, and limited mobility for the rest of your life."

Tim nods.

"We're going to get him fitted for a brace for his knee and some crutches, but unless he's absolutely got to move, like going to the bathroom, I want him sitting or lying down for the next week."

Gibbs winces, letting them see that he has been following the conversation to at least some degree. The Doc sees he was paying some attention, so she turns to him. "You think a week is bad? You get up too soon and wreck those ligaments, you'll be on your back for six months, maybe a year, and you'll walk with a cane for the rest of your life. Are you going to give your son any trouble about resting?"

Gibbs shook his head.

"Good. And when that week is up, you are going to take it easy. No running. Limited walking. Not too much standing if you can avoid it. You're not going back to running down bad guys for at least a month, got it?"

Gibbs nods as that, too.

"Until the bruising goes down, the brace isn't going to be very comfortable. We'll give you pain medicine to deal with that, and when you're awake and laying around, you can take it off. But anytime you're going to move, and when you're sleeping, I want that brace on. I do not want you rolling over in your sleep and tearing your knee up."
And yet another nod.

"Okay. I'll print up a full set of instructions. You guys live near DC right?"

"Yeah." Tim answers.

"I'll add a few recommendations for follow up care."

"Thank you."

From there Gibbs napped. Tim sat next to him, waiting for his team to get back. But no one showed up.

He's feeling fidgety, wanting to do something useful.

You still at the scene? He sends to Vance.

A minute later he gets back. Yes.

Send me the pictures. Tell me what you're finding.

Thought you were off until tomorrow, making sure your team's in one piece.

I'm multi-tasking.

He can imagine the look that gets. Good. So far all we've got is smoke, soot, broken crates, reams of soggy paper, and enough C-4 and stuff to make C-4 to take out the block.

Great. What's the paper?

If it wasn't torn to bits from the explosion and water-logged from putting the fires out, I might know. Right now, it's paper mache. The lab might be able to get something useful off of it.

Even better. Any news from the LA guys talking to Ender's family?

Not yet. It's only eleven there.

Okay. I'm looking through the pictures and going over the contents of Blake and Simmers' computers and phones.

Updates on your end?

Gibbs is off his feet for a week. Limited mobility for a month after that. No news on Tony. Ziva's with him. Draga's just getting wheeled back.

Let me know when you know how they are.

Will do.

Draga was cleared with a mild concussion and a ruptured left ear drum. He was told to head home, take it easy, and if he got a bad headache that he needed to get back to the emergency room, fast.
"When can I go back to work?"

His doctor shrugs. "Tomorrow, if you feel up to it. But resting is probably a better idea."

Draga doesn't look like he wants to rest.

Ziva was cleared as being fine. Bumped and bruised up, but her hearing would be back to normal in a few hours.

Tony didn't get cleared. Mild concussion was actually a contusion, that would, probably, be okay, but they wanted to keep watch on him overnight, make sure the swelling went down instead of got worse.

So, by four o'clock, instead of closing in on Ender, Blake, and Simmers, instead of resting in the morgue, instead of all the thousands of other ways today could have gone, he's hugging Ziva, squeezing Tony's knee, saying goodbye, that he'd see them soon, and getting ready to drive Gibbs and Draga back to DC.

Bit before seven, they're back in DC, and he stops short of the Navy Yard, pulling into the parking lot of Gibbs' favorite diner. Both Draga and Gibbs are looking at him curiously.

"Both of you, stay put."

Draga shakes his head, not willing to ponder the mystery out loud. Gibbs just settles back into his seat. Ten minutes later, he's back with food for all three of them.

"Thought we could use some food. I'm starving." He looks to Draga. "I don't want you driving home without any food in your system." His gaze switches to Gibbs. "And the Docs don't want you taking your pain meds on an empty stomach."

Draga opens his box and sees a huge club sandwich, chips piled high next to it, and a crisp, green pickle spear. "How'd you know what I wanted?"

"Not a clue. I told Elaine it had been a really hard day, and she had three guys in desperate need of food, two of them walking wounded, and gave her a hundred. Ten minutes later, this I what she gave me."

Gibbs smiles. Then opens his box, finds a bowl of chicken soup, rye bread toast, little butter, and scrambled eggs. Same thing his mom used to make for him when he was sick. And a huge travel-sized cup of black coffee, which she didn't, but Elaine always sends with his food when he gets take out.

"Who's Elaine?" Draga asks between bites.

"Gibbs found her years ago. She's his psychic waitress friend."

"Like Vincent."

"Who?" Tim asks between bites of his burger, a perfect warm-pink medium, with lots of bacon and lots of fresh tomato. It'd been in a box with fries (very salty, thank you Elaine!), piece of apple pie (which he doesn't usually eat, but had been craving) and a tall, ice cold Coke (also not something he usually goes for, but loves with a burger). He's half paying attention to Draga while texting Abby, letting her know he should be home in forty-fiveish minutes and has already had dinner. He debates telling her Gibbs is coming home, too, but decides not to. When they get home is soon enough to get into it.

"Café Diem? Eureka?"

Tim's shaking his head.

"Cool TV show from a while back."

"Oh."

He got Draga to his car, and made sure to get a promise out of him that if he started to feel sick or wrong or out of it or anything, that he'd give them a call.

Draga seemed mildly amused at the mothering, promised he'd call if he took a turn for the worse, and slipped into his Charger to head home.

Tim pulled the van to right next to the roadster, headed to the side, and got Gibbs out. Gibbs looks like he might be about to protest being coddled like this, but Tim's glare cut him off. So he quietly leaned against Tim, and hobbled to the side of his car.

"I'm going to check the van in, and then I'll be back."

Gibbs nods.

Two minutes later, they were heading home.

Gibbs dozed most of the ride home. He jerked awake when they went past the exit to his house heading toward Tim's.

"What are you going to tell her when we get home?"

"The truth."

Gibbs doesn't seem to like that idea. He's got a wary look in his eyes, and he says, "Bad plan, she'll get scared and worry."

Tim shakes his head. "You think she can't tell when I'm lying? She'll let me do it if it's something minor like a surprise, but she always knows. If I try to tell her you tripped down the steps coming down from MTAC, she's going to know I'm lying, and then she'll be scared, worried, and mad because I'm lying to her. Not going to do it."

"She'll cry."

"So? I will, too. We all almost died today. I thought I lost all of you. For a full minute…" He doesn't finish that. If he finishes that, he'll flash back to that minute, and he's still got to drive. "That's worth a few tears. I'm the husband. It's my job to handle the tears. You don't want to see it, you don't have to. I'll get you set in my office. I've got a good sofa in there. It was supposed to be a bedroom, so there's a door between it and the downstairs bathroom, so you won't need to use the stairs at all."

He's not sure what that expression is on Gibbs's face, but he doesn't say anything one way or the other about going straight to sleep after getting to Tim's house.

Tim knows what he wants to be doing. Felt it the second he walked through the door and saw Abby on the sofa nursing Kelly. She didn't look up that first second he was in the door, expecting just another night, and for that second, he's watching her, on the sofa, shirt open, their daughter against her breast and that yesnowalivefuck, your body, mine, up against the wall, hard and fast and more than anything else NOW! sensation pounded through him so hard it made his knees weak.

It's not sexual desire. Not exactly. Sex is how it's expressed. He wants her. Wants hard and hot and fast and wet and her and again HER and right now.

But it's not sex, not really. He's not hard (though a kiss, or hell, good eye contact would probably take care of that) and usually this level of want goes with hard. Usually this level of want goes with thrusting and leaking and hot and slick and moaning, moving faster and faster and aching, heavy, hard, pleasure-pain need NOW.

Really, it's not sex. It's tied to sex, entwined with it.

It's life. It's one more day where the bullet didn't have his name. It's home again to his woman and his child.

And though his brain may get the metaphysics of this, the philosophy, he's not just a brain in a jar being carried around by a robot.

He's a man, and balls and cock and guts and heart are all part of this equation too, and they want to fuck. Because that's how they understand life. That's the guts-in-charge, brain's checked out, understanding of life. They want real, tangible, physical proof that he's still alive. They want to be alive, make life, and just, anything, warm and alive and real and breathing and…

And Abby's staring at them, wondering why she's got two shell-shocked guys in her living room, looking scared, and Gibbs really isn't very steady on one foot leaning against Tim, and Tim's not just a body seeking more life, he's a father and husband and son, and it's time to live up to those as well.

He looks to Gibbs, silently asking if he wants to sit with them, be there for this, or go to his office and rest. Gibbs nods at the sofa. So he helps Gibbs to the sofa, gets him down sitting across two of the three cushions. He finds a pillow to prop Gibbs' foot and knee up, makes up a quick ice pack, and put that on Gibbs' knee, and then scoots so he's sitting behind Abby and Kelly, and entirely wraps around them.

"It's a long story," he says without her asking, his lips on her shoulder, basking in her skin on his, and Kelly's silk fine hair under his hand.

"I've got time."

He can feel Gibbs staring at him, No, Shut up! Don't tell her that! Stop! Not that! as he hits different parts of the story. He's not entirely sure why Gibbs decided to join in on this if he's going to keep staring at Tim, begging him with his eyes to not keep talking.
Maybe, because as much as he doesn't want to deal with this, he knows that doing it is right. Maybe he thinks he's trying to be useful, save Tim from himself.

But Tim doesn't shut up, and he doesn't gloss over it, or make light of it, or act like everything was okay today. Because she's his wife, and she's strong enough to take the truth, and right now he needs her strength. He knows he needs a partner to lean on, and he can't always be the strong one. And here, at home, with his girls and Gibbs, he doesn't have to be.

And yeah, Abby did cry. And so did he. And, though he probably wouldn't admit it, Gibbs did, too.

Part of him feels so sorry for Gibbs, for constantly feeling like he couldn't do this, like he couldn't ever let anyone see him be weak or break.

Tonight Abby'll carry him. And eventually he'll carry her. And they'll both carry Gibbs, even if he's pretending he doesn't need it.

And it occurs to Tim, that maybe part of the reason Gibbs is here, silently watching this, tears he won't wipe away dripping down his face, is because no matter how uncomfortable this is, he knows he needs it, too. Maybe it has been too damn long since Gibbs didn't have to be the strong one, and maybe he's here because he's finally willing to (grudgingly) let himself be carried.

Eventually, the story ends. And eventually, Kelly needs to go up to sleep. Abby stands up and Tim follows her, holding both of his girls for another long minute, his cheek against Abby's, his lips on the top of Kelly's head. He doesn't want to stop touching them, doesn't want to lose the feel of warm skin and breath against him.

Abby kisses him, and nods to Gibbs, who looks pretty wiped out on the sofa.

He nods back, letting them go. He kneels next to Jethro as Abby and Kelly head up.

"You just want to crash here? Or you want the privacy of my office?"

"Office."

"Okay, come on, sit up. I'll get you in there." He helps Jethro get settled, and then heads back to his car, grabs Gibbs' go bag, and brings it into the office as well. He snags his desk chair, and wheels it next to the sofa, where Jethro's sitting, and puts the go bag on it, then heads out. A minute later, a glass of water, and his pain meds are sitting on the chair, his crutches are leaning against it, all within easy reach.

He knows Jethro keeps pajamas in his go bag. "You want help getting changed?"

"No." Gibbs looks frustrated, and possibly verging on embarrassed. Changing he can do just fine, because he can do that sitting down. The world doesn't go all swirly when he's sitting down.

"What?"

"Damn pain pills. I can't stand up without feeling like I'm going to fall down, and need to use the head."
"I got ya." And he did, and okay, yeah, that's pretty weird, and way more up close and personal than he ever expected to be with Gibbs, but bodies are bodies and everyone's got one, and they all do basically the same thing, so acting like it's a big deal doesn't make anything any better. (Though five weeks of diaper duty might have made Tim a whole lot more matter-of-fact about this than he ever was before.) Plus, Gibbs is better off with an extra set of hands keeping him steady when it came to getting his pants off, or putting his pajamas on. (After all, since he was there, and since Gibbs was half-dressed anyway, might as well help.)

It took about ten minutes, but he got Gibbs settled on the sofa, and Tim headed up to Abby.

There's a dull glow coming from their bedroom. So, main lights have to be off, but not completely dark. Probably the candles. He smiles at that. Kelly's down, so they should have close to two hours.

Sure, he'd like all the time in the world, but that's enough.

Every extra minute is enough.

He closes the door behind him. Usually he leaves it open. Makes it easier to hear what's going on in the rest of the house, but the converse of that would be true, too. Open door means it's easier to hear what's going on in their room as well, and right now Kelly sleeping soundly matters a whole lot to him.

Abby does have the LED candles glowing away, and is laying on their bed, propped on one elbow, naked, waiting for him.

He stands next to their door for a moment, looking at her, letting his eyes roam over her skin.

"Like what you see?"

"Yeah. I do." He crosses to her, pulling his clothing off.

She's kneeling on the bed, and he's standing in front of her, face against her shoulder as she holds him, kissing his ear. And for all the immediate lust/fuck/sex/now of walking in, and that hasn't gone away, it's still there, speeding his pulse, right this second he's content to just hold onto her.

"What do you need?"

He smiles at her, kissing her lips. "You."

That got a smile back, and another kiss, a long, wet, slippery, sweet, so sweet, her breath against his, lips encouraging pleasure and joy. "What do you want?"

It's only been five weeks since Kelly was born, and she's not bleeding anymore, but they haven't had sex yet, and, yeah, there are things he wants, lots of things he wants. Hard, thrusting, deep, and fast. Fucking for the sake of letting you know you're alive. Fucking to make a baby. Fucking to chase away the cold of death and the shock of having the rug yanked out from under you. He wants all of that.

But hard and fast and spread wide and deep and her clawing his back to ribbons while he pounds into her over and over just isn't an option. Not tonight. Not this soon.
"Whatever you can give me."

That got a smile, too, understanding his point, and a kiss. "I still want to hear what you want. Turn us both on with your words. Might not be able to give it to you, not yet, but we'll both enjoy the story."

He holds her close, carefully, too tight will hurt her breasts, and smiles at that, because it's true. They won't get to up against the wall. They may not get to full on sex (though he's hopeful) let alone baby making sex (not this soon, they already agreed to that), but that doesn't mean they can't enjoy the fantasy of it.

"Just, want you. Want your skin and breath and body and heat." He's kissing her throat, stopping to feel her pulse against his lips. Her fingers are rubbing soft circles in his hair and down his neck and back. He's quiet as his hands trace down her shoulders, over her arms, and then settle on her hips.

Her forehead rests against his while she stares into his eyes. "When you walked in, you were staring at me like you wanted to eat me alive. What were you thinking?"

"Not sure thinking's the word. More like…" He picks her up, and she wraps her legs around his waist, and he takes the few steps to the nearest wall, so her back's against it. "More like… just… the feel of it. The sight and smell and feel of this." Okay, not quite this, they aren't moving, and his dick's pressed against her tummy, but it's close and warm and her breasts are against his chest and he can see her eyes and kiss her lips. "Of you on me and up against the wall, hard and fast and deep and mostly just that slick, wet, thrusting," he's punctuating each word with a short grind against her stomach, "rhythm of hard fucking."

Her eyes slip closed and she sighs at that, rubbing against him, heels digging into his ass. "I like that."

"Yeah." He does, and he really likes her body wriggling against his, but more than that there's this overwhelming sense of love. Of his heart so full of her that he can't hold it. He stops grinding against her, and just holds on, savoring her body wrapped around his, and this feeling of all-pervasive love.

"Tim." There are tears in her eyes as she kisses him.

"Yeah?" He can feel his own tears, and this isn't how he was thinking it was going to go, but it was a hell of a day and if they need more snuggling and crying, they've got time.

"You came home." She's crying again. Relief he thinks. He kisses her tears, and feels her wipe his away.

"I came home." Another long kiss, her hands cupped around his face. He takes a deep breath.

"Always come home to you."

Deep kissing, his lips sliding on hers, and eventually he takes a few steps back, sitting on the side of the bed, her in his lap, rubbing all over him. She pushes him back, and he lies back, watching her as she reaches over to the bedside table, grabbing the condom, tearing the package.

Sense memories are interesting things. It has been years since they've done it with a condom, but just the smell of it whips him back. Abby straddling him adds another layer to it. Been there, done this, enjoyed it a whole lot, both of their first times went like this, same smell, same position, and he's feeling very connected to that right now.

The first time they did this, this almost didn't happen. He'd been so nervous, and then so turned on, felt like his whole body was quivering with wanting to get off, and he’d tied her hands, undid his pants, and she looked up at him, grinned, said, "Nice, McGee!" and then licked him, and God, he almost lost it.

She opened her mouth and sucked him down, and he knew if he didn't stop this right that second that he was going to lose it, because tied-up girl kneeling in front of him, sucking him off was so many of his fantasies all wrapped up in one that he knew he'd barely make it long enough for her to get all the way down his cock again, so he stepped back.

Then he helped her up, and slowly, carefully, and with a whole lot of attention and enjoyment licked from her ear to her pussy, and went to town on her. And yeah, he might not have had much (okay, any) technique at that point, but she was willing to tell him what to do, and he was very good at following directions.

After she got off, he untied her. (Because he wasn't comfortable with tied, kneeling girl blowing him, not then, no matter how hot it got him or how hard it made him.) And she grinned at him, very pleased, cheeks and chest flushed, and took his hand, "Bedroom, McGee."

"Okay." After her Christmas tree-light filled living room, her bedroom seemed pitch black. She mentioned being careful about the edge of the "box sofa bed," and her sheets were cool and satiny, and they were lying on their sides, naked, rubbing against each other which was all sorts of good, and eventually she rolled him onto his back, straddled him, and by then his eyes had adjusted enough that he could see her reach over to the… back… (lid?) of the "box sofa bed" (which he was suspecting had a much more common and revealing name, but he wasn't about to mention it then) snag a condom, and just the sound of her opening it had him leaking, and slipping it over him made him groan, loudly, and he felt a little stupid about that, but she was grinning, happy, and said something like, "If you like that, you'll love the next part," and slid down him in one long, brilliant rush of silvery red pleasure and golden happiness.

He stayed on his back for two, maybe three thrusts, but having her rise and fall on him, watching, but barely touching wasn't enough, so he sat up, wrapping his arms around her, holding her still long enough to kiss her slow and deep, his tongue on hers, and though he's never told anyone, even her, he felt something… electric… like a frisson of tingling energy through his whole body at that touch.

And at that point he just let go, wasn't bothering to try and live up to anyone's expectations, stopped caring how long he lasted and if it was long enough. He just let the pleasure flow through him, and it did, leaving him, probably a minute later, limp, twitching, high as a kite, and smiling.

Abby was lying on top of him, propped on her elbows, gently petting his face, and had said to him, "God, you're beautiful when you get off, McGee."

He thinks he said, "Thanks." He knows he was still smiling, and for once he didn't feel any need or desire to stammer or bluster or wrap himself in protective words.

And for the first time in his life, he was really satisfied after sex. Not just that it had felt good, though it had, but that he'd really been there, and she had, too, and they'd both had a very good time. First time he felt like he didn't need to ask if it had been okay. First time he didn't feel a need to grab his pants and cover himself back up again after. First time it occurred to him that he might not actually be that shy or modest.

Their second first time was fast. Pulling and tearing at clothing, trying to get closer, more skin, more touch, more pleasure, fast.

His pants were around his right leg still, bunched up on his shoe, and he remembers fumbling around trying to get the condom out of his pocket, and finally snagging it, and handing it to her while he took care of the lube.

First time they did it, he didn't know the trick of putting a little lube on the tip of his dick or the inside of the condom. But by the second first time he'd had that trick in his arsenal for years. So he handed her the condom, and with years of working with her, both of them moving toward a single goal, he knew she'd take care of getting it out of the wrapper, and he could take care of the lube, and they'd get together that much faster.

So he was rubbing a few drops of it on the tip of his dick, hearing the crinkle of the wrapper, and then she pushed his hand out of the way, straddling his thighs, rolling it over him, and a heartbeat or two later, he was fully in her, both of them groaning, clutching each other, finally feeling like they could slow down and savor it.

And that time there was no electric frisson. But the sense of joy, and peace, and of finally being home, that was there.

And later, when he thought about it, he realized that was the first time he had sex with someone he truly loved.

This time she put the lube inside the tip of the condom before sliding it over him. The smell is the same. The feel of it, cool and slippery, is the same. Her legs against his hips, fingers slipping down him. Déjà vu all over again.

But as she slipped down on him, he was expecting… more. Especially after what went into getting to this point. Especially after today.

It doesn't feel right. Not that it's wrong or bad or anything, but it's not sex. Okay, that sounds dumb, obviously it's sex. She's slowly easing down his dick; that's more or less the definition of sex. But he's getting, on a visceral level, why he's heard other guys complain about wearing a condom.

It's warm and snug, and that's all sorts of good. (Once upon a time, like say, both of their other first times, warm and snug was his definition of good.) And he can definitely feel her moving, that's lovely. But that glorious wet, slick, hot, soft, skin, slide isn't there. That plush, sucking almost kiss of a sensation is gone.

It's like vanilla extract compared to a real vanilla bean. It's similar, but the nuances are gone.

And Tim really likes the nuances.

And it's not like he won't be able to get off.

But, it's just… not nearly as good as without.

And especially today, especially with the chill of death in the air, and the warmth of life in her body, he wants skin, wants life, wants her life on his and maybe both of them wrapping together to make more life.

He strokes her face, kissing her. Might not be everything he wants, but it's good, and it's her, and that matters more than the feel of it.

She's watching him, and probably sees it in his face, or maybe she's feeling the same thing. She smiles at him, and pulls off, taking the condom off, slipping back down onto him, sighing, and he's groaning, head back, awash in how good that feels, how it amps everything up to eleven, and once she gets settled, he pulls enough of his brain together to say, "You sure?"

"Yeah. We both need this. And if it makes a baby, all the better."

"Yes!" And God, he wants that so bad, so hard, needs it, needs it now.

She rocks forward, and he groans again, loud, hands settling on her hips, guiding her.

That brings her up short, stopping all movement. "Tim, Gibbs's downstairs!"

Maybe he should feel embarrassed, but he just can't muster it right now. "He's on a boatload of painkillers. And honestly, if somehow he's awake, I don't care. He's been here, knows how this works. Not like anything we're doing is going to make him blush."

"If it makes me blush?"

Okay, that's a valid point. Just like he didn't much want his mom listening in, she might have something like that for Gibbs. "Then I'll be quiet. Does it make you blush?"

She thinks about it and gives him a squeeze. His jaw clench at the pleasure, but he keeps the groan quiet, and breathes out, "Oh fuck, Abby, so good!"

She smiles. "Nah, not going to blush."

"Good." He rocks into her, fingers slipping down her butt, and she moans softly. "Because I want to hear you and feel you and touch you and taste you and see you."

She slips back down on him. "Forgot smell."

He moans at her body sliding wet on his. "Kind of distracted right now."

She purrs at him, leaning down so her lips caress his ear, and moans low and rich as he slides into her.

"You sound so good."

Her lips meet his for a deep, wet kiss, stroking, petting, slipping, and rubbing, her tongue matching the pace of his dick, and he sucks it in as she thrusts.

He'd been planning on saying something about tasting good, but, he lost it.

Lost most of the other thoughts in his head.

Just let them go and let himself steep in the pleasure of this. Of her body, naked, on and in his. Of his body, naked, in and on hers. Of another day of being here, in and with her. Of making it home one more time. One more close call, the whisper of one more bullet that didn't have his name on it.

He lets it roll over him, her skin and heart and life against his. Of no-holds-barred making love, moving towards more life, pushing death and mortality back, at least a few more seconds, and maybe an entire generation.

Her fingers between his, grasping, hard, her breath against his lips, the sound of her in his ears, and the slippery, wet, pleasurefuckjoy of her body rubbing against his.

He arches high and hard into her, feeling the waves of ecstasy cresting through him, feeling her tight and rippling on him, and then both of them wet and limp and breathing hard against each other.

Her left hand in his right, he lifts it to his mouth, and kisses the tip of her ring finger. "Always come home to you."

She kisses the bit of his shoulder under her lips. "Amen."

And that's all the prayer he needs.

And that was Wednesday.
Like with Tuesday, Thursday began with crying.

“And another one bites the dust,” Tim says quietly, putting Kelly’s empty bottle on the floor.

Bottle done, now he’s on burp and back to crib duty. So they rock gently, sitting on the rocking chair where Gibbs and Shannon did this with their Kelly, as he’s patting away, humming to her.

He doesn’t have a lot of good baby music. And most of the jazz he likes isn’t exactly slow and soothing. (Okay, he finds it soothing, but the beat is usually pretty fast, and he can’t hum it well.)

So, often he finds himself humming, or quietly singing the songs he’s recently come into contact with. Bits of music that have jumped into his head. Back in April, he’d been sitting on Jimmy and Breena’s back porch, Abby on his lap, hand rubbing over Kelly’s baby bump, feeling her kick, and Breena had cranked the volume on the music, saying she loved this song, and it stuck with him.

So when he got home, he added it to his playlist. Passenger’s not his usual taste, but he’s okay, and Tim likes Patient Love. He probably listens to it, once, maybe twice a month now. It’s attached to sunshine and laughing with people he loves, all manner of good things.

So that’s the song he’s half singing/half humming to Kelly.

“Got a pinch of tobacco in my pocket/I’m not gonna roll it/ No, I’m not gonna smoke it/’Til we’re staring at the stars and the rockets/Twinkling in the silvery night.

“Though the sun may be washed by the sea/And the old will be lost in the new/Well, four will not wait for three/Three never waited for two/Though you will not wait for me/I’ll wait for you.

“I’ll wait for you.”

He knows he’s skipping verses and probably has them out of order, too. But it’s four thirty in the morning, he’s amazed he can even produce coherent sentences.

For a day, maybe two, sometimes a week after you almost die, everything is more intense, more important, more pressing. You love your loves more deeply, everything tastes better, pleasure is so much sharper. (The converse of this is also true. You tolerance for bullshit drops like a rock. Life’s too damn short for it.)

And right now, very much in that space, half-humming, half-singing to his daughter, he gets Patient Love in a way he hadn’t before. He gets why out of all the music in his head, that’s the song that popped up today.

Life is short, and it goes fast, and sure that’s a cliché, but it’s a cliché he’s living very intensely right this second.

Kelly won’t wait for him. She’ll grow up at a million miles an hour, and one day he’ll blink and she’ll be fourteen or twenty and off on her own world, own life, and these gray-midnight minutes will be gone, barely memories.

But he’ll be there, waiting for her, whenever she needs him.

For a moment, he has a very clear sense of who she’ll be at twenty: the young woman she’ll grow into; the life that will orbit his for vanishingly few years, to break away into its own trajectory. Suddenly he gets, really gets, what Jethro meant about your kids not being yours. That they belong to themselves and whomever they may give themselves to, but not you.

He holds her tight, inhaling deeply, trying to burn this sensation, this scent, these little baby sounds into his mind, because one day they will be gone and all he’ll have left is his ability to recall this, so he focuses, listing the details, writing them out in his head, committing them to his memory.

After a few seconds of that, she squawks at him, you’re holding onto me too tight, pretty clear in that outburst, so he loosens up his grip and goes back to patting her back, coaxing out the burps.

She finally burps, which means it’s crib time, so he stands up, and gently sets her in the crib, resting his hand on her tummy and singing five or so more verses of Patient Love.

“I’ll wait for you… Staring at the stars and the rockets… twinkling in the silvery night…”

Her eyes get droopy, and the sucking on the pacifier slows, so he quiets down, pulls his hand away gently, and creeps out of her room, hoping, praying, that this time she’ll actually fall asleep.

He stands outside her door, tense, waiting, counting to three hundred, and this time they made it. Still no fussing, no crying, so he went back to bed, and in about two hours she’d wake up again, and he’ll start his morning for real to the sound of his wife and daughter, next to him, in his bed.

Always come home to this. Always.

Seven o’clock came around, and Tim did wake to the feeling of Abby getting out of bed, and then getting back into it, and the soft, contented sucking sound Kelly makes when she nurses, along with Abby singing something upbeat and perky to her.

He takes a few minutes longer than normal to lay there, next to them, his lips pressed to Abby’s hip, arm over her legs, floating and sleepy and enjoying them.

He gets his shower, and then heads down to make them some breakfast.

Tim almost jumps out of his skin when he hears the toilet flush in the downstairs bathroom, but then he remembers it isn’t just the three of them in his house.

Gibbs hobbles out a second later, then sits at the kitchen table. Tim puts the pan he’d just grabbed on the burner, grabs an extra chair, gets Gibbs’ leg up on it, and then stares down at Jethro.

“You’re supposed to be in laying down.”

“Doc said I could get up to hit the head. Gotta eat, too.”

“You remember what she said about blowing out your knee?” Part of him is reminding Gibbs about the doctor’s orders, part of him is genuinely checking to see how much Gibbs remembers. He was pretty out of it last night, though he’s looking sharp now, and is wearing the brace on his knee.

“Enough.”
“Good. Abby and I are more than happy to have you here the next week.”

Gibbs’ eyebrows go high at that. He’d been thinking a day, maybe two. He doesn’t want to admit it, but he is really hurting and the pain meds do help, (if he didn’t have to take them on a full stomach, he’d have already gotten more of them.) and he’s not stable enough on crutches and one foot to be on the pain meds alone. But he’d also been thinking he’d stay on the pain meds for, at most, two days.

“You don’t have a full bathroom on the first floor of your house,” Tim explains. “And it’s a whole lot easier to lay around if Abby’s glaring at you every time you get up.”

Gibbs nods, that’s true. Disappointed girl staring at him will probably keep him in line just fine. (And drive him crazy, but that’s a different story for a different day.)

“But the point I was getting to is, we both want you here for healing up. But neither of us are going to be happy with you sleeping in my office for a year if you blow your knee out by being stupid. And you’re not going to be happy with that, either.”

Gibbs rolls his eyes and looks put upon. “Yes, Mom.”

“You were a complete snot as a teenager, weren’t you?”

Gibbs smiles at that.

“Good. Seriously though, you blow your knee out not doing something stupid, or you ever just need a place to crash, my office can move upstairs. You ever need it, that room can be a bedroom fast.”

“Tim…” Gibbs doesn’t quite know what to do with that. It’s just… “Wow. Okay.” He gestures for Tim to get a bit closer, and he does, kneeling next to Gibbs. Gibbs hugs him. “Thank you.” And that is genuine and heartfelt. Then he gently slapped Tim upside the back of the head, and finished by petting his hair. “And I’m not decrepit, yet.”

Tim snorts a quick laugh at that and stands up. “Tell me that when you can outrun Kelly again. I’ve only got decaf, you want coffee?”

Gibbs cringes.

“I’ll pick some of yours up along with your clothes. Sometime today, email me a list of what you want from your house.”

He nods. “Orange juice?”

“That, I’ve got.”

“Sleep well?” Gibbs asks a minute later, after he sips some juice.

“Yeah, thanks.” And especially given how yesterday went, and waking up to get Kelly, it had been a pretty good night of sleep. No nightmares. No waking up in a cold sweat. No trapped in that minute of scalding grief. “You?”

“Well as I could, given the circumstances.”

Tim raises an eyebrow. If Gibbs wants to talk about the aftermath of almost dying, he’s here to listen. Surprised, but definitely willing to listen.

“Different sofa, different room, pain killers making me feel dizzy, different nighttime noises.”
Or it could be a much more mundane set of issues. Then he stops, looks at Gibbs, realizing what he just said, and for a second, seeing the smile on Gibbs’ face, Tim’s wondering if Jethro is daring him to blush. He doesn’t. He does shake his head wryly, then sips his coffee, smile on his face, getting fruit out of their freezer, and says, “Yep, babies are kind of loud.”

Gibbs laughs at that. “Babies, uh huh.”

“Any given night I bet you’d get the same sounds at Jimmy and Breena’s.”

Gibbs nods. “Molly’s been sleeping through the night for eight months.”

Tim grins at him, mix of naughty and cocky on his face, and takes another sip. “What do you want for breakfast?”

That look gets a laugh out of Gibbs. “What are you making?”

“Abby’s been doing smoothies lately, so I can make an extra serving of that for you. We usually split some scrambled eggs. And I’ve got bagels.”

“Eggs, bagel.”

“Okay.”

A few minutes later, Tim’s putting eggs on plates, and sitting next to Gibbs to tuck in.

“We’re not waiting for Abby?”

“Nah. Only takes me five minutes to eat. I bring her food up for her, she eats while she finishes nursing Kelly.”

“Getting a pattern set?”

“Hopefully. Come September everything goes upside down again. But at least for right now, I think we’ve got a groove.”

Gibbs nods. “Kelly’s hearing okay, right?”

“Huh? Yeah. They did that test the day she was born. Why? Oh...” He realizes this is Gibbs asking why he’s learning sign language. “We want to be able to talk to each other without little guys listening in. I’ve still got a little high school French in my head. Abby’s the same with Spanish. But she’s already fluent in ASL, so we figured we’d go with that. Can’t listen in and translate a conversation you have to see to understand.”

“Planning on having a lot of conversations the kids can’t be part of?”

“Probably more than other couples. Hey Honey, let me tell you about the gory details of today’s case. Oh look, our four-year-old finds that disturbing. You mean you didn’t need to know about how mommy had to rebuild that bullet because it shattered inside the vic’s body?”

“Good point.” Gibbs chews a bite of his eggs, looks around for his pills, he thought he brought them.

“What do you need?”

“Meds. I thought I had them.”

“I’ll go.” A minute later Tim was back with the pill bottle. Gibbs shook one out and swallowed it.
“Why do you know sign language?”

“Undercover op.”

“You did a lot of them, didn’t you?”

“Used to. Mike was better at running them. I was better at playing whatever the role was.”

“Like you and Tony.”

“Sort of.”

“So what sort of op required you to learn to sign?”

“Dead Marine. We thought it had something to do with his rehab. He’d lost his hearing and was going through a program for deaf soldiers to help get them settled back into civilian life. Lip reading, signing, stuff like that.”

“So you went in as the newly wounded Marine.”

“Learned to sign, read lips, overheard a lot of conversations I wasn’t supposed to.”

“I’ll bet. Catch the guy?”

“Yeah. Took a while, but we got him. And also found that being able to convincingly play deaf made for a great information gathering tool. Lip reading was useful, so, even after the case was over, I kept up with it, finished the whole course.”

“Cool.” Tim finished his plate, and got up to put it in the dishwasher. Gibbs was done, too. “Okay, where do you want to be today?”

“Living room.”

“Then let’s get you over there.”

When he left for work, Gibbs was on the love seat. Kelly was on the floor, getting a little tummy time before her next nap. Abby was also on the floor, reading over the resume and the notes from the first interview, getting ready for her second visit with Elizabeth Henger, potential nanny.

He supposes getting the Gibbs gut in on the nanny hunt is a good thing.

Draga’s at his desk, working hard, and looking very run-down, and very contrite.

There’s not much Tim can do about contrite. Part of being a Probie is the fact that you will mess up, you will screw the proverbial pooch, and if, like Draga, you’re lucky, no one dies.

He, can, will, and should, however, keep an eye on run-down.

“How’re you feeling?”

Draga shake his head, not looking up from the files in front of him. “Doesn’t matter.”

Tim leans against his desk and catches Draga’s eye. “It matters. How are you feeling?”
“Fine.”

Black circles under his eyes, general look of discomfort, slightly shaking hands as he flips through the file in front of him. “Yeah, you look it. Go home.”

“What?” Draga stares up at Tim, startled by that. There’s no team if Draga goes home. No work happens. He can’t go home.

“Tony and Gibbs may be fine with the sit there, stew, and bury yourself in work technique for getting through stuff, but they aren’t here, and I am. You’re embarrassed, sad, scared, or feeling like you’ve got something to prove, I don’t care. Do it somewhere else. If you’re here with me, you’re on the case, and you’re working the case to work the case, not to prove to me or anyone else that you deserve to work the case, got it?”

Draga nods.

“Good. And if you’re here with me, it’s because you’re in good enough shape to work the case, so let’s try this again. How are you feeling?”

“Left ear hurts, and everything sounds like it’s underwater on that side.”

Which is, if Tim remembers correctly, exactly how it’s supposed to be. “Okay. How’s the rest of you?”

“Headache. No, it’s not the concussion. I get them when I sleep badly. I slept badly.”

“Also, okay. You’re riding the desk today. What are you looking through?”

“Contents of the warehouse as well as they can tell.”

“Good. Keep it up. When you’re done with that, I want you working on why the hell Blake is part of this. Go chat with Ducky and Palmer for that.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Don’t call me sir.” Tim fires that one off before he’s even realized it was Gibbs’ line. And it might be Gibbs’ line, but it’s his, too. He’s not Sir, and made a very clear set of decisions in his life not to be Sir. Though he’s wondering if Gibbs turned down a shot at Officer Training. He knows Gibbs could have been Sir here at NCIS, but chose not to be.

Tim settles behind his own desk, looking to see if he’s gotten anything back on the Ender parent’s phone and financial records.

“McGee?” Draga asks half an hour or so later.

“Yeah?”

“Is DiNozzo going to take my badge?”

Tim’s on the verge of automatically answering no, because every Probie messes up. Granted some messes are more spectacular than others, but then he remembers that Draga’s mess almost got Ziva killed.

“I don’t know.”

Draga’s staring at him, eyes wide, worried, vulnerable, looking very young. “When you’re up there, it’s just your own skin on the line. Well, your skin and a few hundred million dollars’ worth of equipment. You fuck up over the ocean, it’s just you and deep blue.”

“Not for us.”

“Yeah, I’m getting that.”

Financials for the Ender family. Numbers, lots and lots of numbers, none of them interesting. If Mom and Dad were bankrolling Thomas, it’s not on any account he can find.

Phone… also boring. They talk to friends, family… There’s one other Ender child, a sister… That might be interesting. From the looks of it Lisbeth Ender calls her parents once a week, same with James, until he died.

They’ve called her a dozen times since they got the news about James, but none of those calls have been more than a minute long, and none of those calls have been returned.

Probably means Lisbeth’s in the wind… Interesting.

He checks his messages. Nothing. But there wouldn’t be. He scoots over to Tony’s computer, logs on, and gets into his email.

Draga looks up at him. “McGee?” What are you doing on DiNozzo’s computer? pretty clear in his tone of voice.

“I’m not team leader. He is. So all communications would go through him.”

“He be okay with you rooting through his email?”

“Doesn’t matter if he is one way or the other. He’s not here. I am. And it’s got to get done.”

“You just have his password?”

“Not exactly.” Though he knows that Tony cycles through four main passwords with a few variations on those. It won’t take him long to figure out which one he’s using today.

“Wait, you’re hacking his account?”

Tim looks up from Tony’s computer. This would be a lot faster if he wasn’t answering questions about it. “He used to do it to me all the time.”

Draga’s looking across the bullpen at Tim, puzzled. “Used to? Why’d he stop?”

“Just about two years ago, he found out I wired a bomb into my phone when it blew a guy’s hand off. Since then he hasn’t messed with any of my accounts.”

“You… wait… what?” Draga’s just staring at Tim, utterly stunned by that.

“Don’t ever mess with my phone.”

“You handed it to me last night!”

“Uh huh.” Tim shrugs, suddenly getting the idea that being handed a small bomb might be discomforting to a person who just went through an explosion. “And I was sitting right next to you.
It’s pretty safe. Just, don’t try to go digging in it.”

“Shit.”

“Gibbs has the same treatment on his. Speaking of which, when you get your new one, let me have it. All of our phones have been wired to send off a distress call if they ever shut down, or get broken.”

“What happens when you turn it off?”

“Don’t turn it off. Put it on vibrate. Don’t let it run out of juice. Number three.”

“There are two number threes.”

Tim nods. “And something like six number ones. Gibbs is better at coming up with rules than keeping track of which number they are.”

“Gotcha!”

“McGee?” Draga looks up.

“Tony’s got to clean out his email more often. Finally found something useful. Got an emailed transcript of the interview with the Enders.”

“Good stuff?”

“Maybe.” Tim checks the corner of Tony’s computer, 8:13, LA time. Late enough. He punches in Callen’s number. “It’s lunch time. Get yourself something to eat. Bring me food, too.”

“What do you want?”

“Don’t care. Food. Protein, vegetables, not a lot of carbs.”

Draga salutes and heads off.

On the fourth ring he hears, “Callen.”

“Hello, Agent Callen, it’s Tim McGee over in DC, you sent my partner an interview transcript, and I was hoping to take a moment to talk to you about it.”

“McGee.” Callen’s thinking about that. “We met once, million years ago?”

“Yeah.” God, when was that… 2009? Something like that.

“You’re part of Gibbs’ team.”

“Yeah.” Technically Tony’s, but… no, for him it’s Gibbs’ team and always will be.

“Okay, what can I do for you?”

“I’m looking at your transcript”

“Okay.”
“What’s your gut saying about the sister?”

There’s a pause on the other side of the line. Then… “Something’s off about her.”

“Beyond the fact that Mom and Dad haven’t been able to get a hold of her?”

“They didn’t mention that.”

“Was she there?”

“No.”

“They’ve called her a dozen times, none of the calls have lasted more than a minute.”

“That’s suspicious,” Callen says.

“Yeah.”

“Does she travel a lot?” Tim asks Callen.

“Yes, she does. She’s a sales person for a medical device company. Sells artificial joints, things like that. Every month she’s talking to new doctors in new cities, letting them know what her company makes and why it’s better than what they’re using.”

“Lots of little towns?”

“Not really, but she’d probably have to pass through a lot of them to get to the bigger cities.”

“Yeah, she probably would. How about the parents?”

“Looked like they got hit with a truck. First the news, then the it has got to be a closed-casket funeral, two dead sons, then oh one of them may not be dead.”

“Isn’t dead. We’ve got confirmation that the KIA was faked.”

“Great. Those poor people. Did the one Ender kill the other?”

“We don’t know.” It wasn’t in the transcript, but… “You guys didn’t suggest that, did you?”

“No.”

“Okay, good.”

Tim’s up from Tony’s desk and over to his, requesting permission to dissect Lisbeth Ender’s life, see what’s going on with her, when Callen asks, “So, how’s the old man doing? He finally retire?”

Tim takes a second to realize Callen’s talking about Gibbs. “Not yet. January.”

“Can’t believe he’d ever hang it up.”

“Well, they’re taking him out kicking and screaming.”

“That sounds more like it. He find himself another redhead?”

Tim smiles at that, been a while since they’re seen a redhead that wasn’t an ex-Mrs. Gibbs. “Nah. Got himself a tiny, little blonde right now, but no redheads.”
“Really… It serious?”

Tim laughs. “Very serious. I’d say he’s hooked for life…” Callen sounds about to say something, but Tim adds, “She’s my daughter. Five weeks old. He’s been on grandpa duty.”

Callen laughs at that. “Sniper magazine do the trick?”

Tim smiles, remembering that. “Something like that.”

“You got pictures?”

“Oh yeah.”

“You’ve got to send me one.”

“Will do.”

“Tell the old coot to give me a call.”

“No problem.”

“Enjoy your gossip,” Draga asks, having caught the tail end of Tim’s conversation with Callen.

“Yes.”

Draga hands Tim a carton of some form of Chinese food.

“What is it?”

“Food: protein and vegetables, low carbs.”

Tim opens it up. “Tofu and mixed veggies?”

“Yes.”

“For future reference, protein means meat.” Not like he hates tofu, sometimes it's pretty good, but he prefers meat.

“Noted. What’d you get from Callen?”

Tim fills him in. “How about you? Anything interesting in the warehouse?”

Draga looks pretty dismayed. “How sure are we that Simmers’ really isn’t bonkers?”

“More sure of that than of anything else in this case.”

“Good. One of the things he did have in there, that did make it through, that seems to have been carefully located to ensure it would make it through no matter what, was an enemies list.”

Tim glares at Draga, and Draga looks alarmed. “Not you. Him. How long is it?”

“Sixty-five people.”

“Son of a bitch,” Tim says under his breath. “Specific threats to specific targets?”
“Times, places, dates, methods, everything, and they’re all Navy personnel.”

Tim slumps and grits his teeth. All credible threats have to be noted, reported, and investigated, plus the targets of those threats have to be protected. Short of blowing up the Navy Yard (again) there’s nothing Simmers could have done that would have monopolized more NCIS manpower.

“Send me the list. I’m going to talk to Vance. Go head down and chat with Ducky about Blake. By the time I’m back, I want to know why he’s doing this.”

“On it.”

“Can I see Director Vance?” Tim asks Vance’s secretary.

“Is it important?”

“I’m not up here to ask him out to lunch,” he says with a tired smile.

She gives him a wry look and lifts her phone to her ear, asking Vance if he’s got the time. She hears his response, nods, and says, “He’ll see you.”

“Thanks.”

“McGee?” Vance asks, looking up from his computer.

“Case just got worse.” He put the list Draga complied for him on Vance’s desk.

Vance reads over it, says... something. Tim doesn’t catch what, because it’s very quiet, but it’s definitely kin to his earlier ‘son of a bitch.’

“I don’t have the manpower for this,” Tim says. With everyone on his team, he doesn’t have the manpower for this, but especially today. Hell, today, he doesn’t even have the manpower to coordinate getting the manpower necessary to take care of this.

Vance looks up at Tim, frustrated, tired, and knowing, exactly like Tim does, that this is a wild goose chase, but it’s a goose he can’t ignore. “I don’t have the manpower for this. There aren’t enough agents out of the Navy Yard to put a protection detail on sixty-five people.”

“We’ve got safe houses.”

“If I put all of them, or even a large number of them, in one safe house, that house is going to explode.”

Tim shakes his head. Sometimes it’s good to not be the guy at the top of the chain.

“Can you get me more face time with Kort?”

“Why?”

“There’s an Ender sister, Lisbeth, and my guess is she’s the one who’s been doing the stateside legwork for Thomas. Want to know, what, if anything they’ve got on her. I also want to know how Ender found out about those subs, how he knew, down to the minute, where they’d be. There’s got to be a way to find these guys, and knowing that will help.”

“I’ll put the call in.”
“Good.”

“You going to check with the FBI?” Vance asks. The CIA isn’t, legally, allowed to do any surveillance inside the US. So if Lisbeth Ender had been in the US the whole time, then the CIA shouldn’t have anything on her. Of course, shouldn’t and don’t are not the same thing.

“Fornell’s my next call.

“McGee?” Fornell sounds very surprised to hear Tim’s voice on his phone.

“I’ve got a possible homegrown terrorist aiding and abetting an attempt to blow up the USS Reagan.”

That has Fornell’s attention. “No messing around with you. What do you need?”

“What do you have on Lisbeth Ender?”

“I’ll find out. Why are you calling me?” Tim gets the context of that. This isn’t why is NCIS calling the FBI for information, let alone Fornell personally. No, this is why is Tim calling. When they need Fornell’s help, Gibbs calls, or maybe Tony would since he’s the leader right now. If Tim calls, it means something has gone very wrong.

“Everyone’s alive and everyone is going to keep being alive. Yesterday was a bad day. Gibbs’ll tell you about it eventually, but I need that info as fast as you can get it.”

“DiNozzo?”

“Today it’s my team.”

“Oh God.”

Tim slumps a little at that and rolls his eyes. “Your faith is overwhelming.”

“No… Just… Your team means you’re the only one still standing, right?”

“Draga’s here, too. And I’ve got seniority over Ziva.”

“Uh huh. But she’s not there.”

“No. She’s with Tony. Can we maybe have this conversation about how shocked you are that I can run a team when I’m not hunting down a terrorist cell?”

There’s a pause on the other side. “This is coming out wrong. You need extra boots on the ground? I got men I can shuffle over to you. Hell, I can be there if you need it.”

“Oh. Yes. We need help. Call Vance, we need a ton of people for protection details.”

“How about you?”

“I need information. Right now we’re playing catch up. Everything you can find on Lisbeth Ender or Thomas Ender/Hiri Al-Said. He’s been on the CIA radar since ’07, but if you’ve got anything on him, that’ll help.”

“I’ll get on it. Which hospital is Gibbs at?”
“My place for right now.”

“You’ve got a terrorist threat and he’s at your place?”

“Pump enough pain killers into him, and even Gibbs is useless as an agent.”

“Ah. I’ll call Vance and offer help.”

“Thanks.”

Two minutes later his phone buzzed. He doesn’t recognize the number, but he’s awfully sure who it belongs to. There’s a one word text: Coffee?

Sure. When?

Now.

Be down in five.

The CIA are jerks. How’d Sam Axe on Burn Notice put it? “Bunch of bitchy little girls.” Such bitchy little girls.

Kort’s staring at Tim with cool disdain.

Tim’s tired of this shit. Yes, Kort’s vastly too cool for everyone and everything. Yes, everyone outside of his team assumes Tim’s tech support and that’s it. Great. Doesn’t mean he’s willing to play the games, especially today.

“How did Ender find out about those subs?”

Kort continues staring at Tim, getting across, by body language alone, how little respect he has for Tim. “Aren’t you the last link in the chain of command?”

“I’m the link fixing up your mess. If those subs weren’t supposed to exist, then they couldn’t have been common knowledge.”

Kort nods, the look of a patient man explaining something very simple to an extremely stupid child. “Not common knowledge and unknown are not the same thing, Agent McGee. Those subs had to be built, and the country they belong to did not have the infrastructure to build them for themselves.”

“Israeli?”

“Yes.”

“Nuclear subs?”

“Yes again. Which is why something else that would blow radiation all over the place had to be involved in the explosion.”

“Okay. So… how many people are involved in building a sub? Sure you can claim they’re being built for someone else, but that kind of sub… that lie’s not going to hold. Hundreds of people knew about them?”
“You’re not nearly as stupid as you look.”

Yeah, he’s really done with this shit. “That fake eye of yours itch sometimes? Ducky once told us they had a ‘tendency to pop out during vigorous interpersonal interactions.’ You ever have that problem?” Tim deliberately steps into Kort’s blind spot. “You want to guess who tracked you down in Hawaii when you lost the real one? Through all the fake names and IDs. You’re, what, the best the CIA has to offer, on a top secret mission, and I caught you, and I did it without having to break a sweat. If I’m the last link in the chain of command, it’s because no one else can do my job. So quit the bullshit; I’m not putting up with it today. Did Ender get on the crew building them? Is that how he knew?”

Kort seems amused by that. Seem amuzed by most of this world. Amused disdain might be his permanent expression. “No, but that’s a good guess. A better guess is who killed three members of that crew shortly after they finished their work.”

“Ahhhh.” That would have been useful to know going into this. “I’m going to want the files on that.” Kort nods. “How would he know where those subs were supposed to be? I’d assume that’s not something hundreds of people knew.”

“That, we don’t know. But we do know who knew officially. And who would have known unofficially, and we are… investigating them and every contact they’ve ever had with the sort of delicacy and thoroughness the CIA is known for.”

“How many of them have you flown to black sites in Afghanistan?”

Kort smiles. “As soon as we know where the leak was, we’ll let you know.”

“I bet. Lisbeth Ender?”

“What about her?”

“Everything. What do you know about her?”

“The CIA does not investigate US Citizens on US soil.”

“Yeah, and the NSA doesn’t engage in indiscriminate information gathering. Remember, I’m not as stupid as I look. What do you have on Lisbeth Ender?”

“We maintained surveillance on all of the Enders for two years after Thomas was officially KIA, checking to see if he made contact. He didn’t. At that point we stopped watching them.”

“Why?”

“Two years is a long time to run an illegal op, Agent McGee.”

“You mean you got caught?”

“In a manner of speaking. We had our budgets cut. Anything that could be trimmed, was. Illegal fishing operations that weren’t producing results were ended.”

“Wonderful.”

“We never found Lisbeth doing anything interesting. We never saw her make contact with her brother. We did notice that she was not, enthusiastic, about her brothers’ choices in careers.”

“Pacifist or Islamists?”
“A combination of both while we were watching her.”

“Wonderful. One more question.”

“Fire away, Agent McGee.”

“Why would one of our aircraft carriers be that close to those non-existent subs?”

“Are you suggesting that someone altered the path of that carrier?”

Why not? “Every new layer on this case takes it deeper. Is it possible that Ender and Co. are that well-connected?”

“Anything is possible. Though I’d imagine your own men would be better placed to tell you if the path of the Reagan was altered and if so, by whom. Likewise, perhaps you have a better indirect route to information as to why those subs just happened to be there than I do.”

Riding the elevator back to the bullpen, Tim texts Vance about the Reagan’s path. Just in case he doesn’t have enough to do with coordinating the protection details. Actually, he probably handed that off to someone else. Tim also requests to find out who’s in charge of that, so he can keep an ear on it.

He sees Draga back at his desk as he heads back to his own, and says, “So, tell me all about Blake.”

“Remember how, back in ’14, in order to meet recruitment goals the Navy loosened its standards for who qualified to re-up?”

“Yeah.”

“Yeah, so until ’13 Blake had pretty normal evals. Then in July of ’13 he was on deck when one of the planes didn’t exactly nail the landing, and got caught in the explosion. He healed up, some scarring, but functional. Biggest issue was nightmares and post-traumatic stress. He was doing his job well enough, so when he re-upped in March of ’14, they let him, but no way in Hell Blake would have made the cut to re-up back in ’13.

“After the accident, his psych evals indicate he had developed some sort of dissociative type of thing. That he had, ‘empathy issues,’ but they thought he was basically harmless as long as interesting puzzles kept him occupied.”

“And Ender gave him the mother of all interesting puzzles?”

“Looks like it.”

“Wonderful. What’s Ducky think?”

“Basically, it’s a defense mechanism, that rather than deal with the trauma of the accident, he shut down the emotional centers of his brain. But unlike Simmers, Ducky’s a whole lot less sure on this one. The huge pile of nothing we found at Blake’s house, and his lack of anything interesting in his personal effects, means that Ducky’s doing this cold, based on just those psych evals and the lack of stuff we found.”

“So, we’re barely scratching the surface on him.”

“Basically. What’d you get?”
Tim gets Draga up to date.

“Lisbeth Ender is up next?”

“Yes.” Tim checks his email, he’s got the permission he needs. “You want communications or financials?”

Draga cracks his knuckles. “Bring on the financials.”

As a kid, Tim hadn’t been a big fan of puzzles. (Sounds kind of ridiculous seeing how he ended up a cop and mystery writer, but it’s true.) His sister was. So, as a bored fifteen-year-old, babysitting his six-year-old sister, he did a lot of puzzles.

In each puzzle there’s a point where you get enough of the pieces together to finally get a feel for what’s going on.

By the time he was getting ready to head off to college, his sister was old enough and patient enough to whip out the 2500 piece puzzles, and though he still didn’t love them, he had gotten to appreciate the rhythms of successfully putting one together.

You get all the outside pieces together. That gives you the boundaries. And like with puzzles, cases work the same way. You get edges and you know that anything outside those edges isn’t part of your case.

At this point, sitting at his desk, going through Lisbeth Ender’s phone records, he feels like he’s got the edges of this case down.

Once you get the edges you start grouping colors together, looking for details that only show up in a few places so you can get all of those bits together.

Likewise, he’s feeling like they probably have all the major players in place. They’ve got the colors and some of the details.

And once you’ve got those colors groups, you start putting the bits together, looking for lines to cross each other, and shapes to form.

The various Enders are one big color group for this puzzle, one he feels like he’s getting pretty well set. Sure, most of what he’s got with Lisbeth is a hunch, though as he’s going through her phone records, he is finding some interesting patterns. Circumstantial patterns, but… interesting none the less.

Hopefully Fornell will have something useful to back his hunches up.

Blake’s another color group, but it’s one of those dull colors that shows up all over the puzzle and you have no idea where it goes or why.

Would you really blow up a ship because it’s interesting? Would anyone? Anyone who can pass a Navy psych eval?

Same thing with Simmers. He can see the shape of that piece, he feels like he’s got a handle on what it’s doing, but not why. Who in their right mind wakes up one morning and starts playing insane?

“Done with the financials,” Draga says.
Tim looks up from thinking about the case and puzzles. “What do you have?”

“Nothing concrete.”

“Tell me about it.”

“Same on the phones?”

“Yeah. So, financials?”

“She does work for a medical company, and yes, I checked, they’re legit. They pay her every two weeks. First and fifteenth of every month. On the sixteenth of every month she cashes out five hundred and twenty-five dollars.”

Tim holds up his finger, signaling hold on, that’s ringing some bells for him. He quickly goes through the different phone records he’s been working on and finds that MDeed’s burner cell got it’s extra 1000 minutes a month every month on the seventeenth. “MDeed’s phone always got more minutes on the 17th.”

“Good. Got a connection there. You have the list of the places where his phone got more minutes?”

“Yeah.”

“Shoot it over here. I’m going to call her company and see where she was working when.”

“Okay. Five twenty-five probably means four other phones getting refills.”

“Yeah.”

“Any trace of her getting money from her brother?” Tim asks. He doesn’t know how much she was getting paid, but $525 a month isn’t petty cash for most people.

“Not that I could see. But if it was in cash, or if she’s got accounts in other names…”

“We don’t have any real movement on this by end of business tomorrow, I’m getting the forensic accountants in on this. Money’s got to be coming from somewhere.”

Draga nods at that. They’ve got to get something to break on this. “So, what do you have on her phones?”

“Everything was supposed to go boom on the 18th. Her last call, to a hotel in Hampton Roads, was on the 17th, after that every phone number attached to her went dead.”

“You check the hotel?” Draga asks.

“Was about to do that. What was her last credit card transaction?”

“Rental car, also in Hampton Roads.”

“Call the company get everything on that car,” Tim says to Draga as he grabs his phone and punches in Ziva’s contact. “Ziva, you still in Hampton Roads.”

“McGee?”

“Got a lead. Are you still at the hospital?”
“Yes.” She sounds tired, and Tim’s starting to feel like a jerk at barging in like this, but it’s the job, and she’s the one closest to the scene right now. “Tell me about the lead.”

“Thomas Ender’s sister got a hotel room in Hampton Roads on the 17th, and she rented a car down there as well.”

“Send me the information. I’ll check it out.”

“Good, be careful. Don’t engage them, just... Do you still have those trackers in your go-bag?”

“Of course.”

“If you can find the car, stick a tracker—“ Draga’s looking at him, giving him the cutting off gesture. “Draga’s got something. What?”

Draga’s shaking his head. “Rental company confirms that her credit card was used to rent a Ford Taurus, but it was returned on the twenty-first. It’s been rented out again and isn’t due back for another three days.”

“Damnit. You get that?” he asks Ziva.

“I did. Want me to check the hotel anyway?”

“Yeah. The mileage on the car should at least give us an idea of how far they could have gotten. And if by some stroke of luck, they’re still in the hotel, wait for us. We’ll be down and loaded for bear.”

“You think they’ll still be there?”

Tim’s shaking his head. They aren’t that lucky. “Not if the car was returned. But it’s not impossible. How’s Tony?” He hears the phone switch hands.

“Annoyed.” Tony's voice. “They won’t let me out of this bed until I get one more CAT scan.”

“Then sit your butt in that bed and get the scan.”

“Sounds like you’re spread pretty thin.”

Tim snorts at that. “You’ve got no idea, and you’re not getting one until you’re cleared by the Docs.”

“At least send me the electronics. I can read files—“

“You on pain meds?”

“Yeah.”

“No files for you. Heal up. Once they know for sure you’re not about to have an aneurysm, then you can read files.”

“You bench Gibbs? He’s got to be on more meds than I am.”

“He’s sitting at my house helping Abby interrogate potential nannies.”

“Damn.”

“Yeah. I’m not having this fall apart because one of my investigators was working stoned.”

“It’s only Tylenol 3.”
“I’ve seen you on pain meds. Go rest. I’ll see you when you get back to DC.” Tim hangs up and switches focus back to Draga. “What was the mileage on the car?”

“Eight hundred miles.”

“Dulles, Reagan, Philadelphia International, and Baltimore.”

“I think Newark is in that range, too,” Draga adds.

“So, every major airport in the Mid-Atlantic, hundreds of bus and train stops.”

“I’ll get the BOLO out.”

“For whatever it’ll be worth this late in the game. Flag their travel documents. Stick them on the terrorist watch list.”

“Closing the barn door after the cows got out?”

“After Mrs. O’Leary’s cow got out.”

Draga winces. “What else?”

“I’m heading down to talk to Ducky about Simmers. He’s not bonkers, so why is he doing this? You’re going to call every one of those places that MDeed’s phone got refills from, see if they recognize the shot of Lisbeth, and see if anyone remembers what other phones she may have bought or refilled.”

Tim heads down to autopsy, and sees both Ducky and Jimmy have the books out, crime scene photos out, and a collection of everything they’ve found on Blake.

“How’s it going?” Tim asks them.

They both look up and Ducky answers, “Frustrating, Timothy, very frustrating.”

Tim shoots Ducky his, I’m with you 10,000% look. “Anything interesting?”

Jimmy slips off his glasses and rubs his eyes. “The only interesting thing is the complete and utter lack of things. It’s like Blake didn’t exist before 2011. He has school records and medical records, but everything is so minimal. It’s barely even a sketch of a person. I know more about the background of the characters in your books than I do about Blake, and supposedly I’ve got his entire life sitting in front of us.”

Ducky’s nodding. “There is barely the shell of a man here. He went to high school, got middling good grades, but no one remembers him, he was on no teams, no picture in his yearbook, nothing. He worked odd jobs for three years, made an impression nowhere. Then he joined the military and ghosted through there. He made no close friends, kept to himself, did his job, and that was it. His phone has no books, no music, no favorite webpages, and besides a penchant for computer games, his computer is in the same shape.”

“Pictures?” Tim asks, maybe if there’s a shot of someone they can run it through facial recognition and get a clue.

Jimmy shakes his head. “None. He’s got a Creeper from Minecraft for wallpaper and that’s it.”
Great big heaping pile of nothing. Wonderful. “Can I pull you two off the mystery of Blake and onto Simmers?”

“Certainly, we’re not getting any further with Blake, not without any extra information,” Ducky replies as he and Jimmy start to pack up the information on Blake.

Tim spreads out what he’s got on Simmers. “I know you’ve come to the conclusion that he’s not really insane. Great. But… if he’s not, what is he doing? Why would he want to blow up a ship in the first place?”

Ducky looks at the picture of Simmers tapping it gently with his index finger. “That is a very good question, Timothy. Why does a sane man put the lives of over five thousand people in jeopardy?”

Tim’s staring at the picture they’ve got of Simmers from his military ID, willing it to tell him why they’re doing this, or better yet, where they are so they can get them.

“Guys…” Jimmy sounds excited.

“Yeah, Jimmy.”

“Is this correct?” Jimmy’s holding up the page with Simmers’ stats on it.

“As well as we can tell,” Tim says.
“Then something’s really wrong. Simmers’ was supposed to be born in ’88, but his Social Security number is really close to Molly’s.”

“Close how?” Tim asks. Other than his and Abby’s, he knows nothing about Social Security numbers.

“They circle through the numbers, as older people die they get put back into circulation. His number doesn’t look like it should have come from the ’80s.”

Tim’s got his phone out and is logged into the social security database in a heartbeat. A few keystrokes, a few seconds spent waiting, and… “Jimmy, how often do I tell you I love you?”

Jimmy shoots him his amused smile. “Often enough.”

Tim wraps his arm around Jimmy’s neck and kisses him on the cheek. “I love you. Jason Simmers was born on May 22, 2011. Then on October 15th, 2011, Jason Simmers enlisted in the Navy.”

“What an enterprising infant,” Ducky says dryly.

Jimmy nods, and Tim finishes, “Whoever our sailor is, he’s most certainly not Jason Simmers. Thank you.” He’s got his phone up to his ear. “Draga, get Simmers and Blake into the facial recognition software... Why…” They hear Tim explaining as he heads back to the bullpen.

He’s on the stairs, just having put down his phone when it rings again. Ziva’s number.

“Hey, what do you have?”

“Lisbeth Ender reserved and paid for the room in cash on the 15th. Thomas Ender did show up on the 18th around 10:00 PM to check in. The desk clerk never saw anyone else, and according to the records Thomas checked out at 6:00 AM the next morning.”
“Okay, so he was there for eight hours. Anyone else with him?”

“I was also able to talk to the maid who cleaned the room, and according to her both beds were unmade and there was an extra blanket on the sofa. It is likely three people slept there. I asked around the local businesses, and there was a breakfast shop two blocks over from the hotel, and one of the waitresses remembered seeing Ender, Blake, and Simmers, but there wasn’t a woman with them.”

“Okay.” Tim’s adding that to his mental list. Whatever it is Lisbeth was doing, it doesn’t appear to involve actual physical contact with the guys.

“I checked the car rental, too. Lisbeth Ender took out and returned the car.”

“So she was in Hampton Roads as of the 21st.” It’s not a question, Tim’s mostly just talking to keep the ideas straight.

“Yes. Any idea where she is now?” Ziva asks.

Tim’s shaking his head. “Your guess is as good as mine. Thanks for checking it out.”

“No problem. It is good to do something useful.” Tim thought that was an odd comment. Not that he disagrees, but being with your wounded husband would be pretty high on his list of useful.

“When are you guys coming home?”

“Hopefully tonight.” That also sounds tired.

“Is he really okay?”

“Yes. I think so. They keep telling me that this is just to be safe, that head bleeds can be tricky and they want to be absolutely certain he is ‘out of the woods’ but he’s acting like himself.”

“He going to be able to work tomorrow?”

“He’s going to want to. The doctors do not think it’s a good idea, though.”

“You going to come in?”

“I intend to.”

“I’ll see you tomorrow then. You guys need anything, give me a call, okay?”

“Okay.”

Tim puts down his phone, hoping things are going all right with Tony and Ziva, and wondering if he’s going to have to pull the same, if you’re here working the case you’re working the case with Ziva that he did with Draga.

Draga has Blake and Simmers up on the plasma. “So, the good news is both Blake and Simmers aren’t really Blake and Simmers.”

“And the bad news?”

“The bad news is even with ultra-top priority rush, we’re still at least ten hours away from coming up with anything on the facial recognition software.”

“Great.”

“I’ve got more good news.”

“Really?”

Draga shrugs. “I talked to Lisbeth’s boss. She requested vacation from the 12th to the 30th. She was telling her co-workers that she was going to Tanzania for safari. Apparently her tumblr is uploading pictures of her adventures and the critters she’s seeing.”

“Would explain why her parents aren’t in a blind panic over her. They probably don’t expect to be able to contact her, so they haven’t gotten worried, yet.”

“You think there’s any shot she’s in Tanzania?”

“We’ll check. But someone had to return that car.” Tim checks his watch. 6:35. “Go home. Rest.
Until we know who those guys really are, we’re stuck. I’ll let the FBI and CIA know what we’ve got, and get them searching, too. First thing tomorrow, we hit the ground running, knowing who these guys are.”

“Sounds good.” Draga stood up.

“Tonight, you sleep, take some melatonin or something if you need to, but I don’t want us to be stuck in here tomorrow. Ziva’ll be in, too. If we need to move, we’re moving, so be up for it. Got it?”

“Yes.”

“Good. Eight AM tomorrow, we end this.”

“Amen,” Draga said as he left.

Tim prepared a quick report on everything they had and fired it off to Fornel, Kort, and Vance. Then he fired off one last email requesting any travel data for Lisbeth Ender. Not too many flights from the US to Tanzania, shouldn’t be too hard to find if she was on one of them. With any luck, tomorrow the Information Fairy would be ready to bestow it’s blessings upon them, and the break would come.

He was halfway home when he remembered that he’d told Gibbs he’d swing by his place and pick up his stuff. A quick U-turn and ten miles of driving took care of that. It felt weird to walk into his house with no one there, let alone doing it knowing he’s got to rifle through the man’s stuff to get…

He checked his email and found the list from Gibbs, clothing, toiletries, coffee, pillow, bourbon (Tim squints at that, not sure how well it’ll mix with Gibbs’ pain meds), sketch pad, and all the paperwork from NCIS.

Too late for the paperwork. It’ll still be there tomorrow. Mounds and mounds of it. Because of all the things he’s done today, filling out paperwork isn’t any of it.

Later. Clothes, coffee, home.
If Tim thought being in the house by himself was weird, being in Gibbs’ bedroom was even stranger. He’s been in it once before, after the Susan-talking-thing, and it looks pretty much the same, though it’s changed some. There had been a picture of Kelly and Shannon up on his dresser when he was there last. Now there were shots of all of them, mostly from the different weddings, but he sees one that Breena probably took (she takes most of the pictures) of him and Gibbs, and Tony, and Jimmy, Ducky and Fornell from the Fourth of July party. Judging by the looks on their faces, that is definitely the No Shame story. He looks at that one more closely. There’s an orb behind and to the left of Gibbs. He know that’s just some sort of anomaly that happens with digital cameras, dust mote hits the light right, something like that. He also knows that ghost hunters think they’re signs of spirits present. He smiles a little and shakes his head a little at that, and puts the picture down.

Stay on track. Being in the house is weird, being in his bedroom is really weird, going through his dresser, okay, that’s borderline uncomfortable.

He grabs six pairs of boxers fast and tosses them on the bed. Socks next. T-shirts were in the next drawer down. Pants, mostly jeans, in the drawer below that. Easy enough. He tries to remember if he’s ever seen Gibbs in shorts, but he doesn’t think he has. But shorts would be easier with the knee brace than jeans or slacks.

Barring shorts… Sweatpants. That’ll do the job. He’s got to have sweat pants somewhere. Tim knows that because he’s seen Gibbs exercise, fight, and sleep in them, so maybe the next drawer down…

Nope. Picture albums in that drawer.

Tim’s curious, really curious, like hand on the cover of the one on the top curious, but he doesn’t open it. He’s seen some of Gibbs’ photo albums, shots of him and his girls. And these albums don’t look like that, they’re thicker, and Tim has the sense that it’s not just photos in these books. So he closes that drawer and spends a moment looking around Gibbs’ bedroom, wondering where sweat pants would live.

Closet?

Nope. Suits, dress slacks, button down shirts, a collection of those golf shirts he likes in every color on the planet, as well as lots of jackets, but no sweat pants. Sneakers were in there though, so Tim grabs them, and then puts them back, no need for sneakers when all you’re doing is laying around.

There’s a chest at the foot of the bed. Wood. Probably made by Gibbs. It’s not where Tim would keep sweat pants, but he knows Gibbs owns them, and he’s not seeing them, so… Not in there. Blankets, towels, quilts, extra pillows.

The only place left is the two bedside tables, which, well, Tim would really rather not go rooting through them. He knows what’s in his bedside table and… Well, he’s perfectly comfortable with the idea of allowing Gibbs’ condom, lube, and sex toy preferences to remain a mystery.

He takes out his phone and flashes a text to Gibbs. At your place, found everything but sweat pants, where do they live?

He heads downstairs and grabs both the coffee, and then to the basement for the sketch pad and bourbon. He’s halfway up the steps when he gets back: Bathroom shelf, over the hamper.

Thanks. Home with your stuff soon.

Good. You eat yet?

No.
We’ll get something on for you.

We’ll?

I’ll ask Abby nicely to put something on for you.

Thanks.

Back up to the bathroom, where there is a tidy looking hamper-shelf combo, which he’s thinking Gibbs must have made for himself because Tim’s never seen anything like it. It looks like a sink cabinet, but instead of a sink at the top, there’s a flat wooden door. Open it, and the hamper is underneath. On top, there’s a shelf with sweat pants and comfy looking t-shirts (Gibbs’ jammies). The shelf above that has clean towels on it. On the outside of the side piece, facing the shower, there are hooks for the towels that are in use.

Very clever.

Tim scoops up Gibbs’ jammies and lounging around wear, snags his toiletries out of the bath, and realizes he doesn’t actually have a bag or anything for all of this.

Back to the closet for a suitcase, and Tim was ready to head home.

Home again.

Tim’s pooped, all he wants to do is crash on the sofa.

But there’s already someone laying on the sofa, reading, looking awfully comfy.

And though he’s awfully fond of Gibbs, he’s not the person Tim wants to crash onto the sofa next to and wrap around.

So he crashes on the love seat, lays there for a moment, eyes closed, enjoying quiet and the fact that Gibbs isn’t interrogating him with questions as to how today went.

After a minute, he sits back up and looks around. No Abby, but there is a plate of food and a tall glass of iced tea on the coffee table. Checking the clock shows it’s a bit before eight, so she’s probably putting Kelly to bed.

“You human again?” Gibbs asks when he sits up.

“Closer.”

Gibbs is really staring at him, looking, maybe not worried, but… Hell, he’s too fried to figure out what emotion is hiding behind those blue eyes. He is, however, awfully sure why Gibbs is looking at him like that.

“Yes, I saw them. No, I didn’t snoop.”

“Thanks.”

“Not saying I wasn’t tempted.”

Gibbs nods. “Wouldn’t have been the end of the world or anything, but, they’re private.”
“And they still are.”

“Good.”

Tim’s pointedly not asking what was in those books as he drinks the iced tea, but he certainly wouldn’t mind if Gibbs would just tell him.

Gibbs sees it and shrugs. “Shannon kept all of our letters. Made sure I kept the ones she sent me. And, back in ’83, we got a Polaroid camera.”

“Oh.” And Tim has a very good idea of what’s in those books, and he’s feeling awfully glad he didn’t open them.

“Yeah. She put them all in books.” There’s a somewhat bittersweet note in Gibbs’ voice, but at least he’s talking about it. “Her very own romance novel: The Maiden and the Marine, she called it.”

Tim smiles at that. “Got a box like that upstairs. All of Abby’s poems are in there.” He rubs his temples feeling life crest back into him with the sugar from the tea. “Okay. That helps.” The chicken breast, green beans and cauliflower on his plate was looking awfully good, too.

“How’s the case going?”

Tim slowly shakes his head. He opens his mouth, about to say, “You wouldn’t believe it…” but his phone rings, and it’s Fornell.

“Let Fornell know you’re actually alive.” He tosses the phone to Gibbs. “I’m going to get more iced tea.”

As he heads to the kitchen he hears, “Tobias… Yeah… Knee’s shot. Doc wants me on my back… Since she tells me that if I screw this up I’m not walking again without a cane…” Tim’s back in the living room. “No. He’s not.”

Tim gestures for the phone, and Gibbs hands it back. “No, I’m not what?”

“Letting Jethro work,” Fornell says to him.

“He’s on Percocet, a lot of it.”

Fornell didn’t say anything to that, so maybe that meant he agreed, or maybe he thinks Gibbs is going soft, either way, Tim doesn’t much care. “What’s up?”

“Christmas in July for you. Friend of a friend did some digging and got everything you ever wanted to know about Thomas Ender. I’ve got FBI files, NSA files, CIA files, Homeland Security files, and now you do, too. If it’s got initials he’s gotten flagged by them.”

“And yet he still manages to sneak onto an aircraft carrier.”

“True. Mostly because he fell off the face of the Earth two years ago. We honestly thought he was dead at that point. It’s all in the files. I’ve also got everything we had on Lisbeth Ender, which was nothing. She’s never hit the radar. We’re running Blake and Simmers, and setting up a database of people we’ve wanted who went quiet the same time they enlisted. Should speed up the process of IDing them.”

“Thank you. How’re the security details going?”

“Don’t know. I handed that one off.”
Gibbs had been watching that exchange. “Security details?”

Tim shakes his head at Gibbs and signs, Long story. Tell you when Abby is down.

“Thanks, Fornell. Looks like I’ve got reading to do.”

“Enjoy.”

Abby’s down a few minutes later. Curled around her, he begins to get them up to date on what happened today. He’s half-telling them to let them know, half-laying it out in his own mind, to work on getting the pieces sorted out further.

And for that sort of talking, Abby and Gibbs are very good listeners. Quiet when he needed quiet, asking good questions, and Gibbs, who he can see is purposely not taking his next dose of pain meds to keep his own mind as clear as possible, looks like he’s really thinking his way through today’s deluge of new information.

Tim talked through Kelly’s full sleep cycle, and feels bad about that, because Abby stayed up with him, listening, instead of getting more sleep. Though he didn’t mind getting a little extra snuggle time with Abby, and he was happy to go get Kelly and bring her down to nurse, while he wrapped up what had happened today.

Eventually she finished eating, and he had finished talking, and he’s ready to sleep too.

He offers Gibbs some help getting back into his office, and was in the process of heading off to grab him more to drink so he could take his pain meds and sleep, when Gibbs says, “Tim, would you sign something for me?”

“Yeah, sure.”

Tim can’t imagine what paperwork could have possibly wandered into his home without him taking it there, but the damn stuff is like bunnies, you turn your back and suddenly there’s more of it. There were three sheets of paper, printer paper, printer paper from his printer, okay… paper work that originated at his house, sitting on his desk.

He finds a pen and asks, “What am I signing?”

“I remember you saying it to the Doc, and thought things would go a lot more smoothly if it was real.” Which gets Tim actually reading the pages in front of him. It’s the legal documents necessary to make him and Abby Gibbs’ medical proxy and official next of kin.

“Oh… I thought Ducky…”

“He is, will be until we get this filed. We talked about it. He thought switching over to you two made sense, too.”

Tim smiles a little at that, half-pleased at the switch, half-sad at the recognition of the fact that Ducky isn’t going to live forever.

He signs, noticing that Abby’s already done so, and then takes the time to actually read the pages. Most of it is straightforward legalese giving both of them the power to make life or death decisions for Gibbs, the last page is his living will.
“I didn’t know you were DNR.”

Gibbs shrugs. “I’ve got more tying me to life than I have in a long time, but, when I’m done, I’m done. My heart stops, and that’s the end of it. Don’t bring me back. And if you let me linger on a machine, as soon as I am dead, I will come back and smack you so hard upside the back of the head your ears’ll ring for a week.”

“Yes, Boss.”

“Good.”

He scans the rest of the page. “Organ donor, too?”

“For whatever they’re worth. Can’t imagine there’ll be too much demand for my liver, and I smoked for ten years, so my lungs aren’t in top shape, but my last check-up said my heart was in great shape and my kidneys should be good. And yeah, you can put me on a machine and keep me going long enough to find good homes for them, then let me go.”

“Ohkay.” Maybe it’s just the long day. Probably it’s the lingering feel of having thought he lost them all, but that idea hits Tim really hard, and he feels his eyes burn and throat try to close up. He swallows hard a few times, and then shifts the topic to something that won’t make him cry. “You smoked?”

“You work with Franks and you either light up and smoke ‘em directly or you get ‘em second-hand.”

Tim knows all about that from his role playing days. “When’d you quit?”

“Little bit before you signed on. Abby’d rag on me for it. Keep giving me pamphlets on lung cancer. Sending me pictures of tar-filled lungs. Had Ducky put a smoker’s lung on my desk. Stuff like that. Just easier to quit.”

Tim can imagine that. “Yeah. She would have. I’ve never lit my pipe. Just like having it to play with. I like the way the tobacco smells before you set fire to it, and Abby still gave me crap about it.”

Gibbs chuckles about that. “Get some sleep, big things tomorrow.”

“Yeah.”

And that was Thursday.

Chapter End Notes

I’m fairly sure this is my last update before Christmas, so, for all of you who celebrate it, Happy Christmas. I hope it’s a lovely day.
By Friday morning Tim was starting to feel like he was in the habit of going to work again. Up, shower, food, dress, and out.

Felt like he was getting his rhythm back.

That was kind of nice.

"Good morning," Tim says as he heads into the Bullpen, seeing Ziva sitting at her desk.

Ziva grunts at him. She's mad. He can feel that coming off of her. It's not the same PISSED that radiates off of Gibbs. This is a duller, slower, longer lasting anger. Tim spends a moment really looking at her, and decides that she's pissed, but not at him, and not at being at work today.

That figured out, he's not going to poke it. If it looks like she's not letting it go as the day goes on and they get more intel, he'll have a go at it later.

The Information Fairy, AKA Fornell, had indeed been kind. Split between them it was three hours of reading.

After three hours they knew this:

Lisbeth Ender (or at least someone who looked like her and had her passport) left the US for Tanzania on the 22nd. Tim put in the call for someone to hunt her down, but he wasn't holding his breath on that. Wanted for questioning was awfully low on the priorities list for most international crime hunters. And though all her travel documents are flagged, he's also not expecting her head back to a first world country using those documents anytime soon.

Thomas Ender had been extremely good as a spy. His evals indicated he was at the top of the CIA's talent pool. He'd been trained for long-term, sleeper-cell style missions, where he could spend literally years in place, working his way deeper and deeper into the local culture, keeping an eye on things, and "nudging" them one direction or another.

His assignment as Aref Al Jalil, had gone smoothly for almost two years. He was settled in, working as an opium smuggler, making contacts in several small villages between the Afghanistan/Pakistan border, returning good intel, and then things went wrong.

Apparently he was so well-settled, he'd found himself a wife and had a child. And Kort's "Stockholm Syndrome" actually translated into drone attack hit the wrong target, killing them, and apparently half of Ender's in-laws.

Once the CIA figured out what had happened, they captured him.

Then the Taliban got him back.

That was 2009. In the intervening six years, rumors of what Ender was up to had spread. But they never got past rumors. He was good enough that deep, deep cover kept him a ghost. However, if rumors (or the NSA, CIA, Interpol, MI6, and the like) were to be believed, he ran training camps out of Columbia and Uzbekistan, and managed to spend some time working with just about every major terror group on Earth.

Fornell's friend of a friend had something of a brainstorm, and decided to check James Ender's travels, and found that he'd been all over the world, all over the United States, and managed to do it while reporting for duty every shift.

Further digging found that James Ender had two passports and driver's licenses.

And if there's one thing the TSA doesn't do, it's give military personnel in uniform with correct travel documents a hard time.

"Draga, we got the IDs back on Simmers and Blake?" Tim asks as he closes the flap on the folder in front of him. (FBI's reports on Ender.)

Draga shakes his head.

"Okay, keep reading. Come on Ziva, let's get some lunch. What do you want, Draga?"

You don't have to be a genius to see Tim wants some time to talk to Ziva alone. She's been radiating mad all morning, and it's not getting any better. Draga's not stupid, so he's not having any issues figuring out that Tim is not going to even try to handle her the same way he did with him, so Draga doesn't get up at the mention of lunch. "Where are you going?"

"Thinking Carlo's. That okay with you?" Tim checks with Ziva.

Ziva nods.

"Cobb salad, no blue cheese, extra hard-boiled egg."

Tim makes a note of it on his phone. "You get IDs on them, let us know."

Draga nods. He's still going through the MI-6 file on Ender, mostly detailing what they suspected was a six month stint in the IRA.

"Okay. Come on, Ziva."

Like Draga, Tim's not stupid, and he also knows he can't handle Ziva the same way he did Draga. He can't just draw a line and tell her to toe it. Too much water under too many bridges there. So, once they had their food…

"Talk to me."

Ziva's still oozing angry. "I am not a child."

Okay, not what he was expecting, but he knows the right answer to that one. "No one thinks you are."

Ziva glares at him. Or maybe not the right answer. Obviously, according to Ziva, someone was treating her like a child. "He yelled at me. Actually yelled."
Tim's giving her the tell me more look. His husband senses kicking in and telling him this might be a good conversation for him to say as little as possible and do a whole lot of listening.

"Once we got home, he yelled at me for running to them. Screamed about it. Told me that if I ever disobeyed a direct order from him or Gibbs again, he'd fire me."

"Wow." Tim gets Tony was scared. He knows he would have been in a blind panic if Abby ran toward him into a dangerous situation, but he also hopes he'd handle the aftermath better than that. Though, given how bonkers he went on the whole pregnant-wife-thing, he's also awfully doubtful that he'd manage it.

"I am not a child. I can decide for myself if…"

He squeezes her hand. She's shaking her head, still angry.

"He has no right to…" She stabs her chicken.

"He's your husband. He's allowed to get scared and angry when you're in danger."

"And I'm not?"

Also not what he was expecting. Apparently they aren't just talking about Tony reacting to danger. "Not saying that. After the freezer, when I got calmed down, and it was her turn to go crazy, Abby hit me, couple of times, until I held her wrists and made her stop. Only reason I didn't get hit yesterday is because I ran away from the blast. I run into a blast, I get two steps past yelled at. So, I'm not going to say you're not allowed to be scared and angry, too. But it's not the same for you or her as it is for us."

Ziva's not buying that at all. "Of course it's the same."

"No, it's not." Tim takes a bite of his lunch. "Are you pregnant?"

"Are you insane?" Not buying it has morphed into seriously irked.

"Not any more so than normal," Tim says dryly. "You pregnant?"

"No."

"Trying?"

She rolls her eyes. "Soon."

"So, are you really certain you're not pregnant?"

"It's extremely unlikely."

"But it's not impossible."

Tim's noticing he's about to get some Ziva anger aimed at him if he doesn't get to the point soon, and it had better be an awfully good one. "It's very unlikely but not completely impossible."

"And that's why it's not the same. We… men… live in the present. Our bodies exist now and that's it. When they're gone they're gone. You… women… live in the present and, maybe, the future. There's always that chance that the next generation is along for the ride, and that's the difference. Sure, you're not pregnant. Sure, he knows that. But if yesterday was the end, you going with him took not just him out, not just you, but maybe any future he's got, as well."
That apparently was not a good enough point, she's glaring at him. "McGee, you are full of shit. It works that way for us, too. That is the father of any children I'm ever going to have, standing in front of a bomb. He's as much my future as I am his, and if he goes, that's the end of it, and I am an adult, and I am allowed to value that future more than a life without it."

Tim shrugs. He may not believe Ziva's right about that, because she not. It's not the same, at least, he doesn't feel that way, not in his gut, because it's the difference between… between the idea of a baby and a baby that might already exist… (He can feel Penny glaring at him on that, for being old-fashioned and patriarchal, but he's comfortable with it.) but he's also not going to argue about it. It probably does feel the same, to Ziva.

"You're the love of his life. You didn't need to die, and you ran into a bomb blast to be with him. You scared the shit out of him, probably Gibbs, too. I bet he's going to yell at you, or at least give you a headslap when you get in range again. I'd yell at Abby and probably say some god-awful stupid things if she did the same thing, because sometimes you're so damn scared all you can do is yell."

That gets a little nod out of Ziva. "She told us about not being able to carry in any groceries while she was pregnant."

"Exactly. Now, how ridiculously stupid is that compared to a bomb? It's really stupid. That's an entire level of special stupid that only guys get, and only about their pregnant wives, but it doesn't make it any less true. Jimmy feels the same way about Breena. I think it's just part of being a guy."

"It's part of being a human, McGee. Do you think I do not feel that same fear every time we go out? Or that Abby doesn't when you're at risk?"

Judging by the fact that he's never seen or heard of Abby, Ziva, or Breena hovering nervously over any of the three of them when they're doing fairly normal and extremely low-risk things, and he knows that both he and Jimmy did it for their wives when they were pregnant, he's thinking the answer is no. But he's also not about to say that.

And he also knows that there is fear there, and it's there all the time, and the fact that it's not the same doesn't make it any less real, or any less intense for the person feeling it, so he says, "I know you do. I know she does. I'm not moving to Cybercrime because I want career advancement. I would have taken a position as a tech down there if Vance hadn't gone for Department Head."

"And I ran away because that's my promise to her. That's our marriage. She and Kelly come first, and I can't put them first if I'm not alive. But... is that your promise to Tony? Will you live for him... Okay, that sounds wrong, but do you get what I mean?"

Ziva nods. "Yes, I do."

"Is that your marriage?"

Ziva shakes her head, and he thinks she's saying she doesn't want to talk about it, not commenting on their relationship.

"You two going to be okay?"

"Eventually."

"You two gonna be able to work together?"

She shrugs. Not a problem that has to be dealt with today. And honestly, not Tim's problem, either, at least, not until Tony gets back and takes over again as leader.

"Your head in the game enough to be here with me?" But that is his problem, and it does need to be dealt with today.

"Are you asking as my friend or the senior member of the team?"

"Right now, it's as Team Leader."

Ziva takes a sip of her soda. "I am, in the game, as you put it."

"Good. 'Cause I need you to ask a favor."

Getting back to the case was making Ziva happier. Work is almost always easier than relationship when the going is rocky. "A favor of whom?"

"Orli Elbaz. I've got Vance working it on our side, and I want to know from hers as well. Who knew where those subs were going to be, and did anyone reroute them?"

"You know she isn't head of Mossad anymore?"

"She's the highest link on the chain I can get to, unless you know the current guy…"

"I do, but not as well. He wasn't a fan of my father, and I do not think he'd be interested in doing me any favors."

"Okay. Get me what you can. It can't be a coincidence those ships were that close to each other."

Both of their phones buzz. Tim grabs his while waving to their waiter for the check and boxes to take their lunch back to the Navy Yard. Jason Simmers aka Xavier Martinez, last known as part of ETA. Vanished in 2010.

Tim looks at Ziva. "Didn't the ETA sign a cease-fire in 2010?"

"Yes, and disbanded in 2014."

"Unemployed terrorist looking for a new gig?"

Ziva shrugs. She's certainly heard worse ideas.

By the time they got back, Blake had a new name, too. Seamus Ivers, formerly of the IRA, dropped off the face of the Earth at the end of 2010, and apparently, rejoined it as Edward Blake, of the US Navy.

So… three terrorists… though Tim's thinking that doesn't quite sound right… Not for targets that big. Not if they're aiming at military targets. Three mercenaries? Special ops? He supposes it's possible that Ender found the biggest target he could locate as a way to strike back against the US, but, what… the Israeli Subs were just icing on the cake?

No. He's working for someone and that someone has to be a government, or a quazi-government with some real money and intel behind it.

From everything he'd seen from the info dump on Ender, (and having IDed Blake and Simmers, massive mounds of new info on them were pouring in) the man was more than capable of planning a mission where he'd get men in place four years ahead of striking.

His phone buzzed, and he saw it was Vance's private number.

"McGee."

"Feel like getting a coffee with me?"

"Yes, sir." What the hell is going on now? Intel too delicate to put in writing? Did I just screw something up? Are we being pulled off? Shit.

"Excellent."

Five minutes later, he was standing next to Vance, holding a cup of iced-coffee (it's really too hot for hot coffee) wondering what exactly Vance doesn't want to say to him in his office.

"I understand you have Ziva putting out feelers for why those subs were where they were?"

"Yes."

Vance sighs and rubs his eyes.

"I know you've been on Gibbs' team for a long time. And I know I take a hands off, let him take the case wherever it leads approach."

Tim feels his stomach start to knot up as it dawns on him what the problem might be. "So you're saying we weren't supposed to know those subs were there, either?"

"Mossad knows we spy on them. We know they spy on us. That's just how the game works. But, until Ziva started calling, they didn't know that we had managed to get our hands on that bit of intel. And they also hadn't know about the almost attack on the Reagan."

"Shit. Sorry."

Vance shakes his head. "Solve the case and all sins are forgiven."

"Yes, sir."

"I also have some news for you on our side of that. The path the Reagan was on had been planned out more than six months ago and was unaltered."

"Who planned it out?"

Leon smiles, but it's not a happy gesture. "Let's put it this way, if the people who planned it are compromised, we've got vastly bigger issues than a possible terror cell."

"I understand. Will someone be checking to make sure we don't have vastly bigger issues than a possible terror cell?"

"Yes, discretely." That answer makes Tim think that some members of the higher ups were about to answer some very uncomfortable questions.

"Okay."
"How close to solving this are you?"

"Closer than I was yesterday, not as close as I'd like to be." Tim doesn't say that he's desperately worried that he'll be able to figure out the puzzle, put all the pieces in place, but still not be able to catch the guys because they're better at hiding than he is at seeking. "I've got positive IDs on everyone. More information is coming in by the minute, but we're playing catch-up."

Vance nods, finishes his coffee, and says, "Play harder," as he heads back into the Navy Yard.

The thing is, as he's sitting there with Ziva and Draga, is that none of the three of them are the ideas guy.

Okay, that's kind of dumb, sure he's the ideas guy, as long as those ideas involve a computer. And Ziva's the ideas girl, as long as those ideas involve a gun. And Draga might be the ideas guy, as long as it involves seeing some little detail the rest of the missed.

But those are ideas. None of them are the IDEAS guy.

Right now, they're missing their ideas guys. Faced with a Mount Everest of facts and evidence, Gibbs or Tony would be the one to have the Eureka! moment and know what to do or where to look next.

And for the most part it's the three of them that do the looking.

And they're doing great at looking. They've got scads of information now. Wading through piles and piles of it. All three of those men have had long and glorious careers blowing stuff up and killing people for whichever "cause" was paying the bills. And Tim, Ziva, and Draga are reading up, learning patterns, getting familiar with how these guys think and why.

What they don't have is where the hell they're located now.

Or how they got off that ship.

Or how they all got onto it, too. Who got Simmers and Blake on the Reagan in the first place? Or, once again coincidence?

Or how they knew when and where to hit.

Or why three guys, three guys who are really great at what they do, used a frigging dead battery to power their detonator. Was the point even to blow up the Reagan, or just scare the hell out of everyone?

Sigh. Tim turns another page, learning more about Blake's training as an explosives expert.

"Think they're in Tanzania?" Draga asks.

Tim shrugs. It's possible. "Any of their aliases go traveling recently?" Specifically, and this is something that worries him deeply, is the idea that the three of them boarded planes using their military IDs and got out of the country before NCIS was even looking for them.

Sure, they requested intel on that, and yes, they set the BOLO, but the fact that nothing has popped up can be just as much a matter of the TSA being asleep at the wheel as those three are still in the US. (In fact, given the CVs Tim's reading on these three, it's more likely not seeing anything is the TSA asleep at the wheel than these three still being in the States.)

But, now that they've got IDs for all three with their real names, the list of potential aliases just got a whole lot longer."

"I'm checking on that," Draga answers.

Tim's staring at his screen, looking at reports connecting the explosives in Simmers' fortress of Solitude to "explosions" (Sometime around 2009 most of the West realized it was in the best interest of everyone if any bombing that could be passed off as some sort of industrial accident, was.) in Ireland, England, Canada, the US, and Australia, and the residue they found at Blake's place.

So, at the very least Simmers and Blake are working together, and they can put the explosives that just about blew them up in Blake's hands. And they can now confirm that Blake really is Seamus Ivers. The facial recognition was only 92% sure, but no two bombers use the exact same explosive recipe, and the chemical composition on the explosives is identical.

Wonderful. More pieces together. Still no closer to finding them.

Tim checks his email, sure he's not going to find that any of the three of them got caught in a BOLO, but he might as well hope.

Nothing.

Simmers and Blake were on the Reagan together. They could talk to each other easily. Ender wasn't. There had to be some way they communicated with each other.

No phone records. No financials. No useful emails.

So, how were they doing it?

He's tapping his fingers on his keyboard, rubbing his forehead. They never did get around to combing through social media. Worth a shot.

"We still don't know how they were talking to each other. Social media time. Ziva, you take tumblr. Draga, you're on Facebook. I've got Twitter. They had to talk to each other, let's find it."

Two hours later, they finally did hit the eureka moment. "Guys!" Draga sounds really excited.

Tim and Ziva look up at Draga.

"They're all players on Minecraft. Got their own server and everything!"

Tim remembers that thing about the NSA watching people online on gaming communities. "That's where they're talking?"

"Think so. And… yeah… they're on now."

Tim quietly sends a quick thanks to God, and starts to hack. "I've got this. Gear up. Ziva, let Vance know what is up. I'll have a location in…" He taps the keyboard waiting for his computer to find what he needs. "Fredricksburg, Maryland. Let's go!" He's up and moving to the car while lifting his phone to his ear to call in back up and the bomb squad. They almost got blown to smithereens once, they're not taking that chance again.

There are times when Tim is more than vaguely worried about the militarization of local police forces. Like, he very rarely thinks they actually need tanks or tank-like transports. (NCIS seems to manage just fine without them.) And having dealt with a decent number of LEOs who would find counting to twenty-one difficult unless they were naked, he's… skeptical is probably a good word, about their ability to use those weapons and the tactics that go with them well.

But right now, as he's being introduced to Lt. Jeffery Tomlinson, Fredricksburg SWAT, he's feeling pretty comfortable with the fact that Tomlinson knows what he's doing, and he's got enough firepower behind him to take out a moderately sized country, like say, France.

They're in a "Lawn Care" van, three streets away from the target house, in front of a foreclosed on house, and Tomlinson actually has two guys very slowly mowing the lawn.

In front of them is a bank of monitors, showing the house their perps is in from four separate angles.

"Once we got the call, we set up the surveillance," Tomlinson says, as he shows them how to control the camera feeds. "Nothing in that house has moved since we've gotten the call."

"Good. How'd you set it up?" Tim asks. "One of them is CIA-trained and probably knows what to look for."

"Saw that when we got your call. We went in with a UPS truck, and delivered 'packages' with hidden cameras to the front porches of a few of the neighbors."

"Cool." For several minutes Tim, Ziva, and Draga just watch, getting a feel for the layout. They've got really good line of sight. In fact, it's too good.

This is some sort of trap waiting for them. Tim can feel it. Ziva's looking really nervous, too.

"Too easy?" If anyone would know, it's their Ninja.

"Yes." She's staring at the aerial shots of the neighborhood. There's no cover anywhere. It's a fairly new development, no trees, very few bushes, and the ones that are there are all small. "They're practically inviting us to come in and get killed."

"Sooo… what's the trap?" Draga asks.

"The warehouse was simple. This is probably simple too. Easy to hide. Easy to disarm, they don't want to blow themselves up. Easy to trip…" Ziva's looking back at the footage of the house. It's a basic, cookie cutter, low end of the expensive spectrum, house for yuppies. Lots of windows, big front yard, no trees. Two hundred other houses all exactly like it, all on .75 acre lots, all facing tidy-little two lane streets, arranged into a near-fractal of cul-de-sacs.

Ziva uses the controls on the cameras, scanning around, giving them a better view of the front of the house. "Does it look like they ever use the front door?"

"Be a lot easier to tell in winter," Tim says. Nothing like snow for making obvious footprints. July isn't very good for that.

Ziva shakes her head. "I know, but… The cars are parked on the driveway next to the garage and side entrance. The post box is at the end of the driveway. Who would use the front door? Police coming in."

"Give me a close up of the front of the house," Draga says. He looks, seeing, Tim has no idea what, but he says definitively, "Side door. They don't use the front."

"So..." Tim says, waiting to see what they're thinking.

Ziva focuses in a bit tighter. "Does that lump under the welcome mat look suspicious?"

"Looks like something I'd stay away from," Draga says.

"If I had any idea how much explosives they had, I would be tempted to just toss something onto the mat and let them blow up," Ziva says, flash of her old self showing through.

"But..." Tim says it, though he doesn't really need to. They all know 'but.' This is residential neighborhood with hundreds of people in it, and they've got no idea what all is in that house.

"Heat feed is online," one of the techs from the Fredericksburg SWAT says.

"Good!" Ziva says, keying it up.

It's honestly kind of boring. Three guys, sitting in front of computers. From the feed Tim's got on their servers, they actually are playing Minecraft right now. Probably. They're in creative mode and building something really big. The fact that they've also got a completely detailed, to scale, Nimitz-class aircraft carrier on their server means that whatever they're building, it's probably not just for fun.

"That can't be good," from Draga gets Tim's attention off of what they're building and back onto the heat cameras.

It takes him a few minutes to see it, but once he does... "Shit."

If it wasn't for the fact that Blake is part of this group, he'd probably be significantly less worried about the fact that there are multiple places on the house, like the front door, the garage doors, the back door, around several windows, that aren't radiating heat the way the rest of the house is.

It's July. It's 93 degrees outside. Most of the house is radiating a bit cooler than that, which makes sense, they've probably got AC going on the inside. But, if say, there were large blocks of something very solid, something that didn't transmit cool well, there would be darker, hotter sections, where whatever that dense material that wasn't transmitting the cool was.

And there are. A lot of them. And Tim's awfully sure those blocks are more of the C-4ish stuff Blake makes. The whole house is wired to blow, and from the looks of it, just about every entrance they could choose is set to blow anyone who comes in sky high.

"McGee," Ziva's voice, and her sounding concerned sends ice down his spine.

"What?"

She points to the square, cooler spots on each of the men.

"They're all rigged to blow, too, aren't they?"

"That would be my guess." She focused in closer on one of them. "Though I'd say they aren't switched on yet, this one is using both hands on his computer."
"Great. So, how do we get them out, without having them blow up the neighborhood?" He looks at Ziva, and she shrugs. Draga shakes his head. Tomlinson began setting up a plan to evacuate the neighborhood, which is something that Tim's in favor of in general, except the great line of sight means that as soon as they start doing it, the guys in the house will notice, and probably blow the place.

"You guys willing to get some bad press?" Tim asks Jeffery.

"Why?"

"They've got cameras all over the house. We can't move without them seeing it. If we could get a bunch of DEA or PD vans or something and go storming into one of the neighbor's houses, make a big deal about it, lots of noise and attention, maybe we could get in and get them shut down before they notice they really are the targets."

Draga looks up at that. "Better idea. Do that, but we'll gas them."

Ziva perks up considerably. "I like that. Big, huge show next door, I'll sneak up to the heat pump, hook in the canister, and then we can go in once they're asleep."

Tim knows the theory behind the gas. Sleeping bad guys don't put up any sort of fight. He also knows that as of this point no police force has managed to use it without killing at least half of the people they were trying to take down, and, honestly, at least half usually meant a whole lot closer to all of them.

If the Reagan had blown, that was at least 5700 lives, plus who knew how much nuclear fallout. Only sheer luck the warehouse didn't get them. And this house, in the middle of a neighborhood filled with people…

It's his call.

He got his cell and made it. Since the beginning of '14 all SWAT teams had been equipped with the gas. NCIS wasn't because they didn't usually go into situations like that, but Tim's call to Tomlinson's commander got the gas released for use.

He's not dying to capture these three, and neither is anyone else. Not today.

Half an hour later, on his orders, while the DEA staged a raid on the house two doors down, Ziva crept around to the back and hooked a non-descript canister into the house's HVAC system.

An hour after that, (while Tim personally apologized profusely to the owners of that house, assuring them that all the damage would be paid for, and the Fredricksburg PD made sure that all the nearby homes were evacuated) the bomb squad went in with gasmasks. Ender and Simmers were dead. Blake was going to have a whole lot of explaining to do, if he ever woke up.

But the EMTs who took custody of him after the bomb squad got him out didn't seem hopeful about him waking up anytime soon.

It took the bomb techs close to three hours to clear the house. And even after that, they weren't willing to guarantee that they'd found everything, or for that matter, short of tearing the whole place apart, that they ever could find everything.
But you can't process a scene if you can't go in it.

And the scene needs to be processed.

So, it was with extreme caution and very slow, very deliberate motions (and as much body armor as they could put on and still move) that Tim, Ziva, and Draga began going through the house.

Why every inch of that house was wired to blow was evident less than five minutes into going through the place, everything anyone could possibly need to roll the whole organization up was in there.

And that organization was much larger than three guys.

Much, much larger.

Tim had Fornell on the line before they'd even gotten halfway through pulling stuff out, and having done so, it was only an hour before the FBI showed up, with their own passel of bomb techs, explosive sniffing dogs, and probably every crime scene tech out of the Baltimore office.

Yeah, NCIS likes credit for big busts, but in the end domestic terrorism isn't their job. Not unless it happens to Navy or Marine personnel or their families.

Playing catch up, running down the likely fifty to a hundred guys in this group, Tim was fine with handing that off. They got their guys for their crime, and that was enough.

And if it looked like there was more Navy or Marine servicemen involved, Fornell had promised they'd get the call as soon as they knew.

It was well after midnight when Tim was finishing up the first of his reports.

He'd talked to Vance when they got in, debriefed him on what they had found, the most pressing bit being that this group appeared to be large enough to make good on Simmers' enemies list, so even though Simmers was dead, the protection details couldn't yet be lifted.

Then came the process of the first report, namely a general what all happened when and why. There'd be more detailed reports later, in which every single second of the day would have to be accounted for, but those could wait until tomorrow. (Checking the clock on his computer, they could wait until later today.)

Tim rubs his eyes and was about to hit the send button when his phone rang. Vance's secretary was requesting that he head upstairs to talk to the Director.

Tim didn't like the feel of that request. They'd already debriefed, so this added call was making him nervous. But he hit send, and headed up, wondering what was going to happen next.

"Agent McGee," Vance says as he heads in. He's not smiling, but he doesn't sound angry, either.

"Director."
He looks over and sees Kort standing next to Vance's desk, looking smug. Vance looks smug, too. Something weird is about to happen, and Tim's aware of it, on edge. He doesn't like being dropped into the middle of a set-up without being told what the set-up is.

"Mr. Kort, on behalf of his organization, felt it was necessary to complain about the handling of today's incident. He wanted to voice his, and the CIA's, distress at losing such a valuable 'asset.'"

Tim's staring at Vance, trying to see where this is going. Vance isn't smiling, but there's that amused, enjoying himself look in his eyes.

"I was thinking, that as the Agent in charge of today's actions, that you should have the chance to respond directly to Mr. Kort."

"Thank you, Sir." Tim can see that not quite smile is still there, and he really hopes he's not misreading the cues, and that this is, in fact, the guy who said he'd pay to see him cuss out the commander in charge of Lejeune setting him up for another version of that show.

Only one way to know for sure.

"And would this be a response from me personally, or from NCIS as a whole, Sir?"

Vance's smile broke through for a half a second. "I think, in this matter, you're more than qualified to speak for NCIS as a whole, Agent McGee."

"Ah. Good." Tim turned to face Kort. "Kort, fuck off and die you ungrateful son of a bitch. I got all of their phones, all of their computers, all of their papers, and their safe house, all intact, and now all in the hands of the FBI who are having a field day with all of this intel they've never seen before because you bastards never share.

"I got all of their contacts. There were fifty-seven people on that Minecraft server and unlike the NSA trolling operations, none of them are thirteen-year-olds just looking to have a good time.

"What you and the CIA couldn't do in five years, my team did in five days. You don't want your valuable assets dead, do your own damn job, and risk your own ass to capture them yourself. Me and mine aren't dying for your fuck ups. And I'm sure as hell not risking three maniacs blowing up an entire neighborhood just to preserve your assets. We clear?"

"Crystal." Kort looks at Leon, who is, for the first time, noticing that McGee's actually pretty tall. "That was impolitic, Director."

"Oh, my, you are right." The full force of Vance's sarcasm was withering. "I am shocked, deeply shocked at what Agent McGee had to say. He's usually much more polite. McGee!"

"Yes, sir."

"You and your entire team are being placed on paid leave. Once your reports are filled out, I do not want to see any of you here again until August. For the next week, I want you to go home, rest, relax, and think about the grave severity and dire consequences of saying impolitic things to pretentious assholes who upon being offered cake, ice cream, and cookies complain about the lack of whipped cream with sprinkles on top and deserve to have their ungrateful asses kicked."

"Yes, sir." Tim nods, trying very hard not to smile.

"Go on. Wrap up that report, and I'll see you in a week. Now, Mr. Kort, do you have any other complaints I can deal with?"
It was a bit after two-thirty when Vance finished reading McGee's report. Clear, concise, matched DiNozzo's, Draga's, and Tomlinson's.

It was the final wrap up that Vance found most interesting. When the case is closed, the Team Leader writes up what happened. He's gotten hundreds of them from Gibbs and a few from DiNozzo at this point, and McGee's was similar, until he hit the end.

The final section had the heading:

Unanswered Questions:

1. How did they get off of the Reagan?
2. Why was the battery that powered the detonator dead?
3. Why stay in the US?
4. Who actually killed Thomas Ender?
5. How did they know those subs were going to be there?

Vance stared at those questions. He doesn't know the answers, and if what the doctors are saying about Blake being brain dead are right, he's not going to be providing them, either.

FBI's problem now.

He flicks off his monitor, and stands, ready to head home, when he hears his door open. He sent Sharon, his secretary, home after McGee and Kort left. No reason for her to stay while he read reports.

"Hello." And while it's true he's not a field agent, he does keep a gun in his top desk drawer, and he's opening that drawer as he greets the figure entering his office.

"Leon."

He knows that voice and relaxes, sliding the drawer shut. "Don't sneak up on people like that, Clayt." Jarvis took a few steps into his office.

Jarvis is not looking happy. And Leon can imagine why, it's after two in the morning, and instead of being home, he's here. "CIA is pissed."

"Oh, come on, Kort deserved every word of what he got, and if he can't handle McGee telling him to fuck off, it's time for a new job."

"That's not why CIA is pissed. And that's not why they'd call me in." That's when what Vance said really starts to get to Jarvis. He spends a moment thinking about who was on DiNozzo's team, and finally remembers which one McGee was, the tech guy who was running the interesting test on Cybercrime. He cussed out Kort? "Really?"

"Really." Vance says with a smile.

"Amusing?"

Vance nods. "For a whole thirty seconds there Kort actually looked almost pissed off. That mildly annoyed, better than everyone else in the universe mask of his almost cracked. So if it's not about Kort, why are you here?"
"I'm here at two forty-three in the morning because at some time around one in the morning CIA Director Carl Hanson got the news that Ender had been killed."

Vance shakes his head. Really, they're going to moan about it? "It was a clean kill, Clayt. Probably saved hundreds of lives."

"Ender was still a deep cover asset for the CIA, reporting directly to Hanson. Kort had been instructed to provide as much information as he could while protecting Ender's cover, but he was instructed to break that cover should it be necessary to get Ender out alive. According to his report, he was intending to tell DiNozzo of Ender's real allegiance should he get too close to catching him. He didn't think McGee was up to it, and if somehow he managed it, that McGee wouldn't be willing to use lethal force to apprehend Ender. Apparently the use of the gas wasn't the 'by-the-book' play he was expecting McGee to come up with, so he didn't reveal that the entire plan was for them to get captured, all of the info compromised, and for Ender to 'break free' again once we transferred him to an Afghani black-site."

Vance sits back down, feeling like his stomach is about to drop out of his body, and gestures to one of the chairs near his desk for Jarvis. "So Kort screwed the pooch, underestimated my man, and the CIA is mad at us?"

"Yes."

Vance sounds tired. "Clayt, it's too damn late for this. Kort keeps his cards too close to the vest, he gets what he gets."

Jarvis flashes him a look that indicates he agrees with Vance, but there's more bad news coming. "They want an inquiry."

"They can have one, but I'll scream so loud and hard about what they were doing it's going to look awfully bad. The fact that they were running an illegal op on US soil will be the least of what I'll throw at them. I'm not letting them crucify McGee for doing his job and doing it well."

Clayton Jarvis stares at Vance for a moment. He knows Vance is protective of his people, but he also knows Vance has the political skills to let one take something for the team if it'll work better in the long run. If he's willing to embarrass the CIA over this, burn those bridges… "It's that cut and dried?"

"We go to the wall on this one and we fight to the last man, Clayton. If we don't, none of our men will ever step up when we ask them to. I'll send you the report. It was a clean kill. Even with Ender being an asset, Blake and Simmers weren't and they were both wearing functional kill switches that could have..." Vance turns his computer back on and sorts through his reports. "According to the bomb squad, if any of those vests had gone off, they would have touched off an explosion large enough to level three thousand meters in all directions, as well as shower debris all over the surrounding area. When they evacuated, there were sixty-three people in that area, and since it was late afternoon on a Friday in summertime, forty-six of them were children. He made the right decision, and if the CIA wants someone to fall on his sword, they need to tell Kort it's time to get sharpening, 'cause it's not going to be McGee."

Clayton nods. "Send me all of the reports. I'll make sure we put the full power of the Navy behind McGee on this one. Knowing we won't roll over should shut the CIA up, but if it doesn't, we'll fight."

"Okay." Vance sighs and reaches for his phone.
"Thought you were just about to head off."

"I was, but now I've got one more call to make."

"It's almost three in the morning. Let him sleep. Once I've got the full report, I'm going to talk to CIA again. If this is as cut and dried as you're saying, the CIA won't fight."

And that was Friday.

And on Saturday, a bit after noon, when he was just getting up, Leon found a text from Jarvis: CIA folded. They're not going to make an issue of it. Ender officially died in 2009, he's already got his star on the wall, and that's all that needs to be said about that.

A few seconds later Vance got Are you going to tell McGee?

No. Not having a good agent second guessing himself for doing his job right.

Okay.
Kelly's fussing. She's on her back, on a blanket, on the floor, under one of those baby play arch things. It's a plastic u-shaped device with colorful stuffed animals hanging off of it. Supposedly, when she's a bit older, she'll be able to kick and punch at them, make them move. Right now they're just bright shapes for her to stare at.

Gibbs is on the sofa, also on his back, foot and knee propped up, ice on his knee. It's Saturday afternoon, and he knows why Kelly cries. Being stuck on your back sucks.

He carefully starts inching his way to getting onto the floor to get her, but Abby, who had been in the kitchen, making lunch for both of them, beats him to it, scoops Kelly up, and puts her on his chest.

She glares at him. "You staying put?"

He rolls his eyes and sighs, focusing on Kelly, stroking his hands down her back.

Abby nods and heads back to the kitchen.

Gibbs looks at Kelly, who's calming down and staring at him. "I'm bored, too."

"I heard that," Abby calls back.

"It's not a secret."

Abby came back into the living room a few minutes later, drinks for them in hand. She takes Kelly from him while he very carefully pulls himself up, and then gives her, and his coffee, back to him. "Chicken lettuce rolls sound good?"

Gibbs nods at that. For all the crud they eat on duty, food at the McGee house is surprisingly healthy. Of course, that's probably counterbalancing all the crud they eat on duty. Though right about now, he'd really, really like something with a ton of fat and probably some bacon on top. He might suggest burgers for dinner. Tim's home, sleeping off yesterday, which they still haven't heard about beyond last night's Got 'em. Home late. text, and he's not helpless with a grill.

"Got another possible nanny you can try to scare into submission this afternoon."

"Wonderful." Gibbs doesn't feel particularly scary lounging about in his pajamas, knee in a brace, four days of stubble on his face. Crabby sure. But right now he feels like any of the potential nannies take one look at him and start to get nervous that they'll be taking care of him, too.

Or maybe that's him projecting.

He's nervous about it. And that's part of the reason why he's bored and crabby, because he's taking this seriously, staying down, healing.

Once he got enough of the pain meds out of his system that his brain was back online, he was planning on telling everyone to stop pampering him, and let him go to work. As much as he's sure that putting the fear of Gibbs into potential nannies is important, (That's his darling girl there, and they had better well take the best possible care of her or they will answer to him!) terrorists trying to kill people takes a certain sort of precedence.

He'd been absolutely certain that the doc had been exaggerating, and that she was just trying to scare him into resting (wouldn't be the first time someone with a string of degrees next to his/her name told him to do something he didn't really need to do), and all he needed to get up and... and he did get up, and he felt the top half of his leg move immediately when he told it to, his hip and thigh were completely with the program and doing exactly what they were told to do. His knee and calf on the other hand... he felt the bottom half lag behind the top for a heartbeat or two, pain shooting through his knee, (and that was just getting up, he hadn't put any weight on his knee, yet) and he suddenly got the idea that maybe the doc knew what she was talking about on the whole ripping out his knee thing.

So, he keeps the brace on a lot, (even though it does dig into what is still his very bruised calf, and hurts like a bitch) because every time he moves without it on, he can feel that there is a lot more play in that joint than he wants. When he stands up to hobble over to the head, or get a shower, even with the brace, he can feel the slide between those bones, and he's very, very aware of how easily this could go very wrong.

So, for the first time ever, he's actually following doctor's orders and resting. And trying, but he's afraid he's not really succeeding, to not be a massive pain in the ass to Abby or Tim.

They've already got a baby, they don't need a helpless fifty-six-year-old living on their sofa, especially not for a year.

Sitting on his ass worries him on another level, too. Because there's only so much reading and sleeping he can do. Which means he's got lots of time to think. He did do a lot of thinking about the case, but thinking about the case reminded him of something.

One day soon, there won't be any more cases.

And when that's true...

He remembers the case they worked about the CO who ate his gun rather than face mandatory retirement. And he's not there, not at all, he's got Kelly and Tim and Abby, and Molly and the new baby, and lots of family stuff but... They all have their own lives and jobs and things that fill up each day.

And he's got the Shannon, which for some reason isn't nearly as done as he was expecting it to be at this point. Something about building cribs... (He's got some maple he's planing away, getting ready to find out if Baby Palmer is a boy or girl.)

But there's only so much woodworking he can do, and that's not twelve hours a day, every day...

And sure, once Shannon's done, he'll take her out, but he's not feeling much desire to just vanish for six months at a time anymore.

There's deskwork. They'll let him review cold cases and recommend 'new' leads on them until the reaper finally shows up for him. And like Mike, he'll be able to come back every now and again and 'help' (he's already checked the regs, post-mandatory retirement, he can't spend more than fifteen days a year on active duty). And if he feels like bouncing from one base to another, chatting with guys who are coming to the end of their enlistments, he could become a recruiter.

But for a guy who's used to working eighty hours a week, that's still a lot of down time.
Tim and Abby need a nanny. They need someone who knows the hours, understands why they can’t say, ‘we'll be home at seven,’ loves their baby, and will do everything to take great care of her.

He looks at Kelly, who's on his chest, chewing on his t-shirt. (She must have lost her pacifier in transit. Yep, it's on the carpet, just out of his reach. And he's damned if he's going to call Abby out here to make a whole other trip to get it. He's never been so frustrated by something being less than five feet away in his life.) so he gives her a finger to suck on, which she approves of. And honestly, though he is enjoying grandpa-hood, and though he loves time with Kelly, he can't see himself doing this full time.

He loved his own Kelly beyond all reason, but that doesn't mean he wasn't about to jump out of his skin the week Shannon had pneumonia, and he was on stay-at-home-dad duty.

Of course, he was a really different guy then.

"What do you think?" he asks Kelly. "You and me? Let mom and dad have someone who already understands the insane hours?"

"Think about what?" Abby asks, sitting down next to him. "Did you lose your paci?" she asks Kelly.

Gibbs nods. "Think she might be getting hungry, too." He gestures to the large drool soaked spot on his shirt. If it's anything to guess by, Kelly's looking for a breast.

Abby sighs. "Okay." She grabs the pacifier off the floor and hands it to Gibbs, who didn't mind getting his left hand back. Then she got up again, headed into the office, rooted through the bag with his clothing in it, and found Gibbs a clean t-shirt.

A moment later, she's got Kelly in hand, who is indeed trying to get to a breast, and Gibbs is changing out of one t-shirt for another.

"Can I eat my lunch?" Abby asks Kelly.

Kelly whines at her.

"I'll take that as a no." Abby says. She hands Gibbs her lunch, "Hold this," while settling Kelly in to nurse again. "You just ate. What is going on?"

"Almost six weeks old. Growth spurt time."

"Great. So, what were you asking her?"

"Just playing with an idea. Not sure it'd work. Not sure I'm actually up for it." Abby's looking intrigued. "Gonna retire soon enough. Maybe you don't need a nanny for all that long…"

Her eyebrows shoot up. "You serious?"

"Maybe. I don't know. Went pretty stir crazy when I was on all babies all the time with my Kelly, but… You need someone who understands the hours are crazy, someone who gets why you can't tell them when you'll be home."

"True…" Abby's nodding. "Keep thinking about it. If you're serious, then we'll talk about it, but… you sure you're not just looking at the calendar and realizing you've suddenly got nothing planned?"

If he could reach, he'd kiss her forehead, but he can't, not without seriously changing his position, so he squeezes her hand and smiles. "Always did know me too well."
A/N: So the last few chapters were huge because I wanted to create a narrative arc for each day. These chapters I've got planned coming up are smaller, all little arcs, complete bits, but there'll be times I can shove a bunch of them together into bigger arcs. (Well, sometimes, sometimes little chapters do the job. You get the point.) Anyhoo... assuming either way works with the narrative flow... do you guys prefer smaller, daily (ish) updates, or longer, further apart updates?
She's young, perky, professional. Her name is Heather Yung.

Gibbs doesn't like her.

Abby does. Probably because she came in, talked about her experience with babies a bit more, played with Kelly some (she seemed to approve, or at least didn't cry) then asked politely about his knee, listened carefully, offered some helpful suggestions, and then told him about how well her grandfather was doing after they put the artificial knee in, and how much better artificial joints are these days than they used to be. According to her, her grandfather was up on his feet without a cane only three months after the surgery and that a year later he was only barely limping. She seemed to think that was comforting.

Mostly she just made him feel seventy million years old, and broken on top of that. Sure, she's twelve (okay, not really, she's probably twenty-six) and bustling with useful purpose and energy. No need to rub that in.

When Heather got up to use the bathroom, Abby grins at him. Keep your butt on the sofa awfully clear in that expression.

He glares back at her, I hate the universe pretty clear in his.

That makes Abby laugh.

When Heather returns, Abby hands off Kelly, letting Heather put her down for her nap and that went… They both listened carefully, yep, smoothly. No crying. And in ten minutes Heather was down again, commenting on what an easy baby Kelly is, and they were talking about schedules, expected salary, and when she could start.

All in all, it was an hour out of Saturday, and by the end of it, Abby seems pretty pleased.

Once she saw Heather out, she sits down next to Gibbs and says, "So?"

He half shrugs. She's fine, on his face.

"Good enough?"

"Good enough." He says grudgingly, and it's not the sort of 'you'll do' statement he made about Tony. There's no affection here, just a recognition of the fact that Heather is good enough. "You can probably do better."

"Kelly seems to like her the best. No fussing on naptime."

"True." This was the first of the nannies who got Kelly down without any protest.

Tim wanders down a few seconds later, looking awfully out of it, hair sticking up in all directions and only wearing his pajama pants, and sat on the floor in front of Abby, resting his head on her knee. "Someone just leave?"
"Yeah. We had an interview today," Abby answers.

"Oh." He looks annoyed, mostly at missing it, not at her. "Why didn't you wake me up?"

Abby kisses his forehead. "Because when I finished Kelly's one AM feed, you still weren't home." Yeah, it wasn't too long after two that he finished his second report and headed home. He hadn't even told them about the team having the week off, yet.

"How'd it go?" Gibbs asks.

Tim nods. "Let me get some food, and I'll tell you all about it."

He's in the kitchen, located some chicken lettuce wraps ("Thank you, Abby!"), stuck half of them on his plate (it's after four, so he's hungry, but dinner's less than two hours away, so he doesn't want anything too big) when he notices a package on the kitchen table.

"What's this?" Tim asks, carrying it into the living room (food forgotten for the moment) and putting it on the coffee table.

Abby shrugs at him. "No idea. Has Thom Gemcity on the address, so I didn't open it. UPS guy asked about that though, and I let him know that it's your penname and that stuff with that name can be sent here."

Tim feels a shiver of fear go up his spine. Things with Thom Gemcity on them should go to his publisher or agent. Not to his home. Never to his home. He checks more carefully and sees that Thom Gemcity is a redirect, it had gone to his agent first.

He sighs with relief. Gibbs is watching him carefully.

"Tim?"

"Fan stuff shouldn't come here."

Gibbs nods; he remembers why fan stuff isn't supposed to come to Tim's house.

Tim smiles at him while heading back into the kitchen for his food and a knife. Yes, fans are great, but no, he does not want them knowing where he lives, that one time was more than enough.

A minute later he's back and opens it up and finds a very cute little basket of baby goodies, along with a few onesies, and some stuffed animals. Okay, good, it's all pink and covered in little flowers. Standard cute baby goodies.

Tim's checking a card, thinking it might have actually been from his agent, when he realized he had no idea who it was from. Which meant this was from a fan.

Which meant somehow one… shit there's a bunch of packages in this box… several of his fans knew he had a child.

He was getting into freak out, hunt down the stalker, make sure his family is safe mode, when Abby says (pulling him out of it) (for a second, at least), "You've got a publicist, right?"

"Yeah."

"And she posts things online about your life?"

"Sometimes." Oh shit! He's trying to remember if he ever specifically said he didn't want anything
"When was the last time you checked your Twitter or Facebook page?"

Tim winces. That's a really good point. "Damn it." He gets up, goes upstairs, grabs his phone and begins to go through "his" tweets and almost drops the phone when he sees that there's a shot of Abby and Kelly, still in the hospital, along with the announcement that mom and baby were doing fine. Thom's Facebook page had the same thing.

And yes, the fact that he had close to twenty thousand congratulatory tweets/likes whatnot is nice, but in that he's in a frothing rage that his publicist posted that pic… and that he's seriously contemplating getting his gun and scaring the shit out of her…

Then he realizes he didn't send that picture to her. He sent it to his agent, who must have given it to her. Unlike his publicist, who works for his publisher and answer to them, not him, his agent actually is his employee, and he's a valuable property she wants to keep happy. After all, she's getting ten percent of each of his contracts, and at this point his contracts take her, on average, twenty minutes every three years.

His hand is shaking while he dials the numbers. She picks up on the third ring and before she could say anything he yells, "Doreen! What the fuck?" (He half notices that Gibbs appears to approve of this, and if his knee was working, would be volunteering for the scare-the-shit-out-of-whoever-did-this plan. Meanwhile, Abby is looking really irked at him, and signs Kelly's napping!)

"Tim?" she's sounding really startled by that. She's never heard him raise his voice, let alone yell or curse.

"I just got baby presents from a fan," he says, still angry, much more quiet.

"Yeah." To her this is really obvious. Of course fans will send baby presents. That's part of what fans do. "We decided to send them on immediately. If we waited until we do your usual quarterly fan mail drop they'd be too small for Kelly. Four more packages showed up today. How's she doing?"

"You posted pictures of my child online!" His voice is rising again, and she's still clueless.

Obviously he's pissed, but this is just weird… So she patiently explains, "Well, yeah. Fans love stuff like that. They love little peeks into your life behind the writing. It makes them feel like you're a real person and keeps them happy and eagerly anticipating your next book. Any ETA on that, by the way?"

He's staring at the ceiling, vibrating with the desire to reach through the phone and pull her lungs out. He finally pulls it together enough to head into the basement (which should minimize the risk of waking up Kelly), shut the door behind him and say, "Do you remember about ten years ago, when that…" he can't even start to think of a word for that, so he goes with, "fan started killing the people I was basing my characters on? You remember how he hunted down Abby and tried to kill her? And, remembering that, WHY THE FUCK WOULD YOU POST A PICTURE OF MY CHILD ONLINE!?"

Silence meets his ears.

And Doreen suddenly gets it, really gets it, and realizes that she's got no idea how to fix this. "Would you like me to take them down?" she asks meekly.

"Them?" Tim's heart is beating so hard he can actually see the pulse in his eyes when he shuts them.
"It's just the one pic. Only one I had."

He inhales deeply and lets it out long and slow. "How many places did you post it?"

"Fifteen," she says, very quietly, suddenly very aware of the fact that Tim's only got two books left on his contract, and that it's suddenly extremely likely he's not resigning with her when it comes time to negotiate the contract for the next three books. "You've got some fan sites in addition to the Facebook and Twitter and tumblr, and there are the bio pages on Amazon, Barnes and Noble, and Goodreads so…"

"Fuck!" He scans through the Twitter feed. That shot had been retweeted and reposted hundreds of times. "It doesn't matter if you delete it or not. Do not ever, EVER post any pictures of Kelly or Abby. If I want pics of them up, I'll post them myself, and you'll note, I haven't posted any pictures of Kelly at all and the only ones of Abby are our engagement and wedding shot. That's it. I don't want anything beyond that out there."

"Okay. What do you want us to do with the baby presents?"

"Oh, God." He thinks about that for a moment. He's too damn nervous to use them, even though the rational part of his mind is sure they're just nice little presents. "Donate them. There has to be a shelter or something that works with pregnant women who need baby gear. Write up thank you notes for me. I'll copy and send them out."

"Okay, I'll get on that."

"Good."

Pulse still racing, he fired off a quick thank you for all the well wishes, and another one saying that Kelly had everything a baby could possibly need, and that while he was touched by all the presents, if fans felt moved to send presents that donations to Wounded Warrior Program or whatever local services were available to low-income mothers would be a very fitting present.

Tim spent about five minutes just pacing around his basement. Not really looking at anything, just trying to make himself calm down.

He knows that immediately moving and changing their names is not only not rational, it's also not warranted. Almost everyone on earth who's even a little famous has their private life splashed all over, and all that happens is that they get people looking at them. But he can't help but feel the fear that there are all these people out there who not only know he has a wife and child, but knows what they look like.

One of those maniacs found him before.

They can do it again.

And the vulnerability of it makes him want to be sick.

Eventually, he called his sister. "Hey, when you told me about starting your own imprint, were you serious?"

She sounds surprised that he's calling her in the middle of the day to talk publishing, but says, "Yes."
"You want a bestselling mystery writer? I move about fifty-thousand copies in hardback per book. More in trade."

"Tim?" She can't believe this. They've talked about him going indie, and about what she's hoping to do with her own start-up. But he's always been so set on staying with his own machine that he mostly just listened and smiled.

"My agent just screwed us big time."

"Doreen? Really? I've always heard good things about her. What, she skimming or something?"

"No, nothing like that. She posted pictures of Kelly online."

"Oh." Sarah knows that that's not a traditional definition of my-agent-screwed me. She also knows that's a hot button issue for Tim. "We're starting up a YA Urban Fantasy imprint. Not that I wouldn't love someone who's got a name that actually sells books, but…"

He nods on the other side of the phone, understanding that he's not part of their brand. "Okay. I've been with Doreen since '03. Never shopped around, and I don't want to query again. You know anyone who's any good at this stuff?"

"Yes. I can shoot you a few names. Trust me, Thom Gemcity isn't going to have to submit queries. Tell me more about it?"

"She published the baby shot I sent all of you to let you know Kelly was on the outside online without telling me."

"Oh! Ouch."

"On all my fan sites, twitter, Facebook, tumblr. It's everywhere. They're sending me baby presents."

"That's cute."

"Yeah. Until I find they've got razor blades or trackers or some other shit in them."

"Tim." Her voice is making it very clear that he's being, not silly, not with his history, but overreacting is likely.

"I know. I really do. Doesn't mean I wasn't about to shit myself when I saw it."

"Okay. Just calm down. Talk books more?"

"Yes." He nods. Books are easy. Books are calm.

"You know, you've got the name recognition, you could go it on your own. Skip the publishers all together and put it out yourself."

"More work than I want to do."

"Maybe not. We get our imprint going, you can contract with us on flat fee basis. At least until we've got some real sellers, that's part of our business model. We'll get you set up with typesetting, cover art, editing, what not. You just write the book and do whatever publicity you normally do."

"Normally my publisher does that."

"Oh."
"Yeah. I have no idea how they get the damn things in book stores, and I don't have the time to find out."

"It's not too hard. Not for someone who's already selling as well as you are. Besides, how many bookstores do you think will still be around by the time your contract is up?"

"That's a point. It'll be 2018 by the time I'm out, and…"

"And almost the entire market will be digital by then. And trust me, if I can get a book on Amazon, you can, too. It's not rocket science."

"By 2018, how set will your brand need to be? I mean…"

"Set. Blog placement, reviews, ad networks, I know that for my market. I don't for yours."

"Okay."

He sits there quietly, neither of them talking for a minute, then, "Tim, I'm about to be late for dinner. Talk to me about this tomorrow? We'll get a plan set up, and I'll give you some names for possible new agents if you want to try that."

"Sure."

"Things like this happen a lot?" Gibbs asks when Tim heads back out of the basement.

"First time that's happened." Tim paces around their living room, staring at the presents. Yeah, he got lots of congrats tweets and whatnot when they got married. No one sent presents. "My core demographic is twenty-five to fifty year old males, they usually don't get too weird about fan stuff, but sometimes they do, and my weird fans are really weird."

Abby's unpacked all the baby gear from the box, but hasn't taken anything out of its packaging. "You don't want to keep this, do you?"

"It's cute." The set closest to him appears to be a stuffed Bunny from the Pat the Bunny books, the Pat the Bunny books, and a little white hat with white and a blue bow and pink bunny ears. It's adorable. He's terrified it's got a tracker in it or slow acting poison, or just something. "I can see it's cute. But, no, I don't want it in the house. I know it's fine. I'm sure there's nothing bad in there, but…"

"It's okay, Tim," Abby says. If there's anyone who is going to sympathize with him on his fear of what might happen if his fans figure out where he lives, it's Abby.

He puts everything back into the box. "You guys mind if I go take this to Goodwill?"

Abby hugs him and shakes her head. "Not at all. Bring some dinner home?"

"Sure. What do you want?"

Before Gibbs got a chance to say something she says, "I think Gibbs is in junk food withdraw."

"Okay. How about I hit the diner and tell Elaine you've been stranded at my place and Abby keeps force feeding you vegetables?"
Gibbs smiles at that. "Good. Food. Tell us about the case. Snuggle your girls."

Tim kisses Abby, and then pats Gibbs' shoulder, and heads up to find a shirt.
“Did I lose a day, Honey? It’s Saturday, right?” Elaine asks as Tim heads into the diner. She’s not facing him, so he thinks she identified him by his car coming in, as opposed to watching him walk in. She turns to him, and as she does, she sees he’s very much not in his Special Agent garb. “Oh, it’s Saturday all right. You’ve got a whole other side to you, don’t you?”

He’s got a ratty MIT t-shirt, sneakers, and his flannel jammy pants on. Wrist cuff and the bottom of the bicep cuff tattoo are visible. It’s occurring to him that he didn’t brush his hair before leaving the house.

“Doesn’t everyone?”

Elaine smiles at him and says, “Amen to that. So what brings you out here in your pjs?”

“Wasn’t planning on heading out. But I’ve got Gibbs trapped at my place, and Abby keeps feeding him vegetables. He tells me he’s starving, and he needs you to save him.”

Elaine chuckles at that. “And am I just rescuing him from healthy food, or am I rescuing all three of you?”

“All three of us. Please?”

“Not a problem, Hun,” she says, placing a coffee cup (of course it’s decaf) in front of him. “For the wait.”

“Thanks, Elaine.”

She handles their orders and the other customers, but after a few minutes she drifts back. “So, when do I get to see that baby girl of yours?”

“Tomorrow or next Sunday, I promise. We’ll come in for breakfast before church.”

“You better. He’s been showing me pictures since the sonogram, time for me to see his little princess in the flesh.”

Tim smiles at that. “You will.”

“So, why’s he trapped at your place?”

He told her about Gibbs’ knee, and staying with them. She nodded and made appropriate sounds as he worked his way through the story.

“Good that he’s got someone looking after him. That man’s been alone for too long.”

Tim grins and sips his coffee, feeling the stress of the presents finally really fade away. “He’s been holding out, just waiting for you to make an honest man of him.”

She laughs at that, waves at him (brushing his comment off), smiling, and shakes her head. “My husband might have something to say about that.”

“All the good ones are married.”

She laughs again. Her husband, the man who actually makes all the food they adore, whacked the bell, and Tim knew those to-go boxes meant their order was up.

“Thanks, Elaine,” he said, paying and heading out.

Summertime dinner on the porch. Nothing better than that. Gibbs is on the chaise. (Which Tim usually shares with Abby, but he’s not resenting not having a place on the prime lounging real estate.) He and Abby both have chairs at the table. Kelly’s in her bouncy seat, kicking her feet a little, making the chair bounce.

The sun’s low enough everything is pleasantly orangy-pink, the air is hot and humid, but not oppressively so. A tall pitcher of ice cold mint-lime-soda (Abby calls it non-alcoholic mojitos) is sitting on the table, drops of water meandering down it.

Cicadas are chirping away. Lightning bugs aren’t out yet, but as the shadows get deeper, they will be.

While they eat, Tim tells them about the last day of the case, starting with the info dump, and ending with telling Kort to fuck off. (Gibbs laughed out loud at that, very pleased by the idea.)

As he’s wrapping up the story (by then the lightning bugs were out, and Kelly had headed up for yet another nap) Tim says, “I just can’t shake the feeling that there’s a big piece of it missing. I mean, I know we don’t usually get everything tied up into a tidy bow. I know there’s usually something missing…”

“Tim, when it’s over, walk away.” Gibbs’ voice is serious about this, because he doesn’t want Tim gnawing on this one for years. But he has to admit, there’s that little niggle in the back of his head, too. The gut does not like this case, at all. But right now, everyone they were hunting is dead, (They pulled the plug on Blake at 3:30 in the morning, after the second doc declared him brain dead.) so it’s not like that niggle can lead to anything good. “We never get all the pieces.”

“I know, Jethro, but something just feels off about this.”

“Off like there’s another part ready to jump out and attack…”

Tim raises an eyebrow when Jethro says that. Sounds like he’s also feeling that sense of not done. “Yeah, but I don’t know how there could be. I got them. I got their communications system, that was all of them, but, it just feels… wrong.”

“What’s sticking out?” Abby asks.

“The dead battery. It’s such a dumb mistake. Come on, I carry back up batteries for everything we use. Draga has back-ups. Ender’s trained by the best, he runs a plan where he’s putting guys in place four years in advance, he’s gotten his hands on super-duper high-level secrets--We weren’t even supposed to know where those subs were. The Israelis weren’t sharing on that; we stole it--so how did he find out? Which is another thing that stuck out…” Tim waves that off, he had a point and he’s getting lost in the details, so he swings back to the original point. “He rigs the detonator with a dead battery? It’s just… wrong.”

“We don’t know he rigged it,” Gibbs adds.

“True. Blake probably did. That was his thing, but… He’s successfully blown up things on at least three continents, and he uses a dead battery?”
Abby thinks about that for a moment. “Why don’t you know who set the detonator?”

“What?” Tim asks. That hadn’t occurred to him.

“Is my team completely asleep at the switch? Why didn’t they tell you who put the battery in? Should have prints on it. After all, who wipes down a bomb detonator?”

Tim looks at Gibbs, who’s looking back at him. They did get prints. There were prints all over everything down in that storage area, but…

“Give me a second…” Tim gets up and goes to his computer. A few minutes later, he’s logged into his account at work, and checking the print reports. He’s scanning through it, and finally gets to the detonator. No prints.

Who wipes down a bomb detonator? The man who’s exceedingly cautious. But the man who’s exceedingly cautious also double checks the damn battery to make sure it works.

The man who wipes down the detonator is the man who knows the detonator is going to be found.

Shit.

He just about ran out to the back porch. “I’ve got to go see Leon.”

“What?” Abby asks, and Gibbs is looking pretty concerned.

“Your team wasn’t asleep. Well, sort of, they didn’t highlight it. The reason we didn’t know who set the detonator is because there were no prints on it. It had been wiped clean. This isn’t done, yet.”

“You want me to come?” Gibbs had successfully hobbled, by himself (and his crutches) the length of the living room and kitchen for dinner, and his knee didn’t feel like it had slipped the whole time.

Tim shakes his head. “No. But get on my computer and look around for evidence we don’t have but should. Something’s really wrong here.”

He wants to try and calm down, but it’s not working. He’s driving fast, that special, hyper-alert zone that he sometimes hits when his brain’s on overload so it focuses down on one thing and gets ultra-aware. Usually for him that’s a coding thing, but right now it’s a driving thing, too.

Right now he could tell you, from memory, the license plate of every car around him.

And it’s a driving thing because he won’t let his brain flail about on the case. Not enough intel. But something about this is really, really wrong.

“McGee?” Kayla Vance is very surprised to see him on their doorstep. He’s never been here when she was here. Last time he was here… No don’t think about that.

“Is your dad home?”

“Yeah. Come on in.” She turns and points toward the living room, calling out “DAAAAADDDD!”
Vance heads out of the dining room saying, “Kayla, what have I said about y…” Tim sees Vance’s face get tight and the tension in his posture shoot through the roof as he recognizes Tim standing there. By the posture he knows that Vance has a piece of the puzzle he doesn’t.

“Tim?”

_Shit, how bad is this? He’s calling me, Tim._

“Can we talk in private?”

“Yes, I think we should.” Vance leads him into his office. It’s a tidy room, lots of books, lots of boxing posters, a few trophies, some bronzed gloves, lots of pictures of the kids, a few pictures of the four of them from before Jackie died. Some pictures of the kids with Lara, and, stereotypes about dating the nanny aside (apparently it was working for Vance) there’s a new one on his desk of him, the kids, and Lara. It’s very much a shrine to the things that make Vance, Vance. Once he closed the door, he says, “What’s on your mind, McGee?”

Tim doesn’t sit down, and Vance doesn’t either. He leans against the edge of his desk, and Tim paces.

“The dead battery’s been bugging me since we found it. I was telling Gibbs and Abby about it, and I mentioned that we didn’t know who installed it.”

“Blake?”

“Probably. He’s the guy who does that. But we didn’t know. Abby asked us why didn’t we know that, because that’s like the number two piece of evidence she’d send up. Which is when I checked, because we should know that. Of everything we should know, that’s the top of the list.

“The detonator was wiped clean. The only guy who does that is the guy who knows the detonator is going to be found. Something’s really wrong on this one.”

Vance nods toward the sofa on the far wall of his office. “What do you drink, Tim?”

Tim feels his stomach knot up and his knees get that loose, wobbly sensation that means his body is sure something very bad is about to happen. He sits down, quickly, and licks his lips, his whole mouth suddenly very dry.

“I’m good, Sir.”

“We’re in my home. Here, I’m Leon.”

“Okay, Leon, I’m fine and right now; I don’t need a drink, but you offering me one and calling me by my first name is making me really nervous, so how about we just get to why you think I’m going to want a drink?”

Leon pours himself one, grabs the chair from behind his desk and drags it over so he can sit in front of Tim. “Bit after two-thirty this morning Clayt,” it takes Tim a second but he realizes Clayt is Jarvis, “came in to see me. Carl Hanson,” Vance pauses to see if Tim knows who that is, and he does recognize the name of the Director of the CIA. “had just gotten word that Ender was killed and that we were the ones who did it. Ender was on a deep cover, report directly to Hanson, long-term mission…”

Vance keeps talking, but Tim doesn’t hear it, all he could hear, feel is the voice in his head screaming NOT AGAIN.
He can see Benedict crumple a few million-year-long seconds after the bullet hit him. That was the shock of the first time he’d shot someone, the first time he ended a life. And it was bad. But since he got the news of who Benedict was, there’s been the feeling of getting kicked in the gut to go with that image, the screaming desire to take it back, make time slow, to do, anything, anything to have not made that decision.

He can see it, replaying in his mind, Ziva hooked up the canister, and for about three minutes while the DEA vans made a huge noise and spectacularly broke into the across-the-street neighbor’s house, he and Draga waited, not really breathing, hoping she could do it and not get caught. They watched all three men on the heat monitor, watched them watch the DEA raid, and apparently they decided it wasn’t their problem, so they went back to their computers.

And then she was back in their van, and they waited, watching the three as they moved slower and slower, and one slumped onto the ground, and another’s head fell to his chest, and the third… he was already pretty slouched, but eventually they saw his hand slip off the mouse.

And it wasn’t until they were all presumed out of it that Tim gave the go for the evacuation of the neighborhood. He didn’t want to start the evac until he was sure none of them could see it and hit a kill switch.

That took two hours, but they weren’t going in until everyone was out of the blast range.

And yeah, he knew the longer a person was exposed to the gas, the lower the survival chances were. He knew it, and he watched the figures on the heat feed slowly get cooler and cooler as their bodies shut down.

They didn’t let the Coroner or EMTs into the Ender’s safehouse, couldn’t get it safe enough. Two of the bomb squad techs carried him out, body limp, one arm trailing on the ground.

And last night he went to sleep with a clean conscience because there were more than forty kids in the blast range, and every single one of them made it out alive. Last night, that image… It’s not that it didn’t bother him, but it was firmly filed in the greater good pile.

And now it’s not. Now it’s tied to a ragged mental voice screaming NOT AGAIN.

Part of him is sitting apart from the screaming. Part of him is amazed at how much this feels like the first time, it’s that same breath stolen, want to pass out and puke sensation.

“How clean can it be? He was one of ours, and I killed him.” Tim hears his voice crack on that.

“Clean, Tim. CIA wanted to fuss. Clayt went over our notes. Hanson went over our notes. Given what we knew, no one could give us a way to get Ender out of there without that whole neighborhood blowing up. CIA wanted to. They wanted to yell about it, but Clay sat down with their higher ups, at three in the morning, and told them, ‘Have at it! You’re all so smart and good at this. Get Ender out without killing the whole neighborhood.’ No one had a better answer than you did.”

It helps, a little. Not enough. But it’s better than nothing, helps anchor him to the idea that this time everyone isn’t staring at him like he’s the enemy.

“What do you mean, ‘given what we knew?’”

Vance wishes he hadn’t said that. It’s easy to forget that Tim’s not just computer smart. “Kort had orders to break Ender’s cover if he needed to. He decided he didn’t need to. CIA did have an exit plan in place for Ender. But, because Kort didn’t see any need to tell us about Ender’s real alliances, they didn’t get to put that plan into place.”

“What was it?”

“Kort was going to have the FBI fake an arrest of the ‘terrorists’ who tried to blow up the Reagan. He’d also supplied all three of them with high quality, fake, US Army IDs. He even had ‘fake orders’ for them. The plan was they’d hop a transport for South Korea, and then cross the border for their next job. Only thing was, that transport flight wasn’t going to work the way they were hoping.”

“Kort didn’t tell because he didn’t think I could catch Ender.”

“Kort didn’t think we could catch Ender. He was there before you took over, and he didn’t tell DiNozzo or Gibbs. According to him, this was an operation that required brains and finesse, not just… ‘bull doggish tenacity and an intimidating stare.’”

Actually, Kort had said nothing of the sort. But it sounded like him, and if you’re going to lie, you need to be specific, and Vance is a good liar. Which is also why Vance changed one other key detail in his story, those IDs were supposed to be Marine IDs.

Tim had called that one correctly. It wasn’t NCIS in general that Kort doubted, (When they were planning what the target should be, and who would eventually take Ender in, Kort had recommended a Navy or Marine target so NCIS would catch it because he knew Gibbs could handle it. He knew Gibbs would be ready and able to make sure that transport plane was the end of the trip for Ender, Simmers, and Blake.) it was Tim in specific. Once Kort knew he wasn’t getting out of this, he owned up to the whole thing and his report made very clear that he figured there was no shot at all of Tim taking Ender down, so there was no reason to compromise his cover, and once DiNozzo or Gibbs was up and about again, he’d read them in. But… And because of but, Ender was dead.

But none of that is anything Vance thinks Tim needs to know. This’ll be enough of a hit to McGee’s confidence, and from what he’s been seeing these last few years, McGee confident is capable of great things, and he wants that man working for him, running his Cybercrime department. He’s not about to do anything to hurt that. He does not want him second guessing himself any more than he already will be, and honestly, right now, he was wishing Tim was a little less sharp, so this whole thing could have just died.

Tim sat there for a long minute, staring at his hands, seeing the bodies on his screen slowly fade as the heat leached out of them.

“Scotch.”

“Tim?”

“I like scotch.”

Vance nods, gets up, and gets him one.

Tim holds it, looking at brown liquid and clear glass. Then he takes a good swallow. He’s not really looking to get drunk (he still has to get home, and he’s still aware of that) but he hopes the burn will help pull him out of this numb space.

At least the screaming is over. That’s kind of nice.
“So, what happens now?”

“Nothing. Like I said, CIA wanted to yell. I told Jarvis we go to the wall on this one, because we are not sacrificing anyone just to keep CIA happy, especially not when they don’t play fair with us. He went in full bore, and by this morning it was done. Not sure what’s going to happen to Kort. If he wasn’t so damn dangerous, they’d cut him loose, but he knows too much to ever really retire.”

“That’s why they call them spooks right? They live forever?”

“Something like that. My guess is that Kort might be spending the next year or two brushing up on his Farsi, and find himself doing some deep cover field-work.”

“Great.”

He sits quietly next to Leon for another moment.

“You going to be okay?”

Tim shrugs.

“It was a clean kill.”

Tim sighs. “No such thing, Leon. He’s still dead, and I gave the order that did it. That’s on me, and it always will be.” He takes another sip of his drink.

“That’s on Kort.”

“Kort might have put me there, but I still made the decision.”

“It was the right one.”

“I’m not saying it wasn’t.” Tim thinks about it. That’s a difference. Probie McGee couldn’t have said that. Soon-To-Be-Head-of-Cybercrime McGee can. Given what he knew, it was the right decision. He does feel sure about that. It still hurts, but... he’s not doubting himself. He follows that thought a bit further, what if he had known...

Even if he had known Ender was one of the ‘good guys’ he’d... still do it. Sometimes you can’t get everyone out. ‘I’d make it again. You don’t leave two guys with dead man switches sitting on tons of explosives in a neighborhood. They had mercury switches on the windows. Some kid misses the ball playing catch, and it hit one of those windows, that whole neighborhood would have gone up. You can’t leave that in place and hope the angels are on your side while you wait for the seventeen part trap you’ve got to play out. When we handed it over to the FBI, their techs were saying they’d basically have to dismantle the house to declare it safe, and they were planning on searching for landmines, too, given how much crap was in that place.” He takes another sip of his drink. “But he’s still dead, and I made the call, and in the end, there are no clean kills, not for something like this.”

“I know.”

“Was there anything in the reports about James or Lisbeth Ender?”

“Not much. No one knows who killed James. Thomas was going to take James’ place, that was part of the plan, but what was supposed to happen to James isn’t in any of the reports. Thomas did recruit Lisbeth for what he was doing. The CIA made sure she was reimbursed for the phones she was buying.”
“How’d we miss that?”

“You didn’t. They had an off-shore account for her, under a fake ID. We know who she became when she vanished, and they’re getting her back.”

“Great.” He hands Vance his still mostly full glass. “I should get home. Abby and Gibbs are both waiting to see what’s going on.”

“Okay. I meant it about you guys taking the week off.”

He nods. Not sure if he’s going in on Monday just to have something to do, or curling around Abby and clinging to her and Kelly for a week.

It’s after ten when he got back in the car. Abby should be nursing again. And hopefully sleeping soon after that. He’s been using up her sleep time, and that’s not fair, not with her getting up every three hours to feed Kelly.

He texts Gibbs. Everyone up?

Right now.

Case is over.

???

Long damn story. It's done.

That doesn’t sound good.

Is it ever? He pauses for a second. Is Abby reading these, too?

No.

Tell her I'm on my way. Will be home soon. Head to sleep, I'll be there for snuggling soon.

Are you? He wonders about that briefly, and then gets the idea that Gibbs is asking if he’s telling her to head to sleep, so she doesn’t notice him just driving around on his own, or whatever, for a while.

Yeah. I'm coming home and going to bed. Not sure about sleep, but…

I'll still be up when you want to talk about it.

Thanks.

Gibbs was on the sofa, reading, waiting up.

It occurs to Tim that this is the first time he’s ever come home and had a Dad waiting up for him. That gets a sigh.

“Tim?”

He shakes his head.
“I’ll be here.”

Tim nods and heads up. His eyes take a second to adjust to the dark of their bedroom, but once they do, he sees she’s on her side, her usual sleeping position, but he’s usually behind her, holding her.

Long exhale. Keep your routine. Routine helps. So he did. He stripped off and brushed his teeth, peed, and headed for bed, just like any other late night. It’s just not like any other late night. He wishes it was.

He snuggles up against her, between soft, nubby sheets and a light summer blanket. Warm, soft body, easy breathing, vague scent of her perfume and shampoo, deeper, stronger scent of her skin, little whiff of baby spit up. Home.

She scoots a bit closer, her neck resting on his arm. Automatically, his other arm curls around her, hand coming to rest under her breast. He kisses the back of her neck, and she sighs in her sleep.

Clean kill.

If that means anything.

I am a gun in the service of life, and if I have to end a life to protect others, I do it.

That’s why I’ve got the badge.

That’s the purpose of the gun.

That’s the job.

More.

It’s not just a job. That’s the life. The life you chose, because it matters, because it’s the man you need to be.

You do what you need to to save lives, and if some goddamn son of a bitch sticks himself in the middle of a fucking bomb, he’s gonna die because I’m not letting the fucker blow. Not me. Not on my watch. Not in a neighborhood filled with families just like mine.

He feels pure white anger surge as he gets to that last bit of his mental monologue. It’s his job to protect people. That’s the long and the short of it, and when it all comes down and works out, that’s who he is. The rest is just window dressing. And that son of a bitch built a cage so dangerous no man in his right mind could let it stand, walked into it, locked the fucking door behind him, and then expected to be saved.

You wanna live, asshole? Don’t sit in the middle of a goddamned bomb, and don’t ask me to get you out. Don’t stay with maniacs who are walking death.

But Ender is still dead, and the screaming from before isn’t guilt, and it isn’t fear. (Or maybe it was, but it’s not now.) It’s rage.

God damn that motherfucking cunt for putting me here. GOD FUCKING DAMN HIM!

Tim rubs his face and can feel he’s shaking, so he gets up and tosses on some pants. He’ll wake Abby if he keeps holding onto her this angry, and she needs her sleep.
“So?” Gibbs asks as Tim walks down less than fifteen minutes after he went up.

Tim shakes his head, pulls on sneakers, and points to the door.

Gibbs nods. He gets it. Sometimes you can’t talk. Sometimes you’ve got to work it off, and it’s got to be physical. If he could run, or fight, he’d go along, but he can’t. So he nods again, and once again says, “I’ll be here.”

Tim closes the door quietly, and Gibbs snags his phone. He flips through his numbers and calls Leon. “He’s not talking about it, yet. What happened?”

And Vance told him.

With Benedict there was sorrow, and grief (which, until that point, he thought was a synonym for sorrow, but after Benedict he knew it wasn’t, not really) there was guilt, mountains of stomach emptying guilt, and fear (which took care of everything in his intestinal tract that he didn’t puke up).

This time, running, hard, though his quarter-moon, ghost-silver neighborhood, there’s just rage.

He wants to scream it to the heavens, but he’ll settle for running. Too late, too public for screaming.

But that little voice is in the back of his head, screaming in rage.

TWICE.

Fucking twice.

His feet pound pavement, his body races through humid dark, heart pumping, sweat dripping, endorphins fighting so far outside of their weight class it’s not funny.

Once was bad enough. Everyone’s got that one case where you fucked up and the end was bad. Everyone.

But twice. When you did everything right?

This isn’t even failure.

This is what, a pyrrhic victory? This is every move done right. Meeting and exceeding everyone’s expectations, being three steps cleverer than the people who doubted him, and the wrong guy still died.

Not died. The wrong guy was killed. Passive voice. Avoidance technique. It’s yours. Own it.

You did everything right, and you still killed the wrong guy.

Tim stops running, staring at the stars, listening to the cicadas and the frogs, and then walks home.

He slumps onto the love seat. “Would it help if I shot Kort?”

Gibbs doesn’t know if Tim knows him so well he just knows he’d have gotten the story from Leon by now, or if he just doesn’t care if he knows the story.
“Can you look at yourself in the mirror without wincing?”

“Probably.” He left the light off while he brushed his teeth, and didn’t spend any time looking at himself.

“Good enough. Unless you’re between eating your gun or feeding it to him, you don’t shoot a man for this.”

“What’s this?” Tim sighs, feels like he’s been doing that a lot, staring at the ceiling.

“Hell, if I know the word. Fucked to hell and gone? Nothing else you could have done, nothing else you can change, you did the best you possibly could and it’s still wrong.”

Tim nods.

“And for that, you only shoot him if it’s you or him, and you’re not there.”

“No. Not even close.” Tim shrugs. “Never been close.”

“Good.”

“Not close isn’t the same thing as spiffy.”

“Nope. It was the right decision.”

“I know.” And this time, Gibbs sees that Tim does. He really does. That’s not the problem not today. “I am so fucking pissed at that asshole for making me do it. This must be what suicide by cop feels like, if you’re the cop.”

“Which asshole?”

“I was thinking Ender, but Kort’s got a mountain of shit I want to drop on him, too.”

“Why Ender?” This is when Tim realizes that he never did get deep into the details of the safe house.

“Front door had a bomb under the welcome mat. All of the first floor windows had mercury triggers on them, any vibration stronger than a lawnmower would have set them off. Bomb squad said they were set so that if, somehow, the cops missed the welcome mat, breaking through the door would set them to blow. Pressure plate on the door they used to get in and out, step over it, fine, but most people would have landed right on it. Pressure plates on the back porch. More mercury switches on the sliding glass doors on the back. Garage doors were wired with magnets. Every entrance of that house on the first floor was wired to blow. And a fucking softball tossed the wrong direction could have taken that whole neighborhood out. And Ender let Blake set it up, walked his ass into it, and somehow trusted us to get him back out again.

“And I didn’t do it. I wouldn’t do it. Stick me in that van, tell me Ender works for the CIA, and I’d still make the call. I’m not going to dance around and wait for the CIA to come up with some rescue plan that gets him out three weeks later, leaving this huge bomb in the middle of a fucking neighborhood waiting to go off. Hell, a delivery guy at the wrong address, neighbor knocks on the back door… No. I’m not doing it.

“That son of a bitch made me kill him. Because I’m not the guy who can just sort of hope it’ll go okay and wait it out.

“He was good at what he did, and he wrapped up a cell with more than fifty guys in it, and if I could... have gotten him out alive, he would have gone right back to it, pulling in more guys, dangerous guys, evil guys, but he’s not doing it anymore because he let one of the assholes build the trap that I couldn’t let stand, and it didn’t matter if he was still in it or not.

“And all the right decisions in the world doesn’t help with the fact that I want to get his corpse up and smack the shit out of it because I’m the one who had to pull the fucking trigger on him.”

Gibbs starts to get up, and Tim glares at him, then moves, sits on the floor so he’s next to Gibbs.
(Gibbs is across the sofa with his foot up.) “This what you were aiming for?”

“Close enough.” He squeezes Tim’s shoulder, and leaves his hand there. “I know it doesn’t help, but I’ve been there, too. Half of sniper training is guns and math, feeling the wind, understanding distance, knowing where something is going to be instead of where it is, trajectories, air currents, calibers, vantage points, and cover. Half of it is pulling the damn trigger. Snipers take out other snipers. We take out machine gunners. We take out high power targets like the other side’s officers.
Big enough gun and we take out engine blocks, that’ll force a column off the street and into the mines.

“And when you’re doing that, you’re taking out enemy targets, and that’s just how it is.

“And I was good at it.” Gibbs smiles a little, but it’s not happy, just acknowledging the bittersweet flavor to being exceptionally good at killing people.

“Really good. And in Colombia I ended up… Another son of a bitch with a bomb, and the idiot Lieutenant wants to parley, hoping we can get our guys and some villagers back by talking. He knows where I am, and the idiot keeps walking around, and the son of a bitch is getting more and more aggravated, and I know where this is going, but I don’t have a clean shot because that idiot keep walking back and forth…” Gibbs goes quiet, seeing that moment through his scope again. Wet behind the ears, twenty-one-year-old moron fresh out of Annapolis, who’d been told not to do this, walking back and forth, and Gibbs can see Delando Cortenz smirking, hand on the trigger that’ll blow his hostages, and he knew where it was going to go, knew that smirk wasn’t going to lead to anything good. “So, I swapped up, bullet big as your thumb, damn thing would have practically gone through an elephant, and it did go through the Lieutenant. He didn’t even slow it down, and it went through the son of a bitch, and we got our guys out, and a dozen villagers. And no one ever said anything about it… but, yeah, I wanted to hit him. If he had stayed the fuck out of it, I would have had a clean shot and gotten our guys out with no problems. If he had stayed to the side, just picked a place and stayed in it, I could have gotten a clean shot. But no, the little asshole had to keep moving around.”

Tim squeezes Gibbs hand back.

“How old was he?”

Gibbs shakes his head, looking frustrated. “Twelve? Something like that. Too damn green, too damn stupid. So full of himself, thought he was God’s gift to all things military. The next incarnation of Chesty Puller.”

Tim doesn’t say anything, he just sits there, and Gibbs lets him. There’s nothing else to say.
Eventually, he hears Kelly crying, asking for yet another meal, so he stands up, kisses Gibbs on the forehead, and heads up to bring Kelly to Abby, save her from having to get up yet again.

“Tim?” Abby sounds sleepy as he lays Kelly in front of her. “You get any sleep at all?” she asks as she gets Kelly settled on her breast.

“Not yet.” He pulls off the pants, and curls into bed behind her.

Between no sleep, and the fact that she has to be able to smell the sweat on him, there’s fear in her voice as she asks, “How bad is it?”

His lips on her shoulder, his arm over her side, his hand on Kelly’s back, he says, “I’ve had better days. But nothing that won’t hold until tomorrow if you’d rather doze while she eats.”

“You think I’m going to nap after that?”

“I can hope?”

“Uh uh.” She lifts his hand to her lips, kissing his palm, his wedding ring, and the tattoo of her lips. “Let me help you carry this.”

So he told her, and held onto her and Kelly, and tried to let anger go, and maybe it didn’t entirely, but being home helped, running helped, talking to Gibbs helped, wrapped in his home and people who love him, helps, and eventually, when Abby flips over, Kelly now between them, so she could nurse on the other side, Tim falls asleep to soft, little sucking sounds, and the feel of his hand on Abby’s hip, his forehead pressed to hers.
He woke up with a jerk, heart pounding, bedroom dim with almost dawn sunlight.

It was his night, and he missed it. His job to get Kelly fed and he slept through it.

_FUCK!_ Yes, Abby will forgive him, but still, _FUCK!_

Apparently he wasn’t exactly thinking that, and may have, just possibly, said it out loud, because Abby moved when he did it. (He’s really sleepy and jittery with adrenaline and all in all, pretty out of it.)

"Tim?"

"I'm so sorry."

She's looking barely conscious. "Huh?"

"You got Kelly, didn't you?"

She shook her head. "No. I've been sleeping."

His eyes went wide, and the first thing he did was more or less leap out of bed to check on her, but she was still in her crib, still breathing, still sleeping. He very, very quietly crept out of Kelly's room, and crashed back into his own bed, suddenly feeling completely exhausted as last night hit and the adrenaline crash faded.

"She slept through?" Abby asks.

"She slept through."

"Yay!" Abby said, tiredly, and then snuggled into him, and they both caught more blessed sleep.

Round ten he got out of bed feeling… He doesn't really know. Not good. Not sick, that haunted, all-over-ill sort of feeling that went with Benedict isn't there. Just, kind of on edge, like he knows something's going to break if he pokes it, but right now it's in one piece.

He decides not to poke it.

Like most Sundays he checks his phone first, and today there's a text from Jimmy.

_Molly's got a cold, and Breena didn't sleep well. Skipping church._

"Thank you," he says quietly under his breath, and quickly sends back _Good, couldn't feel less like it if I tried. Bootcamp?_

By the time he finished with brushing his teeth and putting on some clothing, (More pjs. He's home, he's tired, and he's not planning on going anywhere soon, so jammies work just fine.) he had one back. _Hope so. See how Breena's feeling when she wakes up._
What's up?

More of the same, tired, nauseous, pregnancy dreams. Touch of Molly's cold.

When she wakes up give her a hug from Abby and I.

Will do.

I'm going to hit the gym no matter what. Come if you can. I'll understand if you can't.

No problem.

He fired one off to Ziva: Bootcamp?

YES!

Sounds like you're in a good mood.

And he realizes he's got two other people who need to-

Or maybe not... Vance wasn't going to tell him. He didn't even get to figuring that out last night, and now it's sitting there in front of him, and maybe if it had hit him earlier, he might resent it, but thinking about Ziva and Draga...

They don't need to know.

They just don't.

But you don't lie to your team, not about stuff like this. Draga's idea. Ziva installed the canister. He made the call, but they're part of it. And they deserve to know...

Maybe...

Part of him really doesn't want to say. Just let it go. Bury it.

Would it stay buried? If it's going to come out, he wants them to hear it from him. If it can stay a secret...

He heads downstairs, finds Jethro on the sofa (where else was he going to be...) "You want a hand getting to the porch? Suck up some sunshine?"

Gibbs looks up from his phone. (Probably reading on his kindle ap.) "Yeah, that sounds good." He lets Tim give him a hand getting off the sofa, but not in getting to the porch, (beyond opening the door for him) and he accepts help in getting down onto the chaise.

"One more day."

"Jethro?"

"On my butt for a week. Tomorrow is the last day."

"You've got an appointment for a checkup on Tuesday, right?"

"Yeah."

"I'll take you. Or Abby will, if she wants to get out of the house some." Tim smiles and heads inside, foraging for breakfast, and then heads out again, a few cold turkey sausages on a plate next to a
"Where's Abby and Kelly?"

"Abby said Kelly slept through the four AM feed, so to celebrate they went out to do some shopping."

Tim thinks about that for a moment, about what sort of celebration Abby may have in mind for baby sleeping through the night (ish) let alone what sort of shopping it may involve. He's very pleasantly intrigued by that idea.

"Cool." He ate a few bites, enjoying the fact that it wasn't oppressively hot, yet, and then got back on track when he remembered why he was down here chatting with Gibbs. "I've got a question for you."

"Fire away."

"Do I tell Ziva and Draga? Would you have told us?"

Gibbs thinks about it then counters with his own question: "What are you thinking?"

Tim makes a dismissive sound, indicating that if he had confidence in what he was thinking he wouldn't be asking Gibbs about it.

"Gonna run your own team soon enough, tell me what you're thinking."

"If they find out, I want it to be from me. But they don't need to know, not really. But if it gets out, and I don't tell them, Ziva'll rip my head off, and she's smart enough the dead battery is bugging her, too. Bugs Draga, but I don't think he's got enough experience to put it together. The gas was Draga's idea. Ziva installed the canister.

"He'll take it bad. He already feels like he's screwed this one because of the first bomb, add this on top of it, and that might be the end of him as a cop.

"Ziva… I don't know. I'm not the one she talks to about this sort of stuff. She might just take it in stride, hazards of the job. It might really hit her, she was a handler who's asset went off the rails. She was an asset out there, spent months, probably, hoping her back up would get her, and then realized they weren't coming." Tim shakes his head. "She was an asset left to die. Getting her out was too expensive, so Eli didn't even try. And if I had known Ender was an agent, that's the same calculation I would have made for him. Too many people would have died if that house had gone up.

"So, I don't know. I know she'll be really pissed if I don't tell her and she finds out anyway. And I know that she doesn't need to know. She probably wants to. She'd probably, I hope, be okay with it… Well, as okay as I am."

"Are you?"

Tim exhales long and slow and eats a few more bites of his peach. "I don't know. It's not hitting me right this second, but I feel like it's still there, waiting to hop out. Bootcamp is going to be interesting.

"Which gets us to the next point, can I not tell her? Say she doesn't want to know. Say it won't help anything. She's always been able to tell when I'm lying and has never had any problem getting me to talk."

Gibbs tilts his head in agreement, that's been an issue, too. "I always thought that was because you wanted to tell her. You never seemed to have any problems not telling her about stuff you really didn't want her to know."

"And yet it always came out anyway." Tim half-smiles. "But it's entirely possible that's true. And I haven't tried to keep anything from her, besides taking her home for Tony to propose, in years. I might be better at it now."

"Not craving approval so much now. You'd probably hold out better."

"Great. So…"

Gibbs doesn't say anything.

"You ever not tell us what was going on?"

"Yes."

Tim's expression is saying, go on tell me.

Gibbs shakes his head. "If I didn't say then, I'm not now."

Tim stands up and tosses the peach pit into the far back of their yard. He eyeballs the grass. Gotta mow tomorrow. Without turning around he retries the question. "Then how about this, she talks to you about this stuff, should I tell her?"

"As her friend, you should tell her. As a leader trying to keep his team working as well as he can... You've got the next week off, that's time for you and her to get your heads on right. And that week'll be shorter than the fall out that might happen if she finds out another way."

Good, that makes sense. He turns away from the grass to face Gibbs. "Draga?"

"Draga doesn't need to know. Draga especially doesn't need to know if Tony's going to can him or get him transferred. And that's the last part of this, Tony needs to know. When we go back to work, it'll be his team again, so he has to know."

Tim nods at that. He'd… forgotten isn't exactly right, but stopped thinking about Tony as Team Leader. Not once during that week did he call to check in, (About the case. About Tony as an injured friend, yes, he checked in) or try to get any advice, or… anything. Once he took over and benched Tony, that was it. From Wednesday to Saturday it was his team, so that's how he ran it. (He also made a quick mental note to give Fornell the heads up on that, too. He's fairly sure CIA wants Ender's cover in place but he's also sure that whoever's in charge of the FBI clean-up of this should know what's going on.)

"I should probably go see Tony."

Gibbs nods at that, too.

"You talk to him?"

"Commiserate about how much being on the shelf sucks?"

"Something like that?"

"Yeah. Talked with him a few times."

"He okay?"
Gibbs doesn't answer. And it was in the silence of not answering that Tim notices something, Ziva never responded to his comment about being in a good mood.

He snags his phone out of his pocket and sends her. Are you in a good mood?

A minute later he gets back. Bootcamp 4PM.

So he texts: See you then.

"Jethro, she told me they were fighting, are they okay?"

"Unlike Ender, that really is something you don't need to know unless they want to tell you."

Originally, six (Really, six months? Only six months? It feels a whole lot longer.) months ago, when Bootcamp started, it was mostly about making sure Jimmy had a place to really work out his feelings.

Because fighting is good for that. You have to focus on what your body is doing, so you can't be focused on the wider world. Stress makes your body produce chemicals that trigger a desire to run or fight, and if you don't run or fight, those chemicals just hang around, linger, making you less and less happy, more and more tense, and often cause chronic-pain conditions. When you fight, your body floods with endorphins, which not only make you feel better, but they also help to shut down sad, afraid, depressed, and the like.

And when you fight, those walls you build to keep the crap away, to hold it in a safe place where it doesn't touch you, they crumble, and you let your body do the physical work it needs to do to grieve and move on.

And so, when they began, it was about that. About letting his body do what it needed to do to get through the loss of Jon.

But they kept at it.

Because it's good exercise. Because it feels good. Because time went by and there were Sundays where he didn't need it so much, but Tim did. And every Sunday, Gibb is there, because… (Feels a little odd to say this, even in his own mind, but it's true, so he might as well say it, even if it is only in his mind.) because they're his boys and this is the kind of stuff you do for your boys. (The kind of thing Jimmy is desperately hoping he'll have the chance to do for his own boy one day.)

And Ziva started showing up every week, and so far she's been here because… Jimmy thinks it's mostly because she likes it, and because she needs to practice. And maybe she's here because Ziva misses having brothers, misses dad time, too, and this space here, where they beat on each other fills that need. (He thinks that's probably kind of weird that his family's deepest communication form is combat, but… it works, so it doesn't matter if it's weird.)

So far, though, they've never had a Sunday where they were there to let her fight off rage or fear or unhappy or whatever.

But in that she's killing him, absolutely killing him, and not in a let's-kick-this-up-a-bit-and-get-your-heart-pumping sort of way, but in a holy-shit-I-need-pads-or-I'm-going-to-die sort of way, Jimmy’s realizing that Ziva is not in a happy place.

Jimmy calls time before he hit the mat, holding up his hands in a 'stop' gesture. Any of them can stop any fight at any time for any reason.
He looks over at Tim, who's just… brutalizing… the punching bag, and realizes that Tim's got something going on, too.

For a second, he feels a surge of thankfulness at working in Autopsy, he knows this last case was an absolute bastard, but not for more than a second, because Ziva's glaring at him for stopping things. She wants to fight, but he's so far outclassed by pissed off Ziva, he knows he can't give her what she needs.

"Tim!" He has to yell; Tim's got earbuds in.

Tim stops, looks over at him, expression curious, as he takes out his earbuds.

"Get over here."

Tim's still in the dark, though he's heading over. Ziva's not looking nearly as annoyed. Two on one should be just what the doctor (literally) ordered.

"Have you ever done this before?" Ziva asks Jimmy as Tim slips between the ropes.

Jimmy shakes his head, hoping he hasn't just signed his own death warrant. "But, we've danced together—"

"When the hell have I ever danced with you?" Tim asks as he catches that bit.

"You and me and the girls. Ziva's killing me one on one. She's going to kill you one on one. Both of us against her should let her get enough of a fight in to calm her back down, and not get either of us killed."

Tim nods, smiles, and Jimmy's seen that smile before, that's the dark, predatory thing that hides in Tim and doesn't come out a whole lot, but when it does...

Jimmy sees that smile and sighs, silently wishing Gibbs wasn't flat on his back, an extra set of hands would be really useful today. "Okay, looks like both of you need this today. But when we're done, we're getting drinks and talking, too."

Ziva shrugs, and Jimmy knows they aren't the guys she usually talks to, but, you put your literal skin on the line to help your friend, you get to find out what the problem is. Tim nods, because for him, Jimmy is one of the guys he talks to. (And he was planning on telling Jimmy about it no matter what.)

Tim's thinking this isn't dancing. It's really not. He and Jimmy would be a hell of a lot better at this if it was dancing. But the skills aren't completely dissimilar. And when it is the four of them dancing, he does have to keep track of three other people, one of whom is Jimmy, and Jimmy's doing the same thing, and they do have some level of skill at doing that. (Okay, they're not going to be winning any dance competitions anytime soon, but everyone has a good time and no one gets their toes stepped on, and that's more than good enough.)

See when you're dancing either one on one, or one on one on one on one, two things are true, first off, there's music, which helps you keep an idea of time and beat, and you're moving slowly enough you can actually see what the other people are doing.

And he and Jimmy can sort of, kind of, okay, not really, but it's better than nothing, communicate what they're going to do by look, and kind of coordinate. If Ziva wasn't so fast, they'd be better at it.
(If they'd danced as a foursome sometime between Ziva's wedding and now, they'd be better at it, too, but for some reason there just hasn't been any clubbing dates lately…)

But, as of this point, (round two) he's only accidentally hit Jimmy twice and gotten in his way four times. Jimmy's doing about the same with him.

And Ziva's winning.

End of round two, another thought has hit Tim, he's got unlimited music on his phone and two floors up and a few hundred feet over, he's got speakers. Good speakers. LOUD speakers.

And, it still won't be dancing with Abby and Breena, but he and Jimmy are both going to do better if there is music for this.

So he calls stop, tells Jimmy and Ziva what he wants to do, and goes to do it.

Nine Inch Nails. Full volume. Unless Abby's playing it, he hasn't listed to them since college. But he knows it well enough to know what's going to happen when. And he knows Jimmy does, too. No one their age who grew up in the States and went to college in the late '90s doesn't know this music.

But Ziva's five years younger and didn't grow up in the States.

That smile pops up again. The first few beats of Mr. Self Destruct come up. Jimmy's head jerks up when he hears it, and he shakes it softly, grinning, and mouths, you bastard at Tim. Yeah, he knows this.

This is going to be fun.

This is going to be the kind of fun that he really needs right now.

Better. This is a whole lot better. Set beats both of them know, means he hasn't gotten in Jimmy's way and Jimmy hasn't gotten in his since the music began.

Music, loud, thumping, vibrates through your bones, inflicting minor hearing damage music means that even Ziva's moving with the beat, so they're having an easier time anticipating where she's going to be.

Music they know means that if he takes one melody (if NIN can be said to have melody) and Jimmy takes another, (Usually Jimmy takes the main lyrical line, and he takes the beat. He thinks that's because Jimmy's the singer.) they have a much easier time anticipating each other's moves. Likewise, they're doing much better at coordinating attacking and defending because there's a steady beat holding the whole thing together. (Or as much as NIN can be said to have a steady beat.)

The fact that this music is as much rage and pain screaming at the sky as anything else, doesn't hurt either. This music was designed to be yelled, designed to celebrate pain, channel it, force it into something tangible and real.

It's a very good way to blow off even more of what's bugging him. (It's possible he may be singing along at some points, at least mentally, because he needs his breath to fight.)
Round six (Get Down Make Love) begins with the electronic beat, spoken voice, and moaning, and Ziva's staring at Tim, "You listen to this McGee?"

"I did in college."

She shakes her head, listening trying to map out the music, knowing that Tim and Jimmy will corner the music, use it as their guide.

"You, too, Jimmy?"

"Trent Reznor dropped out of my college about five years before I went there. We fighting or resting?"

Ziva pivoted on her back leg, looking like she was aiming to kick Tim, but her right hand flashed out and would have caught Jimmy's cheek but he got his forearm up in time to defend while Tim spun into an elbow strike that Ziva deflected with the kick she started the move with.

"We fight!"

By the second verse he and Jimmy are working together well enough for one to constantly be defending and the other to constantly be attacking and to swap back and forth between them well enough to keep Ziva off balance.

Round nine, Head Like A Hole, began. Two main musical lines: 'Head like a hole, black as your soul', has one sound. 'Bow down before the one you serve' has another. They blend and support each other. Like the way Tim and Jimmy are fighting. Jimmy takes the bow down refrain, Tim's got head like a hole. Tim's moving faster, more attacking. Jimmy's slower, distracting, on defense.

Head like a hole, black as your soul, I'd rather die, than give you control. And sure it's not real, not him, but he can feel it, hook into it, channel all the pissed-of-just-want-to-beat-the-hell-out-of-Ender into this, and he's making Ziva sweat, literally and metaphorically.

And on what Tim considered a very well-coordinated move, in on the last run of 'bow down' Jimmy caught his eye a second before the line hit, and Tim knew, because he knew the music, what was going to happen. He slid slightly behind Jimmy, while Jimmy was engaging Ziva, but when the word bow hit, Jimmy dropped to the floor, and Tim kicked through where he had been, forcing Ziva's balance back as she leaned back to dodge the kick. Jimmy, on the mat, grabbed both of her feet and yanked them out from under her.

Round nine, for the first time ever, Ziva hit the mat.

Round ten, Ziva asked if they could sub in some of her music.

They took a ten minute breather, each adding three of their own songs.

He stayed with NIN. Jimmy tossed in the Mortal Kombat soundtrack, which Tim recognized. Hell, he even watched the movie back in the day. Perfect music. He's got no idea what Ziva's added. It's not in English and he's never seen it before, and steels himself to getting killed when her music comes on.

He flicked the play to random, music he didn't know, had to be Ziva's, began to shake the gym, and they got ready to go.

By the end of the playlist he knows he was feeling better, and he hopes Ziva is.
Next up, talking.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: And on the blog today, links to each of the songs mentioned.

“So, what are we walking into?” Jimmy asks Tim as he gets out of the shower.

Tim’s already sitting on the bench in front of the lockers, putting his socks on.

“Not certain. She and Tony are fighting.”

“What?” Jimmy wasn’t expecting that, case crap troubling both of them, sure. But that? Nope. Of course, he’s also been out of the loop this last week.

Hard case and Team Leader means Tim hasn’t actually talked to Jimmy about, much of anything, really, since, God, Monday probably. Hard case means no getting together for lunch and gossip. Or lunch and real conversation, or, hell, a lot of the time, hard case means just no lunch.

“You know what happened at the warehouse?” Tim asks. They hadn’t talked about it yet, and since they all survived, Ducky and Jimmy didn’t get called in, but he’s not sure what the scuttlebutt on it is.

“You all almost got blown up?”

“Yeah, that’s the gist of it. Draga trips the bomb. Gibbs yells at Ziva and I to run. We’re at the doorway, almost outside the building. I book off, find the biggest, most solid building and get my ass behind it. Ziva runs into the building, toward the bomb, to Tony.”

“Ohhh…” Jimmy’s wincing. Tim can see that’s the fear of the person you love most in danger. That’s his husband sense kicking in, and he’s getting pissed at Ziva on Tony’s behalf.

Tim nods, he felt it, too. But, that’s not the whole story.

“It gets better. According to her, he handled it in a mature and rational way by screaming at her and telling her that if she ever disobeyed a direct order from him or Gibbs again, he’d fire her.”

Jimmy winces again, and Tim nods at that, too. Because while they are both sympathetic to not wanting your love in danger, they’re also both aware that while there may be women who appreciate caveman-style marital dictates, none of them married one. “He’s so fucked.”

“Yes,” Tim says, still nodding.

“He told Ziva he’d fire her? What the hell was he thinking?”

“Well, he was home with a concussion, so maybe he wasn’t?”

“Youch. Wait, if you know this, when was that?”

“Thursday/Friday sometime. She was just steaming at her desk, so we broke off to talk, make sure she could work.”

“If she’s still that pissed, he probably made it worse.”

“Yeah.”

Jimmy stares at Tim for another second. He’s got an idea that if Ziva is still pissed about this, and if Tony did make it worse, it’s extremely unlikely they’re just chatting with Ziva today. “We’re not going to get to both of you, are we?”
Tim shakes his head. And really, right now, he’s not feeling too much need to get to him today. The desire to beat the living shit out of something been well-sated at this point. He’s not okay, but he’s not walking wounded, either, and that’ll all he needs for today. “Not today. Mine’ll hold.”

“Really?” Jimmy looks concerned for Tim, too. Yeah, he’s seeming better since they got done, but, he can feel there’s still some edge there.

“Really. Nothing that needs to be dealt with right now.”

“Your parents?”

Tim shakes his head. “Nah. It’s the job and this case. Got the last piece of the puzzle and it’s complete shit.”

“Tell me?”

“Yeah, but I need to be the one who tells Tony and Ziva, and Draga may not ever get this.”

“Okay.” Jimmy gets that’s Tim trusting him to keep his mouth shut.

“Ender was still an active CIA Agent.”

Jimmy looks like he got punched in the stomach, hard. “Oh, God, Tim.”

“Yeah.” He stops for a second, but knows part of owning it is saying it. “I’ve killed two undercover cops.”

“You… okay? God that sounds dumb. You’re not; I can see that. You…” Jimmy’s not even sure what question he’s trying to ask.

“I’ll be okay. I know it was the right decision this time. I do. But, yeah, I’ve had better days. Getting out of my head was good. It was really good. Probably gonna write when I get home.”

Jimmy nods. He knows that’s how Tim gets back into his head, but in a safe way. Sounds like a very good plan to him. “Don’t think we’re getting home anytime soon.”

“Not given how pissed she was. I mean, she was pissed on Friday, but was doing better when we closed the case, and now… Gibbs tells me he’s been talking to Tony, and that ‘I don’t need to know unless they tell me’ what about.”

“Ohhh…” Jimmy comes up short. “Ummm… Was Gibbs giving him marriage advice?”

“Uh. I hope not. When we got home from the bomb, he didn’t want me to tell Abby what happened.”

Jimmy shaking his head slowly. “That’s not good at all.”

“He didn’t want her to worry.” Tim’s voice makes it clear how intensely ridiculous he thought that was.

Jimmy just shakes his head slowly. Sometimes it isn’t a huge mystery as to why Gibbs has been divorced three times. Jimmy doesn’t know any woman who has ever appreciated, ‘I lied because I didn’t want you to worry.’

“We will talk about that, too. I’ll come in for lunch tomorrow, we’ll catch up, but she’s waiting for us, and this is like twice as long as it takes us to change.”
“Good point.” Jimmy stood up, dropping his towel, and opened his locker. He started to put on his briefs and caught sight of his thigh and hip, already dark red verging toward purple. “That’s not gonna be pretty.”

“We’ll make sure to get you some ice packs.” Tim held up his right arm, his entire forearm was mottled yellow purple from deflecting Ziva’s hits, and his legs aren’t in much better shape. “Me too. She’s gonna need them, too.”

“Gibbs keeps his door open, right?”

“Yeah. I locked up when I got his stuff, but I’ve also still got his key.”

“We’re getting the drinks to go and heading to his place. We’ll be able to talk, no little people begging for attention, and lay around and ice down everything.”

“That sounds really good.”

He got to Gibbs’s first. Not too much of a shock. Jimmy’s the one getting the drinks, and there’s no reason to race because Ziva can’t get in until he’s there.

But he’s not there for long when Ziva heads in.

While it’s true that Gibbs doesn’t have a well-stocked kitchen (Tim makes a note to do a grocery run for Gibbs before he heads home to his own place.) he does have ice, and ice packs, and some frozen vegetables that’ll do for ice-pack duty, too.

So Tim’s laying out the frozen goodies, finding dishtowels to wrap them in, (Cause Jimmy will scold him about possible ice burn if he just puts them on bare skin.) and then heads to the basement for the alcohol. Ziva prefers Tequila, and Gibbs doesn’t seem to have any of it, but if they have to get her drunk to start talking, and then drive her home, he’s ready for it.

Ziva’s sitting on the sofa, ice on her right calf, right arm, left shoulder, and back. “Scotch and Gin?”

Tim shrugs. “I know you don’t like bourbon, so I didn’t bring it up.”

“I thought Jimmy was bringing the drinks.”

“He’s bringing some of them. This is here if it makes it easier.”

“I do not need to be drunk to talk, McGee.”

“Good. Once he gets here, you want to tell us what’s up?”

Once again Ziva shrugs at that question.

“What?”

She shrugs again. There’s a reason she doesn’t talk about stuff like this with Tim or Jimmy, well, several reasons, but the one that’s coming up right now is the fact that, no matter how pissed she is at Tony (and the answer is god awful fucking pissed) she’s also still aware of the fact that the three of them have a sort of competition as to who’s better at the husband thing, and that Tony, at least, according to Tony, feels like he’s been coming in third for, well, since Jimmy got married and Tim started dating Abby.
And she doesn’t feel like this is a problem that will necessarily get better if Tony’s got his buddies ragging on him about it, too. (Let alone being smug about him being a twit.)

But she’s not sure if it’ll get better on its own either.

And there’s no way to keep this a secret.

And it will directly effect Tim.

Jimmy came in and handed out the drinks. Mango smoothie for her, iced-latte for Tim, and a diet vanilla-mint soda for him. He sees the booze on the table and looks from Ziva to Tim, eyebrow high.

“Thought it might help,” Tim says with a shrug while trading a few ice packs for his drink.

Jimmy sits on the sofa, next to Ziva, across from Tim on the easy chair, and sighs as he gets the ice settled on his hip.

“Come on, Ziva, you’ve beaten it out, now get talking.”

“Tim can go first.”

Tim shakes his head. “Nope. Mine isn’t going to get worse if it stews for a day or two. Yours might. Spill.”

Ziva took a few minute to tell her version of the explosion, getting yelled at, ultimatum fight, then segued into getting home early Saturday. “By then I was thinking it would be better. We’d had time apart to cool down. He’d realize he’d been stupid. I’d apologize for scaring him so bad. We’d talk. It would be better.

“But I get home, and he’s not in bed, or on the sofa watching a movie. He’s at the dining room table, working on his computer, and doesn’t hear me come in. He sees my reflection in the screen and slams it down shut, turns around looking panicked and guilty.”

“What was he doing?” Jimmy asks.

“Porn?” Tim asks. Panicked, guilty, furious wife, not impossible, but he didn’t think Ziva was touchy about stuff like that.

“Nothing like that. But I didn’t know that then. At least, I didn’t see any pictures, and he was typing, but…”

Both of them know sitting in front of a computer, typing away, late at night, and slamming the screen shut means lots of possibilities. And of course, Ziva knows that, so she’s going to get suspicious as soon as she sees that.

“I ask what he’s doing, and he says getting everything in order. And we had a serious conversation, about serious things, which makes sense, we both almost died, but the whole time I had the sense that was not quite what he was doing. Why slam the screen shut if he was writing a living will? I should be able to see his will, right?”

“I’d think so. Breena and I wrote ours together.”

Tim nods along with that. Sure he got his stuff in order first, then told Abby about it, but he showed her everything and told her any changes she wanted made, he’d make. “We’ve got to re-do ours since Kelly’s been born, but I’d assume we’d do that together.”
Ziva nods at them and sips her smoothie. “That is the way you do that. Together. But we had our conversation, and I told him I was sorry, and how I understood how scared he was, and how scared I was for him, and… And it was a good conversation.”

“One sided?” Jimmy asks.

“No, he was talking, too. His mother died, and Wendy left, and Kate died, and if anyone gets that, it is me. I understand what having everyone who ever really mattered ripped away feels like. I understand. We talked about how to deal with it better. Talked about how… how some of our coping mechanisms weren’t healthy, and how to do better.

“I thought we were in a good place when we went to be bed that morning. We’d deal with it, together, get better at it, together.”

Tim and Jimmy are listening, this sounds good. This sounds healthy. The fact that they know Ziva’s so pissed she was beating both of them to pulp means that everything in this story is about to go drastically wrong. “We went to bed, slept in late. Saturday was a good day. We had fun. He seemed lighter, happier. I was feeling better, case was closed, we got them, all wrapped up and ready to go, and we’ve got a week off. It was good. This morning, when I woke up, he had left a note on the mirror saying he’d gone out for food. His computer was still on the table, screen up. I was curious. So I peeked.”

Tim sees her hands ball into fists and her jaw clench, and then she forces her muscles to relax and begins talking again, “He was writing the request for me to be transferred to my own team. I’d take Draga, start my own. He’d take you and Gibbs and build his own, new team from the ground up as you left.”

Tim and Jimmy both wince, and Jimmy makes a very pained sound.

“Does that sound like working on it together? Does that sound like healthier coping mechanisms? No, that is him pushing me away.” And Ziva is spitting mad.

“Maybe it was just a draft. What he was thinking before you talked?” Tim asks her.

She shakes her head. “I thought that for a moment, chided myself for jumping to conclusions, and… I was going to wait, going to talk to him, but…” Tim and Jimmy don’t need too much input on but. Ziva’s home, alone, this bomb dropped into her lap. Tony’s computer is right there, and if she checks his email and he never sent it, she can just let it go and pretend she didn’t snoop. “So I checked. He sent the request to Vance last night while I was sleeping. He lied to about what he was doing. This wasn’t getting his affairs in order, not the way he let me believe. He did not even suggest that was what he was thinking. He didn’t talk to me about it at all. He just did it.”

“What did you do?” Jimmy asks, suddenly very worried for Tony.

“I stabbed the knife he made me through his computer and left. I have not been able to even think about being in the same room without really hitting him, so I figure we are better off not in the same room.”

Tim’s nodding. Jimmy is, too. They look at each other, neither really sure where to go from here.

“You want us to talk to him?” Jimmy asks.

Ziva tilts her head a little, looking curious. “What could you possibly have to say to him?”

“We could slap him upside the back of the head without killing him,” Tim answers.
“How does he even start to fix this?” Tim asks Jimmy as he pushes the button on the elevator at Tony’s place.

“Abject groveling and making it very clear that he knows he went insane? Hell, I don’t know. I’m trying to imagine what Breena would do to me if I did something like that and lied about it.”

“Abby’d kill me, and I’d hand her the fucking knife, because that’s just… You just don’t do that.”

“Yeah. Look, I don’t hold him not wanting to work with her against him. I don’t think I could stand seeing Breena in danger every single day. Especially after Jon.” And Tim knows that Jimmy’s really not kidding about that. “So, I get that part of it.” Tim’s nodding along as he says that. He gets it, feels it, too. And he doesn’t know if he could handle Abby in the field now. Once or twice, yeah, he’d make it through, but every day. No. “But you sit down and you say, I can’t do this anymore. I can’t take the fear. You don’t go over her head and get rid of her, just… No!”

They stand quietly as the elevator eases its way up the levels.

“So, shock and awe? Use that to at least handle the work part of it.” Tim asks.

“Go in pissed and then give him an out by saying the concussion was acting up?” Jimmy replies.

“Works for me. You check him out, and while you’re doing it I’ll call Vance and countermand his email.”

“Sounds like a plan.”

Granted it’s true that beyond the rules, no one in their family has any sort of guy code or guy playbook, but that doesn’t mean they don’t watch out for each other, and that doesn’t mean that all four of them aren’t invested in slapping (literally or metaphorically) the others upside the head if they’re being stupid.

That’s the point of having each other’s backs.

That’s the safety net. You don’t always have to make the right decision. You don’t always have to be strong. There will be men who will hold you up if you fall down, save your ass if it needs saving, and they’ll do it in a way that’ll hurt your pride as little as possible.

And for Tony, it’s a lot easier to be stupid than it is to be scared. So they’ll work the stupid angle, lay down cover for him, let him save as much face as he can, and help him fix this mess as best as they can.

“On a scale of one to toothpaste, how much trouble am I in?” Tony asks as he opens the door.

“Between invade Russia in November and reject Hitler’s application to art school.” Jimmy answers, herding Tony to the sofa, getting him sitting down and starting to check him out.

Tim adds, “Marginally closer to invade Russia, though. Trust me, Abby was significantly less horrified by the toothpaste thing than Jimmy was.” (At least, he’s assuming that’s why Tony knows about the toothpaste thing, and that’s going on the list of things he and Jimmy are talking about tomorrow, because he’s got no idea how bad the version Jimmy told Tony was, especially compared to real life.)
“Where is she?”

“My house,” Jimmy replies, holding his finger in front of Tony’s eyes. “Follow my finger.” Tony does, looking exasperated. “She hasn’t gone looking for a divorce lawyer, yet. How’s your head feeling?”

Tim’s staring at the remains of Tony’s computer, still on the dining room table, Ziva’s knife still sticking out of the keyboard. Time for the awe part of shock and awe. He gets his phone and dials up Vance.

It rings a few times and Vance sounds a little wary as he says, “McGee?”

“It’s just come to my attention, that due to severe head trauma, Tony somehow got the idea that this was still his team, and that he was allowed to request a change to the roster. It’s my team, and will continue to be my team until at least 8:00 AM August 3rd, when it may, if he’s all healed up, revert back to being his team. Any communications you get from anyone other than me until then, just toss right into the trash. Don’t even open them. I’m the only one you’re talking to right now.” Tony is staring absolute daggers at him, and might have been on the verge of getting up and doing something about what Tim’s saying, but Jimmy’s keeping him in check.

“Good.” Leon sounds relieved. And Tim’s certain he doesn’t want to get in the middle of a DiNozzo work/marriage fight. “And is DiNozzo receiving appropriate medical care?”

“Yes, I’m getting him checked out right now.” Now the daggers are aimed at Jimmy. “Preliminary reports indicate some level of temporary insanity due to…” he’s looking at Jimmy, give me a reason on his face.

“Inter-cranial pressure.” Jimmy adds, making it up on the fly.

“Inter-cranial pressure,” Tim says to Vance.

“And will this issue with inter-cranial pressure…” Leon’s voice makes it clear that this is bullshit, and he knows it’s bullshit, because among other things, the man’s a boxer, so he know everyone has inter-cranial pressure. It’s like blood pressure, as long as you’re still alive, there will be some level of pressure. Too much is a bad thing, too little is a bad thing. But his voice also makes it clear that he’d much rather have Tim fix this mess than deal with it himself, so any lie Tim wants to tell him right now, including that Tony is currently a pod person and he and Jimmy are trying to get him back with the help of Mulder and Scully, he’ll happily accept. “…be resolved by next Monday?”

“I certainly hope so, but if not, I’ll let you know. I’ll handle this until it doesn’t need to be handled anymore.”

“Good. Keep me updated as necessary.”

“I will, sir.” And Tim hung up.

“You’re pulling rank on me?” Tony asks him sounding… a lot less angry than he should. Tim’s looking at Jimmy wondering if maybe something really is wrong, but Jimmy shakes his head slightly, Tony’s checking out okay.

So Tim stays with the angry play, because that’s the plan. “I don’t have a rank on you to pull. This is a flat out mutiny. Second-in-command and the Doctor can take out the Captain if he’s being insane. And, my God, Tony, you are being insane. What the hell could you have possibly been thinking where fire Ziva, lie to her about it, pretend you didn’t do it, and then what, hope she doesn’t notice, made any sort of sense?”
There’s a fast flare of anger from Tony, and his words are hot, and… God… just so, so sad, and defeated. “You wanna know what I was thinking? I was watching Kate’s head explode right in front of me and feeling her blood spatter my face wet, not even sticky yet, just wet, like drops of water, warm, salty, water. I tasted her blood, Tim. It was on my lips and face and… And the sharp sting of the little shards of her skull against my cheeks,” he gestures to his face where the bits of skull tore across his skin, “and superimposed on that was the fire of the explosion rushing over us and holding Ziva down, my body, Gibbs body on top of her, and begging God to please, please, please no matter what please let her get through this because if I lose another one I will eat my gun.

“I was thinking about how I don’t know what to do if she’s not here.

“And how I don’t care if she hates me as long as she’s alive.” He takes a deep shuddering breath.

“I was thinking that as long as we are on the same team that no matter what, she will come to me. She won’t let me go. She won’t not jump to put her body between mine and the bullet heading toward me. ‘You go. I go’ that’s what she said to me when she ran toward me. Not, ‘I’m better with explosives, get out of the way and let me do it,’ but, ‘You go. I go.’

“She says she’ll work on that. And I’ll say I’ll work on it, but in the end we’ve both lost too damn many people, and if she’s there when push comes to shove, she’ll run to me to shove right back. And this is the line in the sand, the one I can’t let her cross. She’s not dying for me.”

Tim remembers Gibbs saying, ‘Scared guys do stupid stuff.’ And he’s staring at a terrified guy who just did something remarkably stupid.

He looks at Jimmy, and Jimmy looks back at him, and there’s giving your buddy a smack and some cover to get him moving in the right direction, and there’s so far out of you depth you don’t know what the fuck to do.

And this is way beyond what he and Jimmy can handle.

Tony’s just staring at his hands, probably still seeing his own, personal, mental horror show.

Then Jimmy says, and Tim thought this was very wise, “When was the last time you talked to Dr. Cranston?”

Tony shrugs.

“Would you talk to her? Because, there’s smacking you upside the back of the head for being stupid, which is something both Tim and I are willing and able to do at the drop of a hat whenever you need it, and there’s this, and this isn’t going to get better with a smack and some booze.” Jimmy takes Tony’s hands and gets him looking at him. “We love Gibbs, but we don’t want you to be him. You don’t need to continue his pattern of sabotaging the things you want best because it’s easier to screw them up on your own terms than it is to live with the fear of losing them.”

Tony doesn’t respond. He’s looking pretty listless right now. Tim’s texting Gibbs, asking what Cranston’s phone number is.

“Look, if you need help to do this, I will take you myself.” Jimmy’s voice is gentle, soothing as he says this. “I’ll go with you if you need it. And if you want to come to Bootcamp and fight it out, too, we’re here for that. It helps, it really does. But you need to talk to someone who knows how to deal with this, and that’s not me and it’s not Tim, and it’s really not Gibbs, not on this one.”

Ten digits flash up on Tim’s screen, and he punches them in. While it’s ringing he can hear the phone letting him know he’s got another text, but he wants to move on this before he talks more to Gibbs about it.

“Hello.” Her voice sounds warm and open. He has the sense this isn’t her professional number.

“Dr. Cranston?”

“Yes.”

“Hi. It’s Tim McGee, do you…”

“I remember you, Tim McGee, what’s up?”

“I need to ask a massive favor of you. Tony’s having a really, horribly bad week, and he really needs to talk to someone.”

“And you think that someone should be me?”

“I know that someone isn’t me, and it’s not Jimmy, or Gibbs, and if it’s not you, you’ll have a much better idea of who to point him to than any of us will. Anywhere, anytime, just, soon, please?”

He has the sense of her nodding, that gentle, concerned, curious look on her face. “And you’re with him?”

“Jimmy and I both are.”

“Text me his address. I’ll be there as soon as I can be.”

“Thank you.”

Turns out as soon as she could was seventeen minutes. During all of that, Tony didn’t say much. He made a half-hearted joke about Dr. Kate’s Sister coming to visit, straitjackets, and how maybe he needed to hide the computer.

Jimmy smiled a little and asked if he wanted him to stay, and Tony shook his head.

Rachel knocked, and Tim let her in, giving her a very cut and dried version of the last week, but she stopped paying attention to it about four sentences in when she saw that computer with the knife through the keyboard and Tony sitting on the sofa, Jimmy next to him, hand on his shoulder.

“Did he do that?” She pointed at the computer.

“That’s how Ziva let him know she was pissed. He had the knife made for her as a Valentine’s present last year.”

Cranston nods, then notices that both Jimmy and Tim are sporting bruises. “Did he do those?”

“Nope. We… Long story. Not from him.”

“Ziva?”

“Some of them. But probably not the way you’re thinking. We train with her.”

“And trained extra hard with her today?”

“Yes, as I said, it was a really long, really bad week, Tony got it double barreled.”
Her head tilts slightly, that’s got her attention. “Interesting choice of words. That sort of bad?”

Tim shakes his head a little. “Among other things. Really bad week.”

Cranston heads over, and once again Jimmy asks if Tony wants him there, but he shakes his head, so they leave them to talk.

“God, I hope that was the right thing,” Jimmy says.

“I can’t imagine it’ll make things worse.”

“That’s not a high bar to jump.”

“I know.”

“I’ll head home, let Ziva know what’s up.”

Tim holds up his phone, Why do you need it? from Gibbs on his screen. “Gonna go find out what Gibbs has been telling Tony, if I can. Lunch tomorrow?”

“Definitely. Tuesday, too, if you can?”

Tim nods, they’ve got more than an hour of talking to do. “If we can.”
He’s in his car, key in the ignition, and texts Gibbs back: Needed it so we could get her to come over and talk with Tony. Home in twenty minutes. Talk then.

There are times when Tim just doesn’t get Gibbs. This is one… Why would the idea of calling in Cranston be hard to understand?

Wait, he’s assuming. Yes, Gibbs usually knows what’s going on, but he didn’t know they were over at Tony’s or talking to him.

He just got an out of the blue text asking for Cranston’s number.

So he adds another line to his own text: Talked to Ziva. Got the newer(est?) part of the story. Went to visit Tony, got his version. Realized we were in way over our heads. Asked for number. Home soon.

He’s about half a mile from home when a horrifying thought hits, what if this isn’t fixable?

If Tony can’t work with her anymore… If they can’t find a middle ground…

He makes himself not think about that.

They’re going to be fine, because they have to be fine, because his world doesn’t work if they aren’t fine.

“So, you left Tony with Rachel?” Abby asks once they’re all sitting together in her kitchen.

“Yeah. He didn’t want us to stay, and we knew we were out of our depths. There’s ‘you’re a bit spooked,’ and we’re good with spooked,” Abby knows that first hand, the whole family hopped in to help with their own spooked when they got the previa news, “but existential terror is something else altogether.”

“Is Ziva going home tonight?” she asks.

“I don’t know. When we were talking, she was saying she couldn’t be in the same room with him and not hit him, so none of us thought they needed to be in the same room.

“I do know how long her knife is, and how much of it was sticking out of the computer, so it had to be at least two inches into the table. And we didn’t do our usual non-combat exercises, but Ziva did eighteen rounds, seventeen against me and Jimmy. I know we were both dead at the end of round eighteen, and we could and were each catching quick breathers and letting the other attack for the last six rounds. She was going full out on both of us the whole time.”

“I’ll give her a call in the morning. Maybe head over, see how she’s doing,” Abby replies.

“Probably a good plan. I hope she talks to Rachel, too.” Tim looks over to Gibbs who’s been listening, but saying nothing, just holding Kelly on his lap, letting her chew on his fingers. “Did she really say, ‘You go. I go?’”

Gibbs nods. He’s not sure if that’s exactly what she said, but it was the heart of it.
Abby shakes her head. “That’s not good.”

Gibbs finally says something, “No, it wasn’t.”

There’s something Tim’s been wondering about since he got in his car, something… Not intangible, but it’s really only starting to get a shape now that he’s sitting here telling them about the latest bit of the case fallout and seeing Gibbs deal with it.

He knows Gibbs doesn’t think about this whole women, daughters, relationships, talk to girls, fear, and love thing the same way he and Jimmy do. And he’s also fairly sure that Gibbs won’t talk about it if Abby’s around. (Also part of not thinking about it the same way he and Jimmy do.)

Tim’s starting to wonder if Gibbs suggested or flat out told Tony to pull Ziva off the team.

Even the eat his gun line (granted that’s also the term Tim tends to use when he thinks about suicide) sounds like Gibbs.

But he can’t ask about that now, not if he wants Gibbs to do more than brush it off. The guy who was in favor of pretending he fell down a flight of steps or something rather than distress his girl with the idea they were in danger is also the guy who’s not going to be comfortable talking about how scared he was with Ziva in danger.

And the fact that, when it comes down it, Cranston probably needs to chat with someone else, too, is something Gibbs really isn’t going to like.

But right now, it’s Tim's team, and if Gibbs is the one giving Tony that god-awful bad advice, then he needs more help, too.

Tim’s brushing his teeth, trying to think about sexy type things, because Abby's been hinting in that direction when it came to what was on her Yay! Baby Slept Through The Night shopping excursion, but his brain keeps pulling back to Tony and Ziva, and Gibbs.

“Tim?” her hand on his shoulder, voice soft.

“Mmm.” He puts down toothbrush, rinses, spits. “Yeah?”

“Finish up and go down and talk to him. I’m not getting your full attention back until this is done, so go get it done.”

“But…” We've got plans, right?

“Tomorrow morning. I’ll feed Kelly. You’ll snooze. When she goes back down for her nap, I’ll wake you up, and trust me, you’ll like it.” And she smiles warm and sexy at him. “Besides, he won’t talk to me about it, and I can see just as well as you can that Tony’s not the only problem right now. We both know that Tony didn’t come up with that insane plan all on his own, and neither of us are going to sleep, or anything else, well sitting up here worrying about how deep this goes.”

He kisses Abby, soft and deep, holding her close to him. “I love you so much. And I am so, so, so glad that we are okay.”

She kisses him back. “I know. Love you, too. Go take care of our dad.”

He salutes her and heads down.
For once, Gibbs isn’t on the sofa. (Though Tim’s noticing there’s a Gibbs-shaped mark in the microseude.) He heads in the direction of the bathroom, figuring he’ll check there first, but light’s off in there, too.

So… He supposes it’s possible Gibbs could be sleeping, or getting ready to sleep. The man has to sleep at least on occasion, and in that it’s night time, and he appears to be in the room he’s been sleeping in lately… The idea that he may be sleeping isn’t insane.

“You coming in or just standing there?” Or he could be sitting there, hearing Tim moving around, wondering what’s going on.

Tim opens the door to his office. Gibbs is sitting on the futon, in his boxers and t-shirt, from the looks of it doing something involving… massage oil and his… thigh… hopefully.

He sees Tim eyeing him and glares a bit. “According to Abby just sitting around is bad for my leg, and if I don’t want to get stiff and lose muscle strength I need to do something. She showed me this.”

“She taught you how to Rolf yourself?”

“Something like that.”

“Is it helping?”

Gibbs sends him the how the hell should I know look. “It hurts, but in a kind of good way.”

Tim sits down in front of Gibbs, cross-legged, and snags the oil. No way he’s touching either of Gibbs’ thighs, and his calf is still bruised yellow-green so that’s out, too, but he’s got good hands, and at Jethro’s age atrophy is a possible issue for a guy who spends a solid week laying on his back.

“You work your ankle or other leg at all?”

Gibbs shakes his head, eyeballing the oil in Tim’s hands.

“Foot goes here.” Tim taps his right knee. Gibbs is starting to look a little alarmed now. “Come on, you aren’t the only one Abby’s taught some tricks to, and I’m good at this.”

Gibbs is looking awfully wary, so Tim very carefully lifts Jethro’s foot onto his knee. “Even Tony’ll let me work on him if he’s hurting bad enough. Congratulations, you qualify as hurt enough.”

Gibbs doesn’t jerk his foot back, and Tim gets the sense the only reason he doesn’t is because he’s also wary of trying that with his knee still feeling loose. So, instead of jerking away he says, “You’re down here to give me a foot rub? You can do that to Abby.”

Tim laughs, wryly, cradling Jethro’s foot between his hands, warming it up, stroking the oil over it. “Always been my fondest dream, ya know? Sitting here, in bed, with you, soft glow of my computer monitor providing mood lighting. You in your undies, me rubbing oil on your nasty, sweaty, old feet. Ever since that first case in Norfolk, as we stood in front of each other, wind whirring through your hair, smell of dead body lingering gently in the background, you chewing me out, I’ve been dreaming of this moment.” Tim gently whacks the sole of Gibbs’ foot. “Now shush. Your dick’s not going to fall off because I’m touching you. And get yourself some toenail clippers, you could take someone’s eye out with those things.”

Gibbs looks very slightly amused, like he’s trying to not be amused, but can’t quite manage it.
Finally he grins, and shakes his head, and goes back to working on the top of his leg.

Given that set up, why he’s down here should be fairly easy to get into, but all of the start-ups Tim says in his head don’t quite sound right, and Gibbs isn’t volunteering anything, even though he’s got to know why Tim’s down here.

So, finally he flat out asks, “Did you tell Tony to take her off the team?”

“No.”

Shifty sounding ‘no.’ So, it’s going to be this sort of conversation... “Did you suggest it?”

“Yes.”

“Did you know he’d requested she get her own team?”

“I knew he was going to. I didn’t know he’d done it.”

Tim exhales long and slow. Great. “Uh huh... What was different this time? She’s never obeyed the order to run, and you’ve given it before. I didn’t get the chance to ask him, and it wouldn’t have mattered if I did, because it was clear he couldn’t answer it, so I’ll ask you, what changed? We almost died the summer before last, too, and neither of you went bonkers on it.”

Gibbs also does not seem to be appreciating being called bonkers in regards to this. His eyes narrow very slightly, and then relax. Tim wasn’t there, he didn’t see, so he doesn’t know.

As Gibbs talks, Tim works on his ankle, stretching it a little, rubbing along where the tendons connect his foot to his leg. But he doesn’t need his eyes for that, so he’s watching Gibb’s eyes as he says, “‘You go. I go.’ She ran in and said that to him. And he was screaming at her to leave, which means neither of them was working with the bomb. Draga’s useless on this, frozen. Don’t know if it’s because he was scared shitless, or because he’s the one who triggered it. I’ve got my knife out, getting ready to cut because I can see which wire goes to the timer. Finally, he stops screaming at her, whips around, knocks my hand out of the way, yanks the detonator free and flings it into the pile of gasoline canisters.

“I knew what I was doing. He didn’t. It was complete, blind panic, grabbing at anything. And we both tackled her, got her down. Draga finally came to, and got the trick wall shut again, which probably saved our lives because the fire rushed over us a second later and hit the wall instead of the C-4.

“Something else in there went up. The rush of fire was followed by something loud and that’s what blew the crates all around and tossed us, too.

“And it was over, and we got out, as fast as we could.”

Tim just watches Gibbs. Everything about that report is factually true, at least, that’s how he’d bet. But it’s not the problem. That’s not why he and Tony were conspiring. Not if Gibbs is Gibbs. “So, you’re telling me that it’s your professional, tactical assessment of our team that even though they’ve successfully worked together for thirteen years that they’re not up for it anymore?”

“Yes.”

Tim stares at Gibbs as one of his earlier questions rang through his mind. What the hell could you have possibly been thinking where fire Ziva, lie to her about it, pretend you didn’t do it, and then what, hope she doesn’t notice, made any sort of sense? Rule 18. Better to seek forgiveness than ask permission.

Tim’s still looking at him, eyes level, hands cupped around Gibbs’ ankle, not moving, and shakes his head. “I’m calling bullshit on that.”

Now Gibbs is looking angry. “You weren’t there.”

“No, I wasn’t. But I didn’t just meet you, either. You think I can’t tell the difference between scared and pissed? Because there’s only two Gibbs reactions to what you just described, and let me tell you what pissed sounds like:

“Pissed Gibbs boots both of them off the team and makes them work it out between themselves, and the fact that it’s Tony’s Team or My Team or Hell, Vance’s Team doesn’t matter because you’ve never cared at all about rank when it comes to your people not working up to your standards, and from now until the day you die and likely a long time after that, we’re your people, so there is never going to be a time when you won’t feel the need to drag us into line if we need it. Your ghost will come back and haunt us into submission if we get out of line after you die, so don’t try to tell me you’re supporting Tony in his position as Leader.

“Pissed Gibbs knows that if both of them have gone into blind panic mode that neither of them can be allowed on a field team.

“Pissed Gibbs tells me if a third of my team is so far off the reservation, she’s trying to toss her life away. Because pissed Gibbs doesn’t want my ass handed to me, either, because I can’t depend on my team.

“Pissed Gibbs doesn’t come up with plans to sneak around behind Ziva’s back, because Pissed Gibbs has no problem letting everyone in the universe know he’s pissed.

“Pissed Gibbs tells me he’s pissed, and he tells me why, and he doesn’t leave it open-ended when I asked about it this morning, because Pissed Gibbs understands that this isn’t just Tony and Ziva’s marriage, but our team as well, and as such they don’t get a curtain of privacy the way Jimmy and Breena do or Abby and I do.

“And Pissed Gibbs would have told me to bring both of them home as soon as Tony was fit to travel and Pissed Gibbs would have chewed them both new assholes right in my living room, definitely in front of each other, probably in front of me, maybe in front of Draga, because he’d want it to stick.

“And lastly, Pissed Gibbs would have used the threat of tossing both of them out of NCIS to get them both to toe the damn line because he knows they both love this job and that the only thing that scares either of them worse than disappointing each other is disappointing you.

“So, don’t tell me that this is you being rational and cool and calm and assessing the situation and coming up with the best answer, because it’s not.” And he stops there, hoping Gibbs will pick it up, maybe say something, but he doesn’t.

He doesn’t look away though.

And he doesn’t seem angry.

And he doesn’t deny it.

But he doesn’t talk, either. Things like this work so much better when both members of the conversation actually say words. Now what...
Well, if he won’t talk about being afraid, then Tim will. Let him know he’s not alone. That’s a starting point, right?

“We were planning on going in and slapping Tony upside the back of the head. Angry, bluster, call him stupid, and then give him an out, let him pretend he was upside down from the concussion, because stupid or hurt is easier, less shameful than scared.” Tim shrugs a bit, hoping that he’s getting the fact that he thinks being ashamed of admitting you’re afraid is silly across by his expression.

“We know he’s scared. We’re not stupid. Ziva’s already told us that, and even if she hadn’t, we’re able to empathize. We’re married, we love our wives, and we’ve both had enough close calls to know what real fear feels like.

“And then he told us what he was seeing in his head, and that’s just, nothing we know how to deal with. I mean, Jimmy and I have had our share of shit, and then some, but not that. And that sort of fear, we don’t live with it, not every day. So we don’t know what to do. So I asked for Cranston’s number, because she probably does.

“He’s so scared, Jethro. And he’s got good reason for it. And you do, too. Something happens to Ziva or Abby, and it’ll break you for good, right? And it’s one thing if it’s an accident, if it’s the bullet that comes from nowhere, the babies would get you through that, but to see her run into it… Watch her throw herself into the fire to be with him…” Tim’s shaking his head. He’s not playing this, and he doesn’t have to make his voice sound unsteady for this, it’s genuine.

“You’re allowed to be scared about it.”

Gibbs is staring at him, silent, intense eye contact, not even blinking, and right now Tim can’t read what his face is saying, just that whatever it is, it’s very strong, and very now, and very real.

“It’s okay to be scared, or terrified, or whatever comes after that.

“I heard the blast, saw the destruction. I thought I’d lost you all, and I lost it. Everything in my body went galloping out as fast as it could. Tony found me sobbing in my own mess. And yeah, that’s nothing I’m proud of, but it’s just part of being human and having a body. It’s just love, and the thought of losing it hurts so bad. I get it.

“And if we’re being really honest, I don’t know how you and Tony can deal with Ziva working with us. She’s not my daughter, and she’s not my wife, so I can take it. But I know how I feel about Kelly, how I want her wrapped in a protective bubble all the damn time. And I know how I feel about Abby… Jimmy and I were talking about it, how we couldn’t take having a field agent for a spouse.

“You and I talked about this, how I refuse to make Abby deal with that fear all that much longer. I don’t know how she does it, especially since Kelly, especially since the cops did come to her door to take her to the hospital after her parents were in the accident. If I’d lived that, I couldn’t do it again, not knowing if today’s the day you’ll get the knock on the door. So I’m not doing it to her, at least, not for much longer.

“And I don’t know how you latched onto Ziva so fast, not after you lost your Kelly. Not with what she does. Abby I get. Abby’s safe, tucked in her lab. I don’t know how you can take day after day of this with Ziva, but you do.

“But I do know this, it’s easier if you share it. You sat on my sofa and watched Abby and I cry together for the fear of the close call, and it was okay. Nothing bad happened after. We’re still married. We’re still good. I’m not letting her down by being scared. She’s not hurting me by being scared. We’re allowed to be scared. We’re allowed to share being scared.

“You’ve got to be scared when the people you love are at risk.” He knows he’s very open right now, only two other people get to see him like this, Abby and Jimmy, and he hopes he can break into Gibbs with it, get him to open up in response. And if he can’t get that, he hopes what he says next will come across as concern and not an attack.

“But you and Tony can’t be insane about it. You can’t lie about it. You can’t try to send Ziva away without talking to her first. You cannot cripple our team because you’re scared.

“Taking Ziva off the team is the worst advice I’ve ever heard. That’s pure fear talking. And, not only is it fear talking, but it’s fear that’s increasing the chances that you or I or one of the rest of us gets killed because you’re taking our best member away. It’s fear that puts her in more danger, too. Her own team with just Draga? That’s insane. So, that’s not going to happen. Tony goes before Ziva does. He gets his own new team, and we keep Ziva. We sure as hell don’t send her off on her own with a brand new Probie and hope that’ll work out.

“It’s my team until next Monday. Actually, and Vance is cool with this, it’s my team as long as it needs to be to get working right again. And if I have to hold it longer than Monday to make this happen, I’ll do it. You’re off active duty for at least a month, great, you need the time to heal.

“You’re also off desk duty until you’ve talked to someone, Cranston, Wolf, someone, at least twice, about this. And I will check up on it.

Gibbs blinks slowly, and Tim finally looks away from his eyes, coming back to the fact that they’re sitting in his office. He’s in his jammy pants, Gibbs is in his pajamas, too, and he’s holding Gibbs’ foot.

“You’re going to tell me what to do?” There’s some edge there, but not the fire that would have been there... Hell, last year, even, let alone the get-his-head-ripped-clean-off he would have gotten five years ago.

“Long time ago you said I was yours. Not all that long ago, you said it again and offered to kill a man for me. Guess what, that’s not a one way street, not anymore. I’m yours. You’re mine. And if anyone on Earth has ever earned the right to tell you what to do, it’s me. So, yes, while you are in my home, on my team, and most importantly my dad, my daughter’s grandfather, and the second most important man in my wife’s life, you will do what you need to do to be healthy.

“You know what Jimmy said to Tony? ‘We love Gibbs, but we don’t want you to be him. You don’t need to repeat his pattern of being so scared of losing what he wants that he screws it up because it’s easier to end it on his own terms than it is to fear losing it.”

“Jimmy said that?”

“Yeah. And he’s right about it, and I didn’t put it together, but that’s what you do. And nope, not anymore. You deserve to be happy. And you’ve been floundering around in the wilderness too damn long. It’s time to come home. You’re almost there, so let’s finish this. Let’s get you home. And if I have to pull rank on you to get it done, then I’ll pull rank on you, but one way or another, it’s going to happen.”

More quiet, more not talking, but this time Tim’s not going to fill the silence with his own words. Now it’s time for Jethro to respond, and if he has to sit here all damn night, and all tomorrow, too, it’ll happen.
Eventually Gibbs asks, “Can I talk to you?”

Tim relaxes, because he was genuinely starting to wonder if he was going to have to be here all night.

“Yes, always, about anything, but in addition you have to talk to someone who actually knows what they are doing. I don’t. I don’t even know where to start on this. I just know where to end it. This is where it ends, for you and Tony and Ziva, none of you are working another case until your heads are on right. And if there’s any imprint I’m leaving on this team, it’s that you’ll really be right, or at least have a plan to get there, instead of holding together by duct tape, insomnia, and bourbon.”

“What would I talk about?”

“That’s part of what ‘I don’t know what to do’ means. I don’t. But try this for me: what was different this time?”

Gibbs snags his knee brace. He’s not working on his leg, Tim isn’t either, so he might as well make sure it gets the support it needs. But he doesn’t pull his foot back away from Tim. Touch is… he doesn’t know… but he’s not moving away from it. “You ever read Cranston’s report, back when she first checked us out?”

“Above my pay grade.”

“I know that. Did you read it anyway?”

Tim shrugs a little, of course he hacked it. “Just her section on me. Wanted to know what she took away from it.”

And? Gibbs’ look asks.

“Intellectual overachiever driven by a deep need for external validation from male authority figures. It’s safe to say she nailed it.”

“Did you read her letter to Vance?”

“Wasn’t in the electronic file. Just each of us by name.”

“He gave me the cover letter, wouldn’t let me see the individual reports.”

“They were supposed to be in confidence, so that makes sense.”

“Her basic read on us was we were a group of motivated but broken people who put our whole lives into the job because we could handle the job, we were good at the job, but we let everything else fall to the wayside because everything else wasn’t going so hot.”

Tim nods along, that was them. Not anymore, he hopes, but that certainly was them.

“The job, the team, that was all we had. I’m diffusing a bomb, and you’re standing next to me. Why? There’s no reason, at all, for you to be there. We don’t both have to die if I fuck up. And you’re not Ziva, you don’t know how to dismantle a bomb, you being there isn’t helping in any real way.”

“You go. I go.”

“Yeah.” Gibbs nods and swallows. “We know that about each other, always have, but we’ve never said it. And if you don’t say it… But she said it.”
“She broke the rule. We’re supposed to pretend we want a life beyond this?”

“Yes...” Gibbs stops on that, looks annoyed, but not at Tim. "No... You’re supposed to really want the life beyond this. You ran away, Tim. Draga probably would have, too, if he’d had the chance. And... she’s supposed to be attached to her life. And her life is supposed to be more than Tony.”

“Ziva was supposed to run away?”

“Yeah. We’re supposed to run away from shit like that. We’re not the people we were when Cranston talked to us the first time. You’ve got lives and homes and…”

“Her home is Tony.”

Gibbs shrugs.

“You wouldn’t have held it against him if he had ran into a bomb blast for her.”

“No.”

Tim stares at him.

“It’s different,” Gibbs says.

“Ziva was remarkably unimpressed by that argument. I tried it on her. Didn’t fly.”

“I’d guess not,” Gibbs says dryly. But it is different, to him, because he lived it. “You do everything you can to protect her... and if you can’t... If you can’t, you’re not supposed to walk away from it.” He stops, stares at the ceiling, above and behind Tim, and Tim knows that’s him forcing himself to maintain control. “That’s what women and children first means. It’s the vow you don’t say, but you pledge your life to when you marry one of them. That’s the core of being a man and loving your woman. That you will die to protect her. She will outlive you. That’s not negotiable. And... And I know Ziva thinks it’s crap. I know I won’t be winning any prizes from Abby or Breena on this, either. But, unless there’s a kid on the line, if you can’t protect her, you go with her.”

Tim closes his eyes and sighs. He squeezes Jethro’s ankle. And in the end, at its core, there’s always this. The original (though probably not original, his mom dying is probably the original, so ultimate, not original) trauma that’s shaped the rest of his life. Shannon died, and he didn’t go with her, and he’s been dragging that around for more than twenty-five years.

“After Shannon and Kelly, after you put the bullet through Hernandez, why didn’t you kill yourself? You talk like you wish you had.”

Gibbs sniffs, looks away from the ceiling and back to Tim. “Damned if I know. Not like I don’t know what a gun barrel tastes like.”

Tim puts Gibbs’ foot back on the futon, swaps around so he’s sitting next to Jethro, and wraps his arms around him. Gibbs isn’t nearly as stiff as he usually is when he’s getting hugged, but he’s not relaxing into Tim, either.

Tim doesn’t know what to do with this. He has no idea how to help. He wants some sort of magic words to make this better, ease this guilt, but he’s got nothing.

He can’t tell Gibbs that Ziva’ll always be fine. He can’t tell him that it’s irrational fear. He can’t make the guilt of Shannon go away. And he can’t tell him that he’s being silly about giving Tony any advice he can possibly come up with so Tony won’t have to walk his path.
He squeezes Gibbs tighter, rubs his back, and says, “I’m glad you didn’t.”

Gibbs nods, and Tim feels him start to relax, feels more of his weight ease into his body, and a minute after that he feels the shaking start, the full-body, wracking spasms that go with just falling apart. Jethro’s trying to muffle himself, biting his fist, but it’s not helping with the volume and he might be hurting himself. Tim pulls his hand down and holds it.

“In five weeks, no loud noise has ever woken Kelly. When she’s down, she’s down. Don’t worry about it. Do what you need to. I’ve got you.”

And this time, Tim held Gibbs while he cried.

And it wasn’t quick, and it probably didn’t make anything much better, and Gibbs certainly didn’t seem happier after, just, tired mostly, and pretty embarrassed.

So Tim pokes him gently and says, “If you think that’s gonna get you out of having to talk to Cranston, uh uh.”

Gibbs smirks, snorts a little, and flips him the bird.

“Better. We’re going to sleep in as well as Kelly’ll let us. See you in the morning.”

Gibbs nods, and Tim heads up to his room.
The Good Morning

Crying, the feel of the bed shifting, quick rush of cool air as Abby gets up out of bed and the blanket lifts off of both of them, bright light, red behind his eyelids.

Must be morning again.

Another few seconds of lying there, and his bladder decides to confirm that it is indeed morning, so he staggers out of bed to take care of that.

Tim's always thought it was some perverse quirk of evolution that a full bladder gives you a hard-on and hard-ons make it difficult to pee. It’s (obviously) not impossible, but still, especially when all he wants to do is stagger back to bed, having to wake up enough to will his erection down enough to pee and contort into a position where he can still hit the bowl isn’t his idea of fun.

When he gets out of the bathroom, Abby’s back in their bed, propped up, Kelly in her arms, getting everyone settled in to nurse. This triggers some memories from last night about what was going to happen after Kelly went back to sleep, and suddenly Tim’s a lot happier about the concept of morning.

He lays back down, the way he usually does when he’s sleeping around her nursing sitting up, right arm between her hips and the pillows, left over her thighs, lips pressed against her hip.

She gently pets his hair, and he kisses her hip, settling back into snooze mode, listening to Kelly sucking away, and Abby humming to her.

Tim never got the skill of lucid dreaming. He certainly tried to. Back when he was fifteen or so and his sex life was entirely based in dreams, fantasy, and his left hand, the ability to control his dreams so he could do whatever he wanted was way, way, way up on the list of skills to master.

Never really happened though.

Especially not for middle-of-the-night, deep-sleeping sort of dreaming.

He did find; however, that there’s this spot where he’s still aware of being awake, but his body’s pretty shut down, where he can just sort of start to see the images of dreams begin and his hold on awake wanders off, and he still can’t control that, not completely, but he can nudge it into whatever direction he’d like, and end up with a situation where he’s either fantasizing very intensely or lightly dreaming.

So, it’s not like he’s lying next to Abby thinking that there’ll be some sex in the offing soon, so ordering up some super explicit porn dreams of threesoming with Breena (been a while since he played with that fantasy) is a good plan.

It doesn’t work that way.

But, he’s leaning that way, and it has been a while since he’s played with that fantasy. And if he’s willing to hook into what’s around him, (Abby’s body and skin against his) and recent events, (flushed skin, endorphin rush from fighting, hard, throbbing music, feel of his body hot and wet) he can shape that into something that he won’t precisely control, but will most likely unravel in a way he likes.
Basically, he can set the scene and the tone, but from there his brain just plays it out, and he goes along for the ride. Usually he likes the ride just fine.

Mostly he’s seeing the insides of his eyelids, feeling Abby’s skin against his, hearing little baby sounds, but that starts to fade, and his mind starts pulling images, sounds in.

Hardcore goth/industrial club. He knows it’s a club because his mind has it labeled as a club. Music is loud, lights are flashing black and white and green and pink, and there are other bodies pressed around, moving, but there’s no real detail beyond that.

The music is loud. Really loud. And it’s fucking music. Not music for sex, or making love. This is hard, pulsing, throbbing, fast and heavy fucking music. This is feel her come against you, fingernails tearing down your back, flip her over before she stops twitching, and go at it again music. Nothing about it is gentle, and the lyrics are explicit.

Imagine, wrist cuff, collar round his throat, boots, nothing else on. Not even socks. He can feel the leather rubbing against his calf.

It’s hot, very hot, that’s why no shirt. He’s dancing hard, sweating, skin slick.

Whole place feels languid with the heat, moving fast and hard but slowed down at the same time. Almost a slow motion version of fast. Like he knows it’s supposed to be fast but he’s experiencing it slowed down.

Smells like clean sweat and sex. Turned on bodies pressing hard, grinding against each other. Wet pussy, musk, cum, not anything he’d want in a room freshener, but all of those scents scream sex to him, get him hard, make him want to fuck.

Abby’s in front of him. Not touching yet. Dancing for him to watch. Short skirt, plaid, green and black and red, so tiny, doesn’t even cover her whole ass. He’s watching it sway with the way she’s moving, seeing it just skim over the those sweet little cheeks.

He wants to reach out and grab. Wants to bend her over and lick.

She turns to face him, smile on her face promising good things.

Tiny white tank top, cut off, just barely covering the lower swell of her breasts. No bra. They’re swaying every time she moves, too.

He doesn’t know if he wants her facing him or facing away, just knows that she needs to stop dancing in front of him and needs to start dancing against him, right now.

Facing him. They’re kissing, and she’s pressed up tight against him, riding his leg as his hands cup her ass, holding her firm to him.

Breena appears from nowhere, but she’s beside them now, her body pressed into both of their sides, her arms over their shoulders. Abby breaks the kiss with him to kiss Breena, and one of his hands leaves her butt to circle Breena’s waist.

Skin. His fingers land on her skin. So hot, damp, soft. Bikini top, skin tight gold, another tiny little skirt, but hers is tight and Abby’s is pleated.

Lips. Abby’s on Breena, wet and soft and gliding over each other. Abby nudges Breena’s face to him, and he’s kissing her, enjoying the glorious, wet pull of her mouth on his tongue.
Abby turns, with Breena. Abby’s back against his chest, hot, wet skin sliding against his, her ass rubbing small circles against his hips. He can feel it, and since it’s a dream, he can see it from outside himself. See Abby grinding against him, and against Breena.

See them kissing more.

Breasts barely covered in tight little tops rubbing against each other, nipples hard.

He can watch them kissing, slow, wet tongues sliding over each other. Breena’s sucking on Abby’s tongue, and watching it is killing him. Watching it feels like having his dick sucked, and Breena and Abby know that. Abby’s still rubbing against him, and the kilt’s gone, but her skirt is still there, so it’s the slide of her skin and the raspy rub of her skirt against his dick.

Abby’s hands are on Breena’s hips. Breena’s arms are over Abby’s shoulders, her hands wrapped around the back of his neck. He kisses Abby’s neck, licking along her throat. His right hand is between the girls, letting them grind against his fist. (Skirts vanished, all three of them are naked now, except he’s still got the wrist cuff on. He can see that, and is kind of wondering why he’s watching that when he’s got naked Abby and Breena in front of him, but, well, dreams are weird.) He bites along Abby’s shoulder to Breena’s arm, takes it in his left hand, and kisses to her wrist, then licks each finger, sucking them.

Breena’s head falls back, and she moans, loud. Abby’s kissing down her throat, to her chest, pressing her breasts up and licking both of them. Her lips are so red, her tongue so wet and pink and just lapping at Breena’s nipples, and Abby’s still rubbing against him, driving him insane.

On his side, in bed now. His bed? Breena’s? No idea. It’s a bed, or a carpet, or maybe not. He’s on his side, he knows that. His hands are tied over his head. He knows that, too. Can’t use them, but he wants to. Too much beautiful woman all around him, and he really wants to touch all over both of them, so he’s struggling against the knots.

He can feel Abby behind him. His leg is over her hip and she’s fucking him, getting his prostate over and over and each time he feels that pulse that feels like cumming, but isn’t.

Breena’s in front of him, and they’re sixty-nining.

Wet pussy on his lips, wet lips on his dick, and every time Abby nails him, Breena sucks harder, and God, he’s never felt this good. He’s so hard, and so turned on, and it’s a dream so he can go like this forever and…”

God, so hard, so full, so… cock ring? Yeah, oh yes, that’s good, and both girls are licking all over him. They’re kissing each other around his dick and the visual on that and the way it feels, and fuck…”

“Starting without me,” Abby says quietly to Tim when she gets back into their room. He doesn’t wake up. And right now, she’s fine with that.

In fact, him asleep opens some interesting avenues for playing.

He’s usually a not very deep sleeper. Usually he’s fairly easy to wake up. But they’ve both been tired lately, (and at the one AM feed, he wasn’t in bed, and she could hear Gibbs crying, so her guess is last night was an awfully late one on top of a ton of other late nights this week) and it’s obvious he’s dreaming right now, pretty deeply if the little half-gasps sounds he’s making are anything to go by.
Dreaming about some awfully hot sex if the erection that goes with those gasps is a guide.

So… what to do with sleeping beauty over there…

She knows that if she just creeps around quietly, and moves him very slowly, he’ll sleep through whatever comes next.

Very slowly, very gently. Perfectly silent isn’t necessary. These days they’re both pretty good at sleeping through the other one moving around, getting in and out of bed. But she knows that when she gets up to nurse, he rolls into the warm spot of the bed she left, and when she comes back he curls around her, but he doesn’t wake up for that.

She knows she does the same thing when he leaves bed, so, as long as his sleeping body thinks this is just normal getting up and back, it should work.

She creeps under the covers, same way she usually does, and like usual, his arm wanders out for her to lay her neck over, and he presses in close against her back.

Perfect. Only took a little scooting to get his wrist to the headboard. Only took a few more seconds to get his right arm secured to the bed.

Dreaming Tim doesn’t move much, beyond that snuggling in closer, but she can feel exactly how hard he is, so she rubs against him, and very quietly moans, letting him add that into the dream.

She feels the drop of precum smear against her back, and that’s a bit closer to the edge than she wants him right now. Doesn’t want this over before he wakes up, let alone before she gets into it.

She nudges him gently over, and he rolls onto his back.

More slow, gentle shifting around gets his left hand tied.

She pulls back and watches. God he’s looking so good. Spread out, skin flushed, cock hard, eyes closed, fluttering a little, mouth slightly open, lips so ready to be nibbled. So good!

Mmm… Delicious. She leans over and gently licks him, just getting a little taste, and did taste another drop of precum.

Yeah, he’s way too close to the edge. And with the way this week’s gone, he probably hasn’t gotten off since they had sex, so giving him a bit of help is likely a good plan.

She heads for their toy box and grabs the silicon cock ring.

She isn’t sure if he’d sleep through that, but his hands are already tied, so she doesn’t mind too much if he wakes up.

He moans a little as she gets it set, making sure it doesn’t pinch or pull on anything, but his eyes don’t open, and he doesn’t say anything, so he’s still asleep.

So, dive on in and play with him? Show off what she bought yesterday…

That’ll hold ‘til next time. She wants him awake enough to really appreciate it.

Supplies, that’s a plan, get that set ahead of time. Lube, definitely need that. No matter how turned on her brain is right now (and right now it’s awfully happy about the idea of sex) her body’s not on that same page, and likely won’t be anytime soon, not until her hormones get closer to normal, and that’s still at least a month or two off.
So, lube.

And if they’re going to do anything where lube makes sense, then condoms are on the list, too. Wednesday was good and right, and if she’s pregnant that’s God at work, but she’s probably not, and also not feeling any real desire to tempt fate on that again.

Prepped, ready, supplies laid out, Tim trussed up and ready to play, time to wake him up.

This time she isn’t particularly slow or careful about getting onto the bed. She snuggles in close to him, on her side, presses against his, hand circling his dick, stroking gently. “Wake up, baby.”

“Mmm?” He turns his head toward her, eyes still closed.

She kisses his lips, and the tip of his nose, and lips again. He’s not exactly kissing back, but he is making a sound she’s got categorized as slipping from asleep to awake.

Finally his lips get into the game, though his eyes are still shut, and she feels him try to roll toward her, which stops the kissing as his eyes open and he looks at his wrist tied to the headboard.

The expression on his face is very perplexed. “I slept through that?”

“Look down.”

He sees the cock ring and grins. “Wow. Didn’t realize I was that tired.”

“When’d you get to bed last night?”

“After two.”

She nods, and he kisses her. “How much time do we have?”

She checks the clock. “All goes well, hour and a half.”

“Excellent.”

She straddles his hips, just brushing against him gently, and he groans. (Quietly. This time he’s awfully aware of the fact that Gibbs is in his house, and probably awake.)

“What were you dreaming?”

He pulls her bottom lip between his, tongue stroking over it, arching up as well as he can to rub against her. “You and me and Breena, all wrapped up in each other.”

“Sounds good.”

“It was. Want details?”

“Always!”

“Mmmm…” He wriggles around a bit, getting more comfortable, spreading his legs. “Whole set up, or just images?”

“Was there a set up?” she asks as she skims down his body, slipping kisses across his skin.

“At first. Slipped into images and feelings after that, but we started in a club…” He tells her what he was dreaming as she licks her way down his body. “…and then Breena turned… Oh, god, baby…”
She’s pulling his nipple with her teeth while her belly rubs against his cock. “That feels so good.”

Long slow lick while she grinds into him. “Better?”

“Ohhh…” His head falls back and he almost closes his eyes.

“You’re not talking.”

“Ease off enough for me to get six brain cells working, and I will.”

“Ease off, huh? So, not this, then?” She licks a wide stripe down his chest and stomach, and closes her hand around his dick, squeezing firmly.

“Oh, God, Abby! Fuck me, baby, please!”

She licks the tip of his dick, feeling his hips jerk.

“God, please! Want you so bad.”

She knows part of this is him playing. He’s probably not that close to the edge. Close, sure, but part of this is letting his desire ramp up hers.

Abby pulls back a bit, makes sure he’s watching, and then licks her lips slowly, tongue dragging over every millimeter, getting them good and wet, and rubs them against each other, keeping them just touching, and slowly bends her head and presses down on his dick, letting him breach the soft, wet press of them.

He groans. He’s not being loud, but very sincere in his appreciation, and the feel of his smooth skin on her lips is making her feel very pleasantly tingly in all the right places. Abby pulls back again, with a long, slow sucking kiss, and reaches for the condom.

Tim watches her reach for it, and part of him is really thinking that his dick doesn’t want to get anywhere near a slimy, cold bit of latex.

Part of him is really aware of the fact that, even with the cock ring, he’s not going to be setting any endurance records and the condom should slow him down enough for her to enjoy this, too.

And part of him really wishes she’d go back to sucking him because, fucking god in heaven and on high that felt so mind-meltingly good!

But his hands are tied, so he can’t flip her over, and if this is the game she wants to play, he’s happy to play it.

And yeah, it is kind of cool, but her hand jacking him, spreading the lube over his dick feels excellent, and the fact that she’s going to slip right onto him, and there’s the sensation of heat, and the anticipation of her body slipping onto his. She starts to slide down him, and that’s so… God, pressure, really, really good pressure, oh fuck, yeah… Wait… That’s not right.

Abby just winced. It’s very slight, just a second crossing her face, but that’s not a look he ever wants associated with them and sex.

“You okay?”

“Yeah.”
There’s still a little tension in her face, and not the good kind. Not the so turned on it looks like pain. He thinks this really is pain. “Really?”

“Hurts a little.”

He tries to pull back, but he’s the one on his back and tied on top of that, so there’s nowhere he can go. But ‘hurts’ certainly backs him away from the edge. He’s not feeling any burning need to get off any more.

He wiggles his tongue at her. “Come on, flip around, no reason to do anything that hurts.”

“It’s not that bad.”

That pretty solidly boots him out of any of the lingering vestiges of his sexy mood. “‘It’s not that bad’ isn’t exactly the response I’m hoping for here. I know we haven’t been doing a lot of this lately, but you may remember, it’s supposed to feel good.” Which is when a horrifying thought hit. “Did it hurt last time?”

Abby looks sheepish. “Little.”

“Shit. Tell me stuff like that.”

“It didn’t matter that it hurt last time. We both needed it.”

“It mattered to me.” He’s feeling significantly less like he needed it now, not if it hurt. “Did you get off?”

“Yes.”

He’s searching her face, thinking she’s being honest, but not sure if she’s trying to keep him calm. “Really? You’re not just keeping me from freaking out?”

“Really.” She shifts so she’s laying on him, lips less than an inch from his, looking into his eyes. She hasn’t pulled off of him, but he’s about as limp as he can get wearing a cock ring. “Yes, it hurt, but… that whole night hurt. That’s part of this whole love thing, sometimes it hurts. And I needed it. Your body, in mine, maybe making a baby. I needed that, and it didn’t matter if it hurt because the pleasure through the hurt was more important than the hurt. That’s how we got here, both of us deciding the pleasure of this… this whole life… was worth the risk of the hurt.

“I needed to know you came home, needed to feel it in my bones and heart and guts, and sex does that. Your body in mine does that. Your skin on mine. Your cum in me. Lips on mine. I needed it.”

He reaches up to kiss her. “Untie me?”

She pulls off of him and does, and a second after he has his left hand free, he takes off the cock ring and condom, and once he has his right free, too, he pulls her against him, her whole body stretched out along his. He kisses her long and soft, hand cupping her face, leg wrapped around her hips, full body hug.

“I needed it, too. Needed to know I was still alive. Needed your body on mine. If Gibbs hadn’t come in with me, we would have done it in the living room ten seconds after Kelly was done nursing. And I still hate that I hurt you.”

“It really wasn’t that bad.”
“Great.” He kisses her again, left hand tracing down her skin as he shifts his leg, nudging it so hers rests on top of his hip, so his fingers can cup her pussy. “This isn’t supposed to hurt. And, ‘wasn’t that bad,’ isn’t how I ever want you to think of us fucking.”

“The pain wasn’t that bad. The sex was great.”

“How great can it be if it hurt?”

She shakes her head a little. “You’re so not a girl.”

“I’ve noticed that.”

“It was great because you came home. Because for the first time ever, you ran away from the danger and back to me. It was great because I could feel all of you and you were alive. It was great because it meant I got another day with you.”

He closes his eyes and sighs, feeling the worry in her words. Then opens them, looking into hers. “Not much longer.”

“I know. You’re doing so well with your own team, and, and I think you would have been a really great team leader, but I’m glad you’re leaving it behind. You and Gibbs walked in, and he’s got crutches and you’ve got that not really there look, and I can smell smoke on both of you, and my heart just stopped.”

He kisses her again. “Not going to happen again.”

“You don’t know that.”

“I don’t. But I’ll hope, and you’ll pray, and what was the line, ‘We’re too damn pretty to die?'”

She smiles gently. “Something like that.”

He takes her hand, presses it to his jaw, then kisses her base of her thumb. “Feel that chiseled jaw? I’m just too damn pretty to die.” He winks at her. She snorts at that, and holds onto him for a long minute, her forehead against his. “And you’re right. I was good at it. And I liked it. I’m ready for a team. Been ready for a while. So’s Ziva, really. But I don’t want a field team. I’m good with Cybercrime. I’m good with not getting shot at. I’m really, really damn good with coming home to you every single day of the rest of my life, and I want that to be a good, long time. A thousand years isn’t enough, but I’ll settle for the fifty or so we’re owed.

“I talked to Gibbs about it, after the freezer case, and he told me that when it was time to leave, when I was ready, I’d know.

“I’m ready.”

She kisses him again, lips lingering over his, touching him with feelings that don’t translate well into words, but eventually turn into a murmured, “Good,” against his lips.

He sighs against her, holding her a little tighter, little closer, feeling her heart beating against his.

And eventually the soft, warm sensation of her body against his wakes his dick back up.

She giggles, feeling it fill against her hip. “I take it we’re good?”

He rolls onto his back, taking her with him. “We’re about to be a whole lot better than good. Flip around and let me lick your pussy the way I was dreaming of.”
She sits up, and switches around while he scoots down a bit, making sure there was enough room for her legs at the head of the bed. “Thought you were doing that to Breena.”

Once she’s settled, he gives her a small, fast lick, just saying hi really, and says, “You think I’ve got you both naked and only Breena gets eaten out? Oh no.” Another lick, long and slow this time. She moans quietly and presses into him. “Favorite meal on earth, no way I’m skimping on it.”

She probably smiles at that. He can’t tell because unlike in the dream he can’t see. But he does feel her tongue caress the head of his dick, and that’s an awfully good sign to shut up and fuck.

Been a lot longer since they’ve sixty-nined than he would have liked. For a few minutes, he’s just getting back into the rhythm of it. Mostly remembering how the split focus thing works. How to really enjoy what she’s doing to him while still keeping track of her pleasure and getting her off. But it’s an old, familiar dance now, and his body knows what it’s doing.

He’s not trying to spin her out, mostly because he knows he’s not going to last for very long. Her mouth on his dick feels so amazing right now. Real, hot, wet, slick skin compared to the condom is blazingly good, and her tongue’s rubbing him just right while she pulls back with just enough suction and, just, fuck, so damn good.

She’s slick with lube, but not wet on her own, so she tastes different than usual, (not bad or anything, but not that same delicious, oh god, yes, more, fucking right now, flavor that usually goes with eating pussy) but it’s still her, and she’s still making happy sounds as he circles her clit with his tongue in tight, fast little strokes.

Her legs are getting tighter, always a good sign, so he gets his fingers into play. No penetration, he’s not sure what ‘not that bad’ means, but he’s staying away from that for now. But he can stroke, and pet, tug gently on her lips, and once his fingers are very wet, very slick, he slides them back to circle her anus in time with what his tongue is doing on her clit, and that gets some very, very happy sounds out of her.

Which is good because he’s about three seconds away from losing it. She’s got him deep in her mouth, using her hand as well as mouth, and moving fast, and it’s all wet, slippery, hot friction and feels so amazing.

He’s forcing his focus onto his lips and away from his dick because she’s not that close, not yet, but it’s so hard (difficult, too) and her mouth feels so fucking good, and he was so close before, and she’s rubbing his balls, too, and just, oh… holy fuck! He feels the pleasure course through his whole body, and the sharp pulsing rush of cumming over and over into her mouth.

He’s stretched out, feeling very sated, very lazy, purring against her like a fucked out lion laying in an especially good sunbeam.

She gives him a minute, and then, in proper lioness mode, nips him on the hip, reminding him it isn’t naptime, yet.

A little lick here, little lick there, long lick to tie them together, and he gets back to it. Lapping at her gently. Ramping her up, finally tasting her own lube.

Her body wet against his lips, the sounds she’s making, her legs clamping around his shoulders, as he slips her slowly into a shuddering orgasm. God, he loves this, loves her, so much.
They got eight minutes of afterglow together before Kelly started crying again.

Tim got up. “I’ve got her.”

Abby waited until she saw him walk past his dresser, past his pj pants, to say, “You’re naked.”

Tim shrugs, he’s two steps from the door. “No line of sight from downstairs to up here.” You have to be in the upstairs hallway to see their end of it. Sure, the bathroom and guest room are near the stairs end of the hall, but Kelly’s room and his room isn’t.

“Hey, baby girl. You have a good nap?”

She looking up at him, seeming to be pretty irked about this whole having to wait to get cleaned up before the food comes thing.

“Yeah, I know. But you’re pretty smelly right now, and the grown-up half of this equation is going to be much happier if you’re all nice and clean before you get into our bed.”

That answer didn’t seem to make her any happier. But since he is an adult, and he is picking her up and getting her changed, she knows that means the food will be coming presently, so the crying stops.

“One clean, hungry baby, looking for her mama,” Tim says as he lays Kelly on the bed next to Abby. She’s already laying on her side, which is good for nursing when they two of them want to snuggle.

Tim lays next to them, Kelly between him and Abby, watching as she gets her breast into Kelly’s mouth, and Kelly starts sucking greedily.

He lays his fingers on Abby’s shoulder, tracing down her ribs to her hip. Feels like it’s been a million years since they just laid around in bed together, awake, touching, and talking.

“Missed this,” she says.

“Yeah. Been a while.”

“Got plans for today? Want to run downstairs, grab up some food, and lay around in bed all day?”

“God… I’d love to…” There’s a sort of sheepish expression on his face.

“But?”

“Promised Jimmy we’d have lunch. Should check in with Ziva and Tony, need to at least get downstairs at some point and poke Jethro, see if he’s still in one piece. Gotta give Fornell the heads up about Ender.” He lifted up on his left arm and looked over her back to the clock. “But I’ve got two hours before I need to get moving to make it to lunch.”

“Then I’ll take two hours, and I should call Ziva, see how she’s doing. Get some girl talk in. You guys probably didn’t get the whole story.”
“We never do.” He gently strokes Kelly’s cheek and she half looks over to him, but realizes that won’t work if she wants to nurse, so goes back to ignoring him. “You want to start alternating the 1:00 feed?

“Yes.”

“Same as last time? You take three nights off, let your body get used to not nursing. I’ll catch them. And once you’re adjusted, we’ll swap?”

“Sounds… I was going to say good, because the whole sleeping thing does, but, ow… Hate this weaning part, it’s really uncomfortable.”

“Sorry about that.”

“All part of the job.”

“How about you stay out with Ziva as long as you need, have a good lunch. Use the pump. I’ll get her formula for lunch, and feed her a bottle of yours tonight.”

“That’ll work.”

“Three nights of getting to sleep from ten until seven should sound awfully good, too.”

She strokes Kelly’s tummy. “Oh they do, trust me. It’s the part where I wake up at five or so feeling like my boobs are going to burst that’s not sounding so good.”

He gently strokes the tip of his index finger over her breast. “What are you going to do when you go back?”

She tilts her head in a way that means not sure. “Pump as much as I can. Nurse morning and evening feed. Probably the ten o’clock one, too, as long as it lasts. But my guess is that she’ll end up on all formula all day pretty soon after I get back. Can’t see taking a half hour break every three hours to pump.”

That makes sense to him. When she’s working, she’s working and doesn’t much appreciate having to break. “Looking forward to getting back?”

“Yes. No. I’m loving this time here with her, and I know it’s short, and I don’t want to miss it. But I’m going insane home all the time with no puzzles to solve. And no, ‘why are you crying now’ doesn’t count as a puzzle to solve.”

He smiles at that, stretches again, feels his stomach rumble, and sits up. “What sort of food did you want me to grab from downstairs?”

“Usual.”

“Okay. I’ll be back in a few minutes with food.”

He’s slipping on his pj pants when Abby says, “Tim.”

“Yeah?” He’s turning from his dresser to look at her.

“Remember your blushing comment on Wednesday?”

He thinks about it, and, yeah, he does, but he's not immediately seeing how it's relevant.
“If you go down there with a wet goatee, smelling like my cum, and Gibbs sees you, the next time I see him, I will blush. Wash up first.”

He starts to giggle at that. Then rubs his face, and yeah, it’s still wet and a bit sticky. “Didn’t even occur to me…”

“I know. Doesn’t usually matter if you walk around the house looking like we just had sex. Not like it’s a problem for me. But…”

“I get it. I don’t mind him knowing we have sex, but,” he touches his goatee, “that’s a step further than I want to go, too. I just didn’t think about it. Can’t see my own face.”

He heads to the bathroom to wash his face. Might was well brush his teeth, too. A minute later he heads out. “Presentable?” His hair’s still sticking up in fifteen directions, and all he’s wearing is a pair of flannel drawstring pants and his wrist cuff, but yeah, he looks like himself just getting up (as opposed to himself just gotten off).

“You’ll do.” She looks at him for a long minute, eyes trailing up and down his body, letting him know that she likes what she sees.

He sits on the side of the bed next to her, and kisses her shoulder, scraping his moustache across her skin, nipping gently. “Since you’ve got me thinking about it; how was that?”

It takes her a second to figure out that he’s asking how oral with his facial hair felt. “Honestly?”

“No, lie to me. Only reason I’m asking is I want you to pet my ego. Yes, honestly.”

She shrugs a little. “Kind of itchy and distracting.”

His eyebrows furrow. “That’s not good.”

“Couple times I was pretty close and then you’d shift and suddenly I was getting attacked by a toothbrush.”

He winces. Apparently he’s not winning any awards for greatest lover ever this week. “Great. Shaving went onto the plan for today.”

“That’s a good plan. I like the way it looks. And it feels good when we kiss,” she brushes her fingers over it, “or like how you just trailed it over my shoulder, but… don’t love it for oral, and when I get back to waxing regularly, just, ouch.”

He nods. And if they’re being this frank… “I really don’t like condoms. You’ve spoiled me, because back when all sex involved them, they were just fine, but now…” he kisses her, carefully, “now I know how good real sex is, and how spectacular your body feels, naked and wet and silky on mine, and if it’s about me, I’m good with mouth or hands or anal any other part of your gorgeous body until we can go back to non-condom sex.”

“And what if it’s not about you?” she asks with a smile, because after all, it’s not just all about him.

He laughs a little. “If it’s not about me, then they’re fine. I mean, it’s still sex with you. It’ll still feel good, and I’ll still get off. But, if we’re talking about general preferences, I’d rather skin on skin than skin on latex on skin.” He kisses her again, standing up, getting ready to get them some breakfast.

“From now until we get back to baby making sex, it’s lady’s choice. You get to pick what we’re doing, and if I see the condoms come out, that’s fine.”
“You just wouldn’t mind if they sat in the drawer and collected dust.”

“Not at all.”

“And when we’re back to baby making sex?”

He smiles at her, eyes hot and sexy. “Gonna lay you out, hitch your leg over my shoulder, and slip into you long and slow, just easing into you, making sure to get that angle you like while rubbing your clit. I’ll do it so slow, all the way in and all the way out and over and over and over. Every single inch of your body clinging and slipping over mine.” He leaned in to kiss her one more time. “Gonna make you come so hard your ears ring and you see stars, and your body pulsing on mine’ll set me off, and we’ll see if all that hot, wet, clenching skin, and searing pleasure can make a little brother or sister for Kelly.” One last kiss, wet and slow, and if they’re ever going to eat, let alone not do something even more horrendously inappropriate with Kelly in the room, he really needs to get out of there. “I should probably get us that breakfast.”

“Yeah.” She sounds a little breathless as she says it, grinning at him, and he grins back, leans in one more time, and gently licked her bottom lip, just couldn’t not do that, then saunters down to get them some food.

“‘Morning.”

Gibbs nods at him. He’s sitting at the kitchen table, coffee and eggs in front of him. “Got some in the oven on warm for you two.”

“Thanks.” Tim opens the oven, and there are two plates of scrambled eggs in there. He shuts the door and starts collecting peaches, strawberries, almond milk, and yogurt for Abby’s smoothie. “How’re you feeling this morning?”

Gibbs flashes him a look that may mean Come on, we’re not girls, we don’t have to actually talk about this stuff or possibly Pretty damn tired and maybe Didn’t we do enough of that last night?

Tim shakes his head. “Use words. I don’t know what that look means.”

“Fine.”

“Okay. I know that look didn’t mean that.”

He certainly didn’t have any problems following the back off in the look that followed.

Tim raised his hands, and said, “I’ll stop poking.”

“Good.”

Tim very pointed doesn’t ask while he cuts the peach for Abby’s smoothie.

“Hannah used to do that,” Gibbs says quietly, not looking up from his coffee.

“Hannah?”

“Ex-number one. She’d sit there silently not asking me things.”

“Huh.” Tim shakes his head, then looks at Gibbs and quirks an eyebrow. “Must suck when people won’t talk to you.”
Gibbs glares a little, but there’s no heat in it. “Were you always such a smartass?”

Tim grins. “I have my moments. You and Tony probably should have heard some of the things I used to say in my head to you. You need anything else while I’m up?”

“No.”

Tim hits the blend button and the whirling of the smoothie kills any shot of talking. When it finished and he had her smoothie poured into a glass, he turned back to Gibbs. “Really, you okay?”

“Thought you weren’t poking.”

“You didn’t like me not poking.”

Gibbs sighs, looking put upon. In his own home if he’s in a bad mood, he just goes down to the basement and works until he feels better. “Slept like shit, knee aches, I’ve read every book I had on my to-read list, and I’m bored.”

Well, Gibbs doesn’t want to talk much, so Tim’s not touching slept like shit. Nothing he can do about achy knee. Gibbs is moving around well enough he can get his own pain meds if he needs them, but there is something he can do about the lack of reading material, which may help with bored.

“Have you actually read my books?” While he was getting clothes and stuff for Gibbs, Tim noticed that he did have copies of all of his books on the bookshelves in his room.

“Yeah.”

“Like ‘em?” Gibbs has never said anything about them. Until he was fetching clothing, Tim didn’t even know Gibbs had them.

Gibbs nods. They aren’t his favorite books ever, but they’re good. Once he got over the whole the-main-character-was-based-on-me part, reading them got fun.

“Wanna be a beta reader?”

Gibbs looks startled, he’s got no idea what that term means. “A what?”

“I finished Shadow Force recently. After I finish one, it goes to hibernate for a month or so. Then I read it again, make sure I actually wrote what I thought I did. Abby or Penny, sometimes both of them, read it, too. Beta reading, the second reader. Then I take my notes and theirs, and beat it into a second draft. It’s rough as hell, completely unedited, on paper, and it’s the only copy I have, so you’ve got to be just as careful with it as you are with Kelly, and she can’t get anywhere near it, but if you want to read it and let me know what you think, I’d be interested.”

Gibbs thinks about it. It’d be a good way to eat up the last day of laying on his back.

“Sure.”

“Reading on the sofa?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ll put it, a pad, and a pen on the coffee table for you.” Tim heads out of the kitchen, and he hears him moving through the office, then footsteps in the living room, and back to the kitchen. “Don’t write on it. Penny’s gonna read this one, too.”
Gibbs nods again, watching Tim debate how to take both plates of eggs, and the smoothie upstairs. He settled for moving all the eggs to one plate and balancing a fork on it.

“Breakfast in bed?”

“That’s the idea. Haven’t had a lay in in forever. Still got almost two hours before either of us needs to get ready to go anywhere, and I don’t plan on getting out of bed again until then.”

That got a small smile out of Gibbs. “Enjoy it.”

“I intend to.”

Abby was still on her side, Kelly still sucking away. She had her phone and was reading something, head propped on her hand.

“Breakfast!”

“That was faster than usual.”

“Jethro made the eggs. All I had to do was carry them up.”

“Nice of him.”

“Yep.” He takes the phone from her and hands her the smoothie. Then set the plate with the eggs on it just behind Kelly, and settles into bed next to them, back against pillows propped on the headboard. He forks up a bite of the eggs, holds them out to her, and she eats them. “I remembered to say thanks.”

She nods at him while chewing, and he gets a bite for himself. They’re good. Gibbs cooks them in butter instead of the spray oil they use, and Tim thinks he adds milk and sour cream to them, too. Whatever it is, they’re tasty. Probably bad for him. But, once again, tasty.

“How’d last night go. When I got up to feed Kelly, I could hear crying. Didn’t sound like you,” Abby asks after she swallows.

“Probably was me some, too, but you were hearing him. Didn’t wake you up, did it?”

“Nah.” She shakes her head and Kelly looks up, wondering why her breakfast is moving. “Only one cry is on my wake-up-right-this-second-sensor, and it’s not his.”

“Good.”

“It’s funny, because Kelly crying did wake me up. Heard that and the switch flipped, and I was up. But the whole time I could hear him in the background, but that didn’t do it. Slept right through that until her little, baby cry cut through it.” Abby sips her smoothie. “This is really good. You do anything different?”

“Nope. Probably just got a really good batch of peaches.”

Another nod. “So, how drunk did you get him?”

Tim chewed another bite of egg. “Cold sober.”

Abby’s eyebrows went high as she sipped her drink. “Wow.”
“Yeah. Also got him to agree to see a counselor.”

Her jaw drops. Finally she pulls it back up again. “It doesn’t count as sober if you shoot him up with something other than alcohol.”

He smirks at that. If you had asked him last week what it would take to make Leroy Jethro Gibbs go see a counselor, he would have said, ‘narcotics.’ “Really, sober. Not a chemical in his system. Well, maybe pain meds, but if he was on them, he took them before I got in there with him. I told him that unless he wanted to start planning his retirement party, he was going to talk to someone, at least twice. Not letting him back on the team until he does it.”

Now she’s looking worried. “How’s that going to work when Tony takes over?”

And that’s something that didn’t occur to Tim, either. Fortunately, it also didn’t seem to occur to Gibbs. “We didn’t get into that. But I told Vance that I’d hold the team until it was ready to work again, and I will. And if that means Tony spends some time working for me, or he and Ziva decide they need some vacation time to work things out, both of those options are fine. But they can’t work together if they don’t get this sorted out, and Jethro’s been struggling with this guilt for too damn long. I’m in charge right now, so I’ll abuse the hell out of my power to get them moving in the right direction.”

She smiles at that. “Tim McGee, Benevolent Dictator For Life.”

“Damn right, baby.”

“Eggs,” she says, pointing at the currently empty fork. He fetches another bite for her, she took it, chewing, and then asks, “What did you say to him that got him crying?”

He took his own bite. “Long talk about fear and love and back to Shannon again, because it always goes back to Shannon, and I said I was glad he didn’t kill himself after she and Kelly died.”

Abby blinks hard and swallows. “That’d do it. That makes me want to cry, and I wasn’t there.”

“Yeah.” It certainly had made him want to cry.

“Think it helped?”

“Honestly?” The expression on his face makes it clear he’s not sure.

“Nah, lie to me, I like the happy sunshine and roses version.”

“He’s all better. Took the ring off before we went to bed. He’s hunting for a new red head online while we speak.”

She poked him and stole his bite of eggs.

“I don’t know if it helped. I’m not even sure what helped looks like. But I know he thinks it’s not cool for Ziva to run into a bomb for Tony, but perfectly fine for Tony to run into one for Ziva, and that it’s based entirely on the fact that he didn’t save Shannon and Kelly and feels like if he couldn’t do that he should have died with them. And I’m not a psychologist, but even I know that’s not a good thing.”

“That’s why you got talking suicide?”

“Yeah. Asked why he didn’t do it. Not sure what answer I was hoping for, something to link into not feeling like it was his fault, but he couldn’t give me that, couldn’t tell me why he didn’t pull the trigger, and I don’t know if he doesn’t know or if he just can’t tell me. He did tell me he was a lot closer than I thought he’d been—“

“How close?”

“Knows what a gun barrel tastes like.”

Tim can see her heart breaking for Jethro, and since he’d felt it the night before he knows exactly where she is. “Yeah. So, I told him I was glad he didn’t do it. And he spent an hour or so crying on me. And I have no idea if it helped, or changed anything, or… He’s in a pissy mood this morning. But he’s also saying he didn’t sleep well, his knee hurts, and he’s bored.”

“Is he lying?”

Tim shrugs. “I’m sure all of those things are true. I don’t know if that’s the whole story. I gave him Shadow Force to beta read to help with bored.”

“Oh my. That’ll be interesting.” Abby beta read Most Precious and Traitor Within and she knows exactly how rough ‘rough’ is. (She’s one of the few people who knows that his spelling skills drop in a direct ratio to how deeply he’s into whatever part of the story he’s telling. The more into it he is, the faster he types, the worse the spelling gets. Anything that’s spelled perfectly with precise grammar and all the commas in the right places is filler written to bridge one scene to the next.)

“To say the least.”

“Did you explain that he’s not proof reading?”

“No. Just said it was the first read through, and I wanted his thoughts.”

She shakes her head a bit, images of lots and lots of red ink.

He took another bite of the eggs. “Maybe it doesn’t have to help,” he says, taking it back to Gibbs, and she doesn’t seem to be having any trouble following that he’s not talking about Shadow Force. “Nothing changed or got better with my parents by talking about it. In fact, I think it’s safe to say things got worse with my Mom. So, talking about it didn’t ‘help’ but sharing it wasn’t bad, either.”

“Maybe it’s enough to just know the people who love you love you and they’re not going to freak out or run away if you let them know who you actually are?”

“Yeah.” He nudged her hand, taking a sip of her smoothie. “You’re right, that did come out well.”

She nods. “Sooo… are you going to talk to your mom at some point?”

He flashes her a little dismissive gesture before saying, “I should. But like going to the dentist, I know it’s going to hurt, I know I’m not going to like it, and I have the feeling it’s not going to provide me with any real benefit.”

“Going to the dentist is good for you!”

“Yeah, I know.” And he does. Which does not mean he likes doing it. Just being in the waiting room gives him a headache. “You and everyone else on earth says that. I’m still not buying that I’m any better off than I would have been by just brushing, flossing, and only going when my teeth actually hurt.”
Her eyes narrow a little. Abby’s beyond religious about taking care of her teeth. And unlike Catholicism, which she sees no issues with him sort of just barely going along for the ride, doing a good job taking care of his teeth is something she expects from him as well. As a result, he’s been seeing his dentist a lot more often.

“Not saying I won’t go. Just don’t think it’s good for anything.”

“Uh huh.” She changes the subject, a little, or gets it back to where it was. “You don’t think talking to her again would be a benefit?”

He rolls his eyes to the ceiling. “Sometimes I miss her. Sometimes I forget, and I miss her so bad that I just ache for it.” He smiles, but it’s a sad smile. “Lots of things I want to tell her about Kelly, but that doesn’t last more than a minute or two because I remember, and so much of that crap was her. There are three emails from her in my inbox now. Haven’t been brave enough to open them.”

“You might be pleasantly surprised,” she says with her hopeful voice.

“I might get my heart ripped out again. And I’m… If that’s what it’s going to be, I can wait. And honestly, I can wait for good, too, because speaking of things where I don’t know what helped looks like, this is another one where… I just don’t know. Say there’s a massive, I’m so sorry, apology in there. It wouldn’t change things.”

Abby squeezes his knee and kisses him. He kisses back, feeling the comfort of her touch, and the deep peace of not having to do anything about this. She won’t push him, and right now, that matters.

When he pulls back, she detaches Kelly from her left breast. “Come on baby, you’re all done on that side.”

Tim picks up the plate, holding it and the smoothie so Abby can get herself sitting up, Kelly on her lap, face over her knees, and start the gentle percussion that goes along with coaxing a burp out of their daughter.

In a few seconds, there’s a massive belch, the sort that Tim can’t imagine can come from someone so small. “Can’t believe she can burp like that. I can’t do that, and I’m seventeen times her size.”

“You don’t live on an all milk diet.”

“There is that.” Tim scoots over a bit, and Abby rolls over, getting Kelly set on her right, while Tim walks around the bed to sit facing her again.

Kelly got latched on, slurping away, dreamy expression on her face, looking really relaxed.

“That is one really blissed-out little girl,” Tim says as he gently strokes her hair.

“I think she’s getting a dose of my post-climax oxytocin.”

“Hmmm… Interesting side effect.” Tim stretches, laying on his stomach, nuzzling Kelly’s ear, enjoying the smell of clean baby, and the ridiculously soft feel of her silk fine hair against his cheek. Abby’s fingers trace down his back, and he purrs at that.

“You’re looking pretty blissed-out, too.”

He kisses Kelly’s head, and looks up at Abby, smile in his eyes. “I’m at home, in bed, with my girls, pretty high on my own dose of oxytocin, and I’ve still got more than an hour before I have to do anything besides lay here and enjoy you two. I am pretty blissed-out.” He leans up on his elbows to kiss Abby. “How about you, feeling pretty good right now?”

“Yeah. Be even better if the rest of those eggs got over here and into my mouth.”

He reaches over to the bedside table, and grabs the plate, probably about one egg left on there, and begins feeding it to her.

For a moment there was just the sound of content sucking/chewing, then Abby says, “You never did give us any details, how was Bootcamp? You and Jimmy fought Ziva together? How’d that go?”

“We spent the first two rounds tripping over each other.” He touches one of the bruises on his shoulder. “I think that one’s Jimmy’s elbow.”

“Ow.”

“Not too bad.” He holds up his left arm, still mottled with bruises from defending against Ziva. “This is sore.”

“You should put more ice on it.”

She finishes the last bite of eggs, and he puts the plate back on the bedside table, then scooted down, laying on his side, facing her, moving close enough so her leg could rest on his hip, Kelly snug between them. “I should, but I don’t feel like getting up right now. Anyway, when I was heading toward the ring, I heard Ziva asking Jimmy if we’d ever done anything like this, and he said we’d danced,”

“Uhhhh… Did I miss something…”

“He meant the four of us. But I said the same thing to him.”

She winks at that. “You know, if you two ever do do that…”

“Yeah, you want pictures and so does Breena.” He rolls his eyes and sticks out his tongue a bit. “Anyway, two rounds in it occurred to me that if we had some music maybe we wouldn’t be tripping all over each other, because we have danced as a foursome and we didn’t spend the whole time tripping over each other and obviously something was different, so maybe it was the lack of music. Got my old, college Nine Inch Nails favorites together. Jimmy knew them, too. And we got a whole lot better. We even won round nine. Then Ziva and Jimmy added their own music. It was fun. And we were a lot better with the music, even Ziva’s music, which neither of us had even heard before.”

Abby thinks about that. “Of course you’re better at it with music. When we dance, you and Jimmy lead. You’re like two poles, and Breena and I move between you, but each of you runs your own dance. When it’s all four together, whichever one of you is deeper in the press keeps leading. But when you fight, no one’s leading, or you both are, so it’s a mess. Add in the music, and it leads, so you work better.”

“Makes sense. And when it was NIN, or, Jimmy picked the Mortal Kombat soundtrack— “

“Good choice.”

“Yeah. But we both knew that music so we were doing better with the whole I look to my left a little and he nods a bit and between the two of us we get Ziva off balance.”

Abby seemed to be thinking about that, too. Her fingers traced up and down his shoulder, skirting the bruise. “Think you’ll do it again?”

“Yeah, I do. It was good, and I kind of want to show it off to Gibbs.”

“I want to watch.”

His eyebrows went high. In six months Abby’s never wanted to watch them fight. Something about not enjoying seeing him getting hit. Which he understands. If she was joining in on Bootcamp, he wouldn’t want to watch, either. Even if it’s not a real fight, even if it’s just practice, he doesn’t want to see anyone hit Abby.

Then it occurred to him what was different about this and why Abby might want to watch. “You’re never going to get us to dance with each other, so you want to see this?”

He saw the grin spread across her face as she watched him understand the context for wanting to watch. “What’s not to like? You, Jimmy, hot, sweaty, moving together, loud music, yeah, I like that a whole lot. Breena will, too.”

He laughs at that and tries to think of what it must have looked like from the outside, but he doesn’t have too much of an idea. He was so focused on the fight that the only images he has are what his eyes were seeing. “Probably not as interesting as you think it’ll be.”

“Oh, it will be.” There’s that sexy grin again. “Wait. Your dream. Club, loud music, hot, sweaty… How much of that started fighting with Jimmy?”

“The music and the way my body felt.”

“Was Jimmy in the dream?”

He rolls his eyes. “I’m still a straight guy, so, no. He wasn’t. Not having guys in my sex dreams is one of the defining characteristics of being a straight guy. Just you and Breena.”

He gently nibbles that little naughty smile that lit up her lips. “Hey, I can hope, right?”

“Hope all you want, love.” He shook his head, rolling his eyes a little. “Hope all you want.”

“So, are you saying you’ve never had a sex dream about a guy?”

Tim’s eyebrows scrunch together. His immediate answer is no, but he decides to think about it for a minute to make sure. “Nope. Or if I ever have, it’s not the sort of thing I remembered when I woke up.”

“ Weird.” She looks really perplexed by that.

“Actually, um… no. I think that’s pretty damn normal for the kind of guy I am. I’m fairly sure Jimmy and Tony don’t dream about sex with men, either.”

“Or would never admit to it if they did.”

“Come on, Jimmy’d tell if he did. I just don’t think he does.”

“You could ask.”

“Umm… no…” he says while shaking his head.

She thought about that. “I’d ask.”
“And nothing is stopping you from asking.”

Kelly’s sucking started to slow down. Abby began stroking her cheek. “Oh no you don’t. No falling asleep, yet. Gotta finish both sides. Come on, baby, wake up.”

Her eyes lazed open and the sucking got a little faster. But she’s also looking a little miffed at the whole not being allowed to just drift off thing.

“That looks exactly like your I’m so done with you look,” Abby says with a chuckle.

“You’re not done with us, are you?” Tim asks, nuzzling her cheek and shoulder.

Her eyes track toward him, but she’s pretty focused on the food, so she doesn’t try to turn her head.

“She’ll be six weeks old tomorrow,” he says, slipping his index finger into her tightly clenched fist. “Hard to believe you’ve only been here six weeks.”

“Feels longer to you?” Abby asks. It’s been a very long six weeks for her.

“Longer, shorter, I don’t know. She’s got a doctor’s appointment tomorrow, right?”

“Yeah. I’ve got one, too, and so does Gibbs.”

“Okay, I’m available for whatever chauffer service is needed.”

“Good. I think his appointment is the same time mine is.”

“We’ll make it work.” Tim sighs and stretches again. Bright yellow sunlight is striping between their blinds and over Abby. He trails his fingers along the stripes. Kelly’s in her shadow right now, no stripes for her, and they pick back up again on his side.

They lay there, Kelly nursing away. Tim idly tracing his fingers over Abby’s side and hip, Abby’s leg curled over his hip, both of them enjoying this series of quiet moments with each other.

And eventually Kelly finished up. And like before, she was looking awfully sleepy and peaceful. Tiny babies don’t smile, but they can look pretty satisfied. Once Abby got her detached, Tim picked her up, patting her back while taking her to her room. Another massive baby belch, and then once again she goes down to sleep.

That makes him think something, about relative time, and he’s getting ready to mention it when he heads back into their room, but Abby’s not in their bed.

A second of listening lets him hear the shower running, and turning toward the bathroom shows him the door is open. Shower time together works for him.

He heads over there and sees she’s not got the shower on. She’s filling the tub, sitting on the edge, water lapping at her ankles. Laying around, talking, warm water, yeah, he’s good for that, too.

He shucked off his pj pants and sat next to her. “When I put her down, I was thinking, for us a day is one wake up to the next. I wonder if it’s the same for her. She’s growing so fast, and if each sleep cycle is like a day for her…”

Abby shrugs. “Could be. I always thought a day was on dawn to the next.”

“Or that. Sometimes wonder how this all feels to her.”
“Yeah. She lives in a world without words, barely any images, it’s all touch and sound and smells and weird blurry things whizzing past.”

“She knows these.” He lightly touched her breast.

“Well, she spends a lot of time with them up close enough she can focus on them. I bet once upon a time we all knew that.”

“Probably. Think that’s why even straight girls like breasts? All those good, warm, being taken care of, safe, and happy associations.”

“I think that might be why you like breasts.”

“I like them for a whole lot of reasons,” he says with a smile, kissing her shoulder, “but yeah, that’s on the list, too.”

She leans over and kisses him quickly. “Temperature on the water good?”

“Yeah, feels good.”

“Great.” She shut off the water, and he slipped in, back against the slanted side of the tub, and she followed, settling between his legs, head against his chest.

“Mmm…” she purrs at him.

He kisses her temple. “Yeah, liking this a whole lot.”

Her fingers close between his, left hand in left hand, wedding rings next to each other. His head drops back against the edge of the tub, and they both just rest with each other.

He’s getting pretty close to drifting off when his brain wanders back to ‘not that bad.’

He strokes her shoulder and arm, settling his right hand on her stomach, just below her belly button, about to ask, when she says, “It’s kind of trippy.”

“What is?”

“I can’t feel that.”

“Mmm?”

“There’s like a four inch wide strip below my belly button to my c-section scar, where I’ve got no feeling.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.” She took his hand in hers and traced the edges, about four inches wide and four inches long, just below her navel to the top of her pubic hair. “No sensation at all there. Just completely numb.”

“Is it supposed to be like that?” He’s feeling a little alarmed by the fact that six weeks later she’s still numb.

“I don’t know. I read that numbness could be a side effect of a c-section, but it didn’t say how much. Gets better supposedly.”

“Like, gets better in a few weeks or months or…”
“Don’t know. Have to ask Dr. Draz about it tomorrow.”

He skimmed his fingers from her navel to just below her scar. “Nothing?”

“I can feel where you are now. The bottom side of the scar has full sensation,” she moved his fingers to the point where they were tracing the bottom edge of the scar, “but anything above it on the midline is dead.”

“Nothing at all, not that tingly dull feeling you get with Novocain?”

“Nothing at all. It’s like your hand vanishes when you get there.”

“Huh…” He’s not sure what to do with that. It doesn’t sound like she’s complaining, just telling him, and that, along with a whole lot of other things, goes into the seventy million reasons why it’s great to be a guy file.

“Were you about to say something? I think I might have cut you off.”

“What does ‘not that bad’ mean?”

“Not that bad.”

Yeah, that’s not helpful at all. Not that bad covers paper cuts and stubbed toes to the bruises all over him right now. “Like, sore, or achy, or…”

“Kind of like anal without enough lube and you didn’t stretch enough ahead of time.”

“Fuck!” He’s utterly horrified by that. Been there, done that, didn’t like it at all. “That’s not ‘not that bad,’ that fucking hurts!”

She shrugs. “Then it’s a bad example, because it’s not that bad. I still got off. Too tight, stretching further than was comfortable. Like” she pauses and says, “That’s not going to mean anything to you. It’s just not comfortable. Doesn’t hurt as much as getting a tattoo.”

“The whole way through, or does it get better as we got going?”

“The whole way through. Gonna take a while for my hormones to get all the way back into synch, and until then…”

He sighs and kisses her shoulder and makes a mental promise to keep his face as smooth as possible. “I know. Jimmy said right now your body is doing everything it can to not get pregnant again. I get it. Just, really, don’t like the idea of hurting you, at all. Even if it is ‘not that bad.’ Especially since we aren’t getting a lot of time for this, I want it to be really, really good when we do.”

“I know. We’ll go slow next time, start with one finger and tongue and figure out what feels good.”

“Yes! You, me, Kelly’s nap time, one finger at a time and lots of lube and my tongue driving you crazy, and… Didn’t you get some sort of surprise or something?”

“I did,” she sounds very happy as she says that.

“And do I ever get to see it?”

“Tonight? Tomorrow morning? Wanted you to be awake enough to appreciate it.”

He smiles at that, kisses the top of her head. “Looking forward to it.”
She cups her hand under the water, then slowly dribbles a stream of it down his knee. “So, what’s on for lunch with Jimmy?”

“We never got to Ender. Stuff with Ziva took precedence, but he still wants to know what’s up. And then there’s the thing with Ziva and Tony and how Gibbs works into that. And just haven’t had the chance to really talk to him since last weekend.”

“Good. Glad you’re getting time with him.”

“Even though it means we’re not spending the day in bed.”

“I really should check in on Ziva. If that wasn’t true…”

Tim nods. “If that wasn’t true, I’d cancel on him. He’d understand.”

“Yeah, he would. But if that wasn’t true, you’d have talked it out yesterday, and all the rest of the stuff that has to get done today would have been done, and we would have had the chance to go to bed together at a sane hour last night.”

“Yeah.”

She lifts his hand, kissing his palm. “I’m liking today, though.”

“Yeah. I am too.”

Abby sat up, away from him, and twisted around so she could face him, wrapping her legs around his hips. “You’re going to talk to Jimmy about Ender?”

“Yeah. Still got to tell Ziva and Tony, too.”

“Draga?”

“Probably not.”

“And Tony and Ziva can wait until they get themselves straightened out?”

“Yeah. Not giving them any distractions they don’t need. I mean, I can easily see both of them grabbing onto that and ignoring what’s going on with them.”

“Because that’s not a common pattern for us at all. Finding something else to think about to get away from our problems.” She scoots closer, wrapping her arms around him as well as her legs. “So, it’s been two days, you’ve talked and fought and fucked… How are you doing with Ender?”

He blows out a long breath, and drops his forehead to hers, his arms circling her back.

“I’m still here. And I think I’m okay. I mean, you know I’ve got legendary not-dealing-with-it skills, but I think I’m okay.”

“Still angry?”

He half shrugs. “I’m always going to be angry at that bastard. And if Kort knows what’s good for him, he’ll stay the fuck away from me for the rest of his life, because I will hit him so hard I will break my fist on him, and enjoy every second of the pain because it’ll hurt him even worse.”

“Speaking of maybe seeing a counselor…”
“Cranston’s going to be busy soon,” Tim says, too quickly.

Abby knows a bad excuse when she hears one. “Yeah, because she’s the only counselor on Earth.”

“I know. I get it.” ‘Cause Tim also knows a bad excuse when he makes one. “But, I’ll tell you, and I’ll talk to Jimmy, and eventually tell Tony and Ziva, and then I want to bury it. Just let the fucker go.”

“Can you?” The look on her face is concerned. She sleeps with him, knows how he gets nightmares, knows how the things that he pushes out of his waking mind come back to visit sometimes.

“Yeah. I really think I can. Not losing any more sleep over that son of a bitch.”

“Okay.”

They both know that means she’s letting it drop for now, but reserving the right to bring it back up again if it seems to be haunting him. He kisses her gently, nodding, accepting those terms.

Her finger trace over his goatee. “So, shaving it off?”

He nods.

“Want me to do it?”

That gets a smile out of him. He’d certainly enjoyed it the last time she shaved him. “Yeah, let me get it trimmed first. Are the trimmers still in the drug cabinet?”

“I haven’t moved them. Have you?”

“Don’t think so.” He gets up, water dripping off him, and takes the two steps to the medicine cabinet. “Yep, still here.” A minute’s worth of buzzing resulted in a much, much shorter goatee. (And a lot of dark brown stubble in the sink.)

He grabs a new blade for his razor and heads back to the tub.

Abby smiles at him as he sits in front of her. “Hey, you’ve got lips again!”

“Ha ha ha.”

She scoots closer, taking the blade from him and fitting it into his razor, while he reaches behind him to grab his shaving cream from the little shelf it lived on.

Abby puts the razor on the side of the tub and takes the cream from him, rubbing it between her palms to make it foam, then gently stroking it onto his face.

“Hold still.”

He blinks in response holding still very clear in his expression.

That also gets a smile out of her as she rinses off her hands and began to carefully run the blade over his face.

“I missed how this smells.”

He squeezes her foot.

“Okay, I’ll stop talking until you can talk back.”
One more squeeze.

The slightly raspy sound of the blade pulling over his face, the crisp, slightly citrus scent of his shaving cream, and the feel of her fingers as she tilts his head one way and then the next, making sure she gets all of it, the smooth slide of sharp steel across his skin, and right now, Tim’s feeling very home, very cherished, and just, all over, good.

She dunks the blade into the tub, swishing it through the water one last time, then touches his lips.

“There’s the face I fell in love with.”
"Family is exhausting," Tim says as he rolls the stroller next to the table and sits down across from Jimmy.

Jimmy smiles and tickles Kelly's feet. She looks awfully startled, in that at any given time she's not really aware of having feet, so having someone mess with them is something of a shock.

"I think she's going to be ticklish." Jimmy looks up from Kelly and really sees Tim. "You got your face back! Moving back into work mode?"

Tim shrugs, not feeling any need to explain why his goatee is gone. "I'm ticklish. Abby is. Wouldn't be a surprise if Kelly is."

"I didn't know that about you. So, which branch of the family is keeping you from your beauty sleep? Baby or Grandpa."

"Last night, Grandpa. She's actually sleeping through the four AM feed now."

"Congratulations." And once again Jimmy engages Kelly, picking her up, cradling her in his arms, leaning in close, and saying, "Good girl, letting mom and dad sleep. You keep this up, you're gonna end up with a little brother or sister."

"Maybe."

Jimmy's eyes shoot up from Kelly and back to Tim. "Maybe? Already?"

"Probably not. She's nursing. Only happened once. But, we'll find out for sure next week."

Jimmy laughs. "So, on purpose, or did you guys just forget?"

Tim's shuffling through the baby bag, searching for Kelly's bottle. "On purpose but not planned."

"What does that even mean?" Jimmy asks, looking curious.

Tim looks up at him. "Come on, we've talked about this. You almost get killed, and really there's only one thing your body wants to do to convince you and her you're still alive."

"Ah. Right."

"So, plan was condoms until Kelly's three months old, try not to have two kids in one year, but got home, almost died, and we were following the plan, but… It just felt wrong."

"If you're doing it to convince yourself you haven't died, it should make a baby, or at least try?"

"Yeah something like that."

Jimmy nods as Tim finds the bottle. "I get that."

Tim pulls it out, and shakes it up, then hands it to Jimmy, because it's easier to hand the bottle over than the baby.

"I'm on feeding duty?"
"You picked her up."

"Lucky for you, Kelly, I know what I'm doing." And he does, one arm holding Kelly, the other holding the bottle. "But it has been a while, so I appreciate you helping me get back into practice." Kelly latches on and sucks greedily, looking a little confused about this person who's holding her and talking in the perky voice. But he's got food, and that makes him her favorite person. Once she's sucking away, Jimmy looks over at Tim again. "You know, we're required by law to tease the ever living hell out of you if you end up with two kids in one year."

Tim rolls his eyes and nods.

"End up with three in two years and we drag you off to the urologist for the vasectomy whether you want it or not."

"Oh, come on!"

Jimmy shakes his head a little. He's joking, but he's serious, too. The kind of tone that says he doesn't think it's going to be an issue, but making sure Tim knows that it would be an issue if it happened. "That's just not cool. It's not good for her, at all. Really not good for her." Comments about Abby's age and why three kids in two years might not be completely out of the question are left unspoken, but Tim gets them anyway. "Once, okay. Twice, that's a pattern, and it ends there, because it's really not good for her."

"I know that. I'm not a moron."

"Just making sure you know the lines."

"I end up with three kids in two years, and I'll take myself in."

"Good." Jimmy looks back down at Kelly. "Want some time to enjoy you all on your own!"

"Is this her?" Dana, their usual waitress at Carlo's, asks as she comes over, setting a cup of decaf coffee in front of Tim without even being asked. Sometimes it's good to eat at one of the same four places all the time.

"This is her," Tim says.

"Oh my God! She's adorable." Dana leans down to pet Kelly's cheek. She flashes that irked look. Dana laughs at that. "She's what... six weeks old now?"

"Exactly six weeks old tomorrow."

"Where's Abby?"

"Having a girl's lunch with Ziva right now. So I'm on baby duty."

"Uh, excuse me," Jimmy says. "You're loafing. I'm on baby duty."

Dana smiles at that. "And you look like you know what you're doing."

"Well, I should. Not like I've never done this before."

Dana nods. "So, you two getting your regular lunches?"

"Yes." Jimmy replies.
Tim shakes his head. "Feeling pretty hungry today. I'd like a bowl of tomato soup to go with the grilled chicken salad."

"No problem. Should have it up in a few minutes."

"Thanks, Dana."

"Soup in July?"

"I'm hungry."

Jimmy stares at him, at the shaved goatee, and just nods, laughing a little, looking really smug. Tim grins. Then Jimmy looks back down to Kelly. "She's so tiny. It sounds so dumb, but you forget. This morning Molly was tiny."

"She is."

"She's a toddler. Kelly's what, eight pounds?"

"Thereabouts. She's got a check-up tomorrow, so we'll find out for sure."

Jimmy touches Kelly's face, fingers tracing over her cheek. "You forget how blue their eyes are, too."

"End of December."

"Yep."

"When's the twenty week scan?"

"Earliest they'll do it is eighteen weeks, so we've got an appointment for the 11th."

"You want us to come?"

"Abby maybe. You don't need to take time off for it."

"I don't need to, but if you want support, we'll both be there."

Jimmy looks up at him from Kelly. "It's going to be fine. I know that. The nuchal fold came back normal, the genetic counseling said everything was good, but I'm still really nervous." He nods towards Dana, who's waiting on another table. "We still haven't told anyone who doesn't see Breena in person. Haven't told my mom or brother, yet."

"It's normal."

"Yeah. Great. Still hate feeling afraid like this."

Tim nods, smiling sadly, understanding.

"Anyway…" Jimmy says, changing the subject, because until his newest child is alive and healthy and in his arms, this fear just isn't going away, so something else to focus on will help. "Tell me the whole story with Ender."

So Tim did, happy to get Jimmy thinking of something else. By the time he was done, Kelly had finished her bottle and was sleeping in her stroller, and he and Jimmy were both on post-lunch drinks.
Tim wraps up by saying, "I'm tempted to hack Hanson," he sees Jimmy doesn't remember which one of the names that was, "The head of the CIA." Jimmy nods. "See what he's got on Ender, what he was actually doing. But that's probably just rubbing salt into the wound. It won't make him any less dead."

"Might let you know what happened to James."

"Yeah. Might. Did he kill James? Was he so committed to the role he kept working with a guy who killed his brother? Did he even know? No, he had to. If he didn't kill James himself, he had to have a plan to get him off the ship. If he didn't have that plan, Simmers and Blake would have known something was wrong when the ship didn't blow."

"Think he was cold enough to leave the body there so he'd have a plausible excuse for how the detonator got found?"

Tim blows out a frustrated breath. "That's absolute zero level cold."

Jimmy just stares at Tim.

Tim shrugs. "I don't know. For all I know, Ender never mentioned them being brothers and just played it as he found a guy who really looked like him. Running the faces through the recognition software and 'planning from there.'"

"Maybe."

"Yeah. Anyway… it looks like Vance wasn't going to tell me. But now I know. And I do need to tell Tony. And I'm worried about telling Ziva. I don't want to do it now, because they've got enough on their plates right now."

"Yeah. What was so different about this time? My sense was as soon as anything dangerous happened, you all ran right into it. That the Venn diagram between self-preservation and your team was two circles on opposite sides of the page." Jimmy says, circling each of his forefingers. "Is it just because they're married now?"

"Spent most of last night talking with Gibbs about this. But, short answer, no. It's not just because they're married. Day after they started dating, Tony was telling me that if it's ever him or her, the right answer is her, and he didn't need to because the right answer has always been her. Before her, the right answer was Kate. And maybe that's stupid and sexist, but… especially after we lost Kate…"

Jimmy nods at him. He gets that.

"I mean we all know Ziva can take care of herself. So we don't… well, we didn't used to… get stupid about it. But no matter what, she was the one who was going to come home. I mean, hell, we went to Somalia to get her back. We didn't even know she was still alive. Actually Somalia should have been a good hint on how insane those two are on this."

"Those two,' if memory serves, you went, too, Tim."

"Yeah. A quarter of my family just died. I'm not letting two thirds of what's left run off on a suicide mission without at least someone who actually wants to come home on the team. I didn't go for Ziva. I hoped she was alive, but I didn't feel it in my gut. I went for Tony and Jethro. If she was dead, I wanted to make sure they actually came home. Before we left, Abby said that to me. 'No matter what you find out there, you make sure they come home.'"
"Isn't she supposed to say that to Gibbs?"

"I would have thought so. Especially then. But she said it to me."

"Because that time it wasn't about making sure you fought right, it was about letting the white whale go before it killed you."

"I guess."

"So, they're both kind of insane on this, but you guys get almost killed every year or two and until this time, Tony and Gibbs kept it under control, what was different?"

"Apparently, he and Tony, and me, you, too probably, are allowed to go on suicide missions if there's any shot at all of getting the girls out. Hell, even if there isn't any shot of getting them out. Save them or die trying is perfectly okay."

Jimmy nods along with that. "Sounds right."

"Yeah. Here's the change. Actually, no, it's not a change. They've probably always felt that way. Here's what came into play on this one: they aren't allowed to save us or die trying."

"Oh."

"Yeah. We're allowed to be the big damn heroes, but they aren't."

"Huh." Jimmy looks perplexed. "Like, I get that if we're talking about Abby or Breena, but Ziva? She's better at this stuff than Gibbs and Tony, right?"

"I think so. But, apparently this was the first time Ziva had a good shot of getting free, and ran into the danger, and, on top of that, apparently both of them acted like freaking twits, at least, if what Gibbs was saying was true, which didn't do much to improve anyone's confidence in the whole situation. But, from what Gibbs was saying, there was nothing she could do by running in, but die with them, and that's not okay.."

"Huh. So, she runs in, freaks them both out, and now everything is upside down?"

"Looks like it. And then apparently he and Tony decided to have some sort of heart to heart about it..."

"Because getting marriage advice from the guy who's been divorced three times is such a great idea."

"Marriage advice from the guy who's been divorced three times because he's never gotten over losing his first wife, and is still walking wounded on that front... I don't even think it was marriage advice so much as how to deal with fear, and fear of losing your spouse is the one area you do not want Gibbs' help. He suggested to Tony that she not be on the team anymore. Tony latched onto it, added his own particular version of screwed up to it, and now Ziva's at your place."

"Anyway, that was my half of it. Talking with him until late last night. How about your half, how's Ziva?"

Jimmy looks slightly disturbed. "It's really nerve wracking to be in a home with Ziva when she's pissed. She goes really, really quiet, so you never hear her move, she just appears out of nowhere."

"Any less pissed, now?"

Jimmy shrugged. "She appeared to be pleased at the idea that Tony might have been talking to someone, but he doesn't get any sympathy for having a hard past. That's not really right. There's sympathy, but I can't ask her to overlook him being stupid because he's had a hard past. I can't say to her, 'Cut him some slack, his mom died,' because hers did, too. And 'He's flipping out because Kate died' doesn't mean much when she had to kill Ari two days later."

"Gibbs killed Ari."

Jimmy shakes his head. "No. He didn't. She did. Gibbs set it up as a trap, him as the bait, and trusted Ziva to do the job."

"Oh, God."

"Yeah."

Tim shakes his head a little, sighing. "I actually said to him last night that I didn't know how he could let himself love Ziva so much, so quickly, given how dangerous her life is."

"Guess we were talking in parallel. I suggested that maybe she and Tony might benefit from some marriage counseling."

Tim's nodding along with that. "Got Gibbs to agree to see someone."

"How much alcohol did you pump into him to do that?"

"Abby asked me the same thing."

Jimmy looks at him expectantly.

"It's still my team, and I told him he wasn't going back until he'd seen someone. Twice. And I'd check."

"I'm glad I don't work for you."

That gets a smirk out of Tim. "How'd it go when you suggested it to Ziva? Lead balloon?"

"Not that bad, but she wasn't enthusiastic."

"What does not enthusiastic mean?"

"She stared at me like I was speaking Swahili, laughed, realized I wasn't joking, and then said she'd think about it."

"Think they'll do it?" Tim asks.

"I think they'll do everything in their power to avoid it."

"That's kind of a pattern with this group."

"Yeah, I've noticed," Jimmy says dryly. And both of them know they both also have stuff that might be better off talked with someone about, and both of them aren't doing it, either.

"You didn't go talk to someone after Jon died, right?" Tim asks. He didn't think Jimmy had, but he also hadn't known about the sleeping pills until Jimmy told him.

"Breena did. I probably should have. But she was seeing our pastor, and that's fine and makes sense, and she found it a comfort, but... I wasn't in the mood to buy what she was selling."
Tim nods at that. "Talked to Gibbs about that. He says it helps. Not right away. Nothing helps right away, but eventually you hurt less and feel less angry and the idea that they're out there, waiting for us, helps."

Jimmy shrugs. Not brushing it off, but not willing to engage it for himself. "So, Gibbs believes?"

Tim nods, not sure if he wants to say how deep Gibbs goes on that one. "I'm sure he'd talk to you about it if you ask."

"That sounds like there's a story in there."

"There is, but it's his story, not mine. Mostly. I guess some of it's mine, but not most of it."

"That's ominous sounding."

"Good choice of words there. It's... Just ask him about it sometime."

"God, that's grim."

"Yeah, well... You ever have a sex dream about another guy?" It was out of his mouth before he'd made any decision beyond maybe they didn't need to be thinking quite so much about pain and death right now.

Jimmy's staring at him like he just turned green, a thoroughly perplexed look on his face. "I think you need to leave the clowning around stuff to Tony. He's way better at it."

Tim turns his hands up in a, it's what came out, gesture. "It's not depressing."

"Okay, yeah. Just... death, pain, missing the ones we love, sex dreams with men. That's not exactly a natural progression, Tim. Why would your brain go there?"

"Got talking about it with Abby this morning. She thinks it's weird that I haven't. I thought it was pretty normal for a straight guy to not be dreaming about other guys. But I only know me. You're here. You're a straight guy. Gibbs'd just stare at me like I'm insane if I ask him. Tony'd get insulted by the question, and then lie to me. Ducky'd probably answer it, and then give me an hour long dissertation on the psychology of sexuality and Penny would kick in another hour of feminist theory of gender/preference fluidity."

"I guess."

"So..."

"You haven't?" Jimmy's sounding a bit guarded as he says that.

"No." Tim's slowly shaking his head.

"Come on, all of us have had that wake up in a cold sweat, heart pounding, wanting to wash your brain out with bleach moment."

"Well, yeah. But none of mine have involved another man."

That gets an intrigued look out of Jimmy. "If it's not another guy, what are you dreaming of that makes you want to wash your brain out with bleach."

"Just..." Tim shakes his head. "No... let's not go there."
"Okay." Jimmy's staring warily at Tim.

"So, you have?"

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little, looking slightly embarrassed. "Well, until five minutes ago, I thought we all had, at least once."

"Huh…"

"So, you really haven't?"

Tim takes another sip of his coffee. "I don't remember a lot of my dreams, but, I don't think so."

"Not buying it. You just don't remember."

Tim shrugs.

"Why were you and Abby talking about that?"

"Just laying around while she fed Kelly, talking. Got talking about sex dreams. She wanted to know if—" He realizes that he doesn't want Jimmy to have quite that level of detail for what they were talking about, so he quickly edits what he was about to say, "I ever dreamed about guys. I said no. That not dreaming about guys was part of the whole being a straight guy thing, and she seemed pretty doubtful about that. So, she'll be happy to know that she's closer to right than I am."

"I think it's the waking up and feeling really squirmy about it after that's the defining characteristic of being straight."

"Uh huh. So, does it happen a lot?"

"NO!" Jimmy's horrified by that. "Been more than twenty years since the last time."

"Hey, just asking." Yeah, well, that wasn't horribly grim, but this was probably way too damn far into overkill territory. But… but he's curious, and Jimmy isn't going to flip out about it, and there isn't another guy he can talk to about stuff like this, so… "Why squirmy after?"

"Uh?" Jimmy's staring at him like that should be a really self-evident thing.

"Just, my own brain bleach dreams usually involve someone or thing I really don't like."

"Men are pretty high on my list of someones I don't like," Jimmy says dryly.

"Someone I actively dislike. Not just some random person."

Jimmy nods at that, then asks, "Thing?"

"Like I said, we're not going there."

"How could a 'thing' make you feel all squirmy in a bad way?"

"Thing as a verb, not noun."

"Oh." Jimmy's getting the sense that he's talking uncomfortable dreams, and Tim might be talking nightmares.

"Not saying I'm interested in guys 'cause I'm not but… don't think it'd make me feel gross."
Jimmy shrugs. "It's been a long time. Might feel different about it now."

"Good point. As a teen that would have been a brain bleach dream."

"That's all I'm saying. Spent the three days after more or less wrapped around my girlfriend, because it did kind of freak me out. Now, married, kid at home, another on the way, probably not a big deal. So, your brain bleach dreams involve a someone?"

"Sounds like yours did, too."

"Not a real person. Well, yeah, real person, not like a comic character, but no one I actually knew. Yours?"

"No."

"Come on, who am I going to tell?"

"Everyone."

"So it's someone we know? A woman someone we know? Shepard?"

"Just. No. We do not need to go there."

"Please?" Jimmy's looking awfully curious, and Tim's thinking maybe this wasn't his best hop off of an uncomfortable subject gambit, ever.

"What are we? Sixteen-year-old girls?"

"Says the guy who brought this up in the first place. Was it a sixteen-year-old girl?"

"NO! Stop it."

"Fine…" Jimmy lets it trail off for a second while he drinks more of his Diet Sprite. "Ziva?"

Tim glared at Jimmy. Jimmy's eyes lit up. "Oh, you have, haven't you?"

"Yes, and you have, too, and, no, that's not the brain bleach dream and if you ever say anything about that I am writing out a detailed list of every single piece of porn on your computer and giving it to Breena, Ziva, and Abby."

"Whoa. Calm on down."

"And don't do that. Breena's stuff is on there, too, and trust me, you don't know which is mine and which is hers."

The look on Tim's face says, really, you're going to try that on me? "Ultra X Fetish Shoe House is Breena's?" he asks, completely deadpan.

Jimmy's having a very hard time not smiling. "It could be."

"No."

"Fine. If it's not Ziva…"

"You're not letting up until I talk, are you?"

"Wasn't planning on it."
"Threat still holds, and I'll tell Breena why I'm doing it, and she won't get pissed."

"Terms accepted."

"Diane."

"Gibbs' Diane?"

"Yeah. Gibbs' Diane. Night after the first time we met her. Woke up in a cold sweat wishing I could rip my eyes out."

Jimmy just laughs.

"And then, a year later, she wants me to 'hug' her."

"Oh God. You poor guy."

"Yeah." Tim shuddered. "That's kind of how the dream started, too."

"You know," Jimmy says, thinking about, "She is kind of hot."

"That wasn't the problem," Tim said seriously, because it wasn't. Diane being hot is why (probably) that dream started. "That's never the problem. She's mean and a bully and she was both of those things in the dream, too."

And suddenly Jimmy's got a much better idea of what 'thing' means.

"Sorry."

"Yeah. But Spawn of Satan reputation aside, she's actually not that bad once she opens up some. She's one of those really bright, really accomplished people who's also really insecure and covers it by attacking everyone."

"So, she's mean and a bully."

"Yeah. I guess that is the traditional mold. According to her, she was softer before Gibbs."

"You believe it?"

"I didn't then. Now... Yeah, I know him well enough I can see how it probably went. I'm sure he liked the challenge of her, because softer probably didn't mean soft. Liked that she'd stand up to him. Loved the body, because like you said, she's hot. And Tony dug up this shot of her from about the time they would have been married, and smoking hot. Ducky said he was a lot like Tony back then, so he was probably all quiet charm and those big blue eyes. But she wasn't Shannon, and he didn't love her, and she didn't know what was going on or why he's pulling back. And she's not soft, and she doesn't put up with crap, so she's going behind his back, because he won't talk to her, rummaging through his stuff, finds the pictures, he's still got his old photo albums, and she finds out he had this whole life he never mentioned. Next thing we know, she's getting friendly with Fornel."

"And we're back to why you never ask Gibbs for marriage advice."

"Or if you do, you listen to what he says, think about it, and do the opposite. So, that's mine. Who was yours?"

"Hmmm?"
"Who freaked you out so bad you spent three days glued to your girlfriend?"

Jimmy rolls his eyes. "It's really silly."

Tim just looks at him.

"Fine. The apartment we lived in was small, and Clark and I shared a room. I'd do my homework at the kitchen table, because it'd be quieter, sort of, out there, and my mom is hovering around, getting dinner ready. In our room, he'd mess with me and stuff, but out there, he wouldn't because she's right nearby. Anyway, I'd be working, and she'd be watching this show, a lot, because she was like a major Beau Bridges fan and he was the star, and I didn't pay much attention, because I'd be working. But there was this smoking hot actress on it, Talisa Soto, oh my god, just, so hot."

"I don't know who she is."

"Kind of looked like Selma Hyack."

"Oohhh…"

"Yeah. Gorgeous. Most perfect caramel colored skin and long black hair and..." Jimmy's expression gets across that it wasn't just her skin and hair he was impressed with. Tim nod, he knows what Jimmy's not saying. "So, when she was on screen, I paid less attention to my homework and a lot more to her."

"How old were you?"

"I don't know. Fifteen, sixteen, something like that."

"Okay."

"Anyway. I'm studying my history, reading through this pathetically boring text on the unification of Germany, and my mom's got the show on, and I fall asleep studying, and I start dreaming about her, which was great, but there was also this twerp on the show, a guy about my age, and suddenly he was in the dream, which was kind of weird, but not terrible, and then she wasn't in the dream anymore, that wasn't good at all, and I wake up sticky and horrified with my mom asking me what I was moaning about."

"Oh lord."

"Yeah, talk about conversations you don't ever want to have with your mom while sitting at the kitchen table, let alone conversations you don't want to end with, 'Well, come on, clear up, we're having dinner in three minutes.'"

"No." Tim's somewhere between horrified on Jimmy's behalf and about to burst out laughing.

"Yeah. She's just standing there, staring at me, waiting for me to get up."

Tim's vibrating and biting his lip he's trying so hard not to laugh. Then Jimmy rolls his eyes and smiles, giving Tim permission to lose it, and he dissolves into a laughing fit.

After a minute he says, "Sorry, I know I shouldn't laugh at that. At least you could use the books for cover."

"Which I needed. All I want to do is get a shower and die of embarrassment, and she's like, 'Come on, Jimmy, we're having pot roast.'"
"What'd you do?"

"Lurched up, ran to the bathroom, made myself puke, because once again, little apartment, and you could hear everything in there, so if I didn't sound sick, she'd be knocking on the door, wanting to know what was up, then got the shower, and spent the rest of the night in bed, playing sick."

Tim shook his head. "I have to say, I'm deeply glad to have never had that experience."

"Yeah. Could have gone without it, too."

Kelly chirped a bit.

"I know that sound. That's the it's halfway through my nap time, you need to get moving if you want me to be home to Abby by my next feed call," Tim says.

"Then I won't keep you."

"Last question, is Ziva going home anytime soon?"

"She didn't have a plan when I last talked to her."

"Okay. I'm going to get Kelly home, and then I need to track down Tony, see how he's doing."

"Let me know how it goes."

"Will do."
Feel like company? Tim texts to Tony as Abby takes Kelly from him. His original first opening line, Are you alone, went by the wayside when he heard Ziva’s voice coming from his office.

“She’s talking to Gibbs?”

They hear her voice get very loud.

Abby cringes a bit. “Yelling might be a better description.”

“Is he saying anything back to her?”

Abby shakes her head. “Not that I can hear.”

“How long?”

“Over an hour now.”

“Phew,” Tim says as shakes his head lightly.

His phone buzzed. Not really.

Too damn bad. Not leaving you alone all day.

Not alone.

Cranston still over?

No. Talking to Ziva.

Tim sat next to Abby, showing her the screen. Abby shook her head. Tim holds up his hands. “What do I do with that?”

“Call him on his BS and make him man the hell up and deal with this.”

Tim shrugs at that. “He might just really need the alone time.” Tim knows that sometimes he just needs to be on his own, he figures that Tony probably does, too.

“Then don’t spend too long with him. But go, talk to him, or sit next to him if that’s what he needs. But this isn’t good.”

She’s in my office yelling at Gibbs. You at home?

Yes.

I’ll be over in twenty minutes.

“You gonna gloat?” Tony asks as he closes the door behind Tim.
“Why the hell would I do that?” Tim replies, sitting on their sofa.

“’Cause you and Jimmy are just so good at this love crap, and in three months, I’ve taken her from my bride to she’s looking up divorce lawyers.”

“Come on, sit down. No one’s gloating. How’d talking with Cranston go?”

Tony just glares at him. “Since part of the problem was Kate getting killed, she referred me to someone else.”

Tim winced, he should have seen that was likely to be a problem. But… hell, he didn’t have a plan B for that one. Not like he’s got Wolf’s number, let alone the kind of relationship where Wolf might make a house call. “Did you two talk at all?”

“Some. Until I got to Kate.”

“Did you start talking about Kate to shut her out?”

Tony’s listlessly picking at the splinters that came up from his dining table when he wrenched Ziva’s knife out of it. “The second guy asked that, too.”

“Did you?”

Tony glares at him again. And sure, maybe that’s a game he might play, but he doesn’t think he would, especially not to Cranston, because that’s just… cruel. But he’s not playing around with this, and the question annoys him. “I’m talking about her because I watched her head explode, and right now, for some reason, maybe because I just watched Ziva almost die, that’s really on my mind.”

“Okay.”

They sit quietly.

“So, she’s at your place?” Tony asks.

“Yeah, moving into hour two of yelling at Gibbs when I left. Have you talked to her at all?”

“No.”

“Are you going to?” Tim means soon, not ever. Obviously they’ll talk again, eventually.

Tony’s leaning elbows on his knees, hands laced together, staring at them. “Don’t even know where to start.”

“I’m sorry? That’s usually good.”

“I’m not.” Tim looks alarmed at that, and Tony looks up, catches it. “I shouldn’t have lied about it, but… I’m not sorry about moving her.”

Tim’s not sure how to even begin responding to that. His brain flails around for a few seconds looking for any angle on this, finally he came up with: “You want her safe?”

“Of course.”

“She’s safer with us. Draga’s green. He’s brand new. Anyone else, even if they had been in for a while, wouldn’t know her moves, wouldn’t know how she works as well as we do. She’d be in more danger with a new team.”

The look on Tony’s face says he’s not buying what Tim’s selling, and that Tim’s missing the point. “She can take care of herself.”

“Okay, good, you haven’t gone totally insane. She can take care of herself, but even Ziva can’t see in 360 degrees and keep watch on everyone’s back and protect her own. She needs a team that can back her up. She needs us.”

Now that look’s all you’re missing the point. “No she doesn’t. She was trained for solo missions. She can see in 360, or close enough. I’m not worried about someone getting the drop on her. I’m not worried about her team failing her. No one on Earth is better equipped to handle that than she is. I’m worried about her going on the suicide mission. I’m worried about her running into the bomb or the firefight when it’s hopeless so she can go with us. And a new team, she won’t love anyone on that team enough to suicide for them.”

“Oh.” That’s… Tim shakes his head, and sits back against the back of the sofa. Stop assuming. He keeps underestimating Tony on things like this, expecting shallow, veneer style issues, but they all go deep, and this one does, too.

“Yeah.” Tony’s giving him a knowing look.

They sit there. Tim’s collecting his thoughts. Tony’s picking at the table again.

“Would you have run into a blast for her?”

“Yeah.” He doesn’t look up from the splinters to Tim. “And I know where you’re going with this, and it doesn’t matter.”

“Do you?” Tim raises his eyebrows, and Tony looks over at him, more you’re underestimating me in his look.

“You’re going to tell me she’s a grown up and she can make her own decisions and it’s her life, and if I’m dead anyway, I don’t get a say in the matter, and that if I really respected her and really loved her I’d be just as cool with her making that decision as I am about making it myself.”

Tim nods a bit. “First of all, all of that is true, and that’s where I would have gone with it if I hadn’t talked to Ziva on Friday, or if I hadn’t gotten a report back from Jimmy about how she’s doing, today. But that’s not it. She’s just as scared for you as you are for her, so how about you both promise to live, no matter what. Add it to your Ketubah, engrave it on the rings, tattoo it on your body, whatever it takes, but make the promise and make it stand. When I was talking to her on Sunday it sounded like she meant it, that you’d work on this, together. But apparently you didn’t mean it.”

There a very sad, very small smile on Tony’s face. “I meant it for her.”

“It doesn’t work that way. At least, I don’t think it does. And if you think I’m good at this, here’s what I’ve got: you can’t expect her to do anything for you that you won’t do for her.”

Tony just kind of looks at him, and Tim’s not sure if that’s him being emotionally worn to a nub or just not believing Tim or not caring.
“Hey, you’re the one saying Jimmy and I are good at this being married thing. So, that’s it. That’s my great advice on this. You want her to not run into the blast, you can’t do it either. You want her to come home every damn night, you’ve got to do it, too. You want her to treat herself like the most important thing in the universe, you want to make sure she safeguards that which makes you happier than anything else, you’ve got to do it for her, too.”

Tony doesn’t say anything to that, but he looks like he’s thinking about it. Tim lets him sit there and just think for a few minutes before saying, “If it makes you feel any better, we all do stupid stuff when we get scared. Even guys who are ‘good’ at this.”

“Uh huh. I lied to her and fucked with her job without talking to her about it.”

“I’m not saying you didn’t manage to stick the landing and win the perfect 10.0 Olympic Gold in stupid stuff, but we all do it. Before we knew about the previa, we’re talking about how Abby wanted to labor and deliver and she said at home. And I handled that in a mature and sensitive way, like any good husband would, by literally yelling at her and practically shitting myself with fear. Shockingly enough, she was not impressed by that response.”

Tony snorted at that.

“How much of the toothpaste thing did you get?”

“Some sort of Pod Person Tim showed up and said some really mean things to Abby after she flipped out about the wrong toothpaste. Were you really cursing at her?”

“Yes, I was. There’s on so long I can get yelled at before I snap, and she took me over that line. Anyway, she was having a really bad dream. That I was messing around and was leaving for someone else. She was scared and angry and picked a fight with the real-life version of me. And it was stupid as all get out, but she was scared and angry and people do stupid stuff when they’re scared and angry. And in her own stupid and angry she managed to get me to the point where I was so angry all I had left was stupid, and I said some God-awful hurtful things. Because people do stupid things when they’re scared and angry. We all do.

“But we’re still married. And so are you. Ziva was yelling at Gibbs, not asking him for advice on good divorce lawyers.”

“Might be better off if she was.”

Tim really doesn’t know what to do with that. He thinks for a minute and decides Tony might respond well to some hardness here, so he’ll try that out. “If you weren’t still recovering from a concussion I’d slap you upside the back of the head. No, you wouldn’t be, she wouldn’t be, none of the rest of will be better off if you two split up.”

Tony exhales, not quite a sigh. “It was easier to be her friend. I got to see her every day. Got to enjoy her, but I knew that if something happened to her, I’d still go on.”

“Because the whole Somalia thing was you and Gibbs being really healthy about moving on.”

“That was anger and revenge. And that was her leaving us, going off on a suicide mission to make someone else she loved happy. It’s a pattern for her, and… I know that about her and… This is so scared I feel like I’m going to just vanish under it.” He runs his fingers through his hair, looking away from Tim, like he can’t stand to have anyone see him, but he still wants to get the words out. “Like the world would stop turning if she’s not on it. It was easier to not let her in. It was easier to have a long string of fuck buddies and just be her friend.”
“It might have been, but that ship’s sailed. You can’t go back to where you were. And where you were might have been easier, but it wasn’t as good. Jimmy said this to Ziva, and I’m going to say it to you, marriage counseling is probably a good idea.”

Tony looks at him, tired, defeated, maybe annoyed, too. “You’re already making me go to counseling.”

“I know. And just like Gibbs, you don’t get to come back until you’ve talked to someone twice.”

“You’re not letting Gibbs back on, either?”

“He tells me he ‘suggested’ you take her off the team. No one’s going back to work until your heads are right again, and if that means Draga and I sit on our asses and work on cold cases, that’ll be what happens. And since Leon would rather cut off his own hand then get in the middle of your marriage, he’ll let me run this however I like as long as I need to to get our team back in order.”

“Lovely. Eventually he’ll want us working again.”

“Yes. But you’ve got time off owed you, a lot of it probably, and if you and Ziva need to take it all, take it. You can’t work like this. I can’t work like this. Just because Ziva trained for solo missions and is great at this stuff doesn’t mean I am. I need a team that works. If Kelly’s gonna grow up with memories of me, you’ve got to have it together enough to do a damn good job watching my back. My life, Abby’s happiness, my daughter’s future rests in your hands. I give that to you every day we go to work. I trust you with it. Usually. But I’m not giving it back until you and Ziva can work together again, and talking to someone together would probably help with that.”

Tony snorts at that, rolls his eyes.

“I’m not dying because of your existential crisis.”

“And it’s all about you?” Tony says dryly, pulling some of his emotional armor back into place.

“Damn skippy. You two want to fall apart after I’m in Cybercrime…” Tim shakes his head, he can’t keep this up. Hard’s not working for him, not for this. “It’d break my heart, Tony. You’re meant to be, and it’s hard and scary and… And I’m sorry this isn’t easy for you. I’m sorry you don’t have that little voice in your head that knows how to do this without pissing her off. But… She’s your life, so figure it out.”

“What would you do?”

“About which part?”

“If it was Abby on the line?”

Tim looks up a bit and shakes his head. “I honestly don’t know. Jimmy and I were talking about it. I was talking to Gibbs about it, too. I don’t know how you can take the fear. I… I know what I’ve done about it for her. Cybercrime isn’t about career advancement. Sure, it’s only for until you come back, but I’m a good Team Leader. I can do this on my own, but I don’t want to. I don’t want her worrying about the knock on the door or the late night call.”

Another snort from Tony, this time disdainful. “Easy for you. You’ve got fall back skills.”

“True.” Tim nods, acknowledging that. Abby gets scared; he does something else. Problem solved. Maybe not easy peasy, but easy enough. But Tony doesn’t have an easy out like that. “So does Ziva. But I don’t think you’ll have any luck convincing her to lay down her badge if you aren’t willing to
“And what the hell would I do if I did that? I can’t write novels, or hack computers, or translate nine languages, or build boats, or… I’ve done this all my life. I’m good at it. This is all I’ve wanted to be since I was twenty.”

“I don’t think you need to hang it up. I don’t think she does, either. But I’m pretty sure you can’t ask her to leave if you aren’t willing to do it yourself.”

“Every year we get the close call. And I’m fine with it for me, but I don’t want to be Gibbs.”

“No one, especially not Gibbs, wants you to be Gibbs.”

Tony nods; he knows that. Gibbs told him that, then suggested that maybe Ziva’d be better off with her own team. “You ever wonder what you’d do if you lost them?”

The answer to that is yes, but Tim doesn’t want to get too into it, because he knows he doesn’t want to be Gibbs either, and his own potential coping with it strategy isn’t healthy. In fact, it’s the antithesis of healthy.

So he lies, and feels no qualms about it. “When we first got the news about the previa, and were googling the hell out of it, reading utter horror stories about women bleeding out while their babies died… I didn’t let myself go there. Just wouldn’t let myself think it.” Absolutely none of that was true. He did think about it, especially that night, after everyone went home, and he lay there in their bed clinging to Abby, but what he came up with: that he wouldn’t outlive them by more than the amount of time it would take him to get to his gun, is A: Not useful for getting Tony to a healthy place, B: Nothing he thinks anyone else needs to know, because that might make them decide he doesn’t need to be in the vicinity of firearms if something were to happen to Abby and Kelly, and C: Maybe, (probably) like Gibbs, he wouldn’t actually do it, but he wants the option, and if you tell people stuff like that, you lose the option of doing it. But given all the above, he has no reservations about lying to Tony and doing it well.

“So, instead of thinking about it, I went bonkers on ways to avoid the problem. If we needed to spend the next six weeks in the hospital to make sure it didn’t happen, that was fine. I was ready to camp out there. But that wasn’t enough, I could feel myself starting to think about it, and I needed to shut it down. Couldn’t deal with it, so I started picking fights with my dad in my head rather than think about it.” Also a lie, but as per Rule Seven: Always be specific when you lie, he’s not above adding good details to sell the story.

“And when that stopped working, I moved into ultra-hyper-overprotective mode, which is what you’re doing, by the way, and as part of ultra-hyper-overprotective mode, I carried her from the car into the house, put her on the sofa, and wouldn’t let her move.

“Speaking of stupid, scared behavior, that one didn’t win me any points, either. And it pretty much did take an intervention from the whole family to snap me out of it. Penny actually headslapped me and Jethro over it.”

“I didn’t know that.”

“Abby and I were being scared together. I’m panicking, she’s panicking and getting annoyed at me because I’m being stupid about it, I’m getting more scared because she’s getting more scared, we were feeding each other’s fears, because that’s just how we work. Fortunately Jimmy got worried when we didn’t call and let him know how the scans went, so he came in and saved the day. Told me I could freak the fuck out as much as I needed to, but not in front of her, and that if I ever needed to go hide at his place and melt down, his door was always open.

“Tony, my door is always open. His door is always open. Ducky’s is, too, but, just, not for this. He’s the guy you go to when you’re freaked out about… anything else, but not this. This is what Jimmy told me: It’s okay to be afraid. It’s okay to be sad. It’s okay for her to see you being afraid and sad. She needs to know this sort of thing effects you, too. It is not okay for you to panic. You’re the man, so it’s your job to not totally lose it, especially when you want to. The other thing he said was this, ‘Only one of us has to be sane at any given time.’ And we’ll provide cover for you until you get sane again. We’ll help you fake it until it’s real.

“Bootcamp is part of dealing with scared. If we need to do it twice a week, once for you and once for Ziva, we will. It helps. Your body wants to run or fight when it’s scared, so if you need it, come fight with us. Or run or yoga or, whatever, hell, we’ll play basketball if you like. Tell us what you need, and we’re there for it.”

Tony looks at Tim’s arms. He’d kept a light jacket on when he was at lunch, because people who expect Special Agent Tim McGee look at him a bit oddly when they notice the tattoos and the wrist cuff, and they start to get concerned when they see bruises. But at Tony’s he’s just in jeans and a t-shirt.

“She do that to you?” He points to the bruises on Tim’s arms.

“Some of them. Some are from Jimmy.”

“What are you fighting off?”

“Mmm?” Tim’s eyes open a bit wider.

“You’re not just volunteering to be a punching bag. What’s got you so scared? What had you all beat the hell up back before Kelly was born?”

“Not scared, not right now. Week after we got the previa news, that was scared.”

“Uh huh. Come on. No bullshit, none from me, none from you. She’s fighting hard enough to make those marks on you, that means you were fighting hard, too.”

“We were. She took on Jimmy and I together and we lost fifteen out of nineteen rounds.”

“You won four?”

“Yeah.”

Tony looks a bit surprised by that. “That’s not answering my question.”

Tim rubs his forehead. “When we started it was about anger. It was about giving Jimmy a place to fight it out. But it’s good for fear, too, and for him fear stuck around a lot longer than anger did. For me it’s mostly been anger. There’s been some fear, but mostly it’s… It’s a place to beat out all the pissed off.”

“What’s got you so pissed?”

“Long story.”

Tony stood up and went to the kitchen. A moment later he was back with two beers and sitting on the sofa next to Tim.
“I’m not going anywhere anytime soon.”

“You could be going to my house, collecting your wife, and talking to her about your problems instead of listening to mine.”

“You brushed me off about this last time, too.”

Tim remembers after he’d had the post-talking-to-his-mom meltdown. Tony had asked about it then, and he had brushed him off. And Tony agreed to respect that, and he has. “I did.”

“Why?”

“I’m brushing you off this time because you’re using my problems to avoid your own.”

“Yeah, well,” he pops the cap on his beer and hands Tim the church key. “I’m not ready to face my own right now. And Ziva’ll still be there in an hour or two when we’re done. So, what’s got you so pissed you’ve got to beat it out?”

Tim sighs, not sure if he should play this game or not. But, Tony’s asking. He’s here. And if he wants this sort of access to Tony’s life, he needs to grant it in return. That’s part of the whole don’t do it if you aren’t willing to have it come back to you thing.

“Lots of things, but most recently… This is mine, and I’m going to be the one who tells Ziva about it. You’re not. Can you do that?”

“Yeah.”

“Not kidding about this, because it’ll be tempting to tell her, get her focused on something else, too.”

“I won’t say anything.”

“Okay. Ender was still working for the CIA. He was deep cover, and I gave the order that killed him.”

“Shit.”

“Yeah. And I’m doing better now, but I needed to beat the anger out. That fucker made me kill him. And eventually I have to tell Ziva about it, too, because she pulled the trigger on my order. It was a clean kill, and I’d give the order again, even if I knew he was working for the CIA, I’d still give the order, but I’m pissed.”

“Yeah,” Tony says quietly and sighs. “That’d do it.”

“So, we were both fighting hot and angry. And eventually you hit and get hit often enough and, at least for me, since I know I made the right decision, that… It just helps. Jimmy says it helps with the fear. It’s better for anger, but it helps with fear, too. They’ve got the twenty-week ultrasound coming up…”

Tony nods, he gets that. Gets how doing it again has to be terrifying for Jimmy and Breena.

“So that’s today.” Tony gets up again, and comes back with a few ice packs.

Tim puts them on his arms. “Thanks.”

“What was before?”
Tim looks down at his beer bottle, finger circling the rim, and sighs. “Tony, would you just trust me that now’s not a good time for it?”

“Now’s not good for you, or now’s not good for me?”

“Both of us. And I don’t know when it’s going to be good for me. But I meant it, you’re still welcome to ask Gibbs or Jimmy or Abby. But… I’ve got to think about it to talk about it, and I still don’t want to do that.”

“Okay.”

Tim fished his cell out of his pocket and holds it out to Tony. “Come on, give her a call, and ask her to come home.”

He doesn’t take it. “She’s gonna yell at me.”

“Yep. And here’s something else Jimmy said to me, and I’m going to say to you, because it was excellent advice, ‘You are going to beg her to talk to you and when she does, you’re going to lay down at her feet and explain to her that she is your sun and the only thing that keeps you alive is getting to revolve around her.’”

Tony takes the phone, but he doesn’t dial. “Palmer said that to you?”

“After the toothpaste thing. And he’s right, and that basic idea, that: ‘You are my world, the most precious thing in my universe, and just the idea of anything happening to you kills me, so you can imagine how bad something actually happenings is,’ has gotten me a lot of slack on insane stupid fear stuff, too.”

“Hmp.” Tony hit Ziva’s contact on the phone, and Tim decided now was a very good time to wander off into the kitchen, shut the door behind him, and realize somewhat belatedly that he can’t read any of the books on his phone or call in to see what Abby’s up to if Tony’s talking on it.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: So, as you all know, I update this on the blog and on FF, and as such, every time I update on the blog I see the little date saying that Chapter One went up on Jan 22.

So, this was supposed to be my year anniversary chapter. Then I noticed that I actually posted Chapter One on FF on Jan 17th, 2013.

Ooops. (Mom, you forgot my birthday!)

Anyway, it's been a year since 'There haven't been a lot of watershed moments..."

I'd had a goal of posting every day of this year, and well, I didn't hit that. I did post more than two out of three days. I've written 822K words of the Shardverse, and posted over 682K of them. Effectively, I published the NaNoWriMo word count every single month of the last year, and then some. That feels pretty good.

We've got three major plot points left in Tim's life at this point (and a ton of minor ones), and we're only waiting for two more relationships before my little shards are all whole.

I've been thinking more about the McPalmer stuff, and instead of doing a one version here and one on FF, I'm going to post both versions in both places. In the not wildly distant future the story will start to split, and I'll begin posting Shards as well as Shards
To A Whole. Shards will be sans McPalmer. Shards To A Whole will continue the full story. (More info on that as we get to it.)

Anyway, it's been a year. Happy Anniversary.

Thanks to all of you who've taken the time to read this massive tome of McAbbyness.

Thanks even more for the comments. I love them. They completely make my day.

Keryl
"You sure? You've got a lot of stairs at your place…"

Gibbs just nods. They've just finished his checkup with the orthopedic specialist, and yes, he's healing up nicely, and has gotten the green light to start moving around again.

He's glad that Tim's making sure he knows he's still welcome at their house, but the Doc says he can start gimping around more, that he doesn't need to be on his ass all the time, so he wants to go home.

"Okay." Tim nods, putting his key in the ignition. "You've got no food at your place, so write up a grocery list. I'll drop you off, get the food, and then drop it off…" Left unspoken is: Let you spend an hour on your own, see if you're really up to it, and then offer to take you back to my home again.

"I'll be fine, Tim."

"Great. You hurt yourself on the stairs, and Abby'll kill both of us. You for being stupid, and me for letting you."

"I'll be careful."

Tim gives him a long look, and Gibbs can read the I didn't just meet you last week. I know exactly what careful means, and if you don't want to spend another two hours getting yelled at by another pissed off woman, you damn well better not go falling down the steps. "You better."

Gibbs rolls his eyes a bit. "I will." Really, I'll take it easy. Two hours with Ziva yesterday was more than long enough.

Tim nods. Okay, I believe you, this time.

An hour and a half later, Gibbs is home, alone, with a ton of food. He knows what was on the grocery list he sent Tim, and he knows what Tim got him, and… well… apparently he's giving Jethro a less than subtle hint that maybe eating something of a vegetable nature every now and again would be a good plan.

He's not entirely sure what this leafy green stuff is (kale, maybe?) but he does know it looks a hell of a lot like the spinach his mom would try to get him and his dad to eat.

Unsuccessfully.

He'd been expecting to get home and just revel in the quiet and alone. That's who he is. The guy who gets home from work, tosses his keys on the table by the door, and then hits the sofa or his basement for some quiet.

And he did that, for about five minutes. (Might have worked better if he'd headed to the basement, and yeah, he can do steps, but he's not steady enough on his feet to be standing without the crutch, but the only thing he's got on tap right now it making sure all the wood for Baby Palmer's crib is in order, which means planing, and he can't do that sitting down.)

For about five minutes, sitting on his own sofa, in his own house, his own, quiet, house felt really
He loves Tim and Abby, but the soundproofing in their house sucks. And he's glad they've got a healthy relationship and that they're enjoying each other that much, but he didn't feel the need to be that well acquainted with what them having a good time sounds like. And once he got off the heavy duty painkillers, Kelly crying woke him up, too, and he'd usually get pretty well back to sleep, and then the sound of footsteps taking Kelly back to her crib post-nursing would wake him up again.

So, Tim and Abby's place isn't precisely quiet, or restful.

Add the hours of Ziva just yelling at him last night on top of that…

So, yeah, quiet: beautiful, blessed quiet.

And sure, it's not like he didn't spend years sleeping on his sofa. It's not like the futon in Tim's office is bad or anything, but he's really looking forward to stretching out on his own bed. To sleep. All the way through the night.

That'll be excellent.

So, why doesn't this feel right anymore?

"You free?" he asks Fornell.

"Still wrapping up the case your boy dropped on us. Seventeen down, thirty-six to go. Haven't been home for more than an hour since Friday. Why?"

"Nothing. Just wondering if you wanted dinner."

"I do, but it's not happening today. Or tomorrow. Or the day after. Ender had all the goods on guys all over the world. We're wrapping them up as fast as we can. The word's out, they know they've been compromised, and they are running as fast as they can."

"I'll let you get back to it."

"Thanks. Sunday maybe? Have dinner with Wendy and I?"

"Sure."

Piles of food. Lots of good stuff. Gibbs decides to go see Elaine and let her feed him.

Cooking for just himself feels almost beside the point. He intentionally doesn't think about how he cooked for himself for years, decades, and sure, he ate out a lot, but that had as much to do with the job as not necessarily wanting to cook. He does not think about how much more he enjoys cooking, even if it is just whipping up a pan of eggs, if someone besides him is going to eat them.

Then, as he gets into his truck, puts the key into the ignition and pushes his-Holy shit… okay that's just not working.- He can't push down on the gas pedal like that without pain shooting through his knee.

Come on, there has to be a way to do this. He messes around a bit more, adjusts the seat, plants his heel on the floor of the car, making sure he's not going to move it, and tries again, just moving his foot.
Better.

It's not comfortable, but it's not white hot pain through his knee, either.

"You make a break for it, Hon?" Elaine asks as he heads in, propping the crutch against the counter.

"Only so long I can go without seeing you."

She shakes her head, smiling. "Sweet talker. I'll have your coffee up in a minute, pot's not quite done yet."

"Take your time, I'm not in a hurry."

"Usual?" She's watching him, looking him over carefully, seeing more than just Jethro in jeans and a t-shirt, sensing the patterns that are shifting.

"Eh... No. Not today. Surprise me?"

Elaine smiled at him.

"So, what's going on? I was expecting to see Tim again," Elaine says as she pours him his coffee.

"Just got the all clear from the Doc, so I'm on my own again."

She gives him a long look.

"I've already been read the riot act by Tim. I'm being careful."

"Good."

One of the customers waved for a refill, and Elaine headed over to him, a minute later she was back. "That's not all that's going on, is it?"

Gibbs sips his coffee, look on his face saying, More's going on, but I don't know exactly what, yet.

"You'll figure it out."

This time the look said, Glad to hear it.

Elaine knows that's as far as Gibbs can go with this now, so she asks, "How many tattoos does Tim have? Until I saw him this weekend, I didn't have him pegged as the type."

"Three now, four soon. Getting one on his leg to celebrate Kelly soon."

She looks mildly surprised at that. Not the tattoo per se, but the location. Usually people put tattoos in places other people see them. "Didn't think he was a shorts kind of guy, either."

Gibbs shakes his head, smiles, and says, "He's not. Kilts. He likes kilts."

"There's a man with a lot of sides to him."
Gibbs smiles.

Home again. His nice, quiet home.

His nice, quiet, empty home.

He tossed the keys on the table, put his phone down gently, plugging it in to charge, and looked around.

Everything is exactly where he left it.

Everything is exactly as he likes it.

So why isn't this home anymore?

He hobbled over to the second from the bottom step and sat down, he can see most of the downstairs from there.

Once upon a time this was home. This was the place he went when the day was done. This was solace and comfort and... and quiet.

Why did quiet matter? Why was it so important that this place would be still?

Because noise meant family, and after three failed attempts at family he figured out that he couldn't get it back and second best wasn't good enough.

If it wasn't going to be his girls, his life, his loves, then he wanted quiet and still and alone.

A long time ago, Ziva asked him, 'Are you lonely, Gibbs?' and he said no, and sure, he was lying, but, he wasn't, too.

He wasn't lonely in the sense of longing for people. (Okay, that's crap, too. He wasn't lonely in the sense of longing for people and hoping he'd have them again. He'd given up on hope.)

He'd told her you're never lonely when you have kids, and kissed her forehead, called her kid, and that was true. That Ziva was and is his is true. (Even if she is spitting mad at him right now. Two hours of yelling resulted in two hours of yelling and a hoarse voice. Then Tony called, and she stopped firing at Gibbs, and started in on Tony. But she did agree to go home and yell at him in person, so that might be a step in the right direction. The last thing she said to him before leaving was, "We are not done!")

But you are lonely when you have kids. You're especially lonely when you can see them make lives, homes, and loves, and feel how you had that, and how much you miss it.

He thinks that's part of what changed, why he's sitting here, thinking about how this isn't home anymore.

Since Kelly was born he's been spending more and more time in a home, a real home. Because it's not really home if it's just you. Home needs people.

And sure, he's not feeling any need to listen to another night of Tim and Abby making love, but that's part of what's crystalizing what he's missing. Not sex. (Okay, yeah, he misses sex. It has been a while, but that's intentional.) Not just sex. Not just people. Not just family in the sense of parents and children.

It's the whole damn package.

It's love and care and people who pet you when you need petting, people who you pet when they need it. It's touch and pleasure and noise and someone to ask you what the hell it was you did during the day while you were away and someone you want to tell about it. It's smiles and care and someone else to eat the food you make and another voice when you fold your laundry and…

And this isn't a home. This is a house. No, this is a grave. A mausoleum he crawled into when his girls died, and he never did right by the other girls he brought here.

What did Tim say? 'You've been floundering around in the wilderness too damn long. It's time to come home. You're almost there, so let's finish this. Let's get you home.'

Time to come home.

Time to build his own home, again.

He rubbed his thumb over his wedding ring, lurched up onto his good foot, took two hops to the table his phone lives on, and shuffled through his contact numbers.

He stared at it for a long minute before hitting it.

"Jethro?"

"Hey, Rachel. Could we talk?"

He can feel that gentle smile of hers. "Certainly. When were you thinking?"

"Doesn't have to be right now. You have, appointments, right?"

"Yes, I do. That's usually how this works."

"I'd like to make one."

"Good."
The Price

Make up sex is brilliant. There’s all the intensity of the emotions of the fight. Then there’s the even more intense ‘I’m so sorry; I hate you being angry at me; I hate being angry at you; I love you so much.’

It’s really, really nice.

The problem is, you can’t get to hot, happy, make up sex when the last time you had the exact same argument you pretended to make up, and then did exactly what you were going to do in the first place.

Because you can only get to the make-up sex when there’s trust that you have, indeed, made up.

So, while there had been yelling, and talking, and crying, and more talking, and more yelling between the DiNozzos, there hadn’t been any make-up sex.

There hadn’t been any cuddles.

Or hugs.

Because they aren’t made up.

Right now, Tony’s pretending to be asleep on the sofa (wasn’t allowed in their bedroom last night) while his ninja stealths around their home.

Someone once said, that if you’re getting along, even the smallest home has plenty of room, and when you aren’t, you can have acres of space and it’s not enough.

So, while it’s true they don’t have a huge apartment, until Ziva came home last night, furious, it had never seemed too small. It’s way too damn small, now. Technically, the entire eastern seaboard may be too small right now.

“I know you are not asleep.” She doesn’t look at him as she says it. She’s very intently making coffee, back toward him, facing the counter.

He sighs, opening his eyes, staring at the ceiling. “I know I’m not asleep, too.”

“Then why are you pretending?”

“I’m tired.” And he is, bone deep, every cell in his body begging for rest, tired. “Just want to rest.”

“Then rest!” Ziva says, slamming down the coffee mugs.

He sits up slowly, rubbing his head. He’s had a headache for two days, because of the fighting, not the concussion. “Not going to rest until this is done.” He hasn’t really slept since the bomb, and today isn’t likely to change that. (Also part of why his head hurts. He always gets headaches when he gets too low on sleep.)

“This isn’t going to be done anytime soon, so you might as well sleep. Maybe if you got some sleep you’d be sane enough to realize you are being completely unreasonable.”
“It is not unreasonable to ask you to value your life!”

“No, it’s not. But you didn’t ask.” She whips around to face him as the sk on ask slides off her tongue.

He just shrugs. “It’s not unreasonable to expect you to value your life.”

“I do value my life!”

“Not enough. If you’re going to…” He shakes his head, not willing to finish that sentence.

“You are not asking me to value my life! You are trying to make me your pet!”

“No, I’m not.”

“Yes you are. You wouldn’t have done that to McGee or Gibbs. You respect them enough to actually tell them the truth.”

“It’s not about respect.”

“Of course, it is! You say you love me, but you don’t respect me, not if you’re willing to do that. Making decisions for me, not telling me about it, lying to me about it. That is not respect.”

“I knew you wouldn’t like it.” And he did. He wouldn’t have lied about it if he thought she’d have been okay with what he was going to do.

“Exactly! You don’t pull this sort of crap on Gibbs or McGee. If you want to do something they don’t like, you own up to it and tell them about it. It’s completely about respect. You respect them enough not to lie to them.”

“It’s not respect! I don’t love either of them enough…” Tony shakes his head. “The world doesn’t stop turning if something bad happens to them. I knew you wouldn’t like it. I knew you’d be angry. And I didn’t care because you angry and alive is better than you dead and happy.”

Ziva’s furious again, and the coffee cup in her hand is in serious danger of being squeezed so hard it shatters. “That’s not how you treat people! That’s how you treat a child or a pet. You do not get to make that decision. You do not get to just… ignore how I feel about it. You are my husband, not my father, and no one, no one has any right to treat me like that, not anymore. Not you, not Gibbs. I am not a child, let alone your child, and I get to make my own decisions.”

He stands up, walks across the living room and kitchen to her. He stares her in the eyes, tired, angry, hurting, all of it in his face and voice. “You made the wrong one! You stop getting to make that decision when you make the wrong one.”

Something very intense, very hot, and very not English spills from her lips as Ziva glares at him. Then she turns, pushes past him, out of the kitchen, and says, “This is useless! I’m going out. You sleep. I’ll calm down. We’ll try again in a few hours.”

Sleep.

Easier said than done. But at least right now, he can lay in their bed (more comfy than the sofa), stretch out, cuddle into pillows that smell like her, and not sleep.

Because sleeping requires a quiet mind.
And right now his mind is anything but quiet.

Lying about it wasn’t a good plan. But he knew she wouldn’t go for it, knew if he said, I want you on a different team, I can't take this anymore, it’d piss her off, but, if she could find out about it as something accomplished, done and unchangeable, then she’d be pissed, but, eventually, she’d like having her own team, and then they’d go on.

Then McGee butts his big ass into this and fucks the whole thing sideways.

It’s his team. Not McGee’s. Three days of running things doesn’t make it McGee’s team. He’s in charge of who’s on it, not McGee. It’s his job to make sure it’s running right, not McGee’s, and he gets to define what running right is. And if that’s just the three of them, slowly adding in new people, then that’s what it is.

Except that’s crap, and he knows it’s crap, the problem isn’t that McGee counteracted the shift. The problem was trying to move her in the first place.

Sigh.

Part of being a friend is smacking you upside the head when you’re being an idiot, and McGee’s being his friend.

Part of being an adult is seeing the problems that are there and taking responsibility for your part in them.

And all of being the leader is seeing the problems, facing them head on, and tackling them.

He sees it in his head again. Ziva standing next to them. Hears her say it, ‘You go. I go.’ Gibbs has his knife out, ready to cut, and he knocks it away, yanks out the detonator and tosses it. The most Hail Mary pass of the history of Hail Mary passes.

He stares at the ceiling. Feeling her body under his, hearing the almost slithering rush of the fire, how there was that second where he could hear it before the heat poured over them, then that month-long second between the fire and the blast.

Conversion aside, he’s not much of a praying man. He and God have a deal, and swapping out from not overly Catholic to not overly Jewish didn’t change that. But as the fire rushed over them, he was certainly begging God to get her through this, and even with as loud as the fire was, and his heart beating so hard as to drown out almost everything else, he could still hear her say the Shema, and…

And he panicked. He knows that. Or he took a calculated risk, but did the math wrong. Either way, letting Gibbs cut the wire was probably the better answer.

And he’s not sure which scares him worse, that her being at risk made him make the bad decision, or her running in to join them.

Her running in. He can (he hopes) control the panic. He can (still hoping) control himself.

He can’t control her.

And he knows that.

And trying was stupid.
But you do stupid things when the person you love above all others puts herself at risk. When fear reaches up, colors your world sickly green, chokes off your breath, makes your joints go week and your stomach clench, you do whatever you can to make it stop.

Ziva’s wildness, the fact that he couldn’t control her, that had always interested him. That, as much as her body, got his attention at first.

Like with Kate, the fact that she would be a challenge, that she wouldn’t just go along for the ride, that made him want to make her want to go along.

Be careful what you wish for.

He did it. He got her signed on for the long haul. He won her love and respect (at least, he’d had it up until he hit send on that email) and then came face to face (again) with why it’s easier to keep the walls in place.

After all, how many times can you volunteer to let your heart have the shit beaten out of it?

Of course, if he’s being honest with himself, he knows he’s doing it back to her. She scared him so bad, and that fear hurt so much, that he’s doing it to her, making her hurt the way he hurt.

And it’s not cool, or good, or responsible, or anything he wants to be, but… it’s true. Maybe, beyond acknowledging the fear, it’s the first true thing he’s thought about this.

Because you don’t just do crap like that, and all the justifications on Earth don’t make it all right.

And by hurting her, he’s hurting himself, and on some level, he feels like he deserves that, too.

The sound of her opening the door didn’t wake him up. Have to be asleep to wake up.

It did stop him staring at the ceiling. He gets up slowly, heads to the door of their bedroom, opens it, and leans against the door jam. She’s in the living area, just standing there, looking in his direction.

“I’m sorry I lied to you.”

“Not enough.” Calming down time does not appear to have done much to help with Ziva being pissed off.

“Right now, I’m sorry about this whole thing.”

“Yes, I know, you made that abundantly clear last night. That you are sorry about this whole thing starting with falling in love and ending with lying to me. You’d rather have just stayed a gigolo.”

Yeah, so apparently mentioning that particular bit of doubt, which he’d done as an ‘I’m so scared and in love with you and I don’t know what to do with myself because this was so much easier before’ thing hadn’t been the right tact.

He rubs his forehead. “I love you. I am so terrified that something will happen to you. I hate feeling like this. I hate that I don’t know what to do with this.”
“Just stop it!” Ziva bites out. “You are not alone. You are not the only one feeling fear. You aren’t the only one who’s lost someone. You’re the only one who decided to cut one of us out of the picture and act alone. You’re the one who spent hours talking with me about our future, about getting everything in order, about making sure we’d go on… You’re the one who lied to me! You’re the one who cut me out!”

“I’m sorry!” he shouts that, then gets under better control. “It was stupid, and I’m sorry.”

“I don’t care if you’re sorry! You hurt me, and all the sorry on Earth doesn’t take it away. You cannot just make it better by being sorry. It’s not like this was some sort of thing where you just did not know I’d be upset. It’s not like you stepped on my toe or forgot my birthday or this is some sort of misunderstanding. You lied to me!”

“I know. You scared the shit out of me, scared me so bad, made me so angry… I wanted you to feel it, too!”

Ziva looks like she had been getting ready to say something, but that stops her dead. She spends a minute thinking, then says, “So this is… what… revenge?”

“I don’t know. It was stupid it what it is. It was panic and pain and my balls doing the thinking and not my head. And I shouldn’t have lied, and I may not be sorry I hurt you, because, honestly I’m still too fucking pissed at you to be sorry about that, but I still know it was stupid.” He steps closer to her, stopping before he can touch her, wanting to see if she’d meet him halfway, and she does, stepping to him, staring up into his eyes, not touching, though. “And if you want to be angry about me lying to you, fine, I get that, I understand it, and yeah, it was stupid. But I don’t care if you’re angry about me trying to keep you alive. I don’t care if you don’t like my tactics.” His hands close over her shoulders, gentle, and she can feel the slight tremors in his fingers. “I DON’T CARE if I have to lie, cheat, or steal to do it, but you are going to outlive me, and not by minutes or seconds, but by years, decades if I have any say in it. You say you love me, then prove it, don’t ever run into a bomb for me again, don’t throw yourself in front of the bullet.”

“That’s not fair.”

“I don’t care. I know which one of us is the better person, and it’s not me.”

“Tony—“

“No! That’s the line in the sand for our relationship. That’s the one boundary that cannot be crossed. Anything else we can talk out, work through, forgive, but you will not throw your life away for mine. That’s it. Love, honor, cherish, bullshit! I don’t care. LIVE! That’s your vow to me. That’s the only one I want, and the only one that matters.

“Not once have you said you were sorry for running into the bomb. It’s all about it’s your choice, and I don’t get a say in it, and I don’t get to be mad about it, and I don’t get to try and stop that, and it’s fucking bullshit! I save lives. That’s my job. That’s all I’ve ever cared about doing for my entire adult life. That’s it. And I will be damned to fucking hell for the entire rest of eternity if I can’t save YOU!”

Ziva just stares at him, eyes wide, visually tracing the path of the tears running down his cheeks. “I… just…”

He shakes his head, breathing hard, and then says quietly, “That’s your promise to me. You want me, that’s the cost.”
She closes her eyes and sighs, then takes his hands in hers, and pulls him along to sit next to her on the sofa. “How can we be a team if I don’t have your back?”

He’s looking at her hands, her wedding band, then looks up to her eyes and says, “You go home at the end of the day, and that’s all the having my back I’ll ever need.”

She’s looking like she’s trying to find some wiggle room. “Our job is dangerous…”

“I’m not saying avoid danger. I know the job is dangerous. I’m not saying take a desk job. I’m not saying don’t ever go out again. But if you run into danger when you can’t help, when there’s nothing you can do but die… If I survive it… That’s it. You don’t think it’s fair? I don’t care. You cannot ask me to watch you die for nothing.”

“You aren’t nothing.”

“You weren’t going to die for me. Not then. You didn’t even reach for the bomb. You were going to die with me, and that’s… No! That’s my line that can’t be crossed.”

Ziva says sadly, “You have said nothing about living yourself. I don’t get to ask that of you, do I?”

Tony shakes his head again. “You don’t. And it’s not fair, and it’s not even, and I know it. But it’s who I am. I run into the fire to die with you, you don’t run in for me.”

“And you get to just dictate this?”

He shrugs. He knows he can make the promise, but he won’t keep it. “I could lie about it again.”

She glares at him.

“This is it. All honesty, I get to die for or with you, you don’t get to die with me, and if you think that’s me treating you like a child, if you think it’s disrespectful, I’m comfortable with that. This is who I am. I’m going out for a few hours. You think about it. And, I hope…”

He didn’t finish that sentence. He stands up pushes his feet into a pair of sneakers, and heads out of their home.

His wedding ring is a plain gold band. He’d inscribed hers with יִדְרָן לְךָ/you are not alone because he liked the promise of it, liked what he meant by it, how that was the day when he saw them having a future in a concrete sort of way.

His, though, is just blank gold.

There’s a jeweler only a few streets down from their apartment, so he heads in that direction. He’s not sure how long what he wants done will take, but he hopes it’ll be fast.

No one else is there. Not a lot of business at two on a Tuesday.

The jeweler hears him and jumps to attention. “Can I help you?”

“I hope so.” He took off his wedding ring and handed it over. “How long would it take to get it engraved?”

“Depends on what you want.”
“Got a piece of paper?”

“Sure.” The clerk lays his ring on the counter, then pokes around for a moment before coming up with a pad and a pen and handing them both over.

“Yma.” “That’s what I want.”

“Never tried Hebrew before, but…” He picks up Tony’s ring again, checking how wide it is, looking back at the Hebrew letters. “Yeah, I can do that. Probably about two hours. Give me some time to practice before I do it to your ring.”

Tony nods, turns, and was half way out the door when the jeweler asks, “What’s it mean?”

“I will live.”

He left, seeing the jeweler’s eyebrows still high.

Three hours later, he’s in the elevator heading back up to their apartment.

He’s not wearing his ring. It’s in his pocket. The Hebrew looks good. All the characters are right. It’s nicely centered.

And hopefully this isn’t the stupidest thing he’s ever done.

She’s at the dining room table, cleaning both of their guns. He knows that she hears when he walks in, but she doesn’t say anything.

He stands behind her, staring at the back of her head, and then places the ring on the table next to her left hand.

“When you can make this promise, you can put it back on me. I want to wear it, but I can’t, not if this isn’t part of it.” Then he steps back, heading for the door again.

She’s staring at it, hasn’t turned to look at him. “Where are you going?”

“I don’t know.” He’s still facing the door. “McGee says his door is always open, but I’m not sure I can take McWedded-Bliss right now. I’ve got my phone. Call, and I’ll come.” And then he steps out, into the hall, heading toward the elevator.

He’d pressed the button for the ground floor, but doors hadn’t even shut when his phone rang.

She was standing outside their door, looking down the hall at him, ring in her hand.

She crooks her finger at him, and he came to her, she’s not smiling, or looking particularly happy with him.

He stands in front of her, watching, waiting to see what happens next.

“You will never lie to me again.”

He nods.

She gathers her hand in his, and slips the ring back over his finger. “Come home with me.”
He steps in.

And they weren’t done. There was still a lot of talking, and some crying, but no more yelling. And in the end they had agreed to go see a marriage counselor, because she’s not thrilled with the you will live ultimatum, but she understands that’s his price, and she’s willing to pay it.

And the make-up sex, (which, granted, happened on Wednesday, because they were both exhausted and needed the sleep after that fight) was excellent.
“So how does this work?” Gibbs asks Cranston on Thursday. He’s feeling a very strong desire to get another coffee, but the one in his hand is full. He takes a sip. It’s good. Hot, strong, very black. What’d Jimmy say about it? ‘What do you brew this out of, roofing tar?’ Something like that.

Of course, since he made it, himself, and put it in a travel mug, and brought it with him, it would be exactly the way he liked it, wouldn’t it? He was figuring that Cranston would probably have drinks available, but they’d be tame little things like herbal tea or light roast coffee with hazelnut flavoring or something. (He was sort of right, she’s got one of those multi-flavor coffee makers with a whole bunch of little pods in different varieties. Strong, black, chew your tongue off coffee is not among them, however.)

He’s almost wishing for some sort of massive emergency, like another troop transport crash, that’d pull all hands on deck, no matter what.

Okay, so it might not get him pulled into action, because all he can do in the field is limp around and look stern, but it might get Cranston pulled in, and that’d work just as well.

Just because this seemed like a good idea two days ago, doesn’t mean he’s exactly relishing sitting in a very… comforting is probably the right word, everything about this place just oozes comfort and sympathy and empathy, office. Cranston, serene and also, comforting, is looking expectantly at him, right now.

She smiles at him, notices the way he’s fiddling with the coffee cup. He sees her notice and stops.

That gets another smile. “It usually goes something like this, we talk about why you’re here, what you’re looking to get out of this, we talk about where you are, and from there we try to get an idea of what to do to get you to what you’re looking for.”

“Getting back to work.”

“Good start. But, usually for psych evals I get calls from NCIS, not from the person in question.” He can see a sort of amused curiosity in the way she says that. Work may be the goal, but this isn’t how work usually happens.

“It’s not an official psych eval. McGee won’t let me back on until I talk to someone, twice.”

“About?”

Gibbs isn’t sure if he’s relieved that Rachel isn’t asking about Tim being the one drawing the line here, or upset because he can’t use talking about that to eat up some of this time.

“He thinks my head’s not in the game.”

She tilts her head a little, looking at him intently, thinking. “Is he right?”

Gibbs has never wished more devoutly in his life for a catastrophe than right now. But wishing won’t make it so. He sighs. “I can do the job.”

She writes something quickly, then looks up and says, “Okay. So, he’s wrong, but you’re letting him make you do this, even though he’s wrong?”
Gibbs can feel the trap on this and shuts his eyes. He doesn’t want to own being here, but he can’t admit that Tim’s making him go, because he’s not, not really. He opens them and says, “It’s complicated.”

Not quite a full smile, more the look of someone who knows she’s got someone who wants to talk, but is having a hard time doing it. “We’ve got an hour. Two if you need them. Don’t have another appointment until four. Lay it out for me.”

Gibbs really doesn’t like open-ended questions. At least, not when he’s the one doing the answering. He tries to find a way to build a structure for this, see it like a ship of words. Main beam, support beams, ribs, siding. What idea is all of this riding on? What ideas branch off of it?

“I’m here because I let fear make me give bad advice, and he called me out on it.”

“Doesn’t sound complicated. Was it bad advice about a case?”

Shrug, eyebrows furrow, another sip of coffee. “Not exactly. It was bad advice about how to handle the fear of having someone you love in danger and a case brought that fear on.”

“Doesn’t sound like it’d effect how you do your job.”

“In the sense you’re thinking, it won’t. I can’t chase down a perp right now,” he gently pats his knee, “but I can follow up on leads and interrogate, and my gut still works just fine.”

“And yet you’re here.”

“And I’ll be here at least one more time.”

“Because McGee thinks it’s bad enough you can’t go back to even desk work.”

Gibbs licks his lips, sips the coffee again. “No. He doesn’t.” Gibbs taps the coffee cup. “He’s using that as a way to make sure I do this.”

“The carrot to go with the stick?”

Gibbs nods.

“And how did you end up in a situation where Agent McGee gets to tell you what to do?”

He’s not sure if she doesn’t actually know the answer, or if she wants to see how he understands it. He does know that it’s been two years since he’s seen her in person, and as such she hasn’t been around to see a lot of the changes of the last three years.

While he’s thinking about that, she says, “He married to Abby, now. And she’s basically your adopted daughter, right?”

“Yeah, they just had a baby girl six weeks ago.”

“Congratulations.”

“Thanks.” Gibbs gets out his phone and shows Cranston a picture of Kelly.

“She’s lovely.” Rachel hands the phone back, and sits next to him on the very comfortable sofa. “Any family shots?”

“Lots of them.” Gibbs flips through a lot of them to find one of Tim and Abby and Kelly all together. and shows that to Rachel, too. He shows her another of Tim and Jimmy messing around in his backyard. One of Tim holding Molly. He shows her shots of all the girls together: Penny, Ziva, Abby, Breena, Molly, and Kelly. He shows her Tony with Molly riding his shoulders at the pool. There’s one of Ducky gently stroking Kelly’s head while Penny holds her. He doesn’t show her any of the shots with him in them, because they’re his and they’re goofy and private and… And not for today.

“You’re not in them?” she says, looking at a shot of Ziva lighting the Shabbos candles while the rest of the crew stands around the table, waiting for the start of dinner.

“I took them.” Which has the advantage of being both true and misleading.

“So, if McGee were here, I could ask him for photos, and there would be shots of you in them.”

“Yeah.” And knowing Tim, he’d have absolutely no issues at all about showing off the goofy ones.

“So, is it safe to say that there’s a certain level of respect and affection between you and McGee?”

“Yes.”

“You trust him with your girl?”

“Absolutely.”

“And he’s one of the men on your team. You trust him with your life, right?”

“Yes, I trust him with my life, and no, it’s not my team anymore, it’s DiNozzo’s.”

“You’re still working, but you’re letting DiNozzo run the team?” She didn’t seem to believe that.

“Yeah. I’m retiring soon. We’ve already got the first new member. It just works better with Tony in charge. Explosion took both of us out, which means, until we get back, it’s Tim’s team.”

She makes a note of that and asks, “So, Jethro, is Tim right,” he notices she shifts how she refers to Tim the same way he did, “do you need to be here?”

Gibbs sighs, so much for avoiding this, or getting into it, or… whatever. “Yeah.” He nods, staring at her, looking tired and a little lost.

“And is it really about having your head in the game?”

“Not really. It’s the lever he’s using to make sure I do it.”

“Okay. So, really, what do you hope to get out of this? What do you think he’s hoping you get out of this?”

“He wants me to be happy.”

She smiles warmly at him, and looks at the picture on the phone, this one of all the guys. “That doesn’t sound bad.”

“No.”

“Are you happy?”

He shrugs, tucks his phone back into his pocket, and sips the coffee again. “I’m better than I’ve been in a very long time.”

“What do you want, Jethro?”

Another drink of his coffee, another moment where he licks his lips, another moment of I’m so horrendously uncomfortable I’d rather be doing anything than talk about this loud and clear in his body language. He looks up at the ceiling, takes yet another drink, and then says, “I wanted to be a good husband, and a good father, and a good Marine. And, for a while, I was.” A very sad smile crosses his face. “But you can’t do all of that at once. So, I was being a good Marine. My country needed me. It called, and off to Iraq I went. I had to be there, because I was good at my job, really good, and Shannon and Kelly were home and safe and… And when I went it was just another deployment, hotter than any I’d been on since Nicaragua, but just another job.

“And I got word that Shannon had witnessed a murder. I didn’t want her to testify. He was bad news and…” He licks his lips again, mentally skipping the fight he and Shannon had about her testifying. Last fight they ever had. Only fight he ever regretted being right about.

“And I got word that there had been threats on her life. I knew she was in protective custody. Everyone said she’d be safe. I asked for permission to get leave to go home, but they denied it, there was a ground war and all, and I was a good Marine. I followed orders. I didn’t go home. And they died.

“I failed at being a father and husband because I was off being a good Marine. I let other men protect my girls, and they died because of it. And nothing I did in Iraq made a fuck of a difference. We didn’t take Hussein out. We just left him there. Ten years later, we were back again. Hundreds of thousands of people were eaten alive by his regime between the day I got there and the day they finally took him out.

“I can’t say we were making the world a better place. I wasn’t storming Normandy or taking out Nazis. Hell, I was barely taking out members of the Republican Guard. They were surrendering to anything with an American or British flag on it, including TV news crews. So I was there, doing fuck all, which meant I wasn’t home defending the most important people on earth.

He shakes his head. “That was the point of it, ya know? Honor, duty, sacrifice. All of it was in the service of saving lives, of protecting your home and the innocent. I’m a Marine. I’ll always be a Marine. But I couldn’t serve anymore, not after they died, not after that choice meant they… And then they pulled us out without finishing the job… It was death and pain for nothing…” He’s smiling a little, shaking his head, he’s not even angry about how Desert Storm ended anymore, the anger burned so hot for so long it scorched his ability to be angry about it away.

“I still believe in the Marines. I still serve them and our sailors and their families, but I don’t trust ‘orders’ anymore, and I don’t trust the powers that be to use those men and women honestly or wisely…” There’s a long, quiet minute after that. Then he takes another deep breath and says, “Everything that mattered to me died that day. And since then… I don’t know what I want.

“There are things I need. I need to put murderers away. I need to keep my girls safe. I need to protect people.”

She thinks about that, writes a few more words down, and then says, “I know there are things you want. You are not clinically depressed, so there are things you want. Even if it’s stupid or silly. What do you want?”

He looks away from her, spends a moment studying the abstract painting behind her desk. Sunset maybe? Sunrise? Lots of pinks and orange and yellow, little hints of blues and greens. Then he pulls his words together again and looks back at her. “I want them back.” Another head shake. “I want to wake up next to Shannon, and I want to see my Kelly hold Tim’s. I want the family I have to be part of the family I had, and I want all of us together. And I know I can’t have it. I know that if Shannon and Kelly were still here I would have stayed in the Corp and probably died…

“I want what I can’t have."

She rests her hand on his, giving it a gentle squeeze, non-verbally rewarding him getting it out, actually saying it, and then withdraws it, and asks another question. “What do you want that you can have?”

He snorts a quick, half-laugh. “Good coffee?”

Rachel smiles at that, laughs gently. “What’s Kelly going to call you when she can talk?”

“Pop.”

That got another warm smile out of Rachel. “Are you planning on being an active grandparent?”

“Yes.”

“You want that?”

“Yeah.” He nods. He does want that. Never thought about it in that light, but yeah, he wants it.

“That’s a start.” She looks pointedly at his wedding ring. “I’m guessing you didn’t actually get married again since I saw you last?”

“No. Shannon’s ring.”

She thinks about that for a moment, writes a quick note, and says, “Do you want to re-marry?”

That gets an alarmed look out of Gibbs.

“Let me re-phrase, I forgot how loaded a question that is for you. Would you like to have a relationship with a woman and not see her as a daughter?”

“Got one.”

“Really?” That did surprise Cranston.

“Penny Langston. Ducky’s… I’ll say wife because that’s close enough. Tim’s grandma. One third of our grandparenting team.”

Rachel laughs at that. “I’m not sure if that was you deflecting my question, or letting me know that you’re expanding your core of relationships in a healthy way.”

“Both?”

“Probably. Want to take a stab at the question I was actually asking?”

Gibbs looks up, looks away from Rachel, sips his coffee, starts to say something twice, but doesn’t. Finally he says, “Not really.”

“Okay.” But she doesn’t say anything, just letting that ‘okay’ linger.
Frustration is clear on his face as he says, “Not okay. Not really.” He shakes his head again. This is why he’s here. Don’t try to hide from it. Won’t work if you don’t get to the heart of it. “How much did Tony tell you about what happened?”

She starts to shake her head.

“Don’t want you to break confidence or anything, just want an idea of what you know about why we’re here?”

“How about you tell me how you understand what happened? How Tony understands it isn’t particularly useful when it comes to getting into your head.”

So he did. Explaining the case, and the explosion, and the how he was planning on getting off the pain meds, standing up, marching back to work, and telling everyone to go to hell, when he stood up, felt his knee slide out of joint and decided maybe the Doc wasn’t entirely insane about the whole lay around thing, so he sat back down and tried to figure out what the hell do to with himself if he was going to spend a week on his ass at Tim and Abby's house. Tony called in a panic once Ziva went back to work, and somehow, he hadn’t even noticed when it happened, but somehow Ziva slipped from Ziva to Tony’s wife, and went from co-solider manning the barricades to one of the women that get hidden when you’re hiding the women and children. (That got an interested look, and a note, but Cranston didn’t break in or interrupt him on that.) He gave Tony some god-awful bad advice that was part mourning widower, part terrified dad, but completely not Team Leader rationally assessing his team, let alone older, wiser head providing useful counsel, and then there was more about the case, and about living with Tim and Abby for a week, and about, finally, getting home and just missing that.

“So, I take that to mean you are missing a romantic attachment? And that you want that, as well?”

“Yeah. Maybe not a marriage. I’ve screwed that up in every direction a marriage can be screwed up. And Ducky and Penny aren’t married, doesn’t look like they’re gonna get married, either, but they’re doing fine. So maybe the rings and words don’t matter.”

Rachel raises an eyebrow, looks at the wedding ring, and then wrote another note. “So, what do you want? You imagine this ideal home of yours, what’s there?”

He thinks for another minute, notices the coffee cup is empty when he lifts it to his lips. “Comfort. Another voice. Someone to listen to. Someone to listen to me…” He licks his lips. “It’s dumb…”

“I’m good with dumb. This is a very dumb friendly place.”

He just looks at her, really? in his gaze, then he answers, “One of the clearest images is just having someone to sit on the sofa with and read. Shoulders to wrap my arm around and rest my chin on.”

“That’s not dumb. What else?”

He didn’t have much else, so he starts to flesh it out as he’s talking to her. What does he want? What did he miss most? “Someone to sort laundry with. Someone to show my sketches to. Someone who asks what I’m working on down there. Someone to call down so I can show off what I’ve done.”

“That sounds really good. What else?”

He thinks for another minute. What else… yeah, he’s lonely, but there’s more than that… What does the ideal look like? “Not fighting?”

“Did you do a lot of fighting with the ex-wives?”
He nods slowly. “Yeah. About everything.”

“Did you and Shannon fight a lot?”

“No. Some, everyone does some, but not a lot. Even you and Mr. Cranston fight every now and again, right?”

She smiles wryly. “Every now and again. Were you picking fights with your other wives?”

He was about to say no, because he never did, verbally. Never set a trap for them to make them want to argue. But, “forgotten” birthdays, late nights with no call home, hiding in the basement, refusing to do anything with their families, taking any assignment, no matter how long or far away from home, sleeping with other women… “Yeah, I did.”

“Why?”

He half-lifts the coffee cup, remembers it’s empty and puts it down again. “They weren’t Shannon.”

“The shoulder your chin is resting on, is it Shannon’s?”

“You mean when I imagine it?”

“Yeah, when you see it in your head, is it Shannon?”

“Sometimes.”

“Most of the time?”

He thinks more. “‘Bout half.”

“How about this time last year?”

He thinks about it. “Wasn’t thinking as much about it then.”

“As much, or at all?”

“As much. When Tony and Ziva started hosting Shabbos… That was back at the end of ’13, there was a change. I was home, with a family, doing family things, that started it. We were a family before, sort of… No… we weren’t. We were really close co-workers. We were a team or a unit or whatever. But it was all work. Once, twice a year we’d get together for Christmas or Thanksgiving, but that wasn’t the same. That was a bunch of people who were in the trenches together spending some off time together rather than be alone. Tony’d come over for dinner or a drink every now and again. Abby’d come over sometimes, but not a whole lot, not like she does now. Ziva did a few times, too, but she always kept her private life private. Never even saw Tim in my basement until he started dating Abby. We were a team. We were… close… friendly… depended on each other… trusted each other… but… not intimate. But we’re not anymore, now we’re a family.”

“And spending time with people who have loves and lives outside of work is reminding you of how much you miss that?”

“Yeah.”

“So, closeness, comfort, peace, someone to talk and listen to, what else do you see in this ideal home?”

“Is there more?”
“Sex?”

He gives her an of course, I’m old, not dead look.

“But you didn’t mention it. Didn’t think of it. Or did you just not want to say it to me?”

Good point. He didn’t think of it. Not right now. It was part of what he was thinking about as he sat on the step. Why not? “Sex isn’t too difficult to get. I want that and miss it, too, but it’s not…” He sighs again. “I can get laid. And I’m old enough that taking care of myself scratches that itch pretty well. So… it’s not sex…”

“It’s sex in the context of love and care and peace and family?”

“Yeah. The good morning kiss that runs hot.”

Rachel nods. “Are there children in this home?”

“Sometimes. The grandkids, Kelly and Molly, and the new one that’s due in December. Hopefully at least one more.”

Cranston flashes him a questioning look.

“I hope Ziva and Tony have one, one day. Love it if there’s more than the three of them. I’ll be good with just the three, though.”

“None of your own?”

He looks really startled by that idea, then finally says, “I’m too old. Helping out with Kelly has made it clear that I do not want to be a full time, 24/7 parent of a newborn again. And I’m way too damn old to start dating a woman young enough to have one. And even if I wasn’t, it’s not an option any longer.”

That questioning look again. “Too much risk?”

“Vasectomy back in ’82.”

“Ah.” That got a note, too. She glances over at her clock, fifty seven minutes down. “You want to keep going, or wrap up?”

“I’m good with wrap up.”

Rachel smiles dryly. “I’m deeply shocked. Homework for next time—“

“Homework?”

“Yes. I’ll play to your strengths. Tactical planning and assessment, I want a step by step plan for how to get to your fantasy home.”

“Isn’t that why I’m here with you?”

“Yes. But we start with a plan, and then we work on it, see what’s there, see where you’ve gotten tripped up before, things like that.”

He inclines his head, a physical version of ‘Oh.’

“Yeah. If you want the gold star, you can give me the version of how you got your past three wives or any serious girlfriends, and what you’re going to do differently this time.”

“Sounds like work.”

She smiles one last time. “Monday?”

He nods. “Monday.”
Honestly, Gibbs would rather skip church this morning. But they've skipped the past few weeks, and Breena was sort of sending psychic puppy-dog eyes at them during Shabbos (Which was tense, but not painfully so. There's still friction between Tony and Ziva, and Gibbs's not her favorite person, either, right now, but they're still family.) dinner yesterday when the question came up, and Elaine has informed him that he will produce Kelly for inspection in the not wildly distant future.

So, he's standing in front of his closet, leaning against the crutch, trying to figure out which of his suit pants are loose enough he can wear the brace under them, or if he should just wrap up in ace bandages and hope that'll do it.

Gray one'll probably do.

It did. Add in a white shirt and a sharp blue tie, and he's presentable. Be nice if it wasn't 93 degrees out already with a high set for the low hundreds to go with his gray wool suit, but he'll live.

Pre-church Sunday breakfast at Elaine's struck him as a tradition he could get behind building.

He got there before the McGees, headed in, toward a booth. He was two steps in when Elaine looked him up and down and said, "You getting married again, Hon?"

He smiled at her. "We get dressed up for church."

"Dressed up mighty fine."

That got another smile.

"Getting your usual?"

"Yeah. Tim, Abby, and Kelly are coming, too…"

"Honey, you think I don't know you're expecting company when you head to a booth? I'll hold it until I see 'em." Then she notice Kelly was on the list. "You're finally bringing her in?"

"Yep. Might be a little late…” Because getting anywhere with a baby is always a challenge, but Elaine knows that.

"Doesn't matter, can't wait to see your darlin' girl."

Which was when he noticed the McGee's Highlander pull in. "'Bout two minutes." His first instinct is to head out and offer to help lug baby stuff, but, first of all, he can't, and, second of all, they've just got the diaper bag and the car seat/baby carrier, so it's only one thing for each of them.

He can, however, head to the door and hold it open, which he does. Abby gives him a little, are you taking care of yourself? look, while kissing his cheek.

He sends her an I'm fine. Stop mothering me. look back.
She just looked him up and down and then said, "Uh huh. Which booth is yours?"

He nodded toward the one that now has one cup of coffee, black, one iced coffee, with milk, and some sort of pink smoothie (Turns out it was frozen watermelon lemonade, really nice on a day as hot as this.)

The source of those drinks wrapped Abby in a warm hug, and even warmer words about how good she was looking, which lasted for a few seconds until Tim and Kelly got in, and all of Elaine's attention focused into a lazer like beam on the baby girl.

"Oh my God, Jethro, she's so precious! May I?"

Both Tim and Abby are a bit amused to see she's asking Gibbs' permission to pick Kelly up, but they also get this is some sort of grandparent bonding thing, and that they don't get to really be part of it for at least another twenty-years.

Gibbs does check with Abby though, and she nods, so he very carefully hands Kelly over for snuggles and soft words. Elaine gently rubs her cheek against the top of Kelly's head, inhaling deeply. "Nothing on earth smells like a new baby. I could just eat you up, precious girl!"

Kelly's looking a bit startled by this, not sure if she likes it, (it's kind of loud and smells different, and she doesn't know the person petting her) but it's not unpleasant, so she doesn't fuss.

Elaine is gently patting Kelly's back, cuddling her against her shoulder, whispering gently to her, "You be good to your Pop, now. He loves you more than anything else in the world. You should have seen him, showing off pictures of you when you were the size of a salad shrimp."

Kelly stares intently at Elaine, and then flops her hand onto her nose, squeezing tight.

"I'll take that as a yes, precious girl," Elaine says with a smile. She kisses Kelly's forehead, detaches her hand from her nose, and hands her back to Gibbs. "Well, let's get you all fed and ready for church. Abby, I know what those two want, but what about you?"

Outside of work, they don't really talk a whole lot about what exactly it is they do. They just don't. Gibbs doesn't know if that's a cop thing in general, or just something that's true for his team.

But he's very obviously injured, and he does want to hammer home exactly how important Tim and Jimmy are and how what they do is vital to protecting people and keeping them alive.

So, when Mark? Jeff? (For whatever reason every Slater on earth showed up for church and Sunday dinner today. There's got to be close to a hundred people in the house) one of Breena's extended collection of relatives asked why he was on crutches, he said, "You hear about that warehouse explosion down in Norfolk?"

"Uh. Yeah."

And Gibbs just gave him a long, long look. And from there, questions, answers, and choice details of the case started to leak out and circulate around the Slater family.

And he did notice, that by the time the ham and the turkey had been carved, and plates piled high with succulent meats, manicotti, penne with sausage and peppers, and lasagna, that the Slaters were looking at Tim and Jimmy with a lot more respect.
What he wasn't expecting when he started making sure that the Slaters knew his boys had seen some serious action recently was that he was injured, almost died, and is sitting in a house full of morticians and funeral home directors.

So, about half an hour after the first bits of what had happened started to circulate, Ed's brother Wes wandered over and asked him, "So, have you given any thought to your final arrangements?"

That took Gibbs by surprise. Yes, he's given it more thought than a lot of guys, and not for reasons he ever wanted to, but… Back in the Marines, they'd joke about guys who 'bought the plot' the plot being the bit of ground they'd dig your grave out of. Get badly wounded, you'd buy 'half a plot,' stuff like that. Well, he does in fact own his plot. It's next to Kelly and Shannon's. (There's space for his name on the headstone, too.) But between that and the flag, he's never given it any thought.

"You know, if you want to plan things ahead of time, it's a lot easier on the people you leave behind."

Gibbs nods silently, sure that that's true, and also sure that he's really not wanting to have this conversation.

"Plus, if you plan it yourself, they don't have to deal with the whole, 'Would Dad have wanted this?' issue."

"Okay."

"We also offer competitive pricing and the ability to pay over time. That way no one gets hit with a large bill right after what's sure to be a traumatic time."

"I'm sure you do." Gibbs is looking for a way out. Abby catches his eye, sees that Help! Get me out of this look in it, and heads over, wrapping her arm in his.

"Telling Wes more stories?"

Gibbs smiles at him and shakes his head.

"Just asking him if he had his final plans made. With as dangerous as your line of work is…” Wes lets that trail off.

"Ahhh. At this point, the family plan is to let Breena handle it. We know she'll treat us right. She took care of Jethro's dad, and did a great job."

Wes smiles at that, nods, and heads off.

Tim had told him about fighting with Jimmy, and how the two of them together took out Ziva. He mentioned that the music helped them keep track of each other, and coordinate their fight.

He'd been really excited about showing Gibbs, too. And he saw that from Jimmy, too. For a second it was hard to remember that these are two thirty-seven-year-old men, because they both had that puppyish I-did-something-really-good-c'mon-Dad-come-see-it! attitude when it came to explaining how this worked.

So, he's at the gym, changed into his workout clothing, though God alone knows why, not like he's going to do anything besides stand there, watching, leaning against his crutches, while Tim messes around with his sound equipment and then a wave of… something… Gibbs isn't going to call it music, goes blaring through the gym.

(He's actually quite pleased that they generally have the combat area to themselves on Sundays. This would be really annoying if you weren't part of it.)

Yeah, this is music that'll make you want to fight. Granted, it's making Gibbs want to punch the asshole that inflicted it on the world. The fact that people voluntarily listen to this (Hell, that Tim listens to this. He knows Abby listens to weird stuff, but Tim's Mr. Smooth Jazz.) boggles him.

But, he's watching, can't do much else, and he has to admit, that, yeah, it helps. Probably help their one on one fighting, too. He knows that when they're on their own, warming up, working on their form, they usually have ear buds in.

They were two rounds in, warmed up, not too tired when Gibbs decided to see what would happen if he swapped it up again. He's sure Ziva'll cope well with this, but for Tim and Jimmy it should make things even more challenging.

He hits the off switch on the… thing… the music comes out of, and all three of them stop and look at him. "One on one on one."

Both of the boys are giving him the are you kidding me look. Ziva's grinning.

Then Tim is, too. Gibbs isn't sure what that grin means, not in any sort of detail, just that Tim's got a plan.

Jimmy's shaking his head, probably less than thrilled about having to keep track of Ziva and Tim.

"Have at it." He turns the music back on, and three notes died what, to him, sounds like horribly painful deaths, and then something peppy, fast, and sure, it's not anything he's going to listen to anytime soon, but it's not awful either (must be Ziva's music) comes up.

Jimmy's shaking his head. One on one on one, and it's Ziva's music. They're going to get killed again.

Tim tilts his head, in a way that Jimmy knows means, follow my lead.

Gibbs watches them do it and realizes they are not exactly embracing the spirit of one on one on one, but he's interested in seeing what they do.

It wasn't a brilliant plan or anything, but it was solid. Tim made sure Ziva was between him and Jimmy at all times. Which meant even though they took occasional shots at each other, they were still concentrating force against the most dangerous target, trying to take her out first.

That lasted for ninety-two seconds, until Ziva got her back to the ropes, which meant both guys could still flank her, but they had to be pretty close to each other to do it. That used their size against them, (getting in each other's way) and in her favor. Then she did some sort of flip thing with the rope, Jimmy's knee, and Tim's shoulder, and ended up behind Tim. (This was when Gibbs decided he needed to record these, because all three of them need instant replay to figure out what the hell it was she did.)

But whatever it was, it worked, while they were gaping at the spot where she had been, Ziva tidily tripped Tim into Jimmy and took both of them down.
As she helped Jimmy up, he said to her, "How can you possibly be that fast?"
"Years of practice."

They were in the parking lot, having finished for the day when Gibbs said to her, "Ziver, come home with me?"
"Gibbs?"
"Wanna show you something."

She's got a curious look in her eyes, and wary, and still some anger, but she nods and slips into her car.

"Come on up. Still haven't figured out how to do stairs while holding anything." And while that's true, even if he could carry something while crutching down the steps, he'd still invite her up for this. He wants the symbol of the intimacy of his bedroom for it.

She follows, looking around, scanning everything, the sort of training that never leaves a person. He knows he still does it every time he's in a strange place. Should do it every time he's anywhere, but he's used to this being home, and doesn't give it a proper look through when he gets in.

They head up to his room, and he pats the bed, signaling for her to sit down, before heading to his dresser, taking a moment to figure out the mechanics of how to do it, and then opened the bottom drawer, and got one of the photo albums out.

She's still standing between the bed and the dresser, watching him intensely.

"Look, I'm not doing this standing up." He put the album on the bed, rested the crutches against the bedside table, and then sat down, scooting over so his back was against the headboard and he was in the middle of the bed. Then he held out one arm to her, while putting the album on her lap.

"Come on, look at some pictures with me."

"We are going to look at pictures?" she asks, sitting next to him, cross-legged, looking across him, shoulder toward the headboard, very much not snuggling into the offered arm, so he drops it.

"Yeah. When you left to deal with Tony, you said we weren't done. I know we aren't. Just..." He licks his lips and inhales deeply, then meets her eyes. "Context."

It's the last of the albums. The one where Kelly's oldest. There are all the usual shots, holidays like Christmas and Halloween, vacation shots of the three of them, school shots, Kelly's first ballet recital. Just lots of little, common, snaps of a series of intersecting lives. There's nothing unique about a grandfather spinning his granddaughter around, but it's Jackson and Kelly. Everyone who's grown up in places with snow have shots of kiddies playing in the snow, but the ones of Kelly and Gibbs making the snowman together make Ziva smile. (And the one of Shannon standing on the porch, hot chocolate in both hands, watching them, waiting to welcome them in with delicious warmth Gibbs strokes reverently.)

He doesn't say much while looking at them. Mostly just short answers to her questions, like where is this, or in a few cases, who is that. Mostly he's letting her see them, letting the content of the pictures say what his voice won’t, can’t.

By half way through the album, she is sitting back against the headboard, his arm around her shoulders.

The last page is two thirds of the way through the album. The last picture is Gibbs kissing Kelly at midnight on New Year's Eve; they're both wearing goofy hats that say 1991 on them, and Shannon framed it to get the clock in the shot. That was the first New Year's she was old enough to stay up until midnight.

"Went back to Iraq on the second." His fingers trace over the shot, and he closes the album.

"I've already buried one daughter. I can't do it again. And like it or not, you aren't just Special Agent David… or DiNozzo… anymore." He squeezes her a little more tightly and kisses the side of her head. "Somewhere along the line, maybe when I was walking you down the aisle, maybe when I was holding onto you, trying to keep you from freezing, maybe when I stood in your home and watched you light the candles, but somewhere along the line you became mine." He smiles at her. "Mine in a way you didn't used to be. Shifted from being someone I treated like a daughter to my daughter. And I'll try to do a better job about not pissing you off with it, but I've done this once, and I'm not doing it again."

Ziva looked at the closed album on his lap, snuggled in a little closer to Gibbs, but being careful of his knee. "How about we make a deal? I will do what I can to keep you from burying another daughter. But you will do whatever you can to keep me from burying another father?"

Gibbs smiled at her, kissed her forehead again, and said, "Deal."

Chapter End Notes

I'm not a Jibbs shipper. Never really got it. So, I've got a question for my Jibbs shippers. At the beginning of Season Three until the middle of Season Four, both of them were single. They were obviously attracted to each other. They liked each other. They had a history. Neither of them ever gave a shit about any rule that wasn't currently serving their purposes. Why do you think they didn't get back together?
When he was in school the first time, Gibbs hated homework. There were so many other things he wanted to do and being buried in books or writing essays just wasn't on the list.

Part of what he liked about the idea of the military was that he'd be done with homework.

There are times when he laughs at how he thought that.

The Marines was tons of homework, sure not a whole lot of it was bookwork (at first), but there was some, and though he was naturally handy, he did have to practice to get drills down and his rifle mastered, and all the rest of it.

And sniper school… As he told Tim, half of it is pulling the trigger. The other half… The other half is math. (Okay, technically physics, but still, it's math.) Hard math. Hard math you tried to get done ahead of time (like the rest of the snipers he carried around a small notebook with his calculations in it) but if something shifted, which is often the case with combat sniping, sometimes you've got to calculate a trajectory on the fly, in your head, under pressure, while taking wind readings, distance readings, and deciding which gun or bullet to use. And you fucking can't be wrong.

It was a ton of work. Work he liked, but there were still a lot of days when he felt like his brain was going to melt.

He can remember Shannon rubbing his shoulders as he sat at the kitchen table, staring at the book, willing himself to shove just one more fact into his head. Then she stepped away for a moment, and came back, with a Q-tip. "Here."

He leaned back in the chair and rubbed his eyes; she snuggled in closer. "What sort of break do you suggest?"

She smiled at him warm and saucy. "I know what I'd like, but how about you eat something first, before you get cranky on top of burned out." She kissed him one more time, standing up, taking away the coffee cup sitting next to him. "Man can't live on coffee alone, Gibbs."

He's sitting at his kitchen table, cup of coffee next to him, pad of paper in front, pen in hand, looking at a piece of paper that says: Dream Home: Steps.

Tactical planning. Great. Somehow he has the feeling that what he's got on the first page (crumpled up and tossed out) meet woman, get to know her, fall in love, move in together, isn't exactly a plan.

After all, if Eisenhower had said: Land in France, defeat Germans, win the war, everyone else would have laughed him out of the room.
The jump from Gunnery Sergeant to Master Sergeant is a pretty big one. One he had been hoping to make. And as such, he kept hitting the books.

They'd been hinting that come the end of the ground war in Iraq, he'd be up for Master Sergeant.

But that didn't happen.

And, for a while, when he was floundering in the dark during the months between killing Hernandez and heading back to see Mike Franks again, the idea that he'd ever have enough interest in anything, let alone a new job, seemed ridiculous.

But he did eventually wander over to see Franks.

And Mike looked up at him from the paperwork on his desk, looked him up and down, and said, "Back, huh?"

Gibbs nodded.

"I can use ya. Ya don't waste good, and yer good." Then he wrote down FLETC and a phone number. "Gotta go back to school first. Shouldn't have any trouble getting in. Gettin' out's a different story, but if ya get out, and I've got a job for ya."

FLETC felt a lot more like high school than he was hoping. But it was… distracting. It was different. New place, new people, new jobs. It was a goal. And he got through. (It was harder than he was expecting. He was used to memorizing regulations, did lots of that in the Marines. And the physical requirements were way easier than the Corp. Plus he could out shoot the instructor. Most of the skills he didn't have any issues with, and honestly, evasive driving was a lot of fun. Civil liberties law was a different subject, though… Possibly because he wasn't naturally inclined to being sympathetic to the rights of the accused. When he realized he was going to get yanked out on the psych evals if he couldn't fake it, he learned to fake it. That was also when he realized that if he talked about Shannon and Kelly, he wasn't going to be able to fake it. So he stopped talking about them.)

Few years later, he was in Okinawa with Franks, so he learned Japanese. More work, more hours spent with books and ear phones and listening to tapes over and over. But it ate up time, and it was useful. And it meant that everyone else learned he could pick up a new language pretty quickly. So, in '96, when Franks had his own, I can't take this anymore moment, Gibbs got a new Probie to go with Burley, a new set of assignments, tickets to Paris, and a copy of Rosetta Stone: French. (And then there was Russian. He picked up a bit of German, too.)

So, it's true that it's been more than ten years since he's done any sort of real homework assignments. And he hasn't worried about being graded on something and not passing muster since he was sixteen, sitting in his English Literature class, getting called on to give a speech about Messianiac figures in Red Badge of Courage.

But the paper in front of him is blank. And 'Meet woman' just isn't going to cut it.

When he got to the Corp, when there was finally a concrete goal (Private First Class was the first of them.) Gibbs had no problem doing the work he needed (and more on top of it) to get the gold star.
And staring at the blank page, he's thinking that he might have an easier time looking at this from the point of view of what he's already done.

It's easier to criticize a plan than it is to come up with one in the first place.

So he got up, poured himself some more coffee, poured a slug of bourbon in it, sat back down, and started to write down how he went about getting his various exes.

He met Hannah at a bar. Not that unusual. Those days he met lots of women at bars. (As Ducky said, back in the day Gibbs was a lot like Tony.) And those days, less than two months out of FLETC, nothing much to do when he wasn't working, too burnt to even woodwork. (Kept destroying the projects he tried to start.) Gibbs spent most of his free nights, sometimes with Franks, sometimes without, at bars, sucking down bourbon, looking to get laid.

He didn't plan to get her name, or number, or anything beyond the use of her body for an hour or so, but her hair was red, and her laugh light, and the perfume... It wasn't the same, but it was similar, and if he closed his eyes, (or, as it turned out, if he was behind her) it was close enough.

And for a little while he felt better. Or, at least, the pain dulled down some.

So, he did get her name, and he did get her number, and he did call the next day to see if she'd like some dinner sometime.

And she did.

They made it two years, longer than either of the other two, but he started hunting a serial killer, pulling further and further into the case, seeing more and more haunted faces of victims' families, more and more parents who'd lost their children, parents he wasn't saving from this pain.

He worked until he dropped, worked until Mike started sending him home, but he couldn't go home, couldn't talk about it, so he headed back to the bar, to more bourbon and more women.

By the time he got out of it, by the time he killed the man, he was alone again.

And, honestly, he didn't mind.

Diane was all heat and fire. He doesn't even remember where they met. (She does. And she's still pissed that he doesn't.) He does remember seeing her and the feeling of heat. How time and space sort of slipped away as dark, primitive, sexual heat swelled between them.

He remembers the sparks in her eyes.

The passion in the way she teased him, and how he teased back. How he wanted to tease her back.

And the blinding scorch of slipping into her body.

He remembers how that heat pulled him out of the dull, moving-through-fog sensation of depression. He remembers how looking forward to seeing her, fucking her, arguing with her, just being with her, was the first thing he had enjoyed, genuinely enjoyed, in years.

And if Hannah was the first time the pain stopped, Diane was the first brush of actual pleasure.
But it wasn't enough. Fondness wasn't enough. Great sex wasn't enough.

She was smart. She knew he didn't love her. She knew there was a core of him she couldn't touch. Didn't know why. And when she found out…

When erotic heat turned to anger, and she burned just as hot in that direction.

He does remember where he met Stephanie. Beautiful, classic, enticing Stephanie, olive on a toothpick between her teeth, nibbling gently.

Vodka martini. Why not? They were in Moscow. And again, it was a bar, and again, red hair, slim build, beautiful eyes, and a whiff of something that smelled like home.

They'd been married for two months when the case took him back to Paris. He and Jen went. Stephanie hated the fact that his partner was a woman (especially another slim redhead with long hair and green eyes) and loathed that there was a part of his life she'd never touch, but that Jen got to be part of every day.

She begged him to take Burley. He wouldn't budge. It was going to be him and Jen. Two guys roaming around Paris looked weird. A man and a woman, romantic city, they'd blend better.

By the time he got back to Moscow, four months later, the thing with Jen had started and ended, and he never said anything about it, but Stephanie knew.

They moved back to the States a month after that.

For six months their relationship limped along. He buried himself in work, picked up a new partner from Baltimore, and he fucked other women, and she slept with other men, and she screamed at him, hit him with a baseball bat, and practically set fire to the house, but when it came down to it, she couldn't hurt him the way he hurt her, because really, he just didn't care.

(He still feels guilty about that.)

"You wanna work with me? You gotta learn the rules."

"The rules?" Jenny Shepard, or, as he was calling her, Probie, said.

"Yeah, got a lot of them. Number one, 'Never screw your partner."

Jen smiled up at him, wicked glint in those beautiful green eyes. "Never? How painfully limiting."

And he knew he was lost. He made it two and a half years between Jen being made his Probie, and then Partner, and not once did he touch her, or beyond some mild flirting, step out of line. Because he knew where it'd go if he did.

But they were in Paris, and the cover was a couple, (and God, he knew he was playing with fire when he set that up, knew it was going to end how it ended, but he did it anyway.) and somehow pretending stopped being pretending. (Or maybe the we're-just-co-workers was the pretend part, and the couple was real.) Somehow a dinner out to keep an eye on suspects turned into a real dinner when he never showed, and dinner turned into a romantic walk (where they were supposedly scouting the turf ahead of time) and somehow that ended up with them in bed and her fingernails leaving trails down his back.

Four months later the op was done, and so were they.

She was kind about it. They'd done so well on the mission she'd been offered a post, a team, of her own, (some sort of liaison work with Mossad or something) and she was taking it. He was to go back to DC, take their Medical Examiner with him, work with Burley until he had a start on a new team, at least one new hire, and then Burley would head for Agent Afloat assignments.

And in the end, she kissed his cheek, wished him well, and he was annoyed because even though he wasn't in love with her, he did really like her, and she was a great partner, and… That was bullshit.

It hurt to get left, and that was the beginning and end of it, she was leaving him.

But the part of him that remembered he had a wife in Moscow, and more importantly, one in the grave, knew he'd never be more than deeply fond of Jenny Shepard, and she deserved better than that.

He went back to Moscow, no idea what to say or do about Stephanie, but his rules had changed, and he added one more: Number 12: Don't date your partner, because obviously Number 1 hadn't been specific enough.

"When the case is done, let it go." Mike said that to him, over and over and over.

The case was done. Or should have been. But this one did go to trial, and Elizabeth had been one of the technical witnesses. She was a banker, worked for First Columbia, and had been instrumental in letting them know enough about how check fraud worked so they could catch the guy.

The job was over. He'd let it go.

And then bumped into her at the courthouse.

Twice.

Tall, slim build, curly red hair, fire in her eyes. Yeah, he was interested. So, he asked her out for coffee. She gave his wedding ring a long, pointed look. He saw her check it, noticed the one on her finger.

"Is it a problem?" he asked.

She shook her head. "For you?"

He shook his head and offered her his hand.

"Coffee" ended up being a motel four streets down.

They'd meet a few times a month. Mostly for stress relief. She'd pick him up from work when she had a bad day. Occasionally he'd pick her up when he'd had one. She never saw his home. He never saw hers. They usually made it to a hotel or motel, but occasionally they took advantage of the fact that her car was a convertible.

Drove Tony, and eventually Kate, and after another year Tim, bonkers that they never even got her name. Just, the mysterious red-head they'd occasionally see give Gibbs a lift at the end of a long day.
One day, not long after they met, he stopped wearing his ring. Another day, two years later, she stopped wearing hers.

They never talked about it.

Eventually she told him she'd gotten a new job in Miami. She didn't ask for anything. Didn't indicate he had any choice in the matter. It was a good job, better pay, more power, she was going. She was not inviting him to come along. (Though if he ended up down there on a case, he was welcome to look her up.)

He wished her luck, and genuinely meant it.

And for a year after, he'd think about her on occasion, and miss her.

"When the case is done, let it go."

Mike said it. He said it. He had it written down and tucked into his box of rules.

There's an unwritten one in there, too. "When the relationship is done, let it go."

So, of course, the new Director of NCIS was Jenny. He didn't play the politics close enough to even know she was in the running. (Best he knew twenty years of service was a requirement for the job, and she didn't have it. He doesn't know if they bent that for her, or if it was just an NCIS legend.)

She was still beautiful, still driven, still... everything... she'd been in Paris.

And now she was his Boss.

The attraction was still there. The desire hadn't been lessened by time apart. If anything the fact that she was his Boss, that it was forbidden, made it even hotter. But she had bigger goals than him, and the fact that he liked her, that he enjoyed her, that he wanted her body under his, (and for some reason, probably because she was his boss, in all the fantasies he was on top) and could still remember the taste of her skin slick with sweat and cum, still didn't mean he was in love.

So, he enjoyed the flirtation, he enjoyed playing the power games with her. He enjoyed their relationship in a way that was probably quite a bit more sexual than it needed to be, but wasn't sexual enough to cross the line.

And it felt like a punch in the gut when he watched her play DiNozzo, watched her wrap him in a similar web of sexual intrigue when she thought he wasn't looking.

But that's who she was, driven, and she'd use any tool, break any rule, do whatever was necessary, screw the consequence to get what she wanted.

And when she died, he lit a candle for her, too.

Maybe he and Hollis had had a chance.

Probably not.

But, sometimes, he likes to think, that... maybe...
Okay, she said she'd done a profile on him. He assumed (Stupid. Don't assume.) that meant that she already knew about Shannon and Kelly. (After all, Ziva's profile had included that.)

Turned out she didn't. So, of course, she never brought it up, because she didn't know. And he never brought it up, because he never voluntarily talked about it.

By the time she found out, they'd been together for almost nine months, long time to not mention something like that.

He couldn't say to her 'I thought you knew.'

And she couldn't say 'Can you move on from this? Can we do this?'

So they didn't. He found her listening to the recording in his basement. She looked up at him, so sad, and he sort of did that little shrug thing he does, and she shook her head, and next thing he knew, she was moving to Hawaii.

Sometimes he wishes he'd called her. Or taken some damn time off and gone to her. But he's fairly sure it would have ended badly. Or as Tony said, 'We just met the fourth ex-Mrs. Gibbs."

And he's out of the new ex-wife business.

Long time between Hollis and Susan. Long time before he found a spark that lit more than passing interest. Not that Hart or Ryan weren't fond of him. Not that he wasn't fond of them. But… They never really got past friendly sex.

Susan though… She was different. Less challenging. He likes women that stand up to him, that challenge him, and she did, but there was a sweetness there…

Diane was all sharp corners and edges, the razor-edged cuts he needed to feel alive then. Jen used her attractiveness to underscore her upper hand. For her, sexuality was a tool that she used to make sure the men under her obeyed. Hollis was that same drive and need to do the job he had. And all of them stood up to him, teased him, kept him on his toes, made him toe the line, and he adored it.

Susan was… gentle. What do they call them, Steel Magnolias? Those lovely, polite, gentle southern women who'll go to hell and back and enjoy the trip rather than let you screw them over? Yeah. Something like that.

But she was from Michigan, so maybe not.

However it worked, sometimes she'd just give him a look, and he'd know she was drawing a line just to see if he'd cross it.

And he liked that.

He liked her.

Even brought her home. Introduced her to the family. Told her about Shannon and Kelly before it could become an issue.

And six months on, he still liked her. Really liked her.

But she still wasn't Shannon, and he didn't feel that way about her.
And in the end, he wants more than just a pleasant companion to end his days with. And she was never going to be much more than that.

It was close to three in the morning when he finished writing. Most of it was just what he remembered about his ladies, how he met them, good bits, bad bits, very bad bits.

On the page on top was a list.

Dream Home: Plan

Meet woman.
-Not in a bar
-Not redhead.

Common ground good (cop, military) but not required.

Get to know her.

Let her get to know you.

Talk. Women like words, so talk to her.

-Don't hide Kelly or Shannon.

-Don't hide cases.

Introduce her to family. See if they like her.

Take it slow.

Get to know her family. (See if you like them.)

Reassess and go from there.
This time, he brought two cups of coffee.

“Planning on settling in?” Cranston asks as she sees him unpack them from his go bag.

“Ran out last time.”

“And we wouldn’t want you to go half an hour sans coffee.”

He nods definitively, and then handed over the nine pages (back and front) paper-clipped together.

“You really are aiming for the gold star, aren’t you?” she says, unclipping them as she sits down.

He sits down, flashes her a look that might have been wry, or possibly flirty, she isn’t entirely sure, maybe sarcastic might have been in there, too, and says, “Hoo Rah, Ma’am.”

She laughs. “I wasn’t expecting this much. Give me a few minutes, let me read the… plan. Is this…” Her eyes scan the pages. “Okay, sixteen pages of your different last times, and one page of plan. Let me read the plan. We’ll work on that first.”

It doesn’t take her long to get through the tenish lines of his plan. As he takes a sip of his first coffee, she says, “Do you think, maybe there might be an even earlier first step?”

He looks at her blankly.

“How do you feel about taking that ring off? Wearing it again is recent, right?”

“Yeah, since after Susan.”

“Ah.” She makes a note, flips through the pages, and sees Susan’s the last of the ladies.

“Ah, what?”

“I want to know the story behind that. I don’t want to distract from how you feel about taking it off. We’ll get to why you’re wearing it again sooner or later.” He doesn’t say anything, so she nudges him a little with, “Well…”

He extends his fingers, looking at the ring. “Not a clothes guy. Not a jewelry guy.” He taps his watch. “Have had this for fifteen years. I probably won’t bother with a new one when it dies; phone tells time just as well. I’ve got a box in the sock drawer filled with medals. Shannon put them in the box, collected them. I never cared about it. The ribbons, sure, they go on the uniform. But the medals? Couldn’t care less. Tony’s got something like six other ones in his desk.” He touches his ring again, tapping his thumb against the underside of it. “This and the uniform are the only things I ever wanted to wear. Only symbols that I wanted to carry on my body.”

“Marine, husband, and father were who you wanted to be. No symbol for Kelly?”

He shrugs. “Didn’t do stuff like that, then.” He taps the ring again. “This was it. My life, Shannon’s, and a promise to shelter and love any lives we made.”

She nods, understanding that. “You took the uniform off intentionally.”

“Yeah.”
“How about the ring? Tell me about taking it off the first time.”

He’s staring at it, rubbing it around his finger. “Night before I left for FLETC. You wear the ring, people ask questions. I didn’t want to answer them. I yanked it off, put it in the box with the medals, buried it under my socks.” He feels like he maybe should mention how he kept waking up that night, feeling it gone, how he almost got up to put it back on, but he doesn’t. He gets the sense from how she’s looking at him that she knows there’s more than what he just said.

“And no one asked if you were married?”

“No one asked much of anything.”

Cranston smiles. “I take it you weren’t exactly easy to talk to in FLETC?”

Gibbs nods, small smile on his face. “Wasn’t the first place I heard the second B was for bastard, was the most often.”

“I can imagine. Make any friends?”

“No.”

“All work all the time?”

“Yeah. If I wasn’t sleeping or in class, my head was in a book. I had the highest graduating score from FLETC for the DC Branch until Tim showed up.”

That also gets an amused smile, but there’s a bit of edge to the smile, a silent, back on track, Jethro.

He shrugs. “I don’t know how I feel about taking it off. I don’t intend to wear it forever. I know there’s an end to this. But I don’t want to take it off, yet.”

She nods at that. It’s honest, and that’s a solid place to start. “You’ll take it off when it feels right?”

“I guess.”

“Any idea what feels right might be?”

“No.” And he doesn’t. It’s not time yet. It will be time eventually. Beyond that, he doesn’t know. But, he’s thinking this might, maybe, help speed up getting to eventually.

“But you’re good with ‘feels right?’ That’s a natural way for you to deal with issues.”

He nods.

“The infamous ‘gut’ I heard so much about back in the day.”

“Yeah.” He can imagine what she might have heard about that. Then something else occurs to him. “Shannon liked that. She had rules for everything. I just kind of went with it. We worked on that, together. I got more rules; she got more gut. Met in the middle, both of us got better for it.”

Rachel nods at that, and makes a quick note about it. Then gets back to her first question. “So, are you going to take it off as step one?”

“Probably a good idea. Woman who doesn’t care if I’m married isn’t a good plan.”

She nods in agreement with that. “Probably not. Not if the goal is to build a home with someone. So why did you put it back on?”

“After Susan. Tim told me I wasn’t done being married, so I should still be wearing the ring. And, that made a lot of sense, so I went upstairs, got it, and put it back on.”

“Still in the box with the medals hidden under the socks?”

He nods.

“You were willing to talk to Tim about that?”

“I was being enough of an asshole when I broke it off with Susan that he and Tony decided I needed a bottle of alcohol poured into me to get over it. He drew the short straw and ended up administering it.”

“And let me guess, you and Tony would have just gotten wasted, but Tim got you talking, too?”

“I think so. Something about wakes and telling stories. It’s a blurry night. But I still remembered putting the ring on once I stopped wishing to die from the hangover.”

She chuckles a little at that, clearly imagining it. Gibbs finds himself smiling. She really is amazingly easy to talk to. Of course, that probably makes this job a lot easier. He makes a quick note to remember that this is her job, that she’s a professional, and just because this is comfortable and she’s female doesn’t mean he needs to get interested in her.

“How does it feel to be wearing it again?”

He thinks about it. “Good. Once the ‘You get married again?’ stuff died down. Got a call from Susan two weeks later about how she’d gotten several extremely awkward congratulations from people who’d seen me wearing the ring.”

“Difficult conversation?”

He’s had way worse. “Uncomfortable. She thought it was a good idea, but… She was so sad for me, and that hurt. She was hurting for me, and I’m the jerk who can’t get out of his own past enough to do right by her, love her the way she should be loved. And I felt bad about sticking her in an awkward situation. And… it was really quiet on my end of the phone.”

The look on Cranston’s face is gentle and knowing. “I’d imagine. So, how long has it been since you’ve been on a date?”

“Since January of ’14.”

“Longest time on your own since…”

“Since before I started dating Shannon.”

She wasn’t expecting that. “How long between Shannon’s death and your next girlfriend?”

He was about to answer when he realized they may not be talking about the same thing. “Girlfriend or hookup?”

That answer gets a very curious look out of Rachel. “Is there a difference?”

“Big one.”
“Both then.”

“Four months for a hook up. Hannah was the first girlfriend, and that was a little over two years. That was part of the reason I was hitting the bars so hard that week, it was the anniversary.”

“Why did you go back to dating so fast?”

He shakes his head. Not sure if this is her not really getting him, not really getting men, or if she’s being euphemistic, or if she’s trying to get him to put it all out there. “Wasn’t dating. Just screwing.”

“Ah. Did you find what you were looking for?”

“Got off. Didn’t hurt for a few seconds. That was all I was aiming for.”

“Really?” There’s that look, curious, wanting to dig deeper, and he can feel there’s more she’s looking for here, but he’s not getting what it might be. After all, he doesn’t feel like this is an issue that’s got any real depth to it. He wanted to get laid. He got laid. This isn’t rocket science.

“Yeah.” He’s nodding, still not sure where she wants to take this.

“Like you said last time, now-a-days you can scratch that itch for yourself. What changed? Why seek out another person?”

He looks at her curiously--It’s a good question. Why was he looking for another person? Not like he wanted any sort of company; he practically sprinted out of the room the second they were done.--sips his coffee, and sips it again. He hasn’t thought about that, or any of this, not in any depth for a very long time, so it’s taking him a while to remember who he was back then. (Let alone this aspect of who he was, because it’s not the sort of thing he dwells on.)

Finally he puts it back together. “On my own, I’d think about her. Too much. Thought about her with other women, too, but less. Easier to focus on here and now if there’s a real woman there.”

“Could you get off on your own?” She asks it completely deadpan, staring him right in the eyes.

“No.” He shakes his head and looks away. “Not for close to three years. Couldn’t even get it up on my own for the first year. Too sad.”

“So, for a while, other women were a distraction and a release you couldn’t find on your own?”

“No.” He shakes his head and looks away. “Not for close to three years. Couldn’t even get it up on my own for the first year. Too sad.”

“Yeah. Guess so. A way to get out of my head for a little bit.”

She nods at that, index finger pressed to her temple, looking like she was putting something together. “And was Hannah the first time you got past not hurting?”

“No. Just the first time I managed to make it last for more than a minute at a time.”
“So, why did you go back to screwing so fast?”

He’s not sure what she’s asking. So he gives her that curious look, fairly certain they just covered this.

She sees the confusion. “Why was that your distraction of choice?”

“It wasn’t. Work was my distraction of choice. But work didn’t last all day every day. And we didn’t have hot cases every day. Bourbon was my second choice, filled the hours between cases. Sex came in third.”

“You build boats and do woodworking, right?”

“Yeah.”

“But you didn’t then?”

“I tried. That used to be how I got out of my head, got calm and focused. But I couldn’t do it. You’ve got to feel the wood, figure out what it wants to be, coax it gently into shape. Go at it hard, and it splinters. Those days I’d touch wood, and it’d shatter in my hands. But bourbon doesn’t care. Drink it hard, drink it slow, drink it steady, drink it fast. Bourbon’s happy with all of it.”

Rachel nods at that. “Anything besides women and bourbon?”

“Like harder drugs?”

She nods. “Everything here is confidential, and anything like this, I don’t write down or keep notes on. Even if I got a court subpoena, nothing illegal will be in my notes. So, yeah, harder drugs, cutting, picking fights, adrenaline junkie? How were you medicating yourself?”

“No harder drugs, I’m not sure what cutting is, and yeah, I drove like a maniac and picked fights, and scared the shit out of the guys I took in and took risks that no one else would even dream of. It was the early nineties, NCIS got the bottom of the barrel when it came to investigative talent, and I closed cases. Otherwise they would have canned my ass so fast, I’d have never made it past Probie. I’ve got Death Wish in my files from those days, and Mike and I didn’t have an easy time finding other partners because we did have a reputation as the two guys most likely to end up dead.”

This also makes Rachel look interested. “Mike enabled you in this?”

Gibbs smiles. “Mike was a cowboy of the old style. Go in guns blazing, shoot first, ask questions later, take the bad guys in dead or alive. He had a partner, Vera, who kept him toned down some. Kept me in line, too. But she got her own team, and then it was just the two of us. I don’t even want to count how many times we should have died once she left.”

“Did you like her?”

“Yeah.”

“Romantically?”

“No. More like a big sister. Half the time she was annoying me, making sure I’d do things like eat. Half the time she was treating me like… Like the Probie I was.”

Rachel nods. “Tell me about the first hook up.”

“What about it?”
“Anything.”

“I was drunk, and probably awfully sad looking, and she and her buddies were having a divorce party. I was a guy with a pulse and a dick and still sober enough to sit upright. Still wearing the ring. She didn’t notice or care. I guess I was pretty enough she thought I’d be fun.”

“We’re you?”

“No.” He shakes his head. It was certainly the most depressing sex of his life, and he can’t imagine it was one of her better encounters. “And I felt like shit after. Wanted to peel my skin off felt so dirty. For a few seconds there, I wasn’t hurting. And I didn’t deserve not hurting.”

“But you did it again?”

“Yeah, few months later.”

“Did you need to be drunk to hook up?”

“Yeah. Tried sober a few times. Didn’t work.”

“Didn’t work physically or…”

“Never got far enough to find out if it worked physically when I was sober. Sober, I’d shoot down any woman that got within talking range.”

“Were you sober a lot?”

“I was reliably sober, hung over maybe, but sober, every minute I was at work, and every minute we were on call. I was not reliably sober at any other time for the first two years.”

“Are you an alcoholic, Jethro?”

He shrugs. He probably was then. He might be one now. He does know that he prefers dealing with sad, uncomfortable, or tense if he’s got some alcohol in him. He’s certain that if he did find himself in emotional trouble again, he’d start drinking like a fish again. He also knows that one drink doesn’t mean he has to finish the bottle. And he knows that right now, he doesn’t crave alcohol. Doesn’t find himself thinking about the next drink at 4:30 in the afternoon the way he did back when he was first working with Mike and they were having a paperwork day.

“Unless I had a case to focus on, I wouldn’t have been able to go a night without a drink, and usually closer to five, back then. Smoked, too. After Hannah, I got to the point where I could do some woodworking without breaking anything my hands touched.” He rolls up his left sleeve and shows off a long, thin scar on his forearm, and several other small ones on his hands. “Woodworking with hand tools halfway into a bottle of Jack isn’t a good plan if you don’t like scars.” He doesn’t say anything, but she can see that they’re all old and faded. There are a few fresh scratches, but they’re from the explosion, and small enough they won’t scar. “I have about four drinks a week now, usually two of them are wine at Shabbos. Haven’t smoked since… 2002? 2004? It’s been a while.”

“Are there any aspects of your life that aren’t healthier now than they used to be?”

“Can’t think of any.”

“Good.”

She looks at his list. “So, I’m guessing ‘Meet woman, not in a bar, not red hair’ is you noticing that never worked well.”

Another nod.

“’Common ground, good.’ What does that mean?”

“Just that it’s easier with someone who gets it.”

She taps the pages in front of her, obviously hasn’t had the chance to read them, but wants to know more. “The one that worked best, that you got closest with? Did she get it?”

“Yeah. Hollis. Light colonel. Army CID. Ran her own team.”

“Female version of you?”

“Nah, that’s Borin, and we know we’re too much alike to even try.”

Rachel makes note of that, too. “How did common ground make things easier?”

“She understood I couldn’t make really solid plans. She got why I wasn’t affectionate in front of my team, or hers for that matter. She knew that sometimes I needed to bury myself in the basement and work on the boat until I got it out. She knew that sometimes I needed to be at work all day and all night and all the next day because the bad guys were still out there.”

“Some of the other women have issues with that?”

“Yeah. Part of what killed Hannah and I. Worst possible case they could have put me on. Serial killer going after kids. And she didn’t know about my girls. Didn’t know why I couldn’t pull out of it. Stephanie didn’t like the fact that the job came first, either.” He doesn’t mention that part of what she didn’t like about the job coming first was the job meant Jen, but Rachel’ll read those pages and get to know that soon enough.

Rachel nods, puts a note about that on her paper, and asks, “What does ‘Get to know her’ mean?”

“Stop looking for Shannon. Get to know the woman who’s actually there. Stop trying to shove her into a mold she was never meant to fit.”

“Very good advice.”

“’Let her get to know you/Talk/Tell her about Shannon and Kelly/Tell her about cases’ all seem related. Tell me about that.”

The smiles. “Did you know Tony calls me a functional mute?”

She nods. “I heard that somewhere along the line.”

“Let me guess, you heard some other things about me not talking?”

“On occasion.” She’s got a smile that puts him in mind of Kate very intensely right now.

“In the job I find out all about everyone else, but they don’t get to find out about me.”

“You like that, don’t you?”

“Yeah. It’s safe. And…” he looks up, self-depreciating smile on his face “I’ve been told by various wives and girlfriends, that I can be awfully charming in a silent and mysterious sort of way—“
“No!”

He laughs a little, appreciating the shocked look on her face. “Yes. Rumor has it I was awfully pretty once upon a time, too.”

That gets a gentle smile and a little laugh. “You’re still pretty.”

“I’m pretty old.”

“That happens to all of us who are still up and moving around. So…”

“So, I found that I could be silent, and charming, and attractive, and keep all of me inside me. And women like Hannah would fall in love with the image. And Diane fell in love with the challenge, and the hints of what might have been under there. I don’t know if Stephanie actually loved me or not. She doesn’t hate me anymore, so that’s a step in the right direction, I guess. There are seven women on that list, and only one of them ever knew my whole story.”

“But that one didn’t work?”

“No. Susan and I parted friends. I don’t think she wanted to break it off, but… I knew it wasn’t going to happen, and by the time we got done talking, she could feel it, too.”

“’Introduce her to your family.’”

“Yeah. These days they’re part of the deal. Won’t even try with a woman they don’t like.”

Rachel nods, makes a mark of that, and asks, “What does slow mean?”

“I don’t know, but I do know I’ve gone from first date to engaged to married to divorced in less time than any of my boys took to go from first date to married.”

“That’s fast.”

“Yeah. And it didn’t work all that well.”

“Slow, then. ‘Get to know her family?’”

“If she’s old enough to be interesting to me, she’s got family. She’s probably divorced or widowed. Likely has kids. Maybe has grandkids. I don’t want to be the step-dad from hell.”

“How old are you thinking?”

“Within ten years of my age? I don’t know. She won’t be twenty-two.” That triggers a memory.

“Okay, I do know, she will not be younger than Tony. He’d never shut up about it if I tried that.”

“Sounds like there’s a story there?”

“He’s had more than a few step-moms over the years, and I think he was twenty-one when his dad married the first one that was younger than he was.”

Rachel winces.

“Yeah.”

“’Reassess?’”
“Take the time to find out if it’s actually going the way I think it is. Jimmy and Tim are really good at being married. Get their input. See how they think it’s going.”

“Sounds like a solid plan, Jethro.” She checks her clock. “So, that’s it for session two. You’re ready to go back to work, if that’s all you want out of this.” Rachel just let that hang.

“And if I don’t?” Gibbs asks, quietly.

“Then I’ve got another assignment for you.”

“Oh, great.”

She smiles at his put upon expression. “You talk about these women with obvious affection, but you tell me you didn’t love them. Next up: what does it mean to be in love?”

Gibbs slouches and gives her his best are you fucking kidding me? look.

She’s smiling again, this time you can do this, in her expression. “No, no joke. Can’t find what you’re looking for if you don’t know what it is. Like with planning, if it’s easier to go at it by looking at what didn’t work, take Hollis and Susan, those are the two least complicated and most recent,” she decides to hazard a guess, “Only two where you weren’t actively depressed?” He nods. He was coming out of it by the time things ended with Elizabeth, but he certainly was when they started. “Come up with what was missing. What is love, and what wasn’t there with them to make it love?”

He rolls his eyes a bit, shakes his head, and starts to stand up. “Monday mornings good for you?”

“Yes, Jethro. This time works fine. If you want to make this even easier, come up with your answer, and email it to me ahead of time. That way I can read it, and we can talk about it.”

He nods, then turns and heads out.

An hour later, he hobbled into the bullpen. Tim didn’t look surprised to see him, but he wouldn’t, Rachel’s email would have gotten there way before he did. He just nodded, waited for Gibbs to get settled, and then took half of the pile of paperwork off of his desk, and a third of what was on Draga’s and plopped it on his.

“Paperwork day.”

“Great.”

An hour later, when Draga wandered off in search of drinks for them, Tim headed over again, half sitting against Gibbs’ desk.

“You gonna see her again?”

Gibbs nodded.

Tim gave his shoulder a squeeze. “Good.”
Monday night, Gibbs finishes his dinner, washes up his plate, puts it on the drying rack, and heads back to his cup of coffee and pad of paper.

He’d been doodling on it, just sort of thinking about what love meant. Not coming up with much of anything that made any sense, either on the paper or in his head.

Then it hits him. He can’t email a piece of paper.

And he’s not doing this on his phone.

He’s certainly not doing this at work. No way in hell any of this goes near work.

So… he needs a computer. At home.

On Tuesday, they do more paperwork. He eyeballs Tim and Draga’s laptops between filling out forms.

Tim’s got… three of them… maybe, (he’s not sure if the tiny one is a laptop or something else). Draga’s got one on his desk, one in his lap, and seems to be using both of them to research something to fill out one of the reports with.

He knows NCIS will give you a laptop if you request one for field work.

But he doesn’t want one for field work. He doesn’t want to do work on it at all.

He’s not above the occasional misappropriation of government resources, but requesting a laptop just for personal use rankles. And he’d have to give it back once he retires.

He sends Tim a text. Busy after work?

Just heading home. Why?

Wanna get online at home. Can you make my computer do that?

Tim looks up from his phone, stares at Gibbs, a bit alarmed, and then texts, You mean that dinosaur in your attic that’s older than Draga? Yeah, I can get it online, but… What do you want to do with it? to him.

Write a document. Send email.

He can hear Tim sigh and sees him stare up at the ceiling.

Yes, I can make it do that. No, I’m not going to. It’d take hours, and I’ve got better ways to use my time. I will buy you one.

He stares across the bullpen at Tim, not saying anything, but that’s way too big of a present clear in his face.

I’m shopping. You’re paying. Pops up on his phone a few seconds later. Won’t cost much. And buying a new one will be way faster than getting what you’ve got set up to do anything more than collect dust.

A minute later he gets one more text from Tim.

Do you even have internet access at home?

Internet on my phone works fine.

Tim rolls his eyes. Because the phone has 4G. Who’s your cable carrier?

Verizon.

I’ll get it set.

Thursday. No excuses. He’s got wifi, a zippy new… something… it’s small and black and way faster than his computer at work.

He’s sitting at the kitchen table, Word open, screen blank and white, cursor blinking at him, waiting.

Love

He types it quickly, feeling the nicely springy action on the keyboard. Yeah, whatever else may be true, Tim knows computers.

Then he sits there, staring at it.

This might actually be worse than the blank page. One, single word just sitting there, all by it’s lonesome.

Three hours later, he’s still only got one word. He has, however, learned what each and every function on Word does. He’s put love into every one of the standard fonts. He now knows how to set up an outline or different templates. He can stick love in a box, underline it, attach notes, translate it, set it up with seventy different layouts, mail merge it, track changes to it, and footnote it.

What he hasn’t been able to do is come up with any other word to go with it.

He closes the laptop and goes to bed.

Friday, he gets home from Shabbos, glares at the computer, and heads down to his basement. He still can’t really do any work on the crib, but he can sketch.

Saturday morning. He’s once again in front of the computer, not typing.

He’s got a list of movies he wants to see on Netflix down. He’s checked his email nine times. He’s looked at plans for cribs, boats, frames, and boxes. He’s ogled hand-crafted woodworking tools, read reviews of three new stains, placed an order for wood he really doesn’t need (but it’s very pretty) and has been seriously thinking about a lathe.
He’s getting dangerously close to setting up a Facebook profile.

It’s occurring to him that not having an internet connection at home is a good thing.

An hour later he still hasn’t written another word.

Love Sitting there, all by itself, staring back at him.

Gibbs shuts the computer.

It’s not words. Not for him. It’s never been words. He can’t tell Rachel what love means because he doesn’t know, not in words.

Besides, what do they say, a picture’s worth a thousand words?

His phone has a camera on it. It’ll do.

Last year, after talking to Tim, he moved a few of the photo albums downstairs, as well as a few pictures of the three of them.

So, that’s where he starts.

He takes a snap of the one on his mantle, last shot of the three of them before he left. Next door neighbor took it. He’s in uniform, has his arms around his girls. His duffle was already in the car, and two minutes later they got on the road. There isn’t a picture of the last hugs, last kisses. But he knows it, can see it in his mind’s eye, he was holding Kelly up on one arm, so her face was up with theirs, other arm wrapped around Shannon, holding them both close. He gave Kelly a quick kiss and Shannon a longer, deeper one, (He can still hear Kelly going ‘EWWWW!’ at it.) and then let them go, shouldered his duffle, and got on the plane.

Week later he got a copy of that shot from Shannon. It’s the last picture he has of them.

He puts it back and gets a further out shot, showing that it’s flanked by the family triptych on the left, and a triptych he made for himself, baby pictures of Kelly, Molly, and again, Kelly.

He gets a closer shot of the triptych he made himself, showing that the frames are handmade, by him, carved so that other shots can be slotted in. As long as he’s willing to make more frames, he can keep growing this piece for as many babies as he ends up with. He carefully painted on each name, and realized that one newborn baby with sandy hair and blue eyes looks an awful lot like every other newborn baby with sandy hair and blue eyes, and unless he did more than just first names, it was going to look like he had two shots of the same girl. His Kelly is Kelly Beth. Tim and Abby’s Kelly is Kelly Marie, and once he did that, he decided that all the full names would go on. So in between the Kellys is Molly Keira. (He’s already got the next frame done, just waiting to find out what name’s going on it, and a picture to stick in it. And not to tempt fate or anything, but he’s got the wood he needs for two more.)

On the bookshelf next to the mantle he has three more albums. He limps over to them, grabbing them, and heads to his sofa to take pictures of pictures.
One is their wedding album, the other two are collections of family shots from after Kelly was born.

He holds their wedding album on his lap. He knows what’s in there, but besides showing those pictures to Abby, Ziva, and Breena shortly before Abby’s wedding, he hasn’t looked at it in a long time.

He inhales fast and lets it out slow, then opens the white leather cover with the embossed silver bells and the words Our Wedding on it.

The first shot is their hands. Shannon’s on top, showing off the engagement ring.

She’d been in school then, majoring in English Lit, minoring in photography, and she knew how she wanted this album to look, how it would start and end, so he sat with her, talking, joking, being told, (sternly) to stay still while she kept fiddling with her camera and the lenses and the lighting to make sure that everything looked perfect and that the diamond all but popped out of the picture it sparkled so brightly.

She sent him a copy of it once she got it developed the way she wanted. Some of the buddies laughed, but he liked it, he had to trim it a bit, but it fit in his wallet, and he kept it on him all the time, until he replaced it with the picture of her under the maple.

“She’s gonna love it, Gibbs.”

“Ya think?” he asked Matheson, tucking the ring back into his pocket.

And she nodded, warm smile on her face. “Oh yeah. She is.”

It was smaller than he wanted, but they were both practical people, and saving money for a home came before getting a big diamond ring.

So, it was small, but it was real, and the setting was red gold that made him think of her hair. And it was bigger than what he could have gotten in the States, (for once the exchange rate worked in his favor) but it wasn’t the sort of rock some of the other guys got for their girls.

“Can I ask you something?” Matheson said.

“Sure.” They were sitting next to each other on a picnic bench, enjoying a free afternoon in late February.

“You and Shannon ever…” she gave him a significant look. “Or, you gonna wait to get married?”

He blushed so red he could feel his pulse in his ears. “That’s none of… Why… We’re not talking about this.”

She laughed, sounding pretty happy as he kept sputtering away. “Calm down. Just, trying to be helpful, you know? You’re the only guy on this base with an actual girl you can talk to about this. A girl who’s done this. Who might be willing to provide useful information. So, take advantage of it. ”

Gibbs stopped sputtering, his eyes narrowed, and he said, “What kind of information?”

“The kind where you’ve got a clue so she has as much fun as you do.”

He was staring at her, horrified. Why wouldn’t Shannon have fun? Sure, he’d heard things about guys who were bad in the sack, and jokes around the Corp about wives leaving for other guys, but usually that seemed to center on not having a big enough dick or not lasting long enough. (He’d spent more than enough time in the showers with those assholes to know he had a big enough dick and wasn’t terribly worried about lasting long enough. He did just fine when they were making out.)

“Why wouldn’t she?” he asked, sounding, tentative.

Matheson fished around in her pocket and pulled out a dime. “You’re bigger than that, right?”

He nodded, eyes wide.

She gave him another knowing look.

“Oh.” Until that point in time he didn’t actually have any concrete idea what was really there. (Okay, even with the dime to help him understand scale, he still didn’t have a very good concrete idea of what was there.) He’d touched, over her panties, and seen Playboys, so he had a basic idea, but he tended to stay away from Penthouse, so explicit information of a particularly useful nature was few and far between.

“Yeah. Go slow. Go light. She doesn’t have a dick, so harder isn’t better, not at first anyway. Start with your fingers.” He was blushing again, and getting turned on at the idea of it, (which meant he had images of both her and Shannon in his head) and just really horrendously embarrassed, but also trying to pay attention because he did want to be good at it, and he did have an actual girl here who was willing to talk to him, so he might as well learn something, damn it! “Leave the lights on and actually look, so you can see what you’re doing. You didn’t learn to strip a rifle with your eyes closed in the dark, and trust me, a woman is a lot more complicated than that.”

He nodded; that made sense.

“She makes little happy noises when she’s kissing you, right?”

He didn’t want to comment on that, but he was sure she was asking for a good reason, and this was Matheson, and she didn’t blab, so… “Yeah.”

“She stops making those noises, she’s not having a good time anymore, go back to kissing and whatever else makes her make those noises.”

She looked at him for a long minute, and he wasn’t sure what that look meant, like she was testing him or something, but he didn’t know why or if he was passing. Eventually she said, very light blush on her cheeks, “You know what rug munching is?”

He nodded yes, but only in a very vague that-was-something-dykes did sort of way.

He was also sort of vague on what a dyke was, too, he knew they called Matheson one, a lot. (She’d just flip them off when that happened. Told him once that if she got pissed every time some asshole jarhead called her a dyke, she’d never have time for anything else.) He wasn’t entirely sheltered. He was a Marine Lance Corporal for God’s sake, so, he knew what a dyke was. But there’s knowing and then there’s knowing. And, like with rug munching, he didn’t know.

She was still staring at him, really looking, and then shook her head. “You don’t, not really, do you?”

He rolled his eyes. “I can figure out the basics from the name. I’m not stupid.”

She shoved his shoulder and smirked. “It’s just French kissing, but, you know, down there. It’s a good way to start. Anything she likes on her lips, she’ll like down there, too. And if you do it while you’re playing with your fingers, she’ll probably like it a whole lot, and if you do that first, it probably won’t matter much that you’re a whole lot wider around than a dime by the time you get to the fucking.”

His eyebrows had gone high for that. He wasn’t sure how the mechanics on that works.

“She gets looser?”

“No. But the more turned on she is, the better everything feels, and if you’ve got her turned on, she’s going to like it if you slip in slow and gentle like.”

“Really?”

“I did. And I really didn’t like it when I wasn’t turned on. Hurt like a fucking son of a bitch and I bled all over the place, so don’t do that to her.”

“Oh.” He’d heard about that, too, but from the bragging, popped her cherry so hard it burst perspective. He didn’t know bleeding was optional, and decided then and there that if it was, he didn’t want to do that to Shannon.

“Yeah. So, when are you gonna ask?”

“Next time I get enough liberty to get up there.”

She grinned at him, “Good.”

But he didn’t. The next time he had enough liberty to get up to Stillwater was two days after Matheson died, and he was too sad to ask.

The second shot is the engagement picture she took for the local paper. They’re standing facing each other, but looking at the camera, her hand on his chest, facing the camera as well, showing off the ring.

“Why are we doing this?” he remembers asking.

“When we’re old, we’ll want to remember it. It’ll be fun.” She sounded somewhere between exasperated that he wasn’t gung ho about this, and mildly amused that he was still heading toward his car to take her to her friend’s house (which had the gazebo and creek she wanted for the background) to take the picture anyway.

He wasn’t buying that at all, and his look to Shannon made that clear.

“Don’t look at me like that, Gibbs!”

“Fine!” He rolled his eyes and stuck his tongue out at her, putting the key into the ignition, getting ready to head to her friend’s house.

She blew a raspberry at him. “Let’s go have some fun.”

He was in uniform, she had on a pretty violet dress. It was summer, a few months after they had gotten engaged, a few months before the wedding. The only leave he had between getting engaged and getting married that was long enough for him to get back to Stillwater.
Spring when they got engaged. Early May. Week before the end of class for her, two weeks before finals.

Close to 03:00 when he got in. He wanted to go to Shannon’s but he couldn’t just head over there at three in the morning. So he headed home, back to his dad’s place.

Old man was still up, messing around with something, a soldering iron, and a pile of wires on the kitchen table.

“Leroy?”

“Hey, Dad.”

“You must have driven like a son of a bitch to get here that fast.” Lejeune to Stillwater was, usually, a fourteen hour ride. He’d done it in ten.

Gibbs shrugged. He got here. That’s all that mattered. He slung his duffle on the floor, and sat at the table next to his dad.

“Stayin’ long?”

“Got five days leave.”

Jackson touched the tip of his soldering iron to a tiny bit of metal. “And let me guess, you didn’t run here that fast to see me. Callin’ on your pretty lady as soon as you can?”

“Yeah, Dad. Grab some shut eye. See her after class tomorrow.”

“She knew you were gonna be in town?”

“Yeah.”

“Nice to see you tell someone.” Jack put the soldering iron down and looked at Jethro. Then he looked more, one eyebrow high. “Something special gonna happen?”

Gibbs nodded, staring his dad in the eye. “Got the news yesterday. Sniper school starts in January.”

His father nodded.

“It’s in California.”

He nodded again.

“Gonna have a chat with Mr. Fielding tomorrow.”

“Good. That’s the way you do it. Show her daddy you respect him and that you’re worthy to be part of his family.” Jackson smiled. “Planning on having a chat with her, too?”

“Yeah, I am.” Jethro smiled wide at that, and his dad did, too.

Jackson got up, headed into the kitchen, found another glass, and returned, pouring Jethro a shot of whiskey to go with the one he was working on. “Good, Leroy, good. That girl’s like sunshine and air for you, boy; she keeps you right.”
Jethro nodded.

“I don’t want you ever thinking I don’t like her, or I don’t approve.”

Gibbs could feel the massive ‘but’ coming at the end of that sentence. He took a swallow of the liquor Jackson had poured, small one, he liked whisky well enough, but it went to his head pretty fast. Things were always tricky with his dad, he didn’t need to add drunk to the troubles.

“But?”

“But you are both very, very young, and the world won’t end if you wait.”

Jethro rolled his eyes, starting to feel the anger build.

“Don’t get like that. She’s not done school. And you know she and her family want her to finish. You’ve been a Lance Corporal for less than a year. You’re barely twenty and she’s not going to be twenty until August.”

He was glaring at his dad by the end of that.

Jackson sighed, knowing that look, what it meant, and exactly how deaf a young man’s ears could get when he wanted to get married. “Look, you get married next week, I’ll be happy for you. But a year from now, two years from now, she’ll still be here. She loves you, son; she’s not going anywhere. Some more time to grow up won’t hurt either of you.”

That got a glare, too, and Jethro started to get up, not wanting to listen to more of this. Jackson put his hand on his wrist, and looked him in the eye, earnest. “You think I don’t know why you want to rush? Think I haven’t been where you are?” He shook his head and gave Jethro a very long look that got across everything he wasn’t saying, and then he went and said to make sure Jethro got it, “Think I wasn’t in love with the prettiest redhead on Earth and couldn’t wait to make her my wife?”

“Are you really going to tell me you wanted less time with my mother?”

Jackson shook his head again, sounding sad, a bit wistful. “No. Wanted every minute I could get with her. But the first five years would have been a lot easier if they had started a few years later.”

“Dad.”

“I know.” Jackson smiled a bit. “We didn’t wait, either. My dad said the same thing to me, and I gave him the exact same look you’re giving me. Got married as soon as we could once I got back. I’m happy for you.”

“Thanks.”

“Go, get your sack time. Don’t want to talk to her daddy tired.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Hey, John, the kid’s here to see you.”

Jethro didn’t roll his eyes. Back here, in his civies, he’s ‘the kid.’ The fact that most of these guys were vets (Army, he thought with a bit of disdain) and he outranked most of them didn’t help with his annoyance.
But he wasn’t here for that. If he had headed to the Fieldings’ house to talk to Shannon’s dad he would have had to do it when he was home, which was also when Shannon was home, so it would have given away the surprise.

So, it was lunchtime, and he was in Meadville, at the (of all ridiculous things) zipper factory, waiting for John’s lunch break, so he could offer to take him to lunch, buy him a beer, and have a ‘chat.’

A minute later, Shannon’s dad came out from his office. (He wasn’t one of the guys making the zippers. He was the guy who made sure the zippers got sent to wherever they were going, and that when orders were placed, zippers got made to go with them.)

“Jethro.” Fielding nodded at him.

“Hello, Mr. Fielding, may I take you to lunch?”

He saw the look in Fielding’s eyes, there was some humor, some joy, some trepidation, and mostly a whole lot of, I’ve been expecting this for a while.

“Sure, Jethro.”

Beers and burgers in front of them, Jethro sat there, feeling fidgety. He knew what he wanted to say, but actually saying it was proving difficult. So they talked about the weather, and his leave, and the Pirates, but not why he suddenly developed a desire for one-on-one time with his girlfriend’s dad.

And now there was just quiet chewing. He took a swallow of his beer, and forced himself to talk.

“I’ve been selected for sniper school.”

“Congratulations.”

“Thank you, sir. It begins in January, and it’s in California, and I’d like it very much if Shannon came with me.”

“Yes, I imagine you would.” Fielding smiled at that.

“I think she would like to come, too.”

“You’re probably right about that.” He was still smiling, but he was also going to make Jethro ask.

He fished the box out of his pocket, and put it on the table in front of Fielding, who opened it and looked approvingly at the stone. “I’d like your permission to ask her to marry me.”

“You have it, on one condition.”

Those words felt like ice down his spine, and he was suddenly very afraid that like his dad, Fielding was also going to say they should wait, make it a condition for his approval. “What?”

“You will make sure she finishes school. No matter where you go or what you do, you will make sure she gets the education she wanted.”

Jethro breathed more easily, that wasn’t a problem. There were colleges all over the world. “Yes, sir.”

“Okay, then.”

“Thank you, sir.”
“You can call me John, Jethro.”

He blushed a little at that, but said, “Thank you, John.”

John smiled at him, amused. “Should I tell her mother she won’t be home for dinner tonight?”

Jethro stuck the ring back in his pocket. “Sure.”

“But you’ll have her home by midnight?”

“I always do, don’t I?”

John gave him a stern look, making sure the lines were still bold and clear. “Until the ring that goes with the one in your pocket slides onto her finger, you will continue to do so.”

“Yes, John.”

He knew from her letters she’d be around here somewhere. He’d found the building easily enough, one kind of old brick building might look a whole lot like every other kind of old brick building to Gibbs, but the clock tower stuck out, so he didn’t have any trouble locating it.

Warm day by north-west PA spring standards. Might be in the low sixties, probably high fifties. Students were laying on the wide, green lawn in front of Rockwell Hall, absorbing as much of the spring sunshine as they could. He pulled his jacket a little tighter. Yesterday he’d been in North Carolina, where it’d been in the high eighties. He’d adjust back to the cool, but it’d take another day or so.

“Gibbs!”

And he had his hands fully of happy redhaired girl. He kissed her quickly and put her back on the ground. “Hi, baby.”

She was grinning up at him, eyes sparkling and sassy. “Don’t, ‘Hi, baby,’ me! Give me a real kiss and let me know you’re happy to see me.”

He grinned back at her, shaking his head slightly, little embarrassed by this, her buddies were all watching, giggling, but she was his, and here, and it had been so damn long, so he pulled her close, melding his body to hers, and kissed her right, mouth open, tongue wet and loving. He could sort of hear the buddies cooing in the background, and could definitely hear the appalled, “Miss Fielding!” coming from one of the professors.

“Professor Granger,” Shannon said as she pulled, slowly, back from him. “This is my boyfriend, Leroy Jethro Gibbs.”

She was ninety if she’s a day, and was probably born hating men, romance, and joy. Granger nodded at him curtly while glaring daggers at him. He was tempted to let Shannon go, but the way Granger was staring at him was a challenge, demanding he let Shannon go. He took a step closer, arm draped over her shoulders.

“You’re not a student here, are you, Mr. Gibbs?”

“No, Ma’am.”

“Then what, pray tell, do you do that gives you such liberty as to be about on a college campus in the middle of the day, molesting the students?” She was very blatantly glaring at his arm on Shannon’s shoulder.

He pulled himself into full Marines posture, while slipping his arm off her shoulder, sliding it around her waist, fingers slipping under her jacket, a much more intimate gesture. “I’m on leave, Ma’am.”

“Indeed, and what are you on leave from?”

“The Marines, Ma’am.” It was his best BSing the Sergeant manner. That so-polite-it’s-insulting,-but-there’s-nothing-you-can-do-about-it-because-it’s-polite manner that just about anyone who’d been enlisted for more than a month develops.

She was still glaring at him, because she couldn’t call him out for being rude. “And do the Marine endorse groping women you are not married to?”

“Wholeheartedly, Ma’am,” he nodded quickly, “They recommend we do it as often as we can possibly can.”

Granger’s eyes just about bugged out of her head. Gibbs flashed a quick smile at Shannon, and then pulled her away from the professor and toward his car. “That’s the one you hate, right?” he asked once they were out of ear shot.

She was smiling wide and giggling at him. “God, yes. She teaches biology and I loathe her!”

He’d been thinking about dressed up and fancy dinner for proposing, but… But they’d have to go back to her place, and he’d have to ask her to get dressed up, and then she’d know something was up because it’s Tuesday which wasn’t exactly a dressed up and out night, so…

They were at the same diner they usually grab dinner at, talking. She was talking. He was mostly listening, feeling kind of nervous. He kept touching the ring box in his jacket pocket, wondering if he should do it now, when everyone was around, or later in the car, or maybe at home, in front of her parents, or…

“Earth to Gibbs.”

“Huh?”

“What’s up? You’re off orbiting Pluto.”

“Just thinkin’.”

“About?”

He smiled and made the decision, not here. Not with everyone else around. Not with anyone else around. This was for them, just them. “You.”

“And what are you thinking about me?”

He smiled again, holding her gaze for a beat or two, and then slowly dragging his eyes down her body. She knew that look, knew what it usually meant. “Thinking about finishing up dinner, getting into my car, and driving out to Conneaut.”

“And what are we gonna do at Lake Conneaut?” There was a sparkle in her eyes as she asked. She knew exactly what they did at Lake Conneaut.
“Not look at the moon or stars.”

She grinned at him.

As a child, Gibbs hated fishing. Jackson and LJ loved it. So he got dragged along on what felt like thousands of endlessly long fishing trips. On the upside, he now knew lots of little, out of the way nooks and crannies of Lake Conneaut, spots where you could pull a car in, turn off the lights, and vanish for a few hours.

From his first leave back home, first time he and Shannon got enough time to find a place to really play with each other, they both appreciated his intimate knowledge of the less accessible bits of Lake Conneaut.

There were rules, underwear stayed on, hands stayed on top of it. And he was okay with that.

Frustrated, God, yes, frustrated, but really, on a deep level he couldn’t have explained if he tried, he was okay, too. Yes, he wanted sex, with her, more than he’d ever wanted anything. But waiting felt right. Right in a way he knew she got, and Matheson would have gotten if they’d ever talked about it. But they never did talk about that.

He didn’t talk about it with the rest of the guys, even though he was sure there were some who probably would have agreed, but most of them would have thought it stupid. After all, it was 1978, not 1958.

On a more practical level, he didn’t want to risk getting her pregnant. Seen more than enough of his buddies end up married with a kid on the way real fast. And, sure, it wasn’t likely, but he really didn’t want to risk getting her pregnant and not being able to get back in time to marry her. Or maybe not get back at all.

That had happened to one of the buddies, too. He got the ‘I’m late’ letter, wasn’t able to get leave, got sent to desert training in California, something went wrong, and died. They took up a collection for his girl, but only managed to scrape together a few hundred dollars.

No way, no fucking way in hell he was going to risk that with Shannon.

Besides, there were lots of fun things you could do with your underwear on.

And once he figured out that if he made sure he had a handkerchief and an extra pair of boxers in the glove compartment, getting home (or walking Shannon in to her home and chatting with her parents) after having fun with your underwear on worked a lot better, too.

They were in his Challenger, passenger seat pushed all the way back and reclined, mostly naked, relaxed, (They’d already gotten off once. Didn’t take either of them too long to figure out that she could sit in his lap, facing him, kissing, and they could sort of rub together, and very, very good things would result.) kissing and petting lazily, enjoying the glow. Normally, this would be a lull between rounds, just enjoying each other’s skin and the feel of another heart beating close to your own.

Normally they wouldn’t talk much now. Normally, right now, communication would be focused on touch, on sensations of skin on skin, and the nuances of how hands, lips, bellies, shoulders, and legs can say I love you a million ways.
His lips rested on the crown of her head, and she was gently playing with his chest hair, occasionally giving him a light lick. His fingers trailed through her hair, stroking down her back, over her bra strap, lightly fiddling with the edge of her panties, not breaking, or even bending the rules, just aware of them.

He stretched, content, and she shifted a bit, looking up at him, like she expected him to say something.

So, he did. “Got the news yesterday that I’ve been accepted for sniper training.”

She grinned, wide, happy for him, lips pink and plump from kissing and he had to lower his head and kiss her again. When he pulled back, she said, “That’s excellent.”

“Yeah. It starts in January.”

“Great.”

She still looked so happy, and he had to kiss her again, had to drink in her happiness, feel it on his skin, taste it on his lips. He reached behind him, trying to figure out where his jacket was. Couldn’t be that far off. The jacket had been (along with the rest of their clothing) tossed in the backseat, and while the front seats in a Challenger were large and comfy, the back was pretty tiny.

He felt denim, found the ring, and held the box in his hand.

“Shannon.”

For all the trying to keep it a surprise, he thought she knew what was coming next. Probably because she also knew that sniper training was in California.

“Yeah?” More of that electric grin on her face.

“Come with me. To California, and anywhere after that, for every day of the rest of our lives.” He opened the ring box, and she squealed with joy.

“YES!”

He was grinning so widely he thought his face would crack, and was so high on the excitement of it his hands were shaking as he took the ring out of the box and slid it onto her finger.

And there was more kissing, broken only by looking at it on her hand, feeling the weight of that promise, and the freedom of a bound future.

“I love you, Gibbs.”

“Love you, too, Shannon, love you so much, love you always.”

More kissing, more rubbing, more I love you, all of it round and full and perfect. Glowing with perfect.

That he remembers clearly, much more clearly than the sex or the words, that intense feeling of everything in the world being right and the contentment of that.

And he did get her home at 23:59, with thirty seconds to spare.
He flips to the next page, looking at shots of Shannon and her mom, Shannon and her dad, all the bridesmaids, all of team bride together. All of them sparkly and pretty, dressed up and ready to go.

Next page has him with his dad. Him on his own, all bright and shiny in his dress blues. Him standing next to the three buddies who had come up for the wedding.

He turns that page quickly. He’s lost every person on those pages.

Then he stops, page in hand, halfway to the next one, and wonders what Joann might be up to. He shakes his head, like the buddies standing next to him, that bridge is burned.

Besides, it’s been five years since he’s seen her. He’s not even sure if she’s still alive.

But he could find out.

More getting ready for the wedding shots. Shannon and her girls getting out of the car. Stuff like that. The cake, the bouquet, the garter (okay, he stopped to look at that one), stuff he didn’t care much about. Stuff he honestly didn’t remember all that well.

Finally he gets to one that does matter. He takes a shot of it, to add to the ones he’s sending to Cranston.

Shannon and her dad walking down the aisle.

Gibbs was not fidgeting. At all. Standing there at the front of the church, he was doing such a good job of staying still, in his absolutely perfect uniform, that he’d could have done duty at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, or a living statue, either would work.

The music started, and her friends came forward, all of them walking way, way, way too slowly. Just inching down the aisle at a glacial pace.

And finally, the last one of them got into place, and the music shifted, everyone stood up, the doors opened one last time, and his breath stopped.

The dress was white lace, long, flowy, billowy sleeves the didn’t quite come all the way down her arms. Her hair was in a loose braid, bits of it free and curling gently along her face and neck.

For a few seconds there, time stopped. He watched her eyes scan the church, find his, and a smile lit her face. He felt his own mirror it, and everything started moving again, he started breathing again, because his dad was right, she was his air, and wherever she was, he could breathe.

He takes a picture of the next one, too. It’s a shot of him slipping the ring onto her finger. And while it’s true a lot of the earlier pictures represent moments he doesn’t remember all that well, it’s also true that that one is burned into his memory forever, the feel of her hand in his, skin soft, his hand trembling a little, hers too, as he said with a quiet, reverent voice, ‘With this ring, I thee wed.’
He doesn’t grab a shot of the two of them facing the church as the Minister said, “I now pronounce you Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs,” but he remembers the way that felt, that insane rush of Mrs. Gibbs.

He remembers reading something where one of the characters was talking about offering his wife his name, like it was a crown, the most precious jewel he could give her, and that feeling of pride to see her wear it.

And he completely understood that feeling.

Mrs. Gibbs.

His woman. His wife. Wearing his name like a jewel.

His honor, his life, his name, laid at her feet, offered up to her, and she lifted it, placed it upon her skin, and made it sparkle.

His eyes close and he bites his lip. He stops looking at the pictures, needing to break that train of thought.

Then he opens the album again. There’s the shot of them leaving the church, under the swords of his buddies. There’s the picture of her alone, under the scarlet maple. He doesn’t take a shot of that, but he does put the album down, get up, hobble over to his wallet, and take a picture of the copy that he carries with him. The edges are worn, the corners bent, and the image is faded. He makes sure all of that is visible in his photo of the photo, making it clear that this is something he’s carried with him for more than thirty years, and then he heads back to his sofa and his photo albums.

The rest of the photos are fairly standard small-town, family wedding from the seventies shots. The VFW hall decorated in white and pink. Her mom had made the cake, and it was supposed to have the traditional bride and groom on top, but they couldn’t find one in a Marine uniform, so instead of that, it was white with lots of white curly cues on it, and Shannon had put scarlet and gold fall leaves on the tray around it, and more of them on the top.

Shots of his best man giving the speech while Shannon leaned against him, both of them laughing. Shots of them dancing. Shots of cutting the cake, and feeding it to each other. Shots of the garter and bouquet toss.

All familiar, none extraordinary to anyone who isn’t him.

The second to last shot was his car, ‘Just Married’ painted on the back window, streamers and cans dangling off the bumper. That one brings back memories, lots of memories.

Stillwater to Niagra Falls should have taken three hours.

Gibbs at the wheel, driving to their honeymoon suite, they made it in one hour and fifty-three minutes.

“Stay put.”

He was sitting on the edge of the bed. The bed they were going to share. The bed she and he would be in, together, naked, soon. Where there was plenty of room to spread out and then… God, his pants had never, ever been this tight. He felt like he had three extra guys’ worth of blood pumping around him way too fast right now. “Where else would I go?”

She smiled at him. “Back in a few minutes.” And then vanished into the bathroom with her suitcase.

In a few minutes, she was out in a little white lace slip, and he didn’t know what to do with himself. He was staring, breathing fast, mouth feeling dry, painfully hard, and he just wanted to touch and kiss and see all of her at once.

She was looking a little shy. “You like it?”

He nodded slowly, tried to speak, but words wouldn’t form, so he nodded again and swallowed hard.

She crossed to him, standing between his legs, in front of him, and he just sat on the bed, staring, not touching, not anything, feeling completely overwhelmed by how beautiful she was and how much he wanted her.

“You okay?”

He nodded again, swallowed again, licked his lips, and finally got it together enough to say, “I have never, ever, ever been better than I am right now.”

She undid a button on his shirt, fingers stroking lightly below the dip of his collar bone, feeling the curly black hair there. “I bet you could be better.”

He nodded, finally touching her, his hands resting on her hips, feeling the lace of her negligee and the heat of her body under it, then sliding down, fingers finding her skin, resting on her thighs, tracing small circles on impossibly soft skin. “Yeah, I think I could be.”

A brilliant smile spread over her face and an answering smile spread across his.

She reached for the light, and he stopped her, fingers circling her wrist. “No. Wanna see you.”

She didn’t look entirely sure about that, but she stopped reaching for the light, and he let go of her wrist, dragging his fingers up her arm, and then down her side, so they mirrored the position of his other hand on her leg. Then his fingers slipped back up her thighs, over her hips, tracing lightly over the lace. She giggled a little as they slipped up over her ribs, and inhaled sharply as he closed them over her breasts.

The familiar sensation of her breasts, warm, full, round, under a layer of clothing, helped get his brain working again.

“I’ve been dying to see all of you. Dreaming about it every single night since the first time we met.”

She stepped back and leaned forward, hand on his thighs, kissing him deeply, and then pulling back a little so he could look directly down the negligee, see her breasts hanging free and the dip of her stomach, and while he’s staring, she straightened up, fingers trailing down his legs, ran her hands up her arms, slipped the straps over her shoulders, and let the concoction of silk and lace fall to the floor.

He had touched her over clothing, and they’d ground against each other in the tiny, dark, cramped space of her car and his, but this… This moment of actually seeing, blew his mind. Literally, all thought besides her body had vanished. He didn’t think he’s breathing. His wife, naked, in front of him, and she was the most beautiful woman in the world, the most beautiful woman ever born, smiling at him, in love with him, sharing her body with him.
She was all ivory skin and pink nipples and lips, glorious fire red hair above and below.

He gasped at the sight of her, pulling air into starving lungs, feeling lightheaded at how excited he was by just looking.

“What you were hoping for?” she asked, still smiling at him, enjoying the stunned look on his face, and he looked up, saw the smile, felt it cut through the haze of desire and he found a word to reply with.

“Better.”

He’d already shrugged off the jacket, and his shoes were tidily tucked under the bed, which left his shirt, undershirt, belt, pants, boxers, and socks. All of which were suddenly too tight, too hot, and just too clothing to be born. He needed to get out of it, all of it, right that second.

And while her clothing had come off in a graceful, sinuous slither of silky material, they pretty much tore his off of him, leaving him standing in front of her, at parade rest, naked, grinning, waiting.

It was her turn to look, and his turn to bask in being physically adored. And she doesn’t have the same sort of (what he suspected was a pretty stupid) look on her face that he did on his, but her eyes were wide as they traveled over his skin, and her smile bright.

Her hand hovered over his chest, just close enough to brush the hair and for him to feel the heat of her palm on his skin. She had touched him there before, skin to skin, lips to skin, but they could feel that this was different, that, in a second, things would change, touch would change, and there was a delicious anticipation to that that neither of them was willing to break quite yet.

She stepped in toward him the same time he reached for her, pressing up close against him as his arms curled around her waist. They both groaned, him loudly, her quietly, at the feel of fully naked bodies touching while their lips found a familiar and satisfying rhythm.

His hands mapped her back, her hips, her butt, every inch they could reach while he reveled in the feel of her skin so hot and smooth and tight against him.

He was rubbing against her stomach as they kissed, astounded at how amazing just her tummy felt, how it was softer than anything that had ever touched his dick before. Between that and the kissing he was leaking against her, leaving slippery, wet trails along her stomach.

She had had one hand on his neck, fingernails lightly scratching the tiny hairs there, the other had been stroking down his back, but it got to his hip and followed the curve of his waist to close around his dick. His eyes closed as his head dropped to her shoulder, and he inhaled fast, sharp, almost a whistle, pleasure racing through him. He couldn’t have not come if his life depended on it.

She was smiling up at him, holding him gently, when he opened his eyes again.

He kissed her slow and lazy, relaxing, enjoying, and after a second she pulled back a little, and licked the cum off her fingers.

“What’s it taste like?”

She looked really surprised by that. “You don’t know?”

“No.” He shook his head vehemently.

There was some on her stomach and ribcage, so she ran her finger through it and offered to him.
Gibbs shook his head again. “I don’t need to know.”

She laughed at that, stepped back a bit, looked around, didn’t see any tissues, and headed back into the bathroom. She came out a few seconds later with a hand towel and a box of tissues. She tossed him the towel (which was when he realized he had cum in the hair on his stomach) and wiped herself off as well.

He finished wiping up, and noticed they were both, still, standing next to the bed, so he picked her up, grinning, and tossed her into the middle of it, pouncing in after her, laughing, as she shrieked with giggles.

Leaning over her, smiling, on his hands and knees, he lowered his mouth to kiss hers.

He kissed down her neck to her chest, taking the time to look, lick, stroke, nibble, tickle, anything he could possibly think of with her breasts, loving the soft moans, quick gasps, and panting breaths he coaxed out of her, only stopping when she gave him a none too subtle push to keep heading down.

He traced his fingers lightly over her ribs and belly, watching her squirm, delighted at her giggles, and didn’t stop that until she gasped out, “Stop, that tickles!”

He eased farther down, leaning on his side and one elbow, kissing the crest of her hip, his right hand hovering over her public hair, not touching for a heartbeat, and then very gently stroking over her hair, half feeling the texture, crisp and springy under his fingers, half seeing how she responded to his touch.

She wriggled a little, pushing up against him.

“Good?” he asked, hoping she liked it, because he really did.

“Oh yeah.”

He did it again, and again, marveling at the feel of her body under his, at getting to have her naked, spread out next to him, at getting to touch her, there.

He scooted around a little, sitting between her legs, spreading her wide open. “So beautiful.” He barely spoke it, halfway between a breath and a prayer. It wasn’t original, but it was deeply sincere.

He really had never seen, or guessed, what a pussy looked like. Yes, triangle of pubic hair he knew, he’d seen pictures of that, and he’d felt enough through her panties to know it’d be wet, but the luscious, glistening, pink flower in front of him, surrounded by fire-colored curls, that he wanted to lick and suck and touch and nuzzle and look at and again touch all over all at once with all of him was nothing he’d ever guessed at, let alone imagined correctly.

He was hard again, and that was distracting. His dick was more or less screaming to get in her, but that wasn’t going to go with the go slow plan, let alone start with fingers (which he really wanted to do) and lips (just the idea of which sent even more blood cascading toward his dick).

“Just gonna look?”

He shook his head. “Nope.” Then gently grazed his fingers over her lips, feather light touches, and she jerked a little when he made contact. He yanked his hand back.

“Don’t stop doing that!”

So he didn’t. Touching along each fold, stroking fingers up and down, light touches, heavier ones, seeing how she responded to each. The little spot up at the top seemed to get the best reaction, so he spent more time there, slipping his finger up and down, slowly, over again and again, and each time she’s rise up to press against him, whimpering, legs tight and quivering.

He changed position again, laying on his stomach, wanting to get closer, see more of her, taste her. His tongue darted out to that little spot, touching for a bare second, so lightly, and she squirmed again, hands clenching in his hair, groaning, so he decided that was something he needed to do again, do a whole lot.

Second lick was longer, firmer, coating his tongue with her flavor, and he knew he couldn’t do this lying on his stomach or he was going to come on the sheets from her taste and the way he was moving. He scrambled up to his knees, and that helped him stay focused.

He was moving, all of him, rocking back and forth with her, hands under her butt, thumbs keeping her spread wide, tongue exploring, tasting everything, touching everything, and finally he slipped it in her, feeling her all wet and smooth around him and he had to stop doing that, too. It was too much, the taste, the feel, the knowledge that he was inside her body, all of that was going to make him come, so he backed off and went back to licking.

Gibbs wasn’t sure if he should try a finger. Wasn’t sure if he could and not get off on it. But he did want to, and she was sounding so good, and he wanted to know how she’d sound if he slipped a finger in.

So he did, slow, gentle, licking her the whole time, and she gasped, arched her back, cried out his name, and that felt so amazing. He was doing this to her. He was making her shake and gasp and it was his name on her lips and her body on his and that felt… he didn’t have words for how that felt… but whatever it was he never wanted to not feel this way.

She tugged on his hair, getting his attention. “Now!”

He didn’t need to be told that twice.

Slide in slow and easy, and he did, or tried, took a few tries to get himself where he needed to be, but he found it, and as slow as he could, watching her face, hoping he wasn't hurting her, he started to ease in.

She was still making happy noises, and she was smiling, and it felt so amazing, all soft and hot and wet and just… God… if anything had ever made him feel the divine, it was this moment of his body slowly easing into hers. Nothing else had ever felt like that.

He was all the way in, holding her, wrapped in her body, kissing her, holding still, both of them savoring the feel of being completely together.

She started to rock against him, and that felt amazing, felt like… he didn’t know. Felt great, better than great. But with all that, with as amazing as it felt, it also made him want to move, go faster, chasing even better (which he wasn’t sure he could take, but he really wanted to find out if he could.)

He wanted to go faster because he just knew faster would feel even better, but he wasn’t sure if he should.

So he kept going slow, feeling her clinging to him, arching against him, wriggling, digging her nails into his butt, and he’s biting his lip trying to keep to slow, but he couldn’t, she was so wet and slick and felt so good, and his body was sparking with pleasure, so he thrusts fast, hard. And, God, it was even better.
But Shannon stopped wriggling, stopped making those little happy noises, and he knew that didn’t work for her.

Like in the car. Like how they’d grind against each other.

He rolled over, taking her with him, ending with her on top. He sat up, scooting both of them back so he’s back against the headboard, just like how they’d do it in the car.

“You.” He could barely form coherent thoughts, but she got what he was saying, and started to experiment with how to do this so it felt good.

Quick, little up-down rocking motions. They’re a little too quick, and a little too short. They helped to distract him away from the edge again. Helped him find enough focus to open his eyes and watch.

Her eyes were closed, mouth slightly open, face, neck, and chest flushed, nipples hard. He felt like he was going to wear out the word beautiful, but he didn’t care, because she was so beautiful. He gasped it as she slid all the way down, moaned it to her between kisses, said it against her neck and shoulder as she rested on him between strokes.

Long rolling strokes. His hands found her hips, guiding her, all the way up and all the way down felt amazing, those little, up-down, quick rocking motions are okay, but this is better.

“Good?” he half-grunts, half-asked her.

She slid all the way back down on him and groaned. He swallowed that groan with a kiss, adding his own to it.

He knew that when they were rubbing together in the car, she would start moving faster, grind harder, tilt her hips some and then gasp, moan, shudder all over, and so far that hadn’t happened.

He also knew that he was gonna come again any second. He couldn’t take much more of this. His brain was melting, his body quivering, and any second now he was going to explode.

But he wanted her to, too.

And he didn’t know what to do to make that happen.

“What…?”

And somehow she got what he was asking, (How? He didn’t know. Hell, he barely knew what he was asking.) but she got his hand against the base of his stomach, about where his dick usually was when they were grinding against each other, and she did that thing where she tilted her hips a little, and started moving faster, sliding along his fingers, and oh fucking God, holy mother of all things, that was magnificent. His eyes slipped shut and his body tightened a bit further, and then his whole body pulsed over and over, and he thought he might have been shouting, but he wasn’t sure. What he did know was that he’d never felt that good, never even felt close to that good, never knew he could feel that good, and he really, really wanted to feel that good again.

She kept rising and falling on him for a minute or so after he finished, still sliding against his hand, and eventually he noticed his other hand was just sort of lying next to him, so he rose it to her breast, rubbing lightly over her nipple. He felt her gripping him tighter, the squeeze of her knees against his hips and hands on his shoulders, which was familiar, the clench of her pussy, which wasn’t, but he was greatly appreciating. She gasped, and moaned, and did that little shudder thing, which he got to feel from the inside, and that got him hard again.
She slumped against him, resting against his chest as he held her close, feeling her heart pounding and the extremely pleasant way her body twitched against his, and there were a lot of things he wanted to say to her, lots of feelings pouring through him, but he didn’t have the words, so he whispered, “I love you,” against her ear, and felt her kiss it back to him on his shoulder.

The next morning breakfast showed up, and while they were munching away, and she said, “I got us a wedding present.”

“Us?”

“Yeah.”

“How is it a present for us if you got it?”

“You’ll see.” And he watched her get up, walk, hips swaying, sassy little jiggle to her tush that he was appreciating greatly, (Appreciating greatly was more or less a constant state for him for the entirety of their honeymoon.) and she found her suitcase, messed around for a bit, and came back with a somewhat large, prettily wrapped, rectangle.

“Is it a book?” he asked as she tossed it on the bed in front of where he way laying on his stomach, propped on his elbows, looking up at her.

“It might be. Open it up!”

He ripped through the paper fast and felt his eyes go wide. The Joy of Sex was looking up at him. Part of him was thrilled at the idea of going through every single page with her. Part of him was mortified. They both knew Mr. Hibbard, who ran the bookstore. He was friends with her dad, and the bookstore was right across the street from his dad’s store.

She saw the look on his face and laughed. “I went to Pittsburg to get it. Cut classes for a day, drove down, got it and a few other things to, as my mom put it, ’round out my hope chest.”

He looked up at her from the book and smiled. “Oh.”

“Yeah, couldn’t imagine walking into Hibbard’s and asking for it.”

“I could imagine you doing it. You’re fearless.”

She giggled at that, laying on her stomach, propped on her elbows next to him. “Come on, open it up. I want to see what’s inside.”

“You haven’t read it?” His eyes were wide at that, he can’t imagine having this for, however long, and not opening it.

“Nope. It was for us. I wasn’t going to open it until you were here.”

So he opened it, not sure if they should just flip around or read straight through or… Page one, good enough place to start.

He liked the idea of the pictures, really liked the idea of trying everything he was seeing, but the subjects were not precisely to his tastes. “Hippies.” He didn’t have much use for them. Hadn’t run into too many real live ones. But there were usually some protesting around their bases.

Her shoulder brushed his. (She didn’t seem nearly as bothered by the models.) “How many of the “Guys you work with would pose for something like this?”

“Good point.” None of the guys he worked with were shy about being naked, but, he flipped a few pages and found a shot of the guy lying on his back with the girl lying on him, holding his dick, about to suck it while he… suddenly Gibbs had a much better idea of the fact that there were a whole lot of variations on the theme of rug munching, and that killed any train of thought he might have had about how many Marines would be willing to pose naked for a sex book.

They didn’t read straight through, not for a few weeks later. They did look at all the sketches, and tried a lot of them. Some worked, some didn’t, some actually required reading to make what was in the pictures make a lot more sense.

But all in all, they both had a very good time with that book.

And to this day, he’s never seen Niagara Falls in the flesh.

The last picture (taken a few weeks after the wedding) is both of their hands, hers over his, fingers clasped together, both wedding rings visible.

He takes a photo of that, and then closes their wedding album.

He knows what’s in the next album. This is the one he’s probably looked over the most often. This is the one that’s easiest to share. Brown leather, says Kelly Beth Gibbs March 22, 1982 on the cover.

It’s slim, only had forty-two pages and was only intended to have thirty-eight of them filled.

Hers only has the first eighteen filled.

He’d send the whole thing to Rachel if he could. But he can’t.

So he picks and chooses. The shot of the first time Shannon held Kelly. Kelly’s bright pink, eyes screwed shut, mouth open, yelling like crazy, wanting to eat right that second. Shannon looked tired, and pale, so very pale, he’d forgotten the way her skin looked like chalk for days after. He makes himself not remember the blood, or the screaming, or… or any of that, and goes back to the feel of holding Kelly in his arms, handing her over for the first time. Shannon’s smiling in that shot, eye’s teary, looking at her daughter with unreserved love.

He takes one of him on the sofa, Kelly on his chest, both of them snoozing.

He copies the first birthday party shot, Kelly tearing through her Cookie Monster cake.

She was a late walker. (Early talker, started babbling away at ten months. The Doc said that was normal, they either walk or talk, but not both at once.) He takes a shot of Kelly, eighteen months old, standing up, one tiny hand clenching onto each of Shannon’s forefingers, one foot out, half-tipping over on the other one, as she worked on her first steps.

Two-years-old, pretty yellow dress, shoulder length brown pig tails with yellow ribbons, he’s got her on one arm, the other around Shannon, smiling brilliantly in her cap and gown. It took longer than expected, but she did finish school.
First day of kindergarten, another pretty little dress, green this time, hair in two long braids, her mama’s big blue eyes smiling up at them. She wasn’t much of a dress girl. Liked shorts and jeans, but for the first day of school every year, she wanted to wear a dress. And for the first day of school, every year, Shannon made her one.

He doesn’t have a picture of it, but he can remember Shannon sitting at the kitchen table, sewing machine in front of her, what looked like hundreds of pieces of paper pinned onto fabric, Kelly laying on the floor, playing, watching Sesame Street or GI Joe. (Her Daddy was a Joe, so she watched that show a lot, wanted to be Scarlett (who had pretty hair, like Mommy and shot rifles, like Daddy) when she grew up. He had explained his job was kind of like Duke’s, like of like Leatherneck’s, kind of like Sgt. Slaughter, but not really like any of them. And that when he was here, with them, a lot of what he did was training other soldiers, and when he was away, what he did was to shoot bad guys from very far away. “Like Scarlett?” He hadn’t known she was the sniper. “Sure.” “Cool!”) Then Shannon called her in, trying on the dress for the first time, seeing how it fit.

He took a shot of second grade Halloween, princess costume, another one made by Shannon. One of the few Halloweens he’d been home. They’d been transferred to California earlier that year, and she didn’t have a new bunch of buddies, yet, so he took her out trick or treating.

Eight-years-old was the last page of that album. Raspberry Rumtart themed birthday party started that page off. Christmas ended it.

It’s a goofy shot, really goofy. She’d been one of the sheep in the Christmas pageant that year, and her friend Maddy had been one of the shepherds. It’s from after the play. Maddy had already gotten out of her costume, but Kelly hadn’t. So, goofing off, she put on Maddy’s robes over her sheep costume and was holding the crook.

Shepherd watching sheeps (as Kelly would say, she absolutely refused to believe the plural of sheep was sheep) on high.

Then she got a hold of another of the kid’s wings.

So, it’s her, looking at the camera, huge gap toothed smile on her face, wooly sheep costume and face paint with whiskers (Sheep have whiskers, right? They did at their church.) wearing a shepherd’s costume, with wings and a lop-sided halo.

He takes a shot of that one, knowing it’ll make Cranston smile.

He stands up, putting the albums back, and then hobbled over to the laundry room.

Most of the changes were gone, ripped out slowly, by one wife and then another. None of them needed or wanted a dark room, what they wanted was a laundry room where there was enough light to actually sort the damn clothing.

(He’d let them believe the house had come with a dark room, not that he and Shannon and Kelly had spent hours building her one.) He gets shots of the extra shelves, and the two extra-large sinks, the tiny ‘closet’ in the one corner where she could unload her film.

They’d bought the place in ’88, got it cheap, spent a lot of time and energy fixing it up, and then got stationed in California in ’90. It was only supposed to be for two years. Only six more with the Marines, then he’d have his twenty-years in, retire a Master Sergeant, maybe go into recruiting, and this house, with her dark room and his woodshop would be their permanent home. Kelly wouldn’t have to spend high school moving every year or two. They’d be settled.

He’s not sure what album it's in, but he knows there are shots of the house when they first moved in. It had been a rental and the guys who lived in it had beaten the hell out of it.

You won’t get rich as a Gunny, but you can afford a decent standard of living, especially if you are a fairly frugal person.

Part of frugal was saving up for a house for a long time.

Part of it was getting a place that had been beaten to hell up.

And part of it was putting the hours into the place, putting the love into it to make it shine.

He goes back into the living room and checks the third album. Not that one. Which means it’s upstairs.

He knows he’s got shots of the three of them working on the house. Of him showing Kelly how to drive nails. Of Shannon and her peeling that god-awful puke-green wallpaper off the entryway walls. He knows there’s a shot of the two of them fitting the panes of glass together for the front windows. He knows there are shots of him putting them in.

He limps outside, taking pictures of the house. Making sure to get pictures to go along with the shots of them working on the place. Now versus then.

He heads upstairs to his room, and sees something else he needs to get a shot of.

Their bed.

His wedding present (late) to her.

Their first home was base housing. Two bedrooms, tiny living room, tiny kitchen, one bathroom. Since he’d lived his whole life with his dad or in the barracks, and since she had lived her whole life with her parents, it felt like a castle.

They didn’t have much money (besides the nest egg he was sitting on to get them a real house/college for her) so the furniture was cheap. Thrift store stuff.

Not much reason to go overboard on it. They were only going to be there two months, then they were moving to California.

They did splurge on their mattress and box springs. Used a big chunk of their wedding present money for that. But having done so, they had a really good mattress and box spring sitting on the floor in a very empty bedroom.

They’d been married about a month when he gave her the first sketch. He’d always liked mission-style furniture, clean lines, nothing fussy or pretentious about it. It’d be sturdy, beautiful, fairly easy to make, easy to disassemble, because he knew they’d be moving around a lot.

“It’s a bed,” she said, looking up from the sketch to him.

He nodded. “Do you like it?”
“Yeah.”

“Then that’s my wedding present for us. Between now and our anniversary, I’ll get it done.”

“How are you going to do that?” Not a facetious question. He worked long hours, then sniper school on top of it, and neither of them thought the next base housing was going to be any bigger with a better place to do woodworking.

He shook his head, not entirely sure. “I will.”

“I believe you.”

And he did, though he was giving the finish the last rub down on October 19th, 1979. But they started the first day of their second year together in that bed.

It had moved to California with them. Wherever she went, that bed went with her.

And when they died, he packed everything up, gave most of it away, and headed back east, to the home they weren’t going to grow old in.

Their bed ended up in the attic, along with most of the rest of their things.

When he went to visit Mike, and he ‘accidentally’ saw the Hernandez file, he was sure he’d never be back to unpack it all.

Eventually he was back, but he didn’t unpack.

Didn’t even bother to get a bedroom, (slept on the sofa, less painful) until he realized that Hannah might think it was really weird that he didn’t have a bed. And that she’d ask questions about why he didn’t have a bed. So he went to Sears and bought the first suite of bedroom furniture he saw along with the first pillows and first set of sheets. (It clashed horribly with the rest of the room, and Hannah giggled a bit about him desperately needing a woman’s touch in his home.)

He never slept in that bed alone.

And when the divorce was done, she had taken it, and pretty much everything else inside the house (but not the attic, that was his) with her.

Diane had her own bedroom stuff, it moved in with her, and moved out as well.

Stephanie picked some crap out. He barely noticed it, and barely noticed when it left, as well.

When he started to think that things with Hollis were going to heat up, he brought his old furniture down. After all, she’d done a profile on him; she already knew about his girls. Except, apparently, she didn’t.

She asked if he had made it, and he said yes, not saying anything else about it as her fingers trailed over the wood. “It’s beautiful, Jethro.”

He nodded. Sharing that bed with her ached, but not nearly as badly as he thought it was going to. By the third night, it felt okay. (He had the sense that Shannon was okay with it.)

When she was gone, he didn’t sleep in it again until Susan. Too many memories.
And when Susan was gone... Like with the ring, he’s not done being married, and tossing it aside, pretending it didn’t happen didn’t get him where he wants to go.

He takes pictures of it. It’s not new. There are dings, and a few places where the finish is rubbed a bit thin, (He’d noticed that, years ago, wanted to refinish it, but Shannon grinned, shook her head, told him she liked the memory of how it got worn thin, so he left it.) but this is the bed they spent the first night of their second year in, this is the bed they made Kelly in, the bed she spent her first night home with them in, this was a place of many good nights and good mornings. Much more than any of the houses they lived in, this was the physical manifestation of home.

And the idea that maybe, at some point, he might want to make another one, and that that is probably the final step to welcoming another woman into his home, his life, is terrifying.

But, terrifying or not, he mentally adds it to his plan.

And like ‘take off the ring,’ he knows it’s not time, yet.

He sits so his back is against the side of the dresser, and then reaches back and opens the bottom drawer. There are three albums in here he just didn’t bring down. Nothing particularly special about them, just didn’t feel like he needed every single shot down there.

Like (and he sorts through, looking at many different family shots, taking a moment here, and a moment there to get copies of them) the house make over shots. Nothing special or weird about them. They just didn’t need to be downstairs.

(Though he’s looking at a shot of six-year-old Kelly, holding the little hammer he’d gotten her, working on driving her first nails, and wondering if he’s still got that hammer, and if so, how long he needs to wait to teach Molly and Kelly how to build things.)

But those aren’t the only albums in that drawer.

There are ten others. The ones Tim saw, but didn’t look at, and Jethro trusts that he didn’t.

He hasn’t opened them in a long time. Since right after Hannah left.

The first four are just letters.

He takes the first album out, carefully, the contents are precious to him, even if he hasn’t been able to bear looking at them, because reading them felt like whipping himself with razor blades.

For a moment he sits there, album, black leather, on his lap, fingers resting on the cover. Then he opened it, and took a picture of the first letter.

July 12, 1976

Dear Gibbs,

As you know, I’m setting up rules for everything, but one rule I don’t have is don’t be forward. You’ll never get anywhere, or anything, that you want if you spend your life hiding in the background waiting for people to notice you.
So, even though my mother thinks it’s horribly unladylike to send a letter to a man who hasn’t written me first, (He had, in fact, already written three times when this letter was written, and tossed all three of them out, thinking he sounded like a blathering moron.) I’m going to assume you gave me your address because you wanted to hear from me.

And I have news!

As of today, I am registered for classes at Grove City College. I’m officially a member of the class of 1980! One step closer to out of here!

The campus is old and beautiful. Lots of ancient brick buildings, tall trees, and long, wide yards.

My parents won’t let me live on campus. (Don’t want me picking up bad habits in the dorms. Not likely! Grove City didn’t notice the fifties ended twenty years ago. They still have nightly bed checks for the girls’ dorm. Still, I would have liked the chance to develop some bad habits. They might have been interesting.) But still, four more years, and I’ll have my degree, and from there, the sky’s the limit.

And, since they won’t let me live on campus, and because I need a way to get to and from class, I’m getting a car. It’ll be an old beater, and it’s my job to pay the insurance and gas, but a CAR!

I can’t wait!

It’s been a good day here, Gibbs, and I just wanted to tell you about it.

I hope you’re having a good day, too.

Thinking of you,

Shannon

He practically danced back from mail call when he saw that letter. He read it and reread it and reread it so many times the words are faded and the creases are practically worn through.

And when he got done reading, he folded it up, and tucked it into his breast pocket and carried it with him.

Then he made himself write back. (Three more crossed out, erased through, and thrown out letters.) Finally he decided he was just going to write, and not re-read what he wrote, and just send it, because otherwise, he’d never get anything on paper and she’d think he didn’t like her.

July 14, 1976

Dear Shannon,

Congratulations on college. What classes will you be taking? It’s kind of like school here. Learn this. Learn that. Do this. Do that. Do it right. Do it faster. And it’s really hot and humid. July in North Carolina is terrible. Especially in full gear.

I’m doing well at the learning stuff, but Johnson isn’t. He’s got two left feet and in close drill when we all go right, he goes left. He’s a nice guy. Has the bunk next to mine.

Sgt. McHugh was giving him hell for it. I told him to quit ragging on Johnson.

Turns out that after 56 pushups in 100 degree heat, I’ll pass out. Gotta work on that. The guys who have been here longer can do 100, easy. But I can’t. Gotta get faster, too.

I like rifle practice. Got good aim, always hit the target, usually hit the headshot. That feels good. Not fast enough taking it apart or cleaning it, yet, but I will be.

We don’t get a lot of down time, and I spend a lot of it working, but (he scratched out I really loved getting your letter and spend a lot of time reading it) I’ll write as much as I can.

Thinking of you, too,

Gibbs.

P.S. What kind of car? My Dad and I worked on fixing up an old Challenger. Might be able to give you a hand with whatever you get when I get back up north again.

He snaps a shot of her reply and several of the letters that followed. Mostly it’s just both of them being young. Her excitement as school got closer. Both of them talking about her ’74 Honda Civic (not nearly as old or beat up as either of them were expecting.) Him talking about boot camp.

Three quarters of the way through that album there’s a picture. First shot of the two of them together. He’d asked if she would be his date for the Marine Ball, and she said yes. She and her mom drove down to Lejeune for it.

So, it’s him, eighteen years old, standing tall and proud in his dress blues. He has his arm, very politely, wrapped around her waist. She’s also eighteen, looking quite a bit more relaxed than he was, wearing a flowy, mint-green dress, with a white rose corsage he almost dropped when it was time to pin it on her. He’s staring straight ahead at the photographer, looking very tense and stern. She’s smiling at the camera.

That night was the first time he touched her. First time he held her in his arms. First time they danced. First time they kissed.

There’s another picture, though not a photograph. This is a picture in his mind. They’re walking, he had his arm around her waist, immensely enjoying her body this close to his, his jacket was over her shoulders, and her head was on his shoulder. He was happier right that second than he thought it was even possible to be.

She stopped walking, and he did, too, for a second they weren’t talking, just looking at each other, then she leaned in closer, pressing full into his body, arms wrapping around his waist, and she kissed him, light and gentle. His arms finally got into the game, pulling her even closer, and his lips followed hers, and after a few seconds he… he’d heard of it, but never done it, and right that second he really wanted to do it, so he just gently licked her, and she whimpered.

He almost jerked back, afraid he pissed her off, but she licked him back, and he decided that wasn’t pissed off, and that he really, really liked being licked, and that he wanted to do this a whole lot.

He wanted to do this every single day for the rest of his life.
It wasn’t his first kiss.

It was the first one that mattered.

Joann grinned at him when he brought Kelly back to the motel they were staying at. She tried to start a conversation. He glared at her and left, sure she was laughing at him, and sure he knew why she was laughing at him.

He was right about that, but she wasn’t laughing in an unkind way. But he was too young to know that, then.

He probably would have had the same response to Kelly’s first real boyfriend if he brought her home, sexually frustrated enough to chew through eighteen inch thick concrete, thus proving there was no way his daughter had lost her virginity that night.

Disheveled Marine with a rock hard wood and balls bluer than his jacket heading back to barracks wasn’t precisely rare back in 1976. Which didn’t mean that Gibbs particularly enjoyed the sensation.

He’d thought the guys bitching about girls teasing them so long they hurt was just BS.

Turns out it wasn’t. He’d been kicked in the balls before, by someone who meant it, and this wasn’t that bad, but that didn’t mean it didn’t hurt.

Not a ton of privacy, even in the showers, but right then he didn’t care.

He wanted to get a shower so he could get off. And he didn’t because he’d have to wash off her perfume. Every time he moved he could smell her. He didn’t know what the scent was, something warm and red, something her, and he liked it on his skin more than he could say.

He didn’t like the way his balls ached.

Sex won out.

It didn’t take long. He remembered her body against his, and the softness of her skin under his lips, he could feel the softness of her breast in his hand as they kissed, that got him on edge. He shifted the image, her hand wrapped around his dick. He gasped quietly at that, wondering how her hand, so small and soft, and hers would feel, let alone how it would feel if her lips were on his, and her tongue between his lips while she did it. Then his brain came up with another image, something else he’d heard about, but wasn’t sure if people, girls, actually did, but he could remember the feel of her tongue between his lips, and he imagined her mouth on his dick, and groaned, climax slamming through him.

More letters, a lot of them were pretty light little notes. How was your day, here’s what I did, type things. Some were deeper. Some he wrote easily. Some took hours. He got better at it, more relaxed, less erase-every-third word, as time went by.

He finds the one he’s looking for. Hardest one he ever wrote her. It didn’t take long, but he almost didn’t send it, afraid how she’d react to it.
April 22, 1977

Dear Shannon,

You asked once, why I don't talk about my mom. Said I could tell you, if I wanted to.

Today's the fifth anniversary of her death.

I knew she was dying, but no one would talk about it. Like saying it would make it true. Or maybe they just wouldn't say it to me, like if they told me, I'd break or I was too stupid to handle it or...

I don't know.

Doc kept giving us happy bullshit about not giving up.

Pastor James kept giving us more shit about praying and miracles.

But she didn't get better. She got smaller and weaker and sicker.

And the medicine made her angry, made her cry, made her throw up, and her hair fell out in clumps, and her skin turned gray, and she smelled like chemicals and death.

I overheard the Doc saying to my Dad that it was in her bones and maybe if they look the right arm off, she'd have more time. Not, she'd get better. Not, it'd fix things, but that it MIGHT give her more time.

I know he was going to say yes. Anything to get her more time. More time trapped in a sick, dying body. More time in pain.

She was crying when LJ went in to visit her that day. She wasn't when he left, but he was, not even trying not to or hide it. He didn't say anything to me when he left, just looked at me, looked away, and wiped his eyes and walked out.

She died that night.

My dad still thinks I don’t know what happened. Like I couldn’t figure out that she didn’t just die. Like I didn’t know how much morphine was in her room or what would happen if you took too much of it.

So, that’s it. That’s why I don’t talk about it. She killed herself. It’s supposed to be a sin, you know? Pastor James would have...

But he didn’t know, and we didn’t tell him.

She was sick and she died, and that’s all anyone ever said.

I don’t know how to end this one.

Gibbs

April 24, 1977
Dear Gibbs,

I’m so sorry.

I wish I was there to be with you. Wish I could have held you while you said that.

For what it’s worth, I don’t think it’s a sin. Not then. Not like that. I don’t think God holds it against you when you’re suffering. And I don’t think He’d have wanted you or your dad to spend this much time feeling bad about it.

She was sick and hurting. She died. She’s not sick anymore. And she’s waiting for the day (a long time from now) when she gets to see you again.

I do believe that.

I love you,

Shannon.

April 26, 1977

Dear Shannon,

I love you, too.

Gibbs

P.S. Wanted to say that for a while. Wanted to make sure you got it, quick. Real letter soon, when I’ve got more time.

That is the last letter in that album.

He thinks that their long-distance courtship was probably a good thing. Miles apart meant they got to know each other by letters. Meant that he got to know her in a way that would have been more difficult in person, because he knew what they did in person. (Made out.)

If he had stayed in Stillwater, or if she had been a local girl in Lejeune, he wouldn’t have gotten to know her as deeply as he did through those letters.

And he’s awfully doubtful she would have gotten to know him, because when it came down to it, even with her, talking was hard. Silence was his armor, and he was comfortable in it. Writing his thoughts down was a halfway space. He could let those thoughts out without having to say anything.

He flips through the next album. Mostly light letters. Another Marine Ball photo. Pictures of the two of them splashing around at Lake Conneaut, (his Dad had taken them out for a picnic one afternoon when he’d had leave, wanted to meet this girl his son was so taken with) he makes sure to get a shot of that, wanting one of them playing with each other. There were a few shots of him being a Marine taken by various buddies that he’d sent her. And there were shots of her at school that her friends had taken. There were shots of school that she had taken. A series of self-portraits that were her final project for one of the classes.
She had gotten a few candids of him while he was home. One was him working on the Challenger with his dad. He’d forgotten that one even existed, and took a shot of it for him. He wants to put that one up.

There’s a series of portraits of him, also taken for a class. (Though he suspects that might not be precisely true. He’d been a bit cagey about sitting for formal shots, but she wanted them, and he was home, and it was for a grade and… And the result was some really good shots of him, looking significantly more relaxed and happy than he does in any other formal picture that’s ever been taken of him.)

And there are shots of both of them. At the end of the session where she was taking shots of him, there were still three frames left on the film, so he pulled her into his lap, and she used the cable release to get the shots.
He’s smiling, chin on her shoulder, arms around her. She’s kissing his cheek. He took a shot of that one, too.

They were engaged for five months. So there’s a bunch of wedding letters.

And then they were married, so the frequency of letters dropped quite a bit. Sniper training was six months, and he was home most nights. For two years after that, he was home most nights. Never sent away for more than a month at a time.

But in ’81 he was stationed in Germany. The letters picked back up again.

He’d gotten one about six weeks after he’d left, and remembers that one very well.

August 13, 1981

Dear Gibbs,

Don’t know how to say this. I’m so excited!

Talked to the Doctor today. (He remembers seeing that and putting that together with excited and starting to feel an electric current flowing through his knees and elbows.) ’Round about the beginning of May we’re going to have a baby! (He actually shouted when he read that. Let out a whoop of joy.)

Get your butt home, Marine, you’ve got a daughter to meet! (She always thought Kelly was a girl. He kept hedging the bet, but Shannon was sure.)

Love,

Shannon & Baby

He didn’t write her back on that one. He pulled rank, bullied, verbally abused, and literally pushed one guy out of line to get to a phone.
He’d completely forgotten about the time difference, so it was three in the morning for her.

Eight rings in and he was about to hang up, resign himself to a letter, but a groggy, “Hello” met his ears, which was when he realized it was the middle of the night where she was.

“Shannon, I just got the letter, are you sure?”

He could feel the smile over the line.

“Oh yeah. You’re gonna be a daddy!”

He was grinning, giddy, wanting to jump up and down, but there was a huge line of guys also waiting to use a phone, and he was a Corporal, supposed to have a certain level of decorum, so he didn’t.

He also didn’t know what to say to her, but he didn’t want to hang up, he just wanted to be there with her, hold her, feel her breath against his skin. But that all had to wait. “I love you.”

“I know. We do, too.”

We! A tiny, little person was growing in his wife. “Oh, God, it’s real.”

“Yeah, Gibbs, it is. Gotta get back here, you’ve got a crib and rocking chair to build.”

She was laughing, letting the happy out. “I think a crib and rocking chair’ll do for right now.”

He was staring at the ceiling, buzzing with emotions he didn’t know what to do with. “You tell your parents?”

“Yeah. And your dad. They’re all over the moon.”

“Yeah.” The guys behind him were starting to grumble. “Okay, I’ve got to go. Can’t be hogging up the phone. They’re already pissed because I butted in line.”

“Go. I love you.”

“Love you, too.”

He takes shots of a few of the letters that followed, pictures of the sketches of the crib and rocking chair, pictures of Shannon’s belly slowly getting bigger, the two of them bouncing names around.

He was sent back home again in November, and then right before Christmas got drug back out again to go spend some time in Nicaragua.

He’d told Tim about those letters, making sure he got one out every single day, and he glances through them seeing that a lot of them were variations on the theme of ‘I’ll be home soon.’

And he was. Kelly was due May 10th. He got home the first week of February. Should have been plenty of time. But Kelly had different plans.
For the next five years, he tended to do four months on and four months off. Letters tended to be based on baby things, what he was doing, Shannon’s school work, stuff like that. He takes shots of a few of them, just to give a feel for what that time felt like.

And then the flavor of the pictures changes.

He picks up the next album, knowing what’s in it. He feels it, sitting on his lap, his fingers resting on the cover.

He had thought the idea of the Polaroid was stupid at first. They already had a camera. They had a good camera. She’d been a photography minor, so they had a good camera, a lot of good lenses and filters, and while she wasn’t developing her own stock anymore (Though he’d had plans to build her a proper dark room once they got a house. They were still saving up, wanted a place big enough for him to have a woodworking space, and a darkroom for her, and a backyard for Kelly to play in and…)

But it was her birthday money from her parents, and if she wanted to spend it on a camera she had already told him wasn’t very good, then he wasn’t going to say anything about it.

But not saying anything about it didn’t mean he wasn’t going to give her a few choice looks about it.

She just gently swatted him on the ass and said, “If Kelly cooperates, nap time’s ‘round two. Trust me, you’ll like this.”

“You’ve got her down?” Shannon asked when Gibbs came back into their bedroom.

“Yeah.”

“Good.” Then she handed him the camera. He was still feeling a bit stupid about this. It’s a camera, how much fun can it be? Then she started unbuttoning her shirt, and he suddenly felt like there might be a whole lot of fun things they could do with a camera.

She saw it really hit him and smiled, big and wide and happy. “Still think film that develops on its own is stupid?”

He shook his head. “Nope.”

The first ones are just nudes. Ones he took of her for his own viewing pleasure. (Though he gave her strict instructions that if she ever took any for him to never mail them to him. Pictures, no matter how graphic, were expected to be shared. And pictures that didn’t get shared more or less guaranteed that you got your stuff rifled through to find out what you got.) Ones she took of him for her. (He was shy about that at first, which felt weird, not like lots of people hadn’t seen him naked. Of course, lots of people hadn’t seen him naked, hard, and wanting sex. But eventually he got relaxed enough to be on the subject side of the camera. But he can see how stiff (and not in a good way) he is in the first few shots.)

Some of them were Shannon just messing around, seeing what she could do with the Polaroid. Composition. What the flash could do. There were some ridiculously under and over exposed shots of him in the all-together. Likewise she was messing around with focal length, seeing how close and how far away she could get and still get good shots. (There was one so close up and out of focus that the only reason he can tell it’s his dick and not his thumb is because he was there when she took it.)

Eventually the quality of the nudes got better. More put together looking. Better focus. More likely to be properly lit.

Eventually the idea that they didn’t necessarily need to put the camera down when the sex started also crept in.

Eventually she figured out how to get the tripod in place, and how to use the cable release.

And eventually those shots got scorching hot.

Eventually he started getting letters that ended with, ‘Looking through the photo albums, thinking of you, Love Shannon.’ And reading that would get him so hard, so fast.

He hasn’t done this since before she died. Hasn’t been able to. Didn’t matter how hot the shots were, sadness killed his hard-on and just left him grieving, angry, and craving enough alcohol to kill the parts of his brain that remembered why he was sad and angry.

Technically speaking, he’s never done this. These books were hers. When he was away he didn’t have the space for a full photo album. But he did keep a small book of whichever new shots really caught his interest.

(And every time he was getting ready to ship out again, they made sure that both of them got a new set of shots to play with for while they were apart.)

But he used to do something like this. Back against the wall, pants open, one hand flipping through the pictures, other in his lap.

His pants aren’t open, yet. (Can’t open. He’s wearing sweats). Hand’s not in his lap, either. But he’s not opposed to the idea of trying, seeing if he’s able to enjoy what they had without the loss of it crushing every iota of pleasure he could take from it.

It’s been long enough that he doesn’t remember what the first one is. He knows he’s at the end of the just nudes, because he can remember Shannon setting up the tripod and saying, ‘Let’s see what we can do with this,’ but he doesn’t remember what’s on the next page.

He flips it over.

He remembered them out of order.

She’d handed him the camera and said, ‘Take pictures,’ then shimmed down his body and started to blow him.

It’s her face, lips, tongue, and his dick. She’s licking the head of it, flat of her tongue flush on the underside of the tip of his dick, just about to pull off, eyes on the camera, half-smile on her face.

He feels his body throb at it, remembering how that felt, her tongue lapping at him, hand holding him firm at the base.

For the first time in years, he started to get hard without any touching.

Next shot down was her sucking him, cheeks little bit hallowed out, eyes sparkling at him. He could hear how she’d moan quietly while doing it, soft little mmmmm… delicious sounds. He loved those sounds. Loved how much she enjoyed him, and always acted like that, like he was delicious, like his physical body was something she craved every day, missed every night he was away, and was something she could never get enough of.

He certainly felt that way about her.

The film was expensive, and he didn’t want to burn through all of it, but when a minute went by without him taking another shot, she looked up and asked, “Not liking this?”

“No. I like this just fine,” he said, very sincerely, because he did like it, loved it.

“You aren’t taking pictures.”

“Don’t want to go through all the film.”

She smiled at that. “One pack is for you. One’s for me. You’ve got eight shots left.”

“Oh.” She licked him again, tongue trailing over his dick, and he decided he really needed a few more shots of that.

By the third shot he’s hard, and determined to enjoy it, enjoy this. Not let the sadness of the loss overwhelm the pleasure of what he had had.

He takes off his t-shirt. It’ll do duty for a cum rag.

He scoots out of his pants, wrapping his hand around his dick, looking at the picture, Shannon taking him all the way down. His hand moves slow and steady, the way her mouth would have. No need to go fast, plenty of time, this is just the opening round.

Half of his film was gone, and he felt his balls pulling up, knew he needed to switch things up or this wasn’t going to last all that much longer. He gently stepped back, then helped her stand, pulling her face to face, for a long, ravishing kiss.

When he was back from the edge, and she was breathing faster, he handed her the camera. “What do you want pictures of?”

Next page. They’re on the bed, instead of standing next to it. She was lying on her back. He was kneeling between her legs. The photo is cropped to just show him and her legs. On his left, her knee rested against his hip. On the right, he was holding her ankle, her calf against his chest. He was cradling it in his hand, kissing the hollow, as the fingers of his left hand trailed down her inner thigh.

The sense memory attached to that one hits like a hammer.

She used to wear… something. He doesn’t know what it was. It smelled good. Sweet, floral, yummy. The scent of it made him want to eat her alive.

It tasted nasty. They’d been married for a year when he finally said, “I love the way you smell,” and then licked her throat, over her pulse point, one of her favorite places to be nibbled and kissed, and where she’d also dab the perfume, “but this stuff tastes awful.”

She winced. “Really?”

“Blech.”

She messed around with a few other scents, and eventually decided to try a few drops of vanilla extract. The real stuff, not the vanilla-flavored goop. And while it’s true that Kelly hated the way that tasted, that was because it doesn’t taste like it smells. It tastes like what it is, alcohol that vanilla soaked in.

Which meant it wasn’t a problem for Gibbs.

And that image, his teeth gently sliding over the hallow of her ankle, where she’d dab a little of the extract brought back the scent, vanilla blended with her skin, and the feel, the smooth stretch of her leg against his stomach and chest, the silky warmth of her leg under his fingers.

For a second there, he was back, gently kissing and nibbling his way down her leg.

And a second later, he’s sitting on the floor in his bedroom, looking at pictures.

But that was always the way it worked. He’d be alone, looking at the shots, get so into them, into the memories attached to them, that he’d lose himself for little moments of time. For a few minutes, he’d be making love to her, and sure, eventually the real world would come back, but he could shut it out, and pull a few more minutes of time with her out of the ethers.

Part of him fights that, trying to stay firmly here, now. He’s fifty-six, at home, alone, looking at pictures, trying to enjoy memories of the life he lost.

Part of him doesn’t want to. He’s twenty-seven, at home, with his wife, baby napping, taking advantage of the time they’ve got alone.

He gives in, surrendering to it, burying himself in the memories triggered by the pictures.

Kissing his way down her leg, the feel, taste, smell of her skin on his lips. The way she’d gasp when he’d bite gently. (And sometimes not so gently, but that didn’t happen all that often. Usually when he was getting ready to ship out. They both liked having a mark that’d last. He’d just smirk at the other guys bragging about the marks on their chests or shoulders or back. His were never easy to see, upper, inner thigh, just the way he liked it.)

Spreading her legs wide, taking the time to suck and lick every inch of her, riding the waves of her pleasure and her cries.

He’s there, wrapped in her taste on his tongue, the feel of her hair against his face, wet on his lips and nose and fingers, her legs wrapped around his shoulders, rubbing himself with her juices while he licked her through her climax.

There, in that moment of her body tight and pulsing on his, wet, sucking throbs around his fingers, his own body hard and eager, kneeling, pulling her up to ride him, catching those last few twitches as she sank down onto his body.

Kneeling, her lips on his, facing him, his hands cradling her butt, hers in his hair, then on his face, holding him, kissing and kissing and kissing again as they rocked together.
Face to face, eyes open, no words, no words could cover it, but touch, glorious hard soft wet rich pleasure touch over and over up and down and in and

There, that second, his body going tighter, harder. Hers moving faster. Blood pumping, her teeth closing on his lip. Her hand tightening in his hair, pulling his head back. Her lips on his jaw, teeth on his throat.

He’s grunting with each breath thrust, pulling her even harder against him. Deeper, more, faster, wet and soft and everything slick and pumping hot pulse pleasure as he arches into her and things blank out into a gentle white ecstasy.

And like before, coming out of it is disappointing. The part of his brain that was fighting it probably had the right idea.

He’s not twenty-seven, and he’s not home with his wife, and it’s not nap time, and none of that will ever be real again.

Gibbs wipes up, feeling… He’s not sure what this feeling is.

Better than the last time he tried this. He’s not despondent. He did get off. He doesn’t want to break things or kill people.

He guesses all of those are steps in the right direction.

His head tilts back, resting against the side of the dresser, his eyes are closed, and he’s breathing deeply.

“I miss you.” He shakes his head. “Miss you so much.”

He doesn’t see her, but he feels her presence very clearly, and with it the sense that this is something he should be doing.

He looks around, sees that it’s only two in the afternoon. Lots of time.

He picks up the first album again, and this time starts to read straight through, not skipping around, not looking for things to illustrate what love meant.

This time he’s just trying to be close to her, just remembering who they were, and trying to get closer to being at peace about not being that any longer.

It’s well after eight when he closes the last album. He sits there, staring at nothing, holding it against his chest.

The last shots, like the ones that made it to Kelly’s growing up book, are from New Year’s Eve, 1990.

Kelly went to sleep at midnight.

They didn’t sleep at all.

The Polaroid was especially bad with low light shots, so the last collection of them were all sort of vaguely orange-brown, deep shadows in black, highlights in gold.
He’d brought the ones he’d liked best along with him. The ones that were left were for her. It’s probably not prophetic or foreshadowing, just that she preferred to have shots of him, and he preferred the ones of her, and they both liked the ones of both of them.

But even with that, the last shot does feel like foreshadowing.

The last shot is of just him.

He’s resting in their bed, on his side, head on his arm, leg draped so that his dick’s hidden. His eyes are closed, and his muscles relaxed.

There are probably fifty other versions of that shot through out those books. They don’t mean anything, other than she liked to get shots of him napping.

But that’s the last of the naked pictures. There are still letters. The date on the last one was February 4, 1991. Nothing special about that day. Him writing about how much he didn’t like what he was hearing about possible pull outs from Iraq and that there was no point to this if Hussein was still in place when they left.

He knows he wrote letters after that one. But he doubts she stuck them in the books the second she got them. And the ones that didn’t make it into the books didn’t come home with him when he packed up their place in California.

He puts the book down and rubs his eyes, remembering he’s working on something here, besides just sitting around until his entire bottom half had fallen completely asleep.

He sighs and looks through the pictures on his camera.

He’s got shots of them playing, and their home, and the things he made her, and the close, easy intimacy.

He doesn’t have a sex shot.

And he’s not sure if he wants to add one.

Sex is part of love, big part of what he and Shannon had together, always was, but those shots… They’re his, and private, and… his.

But he gets the sense she wouldn’t have minded if he shared one. Not in this sort of context.

He goes flipping through again, looking for something erotic but not explicit. He finds a good one. She’d set the camera with the tripod and cable release, they both knew where in focus was, and either of them could just hit the release and snap a shot without getting out of bed.

She’s on top, looking into his eyes, and he’s looking into hers, faces about four inches apart. On the far side of the shot, her hair is long and loose. On the near side, his hand is in her hair, holding it back, so her face, and his, is visible for the shot. The shot cuts off mid-back. It’s clear they’re naked, clear they’re in bed, but her arm blocks her breast, so it’s not too revealing.

Well, it’s not too naked. The faces are revealing. Pleasure, joy, happiness, love, all of it is clear on both of their faces in that instant. They aren’t looking at the camera, so it’s in profile, but he thinks anyone can see the love in those expressions, and in the gentleness of his hand in her hair, or the way her fingers are curled around his shoulder.
He snaps the next one, too. She was lying on his chest, head on his shoulder, (his face is blocking the view of all of her face but her chin) he was kissing her forehead, so all Cranston will be able to see is the back of his head. But that’s not really important. He’s looking at their hands. His fingers were lightly slipping down her spine. Her fingers were stroking over the back of his neck.

They weren’t done in that shot, though it wouldn’t be an insane assumption, just getting a break if he remembered right. After a minute, she pushed herself back up, straddling him, rising and falling as he palmed her breasts.

He turns the page. Yeah, he remembered right.

He didn’t take another shot of those pictures. The first two get the idea across. Rachel doesn’t need to see Shannon, head back, face tight, skin flushed rose, mouth open, climaxing as he sat up and licked her breasts. She doesn’t need to see the one after it, where his fingers and arms have gone tights, his jaw clenched as he comes with her. Or the one after that, her slumped into him, cradling his head against her chest, both of them sweaty, relaxed, panting, and smiling.

Almost done. He’s got shots of just about everything, now, but no fighting shots, either, because who takes photos of fighting? But that’s part of love, too.

Just, nothing he can take a shot…

Oh.

He stands up, slowly, rebalancing and wincing when his full weight hits the damaged knee, and then reaches for the box with his medals in it.

His purple heart is in there, and yes, it’s still got the slight dent on the top, and the scratches along the back.

He’d never gotten one before, so he didn’t know how it worked, not really.

He didn’t want her to worry, so he hold her the if you bleed you get one (which is true), and it was just a scratch, barely anything. (How he thought he’d get away with that lie, told to a woman who knew every inch of his body, he doesn’t know, but he was dumb enough to try.)

She wasn’t there when he got the ribbon. But they mailed the actual medal and the citation for how he got it home.

Which meant she read the whole story, and how ‘just a scratch’ meant almost bled out from a shrapnel wound to the thigh.

When he got home that night, he was really excited to see that Kelly was off spending the night with her parents.

Then he found out she was off spending the night with her grandparents so Shannon could full on scream at him without upsetting their daughter.

She’d thrown the medal at him, and he ducked. It hit the mantle hard enough to leave a small dent and scrape up the back.
That’s what all their worst arguments were, each of them being scared for the other.

She found the vasectomy scar.

Three other wives, who knows how many one night stands, four lovers, none of the rest of them ever noticed that scar. It’s tiny. It’s not in an obvious location. (It was intentionally not in an obvious location.) But she saw it, and what had been a very, very good afternoon rapidly turned into a very, very big argument.

And it was another stupid thing, because sooner or later she would have started asking about maybe they should see a doctor because she did want more children, and she would have continued to not get pregnant, so obviously something wasn’t working right.

But as he said before, and will likely say again, scared guys do stupid things, and with the memory of that c-section bright in his mind, along with how her voice sounded when she said, ‘Gibbs, I can’t see’ he was world-class scared and that brought on massive stupid.

He couldn’t do it again. Couldn’t risk it.

Though, in retrospect, if he had just told her, she would have been okay with it.

And while she never got okay with him not talking to her first, she understood he was scared, and understood that he couldn’t bear to let her see him scared. That that was just as bad as being scared for him.

That was one of the few times where his Dad’s ‘the world won’t end if you wait’ line made sense. Had he been a bit older, bit more sure of himself, he probably could have said to her that he’d never, ever been so scared in his life and that he’d literally rather go up against a firing squad than ever feel that way again.

But he was barely twenty-four when Kelly was born, still twenty-four when she found the scar, and he couldn’t say that, especially not to her, not then.

Their last argument, the last thing he ever had the chance to say to her, over a static and pop filled connection that he’d practically had to kill to get was about testifying in that case.

The Feds were telling her they could keep her and Kelly safe. They were telling her about how many people she’d be able to help by getting this guy off the street.

And she had her own sense of duty and honor, and how you had to stand up for what was right. And testifying was right.

He begged her not to testify. The whole thing just scared the shit out of him. Set all his warning sensors off. Woke him up out of a dead sleep in a cold sweat, nightmares he couldn’t remember, but knew had something to do with it racing through his head.

By then, he was enough of a grown up to say, ‘I’m scared.’ And she was, too. But she was also sure it was right. He’d killed a man. She saw it. It was her job to make sure it didn’t happen again.

And doing the right thing mattered more than being scared. After all, wasn’t that what he did every single time he went out there?

He didn’t have a good response for that. He never had a good response for any of it, other than flat out begging her not to do it.

“Shannon, please, don’t.”

“Gibbs…”

“Please.” And he ran out of time.

He put the rest of it in a letter. But, by the time the letter got there, they were already dead.

The picture of the medal by itself probably didn’t mean much, wouldn’t, and there is no way in hell that he’d try to get a shot of the vasectomy scar. But it didn’t take much effort to get his pants down again, so he gets a shot of the scar on his thigh, and he flips through the nudes until he found a good one of her belly, takes a shot of that, cropping it carefully, so only the scar is visible.

That will do, until he sees Rachel and tells her about it.

He heads downstairs, to the table where he tosses his keys, wallet, and ID when he comes in, and takes one last picture, it’s his badge. There’s nothing left from that last fight, nothing left of Hernandez or the car crash that killed them or the bullet he put through him or begging Shannon not to testify.

All that’s left is him, and who he became because of that.

And the badge symbolizes that well enough.

He sat in front of the computer, finished attaching all of the photos, put them in more or less chronological order, put Rachel’s email address in, and spent a moment looking at the subject line. Then he wrote: 1000 Pictures One Word.
Tradition and Context

When five Sundays went by without them setting foot at St. Sebastian's, Father John called Abby. It was polite, gentle, wanting to see how she and Kelly were, reminding them that even if they weren't happy about the whole baptism thing, that they were still more than welcome at the church.

"He sounded a little nervous," Abby says to Tim as they eat dinner, after telling him about it.

"Like his plan won't work if we don't get back there?"

"Maybe." She tickles the bottom of Kelly's foot while she flails a bit in her bouncy chair.

"Sooo…” Tim asks, bite of grilled zucchini halfway to his mouth, "You want to wait another week and then have me try again? I can tell him that we're church shopping, that we've been to Jimmy and Breena's for the last few weeks and liked it, and that if he won't budge on this, we won't be back, and if he doesn't fold, then I will."

She shrugs.

"It's up to you. You want, we can be there next week, and I'll tell him Sister Rosita is fine."

"I actually do like Jimmy and Breena's church."

Tim nods. It's still church, so it's not like one's much better than another to him, but Jimmy and Breena are there, and the nursery seems nice, and everyone's friendly, and okay, yeah, he doesn't adore having an extra five hours a week with Ed Slater, but as downsides go, especially post-Bootcamp, post-Gibbs (Gibbs!) telling stories of them all kicking ass and taking names, it's not a horrific one.

"Whatever you want on this," Tim says, stroking her hand.

"More time to think."

"As long as you want. I don't mind if Father John sweats this."

Okay, it's not likely, at all, but it has been more than two weeks, and there's no other way to tell, because she's not menstruating again, yet…

"We going to do another pregnancy test?" he asks while walking Kelly around, patting her back gently, trying to get that last burp out of her before taking her for the second of her nighttime sleeps. Abby sticks her head out of the bathroom, toothbrush between her lips. "I had the water running, what did you say?"

"Pregnancy test? I know it's not likely, but…"

She nods and heads back into the bathroom.

Kelly belches loudly, and Tim kisses the top of her head. "Good girl. Okay, back to bed for you." She settled in against his chest more closely. "Yeah, I bet you do feel better, don't you?"

A sleepy and content little chirp answers him.
Rocking, lullaby, sleepy baby back in bed, and then back to his own room he goes. Abby's already in their bed, so he looks at her expectantly, and she shakes her head.

"Oh."

She's got a kind of disappointed half-smile on her face. "Yeah."

He sits down next to her. "You okay?"

"Yeah. Just… I don't know, about half-relieved and half-disappointed. Didn't want to be pregnant again, not yet, didn't want to not be, either."

He nods at that and kisses her, same half-disappointed smile on his face. "Yeah."

Okay, it's not his most riveting story ever. Mostly just how Tony and Ziva are finally both back, which means Tony's in charge of the team again, and this was their first case out at full strength again, and sure, she's heard the whole, we found a dead body, we processed evidence, and then I spent the next six hours mucking about on the computers to find out more, is pretty routine, but it's not actually boring.

"What's up, you're a million miles away?" he finally asks, because she's not following the story at all.

She shakes her head. "Sorry. Just been thinking a lot today."

"About?"

"You asked, a while back, what being Catholic means to me, and, I think I've got it, now."

Ah, back to that. Well, it's Thursday, and yet another Sunday is looming. Okay, he can see how it'd be on her mind.

"Okay," he says, keep talking on his face.

"It's a line of traditions, tying me to my family. Mostly to people who aren't here anymore, people you've never met. And I don't want to break that line. Every Sunday we're there, I take communion just like I did with my mom and dad and my aunts and uncles and grandparents."

"That's good enough for me."

She flashes him the not quite done yet look. "But… maybe it doesn't have to be that line. There are other traditions out there. King cakes for Easter, Jambalaya for Christmas, the tree, stuff like that. Just… you know, if it's you and me, it doesn't matter that gays can't marry and women can't be ordained and no birth control, well, I mean it does, but…"

"I got ya." He's nodding, knowing that she doesn't mean that those aren't issues, but that they're grown-ups so they've got their own contexts for them.

"It can just be little idiosyncrasies that we ignore or tolerate, and the links matter more than they do."

Another nod. They're on the same page here.

"But Kelly'd be learning this from scratch. She and any other kids we have are a new start, and…"
And I don't want them burned on this the way you are."

He smiles ruefully at that. "You've got to actively work on it to get my past with this. This isn't some sort of accident."

"You didn't like the fact that this was just empty symbolism for your dad. You going to a church you don't believe in looks like setting up that pattern all over again, and I don't want that for our kids."

That stops him short. And for a moment he has to think about it, because he hasn't wondered what their kids might think about this, and if they'll see it as him just going through the motions to provide a certain image. But, eventually, he decides no, it won't be. "It's not empty for me, it's just… not what most people mean by it."

Abby smiles at that.

He gently strokes her wedding ring. "For me, this is part of our marriage. This is part of the vow to put you first. And that matters more to me than everything else."

That got a kiss.

"It's not just your dad that burned you on it."

True. Granted, his dad set the pattern that made him loathe empty symbolism, but he thinks even if he hadn't grown up with John it'd still bug him. "I'd have probably been a lot more tolerant of it if it hadn't been for him. Probably a lot more like how Penny deals with it."

"True. But the point I'm trying to get to, is that there is a lot of empty crap that goes with this, and… when I think about it, what being a Christian is, what I want and need from a church, and from faith, and what I want to do with it, the heart of it is love. God's love for everyone. And if it's about love, and if we're all sinners trying to do better… Then anything that encourages hate, that gives it space to grow and nourishes it, is the problem, and a lot of the stuff I don't like about being Catholic just encourages hate. And it's not a problem for me, I've got context for it, but Kelly doesn't and… maybe she doesn't need to hear about homosexuals going to hell, or that there's something bad about pleasure, or that it's her job to crank out as many babies as she can, or that she can never be equal to a man. Maybe, we don't need to try to teach her God loves everyone all the time and in all ways, while also teaching her that He's constantly judging everything and that eternal pain and torment is waiting for the people who don't measure up."

Tim smiles at her. "I'm good with that."

"And Jimmy and Breena's church isn't perfect, but they ordain women and marry gays and that's two pretty big steps."

He nods.

"And they're a lot less focused on doing things the 'right way' and more focused on doing the 'right thing.'"

"I like that part, too."

Abby smiles at that. "I bet Ducky would have something to say about Pharisees right now."

"I don't remember who they are."

"The guys Jesus was rebelling against. They were so caught up in the letter of the law that they forgot the spirit of it."

"Seems appropriate. So, St. Mary's?"

"Yeah."

"Okay."

On Sunday, Tim and Abby had a chat with Pastor Brons about what was involved in joining St. Mary's. They offered new members' classes which Brons said were basically Episcopalianism 101. They started new ones every other month, and the next class began in September.

Abby signed up for it. Tim didn't. He'll attend St. Mary's, but won't formally join any church. (Brons found that… amusing is probably the best word. He has the sense that she's thinking she'll eventually get her claws into him, but he's doubtful. Okay, he thinks she's out and out insane, but he's vastly too polite to say it.)

They also set the date for Kelly's baptism. November 9, 2015, they'll stand up there with the Palmers and officially welcome their daughter into the church.

And while various Slaters hadn't been thrilled at the idea of Tim and Abby as Molly's godparents, when word started to get around the family over the course of Sunday dinner that Jimmy and Breena would be Kelly's godparents, there was some hardcore celebrating.
Distance

Professional distance is something that, if you could get her to admit it, Cranston finds difficult with some clients. Not that that's terribly shocking or anything, every counselor has that client who, for whatever reason, is hard to keep off in a nice, safe little box.

Sometimes you just like people, and when you like people, they get inside, and when they get inside, that's bad for professional objectivity.

Which is part of the reason why she's got Gibbs mailing her stuff ahead of time. She does like him, and she is finding it difficult to keep the distance she needs from him.

She was skimming through what he wrote about his failed loves, saw, not just the length, but the intensity, and knew that part of keeping her own emotional cool would involve making sure she had time to read, think, feel, and process before she added him and his emotions to the mix as well.

She can feel her own inner ethicist yelling at her. She likes Gibbs. They do not have a good starting relationship for a client therapist relationship. The power dynamics are wrong. The history is wrong. Kate is a great, big, neon flag of wrong. (Some of the things Kate told Rachel about Gibbs, which is part of why she's interested in knowing him better is also a massive heaping pile of wrong.) The way he sees her is wrong.

But she's also dead certain that, unlike Tony, whom she could refer off to someone else, Gibbs will not talk to another person about this. If she refers him off, that'll be the end of this. He'll curl back into his shell and never crawl out again. (You're justifying. Yeah, well, I'm also right.)

And she doesn't want that for him.

So, (her inner ethicist thinks this is BS excuse making and that she knows what she needs to do, and not doing it is wrong) she gives him homework assignments so she's got enough time to deal with what he's giving her and can then listen to him with a calm mind.

Still, even with all of that, she was very excited to see 1000 Pictures One Word show up in her inbox. And very, very curious to see that it had 70 attachments.

She opened the email and saw they were pictures.

She wasn't expecting pictures. She probably should have. 'Tell me what love means to you?' What'd she expect, poetry? Another essay? The guy rarely talks if he can avoid it.

Next assignment, he'll probably carve her something.

She goes through his pictures, watching the love story unfold, (amazed at how young Gibbs and Shannon are in the beginning. She knew they had to have married young, but, Lord, they're teenagers in the first shots.) seeing them slowly age, seeing Kelly join the family. Mostly she makes note of the joy. She knows that most people only take photos of happy times, but there's a deep, settled quality to the happy in these.

She was mildly surprised to see how far he took the photos. (And somehow, not very surprised at all to see he had photos like that to share.)

She's not sure what the purple heart means, but does take note of the fact that it's dented and scratched. Unusual for a medal. Especially for a man like Gibbs, she's expect his medals to be kept in pristine shape. She assumes the scar that's clearly his goes with the purple heart. She's not sure what, besides a c-section, the scar on Shannon means. (Or why it's off with the purple heart and the scar on his leg, and not with the shots of Kelly as a baby.)

Likewise she isn't sure what he's telling her with the badge.

But tomorrow she'll find out.

She makes a few notes for herself as she looks through. Questions as to what this or that means. (Like the laundry room, badge, and the Purple Heart.)

But when she gets to the end of the pictures one thing sticks out, and she wonders if he knows he was doing this.

What does love mean to you?

Shannon.

That's his answer. And she wonders if he thinks he's showing her examples of what a loving relationship looked like, or if he knows that what he's saying is that, to him, love is Shannon?

Closing her email, she stands up, and heads to her book shelf. She has a decent-sized collection of Mark Twain and knows which one she wants. Her fingers find the Diary of Adam and Eve and skip to the back cover, and then back a few pages to Adam's final words, spoken standing over Eve's grave.

"Wheresoever she was, there was Eden."

She sits down, finger marking the page, book in her lap, forefinger gently tapping the cover, and sees that this is Gibbs' fall. That life with Shannon and Kelly was grace, Eden, and a bullet tore it to pieces.

This isn't just the loss of love, this is the loss of innocence.

And no matter what, innocence is one thing Gibbs can't get back.

"Three cups?" Rachel asks as Gibbs hobbles in on Monday morning. She notices that he's got one in his hand, go bag slung over his shoulder and down to one crutch.

He handed the cup over. "Thought you might like one."

"You're getting me coffee?"

"Sure. You drink coffee, right?" he says while unpacking the cups he brought for himself from the go bag.

"Yes." There's some tension in her voice. Part of it is wariness from her own reactions to Gibbs, part of it is wondering how he's reacting to her. After all this is an emotionally vulnerable guy who doesn't have intimate relationships with women who are equals and has a bad track record when it comes to not sexualizing relationships with redheads.
He catches that wariness. "It's not a problem is it?"

"That depends, why did you get it?"

He shrugs. "I thought you might like it."

"Really?"

She can see by the look on his face he knows he's tripped over a line, but he's not sure what line or why. "It's friendly?"

She raises an eyebrow.

"It's easier to talk if we're just two people sitting around talking over coffee."

She nods and takes a sip. It's good. Hot, creamy, sweet, hint of nutmeg. The way she likes it, and very much not how he'd fix it for himself. "That's fine. If it makes talking easier, then I'm happy to have coffee with you. But somewhere in your mind, you need to remember that this isn't a date, we aren't just getting to know each other, and I'm not another redhead you're working on charming. There are lines, Jethro, hard rules, and this doesn't work if we don't follow them."

He nods. "I know."

"Do you?"

"Yeah." He nods, suddenly very aware of how easy it would be to slip into the idea of Rachel as another woman he was courting, and how that would fuck everything sideways. He nods again, voice serious as he says, "I do."

"Good." She sees the smile on his face. "What?"

He shakes his head, licks his lips, looks away, sheepish, and then looks back at her. "You might not want to know."

"Try me."

"Just bringing back the memory of slapping myself upside the back of my head about your sister. Had a very long conversation with myself about how she was my employee, and too damn young, and I'd already made that mistake once and no one ended up better off for it."

He sees the smile on Rachel's face. There's a knowing flavor to the amusement in her eyes.

"But you already knew about that…"

Rachel nods. And she'd heard the other half of it. The frustration of too old, too divorced, too bitter, too married to the job, too much of a bastard, too much her boss.

Gibbs shrugs. He wasn't surprised that Kate felt it, too. Would have been a whole lot easier if she hadn't been interested in him because, for whatever reason, he never sparked for a girl who wasn't at least mildly interested in him back.

"So, tell me about the photo essay. How long did it take…"

They spent most of the hour going over what he'd taken pictures of, what different details meant, how it fall fit together.

By the end of it Rachel was sure that, yes, to Jethro, love meant Shannon. And as long as that was true, there wasn't going to be any getting past this.

"Jethro, try to put it into words. Just a few of them. What is love?"

He stares at her, swallows his coffee, takes another sip, stares some more, thinking, that's clear on his face, but eventually he shakes his head.

"Are there any words in your head right now? Is it that you can't say it, won't say it, or there's nothing to say?"

"There's nothing to say."

"Give me your wallet."

He's looking at her like she's crazy, but he hands it over.

She very carefully took the picture of Shannon out, feeling the years of attachment, the decades of love in the frayed edges of the picture, and then held it out to him. "Jethro, is this love?"

He nods.

"And that's why it never works, why you never fall in love with anyone else, because you keep trying to get this, again, don't you?"

"Yes."

She tucks the picture back into his wallet and hands it back to him.

"Jethro, you are never going to have her again. That life is gone. Shannon is dead. Kelly is dead. The man you used to be, is dead. None of it is ever going to come back."

"I know."

"Do you? Do you know it in your guts and bones, can you feel it in your soul, that this is never coming back, that you can never rebuild this, and hoping and praying and trying is never, ever going to get it back for you?"

He blinks, slowly, silently, and swallows, hard.

"Have you ever said the words?"

He looks at her, pained, curious.

"Have you ever said, 'My wife, Shannon, is dead?'"

He thinks about it, sure he must have at some point, but he also realizes that he's never said it to any of his women, even with Susan, he'd never said the word. He told her he was a widower, but left the details vague, and the word dead never crossed his lips.

"No."

"Can you?"
He opens his mouth and feels every word he's ever had go skittering off. Then he closes his mouth and shakes his head. No. Not right now. Not today. Not to her. Especially not after the hours he spent looking at the pictures.

"That's next week's homework assignment. Say it to someone."

He nods, and begins to pack his stuff up.
Tim's sitting on the floor, Kelly on his legs, looking up at him, one hand wrapped around each of his index fingers. She's cooing and gurgling, and he's doing it back to her, or she's doing it back to him, either way, it's happening.

He's rubbing the tip of his nose against hers and then pulls back, "Gooo."

Her eyes are bright, and she smiles at him. Wide open, happy, smiling.

And he feels so wrapped in love with that, so awash in adoration for this tiny person and how much she's his whole world and…

And he snags his phone and gets a quick shot of it.

And before he puts the phone down he hit the call button.

"Oh My God! Tim! Honey, are you okay!" his mom answers on the first ring, sounding breathless.

"Hi, Mom. Kelly just smiled at me."

"Oh, baby." He can hear the smile in her voice, and some confusion, and excitement, and fear. "Is she still doing it?"

"No. Not anymore, staring at me, looking confused."

"Is that her I'm hearing?" 'Staring at me' also involved blowing bubbles and cooing at him.

"Yeah, that's her. I just… She smiled at me, and I wanted to tell you about it."

"I'm glad you did. Did you get a picture?"

"Yeah. I can send you—"

"No!" he can feel the way she's biting her lip on that, not wanting to demand anything, but terrified she'll scare him off. "Just, please, don't hang up, please… keep talking to me, okay?"

"Okay." But he's not sure what to say. And she's just listening, listening hard. He can imagine the look on her face, can hear the fact that she's excited by the way she's breathing. Can feel how nervous she is right now, terrified of saying the wrong thing and scaring him off. "I miss you."

"I miss you, too, Tim. Miss you so much."

"And I'm really angry," he hears the edge in his voice as he says that, and feels her flinch at the heat in his voice.

"I know. I'm sorry. I… just… I'm sorry."

"And I'm going to be angry for a long time."

"It's okay."
"But I miss you, and she smiled at me, and I wanted to tell you about it."

"I want to hear about it, about all of it."

Kelly makes a little fussy noise, one he's got characterized as the naptime five minute warning.

"I've got to go put her down before she gets overtired."

"Okay."

"Bye."

"Wait… Tim?"

"Yeah?"

"Can I call you?"

"Sure. Might not answer, but yeah, you can call."

"Okay. That's good enough for now."

"Okay. Bye, Mom."

"Bye."

His hands are shaking as he hangs up the phone, and he didn't know what to call the emotion flooding through him.

But he does know he's a dad, and it's his job to make sure his little girl gets down to sleep before she gets overtired.

So he picks her up, gently, cradling her against his chest, and carries her up to her room.

And he spends too long sitting with her in the rocking chair, lips against the crown of her head, his hands wrapped around her, feeling her heart beating against his, because she's dead asleep before he felt like he could let her go.

But she didn't mind.

"Tim?" Abby asks him curiously as he heads out of Kelly's room. She knows something's up; it doesn't take half an hour to put Kelly down.

He nods toward their room, not wanting to have this conversation right outside Kelly's door. Sure, she'll sleep through whatever comes her way, but it still feels odd to chat right next to where she's sleeping.

He sits on their bed, in the middle, back against the headboard and pillows, and she follows, settling in next to him.

He fishes his phone out of his pocket and shows her the picture of Kelly smiling.

"Ohhh…” she half-says it, half-breathes it, eyes soft, smile wide. "She's smiling."
"Yeah," he says it softly, rubbing his hand up and down her back.

"Why didn't you call me?"

"You were sleeping."

She nods a little at that. As of this point, she has not yet lifted the wake me up and die rule. She snuggles in close to him, head against his shoulder, legs draped over his, holding his phone, gazing at Kelly's first smile. Then she looks back up at him and raises an eyebrow, that's not all clear on her face.

He rests his head against the headboard, staring up at the ceiling and sighed long and deep. "I called my mom."

"Oh." She squeezes him a little tighter and kisses his shoulder. "How'd that go?"

"Okay, I guess. She said she was sorry. I said I was mad and that I was going to be mad for a long time, but that I wanted to tell her that Kelly smiled."

She nods. "Are you all right?"

He shakes his head. "I don't know. She was sorry and nervous I'd run away and scared and misses me and... And I don't know."

"Angry?"

"Maybe." He closes his eyes, and his posture slumps a bit. "Hurting again. I hold Kelly and..." He opens them and looks at Abby. "And she's my world. Just, so much love and joy and hope and... And I just want to protect her from everything. And how could either of them, but especially her... She's my mom. I grew in her body. How could she have thought that what they did was all right?"

"I don't know."

He shakes his head again. And Abby snuggled with him, holding him, not saying anything, letting him process as well as he can.

Eventually, Kelly wakes up again, asking for yet more food. Abby starts to get up, but Tim shakes his head, kisses her, and gets up.

"Hey, baby girl."

She looks up at him from her crib, eyes tracking him as he leans over to pick her up.

"Let's get you clean and ready for second dinner."

She seems to appreciate that idea. She's quietly sitting in his arms, waiting to get changed.

He lays her down, takes care of business, tickling her feet a little, which gets a startled look and an indignant squawk out of Kelly. He chirps back at her, mimicking the sound. "You know, when you can laugh, you might get tickled a lot." He lifts her to his shoulder. "I can't imagine your Pop'll ever turn up a chance to tickle his favorite girl. And your Uncle Jimmy, he's a tickle maniac. Your cousin Molly'll tell you all about it." He kisses the top of her head. "But if you don't like getting tickled, I won't do it. And I won't let them do it, either."

