either, so maybe she’s content to snuggle and doze, too.

What feels like a minute later, but according to the clock is two hours, he feels the bounce of a small body climbing into their bed and more or less hopping on him, along with “Uncle Tim, Uncle Jetro says it’s time to go on Adventures!”

He slowly blinks a few times, and then looks at Molly, who is kneeling right next to him on the bed, face a few inches from his.

“Okay…” He’s awake enough to make words now. “Tell Gibbs I’ll be there in ten.”

Molly grins, and bounces back out of the room. Tim kisses Abby’s neck, holds her tighter, and then pulls back.

“So much for an early morning bit of fun,” Abby says, also blinking herself awake.

He kisses her once more. “There’s always naptime.”

She grins back up at him.
Pushing the cart through the grocery store, with Sean and Anna in the little seat at the front, Kelly kneeling in the cart, while Gibbs walks with Molly on his shoulders, Ziva a few steps ahead with Dave in a snuggli on her chest, as they pick out whatever they’re having for lunch, dinner, and breakfast tomorrow has got to be one of Tim’s favorite sights.

The smell of fresh cut grass, the sound of the mowers buzzing, the feel of pushing it against the grass. The heat of the sun on his back, t-shirt clinging to his skin as he soaks his shirt with sweat. The slight prickly sensation as tiny bits of grass flick away from the mower and hit his legs. Above and behind it, the faint whiff of wood smoke from Gibbs getting the grill ready to go.

Every family has chores. Things that have to get done. And with them not living at the house fulltime that means everything that goes with keeping it running has to happen on the weekends.

And from May to October, that means mowing the grass. Tim and Tony have the job this weekend. Abbi’s on making sure the edges get trimmed. Between the three of them it’ll take about an hour and a half. Not a huge job, but none of them mind the weekends when it’s not their job.

When it’s done, Tim’s hot, and tired, and his shoulder aches a bit. It generally doesn’t enjoy things where he’s got to push something that vibrates. (At least, he’s assuming that’s the issue. Mowing grass is pretty much the only time where this issue pops up. Though maybe this winter he’ll use the snow blower and find out if he’s right about what’s going on.)

But, when it’s done, they’ve got the whole backyard area smoothed down, and everything smells like fresh cut grass, wood smoke, and just a hint of cooking beef and onions.

Tim’s hungry, and food is coming soon.

Hot water bursting all over his skin.

Tim may not love mowing the lawn, but he’d have to admit that a hot shower right after doing that, and then stepping from his overheated shower into the cool air of his bedroom feels amazing.

He takes a minute to towel dry his hair, and then slips on a t-shirt and his PJ pants. Nothing’s happening tonight he needs real clothing for, and right now soft, cool cotton on his skin sounds like an excellent plan.

Salt. He can feel the fleck of it on his lip, and taste it evening out the bitter/sour flavor of the margarita at his hand. His tongue slips out, catching that tiny flake of salt, and he feels/tastes it dissolve on his tongue.

They generally don’t do much in the way of mixed drinks, but during the morning’s Adventures at the Temple of Food, flank steaks were on sale, and that looked like an awesome opening for tacos, and if they’re having tacos for dinner, then margaritas go on the menu, too.

For someone who doesn’t do much with sugar, Jimmy’s got some mad margarita skills. He’s really picky about what limes go into it, which tequila, and God forbid you don’t get the right organic blue agave syrup. (The one time Tim brought the wrong stuff home, Jimmy wasn’t willing to mix ‘em up. He didn’t want to be associated with a ‘sad sack drink good only for getting wasted.’ The less said about the time Tony brought frozen limeade, the better.) But assuming you bring him the exact right mix of ingredients. (Including the correct ratio of Key limes to Persian limes.) He will mix up some incredible margaritas.

Tim was just about on the back porch when Jimmy handed him the first one, gesturing to the set up in the kitchen. There’s two pitchers full, and Tim can see more limes waiting.

Tim feels his muscles loosen up, buzz creeping through him. Jimmy mixes them tasty and strong.

He kisses Jimmy thanks for the drink, and can taste more salt, more bitter/sour/sweet on his lips. Apparently Jimmy’s been sampling his wares, making sure they’re up to snuff.

From the kitchen, Tim can see Gibbs on the back porch, flipping the steaks. Maybe half an hour or so until dinner.

The sound of Sean laughing, just uproariously laughing. Eyes wide, mouth wide, giggling like only a baby can.

Tim might not be entirely sober by this point, but he’s having a good time. He’s laying back on the grass, Sean in his hands, “flying” him around, and then pulling him back down to blow raspberries on his belly.

Sean’s dressed for the weather. He’s in a diaper, and that’s it. (Right now, it’s a very no shirt, no shoes, no problem sort of vibe. It’s hot outside right now. The girls are in the baby pool, splashing around. And Sean’s not the only one wearing just a diaper.)

Every time Tim starts to drop Sean down toward his lips, Sean starts to belt out laughing. Once his lips hit Sean’s belly, his little arms and legs flail around as he just wails with laughter.

The scratch of claws on his tummy.

Apparently, Jackson wants in on the game, too. He’s rushed up and is now standing on Tim’s belly, hopping up and down, licking Sean’s feet, which just adds to the laughing.

“The scratch of claws on his tummy.” That may be his favorite word on earth. At least right now. (In a few hours, once they’re in bed, he’ll likely have a different favorite word on earth. Tim’s perfectly fine with situational favorites.)

Kelly comes barreling over to join in, soaking wet from playing in the pool. Fortunately, Jackson hops off his tummy before Kelly flops onto him, knocking the air out of him. “Daddy!”
Tim coughs a few times, and sits up, grabbing his kids, holding onto them. Then he puts Sean down on the grass, pulls off his now soaked t-shirt, and rolls onto his hands and knees, crouching down low, so Kelly can scramble onto his back.

She lays flat on his back, arms around his neck, and he pushes himself up, and starts crawling around the backyard.

This time the laughing is punctuated with “Horsey!”

He makes sure she’s got a good hold of him and then “rears” up a bit, and Kelly tightens her grip and laughs even louder.

Salty, bitter lime, alcohol burn; flour tortilla; creamy, cool guacamole; sweet, charred onions and peppers, and the rich, salt, spicy beef.

Tim hopes they get to do taco night at least once more this summer.

Four little bodies, all tucked into their cribs/beds.

Definitely one of his favorite sights.

It’s not very dark, not yet. But it’s bedtime for the kiddos, and they’re all washed up, in their jammies, and in their beds. Gray light from the dusk sky outside, and blue light from the nightlight in their room.

Molly, like her daddy, likes to sleep on her back, sprawled out, taking up as much room as she can.

Kelly, like both of her parents, prefers to sleep on her side, wrapped around her very favorite stuffy: Skully.

Anna’s on her back, slowly sucking on her pacifier, eyes droopy. She and Sean share a crib, but not for all that much longer, they’re both getting big for it, and they’re going to need more space for Donnie, soon. Sean’s at the other end of the crib, and though they keep putting him down on his back, the first thing he does, as soon as he’s down on the mattress, is flip himself over onto his stomach.

Four little bodies, small getting-ready-to-sleep sounds, blue-gray light of a late summer night.

Tim’s smiling as he eases shut the door, getting ready to head back to the porch where the rest of the family is.

Warm summer night, lit by flickering tiki torches, gold light spilling out onto the porch from their living room, and the flicker of lightning bugs along the tree line.

His favorite people are arranged around the porch, sitting at the table or on the lounges. Tim pours himself another margarita as he watches his family relaxing and chatting.
Tony’s laugh spills through the group, and Tim can’t make out what exactly it is Ducky’s saying, but apparently it adds to it, because more laughs join Tony’s.

He takes a sip, walking through the living room, out to join the others. Opening the sliding glass door to the patio adds the sounds of a million frogs and a billion crickets to the lull of voices. Under his feet there’s the warmth of the sun caught in flagstone, and on his skin there’s the damp heat of a humid August night.

Abby sits up on the lounge chair she’s been keeping for them. He joins her, handing her his drink, and she takes a swallow, as he sits behind her. A moment later, she settles back, sitting between his legs, her back against his chest. He rests his face against her neck and shoulder for a moment. Inhaling the scent of her hair and skin. He kisses her shoulder, enjoying warm skin against his lips, and then reaches over for another sip of his drink.

Across from them, Ducky and Penny are sitting at the table. They’ve got a chess game going, as they talk to everyone else.

Gibbs and Abbi are sharing a lounge, too. Abbi’s got a margarita, and Gibbs has a beer, and both of them are looking soft and goofy. He’s lounging on his back, one hand behind his head. She’s sitting with her back to his hip, leaning forward, hands on her knees, toward the rest of the group, eyes lit up as she and Tony are taking about some undercover work they’d done years ago. Her hair is up in a ponytail, some of it starting to fall out, and Gibbs gently pets a few of the tendrils, between long, slow pulls on his beer.

Ziva’s in one of the cushy chairs. She’s got a margarita, too, but hers is virgin. And the reason for that is being walked around by his daddy, who is talking, animatedly with Abbi, telling a story that Tim’s sure is at least 95% bullshit, but it’s entertaining bullshit, as he tries to coax a burp out of the little guy.

Dave DiNozzo’s fussing a bit, but they’re all used to having a fussing baby as part of any gathering. After a massive belch, he settles back down, and Tony hands him back to Ziva, who gets him onto her other breast, where he happily tucks into Second Dinner, Course Two. Tony half sits, half hovers on the arm of her chair, stroking her cheek as Dave slops away, and Abbi takes over telling the story of Impossible Daring Do.

Jimmy’s sitting at the far edge of the lounge Tim and Abby are sharing. In front of him, Breena’s sitting on an exercise ball. They’re sharing a collection of bottles of water. Ten minutes ago, they were in the freezer. Now they’re melting in the summer heat.

Breena’s sipping one of the bottles, and Jimmy’s sitting behind her, gently pressing the base of another one into her back, using it to rub the sore spots on her hips and low back.

Tim stretches his foot out a bit, and gently rubs Jimmy’s hip with it. Jimmy turns to look at Tim, flashing him a quick smile, and goes back to paying attention to Breena as Abbi says, “So, by that point, I was sure we were beyond FUBAR. Cover blown, Omagi’s unconscious, Roger’s is bleeding, bad, and everything’s about to end…”

Abby above him. Riding him slow and lazy, both of them more buzzed than they’ve been in… Since before she got pregnant with Sean, maybe Kelly. Between the alcohol, condom, and a naptime quickie, Tim’s sure he can go forever.
So right now, he can watch. She’s on her hands and knees, hovering above him, sliding up and back, hair falling around them. He lets his eyes drift shut, and lifts his head, kissing her, soft and easy, like the pace they’re going at.

Her tongue on his, slipping between his lips. Long, liquid strokes. He grazes the tip of her tongue with his teeth, and she moans, quietly, at that.

She breaks the kiss, straightening up, and Tim’s eyes open again, watching.

She’s grinding a bit faster, taking him a bit deeper. He’s got his eyes half open, tracing the sway of her breasts, and the bounce of her hair. They drop further, watching her body taking his. His hands fall to her butt, enjoying the round warmth under his fingers.

Her hands are on his chest, thumb stroking over one nipple.

He watches the flush spread across her chest. Watches her eyes close, and her face start to get tight. She’s moving faster, pulling all the way up and back, and taking him with her as she speeds up.

One of those hands on her butt finds her clit, and starts her favorite quick circles.

That sound, her voice getting higher, faster, more breathy. That’s hitting him right in the dick. Tim begins to tense up, too. His hips moving faster, head and chest coming off the bed, arching up to watch more, see her body engulfing his, watch his dick sinking into her pussy, and the pink, wet glide of her body on his.

She’s gasping, just about there… moving faster, erratic, hips snapping, faster yet, and he’s about to topple, pleasure/tingle/waiting, about to burst.

“Ugh!” Louder, more forceful, higher pitched, and then her body twitches, begins to grab his in soft shocks, and Tim’s over the edge, too, his own body joining hers in a wet, twitching glow.

He collapses back onto their bed, buzzing all over with pleasure, sure sleep will overtake him soon.

Good sleep, good fuck, good buzz, right now everything is amazing.

He lays there with Abby on his chest, breathing with her, and a moment later, hears Breena cry out, and Jimmy’s echoing grunt. A few seconds after that, there’s a long, smooth expanse of back… He’s thinking it’s Jimmy’s, against his calf.

Nothing else feels like this, wrapped up in the people he adores, body awash in every form of pleasure it loves.

Soon enough they’ll be waking up, back to the grind, but right now, spread out all over their bed, everything is splendid.

Bitter, milky coffee. That flavor exploding over his tongue as he stands in the kitchen, in his PJs, next to Jimmy.

He’s putting Cheerios into bowls. Jimmy’s pouring milk onto those bowls. As soon as Tim’s done with that, he gets the bananas out, and begins cutting them up. For three of the kids, that’s breakfast. At almost eight months old, Sean’ll eat the cheerios and bananas as finger food, but he had a date with Abby for his ‘real’ breakfast.
They don’t really talk. Both of them are more than a bit sleepy. But each of them knows what they’re doing, and they move around the kitchen, and each other, easily.

“Church?” Tim asks, as he fishes the knife out of the cutlery drawer.

Jimmy shrugs. “See how Breena’s feeling. Looked like she was really sleeping, and I’m not waking her up if that’s the case."

Tim’s perfectly fine with that. Especially because, if they skip out on church he has the time to do some writing, and he’d like to do that.

“Should probably do dinner,” Jimmy adds, putting the bowls on the tray he’ll use to carry them to the kids. Then he reaches over to grab the first of the sippy cups.

Tim nods. “Been a while since we made it.” And it has been a while since they dragged themselves out of their haven here to go to church and Sunday dinner with the Slater clan. He steps away from the counter to the fridge, grabbing a bottle of apple juice. Little guys like their breakfast apple juice.

He hands it over to Jimmy, and then grabs Molly’s special My Little Pony glass. She’s too big for the sippy cups, but that doesn’t mean it’s a great plan to give her a full-sized adult cup.

“You want me to ride herd on the kids, give you some time to get out and stretch?”

Jimmy smiles at Tim, and gives him a quick kiss. “Yeah. Going into it with a calm mind always helps.”

Several moments later, Tim’s got Sean in his lap, feeding him tiny bites of banana, sipping his own coffee, as the girls eat their cereal, and he can look out and see Jimmy on the lawn, standing tall, in his gray cotton pj pants, starting his sun salutations with mountain pose.

He kisses the top of his son’s head, and quietly says, sarcastically, “It’s a hard life,” with a smirk.

And maybe tomorrow it will be, but right now, as the song says, it’s summertime, and the living is easy.

Another laugh. This one’s a bit deeper, and from the far side of the room, but Tim’s enjoying getting to see it.

Tim’s on his own, in the corner of the Slater’s home, nibbling a cannoli, watching Breena laugh with her sisters. He doesn’t know what they’re talking about, but judging by the way her cheeks are lit pink, her head back, and the wide-mouthed guffaws, it’s good.

This might not be his favorite place on earth, or his favorite people, but if he gets to watch Breena that happy, it’s worth it.

He sidles over to her a bit later, making sure to keep a proper, good friend sort of distance from her, though he’d like to kiss her. “What was so funny?”

She grins at him, wide, teeth shining grin. “Oh, Tim…” she shakes her head. “I can’t. Just… If you guys head off for MMA, go easy on Collin.”
Tim raises an eyebrow. Collin has been limping a bit today. “Cautionary tale?”

Breena laughs again.

Moving, maybe not as fast as he used to be, maybe not as easy, but he’s dodging, and kicking, and punching, and his endorphins are spiking, sweat flowing, body tight with anticipation. Time’s going slow, and his body is going fast, and it feels amazing!

Right now he’s fighting one on one with Tony, which is always, for Tim, his easiest fight. There’s enough edge between them that he can fight with Tony without getting too wrapped up in his head about maybe hurting him, or going easy, or any of his protective feelings.

It’s been a year and a season since he’s been back to really fight. He’s worked on building up his strength. He’s worked on rehabbing his ankle, wrist, and shoulder. He’s gotten his flexibility and balance back. But the last time he thought he might fight, his head got in the way, and he practically killed Collin for taking a swing at Jimmy.

But right now, he and Tony are up first, and after more warm up time than either of them would have done before, they’re at it. And it feels good.

Tony’s taunting him. Teasing. “Come on, Mc Featherweight, even Dave hits harder than that.”

Tim twists, leading with his elbow, which Tony sees, jumping aside from it, and tangling himself on the left foot that Tim snuck out.

He hits the ground, but isn’t out. From there, one of his hands snake out, grabbing the back of Tim’s knee, taking him down, too.

Tim rolls up, but Tony’s already standing up, offering him a hand.

Tim takes it, and smiles at Tony, who nods back. There’s that second, where they hold each other’s gaze, feeling years of trust and respect. Then Tony swings, and Tim dodges, and the fight is still on.

Thwack, thwack, thwack, thwack…

When he’s into it, it’s just a pleasant underscoring of his work. It’s the sound of his mind creating something. His fingers, on his keyboard, making his ideas real. He spent a bit of the morning writing the scene longhand, but there always feels like something is missing when he does it that way. (Or on his computer. It just doesn’t feel right without the thwack of his typewriter, or the feel of the keys under his fingers.)

He feels Abby’s hands on his shoulders, and her chin on the crown of his head. She’s reading as he types, and once upon a time that used to make him nervous, but at this point he’s comfortable with it. She knows what his rough work looks like, and he doesn’t feel the need to pretend that he can turn out clean, perfect copy on the first shot, not anymore.

She kisses the top of his head, and gently squeezes his shoulders. “I like that.”
He looks up at her, eyebrow raised. What do you like? he asks silently.

“Gabe and Alwyn,” Alwyn is the most recently added character to the Dragons. A younger brother for Gabe. “I’ve been hoping they’ll get some time together, where they aren’t trying to kill each other.”

Tim takes off his glasses, rubbing the lenses to clean them a bit, while he looks at his typewriter. “I don’t know how much of that we’ll get, but yep, right now.”

She strokes his hair. “They’ll get on the same side.”

He shrugs. He doesn’t think that’s where the story is going, but it certainly may end up there. Then glances across the room to the clock. “Dinner?”

“Yeah. We called once, and you didn’t respond. Figured you were so far into it you didn’t notice.”

He shakes his head, then stands up, stretching his neck out. “Totally clueless.”

“Hold still!”

There’s a certain feeling. Namely, the sensation of about thirty pounds of small, squirmy person who does not want her hair brushed. It’s the… second, maybe third to last chore of the night. Molly and Kelly both have long enough hair now that they can’t just get their hair washed and head to bed.

His job is to hold onto Molly, keep her on his lap, while Breena gently rubs the conditioner through her curls, and then she hands him the wide-toothed comb, while she grabs Kelly and gets to work on her hair.

Kelly’s the easy one. It’s true Abby had some curl in her hair, especially as a little girl, but his hair’s always been straight, and Kelly’s is thin, and fine, and straight. Wash it, rub a bit of conditioner in it, and thirty seconds of combing later, she’s good to go.

Molly is a somewhat more complicated story. But right now, she’s deciding to not protest having her hair combed, too mightily.

The first time he did this, he had no idea how to handle it. Put comb through hair. Yeah, not so much. He’s got to start at the bottom, and work his way up. And it helps if he doesn’t attempt to comb one entire side of her head at a go.

So, he’s sitting on the floor, outside the bathroom the kids use, in his house, with Molly in his lap, both of them singing the theme song from Shawn The Sheep, as he combs her hair, and calls her his ‘little sheepie.’

Molly giggles at that.

“And you know what happens to little sheepies who don’t get their curls combed…”

She tries to turn in his lap, to look up at him, but that’s made more complicated by the comb in her hair.

“Remember… Just like Shawn… They get shorn!”

“NOOOOOOOOOOOO!” (Breena shoots him a You cut that child’s hair and die look. He flashes one back to her along the lines of, I’m just talking.

“Okay, then we’ve got to get the curls all combed out.”

Molly settles a bit further into his lap, and lets him finish combing out her hair.

The last memory of the weekend is a picture.

It showed up on his phone just as they were getting ready for bed. He’d literally just plugged his phone into the charger and stepped away, toward the bathroom, when it buzzed at him.

Normally, this late at night on a Sunday, that’d buzz would be work, so it’s with some trepidation that he turns to face his phone, picks it up and sees a text.

That unclenches his shoulders. Doesn’t matter who it is, a text will be lower priority than a call going straight to voicemail.

Seeing it’s from his brother-in-law relaxes him even more. He’s starting to smile, having a clue why he might be getting a text from Glenn at 11:06 on a Sunday. At the end of August, when his sister is due to give birth the first week of September.

That smile breaks through fully as he opens the text and sees a shot of his sister, pale, tired, sweaty, half asleep, with a tiny pink person on her chest.

Nicholas Armstrong Holland. 9:47 PM. Mom and Baby are fine. Adult visitors welcome tomorrow. Cousins welcome at our place when we get home.
As Tim’s getting ready for work on Monday morning, he notices that his typewriter, which normally lives in his office, is sitting on the floor, next to the door, where lunches, go bags, purses, and whatever else gets stacked up before it goes to work.

It’s sitting there, next to his go bag, a pack of typing paper, and three new ribbons for this typewriter. Abby sees him staring at it, and says, “You make sure you get at least half an hour a day on that. It doesn’t have to be good, or about dragons, or… anything. But you sit down, you eat some food, and you write. You need some away time every day, so get it.”

He turns to her, smiles, and gives her a kiss.

She smiles back, and pats his cheek. “Go tame those dragons, Director McGee.”

He kisses her again. “I love you.”

She grins up at him. “I know.”

He’s got one side trip before he gets into work.

He can’t stay for too long, but he’s not sure when he’s going to have the time, and the headspace, to really enjoy this, again. So, en route to work, he makes a stop at Niveneh Birthing Center.

This is decidedly not a hospital. Everything around him, including the ceilings, are soft, comfy neutral colors. Lots of beige and cool greens. There’s some sort of water thing… It’s not exactly a fountain, but he’s not sure what to call those rock installations on the wall with water flowing down them. Anyway, whatever those are called, there’s one of them every hundred feet or so, so there’s a constant soft trickling sound, and low, gentle music, and honestly, if he didn’t have a collection of extremely pregnant women, and their partners, walking around the hallways, he’d assume he’s at a high class spa.

“Baby spa,” he says under his breath, looking for room 213. “Mani-pedi, acupressure, chakras aligned, world class food, and labor…” He looks around and idly thinks that if this FBI thing doesn’t work out, maybe he and Breena can talk to Slaters about ushering them into the world as well as helping them out. He bets Jeannie would like working with people who are happy, for once.

He wonders a bit if a place like this might be easier for Breena and Jimmy when it comes time to get Donnie out. No memories here. No surgical center, either, which probably would make them both uncomfortable.

And, after a few moments, he finds his sister’s room. And in it…

Sarah’s sleeping, Glenn is sacked out on a sofa bed. Tim figures this is probably what most brand new families look like. The star of the show is in his own little bassinet, though his is set up as a co-sleeper sort of thing, attached to Sarah’s bed, instead of the separate bassinettes they had where his kids were born.

Tim creeps over as softly as he can, and looks down, saying, “Hi, Nick.”
Nick, who appears to be awake, and quietly looking around, chirps at him, wriggles some, goes even brighter pink, and grunts.

Tim looks down at him, laughs, (which wakes up Sarah, who he leans over and kisses) and then says, picking up his nephew, “You know, that’s exactly what your mom did the first time I held her.”

Sarah blinks a few times, finally figures out what’s happening as she sees Tim starting to unswaddle Nick, and laughs at that. “I did not.”

“Oh yes you did.” He mimics his mother’s voice, “‘Tim, say hello to your baby sister. Okay, now very gently. Make sure you’ve got a hand under her head and one on her tush… There you go… And…’” Tim can see it as he’s repeating what his mom said. Sarah wasn’t this small. And she wasn’t this pink. And he knows now that she wasn’t a newborn. But back then a baby was a baby was a baby. And as soon as he got her situated in his arms, she looked up at him, and he looked at her, and then she screwed up her face, grunted a bit, and there was a loud phbbt sound, followed by a warm, wet sensation on his forearm. He makes a raspberry sound which makes Sarah laugh even harder, and startles Nick. “Lucky for you, unlike the first time I held her, I know how to fix this situation now.”

Sarah’s about to get up.

“Oh okay.” And when she settles down, carefully, her eyes drift shut.

Meanwhile, Tim gets Nick cleaned up, watching him kick his tiny feet and flail around a bit. He’ll admit, he’s jonesing hard to meet Donnie as he’s doing this. Can’t wait to see their newest boy, though right now, spending some time with this one’s awfully fine, too.

He gets Nick cleaned up and reswaddled, spends a moment snuggling him close, smelling his new baby scent, until he gets fussy, and then hands him over to Sarah.

She comes awake again, taking her son, and Tim grabs some extra pillows for her. “Thanks,” she says, getting them under her arms and into nursing position.

“You okay with me staying?” Tim asks. He doesn’t think she’d be shy about that, but better to ask and leave, than stay and annoy her.

She gives him her I can’t believe you just asked that look.

“Better safe than wrong, you know.”

“Oh okay.” Then she turns her attention to Nick, who, like many people who are less than twenty-four hours old, hasn’t quite figured out the eating thing, though he does know hungry, and doesn’t like it. He’s rapidly going from fussing to full on wailing. She’s trying to get her nipple into his mouth, and saying, “I swear, child, what you want is right here. Just close your mouth and you’ll have it!”

Tim’s grinning at that, remembering some similar conversations between Abby and Sean, and Breena and Anna.

Fortunately, crying baby gets her colostrum flowing, and a moment later, a drop of it hits Nick’s tongue, and suddenly he knows, sort of, what to do.

Tim looks up from Nick to Sarah. “So, you okay? You look tired, but… you know, you should.”
“I’m… okay. Sore as hell. I feel like I got punched in the privates with a steel wool toilet bowl cleaner.”

Tim cringes and says, “Ulgh! That’s an exceptionally vivid image.”

She smiles sarcastically at him. “That’s my job.” Then she looks down, giving Nick a real smile. “And I guess this is, now, too.”

Tim nods, petting his nephew. “Yup.”

She looks over at Tim’s outfit. He’s got an actual suit on today, and then glances around for a clock, sees the time and says, “Speaking of jobs…”

“Yeah, on my way to work. Got a hell of a week, or three, planned, and wanted to go into it in a good mood. I think everyone else will be coming later today, maybe this evening.”

“But you’ll be working?”

“Yeah, probably. Got a lot of balls I need to keep in the air right now.”

“Then go get tossing.”

He kisses her cheek, and kisses Nick, looks at his still blissfully asleep brother-in-law, and says, “Tell Glenn I would have said hello, but I didn’t want to wake him up.”

She nods at that, and Tim’s off. Ready for the next bits of the day.

When Tim gets into his office, he’s the last one in. He might have preferred to get in earlier, but not so much as to have left before dawn.

He notices, as he heads in, looking at the collection of people around his table, that there’s a really good energy here. Eager, friendly. These are people who may not know each other, not yet, but they’re willing to work together, and all of them are looking forward to seeing what comes next.

Some of them appear a little curious about the antique typewriter he just placed on the corner of his desk, but Gibbs and Ziva see it, and share a satisfied look.

Apparently there was an unspoken consensus that whatever happened today, everyone would be in full-on professional mode.

Gibbs is sitting on the sofa. He’s in his usual work outfit. His tan sports coat and green golf shirt got pulled out of retirement from his closet for this. Granted, the tiny dog on his lap may look a tad unprofessional, but the rest of him is radiating confidence and competence, so Tim gets the sense no one is willing to ask why a little ball of extremely alert, silky fluff is part of the party.

Fornell, who’d been willing to bend to the point of skipping his tie and putting some jeans on while they were researching, is back in his FBI-approved charcoal suit and dark tie. It’s occurring to Tim that Fornell has to look different than he did the first time they met, it’s been almost fifteen years, after all, but at a glance, Tim can’t see what’s changed.

Ziva’s the only one not in her usual “work” gear, and that’s because she’s not back to her NCIS size
yet. However, for her, “work” gear was always a bit on the casual side, and a set of black cargo pants and a light khaki blouse isn’t too far off her usual. (Though having Dave in the snuggli on her chest is a few miles off of her NCIS style. But, like with Jackson, just by the power of Ziva being Ziva, no one seems to think Dave doesn’t belong here.)

Burke, who had ditched the pants suit after the second day on research work, has found it again. It’s boxy, awkwardly cut, navy blue, and she’s got a white blouse under the jacket. It actually puts Tim in mind of how he tended to look in suits back in the day. (To the point where he’s wondering if it literally is a men’s suit. She’s tall and broad enough in the shoulders to wear one.) He’s half debating suggesting she actually go visit a tailor if she’s going to keep wearing suits, but he’s also sure that’s likely over the line. Maybe in five or so years he can say something like that without it coming off wrong, but he knows he can’t right now.

Though, maybe at some point, he’ll make sure she gets to one of the ‘how to blend in with the high and mighty’ seminars. Let them make the suggestion…

His core team is here, ready to go, and they look like they’ve been chatting with the newcomers.

Vivianne LaCroix, his Press Secretary is sharing the sofa with Gibbs, and gently patting Jackson, who’s lapping up the attention with abandon. And Tim’s still a million percent sure he made the right choice with her. She’s in a cream-colored suit, modest just-above-the-knee skirt, fuchsia blouse, some sort of attractive gold necklace. She just oozes professional style and class.

Hotch is leaning hips-against-the-counter with the coffeemaker, and he’s broken out the black suit from his ID photo. He’s shaved, too. And, yes, it’s making him look a lot more stern than he was during his interview, but, he smiles as he says, “I know just as much about this as the rest of you…” and that softens the look.

Standing next to him, not wearing a suit is… The man notices Tim watching him and says, “Derek Morgan. Hotch said you needed people, and I’m people,” as he offers his hand.

Tim nods. This guy is definitely people. He’s tall, wide through the shoulders, narrow through the hips, and looks like he used to play football. He’s in jeans and a Henley, and perfectly comfortable in it, even in this room filled with suits. “You’re certainly people.” He looks to Hotch, question in his eyes.

“And after I started sleeping again, and stopped jumping every time I saw something out of the corner of my eye, and felt like my child and girl could pick me out of a lineup, I started to miss being useful,” Morgan, who looks so well at ease here in Tim’s office, he’s having a hard time imagining that anything ever wore him to a nub, says.

“Though your promise of flexible hours and getting to see his family is part of the deal, right?” Hotch checks.

“As long as the work gets done, I don’t care when you do it, where you do it, or how you look while you’re doing it.”

Morgan smiles at that.

Tim glances to Fornell, who nods. He doesn’t know Morgan, but he knows of him, and he passes the sniff test. That’s all the approval Tim needs. “Welcome to team useful,” Tim says to him.

He puts a box on the table, and crosses to the side where the accountants are sitting. “Hi, Tim McGee.” He holds out a hand to a man who just feels… Like the west. He’s wearing a navy suit, and it’s a little rumpled. Probably flew in it to get here. So it’s not like he’s got a ten-gallon hat or cowboy boots or a leather vest or jeans on, but… Maybe it’s the tan, weathered skin, the long, lean build, or blue eyes that look like they’re used to wide skies, maybe it’s unruly curly gray-brown hair, but something about him feels like open, windy plains.

Chaffin shakes his hand, and nods. “Jeremy Chaffin, I’ll admit, I’m curious, of everyone you could possibly call in, why me?”

Tim smiles, and then extends his hand to the woman sitting next to Chaffin. She’s a bit older than he was expecting from the pictures, but that doesn’t matter if she’s got the stamina to do the job. Like most of this group she’s got “gray” hair, but where gray means white strands mixed in with darker ones for the rest of this crew, in her case, her hair is the color of a pencil lead. It’s gray, short, and the bangs are fluffed up. “Nancy Marsh, right?”

“Yes. And like Jeremy… Why me, and what are we doing? There’s an entire forensic accounting department, so why us?” She’s wearing a lavender twinset, a pearl necklace, and glasses. She’s a bit closer to his mental idea of librarian than accountant, but, as he thinks about it, he doesn’t really have a mental image, besides Diane, of an accountant.

Jennifer rounds out the crew. She hadn’t been in the room when he stepped in, but she is now, leaning against the door jam between their offices, waiting to be useful.

Tim doesn’t immediately answer her question. He circles the table, opens the lid of the box he put on the table. The smell of fresh baked pastries fills the room. “The muffins are on me. And whatever else it is you guys like for crime solving fuel. Just let me know and I’ll make sure we’ve got it. Now…

He feels like that’s a properly dramatic start, and then begins to get into the nitty gritty. As his team reaches for muffins, or refills cups of coffee, he says, “As for why you and what we’re doing… We’ve been given the task of cleaning house at the FBI. Obviously, that’s the kind of job that burns bridges, annoys people, kills friendships, and encourages people to play favorites. So, if you are here, it’s because someone recommended you, specifically, for the job.”

“Isn’t that IA’s job?” Morgan asks.

“IA is your second target,” Tim says.

That gets a lot of curious looks aimed at Tim.

“What’s the first one?” Marsh asks.

“Kenneth Crawl, James Unger, Harry Jegg, and Thomas Fink.” Tim lays the thumb drive Fornell got with all of the accounting data on it in front of Chaffin and Marsh. “And that’s where your case begins.”

There’s a moment when Chaffin and Marsh look at each other, both curious, and Morgan says, “Aren’t they our Union Reps?”

Tim nods. “Like I said, this is your first target.” He points to the pile of boxes against the wall of his office. “That’s my first target.”

Everyone glances around, and the newcomers seem to get, very quickly, what’s in those boxes, and why going after the Union would matter.

“Not anymore,” Tim replies, tapping the drive. “It’s pretty simple. We have one job, and that’s clean up the FBI. They have one job, to make it as difficult as possible for us to get rid of people. That’s what you pay those dues for, to make sure someone will fight to the ends of the earth to keep you working here. Which is great when you’ve got a supervisor who just doesn’t like you, or are about to blow a whistle, and terrible when you’re the guy trying to get rid of, or discipline, a culture of corruption.

“So, if we’re going to do our job, they can’t be doing theirs. Lucky for us, they appear to have been playing fast and loose with the rules, which should make this a lot easier.”

Burke smirks and adds, “They’re going to want to try this in the media. McGee’s going to make that difficult for them.”

That’s where LaCroix nods. She understands why she’s here, and why Tim would need a press secretary as part of his starting lineup.

Tim nods. “I’ve been looking at similar moves among other departments over the last five years, and within days of the notices of ‘cleaning things up’ the Union Reps show up and do a massive show about how the people trying to clean things up are incompetent and trying to hide it by blaming their employees. Instead of letting them go on the offense, we’re going to put them on the defense. And we’re going to wait until after whoever is left standing among their members has a chat with me about the cleanup, to do any press on it.”

“Then what am I going to do?” Vivianne asks.

“On Friday you are going to outline how, in response to the horrible mess the world fell into last year, that the FBI has come up with a major new initiative to clean up the FBI, first, and from there, the rest of the US Government. If anyone at that conference asks about arrested Union Bosses, you’ve got to do some more research before you can make a statement on that. That should be Friday. On… Jennifer?” Tim’s not sure exactly when he’s going to be meeting with the Union people, but he knows it’s coming.

“I’ve blocked out time for them on Saturday morning,” she replies.

“I’m assuming that shortly after they figure out who put their guys in jail, they’ll want to talk to me. We’ll be talking Saturday morning.”

“You’re laying a trap,” Chaffin says.

“I’m trying. There’s a TV show my wife likes,” Tim’s said it before he thought about it, and hopes no one gets enough time with Abby to find out that the wife in question is Breena, “and it’s about a group of con men. One of the things they keep saying is, ‘You can’t con an honest man,’ and assuming these guys play by the rules, I’ve got nothing.” Tim realizes he’s telling them the outcome he wants, and that he’s their boss. “And, look, you get into those numbers, and if they show nothing, they show nothing, and we’ll take the lumps coming. That is always the rule here. I don’t care how bad I want whoever it is, if you can’t find proof, then you can’t find proof, and that’s it, case over. No one’s going on a vendetta or fabricating or fudging evidence because it works for my plans, got it?”

Everyone nods. He hopes they do have it.
“But, if they don’t play by the rules, and I’ve got a feeling they won’t, Vivianne, I’m going to have a glorious recording for you to produce as your ‘research’ Saturday afternoon. And, if they really don’t play by the rules, Hotch, I should have a bribery attempt for you to arrest.”

She smiles at that. Hotch smirks.

“For right now, Hotch, you’ve got Morgan, Chaffin, Marsh, Fornell, and Gibbs. Investigate, find what you can, make whatever arrests you can. LaCroix, we’re about to have a chat about what’s going to happen, and how to package it. DiNozzo, and Burke, you’re still with me.”

“What are you going to do?” Hotch asks.

Tim turns to the boxes along his far wall and sighs. “Write up notes on all of them. I’ve got to explain to everyone in that group why they are getting chewed out by me.”

Jackson chooses that moment to bark. Tim gets up pats his head. “Yeah, I’ve got a lot of noses to rub in their own mess, which means I need to know what messes they all made.”

“Do you have a place for us to work?” Chaffin asks. This is a spacious office, but it’s a bit smaller than he’d like for nine agents, a dog, and baby, all in one space.

Tim nods. “Yes. I do. Jennifer will take you to the offices I’ve got marked out for you. And, Chaffin, when this case is done, if you want to return to Wyoming to work from there, that’s fine, or if you want to come back to DC…” He can see by the look on Chaffin’s face that’s a non-starter. “Don’t worry about it. When this one is done, we’ll talk about what I’m going to need you doing on the IA investigation. Nothing about that has to be done in DC.”

Chaffin looks relieved. “I’m okay visiting here, but… wouldn’t want to live here.”

Tim smiles. “A lot of people feel that way. When we get onto the bigger IA case, we’re going to need more talent, and we’re going to need it handy with numbers. Anyone you and Marsh can vouch for personally, we’ll shift onto this. We’re going to need skill, discretion, and people willing to burn bridges if the bridges need to be burned.”

When Hotch and Co. have eased out, and Ziva and Burke are starting to write up short notes for him on each of his employees, Tim settles down to chat with LaCroix.

“Were you in the US last fall?” he asks.

She shakes her head. “I was in Haiti. You go to places like Cap Haitian, or the Sudan, or Syria, and you never expect to feel safer there than you would have back home.”

Tim can certainly understand that. He heard a million versions of that when different men survived Afghanistan or Iraq, and came home to get killed here. “Where was ‘back home’?”

“Luckily, yes. But getting back is slow. They tell me that any day now they may reopen my floor. The construction crews work around the clock, when they can, but they’ll often run out of whatever it is they need, and have to wait for the next shipment.”

Tim sighs at that, long and low. He’s heard a lot of versions of that story. Whoever it is needs whatever it is, and if there isn’t any of it, the construction guys just move to the next job, and sooner or later, often later, they come back.

“What are you waiting on now?”

“Drywall. They had men putting it up three days ago, ran out, and…” she spreads her hands wide, “one day, I’m sure more will come, but it appears that everyone who makes drywall is making all the drywall they can, and we’re using it all up.”

“Or your guy just isn’t willing to pay the price for it these days.” Tim knows you can get anything in DC now, as long as you’re willing to pay for it. Assuming you want pre-Fall rates, you’ll get whatever it is, sooner or later, when someone in say, Iowa, has some extra that’s just hanging around.

“That is likely, too. My landlord is a firm believer in never paying a penny more for something than he has to. Why ask if I was here?”

“Just want to know if you saw it firsthand, smelled it, lived it?”

“No.” She delicately shakes her head. “I didn’t get back to the US until April.”

He nods at that. “Have you studied it?”

“Since you gave me the job, yes. I’ve watched as much footage of it as I could and read firsthand accounts.”

“Good. I think you need to understand how bad things got to put the rest of this in the right perspective. So, here’s the set up: Each branch of government has its own watch people. They have their own Internal Affairs departments, and they’re supposed to make sure that those groups are on the straight and narrow.

“On top of that Congress is supposed to be able to hop in and keep people’s feet to the fire.

“And, supposedly, whistleblowers will be protected, and whatever whistle they blow will be looked into.

“Obviously, there was a catastrophic failure of all three of those levels.

“Now, in addition to all of that, there’s one final level of protection. The FBI’s Public Corruption department. Usually, they get called in on state matters, when no one in the state can be trusted to be even-handed, but we’re also the guys you call when IA isn’t on the job, or when the Feds are on the take.

“Obviously, we failed monstrously, too.”

“And that’s where you come in…” Vivianne leads in.

“And where you do, too. First off, transparency. Unless it involves outing one of our guys who are undercover, you’re free to talk about anything. Although, I’d appreciate: ‘I need to do more research, but if you email me that question, I will make sure you get a response,’ going into your list of tried and true lines. We will get back to them, but like what you’re going to do this weekend, ‘more research’ may mean the situation is evolving and you’re waiting for it to finish evolving before commenting.”

Vivianne smiles, and goes into Press Corps Mode: “Right now, Ms. Reporter, that situation is in flux. If you’d like to send me a copy of the question, and any follow up questions, I’ll make sure you get a response when the situation is no longer in flux.”

Tim’s nodding. “I like that one, too. The big issue is, we may brush them off, but not forever. Those questions will get answered. It will be vitally important that not only does the world know what we are doing, but that they trust that when we say something is happening, or that we can’t comment about it now, we mean it.

Vivianne wants to see how far he goes with this, and says to Tim, “Ms. LaCroix? Did your agency go against the Union Heads in order to make them look bad, knowing you’d want to fire a lot of people…” She gives Tim a leading look to go with that, testing to see how transparent he wants to go.

Tim answers, as if he were her. “We went after our Union Reps, because they were breaking the law. We started with them because we wanted to send a very clear and powerful message: There is nowhere to hide, no position too high up, no one outside of the law. If you are breaking the law, if you are taking bribes, if you are looking the other way, there is no place for you in the FBI, no place for you near the FBI. We will not associate with you. You will not represent us. We will find you, and we will remove you.

“Corruption is a cancer, leave even a little of it in place, and it will grow, spread, and kill you. So, we are cutting it out, wherever it may be. And once the physician has healed himself, we’re going to start up with the rest of the patients.”

She smiles at that. “Have you thought about doing this for yourself?”

“Yes. But a wise woman told me, there are things I can do, and things she can do, and some of the things I can do, she can’t, and vice versa. So, I’m better off using my time doing the things you can’t do, and letting you use your time to do the things I can’t.”

Behind Vivianne, he sees Jennifer smile at that, as she’s arranging files for Ziva and Burke.

“Thank you. And my answer for the Union Rep question moves into point number two: Everything changed when all of the safeguards failed, and that is not going to happen again. The FBI is changing. It was our job to protect the people, and we failed, but we will not fail again. And if that means turning everything upside down, then we turn it upside down.”

“And how will you be turning things upside down?”

Tim smiles widely at that. “This is the good stuff. Get your notepad, it’s gonna be a long one.”

Vivianne pulls out her phone and hits the record button. “I’m ready.”

So, Tim begins, starting with the complete shake up of who works for the FBI, and then getting into the changes they’re going to make for how crimes will be reported, the changes for how crimes would be assigned, new internal checks and balances, making sure everyone does what they’re supposed to, and how they are going to go everywhere. How no one, nowhere, in no branch of the US Government, on US soil, was going to be safe from the FBI.
When he’s done, Vivianne says, “Sounds adversarial.”

“That’s how I want them to see the Public Corruption Unit. We’re the new Untouchables, and the entire US Government is under suspicion of rum running.”

She chuckles at that, and then asks, seriously, “What happens if that makes people unwilling to call for help?”

Tim’s not sure what to do with that. “How do you mean? You caught your Boss doing something he shouldn’t, but you’re on the take, too, so you just shut up? We’ve got our anonymous crime reporting system for that.”

“No. You’re a local PD, and your Unit Chief is way too cozy with the Mayor, and both of them are covering for the guy who runs the local construction company. A child goes missing. None of them, and their little pay for play deal has anything to do with that missing child, but they’re wary about calling in the FBI to hunt for the child because they don’t want their sweet little deal to get squashed.”

Tim opens and closes his mouth, and starts to feel the headache coming on. He swallows. And swallows again, reaching for his coffee, and then finally says, “Yeah, I got nothing for that. Okay, Ms. LaCroix, you’ve got the floor, someone asks you that, what do you do?”

“Thank you, Mr. Reporter, that’s a very good question. You need to remember that the FBI is here to work for you. A lot of our government forgot that recently. We did, too. But not anymore. We’re making it our mission to remember it and keep remembering it. If you have a case where you feel like the FBI should be involved but isn’t, give us a call. If your child is missing, give us a call. We are here to help, so help we will.”

Tim grins. “I like that. My higher ups may not, but go with it. When people think of the FBI, I want them thinking of us as Eliot Ness, not Alex Krycek.”

“Who?” She’s staring at him blankly.

“Uh…” Tim thinks about how long it would take to explain who Krycek was. “Don’t worry about it. We’re the good guys, we’re here to help, and that’s the message we’re sending loud and clear.”

“I can work with that message.”

“Thank you. So, Friday the shindig begins. First thing in the morning, Comey’s going to give his resignation in front of a select group of FBI Agents. Then I get to handle the shape-up-or-ship-out side of the message. As soon as he’s done with his half of it, he’s going to you, where he’ll give his public resignation, and then he’ll answer whatever questions, lob the press over to you, and you’re taking it from there.”

“And while I do that…”

“I’ll be chewing out the current slew of Public Corruption Agents, and then, from there, rubbing noses in messes.”

She smiles, his turn of phrase triggering a question. “Okay, not that Jackson isn’t the cutest little thing ever, but… Why is…” It’s clear she doesn’t know the name of the white-haired man who was holding him.

“Gibbs, bringing a puppy to work? He doesn’t look like the kind of man who has or needs a support animal.”

Tim’s giggling at the idea of Gibbs with a support animal. And then laughing wishfully at the idea that they should have gotten him one ‘back around ’02, because something warm, fuzzy, and loving probably would have helped him a lot. Maybe a little bit of doggie love could have gotten Pop out of Gibbs a few years earlier. He knows he certainly felt better about life in general when’d he’d go home from a bad case and Jethro would leap up to greet him as soon as he was in the door.

Then he gets back to her question. “That little guy is training to be a hearing ear dog. He’s learning how to go to a lot of places, with a lot of people, and behave properly while he does it.”

“Oh. That’s… I thought they were usually German Shepherds or Labradors.”

“Seeing-Eye Dogs often are. They’ve got to be big enough to be able to stop you from walking into things. Hearing Ear Dogs just need to be able to get your attention. So, little guys, like Jackson, are very smart and live about twice as long as a Labrador would…”

“Making them ideal for the job.”

By the time Tim’s finished talking with Vivianne, and she’s settled off in her own new office, getting herself, and it, set up, it’s lunch time.

Tim goes back to his own office, looks at the stacks of cases, and the pile of note cards that Ziva and Burke are getting ready for him. For a second, he feels tempted to grab his lunch, a folder, and a pen, and then he stops.

“Will the sound of a typewriter bug you?” he asks them.

Ziva looks up from her folder, and smiles at him. “Abby sent you into work with it, I see.”

Tim nods.

“Write, McGee. It’s good for you.”

“Okay. You two want some down time? Get out of here, eat something?”

Burke, not looking up from her folder, shakes her head. She’s in the zone right now. Dave’s in his stroller, snoozing, so Ziva shakes her head, too. “I think we are comfortable, here.”

“Okay. Thanks. Really!”

“Go, write.”

Tim sits down, opens up his lunch, and gets to it.

When he got home that evening, later than normal, he noticed he was much less exhausted than he normally is after a long day at work.
Even six hours of writing notes goes more smoothly if he takes breaks and lets his brain play.

When Abby and Breena got home from visiting Sarah and Nick, he pulls Abby close, kisses her, and says, “You were right about the writing.”

She smiles back at him, kissing him, and says, “So, how was today?”

“So, you’re Diane’s exes?” Chaffin says, sipping his coffee. Even he needs the occasional break from the numbers, and chewing the fat’ll do it. And sitting here, at a long conference table, in a bright, sunny room, overlooking the ruins of the Archives, there are two guys who may have some fat for him.

Both of the men, who are working with Hotch on getting financial records from different banks, look a bit like deer in the headlights. The bald one finally says, “Two of them.”

“There’s a third one now?” Chaffin asks, standing up, stretching, getting himself another cup of coffee.

The quiet one inclines his head, and the bald one replies, “I guess that tells us when you two got together. Sterling’s been old news for a while.”

Chaffin sips his coffee, and thinks for a moment.

Then Marsh adds, “Sterling… I know that name. He was with Homeland Security, right?”

The quiet one nods.

“Sterling… I know that name. He was with Homeland Security, right?”

“Diane Anderson,” Gibbs says, voice quiet. “She’s… my ex-wife, his ex-wife, and his ex…?”

Chaffin shrugs. “I wouldn’t say ex-anything. We were friendly back when we worked for the IRS. We’re still friendly.” Chaffin smiles a bit. Assuming he can get out of the building at some point, and Diane can get free from Jarvis, the two of them have an extremely tentative dinner date on the books.

That gets a lot of nodding. Chaffin’s walks over to the window and looks out. There’s still construction and yellow DO NOT ENTER tape visible all along the far side of the street they’re on.

“When I left the FBI, I got as far away from DC as I could. Took our family, moved to Puerto Rico. It was just insane. There was the bar I’d hang out at. On the beach. They had a TV, and one day DC was on fire.” He’s shaking his head.

Chaffin’s nodding, intensely. “I don’t own a TV. It was… late afternoon, I was making sure the numbers were actually telling me what I thought they were, and then Marsha, she’s the cube next to me, rushes over, and says, ‘LOOK!’ waving her phone in my face. The mob was rushing the White House.”

Hotch eyes Fornell. Taking him in, trying to remember why he knows Fornell’s face. And then he’s got it. “You were on TV. It was you in the tank with the kids, right?”

Fornell nods. “If it wasn’t me you saw, it’s only because you were watching the wrong tank.”

“Our BabyGirl talked about him!” Morgan says, fast, looking at Fornell in a whole new light. “I mean, if you’re the one with the tank.”

Fornell looks pleased to say this. “I’m the guy with the tank. One of them. Took five of us to get everyone in the building out. No one wants to rush a column of people if there’s five tanks around it, and the border guards decided that they had no interest in keeping up the barricades when we came up to them.”

Hotch nods, and then stands up, and hugs Fornell, who looks really shocked by that. So does Morgan. Apparently, that’s not normal Hotch behavior. “Most of the BAU was out when things fell apart. They were on a case in Minnesota, but Penelope Garcia wasn’t. She was in the building here, and you got her out.”

Fornell looks embarrassed when Hotch lets go of him. “Just… You know. Something needs to be done, so you do it.”

“With tanks?” Marsh says. “I was out on an audit that week. Luckiest assignment of my life. But… How do you get tanks?”

So, as Gibbs passes cups of coffee around, his new crew works on building up a sense of team commiserating over the adventures of Fornell and the tanks.

And, eventually, when that starts to wear down, Fornell elbows Gibbs and says, “You think tanks are impressive, this one was sailing up the Potomac, blind, at night, under an armed bridge, to smuggle food in and people out.”

Gibbs rolls his eyes, but that gets a lot of attention pointed at him. So, he doesn’t exactly tell the story, but he lets Fornell tell it. (By the time Fornell’s got a hold on that story, Gibbs was more or less piloting an inflatable raft through icy cold, mine-filled, shark-infested water, under fire from the VA National Guard, but… entertaining bullshit. And entertaining bullshit goes a long way toward building up camaraderie, and an even longer way toward making waiting on hold for the various banks they’re getting records from bearable.)

Morgan looks at Hotch, and Hotch gives him a little nod, so they start talking about how, once everything fell apart, they couldn’t just sit on their asses and let it crumble, so Morgan came back from Puerto Rico, and Hotch dusted off a few IDs he wasn’t supposed to have any more, and the two of them pretended to be inspectors, waving through boxes of food and supplies.

Hotch wraps up with, “It probably didn’t help much, but… It was something.”

Morgan nods. “Probably should have seen if I knew anyone with a helicopter.” He shrugs. “The idea just didn’t occur to me.”
Gibbs shakes his head. “The Virginia and Maryland National Guard were forcing anything that tried to fly in down. The first few days, some bastards were shooting from the air and dropping homemade bombs. Unless you were a news chopper, you couldn’t get over the city.”

“Oh.”

“Yes, I’m still here,” Fornell says, finally getting an actual person on the other end of his phone. “I’m FBI Agent Tobias Fornell, badge number…” And with that, they get back to work.

Much later that night, after everyone but Morgan and Hotch have left, Morgan says to Hotch, “Okay, I know why we’re here. And I know why the accountants are here.” Morgan nods in the direction where Gibbs and Fornell sit when they’re working. “Why’s team gray-hair here?”

Hotch takes a moment to run his own fingers through his hair. It used to be jet black. It’s not any more. Then his look says it all, but he adds his voice, too. “Exactly why you think they’re here.”

Morgan rolls his eyes. “Babysitting.”

“You got someone you’ve never worked with, based on one recommendation, who washed out—“ Derek’s look stops Hotch. “I’m talking about me, Derek.”

“No one could have done more…” Morgan says.

“I know. Or maybe, no one should do more.” They’re both quiet for a moment, thinking of the same person.

“You talk to our PrettyBoy?” Morgan asks.

Hotch’s face grows tight. “I’ve tried. He’s… not very communicative right now.”

“Yeah. He’ll talk to me,” and they both know how Spencer can talk, filling up the space with piles of words and facts, but nothing of value, “but not talk.”

Hotch nods in agreement. “The Lecter case is eating him.”

Morgan’s in danger of giving himself whiplash he’s nodding so hard at that. “I don’t know if they’re trying to use him as bait, from everything I’ve read, Spence is catnip for Lecter, or if Lecter is catnip for Spencer, and he’s going down a rabbit hole for him.”

“You think he’s using again?” Hotch asks quietly. Reid’s ‘coping mechanisms’ are a closely held BAU secret.

Derek holds his hands wide. Sometimes it’s hard to tell the difference between tired and wired, and strung out, especially with Reid. “McGee gets wind of that, he’s out of here, isn’t he?”

Hotch just doesn’t know the answer to that, so he doesn’t answer.

“You want him out of there, don’t you?” Morgan adds.

“Years ago. He’s too damn smart to fail the evals, and too self-destructive to spend too much more time in there.”
“I know that look. Daddy’s out to protect his kiddo.”

Hotch knows Morgan isn’t wrong. Reid always appealed to the father in him.

“You want him here, with us.”

Hotch isn’t sure about that. “I want him away from Lecter. With us? I don’t know.”

“He’d be wasted here. This is…” Morgan looks around at the team they’re building, and the pile of numbers they’ve got. “This is good. It’s go-catch-the-bad-guys work. It’s why you and I signed on in the first place. But any competent agent can do this. We’d be wasting Reid here.”

“That’s why I don’t know about with us. But… I was talking to Walter. McGee’s got plans and plans and more plans. He’d have something for Spencer. I know it.”

“But would our PrettyBoy want it?”

Hotch sighs. Especially when Reid gets ‘focused’ on a case, it’s difficult to get him out of it. “That, I don’t know. He’s pleased to see us again.”

“He is. Maybe if I were to hit BabyGirl with it, just get her to nudge him toward us. I know JJ would approve the transition.”

“She would.”

“I figured you’d want to see this,” Comey says, handing Tim few pieces of paper the next morning.

Tim glances at them, wondering what, on paper, Comey could possibly want to share with him, let along first thing in the morning, unannounced, but once he sees it, he understands. This was never on the FBI servers, and it shouldn’t be.

It’s Comey’s resignation speech.

Tim reads through it, quickly, he doesn’t want the man just sitting there, staring at him for too long. He’s nodding as he goes along, and smiles at a few spots. Then he looks up. “It’s good. It’s really good.”

Comey nods. “I’ve had someone write them up for me for so long… wasn’t entirely sure how to do one for myself.”

Tim hopes he never gets there, but, he can kind of understand that.

“You knocked it out of the ball park. Now all I’ve got to do is make sure everyone runs the bases.”

Comey gives him a searching look. “And will they run the bases?”

Tim smiles at him. “Yes.”

Then he places the copy of the remarks into the shredder, pausing for a second to get the nod from Comey before hitting the on button. Comey nods, and there’s a grinding sound as the shredder eats the speech. No one gets to see this until Comey goes live with it.
“Have you spoken to the President, yet?” Tim asks.

Comey nods, looks around, sees only Ziva and Burke, working on more notes, then he says, “And how is your investigation going?”

“I have a feeling Wednesday is going to be a big day. Hotch tells me that once Marsh and Chaffin got into it, the numbers might as well have been a treasure map with a big X on them. He’s going to be scooping people up all Wednesday. Jennifer’s kept some time on Saturday free for me. I expect to be given an offer I won’t want to refuse.”

“And will you refuse?” Comey asks.

“Oh, yes!” Tim’s smiling at the idea. He’s assuming, and he knows he shouldn’t, but people so stupid as to have a mortgage larger than their listed income, and then claim the interest on that mortgage on their income taxes, are too stupid, and too cocky, to play the game by the rules. And he’s looking forward to seeing how they’re going to try and get him to let them keep breaking them. “And I’ll make sure I’ve got a recording of it, so I can have LaCroix get up and play it live on national television, and then explain exactly what cleaning up the FBI means.”

“They’re going to hurt you for this. You know that?” Comey says, voice serious. There’s a real warning there, and Tim hears it, but he’s not feeling it.

“They’re going to try. I have a feeling, especially after I go live with what I expect they’re going to offer me, that I’ll be a lot harder to hit than they’d like. After that, anything they come up with will look like sour grapes.”

Comey looks at Tim, eyes very serious. “If you back a man into the corner, expect him to bite, Tim.”

Tim nods. “Like wear a vest, bite?”

“I wouldn’t put it past them. If you can offer some version of it where they save face, you may last longer in this job.”

“I’ll think on that.” Again, he’s not feeling it, but he doesn’t want to blow it off, either.

“Good.”

After Comey leaves, Ziva slides over to Tim’s desk. “He’s right.”

Tim inclines his head.

“Don’t grab the snake by its tail, Tim. Take its head clean off, or give it a way to get away. Don’t corner it.”

Tim looks up at her, irked. “Great. How?”

“Take the head off. As soon as you get whoever comes to give you the offer, make sure you’ve got the warrants ready to go. Open the whole Union up. Right now you’re looking at individual members and what they’re doing. Get into their books and official work. What’s the fancy term? The thing they use against organized crime? FICO? Break the whole thing open. Kill the snake.”

“RICO, and… Okay.” He thinks about that for a moment. Then he smirks. “I think I’ve got a way to use that. Okay…”

“Good.” Then she flops ten more files onto his desk, and Tim starts writing up more notes.

Wednesday morning, bright and early.

Well, early. Bright requires the sun being more than an inch above the horizon, so it’s not bright. But, Good Lord, it’s early. Gibbs is fine, he’s only up an hour or so earlier than normal for this, but Fornell’s bitching about his joints and mainlining his coffee.

Hotch and Morgan, who have also gotten out of the habit of pre-dawn raids, are looking somewhat sleepy, too, but it’s time to go.

They’re creeping through a quiet gated community, in an extremely posh DC suburb on the Virginia side of the line. This early in the morning, the only things that appear to be awake, besides them, are the birds and squirrels.

The house is, like all of the houses in this development, palatial. Hotch takes the front door. Morgan’s on the left side of the house. Gibbs has eyes on the garage and right side door. Fornell has the back. And even with that, there are still doors, and a decent collection of huge windows, that none of them have a good line of sight on.

Gibbs hears in his earwig, “It’s time.” Then he hears across the near silent development, a fist thudding against a door along with, “Kenneth Crawl! This is the FBI! Open UP!”

Kenneth Crawl, chief counsel for the Federal Bureau of Investigations Employee’s Union, or FBIEU, (F-bow as they say it) is the first man on their list.

And he’s been a naughty boy. Under US tax law, if different organizations offer you gifts worth more than $500, you have to record them as income. And if one of those organizations is, say, paying for your car, or another one is paying for your home, and you don’t list that as income on your taxes, you pay some really big fines and go to jail.

And, say, if, you happen to be on the board of several charitable organizations, and if you maybe happen to be on those boards with the head honchos of numerous other businesses, and if, you know, you’ve somehow got an uncanny eye for selling the stocks of those companies short, and if, after you’ve done that, you’ve got this habit of donating 80% of your windfall to charities those Head Honcho’s just happen to draw a salary as boards members, it’s just possible that you may be engaging in insider trading. Which is, like not reporting your gift income, illegal. And insider trading or not, you’re certainly engaging in money laundering, and that’s not a good thing.

So, yep, Mr. Crawl Esq., has been naughty.

And he’s about to get his wrist slapped hard enough to take his hand off.
Gibbs can’t see it, but he can hear, through the collar mic on Hotch’s shirt, a very confused voice saying, “What the fuck? Is this a joke?”

“No joke.”

There’s a rustling sound. Gibbs figures that’s the sound of the warrant for Crawl’s arrest being offered followed by, “This can’t be right. I need to make a call.”

“As is your right, after we’ve booked you.”

“Now, listen here, there’s no need—“

Hotch’s voice comes through loud and clear. “Mr. Crawl, that is an arrest warrant with your name on it. You can come with me easily, or you can come with me hard, but you will come with me. If it’s a mistake, joke, or anything else, you can figure that out, after I’ve got you processed.”

There’s a sigh along with, “Fine. Do you mind if I put some clothing on?”

“No. Morgan…”

A moment later Gibbs hears Morgan’s voice. “I’ll fetch some clothing for you. You stay where we can see you, Mr. Crawl.”

“This is ridiculous! The warrant doesn’t even say what I’m supposed to be wanted for.”

“Nonetheless, it says you are wanted,” Hotch’s voice.

After about five minutes, Gibbs and Fornell get the all clear.

Sitting in the backseat of Hotch and Morgan’s car is an older man. He’s got to be within a year of sixty, and he looks like every stereotype of the rich, well-connected, white lawyer.

Well, a somewhat grumpy, discombobulated one. He didn’t get his morning shower or shave, so he’s not as polished as he’d like to be.

Honestly, he puts Gibbs in mind of what Senior looks like after drying off from playing in the river on the Fourth of July. He’s younger, of course, but that same, plump, well-fed, prosperous look, just rumpled and stubbly.

Gibbs grabs his phone and sends off a text. One down.

Tim’s blissfully sleeping when his phone buzzes. He jerks awake, and momentarily curses that he didn’t have the brains to be one of the two of them on the outside this morning.

He knew this buzz was coming, but somehow that didn’t translate to making sure that he could easily reach his phone without have to untangle himself from all of his happily sleeping bedmates. Breena’s on one side, and Jimmy’s on the other, and given the chance of disturbing the pregnant lady or his husband…
Yeah, Jimmy’s got perpetual short straw on that one, and he grunts a bit when Tim accidently elbows him trying to get out of the bed without jostling Breena.

Finally, he’s got to his phone, and sees the text.

He smiles at it and sends back. Three to go.

Then he looks at the bed, and shakes his head. He’s up, he might as well be up.

He sends another text, this one to Chaffin and Marsh. Crawl’s in custody. Once he makes his call, get on it.

As per Ziva’s suggestion, he’s taking the head off the snake. As soon as Crawl makes his call, they’ll follow the call and begin the investigation. Meanwhile, Crawl, as the group’s lawyer, was the first target of the day. They don’t know for a fact that the three to go will try to call Crawl, but if they do, they’re going to be getting no answer.

It’s still early, and definitely bright now.

Harry Jegg, Finance Comptroller for FBIEU, is having a lovely bit of breakfast on his back porch when Gibbs and Fornell (given the directions to take the back) shock the shit out of him by stalking up, guns drawn and pointed down.

He sees them, and immediately jumps to the ground, hands over his head, shouting to his wife, “They’re here! Get down, get down!”

Fornell glances at Gibbs, eyebrow high.

Gibbs shakes his head, and holsters his weapon. They hear the thudding on the front door, along with the call of “Henry Jegg! FBI! Come out!”

Gibbs says into his mic, “He’s back here with us, lying on the ground.”

Fornell hasn’t holstered his weapon, he’s got it in hand, and pointed at the ground, but he is standing next to Jegg, head tilted to the side. “Are you expecting an attack?”

Jegg’s breathing hard, and gasping, “You? You? You scared the shit out of me!” He’s slowly sitting up as his wife, still frozen to her chair on the patio, blinks in shock.

Gibbs offers a hand to Jegg, as Hotch and Morgan come around to the back. Jegg gets up, says “Thanks,” to Gibbs, and then says to Fornell, apparently assuming that he’s the lead investigator, “They’ve been sending letters for years. How did you find out?”

Fornell looks to Hotch, and Hotch nods, so Fornell rolls with it. “We’re the FBI; we protect our own. Now, for your safety, how about you and the Mrs. pack a bag, and get ready to come with us?”

“Oh, thank you!” Jegg says, grabbing his wife by the hand, pulling her into the house. A moment later, Hotch is on his phone. “Yeah, get me a track on Jegg’s phone. I want to see who he’s been calling.”

Morgan’s got his own phone out. “Hey PrettyLady, yeah, we found out why Jegg’s been pulling ten grand a month out of the Union and paying it into that unknown account. Someone’s been blackmailing him. Uh huh… Yeah… We’ll be looking for his phone records. You and Chaffin have any luck on figuring out who he’s been paying? Still looking. Okay. Uh huh… He thinks we’re taking his wife and him into protective custody. Right now, we’re rolling with it. We’ll split him up from her on the way in ‘for their safety.’ He gets his rights read on the way in, and we chat with her, and see what she’s willing to tell us… Thanks. Yeah. More information coming your way, soon.”

Morgan hangs up his phone. “Marsh is on it.”

Every month, like clockwork, Henry Jegg was pulling ten thousand dollars out of the Union’s coffers, plopping it into his own account, and then wiring it off to an as of yet unknown account.

As he comes running down the steps, a frantic look on his face, hastily packed bag in his hand, Gibbs knows this one’ll crack easy.

He smiles at Mrs. Jegg, and says, “Look, we want to keep you two as safe as possible. You come with Agent Fornell and I, and Henry will go with Agents Hotch and Morgan.”

She kisses her husband goodbye, squeezes his hand, and then leaves with Gibbs.

Fornell smiles at Hotch, a quick gesture the Jeggs miss, but all of the agents know what’s happening next.

Tim’s feeding the babies their breakfasts when his phone buzzes again. Two down. Got the wife talking. Apparently someone, not us, noticed that the FBIEU wasn’t following the campaign finance laws. They’ve been paying hush money for the last three years.

Tim smirks. Good. We arresting her?

Not yet. Right now she’s just near what’s going on.

Then keep her happy and talking.

Tim sends out another text to Chaffin and Marsh. Do we know where that money was going, yet?

A few minutes later he gets one back from Chaffin. To the Caymans, then cashed out.

Dead end?

As of now.

Tim sighs.

“Hit a snag?” Breena asks, as she’s making lunches for everyone.

“We missed someone who was in position to blackmail people about the campaign finance debacle. And finding them just went black.”

“Sorry.” Abby says.

“Thanks. After all, you wouldn’t want me to get bored, right?”
Abby snerts at that, and kisses the top of his head. Tim rolls his eyes a bit, and grabs the bit of banana that Sean’s trying to get rubbed into his hair.

Jimmy rushes through the kitchen, stuffing food into his mouth while grabbing his lunch. They’ve all seen this before, so, after a few quick kisses, he’s out, leaving to calls of, “Go get ’em!”

Abby’s phone chirps, and she gets moving faster, too. “Dead body in Rockwood Park,” she says, filling in the bit Jimmy left out as he was rushing out.

“Busy day coming up,” Breena says.

No one disagrees with her.

There’s busy and there’s busy.

Tim’s people are busy. They’re off doing useful things and kicking down doors. (Actually, they aren’t. They’re going after lawyers and accountants. So far all they’ve had to do is knock loudly. But Tim’s enjoying imaging them storming in.)

He’s busy. Reading files. Writing notes. Sitting at his desk, across from Ziva and Burke, who are also reading files and writing notes for him.

It has to be done. He can’t just paper over the whole of the Public Corruption Department with generalities. If he does that, anyone in the crowd will be able to shift blame. They’ll be able to say, ‘It wasn’t me,’ or ‘I didn’t know,’ or ‘Everyone was doing it.’

Okay, he can’t get rid of that last one. Everyone was doing it. But he can certainly make sure that everyone he talks to understands how and why they screwed the proverbial pooch.

But, (eye roll) it’s boring.

All three of them, hell, Dave even, is waiting with baited breath for each new update from the team that’s actually doing fun stuff.

“Do we have anything on Crawl’s call?” Hotch asks when he, Gibbs, Fornell, and Morgan get back from bringing in Jegg.

Marsh replies, “He’s called Gareth Powers, second counsel for FBIEU. He’ll be coming in soon.”

“Anything interesting?” Gibbs asks. He’s used to his team having everything up and ready to go once processing is done, and he’s not seeing any interesting laying around.

“We’ve literally just got the warrants. Less than a minute ago. You walked past the lady who brought them to us. Nothing else yet to go with,” Chaffin responds.

Fornell checks his watch. “Unger won’t be in position for another hour, what do you need us doing?”
Marsh inclines her head. She’s already got her computer open and on the hunt. “Same thing we did with the first four of them. Financial records. Pick a bank and get calling.”

So, while Tim’s a floor up, fantasizing about kicking doors down while he’s writing a list of missed cases and sweetheart deals, his ‘go’ team is sitting around, on their phones, waiting on hold, looking for anything they might find on Gareth Powers.

As Fornell waits on hold, he says, “We don’t actually have any questions for Crawl, do we?”

Marsh shakes her head. “It’s all in the data. He can visit with his lawyer, and if Powers is clean, great, out he goes. If not, we arrest him, too.”

Chaffin’s never actually interrogated anyone, so he’s less sure, but he says, “We do deals, right? We know you did X, so tell us about Y, and then we haggle?”

Gibbs smiles.

Morgan adds, “And once we figure out what the hell Y is, we’ll do that.”

“And if he begs to talk to us, offering up some Y, we’ll be very interested in that,” Fornell adds. “But right now, they can go sit in a cell and wonder about what’s going on.”

Gibbs looks up from the computer he’s on. “Powers is starting to make calls. Let’s see who he wants to talk to.”

Fornell moves over and looks at the screen. “That’s the main phone line here.”

Another number pops up. “Okay, who’s that?” Gibbs asks.

Hotch and Fornell share a look. And then laugh.

“What?” Morgan asks.

“Comey. He’s calling Comey.”

That laugh spreads.

“Gareth, I can’t do anything about this!” Comey says, very emphatically.

“What do you mean you can’t do anything? You’re the head of the FBI.” Gareth Powers is having none of this. The whole point of being the kind of guy who can call Comey and get him on the phone in less than five minutes is so when something needs to be done, it gets done.

“And that’s exactly why I can’t get involved.”

“You have to! Crawl’s in jail.”

“Where he went after being arrested with a legitimate warrant. I can’t help.”

“You have to. This is total shit. Hotch, the guy who ran the arrest, he works for the fucking BAU. They go against psychos. Sure, Crawl’s a cold-ass-son-of-a-bitch, but he’s not collecting eyeballs in his freezer. This has to be a mix up!”

“No. It’s not. Your information is out of date. Hotch isn’t with the BAU any longer. He’s with Public Corruption, now.”

And as soon as Comey says that, Powers goes dead silent. For a minute, a full sixty-seconds stretching out into heart thudding silence, there’s nothing from his end of the line. Then he finally says, “And you can’t help.”

Comey could almost laugh as he hears the understanding in Powers’ voice. “I can’t help.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah.”

Powers never did show up to help his client. Nineteen weeks later, they found him in Badajoz, Spain, living under an assumed name.

Apparently Crawl wasn’t the only one in on that insider trading/money laundering scheme.

On Wednesdays, James Unger eats lunch, at exactly 1:00, at the Tribune Club.

In their research on where and when to grab him, Hotch and Co. weren’t able to find out why, but, every week, his credit card shows that he’s here, so here is where they’re going.

Here is not the dark-walled, heavy-oak paneling, leather-chaired temple to upper-crusty snotty-perfection that Gibbs was expecting with a name like the Tribune Club.

It’s a strip club. A nice one from the looks of it, but a strip club nonetheless.

And the Wednesday mystery? Wednesday is Yellow Fever Day.

Gibbs is rolling his eyes as they get ready to slide into the place.

Fornell is shaking his head. “Always my least favorite place to grab a guy.”

Morgan’s curious about that. “Always thought they were easier to get in a place like this. Tend to be distracted.”

“You’re not wrong about that. But I feel bad for the girls. We show up and bust this guy, and people’ll stay away for a while after. That’s hard for them.”

Gibbs, Morgan, and Hotch weren’t expecting that, and it’s clear by the looks on their faces that none of them had ever thought of that.

Fornell shrugs. Gibbs knows that look, there’s a story to this, but he’s not about to ask while the four of them are together. Later, when it’s just the two of them, he’ll find out. Fornell nods, later, he’ll tell that story.

And, when they go in Unger is distracted. And it’s fairly obvious how he can spend $200 on lunch every Wednesday.
He may be skimming on his taxes, but at least he’s a good tipper.

Like Crawl, he’s sure this is a mistake. And like Crawl, he’s not putting up any sort of trouble, other than fussing loudly about this being a mistake. And like Crawl, he’s going to be awfully disappointed when he calls his lawyer (Crawl) and no one shows up to offer any help.

“Oh. Okay… Sure. I’ll bring ‘em home. Love you, too.” Tim almost says, “Kiss Abby for me,” but he doesn’t. Ziva’s not the only one in the office as he’s talking on his cell. Generally speaking, when he talks to any of his spouses when someone else is in ear shot, he keeps his conversation vague enough that there would be no reason to assume he’s not talking to Abby.

And that worked just fine today. Right now, Jimmy’s between bodies, and Abby’s up to her elbows in trace, so Jimmy’s the one who called.

“Case?” Ziva asks.

“Dornie caught another murder. Abby’s in the lab late tonight. From what I can tell, Tony should be home normal time.”

“His case went hot on Monday, they are still working it,” Ziva says.

“So you’re bringing work home,” Burke asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah. More fun with files. Get the kids fed, into bed, and then I’ve got a date with more of these. So fun.”

Ziva nods. They’ve both been dying for updates from downstairs. Three down, one to go. That last one isn’t getting back to DC until 7:00, and they’re going to wait for him to get home before trying to arrest him.

Attempting to grab people at the airport, when they’re coming in, is just messy. Too many people, too easy for a spooked person to run and run far.

But, when they get home? They’re often tired, frazzled, and not willing to put up a fight.

So, 9:00. If everything goes well, they’ll be four for four before Tim brushes his teeth tonight.

“Gibbs, Fornell, take the back.”

Since Hotch is officially in charge on this op, neither Gibbs nor Fornell has a problem with his order. And the back does give them the opportunity to be the guy who saves the day when it all goes upside down.

So, they’re quietly doing that half-walk, half-run, gun out, pointed down, move-into-place maneuver through a very still suburban street at nine at night on a Wednesday. A very surprised squirrel skitters away from them, but that’s about it for signs of life in this neighborhood this time of day.
Other than the stars, and the complete lack of light, they might as well be doing the exact same thing they did this morning. This neighborhood isn’t quite as rich as Crawl’s, but it’s not off by much. No one has a four car garage, for example. Only most of the houses have pools, instead of all of them.

Once they get into place, each of them at opposite corners of a tidy backyard, (behind the pool) Gibbs quietly says on the mic, “We’re in place.”

Then they hear the thudding on the door followed by a very loud, and very clear, “Thomas Fink! Open up! FBI!”

A moment later they hear through their earwigs, “Let me see that!” Fink, the Director of FBIEU says.

Gibbs and Fornell move to the front of the house, and see his eyes flying across the page.

“Me? You’re here for me?” He staring at Hotch and Morgan in stupefaction.

“That’s what the paper says,” Hotch says.

“Just me?”

“Should we be here for anything else?” Morgan asks.

“I’m not saying anything without a lawyer.”

“As is your right, Mr. Fink,” Hotch says.

As Fink is glaring at Hotch, Morgan calls Tim. “McGee, I think we’re gonna need a warrant for Fink’s house, computers, papers, the works. He seems to think we’re selling ourselves short going with just him.”

Tim, back at his home, sitting next to Breena, writing his notes on yet another case as she reads up on the plusses and minuses of a new embalming solution, (both of them amiably bitching about who’s got the more boring situation) says, “Toss Fink in the car, crack the windows, and hold tight. I’ll have a warrant for you, fast.”

Gibbs holsters his gun. Fornell does, too, and they begin the walk back to the car.

Halfway there, Fornell says to Gibbs, “You think that’s the last time we ever do that?”

Gibbs blinks, and then, slowly, nods. Maybe it’s not the last time. Maybe. But… He looks around as Morgan’s making sure that Fink’s head doesn’t bonk into the back of the car, and his gut isn’t feeling it.

This is it. He just suddenly knows. This is the last time. He looks at Tobias, who nods.

Gibbs blinks again. “God.” He can’t even begin to put into words how this feels.

And he doesn’t have to. “Yeah,” Fornell says. “Let’s get ‘em booked, and then go get very drunk.”

Gibbs nods.

“I’m not saying anything without a lawyer!” Fink says, utterly flustered and indignant as Hotch shoves him into the car.

Morgan shakes his head, and then says, “Did anyone ask him anything?”

Hotch smiles. “No, they didn’t.”

Morgan turns in his seat toward Fink. “Guess what? No one’s gonna ask you anything. We’ve already got what we need.”

Fink looks very scared at that. And proceeds to look even more and more scared when no one says a word to him as they wait for that warrant.

Gibbs notices, half an hour later, as they start taking apart his house, that Fink’s gone from nervous to terrified.

“We’ve got him on wire fraud and tax evasion, right?” he says quietly to Hotch.

“That’s what we’re supposed to have,” Hotch has spent way too many years as a profiler to not see the fear radiating off of this guy.

“Would you be that scared of a wire fraud conviction?” Gibbs says.

Hotch shakes his head. “I wouldn’t look that scared unless I had a body in the basement.”

They stare at each other for a long minute. Then they look at Fink, who is small, slim, and looks like, if he really worked up to it, might be capable of pulling a trigger, at a target. Both Hotch and Gibbs shake their heads.

They know killers, this isn’t one of them.

The two pounds of hash they found in his suitcase was a bit of a shock. On a few levels. Not the least of which was how he managed to get it through the airport in his carry-on.

But all of that will wait for later.

Tim is brushing his teeth when his phone buzzes for the last time that night.

Four for four. You’ll never guess what we found in his suitcase. Tim can feel Gibbs’ glee at this.

You’re right I can’t. What did he have?

Two pounds of hashish.

Tim stares at his phone, rubs his eyes, which are a bit buggy from hours of reading paper files, and then hands it to Breena, and says, “My glasses are downstairs. Does that say what I think it does?”

She snorts a laugh. “Oh yes it does. Someone’s got a hidden side, doesn’t he?”

“Apparently. The FBIEU is one hell of a shitstorm.”

She smiles at him, and pats him on the butt. “Lucky for you.”
“Amen on that!” He takes the phone back and sends back to Gibbs. Looks like the stars are aligning.
I’m off tomorrow, are you going in?

Nah. Hotch and Morgan are pros. They don’t need me hanging around.

Left unwritten is the question, “How about you?”

I’m building Donnie’s crib tomorrow afternoon. If you felt like coming by to help, I’d appreciate it.
I’ll be there.

Abbi’s home with Mona and Jackson when Gibbs and Fornell get in.

They’re actually earlier than she would have expected. All things considered, 11:30 isn’t that late for the kind of day they had planned.

She doesn’t like the vibe on them, either. They, from everything she’s been getting text-wise, should be returning home the conquering heroes, and right now, she’s got two mopey, wet dogs in her house.

Gibbs flops on the sofa next to her, and Fornell takes one of the armchairs. “Nope,” Gibbs says.

“Just peachy,” Fornell adds. “Textbook white collar cases. You go in, they fuss about being innocent, lawyers get mentioned, you toss ‘em in the car, and they fuss. Get ‘em back, call the lawyers, and they fuss more.”

“So… why are you guys moping?” she asks as Gibbs snuggles in, and Mona hops onto the sofa to go love on him some, too.

Fornell opens his mouth, and then shuts it, and then gets up, heads to the kitchen, and pours himself a scotch and two bourbons for Gibbs and Abbi, and comes back a moment later, handing them over.

Gibbs drinks half of his straight off, and then says, “That was it.”

Fornell’s already shot his back, and is back in the kitchen pouring another one. “End of our line,” he says from the kitchen. “The gut doesn’t think we’re ever going to be in the field like that again, and when is the gut wrong?”

“Oh,” Abbi says, taking a sip of her own bourbon. Part of her is very pleased that the gut thinks this is the end. Part of her knows they must both feel like they’ve had an arm cut off.

“So, you retire. And you shift onto paperwork. And you tell your wife about all those things you think you’re going to do. And…” Fornell’s got a much bigger glass now, and is sitting across from them on the armchair. “And I didn’t think it would ever really end, you know?”

“There’d always be one last hurrah,” Gibbs adds.

“Hurrah,” Fornell says, voice flat. He gulps another swallow of his scotch. “No wonder Franks was drunk all the time. This feels awful.”
No one says anything for a moment, and Fornell stares into his glass. Then he looks up at Gibbs, eyes blazing. “A long time ago, we were talking around something. For after retirement. It had to do with Franks and girls and… Okay, we’re retired now, what are we doing?”

Gibbs isn’t entirely sure, anymore, that he actually wants to do what he was talking about back then. Travel restrictions are getting less onerous, and some of those countries seem to be calming down. And, more importantly, at least right this second, he’s feeling burned on really, finally being done, but he knows that when he wakes up in the morning, he’ll have things to do. Things he wants to do. But given how Fornell’s looking right now, he’s thinking they can spitball about this all night.

So, Gibbs takes another sip of his bourbon, pets Abbi and Mona, and then says, “Mike Franks was running girls out of Iraq. Teens who got married at twelve, he’d get them and their kids out, resettle them here. I was thinking about getting into that business.”

Fornell grins. “I can do that! We’ve been talking about traveling. Wendy and I can go, visit wherever, and while I’m there, I can scout ports, places for you to stick the boat, and…”

And they’re off.

As strategy planning sessions go, it was pretty much what it was, two increasingly drunken men fantasizing about daring-do and high-seas adventures where they go off and save the damsels in distress. It was not, by a long shot, anything one could call a concrete or well-thought-out plan.

But it got them through the night. And when Wendy came to grab Fornell and take him home, he was in a better mood, and able to sleep.

Which, really, was all it needed to do.
The Fear of McGee: Curtain Call

Thursday morning feels like a morning should. Tim gets up, helps with kids, and food, and even manages to get a quick bit of yoga in. He kisses kiddos goodbye, and without a thought, hops into the car with Abby and Jimmy.

It’s just a morning.

They’re halfway to NCIS when the fact that this isn’t how his day is supposed to go really hits him.

“For a good few minutes there, I was just going to work this morning.”

Abby turns to face Tim. She’s in the front with Jimmy, who’s driving, and he’s in the back.

“Yeah. It did feel a lot like old times.”

He nods.

“You sure you want to do this,” Jimmy adds, voice soft. They know what his plan for this morning is, and generally, support it, but there’s generally supporting it, and wondering if Tim’s just opening himself up for some heartache.

Tim nods again, his determined look on his face. “Yeah. I think I need it.” Then he smiles a little. “Besides if it’s too much, you’re just a few hundred feet below me.”

Jimmy nod, as Abby says, “Damn straight. And you call if you need anything.”

“Don’t worry. If it gets to be too much, I’ll scamper on down and get some snuggles.”

Abby nods, still half-turned in the car seat, still looking at him. “Good. You can come home tonight determined to handle tomorrow, but I don’t want you beating yourself up so bad you’re falling apart.”

“Okay,” Tim adds, to himself, very quietly.

Almost a year.

Almost.

Tim’s standing in front of the door to the roof. It’s metal, painted gray, and looks exactly the way it did almost a year ago. When the Marines scrubbed and cleaned and repainted the Navy Yard, this door didn’t get a makeover.

Once they put the fires out, and once it became clear no one was going to be getting out of DC who wasn’t already out, this was where Tim did his job.
Leon divvied them up by skills. Almost everyone in the building could fire a handgun. Not as many people could hit a target with a rifle at a long distance. But Tim could. So every day, he’d take his rifle, pop the helmet and body armor on, and go to the roof.

Gibbs was up here, for some of the time. He remembers that. Once the smoke cleared, Gibbs was up here.

And Jarvis. He thinks he was a little surprised to see him up here the first day, but… Not much. That Jarvis could sharp shoot… Once he thought about it, patient, sharp eyes, the ability to do the math. No, once he put it together, it wasn’t a surprise.

A revolving collection of Marines. Tim doesn’t remember their names or faces. They were just shapes on the roof that occasionally moved.

They’d sit, or stand, or in Tim’s case, lay, and wait. He thinks that most of the days he just lay up there, on his belly, watching, and waiting. Most days… Probably. His memory is still fuzzy on a lot of the day to day stuff.

It’s not fuzzy on some of it though.

Tim spends a moment, standing in front of the door to the roof, not opening it, feeling… He can’t name it. Somewhere between dread, fear, loathing, and blah.

Probably, mostly, blah.

He knows it can’t be as bad as it is in his head. It just can’t be. He won’t open the door and suddenly morph back a year. (Though there’s a nagging fear in the back of his mind that he will.) The sky won’t suddenly fill with smoke and ash. His clothing won’t suddenly get too loose, clammy from not enough drying, and reeking from mildew and his own sweat. There won’t be a rifle in his hand, or a helmet, also reeking of mildew and sweat, on his head.

There won’t be a mob of people, needing to be broken.

There won’t be hunger, or depression, or the verge of madness.

None of that is waiting on the other side of the door.

It’s just a place. A place where some very bad things happened to him. Where he did bad things to other people.

But his heart is pounding as he extends his hand, feeling the cold plastic of the push pad on the door handle, and he feels stupid about it because all he’s going to find when he opens it is the last day of August, a blue sky, and a wall of late summer humidity.

Not all. He’ll find memories. And maybe motivation. But… the only horror on the other side of the door, isn’t on the other side of the door. It’s here, with him, in his head. And it’s just as real on this side, staring at a gray-painted metal door, as it will be on the other side.

He makes himself press the handle, and then the door, easing it open, his eyes close, and after one more moment, he opens them, and steps forward.

If his heart was going a million beats a minute before, it’s kicked it into double time, now. And his knees feel weak. They’ve got no interest in taking him any further. But he’s got to go further. Has to go back. Has to see.
He can almost see his perch. There’s an exhaust vent between the door and where he would lie, and right now, walking toward it, he can feel the hours lying on his belly, the rough pressure of tar paper roof on his elbows, the heat of it. None of the days he was out there got very hot, but the roof is black, and the sun would soak into it, and at first, when he’d lay down each day, the warmth was nice. Especially as the month wore on, and the air got colder, and he lost more weight, that warmth was nice.

Tim’s standing next to his perch.

It’s clean. Mostly. No puke. That’s his last very clear memory of being up here. Last memory with real context, with a beginning, middle, and end. Jarvis tossed the MRE at him, said something like, “If we’re gonna kill for it, we might as well eat it,” and Tim tore it open, wolfing it down. He still doesn’t know what was in it. Just that it was food, and he needed food, had to have it, his body was reaching for it, grimy, gray-nailed hand, tearing the wrapper apart and stuffing it, fast, too fast, into his mouth.

He’s not entirely sure he even chewed.

And it didn’t matter much anyway. Less than a minute after tossing the packaging aside, he’d puked it back up. Acid burn in his throat, and shame. He remembers that so clearly.

A starving man can’t shovel 3000 calories of whatever that was into himself in under two minutes and not throw it back up. And he knew it, but he couldn’t slow himself down. He wasted food, and just about wanted to shoot himself for that. Wanted to, and might have been, crying for it.

After that there are just flashes. Literal, muzzle flash, and metaphorical, short images with no real narrative flow, other than, he knows, intellectually, what he was doing.

Knows it the way he knows scenes he’s written.

There’s no “lived” memories of some of those bits.

He can see people he shot. Still. Faces. Though… He’s got to be adding them, making those memories up, because he’s up here right now and he can’t see that far…

Or not.

Rifle scope. He was watching the world through a scope. That could be why there are just flashes of images, because the rest of the world was edited down to the tiny circle of the scope.

Tim looks down, and realizes he’s sitting on the roof. Probably a good thing. Abby, and Breena, and Jimmy wouldn’t want him standing up here, at the edge of the roof, looking down at the ground. But sitting, just peering over, that’s fine.

His rifle isn’t down there. He thinks he threw it away. Or maybe he just invented that memory. He didn’t have it when he went home. He did have it when he got up here. Obviously something happened to it in between, but he doesn’t know what.

The cars are gone. They’ve been gone for… ten months now, maybe nine. No more ring of cars. Their insurance company sent them a nice check to cover Abby’s car. Hand-built roadsters aren’t exactly a dime a dozen.

He can remember the snow plow driver. It wasn’t really a plow. It was a plow blade, a big city plow blade, on a truck. Big truck. A Ford F-450 or the like. Huge thing. More than enough power that it would have shoved anything in its path away. And there were people all around it, ready to break the line of cars, ready to mob them.

Gasoline. Burning gasoline. He more smells it than remembers seeing it, but he knows he saw it. He’s just not sure if he saw it that day, or the day they were guarding the prisoners. Probably both days. Maybe.

It had to be there. He can smell it.

The plow was coming. Stupid thing. But if it’ll move a whole street of snow, it’ll move a Honda Hatchback, or some other little car. Only had to do that a few times, open up some gaps in the cars.

It’s not like a wall of cars will keep people from getting in. It will slow them down, space them out. And if most of what you’ve got is non-automatic rifles and handguns, you need to space them out. If they all come in together in a mob, those weapons become useless. The mob just takes the hits and keeps coming. Most of the mob can’t even see what’s happening to the people at the front. If you can’t see the front line get shot, then you can’t get scared, and you won’t run away. But spread them out, and they can see. Spread them out, and when people being to fall, the ones in the back will stop.

And the plow was coming. And it wasn’t stopping. And if it moved those cars out of the way, they’d have a mob to deal with, not just a line of people.

He was Black. Young… Old enough to drive. Old enough to fill out that front seat. Young enough his hair was black, and his face was unlined and… He was determined. Tim remembered that. He wasn’t looking at anything other than what was ahead of him.

Food.

There was food ahead, and he was hungry… He had to be hungry. Sunken cheeks and sunken eyes and hands with knuckles too large and…

His face filled up the circle of the scope.

And then it didn’t. Then there was just a spider web of shattered glass and red spatter.

And Tim threw away his rifle, and he shut his brain down, and…

Eventually he was home.

The place the man in the truck never got to go.

“It feels like the walls should scream, doesn’t it,” Leon says, sitting on the edge of the roof next to Tim.

He jerks a bit at the voice, startled. “Leon. How?” He can’t imagine that Leon knew he was coming up here today.

Leon smiles at him. “Dumb luck. Every inch of every Federal building is non-smoking now.” He pulls out the pack. “I’m down to one a day, now. You mind?”
Tim shakes his head.

Leon slips out his daily cigarette, and lights it, inhaling with a look on his face like this is the definition of pleasure.

“If it weren’t for the girls, I might keep this up. Especially after a long chat with some idiot who wants the impossible, yesterday, one of these feels really good.”

Tim’s never really smoked so he’s got no frame of reference for that. “I’ll take your word for it.”

“Like that first sip of coffee on a lazy morning, when it’s made up just right, and you’ve got nowhere to go or anything to do.”

That Tim understands, and he smiles at it. “Really good.”

Tim looks over the edge, staring at the road. He’s walked the road, driven down it, and somehow that side of it didn’t hit him. No flashbacks or shakes from that. He’s been through the walls, walked by the spot where he stood next to Tony, shooting and shooting, begging his loves to forgive him for getting himself killed so stupidly.

That was a mob. And it took Fornell in his goddamn tank to break it. His little handgun might as well have been pissing in the ocean for all it did.

But the wall doesn’t hit him.

It’s just up here. “It should,” he says to Leon, getting back to his comment about the walls screaming. “Where do they scream for you?”

“My dining room.”

Tim winces, feeling enormously stupid. “I… Shit.” He’d been expecting the wall or something like that. Something to do with last year.

Leon holds up a hand and shakes his head. “It’s okay.” He stares out over the Navy Yard. “Driving a bomb into the place is probably my worst moment here.”

Tim sighs at that. Then he says, “How’d you go back?”

Leon snorts a laugh. It’s a derisive, inelegant sound. “Couldn’t not go back. We moved here at the height of the real estate bubble, and when Jackie was murdered, we were still underwater on the house. If I left, I’d have had to have pulled the kids out of school to free up enough cash to pay what we owed on the house.”

Tim winces at that set of choices.

“We stayed in a safe house until you guys got done with my house. Karen,” Vance’s secretary, “made sure that when we went back it was cleaned and patched, and looked like new, but… I couldn’t walk into the dining room for weeks. I’d go out the front door, circle around to the side, and go into the kitchen door rather than go the dining room.”

“Is it still screaming?”

Leon inhales long and hard on the cig before saying, “Whimpering. Maybe. Somedays I forget. Somedays it still hits so hard I have a hard time breathing.”
Tim nods. “Yeah.”

“So, what’s got you up here?”

Tim stands up; he’s still got other things to do today. “Motivation. Remembering why I’m doing all of this.”

Leon nods at that, inhaling on his cig, looking over everything.

At the edge of the roof, by Tim’s foot, there’s a copper shell casing. Might be his. Might not. Might have shot the man with the plow. Might not. There’s no way for him to tell.

It would have been bright orange when it landed there, but now it’s dull greeny-gray. Pitted and dark with almost a year in the open.

He picks it up, holding it, letting a long, quiet blank fill his mind. Just feeling that edge of… atonement, maybe.

He tucks it into his jeans pocket and stands up. Can’t atone. That’s not how it works.

He can make sure that no other bastard ends up where he was, or driving a plow, just trying to get enough food in him to keep going. He can do that.

So he will.

Leon watches him do that. He exhales, and flicks the nub of his cig over the edge of the roof. “Come down with me, I’ve got something I was meaning to give to Abby the next time I went down to the Lab.”

Tim follows Leon down to his office, watches him look through the main drawer of his desk, and then pulls out a ring. Tim smiles a bit as he sees it. Coppery-red gold and steel. Passion and strength. No stone. Its counterpart has a star sapphire on it.

Leon hands it over, and Tim checks the inside, and there it is, 2/14/16. “Ducky’s wedding ring.”

“Ngyn found it under one of the bookcases in her office. She asked what to do with it, and luck would have it, I was fairly sure I’d seen that ring before.”

“He’ll be happy to have it back.”

“I imagine he will be.”

Tim tucks it onto his index finger. Ducky’s got some wide fingers, or his are just quite thin, either way, he doesn’t want to lose it, or forget about it, and that’s an easy way to keep track of it.

He leaves Leon’s office with a coppery-colored ring around his finger, and a copper shell in his pocket. He supposes that could be some sort of symbol of life and love and death and all of it circling around him, always circling, or maybe it’s just metal.

Either way, the day calls, and there’s more to do.
His next step is his own office, where he’s got two packages waiting.

One showed up yesterday. One a week ago. Both of them are in a box with a selection of other bits and pieces he’s grabbed for this.

And he knows what he needs to do with them. Which is why he’s got the box in his hands, and tools in his backpack, along with extension cords, and is walking across the street, ducking under the “Do Not Cross” tape that’s still covering the mostly boarded up doors to the Archives.

Jarvis and Crew have done some work on the place. By tomorrow morning the boards will be down, so they’ll have some light. They also got the electricity working. He needs that for part of his plan. The rest of the building is just the way it was. Which is intentional. He wants it dirty and broken.

Time for the test run. Part of this is just to make sure everything works. Part of it is to make sure he can handle it. If he’s going to put THE FEAR OF MCGEE into these bastards, he can’t crumble under his own theatrics.

The first part is pretty easy. One of the two packages is a device that produces sounds in the 15 to 25 HZ range. All he’s got to do with that is plug it in, get it turned on, and then spend the next fifteen minutes cursing at his phone as he tries to get it synched to the device. Finally, he’s got it. He thinks. Since he can’t really hear the sound, it’s difficult to know if it’s actually working. But supposedly, he’s got a slider on his phone, and if he just moves his thumb across the screen, the intensity of the sound goes up or down.

Supposedly. He can’t hear it, and he’s not feeling it, so either he’s immune, or maybe it’s not working.

Then comes part two. He opens Janice’s scent. Unlike her usual bottles, this is a baby food jar, which she has labeled DOOM, and…

“Oh God!”

Tim holds it together long enough to carefully get the top back on it, put it down, and then sprints to the back of the room to throw up.

She absolutely nailed the scent of DC. His heart is pounding, skin clammy, cold sweat pricking along his forehead and down his back, and after a few heaving breaths, he retches a few more times, just at the memories that go with that smell.

So, objective one, test this to make sure he can handle it, has been attempted.

And failed.

Objective two: test this and makes sure that it works. Well, the scent works. He’s still a little doubtful about the sound.

At least he knows how to work with the scent.

There are times when Tim’s get down on his knees glad he was a field agent, and this is one of them. He doesn’t have any on him, because he hasn’t been a field agent for more than a year now, but he still owns it.

Vick Vap-O-Rub. Petroleum jelly, lavender, menthol, and god alone knows what else. A little (maybe a lot) of that rubbed in his nostrils will burn like shit, but it’ll kill his sense of smell. He makes a note to make sure he’s got the second suit in his office, and that as soon as he’s done with this, he’s going back there, tossing the first suit into a sealed bag, having it taken to be professionally cleaned, and scrubbing himself off with steel wool, or whatever the smell destroying equivalent it, until he’s banished every trace of that from his skin and hair.

He gets the second part of making sure everyone smells it set up. He’s carefully installing three small, cool mist humidifiers around the archives. The lady at the Target looked at him like he was insane when he went to buy three humidifiers in the middle of a week where the humidity didn’t get below 90%, but he wants that smell blowing around the archives, and they’ll do it.

All he has to do is pour some of the scent into each reservoir, and within minutes the whole place will reek. Tim looks at the humidifiers, and at the babyfood jar of stink, and decides that he can finish that bit up tomorrow, when he’s got his sense of smell burned to a nub.

As for the sound…

He keeps fiddling with it, trying to make it do something.

It’s almost funny. He was just about sure that it wasn’t effecting him, until he realized that the feeling of dread and cold sweat wasn’t just leftovers from his experiment with DOOM. And, it took the sensation of someone watching him, and seeing the fucking gray specter out of the corner of his eye before he realized that, nope, that feeling of distress wasn’t just him in a smell-induced funk.

So, yeah, by the time he’s done with this part of chewing them out, he should have this group thoroughly spooked.

He’s not sure if he’s crossing the line from motivating to cruel for no good reason…

He wants to make sure that the idea of failure feels so abysmally bad to these people that they will quit rather than risk it again.

Tim’s feeling pretty satisfied by the time he’s done with that. He sends Comey a text, telling him to make sure he’s got Vicks up his nose before the speech tomorrow, and then leaves.

Time for the “good parts” of today.

If Tim were to list his favorite ways to spend a day, crib building likely wouldn’t be on the list, but right now he really needs a concrete, physical, good thing to be doing.

Getting Donnie’s crib ready is on the list.

No matter what happens tomorrow, this will still be here. This life, home, loves, this will still be here, still standing…

He’s just about got the box ripped open when he hears the door open, and barking. “Hey!” He calls out to Gibbs.

Gibbs takes a moment, and then he’s up in the room that Anna, Sean, and Donnie will be sharing come… late September or early October.

Right now, the crib that Anna and Sean share is a Gibbs original. But between Dave getting his own crib (and rocking chair), and the million other things of the last nine months, Donnie’s got a crib from Babies R Us. It’s perfectly functional, does everything it needs to do, and everyone knows Gibbs loves the stuffing out of all of these little guys, handmade cribs or no.

Mona barks sharply to say hello to Tim, and Jackson head butts him, tail wagging frantically.

“Shush,” Gibbs says to Mona, which surprises Tim. Jackson’s got the no barking unless it matters rules. Mona’s just a dog, she’s allowed to say hello.

Then he looks at Gibbs more carefully, as he’s sort of flopping himself onto the floor next to the box and tools. “Are you hung over?” Tim asks voice low and soft.

Gibbs blinks some very red eyes in his direction.

Tim gets up, wondering what could have possibly happened last night, goes downstairs, makes a pot of coffee, and finds the Advil. He’s back up, finding Gibbs leaning back against the wall, eyes closed, looking awfully hang dog.

He doesn’t have to say anything. As soon as he’s in the room, Gibbs holds out his hand for the coffee and pills. He looks like Tim sucker punched him when he hands over a big glass of water and the Advil. “Drink that, drink the next one, and then the coffee’s waiting.”

Then Tim just sits down, petting the doggies, and playing fetch with Jackson by wadding up one of the pages of the directions for putting the crib together into a little ball, and flicking it into the hall. Tim’s never been the kind of hung over Gibbs looks to be, but he can imagine that right now he doesn’t want to listen to a drill or hammer.

After about half an hour, when the Advil starts to work, and Gibbs starts showing signs of life, Tim says, “What happened?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Realized yesterday was the last case.”

Tim opens his mouth and says, “Oh.” He can feel how that’s got to be something of a punch. “Really felt it you mean?”

Gibbs nods tentatively, like he’s afraid his head will fall off if he moves it too fast or hard.

“You okay?”

“I’ll live,” comes out of Gibbs.

“I know that.” Tim keeps looking at him.

Tim can see that, and he understands the difference between commiserating with, and up to my eyes in my own existential crisis. “Okay. Fornell going to be okay?”

“Sooner or later.”

“I’ll keep both of you on as long as you want to be on.”

Gibbs flashes him a Cut the BS look. “Writing up notes? Getting bank records?”
“It needs to be done.”

"But we’re not the guys who do it. Is clear on Gibbs’ face.

Tim nods. “Okay.”

Gibbs pushes away from the wall, and grabs for one of the crib pieces. “Let’s get this up.”

“Let’s.”

Not quite three years ago, which seems like an unfathomably long time ago, as well as a shockingly short period of time, Tim sat in Gibbs’ basement, helping to rub an oil finish into Kelly’s crib.

They talked some. About his dad, but most of it was them, quietly working together.

There wasn’t a whole lot that had to be said. Tim just needed the time, needed to have his Dad pat him on the shoulder, and tell him he could do it, even if he didn’t say the words.

They don’t talk much today, either. A little about the case. A little about tomorrow and what’s coming up. But mostly it’s just the two of them, in a room, handing each other tools, holding pieces of wood together, gluing and hammering.

Tim doesn’t have to say that he needs his Dad to pat him again.

And Gibbs doesn’t have to say, You’ve got this.

Here, together, building something for the life outside work, the life that makes work matter, that’s enough.
The Fear of McGee: Act One

Friday morning.

Tim’s taking a moment, just staring at himself in the mirror. (Kind of hogging up bathroom space, but today, no one minds.) Abby brushes past him, in need of her toothbrush, and as she reaches, she kisses his shoulder, and he blinks, coming back to the here and now.

“You’re going to nail this,” she says to him.

He nods, and then touches the goatee. Here, in a hot, steamy bathroom, naked, he’s not exactly looking like the Dread Director McGee, about to kick ass and take names, but he can feel the edge of it coming up.

Given that he’s still got to get his “Doom Sprayers” set up, and given exactly how much his new suit cost, Tim’s come to the conclusion that he doesn’t need to be wearing the suit when he gets the last touches done on the Archives.

So, when he gets to work on Friday morning, he’s still Tim McGee, just a guy in a pair of jeans and t-shirt.

The Director comes out later.

And, as a guy in a pair of jeans and a t-shirt, with a suit bag over his shoulder, and a shoe box in his hands, he sticks out a bit going into the Hoover Building, but only a bit. He’d blend better in the suit.

Doesn’t matter, isn’t happening now.

Once in his office, Tim hangs the suit up, puts his shoes on the floor, and checks in with Jennifer.

“Are you ready?”

She nods at him.

“Any calls from the FBI EU?”

“Thirty-eight of them.”

Tim smirks. “And we have an appointment set?”

“We do. They wanted to meet at their headquarters, but I explained the only time and place you’d meet is the one we’ve got set.”

“Okay. Saturday morning’s all ready to go. Who are they sending over?”

“We haven’t arrested their Assistant Director, so he’s showing up.”

“Lovely. You let Hotch know that he’s the one coming.”

Jennifer nods and then eyes Tim. “You switching things up?”
“I wish. Later, with any luck. Right now this is minimizing the mess.”

“Ah. You’ll forgive me for not wanting to see the show.”

In a heartbeat. “Hell, I don’t want to see the show. You’re more than welcome to the pass. I’ve got a few more things to set up. Anyone calls, I’m at the Archives.”

“Anyone calls, and I’ll send them to you.”

“Thanks.”

Tim does two last things before heading across the street. He tucks his wrist cuff into his desk drawer. He’d like to have it close, and he’d like more to have it not smelling like the fall of DC again. Then he rubs Vicks in his nostrils. It burns like crazy, but he’s sure his sense of smell is dead.

Then over he goes.

---

Doom smells just as horrible as he remembers. Even with the Vicks.

Okay, maybe not just as horrible. He doesn’t have to sprint away to find a place to be sick.

It’s still freakishly horrible. Pouring it into the humidifiers and turning them on is… It’s just… There aren’t words.

He makes a note to add as much Vicks Vapo-Rub as he possibly can and still breathe and not look like his nose is running.

Tim becomes aware of another person in the Archives when he hears gagging. He looks up and sees Jarvis looking green.

“I take it you plan to kill them?” he says, voice dry, hand trembling slightly as he grabs for his cigarettes, lighting one and sucking down the smoke happily.

“I plan to make them wish they were dead.”

“This’ll work. Eugh! How… I don’t even want to know where you got this, do I?”

“Do you like cologne that actually smells good?”

“I’ll text you her website. She makes some really fine scents, too.” Tim stands up, and then fiddles with his phone, shutting off the power and killing the humidifiers. “So, are you going to stick around for the show?”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Not with it smelling like this. Once was a thousand times more than enough. I’ll get the highlights, later. I wanted to let you know that everything on our end is all set. We’ve got a two-steps-away-from-condemned high school filled with cots. So the luxury accommodations you were looking for are all set.”

“Thank you.”

“And I’ve got six cleanup foremen who are ready to put your people to work. They’ll be hauling rubble out of the holding zones, sorting it into reuse/recycle/rubbish categories, and then dumping it into the trucks to get it where it needs to be.”

Tim approves of that plan wholeheartedly. “Sounds physically difficult, and mind-rottingly boring.”

“Exactly! Ten hours a day of tossing bricks into the reuse or rubbish pile. It’ll be fascinating.”

Tim smirks. “At least they’ll be excited to get away from that and come get chewed out by me.”

“You start this up at 10:00, right?”

Tim nods.

“John Adle and Melvin Rose will be here by 9:45. When you’re done, they’ll lead your guys to the school, get them set into teams, and from there it’s work time.”

“Good.” Tim nods to the un-boarded windows and doors, and points to the humidifiers. “Thanks for getting this up and running for me.”

“Trust me, I’m getting the way better half of this deal.”

---

Tim knows some men wear suits like knights wear armor.

He’s sure that that kind of attitude is encoded in the DiNozzo DNA for example, but, for him…

This feels like a costume, not armor.

It’s a nice costume, make no mistake about that. He’s in the charcoal suit, with a crisp white shirt, maroon tie, and maroon pocket square. He’s taken the time to get his hair looking properly official. He left the eyebrow scar visible, but Breena suggested that a bit of brown mascara might make his goatee look a tad more like a beard and a bit less like stubble. (Unfortunately with only two weeks to grow he’s at what looks like scruffy, didn’t-shave-over-vacation level facial hair, instead of a beard.) Brushing mascara onto his face feels odd, but Breena’s right, it’s the difference between looking like what’s on his face is intentional, as opposed to he just slept in for a few mornings.

His tie is knotted perfectly, and it’s a standard Windsor.

He’s got a good watch, borrowed from Ducky, and he’s feeling a bit bad about that, because he didn’t spell out how that watch might smell when Ducky got it back. (He hopes the fact that it’ll go back with his wedding ring will earn him some forgiveness on that front.) Granted, it’s not like Ducky’s a virgin when it comes to bad smells. Still, as he slips the black leather band through the gold buckle, and more importantly, looks at the drawer where his wrist cuff is, which is staying here, in his office, so it doesn’t get doused in DOOM… Tim sighs… Better to ask forgiveness than permission, right?

Somehow, he feels like that rule’s more or less a blanket excuse to be an asshole.
But, he guesses, that’s pretty much in character for The Director.

“Awww! Look at you, Probie!” Tony says from the door to Tim’s office.

“Tony.”

He sweeps in, and then takes Tim by the shoulders, looking him up and down. “I knew it would happen sooner or later!”

Tim raises an eyebrow at Tony, who’s beaming at Tim.

“You finally hit puberty!”

Tim sighs and smacks Tony on the shoulder. Tony continues to beam at him.

“Seriously, wha’d you do to your beard? It looks like real facial hair.”

Tim rolls his eyes, and then says, “Brown mascara. Breena suggested it.”

Tony nods. “Good plan.” Then he shifts a bit so he’s in front of Tim, and nods again. “Who’d’a thunk it, you look like a real grownup.”

“Thanks, Tony.”

Tony reaches forward, takes Tim’s pocket square out, gives it a quick flick of his wrist, opening it up, and then refolds it with easy, practiced motions. He tucks it back in, and nods again. Then he eyes Tim’s cuffs, gives the right one a very gentle tug, evening them out, and says, “There you go.”

Tim’s eyes are about to pop out of his head he’s rolling them so hard, but this is comforting. It’s good to have something other than The Director to focus on. And, he thinks about it, if Tony suddenly got all rah-rah on him, he’d figure that he’d be just about to fatally muff whatever it was. He’s getting teased because he’s not on the verge of existential failure.

Tony’s still walking about him, nodding, and then stops in front of Tim. “Yeah. You’ve done Senior up proud.” He snaps a picture of Tim. “He and Mr. Huong will be happy.”

Tim chuckles at that. “You still coming?”

“I’ve got Draga popping up the popcorn as we speak. We wouldn’t miss it.”

“In that case…” Tim hands over the Vicks.

Tony glances at it and nods. “I see you intend to go for a certain level of realism,” he says, rubbing the jelly into his nostrils. “Eugh! I forgot how much that stings.”

“Trust me, this is better than what’s coming.”

They hear voices in Tim’s outer office, so Tony quickly says to Tim, “You’ve got this, you know that, right?”

“Yeah. I do.”

“Good.” Tony hands the Vicks back, and then begins to head out. “We’ll be near the back, just “Keeping watch.”

“Thanks, Tony.”

The voice in the outer office is Comey. He’s talking to Jennifer. Once Tony leaves, he heads in.

“You ready?” Tim asks him.

He nods. “I can see you are.” His nose wrinkles. “Vicks? You have a cold?”

“No.” Tim hands the jar over. “Trust me, you’ll want some, too.”

Comey takes it, and tucks it into his pocket. “I hate the way that stuff feels. I’ll put it on a few seconds before you’re ready to roll.”

Tim nods at that. They both look at each other, and then look away. Tim checks Ducky’s watch. “It’s time.”

Comey nods again, his eyes vacant. They head out of the building, and as they leave, he gazes across the street, looking like he’s catching one last glimpse of a lover he’s leaving. Involuntarily.

They head into the Archives, and it’s perfect for what Tim, and Comey, need. The morning light is streaming in, catching on the dust, creating columns of light. With the Vicks in his nose, Tim can’t smell the room, but he hears Comey gag, and say, “Uhg.” He swallows hard. “I never thought…”

he’s rubbing the Vicks into his nostrils, fast. “I never thought I’d have to smell that again.”

“That’s only the residue. Once they start to file in, I’ll turn the humidifiers on.”

“You’re going to torture them.”

Comey flinches very slightly at that. This lesson certainly stings for him.

Right in front of where the Constitution used to be Jarvis got a podium set up. There’s even a microphone on it. Tim approves, he didn’t think of it, and it will make this a lot easier.

He can feel Tony and Draga lurking in the back. He can’t see them, but he can hear a faint crunching sound. They actually did get popcorn! That makes him smile. Then he smiles a bit wider, they’re behind him. Tony’s literally got his back on this one. Because no matter what, or where, he’s still his partner.

And then Tim shuts it down. He can see the first collection of Agents starting to pick their way into the building.

Right now, he’s watching curious and nervous rapidly descending to dread. The ten or so people in front of him came to a dead stop as soon as they got the first whiff of the place. They’re looking around at the ruins, and most of them have an expression on their faces indicating they’re sure they’re in the wrong place.
Comey strides over to the microphone, picks it up, and says, “Come in.”

So they do, and as they do, more follow.

The show starts at 10:00. It’s 9:42, and people are beginning to fill the place.

Comey’s behind the podium, looking stern. Tim takes a few steps back, and leans, casually against the wall, where the Constitution used to be. His hands are in his pockets, his thumb on his phone, and he turns the humidifiers on low, and starts, very softly, the rumble of his sound system.

He closes his eyes, and begins to shift his mind.

By the time he opens them his face is hard, his eyes are raptorial, looking at the people in front of him like prey.

The Director is ready.

---

Panic has a smell. Tim’s smelled it on suspects, on criminals, on desperate men in bad places, on himself, even. As more and more agents file their way in, he can smell it, above, or maybe through the mess of DOOM.

Or maybe he’s just feeling it.

However it works, he’s aware of it. He’s got a herd of people packed into a dim, foul-smelling room, and with every additional second they’re getting more terrified.

He turns the sound generator off. He can’t have them so panicked they can’t absorb what he’s saying. He’ll nudge it back up when he wants to really pound a point home, but if they’re all about to run before he even gets talking… That’s defeating the point.

When Tim’s watch hand flicks to 10:00, Comey takes the mic, and taps it.

These may be scared people, but they’re all trained FBI Agents, curious, bubbling with rumors, and their Director has just attempted to get their attention. They go dead silent in less than a moment.

Tim takes that moment to nudge his Doom sprayers into play. Just adding a bit more funk to the surroundings. He hears a few people gag, sees them eyeing the exits with panic in their eyes.

“A few bad apples,” Comey begins. That rivets attention to him. “That’s the phrase, right? What we say as a way to pretend that it’s not our fault when something goes wrong on our watch. We’ve all seen it, all heard it. Union reps. Police officers. The media talking heads. Those dratted ‘bad apples’ keep turning up.

“We heard about that over and over again. It was never anything systemic. It wasn’t an issue with wider law enforcement. Just… a few bad apples.

“No organization is made of angels. And it’s irrational to expect perfection. We deal with so many crimes, every single day, and there are so many of us, that, of course, there have to be a few bad apples.
“So, we shrug and move on. After all, what can you do?” Comey goes quiet for a few beats after that. Tim nudges the sound, and spends a moment watching people shifting, feeling their dread rising. They don’t know why to be afraid, not yet, but they are.

“The thing is, we keep forgetting the second half of the sentence ‘A few bad apples…ruin the bunch.’ It’s not just, there are bad apples. This isn’t a bland statement of fact. It’s a warning. The bad apples poison everything around them. The bad apples have to be plucked out and destroyed or they ruin everything.

“We forgot the second half of that sentence. And maybe, because we are the bad apple pickers, we got complacent, forgot to look in our own bin. Maybe, the job was just too damn big. Or maybe we weren’t willing to do it. But almost a year ago, the entire country paid for us getting lax.”

Tim’s watching them carefully, and he can see them getting less and less comfortable. Before fear was an external emotion. A reaction to what was going on around them. Now it’s sliding inward. They’re starting to put what Comey’s saying together with who they are, and what they’ve done. Tim hits them with a quick blast of sound, and feels his own hair rise, sweat pricking down his own back, so he figures it’s got to be hitting them, too.

“A year ago, where we stand now, was one of my favorite places to unwind. We’ve all been there, those days that just eat into your mind, and you can’t stand to bring those thoughts home, so you find a place to go, and unpack your mind. Find a place to be a touchstone, and get you back to yourself, so you can be yourself.

“This was mine. On, September 4, 2013, I took the oath and became Director of the FBI. The same oath each and every one of you swore. And that oath mattered, mattered not just as to the idea of what I was doing, but to my ideal of myself. So I’d come here, sit near what I’d sworn to protect, and let the worms out of my head.” Comey shakes his head. “But it wasn’t enough.

“The decay crept in. It crept in to me, and it crept into you. We didn’t just fail at weeding out the bad apples, we left them in place, watched the rot spread, and became the bad apples.”

Tim can see the audience does not like this direction, at all. They’re squirming and trying to get away from what Comey has to say to them.

“Last year, the country fell apart because we didn’t do our job. Last year, Washington DC burned because we failed. We didn’t just not get the bad apples, we let them set up fiefdoms and run the country.

“We let them win.

“And people, people we swore to protect, lost everything or died because of it.”

Comey pauses letting that sink in. He lets that pause go on for a long moment, and Tim hits the switch, adding a pulse of low hz sound.

He goes off script for a moment. “Breathe in. Do it. Inhale, deep. Smell that? The whole city smelled like that, and it smelled like that for months. That’s death. That’s how failure smells.”

He gives them another moment there, and Tim turns the humidifiers up to high. The smell of Doom’s choking the room, and he can hear gagging, and sees several of the agents trying to get out of the press, looking for somewhere to be sick.

A mean little part of his mind screams Strangle on it!
Comey gets back to his script. “We’re done letting the bad apples lay around and rot the system. But we can’t do that if we’re rotten ourselves. So, today, spring cleaning begins. Today, we start over, anew. The FBI’s Public Corruption Department is about to have its largest shakeup ever. And once the dust settles with you, you’ll put the rest of the FBI under the microscope. We will go forward, and we will do what we pledged to do. We will protect the US Constitution from all threats, foreign and domestic.

“Lead by example, so here goes. Do as I say, and as I do.

“As of today, I have handed my resignation to the President. I was part of the problem. I let the rot creep in. I made compromises and cut corners, and looked the other way, and that ends, now.

“As of today, the FBI changes. We rededicate ourselves to doing our job, and doing it right.” Comey turns to Tim. “I’m sure you’ve been, at least, introduced to Director McGee. He has taken over Public Corruption, and he’s about to begin the purge.”

Comey steps back, and Tim smiles at him. Just a fast little gesture. Wanting Comey to know that he approves of what Comey did. Comey nods back, and then takes off his badge, and at his level that badge is entirely symbolic, and puts it on the podium. Then he turns, stares down the group, and walks through them, leaving.

They part for him, too stunned to do anything else.

Tim stands at the podium, gets his best shit kicking expression on, waits for Comey to leave, and for his Agents to look back toward him.

Once Comey’s left, he can feel this begin to settle in. They’re starting to internalize what they’re seeing, starting to ease out of shock and into terror. Panic is fear that blinds you to what comes next. It short circuits your ability to plan, to think. Terror… They know what to be scared of now, and he can see butt covering mode starting up.

This is all real, and a lot of them are starting to scramble. Tim gives it one quiet beat before upping the Hz. He wants to short circuit that butt covering mode. He wants them awash in feeling terrible, not planning out which lies will serve them best.

He can feel the crowd shift as the sound gets to more and more of them. Once they’re back into fear mode, he starts, “I haven’t met most of you. Some of you may remember that email you got back in July, it was a cute, friendly little thing, ‘Hi, I’m Director McGee, can’t wait to work with you,’” he shifts his voice up a bit, and adds a little bounce to his diction as he talks about the email, and then kills it dead with the next word, “boilerplate. And back in July, I was looking forward to working with you guys.

“I had plans, ideas for how I was going to reshape this department, and how you and I could go about clearing up the corruption around us.” He’s seeing some expressions that make him think of Jackson when Gibbs isn’t happy with him. He’s hopeful that those expressions go with Agents who can be turned into “good apples.”

“It’s a great job, right? You go in, and get to be the White Knight.” He smiles at that. “The best of the best. That’s who we’re supposed to be. It’s our job to weed out the other Knights who aren’t doing their jobs. We’re the ones who save our country from the connected and powerful abusing their power. We’re it, the last line of defense.

“And when I signed up for this job, I had so many ideas. We were going to do amazing things.

“Before everything went sideways, I was part of the team that found out what was going on, and...” Tim shakes his head, “It was a fucking mess. Everyone was involved. Judges, lawyers, the IRS, The President, both Parties, most of Congress, most of the Senate, the DEA, the FDA, more alphabet soup than I can remember. Every time we’d find a new lead, we’d find a new batch of assholes fucking the public.”

Tim pauses. He’s got them fully shocked. Comey stunned them. But he only started the idea that this was going to come down on them. Tim’s hammering it home. He’s the dark mirror, showing off every flaw, and they don’t want to gaze into it.

“I’m sorry, do some of you find my language unprofessional? Get used to it. We’re done with dry, sanitized euphemisms for what happened. The US Government raped the people it was meant to protect. It fucked them in every direction it possibly could, and slapped them around once it let them back up again, and right now, we’re standing in just one of the burned out hulks left over from when the people jumped up and took revenge.

“And going into this, I thought I was joining the only one of the major players who were good guys. None of you came up as we got into it. Lead after lead, each new turn drawing up into another cesspit of fuckers and scumbags, but the FBI kept coming up clean.

“As things were falling apart, it was you guys who were with us on the front lines of trying to clean everything up before it collapsed.

“So, I signed up for this job, visions of the fucking Untouchables in my head. They gave me carte blanche to go in and clean things up, and I had visions in my head of leading you guys into battle, and wiping the field of the incompetent and corrupt. Get the right people in the right place at the right time and you can change the world. And change the world we would.

“Well, I don’t have the right people, in the right place, at the right time. I’ve got you bastards. If you are here, you’re one of the fuckwits who” he gestures at the ruins around them, and nudges the sound control, letting a blast of Hz roll over them, “looked the other way and LET IT HAPPEN.

“Seven hundred and twelve agents. That was the Public Corruption Department. Five hundred and eighty-seven of you are packed in here right now. More than three out of four of you couldn’t do your jobs. You were the thin white line between this,” he gestures again, and nudges that sound again. Tim figures that he’s got chills going up his own spine, and he knows what he’s doing, so the people watching him should be feeling horrible. “and a society you were meant to protect.

“YOU FAILED!

“Each and every single one of you is here because you failed. You, personally, fucked up investigations. And I don’t mean you had an off day and missed one or two cases. If you are here, you had a pattern of looking at baskets of apples, seeing the rotten apples, and leaving them in place.”

Tim points behind himself. “You see what’s behind me?”

They’re all looking behind him at a blank bit of wall.

“Nothing, exactly. Do you know what’s supposed to be behind me? The US FUCKING CONSTITUTION. The document you all promised on your lives to protect and defend. You signed up for the FBI and swore an oath, on your honor, to live your life, and do your job to protect the US Constitution.”

Another long, quiet moment while he floods the room with smell and sound. More agents run away, and in the silence of him not speaking, they can all hear retching and gagging.

One more silent beat, and then Tim begins again. “They tell me that it’s still in its vault under the floor. They tell me it’s okay, because that vault was designed to withstand a nuclear attack on DC, so firestorms, looters, and no power shouldn’t have hurt it. The vault did its job.

“You didn’t do yours. You were supposed to be that vault. You were supposed to make sure all the other assholes, schemers, thieves, and killers didn’t get away with it. They were all there, hundreds of thousands of them, chipping away at the vault, looking for a crack to get through, and you let them.

“Over the next twenty-four days, you will be here, in DC. You will work on cleanup and rebuilding. Each of you will see me, and we will talk about exactly what you did, because I know a lot of you are looking around like,” he shifts his voice again, higher, mocking, “Me? I didn’t do anything. I did my job! I’m a good agent!” And then back to the darker, deeper tone he’s been using to chew them out. “If you are here, no you didn’t and no you aren’t!

“If you are here, that means you fucked up. If you are here, you were part of the problem. You looked the other way, hid cases, buried cases, ignored things that would make the wrong people look bad.

“If you are here, the more than six thousand people who died in DC during the riots are on your hands. If you are here, the fall of the United States is on you. If you are here, you need to get on your fucking knees and crawl through this city begging the forgiveness of everyone around you!

“One hundred and twenty five of your co-workers did their jobs. They aren’t here. They get to sleep at night knowing they did everything they could to make the system work. And sure, they didn’t save it, but they fucking tried. None of you get to say that.

“Tonight, you get to collapse on hard, little cots, with barely enough food, no showers, and twenty-four days of hard work in front of you. There’s only one way out of this, resign. Any of you want to plop a letter of resignation into my inbox, and you’re done. Off you go. Don’t let the door hit you on the ass on the way out.

“If being an FBI Agent matters to any of you, if you meant it when you swore to uphold and protect the Constitution, you’ll take the punishment duty that’s coming. You’ll look me in the fucking eye when I go through every case you failed, and point out how you, personally, let this happen. If this is real, and if you’ve got any sense of vocation, you won’t slither around with, ‘I did what I could,’ or ‘Everyone was doing it,’ and you won’t even think of uttering the words, ‘I didn’t know.’” Again, he uses his voice, shifting into a vicious mimicry when he utters the excuses.

“You knew. You had a job, and you knew what it was.” Tim gestures to the doors. “There are men at the doors, they will lead you to where you’re going to be staying for the twenty-four days. When you get there, you’ll find a cot with your name on it, as well as the time for our appointment.

“Until that time, and after it, you will report to John Adel and Melvin Rose. They’ll put you into teams, and assign your team to some part of DC that is in need of cleanup. You will spend ten hours a day lugging rubble away.

“You will not be paid for the next twenty-four days. The only way to leave is to resign. I’d make you wear fucking hair shirts if I could, but I can’t, so this is it.

“Do me a favor, resign. I don’t want to see any of you again. I want to hire new people who know their asses from a hole in the wall. I want people who are in it for the good of the country, not the good of themselves and their pet causes.

“If you stay, you’re on probation. You’ve got a year to prove you belong here, and if you don’t, if you pull any of the same shit, the same ‘it’s not a big deal if my people do it’ crap, then that’s it, you’re gone.

“And in case it somehow wasn’t clear, as of right now everything changes.” Tim stares them all down. He realizes he’s got a microphone in his hand, and he figures he’ll never have a more appropriate moment for it, so he drops his mic, the sound of the impact echoing through the Archives, and then stands there, arms crossed over his chest, staring them all down, as Adel and Rose take charge of them.

It takes almost forty minutes for them to get all the agents out of there, but once they’re gone, Tim sags against the podium, knees going weak, feeling the shakes through his whole body. He swallows hard a few times, gripping the podium, using it to keep himself from sinking to the floor, and then feels a warm hand between his shoulder blades.

“You killed it, Probie.”

Tim’s eyes slide shut, and he nods his head. He knows he killed it. He’s just not sure if he’s killing himself, too.
The Fear of McGee: Act II

Getting everyone settled at Robbie Cook High School, sorted into their places, and fed lunch means that Tim’s got some down time between the first round of ass-kicking, and the start of the second.

He uses that time to get a shower. (Which apparently he needs. No one will stand near him as he heads back to his office, and Jennifer winces when he steps in. His poor dry cleaner will be cursing his name when he gets the contents of the triple layered trash bags Tim’s handing off to Jennifer.)

He gets into his gray suit with the jade pinstripe, collapses onto his sofa, and flips on the TV to watch Vivianne’s press conference.

He sighs. This is a thing of beauty.

They managed to keep what was going to happen so far under wraps that he gets to see the entire assembled press corps go dead silent when Comey resigns. The last time he saw a group of reporters so stunned Jarvis had just dissolved the United States Marine Corps and Navy.

This isn’t quite that hard of a hammer blow, but he’s watching that silent moment spread on and on, and then there’s a palpable jerk among the reporters followed by a roar of questions.

Comey takes them for almost an hour, and then hands things over to Vivianne.

By that point Tim’s feeling more alive, so he eats and watches her field questions about how things are going to change and why. No one asks about any sort of FBIEU stuff, so that’s apparently currently under the radar. A lot of them are interested in what cleaning things up means, and a few are really intrigued by the tech changes he’s interested in implementing. All in all, he’s very pleased with how that conference is going.

Jennifer pokes her head in as Vivianne’s wrapping up. “I’ve got requests for interviews from every news organization with letters.”

“Send them to Vivianne.”

“You sure?”

“Yeah. She can decide who she wants me talking to, and when, and I’ve got a feeling I’ll do some quick little spiel, and then be done with it. Maybe take some time with some tech guys. Then I’ll say something about how it’s great to keep people in the loop, but I’ve got a job to do, and that’s why I hired her, so someone could dedicate all their time and expertise to keeping them updated.”

Jennifer nods. She sees the food in front of him. “First one’s due in soon.”

“I know. When they get here, be curt. Not rude, but not welcoming, either. I want them off-footed when they come to see me.”

“Getting stared down by the office secretary when you got sent to the principal’s office?”

Tim smiles at that. “Exactly. Any word from Hotch?”

“He’s gotten the warrants to go into the FBIEU’s finances. The accountants are already on it. The guys have finally gotten lawyers, and they’re less than pleased with the current line. No one’s offered up any goodies to get out of trouble, but they’ve all asked about if anyone’s talked to you.”
Tim nods at that. “This is really predictable.”

“They’re playing the game by the rules they wrote.”

Tim smiles at that, too. He’s going to enjoy showing them that the rules are about to be re-written.

The first of the Agents to come in is mad.

Tim counts his blessings on that. He’s a lot better at dealing with angry than sad or shamed.

He can go just as hard, just as angry, and that’s easy.

Agent Dan Smitts has been a part of the FBI for 19 years. He majored in accounting and law in college, and joined the Bureau right out of school. He joined Public Corruption back in ’05 after a stint with the Forensic Accountants. For all nineteen years, he had good reviews. Maybe not a model agent, but in the top 1/3.

He’s tall, slim, with light brown hair that’s about half gray, and light brown eyes. He’s ten-ish years older than Tim and ready to bite his head off as he stalks through the door.

Tim’s already sitting behind his desk. He gestures to the chair in front of his desk.

He doesn’t normally have a chair in front of his desk. He likes to talk with people either at his conference table, or on the sofa.

So, with that one, lone, metal folding chair in front of his desk, he’s made it exceptionally clear that this is not his normal routine.

Dan takes one look at the chair, rolls his eyes, grabs one of the conference table chairs, which are comfortable and padded, pulls it into place, and uses his foot to almost kick the folding chair away.

Tim just watches that, eyes bland.

He thinks for a moment about what, exactly, he wants to do with this little show that Agent Smitts is putting on.

He knows how The Admiral would have handled it. He would have gone full bore, screaming, and cursed that man into a blubbery pile of goo.

Tim knows he’s not going there. He lets the silence hang for a moment while he ponders, what, exactly to do with Agent Smitts.

And then he knows how he’s handling this. The Admiral would rage. And it would never get to his eyes. The screaming, the words, the storm all around him, all of it was a show.

And Tim’s got to put on a damn show now, but he won’t let it be a mask.

He settles further into his chair, pulls up his calm, dives into the cold, hard places in his mind, and quietly says, “I take it you do not consider my evaluation of you, or the Public Corruption Department, fair or warranted?” He keeps his voice soft as he says that, and his tone even.
“May I speak frankly?”

“Certainly. Be as frank as you like. There’s literally no shot I’ll think less of you as an agent once this is done.”

He sees that it takes about a second for Smitts to understand exactly what he just said, and then his eyes flare with anger. “Fuck you. Fuck your ideals. We did our job! I did my job! I did it as well as anyone could have possibly done it.”

Tim drums his fingers on his desk, slowly, one tiny thud after the next. “The entire government falling due to internal corruption would appear to argue otherwise.”

“No one could have stopped that.”

Tim make a small hmmp noise. “Earthquakes, the tides, the sun rising in the morning; those are all things that can’t be stopped. Government corruption getting so bad that the entire edifice topples does not seem to be on par with the rest of that list. You had a job, you didn’t do it. You, specifically, you, looked the other way, and let cases slide. And maybe you, personally, couldn’t have stopped The Fall, but if you hadn’t looked the other way, you’d still be back in the Philly office, along with nine of your co-workers, who actually did their jobs.”

“Oh, cry me a fucking river. This is not on me. And it’s not on the FBI. I put corrupt public figures away every damn day of my career. There are literally thousands of people in jail because of me, and they were all fucking the system. You don’t know what we did here. You’re from NCIS, you had, what, four cases a week in a really brutal week? Four cases an hour! Every hour! Of course I looked the other way, so did everyone else! There was no possible way to do this job if we investigated everything. So, if one came in, and you knew they were good people, you killed it, because there was no other possible way to do this job.”

Tim just stares at Smitts, fingers steepled in front of him and lets him talk.

“Most of it was bullshit anyway. We’d have these dreamy-eyed twits who didn’t understand that you had to move money around to get the job done, or political hacks using whistleblower status to fuck with their higher ups. Someone would get a bad review and ten minutes later they’re reporting their boss for corruption.”

Tim flips open the folder on Smitts. “You had one of the highest cleared case rates in the Bureau.”

Smitts’ eyes flash at that. “I have one of the highest cleared case rates.”

“Most of your cases involved plea bargains.”

“So did yours. Pleas are fast, prosecution takes time, so if they can, they skip it. If I’m sitting around waiting to testify, I’m not going after the next guy.” Smitts isn’t wrong about that. By the time the lawyers finally did show up, most of them did what they could to avoid going to court.

Tim nods. He wonders if was means she’s no longer with the IRS, or she was in the DC office and is no longer alive. That’s not in the file, and he’s not about to go off script and find out. Though if she did die in The Fall, that might explain a lot of this rage. Smitts literally can’t allow himself to take any responsibility for this because it hurts too badly.
“And, according to my files on you, you requested to get IRS cases get sent your way.”

“Yeah. I knew those laws in and out. Knew the IRS in and out, too. Made it easier to talk their language, see who was doing what. We already had rapport, so they’d tell me stuff without having to dig too hard. Like I said, we were constantly slammed, so the faster you could get through the shit and find out what was really going on, the better.”

“You worked non-IRS cases, too.”

“Yeah. No one’s so specialized they only do one thing.”

“When I started looking through your files, I found you have a 20% case clearing rate on IRS cases.
Most of the 80% you didn’t clear, you never even asked a single question about. Your ‘skill getting through the shit’ couldn’t have come into play on a case where the only thing you did was sign your name to it.”

“I read the cases; they were BS! We’ve got to ‘investigate’ everything, so, you get a charge, you read it, and if it’s stupid, you toss it in the circular file. Everyone does it.”

“You had a 70% clearing rate on non-IRS cases. And from what I can see you very rarely just stuck your name on one of those and ignored it.”

“Yeah, ‘cause that wasn’t my area of expertise. You don’t know the players, you’ve got to look into the case before you can call a pile of shit a pile of shit. The IRS was being unfairly targeted. After the Lerner stuff, so many people decided to try and make names for themselves by making them look bad. We were swimming in shit cases after everyone found out about her.”

“Ah.” Tim lets that hang.

“Ah what?” Smitts bites out.

Tim shakes his head. Then he begins to list names, after ten of them he says, “Do you remember any of those cases?”

“No.” Smitts snorts at the idea that he’d know who those people were.

“Of course not. You glanced at them, decided they were, as you put it, BS, tossed them in the ‘shortly after hell freezes file’ because they were being ‘unfairly’ targeted and forgot all about them.”

“Sure.” That gets and eye roll.

“You want to know why I know them?”

“Because you’re a Monday-morning-quarterback on a fucking vendetta.”

Tim smiles. Smitts is not wrong about that. “All of them, every one, was implicated in the Congressional slush fund.” He lists three more names. “They were on the payroll of the Bathenadas.” Four more names. “They were on the payroll of the mob.” Sixty-two more names.
“They were being paid off to investigate the political opponents of certain members of Congress.”
Nineteen more names. “They were being paid off to make sure that politically unpopular groups couldn’t get 501-3-C status.” Nine more names. “They made sure politically popular groups didn’t get their 501-C-3 status revoked.” Two more names. “They helped call a hit on one of my friends, and if I wasn’t smarter than they were, they would have called one on me, too.

“Those are your ‘good guys’ with the BS charges against them. And they go back to 2005, way before Lerner was a blip on the radar.”

There’s a tenth of a second where Smitts looks worried, and then he kills that dead and covers it with, “Those are also less than 1% of my caseload. You can’t fault me for that. If I go through all of your old cases, I’m sure I’ll find some people you missed, too.”

“You probably would, but unlike me, you’re not on this side of the desk, you didn’t get hired to straighten everything back up again, and when I missed a guy, it was because he was hiding better than I could seek, not because I looked at him and said fuck it!”

That gets an eye roll.

“You have two options at this point, resign, or deal with punishment duty, and then, when you are back on, you will investigate every case you get, in the order you get it, to the fullest of your ability. At some point in the next year, I will get a case triaging system into play, and then it will tell you what cases to work on. You have lost the ability to decide for yourself which cases you will work or what order you’ll work them.”

“And as of today, if you do not resign, you are a Probie again. You will have a case officer who checks on you. You will report to him on every case you work. You will be required to have him give you approval to abandon working on a case. You will not work another case on or with the IRS again. And if you so much as set a toenail out of line, you are fired.”

That gets Tim’s anger up, a genuine flash of mad. “No, you are not! You never were! You can’t even identify what a good agent is! Good agents do not coast along on their gut, shutting down investigations out of hand because they had a good feeling about the people involved. Let me guess, your sister is IRS, and you get to hear about these BS charges, and how everyone wants to piss on the IRS all the time, and it’s just crap, and she’s a good person, so the people she works with have to be good people, too, so screw it.

“That may be being a good brother, but it is not being a good Agent! I know that first hand, because I caught a case with my sister, and I was a terrible agent on that cast. There’s a reason why we don’t work cases with our families. Being a good Agent is saying, ‘Hey, I know a lot of IRS people, so I’m not being objective, I need to start getting DEA cases or something.’ It’s not, ‘These guys are getting picked on, so I’ll ask for their cases and go easy on them!’”

Smitts is glaring at Tim.

“Are you staying?” Tim asks, forcing himself to cool down.

“What happens if I resign?”

“I have no idea. That’s up to you.”

“Pension, references…”

“Nineteen in, you aren’t vested yet. Your reference will confirm that you worked for us. That’s it. You will not be able to get a job with any other federal department. You will be able to COBRA your health insurance like anyone else who leaves a job.”

Smitts stands up, leaning over Tim’s desk. “Fuck you and fuck your options! I am not going easy.
“You can fire me, or at least you can try. I am not reporting for your fucking punishment duty, and I am not resigning. I’m going back to Philly, getting back to my cases, and you can deal with my union rep in the morning.”

“I don’t think so. Agent Dan Smitts, you are, as of right now, fired. You will hand me your badge, and gun, and you will not report back to Philly. You can call your union rep, as is your rights, but you are going to lose that fight.”

“Yeah. We’ll see.” Smitts turns to leave.

Tim stands up and barks out, in a drill sergeant’s voice that would have made Gibbs proud, “Agent Smitts! Your badge and gun! Now!”

Smitts rips them off and flings them toward Tim, before storming out of the room.

As he goes, Tim hears, “I’m suing all of you fuckers into oblivion! I’ll have my job back before the week is done, and you’ll be the one unemployed.”

Jennifer steps into Tim’s office, and shuts the door. His next appointment is already in her office. She quietly says, “I take it that went well.”

“Just peachy,” Tim replies, picking up the gun and badge. He hands them over to her. “Start the paperwork for the termination of Daniel Smitts. Who’s up next?”

“Justine Becker.”

Tim nods. “Give me five minutes, and then bring her in.”

Four minutes and thirty seconds of fast typing is followed by a very tentative knock on his door.

Tim stands up, walks away from his typewriter, straightens the metal folding chair in front of his desk, sits back down at his desk, and says, “Come in.”

And immediately regrets it. Justine is on the verge of crying. He can see the tears glistening in her eyes as her bottom lip quivers. She timidly moves across his office, and primly sits herself onto the folding chair, trying to take up as little space as possible.

She glances at his eyes, and then looks away.

Tim already feels like a total fucking asshole. He bites his lip as discretely as possible, and then flicks open her folder.

“Do you know why you’re here?”

“I didn’t do my job, sir.” Her voice cracks on, sir.

Oh God! He’d rather spend all day chewing out angry men then spend another moment with a quivering woman about to cry in front of him.

He swallows and keeps his calm. “That’s a given. Do you know what aspect of your job didn’t get done?”
“No,” she squeaks, and bursts into tears. It’s not pretty crying. This is loud, gasping, snotty-nosed, messy crying.

Tim points to his bathroom. “Go, take a moment, get tissues, and calm down.”

She does, and he takes a moment, too. He fetches a rubber band out of his desk drawer, and fits it around his wrist. If he keeps biting his lip to keep himself in line, he’ll rapidly be out of lip, and they’ll all see him do it. He should be able to flick the band without anyone seeing. He just needs to move his hands to his lap.

He hears the crying in his bathroom slow down to hiccoughing sobs, and makes himself recheck the notes.

A moment later she’s back, face blotchy and scarlet. And he’s feeling a bit more resolved toward going hard on her. She may look like a whipped little lamb, but she’s one of the first people here because she’s got one of the most egregious patterns.

“In the five years you’ve been here you’ve had thirty-five cases involving local elections. Twenty-seven of them resulted in nothing. You spent three years working out of your hometown, Harrisburg, and two years in Richmond. When you were in Harrisburg, in your hometown, where your father is a state Senator, and your grandfather was an elected judge, you found nothing wrong. Every case of local election tampering in Pennsylvania resulted in you sitting on your butt and doing nothing. Then you move to Virginia, and with your experience in election fixing, you get called in on seven cases across Virginia, and suddenly, in a state where you know no one who’s ever stood for election, you get six convictions. Care to explain?”

And the sobbing starts again.

Tim sighs, and waits. He knows the FBI got these because state elections aren’t covered by the Federal Election Commission. And as state cases, the Pennsylvania authorities recused themselves because they didn’t want to look like they were cooking their own books.

“Did you volunteer for those cases? Ask for them?” Tim asks when she finally looks like she can form words.

“Not the first one, but my Dad found out I was on it, and…” Her face crumples into more tears.

Tim thinks she says, “What would you do for your Dad if he asked?” At least, he hopes that’s what she’s said, because otherwise his answer won’t make a lick of sense. “I ran the sting that got him arrested back in December. He’s in jail now.”

(The wider point, that he literally helped his family murder someone for revenge, and justice, let alone the mile long list of felonies he’s committed for Gibbs, is something he doesn’t intend to say, ever, to anyone.)

Apparently what he said made enough sense in response to her, that she’s staring up at him, eyes bright pink. “You…”

“He’s in Leavenworth. Are you saying your father, a state senator, asked you to use your position as an FBI Agent to compromise investigations?”

She blinks, hard.

And Tim goes hard, too, pulling his ice back up, keeping it between him and his sympathy. She may legitimately be this upset, but she’s not a little lamb, and there’s no shot, at all, that she didn’t know why she was in this office.

“Your badge lands on my desk in five seconds. If you do that, then we’ll allow your dad to take a plea. Or you keep your badge, and when you get done with punishment duty, we will bring charges against you and him.”

Tim gets to a three count before her badge lands on his desk.

“Thank you. I want you to report to Room 317, and talk to Agent Hotch. Explain exactly what you and your father did. He’ll handle the rest.”

A moment later, she leaves, whimpering. Jennifer’s in a moment later, and he hands her the badge.

“Resignation paperwork for Justine Becker.”

She nods, taking the badge.

“Next one angry or sad?”

“Numb, if I had to guess.”

Tim sighs. “Great.” He glances at his clock. If he wants to get them all done, and get home at some point, and right now he wants home more than anything, he can’t take breaks between them. “Send him in…”

So she does.

When Abby picks him up to take him to the House, for only one night, Tim’s got a welt on his wrist from snapping it with the rubber band so many times.

She looks at it, and her silent, withdrawn husband, and rests her hand on his neck. He turns his face into her palm, closes his eyes, and lets himself drift as she drives them, and the kids, towards Shabbos and, for him, a few hours of weekend.

The nap helps. Food helps. Jimmy gently padding his wrist with a bit of gauze and a stern, “Not again. Take the damn break if you need it,” helps. Time with babies helps. Sex helps. More sleep helps.

And then it’s morning, and he’s back to it.

“Mr. McGee, you’re a hard man to get a hold of.” Okay, this bit of it, he’s looking forward to. Smacking the smug off an asshole is always a pleasure, and just by the way he walks into the room, Tim knows Jeff Ons, Assistant to the Director of FBIEU is an asshole.

Everything about him is just oily. Tim feels like he should leave a trail of ooze behind him. He doesn’t offer to shake Tim’s hand, and Tim doesn’t offer, either.
“I’m a bit busy this week, but I did specifically set this time aside for you.”

“Ah.”

Tim gestures to the seats across from his desk. This time it’s one of the conference chairs. He doesn’t want to overload the power dynamics quite so hard with this first brush against FBIEU. Ons sits down. Tim also gestures to the coffee maker. “Feel free to get yourself a drink.”

“I’m fine.”

“Splendid. So, what did you want to talk about?”

“I’d imagine the same reason you set that time aside for us.”

“That’s probably true, but, since we both know what’s going on, and I’m already doing what I want to, and I don’t know what you want to do, the ball is in your court.”

Again, Ons looks at him and says, “Ah.”

Tim nods. He waits. Ons very much looks like he wants Tim to begin this, and Tim is not about to budge. He can sit here and be stared at until the end of time. Finally Ons says, “I’ll admit, once we had word that Fink, Jegg, Unger, and Crawl had been arrested, I wasn’t expecting to find you behind it.”

“Why not?”

“Well, we aren’t the public, nor are we corrupt, so the Public Corruption Task Force seemed like an odd fit.”

Tim appears to digest that for a moment, then he says, “Interesting, and who did you expect would have been behind arresting your top four men?”

Ons eyes Tim, aware of what he just stepped into. He’s got a slick answer for it, though. “I was expecting some new political pet, someone with a hard-on for destroying public unions. As you know, Sesson, Cowder, Hanson, and Rimmenez all ran for office on platforms of destroying Union power, so I was expecting one of their lackeys.”

“Then I suppose it must have been a pleasant surprise to see that this isn’t a political witch hunt, and instead it’s a case of good police work.”

The gets a glare. “All I see is clever maneuvering. You want to get rid a lot of men, so you attack us first.”

This time Tim doesn’t respond, not directly. “Are you suggesting our police work has been shoddy? That the charges we’ve rendered are… made up, perhaps?”

Ons side steps that, too. If he’s read the charges, he knows they’re awfully solid. “I read up on you.”

“Did you have a particularly bad case of insomnia?”

Ons snorts at that. “You’re good enough with a computer that you could have planted everything you’ve brought against my men.”

Tim’s turn to snort. “I may be good with a computer, but I’m not capable of using one to manufacture two pounds of hashish. Computers that do that are fiction. As for the rest of it… Well. You’re sitting in the middle of the FBI’s Public Corruption Department, in the middle of the FBI, where I am not, by any stretch of the imagination, popular, and I’m becoming less so by the minute. I’m sure you can find someone to open an investigation into me and what I may or may not have done to your men’s financial records. Hell, if you like, we can call another Agent in right now and get started. I’ll happily hand over everything we’ve got, and they can get playing on it. I understand we’ve got some of the best Forensic Accountants and Forensic Hackers on earth here, so let’s do it.”

That gets another glare.

“Not willing to put up?”

“It would be embarrassing.”

Tim shrugs. “So? I’ve been embarrassed before. It didn’t kill me. Plus, once an investigation is done, I’ll be vindicated, because your guys actually did what I’m accusing them of. No one did anything to their records.”

“What do you want, McGee?”

Tim smiles. “That one’s easy. To go home early, play with my kids, and have a good night with my family. What do you want, Ons? After all, you’re the one who called the meeting.”

“You know, we don’t have to be enemies.”

“I hadn’t realized you considered me an enemy.” Tim’s smile fills in You aren’t dangerous enough to make my enemy list. Ons’ quick, annoyed look indicates that he gets the subtext.

“The FBI would be much better off if we were to be on the same side.”

Tim smiles widely at that, laying on his ‘younger, enthusiastic’ expression. “I absolutely agree with that. If you were to back our efforts to clean up the FBI, I’d appreciate that greatly.” Tim lays the bait.

“How much?” Ons leans forward, interested.

“It’d make my job a lot easier, and anything that makes my job easier is something that lights up a warm glow in my heart and makes me sleep easier.”

“Well, we’d certainly like to make sure you sleep well,” Ons says, voice cheerful, looking pleased that this is finally going the way he wants it to.

Tim grins. “That’s excellent. So, you’ll hand over all of your internal documents and finances and then we can go through and weed out everyone in your organization who’s causing trouble?”

It was deeply satisfying to see Ons’ face freeze and then go white.

“Oh,” Tim says, the steel back in his gaze. “Is that not what you meant by on the same side? What do you want, Ons?”

“We will find out who you work for.”

Tim snorts a half-strangled laugh. “We’re in the Hoover Building, and there’s a sign on the door with my name on it. If who I work for is a mystery to you, you need to resign.”

“Just stop it.”

Tim sits silently.
“We can make things difficult for you.”

Tim shrugs again. “Of course you can. Anyone who walks into this room has that power. Still, go back out, look at the title to go with the name on the door. Do I look like a man who fears difficult?”

Ons steeps his hands. “We can make them impossible. We can keep you in court for decades.”

Tim nods, and he lets his expression go serious. “That does sound troublesome. I try to avoid court when I can. Rule 13, never involve lawyers.”

“Good.”

They both wait.

Another beat of no one saying anything.

“I’m not psychic, Ons. You do have to tell me what you want.”

“Best-selling author, multiple degrees, advanced computer skills, you’re smart. What do you think I want?”

Tim’s smile is sharp. “I think you want to help me turn the FBI into the cleanest, most-efficient branch of Federal Law Enforcement.”

Ons scoffs. “Yeah. Of course I do.”

“And thus, again, we’re back at open your files, let me see what you’ve been up to, and prune the dead wood.”

“No.”

“Then you need to lay it out for me. You need to tell me, in tiny, little words, what exactly it is you want.”

Ons looks really suspicious. “You wearing a wire?”

Tim stands up, takes off his jacket, and starts unbuttoning his shirt. He’s surprised to see Ons doesn’t stop him. He has Tim pull the shirt all the way off. Smart enough to know what he’s going to ask for is illegal. Dumb enough to do it in my office. There’s a reason why you’re the Assistant to the Director, and not any higher. “You want the pants, too?”

“And shoes and socks.”

So Tim strips down to his underwear. Ons stands up, grabs him in an extremely intimate manner, but assures himself Tim isn’t hiding a wire behind his balls. Tim shudders exaggeratedly, and puts his clothing back on. “That was unpleasantly familiar.”

“Not taking any chances.”

Tim smirks at him. “Of course not. What do you want?”

“I want my men free.”

“Just like that.”

Ons nods. “Just like that. You let them walk. We’ll let you save enough face by having them fade away quietly. We’ll replace them. But none of my guys go to trial or do another minute of time.”

“And what, exactly, am I supposed to do? Just put out a press conference and say, ‘Oops! Wrong guys? Those two pounds of hash, turns out it was brownie mix?”

“We intentionally haven’t brought up any press for this. Your side hasn’t made a big deal of it, either. Don’t say anything. My men go free.”

Tim pretends to consider it for a moment and then says, “Yeah, I’m not seeing why I’d want to do that. I’ve got all four of them dead to rights, and as soon as we hunt down Powers, I’ll have him up to his eyeballs in insider trading charges.”

“Gareth’s part of the deal. You don’t hunt him down, and he doesn’t ever come back. And you’re going to do it because you want to fire people. If you do what I want, I let you do what you want. Every day you keep my guys in jail is a year I keep you in court. You want to get rid of the dead wood, guess what, I’ve got the pruning shears.” Ons looks like he’s got the upper hand, and Tim wonders how many times before versions of this conversation have happened.

“That’s a poetic way of putting it. So, just to make sure I do understand this, you are offering me… Cooperation? You’ll burn your union members? Lose their phone numbers when they start calling for help? How does this work?”

“Start? They’re already calling, and we’ve got the funds and lawyers to handle them all. But we don’t have to. Once my guys are free, when your guys call for help, we point out that we can’t help, and it’s done.”

Tim blinks, making himself look impressed. “Wow. That’s…”

“Tidy. We go along with your clean up the FBI. We give press conferences about how whatever you found was disturbing enough that we’re not willing to contest the firings, and that’s that.”

“And do you open up your files and let me go through your internals?”

Ons laughs.

Tim blinks. “That’s a pretty good deal.”

“It’s the best you’re going to get. I can have a judge stopping your punishment duty in less than ten minutes. He’ll make sure that years pass before you can so much as put an unsatisfactory review in anyone’s folder.”

Tim nods, and then says, “Well, I certainly wouldn’t want that.”

Ons grins, feeling like he’s won.

Tim smiles back, and hits the button on his phone. A second later, Hotch is in the room, reading Ons his rights.

“Mr. Ons, you are under arrest for attempting to bribe a Federal Officer.”

“What!”

Tim replies, “That’s what they call it when you try to get an official to do something illegal for you by offering him something he wants or needs.”

“You have no proof!”
“I recorded the whole thing. My computer’s been picking up every word since you walked into the building.”

Ons looks horrified.

“No one wears a wire. Not in his own office! Mr. Ons, you’ve got one call now. Are you calling your lawyer, or that judge you just threatened me with?”

Ons stands there, numb, blinking. He glares at Tim, but seems to have very rapidly hit the decision that now would be a really splendid time to use his right to remain silent.

“Hotch.”

Hotch turns Ons, and takes him out of his office.

For a full minute Tim feels really good about that. And then for one more minute. Then Jennifer pokes her head in, “Tim, you told me to give you the ten minutes heads up. The first one is already here. You’ve got ten minutes until the appointment.”

And feeling really good goes crashing down.

Time to start handing out the head smacks.

The less said about the rest of Saturday, the better.

And nothing said about Sunday would be, in Tim’s opinion, even better yet.

He’s not home for nearly as long as he’d like, but he’s sure as hell not about to bring a second of his day into his home. His spouses ask about how it’s been going the first few days, and on Saturday he answers, a little, talking about Ons. By Sunday night, he just shakes his head.

They don’t make him talk.

On Monday morning, Tim gets an interesting one. Jason Reneer is the second one of the day. He’s a forensic computing specialist, and when Jennifer pokes her head in, getting directions on what to do with the one who just left (sobbing) she says, “This next one… Is different.”

“How?”

“He’s dead calm.”

Tim sighs at that, and nods. “I could use some calm.”

“Two minutes.”
And in two minutes Jason Reneer heads in.

He’s tall. Even from his 6’1” vantage, Reneer is tall to Tim. His hair is blonde, wispy, soft, and worn longer than FBI Agents would normally go for. (It almost brushes his collar.) His eyes are blue. And he’s slender.

And like Jennifer said, he’s calm. He’s not cheerful or perky, not after three days of brick sorting, but he’s not angry, defensive, or sad.

And he’s also aware of the way Tim’s watching him, like he doesn’t know what to do with this. (Which is true.)

He sits down, looks Tim dead in the eye, and says, “I don’t belong here.”

Tim’s had versions of that, but not calm. Angry and defensive, sure, but this isn’t frantic butt covering, this is just a statement of fact.

“Okay. I’ve got 38 cases that beg to differ, but, have at it.”

“Noise.”

That impresses Tim, so he rolls with it. “Noise?”

“You’re a math guy. I’m a math guy. We understand the concept of noise. If you have enough data points, you will find a pattern, whether there’s actually a pattern there or not.”

That’s a new angle, and Tim’s willing to see where Reneer takes this. “True. Teasing patterns that mean something out of the noise is part of what I do.”

“Right. You couldn’t do the sort of thing you hope to do with the tech if you didn’t know how to do that. Whatever you’ve got on me, it’s noise.”

“You seem awfully sure of that.”

“Because I am.” He’s dead confident on that. “I don’t play favorites. I don’t mess around. I get cases. I solve them.”

Tim’s gut wants to believe this guy. His records suggest that a leap of faith may not be warranted. “Uh huh. You get ‘em, you solve ‘em, and that’s that.”

“Yes.”

“In six years, you were assigned 38 cases involving congressional staffers of Democratic congressmen. Beyond noting you got the cases, you investigated none of them. The forty-three cases involving Republican staffers were all investigated. You’ll forgive me if that level of lopsided looks like more than noise.”

Reneer tilts his head at that, looking curious. Tim waits, wondering what’s going to come out of him, “Show me,” isn’t what Tim was expecting.

But he does. He whips out the notes, and lets Reneer get into the files to check them.

“I only remember five of them, but the ones I do, I got pulled off of.”

That gets Tim’s attention. “That’s not in the notes.”
“It’s not like I was formally told not to investigate them. But, this one, Hanson, I remember because it looked interesting, and I’d just gotten the warrant to start going through her files, and then my Boss shows up and tosses a hotter, newer case into my lap. He wanted that other one to take precedence. You’ve got to investigate what he wants you on.”

That gets Tim interested. No one ever said ‘Don’t investigate blah,” but if they were leaning on agents to investigate other things…

“How often would that happen?”

“At least once a month.”

“Tell me more about that boss.”

“Howard Ruther. He’s not a bad guy or anything. But he was really interested in us making sure that any case we got involving government contractors took precedent. So… yeah, I got bumped off several cases against… a bunch of people, really, because he had a new contractor taking a kickback or something, and he wanted us on top of that.”

Tim’s scanning through Reneer’s file. “I’ve got more research to do. You and the rest of the people working for Ruther may have gotten a reprieve.”

“You believe in reprieves?” Reneer looks surprised, but happy to be so, by that.

“I believe in laying blame where it belongs. Anyone we couldn’t find a pattern for, isn’t here. If your Boss is telling you to investigate something, and he keeps showing up whenever other cases appear in your docket, it’s not entirely up to you then, is it?”

“No.” Reneer’s still dead calm. “Now what?”

“Brick sorting. I’ll check out Ruther. I’ll check out the other people working for him. If your story is right, not only do you have a reprieve, but I’ve got a division that needs people who can find real patterns in the noise.”

“So, if I’m right, I’m getting a promotion, and if I’m wrong?”

“Twenty more days here, and then you can enjoy another Probie year.”

Reneer nods. “I’m right.”

“I hope you are. I need guys like you.”

Since the show began, Gibbs, Ziva, and Fornell have been off. He doesn’t need them researching, and he doesn’t have room for them in his office.

They’ve had the option of working with Hotch, but, none of them have been interested.

But he’s got a job now. It screws up his schedule for the day, but he doesn’t care. They can wait for him.

He gets Gibbs on the phone (he’s nervous about calling Ziva, not wanting to wake Dave if he’s napping with an ill-timed ring) and explains the deal with Hanson.
“I need eyes, and I don’t have the time to do it.”

He can feel Gibbs nod. Then two words stretch across the miles. “On it.”

“Thank you.”

And then it’s back to chewing people out. Which is getting harder by the moment, because now, as he’s smacking people upside the back of the head, he’s wondering if he should be smacking their bosses.

But, no one else comes in with that explanation. He gets a lot of, “I did the best I could.”

Some of them outright apologize.

Some of them even mean it.

By the middle of the day he’s put them into three categories.

Angry: That’s Smitts and his ilk. Tim doesn’t enjoy working with them, but they’re the easiest of the bunch. They come in pissed, he pisses right back at them, and in this contest he’s got the biggest, longest dick, so he wins.

Seppuku: These are the ones who come in crying, and perform the verbal equivalent of ritual suicide in front of his desk.

He hates them. He’s had the hard boss staring down at him, and being awash in abject shame and misery, and having to do it to someone else makes him want to curl up in a ball and rock back and forth whimpering.

The “Reasonable.” It takes a few days before he gets one of them. Tim knows they talk to each other when they get back to punishment duty, so it probably takes a while before this plan of attack gets put into play.

Irina Murphy is the first one to try it on him. (Though each version of this he’ll get will go about the same.)

She strides into his office looking as crisp and professional as someone who’s been doing hard work, didn’t bring the right gear for it, and hasn’t had copious shower access can. So, she’s rumpled and likely wearing less makeup than she’d prefer, and if he had to guess she never voluntarily leaves the house with her hair this unkempt.

That said, she’s doing a fairly good job of keeping herself together. He’s seen agents (usually of the Seppuku variety) who look like they haven’t slept or showered since they left to come to DC.

“Director McGee, I fully admit I messed up. I wasn’t as good of an agent as I could have been, but, be reasonable. More than nine out of ten of the cases I got, I did a good job on. Yes, I did look the other way sometimes, and I’m not proud of that, but…” And she’s got a hangdog look on her face here, “but it happens. You know people, and they’re trying to do good things. And you want to believe in the greater good, so, you cut a corner here, or look the other way there, so they can do what needs to be done, because the greater good matters, right?”

Tim lets her keep going.
“I mean… I know one of the cases you’ve got in there was on Senator Fishburne. And, yeah, I know, I buried it. And I did it because he was one of the few solid votes for EPA funding and expansion. If I had taken him down, we might have all been swimming in toxic air and drinking poison. And… The Endangered Species Act, every few years those bastards kept trying to kill it, and I knew, no matter what, he’d fight for it.

“So, yes, I ignored his office playing fast and loose with the fundraising laws. But, I had to. If he had gone down… I couldn’t live with that.”

Tim nods slowly, reading the look on her face, the hope that an appeal to a higher good than her job might matter. And, were this just a philosophical discussion, he might agree. But this isn’t. “Assuming you mean that as your resignation speech, I will take that into consideration on whatever recommendations you get for us in your search for further employment. We’ll let future employers, possibly in the environmental sector, know that you are ‘passionate’ about causes that matter to you.”

She just about swallows her tongue. “This job matters to me!”

Tim stares at her, hard eyed, and keeps his voice quiet. “Not enough. Your job was achieving the greater good through a whole lot of little goods.” Tim shakes his head at that. “That’s all any of us ever have, really. A lot of little day in, day out, everyday goods. And you’re right, nine out of ten of your cases you did exactly what you were supposed to do.

“But everyone else does, too. You’d never eat in a restaurant that only got nine out of ten orders right. If your electrician gets nine out of ten of your plugs in right, your house burns down. If your doctor correctly diagnoses your illness nine out of ten times, you die. You weren’t hired for this job to be reasonable. You were hired to be better than reasonable. You were hired to be outstanding.

“This is it, Public Corruption. We’re the White Knights, and you weren’t. You want to go crusade for the environment, and I’ll make sure whoever calls in for references knows you’re so damn committed to making sure we’ve got clean air and water that you were willing to let people break the law. Otherwise, right now, today, you’re committed to clean government, and everything else comes second.

“Right now, you cease to care about the ‘greater good.’ Right now making sure the guy in your case file is doing his job legally is your greatest good. If you can do that, you stay, if not you leave. It’s that easy.”

She eyes his desk, and her badge in her hand, stands up, taps it on his desk, still thinking, and then leaves, still holding her badge. Tim sighs, and puts in his notes that she never gets put on a case that touches anyone environmentally connected.

And then comes the next one, another Seppuku.

Apparently, Reneer talked. By the next morning Tim’s getting a lot more, “I was working on whatever it was, but my Boss kept dropping new assignments on me.”

Some of them, he knows are lying. Too much time in interrogation means he knows when someone’s BSing to save themselves. He fires three of them in quick succession, which feels… Maybe good, maybe not. He doesn’t know anymore. Tim’s spending most days trying not to feel.

Some of them, though… They aren’t sure. Which means they’re probably cobbling together memories of getting hot cases dropped into their laps, and wondering if going after those cases meant they missed something. And, given how much they’ve got riding on successfully making him believe they really meant to be good agents, but they just got yanked off of those cases, they’ve done a good job of convincing themselves that that’s what really happened.

The best he can do with this is rearrange how he’s going to talk to these people. Bosses get bumped to the top of the list.

“I’ve got one you want to see,” Jennifer says to him. (After a morning of three reasonables, two seppukus, two angries, and five I-Got-Pulled-Offs.)

Tim’s staring at her, dead-eyed, forcing himself to show some interest in something. Then he hears a tiny yip, and starts to feel a smile spread across his face.

“You do, don’t you?”

“Yeah.” She looks pleased to see him perking up.

Then Gibbs heads in, with Jackson. He plops a huge file down in front of Tim, and leans back against the counter where the coffee maker is. “Your math guy was onto something.”

“Good, I liked him.”

Gibbs nods. “His boss’s wife is the sister of the former Assistant Director of the Democratic National Party.”

“Oh God, I don’t want to tell you how many times I’ve heard versions of that over the last week.”

Gibbs nods at him, I know all over his face.

“The thirty-eight guys under him, some of the cases we pulled them for were ones that protected the DNC or their people. But not all of them. Reneer, he’s found you nine more good employees.”

“Better than nothing. Who’s getting saved today?”

Gibbs lists the names. “Ziva and I are already starting to go after your other supervisors.”

“And once I’m done telling them they’re free to go, I’m handing you Reneer. He should help you pick out patterns from noise.”

Gibbs smiles at that. He’s sure that Tim’s head would explode if he saw the way he and Ziva were figuring out what patterns might exist. He knows for a fact that both Tony and Abbi were horrified to see the web of connections they had drawn on six whiteboards. And amazed they were able to pull something out of that web of mess.

It got done, that’s all that mattered.

It takes a while to hunt down Reneer and his eight innocent co-workers. They’re scattered throughout the city.

Tim thinks the best of the saving graces on this is that he hasn’t talked to anyone but Reneer in this group. Though if he had, he supposes this would go a long way toward showing off that he’s not always right, and he’s willing to own up to it.

Still, he’s glad he hasn’t made anyone in this group cry. At least, not in person.

As soon as they’re all in his office, before anyone has a chance to speak, Reneer grins, smugly, and says, “I was right.”

Tim nods. “You were. Now look around you. Thirty-eight people reported to Hanson, you nine represent the only ones doing your jobs properly.”

Reneer shrugs. “I never said you were wrong about the rest of them. Just me.”

“Not just you.” Tim turns his attention to the rest of this group, who are all tired, sunburned, smelly, and unsure of what just happened to them. “Agent Reneer walked in here and told me I was wrong about him. He was right about that. I was also wrong about you. When I got this department, I went through everyone’s employment records, looking for patterns. I found a pattern for each of you. The problem was, what I found was how your Boss was covering his tracks.” Tim looks at them, regret in his eyes.

“I’m very sorry I called you on the carpet. I’m sorry I put you through this. Your status as full agents has been re-instated. You’ve been given an additional eight days of paid vacation. Which if you want to take as of tomorrow, I’m fine with. There are no black marks on your record. And, as of right now, there’s an Uber waiting to take you to the FBI jet, and in two hours, you’ll be back in Boston with your families.”

They all blink at that. Then one of them, Samason, says, “That’s it?”

“That’s all I could think of. Is there anything else you’d like?”

“You rip us all up, and then tell us you were wrong, give us vacation, and send us home on your personal jet?”

Tim nods, wondering what else he can offer. “I’ve got some Steam gift certificates that I used to give my NCIS guys for ‘good job’ treats, but that seemed like way too little for this. But, I mean, if you like gaming, your next game is on me.”

Samason shakes his head. “No, I’m not saying that’s too little. Just… You’re admitting you were wrong and now you’re trying to make it right?”

Tim nods again, relieved. “That’s the idea.”

“You do that?” Robinson, a particularly bedraggled agent asks.

“I try.” Tim sighs. “God knows I’m human. I’m not going to get it right all the time, but I’m certainly going to own up to it when I don’t.”

“Maybe, next time, a bit less shock and awe first, and a bit more listening?” Samason suggests.

Tim raises an eyebrow at him. “Nine out of thirty-eight.”

Reneer gives Samason a little whack to the back of the shoulder. Tim sees some sort of glance pass between them, then Samason shrugs. “Mathboy’s saying I just stepped in it.”

“Mathboy,” Tim says dryly, looking at Reneer. “I’ve got a list of nicknames like that as long as my arm. He just saved you. And maybe some of the rest of your co-workers. The rest of you, off you go. Get ready to go home. Reneer, hang around for a moment.”

The other eight of them file out. Once they’re gone, Tim says, “The offer is open for you, too. If you want to get on the jet, you can be back in Boston before sundown.”

“Or…”

“Or I’ve got two agents with the files and backgrounds on every Supervisor, Team Leader, and Assistant Director in Public Corruption. They need someone to help hunt through the noise and find the patterns. Once that’s done, I’ll slot you here, put you with the group that’s going to begin investigating Internal Affairs, give you a team of your own, and you’ll start that investigation off at the top, so we’re not crucifying people for what their Bosses did. When IA is clean, then we’ll turn you loose on the whole FBI.”

“I like the sound of Team Leader.”

“Good.”

Reneer offers Tim a small saucy smile. “I like the sound of Steam gift certificates, too.”

Tim snorts a laugh at that, then goes into his desk, digs around, and finds two one hundred dollar certificates. He hands them over. “I don’t know when Gibbs is going to let you have some downtime again, but when he does, have fun with it.”

There’s a gleam in Reneer’s eyes. “Oh, I will! Uh… Where do I stay? I’m not going back to the high school, right?”

“No! Jennifer will get you set up with somewhere worth staying, and you’ll meet Gibbs tomorrow.”

“Just… You aren’t allergic to dogs, are you?”

“No. Why?”

Tim smiles. “You’ll see in the morning.”

“Okay…” Reneer sounds a bit nervous about that, but he heads off, looking pleased.

And for a moment, Tim is too, until he catches the sound of crying from his office.

Every ounce of good feeling from that evaporates as he realizes he’s still got two hours of employees to deal with.
The Fear of McGee: Act III

The first death threat shows up a week after he starts.

Tim is philosophical about it. He’s been held at gunpoint and stood over a ticking bomb, so violent, incoherent rage, scrawled across a piece of paper with the Robbie Cook High School crest on it doesn’t even make his pulse rise.

He looks at the envelope, which he got already opened, analytically. No return address. No stamp. The glue strip is in pristine shape.

He doesn’t toss the letter out, just plops it into a folder for Hotch. “Can’t kick over the hornets’ nest and act startled when they try to sting you.”

Jennifer looks at the letter. “You aren’t going to do anything with it?”

“No sealed, no stamp, probably the only reason it got delivered is because it was going to the FBI, whoever wrote this didn’t touch it. And, everyone in that building is smart enough not to use his own handwriting for this.”

“So… you just…”

Tim sighs. “Use it as cause. I catch anyone snooping, straying too close to my home, offering a real threat, I can snap ‘em up, now.”

That gets Jennifer’s attention. “You didn’t send this to yourself, did you?”

Tim almost laughs at that. “I’m not that devious.”

Jennifer nods. “Five minutes until the first one.”

Tim sighs and rubs his temples, feeling the headache creeping up on him. He remembers the number of guns he’s been handed over the last week as different people have resigned. Just because he doesn’t feel like this is more than a temper tantrum on paper, he’s not going to tempt fate. “Make them give you their guns before they come in.”

She looks relieved at that. “Thank you,” she says as she heads out.

Tim stands up, stretches, and then pulls off his jacket, tie, and shirt. Comey told him to watch his back. He’s got an actual death threat now. He pulls his vest out of his bottom desk drawer and slips it over his skin.

He rolls his eyes. Wear a t-shirt tomorrow. It’s rough and annoying against his chest, back, and shoulders. Hot as fuck, too.

He’s just straightening his tie as the first one of the morning, Julius Aerbinder, head of the team that dealt exclusively with investigations into the bidding systems for federal contracts heads in. His people are saying he’s the one who kept booting them off of investigations related to Consolidated Concrete, Henry’s Fine Paper Goods, Industrial Amalgamated Inc., and CVR Corp.

The problem is, his people all have their own shit, too. He’s got maybe one employee who might not be here on her own volition. And he’s got so much of his own shit, it’s hard to tell if those five companies are getting extra protection from him, or if they’re noise.
And he’s mad.

Good. Tim steels himself, puts his ass kicking glare on his face, and gets ready to stomp this twit.

He gets another badge thrown at him for his troubles, but that’s one more jerk he won’t have to deal with again.

Tim collapses back in his chair, and stares at the ceiling. One down, thirty-nine to go.

“You bust fifteen balls,
“What do you get?
“Another day older and—“

“Shouldn’t it be sixteen?” Jennifer asks as she comes in. Tim didn’t realize he’d been singing that out loud.

He blinks at her, and thinks about it, and says… “Probably. Did I lose five minutes?” He thinks he’s got five more minute of lunch time.

“Interesting.”

It’s the entrance to Robbie Cook. He’s watching several of his people leaving once the sun goes down.

“They’ve apparently noticed that no one is guarding the door. Where do you think they’re going?” he asks.

“Hotel? They were back in the morning.”

“Am I seeing any of them soon?”

She taps the phone. “That one is Juan Ferrez; you’ve got a meeting with him in three days. He’s the first of the bunch. You want me to move them up?”

“Nah. Keep watching, keep recording. Write up the resignation paperwork for them, get it all filled out. I will happily accept their resignations when they come to see me, and if they don’t sign, we’ll immediately terminate.”

“You want a guard on the door?”

Tim snorts. “NO! If they’re sneaking out, they’re done. And if I need to post someone at the door to keep them in there, I don’t want them on my team. How many ran off last night?” He obviously didn’t see the full eight hours of video.

“Just those five.”
“Okay, keep me posted.”

“I’ve got you.” She nods to the clock. “And now your five minutes are up.”

Tim groans, and then packs his lunch away. “Nineteen down, twenty-one to go.”

He’s fucking burnt by the end of the day. Fifteen of that twenty-one were Seppuku mode, and at least eleven of them were acting. The only thing worse than someone who genuinely hates what he/she’s done and is shamed into just about wetting his/her pants, is someone who’s faking it.

Tim packs his gear up, slowly, he shoulders his go bag, and feeling like his legs weigh a million pounds, he lurches out of his office, and down the stairs.

He usually takes the stairs. The months where he couldn’t take the stairs still annoy him, so he makes himself go up and down the four flights, even though, given how tired he is, the elevator is seeming awfully tempting.

An extra perk of the stairs, he’s pretty much the only one who takes them. Just him and the crying, snotty-nosed voices in his head, sobbing and begging him for forgiveness.

He stops mid-flight, closes his eyes, and leans against the wall, willing those images to go away.

“Timothy McGee.”

He jerks, and is reaching for his gun before he knows who’s talking to him.

His eyes find a woman a few steps below him, looking up at him. She has white hair, he knows that. And… eyes. The hardest, sharpest, oldest eyes he’s ever seen. He assumes, thinking about it later, that she had to be more than white hair and a pair of diamond eyes staring up at him, but he can’t remember anything else about her.

He doesn’t know who she is, but his hand doesn’t leave his gun. He flicks the holster guard off.

“Yes. And you are?”

She keeps staring at him, tilts her head slightly, and says, “Someone you won’t get to know in this life.”

“Uh… Okay.” He’s certain she’s speaking in English, with a British accent, but that makes no sense to him.

For a second, her eyes almost soften, there’s a hint of a smile, and then, “Watch your back.”

He literally turns, putting his back to the wall. He’s got no idea who she is, but his danger sense is screaming.

“Do you… Is…”

She steps past him, and gently touches his face, right next to his left eye. “You have your father’s eyes.”

He winces at that.
“No, not that one. Use those eyes. You’ll see what’s coming before it gets to you.”

“Uh… Is there a…”

And she’s gone.

He rubs his hands against his eyes, hard, but he’s alone, in the stairwell.

Tim turns around, goes to his office, locks it, and immediately calls up the security footage. He watches himself have a conversation with no one.

He’s got his phone out before he’s finished the video. “Jimmy, do you have a minute?”

“Just did a y-incision. Can it wait?”

“I’ll be there in ten minutes.”

Actually, he’s there in eight. Still wearing scrubs. And he’s got to knock to get in, because Tim’s not only made sure that no one has line of sight on him, but his door is locked.

And he locks it after Jimmy gets in.

“Did you eat today?” On the way over, Jimmy dealt with a spark of panic, and then beat it down and made himself switch into medical mode.

“Yeah. It’s not low blood sugar.”

“Not what I’m thinking.” He strides across the room, touching Tim’s forehead and throat, looking at his eyes. “You don’t have a fever. Your eyes aren’t glassy. You aren’t sweating. Your skin isn’t clammy. Your heart rate is up, but not that high.”

“And everything I ate today was from the food Breena packed for me.” Tim knows what Jimmy’s thinking now.

“With you all day?”

“In my office with me, all day. I went to the bathroom twice, but the office was empty then.”

Jimmy’s about to go deeper on that, and then he looks over to the coffee machine. “Drinks?”

“Water and coffee. Water from sealed bottles. Coffee from the…” Tim winces. That’s been in his office, alone, every night. “Shit.” He’s pulling off his jacket, as Jimmy goes lurching for his bag. He brought his kit. “Bloodwork?”

Jimmy’s nodding. “Bloodwork.”

Tim rolls his sleeve up. And Jimmy gets his alcohol wipes. It’s as he’s drawing the blood, that Jimmy asks, “What did you see?”

Tim tells him, as well as he can remember, and fills in the bit about the video of him by himself in the stairwell.
Jimmy’s not sure what to do with that. “At least she’s giving you good advice.” He keeps watching Tim, fairly certain that the bloodwork is going to come back clear. “You don’t look drugged.”

“I don’t feel drugged. Tired, but…”

Jimmy nods. He knows that Tim’s not sleeping well. “You sleep at all last night?”

“Couple hours.”

Jimmy thinks about it. “Dreaming?”

“I saw the video, I’m standing up and talking.”

Jimmy snorts. “Let me see it.”

Jimmy watches it, and shakes his head. It’s not great footage, but between what he can see with his eyes, and knowing Tim…

“You lean against the wall, close your eyes… Dreaming.”

Tim makes a face at that, but he’s got to admit, it’s logical. And he certainly likes that idea better than someone poisoned him.

“Then we don’t need to tell the girls about this?”

Jimmy looks at him like he’s the biggest twit he’s ever laid eyes on. “You’re insane.”

“But that’s not the insane part. If you think I’m not testing all of this stuff… Let alone you think I can somehow pull off this, ‘Hey, Abby, I’ve need you to check this blood, which I wrote T McGee on, and this coffee machine, which just happens to look exactly like Tim’s, for every poison you can think of, and a few you can’t, but it has totally nothing to do with Tim at all,’ you are insane.”

Tim nods. “Okay.”

“I will tell her it’s my medical opinion that you need to go home and sleep, which she will agree with. And that I will give you something to make sure that when your head hits the pillow you’ll sleep.”

“I can’t be a zombie tomorrow.”

Jimmy just eyes him, and Tim nods, slowly. If he’s literally falling asleep on his feet, he’s past the point where zombie is a legitimate concern.

“Come on. I’ll take you home.”

“Then you’re going back to work, right?”

Jimmy nods. “Got to run this stuff, and Sam’s keeping Lt. Heathers company, but that’s an easier job with the two of us.”

In Jimmy’s car, Tim wants nothing more than to just close his eyes and drift, but he doesn’t.
Because of the nature of the FBI, who works there, who goes in there, the Hoover Building has a “secure” parking facility. It’s two blocks down, and under a non-descript building. Officially it’s an office building with an underground parking garage. There’s an underground path that leads from that parking garage to the Hoover Building’s basement. No name on the building, just a number.

Jimmy, being a visitor, didn’t park in there, but Tim’s car is in there.

As they drive by, he notices a delivery van sitting out front. Bertha’s Flowers. With two men in the cab. In the no-parking zone.

Since that building is a front, and all that’s in there is storage, thus there is no one inside to receive a delivery of flowers, and there are places on the street to park closer to the other buildings which could have someone getting flowers, Tim grabs his phone. “Hotch, hey, you still in the building… Uh huh… Yeah… There’s a delivery van in front of the secure parking facility. Probably nothing, but… Thanks.”

“Trouble?” Jimmy asks.

“I hope not, but no one’s supposed to be there. Don’t want anything compromising line of sight when we bring in big name people.”

They’re a quarter mile on by that point. “That’s where you park, too.”

“Yeah. I’m not… feeling it in my gut, but… I’m not Gibbs. So, they’ve got secure parking; I’m using it.” He taps his chest, and Jimmy hears fingers on Kevlar.

“What haven’t you told us?”

Tim sighs. “Got the first death threat today.”

“Tim!”

“I was going to mention it after dinner.”

“I carried a filled coffee maker down four flights of stairs and through security!”

Tim looks irked at that. Okay, yes, it was a rather sloshy mess, it’s a pretty good thing that Jimmy’s got scrubs on, but of all the possible responses…

“Context, Tim. You’re exhausted, you get a death threat, you’ve been on work you hate all day, and suddenly you’re seeing someone telling you to keep your eyes peeled. I’ll still test the stuff, because it’s you, but my first semester psych class, college psych, not med school, tells me this is pretty normal.”

“Oh.”

The driver jerks when he hears knuckles on his side window.

He’d been watching the parking garage in front of him so intensely he didn’t see the large black man with the bald head sneaking up on him.

His partner, also watching ahead, frantically looks to his right, and sees the older man with the white-threaded black hair standing next to him, grim look on face, and an FBI badge pressed against the car.
The driver rolls down his window. He tries smiling. “Agents.”

“You better have a damn good reason for being here,” Morgan says.

Both drivers flash each other a look.

“Yeah, that’s not a damn good reason,” Hotch says. “Out of the car.”

“Wait! What? We’re just…”

“Getting out of the car, getting patted down, getting arrested, and then explaining to us why you’re here,” Morgan adds, stepping away from the door and pulling it open.

“NO! No… We’re just…”

“In a restricted zone,” Hotch says. “Out.”

“We’re just watching!” the passenger says as he steps out of his side.

Hotch presses him against the side of the van, pats him down, and cuffs him. “This one is clean. Yours?”

“No weapons. No ID, either,” Morgan replies.

“None on mine, either. What do you bet we don’t find any flowers in the back?”

“I don’t make bets I’ll lose,” Morgan says, walking his guy over to Hotch. “So, how about it? Why are you here?”

“Watching!” The driver says.

“And who are you watching?” Hotch asks with both of them in front of him, as Morgan goes rummaging through the van.

“Don’t know. A car. We’re looking for a Highlander, plate number…” he spills the digits. “Just watch, follow, and photograph.”

“There are cameras in here,” Morgan says. “Got a lens you could use to see Mars. No weapons.”

“Just watching! That’s all we’re doing!” The passenger is adamant.

“Uh huh.” Hotch packs a lot of disdain into those two syllables. “What are you going to do with your photos?”

“Give them to our boss.” The driver says. “It’s legal to take pictures of people and their cars. The press does it all the time.”

“She’s Allison Carter.”

Hotch and Morgan share a look. She’s the… God, they’re getting pretty far down the ranks at this point. She’s the Head of the Human Resources for FBIEU.

“Heh.” Morgan says. “You know, it’s generally legal to take pictures of people and their cars. But “Okay, thanks, Hotch…”

Tim’s sitting in the waiting area of their local Target, as he and Jimmy wait for them to fill a prescription for sleeping pills.

“What was it?” Jimmy asks.

“FBIEU, probably looking for blackmail fodder.”

Jimmy sighs. “So, you caught this one.”

“Yeah.” Tim’s head hits the wall behind him. He knows they’re both thinking it, but neither of them wants to say it.

Eventually, Jimmy does. “If we don’t want to get outed, it’s probably best if Breena and I go back to sleeping at our place, and you guys sleep at yours.”

“Probably…” It hurts to say that.

“You think this will ‘blow over?’”

“No. I think I’ll settle with them at some point, and they’ll try to rejigger it as soon as they get something on me. I’ve got 4/5th of the executive level behind bars right now, and they’re getting desperate. Ziva said take the head off the snake, but…”

Jimmy can see Tim really isn’t in a place to think about this, not right now.

“Okay. It’s not happening tonight. We’ll deal with tomorrow, tomorrow.”

“Okay.”

Jimmy gets Tim home and settled. He can’t stay long, and there’s a somber air, as they make plans to talk tomorrow, in Tim’s office, at lunch.

Jimmy was right, whatever that pill he gave Tim was, he hit the pillow and was gone.

He doesn’t remember any dreams that night. And he’s only mildly upside down when he wakes up.

But, upside-down or not, a few thoughts occur to him: A: They were going to follow his car. Which means: B: They don’t have his home address. Likely because C: Between his job and Abby’s past as a stalking victim, their home address is secure. (To the point where their driver’s licenses don’t actually have their real address on them. It’s close, but… not exactly right. And as a backup measure, if anyone tries to use the VA DMV to find Tim or Abby, he gets a heads up.) But, just in case D: By this evening, that’s going to be even more secure. His publisher, agent, and anyone else who has Tim and Abby McGee attached to 12998 Hertzle St. won’t have it.

Those thoughts have also led to him thinking that, no matter what, he’s not letting them drive his family apart. Windows shut, blinds closed, the only thing they could get them with is a heat camera, and there’s no way to prove it’s them on the camera. (Granted, he’s going to be bringing some goodies home, make sure nothing is sending information out of his home. No way he’s getting bugged. If he’s feeling really paranoid, he’ll make sure the power is off if they’re doing anything he wouldn’t want on camera.)

He’s finishing up his shower, and feels like all of this is a massive pain in the ass. And it is, but as he gets dressed, and sees Jimmy sleeping (very late night, he got in… Tim doesn’t actually know, but if he’s still in bed, that was at least 2:00 AM night.) and hears the ladies dealing with the girls…

This is his castle, one of them, and he’s going to defend it against any and all comers.

“Us to our place, and you to yours tonight?” Breena asks as they eat breakfast.

The kids are with them, so Tim doesn’t say “Fuck that.” He settles for, “NO!”

Abby raises an eyebrow at him. “Devious plans?”

“Lots of them.” His eyes sparkle a little.

“Good!” she kisses him. “You know, I made that jammer a few weeks ago.” Breena and Tim look at her curiously. “Didn’t I tell you about that?”

They shake their heads.

Abby waves that off. “Dornie had that murder last month, and every time he or his guys got within fifty feet of the killer all of their gear died. Radio, phone, wi-fi, all of it. As soon as they got out of the zone, it came right back. I build him a quick-proof-of concept device. He used it to kill the device that was killing his gear… Anyway, Abby to the rescue, case solved, and I’ve got a jammer that I can mess with a bit, boost the signal. Turn it on, and everything in the house goes dead. Turn it off, and everything turns on again. So, as long as we don’t want to watch anything while we’re messing around, we can be an electronic surveillance dead zone.” She grins at them.

Tim kisses her. “I love you.”

Abby smiles prettily, hugging him. Then she glares at him, “No vest.”

“I’ll put it on before I go.”

“You better!” Breena adds.

“I will. I really think the letter was just a pissed off agent blowing off some steam. And I think the Union’s just looking to embarrass me.”

They both stare at him, then Breena strokes a hand over Donnie, and Abby looks to the rest of the Tim nods. “I know. I’m not risking anything. I keep the blinds shut. I’m wearing a vest. No one gets into my office with a weapon. And I’ll start moving around the office at random. Someone uses a heat scope, I won’t be sitting still.”

They both nod.

“Uber into work,” Breena adds. “Call a car, have it drop you inside the secure parking lot, and do the same when you leave. No one sees you go in or out.”

“I can do that, too. I was going to do that today, anyway.”

“Okay.”

Three more death threats. Nine agents slipped out to sleep somewhere other than Robbie Cook.

And, when he gets in, there’s a news clipping from the New York Times. Apparently, according to this article, he’s ‘torturing’ his agents with unsafe duty. Next to the clipping is a request from Vivianne for ten minutes to talk to a hand-selected reporter, where he can ‘give his side.’

He sends her a quick email telling her to set it up.

Then he settles back in his chair, for a minute, before getting up and starting to pace randomly around his office.

Jennifer ushers the first of his appointments in.

If sitting there, on the far side of his desk, staring them down was unnerving, wandering all over, including standing right next to them, looming over them, cranks the stress level up a few more notches.

Unfortunately, it does that for him, too.

“Director McGee, I want to thank you for taking the time to talk to me.”

Tim nods. “Best fifteen minutes of my day here.”

Adam Heth, reporter for the New York Times, looks startled at that. “That’s not usually how people react to being grilled by a reporter.”

Tim smiles, but it’s grim. “I usually do press on paper. No love of getting grilled, either. But… compared to how I’m spending the rest of my day…” Tim shrugs. “So, have at it.”

“We’re getting reports that you’re illegally requiring your agents to do manual labor in dangerous conditions if they want to keep their jobs.”
“I take issue with agents, illegally, and dangerous conditions, but you’ve got the general gist right. I have given any member of the FBI, up to our previous Director, Mr. Comey, who was derelict in his duty the chance to atone by doing physical work to fix the results of that dereliction. If any agent doesn’t want to do that work, she or he’s welcome to leave. So, this is not punishment duty offered only to the rank and file, nor is it corporate punishment. We went through the files of everyone in the Public Corruption Department, and have applied this punishment accordingly, no one who was looking the other way has been exempt. So, not Agents, in the sense of the entire department. Only the ones who weren’t doing their jobs.

“As for illegally… I’m not being subtle or quiet about this. I have yet to have a judge show up and tell me to stop.

“And dangerous…” Tim pauses, looking at the reporter for a moment before saying, “You don’t live in DC, do you?”

“No.”

“Okay. After the fall, the mobs set fire to most of the city.”

“I saw the footage.” Adam winces a bit at that. It’s one thing to see riots burn down somewhere far away and not “real.” It’s another thing when it’s your own capitol.

“Good. A lot of the buildings were old, and the fires made them unsafe. In the almost year between then and now, a lot of buildings have collapsed or been demolished because they were unsafe. DC is scrambling for funds to rebuild, so, if it’s in the rubble, and it can be used, we’re using it.

“Bricks are bricks, if they’re sound, Jarvis can use them. So, this ‘dangerous’ duty, and bear in mind, these are men and women who carry guns and go out and risk getting shot, every single day, is sitting at one end of one of the many empty blocks, and slowly going through the rubble looking for bricks that are still solid.

“The ones that can be reused get sent to construction sites. The ones that can’t get hauled away. There are churches and schools that have children volunteering to do this work. It’s hot. It’s boring. It’s physically annoying, and I’m sure their backs and shoulders ache at the end of the day. But it is not dangerous.

“I’ve worked in DC since 2002, and this city is as much home for me as anywhere can be. It burnt because we failed. The people who are out there, they didn’t do their jobs. So, yes, I am, literally, making them clean up the mess they made.”

Adam seems to approve of that, and Tim’s sure that’s why he’s the one who’s got this scoop with him.

“Your agents say you’re blocking them from access to their Union Reps.”

“I’m letting them talk to the press, but not their Union Reps.” Tim rolls his eyes. “If that’s the case, I’m a piss poor mastermind. They still have their phones and computers, and I am doing literally nothing to see who they’re talking to, or why. If they can’t get a hold of FBIEU, that’s on FBIEU, not me.”

Adam smirks at that. “That’s not entirely true, is it?”

“FBIEU has more than 100 employees. I’ve arrested eight and have a warrant out for number nine. If they can’t figure out how to support their members without those nine people, they have way more employees than they need.”
Adam chuckles dryly at that. “They say the charges you’ve brought against them are trumped up.”

“Of course they do! Have you ever seen anyone go to the press and say, ‘Yep, they’ve got us dead to rights. We’re absolutely guilty of all of this stuff.’ We don’t comment on ongoing investigations, but anyone with a PACER subscription can see what motions we’ve filed in court.”

“Which is why everyone is interested. Those aren’t the usual hardball sorts of charges. Drug smuggling isn’t the sort of thing that goes away if people come to terms.”

Tim smiles, slightly. The corners of his lips lift. “Okay, see… I know a lot of people don’t get this, but, maybe if I say it enough, eventually it’ll filter through. Business as usual ended the day I got here. I don’t bring charges against people to try and manipulate them. I bring charges against them because they’re breaking the law. I’m not doing this hoping that FBIEU will show up and offer me something. They already had a guy try that. Last I heard, he’s going to take the guilty plea for bribery, because I’ve got him on tape literally offering me what I want, if I break the law for him.”

“Uh huh.” Adam is singularly unimpressed by that.

“You don’t buy it.”

Suddenly, Adam, who Tim thought was younger than he is, looks old and jaded. “Let’s put it this way, we’ve heard this song before.”

Tim nods. “Fair enough. Come see me again in a year, and tell me if you think I’m singing the same old song you’ve heard before.”

Adam stands up. “I’ll do that.” At the door he says to Tim, “You think you can really do it?”

Tim shrugs. He doesn’t care if this is on the record or not. “I’ll do as much as I can to shape things, and if I’m Sisyphus rolling the boulder up the hill, then that’s what it is. But there’s no chance of me getting that boulder all the way up if I don’t at least put my shoulder to it.”

Adam nods at him, and heads out.

Agent Todd Clure.

He’s twenty-six, looks young for his age, and as he’s heading into Tim’s office, Tim catches him mumbling, softly, “I shall not fear. Fear is the mind killer. Fear is the little death…”

“Have a seat.”

Clure jerks as Tim says that, and then meekly plods into the chair in front of his desk. He’s in his suit. There are visible sweat stains on the shirt, and dust and construction grime on his trousers. His shoes have seen significantly better days.

He doesn’t look Tim in the eyes, or face even, as Tim paces around him.

“Do you know why you’re here?”

He’s glances up, fast, and then looks away. “Jason… Agent Salamdra, and I… We ignored complaints against five senators and seven judges. Jason made sure any cases involving them got sent to us.”

Tim’s impressed. Most of the people in front of him only have a vague sense of what’s got them there.

“Sounds like you knew what you were doing was wrong.” Tim can’t hear it, but he can feel Todd continuing the ‘fear is the mind-killer’ mantra in his head.

“Yes.”

Tim waits a few beats, watching Clure fidget his fingers, and study his desk. He’s striding around Clure, glaring down at him, radiating disgust and disapproval, but Tim can feel it cracking.

Clure’s young, too young, and he’s plump, and so nervous he’s about to wet his pants. His mantra is right out of Dune, and Tim’s sure that if he went through his go bag, he’d find at least one fantasy novel.

He’s also not saying anything.

“You knew it was wrong, why did you keep doing it?” Tim’s voice is icy, his heart isn’t. A set of big, scared, sincere eyes are looking up at him.

Finally, “He was my partner. He’s been here forever, and I’m new, and… He already thinks I’m a geek, but… I didn’t want to be a useless geek. So… he says it’s important, that it matters, that they’re good guys doing important things, so… We bury those cases.”

“Isn’t that breaking and entering?” Tim’s fairly sure that’s what he asked Tony on literally their first case together. Ten minutes later, he was hacking a man’s computer, no warrant, and the only thread of what he could call probable cause was something he got from said breaking and entering.

What he did was completely illegal.

But he didn’t want his partner to think he was a useless geek, either.

Tim feels the mask come up. He’s got a job to do, and that’s that. He needs to make sure that if Clure is staying he does his job.

So, he leans into it, chewing Clure out about how if he knew it was wrong, he needed to act on it. He lays in on him about how his duty is to the Constitution, not his partner. He flays the kid with duty and honor, and he does it because he doesn’t have enough eyes to make sure everyone under him is doing their job. But they’ve got to do that job. He can’t trust, and he can only barely verify, which means he’s got to somehow make these people fear him and what he’ll do to them more than they love or enjoy any advantage they might get from bending the rules and cutting corners.

When The Admiral would chew people out, it never got to his eyes.

This doesn’t get to Tim’s eyes, either.

When he’s done with Clure, who leaves his office, crying, but still with his job, (Which is something his partner couldn’t say.) Tim flops back onto his sofa.

He can see it. It’s a little boat, designed for river transport. They’re a million miles from home, a hundred from help, and all they’ve got is each other. Fuck up, talk at the wrong time, any lapse in attention, forget to secure something properly, and they can all die. Can’t be awake 24/7. Can’t do everything yourself. Can’t change out your people and get new ones. You’ve got what and who you’ve got, and your life depends on everyone doing everything right, all the time.

Tim has something he calls his narrator voice. Usually it pops up when he’s writing, but every now and again, he hears it in his real life, too. (It often sounds like Ducky.)

And he can hear it right now: "It’s a terrible thing to look the monster straight in the face, and finally understand him."

That’s the moment Tim detaches himself from being the hard ass. This is a job. He’s doing it.

That’s enough.

It does not escape the notice of Jimmy, Breena, and Abby that from that night on, they’ve got a Tim-shaped object that will drift through their home, eat whatever’s put in front of him, answer direct questions, and go through the motions of putting babies to bed.

And that’s it.

If he’s not asleep, he hides in his office. If they’re at Jimmy’s place, he goes and hides in Breena’s office. He doesn’t start conversations. He’s not gaming. He doesn’t appear to be reading or working when he’s in there.

He goes to bed as soon as he possibly can.

They can all see he’s pretty much got “COPING MECHANISM” tattooed onto his forehead, but they aren’t sure how to handle it.

Pull him back to them, or let him drift.

Communication is the heart of a good relationship, so when they get to the third day of Tim drifting, Abby heads into the office and plops herself onto his lap.

From what she can tell, he’s been sitting in the dark, listening to his jazz.

He makes a little ‘mmm’ sound as she gets settled, but doesn’t really respond.

She kisses him, and he doesn’t turn away, but that’s a less than halfhearted return kiss.

“Tim.”

“Mmm.”

“Come on, baby, come back to me.”

He blinks slowly and sighs, his eyes, and attention fully on her for the first time in a few days. “It’s easier if I don’t.”

“Tim?”

“I’ve got to get it done. But if I spend too much time feeling it, I hate it, and I hate what I’m doing, and… It’s still got to get done. Then I come home, and…” He’s stroking her face as he says it, and then he deliberately stops. “Every time I come home, it’s harder to go back. I could just be here. Just… fuck it. I’m done. Stay here with you and the kids, and be done. Embalming can’t be that hard. I know I can take dead bodies. Breena could use some extra hands. Just, done.”

Abby nods. “Okay. We’ll let you drift.”

He nods back. “When I’m done, reel me back in, okay?”

She kisses him again, and this time he kisses back, properly. “That’s a promise, love.”

He nods, and then settles back into his chair, closing his eyes, and pulling in on himself.

Two days later, Tim’s in full-on Director mode.

Once he’s slipped out of himself, once he’s playing it, it’s a lot easier to hold onto. It’s not him, just a character he’s playing, a scene he’s writing.

He’s not sure if that’s a good thing, but it’s making it easier to hold onto whatever level of sane he still has. Though, he’ll admit, for this meeting, there’s a tiny spark of Tim looking forward to it.

He sits at the conference table, across from two other men.

“Gentlemen, I’d like to remind you, before we begin, that I am recording this, and all other conversations we have.” Neither the Union Rep (Tim hasn’t bothered to learn this man’s name, but he does know he’s not an executive member) or his lawyer looks happy about that, but they can’t exactly say anything about it, because it would be recorded. “So, hit me with what you want.”

“You were a member of NCISEU, until 2015, correct?” The Rep says.

“Yes, NCIS Agents have to join NCISEU, unless they are management. I became management in January of 2016.”

“So, you know the benefits an organization like ours provides?”

“I’m familiar.” Though the one time he really needed the help, when he was being grilled by the Metro PD about Benedict, he was on his own. It didn’t occur to him to seek his Rep, and by the time it was done, Gibbs was saying he should have been there and…

Their team always handled stuff like that as a team. In fourteen years, he never asked for the help of NCISEU.

“Then you must know why we’re here,” the Rep says.

“I certainly have my suspicions. How about you lay it out for me?”

So, The Rep does. “We’d like you to reconsider your position on the nine members of the FBIEU you are prosecuting.”

Tim pretends to think for a moment and then says, “No.”
“That’s it?”

Tim looks exasperated. “In the next year, I’ll bring cases against your entire upper management, unless we can’t find Powers, in which case I’ll get all of them but one. And I’ll do that because your people were breaking the law. And they weren’t being subtle about it. It was abundantly clear they decided that as our union they could do whatever they liked, and nothing would happen to them.”

“And that was deeply unfortunate.” The Union Rep says. “None of them will ever work in for us in any capacity again.”

“You’re right; they won’t, because most of them won’t get out of jail until well-past retirement age.”

He sees a flash of anger in the Rep’s eyes. “You’re making it difficult for us to do our job.”

“Your job shouldn’t require breaking the law. If it does, you need to come to me, and we’ll get it sorted out so you can do your job legally.”

The Lawyer, John Olson, Tim did bother to learn his name, jumps in on that. “That’s not what Harold meant. Your steadfast attachment to justice,” this lawyer seems to be a lot better at his job than Ons was, “means that when our members are being treated unfairly, we won’t have the reputation to fight for them properly.”

Tim sips his coffee. “Nothing is stopping any of your people from pleading out, taking the deal, and having this quietly finished.”

Olson raises his hands, palms up, in a ‘what can you do’ gesture. “The world being the way it is, if any of my people take a plea, as soon as one of our members tangles with management, you’ll plaster all over everything that nothing we do is legit because we’re all crooks, and then whip out all of those guilty pleas.”

Tim sips his coffee again. (Made with bottled water, brought from home, and a k-cup that’s been in his possession since he brought it from home. Jimmy’s tests came back negative, but he’s not taking any chances.) “Your people should have thought of that before literally voting crooks into the top positions. Part of not doing the sorts of things I arrested your men for, is that getting caught damages your reputation forever. That’s why you don’t do that stuff.”

That gets silence.

Tim can see that Olson and The Rep have better discipline than the last one, so he continues, “However, you’ll be glad to know that I am working on safeguards against bad management. If you can find some employees who haven’t been implicated in anything, and are intelligent enough to count to twelve with their shoes on, I’ll be happy to allow them access to the safeguards we’re working on. We’ll let them see the plans, give them a chance to comment on them, and take their input into account.”

Tim watches The Rep and Olson confer quietly. Not so quietly he can’t catch some of the details. He notices The Rep say the word strike for example, and Olson shakes his head at that whispering political nightmare.

The Rep’s face gets more and more tense, and then, without a word, he leaves.

Olson settles back in his chair. “As of today, anyone you haven’t fired in the Public Corruption Department can’t be fired. Not as part of your initial sweep. Our people will turn over our books, and the ones you’ve already caught will plea out. No press on any of it. Our people will see your safeguards, and you will pay attention to what they say.”
“Does pay attention mean rubber stamp?”

Olson inclines his head slightly, some steel in his eyes. “How long do you want to spend in court, Director McGee?”

Tim opens his hands wide. “I’m the US Government. I’ve got more resources and time than you do. How long do you want to be in court, Mr. Olson?”

He thinks about that. “Pay attention means that unless it’s completely un-doable, you will do it.”

“I can’t agree to that. I can say, that if you’ve talked to anyone who’s worked for me, they’ll say I’m a good Boss, I’m a fair one, and I’ll make sure our systems reflect that. Three out of four Public Corruption employees are meeting with me this month, and three out of four Managers are, too. We’re cleaning up on all levels.”

“Which is the only reason we haven’t gone on a press offensive.”

Tim smirks. “You mean you’ve got no sympathetic angle on this one, and there doesn’t appear to be one coming up anytime soon, either. Comey stepping down for this blew your ‘us versus them’ narrative out of the water.”

The lawyer blinks. “Shall I start setting court dates?”

Tim shrugs. “It’s no skin off my nose, and you, get, what, paid by the hour? So, it’s all good for you, too. Union elections are up in ’19. How re-electable do you think you’ll be when the upper brass are all in jail, and all of those dues have been used to defend them? Meanwhile, your rank and file, they won’t be working here. I will guarantee that no Federal judge wants to be seen as giving corrupt law enforcement the time of day. Which means, you won’t have a base of people whose jobs you saved to back you in ’19. And when ’19 comes along, it’s entirely likely they’ll opt for a new union, or, with the safeguards I’m putting into play, shed it all together.

“So, I’d focus on making my guys decide that paying those dues to you is worthwhile. If I were you, I’d be selling how we’re working together to make the FBI as clean and focused as possible.”

“If you fire everyone you want, what angle can I use for why paying those dues is a good thing?”

“I’ll give you no Public Corruption people who haven’t already been fired will be fired. They may go on probation or suspension, and I will encourage them, intensely, to resign, but unless I find something flat out illegal, I’ll keep them for their second probie year. You can crow about how you saved a few hundred jobs. You can take credit for the entire fair management program, if you like, but I still build it, the way I want it.”

That gets Olson nodding. “Better. You’re going to expand out from Public Corruption to IA, and from there to the rest of the FBI?”

“Yes.”

“That will take years. You only look at their records after 9/1/17 for firing purposes. If they don’t shape up after seeing the PC purge, you can go after them, but anything before the purge can only be used to determine criminal liability.”

That sounds fair to Tim. “I can work with that. Anyone too stupid to shape up or resign is too stupid to keep working here.”

The Olson nods.
“Your guys will plea.” Tim wants to make sure he’s got that on the books.

“They’ll plea out. You’ll give them white-collar, first-time offender sentences. No one’s in for more than ten years, and they’ll be in light security.”

“I’ll have to run that by Justice, but I think they’ll go for it.”

Tomas nods again.

Tim nods back. “Do we write this down?”

“You’ve got it recorded. What would be the point? I’ll get the paperwork started.”

“Jennifer will make sure it goes where it needs to and gets done properly.”

Olson’s just about out of the door when Tim says, “And if I see anyone else from FBIEU stalking me or my family, all of this goes to ash.”

Olson nods, curtly.

“We’re recording,” Tim reminds him.

“Fine.”

“Does that mean you understand what I said, or you are agreeing to those terms?”

Olson glares at him, unhappy Tim’s caught what he’s doing.

“We agree.”

“Thank you.”

Once Mr. Olson is gone, Tim calls down to Hotch.

“The FBIEU claims they’re going to open up their books. Make sure everything they send over matches what we’ve already gotten with our warrants.”

“And you want me to let you know what I find.”

“Exactly. If they send in cleaned up copies, off you go to arrest a few more people. If it’s good, then we play ball, and this round is done.”

“Sounds good. I’ll let Marsh and Chaffin know that we’ll be getting more records.”

“Thanks. Let me know as soon as you do if this is legit.”

“Will do.”
The storm rages, but Tim’s calm inside.
Ish.

He can wield sarcasm from a little bunker deep in his head, and just have it flow through him.
Sort of.

He can't stay completely untouched by it, but it's like having an umbrella in a bad storm. He's not getting nearly as wet as he would without it.

“Mr. Gordon, that appears to be you leaving Robbie Cook High School. The video shows you coming back in the morning. You appear to be well-rested, and well-fed, so I’m going to have to assume you did not suddenly develop a deep need for extra repentance, and are spending your off hours sorting even more rubble…”

Gordon, who had been on page one of the mock-Seppuku plan goes genuinely white.

“Were you unaware that we’re videotaping the entrances and exits to the high school?” Tim just lets that sit, waiting to see what Gordon will do. This is the fifth version of this he’s done, and so far, since none of his hooky-players have gone back to Robbie Cook, the fact that he knows they’re slipping away hasn’t gotten out.

Eventually, Gordon says, “No.”

“Ah. And would you consider sneaking out in the dead of night like an adolescent creeping out of Mommy and Daddy’s house, hoping not to get spanked in the morning, the kind of behavior befitting an FBI agent?”

Tim can’t fire him. So far the paperwork that FBIEU’s sent over has matched what his team has dug out of their records on their own. He’s perfectly fine with carefully wording what he says so that Gordon thinks he’s been fired, and then hand him the resignation paperwork.

Gordon doesn’t answer, and Tim lets a full three minutes of dead silence pass. He spends all three minutes staring at Gordon, face and eyes hard. In his head, he’s humming one of the songs Abby likes. When it’s done he knows enough time has passed.

“Appears you’ve lost your voice. Let me add this, we have one of the hardest jobs in the world here. We stand up and go up against powerful people who want to remain powerful people. You don’t have the balls to walk up to me and tell me to fuck off, so how can I possibly trust that you’ll do it for anyone else? Under what possible circumstances should I ever willingly put you in a position of respect, authority, and public trust when you can’t even go four days without breaking the rules?”

Gordon stands up, and hands over his badge.

Tim nods.

He doesn’t know how many that’s been today. He doesn’t know how many more he’s got, either.

As long as he keeps drifting, eventually, the day will end, he’ll go home, and sleep, and then…

Eventually, this will all be done.
The Fear of McGee: Recovery

For his last day of chewing out agents, Tim wakes up numb. He doesn’t care that today is the last day. He doesn’t care that he’s only got to see seven guys. He doesn’t care that he’s leaving work early today, or that it’s Friday, or that he’s taking a longish weekend at their house and wrapping himself in his family and not doing or thinking anything work related until Tuesday afternoon.

Because he’s numb, and he just doesn’t care about anything right now, because if he lets himself care, he can’t do the rest of it.

He’s mechanically putting his clothing on, when he notices a package in his suit jacket pocket.

A small rectangle, about as long as his hand, light, wrapped with pretty silver paper, with those pink roses that Breena likes.

The note on it is in Abby’s handwriting. Timothy, Open it after the last one. Follow directions. We love you. It’s signed by all of them.

The Timothy bit makes his brain frizzle a bit. He’s got the sense that once upon a time good things were associated with Abby calling him that. But right now, he still can’t touch it. He’s too numb, and too tired, and too far away from himself, and from them.

When his door shuts, and with it the sound of a sobbing woman shuts off, too, Tim slumps back into his chair.

That was the last one. He’s done.

He spends a long moment, completely fried, staring at the ceiling. Even the effort involved in blinking feels monumental.

Somehow, eventually, he remembers that thing in his pocket, and pulls it out.

For a long moment he stares at it, too. Just too damn exhausted to muster up the energy to open it. But eventually, his fingers get moving, and he rips the paper, and then seeing what’s in his hand, he almost smiles.

It’s his collar. With another note.

Timothy,

Put this on.

After 2:00 there will be an Uber waiting for you outside of the office. Get in it.

It’ll take you home.

Once you get there, go upstairs, undress completely, except for the collar and wrist cuff, and go to sleep.

Good things coming when you awake.
Love you,

Abigail.

He holds the collar in both hands for a moment, and then starts to loosen his tie. Getting that thing off feels like actually breathing for the first time in days. He doesn’t usually wear a tie, but especially for this, he wanted to look unapproachable, professional, older, and the tie helps with all of that.

But it’s not him. It’s something he occasionally plays with, and ripping it off feels good.

The top two buttons come off next. This time it’s not just the feeling of being able to breathe, it is breathing. He’s inhaling deep, letting air fill his lungs until it feels like he can’t take in anymore.

He slips the collar around his neck, soft, supple leather, the gentle weight of it just at the base of his throat, and then the snug embrace of it.

He supposes on a purely tactile level, it feels a lot like one of his ties. But not emotionally. This loop around his neck makes him feel free, the ties, they make him feel bound, and not in a good way.

This is surrender, slipping himself into someone else’s hands. This is being taken care of.

And after weeks of being in charge, of being hard and cruel and angry, letting that all slip away and settle himself into someone else’s control feels marvelous.

Tim stands up, buttoning his shirt collar again. Jennifer doesn’t need to see the black leather looping his throat. Maybe one day he’ll let her that far into his life, but today isn’t that day.

As he heads out, he says to her, “I’m not in until one on Tuesday, and you don’t have to be here until Wednesday if you don’t want to be.”

“Do I need to be on call?”

“I’d be nice, but not mandatory. If you turn your cell off, I’ll make my own damn reservations. The last few weeks were killer, and I know and appreciate what you’ve been doing. So, down time, for both of us. We can’t do this fried, so we won’t.”

She smiles at that, a tired smile, but a smile nonetheless. “See you Wednesday.”

He nods and leaves.

There is an Uber waiting for him.

It’s a pretty nice car, and the driver doesn’t seem bothered that he doesn’t want to chat. In less than half an hour, he’s been deposited at Jimmy’s place, which he wasn’t expecting, because it’s Friday, and supposedly there’s Shabbos tonight, but…

They want him here, here’s where he’s going.

He idly notices that there’s food on the bedside table as he undresses, so apparently if he wanted to eat, he could, but he’s not feeling any desire for food.
Sleep, though…

He crashes into the bed, stretching all the way out, absorbing the feel of soft, cool cotton on his skin, and the secure weight of the collar around his throat, and then the tidal wave of exhaustion washes over him, and he’s gone.

It’s light when Tim wakes up, stomach growling at him.

For a moment, he thinks he’s slept the afternoon away, and then he realizes the light is on the wrong side of the room for sleeping until evening.

A quick glance at the clock hammers that home. 9:43. He slept the whole night, and a good chunk of the morning. Tim looks around, but doesn’t see any sign that anyone else was here over the night.

He’s not sure what’s going on with that, but… If they want him alone for a bit… Or if none of them felt the need to watch him sleep. He can’t really blame them for that.

There’s still food next to the bed, and a note. Jimmy’s handwriting this time.

Tim,

They sent me to check on you, bring you home for supper, but you looked exhausted. Sleep well. Eat. Send us a text when you’re up.

Love,

Jimmy

His stomach growls again. Tim thinks about that as he’s biting into the apple that was sitting next to the bed, he remembers breakfast yesterday, but he’s not certain about lunch, and slept through dinner.

His phone is next to the plate of food, so he grabs it, and fires off a quick, I’m up text to all three of them.

Good morning, Timothy. Comes back from Abby. How are you feeling this morning?

Tim blinks a few times. They’re still playing. He remembers the collar at his throat, and the promise of good things to come.

Hungry. He sends that back so he’s got a prompt answer, and adds, Just woke up, not sure on everything else, yet.

Take a few minutes to really check in. Emotional feelings, how are they?

So he takes the time to assess. He’s still tired. Depending on where this goes, he may go back to sleep. He’s interested in playing, but at a distance. Like he knows he should be interested in playing. He can’t quite touch his interest in this, and given how long it’s been since he’s had sex, that tells him he’s still pretty far gone.

More thinking, trying to get himself enthusiastic about anything else, and he picks the phone back up. Tired, feeling pretty blah. Don’t much care about anything right now.

Okay, you had to numb yourself pretty far down to deal with the last two weeks. We don’t expect you to instantly change gears. Right now, you’ve got processing time. How tired are you?

Wouldn’t mind more sleep.

Eat, text Jimmy when you’re done. He’s got the next bit.

Okay.

Love you, baby.

Love you, too.

There’s the apple next to the bed, as well as a granola bar, but Tim’s looking for more in the way of food than that. He heads downstairs, and stands, naked, in the kitchen. For a long moment he just stands there, looking around, fully aware of the fact that he’s A: hungry, and B: there is food here, but the part of his brain that can put those two things together and then come up with a plan for how to apply B to A to solve the problem takes an agonizingly long time to snap into gear.

Eventually, though, his eyes land on the coffee maker, and he lurches toward it, aware of the fact that a mug of coffee with lots of milk will probably go some way toward making him feel like a real person.

Maybe.

He’s not sure if it’s the coffee, or the familiar routine of making it, but he’s starting to feel a little more attached to the real world once he’s drunk his cup. At least, enough to decide that some eggs would be a good plan, too.

I’ve eaten.

Good. Naptime, next? Comes from Jimmy a moment later.

That’s the plan. Unless you’ve got other plans.

Oh yeah, we’ve got plans. When did you get off last?

Tim’s got to think about that. He hasn’t even been interested in sex the last… “Shit.” It’s got to be getting onto a week now. Maybe longer. He shut everything off. He shifts around a bit, aware of a dull, full sensation round-about his prostate-area. It’s not fever pitched, have to get off. Not like right before Kelly was born. But he can tell it’s been a lot longer than normal. And, he thinks, and tries, and yes, just rocking back and forth on the kitchen chair gets his dick perking up, so at least on a basic biological level, his body is aware that it’s been missing some action.

At least a week.
Okay, we’re playing with you tonight, hard, so you’ve got to be in condition for that. Can’t be a ten second wonder, and if it’s been that long, it’s cruel to spin you out. Put yourself to sleep good. Take your time, do it slowly, go play with some of our toys.

I can do that.

Then go do it. Make a video, send it to Breena. Tonight we’re putting on a show for her, give her a preview.

Tim smiles. He’s feeling genuinely pleased at that idea. Video soon. Any specific requests?

A moment later he’s got an email.

Timothy,

James and I have already been booked for tonight. Special client, hoping for an m/m/f show. I’m up to Domme. He’s playing the butch. You want to be the middleman?

She’s looking for an audition video. Something short, less than five minutes, preferably highlighting your ‘in the middle’ qualities.

You in?

Abigail.

A little spark of genuine eagerness hits Tim. Yeah, he’s in for this.

Showing off his ‘in the middle’ qualities, huh…

He heads up to Jimmy and Breena’s bedroom to see what sort of goodies they may have for something like that.

They don’t have a toybox, per se. They have the bottom drawer of Jimmy’s dresser. If you open it up, there are two nicely folded sweaters on top, and once you take them out, there are the toys.

And they do have some nice toys, but, as Tim’s looking through them, they’re mostly for playing with someone else or for a girl on her own. He’s not sure if, back when he was on his own, Jimmy was a mostly porn, spit, and his right hand kind of guy, or if whatever toys he had for playing with himself didn’t survive his honeymoon, but with the exception of some cockrings, nothing in there is really for a guy on his own.

There’s a basic dildo (Tim eyes it for a minute, thinking about his ‘in the middle qualities’ and decides with how his prostate is feeling right now, any level of direct play will end him too soon for an interesting video), one of those large wand-style vibrators, (it occurs to him he’s never seen Jimmy or Breena use it, and that might be fun one of these days) ropes (always fun, he tosses them to the bed, thinking he might figure something out for them), a few different lubes (the one they use for regular sex lives in the nightstand, these are flavored ones), a small, bullet-type rabbit vibrator (totally useless for him), and this weird little circular thing with a bunch of flaps on it that’s supposed to mimic oral sex, but both Jimmy and Breena thought it was stupid after buying it. They’ve used it twice, once with each other, and they turned it on once to show Tim and Abby what it did, and they also came to the conclusion that it looked kind of stupid, too.
But he didn’t try it, and he’s all on his own, and… maybe he’ll get some bonus points for figuring out something this is good for.

Or not. He turns it back on again, and it makes a hmmmming sound along with the occasional squeak. But… Put enough lube on it, and him, and…

His dick is just starting to show a touch of interest, and Tim decides it’s time to get a bit of clean up in before he does anything in front of a camera.

Okay, phone on, but not yet recording, lube nearby… Trying to look like he’s the kind of guy who wants to be in the middle. He tries to imagine it, as he’s gently stroking himself. It’s a club of some sort, exclusive sort of place, where patrons can arrange for whatever sort of show they want.

This lady wants to see two boys get handled by a Domme.

And he could be one of the boys.

If she likes what she sees on this video.

He’s starting to get hard, but not quite there, so he fits the cockring around his cock and balls. This is Jimmy’s good one. Most decorative one. It’s a strap of soft black leather. There’s a slit on one side, and his balls go through that, keeping them down, and a bit further from his dick than a normal ring would, then the rest of the ring slips around his dick and snaps tight.

It’s snug on Tim, and it’ll just get snuger, which is a good feeling. And he has to admit, he does like the way it looks, and the way he looks wearing it. He smiles a little, remembering that conversation, more than a year ago now, where they were talking about cockrings as jewelry for men, and as he gives himself another stroke, he’s thinking this might be more like a push up bra than a necklace.

Though, if memory serves, the girls never have anything good to say about how pushup bras feel, and this feels good. That heavy, full, sporting a baseball bat sensation is creeping up on him as he thinks more about his show tonight.

He gives himself another long pull, enjoying it.

What else goes into being the guy in the middle? He’s got his collar and cuff on, tattoos visible because besides three pieces of leather, he’s naked.

His eyes land on Breena’s dressing table. He thinks about it for a moment, and starts to feel more of a flush sliding through him… He could be pretty. He could be so pretty.

Abby loves it when he’s pretty. She tells him sweet things and makes him feel so good, and it’s been so long since he’s done anything like that.

So long since he just relaxed back into soft words and kind petting and…

He steps over to the dressing table, and runs headfirst into the fact that he’s still got the goatee on.

And that’s not pretty. The Director is still looking back at him.

He stares at himself for a moment, and shudders.

Tim takes off the cockring, his cuff, and collar, almost mechanically, and marches into the bathroom.
Jimmy’s got his extra razors there, and they’ve got the little trimmer they use for real playing in there, too.

It takes him fifteen minutes, but he trims everything off. He was thinking just his face at first, but by the time he got into it, he knew how he wanted to be pretty, and next thing he knew he was wrapping up with the hair that grows on the top of his feet. A few more minutes later, he’s in the shower, warm water making his skin pink up, the feel of a razor blade and smooth, silky shaving cream on his skin is making him hard.

It’s Breena’s special shaving gel, the stuff that makes hair grow in slower and softer. He doesn’t care if it is rose scented. He’s got some amazing memories of that scent. And the blade on his skin brings back more memories. Of getting more naked than he’d ever been, for Abby. Of their honeymoon in the cabin in the woods. And he’s doing it again, shedding everything from the skin out. Each pull of that blade across his arms, and chest, legs, and pubes, feels like another layer of The Director coming off.

Because The Director is not pretty. The Director does not get dressed up and put on makeup or shave every inch of his body below his eyebrows, so that his wives and husband can enjoy rubbing up against his silk smooth skin.

The Director does none of those things, but Tim does.

Tim’s allowed to be soft, and smooth, and he’s allowed to be pretty, and soft, and gentle. He’s allowed to let himself feel.

The Director is hard and sharp. There’s nothing kind or gentle about him. He’s a bad taste in Tim’s mouth and a memory he wants to shed.

Tonight he’s Tim…othy. Timothy. That’s the version they’re playing with. He’s allowed to be soft, and pretty, and flirty. He’s allowed to enjoy sensual things, and let himself enjoy the people around him. He’s allowed to let them enjoy him.

When he’s done his shower, he’s silky from head to toe. He takes the time to dry off carefully, and then he puts his leather, all of it, back on.

He does his eyes, and no, it doesn’t look as good as when Abby or Breena does it, but it’s good enough. He hunts around for a few minutes, but Breena doesn’t have any of the fun-colored lipsticks, and he’s certainly in the mood to go for black or blue lips, not pinks or reds, which are the colors Breena has.

His eyes land on the collection of little tubes in front of him in her drawer. No, not pink. But soft, soft and shiny, and pretty.

She’s got lip balm. It smells nice, tastes like vanilla, and makes him look that much softer. She’s got a perfume that’s mostly vanilla, too. He hunts around for that. He’s never worn it straight, but he’s certainly smelled it on his skin before, rubbed off of Breena’s.

There are some good memories with this scent. He rubs it into his wrists and throat, inhaling deep. Soft, and sweet, vanilla, amber, a bit of musk and oakmoss to keep it from being too foody. His eyes slip shut, and he sighs with pleasure.

Fourteen straight days of burnt out FBI employees, in dirty clothing, without enough showers. Anger, fear, hard physical work, all of it makes a person reek.

Soft, fragrant skin, Breena in his lap, kissing him as he held her, Abby and Jimmy on the far side of the bed, rocking against each other. Breena’s hair against his cheek and shoulder, Abby’s soft little gasps.

Good memories.

He stands up and heads back to the bed. He’s got the lube, that wheel… Sqweel, it’s called a Sqweel, and the ropes.

He knows there are guys who can tie themselves up, but that’s not really a game he plays on his own. But… he licks his lips. He wants to be chosen to play with the Domme.

He’s already wearing his collar, and he takes one of the ropes and loops it around the collar, like his very own leash, then he takes it a bit further, wrapping it around his chest and belly, looping it around his thigh, and tying it there.

He twists a bit, feeling it tight and snug on him.

That gets a long sigh. It feels good, secure. Cherished, even if at a distance, right now.

Tim sits on the bed, lying back, stroking himself. It doesn’t take long for him to get hard, and once he does, he knows this is not going to be a long video. Once his libido really wakes up, it’s suddenly very aware of how long it’s been since he last got off.

Tim turns on the recorder and says to it. “Hi. I’m Timothy. Abby sent me a note letting me know you’re looking for a third for tonight’s show.” He smiles into the camera. “I hope it’s me. I’ve played with Abby and Jimmy before, and it’s always a blast. They didn’t say exactly what you wanted to see, other than something to indicate I’m kind of flexible. I hope this does the trick.” He winks at the camera. “Enjoy the show.”

Then he sets his phone on the bed, so it’s propped against a bundled up blanket, and pointing at him.
He figures that as long as he stays more or less where he is, splay-legged at the head of the bed, Breena should get to see him do anything she might want to see.

Tim grabs the lube, and drizzles a good handful of it into his palm. Then he licks his lips and closes his eyes. He pulls images of the last time he was ‘in the middle’ into his head, and gives himself a long stroke.

The soft groan that eases from between his lips is utterly unfeigned. It’s been so damn long since he’s had a hand on himself, even if it is his hand, it feels amazing. Add in the ring and the rope, the snug binding across his body, and he’s feeling great.

He smooths the lube all over his balls, too, getting all of himself slicked up, and then grabs the Sqweel.

He flicks it on, and the little tongue looking flaps being to spin around. In his hand, it’s just a bit of a vibration, but on the tip of his dick…

It’s definitely not someone lapping at him. It’s way too… plastic, for that. But, having something soft and vaguely fleshy lightly tapping on the underside of the tip of his dick… It’s… not going to get him off, but it feels interesting. Maybe not erotic, but interesting.

And, sliding it, gently, up and down his shaft, as he’s rubbing his balls, that’s pretty good.

Slipping it down further, letting those little tongue looking bits gently thwap at his balls. Better. A bit more lube, and it’s all slick and with his eyes closed, imagining himself on his knees, with Jimmy behind him, fucking him hard and steady while Abby’s under him, licking his balls over and over…

“Fuck!” eases out of him. He tightens his grip a little, fucking through his hand, thighs tensing at the sensation.

His hips clench, thrusting him through his fist, and he knows how to make this better. Tim’s up on his knees, feet under him. It takes a moment, but he gets the Sqweel between his feet, holding it so it’s right behind his balls, tapping, gently against his perineum.

Any other time, this wouldn’t do much for him, but it’s been more than a week, and he’s feeling so full. So ready to get off, and each little tap almost jolts through his prostate. He wiggles his hips a bit, grinding down, but that just slows the Sqweel down, so he’s got to stay up, keep it light.

Thwap, thwap, thwap… It’s a terribly designed toy. Way too loud, and the sound couldn’t be less erotic if it tried, but right now it’s doing him just fine.

He’s trying to imagine it, just the point of Abby’s tongue, she’s lightly lapping at him, and Breena’s got him, too. She’s on her knees, sucking his cock. He ripples his hand on his dick, trying to mimic some of the things she’d be doing to him.

His hips rock, running his dick through his hand, and this isn’t going to take much more.

His head falls back, hips flexing, hand getting tighter. In his head, Abby’s spreading him wide, licking him from top to bottom, worming her tongue into him, and Breena’s in front of him, pulling him in deep, sucking hard.

They match each other, Abby tongue fucking him as Breena sucks, and they’re going fast, so fast, faster than people can really go, but his hand is fast, and it’s been so damn long, and even with the cockring keeping his balls down, he can feel everything getting tighter, feel his world narrowing down, and his hand moving faster, tighter, slicker, his body adding its own lube to keep his hand flowing, and…

His jaw goes tight, the rest of his body clenching as the tingles start, and then he pulls a hair tighter, and twitches all over, spurting high and far.

He shouts with it. One short, “Uhn!” as his cum stripes the bed and dribbles over his hand.

He flops back a second later, and all he wants to do is sleep. It feels like a monumental task to get himself wiped off, the recorder off, video sent, and cockring off.

He doesn’t even bother to take the rope off before crashing back into another sleep.

When he wakes up, there’s a text from Breena. You’re hired.

There’s another one from Jimmy. Don’t forget to change the sheets. Tim smirks at that one, and gets to it.

A few minutes later, feeding himself again, Tim fires back another text. Awake, room’s clean, anything else?

He gets one back from Abby. Good. We’ll be home around seven. Pick up dinner for us. Between now and then, process, write, take the time you need in your own head.
Thanks.

So he does.

He’s been nudging something for a while. Getting closer and closer but not quite touching it as he writes around whatever idea it is.

Free writing, especially the way he’s doing it right now, longhand, pen on paper, isn’t like storytelling. Sometimes it’ll look like poetry, or snippets of story, or… what’s in front of him: word salad.

His paper looks like someone dropped a thesaurus, all the words fell out, and some of them landed on his page.

The last time he was this congested with ideas that weren’t properly forming, he was sitting down at his typewriter again for the first time after his psycho fan tried to kill Abby, with the words from his editor “You’ve already gotten one extension; there won’t be another one,” ringing in his ears.

Re-reading the word salad isn’t helping, either. It’s not providing him with any real clarity of thought. Mostly, it’s a pile of sounds, on a page, whirling around in a not terribly useful manner.

He shakes his head, takes off his glasses, rubs his eyes and temples, and gets up.

Whatever it is doesn’t want to come out, yet. So, he might as well go put some clothing on and get dinner.

“Home is where your comfy clothing is,” Tim says as he pulls on his black kilt.

He doesn’t have a full wardrobe here. He can’t, there isn’t room for it, but at any time, he’s got work shoes, a pair of good jeans, a decent jacket, a nice button down, and a selection of bumming-around-the-house-wear.

Including, apparently, his black kilt. (Likely because the last time he was wearing it, he was here.)

He grabs for one of Jimmy’s t-shirts. (Another space saving device, he can wear a decent amount of Jimmy’s clothing, and vice versa. There are some stylistic differences, but all gray men’s large t-shirts are more or less identical, and there’s no one on earth, not even Abby or Breena, who pays close enough attention to their wardrobes to be able to tell if the t-shirt Tim’s got on was originally his or Jimmy’s. Tim certainly doesn’t know. It was in Jimmy’s dresser, so it’s his. If it goes to the McGee house, gets washed there, and ends up in his dresser, it’ll become his t-shirt.) And then tosses a jacket on top of that. Mid-September, summer’s trying to hold on, but it’s starting to get a bit cool.

Tim grabs a pair of socks (also Jimmy’s) and heads down to put on his boots. As he’s sitting on the bottom step, lacing up his boots, he can see his bare knees and hairless legs, and some of what the word salad was trying to tell him starts to click into place.

He stretches his legs out of in front of him. Naked smooth skin, under a “skirt.”

“Shit.”
He’d been fairly comfortable with his The Director isn’t pretty stuff. He kind of liked that as a line between Tim and his image of The Director. But, looking at himself, an image from a half-remembered tell-all TV drama surfaces to his mind. It’s J. Edgar, in a pink dress.

He sighs. The literal Director of the FBI, the guy who’s name is on the damn building, used to go about twenty-five steps past where Tim’s comfortable on the “pretty” front.

Obviously, this isn’t anything that sets him apart from the pack.

Any dinner requests? Tim sends off as he’s sitting in Breena’s car, engine on, waiting. He’s edging toward hungry again, but not with it enough to have a specific food preference.

“Coming back” is putting him in mind of how a limb that falls asleep wakes up. Numb and tingly, and if you hold it in one place you can sort of ignore it, but if you move, you get a wash of tingles and…

Right now, things are fairly quiet. He’s just waiting for instructions.

But maybe in a minute he’ll move and a rush of… everything… will come back over him.

His phone buzzes a moment later. Jimmy’s number. Breena’s craving sushi. We’re thinking living room picnic.

I can do that.

Tim gets it ready. He fetches sushi rolls, gets some decent sake and puts it on ice, he lays out a soft cotton sheet on the floor, and packs some pillows around them. He cranks the AC and lays a fire, then hunts down all the candles he can find, putting them around the living room and the bedroom.

Once the scene is set for a romantic night, he scans the road. He doesn’t see any cars he doesn’t recognize, but that doesn’t mean no one is watching.

He’s not feeling it, either. But that also doesn’t mean no one is watching.

He goes down to Jimmy’s basement and turns off the power. Then he takes one of his own goodies, which has been sitting in his go-bag for about a week, and goes through the house. It’ll pick up anything that’s using a current.

Nothing glows that shouldn’t.

There’s still an hour until the rest of his family will be here. He turns the power back on, and sets up his computer and Breena’s (the only two in the house) for a full scan. If there are any gremlins lurking in there, he’ll find them.

Tim hops up from his computer the moment he hears a car pulling into the driveway, and just about has a stroke as he gets to the door and opens it, coming face to face with Ed.

“Tim?”

“Ed!” He scrambles for a second. “Get out of here! Abby’s got the kids. Jimmy’s been making sure Breena gets a day off, just her, no kids, no babies, no work, and then some adult fun tonight before
Donnie makes his entrance. He’s off getting that fruit juice she likes, and then he’s picking her up.
They’ll be here in like five minutes.”

“Then why are you here?”

“I’m on my way out, too. Just got to get Molly’s best stuffie. She got to our place, noticed she didn’t have it and melted down. Go! Quick!” Tim waves Ed toward the driveway.

“But…”

“Whatever it is, it can wait until tomorrow! Breena’s getting a carefree, romantic night while she can still enjoy one, and neither you, nor Molly’s need for a tiny, stuffed Corgi is going to derail that.”

Ed nods. “It’ll wait. You need help finding it?”

“Nah. I’ll have it in a minute.”

Tim starts to breathe again a moment later when Ed pulls out. Then he texts the other three. Ed just showed up. Told him Jimmy had set up a day off for Breena, and that we had the kids tonight. He says whatever it is will wait until the morning.

A minute later he gets back from Breena. I bet I know what it is. Our usual surgical thread distributor has a new product. He’s not sure how hot it is, and offered us and a few other mortuaries some to test it out. We’ve been working with it at all the Slater’s branches, and I’ve got the notes from my uncles about how it did for them. He was probably hoping to read them tonight.

Tim sighs at that. Okay. Anyway, you got a stress-free day out today and a romantic night tonight, if he asks.

He gets a saucy emoticon back. Well, I’ve certainly got the romantic night tonight. Best show on earth starts soon, and I can’t wait to see it.

Tim sends her a little kiss emoji back. Love you, too.

Three minutes later, Tim hops up again, once more hearing the sound of a car on the driveway, and this time he hears three doors open and shut.

When they get in, Tim gets hugs and kisses, and happily gives both back, too.

Abby strokes his throat, and gives him a look, so he goes up to get his collar. She doesn’t say anything, and he knows he’s not in trouble or anything like that. He probably should have kept it on, but she didn’t tell him to.

He does sigh happily as she loops it around his throat and gently fastens it.

Then she pets her fingers through his hair, as Breena heads into the living room, looking properly appreciative of Tim’s dinner picnic.
“Looks good.” She appears to like the array of plates with yummy fish and rice, along with different sauces and drinks. She might not be able to eat much right now, but each little bite of food packs as much punch as it can.

Tim smiles at her, as Jimmy helps her down onto the floor. The extra pillows get scooted around so she can recline comfortably. “That’s good.”

The rest of them join her, and Abby’s about to click on her device killer when Tim says, “I scanned the house this afternoon. No bugs here, and if you turn that on, it’ll kill the neighbor’s electronics, too.” They can use that at his house without the neighbors to the right and left losing their power, too. Jimmy and Breena’s house is too close to the houses next to it, to do that.

The drapes are pulled, the doors are locked, there’s no line of sight, and the fire in the room is making sure they’re in an area with a nice warm glow around them. It’s not perfect, but it’s good enough.

And, because the power isn’t off, they can listen to music.

Once everyone is settled and eating, Tim can feel the quiet around them. He sees six pairs of eyes watching.

They don’t need to say it, he knows.

So, Tim starts to talk. He doesn’t spend too much time on specifics. No details like, “And then I told him our job is all about trust and no one could ever trust him again…” more general themes and…”

“There’s something there, nagging at me,” he says, curled on his side, head in Abby’s lap, Breena’s feet in his hands, rubbing away. She’s leaning against Jimmy, who’s got his chin on her shoulder. “Just… If you’re doing your job right… You shouldn’t have to do… this… to do it.” He shakes his head. “But I don’t know what else to do.”

He stares at the ceiling for a moment. “I want to be a good Boss, and I’m fairly sure these last two weeks weren’t that.”

“Can you be a good Boss with lousy employees?” Jimmy asks.

Tim winces a bit at that. “I’m trying to not think too hard about that, too.”

That gets three sets of eyes trained on him. Tim shakes his head. He knows he’s not ready to get too deep into that. “I got rid of the worst of the bunch. Less than half of the ones on punishment duty are left.”

Abby pets his face. “Time to rebuild.”

“Yeah. Just… Do I have cracked bricks that’ll collapse if I try to build with them, or just grungy ones that look cruddy, but’ll do the job?”

No one’s got an answer for that.

Abby glances around, sees that dinner is pretty much eaten, and decides it’s time to move on.

“Okay, upstairs for you two, go, get cleaned up and ready for a good time. Breena and I’ll be up in half an hour.”

Tim likes that idea. He’d much rather be thinking about subbing than bossing. “What sort of cleaned up and ready do you want?”

“James knows.” Abby points to the stairs.

So, Tim hops up, and Jimmy untangles himself from Breena a bit more slowly, and up they go.

Jimmy doesn’t have a whole lot of “prep” to do for tonight. He knows where he goes in the equation, and as soon as he’s naked and brushed his teeth, he’s good to go.

He does nod at their bathroom. “Get really cleaned up.”

Tim’s eyes spark at that. “Good!”

So, while Tim gets cleaned up, Jimmy drags a comfy armchair over to a good viewing spot for Breena. She’ll happily watch tonight, but playing is only slightly above a root canal in terms of things she wants to do. Or as she put it when they were planning this out, “I’ve already got one little man inside me making me miserable, I don’t need to add two big ones!”

He knows Abby’s getting the rest of the goodies for tonight ready downstairs.

Once they’re set… She’s “running the show,” though given how the three of them already went through everything before, and planned it together, she’s more the ringleader than the Domme.

It doesn’t matter much to Jimmy how precisely it works, as long as it pulls that lost, half-dead look out of Tim’s eyes.

---

Tim’s out of the bathroom a few minutes later. “Any directions beyond clean? Cologne? Eyeliner?”

Jimmy shrugs. He doesn’t have specifics for this. “Whatever you’re in the mood for. All I’m supposed to do is make sure the room is set, and you’re naked and cleaned up when they get up here.”

“And that’ll be?” Tim’s eyeing Breena’s vanity. If he’s got enough time…

“Now, Timothy, that’s now,” Abby says, stepping in with Breena.

Tim drops to his knees in front of Abby, head bowed. Part of it is the game, but part of it isn’t, and Abby senses that. She kneels in front of Tim, too, gently taking his face in her hands, gazing into his eyes. “You really need this, don’t you?”

“Yes.” His voice is soft, but sure.

She strokes his face and hair and then kisses him, and Tim purrs.

Abby stands up, still petting him. She nods to Jimmy, eyeing the collar and wrist cuff Tim took off for getting cleaned up, and left on Breena’s dressing table. Jimmy helps Breena get comfy, and then grabs the collar and cuff for Abby.

He’s not entirely sure if this is part of setting the scene. She’s in charge, and can ask him to do things, like grab two bits of leather that’re six feet from her hand, or if she thinks keeping a hand on Tim at all times is important. She would have to let go of him to get the leather.

Jimmy hands it over, and Abby smiles at him. With that smile, he knows, she just doesn’t want to let go of Tim. Her skin on his is grounding him, and she’s not about to let go.

Abby takes Tim’s left hand in hers, lifting it, kissing his palm, and then fastens his wrist cuff around his wrist. She lowers his hand and loops the collar around Tim’s neck. Tim bows his head, resting it against her hip, eyes closed, feeling awash in warm, devoted safety. A sigh slips out of him, and some of the tension that’s been keeping his shoulders up near his ears and the worried look on his face starts to bleed off.

Abby and Breena are talking, but he’s not really paying attention. When he needs to do something, she’ll let him know.

Jimmy’s standing behind him. He can feel his fingers on his shoulders.

And that’s where the line becomes crystal clear. This is what The Director can never do. It’s not about gay or straight or bi. Masculine or femme or pretty… none of that touches it. The Director can be any of those things, as long as he’s the one calling all the shots. He can top or bottom or cross-dress or be pretty or anything, as long as it’s on his terms.

This. Right here. Kneeling at his loves feet, completely in their hands, about to do or have done anything they desire, this is what The Director can’t touch.

Utter, implicit, trust. They’ll take care of him. They’ll do whatever they like with him, have him do whatever they want, and he’s safe, cherished, adored.

The Director rules, he doesn’t serve. Or maybe he does, but he doesn’t enjoy it. He became The Director because he didn’t want to take orders, he wants to give them.

Tonight, Tim doesn’t care if he never gives another order again in his life.

Tonight, Tim wants to serve.

“Timothy, what’s your safeword?” Abby asks.

Tim’s not sure what to do with that. He gets why she’s asking, especially with the “characters” they’re playing tonight already being their usual safewords, making sure the rules get laid out ahead of time makes sense. He wants to answer, do what his lady wants, but… “Abigail.” He looks up at her. “Not tonight, baby. Whatever it is, I’m good. I… don’t want one, not tonight.”

She smiles at that, getting what he’s asking and why, and then strokes his face. “Okay, but you say stop, and we stop.”

He nods back, utterly certain the word stop won’t be coming anywhere near his lips tonight.

“Timothy, lay down, on your stomach.” Abby nods to the bed.

Tim crawls into the center of the bed, doing his best seductive cat stalking crawl. Breena’s kind and doesn’t laugh. He’s just not very cat-like, especially right now when he’s tense and stiff from days of being tired and angry.

He does, however, do a good job of laying down, and sighing happily once he’s on his tummy. And that sigh turns into a full groan when he hears the next bit, “Given what we’re going to do with you tonight, we’re going to want you all nice and bendy. James, I think he’s going to need some help getting the kinks out, can you help him?”

“Oh yes!”

Tim groans at the feel of two warm, big, hands, one on each hip, as Jimmy leans into his palms, and slowly pushes his way up to the tops of his shoulders. Yes, from an erotic perspective, naked girl on his back, working the kinks out feels better than anything else. From a stiff, angry, pissed-off posture for two solid weeks, having someone his own size lean pretty much his entire body weight into him, and then stroke all the way up his body feels amazing.

Right now, as Jimmy’s still slowly easing up his back, Tim’s got bits and bobs popping he didn’t know could pop, but Good God Almighty did he need them popped.

He groans so loud that Jimmy whispers in his ear, “You just came on the bed, didn’t you?”

Tim grins, and quietly says back. “Yep, do that again, and I’ll do it again, too.”

“Not quite, yet.” Jimmy settles himself up by Tim’s head, and starts digging those, long, strong fingers of his into Tim’s shoulders, and Tim melts into a groaning puddle of goo.

He didn’t think he could feel better. That was it. Laying there face down, Jimmy rubbing his shoulders, hurting him so good as each tight, knotted muscle slowly gave up and relaxed, was absolute heaven.

And then Abby straddled his hips, and reminded Tim that there are levels of pleasure.

She’s got one butt cheek between her hands, and again, normally this would be some of his favorite playtime, but he’s been so tense the last week that even his butt is stressed out, and so none of this is hitting any erotic buttons, yet. Right now this is the sublime pleasure of being worked over by people who love you and want you to feel really, really excellent.

Right now, all he’s got to do is lay there and relax, so he does, basking in the joy of this.

And like with shaving, he can feel layers of The Director peeling off of him, sliding away with each stroke of a warm hand over his skin.

Tim tried wax play, once.

And having been young and kind of stupid, he assumed, as a not very hairy guy, that all the prep they needed was a candle and something that would make fire.

Yeah. No. That didn’t work. Not only did his girlfriend grossly underestimate how far away from his skin the candle needed to be, she also decided the center of his chest was the best place to start this, which is one of the few places he’s actually got some hair.

The only thing less erotic than scalding yourself, is then having to yank your chest hair off in an attempt to get the wax off your scalded skin.

So, Abby knows that candle play is a no go for Tim.
She also knows this man inside and out, and that he loves anticipation games. And, on top of that, she wants to take him completely out of his head tonight, so being in his body, straining, quivering, begging for the next hit of sensation strikes her as an especially good way to get into play.

So, they do not have a candle. They do have three bottles of oil. One is room temperature. One is warm (about ninety-five degrees) and one is hot (104, she wants absolutely no shot of scalding him.)

And while Abby’s stroking over Tim, rubbing him slowly, gently, teasing him by getting closer and closer to dick, nipples, and lips, Jimmy’s getting the bottles of oil.

---

Tim’s vaguely aware of Jimmy moving away from him.

Vaguely.

There was the lovely sensation of warmth, and the amazing feeling of big, strong hands working on Tim’s neck, cradling his head, and gently pulling, stretching him, probably back to his full height, and then that went away, the bed dipped a bit, he could feel Jimmy moving around, and then there’s just Abby. (It doesn’t occur to Tim that he can open his eyes.)

And just Abby is awfully good. She’s got him flipped over now, onto his back, and is straddling his left thigh as she’s rubbing a gentle, deep circle on his belly. (Speaking of things he didn’t think could feel this good, but, apparently, in the right mood, Tim loves tummy rubs. He fully understands why Mona will flop on her back and beg for tummy rubs. If they feel even half as good to her as this does to him, he gets it.)

His eyes are closed, and he’s floating along with it, humming a bit as she places one hand on each hip bone, her thumb tips just touching each other, right above his dick, and then running her hands up his belly over his sternum, and across his chest, down his sides, and back to his hips again.

Then there’s a hand on his wrist. Jimmy’s, he knows that by feel, now. And Abby says, “Make sure he’s secure, James.”

That perks Tim’s ears up. Secure sounds very good to him. The feel of Jimmy pulling his arm over to the headboard of the bed, and then tying it into place feels even better.

Tim knows what’s happening now. Abby shifts to between his legs, and keeps working him, rubbing more into his chest now, fingers light and soft, teasing over his skin, as Jimmy ties his right hand, and then his right foot, and left foot.

Tim tests the ties, but he’s good and secure. He’s not going anywhere anytime soon. Which is exactly the way he wants it.

He doesn’t expect what comes next. His eyes have been closed through most of the massage, and he hadn’t gotten around to opening them when Jimmy was tying him down, so he didn’t see the next bit until it was right at his face.

The blindfold.

The masquerade mask he made for Abby with the blacked out eyes. He knows that’s got to be what they’re using. One moment he’s seeing the dull red-brown of the inside of his eyelids in a lit room, and the next there’s just black.

Tim’s tied spread eagle on the bed, and he feels the warmth of Abby’s body, so he knows she’s between his legs, but he can’t tell what’s going to come next.

He’s not tense. He’s not sure he can get tense right now. He’s in way too good of a mood and way too relaxed for it, but he is eager. He wants to know what’s coming for him next.

There’s nothing. Neither of them are making any noise. Breena’s not saying anything. The music turned off… Tim doesn’t know when it turned off, but it’s not on now. All he’s aware of is his own body, his need to know what happens next, and the warmth of Abby between his legs.

Then there’s a burst of sensation, cool, wet. A soft strike along his upper thigh, and a long, slow trickle down the outside of his thigh.

Hot. He wriggles in pleasure. A drop of hot, and again, wet, this time on his sternum.

This one must be skin temperature. He just feels the wet and the weight as another drop hits him, just below his nipple.

He doesn’t know what they’re dripping on him. It can’t be wax. Wax isn’t liquid at room temperature, which the cool one… he jerks, another cool drop hitting him on the inside of the elbow, the cool one can’t be wax. It doesn’t smell like anything. No one’s licking him, so it’s not chocolate or something like that… but… “Oh!” eases out of him as this time a stream of drops, fast, one after another stripe his belly.

Then Abby’s moving. He knows her hands, so Jimmy must be the one dropping whatever it is on him. She’s rubbing all over him, smoothing the… It’s oil or lube, has to be, based on the glide, all over his skin.

Then her hands vanish again, leaving him alone in the dark, anticipating, waiting, starting to tense up, looking for the next… There. Hot again. This one right below the head of his dick. He’s not hard. Not yet. But if they keep this up that won’t be true for long.

Abby smooths the oil or lube or whatever it is along the length of his dick and then more drops. The cool ones this time, one after another after another, a quick line from his balls up his dick.

Tim’s biting his lip, trying to wriggle into more sensation.

Abby gives him some of it, stroking him again, and Jimmy hits him with the cool oil, this time on each nipple. One drop each.

Finger… Jimmy’s he thinks. But only because he’s fairly sure both of Abby’s hands are on his dick. One drop of oil, and then one finger drawing that drop out, circling each nipple with it.

Maybe not. More drops… This time along his hip and belly. But there’s still a finger on his nipple… Maybe Breena’s playing, too.

Toes! His feet jerk. The room temperature oil’s been dripped between his big toe and first toe, and now it’s meandering down the inside of his foot. Another finger, just one, sliding through the path of the oil.

Abby’s let go of his dick, and he whines at that. He wants her hand back there, and…
More drops, hot and cool at once, right on the line where his pelvis and leg meet, and again, the oil seeps along his skin, slipping down…

Hand… Warm, softer, small, Abby’s probably. Could be Breena. Holding his balls up, stroking oil slick hand against oil slick skin, a bit of jostling and moving… Cockring. “Fuck!” That’s feeling good. He’s not as hard as he can get, not yet, but this’ll help. It also helps pull the skin on balls taut, and like that, the next few drops of oil feel exquisite, that much more intense, each one, warm and slow, dripping down, and trickling over his balls.

Hand again, spreading the oil all over him. Below his balls, between his ass cheeks. In this position they can’t drip on him, not there. But he’s all slicked up, and the fingers, he’s fairly sure they’ve got to be Abby’s, too small for Jimmy, and he’s not feeling fingernails, so not likely to be Breena, fingers are rubbing him, pressing his perineum, and…

Glass. He knows what that is. It’s cool, and slick, and it takes Abby a moment to get it set, but again Tim wriggles, groaning. That’s the first of the dilators, the smallest one of the bunch, and he’s very pleased to see her getting it set. He shifts a bit, rocking, feeling it in him, and her hands on him, reveling in that.

For a second.

Then there are more drops, this time down his throat, each one the skin temperature oil. He more feels the hit than the liquid. And more, down his chest, down his belly. As each drop gets closer to his dick more time passes between each drop.

His hands are starting to clench, because the last drop got him just below the belly button, and he knows where the next one should hit, right at the tip of his dick, but time is slowing down, stretching out, and there’s just dark and anticipation and… “Please!”

The drop of oil, this time warm, explodes wet and rich on his dick and Tim thrusts into it.

“Is it good, baby?” Abby’s voice.

“YES!” Tim growls.

He’s rewarded with not just a drop, but a stripe of warm oil, drizzled along his dick. “OH, FUCK!”

“What would make it better, Timothy?” Jimmy asks.

Tim swallows hard. He’s blank. No ideas. And… he doesn’t want ideas. He doesn’t want to decide or be in charge or any of it. “Just… whatever you want! Anything!”

Jimmy and Breena watch Abby grin when Tim says that. “Oh, baby, we’re gonna fuck you so good!”

“Please!”

She’s scooted up the bed a bit, and runs her fingers through Tim’s hair, then kisses him, sucking his lower lip. He lifts his head, as much as he can in this position, kissing into her.

Jimmy’s kneeling on the bed, next to them, enjoying watching them kissing, but also watching Breena, making sure she’s having a good time. She’s in the chair, eyes on the three of them, one hand slowly circling her nipple.

Tonight’s not going to be fast, so she’s pacing herself, getting ready for a good, long, slow build.

Jimmy kisses back at her. She winks back at him. Then he drizzles a little more oil on Tim, grinning as he quivers and squirms.

Tim adores watching sex, but there is something to be said for not knowing what’s coming next.

He’s stretched out on his back, eyes blinded, hands and feet bound, completely open and vulnerable. All he can do is feel.

And listen.

Abby’s moving around him. Her voice… footsteps, he knows she’s moving. “Is this what you wanted to see, Breena?” Fingers are trailing up his side, tickling him a little as they scrape from hip to wrist.

“Yeah, he’s just as lovely as you said he’d be.”

Tongue. Wet, soft, laving over his nipple and then a hard, sharp bite. No stubble, must have been Abby. Tim jerks a little, and moans, deep at it. It hurt, but as soon as she let go, he’s riding it, feeling the rush.

“He pinks up so pretty,” Abby’s voice.

Finger, slick, tracing the bite. It’s a raw feeling, sharp and… “Uh!” Tim inhales hard. That finger just pressed down, and a hand pulled wet and slick along his dick.

“And makes so many great sounds,” Breena’s voice that time.

Fingers, running through his hair, larger, broader. Jimmy’s he thinks. Lips, this time on his, definitely Jimmy. Even though he’s shaved today, he’s not soft like the girls, and he smells different, too.

Tim groans into Jimmy’s mouth, letting himself relax, go soft and placid against his husband. He pulls Jimmy’s tongue into his mouth, sucking softly. That gets a little grunt out of Jimmy, and Tim smirks slightly.

“He’s not the only one who makes great sounds,” Breena says, and he feels Jimmy pull back a bit. He doesn’t say anything, but he’s sure Breena got a look that said a thousand words.

Tim lifts his head, finding Jimmy’s lips, gently biting the lower one. Pay attention to me!

“It’s not always all about you,” Jimmy says softly to him, no bite in those words, just reminding him that he’s not the only one in the room. Then there’s a hand on his dick again. Jimmy’s. Abby’s doesn’t cover that much of him. He’s pulling long and steady, and Tim’s hips are jerking up into it.

He feels jostling on the bed. “Pretty, pretty boys. Both of you slick and flushed. Makes me so hot and wet. How about you give him a taste, James?”

Tim feels Jimmy move away, though his hand is still on Jimmy’s dick, and then he’s back, kissing
Tim, lips wet with Abby’s cum, and stroking his dick fast and hard.

“Oh! Fuck!” It’s half a breath, half a word, and Tim’s jerking, trying to get more of everything.

Jimmy’s hand goes loose, and he pulls back.

Tim whimpers.

“None of that, love,” Abby says to him. “You’ll get your taste, too.”

Tim feels everyone move. Abby’s moving up his body, settling herself over his mouth. Jimmy’s… Letting go. He pouts at that. Soft and loose is better than dick against his belly all by itself.

Then he feels heat between his legs. Jimmy’s got to be down there. Heat and skin against his face. Scent. Abby’s pussy in his face, he opens his mouth, tongue darting out, lapping at her.

“Ahhh… That’s it baby!”

He’s almost entirely focused on Abby, on her scent, and taste, and the feel of her skin on his, when he feels what Jimmy’s doing. Warm, thick fingers on his ass. The slide of lubed glass, a moment of feeling open and relaxed, and then another slide, this time with some stretch and a little burn.

Tim moans at that. Today, he likes the burn, and hips arch for it.

And Tim’s happy to. He shuts as much of the world outside of his lips, tongue, and Abby’s pussy as he can, and focuses down.

Blind, no hands, it’s all about his mouth. Wet tongue, wet clit, wet lips, so slick, so hot. He can feel her dripping down his chin and throat, taste her, smell her, and he feels like he’s swimming in her body, savoring every twitch and moan.

His lady’s given him a task, and he’s going to do it.

His body rocks, as he circles with his tongue. He purses his lips to suck her, and switches back to more circles. He can feel her thighs going tighter against his face, and her hips rock fast and erratic against his lips.

He can feel his own body drip as he tongues her. He wants to dive into her, fuck hard and fast. Her hips snap faster, rocking against him, and for a second she stills, before her body twitches, hard.

He slows his tongue, but doesn’t stop. He matches her, soft little licks each time her body twitches.

He’s making a lot of small, wet, needy sounds as his spit slick tongue slides over Abby’s cum slick clit.

There’s a feeling of movement, and then hands on his left ankle. A second later his foot is loose and the bed jostles a bit. Jimmy’s moving. Sitting next to him, cross-legged probably. He’s got Tim’s left leg draped over his lap.

Tim’s not sure what Jimmy’s doing, but then he feels it, and those soft, little needy sounds become loud, demanding ones.

It’s a gentle touch. Four fingertips along the back of Tim’s dick, keeping him steady. Jimmy’s thumb is right where the head of his dick meets the shaft, and he’s lightly, gently, right in that one little spot rubbing tiny circles.

Oil slick hand, oil slick dick, everything is smooth and gliding.

Tim’s writhing on the bed, trying to get a bit more pressure. It’s an electric sensation, light, sharp, rolling over his dick and through his body, but it’s not enough.

Jimmy takes the pad of his thumb, presses it against the base of Tim’s dick, and presses, slow, hard, perfect hard, but so slow, too slow, all the way up the length.

Tim feels the precum ease out of him as Jimmy does it, and he hears Breena groan a second before he feels a tongue touch the tip of his dick and drag over it, slowly pulling back a moment later. Then those fingers again, and thumb, and light, wet, slick circles on his dick as his tongue glides against Abby, with more light, soft wet circles.

Tim’s shivering, trying to figure out how to move to get more of everything. More pussy, more touch, more sensation, everything.

He wants to leap over the edge, gallop into an orgasm, but they won’t let him. They’re keeping him here, inches away, turning up the pleasure one agonizingly slow notch at a time.

Jimmy moves away. Tim’s leg is free, feeling a little cold. Jimmy’s body was warm against it, and him gone leaves his skin naked to shockingly cold air.

Moving. Jimmy’s hand on his ankle again. The bed shifting more. Jimmy’s between his legs.

Hand on his dick, stroking fast and steady, and Tim’s snapping his hips, trying to throw himself over the edge, trying to get off, trying to let the fire consume him. He’s begging, or would be if his mouth wasn’t full of pussy, so all that’s coming out are wet, muffled whimpering noises.

Jimmy’s knee. It’s against Tim’s thigh, keeping his legs spread wide.

Hand moving fast, and then light, too damn light, barely touching. All the speed he could ever want, but not enough friction.

Jolt. A blast of pressure-pleasure through his prostate and Tim knows what Jimmy’s doing. He feels it again, sharp and arcing through his balls and legs and spine. Once more. He’s rocking the dilator against him.

Empty. His body wants something to hold, something in him, something rocking right there getting him over and over and…

Thick, solid, cold. The glass is fucking cold as it slides into him. Wide. Stretch, but Jimmy angles it right and there’s another jolt, one more, Tim begs, pleads, body quivering, he knows he’s saying, “Please, please, please…” over and over, licking it into Abby’s skin.

Jimmy gives the dilator one last twist, and then lets go, returning to where he’d been, and that slow, easy, light, too fucking light, stroke on the tip of Tim’s dick.

“What do you think, James, is he ready for you?”
At this point, Jimmy’s fairly sure that Tim would happily fuck anything that could get his prostate, so he’s beyond ready.

He’s been trying to get Jimmy to get him off for the last ten minutes now, and just begging Abby for... Everything. He’s not making a whole lot of concrete requests right now, beyond a whole lot of please.

But there’s ready, wet, flushed, quivering, hips jerking, and there’s ready, namely stretched slow and easy so Jimmy won’t hurt him, and that’s...

“I think he’s ready.”

Tim hears that and perks up. “YES! Please! NOW!”

Abby sits back, kneeling beside Tim, and takes the blindfold off of him. He blinks at the sudden light. “I want you to watch us fuck you.”

His eyes are wide, pupils blown, a little glassy. He’s looking drugged with pleasure. He blinks again, slow, and says, growling, “Yes!”

Abby grins at him. “Good.”

She nods to Jimmy, and he knows the next bit.

“We’re going to untie you, and move you around. Legs free. Ass right at the edge of the bed. Then we’ll re-tie your hands.”

Tim nods, slowly. He feels Jimmy moving away from him. Then he realizes he can watch. He looks away from Abby, sees Jimmy untying his foot, and Breena, face flushes, legs wide, lips wet, fingers glistening, watching him, hungry, eager. He hasn’t heard her come cry, and realizes she’s pacing them.

She looks just as eager to get off as he is.

Jimmy moves around the bed, untying his hands, and Tim watches him, staring at his body, naked, hard, shining with oil. His hair is wild, curling easily, and his hands are strong and gentle on Tim’s wrists as he unties him.

Tim’s eyes slide back to Abby, also naked, also gleaming with oil. She’s flushed, her lips wet and swollen from kisses, nipples hard, hair awry from fucking.

“You’re so beautiful,” he means all three of them, and makes at least a second of eye contact with each one.

Abby strokes his face. “You should see yourself, love. All spread out and quivering for it.” Her fingers trail up his dick. Jimmy gets his other hand, and Tim lies there, taking several breaths before he realizes he can move on his own.

He begins to scoot himself into position, hips at the side of the bed, feet on the floor, arms out. Jimmy reties him, and Abby steps off the bed, standing between his legs. She’s staring at him, looking at his dick high, red, wet; balls, tight, pulled as tight to him as they can get with the cockring, though this moment of rearranging his pulling Tim back from the edge of wanting to get off, and they’re starting to slip down again. His ass is stretched wide around the dilator, and she knows that in a moment Jimmy’ll be fucking him, and she will, too.
“You want us, baby?”

“Yes.”

Jimmy finishes tying his right arm.

“Please!”

She settles herself next to Tim, and starts to slowly jack his cock. Up and down, slow, easy, slick with oil. Jimmy crawls around him, careful not to kneel on his arm, and gets himself standing between Tim’s legs. He pumps his own dick, which is more than ready to get into the action, spreading more lube over himself, before hooking the dilator with his index finger and slipping it out.

Tim whimpers at that, and then whimpers again, spreading his legs as wide as they go as Jimmy steps even closer, holding his dick in his hand, getting it in place and sliding forward easy and sweet.

Both of them groan, hard, at that. Jimmy’s a little wider around than the largest dilator, which means Tim’s nice and snug against him, and Tim’s craving any extra hint of sensation he can get, so that little bit of extra stretch shudders through him.

Abby lets his dick go, watching it twitch as Jimmy moves through his first few strokes. Every time he gets Tim just right, his dick jerks, pre-cum beading at the tip, and Tim moans.

By this point, Abby’s not even pretending to run Jimmy anymore. They’re running Tim, together.

She glances back, and with a little nod, Jimmy gets across the idea that on his side of this, they’re all set.

From the way Tim’s watching her, the half closed, glazed eyes, she knows he’s close.

Close to coming, but he’s still in his head. He may not be paying attention to anything other than his dick and Jimmy’s right now, but there’s still an outside world in his head.

And she wants to shatter that. Wants to take him completely out of the world. She wants him to exist right here, right now, in his body, and their love.

Normally, she wouldn’t do this, because normally this isn’t how they play. When they spin him out it’s all about anal until it’s time to come. Tossing his dick into the mix is just too much stimulation at once. He just can’t control it after a certain point, and both at once is that certain point.

Tim’s lying there, rocking gently against Jimmy. He’s eager, body tight, straining against the ties on his arms.

“Timothy.”

His eyes laze away from Jimmy to her.

“I’m going to slide onto you, don’t come.”

His face looks pained, and the groan is deep and intense. Abby pauses, waits a moment, sees if he’ll say ‘Stop,’ but he doesn’t, so she straddles his hips, pushes her thumb into the bruise on his nipple, and slowly slips down on him.

“FUCK!” He breathes it, face tense, eyes closing. He can’t take watching it and feeling it, and not coming. Even with the jolt of pain to go with it, he’s so close to the edge he can taste it.

Abby can feel Jimmy’s not moving right now. He’s making sure Tim’s got some time to adjust. Abby gives Jimmy a little pat on the hip and he begins a very slow stroke. He’s just gliding in and out right now, intentionally not getting Tim’s prostate.

He’s got some idea of what Abby’s working toward. They talked about tonight’s goals on the way here. So he doesn’t want to stack the deck against Tim.

The last thing any of them want is to set him up to fail tonight.

Abby starts to glide, too, matching Jimmy’s pace.

Tim’s hands clench against the ropes, and his toes curl, and he’s about to bite through his lip he’s working so hard at not getting off.

“Come on, baby, just a bit longer, hold on,” Abby coos at him. She knows him well enough that she can order him to come the seconds it looks like he loses control, she won’t let him fail at this, there’s no chance of him getting off “before she wants him to,” but she’s hoping she can pull him through this minute, get him to the next, and burn through any world outside her voice, and their bodies.

Tim’s closed his eyes. His arms are tight, jaw clenched, the muscles of his neck and chest straining. He’s biting his lip, trying to hold very still, minimize the friction as much as he can from his end of this.

“Abby!” He gasps.

“You can do this, baby. Just flow with it, let us take care of you.”

“Abby! Please! I gotta…” She can feel the tension in his thighs, and his knuckles are white.

She slows way down, just easing over him, long, slick glides. Her fingers find his face, and she strokes his cheek and kisses him. “We’ve got you, Tim, just relax. Let it go, baby.”

“Unh…” pants out of Tim’s lips. His eyes open for a second, and focus on Abby. She smiles at him, stroking over his cheeks, forefinger slipping along his lips.

He opens them further, gently licking her finger. A little salt, sweat from all of their skins, a little slick, still traces of the oil. He focuses on that, and then on her face. And again she smiles.

“Come on, relax, baby, let us do you. Let us take you so far out of your head that there’s nothing but your body left.”

He kisses the tip of her finger, and smiles.

Abby glides against him again, base to tip and back again, a long sweet grind. She’s sending shivers and quivers all along her own body with that move, and it’s got to be even more intense for Tim.

Tim inhales, deep, exhales, his eyes settling into that half-closed droop, as his body goes soft and limp against the bed.

“Oh… There you go. Perfect, baby, just perfect. Makes me so happy to see you like this, all pink and wet and ready.”

Tim purrs at that, wriggling a little, and Abby beams at him, pleased to see him let everything else go.
“You just stay like that, relaxed and happy, and Jimmy and I are going to fuck you right out of your head.”

It’s like a switch in his head. There was struggling, holding on to not getting off by his fingernails, there was worry about not pleasing his lady, and his body so tight, so ready, so full, and the edge was right there and he was so afraid of falling over it, and it was so close, and he was trying to back away, so worried, so turned on, so needy and God, she’s moving, and Jimmy’s not but he’s hard and full, pressing him right there, and just breathing means a little friction, and Abby slides and so much tension and…

And then soft words and a softer touch just flipped the switch.

He can do this.

All he has to do is let himself go.

It takes a second, a heartbeat of actively making his body relax. For a moment his fingers feel odd, tingly, like they’re having a hard time letting go after that long clenched, but he relaxes, all over.

It’s not in his hands, or head, or dick even. Abby and Jimmy have him, and they’ll take care of him, and all he has to do is exist right now.

And feel.

Once Tim fully lets go, Abby knows not to run Tim too much longer.

But for a little while.

Watching him like this…

It’s so fucking delicious.

She can see it in the droop of his eyes, and the soft smile on his lips, and the way his shoulders and chest are flushed but not tight.

He’s right here, right now, but not tense, not straining. He’s just flowing with it, taking each stroke, enjoying it, but not chasing anything.

“That’s it, baby.” She’s rocking slow and steady against him, matching Jimmy’s pace, getting themselves set so that when he goes deep, she goes shallow. Basically, they both move forward and back at the same time, but, given what they’re doing, moving the same way at the same time produces different results.

She reaches behind herself, and finds one of Jimmy’s hands. She doesn’t want to break the spell with Tim by asking Jimmy how he’s doing, but she does want to check in, make sure he’s okay, too. She gives him a little you okay? sort of squeeze.

He kisses the back of her neck and quietly says, “Yes, but soon, please.” Tim is tight when he’s tense, and with as long as they’ve been going, and with as tight, and hot, and slick as Tim is, Jimmy’s got a fingernail hold on the edge, too. He’s already gotten through every bone in the body, alphabetically, backwards, and is rapidly running out of don’t-come strategies.

She nods. And then picks up her speed a little. Jimmy matches her.

“Timothy, you want to come?”

“Yeah…” eases out of him, more a breath than a word.

“Good, baby. I want to watch you come. Want to see you shake and moan for me.”

Tim does groan at that, and the faster pace.

“Good, baby, good… How’s Jimmy feel? Is he hitting you just right?”

Tim moans at that, too. Jimmy’s been hitting him just right all night, and right now, speeding up, and with as long as they’ve been playing with him, Tim feels like he’s getting fucked on his dick, and through his dick, and he’s about to cum gallons.

Every stroke rocks through him. They’re still going pretty slow, fluid, like waves, swelling up and back.

Tim’s nipples are tight, and his body is tensing up again. Each crest takes him higher, each drop is deeper. His hips are rocking faster, harder, chasing more pressure and pleasure. His face, neck, and chest are flushed, and he’s glistening with sweat and oil, hair dark with it.

“God, baby, you look so hot like this. So perfect… Makes me want to come just watching you.”

Tim’s gripping the ropes, knuckles going white, his jaw is tight, and he’s making a low, deep groan with each breath.

“Just like that, just… like… Come, baby, come for me!” Abby grinds down on him, and Jimmy thrusts up, getting him just right, and his whole body rocks, jerking, as lightning tingles spread through him and pleasure spurts wet and hard, over and over.

He twitches again, and again, and over… More than he can count. His body’s wracking with pleasure, and nothing exists outside of the sensations pouring through him.

And in a moment, Abby’s resting on Tim’s chest, with Jimmy lying against his side, and Breena’s joined them, untying his hands.

Breena curls in next to them. Tim hums a little, a soft sub-verbal acknowledgement that she’s joined them on the bed.

“You back to us?” she asks.

He purrs again. Then says, “Yeah. Maybe…” His eyes are closed, and his lips open, just enough for the tip of his tongue to side over them. He kisses Abby. Then he turns to kiss Jimmy. He’d kiss Breena but that requires moving more than his head, so he says, “Enjoy the show?”
“Oh, yeah!”

There’s a quiet moment, and then Tim says, eyes still closed, “Even if your water does break, I’m not going anywhere.”

That gets a bit of laughter. Memories of how Sean got a move on passing between them.

“He’s squirming a bit, but I don’t think he’s going anywhere tonight,” Breena says.

“Good. ‘Cause I’m not.”

“Lazy bastard,” Jimmy adds.

Tim smirks. “Sometimes it’s good to be the Uncle.”

He hears Jimmy laugh at that, and then feels cold as Jimmy levers himself up, dragging out of bed to go clean himself up.

Tim’s asleep before Jimmy gets back.
The Fear of McGee: Coda

Tim’s fairly sure he’s dreaming.

First and foremost, he’s never been to Vietnam, and he’s awfully sure this is Vietnam.

Second of all, he’s never been on a MKII PBR, though maybe this is a MKIII PBR, they’re identical from the outside. The only reason he knows what it is are memories of pictures of them in his father’s office.

Like any MKII/III PBR, it’s small. Shallow draft. Turtle navy has to move on rivers, and those things can be awfully shallow. PBRs patrol the rivers. Small crews, too. Four men per boat, and two boats working together. He’s not so much on the boat, as aware of it. People are moving around and through him, so he’s not part of the crew.

He’s watching, not doing.

The jungle is thick. Too thick. Impossibly thick. A literal wall of vegetation looms up from the waterline. There’s no visibility. Anything could be hiding in the jungle.

They’re moving as quietly as possible. It’s night, and they don’t like going at night, can’t see any mines in the water at night, but during the day the guys in the jungle can see them, so…

The wrong word. The wrong move. Drop something, say something, sneeze, and they can all die.

He can feel The Admiral’s eyes burning through every man on that boat. Except he’s not The Admiral. He’s The Lieutenant. He’s twenty-two and about ten days out of Annapolis. Tim knows this story. He’s been told it over and over. The man who ran this boat, and who was supposed to run The Lieutenant, turn him from a green boy into a leader, is already dead. He lit a cigarette, in the open, at night, which was against regs, and got picked off by a sniper within two hours of getting on the boat on their first trip as a unit.

And every second since then The Lieutenant has had eyes on everyone, all the time, demanding constant, instant, perfect obedience.

One of the men coughs. The entire boat goes completely still, waiting, but nothing happens.

Except the man who coughed, he’s cringing, silently. He knows what’s coming for him. The Lieutenant is standing there, at the prow, staring him down. When they get to the landing zone, he’s going to wish a sniper had gotten him.

It’s very dark when Tim pulls out of that dream. Abby’s in front of him, sleeping, and Breena’s behind him. He feels a little squirm, Donnie shifting in his sleep. He could lift his head and check the time, but he doesn’t feel any need to do it. This dark, it’s still hours before wake up time, so that’s enough.

He goes through the images in his head. Makes himself go through them again. He’s sure this is part of what he needs to know, or do, or… understand.
High stress, any wrong move and they’re all dead.

That’s how he never met his Uncle James. Maybe he made a wrong move and bought it. Maybe someone on his boat did. The men have to be perfect. If they aren’t perfect, they die or get captured… If the stuff they’re carrying doesn’t get through, the men waiting for them might also die.

He replays it again. There’s meaning here.

Can’t trust. They have to be perfect, but no one is perfect. Draftees. Most of them don’t want to be here, aren’t career military, and don’t give a shit if they have a perfect record. Can’t get rid of them. There are no alternatives. These men, there, then, are it. And their lives literally depend on each other. As long as they’re all alive in the end, anything The Lieutenant needs to do to make sure that happens is for the greater good…

Except it isn’t.

Maybe…

Does it matter if his men fear him, hate him, curse him, as long as they’re still breathing at the end of the day?

Another image hits him, and he’s not sure if he’s dreaming now, or just imagining intensely. This time it’s a desert city, and he knows, just like he did before, that this is Iraq. (Though, given what he’s seeing in his head, he’s pretty sure that’s his memories of Somalia, blended with Afghanistan, with Iraq stamped on top of it.)

This time it’s The Gunny who’s keeping the men in line, making sure he doesn’t even need to say “Jump” before they all leap up with “How high?”

They’re going building to building, clearing them. They communicate by hand signals, sweeping through, guns at the ready.

One of the men… Not one of the men. This one’s an embedded reporter. No gun. He tries to move forward, past the men, into an uncleared, but empty-looking room, and The Gunny grabs him by the back of the neck, slaps him across the face, and drops him in one easy move.

He’s laying on his back, gasping for air, but the soldier who was supposed to go into that room does, and Tim can hear him saying, “Trip wire. Get the bomb squad in here.”

The Gunny just looks down at the man on the floor. He won’t ever return to their unit.

He can feel it’s different. Everyone in that room is a volunteer. And maybe they didn’t expect to end up there, and it’s clear that a bunch of them don’t want to be there. Some of them are counting the days until they get out of there. It’s blindingly obvious they do not want the reporter there. They’re professionals. They know what they’re doing. He’s the one who might get them killed.

Iraq bleeds into his own memories, own dreams, this definitely is Somalia, he can taste it in the air, the blood in his mouth, and the feel of the floor hard, hot, under his body.

Tony’s talking, spinning a line of BS Tim can barely follow, because he knows that if something doesn’t happen soon, he’s got to move, fast, no hands, against someone with a gun who already knows he’s not helpless.

He doesn’t hear the shot, can’t hear it, Gibbs is way too far away for that, but he sees Saleem’s head snap back, and for a second they’re all still, and then they’ve got to run, move, fast, get out of there.
Tony’s getting his hands. Ziva’s trying to stand up. Slow, her body doesn’t want to move. He’s got the gun. Tony’s got most of Ziva’s weight on him. Tim’s got some of it. She’s so weak her legs won’t support her. They’re shuffling out.

He’s got the gun. Drugged, they’re all drugged, but that doesn’t matter. It feels like the hallway is spinning as they lurch down it. He’s got one hand free to shoot. He can’t use his right to steady it without dropping Ziva. There’s a shape at the end of the hall. He’s lifting the gun, hoping, praying he can nail the shot, but his eyes still don’t focus well, and he can still taste blood, and he knows he’s waver ing for a second, but…

It’s Gibbs at the end of the hall.

All of them volunteered for it, knowing how it would go. One mission, with men he chose, and trusted.

Tim opens his eyes. Lighter now. Dawn or just about. All four of them still in bed. He kisses the back of Abby’s neck, and rolls over to kiss Breena. She murmurs a bit, but doesn’t stir.

Everything he ever learned about how to be a leader (or not to be a leader) came from men who were trained and training other men in literal life or death situations.

As the sun grows brighter, he can feel the difference. He runs the Public Corruption department. Most of the time, most of his men will never even need a gun. He’ll have a hundred fold more accountants and lawyers than “muscle.”

The stakes he’s playing for, they aren’t literal life and death, not immediately, not directly.

He’s playing them with professionals, who chose to be where they are.

He knows that matters, but he also knows he’s not seeing the whole picture fully, not yet.

_____________________

Gibbs, Vance, Ducky, Abbi… all of his images of a ‘good leader’ are military.

Tim’s not sure what to do with it. But he’s got the feeling that if he were to do more free writing today, it would look a whole lot less like word salad and more like a path toward defining himself as a leader.

More about what he’s learned from that, and what he’s learning not to do from it, too.

But right now, he doesn’t have free writing time.

He’s got something more important, namely a collection of tiny people who haven’t spent nearly enough time with Dad/Uncle Tim lately.

And right now, that matters a hell of a lot more than figuring out the job.

Because one thing he doesn’t need to figure out is that these people around him, in his arms, lying on his belly, crawling all over him as they romp around in the living room, matter a hell of a lot more, and will continue to matter a hell of a lot longer, than anything he’s doing with his job.
Just because he’s playing with the kids doesn’t mean his mind is silent.

Tim’s on his back, holding Sean in the air, lowering and rising him, as he giggles and burbles and drools a bit on his daddy. (Who doesn’t mind at all. Compared to burnt-out FBI Agents, drooling, happy baby is a treat.)

He remembers golden light. Abby’s apartment, way back, before they were living together. They’d been talking about Communion, and why he didn’t take it, and then symbols.

She’d asked: "What symbols do matter to you?"

He remembers thinking about it, and coming up with: "My badge. The idea that I'm part of the line between order and chaos. That there's an agreed upon idea of how we'll interact with each other, and I'm part of what protects the people who follow the rules from those who don't. That I'm a gun or knife, an instrument of violence, but bound by honor, in the service of justice, for the protection of others. That matters to me.

"Words... They're the tool we use to try and expand the universe we know and see. How we share it with each other."

She squeezed his hand. "They're good symbols, McGee."

"Thanks."

That was his first Christmas with Abby. He remembers being careful about what he said, stressing justice and not law because… Well, law was something of an afterthought for them, wasn’t it? Something they tended to work around. Hell, what was it, his third case? Second? “Rule 13, McGee, never, ever involve the lawyers.”

He was led by a man with a good strong moral compass that pointed true north, and he stayed on the side of the angels, but…

God…

Tim looks over. Gibbs has Molly and Kelly in his lap, and is reading them a story. Supposedly, they’re all winding down, getting ready for afternoon nap time.

He rubs his hands over his face. Tim’s lying on the floor. Sean’s sitting on his belly, and Jackson is on his chest, on his hind legs, front paws on Sean’s chest, licking his face.

They never had any use for law.

He bragged about it to Tony, “How many felonies do you think I commit a year? In a good year, it’s five or six.”

He didn’t get caught. And the end may have justified the means, but… Everyone he just fired thought that, too. Almost all of them had some greater good. Sure, he had some grifters and a few on the take for the sake of being on the take, but he’s prosecuting them. The ones he just fired… They all had justifications, too.

He knew, when he was talking to Abby all those years ago that law wasn’t justice. He came up in a team that more or less considered law an obstacle to justice. And Tim isn’t sure how he feels about that, not right now, but he’s starting to get a sense of where he needs to go.

Law is supposed to be a tool of justice. That’s how this whole thing, country, government, law enforcement is supposed to work. Everyone is under the same law. It applies to everyone and it works for everyone and…

And that likely won’t ever happen. No perfect world, not ever. But…

He can stop people from using the law it to carve out little niches of power and influence for themselves. He can do that. But if he’s going to do that, it means he needs to be part of that. Follow the same rules everyone else does.

He remembers Manner looking at him in disgust, because he was the rule-breaking cowboy. He can imagine him laughing his head off at where he is now.

“You okay?” Gibbs asks him.

Tim sits up, holding Sean steady, but Jackson gets a bit of a surprise, shooting of a quick yip as he scampers aside. “Maybe…”

Gibbs keeps eyeing him. He’s heard the stories of the last week, noticed the lack of Tim from their home the last two weekends, and he’s here right now because he wants to lay eyes on his boy, see how he is.

Out of sorts seems to be the answer. He’s seen Tim worse, a lot worse, and he’s seen him better, quite a bit better. Right now he’s… just off.

The gut isn’t worried. Tim’s thinking hard. Anyone looking at him can see the wheels turning, but Gibbs has the sense this is important turning.

Tim rolls Sean onto his back, and grabs his feet, patting them together and rolling them in little circles. Sean laughs. Mona pads over, and lays her head on Tim’s shoulder. Tim gives her the stink eye, but she knows it’s not real, then he pets her. She looks satisfied with that, and stalks off to Gibbs.

Gibbs lets Tim keep thinking, and playing with Sean.

Eventually, it’s naptime, and the kids go down to rest.

He heads back downstairs once they’re in their cribs, thinking he’ll free write, but instead of turning toward Breena’s office, he heads for the back porch, where Gibbs and Jimmy are.

They don’t really need to be out here right now. There’s a brisket on the grill, slowly cooking away, but that doesn’t require any real supervision.

He thinks they’re just out there, sucking up some late summer sunshine. There won’t be too many more of these warm, blue-skied days, not this year.

“Abbi coming for dinner tonight?” Tim asks.

“That’s the plan. She’s been checking her new teams, seeing where the holes are. Almost done. Maybe by the end of the month, she’ll be back up to her full force.”

Tim nods. He knows that she, like him, has a massive staffing problem, though she’s getting closer to having her ducks in a row.

“Checking how?”

“Now until the middle of June, ride alongs. She joins each one for a day or two, sees how they work together, gets a feel for everyone involved. Lets them get a feel for her.”

Tim winces, that’s a lot of time away from home.

Gibbs nods. He’s been missing her, too. On the upside, she’s only got 207 teams. And she does have the jet, so she gets home for at least a few nights a week. But, between now and next summer, besides the month between mid-December to mid-January in DC, she’s got a lot of traveling.

Tim thinks about all of this more, hours later, tossing the salad that’s going to go with the brisket that Gibbs is slicing up.

Jake and Penny spring to mind. He can only be a tool of justice if the law is just. And a lot of the time law and justice don’t even have a nodding acquaintance. That’s why they avoid the damn lawyers, why they cut the corners and… Okay, that’s bullshit. Sometimes, that’s why they avoid lawyers and cut corners.

Sometimes the gut, Gibbs’ and the rest of theirs, knew the bastard was guilty, and sometimes the law stopped them from doing what was right. But most of the time, those laws are there because not everyone has a gut, and not everyone uses his gut, and it’s awfully easy to screw someone over, gut or not, if you’ve got a badge.

Clements springs to mind again.

Those same laws his team occasionally ignored were put in place to protect guys like him.

But he’s not enforcing those laws. Sort of. Probably. A police force gets enough complaints, his guys could get called in. For the most part, the civil rights guys are in charge of making sure that cops don’t steamroll citizens.

He’s a level up. It’s his job to make sure the powers that be play the game fairly. He’s the one who makes sure that justice isn’t just a concept for the people around him. He’s got the image in his mind: Lady Justice. She wears her blindfold, and holds her scale, but everyone forgets her other hand, the one that carries the sword.

He’s got to make sure she stays blind, and that sword in her hand is sharp.

It’s his job to cut the hands off people who try to put a thumb on the scale and tip its balance.
But he can only do his job if the law is worthy of it. Tim groans. He knows he’s going to have to spend even more time with the damn lawyers, and start talking to his grandmother and Jake.

He makes sure that he gets on dish duty with Abbi when dinner wraps up.

“You off again in the morning?”

“Yeah. Miami. I’ll be there all this week, home for the weekend, and then back for the next week, home again, and the week after.”

Tim nods. That makes sense to him. Miami is a major Coast Guard city.

“They happy to see you?”

She snorts at that. “Were you happy to have Leon looking over your shoulder?”

Tim rolls his eyes. Even with the fact that he likes Leon, he never wanted him hovering over his shoulder watching him do his job.

“Exactly. But most of them are new. Most of them have never worked together before. The old system, where you have a tried and true agent with a Probie’s been shot to shit for me.”

Tim nods along with that, too. He’s got a mental image of Abbi from their time in the Navy Yard. The Marines knew the chain of command went something like this: Jarvis, Vance, and Abbi. She had them snapping to and saluting within… Three minutes? Four. She stood there, and they just knew.

In the image, she’s standing outside, wind whipping her hair, which is already dirty and ratty, wearing the same pants suit she had on pretty much the whole time. Her white blouse is gray. Her navy pants are darker gray. She had on body armor, black, too large. She’s inside the grounds, so her helmet is… Not on her head. She had one of the automatic rifles, though she’s holding it in a relaxed manner. Muzzle is down, finger isn’t near the trigger.

All she had to do was exist, and the Marines knew she was in charge. He wonders what she like when she was Captain Borin.

“What happens after you finish riding along?” Tim asks.

“Can’t be everywhere at once, Tim. Gotta trust ‘em. What was Reagan’s line? ‘Trust, but verify?’ That’s my job now. Go, see, watch, point out problems, and then let ‘em run it. Verify when and as I can.”

He blinks slowly at that, feeling like the floor just opened under him.

Trust is a choice.

He trusted Gibbs on first sight. On reputation and body language alone, he trusted Gibbs. But that trust wasn’t earned. Gibbs did nothing but be himself, and Tim gave it to him.

Same with Abby. He stepped into her lab, and… He chuckles remembering the first time they had sushi. Okay, he didn’t trust her instantly in all things, but he just knew she wouldn’t pull any big shit
Tony took more time. He trusted Agent DiNozzo, as a professional, as a man who would have his back in a fight, years before he trusted Tony. And, even in that case, he more learned how Tony would behave, got his character down, and trusted that Tony would be Tony, and that would be that. Tim sighs, he didn’t have that character down as well as he thought he did, which has always been part of the tension between them.

Kate was… He’s not sure anymore. He feels like he trusted her quickly, but he’s not sure how much of that is the distance of years, and the sort of rose-tinted haze of loss and regret that fills all of his memories of Kate.

He knows something else, whether they earned his trust or not, he had to trust them, because without it, they couldn’t do their job.

Trust is a choice. His team couldn’t function without it. That was four people.

There’s no possible way he can run a two thousand person department without it.

There are 297 people working on rebuilding DC, sorting stuff, and finishing up punishment duty. And if there’s any chance of his being able to run this department, and do the things he wants to do, he’s going to have to figure out how to trust them.

He dreams of Jenny Sheppard. Nothing concrete. She isn’t talking to him or anything. It’s just the feel of her.

When he’s awake, again, deep in the dark, this time with only Abby next to him, (He’s on the outside of the bed, on kiddie duty.) he thinks of Jenny, and Jeanne, and going to Canada to go after The Frog, and…

He wonders, idly, if any of them have a picture of Jenny. He wants one to put in his office. Not like a huge portrait or anything, but… He wants the memory. Better yet if there’s a shot of him with her. (Though he’s pretty certain there isn’t one. Jenny died before everyone had a phone with a camera, and he knows he never took a shot of them together on the phone he had with a camera.)

He wants the motivation.

Someone, someone like him, should have showed up at NCIS and slapped her in cuffs after The Frog. If she hadn’t died… He heard the rumors. Part of why Vance was there, even before Jenny died, was they were looking to ease her out. But that was butt-covering mode.

And he doesn’t trust that anything other than an early retirement would have happened to Jenny if she hadn’t been sick and dying, and maybe, not even that.

And thinking that, he’s got to look at himself, and what he did for her, would have done for her.

He wonders, idly, if part of Jenny accepting his badge when he was protecting his sister, was that she wasn’t sure he’d play ball if she asked for him to go too far. He’s fairly certain there’s a line he wouldn’t have crossed. He doesn’t know what that line was. He honestly doesn’t know what he would have done if she’d hit him with Tony’s assignment. He likes to think he would have said no, but… He doesn’t know that. Especially newly minted Senior-Field-Agent McGee, desperate to prove that he was worth the position…
He does know that if The Director of NCIS told him to monitor the communications of someone, without a warrant, he’d have done it in a heartbeat. No questions asked.

And he knows because he has done things like that.

But he doesn’t know what to do with it.

Other than not do it again.

Better ninety-nine guilty men go free than one innocent man be imprisoned. That’s the saying, right?

He wonders if the gut, his or Gibbs’ or Tony’s or Ziva’s was ever wrong. They always managed to convince a jury, and they never fudged the evidence… just… how they got that evidence, sometimes.

He’s thinking about that on Monday, as he’s heading to the grocery store, planning on doing a whole lot of boring, normal, everyday chores.

That’s his job these days, right? He’s the one who stops the powers that be from going after the innocent as they sweep up the guilty? Maybe.

He’s the one who reins them in?

Probably.

Somehow, the broccoli in his hand is not filling him with insight.

Tuesday afternoon. He’s in on his own in his office. Jennifer’s still off. No one needs to be chewed out. His immediate investigative job has been handed off. Hotch is off dealing with the pile of cases he’s handed him.

It’s the first time he’s been in his office, to work, on his own, since he got here. For a moment, he just stands there, looking around, and then… He sees his computer and smiles.

Today he can work on the things they actually hired him for, building functional infrastructures.

This is fun. He hasn’t worked with code in… God… Weeks? Months? Too damn long.

The NCIS triaging system is his architecture. He’s messing with it some, building up the skeleton for an FBI system. By the time it’s been rolled out to the FBI, what had been a house will have to be supersized up to skyscraper scale.

But, just like the base concepts don’t change between a house and a skyscraper, the program architecture he’s working on doesn’t change, either. He’s got to make it bigger, stronger, more robust, but a joist is a joist, and a data sort function is a data sort function.

He’s thinking that he should be able to get his computer guys together next week, show this off, and get them up to speed on the idea of A: this is what they’re building, and B: we need people, yesterday, to do it.
He’s happily coding away, pleased to be back to this, fingers dancing on the keyboard, fully in the zone when a stray thought brings him to a standstill.

He knows exactly zero of the people he’s going to hand this off to. They’ll talk. He’ll drop this plan on them. He’ll keep eyes on them, check in, see how they’re doing, but…

He’ll hand it over to strangers, who work for the FBI, which, as of this point has not been covering itself in glory when it comes to being worth trusting, and trust that they’ll do it.

And he would have done it without a thought, had it not been for the 297 employees still laboring away, sorting bricks, all of whom he’s feeling wary about ever giving another assignment to.

He closes his eyes and sighs. It’s one thing to realize you need to do it. It’s another one to do it.

“Thanks, Jarvis.” Tim hangs up his phone on Thursday. Apparently, the guys who’ve stuck around are doing a good job. Jarvis is getting chunks of DC cleared a lot faster than expected, and he’s able to get more bricks distributed around the city.

It might not sound like much, but if your building project has stalled out because you can’t get bricks for love or money in DC, having a truck load of them show up makes a world of difference. And, if your building project hasn’t gotten started because there’s three tons of wreckage sitting on top of your building site, cleaning that up means you get to start moving.

Some days, it’s an inch at a time, but DC’s coming back.

Punishment duty is almost done for what’s left of the Public Corruption Department. They’ve got two more days, and then, Sunday morning, September 24th, they get to go home.

Tim knows he’s going to gather them all together again, talk to them at least once more.

But he’s still not sure what he’s going to say.

Trust. He’ll trust them, because he has to. Because this can’t work if he doesn’t, but… But unlike his ass kicking speech this one isn’t coming together as easily. He rolls his eyes at his typewriter. For some reason it’s not writing the speech for him.

He shrugs and goes back to system architecture. He’s got the answers for that.

“An easier week, Timothy?” Ducky’s asking as they do their weekly family supper.

“Yeah, Duck. Back to my roots. Programming. Then meetings with other programmers to talk about how to make this do what it’s supposed to.”

“Productive?” Penny asks him.

Tim nods. “Yeah. I think so. Like any really big project, it’ll take time, but… We’ll get it.”
“And your wayward agents?” Ducky inquires.

That gets a small groan out of Tim. “I’ve got to come up with something for them, by Sunday, but…” He stares around their home. “Right now, I’ve got nothing.”

The rest of the crew nod at that, knowing he’s having a hard time. He doesn’t have anything else to add to that, so the conversation whips along.

Tim keeps looking around, feeling like there’s something here, something useful, but he can’t touch it.

And he doesn’t, until about an hour later, when he’s carrying Sean and Anna to the bathroom. His eyes land on the Asshole Jar, which since the kids still can’t read, is still on the mantle, currently empty. (He has a feeling it will soon be retitled the Jerk Jar, because Molly’s got all of her letters down.)

He can hear Gibbs, real Gibbs, right now, a few steps behind him, talking to Molly about how Jackson and Mona don’t like baths, either, but they have to get them, too. And he can hear Gibbs in his head saying, “Rule 72: If it’s more than two years old, forgive it! Unless you are willing to rip our family apart, let it go.” Tim’s thinking he might be mashing 72 and 73 together with that, but… It’s close enough.

And the piece, the stupidly easy piece, the bit that he can’t believe he didn’t see before slips into place.

It’s not enough to trust them, he’s got to forgive them, even if only in his own head, first.

Another thought hits him, just as fast, and just as hard. He needs to forgive himself, and all the times he didn’t live up to the standards he’s setting for his men.

Wipe the slate clean, start new. All of them.

By the time tubby is done, he knows what he’s going to say to them on Sunday.

Tim’s just as careful about setting the scene for this as he was the first time.

He’s in his usual work clothing. What Tony calls his ‘dress for less’ loafers. They may not be fashionable, but they’re comfy, and they have good enough traction he can run easily in them. Black jeans, nice ones. No fraying or faded patches. Simple black leather belt, and though his FBI badge is mostly ceremonial, he’s wearing it, just like he did his NCIS badge. He’s got a feeling that’ll be true for the rest of his career here. He wants that mark of office, of what he’s doing and why he’s doing it, on his body. The shirt is new. Breena got it for him. It’s pink with a black check pattern. He’s not wearing a tie. He’s got a medium-gray sports jacket on top of that.

He’s clean shaven. His hair is its usual tamed down for work style. He folds his glasses, hooking them into the neck of his shirt. If they were to see him while he’s working in his office, he’d likely do that. Look away from the computer, take them off, and tuck them into the top button.

The Director talked to them before, now it’s time to be Boss or McGee.
He doesn’t have a podium this time. No microphone. No tricks, period. It’s just him, his voice, and them. They’re all on the floor, sort of milling around. He scoots back a bit, leaning against where the Constitution should be. He’s got to speak up, but he doesn’t have to yell. The acoustics in here are good.

“Hi.”

He can feel waves of extreme annoyance coming at him, and he accepts that.

“I know. You don’t want to be here a second longer than you need to. I’ll keep it short. We’re done. Punishment duty is over. Today, you pack up, go home, crash, rest, complain about me, whatever. Your time is your own, until Wednesday, when you start anew.

“As Probies.

“And you’re starting as Probies because Wednesday marks a blank slate. Everything that came before, it’s over. Forgotten. Forgiven. Done. Your records are gone. September 27, 2017 is now your first day at the FBI. We’re all starting from scratch.

“So, let’s start. ‘Hi, I’m Tim McGee. I’m the new Director of the Public Corruption Unit. You can call me Boss or McGee, and I’m looking forward to working with all of you. We are here with one job, and that’s to make sure that the guys who write the laws, and enforce the laws, live by them.

“Which means we’ve got to live by those laws, too. Every day from here on out, we’re the White Knights. We’re the ones who make sure that all those grand ideals like justice mean something. If that’s something you don’t want to do, no harm, no foul. Trust me, I understand playing fast and loose, and why you might want to. Hell, if you’re just sick of me, that’s fine, too. I’ll approve any transfer you ask for.

“Mr. Comey talked about the bad apples. If you want your very own pair of pruning shears and shovel, if you want to be the people who clean out the rot, if you want to be the people who make sure that the government works for the people, that it protects them, that it treats people fairly, then I have a job for you.

“Okay. That’s it. I’m done. Go home, rest, think. Wednesday morning, we start over.”

And for the first time in weeks, Tim’s feeling like himself.
Gibbs opens his door, ushering the dogs in. Then he steps through, closes it, and locks it.

For a second, that feels really odd.

Decades went by without him locking his door, but there are things in this house, home now, that he values and wants to keep safe.

Though, as he steps into a living room filled only with a very small dog and a fairly big one, the primary person he wants to be in this house isn’t here now. He sighs, heading through the living room to his kitchen, to pull out supper for him, Mona, and Jackson. It’s Monday. Abbi won’t be home until Friday.

They Skype (Speaking of things that are new: he not only knows what Skype is now, and knows how to use it, he also owns the equipment necessary to use it.) every night, but it’s not the same. Better than nothing. He vastly prefers going to bed and having at least a small glowing rectangle that allows him to hear her voice and see her face to just him and his bed, but…

It’s still lonely.

That little rectangle turns off eventually, and he’s still waking up on his own.

Or, like right now, he’s looking at one pork chop, one potato, and one beer. It’s dinner. It’ll do the job. And it’s a hell of a lot more fun to make two of them. Even more fun to watch her eat whatever it was he made. Better yet to sit down, share the meal, and some nights they talk, some nights they’re mostly quiet, but just having her there makes everything a thousand times better.

He half smirks and grabs for a bag of frozen green beans. He’ll even, on occasion, eat vegetables when he’s on his own, because she likes them, and it feels like cooking for both of them when he makes them.

Mona ambles over, nudging his hip with her muzzle.

Gibbs tosses her a green bean. She snaps it out of the air, and in a second Jackson appears, also looking for his green bean. Gibbs tosses him one and gets to seasoning up his dinner, listening to two dogs munching on frozen green beans.

This time of year, it’s too hot for a fire in the house, so Gibbs builds the fire in his grill, and waits for it to heat up. He settles himself in one of the wooden chairs on his back porch, beer in hand, tennis ball and ping pong ball in the other, tossing them around, letting Mona and Jackson zip around his yard chasing them.

It’s a perfect evening. Just starting to cool off. Clear sky pinking up with sunset. It rained yesterday, so the air isn’t too humid. It’d just be a hell of a lot more fun if he had someone in the chair next to him.
It’s not like he’d have much to say. Not today.

He, Fornell, and the doggies went to the Smithsonian. They’d both lived in DC for more than twenty years and somehow never managed to get to the Smithsonian.

Just two old guys, and two dogs strolling around. Talking, quietly, mostly about the exhibits, and a bit about a wedding that’s getting closer and closer, and a little, in not-quite-coded half-sentences about how if any of their future plans are going to work out, Fornell needs to learn to sail.

That’s on tap for next week. Get Fornell up to Semper, head out onto the bay, and start teaching an old dog some new tricks.

But that’s next week. The rest of this week, Fornell and Wendy are heading south, going to visit a few Virginia wineries, one of which just happens to be in Charlottesville, VA, coincidentally, less than twenty minutes away from where Emily Fornell is getting settled into her freshman year at UVA.

Apparently, Fornell may be going into something that could be called my-baby-went-off-to-college-and-I-haven’t-seen-her-in-nineteen-days,-HELP! mode. It’s likely both Wendy and Emily are humoring him, allowing him to head out on a mini-vacation, that just so happens to put him a hundred miles closer to his daughter than normal, and then take his daughter and wife out for dinner. He’s promised Wendy he won’t linger. Or try to monopolize Emily’s time. Or cry. Too much. Gibbs told him to hug Emily for him, and if he finds a really nice bottle of something kind of bubbly, to bring two cases of it back, because they don’t have anything champagne-like for the wedding.

Still, sitting here, next to his own empty chair, Gibbs is feeling a lot of sympathy for Fornell.

Mona bounds up, laying her head on Gibbs’ knee, happily accepting ear scratches, and playing a little bit of a half-hearted tug-of-war with him over who gets the tennis ball.

Eventually she lets go, and he tosses it, and Jackson tries the same gambit, which doesn’t work nearly as well because he can’t reach Gibbs’ knee without a stepstool.

Eventually, the grill heats up, and the potato and pork chop get cooked, and eventually Gibbs eats them, cutting a small piece of each for Jackson and a bigger piece for Mona. They both know they’re allowed to have one bite of whatever it is he’s eating, as long as it’s okay for dogs to eat it.

They are significantly less clear on what constitutes ‘okay for dogs to eat.’ But they know not to whine if he shakes his head and says, “Not for dogs.”

He sighs a bit as he’s in the kitchen, cleaning off one plate. He’s got a dishwasher, but there’s not too much point to it for one plate, one fork, one knife, and one cup.

After dinner, he settles in (on Abbi’s sofa) and turns on the all westerns channel. There’s a movie on. It’s black and white (Which bodes well, he likes the old ones better than the new ones.), but he doesn’t immediately recognize it.

After five minutes of what he’ll charitably call the worst movie ever made, he knows why he doesn’t recognize it. He’s seen every western worth watching, probably about twenty times. This is not one of them.

He’s about to call Tony, tell him to turn on the TV, just to have someone to bitch about this with.
(Since they’ve been running together, he’s noticed that he likes talking with Tony about movies and TV. Somehow, what was annoying when it was distracting him from the latest killer, is actually a lot of fun when it’s distracting him from another mile of jogging through hot and humid DC in summertime. This has resulted in him actually watching, especially since he’s got free time coming out of his ears right now, some of the movies Tony likes, or likes to complain about.) But he notices that it’s bedtime at the DiNozzo house, which means he’s helping to put Dave down, or he’s still at work, and either way, he doesn’t need to be blathering about how cosmically bad the acting in this thing is.

Gibbs glances at the clock. Only one more hour until Skype-time.

“Hey!” And with one syllable, Gibbs’ whole world lights back up again.

He’s in bed, ready for the end of the day, lying on his side, looking at his phone. And right now, also in bed, lying down, looking at her phone, is Abbi.

“Hi back,” he says. He doesn’t say anything else, not right then, but it’s clear by the softness in his eyes, and smile, that this is the best moment he’s had all day.

And it’s clear from the look on hers, that this is the best moment of hers, too.

“So…” he says, leading her on, looking forward to hearing what she’s been up to today. He can see by the extra pinkness in her skin and the wild frizz of her hair that she’s been out on the water today.

“Ryan, Concetti, and Murph.” She rolls her eyes, sighs, and exhales, long and loud. Then she starts to rub her forehead, and winces. What looks a little pink in his monitor might be a real sunburn. “On the upside, they aren’t on the take, doing anything illegal, or about to sell us out to a drug cartel.”

He knows that tone of voice. “Because together they’re not quiet smart enough to count to thirty one without taking off a shoe?”

“Exactly.” She groans again. “Okay. No. Not really. Ryan’s been out of FLETCh for two years, and Concetti and Murph are even greener. If I could pop each of them with an experienced agent, I’d have the making of three good investigators.”

“But you don’t have the experienced agents.” It’s a statement. He knows every branch of government is scrambling for people right now.

“I don’t. Every experienced agent I have is leading his own team or in management.” She sighs again. “I’m honestly starting to think of booting them back down the line. Which’ll cause screaming because just about none of them want to be running down perps again, let alone taking the hit to their income.”

Gibbs nods at that. “Looking hard at any of them?”

“Me. A few others.”

For a second, he does feel a little alarmed at the idea of her in the field again, fulltime, but he sees the look on her face. That, like his and Fornell’s go-out-and-rescue-the-girls plan, it’s more a fantasy than a reality. It’s a way of coping with a situation with no good answers.
“You going to ask them?”

“I’ll ask. And I’ll beg my superiors to see if I can keep them at their current ranks and pay. If they don’t actually have to take a career hit, they may go for it.”

“Good luck.”

“Yeah. I’m counting the days until the next FLETC class gets out.”

Gibbs smirks. He knows why. That’s the class that is filled with only experienced investigators moving from state and local PDs to the Federal level. In an effort to get more people to the Federal level who can at least correctly tell their ass from their elbows, most Federal Law Enforcement made offers to count years spent on a local or state PD toward determining seniority at the Federal Level.

“All you’ve got to do is woo them away from Tim.”

She growls at that, mumbling something about bigger budgets and fancier toys.

“We always had the same problem, too. So, besides green, how were they?”

He sees the tired in her eyes, and the long-suffering look. Rewind seventeen years, and that would have been him with DiNozzo and McGee. It’s not that her guys are necessarily bad, they’re just not experienced, and not experienced working together.

“We get a call out for an abandoned boat, so off we go…” Gibbs settles back against his pillow to listen to her story.

It’s later, a lot later, when they hang up.

He knows that the kids do more than just talk with Skype. And once upon a time, Gibbs was good with a hot letter or sexy photos. (The idea of taking some and sending them to her go skittering through his mind, but nine tenths of the fun of those photos was they took them together. He does put that onto his list of plans for this weekend, while killing the idea of doing it himself.) But, looking at his phone, the idea of ‘doing more’ seems… lonely.

Granted, he’s alone, in a room with two sleeping (snoring) dogs. Lonely’s pretty much the default setting right now.

He rolls over, putting his phone back on the charger, and flicks off the light.

“I know that look,” Tony says the next morning as he’s getting Dave into the stroller.

Gibbs grunts at him, while tying his sneakers.

“Yep, definitely one of those days.” He snaps the clasp on Dave’s stroller seatbelt, and makes sure his pacifier is within reach. (At four and a half months old, Dave is starting to reach for things with various levels of success. He normally gets his hand to somewhere near whatever it is is located, but if he can’t see it, there’s no shot at all of him figuring out where it is by feeling it against him.)

Tony rolls his shoulders, and stretches out his thighs and hips. He knows if he skips that step he’s Going to be hurting later today, and then pretending he doesn’t hear the comments from Johnson and Spader about him being in the bad mood.

Once they’re two blocks into the run, with the dogs loping along, and Gibbs and Tony’s various creaky joints warmed up and moving properly, Tony says, “We can take the dogs, you know. Or Mona. Mrs. Elthel would let her stay with us for a few days.”

Gibbs shoots Tony the Huh? look.

“If you wanted to go to Florida for a few days, we could take Mona. You could probably take Jackson on the plane. Between him being the size of a gerbil and a hearing ear dog, they’d let him on. Or you could call up McDirector and see if he could swing something for you, get you on the next FBI plane to Miami, or I can see if Leon’ll stick you on a transport.”

Gibbs blinks, hard.

Somehow, it didn’t occur to him that he doesn’t have to sit on his ass here in DC waiting for Abbi to get back.

He’s retired.

Tony smiles at him. “Now you’re looking better.”

He hasn’t thought of it for years, but as he’s getting his shower, going from sweaty-old-guy post-workout into, vaguely Old-Spice-scented grandpa-guy, it wanders through his mind.

When he was engaged to Shannon, he had this fantasy. (Well, he had a lot of them, but this one was fairly tame.) When he was walking rounds, or in the mess, or anywhere he didn’t need to pay much attention but was still in public, this one would tend to wander into his mind.

He would drive up to Grove City, figure out where her car was parked, and then just wait for her.

He could see it so clearly. She’d be done with her day, carrying her books, maybe walking with a few girlfriends, not really paying attention to the car. The important bit was the image of her, hair blowing in the wind, light summer dress snapping against her hips and knees, as she chats with her buddies. Eventually, she’d say goodbye to her buddies, turn toward the car, and there he’d be, leaning against the door, huge grin on his face, waiting for her.

Unfortunately, he didn’t get the chance to do it. The only time he got enough leave to get up and back, she knew he was coming because they had things like actually getting married planned for those days.

But… now. He’s retired. He’s got time, oodles of time.

“I see he suggested it,” Ziva says that morning, after he’s done with his shower, and it’s just them and Dave. She’s pretty much got her routine with Dave down, and she doesn’t exactly need the help, but it makes both of them feel better.

Less at loose ends after they finished up with the FBI.
Neither of them are feeling a need to go back. There’s only so much paper shuffling Gibbs or Ziva can do, but they do have a lot more unfilled hours now that they aren’t helping Tim out. The FBI, for her especially, was boring, but there’s something to be said for boring, when it’s useful.

Gibbs nods at her.

“Are you going to do it?”

He doesn’t answer that directly. Instead he pulls out his phone and says, “Grocery list up to date?”

“Yes, all you have to do is synch it.”

Gibbs glares at the phone a bit, but successfully gets the app synched. The McPalmers have an app that lets all four of them put things on a group grocery list, and keep it updated, so when any of them happens to be in a store that has whatever they’re looking for, they can just grab it, delete it off the list, and move on. When the next one walks into a store, opening up the list, it reflects what they need.

This has resulted in fewer moments where there is no toilet paper at House Palmer and 3 bottles of honey at House McGee.

And, since Gibbs has been doing a lot of grocery runs for/with House DiNozzo, and since Tony was bitching about the morning where there was no coffee at all in their place even though it was on the list (Ziva’s list, Gibbs did the shopping), to Jimmy, who smugly whipped out his phone to show off their new goody, their branch of the family has it, too.

But, it only takes three seconds to synch, so he didn’t exactly buy himself a lot of stalling time.

Ziva’s patient. She’s waiting for him, a bit of a smile on her face. “I’m sure Leon would get you a place on a transport if you asked,” she says when he puts the phone back into his pocket.

Gibbs is fairly sure he would, too, except he can’t imagine making himself ask for an empty seat on a transport so he can visit his fiancée.

“Mona wouldn’t be a problem?”

Mona looks up at Gibbs, a question in her eyes. She knows her name, she knows the word problem, she knows the tone that goes with being scolded, and that normally goes with problem, but Gibbs isn’t using it, so…

Gibbs pats her. “Good girl. We’re just talking.”

“No! We’ll be fine with her.” Ziva says. “Go. Have fun. Come back with a tan.”

Gibbs smirks at that.

Heading home that night, with the dogs in the car, sitting next to them, Gibbs can’t help but fall into that fantasy again.

It’s different now.

First off, he’s got no idea what Abbi’s driving, because it’s a rental.
And he doesn’t actually know where she’s saying. It’s a Radison, but… There’s got to be more than one of them in Miami.

But he does know where she works. Sort of. It cannot possibly be that difficult to locate the CGIS headquarters in Miami, and he’s got the suspicion that if he were to call Abbi’s office, and talk to her secretary (because she has one now) that he could likely come away from that conversation with not just an address, but directions, and perhaps what room she’s using for her base of operations while she’s down there.

He’s seeing it. There’s the main doors to the office. They’re glass. Probably a little foggy, too much AC on the inside, humid air outside, that’d cause a little condensation. And in his fantasy, there’s a convenient bit of wall for him to lean against. She’s walking out, blurred by the glass for the first few steps, maybe still talking to whichever green investigators she’s got tonight, and then she’s outside, sending them off for the night, heading toward her car. He could slip up behind her, keeping pace, just far enough back as to not trigger her “I’m being stalked” sense, and he could say something like, “Can I buy you a drink?” (He’s not sure exactly what he’s going to say, yet.) And she’d whip around, see him, and light up like flipping the switch on a Christmas tree in a pitch black room.

He’s smiling by the time he gets home.

And by the time he’s got dinner in front of him, next to his computer, he’s growling.

There are certain things Gibbs just doesn’t do. Arrange air travel is one of those things. For a solid twenty years, if he needed to go somewhere, he just said “I’m going here” and someone (usually Tim) made it happen. The last time he bought his own plane tickets he was in an airport in Mexico, holding his passport in one hand, and a wad of cash on the other, trying to get a last minute spot on a red eye because Ziva was in his basement.

He hasn’t been on a commercial flight since they went to Montana, and for that one Abbi used CGIS to cover the travel.

So, sitting in his kitchen, staring at his computer, seeing that apparently the price the airline quotes is for you to travel, just yourself, naked, with no bags, and that they’ll practically charge you extra for the air you breathe on the damn plane is killing him.

He’s halfway between scooping up some stuff, grabbing the dogs and sailing down (he should get there just in time for Abbi to get on a plane to go back to DC for the weekend) and calling Leon and Tim, looking to see who’s got the first flight to Miami from anywhere between Baltimore and Richmond with an empty seat on it.

When he realizes he can’t find anything about Jackson, and how to bring a service dog on the plane, he gives up and calls Tim.

“You got an empty seat on anything going to Miami anytime this week?”

He can feel Tim blink, because that’s a bit more out of the blue than he usually is.

“Tony said you’ve got that jet. Could I get a seat on it?”

That gets Tim up to speed. He knows who is in Miami, so he doesn’t need a picture drawn for him for why Gibbs wants to go.
“I can find out. Well, Jennifer can. I probably can’t just send you to Miami all on your own…”

“I know. But if it’s going there anyway.”

“I don’t see why not. Any particular day or time?”

“She’s flying back Friday afternoon. I’ll hitch a ride with her. I just need to get down there before Thursday night.”

“I’ll see what I can do.”

“Thanks. And if you can’t… how did you get us flights when you were at NCIS?”

He hears Tim snort a quick laugh at that. “Trust me, Gibbs, it isn’t going to work. I had to program it myself and hack half a dozen databases to find out what transports were going where, when. They don’t like to have a huge, easy-to-find list of where everyone and thing is going to be and how it’s going to get there.”

Gibbs sighs. That makes a lot of sense to him.

“Karen, Leon’s secretary, she’s got a copy of my program for that. If you want to ask her, she can probably hook you up. If you don’t mind going on a Herc or something like that.”

Gibbs doesn’t. He looks at the two dogs at his feet. Mona’s doing her usual post dinner chilling out. Jackson is prancing around trying to get her to play with him.

He tries to imagine taking Jackson on a Herc, or any other sort of military transport. It’s not a pretty image.

“Probably need a plane designed for people.”

“I’ll see what I can do.”

The correct answer is: Thursday morning, Dulles International, 8:00 AM. It’s not the jet. It is a chartered flight for ten DC Agents heading to the Miami branch for a seminar and training session on international kidnappings.

The plane’s a puddle jumper, and it holds 12 people. Leroy Jethro Gibbs, and Jackson Gibbs, have seats 11 and 12.

An hour into the flight Gibbs knows several things:

Jackson, who is normally of a very sweet temperament hates to fly. Gibbs wonders if it’s possible for dogs to get motion sickness, because he’s not throwing up, but he’s lying on Gibbs’ lap, utterly miserable, whining piteously at him, as Gibbs gently rubs his belly, hoping he’ll feel better.

Of the ten agents on this plane, seven are going to Miami to party. Three may be going to learn something about kidnappings, or just don’t drink. Whatever the reason, the plane offers complimentary adult beverages, and most of the agents (and Gibbs for that matter) are partaking of them.

Gibbs closes his eyes, gently petting Jackson, and does his usual pretending to sleep on the plane routine. Sometimes, on military transports, he genuinely falls asleep, but this one, excited for where he’s going, it’s not happening.

The plane is loud, but he listens to conversations around him. He’s thinking that if Tim’s gonna get him on the flight, he should at least keep an ear open for him. There aren’t any mentions of Director McGee. There are several of how the seminar will be over by 2:00 and then it’s beach time. Apparently there’s something called Joe’s Crab Shack, which a bunch of them will be hitting tonight, so Gibbs makes a mental note to avoid that.

Jackson’s ears perk up as soon as his feet hit pavement. They’re back on the ground, that infernal buzzing, vibrating, horror machine is gone, and he’s in a new place filled with new sounds, new smells, and new sights.

Jackson’s getting pretty good at acting like a service dog. (Though it did take the Gibbs Stare to get the TSA guy to believe Jackson was a hearing ear dog when they went through security.) But sometimes, he’s still a puppy, an excited puppy, in a new place with lots of new things, so, even with his little Hearing Ear Dog jacket, he’s still sort of dancing around, trying to see everything.

Gibbs eventually picks him up, because three times now he’s just about been run over by other travelers not paying nearly as much attention to their luggage as Jackson is.

Picked up, Jackson can see even more of Miami International, and his little tail is whipping back and forth so fast it’s barely visible.

Gibbs is carrying Jackson on his forearm, like a small furry football, and weaving through the crowd. Somehow, somewhere, there’s a place to pick up an Uber, he’s just got to find it, and then…

Abbi’s secretary knows that Gibbs’ll be hanging around outside of the CGIS building. Which means that if someone calls security about the old guy and the dog just hanging around, they know he’s not a threat.

Abbi doesn’t know that he’s waiting for her, sniper patient.

His target is almost in sight, and he can’t wait to see her.

It could be said, as he strolls out of Miami International, that Gibbs has something of a spring in his step. (Jackson could certainly be said to have a perky little wag of his tail.)

---

It is absolutely true that Gibbs can do a fabulous job pretending not to be bothered by the weather. 100 degrees out, 80% humidity, no AC, he’ll drink coffee and look cool doing it. Everyone else is, literally, freezing to death around him, he keeps standing, and tries to take his jacket off.

But it’s not that he’s not bothered by weather, it’s that he’s exceptionally good at focusing on the bigger thing, and using that to pull his mind away from whatever else is going on.

Miami in September is hot. And muggy. And if he’s reading those clouds right, his plan of waiting quietly for Abbi’s going to get very wet, very soon.

And, while he can do a good job of looking like he’s totally cool and unperturbed by the weather, even Gibbs looks like a drowned rat when he stands out in a soaking rain for hours. And Jackson, especially soaking wet Jackson, is not going to help him look any less drowned-rattish.

Nope, put the two of them in a soaking rain, and instead of Abbi lighting up with joy at seeing them, she’s going to take one look, begin to laugh, and then tell them to get inside. And, instead of a hot, romantic evening, she’s going to be hunting for towels to dry them off, and making some, ‘poor baby,’ noises at Jackson.

So, like any plan that’s finally brushing up against reality, Gibbs starts to reshape things, fast, as huge drops of rain begin to patter out of the sky.

Coffee. Miami knows how to make coffee. Good God! The only part they don’t have down is these stupid thimble-sized cups. Who drinks coffee one ounce at a time? Miamians, apparently.

Gibbs has six tiny, empty, cups of Cubano coffee in front of him, he’s feeling a really splendid buzz. The people near him are speaking Spanish, and he’s planning.

His first plan, calling up Abbi’s secretary, finding out where she’s staying, and then heading over, picking the lock, and letting himself in burned before he finished the first of his thimbles of coffee. He can’t pick an electronic lock, and he doesn’t have a badge to get the hotel manager to let him in.

But, that plan gives birth to plan B.

And he likes plan B.

He sends Holly, Abbi’s secretary a text. In Miami, want to surprise her. Where's her hotel?

He’s pretty gratified to see she calls him back. “Gibbs?”

“Come on, you know better than to text for something like that.”

“I normally do. They put something in the coffee here.”

“Yeah, I bet. What do you want to do?”

“Okay, I know I can’t get into the room, and I know she’ll go back there sooner or later. So, head over, settle in, wait. I’ll grab some flowers or something, write a note, and have the desk clerk put it in her room. She gets in, finds the note. Normally, if I do something like that she calls… Anyway. When we’re talking, I’ll knock on the door…”

He can feel the smile beaming at him from DC. “Softie.”

“Today. So, where is she staying?”

Holly chuckles. “She’s at the Ocean Breeze Radison. Look, you want me to call and see if I can get you into the room?”

“If you can, I’d love it. If not, don’t worry about it.”

“I’ll call, see if they’re willing to go along with it.”

“Okay. I’ll get some flowers, and head over.”
They’re orchids. He doesn’t know what type, other than they’re pretty. Dark purple and bright pink. He doesn’t go for an outlandish note, just a simple, “I miss you. –J”

Depending on how closely she’s paying attention, that’ll be the first hint something is up. The note is in his handwriting.

He hands them over to the lady at the hotel desk, and she’s very polite, but she makes it clear that there’s no shot in hell of him getting a key to Abbi’s room, or even, for that matter, what the number is. (Which, unfortunately, Holly didn’t know.) She won’t put the flowers in Abbi’s room, either.

She will, happily, hand them to her, when she gets in.

Gibbs appreciates the security, even as he’s gritting his teeth at the tattered remains of Plan B.

There is a bar. It’s a really nice bar. They have drinks that cost more than entire meals, good meals, out on the town, fancy date night meals, that he bought Shannon back in the day.

He’s drinking coffee. Real cups of it. And, this is the first time he’s ever done this at a bar, but he’s ordered decaf. Apparently, there is a point where even he’s had too much caffeine, and it the correct answer is eight Cubanos (a normal sized coffee cup) in an hour.

By that point even his teeth were buzzing, and he decided it was a good plan to cut himself off if he ever wanted to sleep again.

So, in a bar, with a decaf coffee, overlooking the entrance to Abbi’s hotel, he does have time to work on Plan C.

Plan C…

He’s staring at his cup of coffee as Jackson sits at his feet watching everything around them avidly. He seems especially interested in the people in the lobby going back and forth.

When Gibbs has been working away from home, he gets done with work, goes to find dinner, eats it, and then returns to his hotel room. Or, he works, gets hungry, keeps working, orders food, eats it, keeps working, and then goes to his hotel.

And there’s no reason for him to think Abbi does anything differently.

There’s no reason for him to expect her to come back here before having dinner. Going home before eating dinner is something you do when there’s someone home to share that dinner with.

And there’s no reason for her to be thinking that someone would be waiting for her.

Gibbs sips his coffee. He’s got time. He’s got an internet connection. And he’s got a plan.
Working hard? Pops up on Abbi’s phone just about the time the two of them would normally be sitting down for dinner.

She rolls her shoulders. She’s not, really, working hard. She still with Ryan, Concetti, and Murph, and they’re slowly working their way through a list of leads.

Again, they aren’t bad, they’re just slow.

Not sure if this counts as working. We’re chipping our way through the leads.

A moment later: When was lunch?

Abbi smirks at that. You want to call two cups of coffee, three power bars, and half a banana lunch?

No. 1784 W. Palm. There’s a table waiting for you. Go eat. Now.

She sees that and smiles. Then she looks at her guys. She’s sure they won’t mind an hour or two without The Boss hovering. Abbi stands up, gets her jacket, and says, “I’m going to get dinner. Keep at it.” She glances at the clock. If she’s going to eat, and then get back to the hotel, grab a shower, then call Jethro… “Finish with the guys you’re on now, and then quitting time. See you in the morning.”

Her three ducklings look pleased by that.

And Abbi feels pleased to be getting out of their hair for a few hours.

On my way.

A moment later she gets back. Good. Enjoy it. Talk later.

Wouldn’t miss it.

I love you.

Me, too.

Her navigator software says that 1784 W. Palm is only twenty-five minutes from her. It also tells her that it’s a little seafood place on the beach. After this afternoon’s thunderstorm, a bit of seafood on the clear, and now much less humid, beach sounds awfully good.

Maybe a cold beer, some oysters or clams… Conch. She’s in Miami. Get conch. Conch, beer…

She sighs. Fuck it, cold margarita. Fresh lime, salt, salt air, breeze, something sweet and briny on her plate…

Yeah, she can see that.

She smiles at the version of Gibbs in her heads.
It’s not small; small conjures up images of a restaurant with ten or so tables. This is a shack. There are three tables, a short bar, and maybe a table in the back. The behind the bar kitchen area, all of which she can see is a door with a window, looks like it’s probably larger than the rest of the place.

There are two old guys at the bar, and a bartender slowly wiping out a glass.

As Abbi looks around, she’s wondering how Gibbs knows about this place, and what’s about to happen next. As she’s looking, she notices that the front table, the one closest to the open window looking over the ocean has the most beautiful orchid sitting on it.

The bartender sees her notice it, and smiles. “They’re for you, miss.”

His voice is thick and rich, a strong hint of Creole, so he, or his parents, are likely from Haiti.

There’s no note on the flowers, but she smiles to see them, gently touching the petals, slipping off her jacket, and rolling her shoulders. She can see the beach and sea from here, and her eyes are far away, catching the light glinting off the waves.

Abbi looks around. She doesn’t see a menu, and she’s wondering if this is the kind of place where you bring the fish and they cook it for you. She supposes she could ask a lot of questions, and get up and find out what’s going on, but right now…

She’s going to sit back, and watch the waves.

She knows that Gibbs has something going. She can feel his fingerprints all over this. She just doesn’t know what it is, yet.

---

Gibbs has been watching. He can see her from his perch behind and to the left of where she’s sitting, she can’t see him. For a moment, he enjoys looking. She’s in full-on work mode, pants suit, crisp button down, ‘professional’ makeup, but he can see her start to relax, let the day ease away.

She’s settled in, looking comfy. The breeze is starting to toy with her hair, lifting tendrils of it off of her shoulders. He smiles, grabs the mojitos, and heads over.

---

Abbi feels it a second before she sees him. She doesn’t hear him. No one hears Gibbs when he doesn’t want to be heard. There’s just a Gibbs feel, and whenever he gets too close, she knows he’s near. The smile is already spreading across her face as she turns towards the hand and forearm placing a drink in front of her.

Gibbs is grinning back down at her, as he leans in for a sweet hello kiss.

A moment later, when he pulls back, and sits down next to her, on the same side of the table, he simply says, “I missed you.”

She’s smiling, eyes lit up, face beaming at him, slightly shaking her head. “I didn’t…” Then a tiny yip, and the feel of two little feet against her shin answers one of her questions. At least half of the family is here.

She bends down, picks up Jackson, and lets him sit in her lap as she kisses Gibbs again.
“Is Mona going to appear out of nowhere?”

“Nah, she’s with Ziver.” Gibbs sits next to her, arm around her shoulders, just touching her to touch her, feeling really splendid all over.

Leon, the owner of the place, shows up a few seconds later, with a large plate of crispy fried conch, long, slow simmered greens, and hush puppies.

“I didn’t expect this.” She’s still grinning as Gibbs picks up a bite of conch, and feeds it to her.

“I didn’t, either, but you know what?”

“What?”

“I’m retired.” He’s still grinning, too, also munching down a very tasty bite of conch. “And you know what that means?” He’s feeling kind of silly, and, for him, very talky. It’s possible he’s still got too much coffee in his system, or maybe he’s just really happy right now.

She’s looking a little less giddy as she says, “What?”

“I’m not tied to DC. I don’t have to stay there. There are no cases I have to solve. There are no bodies I need to find names or killers for. Home’s where you are, and yeah, I’ve got the dogs, and the kids, and all the rest of it, so I can’t be gone all the time, but I don’t have to stay there every single day. There’s no reason why I can’t join you for some of this,” he smirks a bit, “as long as you don’t mind sharing dinner and a bed with me at the end of the day.”

She laughs. “You’re retired.”

“I’m retired, and I just, finally, figured out what the hell that’s good for.”

She’s still laughing. “Took you long enough.”

“I know! So, instead of talking to a tiny little picture of me. How about we share some food, and you fill me in on how today went?”

Abbi takes a bite of the greens, makes a soft purring sound, knowing the only reason they’re in front of them is for her, and then says, “Okay, so, last we left off…” and proceeds to get him up to date on the latest adventures of Director Borin Breaking In Her Teams.

It’s many hours later, and Jethro is still awake.

He’s not shocked by this.

(He’s also beginning to appreciate thimble-sized cups of coffee. That damn stuff needs a warning label or something. He’s sincerely looking forward to getting Tony and Fornell a bunch of them. Without the warning label.)

Abbi’s asleep. Jackson is asleep. She’s curled onto her side in front of him, and he’s spooned up close. Jackson’s taking advantage of one of the sofa cushions.

It’s finally, really hitting him that he can do whatever he wants. Not every day. Not all the time. But… He has some money. He’s got buddies with connections. He’s got a truck and a boat. And if his fiancée has to work all over the place this next year, then he can go with her.
She’s got a few more weeks here. Then New Orleans. New Orleans. Pride’s been telling him for years to get his ass over to New Orleans and he always had the job or something else, and… Abby’s brother runs that place. He knows Abby loves it, but Luca could run a roach motel and Abby would love it. Tim says it’s really nice, too, and he’s a lot less likely to love something just because Luca Scuito runs it.

Abbi could do the first few days, and if he were to get in on Wednesday or something, they could stay there Wednesday and Thursday night. He could go find fun stuff, check things out, have something to tell her about when she’s done with her stories, and hunt down amazing food for dinner and…

He’s retired.

He’s in a hotel room, holding his love, eyes wide open. He kisses the back of her neck, mind buzzing with ideas.

He didn’t have a great honeymoon idea, namely because sail off into the sunset is a terrible idea when the nearest body of water is the Potomac and it’s January 1st. But maybe he doesn’t need one. Maybe they just have time at home, relaxing after the wedding. Maybe, he makes sure they get a whole bunch of little, fun treats. At least one a week. He knows she’s got the job, and he knows she won’t have hours for sightseeing or the rest of it, but he can damn well make sure that she gets one really excellent meal a week and a night in a really good hotel with some great company.

He can damn well do that!

If CGIS is going to drag her all over the country, he can make sure that she’s got at least one really good memory from each of those trips.

One other thought comes to mind. Shannon loved pictures. And she took them because she enjoyed it, but also because she wanted them to have memories. She thought it was important for them to have actual, physical things to remember each other and what they did.

Gibbs is sure of one other thing, he’s damn well going to learn how to use the camera on his phone. Because they’re going to have pictures. He doesn’t care if he’s the only guy left on earth who still prints photos out. His home is going to have pictures, of both of them, doing fun stuff, together.

Even if it is only one or two days a week.

Chapter End Notes

Hi All,

Okay, so March kicked my ass. It just did. I am hopeful that things are getting better, but… Yeah. I wrote just about every day. I got more than 80 pages of stuff done. And… Yep… Exposition and plot dump of doom.

So, I’m going to try to end it sweet and fluffy. And here’s hoping for a better April.
“You know how it goes, Breena.”

Breena glares at Dr. Jun, who is supposed to be telling her that Donnie is on the way.

“I know. The only thing you want to hear is me saying, ‘It’s a boy,’ to the background of a crying baby. He’s on his way. You’re three centimeters dilated. He’s at positive one station. He’ll get moving soon.”

Breena glares again.

“I know. You’re done. Your due date is October 5\textsuperscript{th} and the induction date is October 20\textsuperscript{nd}. We won’t be going past then. The longest this is possibly going to go is another twenty-four days.”

Breena really glares at that. Then she winces. That was a contraction, and it lasts a decently long time. Jun smiles at her. “That could be the start of things. Get dressed, go home, give me a call when they’re four minutes apart.”

“News?” Jeannie asks when Breena gets back to work. (Glaring at her belly, which has not deigned to contract since applying clothing and leaving the doctor’s office.)

Breena shakes her head. “He’s fine. Looks determined to hang around like Molly did, but fine.”

“Blood pressure?”

“Fine, Mom.” It had been a trifle high at her last checkup. “I was running late and tried to hurry to get to the appointment.” She’d attempted to jog. It wasn’t pretty, and her blood pressure was high when they checked it and borderline when they checked again at the end of the appointment.

“Okay. I was thinking, instead of sleeping on your sofa, how about I bring an air mattress?”

Breena’s mouth opens, and she looks shocked.

“Oh, honey, come on, you know that sofa’s fine for sitting but not sleeping. After Anna, my back was aching for a week.”

Fortunately, that buys Breena a good two seconds to think, because her brain’s whizzing around with the fact that when Molly and Anna were born, her mom came home with them, stayed with them, and made sure Jimmy and Breena both got at least one four hour stretch a night of uninterrupted sleep.

And, obviously, she doesn’t see any reason why she wouldn’t do that again.

But Breena does.

“Uh… Okay… Um… Shit.”
“Breena?” Jeannie’s looking really concerned. Breena rarely curses, especially around her mom.

“Look. Uh…” She swallows. Part of this is playing a role. If she’s going to sell the big lie, all the little truths have to look solid. Part of it is thinking fast, trying not to look too rattled. “Okay. Mom… We don’t talk about it because a lot of people,” and the way she says a lot of people it’s clear she means Dad, “think it’s weird, but… Tim and Abby’ll be there when we bring Donnie home.”

“That’s weird?” Jeannie isn’t stupid, so she knows she doesn’t have anything approaching the whole story here. Tim and Abby staying over may be odd, but it’s not weird.

“No. Or, at least, not the part I’m thinking. It’s… Okay… You know how we share a space at the house?”

Jeannie nods.

“We built our wing of the house together because we knew we got on, and it just seemed easier, you know?”

“Four hands make light work.” Jeannie looks wary as she says that. Speaking of weird, yes, the first time they visited, Ed noticed that the McGees and the Palmers were sharing a wing, and a bathroom, and the kids were all in the same room, and yes, he did think that was weird.

“Exactly. And… Mom, it’s so much easier. All of it. Dinner, keeping eyes on the kids, all of. And… we all get to Friday with a spring in the step and a perky mood…”

“I noticed that.” And so did Ed, which is part of why weird didn’t ever turn into anything other than some backhanded, and quiet comments about Jimmy not making enough money for them to deck out their section of the house for themselves and having to share with the McGees. Jeannie had shushed him, because they haven’t asked, won’t ask, and don’t know how the financing for the house went. But, if they decided they wanted it fancy, and had to double up with Tim and Abby to get the sort of fancy they wanted, Jeannie was fine with that, after all, they may share a bathroom, but not a bedroom, so…

Yeah, kind of weird, but when Ed would speculate, she’d hush him with a look and the occasional sharp poke.

“Yeah, because those nights are easy. We break up all the jobs and share them around, and mornings work the same way. And… at first, we’d spend Friday and Saturday nights at the House, and really liked it. It’s so much easier, and the girls liked it, and then Sean comes, and… And even with the extra hour and a half of driving to get to work, we’re staying Sundays, too, because it’s still easier, and… And the extra drive is stupid, so… We’ve been living with them, our house or theirs, for almost a year now. It makes for cramped quarters, but happier adults. One of us is on baby duty each night, which means we each get to sleep three out of four nights. When Tim or Abby’s on baby duty, Jimmy and I can be on our own—“

“That’s what your dad walked in on?” Jeannie asks. Breena can’t tell what she’s thinking, but it doesn’t feel great. Not horrible, either, but… she’s being careful as she speaks.

“Basically. It was Tim’s night for the kids, so we made a night of it for us. And that’s why Tim was there when he pulled the gun on Dad. We move around from place to place, so if he’s looking for a place to crash during the day, get some solid sleep without little guys poking him, he might end up at our place.”

Jeannie’s watching her daughter, nodding slowly. “Uh huh… Weird.”
“Or gross. Some people think it’s gross. But for me… I mean, we did this with Sean, too. I’ll nurse during the day, and some of the night feeds, but once it’s bedtime, someone else will bring Donnie to me, someone else will get all the other kid stuff. Someone else will get at least one, maybe two of his bottle feeds a night, so I can sleep and heal. When Donnie’s on all bottle feeds at night, we’ll rotate with baby duty…”

“And it’s easier. Yes, I get that. There have certainly been times when I would have liked another woman in the house.”

Breena nods. Her mom is being honest with that. House, business, three little girls, yeah, there were times she would have killed for an extra set of hands.

But there’s a reason why they didn’t have those extra hands. Jeannie and Ed have a very set idea of what a family looks like, and it doesn’t involve living with your husband, and his best friend, and wife, and kids.

Jeannie sits there, staring at her daughter. She takes a few deep, calming breaths. “Easier.” Her voice is very dry. “Are you and your sisters trying to give your father a stroke? Would it have really have been that hard to live without them for a week, let me come over, help with Donnie, be happily blind, and then go back to whatever this is?”

Breena stares her mom right in the eye. “Yes. It’s… easier, and happy, and all that’s true, but this is true, too, it’s not home if they aren’t there.”

Jeannie rubs her head, wondering idly. “Almost a year?”

Breena nods.

“Wonderful.” Her voice is sharp. Then her eyes go wide. “Tell me that is Jimmy’s son.”

“Just like his brother and sisters, he’s a Palmer. He… just… will probably look a lot like his cousin Sean.”

Jeannie moans.

And Breena knows this is the part she’s been building up to. If she’s going to have any functional relationship with her parents from here on out, this is the lie she needs to nail. “NO! You can think the rest of this is gross or weird or whatever, but you do not get to groan about our boy. NO. They held Molly with us when we had her baptized. They held us when we lost Jon. They were there when we got the testing for Anna. And when we told them they were trying again, and because we were living together then, they saw the stress and the fear as we got ready for the first pregnancy test, and… No. You do not get to moan about our loves offering us clean DNA.”

“Offering clean DNA? Is that what you’re going to call it?” Jeannie’s voice is shattered glass sharp, and she looks so horribly disappointed in this whole thing.

And Breena sells the big lie. “What the hell else would I call it?”

Jeannie blinks. “Wait…”

“Wait what? Why would I wait? We love these people dearly and they saw us hurting, knew there was a way to cut the fear and pain down, and stepped up. Why the hell would I wait about that?”

“Just… How’d you get that DNA?”
Breena pulls her epic, annoyed, insulted teenager eye roll out and says, “My husband’s a doctor, Mom. He and Abby have absolutely no problem obtaining a sterile specimen jar and a plastic nozzle syringe. What the hell were you thinking?”

Jeannie eyes Breena again, and Breena eyes back just as hard.

“Oh.”

“Yeah. And just to make sure all bases are clear, Jimmy has been there for every second of this child’s existence. And Abby’s known the whole time. She’s the one who brought it up at first. We’re living together, so she knew we were charting, and getting ready for the next try, and she saw the fear… Anyway, she’s the one who suggested that maybe a different mix would make things better. She’s also the one who knew that morning sickness is usually determined by the father’s DNA. You’ll note, I was a hell of a lot less sick this time around. And we went into the Nuchal Fold test calm.

“I don’t care if you think that’s icky, for Jimmy and I the extra calm, the lack of fear, the five fewer weeks of puking, that was worth it.”

“Oh.” Jeannie still looks wary. “So… you’re just… living together?”

“Living together, raising the kids together, maybe, one day, depending on if we can sell our own places, we’ll upgrade to a bigger house, but… Yeah. I mean… It’s like those summer vacations with Uncle Wes’ family. There’s always another set of adult to share the jobs with. The kids have lots of little guys to play with. The house is loud, but it’s fun.”

“And you kept this a secret?” If you’re just sharing a space, why would you keep it quiet? is clear on Jeannie’s face.

“Yeah, because I’m not actually trying to give Dad a stroke! And, he’d take it wrong. And he already thinks Jimmy and Tim are weird and this would just… The only reason I’m nervous about Donnie is that Dad’ll be a jackass if he looks too much like Sean. And compared to worrying about another trisomy baby, I’ll take that, but…”

“Okay, yeah.” Jeannie sighs. She rubs her forehead. She and Ed have had a lot of discussions about how if you want your children to tell you things, you can’t then come down on them like a ton of bricks when they do, with extremely varied levels of success. “Just… why not mention the… donation… before.”

Breena sighs. “Donnie is Jimmy’s, no matter who donated the sperm. We don’t want to be seeding any ideas that this is Tim’s kid. He’s not. He’s Jimmy’s.”

“Just with straight hair and green eyes?”

“Maybe. You’ve got curly hair in your baby pictures, so we’ll see. That’s another side part of having Abby in the family. She could look at the DNA, run the punnet squares, and she’s fairly sure Donnie will look a whole lot like me. There’s a fifty-fifty shot he’ll have blue eyes.”

“Deaf?”

“Very unlikely. It’s a recessive. Tim and Abby together have a one in four shot of it popping up. But something like one in ten thousand people has that recessive. We didn’t test me to see if I did because the chance of it is so slim. But, if they decide to try again, we’ll return the favor.”

“Turkey-baster babies.”
Breena strokes the tiny diamond that always lives against her chest. “Healthy babies.”

Jeannie nods. “Fine. What are you telling Ed?”

“If he asks, the same thing I told you, that we didn’t enjoy the fear of waiting for the nuchal fold test, so we tried with a new mix.”

“And if he doesn’t?”

“I’m not saying anything. This is Jimmy’s son, and as little as I have to say about it, the better.”

“Okay.” She sits there quietly for a moment. “Don’t you just… get sick of always having other people around?”

Breena shakes her head. “Not so far. But we also don’t always have other people around. If we want time with just us, we get time with just us. Jimmy and I get more couple time now than we did before.”

“Because when it’s Tim or Abby’s night with the kids you can be completely off.”

“Yeah. We’re all better-rested. We’ve got more free time. Just, you know, stupid stuff. How many hours a week do you spend on errands? We can buy all the groceries in one trip, and in bulk. Instead of me picking up dry cleaning and Abby picking up dry cleaning, we get it all in one run. It’s just, a lot of little stupid things you barely think about until they’re not cluttering up your day. Or if they are, they’re only cluttering up one day a month instead of one day a week.

“And, you know I adore Jimmy, but… Sometimes it’s really nice to have another woman around.

“And I know he feels the same way about having Tim around. He doesn’t always feel like he’s swimming in an estrogen sea.”

Jeannie inclines her head, she’s certainly had more than a few days where someone who got it would have been more than welcome in her home. Then she smiles a little, softly, about how many times in the last few months she’s wanted to call her best friend, Nance, because she’s the one who got it, but she wasn’t there.

“I told my mom we were living together,” Breena says at supper, that night.

That gets three very curious and somewhat shocked looks.

“It went okay. I sort of hedged exactly how things work. More a space and child care sharing arrangement.”

“Why did you bring it up?” Jimmy asks, wondering if Ed’s going to pop up to haze him in the next ten minutes and/or do something stupid to him and Tim.

“She was getting ready to buy the air mattress so she could camp out in my office for the week after Donnie shows up.”

And Jimmy develops a look very similar to the one Breena had.
“Exactly. I had two seconds to decide to out us, sort of, or boot you two out, and have a week of just us. And…” she just looks at the other three of them. They all get it. None of them want to miss out on Donnie’s first week home. He’s their boy, and it’d be like walking on hot knives to miss that.

“So, what, exactly does your mom know?” Abby asks.

“We live together, we share running a house and raising the kids, when we want on our own time, we take it. I worked that in with that weekend where Dad caught you at our place. That was one of your nights with the kids, and we were off on our own.”

“So, as long as we keep behaving the way we usually do…” Abby lets that trail off.

“Everything should work the same as it usually does. I don’t know if she’s going to tell Dad we’re all living together, or if she’s just going to say that you guys are staying over with us, returning the favor from us saying with you when Sean was born. He likely won’t mind her deciding to sleep at home that week. Either way, that’s the official story.”

“But we’re living together, and not living together,” Tim says.

“Yeah. Think, two sisters get married and share a house between them and their husbands. Platonic co-parenting.”

“And she bought it?” Jimmy asks.

“Enough. I did a good enough job on the setup that by the time I got to the donating DNA—“

“Everything on the table all at once,” Tim adds.

“Might as well. I mean, she sees us, and knows that everything is calm here. She sees Gibbs and the rest of the extended family with us, and gets the same sense, so… There’s enough there that she can believe the story as I told it, and, I think she’s a lot happier that way. I almost went completely honest, but, I could see the way she was reacting, and I wasn’t doing anyone any kindness by telling that full story.”

A contraction hits and Breena stops for a moment, cheering this one on, willing it to get things moving, but it peters off and her water remains steadfastly unbroken. She pokes her tummy. “Get moving.”

Donnie doesn’t even bother to kick back. He wriggles a little, but nothing that feels like he’s planning on going anywhere.

“But, since it’s out… Three bedrooms here. Four at your place… Nine people in just our branch of the family, and that’s if we don’t have any more children. The really big houses in Arlington and the like are going for pennies on the dollar because all the big wigs are in jail or up in New York… If we could sell our current places, or rent them…”

“We could get a place bigger than our two houses, combined, with all the trimmings, for what we spent on our original house,” Tim says.

“If not a bit less,” Breena follows.

“Except we’ve got two houses that are also worth pennies on the dollar,” Jimmy says. He doesn’t like to think about how far underwater they are on their place. Yes, he can pay his mortgage, but the ultra-expensive overheated real estate market they bought into less than five years ago has collapsed, and it doesn’t look like it’s going to perk up again anytime this decade. What he’s saving in real estate taxes, assuming his county ever bothers to reassess house values, isn’t going to make up for what they’re out.

Tim and Abby already own their place, so, at least they aren’t still making payments, but… Yeah, seeing your house go from a value of $550K to $107K in a three month space of time hurts.

“I’m tabling that for a later discussion,” Abby says. “Rule 74: Thou shalt not move house when a new baby is right around the corner.”

Everyone can agree to that rule.

(Though, later that night, as they’re getting four babies to sleep in two rooms, getting ready for number five, they’re all thinking about it, hard.)

Day 894572927 of the pregnancy, and Donnie is still, stubbornly, hanging on.

“Just move, baby, please.” Breena jerks a little as he kicks her in the hip. “That wasn’t what I meant!”

She’s at work, gently using her airbrush to add a bit of makeup to Mr. Hadler. Apparently, it didn’t occur to him that the little label on his grill that said DO NOT USE INSIDE wasn’t kidding. It looked like he decided to do a bit of indoor grilling during a thunderstorm, and the carbon monoxide killed him.

Breena’s making sure that he’s not bright pink in the casket.

She’s bone deep tired. Not sleepy. Not the kind of tired that resting would help. (If resting would help, there’s a large, enthusiastic group of people who would happily carry her to bed, dim down the lights, and sing her soothing lullabies.) She’s tired of being pregnant.

She got this way with Molly and Anna, too. Everything aches, and there’s no comfortable positions, and constantly wondering if every little contraction is things finally starting up, and… She’s done. She’s just done. She’s done being pregnant with Donnie, and this time, she’s done being pregnant period.

This is it.

She’s talked with other moms about knowing when they’re done, and agonizing over if they’re going to want another baby and…

Nope. She’s done. She is never doing this again.

It would have been nice if that cold, hard certainty had gone along with a good strong contraction and her water breaking, but… Nope.

Breena may be done, but she’s not done.

And given the still too rosy hue on Mr. Hadler’s face, he’s not done, either.

So she gets to it.
Her father’s been working next to her, one table over, and very quiet.

Too quiet.

Chewing on something quiet.

“Out with it, Dad.”

“We can give you a raise. I mean… Your sisters will get a little weird, but, you own more than half of the business, you can pay yourself more.”

“Dad?” She turns the airbrush off and puts it down, staring at him.

“If there’s too much work at home, and Jimmy’s not pulling his weight—“

“Woah! Just stop, right there!” She glares at her father. “That is not what I said to Mom.” She punctuates that with a hard look and a pointing finger.

“According to her, you said it’s easier.”

“It is. That doesn’t mean Jimmy’s not pulling his weight, or I want to hire someone else to… Dad! It got easier here when Amy got out of school and began working with us. That didn’t mean you or I or mom wasn’t doing enough on our own! It just meant it was a big job and extra people made it easier!” She glares again and mutters. “Not pulling his weight… He’s pulling a damn Mac truck.”

His eyes narrow, and he grudgingly admits that’s true.

“That’s what I told Mom!”

“Do your sisters know?”

“We haven’t said anything about it. If we ever get a place for the nine of us, they will, otherwise, we’re keeping this close to the vest.”

“Does Gibbs know?” He looks up from Mr. Tenier, the customer on his table, eyes intense.

“Yeah. He helped to build our space for us. He knows. Everyone who lives at the house knows. I know he spent a lot of time with the guys, making sure they weren’t being stupid, that we had good rules in play, before we got into this.”

Ed’s got a curious looking half cringe on his face. Like he wants to know, but he’s afraid to ask.

“What kind of rules?”

“You really don’t want to know.”

Ed thinks about that. “You’re probably right.” He stays quiet, thinking more. Breena can see the fact that Gibbs knows and hasn’t already put a stop to this is going a long way towards keeping her dad calm. “If you need more help, you can give yourself a raise.”

“We’re good, Dad.”
“Yeah… But… Kelly and Sean have the nanny, and… The McGee’s have four bedrooms… I mean… You haven’t given yourself a raise in a while, and Donnie means three kids in daycare, and…” All of that’s true, but she’s got the sense that Ed’s talking around something. And it takes a moment of him listing expenses before she figures it out.

“Are you trying to make sure that our half of the family makes as much as Tim and Abby?”

Ed looks a little embarrassed by that. Then he says, “Yeah.”

Breena sighs long and loud at that. “We’re fine, Dad.”

---

There is one perk to being home. She can lay down. On her side, because on her back (which she rather likes and can’t wait to do again) means that Donnie cuts off circulation to her lower extremities and tries to lay on her lungs.

Laying down means that some of the swelling in her legs starts to go down, too.

Molly’s sitting on the sofa with her, poking her in the shin, watching her little fingers leave dents in her mama’s legs. Kelly’s watching her do it, mesmerized. She pokes Molly, but as soon as her finger pulls back the dent goes away.

Interestingly enough, she’s got another set of green eyes, much bigger green eyes, really watching this, too.

“It doesn’t hurt, right?” Tim asks.

She shakes her head. And she can see the same curiosity in his eyes as in Kelly’s. “Go ahead, you can try, too.”

He pokes her, thumb slowly easing into too puffy flesh, and then pulls back, looking at a thumb shaped dent in her thigh.

“Your doctor knows about this?” Then he shakes his head. Not only does Dr. Jun know this, but Jimmy does, too.

“Yeah, they know.”

Tim sighs. He pats Donnie. “Time to get moving little boy!”

Donnie does not respond.

---

“Fully effaced, four centimeters dilated, he’s a positive two station. It really should be any minute now, Breena.”

Breena rolls her eyes. It should be any minute now, but any minute other than now is not what she wants to hear.

Dr. Jun helps her up. “Yeah, I know. You know the drill. Unless you call me first, I’ll see you in two Breena nods, she does know the drill. The only reason she’s here every other day is to make sure her blood pressure stays where it belongs. The last two appointments have been good, but at this point, if there’s a chance they’ll induce labor if her blood pressure gets too high, she’s thinking she’ll jog to the next appointment.

11:59:59 slips to 12:00:01 and with it the end of September.

Breena looks at Donnie. She can feel him squirming around in there.

“Looks like you’ll be a year behind your bother and cousin in school.”

He does not appear to be concerned.

“You think he’s really going to go for exactly nine months to the day?” Jimmy muses as they’re eating breakfast on October 3rd.

Breena glares at her baby bump. “He better not!”

Jimmy stands up, clearing up the kids’ dishes, and then kisses Breena. He quickly kneels, and says to Donnie, “Okay, moving out time. This is the eviction notice.”

Nothing happens. Jimmy finishes up clearing the dishes, and he’s on dropping the girls at daycare today.

“So, if I’m doing my math correctly, Donnie’s due soon, right?” Rachel asks.

“Any minute now,” Jimmy replies. He should probably see Rachel more often than he does, every six weeks or so, but, at least right now, he’s generally feeling pretty settled and in a good place.

But he does keep making appointments, because it’s not about keeping him in a good place when everything’s going well, it’s about staying in a good place, at least mentally, when everything else isn’t so hot.

And he knows that one of his ‘not so hot’ periods is coming up, fast.

She’s watching him, waiting to see if she’ll actually have to ask.

He doesn’t make her. “I’m looking forward to the other side of it. I know Breena is, too. I rationally know it’s going to be okay. I’ll rationally know it while we’re going through it. I’ll chain myself to it, and use it to keep myself as calm as can be, and she will, too, but…”

“But…” Rachel leads him on.
“Jon’s always there. I mean… It’s the same hospital. Same doctor. We’ve lucked out so it hasn’t been the exact same room, but it’s not like the rooms are much different from each other. It smells the same, the same gown, the same sounds, same positions…” He half shrugs. “We gotta get him out, so it’s not like we get to skip this part of it, but… We’d skip it if we could.”

Rachel nods at that. “That sounds very normal.”

“Yeah… Well…” He smiles, but there’s some sharpness to his eyes. “I’m good at normal.”

“Yes, you are, or at least looking that way…” She lets that dangle.

He smiles again, and again there’s some sharpness in his eyes. “I haven’t gotten into a fight, even friendly MMA, in more than a month. We still do some of it, just to stay sharp, but not as often as we used to. No planning how to kill anyone. I haven’t done any sort of chasing pain or… self-destructive… or destructive to someone else stuff, in a while. I have been doing a lot more yoga than normal.”

Rachel inclines her head at that. “It sounds like you’re coping well.”

“I’m certainly trying. Just, got to get to the other side. Once he’s out, and in our arms, and crying,” Jimmy’s voice wobbles a bit on crying. But that’ll be the moment where it really sears into them that they are on the other side. “we’ll be okay.”

“I think you’re okay now.” Compared to some of the conversations she’s had with Jimmy about some of the stuff he’s been up to over the last year, this sounds really normal and healthy.

“We’ll be able to enjoy it.”

Rachel smiles at that. “Will you send me photos?”

“You know our family, everyone we’ve ever spoken to gets pictures.”

She chuckles at that.

“Here.” Jimmy gets his phone. “Jun does extra checks, because of Jon, and this is the latest one.” He shows Rachel a 4d ultrasound from earlier in the week. Half of little guy’s face is hidden behind his hand. He almost looks like he’s waving at them.

“Awww…”

Jimmy smiles at the picture, too. “Yeah. He’s fine. I know it. He’s going to be fine. I know that, too.”

“You’re just having a hard time making the little ‘what if’ voice shut up.”

“Yeah. And I feel the spike of fear every time I see Breena’s number pop up on my phone right now, and I kind of want to bubble wrap her and move into the hospital full time, except I don’t because there are so many memories there, but, yeah, other than that, I’m just dandy.”

Rachel smiles at that, too.

Jimmy’s phone buzzes, and he feels the spike of adrenaline, but sees that it’s Allan. “I’m afraid I’m going to have to cut out,” he says to Rachel as he answers. She nods, understanding how this works. Fortunately, he doesn’t. Allan just needed confirmation that Jimmy was going to be in court on Tuesday and wouldn’t be available to talk to a group of Middle Schoolers for career day.
When Jimmy hangs up, he looks a bit sheepish. “Sorry.”

“I take it Dr. Allan doesn’t know why you aren’t in the office?”

“He knows that I’m hovering closer to home these days than usual, and though I didn’t specify why I wasn’t going to be in this morning, he’s sure it’s got something to do with Breena and Donnie. So, he’s not wrong, he’s just not right, either.”

“Ah. So, tell me about what else is going on…”

“Breena outed us to her mom.”

Rachel’s eyebrows go skyward, and that easily fills the next forty minutes.

Another day, another funeral.

Two funerals, actually.

And as soon as Mr. Richards is upstairs, being viewed, Breena’s done. It’s only 10:30, but she’s tired and all she wants to do is lie down and sleep.

Her parents and sisters, who have been trying to get her to take time off for maternity leave, are more than happy to usher her out of the building, wish her pleasant dreams.

Ed drives her home, and she grouses at him about being a million years pregnant and pokes her son who still isn’t moving. He pets her hand, and walks her up to her bedroom, asks if she wants him to call anyone.

Breena shakes her head. “Just want to rest.”

“Okay, honey.” He kisses her forehead, and heads back to work. “You need anything, you call. I’ll be back in a heartbeat.”

“Thanks, Dad.”

What she needs is to be in labor. And it’s just not happening.

All morning she’s been having contractions. Light, gentle, fluttery little things. One every two minutes for half an hour, then nothing for half an hour. Then a good strong one that’ll last two full minutes. Then nothing for half an hour. Then another hour of light, fluttery crap.

She’s SO DONE with this. She knows what real labor feels like and this is just… Crap. Little, piddly, getting geared-up CRAP. And it’s been going on for weeks now and she’s just about to beg for the damn Pitocin, just to get these stupid things to even out and start acting like real contractions.

She waddles to the bathroom, slams a few Aleeve (and right now she doesn’t care much one way or another if that’s on the approved list. Two damn pills will just take the edge off, not hurt anything, not this late in the game,) and then huffs off to bed to spend twenty minutes trying to find a position that approaches comfortable before finally, finally getting a nap.
She wakes up to Abby gently rocking her shoulder, and “Come on, just shift out of it, Breena.”

For a second she looks really confused and then, “FUCK!” slips out of her as the mother of all contractions hits.

Which is when Abby recognizes that what she was seeing, and the moans she was hearing, were not a nightmare.

For a good two minutes Breena just can’t move. Everything is locking up and she wants to push. Hard.

Abby’s grabbing the go bag, and saying something about getting to the hospital, but “No time!” gasps out of Breena, and she tries to get herself toward the bathroom as the contraction eases off.

Abby’s by her side, helping her, and as soon as she stands up there’s a gush of fluids, and apparently the Aleeve did more than take the damn edge off, but it certainly isn’t doing much right now. She’s tensing up, body working on getting this kid out now.

She knows that sensation, and says, loudly, “I know I was telling you to hurry up, but right now, wait!” The feeling crests through her again and waiting isn’t going to be an option. “Bathroom.”

“You sure?” Abby asks, getting her into the bathroom, helping her into the tub.

“He’s not hanging around.” Breena says through gritted teeth. She’s pulling off wet sweatpants and Abby turns the water on.

“We got time to call Jimmy?”

“On speaker.” She’s panting, on the floor of the tub, didn’t even bother to take her t-shirt off, and getting onto her hands and knees, fast.

Abby whacks the phone, checks, and then says, “Oh. Yeah. Hair. I see hair, Breena.”

Breena’s not talking now. She’s on her hands and knees, and focusing, trusting that Abby’ll make sure Donnie lands easy.

“Abby?” Jimmy’s voice on the other end. “What’s up?”

“Get home, now!”

“Now?”

“Yeah! Now!” She then hits the off button before Breena’s loud, pushing groan goes through. The last thing she needs is Jimmy driving like a maniac and getting into a car accident. He’ll drive fast and attentive, thinking he’s coming home to take Breena to the hospital, thinking he’s got hours to go.

She hopes he’s home in time before someone needs to catch Donnie, because they didn’t get that far in the Lamaze classes, and it’s not like Abby’s done this from the pushing side of it.

Another long, loud groan from Breena, and she can see a quarter-sized patch of goopy brown hair. Abby rubs her back, and tries to be encouraging. The contraction subsides and what glimpse she had of Donnie retreats. Then Abby pulls off her clothing, gets into the tub, kneeling in front of Breena, “Rest on me.”
Breena moves forward a bit, laying her head and chest against Abby. Abby makes sure she’s steady, and keeps rubbing Breena’s back, kissing her shoulder and neck. “You’ve got this.”

Breena doesn’t say anything, she’s focused on Donnie and the building need to push. It’s crested again, that need to get this kid out. Her focus is narrowing further, the rest of the world peeling away, and she’s pushing again, centering and focusing everything down and out.

Breena pushed an hour with Anna, and an hour and a half with Jon, and close to two hours with Molly, so… Abby’s really hoping Jimmy gets a move on and is here in twenty minutes, because she’s feeling more and more head each time Breena pushes, and she’s fairly sure little guy is not going to be an hour long job, let alone a two hour long job.

Jimmy’s bounding up toward the house, ready to run in, grab the bag, grab his wife, and then off to…

He knows that groan, and he just heard it through the walls of his house. For a second he stops dead, and then he’s moving at the speed past ‘bounding,’ and as he’s flat out running up the steps, he knows what he’s hearing because he’s heard it three times before and…

Bathroom.

Good, they’re in the bathroom…

Breena’s on her knees, leaning into Abby, groaning, loud and hard, and Donnie’s crowning, and he’s whacking the water in the sink on, fast, washing up, faster, and there, behind his wives in less than a heartbeat.

“You didn’t mention active labor,” he shoots to Abby.

“Didn’t want you getting into an accident.”

He nods, and looks around, trying to think about how to do this. He’s only ever done it in a hospital, with a bed, with an edge that folded down and there’s really not enough room in the tub for him to see what’s going on. Abby’s got the water beating down on Breena’s back and that probably helps her feel a little better, but… It’s a terrible angle and he really can’t see anything and…

The contraction passes, and he kisses Breena, taking her weight from Abby.

“Abby, get on the side of the tub, sit back, legs wide.”

Abby doesn’t ask questions, even though her first thought is, I’m not the one in labor.

“Okay, Breena, we’re going to get Abby on the side of the tub, and once she’s up there, you’re going to straddle her legs. She’ll hold onto you. I’ll get in front, and catch Donnie, okay?”

Breena nods, and gets out, “Move fast, they’re coming quick.”

Jimmy glances to Abby, she’s on the side of the tub, patting her lap, and Breena’s up, straddling her. It’s not exactly the birthing stool he saw in his history of gynecology textbook, but it’s about the same shape, and it gets Breena high enough up that he can get in front of her, see what’s going on, and…

“This might sting.”
Breena flashes him a are you kidding me look for almost a tenth of a second before the contraction begins again.

Jimmy slips a finger in to check, make sure that the cord’s not wrapped around Donnie’s neck, but he doesn’t feel it. Just his son, trying to join the rest of the world, at hyper speed, after way too much dawdling.

---

Jimmy’s rationally aware that time is moving fast. There’s no possible way they’ve been in the tub for more than three minutes, but it feels like forever for him.

The few babies he delivered before were intense situations but this…

Each contraction, each push, and a little more of Donnie becomes visible. And Jimmy can’t help it, his hands are shaking with adrenaline and joy and fear, and right now everything looks fine, except for the fact that they’re here, and not at a hospital, and he’s partially freaking out about how it’s probably been a good three weeks since anyone sat down and really cleaned this bathroom, and then Breena’ll push again, a hard, groaning, push, and ears! He can see ears, and feel soft, slippery, wet skin. Pink. Smeary with a little blood and waxy with vernix, but pink, good color, everything is moving the way it’s supposed to, and Breena gets a short breather, a moment to relax, and Jimmy does, too, for a few seconds, and the contraction ramps back up, jolting through her and Donnie’s face down so Jimmy can’t tell, too much, what he looks like, but he does say, “I think he’s got straight hair.”

Abby’s grinning at that. Cheering Breena along. And Jimmy goes back from bouncing between exultant joy at seeing his son, and worrying about the fact that he doesn’t have gloves on, and his shirt is so far from sterile it might as well be a petri dish, and then another push, and…

---

Down, out, hard, and tense. So much pressure. This constant, building, urge. All of her muscles are tense, tired, shaking with the strain, but the pressure won’t be denied.

Breena’s pushing hard, entirely in the moment, in her body, existing in time slowed down to individual heart beats, and long, steady exhaled breaths.

Her son’s coming, and it’s her job to get him to the other side.

---

“You’ve got this, Breena. He’s on his way, and we’re going to get to see him soon, and there you go, keep it up, you’ve got it…” Abby’s taking her role as birth support and cheering section seriously.

She knows that Breena’s not listening to her, and Jimmy’s obviously busy right now, but she thinks her voice is calming. She knows it’s helping to keep her calm.

She knows Tim and Jimmy don’t have much use for faith, but she does, and right now, it’s hitting her hard. Hand of God alone that she was here today. She had a court date, decided to change out of her Career Barbie outfit (though these days her court suit looks a lot more sophisticated than it used to) and get into something more Lab Appropriate, and then head back to work for a few more hours.
Jimmy’s place was a little out of the way, compared to their place, but she just felt like she needed to be there, so that’s where she went.

She’s praying as she cheers. Giving thanks that Breena wasn’t on her own for this. For protection, she’s just as aware as Jimmy is that their bathroom isn’t sterile. For forgiveness, it’s only now, with the phone well out of her grasp that the idea of calling 911 is hitting her. And most of all, as she hears a tiny chirp of a new voice joining them, she prays in celebration.

Jimmy’s muttering his way through his med school lessons.

And not because there’s any chance that right here, right now, Jimmy’s about to forget what he’s supposed to do. He knows the drill, head comes out, baby’s head turns, get shoulder A, get shoulder B, and out he comes.

But because he’s got to do something to stay calm, or otherwise, he’s going to jump out of his skin.

The only upside is this is as far from Jon’s delivery as it’s possible to get. He’s got no memories of anything like this. There’s no sorrow here. No sense of loss or pain. There’s no past right now, barely any future. He’s entirely in this one second, right here, right now.

There is a reason why they tell you not to deliver your own kids, and Jimmy’s sure it’s this feeling, right now, that he couldn’t name if his life depended on it. He feels electric all over, tingling with this moment, shaking from it, and grinding under all of it is the overwhelming sense of responsibility. This is his wife, his baby, and he’s got to get them through it.

So, he’s keeping up his own mantra, as he gently, so gently, this is his wife and child, turns Donnie’s head a bit, making sure to keep him supported, and on the next push, his shoulder slips out, and Jimmy breaks the mantra to say, “Almost done, one more and we’ve got him,” and there, another hard, groaning push, and there’s a second where Donnie doesn’t move, and then he’s out with a fast rush, along with a spray of amniotic fluid, and Jimmy’s holding his boy who’s crying full out and…

And there just aren’t words.

He’s here, in Jimmy’s hands, wet and pink and wailing.

He gently cuddles his boy, and lifts up a bit, so he’s kneeling between Breena’s legs, holding Donnie up, so he’s snuggled between them. And all three of them take a moment to bask in this new little boy.

Eventually, time eases back to normal. And eventually, they pull back enough to see that he’s got all his fingers and toes, and they get Breena onto the side of the tub, as Abby grabs a towel, and floss, and a knife as Jimmy holds his wife, and she holds their son.

Abby ties off and cuts the cord a moment later, and makes a joke about why it might be desirable to have more than two attendants for this sort of thing, which Jimmy’s beginning to agree with, because he really wants to be cuddling with his family right now, not delivering a placenta, but…
There’s literally nothing about this situation that he thinks would be improved by trying to put it on a stretcher, move it into an ambulance, and then and handle it on the road to their hospital.

The messy bits still need to be handled, but handled they are and, eventually, Abby and Jimmy are able to walk Breena back to bed, get her propped up, and Donnie happily latches on for his first dinner.

“Last one home,” Tim mutters as he pulls his car into the driveway.

Granted, that’s not exactly new these days.

He’s a little surprised to not hear any kiddos when he opens his car door, but it’s a nice day, and sometimes, when they get back a bit early, Jimmy or Abby will load the little guys up and take them out for a walk before dinner.

He notices that Jimmy’s car door isn’t closed, and shuts it. That’s a really good sign that little guys were out here playing. Molly loves to play with car doors, opening and shutting again and again. It drives the adults crazy because all they can envision while she does it are tiny fingers crushed in the door.

They probably went for a walk.

He doesn’t smell or hear cooking food as he heads in, calling out ‘Hello,’ but it’s not like they never have delivery. There’s a new Greek place that opened a few miles out, and Abby’s been talking about getting some gyros the next time they want delivery, so maybe a few of them are working their way home.

“Upstairs!” Abby calls back. He can hear the grin in her voice, so something good has to be happening up there.

Tim heads up the stairs, pulling off his tie, and unbuttoning his cuffs, ready to peel out of his work clothing, hop into a t-shirt and kilt, and move into relaxing at home time.

“So, did anything interest—“ the question dies on Tim’s lips as he realizes what he’s seeing when he steps into Jimmy’s bedroom. Breena’s in bed, Jimmy and Abby next to her, and there’s a tiny person wrapped in one of their bath towels, on her chest.

“When?” His eyes light up, a huge smile spreading across his face as joys arcs, electric through him. He’s kicking off his shoes and joining them as quickly, and gently as possible.

“Ten minutes ago. Don’t go into the bathroom, and there’s a pretty big wet spot on the other side of the bed you don’t want to step in. Gibbs is taking the kids tonight,” Jimmy replies, not looking away from his son.

Tim’s eyes are tearing up as he gently strokes a hand over the little guy being held by his mother. “Hello, Donnie.” He strokes Donnie, who’s awake, quiet, and looking around.
A carefully cropped picture, one with just Jimmy, Breena, and Donnie in it, goes out a few minutes later: Donald Timothy Palmer, 10/3/17. Mama and Baby are well. Visitors welcome tomorrow.

The full picture is this: Breena’s in the middle, with Donnie on her chest. Aside from her post-partum panties and pad, she’s naked. Jimmy, who shucked off his clothing shortly after they got Breena into bed, (There’s a reason why they wear overalls or scrubs when dealing with the messy work at NCIS, all of the clothing he was wearing when he walked into the house is utterly disgusting right now.) is next to her, arm behind her, other arm under hers, supporting Donnie. It’s clear from the picture that he’s not wearing a shirt, but it’s a carefully cropped shot. An especially sharp-eyed observer may wonder why he’s also not wearing his watch, but… If they ever get the full story, it’ll make sense.

Pull back a bit further, outside the tight rectangle of Jimmy, Breena, and Donnie, and Abby, also naked, because she didn’t see any point to putting anything on before hopping into bed with them, is on Breena’s other side. She pulled back just enough to not be in the ‘official’ version of the picture, though she’s gently stroking Donnie’s foot.

Tim’s on Abby’s far side, looking like he just got home from work, which he did. He’s the one taking the photo, making sure he and Abby aren’t really in it.

Then he takes the one after it, where they both press in close, hold each other, and that photo, all five of them together, is the one that certain members of the family get.

That shot, which has It’s a hell of a story, can’t wait to tell it. Okay, we can. Tomorrow. Not sure if we’ll be home or at the hospital. More details coming. Anyone who feels like doing some scrubbing is welcome at the Palmer place right now.

Predictably, in less than a minute, Jimmy’s phone is ringing. It’s Ed’s number, but Tim picks it up.

“That’s their bed in the background of the shot!”

“Yeah. Donnie’s got two speeds, quick time and dawdle. Apparently getting out was done on quick time.”

“And yet, you’re there.”

“I’ve been here for literally four minutes. Long enough to kiss our boy and take the photo. Donnie’s been out for ten more. They hadn’t even had time to text me. I was just getting home like normal.”

“Are they going to the hospital?”

Tim shrugs and asks. Breena’s looking like she doesn’t want to move again, ever. And Jimmy’s crashing from the adrenaline, so he’s not exactly feeling like going out right now, either, but he nods, slowly.

“Yeah. Once they’ve had a bit more time to rest, I’ll pack ‘em up and take them. Get everything checked out.”

He hears a pause and the sound of the phone being handed over, then Jeanie’s voice. “Is everyone okay?”
“Tired. I wasn’t kidding with Ed about four minutes. I haven’t even gotten the story, yet. Little guy is here. No one called 911, and we’re not waiting for an ambulance, so I know everyone’s okay. I got in about a minute after they called Gibbs to get the girls.”

Abby gestures for the phone, and Tim hands it over. She flips it to speaker, and then, as Donnie nurses, Breena drowses, holding him gently, and Tim and Jimmy get to pet their boy, she fills Jeannie and Tim in on the whole story.

By the time the story is done, Ziva’s over with dinner and a mop. (She did get gyros.)

Tim, also having missed out on the ‘excitement,’ is on cleaning up, and the less he thinks about that in the future, the happier he’ll be. Jimmy wasn’t kidding about placentas looking like evil, bloody jellyfish, and if he never has to touch one again, it’ll be too soon.

Jimmy eventually gets out of bed, to put some boxers on, and mutters, “You couldn’t have done that yesterday…” as he heads into the bathroom, to make sure he’s cleaned up enough to be presentable at a hospital.

Ziva smirks at him; the bathroom is clean enough for surgery, now. “You did not ask us to.” She stands up, hugs him, and then heads into the bedroom. If Jimmy’s out of the bed, that means she can snuggle up next to Breena and get her new baby fix.

Two hours later, Tim drives Jimmy and Breena, and Donnie, already cleaned up, in his onesie, tucked into his car seat, to the hospital.

Once there, Dr. Jun checks Jimmy’s work, makes a few jokes about him putting her out of business, and then says that if they want to go home, they can. No anesthetic means there isn’t any good reason for Breena to spend the night if she doesn’t want to, and at that point she didn’t.

By that point, the only thing Breena wanted to do was go back home, lay down, wrap around her baby boy, and get to actually enjoy a few hours with him.

So they did.

Tim took them back home, dropping them off, and then, just like Breena said, they get to have more time with each other than they would otherwise because they don’t have to do anything other than just be with Donnie.

Tim’s the one who went off to go pick up the pile of antibiotics for Breena. And Abby heads off to the McGee place, where Gibbs is with all the kids. She spends some extra time with them, showing them pictures of their newest brother, and making sure Gibbs has an extra set of hands for putting everyone to bed.

And, so, after 39 weeks and two days of waiting, Donald Timothy Palmer, who does look an awful lot like his cousin Sean, with the pouty bottom lip and a slightly droopy right eye, though he also has his mama’s round face, plump cheeks, and hooded lids, settled down into his parents’ bed. They snuggle around him, count fingers and toes, marvel over his light brown-blonde eyebrows and lashes, and his little pouty lips, murky-blue eyes, and his tiny little hands and fingers, nose and ears, and just how perfect he is, in the way that all brand new babies are perfect to their mommies and daddies.

And, eventually, Tim’s back with the meds, and Abby’s back from making sure the kids are in bed, and they, too get to bask in their little boy.

Chapter End Notes

So, this is the slightly modified story of how my aunt joined the party. Though, in her case, her mom ended up delivering her by herself, because the only other person in the house was her three-year-old sister, who, being asleep at the time, wasn't exactly the most effective midwife, ever.
It’s morning.

Technically.

Tim’s rubbing his eyes, feeling exhausted, stumbling around the kitchen, getting a smoothie for Breena, and remembering what it’s like to have a newborn around again. Yes, he loves Donnie beyond all reason, but this bit here, tripping over your feet, because a certain tiny person is under the impression that meals must be served every two and a half hours, is overrated.

At least he gets to go back to sleep once said smoothie has been delivered. Because it’s morning, and as soon as little boy is done and ready to be tucked back into his crib, Jimmy takes over.

Tim manages to get all of the bits of nursing fuel assembled, blended, into a glass, and up to Breena, who is also looking like she got run over by the tired truck.

Once he hands it over, he crouches next to her. She’s in her nursing chair. Bed may be “easier” in the sense of not having to get up, but especially with these brand new little guys who don’t have the routine down yet, the extra arm support the chair offers is worthwhile.

Donnie’s eyes are open, and he’s gazing up at Breena, tiny hand curled around her breast, as he… Tim’s seen a lot of nursing babies over the years, and little guy’s more gumming Breena’s nipple than slurping down dinner.

Breena’s working on prying him off of her nipple, saying, “Nope. Open wide, get the whole thing into your mouth. I promise, it’ll work better.”

“Speaking of which,” Tim keeps his voice low, but he holds out the smoothie, and makes sure the straw is located so she can get it easily.

She sucks thankfully, eyes closing for a second, as calories try to make up for lost sleep. “Thanks.”

He kisses her, and is about to stroke Donnie, but he doesn’t want to distract him from the task at hand, getting a good latch. He closes his mouth, and it does look like he’s got a lot more areola between his lips this time.

Breena’s watching Donnie, and Tim can see him start to suck.

“He got it?”

She looks up at him. “Maybe? First week or so is hard to tell. He doesn’t not have it. I can tell that.”

And, for as much as he was jonesing for bed five minutes ago, right now Tim just wants to hover here, snuggle with Breena, and watch their boy eat.

“Tim…”

“Mmm…?”

“Go back to sleep. He’ll still be here in a few hours, and the more rested everyone is, the better we’ll all be.”

Tim nods, slowly, and shuffles off to their bed, crashing next to Abby, and snuggling into her.
Jeannie’s feeling very… tentative… as she steps into Jimmy and Breena’s house.

She wasn’t sure what she’d see once she got in there. Both Tim and Abby’s car is in the driveway. And she knows what Breena’s said about… whatever this is… but…

She just feels off.

So, as she’s getting ready to open the door, she’s steeling herself, getting ready to shove an approving look on her face, and to get in there and be useful and all the rest of that, because she might not like, or necessarily approve of whatever the hell this is, but she won’t miss out on her grandkids, and she’s not abandoning her daughter when she needs help most.

“Hello,” she says it softly as she lets herself in.

“Hey, Mom,” also soft, comes back to her from the living room, along with, “Hi, Jeannie,” from Jimmy.

She steps in and finds Breena, on the sofa, Donnie in her arms, looking awfully tired and so in love and completely enraptured by her little boy. That starts the smile spreading across her face. Jimmy’s behind her, holding onto her, and their boy, and… awake.

Part of why she was here with Anna and Molly was so Jimmy could sleep during the day. Get rest now so he could be on during the night. But he’s looking fairly bright-eyed and bushy-tailed. She also hears a sound… Breakfast cooking. Abby comes in from the kitchen. She hugs Jeannie, kisses her cheek, and says, “Hey!” before turning to Jimmy and Breena, “Food’s ready. Think you’ll have him down soon?”

Jimmy untangles himself from Breena. “I’ll grab mine, fast, now, and when he’s done, I’ve got putting him down.” He kisses Breena. “Food and naptime for you, right?”

She nods, then glances over to her mom, gesturing to the fact she’s alone on the sofa, and says, “Well…”

Jeannie flows over to meet Donnie. He’s nursing away, eyes starting to slide shut, but for the time being they’re still a little open. She can’t see most of his face, but the bits she can see… Jeannie feels the smile growing. A tiny covering of light browny-blonde hair, round cheeks, those ears… The eyes are Tim’s. Even from here, just at a glance, she can see that, but the rest of the face, and the hair, and… That’s Breena as a baby.

His eyes slip all the way shut, and Breena coos at him, “Come on… No sleeping yet.”

Donnie’s eyes open again, but he doesn’t bother to start sucking again.

“Okay, I think you’re done.” She gets him unlatched, and Jeannie’s snapping into action, grabbing a spit-up cloth, and getting ready for Donnie.

breaths against her neck, as she starts the familiar walk/bounce routine of burping a baby.

Breena flops back against the sofa, and a moment later, Jimmy’s out of the kitchen with a plate of eggs, a smoothie, and a toasted bagel. “Come on, eat, and then sleepy time.”

Breena doesn’t look thrilled to sit up and eat. Sleeping sounds better than food, but Jimmy isn’t wrong about her needing food.

Abby’s out a moment later, grabbing a picture of Jeannie with Donnie. “Okay. I just sent that to Ed, Amy, and Christine.” She kisses Breena, and Donnie, and then Jimmy (on the cheek). “And I’ve got to get going. Tony called, they’ve got a triple murder, and Allan’s drafting me into helping.”

“He can do that?” Jeannie asks.

“Anyone with a pulse who can figure out how to wield a swab can help an ME collect evidence. When they get slammed, if I’m not also slammed, I help out.” She pets Donnie again. “Since it’ll be a few hours before all the evidence is in, I’ve been drafted. I’ll swing by the kids tonight, and then home late.” And then she’s off, upstairs to give Tim a quick kiss, and off for her day.

“Actual” morning starts with the sound of another voice in their home.

Jeannie.

Tim’s alone in their bed when he hears the new voice coming from the downstairs. The clock tells him it’s a bit after eight, and that he should be getting up, because the kiddos have been getting plenty of Uncle Jethro/Pop time, but they’ve been more than a bit low on Daddy-time.

He’s just thinking that as Abby breezes in, already dressed for work. He sits up, blinking. “You’re going in?”

“I have to. Triple murder. I’m giving Allan a second set of hands.”

“Oh.” He kisses her. “What’s the plan?”

“Work, back to our place after, spend time with the kids, and then home. You?”

“Uhhh…” He knows he should have a plan, but he’ll be damned if he knows what it is.

She grins at him. “Yeah. You’re still asleep. Text me when you know what you’re doing.”

“Okay.” A wide yawn splits his face, and he lays down for a few more minutes.

But only a few. He gets his shower, dries off, and is reaching for a t-shirt when something occurs to him.

“Uncle Tim,” did not just suddenly get a few weeks of paternity leave. In fact, “Uncle Tim” is supposed to be racing into the Hoover Building because he’s epically late, and has a bunch of electronic architecture building to do, and a mile high stack of resumes for people who want to work on said architecture building to go through.

However, Uncle Tim is a Director, so he can, on occasion, take an unscheduled ‘personal day.’
But he’s fairly certain ‘day’ is the operative word. He flashes Jennifer a text, letting her know that he won’t be in the office today unless something blows up.

He’s heading down the hall as Jeannie comes out of the nursery. Apparently, Donnie’s down for nap number... Tim doesn’t know. A lot. Nap number a lot.

“He sleeping?” he asks quietly.

She nods. She’s looking at him, really looking, cataloging his face and body. Seeing the man who helped to build the boy. Tim stands there, not sure what to do, but after a moment, just standing around being examined is getting uncomfortable, so he steps into the nursery, and watches their youngest snooze.

He can feel Jeannie watching him do it, but when he turns back to her, she looks away.

“Ed here?” Tim asks, voice low, as he shuts the door.

“Not yet. He’s got the early jobs. Getting a client, working on getting a few ready to go, but today his day is pretty much over at noon.”

“And yours?”

“Christine and Amy are handling my day, today.” They’re walking down the steps, and Tim’s heading into the kitchen where breakfast is ready, and Jimmy’s eating. She looks around. Breena’s already eaten and lying on the sofa, napping. Tim’s eating. Jimmy gets up and moves the laundry from the washer to the dryer, makes a comment along the lines of, “And there’s a reason why scrubs were invented,” and then heads back down to share his morning coffee with Tim.

Tim can feel that she’s out of sorts, all the help she planned on providing has been taken care of.

“Come, sit down. We’ve got extra coffee in the pot,” Jimmy says, acting like this is a totally normal morning. And, it is, at least, as normal as the world can be when there’s a little guy who’s not quite twenty-hours old sleeping upstairs.

Tim’s about to say something along the lines of, “I’m thinking after this I’ll go love on the older kids some,” but they hear a little baby chirp and freeze, waiting to see if that blows into a full blown wail.

A second later, it does, and Jimmy hops up, “And that one’s my cue.”

Once he’s upstairs and Jeannie’s got her coffee, she says, “He’s looking really well-rested.”

Tim’s not sure if she’s giving him a searching look, because he’s very much not-well-rested this morning. He shrugs before saying, “Round ten we pried him off of Breena and Donnie and made him go to sleep. It was my night with the kids, so I was on baby fetching, and Breena was on feeds. He’s on babies tonight. So he’ll be the zombie tomorrow, and Abby and I’ll be the perky ones, and all three of us’ll make sure that Breena can be sleeping as much as possible.”

Jeannie sips her coffee, nods, still looks wary, but she doesn’t say anything. For a few minutes they listen to Jimmy through the baby monitor. From the sound of it, little boy is doing the traditional newborn, something-isn’t-right,-but-I-don’t-know-what fussing. And from the sound of it, Jimmy’s doing the traditional veteran dad routine of: check diaper, pat, hum, take off or add clothing, and attempt to figure out what has irked the newborn.

The crying isn’t getting louder or more insistent, so it doesn’t sound like he’s solved the problem, but it doesn’t appear to be getting any worse.
Tim finishes his coffee and eggs, and says, “I wonder if sometimes they get freaked out about being dry. Yesterday, he was wet all over, and sounds and light were muffled and dim. Sometimes I think they cry just because it’s different.”

Jeannie nods at that, and thinks that’s doing an awfully good job of defining why this feels so uncomfortable for her. Yesterday (okay, three days ago) everything worked one way, and now it’s different.

Back to his place.

And at his place there are two little people who have been missing Daddy time.

Okay, one little person who is making it extremely clear that she’s well aware that something’s been awfully different today, and another little guy, who being nine months old, lives in eternal now, and doesn’t exactly get this whole time thing.

So, Kelly’s attempting to surgically attach herself to him, and Sean’s just his usual pleased-to-see-Dad.

And he’s very happy to see both of them. Happy to show off pictures of Donnie to Heather. (Who makes all the right noises in regards to the small pink person he’s showing off.)

He’s on the floor, with Sean sitting in his lap, and Kelly next to him, building up blocks, as Tim explains the plan.

“So, I’m going to be here until this afternoon. And after lunchtime, Pop’ll bring Molly and Anna over. You guys will play, then go down for naps. When you wake up, he’ll be here, and Mama will come for dinner, and Molly and Anna’s Poppa and Gran will probably come over, too. And then tomorrow, we’re all going to Jimmy and Breena’s house and you’ll get to meet your little…” he stumble a bit at that, never quite sure if the kids are supposed to be siblings or cousins, and quickly amends with, “Donnie.”

Sean’s watching his hands as he signs it, but he’s got no idea if those signs mean anything to him. Tim remembers feeling that way about talking with Kelly when she was an infant. Saying words, explaining things, and having no idea if he was making a difference.

Sean, obviously, doesn’t talk, but he does occasionally make a few signs. (Eat, drink, Mama, which he uses to mean any adult, and, just like his sister, cookies. She got that word down fast, and he got the sign down fast, too.) He’s not regular with any of them, and if he’s made the connection between make sign and things happen, they aren’t sure, but, he’s at least starting to put these things together.

Tim gently strokes his son’s head. It’s October 4th. One month and two days and little guy here will get his first implant. He wonder if, like Donnie, he’ll spend a while just crying because everything is new.

Gibbs manages to get over to Jimmy and Breena’s in the late morning.
There was a time, not so long ago, when he could go through the whole night, several of them, without sleep, and just mainline coffee and bounce back up the next day to begin more work.

That is not how things work now. Little guys were understandably excited about lack of parents, and Donnie, and everything else, so he had about four wakeups over the course of the night.

Much to his surprise, Sean, who’s usually up at least once a night, just to make sure everything is still around, slept through just fine, and Molly, who can sleep through a fire alarm, came wandering out, hopping into his bed three times, looking for extra snuggles.

Anyway, once he got the assorted kids where they needed to go, he went back to his own home, played with the doggies a bit, and crashed for a few hours of uninterrupted sleep.

After lunchtime, when he’s up, moving around, wishing devoutly that he could just go to the Diner and have Elaine take care of him, he’s wondering if not bouncing back so easy is another sign of getting older, or if he’s just out of practice.

Either way, he doesn’t like it.

He does, however, like creeping into Jimmy and Breena’s house, finding them crashed out on the sofa, snoozing away, (Breena’s tired, and Jimmy’s stocking up on extra sleep for tonight’s baby duty) and Jeannie in the kitchen, working on putting together some serious lasagna.

Gibbs creeps in, looks around, doesn’t see a tiny baby boy, so he moseys over to Jeannie to offer to help.

She shrugs a bit. “It’s easier with one person. Extra hands mess up my rhythm.”

Gibbs can respect that. “I run into that with my woodworking. If everyone has their own piece, it works fine, but all together on the same part…”

She nods, spooning sauce onto the noodles. “Tim can eat this, he just usually doesn’t, right?”

“Yes. He’ll eat it if it’s the main course. Ziva’ll often make it if we’re having a milchig Shabbos. Especially if Senior’s coming around. If there are other options, he’ll go for something lower carb. He’s got a sweet tooth, so he saves up his sugar for dessert.”

“I’ve got some chicken breasts marinating, too.”

Gibbs nods along, pleased to see she’s made something for Jimmy to eat. “Molly loves lasagna.”

Jeannie smiles at that. “Have you seen him, yet?”

“Just the pictures. Sounds like they had an exciting night.”

Jeannie nods at that. “Christine showed up fast, but not that fast.”

Gibbs inclines his head. Then he decides to share, some of, his own story, “Kelly, my Kelly, was fast, too. Lot of waiting, and then, boom! baby.”

Jeannie doesn’t know that whole story, but she understands the basics of how that works. “Yeah. It looks like everyone came through okay, though.”

Gibbs nods.

A moment later, he hears footsteps on the stairs. Apparently, Ed’s here, too. And from the looks, and sounds, of it, just finished putting down Donnie.

As soon as he’s in the kitchen, Jeannie says, “You let him sleep on you, didn’t you?”

Ed rolls his eyes a little, pats his tummy, which has gotten rather round over the years, and says, “I’ve spent years perfecting the ultimate baby napping zone, it’d be a shame to waste it.”

Jeannie shakes her head, but she’s smiling, too.

“I did get him into the crib, still asleep. Hello, Jethro.”

Gibbs nods at Ed, who’s quietly fixing himself a cup of coffee. Ed picks up another cup, and lifts it toward Jethro, who nods, agreeing that he’d like a cup, too. Ed pours, and Gibbs takes it, sipping, and like always at Jimmy’s place, wondering how he can stand this vaguely coffee-flavored water. Ed sips his and shakes his head a bit, too.

“I don’t understand light roast.”

“Ed!” Jeannie says, voice low.

“I know… Just…” He stares at Gibbs, and Gibbs does nod a bit. “See, he gets it, too. This is like… Coffee water. Or coffee perfume. It smells like coffee, but it doesn’t taste like anything.”

Gibbs smirks and nods at that, chuckling a little. Sometimes having the guy without the mental filter around can be fun.

“You can taste the actual flavors, not just burnt,” Jeannie adds.

“Uh huh…” Ed’s giving her a disbelieving look, that shifts into a smile. Jethro knows that they’re just playing with this. He eyes the lasagna. “I don’t suppose any of that’s coming home with us?”

That gets a side eye from Jeannie, along with a gentle whack to the back of the hand with a spoon as Ed reaches to nibble a bit of the mozzarella.

As they gently snark at each other, Gibbs heads up to see Donnie.

He’s lying on his back, swaddled up, eyes closed, sleeping. And like everyone else who’s seen him, he can see the mix of Breena and Tim on his face.

Gibbs wants to pick him up, feel his tiny body in his hands and arms, but he’s also a firm believer in the idea of Thou Shalt Not Wake The Sleeping Baby. Donnie’ll wake up soon enough, and for right now, he can hover a bit, and watch him sleep.

He does wake up, about twenty minutes later, and Uncle Pop (what Molly and Kelly have been calling him for a while now) is ready to leap into action, picking him up.

Donnie’s got the usual, somewhat grumpy, very confused look of a just woken newborn. And Gibbs has the usual getting-to-pet the new baby look of rapture.

“Hi,” he says to Donnie, who, having woken up hungry and crabby, is not exactly in the most social of moods. Gibbs nods at that, lifting him to his shoulder, saying, “Yeah, I feel like this a lot of mornings, too. Abbi’ll tell you about it. Let’s get you cleaned up, and over to Mama.”

Donnie doesn’t stop crying at that, but it does feel more like he’s just complaining about the situation, amicable bitching, as opposed to genuine distress. Gibbs knows all about that, too, so he just nods along.
Once he’s downstairs, and located in Breena’s arms, Donnie perks up quite a bit. He’s not exactly a natural at nursing, not yet. But he’s working on it. And, apparently, like most babies, being snuggled up against Mama and having a bit of lunch makes everything else better. His eyes are open and he’s focused on her and food.

Gibbs takes a rather cropped photo, and sends it off to Ducky.

“I can see he’s doing fine, how about you?” he asks Breena.

She shrugs. “Tired, sore. Not entirely sure what day it is. Par for the course.”

Gibbs grins at her. “I know that.” His phone buzzes. He checks and nods, flashing back a text. “Duck’s on his way. Penny’s got votes all this week, so she won’t be down until Friday, but he’s getting on the train. I’ll pick him up in a few hours.”

“And I know Tony’s slammed with a triple homicide. Ziva mentioned that when she came over to help clean and feed us. He’ll be over when he can. How about Abbi?”

“Still in Miami. She’ll be home Friday, too. Can’t wait to see you and him.”

Breena winces a bit. “This is messing up your romantic dinner night.”

Gibbs shakes his head at that. “There’ll be a lot more opportunities for that. Little guys only show up once.” Gibbs eyes Donnie. “Though this one isn’t that little. How big is he?”

Breena blinks. She knows they weighed him when they went to the hospital, but since she hasn’t been in a room with that information written on a whiteboard, with nurses checking little guy periodically through the day, she doesn’t remember off the top of her head.

Jimmy who’s been half asleep, and dozing behind her perks up enough to say, “Seven nine, twenty inches. Big for a McGee, halfway between Molly and Anna.” He doesn’t add anything else to that, or open his eyes.

Gibbs smirks at that, understanding what’s happening. He’s seen all of them do it when they expect a big night. Suck up every possible moment of sleep.

“They checked his hearing?” he asks. He’s sure they’d mention it if he hadn’t passed, but he’s got a rule about assuming things, and since little guy wasn’t born at the hospital...

“Yep, passed both tests in both ears. As best they can, tell he’s a perfectly normal, healthy newborn, who was in a flaming rush to join the world once he decided to get moving,” Breena says, her index finger stroking over Donnie’s cheek.

“Good.” Gibbs watches them, a grin on his face.

Donnie keeps nursing.

Ed and Jeannie hang back. Part of it is not wanting Breena to feel swamped. In the hospital they generally do a good job of keeping the number of visitors down, and visits fairly brief. That’s less of a thing here at home.
And part of it is watching Gibbs.

Because Gibbs knows about this… thing with the four of them… whatever it is. And if Gibbs is okay with it…

They’ve been part of the larger family long enough to get a feel for the extended Gibbs clan members, and while they respect both Ducky and Penny, they’ve got the sense that both of them are entirely too, ‘Do whatever you like, as long as it makes you happy’ for their own comfort. Like, if Gibbs has rules, they’ve got suggestions. And those suggestions are optional.

But Gibbs has rules. And, if whatever this is really doesn’t bug him, or break his rules… Then maybe they can be okay with it, too.

And Gibbs looks okay. If it’s been going on for almost a year… And Breena says it has… Then Gibbs has been okay the whole time, but they didn’t really look.

Ed and Jeannie Slater may not have guts and they haven’t spent years interrogating people, but they have built an extremely successful business based on catering to people who are in extreme emotional distress. It’s their job to make sure that people who can’t say what they want, get it anyway.

And they are very good at it.

So now, they’re actually watching. Jeannie’s using the same skills she uses to figure out what’s actually important to the people in front of her, and say, gently suggest that if the budget is tight, and Mom wasn’t actually a woodworker, that maybe it’s okay to get the casket with the walnut stain, instead of the actual walnut coffin. And since Mom was a gardener, then spending the money they saved on the casket on flowers is a good idea.

Gibbs is just sitting with them. He’s not saying much, but he never does. He is gently petting Donnie a bit, content to sit quietly with Breena while Jimmy snoozes behind them.

When Donnie get to his mid-nurse break, Gibbs scoops him up, letting Breena get a bit more rest. He’s happy to pace around, gently patting, humming a bit. (Off key, and Jeannie thinks it’s Suspicious Minds. The idea that Gibbs may be an Elvis fan amuses her to no end.) Eventually, Donnie burps, and gets handed back. Eventually, he’s done, and by that point, like most newborns, he’s just about ready to go back to sleep.

Jeannie swoops in to get Donnie. She’s not giving Ed a chance to put his baby napping zone to use again. Yes, she’d love to cuddle this little boy to sleep, too, but she’s not doing his parents any favors by that.

Gibbs hangs around the Palmer house for a few hours, and then it’s getting kids from daycare, time. He’s getting ready to go, and Ed says, “Want some company?”

“Sure.” He’s had the feeling all afternoon that Ed and Jeannie have wanted to talk to him, alone. Might as well get it out of the way.

Just about out the door, when Jimmy, who’s gotten about as much daytime napping done as he can, hands Gibbs his keys. “No kid seats in the truck.”
Gibbs and Ed share a look. In some ways life was easier back in the pre-safety days.

Gibbs takes the keys, gives Jimmy a hug, nods, and then they head off.

For the first few minutes of the trip, they’re both quiet. Ed doesn’t appear to be ready to say what he’s thinking, and Gibbs isn’t about to try and pull it out of him.

At a stop sign, Ed looks back, sees that there are two carseats, and not a ton of room for number three, and says, “They’re going to need a bigger car.”

“They’ve got one.” Gibbs has Jimmy’s car, which is usually for heading to work and back. It’s got room for two car seats in the back, and three could probably be squeezed in, tight, but most of the time, that doesn’t matter, because it’s got one, or maybe two, adults in the front and that’s it. When they go anywhere with all the kids, they take the van or one of the McGees’ Highlanders.

Ed shrugs. That’s true. “Just tricky when you’ve got to make sure the right car goes to the right place at the right time, or you end up stranded.”

Gibbs inclines his head a bit. He knows that he prefers not having to think about which car he takes where, when. “Something to be said for piling kids in the back of the station wagon.”

“Amen!” Ed lights up at that. “I remember all three of us in the back of Mom’s station wagon. Somehow, we all survived.”

Gibbs grins at that. “Dad had a truck, big, old Ford. A ’38 or something. It was old, when I was a kid. Him, me, Mom, no seat belts, bumping down the road.”

Ed nods. “Yep. When the girls were little, Jeannie had a… I don’t remember. Some sort of Pontiac. It was bright yellow. We’d pile them in, and some of their friends. Pre-school carpooling, six kids in the car.” Ed shakes his head. “Those were some loud trips.”

Gibbs laughs at that. “Kelly, Maddy, a few of their other friends, all in the backseat of Shannon’s Taurus. Girls can get really giggly.”

That brings up a lot of good memories for Ed. “You have the station wagon version?”

Gibbs nods, also remembering some very good memories.

“Think little boys are different?” Ed asks.

Gibbs shrugs. “Always had a pack of little girls at my place.”

“Yeah. I remember being one, but…”

Gibbs gets that. He remembers (sort of) being one, but he’s sure that his parents had a very different idea of what it was like to raise one than his idea of what it was like to be one.

“We’re going to find out,” Gibbs says.

Ed smiles at that. “Looking forward to it.” He watches the road for a few more seconds as Gibbs drives toward his house. (Picking up doggies before picking up kiddos.) “You think they’re serious about this whole… living together thing?”

Gibbs does his best not to smirk at that, or laugh outright. “Yeah. They are.”

Ed stares at the ceiling of the car and sighs. “It’s weird.”
Gibbs doesn’t say anything to that. He’s, very clearly, not arguing that point.

“Let me guess, Ducky had a half-hour monologue about different cultures where this sort of thing is really common and happens all the time, right?”

Gibbs does smile at that, and then says, “Hour and a half.”

“Did you listen to more than ten minutes of it?”

Gibbs chuckles. “I got the high points.”

“Yeah.” Ed watches Gibbs drive. “You’re really okay with this?”

Gibbs glances away from the road, and makes sure to put all of his Gibbs into the next bit. “Why wouldn’t I be?” He’s basically daring Ed to make an issue of it.

Which is actually what Ed wants to see. There’s exactly one man he knows who’s even more protective of his family than he is, and that’s Gibbs. If he’s closing ranks to defend this, it’s got to be okay.

Ed thinks about it for a moment. “You’re Pop to the McGee kids, and Uncle Jethro to the Palmer ones.”

“Molly and Kelly are calling me Uncle Pop right now.”

Ed laughs at that. “The title changes, but you’re basically grandpa to all five of them, right?”

“Yeah. Dave might call me Saba, or maybe he’ll join the Uncle Pop crew when he’s talking.”

“No playing favorites. No: these are the grandkids and these are… the step-kids.”

“No.” His voice and eyes are serious on that. “Just like their parents, the kids are mine.”

Ed nods at that. “Okay. Start telling me what Kelly likes. We’re not going to be that family where the kids have different sets of grandparents who treat them differently. I see too damn much of that at work. I’m not doing it at home.”

Getting the kids down for naptime goes about as smoothly as could possibly be expected from four excited little people who haven’t gotten a lot of mom and dad time and suddenly have Uncle Pop, Poppa, and Mona and Jackson to play with.

It’s not exactly a trainwreck, but Gibbs isn’t sure if Heather was happy for the help, or if it would have gone a lot easier if it had just been her.

He does see Ed watching Anna and Sean, sharing a crib, and Molly and Kelly who share a room.

“Donnie gets his own crib?” Ed asks when they’re downstairs, after the kids are (finally) asleep.

“Maybe?” Gibbs doesn’t know. “Anna and Sean are getting bigger. Right now, they seem pretty happy together. Sean gets nervous when there’s no one he can see, and Anna’s seems to like having someone else nearby. She’ll babble at him, talk a little. He’ll coo and babble, but not exactly in response. He just does it, sometimes. He doesn’t know she’s making any sounds, so, she’ll babble at him, and he’ll open and close his mouth at her.”

Ed doesn’t know if that’s encouraging or heartbreaking. He decides to focus on encouraging. “And they’re both signing a little.”

“Very little. He’s got three or four signs, and she’s got maybe ten.”

“Molly and Kelly are picking it up fast.” Ed’s noticed that his oldest granddaughter signs just about every time she starts to talk. Since the grownups are all in favor of her practicing as much as she can, they haven’t stressed, or even mentioned, the fact that if Sean’s not around, she doesn’t need to sign. “You guys are pretty sure he’s going to need it.”

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. Even with the implants they don’t expect him to have much more than 70% hearing in either ear. And they’re starting with one implant, hoping something better will come around before school time.”

Ed thinks about that for a moment, figuring out what 70% hearing in one ear would mean. “Good enough to duck if someone yells out to him.”

“Better than that, maybe a lot better, but he’ll likely need to see the words, too.”

It looks like Ed’s thinking about that, too.

Gibbs doesn’t have a lot of time after the kids go down for afternoon nap. He lingers for a few moments, talks a bit with Ed and Heather, and then he’s off. Time to get Ducky.

If there’s anyone who’s been more eager for the arrival of this little person (besides Breena) Gibbs wouldn’t believe it.

He finds Ducky at the train station, dressed in his usual early fall button down, pressed trousers, light jacket, and fedora, a floppy-eared stuffed bunny that’s just about the same size as Donnie, in his hands, eyes sparkling so hard they could light up the whole station.

Gibbs eyes the rabbit as they head for Jimmy’s car. Molly and Anna got stuffed corgis. Molly’s is the light caramel color that Gibbs thinks of a corgi-colored. Anna’s is a darker brown shade. He was expecting another corgi.

“Duck?”

He’s buckling his seatbelt, rabbit in his lap.

Ducky looks up, sees Gibbs staring at the rabbit. “I have it on good authority that as a small child Jimmy had one that he utterly adored, and as a youngster, the Velveteen Rabbit was one of Breena’s favorite stories.” He holds up the rabbit. “And thus, Donald gets his very own Velveteen Rabbit.”

Gibbs smiles at that. “Are you going to call him Donald?”

“Maybe. As a boy, everyone else called me Donnie. My grandfather would call me Donald. That always made me feel grownup, and special. A sign that he took what I was doing, and saying, and being, seriously.”

Gibbs smiles at that, suddenly getting why, unless specifically asked not to, Ducky always refers to people by their full names.

Jimmy’s walking Donnie around when he hears the door open. Little guy has had meal number too-many-to-count, burped, diaper changed, and every other need anyone in this house can think of attended to, but he’s still fussing away.

Tim’s sitting at the table, keeping them company.

“We’re in here,” Jimmy says, though why he couldn’t say. It’s not like the fussing baby is hard to locate by sound.

A moment later Gibbs and Ducky are in the kitchen with him, and Ducky’s shucking off his jacket and fedora. A moment after that, he’s taken his namesake in his arms, eyes glowing with a film of happy tears, saying, “Hello, Donald.”

And apparently what Donnie needed was his Ducky. He’s looking up at his great-grandfather, eyes wide and serious, a very intent expression on his face, fussing done.

Duck holds him close to his face, gently kissing him, supporting him in his hands. “I understand you gave your Mama and Daddy and Aunt Abby a bit of a surprise.”

Donnie coos at him.

“As is your prerogative. I think we were all hoping you’d come sooner rather than later. I know I’ve been waiting far too long to meet you…”

And Donnie rests in Ducky’s arms, listening to him talking, quiet, eyes wide, until they began to droop, lulled to sleep by a soft Scottish burr.

Donnie, on his back, sleeping in his crib, next to a light gray velveteen rabbit that’s longer than he is: that’s the photo Tim prints out to put on his wall at work.
Work.

They flip things around. Today Tim’s going in, and Abby’s calling out with her own ‘personal day.’

Tim really doesn’t want to leave. He wants to stay home, bask in Donnie, and then spend more time with the rest of the kids, getting them ready to come home tonight to meet their youngest sib-ousin… He shakes his head, sibling. Just go with that. That’s what this is, one big family. Except… what happens when Kelly calls Donnie her brother outside the family?

Cousin.

The kids are cousins, and it’s probably better if he just gets that bright and steady in his mind and keeps it there.

As soon as he’s in, Jennifer’s up, next to him. “Okay, let’s see ‘em!”

And Tim doesn’t need any more invitation than that. He’s got the picture of Donnie snoozing with his bunny to show off, along with a few hundred other ones on his phone. So, he hands over his phone as he heads into his office, and hunts down a clear bit of wall to add another picture to.

“Oh Tim! Look at him!” Jennifer’s cooing at the pictures of Donnie as Tim hangs the sleeping one up. “Oh, he’s such a sweetie, look at those…” And Tim’s fairly sure she’s about to say ‘eyes’ because she stops, and then looks at Sean’s brand new baby pictures, and back to Donnie, and back to Sean.

She stands there, just staring, saying nothing. Then she looks at Tim, really looks at him, and looks back at both pictures.

Tim smiles at her, and says, “You were about to say, eyes right?”

“Yes.”

He nods. “Sean’s will be green. We’re almost sure of that. We don’t know anything about Abby’s biological parents because she was adopted, but both she and her brother have green eyes. I know I’ve got a blue recessive hiding in there, so we’re almost certain Sean’ll have green eyes, like Kelly, but he could have something else. Breena’s got blue eyes, so for Donnie… he’s got about a fifty-fifty shot of blue eyes.”

“Oh…”

She’s staring at the photo of the four of them. The one from the lake, where they’re all tucked in close, arms around each other. The one that’s right next to his wedding shot with Abby. It’s not a rare angle for a selfie, they have to get in close for that, and there’s nothing untoward in that picture, just a lot of really wide shit-eating grins.

Tim thinks she’s really seeing that picture for the first time. He adds, “Do you know what Trisomy Jennifer looks back to Tim, shaking her head.

“How about Down’s Syndrome?”

“Yeah. I know about that.”

Tim finishes with the shot of Donnie sleeping, getting it taped to the wall, and then sits in one of the chairs at his conference table, pulling another one out, and patting it. Jennifer sits down, and Tim gets into it. “Okay. Downs Syndrome: that’s Trisomy 21. And it ranges from bad to fatal. Even the ‘mild’ cases involve some nasty problems. Trisomy 13…” Tim sighs, wishing he didn’t know this. “There’s no ‘mild’ version. The dry, medical way of putting it is that it’s ‘incompatible with life.’” He smiles weakly, and swallows. “Jimmy and Breena’s second child, Jon, had Trisomy 13. He, like most Trisomy 13 babies, was stillborn.” He smiles again, looking at pictures of his extended family. “And, they stuck together, and got through it, and tried again, and Anna’s as perfect as a baby girl can be, but waiting to find out if she was okay was nerve wracking. So…” He shrugs a little, like this is no big deal, and really, it’s not, but… It’s also not quite true, either. “Anyway. We love them. They love us. And if a bit of DNA from someone who wasn’t part of the mix that made Jon helped them to sleep easier at night and have a healthy baby, then that’s all there was to it.”

Tim looks at the picture of Donnie. “And there he is.” He’s smiling wide and happy. “Whole and healthy, keeping his mama and daddy up at night, exactly what he’s supposed to be doing. And if he looks a bit like his ‘cousin’ over there, well… I don’t mind at all, and neither does anyone else in our family.”

Jennifer looks at that. Nods slowly, leans back in the chair, and then says, “You practice that story a lot?”

Tim looks alarmed. “It’s true!”

“Uh huh. You mean it’s factual. Tim, I have friends. I have close family. I have a husband, too. Now, let me think about how you talk about Jimmy and Breena. Let me look at those family photos you’ve got all over your walls. Let me ponder why you took yesterday off. Hmmm… So, wanna try again?”

Tim spends a long time looking at Jennifer, and she looks just as long and direct, back. Finally he says, “Nope.”

“Oh huh.” She eyes the photos, and Tim, and then says, sincerely. “Congratulations on your son.”

“Nephew.”

“Maybe to the world out there, but you know who he is.” She nods to the rest of the photos, “and they do, too.”

Tim’s not sure what to do with that, but… As they say, a man can’t keep secrets from his secretary. She doesn’t appear to disapprove, other than of him lying to her, but… If there’s something he is sure of, it’s that he’s not saying anything except for the official party line while he’s in this office.

If he could have his computer recording, anyone else could have a bug in here, too.

He does, however, once she heads out, sit down, take a piece of paper, and write, by hand, Of course he’s my son. And Abby’s, and Jimmy and Breena and… Yes. You’re right. We’re not just ‘good friends.’ But in here, nothing goes past my lips about this, and I’d really appreciate it if it didn’t get past yours. You want to ask me about it, that’s fine, but not in the building.

Tim heads into her office, drops that on her keyboard, and then says, “Who am I seeing today?”

She quickly reads the note, smiles at him, nods, shreds it, and then says, “You’ve got your monthly update call with Sinjin Patil, but other than that, all of your work is on your computer.”

Tim nods at that, too. At least that’s one secret he’s kept from his secretary, she has no idea who Sinjin Patil used to be.

“On his computer” today, means going through more resumes. He’s got the basic idea of what he wants his crime triaging system to do. He knows how he wants the system that will let people report crimes to work. Getting that streamlined into one, fully functional, completely integrated FBI-wide system is a massive task.

One he’s not even going to attempt to do by himself.

So, right now, he’s going through a list of who’s who, sending out, ‘How would you like to take a few hours and get to know more about this massive project I’m thinking about,’ emails, and figuring out how many people he’s going to need to build it, and out of all the names he’s got, who his dream team is, and who’s the B-team, and who needs to go into the poison pill pile.

He does that all morning long, and then, because he’s noticed he works better when he does this, he shuts everything down, gets up, walks around for a bit, and then grabs his typewriter and spends an hour eating lunch, playing with his dragons. (Shockingly enough, this scene involves a bright blue, tiny baby dragon.)

He’s back to his computer, sorting through more resumes when he hears the door to his office close, and, “Do you have any idea how bizarre it feels to just walk into the FBI and not have five hundred guys pull a gun on me?”

Tim looks up at Khan as he’s leaning against the door to his office. He glances at his computer. This is exactly the time Khan’s supposed to call him. He’s just here, in person, instead.

“Come on in. And, nope.”

Khan smirks at that. “I’d think not, Mr. Do-Right.” He does step further into the office, though he doesn’t sit down.

“What brings you to DC? Burning desire to see my pretty face?” Tim pulls his glasses off, tucking them into the collar of his shirt, and then winks at Khan.

Khan barks a short laugh, steps to Tim’s desk, and pulls a photo out of his backpack. Tim smiles at it. It’s him and Abby giving the camera the bird. “Seventeen thousand, four hundred and ninety-six files of this one picture, each with its own, randomly generated, file name. This is what you call a racy photo?”
Tim smirks. Nope, it's not. But that tells him how far Khan’s gotten into his mirror web. (It looks like his real computer system, it just isn’t.) It also tells him how well Khan’s doing on breaking his encryption. That photo actually can be decrypted. So can a few other files containing similarly innocuous content. The rest are highly encrypted gibberish. “Maybe.” He laughs a bit.

“Out of curiosity, how many months did you spend setting up your system before finding me?”

“I got on it two months before I came here.” And he spends at least an hour a week tweaking it further. It’s much harder to break into a system that’s constantly shifting.

Khan walks around his office, looking at most of the same things he had in his NCIS office. “No new books.”

“Working on a new project.” Tim nods at his typewriter. “Lunchtime is sacred here.”

He eyes what’s in Tim’s typewriter. “Dragons?”

“I like dragons.”

“Should have figured from the tattoo.”

“So… Good flight?” Tim’s supposed to get a heads up if Khan flies anywhere. He’s not, especially with his new ID, on the no-fly list, but he is tracked.

“I drove.”

He makes a mental note to have any gas purchases on his credit cards highlighted and sent to him.

Khan shifts attention from the room to Tim. “Thought it’d be more of a mess. The pictures on the news are mostly of destroyed bits of town.”

“Disaster porn never gets old. You go see the Capitol?” The closest anyone is allowed to get is the steps. The building is still a burned out hulk, and no one has been willing to pay to fix it. Jarvis is talking about allowing it to stay a ruin, a monument to what happens when people get complacent about their leaders. Tim thinks that’s fitting.

“Only to spit on it.”

“You and a lot of other guys.” He still doesn’t know why Khan is here. Maybe just to test his limits. Maybe not. He wouldn’t be the first guy who got into the building to go look around and get hints for what sort of password a man picks. (Not that he can get any for Tim’s password by doing that, but he does make a mental note to go and double check Jennifer’s.) Khan’s not saying so far, and technically he’s a “free man” so Tim won’t push it. “So, weekly report?”

“Sure. Just to check, I can go after government contractors, right?”

“Yes. Can’t go into their personal stuff, but if you stay in their business accounts, and the Feds they work with, you’re in the clear.”

“Non-US citizens?”

Tim’s not sure about that. “Don’t have any laws covering that, yet, so leave them alone, unless you find something hinkey in a Fed’s stuff. You find something hinkey?”

“Not yet, thinking about what I want to do, where I want to go.” Last month he’d handed in the first of his reports. The one where he ransacked the FBI’s own security. Tim had sent that onto the FBI’s
Cyber security Team with a “Drop everything and handle this” note attached to it. He makes another note to check up on that and see if they actually did anything. If they haven’t, Khan’s going to be able to raid the whole FBI and fuck things four kinds of sideways. “Do universities count as contractors?”

Tim shakes his head. “Nope. Hospitals don’t, either. Just because they get money from the government doesn’t make them fair game.” His eyes flicker, getting a sense of what Khan may have been thinking. “You were going to open a lot of research to the web, weren’t you?”

Khan shrugs. There is a certain poetry to unlocking all of that federally-funded research hiding behind expensive paywalls. “I’m not used to being on Team White Hat. It’s taking me a while to figure out what to do.”

For a moment, Tim tries to imagine what he’d do if given free rein to hack anything the government did. It’d take him a while to pick a project, too.

“Okay, limit yourself to companies doing direct business with the Feds, and how that business gets done. If you can prove that… I don’t know… Boeing or something, is paying kickbacks for contracts, go for it. Medical companies that are screwing the VA or Medicaid, and better yet, companies that are doing it with help from people in the VA or Medicaid… Stuff like that. Medicare and Medicaid alone could keep you in scandals until you’re ready for the retirement home.”

“You’ve got a cheery view of things.”

Tim nods to his window. The blinds are down right now, but both of them know what’d they see if they looked out. “You think I’m wrong?”

“No.” Khan passes over a thumb drive. “I went easy this month, called every member of Congress’s secretary, claimed to be a family member, acted frantic because I was locked out of the family computer, and asked for the password. I got four hundred of them.”

Tim sighs. Hacking 101 these days doesn’t involve a computer beyond the ability to google a phone number. Find whoever it is, sound appropriately flustered, call in, and just ask for a password.

“Your grandma’s staff passed.”

“Talk to an older guy with a Scottish accent?”

“Yes.”

“That’s her husband. He knows you aren’t on the up and up.” And though Tim hadn’t heard about that, it wouldn’t surprise him if Tony didn’t get a call about two minutes later, asking to track that call, and see who tried to scam them.

“A lot of them did, still, that’s an almost ten percent fail rate.”

Tim taps the drive. “I’ll pass the report on. You give it three months, and if they don’t change their passwords…”

Khan smiles. He intends to have a lot of fun with that.

“Try not to make your home a private country, please.”

Khan smiles at that, too. He’s still looking around Tim’s office. “Been reading up on you.”
“Dealing with insomnia?”

Khan turns away from the family photos to look at Tim as he asks, “You really bust your dad for gay bashing?”

Tim’s surprised that that’s what has Khan’s attention. He’d have assumed hacking the CIA, or some of his other, lesser known adventures would have been more impressive to him. “If it was in the papers, it must be true, right?”

That gets a snort of derision. “That’s why I’m asking.”

“Yeah, I did.”

Khan nods at him, and for a second, Tim thinks there might actually be some respect in that look. Then he walks around Tim’s office, looking at the pictures. He’s got a lot of them of his family up in there, on the walls, on his desk, and several clustered around his typewriter. He stops at Tim and Abby’s wedding photo, the one of them dancing together, and the shot, right next to it, of him, Jimmy, Breena, and Abby at the lake last summer. That’s the shot he’s looking at.

“You spend a lot of time with them.” There are pictures of Gibbs and Abbi, and Tony and Ziva, and Ducky and Penny, but for every one of them, there are three of the Palmers. The only people he’s got more shots of are the kids.

“As much as I can.”

Khan shakes his head a bit. “I really don’t want to see the racy photos, do I?”

Tim shrugs, not sure if he wants to say this out loud, in here, but... The thing with Jennifer was being really cautious. It’s unlikely that anyone is recording in here. Saying this now, less than five hours later, is a different flavor of cautious. Tim is certain that Khan is the most dangerous man he’ll ever have in this office, at least, to Tim, personally. Tim is also certain that if anyone is recording in here, Khan is vastly more dangerous that whoever may have come up with that plan. He doesn’t want Khan getting any ideas. “I’d rather you didn’t find them, but… For you seeing them, it’ll depend on how squirmy you think foursomes are. Let alone foursomes with my naked butt involved.” Khan doesn’t wince, but he doesn’t look like he wants to see that, either. “For me… Anyone who needs to know, already does, including my boss, and theirs. You can’t blackmail me, or them. I’m as out as I can be without taking out an ad in the paper. And if you want to take the ad out for me, the worst they can do is fire me, and if that happens the FBI will have your face and name back on the most wanted list.” Tim doesn’t have to mention how many of Khan’s former acquaintances will also suddenly learn he’s not nearly as dead as he used to be.

Khan watches him for a long moment before saying, “The man with a clean conscience?”

“Something like that.”

Khan rolls his eyes. “You guys tend to be boring.”

Tim smiles. “I intend to spend the rest of my life being dreadfully boring. The last year and a half was more than enough excitement for three lifetimes.”

“Uh huh…” Ajay keeps walking around the office, looking at pictures and the like. Tim lets him. He looks like he might be working up to saying something, or maybe Sun Tzu style, he’s just learning his enemy, Tim’s not sure. After another moment, Khan says, “So, you don’t waste good?”

“That’s the idea.”
“And you thought of me?”

“You got out of Clement’s building, and if it had gone up, you would have gotten away perfectly clean. No one would have ever looked for you again. Getting us the intel to make sure the building didn’t go up had no upside for you personally.”

Khan blinks. “I didn’t want to see more than five hundred people die for no good reason. That’s what got you interested? That’s... I mean, look, I’m not a good guy, but... Hell, you’ve got to be an actively evil one to let that bomb sit in place. How low are your standards for good?”

Tim shrugs at that. “The fact you can really code got me interested. The fact you didn’t let them die made me think I could possibly work with you, if I could ever find the right job.”

Kahn nods. He pulls out another thumb drive. “You said I could have a team. I want her.”

“I’ll look into it.” Tim’s holding the drive. “This a friend of yours?”

“I’ve never met her in person, don’t think you have, either, but we both know her.”

Tim pulls out one of his ‘disposable’ netbooks, and sees Kahn notice that he does it, and then pops the drive into it. His eyes skim over the dossier on the screen in front of him. “Yeah, I know her. Not sure if I can get her out of jail, let alone put a computer in her hands, but... I’ll look into it. Why do you think she’s good?”

Kahn smiles. “I used to trade intel on Silk Road; she set it up. Come on, she was a kindergarten teacher before she went dark side. There’s got to be some soft and fuzzies in there.”

“Liking five-year-olds and having a lot of patience isn’t exactly what I mean by ‘good,’ but...” But if Khan is right, and they can work with her... She’s certainly got the skills, and then some. “How long are you sticking around?”

“Figured I’d do a few days here, then up to New York, maybe hit Boston, go wander around MIT and moon Dean Rutherford if he’s still there, and then home.”

Tim chuckles. If there’s anyone he’d want to moon, Dean Rutherford, who had been an old-school mechanical engineer back in the day, and somehow got saddled with the forensic computing department under his purview, would be on the list. They had great professors, but Rutherford was a massive pain in the ass who just wanted them to all go away and let him build bridges.

“Stick around for a few days, I’ll see if I can get a meet up with her. See what, if anything, I can do about her sentence. If you think walking into the FBI without anyone pulling a gun was a trippy experience, get ready to visit a prison as part of team White Hat.”

Kahn shakes his head. “I still think you’re insane.”

“Join the club.”

Do you believe in second chances?

Tim’s thinking that as he’s looking through resumes.
Once upon a time, there would have one more name in this pile, Kevin Hussein.

Kevin was good. Just a little gullible and a little greedy, and put those together and a lot of people got hurt.

The computer Black Hat team he’s got Khan building is going to need constant surveillance. Keeping track of it isn’t something he should really be doing in his off time. It should have someone, someone good, who does nothing but keep eyes on it.

The last thing he does, before heading home, is give Jennifer Kevin’s name and number, and ask her to set up a time for them to meet. Maybe he’d be interested in a second chance, too.

Tim’s heading home, his home today. He’s going to pick up the kids, grab some dinner, and then they’re all going home. It’s time for little guys to meet Donnie.

He’s holding Sean in one arm, Anna in the other, and kicking open the door. Molly and Kelly go tearing in, and fortunately, Abby’s on point, sweeping them up before they charge in.

“Shhh… Very quiet. Little guys like quiet,” Abby says, before letting them go, and they walk, quiet…er… into the living room. Donnie’s both awake, and just finished eating, so he’s in as good, and perky, of a mood as he gets these days.

He watches his sister and cousin, and they look at him. Molly’s not terribly impressed with him. Sean’s her baby, this new little guy is the person who stole her Mama for two days. She scrambles onto the sofa, and gloms onto Breena. (Anna’s fussing at Tim, trying to leap off his arm, also in a quest to get to Breena. He walks over, and gently gives her to Breena.)

Kelly’s watching him closely. He’s on the sofa, between Jimmy and Breena, in a little blue onesie, mittens on his hands, lying on his back, kicking at the ceiling a little. She grabs his foot as it flails up, and puts it to her hand. It’s just a little smaller than her hand.

“Little feet,” she says it, and drops his foot so she can sign it.

Tim nods, sitting on the sofa next to Jimmy, scooping both of his kids into his lap, so they can see Donnie easily, and so he’s got a bit more control of what they do next.

Abby’s getting video of all of this, and Jimmy picks up Donnie, holding him up so that he’s closer to his sisters.

“This is your little brother.” With both of them snuggling into Breena, they’re willing to give Donnie a little more attention.

Molly pats her Mama’s tummy. “He’s out now.”

“Yes. He is.”

She pulls up Breena’s shirt and looks at her belly, patting it. “How?”

That gets a bit of chucking from the adults, and a few quick looks along the lines of how to explain this to the three-year-old?
Abby starts a very streamlined version of girls, boys, and how that all works but Molly gets bored about ten words in, so Breena says, “I pushed him out,” and makes a little grunting sound along with a pop sound, and that seemed to do the job just fine.

A few hours later, when they’ve got all of the older kids down, and Donnie’s sleeping, too, Jimmy says to Abby, “It’s probably the tired talking, but going from four to five doesn’t seem nearly as daunting as I thought it would be.”

She chuckles at that. “Yeah. I think it is. Let’s see how it looks when you’ve got some more sleep in you.”

He kisses her gently, and heads toward bed.

Abby ambles downstairs, makes herself a cup of tea, and drifts over to where Tim and Breena are. They’re both on the sofa. He’s got his laptop on his lap, researching Heidi Partridge, getting to know more about what she did before they tossed her in jail. The more he learns about it, the more impressed he is, and the more he’s wondering where the line between Team White Hat and Team Black Hat is.

Breena’s next to him, lying on her side, dozing away the minutes between now and Donnie waking up again. Should be sometime in the next half hour. Once he’s up again, fed again, and down again, she’ll go upstairs to sleep in her bed, instead of snoozing on the sofa.

Abby sits on his other side, reading his screen, nodding.

“I remember her.”

There’s a question in his eyes as he looks at her.

“They arrest, what, two female hackers, let alone good ones, a decade. Then there was the fussing about her case. She stuck out. Why are you reading up on her?”

“My college buddy wants her for his team.”

Abby parses that sentence for a moment, and then nods. “Isn’t she in jail for like six consecutive life sentences?”

“Eight.” He rolls his eyes. He’s read the cases against her, and they couldn’t pin anything illegal on her, so they put her away for multiple lifetimes for creating a marketplace for other people to do illegal things. People did use her market place to hire hits on other people. At least, that’s what the cases say. They charged her and found her guilty on all eight of them. Since the details weren’t out in public, no one knows for sure if said hits ever happened. They do know they were advertised, and someone signed up for them, and someone got paid.

It’s not outright stated, but it’s very heavily hinted that if she’d rolled on the people buying and selling on her market, she’d have walked. It is stated, and Tim believes it, that there was no way for her to do that. If her software did what she said it did, there was no way for her to know who was selling what on her market, or buying it. That’s why her market was popular. No way to trace who did what. In many cases, the buyers and sellers didn’t know who was who, either, and they never did.

Before everything went insane, when there was still a Supreme Court, her lawyer had a case pending, pretty much trying to see if the Feds really could bust her for running a market, which is fully legal, just because illegal stuff got sold in said market. When they arrested three of nine justices, and five others resigned, the Court got sidelined, and all of the cases pending are just hanging. Tim thinks there might be four justices now, but they’re not exactly zipping through confirming new ones. The longer the court is offline, the longer Congress can keep doing whatever it likes.

The downside of all of this is that he’s got no idea if there’s anything he can offer this woman to make her even remotely interested in working for him. More basic than that, he’s got no idea if there’s any sort of job he can offer her, period.

“What would she do for you?” Abby asks.

Tim gives another shrug. He knows what he’d hire her for, namely making it so people could safely, anonymously report crimes on his system. Her market was as good as they said it was. She was the only person they were able to stick an ID on and prosecute for it. And if she could do that, she could make him a system so people could blow whistles all damn day long without fear of reprisals.

What Khan would do with her…

He can ask him that. See what he has to say. The suspicious part of Tim’s mind knows exactly what Khan would do with her, namely use her skills to make sure he can do whatever he likes, invisibly. That feels way too plausible for Tim’s comfort. He’s definitely going to get that answer out of Khan before he decides to let Khan anywhere near her.

Tim thinks about that even further. Even if Khan has a good plan for how to use her skills, he still may go around him. Getting a whistle-blower site up and running, and running well matters more than whatever Khan and Co. may get up to.

“Do you have any plan?” Abby asks as he’s musing away.

Tim shrugs at that, too. “I guess I get to go and introduce myself to Howard Tarkin, the current acting Director of the FBI, and see if I can get him interested in popping her out of jail.”

“Give Penny a call, maybe she can wriggle a Congressional pardon or something like that.”

Tim thinks that’s an awful good idea, and one that doesn’t involve him having to remind the current guy in charge that he’s got his job because of him.

Tim smiles at Abby, kisses her, gives Breena’s foot a gentle squeeze, and gets up to go make a quiet phone call.

“Hey Penny,”

“Tim! Hi!”

“Do you have time to talk, or am I getting you in the middle of something?” Just because it’s post-tubby quiet time at his house, doesn’t mean it is quiet time for Penny.

“I’ve got a few minutes. They’re reading the text of a bill I know inside and out, so I can talk until they’re done.”

“They’re actually reading the bills now?”
“Yeah, for some reason Jake thought that was a really important provision to get passed. All bills have to be read into the register before they can be voted on. That’s made for some shorter bills, and some hoarse legislators.”

That amuses Tim.

“So, what’s got you calling? Can’t be baby advice. I’ve been seeing the pictures and you all look like pros, sleep deprived pros.”

Tim snersks at that, and then says, “You know anything about Heidi Partridge?”

Penny thinks for a moment and then says, “She hit my radar a while back. One of the law professors at American was writing an amicus brief on her behalf. I didn’t think he had a leg to stand on, too much precedent contra his point, but he was doing it. Why?”

“Well, I just finally noticed she existed, and now that I know about her, I’m wondering if I can use her, but, she’s in jail, and I’m not even sure who’s got dibs on her at this point.”

Penny thinks about that. “I know that officially, the DEA brought the case, because there were drugs being run right and left on her market. I know unofficially the IRS was who made sure the case didn’t get dropped or go away.”

That makes pretty much no sense to Tim. “Why the IRS?”

“Because a market the US can’t regulate is a market it can’t tax. More than half of her transactions didn’t use any sort of traditional cash. They traded in goods and bitcoin. For illegal goods, that’s just a blip on the screen, but full, real anonymity means that anyone could trade for anything on there. What happens when buyers and sellers decide to skip Amazon and go full anon? Some of them were starting to. She had people offering lawn mowing services, pet sitting, art, yachts, and other things like that, too. They were starting to use her site as a white market, too. Suddenly, there’s a huge pile of money moving around, and no one can attach it to a person.”

Tim sighs and then thinks some more. “So she’s basically in jail for coming up with a system that could undermine the way the US government funds itself.”

“The way every government funds itself, Tim.”

“So, what you’re telling me is that hell will freeze over before there’s any shot of me putting a computer back into her hands and getting her working for me.”

“Exactly. I mean, try, certainly, but my guess is if you go to any US Attorney and try to make a deal, they’ll laugh you out of the office.”

Tim’s eyes narrow. “Lovely.”

In his office the next morning, Tim’s tempted to ping Khan’s phone, and then just show up wherever he is. He’s not sure how they got into this pattern, but he’s thinking now’s probably a good time to nip it in the bud. So he calls.

“Hello, Sinjin.”

“McGee…” Khan sounds wary, or maybe half asleep. He may not be the kind of person who’s usually awake at 8:32 AM.

“T’m looking into Heidi Partridge. What did you want her for?”

There’s a pause, and what Tim imagines is a smirk, and then the sound of moving around. He hears a mumbled, “Excuse me,” more moving around, a door closing, and water turning on. Then Khan says, “You want me to hack people and sell their stuff. Assuming I don’t want to end up dead, I need a way to do that without getting caught. I figured if anyone could build me the system I need to do it, and do it right, it’d be her.”

Tim’s nodding on his side of the phone. That’s a really good answer.

“Okay. I’m working on it, and I don’t know if I can get her. My feelers aren’t suggesting this’ll be easy. Give me a day or two, with any luck, by then I’ll have a meet up for us on the books.”

“See you then.”

“Have fun.”

“I was…” trails off and then Tim hears a dial tone. He smirks a bit at that, too, fires off a request for more information about Heidi, and then goes back to looking for some co-builders for his project.

Kevin Hussein looks nervous as he walks into Tim’s office. Getting a call from the Director of Public Corruption, even if he is a guy you know, especially if he fired you from your last job, is a nervous making sort of thing.

Tim hopes his smile will help to ease this, and it does, a little. Kevin’s shoulder unhitch, and he sits down easily enough.

“I wasn’t expecting to ever hear from you again,” Kevin says. “At least, not without a subpoena.”

Tim shakes his head a bit, gets up, goes to the coffee maker, and gestures. Kevin shakes his head at that, and Tim crosses the room to sit down across from him at the conference table.

“No subpoenas. I was wondering if you had any interest in taking another stab at law-enforcement?”

Kevin looks stunned by that. Eventually, “Uh…” comes out of his mouth followed by, “You know I wasn’t an agent, right?”

“Yes. I don’t need an agent. I’ve got agents. And I’ve got one team… I’m working on building it, and… I’m going to need someone to keep eyes on it.”

“Like a manager?” Kevin’s intrigued by that.

“More like a babysitter.”

It’s clear from Kevin’s expression that that is not the magic word to make him want to sign up. “And you thought of me?”

“I need someone good. You’re good. I’m putting together a hacker team that’s basically me holding the tiger by the tail. If they play the way I want them to, we’ll get a lot of valuable information from it. If they don’t, people get mauled. I want to know if you’re interested in stopping potential maulings?”
Kevin thinks about it. Tim knows he’s got a job with a small, local company, probably a few levels below his skill set, keeping their computers running. He likely took an intentional step down so he wouldn’t have someone too picky about his last job and lack of references, who could then give him good references for the next one.

“Why would I want this job?” Kevin asks.

“Because it’ll be challenging. You’ll be keeping eyes on at least one, and maybe more, of the slickest Black Hats I could con into working for me. And if you do your job right, they won’t know about it.”

Kevin’s looking mildly disturbed by that. “Why would you trust me with it?”

“I don’t waste good. I saw how you looked when we got to the end of the Clements case. You didn’t want that to be the way things ended. So, here it is, try number two. You want it?”

Kevin’s looking wary, like hope may be starting to shine through, but he’s afraid of letting it grow too strong. “Who would I be watching?”

“I’ve got Sinjin Patil right now, and might be able to get Heidi Partridge. Not sure who comes next, but I know this group will grow.”

Kevin looks confused when he says Sinjin, and shocked at Heidi. “I know who she is. Who’s he?”

Tim shakes his head. “Beyond Sinjin Patil, you don’t need to know.”

“Oh.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. If this works the way I hope it does, you’ll never see each other, and they won’t know you’re lurking. But lurk you will.”

“And what will they be doing?”

“I’ve given them free rein to hack any chunk of the government they feel like hacking. Sell whatever they can find. They’ve got to report what they’ve broken into, and how they did it, but if whoever got hacked can’t tighten up their own security, they’re welcome to raid the till.”

“That can’t be legal.”

“I’ll worry about that. I think what we’re going to do will be so useful, that even if it’s not, they’ll look the other way. After all, they’ve been letting the CIA pull this sort of crap for years, why not us?”

Kevin doesn’t have a good answer to that. He stares at McGee, thinking. “I sort of feel like this is a test. Like, I take this job, and I watch them do whatever it is, am I supposed to report it?”

“To me.”

“I know to you, but… They hack the DEA, should I report it to them, too?”

“If you like, but I’d prefer you didn’t. I don’t want to spend all of my time bailing these guys out of jail and on the phone with other high muckety-mucks in a massive pissing contest.”

Kevin eyes Tim, walls up, very wary and defensive. “This is how I got fired before. You told me to be smarter.”
Tim smiles at that. “I did. Take some time, check my credentials. I can offer you this job, if you want it.”

There’s a hint of a smile in Kevin’s eyes as he stands up. “I’ll do that. You can really hire me?”

“For this, I can and will.”

Two days later, Tim’s happily coding away, a snippet of part of how he wants his job triaging system to work, that he’s got to get down before it runs away, when a soft buzz almost attracts his attention, but doesn’t.

Two hours later, he checks his phone and sees that he’s gotten a response to his request for everything on Heidi Partridge.

Tim stands up, walks around his office, stretching out, as he taps the screen, looking forward to see what it was they really busted her on and with, but that’s not in his email.

“There are no records matching the person requested.”

Tim’s so shocked by that he says it out loud.

“No.” He steps back to his computer, brings up his own connection to the Federal Prison database, and begins to go through it.

Nothing.

He tries every variation of her name he can think of.

Not a word.

Tim sighs, and then rubs his eyes. He double checks, googling her name. Yep, tons of information. He’s staring at the New York Times article describing her eight consecutive life sentence term and the screen saying there is no such person in the Federal system.

“Okay,” he mutters. “Federal Witness Protection… or something like it.” But there’s a cold feeling in the pit of his stomach.

He google’s her lawyer, and puts in a call to her. No answer. No voicemail. The phone just rings. That cold feeling is getting more pronounced.

There are news stories about her until the week before everything went sideways. They said a court date had been set for spring, but, of course, by spring there wasn’t a court to have said date in. And after that, any mention of her online goes black.

He fires off an email to Jennifer, asking her to get the Federal Prosecutor who handled Heidi’s case on his calendar. Then he scans the articles, finds one that mentions interviewing her at Holston Federal Correctional Facility, and gives them a call.

He waits on hold, and eventually a polite voice answers and asks what she can do for him.

“Hi, I’m Tim McGee, Director of Public Corruption for the Federal Bureau of Investigations.” He rattles off his ID number and waits a moment for her to confirm he’s on the up and up. “I was wondering if I could see one of your prisoners.”

“I can certainly see about arranging that. Who would you like to see?”

“Heidi Partridge.”

“Just give me a moment.”

That moment turns into ten. And ten turns into a new voice on the phone when he gets a person again.

“Director McGee?”

“Hello.”

“This is John Setter, Director of Holston Federal Correctional Facility. Who did you want to see?”

“Heidi Partridge. She’s serving eight life sentences for running Silk Road. Her case will go up before the Supreme Court as soon as we’ve got one again. She’s got information I’d like to get.”

Tim hears the swallow on the other end.

“Ah. Yes… That Heidi Partridge. She’s no longer with us.”

Tim closes his eyes and sighs, hard. “Okay. Is she dead?”

The voice on the other end trembles a bit. “We have no reason to believe that.”

“Excellent. Then you can tell me where she is now?”

The voice gets very soft. “No.”

“No, you can’t tell me, or no, you can’t tell me?”

There’s a long silence where Tim can feel that John Setter would rather say anything than what he’s about to say right now. “We… don’t know what happened to her.”

Tim bites his lip, hard. “Okay. Did she escape?”

“Maybe.” There’s a lot of fire in the next words. “My people are looking into it. Somehow she got out of our prison, without attracting any attention, so whenever she was last here, the people who regularly checked her cell, made sure she went where she was supposed to, and all the rest of it were satisfied that her not being there anymore was on the up and up, but as of right now, there are no records of her in our system, at all.”

Tim looks up at the ceiling and bites his lip again. “Any idea when she was last seen?” If the answer is before last summer he’s going to raise Clements from the dead and punch that asshole just to do it.

“We think last October.”

That’s a bit of a relief.

And then it’s not a relief at all, because something happened to her, while the world was upside down, and… “Shit,” eases out of Tim’s lips. The military handed itself over to the state national guards. But during that month when the government was down he has no idea what happened with Federal prisons. Did the guards go to work? Did they get food shipments? “Who was running your prison last October?”

“We were handed over to the state of North Carolina, and their prison board handled it.”

“Did your people stay on?”

“Some of them. I wasn’t working here then. My predecessor,” his voice gets soft again, like if he says it quietly, it’ll be less true, “was arrested for corruption in the sweeps that happened after the Fall.”

Tim nods. A lot of Federal Employees were on Team Black Hat, and where better to have a Black Hat than running a federal prison?

“Uh huh. I will have agents over to talk with you shortly. Get a report of everything you know about her, and I’ll start the missing person’s report.”

There are times where Tim wants to be a field agent again. Right now, for one. Right now he wants to go and get in his car, and drive to…

Okay, no he doesn’t want to drive to North Carolina.

He wants to go home tonight, and spend time with his family and kids.

He does want to be investigating what happened to Heidi Partridge. He wants to know what happened to her. Did she plan her own escape? Was Penny right about her being too big of a threat to the powers that be, so they took her out? Is this just a glitch where she got transferred to something, and suddenly there are no records of it and…

Okay, no on that last one. There is no possible benign reason for this.

Tim gets a missing person’s report started, and while he types with one hand, he makes a call.

“Sinjin…”

“I thought part of the deal was I come up with my own assignments.”

“Heidi Partridge vanished out of a Federal Correctional Facility some time after last October without a trace.”

And that gets a pause out of Khan followed by, “You want me to find her?”

“If you can. Barring that, how she got out. I’ve got an official missing person’s report going, but she’s been gone almost a year, from a prison, and no one noticed.”

“You’re not holding out any hope of finding her through traditional methods.”

“I’ll look, rattle cages, yell at the Federal Prosecutor and all the rest of it, but no, I’m not expecting to get much. So, you’re up.”

Khan thinks about that. “Which prison was she at?”
“Holston Federal Correctional Facility.”

“I’m on it.”

“Hey, Kevin,”

“Hi, McGee.”

“So, what if I offer you a completely above the line, on the books, totally legal assignment? Would that interest you?”

This time there’s no wariness in his voice. “Yes.”

“Heidi Partridge went missing from a Federal Correctional Facility last year. I’ve got Sinjin looking for her. I want you looking, too. For her, and for what he does. I don’t want him finding her and neglecting to mention the fact to me.”

Kevin’s still a beat behind Tim. “She went missing from a federal correctional facility?”

“Yes.”

He can feel the look Kevin must be giving him.

“Exactly. We know she was there last October, and after that… We don’t know. The guy who ran the place before the current one got busted after the Fall. I’ll get his name and anything I can find on him, too.”

“Okay. So, if we’re both actually looking for her, should I meet this Sinjin guy?”

Tim’s just about to say yes, that both of them working this together would be a great idea until a tiny little niggling, sleep deprived part in the back of his head screams DANGER! WARNING! loud enough for him to remember the last time Kevin and Khan met.

“No. You’re better off compartmentalized.”

“You think he’s going to give me a better offer than you can?”

“I think he’s dangerous enough that we’re both better off with him not knowing you’re keeping an eye on him. He knows I’m doing it, and that’s fine. He doesn’t need to know you are.”

Kevin doesn’t say anything for a moment, and then adds, “Did you know there are 887 Sinjin Patils in the US.”

“Nope.” But Khan probably did when he picked that name. Hide in the crowd.

“Okay. Send me what I need to keep eyes on him. I’m in.”

“Thank you.”

Tim heads out of his office, to Jennifer. “Hey, how are you doing with tracking down that Federal Prosecutor?"
She shakes her head.
Tim raises and eyebrow.
“Not on the rolls anymore. Vanished in October.”
“How vanished?”
“Went to work one day and never came home. His family has a missing person’s report out for him.”
Tim rubs his forehead. “It never ends.”
“Tim?”
“I’m thinking someone did some cleaning house when everything fell apart. The only question is, do we have whoever someone is? Are they sitting in a jail in New York? Or are they still jerking around puppets by the strings?”
“Finding stuff like that out is our job, right?”
Tim nods.

The problem with being the manager, especially of a very new operation, is that Tim just doesn’t have enough warm bodies in chairs to do the damn job.
Which just intensifies his desire to go out and do it, himself.
But if he’s doing it himself, the system that catches all the other damn crimes doesn’t get built.
He’s grinding his teeth together as he’s sitting at his computer, staring at this problem. This nebulous, undefined, murk of shit that…
“Okay.” He makes himself stand up and start moving around. Grinding his teeth to nubs isn’t helping anything. Why Gibbs had that baseball bat at his desk is suddenly making a lot more sense to Tim.
Is this one missing person?
Clearly, no. Not if her lawyer isn’t answering the phone and the prosecutor who worked on her case is missing person’s report missing.
Is this cleaning up one case? Is this a very well run escape? “Shit.” He’s going to need more from Khan and Kevin before he can even get a hint on that. If it is an escape… “SHIT!” Is it a kidnapping? Just because she didn’t know her customers didn’t mean that, especially after the case, that they didn’t know her, and when everything went crazy, a bunch of people may have decided having her on the outside would be a very good plan.
“Shit!”
That cold feeling creeps down his spine. The Federal Prison system got handed over to the states, who may or may not have been extremely vigorous in making sure that those prisons were run correctly. He doesn’t know if there was any sort of accounting after the Feds got the prisons back to make sure that everyone who was supposed to be in said prisons were still in them.

“Double shit!” Like Setter, there are a lot of new wardens at different federal prisons because more than one person noticed that it would be a really good plan to make sure the guy in charge of the place let the guys in the place keep running their operations.

Tim’s jonesing for a baseball bat right now. Something to grip onto and maybe swing around some would be really nice. He confines himself to pacing around his office.

Talking out loud helps, too.

“A: Who’s missing?” He needs to find out if anyone involved in the Partridge case is still accounted for. That one is fairly simple. He can toss that down to Hotch, and he can hand it off to someone on team White Hat.

“B: Who’s missing? Meta version.” That needs a full accounting of the US Federal Prison system. Huge job. He can’t just bounce that over to Hotch. That needs a full, dedicated team of White Hats, someone who’s got some tech skills, someone who’s used to dealing with bureaucrats, someone who’s… A name forms in his mind. He doesn’t really have a mental image of the guy, because he hasn’t met him in person.

But Gibbs has. And Gibbs gave him the CV and vouched for the guy, and Tim happily handed him the New York office.

He pokes his head out of his office, “Jennifer, can you get me Mac Taylor on the line. He’s the guy I’ve got working in New York.”

Then he pops back in and starts strolling around again. “C: Who should be missing?” If there is someone they didn’t see, still pulling the strings, or at least doing it ‘round October, who else would they have vanished?

Tim sighs, hard, at that. He doesn’t know. He doesn’t know how to know. He doesn’t know who would know, either.

He’s got the space for it on his organizational chart, well, at least in regards to laws and regulations. He wanted his troop of lawyers to read the damn things and figure out how to screw things up with them. And this is sort of like that. Who would you vanish if you had a vested interest in certain results? What he doesn’t have is any actual people working in that department. He doesn’t have a department, period, for that, yet.

And he’s got no clue, not in concrete, this person right here would be great at this, terms of who should run this.

And fortunately, he doesn’t have to think about that too much longer, because Mac Taylor is apparently fairly easy to get on the phone.

“Hi, Mac.”

“Director McGee.”
“Just McGee, or Tim if you like. Anyone Gibbs recommends as highly as you, doesn’t have to use my title.”

“Thanks, McGee, what has you calling?”

“How are you doing on getting your office set up?”

He can feel the smile on the other end. The smile that’s half grimace. He’s been in charge of the New York office of White Hats for about five weeks. Which is just about long enough to unpack the chairs, stick a few butts in them, and maybe slap some paint on the walls. “It’s going. Not as fast as I would like, but I’ve got some good core people.”

“Excellent. Do you have enough of them to start a big project, while ramping up?”

“How big of a project?” Tim hears eagerness in Mac’s voice. He may be doing a fine job of setting things up, but he wants real work.

“We’ve got jurisdiction over pretty much anything the government does. I just found a case where someone walked out of a federal prison, maybe.”

“Maybe?” Mac sounds intrigued.

“Maybe. She’s not there now. She was there before the Fall. No one knows what happened.”

“Sounds interesting, but not big.” Mac isn’t wrong about that.

“I’ve already got the case of the missing lady assigned. The big part is, how many other people vanished from federal prisons during the Fall? Got ‘transferred?’ Or ‘early released?’ Or…”

Tim can feel Mac leaning back in his chair and nodding. “I’ve got you. See if there’s been a full census since the Fall. See if that census actually makes sense. See who’s missing, see why, and find out what happened to them, and how they got out, and who let them out.”

“Yeah. Top to bottom, check the whole thing out.”

Mac exhales audibly. “That’s big.”

Tim's pleased to hear the pause while Mac thinks through it. “I can start it. If I put everyone I’ve got on it, we can begin, but I don’t have the man power, not yet, to do it right, or finish it anytime soon.”

“I don’t have a set time for finishing. Build your office, keep adding new people, and as you get them, put them on this. Keep sending me reports on what you find. My guess is for the first few months mostly what you’ll be doing is keeping some baby agents on hold with different prisons, yelling at them to send over lists of who was there in September of ‘16, and who’s there now, and an explanation for anyone who’s on list A and not on list B.”

Mac audibly smirks at that. “These things do start slow. I’ll get people on it.”

“Thanks, Mac.”

_____________________________________________________

After dinner, during the part of the night where the little kids are down, and Donnie is having dinner number one (or lunch number three, it’s hard to keep track with these little guys) Tim explains the situation to his spouses.

“Does anyone else have the image of Kevin, in the StormTrooper outfit, bursting in on Heidi, ‘I’m here to rescue you!’ while Khan hangs back in the Han Solo costume?” Abby asks as he gets to the end of the missing hacker part.

Tim laughs at that, and then says, “If I thought I could get them working together without killing each other, I might have tried it, but…” he shakes his head. “Plus, it’s just as likely that Kevin busts in, and finds out that Heidi isn't Leia so much as the Grand Moff Tarkin, so she shoots him. Kevin’s not getting any closer to any of this than a computer keyboard."

“I’m glad you’re working with him again. He was always a good guy, just…” Abby’s not sure exactly how to finish that without casting dispersions about Kevin.

“Yeah, just… He’s reminding me of pretty much my entire team. A little stupid, a little greedy, and little too willing to look the other way if it worked out well for them. I smacked his hand a while back, so, with any luck the lesson stung, and he wants to do better now.”

“You think she ran, or got taken, or…” Jimmy’s asking.

Tim shrugs.

“The gut doesn’t know?” Breena adds.

“The gut knows something is bad, it doesn’t know what flavor of bad it is. Which leads to most of the rest of what I did today…” And from there Tim’s explaining what he’s got Mac doing, and how many possible levels of crud may be going on, he wraps with, “the thing is, I need someone who can look at who’s in prison, or should be in prison, or was in prison, and figure out from there who may have been scooped up. I mean, look… with what we’re doing now, I can only get people who were so sloppy as to leave a record that that person was in prison in place, and then had them vanish. If someone’s good enough to completely erase the record of them, I can’t find them, not with what I’ve got Mac’s guys doing.

“I need someone who knows what to look for, and can spend a lot of time online, checking around, seeing who got tossed in prison and who may have completely vanished, and I’ve got no idea who to put in that job.”

“You need a Black Hat’s Black Hat,” Jimmy says.

“Yeah, I need… Senior. Someone who knows everyone and what they’ve all been doing, but I need it for the real scumbags. Not somewhat sleazy business grifters.”

That gets some looking around, and Tim lets himself slouch back against the sofa, eyes closed.

After a minute of that, where the only sound is thinking adults and a nursing Donnie, Jimmy says, “Ummm… I mean, we don’t know, not really, what exactly he was doing, but… What about your Uncle Tom? Black Hat’s Black Hat, that was kind of his job description, right?”

Tim blinks, slowly. “Yeah.” Then he very gently boops Donnie on the tip of the nose. “You need to sleep longer, because I should have been able to think of that. All of us should have been able to think of that. We had dinner with King Black Hat three weeks ago at Shabbos, and somehow none of us thought of him.”

Jimmy clears his throat.
“Okay, Daddy thought of him. The rest of us should have gotten it at the same time, and I should have gotten it early enough that I would have just told you about calling him.”

Speaking of things Tim should have thought of, when he made the decision to call his Uncle Tom, he figured he’d call in the morning, because he’d done all the damn work he wanted to do and he wanted some time to just be with his family preferably while awake and when no one was crying.

But, the thing he didn’t think of is that it was his night for Donnie, and to say he’s hurting for sleep come morning time is something of an understatement.

He’s grumbling around his office, muttering about how there’s a reason people have kids when they’re teenagers/early twenty-somethings, and that reason is the ability to go days without sleep and not turn into a cranky snapping turtle.

He realizes he hasn’t actually put the coffee pod into his coffee maker, which is why he’s just sipping hot water, milky hot water. Sweet, milky, hot water he was paying so damn little attention to that he managed to doctor the damn thing up, without noticing the complete lack of coffee in his beverage.

“Stupid cranky snapping turtles.” He pours out the "coffee" and starts anew. This time making sure that there is indeed coffee in the machine.

He gets his computer on, and his email up. A few reports that he wants to see are there. Hotch has handed off the missing person investigation of Heidi Partridge to Seeley Booth, who Tim sort of remembers is someone Fornell thought would be good at this sort of thing.

Official investigation, check.

There’s an email from Kevin and Khan. He opens Khan’s first. The first paragraph is about how his next major hacking project is the Federal Prison system, and that a lot of guys are going to be getting their sentences reduced to nothing if they don’t tighten up their security.

Tim sighs, decides that’s fair game, and, while reading it, forwards the email onto Kevin, so he knows what’s up on this side of things.

Then he gets onto the next bits. Currently, there are some records that Heidi Partridge is a person who did time in federal prison for accessory to murder, blah, blah, blah, accessory to tax evasion, accessory to drug sales, accessory to blah, blah, blah and blah. Tim notes that she wasn’t convicted of actually doing anything herself, just helping other people do it.

Khan found her court dates for example, and her original arrest records. He was able to locate what jail she was in, who at the DEA talked to her, and the original case notes. He couldn’t find what happened to her after she was convicted. That’s where the trail went blank.

His last bit was about how he’s starting to hunt down where records should be, and looking for erase marks.

His letter from Kevin covers most of the same stuff, namely that Kevin’s reported that’s what Khan’s doing, and for his own investigations, he’s found that all of the bank accounts that Heidi had when she was arrested are still frozen, and apparently untouched.
Tim nods as he reads that, sighs a little, sips his coffee again, and comes to the conclusion that they’re likely tracking a dead woman, or people want them to think she’s dead.

He sends both of them ‘Good jobs! Keep it up!’ emails, and moves on.

The next step is another email, explaining what he wants to Penny, and asking her for a congressional warrant for it. He’s not sure if he can get it, even with that, but…

If Heidi is dead, or hidden well enough they can’t find her, he obviously cannot use her skills to modify her marketplace of secrets into a whistleblower site. Which means he needs to get into everything the DEA had on her, which, hopefully, includes all of her computers.

If he can lay hands on them, he can, along with the tech guys he really needs to get around to hiring, reverse engineer her goodies and use it to build his system.

He sips more of his coffee, feeling like he might have a few brain cells to rub together, and then, grabs his phone to call his Uncle Tom.

“Hi, Uncle Tom.”

“Tim?” Tom’s not so much checking to see who is calling, there’s only one guy with a Virginia number who calls him Uncle Tom, as expressing surprise to hear from him.

“Yeah. Could I take you to lunch, or coffee, and pick your brain some?”

“Uh… Yeah, sure. About what?” He sounds wary, and Tim wonders if he’s expecting some painful, emotional family heart to heart, trying to learn more about why John is who he is.

“A job offer, of all things, and if it’s not up your alley, then maybe you know someone who wants it.”

Tom sounds significantly more relaxed as he says, “Point me to the coffee.”

There are days when Tim really misses the Diner. Today is one of them. He’d like nothing better than to take his Uncle to a place where everyone knows him, won’t eavesdrop, will provide attentive service, and the food is just good.

He knows the part of town the Diner was in is pretty well cleared out now, but he doesn’t know if Elaine and her husband are coming back. He thinks they’re on the invite list for Gibbs’ wedding, so with any luck he’ll get to find out if they’re coming back sooner or later.

There is a coffee shop a few blocks down from the Hoover Building. It’s new. He’s never been in before, but it appears to have both coffee and tables, which is all Tim really needs.

So he’s there, and so is his Uncle, who ordered the largest cup they sell of the blackest, strongest coffee they sell. (Tim’s got a sugar-free, hazelnut latte in front of him, with whipped cream, and he’s practically daring Tom to make an issue of it. He ordered it intentionally, so he could dare Tom to make an issue of it, and is a bit embarrassed that he did that, but the guy does look and sound a lot like John. He doesn’t, however, make any comments about Tim’s ‘girly’ drink.)

“How are you liking retirement?” Tim asks once they’re both sitting down.

Tom looks exasperated. “Dad had the right idea, work until you drop. McGees were not meant to retire. I’m bored.”

Tim’s not sure he agrees with that, but he's also not about to comment on it, beyond, “Here’s hoping I can help with that.” And he gets into what he’s thinking.

The smile on his Uncle’s face gets wider and wider as he goes. Tim’s actually feeling like he’s got to rein this in a bit, because the guy’s about to leap up and immediately sign on for anything he can give him. “It’s not a field position. No cloak and daggering. At least, not for you. I need someone who can tell me who I need to make sure we’ve still got, and that they’re just sitting their butts in prison, doing nothing.”

“Look, Tim, in the last six months, I’ve bought a house. I’ve fixed it up. I got all of our stuff moved. I’ve gone to every movie Lynn’s wanted to see. I found the end of my never-ending-to-read list. We’ve seen every TV show ever made. I’m… done. Anything you could have me doing is a step in the right direction. And, I think I can take it one step further. You want to make sure we’ve still got the guys we had. And that makes sense. I can also put guys you didn’t know you wanted on the radar.”

“That would be good. I don’t know when I’ll have people—“

“Tim, my whole team is suddenly retired. I’ve got fifteen guys, trained SEALS who followed me to the CIA, who helped me take the whole thing down, who have been sitting on their asses for most of a year, which is something none of us were designed to do. I didn’t just go solo when I sent that envelope. My whole team vanished one night, because none of us wanted to be part of what we were doing. Just stick an FBI badge in my hand, and I’ll start making calls. By Monday, we’ll be up and ready to go.”

Tim feels an insane rush of pleasure at that. This is exactly the sort of thing he wants to hear. And since they were all CIA, they’ve all got the certifications to be Federal Agents, down.

Tim gulps his coffee, wide smile on his face. Then he stands up. “Come on. Let’s get you introduced to Walter Karningham. He runs my Black Hat ops, and I have a feeling you two will get on like a house on fire.”

Tom McGee practically leaps up, ready to get to it.

As Tim’s heading back up the stairs to his office, away from Walter’s he’s again struck with how much he wants to be doing… Any of it, really.

He wants to be searching computers, looking for hackers who erased criminals. He wants to be checking bank records. (Which is a sign of exactly how far gone he is. No one, outside the forensic accountants want to check bank records.) He wants to be seeing what happened to Heidi’s lawyer. He wants to be looking through all of it.
His shoulders slump a bit as he continues up the stairs.

Investigating is fun.

But managing is useful.

In the time it took him to get all of the players into place, get them talking to each other, get them investigating, he could have done… Maybe some bank records, the missing person’s reports, and a just gotten a link up to the Holston Correctional Facility computers.

He walks past Jennifer, who’s writing at her computer as he heads in. There are things she can do. And he can do pretty much all of them. But if he’s doing them, he’s not doing something bigger, something more important.

He gets that, feels it, as he’s sitting at his desk.

But doing it was fun.

He opens his email. Penny’s been able to get him that Congressional Warrant for basically anything the DEA and the IRS may have involving Heidi Partridge.

He smiles at that, imagining going in, grabbing…

Except it won’t be him. Because he’s managing. Tim sighs again. He forwards it to Hotch, along with a “Get me those computers as soon as you’ve got them,” and then gets back to doing the thing he can do that no one else can.

Reading resumes. It’s boring. He doesn’t enjoy doing it. But no one else can set up this damn team to make it do what it needs to do.

And maybe, once he’s got enough butts in seats, he can actually start doing some fun stuff again.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, after House Rules, I knew I had to get those three together.
Too Much and Not Enough

On October 23rd, 2017, Tim starts the day the way he starts many days.

Get up, brush teeth, help corral babies, and then he’s got a bit of time for his workout.

Which is part of his baby corralling routine, too.

He’s doing his pushups, Kelly riding his back, and to (according to Jimmy) encourage him to not cheat on going all the way down, Sean’s on his back, looking up, getting a raspberry blown on his belly as Tim dips down.

The kids think it’s a blast, and they like the next bit, toddler arm curls, even better.

He’s thinking, as he’s standing up, Molly gripping his left arm, Kelly gripping his right, and curling each arm, lifting the kiddos, that this time, five years ago, he was just waking up, in his tiny, bachelor apartment, with a sense of excitement and anticipation, because he knew the night was going to end with his second first date with Abby.

He remembers brushing his teeth, carefully packing up his ‘80s themed costume, begging the universe for a day with no case, checking his coat pocket nine times to make sure he had the tickets, and then off to his car, ready to start his day.

Fantasies of said date spinning in his mind all through the day.

And absolutely nothing, not his wildest, kinkiest, most off the wall fantasies, could have possibly allowed him to contemplate that that date would lead him here.

He’s able to duck into the shower before Abby gets out.

He gives her a quick kiss, they’re both running a bit late, and he’s not sure if she’s interested in being later. She kisses back, with enough heat that he’s sure she knows what today is, too.

His hands settle on her hips, and her arms wrap around his neck.

“Good morning,” she says with a grin.

“Yeah!” he’s smiling back. “It really is.” He nuzzles against her neck, feeling her skin, glorious hot, wet, and silky under his.

She’s rubbing up against him, deliberately, still smiling, and says, “I don’t think it’s even remotely fair to suggest that Jimmy and Breena go solo with all five kids, not with Donnie less than a month old, so we can get a night out.”

Tim half nods, but mostly kisses her shoulder at that. He agrees, and she knows it.

“But that doesn’t mean we can’t get a slightly longer than normal shower.”

He’s really grinning at that as he pulls away from her shoulder to kiss her lips. “Got an 8:30 meeting.” He’s not saying no, just giving her the limits.
“Then you’ll need to be quick, won’t you?”

He drops to his knees, kissing down her body, lips stroking over collarbone, breast, tummy, and hip, before settling in front of her, hands on her hips, and kissing her properly. She moans at that, hands clenched in his hair, rocking against his lips.

He sighs, one hand stroking her, the other stroking himself, while his tongue slips over her skin, and the water from their shower cascades down his back.

Five years ago, this he could, and did, imagine. Often.

Her thigh on his shoulder, heel against his back, body quivering on his fingers as she moans his name.

Yes, this filled up many hours of his imagination.

He doesn’t even give her a second to stop twitching before he’s up, deep inside her, her legs around his waist, her ass in his hands, groaning at the feel of her on him, in his arms, around his body.

She’s bouncing against him, and he’s focusing on how she feels against him. The hot slide and pleasure sparking up his spine, through his dick, and down to his toes.

Fast and hard and sweet. His body thrilling at the slip of hers against it. Yes, he imagined that a lot.

Five years, that’s 1826 days, 43,824 hours, 2,629,440 minutes, and he’s not about to say each and every one of them has been unmitigated bliss, but with her in his life, they’ve all been better than they would have been otherwise.

The water’s starting to run cold, and they’re standing together, quietly, kissing gently, enjoying the glow.

He strokes her face, shifting wet tendrils of blond hair away from her forehead. She’s looking up at him, her hand drifting up and down his back.

“Five years, huh?”

She smiles at that. “Who’d have thought?”

“Me. It’s better than I imagined it, but…” He kisses her soundly. “Every single day for the rest of my life, I am going to thank any and all gods who might listen, that when I asked if you wanted to see The Generics, you said yes.”

She laughs at that, and kisses him again. “Pretty words from my writer. I love you.”

“And I love you.”
more importantly code with each other.

Covington’s been explaining how the government doesn’t do that.

Tim’s feeling his teeth grit, as he’s explaining how they’ve got a private version of it, now, and they don’t have to open their project to the wider world to use GitHub, though he doesn’t appear to be swaying Covington.

Covington’s explaining that GitHub and things like it are a violation of their online security protocols and it just can’t be done.

“Who makes the protocols?” Tim finally asks as they go around and around about he needs this and she’s telling him it’s against regs.

“Not me! And even if it was, this isn’t something you can glare me into submission on. I actually read that report you sent, the one with your pet hacker. If we use something like GitHub there’s one more portal I’ve got to defend, and I’m up to my eyeballs for the next two years covering up the holes he found. So, no. No, GitHub! Find another way to talk to each other. One that only uses our in-house programs.”

Tim’s fairly proud of the fact that he does not, in fact, growl in response to that. He does sigh. But, she’s got a point. He literally pulled a code red on her, and is now asking her to do more.

He’s in a black mood as he gets out of that meeting, but as he checks his phone, he feels some of that bleed away.

Abby’s sent him a playlist.

He smiles a bit at it, pops his earbuds in, and listens to “The Generics Cover Basic Love Songs” as he starts hunting down who the hell wrote that stupid bloody protocol and how to get it shifted. He figures that at the speed the FBI moves, he should be able to get it done just about a year after his IT people have taken care of Khan’s first range of attacks.

He sighs again, wondering how long it’ll take him to get his guys to build an “in house” version that actually works. Supposedly they’ve got something, but… Maybe it’s not as clunky as he thinks it is.

By the end of lunch he’s hunted down the “protocol” and is in the process of doing the actual, by the books, official, here’s-why-this-thing-sucks-and-you-need-to-change-it paperwork.

And the reason why he’s doing the damn paperwork is that the “protocol” may not be law, but there is an actual law that spawned it, and he figures he’s more than close enough to the edge on a bunch of the other stuff he wants to get done, so he’s not about to get shot in the ass for violating this thing. (Though if he can’t get an exemption for what he wants to do with this, he may be tempted to change that position.)

He’s also got a meeting set for time with three of his coders, to see what they think about trying to beat the in house system into shape. (He’s guessing that meeting is going to be a whole lot of laughing followed by a ‘Wait, you aren’t joking? Fuck!’ moment.)
Paperwork filed, he gets to the best part of his at work day. Updates on his prison case.

On the meta-level Mac has successfully gotten nine Federal prisons to send him their data: fast, easy, with notes. The downside is, there are 103 Federal Prisons. As Mac has pointed out to him, this system is beyond a mess, and the 9 that responded were all in states like Missouri, well out of the limelight, a bit underpopulated, and far enough away from the any major population centers that no one thought it was worth trying to get more than a few rats into the system.

He’s even found that almost 99% of the prisoners in those nine prisons are accounted for.

Or as he put it to Tim when he was checking in, “There you go, every honest man in the US Federal Prison system has answered the call. The rest of them are covering up, cleaning up, looking for who to spin or blame, or so incompetent they can’t pull the numbers together yet.”

“So, you’re saying you’re gonna be busy for a while,” Tim replied.

“I’m counting the days until the next graduating class from the Academy. Can’t wait to get some new blood in here.”

“You and me, both.”

On the behind the scenes level, his Uncle’s sent the first of the reports, and this one pretty much covers: We’re all in place, ready to go, and are moving. Real reports coming soon.

Given that he’s been on the payroll for less than two weeks, and that it took him more than a week to even hunt down all of his guys, Tim figures that’s reasonable.

On the ‘main investigation level’ he’s got a headache that won’t quit. “So, let me get this straight, ‘The DEA brought the case against Heidi in the first place.’”

Hotch nods.

“And then somehow, they transferred all of their evidence to the IRS.”

Another nod.

“And the IRS won’t release any of that evidence because the Congressional Warrant we’ve got isn’t —“ “Legally binding according to them. Their lawyers are claiming that as of this point in time Congress is overstepping their Constitutional boundaries and cannot order bench warrants for criminal cases.”

Tim groans.

“So, we got an actual Federal Judge to re-issue the warrant, and they still wouldn’t play ball because the judge we found was appointed by Clinton. Who, like everyone else from 1932 until six months ago, got elected with a stolen electoral college.”

Tim bangs his head against his desk.

“Then we got one of the twenty-eight new judges, appointed by the new President, and passed by the current Congress, to write a warrant, and they tell us that that one doesn’t work, either because —”

Tim sits up, slowly. “We changed the election laws without amending the US Constitution.”

Hotch nods. “Exactly. So, storm the castle, or what?”

Tim writes down the name of his uncle and his direct number. “This is the guy who’ll plan and run the op. I want you to brief LaCroix about all of this, and I want her live on TV explaining how the IRS is impeding everything. Then I want you to take her, and your collection of warrants, and a camera crew, back to the IRS, and politely ask for everything they’ve got on Heidi Partridge’s. If you don’t come back with the motherlode, send in Tom McGee.”

Hotch seems to enjoy the idea of that.

And, then, of course, there’s the actual case: Find Heidi Partridge.

Khan communicates mostly by text and email. Kevin seems to like coming to visit in person, and as Tim’s thinking about tonight, and what might constitute a nice little treat to bring home, Kevin pops in.

“News?” Tim asks.

Kevin sits down across from him, shaking his head. “Not on Heidi, and not on Sinjin. She’s still vanished, and he’s playing fast and loose with the rules, but he hasn’t ditched them completely.”

“That’s good.” Tim realizes that doesn’t quite cover what he’s attempting to convey. “The fact that he’s still playing by the rules.”

“Yeah. Great.” Kevin shakes his head. “We’re going to hit the brick wall soon. At least, I am. He’ll probably go dark web and see if he can find anything in the code that looks like her.”

Tim doesn’t think that’s a bad plan.

“I’m listening…”

“There was a case at NCIS, before I got there, but… I mean, you guys kind of got touted as rock stars for it. Save Ziva by tracking CafPow! I want all the case files on her. If she’s alive, and hidden outside the US, there’s probably a CafPow, or something like that, that she wants.”

Tim smiles at that idea. “Look, if I can shake anything out of the IRS—“

Kevin flashes him a perplexed look.
“They’re the ones who ended up with the evidence.”

“Okay…” He looks doubtful.

“Yeah. I know. If I can get it free from them, I’ll pass it on. Meanwhile, if you want to go talk to the people who she used to teach, well, their parents, go for it. Maybe she likes gummy bears or something.”

“I’m hoping,” Kevin stands up to head out. Then he pops his head back in. “If I ever wanted to become an actual agent… How…”

“Go talk to some people first. If you like it, we’ll talk more about it.”

Kevin half nods, that’s good enough for him, for right now.

Having gotten in a little early, Tim’s feeling okay with leaving a little early, too. He may not be coming up with a vast font of “treat” ideas, so maybe he’ll settle back with a good old standby, go home early, cook, and make sure everyone else just has to walk in, sit down, and food’s ready for them.

Heck, if he’s feeling really frisky, and something looks good in the grocery store, maybe he’ll even make cocktails.

He smiles at the image of that, thinking of Breena watching those margaritas Jimmy had whipped up last summer. She didn’t get to have any, and she wanted one. Abby liked them, too… And suddenly he’s got dinner ideas…

“Are you listening to ‘80s pop?” Jimmy asks as he catches the tune Tim’s got playing. Today’s his first day back at work, and he’s just getting in.

“Yes.” Tim’s not just listening, he’s actively bopping around a little, too, as he’s working his way through putting dinner (shrimp tacos) together. Right now he’s on guacamole, and in a minute he’ll shanghai Jimmy into drinks.

“Oh huuuh…” Jimmy says warily, seeing a collection of limes, tequila, and agave syrup. “I thought this stuff made you break out in hives.”

Tim half shrugs. He doesn’t normally, under any circumstances, listen to ‘80s pop. “This has some good memories attached to it.”

Jimmy doesn’t need to be told what to do with the limes. He hangs his jacket up, rolls up his sleeves, and gets to it, as the Generics move onto their next song.

“You have memories of this? This is Centerfold. We were… six when this came out? I mean, I remember some skating dates where they’d play this as a throwback, but… You didn’t do stuff like that.”
“I don’t think I’d ever heard it until I was in grade school. Neither of my parents liked pop.”

“Uh huh… So…” Jimmy starts to roll the limes, and he can see Tim slicing up onions to add to the guacamole.

“You’re the singer. Whose voice is this?” Tim asks.

Jimmy stops, and really listens. “This is a cover.”

“Yep. And,” he checks his watch, “almost exactly five years ago, I was getting dressed up to go see a cover band do some music I don’t normally like, because I thought the girl in question might enjoy a night out all dressed up listening to fun, loud music.”

Jimmy laughs. “It’s your anniversary.”

“And where is the girl in question?”

“I got a text five minutes ago saying she’d just gotten off of I-95.”

“So home in ten.”

“Yes. I’ll get food on the table, you mix up the drinks, we get kids in chairs, then mine’ll get home, we’ll wake yours up, and dinner with our ladies is on.”

Jimmy smiles at that while shaking his head, and begins to ream the lime.

Breena’s the last one at the table. She’d been having an awfully nice nap, and really wanted to stay that way.

But, food calls. And while it’s generally a good idea to let the sleeping new mama lie, it’s also a good plan to make sure she gets fed.

So, half-asleep, rubbing her eyes, she slowly heads toward the dinner table. And stops a little short. There is, of course, the normal chaos of dinner with nine people, five of whom are under the age of four, but there’s also shrimp tacos, and chips and guacamoles, and margaritas, and this is significantly fancier and more involved than the average dinner at the McPalmer house on a weeknight routine is.

“We celebrating?” she asks as she sits down, and sips her drink with a little sigh. Right now cold sweet, salty, and sour is hitting her just right. She also notices her glass is about half the size of everyone else’s, because if she has a full one, it’ll hit a few levels beyond ‘just right.’

“October 23,” Abby says, while making sure that Anna’s shrimp are cut small enough.

“Right. Happy Anniversary!” She helps herself to a few chips, and then makes sure that Molly’s not just licking the guacamole off of hers. “Eat the chip, too, Molly.”

They hear crunching to go with the next bite, so that’s a good sign.

Tim’s reaching across, passing Jimmy the hot sauce, and says, “You know, I never heard your first “Don’t even know when it is,” Abby adds. “We know there was a moment when the not quite-Doctor Palmer looked across a room at a mortuary convention and saw Ms. Breena Slater, but…”

Jimmy smiles a bit. “Actually, that was the very newly minted Dr. Palmer. Trust me, I didn’t have time for conventions or dates when I was still doing my residency. I got my degree in December, and that was…”

“January,” Breena adds. “I almost missed it because we had a bad accident on New Year’s, and ended with three members of the same family, in addition to the rest of our regular routine. Dad told me to go anyway. Can’t keep my license if I don’t get enough continuing education hours, and the deadline was coming up hard and fast.”

“Which worked out quite well for me,” Jimmy smiles, stroking the back of her hand, looking at her with tenderness in his gaze, and a heartbeat later, his eyes snap away from Breena, “Molly!”

Molly pouts at him, but stops trying to put the chip she just licked the guacamole off of back into the dish of guacamole. She eats the chip, slowly.

“This might be a better story for after dinner,” Breena says.

Tim, who’s been listening with interest, looking forward to hearing this, stands up to grab Donnie, who’s in his bouncy chair, and fussing. Eating with one hand, walking a fussy baby around the kitchen, while keeping eyes on four other kids, is really all anyone can do.

So, they enjoy the tacos, and the drinks, and manage to get some brief updates of how today went. Things like: “The IRS are jerks.” “Major Mass Spec is officially going to be retired next year.” And “No dead body today.”

Toward the end of it, Jimmy says, “So, how long before we can have a sit down dinner in which we get to eat and have a full conversation?”

Abby and Breena laugh like that’s the funniest thing he’s ever said.

Tim actually thinks about it and says, “Probably not more than another ten years.”

Dinner, playtime, bath time, bedtime. Tim’s kind of hoping he’s overestimating the ten years thing.

As best he can remember he was… seven…ish… maybe before his mom could say, “Go get ready for bed,” and he could pretty much do it on his own.

Granted, he didn’t have to share a bathroom with anyone.

He’s toweling off Sean, watching the girls, and Molly’s… kind of… if he squints… maybe… Yeah, nope. Not yet. She’s almost four, and if left to her own devices can apply some random amount of toothpaste to a brush, chew on the brush, and then put it back, un-rinsed, on the sink.

“Go get ready for bed,” is still more than a while off.
Jimmy’s brushing Anna’s teeth when his, and Tim’s phones buzz.

Tim’s got the free hand, so he checks his. “Tony. The Pirates have made the World Series. He wants to know if we’re free next week to take Gibbs out for his bachelor party.”

“Assuming all the usual caveats…” Jimmy says.

Tim texts back. Yeah. When and where?

Fornell’s getting tickets. We’re gonna aim for Pittsburgh unless it’s sold out. Leon’s getting the jet. All you two have to do is show up and stay awake.

Thanks, Tony.

“What’s a bachelor party?” Molly asks, perking up. She really likes parties.

“That’s when, before you get married, all of your guy friends take you out to celebrate,” Tim says.

“For UnclePop, we’re going to take him to see a baseball game,” Jimmy adds.

Molly scrunches up her face at that idea. “Cake?”

“Nope. Baseball.” Jimmy knows that Molly thinks baseball is boring.

Tim nods at that. “Baseball and beer.”

Her face wrinkles up even more. She’s smelled beer, and was even allowed a tiny sip of it, and cannot, for the life of her, imagine why anyone would voluntarily drink it.

“I don’t wanna go.”

Tim and Jimmy share a look, relived. “That’s okay,” Tim says. “You don’t have to.”

“I still get to be the flower girl?”

“Yes, you do!” Jimmy says, voice bright. “This is before the wedding. At the wedding you still get to get all dressed up, and walk down the aisle, and drop petals on the ground, and then Abbi will follow you.”

Molly nods, happy about that.

All kids, except for Donnie, who’s on yet another meal, are in bed.

Breena’s got him on her chest, slurping away, settled into bed, and the rest of her mates join her there. There’s something to be said for quiet family time in bed, talking. All of them like it, and this is as good a time as any.

Jimmy’s pulling off his clothing. Tim’s taking care of his own getting ready for bed routine. He’s figuring he’s going to listen, and then he’s going to sleep because it’s his night with little dude. Abby’s already in bed, with Breena, looking pretty relaxed and tired, because last night was her night with little dude.
Breena’s looking tired, too, because all nights are her night with little dude, as Jimmy slides into bed next to her, spooning up at her back, slipping an arm around her, under Donnie, giving her a little extra support.

Once Tim’s got his teeth brushed and has joined them, Abby says, “So, it’s January, we’re at a mortuary conference, and…”

Tim’s been thinking about that since they started this conversation, and he’s got a question, “Jimmy, what were you doing at a mortuary conference? You guys don’t embalm anyone.”

“Nope. But we use a lot of the same supplies they do, and Ducky’s got to buy them. He sent me off to network, get to know the guys who make the tools we use, and so forth and so on.”

Breena twists, giving Jimmy a little smile. “I think he was just getting you out of the morgue for a few days.”

“Nope. But we use a lot of the same supplies they do, and Ducky’s got to buy them. He sent me off to network, get to know the guys who make the tools we use, and so forth and so on.”

Breena twists, giving Jimmy a little smile. “I think he was just getting you out of the morgue for a few days.”

“Or he could have been just sending me off. It’s not like we go through that much surgical silk. Or that one brand is really different from any other.”

“So, how’d you run into each other?” Abby asks.

“It was my first—“

“And only…” Breena adds.

“And only mortuary conference, and I was sticking out like something of a sore thumb. Like you pointed out, I don’t embalm, I don’t do makeup, I don’t sell coffins, I don’t do cremation prep, I don’t handle any of the legal stuff that goes with any of that, so… I was kind of… bored… at some of the talks. So, I was… um… paying significantly more attention to the people around me than to the topics of conversation. I mean… Look, I know it matters how good your different makeups and putties are at covering the marks of death, but… It’s just not anything I need to know. So, I wasn’t paying attention to how well different makeups dealt with different humidity levels. I was watching the gorgeous blonde, who was paying attention, avidly, to the conversation.”

“I’m sitting there, taking notes, because at that point we weren’t using an airbrush for makeup yet, and, doing good makeup really matters in my job. It’s got to look soft and natural and it’s got to stay on and it’s got to cover… Everything. So, this guy is talking about airbrush techniques, and how you can’t really use the water-based stuff because it’s just too light to really cover what we need to cover, and I keep feeling eyes on me.

“The first time I felt it, I looked around, but didn’t catch Jimmy staring.”

He shrugs. “I didn’t want to look like a creep.”

“The second time, I did.”

“Because you smiled a bit when you looked the first time. Like you were curious about who may have been interested.”

Tim nods, approving of Jimmy’s stealthy ogling technique. “Only let them catch you when you know it’s welcome.”

Jimmy nods back. “That’s the goal.”

“So, the second time I look up, there’s this guy, and he’s smiling at me, and… He’s Harry Potter, all grown up. The only part missing is the scar.”

Jimmy chuckles and rolls his eyes a little at that. “J.K. Rowling’s later books in the series: Harry Potter and the Y Incision, Harry Potter and the Father-In-Law of Doom, Harry Potter and The Vibrating Wand…”

The other three of them like that.

“I flash him a little smile, and then go back to doing what I’m supposed to be, namely paying attention to the lecturer, learning about how silicon based makeups hold up better and cover better.”

“And having gotten that smile, I’m coming up with a plan. The lectures go all day, but we’ve got a lunch break, and who knows, maybe, if I’m lucky, I can get a lunch date out of this.”

“Alas, he wasn’t lucky. The lunch break was two hours, and like I said, we were slammed. So, I got out of class, practically sprinted off, galloped back to Slaters’, and got to work.”

“So, class breaks, I’m gearing up to go say, ‘Hi,’ I look down to put my pad of doodles into my bag, look back up, and she’s gone.”

“Was there pouting?” Abby asks.

“Major pouting!” Jimmy replies. “I went off, found myself some food, kicked around a bit, and then went back, hoping she’d be there for the second half of the class. But, time’s ticking on. The lecturer is getting going, and her seat is empty. And then it wasn’t. Someone else was sitting in it.”

“Traffic.”

“Ten minutes later, I’m sitting there, with a pad covered in scribbled and doodles, staring at the wall, mentally smacking Ducky upside the back of the head for even suggesting this, when someone slides into the seat next to me and whispers, ‘Did I miss anything?’”

Breena adds, “And Jimmy swallowed his tongue, stuttered for a moment, and then grinned sheepishly and said…”

“I honestly don’t know. This isn’t exactly my thing. I’m a Medical Examiner.”

“So, what’s got you here?” I asked, quietly, pulling my pad out of my bag.”

Jimmy’s stroking Breena’s shoulder gently with his chin, as his hand helps to cradle Donnie. “And there was the thought in my head, ‘I’m here because you are.’ That that was it, the whole reason why I’d be here at this place at this time was to meet you. And the thought that actually came out, ‘Supposedly, I’m networking. Jimmy Palmer, NCIS, Assistant Medical Examiner,’ I held out my hand, and you shook it, which made me feel about nine feet tall, and then you told me your name, and that you were a Mortician at Slaters’, and then you shut up, turned toward the guy leading the class, and got back to being a good student, while I sat there and picked out names for our kids.”

“You did not!” Breena says, grinning at him.

Jimmy smirks a bit, kissing her shoulder, stroking his index finger over Donnie’s back. “Maybe I was intently thinking about making them.”

Tim and Abby laugh, and Tim adds, “That I believe.”

Jimmy gets a bit more serious, after that. “Not sure if I ever believed in love at first sight. Not sure if I do now. But, there was something special there, for me at least. I’d certainly run into horny at first sight often enough to know how that felt, and yes, that was there, too, but there was more.”

Breena leans her face against his, and then turns to kiss him. “I felt it. Something… it wasn’t like, ‘oh this is the person I’m going to spend the rest of my life with,’ but there was a sense of rightness.”

Jimmy nods at that. “Yeah. The click of a puzzle piece sliding into place.”

“And…” she looks like she feels silly saying this, “there was a literal tingle when my hand touched yours. I’ve never felt that, anywhere, with anyone, ever.”

“I didn’t know that,” Jimmy says.

She shrugs a bit. “Did you feel it?”

He shakes his head. “Nah. Just the rush of you touching me, and how soft your hand was.”

“Just got out of the mortuary. Had about a gallon of moisturizer slathered all over them when I left.”

“So, I sat there and daydreamed. And doodled. And, because I was sitting right next to you, I couldn’t just spend three hours gazing at you, so I gave you the occasional side eye, watching the way you watched the lecturer, or the way your fingers moved the pen across the page—“

“You were watching me write?”

He lifts her fingers to his lips, kissing them. (And Donnie chirps a bit at that, apparently that’s a bit more jostling than he likes when eating.) “You’ve got really pretty hands. Trust me, by the end of that lecture I could have described everything you were wearing, what pen you were using, who made your bag, how many earring studs you had, and what they were.”

“Okay, that’s borderline creepy.”

“Which is why I’m good at not getting caught. Eventually, the lecturer got done, and as we were packing up, I said to you, ‘So, I’m supposed to be networking, getting to know local morticians, and if you’d be interested, I’d certainly like to get to know you better. Want to get a drink with me? Maybe dinner if we hit it off?’”

“Smooth,” Tim says.

“Oh yeah. I was giving James Bond a run for his money,” Jimmy snarks.

“Fortunately, you were cute, and genuine, and I wanted to get to know you better, too. So I said, yes, but not that night, because we were still up to our eyes in people. Wednesday.”

“Two of the longest days ever—“

“Wait, is that when you were swanning around work with your hair slicked down and enough cologne to stun an elephant?” Tim asks.

“Yes.”

Breena’s never heard that part of it. So she’s looking at him with a question on her face.

“I really wanted you to like me. Everyone told me I was trying too hard.”

“Which is why when we met at the bar you looked like you,” Breena says.
“A slightly more stylish version of me. I’d gotten my hair trimmed, and had on my best jeans and button down. Abby told me the cologne wasn’t bad, I was just wearing too much of it, so I took care of that. You had on a long pink sweater, black leggings, black, leather Cole Hann ankle boots and your hair down.”

“I wanted to look pretty and casual, too.”

“You were gorgeous!”

She smiles a bit at that. “You got there before I did. I remember you were waiting at a table, hadn’t ordered anything, yet.”

“Just had enough time to put my coat on my chair.”

“And… I think the first thing I asked you was what NCIS was.”

“You didn’t know?” Abby asks with a smirk. “No one ever knows.”

“I’d just about gotten three words into the answer when the waitress came over, asked what we wanted. You got a glass of chardonnay, and I spent a moment debating if I should get something ‘manly’ or a glass of wine, and pretend that I knew something about wine, and then Gibbs is in my head, telling me I’m trying too hard, so I asked for a Green Fairy Mojito, which is a drink they make really well and I really like, and you looked at me like you’d never, ever seen anyone do that before.”

“I had never, ever seen a man order a drink like that.”

Jimmy shrugs. “They taste good.”

“As I found out, because, since I’d never seen anyone order anything like that, you had indeed gotten me interested, in both how good this thing must taste, and in you for being willing to order it.”

Jimmy looks pleased. “I know I told you about NCIS, and we talked about drinks, and the conference. You told me about being a mortician, and working with your family. And by the end of the drink, I was feeling awfully loose and relaxed, and you were smiling and flirty, so I said something like, ‘So, dinner?’”

“And I said yes, and then made you wait another few days, but by doing that I moved us into the weekend, and said, ‘Do you like bowling?’”

“You bowl?” Tim asks.

“And I said, ‘I’m terrible at it.’” Jimmy replies, “And you said, ‘So am I. But it’s fun, and we can talk while we do it. Then have some dinner after.’ Which I immediately hopped right on top of because, no, neither of us is good at bowling, but turning dinner into an afternoon and dinner sounded great to me.”

“We should do that,” Abby adds. “It is fun, and it’s been years since I’ve gotten to go.”

“Maybe there’s a place by the house… Get the kids in bed and duck out one night…” Tim adds. He’s bad at bowling, too, but it might be fun. “Why ask to do something you weren’t good at?” he then asks Breena.

“One of the things I learned young is that ultra-competitive guys get on my nerves. It was the middle of winter, so outside sports are out, but we can bowl. It’s inexpensive. It is fun. We could talk. And if Jimmy blew his stack or turned into a jerk tossing the ball around, I’d find that out, fast.”

“Plus, you’d get to see how he’d treat you if you were doing something you weren’t great at. Some guys…” Abby lets that trail off, but she and Breena are sharing a very been there, done that sort of look.

Breena nods. “Probably our first five dates were me tossing Jimmy into situations where I could get to see how he’d respond to things that might be issues later on. I needed to know that he’d respect my boundaries.”

“And I appreciated that slow, easy, get to really know each other sort of dating plan you set up. I mean, I’m not saying I didn’t want to rush, run in headlong and go at all of it at once, but the little burnt ember that was still stinging from what happened with Michelle recognized this as a good thing.”

“So, our first real date. We meet up to bowl, and yes, we both are bad at it,” Breena says.

“Combined score, for both of us, under 100.”

“For two games.”

Jimmy smiles, remembering that. “But we were having a good time. Cheering if either of us hits a pin. I remember giving my ball a little pep talk before each throw.”

“It’s a proven fact that you’ve got to talk to the ball. She won’t glide straight and true if you don’t,” Abby adds, with a grin.

“Jimmy gave me the complete history of bowling, from the dawn of cave people tossing rocks at sticks to today,” Breena adds.

Jimmy nods. “I didn’t intentionally study up on that. But I told Ducky what we were doing, and… seriously, the man knows everything.” Jimmy thinks a bit more. “And you told me about your clients. I told you, generally, about my case, and we both talked about how it was cool to be able to have that conversation without the other person flipping out or thinking we were twisted in the head or overly morbid.”

“And I think we now know why Ducky sent you on that conference. Making sure you got to meet someone who wouldn’t stare at you like a ghoul when you said what you do,” Tim says, very easily imagining Ducky doing something like that, especially if Jimmy was just out of med school, suddenly had a lot more free time, and may have been looking for new social situations.

“He certainly could have,” Jimmy replies.

“Talking shop got us to the dinner check,” Breena adds.

“And I’ll admit I had some hopes for after dinner. Things seemed to be going really well. I’d driven. She’d taken the metro. I was getting ready to suggest giving you a ride home, when you told me that you loved guys, and making out, and you knew you were going to love sex, too, but it wasn’t on the menu until you were married, and then my brain shorted out because you said it really graphically, and then sucked that straw down between your lips, and asked if I was cool with that.”

Breena’s nodding slowly, “I've known a lot of guys over the years, and one thing I’ve noticed about all of you is that you're pretty possessive and you like to know that when something is yours it's really yours.' And you nodded at that, so I continued, 'Look, I love guys. I love the way they feel and smell and look and touch me. I love kissing and making out and rubbing up against them, but I'm a virgin. I'm not having sex with any guy until I get married. That's my wedding present to my future husband. He'll know, absolutely, that I'm his and only his. And when that ring's on my finger I'm going to absolutely rock his world.' And then I smiled, licked my lips, wrapped 'em around my straw, gave it a suck, and followed up with, 'If that's not something you respect, well, this was fun. If it's something you do, then I'd like to see you again.'” And you blinked, really slowly. I could see you imagining it. And licked your lips. Swallowed a few times, and then said, “Marry me,” and I laughed. I stood up, kissed your cheek, put my half of the tab on the table, and said, “How about we go on a second date first? I’m free Monday night.”

“And the rest, is, as they say, history,” Jimmy wraps with. He kisses Breena, and gives Donnie a gentle squeeze. “Eight years come January.”

She nods at him, her head resting on his shoulder. “Feels odd. Like too long, and not nearly long enough.”

“Like how could that much life be squeezed into that little time, but also, eight years,” Jimmy replies.

“Yeah.”

Tim gives Abby a tighter hug, and then strokes his hand along Breena’s arm, his fingers brushing over Jimmy.

He doesn’t say it, but he does feel something like, all the time in the world, and never enough.

Donnie gets done, and they move out of cuddling and talking time, back into the real world, where kiddos have needs, and adults do, too.

Tim gives everyone a goodnight kiss, and gets himself to sleep. There’s another one of these days of many hours filled with life that suddenly turn too short once they’re over, tomorrow, and he needs to be ready for it.
“You okay?” Jimmy asks Breena.

She, Abby, and Ziva have decided that tonight will run much easier if they all get together and handle the six kids between them.

Breena gives him the look, and he nods.

“Of course you are. We’re going. We’ll have fun. Back before two.”

Breena’s holding Donnie to her chest, and makes a little shooing motion toward the door.

Jimmy nods, sighs, and with another round of kisses for everyone, heads to the car. Where Tim, already behind the wheel, having successfully gotten out of the house with only one round of goodbyes, raises an eyebrow at him.

“Yeah. I know. We’ll be back in ten hours. Yes, I know, I do this for work. But I haven’t. Not since before Donnie was born, and we’re all going, and…”

Tim nods, puts the car in reverse, and begins the drive to Andrews, where Tony, Leon, Fornell, Bleach, Ducky, and the man of honor, Gibbs, are waiting.

They’re the last ones there, which isn’t completely unexpected. Unlike some members of this party, they have things like jobs and babies at home.

As they’re unbuckling seatbelts and getting out of the car, seeing the rest of the guys grouped around the jet, Tim says, “So… twenty years, huh?”

“You mean until we can easily jet off for a night on the town with the guys?” Jimmy asks.

“Yeah.”

“Probably less.”

“But not that much less.”

Tim smiles back, a bit of sharpness in his voice, “Apparently.”

“Says the guy who’ll be missing them by the seventh inning.”

This time the smile’s real. “Sooner.”
“Papa’s rolling in his grave at this!” Fornell says as they head for the jet.

“Going to a World Series?” Jimmy asks.

Fornell shakes his head, and Tony smirks at that, adding, “I told Senior what we’re doing and he winced.”

It’s clear Tim, Jimmy, and Leon don’t get what the issue is.

“Pirates versus the Yankees,” Gibbs says. “They’re Yankees. And the last time they did this, the Pirates won.”

Bleach nods, long and slow. He’s not a huge baseball fan, but his father would have winced at this idea, too. By the time he was born, in ’58, they’d moved to Illinois, but his dad was a Yankee fan until the day he died.

As they’re heading up the stairs into the jet, Gibbs is looking immensely pleased. Sure, he was only two years old when the Pirates went up against the Yankees in the World Series the first time, back in 1960, but he remembers his Dad and LJ talking about it, reveling in it, for years.

He didn’t see that game, couldn’t have seen it, but he remembers it, because LJ and Jackson saw it and retold it so often, it’s burned into his memory, too.

Sure, the Yankees have won more World Series than any other team, but they didn’t beat the Pirates when they went up against them. Though Fornell’s mentioning that the Yankees outscored the Pirates close to two to one when it came to total points for the entire Series. And Tony knows, because his dad’s told him, that that year’s MVP was on the Yankee’s side.

Ducky says, “I’ll admit, baseball is one of the few areas of Americana that I haven’t spent that much time studying,”

“So, you mean, you only know more about it than 90% of the population, instead of your usual 99%,” Leon says with a little grin.

Ducky’s eyes may have sparkled a bit at that. Or perhaps it’s just the light coming through the windows in the jet. Either way, he appears pleased by that, and then finishes with, “But it is my understanding that that is the only World Series that ended with a walk off home run.”

Gibbs smirks even wider, as Tony and Fornell both roll their eyes.

Fornell begins, “Yeah, Duck. Only thing anyone remembers about that damn game. What’shisname —”

“Bill Mazeroski,” Gibbs adds.

“Gets up there, whacks the ball, and that was the end of it.”

Again, Tony’s rolling his eyes. “Two to one more points. The Yankees won two of those games without the Pirates getting a single run.”

Tim buckles his seatbelt as Tony and Fornell continue to bitch about how wrong it is to be going to a World Series where they’re expected to not just root against the Yankees, but to root for The Pirates.
Gibbs looks pleased as punch by the whole thing.

They’ve been in the air for about an hour when Tim gets a call.

He knows who he’s hoping will call him. They deliberately set it for now, because now is when all the main news shows go live, but he doesn’t recognize the number.

He answers it anyway, “McGee.”

“Are you the ass-sucking faggot who sent a camera crew to serve a warrant on me?”

Tim supposes that tells him who’s on the other line, at least on a general level. He’s not sure, entirely, who this is from the IRS, but it’s got to be one of them. He spends a second thinking, mostly something along the lines of how he’s the ass sucking faggot who’s going to boot this asshole out of his job for sexual harassment, but decides this jerk doesn’t need a heads up on that.

“Yes,” he says, instead, and makes sure his phone is recording.

“A CAMERA CREW! You sent a fucking camera crew into the IRS to demand we give you computers! How could you even think to do that? What the fuck would make you think that was--”

“Apparently, it worked,” Tim cuts him off.

“Oh, it worked,” the tone of voice is oily. “You got your show.” Tim’s utterly certain they got handed the first computer the IRS could unplug from a wall and stuff into an evidence bag.

“I wouldn’t have needed a show if you’d given me what I asked for, the first, second, or third times.”

“You don’t have the authority to get it!”

“I’m sorry. I don’t have the authority?” Everyone in the plane is staring at Tim as he argues with this jerk.

“No! There’s no government to make that sort of a claim. No one can give you a legal warrant.”

“Really, that’s the line you’re going for? I paid taxes last April. And, I don’t know what the rate was in 1931, the last time there was a constitutionally legitimate President and Congress to make the rules, but I’m damn sure I didn’t pay it. Don’t you try to tell me you’re not going to comply with any ‘illegal’ requests when you’re still charging taxes. And don’t you even try to tell me you stopped going after people. You’re using the same damn warrants I am to go through people’s finances, so don’t even try it!”

“Fuck you! You’ll get those computers after hell freezes over.”

“I’ve got Congress saying they’re mine. I have warrants!”

“I don’t care.”

“Do you know who I am?” Tim says.

“Yes. Do you?”
That pulls Tim up short. He doesn’t know who the head of the IRS is, not off the top of his head, or if he’s talking to him. “Actually, no. I know your office, but I don’t know your name.”

“Jim Mellon, Director of the IRS.”

“Okay, Jim. Guess what, those computers will be in my office tomorrow, or you’ll be going to jail for obstruction of justice.”

Jim snorts at him. “Yeah. Try it. It’s not gonna happen.”

“Why not? What makes you bulletproof?”

Tim’s talking to a dial tone. He can feel everyone staring at him, and shakes his head. Then he makes the call to his Uncle. “Hey.”

“Tim.”

“Yeah. You talk to Hotch?”

“He said it went just fine.”

“That’s because the computers are duds, just to show the media. If we go live now, claiming they gave us duds, they’ll claim we mishandled evidence. Get your guys on it.”

Tim can feel his uncle nodding. “On it. It’ll take us a few days just to find the real computers, and then another day to plan it, one more to get it. Call it a week.”

“Sure. I need them more than I need a show.”

“We’ll get ‘em.”

“Thanks.” Tim hangs up and explains what happened. He catches Ducky and Leon sharing a quick look as he said, ‘what makes you bulletproof?’ “Okay, what was that?”

“He may be, right, McGee,” Leon says.

Bleach is leaning in, listening with interest. Actually the whole conversation, starting with the idea that no one could order a proper warrant, interested him from a legal perspective.

“Why would he be right, Leon?”

“They burned out the IRS, Tim. Remember?”

Tim flinches; he still feels guilty about that. “Yeah.”

“Not just in DC. Most of the places, there weren’t people in the buildings, but… IRS buildings saw a lot of fire and rioting. Something like twenty of them burnt to the ground, and a bunch of others were damaged before things calmed down.”

“Okay, Leon…” Tim’s not seeing why that’d make this guy bulletproof.

Ducky is. He shakes his head. “Timothy, they don’t have the evidence anymore. Not for many of their cases.”

Tim and Bleach both groan. Tim feels punched. “They’re bluffing. He’s not drawing the line in the sand because of me personally, it doesn’t matter on my one case, but if it goes live they don’t have my evidence, it’ll go live that they don’t have…”

“The evidence they used in tens of thousands if not hundreds of thousands of cases, many of which are being negotiated, prosecuted, or appealed. I do not think Thomas will be able to locate what you want,” Ducky says.

Tim scowls at the ceiling of the plane, not sure what to do. Governments don’t work without income. People don’t pay taxes if they don’t have to. And if he defangs the attack dog that makes people pay those taxes…

Gibbs puts a hand on his shoulder and gives it a gentle squeeze.

“It doesn’t have to get figured out right now.”

And that’s probably the best answer anyone could give Tim. He needs time to think this through.

---

The Pittsburgh of Gibbs’ memory is permanently gray. It’s a steel town, covered in grit and soot. Even on bright, sunny days, there was always a wash of color-dimming gray in the air, and stains of it on everything else. On top of that, in western Pennsylvania, bright, sunny days were fairly few and far between.

Thus, gray. Gray buildings, gray skies, gray dingy streets, and gray windows. He, LJ, and his Dad would come here for ball games, spend the day, come home late, and the next morning the truck would be gray, and his mom would be complaining about having to get soot out of their clothing.

Granted, it’s been decades since the steel mills closed down, but they’re the decades he didn’t come here more than once a blue moon. His mental image of Pittsburgh froze in 1982, and every time he comes back there’s a moment of mild shock as he again gets used to the idea that 1982 was a long time ago.

He thinks part of why it’s always a shock is because getting into Pittsburgh is exactly the same. They leave the airport and take I-376 to the tunnel, spend a moment in the dim florescent lights of the tunnel, and then burst out, into the lights of the bridge, and there, in front of them, like he’s morphing from a black and white picture into full high-def color, is downtown Pittsburgh.

Getting to the stadium isn’t exactly the same. PNC Park is new… at least compared to his memories of games down at the Point.

The Uber driver’s asking if they’d ever been here before, and everyone besides Jimmy are giving variations on the theme of ‘not really,’ and he’s talking with them about being Yankees fans. (Because who else comes to Pittsburgh for the World Series if this isn’t their home town?)

Jimmy sees the way he’s watching the skyline glowing in front of them. Some of the buildings are the same. Some are new. All of them are brighter than he thinks they could possibly be. “Good memories?”

Gibbs nods. Then he says, “Making some new ones, too.”
“You got a box?” Gibbs is asking in disbelief as they head into an elevator. He was thrilled at the idea of getting to do this with his boys, but, apparently Tony and Fornell decided that a few beers and hot dogs in the stands is not the order for the night.

“Wedding present from Senior,” Tony says. This almost didn’t happen. As soon as the Pirates won, he started hunting for tickets, and kept coming up with nothing. Or, worse, one ticket in section A, one in section C, two more in section D for a different game, and three in section nosebleed. If they couldn’t watch it together, they might have just as well headed to the house, put it on the big screen, and seen it from there.

He was complaining to his Dad, who said, “I know a guy. Let me make a call.”

An hour later, they had a box.

“Where is your father, Anthony?” Duck asks. He might not be part of the core group, but Ducky’s fairly sure he’d have been welcome in this group.

“Last he told me, he and Delphine were in Antigua,” Tony replies. They’re out of the elevator, heading down a long hall, toward where the boxes have to be.

“What are they doing there?” Jimmy asks.

“Snorkeling, and beyond that I don’t know, nor do I want to.”

Bleach is listening, thinking, and then says, “He was the other half of Team Army at the Fourth of July bash, right? Mr. Style.”

“Something?” Tony asks.

“Gibbs calls him Chief,” Jimmy adds.

Bleach stares over at Gibbs, his eyes amazed, then he laughs. “You don’t, do you?”

Gibbs shakes his head a bit, and opens his palms wide.

Tony takes a few steps ahead and opens the door that matches their tickets.

“They don’t know, do they?” Bleach asks as he rolls into the box.

Gibbs shakes his head, smile tugging at the corners of his lips.

“What don’t we know?” Tim asks. He’s torn between looking around the box, he’s never been in one before, or paying closer attention to Bleach’s story.

“Do they know about Marsh?” Bleach asks as he looks out at the park. “That’s a view, all right!”

“Tim does, a little,” Gibbs replies, also looking around, checking out the deluxe seats. He’s firmly convinced that rock hard seats is just part of a baseball game, but… Apparently not. Then it hits him, he hasn’t seen a game live since 1989, and that was with Shannon and Kelly. Back then they weren’t quite in the nosebleed section, but it was close.
“Okay, this sounds good, start at the beginning and spare none of the details,” Fornell says as they walk around the box, looking at the view of PNC Park laid out in front of them.

Bleach just about gets his mouth open before three very pretty girls in Pirates gear appear from nowhere, asking them for drink orders, telling them they’ve got an open bar, showing off the food menu, and saying, voices flowing over the guys like liquid sex, that if there’s anything they need, feel free to ask.

As soon as they’re out of the room, Jimmy shakes his head and says, “How much do you think they’ve got to practice to get that tone of voice?”

“Hanoi Hannah,” Fornell says, and then grins. He looks around and realizes the only other person here who was in Vietnam was Ducky, who has a similar, if less intense smile on his face. “She was a VietCong radio announcer. Spoke perfect English. Voice like a wet dream. You’d hate the things she’d say, but after a month in the jungle, you’d pitch a tent hearing it.”

“I was at one of the hospital units, and we’d have men clump around the radio whenever she was on.
They’d yell at her, but tune in everyday nonetheless. She did have one hell of a voice.” That tiny bit of mild profanity from Ducky has all the rest of the men in the group wondering what on earth that woman could have sounded like.

Bleach gets his chair set so he can easily see the diamond, and the big screen TV, then adds, “I remember that. Not ‘Nam, but Saudi. There’s got to be women in that country, somewhere, but dammed if you can find them. I was there in the ‘80s, and at first you don’t notice it, because you’re used to being in a mostly male environment, but it slowly sinks in that everyone on the base is male.
And, at least when I was there, they basically didn’t let us off base. You’d call home, and just hearing a woman’s voice’d do it for you.”

Leon smiles at that. “Did a stint on a sub in the early ‘90s. Six months. No women. No calls home…
I got on land, saw Jackie, and…” He laughs a bit at that, a very fond smile on his face. “She enjoyed that homecoming.”

“I’ll bet,” Tony says with a grin.

“Uh huh… Okay, who’re Marsh and Chief?” Fornell gets them back on topic.

Bleach leans back in his chair, grin on his face. “Okay. So, you got to remember, we’re in Basic together, and a bit of advanced training before they broke us all up. Now, Marsh started with us in Basic, and Marsh…”

“I asked the same thing,” Tim adds.

“That was just his last name,” Bleach says.

“Bill Marsh,” Gibbs adds. “He was so… Marsh… no one even tried to stick a nickname on him.”

“Not like Grave over there.”

“Wait, Grave?” Leon asks. Neither he, nor Fornell, had heard that bit.

Gibbs rolls his eyes a bit.

“He wasn’t a talker, even then. The only one who could get more than a few words out of him at a time was that girl…”

“Matheson,” Gibbs says. “She wasn’t in our unit, but was at Lejeune the same time.”

“And you’d talk to her. Or she’d talk to you. Rumor had it you two had a thing.”

“So, what was with Matheson?” Bleach asks. Back in the day, asking about Gibbs’ friend would get you silence if he liked you, or hit if he didn’t.

“She wanted a friend.”

Bleach laughs at that. “Yeah, and you were friendly.”

“I wasn’t an asshole. Amazing how far that’ll get you.”

Bleach rolls his eyes. “Anyway, he wasn’t a talking kind of guy back then. So, his nickname: Grave. As in ‘silent as the…”

Gibbs feels like they’ve covered that to death. “So, Bill Marsh… anything you ever wanted or needed, he could get for you. Doesn’t matter what it was, how illegal it may have been to have it, how rare it may have been—“ “He’s the one who got you guys popsicles in the middle of the desert,” Tim adds.

“Exactly!” Bleach says. “He was an A1 scrounger. We’re on desert survival training, in the middle of the goddamn Mojave desert, and Marsh pops up with ice cream bars for us.”

“How?” Leon asks. He’s met some damn good scroungers over the years, but that’s beyond good and into the realm of has-to-be-bullshit.

“He said he was in good with God,” Bleach replies. “‘Ask and He shall give.’”

That gets some very skeptical looks. Bleach nods at them. “Yeah. So, anything you want, anything you need, Marsh can find it. We get done with Basic and they whisk him off to the quartermaster’s service.”

Tony’s not immediately seeing why you’d put the guy who can find anything in charge of everything, so Bleach adds, “They’re the guys who are in charge of making sure everyone else gets everything they need.”

“And usually, they don’t have it,” Fornell adds, having dealt with way too many examples of his men not having what they needed in ‘Nam.

“So they’ve got to scrounge for it,” Bleach finishes.

“Okay,” Tony says.

“So, we’re a man short as we move into more advanced training, and they send us Chief. You remember his real name?”

Gibbs shakes his head.

“Red skin, black hair, black eyes, claimed to be a full-blooded Cherokee, and since it was a gentler, more enlightened time, we started calling him Chief before he finished telling us that,” Bleach says.
“Rob,” Gibbs says. “His first name was Rob. I remember his girl calling him that.”

“So, we get Rob, and we’re fucking pissed to have lost Marsh, because with Marsh in the crew, life was pretty good. So, we’re not exactly easy on him, and…”

“He’s a dumbass,” Gibbs adds.

“Dumbass,” Gibbs replies. “He got better over time, but, especially at first, dumbass.”

“Basically he tried to be Marsh, but he couldn’t be Marsh, because there was only one Marsh, and he wasn’t bright enough to do a decent job of replacing Marsh. If he wasn’t trying to be Marsh, he probably would have been okay, but… We’re always talking about Marsh. So, he always had these really complicated schemes, trying to be Marsh. Five part trades that were supposed to do things like turn extra rations into beer, or something like that.”

“And they always failed,” Tony says.

“Not always. He’d work it just often enough to keep us hopeful. But, usually, somewhere along the line the trade’d go up. We’d end up with nothing, or say, instead of turning extra rations into beer, we’d end up with a crate of boots. And he’d talk about his luck being off, then go off hunting for the next big trade. Try and turn those boots into beer, say.”

Tony looks over to Gibbs and shakes his head. “Don’t ever let him know that story. He thinks it’s a sign of respect.”

Gibbs looks a little guilty. His own personal in joke, busted. “It’s…” But he lets that trail off, not exactly sure how to explain what Chief is to him, but it’s not entirely a slap in the face.

Tim thinks about it, then he laughs a bit. “That’s your version of Probie, isn’t it?”

Gibbs nods.

“What happened to Chief?” Leon asks.

“Finished his hitch. Moved back to Wyoming last I heard,” Bleach says.

“Became a high school basketball coach,” Gibbs adds.

Bleach is surprised that he knows that.

“Got one of his kids in my unit Colombia, another one in Desert Storm.”

Bleach nods. “Small world.”

By then the girls are back with the drinks, and want to know what they want to eat.

There is beer. And food. And it’s excellent.

Jimmy’s munching on his salad, a steak one, with (and this appalled Tim when he first saw it, but Jimmy just smirked at him) fries on top, when he says, “I bet if I asked, one of them’d go to the O and get me some real fries for this.”

Tony’s still staring at the salad. “Why does it have fries on it?”

“Just how they do it here.”

“Did you used to live here, Palmer?” Fornell asks.

“Not here. Went to school about an hour and a half north of here. We’d come down here on the weekends for concerts.”

“Ones you were in, Jimmy, or ones you were listening to?”

“Both Ducky. The O’s down by the University of Pittsburg, and they did hotdogs, fries, subs, beer. It was a good place to crash after a show, get a huge pile of… it’s probably only okay food, mostly I remember it being cheap, and compared to dorm food, anything tastes good.”

Gibbs has some memories along those lines, too, of the same place, though his are likely twenty years older, and involve him and a bunch of Marines getting to the train station, taking a bus into town and killing time, waiting to get picked up, or catch the next train.

“Where’d you go to school?” Gibbs asks. He knows Jimmy went to one of the about 25 little colleges dotting Western Pa, but not which one.

“Allegheny. It’s not all that far from Stillwater.” He didn’t mention anything about it to Gibbs the last time they were here, but on the ride up he did tell Breena about how if they’d driven another half hour, they’d be at his alma matter.

Gibbs smiles at that. “Nope. Used to go fishing at Lake Conneaut. You ever get over there?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Up to Erie, down to Pittsburg. Didn’t have a car, so I was limited to where a Greyhound could take me.”

Gibbs nods. He remembers how stranded you were in any of those towns if you didn’t have a car, especially, if, like Stillwater, they didn’t have a college, so Greyhound didn’t stop there. He remembers long afternoons of nothing to do, nowhere to go. Half of joining the Marines was about finding a place to go. Half of his dad getting him that car was about trying to keep him out of the Marines, by showing him there was a world he could access without joining up.

He looks around him, not just at the box, and the game, but at the men. It certainly wasn’t a direct path, but the Marines got him all of this.

He remembers Shannon, sitting on that bench, waiting for the train. If he hadn’t been shipping out, he’d have never spoken to her. She’d have just been the redheaded girl in his memory.

He thinks of another redhead in Pensacola, right now, auditing yet another Coast Guard outpost, and how without the Marines they wouldn’t have met, or if they had, they likely wouldn’t have been nearly as interesting to each other.

Maybe not every good thing in his life can be traced back to the Marines, but a whole lot of them can.
There’s the game in front of them, far, far below.

And the big screen, so they can see the plays up close, to the right.

By the fourth inning, the Yankees are up 6 to 0 and Tony and Fornell are happily smirking at the idea that this is going to be a repeat of the ‘60’s Series, where the Yankees thrash the Pirates (on the points at least).

“Retribution!” Fornell’s saying. “They’re back here now, getting ready to—“

They, obviously, can’t hear the crack of that hit live. But it echoes through the box from the big screen, and the roar of people cheering is audible through the glass and through the screen as Jaso sends the ball spinning through the air, into the bleachers, and grand slams himself, and the man on first and third home.

3-6 isn’t close, but it’s closer, and the game suddenly gets a lot more interesting.

Seventh inning. The games up to 5-7, and the Yankees are up to pitch next.

As they’re moving around the box, not really watching the entertainers, Bleach says, “You ever tell them about baseball duty?”

Gibbs half smiles, and shakes his head.

Fornell adds, “It’s safe to say, if it happened before 1990, we likely haven’t heard about it.”

“What’s baseball duty?” Tony asks.

Bleach grins wide and happy, and takes a sip of his bourbon. “Baseball duty. Okay, so this is another Marsh story.”

“Most of the good ones are,” Gibbs adds.

Bleach nods. “He’s right, most of the good ones are. But this one…”

Gibbs is still smiling.

“It’s possible, that part of why Marsh could always find whatever he needed, whenever he needed it, was that he was really good at schmoozing the officers’ wives.”

That gets a few alarmed glances.

“Don’t go there,” Gibbs says.

“Really, don’t,” Bleach adds. “Marsh had a girl and was faithful. No, when I say schmoozing, I mean schmoozing.”

“Eddie Haskel?” Fornell asks.
“But real. First few weeks at Basic, he’s feeling around, getting a sense for who is who, and then he starts grabbing a few of us at a time, on each of our off shifts.”

Gibbs shakes his head.

“Yeah, we all thought he was insane, but some of us went along, and… he’d have us weeding their flowerbeds, doing chores around the house, picking up their groceries, on our off time.”

“Only way he got any of us to go along with it was that he could get anything,” Gibbs adds.

“Yeah. So after a few weeks of this, Bill Marsh has a golden reputation for being such a good boy,” Bleach says.

“Got to remember, we’re all eighteen,” Gibbs says.

“And those officers’ wives think we’re puppies with rifles.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. Then he says, in a dead on impression of Col. Geven’s wife’s voice, “Oh, they’re all such sweet boys.”

That drops more than a few jaws, none of them knew Gibbs could do that. Bleach is laughing his head off as the rest of them just stare, and then slowly start to laugh, too.

Bleach takes over on storytelling, “So, Marsh is laying the groundwork. He’s the golden boy, and of course, any of his friends are good boys, too.”

“He makes Private First Class in about ten minutes.”

“Yeah. And once he’s got that PFC, he starts to take advantage of it. Now, remember, they’re used to seeing Marsh and a crew of guys go wandering around base to some non-standard areas, for non-standard duty.”

“And… we may be Marines, but Marines like off time as much as anyone,” Gibbs adds.

Leon and Fornell laugh at that. Navy and Army are fond of off time, too, and are convinced Marines couldn’t define off-time if they tried.

“If not more so. So, once he’s got them used to seeing us wandering around, he gets this idea, there’s not much reason for us to be off doing stupid duties we don’t like. Can’t get out of all of them, but at least a few… What were we supposed to be doing?”

Gibbs thinks for a second. What did they used to get out of the most? “Cleaning jobs. He didn’t like cleaning jobs. I think he got us out of our turn on KP, and latrines, and… a lot of scrubbing. If the scrub brushes looked like they had our names on it, Marsh was on the job.”

“And on the job meant that he’d line us up, give us some gardening tools or whatever, and march our asses to the nearest officer’s house.”

“And we’d spend an hour or so pulling weeds or mowing the lawn or whatever,” Gibbs says.

“But we do it often enough it never takes more than an hour. Meanwhile the lady of the house is making us lemonade and cookies, telling us we’re such good boys, and then, because we got done so fast, and it was such a nice day, somehow Marsh only picked nice days for this, maybe we’d go toss a ball around in the backyard, play a little catch or something, when we were done.”

“Oh, they work you poor boys so hard. Just, take an hour or so to play. It’ll be our secret.” Gibbs again nails Col. Geven’s wife’s voice, and again, there’s a lot of amazed faces pointed at him as Bleach laughs.

“And if, God forbid, some poor bastard went looking for us for shirking our duty, he’d have to pry us out of the hands of an officer’s wife, who adored us, and was sure that Marsh could do no wrong.”

“Stuffy Smith,” Gibbs says.

Bleach laughs, shaking his head, looking really amused. “He hated what Marsh was up to, and he tried to get us away from Major Henson’s wife. She cussed him out…” He shakes his head again. “Never knew a women knew language like that, let alone ever used it.”

Gibbs nods. “She was one of those pretty, little southern girls, with a thick Georgia accent, used to wear prim knee length skirts, twinsets, and pearls, and just looking at her, you’d think she’d blush if you whispered the word “darn” near her. Turns out she was a combat nurse during Korea. That’s how she and the Major met. That woman… Took no shit from anyone, especially a puffed up little peacock trying to get her pet gardeners out of her prize begonias.”

Bleach nods. “And we took damn good care of those begonias.”

Gibbs laughs, remembering that.

Top of the ninth, things get interesting, the score’s 8-8, and the Pirates are batting.

Gibbs is leaning forward, staring down at the men on the field. Yes, technically, there’s a better view on the big screen, but there’s something about watching the actual players, even if they are tiny. He and every other Pirate’s fan on the planet is with him, staring, hoping, beaming hit the ball at Ngope, who’s the first one up to hit.

Tony and Fornell are also into it. They’re watching just as hard, strike ‘em out vibes pouring off of them as Betances gets up to the mound, ball in hand, teeny, tiny white speck on a field far below them. He tosses it up and down a few inches at a time as he stares down Ngope. Then he winds up, ball clenched in his hand, fires it off, hurtling down the field, Tim, Jimmy, Ducky, and Bleach get to see, because they’re watching the big screen, the beautiful way it heads straight toward Ngope before dropping half a foot just inches from his bat.

Tim mutters, “Fucking remote control,” watching it, and Jimmy nods. That curve ball looked like someone had a remote control and was driving the damn thing.

Bleach is shaking his head, and looks at Tim, “Physics isn’t supposed to work that way, right?”

“Obviously it does.”

Fornell and Tony turn their attention back to the big screen to watch the replay, and cheer when they see what the ball did.

Gibbs doesn’t look away from the field. The catcher shoots the ball back to Betances, and he spends a moment watching the catcher, getting his signal. He nods, squeezes the ball a few time, winds, and fires again, this time long and fast, too fast, it whips by Ngope faster than anyone can see.

Even on the slow motion re-watch it’s zipping along.
Gibbs is still staring, still beaming, along with every other Pirates fan hit it, hit it, hit it, hit it at Ngope.

Another wind up, another blur of white a million miles below them, and again, they hear the crack of bat on ball over the big screen, but it’s dwarfed by the sound of Pittsburgh, not just the stadium, but the whole city yelling.

Gibbs is up on his feet, cheering, as Ngope rounds first and stops at second.

Next batter up. Polanco. Tony and Fornell are scowling. Every other time Polanco’s been up this game, he’s hit the ball.

The Yankees hold off. The coach is out, up on the mound, talking with the pitcher. Betances look annoyed, but nods. Top of the ninth, he’s pitched the whole game, but he’s getting pulled out. Time for a fresh arm. A minute later there’s a new pitcher up, and he takes a moment to eye Polanco, get a feel for the air, for the crowd, for the ball.

Then he’s up. Wind up, pitch, ball flying, and strike.

And again.

Polanco’s at home, looking tense, staring down Holder, waiting for the pitch. It’s a cool evening, but sweat’s running down his face, and the big screen is high def enough to see it.

Ngope’s inching out from second, getting further and further from the base. He’s keeping careful eyes on the pitcher, because he’s getting close to the point where he can’t get back in time if he turns to fire the ball back to second instead of—

And the ball flies, hurtling toward home. Ngope is running, he’s putting on every burst of adrenaline he’s ever had into speed, and the ball looks like it’s hanging in the air, while everything with the batter goes slow motion for a heartbeat while Gibbs and the rest of the Pittsburgh fans all scream for Ngope, willing him to beat the speed of the ball.

Crack! Again, they hear it through the big screen, can’t hear it live and it’s not even over before the screaming wells up louder.

It’s good. Ball is flying deep toward second, and everyone is running. Ngope gets to third and the coach is egging him on. Pittsburg is screaming, “Run, RUN, RUN!!!!” Over and over as he tears down the line between third and home.

Polanco lands on first, and stays, safe.

Gregorio, the short stop, grabs the ball on the bounce, and fires it toward home, where Ngope is just inches away. He drops, diving, letting momentum carry him, and the entire city goes silent for a heartbeat until the Umpire shouts, “SAFE!”

And Gibbs is leaping into the air, cheering.

Bottom of the ninth. Yankees are batting. Pirates are still up by one. Two on base. Judge at first. Refsnyder at third. Two outs. Two strikes. If Holliday can manage to hit the ball, and everything goes just right… If he misses, the game ends here.
Tim’s seen Tony less focused in live firefights. (Okay, no, not really, but it’s close.) He is on this game. And Fornell’s right next to him.

Tim’s never seen Fornell pray, not really, but he’s awfully sure he knows what it looks like, now.

He has seen Tony pray, really pray, begging God to please, please, please, make whatever it is happen, and he’s praying now.

Cole’s on the mound. He winds, fires, and again there’s a heartbeat of the sound of ball striking bat followed by the roar of every Yankee’s fan on Earth all screaming at once as that ball goes skittering across the diamond. It’s a line drive, right up the middle. Refsnyder’s running for his life, aiming for home. Fraizer and Mercer are tearing toward the ball. Mercer’s up with it, takes a heartbeat, and makes the decision, Holliday’s further from first than Refsnyder is from home. He shoots it to the first baseman who tags Holliday out and ends the inning.

Yankees V. Pirates, first game of the World Series, tied at the bottom of the ninth, going into overtime.

“You know,” Jimmy says to Tim, “if more ball games went like this, I might actually not mind joining the Slaters when they watch them.”

Tim’s nodding along with that. Part the reason he likes playing baseball, but is, generally speaking, lukewarm about watching it, is most games last three hours, and maybe ten minutes of them are interesting.

If he’d had to watch an entire game of the first four innings. Where the Yankee’s just kept striking the Pirates out, he could have taken an hour of that before he phone came out and he started to do some work.

But this is not that game.

The teams are doing their stuff, probably just killing time for commercial breaks or whatever. The box ladies have wandered back to check on them, making sure they’re so well fed and drunk they can barely move.

Leon’s sipping his beer, stretched out, enjoying the show. He looks over to Tony, and then nods a bit. “We should have a softball team.”

Tony laughs at that.

“Seriously, we’ve got some room to practice at the Navy Yard. Other branches—“

“We’ve got one,” Fornell mentions, which was news to Tim.

Tim stares at him.

Fornell shakes his head. “We’re five for five the last five years. Play against the CIA, IRS, NSA, and Homeland. Management can’t play, and they only let people who got scholarships for it in college join up. Mixed boys and girls, but all of them were an inch from pro before they got to us.”
Leon thinks about that, and about who he’s got working for him. “Maybe just to play against ourselves.”

Tony can imagine that. And he’s got a feeling of who’s gonna be the captain of team Cop.

Jimmy raises an eyebrow at Gibbs. “And where exactly will Dr. Allan and I go?”

“Okay, four. Cops, Marines, Navy, and College. That way Tim’s babies have a team, too,” Leon says.

“Her personally?” Leon asks.

“Yeah.”

He shrugs. “I never see or hear her. All the reports look good. If she’s in over her head, she’s not letting us know.”

Tim nods; that sounds about right to him. He’s about to say something else, but the commercial break ends, and things begin to move again.

Top of the tenth, Pirates up. One on base, one out.

Hanson’s looking to stretch his run from a single to a double. He’s leading well away from first as Holder’s getting ready to pitch the ball. Holder winds, and Hanson starts to run, fast, but Holder whips himself around, fires the ball to first and, with the snap of leather on leather, Holder’s stuck between two bases. He takes a tenth of a second, indecisive, before trying to make it to second, but he can’t beat the ball, and he’s out.

Top of the tenth, no one on base, two outs.

Osuna’s up.

The tension in the box is so thick you could walk on it. Even Tim, Jimmy, Leon, and Bleach, who don’t really have a dog in this fight are leaning in, watching eagerly, waiting, breath and pulse fast with anticipation.

One pitch, one swing, and “strike” echoes through PNC Park.

One pitch, one swing, and Osuna’s gotten that ball and taught it to say ‘master’, it’s high and flying far, into the bleachers. Pittsburgh’s melting down, cheering and screaming at it.

Osuna walks his bases, enjoying his home run, and the sound of his town keening in pleasure at his work.
Bottom of the tenth: Pirates are up one, and they want to shut this game down. The sooner they can get the Yankees out, the sooner they win this game.

The Yankees, of course, have different plans. They’re pulling out their big guns. The best hitters they have are in the lineup now.

Fornell’s looking pleased, waiting to see this flip back to them. Hicks wasn’t even supposed to be up on this game. He’s wondering, out loud, to Tony, if they had to bring him in. Maybe they kept him in New York, get him ready out there, and…

Chatting time is over.

And the Yankee’s deliver. In the next half hour they get three men on base, and two of them out.

Holliday’s up again. He’s at the plate. Castro’s on third. The big screen is split screening, focusing in on both of them. Then it shifts away from the third baseman to focus on the pitcher.

He’s ready. Tim feels like he can see it on his face. This game is ending here, now, and that’s all there is to it.

He fires off his pitch and it goes straight and true, crossing over the plate, just a tad higher than Holliday thought it was. He just catches the tip of the ball, and it goes flying, straight up, popping high over the catcher who looks up, watching the ball, as it almost hovers in stopped time, before getting right under it, snatching it out of the air, and gently tapping home plate with it.

Game over!

Pittsburgh SCREAMS! The sound tears through the night, thudding, pulling, rumbling rib cages and setting hearts pounding.

It didn’t occur to Tim that getting out of Pittsburgh would be a pain in the ass. How he missed that, he doesn’t know, but the “home by two,” that he, Jimmy, and Tony had quoted their wives is, at best, about the time they’ll get across the bridge.

The city’s celebrating. The parking lot is packed with partiers. Cheering, screaming, happy drunk people are haphazardly reeling around, waving their Pittsburgh gear, riding the high that comes with the home team winning a big game on home soil.

Traffic is stopped dead.

They could likely walk to the jet faster than they can ride there in the Uber.

That means he’s got thinking time. Gibbs, Tony, and Fornell are replaying the game. Happily bitching about what happened when and how.

He can’t really get that deep into it, because he’s just not that well-versed in how the game should be played. So, it rolls by him…

But part of it does stick with him. You’ve got a goal, and you fight like hell, put your best guys up, and you do whatever it is you have to, to win. And maybe you don’t win. Maybe you can’t. But you play as hard as you can.

And if you see someone not playing by the rules, you sic the Ump on them, and make them play by the rules. Because you can’t play the damn game if there aren’t any rules, or if the big team can break them because they’re the big team.

It’s a late night text, and he doesn’t expect a response from Hotch or Penny anytime soon, but he feels settled when he sends it. We’re going against the current head of the IRS for obstruction of justice and evidence tampering. Batten down the hatches.

On the flight home, Gibbs is staring out of the window, watching miles and miles of tiny lights spread below them.

He thinks about the 1960 series, and how, though he wasn’t there, he was. How he lived it through the words of his father and favorite uncle.

Tony and Fornell are bouncing around one call they thought was criminal, and Gibbs settles back, sipping his bourbon, smiling.

There are six little guys, none of whom are old enough to remember this first hand, but they’ll all feel like they were at this game. They’ll have memories of UnclePop, Uncle Tobias, Uncle Tony/Dad, talking through this game for years to come.

Tobias is saying, “It’s clear he was over the line, the Ump was completely—“

“Bullshit!” Gibbs says with a smirk. “You need glasses to see a piece of paper in front of your nose. You gonna tell me you could make that call from more than 2,000 feet away better than the guy who was on top of it!”

“I need glasses!”

And they’re off… Making some new memories, and some new stories to pass on.

Chapter End Notes

Some of you have commented over the years about how much research I must do for this story. And it’s true, I do a good amount of researching. But, if you’re curious, this chapter is the top of the heap. I don’t follow baseball. So... if I’ve royally screwed the pooch on this, I'm sorry. This is the best I could do with my Google University Degree in World Series baseball play.
Hi All. I didn't fall off a cliff or anything. It's just that wonderful time of the year we call: Summer Vacation. Between the end of school year stuff, the kiddos then being home, and this being a more difficult chapter to write, it was a long time between updates.

Here's hoping the next one is up sooner.

Keryl

“Hi, Walter,” Tim says, as he opens the door, ushering the leader of Team Black Hat into his office. His personal office. In his home. He asked Walter to stop in on his way into work this morning, so they could speak “privately.”

“Hey.” Walter’s looking around, wondering what’s so pressing that Tim’s got him at his house instead of up on the fourth floor of the Hoover Building. “So, what’s the super-secret mission we can’t talk about in the office?”

Tim turns up the music that’s playing in there. Jazz, loud and eclectic. He and Abby have swept their home looking for bugs, nothing came up, but he’s being careful. So careful, he’s got some of their “personal devices” taped to the windows, vibrating away. They’ll kill a laser mic. Walter sees them, raises an eyebrow, and then shakes his head. He knows why they’re there.

Short of telepathy, this is as close to a private conversation as he can get.

“I got the warrants today.” Tim hands the folder over. “You know the IRS gave us ‘the Partridge Computers’?”

“Yeah, Hotch told me that. Told me they were duds, too.”

“Yes. They’re going to be part of the obstruction of justice case we’re working.”

“Okay… Um… How?” Walter doesn’t immediately see how dead computers could be part of an obstruction of justice case. He knows exactly what the IRS will do. ‘Hey, the evidence was there when we handed them over, you must have screwed them up!’

“Among other things, I’m going to use our forensics to point out how no one on the list of people who have signed those computers into and out of evidence has ever touched the computers we got. Or the evidence bags.”

“They’ll say we wiped them.”

Tim smiles. “They may, but we’ve got the prints of the people who handed us the bags still on there.”

Walter smirks. “So, we’re building the case against Mellon, and Hotch has the official thrust of that. But you’ve got something else up your sleeve… That’s why I’m here, right?”
“I’m hitting them with obstruction for the Heidi Partridge case. That’s what Hotch is working on right now. And we are going against Mellon, that’s where you’re coming in. You’re going to get some guys in undercover, and they’re going to make the case that the IRS has been going against people without the correct evidence since the Fall.”

Walter inhales, sharp. That would be a massive breach of the extremely shaky trust the public is starting to rebuild with their government. “Shit. Really?”

“Yeah. That’s the working theory for why we didn’t get the right computers. Tom McGee’s team is going to go in, see if they just won’t give us the right computers, or if they can’t give us the right computers. I want you to get some guys in as auditors, lawyers, whatnot, and see what happens when they roll up on a case they can’t prove. Either on appeal or one that’s been lingering or…”

Walter’s nodding. He gets it. Part of why they’ve got Black Hats is Tim doesn’t just want to take out bad apples, he wants to eradicate bad systems. “You want to know what happens when Bobby New Agent says to his boss, ‘So, I’ve got the Patterson case here, but I can’t find the ledgers.’”

“Exactly. And I want it recorded, and I want it on several levels. I want Bobby New Agent, Sally New Manager, and Karen New Auditor, to get in there and see how deep this goes.”

Walter’s nodding. “I’ve got, maybe, one person I can shift into this now.”

Tim was expecting that. Like everyone else, Walter’s hurting for people. “That’s better than the zero we’ve got on it today. I’m going to give you a name, Diane Anderson. She works for Governor Jarvis right now, but she used to be IRS, in their investigative department, and she’ll be able to point you toward some people worth cultivating.”

Walter nods at that, too. “You want me to flip people who already work there?”

“Yes. Look, I know we can’t get people in there fast enough to do this on our own. So, get your guy in. If you get other guys who’ll be good for this, get them in, too. Meet with Anderson, and get her suggestions. If this is going to work, we’ve got to prove it’s system wide, and that isn’t going to happen with just one or two guys. Start getting it set up. I don’t care about fast, I do care about right.”

“Meanwhile, Tom’s team will find, or not, what it’s looking for. And if the evidence is there, and the IRS is just dicking with us, then this’ll be all in Hotch’s wheelhouse, but if it’s not there…”

Walter nods. “Got it.”

The next day, Friday, Tim’s in his office, not paying nearly as much attention as he should to the conversation around him.

“So, Sanders here hacked into their servers to find where they keep the evidence when it’s not in use,” Tom McGee says. He’s sitting in Tim’s office. His work office, with a woman in her mid-thirties, Sanders, who’s got a laptop in front of her, Tom McGee, and Hotch.

Sanders says, “The IRS’s security needs help. They didn’t have anything I couldn’t get through in less than an hour. So, going through, I can tell you that no one has officially accessed Partridge’s evidence since September of ’16. No one, for example, logged it out of their system and reported it moved to ours. I can also tell you that, officially, it’s stored off-site in a building that wasn’t burned down, so they should still have it.”

This is the part where, had Tim been paying close attention, he likely would have said something like “Should?” but in that it’s Friday, November 3, and Sean’s going in for his surgery on first thing in the morning on November 6th, he’s a tad distracted.

Fortunately, Hotch, who is sitting next to him, is not at all distracted, because he doesn’t have a baby who’s going to be operated on in the next week, so he says, “Should?”

Sanders nods. “Yeah. Should. In the official record, all of her evidence was moved off site November of 2014, when the first case was closed. However, doing a bit more digging, I can see that the records were changed in March of ’17. In fact, a lot of records were changed in March of ‘17.”

Hotch nods. “Okay. Our forensics people have confirmed that the computer in the bag has only been touched by Ralph Sanger. He’s the personal assistant to Jim Mellon. The bag itself has been touched by Mellon, Jason DeMent, the man who brought us the bag, and Ralph Sanger. Our handwriting analysis techs tell us that of the twenty-three signatures on the label on the bag, all of them appear to be copies, and, though some are in black ink and some are in blue ink, all of the signatures came from one of two pens.”

“So the evidence bag is forged,” Tom says.

“Yes,” Hotch replies. “And by someone who wasn’t good at it.”

“And let me guess, I’ve got two options, and the first one doesn’t count,” Tom replies.

Hotch nods. “I suppose it’s possible that DeMent forged those signatures, but that’s a bizarre job to have the guy who works the front desk do.”

Tom and Sanders are nodding; Tim’s staring at the wall.

The three of them share a look, and then Tom gently nudges his nephew. “You okay?”

Tim jerks a little, feeling embarrassed. “Uh… Yeah. Sorry. His pre-surgical checkup is this afternoon… and… It’s really hitting.”

Hotch and Tom, both fathers, both men who have led other men, share a look, and a nod. “He’s going to be fine,” Hotch adds.

Tim half nods. “Yeah. I know,” he shrugs a bit. “But, there’s I know, and there’s I know, and on this one, I don’t know. And I can’t, and won’t until he’s out of surgery.” He glances to Sanders. “Sorry, again. My son is deaf, and he’s getting a cochlear implant on Monday. He’s ten months old, and to say we’re a bit on the tense side is an understatement.”

She nods. “There’s be something wrong with you if you weren’t.”

“Yeah. Anyway… Instead of me sitting here like a lump… It sounds like we’ve got a solid circumstantial case that the IRS is not playing by the rules.”

All three nod.

“Sanders, you said something about changing the logs, how are you documenting that?”

And Sanders begins a fairly complicated conversation about how she’s making sure they have the evidence to bring this into court. After all, it’s not enough to know the IRS isn’t playing by the rules, they’ve got to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt.

And Tim does an… okay… ish… job of paying attention to her.

Three hours later, Tim drives home, and Abby meets him there. Both of them are nervous and jittery, and not in the best place ever. But they’re trying to keep cool, because if they flip out, Sean’s gonna flip out, too, and two nervous adults are one thing, but a wailing baby is something else all-together.

Besides, rationally, they know this isn’t a big deal.

They’re tucking him into his car seat, and he’s babbling a bit, and chewing on his fist, and being his usual adorable self.

Tim pulls back for a moment, watches Abby blow a raspberry on his cheek, and Sean squeals with a sound they know is him laughing, but most other people wouldn’t be able to identify.

Abby looks up at him. “It’s going to be fine.”

He nods. “Yep. This is just the pre-surgery checkup.”

“Exactly. The worst thing that’s going to happen is the Doc’ll look in his ears.” Which they both know from his various pediatric appointments, Sean doesn’t like.

“Yeah.” He gets into the car, sliding into the driver’s seat, and Abby gets into the passenger seat. “So why does this feel like going to face a firing squad?”

She doesn’t answer, because they both know.

What if it doesn’t work? What if it goes wrong? Some kids get the implants and begin to scream and really never stop unless you turn the implant off… Or what if it goes really, really wrong, surgically wrong? What if he’s allergic to anesthesia? What if the Doc has an off day, does a half-assed job and…

Tim shuts the litany of ways this could go wrong down. He’s not doing anyone any favors with that.

They’re in the waiting room, for a checkup for fuck’s sake!

Yes, it’s a surgical checkup but still…

If he can’t get this under control, he’s going to be a wreck by Monday. So… calm, smooth, easy breathing. Relaxing. Nothing bad is happening. Little boy is on the floor, playing with blocks, while a toddler, a happy, functional, perfectly alive and healthy toddler, with two cochlear implants on the sides of her head, babbles at him.

Tim gets onto the floor with Sean and the little girl, and starts piling up blocks. Both of them are happy as little clams to knock them down, and the girl’s mother comes over, to keep a closer eye on them.

“Follow-up appointment?” he asks and signs.
“Yes.” She’s watching him curiously. “You speak amazingly well.”

Tim laughs. “Oh. Uh... No. I sign everything because that way Sean gets to see it and learn it the way he would speaking. I’m not deaf.”

She sits down. “Wow. It’s been three years, and...” she looks at her daughter. “We should learn to sign, but...” Tim notices the little girl doesn’t turn toward them as she’s playing. She’s three years old, he’s guessing from the context, so she may just be into the game, or it may be her implants aren’t sensitive enough for her to get what they’re saying, or some combination thereof. “Your little boy... He’s...”

“Ten months. I knew how to sign before he was born. No way I’d be this good at it this fast.”

“Oh.”

“Two years now.”

She’s got black hair, in little curling pig tails, and each implant has a little bow clipped onto it. It almost looks like she’s got some cute little barrettes on each side.

“He’s getting his first one on Monday. This is the pre-surgical consult.”

The mom smiles at him. Abby, having finished filling out their insurance forms, joins them on the floor. “And you two are just about of your heads, aren’t you?” the mom asks.

Tim half-smiles and Abby nods, vigorously. “I can’t stop the what-ifs!”

The mom nods at that, too. Then she says, “Nichole!” This time, a little louder than before, and in what both Tim and Abby recognize as the ‘pay attention to me’ voice that all parents learn to use. This time the little girl turns to her mother. “Mama?”

“Hey, baby. Maybe we don’t knock the blocks quite so far?”

She nods, and goes back to stacking her own blocks up.

The mom turns back to Tim and Abby. “She gets about seven out of ten words, and lip reads the rest of them. We’re still seeing a speech therapist every week, but most people can understand most of what she says now. She started pre-school in the fall, and other than the ‘you cannot tug on Nichole’s ‘barrettes’ speech, she’s just like the other kids there.”

“That’s good,” Abby says. It sounds lukewarm, and compared to her usual effusive enthusiasm for everything it’s beyond cold.

“And it doesn’t help, does it?” The mom says, with a knowing look.

“Not really.”

The mom nods again. “Yeah. It was the longest four hours of my life. And then when it was done, she was pissed. Hell hath no fury like a baby coming out of anesthesia. And the day in the hospital wasn’t a blast, either. But... the next day, you go home, and the drugs wear off, and the surgery heals, and eventually, you’re in a room, and the doc says, “Okay, we’re gonna turn them on in a sec; what’s the first thing you want your baby to hear?’ And... some of them cry, but Nichole... I said her name first, and she jerked in my arms, looking around, really confused. So, I turned her a bit so she could see me, and I put her hand on my throat, and then said her name again, and she lit right up in a huge smile. And… seriously… nothing feels like that. It doesn’t erase getting there, but it does put down a lot of the stress.”

Tim’s holding Abby’s hand, and Sean’s banging two blocks together as Nichole piles them up for him. A second later, the nurse says, “Nichole Trainer,” and the little girl, and her mom, get up.

Tim and Abby look at each other. He inhales, a little shaky. She half smiles. And they both say, to each other, “It’s gonna be okay.”

Eventually, the nurse calls out “Sean McGee,” and back they go. She measures and weighs him and, like everyone here, she signs and speaks, and when Sean makes a little hand gesture that could just be him messing around, or could be Hello, she stares at him in amazement and tells them how smart he is and how fast he’s picking this up.

And like every other doctor’s appointment where one of their kids is showing off how smart, special, perfect, and utterly delightful they happen to be, Tim and Abby bask in it.

Then there’s more waiting. And more waiting. And a brief, ‘yep, everything’s okay’ checkup.

And it’s all just so fucking normal.

That’s what gets Tim the most about this. He mutters it to Abby as they’re leaving, “Lah di da di da… Just going to cut open your child’s head on Monday, pass the butter please. It’s like it’s just… nothing.”

“Yeah! Don’t get me wrong, I don’t want them to be nervous wrecks or anything, but…”

“Some recognition that this is a big fucking deal.”

“Exactly!” They get Sean strapped into his car seat, and little man, who didn’t get his proper afternoon nap is getting awfully crabby at this point, so he’s not exactly just gelling along with the program.

So, he’s in the back, fussing away, as Tim and Abby do pretty much the same thing with each other.

And they know they’re fussing. There’s nothing, short of cancelling this, that they can do, so they’re just blowing off steam and squawking at each other about it.

Sean, at least, falls asleep after a mile or two, and they take the extra, ultra-long way home so he can keep sleeping, and they can just bitch about this, with each other, without anyone, like their other children, overhearing.

And like Sean, eventually, they run out of steam.

And head home, and get the other kids, pack everything up, and head for the House.

After all, it’s Friday, and Friday means time at their home, with their family.
“You know who called me last night?” Tony asks, passing a platter of roast chicken down the table.

“Tony, you’re a cop, you get thirty calls a day,” Abbi replies. “You have to narrow it down.”

“Okay, you know who called me at 11:45, somewhat drunk, celebrating, last night?”

Gibbs sighs, loud; he got the same damn call, just at 11:42. “Fornell wanted to celebrate?”

“Apparently, in a world where babies do not wake you up at the crack of dawn, staying up late to watch the final game of the World Series is a thing.” Then Tony just stares at Gibbs and smirks.

Gibbs rolls his eyes. “Uh huh. Yeah, I know. Yes, I was watching. Three zero, Yankees win. My guys won the game that mattered.”

Ducky chuckles at that. “So, I take it baseball is over for another year?”

“For another year. It’ll start up again in April,” Tony adds. He glances down the table to Abbi, “So, are you done with Pensacola?”

“Finally. Mobile next, which isn’t exactly a prime location—“

“What’s wrong with Mobile?” Jimmy asks Abbi.

“For me, personally, not all that much, but if you ask any sailor who’s been stationed there, and that includes the Coast Guard, they’ll tell you it’s New Orleans with all of the fun removed.”

Penny’s nodding at that. “Nelson and I spent a year in Mobile, back in the ’50s.” She shudders. “Deep in the Bible belt, with full on KKK segregation, so hot and humid your clothing would mildew, and no air-conditioning. Literal Hell. Our parish was segregated, so I started attending church at one of the local, Black, Baptist churches, and managed to horrify a lot of the other officer’s wives.” She half-smiles at that.

“Is that what got you interested in civil rights?” Abby asks.

“We were in Pensacola before Mobile, and that was what got me interested. I’m not saying Boston was heaven on earth, or even particularly good when it came to civil rights, but it was easy to ignore. Unless you were looking for it, you didn’t see it, and as a teenager, I wasn’t looking for it. Once you got to the south, where every building had signs about who could use them, you couldn’t ignore it anymore.” Penny’s voice trails off… “I don’t want it to sound like a simple thing. Down I went, and oh, this is wrong, go fix it. I’m not a hero of this story. When we moved down, I wasn’t comfortable around black people, and the only one I’d ever spoken to before that was the girl who helped Mama with the house. My father was a Captain, and he was vocally, skeptical that black men should be allowed to serve in every billet. He was sure that, on a case by case basis, some black men, might be up for the job, but he certainly didn’t want an entire ship full of them. So, don’t take this as some sort of all the bad guys were in one place or on one side sort of story.”

“Grandpa wasn’t like that, though,” Tim half-says, half-asks.

Penny gets that small smile on her face, the one that goes with remembering Nelson. “No. Or if he was, it was before I met him. By the time I’d met him, he was firmly convinced that anyone who wanted to serve their country had any and every right to do so, and he’d do everything in his power to make sure they got put where they could do it. He’d have put women on ships if he could have.
He saw what the nurses and ambulance drivers had been up to, and he figured if ladies could handle that, they could fly planes and sail ships. But Nelson, especially back then, was one in a billion.” Penny stabs a bite of chicken on her fork, and shifts topic, a bit, “So where are you staying?” she asks Abbi.

“Who knows? I’ll get on a plane, land, and they’ll stuff me somewhere for a week. I know who I’m shadowing, what issues have been causing trouble there, and looking to see if I can spot easy answers,” Abbi replies.

“Anything look easy?” Ziva asks, as she pats Dave’s back.

“I’ve got the officer with the highest number of complaints against him down there. Not sure if that’s easy, but I’ll get to see if he’s salvageable, or if we’ve got to toss him.”

“How’s he still there?” Tim asks.

“Lots of complaints, but none of them are about corruption. He plays straight and narrow on our side of things. But we’ve had to settle three harassment claims on him, where he assaulted people who were suspects.”

Tim winces, and the rest of the table isn’t thrilled with that. Abbi glances to Gibbs, and he looks back at her. They both know there’s a nanometer thin line, and if you manage to stay on the right side of it, you can be an amazingly good agent, but if you fall to the wrong side…

Gibbs nods slowly. He knows she’s going to find out of salvageable means that this guy’s somewhere on the Mike Franks end of the spectrum, and if he gets smacked upside the back of the head, hard, he can rein it in enough to keep functioning, or if he needs to go. Though, with three complaints that went far enough for the Coast Guard to pay out settlements, the likelihood that this guy is salvageable is awfully thin.

“Anyway, that’s my week.” Abbi looks to Abby, who has Sean in her lap. “How’d the checkup go?”

Abby sighs, and Tim rolls his eyes and they both shrug and say, “Fine,” with the sort of enthusiasm one would expect from someone who just put his foot into his shoe to find it was full of lukewarm oatmeal.

“We were going over it with each other, and… It’s just so average,” Abby says.

“And yes, I get it, irony, in all capitals, but when I was just going through my average day of life hip deep in murders, I did my best to make sure that the victim’s family’s didn’t feel like it was just another day,” Tim adds.

“Do we have a time, yet?” Jimmy asks.

“They’ll call Sunday afternoon, let us know then. Supposedly ‘first thing,’” Abby adds.

“Probably means get there at five for a six o’clock surgery,” Jimmy says.

Neither of them are excited to get up at four in the morning for this, but the earlier the better. They’ve heard stories of surgery in the afternoon, which is a problem because you can’t eat for twelve hours prior, and there’s no possible way to explain to a ten-month-old why the food isn’t in his mouth.

“Everyone there is very impressed with little boy here. The Doc does think the signing is intentional. He’s sure Sean’s picking it up,” Abby says, snuggling Sean, who isn’t doing much of anything signwise. He is chewing on a tiny bite of chicken, though.

“I sign!” Molly says, and signs, very pleased with herself.

“And if the doctor saw you, he’d be very proud of you,” Tim replies. “But your ears work, so you’re not going to be seeing him anytime soon.”

“Sean’s ears work?” Kelly asks.

“That’s what we hope,” Abby replies. “We’ll find out ’round about Anna’s birthday.”

And Sean chews his chicken, watching the hands around him, eyes keen.

There’s “family” and then there’s family, and right now, Tim’s exceptionally aware of the difference. It’s the weekend, and though Jimmy, Tony, and Abby get called in to deal with a murder, Tim’s got a lot of quiet time.

Which is the last thing he needs right now.

But Gibbs, Ducky and Penny, Breena and Ziva keep him, and the kiddos busy.

He doesn’t have time to fret. They’re off to the “Museum of Food,” and then Ducky’s got them working on a research project for Penny. She’s got a stupidly complicated bill in front of her, and none of them are sure what the hell it actually does, so there’s reading through it, trying to figure it out. (Apparently, what it actually does is slightly shift the legal specifications for gasoline canister manufacture to make them a tad more vapor tight. Testing to see if said specs would actually do that, by buying a few gas cans made at various standards and seeing if they could blow them up in the backyard was significantly more fun than Tim was expecting when the idea of ‘researching a bill’ came up. Correct answer, if the new specs made gas canisters any safer, it’s not readily apparent to the Gibbs clan.) And Gibbs, noticing that it’s November, and about time to put Semper in the boathouse for the winter, has them scrubbing her off. (Kelly and Molly especially like that. They’re wet, and soapy, and only getting about three square feet of decking clean, but they’re having a good time at it.) And, of course, Donnie’s only a month old, so he’s got a fairly steady collection of needs that have to be tended, and all in all… It’s a busy weekend.

And, if, through all of those adventures, Sean gets snuggled the whole time, and his little knees and feet don’t touch the floor unless he’s fussing about being constantly held, no one says anything.

“Okay. Five AM. We’ll be there. Yep, insurance card… We’ve got the forms already on file… Pediatric surgical wing… Okay… See you then,” Abby says, hanging up her phone.

Tim doesn’t need her to explain anything more than the half he heard. The “late afternoon” call they were supposed to get turned out to be a bit after eight.

“Five AM for prepping, six for surgery,” Abby says to him, sitting down on the bed they share with Tim eyes the door. Sean’s down for the night. He shakes his head, he’s not going in there to just watch him sleep. Abby gently squeezes his arm. She wants to go pick Sean up and snuggle him some more, too.

Breena, who’s keeping them company says, “He’s going to be all right.”

They both nod.

“He really is.”

And again, they nod.

She wishes Jimmy were here. “He’s going to be all right” might carry more weight if the person saying it had the MD. But, probably not. Ducky’s been telling them that all weekend, and it’s just… words.

And she knows from her own experiences with Anna and Donnie that it’s not ‘all right’ until it’s done. ‘All right’ is something that only exists in the past tense.

Tim’s actually pleased that it’s his night on kid duty. He knows he’s going to sleep like shit, so it might as well be him getting up to fetch Donnie and deal with whatever other little dude maintenance is necessary.

He doesn’t know which feed it is. Sometime in the blue dim night. He’s handed Donnie over to Breena, and goes back to the nursery, standing next to the crib, watching Sean.

He’s on his belly, sucking his thumb, sound asleep. Anna’s next to him, her side to his.

He lays his hand on Sean’s back, dreading the coming light. Though he realizes in an abstract sort of way, that they’re leaving for the hospital before dawn.

Sean doesn’t stir at his touch. He might not even wake up when they move him to the car seat. He’s a sound sleeper.

“It’s gonna be okay,” he says to Sean… More to himself. “It’s gonna be okay.” That time it’s halfway between a hope and a prayer. “It’s—“ he feels a hand on his back, and then a chin on his shoulder, and arms around his waist. Abby, pressed up against him.

She kisses his neck. “It is.”

“I know.” And maybe if they say it to each other enough, they’ll believe it enough to not cancel the surgery in the next few hours.

It’s routine surgery. Their doctor has done this literally hundreds of times. Likely in the last year alone. Countless little people have had this done and come through fine.

And none of that matters for shit because Tim and Abby have just handed Sean to a nurse, and they’re listening to him cry as she takes him away to be cut open.

Tim’s spent more time in a hospital than he ever wanted to. And right now he would happily, eagerly, jump right back into one of those beds and let himself get cut open if it meant that Sean would be okay.

But it doesn’t work that way.

There’s just sitting there with Abby, holding each other, waiting.

Gibbs is there about ten minutes after they hand Sean over. He’s got coffee (decaf), Caf-Pow (decaf), and breakfast for them. He doesn’t ask how it’s going, he just sits next to them, keeping his hand on Abby’s shoulder, under Tim’s hand.

And they keep waiting.

Jimmy joins them 137 hours into their wait. (Real elapsed time: 122 minutes.)

“New?” he says, flopping, boneless into the chair next to Tim.

“Two down, two to go,” Gibbs says, looking at Jimmy. “You need to go home.”

Jimmy half shrugs. “I’m okay.” He hasn’t been on ‘non-stop’ since Saturday morning, but it’s been close. An hour ago, he and Allan finished identifying all of the bodies and determining cause of death. Tony and his crew solved the crime before they got all of the pieces with the right people. Car bombs should not be attempted by amateurs. Sgt. Stephanie Moore not only managed to take care of her cheating husband, she also got five people who happened to be within a block of his car when it went up.

Jimmy slouches down, stretching his legs in front of him, takes his glasses off, tucking them into his jacket pocket, and lays his head back on the chair, his temple against Tim’s shoulder. “I’ll stay until he’s out of surgery, then I’ll go home.” Then he closes his eyes, and a moment later, they can hear him breathing, soft, steady, calm.

“Not yet,” Gibbs is saying to whoever just called his phone. “Should be any minute now. Three to four hours is average.” He’s pacing across the waiting room. “Three and a half. Doc said they’d let us know when he’s out, then an hour or so in recovery, and then we can see him. Yeah, I’ll call, or text... Okay… Will do.”
He sits next to Abby again. “That was Sarah. She sends her love. They’ll be over to visit when Sean’s feeling up to it.”

Another twenty minutes goes by, and Ziva, with Dave in his stroller, finds them.

“I take it he’s not out, yet?” she says, reading the tense vibe of the people around her.

Gibbs says something to her.

Tim isn’t really paying attention. He’s slowly rubbing his hand up and down Abby’s back, feeling the ridges of her dress straps under her sweater. Four straps, crisscrossing her back. For the last hour that’s how he’s been passing time, one, two, three, four down, and one, two, three, four up, and down again.

It’s probably not constructive, but it has put him into an almost trance-like mindset. Time’s not moving fast, not moving period, if you asked him, but one ridge after another is real, and here, under his hand.

He hears Abby make a little noise, and pays a bit more attention to something other than her dress under his hand. Ziva’s handing something… he almost has to work to pull himself back to the real world, but he does, and as he does, he sees what Abby’s holding, laughing and crying over.

It’s a teddy bear, made of soft gray and blue flannel, and on the side of his head, and behind his ear, is his very own (gray felt) cochlear implant.

Tim swallows hard, feeling his own eyes watering at that.

He’s in scrubs, still wearing the cap on his head, but his eyes are happy, and there’s a smile on his face, and a million pound weight slips off of Tim and Abby before Doctor Snyder even says anything. But he does say it. “The surgery went fine. Everything was textbook. He’s in recovery, and one of the nurses will get you as soon as he’s up. He’ll be a bit crabby when he comes to, but that’s normal.” He shakes Tim’s hand, and Abby hugs him. Snyder pulls back from the Abby hug, and smiles at them. “So, first week of December, we’ll bring him back in, and turn them on. Between now and then, all you’ve got to do is decide what you want your little boy to hear you say to him.”

That crashes through Tim, electric, and his knees feel week at the idea. Maybe it won’t be perfect, or very sensitive, but his son will hear his voice, at least some.

Another hour of waiting. But this hour is easier. Faster. Ziva takes Jimmy home to crash, and he and Abby wait, and wait, and wait, almost jerking up out of their seats every time a new nurse slips into the waiting room to call another family in.

And finally, finally, finally, one shows up with their name upon her lips.

The recovery room is crowded, there’s someone in every bed, and along the far wall, there are cribs, and Sean’s in one of them. They hear him long before they see him. “Crabby” does not even begin to cover the level of pissed off crying they’re hearing. They know that cry, that’s a furious little guy.

They draw closer, pulled by sobs louder than a twenty pound body should be able to make. And each yell washes over them with relief. If he can yell, he’s okay, or at least he’s going to be okay.

His whole head is covered in big, puffy bandages, and he keeps trying to roll onto his belly, but he’s a bit too drugged so he’s not exactly getting his body over, and apparently he keeps nudging the sore side of his head, too, which makes him cry louder.

Abby’s swooping him up, fast, and Tim’s right next to her, holding her and him. Gibbs, who’s a little more aware of the rest of the room, spots a chair, and drags it over.

“He probably wants to nurse,” one of the nurses says. “They’re always hungry and thirsty after surgery.”

Tim remembers that from his own adventures in the hospital, how dry his mouth was and how desperately he wanted something wet.

Abby sits down in the chair and has him on her breast in a matter of seconds.

Sean looks very slightly mollified by getting a breast into his mouth, and he can’t cry and nurse at once, so he quiets down, slurping away, as Abby holds his close, and Tim gently strokes his cheek, and Gibbs hovers behind them, keeping a quiet, soothing presence.

He does snap a quick photo and send it off to the rest of the family. Out of surgery, having lunch. Everything went well. Next appointment in a month.

They’re eventually taken out of recovery to Sean’s room. Back before everything went to pieces in DC, this was probably a private room. Now it’s got three cribs, three chairs, and three cots for adults packed into it. There are two other babies in there, but they’re all cochlear implant cases, so, while it’s true that a collection of crying babies in three different cribs is a hell of a grind for their parents, they aren’t disturbing each other, at all.

Also, because it’s a room shared by three babies, only one “visitor” is allowed for each child in at a time.

Sean, who fell asleep a moment after he finished nursing, and is now in his crib, with his teddy. The nurse said he’s likely going to be doing a lot of sleeping today, and tomorrow, and the day after. As long as he’s on serious painkillers, he’s going to be snoozing, a lot.

Gibbs, seeing the cot, flops down on it, laces his hands behind his head, and then, looking up, orders Tim and Abby, “Home, both of you. You’ve kept watch over him while he was in danger, and he’s in the clear now. He’s not waking up anytime soon, so I’ve got him. I don’t want to see either of you until you’ve gotten at least four hours of sleep and a real meal.”
And while both of them would like to argue, there isn’t any arguing with those ice blue eyes, and one of them has to leave anyway… And it’s not like either of them has gotten any solid sleep in the last few days…and it’s also not like either of them was really able to eat breakfast, so…

As they’re pulling out of the parking lot, Abby’s setting her timer. She will be back at the hospital in exactly five and a half hours, which is exactly the minimum amount of time they need to get home, sleep, eat, and come back.

Unless Tim beats her to it.

“Down you go, love,” Breena says to Donnie after he finishes his late lunch.

He blinks up at her, sleepy, a few times before settling onto his back.

“Shhh…”

His little eyes droop, and drift shut.

She steps away, as quietly as she can. So far, Donnie’s been a fairly easy sleeper. Something of a fussy eater, little man won’t give up those burps until he’s been patted to the ends of the earth and back, but lay him down, keep quiet, and he’ll drift off easy enough.

She smiles at him, and feels her own eyes drooping. Naptime for her, too. Even with one of her spouses making sure to get one of Donnie’s feeds, that still means she never gets more than five hours of sleep in a row, and honestly, she’s often getting less. Little boy being slow on his burps means that he doesn’t just eat and go down.

And right now, going down is a very good plan.

She heads to her own bed, and finds Tim, Abby, and Jimmy all in it.

Abby’s in the middle. Tim’s snuggled up at her back, and both of them are exhausted. Jimmy’s next to Abby, on his back, holding her hand. He’s exhausted, too, but a different flavor of it.

Breena crosses their room, and finds her spot next to Jimmy, lying her head on his shoulder. He wakes up just enough to kiss her forehead, stubbly chin rasping against her skin, and then he’s still again.

When Tim wakes up, his mouth tastes brown, and his eyes don’t want to open, and the reality of not really sleeping for the last few days crashes into him.

And he couldn’t care less about any of it, because he’s got to get back to his boy.

He gently untangles himself from Abby, who will likely be a bit on the annoyed side about him sneaking off to get baby snuggles, but only one of them can be there at any given time, and she’s the one who does the nursing thing, and that happens tonight, so she might as well get more sleep and…
And he’s rationalizing it.

He’s awake, he ate something, he’s going.

And that’s just it.

When he gets in, Gibbs is in the chair, and Sean’s on his chest, snoozing away.

Gibbs sees him, and looks a little guilty. They try not to let the kids sleep on people. “And now we know why you sent us away.”

“You needed the rest.”

His eyes still feel gummy, and his body aches with tiredness. “I did. Abby was still out when I got up.”

He gently takes Sean from Gibbs, and Gibbs stands up, offering up the chair. Tim settles himself, cuddling him against his chest. He makes sure not to let his chin droop to the top of Sean’s head. He doesn’t know exactly what’s sore, but better safe than sorry.

He can feel a tiny heart thudding against his chest, and little breaths against his neck. Sean smells wrong, but that’s likely because he was in surgery. Once they get him home and a bath, he’ll smell right again.

“Did he wake up?”

“Just for a minute. I changed his diaper, gave him a bottle, and he was out again. They’re giving him good meds. He’s a little loopy, but I don’t think he’s hurting.”

“Good.”

They see a nurse hovering near the door, and Gibbs gets the message. He squeezes Tim’s shoulder, lays a kiss on Sean’s back, and heads off.

“You cheated,” is the first thing Abby says to him when she gets in.

Tim shrugs a little, not feeling even remotely guilty about it. Sean’s in his arms, snoozing away, and he’s had a few hours of just holding onto him, reassuring himself that everything is indeed, fine.

Little guy is loopy, which is kind of entertaining in a ten-month-old. He was trying to suck his thumb but couldn’t successfully get it into his mouth. He hit himself in the cheek with his fist and looked really surprised about five seconds after it happened.

“I can’t nurse him, and you needed the rest…”

She gives him the hairy eyeball while taking their son from him. For a moment, she just holds him, feeling the soft, warm weight of his body against her chest. Her eyes close and a smile spreads across her face as she snuggles him.

Then she looks up at the bigger version of the little guy and says, “Uh huh…” She knows he’s BSing it, and he knows she knows, too.

“He should be waking up soon.”

“Good.”

“The nurse says they’ll release him ‘round ten in the morning.”

“I’ll stay ‘til then, and take him home, then.”

“How about you text me when he’s ready to go, and I’ll pick you both up. That chair’s shit for sleeping in, the other little guys aren’t exactly silent,” one of them is fussing away as he and his mom waits for a nurse to show up with more pain medication, “and I don’t want you driving tired.”

Abby eyes the chair, and the cot, thinks about too damn many nights in the hospital in her past, and decides Tim’s onto something.

“Okay.” She holds him a little tighter, and inhales, deeply. Tim steps in closer, wrapping both of them in his arms. They stand there, holding each other, for a few minutes. Then the nurse with the pain medication comes in, and as she’s making sure the other little guy gets his meds, she eyes them.

Tim nods, kisses Abby and Sean, and then heads off.

“How is he?” Breena asks as soon as Tim’s in the house.

He doesn’t have time to answer before being rushed by the other kids, who haven’t seen UncleDad all day, and are understandably interested in some time with him.

So, he’s on the floor, sitting cross-legged, holding Kelly, with Molly on his back, and Anna toddling towards him, when he says, “He’s okay. Sleepy. Annoyed when he’s awake. It looks like they’re doing a good job with the pain meds. Most of the time he’s asleep, but when he’s awake, he’s not too fussy.”

Breena sits down next to him, rests her head on his shoulder, and says, “Good. And how’s Daddy?”

Tim kisses her forehead. “Better. It’s done. For good or bad, it’s done. No going back now.”

Jimmy comes out of the kitchen, where he’s been wrapping up dishes. “Hey.” He sits down next to Tim, too, and takes Anna, who’s trying to climb up Tim’s legs, and holds her.

“You’re looking better,” Tim says to him.

“Back at you. Have you eaten?”

Tim blinks at that question. He doesn’t remember eating, but that doesn’t mean much. “Maybe. I’m not hungry.”
“There’s a bowl of stew in the fridge for you,” Jimmy replies. He kisses Tim on the top of the head, and straightens up. “Eat up, quick, and then help me out with tubby time.” Then he curls his arm so Anna’s hanging upside down, peeling with giggles, as he blows a raspberry on one foot. “Okay, up the stairs we go! Tubby time!”

And like a heard of elephants galumphing up the stairs, the assorted McPalmer kids head to the bathroom.

“When’s Sean coming home?” Molly asks as they settle in for story time.

“Tomorrow morning,” Tim says.

“And you’re going to have to be really gentle with him,” Breena adds. “He’s got a big booboo on his head, and it’s going to be sore.”

Tim nods at that, then he cups his hand over Kelly’s ear. “He’s got a big, puffy bandage that looks like this on his head,” he says.

“Hearing?” Kelly asks.

“Not yet. The booboo’s got to heal up before they can make him hear,” Tim says.

Anna points to her knee, which has a booboo on it: a long, thin scrape. “Booboo?”

Tim’s nodding, though Sean’s isn’t exactly on that level. He reaches forward and gently strokes her head behind her ear, and then does it for the two older girls. “Right there.”

“Kiss it?” Kelly asks.

Tim nods. “When he gets home, you can give him a gentle kiss.” Tim figures there’s no way Sean’ll be able to feel it through his bandage, so there’s no shot of them hurting him.

When they get the kids down, Anna, who is normally pretty good about laying down and going to sleep, keeps sitting back up and looking around the crib she shares with Sean.

Tim kisses her head an extra time.

“Yeah, I know. He’ll be home tomorrow.”

9:30, before Abby’s even got the chance to text him, Tim’s waiting at the hospital.

They do let him break the “visitor” rule for Sean’s release care consult.

He and Abby both nod along. The big bandage stays on for two days. Then they can take it off. The steri-strips underneath will just start to peel off, and like with Abby’s c-section, don’t tug on them, just trim them as they get loose. Sponge baths for a week, then he can go back in the shower. Use an earplug for the next few weeks to make sure the inside of his ear doesn’t get wet. If he spikes a fever or if the area gets red (more red) and swollen (more swollen) bring him in.

They know all of this stuff, and are eager to get out of here. Sean’s waking up some. He’s still on pretty heavy-duty pain killers, but not the level he was yesterday, so he keeps trying to get free of Abby’s arms and get on the floor.

He’s not really crawling yet, but he does sort of rock and scoot, and he looks like he’s in a rockin’ and scootin’ sort of mood.

Abby’s not about to let him rock and scoot on the floor of a hospital, and Tim wholeheartedly agrees with that. So, Sean’s in a crabby mood, which makes getting out of there even more appealing.

Finally, though, they’re out.

Sean’s in his car seat, and getting with it enough to have noticed there’s this thing on his head. He keeps whacking at it with his hand, trying to figure out what it is. Tim’s driving, and Abby’s in the backseat. She has a mirror, and tries showing Sean himself, and his bandage in the mirror.

He spends a few minutes looking at the mirror, and seeing the baby in the mirror, and how it’s doing what he’s doing. That seems to calm him down a little, especially about the thing on his head.

Or maybe, because he’s ten months old, and has the attention span of a drugged infant, he just loses interest.

Either way, he falls asleep again, and they take him home.

“Ooohhh…” Heather takes Sean from Abby when they get home. “Look at you! Is your head sore?”

Sean, of course, does not respond to that directly. He does lean in for a cuddle, and then jerk his head back because he just laid the sore side against Heather’s chest. Then he cries, and tries to get out of her arms because he’s sure she just bit him or something.

She hands him to Tim; she’s a firm believer in not forcing cuddles on children who don’t want them, and says, “Gonna be a long couple of days.”

Tim, who’s carefully making sure only the healthy side of Sean’s head comes in contact with his shoulder says, “Yes.”

Abby, who’s got Kelly in her arms, brings her close enough to see her brother, and then, holding her hand, very lightly lets her touch the bandage. “It’s really sore.”

“SEAN!” Kelly yells, but Sean’s completely unaware of it. She nods, looking satisfied by that, and says, “Not hearing, yet.”

“Not yet,” Abby replies, wondering if Molly and Anna are going to need to do that, too.
Lots of cuddles, lots of naps, lots of snacks, and lots of Little Bear.

It’s a very slow day.

Laying on the floor, on his side, with Sean sitting up in front of him, gnawing on one of his blocks, as Kelly snuggles against his chest, and the three of them watch Little Bear and his buddies sing the rain song, Tim’s finally feeling really settled again.

A moment later, when Mona and Jackson come bounding in, with Pop not far behind them, it gets better.

Mona stares at Sean, cocks her hear, and gently sniffs him. She doesn’t actually nod, but she goes have a sort of, “I guess this is okay,” look to her face, then she pads off to the kitchen, where Abby’s getting lunch ready.

Gibbs sits down next to them, and Jackson scurries over to Sean, putting his front paws on Sean’s leg. He gives a little bark, and it looks like Sean notices it, but Tim knows he’s responding to Jackson touching him. Then Jackson hops ups a bit further, so he’s in Sean’s lap, and lays his front paws on Sean’s shoulders, and licks Sean’s face.

Sean lights up in a huge grin (first they’ve seen all day) and strokes Jackson’s back.

Both of the grownups keep a close eye on those two. The odds of one of them accidentally hurting the other one are higher than they’d like, but right now, little puppy and little boy are happy as clams with each other.

Gibbs gives Tim a gentle squeeze to the shoulder, and says, “It was okay.”

Tim nods, inhales and exhales deeply, and says, “I know.”

And this time, he’s not lying.
And we’re a go!”

There are times Tim misses MTAC, and this is one of them.

He’s in his office, at home, sitting next to his uncle and Walter, and watching the feed through Sander’s glasses. Right now he’s got a view of the front of a building where the IRS claims it stores its evidence. There are no signs on it, nothing to suggest it’s anything other than a warehouse just outside of the DC border.

It feels perversely bizarre to be watching this in his desk chair, in daylight, without three million dollars of top of the line computer equipment next to him.

It feels odder yet to just watch. There is precisely no situation where him hopping into this will help. His job is to be the Boss, and if necessary call an abort, call the head of the IRS, or the lawyers depending on how badly this goes.

“Daytime?” Tim remembers asking his uncle when he sat down with the plan for this.

“Daytime. Nothing on earth looks less suspicious than someone with the right credentials walking into the right building during office hours.”

Tim had to admit, that made a certain amount of sense.

Outside the IRS building is as non-descript as possible. Inside is a different story.

Anyone can walk into the main lobby. From the camera in Sander’s glasses, they can see a small space in front of a metal detector. That’s common enough for a federal structure. The blast shields behind them, aren’t. The fact that everyone is getting scanned and patted down isn’t common, either.

The fact that you can’t even go through the metal detector if you don’t pass a fingerprint and facial recognition scan take it even further.

After the IRS was burned out, they made sure no-one who didn’t belong there could get in to any of their buildings.

Though, as Tim’s watching Sanders walk up to the fingerprint scanner, he’s wondering if a big part of this isn’t so much about securing their people, as making sure no one can do what he’s doing.

“You sure you want to do this?” Tim asked Sanders. He feels like he’s pretty capable when it comes to reading people, and as best he can tell she’s who Brand’ll be in about ten years. Whip smart, hyper capable, able to hack anything that can be hacked, but not a field agent.

Tom McGee snorks a quick laugh at that.
Sanders smiles slightly, licks her lips, and says, “Yes, sir, I’m sure.”

Tim looks at both of them. “What’d I miss?”

“Well, sir. The US didn’t have women in combat roles when I wanted to enlist, but Israel did.”

Tim nods slowly. “Say no more. Did he have to wrestle Orli to get you on his team?”

“Orli was out by the time I switched sides.”

“Ah.”

Sanders is looking at the fingerprint scanner. It’s a basic version. Place finger pad onto the scanner, little light scans across, it dithers for a moment, and then… Yep, green light.

Over to the facial recognition scanner. She has to take the glasses off for that, so they get a view of the room around them spinning, and then the floor.

“You sure this’ll work?” Tim asked.

Tom looked away from the makeup artist, Jim Bellinger, who was working on Sanders to him. There’s some exasperation in his eyes, and a bit of sharpness in his voice. “Pretend I’ve done this before.”

Tim nodded, and sighed. It’s easier to be the guy getting ready to go in, than it is to be the one managing.

“Fine,” Tim said. “Tell me how this’ll work.”

Tim nodded. “Okay. And…” he eyed the prosthetics Bellinger, who Tom hired out of a Hollywood special effects team, was applying to Sander’s face.

“Facial recognition measures sets points on people’s faces. What looks like the same person to you, doesn’t look like the same person to a computer because the eyebrows are a little higher, or the nose a tad wider, earlobes a bit longer,” Bellinger said as he carefully glued tiny pads of latex to Sander’s face. “Once I’m done with the makeup, she’ll look almost exactly like she normally does, but the pictures they get when she’s in the building won’t match Sanders on a facial recognition, but they will match Melanie Burkowski.”

Tim looked at the little latex pads that he’s going to put on Melanie’s fingers. “Same with the prints.”

“Exactly.”
Tim can’t see how the facial recognition software works. He, and everyone else, spend a moment looking at the floor. Gray, poured concrete… Boring.

He’s starting to move past tense and into worrying… What if one of the little pads slipped off? Maybe she had an itch and scratched and dislodged an eyebrow or something… when the glasses move again, and once more they’re on Sander’s face, and she’s walking forward.

She lays her purse and the folder with the evidence request on a conveyor belt, and then walks toward the metal detector.

A security guard pats her down. They get a view of the top of her head as she very carefully frisks Sanders.

A moment after that, the guard stands up, nods, and Sanders goes through the detector.

Another moment, and she’s on the far side of the conveyor belt, and picking up her purse and the evidence request.

The final hurdle lies twenty feet past the blast shields.

“Her name is Myrna Smith, and it’s her job to know where everything is, make sure all the paperwork is in order, and then fetch it for you,” Tom says.

Through the screen, Tim sees an older woman, gray hair, gray eyes, and a look of world weariness that makes him think this woman has seen everything there ever was, ever is, or ever will be to see.

She’s behind bulletproof glass, in an office that appears to be made out of concrete cinderblocks.

She presses a button, and they hear, “Whaddya need?”

Sanders finds the button on her side, and presses it, allowing Smith to hear her voice. “My boss wants the Partridge evidence.”

Ms. Smith looks at Sanders. She knows something’s up.

“You’re in the wrong building. The FBI has that.”

They can’t see what Sanders does, but they hear her say, “Don’t I know it! Look, Hellerson says you’ve got it, and I’ve got to get it from you.” She holds up her evidence request so Smith can see it through the glass.

Smith’s eyes flick over the order. Besides what it’s asking for, apparently it passes muster. “I can’t give you what I don’t have.”

“I know! But Hellerson says the computers say you’ve got it, and… I mean, did you personally hand those computers over?”

Myrna rolls her eyes. “No. I watched it on TV the same way everyone else did. I can double check.”

“Thank you!”

They watch Myrna turn to her computer screen, and her fingers flying over the keys. She stares at the screen for a moment, eyebrows scrunched together, and licks her lips. “Yeah. Your boss is right. The computer says it’s still here. I can go look.”

“Thanks.” Myrna’s just about up when Sanders asks. “Hey, can you see who was supposed to be on when the computers went to the FBI?”

“I know who was on. There’s only three of us, and Alison Hentrinks is the only one who’d screw the pooch badly enough to hand over evidence without recording it properly. I swear, that girl!” She rolls her eyes and shakes her head. “The only reason she’s got a job is because we’re all hurting for people right now. Sit down, it’ll take me a while.” Then they watch Myrna stand up, fetch a hand truck, and vanish through the door that has to lead back to the evidence warehouse.

They spend twenty minutes watching Sanders read. Tim approves of her choice of fiction.

All through it, they wait, on edge. At NCIS Tim’s set some things, evidence, files, cases, etc… so that, should someone attempt to access them, an alarm will go off, and let them know who’s trying to get them.

Sanders didn’t find anything along those lines when she was carving a way into the IRS computers, but that doesn’t mean there isn’t one there.

They have all communications into and out of the evidence building monitored, and right now, everything is silent.

If something tries to get out, they can kill the signal, but doing so kills their signal to Sanders, too.

Half an hour. Tim’s half-reading A Dance With Dragons, again, and half keeping an eye on the communications feed.

“How long do you think it takes to find a computer?” Walter asks.

Tim shakes his head. “If it’s like the NCIS evidence lock up, it could be hours. Everything is in there, somewhere.”

“And if, like we suspect, it’s not in there…” Tom says.

“She’s going to… Actually, no. If it’s not there, she’s going to assume that what’s her name just did an awful job and didn’t log the transfer,” Walter says. “What do we know about Myrna?”

“We did a full background on her. She’s worked for the IRS for twenty-eight years. She’s set to retire next June. She’s been in evidence since 1990.”

“So, if they’re handing out faked evidence, or changed all the records, she’d have to know about it, right?” Walter says to McGee.

Tom half-inclines his head. “It’s a working theory. We’re not sure. Evidence from three IRS buildings ended up here, so it would have been easy to move things without her knowing what was getting moved, and what needed to move.”

Walter isn’t buying it.
“Everything gets a scanner code when it’s packaged up. That’s how they log things in and out. Scan them, sign for them, scan them again when they get to whomever is supposed to have them.”

“Like Amazon?” Tim says.

“More like a library, but that’s the basic idea,” Tom says.

“Do we have eyes on the scanner feed?”

Tom clicks a few times and another window pops up, splitting the view on the big screen TV in Tim’s office into three. They can all see the last scan was four hours ago.

They hear the buzz, and see the view from Sander’s glasses jerk away from the page to the window.

“That girl’s a twit. There’s nothing back there,” Myrna says.

“Okay.” There’s a pause, and Tim assumes that’s Sander smiling. “Thanks for double checking. You mind calling my boss and telling him there’s nothing there?”

“You don’t want to get chewed out?” Myrna says with a dry smile.

“I’d rather not.”

“Sure, hon. What’s his extension?”

“3398.”

They watch Sander watch Myrna dial, and a second later McGee’s phone rings.

“Hellerson.”

“Hello Mr. Hellerson, this is Myrna Smith, in the evidence lock up. I’ve got…” They see Myrna look to Sander.

“Melanie Barkowski”

“Melanie Barkowski, down here, requesting the Partridge evidence, and I’m confirming we don’t have anything.”

“Uh huh…” McGee says. “Nothing?”

“Nothing.”

“Huh… That’s interesting. The computer says it’s all there.”

“Computers are only as good as the person who updates them, and Allison’s a twit.”

“Interesting. Just to be clear, you’ve got nothing on the Partridge case.”

“Nothing, sir. Everything is supposed to be in five boxes marked XKJ-2237-8742-Part. None of them are here.”

McGee offers a long suffering sigh. “Thank you. I’ll go call the FBI again.”
“Good luck, sir.”

“Thanks.” Tom hangs up.

They see the image on the screen bob up and down as Sander nods at Myrna. “And thank you. Okay, I’m off.” And they watch Sander walk out.

Tom McGee turns to Tim and Walter. “Now’s when we start planning the dead of night, sneak in, leave-no-trace mission.”

Tim nods. “Walter…” He doesn’t need to even start the sentence.

“I know. Eyes on Allison, and get someone into the evidence lock up. Let’s see how often they’re playing fast and loose with the books. Just to be clear, we don’t, in fact, have that evidence, right?”

“She said five boxes. We got one envelope with a laptop in it,” Tim replies.

“All right,” Walter says. “We’ve got confirmation of the fact that there’s supposed to be way more than what we’ve got.”

“Yep. We won’t know until Uncle Tom’s guys get in there if Allison didn’t scan anything because there was nothing to scan, or because she’s in on it, but either way, I want someone in one of those jobs finding out what the orders from on high are.”

Walter smiles. “I think we can arrange that. I have a feeling Allison’s going to get a new job offer, a better one, very soon, and we’re going to pop someone in her place.”

“Perfect,” Tim says. “What are you going to do with Allison?” Someone who can’t be trusted, assuming Myrna’s not just BSing to cover her ass, to scan a document doesn’t sound like the kind of person they want at the FBI.

“We’ve got an evidence lock up, too, and ours is completely automated. On purpose. A lobotomized rabbit could run that system and not screw it up. There’s no possible way Allison’s too stupid for it, and just like the IRS, we’re hurting for manpower, too.”

“Go get her,” Tim says, liking this, very much.

“I’ve got news,” Khan says to Tim a few days later.

He’s not in DC. They’re talking over a secure line.

“Partridge news or hacking the government news?”

“You’ve got my hacking report.” He hears Khan make a disgusted noise. “Do you have any idea how badly I’m going to hurt you guys if you can’t close that hole?”

“I can imagine.” The last report was Khan hacking the anonymous bidding contract server for the US military. Apparently, it took him all of three hours to set it so he could award the contracts to whomever he wanted. Tim’s sent his report off, along with a ‘now would be an awfully good time for you guys to look into block chaining your bids and contracts’ note. He’s fairly sure the guy at the Pentagon he sent that note to is going to ignore it. Khan will likely come out of the deal rich enough to buy his own private island, or three. “Partridge news, then.”

“Maybe. There’s someone in Montana who’s doing some coding on the dark web that looks familiar.”

“How familiar?”

“Close, but not certain. I’m thinking of a field trip.”

“NO! If it is her, and you walk up to her…” Tim’s got images of dead hacker rushing through his mind.

“People knew my code, not my face.”

“Enough of them knew your face you were hiding for your life, before you ‘died.’ If she didn’t break herself out, the kind of person who grabbed her could likely identify you, too.”

“Uh huh.” Khan’s not impressed. “You just want to grab her yourself.”

“That’s true, too. But I’m not interested in losing you in the process. Among other things, you drive up to wherever the hell it is Montana, you’ve got to cross a border, remember? And I don’t know if they’ve got your real prints on file or not.”

Khan hisses. “Shit.”

“And then, once you get there, what? If she ran away on her own, fine. If someone grabbed her, you’re alone, in a foreign country, where you’re a wanted fugitive, where my get out of jail card means less than the paper it’s written on, trying to rescue a woman from someone who had the power, pull, and guns to get her out of prison and erase most of the last year. So, please, keep your butt in Miami, enjoy your mojitos, and let my people go hunting for her.”

“So your guys can get into the shootout with the ‘bad guys.’”

Tim’s hoping not, but that’s always a possibility. “Maybe. At least my guys know how to use a damn gun.”

“What are you going to do with her if you find her?”

Tim stares at the ceiling. “I don’t know.”

Khan sounds surprised. “You mean that, don’t you?”

“If she ran away, she’s not going to want anything to do with me, especially if I’m taking her back to prison. If she got grabbed, I’ve at least got some leverage, but that gets shot to shit if I immediately turn around and toss her back into jail.”

“Depends on how bad conditions are.”

“Yeah. Great. If it’s bad enough federal prison looks good…”

Tim can feel Khan nodding. If it’s that bad, she likely won’t be of any use to anyone after that.

“Give me the coordinates. I’ll have someone scout it. Once we’ve got a better idea of what’s out there…”

“Fine.” Khan does. “That’s wild west territory out there. Who are you sending?”
Tim smirks. “My dad’s in-laws are in Montana. Maybe he’d like an excuse to visit.”

Khan thinks about that for a moment, and then says, “Wait, Silent Sam, with the U.P. address?”

Tim laughs. “I want someone who looks like a good old boy from the wild west, possibly just out with his horse, his buddy, and his dog for a ride.”

“Oh, God. He’ll nail that, won’t he?”

“Exactly.”

Tim checks in with Kevin after that call, laying out what Khan offered.

“Yeah, he’s still on the up and up. He found that address two days ago. He’s been checking and double checking, and I’ve been looking for Heidi’s Caf-Pow.”

“Have you found it?”

“Maybe.”

“I’m hearing that a lot today.”

“According to the parents whose kids she used to teach, she was a huge fan of Ghirardelli Chocolate Squares.” Tim nods at that, he likes the dark chocolate and salted caramel ones. “The address Khan gave you is on an Indian reservation. It doesn’t have postal delivery. It’s got a box. The very nice lady at the Post Office was willing to tell me that that box does get a large package sent to it every month from Amazon, and that said package does have a ‘Perishable’ stamp on it.”

“Kevin, that’s good work.”

“That’s a really tenuous lead, McGee. For all we know, that’s a box of pumpernickel bread or something.”

“You’re right about that, but you still did a good enough job to figure out what she likes, and talked the Post Office lady out of some evidence. That’s good work. You feel like going on a trip?”

“A trip?” Kevin sounds halfway between excited and wary.

“Yeah. Montana. I know who’s going into the field. If you want to be the guy in the hotel room keeping eyes on the computers, ears on the situation…”

“Oh… Yeah. Sure. Who’s going into the field?”

“I’ve got to ask, but I think Gibbs and Fornell.”

Tim hears something like “akgurk” on the other line, and he smiles, imagining the look on Kevin’s face at that news. “I’ll let you know when it’s set up.”

“Hey, Dad.”
“Tim? What’s up? Sean okay?”

“Yeah. He slept through the night last night.” For the first time since they weaned him off his pain meds. Once his little snuggle bunny got used to all the extra cuddles and attention he was getting, he didn’t want to stop. Getting him to sleep in his crib, with just Anna, was three nights he’d rather not think about, again.

“Excellent. How’s the scar?”

“The steri strips are almost off.” Which is what Tim’s willing to say. That it’s bigger, redder, and staring up at him every time he sees the side of Sean’s head is what he’s not willing to say. That he almost decked Jimmy when he made the joke about Frankenstein’s baby is something else he’s not willing to say. He held Sean under his armpits, using his fingers to keep Sean’s arms out in front of him while ‘walking’ him around the living room, chasing his siblings, groaning. The kids, including Sean, thought it was a laugh riot. Tim felt his hand curl into a fist, and he wasn’t entirely sure if he wanted to smack Jimmy for having no filter, or himself for putting that scar on Sean’s head.

Gibbs doesn’t ask what’s up again. Tim can feel him thinking it.

“How’d you and Fornell like a trip to Montana?”

“Now?”

“Yeah.”

“I think Fornell’d want to know what he did to piss you off so bad you’d send him to Montana in November.”

Tim laughs at that, and then waits. He knows Gibbs is curious.

“Why?”

“We think we might have found Heidi Partridge, and I think it’d be a really good idea to have some people who can look like Montana go wandering about, get a look at where she might be, and see if they can suss out if she ran or was taken.”

“Scouting.”

“Scouting. Just a couple of guys, maybe a horse or two, take Mona if she can stand the flight…”

Tim feels more than hears Gibbs shaking his head. “Dog sled. Snow’s too deep for horses now. We’re going to want some dog sleds.”

“Lucky for you, you know someone who has a few of them.”

Gibbs laughs. “When?”

“Whenever Jennifer tells me she’s got tickets for it.”

“I can do that.”
“Wendy…”

“Hey, Jethro.” She looks up from the crossword puzzle she’s working on. Like his house has an open door policy, for him, the Fornells have an open door, too. So, she’s not too surprised to see him just walk into her living room less than an hour after he got off the phone with Tim.

“You mind if I borrow your man for a few days this week?”

“Borrow him how?”

“Drag him to Montana, spend some time sliding around with dog sleds, looking to see if there’s a missing hacker in an-off-the-beaten-track house in the woods.”

She nods. “He’ll like that. What are you going to do if you find the hacker?”

“Not sure about that. We’re just supposed to find out if she’s there.”

“Sure, have fun.”

He kisses her cheek. “You’re the best decision Tobias ever made, you know that, right?”

She smiles at him. “He’s in the back.”

‘In the back’ turned out to mean in the garage. Fornell doesn’t love working with his hands, not the way Gibbs does, but after about a week in a tank, everyone in there becomes a fairly decent jackleg mechanic. It’s that or die, because those things, especially in ‘Nam, tended to drop over dead if you looked at them wrong, so everyone had to be able to fix pretty much everything, or at least rig it into some sort of basic functional shape to get it to limp back to base.

In addition to not loving working with his hands, he also doesn’t love spending money he doesn’t have to, and if he’s looking at changing his own oil, or giving someone money to do it for him… That’s simple. Compared to a tank, taking care of Wendy’s Hyundai is a piece of cake.

A piece of cake he’s currently located underneath of, getting ready to drain the old oil and put some new oil in.

“Once you’re done with that, gear up.”

Fornell slides out from under the car. “I’m sorry. Do I look like one of your minions?”

“Hah.”

“You don’t order me around.”

Gibbs snorts at that, too. Fornell slides under the car.

Fornell slides back out again, peering up at Gibbs. “What kind of case?”

“You remember what I’ve been telling you about Tim’s missing hacker?”

“Yeah. He find her?”

“Maybe. I’m heading out to see if the person they found is her.”

Fornell thinks about that. “You want me to come, too?”

“Yes. Go out, blend in, look around, see if it’s her, or if we’re looking at a bunch of sixteen-year-old computer geeks.”

“What do we do if it’s her?”

“Not sure, yet. Probably depend on if she looks like she’s there because she wants to be, or if someone’s holding her.”

“If she’s there because she wants to be, we need to bring her ass in.”

Gibbs shrugs. He’s certain he doesn’t understand all the ups and downs of what they arrested this lady for, but Penny thinks the charges are crap, so that’s good enough for him.

Fornell sees he’s lukewarm on this, and adds, “Her lawyer’s dead. Her prosecutor’s missing. Remember… If she got herself out, a lot of people got hurt for her to do it.”

Gibbs nods at that. “Good point.”

“And if she’s being held…” Fornell’s warming up to the mental image of night vision goggles, storming in guns drawn, and rescuing the captive. He’s got a wide grin on his face and looks awfully ready to get going.

“If she’s being held, we’ve at least got to wait for a warrant or something. Probably want some backup, too.”

Fornell waves that away. “I’m in.”

“Pack your long johns.”

That brings Fornell up short. “Wait, where are we going?”

“Teach me to agree to a trip without asking where we’re going ahead of time,” Fornell says as they shuffle through the million person long line at Dulles’ security.

Gibbs would have to admit, this wasn’t part of what he was looking forward to. Yes, with visiting Abbi every week he’s spending more time in airports than he ever wanted to, but at least with all of those flights they’ve been ‘domestic.’

Right now, they’re in the international terminal, because, when he wasn’t looking, Montana went from declaring itself no longer part of the US to doing something about it. So, unlike when he and Abbi went almost a year ago, now they’re on an ‘international’ flight, and having to deal with even more security and hurdles.

“Feels weird to have to use my passport to get to Montana,” Kevin, standing slightly behind them, adds. He’d been feeling a bit nervous about a trip with Gibbs and Fornell, but McGee told him they’re like sharks and can smell nervous at a thousand paces, so bottle it up, and just go in and be sure of himself. ‘You helped take down Khan. Gibbs knows that. Just don’t step on their toes. Act like you know what you’re doing on your side of it, and you’ll be fine.’ That helps, a bit, and he’s doing his best not to act like a junior probie fresh out of FLETC.

Fornell shakes his head at that, and adds a bit of an eye roll. It’s not like he blames a lot of the states that left for leaving, but right now, it’s a major pain in the ass. He feels a little nudge to his shin, and looks down, Jackson wants something. Fornell picks him up, and then looks at Gibbs. “I would have understood bringing Mona, but why is the gerbil with us?”

Kevin would have to admit that “the gerbil” is helping a whole lot on the ‘be comfortable’ front. Yeah, Fornell’s being gruff about him, but whenever he thinks no one’s looking he’ll bend down and pet him. It’s hard to be too intimidated by a man who’s cuddling a puppy, even if he does keep calling him a gerbil.

‘The gerbil’ looks insulted at that, and offers a small bark. Gibbs takes him from Fornell, and Jackson, now high enough to see more than a sea of feet, settles down on Gibbs’ arm. And like Fornell, it’s just… difficult, to be intimidated by the guy carrying four pounds of ridiculously cute little doggie.

“Who’s Mona?” Kevin asks.

“His real dog,” Fornell says, gently petting Jackson’s head. “The snow’s going to be over his head, Jethro.”

“They wouldn’t let Mona on the plane proper. She would have had to have gone in a crate. And he’s got to be able to handle anything anyone throws at him, including snow, horses, and other dogs.”

Kevin clearly wants to know why Jackson would need to handle anything other than chasing balls and chewing on toys.

He’s about to ask when Gibbs says, “He’s a hearing-ear-dog-in-training. He’s got to be able to go wherever his person goes.”

“Oh.” Kevin looks more closely at Jackson. “How old is he?”

“About nine months.”

That surprises Kevin. “Is he full grown then?”

“Just about. He might get another half-inch or so.”

Jackson’s watching Kevin with interest, trying to get some petting and licking in. Kevin hold out his hands and it’s clear that Jackson wants to head over to visit. Gibbs inclines his head and lets Kevin take him.

Talking about how one trains a hearing ear dog kills the rest of the line, and shocks Kevin. Gibbs, Gibbs, the invincible, silent knight of NCIS is happy to chat, with actual, spoken, words, with him about teaching a puppy to recognize hand signs.
“Seriously?” Fornell’s in full-on snit mode when the TSA lady wants to flip through the books in his carry-on luggage.

“Yeah, of course it is. God alone knows how I’m gonna take a plane down with a bookmark. I’m retired FBI, you know?”

She’s flipping through the pages of his book, ignoring him. The only reason he doesn’t make a bigger fuss is because Kevin got “randomly” pulled aside so they could do a “thorough” search of his computer equipment, and he’s doing a much better job of tolerating it than Fornell is.

When they’re through security, Fornell says to Gibbs and Kevin, “The next time McGee wants my ass on the other side of the country, he can pony up the private jet.”

Kevin sniggers at that.

The rest of the trip is fairly basic. Wait, get up, get in line, wait some more, get on the plain, wait, fly, wait, get off the plain, wait, go through customs, wait some more, finally get through and get their luggage.

Gibbs had thought about calling his in-laws and seeing them for dogsleds, but a look at the map squashed that idea. Montana is more than five hundred miles wide, and Abbi’s parents are on the eastern side of the state, and the Flathead Indian Reservation is on the western side.

A few minutes of googling also told him that dog sleds might not be the greatest idea, either. He knows Abbi’s mentioned that Montana is arid, and that it doesn’t actually snow all that much, it’s just that the snow that falls doesn’t go anywhere until May. The part of the state they’re going to isn’t as dry as Abbi’s part, but there’s still only a few inches of snow on the ground in November.

So, horses. He’s good with horses. Two guys out for a ride, little dog frisking around behind them, maybe riding with him. Kevin back at the hotel, keeping up with them, voice in the earwig… It’ll be good. They’ve got about an hour’s drive to get to Polson, another hour or so to get settled. Then they can go and start getting the lay of the land.

He’s getting that planned out in his head as Kevin’s looking for the luggage carousel so he can get his gear, and Fornell’s texting Wendy to let her know he got in okay, when a voice filters through.

“Jethro.”

Gibbs jerks to a stop, turning toward the sound of his name. He blinks, shocked. There’s a man, standing, waiting. He looks familiar, but it does take Gibbs a tenth of a second to place his father-in-law. “Jeff?”

The older man offers his hand, and Gibbs shakes on automatic, feeling stunned to see him here.

“Abbi said you’d be here,” Jeff says, looking amused to have caught Gibbs off guard.
Fornell and Kevin wait to see who this person who’s got Gibbs floored is.

“I can’t believe you came.”

“Eh…” Jeff waves that off. “If you can’t take a little drive, you don’t belong out here.”

“Nine hours?” It’s got to be at least that long from the Borin ranch to Missoula International, and even for Gibbs, who’s been known to tolerate a ‘little drive,’ that’s a long time in a car.

Jeff’s non-plussed. “Who’re your friends?”

That snaps Gibbs back to himself. “Tobias Fornell, Kevin Hussein, this is Jeff Borin, my father-in-law.”

That amuses Fornell to no end. He shakes Jeff’s hand, happily, and says, “Your daughter is one hell of a woman. You and her mother did a fine job with her.”

“She did a fine job with herself, we just helped.”

Fornell likes that answer, too.

Kevin’s eyeing Gibbs, not sure what to make of this. Gibbs isn’t wearing a wedding ring, and this isn’t the warmest reaction he’s ever seen. Nothing hostile, but…

Then Fornell says, “I wasn’t expecting to meet you until the wedding. Gibbs was saying that you guys are pretty tied down to the ranch, lots of livestock,” and that slips the pieces into place for Kevin.

“We took on some extra hands this year. Tax laws changed, and that freed up some extra cash. I’ve got time to take a few days and help out my family.” Jeff eyes the three of them. “Looks like you need it. Are you supposed to be blending in?”

Jeff’s in jeans, boots, a thick plaid flannel shirt, a wool-lined denim jacket, and behind him, in the chair he’d been sitting in as he waited, is a Stetson and a pair of sturdy leather gloves. Gibbs in his cargo pants, sneakers, t-shirt, Marine sweatshirt, and winter coat is the closest in look to Jeff. Though, that’s more based on attitude than fashion. Fornell’s somewhere in Jeff’s range, too. He’s got on jeans, loafers, a gray button down, a jacket, and his winter coat on top of it. Kevin’s dressed for work. He’s wearing a suit, and because his mental image of Montana is a hybrid of Alaska with cows, he’s also got a parka, winter snow boots, a scarf and wooly hat stuffed into his pockets, and his best cold weather skiing gloves.

“That’s a mascot, not a dog.”

Kevin, who’s rather taken with Jackson, and is seriously thinking that he might want one of these little guys as a pet, says, “Maybe he’ll keep me company.”

Jeff eyes Kevin. It’s clear on his face that he was thinking that Kevin might be the younger, more in-shape, active guy with the actual badge who goes along and makes sure the two old guys don’t pass out from altitude sickness and over-exertion. “You’re not going out?”

Kevin shakes his head. “No. I’m tech. I’ll keep eyes on the communications, figure out if you’re in the right place, see if they’re aware of you guys poking around, and if you spook them. If you do spook them, I’ll be the one to see what they do with that, if they send the information on. And, I’m also the only person here who actually works for the FBI, so if you get on the wrong side of the cops, it’s my job to make sure you get bailed out.”

Jeff thinks about that, and nods. “Always a good plan to have someone watching your back. Come on. Daylight’s fading fast, let’s get going.”

They cross one more border to get into the Flathead Indian Reservation.

They wait in Jeff’s truck while the border control officer, a bored-looking Native American, checks their drivers’ licenses against whatever’s in his database.

“Just making sure there are no warrants out for us,” Jeff says.

“That a problem out here?” Fornell asks.

“For about a week back in February when we really broke off. Technically, they’re still part of the USA, as much as any Reservation is, and we’re on our own, and for a little while we had people running in both directions trying to avoid the other side’s laws. Right now, everyone and their car gets checked going in and out, and that’s that. Same if you want to head out of the state in any other direction.”

Gibbs files that away. Trying to get Heidi Partridge out of the Flathead Reservation, if she’s in here, might prove interesting on several levels.

Jeff was right, daylight is fleeting. It’s not much past five, but the stars are out. It’s cold, but not inhaling gaseous ice that Gibbs ran into in January. This puts him in mind of deep winter back in DC. Not fun, but not horrific, either. The thermometer on Jeff’s truck says it’s just above freezing, but those numbers have been dropping fast as the sun set.

They’ve pulled into the parking lot of a mid-range hotel in a ridiculously picturesque little town on a snow covered lake. “Where are we looking for?” Jeff asks as he shoulders one of Kevin’s bags.

“Once we get into a room, I can pull it all up. If we’re where I think we are, we’re still a few hours off,” Kevin says, and then grabs his other bag.

“Could be, it’s a big reservation,” Jeff replies.

They get checked in, find their rooms, and in about half an hour Kevin does have his tech hub set.
He’s looking at his maps, and points to the far northwest corner of the reservation. “That’s where we’re getting the signal from.”

Fornell looks at the space between where they are and where Kevin’s pointing. “If the signal is way out there, why are we over here?” Polson is in the northeast corner of the Flathead Reservation. The signal they’re looking for is in the far northwest. “Why not,” he squints at the map, “Niarada?”

Jeff laughs at that. “Nothing but a motor cross track in Niarada. It’s about 25 people scattered over fifty square miles. There isn’t a town or anything, just a few roads and some houses. Robin, a friend of mine, she’s out there, and has horses, so we’re going there, but you’ll see, there’s no there, there.”

Kevin adds, “We’re here because we aren’t officially here, which means we couldn’t go and borrow a tricked out FBI van from South Dakota with its own wi-fi hot spot. Using the local wi-fi, this is the best of what was available. Both McGee and I thought it’d be really nice if you two weren’t out in the middle of nowhere and then suddenly my feed died because the local connection was wonky.”

Jeff points to where the target is, a tiny blob in the middle of nothing but trees. “But they’ve got a good signal.”

“They do. And I do, because I’m here. And tomorrow, when you get out there, we’ll be all set. You’ll piggyback off of their signal once you get close enough, and I’ve got this solid one here. And you won’t be going, ‘Kevin? Kevin? Can you hear me?’”

Jeff nods, and then glances around at the rest of them. “You hungry?”

They are, so with everything set on the tech side until tomorrow, it’s dinner time.

With a talent for tech, Kevin has spent most of his life in mixed-race groups. Even if the rest of his school was whiter than snow, the IT club would have several other brown faces in it. When he got to college, he lived in the computer science dorm, and half of his classmates were Asian. Working with the Feds, again, the rest of the building might look like a blizzard’s worth of snowflakes, but in the tech department skin tones ranged all over the map.

So, he’ll admit that he’s awfully shocked to walk into a restaurant in the Flathead Indian Reservation and be the only person of color in the place.

He’s getting some looks, though he thinks that’s more to do with his clothing than his skin color, but it does feel really odd to see no one darker than Fornell in here.

Jeff catches him looking around, really surprised, and watches to see what’s getting to him. “Not what you were expecting?”

Kevin shakes his head.

“Didn’t think you’d be the only Indian in an Indian Reservation?”

“I’m Pakistani, but… yeah, basically.”

“Back in 1855, the US government set up this land as an Indian Reservation. Then, in an effort to turn the Bitterroot Salish, Kootenai, and Pend D’Oreilles into dark-skinned white men, they gave each family a plot of land.” His lips curl. “They’re nomads, moving through the land, following the herds, but the Feds didn’t like that. They wanted ‘em to be farmers. So each one got a plot. But the plots only made up a third of the Reservation. So they divvied up the rest of the land, and gave it to anyone else who wanted to move out here. Not a lot of people did, but more than there were Natives. Then the Feds took the rest of the land. The Flatheads got to be a minority on their own reservation. They’ve been buying the land ever since, and own close to two-thirds of it, now, but especially in the more tourist-friendly areas, there aren’t that many Natives. Out here, they’re something like one out of six, and for the reservation as a whole, they’re one out of three.”

“Why didn’t they leave the US when you did?” Kevin can’t imagine why they didn’t tell the US government to bugger off when the rest of the state around them did, maybe toss all of the non-natives off the reservation. Though, as he thinks of how well that worked out for India and his own country, maybe they were smart enough not to try.

Jeff’s lip curls even further. “The US owes ‘em a huge pile of money. There’s a Federal trust that’s supposed to pay out to the Reservations. They were using it as a slush fund for whatever other crap they wanted to do. And they still claim to own a bunch of the land in the reservation. Said the Flatheads would have to pay maintenance fees for it if they tried to leave. That fee’s more than the tribes make in a year. Some of the younger ones are saying they should just tell the Feds to fuck off, close the borders, and claim the land. But among the old, memories run deep, and the tribal elders know what happened the last time they went up against the US Army. No one’s interested in doing that again. So, the lawyers fight it out.”

“Great,” Kevin says, voice flat.

Jethro, who’s been listening, but not saying, adds, “Penny says they’re offering statehood to the reservations.”

Jeff nods at that, as a waitress seats them. “Some of them. Further east. The ones in the Black Hills have gas and oil hiding under their land. Out here we’ve got trees. No one’s offering any pretty deals.” Jeff shakes his head. “That’s bleak.” He focuses on Jethro. “Tell me what my girl’s up to. We haven’t gotten a call since Sunday.”

Gibbs doesn’t blush, but there is a feeling of being under a microscope. “It’s her last week in Mobile. She saved the worst team for last. So far they’re tiptoeing around, doing a lot of looking over their shoulders, waiting for her to look the other way.”

“This the one with all the complaints?” Tobias asks. Jeff appears pleased that Gibbs’ best friend knows what’s going on with his daughter that well.

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. He’s a jackass. Even on his best behavior she can tell that.”

“Enough of one to get rid of him?” Tobias asks.

Gibbs shrugs. “And replace him with…” He turns from Fornell to Jeff. “She’s already short men, and this guy clears cases. He’s a jerk, and maybe more than a jerk, but he gets the job done. Everyone with a passing grade for the next three FLETC classes is already spoken for, and the CGIS is awfully low down on the list of plumb assignments. She’s trying to hire anyone with any experience in maritime law enforcement, but they’re also few and far between.”

“She went from too little budget and too many people to just enough budget and not enough men,” Jeff says.

“Exactly. She’s got money to hire, but no bodies to put in jobs. So, she’s sitting on this jerk and his partner, Mr. Jerk-lite, and trying to figure out what to do with them.”

“Split them up?” Kevin asks.

“That’s definitely going to happen.” Gibbs smiles. “That was the first thing she told me about these two. Jerk-lite is going somewhere else. Boston or New York. They’ve got top of the line management there, and a good leader could probably do something with Jerk-lite.” Gibbs smiles. “Says he reminds her a bit of Tim. He’s about twenty-five, got paired with the Jerk right out of FLETC, and desperately wants to make his partner like him, so he’s picking up all of his bad habits.”

“Jerk’s a different story,” Fornell says. “She afraid he’ll poison anything he touches?”

Gibbs nods. “That’s what she’s afraid of. What she’s trying to figure out.”

Fornell shakes his head, putting down his menu, “Have I ever told you how lucky we were to never get to management?”

Gibbs nods back, “Amen!”

“What’s after Mobile?” Jeff asks.

“New Orleans. That’ll get her to the middle of December, and then she’s home for a month. Mid-January she’ll get back to it with Portland. Then Seattle. Then Honolulu.”

“You’re going along for that one, right?” Fornell asks.

“Hoping to. At least a few weeks.”

“Will you take Jackson along on that?” Kevin asks. The little guy didn’t exactly love the trip to Montana, but he did okay. Honolulu is a full day on a plane, though.

Gibbs shakes his head. “He and Mona’ll spend some quality time with Tim’s family.”

Fornell chuckles at that, and then says to Jeff, “He ever tell you about Mona, or the first time Tim met her?”

Jeff, of course, has not heard this story, and looks amused as Fornell gets into the adventures of Mona and the extended family. Kevin, who has also not heard this story, and of course, works with McGee, listens, fascinated, getting a better idea of who that guy behind the desk is.

It may only be eight o’clock, but Gibbs is ready to turn in. His mental clock thinks it’s ten PM. Jeff’s getting ready to go to bed, too, because he’s on farm time, and that means sleep by nine because the day begins at four. Fornell and Kevin seem fine with an early bedtime, for the same reason Gibbs is. Their internal clocks are two hours off, too.

He’s in his room, on his own, appreciating that Tim doesn’t require they double up on rooms, sitting on his bed, and calling Abbi.

A few rings pass, and he wonders if she’s still working its… Nine, where she is, so later than ‘normal office hours’ not nearly as late as she’ll often work if she’s on her own. But on the next one he hears her voice.
“Hey,” she sounds happy to hear him, and a moment later, he’s got picture, too.

“Hello, back,” he says.

She’s smiling at him, and then says, “So, you find a surprise at the airport?”

He rolls his eyes at her a bit, and smiles. “Yeah, I did. Took me a second to recognize him, because I wasn’t expecting to see him.”

She laughs at that. “How’s he doing?”

“Just fine. Lucky for us, he’s got a buddy in Niarada, who we can rent some horses from, so we’re not stuck having to try and ride out from here.”

“Sounds like you and Fornell won’t have to be doing any middle of the winter camping.”

“For which both of our backs are thankful.”

She smiles at that, too.

“How are things on your end? The Jerk let the mask slip?”

“Nah. He’s still acting like the Lt’s right behind him, looking over his shoulder. I know he’s bitching about me as soon as I go to the restroom, but I haven’t caught it, yet.”

Gibbs offers her some quiet support. She appreciates it, and then says, “It’s probably a bad thing, but I’m hoping we run into some other asshole, so I can see him deal with someone difficult. So far this week everyone we’ve seen has just rolled over in front of him. I don’t need to watch him deal with someone who’s cooperating. I need to see him deal with someone who’s difficult.”

“You can be difficult.”

“Yeah, and if no one obliges me by doing it for me, I may end up having to be the person who does it, but…”

“But you’d rather watch him do it than dish it out.”

“Yeah, the rest of the station isn’t exactly loving me hovering around, and everything’ll run smoother if I’m just around to see what’s up, not there gunning for one of their own.”

Gibbs more than knows how that works. “Then I hope you guys find your asshole.”

She laughs at that. “Talk about an odd place to be.”

“Amen.”

“Tell me about tomorrow…”

So Gibbs does.

With Jeff along to help, “blending” works a lot better than expected.
Fornell’s looking at the cowboy boots, and says, “McGee’s expensing this, right?”

Apparently there are cowboy boots, and cowboy boots, and the things that Jeff is making them buy so they don’t look like a pile of dudes from back east are designed to last a lifetime and a half of hard, physical labor. These are not pretty, hand-tooled, leather that comes from cows who have never spent a day in the rain.

These are boots, for the kind of guy who may find himself ankle deep in horse shit, and wants to keep his feet dry and clean, and his footing stable.

Gibbs appreciates the quality and workmanship, but… Yeah… He’s also glad the FBI’s footing the bill. He half-wanted to blush when he saw what they cost. Especially since he doesn’t expect to need to wear them again.

But, by the time they’re done, Gibbs and Fornell, in their jeans, boots, flannel, hats, and jackets look like the kind of guys who belong on a few horses out in the west.

Jackson doesn’t blend. Jeff’s staring at him, shaking his head. “You really want to bring him along?”

Gibbs nods. “He hears better than we do, smells better, too. If something’s out there, he’ll sense it before we do.”

“From the top of a horse?”

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. His job is to be alert, and let his person know when there’s something he needs to be paying attention to.”

“Oh, but he’s in training,” Jeff points out.

“He’ll be fine. This isn’t the first probie I’ve taken out.”

Jeff just sighs, and then pats his rifle. “I don’t have to ask, do I?”

Both Gibbs and Fornell shake their heads. Then Fornell adds, “He’s the sharpshooter. I can hit it if I can see it with a naked eye. Give him a pad of paper, a scope, and enough time, and… What’s your record?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Almost forty years ago. I’m probably good for 2500 feet now.”

Kevin’s eyes go wide. “That’s almost a kilometer.”

“Should have seen me back when I was active duty.”

Gibbs is holding Jackson, and his expression seems to be saying, “See, he’s coming in handy already.”

Fornell pats his own gun, which is on his hip, but covered by his jacket. “Open carry out here, right?”

“Yeah. You don’t even need a license anymore. Especially as far out as we’re going… This is grizzly territory. They should be asleep by now, but no sane man goes out without something to get him out of a tight situation.”
Fornell nods at that. “That’s good.”

Kevin adds, “Okay, let’s get you wired up and ready to go.” He points to his collection of equipment. “Jeff, I was only expecting two guys, so I’ve only got two earwigs, do you mind…”

“I’m fine with only one voice in my head.”

“Okay.” He hands the earwigs over to Gibbs and Fornell who know how this works. “The microphone on these is sensitive enough that I’ll be able to hear whatever it is you say.” Kevin points to the door connecting his room to Fornell’s. He and Gibbs head off, and Jeff watches as he tests the equipment. “You guys hear me?”

“Just fine,” comes out of the receiver, in Fornell’s voice.

“Great. Gibbs.”

“I’ve got you.”

“Okay, come back in. There’s only one downside on this, you can’t wear a knit cap or earwarmers, or all I’ll be hearing is the sound of cloth moving around over the mic.”

“Lovely,” Fornell says dryly. “I didn’t need ears.”

Gibbs waves that off. “Tony gets on fine without the top of his right ear.”

“He’s missing part of his ear?”

“That’s why he’s wearing his hair longer the last few years.”

“Completely missed that. What happened?”

“Deep freeze.”

Fornell winces, he knows that story. Usually, when a case goes bad, he ends up at Gibbs’ place. That was one of the few times Gibbs ended up at his place.

Kevin decides he doesn’t need to know that story and adds. “It’s supposed to be above thirty all day today. I think you’ll come back with your ears attached.”

Stepping out to Jeff’s truck, it may be over thirty, but it’s not over by much. Between the chill and the thin air, this is Gibbs’ idea of winter.

Polson’s a town a pretty streets, small homes and businesses, a long expanse of iced over lake, with snow topped mountains on the horizon. It might as well be a post card for how pretty it is.

In town, there are buildings, and a general sense of people around, but once they’ve crossed the long bridge over the lake, and drive for a few more miles, they’re out of town and…

Fornell’s staring out of the windows of the truck, eyes wide. “I’ve never seen the sky so wide.” There are long wide hills, and longer, wider plains between them, and a billion square miles of land and sky.

Gibbs is nodding along, he knows how Fornell feels.
You’re gonna feel like you’re in a fish bowl when you get to DC,” Fornell says to Jeff.

Jeff inclines his head. “Part of why we left Seattle. Got out here to visit, looked around, and everything else felt tiny and cramped after. Even the Space Needle doesn’t feel like much of a view once you’ve been out here.”

Fornell and Gibbs look around, neither of them have been to the Space Needle, but they’ve both been on an aircraft carrier, and short of that, this is the widest view either of them have ever seen.

They drive across hilly grasslands, frosted white with a thin glaze of snow, brown grass poking through, mountains on the horizon. The thing Fornell isn’t noticing is trees. Yeah, there’s a gray-green line on one of the hills, and those might be trees, but everywhere else is prairie.

“They could be totally blind and see us from a hundred miles off,” Fornell says, watching the land. He glances to Gibbs and Jeff. “We damn well better ‘blend.’”

Jeff’s eyes scan the road and land. “Give it a bit. There’ll be more trees where we’re going.” He thinks Fornell has a good point, though. “Do we have a plan other than mosey around?”

Gibbs nods. “Mosey around, get near the place, see if we can find somewhere with line of sight to their windows, break out the binoculars, and settle in. Kevin’ll tell us what rooms they’re in, and we’ll keep moving around so we can see them.”

“And if they’re not in a place with handy windows...” Jeff asks. “Some guys don’t bother with windows, especially if they’re building on the cheap.”

“Mosey even closer, crowd the front door, and be lost assholes looking for a bathroom and some help getting home,” Gibbs says.

“It’s a small place,” Fornell adds. They’d seen the satellite shot of it, and it does look like a tiny square in the middle of nowhere. “Can’t be too many places to hide someone.”

“And if they’ve got her stashed in a basement, they’ll have to have something we can see to get a hint of that.” Gibbs knows construction, and he knows what to look for to see if this cabin has a basement someone could be stashed in.

“Like Kevin saying that there should be an extra person in the room we’re in,” Fornell adds. “He’s got heat sensors, so if one of us is saying something like, ‘So, is it just you two on your own out here?’ he knows we can’t see the third person, and can tell us that we’re just about on top of her.”

“And if she’s there?” Jeff says.

“Depends on how she’s there. Tied up to a computer, we shoot the bastards and get her out. Shackin’ up out in the middle of nowhere, we mosey on out, Kevin keeps track of them, makes sure they don’t run off, and Tim sends in guys with actual badges to go swoop ‘em up,” Fornell replies.

Jeff nods. “I can mosey with the best of ‘em.”

Gibbs smiles, and Fornell says, “Great.”
“Hey, Robin,” Jeff says a minute after stepping out of his truck.

Gibbs has seen some out of the way places in his life, like, for example, where Jeff and Becky live, but this blows them out of the water.

Robin Husted runs a… Gibbs honestly isn’t sure what exactly this is. Apparently, Niarada’s got one thing in it, a motor cross track. She’s a few miles away from that, but seems to do a little mechanical work, there’s a bay for taking care of bikes, some bits of farming. There’s a barn, a few cows, and some horses. She’s got a tidy one-story house, which she rents rooms in for people who want to use the track, and not make the trip all the way to Polson and back.

So, maybe he’d call this place a… ranch? But that’d be a big question mark at the end of it.

“Jeff.” Robin’s a quiet woman, looks like she may not say ten words a day if left to her own devices. Fornell’s looking around at all of this space, and if she lives alone, he can see why she’d never say anything, there’s no one to talk to.

Not for miles.

A child… boy… maybe. It’s got long hair and broad features, and bundled up for the winter, Fornell can’t tell if it’s a girl or boy, pokes it’s head out of the barn.

“They here for the horses?” s/he yells across the yard.

Robin nods. Her eyes skate past Gibbs and Jeff, land on Fornell, and she asks, “You ever ride before?”

“Million years ago.”

“Any good?”

“I know which side of the horse I’m supposed to be facing, and how to put my foot in the stirrup to make sure that happens.”

She nods again, and yells out, “Make sure to saddle up Lucy.” Then she returns her attention to Fornell. “She’s a sweet girl with an easy gait. Won’t challenge you, or try to rattle your teeth out.”

Fornell appreciates that. “Thank you.”

She may be a sweet girl, but she’s still a horse, still awfully tall, and yes, he does know which foot to put in the stirrup, and he’s got the basic idea of lofting himself up, but it’s not exactly anything he regularly does. He’s got no muscle memory for it.

Meanwhile, Jeff more or less sprung onto his horse, and Gibbs hopped up with way less effort than someone with his knees should ever have to use. Hell, Jackson, who, granted, Gibbs just put him up on his horse’s saddle, got settled with less effort than Fornell’s expending.

So, they’re up and ready to go, waiting for Fornell to get on the horse.
He glares at Gibbs, half hopping as Lucy steps to the side. “One of these days, I’m going to make you do something with a tank. Make you look like the out-of-place-dude.”

Jeff sniggers at that, as he watches Fornell take a few more half-hops before getting himself into the saddle.

Once they’re saddled up, Gibbs calls Kevin, and he makes sure their electronics are live. From here on out, he’s ‘driving’ so to speak, because he’s the one with the satellite view of where they are, and where they need to get.

“How far to go?” Gibbs asks, breath frosting between words.

They hear Kevin’s voice. “According to the GPS you’re eight miles from the house.”

“What direction,” Fornell asks, a little exasperated. It’s clear that this is Kevin’s first time as support for a team.

“Direction, right! West, right now. You’ll catch a road and go north in a bit, but for now, head west.”

“Everyone in place?” Gibbs asks.

“McGee got me a good view of the place on the satellite feed. Infrared tells me that there’s three people and two… I’m going to guess they’re dogs. Right now, they’re all inside.”

Gibbs relays that to Jeff, who asks, “If you can see that from the sky, why are we doing this?”

Kevin answers and Gibbs repeats, “Because we don’t know who those people are. That building doesn’t technically exist. There’s no owner of record. If they’re a bunch of Flatheads running their own tech empire from the middle of nowhere, we’ve got no quarrel with them. If one of them is Heidi Partridge, we’ve got to start getting the paperwork up to get her out of there.”

They’re quiet as they clop through the snow crusted grass. On the horizon those trees that Jeff said would be closing in, are indeed, closing in. That cabin’s in a forest, but for right now, they’re still on snow covered grass.

“Diane coming to the wedding?” Fornell asks.

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. Tim’s still got that accountant in town. She’s bringing him.”

“Chaffin.”

Gibbs nods.

“Emily likes him. She liked Draga better, but this guy looks solid.”

Speaking of Emily. Gibbs got the RSVP card yesterday. “Emily’s bringing a date, too.”

Tobias sighs. “Yeah. New guy. She met him at a Halloween party. Told us about him last week.”

Gibbs smirks. “This one any good?”
“I won’t find out until the day before your wedding. He’s going home to his family for Christmas, and then coming to mine for New Year’s.”

“She like him?”

“Fluttery eyelids and lots of sighs. I’d diagnose head over heels in love.”

Gibbs sniggers at that. “You want to bring him along for some ‘male bonding’ and we’re game.”

Fornell can just imagine ‘male bonding’ with this crew. “Make sure we bring Ed, too.”

Gibbs has a wide smirk on his face, and explains to Jeff who Ed is. By the end of the story of Ed and Emily’s jerk of an ex, Jeff’s in favor of him being invited to ‘male bonding,’ too.

“You guys see a road in front of you? About a hundred feet ahead?” Kevin’s voice cuts into their conversation.

Fornell, Gibbs, and Jeff scan the snow before them. Finally Jeff point out a spot where the snow is slightly lower than the snow around it.

“Yeah. No one’s used it since it snowed last. No fresh tracks.”

They hear Kevin typing. “Four days ago. Follow that north for three miles, and you’ll hit the edge of the property line.”

And with that the ‘three guys and a dog out for a ride’ mosey over in that direction, and keep going.

Jeff was right, the trees do get denser. It’s not exactly Gibbs’ idea of forest, but there are enough of them to provide some cover and keep them from being visible from Mars.

“They still in the house?” Fornell asks.

“Three heat signatures in there. The dogs are outside.”

Gibbs passes that along, stopping his ride.

“Shit.” Jeff says. “So much for them not knowing we’re near.”

Gibbs curses quietly under his breath. The dogs will know if they get close enough to look into the place with their binoculars. They’ll likely start barking up a storm. So much for plan A. “Let’s go be tourists.”

And they do. If Gibbs had to guess by the cacophony of barking that started when they got within visual range of the house, there are way more than two dogs there, so he’s not sure if only two of them were big enough to show up on the heat sensors, or if these are just really loud and aggressive doggies.
Before they’re within fifty feet of the house, the dogs are out, and it is only two of them. They’re big, shaggy things, large enough to give anything smaller than a bear pause about getting too close to the house. Gibbs isn’t sure what they are, other than he doesn’t want to mess with them.

Fornell yells out, over the dogs, “Hello!” He’s playing up his accent, sounding like a thousand generations of the Bronx, all condensed into one person.

The dogs keep barking, and the horses aren’t having a great time with that. They’re nervous, but for right now, the dogs are staying a good fifteen feet away, so the horses haven’t bolted, yet.

Jackson’s yipping back at the bigger dogs, back up, teeth bare. He’s defending his humans, and it doesn’t matter that he’s about half a meal for one of those big guys, no one barks at his people the way the dogs on the ground are.

Gibbs makes sure he’s got a good hold on him. Patty’s been pleased with his puppy socialization techniques. Jackson’s pretty much fearless, quiet, and gets along everywhere with almost everyone. That said, he doesn’t want to have to explain how he lost him because he took him on a case to Montana and got him eaten by something that looks like a cross between a wolf and a St. Bernard.

Eventually, they see the door open, and a man walks out. They’re too far away for great details, but they can see he’s native, bundled up, and younger than anyone in their party.

“Hush up, you two!” he yells to the dogs. They hush, but don’t retreat, and their owner is watching Gibbs, Fornell, and Jeff warily. “Hello back.”

Fornell holds up his phone. “Damn thing’s got no reception out here, and we’re lost. You mind if we stop in for a moment and make a call.”

The man eyes them, and then nods. “Sure. Come on in. Warm up, make your call.”

“Thanks.”

They dismount, and tie the horses up at the front porch, and then head inside. There are three people, and a very spiffy collection of computers, but Heidi Partridge, unless she underwent not only a sex change operation, comprehensive facial reconstruction, but also got herself a new race, isn’t in that cottage.

“You guys are life savers,” Fornell says.

“We know we’ve got to be heading east, but east covers a lot of ground out here,” Jeff adds.

And Gibbs, holding Jackson, with his fingers still in his gloves adds, “And if our wives don’t hear from us soon, we’re dead.”

Fornell nods, vigorously, at that.

The first man takes his own cell, unlocks it, and hands it to Tobias. He calls Wendy.

Jeff pulls his map out, and spreads it out on an empty kitchen table. Then he points out his friend’s place in Niara’a. “We’re trying to get there. We know we’re somewhere around here.” He circles his finger in their general area. “If you can give us some help…”

The first man nods. “Yeah. Okay.” He eyes the map. “Yeah. Right now, you’re here.” He points out where they are on the map, and then gets a pen. “It’ll be hard to see in the snow, but you’re looking for this.” This is a tiny one lane dirt track. It’s on the map, barely. “Keep following that east, and then you’ll get to” he points out another road on the map, and this one is an actual street. Gibbs doesn’t think it’s paved, but it’s probably gravel, and likely more than ten feet wide. “And that’ll take you back to Niarada.”

While they’re talking, they hear Fornell saying, “Yeah hon... We’re going to be a bit late… You know Jethro, he took the gerbil with him, the damn thing went running off, and by the time we caught it, we’d gotten turned around… Uh huh… Yeah, I know. Teach me to trust the compass on my phone in the middle of a dead zone. Yeah… I’ll tell you all about it when we get back…” He glances to their host.

“Three hours?” Their host says, looking at the map.

“About three hours. Thanks. Love you, too. Bye.” Then Fornell turns to their host, handing the phone back. “And thank you. These two do stuff like this all the time. I don’t. She’s nervous about me out in the woods, afraid I’m gonna get eaten by a bear.”

Gibbs smirks at that. “We haven’t gotten you killed, yet. You’d think Wendy’d know that by now.”

“Yeah, well, she knows you two. She’s got reason to be worried.”

Jeff just shakes his head, laughs, and tucks the map back into his jacket. “Thanks again.”

And with that, they leave.

Gibbs waits until they’re well past the line of sight of the cabin before saying to Kevin, “You get all of that?”

“Yeah. And I’m watching them now. If you spooked them, I can’t see it. They’re all in same room you were, sitting around doing whatever it is. They aren’t even on the computers right now.”

“Great. Total bust.”

Kevin sighs. “We knew it was a long shot.”

“So, what’re they doing there that’s got you guys wondering about them?” Jeff asks.

Kevin starts an extremely technical and complicated explanation of what they were doing. Gibbs sees the three of them glance at each other, and Kevin could be speaking Latin backwards for all they’re understanding him. After another minute Gibbs says, “We’re good, Kev.”

“Ah. Back tonight?”

“Yeah. Late. Don’t wait up. We’ll see you for breakfast,” Fornell replies. They’re at least four hours from their hotel now.

“Okay. See you at breakfast.” Then they hear the connection go dead.
A few steps later Jeff says, “That lady’s dead, isn’t she?”

Gibbs nods, and Fornell says, “Probably. Someone decided she was too dangerous to live, so she, and everything she touched, is gone.”

“What’d she do?” Jeff asks.

“According to Penny, found a way to buy and sell stuff where no one knows who the buyer or seller is and no one can find out,” Gibbs replies.

Jeff can’t believe that. “And that’s too dangerous to live?”

“If you don’t know who buys and who sells, you can’t tax those sales, and you can’t trace income and…”

That’s when Jeff gets it. “Half the country fucks off. California, their biggest cash cow, and Texas, number three, also leave, and someone suddenly decides that people who can fuck the tax system gotta vanish.”

“That’s what it sounds like,” Fornell replies. “Though Penny’s thinking it might not be someone inside the US. Lady like that… she’s trouble for any government.”

“Then why look?” Jeff can see he’s not asking that right. “For her, alive. Instead of just hunting down who vanished her.”

“She’s worth her weight in gold to any of the drug cartels, or anyone else who wants to move product silently,” Fornell says. “Worth breaking out of prison, and keeping alive.”

“So, the good guys might have offed her, and the bad guys might have kidnapped her?” Jeff says.

Gibbs nods. “Or she might have decided to take advantage of the chaos and got herself out of prison.”

Jeff winces.

“Welcome to our world,” Fornell replies.

It’s hours later, and Gibbs is in his hotel room, fresh out of the shower, finally feeling warm again, and about to give Abbi a call when there’s a knock at his door.

“Give me a minute.” Calling Abbi doesn’t require that he put on things like pants. Opening the door to anyone but Fornell, does.

“I didn’t wake you?” Jeff asks, stepping into Gibbs’ room.

Gibbs shakes his head. Jeff had turned in early, right after they got some supper into him. He’s still on working at the farm time, which means a nine o’clock bedtime to go with his four AM wake up.

Jackson, who is looking up from his pillow on the floor, yawning, debating getting up to say hi or going back to sleep gets a nod from Jethro. “Just him. I was about to give Abbi a call.”

Jeff nods. He holds out a cup of coffee, and Gibbs takes it, sipping, and nods in approval. It’s good coffee, and there’s good whiskey in it, too.
He sits down on his bed, and gestures to let Jeff know to make himself comfortable. Jeff does, taking off his boots, stretching out on the one chair in the room, putting his feet on Gibbs’ bed. He sips his drink for several quiet moments, and Gibbs doesn’t push him. Obviously, if he’s still up, and in here, looking to talk, something’s on his mind.

Finally he says, “What happens now, with the case?”

Gibbs sighs, and takes a deep drink of his coffee. “I don’t know. Tim’ll keep his people looking for her. He’ll do that until they find a body, but as more time goes by, they’ll search less and less.”

Jeff nods. “And you just let it go?”

Gibbs half-smiles. “You gotta. Rule number eleven. I sucked at it for years. Used to tell it to my kids, but at the end of the day, I couldn’t let ‘em go. Not unless we’d solved ‘em, so I’d work us until we dropped or we solved them. That’s one of the biggest changes between now and then. I know now when I’ve done all I can do, and on this one, I’ve shot my bolt.”

“Feels like there should be more.”

Gibbs nods. “There is. Kevin’s not done. Tim’s got another hot shot computer guy, and he’ll keep looking, but…” he shakes his head, “I’m done. If they get another lead like this, they can dust me off and take me out of retirement, and I’ll go hunting, but I can’t do what Kevin can, so I can’t help with this case, not tomorrow, at least.”

Jeff nods at that, too. He’s looking into his coffee, thinking hard. “This’ll eat you if you let it.”

“It will. The trick is not letting it.”

“So, you just… call Abbi, chat, and go to sleep tonight?”

“Yeah. Get up in the morning, go home, go see her in Mobile. Family time on the weekend. You’ve just got to let them go. And that’s the hardest part of this job. It’s why you need an anchor outside of it. If you don’t have that, it’ll eat you, and one day you look up and you’ve got nothing but the job and then… You die on it, or you get old and they boot you out, and if you’ve still got nothing but it, you die. That happened to a lot of the men I knew when they were forced to retire. All died within a year. Just, didn’t have anything to keep them going.”

“And that’s not going to be you.”

“That is not going to be me.” Gibbs thinks and realizes, “Can’t be me. A year was last January.”

Jeff inclines his head, and expression that seems to say, fair enough. “You don’t think she’s out there, somewhere, though.”

“That does make it easier to shut down. My gut isn’t fired up about this. She went missing from a Federal Prison. Her, the evidence they used against her, her lawyer, her prosecutor, everyone who touched her case is dead or missing. Whatever happened to her is done by now, and all we’re doing is cleaning up the mess.”

“And that’s harder to get excited about.”

“Exactly.”

“You think we did it, or a cartel?”
Gibbs sips his drink. He thinks about it, tries to feel it, and doesn’t come up with much of anything. “Two years ago, I’d have been sure it was a cartel. They busted her for running a market that people sold drugs on.”

Jeff seems to get that. “But now…”

Gibbs shakes his head. “You ever see the Wizard of Oz?”

“Yeah.”

“Curtain’s gone now. I was never so innocent…” Though as he thinks about that, there was a time he was that innocent. “Since I’ve been a cop… I was never so innocent as to believe that we didn’t have more than enough problems on our side of it. I knew that. Saw that all over. My first partner left when we just let the USS Cole bombing happen. I literally watched our government let our people get killed because it was ‘better for the big picture.’ I knew there were bad apples all over the place, but… I didn’t know how bad.

“I do now. And I can’t lay odds on who’s behind what happened to Heidi Partridge. When I was a cop, we’d get cases, and there are two kinds of really difficult cases, the one where there are no suspects, and the ones where there are too many.”

“Too many suspects on this one.”

“Right. We know it was done right. Done from the inside. Done when everything went insane. And that rules out no one.”

“What would happen when you had too many suspects?”

“We’d narrow them down. Weed ‘em out. I’d sit across from them, stare at them, read their faces and bodies, and… And it doesn’t matter because none of that will work for this case. If we took her out, where would I start, head of the IRS? Would he even know? The guy who was head when we think she vanished died in the chaos last year. His second in command is dead, too. The next guy down, he’s already in a holding cell.

“We got custody of her because she was in the US. But the EU wanted her, too. Her market was letting their guys skirt their laws just as easily as the people here were. I don’t think I ever had a case with this many suspects, let alone all of them invisible, faceless… ideas…”

“What about the lawyer and prosecutor?”

“Tim’s got people on those cases. Hopefully there’s a lead somewhere out there. No one ever commits the perfect crime.”

“But this is looking pretty close.”

Gibbs doesn’t want to, but he nods. “If that computer hot shot of his hadn’t wanted to see if they could get this lady working for them, no one would have ever noticed she was gone.”

Jeff has a hard time believing that. “No one. No family?”

“Not married. No kids. Parents are dead. She’d already been in jail for a few years, that’ll cut off all but the deepest outside relationships. No one reported her missing. I know Tim’s people would have checked, made sure that everyone who might have been in contact with her got checked. Nothing.”

Jeff shakes his head, staring at the wall behind Gibbs.
Gibbs sips his drink, and then says, “When you’re in training they tell you you can’t solve them all. No one can. They don’t tell you you shouldn’t try, though.” He half smiles a bit, and runs his fingers through his now completely white hair. He tugs at it, a little. “If this gave me anything, it’s this: I know what cases I shouldn’t try on, now. I was a damn good cop, and give me a badge and a pile of murders and I’ll be a damn good cop again, but this isn’t a murder. Not really. I could solve kidnappings all day long, but this isn’t a kidnapping. This isn’t crime. This is politics, and everyone who’s ever met me knows that I’m not a politician.”

“And you’re not management, either.”

“Nope. I run teams. I train people. I was a gunny sergeant, and a good one. If that bomb hadn’t gotten me, I’d have retired a master sergeant, and been a good one of them, too. But…” He’s got some sort of idea of what he’s trying to put into words, but he’s having a hard time pulling it together. Part of Gibbs just wants to stop talking, let it lie. The problem is, Jeff likely doesn’t have years to watch him in action, learn who he is by being with him. Which means he’s got to talk. So he tries. “You watch Tony, and he can’t stand a mystery. He’s got to know what’s going on. I don’t. I can let people have their secrets and then some. No problem. He’s an investigator. He’s all about peeling away the mysteries.”

“And that’s not you, either.”

“No. That’s why we worked well together. I needed justice. He needed the pieces all in place. Together… and then add in Kate, and Ziva, and Tim… and we could solve pretty much any crime that came our way.”

“And who are you now?”

Gibbs sips his coffee again. “I told one of my friends once, that all I ever wanted to be was a good Marine, a good husband, and a good father. I was a good Marine. And now I’m busy being a good husband and a good father, and occasionally, my kids still need the good cop to help out, so I’m that, too. But mostly, I’m Dad and Pop.”

Jeff looks pleased with that, slowly gets up, and heads back to his room.

Tim gets the update early the next morning, and he can’t say he wasn’t expecting it. He passes word back to Khan, along with a ‘Keep looking,’ note.

And from there, it’s back to the grind.

Jimmy almost trips over the box when he gets home. It’s one of those cardboard boxes that reams of paper come in, lying on the floor, next to all of the shoes, in his mudroom.

There’s no scribbles on it, or bright construction paper glued to it, so he’s assuming it’s not part of an art project of Molly or Kelly’s. He nudges it with his toe as he’s hanging up his jacket, and it’s solid. It may not be full, but whatever’s in there is heavy.

He pulls the lid off, and sees a neatly typed manuscript, and smiles. Suddenly, this box being here makes a whole lot more sense. The mudroom has a door on it. When they come home to Jimmy and Breena’s everyone comes in, leaves their shoes and coats in here, and then goes into the rest of the house. The kids are basically never in here, which is the one thing you can’t say about the rest of the house.

So, if you happened to have, say, the only copy of a manuscript, and if you were crazy enough to bring it into Jimmy’s house, this is the room you’d want it in.

He does, however, heft it up, and stick it on top of the washing machine. Just because little people pretty much never come in here doesn’t mean they may not decide that today’s the day to do it.

He heads into the kitchen, and sees Tim working on dinner, as Breena’s coralling kids.

“I see we’ve got some reading tonight,” he says, kissing both of them, and each of the kiddos.

“Read at your own risk,” Tim replies. “Usually, I finish them, let them hibernate for a month, rewrite, and then someone gets to lay eyes on them.” He glances away from cutting up chicken breasts into tiny pieces for Molly, Kelly, and Anna. “ Aren’t you one short?”

“Yes. We were almost out the door when Abby got the call. Tony and Johnson found the crime scene. Johnson’s already bringing the first box of goodies in, and they’re just going to keep coming all night long.”

Breena and Tim take that in stride. These days there are fewer late nights/all nighters, but fewer isn’t the same as none.

Kelly’s paying more attention than they expected, and she says, (and signs) “No mama?”

“Not tonight, sweetie,” Jimmy replies (and also signing, at least as many of the words as he knows). “But just like always, we’ll Skype her right before bedtime so you can get your kisses.”

She nods at that, going back to paying attention to getting ready for dinner.

“I already read some of it,” Breena adds, getting back to the manuscript.

Tim shakes his head. Abby sent Breena some of the bits he had written when he was healing up. They're hot, but... that's about all they've got going for them. “And I can’t believe you’re still here after seeing that.”

“Tim…”
He shakes his head. “They’re rough drafts for a reason. The only thing you’re doing is getting it down before the ideas run away.”

“So, you saying you’d rather we just let it sit?” Jimmy asks.

“Oh… yeah. But if you’re dying to see what’s in there, I’m not going to stop you.”

Jimmy and Breena share a grin. They want to see what’s in there. “Story time while Donnie gets his dinner?” Jimmy asks.

“Oh yeah!” Breena’s looking excited.

Tim shakes his head again, rolls his eyes a bit, and then brings two plates to the table.

---

Bedtime. Almost. Abby’s still slogging through prints, blood samples, and other bits of evidence from the scene, though her last text says she should be wrapping up within the hour. Tim knows he’s intending to stay up late enough to at least say hello to her. So, he’s in bed, with his laptop, going over a report one of his tech guys just sent him about trying to get his reporting software running.

Breena’s on the other side of the bed. She’s got easy getting in and out access because little guy is currently snuggled up against her chest, slopping down what will, with any luck, be his last meal for this particular twenty-four hour stretch. He’s just about seven weeks old now, and apparently growth spurting with a vengeance, and for the last day and a half, he’s eating every two hours. Which hasn’t done much to help anyone stay nice and well-rested.

Jimmy’s in the middle, stack of papers on his lap, reading out loud, having a fairly good time of it. Tim’s not nearly as bad at this first draft thing as he thinks he is. (Though he only had to read one of the typos twice before he got a very irritated jab from Tim and instructions to read the words that are supposed to be there, not the ones he typed.)

They’re starting off with a fight scene, and it’s going pretty well, it’s mostly him and Tim, or Daegan and Gabe, and they’re swooping around trying to fly their way through a wall of flack (he makes a mental note to ask why they don’t just go over it) daring death, telling it to fuck off, kicking (burning?) ass, and taking name.

Jimmy looks up from what he’s reading. He’s getting to see himself. He likes it, both of them have taken about 30,000 levels of badass, which appeals to him, but something’s niggling at him.

Daegan M’Gy, second-in-command of the Night Furies (he makes a mental note to suggest that term might be a tad copyrighted), Gabe’s right hand man, sometimes lover, best friend, all of it, and…

Black skin. Like really black. Jet black. Jimmy thinks about that. It’ll look cool. Breena seems to appreciate the image of him like that. (Brynne doesn’t show up for a few hundred pages, so they aren’t going to get to her tonight. She and Tim are talking about what she looks like as Jimmy’s thinking.) And then the niggly thing hits him. Tim made him a black dragon, with green eyes, the second in command of the Night Furies.

His own personal bitch face pops up as he rolls over and whacks Tim in the chest.
“What the hell, Jimmy?” Tim sputters, totally shocked. One moment he’d been lying in bed, naked save for his glasses, talking with Breena about how to design dragons, and the next his chest is lightly stinging.

“ Toothless! You made me Toothless.”

“What?” Toothless means literally nothing to Tim. Breena bursts out in hysterical laughter, and Donnie stops sucking long enough to make a really disconcerted sound.

“How To Train Your Dragon, Tim! The dreaded Night Fury dragon, made of nighttime and death, black skin, green eyes, comes out of the North and destroys everything.” The M’Gys are the rulers of the “North.” “You made me into a cute, little, cuddly dragon and Disney’s going to sue you for it.”

Breena’s wiping tears from her eyes at this. “Oh, Tim!”

Tim’s eyes narrow. “Shit.” He rolls them. “Okay, put the note in the margin. I told you, rough.”

“George RR Martin is going to get you for the “North” thing, too,” Jimmy adds, as Breena hands him a pen so he can write on the manuscript.

“So, Tim’s got a new manuscript done, Dr. Palmer?” Allan’s saying as he and Jimmy get started on this morning’s autopsy.

“Oh, yeah.”

“Any new insights into how he sees you guys?”

“I’m a dragon now. Granted, I’m fucking Toothless…” Jimmy wipes the back of his forearm across his forehead. He doesn’t feel uncomfortably hot, but he’s sweating. He’s got to check and see if the climate control is working properly.

Allan looks taken aback at this. Then he says, “Well, I suppose that’s better than a corpse.”

Jimmy stares at Allan, confused, not immediately connecting that to the original Pimmy Jalmer, then he does, starts to laugh, hard, and a second later he’s on the floor, ass smarting, and bleeding from a small cut on his hand where the scalpel got him.

Allan rushes over. “Dr. Palmer?”

At first, Jimmy’s about to reach out, and ask for a hand up, and then it hits him, he’s got a headache, his knees feel week, the room is spinning, he’s in a cold sweat, and he’s just collapsed. Right now he needs sugar, and his blood testing equipment, fast.

“Coke.”

Allan nods and sprints toward the fridge. He knows why Jimmy keeps a can of Coke in there, and why he’s never seen Jimmy drink one, before. He’s back less than a second later, with the Coke, kneeling in front of Jimmy, popping the tab for him.
Jimmy takes it, feeling shaky all over, head throbbing worse by the second, which means his blood sugar is in freefall. Two fast gulps are followed by Allan getting up and rushing over to Jimmy’s go bag, rifling through it, looking for his testing lancet and strips. He grabs the glucose tabs that Jimmy keeps in there, too.

Again, he’s back in a matter of heartbeats, offering the sharp, but Jimmy shakes his head, and extends his forearm, right now (though the additional sugar is starting to help) he’s feeling too shaky to do a good job of it.

Allan nods, rolls back his glove and sleeve, pricks his skin, and siphons a microliter into the test strip, fitting it into Jimmy’s tester.

Another minute passes, as Jimmy sips more of the Coke, and the throbbing in his head starts to subside. Half the can. Drink half the can, let fifteen minutes go by, test again. Add more sugar as necessary. He knows what to do, but he doesn’t usually have to do it.

Allan’s looking alarmed as the tester gives its results.

“How bad?”

“Fifty-two.” Allan’s already getting up and heading to Jimmy’s go bag, getting him a protein bar.

“Did you forget to eat this morning?”

“I don’t think so.” He can remember doing it, but… It must have been yesterday. He knows he took his insulin. First thing, wake up, test, snack, apply insulin, workout, shower, eat breakfast. That’s his routine. He’s got to do that, or he ends up with too much insulin and not enough sugar, ass on the floor with a throbbing head and a bleeding hand. “Shit.” He rubs his eyes, and feels the shakes begin to subside, some. He sips the Coke slowly. He’ll test again in a few minutes, but if this is anything like the last few times his blood sugar has dropped into freefall, he should be on the upswing by then.

“Even with two extra people, new babies are rough on your sleep. Just need to keep better track of my blood sugar the next few days.”

“You want me to get Abby to take you home?” Allan says, handing him the protein bar.

Jimmy waves that idea off, though he does take the bar, because real food to go along with sugar is important. “How about you get me gauze and tape for the cut, new gloves, and a few minutes to get my head together. Then we’ll start again.”

“Are you sure, Dr. Palmer?” Allan’s worried about him. He knows Jimmy has diabetes, but this is the first time he’s really seeing it.

Allan switches out of work mode and into personal mode. “When was the last time you saw your Endo, Jimmy?”

“I see her every six months. Just like I’m supposed to.” Five weeks ago, actually. And like every other time, she pokes, prods, tests everything, tries to talk him into at least a glucose monitor, and he does his part of saying he’s fine, and everything is under control. She gives him the hairy eyeball, but concedes his numbers are good, and they leave it there for another six months.

“Make an appointment, soon.”

“Sure,” Jimmy says, just to make this go away.
“Any excitement at work?” Breena asks when Jimmy gets home.

“The twenty-two year old?” Abby asks. She knows a Marine who collapsed during a PT run and was dead before the medics got to her was brought in today.

“Yes. Congenital heart defect. Weak spot in the left ventricle. One day it was going to blow, and that was today, unfortunately.”

Tim sighs, shaking his head. “I’d almost rather take a murder than that.”

Jimmy nods, understanding. He’d rather have someone to blame than just be at the mercy of random fate.

Two days later, when Jimmy’s sugar starts to crash again, he knows it’s entirely on him.

During the day, Jimmy can go five hours without eating. He prefers not to do that. He tries to make sure he gets at least a little something every two hours. Wake up snack, breakfast, morning snack, lunch, afternoon snack, dinner, bedtime snack, and that’ll usually get him through the night. He got his afternoon snack, just like normal, and got in the car, heading toward the house for Shabbos, and promptly ran into a traffic snarl the likes of which he hasn’t seen since before The Fall.

Apparently, every single car on I-95 is trapped in some sort of merging hell, trying to get around an accident, with him in the middle of it, and they’re all creeping along at what feels like negative ten miles an hour, as every idiot on the planet rubbernecks their way through a three car pile-up, and all of the emergency vehicles.

So, yes, he’s late for dinner, and he’s pushing the four hour mark when he finally pulls into the driveway of the house, and to say he’s irritable is not an understatement.

He’s ready to bite the heads off of puppies.

And he can feel the cold sweat starting again, which is just pissing him off even more, because he might like to feed himself every two hours, and four hours is when he absolutely should start making sure he’s in range of food, but he should not be this delicately balanced. He should be able to get to five hours, especially if he got all of his previous meals and snacks, and a full night of sleep, because, mercifully, Donnie’s back to his eat every three hours routine and it was Abby’s night to fetch him, before he starts to feel this far off.

But he is feeling off.

Fortunately, he keeps it together as he gets into the house. Shabbos is in full swing, and no one seems to notice if he’s a bit sweaty when he sits down at the table and immediately steals one of Tim’s dessert cookies.
That gets more than one raised eyebrow, along with a few looks from his spouses who are somewhat surprised to see him go diving for not just food, but sugary food, instead of offering hugs and kisses, but Breena knows what she’s seeing, and she nods. Which is pretty much all Tim and Abby have to see.

Jimmy nods back, chewing.

And after a few minutes, he’s feeling like a human again.

---

It’s a misconception that diabetics cannot, or should not, eat sugar.

Jimmy, personally, chooses to eat as little of it as he can, but that isn’t exactly mandated by his doctor. (There are times when he absolutely has to eat sugar. Like when his blood sugar is in freefall.) The reason for this choice is, his body, specifically his pancreas, is supposed to make insulin, and that insulin is supposed to break down glucose, and turn it from sugar into energy. And if he doesn’t have insulin to break down glucose, it just keeps floating around in his system, turning his blood into sludge.

Unfortunately for Jimmy, his pancreas did its job for about twenty years, got into some sort of ridiculous snit, and then promptly quit.

So, he does his best to give his body as little sugar as he can, so he has to use as little insulin as he can, because, while it’s true that insulin is keeping him alive, it is, like many other medications, poison in higher doses, and the less of it he can use and keep himself in the sweet spot, the healthier he’ll be, and the longer he’ll stay that way.

That’s his balancing act. He has to keep enough insulin in his body to let him use the food he consumes, and the sugars therein, because just about everything has some level of sugar in it, but if he gets too much insulin and too little sugar, he goes into free fall, and if he gets too much sugar, and not enough insulin, his body moves in the other direction.

Neither of them are places he likes to be.

So, like with his yoga, he keeps himself centered, focused, and balanced on a ridiculously small point, in a stupidly difficult position.

And he’s done it for almost twenty years with very few wobbles.

And he’s extremely annoyed to see that he’s wobbling.

---

Breena’s eyeing him. Dinner’s done, she had them put the kids down, and he knows she set that up so they could have a moment or two for just them. Kids are down, they’ve got that moment, and she’s got that tense look on her face.

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little. He half shrugs, too. “I was so close to home; I didn’t break into another snack pack.”

Mona keeps bumping her head against his hip. She’s been doing it all night. And Breena knows why.
“She can smell it on you.”

He can’t, and he’s honestly not sure if Mona really can, too. He should only smell off when his blood sugar gets too high, and that hasn’t happened since he cut pretty much all the carbs out of his diet. “I know. It was stupid. I should have had a few nuts on the road.”

“Yeah.”

“Come on, you know me.”

She gives him a long look. They’ve had very few serious arguments over the years. Okay, they’ve had one serious argument over the years, and it’s about the fact that he does not have an insulin pump or continuous glucose monitor. And he doesn’t have one because he’s on top of his levels, and has everything under control. As long as that’s true, she’s willing to let it slide.

And the second it isn’t true, he’s agreed to do something about it.

And she’s really watching him, hoping it’s time.

And he’s watching her back, afraid it is.

The rest of the weekend, Jimmy’s diligent. He tests more often, ups his little snacks, one every ninety minutes, makes sure that he’s never got an empty stomach, gets up with at least one of Donnie’s wake ups a night (even when it’s not his night) to add in one more extra snack a night, and he’s fine.

Monday, Tuesday, he keeps that up. No problems. It’s annoying having to keep checking constantly, but… That’s just part of being diabetic. He makes the decision to ease back on the snacks, and see what happens on Wednesday.

Crying. Tim blinks. That is definitely a wailing baby. Much wailing. Tim blinks again. Definitely wailing baby. Someone’s supposed to get that. He’s awfully sure it’s not him.

He thinks about it for another moment, and… Yep, it’s Jimmy’s night.

Apparently Donnie’s in a mood.

Tim blinks again. His back is warm. Really warm, and kind of damp. So, wailing kiddos, and Jimmy is against his back, sleeping. Not in the nursery, with the wailing babies.

Donnie’s not in a mood; he’s not being tended.

Tim rolls away from Abby, and shoves him, half-noticing that Jimmy’s skin is clammy, and says, none too kindly, “It’s your night.”

Jimmy still doesn’t move.
Tim shoves him again, rolling his eyes. It was his night last night, and he got up six damn times (three with Donnie, once with Kelly, and twice with Anna, all of whom decided last night was a spiffy night to get up and party all night long), while Jimmy got to sleep the glorious, uninterrupted sleep of the parent not on baby duty. Tim is supremely unsympathetic to Jimmy not wanting to wake up.

“Get up!”

And Jimmy still doesn’t move, which is when the lightning cold fear goes shooting down his spine, and Tim is UP.

“Jimmy.” He’s shaking him now. “Abby, Breena! He’s not moving!”

Tim is electric with fear. He’s shaking with it, skin buzzing, feeling completely useless. Jimmy’s eyes are slowly easing open, and his head is lolling around as Tim stupidly keeps shaking him, because if he can just see Jimmy’s eyes, hear his voice, then everything will be okay, right?

He does blink, slowly, a few times, and Abby’s on Jimmy’s other side, and he doesn’t know where Breena went, but she’s not in the bed with them, and everything’s moving too damn fast and too damn slow and Jimmy isn’t talking, but there’s a sliver of reflection in his eyes, so they’re open, just a little, and Breena’s by his side, shoving him out of the way.

He moves aside, feeling bound in glue by fear, and numb with stupidity because he doesn’t know what to do.

He’s biting his lip, hard, because the guy who knows what to do is the one who’s only, just starting to make some sounds.

But he is making sounds.

“My night?” He sounds really confused about that, and his voice is slurring.

That snaps Tim into action. Donnie. He’s still wailing.

He can’t do anything for Jimmy right now, but he can feed the kid.

So he does.

Getting a furious little guy calmed down when he’s in panic mode isn’t exactly easy. But it’s something concrete he can do.

Donnie’s in his arms, angrily sucking away on his bottle, supremely annoyed that he had to wait maybe seven whole minutes for his meal, when Tim goes back into their bedroom.

Abby’s on the phone. Breena is glaring at Jimmy, who, in the low light of their room, is pale, listless looking, and very slowly sipping a Coke.

He hears Abby say, “Forty-five.” And “Yeah, that’d be great.” Then she looks to the rest of them, “Allan’s coming over.”

Jimmy, sounding horribly tired, says, “I don’t need a doctor. I just need to eat.”
By the time Allan gets there, Jimmy looks, if anything, embarrassed. He certainly feels embarrassed. So much for his experiment. He rolls his eyes a little. “I’m fine. Back up to 73, and rising.”

Allan’s look has a lot of layers to it, most of them along the lines of ‘You’re my patient, and I’ve got a legal obligation to say nothing in front of everyone else, but we are having a real conversation about this when you get to work tomorrow, and you fucking will be showing up to work tomorrow, if for no other reason than to have that damn conversation.’

Jimmy reads all of them, loud and clear, and nods back.

What Allan chooses to say with his words is, “I don’t ever want to hear the words ‘back up to’ and ‘73’ in the same sentence again.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes at that, too. “I’d rather not be saying it. Look. I’m fine. Back on the upswing. I’ve got my watch set to wake me every two hours so I can recheck, and if it starts to drop again, I know what to do.”

Allan eyes him again. That’s reasonable. But he also saw how fast Jimmy went down last week. “Hour. Have one of them check it. You don’t need to wake up for it. But every hour.”

“All right.” Jimmy bites out. He’s not about to ask anyone else to check his sugar. And if he’s extra crabby tomorrow, Allan’s the one who’ll have to deal with it.

Then Allan lights the fuse on the bomb. “When’s that endo appointment?”

Which is when Jimmy has to admit that A: he didn’t make the appointment, and B: this isn’t the first time this has happened recently.

Right that second he’s thinking diabetic coma would have been preferable to the amount of trouble he’s in right now.

It’s hours later, and Jimmy’s asleep, or close enough it doesn’t matter.

Allan’s headed home, having made sure that Jimmy’s sugar really will be checked every hour, and that he’s stabilized at 103, which is where he should be after a Coke.

Donnie’s down, for the moment.

The same cannot be said for the other three adult McPalmers, who are not, by any stretch of the imagination, about to, or near, asleep.

Scared doesn’t really begin to cover it, but that’ll have to do. All the flavors of scared are filling their bedroom right now, thickening the air, keeping them from rest.
They aren’t really talking to each other, and cuddling isn’t helping much. There’s still too much zinging electric adrenaline for close in, snuggly, dealing with fear. Too much need to move.

Right now, Tim wants to fight. But the guy he normally does that with is not only sleeping, but he’s terrified that if he hits him, he’ll hurt him. He’s fairly sure he could call Tony, but he also doesn’t want to leave the ladies, and… He’s tired, and he’s scared, and he wants to hit the universe, not Tony, and…

And it hits him like punch to the guts, one he doesn’t expect, one he didn’t see coming, didn’t imagine, couldn’t have predicted, one minute he was completely here, and the next he’s in Canada, and Breena’s furious at him, and he’s in the Navy Yard, and they’re begging him to get out, so scared, and all of that fear, weeks of it, comes crashing into Tim.

Twenty-four days of that shit. He put them through twenty-four days of this.

Tim drops to his knees in front of Breena and Abby, and he can barely put it into words, there’s just the overwhelming feeling of it.

“I am so sorry for last fall.” He thought he was sorry before, and he was. He was the kind of sorry that can only imagine how the other side of the equation must have felt. It was real, and sincere, and it mattered. But this is the kind of sorry that knows, at least a taste of, what he put them through.

And this is an entirely different universe of sorry.

He swallows hard, still feeling aftershocks, literal shocks, his hands are still trembling, of fear and helplessness. “So, so, unspeakably, sorry.”

Breena nods, curtly. At any other time, that would matter to her, but she’s worn to a nub, too, and can only take so much.

Abby pets him, offers a half smile, and says, “How about we work on not doing shit like this to each other?”

That sounds excellent to Tim.

This is not the worst morning of Jimmy’s life. Pretty much because he’s already had the worst damn morning a person can have.

This isn’t even in the league of that morning.

But, for run-of-the-mill bad mornings, this is the top of his list.

He hasn’t seen Tim yet this morning. When he got up, Tim was already out of the house. He doesn’t know if Tim’s scared, pissed, not speaking to him, or if he got called in early.

Breena isn’t talking to him. Looking at him. Yeah, lots of looks. He’s in TROUBLE. One blip, where he didn’t eat properly, fine. Two, that happens. Three, and he didn’t mention one of them, and his butt isn’t already sitting in front of the Endo, that means he’s not playing by the rules they set up years ago, and she is pissed.

Abby’s in research mode. She’s dealing with scared by becoming, overnight, an expert in Diabetic-Tech. She’s whirling through pros, cons, side effects, and has a list at least as long as her arm of things for him to talk to his Endo about, and likely just as many things as she wants attached to his body by the end of said conversation.

He knows she’s trying to be helpful, but all she’s doing is pissing him off with her version of his future as a fucking cyborg.

And, of course, there’s Allan, who is in full Dr. Allan mode, not Dr. Allan, ME, but Dr. Allan MD, who wants to know all about why he doesn’t have Abby’s yard long list of electronics embedded in his body already, and is pointing out study after study about why he should be starting up his career as the six million dollar man.

He’s not exactly growling as he’s on the phone with Abby and Breena, who are checking in to see what he’s been up to this morning, and if he’s checked his sugar, and if he’s made an appointment with his Endo, but he’s certainly been in better moods before.

“Yes, I made it!”

“When?” Breena’s voice is curt, angry.

“I got the first day she could fit me in. Tuesday after next.”

“Bullshit!” whispers out of Breena. And though she doesn’t say anything, he can feel Abby’s got the same thought in mind.

“Which other diabetic would you like me to bump out of his spot to get in there any earlier?”

“You explained it was an emergency?” Abby asks.

“Yes.” No. Because this isn’t an emergency. This is diabetes. This is what many diabetics go through all the time. And he’s not about to bump someone whose sugar’s been riding a roller coaster every damn day because he’s had a few blips over the last week. “I just have to keep checking my sugar more often. Most diabetics do this all the time.”

He hears one of the lines hang up, and knows that’s Breena because that’s what mad Breena’s like. If she gets mad enough, she retreats, that way she can’t say anything she’ll, and he’ll, regret later, but when she is ready to talk, when she’s got it thought through and planned out, he damn well better be ready to hear it.

Abby says, “I’ll go talk with her. Every hour you check. Show Tim and I how to do it, and we’ll get you during the night, too.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “It’s not painless, Abby. I can’t sleep through it. Might as well just do it myself.”

“Show us, anyway. Neither of us knew what to do, and that was terrifying. At least when we get up with Donnie, we can poke you, and you don’t have to wake up enough to do anything.”

“Fine. Tonight. I’ll show you the tester and how to do a glucagon injection.”

“What’s glucagon?”

Jimmy doesn’t want to get into it, but… given how last night went. “If I drop far enough to start seizing and slip into a coma, if I can’t eat, it’ll bring my sugar level up.”

“Oh.”
“The little red box that Breena put on our bedside table.”

Abby had seen it, but Breena didn’t use it, so she didn’t ask. “Good.”

“Yeah, great.” He’s in a black mood as he hangs up.

“He’s lying.”

“I’m sure he made an appointment, Breena,” Abby says.

“Not about that. He took whatever the first one was and that was that. He didn’t push.”

“Oh. Well…” Abby thinks about it. “What’s the name of his Endo?”

Breena tells her, and Abby, on her computer at NCIS, says, “Look, just because Tim’s got the Hacker crown with all the merit badges and whatnot, doesn’t mean he’s the only one who knows how to use a computer. Let me see if I can open up a time for Jimmy.”

That’s the first concrete thing that Breena’s heard that she wants to hear. Really, the only thing she wanted to hear was years ago, when they were newlyweds, and Jimmy got a tummy bug, so he couldn’t eat, which meant he couldn’t keep his sugar balanced, and ended up in the hospital on an IV to keep himself in the sweet spot. Then, and now, what she wants to hear is, “Here’s your insulin pump,” (and continuous glucose monitor, though they weren’t around when they had that argument.) “calibrate it every day, and let it do the rest.” That, however, wasn’t what Jimmy wanted, so, they had a deal.

Which someone has not been living up to.

“You going to boot someone?”

“Not another patient. But if they’ve got emergency slots, or something like that, I’ll pop him in.”

“Thanks, Abby.”

“Okay, now, you go sleep.”

Breena barks a short laugh at that.

“I know, honey, try. You need to rest, and right now, he’s got a doctor literally standing right next to him. He’s as watched as he can get. So, sleep.”

Breena sighs, and hangs up. She does need sleep, but she can’t imagine it’ll happen. Every time her eyes close she hears Tim shriek, “He’s not moving!” she feels the horror in his voice, and the gripping terror in her chest, and the world stops spinning.

And it’s not going to turn again until there’s something that’s constantly keeping track of Jimmy’s blood sugar level, keeping him safe.
As Abby’s engaging in some extremely illegal poking about in Dr. Hildebrand’s appointment book, she’s coming to the distressing conclusion that Jimmy may not have raised hell about getting in sooner, but it likely wouldn’t have helped if he did.

She must be a very good endocrinologist, or like many of the doctors in the greater DC area, she’s slammed, still taking up the slack from the fact that the hospitals are rebuilding as fast as they can, but they aren’t rebuilt.

She’s about to give up. From what she can tell, Jimmy’s in the emergency, get-you-in-as-soon-as-possible slot. And, she’s not about to bump someone else from their appointment. She’s listlessly flicking through the dates when she notices a pattern.

The third Monday of every month, there’s a lunch appointment. With the same guy.

That’s the only person she sees at lunch. The only person she sees every month, too.

Abby takes a moment to look at it, make sure she’s seeing the pattern she thinks she’s seeing, and then she google’s the name. When she gets the answer she expected, she grins.

Ten minutes later, she’s in Autopsy, pulling Jimmy’s phone out of his pants pocket.

“Uh!” He gives her a very startled look. Yes, obviously, after last night, when Allan came into their home, saw them all in bathrobes and various states of clearly-just-got-out-of-bed, (or in Jimmy’s case, still in bed) in their bedroom, Allan is more than familiar with what level of intimate relationship they have, but she’s never just reached into his pants in front of anyone else before.

She’s opening it up. “You really need to put a passcode on this. Tim’s already pissed at you, don’t let him see you don’t have one.”

“Abby?”

She’s still messing with his phone. Then she hands it back to him. “There. Monday. Noon. You and Dr. Hildebrand have a date. Bring her a nice lunch.”

Now he’s staring at her, and the phone, and her again.

“I wouldn’t bump a patient to get you in sooner. I had no trouble bumping her monthly meeting with a drug rep. Centon Harvey of Pfizer is going to have to wait a week to see her next.”

“Abby!” Jimmy’s looking alarmed.

“NO! Don’t give me that! You will show up. You will talk with her. Breena’s going to show up with you. You will come home with something better than ‘I’ll test my damn sugar every hour.’ I know for a fact they exist, and apparently, it’s fucking time to get one.”

“They don’t—“

“I made sure the Doc’s got a full write up of everything that’s happened and a request for a prescription for three different devices. They will be ready when you get there, and you will return from her office with one of them.”

Jimmy inhales, hard, exhales just as hard, anger sparking off of his eyes, and then turns on his heel and storms out of the morgue.

Allan mildly blinks, cleans his glasses, and says, “I think you hit a nerve.”
Living in the middle of the storm, Abby’s been working on keeping herself calm. Breena is furious. Tim is terrified and guilty. Their home cannot take any more anger on top of that, so she’s being fucking useful, and when one of the other two calms down a bit, she can be the frantic one. But, she’s not at home right now, and Allan isn’t part of their little family, so she can turn to him and let some of what’s under the surface blaze forth. “I don’t care! If he’s angry, he’s angry alive. Thirty-nine. That’s how low his sugar was when Tim noticed he wasn’t moving.”

Allan hisses. Jimmy was at forty-five when they called him, and higher when he got there. Thirty-nine is a hair from get the glucagon and pray.

“Exactly. And I do not care about fucking medical ethics. I do not care about any responsibility you may have to him when it comes to keeping his confidences. If I find out he’s taken a tumble in here again, and you didn’t tell me, I will literally make every single minute of whatever’s left of your life a living hell, and Breena and Tim will make sure that won’t be all that long.”

Allan just blinks at her. Abby can’t read that look. Not well. But if it translated into, You cannot threaten me into submission she wouldn’t be shocked.

“Allan…” This time she tries asking. “Please. If he’s going to be a twit about it…”

Allan shakes his head. “You are angry, and scared, and that’s a bad combination. I know. I really do. But he specifically told me not to get you. I can’t violate that. More importantly, I won’t.”

“What’s the fucking point of ethics if he’s going to die on us? Your ethics would have worked out so well. Once with you. Once on his own. Once with us. How many times would it have to happen before you’d have put together it wasn’t just the one shot?”

“I would have known this morning, Abby! Even if you guys hadn’t called. I’m not stupid, and he’s a bad liar. ‘Donnie kept me up’ wouldn’t have gotten past the third word. And I would have driven his butt to the Endo myself if need be. And I can write the script for the monitors if need be. I think talking to his Endo before settling on one is a good idea, but at the absolute latest, Tuesday after next, he would have seen his Doc.” Allan sighs at her. “He’s not wrong, Abby. This is what diabetes looks like for many people who don’t have a monitor. You’re so used to him coping miraculously, that slightly better than average is terrifying. Most people live decades like this.”

“His father didn’t.”

Allan doesn’t have a response to that.

Screaming silently into the void, voice stolen by fear, an all-pervasive NO thrums through Gabe.

NO. NO! NO! It’s a mantra, a hope and prayer, demand of any god who may be listening, NO.

Because there’s nothing else he can do. No magic to pull from. No villain to hurt. There’s nothing, just screaming at the gods and begging, NO.

No, Dae, NO. Not today. Not today, and not tomorrow, and the day after will take care of itself, but not today.

But Dae doesn’t answer, can’t, and Gabe’s heart pounds faster, harder, hopeless and helpless.

Dae’s the healer, he’s the one who knows what to do, but he can’t because he’s the one hurt, and all that’s left for Gabe is screaming NO—

Tim’s typing fast and hard. He’s got to get it out. Got to do something with it because it’s just eating him from the inside.

He’s never, ever been that scared before. He’s been close, twice.

The first time, when that maniac fan was holding a gun on Abby, his guts had turned to water and his knees rubber, but at least there was something he could do. He wasn’t helpless. Maybe it wouldn’t have been enough, but it was something.

And, though, looking back, in some ways he feels like he always loved Abby, loved her the way he loves her now, that his present re-colors the past, but it doesn’t, because it can’t. He didn’t love her, not then, not the way he does now. If he had failed, it would have… He doesn’t like to think about it. It would have crushed him, but he’d have still been Tim after. A broken, wounded Tim, but still Tim.

The second time was with when that sadist said, “The placenta’s low,” and proceeded to provide no other useful information.

That had the same feeling of utter helplessness he has now. He couldn’t shoot it, or talk it down, or anything. He had to just sit there and take it. And by then he knew that if something happened to Abby and Kelly he wouldn’t still be Tim after it.

That loss would fundamentally change him, on an innate identity level. And he would never, ever be the same after.

But, of course, after “low” and a collection of terrified questions, the tech did say, “No one’s dying today,” and then Dr. Draz said the same thing. And so did Jimmy. And so did pretty much everyone else.

And he felt sick with helplessness, but Abby was okay. And Kelly was okay. And they’re fine, and had another baby and…

It all worked out.

He can feel Jimmy’s body under his hands. Cool, damp skin, clammy to the touch, feel the shove he gave him, and him just lie there. He can see woozy eyes, looking around, bleary. Confusion, slow blinking, and he can still hear Donnie wailing away, the same sort of sound his heart was making, because Jimmy wasn’t okay.

And no one is hovering behind him saying, “He’ll be fine.”

And he’s not going to just “get over it.”

And there’s not a single fucking thing Tim can do about this.

A bit more than a year ago, on the beach in OBX, Tim knew that if something happened to Jimmy or Breena, it would hurt but he’d survive it. He’d still be Tim.

And now he knows that’s no longer true. They’re just as vital to him as Abby and the kids. They’re the lives he can’t live without. Husband, father. That’s his core, his identity, and if he loses that… He won’t be Tim anymore.

And he’s got to write, or he’s going to implode.
Rationally, Jimmy knows he should have a monitor and pump. He knows it. He’s known it for years.

Back around 2003 when the first insulin pumps came out, he had one, and he hated it.

First off, when he injects himself, he uses a tiny little needle, and he doesn’t keep hitting the exact same spot over and over. So, at any given time, he does have several spots on his belly that are a tiny bit tender, but that’s it.

The pump required a much larger needle, because it had to keep a hole in him large enough so that his body didn’t heal around the needle. So, constant sore spot. And, he’s diabetic, so his body isn’t exactly crackerjack at fighting off infections, so every time he moved the tube, he had a tiny, red, swollen cut on his belly. The entire time he had the pump, he looked like he had a ring of welts around his stomach.

He had to tape the needle into place on his abdomen. Cue the constant allergic reaction. He has yet to meet an adhesive he can wear on his skin and not break out at. That stupid cut from the scalpel: he had to wrap his finger in gauze, tape the gauze, and then put his gloves over that, because a stupid Band-Aid will make his skin flush pink and swell wherever the adhesive is touching.

There was a little tube between the pump and his body, and the time it got kinked, so he thought he was getting insulin, but he wasn’t, which resulted in him spiking his sugar into the stratosphere. Twice.

Oh, and, yes, back then he wasn’t exactly getting laid right, left, and all over, but having this stupid thing clipped to his pants all the damn time didn’t make his day when he did finally manage to locate a woman to have sex with. Take it off? Unplug it? Stab himself again? Leave his underwear on and hope it doesn’t get yanked out? He never found a good way to deal with it.

And then there was the whole work thing. He’s constantly going into and out of buildings that require him to go through a metal detector, and especially when they were new, a lot of security guys didn’t know what an insulin pump was. He had it yanked out twice by aggressive idiots who thought he was being unreasonable about taking off his pager.

When things started up with Lee, he looked at all the shit he was going through with the pump, looked at his diet, his exercise level, said fuck it, and went back to needles.

And, save for when he’s argued with Breena about it, he’s never regretted that decision.

Glucose monitors, which have only been on the market for a few years are a somewhat different story. He’s never had one of them, and until the week before last, didn’t see a reason for it. Testing his blood three or four times a day isn’t a big deal, and that’s all he had been needing to do.

But, of course, things have changed. He supposes he might be able to compromise with just a glucose monitor, because it’s not like an insulin pump would do shit for anything that’s causing him problems right now, but…

God, he doesn’t want one. His skin crawls at the idea of constantly, every hour, every day, being tethered to one of those things.
And he knows why it does, too.

Tim’s rattling away on his typewriter, more or less ignoring the rest of the world. He’s in the story right now, because the story is a “safe” way of dealing with all of this.

Jimmy shuts the door to Tim’s office. He wants a chance to bitch about this without either of the girls getting on his case, which meant a short drive away from his office to Tim’s. “Our wives have declared that I’m getting an insulin pump, and a glucose monitor, and God alone knows what else.”

Tim looks up, holding very still for a second, and Jimmy’s suddenly aware of this isn’t _the girls_ declaring anything. This is all three of them having come to an executive decision.

“That’s the way it is?”

Tim nods. Absently. He takes his glasses off, also absently, setting them half off his desk.

He’s felt this before. Never in relation to Jimmy. He’s never expected to feel this about Jimmy, but he’s standing there, whole, up, on his feet, color good, eyes bright, both sparking a bit from the underlying current of anger, talking to him, and Tim’s up, moving fast, slamming Jimmy back against his conference table, kissing him, _hard_, all over, lips, jaw, cheeks, fingers gripping, just as hard, around his arms, and _kissing_.

The first time he felt this actually did involve Jimmy, sort of. It was the night he and Ducky got kidnapped. They were in the woods, in the dark, and they heard the shot, and he remembers that horrible cold feeling, the idea that they’d failed, didn’t get there fast enough, and… And it was okay, they had gotten there in time, and as soon as he and Abby were home they were fucking like the world would end if they didn’t because they needed something to chase away death. His body _needed_ life. Needed to remember he was alive. Needed some way of expressing that the bullet didn’t have his name on it.

Even if only for a moment.

He’s felt it since then, but every time he’s felt it, he’s been the one proving to _himself_ that he’s not dead. He can remember coming home to Abby after that one bomb, and the feel of seeing her. It was erotic, but not. His body wanted sex, but not from a sensation perspective. He wasn’t craving pleasure. He needed life. He needed to experience it, needed to prove it. Needed to make it. His body knows what it means to be alive, knows it as breath and pulse, knows it in his balls and dick, knows it as fucking, making more life, pushing death back…

He remembers seeing Abby and wanting all of it so hard it pretty much shorted everything else out in his mind. But she was nursing, and he was literally holding Jethro up, and no matter how much he wanted it, it didn’t happen.

This time though, he’s alone, with Jimmy. And it’s not his life he needs to prove. He knows he’s alive. He needs to know Jimmy’s alive. Needs to feel the life in Jimmy, and make his body believe it, feel it in his guts and bones and balls.

He’s kissing, hard, so hard, feeling the heat of Jimmy’s skin under his, his heart pounding against his chest, tasting blood, he’s sure he’s nicked Jimmy’s lip, but he doesn’t care, he’s _alive_. He’s ripping at Jimmy’s tie, while trying to undo his own belt at the same time, while sucking a hickey into Jimmy’s jew and he can smell it.

It’s always on Jimmy’s skin when he comes from the Morgue.

Usually, on days like today, when he hasn’t done an autopsy, it’s just a hint. A whiff of death under the chemical tinge of disinfectant, but right now that smell is driving Tim crazy, just the blush of scent feels like swimming in it.

It’s death. On Jimmy, in his hands and skin and, Tim just wants to fuck it out of him. He wants, needs, to reclaim Jimmy, take him back, mark him, make him his. He needs to stand over this man and wave his fucking sword and scream at Death, make it know that it can’t have Jimmy.

Breath and pulse, his body throbbing under his, around his, Jimmy’s cock in hand, pulsing, striping his belly with Jimmy’s cum, wiping that scent off of him, fucking it out of him, removing any trace of death from him. That’s what he needs.

Tim’s got his belt undone, and his pants open, and he’s scrambling for Jimmy’s.

Jimmy’s not sure what the hell just happened to him. He was standing next to the door, and now he’s on his back, on the conference table, being… ravished, is pretty much the only word immediately springing to mind. And he’s… Okay, part of him is starting to get turned on, his dick is pretty much all in favor of this. Tim’s is hitting a few of his kinks, the maybe get caught kink, his danger kink, and his pain one, all at once, and hard, but…

He’s trying to pry Tim off of him, because he doesn’t really want to get fucked through his conference table, and yes, he’s got something of a pain kink, but Tim’s doing this a lot harder than he likes, and judging by the way Tim’s rubbing against him, and his position between Jimmy’s legs, he’s not looking to bottom, and that’s not a line Jimmy’s crossing on a table in Tim’s office, let alone with the kind of speed and force Tim’s using right now.

He’s not having a lot of luck at removing Tim because he’s determined right now, and almost the same size as Jimmy, and frantic with fear, and on top of him, and…

He’s never tried this, but he’s fairly sure it’ll work better, and kinder, than punching him in the stomach, which is his plan B, because Tim’s just about got his pants off, and he’s not showing any signs of stopping anytime soon.

“Timothy, stop.”

Tim’s only barely aware of Jimmy sort of flailing at his shoulders, let alone his repeat attempts to get his attention by saying “Tim,” several times.

He knows it is happening, he just doesn’t fucking care. It doesn’t matter nearly as much as what he’s trying to do.
But, “Timothy, stop,” freezes him, and the tone of voice lets him know that Jimmy’s not interested in going along with this.

He practically springs back, away from Jimmy, which is when what he’s doing finally clears in his head, and… “Shit.”

He slumps into one of the conference chairs.

Jimmy, nods, gently touching his lip, which has a small split. Tim can see three large bite marks forming on his jaw, neck, and collarbone, too.

“What was that?” Jimmy asks, sitting up.

Tim’s feeling really embarrassed, and kind of turned-on, and angry and afraid come storming back, fast, and… mostly embarrassed.

“I think was trying to get you pregnant.”

Jimmy nods slowly, pulling his pants back up. He doesn’t really have anything to say to that for a moment, because while that goes along just fine with what Tim was doing, it makes literally no sense to Jimmy, but he finally comes up with, “Okay, if that’s my alternative to a glucose monitor and a pump, and the rest of that crap. I’ll take the crap. Am I bleeding?”

Tim stands up, rights his pants, and then heads to his bathroom, grabbing a few tissues. “A little.” He steps closer to Jimmy, holding the tissues, but doesn’t, won’t, touch him without express permission.

Jimmy nods, and Tim steps even closer, very lightly, gently kissing his lip, and then dabbing at it with the tissue. “Sorry.”

“Seriously, what the hell was that?”

Tim opens and closes his mouth a few times and the shakes his head. He remembers Abby in his lap telling him he wasn’t allowed to dangle this perfect life in front of her, and then yank it away by dying on her. She hit him. He remembers that. Not just gentle little taps, but really hit him.

And he suddenly knows how that felt. “Not being able to take the crap I’ve dished out.”

“I’m still not following you.”

Tim shakes his head. “I don’t think you have to. I’m just… sorry. Uh… You were saying something when you came in…” He’s feeling exhausted all of a sudden. Like all of the emotions that had been coursing through him have all rushed away, leaving him with two hours of sleep and frazzled nerves and staring at a man he adores who he just basically assaulted because the idea of losing him was so terrifying he couldn’t find anything else to do with it.

He crashes onto his sofa, and Jimmy follows, sitting next to him, but there’s still some wariness in his posture.

And after a moment of watching Tim just sit there, parsing ‘not being able to take what I’ve dished out,’ that wariness breaks. He offers Tim an arm, and Tim snuggles into him.

They hold that quiet for a moment, and Jimmy can feel Tim’s fingers against his chest, and his lips against his throat. And Tim’s there, feeling breath and pulse, and the frantic need to wipe death off of Jimmy is receding, but it’s still lurking under there, because he can still smell it on him.
He can still feel Jimmy, like this, warm, still, against him last night, not moving, not responding.

This time, he gently kisses Jimmy’s throat.

He can feel Jimmy petting his hair, and then he asks again. “Yeah. I do need to know, what was that?”

This is easier with his face against Jimmy’s neck. Easier to not say it with eye contact. But he makes himself look up anyway.

His fingers find one of the bite marks. Jimmy’s going back to work with a pile of hickeys. Tim shakes his head, a little. But he makes words form. “You don’t get to die.” His face is intense, and he knows he can’t demand this, can’t make the universe stand up and somehow take notice. There is no magic in this world and will alone cannot keep our loves safe, but, he can’t not try. “Abby said that to me once. You don’t get to dangle this fantasy of a perfect life in front of me and then take it away by dying. And… I can smell it on you.” Tim wipes his lips in embarrassment. “I could feel it on you last night. And, you don’t get to die. So… I was…” He’s blushing from his forehead to his neck. “I was… claiming you. And… I was going to fuck the death right out of you. Take it off your skin. Make it know that it can’t have you.”

Jimmy exhales long and low at that. He gently strokes his hand from Tim’s shoulder to hand, and nods. “You weren’t kidding about trying to get me pregnant.”

Tim’s blushing at that. “Not really. I’ve… done that with Abby after a few close calls.”

“Yeah, same with Breena and I.”

“The brain knows it doesn’t work… On any level…” He rubs his lips together, horribly embarrassed. “Especially not for you and me… But… balls and guts, not so much.”

Jimmy nods, and shifts a bit, his own position, and Tim’s, too, so he’s in Tim’s lap, straddling his legs, face to face with him. “Not here, and not like this, but… Later, slow, gentle, you still need to, sure.”

“I have a feeling later the ladies will want you, and I’m not going to get between them and you. So… you were saying something when you came in. I know that. You came in, and your mouth opened, and everything went really blurry and hyper slow and very aware of your body and life and whatnot, but… You came here for a reason, right?”

“Yeah.” Jimmy rolls his eyes. “I think it’s fairly clear you’re not the sympathetic audience I was hoping for.”

“Yeah, well, I’m feeling pretty cringe-y about five minutes ago, so try me. This is the most receptive I’ll ever be.”

“Abby hacked my Endo, booted a drug rep, and got me in on Monday.”

Tim feels a flush of pleasure at that. He makes a mental note to get some flowers for her tonight. He’s also with it enough to see that this is not making Jimmy happy.

So, he says, “Ah. And, this is bad?”

“You mean, beyond the dozen illegal, and extremely easily tracked HIPPA violations? Can we start there? I think Doc Hildebrand will be amused by this, mostly because she’s on the same side as the girls, but… If she’s not, Abby can literally go to jail for this.”
Tim waves that away. If Abby didn’t get in and out clean, he can mop up after her. “I can take care of that.”

“It’s an appointment for me. There’s not exactly a mile long suspect list.”

“I can take care of that, too. By the time I’m done, that appointment will have originated from your Doc’s software, on a computer, in her office.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes.

“Same side as the girls?” Tim asks.

“It’s like I’m a child, or a pet. Okay, as long as you do whatever it is, you can get your gold star.”

Tim’s not following that, so Jimmy explains his deal with Doc Hildebrand and Breena. How, as long as he’s ‘got it under control’ he gets to make his own decisions.

And Tim listens, but it’s clear he doesn’t get it.

He’s trying to. But, yes, in the same place, he’s fairly certain he’d have gotten himself into several test groups to be on the absolute cutting edge of whatever tech they’re setting up for keeping diabetics in the sweet spot, and it’s entirely likely that, if at twenty, he’d been diagnosed with diabetes, he’d have gotten that PhD in Biomedical Engineering, and would be one of the guys making new devices to replace the function of a working pancreas.

So, Tim sits, and he listens, and if his thumb just happens to be on Jimmy’s throat, just below one of the hickeys, keeping constant track of the thrum of his heart, Jimmy doesn’t appear to mind.

But even with the explanation, he doesn’t get it. Jimmy explains hating the pump, and Tim nods along, but…

“So… What’s the problem with it?”

“You mean besides hooked up to a machine all the time?”

“Yeah. I heard what you said, and I don’t know but I can empathize with the idea that it’ll be annoying, but come on… Annoying is better than sick or dead. And… It’s been 14 years. Things keep getting better, right? There’s got to be something else, right? I’m completely certain I can find a way to keep a tube and a pump on you without the tube kinking up and without your skin breaking out in hives. I didn’t keep up biomedical engineering, but I wasn’t bad at it. I was just better at computers. This shouldn’t be hard to solve.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “They’ve got some pod now. No tubes. I still need to have this stupid fucking thing literally in my body all the time, but, yes, they’re better.”

Tim stares at him, eyes big and wide.

“God, is Breena coaching you on that look? She gave me the exact same damn thing right after we got married. I don’t need it!” Jimmy can literally feel Tim tense at that. Before he whips out any sort of verbal response, Jimmy says, “I didn’t need it.”

Tim relaxes marginally, and keeps looking.

Jimmy shakes his head and sighs again. “It’s winning. I kept it at a standstill for almost twenty years, but… It’s winning. I’ve told Gibbs that this isn’t some little allergy or something, in the long run, it’s Jimmy looks very sad and moves closer. Tim’s hands wrap around him, settling on his waist. “This is my death, Tim. I mean, yeah, we all die, but… I know how it ends for me. This is how it ended for him.” Tim knows Jimmy’s talking about his dad. “He couldn’t control it, and… honestly, didn’t try as hard as I do, and…” He’s shaking his head, and exhales, very long, very deep. “I was diagnosed three months after he died.” He thinks Tim knows that, though he doesn’t think he’s every laid out the timeline that clearly. “And… yeah, that close together… It was like the fucking Angel of Death showed up in that hospital room and spit on me. Doc didn’t have to say anything, I could smell it on myself when I got conscious again.

“My mom went white. She knew the minute she walked into the hospital room. She knew that smell, lived with it. I was at school when he died, but… When I got back two days later, their room reeked of it. I’d been partying like a maniac right before, and… I could have splattered myself across a four lane highway, or ODed, or, anything, and she would have taken it better than walking into a hospital room that smelled like a diabetic with too much sugar in his blood.”

Jimmy’s looking at their ceiling, voice shaky, but still talking, though he kind of wants to shut this down and just retreat into quiet. “That’s when she started pulling away from me.” He half-smiles and blinks back the tears. “She could handle the fact that I was high. Me being one of the stoners was annoying, but not a deal breaker, not if my grades stayed good enough to keep my scholarships. Diabetes, that was something else. That’s why she’s good for letters, and uh… phone calls and emails, but she keeps me, us, at arm’s length because of it.

“I think it’s the same thing with Clark. She told him, and he just turned and walked out of the room. Like I did it on purpose.

“And… I’m just lying there, and the Doc’s going over everything, got me set up with my first endo appointment, and giving me pamphlets and all of this crap, that I know because I grew up with it, but… But, I didn’t really know, because he’s was always, ‘It’s just a little diabetes,’ like it was no big deal. Extra ice cream, sure, just up the insulin. Skip lunch, why not, there’s always a can of soda in his bag. Lose weight? Why? Drink less, what’s the point? Life’s too short not to have that extra beer or seconds on the birthday cake.

“So, I read the pamphlets. And I got online and I read everything else. And I followed everything my doctor told me to the letter, because I wasn’t going to be him. It beat him, and that wasn’t going to happen to me. I was going to control it. And I was following the low-fat, lots of veg, treats are fine, just up the insulin recommendation, but it wasn’t giving me the results I wanted, so I did more research, and I got a fucking MD to go with it, and… Yeah, your Endo doesn’t look at you like you’re quite so much of a flaming moron when you finally finish medical school, and…” his voice breaks on this. “And it didn’t fucking matter at all. It still won.

“Put that doodad in my arm, or on my leg, or belly or wherever, and…” he shrugs, bites his lip for a tenth of a second, before he feels the sting of the cut Tim already put on him and stops, “And I’m waving the white flag. It’s calling the shots, and I’m reacting. I’m not in control any more.

“And that’s where the end begins, you know? Impotence, neuropathy, necrosis, amputations, blindness, and eventually the blood poisoning gets me. If I’m lucky.” He exhales slow at that. “Maybe you were on the right track before, death is in there, but you can’t fuck it out of me, or off of me, or… anything like that. It’s there, in my body, in my blood, every minute.

“And as soon as I slap one of those little fuckers onto my skin, I’ve got to admit that it’ll win.”
Tim holds onto him, keeping Jimmy close. That he can sympathize with. Jimmy’s literally cut and bruised right now because Tim’s so awesome at dealing with not being able to control this situation. But sympathy doesn’t mean that Jimmy’s right.

“You ever say that to Breena?”

He nods. “Yeah. She knows. But, for her, that device is control. It doesn’t sleep, it doesn’t forget, it doesn’t get distracted, it’s always there, chugging away, doing its job.”

That sounds awfully good to Tim right now, too. After vastly too many visits to the Morgue he’s got more than enough vivid images of everything Jimmy just said, and he’s doing everything in his power to not imagine any of that in relation to Jimmy.

Jimmy can see exactly how much Tim wants a monitor on him now, and rolls his eyes at that, too. “Yeah, I know, man-up, put my big boy Underoos on, and get the damn thing, right?”

“If it was me, or Breena, Abby or the kids…”

“I know. I’m allowed to be a hypocrite about this. Doctors make terrible patients, blah, blah, blah.”

Tim runs his hand up and down Jimmy’s back, feeling warmth, solid muscle, the flex of him breathing. “Why don’t we love ourselves as well as we love each other?”

Jimmy shakes his head at that, and kisses Tim. He doesn’t know why, but he knows it’s true.

Tim leans further into him, twisting a little so his face is pressed to his throat. He kisses his pulse, placing his lips about an inch below one of the hickies. “As long as that’s still going, it hasn’t won.”

He scoffs at that.

Tim pulls back, looking him in the eyes. “No. You stop that. Redefine the terms of victory. You are alive. Every day with us is a win.”

Jimmy doesn’t get particularly sharp when he’s sarcastic, not often. He tends to go more for a dry tone, but when he does, he can cut stone with his voice, and that’s exactly the tone he uses to say, “Yeah, tell me that when they’re cutting my fucking legs off. Or I’ve had a catheter so long they’ve had to split my dick down my urethra to deal with the gauge of the tube. All the win! Can’t walk, can’t fuck, fingers are turning black from blood poisoning, out of my head on morphine to deal with the pain, but still turning O2 into CO2, lots of win!”

Tim blanches at that.

“Medical school, remember? I was there. I took care of them. The only amputations I had to do were on diabetics who didn’t…” He’s actively crying now and can’t finish that sentence. But he can see it, smell it. That one woman, he peeled the skin of her foot off like it was a fucking sock, and then helped to take her leg off at the knee. She still died of blood poisoning two weeks later.

Tim holds onto him, trying not to imagine it. He can feel Jimmy against him, his legs against his hips, his fingers against his back, and the idea of any part of Jimmy not attached to Jimmy, not warm and pink and healthy is making Tim feel actively nauseous.

Somehow, after this last year, and all the years before it, it never really hit Tim that Jimmy is sick. He knows that Jimmy’s diabetic. He’s seen him test. He’s seen the insulin he takes with his meals and before he works out. He cooks for the man, and is avidly aware of how carefully he watches what goes into his body.

But somehow that never translated into the idea that Jimmy is sick.

Jimmy has his cry, and gets himself back together. Tim’s quiet, holding onto him, petting his back, kissing his forehead from time to time.

When Jimmy feels calmed down, Tim says, very quietly. “Maybe it does win. You’re probably right about that. That’s no reason to let it win easy. One of my favorite authors once wrote ‘Of course the deck is stacked, but you absolutely can’t win if you don’t play, so you might as well play.’” Tim shrugs. “So, play. It just pulled a trump card, fine. You get the monitor, and it can’t keep sneaking up on you. And maybe that’s enough for a long time. Maybe that stalemates it for decades, the way you did with the way you eat. Maybe it’s enough for a few days. I don’t know. But if you get a few days, that’s a few days we want with you.”

Jimmy doesn’t say what he’s thinking. That it’s not that easy. That he doesn’t get it. That it’s… futile. In the end, it’ll win.

He lets Tim hold him for another moment, and then gets up. “I should go.”

“You don’t have to.”

“I know. But you’re not getting your work done, and I’m not doing anything useful, either, and…”

“I wasn’t doing all that much.” Tim glances at his typewriter.

Jimmy nods to Tim’s computer making it clear he doesn’t want to dwell on him or sickness anymore. “Well, go, do. Missing hacker to find, entire legal system to re-do. Go get it.”

Tim rolls his eyes and groans. He’s got the system ramping up as fast as he can, which isn’t nearly fast enough. As for the hacker, “You know we don’t even have her prints or DNA on file any longer? The IRS managed to ‘lose’ everything. The only way I can search Jane Does is facial recognition, now, and something like 2/3ds of them aren’t in the facial recognition system.”

“Go get the court order to exhume her parents and look for someone who’s a partial DNA match to both of them.”

Tim blinks, getting up. “That’s the first concrete lead I’ve had in a week. Thanks!”

Jimmy nods, kisses Tim, and heads out.

As both a guy, and a guy who never did a whole lot of one night stands, Jimmy’s never done the ‘Walk of Shame.’ He’s aware that it’s a thing, but… Back when he was still doing one (or several) night stands, he had more of a “Strut of I Got Laid” than a “Walk of Shame.”

That said, leaving Tim’s office with several visible hickies, and a shirt that’s got two fewer buttons than it did when he came in, is an… interesting… experience.

Jennifer, the only person who absolutely knows that he is not leaving in the condition he came in in, does a double take as he heads out. Tim’s mentioned that she knows, but it’s pretty clear there’s a difference between knows and knows, and right now, she suddenly knows.

He certainly feels like a lot of people are staring, but he’s also pretty sure that’s mostly in his head. Most people probably don’t give two shits about the guy with the visitor’s badge, split lip, and love bites, moving through the Hoover building.

Going back to work…

Screw that. He’s got every damn reason to take the day off, and if someone turns up dead, Allan can call him.

He calls Allan, tells him what’s up, and pulls out of visitor parking.

Time to go home.

Breena’s sleeping when he gets home.

He’s glad for that. He knows there’s no shot she actually slept last night. Between feeding Donnie and fear, she didn’t get any rest.

She’s not looking very restful now, either. There’s still tension on her face, and he can see her eyes whipping around in REM sleep.

He hopes it’s a good dream.

Judging by her face, it’s probably not.

Jimmy sighs at that, and strips out of his clothing, climbing into their bed. They’ve done this so many times, she doesn’t really wake, though she does snuggle into him. Even mad, even asleep, her body finds his.

He watches her, sees some of the tension melt out of her face, and the fluttering in her eyes ceases. Slipping from dreaming sleep to light sleep. He lays there quietly, watching her, letting her rest.

Why do we love each other better than we love ourselves?

What would he do for her? As an act of love, for her?

Anything.

Then why is this so fucking hard? Do it for her. Do it for them. And done, right?

It will, objectively, do a better job of keeping him healthy than he’s doing right now. It’ll wake him up if his sugar starts to slip during the night, and let him sleep if it’s solid. It’ll make it easier for him to see how much insulin to add if he goes outside his collection of “safe” foods.

It’s a stupid box of plastic, metal, and electronics. It does a job that his body won’t. It’s no different than Sean’s cochlear implant, which gave him not a second’s pause when they were talking about getting one for him.

He should be ecstatic that it’s a thing, and a thing he can have. It’s a literal lifesaver for millions of people. It would have been a lifesaver for his father.

And that doesn’t matter. Not in his heart or guts.

He usually sleeps on his back, and Breena normally snuggles into his side, head on his shoulder, leg draped over his. When he got into bed, he slid into his normal position, and she rolled into hers. He can feel her skin against his thigh, the soft weight of her leg on his. The box goes there. On his thigh, or on his arm, maybe on his belly.

He tries to imagine it. It’s there, jabbing into his skin, she slips her leg on top of his and yanks it, or lays on it, or… Whatever. He hates the idea of it. It’s supposed to be his leg, and hers. Not his leg, his sharp, pokey, plastic box, and hers.

There’s a thing that Abby and Breena do. Tim doesn’t, normally, though he was this afternoon. That’s slip their hand up his arm. Usually it goes along with sex, especially if he’s on top, they’ll drag a hand up the length of his arm, feeling the muscle, the strength in his biceps and triceps working to keep him up, above them, moving.

He sighs. He actually really likes that. He enjoys them appreciating the amount of work he puts into looking the way he does. It’s not like they’ll have to stop if he gets a monitor. They’ll… move around the box, or skip that arm, or maybe accidentally tug it, but… It shouldn’t be like the time he got the tube caught on the pump and ripped the sharp end out of his tummy.

Or his belly, the box could be on his belly. Any position that involves one of them lying on him, and there’ll be this thing between them. A sharp, painful thing intruding in moments that are supposed to be about pleasure. Hell, he doesn’t like condoms because they get in the way, and they at least don’t have a fucking needle jabbing into him, poking and pulling every time one of them moves.

The needle he uses for his insulin now hurts for a second, and then it’s done. The box… It’ll do a better job, and annoy the shit out of him while doing it.

Every single moment of every single day, it’ll be there, on his skin, in his skin.

Do it for them.

Honestly though, that’s set dressing. Annoyances. Those aren’t the deal breaker. The deal breaker’s in his head, not on his skin.

Put one of those things on, and he’s got to admit that he doesn’t have diabetes, it’s got him.

He feels Breena wake up. There’s a moment where she’s soft and relaxed against him, breathing steadily, and he feels that shift. She tenses, misses a breath, and then shifts into a faster, shallower breathing pattern.

He kisses her forehead. “Abby got an appointment for Monday, at lunch. Assuming you’re willing to risk getting arrested for a dozen or so HIPPA violations, you can come with me for it.”

She’s been to a few appointments with Dr. Hildebrand, and they like each other. “She’s not gonna bust us for that.”
“Probably.”

They’re both quiet for a long minute.

“I was never looking for a cure.” She turns, rolling onto her belly, shifts up, so she’s on her elbows, looking down at him, for a second she’s shocked at the bruises, but decides to let that go, getting this out matters more. “I don’t need you to regrow a pancreas. I just want a fucking alarm to buzz if your sugar starts dropping when you’re asleep. Thirty-nine, Jimmy. That’s… If this had happened last month, when Donnie was still on the inside… We’d have slept through the night, and I would have woken up a widow.”

That’s probably not literally true. Probably. Most diabetics go into seizures before slipping into a coma, and it’s not like anyone can sleep through him seizing. Even his stoner roommate, high as a kite, was able to notice something was wrong when his blood sugar got so high he went into a coma the first time.

Also, diabetic coma means that everything slows down, and they likely could have gotten him pumped full of glucagon in time… Probably. If it wasn’t a weekend. Happen at the house, and… Yeah, they’d get up, and play with the kids, and do their thing, let him “sleep in” and if he’d been in bed alone…

It’s true enough that he’s not going to argue the point.

Breena’s very determinedly not crying, though her lip and voice is trembling. “And… honestly, I don’t care if you don’t like the damn monitor. I don’t like the idea of being a widow, or raising our kids without you, and that trumps your fear of electronics.”

Jimmy blinks slowly. He can’t put his voice to it, not yet, but she’s right, and he knows it. He nods.

She sees that nod, blinks a few times, nods back to him, and then lightly touches his lip. “Tim smack some sense into you?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not exactly. He was… trying to fuck the death out of me, and… Yeah…” He shakes his head a bit at that, too, running his hand through his hair, staring up at Breena, who’s looking down, fairly shocked at that. “Yep.”

“Did it work?”

Jimmy really rolls his eyes at that. “Yes, Tim’s amazing cock has made me immortal! Isn’t that a trope or something, magical healing cock? All he did was bruise me up, give both of us some fairly uncomfortable boners, and embarrass the hell out of himself. It was a remarkably ineffective technique.”

She gently strokes his face, skirting around the hickeys. He kisses her fingers.

She tries a quick smile at him, but it falls flat. Her eyes are watery, but looking at him very intently. “It’s like the world stopped turning. I can hear his voice, and see him shaking you, and you’re just rocking back and forth, not moving at all on your own. No sound… no… anything. Just limp and gone and…

“And I’m not sorry, but I’m not going through that again. Not… Not if there’s some way to avoid it. If you want to go kick Tim, you can, last year with him burned through my entire ability to deal with weeks of mortal terror, and I cannot… just cannot take the thought of losing you. Not now. Not like this. Not for something so fucking stupid as not having a glucose monitor. Just… no.”

They hear a faint cry. Jimmy sits up. “I’ll get him.”

And a few moments later, he’s back, with Donnie in his arms, as Breena gets the pillows piled around her, ready for Donnie’s pre-dinner nurse.

Once they’re settled, Jimmy sits next to them, arm around Breena’s shoulder, looking down at their son as he nurses.

He started this conversation with Tim, started it with Breena a long time ago, too, but never got here. Though he’s not sure where here really is. He’s feeling it though, and he thinks saying it matters.

“I don’t need a cure, either. I just need control. And once I put that thing on, I have to admit I don’t have it.”

She turns her face to his shoulder, kissing it. “Honey, you never did.”

He sniffs, nods slightly, and says, “I had the illusion of it.” He remembers something Ducky said to him once, that didn’t exactly resonate at the time, but it is now. “We live and die by the lies we tell ourselves.”

She nestles in a little closer, and kisses him again.

He has a snack every hour and a half. That seems to be where the sweet spot is now. He doesn’t need more sugar, he just needs it more regularly. Seven fucking almonds every hour and a half. One midnight snack of twenty almonds, and at least for the last three days, his sugar has stayed rock solid.

He doesn’t need a monitor, he just needs some damn food and his watch to buzz regularly, reminding him to keep eating the damn food.

Explaining this solution to his loves has gone exactly nowhere.

Tim said, one, maybe half-encouraging thing, along the lines of, “Look, get the damn monitor, keep eating the almonds, and if you actually do go three or four months without a blip, and you hate the monitor, we can talk about taking it off.”

Tim didn’t actually use the tone that they use with the girls when they don’t want to argue, but aren’t about to give the point, so they offer a half-baked hope that’s not actually going to happen.

But he wouldn’t be shocked if that wasn’t exactly what had happened.

At least during the week, he’s at work. During the week, Jimmy gets a solid ten hours a day where he’s not constantly being hovered over by people who are panicky about his well-being and afraid that if he goes 93 minutes without food, he’s going to collapse.
Over the weekend…

They’re babysitting him, and trying to make it look like they aren’t, but by Sunday afternoon, literally every minute he hasn’t been in a locked bathroom, there has been someone else lingering nearby.

Casually.

Pretending they aren’t.

Constantly glancing at him, doing the math, waiting to see when he’ll pull out a snack.

“Come on,” Ziva says to him once the kids are down for afternoon naps.

“And do what?” He’s sitting at the kitchen table, attempting to read, feeling Tim’s eyes on the back of his head as he and Tony “game.”

Ziva gives him a long look, and then says, “Run.”

She’s dressed for it, sort of. With little guy seven months old, she just got back to her regular routine last month, and is still gearing back up to it. She doesn’t quite fit into either her normal running gear or her maternity running stuff, but, sneakers, sweats, light jacket, hair back… Suspicious bulge in her pocket… that looks a lot like a roll of the tape they use on their hands when they spar.

He’s fairly sure that “run” means fight, and suddenly, Jimmy’s all in favor of that.

“YES! Give me a minute.” He’s up from the chair, gets out of his PJs and into something slightly more exercise appropriate, and, though he’s done it before every other workout, he takes his bolus, really aware of the extra insulin he’s got to give himself to work out, and then meets back up with her about three minutes later.

“You want extra company?” Tim asks.

Ziva shakes her head at him. “You hate running. Play with Tony.” Then she and Jimmy are out of the house.

They actually do run, just far enough to get out of the view of any of the windows of the house, then Ziva stops. “They will be upset if they see bruises.”

Jimmy nods at that. They’re in a clearing in the woods. Cold late November air, dead brown leaves underfoot, along with sticks, rocks, and hard, almost frozen dirt. “Pull the punches.” He glances down, they’re both wearing sneakers. “No kicks…” And looks at the rock-strewn ground, and thinks about how much it’ll hurt to fall on it. “We might as well just run.”

“Then catch me!” Ziva says with a grin, and she’s off.

It’s good. Tearing through the woods, zig-zagging trees and brush, jumping over logs, branches snapping against his skin, heart pumping, body moving fast and easy.

He doesn’t know how long they go for, but when they’re done, he’s hot, sweaty, not feeling the cold air, heart thudding, and feeling good.

“Thank you!”

Ziva gives him a hug. Then she places his hand on her decidedly not flat belly. “Bodies change. It’s just what they do. We still know how to enjoy them, no?”
Tim would have to say this is one of the most emotionally bizarre moments of his life. He and Abby have been working together, getting a collection of little sleeves, for lack of a better word, so Jimmy can keep the glucose monitor (which should be coming home with him from his appointment with Dr. Hildebrand today) on his arm, waist, or thigh, without having to resort to gluing it to his skin.

No, it won’t be as secure as it would be if he used the tape, but it’ll stay put well enough, and he won’t have his skin breaking out.

He and Abby are, objectively, having a good time. They’re cutting up bike shorts and a few pairs of LulaRoes, sewing up hems, adding little pockets so he can use them for more than just keeping the monitor in place. He’s measuring and cutting, she’s sewing, and they’re enjoying being with each other and having a concrete project they can do to help with this.

They’re having a good time on another level, he’s coming home with at least a monitor. They’ve decided not to press on an insulin pump, because as Jimmy’s pointed out, he’s not having a problem with not enough insulin. He’s keeping his insulin levels just fine.

Once they get that monitor in him, and calibrated properly, they’ll have real time (almost) read outs, and if Jimmy starts to get in trouble, it’ll make sure they know it, and he can eat a few nuts or something, and boom, no problem!

So, they’re having a really good day.

And Jimmy went off to that appointment looking like he’s about to face a firing squad.

And Tim doesn’t know what to do about that. The thing that’s making Jimmy so unhappy is delighting him.

And he doesn’t know how to touch the fact that Jimmy hates this. He gets why Jimmy hates this, sort of, but he doesn’t know, what, if anything there is to do about it. No, three good days is not enough. If, after the Stennis he had gotten his hand back to mostly okay, and said, ‘This is good enough’ Jimmy would not have been cool with that. He made him keep doing the physical therapy, even though it hurt, even though he didn’t like it, because he needed it.

Tim’s really hoping that Jimmy’ll get it, and it won’t be nearly as big of a pain in the ass as he thinks it’ll be, and… eventually, it’ll just, be okay.

Jimmy wasn’t aware of the fact that his eyes could roll this hard. Anyone who thinks a teenager is a pain in the ass should see what a teenager with 20+ years of additional experience at irate snark can do.

Dr. Hildebrand is not only not annoyed about him appointment jumping, she’s just thrilled that he’s come to his senses and is willing to get a monitor.
She and Breena are positive-reinforcing at about the same level with which they lavish praise on Kelly for successfully peeing in the toilet. If Breena thought it would help, he’d be getting lap dances and blow jobs right and left for agreeing to do this.

Breena catches his absolute bitch face before the Doc does, so she lays off, knowing that she’s just making this worse, and after a few beats Hildebrand notices, too.

“Okay, yes, I know. You don’t want this. I’m still glad you’re doing it. Your friend sent me your numbers, and… Yeah. You can read them as well as I can. You’ve gone from solid control to shaky.” Breena winces as Hildebrand says that. “You had a really good long run of taking care of yourself with mostly diet and exercise. In fact, you had the best controlled diabetes of anyone I’ve ever worked with.” If Breena wasn’t on one side of the desk and Hildebrand on the other, she’d be kicking her to get her to shut up right now. “You’re the hopeful end story I tell newly diagnosed people about…”

“But…” Jimmy says, dryly. Everything he’s ever said about control is just being repeated back to Breena right now, and everything he thinks and feels about it just got reinforced, by his Doctor.

“But you’re almost forty, Jimmy. You’re getting older, and everything slows down, works less effectively as you get older. And I know you don’t want a device. We’ve been over that, but given what you’re telling me, it’s time for, at the very least, a continuous glucose monitor.”

“Fine. Tell me about it.”

She gets the pod out of a box and shows it to him. “It’s about the size of your thumb tip and goes on your arm or leg. Little sensor goes under the skin. You’ll have to replace the sensor at least once a week. It uses bluetooth or wifi, depending on what sort you get, to hook into a device that lets you see the readouts and calibrate everything. It sends you an alarm whenever your glucose starts to shift too much. If you get an integrated model, along with an insulin pump, it’ll increases your insulin when your sugar drifts up. You’ve got to test normally twice a day to make sure it’s still calibrated properly. But, once you’ve got it set and mastered, you’ll be able to tell how everything effects your sugar levels. What you eat, how you exercise, how much rest you get, all of it.”

Jimmy nods; that would be useful. Make it easier to find what’s booting him out of the sweet spot. Tim and Abby could have little data orgasms reading his charts, and Allan can stop hovering over him like he’s on life support. His eyes roll at that, too.

Hildebrand glances at his numbers. “Everything I’m seeing is about low sugar, so… If you don’t want a pump, I’m okay with you skipping it, for now.” Jimmy shoots another look at Breena, who nods, just a hair, acknowledging that he may have something with his interpretation of what’s going on. “That side of this seems like it’s just fine with what you’re already doing. But, you need to know what’s going on with your sugar, why it’s dropping so fast, and put a monitor together with a daily journal, and you’ll have a much better shot of figuring that out.”

“Yeah.” His voice is still dry. She’s not wrong.

“That said, I’d like to see you get an insulin pump, too. An integrated model will do a better job of keeping you where you need to be, and you’ll need less insulin in the long run because it’ll do a better job of just nudging your level. I know you don’t like the tubes, so get a pod.” And apparently knowing that this was likely her one shot at pulling this off, she pulls out the exact model of insulin pod that works with the glucose monitor she just put on her desk. Abby’s note said, “Be ready” and boy is she. “Pop the pod on once every three days. Put the monitor on once a week. Test your sugar twice a day to calibrate, and you’re done. This is it, as close as we can get you to a functional pancreas without getting into the islet cell replacement therapies.”
They’ve been over that, before, too. Which is actually something Jimmy would prefer to a bionic pancreas. And he knows that by the time they’ve got them ready for human trials, he’ll likely be too old to be a candidate.

“Fine. Just… Do it.”

“Both?”

He hears the Doc say, “Jimmy, this is a good thing. Seriously, long run, this is so much better for you.”

He doesn’t respond to that.

---

Jimmy sighs, staring at what looks like McAbby Home-Ec Hell.

Yes, it’s better than the setup that was in the box with the pods.

No, it won’t torture his skin.

He’d still prefer not to be contemplating it.

It is a collection of arm, thigh, and waistbands. They’re soft, stretchy fabric, repurposed from bike shorts and yoga leggings. The fabric is designed to breathe, get sweated through, and still keep you cool and dry(er). Each one has a little pouch sewn into it with a Velcro closure, because apparently Tim and Abby think he might need extra pockets.

Tim’s holding one up, looking very pleased with himself. “Come on.” Abby’s grinning at him.

Jimmy’s staring at the one in his hands, nice even seams, the Velcro that’ll close the pocket is soft and supple.

“You two can really sew, can’t you?”

Tim shrugs. “Snow Elf costumes don’t grow on trees. Compared to fuzzy velour, this is a breeze. Okay, let’s try this on.”

“Put the pod where you want it--” Abby starts.

“In the box, on Dr. Hildebrand’s desk,” Jimmy mutters, not quite under his breath.

Tim and Abby pretend not to hear. And Jimmy wipes down the back of his arm with alcohol, waits a moment for it to dry, pinches up a bit of skin, presses the pod to it, without peeling back the adhesive. Abby grabs the armband that’s skin-colored. (They made him ten each, for his arm, leg, and waist, most of them are skin-colored, one of them is black with little skulls, two are bright blue, one is dark green.) She scoots it most of the way up his arm, and just looks at him.

Jimmy presses the button, feels the needle shoot home, winces a little, this is very much not the tiny little needles he uses on himself, and nods. She pulls the armband all the way up, and… It’s like wearing bike shorts, on his arm, that happen to keep a needle in his skin. Besides the soreness from the needle, it’s not uncomfortable. The band is wide enough he’s sure the pump won’t go anywhere. Tight enough it’s not in danger of pulling out. And the fabric is comfortable enough, he doesn’t feel like he’s wearing a pressure bandage.

And, as Tim is saying… “Keep the band on in the shower. When you get out, have one of us give you a hand to keep the pump where it needs to be, dry off, pop a new band on, and you’re ready to go.”

“Or keep it on my leg or waist.”

“Or keep it on your arm or waist, and hold it yourself,” Abby adds.

Jimmy runs his arm through its full range of motion. He can certainly feel the pod. It’s not painless or invisible or any of the other bullshit they try to use to sell people on these things, but it’s also significantly less of a pain in the ass than the pump he had fourteen years ago.

He picks his right thigh for the monitor. It’s smaller than the pod, but has a much longer needle. Compared to the tiny pin prick on his arm for his usual testing equipment, this thing’s a torture device. Supposedly, feeling like he’s got an inch of steel in his leg will wear off and this thing’ll be painless, but right now, it’s not.

The only upside is he’s used to wearing bike shorts on his legs, so the feeling of the fabric is significantly less foreign.

He still doesn’t like it.

It is, somewhat, but only somewhat, satisfying to then dump all of the electronics on Tim and say, “Make it work.”

It’s more satisfying to spend the next two hours listening to Tim curse about how whoever set this up was a fucking sadist who didn’t know his ass from his elbow when it comes to code.

After two hours, during which kids have been fed, and put to bed, and the rest of the evening chores handled, he hears Tim say, “Fuck this!” storm out of his office, and grab Jimmy’s phone.

An hour later, he’s got his phone tossed into his lap. “I hacked the device, ported the ap, and reset everything so it’d work on your phone.” He opens an ap. “There’s your numbers. There’s where you put your daily calibrations in. This one here is so you can bolus extra insulin when you need it.”

Jimmy nods, looks at it, and leaves. He’s thinking right now, he could really use some time with Gibbs.

Or not. He’s halfway there when he remembers that the basement is closed, unless he wants to go to New Orleans.

“You’re still awake,” he says to Tim, three hours later.

Tim shrugs a bit. His night with Donnie, and none of them had a problem with him staying up for Jimmy getting home. Tim watches Jimmy as he steps across the room, sees how he’s carefully placing his feet, and remembers hearing a car pull away.

“You’re drunk.”

“Yes.” Jimmy flops onto the sofa next to Tim, and then jerks his arm back, because that hit it against the sore spot. “Damn thing’ll pump me full of insulin on its own, might as well have a drink, or two, or three, or four. Don’t have to worry about having to calculate my insulin to deal with it.”

“Did you enjoy it?”

Jimmy shrugs. “We’ll see how crappy I feel in a few hours. Since I went low carb, I’ve never liked the way too much sugar and then too much insulin feels. Had a piece of cheesecake, too. In for a penny, in for a pound.”

Tim wraps an arm around Jimmy, pulling him in close. He can smell the alcohol on him. Whatever he was drinking was strong and sweet. There’s a hint of anise in there, too. Probably absinthe. He kisses Jimmy’s forehead.

“Got halfway to Gibbs’ place, but then remembered Mr. Technophobe’s in New Orleans with Abbi.”

“Figuring he’d be more sympathetic than the rest of us?”

“Or at least I wouldn’t have to pay for the drinks.”

Tim smirks at that, kisses him again, and says, “Yeah, but no cheesecake at his place.”

Jimmy’s staring off at the living room wall. “It wasn’t as good as I remembered it. Too sweet, too rich, could barely taste the strawberries. It was mostly just syrupy-goo.”

“Yuck.”

“Crap chocolate sauce, too. Not nearly enough cocoa, and too much corn syrup.” Jimmy stares at the clock on the wall. Seven minutes after twelve, not that late, not really. Later than he’s been out, on his own, not for work, in probably six years. “Drinks were good. They still taste right.”

“Probably why you shouldn’t get cheesecake in a bar.”

Jimmy closes his eyes and lets his head rest against Tim’s shoulder.

“Shouldn’t be getting drinks, plural, anyway. But… what’s the point? It won’t matter.”

“If you mean one or two, even a few more some night out, like the next time the four of us manage to talk someone into watching all of our kids and going out clubbing, you’re right, it won’t matter.
You want us to get a room at the Omni, stay there the night of Gibbs’ wedding, and go wild at the party, have fun! Unless it makes you feel bad. If you mean, ‘Hey, I’m gonna die anyway, might as well sit on my ass, get fat, snork down all the sugar and alcohol and burn through my body that much faster,’ it matters a lot.”

“I don’t know. Right now, it all seems useless. I did everything. Literally. Everything. And it still wasn’t enough.”

Tim doesn’t know what to do with that.

Jimmy lays his hand on his thigh. He can just see the bulge of the monitor under the line of his trouser. He gently flicks it with the tip of his finger. “It’s not the thing. It’s what the thing represents.”
Tim lays his hand on Jimmy’s. “You not dropping into a coma and dying on us one night.”

“Me being sick enough where that’s a possibility.”

“You’re the healthiest guy I know.”

Jimmy laughs, voice black and bitter as Jethro’s coffee. “Except for the fact that you’ve got to literally keep a little box on me 24 hours a day to make sure I don’t fall asleep and never wake up.”

Tim doesn’t know what to do with that, either, other than what they’ve done for him when he’s needed time to adjust his identity, and deal with the fact that those adjustments don’t come easy. He holds onto Jimmy, and doesn’t say anything.

Not all that much later, Donnie’s up, looking for yet another feed. Hopefully, in two or three weeks, he’ll get big enough to shift from eating every three hours to at least one good, five hour sleep a night.

But it hasn’t happened, yet.

Tim’s snoozing against Jimmy, holding him like a teddy bear.

Jimmy gently shoves him over, and gets up to get their son.

It likely isn’t the most surgically precise diaper change ever, but he’s not so drunk that he can’t wipe poop off of a baby.

Breena’s still snoozing when he brings Donnie in. Abby’s on her side, snuggled against their wife’s back, so Jimmy slips in on her other side, gently says, “Hey, food time,” and she pulls out of her snooze.

“You’re home.” She sits up a bit, shifting around, opening the nursing bra and resettling herself against Jimmy.

“Yeah.”

“Gibbs?”

“Wasn’t home.”

“Oh.” Donnie lets her know that she’s not getting that breast into his mouth fast enough. “Shush you. Food’s on the way.”

Donnie gets to it, and begins to suck, mollified.

Jimmy rests with his head against the headrest, arms around Breena. He’s gently stroking her arms as she feeds their youngest.

This feels good. She’s warm and solid in his arms. Donnie’s making happy little mwuf, mwuf, mwuf noises, looking up at them in the dark. His body still likes this. It still knows what pleasure is. It still feels it. He’s still actively enjoying watching Breena nurse Donnie, and if he were a few weeks older, Jimmy would be doing something about enjoying this, or at least letting her know, explicitly, that he’d really like it if she were to develop some interest in enjoying this with him.

He feels her drift off in his arms. First time that’s happened since they had a hard time waking him up. He knows part of it is just being tired. It’s been a long two weeks for all of them. And part of it is she’s not afraid he’s going to drop over dead if she’s not watching him.

He sighs, and kisses her. She can rest again, because he’s safe.

And maybe, in a day or two, that’ll matter to him, too. Probably, in a day or two, he’ll get used to this, and it’ll be like all the rest of it, like daily testing, and the needles, and never leaving the house without a snack and glucose tabs, it’ll just be something he does.

He just wishes it wasn’t.

At Donnie’s next wake up, Jimmy jerks awake, too, and wishes he hadn’t.

He’s not sure if he’s hung over from alcohol or too much sugar. He supposes it doesn’t matter much one way or another.

It’s one thing to take the headache, muzzy feeling, and nausea for a really good meal or drink. But, honestly, neither the booze or food was worth this.

He supposes that’s the answer to ‘Why bother?’ Because it hurts too damn bad not to.

He gets up, chugs a huge glass of water, which makes his stomach rebel, but not enough to make him throw up, downs two Aspirin to go with it, and staggers back to bed.

He catches the looks the next few days. The monitor, under his scrubs bottoms, isn’t very visible. When he’s sitting down, the leg of his scrubs can get tight enough for it to be visible, sitting there, on his thigh. But, especially when there’s someone other than Allan in the Morgue, he’s usually standing up.

The sleeve keeping the pod in place is completely visible. It’s a few inches below the edge of his scrubs sleeve. And apparently, everyone who wanders into the Morgue feels the need to ask why he’s wearing a band around his arm.

He does find out he’s not the only one using a pod and monitor. But it’s not exactly comforting, or comfortable, to chat with Dornie’s second-in-command about the various merits of one pod versus another.

Thanksgiving Wednesday.

He’s trying not to mope. He really is. He’s gotten through dinner, helped put kiddos to bed, kept a not too painfully fake smile on his face, and has been helping with prep-work for tomorrow’s feast.
The whole crew is coming, and usually, he’s in an awfully good mood when that’s true.

And maybe if this wasn’t a holiday that was all about consuming mass quantities of food, the one thing that requires him to be constantly thinking about, and aware of, being diabetic, this would be easier. Maybe if he were stringing lights on a tree, or carving a pumpkin, or… anything else.

But he’s not. He’s zesting an orange for the cranberry sauce.

Senior (who, with Delphine’s help, will be the first ones to break in their finally furnished guestroom) is next to him, chopping up the walnuts that will go into said sauce, and says to him, "Junior said you got a new doo-hickey. That means you finally get to eat this stuff, right?"

Jimmy’s shoulders slump, and he nods, eyes rolling. "Yeah. Whoopie!"

Senior winces, realizing that he just poked the porcupine, and that Tony’s ‘he’s feeling sensitive about it’ didn’t mean ‘try to cheer him up by pointing out yummy things he can eat now.’

Gibbs sees it. He’s hovering on the side of the kitchen, sipping his coffee, keeping them company. (Tomorrow, when Fornell shows up, that’s when he’ll get his kitchen time.) He puts the cup down, and gently pulls Jimmy out of there.

"C’mon." He leads them to their jackets, and they head outside.

Pitch black sky, bright clear stars, and frosty breath. It’s not quite winter, but right now Jimmy couldn’t tell you why.

"You gonna bite everyone’s head off forever?"

Jimmy gives Gibbs the stink eye. "Only for the next twenty years. I’ll let you keep the title of longest grudge at the world."

Gibbs smirks at that, inclining his head. Jimmy isn’t wrong about that. "And did anything about my record-setting grudge make you think it was a good plan?"

“No."

“And it doesn’t actually feel good, does it?"

Jimmy rolls his eyes, bitch face at Gibbs. "No. But if I had good in my reach, I’d be grabbing it." He shows off that fake smile. He's been hoping that maybe if he just keeps doing it, he'll start feeling it. So far, no luck. "It’s conspicuously missing right now."

Gibbs nods, sitting down on the front step of their porch, knees popping. Jimmy sits with him. Those pops sound loud enough to mimic gunfire. Jimmy looks at him, seeing the glasses, worn all the time now, and he knows what’d he see if he got Gibbs’ shirt off, the scars. He knows each mark goes with a change, something that shifted his life, and his understanding of that life.

"I know, Gibbs. I know. We change. Our bodies shift, and we deal. I know."

Gibbs doesn’t say anything. He lays his hand on Jimmy’s back.

Jimmy flicks the bulge on his leg. He’s in his pajama pants right now, and the monitor is fairly easy to see through the soft cotton. "It’s just a thing. And it shouldn’t matter. But it does. And if I could make it not matter, I would, but… Right now, I can’t."

Gibbs nods. He touches his glasses. "Felt the same way about the first pair of these. Didn’t use ‘em for years after I needed them. Had to be threatened with getting tossed out of NCIS before I bought a pair, and I stuffed it in my desk drawer and didn’t touch it until my next checkup, and then only wore it to that. What’s a sniper with bum vision?’

“You hadn’t been a sniper for years at that point.”

“Exactly. But put those glasses on, and I had to finally, really say goodbye to it.”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow at that, he’s heard more than a few stories to indicate that Gibbs got those glasses years before his last distance shoot. And then he gets what Gibbs is saying to him.

“Oh.”

Gibbs nods. He taps Jimmy’s chest, and his temple. “It’s in there so much more than any of…” he looks over Jimmy’s body, “that.”

Jimmy blinks, slowly. What’s a sniper with bum vision? Unemployed. What’s a sniper with bum vision and glasses? A fucking sniper.

“There’s nothing you want or need to do, you can’t do with those thingies on you.”

“Except not have them on me.”

Gibbs nods, he understands that. He touches his glasses again, his eyes drop to Jimmy’s monitor. “Just a tool. Something to get you what you want.”

“I know.”

Gibbs rubs his back. “Then sooner or later you’ll feel it, too.”

“Sooner or later. How long did it take to get used to glasses?”

“When I realized not having them made me look sillier than having them… Only so many times I could pretend that I didn’t hear Tony calling me blind when I was holding a report at arm’s length trying to read it. And Kate suggesting that maybe I didn’t actually see the bomb… She didn’t know it was just close up my vision sucked. Having to borrow Jenny’s glasses to read the damn report… Just, you hit a point where not having it is silly, and you’ve got to decide if your pride is worth everyone else thinking you’re a fool.”

And again, Gibbs looks at Jimmy’s monitor.

Gibbs keeps staring at him.

“I’m used to looking silly.”

Gibbs is still looking. Then he says, “You’re used to being silly, and looking like those pretty boys Emily’s got hiding in her phone.”

Jimmy snerks a short laugh at that. “Uh huh…” his voice is dry, but he’s got a sense that Gibbs might have hit a target he didn’t want to contemplate with that shot.

Gibbs nods. Then he gently slaps Jimmy upside the back of the head. “You’re still the prettiest. Now go love on your family some. It’ll help.”
Jimmy rolls his eyes, hard, then he stand ups, and offers Gibbs a hand up. He shakes his head, rolls his eyes again, and says, “So you say, old man.”

“Old. Remember that. I’ve had decades to figure this crap out. Once upon a time, I was the prettiest. Then Tony showed up. And he had to deal with Draga taking that title from him. And one day you’ll look over and notice Allan’s getting a lot more attention than you do. But that’s not today, and those little bits of metal won’t effect that, at all.”

He’s standing in their bathroom, looking at himself. Naked. At least, as naked as he gets now. There’s a band of fabric around his triceps, and another one around his quadriceps.

He’s got the feeling that Gibbs may have been onto more than he’d have liked to admit.

Last week, standing here, naked, he looked healthy. Magazine cover healthy. Emily’s pretty boy healthy. Tim’s ‘healthiest guy I know’ healthy

And now he looks like what he is: diabetic.

He’s not in good shape. He’s in good shape for his condition.

He can’t go to the pool or gym and just be the cut guy in the moderately tight swim trunks.

People won’t look at him just because he’s in good shape. They’ll see the bands around his arm and leg or waist, and wonder. Or, he supposes, know.

He’s said this before. Often. Eventually, in every meaningful relationship, and many not terribly important ones, he’s had to say it, but this time it’s different. This time, he’s accepting it, letting it shape him, feeling it sink in, mark him, as opposed to a few syllables to explain a situation and then brushed out of sight as quickly as possible.

“I’m diabetic.”

There’s no massive change. No glorious, oh, everything’s just dandy now, epiphany, but… maybe… that makes things a little better. Maybe it’s starting to shift his perspective.

There’s a knock, and he says, “Come in.” He’s been dawdling in here for a while, and it’s more than time enough to let everyone else in. He reaches for his toothbrush as Breena heads in.

“Hey.” She crosses the bathroom, coming up behind him, wrapping her arms around his waist and standing on tip toe so she can rest her chin on his shoulder.

He turns his face, and kisses her, and maybe his voice isn’t the happiest it’s ever been, but there’s no actual edge of snark when he says, “Hey back.”

“Doing some thinking?”

“Yeah.”

She looks at him in the mirror. “Naked thinking.” That gets a grin. “I like naked thinking.”

He rolls his eyes a little. “You don’t have to do this. You won. I got it. I’m not going to fuss… at least, as much as I can… It’s…” he’s shaking his head.
“Jimmy,” she lowers herself down onto her feet, and turns him so he’s facing her. Then she strips off her long sleeve t-shirt, and her nursing bra, sweat pants, and panties. “Am I still beautiful?”

“Oh course,” it’s out of his mouth before he can even think of anything else.

She smiles a little, kindness, but not happiness in her eyes. “No I’m not. I might be, again, later, but…” She puts his hands on her breasts. “Flabby, empty water balloons, down to the spots that have been stretched out so often they’re crepe-y.” She lowers his hands to her hips. “Bright pink stretch marks.” She has him squeeze them. “At least fifteen more pounds than should be there.” She shifts his left hand, squeezing his wedding rings, making sure he feels their bond, marked in metal, on his hand, and places it on her pussy. “Dry as dust, stretched out, sore, and more hemorrhoids from pushing another kid out.”

“You’re still beautiful.”

She flashes him the bullshit look, and then says, “Do you still love me?”

“More than I ever did. Even with…” and all of these last few weeks go unspoken. “More than ever.” And that gets a genuine smile from her.

“Am I still me?”

“Yes.”

“Do you remember the first time we had this conversation?”

“Yeah. After Molly was born. You didn’t believe me then, either.”

“I know. And it took… months before I got use to my new body, but I did, right?”

He nods.

“And I eventually got to the point where I believed you when you told me I was sexy.”

He nods at that, too.

She turns him back to the mirror, and her fingers lightly brush against each band. Then she kisses his shoulder. “You’re still you.” She holds him for a long moment. “And I still love you. More than ever.” Then she steps back, and gives him a little slap on the ass. “And you’re still one fine motherfucker, and if you’d like to do something along those lines, Tim and Abby are on kid patrol for the next two hours.”

That makes Jimmy laugh. He turns around, and kisses her, soft, and gentle. He holds her close, really close. Donnie just ate, so a good, firm hug isn’t hurting her breasts right now. Though he’s very aware of her leg against his, and how the monitor is almost, but not quite, between them.

“You really want this?” His fingers trail up and down her back, feeling velvet smooth skin, warm and vibrant.

She looks up at him, and nods. “Yeah. You?” It’s been… he’s not exactly sure, longer than he normally goes without sex. With all of this, he just hasn’t been in anything approaching the mood. And they’ve all been giving their favorite porcupine all the space he could want.

He kisses her again, and his body isn’t exactly leaping to attention, but it’s definitely interested in going in that direction, and kissing, wet and sweet, and her body, hot and naked against his is getting “Good. Bed,” she says, taking his hand, about to lead him there. He has other plans. He scoops her up, cradling her against his chest, and carries her, as she giggles, to their bed.

He places her, gently, down, and makes sure the lube is right at hand. The last thing he wants to do is find out that it’s hiding over on Tim and Abby’s side of their rooms. That set, he joins her, lying down next to her, taking a moment to find a comfortable spot for his arm, because when he’s facing her, he likes to lie on his left, so his right hand is free, and, of course, he’s got a device on his left arm now, so he’s got to scoot around some, looking for a way to lie on his side that doesn’t feel like he’s crushing the damn thing.

Once he’s there, his leg is easier. It’s on his right leg, and by slipping his leg over hers, and her leg over his, they’re snuggly entwined with his monitor a few inches below her butt.

She settles into him, sighing, eyes closing. He sighs, too, and lets his eyes close. For a moment, he just holds this. Her, him, both of them touching, relaxing, together. They’ve had thousands of these little moments, and each of them helps him re-center. And right now is no exception to that pattern.

Her fingers gently stroke his chest, and he kisses her forehead. She raises her face to him, her lips to his, and the kiss continues, lip to lip, starting soft, easy, more about sharing breath than touch, but it deepens, opens, moves to a dance of lips and tongues, of wet slide, gentle sucks, and the occasional sharp nip.

He knows not to try to touch her breasts, not now, so his fingers find her ear, and gently trace along the contours, down her neck, down her spine, making little journeys along the curves and dips of her skin. Her hips begin to rock, pressing her pussy against his leg, and his hips rock right on back, rubbing his dick against her tummy.

She might not like those extra fifteen pounds, but they do make for an exceptionally plush spot to rub up against. She’s always been good about keeping her skin silky soft, and with a little extra flub under it, he’s rubbing against something he really likes.

He’s not the talker Tim is, but he knows she likes hearing him appreciate her. “Feels so good. So soft.” He more kisses it to her than says it, half-way between a breath and a word, but he feels the smile spread across her lips as they kiss, so that’s good.

Her hand traces up his arm, the way she often does. He can feel her fingers lingering on the curve of his muscles. Her leg crooked over his hip means she can do something similar with her foot, just over the back of his thigh and the curve of his ass.

Her leg shifts down a bit, foot trailing along his leg, and he tenses, wondering if she’s going to nudge the monitor, or catch a toe in the band, tugging it, but she doesn’t. There’s just the feel of her foot and toes sliding along the back of his leg, and her pussy rubbing against the front of it.

He hates being so aware of the little devices. Hates that he’s focused so intently on not moving wrong, and not rubbing them against the bed, or her, or… whatever.

She kisses him deeper, and says, “Here with me, not off in your head.”

He kisses back. “I’m here.” That gets a little eye roll. “That’s why… Just… Getting used to it, I guess.”

She nods. And kisses him again. “We will, you know? We learned how to fuck Tim without hurting him, and he had a dozen hurt spots on his whole body. We’ll learn how to avoid your sore spots, too.” She slips back from him, enough to get her hand between them, wrapped around his dick, and though, normally if she was going to do that, she’d have moved down his leg, this time she just moved back.

Her hand feels good, curled around him, not stroking yet, just holding him.

“Rather not have to think about it.” His hand finds its way between them, too, nestling between her legs.

“I know. We’ll get there.” She gives him a little squeeze. “And this at least, still works just fine.”

His eyes slide shut. “Yes, it does. And this?” He’s gently cupping his hand, providing a little wave of pressure against her whole pussy.

“You know it,” she says with a little sigh.

And he does. And this too, though they’ve done this dance before, is another moment of adjusting to bodies changing. First few times back at it after a baby sex isn’t like… any other sex they have. Slow, easy, lots and lots and lots of lube. Everything is sore, nothing wants a lot of hard, fast, heavy pressure.

Just slow and easy, more about getting to know the lay of the land again.

He kisses her, and then pulls back, eyes on hers, watching her face. There aren’t words for this, for the feeling between them, and right now, it might not be happy, but it’s real, and matters, and the sex is about this feeling growing with each breath, keeping them cemented to each other, and their family.

She rocks against his hand, keeping up their eye contact.

He doesn’t say ‘I love you.’ Right now words, verbal ones, seem like a distraction, and he doesn’t want to pull anything away from this look, this touch, the feeling of this moment here, between them. He does smile a little, and rocks against her hand.

They stay there, close, looking, not kissing, but touching, letting the feeling, both physical, and emotional continue to build between them.

She’s the one who moves first, gently rolling him onto his back, straddling his hips, reaching for the lube and making sure both of them are slick.

He groans as she slips down him, and she knows that sound, that’s pleasure, not her bum pressing against his monitor.

Once she’s settled, he sits up, scooting them so he’s back against the headboard, and raises his legs a little. There is a bit of a dull ache as her butt presses against the monitor, but it’s not terrible. Just something he’s aware of as they shift into a position they found when Molly was about two months old.

He sits, legs bent a bit, and she’s straddles him. From there she can’t end up accidentally sliding too deep, and he can’t thrust too hard. She snuggles in close against him, face against his neck, and he can wrap his arms around her.

He strokes her hair, hands cascading from her head to her back. She’s got one hand on his arm, fingers around his bicep, and from there, both of them can rock a little, enough to set off slow sparks.
And they are sparking. Wet and slick, hot and drag. It’s only the top two inches of his dick in play, but they’re having a very good time.

He kisses her forehead, “Good on your side?”

She wriggles, and he enjoys it. “Mmmm…” She looks up, and their lips meet.

Slow and easy. Lips and tongue and pussy and cock all sliding gently against each other. Nothing rushed, no frantic movements. Just, long, wet, slow waves of building pleasure. Each stoke slowly, gently upping the sensation.

Glide and rock, wet skin, slick skin, the taste of lips, and the smell of sex, all of it wrapping around them, one soft, slow, easy rock of hips against hips.

His lips on her collarbone. Her hands on his shoulders. Both of them moving, one stoke flowing into the next, one kiss blurring into another.

A little deeper, a little faster, his hands on her hips, her hands twined with his, lips caressing each other, rock, pause, flow, rock again, moving back and forth, hips like tides.

Pleasure swelling, rising, like high tide, back and forth, ebb and flow, but each time just a bit further, a bit closer.

Hitting the mark. There. Shuddering ripples, her body on his. Pulse and spurt, his body in hers.

And then quiet. Breath and pulse and bodies resting against each other.

And for the first time since he put them on, Jimmy’s not aware of his new tech. Not aware of anything except for the body in his arms, the body wrapped around his, and the pleasure and love keeping them bound to each other.

And it’s not a cure. Or a personality transplant. It doesn’t erase the last week, nor will it negate weeks of getting used to this new space he inhabits. But it’s enough, for now.

And really, that’s all anyone ever gets.

Chapter End Notes

Hey guys. So, I know I’ve been playing beyond fast and loose with Jimmy's diabetes this whole story, and had been planning on getting it closer to real before getting to the end of the story.

I don't have diabetes. I do have several good friends who do. Between them and research I hope I did a decent job with this. (All of Jimmy's why I don't want/like pump stories have been stolen from various buddies, for example.) I feel like I found everything I needed, but... The only thing I had a really hard time nailing down is what numbers go with that physical responses. I know 100 is normal. I know below 70 is low. And I know below 45 is start to panic time. Beyond that, I didn't find really good descriptions.

Anyway, I hope I don't have a 'away team bats first" style screw up here, but I might, and if I do, I apologize.
Thanksgiving 2017

Thanksgiving dinner may be an awesome holiday for children, but Thanksgiving morning can be frustrating for their (grand)parents.

At not-quite-four-years-old, Molly Palmer has come to the conclusion that there’s not a thing on this blue earth she can’t help out with. On the most charitable level, this is factually true. She can “help out” with lots of things. Sometimes, said help is even bordering on useful, or at least, not too wildly destructive.

The thing is, Molly comes with an entourage. Namely, Kelly (when she’s paying attention) is under the impression that there’s nothing Molly can do that she can’t, so if Molly’s helping, she's gonna help, too.

And if Molly and Kelly are helping, then Mona’s coming along for the ride.

And if Mona’s in, then Jackson isn’t far behind.

And what had been Gibbs and Fornell in the kitchen, during the wee tiny hours of the morning, getting the turkey ready for the smoker, turned into Gibbs, Fornell, Molly, Kelly, Mona, and Jackson in the kitchen, which is making what, yesterday, had seemed like an immensely spacious kitchen feel rather tiny and cramped.

At any given time, at least one of them is underfoot. The turkey in question, a massive thirty-two pounder, is big enough it’s hard to see around, which makes underfoot more troublesome. And with the exception of Jackson, none of the rest of this crew has been intensively trained in staying quiet.

So, as Gibbs is holding this huge, floppy, raw turkey aloft, brine dripping off of it, and Fornell is trying to tie it into something approaching the correct shape, Molly is offering to unravel the twine for him (she’s being ‘helpful’), Kelly is asking “Why?” (Just “Why?” There’s no context attached to that. Obviously it makes sense to her, and maybe if Gibbs had clear line of sight on her hands, he might get some more context, but he’s holding a massive turkey, and does not have clear line of sight on the tiny person more or less sitting on his foot.), Mona is hovering at the edge of the kitchen, watching the turkey, thinking some intense YUM-oriented thoughts and occasionally whimpering in such a way as to indicate that maybe if Gibbs, or Fornell, she’s not picky, could… maybe… just let her chew on it a bit (She knows she’s not allowed to eat raw turkey, but the humans couldn’t possibly mean she can’t taste it, right?), she’d really appreciate it, and Jackson is bonking Fornell’s shin, because he too would appreciate the turkey getting just a few feet lower so he could get a few licks in, too.

Fornell looks at Gibbs over the turkey and says, “So, grandkids are fun, huh?”

Gibbs looks back, Usually loud and clear on his face. Then he calls out, using his voice, “They are when their parents show up and tend to them!”

This causes Tim to materialize out of nowhere (about two minutes later), looking rumpled, sleepy, yawning, and somewhat abashed. (He is, however, wearing pants, which is why two minutes elapsed.) “You’re supposed to be in our rooms,” he says to the girls, kneeling down, grabbing one in each arm, pulling them out of the kitchen. He looks back to Gibbs and Fornell and says, “If another one makes a break for it, send ‘em back. They know they’re supposed to stay with us until seven.”

Fornell and Gibbs, are able to, mostly, (Mona and Jackson are still eyeing the turkey like it’s mana from heaven) go back to working on the turkey, hearing Tim saying, “We have a clock next to the door for a reason, if there isn’t a seven up there, you don’t get to go out!” (The girls can’t tell time, and only Molly knows her numbers, but they can all see if the hands on the clock match the picture on the wall that lets them know when it’s okay to go out.)

“But they were up, Uncle Tim!” Molly says. (She knows the rule is that she’s not supposed to be out there before seven so she doesn’t wake anyone up.)

“Molly…” Tim’s tone of voice flashes Gibbs and Fornell back to many versions of this conversation, and they both share a smile.

Then they take care of the damn turkey, because, unless they’re on a case, it’s too bloody early to be up and about.

As Gibbs and Fornell are having a celebratory ‘Got the smoker working, got the turkey in the smoker, dinner’s cooking’ cup of coffee, the rest of the family begins to roust themselves for breakfast.

Ducky’s the first of the crew to come out of his room, in his bathrobe and navy blue pin stripe pajamas with white buttons that make Fornell think intensely of his own father.

“When’d you get in?” Gibbs asks, as he passes a cup of coffee toward his old friend.

“Later than I care to admit.” Ducky wraps his hands around the coffee, inhaling deeply, before lifting it to his lips to sip. “Traffic was disastrous between Baltimore and DC.”

Fornell nods. “Been getting more of that lately. I think it’s a sign people are starting to come back.”

Ducky thinks about it. “That could be. We went for a year with only a ghost of the local population here, and enjoyed the lack of traffic with it.”

“Had to be some silver lining to go with that cloud,” Fornell says. Then he thinks about it, and what he’s been seeing, and what Ducky didn’t say. “That’s not it, is it?”

Ducky shakes his head. “It is unlikely that that’s true. We won’t have a proper census for at least another year, so it could be, but, it’s more likely that lack of road maintenance is starting to result in accidents.”

Gibbs winces. “No money?”

“Not for anything that doesn’t absolutely have to happen last year.”

Both Gibbs and Fornell wince at that. Ducky takes another sip of his coffee. “Tell me about Jimmy.”

Fornell raises an eyebrow; he can tell from Ducky’s voice that something is up. Ducky missed most of the drama by not being in DC, but he’s been getting updates, and, more tellingly, lack of updates. Jimmy’s very good about sending a short email or two a day, and he’s gone silent this last week.

Fornell missed all of it by not being part of the immediate family.

Gibbs explains, and finishes up with, “He’s feeling fairly low, and trying not to.”
Ducky nods. He may not have any great words of wisdom for this, but he also doesn’t think any would help. He does think having some quiet time with a good friend, possibly doing nothing even remotely related to what’s been distressing Jimmy may help.

And he intends to be that good friend.

Jimmy wakes up feeling a bit less like the emotional equivalent of a lukewarm turd floating in a swimming pool, and maybe a bit more like the guy whose job it is to clean up said turd.

Which, he supposes, is progress.

He rubs his eyes, and sits up. They let him sleep in this morning. He’s the only one in the bed, or the room for that matter, so at least they’re getting comfortable with the idea that he can be left alone for more than a minute or two on his own without dropping over dead.

He supposes that’s progress, too.

Like any other morning, as soon as he’s got his glasses on his face, he reaches for his testing equipment. He pokes himself, and check to see his blood sugar level. He’s on par with where he should be after no food for six hours. The ap on his phone says his glucose monitor agrees (more or less, it’s a few minutes off of his blood tests) with his results, so he munches his first snack of the day, tells his ap that he intends to do some yoga, so it figures out how much extra insulin to give him, and then he’s just… done.

Which feels a little weird.

He eyes the bedroom floor. He told the ap he was going to exercise. The pod’s giving him more insulin because of it. He can’t exactly feel it, probably, he’s not sure if there’s a slight vibration on his arm letting him know it’s doing something, or he’s imagining it, but, if he doesn’t get moving, he’ll regret it, so…

Yeah…

Yoga.

Which he does every morning. Except he hasn’t since they put the monitor and pod on him. Probably because he was feeling hungover Tuesday morning, sulky Wednesday, and today’s Thursday.

He stands next to their bed, wiggling a little, stretching his toes out, curling them in the plush carpet next to the bed, trying to get into the right mindset for this. Blank, loose, turned in on himself, focused on his breath. He’s had easier times settling in, and harder ones. He’s not exactly par for the course, but he’s not too far in the weeds, either.

He’s fairly sure today’s not going to be much of a workout. Sometimes he can’t get to the part of yoga that involves moving. The first week of practice after they lost Jon all he did was stand there and breathe, work on letting his mind go quiet. And it took that full week, and a few days besides, before he could do anything past that.

And if all he does is stand here and breathe today, then that’s all he does.
But eventually, his mind does shift. He feels his body soften, the ease and relaxation of existing within the in/out of his breath loosening joints and muscles, and from there he starts to move.

He’s surprised that his thigh, which hurt a hell of a lot more when it came to insertion is basically unaware of what he’s doing. Bend, twist, all of his weight on his right leg, no problems. His arm, not so much. It’s not horrible pain, but he’s aware of it. Just a dull, pulling sensation when he moves his arms in certain positions. Once he’s still, it vanishes, but shifting from one position to the next, he can feel it.

So, he’s not able to go as deep, and as relaxed as he’d like to have been, but even with that, he thinks he’s better for the yoga than he would have been without it.

Post-shower time threatens to be annoying, because he put the insulin pod on his arm, and he can’t hold it there, and take his band off, and dry off at the same time. Yes, it’s true that many weekday mornings there’s someone else within easy range of him, but he’s on his own now. As he’s staring at the towel on the towel rack, and the insulin pump under the armband, the puddle on the shower rug at his feet getting larger by the second, it occurs to him that it’s Thursday, and he’s got to put a new one on today anyway, so…

Off it goes, and he enjoys that as he dries himself off. There is a little red spot on his arm, but it’s looking way better than the cuts he had after using the pump. A little Neosporin and a day or so, and it should be all healed up.

Time to decide where to put the next one. He can do the backs of his arms, his belly, his butt, his low back, and his thighs. He decides to try his low back, because that’s the one spot that he can reach for himself and he doesn’t routinely want to have someone/thing pressed up against.

It’s not ideal. He’s got to reset it when he realizes he’s got it right at where his pants waistband normally goes, but on the second try he gets it somewhere less annoying.

And from there, it’s time to face the day.

“So, who all is coming?” Senior asks as he sips his morning coffee, nibbling a croissant.

“There’s the core family,” Penny says, adding milk to her morning tea. “All of whom are here.”

“And Tom and Lynne,” Ducky adds.

“And last I heard their girls and their families are coming, too,” Penny replies. “Sarah, Glenn, and Nick, as well. So, as much as there’s a clan McGee, almost all of them are coming today.”

“All of the great-grandchildren,” Senior says with a smile. “It’ll be good to get all the cousins together.”

“Hopefully for years to come, too,” Ducky replies. “I believe Leon and his family is coming, too.” Ducky notices Jimmy moving through the kitchen, grabbing his own coffee, and helping himself to some scrambled eggs, and decides that today would be an excellent day to act as if this is any other morning at the house, so he just pulls out the chair next to him, not even breaking meter of his voice, and continues on, while still letting Jimmy know there’s a place for him at the table. “Along with Jethro’s friend, Bleach, and his wife.”
Jimmy sits down.

“We’re going over the guest list. Is Samuel going to be joining us?” Ducky asks.

Jimmy drinks his coffee, munches a quick bite of his eggs, and then says, “I’m not sure. He’s mentioned wanting to see you and Penny again.” Penny smiles at that. Sam’s a good letter writer, and she enjoys her semi-weekly updates from him. “His friend Sarah is in town, and they have some nebulous plans. I told them that everyone was welcome, and they could certainly join the fun if they wanted to, but that it wasn’t a mandate or anything. He said he’d check with her, and they’d see how they were feeling. He’ll likely text me later today.”

Senior glances at him, and says, “Samuel… The blond? Your partner in the cannonball championship?”

“Yes. Dr. Allan. My partner in the field, too.”

“And Sarah’s his friend? Is this part of millennials not liking to admit they’re in relationships, or are they just buddies?” Senior asks.

Jimmy thinks through how to answer that. “You know how people sometimes say, ‘It’s complicated’ when they’re talking about relationships, and what they mean is ‘I don’t want to talk about it’?”

Senior nods.

“Okay, when I tell you that Sam and Sarah is complicated, it’s not that they don’t talk about it, it’s that it’s legitimately complicated, and that’s all we need to say.” Jimmy eats another bite of his eggs, watching Senior, and thinking about how he generally socializes with people. “Though, if you could maybe not flirt with her, that’d likely be a good thing.”

Senior seems to think about it for a heartbeat or two before saying, “Jimmy, that’s like asking me not to breathe. It’s part of being a DiNozzo.”

“Girls like it when I flirt with them. Make’s ‘em feel pretty!”

Jimmy’s not sure where the bounds are when it comes to identifying someone who’s out in regular life, but not to Senior, so he’s looking at Penny in a sort of mute cry for help, and she just keeps looking back at him, utterly unhelpful, waiting to see how he’ll handle Senior.

“Not all girls want to be pretty to the 85-year-old guy, Dad. Some of them think it’s creepy.”

Senior looks appalled at the idea that him flirting with a twenty-something could possibly be creepy.

Jimmy sighs, feeling saved by Tony, who’s also joining them at the table with a cup of coffee in his hand and Dave in his lap. He rapidly shifts topic. “Any of your team?”

“Not this year. We’re off until Tuesday. Really off. Not on call. Not on back up. Got permission to break three. So Draga’a got Kevin and going up to Maine to visit his parents. Johnson’s back in Pittsburgh with her family, and Spader got himself a ticket to Vegas.”

“What’s he doing there?” Penny asks.

“I didn’t ask, don’t want to know, and have been told that whatever it is, we’ll never hear of it.” Tony says with a smirk. “He did leave me with a check for five grand on the off chance I need to bail him out, though.”

The rest of the crew chuckles at that. Tony asks, “And do we have the Slater clan?”

“Some of ‘em. Ed, Jeannie. She’s coming early. The last time she saw Fornell, they dreamed up this idea of Italian macrons. They’re going to do some sort of cooking thing involving amaretti cookies and mascarpone.” Senior perks up at that, joy beaming off of him. Italian macrons sounds right up his alley. “Uncle Wes and Aunt Crissy. Amy and Collin. Christine has a new boyfriend, and she decided that bringing him to this shindig was a much better way to gently expose him to the family, rather than dropping him headfirst into Sunday supper with the Slaters.”

Abby sits down with them, keeping an eye on the kiddos playing in the living room. “So we are meeting the infamous Alexi?”

“That’s the last I heard of it.”

“Alexi.” Tony asks, “Why have I heard that name before?”

“Breena’s mentioned him. He plays for the Nationals. This’ll be the first one Ed likes,” Abby replies.

Jimmy shakes his head. “He could own the Nationals, and he’s not going to be good enough for Ed.”

Abby shakes her head. “He’s gonna like this one.”

Jimmy rolls his eyes and wishes Collin were here, because there’s exactly one other guy who’ll really get the depth of that eye roll, and it’s him.

Officially, dinner begins at four. Unofficially, especially if you intend to cook, dinner begins whenever you get to the house.

So, round about 9:00, people start coming over.

Jeannie, on her own, is the first of the crew to make it. Ed and Christine are covering today’s funerals (only two) and will be joining them closer to meal time.

As she walks in, lugging a bag full of ingredients, which Wendy Fornell snags from her, she sees the assorted McPalmozo kiddos on the floor, playing (or as close as a collection of infants and toddlers get, they’re more or less inhabiting the same general space), and says to her daughter when she comes over for a hug, “There’s a lot of memories of you and your cousins.”

“Gramma!” Molly hears Jeannie’s voice and comes tearing over. A second later Kelly does, too, also calling Jeannie “Gramma.”

Jeannie raises an eyebrow to Breena at that, and Breena says, “As long as you’re fine with it, I don’t think anyone else minds. They’re both calling Gibbs ‘Uncle Pop’ these days.”

Jeannie smiles at that, lifting both girls into hugs. “I remember you and your cousins calling your Dad and Uncle Wes UncleDad a few times when you were little. It took a while to get all the names settled.”
By that point, Anna has also noticed that something is going on, and she ambles on over, raising up her hands and saying, “Up!”

Jeannie puts the two older girls down and picks up Anna. “Happy Thanksgiving.”

Anna doesn’t exactly respond to that, but she does snuggle in on her grandma, who, carrying her, heads over to the three youngest McPalmozos, all of whom are in the not-walking-yet phase of life and are hanging out on a blanket with Tim. Each of the boys gets a hug and a kiss (and so does Tim).

Wendy finishes putting amaretti ingredients in the kitchen, and rejoin them. “Tobias and Jethro were up at 5:30 turkey wrangling, and both of them went back to bed around 7:00.” As she’s saying that, Jeannie gets hugs from Senior and Ducky and Penny. Jimmy waits his turn, and when he gets his hug she gives him a gentle smile and an extra squeeze.

“There’s plenty of coffee and some breakfast stuff in there,” he tells his mother-in-law. “Feel free to grab a bite.”

There was a time when getting up at o’dark thirty was Gibbs’ idea of a good time. A time when dark, quiet morning was something he appreciated.

Or at least didn’t mind too much.

That time is not now.

And having gotten up at o’dark thirty to turkey wrangle, he’s very much enjoying having gone back to bed, where there was a lovely, warm, sleeping woman, and snuggling back under the blankets with her.

There was never at time when Abbi Borin loved getting up at the ass crack of dawn. Probably because, for as long as she can remember, she had to get up and tend to cattle at that time. And today, she doesn’t have to.

Which she is enjoying immensely. She woke up just a bit when Jethro got out of bed, and sort of, half-dreaming, noticed when he got into bed, but at least here, at the house, she doesn’t have to get up before noon if she doesn’t feel like it, and especially after a week of shadowing the morning shift in New Orleans, she doesn’t feel like it.

So, right now, as people begin drifting over to their home for the Thanksgiving feast, both of them can tangle under warm covers, high above the party on the third floor, and enjoy a lazy, sleepy, morning.

Tom and Lynne McGee, along with their older daughter, Nichole and her husband Daiki, and their eight-year-old daughter, Akiri, and their younger daughter Geena and her husband Robert, and their kids, James, six, and Mandy, three, all show up a little before lunch.

It feels a little bizarre to Tim to get introduced to his cousins. He thinks he met Nichole at Nelson’s funeral, but he’s not sure about that, and he’s not about to ask her, ‘So, how old are you?’ because if he did meet her then, she was a baby/toddler.

And, not long after Nelson died, Tom took the job that moved his family to Japan. He knows for a fact that he’s never met Geena, nor the husbands, or any of the three little guys adding to the bustle and noise at their place.

It doesn’t feel bizarre to see how pleased Penny is to have this many of them in one spot.

About an hour later, Sarah, Glenn, and Nick get in, too, and it occurs to Tim that this is the highest concentration of McGees in on spot, pretty much… ever. He supposes Nelson’s funeral was the last time this many of them were all in one place, and back then, more than half of them weren’t born.

When Sara and Glenn get in, Penny gets everyone corralled into the living room in front of the fireplace, all bunched around her and Ducky, and tosses Delphine DiNozzo her phone. “Get a picture of all of us?”

She grins as she’s about to do that, making sure they’re all in the frame, but just as she’s about to snap Penny says, “Wait up. Jimmy, Breena, come on, get over here! Jethro, Abbi, stop hiding. Come here.” By that point Tony and Ziva have figured out this is going to be Penny’s whole clan, so they’re heading over with Dave, too.

It takes a few shots to get one where everyone is more or less looking in the general direction of Delphine with the camera. But, eventually, there’s a picture of Penny with her husband, her son, four of her grandchildren, all of their spouses, nine great-grandkids, and the plethora of family they picked up along the way.

Once Delphine’s got the shot, Penny takes it, pops it into her photo editing software, draws a little arrow next to Tom and writes “Christmas, 2017, you guys go here!” and then sends it to her son, Mike.

Next months, she’s having dinner with all of her kids.

“Do I just let him out?” Lynne McGee asks Penny as Jackson stares up at her, and then trots to the front door, and stares at her again.

“Jackson?” Penny says. And then adds, “There’s a doggie door in the back that he knows how to use. What do you want?”

Jackson recognizes his name, trots over to Penny, and then starts to head back to the door. She follows him, wondering what’s up, and when they’re a few steps away, they hear the knock followed by the sound of the door opening.

Penny looks down at Jackson, and says, “You heard the car in the driveway?”

He gives her a little yip, and a second later, he trots over to say hello to Kayla Vance, as she steps in the door, the rest of her family slightly behind.
Tim’s been having an awful laid back Thanksgiving. He’s not cooking anything this year, so he’s been staying clear of the line of people flowing into and out of the kitchen (other than heading over for coffee refills).

Because he’s not cooking, he’s been doing a lot of baby duty. Molly, Kelly, and Anna are pretty much free to roam, which they’ve taken advantage of by mostly hanging out in the kitchen, ‘helping’ by making sure that everything tastes okay. Or by playing with their cousins/showing them around. Last he saw they’d all vanished off into the nursery to likely throw things around, bounce all over the place, and break things, but as long as they aren’t doing it right in front of him, he’s fine with it. Okay, not really, but… He’s got babies, one of the seven other parents of this crew can be paying attention to older kiddos.

That leaves him, in the living room, with three (four, once Nick shows up) little guys.

Technically they’re all ‘infants,’ but infant covers a lot of ground.

Sean McGee’s six weeks shy of a year. With the exception of the side of his head where he got the implant, he’s got a full head of fine blonde hair that’s about an inch long. His eyes have already shifted to their final color, and just like his big sister, they’re a light green. Somedays, they’re more yellow, like Abby, some days more blue, like Tim, but no matter what, they’re definitely green. He can sit up, pull himself into a standing position, scoot a bit (he still doesn’t crawl or walk, yet), and chew on ‘solid’ (mostly a handful of Cheerios/some basic fruits) foods, and has some very definite preferences for which toys he’s going to be playing with. He’s aware that his cousins are nearby, but besides Tim (or any other adult who picks him up) he doesn’t care much about other people.

Dave DiNozzo’s getting onto eight months. He sits up, but isn’t scooting or standing. Right now, he’s laying on his back, feet in the air, grabbing at them, and tipping himself over when he catches them. He’s got a full head of curly black hair, and his eyes are somewhere between dark blue and brown. Like his Daddy, he “talks” all the time, though no actual words are coming out, yet. Like Sean, he’s aware that there are other people/babies here, but unless one of them is directly interacting with him, he couldn’t care less about them.

Nicholas Holland is three months old. He’s got big, murky blue eyes, a tiny wisp of dark brown hair on the top of his head, a little fringe of it around the edges of his head, and most of the time, he just lays there, kicking his little hands and feet. Pretty much he’s a squirmy pillow that coos, cries, and poops. Which is exactly what a three-month-old is supposed to do.

And, at not quite two months old, Donnie Palmer rounds out the group. He’s got a fine dusting of light blonde hair, very blue eyes (light blue eyes. Unlike the rest of this crew, his eyes are not the dark murky blue that eventually turns into brown or green. Tim’s fairly sure that by the time he’s a year old, Donnie will clearly have Breena’s blue eyes.), and is very intensely sucking away on his pacifier. Like Nick, he’s not up to much yet. He lays on his back. He lays on his front. He’ll wiggle and coo and squirm, but he’s not working on figuring out how to go get that stuffed doggie that Kelly’s carrying around the way his cousin Sean is. He’s not yet capable of even seeing said doggie, because it’s on the far side of the room. He is able to see the tiny doggy that’s next to him, licking his face, and he’s making some pleased sounds as Jackson “kisses” him. (For about a moment, until Tim, who’d been paying closer attention to Sean, who is holding each of his thumbs and using them to practice standing, hears the lapping sound, and quickly sets Sean down before scooping Jackson up in one hand saying, “Jackson, yuck! Stop slobbering on the babies.” And setting him down on the far side of the blanket they’re all “playing” on.)
And while it’s true that in terms of physical exertion, looking after four infants, none of whom can crawl yet, isn’t exactly taxing, and it’s not exactly like he’s all on his lonesome, various adults come visit with him, and the boys, Tim is beyond pleased to see naptime roll around.

“Look who’s up!” Fornell says.

Gibbs shrugs a bit. He’s been up for about an hour, and it’s taken him that long to get from the staircase that leads upstairs to his rooms across the living room to the kitchen, where Fornell, Wendy, and Senior are making cookies.

Good looking cookies. Gibbs threads his way in, moving past a whirring mixer, kissing Jeannie on the cheek as she’s drawing circles on a piece of parchment paper, saying ‘Hello’ to Senior, and Vance, who’s standing next to the oven, putting his and Lara’s contribution to the feast (cornbread muffins) in to cook.

Coffee in hand, Gibbs circles back around to the counter, where he can hover near the conversation, but not be in the way of the cookie production team.

Though, as he’s circling, he notices that it does look like some of those little guys are done, and they smell amazing, and they’re just sort of sitting there on the cooling tray, and he can imagine how good little puffs of almond meringues filled with marscapone and cream would be with his coffee and before he’s really thinking about it his hand is drifting in the direction of those—

Thwack!

Fornell whacks him on the back of the hand with his spoon. “You want to test ’em out before dessert, you gotta help make them.”

Gibbs shrugs at that. He looks around, sees that Senior, wearing his Kiss the Cook apron, (Of course he’s got a Kiss the Cook apron. Like his collection of mistletoe sprigs, that’s just part of his holiday routine.) spooning small blobs of dough onto the parchments that Jeannie’s been marking, and figures he can spoon cookie batter with the best of them.

So, he pulls up a spoon and a parchment paper, and gets to it.

As he’s spooning, Jeannie and Fornell are talking about Italy, and how finally Fornell’s got enough time off to go and take Wendy, and how next week they’re heading off, and they’re going to visit half a dozen small towns all up and down the western coast, and how he cannot wait to get going. Jeannie’s telling him about places he’s got to see, and Senior is adding his own bits as well.

Gibbs is only half listening, he’s heard these travel plans before, and doesn’t expect to ever get to Italy, so he’s not feeling a burning need to know what the best gelato spot in Naples is. He’s concentrating on getting the batter into perfect little circles, because if they aren’t just right, they’ll bake up in odd sizes and won’t make the right sort of little sandwiches Jeannie and Fornell want.

So, he’s mostly paying attention to putting the batter on the paper right, and smoothing it with his spoon, but eventually, he becomes aware of a lull in the conversation, and the sense that they’re waiting for him to add something.

He looks up.
“Honeymoon plans?” Jeannie asks, again, amused. She enjoys seeing how deeply into a job Jethro can get, even if that means he’s not much of a conversationalist while doing it.

Jethro shakes his head. “Home. Been on a plane every week for the last few months, and she’s been doing it longer.”

“Nothing special at all?” Senior asks.

Jethro thinks about waking up with Abbi this morning, slow, lazy, just lying around in bed until they both felt rested, and feeling rested, some sparks started to ignite.

“Got all the special we need at home.”

By early afternoon, Diane and Emily have arrived.

It’s clear that Diane’s happy as a clam, maybe a tired clam, but happy none the less. It takes Tim a moment to guess what’s going on, but after talking with Emily some, he sees it.

It’s not that Emily was ever shy or retiring, or particularly timid and reserved, but it’s also clear that her first two months of college, the first two months of her ‘adult’ life, where she’s been in charge of all of her own decisions, has her blooming.

She’s not exactly strutting, but there’s a definite change.

He watches her move through the room, sees the confidence, and the sense of her own place and value in that place, and he wonders if that’s what Diane was like when she was young. Wonders if that’s part of what caught Gibbs’ interest in the first place.

Maybe yes, maybe no. He obviously never knew Diane before Gibbs, or Fornell, or… any of the things that made her the hard-edged adult he met all those years ago. But he does see that Emily’s off in the corner with Kayla Vance, and both of them are chatting away, eyes bright, ready to take over the world.

It’s naptime, so his girls are down right now, but he knows all three of them are getting extra-long hugs when they get up.

From the dining room, Fornell and Vance are putting the plate with the cookies on the table. Both of them are watching their daughters.

“So, she’s back?” Vance says.

“With her mom yesterday, today, and Friday. I’ve got her Saturday and Sunday, then back she goes.”

Vance shakes his head, exhaling low and slow. “God.”
Fornell nods. “Yeah. Then she’s off again until the day before Christmas Eve.”

“I’m trying not to think about it.”

“I know.” And Fornell does. Besides her first two years, he never had Emily every day, and especially when he was doing a lot of undercover work, weeks could go by without seeing her, but the last five years especially, they’ve had a regular schedule. There are still mornings when he gets up, doesn’t see Emily at the breakfast table, and feels a twinge of just wrong. “How long?”

“Kayla’s a junior this year. Jared’s sophomore. Three years and my house is empty.”

“And they’re counting the days to get out, and you’re dreading them.”

Vance half-smiles. Fornell’s got that right.

“She looks happy,” Vance says.

“She is. She’s having a blast. Right now she’s getting her core courses out of the way, but she tells me she’s interested in criminal justice. Thinking about getting a forensic accounting degree and then going off and rooting out the bad guys with a computer.”

“McGee’ll love that.”

“Oh yeah. Six years from now, when she’s got her masters and gone through the Academy, he’ll have work for her. How about Kayla and Jared?”

“I’ve got confirmation that if she keeps her grades up, she’s got a spot waiting for her at Annapolis. Jared… he’s still hoping for Duke basketball, but…” Vance is trying not to say what he knows is true. “He’s good, but…”

“But he’s not the best kid on his team, and he’s not on the best team in the state, and…”

Vance nods. “And he’s not exactly overflowing with backup plans, either. Lara’s trying to get him interested in sports medicine.”

“Is it working?”

Vance wiggles his hand. “More interest than anything else that isn’t basketball, but he doesn’t have any sort of passion for it.”

“Ah.”

Tony, who headed over to snag a cookie hears that, and decides to go spend some time with Jared. He’s thinking it’s likely important for Jared to hear something along the lines of, ‘It’s okay not to have it all figured out right now,’ along with a side of, ‘It’s also okay not to love books and studying,’ and possibly something along the lines of, ‘Hey, have you met Glenn? He’s a firefighter, and if the Navy isn’t doing it for you, maybe chatting with him would be of interest.’

Ducky’s noticed that Jimmy’s part of the celebration, but also keeping himself beside it. He’s there, he’s got the smile on his face, and he nods from time to time, and will speak if spoken to, but unless he’s with the kids, he’s not really interacting with anyone.
He heads over to where Jimmy’s sitting, on the floor, near, but not part of, a conversation between Breena, Amy, and Collin. Wedding details.

“Can I borrow you, Dr. Palmer?”

Jimmy looks up, surprised. He knows that’s code for some sort of professional conversation, but he can’t imagine what Ducky might need, let alone from him these days. He does know that getting away from the pros and cons of spring versus summer weddings won’t break his heart.

He stands up. “Certainly Dr. Mallard.” When they’re a few steps away, he adds, “What’s up?”

Ducky’s leading them out of the common area of the house, and into his own rooms. When they’re in his library, he says, “I know you used to read several journals on public health issues.”

Jimmy nods, sitting down. “Not quite as many as I used to, spare time’s getting scarce, but I’ve still got a few in my list. Why?”

“Jarvis has asked me what I think about making any sort of public assistance contingent on maintaining up-to-date vaccinations. And, if so, which ones.”

Jimmy knows that’s tricky territory, and starts thinking about it. Eventually, just to make sure he’s on the right track he says, “So, like, no Medicaid if you don’t have your flu vaccine?”

“Possibly. That’s part of what he’s trying to decide. Or no public schooling if you don’t have your MMR, and the like.” Ducky smiles in his mind. Jarvis has had no such conversation with him, but he wanted something to talk to Jimmy about, something for him to think about, something with some complicated meat to it, and this fits the bill.

Jimmy’s thinking. He’s not talking much, not yet, Ducky can see he’s weighing issues in his mind.

For as much as the modern world thinks stiff-upper-lipping your way through emotionally difficult times is an antiquated relic, Ducky’s still a firm believer that, in situations where there’s little to nothing to do, you might as well focus on something else, something where your mind could possibly make a difference. After all, if he and Jimmy hammer out a good idea here, he absolutely can send it onto Jarvis, who is looking for anything he can find to save money for the State of Colombia.

And, with any luck, an hour or so in a quiet library talking about something interesting and complicated, and not focused on Jimmy, will make the rest of the day that much easier.

Gibbs is holding Sean, standing on the back porch, upwind of the smoker. Fornell’s looking at him. He’s got a little hat on, and under his blanket is the hand me down Future Marine onesie that belonged to Kelly first. They’re sitting on the back porch, waiting for the turkey to crest those last few degrees and be declared ‘ready.’

Sean’s hat doesn’t cover all of the scar, and Fornell, curious, pulls the hat up just a bit to see all of it.

“It’s not that bad, not really.”

Gibbs shrugs a bit. He doesn’t think it’s that bad, either. Tim and Abby are both under the impression it’s a mile wide and three miles long.
Leon, who just stepped out for his one smoke of the day, catches that, and comes over, but doesn’t light up, because he’s sure Gibbs will stomp him to a pulp if he attempts to smoke near Sean.

A second later, Tom McGee, seeing a small confab outside, decides to join them. “Are we hiding out here?”

“Nah,” Leon says, also discretely checking the scar. “Just seeing how little guy came through.”

Tom sees it, too, and then nods. “No one’s gonna mess with him when he starts up at Annapolis. Cut that hair high and tight, and a scar like that, they’ll think he’s tough.”

“He’s deaf, Tom,” Fornell says. “I don’t think Annapolis is going to take a kid who can’t hear.”

Tom waves that away. Unless how the game is played gets radically changed, that’s not going to matter for Sean McGee. “If he’s got the interest, they’ll take this one.”

And, as soon as Tom’s said it, Gibbs is sure that no matter what might be true for any other deaf kid, that’ll be true for Sean McGee.

Leon can kind of see where he’s going with this, so he says, “He’s not gonna be on a ship. Probably won’t ever set foot outside the US. By the time he’s old enough for it, he’ll be training to fight with a joystick, a computer, and a mech droid or something along those lines. As long as he can hear well enough to get through basic, no one’s ever going to set him near an actual battlefield.”

Tom’s smiling, imagining it. “Tim and Abby’s DNA, all the tech wizardry anyone could ever want, a million years of McGee service to country… Yeah. He won’t need ears. Just a little desire.” Then he looks at Gibbs, fairly sure where the desire part will come in. “It’ll feel weird to see one of us come out in dress blues instead of whites, but… I guess it’ll be okay.”

Leon grins. “His eyes work just fine. He’ll be sniping from halfway across the planet, thinking of the stories his Pop used to tell him about having to actually go places to do it.”

“He’ll be a… what… twenty-two year old Second Lieutenant?” Tom asks. He could tell you everything you’d ever want to know about getting out of Annapolis as an Ensign; he’s a bit fuzzier on how it works for Marines.

Fornell adds to it. “You’re gonna be his first salute, aren’t you?”

And Gibbs would have to admit that idea tickles him to no end. He sits down on the little wall around the patio, and sets Sean in his lap, and then signs to him, though he knows most of this will mean beyond nothing to Sean, If you want it, I’d love to be your first salute.

Sean coos at him, and then catches one of Gibbs’ fingers, and starts chewing on it.

With the turkey in the house and “resting” Fornell ambles over to Tim, who’s talking with Penny.

He waits a few beats for the conversation to slow down, and when it does he asks, “Any news on the missing hacker?”

Penny lights up at that, too. “I meant to ask about her also… Or about the wider case with her. Any news on how the prisons were doing in general on keeping people inside?”

Tim nods, shifting gears from talking to Penny about what she’s been up to most recently. (Sitihg in “I don’t have any new updates on Heidi. Jimmy had a good idea for how to find her, and we’re fussing with the legal permissions to do it.”

That gets a raised eyebrow from Penny, and Jimmy, noticing he’s being talked about, drifts over with Donnie in his arms.

“The next of kin that never ends?” Jimmy asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah. The IRS completely wiped everything on her. Whether they did it on purpose, or it was a casualty of the Fall, I don’t know, but we no longer have her prints or DNA on file.”

Fornell winces. “That’ll make her Jane Doe almost impossible.”

“Yeah. Leaves us with facial recognition, which we’ve got slowly churning away. Jimmy’s idea,” he looks pleased by the credit, “was to dig up her parents, get DNA samples from them, and see if anyone matches both of them.”

“Good plan,” Fornell says, and Penny nods.

“But…” she says.

“But Heidi is the only next of kin on the record, so we need her permission to dig up her parents.” Tim groans at that. “I’ve got a judge who’s supposedly giving me a warrant for it, but he’s ‘off for the holidays.’”

Everyone looks at Bleach, who’s talking with Gibbs.

Tim shakes his head. “Hasn’t been a judge since the Fall. And I’ve got way too many Congressional warrants coming from you, so…”

“Hurry up and wait,” Jimmy says, gently bouncing Donnie.

“Exactly. As for the bigger issue with the prison system… Mac tells me that he’s, slowly, getting reports in. The upside is most of the prisons he’s getting responses from have all of their people accounted for.”

“But not all of them,” Jimmy adds.

“Exactly. And some of them may be glitches. We’ve got to assume the system doesn’t work perfectly. He’s sending me updates on people who are missing and ‘hinkey.’”

“A lot of them?” Fornell asks.

“What would be a lot?” Penny replies.

Tim shrugs. “Enough to keep me and mine busy for a while. Not enough to devote a full taskforce to it. Say ten people now. More as the full counts keep trickling in. It looks like someone was well enough located to take care of business, or maybe a bunch of someones, there’s no clear pattern in who is missing to pin this on any one person, at least, not yet.”

“So, you’re looking at anything from a bunch of people with grudges took out inconvenient prisoners to yet another grand conspiracy,” Fornell adds.

“I’m really hoping for bunch of people with grudges,” Tim replies.
Sam and Sarah make it a bit before dinner. Like younger people who don’t cook everywhere, they’ve brought wine. Good wine, which Jimmy takes from them, before hanging up their coats and leading them into the fray.

He’s met Sarah before, but this is the first time really seeing her, or her and Sam, in any sort of social setting.

Sam’s in his relaxing at a somewhat dressy function jeans and button down. (He overestimated the dress code here by a few degrees. Jimmy himself is only one notch above his pajamas. Last he saw Tim, he was in his PJ pants and a sweatshirt, though it’s possible he decided to put real clothing on as official ‘dinner time’ grew near.) Sarah’s got on a fairly similar outfit, and they’re holding hands.

Sam keeps eyes on him for a few minutes, checking, and Jimmy nods, saying, “I’m okay.”

“Last I saw, they were in the kitchen doing something to a pumpkin pie.”

“Depends on if you like your pumpkin pie with cinnamon-sugar roasted pecans and bourbon whipped cream.”

Her eyes light up and “Oooo!” slips out of her mouth. She wraps an arm around Sam, and he leads the way to the kitchen.

Half an hour or so later, Senior finds him and says, “What does ‘complicated’ mean to you? That’s a boy and a girl in love. That’s the least complicated relationship I’ve ever seen.”

And, by that point, watching Sam and Sarah, who have been in touch range the whole time they’ve been here, Jimmy understands what Sam meant by ‘the cuddling is good.’

They are cuddly. And affectionate. And yes, if he was one of their parents, and had been watching years of that, he’d be fairly shocked to see them break up. But, as he watches more carefully, the way they touch each other reminds him a lot of how he touches Tim.

Comfort and pleasure, yes. Love and respect, certainly. Sexual desire… eh… not really. Jimmy’s seen and felt more than enough horny over the years to know how that sort of touch looks different than warm affection. Maybe there’s a hint of sexual interest on Sarah’s part, he wouldn’t rule them fooling around tonight out, especially since the wine’s flowing and they’re both getting a little giggly, and he wouldn’t be shocked if they just snuggled.

And really, unless Sam shows up for work tomorrow with a massive shit-eating grin, looking to boast, just the idea of which amuses Jimmy to no end because it’s so far out of character, it’s absolutely none of his business.
Gibbs and Fornell wrestled the bird into submission. They tied him up. They roasted him. And then got him on a platter to rest for half an hour.

And then, because they both know who the expert is, they hand him over to Ducky.

It’s almost dinner time, and Dr. Mallard has the knife in hand, ready to carve.

It’s not like a hush grows over the crowd, but many of them do drift to the dining room table, turned into a buffet laden with succulent treats, to watch as Ducky tidily dismantles the bird.

It takes him about five minutes, and there, where once had been a huge, proud, mahogany roasted turkey, sits a pile of bones, and more interestingly, a platter covered in yummy turkey.

And with that, dinner is on.

Leon’s behind Abbi and Gibbs in the line of people slowly circling the dining table, adding food to their plates.

And, as he’s reaching for another slice of turkey to go next to the stuffing, sweet potatoes, cranberry sauce, and mashed potatoes, he says, “So, come January 1st, when I need to call in a favor from CGIS, am I asking for Director Gibbs or Director Borin?”

Gibbs laughs, just at the idea of ‘Director Gibbs.’

Abbi takes it a little more seriously. They haven’t talked about her changing her name, and she’s not exactly sure she wants to make the decision right this second, but… especially with the vastly amused sparkle in Gibbs’ eye at just the idea of it…

“At least at work, I’m staying Abbi Borin.”

Gibbs nods in approval. “Dad’l be rolling in his grave at the idea of me marrying an officer,” he’s still chuckling, “I’d never hear the end of Director Gibbs.”

“And we would not want to unquiet your father’s ghost,” Ducky adds, slipping in between them to tidily snag a dinner roll. “Besides Penny would like to not be so horribly outnumbered by the traditional set.”

Abbi smiles at that, and nods, but as she’s reaching for the green beans, she is contemplating if, when she’s not at work, she’d like to be Abbi Gibbs.

Given the number of people at this event, (and at this point Tim’s not even going to try to count. He’s fairly sure that every time he looks up, a flock of new people arrive) anything short of a Versailles-style banquet hall is just not going to have enough seating for an everyone-sits-down-to-eat-at-a-table sort of meal.

And yes, the house is big. Yes, it’s been designed to hold a ton of people. It was picked out and renovated with meals exactly like this in mind.
There still isn’t room to put a table, or multiple tables, big enough for everyone to eat.

There are several small ones that different groups have grabbed. For example, one of them has all of the cousins who are big enough to eat (more or less) on their own. There’s another table next to a high chair corral, which makes it easier for the different adults keeping eyes on babies to actually get a moment to sit down and eat.

Every horizontal surface in the kitchen has someone standing/leaning next to it, using it to keep a plate steady while they eat/cut up food for a smaller person.

There are a collection of little folding tray tables next to the sofas and armchairs, so that all of them can be pressed into service.

There are people sitting around the fireplace with plates in their laps.

There are people sitting on the stairs, also with plates in their laps.

As Tim’s wending his way through the crowd, looking for a horizontal surface to plop himself so that he can cut the food on his plate and proceed to eat it, he’s feeling stunned that he’s got all of this family. That somehow, he went from a “team” that’d get together at Gibbs’ or Ducky’s place, to this.

He’s in a house filled with people, filled with children, with voices, happy voices, all talking and bustling around, sharing the food they all worked on, giving thanks for this time together.

He sees Abby on the stairs, and she scoots over a bit, making space for him. He wedges himself in next to her, sitting hip to hip, catching half of a conversation with Kayla Vance and Sarah Sam’s Friend (he doesn’t know her last name) about moving away from home to go to college being an awesome thing, and rests his head on her shoulder for a moment, savoring being here, with her, with all of them, before tucking into dinner.

Jimmy eyes it, sitting there, sparkling in the light of the dining room. Cranberry sauce.

As a kid, he used to love it.

It was his favorite part of Thanksgiving, and every year he looked forward to it, because they only had it once a year.

And, as Senior pointed out, he can eat it this year. (Though, technically, that’s always been true. It’s not that he can’t eat things like this, it’s that he doesn’t.)

He did help make it. So he knows it’s got the absolute minimum sugar necessary to get it to stay together, and the rest of the sweet comes from Stevia. (Though he appreciates that, it’s not for him. The rest of the crew can’t taste the difference, and no one needs the extra calories, so light cranberry sauce it is.)

As he’s circling the table, putting ‘safe’ foods on his plate (turkey, green beans, spinach, olives, salad, nuts) he keeps coming back to the cranberry sauce.

He’s staring at it, thinking… debating. Before he knows it, there’s a little mound of glistening red cranberries on his plate, and Tim saying, “That’s maybe five cranberries worth. Just enjoy them.”
A moment later, he’s sitting down, next to Breena, with Anna in his lap, and he does put a few berries on his turkey, and for a second, after it’s in his mouth, he goes silent, unable to speak as a flood of memories come washing back.

He knows people talk about scents taking them back, but he generally doesn’t have that sort of reaction. Or maybe he’s just not hooked into the right scents. Taste though…

This is the eight or so childhood Thanksgivings he remembers. This is his parents, aunts and uncles, cousins, all piled into the little house in Northern Philly that his grandparents owned. (They moved out when he was 13. The neighborhood was ‘getting bad,’ and Poppop needed more help getting around, and… That’s where these memories end.)

It’s sitting at the kiddie table, wearing the Indian headdresses/Pilgrim hats that Aunt Anna would have them make out of construction paper when they got there. Something to keep them busy while the adults got dinner put together and on the table.

It’s him and his brother seeing who could get more black olives on their fingers.

It’s eating one bite of turkey, one bite of mashed potatoes, one green bean (eaten under protest) a huge mound of stuffing, half a can of cranberry sauce, and a slab of pumpkin pie bigger than his hand with lots of whipped cream.

And he’s not sure if he’s grinning or crying as all of that comes crashing back with a taste of cranberry sauce, that can’t, on any level, really taste like the bright pink jelly that his mom would pry out of a can as his grandmother would be bustling around the kitchen making sure that the ‘good china’ was being properly taken care of.

But it’s close enough.

“You okay?” Breena asks, leaning over to him, stroking his back, accidentally bumping his pump.

He blinks, takes off his glasses, rubs his eyes, and says, “Enough.”

She gently kisses him. “Okay.”

“When does it get turned on?” Lynne McGee asks Abby as she’s got Sean at the kitchen sink, mopping mashed sweet potatoes off of his face and hair.

“Week after next.”

“And then he hears?”

Abby holds up crossed fingers, and adds, “We hope. We won’t know how much he might hear with the one implant, and… He won’t ever hear, not the way you and I do, but the device’ll turn sound into electrical impulses and those impulses will go to his brain, and he’ll be able to respond to sound, and with a lot of work and effort, he’ll learn to understand those impulses as sound.”

“So, like any other baby, just, eleven months behind?” Lynne says, handing Abby another wet paper towel.

“That’s what we hope. That like going from inside” she pats her tummy, “to outside, he’ll be in for a Abby’s been signing this as she’s been saying it. At least, as much as she can, and still wipe off the squirmly little guy who was determined to get mashed sweet potatoes on every bit of his skin he could reach.

“Will you still sign to him?” Lynne asks.

“Probably. Even with the implant, it’s likely he won’t hear well enough to catch everything, let alone most things. So, we’ll sign. We’ll lip read. We’ll ‘hear.’ And we’ll hope for better things to come along.”

Lynne, who’s been standing to the left of, and slightly outside of Sean’s line of sight (he’s watching Abby), strokes his cheek, causing him to glance over at her, startled.

Abby watches that, and says, “With any luck, the implant will be good enough that won’t happen anymore. He might not be able to work out what you’re saying, but he’ll hear it enough to know you’re there.”

“Being able to sense the world around you without having to see it sounds like improvement to me.”

Abby half-smiles. “Me, too.”

“Madam Congresswoman,” Leon says.

“Director Vance,” Penny replies, amused. She’s up for seconds on the turkey, and noticed that as soon as he saw her get up, he did, too. “Are we being formal, today?”

“We are for this little bit of it.” He hands her a thumb drive. “You’ll get a feasibility report on pulling all Federal Law Enforcement into one umbrella in the next few months. That report will tell you it’s a disastrous idea.”

She nods, looking at the thumb drive. “Why do I have a feeling this will indicate it’s a significantly less disastrous idea?”

“Because you always had more than enough brains, and then some. Those are the unedited numbers. I’m not saying they show moving all into one would be sunshine and rainbows, but the formal report is going to show you a shit storm, and this,” his finger taps the thumb drive, “is just a rainstorm.”

Penny inclines her head, taking the device. “I suppose it’s preferable to get soaked than filthy.”

“That’s my take on it.”

“And are you an anonymous source?” Penny asks, a bit of smirk in her eyes, pocketing the drive.

“There’s no point to that. There’s a dozen people who put these numbers together, a half dozen who have access to the finished products, and two who aren’t protecting their turf by trying to kill a re-org. And if Grieg isn’t handing his copy over to his pet Congressman, I’ll eat a landing craft.”

Penny nods. “I’ll make sure this goes where it needs to.”
“Thank you.”

“Little over a month to go, huh?” Amy Slater asks Abbi.

“December 31\textsuperscript{st}, so, yeah.” She’s smiling at her, but generally doesn’t much enjoy wedding chit chat. The wedding itself, that she intends to enjoy, but talking about planning it… not so much.

Granted, Amy’s flashing an engagement ring, too, so maybe she just wants to commiserate. “Got everything done?”

“Besides the last fitting, girl’s day out, and actually getting married, yes.”

Now Amy’s looking at her like she’s insane. “Okay, no way you are that organized. You’ve already gotten the final counts, made sure that everyone’s gotten their tickets/hotel rooms, double checked the flowers/caterer/photographer…”

Abbi holds up a hand. “You want to talk to Jethro.” She points to him on the far side of the room. “He’s doing that stuff.”

“You got him” her eyes are wide as saucers as she looks over to Gibbs, at the fireplace, talking with Ducky and Senior about something, “to take care of that?” Images of Gibbs arranging flowers refuses to form in her mind.

“He’s the retired one. I’m the one who’s in a new city four days a week, traveling another day, and home only on the weekends.”

Amy’s still staring at Jethro, and then looks over to Collin, who’s talking with Jared Vance, Tony DiNozzo, and Glenn Holland about something. Then she looks back to Gibbs. “You trust him to do that?”

Abbi’s looking at Amy like this is a breathtakingly obvious sort of decision. “I’m marrying this man. If he can’t be trusted to make sure food shows up at the wedding, I’ve got no business marrying him, neither does anyone else.”

Amy rolls her eyes. “Yes, of course, he’ll manage to make sure there’s some sort of food on some sort of plate, probably. But the \textit{right} food, on the \textit{right} plates, with the \textit{right} flowers, and the \textit{right} napkins… Aren’t you worried?”

“No.” Abbi says decisively.

Amy’s eyes narrow slightly. Then she says, “You couldn’t possibly care less what sort of plates are under the food, could you?”

Abbi smiles. “Exactly. As long as there are plates, and food shows up on them, we’re good. The things that mattered to me, that had to be \textit{right}, meaning, ‘exactly the way I like it,’ I took care of. The rest of it, he can do however he likes, and that’s fine. I mean, isn’t that how you and Collin are doing it?”

Amy sighs a little. “I’d like him to care about some of the things that matter to me.”
“Like…”

“The right napkins and the right plates and…”

Abbi nods. “Yeah. I think that’s the sort of thing you’re either wired for, or you’re not. It’s my wedding, and I can’t manage to get myself excited about things like that.”

“Hmp.” Amy gives Abbi the side-eye. “What do you care about?”

“For me and just me? The dress. For us… Guests. Making sure the people we want to spend time with could come. The food. We had a blast picking that out. We had fun with the drinks. There’s a coffee bar and a bourbon tasting set up, and the food’s been picked to go with that. Our wedding cake is going to look amazing and taste even better. We didn’t care if the music was live, but we did get a good DJ. So, good people, good food, good booze, good music. That sounds like a party to me.”

Amy smiles a little at that.

“And, of course, the vows. That’s the line between a wedding and a party, right? That’s the thing I’ve been really working on. Honestly, that’s the only thing that has to be perfect. Five, ten, twenty years from now, no one will care, or likely even remember if the napkins were rose or pink or coral, but our vows… They’ll still matter.”

“Yeah, they will.”

“So, you two have a date, yet?” Abbi asks.

“My dad’s rooting for February 20, 2020.”

“Put it off as long as he can.”

“Something like that.”

Gibbs drifts away from Senior and Ducky, over to Abbi, once Amy’s circled away to a different section of the party. He gently kisses her, and she looks up at him, amused.

“What was that for?”

He kisses her again. There’s a lot in his look, but she’s got the idea that he was ‘listening’ in on their conversation.

She smiles at him, and nods, and he nods back, steals one more kiss, then he heads off, searching for Tim.

He finds him, standing next to Tom McGee, both of them talking to someone at the far end of Tim’s phone, so he waits, and eventually the conversation ends, and Tom drifts off to find his wife, and Gibbs gets a moment alone, in the thrum of voices, to say to Tim, “You mean it about helping with my vows?”

“Of course.”
“Good. Saturday?”

Tim’s beaming at him. “I’m game when you are.”

There’s only one of them left.

Just sitting there, in the middle of the table, on a platter, all by itself.

The last of Jeannie’s cannoli.

Jimmy’s hovering nearby, giving it the side-eye.

The first time he was invited to Sunday supper at the Slater house he did his best to be a polite guest while still attempting to eat in a fairly low carb sort of way. He had a lot of salad, ate around the croutons, a tiny bit of lasagna, a spoonful of manicotti, and listened to a bunch of comments along the lines of “Good God man, you don’t eat enough to keep a bird alive, here, let me…” followed by “helpful” relative plopping some sort of pile of carbs on his plate.

This was torture on several levels. First off, Jimmy genuinely adores Italian food, and Jeannie is a great cook. The single most painful aspect of going low carb was saying goodbye to pasta. He could tell by the smell he would have very happily eaten everything on that table, and then some. Secondly, he hates being rude, and he could tell his not eating large quantities of everything wasn’t going over well. And third of all, he had to keep explaining, over and over and over, why he wasn’t eating a huge pile of everything.

After a few hours of it, he grabbed a cannoli, kept carrying it around, eating it very slowly. (As long as he didn’t have a plate in hand, and did have food, no one attempted to offer him more of it.)

Apparently, enough of them noticed him eating it that Jeannie got the idea that he really liked them into her head (and it’s true, he does) so ever since, they’ve always been on the menu. (On the off chance he decides he might eat one again. Just because it’s been eight years doesn’t mean that today might not be the day he goes for another one.)

And, actually, side-eyeing it, Jimmy’s thinking today might be the day.

Unlike the vaguely cream cheese flavored pile of sludge he got to go with his drinks, he knows that little delicacy on the table is worth any sugar hangover he might get from it. And, besides the literally two bites of cranberries, he’s stayed on the low carb side of things today, so he shouldn’t be too far over the line if he were to have a bite or two. (He’s fairly sure that were he to have a bite or two, he could find someone to finish it for him.)

He’s still sort of glancing at it, remembering his Dad snorking them down when he’d bring them home. It didn’t happen a lot, maybe once or twice a year, usually a Christmas-time sort of thing. He thinks more, it might have only been a Christmas-time treat.

Actually… Thinking a bit more… When he was a kid, his dad still delivered mail on foot. He had actual rounds, carried the bag, walked up and down the streets of Wilmington, and gave people their letters. He’s betting that the box with the cannoli was probably a Christmas present from someone on his route. Round about Thanksgiving his dad would start getting presents from the regulars on his route, so… Yeah, probably a gift from someone he delivered mail for.
Jimmy was fourteen when his dad moved from a walking route to a driving route. He was twenty when his dad died. And right now, eyeing that cannoli, is the first time he’s put together how shifting from eat-whatever-you-like-and-adjust-insulin-as-necessary-while-walking-fifteen-miles-a-day-carrying-a-fifty-pound-bag-on-your-shoulder is intensely different from eat-whatever-you-like-while-sitting-or-lying-down-twenty-two-hours-a-day.

In his memory, his father is always a big man. And Morris Palmer was a big man. Tall, broad shouldered, wide hipped, full belly, a big smile, and a big laugh. He was gentle and goofy, and fun to be around, and he could fill up any room he walked into, by sheer personality alone. And that’s most of what Jimmy remembers about him, that he was big. That he dominated any space he was in, and he filled it up with good feelings, warmth, and happiness, and fun.

But thinking more about it, when Jimmy was little, a lot of what made his dad big was muscle. He always had a belly, but when he was a kid, his dad would toss him and his brother around, and he had strong arms and back and legs. By the time Jimmy went to college, there was still some hard muscle under all the flub, but mostly, it was flub, and Morris Palmer wasn’t tossing any of Jimmy’s little cousins around by that point.

He’s holding the cannoli, apparently he picked it up without noticing it, looking at it.

He’s still looking at it, and feels Ducky near him.

“I take it perceptions are shifting?” he says, voice gentle.

Jimmy’s still looking at it. When he went low carb, a big part of that was memories of his dad eating. Morris had a major sweet tooth, loved beer, and would never say no to seconds on anything. The last time he saw his dad eat was the day before he went back to college to start his sophomore year. They’d had a little goodbye party, and he remembered his dad plowing through hot dogs, hamburgers, corn on the cob, watermelon, and then ice cream and cake. Summertime party at the Palmers’. By then he was having a hard time keeping his sugar in line. He didn’t test often enough, and probably didn’t take enough insulin to deal with the food he was eating. Jimmy remembers smelling the high blood sugar on him, but that wasn’t the sort of thing that worried Jimmy because his dad was always so happy. It’s difficult to feel any sort of danger sense when the guy in danger isn’t worried about it. He’d just brush it off, give himself another shot, and that’d be that.

And that’s how Jimmy left for school in August, gave both of his parents a hug, got on the Greyhound, didn’t think anything about it, didn’t bother to write or call home for three weeks, and then one afternoon in September he got home from class, and the light on his answering machine was blinking, and listening to that message from his Aunt Anna shifted his entire world.

He can still feel that moment. He’s sure he always will. “Jimmy, it’s Aunt Anna. Give me a call as soon as you get this. It’s important.” He didn’t know what had happened, but when he heard that last word on the message, he knew his world was about to crack.

“He had to know, Duck,” Jimmy says, putting the cannoli back on the tray.

Ducky’s not entirely sure what Jimmy means by that, but he’s also not feeling a need for clarification. He lays his hand on Jimmy’s shoulder, and offers a gentle squeeze.

He looks across the room, where Breena’s giving Donnie his dinnertime nurse while she sits with Abby, who’s got Kelly and Molly on her lap. Anna and Sean are on the floor. Their Aunt Sarah is next to them, and from what he can see, she’s telling them a story. As soon as Donnie’s done, it’s tubby time and then bedtime for the kiddos.

He’s thirty-nine. Twenty years will put him at fifty-nine. Eleven more years than his father got.

He watches his children. They’re getting sleepy, and beginning to get a bit fussy because of it.

He can feel the anger, the ever simmering rage at his dad for not taking better care of himself, that he probably should have a chat with Rachel about, but maybe not, because that anger’s helping to burn through a lot of the emotional crap that goes with the monitor and the pod.

Twenty years wasn’t enough.

Not when it didn’t have to be that way.

And he’ll be damned if his son’ll be sitting here, forty years from now, angry, because he didn’t do everything he could to keep himself alive, healthy alive, for as long as he could.

If there’s a time that lends itself less to clandestine mucking about, almost midnight on Thanksgiving day, Tim can’t imagine it. The dishes are done. Everyone else is in bed, sleeping the deep, sated sleep of Thanksgiving night.

The only three mice stirring in his house is himself, his Uncle Tom, and Donnie, who’s hanging with them for a bit while Tim walks him around patting his back.

There’s something to be said for the entertainment room upstairs at their place, and that something is: big screen TV and all the electronics you could possibly want. Tim didn’t, in fact, install a micro MTAC, but he didn’t miss by much, either.

So, as he paces Donnie about, patting his back, Tom stands at the ready, microphone on, and they watch as the team, and Walter, get into place.

They hear Karningham’s voice and see him pop up on the screen. Like Tim and Tom, he’s in his casual, at home, mucking about clothing, likely because he’s at home, and they’re talking over his computer. “McGee, why on Earth would you pick now for this? I’m just about in a turkey coma.”

Tim’s about to answer, but Tom assumes he’s the McGee in question, so he says, “Because everyone else is in their turkey coma, too. How’s it going?” he asks his team.

“Almost ready, sir.”

Tim hasn’t met the one who replies to his Uncle, but he knows the young man in question is named Paul Daveed. Once upon a time, Paul was picked right out of Annapolis to join a somewhat off the books operation that was run out of Japan. Once upon a time was eighteen months ago. He’s the youngest member of the team, and is a non-leathal combat specialist. After all, they don’t want to kill anyone on this job.

Sanders’s ready to go in, too. She’s got her computer goodies up and ready, and is planning their entrance.

“Anyone on the perimeter?” Tom asks.
“Only one guard tonight,” Daveed replies. He’ll stroll by the main entrance in eight minutes, be out of sight in another three, and then in we go.”

Tim messes with his computer some, and throws up feeds of the entrance to the corporate park that the IRS storage warehouse is in, and a feed on the door they hope to get into the building with. “We’ve got visual of the entrances.”

They watch, and wait, and eventually, seven and a half minutes later, they see a bored-looking guard stroll past the front gate. Three minutes after that, he passes by a van, blocking his view of the main gate, and in Daveed and Sanders go.

Tim switches up the feed, so he can see what they’re seeing. Mostly ghostly green night vision bouncing around with each step, a blur of shapes, much too bright or all but invisible.

Eventually the cameras focus on a door, and then they’re watching a split screen. Sanders’s keeping eyes on the entry keypad, and Daveed is switching between watching her and keeping eyes on the area around them.

It only takes her a few minutes to insert the scanner, read the right code, and then put it into the lock. Only a few seconds for that lock to snick quietly, and the door to open at her touch.

Then they’re in.

The first time, Sanders went in from the front, doing the normal visitor routine. This time they’re in the employee entrance.

“I see they didn’t waste any budget on the décor,” Walter says, looking at miles of shelves, ghostly in the green gray of night vision, many of which appear to be empty.

“Doesn’t look like they’re in danger of running out of space soon, either,” McGee adds.

Tim’s just watching it. He knows what the NCIS evidence lock up looked like, and he knows what he’s seeing in front of him. His head shakes. “This is what, six months of evidence? This can’t be years of storage.”

“This is supposed to be three different storage systems combined into one,” Walter adds.

Tim keeps eyeing it as Daveed and Sanders move through the shelves, looking for the one with the right number on it. “They’ve got room for three units all in one, just not the evidence.”

It’s a very organized system. Apparently the IRS knows what should be in there. Each shelf has a number on it, and each shelf has areas taped out with other numbers on them, and Tim knows that those numbers go with case files. In some of the sections, there’ll be a box, or two. In some of them, he sighs, hard, when he sees it, there’ll be a few files, charred, blackened, obviously pulled from the burnt out wreckage of whatever was left after the fires. Some are empty.

Tom snorts. “Accountants. They didn’t have the evidence any longer, but they made sure that every single case had a space to keep that lack of evidence in.”

“Maybe they were hoping to recover more of it,” Sanders says, sounding doubtful.

Tim decides he prefers that to any other explanation. “I hope so.”

They watch as Daveed and Sanders keep moving through, and eventually they find the spot. One half-melted thumb drive, and two files, one of which is singed. Daveed makes sure to get copious photographs. They have to prove that the IRS didn’t give them the evidence. It’s also clear, from how small the space is, that the computer that did get handed over to Tim was never on this shelf.

They watch over Sanders’ shoulder as she flips through the files, very carefully, fearful of breaking the pages. Daveed gets photos of each of them, too. “Witness statements.”

Sanders’s nodding. “I guess we know who the anonymous source who tipped the IRS off was, now.” Though none of them recognize the name. Tim’ll make sure they add that name to the list of people to investigate, see if he’s still alive. Daveed keeps photographing, and Sanders tucks the thumb drive into her computer, hoping to copy whatever may be on it. A moment later, she says, but she doesn’t need to, they can see the screen on her computer, “Dead. Fire fried it.”

Tim nods. “Okay. Daveed, finish up with the photos, and then get out of there.”

“Wait,” Walter says. “One quick job. On the way out I need you to find, Shelf 68, Box 352-C, and stick it somewhere else.”

“Reverse the numbers. Pop it on shelf 86. I want them to be able to find it if they really look for it. But I also want to see what happens if they can’t find it.” He mutes part of his feed, and says to Tim and Tom, “I’ve got my first people into the IRS. That’s an active case right now, so I don’t want to mess it up too bad, but I do want to see what happens when my mole tells her higher up the evidence is missing.”

Tim nods, happily, at that. “That’s exactly the sort of thing I want in my reports.”

Walter looks pleased at that, and flicks his feed back over to Sanders and Daveed. They watch them move the box for his case, and then make their way out.

In, out, done, and clean. Less than an hour from start to finish, and no one knew they were there. McGee says to Walter, “And that’s exactly why you do things like this in the middle of the night after Thanksgiving.”

Walter nods. Then he says, “And let me guess, it’s my job to figure out what the hell was in those casefiles that’s so appalling the IRS was willing to take a major obstruction of justice hit rather than give it to us?”

Tim nods at that, too. “There’s got to be a smoking something in there. Otherwise… The case is done. The defendant is gone. The appeal is obviously over since she’s not in prison anymore. So, what did they not want us to see?”

“I’ll get to it, in the morning.”

“Good enough,” Tim replies. He notices that Donnie’s snoozing against his shoulder, and comes to the conclusion he’d rather like to be asleep, too. He turns to his Uncle, who’s wrapping up the conversation with his team, and waits for them to finish before saying, “I think I’m done for the night, too.”

Tom nods at that. “Happy Thanksgiving.”

“Oh yeah. Back at you.”

Tom smiles at that, and half inclines is head. “Been a hell of a year, but I’ll tell you, I’m glad to be back at this.”
Tim smiles at that. “I’m glad you are, too.”

Last moments of the day. (Though, technically speaking, it’s already Friday.)

Tim’s got Donnie down, and has gone to his own room. He (quietly) pulls off his clothing, brushes his teeth, and then eases into bed.

Right now, everyone is sleeping. Breena’s on the far side of the bed. Jimmy’s next to her. Normally he sleeps on his back, but he’s on his side tonight. Abby’s curled up next to him, almost but not quite spooning him. In the morning, when Tim sees Jimmy get out of the shower, and notices where he’s got his pump, his unusual sleeping position will make a lot of sense. But for right now, he doesn’t know what’s going on, but he plans to take advantage of the three person spoon.

He snuggles up behind Abby, and is able to get his arm across her, across Jimmy, and his hand just resting on Breena’s hip.

He feels his body relax, eyes growing heavy, and lets himself be lulled by the small night sounds of the people around him.

His last thought is something Gibbs said to him, a long time ago, shortly after they lost Jon Palmer. “… And you pray, because if you’re any sort of decent man, and I know you are, sometimes you heart is so full of love and thanks that there’s nothing else that makes any sense to do.”

And right that second, wrapped around his loves, in their bed, after a day spent with his whole family celebrating the idea of giving thanks for the good things in your life, he can not only hear those words, but feel them, and more importantly understand them.

And he’s not sure if it counts as prayer if there’s no set god you’re offering thanks to, but right that second, Tim is feeling very grateful and deeply thankful.
Even better than getting up at o’dark thirty, tending to a turkey, and then going back to the lovely, warm, sleeping woman in the lovely, warm, cozy bed is getting to sleep straight through, and then wake up with her.

Saturday begins slow.

Which Gibbs is enjoying immensely.

It’s been almost a year since they first got to spend the night in their room in the house. And in the course of eleven months their little nest up on the third floor has gotten a little more worn, (Yes, those soft, white lambskin rugs looks awesome, until you take into account that you’ve got a big black doggie, and a little brown and black doggie, and since said doggies are not allowed to sleep on the bed, they’ll sleep on the soft, fluffy rugs, and promptly turn them from white to dog-fur colored.) and a lot more comfortable.

The first thing that starts to filter through his sleeping mind is the sound of claws tapping on hardwood floors. They’re the only ones on the third floor, so they generally just leaves the door open. Doggies come and go as needed, and those first sounds are Jackson scampering down to take advantage of the doggie door that’ll lead him outside.

He’s aware of soft light in the room. He’s not aware enough to know if that means it’s cloudy out, or if it’s still early enough the sun hasn’t broken the treeline, yet.

And he’s not feeling any burning need to find out.

Later, it’s got to be later because sunlight is streaming in now.

Gibbs makes a little mmmm noise before snuggling in closer to Abbi. He’s feeling her breathing, the soft up/down of her body in his arms.

This time, his brain starts to wake up, even if the rest of his body is awfully content to just lie here.

Bits and pieces of the world beyond his body and Abbi’s under the blankets begins to filter thought. The sound of snoring doggies comes first. The smell of coffee. He doesn’t know what time it is, but late enough that the kids have started on breakfast, obviously.

Breakfast, coffee… Saturday. It’s Saturday. That means grocery shopping with the kids and grandkids. Tim, Ziva, little guys, little doggie… That’ll be good.

Then home, nap time for littlest guys. Molly and Kelly and Anna will bounce around between the different adults, while the rest of them amuse themselves and deal with whatever chores need to get done.

November… Not too much to do. Grass isn’t growing. Last of the leaves got cleaned up last weekend. No snow on the ground. He thinks they may have gutter cleaning, and making sure they’ve got enough salt to get through the winter once it really comes. Easy day for chores.
Maybe he’ll take the time to do some more furniture sketching. When he and Abbi picked out the furniture in their room, the plan was to replace most of it with stuff he made for them. Over the last year, he’s gotten their bedside tables replaced. That still leaves dressers, the chest at the end of their bed, a few lamps, the bed itself, and the wardrobe.

As he’s thinking through which bit of furniture he wants to design next, another thought wanders through his head. It’s Saturday.

He and Tim have plans for today.

Vow-oriented plans.

With about a month to go, and with the idea of working on wedding vows on the agenda for today, Tim’s coming to the conclusion that he and the rest of the McPalmers need to figure out what they’re getting Gibbs and Abbi for a wedding present.

So, while Gibbs is upstairs, slowly waking up and getting moving, Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena are all up, and in their own section of the house, keeping an eye on little guys, and bouncing around present ideas.

“I suppose travel is out?” Jimmy says.

The other three look at each other, compared to what they’d normally spend on a really good present… Especially if they got Tony and Ziva into it, all expenses covered trip to somewhere really cool would be something they could do.

Except…

Abby’s nodding at him on that one. “I think the absolute last thing either of them want to do is go anywhere.”

That gets some sighs, because cool trip is something that they could just pool some money for, buy a few pre-paid credit cards, and collect some travel brochures, along with a promise of “Tell us when and where, and we’ll make it happen,” and then go from there.

“And they don’t need anything,” Breena says.

More nodding. Everything a couple could possibly need, they’ve already got.

“Do they want anything?” Tim asks. (Yes, they did get an actual invitation to the wedding. He wasn’t the one who opened it, responded to it, or any of the rest of that. He hasn’t even looked at it all that carefully, other than being aware that it’s on his refrigerator.)

Breena, the one who opened the invite, and actually read it, replies. “No gift registry.”

Three more sighs. They understand why there isn’t one. Fewer than thirty people are coming to this wedding, and all of them are very close friends or family. Like with Tony’s wedding, the idea of a registry for this small of a gathering just feels weird.

So…
“Bourbon of the month club?” Jimmy says. “Is that even a thing?”

Tim gets up from their breakfast nook, and grabs his laptop, about to find out. After twenty seconds of google he can says, “Yes. It’s a thing. It’s a lot of things.”

The other three of them huddle around him, looking and find… “I think we’ve got a bunch of our Christmas lists taken care of.” Breena says when Tim pulls up a site that does tasting samples of Bourbon, Rum, Gin, Absinthe (Jimmy’s about to order for himself, but he’s fairly sure the other three just picked out his Christmas present.), Vodka, Scottish, English, Japanese, and American Whiskeys…

Tim’s nodding at that, thinking that they’ll have no trouble picking out liquid presents for everyone this year, but… he’s not exactly in love with Bourbon of the Month Club as a wedding present for the two of them. (Though he’s thinking it would be a good Christmas gift.)

“I kind of want something they can… interact with,” Tim says.

The other three of them are looking at him, and Abby says, “Like, what, a pet?”

“No… Just… I don’t know. Bourbon of the Month is fine.” He clicks it and adds it to their cart. “For Christmas.” He sits there, looking at the picture of bottles of drinks, and scoots around the site, clicking on a Gin set, and a Rum set, and a few others, knocking different families off of their Christmas shopping list as he tries to come up with what he means by interact with. “Something they can do.”

“Tim, I’m fairly sure that you can buy them the X-box, set it, put the game in it, turn it on, and even play it in front of them, and they still aren’t going to be interested,” Breena adds.

Tim rolls his eyes. “That’s closer to what I mean, but… I know that’s not them. Something they do, not just consume…”

The other three look at him, and at his computer, and back at him. “Yeah. I know,” Tim says. “It’s in the cart. We’ll get it, and if I can’t come up with what do means, it’ll be a wedding present.”

That gets three comfortable nods, and then a wicked smile crosses Abby’s face. “Sex toy of the month? There’s some doing.”

Breena giggles happily at that, and Tim and Jimmy groan. (Though, given how Abby and Breena exchanged glances, Tim’s got a feeling what their Christmas… or maybe birthday, since that’s coming up, too, present may be.)

The idea of working on his vows banishes the last of Gibbs’ sleepy Saturday morning laying around in bed with Abbi mindset.

He gets himself out of bed, gently. He may not love getting up when it’s still black outside, but he’s also not the late sleeper Abbi is. Especially not on Saturdays, when there are little people who expect to go visit the Museum of Food with Uncle Pop.

He spends a moment watching Abbi sleep.
There were some things about their wedding that really mattered to her. Like her dress. There were some things that mattered to both of them: food, guests.

And one thing that absolutely mattered to him: vows. Going into this, the only thing he was certain of was that he couldn’t do the traditional church vows. Not again.

He gently strokes her hair, and her face turns to his hand, offering a sleepy snuggle, before he heads to the bathroom.

When he and Shannon married, not only did people, at least people in his part of the world, not write their own vows, the idea of it was something suspicious. You weren’t really married if you didn’t repeat the words the Pastor said.

It was almost like a spell. Magic imbued by thousands of repetitions. You said them, your parents did, so did your grandparents and their parents and… maybe the language changed, moved from French, or German, or Italian, or whatever to English, but the vows stayed the same.

And standing there, twenty-years-old, in his dress blues, he meant every syllable of it with every fiber of his being, with a kind of certainty he’s not even capable of anymore. With the hope, faith, and love that only an innocent heart can muster.

He doesn’t have that heart any longer.

He pads over to the bathroom, strips out of his PJs, and turns the water on in their shower.

He said those words to Hannah, and to Diane, and to Stephanie. And maybe, for a minute, he almost meant them when he said them to Diane, but he knows for a fact they were hollow and empty when he said them to Shannon and Abbi.

In the water, letting it wash over him, he knows he can’t say them again. He can never mean them again, not the way he did when he offered them to Shannon, and he won’t give hollow lip service to the bond he’ll seal with Abbi.

So he needs new vows, and apparently, today’s the day to start figuring them out.

It’s not just the kiddos who like their weekly trip to the Museum of Food.

Granted, for Tim, Gibbs, and Ziva, walking around a supermarket, even a pretty nice one, isn’t exactly an adventure.

That said, their market does have this one part that Tim loves. And he’s noticed that Gibbs and Ziva certainly appreciate it, too.

Between the produce and bakery section is a long line of barrels. Those barrels all have coffee beans in them. And yes, Tim’s aware of the fact that storing coffee beans in barrels, let alone ones with clear plastic tops isn’t the greatest idea ever in terms of keeping said coffee in top shape, but… Good God, that part of the store smells good!

And every week, while the girls sort of toddle around the fruits and veggies, the adults keeping an eye on them drift closer and closer to the coffees, often getting little bags of the different varieties, sometimes just standing next to them, breathing deeply.

Today, Tim and Ziva are having a good time, looking through the beans, figuring out which ones they haven’t tried yet, and packing up small bags of them. Gibbs is giving the selection the stink eye, looking at a barrel with maybe six beans in it. There’s one blend he and Abbi really like, and right now they’re out of it.

Tim sees him doing it, and begins to think, looking over the roasts in front of him. Lots of medium and light roasts. Just about all of the beans he can see are some sort of brown, not black, which is likely why Gibbs is giving it the stink eye.

He nudges Ziva, and quietly says, “He likes it dark but not burnt, right?” (Ziva’s got a better sense of taste than he does. She claims that the stuff Gibbs likes has flavors, but all Tim can taste is burnt.)

Ziva nods, and whispers back, “That’s why you never get him Starbucks Italian or French roast, too much burnt, not enough roast.” (She can count the number of times she’s been smacked upside the back of the head on one hand, and one of them was for showing up with a Starbucks Italian Roast Venti for Gibbs.)

Tim nods back, thinking. He’s not sure what he’s thinking, but he’s got the feeling he’s onto something with this. And then whatever nebulous idea may be coalescing skitters off, because Kelly’s about to grab an orange from the bottom of the pyramid and send them all tumbling.

Kiddos are down. Lunch is eaten. The rest of the crew has moved onto their different afternoon activities. And Gibbs and Tim are in the McPalmer side of the house, sitting at the table in the breakfast nook, with a few pads of paper, cups of coffee, and a couple nice pens.

Tim’s sitting there, trying to be “helpful.” He suggested the same thing he told Tony, just freewrite it. Let whatever’s in your head out on the page.

Gibbs isn’t exactly glaring at that pad, but he’s not having a great time with this. He knows how this feels. He’s got ideas of what and how this has to be different. But words are biting him in the ass here.

They’ve been staring at this pad of paper for what feels like hours. (Actual elapsed time: seven minutes.)

“What’s your first song?” Tim finally asks, hoping it’s got words, and they can get some thoughts moving with them.

“Good one.” He pulls out his phone and brings it up. A brass band cuts through their common area, and Tim lets the sound, and the lyrics roll over them…

“Some day, when I'm awfully low
When the world is cold
I will feel a glow just thinking of you
And the way you look tonight
Yes, you’re lovely, with your smile so warm
And your cheeks so soft
There is nothing for me but to love you
And the way you look tonight

With each word your tenderness grows
Tearin’ my fear apart
And that laugh, wrinkles your nose
Touches my foolish heart…”

Tim’s nodding. “Very good choice.” He fiddles with his pen, writing scraps of lyrics. “Why’d you pick that one?”

Gibbs smiles a bit, decides not to get into what the two of them were doing when it popped up on the random song list, and they both paused, thought about it, and decided it worked.

Tim gives him gentle shove with his shoulder. “I know that look. Okay, what do you like about it?”

And, again, Gibbs doesn’t glare, but there’s this feeling, and that song goes with that feeling, really nicely, but the whole words thing is killing him.

Tim, in a not even remotely helpful gestures, smirks at that, too. “I know that look, too. Try to say it. Even if it sounds stupid, it’s only stupid in front of me, and nothing you’re going to say ever leaves this room if you don’t want it to.”

Gibbs stares at the ceiling. “Fear.” He rubs his hand over his face. “It’s always about fear. ‘Tearin’ my fear apart.’ People can’t… Take your fear away. It doesn’t work that way. Fear’s in you, and… I had to deal with that. Diane and I didn’t work because of my fear. I couldn’t let it go, and it poisoned everything else.” He sighs at that. “Not very romantic. She doesn’t make me fearless…” He rolls his eyes. And Tim gets why he doesn’t think that sounds like the start to a good vow. Gibbs adds this, “But she does make it easier to handle the fear. Reminds me why I don’t want to be trapped by it.”

“Sounds like a good place to start. ‘For you, I will be fearless…’ Something like that.” Tim writes it down.

Gibbs inclines his head and looks at six words on a piece of paper. He’s not sure he’ll keep it like that, but Tim’s right, it’s a start.

“Maybe something about getting older and wiser, wrap that into being fearless?” Tim asks.

Gibbs shoots him a little glare at the ‘older’ bit, but Tim’s not exactly wrong on that front, and it does start to get some actual words flowing in his mind. “Been around the block enough times to have learned a few things…”

“Something like that.”

Gibbs takes the pen in hand, and stares at the paper.

He starts writing, fast, almost afraid that if he really thinks about it, his mind will strangle the letters forming on the page.

Been here a few times, and done this too many. And maybe I did need someone to whack me upside the back of the head with a golf club, but eventually, I got it. I hope.

Abbi, I love you.
But that’s got to be more than pretty feelings. I’ve done the pretty feelings, too many times, too.

It’s got to come from change and lead to change.

It’s got to make me want to be a better man, and it’s got to make me choose to be one, too.

So, that’s it. The promise. I will be the better man. I will be worthy of your love, and your home, and your life.

I will be your partner. I will have eyes on your six. I will defend you, your heart, and your home.

I will cherish you, and support you, and build a life with you that we both adore.

Tim reads over his shoulder, and wonders for a second if Diane’s on the invite list. (He’s fairly sure she’s the one who whacked him with the golf club, though he wouldn’t put it past Stephanie, either.) He’s about to mention it, but his eyes keep scanning, and he decides not to. Instead he says, “That looks like an awfully good rough draft to me.”

Gibbs lays the pen aside. “Good. If I keep going there’ll be butterfly kisses in there, and…”

Tim chuckles. “Don’t worry, we’ll shoot you with the tranquilizer dart and shut you up if you’re in danger of going overboard.”

---

Do. Something to interact with. Something that involves thinking and playing and…

Tim’s listlessly poking around with his internet connection. Breena’s right, what he really wants to get them is an awesome game they can play together and have a blast with, but… They just aren’t gamers.

He spends an hour or two on a sailing site, looking at… stuff. Boat-oriented stuff. Very much stuff. He’s got no idea if Gibbs wants, needs, or could use anything he’s looking at.

And, beyond that, he’s got no idea if Abbi would like any of it, either.

He clicks off of that site, and goes on to his news feed. He’s got his computer set to give him heads up for any sort of news involving cryptocurrency markets, because that’s the sort of thing that might give him a hint about where Heidi Partridge, if she’s still alive, may be working.

A few new stories are up, so he does some reading. The second one tells him that if he wants the story, he’s got to kill his ad blocker, so off it goes. He’s reading up on attempts to regulate currencies using blockchain technology (Much eye rolling, and making a mental note to suggest to Penny in the morning that if she knows anyone in the SEC, that they need to spend a few minutes learning that they literally can’t do what they’re hoping to. And then he spends a moment wondering if this is them attempting to make any sort of non-traditional currency use illegal.) when the ads on the side of his computer eventually get his attention.

Apparently his computer decided he’s interested in good booze and food.

Exquisitely yummy photos are on the left hand side of his computer, daring him to click on them.

So he does. After all, Abbi likes to cook, and Gibbs likes to eat, and maybe there’s something more doing-oriented in there. Maybe… He keeps clicking around. High end cooking classes… Streaming content… They might like that. Make a really nice dinner (or six) together. The kits come with all the food… All they have to do is chop and watch the video.

That’s closer to what he’s thinking with do when a word catches his attention: coffee.

His eyes jump over, and after a few minutes of reading, he’s more or less leaping up, and saying, “Guys, guys, guys!” He’s so excited he’s sounding like Abby, but he thinks he knows what he wants them to give Gibbs and Abbi.

“Look!” he’s brandishing his computer at Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, who cannot, in fact, look, because he isn’t holding the monitor still.

“Tim!” from Breena, her slow down tone of voice gets through to him, and he holds the computer still.

The other three get a chance to read his screen, and see why he’s so happy.

It’s a roast-your-own-coffee kit. It comes with a roaster, raw beans, and lessons.

“Doing! Interacting!” he’s pointing at the screen. “This is what I’m talking about.”

Smiles are spreading among his spouses, too. Abby looks up at him. “You know, by the time this is done, he’ll only drink his own roast, and he’ll know to the second, and the degree, how done it needs to be.”

Tim’s fine with that. “Yep! And she’ll have hers, too. We’ll get them his and hers grinders, so they don’t get the other one’s blend into their own mix.”

Jimmy and Breena are laughing at that. Then Jimmy says, “And are we getting one of these for you, too?”

Tim waves that away. “Not this year. So…”

The other three nod. “Yeah,” Breena says. “So, each of us gets them a bag of the beans we’ll think they like best…”

And with that, they spend the next few hours looking for the right green coffee beans to go with Gibbs and Abbi’s new coffee roaster.
Got some music to go with this one. There's a link to a youtube video that goes with one chunk of the story. Click on it (in a separate window) to have the full experience.

It’s rather nice to be able to do visit Dr. Snyder and not have an impending sense of doom. They made the decision, it’s done, and now they just get to see if it works.

So, bright and early on a fairly chilly day for early December, Tim and Abby (they would have brought Gibbs along, too, but the Doc said this works best with the fewest possible people in the room) take Sean to get his implant turned on for the first time.

It’s called mapping. Every deaf person “hears” differently, so every person with an implant needs to have it calibrated specifically for them.

And, especially for little guys who are brand new to this hearing thing, keeping the range a bit narrow to begin with can be a good idea. Sort of ease a baby into the hearing world.

But, that does mean they’ve got to turn it on, and then play a lot of different sounds, over and over, looking for the band Sean can hear with the implant.

Fantasies of the first thing Sean hearing being their voice are just that, fantasies. The first thing he’ll likely hear is a buzz.

Getting it set up takes a few steps. There’s two parts, the microphone, which is a small disk, in cobalt blue, with a magnet on the back that sticks to the side of Sean’s head. He’s also got a wireless transmitter that clips to his clothing. Right now, Tim’s just holding it, rather than trying to figure out where to put it on Sean’s outfit.

The Audio Tech, a young lady named Dora, places the microphone on Sean’s head, and Tim and Abby sit there, on edge, waiting to see what happens.

Sean’s first reaction to the microphone is to try and get it off of his head.

Tim supposes that makes sense. If someone stuck a cold magnet on the side of his head, he’d probably try to grab it and see what it is, too.

They let Sean grab it and look at it, but take it before he can try to chew on it.

“Not for eating,” Abby says and signs at him.

“This’ll help you hear,” Tim adds, also saying and signing.
Dora puts it back on the side of his head, and Abby, holding Sean’s hand, lets him feel it on the side of his head, as Tim says, and signs, “It’ll sit there on your head, and when it’s turned on, you’ll hear.” I hope.

Obviously, that means nothing to Sean. Other than an odd, cold sensation on the side of his head.

Then Dora puts the other sensors on his head. The same ones they used to determine if he could hear in the first place. He’s not a fan of them either, but Tim and Abby are able to distract him from trying to rip them off of his head.

Then Dora messes around with it, doing… Something… Playing different buzzes, probably. Tim’s not really paying attention, he’s watching Sean, making sure he’s okay.

And right now, he’s mildly irked by the things on his head, but beyond that, he’s doing fine.

Then he’s looking really startled, eyes jerking toward the direction of the implant.

Then Dora says, “Okay. We’ve got it set so he can hear. What do you want to say to him?”

There’s a second, a breath, where nothing happens and Sean doesn’t react. His first voice ever is Dora’s. Then one more heartbeat, where he looks really, really surprised. It’s a look both Tim and Abby know, because they’ve both seen it on each other.

And then his face crumples into fear and he wails at the top of his lungs.

They look at each other, and nod, and Tim fights the urge to immediately turn it off.

They do snuggle Sean, and try to soothe him, but the thing they normally do when they’re doing that, the little ‘Shhh…’ hum is just disconcerting him further.

It’s Abby who gets the idea to put his head right against her throat as she’s ‘shhh…ing’ which gets yet another really startled look out of Sean, because, apparently, he’s able to put together this new thing in his world, and the feel of Abby’s ‘shhh…’

He quiets down a little as she stops ‘shhh…ing’ and the vibration and the thing stops. Then he looks really startled again, when she starts up once more. His little eyes are darting around, and he pulls his head back from her throat, and the feel of ‘shhh…’ stops, but the sound continues.

His eyes are bright red, but he’s not wailing right now. Right now he’s bobbing his head against Abby’s throat, looking really confused as the feel of ‘shhh…’ starts and stops as he pulls his head away and touches it to her, but the sound keeps going.

Tim takes his hand, and puts it on his throat. “We’ve been talking to you the whole time. This is what it sounds like.”

Sean’s head whips over to Tim, as he feels the vibrations in his hand, but hears them now, too.

It looks like he may be thinking about it, and maybe it’s okay, but… after another minute, and a few more sounds, it’s pretty clear Sean’s feeling overwhelmed, and he starts to cry, which just freaks him out even more, because now there’s this sound that goes with him wailing at the top of his lungs, and…

He’s just not having a great afternoon.

“Can we turn it off? Give him a little break?” Tim asks, heart aching for his boy.
Dora shakes her head. “We’ve got to get it calibrated. Once we’re done here, if you want to turn it off and let him have his nap in peace, that’s fine, but unless you want to be here all day, we’re better off just getting it done. I know, none of them like this. But the sooner he’s finished, the sooner he gets to go home, and the sooner he’s back in his usual surroundings. It’ll get better.”

Tim exhales long and hard, blowing off his frustrations, and for the first time, as Sean whips his head toward that new sound, too, Tim’s realizing how much noise that makes.

How much noise all of it makes.

---

So, the little fantasy of, “I love you.” Or “Hello Sean.” Or any of the myriad other options for the first thing Sean would hear them say fades away to reality.

Crying.

The first things Sean’s going to hear is a lot of crying.

Apparently going from absolute silence to even just the noises in a fairly quiet medical office is overwhelming, especially for a not quite one-year-old mind.

The thing is turning the implant off freaks Sean out more, because suddenly everything is back to normal. He can feel Abby holding him, making the shhhh rumble, but not hear it anymore, so he’s looking around, really worried because now that thing is missing.

As Abby’s holding Sean, Tim says, “Well, at least we know he’s really smart.”

“Like that was ever in doubt.”

Apparently, most babies can’t put together the feel and the sound, let alone get the idea that they’re somehow linked. Dora said that the way he was watching, feeling Abby make the Shhh sound, looked more like how a toddler or young child behaves, not an infant.

And that’s nice and all, but they’re feeling a bit disheartened as they head home.

“Next run will be better,” Abby says, sounding halfway between convinced and convincing herself.

Tim nods, not really feeling it, but… “I’m getting a lot of sympathy for Jimmy and his I-don’t-want-this-thing-attached-to-me mindset right now.”

Abby snarks at that. “Yeah.” She’s quiet as Tim’s driving them out of the Doc’s parking lot. “Three more of these to go.”

Tim nods back. This is the first of the get the implant working appointments. As time goes by, and Sean gets more used to using the implant, they’ll continue to adjust and readjust the hearing levels. Right now they’ve got it pretty quiet so Sean’s not too badly spooked.

“Next one should be easier.” At least, that’s what everyone says.
It’s just Tim, and Abby, and Sean, in his nursery. They’ve got the ceiling fan on, thinking that’s a good place to start. Just a low, easy buzz.

This time they turn the implant on, and Sean looks a little startled, but doesn’t break into immediate cries.

Abby signs to Tim. How much was just being in a new place, you think?

_Hopefully a lot._ He signs back.

They let Sean get used to the background sound, and then turn him so he’s facing Abby. Tim holds his hand on Abby’s throat as she quietly says to him. “Hi, Sean.”

Again, he looks really startled, but he doesn’t burst into immediate tears. He keeps staring at her, and then whacks her throat a bit.

“That’s where sound comes from,” Abby says.

He keeps staring, at her mouth, and throat, and face. He’s not crying, but he does look very skittish. Like he half wants to jump out of his skin, half wants to know more about what this thing is. Then he touches his head, just below the mic, probably about where he’s sensing/feeling/hearing whatever, this new thing.

Abby nods. “Hearing. You’re hearing.” She touches his head, just below the implant.

Tim adds his voice. “Everything in this world makes noise. Time for you to hear it.”

That gets Sean looking toward Tim, but it takes him a moment to think before he does it. Tim half inclines his head as he sees that. He’s on the side that doesn’t have the implant, so Sean’s going to have a harder time figuring out where his voice is coming from. Abby gets up, handing Sean over to Tim, and Tim resettles him in his lap, very aware of all the tiny little noises that go with that.

He can’t tell how many, if any of them, Sean can hear. He’s watching Tim, and Abby, and back to Tim, very intently, but he doesn’t seem to be thinking about the rustle of clothing together or the sound of Tim’s hand sliding against his arm.

Tim places Sean’s hand on his throat and says, “Is this better? Slow and gentle?” He signs it at the same time, but Sean’s not watching his hands. He’s watching his hand against Tim’s throat.

Abby comes back. She’s behind Sean, and he doesn’t turn to look at her, so… He probably didn’t hear thick boots against carpeted floor. She doesn’t make a lot of noise like that, but there’s some.

“Oh, she says, making sure to stay behind him. For a moment, he’s looking very intently at Tim, curious, wondering why he didn’t feel anything with that one. He squeezes Tim’s throat, and Tim wonders if he and Abby have different “voices.” Or, for that matter, if Sean has any idea of direction, yet.

She says it again, and again he’s still staring at Tim, trying to figure out why there was no feeling to go with the sound this time.

Abby slips over, so she’s in his view, and says his name again, and this time he puts together why he didn’t feel anything from Tim to go with whatever that thing that just happened to him was. She pats her lap, and Sean leans towards her. Tim hands him over, and sees that she’s got Goodnight Moon in her hands.

For his whole life, getting ready for bed has involved being snuggled in Mama or Daddy, Uncle Jimmy, Aunt Breena, or Pop’s lap, sometimes on his own, and sometimes with his sibling/cousins, and getting a story. And though the story lineup changes, Goodnight Moon is always the last of the bit.

Abby rests her throat against the top of Sean’s head, and opens the book. “In the great green room…”

Sean looks tense at that, but he doesn’t start to cry, or fuss, and he does, by the third page, start to settle in against Abby, snuggling close, looking at the pages.

He likes the bit about kittens and mittens, and when Abby gets there he lets out his usual excited chirp, and that startles him, too. He jerks at the sound, and looks around, very confused. His eyes find Tim, and Tim says, “Not me. That was you,” signing it, too.

He’s got no idea what any of this could possibly mean to Sean, but he looks back at the page and looks to Abby, who also shakes her head.

Sean chirps again, a sort of tentative coo, and again, he hears it as well as feels it, and then again, and again, and again, and suddenly a huge smile washes over his face.

Tim feels the same smile spread over his, and Abby’s glowing at him.

---

Apparently, turning it off is just as bizarre for Sean as turning it on.

Once it’s off, Sean tries making noise a few times, but, of course, nothing happens.

That gives Tim the idea of turning it on and off as Sean’s babbling at them, giving him a better idea of what that thing on his head does.

At least, he hopes that’s how it works.

He puts the microphone on Sean’s head, and turns it on, and says, “Hearing. This is hearing.” Then he takes it off, and says and signs, “And this is deaf.”

And maybe it helps. Maybe it doesn’t. Sean looks more curious than scared, but…

He’s eleven months old, what he understands or doesn’t… Tim and Abby just don’t know.

---

They do know to start up slow and easy on the new sounds front.

Though they’re getting a little big for it, Sean and Anna still share a crib. So, exercise the first in hanging out, with the implant on, with the sibling/cousins is Sean and Anna in their crib.
She wants to look at, touch, and play with his microphone and the tech that goes with it.

He’s watching her, fascinated by this entirely new level of stuff coming off of Anna.

Of the kiddos that “talk” Anna’s the quietest of the bunch. She’s not silent by any stretch, but compared to Molly and Kelly, both of whom can have streaks of chatterboxery, she’s pretty laid back. She’s also not quite two, so she doesn’t exactly have a massive vocabulary.

“BOX!” she doesn’t actually know what the thing on Sean is, but she’s excited about it. So, they watch hovering near, about to jump in, as Anna explores the transmitter clipped to Sean’s shirt, and Sean explores all of this noise Anna’s making.

Tim supposes he should have expected it. Given this is exactly the same thing she did when they explained that Sean was deaf.

But, as soon as she sees Sean, with his implant on, Molly races over and screams at him, “SEAN!”

And he immediately bursts into panicked tears.

Molly looks pretty satisfied at that, arms crossed over her chest, wide smile on her face. “Not deaf now.”

Abby gets him calmed down, in a different room, while Tim goes over (again) not screaming at Sean. That sound is new, and different, and scary for him, so be nice.

That results in the girls whispering at him. And, in many cases Tim might think that was going too far in the opposite direction, but right now he’s fine with it.

There’s a moment when the implants working really sinks in. Tim’s got Sean on his lap. He’s reading. Sean’s chilling with him.

Tim’s phone beeps, letting him know he’s got a text.

Sean jerks at it.

Tim kisses the top of his head, and then gets the phone. “It beeped. It’s telling me I’ve got a text.” Sean knows what (in a very abstract sort of way) his Daddy’s phone is. It’s a thing with lights and colors on it.

Tim looks at it, puts the passcode in, and then checks his mail. He reads the note, nods, and then says, “Your Uncle Jimmy had a good idea a few days ago. I just, finally, got permission to use it.”

He kisses the top of Sean’s head, and sends a quick note to Hotch, “Just got the warrant to exhume Seth and Ginger Partridge. Get it taken care of and over to our forensic techs.”

A minute later, there’s another beep, Hotch letting him know that he was on it, and again, Sean looks around for the beep.
Of all of his parents, Jimmy’s the one who’s best with getting Sean calmed down and content. He’s the one with the magic patting/singing technique that gets little guy all chill and ready to sleep. And with as exciting of a day as it’s been, Jimmy’s definitely on getting little guy calmed down for bed tonight.

Jimmy doesn’t know why, when he picked Sean up for… maybe the second or third time, it was still the first day of his life, and he was fussing, that Wonderwall sprang to mind. He knows he liked it the first time he heard it, back in the ‘90s when it was Oasis playing it. And he liked it again, years later, when Breena introduced him to Ryan Adams’ cover of it.

For whatever reason, that’s the song that popped into mind, at the slower, Ryan Adams’ pace, when he was holding Sean, trying to get little guy calmed down on that first day of his life. He sang it to Sean, and Sean dropped right off to sleep.

It’s getting onto bedtime. Sean didn’t have the implant on for tubbytime, obviously that would be a disaster, and he won’t have it on for sleeping, can’t be sure it’ll stay where it needs to in his sleep, and the last thing anyone wants is for him to scoot around in his sleep, knock it loose, and one of the two of them in the crib decide to chew on it. But, right now, before story time, Jimmy’s got Sean, and he makes sure the microphone is on his head, and that it’s on.

He snuggles Sean close, and he knows how this works, so he relaxes against Jimmy’s chest.

Jimmy starts to sing, as he walks him around, bouncing gently, and this time, Sean doesn’t jerk at the sound of it, he just rests there, making a content little cooing sound.

“Today is gonna be the day that they gonna give it back to you./By now you shoulda somehow realized what you gotta do./I don’t believe that anybody feels the way I do about you now/And all the roads we have to walk are winding/And all the lights that lead the way are blinding/There are many things that I would like to say to you/but I don’t know how/I said maybe/You’re gonna be the one that saves me/And after all/You’re my wonderwall…”

Jimmy sings it a few times, feeling Sean relaxing, breathing deeper and easier against his chest. He kisses the top of his head, and says, “Goodnight, baby,” before turning off the microphone and taking it off of him. Then he hands Sean over to Abby, who’s also on story time today, and the first day of Sean McGee, hearing, comes to a close.

Breena’s been helping Tim mop up the bathroom, tubby time isn’t exactly a tidy affair, and requires someone to do some serious cleanup every night. They’ve both been hearing Jimmy sing that to Sean every day of his life, but this is the first time she’s really listened to those lyrics.

She flashes Tim a look, and he nods, he’s fine with finishing up the bathroom.

She heads over to Jimmy, standing behind him, wrapping her arms around him, kissing his shoulder. Jimmy’s watching Abby doing her round of kisses and tuck-ins, and he doesn’t take his eyes away from them, though his hand finds hers and squeezes. “Probably won’t turn the microphone on for that all the time. Kind of breaks the bedtime flow. But I wanted him to hear it, at least once.”

She rises up on her tiptoes and kisses the back of his neck.

It’s the next morning, when Jimmy’s getting kiddos dressed and ready, that he gets another bit of time on his own with Sean.

Like every other morning where he’s on Mission: Get Kids Ready, there’s the round of fresh diapers, followed by clean onesies, and then, because it’s winter, on go the pants and socks, another layer of shirts, and sometimes sweaters.

So, today, Sean’s styling away in his little white (ish) onesie, and tiny little blue jeans, along with a little flannel shirt. (Okay, yes it’s a pink and blue flannel shirt, it’s a hand me down from Molly to Kelly to Anna to Sean, but he couldn’t care less what color it is, and the three older kids haven’t beaten it into a pulp yet, so it’s getting used. When Sean’s old enough to have preferences about his clothing, they’ll be respected, but as of yet, he does not have them.)

Breakfast is up next, and the plan is to have his implant on, so…

Jimmy’s holding the transmitter, staring at Sean, who’s sitting in his lap, trying to lunge away from Jimmy because there’s stuff to do on the floor, and he’s not doing it right now. Meanwhile, he’s trying to keep the squirming not-quite-one-year-old somewhat still while he tries to figure out where to put the transmitter.

Jimmy’s giving it the stink-eye as he says to Sean. “This is my least favorite part of this, too.”

Sean, of course, doesn’t hear that part, so he’s utterly unaware of it, but… Yeah. So… Clip the little box onto his shirt… Back of the shirt, and it’ll get in the way when he’s in the high chair, front of his shirt, and it’s going to get doused in food. Pants, same issue.

Well…

Maybe…

Little guy doesn’t walk or crawl yet…

Jimmy clips it onto the bottom of Sean’s pant leg, and then turns it on.

“Try not to kick that off.”

Sean’s torn between messing with the thing against his foot, and that whole sound thing. So, he’s looking from Jimmy to his pants to Jimmy, and back again.

Jimmy sets him on the floor, sitting crosslegged in front of him. He taps the bulge under his pj pants. “Yeah. It’s kind of a pain in the butt figuring out where the hell to put these damn things.”

He watches as Sean gets a hold of the transmitter and tries to yank it off his pants. Jimmy takes it off, but doesn’t turn it off, so Sean can hear him say, “Okay, this isn’t going to work.”

Then he gently lays Sean down and tests something. “Let’s see…” He gently scoots the transmitter into Sean’s pants between his thigh and the pant leg.

Sean’s still curious, still grabbing at it, but it’s in his pants, and he’s eleven months old, so he has not yet figured out how to remove his pants.

Jimmy nods at it. “I think that’ll do it. It works okay for me, too. Maybe Mama and Daddy’ll make you some leg bands, too.”

And suddenly Jimmy can see it, flashing forward a few years. Sean’ll have a collection of little armbands and legs bands, just like Uncle Jimmy’s. They’ll “match.” And maybe the bands won’t do exactly the same thing, but they’ll help keep the tech they use stay on their bodies, but out of their way.

He supposes that’s something.

And, more than that, anything that helps Sean feel a bit less “odd” compared to the rest of the herd, that’s a good thing.

It’s not long after the McGee kids get to their home, with Heather, that Gibbs comes by.

He’s got Mona and Jackson with him, too. This afternoon, he’s on a plane heading to New Orleans, so Mona’s coming over to stay with the McPalmer crew for the middle of the week.

Jackson’s going with him, because that’s part of puppy socialization.

But, no matter how tight the schedule is on his flight out Gibbs was going to make sure he got to see Sean.

When he gets there, the microphone is on his head, but not turned on. He’s a little curious about that, but Heather tells him, “They’re starting off easy, an hour or so at a time, a few times a day.”

That makes sense to Gibbs. He’s been reading up, and apparently implants are not like swimming pools. You don’t just jump in and adjust. Or, he supposes, depending on your personality, maybe they are like swimming pool, you stick your toes in, and slowly ease the rest of you in as you adjust to the new experience. (He’s a leaper when it comes to pools.)

Heather can also see Gibbs is itching to see how Sean does with the new device. She smiles a bit. “Come on, we can do his hour while you’re here.” She fishes around in Sean’s pants, which makes no sense to Gibbs, but he’s not asking any questions, because a second later Sean’s looking very intensely at Mona who’s licking all over Kelly, and both of them are making quite a bit of noise as that happens.

Gibbs blinks, hard as he sees that, realizing how much he takes something like that for granted.

Realizing how much he wanted that for Sean.

He doesn’t know how much hearing Sean’s getting from this, but it’s at least enough that he can hear the big doggie woofing at his sister, who’s shrieking with laughter at getting licked.

On the far side of the room.

Outside of his direct line of view.
He sits down right in front of Sean, attracting his attention. Sean goes from sitting to on his hands and knees lunging/rocking in Gibbs’ direction. He’s not figuring out the picking his knees and hands up will allow him to move part of this yet, but he’s at least got the most basic aspect of it down.

Gibbs gets the message and picks Sean up, putting him in his lap. Normally, when he does that, Sean droops back and snuggles against his tummy, but right now he’s staying alert. Partially just watching Mona and Kelly, but (Gibbs’ hopes) partially waiting to see if Gibbs is going to make any noise, too.

And, for the first time ever, Gibbs really wants to talk. “Hi, Sean,”

And Sean does turn toward him, watching his face. Tim’s mentioned putting Sean’s hand against his throat as he speaks, but Sean’s already reaching up, so Gibbs switches him around so he’s facing Gibbs, and presses his big hand over Sean’s little one against his throat.

“So, wha-d-ya think? Hearing… Everyone’ll tell you that I don’t talk, but they’re wrong about that. I just don’t talk a lot. Because hearing is important. And it’s hard to do if your mouth is running all the time. And the more you hear, and more than that, the more you listen… Almost any problem you can get into, if you listen carefully, you can find a way out of.”

He kisses Sean’s palm.

“So, we’re going to learn to listen. And we’ll learn how to do it with the implant,” Gibbs almost taps it, but then realizes that’ll be like tapping a microphone with a direct input to Sean’s brain, so he decides not to. He just, gently touches Sean’s hand to the mic. “And we’ll learn to do it with our eyes.” He taps his eyes. “You can do a lot of listening with your eyes. Most people don’t know that, but that’s probably because they don’t stop talking long enough to find that out.

“But you and me, we’re going to listen with our eyes. And with the implant, and who knows, maybe one day you’ll get to listen with that other ear?

“But however it works out, a wider world just opened up, and we’re going to learn how to use it.”

He kisses the top of Sean’s head, and then Jackson scrambles up, wanting in on the confab. So he picks Jackson up, and sets him on his lap in front of Sean, and says, “Okay, Jackson, you want to say Hi.”

So Jackson does, a little yip, and Sean hears it, and starts to giggle.

And Gibbs feels so full of happy, he doesn’t know what to do with himself.
The Year's Count

On the first day of his forty-first year, Jimmy Palmer wakes up to the sound of a baby fussing. This is not, by a long stretch, a new experience. The only question is which child? He’s on baby duty tonight, and Sean still wakes up at least once a night, usually just for a little chat and snuggle, and Donnie wakes up every three hours for a feed.

He pulls himself, groggy and exhausted, up from his lying position, and recognizes the sound is coming from the baby who’s got his own crib. A quick glance toward the crib Sean shares with Anna tells him that his next two oldest are still snoozing.

Why he thinks Sean might wake up, he doesn’t know, but he still checks.

Then he remembers why he checked, Sean got the implant turned on. And then he remembers they don’t have the implant on when he’s sleeping.

Jimmy’s rubbing his eyes. He’s too damn tired for this.

Donnie, who is not renowned for his patience, goes from fussing to full-on wailing.

He lays his hand on his son’s belly. “I’m up. Food, soon.” He gently picks up the youngest of his children, whom he shares no DNA with, and snuggles him onto his shoulder. “Come on, baby, diaper time, then food.”

At forty years old, Jimmy Palmer is a father. Most of the world knows of three of his children. A smaller group knows of the fourth. And a very select group knows that he’s not exactly an uncle to two others.

In forty years, he’s collected six children he loves beyond all reason, and no matter what the DNA mix is, or what they call him, they’re his kids.

Timothy McGee wakes on the first day of his forty-first year between his wife and his husband. He can hear a soft slurping sound, and sees that his second wife is in the rocking chair, nursing the child that is biologically his son, but officially his ‘nephew.’

He lets his head drop back to the bed. If Breena’s nursing Donnie, that means they’ve gotten to the 5:00 feed, and he’s got a few more hours of sleep.

He snuggles in against Abby, kissing the back of her neck, and rubs against Jimmy’s side a bit.

In forty years, Tim’s managed to collect three spouses, a husband and two wives, and he adores them beyond all reason.

Two hours later, Tim’s watch buzzes, letting him know it’s get up time. Not that he really needs an alarm, in the next few minutes at least one, if not more, little people will get up and start looking for attention and breakfast.

It’s his morning to get them all up, changed, and eating their breakfast.
Then, while they munch, he flips on one of his yoga videos, and goes through one of his routines.

He’s, finally, after a year and a half, back to where he was before he got hurt on the Stennis. If not slightly ahead.

The kids are little enough that they don’t care if he’s naked when he does his yoga practice, so he tosses on a robe to keep warm while he’s getting them cleaned up and all downstairs around the table. Molly, Kelly, and Anna are all old enough to eat on their own. For most other meals, Sean needs some help, but breakfast is Cheerios, milk (Sean’s is in a sippy cup, the girls have theirs on their cereal), toast (cut up small for Sean), butter (Tim’s got to put the butter on and let it melt into the toast, or the girls will just eat it straight off the bread), and pieces of banana. It’s all small finger food.

Donnie is still asleep. He’s not quite on the same schedule as his four older sibling/cousins, so the trickiest of the bunch to feed isn’t on Tim’s morning to-do list.

He gets the kids set with their food, tosses off his robe and gets the video started.

It’s not the most focused or concentrated yoga ever. He’s got to pause a lot and deal with little guys, and Molly and Kelly like to “help” him.

But he gets into it, and for the first time since the Stennis he gets both heels on the floor while doing downward facing dog. (With two other little bums pointing in the air next to him as Molly and Kelly join him. Sean’s on the floor eating the Cheerios his sisters dropped, and Anna’s playing with Kelly’s stuffed skull, which will cause a major upset in ten minutes when Kelly notices, but for now, all is calm.)

His shoulder and wrist are telling him he’s still got to build his strength up more before he’s going to be able to do a handstand.

But that doesn’t mean he isn’t trying. Down dog, to plank, to squat, to bird in a basket, shift weight, tighten core, try to raise torso, wobble, wobble, try, and fall.

He gives it three shots, and ends up back in down dog, from there a quick shavasana to up dog, and back to down. He feels a warm hand on his ass along with, “There’s a lovely view to wake up to.”

He smiles up at Abby from under his arm.

She gives his tush a quick kiss, and another pat. “Got some plans for this.”

That intensifies his grin as he slides back to plank, and from there to child’s pose. Then he’s sitting up, seeing Abby’s on breakfast for the adults. He puts the robe back on, heads into the kitchen, and kisses her. “Good plans?”

“Oh, yeah. You’re gonna love ‘em.”

He flashes her a very satisfied smirk as he grabs a glass of water.

In forty years, Tim McGee’s gone from a skinny little kid, to a plump teen, to an overweight man, to a skinny one, back to a fat one, to a fit one. He’s in the best shape of his life, now, even if this shape was nothing he ever expected to be.
“Get moving, sleepyhead. Dead bodies await!”

Jimmy opens one eye. He’s almost ready to glare at Abby, but that takes more energy than he wants to expend.

She kisses him, and that’s fairly nice. If he was even a quarter awake, it’d be quite a bit more than nice, but he knows that if she’s poking him awake, the likelihood of that kiss turning into anything more than a quick wake up smooch is nil.

He blinks a few times, and pulls himself into a sitting position. He’s the only one still in bed, and the clock is telling him he’s got time for a fast shower, a quick break—and it looks like Abby was on top of that, his breakfast is sitting on the bedside table next to him. He can’t eat until he calibrates his blood sugar monitor, so he gets on top of that.

One prick, a microliter of blood, and…

And it still works. He’s not quite comfortable trusting the two devices that live on his skin 24/7 yet, but so far they’re doing the job.

In forty years Jimmy’s added two state of the art medical devices to his body. He doesn’t love having them on him all the time, and they’re still working out the kinks for where on his skin they should live, but for the first time in twenty years, he’s not poking himself with a needle two to four times a day.

(And sometimes, on some days, he might, if properly asked, admit that he’s okay with it.)

Tim’s just about done when Jimmy hops into the shower. He kisses his husband, hand on his cheek, as he gets out. “Happy birthday,” Tim says, with a bit of irony in his voice.

“Back at you,” Jimmy shakes his head. Of all the things he could have possibly expected out of life, ending up married to someone with his exact same birthday was never on the list.

Drying off, Tim’s looking at himself. In forty years he’s collected a full leg sleeve tattoo, that he’s thinking is likely done. There’s room for a few more bands around his dragon, but he doesn’t think there will be any new children to inspire them. He’s comfortable with that, but he would certainly love another band or two (child or two) to complete things. But realistically, five kids is enough. He’s marked his wrist with the lips of his loves, and his arm is circled by the love of his first wife wrought in ink. His first identity, the computer guy, marks his right shoulder, and he’s thinking as he works more and more on this next novel, that he wants something to mark that, too.

But that’s not happening today, or tomorrow, and he’s got no set idea of what he wants for that.

He’s in front of his dresser, reaching his hand out to grab the pull, and looks at his right hand. In the year and a half since The Stennis, the scars have faded to dull pink. Another year or two, and they’ll be the same color as the rest of his skin. In forty years, Tim McGee’s collected scars as well as tattoos. Unlike the tattoos, there are more scars than he can, or wants to, count. But like the tattoos, those marks have shaped him.

He almost never thinks of the tiny white one on his side, where a piece of glass pierced his side, and set him on the path that would land him here, but he’s forty today, and feeling introspective. His fingers slip to his side. He can’t really see the mark, it’s the same color as the skin around it, but he can remember how it felt, and that surreal moment when he went from hot and dazed, ears and head ringing, to piercing pain in his side, to knowing that if he lived through that moment, he needed to make some changes.

Breena’s finishing up her breakfast when Jimmy gets downstairs. With Donnie’s current eating schedule, she’s got a few more minutes before he wakes up again, then one last nurse, and they’re off to daycare, and she’s off to work.

Tim and Abby have already left for the day. Heather is over, corralling the older kids.

Jimmy kisses her, gets a good morning hug (with some distance between them, nursing breasts don’t like close hugs), and a happy birthday from her and Heather.

“Just got the text from Dad. Friday evening is open, so they’ll be at the birthday shindig.”

Jimmy nods at that, pulling on his jacket. He kisses his wife one more time, and cuddles the babies before he rushes out of the house. He’d been hoping Friday night viewing would book at Slater and Palmer’s, but things don’t always work out the way he likes. Apparently, the whole crew will be showing up at the house this week for Shabbos, and the winter birthday bash. (Abbi, Anna, Tim, Jimmy, Penny, Sean, Gibbs, and Molly all have winter birthdays. It’s just easier to do them all at once.)

At forty, Jimmy’s collected a crew of in-laws, one he’s not terribly fond of, but the rest of them have blurred the lines between where his ‘natural’ family ends and they begin.

On the upside, Tim doesn’t have a literal inbox. There is no tray on his desk filled with paper. There is a reason for that. A sign on his door that says in no uncertain terms that any paper put in his office will be summarily set on fire, unread. He only accepts electronic communications.

So, his office is tidy. There is a desk with a typewriter on it, and a stack of paper next to it, and that is the only paper allowed in his office.

His virtual inbox is a festering swamp of need. There are alligators of cases, waiting to snap at the unwary. Mosquitos of niggly details, needing to be slapped down. Vast sucking morasses of attempts to get his electronic architecture in place. Putrid blorps of noxious gasses escaping every time he runs into yet another reason why he ‘can’t’ do something.

Today he’s gearing up with his virtual flame thrower, and getting ready to start burning off some gas. He’s been at this almost six months, and most of the ‘can’t’ is code for ‘I don’t feel like it’ or ‘There’s some sort of stupid bureaucratic regulation left over from the last administration keeping me from doing it.’

At forty years old, Tim McGee has gotten to the point in his life where he no longer accepts stupid excuses, and he doesn’t take no for an answer when he’s asking for something reasonable.

His ass-kicking boots are on, and he’s about to apply them to many a buttock.
Jimmy eyes the skin sitting in a petri dish of sterile solution. He hasn’t done this in years, and Allan’s never done it, so…

It’s supposed to be fairly simple. Hydrate the dried out tissue, gently debride the top layers of the dermis, exposing a clearer image of the tattoo underneath. Get shots of it, send them to Abby, and with any luck they’ll have an easier time identifying Mr. Doe.

“Did you know, Dr. Allan, that this technique was invented when…”

In forty years, Jimmy’s gone from being the student to being the teacher. And he quite likes it.

There are times where the ass-kicking boots are not the appropriate footwear.

“Hotch…” Tim usually stays up in his office, but it’s been ten days since they got the warrant to get Heidi Partridge’s parents exhumed, and he’s heard exactly nothing on it.

Hotch looks up from his own desk, which, like Tim’s, is clean, and he assumes, that like him, he’s got an electronic inbox of doom.

“Hi, McGee. Updates?”

“Yeah.”

“On which case?”

That’s a salient point. Hotch has a department, not a team. “Partridge.”

“Give me a minute.” Hotch gets it queued up on his computer, and takes the time to read. Then he shakes his head. “Nothing yet. Both DNA exemplars are in the system, they’re both being run, but the only things they’ve found as of yet are a few cousins, all of whom are alive and accounted for. No one who matches both of them.”

Tim sighs. “Okay. Thanks. How’s the rest of it going? You need anything?”

“More people.”

“Yeah. I’m working on that.”

In forty years, Tim’s learned that when someone has a good reason to not have the answer, yet, to accept it. It’s enough for his people to do the near impossible, he doesn’t need to be the man who expects them to do the impossible.

“Okay, Tony. Yeah. Ten minutes, okay? We’re still in scrubs.”

“Agent DiNozzo?” Sam asks as Jimmy sets his phone down and begins to strip out of his scrub top.
“Yes, Dr. Allan. He’ll be bringing down Ms. Chethio. She’d like to see her brother.”

“I hate these,” Allan says, rapidly stripping off his scrubs, too.

“I understand,” Jimmy replies, heading to his locker, where his suit is. It’s his policy that when the next of kin are brought down, he and Dr. Allan will be dressed for them. They can’t always do it, sometimes they don’t get enough heads up, but if they do, then he makes sure they’re in suits and ties. It’s not a big thing, but sometimes little things, like taking the time to dress with respect for the next of kin, matter.

They get changed, fast. Jimmy’s got time to plug in his electric kettle, if Ms. Chethio wants tea, he’s ready to offer it. The bottle of scotch is next to the kettle. He’s as stocked as it’s appropriate for an ME to be when it comes to offering comfort for the bereaved.

A moment later, they hear the bong of the elevator.

A moment after that the doors open, and every ME’s least favorite part of the job is on. Jimmy doesn’t smile, he does offer a slight nod, and say, “Ms. Chethio?”

She nods, too. A frightened looking teenager, who, he’s sure, is about to have the absolute worst day of her life. So much for the scotch. Though depending on how this goes, he and Allan may have a sip or two when it’s done. Wouldn’t be the first time they took a drop of liquid refuge, but a drop is all Jimmy allows. They still have to be able to do the job.

Jimmy inclines his head, and Dr. Allan pulls Sergeant Chethio out of his drawer. He’s covered with a sheet from head to toe.

“You know you don’t have to do this? We do have a positive ID,” Jimmy says, leading her to the drawer.

She nods again, tears welling in her eyes, and choking her voice.

“Okay, Dr. Allan?”

Allan pulls the sheet back enough for Sergeant Chethio’s sister to see his face. She stares for a second, and then her shoulders curl in on themselves, and the sobbing begins. Tony’s gently resting a hand on her shoulder.

“How?” She looks up, eyes red and bleary, pleading with the universe for this to not be true.

“We don’t know who or why yet, but how was several stab wounds,” Jimmy says. “The first one got your brother in the heart, and the rest of them he never felt.”

“He wasn’t hurting?” Her eyes are huge, red, puffy, tearing.

“No.” Jimmy gently shakes his head, and takes her hand, holding it. “He was gone before he knew he’d been stabbed.” No, none of that is true. He bled out slowly, into the pericardial sac and spent probably a good half hour feeling like he was having his heart slowly crushed, but his sister doesn’t need to know that.

At forty years old, Jimmy Palmer is, in most cases, a terrible liar, but when he needs to, when it matters to someone else, he can and will lie, and he’ll do it well.
“Rule Number 2: Do not mess with McGee’s lunch, if you want to live.”

It’s lunchtime, Tim’s got his bowl of soup, salad, and coffee, and is typing away. This is his battery recharge time, and it is sacrosanct.

He didn’t realize until he got to the FBI how much he depended on time with his family to keep his battery full. He doesn’t have that here, and here the problems are deeper and more stubborn. He needs his downtime more, and he’s got less of it.

So, every day from noon to one, or thereabouts, the door to his office shuts, and the sound of an old-fashioned typewriter can be heard echoing through the fourth floor of the FBI building.

Technically, by now, he’s on editing the first draft of the first M’Gy Dragons book, but that’s not what he does here. This is not a space for careful re-writes, picky word choices, and well-considered plot points. Here he writes, whatever bits, pieces, scenes, dialogs, anything that flows through his mind. This is pure, unfettered, right brain off, left brain on, creative time.

Sometimes, he’s working through his real problems. Resetting them in the story. Unbound by the “rules” of the real world and government bureaucracy, he can get “creative” when it comes to dealing with sticky situations. Sometimes he’s pulling himself out of this world completely and spending some time in the world of his own creation.

All of the time, it’s a way to avoid burn out, and to get back to work after lunch as sharp as he was at breakfast time.

And, even though he’s writing about shape-shifting dragon knights, his words are real. The situations, the emotions, the frustration, the victory, he’s writing it, but he’s living it as he writes it. The ability to have a place where he can do anything he wants or needs to with his problems is a like having a fountain of cool, clear water when he’s parched.

Of course, sometimes, he needs more than water. On days when he’s really fried, he heads back to NCIS to suck up some time with Abby and or Jimmy. (Depending on who is there and what they’re doing.) Sometimes he needs time with them to get his head back into the game.

But, every day, by one o’clock (one thirty at the latest), he makes sure he’s back on the clock, and ready to take on the next problem.

By the age of forty, Tim McGee has figured out that he needs downtime, and what he needs to do during it, to keep himself sharp.

Jimmy’s the first of the bunch to get to Tim and Abby’s house. Not for the first time, he’s debating asking Heather what she’d charge to take care of all five of their kids. He’s fairly certain that it can’t be that much more than what they’re spending on daycare right now.

Of course, he also doesn’t know if Heather wants to take care of five kids under the age of four. He knows he generally does not want to deal with all of the kiddos on his own, and that they do their best to make sure that at any given time at least two parents are on point. Even if you love kids, which Jimmy does, outnumbered five to one is daunting.
He’s also not sure how to work Heather taking care of the kids with Breena picking up their kids at about two every day. He’s not sure if she wants all five kids in the afternoon. (Though they’re generally napping then. Of course, Sean and Donnie haven’t moved into a full two plus hour afternoon nap, yet, because they still get morning naps.) He doesn’t know how that would work with what she does for Slater and Palmer’s at home.

And, of course, Molly turns four in a few months, so the September after next means she starts kindergarten, and that makes the child care situation shift again.

And, of course, if Heather’s watching all the kids, that’s more reason for them to live in one house, and if they’re doing that then a bunch of other complication arise and…

And right now, it doesn’t matter. That’s something else that isn’t going to be solved today.

Right now, he’s got Sean in his arms, and Kelly is happily babbling at him, about her day. He’s listening and both of them are working on their signing.

She’s getting it faster than he is, and if he’s following her fingers right, she’s getting it faster than she’s picking up verbal words.

Heather’s adding in her own prompts, also both verbal and signed. She’s at about where Jimmy is. An adult who’s been working diligently, but not full time, on it for six months.

By forty, Jimmy’s adding another language to his list of skills, because he’ll be damned if he can’t talk to his “nephew” however is easiest for him.

When it’s just the four of them, birthdays aren’t that big of a deal. Some sort of ‘nice’ treat is involved for the birthday person, but any real party or celebration is left for gatherings with the larger group.

That said, Jimmy is very much looking forward to tonight’s treat. When the girls plan a good time for them, it’s a good time.

He’s hoping that Breena’s feeling up to playing with them. Donnie’s a little past three months old, so she’s completely healed up, but her hormones are still firmly in the ‘do not get pregnant again’ side of the fence (after all, they can’t tell she’s got an IUD) so, right now desire isn’t really part of the equation for her.

But, when the three of them get really going, she enjoys watching that, and hopefully it’ll kick things from enjoying watching to enjoying doing.

And as much as he loves his kids, at forty Jimmy’s feeling pretty good at the idea of being done with babies. He’s looking forward to having both of his wives back to completely healed up, both of them back to interested in sex, and moving back to the idea of sex as recreation as opposed to procreation.

He’s (probably because he was on baby duty last night) fervently looking forward to having all of them potty-trained and sleeping through the night.

At forty, Jimmy Palmer is looking forward to moving onto the next phase of his life, moving from babies and toddlers to toddlers and little kids.
“Happy birthday to you, happy birthday to you, happy birthday dear Tim and Jimmy! Happy birthday to you!”

Abby’s the one singing. Breena’s sitting on… their present apparently, holding two lit candles.

Tim eyes the thing under Breena, wondering why the girls though they needed a…sofa… chaise… thing. It’s definitely a piece of furniture. Jimmy blows out his candle and flops onto the thing next to her.

Abby’s grinning from ear to ear. “Tim!”

“Oh, right.” He blows out his candle, and Breena gets up, gesturing for him to sit on the thing.

It is comfy.

The fabric is… maybe… velvet… ish? It’s soft and plush and black, looks good in their room. The seat under him is nicely firm, with enough give to be easy on his body. The only reason he’s not entirely sure what this thing is, is it’s shape. It’s not quite six feet long, and maybe two feet wide, and at one end it’s about two feet high, and the other end it’s about three feet high, and between those two ends is a swoopy curve, almost like a very rounded 8, laid on its side.

So, yes, it’s attractive and comfortable, but there’s never been a moment where Tim’s found himself thinking, “Hey, you know what, we need some extra seating in our bedroom…” Though, he supposes that a nice, comfy recliner sort of thing could come in handy when they’re playing one on one with the fourth one of them watching.

Though, given that grin on Abby’s face, he’s getting the idea that this is not here to provide some prime seating territory for live porn night.

Maybe… He knows the flavor of that grin. That’s very much a sex grin, so…

Jimmy shakes his head, boots him off the thing, and lays himself from the head to the foot of it, Breena hops over into his lap, straddling him, and the sofa easily, and suddenly Tim gets what the hell this thing is.

It’s a sex couch.

Abby wiggles herself over, and yeah, it’s set so she can easily straddle Jimmy’s face, and both ends have soft curves designed to easily kneel on or against, and the headrest can be moved around to make the curve in the center less shallow, and… Oh… There are D rings all around the base of this thing (discrete D rings, they tuck under, so Abby’s pointing them out) so you can tie, or since it’s fairly short to the ground, clip, restraints into it, and…

Yeah. Tim’s grinning from ear to ear, too. “Happy birthday to us, huh?”

Jimmy’s already sprawled out over the thing. “Happy birthday to me, I think. You’ve got tomorrow.”

“Eh…” Abby says. She pulls a quarter out of her pocket, and tosses it high. “Call it, Tim.”
“Heads.”

Breena snatches it from the air, and palms it. “Tails. Okay, yep, Jimmy, you’re right. Happy birthday to you, tonight. Happy Birthday to Tim, tomorrow.”

She gets up from Jimmy’s lap, whispers in Tim’s ear, and he nods. He likes what he’s hearing. Okay, yes, he would have liked it being Happy Birthday to him first, but he’s okay with being part of the doing side of the equation, rather than the done-to side. There’s always tomorrow night, or the night after, or…

The girls have well thought out plans for both of them, and he knows whatever’s coming for him will be just as good.

And tonight, they’re going to light up Jimmy’s favorite fantasy games, so he’ll play along with that.

Jimmy likes to be watched. Really likes to be watched. Three quarters, at least from his part, of having sex with Lee in pretty much every possible place at work was the possibility of being seen. They’d be at it, fast, open, dirty, and he’s have this little fantasy in the back of his mind of someone, usually whichever person he saw at work and fancied that particular day, just walking by, hearing something, and taking a peek, and seeing them. They’d look away, fast, and then look back, pull closer, eyes frozen to the action, unable to look away. In his fantasies the watcher was always female. Always wearing a skirt. (And, about a third of the time, Abby. It wasn’t an accident that he kept ‘forgetting’ to turn off the camera in Autopsy. After all, the only person who ever used it with any regularity was Abby. And the one time she caught them, she did enjoy the show, just not quite as much as Jimmy had hoped, at least, not until she got home.) In the fantasy, she’d be standing there, other side of the door to Autopsy (or wherever they were) watching, unable to turn away, feeling nipples get tight and pussy wet, and it’d just be too much. She’d have to start touching herself. He’d have that image in his mind. Lee, or whomever he was with, in real life, in front of him, on his body, and the ghost in his head, watching, eyes wide, rubbing herself off at the sight of him and whichever partner he was with, but really, at the sight of him.

Well, Tim’s not a girl, but he, and the girls, know for a fact that if one of the three of them is going to be the watcher, Jimmy’s going to prefer it be him. He does have a collection of “skirts.” Though, given how the girls are setting up that sofa, he’s fairly sure Jimmy’s not going to have much of a view of anything besides the girls, so jeans, or something with a zipper, so Jimmy can hear how turned on the watcher is, will help.

Tim changes out of his got home from work, lounging around PJ pants into a pair of jeans, and then heads downstairs. He’s got a fifteen minute wait for things to “get going” before he “catches” them.

He decides to go all out on it. He grabs his keys, gets in his car, and drives around, so that, when it’s time for him to “catch them,” Jimmy’ll have a lot of sound cues to let him know what’s up.

By the time he pulls up, very aware of the crunching sound of his tires on the gravel driveway, Tim’s really looking forward to this. He’s not sure exactly what he’s going to see when he gets up there, but it’s going to be good. It always is.

He slams the car door shut, and double clicks the lock fob, making the car chirp at him.

He’s loud as he opens the door to the house, and tromps up the stairs. He doesn’t call out ‘hello’ but he does make a little “Oh!” sound when he slips into the bedroom.

But that “oh’s!” genuine.
They’ve got Jimmy lying down on that sex sofa, and he’s looking awfully happy to be there. His head is back on the lower of the two curves, back resting against it, and his feet are on the floor. His posture is loose and relaxed. He’s having a good time, but not starting to ramp up, not yet.

Abby’s leaning back against the higher of the two curves, her legs over Jimmy, her hands between his legs, gently stroking the insides of his thighs, balls, cock, and stomach.

Breena’s at his head, kneeling against the lower cushion, kissing him, stroking his face and chest.

Tim’s certain Jimmy knows he’s there, but right now, he’s kissing Breena, and not looking away from her.

Tim leans against the wall, settling back, watching.

Abby looks over her shoulder at him, and grins, and he smiles back at her. Then she gets back to focusing on Jimmy.

They’re gorgeous. Gold candlelight flickering on bodies he adores. Everyone’s moving soft and easy, long gentle touches, and deep, wet kisses, just getting started. Jimmy’s naked. Abby’s wearing stockings and gloves, all in black. Breena’s mostly behind the sofa, so he can’t see too much of her, but the bits he can see tells him she’s in a very pretty pink lace bra.

Abby leans forward, and Breena leans down, and they’re both licking Jimmy’s chest, interspersing licks with nips, and he’s groaning at it, enjoying the bit of pain to go with pleasure. He raises his head, looking at the ladies first, and then looking in Tim’s direction. Tim’s not entirely sure how well Jimmy can see him. He’s not wearing his glasses, but he may have his contacts in.

Tim smiles at him, anyway, and lets his eyes trail over the three of them.

Then Breena’s got Jimmy’s (and Tim’s) full attention. She’s wearing a pair of very small, very expensive pink satin pumps, and is slowly, gently, trailing the toe of one of them down Jimmy’s body from his collarbone to his hip, and he’s groaning at that.

Tim doesn’t get the thing about the shoes, but apparently Jimmy does. His eyes are glued to Breena’s foot as that tiny wisp of shiny pink fabric gently slips just a little further down his body. He whimpers when Breena pulls back, moving away from him, and then situates herself on the higher of the two curves, keeping one foot on the floor, making sure she’s got good balance, and then stretches her other leg high above Jimmy, letting him just stare at her long, shapely leg, with that shoe at the end of it. She strokes his face with her toes, and he whimpers again, turning his face, kissing the toe of the shoe, and arching up as she again trails it down his body.

Tim supposes on a just basic sensation level, that it probably feels pretty nice trailing against his skin, but… Jimmy’s at way past pretty nice. So, yes, Tim’s not wired for what Jimmy’s getting out of that experience, but he does get desire, and he gets sex, and he gets Jimmy trying to get off that sofa, trying to get more of what he wants, and that, along with the two mostly naked women, is hitting him hard.

He unzips his jeans, slowly, deliberately, maximizing the sound of the zipper, and Jimmy doesn’t look away from Breena, or what she’s doing to him, but he groans at the sound.

He groans louder as Abby bites his hip. Sucking a hickey into him. His hips jerk at that sensation, trying to get his dick into or at least near, something hot and wet.

“Watch, Jimmy,” Breena says, gently resting just the tip of the toe of her shoe against the base of Jimmy’s dick, tracing it up his skin, and he does, eyes glazed, dick starting to leak.
That’s getting to Tim. He knows how that feels. So hard and so full and so wanting and so needing. He’s been there, staring at something so hot he doesn’t know what to do with it. Something so hot he’s got to get off on it. He unsnaps the jeans, scooting them down his hips, and palms himself, feeling his cock, hot, hard, ready, in his hand.

Jimmy doesn’t notice Abby move to his head. His eyes are focused on Breena’s shoe, and his dick, and the way it’s just kissing over his skin.

Abby licks the shell of his ear, as close to a kiss as she can get without breaking his view, and then runs her fingers through his hair.

Tim knows what that does for Jimmy, too. Knows he loves that, and loves it even more with a little tug, and… Yes, Abby’s giving his hair a little pull as Breena puts both feet down on the floor, hooks her finger into the crotch of her g-string, slowly pulls it to the side, showing off her naked pussy, stroking her fingers over it, and then slips onto Jimmy.

The girls time it right, getting both sensations at once, and again, Jimmy almost jerks off the sofa, with a loud cry of pleasure.

Tim moans at it, too. His hand is tight, moving over his dick, but dry. There’s no sound involved in what he’s doing. Abby’s shifted around, straddling Jimmy’s face, so in a moment, he’ll have no view, period.

Tim steps forward, finds the lube, and slicks himself up. He groans, loud, at that, too. Slick hand on his dick may not be his favorite sex ever, but right now, especially when Jimmy groaned, too, because he heard that, and is hearing the soft, slick sounds that goes with what Tim’s doing, it’s working just fine for him.

Tim kneels close. He can kiss Breena, and does, and that makes what he’s doing with his hand a thousand times better. He kisses Abby, too, loving her lips on his.

Both of the girls have glazed, blissed-out looks on their faces, so riding Jimmy’s treating them just fine, too.

He keeps kissing, moving from one of his ladies to the next and back again, keeping pace with Jimmy, rocking his dick through his fist at the same speed Breena’s rocking on Jimmy. She shifts a little, tucking her feet up next to Jimmy’s hips, not exactly digging the heels into him, but he can certainly feel them against him, and that gets another loud groan out of Jimmy.

Tim’s is watching. Watching both of his ladies, but also Jimmy, watching muscles grow tight, and hips moving fast. Watching his hands clench, one of them on Breena’s ankle, his thumb stroking the band of her shoe, the other on Abby’s hip, helping him keep pace with the way she’s rocking. They’re moving faster, in concert, skin glowing in the soft candlelight.

He knows Jimmy’s close, his rhythm is growing sharper, more staccato, and he knows the point of the fantasy is that the person watching gets off on seeing the action, so Tim moves his hand faster, standing between the girls, kissing each of them, feeling his body thrum with pleasure, and his muscles growing tighter.

And as his body stiffens, grows tight and glowing with pleasure, teetering on the edge of rapture, he feels suffused with love, like it’s soaked into every cell of his body, like the it’s the water that flows through everything, keeping him alive.

He jerks, shudders, spurting on Jimmy’s belly, and that little cum cry, along with the spatter, the feeling, knowing that someone got off watching him, sets Jimmy to moaning and twitching, too.

At the age of forty Tim is a lover, and he’s learned that sex is more complicated, more nuanced, and more splendid than anything he could have imagined as a young man, and he is eternally grateful for that.

Jimmy’s last thoughts of the first day of his fortieth year, beyond the general buzz of feeling excellently post-climax-blissed-out and snoozy between his ladies, is how much he loves this life he’s collected over the years.

Breena’s on his right, laying on her side, lips against his shoulder, arm over his chest, leg over his hip. Her usual place, almost, her leg is about two inches higher than normal, so it’s not resting on his glucose monitor. He kisses her, slow, gentle, easy. Both of them are almost asleep.

Abby’s on his left. Her back to his side. His hand is resting on her hip, cupping that soft, warm curve. He kisses the back of her neck, and she wriggles against him gently.

And from there, wrapped in his ladies, somewhat wishing Tim were here, too, mostly just happy someone else is on baby duty for the night, and he can just sleep, Jimmy drifts off.

Tim’s last thoughts of the first day of his forty-first year, focus on the baby on his chest, eating his bottle.

Donald Timothy Palmer is his. He, like his older half-brother, looks more like Tim than Tim looked like Tim at three months old. As the old adage goes, “There’s no denying that child.”

And there isn’t, and won’t be.

Donnie is his, completely. And he’s Jimmy’s, just as much. And of course he’s Breena’s, but he’s Abby’s, too.

And that’s true for all the kids. And it’s something none of the adults really expected when they got into this, but that doesn’t make it any less true. The children are theirs. And he’s not sure what’s going to happen with that, if eventually he’ll be Daddy and Jimmy will be Papa or how that’ll work. Maybe he’ll always be Uncle Tim to the baby on his chest, but he knows that he’s just as much Dad to this child as Jimmy is. That Abby will be just as much Mom as Breena. And that will be true, no matter what the titles are.

And he knows that, because at forty, Tim McGee knows that love is limitless, and that it feeds upon itself, growing richer and fuller as it’s shared.

Donnie’s done with his bottle, and Tim drapes the spit up cloth over his shoulder, and gets him situated.

“Okay little boy, let’s work the burps out, and then sleepy time for both of us.”
Donnie gurgles at that as Tim starts patting his back. They walk around the nursery, Tim humming softly, patting gently, as Donnie fusses a little.

He may be tired, and wishing he was in bed with the rest of his spouses, but at forty, Tim McGee can say he’s happy.
“So, what’s on for this week?” Tim asks Jennifer as he sweeps in on Monday morning.

“A lot of the same. Building your infrastructure. Meetings about building. Supervising. Meetings about supervising. Meetings explaining to the higher ups what you’re up to. Meetings with your department heads, seeing what they’re up to.”

Tim nods. “Yep. Same old, same old.”

“One little bit of new. Attorney General Glane wants to meet with you. You’ve got an hour with him on Wednesday.”

That is new. “He say why?”

“Nope. Just wants to meet up, at his place.”

“All right. I’ll be there.”

As he’s heading to a fairly non-descript building in the suburbs of DC, a fairly non-descript building that is very much not part of the Justice Department complex, Tim’s feeling fairly ‘iffy’ about meeting with the Attorney General.

Because his previous federal service was with NCIS, most of his casework went through the JAG system. But not all of it. So, he knows, on a somewhat personal level, that the AG’s office is in charge of prosecuting and defending all of the government’s stuff. And he certainly remembers Comey pointing out that when the FBI wants to do things that other people think may be a tad on the illegal side, the AG is the organization that defends those lawsuits. That’s what got Comey to ‘look the other way.’ He didn’t just need the AG to prosecute his cases, he also needed them to defend them.

And he also knows that the previous AG pulled a runner and is assumed to be dead. She and, from the looks of it, most of her staff were up to their eyeballs, if not completely submerged, in the shit that took everything down in The Fall.

He knows that this new AG was, until a year ago, the Assistant Director for the New York State branch of the AGs office, and apparently he was the highest rated member of the AG’s office they could find with completely clean hands. (And he knows, because, having had this meeting go on the books, that the reason why Mr. Glane had clean hands is because no one thought enough of him to bring him into any of the conspiracies. Tim couldn't find out if that meant he's got the personality of a dead fish, or if he's got the brains of one.)

And, on top of that he knows that, of the cases he’s sent to the AG since he’s been in charge, more than six months now, less than 10% of them have even resulted in a meeting, let alone a court date, or anything approaching a prosecution.

So, to say that he’s not overwhelmingly impressed with AG Glane as of this point, and that he’s curious as to why he’s getting called in, and that, parking in a lot of what looks like just another corporate building, he’s feeling mostly a sense of ‘meh’, is not an exaggeration.
Yes, it looks like just another building in a corporate park on the outside, but the security on the inside is good.

Tim generally prefers that only a small group of people he’s extremely fond of ever touch him that intimately, but, just like every other time he goes through one, he set the metal detector off, and then when they wanded him, the wand started screaming like he’d killed its parents, so he got significantly more like felt up than patted down before they let him into the AG’s office proper.

He doesn’t make the quip about the guard should buy him dinner before touching him like that, though he wants to. The guard’s probably heard it a million times and doesn’t need to hear it from him, too. He stands there and lets it happen.

As he’s being fondled by the security guy, he looks around, and tries to remember if the old AG’s office went up in flames, or if they moved out here to make sure there was no shot of it happening in the future.

Once the guard’s finished with him, another thought hits him, if the AG is hiding where their people work, that means they don’t think they’re doing their job well enough to prevent people from wanting to kill them.

That’s not a comforting thought.

“Mr. Glane,” Tim offers his hand to Glane, a man about a decade older than he is, a hundred pounds heavier, and significantly more frazzled looking. “Hello. I’m pleased to finally get to meet you.”

It’s a functional office. Boring really. If there are any hints of personalization in here, Tim’s not seeing them. Of course, this might not actually be Glane’s office. He might have a spot where he meets people, and another spot where he actually works.

This is normally where Glane would say something like, “likewise,” but it doesn’t happen. He doesn't take Tim's hand either, just points to one of his chairs, and then says, “Coffee?”

“Sure, if you have decaf.”

Glane shakes his head, and sits across from Tim, eyeing him as he gets his own cup, of, apparently, full strength coffee ready and then sips it.

Tim’s feeling his defenses going up. This is not just a little meet-and-greet chat-fest, or anything of the sort. “So, what gets you calling a meeting?” Tim asks, deciding to get the ball rolling.

“We understand you’ve been taking a close look at the IRS.”

Tim wonders, idly, where they got that suggestion from, but figures that’s a back burner idea for right now, and says, “It’s my job to take a close look at everyone.”

Glane nods. “Of course. And of course, we want you to do your job.”
“Great,” Tim’s fairly sure there’s a subtext along the lines of “lay off the IRS” here, but it hasn’t been made quite that clear, yet. “Glad to hear it.”

Glane checks his phone, and then says, “My secretary says you’ve sent us 297 cases since you’ve taken over.”

Tim thinks about that. “I don’t have the number off the top of my head, but that sounds about right.”

“Are you recording this conversation, Mr. McGee?”

“No, I wasn’t, but…” Tim pulls out his phone and puts it on the table, clearly recording. “Everything uploads immediately onto the cloud as we speak. So, yes, now I am recording this conversation, and you’re watching me do it.”

“Lovely.” Glane taps his fingers on the table. “You worked for NCIS before going to the FBI, correct?”

“Yes.”

“So, your cases went through the JAG system, did they not?”

“That’s right. I’d have one or two a year you guys would handle, but the rest of them went through the JAG system.”

“Ah…” A very tiny, very tight smile lifts the corners of Glane’s mouth. “It’s good to see you’re at least familiar with the AG’s office and how we work.”

“Yes. But I have the feeling you’d like to make sure I’m even more familiar with it?”

“Exactly. As you know, last year was difficult for us.”

“And everyone else with a Federal job.”

“Indeed.” Glane stares at Tim. Tim’s not sure if that’s supposed to be a message, or if Glane’s blaming him for the bad year the AG had. Possibly both. This is when it occurs to him that just because Glane wasn’t in on any of the conspiracies, doesn’t mean he didn’t approve of them, or love his co-workers the way Tim loves his.

“But it was more difficult for you guys than other branches?” Tim asks.

“Given the fact that we lost a full fifty percent of our staff, and everyone higher up than Assistant Director of a local office, I think it’s clear to see that things were more difficult for us than for most of the other offices.”

Tim nods. “That sounds correct.”

“Because of that difficulty we are extremely low on staff lately. Add in the increased workload we’re getting from New York these days, and my department is stretched very thin.”

Tim nods at that, too. Maybe Glane’s about to explain why none of his cases are going anywhere, yet? “I can understand that. I had to double the size of my department to deal with the projected workload, and we’re still looking for people. I’ve got a good five hundred seats empty, and no one filling them right now.”

“Ah.” Glane relaxes by a hair. “So you understand the complexity of the current environment.”
“I get you’ve got more work than you’ve got bodies to do work. I think we all do right now.”

“Succinctly put.” Glane stares at him, and Tim knows he’s supposed to get a message here. In fact, he’s fairly sure what that message is, but… No, he’s not playing ball, not yet, not like this.

“What I don’t get is why you called me here, or asked about what I’m doing with the IRS.”

Glane looks quite frustrated with Tim. He delivered the message. Tim appeared to get it, and now he’s not doing what he’s supposed to do with said message.

“As of this point in time, I have fewer than fifty attorneys I can put on corruption cases.”

Tim nods at that. “Bottleneck. I’ve got 1500 agents, and 500 more of them coming online as soon as I can hire them. What’s your hiring plan?”

“That’s the question now, isn’t it? Our budget will allow us to replace the people we lost, but not expand.”

“Well, how many will we have after you expand?”

Glane’s eyes are cold. “Fewer than fifty. We didn’t lose corruption lawyers.”

Tim is fairly sure that can’t be true. Not if Glane is the highest ranked man standing. There had to have been someone in charge of a corruption department, or something like that. So, obviously this is part of what he’s supposed to understand, unspoken, and respond to, also unspoken. “That’s good. But… If you had fewer than fifty to begin with, I’m thinking that just possibly that’s part of how last fall happened. What are your plans for expanding that department?”

“If I can get the money for it, I’d like to see 200 lawyers on it, each one with a full team of support personnel. We have immigration lawyers that we will no longer need as immigration lawyers. But, to get them ready we need to retrain them. That takes time and money. We can hire some new lawyers, but again, that takes time and money.”

Tim grasps that concept. He’s doing the same thing with his department, too. “So, take the time and money and do it? It’s not like you’re hiring agents who have to go through FLETC or the Academy. Last I checked we had way more lawyers graduating law school than there were jobs for them.”

“I would love to do that. All I need is the budget.”

“Okay…” Tim’s thinking he knows where this is going. Glane mentions the IRS, he mentions not having enough guys, he mentions needing more money, so… Maybe? He’s also thinking this is an excellent time to play as stupid as he can. “I can give you my grandmother’s number. She’s a congresswoman, and I think they’re the ones who do the budget stuff.”

Glane glares at Tim, and sighs. Tim’s not sure if he’s buying the stupid act, but he’s definitely frustrated by that response.

Tim sees Glane watching him, sees him debate what, if anything to say next. It’s clear he’s not sure how much he can say, or if he should even try. He stands up. “Okay, Mr. McGee, thank you for your time. I’ll happily take your grandmother’s number.”

Tim knows he’s being dismissed. He stands up, shakes Glane’s hand, and then sends him Penny’s number.
Tim replays the conversation as he rides back to the FBI.

If he’s understanding all of the unspoken bits correctly, and he’s not sure he is, but, if he is, Glane’s telling him that if he ignores the IRS, he’ll have a pile of lawyers in the not wildly distant future to sic on his various cases, but if he doesn’t leave them alone that less than fifty is going to stay right where it is.

Maybe.

Probably.

He stares at the ceiling of his car, sitting in the FBI parking garage, thinking. Then he calls Penny, because if anyone is going to have good instincts on this, it’ll be her.

“Hey, Penny, you got a few minutes?”

“I only answer the phone when I do. What’s up?”

“That’s what I need to know, too. Would you listen to a conversation between me and AG Glane and tell me what you think he’s saying?”

“Sure, Tim.”

Tim plays the conversation, and he hears Penny make occasional little ‘hmm’ noises. She asks him to replay it one more time, so he does. And when it’s done he says, “So?”

“Lay off the IRS, and you get to do your job. Don’t lay off of them, and you’ll get the barest skeleton crew available to you.”

Tim looks annoyed by this. “That’s what I was thinking he was saying. So… Can he do this?”

“Yes. The AG and any other state’s attorney has full prosecutorial discretion. He can, or cannot, take any case he pleases for any reason he pleases.”

Tim glares at that. He certainly knows that’s worked for him in the past. His team has used that to boot particularly sympathetic cases, but… Somedays, like today, that feels like way too much power to vest in any one man. “So, if I keep going after the IRS, he could decide to go on a full strike against the FBI, and refuse to litigate any of our cases?”

“He can, but he’s unlikely to do it. That’ll make him look bad enough his head will roll.”

“But this doesn’t? I mean… If he’s got no one working my cases I’ve got no problem screaming that to the heavens.”

“Tim…” She sighs. “First off, he’ll make sure someone is on your cases. They’ll be terrible at the job and vastly overworked, but there’ll be someone doing the job. If you keep going after the IRS, and if you get a skeleton crew of the AG’s least competent people working on your cases, I and a few hundred other congressmen will go on the warpath for you. We’ll be loud, and we may even be able to get Glane out of his job.”

Tim doesn’t like the way she sounds when she says that. “That sounds like a huge BUT is coming up.”
“It is. BUT, as you may have noticed…” She pauses on that, thinking, “or maybe you haven’t, we’re in something of a larger than usual money crunch here in Federal Government-land. Losing the tax revenue from California and Texas hurt, losing the money from North Dakota, New Hampshire, Maine, Montana, and Utah didn’t hurt as much, but it certainly isn’t helping. The market has not been kind to the value of US treasury bonds lately, limiting the amount of money we can raise by taking on more debt. More people than usual have been cashing in the bonds that were outstanding than before, which means more money is flowing out. So we have to rely more on money coming in from the IRS to keep paying the debt on those bonds. And that just pays our debts, doesn’t buy or build anything new, and before you say it, if we just print more money, our current situation of the dollar holding value will go from shaky to completely nonexistent.”

Tim swallows, hard.

“And, if I understand the cases you’re looking to put in play on the IRS, you’re going to draw attention to the fact that they’re trying to get people to plea out on cases where they don’t have the evidence to win, in an effort to get them to pay huge fines.”

“Yeah. That’s part of it. Heidi Partridge is another part of it.”

“On the first bit… You keep going on that, more people will chose to go to court. That means the IRS loses the cases because they don’t have the evidence any longer. And that means even less money to pay off our debts. Don’t pay those debts…”

Tim sighs. “Okay, yeah. And Heidi ended up dead because she had the way to keep people trading goods and services and not paying taxes on them.”

“Exactly. So… Yes, I can go on the warpath for this. I can likely get Glane booted. And I can tell you that the guy who replaces him, and the one who replaces him, and the one after that, and the next guy and then the one after him, and so on and so forth will all take the same line he is. The IRS has to be able to get the maximum amount of money, and it doesn’t matter how it does it, because absolutely nothing else we want to do happens without cash coming in.”

Tim sighs, hard, feeling punched in the guts. “Shit.”

Penny almost chuckles. “Welcome to adulthood, land of soul-crushing compromises.”

“Yeah, great. Advice?”

“Certainly. Nothing lasts forever. We will rebuild, we’ll resettled, we will get the money flowing again. Stay the course, build your cases, quietly, secretly, and in five or so years from now, when we aren’t grubbing for every single dime we can lay hands on, go get ‘em. There’s no statute on murder. There’s currently no statute on corruption cases. Go after the lower hanging fruit, clean up what you can with what you’ve got, and by the time you go after the IRS, you’ll have a cleaner workspace, more tools, and a better vantage point to do it from.”

That sounds distressingly rational. “At the very least, I’ll have a better idea where the AG got the intel that I was working on the IRS case to begin with.”

“Yes. And by that point you will have people on your side inside the AG’s office, who you will need if you want to take out the big players without a re-do of last fall. Tim, you’re forty. You’ve probably got twenty-five years to build this. You’re in position to play the long game, so play the long game. Build your team, and put this on the back burner for now.”

“Thanks Penny.”
“You’re welcome. Are you going to do it?”

Tim sighs again, still staring at the ceiling of his car. “I don’t know.”

“Think about it.”

“I will.”

---

Play the long game. Penny’s not wrong, that’s firmly in the soul-crushing compromises column.

And she’s absolutely right, he will have an easier time doing this if he’s got a team in place when he moves, instead of building the team _while_ he does this.

But, God, it leaves a bad taste in his mouth. Jennifer raises an eyebrow at him, able to feel the bad mood as he storms into his office, and he shakes his head at her.

The AG knew what he was doing with the IRS… Or… Did he just guess? Not like he’s been on ultra-silent mode with this stuff.

He calls his Uncle.

“Tim?”

“Hey, Uncle Tom.”

“What’s up? Got a new target in need of some surveilling?”

“That right this second,” though as he says that, he’s thinking he does, but he’s not saying anything to Tom about checking out the AG’s office until they’re at the house for Christmas, and he’s swept the place for bugs. “I got a warning shot across my bow on behalf of the IRS. I need you to double check, make sure your guys got in and out clean.”

“I can do that.”

Tim’s relieved that Tom’s not taking that as a personal affront to his competence.

“And I want you to check on Walter, make sure his guys got in and out clean, too.”

He feels Tom smile at that. “On it. And let me guess. He’s going to be checking me and mine, too?”

“Of course. They got the heads up from somewhere, so…”

“Okay. I’m on it.”

He calls Walter and has basically the same conversation. And again, he’s relieved to see that Walter doesn’t think him double-checking is a personal insult.

As they’re wrapping up Walter says, “So… you want me to keep moving people into the IRS?”

Tim sighs, long and low. “That’s the question now, isn’t it? Right now, when we don’t know how the word is being spread… Whoever you’ve got in play, keep them there. Don’t expand any further, though.”
“And if my guys are talking…”

“Find out first. We’ll figure out where to go from there.”

“Okay.”

Tim stares at the ceiling in his office. Then he looks away, rubbing the kink in his neck. He’s been staring at ceilings too damn much today.

He shakes his head, then rolls it, feeling little crunchy sensations as he rolls his neck. The girls have been talking about Abbi’s bachelorette party, and mentioning that some sort of spa day massage party is part of it. Right now he’s wondering if they’d mind too much if he invited himself to that part of the party.

He snorts a bit. Yeah, they’d mind. That’s girl time, and he’s not a girl. And they’d suggest that as a perfectly functional human being in possession of a phone, internet connection, and credit card that he can sign himself, and better yet, himself and them up for a massage on some other day.

He thinks about that. Christmas is coming… in less than a week. That’s a few pleasant moments of research, and he’s got some Christmas presents for the four of them, but once done, he’s back to the same place he was before. What to do next?

His hand is reaching for his phone again, and he’s not quite got an idea of who to call. Abbi springs to mind first, but… Yeah. Last week in New Orleans. He can wait until she’s home to talk to her. Nothing he’s doing on this needs to happen right this second.

But, his phone is in his hand, and… Leon. Leon would probably have some insight into this.

He doesn’t get an answer, but he does get Leon’s voice mail. “Hey, Leon, it’s McGee, can I buy you a coffee or lunch sometime this week?”

And with that, he’s feeling a little more settled, and gets back to the million other things he needs to do.

“You know what the worst part of it is?” he says to his family later that night, before they go to bed.

“You mean, besides the fact that you don’t know how the AG found out what you’re up to?” Abby asks.

“Besides that,” Tim replies. “Though that part’s bugging me, too.”

“The fact that they think you can be bought off?” Breena asks.

Tim glowers at that. “That one hadn’t hit me, but, yeah, that’s annoying, too.”

He eyes Jimmy, who shakes his head. He knows that was a rhetorical question, and isn’t going to add to it.

“The fact that it’s actually not stupid. Like, if someone had hit me with it the way Penny put it. Take your time, get your team and contacts in place first, make sure you’ve got a sound footing, and then go after the big fish, I might have listened to that. But now it’s a threat and part of me wants to double down immediately, go after the IRS fullbore, just to say, ‘You can’t make me do anything!’”

Jimmy nods at that, and Abby says, “Of course, that might be the plan.”

Breena agrees. “If any of these guys know Gibbs at all, or have heard of him, or have been paying attention to who you are, they may be trying to goad you into moving fast, without the proper structure in place, so you muff it, and then you get booted out and they end up with someone easier to deal with.”

Tim groans at that. “At any point over the last fifteen years, have I ever given any of you any reason to think that this kind of shit was my idea of a good time?”

That gets some scoffing, and a bit of supportive petting, but none of the four of them really know what the right answer is.

Leon’s got free time on Friday. And, by Friday, Tim’s more than happy to buy him a coffee, or lunch, or drink, or at this point whatever the hell he might like, assuming it gets him expounding on how to run a damn agency and thread needles like this.

Fortunately for Tim’s wallet, Leon’s good with coffee and a donut.

“I know you aren’t plying me with caffeine and sugar just for the pleasure of my company,” Leon says, as he’s biting into his chocolate glazed donut.

Tim sips his decaf and nods. It’s good, and the donut looks and smells amazing. He’ll happily come back here again. Neither of them have ever been to this donut shop before for one very good reason, Tim picked it at random ten minutes before they got together, while they were driving. He figures if he didn’t know where they were going, there’s no way anyone else could have, either.

“Nope. Got a hard question, one that I don’t want anyone listening in on.”

Two in the afternoon on the Friday before Christmas, they aren’t the only people in the place, but they are the only people sitting at a table, talking. Everyone else is ordering to go.

Tim takes another sip and lays out his conversation with the AG. Leon listens, and nods, sips his coffee, and then pulls out a toothpick to chew on, too. Tim adds in what his grandmother, and Breena had to say, also.

Leon nods along. “You’re getting good advice.”

“That part I knew. What do I do with it?”

Leon sniggers. “Welcome to management.”

Tim rolls his eyes.

Leon sips his coffee, a smile sparkling in his own gaze. “I know you don’t want to hear it. But your grandmother’s got it right. That’s how I’d do it, too. But, here’s the bit she doesn’t have. It is useful to have a few loose cannons who you just can’t control under you.”

Tim is suddenly getting why Team Gibbs got as much slack as it did. Leon sees him get it, and nods.

“You be the deal maker. You be the ‘reasonable’ one. You make sure they know that you’ve got this guy under you who’s a massive pain in the ass, but you just can’t get rid of him. By the way, that’s why you don’t sack your damn union, so you’ve got a reason why you can’t get rid of your bulldog. There hasn’t been a single director of NCIS who loves NCISEU, but, we all toe the line so when it’s time to whip out the bulldog, we have a reason for why he’s still there and why our hands are tied.”

Tim sighs. “I didn’t sack FBIEU.”

Leon smirks at that.

“Yeah, great. You couldn’t tell me this before I crushed them.”

Leon shakes his head. “You needed to do it to get rid of your deadwood. From now going forward though…”

That bridge is beyond burnt. Nothing left to do for it. “Yeah, fine. So, pull back?”

“That’s what I’d do. And go make sure you’ve got a collection of Gibbslets. Make sure you’ve got at least one of them per district, but probably no more than one. You need to have at least a few of them, but you don’t want every one of your teams to be full of them. We’re organized by geography, so that’s how I’ve got mine set. You do yours however you’re organizing.”

“By specialty.”

“That works. Your Gibbs-team will, mostly, do whatever it does, but from time to time you’ll make sure it gets the case you’re not supposed to be looking at too closely, and, ‘Shucks, it’s out of your hands.’ No one likes that, but if you don’t abuse it—“

Tim flashes a very curious look.

“Everyone plays the game this way. You give your Gibbs-Team that sort of case when it really matters, but only when it really matters. Don’t pull this out for piddly stuff. Your IRS case… That’s got levels, right?”

Tim explains about that, and Leon keeps listening, sipping his coffee, gnawing his toothpick to a nub.

When Tim’s done with the IRS muck, Leon says, “Okay, good. This is part of how you draw your lines and your management style. If you keep your Gibbs-team on Ms. Partridge, you’re telling the AG and whomever else that you won’t look the other way for a murder. That’s your hardline.”

Tim’s familiar with the idea of hardlines, so he nods.

“But… The rest of the IRS case, the evidence stuff, a lot of those cases, in the first place, they had the evidence. That’s what we’re thinking, right? Most of it is gone because it was destroyed, not they never bothered to get it in the first place?”

Tim shrugs. “I hope so. Possibly. Diane’s said some things about the IRS to make me think that it’s entirely possible that there wasn’t ever evidence, and that the law’s intentionally so complicated that every single person is always breaking the tax law, so… That’s part of why they were on my radar so fast. When one of their hot shot investigators tells me it’s literally impossible to obey those laws, and they’re intentionally written that way, I get a little edgy about that.”

That gets a yeah, what can you do look from Leon. “McGee, look, no one is saying the IRS is clean, or that you shouldn’t have your eyes on it.” That stops Leon as soon as it’s out of his mouth. “Maybe the AG was saying something like that. I’m not saying that. I am saying that this would be a situation where you’ve got a good division of issues. You can keep your Team Gibbs on Ms. Partridge, back off on your evidence hunt, and let them know that you’re willing to play along, but only up to a certain extent. Everyone here plays the game, and if you give them some of what they want, you’ll get some of it in return.”

“And if I keep on investigating, just quietly?”

Leon shakes his head slowly at that one. “For right now, stop it. You don’t have the people in place. And you need them for this. You need high-trust professionals. People who are excellent at their job, who have a proven track record of getting you what you need, and when you need it. Right now you’ve got a few of them, and an entire department of people who are not particularly thrilled at you, looking to get you out of your chair. Give it a few years, get the people in place, weed out the people aren’t happy you took over.”

Tim winces.

“I know. I didn’t want to hear anything like that as I was rising up, either. But, I can tell you, that right now I can run missions I couldn’t have dreamed of when I first sat my butt in Shepard’s chair, and I can do it because I’ve got people who are personally loyal to me.” Leon gives a small snort of a laugh. “I’ve got you, for example, and by extension a lot of the FBI, able to lend me a hand. But I didn’t have you, and team Gibbs, you guys were sure I was trouble for… the first few years, at least, when I first took over.”

Tim rolls his eyes a little. “You acted like trouble.”

“No. I acted like you. Or you’re acting like me. I got sent in after a corrupt director who was playing way outside the bounds, and my job was to clean up her mess, a mess you guys had way more of a hand in making than anyone else. My job was to sort that all out. And honestly, you guys are lucky that SecNav wanted that taken care of quietly and Shepard died, because the easiest way to deal with the Shepard mess was to just cut you all out.”

Tim sighs, remembering both the mess Shepard got them into, and how long it took them to decide that Leon was on the up and up. He figures that, of the bunch of them, he was the first one to decide Leon was on Team White Hat, because he was the first one to get Leon’s trust in return. “Trust has to be a two way street.”

“Exactly. You’ve got to be in there long enough for them to know that if you ask them to step on a ledge, you’re doing it for a good reason, and you’ll make sure to catch them if they fall. You built up that rapport with the guys in Cybercrime, and you did it fast. You can and will do it again, but it’s going to take longer.”

Tim takes another swallow of his coffee.

“I’ll give you the same advice Morrow gave me. Clean up your own house before you go after anyone else’s. That way, when you’ve got to pull from your own team to stand and fight, you know they’ll stand and fight with you.”

Tim nods. No he doesn’t really want to hear that, but it makes a lot of sense.
“One other bit of advice. If you have a reputation for being ‘reasonable,’ when you need the help of other teams, they will provide it. More importantly, if you are ‘reasonable,’ when you do turn against the members of another team, the rest of that team will be much more likely to listen to what you have to say, and act on it. Right now, pretty much anyone you go up against will close ranks against you. You’re an outsider, and you’re going to take them down. Get a reputation for only going against people when it matters, and you’ll get more cooperation.”

“Sounds like looking the other way, a lot.”

Leon half smiles. “McGee, you’ve got enough work cleaning up your own mess to keep three departments busy, full time, for years. That buys you time on the wider scale. Go after some of your pet projects and make a reputation on them. A few at a time. I’ve been hearing about what Taylor’s doing with the Federal Prisons, and that’s a really good one to start with. He’s just quietly going in and doing his job, getting a lot of good brownie points, and not stepping on too many toes while he does it.”

“That’s because none of the big guys care about the prison system.”

Leon half smiles again, grabbing a new toothpick. “Exactly. But it’s building his, and your reputation. You’re doing a good, thorough job. You’re doing it on something that matters, but isn’t glamorous. Taylor’s being reasonable. His people aren’t going in and demanding the impossible, nor are they slaughtering everyone near the problem, they’re just making sure that the people around them follow the rules, and the ones who don’t get smacked. Find a few more Federal Prison systems, handle them well, and then you’re going to get other guys who want to be good at their jobs calling you for help. They ask for help, you give it to them, this builds up relationships. That way, when your Black Hats go in, and whoever gets wind of it, they’ll know you’re on the up and up, and if your guys are in there, there’s a real problem, because you don’t dick around with piddly crap and you don’t sic your attack dogs on people based on a whim or politics.”

Tim rolls his eyes at that, too.

“Build your reporting system. Get that in place. By the time you’ve got that set, so that people know that when you get a case it’s real, and a solid reputation that when you go after something it’s because it’s broken and needs to be fixed not because your ego is on the line, you will have a much easier time doing what you want to do.”

Tim shakes his head again. “I told my family last night, ‘Have I ever, in fifteen years, done anything to indicate that this was what I wanted to do?’”

Leon laughs at that. “Get your team in place. You can’t build without a good foundation, and you don’t have one, yet.”

Tim nods. “Thanks, Leon.”

“You’re welcome, McGee.” He sips his coffee. “So, no big Christmas shindig this year, right?”

“Sort of. We’ve got McGees from all over the globe coming, starting tonight actually, and when none of us were watching Fornell grafted himself onto the family, so he and Wendy will be there, but with the wedding the next weekend, none of us felt like doing a big party two weeks in a row.”

Leon laughs at that, too. “I can see that. And how is the groom doing?”

That gets a gentle smile from Tim. “He’s good. He and Abbi are back from New Orleans today, and home for the next six weeks. They’re both happy about that.”
“I can certainly understand that. Nothing better than getting home after living out of a suitcase for weeks…”

Tim nods, and the two of them spend a bit of time talking about the upcoming festivities of the Gibbs clan.

On the way back to work, Tim keeps thinking about what to do.

If he hadn’t gotten rid of Comey, he knows exactly what he would have done, gone right on doing what he’s doing. Because if he hadn’t gotten rid of Comey, he’d know his place. When Comey was in charge, it was his job to be the bulldog.

But Comey’s gone. And he’s okay with the new Director, but he’s not nearly so sure that Tarkin’s got his back the way Comey did.

Scratch that, he knows that Tarkin doesn’t have his back the way Comey did. Maybe, one day, like Leon, if they work together long enough, and come up with a shared vision for where the FBI is going and what it’s going to do, he will. Or, given he worked with Comey for only a few months, maybe they’ll have a closer, better relationship.

But right now, they don’t.

That might as well be his theme song these days. Right now, he doesn’t. Even with the men who he’s feeling closest to, his Uncle and Walter, he doesn’t have that sort of relationship. Not now. But maybe, with enough time, he will.

Until then… He picks up his phone, “Hey Walter.”

“McGee… You sound unhappy.”

“Yeah. Not loving being the boss right now. Loving it or not, it’s got to get done. We’re going to keep going on the Heidi Partridge case, but we’re, for now, pulling back on the rest of the IRS investigation.”

Walter’s quiet for a moment. “That feels like a kick in the stomach,” comes out when he finally speaks.

“I know. I’ve gotten what’s likely good advice lately, and… Can’t build your castle without a proper foundation. We go after the FBI first, focus in on us, make sure our own house, and team, is in order, and then we’ll go after the big players.”

Walter sounds disappointed, just like Tim. “Probably a good idea.”

“Yeah. Probably. Next time, we’re not going to get a heads up from the AG letting us know one of our guys has been talking.”

“That’s an upside,” though Walter sounds lukewarm on that.

“Doesn’t feel like much, though, does it?”

“No. Granted, I only had one person in the IRS. Getting people into play is difficult right now.”
Tim nods. “Yeah. Another reason to wait, we need to get our own teams filled out.”

“Okay. So, hiring, and…”

“Start here. Go through the old complaints if you don’t have any idea of who to target first. Just because we cut the Public Corruption department to the bone, doesn’t mean we’ve looked wider. Go forth, kick ass, take names, and get me, and the rest of the FBI, a clean team to do great things with.”

Walter sounds a bit more enthusiastic as he says, “On it, Boss.”
Pulling up to the house, ready to start Christmas weekend, Tim’s feeling… pretty good. He’s… wary probably isn’t the right word, but it’s in the right neighborhood at the idea of the grand gathering of the McGee clan.

He completely gets it from his grandmother’s perspective. For the first time in, forever… since Nelson’s funeral, so, thirty years, which is close enough to forever… almost all of her family is getting together in one place.

He’s sure that when he’s 85, the idea of getting the kids, and their spouses, and their kids and their spouses, and possibly their kids, all in one place for a massive Christmas extravaganza will seem awesome. So, he completely gets it for her.

But… Okay, things are great with his Uncle Tom and Aunt Lynne. He enjoys spending time with them, and probably needs to have a little chat with Tom about an extremely clandestine mission to get people looking at the AG’s office. Something where he’ll have a year or two to plan and get the right people for it. So, sure, side A of the extended family is fine.

And, that one visit with Uncle Mike went just fine, too.

But he’s a little apprehensive that John’s going to come up. Either from the other cousins, who don’t know all the story, or the alcohol will get flowing, and what’s likely good memories for Penny, kids all messing around doing Christmas-y things, will get talked about, and he’ll have to listen to stories about John being… human. A kid. A person with a past and a childhood and all of those messy ties that make him less of a monster and more of a…

Whatever he is.

But, apprehensive or not, he’s sitting in the car, watching flurries drift down, kissing the windshield and melting on the glass, getting colder by the second, because he turned the engine off when he pulled in.

It’s time to move.

Tromping through the driveway he passes several cars he doesn’t recognize, as well as Jimmy’s car, and Breena’s. Looks like he’s the last of his crew in tonight.

The idea of all of them at home makes him smile. Sure, he can’t give everyone a proper greeting, but just seeing them will be good, and it’s not like there are all that many hours between now and bedtime.

He opens the front door, seeing that as of yet, no Christmas decorations are up. Apparently, like last year, this year they’re going to go do the decorating on the 24th. He likes the idea of that. Especially as the kids get older, having something for them to do most of the day before Christmas seems like an excellent idea.

The warmth and light of inside hits him, along with a rattling sound and a really bizarre smell.
Coffee. Maybe? Smoke and... something else, he’s not sure what. The whole house is drenched in it.

As he steps in, hanging his coat in the coat closet, and toeing off his shoes, putting them in the line with the other shoes, lots of other shoes, he wonders what’s going on. Yes, any house with a Gibbs in it, yet alone Team Gibbs, is going to have a certain odor of coffee, but this is… maybe… burnt coffee?

He steps further into the house, greeting family, kissing kiddos, hugging them, but still wondering what that rattling sound is. It’s coming from the kitchen, where, apparently many of the adults are. He can hear voices, but isn’t focusing enough on them to hear what they’re actually saying.

It’s only when he’s got Sean on his hip, carrying him to the kitchen that he catches the conversation.

“Wedding present from Tim and Abby and Jimmy and Breena. We got home, found it, and decided to bring it along and play with it,” Abbi’s saying, smiling at a collection of McGees, while Jethro’s watching the spinning coffee roaster drum with laser-like attention.

Tim feels a wide smile spreading over his face, watching the two of them show it off and play with it. “I take it you like it?”

Abbi’s grinning, and Gibbs looks away from the coffee for the barest hint of a second to nod in agreement.

Tim hugs both of them, and then looks around. He sees Penny, and Uncle Tom and Aunt Lynne, one of his cousins, and he doesn’t know the little girl… so she’s got to be one of Uncle Mike’s grandkids. Tony drifts into the kitchen, sees what Gibbs and Borin is playing with, and sighs. “Tim! It was hard enough to get him the right coffee when we’re out, now he’s going to have to come up with Rule Nine: C: Always carry coffee!”

Tim snersks at that, feeling very pleased.

It’s vaguely surreal to need to be introduced to his family, but… Uncle Tom’s extended family has spent most of their lives in Japan. Uncle Mike’s extended family has spent all of their lives in Australia. Tim’s never been to Japan, and hasn’t been in Australia for 39 years. He hasn’t met most of his cousins, and has never had the opportunity to meet all of the second cousins.

So, surreal or not, he’s shaking hands, and introducing himself and his kids to a collection of people, most of them with his last name, many of them with similar eyes (shape, not color, he got his green eyes from his mom) and hair, who he’s never met before.

He wonders, idly, if he has just bumped into one of the assorted McGee cousins, if he’d recognize they look a bit similar, or if he’s only seeing it because he’s looking for it.

When they set up the house, they knew they’d be facing a situation of an unknown number of children, who would, in all likelihood want to entertain buddies here as time went on. They also knew that, an hour out of DC, when they’d have gatherings here, people would likely want to stay the night rather than drive back, late.
So, when they set the house up, they didn’t stint on guest rooms. There’s three furnished guest rooms, and though right now it’s only got carpet, painted walls, and empty shelves, there is a wide area that will be a dorm-like room for the kids when they get older so that, even if it’s only the cousins, they can all have sleep-overs. And when they get older and invite larger groups of buddies, there’s room for them, too. And, best of all, they’ll have a chunk of the house that’s not directly underfoot of the rest of the family.

With all of that space, by the time they got all the rooms furnished, they figured they were ready for whatever guest situations might hit the House.

That’s until every one of Penny’s descendants descended on the place.

Because they’ve also got a nursery-age baby, and because they’re in on the McPalmer family dynamic, the McGee-Holland branch of the family is rooming with the McPalmers. Sarah and Glenn have Jimmy and Breena’s room, and Nick’s bunking with Donnie.

Tom and Lynne have the first of the guest rooms.

Mike and Darla have the second one.

The third one, and no one was expecting this when they set the place up, but they likely should have, became Fornell and Wendy’s room about three months ago. Apparently, with Emily not staying over every weekend, Tobias and Wendy have been missing family time, so… They come to the house and get a fix of babies and ‘young people’ two out of every three weeks.

Which leaves the dorm area, the living room, Ducky and Penny’s study, the library, and the entertainment room for Tim’s remaining twenty-three cousins and second cousins.

Apparently, there are a lot of McGees. Because they’re so scattered, and because his part of the family moved every two years, it never occurred to Tim that he’s got a big family, but looking around… Yeah, a lot of McGees.

Most of the first night is people getting settled, making sure everyone’s got towels and pillows, and showing off, again and again, where everything is, with a side of, apparently, in Australia and Japan, not everything works the same way. Things Tim takes for granted, like how to plug in a smart phone, or how to get hot water out of the shower, are not immediately obvious to kids, or adults for that matter, who have spent their whole lives in Japan.

Tim’s explained why the plugs in the US look weird to different collections second cousins twice now, and it looks like a third one, Perri, Tom’s six-years-old granddaughter, and as of this second in time Molly’s second favorite person on earth, just noticed and wants to know why the outlets are weird.

Dinner is loud. Even for a gathering at the house, this is a lot of people.

Half of Mike’s family has never seen snow before, so they’re glued to the window, watching it fall, and dying to get outside in the morning and play in the stuff. Sure, there’s only an inch on the ground, and the weather channel’s saying they’re only going to get two inches total, but for people who’ve never seen it before, it’s fascinating.
There are stories, a lot of them, but this relieves Tim quite a bit, many of them are life in the Navy, or next to it, stories. Part of that is probably because it lets people like Gibbs and Ducky, Connor and Alvin, Mike’s son-in-laws, and Robert, Tom’s younger son-in-law, add their own stories about military life, instead of monopolizing the conversation on McGee family memories.

Part of it is there are some edges here, and John isn’t the only one.

Ducky’s never objected to any tales of Nelson McGee. He’s sure that if they had ever met, they’d have been splendid friends, and he’d like to think that if Nelson is looking on, he approves of the life he’s made with Penny, but with the exception of Tom, who’s already had this conversation with his mother, none of the rest of the crew is sure how much Ducky wants to hear about Penny’s first husband.

But, the biggest aspect of it is John. Apparently everyone in this group over the age of 15 knows that John’s more or less an off limits topic. And the ones under 15 are only tangentially aware of their great-uncle John. If any of them have noticed he’s missing, none of them have asked about him, at least, not where Tim can hear. (And if any of them wonder about Tim and Sarah being introduced as Penny’s grandkids, instead of say Mike’s kids or Tom’s kids, none of them have mentioned it.)

So… tales of idiot officers, and daring stories of sneaking in and doing whatever, of running a sixteen part con to get ice cream in the middle of Vietnam… Those are funny and don’t risk opening up a collection of sticky emotions.

And, of course, there’s the world right now, which offers a collection of interesting moments to keep the conversation going.

There’s peanut butter, which like snow, isn’t common in Australia or Japan, and the kids are fascinated by it. (And Mike’s gagging a bit on a spoonful of it. “Gah! That’s not how I remember it! It used to be sweet, didn’t it?” Gibbs takes Jimmy’s organic, no sugar added, ‘healthy’ peanut butter away from Mike and hands him a jar of Jif. “This is the stuff I eat.” He takes a tentative bite, then the smile spreads across his face. “This is what I remember. Anyone got white bread and grape jelly?” The kids look appalled at that idea.)

Some of the issue with loud is language. Akiri, Tom’s oldest grandkid is Japanese. Well, maybe not if you ask someone with a million generations of Japanese grandparents, but, by American standards, if your Dad is Japanese, and you were born in Japan, have lived your whole life in Japan, and only speak Japanese, and are a citizen of Japan, you’re Japanese. And, while his two youngest grandkids have two American parents, they’ve also spent most of their lives in Japan, and primarily speak Japanese. So, there’s a certain level of repeating bits of conversation over and over loud and slow, and translating into and out of Japanese.

(Molly’s fascinated by Mandy, who’s never used a fork before. She’s just as fascinated by Molly, who doesn’t know how to use chopsticks, and they’re both doing a four-ish-year-old version of charades to talk to each other.)

Tim was hoping to get both Tom and Abbi alone for a few minutes, he’s got some things to ask them, but with the chaos of everyone here, and introductions, and all the rest of it, he never gets around to it.

He’s telling Abby, Jimmy, and Breena about that as they’re getting ready for bed, earlier than normal, but entertaining two dozen strangers is tiring, and tomorrow’s a packed day, and Abby says to him, “Three day weekend, baby, you’ve got time.”

He shrugs, spits, and rinses off his toothbrush. “True.”

Then he shrugs again. There’ll be other weekends. Okay, maybe not this one or the next one, but after that… After all, it’s not like he’s in a flaming rush to get this one. All the problems in the world will still be there after January 3rd, and none of them need to be, or can be, solved right this instant.

Tim can feel it, standing in the bathroom, putting his toothbrush back. It’s the moment where he fully shifts out of being the guy who solves cases, which have defined deadlines that have to be done as soon as possible, and yesterday is even better than as soon as possible, into the guy who manages systems.

“Play the long game…” he says it quietly, and the other three people in the bathroom with him look at him curiously. Tim shakes his head. “I just… I’ve got time.”

“Tim?” Breena asks as she’s putting toothpaste on her brush.

“I’ve got time. If I’m going to build these long, complicated, go in, get all the evidence, sort ‘em out from top to bottom, three-or-four-year-long cases, I don’t have to start them right this second. There’s no mourning widow begging for answers. There’s no prosecutor who needs that detail now. Clues aren’t vanishing right and left. Prints aren’t decaying in the rain somewhere. I’ve got time. I can set these up right, get the right people, and take the time to do it properly.”

Jimmy smiles at him. “And that’s a good thing?”

“It’s… freeing.” He smiles a bit. The idea of not having to rush, not having to get it done yesterday is almost unsettling. “And at the very least, I think it means I get to have a good Christmas.”

Mike steps out onto the back porch, cup of Irish coffee in hand. Gibbs may not have a lot of experience with coffee roasting, but his first attempt produced some lovely results.

Or, maybe if it’s got enough whiskey in it, everything tastes fine.

Tom’s already out there, wearing his coat and boots. He looks at his brother, nods, and then says, looking out at the dark woods behind them, “I’ve been back here a few times. Kind of hard to see the path, but,” he flicks on a flashlight, playing it over the snow, “I won’t get us lost.”

Mike snorts a half-hearted almost laugh. “When has a McGee ever been lost? Dad’ll raise up from the dead to lecture both of us about P To The Seventh if we ventured out without a compass or map.”

Tom nods at that. Both of them thinking of a half million lectures about Proper Prior Planning Prevents Piss Poor Performance.

“You got it?” Tom asks.

Mike nods, patting a rectangular lump under his coat. “Yeah. They sent it… him… shit. I…” He looks sad and confused at that. “Yeah. They sent me word six weeks ago, and sent the ashes two weeks later.”
Tom nods at that, too, then looks to the river, a glinting silver thread through winter night black trees. “He’d cuss both of us out for this. ‘Never want to see a fucking river again you used cumrags! What could possibly make you think this is where I want my ashes? Speak up, fuckheads!’”

“‘Used cumrags?’” Mike replies to the ghost of their brother that Tom has conjured. “‘Yeah, well, at least we were bright enough not to piss off the whole fucking family. Who’s the used cumrag, now, dumbass? If you’d kept your damn temper, and secretary, in check, we’d have done this together, at the ocean, on your fucking flagship, with a flag, and your rank intact. Not sneaking out, on our own, at a damn river.’”

Tom blinks hard, leading the way through the inch of snow in the backyard. “Kept his damn temper, and secretary, in check, and we’d likely not be doing this period. They give you cause when they called?”

“Yeah. Shit cause. Cardiac arrest.”

Tom winces. He’s helped to fake enough death certificates to know that cardiac arrest means the heart stopped beating. Literally every dead person ever has suffered cardiac arrest. “Get any scuttlebutt?”

Mike shakes his head, a little surprised that Tom would ask. If anyone would have scuttlebutt, it’s him. “No. Not like I’ve got a lot of feelers in Leavenworth. You?”

Tom exhales, frustrated. As well as he could, he kept track of his brother. “I’ve got feelers all over the place, but no one there had anything to say about him. Not like he was alone there, after the Fall, Leavenworth was filled to the gills with high-ranking idiots. A quarter of his graduating class at Annapolis was there with him. He got there, he kept to himself, barely talked to anyone, ever. Almost no visitors. The Navy’s new drone guy showed up twice to pick his brain, and that was it. Kept his eyes in a book when he wasn’t rehabbing his hand, and did his best to ignore everything. Then six weeks ago, just like you, I get the call.”

“Yeah.” Mike rubs his eyes. “Apparently, they don’t send a chaplain when your brother dies in prison. Just a fucking call.” He looks back to the house. They can see a few lights glowing through the trees. “We can still turn around and tell Mom.”

Tom stops, and looks back toward the house, too. Their mother’s side of the house isn’t visible from where they are, but he can imagine her, easily. “No. They weren’t speaking. She’d cut him out for what he did to Tim. Wrote him out of the will. Made sure they wouldn’t cross paths, unless he wanted to find her, and… I’m fine with her thinking he was so damn stiff-necked he couldn’t make himself bend.”

Mike doesn’t think Tom’s wrong about that. If John had gotten out of prison, he would have just… vanished probably. Never gotten in contact with any of them again. Still… “You’d want to know if it was one of your kids. And I’d want to know if it was one of mine. Even if…” Mike shudders, imagining things going that badly with his family, praying they never will.

“I know. I would, but… Hell, she probably wants to know, but… I keep remembering after she got the news about James and… You saw her after the stuff with John and Tim went down… She’s eighty-six, or will be next week, and…” Tom doesn’t have to finish that sentence. They can both maintain the lie for the few years their mother is likely to live.

Mike nods. “Not like it’s the first time you, or I,’ve lied to her.”

Tom half-shrugs at that, and then points his flashlight to the river.
Mike takes one step, and then stops. “You want to tell Tim?”

Tom shakes his head. “If I thought he could keep the secret, I would, but… He’s a good guy. I like him, and I like working with him. He’s got balls, and a good head, too. But if we tell him, he’ll tell Abby, and Jimmy, and Breena, and the next time Jimmy or Abby sees Mom, she’ll know. Some men are made for secrets. Ducky. If I thought he needed to know, I’d tell Ducky. But Tim’s not a man made for secrets. Whatever’s happening with him, he tells his family.” Before Mike can say anything, Tom adds, “Sarah, too. I think she’d keep the secret, but she’d be sad, and everyone would wonder, and… I’m not putting her in that position. Not today. Not wrecking her memories of Nick’s first Christmas.”

Mike looks toward the river, and back to the house. He doesn’t like to think about the fact that one day, their mom won’t be around, but, in all likelihood, that day is coming, and soon. But just because he doesn’t like thinking about it doesn’t mean it isn’t true, and doesn’t mean he can pretend it’s not a factor in what they’re doing. “It’ll hold.”

Tom nods. “It will. Maybe we’re just kicking this down the road. Maybe in a year, Tim’ll notice he didn’t get the ‘Heads up, the guy who assaulted you is out of prison’ note. Maybe he’ll do some digging. Or maybe he’ll just tuck John into the back of his head, leave him there, and let it be.”

“Maybe.” Mike nods to the river, sipping his coffee, frozen breath mingling with the steam coming off the beverage. “Come on. It’s cold out here.”

Tom chuckles at that. It’s a bit below freezing, chilly, but not frigid. “Too much time in Oz.” He turns his flashlight to the river. A moment later, they’re on the snow-frosted dock, standing at the edge of the Potomac.

For a moment, the brothers McGee look at each other, not sure where to start. Then Mike says, “Like Dad said, we’re all water, given breath for a moment, set free to walk the earth for a lifetime.” He reaches into his coat pocket and removes the small wooden box with his brother’s ashes.

“From the oceans we came, and to the oceans we return,” Tom replies, adding another of their father’s lines.

Mike opens the box, and tosses his brother’s ashes high, letting them scatter over the river. They watch the tiny flakes float gently on the air before kissing the surface of the water. Some sinking, some floating downriver.

“Light takes a little while, but you’ll get there,” Mike adds.

Tom pulls his flask out of his pocket. He chose not to dilute his bourbon with coffee. He takes a good, long drink, and then pours another one into the water to go with John, then passes the flask to Mike, who takes one more, and the pours yet another one into the water, and one more. “Drink up, boys.”

Tom’s voice is rough as he says, “Dad and James?”

Mike nods. “Yeah.” He wipes his eyes. He takes one more sip, and hands it back to Tom, who finishes the flask.

Tom then raises the flask to the river, and the sky, and says, “One day. When we rejoin the water that gave us life.”

Mike rests his hand on his brother’s back, and echoes him. “One day.”
The day before the day before Christmas. December 23rd. The most ‘meh’ day of a child’s year.

And, well, it’s a kind of ‘meh’ day for adults, too.

Tomorrow, the great-holiday-decorate-a-thon begins. Which means today is the great-pre-holiday-decorate-a-thon-cleaning-binge.

They last did this right before Passover, and the house did get a good, thorough going over then. But it’s been more than eight months, and somehow, possibly the large number of babies and small children who dwell there on a regular basis, and the doggies don’t help, but the place is looking a tad on the grungy side.

It’s not like they never clean. Every weekend, before going back to their own places, everything gets a going over. But there’s ‘we ran a vacuum over everything,’ which is the usual routine, and there’s ‘we got the magic erasers out and took all of the crayon off the walls, and found the cans of paint to touch up the dings, ran the curtains through the washing machine to get the dust out, spot cleaned all the blops off the carpet, and…’

Or as Mike put it, soft cotton cloth in hand, gently buffing the banister which had lost some of its glow over the year since it was installed, “You drug our whole family from Australia just to get some extra hands in place to clean? Really, Mom? I will mail you the check next year to pay for the cleaners!”

That got some amused chuckling, along with a gentle whack upside the back of the head from Penny. “Get to it. Inspection’s at dinner.”

“Oh, God!” Tom groans. He’s in charge of removing every one of the twenty-seven million pictures from the mantle, dusting them all, polishing the glass, dusting the mantle, and putting them all back.

“I take it this is triggering a few memories,” Ducky offers. He’s got a bottle of spot remover and is working on removing the various forgotten drips and drabs that the seven McPalmOzzoLand babies and two doggies have left on their upholstery.

Tom sighs, and rolls his eyes. “Weekly inspection. Every Friday night, before Mom and Dad would have people over, we’d have to have our rooms, and whichever room of the house we were in charge of that week, inspected. Saturday rolls around, and we’d get our assignment. We shared rooms, so, I’d get my half of the room I shared with Mike, and, maybe the downstairs powder room. And five o’clock, on Friday, Mom, or sometimes Dad, would roll through and check everything.”

Tim, who’s been working on putting back all the various kitchen equipment and cooking gear that’s wandered off from their homes over the course of the year, (“Who put thought the Paprika went in the freezer?” Tim’s muttering as he’s putting it back in the spice rack. “Don’t move it, I’m using it in my smoothies, and it’s better cold,” Ziva replies, putting down the silverware she and Abbi are polishing, snatching it out of his hands, and putting it back in the freezer.) hears that and smirks. “We did that, too. Every Friday, five o’clock.” He shoots a mock glare at Penny. “So, I’ve got you to thank for that?”

“Five o’clock inspection was a tradition in the Langston house. My mother made sure every week that the house was clean. To the point where she would take a pin, and go to every corner of the house, and see if there was any dirt in it. You thought I was tough?” She snorts a laugh. “I didn’t have a vacuum cleaner until I was married. We swept that house by hand, scrubbed it with lye soap, wood brushes, and rags, and if Mama found a speck of dirt in it, you’d get your fanny paddled with Papa’s belt, and we did it in calf-length dresses, heels, stockings, and girdles.”

That causes the two younger generations of McGees, who did have such labor saving devices, no threat of physical punishment, and tended to clean in dungarees (jeans by Tim’s generation) and t-shirts, (and, in Tim’s case, his mom just checked to see that everything was tidy with no visible dust bunnies) to look a tad chagrinned.

Penny’s standing near her youngest son, watching his buffing, and says, “Mama was born in 1900. She got married at seventeen, and a week later her brand new husband shipped off to fight in the Great War. A year and a bit more, her husband came home from World War One, having survived everything the Kaiser’s navy had to throw at him, and they got some baby-making done, meaning she was eighteen-years-old and two months pregnant when he, and everyone else, promptly came down with the Spanish Influenza. She’d tell you how in Boston, the doctor had a helper, and he’d go through, open all the doors between the doctor and the patients, so the doctor didn’t have to touch anything, and he could just go in and out, and how he said to her that the cleaner she could keep everything, the less likely Papa was to come down with some sort of secondary infection. But she cleaned that house, and he lived, and she never got sick, and my oldest brother showed up two seasons later, healthy as can be. So, ever after, that house was kept clean.

“That was before the docs knew the difference between bacteria and viruses, right?” Tim adds.

“No. The first virus was discovered in 1892, Timothy,” Ducky replies, looking up from the spot he’s treating on the sofa. “It was, however, long before there was much, besides pray, and clean, that anyone could do about any sort of sickness. My mother’s family was living in Edinburg when the Spanish Flu came, and they had the means to get out of the city. ‘Fresh country air’ was about the best anyone could do in the face of a viral epidemic.”

Penny sniggers at that. “Until you get on the train, packed in with everyone else who has the flu, trying to flee the city, and catch it from them.”

Ducky inclines his head at that. She isn’t wrong. That’s how the flu got out to places like Loch Morran, where the MacLannaghs, his mother’s family, called home. “The wonders of fortune. My grandfather had an automobile. He was always keen on ‘the latest thing.’ I still remember it. A Vauxhaul 20 A09. It had,” and here Ducky pauses for dramatic purposes, “twenty horse power. It was an absolutely gorgeous car. He kept it gleaming white, with a tan leather interior, and a tan, leather roof. It could seat six, and if you talked to it nicely, it would, on occasion, consent to start and actually carry said six people around. He called it, but only when the ladies were out of earshot, ‘The White Arse’, because it had the temperament and work ethic of an especially stubborn donkey.”

“But it worked to get your mother and her family out of Edinburg,” Mike says.

“Apparently, in times of need, it could be prevailed upon to get up and do some driving. And the country place was well off the beaten path. It’s entirely likely that those two bits of history combined and are entirely responsible for me being in this room, now.”

That also gets a chuckle. Penny drifts over to Ducky, giving him a kiss on the top of the head, and the cleaning continues.

Fornell and Wendy roll in around noon, each of them carrying as many grocery bags as they can, and as he kicks the door shut behind him, Fornell says, “Got more of them in the car. Who’s on toting duty?”

Tony, who’s scrubbing out the foyer powder room sticks his head out and says, “We’re all up to our necks in chores. You’re on lug it yourself duty, unless you want to grab a scrub brush.”

Fornell looks at Wendy, both of them look at everyone cleaning, and turn right around. Given the choice of cleaning or groceries, both of them will take groceries.

Gibbs would have to admit, that it’s a little odd to hear variations on the theme of Grandpa and not have it be aimed at him. He’s almost looked around twice to see if Ed and Jeanie decided to drop by, but… Nope. Both Tom and Mike are grandfathers, too. (Mike since he was forty-two, which was something of a surprise for him. Apparently, one of the hazards of on-base housing is that your seventeen-year-old daughter falls in love with a nineteen-year-old Marine, and next thing you know, you’ve got your first grandkid before you’ve got your first gray hair. And while it’s true that nineteen-year-old Annapolis Plebe Mike was quite appreciative of the seventeen-year-old girls who lived near Annapolis, forty-one-year-old Mike just about had a stroke when his, personal, seventeen-year-old daughter brought and extremely sheepish Private First Class over for a ‘serious chat’ one day. On the upside: They’re still in love. Melanie and her two little sisters lit up his world in a way he couldn’t imagine before she showed up. And Connor’s outside, helping Jimmy and Tony stock firewood for the weekend, so these days they get on fine. Though he was sorely tempted to get Connor transferred to Afghanistan when he got the news that Melanie was cooking.)

But, hearing it he is.

He’s also noticing that it’s kind of nice to have some people here who are his age. In their usual group, Fornell’s nine years older, and Tony’s nine years younger, so they both missed growing up in the ‘60s. Mike and Tom are both a little older than he is, but only a little. Like him, they missed Vietnam, at least for active duty. Mike officially spent a few months on a battleship before Nixon finally, fully ended things. Tom graduated Annapolis in ‘76.

They talk a lot about the past, telling the kiddos stories, and one of the McGee boys will remember something, often something silly, like Ovaltine, which will bring back a wash of memories for Gibbs, things he hasn’t thought of for decades.

Things he intentionally hasn’t thought of, because, stupid little things like Ovaltine are tied to his mom.

So, as Darla’s making up a round of chocolate milk for the kids, and Mike’s talking about Penny mixing up Ovaltine for them, Gibbs is seeing his mom, standing in their kitchen, at the counter, that tin of powered chocolate stuff (he’s not sure what’s actually in Ovaltine, but it was supposed to have vitamins and minerals or whatever) putting a spoonful or two into a glass of milk. He can hear the little clicking sound of the spoon against the glass as she’d mix it up. In his memory, she’s wearing a blue dress, and her usual yellow apron. The window was over her right shoulder, and light would stream into it, making her hair glow new-penny copper. He was sitting at the table, eating a grilled cheese sandwich, and she was making him his drink.

He hasn’t thought of that in decades, likely, and he knows why. Even a year ago, this memory would have hurt.

And now it doesn’t. It’s just a moment in time, one that he enjoyed. So, with Molly in his lap, he reaches for the glass of chocolate milk, handing it to her, and says, “I remember that. There were commercials for it, too. I’d watch Mr. Rogers,” Molly and Kelly watch that on occasion and know what it is, “and there’d be commercials for Ovaltine.”

“You watched Mr. Rogers?” Tom’s having a hard time believing that. In his world Mr. Rogers wasn’t a thing until his kids were little.

“Yeah, when I was little. It was local out of Pittsburgh before it got big, and if you got the rabbit ears in exactly the right spot, and the weather was right, you could get it up in Stillwater.”

(Tim’s also fascinated by the idea of little kid Jethro sitting in front of one of those huge 1960s TVs, watching Mr. Rogers. He does some quick googling, sees the show started in ’63, which would have put Jethro at 4 or 5, so… Yeah. Jethro in front of the TV, singing “Won’t You Be My Neighbor.” He can’t wait to tell the rest of his crew.)

“Dad had a store…” Molly’s looking at him, confused. In her world, “Dad” is Jimmy. “My Dad,” Gibbs says. He grabs his phone, and finds the picture of him and Jack in front of his car. Then he finds the shot of Jack cuddling baby Molly at her first Christmas. “That’s you and him. You only got to meet him a few times, but if you hear anyone talking about Jack, that’s my daddy.”

Molly stares at the picture, and then shakes her head. “Sean.”

Gibbs nods. They’ve had variations on this conversation before. Molly’s firmly convinced that she’s always been almost-four-years-old, and any babies purported to be her in photographs are whichever McPalmer is closest to that age, no matter how little said baby may look like the curly haired girl in the picture. He continues on with the story. “My daddy, he had a store up in Stillwater. Like the grocery store, but it was a lot smaller. And there was a shelf with Ovaltine on it. Chocolate and strawberry. And after seeing a lot of commercials for it, I started asking if I could have some.”

“Ohh… You had the good stuff,” Mike adds.

Gibbs winces and shakes his head. “Not as I remember it. But… Jack ran the grocery store, and… When things got too old to sell, he’s bring them home. Didn’t want them to go to waste. And Ovaltine was kind of expensive, so… We’d get the stuff right before it expired. Maybe that’s part of why I didn’t like the strawberry stuff.”

Tom chuckles at that. “I didn’t think that stuff could expire.”

Gibbs shrugs. He takes a sip of Molly’s chocolate milk. It’s good, doesn’t taste anything like his memory of Ovaltine. “You might have something with that.”

As the afternoon wears on, Tim finds Abbi in the kitchen working on prepping her part of the upcoming feast. Christmas Eve they’re having roast beef and all the trimmings, and Abbi’s in charge of some of the “trimmings.”
Specifically, right now, she’s working on dough for the million soft, fluffy, yeasty sweet rolls that are going to go along with this, and the dough for the cinnamon rolls that are going to be part of Christmas morning breakfast.

“Need help?”

She raises an eyebrow. Tomorrow, when she’s got to shape all of these little monsters, she’ll need help. Right now she’s dumping powders and liquids into the mixer, blending them, and then scraping them out into plastic baggies to rise.

Tim shrugs and stands back to the counter. “Okay, I’ll supervise.”

That gets a snerk out of Abbi. “What’s going on?”

“You’ve been all over hell and gone the last few months. Seen almost two thirds of your men. How is it?”

That gets a little eye roll, too. “It’s work. It has to be done, so I’m doing it, but… Yeah, I’d rather solve murders. Why?”

Tim takes a while to explain the IRS situation, and talking with Leon about having a real team, and running a department, and says, “So… I’ve got this huge pool of people, and… I don’t know them. I’m not a familiar face. And I’m thinking about what you’re doing and… Is it useful?”

“Wouldn’t do it if it wasn’t useful.”

Tim sighs at that. He gets that might not have been the best way to ask the question. “Okay, let me try it this way: given everything else I’m doing right now, would you suggest I attempt a modified version of this?”

That gets Abbi’s interest. “How modified? You’re not planning on spending the next year on the road, are you?” She looks horrified at that idea.

“NO!” Tim’s horrified at that idea, too. “I was thinking appointments or calls. If I can get three twenty minute calls in a day, more on days when I’m low on meetings, I can… Spend the next five years at it, and still not have talked to everyone at the FBI.” He shakes his head. Yeah, he’s got time, but that’s probably a bit slower than he wants to go. “This is futile.”

Abbi thinks about it. “Not necessarily. I’m trying to weed out my bad apples with these trips. I can’t do that in a twenty-minute meeting. What are you hoping to do?”

“I…” He’s been thinking about it, feeling it, but this is somewhat nebulous. “Part of it is I want people to be willing to come to me when they run into something bad. Part of it is looking for the bad apples. Part of it is... finding who goes where. What talent I’ve got and how to use it.”

Abbi thinks about that, turning off the mixer. Tim grabs one of the baggies, holding it open while she scrapes the dough out. He flashes her a little See, I’m useful look. That gets an eye roll, too. “Twenty minutes won’t get your bad apples. If they’re so bad at this they can’t take a twenty minute meeting or phone call with you, they’re not smart or smooth enough to be involved in anything that’ll cause real problems. But, it will let your people stick your face to your name. And it’ll make them realize you mean it when you say you want to change things. I’ll violate Eight and assume ‘Hard-Ass McGee’ isn’t coming to these meetings, and ‘Easy-Going, Sincere McGee’ is.”

“That’s the idea. Be approachable. See what problems are on people’s radar. See what they need to do their jobs better. See where they are and where they could be. You getting a lot of that?”
Abbi nods. “More than you likely will. I’m actually in their offices, so I’m seeing everything from the copy machine is older than Emily and only works on odd Tuesdays, to the one guy who no one wants to be in the same room with. But if you ask, I’m sure they’ll give you at least some ideas of what’s up. And they may be more likely to come to you once you open the door to them.”

“I can hope, right?”

She nods at that. He seals up the bag in his hand, and lays it on the counter next to the other ones.

“I need to find my Gibbslets. You got them?”

Abbi half-smiles at that. “A few. Though we call them Borins at CGIS.”

Tim chuckles at that. “Yeah. You would.” Then another thought hits him. “And, are we going to keep calling you Borin?”

She looks away from the flour she’s measuring out. “You mean, after next week?”

Tim smiles at her.

She glances around, but Gibbs isn’t anywhere nearby. “I’m keeping Borin at work. But a filled out copy of the paperwork to change my name to Abigail Borin-Gibbs is his Christmas present.”

Tim smiles even bigger at that. “He’s going to love that.”

Abbi smiles, too. “Yeah, I think he will.”

Gibbs isn’t around because he, and the rest of the grandpa squad, are in the front yard with the kids, Mona, Jackson, and the sleds. They’re ‘officially’ riding herd on this crew, keeping an eye on them while they do everything in their power to slide around on the two inches of snow they got.

It’s not going all that well. The Australia contingent is fairly sure Americans are insane, because lurching down a cold hill on a tiny sheet of plastic makes no sense to them. And Mike’s explaining to them that this works a whole lot better when there’s enough snow to cover the grass.

Fornell, meanwhile, is checking the weather. “Gonna be below freezing tonight and tomorrow.”

The other three of them exchange glances, not immediately seeing why that’s important. “And are we getting more snow to go with it?” Tom asks, staring at the bright blue sky.

“Nope. But we’ve got two inches of snow on a very long driveway, two inches of snow on the front yard, and the back yard, and we’ve got more than twenty of us. We could build one hell of a sledding track,” Fornell says with a massive grin.

That get some wide eyes, and a lot of looking around, seeing what looks like miles and miles of snow just sitting around, and then the grins start to spread across faces.

“I’ll go get our boys!” Gibbs says, darting into the house, huge smile on his face. “Tobias, go get the shovels and wheelbarrow!”
Never let it be said that there was an engineering problem that a tribe of McGees couldn’t solve. It’s not an Olympic-level sledding track, but only because they used what was kicking around the place to make it.

Tim clocks them at 28 miles an hour on the last downhill curve, before the uphill slope and long s bend bleeds off enough speed to stop the sled without a crash.

That’s plenty fast for a plastic sled with Jimmy, Molly, and Kelly on it. The older kids get to go on their own, and they’re shrieking at it. The mystery of why Americans like sledding is a mystery no longer.

And, though he wouldn’t admit it, but there is video to prove it, Fornell’s also yelling as he goes around that last curve, holding Wendy tight, as they hurtle down the track.

The night before the night before ends with a collection of frosty adults, with wind-reddened faces, and cold-stiffened fingers, heading inside for cocoa, coffee, and tea, all liberally laced with alcohol, giggling, and buzzing from the fun of the sled track.

The day before means decorating and cooking. The house is clean. It’s filled with people.

And now it’s time to make it Christmas.

Last year, when they went into the woods to find a Christmas tree, it was just the guys and the two oldest kids.

This year, it’s an expedition. Because they were raised in Australia or Japan none of the assorted McGee kids have ever done anything like this, and they’re all giddy at the idea.

So it’s true that Kelly and Anna are sitting on the sled, waiting to get pulled. Molly, Perri, Melanie, Akiri, James, Mandy, Susan, Karen, Julie, Dan, and Adam are all ready to go.

Tim, Tony, and Jimmy are all fairly pleased to see that they get to share cutting down and lugging this thing in with three more men about their age, while Gibbs, Mike, Tom, and Fornell (the grandpa squad) are all on ‘supervising.’

The assorted kids pick, between them, enough Christmas trees to decorate Versailles within an inch of its life. Akiri’s not just going after pines, she’s also pointing out oaks and maples, too. (Jimmy does a good job of conjuring Ducky, who decided to stay inside, near the fire, to explain why the tree needs to be an evergreen. However, Akiri speaks Japanese, and Gibbs’s Japanese isn’t up to translating all the ins and outs of Pagan Yule festivals. They got a tiny, denuded of leaves, oak sapling for her.)

The grandpa squad narrows them down to three trees, all of which are evergreens, and all of which have the advantage of being small enough to actually fit into the house.

Cutting and lugging gets to decide which of the three they’re going to actually cut down.

And in only three hours, a tree is selected, cut down, wrangled back into the house, plopped into the Abby and Breena have made, with the assistance of Lynne and Darla, by conservative estimate, a thousand pounds of cookie dough. At least, mounded up, waiting to get rolled out, it looks that way. Penny and Susan are in charge of rolling the dough out. Ziva, Tony, and Wendy are on cutting said cookies out, and getting them baked. Fornell claims to be on ‘quality control,’ which means sampling a cookie or two from each batch. (Mona and Jackson would also like to be on ‘quality control’ and have successfully gotten Fornell to share a few cookies with them.)

There just isn’t enough room for more than five kids to be putting decorations on the tree all at once. (Even if it is a twelve foot tall tree.) So, each one gets his or her box of decorations, and time to put them on the tree. Everyone else is at the dining room table, with a tray of baked cookies and decorations.

Breena’s leaning over the table, showing the kids how to use the decorating tips and royal icing to draw designs on the cookies, and how to “flood” the inside of the design so there’s a nice, smooth, flat center.

Abby’s using the regular frosting, and the glitter, showing the younger kids how to make their cookies sparkle.

Ducky’s at the head of the table, spinning a yarn about how Santa got that bowl full of jelly belly, and that cookies are not only necessary, but vital to maintaining a proper Santa tummy. (He’s nibbling a cookie, and patting his own version of said Santa tummy.) “Of course,” he says, sipping his spiced cider, “It’s not just Santa who needs the cookies.”

Molly looks at her Ducky with big eyes. “Who else needs the cookies?”

“The reindeer, my Molly, without enough cookies, the reindeer can’t fly!” he says it with utter sincerity.

“No!” Perri says. “The reindeer have to fly!” she’s very certain about that.

“You are absolutely right. Christmas can’t happen if the reindeer can’t fly. That’s why we have to make a lot of cookies. We have to make sure that Santa gets his cookies and each of the reindeer get her cookies, as well.”

“Her cookies?” Melanie’s old enough she doesn’t believe in Santa or reindeer, but she’s never heard anyone refer to the reindeer as ‘she.’

“Of course, Melanie. You’ve seen pictures of them, correct?”

Melanie nods.

“It’s only the female reindeer who keep their antlers during the winter months. The male ones lose theirs in the autumn. So, though very few people know this, Donner and Blitzen and the rest of the reindeer are all ladies.”

Penny catches that bit. She reaches for a cookie with a smile on her face. “Well, if you’re going to coordinate gift delivery across the entire planet on one night, you’d certainly want women doing that.
Leave it to men, and only a quarter of the presents would get there, and they wouldn’t be wrapped.”

Breena and Abby, who have noticed their personal husbands appear to be allergic to wrapping paper, both laugh at that.

As one of the few members of the US-McGees who speaks Japanese, Ziva’s spending a lot of time with the assorted Japanese-McGees. She and Gibbs make sure the kids aren’t completely in the dark, but neither of them have had to speak it with any regularity in… decades, really.

So there have been a few moments where one party or the other is staring blankly at the other one, completely unsure what they could possibly mean.

Akiri’s getting ready to put her ornaments on the tree, and is asking why they’ve got little bits of silver foil that they’re going to dangle over the branches. Her branch of the family is Shinto, so Christmas just isn’t a big deal for them, add in a Tokyo apartment that couldn’t fit a Christmas tree, even if it were A Charlie Brown Christmas Special-sized, and Christmas trees just aren’t part of her world. Which is not to say she’s not enjoying it, she’s just not sure where everything goes, or why.

Ziva’s pretty sure she did a good job of answering what the foil was (tinsel), and why they use it. She knows she didn’t intentionally make any sort of joke, but seeing two grandkids and Tom McGee start just about pants wetting laughing tells her she’s got something wrong.

“What?” she switches to English.

Tom’s still giggling, and the kids are looking between him and Ziva. “The word you used for reflective… doesn’t mean reflective, not with the stress on that syllable.” He’s snarkily a little, still.

“What does it mean?” Ziva asks.

Tom shakes his head. “It doesn’t, not really… Uh… Spiny-backed-pig.”

That gets Tony into play. “Porcuswine? You managed to get Porcuswine into Japanese?”

Ziva gives him a gentle shove, and Tony goes on to explain the story of the Porcuswine, much to the amusement of the rest of the tree-decorating crew.

“Almost done?” Jimmy says, looking at the tree.

“Just about,” Tony replies.

Abby’s coming up to them, along with Ziva, Breena, Tim, Sarah, and Glenn. There are four little guys at this party who aren’t quite ready to put their own ornaments up.

Sean, the oldest of the bunch, has been watching this whole ornament thing with a lot of interest. Bright, shiny, sparkly things are his jam, and the tree is covered in them. If he could crawl, he’d be under that tree whacking at the ornaments. But he can’t so he’s had to be content to watch. Right now, Tim’s holding him while Abby’s rooting through the box, making sure each of them gets the right ones.
Sean’s is green and gold. It’s a small ball, and says: Sean James McGee First Christmas 2017

Dave’s is blue and silver and has: David Jethro DiNozzo First Christmas 2017

Nick’s is red and gold: Nicholas Armstrong Holland First Christmas 2017

The last one, Donnie’s, is red and white: Donald Timothy Palmer First Christmas 2017.

“Big year!” Glenn says, shaking his head a bit, holding Nick’s ornament. He reaches high, putting it on one of the empty branches near the top of the tree. Sarah gets a picture of him doing it, while Nicholas, who couldn’t care less about the tree or ornaments, kicks his little feet in his bouncy chair.

Tim lets Sean hold his, and he does, staring at it. Then he starts flinging his hands around, shaking it. Nothing much happens, but Abby decides to take it away, not wanting him to get scratched with the hook. She puts it on the tree, and Tim holds him close. “That one’s yours.” They both smile when Sean looks away from the ornament to Tim when he says that.

Ziva’s moving around the tree, looking for a good spot. Tony’s holding Dave, who’s also not terribly interested in any of this stuff. When Ziva finds the spot, he crouches next to her, and it, and gets a shot of the three of them, hanging Dave’s first ornament.

Breena’s got Donnie, and Jimmy’s got the ornament. He hangs it on the same branch that Anna and Molly put their ornaments. It’s bent under the weight of all of those balls, and candy canes, and tinsel, but Jimmy likes the idea of all of them together. Breena smiles, gets the shot of it, and then hands the phone to Abby, who, after a minutes of corralling kiddos, gets a shot of her, Jimmy, Molly, Anna, and Donnie, all sitting in front of the tree, the one branch with all of the ornaments in the corner of the shot.

Dinner’s almost ready as they finish that up, but there’s one last shot that Abby wants. They get the boys lined up on the sofa. (After putting a blanket on it. Ducky’s glare was more than enough to make sure they protected the newly cleaned upholstery.) The shot of all four boys, more or less all looking in the general direction of the camera, was a big hit with all of the assorted family members.

They’ve just finished getting everyone settled down for dinner when Jimmy’s phone buzzes. He glares at his phone, but lifts it to his ear. They see him nod, blink, nod again. “Okay. I’m three hours out. Tell Dornie, I’ll be there as soon as I can.”

They all know what that means. Breena squeezes his hand and gives him a half-hearted smile. “Body?”

Jimmy nods, standing up. “The only upside is, this looks like a car accident. I should be home in time for presents.” He bends down to kiss her, and then takes a few steps to kiss the kids, too. His eyes find Tim and Abby, and it might not be a kiss, but it’s close.

He’s got his phone to his ear, and is saying, “Dr. Allan, I hope you weren’t in the midst of stocking stuffing…” as he heads to their wing of the house, gathering his things.
When dinner is over, Ducky corrals the kids. “Come children. It’s time to make sure the reindeer get their cookies.” He’s got a plate heaped with cookies, and is wrapping a scarf around his neck.

“Ducky?” Melanie asks.

“We must feed the reindeer,” he says with a little smile. “After all, Santa comes into the house to get his cookies, but the reindeer must stay outside.”

Melanie smirks a bit at that, looking in the direction of the woods behind the house. She can’t see it. Outside is dark, inside is light, so all she’s got is the mirror image of them inside the house, but she knows what’s out there, and has a suspicion as to what lives out there. “So… if we were to put the cookies in the trees perhaps…”

Ducky grins back at her, glad she’s going along with this. “Yes. I think the reindeer might come down from the roof, and spend some time nibbling cookies.”

Melanie laughs at that, and helps to get the younger kids into their winter gear. It takes a few minutes, but they do get all of them bundled up, and Ducky, Melanie, Penny, Abbi, and Darla, get the cookies, and make sure the kids have plenty of them to put up on the trees.

That buys the rest of the adults a quiet hour for getting the kitchen clean.

And in the morning, just like Ducky expected, there are “reindeer” tracks all around the trees that had the cookies in them. (And just possibly, the local deer population is a tad better fed than normal this time of year.)

Molly brings over the copy of the ‘Night Before Christmas,’ and settles in next to Gibbs. She isn’t thrilled about Anna and Sean getting lap space when she’s on the sofa next to him, but she’s been told how she got one whole Christmas with all the adults to herself, so she was willing to allow it. Plus Kelly’s also next to Gibbs and not on his lap, so… She’ll tolerate it.

For now.

Next year, she better get some lap time.

But she’s got some suspicions about that, because Mama, Aunt Abby, and Aunt Ziva all had babies this year, and Uncle Jethro likes to cuddle babies. And next year Dave and Donny will be big enough to want to get involved in story time, too.

But it’s Christmas Eve, and the sound of Gibbs reading the poem is lulling, and the kids start to relax, feeling sleepy.

He finishes up, and Mama comes to collect them, getting ready to take them to bed. Anna and Sean, the babies, get picked up first.

Uncle Tim says to Kelly, as he’s picking her up, “Say goodnight to Pop.”

“Night, Pop,” Kelly’s sounding sleepy.

Molly hears that, and wonders something. So as Uncle Tim’s taking Kelly over to her bed, she hops onto Gibbs’ now empty lap and says to him, “Kelly calls you Pop. Anna calls you Uncle Pop. I call
For adults, the night before Christmas takes off when the kids are all in bed. Packing presents and taking them through customs is just a massive pain in the ass, so most of the presents were mailed to the house.

So, on the night before, there’s a collection of adult McGees, wrapping paper, ribbons, tape, and scissors, all scattered about, along with a collection of other adult McGees attempting to assemble various presents for little guys.

As Tim and Abby wrestle with Molly’s tricycle, and Breena nurses Donnie, he says to the collected McGees, all doing similar chores, “You know, you’d think putting together a half mile long sledding track would be harder than assembling a tricycle. But you’d be wrong.”

That gets a bit of laughing, and Abby holds up one of the pieces. “You know, I think they drilled the holes with the pieces upside down. If we put it together backwards, these may work.”

Tim groans, and looks to Breena. “You and he planned this, didn’t you? The year Anna was born, you had us assembling impossible presents, last year, you got easy presents, and now we’ve got another impossible one, and he just skips on out, ‘Oh, dead body, so sorry.’”

Breena laughs hard enough at that, she startles Donnie.

This time, a year ago, Abbi was sitting with Gibbs in front of the fireplace, basking in golden lights, and looking at the brand new ring on her finger.

This year, the two of them, together, are working on putting together a collection of doll beds. The girls like to put their dollies to bed, and they haven’t had a very good bed for them. (Gibbs was appalled to see them tucking dollies into a cardboard box. And suddenly he had another project.) So, as he’s fitting the legs into place, she’s putting tiny little sheets on tiny little doll mattresses, she catches the glint of light on her finger.

The pearl doesn’t so much reflect light as glow on its own. She knows it can’t actually do that, but it looks that way.

He sees her looking at it, and smiles.

“Seven more days,” she says.

Gibbs leans forward and kisses her. “Start the year off right.”
Jimmy does get home before presents. He even gets home before the kiddos wake up, hoping for presents.

As much as he ever has ‘straightforward cases’ this is one of them.

A Petty Officer, a Christmas party, too much eggnog, and not enough sense to call an Uber. He hates cases like this. Well, with the exception of when he gets called in to bless the death of someone who dies of natural causes, he hates all of his cases, but these… It’s not like he can lend any sort of closure to this. He cannot grant justice, or at least the information necessary to find it. He’s just left with the image in his head, a woman in his morgue, wearing her Christmas sweater, sobbing over her husband’s corpse.

Ducky’s waiting for him when he gets in. He’s sitting on the sofa, reading, with two cups of coffee on the side table next to him. (One of Jethro’s “less successful” attempts. Tastes perfectly fine to Ducky, but it’s ‘not done enough,’ for Jethro’s tastes.) Behind him, the Christmas tree is glowing, and presents are piled under it.

He pushes the coffee toward Jimmy, who’s pleased to take a few sips. “This one is good.” (Jimmy would call it a medium-dark roast, it’s as cooked as he ever wants any coffee he’s going to drink.)

“He thinks he didn’t cook it long enough.”

Jimmy lays his head against the back of the sofa, and says, eyes closed, “Well, he can give me all the ones he pulls off the heat too soon.”

Ducky smiles at that, and takes another sip. There is something to be said for fresh-roasted coffee. He could get used to this. “I take it, it wasn’t a murder?”

“Not today. It was exactly what it looked like. Drunk driver. The road turned right, wasn’t as plowed as it could have been, he skidded, too drunk to correct for it, and…”

Ducky winces.

Jimmy nods, opening his eyes and sitting up, taking another sip. He just wants something to pull him into the present, but not so much caffeine that he won’t be able to sleep. “His wife is planning a funeral on Christmas because he was too fucking stupid to use an ap.” He slumps back against the sofa, slipping off his glasses and rubbing his forehead. “I’d almost rather have a murder. Get murdered, it’s all out of your control. And, there’s something I can do. Drunk driving, that’s all on you, and all I can do is stand there and hold your hand.” He takes another swallow of the coffee. Yes, it’s tasty but that’s his last gulp. “You up early or late?”

“My traditional middle of the night wander.”

Jimmy nods. He knows that Ducky doesn’t sleep straight through the night. He spends a moment just staring at the tree, and then says, “How are you doing with Jethro’s wedding?”

Ducky knows that Jimmy isn’t vitally interested in whatever speech he’s got ready to give at Jethro’s wedding, especially not at three in the morning. He’s looking for something to get his mind off of what he did tonight. But, he was expecting that, too. His usual midnight wander doesn’t involve setting himself on the sofa in the living room, let alone with two drinks, unless he intends to intercept someone in the living room.
“I think I am doing fairly well. I’ve had a few years to ponder, and live, and watch what it means to be married since I did this last…” he smiles at the memory of Jimmy and Breena’s wedding.

“So, not just reheating what you did for us?”

“Perish the thought!” They talk for a half hour, letting Jimmy reset his own peace, and put the dead where they belong.

“It’s Christmas!!!” That’s the sound, in Molly’s voice, echoing through the McPalmer side of the house that wakes up the assorted adult McPalmers, and McHollands.

Tim opens one eye as he hears feet running through the hallway, and says to Abby. “And I take it we’re up?”

She nods, raising herself, and Breena begins to stir, too.

They let Jimmy sleep. He can join the rest of the crew when they do presents with the wider group.

And thus, at 5:37 AM, Christmas begins.

There are things that compensate for getting up an hour earlier than normal. Fresh, hot cinnamon rolls, fresher, hotter coffee, and a collection of little people squeezing with joy as they open their presents goes a long way to banishing, “I got up at the ass crack of dawn,” grumpiness.

Three hours later, real breakfast, and then presents for the larger group do an even better job of shoving those thoughts away.

Penny’s sitting on the sofa, her pile of presents next to her, opening away. Pictures of the various family members have been popular this year. Last year, she hadn’t fully let everyone know how destroyed their home was. But this year, they know that, and all of her family has been going through their own collections, making copies.

What do you get the person who has everything? The one thing she no longer has, her pictures.

So, mostly she’s opening flat packages of nicely framed shots of her kids, and their families, and any pictures they may have had of their original family, or better yet, hers.

Mike, for example, had a shot of her father and Nelson together, on the back porch, sharing a beer. That one had to be back from 1951 or so, because she’s in the background, pregnant, and John is a toddler playing with blocks.

Tom somehow had a copy of her parents’ wedding picture. He also had Nelson’s graduation from Annapolis picture.
And she couldn’t be happier with those pictures.

Though there’s one present that isn’t a flat package, and she’s curious as to what it is. Six inches tall, cylindrical, heavy for its size. As she picks it up, she can feel it slosh. “Okay, who got me moonshine?”

Tom and Mike smirk at each other. “Open it, Mom,” Mike says.

It is, as she guessed from the feel, a mason jar filled with liquid. But it’s not moonshine.

She holds it, feeling a million memories of the twenty-eight places she and Nelson both called home, all flooding through her. It’s a jar all right, and there’s water in it, sea water, sand, a few small shells, some pebbles, and sea glass.

Anywhere on land Nelson called home had a little jar of the sea on the mantle, or when they lived in an apartment, on the bookshelf. When they first married, he put one on the mantle of the tiny officer’s house they shared, and she had looked at it, very curious. “Blood of the McGee, cut me, and this’ll come out,” he’d replied. She’d raised an eyebrow at him, and he added, “Get too far away from the ocean, and I start to go wrong in the head. So, I always bring it with me.” They were in Pensacola for flight training, and he had the next two years on land, so she shrugged and nodded.

And after that, every place they lived had a little jar of seawater.

Her kids grew up in a home that had a little jar of seawater. And, after Nelson died, until it got lost with her luggage on one of her trips, she carried that little jar around. And when it got lost, she let it go.

But, holding onto it, it feels right in her hands. She’s not a McGee, not the way Nelson or her boys are. She’s not the sea on legs, but she’s tied to it. The shore that it laps against. The solid, yet wet, spot where land and ocean come together.

She’s smiling, and there are tears in her eyes, as she stands up, and clears a little spot on the mantle for the jar of seawater.

Tim opens the box, wondering what on earth his loves could have gotten him. It’s about twice the size of a shoebox, and there’s literally nothing he’s wanting that’s that big.

At least, nothing he’s wanting that they’d get him. There are a few computer goodies he’d like for his home system that might come in a box like this, but to know that they’d have to go from just knowing him really well, to digging unexpressed thoughts directly out of his head, because this isn’t anything he’s talked about.

So, it’s with a sense of curiosity that he’s opening this thing. It’s not too heavy, especially for its size. It does rattle a little when he jiggles it, but not a lot. Whatever’s in there is in there pretty good. And as he’s jiggling it, Breena shoots him a death glare, so he stops that, fast, and gets to opening it up.

Fancy wrapping paper gets ripped to smithereens, and he also yanks the top off the box. There’s more paper inside, lots of tissues, and he’s digging through, eventually finding the first solid thing in there. It’s also wrapped, and he’s got to get through that, but once he does, he understands why Breena was glaring at him.
It’s a dragon. And from the looks of it, it’s a custom, 3d-printed, hand-painted dragon. He’s grinning at it. This one is black, with big blue eyes, and… He goes tearing through, finding two more dragons, a green one, and a violet one. There’s one human figure, a women with dark hair and green eyes, and he can’t grin any wider at it.

It’s his story. He, Jimmy, and Breena are dragons. Abby’s a human. They got him custom, 3d-printed action figures for the main characters in his story.

Tim leans over, kissing Abby, who’s closest to him, first, and then Breena, who’s a few feet away, and Jimmy who’s on his far side.

Jimmy’s grinning back. He was the one who found the place who did them. Abby’s the one who got the design into a CAD format, and Breena made sure to carefully re-read Tim’s first version, along with a few of the corrections he’d plopped in there, so that they’d look right.

“Thought you needed some decorations for your office,” Jimmy says.

“I love them!” Tim says to all three of them, very happily picking them all up and looking them over again and again. Kelly wanders over from playing with her toys to see Daddy’s toys, and he lets her, very gently, touch them.

Jethro would have to admit he’s not expecting an envelope from Abbi. Actually, he’s not really expecting a Christmas present at all.

There’s only so many things he wants, and he’s got them all.

So, they’d had a chat about how if she ever ran into some present of some sort she thought he’d like, have at it, but that she didn’t have to feel like she had to get presents for him at any given time. And especially this Christmas, with their wedding a week away, presents have been showing up at their place for a while, so pretty much all of his ‘anything I could possibly want’ buttons have been hit really well.

(Honestly, he doesn’t ever want to be the guy people just get gifts for because they feel like they’ve got to get him something. He especially doesn’t want Abbi to feel that way.)

But in his stocking there is an envelope with his name in it in her handwriting.

Part of him is wondering if this is a gift certificate for something to do while they’re in Honolulu. But as he slits the envelope he’s thinking this doesn’t quite feel right for that. It’s too thin and too big, and pulling it out… he can’t focus on the words without grabbing his glasses, and…

“Oh.” He blinks as he reads it, feeling… just… full. Full of love, and joy, and being appreciated, and cherished and…

Abbi’s next to him, chin on his shoulder. “You okay?”

He smiles at her, kissing her. “Yeah.” There’s a huge grin on his face as he looks back down and reads the formal document for a legal name change. “Abigail Borin-Gibbs.”

She kisses him back, and all of it goes rushing through him: the touch of her lips on his, the feel of his name on her, the sense of home and belonging.
He licks his lips, and then gently flicks hers with the tip of his tongue before saying, “Mrs. Gibbs?”

She smiles back at him. “Next week.”

He nods, grinning, huge. “Next week.”

An hour later, when Mike gets a moment alone with Tom, he says, “Tim’s not a man for secrets, huh?”

Tom nods, knowing what his brother saw, and why he’s mentioning it. “Yeah. They aren’t open about it in the wider world, but they’re doing a shit job of keeping it quiet at home. Tim especially. It’s like he’s got a little mental switch, and when it’s on ‘home’ his ability to keep things hidden falls apart.”

“I was back here, after that damn test of his,” Mike says. Tom nods, he remembers that story. “And Jimmy… I couldn’t figure out what I was seeing. Actually, I could, and apparently did. I couldn’t believe what I was seeing. Jimmy more or less told me he’d kill John if he got the chance, coming on like pissed-off boyfriend.”

They both look in the direction of the combined McPalmers who are wadding up balls of wrapping paper and tossing them around. Big balls for Mona, little ones for Jackson. The dogs are happily bounding through the drifts of wrapping paper in the living room to chase them. None of the adults are doing anything out of the ordinary, but Mike knows what he saw. Buddies don’t kiss each other. Not on the lips, and not because one of them got the other one an especially nice Christmas present. (Case in point, Fornell looked really pleased with the DVD collection of spy movies Jethro got him, no smooching ensued.)

“Yep. I’ve never asked why he didn’t want to go to Annapolis, or join the Navy, and I’m not going to, but back in the ‘90s when he would have started…” Tom lets that trail off; his look fills in the blank. They both know what would have happened to a gay sailor in the ‘90s if he was outed.

Mike nods in return. “Okay. You think that’s part of what was going on with them?”

Tom’s hands spread wide in a maybe? gesture. He’s read John’s arrest reports. He doesn’t know if Mike has, and he does want to know what Mike thinks about this, without dropping any ideas into his head.

“When I talked to Ducky about it, he was asking about John. It was right after the Stennis, and he wanted to know more about John. Wanted to know if he was gay or bi.” He glances over to Ducky, who’s quietly singing a Christmas carol to the kids, while Tony strums along on the guitar he got from Ziva as his present. “I… didn’t put that together with what I was seeing with Tim and Jimmy,” Mike says, feeling the puzzle pieces start to slot into place.

“You think he was?” Tom asks.

“Tom?” Mike can’t believe he’d ask.

“John. You think he was gay or bi?” Tom’s asking him intently. Having read those reports, he can’t get the idea out of his mind, but just because he’s got an idea doesn’t mean it’s right.
“If he was, he never told me,” Mike replies.

“That’s not what you think.”

Mike rolls his eyes. “When he was younger, we went out drinking a few times. I caught him checking out a few guys. Never saw it get past looks, even when he was drunk. Sarah’s told me she thought he was sleeping with his secretary.”

Tom winces. “That… adds context.”

“Yeah. How about you?” If they’re going to speculate…

“Mike?”

“What did you think?”

Tom rolls his eyes a bit. There’s a reason he can’t get the arrest report, and everything that goes with it, out of his mind. “You remember Bob Harmer?”

Mike shakes his head, which doesn’t shock Tom. Mike was pretty young when this went down. So was he for that matter.

“Okay, I got it second-hand from James, and I didn’t get it when he told me about it. This is me thinking about it now. He and John were buddies. They were wrestling, at least that’s what James said, and Dad caught them, and then Bob never came over to hang out at our place again.”

“When was that?” Tom can tell from Mike’s expression that he’s got no idea what Tom’s talking about.

“I don’t… Back when we were kids, and John was… I don’t know, fourteen, thirteen? Young enough James didn’t know what they were doing. If they’d been kissing or something, he would have known what he saw, so it couldn’t have been that blatant. Old enough Dad got nervous when he saw whatever they were doing. If they’d just been tussling, Dad wouldn’t have blinked. Not like the bunch of us never got into fights or wrestled. James was wondering why Bob wasn’t coming around anymore, because he liked him, and John punched him when he asked.”

Mike winces at that. “I didn’t know that story. You think Dad went hard on him…”

Tom’s shaking his head. “I can’t imagine it. He never went hard on me on anything. Just, disappointed, you know…” Mike’s nodding. He knows. You never wanted to deal with a disappointed Nelson McGee. Mike would have rather have teeth pulled than disappoint their father. “But… I don’t know. It’s not something that ever came up with me and Dad.”

“Yeah. Or me.” They both watch the rest of the family playing their Christmas morning games. Mike continues to watch the assorted McPalmers. Jimmy’s got the babies lined up, starting with the one with his last name, and Tim’s eyes, on their backs, and giving them raspberries. The toddlers, and about half of the older McGee kids are lining up to go next. “So…”

Tom shakes his head. “I’m not butting my nose in.”

Mike rolls his eyes. “Not that way. You keeping eyes on his six? Something like that can bite you.”

Tom inclines his head, getting where Mike’s going. “Yeah. Always. As long as he’s on the right track, I’ll keep his secrets, and if he’s not…”
“You’ll leak ‘em to the guy who puts the knife in his back.”

Tom stares at his brother, ice in his eyes, reminding Mike very strongly of John in that moment. “Or I’ll use the knife myself. It wouldn’t be the first time. I’ve let enough shit slide in the past, not again.”

Mike nods at that.

Christmas afternoon. Quiet time. Breakfast and presents are cleaned up. Dinner’s cooking. Assorted kids and adults have scattered off into their own little groups, or on their own for some alone time.

Sarah sees Tim clacking away on his typewriter at the breakfast nook in their part of the house. She’s just got Nick down, so she sits next to him, waiting for his fingers to stop moving. “This the new one?” she asks as she sips her coffee. (Abbi’s blend. It’s so-so, would be better if it was a tad less cooked.)

“Sort of. Just a random scene. The first draft is hibernating right now.”

“You want me to take a look at it?”

Tim pushes his glasses onto the top of his head. He uses them for close up vision, but if he’s looking through them too far away, like say someone’s face who is sitting a few feet away, they start to give him a headache. “Do you want to take a look at a really rough draft?”

She counters with, “You planning on trying to sell it?”

He nods.

“As Thom Gemcity?”

“That’s the idea.” He figures he’s got a much better chance of getting a publisher to lay eyes on this if it’s got his pen name on it.

“You still with Doreen?” Sarah asks, remembering the name of Tim’s ex-agent.

Tim shakes his head at that. “NO! She’s the twit who let her publicity people post pictures of Abby and Kelly online, without asking me about it first. I got a bunch of cards for new people at your wedding, but haven’t moved on them, yet.” He glances at the page in his typewriter, and they both know you don’t go agent shopping if you don’t have a finished piece to sell.

Sarah winces, remembering how pissed Tim was when he saw those pictures online, then her eyes spark as she says, “So, you’re free agent right now?” There’s a smile spreading over her face.

“Yeah, I am.” He looks at the page. Right now he’s got Gabe trying to figure out how to rule his damn kingdom. Mostly he’s just working out what’s going on with the IRS stuff, but using his fantasy land as a foil for it. He’s not sure if something like this, a three page dialog about tax policy and how if the tax collectors can’t be trusted your kingdom falls apart (Yes, he’s still rather miffed about the IRS stuff, just because it’s good advice doesn’t mean he likes it.) is the sort of thing that goes into a young adult novel, and he’s absolutely certain that the vast piles of smut that fills the non-fight scene, non-how to rule a kingdom sections of the story absolutely don’t go in one. “But this couldn’t be less of a young adult book if I tried.”

She flashes him a look and says, “I’ve had an adult imprint for almost a year now.”
He blinks. “Right. I knew that. I really did. You were telling me that, and…” He’s thinking, fast, “But it’s not as big or as popular as your YA line.”

“No fiction for adults sells the way YA does. But yeah, I’ve got adults, and they sell, but I don’t have a good anchor author. Some of my YA authors wanted to branch out, so I let them, and some of their readers have grown with them, but,” and here she eyes Tim, “If I had a New York Times bestseller… one who writes adult bestsellers…”

“Mysteries. And this isn’t one.”

That gets another grin. “Some of your base won’t come over to see what you’re up to. Fantasy won’t do it for them. But some of them will, just to see if you can do a different genre.”

“Yeah, well. That’s the question, isn’t it?”

Sarah smiles. “It is. So, let me read it. If anyone knows if you can write a fantasy, I’ll be the one.”

Tim’s nodding but, he’s also thinking of what’s in that book. He starts to blush a little. “Uh… It’s… um… not like my mysteries.”

“Tim, I’ve read fantasy, and I’ve read a mystery before. I’m familiar with the differences.”

“Yeah.” He rolls his eyes. That’s not precisely the difference he was thinking of. “It’s got a lot of sex in it.”

She laughs at that. “So do most of my adult books.”

He hasn’t read her adult imprint, so he’s got no idea if she means, kiss, kiss, fade to black, share breakfast the next morning sex, or ‘throbbing members’ and ‘yearning womenhoods’ sex, or his own style of calling a cock a cock sex scenes.

He licks his lips, nervous. “Uh… It’s really explicit.”

“Oh, no.” She rolls her eyes. “Color me shocked. You’ve got three spouses, and five kids, and like sex. Knock me over with a feather. Let’s see if you can write it, Casanova, and more importantly, write it so women will read it.”

Tim shrugs a little at that, and then reaches for his phone. He goes to Amazon, looks up T.M. Gee, and hands her the phone. “I’m T.M. Gee, those five star reviews are for me.”

That gets full out belly laughing. “You write lesbian smut!” She begins flicking through the reviews, still laughing. After a few minutes, she hands it back to him, and says, “I’ll read it. And if I can’t sell it, I can tell you what to do to make it salable, and who might want to buy it.”

“Thanks.”

She waits, expectantly for a moment, and then her face starts to fall as Tim doesn’t get on his phone or computer. “It’s a hard copy, isn’t it?”

He shrugs a bit. “I don’t put it into a computer until I move onto the second draft, and, like I said, this is the first draft. Abby, Jimmy, and Breena have read it, so it’s covered with post-it notes with comments on them.”

Sarah sighs. “How can you possibly be allergic to computers when you write?”

“Because I’m not allergic to them 99.9% of my time. You want to wait for an electronic copy?”
“Nah. Give me the hard one, just take the stickies off of it. I want to go in with just my own ideas.”

“I can do that.”

Christmas comes and Christmas goes. Dinner starts when the kiddos get up from their afternoon naps, and lasts for what feels like hours.

It’s not a formal, sit-down meal. There are too many of them for that. It is plates of food and people drifting from conversation to conversation.

There are kids all over the place, and a game of something seems to be on all the time. The dogs are happy as doggies in a crowd. Someone is always ready to scratch an ear, pet a belly, or offer a tiny bite of something yummy.

It’s the noise of lives, many lives, in one home, bound to each other by love and blood and history.

Tim gets a quiet moment, where he’s between conversations, and he looks at Penny’s jar of ocean water on the mantle.

He picks it up, holding it, thinking about how the water that little jar symbolized shaped his life, and all of the lives around him. He never wanted to be a sailor. The Navy isn’t, wasn’t, and won’t be, his home. But he’s a McGee, and he’s just as tied to the ocean as everyone around him. And maybe in the cosmic scale of things that doesn’t matter. Or maybe, it’s only in the cosmic scale of things, that it does.

Tim’s on his back, in bed, resting. They all are. It’s those few extremely pleasant moments between orgasm and sleep, when the world is golden, and skin is flushed and warm. Hearts slow, breathing goes from fast, harsh gasps to the quiet in-out of relaxation.

Abby rolls onto her side, facing him, sliding her leg onto his hip. “I forgot to check in and ask, but… You doing okay with everything?”

He strokes her hair and face, and wriggles a bit, so his other shoulder rubs against Breena and Jimmy.

“Yeah. After the first few hours, I forgot to be tense about it. Not saying I want to hear a bunch of happy family stories with The Admiral in them, but… yeah, this is good.” He doesn’t say it, because he’s not sure how to put it into words, but for the first time in… ever likely, he actually feels like a part of his birth family. He’s not sure if he’s claiming, or reclaiming it, but he’s finally got in his grasp a part of his life that he should have had since birth.

Abby kisses him, and he gets a little pat from Breena on that. Jimmy makes a little, “Mmmm…” noise.

Tim closes his eyes. Drifting. Floating along on the small sounds and feel of his loves near him. He doesn’t say this out loud, either, but maybe… Not soon, but… maybe in the next year or so, he’ll call his mom.

Maybe it’s time to start thinking about reclaiming that relationship, too.
Of Stories and Subterfuge

Short week this week. Tuesday to Friday. Tim’s in the office. Jennifer is, too, but a lot of the FBI is on vacation. It’s the week between Christmas and New Year’s, when the kids are out of school. It’s not exactly a skeleton crew, but just walking in, he can feel the lack of energy in the building. Granted it’s also December 26th, and it’s likely a lot of the people who came in today partied late yesterday.

Lucky for Tim, he’s got a fairly quiet day planned.

Just him, his computer, his 57 million niggly details that need to get done, and possibly tossing a plan to talk to everyone who works at the FBI over to Jennifer, who, he’s sure, is going to adore this new project.

He smirks a little at that as he heads into his office. And, though he can’t see himself, he’d be utterly unshocked to hear that, on occasion, Gibbs would wear a smile like that, too. Back when he could foist off some niggly, detail-oriented thing on Tim.

Into his office he goes. First and foremost, coffee. He’s got a small bag of what Gibbs thinks is a light roast, cut in half with what Fornell thinks is a light roast. Put those two together, and it’s what Tim considers a fairly tasty blend.

He’s getting his first cup going, K cup machine rumbling away as it heats up, and then he turns his attention to his box. He’s not sure where the dragons go, but spending ten minutes putting them in different places around his office makes him happy.

(And gives him the time he needs to drink some of the coffee, start to feel something like awake, open up his computer, straighten his shoulder, and begin to wade through the reports.)

He’s an hour into his inbox, which means he’s only scratching the surface of the letters that are tagged with VITAL!!! LOOK AT ME NOW, when he gets the first text from his sister.

Everyone and their cousin have done a vaguely Scottish society. Drop the kilts and pick somewhere else. Iceland is cool, and not vastly overdone.

Apparently, she’s started reading his manuscript. Tim nods at her note, pouts a little about saying goodbye to the kilts, but figures he can probably set up some way to work them back in and sends back. Noted.

Then his eyes go back to his inbox, and the next letter has his full attention. It’s from Hotch. Tagline: Important But Not Time Sensitive.

Hotch rarely emails him, let alone with a tagline like that, so Tim gets into it, fast.

Unfortunately, it’s exactly what he was hoping it wouldn’t be.

McGee,
Got a heads up from our DNA techs. A body with 50% matches to the DNA profiles of Seth and Ginger Partridge has been found, listed as a Jane Doe, in the Gatlinburg, TN morgue.

She’d been there for the last eight months.

Heidi Partridge is no longer a missing person. I’ve enclosed a link to her case, and we’ve taken custody of it and her from the Gatlinburg PD. They found her body in the Little River, and have no concrete time or place of death.

Sorry to drop this on you. I know you were hoping for a different outcome.

I hope you weren’t bothered by me emailing instead of calling. Since another day won’t matter, I didn’t think this was worth upsetting your Christmas for.

Hotch

Tim fires back a quick, ‘Yes I was hoping for different, no I’m not bugged you didn’t call me on Christmas Eve for this, keep me in the loop with the investigation into the murder’ email. Then he reads her file, shaking his head.

He leans back, staring at the ceiling. He’s seen this before. Clean, professional, clues swept aside. She’s obviously dead, and the ME thought she drowned, but she’d also been in the river for a while, and had been nibbled on by enough of the local wildlife that they can’t tell if the water in her lungs got there before she died, or after.

They aren’t going to solve this. It’s entirely likely there never was any shot that they could have. Just figuring out that she was gone put them well ahead of anywhere they were supposed to be.

But that feels hollow.

Tim glances over to his dragons and sighs. Even though he writes about his real life, and the tangles therein, there are times like right now where he’d give anything to live in a world where there’s not struggle that can’t be solved with a judicious application of fire breath.

Then he shakes his head. He looks out his window to DC, still rebuilding, judicious application of fire doesn’t solve as many problems as he’d hope, either. If it did, he wouldn’t be looking for Heidi Partridge’s killer.

He sends off another email, to Kevin and Khan, letting them know the hunt for Heidi Partridge is officially over. The hunt for who got her out, how they did it, and why... He's more than happy if they want to go full bore on that.

Hi,

I’m Tim McGee, new Director of Public Corruption. I’m hoping to take the time to have a chat with each of you, talk about the new crime reporting software that we’re getting set up, the way I hope the FBI will shift with changing times, and get to know you, what you do, what you see, and what you might want to do in the future.

If you could spare half an hour for a chat sometime in the next week, I’d appreciate it.
Thanks,

Tim.

Tim reads over the email he’s going to send to the first 20 people on the alphabetical list of FBI employees. Aaderson to Aces.

He knows how he would have responded if something like that had popped into his email back in the day. He’s not trying to encourage pants-wetting terror, but he’s got a feeling that twenty people are about to begin wondering if they’re on the chopping block.

He figures that, given a few months of this, as more and more people get calls, and they don’t get grilled or fired or asked to rat out their co-workers (though he hopes that by mentioning he’s going to set up a fully anonymous whistle blower reporting software, that the idea that they could rat people out should they see something worth ratting, will filter into their minds) getting an email from him will be less scary.

His fingers cross at that idea. He hits save, and puts that email down to rest. He’ll muck about with it a bit more later.

Time to do some more reading of reports. He’s got a team of people supposedly working on that reporting software, and he’s not given any of their output a thorough looking over recently.

---

Computers are clean. They’re easy. They’re creatures of elegant design, where the right thing written the right way always does exactly what it’s supposed to.

At least, he knows he’s certainly told people (and here he’s thinking of Tony and Gibbs) that’s that how they work.

That is not how the program in front of him is currently working. There’s a bug. Actually, given what he’s seeing, there’s a colony of bugs, hiding somewhere in what’s an extremely alpha version of his Internal Anonymous FBI Whistle-Blowing (His programmers are calling it the IAWB.) software mock-up.

Hunting them down is tiring, and it’s making his eyes cross, but unlike say, a certain no-longer missing person, he knows the bugs are in there and with the proper application of time and energy they will be found.

After two hours, he knows he’s made a difference. Maybe not a huge one, but that program works better now than it did before.

---

Lunch goes the way lunch always does. Munching his meal while typing away. His phone buzzes, and there’s another note from his sister: No Night Furies. Disney owns that! Tim smirks, and types some more. A few minutes later he gets: NOT THE NORTH! THERE BETTER NOT BE A HUGE WALL OF ICE IN THIS THING! AND IF UNDEAD FROST ZOMBIES SHOW UP, I’M SLAPPING YOU FOR WASTING MY TIME. I DID NOT SIGN ON TO READ GAME OF THRONES FAN FICTION.

That gets an outright laugh. No North. I already fixed that in the next version. So, can I write fantasy?

He continues typing away and another few moments go by. He’s almost done lunch and getting back to the grind when he gets. Maybe. I’m getting a minute here and a minute there to read. So far it looks like fan fic, good fan fic, but…

Point taken Tim shoots back. Keep going. When you get deeper in, it’ll branch off further from the Game of Thrones ideas I used to start it off.

He is back at his computer, beating yet another bug into submission when he gets back. Good. Inspiration is okay, but I’m not looking for the next E.L. James.

There’s another quiet moment as Tim continues to hunt for bugs.

Okay, I’m looking for E.L. James’ sales. Just not her reputation for re-writing Twilight into mommy smut.

That also gets a smile from Tim. Well… I don’t know if you’ll call it Mommy smut, but I can guarantee you there’s not a single vampire in there, sparkly or any other sort, or for that matter, anyone based on a certain psychic sparkly vampire, either.

A smiley pops up on his phone, and Tim gets back to work.

“How was today?” Tim asks as he’s sitting in bed with his family. They usually try to have this conversation at dinner time, but like many a dinner times, the various McPalmer babies monopolized their attention, and all he knows for sure is that Jimmy and Abby didn’t have any new bodies, and Breena’s got a pile of them. (Given it’s the week after Christmas, is par for the course. People die in droves on December 26 and 27, having waited so as not to wreck Christmas, and more of them drop like flies on the 29th and 30th, so as to make it before the year ends.)

Breena rolls onto her side, and smiles at them. “I got an interesting call today.”

That has their attention. She often has all sorts of job stuff going on, but interesting calls, not so much.

“Tell us more,” Abby replies, wanting to know what qualifies as an interesting call.

“Oh, okay, so did you know that Gibbs invited Elaine and her husband to the wedding?”

That gets a collection of spouses looking at each other to see if anyone had known that. If they’d thought about it, they’d have assumed it was true, but none of them thought about it.

“I’ll take that as a no. Anyway, they’re coming up. And, she called me because back before they left DC we had said that if they wanted to make a go at the Diner again, we’d be willing to invest…” Tim kind of remembers that, and he can see Abby and Jimmy nodding. “Anyway, Jarvis and Co. set a new law on the books for DC. If you can pay the back taxes you owe on your property, you get your deed free and clear, and he’ll give you a five year no business tax ‘rebuilding’ window.”

That clicks in Tim’s head. And he gets why Jarvis would do that. The back taxes would be based on the assessed value of the property before it burned. And the next five years would be when a business is going through its growing pains, likely not worth all that much. But, after five years, whatever it is would be rebuilt, and if it survived, it’d be thriving, and…
“Not a bad way to get new money into the city,” Tim says.

“Or like Elaine and Brian, old money,” Jimmy replies.

“Exactly. So, they’ve got the loans to rebuild lined up, and if we want to invest the back taxes, they can be clearing up the property, and looking to break ground on the Diner Mark II by the beginning of February.”

“That’s an interesting call, all right!” Abby says. “So… do we have the money for it?”

“And, is this a loan, or are we partial owners or…” Jimmy’s asking.

Brena’s grinning. She ran the numbers on this before deciding to mention it to the other three of them. “The back taxes aren’t as bad as they could be. We’d have to sell some stock, move some money out of the retirement accounts, but yeah, we can do it, and yes, we’d be partial owners. It’s a 10% stake in the Diner. So…” She looks between them.

Tim’s nodding. Just the idea of having the Diner back makes him happy in a way he didn’t know he was missing, but now that he does, he wants it, badly.

Abby’s nodding, too, bouncing with excitement, and Jimmy say, “Oh yeah, we’re doing this!”

Brena looks really pleased by that. “Good. I’ll have an interesting call for her in the morning, and on Saturday, when they’re up for the rehearsal dinner, we’ll have papers to sign.”

______________________________

Wednesday morning, on his way into work, Tim goes by where the Diner used to be. They’ve cleaned up, some. Well… the streets are clear, and there are some cars zipping by on the overpass near them, and he can see that there’s a building across the street that’s under construction.

He doesn’t get out of his car, or try to pull it into what used to be the parking lot. Under the snow and rubble there are only a few signs of what used to be here. A bit of the metal walls is visible, and he can see a little piece of counter jutting into the sky.

He knows the place can’t hear him, nor can it care, but he says it anyway, “They’re coming back. We all will…”

______________________________

When he gets into his office, his phone buzzes. Well, it's definitely not mommy smut. pops up from Sarah.

Daddy smut?

Please tell me you don’t actually know what that term means, instead of you’re really asking that.

He’s debating if he wants to do some googling to find out what he just asked, or decide it’s something he just doesn’t need to know. He looks at his computer, on his desk, in his office, in the Hoover building, and decides that if he does need to know, he certainly doesn’t need to know on this computer. And, in all likelihood, he doesn’t need to know. Uh… Just meant I’m a dad.

Good.
So, not mommy smut, is that a good or bad thing? Tim sends back.

Shrug. We’ll talk more about it after I read more of it.

That’s ominous.

Yep. She flashes a smiley at him. I’m a third of the way through. I’ll have a better idea when I finish it.

Okay.

Maria Aaderson is nervous. Tim understands why. Out of nowhere she’s got this request for a chat from the Head of Public Corruption. And, as an accounts payable clerk, it’s not like she’s normally the kind of person who gets requests to chat with the Head of Public Corruption. At least, not if something hasn’t gone horribly wrong.

He’s read her personnel file, so he knows she’s been with the FBI for eleven years. She lived in DC, worked in the Hoover Building her whole career, and was here during the Fall.

He figures that’s his in.

So, Laid-Back, Sincere McGee is on point. His tie is off, and shirt sleeves rolled up. If he had a Mr. Rogers-style cardigan, he'd be wearing it. He’s offering coffee/tea, sitting across from her at his conference table, not on the other side of his desk. He’s doing everything he can to radiate, ‘this is just a casual chat.’ After a moment, when she starts to relax a little, he says, “As you know, I’m new to this job. But I want to do it well. I want to do it better than anyone else ever has or ever dreamed of.

“If I have my way, we’ll run the cleanest, most efficient force the Federal Government has ever seen, because what happened last year, that’s not happening again, not on my watch.”

She blinks at that, but looks like she approves, and then says, “So… You’re talking to me?”

“Yeah. Well, it’ll take a while, but I’m going to be talking to everyone. You just lucked out to have the first name, alphabetically, in the entire FBI.

“I came up at NCIS, and the guy who was my mentor, he had a rule, ‘Don’t waste good.’ You’re good. You, and everyone else here. They wouldn’t have hired you if you weren’t. I’m sitting on a huge treasure trove of talent, of people who see and know things I could never see and know, and I’m not about to waste that. You and I, we’re talking, and who knows one of these days, I may get a case that crosses my path, and I’ll need someone who knows something about how an accounts payable department is supposed to work, so I’ll have you in my mind, able to call you up and pick your brain if we need it.

“And you see things I never will. We can’t clean up the rest of the government if our ship isn’t clean, and I figure people like you, who are handing out the cash, are in a really good position to see if things are starting to go wrong.”

She nods at that. “I don’t know what we pay them for, just that we do. But, I do know I’ve seen checks go out that looked off.” She offers a lame half-smile. “Those guys who requested them don’t work here anymore.”
Tim nods. “We’ve got a lot of that to deal with. So… Just, if you ever see something. If it doesn’t pass the sniff test, I’m here. I’m listening. You don’t want to talk to me personally, in the next two years we’ll have software up that’ll let you let me know what’s going on, without ever letting me, or anyone else, know you’re the tip off.”

That sparks a little interest in her eyes. Tim wonders how many of those checks she saw go by over the years.

“That’s… not stupid, maybe silly though, but it would help. When we worked here before the Fall, one of the perks was we’d get Metro passes. I get a lot of the Metro still isn’t up and running, but if we could get passes again, or if… I don’t know, like Facebook or something, if there was a van or shuttle to pick us up. There aren’t enough parking spaces, but we’ve all pretty much got to drive, and that’s annoying and expensive, so… If that’s something you could do something about…”

Tim’s writing it down. “I have no idea if I can, but I can certainly pass it on. This is the sort of thing we should be able to do. Setting up a few shuttles or getting a hold of Metro passes shouldn’t be that difficult.”

She smiles at that. “Thanks.” Then she sips her coffee, really looking at him. “You’re not what I was expecting.”

He’s nonplussed by that. “After my first few months here, I’d expect most people think I’m a bit more like,” he points to the dragons on the desk behind him, “than this guy here. Sometimes it’s good to be a dragon. Other times, it’s good to listen.”

That gets a quick smile, and then she’s standing up, getting ready to leave.

Tim’s not sure how useful that was, but… It’s a start.

Like Leon said, get your own house in order first, and if nothing else, he’s opening the flood gates to start getting tales about what’s going wrong in his own house.

When Tim gets home, there’s a box waiting for him. Inside is his manuscript, an entire Staples-worth of new Post-It notes stuck to it, as well as… A lot of new stuff in there. He writes on white paper, and he can see sections of light blue. Apparently, Sarah’s added new stuff, or had notes that needed more than a Post-It’s worth of space to cover.

He lets out a long sigh. Jimmy, Breena, and Abby together didn’t add this many notes when they read it. He glances over the first few pages, and unfortunately, none of them are comments along the lines of “Spell check here!” or “Where the hell did you learn to format these things?”

They’re all real comments.

That gets another long sigh. Well, at least he knows what he’s up to tonight. Lots and lots of reading... and thinking.

But that’s for later, right now he’s got kiddos to kiss, and dinner to eat, and little guys to play with, and… And a lot of good stuff.

“Good God, I didn’t think you needed that much help!” Jimmy says, later that night, as Tim’s digging the first few Post-It note bedecked pages of his manuscript out of the box. “She pick on your font choice, too, or is all of this real?”

Tim makes a little mopey face. “All real.”

“Ugh. I thought you were good at this.”

That gets some stink eye. “I am good at this. Millions of people are good at this.” Tim flicks the notes. “Good doesn’t sell. This is how I get great at this.”

Jimmy sighs, shakes his head, and says, “Okay. This is why I don’t sing professionally. I just want to have a good time doing it, not get someone to criticize every note.”

Tim stares at all of his comments. Jimmy may be onto something there. He settles back onto their bed, fluffs his pillows a bit, puts in his earbuds so he’s got some jazz to listen to, clicks his pen a few times, gets his own pack of Post-It notes (so he can make notes on her notes), and gets ready to read.

It’s quite obvious that Sarah trained to be a writer, as opposed to him, who just picked it up by reading. She’s a better editor than he is, and has a better idea of how stories work. She’s pointing out things like how he needs more backstory up front, and how yes, some mystery is good, he’s not actually writing a mystery here, so a bit more spelling out would be better.

He likes her notes. They’re good, solid advice, giving him a lot of ideas of how to make this better.

So, he’s cruising along, scanning her notes, writing his own.

Then he gets to chapter eight. First sex scene. Gabe and Dae “blowing off some steam” with the “ladies of negotiable virtue.”

If you asked him, he’ll admit he thought twice about sending this to Sarah, because there’s a lot of smut in here, and she’s his sister. And, yes, obviously, she’s figured out he likes sex. The stork brought exactly none of the children he shares a home with. Still, she’s not just his sister, but his little sister, and… Still, the general rule of thumb is if you wouldn’t want your grandma to read it, don’t write it, because you’ll muff it.

And sister should work just as well as grandma… And given his personal grandma…

So… Okay, he knew she was going to be reading this. He knew she was going to give it a going over and offer suggestions for how to sell it. But somehow when he got into the second page of chapter eight, and things started heating up, he wasn’t expecting to see the entire section crossed out with a whole new sex scene in its place.

He knows, in that he’s got the reviews, that he can write an at least acceptable lesbian sex scene, so he didn’t think that adding some guys to the mix would fuck it up that badly. As the very happy owner of penis, he figured he could do an okay job of writing about one in action.

But, okay, she’s the pro. She sells these things.

So he gets to reading and…

Wow. All righty. He’s blushing from his hair to his sternum and wonders how much of this is revenge for him plopping an erotic novel in her lap. Abby’s next to him, reading one of her journals, writing up her own notes on the pros and cons of a particular brand of major mass spec to replace Major Mass Spec, and notices how he’s squirming as he’s reading, and suddenly she’s really interested in this, too, which means a minute later, he’s got Breena and Jimmy also reading over his shoulder.

It’s really fucking explicit. Not that that varies from the tone he set, but… Dae and Gabe… okay, there’s a girl there, too, (there were two of them in his version) but they don’t seem to be nearly as interested in the girl as they were in his version of the story. In fact, in his version of the story there are pages devoted to lovingly describing everything there ever was to know about said girl(s), or at least, what she looks like. But in this version, he’s not entirely sure why she kept the girl, because from what he can see, she’s… kind of beside the point. She completely vanishes for entire pages at a time while Gabe and Dae mess around with each other, in extreme, explicit, detail. (Breena and Abby appear to approve of this. Jimmy, who prefers his smut on film, where, even if the action changes direction, you can still see the girl, appears to be wondering where the girl went, and also, given the level of description of Dae, how much of him Sarah’s personally seen, because sure, he’s happy that she’s noticed his abs, he certainly worked hard for them and doesn’t mind them being praised, at all, but she’s got his freckle count and probably shouldn’t know that much about his dick, let alone his dick when it’s hard.)

So, as Tim gets to the end of that section, he’s in a somewhat confused mental space. Abby and Breena are giving him some very clear, let’s pack this up and get playing looks. Jimmy’s starting to wonder what the hell it was Tim asked Sarah to do to this story, and if they need a better lock on their door at the house.

He checks her notes that go along with this section, and all they say are, “Talk in person.” He checks his watch; it’s not that late. So he calls. (This gets a bit of moping from the girls, along with a ‘We’ll just start without you, then...’” comment from Breena. That’s more than enough to attract Jimmy’s attention away from the story, but not quite enough to distract Tim.)

“I take it you got to chapter eight,” Sarah says when she picks up.

“Uh, yeah. I didn’t think the first version was bad.” I didn’t think it needed to be completely re-written into a Gabe and Dae fuckfest.

“It’s not. This isn’t a writing style thing. Your smut is just fine. It’s a genre thing and a marketing thing.”

“Huh?” This just adds to Tim’s confusion. It’d be one thing if his sex just wasn’t… sexy. It’s another thing all together if it was fine but not… marketable.

“Hence talk in person. What are you doing for lunch tomorrow?”

“Assuming nothing’s on fire, having it with you?”

He can feel the smile. “Right answer. You actually read all the way through?”

“Yeah. So did the girls and Jimmy. Someone needs to wash your brain out with soap and holy “Water.”

She laughs at that. “Right back at you, Tim. I tried to keep close to your style, and the basic idea.”

“Okay. You changed who was doing what.” And to whom.

“Exactly. We’ll talk about why tomorrow. But let me guess, the girls really liked it, and you and Jimmy are sort of meh on it.”

“That sums it up nicely. And Jimmy’s wondering how you know that much about him.”

Sarah laughs. “How’s that go in the TV shows? I didn’t, but now I do.”

Tim smirks.

“How’d the rest of the comments look?” she asks.

“Good. I like the ideas you’re hitting me with.”

“Wonderful. Text me with when you can break for lunch and where to meet?”

“I can do that.”

And then, phone put away, Tim notices some rather happy sounds coming from the bedroom, and decides it’s more than time to play.

---

“999 bugs in the code, 999 bugs… Take one down, beat it to the ground, 998 bugs in the code.” Tim’s singing tunelessly as he takes another whack at the extremely alpha version of IAWB.

He wonders idly how Manner is doing with CrimeWeb. He hasn’t asked about it in weeks, and should probably schedule a time for them to get together to check things over. Get that up and working. Get his anonymous reporting software in place. Integrate them…

Yeah, it won’t be a magic bullet, but it would at least be functional tools to fight the good fight with.

And that’d be a start.

---

“So, tell me what you mean by genre and marketing,” Tim says as Sarah sits down.

“Hello to you, too.”

He points to the chai-tea he’s already ordered for her. And then holds out his hands for Nicholas. He wants some snuggle time with his nephew. Once he looks up from making googly-faces, he says, “Nothing’s on fire, but we’ve got some smoke signals, so I can’t stay for too long.” Apparently, one of his bug fixes unraveled a fairly large section of code that’s kind of necessary to make the interface work. He’s got it back with his team, but they may want to ‘have a chat with him’ sooner rather than later.
“Okay. To the point then.” She takes a long drink of the tea, and sighs. “I love caffeine.”

Tim raises an eyebrow, and then looks down at the five month old in his lap. The very drooly and somewhat fussy five month old, who is gnawing on his finger like a teething ring. Tim can feel the little tooth nub that’s rubbing against his index finger. “Say no more.”

Sarah takes another deep drink of her chai. “About that. As for the story, you’ve got too much sex for a straight fantasy novel, and too much plot for fantasy erotica. You can chop two thirds of the sex and the Gabe/Dae/Brynne storyline and still have a functional fantasy. Or you can keep all the sex, drop some of the world building and politics, and turn it into an erotic romance.”

Tim listens to that, not really liking either of those options, but she’s the one who sells these damn things, so, he’ll think about them. She nods as his prize bitch face wanders across his features when he says, “Tell me about marketing.”

“If we run it as a Game of Thrones-style fantasy, most of your readers will be straight, white guys. They like some sex, but not tons of it, really don’t care much for epic romances, and will immediately toss the book aside if they see the Gabe/Dae romance.”

That blindsides Tim. “I don’t think of Gabe and Dae as a romance. I mean, they don’t fall in love over the course of the story, and that’s what makes a romance a romance, right?”

Sarah rolls her eyes a little at that. Yes, he’s right, that’s technically how the genre works, but she also assumes he knew that she wasn’t using the term to mean a formal genre. “Okay, love letter. You’re right, you start the story with them a couple, so it’s not a ‘Romance.’”

Tim also wasn’t thinking of Gabe and Dae as a couple, either, but… He supposes that’s what you call two people who love each other, live together, and have sex at least near each other if not with each other on a regular basis. So, not like he can quibble on that.

“Fine. And if I keep the sex…”

“Then we’re in romance/erotica territory and your readers will be primarily women. Women readers love romance, and they love sex, hey’re okay with lots of niggly plot and world building, and they generally, especially for this kind of work, want the guys to be gay or bi.”

Tim nods, understanding why she rewrote the story the way she did. And, as he saw, and still remembers with a bit of a smile, Abby and Breena certainly enjoyed Sarah’s rewrite. (The Dragon Knights got to have a good time last night.) But, he doesn’t exactly want to go there. “And if I want to keep it the way it is?”

She sips her drink. “I’ll publish it no matter what. It’s a functional story. Get serious about some of the technical changes I’m giving you, and it’ll work. I’ll make back what I put in on your name alone, but genres exist for a reason, and that reason is to help the people who want to read what you want to write find your work. You’re straddling a few genres here, not really in any of them, so without a shift, your sales will drop. You’ll probably do better keeping the epic fantasy in the erotic story than chopping the romance out of the epic fantasy, but that’s up to you.”

That gets a dry smile out of Tim. “Since it’s the entire main plotline for the second book, you just might be onto something.”

“Book two is when we finally get Katie and Gabe together?”

He’s got a few dozen pieces of chapters of that story written, but not put together, yet. “Yeah. That last ditch cliffhanger plot they’re plotting at the end is the plan to get themselves captured and take over from the inside."

"Which puts Gabe into Katie’s hands."

"That’s the idea."

"It’s a good idea. So, here’s your choice, if you shift Gabe and Dae a bit, start with them as a full romantic couple, you’ll make a lot more of your female readers happy. And if they spend a bit less time with ‘the ladies of negotiable virtue,’ and don’t think I don’t know who you stole that term from,” Tim rolls his eyes, “that’ll go even better."

Tim winces a little.

“What?”

“It’s just… that’s not who we are.”

Again Sarah’s shooting him a look, and then dryly says, “I’m sorry, must have been the shape-shifting-dragon-knights that threw me off, but I didn’t think it was an autobiography.”

Tim narrows his eyes at her. It’s not quite a glare, but the smartass vibe is strong. “It’s not… but… it’s still us you know.”

Sarah nods. “Look, you lucked out on your first series because you could write your love letter to your family and not have to mess with it too much. You can do this here, because I’m your sister and I’ll let you keep it exactly the way it is, if you want to. Or, you can realize that if you shift it a bit, you can make both of us a whole lot more money, and you can have more than fifty people actually finish reading this thing.”

Tim rubs his forehead. He’s not sure what to do with this. He takes a sip of his drink. “I don’t know how to write that.”

“Once again, Tim, shape-shifting-dragon-knights. I know you have an imagination. I know, especially in the later chapters where you get Brynne into it and she starts ‘encouraging’ the guys, that you can write smoking hot guy on guy stuff. So, don’t tell me you don’t know how to do it. Tell me you’re going to really think about what I’m telling you and decide on a path for selling this thing.”

Tim sighs. He thinks. “Okay. If I start with Gabe and Dae together, won’t that make a lot of the readers really dislike Brynne and Katie?”

Sarah nods, pleased. “That’s a good question. You start the story with Brynne coming in to marry Dae. Back it up a bit more, and give us more of her backstory, make her into a character in her own right, independent of the guys, and I think you’ll have better luck with this. We’ve got a whole book of Katie kicking ass and taking name before she gets wind of Gabe, so I don’t think anyone will have any trouble with the idea of her joining the party. You tell us about what Brynne is doing to run her household and why she’s such a good marriage partner, but if you spend a few more chapters showing that, then your readers will get into her head, too, and sympathize with her. They’ll be wondering about what’s going to happen when she gets dumped into Dae’s lap, and if she’s looking at some sort of awful-loveless marriage where all they share is a name and some kids. In fact, you can play up how that was a really common pattern, and go into why this is different.

“If your characters are going to ‘have it all’ lovewise, you might as well give them ‘all.’”

Tim nods, still thinking. “How much do I have to shift things to start Gabe and Dae off as a couple?”
“Just the sex scenes. I know you wrote it, but re-read it and pretend you don’t know these people. Trust me, it this story is just as much a love letter to Jimmy as it is to Breena and Abby.”

“Yes, but would Gabe or Dae see it like that?”

Sarah looks pleased by that question. “Another good question. That one I’ll bounce back to you and your understanding of them and the world you’ve built. But, however it is they understand it, and maybe that can be part of what you work in there, how things shift when Brynne hits things, maybe she’s part of how they see they aren’t just extremely close friends. And if you work that angle in, then you can keep your original sex scene the way it is, but whatever you do with it, you will have fans rooting for those two to ‘fully’ get together.”

“Dae and Gabe, Dae and Brynne, Brynne and Gabe, Gabe/Dae/Brynne…”

“And then pull Katie into it next book.”

“Yes,” Tim rubs his chin. He’s still thinking, juggling things around in his head. “Lots of work.”

Sarah smiles at him. “The good ones always are.”

“Probably going to need at least six months to get a new draft of this.”

“No problem. I’m not in any hurry.” She smiles. “Wouldn’t mind a signed right of first refusal contract though. Having your named locked in on some level would help my portfolio.”

Tim laughs at that. “You coming to Shabbos tomorrow?”

“Yes, and the wedding. Want me to bring it?”

“Yes, I’ll sign. You’ll have first shot at whatever the hell this thing turns out to be.”

“Good, Tim. It’s going to turn out to be good.”

That makes him smile, too.

When Tim gets back to his office, there’s a note waiting for him, on paper.

Jennifer’s letting him know there’s something important up.

He crosses the room, shifts Brynne’s dragon half an inch, so the sunlight from his window is fully covering it, and then picks up the note.

He reads it, nodding, feeling vaguely off foot.

Last week, when he talked to Glane, exactly none of his cases had gone anywhere with the AG. This week, formal prosecution began on ten of them. Apparently, he’s suddenly got some attorneys free to work on his cases.

“What a shock,” Tim mutters, crumpling up the ball and tossing it into his trash can. Then he takes it back out, smooths it back out, and goes into his closet of supplies. He does, much to his surprise, have a box of manila folders in there.
He takes one of them out, writes Dragons on it, puts a few pages of his story in there, and then adds that note.

“Play the long game.” If the AG is going to try and make him toe the line to get his cases seen to, he’ll use it for evidence. He takes their conversation, saves it onto a thumb drive, and sticks that in there, too.

“Years…” It’ll take time. It’ll take playing along, and looking like the poster child for getting along. But Glane, and the men like him, they’re going down. They don’t know it yet, but they will.

Tim looks at the dragons… In most of the story, they look like everyone else, walking around in their human bodies. Maybe, sometimes, you’ve got to blend in, and wait to use your fire, but there’ll be a time for it.

He looks at the pages of the story that’s currently doing camouflage duty for his casework. “The good ones take a lot of work.”

He nods at that, and sits down at his typewriter. This time he’s not writing about dragons, not really. He’s writing up a few new characters, a powerful Lord who controls assets the Knights need to keep the peace, and a new Knight, an older one, with an elite team of knights who reports to him. His fingers are moving so fast he's jammed the typewriter twice, and if it's not exactly a story, it’s coded to look like a story. Not like his Uncle Tom is so stupid he can’t figure out who is who in what he’s doing.

He smirks a little as he types. He’s got a feeling Walter is suddenly going to become a ‘beta reader’ for his stories, too. And likely another one of the knights, too.

Take the time, do it slow, set it up right, and do it on paper, as a story. Burn his typewriter ribbons when he’s done with them. No leaks, no one outside of his circle will be able to twig to what he’s doing. No late night calls, no suspicious lunch dates. Just him passing on his extra-curricular works to a few other guys who might like them. Put the comments on Post-It notes. Write it as fiction, and play with it from there.

And when they’re ready to move, they’ll have it all planned out.

And maybe, for kicks and giggles, once those plans have been executed and he's done with them, he’ll mess with them some and sell the damn things to his sister and bulk out the kids’ college funds while he’s at it.
“Junior’s going to meet us at the airport?”

“With any luck, Dave, too,” Delphine replies.

Senior nods at that. Assuming everything goes right, they’ll get in at about mid-morning, tomorrow. He knows the girls have an outing with Abbi planned, but Tony and Dave should be there when they land.

Senior tucks a stuffed Leaning Tower of Pisa into his bag. They missed last week’s Christmas-extravaganza, so when they get in, it’s present time. Granted, most of the presents they’re giving out come in envelopes, but he’s got one toy for Dave, who he can’t wait to see.

One hour at the airport, an hour and a half on the plane, seven more hours in an airport, eleven hours on a plane, five more hours in an airport, an hour in the air, an hour on the road, and he’ll be snuggling his boy again.

And then it’s wedding time. That’s making him smile, too. “About time they got married!”

“They’ve only been together for two years, Tony! That’s more than fast enough.”

Senior gathers Delphine close, and kisses her. “When you’ve got the right gal, you should move fast. Make her yours and keep her dear.”

She laughs, and gives him a gentle shove, followed by another kiss. They hear a honk and Delphine’s phone buzzes. “That’s our car.”

“Then let’s get going.” Senior picks up the bag with his suit and her dress, and she gets the carryon with Dave’s toy.

It’s time to head back to the US, for a belated Christmas, and a wedding.

“And you’ve got our number…” Jeff Borin says as Becky Borin shoves their bag into the backseat of their Ford F-350. It’s dark out, granted, that’s nothing new at 5:00 in the morning barely a week past the shortest day of the year. And them up, and about, doing stuff, in the 5:00 AM dark, also not new. Actually, since they skipped making breakfast this morning, up and at ‘em at 4:30 meant they got to sleep in a little.

Getting ready to leave, together… That’s the new part.

Moira, this year’s top hand, nods at them from her perch on their front porch. “We’ll be fine. The cattle will be fine. The dogs will be fine. The tourists will be fine!” Part of not making breakfast was Moira and the rest of the hands showing off they could handle everything, part of it was time to do a last minute packing check. “Go, enjoy!” Jeff’s not saying anything as he heads for the truck, but she can feel he’s nervous. It’s been more than a decade since both he and Becky left the ranch for more than two days at a time.

Becky heads over to Moira, gives her a hug, and quietly says, “Unless there’s a catastrophe and we can somehow do something about it from D-- Colombia, don’t call.”
Moira smiles back at her. “That was the plan.”

“Good.” She crosses the frozen, snow-covered parking area in front of their home, and slides into her side of the truck. Jeff’s sitting in the driver’s seat.

“We ready?” he asks, looking at the house like he’s afraid it’ll explode if they go away.

“Ready or not, we’re going! Come on, Dad, time to give away the bride.”

Jeff laughs a little at that, shaking his head, and then puts the truck into reverse. “Wedding time.”

Ziva and Dave are the first one to get to their house on Friday, December 29th 2017, first day of the great Borin-Gibbs wedding festivities.

She unlocks the door, heads in, and checks the thermostat, but whatever magic it is McGee did to it is still working. It’s cool in there, because they haven’t been in all week, but the heat is on, chugging away, warming the place up. Give it an hour, and it’ll be nice and toasty.

She takes Dave’s favorite blanket off the back of the sofa, spreading it on the floor in front of the fireplace, and then sets him on it, taking his jacket off, before going to the coat racks to hang his jacket up.

“Almost Shabbos-time. What shall we do first?”

Dave gurgles at her and works on his rolling over skills. He’s pretty good at getting from his back to his tummy, but getting back over again appears to be stumping him these days. He’s working on it.

She sniffs a bit, and like always when she’s the first one here, the house feels a little empty and flat. It smells cold, abandoned. But not for much longer.

Ziva starts by getting a fire going in the fireplace. That’s Gibbs’ job. Normally, when he’s in town, he goes over to her place, runs with Tony in the morning, and then helps her out, wrangles Dave, and they both come to the house together, but today he’s going to be coming in later than normal, and she wants their home completely inviting for Borin’s parents. So today, she’s arranging kindling and lugging in the first tote of logs.

Once it’s burning brightly, she heads back to the car, getting the groceries.

She hasn’t felt this… excited… maybe… This could be excitement, but maybe it’s pride, or… Ziva’s not sure. She’s showing off her home to her new family. She’s making food for her new in-laws, and… And she never got to do that for Tony’s family. There wasn’t a Senior-coming-over-for-dinner-the-first-time moment. No, get-to-meet-the-parents-nervousness, or get-to-meet-the-parents-showing-off-how-awesome-we-are. Whatever this is, she hasn’t felt it before, and right now, she’s enjoying it.

And she’s going to do her dad proud.

Abbi’s mentioned that her parents don’t get a lot of turkey. They live on a cattle farm in the middle of nowhere. They do celebrate Thanksgiving, but with a dry-aged, standing rib roast. It’s not that they can’t buy turkey if they wanted one, it’s just that if you only grocery shop every six weeks, and you pack every inch of the truck full when you do it, shoving a frozen bird big enough to feed at least 20 into the truck just isn’t practical. Especially not when you’ve got, literally, tons of top-quality, gourmet protein mooing about in the backyard.

From what Abbi’s said, Ziva gets the idea that her parents are very practical.

And tonight, they’re practical people who are getting an amazing roast turkey supper.

So, turkey, check. It’s brining away in the cooler. Gibbs is going to actually cook the thing, he’s the one who knows how to use the smoker, unless the flight runs late, then she’ll pop it into the oven.

Turkey fixings… Two more bags of groceries get lugged into the house. Check.

Cider… Hard and soft. More checks. Ziva pours the soft cider into a slow cooker, sets it on low, tosses in two sticks of cinnamon, a few cloves, and some dried orange peel. Between that and the fire, the house smells lived in now. Hard cider goes into the fridge. She eyes one of them. Not like she’s going anywhere. She pops a bottle, and has a sip.

Dave makes a startled sound, and she darts out. “Look at you!” He’d managed to successfully roll himself not just onto his tummy, but back again to his back, to his tummy once more, and off of his blanket onto the hardwood floor, which was colder than he liked. He’s staring up at her, looking really shocked because everything’s so cold on his belly. “I put you there for a reason, you know?”
He blows a drooly bubble at her, and she picks him up and puts him back on the blanket, this time sitting down. “Your father wouldn’t just take my word for it, either. He always has to test it, too.”
Dave coos. “Here.” She arranges his toys around him. “You play, then snack time, and nap time.”
Dave lunges for his plastic rings, and manages to grab one, whacking it against the other ones.
“Good. You’re looking content.”

She kneels there, looking at her son, seeing shades of Eli in his face. She can imagine what her mother would have thought of this. Ema taught her the prayers, and how to make Challah, how to cook in general, how to keep a home, on the idea that one day, she’d have a home to keep. Abba…
She knows he told her that he liked the idea of grandchildren, and it felt real. But that was the thing about Eli, everything about him always felt real. That’s why he was dangerous. He could be sliding a knife into your back, literally or metaphorically, but he’d still feel like your friend.

He may have liked the idea of her with a home and family, but he trained her to break families, not make them.

“Could you have imagined this, Abba?”

She knows that Gibbs’ ghosts talk to him, but hers don’t deign to answer. And it’s probably better that way. Let the past be the past, and the present and the future take her time, attention, and love.

Ziva gets up, turns on some music, a little dance in her step, as she heads to the kitchen to get ready to open her home to welcome the newest members of their family.

Abbi clicks the power button on her computer. The little dialog box pops up, making sure she’s really done for the day, but she is.

It’s noon on Friday, December 29th, and she is officially, off.

Done.
Incommunicado.

Off the grid.

Until January 15.

Omagi’s got everything he could possibly need to keep the place going for slightly more than two weeks. (She never expected to end up running CGIS. Omagi really never expected to be the CGIS number two man. But when good people are thin on the ground, you make do with who you have.)

She pulls her jacket on, and locks her office behind her.

Abbi leaves CGIS and Director Borin behind. For the next two weeks, she’s The Bride, on her honeymoon, and she intends to enjoy every second of it. Starting now.

She sees Gibbs’ truck waiting for her in the parking garage, and from her vantage point, she can see the back of Gibbs’ head along with Mona’s. She knows Jackson’s in there, but he’d have to be sitting on the back of the seat for her to see him, and he’s not allowed to do that. She crosses to the truck, and gets in, tossing her go bag inside.

He reaches over, kissing her. “Hi.” Mona and Jackson both give her affectionate licks.

She kisses Jethro back. “Hello back.” And pats both doggies. “So…”

“I checked the flight, they’re still on time. So, off to Dulles, get your parents, lunch, and bring them home for Shabbos.”

“Good. Ziva told me, Senior and Delphine are in Germany and due in round about this time tomorrow.”

“Omagi promised me that anything short of a direct nuclear attack on one of our bases, I’m off.” She smiles at that. “He also tells me that anything short of a nuclear attack on one of our bases, he’s got Sunday off.”

“Not gonna miss your wedding?”

“Nope.” Abbi shivers a little, an excited gesture, that looks very young, and very unguarded. “It’s really happening.”

Gibbs has a huge smile on his face. He kisses her again. “Yeah, it is.”

“Ducky…” Penny says, as she sees him pat his jacket pocket, yet again. Checking for, (by her count) the sixth time, his wedding speech.

“I know. I know it’s there. I have a copy saved to my google drive, too. And I have emailed a copy to Jimmy. A man is allowed his idiosyncrasies.”

Penny smiles at that, and nods. “A nervous man?”
He sighs. “It’s silly. I’ve given speeches, lectures, once, back in the day, I even preached a homily. I presided over Jimmy and Breena’s ‘wedding,’ too, but this time feels different.”

She smiles at that, too. “This time matters more.”

He takes her coat off the coatrack and holds it open for her. She checks her watch as soon as her wrist is through her sleeve. “A little over forty-eight hours, and you can stand up there and marry your best friend.”

He chuckles a bit at that, taking his fedora off the hat rack, settling it upon his head. “I expect Jethro would be a tad startled if the nuptials ended up with the two of us married.”

She gently elbows him. “You’re horrible!”

“I’m trying.” He nods to her phone. “And how does Google suggest we proceed?”

She looks at the screen. “Looks like 95 until we get to Wilmington, and then to 301 for the rest of the trip. No major traffic snarls, yet.”

“Yet. Let’s get moving before that’s no longer true.” And with that the Langston-Mallard branch of the family begins the trek home.

“Mom! Dad!” Abbi jumps forward to hug her parents as they wander through Dulles toward the luggage carousels. Her mother enthusiastically hugs her. Her dad gives her a lackluster smile and a half-hearted squeeze. She knows what’s going on. “Bumpy flight?”

Becky nods. “We hit turbulence a few times, and Jeff’s not much of a flyer to begin with, soo…”

He waves it off. “Let me sit still for a few moments, and my stomach will figure out where it belongs.”

Gibbs hugs Becky, and says to Jeff, “Dramamine?” as they edge closer to a bench, and Jeff flops down.

He shakes his head. His color is starting to get better, slowly. “Makes me feel stoned, and not in a good way.”

Gibbs nods, remembering what Jeff said about not liking straight pot because it made him too loopy.
Then he feels ice down his spine. “Uh…” Cannabis is legal in Washington, State of Colombia, but not in Virginia, and the Federal Government, which runs the TSA, which controls this airport, but not the one they took off from in Montana, hasn’t legalized it yet, either. “Did you bring your…
diabetes meds?”

Jeff sniggers, though it looks weary. “No. Not the one you’re thinking of. Not getting busted and wrecking your wedding, or reputation,” he says to Abbi.

“Thanks, Dad.”

“Figured you had more than enough excitement coming your way, without bailing me out of a TSA Gulag.”
That gets a dry laugh. “Just a bit,” Abbi replies. “So, besides turbulence, how was the flight…”

The application of food (even if it is from a restaurant in an airport), beer, and best yet, a seat that doesn’t move, improves Jeff’s outlook on life significantly.

“I’d forgotten how warm it gets back east.”

Gibbs and Abbi share a smile at that. He’d had the radio on when she got in the car, and they both heard the weather guy talking about how it was cold twenty degrees out, and with the wind chill it was down to ten.

Becky gives him a little shove, knowing Jeff’s just fooling with them. It’s cold, and even by Montana standards tenish degrees in the wind is chilly. He shrugs it off a bit, and then says, honestly this time, “It’s also damper than I remember.”

Becky nods, vigorously. “Different kind of cold, seeps into your clothing and won’t get out.”

“Yeah, Mom. They’re calling for snow tonight and tomorrow.”

“Enough to cause problems?” Becky asks.

“Nah. Not for this group,” Gibbs replies, munching one of his fries. “Roads may be dicey, but that won’t stop a murder investigation, so we can all drive in it. By Sunday, all the main roads should be clear.”

“But we may get enough to renovate the sledding track. That was looking a little sad when we left after Christmas,” Abbi says.

“You have a sledding track?” Becky asks.

That gets a discussion of the Christmas Holiday, and what happened. As Abbi and Gibbs are explaining Fornell’s idea and how it got built, Becky holds up her hands, “Okay, I know you’ve got pictures. Get us up to date on who is who. I don’t want to be scrambling for names.”

Abbi pulls out her phone, and begins to flip through shots, both of the sledding track with them whipping around on it, and of the different members of the family celebrating over Christmas.

Gibbs nods along, and says, “Tonight we’ve got… Ducky and Penny, Tobias and Wendy, Emily and her new boy are coming ‘round for dinner, four McGees, five Palmers, and three DiNozzos.”

Abbi thinks for a moment. “And a handful of Hollands. That’s the core group, more or less. Sarah and Glenn Holland, Tim’s sister and her husband have been coming around a lot more often since they had the baby, but they aren’t every week. Come Saturday and Sunday, we’ll get the whole crew in.”

“A lot of faces,” Jeff says.

Gibbs shakes his head a bit at that, but it’s not like she’s wrong.

Jimmy rolls the newly sanitized table back into their refrigerator. “I think, Dr. Allan, that we’re done for the day.”

Allan looks around, and then says, “You know, there’s no wood down here to knock on.”

Jimmy laughs at that. “Not that’d it help. But the gut isn’t feeling another one coming in.”

Allan looks at the clock; it’s only a little past two. “Not feeling it, or eager to get out of here and start your weekend?”

Jimmy smiles at that, too, just a shade of guilt in his expression. “Well… now that you bring it up…”

Allan smirks. “Go ahead. I’ll hold down the fort. Won’t even tell the Boss you’re playing hooky.”

Jimmy grins at him. “I knew there was a good reason I hired you.”

Allan waves that off, as Jimmy heads over to grab his jacket, and then says, “Uh… You know how I got invited to Gibbs’ wedding?”

Jimmy nods. “I wasn’t one of the ones roped into addressing envelopes, Abby and Breena have the nice handwriting, but I am the one who supplied your address, so yeah, I had a clue.”

“Allan doesn’t have a plus one. And…”

Allan’s eyes light up. “And now you do?”

“I… How badly would it mess things up if I asked to add a plus one? I mean…” He cringes a little. “I know this is like a million shades of bad manners, but… I really like this guy, and…”

“Bring him, and I’ll get it cleared. So, what’s his name? Where’d you meet him?”

Sam sighs. “So…” he sighs again. “Okay, so… When I replied, I didn’t have a plus one. And…”

“Why would I laugh?”

“His name is Alan Samuels.”

Jimmy tries very hard and manages to choke that laugh into a snigger. “Tony’s head is going to explode.”

“I know.” That gets an eye roll. “We met picking out Christmas trees, of all things. Anyway, I’m grabbing a spruce, he’s getting a bigger spruce, we do the little trying not to bump into each other dance, and that’s that. Didn’t think about it twice. Then, it’s the 26th, and I’m at that lecture for my CEUs, and he’s the one giving it.”

“He’s a doctor, too?” Jimmy’s delighted. If he were designing a man for Sam, this sounds like the ingredients he’d toss into the mix.

Allan nods. “Apparently he thought about the dance of the spruce trees. After the lecture he came over and struck up a conversation. He’s got a specialty in infectious diseases. He’s actually in DC now because he’s studying how the collapse of the local medical system effected contagious diseases. Trying to figure out how much working hospitals effect things. And back when I was with the CDC we’d actually corresponded a few times on minimizing the infectious impact of airborne viruses in airports. But it never went past a few emails, mostly checking each other’s math.”

“Sounds like a match made in heaven,” Jimmy’s smiling as he says it.

Allan looks dreamy as he says, “I hope so.”

“Hello…” Fornell calls out, softly, as he opens the door to the house. When he and Wendy pulled up, the only other car in the drive was Ziva’s, and he’s not about to yell out a loud greeting when Dave may be napping.

Turns out quiet was a good plan. Dave, and his Mama, are both getting a snooze on the sofa.

He and Wendy sneak in, taking their bags up to their room, and once up there, they’re feeling safe to talk again.

“Smells good down there,” Wendy says, hanging up a suit bag, and her dress.

Fornell nods, looking a little distracted.

“Tobias…”

He shakes his head and focuses back on her. “I know.”

“Come on. She’ll be fine. He’s a good guy. I like him. Diane likes him. Nothing—“

“Everything’s going to happen. He jumped her nine seconds after we pulled out of the driveway.”

Wendy smirks at that. “Probably. Nothing she doesn’t want to happen is going to happen.”

Fornell glares at his wife. This is the first time Emily’s brought a boyfriend home, and he’s staying at their place, alone, with her. “That is not making this any easier.”

She smirks at that, too. “He’s been over all week. You like him.”

Fornell glares a little at the image of Drew Stacy. “I like him when I can keep an eye on him.”

Wendy outright laughs at that. “Oh,” she pets him gently, “You’re reminding me of my dad so much right now.”

Fornell rolls his eyes, and flops onto the bed. “I left. I’m not hovering around. They’re getting their alone time.”

“And she appreciates it.”

“He appreciates it.”

“That, too.” She can see he’s still kind of mopey about his little girl playing house with her newest boyfriend. Wendy pulls out the big guns. “Ed Slater, you want to be reminding everyone of him?”

Fornell looks betrayed. “Oh, that’s just mean!”

She looks at him.
He rolls his eyes and sits up. “Fine.” He looks toward the door to their room, and is about to say something like, “Do you want to get the groceries we brought now, or should we stay up here and not risk waking up Ziva…” when Wendy plops herself into his lap, facing him, and gives him a kiss.

“Looks like we’ve got a while before we need to be downstairs again,” she says.

Fornell’s hands come to her hips. “Probably.”

Her look says it all, and he kisses her, gently at first, but deeper, with intent as the moment stretches on.

Normally, of the two of them, Jimmy’s the one who gets home later. But, between his sense that no one was going to be needing his skills, and Breena trying to get some extra time in at work, he’s the one who left early, picked up the kids, and is taking them to the house.

They’re in a pretty good mood as he pulls up, parking next to Ziva’s car. Molly’s very much looking forward to some time with Pop and the doggies. (Mostly the doggies.) Anna’s telling him in a very animated but somewhat low on words sort of way about something. He’s not sure what a boggin is, but whatever it is, she’s really into it. Donnie’s wrapping up his nap.

He gets them out of their seats, and with Donnie on his arm, snuggling against his chest, holding Anna’s hand, Molly leads the way as they head into the house.

“AUNT ZIVA!!” Molly gets out before Jimmy can shush her. And with that, naptime is over.

“Shhh!” Jimmy says, two seconds too late, as Ziva sits up, slowly. “Sorry,” he says as Molly shoots over to her, looking for a hug.

Ziva waves it off, rubbing her eyes. “Dave is still asleep,” and he is napping away on the sofa. She sits all the way up and hugs Molly, and Anna who joins her a moment later.

She looks a little confused to see him and the kids. Normally, if Jimmy’s bringing them home, it’s after a full day of work. “Did we sleep all afternoon?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “I’m about three hours earlier than normal.” He begins the job of getting all of his kids out of their winter gear.

“Slow day?”

“Very slow. Last I saw, Tony was finishing up putting his details into the computer. He and Abby should be about two hours behind me.”

“Everyone home for Shabbos.”

“Unless some poor family just got hit by a bus or things blew up at the FBI, that’s how it’s looking.”

She checks her phone. “You hear anything from Gibbs?”

“I checked in with Abby before I left, and she’s reporting the Borins have been picked up, fed lunch, and are stuck in traffic on 95. Should be here in a bit.”
A second later, having gotten all of his kids out of their winter gear, and sat down next to Ziva, Anna’s grabbing his arm and trying to pull him to the door. “BOGGIN! BOGGIN!”

Jimmy looks at Ziva, and she shakes her head, no idea what a boggin is. Jimmy lets himself be led back to the door, and when Anna sees that hasn’t done the job, she starts whacking it. Jimmy picks her up, and says, “Honey, I don’t know what a boggin is.”

But now, in her daddy’s arms, she’s high enough up to point, so point she does, through the door, to the sledding track in the front yard. It’s solid ice, but over the week it got warm enough to make everything slump, so it looks droopy, but it’s hard as a rock. “Boggin… Toboggin! Tomorrow sweetie. We’ll have enough snow for it tomorrow.” He points to Fornell’s car. “Uncle Tobias is here, and I’m sure he’ll be willing to help get it rebuilt. Then we can all sled tomorrow.”

Anna’s not thrilled by that, but she decides not to have a massive fit over it. Possibly because Ziva’s joined them at the window in the door, and is resting her hand on Anna’s back.

“Let me guess, you’d get from the ranch all the way to Idaho in less time than it took us to get from the airport to here,” Abbi says as they pull into the driveway of the house.

Gibbs is sort of paying attention to what the Borins are saying, but he’s vastly more focused on the feel of right now. He’s bringing his wife’s family home. He’s showing them what he’s built: this family, in the metaphorical sense, and this house, in the literal.

He’s proving, tangibly, that he can take care of any need their girl may have, and that feels good, proud, and content.

He can see Jeff looking at the place, and to him, and back to the house. There’s a slow, appreciating nod that goes with it. Gibbs feels the pride of having earned that nod more intensely than any metal he’s ever gotten. Then Becky says, “Oh, Lord, you weren’t kidding about the sledding track!” That gets all attention to the swooping curves of melted/refrorozen snow/slush all around the front yard.

“ Nope,” Abbi says as Gibbs shakes his head. Abbi points out a few of the cars. “And it looks like we’ve got some people who are going to want to ride it, soon.”

When they step out, Gibbs notes the smell of wood smoke from the fireplace, and… turkey on the smoker… He sees Fornell’s car and knows why he’s here this early. Tobias has his back for making sure his in-laws get a proper homecoming.

Jeff and Becky are talking to Abbi about the sledding track, and looking around at the rest of the property. “I’ll never get used to all the trees,” Becky says.

“They go on for miles,” Abbi replies. “Actually, keeping this mowed down is a big part of our weekly chores. If we leave it alone, it’ll be a forest before the year is done.”

Gibbs notices the curtains on the front window shift. He can imagine the faces looking out through them. “They’re dying to meet you two. Come on.”

They’ve just about taken three steps when they hear another car pulling up. That pauses the trip into the house as they wait for Penny and Ducky to get out. A moment later, as the first flakes of snow begin to drift down, Abbi says, “Mom, Dad, this is Penny Langston and Ducky Mallard. Penny, Ducky, Becky and Jeff Borin.”

Penny offers hugs, and Ducky shakes hands. Penny’s smiling at them, and Ducky says, “We cannot wait to hear your stories. Abigail is a little short on the tales of her youth.”

Becky grins at that. “Oh, I think we may have a story or two.”

Abbi rolls her eyes. “Oh God!”

Jeff chuckles. “Isn’t that the point of introducing us to everyone? So they get to see the you you were before they knew you?”

Abbi looks a little wary. “I guess.”

Becky wraps an arm around her. “We’ll be gentle. Your sister though…”

With a sarcastic tone, Abbi says to Gibbs, “We should have eloped.”

He laughs at that. Then the door opens, and Jimmy calls out, “Come on, stop freezing out there and let us say hi to everyone!”

And so, Gibbs brings his in-laws home.

“You ready Abbs?” Tony asks as he breezes down to the lab.

She looks around at everything, but like most of the rest of the government, she’s having a slow week, too. “Requisitions requested, reports filed, evidence catalogued, I’m ready! Let’s get out of here before something blows up!”

“Amen!” and with that, they’re off.

A minute later, they’re in the parking lot debating her car or his. “Are we picking up the McLittles?”

“I think so. Last I heard Tim was still working.” She grabs her phone and sends off a text. A minute later she says, “My car. He’s still beating stuff into submission.”

They head over to her car, and hop in. As they’re pulling out Abby says, “You hear from Senior?”

“They’re in Germany,” he checks his watch, “for the next four hours, and then to London to Boston they go.”

“I thought they were going from Berlin to New York.”

“They were. Something’s screwed up in Newfoundland, of all places, and it’s messing up the air traffic.”

Abby shakes her head at that. “You excited to see them?”

Tony sighs a little. “Yeah. Probably. It’ll be okay, I know that, but…”

“But it’s been not okay enough, you’re still wary.”
“Yeah.” They ride in quiet for a moment while Tony fiddles with the stereo, looking for something that won’t torture his eardrums. “I can’t understand how you and Tim aren’t deaf.”

Abby rolls her eyes, and gives him a poke.

He settles on a jazz mix. “This is Tim’s right?”

Abby listens for a moment. “Yeah. Though Jimmy’s got a similar playlist, too. Breena’s got some soft rock/pop if you like. You know, if you want, you can add a mix, too. Not like I don’t have twenty gigs of storage on that thing.”

Tony stares at Abby’s phone. “Maybe this weekend.”

“In our copious spare time.”

“I don’t have much going on tomorrow. Keeping eyes on babies, and getting Senior and Delphine from the airport. Some of us weren’t invited to Abbi’s-girly-spa-fest.”

Abby grins. “Sucks to be you. I’m getting massaged, pampered, my nails and hair done. Gonna be a new woman by the time you see me at the rehearsal dinner.”

“And we’re riding herd on the kiddos. I know.” He smiles a little at that, twisting his neck. They both hear the popping. “Maybe I’ll crash the girly-spa-fest. I could use a massage.”

Abby laughs at that.

“You know,” he says, changing the subject, “there is one thing I’m kind of excited about… I can’t wait to see Gibbs with in-laws. I mean, happy in-laws, not us busting his former mother-in-law.”

Abby’s grinning at that, too. “They should be home by now. What do you think they’re like?”

“Abbi’s told us they run a ranch, so… probably get on with Gibbs like a house on fire. I swear he was a cowboy in a former life.”

“He was, you know? Mike told me that.” She says it deadpan enough that Tony shoots her a very curious look, not sure if she’s joking or not.

She winks at him. “Nah. Sherriff. Once upon a time he had a tin badge and a trusty horse. He knew who the good guys were and the bad guys, and he protected the one and shot the other.”

“And by once upon a time, you mean, what, last year?”

“Something like that.” That gets a pause, too. “Actually, God, it’s been almost two years since he ‘retired,’” Abby says.

“Fast two years.”

“Yeah. Turn this one up.” Tony reaches for the stereo and turns up a peppy saxophone mix. “We were worried about him before he retired, afraid he’d get lost without the job, but…”

“Yeah,” Tony says. Just because he got caught with the shit end of the worried-about-retired-Gibbsstick doesn’t mean he didn’t feel it, too. “But he didn’t, and now… When’d you meet him, back in… ‘97? Something like that, right?”

“January of ’98. He’d just gotten back to the US. I’d been with NCIS for… I don’t know, two months, something like that.”
“Nineteen years ago. Seventeen for me. I’d have never expected us to end up here.”

Abby shakes her head at that. “No. Never in a million years. But it didn’t take a million years, just twenty of them.”

---

Breena stands up, back creaking. It’s been a long day of a lot of makeup.

Tim’s told her they’ve done actual studies of this, but she’s not terribly impressed, any good mortician could tell exactly what those studies found, death rates shoot sky high on December 26th, and stay there until January 1st.

And they drop from December 23rd to the 25th. The old, the sick, the frail… They hold on to avoid dying on Christmas.

On the 26th, her dad picked up six people. He got eight of them on the 27th. Six more on the 28th. Normally, they pick up two or three people a day.

So, it’s been a long week. She’s been doing more embalming and making up than normal, both in that she’s got more clients, and her father normally works on that, too, but he’s been picking people up.

Her spine pops like bubble wrap as she gently twists from side to side. She’s looking forward to tomorrow, and tonight, where she intends to spend at least an hour laying down with Tim and Jimmy working on her, intensely.

“Well, Mrs. Heland, we are done. My sister and Mom have you from here. They’ll make sure your family gets to say goodbye to you properly.”

Mrs. Heland, of course, does not respond.

Breena heads to the private breakroom they have in the basement. She tosses her scrubs into the wash hamper, and changes into her street clothing. As she’s doing that she sends off a text: Am I the last one home?

A minute later she’s got a shot of Jimmy, Abby, and the kiddos playing on the floor with Mona.

She also gets: I doubt it. From Tim. You leaving now?

Yeah. Just changing out of my scrubs. You?

Just about done. Got to drop a few pages off to some beta readers.

???

Worked on a new scene for the novel. Walt and Uncle Tom want to give ‘em a read.

Breena knows she’s missing something on this conversation, and she knows that Tim’s telling her this for a reason. She also knows not to ask over text. Cool. We gonna like these new scenes, too?

Yeah, I think so.

Excellent. See you in an hour or so?
Tim’s phone buzzes, and a shot of Jimmy, Abby, the kids and Mona flashes up, along with Breena’s Am I the last one home?

He spends a moment texting with her, as he carefully wraps up his work for the day.

Hopefully, it’s been a productive day.

Hopefully.

He hasn’t actually hit his Uncle or Walter with his ‘story idea’ but he’s thinking it’ll work. Thinking it’ll work enough that today, instead of beating his computer systems into shape, he wrote up, on his typewriter, on paper, with carbon copies (Jennifer just about died when he said he wanted carbon paper. She didn’t know anyone his age even knew what that was, let alone how to use it.) a brief, here’s who’s who of the dragons, adding two more characters Tomas and Hurron, and giving them familiar enough backstories that Tom and Walter should, with very little difficulty, know who the hell they are.

Likewise, he wrote up his Villains list, and added enough so that they should also be able to figure out what the hell is going on with them, too.

He’s sure that list is going to grow, but for right now, he’s got a few targets and at least one big bad.

It’s enough.

He adds a post-it note to each collection of pages. Here’s the story I was talking about. It’s rough, and I’m still working on it. I’ll send you more as I’ve got it. Let me know what you think. Thanks, Tim.

He plops them into envelopes and tosses his copy of what he’s written today into his Dragons folder. The FBI is officially closed on Monday, but Tuesday or Wednesday, he should get some ideas from Tom and Walt as to what they think Tomas and Hurron should be doing.

And with that, he’s done for the day, too.

Time to get heading home.

Like Thanksgiving, Gibbs and Fornell (mostly Fornell) have been in charge of the turkey.

And like Thanksgiving, the bird came off the smoke a bit early, because it’s going to get some time to hang out in the kitchen, “rest”, cool off a little, and make sure that all the rest of the goodies are ready to go.

Which means, for the first time since he’s gotten home, Gibbs has a moment alone with Fornell.

And there’s something he can’t wait to ask about. Emily’s new boy. The two of them showed up about half an hour ago, and they’re staying for dinner before heading back “home.” He’s a lanky kid with almost literal heart eyes every time he looks at her. Both of them are on the sofa, talking with Wendy, Jimmy, and Penny about something.

Gibbs pointedly looks at the kid, and Fornell says, “His name is Drew Stacy. He’s a junior, majoring in information systems, and an Army ROTC Commander.”

Gibbs nods. Drew’s got blue eyes, dark brown hair shaved high and tight, and military posture. Seeing him sitting next to Emily, adoration oozing off of him, he feels like he’s looking in a mirror from 40 years ago.

“Say’s he’s enlisting fulltime when he graduates. Going to go career military. Something about securing data systems in hostile environments that made Emily swoon, and sounded like gibberish to me.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. He keeps watching. Drew gently brushes Emily’s hair out of her face. She’s grinning, and kisses his palm, both of them completely unaware of the two old guys with white hair watching them from the kitchen.

“He keeps calling me, ‘Sir.’”

Gibbs sniggers, remembering doing that with Shannon’s dad.

They watch them for another moment before Gibbs says, “That’s your son-in-law.”

Fornell sighs, staring at the two of them, knowing what he’s seeing. “Yeah.” He rolls his eyes. “God help him if he knocks her up before they get married.”

“Tobias…”

He just looks at Gibbs, and Gibbs nods. “Shannon’s dad probably said the same thing to his best friend when I showed up.”

That makes Tobias laugh.

“Your girls like him?”

“Diane says he’s ‘cute,’ and Wendy approves. He pulls out chairs for her, listens when she talks, and has managed to go an entire five minutes at a time without touching her if I’m staring directly at him.”

Gibbs chuckles, remembering that, too. “Could be worse.”

“Yeah, he could be a Marine,” Fornell’s deadpan is perfect for a beat, and then he breaks into a grin. Gibbs gives Fornell a shove when he says that, and Fornell shoves back, smirking.

“Gonna go commiserate with Jeff?”

Fornell rolls his eyes at that. “I’ll wait for a ring.” Then he looks over to where Jeff and Becky are chatting with Tony and Abbi, both of them giving the grand tour of all the photos on the mantle. “How’s it feel? Nervous?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Nah. Excited. Happy. Little weird to have in-laws again, but… Not bad.”

“Good.”

“You?”
Fornell knows Gibbs is asking about his part of the wedding, the best man’s speech. “I’ve got it down. You got your part?”

“Almost. Gonna run it by my ghostwriter one more time.”

“You’ve got a ghostwriter? That’s cheating.”

“He offered. Just want another set of eyes on the thing, make sure I don’t sound stupid.”

“You’re not gonna.”

Gibbs smiles at that. A moment later, Ziva’s in the kitchen. “Is this gossip open to anyone or is it man-only?”

Gibbs and Fornell share a look. “Nothing exciting in here.”

She gives both of them a long look, and then says, “Tobias, we have something of a family tradition, and I was wondering how you’d feel if we invited Drew to our next bootcamp?”

Gibbs laughs, loud, at that idea. Apparently, he’s not the only one thinking Drew Stacy’s gonna be sticking around.

Tim pulls up to a packed driveway. He doesn’t recognize one of the cars, but the rest of them look familiar.

Full house tonight.

He sneaks in during the last few seconds of handwashing. It takes him a second to basically throw his coat at the coatrack, and slip into line behind Penny.

She turns to hug him. “Long day?”

“Not horrible, just time intensive.” Almost everyone else is already seated, so he washes his hands quickly, and slips into his chair between Abby and Breena. Abby gets a kiss, and he’s about halfway to kissing Breena when he notices exactly who’s at the table and pulls back at the last second, slipping into a warm hug.

“Hey!”

“You made it,” Jimmy replies. “Thought you weren’t that far behind Breena.”

“I can’t have left that much later than she did, but the snow screwed up traffic, and I got stuck,” Then he pauses, seeing three people he’s never met before. “I’m sorry. Hi! I’m Tim,” he says, getting up to shake Jeff and Drew’s hands, and kiss Becky’s cheek. “I know you two are Abbi’s parents, and…”

No one had told him Emily was coming tonight, let alone that she’d have a friend holding her hand.

“I’m Drew,” the kid says.

Emily smiles up at Tim, as Tim says, “New boyfriend. Cool. You’re in for the wedding?”

Emily nods at that as Tim sits back down again, making sure all of the kiddos get hugs and kisses as he moves around the table.
Jimmy looks up sharply at that, “Abbi, speaking of ‘in for the wedding,’ how big of a pain in the butt is adding one more person to the guest list?”

She flashes him a half smile, “Depends, are you willing to make all the calls?”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah, if you get me the numbers, I can do that.”

“Then it’s not a pain in my butt at all, who are we adding?”

“Allan…” he turns to Jeff and Becky, “my assistant, Dr. Sam Allan, He’s got a new boyfriend, and was hoping to invite him.”

“Oh!” Abbi’s face is happy at this. “Yeah, of course. Is this his first boyfriend since…” She drifts off on that idea, not everyone knows Sam’s background here.

Jimmy fills in the blanks. “Sam had a partner. He was murdered in a hate crime. That was… got to be close to four years ago now. After the trial, he decided to switch from infectious diseases to medical examination. To the best of my knowledge this is his first boyfriend since, so you all,” and here he’s looking at Tony, “be nice.”

Tony gets the message, “I’m always nice.”

“Yeah, be nicer. His name is Alan Samuels.”

And Tony does laugh hard enough at that that a casual observer might think his head is in danger of exploding. But, he’s not the only one, everyone else who gets the joke thinks that’s fairly funny, too. (And once it’s explained to Drew, who hadn’t listened closely enough to Allan’s name to catch it the first time, he thinks it's funny, too.)

They’re passing around the turkey, everyone filling their plates, mostly talking about the food, when Jeff asks, “Did that case you two were out to investigate ever get solved?”

He’s asking Gibbs and Fornell, but they don’t know. They glance over to Tim. Tim sighs. Abby, Jimmy, and Breena know this, but he was planning on telling everyone today, and hadn’t gotten around to it, so…

“Actually,” the tone of his voice spells it out without him having to say much more.

“Where’d you find her?” Fornell asks.

“She’d been in a Tennessee morgue for the last eight months.”

That gets some wincing.

“Cold?” Gibbs asks.

“Subzero,” Tim says, “She’d been swimming for a while before they got her.”

“So, nothing?” Jeff asks.

“We know she’s missing, so we’re ahead of the game. We know she didn’t go for a walk on her own, so call it two steps ahead,” Tim shakes his head, “but this was done carefully, we’ve got nothing on who took her for that walk, and how she ended up swimming, and we’re not going to find any answers by looking at her.”

“So what happens next?” Becky asks.

Tim smiles a bit at Tony. “I’ve got the second best homicide team on the job. They’re looking. It’ll come up blank. I’ve got a different team, right now in the pre-larval stage, but eventually, I’ll be able to identify other people like Heidi, and I’ll set watch on them, and when someone moves against one of them, I’ll swoop them up.”

“Proactive instead of reactive,” Abby says, a smile on her face, as she pets the back of Tim’s hand.

“Other than I’m planning for a ‘next time,’ yes.”

“And you think there’ll be a next time?” Drew asks.

Tim takes a bite of his turkey. “There’s always a next time. But maybe not a time after that.”

“At least, not the way they did it before,” Jimmy says.

Tim sighs again, “Yeah. But that’s as good as I can do, so I’ll do it.” He shakes his head. “I’m sorry, that’s grim.” He looks over to Abbi’s parents. “We do talk shop at dinner, but we try to keep it more on the entertaining BS side of things and less on the existential crisis, the world is full of evil, and on our absolute best days we manage to just keep it at a standstill side. But, sometimes it leaks out. Anyway…” Tim thinks fast, looking for something easier to talk about, “Abbi tells us you’re homesteaders. I thought that ended in like… the 1880s. How did you get into that?”

Jeff smiles a little, and Becky smiles wider, “Dumb luck, a dream, and barely fifty bucks between us.”

“Didn’t hurt that your Gran was a research librarian, and she knew everything there ever was to know,” Jeff adds. “She’s the one who suggested we look into it. Her grandparents got to North Dakota as homesteaders, and after the rain didn’t follow the plow, they moved further west.”

“To much better fortunes in Seattle,” Becky adds. “But her family had stories of it. Go west, grab a chunk of land, manage to get something to grow on it for five years, and it was yours.”

Jeff takes over between bites of turkey. “I was getting restless in school. Too much books, not enough doing. Failed too many classes because I was busy planning out buildings instead of writing up papers on how to tell Baroque from Rococo or whatever twaddle they had me doing back then.”

“He never was one for fancy curly-cues,” Becky adds, glancing around, noticing there’s not much in the way of fancy curly-cues decorating the house, either. “I was working for a vet. Back then you could apprentice, sort of. Show up, do the work, learn in the office. You had to go to school to be a vet, but to be an assistant or a veterinary nurse, all you needed was strong nerves, a stronger stomach, and scrubs.”

“That was a year or so. I got to the point where I knew if I stuck around much longer I was going to fail out, so… Had to find something. No one was going to hire me to design buildings without that degree. I worked construction for a few summers, so I had a few contacts, and some practical experience. We were at Becky’s parents’ place, kicking back on a Sunday, and Gran was over. She said something like, ‘Back in the day, you’d get married, pack up, head ‘west,’ and make a go of it.”

“We looked at each other, I think I raised an eyebrow, and he nodded, and… six months later, we’d packed up the oldest, cheapest, most beaten-down school bus that still ran with everything we owned and every book on how to build, make, or grow anything we could think of, stuck two barely pregnant heifers in a trailer on the back, and out we went.”

“That was 1972, and we barely made it that first year,” Jeff says.

“He’s soft-balling it. We scraped by on nerves and a willingness to split ramen packs between us for food. We lived in that bus for the first two years, built the barn for the cows first, learned the hard way that August was way too late in the year to start a ranch in Montana, sheer stupid luck that we got enough snow the first winter that we could pile it around the bus to stay warm, and slowly carved a ranch out of the wild.”

“By the time Abbi was born, we had a doublewide trailer, and back then, that was a big deal for us,” Jeff says.

“You never know how much you miss things like electricity, or showers, until you go without them for a few years. That trailer was a mansion compared to the bus,” Becky replies.

Hearing that, Tim has a very vivid memory of the showers in the Navy Yard, and how hot water and decent water pressure was something he took for granted, until it was gone. He hates the memory, the feel of the trickle of lukewarm water barely dribbling over him, but he is pleased to see that it’s unpleasant, but not an instant trip back to the Navy Yard. It’s just a memory.

Jeff continues, “By the time Abbi was born, we also owned the first five acres of land. And once you’ve got some land, even if it’s not worth much, you can get loans, and from there, everything goes easier.”

“That’s how my family did it,” Breena says. “Well, not ranches. Build the first funeral home, take out a loan against it, build the next one, pay the loan back, or roll it over… My great-great-grandparents did that back in the 1890s, and we’ve been expanding on it ever since.”

Becky and Jeff are nodding along with that. “We’ve expanded as much as we can, there’s nowhere around us worth going. But you’ve got the basic idea. Only so much land out there is worth trying to run cattle on.”

“Or keeping tourists entertained,” Becky adds.

“And how do you keep tourists entertained,” Ducky asks.

“Well, Ducky, have you ever been on a dogsled?” Jeff asks in return.

“Actually, a long time ago, I was invited to spend Christmas with a few friends outside of Toronto…”

Tim’s not on cleanup tonight. At least, not dinner cleanup. He’s on entertain kiddos, and then tubby-time.

So, he’s on the floor, with the assorted little dudes, Drew, (who Fornell keeps shoving into small-child-intensive-activities, probably as a pre-emptive, I DO NOT WANT GRANDCHILDREN ANY TIME SOON sort of maneuver), Glenn, and Jeff.

For Tim and Glenn, this is old hat. Roll around on the floor and roughhouse (in a very gentle sort of way with the infants) so that the kids can burn off that burst of energy that goes with dinner, and they’re in a fairly calm sort of mood for tubby and bed.
Drew’s got little siblings and cousins, so it’s been a few years since he’s been on baby duty, but he’s got the basics down. He can make goofy faces and blow raspberries on tummies with the best of them. (Fornell, hovering in the background, helping to clear the table, is suddenly realizing this might be a bad plan, because Emily’s watching Drew be good with kids, and if anything he just made Drew about fifty times even more attractive to her. He’s mentally groaning and trying not to. After all, if this guy is sticking around, and if he is the guy who’s going to be providing him with said grandkids, hopefully a long time from now, he’d like Drew to be good with them.)

Jeff’s giving horsey rides to Molly and Kelly and Anna. All of them are happy to hop on his back and get bounced around the living area. His face is lit up as he’s doing it, but there’s a wistful edge there, too.

Becky sees it, and joins him as he’s putting down Molly. She gives him a sweet kiss, and a nod. He nods back at her. There are some things they don’t have to talk about, truths they’d rather weren’t true. And right now, he’s going to enjoy this time he’s got, rather than wishing for a world he doesn’t have.

As Fornell and Tony finish cleaning up the table, Fornell says, “We gaming tonight? Duck still owes me a rematch on Scrabble.”

Ducky, who’s drying off the silverware and putting it back in its drawer, says, with a huge grin, “I believe the phrase is, ‘Bring it on!’”

Tony laughs at that, and says to Becky, Jeff, and Drew, “Once the kiddos go down, we’ll often have a game or movie or something. If we’re gaming, though, tonight’s a good night for Monopoly, because Senior’s coming tomorrow.”

That gets a collection of shared looks, but none of the newcomers knows exactly what that means.

Tony expands the idea, “Senior, my dad… You don’t ever want to play him in Monopoly. See, he doesn’t actually buy any land or properties. And he’s either going to win big or go broke in the seventh round, but if he rolls well, and he’s not out on the seventh round, he’s going to start offering to loan people money. Say you land on Park Place, but you’ve only got 200 dollars, and you need 350 to buy it, he’ll give you the 150, and then you’ll give him…” Tony does the math. “What is that, 40%?”

“Forty-three, rounded up,” Tim says, looking up from Donnie’s tummy rub.

“Thank you, McCalculator. So, you pay him 43% of all the rent you get on that piece for the rest of the game. Once he’s got your properties leveraged, he’ll loan you money to keep you in the game if you land bad. So, you land on Ducky’s hotel empire, and go belly up, and Senior swoops in and takes a third of whatever it was you had left, because after all, creditors get paid first in bankruptcies. And then, maybe he rolls badly, and you’ve got to mortgage your stuff to bail him out, because he owns half of it or whatever. You’ve bailed him out, but now you’re not making any more rent, and next thing you know everyone else is broke, and they all owe him money. We played with him once, and promptly decided that was never happening again.”

“Your dad a banker?” Becky asks.

“Worse, real estate mogul,” Tony replies. “He’s got an eye for a deal, and he’s always looking.”

Jimmy joins them from the kitchen, “Whatever we’re playing, I’m in.” He takes Donnie from Tim. “Come on, you, I think you and your cousins are in for tubby time.”
Tim picks up Sean, and says to the newcomers. “With this many little guys, tubby time works best in shifts. Glenn, you want us to get Nick, too?”

Glenn looks awfully happy taking Nick off the floor and holding him out to Tim. “If you’re offering…”

“No problem.” Tim picks up Nick, too. He gurgles at his Uncle. “Come on, tubby time for you. Tony?”

Tony waves them off. “Three’s as many as fits in there. We’ll get Dave with Anna.”

“Okay,” Jimmy says, and then they’re off for stage one of Mission: Put Kids To Bed.

“Absconded?” Ducky says with a raised eyebrow. “I’m awfully certain that is not, in fact, a word.”

Fornell glares at the board. When Ducky played scone, he thought the Scrabble gods had finally smiled upon him. “Fine…seed.” He places the tiles, and looks at the board, depressed. “And that’s it for me.”

Ducky gently pats his hand with a wicked smile on his face. “It was a pleasure.”

“You say that because you beat me by a million points.”

“Only one hundred and seventy-eight of them,” Penny adds, sipping her cocoa.

Fornell gets up, stretching, and pours himself a scotch. Then he joins Wendy on the sofa. Ducky’s at the table, looking around at the rest of the group, “Any other takers?”

Penny grins at him. “Oh yeah. Let’s see how you do against someone who’s got as much vocabulary as you do.”

He smiles back at her. “The game becomes sweeter for the challenge of it.”

Breena heads into the living room, and says, “Hey, Gibbs, got kiddos looking for their tuck-ins from Pop.”

Gibbs gets up from his place by the fire, where he’d been lounging around with Abbi. In the McPalmer nursery, there are six little guys, bundled up and snuggled down, ready for what will hopefully be a good long night of very few wake ups.

He hugs Molly, and Kelly, both of whom sit up for him, and pets Anna, Sean, Nick, and Donnie, who are already mostly asleep.

“Story?” Molly asks, voice soft, so he breaks into a quick rendition of Goodnight Moon. None of them need the book anymore. He’s got the words down pat, and the girls all know the pictures in their heads. When he wraps up with the last line, he’s got six little people all breathing softly around him.

He creeps out, closing the door quietly, and walks a bit further down the hall. The bathroom the kiddos share is still getting mopped dry. Glenn’s saying, “How can they possibly make this much mess?”

Jimmy’s shaking his head. “At least we aren’t wiping down the ceiling.”
“Time to get those glasses checked,” Tim replies, standing on the toilet seat to reach up and get some wet spots off the ceiling.

Gibbs watches them, pleased to not be part of the cleanup crew, and then says, “Tim?”

Tim looks away from the ceiling. “Yeah?”

“Can I borrow you?”

“Sure.” He tosses his towel to Jimmy, and heads out. “What’s up?” Tim asks as Gibbs leads him away from the others.

“This,” Gibbs reaches into his pocket and hands Tim a folded piece of paper. “Give it a look?”

Tim smiles, fairly sure what this is, and when he unfolds the paper, he’s not wrong. His eyes trace over the paper and he’s nodding, liking the changes Gibbs has made since he saw this last. He nods again, and then refolds the paper, handing it back to Gibbs. “They’re good.”

Gibbs smiles a little at that, and Tim pulls him into a close hug. He can remember doing this on his own wedding day, and the feel of it then, and the feel of it now, reversed. “You’ve got this, Dad.”

Gibbs smiles wider, blinks, and then ruffles Tim’s hair.

Normally, Jeff and Becky turn in early. Normally, they’re two time zones to the west. So, their early-to-bed/early-to-rise habits are working well with eastern standard time. Namely, it’s a bit before eleven by the local clocks, but for Jeff and Becky, it feels only a bit before their normal bedtime.

Most of the rest of the crew has gone to bed, or at least retired to their own rooms, but Gibbs and Abbi are still up, and so are they.

Right now, everyone is sitting around, enjoying the last drink of the night, and the glow of a slowly dying fire.

Jeff gets up, whiskey in hand, and spends a moment walking around the mantle, looking at all of the pictures, before he sits down next to Becky again. His hand rests lightly on her back, and he says, “We’d always wanted that,” as he nods to the pictures. “That’s part of building up that ranch. It was supposed to be a family business.” Before Abbi can say anything, he adds, “It’s not a complaint or a criticism. You and your sister just aren’t ranchers, and that’s okay, but…” He looks around the house again. “But this is good. And it’s something we wanted for us, and want for you.”

Becky leans forward, wrapping an arm around Abbi, “Make the time, though. Bring ‘em out west. Especially the little guys, as they get older, they’ll like it out there. Get to play with the dogs and horses and cows.” She looks at Gibbs, who also seemed to have a good time playing with the dogs and horses. “Time with the animals is good for pretty much everyone.”

“We’ve got the space, especially in the summer. We could put this whole crew up, and they wouldn’t have to be all in the same room, tripping over each other,” Jeff adds.

“And, we know you’ve got crazy schedules, but… Just, say you’ll try.”

Abbi nods. “We’ll try.”
Gibbs says, “We will. Maybe not this year, traveling with toddlers is tough, but we’ll get ’em west.”

“Good,” Jeff replies.

Becky stands up. “I think it’s bedtime for us.”

Jeff stands up, too.

“Goodnight,” Abbi replies, watching them head up the stairs to their room, as she snuggles in close. “They approve.”

He kisses the top of her head, a smile on his face. “Good.”
The Art of the Tease (Reprise)

Friday night, the kiddos are in bed, and so are the adult McPalmers, snuggled under the blankets, settling in for the night.

“I was thinking,” Abby says, voice indicating a game is in the offing.

Tim kisses the back of her neck, then props himself up on his elbow so he can see more of her than the back of her head/shoulder. “I love it when you’re thinking.”

“Especially about sex,” Jimmy adds, snuggling closer to Breena, stroking her hair, as she flips over to face Abby.

“Hmmmm… I suppose I could be thinking about sex,” Abby says.

“You mean you weren’t?” Breena asks, stroking her toes over Abby’s leg.

“Not directly, ish… sort of. Tomorrow night, we’ve got the rehearsal dinner, which should be fun, but… Have you seen that restaurant?”

Tim shakes his head as Breena nods. Jimmy figures he doesn’t need to add anything to it, because all bases are covered.

“It’s an open floorplan,” Breena says, guessing where Abby’s going with this.

“Exactly. Really open. No booths, just tables. No hallways. The sushi bar, grill, and bar is in the middle, with open access so you can watch them make your food and drinks. There are bathrooms, but there’s no way to just drift out without anyone noticing.”

Tim makes a noise like, “Ehck!”

“Why would Gibbs pick a place like that?” Jimmy says.

“Beyond the reason both of you are pouting… the food is really good. Pan Asian, mostly sushi and yakitori, but with flavors from all over the eastern hemisphere,” Breena replies, a little smirk on her face.

Abby adds, “He was telling Ziva about it, and she told me, basically, we’ve got the place for the night. They rented the whole restaurant. No table service. The chefs will be doing their thing, and we get to pick up and nibble whatever looks good as we like.”

That sounds good to Tim. But, nowhere to wander off to… That’s less than perfectly awesome.

Abby nods. “So, that’s tomorrow night. For the wedding, well, there are nice little nooks and hidden hallways in the Omni, but… Breena’s parents are coming to the wedding. Abbi’s parents and sister’s family will be at both. Same with Senior and Delphine.”

“So, you’re saying we have to behave?” Tim says, sounding incredulous. Three quarters of the fun of a wedding is sneaking off and not behaving. If you’re not going to be messing around/or thinking about/planning how to mess around, weddings are boring.

Abby grins up at him, and gives him a quick kiss to the tip of his nose. “Perish the thought! I have a plan. Tomorrow night, we’re on our own after the party, and I doubt anyone would mind if we head off a bit early.”
“Not like we don’t have five little reasons for that,” Jimmy says.

“That works. We’ve got the sitters until 11:00,” Breena says. Little guys will be going to the wedding. They aren’t going to the rehearsal dinner.

“And a mini-van,” Abby adds. “So a game… Too many strangers, no good hiding places, so it’ll be all about the tease. Hours of meeting, mingling, and teasing. Soft words, short, non-obvious touches, just four friends, out for a night.”

“And maybe we flirt a little too hard, stand a little too close, or look a little too long, but nothing over the line,” Breena adds, enjoying the idea of hours of teasing. “Nothing that would get anything other than a mildly curious raised eyebrow.”

Tim smiles at that, feeling his joy, and dick, well up at that idea. “Playing to my strengths.”

Abby kisses him. “And then… I mean, hours and hours of suggestion. Of whispered promises and ideas. Maybe we don’t exactly get home. I don’t know about you guys, but it’s been a long time since I had sex in a car.”

Tim thinks about it. “Years… Back in Arizona, or…. Texas… where were we?”

Abby shrugs; she wasn’t keeping that close of a look at the map. “In the desert. Though I was kind of thinking naughty teenagers, mom and dad have been watching all night, we’re finally free from under their gaze, time to party, sex in a car.”

Jimmy’s laughing at that. “Yeah, I’ve got some memories that go with that.” He nods, slow lascivious smile spreading across his face. “Sounds like the makings of a good time. And do you have wedding game plans, too?”

“Other than I stick with Tim and you stick with Breena because there’ll be way too much fussing if we get caught with the wrong person…” Then Abby shakes her head.

“Maybe a bit more teasing.” Tim scoots up, leaning over Abby to Breena, and kisses her. “Just because we can’t get caught messing around doesn’t mean I can’t fill your head with some tasty images for when you go fool around with him.”

Jimmy kisses Breena, too. “You going to enjoy that, his words in your head and my dick in your pussy?”

Breena makes a very pleased purring sound at that. Then she says, “I could probably get used to this.”

Abby grins, too, trailing her hand down Jimmy’s side. “Probably.”

There are other things Breena could get used to, too, and getting out of bed a little after eight, when the kids have been taken care of by her guys, followed by a good cup of coffee, a croissant with raspberry jam, then packing up her going out outfit for tonight, and heading off with her wife, Abbi, Ziva, Penny, Wendy, and Becky for a girls day out, is on the list.

Having to do nothing more stressful than picking out nail polish colors is the aim of the day, and she intends to enjoy it, thoroughly.
It was a long week, and yes, last night the boys did a splendid job working on her, but an hour of good massage and sex doesn’t make up for a solid week packed full of dead bodies. Her shoulder hasn’t unkinked yet, though she’s hoping it will.

They’re in an Uber, heading toward Arlington, and the party mood is a little subdued right now, but only because everyone is still a little sleepy.

“I tried, Mom. We offered to pay for the tickets and her work to get her out a day earlier, but she didn’t want to spend a minute longer away from home than she had to.”

None of the rest of them have heard about this. They all know that Miranda is Abbi’s little sister, but none of them knew there was any drama to this.

“Something prickly?” Ziva asks.

“No. They run their own business, and her heading out a day early meant closing for a day and…”

“And they built that business from scratch and aren’t about to leave it be for a minute longer than they have to,” Becky says. Her voice turns slightly sarcastic as she gives her older daughter a long look. “I can’t imagine were she got it.”

Abbi chuckles a bit at that, looking at the rest of the ladies in the van. “Yeah. Totally out of character for our family. Wouldn’t know anything about working every possible minute and then another one or two just because.”

“What does she do?” Breena asks. They’ve seen pictures of Abbi’s sister and her family, but haven’t heard much about them.

“Towing. She runs the phones, computers, and books. Drew, her husband’s name is Drew, too, does the driving. You get stuck in Kansas City, give ‘em a call, and in half an hour they’re there to get you moving again.”

“And if no one picks up the phone…” Abby says, letting that trail off. They can all get why her not being there would be almost as much of an issue as the truck not being there.

“Exactly. We talk or write every week or so, but she’s hard to pry out of Kansas.”

“But they are coming,” Becky says. There’s a tinge of worry on her face. Cutting it this close, and winter weather, and…

Abbi pats her phone. “I got the text two hours ago. They’re at the airport. Their flight is on time, and right about now, they should be getting on it. Speaking of which, Senior and Delphine?”

Ziva replies, “Should be landing at Dulles in an hour or so. Tony was supposed to be leaving not all that long after we did.”

“He’s missing out on sledding track repair?” Wendy asks.

“Much to his disappointment, I’m sure,” Abby adds, dryly. For Becky she says, “He’s never been a huge fan of cold, wet, or building stuff. He likes riding it just fine, but finds lugging six hundred pounds of snow boring.”

“I’m sure Jeff will take his place happily,” Becky says. “He likes stuff like that. Your man, too, right?”

Abby wiggles her hand a little. “Tim likes designing things, he got that from Penny,” who smiles at that, “and he’s okay with building them, but he’s happier with a soldering iron than a saw. Gibbs is the real builder.”

“He’s the one who does it for fun, but we all worked on the house,” Penny adds. “I think it’s safe to say that at this point, we’re all builders. Even Ducky and I were on the roof putting shingles up.”

Becky looks pretty impressed by that, and somewhat disbelieving. “You were putting up shingles?”

“Oh, yeah!” Abby says. “Imagine her with her hair pulled back, a big floppy sunhat, and a loose button down. No sunburn for Dr. Langston. She was up there, using the nail gun, with the best of us.”

Penny half shrugs. “I raised my boys to never shirk a job if they could do it. It was a job. It needed to be done. And I can point a device and pull a trigger as well as anyone else. And if I was doing that, one of these young ones could be lugging shingles up from the ground. And, I can promise you, these old bones don’t want to be going up and down a ladder more than once or twice a day.”

That gets a smile from Becky. “Well, my comparatively younger ones aren’t a huge fan of ladders any more, either. There’s something to be said for young people around.”

“Yes, there is.”

“Get back here!” Tim lunges after Anna, who is attempting to follow her older sister outside. Normally, this would not be an issue except for the fact that said older sister has boots on, and Anna is current in socks.

He grabs the youngest of the crew who are up and walking. “Boots! No frozen feet on my watch.”

Jimmy sniggers a bit at that, as he wraps the scarf around Kelly’s face. “Okay, you’re done, you can join Molly and Pop.” She begins to waddle outside. In traditional toddler in the snow fashion, her cold weather garments have rendered her practically spherical. He reaches for the second boot. “Here, let me…” With Tim on one foot, and Jimmy on the other, they get Anna finished quickly.

“Great, out you go, I’ll be there in a minute.” Tim’s wrapping his own scarf around his neck.

“Good, lord…” Jimmy says, looking out the window. “What are they doing?”

Tim stares, rubs his eyes, and then says, “That looks like a dogsled to me.”

Jimmy nods. “Is Jeff hitching up Mona?”

Tim’s still staring. “If I had to bet, that’s how I’d bet.”

“Why?” Jimmy says. And then, after another moment of watching the answer becomes clear. Fornell heads over, bucket of snow shoveled off the driveway between his hands. He drops it on the sled.

“Because none of us want to lug snow,” Tim says, with a smile. “You coming out soon?”

“I hope. Gotta make some calls, get Sam’s Alan in on this thing. Ducky’s keeping an ear on the boys, and if I’m done before they finish their morning nap, I’ll head out.”
Tim nods, pulling on his jacket, and then leans in to give Jimmy a quick kiss. “Good luck.”

“Thanks!”

“Hey, if you’re on hold too long,” he hands over his phone, “send the girls something fun.”

Jimmy smiles at that. “That should make on hold time more interesting.”

Deveda spa in Arlington, VA.

If someone were to take the word Luxury right out of Breena’s mind and apply it to a spa, this is it. Everything around them oozes understated class. There’s nothing flashy, no gold-plated faucets or gewgaws with sparkly bits, but the accents are beyond lush, like a single, perfectly spherical, blown glass vase that likely costs more than a month of their combined wages holding three, perfect, and fresh, Blooms of Paradise, sitting on a scrupulously clean, mirror-sheen polished, onyx table between two white suede chaise lounge sofas.

“Diane knew what she was talking about, I take,” Abby says to Abbi.

Abbi’s looking around. Diane suggested this was the place for a bachelorette fun day, and that was good enough for her. She gave the number to her secretary, told her the day and how many people would be there, and that was that.

“Ladies! Come on in.” An effusive woman says while waving them deeper into a room decorated in cool whites and creams with the occasional splash of a vibrant blue or orange. “Abbi Borin, right? I’m Cicely Summers, and I’ll be coordinating your treatments today. Have any of you ever been here before?”

That gets a collection of ‘Nos’ and shaken heads.

“Oh, then you’re in for a treat! First things first, you come with me down to the locker rooms. You’ll get out of your street clothing, into robes, and then into the lounge. From there we’ll go over what you’re getting done, what you want to eat and drink while you get it done, and what sorts of things you can do between treatments.”

“Between?” Wendy asks.

“Because there are so many of you, we can’t do all of you at the same time for things like the hot stone massage, or the paraffin hand and foot soak, so, while we work on some of you, or move you through other treatments, some of you get to relax in the hot tub or steam room, grab a shower in the water lounge, nap on the sofas in the music and light therapy room, or nibble some snacks in the main lounge. Whatever you like.” She’s leading them down a long hall, and then turning into a small, intimate locker room. It’s got space for twelve lockers, so apparently Cicely wasn’t kidding about not being able to handle all seven of them at the same time on the same treatment. They’ve got half the spa’s capacity taken with just them.

She demonstrates how to use the lockers, and then says, “Okay ladies, you hang your stuff up, get into your robes, slip on your slippers, and meet up with me through that door,” she points to a door on the far side of the locker room. “Then I’ll give you the tour, you’ll fill out the paperwork, we’ll go over what you’re all set up for, and then the day is yours. Abbi,” she gestures to Abbi. “This one is yours.” Then she opens the first of the lockers, and takes out the robe. It’s, like most of the rest of the décor, cream-colored, and ultra-lush, thick terry cloth on the inside and some sort of satiny fabric on the outside, but this one has a gold trim, and BRIDE embroidered on the lapel pocket. There’s also a sparkly little tiara type thing to go with it, and Cicely sets it on Abbi’s head. “We like to make sure everyone knows why you’re here! So,” she hugs Abbi, who looks fairly stunned, and then backs up.
“All righty! I’ll meet you in a bit.” She starts to head out. “Oh, one last question, do you want me to pop a sparkling rosé or prosecco or both?”

Abbi’s just staring at the robe in her hands, bride in a pretty cursive font staring up at her, feeling a bit overwhelmed by all of this.

Wendy’s chuckling at the stunned look on Abbi’s face. “Diane certainly knew what she was talking about.” She looks at the ladies. “Let’s go with both. I’m sure between the six of us, we’ll put a dent in both.”

“Wonderful!” And with that, and a swish of flowy skirts, Cecily sweeps out to get the lounge ready for them.

Abbi looks up, shaking her head a bit, and says, “Uh…”

Ziva wraps an arm around her, and her mom, both of whom are sharing similar looks of what did I get myself into? and says, “Come now, this will be fun!”

Breena rolls her shoulders, opening her own locker, and echoes Ziva, “Fun!”

Over the course of his own personal wedding, Jimmy was in charge of such decisions as: Show up or not? Do I really need to invite cousins I haven’t seen in half a decade to this thing? And: Can we maybe get at least one meal option that isn’t dripping with carbs?

Apparently, when you go to your fiancée’s home, in your very spiffy, powder-blue, 1970’s vintage tux, and suggest that a retro-wedding would be a lot of fun, you very rapidly get cut out of the decision making. (Standing there, muttering, ‘McGee thought it was cool,’ did nothing to make his bride, her sisters, and her mother stop looking at him like he’d gone terminally insane.)

That said, since his primary job was to show up and make sure he had the rings, he has never done any real wedding planning. Or more precisely, wedding confirming.

It doesn’t seem like he should have to call this many people to get Sam’s Alan added to the list, but as he’s on hold again, his eyes are rolling so far back into his head he can practically see his brain.

Outside, they’re working on the sled track. Kids are playing, adults are building. Dogs are frolicking, at least as well as they can with sleds of snow attached to them. Everyone is having an excellent time.

Except him.

He’s holding the phone, pacing around, and having conversations like: “Okay, Mr. Palmer,” (He’s not about to make this conversation any longer by pointing out he’s Dr. Palmer.) “would that bring the seat count up to 45?”

“Is 45 one more than it was before?” It’s occurring to him that knowing how many people were coming to this thing would have been useful. It’s also occurring to him that people who have to confirm a total if you’re adding one to the base number need to be shot in the head. Likely with a high caliber rifle. Why Breena was in such a mood right before they got married is making a whole lot more sense to him, now.

“Yes, sir, it is.”

“Then, yes, we’re going to need 45 seats.”

“We’ll have them. Do you still want them in a circle around the altar?”

Jimmy’s feeling a momentary sense of panic. The last thing he wants to do is mess up the carefully designed setup that Ziva and Gibbs put together. “Is a circle around the altar the way it was before?”

“Yes.”

“Okay, then yes. Just keep everything exactly the way Gibbs set it up, but add one more chair to it.”

“If we add one more chair to it, it won’t fit in a circle.”

Jimmy grits his teeth.

“Are those chairs cemented to the ground?”

“Sir?”

“You can move them, correct?”

“Certainly. That’s how we’re going to get them in there.”

“Okay, here’s what I want you to do, take the outermost row of chairs, move it a few inches further back from the alter than it already is, like, maybe three inches, and then, you should have enough room to add an extra chair to it.”

Dead silence on the other line.

“Just trust me on this, if you make the circle just a little bigger on all sides, you’ll have room to shove another chair into it.”

The voice on the phone sounds doubtful. “Okay. We can do that, sir. Uh… Do you know that the chairs have covers and bows on them, and that while we provide the chairs, we don’t provide the covers or bows?”

Jimmy bangs his head against the wall, shoulders slumping. “No, I didn’t, but I’m guessing that’s one of the seven phone numbers I’ve got on my list.”

“Probably.”

“Thanks.” One down, six to go. “I better get an invite to your wedding,” he mutters to his mental image of Sam as he dials the next number. “And I’m adding an extra person the day before, too!”

“Abby, two Abbies, this will be interesting,” Cicely says, half-sitting on the edge of Abby’s chaise, her clipboard in hand, making sure she knows who’s getting what done, and when.

“I’m Abbs and she’s Abbi, if you like,” Abby replies. Abbi may be looking a little overwhelmed by the vast tidal wave of girly excess being showered upon them, but Abby is settling in just fine. If people want to rub her feet and bring her wine and cupcakes all day, she’s down for it. In fact… If they ever get enough babysitting for it, she’s thinking of seeing if they can bring the guys along for this, just the four of them, and then book a night in a good hotel. Maybe next summer, anniversary present. (Though the mental image of Tim and Jimmy getting pedicures makes her giggle.)

Cicely writes that down. “Okay, I see you’re on for the aromatherapy massage, caffeine facial,” when Abby read that was an option she was all over it, “mani-pedi, and hair.”

Abby nods. “Sounds great!”

“Now, the question is, what are we doing with your hair? We’ve got a full salon, so anything you might want, we can do. We just need to know what, so we can make sure we’ve got the time to do it,” she looks at the pink in Abby’s hair, which was a dark rose color a month ago, but has faded to a light baby pink. “We could freshen up your color if you wanted, or, I know you’re getting ready for a night out, so if you wanted to try a blow out, we’ve got the tools and people for that.”

Abby raises an eyebrow. “We could.” Another thought occurs to her, she’s got more free time these days. Two extra parents means grabbing an hour or so every other week wouldn’t be out of the question anymore, and it wouldn’t be that big of a pain in the butt to take care of a new color… or an old one. And the wedding colors are royal purple and silver, so… It would certainly look cool...

“Whose dyes do you use?” They won’t be hers but, as the pink in her hair attests, there are acceptable substitutes out there.

“Bellington’s.”

Abby nods. They’re a high-end, organic, gentle dye with a very nice range of colors. “Do you have the whole range?”

“Yes we do. And our colorists is more than comfortable mixing custom blends if we need one.”

Abby nods, again, happy smile starting to spread across her face. “Yeah, I’m going to freshen up my color. I had black hair for a long time, and I do miss it. So, back to black, and let’s put some royal purple in there for the wedding.”

Breena, who was reading over the list of massage options, catches that last bit, and with a wide smile on her face, says, “That’s going to look awesome!”

“All right, come on guys,” Tim says in his best Dad-voice.

Little girls do not want to go in.

All three of them have gotten to the point where they no longer take a morning nap, so they were awfully happy to play in the snow, get the track built back up, and then spend a few hours swishing around on it with their various dads and uncles.

What they are not happy about is schlepping back into the house, where there is lunch, and then the dreaded naptime. (Which all three of them sorely need. And even if they didn’t, there’s only so long the various adult members of the crew want to be playing in the snow.)

Tim’s got them inside, corralling them at the door, as he and Jimmy work on pulling snow gear off of “You look frozen,” Jimmy says.

Tim rolls his eyes. “Pop, Uncle Tobias, and Jeff, they’ve all got snow pants and long johns. I’ve got jeans.” He lowers his voice. “And literal blue balls. The damn things are just about frozen solid.”

Jimmy sniggers. “I’m sure we know someone who’ll be happy to warm ‘em back up.”

“Yeah, but not for a few hours.” Then Tim thinks about that. Most of the crew is also here, taking off snow covered clothing. Tobias and Gibbs are sniggering a little at his comment, Jeff looks slightly scandalized. He decides not to suggest that maybe if Jimmy were to help him ‘warm up’ the girls would enjoy some video of it.

Jimmy, having completely missed that pause, says, “Poor baby.”

Tim mock glares. And then gets back to focusing on the task at hand, getting whiny, borderline overtired little people warmed up, fed, and into bed. He’s not feeling an overwhelming sense of regret as he volunteers to work on lunch, and let Jimmy take over on hands-on little guy wrangling.

As Tim’s heating up soup, and Gibbs is toasting up grilled cheese sandwiches for everyone, there’s a certain level of sulky-ness radiating from the living area where little girls are supposedly amusing themselves before lunch.

Ducky, with Donnie in his arms, wanders into the kitchen. “Do we have any last minute errands to run?”

“Flowers, tomorrow, but Jimmy and I are on that,” Tim says. He’s got one job, half of one job, he’s sharing it with Jimmy, and he’s got it down pat. Get flowers, deliver flowers, then all he’s got to do is drag his suit to the Omni, find Gibbs’ room, get dressed, and then it’s wedding time.

Gibbs shakes his head. “Suit’s at Fornell’s, rings are there, too. Got anything you need, Duck?”

“Marriage license?” Ducky asks, pointedly.

“Abbi’s got it. It’s in the box with the dress, shoes, and whatever other goodies she’s got in there. She figured that was the one thing that, no matter what, there was no possibility of getting lost or forgotten.”

Goodies reminds Tim of something. He’s got one last errand, sort of. It shouldn’t take too long, and he can get it printed out when he and Jimmy head home with the kids before tonight’s dinner. If he remembers correctly, it only took him ten minutes to set it up when he did it for Tony, and if he saved the template, it’ll take even less time now.

Though, thinking of goodies, and his part of it, he wonders if Jimmy’s gotten his bit done, or if they need to stop at a drug store on the way home this afternoon.

“Timothy… You’re looking intently at something. I dare say it’s not the soup.”

“Uh… No, Duck.” Clam chowder is not now, nor ever, terribly interesting. “Just thinking of a few things Jimmy and I need to get done before we head home.”

Ducky flashes him a curious look. “Are you not staying here tonight?”

“Not tonight. Our place is closer to the restaurant and the Omni.” He notices no one else, meaning
Jeff, is paying attention to them, but he lowers his voice all the same. “We’re going to be at my place tonight, if you and Penny want the keys to Jimmy’s so you don’t have to drive all the way back here, just say the word.”

Ducky shakes his head. “We already have our room at the Omni booked. After tonight’s dinner, we’ll retire there.”

“Okay.”

“Who is looking after your children tonight? You don’t have Heather working all week and all weekend, do you?”

“Not quite. She had some friends who also watch children who were free tonight. Sally and Amanda are coming over to keep eyes on the kiddos this evening. Tomorrow, Heather and her friend Keith are going stay at the Omni and be backup childcare. We’ll have the kiddies with us as much as they want to be, but if they’re getting bored or fussy, up to Heather and Keith they go. We’re guessing that Sean, Donnie, and Dave won’t be spending too much time downstairs. Long enough for us to get pictures of them in their little suits, and maybe Sean’ll have a bite of cake, but that’s probably about it. We’ll probably have to march Molly out of there at gunpoint to get her to go to bed when it’s bedtime. But, we’ll work it out. Heather and Keith’ll be staying with us until the morning, and then Heather’s got Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday off, and then the next Monday off, too. Abby’s got the Wednesday off, and supposedly, I’m remoting in on Tuesday and the next Monday, so we’ll see exactly how well that works.”

Gibbs sniggers, and says, “Better than it would with a murder.”

“Yeah. Can’t exactly remote in to a crime scene, but I have a feeling it won’t be the greatest programming I’ve ever done.”

That also gets a bit of chuckling.

“Ohhhhh…” Breena purrs as the massage therapist does something to her shoulders. She doesn’t know what, or how, she’s doing it, but it feels like at least fifty pounds of stress and responsibility just fell off of her.

“I take it you needed this,” the therapist says.

“More than I knew.”

“Weddings are stressful. So many women come in here, and they’re just tied up in knots from all the decisions.”

“This one’s easy for me. All I have to do is show up. Ziva, the one with the long dark hair, she’s been helping a lot with the planning. Work though…”

“What do you do?”

Explaining what she actually does is more talking than she feels like right now. Groaning though… The therapist hits another spot, leaning into it slow and steady, and all of the air in Breena’s lungs goes galloping out in a low groan.

“Makeup. I do makeup.”
Another long, steady press into her shoulder. “I know all about that. Anyone who works with their arms out in front of them all day is going to be sore here.”

Breena whimpers a little at one more deep press, agreeing.

The therapist chuckles. “How long has it been since you’ve gotten a massage?”

“Uh… My…” she almost says spouses “husband works on me often, and he’s good, but he’s not exactly a pro.”

“And, let me guess, it’s been years since someone who knows how to,” she feels pressure just under her shoulder blade, along with a little traction, and a gentle twist, and… something… she’s got no idea what that something is, or how, with only two hands the therapist can possibly do anything else to her, but something happens, and her right shoulder feels like it’s unwinding. Like her muscles are a tied knot, and someone just pulled the right string to untie them.

“I don’t think anyone’s ever done that to me.”

Breena’s face down on the table, but she can feel the pleased smile from the therapist as she moves onto her left shoulder.

Tim tucks his phone into his pocket. “And we have confirmation that Senior and Delphine are on the ground.”

“Good. Where are they staying?” Ducky asks, sipping the last of his soup. Lunch is winding down rapidly.

“The Adam’s House reopened in September, so I think they’ll be there,” Jimmy says.

All of them hear the yawn out of Molly. “I think that’s my cue,” Jimmy says. “Time to get little ones down.”

Tim follows along, herding the younger kids, with Sean in his arms. Once they’re in their section of the house, he says, “Any news on the tux?”

“No yet. But it’s not supposed to get here until tomorrow. He is saying that he and Senior are going in search of cufflinks to go with it.”

Tim thinks about that, and says, “Probably a good idea. I don’t know if he’s got a pair.”

Jimmy ponders and decides that he does. “I think I’ve seen him wear them to church.”

Tim shrugs, and then lies Sean down on the changing table. “Okay, clean diapers for everyone, and then naptime.”

“You nap too?” Molly asks. She’s looking very sleepy, and both Tim and Jimmy are pleased by that, because at almost four, she’s hitting the point where naptime is a little iffy, but when she misses it, she’s a prickly porcupine for the rest of the day.

“I think I will. You?” Tim asks Jimmy. Maybe they will get the chance to send some fun pictures to the girls.

“I could probably be talked into a nap,” Jimmy replies.
They get the kids cleaned up, read stories, tuck them all in, give them all kisses and snuggles, and then, finally, five little people end up all settled down.

Tim and Jimmy amble toward bed, too. Tim flops down on his back, and sighs, with a big yawn, “It shouldn’t be this much work to keep them all playing.”

“How many sled runs did you do?”

“I don’t know… 25?”

“Well, that’s walking four miles in the snow, plus building.” He pats the bed next to Tim. “Roll over.”

Tim does, and a moment later, as Jimmy straddles his waist, feet by Tim’s ears, and then leans one palm into each of Tim’s thighs.

Tim moans, loud. “Ohhhh…”

“Yeah. I bet your calves are just as tight.”

“Mmmmmmm…” Tim feels like they shouldn’t be, but… He’s not in the field any more, and hasn’t been for almost two years. He doesn’t walk five or six miles a day, like he used to.

Strong fingers rubbing the knots out of his legs is heaven. And then it’s not. Tim lifts his head, looking for where the magic fingers went. They’re on Jimmy’s phone… Doing something, and then Jimmy says, “Okay. Make as much noise as you want. I’m recording it. I think the girls’ll like that.”

Tim laughs a little at that, and that laugh is cut short by a “Ahhwww…” as Jimmy grabs his right calf and begins to massage it. “Damn!”

“Yes. Come on baby, moan for me!”

“Uhhh! Oh… Jimmy!” Tim’s grinning as he does it, though he’s not having a hard time with the moaning. What Jimmy’s doing to him feels really good.

“Yeah, baby, sing for me.”

“Harder! Ohhh… Right there! Unghn…” Jimmy’s got his thumb right in this spot and Tim can feel it up his leg and into his foot and… “God!”

“Yeah, you know my name.”

Tim does laugh at that one, silently thought.

“Say it!”

He looks over his shoulder at Jimmy. Who’s also on the verge of hysterical giggles. Jimmy digs his thumbs into Tim’s calf, sliding them down in a long wave, and Tim says, “Oh… Fucking GOD!”

“Yeah baby. You know it.”

“Please.” He’s so damn close to the knot, almost on top of it.

“Please what?”

“Please, God, please, just a little—“
“There!” And Jimmy’s got both hands wrapped around Tim’s calf squeezing hard, with his left hand, and pressing deep with his right.

“YES! Oh… fuck! There, THERE!”

“Yeah, there… Give in to it, Tim. Let me do it for you.”

“Oh fuck, fuck, fuck! Jimmy!” Tim offers another whimper-y sigh, and then a loud, “OH!” followed by a sharp, inhaled breath, and a low, deep, soft, “fuuuck!”

“Yeah…” Jimmy says, letting that yeah just purr off his tongue. “Perfect, baby, perfect.” Then he turns off the recorder and both of them collapse into loud belly laughing.

When Tim can breathe again he says to Jimmy, “You know my name?”

Jimmy gives Tim’s calf a little squeeze. “It worked.”

Tim rolls over, and then sits up a little, so he’s face to face with Jimmy. He gives him a soft kiss, and smiles at him, eyes warm. He lifts Jimmy’s hands in his, and kisses each finger. “If it gets these rubbing on me, I’ll call you God whenever you like.”

Jimmy sneers at that. “First Church of the Holy Palmer. Offerings of blow jobs and foursomes readily accepted.”

They both laugh at that.

Abby’s killing a little time between treatments. Her massage is done, and they’re going to start on her nails soon, but right now, she’s on one of the chaises in the lounge, listening to her music, and enjoying a tiny ham and cranberry compote sandwich.

Her phone beeps, and there’s a text from Jimmy that says, Earphones on.

She’s already got them on, so she turns off her music and starts the audio file he added to the text.

She lays there, giggling, feeling flushed from head to toe, imagining what the two of them may be getting up to. Okay, they probably aren’t doing that. The likelihood they’re horny enough for it after last night is fairly low.

But they could be. Tim could be on his hands and knees as Jimmy’s fucking him hard and steady, getting him right there over and over.

Tim gets to the God line, and Jimmy says ‘You know my name’ and Abby can just see it, Tim on his hands and knees, collar on, head back as Jimmy’s pumping into him. His hand knots in Tim’s hair, pulling him up, so he’s back to chest with Jimmy, and his hand circles around Tim’s cock, stroking, lightly, teasing as he rocks his hips slow and deep.

She’s wet before the recording is done, and has a pretty good idea of how to hit them with a little turn about is fair play.

She sends a text to Jimmy: You’re killing me. You play that for me, just as I’m walking into my massage. Now I’m going to have two women, beautiful ones, strip me naked, oil me up, and rub me all over, while Breena watches.
Okay, that’s not literally true, but she wants them just as turned on as she is.

I’ll be lying there, trying not to imagine you two fucking in our bed, trying not to get too turned on, but the massage ladies are so pretty, and they’ve got such strong hands. And you sound so good. And it’s all too much. I’ll be all slick and wet all over and they’ll be touching me.

They’ll be rubbing over my hips and thighs, and what if they smell it on me? What if I just can’t not roll my hips, pressing against the massage table, trying to just get a little friction right where I need it?

What if I’m bad? Will you chastise me for my wanton ways?

Jimmy chokes when he reads that, and mutters, “What’s the line, ‘and after the spankings there’ll be oral sex?’”

Tim, who hasn’t yet read the response (he’d actually been inching toward getting a nap) says, “Why are you quoting Monty Python?”

Jimmy shows him the text.

Tim closes his eyes and groans.

He takes Jimmy’s phone and writes Tim here. Do you remember what happens to bad girls?

A moment later: Pout. No fun.

Be a good girl, and you’ll have all the fun you want. No making the massage ladies uncomfortable.

Can I make you uncomfortable?

I’m rock hard and have nothing to do with it for hours. You’ve more than succeeded.

Good. And when I see you, I’m going to get down on my knees and kiss it.

Tim closes his eyes again, and groans. I love you.

You, too.

Let me know when you’re done with that massage, because I’ll light up your phone when you’re on your own.

Actually getting my nails done next.

Tim looks at Jimmy, who’s been reading over his shoulder. He sends her: You really are evil.

A kissy face emoji pops up, along with Breena is getting her massage now. She’ll be out in about an hour.

Okay. Won’t expect a response from her soon.

Gotta go!

Love you.
Love you back!

“So, what does happen to bad girls?” Jimmy asks, lying on his side, looking at Tim and the phone. “I thought you didn’t like that sort of game?”

Tim settles back on his back. “I don’t like the spanking part of it. I didn’t have any problem, besides the bluest damn balls you’ve, and yes, you personally, with your two year wait for Breena, could possibly imagine, with some sort of punishment for ‘misbehavior.’”

“What happened?” Jimmy asks, enjoying the idea of this story.

“Kind of like the game we’re playing now. It was our honeymoon, and we were out and about, and I was teasing her non-stop. We finally get back to the hotel, and we finally get into bed, and I tell her to get a nap.”

“So, you were a raging asshole?”

Tim rolls his eyes. “I was the Dom, and no, I wasn’t pushing her too hard. Not like it was the first time we’d played a version of that game. The plan was to ‘nap’ for maybe five minutes and then piles and piles of sex.”

“And she didn’t just lie down and snooze.”

“Oh, she laid down all right. Snug up against me, ass against my dick, pillow between her legs, and began to rub off on it. And I’m stuck there, trying to figure out if I should just lift her leg a little and ride her on home, or stay in character. I check in, she’s pushing me, not so far gone she just can’t do it, so I yank her onto her hands and knees, trail my dick down her pussy, giving her just a taste of it, as I said, ‘Bad girls don’t get fucked’ and stepped away.”

“OH… Shit, you are evil.”

“Yeah, and probably sort of stupid. Stepping away hurt. But I did, and tied her down so she couldn’t get herself off, and then made her actually get a nap.”

“Evil.”

Tim nods. “Uh huh. Longest hour of my life until they operated on Sean.”

Jimmy chuckles at that.

“Chastise?” Tim asks him.

“You really want to know?”

Tim knows that just because he doesn’t like a particular game, doesn’t mean they don’t play it when he’s not around. And he has, on a few occasions noticed some flushed looking handprints on Abby or Jimmy. So, he’s got a decent idea of what they get up to when he’s not there.

He thinks about it for another minute and decides that he’s okay with hearing about it, at least. He’s got the sense spanking games are never going to be one of his turn ons, but it’s not actively making him feel sick right now, so…

“Yeah, sure.”

“She liked watching it when Breena spanked me, so the next time you were working late, we tried with her, and… Like I said, my body can’t tell the difference between pain and pleasure endorphins, and her body really can’t.”

“She likes getting tattoos.”

“Yeah, we’ve talked a little about that. It hurts, but there’s the ability to drop away from it, and slide into a really nice, safe, floaty sort of space, and ride the endorphins.”

“Subspace.”

“I think that’s what it is when you do it. For her, or me, it’s not the subbing so much, as the feel of it. It’s more like a drug than a change of attitude.”

Tim’s not sure about that, but he’s not about to compare the two anytime soon, so he’s not going to argue it.

“Anyway, sometimes she, or I, not Breena (she’s good with giving but not receiving) is ‘naughty’ and needs some ‘rigorous chastisement.’”

“Really… I mean… It feels good?”

“Okay, look, by itself maybe not, but when Breena and I’d do it on our own, I’d be across her lap, my dick between her legs. Each hit means a sharp sting, a thrust, and a rush of endorphins. So, yeah it’s good. Then we added Abby to the mix, and… Okay, those two, together… Speaking of Fucking GOD!” Jimmy’s eyes are gleaming at the memory. “Tim… Okay, you like being in the middle, doing and done to, getting all your spots hit at once. Well, they thought about it, and decided if I was on my knees, with Abby on her hands and knees in front of me, and one of the toys inside of me, every strike would really hit home, and… FUCK! Yes! They’re right about that. You get hit, you flex, and clench, and thrust, and… It’s like an explosion of good sensations all at once.”

Tim thinks about it, and at least on a theoretical level he can get the idea of this. “So you just ride the feelings and enjoy?”

“And try to make it to fifteen strokes without coming.”

“Ever do it?”

Jimmy rolls his eyes a little. Tim doesn’t appear to be getting the nuances of this game. “Well, I’m not exactly trying to follow that order, so, um… NO.”

“And Abby?”

“She kneels across my face. Every time Breena spanks, I lick, and she’s never made it to fifteen, either.”

“So, you don’t do the spanking?”

“NO! I don’t like hitting Ziva or Abbi, and they’re both trained warriors who know how to take a punch and can kill me with their pinkie finger. Doing the spanking isn’t the sexy part for me. Getting spanked, watching, or helping, sure that’s good, but even for a game, I don’t really want to hit either of them.”

Tim nods at that. He wonders idly, because he’s not going to bring it up, because he’s not offering, if Jimmy might like being on the spanking end of things if he was dealing with someone closer to his own size and strength, but… But when it comes down to it, Tim doesn’t think that’s a bridge he ever needs to cross.
He stretches and wriggles a little. The sheets are soft, his bed is warm, and one of his favorite people are in it with him. “It’s a tough life.”

Jimmy laughs at that. “Hard… That’s the word you’re looking for, at least, given what we’re talking about.”

Tim smirks at that. “I suppose it’d be cheating to get off now.”

Jimmy nods. “Come on, naptime for us, too.”

“Well, Ms. Bride, what color are your attendants going for?” Breena asks. She’s ten minutes away from the pedicure station and wants to make sure that she looks the way Abbi’s thinking she should.

“Uhhh…” Right now, Abbi’s got time to just lay around. She’s been massaged, she’s hit the hot tub, her facial isn’t for another half hour, so she’s on a sofa, with a glass of wine, a good book on her phone, a collection of little sandwiches and pastries within arm’s reach, and a warm blanket wrapped around her. And, honestly, right now, she could not, possibly, at all, care less about whatever toe/fingernail polish everyone else has. “Really, whatever you like.”

Breena smiles at that, seeing that Abbi’s got a pretty solid I want to chill vibe. “Shall I just write up a ‘Ask Me No Questions’ sign for you?”

“Yes, please!”

That gets a bigger smile, and a bit of a laugh. She sits on the sofa next to Abbi, snags one of the petit fours, nibbles it, and wraps an arm around her. “Too much bride-ing all at once. I remember that. By the time we got to our wedding, I felt like if I had to make one more decision my head was going to explode.”

Abbi shakes her head. “The stress is all work. This… I honestly just don’t care what your nails look like… Unless you point them out, I’m not about to even notice them. I’ve got bigger things to pay attention to the next few days.”

Breena gives her a little squeeze. “Good.” She stands back up. “I’ll make sure you don’t get bugged on the little stuff.”

“Thanks.”

And Breena does pass the word along. She knows Ziva’ll be joining her in a minute for the nails, and Wendy’s in the hot tub, floating around with Penny, both of them are heading towards nails soon, too. Abby’s got her hair processing, they’re lightening some of it up so it’ll take the purple dye well. Becky’s in one of the massage rooms, so she’s not going to bust in there, but she also figures that Becky also doesn’t care much for nail polish.

Message delivered, it’s time to get her nails done. As Breena’s looking at the pretty, shiny bottles in front of her, a thought goes wandering through her mind. Tonight, she’ll be wearing her standard, going out for a nice night in the winter, boots. They’re attractive black leather with a thick heel, and a strap around the ankle with a shiny silver buckle. They come up to almost her knees. And with tonight’s outfit, a tailored skirt, blouse, and long jacket, they look rather snazzy.
But, she might as well have snaggle-edged, brittle claws as a pretty manicure under them for all the light her toes will get.

Tomorrow though, they are going to the Omni, getting dressed at the Omni, going from their room to the wedding, which means never setting foot out of doors, so, should she want to, she could pack some shoes that show a little toe.

And she knows someone who’s keen on seeing a little toe peek out from some pretty shoes. And if that toe were capped off with… She snags a bottle of bright silver polish… some bright, shiny toenails, a certain person would likely enjoy that, a whole lot.

Another thought fills her mind. If said toes were to be slowly dragged up the leg of hubby A, then hubby B, who would likely be watching, would enjoy that a whole lot, too.

Sparkly little toes, her open-toed silver pumps, and maybe a sweet little anklet. Something with a little sparkle to catch the eye…

Yeah, both of her boys’ll appreciate the hell out of that.

A few minutes later, as she’s sitting back, soaking her feet, waiting for the pedicurist, she sees the text from Jimmy. Earbuds in…

Okay. She sets it up, turns the sound on, takes a sip of her wine, and just about chokes on it.

“Are you okay?” The pedicurist asks.

“I… Uh… Yeah… Surprise from my husband.”

“Looks like it. You need to give him a call?”

“No… Not right now.” She knows if she responds to this, she’s just going to get more turned on, and… not a good time for that, not yet. “But, yeah, let’s make sure those toes look amazing.”

“Do we need to stop at the drugstore?” Tim asks Jimmy when the kiddos are up, in the car, and they’re en route to his house.

Jimmy flashes Tim a confused look. “Do we? Is there something you need?”

“Not me. You know… Gibbs’ goody bag?”

And recognition hits Jimmy. “Oh. Yeah. Got ‘em last week. He’s beyond set up for a good time.”

Tim smirks a little at that. Then he says… “You ever think about getting some of them for us?”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow.
“You know, just, for fun. See what it’s like?”

That eyebrow goes exactly nowhere.

Tim rolls his eyes. “Okay, I overheard Fornell and Ducky talking and… Apparently a somewhat common side effect is that it slows you down, so… You know… If you wanted to go for a long time, without having to spend the whole time cataloguing every bone in the body or imagining Gibbs in a speedo…”

“Why were they talking about that?”

Tim caught the last half of that conversation, and almost walked away immediately, but… He didn’t. “My guess is Fornell wanted a doctor’s opinion, without having to actually ask his doctor.”

That makes sense to Jimmy. He’s the one driving, so he looks in the rearview mirror at the five little guys in the back. “We ever get enough time to make a long time worth it…”

Tim nods.

A minute later, Jimmy says, “We need to hit the bank?”

Now it’s Tim’s turn to look confused.

“Elaine and Brian… You have a check?”

“Oh. And yes, we’re low enough tech that we do have a checkbook.” He leaves out the fact that it did take him and Abby half an hour to find the damn thing, and that, since they got their combined checking account, more than three years ago, they have used four checks. (Three of which have been given to Girl Scouts selling cookies door to door in their neighborhood. The fourth of which is currently in his wallet, waiting to be given to Elaine and Brian.)

“So, all we need to do is…”

“Hand off the kiddos, get showered, get dressed, and make the girls happy.”

Jimmy smiles, he’s looking forward to that.

The hairdryer is buzzing away, and then the buzzing stops.

“All done?” Abby asks the lady who’s doing her hair.

“All done.”

And for the first time all afternoon, Abby opens her eyes and looks at herself. She’s been intentionally not looking. As someone who spent years doing her own hair, and especially her own dye, she knows that if she watches, she tries to take over, and… That’s just not good.

So, for the last two hours she’s had her eyes closed if there was any chance of her seeing her hair.

But they aren’t now. There’s the barest hint of a second where she’s not quite sure what she’s looking at, but it doesn’t even last a full heartbeat. Yes, her hair had been blonde for more than two years, but that wasn’t long enough to really change her mental image of herself.

Then she’s grinning, looking at herself. “Back in black!”

The hairdresser nods. “Oh yeah!”

It’s not just black, though. The top layer is black, and each layer below gets lighter and lighter, into a deep purple. Her cut is still long, but it’s got steep, chunky layers cut into it, so all the colors are visible. In low light, the whole thing will look black, but in good light, like she’s got now, it’s a shower of black, blackened purple, midnight aubergine, royal purple, and then, at the very bottom, a deep violet.

The hairdresser also added in a soft, wavy curl, and right now Abby feels amazingly pretty.

And very, very GOTH.

“I love it!” She bounds up to hug the hairdresser.

“Good! That was fun. I don’t get to do a lot of interesting colors.”

“You knocked this one out of the ballpark!” There’s a lot of excited Abby bouncing, in addition to twirling, looking at her hair from all angles, fluffing it with her fingers, feeling the soft weight of it, as the huge Abby smile refuses to budge from her face.

---

Jimmy’s in the car, just having pulled into Tim’s driveway, when his phone buzzes. He pulls it out, and there’s a shot of some toes he’s especially fond of, with a very pretty coat of silver nail polish on them.

Now, it is true that Jimmy, is not, in fact, a foot guy. He’s a shoe guy. But he’s awfully fond of how shoes work on feet, and said shot is causing some really delightful images to go dancing around his mind.

“What’d she send you?”

“Toe pic.”

Tim nods, looking over Jimmy’s shoulder, and Jimmy knows that he doesn’t entirely get what Jimmy likes about this, but that he’s not feeling the need to rain on any parade Jimmy may be having right now.

Tim unbuckles, and goes to get Donnie out of his car seat.

A second later, Jimmy’s phone buzzes again. This time it’s a picture of a tube of… something. She’s got it shot so he can’t read what it is.

“You get shoes to go with those toes?” Tim asks.

“No. It’s…” A text pops up. Last shot was for Tim. He quickly sends back. Uh… Not helping.

You’ll understand it when you understand it.

He rolls his eyes. Really not helping.
A kissing wink face pops up.

“What is it?” Tim asks.

“I don’t know. I can’t read the label. It kind of looks like a tube of oil paint.”

“Uh…”

“Yeah. She says it’s for you and you’ll understand when you understand.”

“Okay.”

They’ve gotten home. The babysitters have arrived. Tim’s printed out Gibbs and Abbi’s brand new diplomatic tags, while Jimmy started to get ready to go out. He tucks them into the bag that Abby, Breena, and Ziva put together for Gibbs and Abbi, and resolutely does not look inside to see what else may be in there.

It’s one thing to rag on Tony about his sex life. It’s a whole other thing to come face to face with whatever the hell it is that Gibbs is getting up to with Abbi. Let alone what Gibbs is getting up to with Abbi that Abby, Breena, and Ziva think he might want or need toys/instructions for.

There are some things Tim just doesn’t need to know, and what’s in those nicely wrapped packages in the cute bag Breena picked out is likely at the absolute top of the list.

All he needs to know is that if/when Gibbs decides to toss some of them in his suitcase before heading off to wherever it is Abbi’s going next, that no one in customs or security is going to mess with them.

That done, time to get a shower, shave, dressed, and then off they go.

He heads up to his room, stopping in the living room to check on the kiddos. Right now, everyone seems copacetic, except for a slight sense of confusion from the babysitters, who appear to be under the impression that Tim and Jimmy are a couple (not exactly wrong) but that they’re the only members of said couple (err…) and somehow, between the two of them, with nary a womb in sight, managed to produce five kids in four years who look just like them. (Tim imagines they’d need to have vastly more money than they actually do to pull that off. He knows surrogacy is a thing, but he can’t imagine it’s inexpensive. At least, he personally, wouldn’t be willing to get pregnant for someone else for anything under ten million dollars, so it’s got to cost and arm and a leg.)

Tim assumes they’ll eventually notice the pictures with Breena and Abby in them, and spend more time gossiping trying to figure out what’s going on, but he’s not butting into it.

He’s heading up to his room, where Jimmy’s in the shower, and he’s got a few minutes of free time.

And free time gets him thinking about tonight’s game.

The art of the tease.

Part of him’s thinking this would be a splendid time to send the girls a naughty picture, or two. They’ve certainly enjoyed them in the past, and he’s got time, a phone, and does need to be naked in the near future.

He’s taking his clothing out of the closet, laying it on the bed, making sure he’s got everything he wants to wear, and nothing needs to be ironed.

Tonight’s dressy…ish. He doesn’t need a suit, but he’s also not supposed to be in a sweat shirt and jeans.

He’s wearing his black tux tomorrow with the plaid kilt, so today he lays the black kilt out. He takes a picture of it, sitting on the bed next to his white dress shirt, the vest from his gray suit, and his leather jacket. He sends that off to the girls, thinking they’ll like it.

He’s getting undressed, and debates sending them a nude. Not like they don’t have at least a few hundred shots of him frolicking about in nothing but a smile on each of their phones. Then the pictures they took of him when they were playing go dancing through his head.

He takes his pants and boxers off, and puts the kilt on. He hikes the skirt up, remembering they like him a little undressed, and gets a picture of his hip and thigh, with the line of the kilt making sure the picture stays PG-rated.

He supposes it’s not a pinup if it’s only ten inches of his leg and hipbone, but… It’s good enough.

He adds one line of text: I expect at least one kiss print a piece here.

That gets little kissy emojis from both of them.

Tim puts down his phone, and heads to the shower. Time to get ready to go out.

---

Go home: check.

Hand off kiddos: check.

Assemble goodie bag for Gibbs and Abbi: check.

Get showered and shaved: double check.

Which leaves Jimmy Palmer, naked, save for the sleeves on his right thigh and bicep keeping his electronics in place, in Tim and Abby’s bedroom, supposedly working on the next part of his mental list: Get Dressed For Party.

Jimmy eyes the kilt. It’s just lying there on the bed, waiting for Tim to get out of the bathroom and put it on.

The point of the night is the art of the tease, and he’s certainly been thinking about what would be visually interesting for the girls. How to tease them without opening his mouth, or touching, or anything else. How to be erotic just standing still, from across a room.

The girls certainly wouldn’t expect it. And they’d like it, if for nothing beyond the novelty aspect of it.

And it’s not like Tim’s that much bigger than he is. He picks it up, eyeing how it fits. It wraps around his waist and clips into place, which means the inch or so that Tim’s got on him on waist size shouldn’t matter much.
He holds it up to himself, not quite willing to try it on, but looking to see if that extra inch and a half of height Tim’s got on him will matter. It doesn’t look like it. Holding it to his waist, it look like it comes to his knees, and that’s where they’re supposed to fall, right?

For the first time ever, Jimmy’s contemplating his knees on an aesthetic level, and debating how much of a dork he’ll be if he puts this thing on.

He hears Tim moving around in the bathroom (wrapping up his own next check mark: Do Hair) and calls out, “So, how cold are these things?”

Tim sticks his head out, rubbing a little styling wax through his hair, and sees what Jimmy’s thinking. “I was planning on wearing it with a shirt, vest, and leather jacket. So, not that bad. You wouldn’t want to go for a hike in a kilt in the middle of winter, but the hundred feet between the house and the car and the car and the restaurant, no biggie.” He smirks a bit. “You thinking I get to wear the pants tonight?”

Jimmy rolls his eyes and tosses the kilt onto the bed. “Yeah. No.”

Tim continues to smirk at him. “Come on, put that thing on, add some eyeliner, and the girls’ll eat you alive.”

“They’ll eat me alive in pants, too.”

Tim shrugs, tossing his towel into the hamper, turning to look at Jimmy. “What had you eyeing it?”

“Just… You know, we’re supposed to be teasing, and they’ll have some sort of cute, little outfits on that drive us bonkers, and I wanted to reciprocate.”

Tim looks at the kilt. They’re used to him in it, and he’s fairly sure at this point that most of the thrill, beyond the practical level of easy access, has worn off. For him wearing it. “That’d do it.” He steps over to his dresser and selects a cologne for tonight. He’s thinking tonight’s a good night for his metaphorical something black and lacy.

Jimmy stares at the heap of cotton on the bed. “Yeah… Not that cold?”

“Not that cold.” Tim rubs the cologne on his wrists and throat. “Besides, you’ll have the sleeve on your thigh for your glucose monitor. If it’s really chilly, put your yoga shorts on under it. It’s not actually a law that you’ve got to go commando in ‘em.” Tim watches Jimmy continue to eye the kilt as he puts the bottle down.

Jimmy’s half-pondering, half-feeling like he’s seriously thinking about a major shift, but he’s having a hard time putting his finger on why. After all, it’s just a piece of fabric, it’s not like he’s shaving his head or getting a tattoo on his neck.

“I swear to God, they don’t make you hand in your man card when you put one of them on,” Tim adds, looking through his closet for a pair of slacks not in desperate need of ironing.

Jimmy knows that. On a lot of different levels, so that’s not the issue. Watching Tim study a pair of black jeans, debating if they’re fancy enough for tonight finally lets him cement the idea he’s wrangling into place. “No… not… It’s just, it’s your thing, and that feels weird.”

Tim smiles at Jimmy, stepping over to him, and giving him a quick kiss. “You’re one of my things, too, might as well try it out and see if you like it. If you feel stupid, take it off, I won’t tell on you.”
Jimmy eyes it one more time, and then goes looking to see if he’s got any decent socks here.

Three minutes later, he’s got it on, is looking in the mirror, and it feels… “This is stupid.”

“No it’s not! It looks good.”

It doesn’t look bad. It’s just not him. “On you. On me it’s… I don’t know, not me.”

“It wasn’t me until I wore it out for the first time, either. You don’t look stupid.”

Jimmy gives it the stink eye and takes it back off. “Abby ever tell you about when we got your cuff?”

“Yeah.” He’s nodding, remembering that story, understanding where Jimmy’s coming from. She told him she suggested getting two cuffs, one for Jimmy, and he told her hell would freeze over before he wore ‘matching bracelets’ with Tim. And Tim, when he heard that story, more than approved. “Matching bracelets.”

“Yeah. This is you.” Jimmy goes over to the closet and grabs a pair of his own pants. “And these are me. And maybe, if we’re ever somewhere where no one knows you, I may try again, because you’re right, it doesn’t look bad but…” he shakes his head. “Not here and not tonight.”

“Okay.” Tim grabs the kilt, wrapping it around his own hips. “That’s fair enough.”

Jimmy’s pulling up his pants, and Tim says, “Wait.”

“What?”

Tim grabs his phone off the bed. “Those pictures Breena and Abby liked taking of us. Give ‘em a good one.”

Almost time to go. The ladies are getting ready.

Breena’s putting in her earrings when her phone buzzes and Show it off if you get the chance pops up from Tim. A second later, she’s got a shot of a damp, tousled Jimmy, leaning against the closet door, sex in his eyes, with his pants half undone, fingers just dipping below the waist line, and no shirt.

Breena grins at it and sends back to Tim. You know what I like. Any pretty pictures of you?

Ask Abby pops up in response.

“Oh yeah. Just getting a progress report. Apparently, Jimmy’s almost ready to go.” She gives her hair a little fluff, rubs her lips together, smoothing out her lip gloss, and then stands up from the makeup table in the locker room.

“I think I’m done, who’s next?” Ziva takes the space, her makeup bag at the ready, and Breena gives herself one last check in the mirror.

It’s not a fancy outfit. Not complicated. But it looks killer. Black knee high boots, skin colored stockings, and they are stockings, no pantyhose, or for that matter, panties, tonight. Her skirt is brown wool, and it’s tailored to her shape, skimming along her legs from hip to just above her knee, with a modest slit up the back to make it easier to walk. She’s got a simple white blouse. It’s a button down with the top three buttons undone. Jon’s necklace adds just a bit of sparkle to her décolletage.
She’s topped it all off with a hip-length black wool jacket, also tailored. It’s sleek, fashionable, professional, and if she leans just the right way it offers a great view of her breasts.

And gosh, she’s only got three people who really enjoy that view hoping to see it tonight.

She pats her hair one last time, and then goes off in search of Abby. Last she saw, she’d vanished into one of the dressing rooms with her outfit for the night.

Only three of them to pick from, so… She reaches out, knocks, and hears Abby’s voice.

“Hey, can I come in?”

“Sure.” Abby opens the door. She signs at her, _Got a picture for me?_

Breena’s got to really watch, and Abby signs it again, slower, for her to get it, and then she nods, showing off the picture of Jimmy. Abby grins at it, and then shows her the one Tim sent. Apparently Jimmy took this one. It’s Tim, sitting on their bed, legs wide, leaning back, braced on his hands. He’s got the kilt, a _very_ cocky look on his face, the wrist cuff, and from the look of it, nothing else, on.

It’s not the most ‘come and get it’ look she’s seen from Tim, but it’s definitely in the top five.

“I take it they’re almost ready to go,” Abby says.

“Looks like it.” Breena looks Abby up and down. She’s in one of her ‘little black dresses.’ This one is shaped like an oversized long sleeve t-shirt, covering her from shoulder to just above her knees.
Though a wide neckline, baring one shoulder, a silky fabric, and a blood red belt, keep it from being a shapeless sack.

“Looks like you pretty much are, too.”

Abby nods to pumps on the floor. “Kind of wishing I’d brought some real boots, but…”

“They look good.”

They’re little satin pumps. They look great with this dress. But especially with her hair all decked out, Abby’s really wanting to leap back into some of her gothier-outfits. She wants boots, and wrist cuffs, and her plaid jeans (assuming she can get into them) a wide black leather belt with two prongs on the buckle, and a cute, tight t-shirt with a skull on it. She wants her ponytails, too. Maybe not forever, she’s pretty fond of the more ‘grown up’ Abby she’s been wearing to work lately, but at least for a day.

“Day after tomorrow. Monday we’re all home and you can dress it up however you like.”

“Back in Black time!”

“It looks good,” Breena says, looking over Abby’s new hair.

Abby smiles at herself, and Breena. “It feels good.” She looks at the two of them in the dressing room. _We going to get a picture for them?_ She signs, slowly, for Breena.

Breena shakes her head, and then touches Abby’s hair. “We’re going to surprise them. Wha’d you say, Back in Black? That’s a song, right?”

Abby’s grinning. “Oh, yeah, it’s a song all right.”
Tim shakes his head as he and Jimmy walk into the restaurant. “I’ve been in Burger Kings that did a better job providing you cover for a tryst.”

“Why were you fooling around in a Burger King?” Jimmy asks him. “Unless you were sixteen, that’s kind of skeevy.”

“I wasn’t… Just…” Tim looks around the remarkably open and empty feeling restaurant. “Making the point.”

“Oh, yeah.” Jimmy eyes the restaurant. “This place looks like it was designed by a bunch of pleasure-hating neo-Victorians.” Not really. The look is ‘clean’ and ‘modern.’

Tim sniffs. “Or maybe they want you focusing on the food when it comes to pleasure. It smells great.” He’s not sure where Gibbs found this place, but it’s really open. A wide array of tables circle around what looks to him like three bars. One is an actual bar. There’s a bartender, and behind him is a collection of shelves holding many different varieties of alcohol. To the left of him there’s a bar that Tim’s not sure of. There’s a grill behind it, and he knows there’s supposed to be yakitori, so he guesses that’s where you get you’re grilled goodies. To the right of the drinks is a sushi bar.

You can watch the people making the food for you, and that food does smell excellent.

And he supposes that the extremely minimal, Japanese-ish décor works for a pan-Asian fusion place, though he’s privately wondering if this is what Japan would look like if Ikea was in charge of decorating it. Everything is light, pretty, functional, and there’s nary a spare nook or cranny to be seen. Hell, there aren’t even table cloths. Unless he’s feeling especially bold, and lucky, he can’t so much as play footsie here.

His eyes catch a few screens, elegant expanses of white paper, in white maple frames, but… They’re flush against the windows. He’d have to be the size of a mouse to take advantage of them.

He catches Gibbs eye and says to him, without adding any voice, “You did this on purpose.”

Gibbs may not know exactly what’s going on, he’s saying hello to Senior and Delphine, but he’s got a good enough idea to just happily smirk back at Tim.

They’ve been there long enough to grab a table, hang up their coats, and get drinks for the four of them when Jimmy notices the doors open and the girls come in.

He finds Breena first, and stares, mouth not quite falling open, but pretty much only because he’s in public. He elbows Tim, hard, who turns and has a fairly similar response. They’ve seen this outfit before, but that doesn’t make it any less appealing. And, on top of it, there’s just something about a woman you adore, her skin pink from the chill, stripping out of her coat, and then slowly peeling off her gloves.

Breena sees them, and comes over to greet them, kissing Jimmy, offering Tim a hug, and then links her arms with theirs. “Okay, come on, grand reveal time.”

This would be the point where Jimmy and Tim both notice that Abby is not among the ladies hanging their coats up.
“We missing someone?” Tim asks.

“Yes, but it’s intentional. Okay.” She stands Jimmy to one side of the door. “You go here.” She puts Tim next to him. “There, good. Okay.” They see her texting, and then hear a few notes of music… Tim’s almost placed the song when Abby opens the door.

She’s in her long red coat, and her hair is cascading down her back and shoulders in soft curls of purple-edged black, and his mouth does fall open. Any thought of what that music might be goes thundering away as he just looks at her.

She sees it, and grins at him.

Jimmy’s laughing with joy. He’s enjoying the view of Abby, and he’s figured out the music that Breena’s playing is Back in Black. He wraps an arm around Breena and kisses the top of her head. “That’s perfect.”

Tim crosses the three steps between him and Abby before knows he’s moving, takes her in his arms, dipping her back, and kisses her, long and deep. When he pulls back, some of the others are giggling, and Abby says to him, “So, I take it you approve of the new hair.”

He’s grinning, eyes warm, and his fingers find her hair, gently stroking. “Oh yeah! I didn’t realize I missed it, but… Oh Abby!”

She’s beaming at him.

The party rolls on around them. People coming in, getting the chance to say hello to old friends, and make some new ones.

Abbi’s sister and husband look a bit weary from the trip, but the kids are excited, and they make a bee-line for the yakitori. Apparently grilled chicken on sticks is a big hit for them.

Tim’s genuinely pleased to hug Elaine hello, and offer Brian a warm handshake. They’d been driving all day (traffic snarl on I-95 just north of Richmond made a six hour trip into a nine hour trip) but the chance to sit back, relax, eat, have a good drink, and get some pesky paperwork out of the way is brightening their hearts.

Dwayne Pride made it in from New Orleans two hours ago. Long enough to check into his hotel, stow his go-bag, and get here. But, now here, he’s got a drink in hand, and is looking for something to get some music playing. In addition to a somewhat ‘clean’ décor, there doesn’t seem to be a stereo in this place. But, it’s not a party if there isn’t music, and anywhere with Pride, especially Pride with a drink in his hand, is going to be a party.

Callen comes in a few minutes later, looking slightly confused by all of this cold weather. For someone who supposedly spent a good deal of time in Russia, snow on the ground seems to be boggling him. Gibbs teases him about spending too long in the sunshine, before Tony sweeps over and says to Callen, “Your surfer boy still back on the left coast?”

“Deeks is still there.”

“Lord, Gibbs, Draga and I ended up out there on a case last year. You should have seen this shaggy ragamuffin we ended up working with. Looks like he rolls out of a sleeping bag on the beach every morning and goes to work.”
“Which is part of what makes him great at what he does,” Leon replies, before saying hello to the bunch of them.

They hear a burst of loud, and from the sound of it, dirty laughter from the front of the room where several men, and one woman, all about Abbi’s age have just showed up.

Gibbs knows who they are, in general, if not specific, and says, “I think I’ve got some people to get introduced to.” He heads towards the group.

Abbi’s got a handful of buddies from back in her Marine days who scattered across the country in the years since they all got out. They’re all back together now, and the laughter coming from that corner shows they’re happy to be back together, in the flesh, for the first time in ten years. They seem pleased to see Gibbs, and even happier when Bleach and his wife roll in. More than half of them went through training with him.

LJ and his sweetie make it. He’s got a walker now, and is looking more frail, but his smile is bright, and he falls in with Ducky and Penny like they saw each other yesterday, not two years ago.

The stars burn bright in a cold clear sky, the drinks flow, the food fills plates, and the party takes off.

Breena, with her spouses in tow, finds Elaine and Brian early in the evening. After hugs hello, and a bit of small talk, she says, “So, shall we focus on business now, get it out of the way, and leave the rest of the evening for pleasure?”

Brian and Elaine smile at that, thinking that the party will be more fun if they’re not constantly breaking into it with discussions of repayment options, tax burdens, and what sort of corporation they’re forming.

Abby, Tim, and Jimmy smile at that, because they know what sort of pleasure Breena’s thinking, and that’s also a lot more fun if they’re not trying to juggle sex with business.

Elaine’s got a big purse, and in it are several copies of a contract. Apparently the four of them aren’t the only ones going in on this. Tim knew about Gibbs and Abbi, but there’s more than one contract left after she gets the ones for them out.

Breena, as the one who really knows what’s going on with this, takes the contract and starts reading. And as she starts reading the game really takes off. Apparently, Breena’s perfectly fine mixing some business with pleasure.

What she’s doing should not be legal.

Not at all.

Tim’s squirming watching it, and he knows that Jimmy’s not having any easier of a time dealing with it. Even Abby, who’s, generally speaking, better than the two of them when it comes to playing it cool, is having a hard time looking away from it.

The ‘it’ in question?

Breena, sitting next to Elaine and Brian, across from her spouses. She’s leaning down a bit, elbows on the table, hair draped so that Elaine and Brian can’t see what she’s doing, but Tim, Abby, and Jimmy, who are across from her can. And they’ve got just a glimpse of cleavage down her shirt. Between her fingers is a pen. A fairly standard click pen. Black, silver tip, the sort of thing you press down on to make the ball point come out.

She’s “chewing” gently on the clicker. If you didn’t know her well, you could, possibly, think this is an absent gesture, the sort of fidgeting that people often do when they’re concentrating on something else.

If you’re one of the three McPalmers staring at Breena, you know that’s not anything she does when she’s concentrating and you’re aware of the fact that no pen ever has needed that level of gentle suction and occasional licking.

At one point, where Breena’s tongue darts out for just a second to caress over the tip of the pen, circling it, lightly, and Abby hisses sharply with a fast, inhaled breath (because all three of them know that’s a stroke for her, not Tim or Jimmy) she glances up from the document, smiles at them, kisses the tip of the pen, and goes back to reading.

Tim’s very proud of the fact that he didn’t choke at that, because all he can imagine right now is Breena between Abby’s legs, licking her until she’s crying out. He gives Abby’s knee a little squeeze, and she leans against him, her hand finding his.

A moment later, Breena looks up, nods to her spouses, and then turns to Elaine and Brian. “Looks good. Got the check, Jimmy?” She signs her name, passes the contract to Jimmy, and Jimmy hands over the check. A moment later Tim and Abby do the same.

At 6:13 on December 30th 2017, Tim and Abby McGee, and Jimmy and Breena Palmer, each became the owners of a 5% share of Elaine’s Diner.

It’s just a little touch. Abby’s sitting at the table, and Tim’s standing behind her. He gently brushes her hair to the side, and bends down to lay a soft kiss on her shoulder. She shivers, just a little, at the feel of his lips against her skin. She smiles up at him, squeezing his hand, and he smiles back down.

About an hour into this, Pride, who’s been hanging out with Tony, Abby, and Leon, comes up with a plan. (It is possible that Abby may have suggested said plan by commenting, in an off-hand sort of way, that wouldn’t it be great to get a taste of home here and get some dancing going…)

A quick survey of the room has shown him that while there are enough tables for everyone to sit, most of the party is not sitting, at least not for long. They get up to get drinks and food, chat with people, mingle, and they might, on occasion, sit down. But most of the time, they’re up, moving around in little clots, joining and rejoining different groups as the night progresses.

Which means they don’t really need all of those tables in the middle.

Which means the music Pride got going, could be put to its intended use.

Dancing.

In what can only be described as a brazen display of Rule 18 they get moving tables, and before the hour shifts, Pride’s dancing with Lara, and Tony’s getting a moment to swing with Ziva.

Once those chairs are out of the way, Abby pulls Tim to join her on the dance floor.

He’s got a wicked little smile on his face as he holds her close, lips an inch from her ear. “I was thinking about later tonight.”

“I certainly hope so.”

“Oh yeah. You remember that horrible lie you told me when we were processing that cab… The one where you said your first time was in a cab, and I said, front seat or back, and you said, both, sort of?”

Abby laughs. “You should have seen the look on your face when I said that.”

Tim smiles. “I’ll bet it was something. Had about 30 X-rated scenarios go dancing through my head when you said that.”

She smiles at him, very pleased with herself, swaying closer to him, letting her hips brush his. “And what are you thinking about my ‘horrible lie…”’

He kisses her, gently. “Well… We’ve got a van, and maybe it’s not a taxi, but it does have a front seat, and a back seat, and…” He drops his voice a little lower, all but kissing the words to the shell of her ear, “I’m thinking about who goes where. Am I in the front seat, getting blown, and Jimmy in the back, fucking you? Or is Jimmy in the front? Whose cock do you want your lips wrapped around?”

She turns her head, kissing him. “Ohhh… Pretty, pretty questions.”

His lips find hers again. “You know, I suppose, if you’re feeling really flexible, Breena could be in the front seat, and one of us could be next to you, sucking your nipples, and the other in the back…”

Abby laughs at that, trying to imagine how far her back would have to bend to do that. “No. How about this: she could be in the back, making good on that promise with the pen. She could be in the back, say…” her tongue slips over her lips, “in Jimmy’s lap, and you could be in the front seat.”

He trails his fingers through her hair and down her neck, liking the idea of that a whole lot. “Pretty, pretty pictures…”

“Yes!”

Breena’s reveal of Abby, with Back in Black playing, has set an idea in Jimmy’s mind.

One he needs a confederate for.

So, he leans to his right side as he’s nibbling a bite of sushi, and says to Abby, “What’s Pride playing the music on?”

“His phone.”

Jimmy nods. “You think you could get Short Skirt/Long Jacket up on that?”
Abby knows that song and grins. “Yeah, I can do that.”

“Good, I’m off to ask my lady for a dance.”

Breena’s talking to Miranda Borin and two of Abbi’s Marine buddies, when he sweeps over. “Can I distract you away for a few moments?”

“Depends, do I want to be distracted?”

He smiles, hand on her shoulder, fingers resting gently against the nape of her neck. “I really hope so.” He sees Abby, who grins at him, and then the song changes.

“Then lead the way.”

It’s a fast song, and not really designed for dancing, but once Breena realizes what it is… She starts to laugh, very pleased at Jimmy. “Fingernails that shine like justice?”

“Hey, they’re really sparkly,” he replies, kissing the tip of each finger while they dance. His knee brushes just above hers, over the two inches not covered by skirt or boot, and he looks her up and down, eyes tracing her body. He licks his lips. “Short skirt, long jacket, I love this.”

“Good!”

It is a party. And this is a friendly group. And friendly people often dance with each other. In a friendly sort of way.

So, for the moment, Tim’s dancing with Breena. They’re not really touching, occasional brushes of fingers and hands, or maybe her hand on his shoulder, or his on her hip. It’s a fast, peppy jazz beat, not the sort of thing one pulls their partner close for.

But they’re on the dancefloor, near the speaker that Pride found, so the music is loud, and no one’s really paying attention to them.

Perfect.

Tim says, keeping his voice low, but enunciating clearly, so Breena can, as well as possible, see his words, if not hear them.

“Dinner’s got me thinking.”

She raises any eyebrow at him. “Thinking or thinking?”

He grins, eyes sparkling warm and sexy. “Thinking. I don’t know how real it is, but I’ve seen references to people using another person as a sushi buffet.”

“Is this part of you getting messy eating clams?” Breena says with a sassy little snap in her voice, remembering his comment, back from the last time there was sushi and sex in the offing.

He’s still grinning, liking that a whole lot. “I really hope so. Dress you up with yummy little bites. Find a few of those really nice, smooth lacquered chop sticks. Jimmy and I kneeling next to you, gently stroking the tip of the sticks over your skin, lighting up goosebumps.”

“I’m lying in front of you, and you’re going to use chopsticks?”
“Only to play with you. Just want to add an extra sensation. When it’s time to eat, all you’ll feel is lips.” He glances around, and then quickly traces just the tip of his index finger down her throat. “Nibbles all up and down your body. Maybe the drip of blood warm soy sauce… Can you feel it, lying there, blindfolded, cool morsels on your body, the occasion hot drop of… something… might be soy, might be sake, but after it, always after it, a tongue wet and soft caressing over you. Hard and smooth little points dragged over your skin. But you never know exactly where or when the next sensation is. Maybe rub just a little wasabi on your nipples, glowing warmth followed by more tongues.”

Breena licks her lips, looking up at him, every breath, every move broadcasting that she’s enjoying this. “Do I get to eat?”

“Oh, I imagine that Jimmy and I can find something for you to taste. We might not want you to bite, but I’m sure we’ll have something for your mouth to do.”

“And if I add my own special sauce to the mix, will you lick it off?”

“Every drop. And I’ll take your blindfold off so you can see me suck it off Jimmy’s tongue, too.”

“And if I want to watch you suck it off another part of Jimmy?” She licks her lips, tip of her tongue lightly trailing over them.

Tim wants to kiss her so badly right now, but he doesn’t. He keeps his eyes on hers, and says, “Whatever, however you want it, just ask.”

“Don’t worry, love, I will.”

The song ends, the music shifting, moving to something slower and more romantic. Both of them leave the dancefloor, and Tim, hands in his pockets, heads to the restroom for some ‘calming down’ time.

Jimmy’s having a conversation with Ducky and Penny. They’re talking about Penny’s latest adventures in New York, and how she’s got three more years as a congresswoman, and then… They don’t know. Come back to Virginia? That’s the current plan, though both Ducky and Penny are a tad skeptical that going from being involved, day-in, day-out in building the State of Colombia to “retirement” will be for them.

“I’m sure Jarvis will have something you can do,” Jimmy says, noticing something. He steps a little to the side, and confirms what he thinks he’s seeing.

“Something,” Penny replies. “Of course, but what? Technically, if I’m going to be involved in the state government, we need to move there.”

“We do, still, technically, own my condo,” Ducky says.

“No one’s wanted to take it?” Jimmy says, still looking away from the two of them. Apparently, if you stand in exactly the right spot, the shadow the screen in front of the window casts allows you to see out into the parking lot. Jimmy takes a step to the side, but from there, he’s only got a view of the party reflected in the glass. One step back, and again, the screen blocks the light, and he can see cars and streetlights.

“We’ve had it on the market for more than a year now, and even at pennies on the dollar, it hasn’t sold,” Penny replies.

Jimmy makes a note of where his car is, and yes, he can see it from the window. Then he refocuses his attention to Ducky and Penny. “If fixing it up is the cost of keeping you guys active and happy… I mean, not like we haven’t done it before.”

“Before we put it on the market we got it fixed back up again,” Ducky says. “It was vandalized, but not destroyed. Mostly it needed someone to go through and clean it. Now, it’s clean, but empty.”

“I don’t know if we still have any neighbors,” Penny adds. “Most of them worked for the government or the universities.”

Jimmy sighs at that. Many of the government and government adjacent jobs are in New York now, and last he heard, American and Georgetown were rebuilding, but not, by any stretch, rebuilt. But, in three years…

Ducky sees that sigh and nods. “Nothing that needs to be decided now.” He shares a look at Penny, and they both know that this is something that may never need to be decided, but both of them think that having long-term plans is something that helps older people stay alive and healthy. So, whether they need them or not, they’re going to have plans.

“Oh!” Jimmy says, playing up how good the sushi between his fingers is. “You’ve got to try this!” he says to Abby, holding the bite of seared fish out to her.

Abby’s eyes quickly skirt around the room. No one’s watching them.

Instead of taking the fish with her fingers, she opens her mouth, taking the piece, and giving his index finger just a tiny lick.

“Tasty,” she says, a second later, making it clear that she’s as much talking about his skin as the food.

“So, tasty,” he replies. He’s got another piece of whatever this is, so he carefully picks it up, dips it in the soy-wasabi mix, lifts it to his own lips, letting just a drop of the liquid hit his tongue before he gives it a light bite. He chews that one, then licks the remaining piece of fish. “Hot, salty, a little musky. Exactly what I like.”

Abby laughs at that, and wiggles her finger, letting him know to lean closer.

He does, and she snatches the bite from him, again, “accidentally” licking his finger.

Another hour flows by, and Jimmy puts his newfound information into play. He pulls Tim, Abby, and Breena over to that little spot, and in a casual sort of way, points out the view.

Tim smiles, getting it, and a plan, into his head.

“I think it’s about time for us to deliver that present to Gibbs.”

Jimmy nods along. “I was thinking that. Maybe… take a few minutes to get it.” He looks, pointedly, to their van.
The girls get it. “Both of you, together?”

Tim nods. “Yeah, I think both of us.”

Jimmy likes to be watched, and get caught, and enjoys danger sex, so just the idea of this is getting him revved up, and sure, if he brought one of the girls, Tim and whichever one stayed inside would enjoy it, but if he brings Tim both of the girls will adore what comes next.

Once they’re outside, Tim sets his watch alarm. They can’t spend too long out here. Just long enough to make it fun to watch. They walk a few hundred more feet, next to the car, looking up at the party. They can see everyone near the window, but except for Abby and Breena, who know to look at the little strip of glass that’s in the shadow of the screen, none of them can see them.

“Feels trippy,” Jimmy says. “Naked but invisible.”

Tim smirks at that. “Too cold for naked.”

They’re at the van, and he leans against Jimmy. Kissing him when he’s not watching the girls.

It triggers a memory for Tim. Cold air, car behind Jimmy, the feel of desire. He rubs up against Jimmy again, deliberately, and says, “I’d like to pin your hands, and tell you a story.”

Jimmy looks away from the girls and the rest of the party. “Why?”

“Because if I pin your hands, Abby’ll see it, and remember the same thing I am. She’ll tell Breena, and… It’s a good story. You’ll like it, too.”

Jimmy thinks about it, and then nods.

It’s a little more difficult to do with Jimmy. Jimmy’s bigger than Abby, and this time Tim’s got to use both hands, because he can’t actually pin Jimmy if he’s got both wrists in one hand. But he’s fairly sure Abby’ll still get the idea when she sees him reach up, pressing each of Jimmy’s wrist against the cold metal of the van, and rock into him.

He kisses Jimmy’s throat, and bites his jaw gently. Just enough to make him squirm a little. “I did this with Abby once. Right after we got those Valentine’s videos.”

Jimmy remembers those, and moans a little.

“Yeah. You and Tony finally left, and I had the time to watch, so I did, and…”

Jimmy’s nodding, he remembers what was on that video, and right now, looking up, he can see Breena, who looks a lot like she did in that video, just a lot more dressed, next to Abby, who just lightly put her hand on Breena’s shoulder, laughing at a joke or something, both of them holding eye contact with each other for a moment too long before shifting their gazes back to him and Tim.

Tim’s rocking his hips against Jimmy. “Every drop of blood in my body was in my cock after that video. I told Abby I was going to fuck her through the wall when she got home, and then an idea hit. I texted her and asked if she had on a skirt, and she did, and panties, but she didn’t. So I told her to go get some, and where to park when she got home.”

“Why’d you want her to put panties on?” Jimmy can see it in his mind, that little blue outfit she was wearing in the video as she and Breena kissed. Maybe Tim wanted to see it live, too. He certainly enjoyed that little pink number Breena had been wearing.
Tim nuzzles Jimmy’s throat and jawline, and says, voice low, “So I could do this, press her up against the car, pin her hands, and then cut them off her before fucking her into next week. Outside, in the cold, where anyone could just walk up and see us.”

Jimmy hisses at that idea, a long, fast inhale as the idea of it, the feel of it, and the sense of danger and power all wrap together in his head. “Oh.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Good night. Felt like a walking hard-on. Every drop of blood in my body running around too fast, too hard, and every thought focused on my cock. Every time I closed my eyes I could see them kissing, and when I got Abby inside, I could taste Breena on her, and… Very good night.”

Jimmy’s watching the girls. They can’t just be staring out the window at them, but they keep glancing his way, and Abby just brushed Breena’s hair off her shoulder and throat, to ‘admire her necklace’ or something like that.

“She liked it?”

Tim sounds smug, “Oh yeah.”

“The whole set up, or just the knife?”

“Both. I don’t take my knife out very often, but it’s gone over well when I have.”

Jimmy looks back up at them again, and waits until they’re both watching them. Fast, before Tim knows it’s going to happen, he’s slipped the pin, flipped them around, and gotten his thigh wedged between Tims, and Tim’s hands behind his back.

Tim hits the car with a bit of a thud, and feels the metal behind him, warmer than he expected, but that’s the ghost of Jimmy’s body there. He sees Abby’s eyes go wide, and Breena look over, also a bit surprised to see they’ve flipped.

“One day, I’ll show both of you how to play a knife game,” Jimmy’s voice is low, dark, and sending shivers, the good kind, up Tim’s spine. He’s never been waiting with baited breath to hear more of what Jimmy was going to say, not in a this-is-turning-me-on sort of way, but he is right now.

“Soon,” Tim says, egging him on.

“Oh yeah. I’m thinking Abby’s going to need a button down shirt, probably best if it’s a little too small.”

Tim can see where this is going. “The buttons strain over her breasts.”

“Exactly. Cheap lacy bra. Next time you’re at Target pick one up.”

Tim’s dick is leaping to attention at this idea. “Got it. Flimsy skirt?”

“Yeah, fairly loose at the bottom. Thong.”

Tim squirms against Jimmy, enjoying this idea, a lot. “What are you bringing to the party?”

“A scalpel.” Jimmy grins at Tim, and then kisses him, hard, deep, rocking against him, and Tim can feel this idea is getting him hard, too. What had been a show to turn on the ladies is rapidly getting to both of them, too. “She’ll sit in your lap, legs wide over yours, and you’ll hold her arms behind her back.”
Tim’s nodding. “Pull the shirt a little tighter, those poor buttons’ll be working hard.”

“Yeah. Won’t take more than a little hint of pressure from the scalpel, and off they’ll go.” He makes a little flicking gesture with his hand.

“She’ll be squirming in my lap, and I’ll be kissing her shoulders, teeth lightly scraping up her neck. You’ll be kneeling in front of her. One button at a time…”

“Until her shirt is hanging off of her. I’ll lean in, kissing her breasts, sucking on them, stroking, but that bra’s in the way…”

“So it’s got to go.”

“Hook my index finger into the fabric between the cups, pull a little, so it’s not flush on her skin, and then, snick, off it goes.”

“God…” Yeah, this is working a treat for Tim, he can imagine it and feel it and… “You can see here there, legs wide, just the tiniest hint of her panties under her skirt, and the shirt and bra open, boobs hanging out…”

“Not sure about hanging out. I intend to be holding them.”

“She’s kissing me, and you’re kissing her, and all three of us rubbing and rubbing against each other.”

Jimmy’s rubbing against him now, both of them are, rocking because the friction feels too damn good to stop. “I scoot up a bit, press my cock against her-“

Tim groans. “Her sweet ass against me, her pussy against you.”

“God, yes!” Jimmy’s rocking against him, hard. “But that damn skirt is in the way. One little nick, just enough to start it, and then I grab it and rip it off of her.”

Tim groans at that, too. “You going to rip the panties off, too?”

“You want me to?”

“I’ll press up a little on her arms, give her the idea to stand up.”

“You just want her ass in your face.”

“Duh. She’s got on a little black thong, so it’s right there, soft and lush and I’m kissing everything I can reach.”

“Trace over everything with my fingers. Keep ‘em light to start with, get the edges of the panties, then drag them over, and slip my tongue between her lips.”

“She’d moan at that. That deep, breathy, ‘fuck’ out of her.” They both know that sound and appreciate the memory.

“Oh, she would. And you’d give her a little bite, make her groan, and I’ll slit those panties off, pull her into my arms, wrap her legs around my hips and be deep in her before she stops moaning.”

Tim’s teeth grit at that idea. “I’d be able to watch from an inch away, until I’m all slicked up, and join you.”
“The two of us, holding her between us, rocking away.”

Tim wraps his arms around Jimmy’s hips, and kisses his throat and ear, “Best dance ever.”

“Yeah.”

They kiss again, deep, fast, feeding on the idea of Abby naked, between them, and the feel of fucking her into a dance. They’re moving faster, and Tim’s enjoying it, rocking faster, letting his hips set the pace, and then the timer he set begins to buzz.

He’s not exactly close, not right now, especially not with his watch buzzing away on his wrist to let him know it’s time to move, but… Probably a good idea to pull back. “You know, unless you want to cum in your pants from rubbing off, we should probably stop.”

Jimmy does slow down, but doesn’t exactly stop. “Been so damn long, I’m not even sure I can anymore.”

That gets a quick laugh out of Tim. He gives Jimmy a quick peck, and Jimmy steps back, adjusting himself. “Joys of forty.”

Jimmy gives him wry smile, which Tim shares, both of them remembering a time when anything rubbing against them would have done it, and then a real one lights Jimmy’s face, “Joys of forty, half an hour or so from now, we’ll have actual women getting us out of our pants, and we’ll be getting into theirs.”

Tim smiles back at him, and likewise shifts himself about. “You know, put it like that, and I like forty.”

They give themselves a minute to get ‘presentable,’ then Jimmy opens the door to the van. Inside there is a bag, with a little tag on it that says Gibbs and Abbi, and said bag has a pretty ribbon on it, and it’s made of a very pretty silvery paper with the outlines of white roses on it.

The outside of this bag oozes elegant class. In other circumstances, Jimmy could easily see himself handing it to Senior or, hell, if one were available, a senator or something.

But both Jimmy and Tim know, in a ‘round-about, non-specific sort of way, what’s in this bag, so Jimmy’s not about to hand it off to anyone who isn’t Gibbs or Abbi. (And, honestly, were he to hand it to Abbi, he’d likely blush.)

“All set?” Jimmy asks.

“All set.” Tim hands the bag over to him.

And thus, they head back into the restaurant. Gibbs is the closer of the two of them, talking with Pride, Fornell, and Tony about something, but he’s easy enough to wave away. (Jimmy catches his eye and holds up the present bag. Next to Gibbs, Tony smirks a wide and dirty smirk, and starts talking to Pride and Fornell, both of whom seem to catch his wide and dirty smirk.)

Jimmy hands the bag over, and Tim says, “Besides the diplomatic tags, and some pills you probably don’t need, but may want, we do not know, nor do we want to know, what, precisely, is in this bag. In a general sort of sense, we’ve been told by our wives that they expect you to make sure Abbi has a very good time on your honeymoon, and any and every possible thing they could think of to ensure that is located therein.”

Gibbs looks a little startled by that, but takes the bag, looking in. All he sees are nicely wrapped packages nestled in tissue paper, and the stickers that Tim added to the mix.

Jimmy takes over. “Last I checked you weren’t on any blood pressure medication. If that changes, don’t mess with the pills. Otherwise, I’ve been told they’re fun. But if they’re fun for more than four hours at a time, get to an emergency room.”

Gibbs eyes just about fall out of his head at that bit. He looks like he’s about to swallow his tongue. Jimmy and Tim enjoy it, for a moment, before Tim slaps him on the back, and gives him a quick hug.

“All bases covered?” he asks Jimmy.

“Yep. Enjoy! Don’t tell us about it later!” Then Jimmy hugs Gibbs, and they head over to their own wives.

Though, looking back, they again see Gibbs looking into the bag, a somewhat curious expression on his face.

Even better, a minute after that, Abbi joins him, asking about the bag, and her wicked and loud laughter just makes all four of the McPalmers day.

Tim’s heading to the restroom when he hears Wendy say to Elaine, “Did you know they’re roasting coffee now? The McGees and Palmers got Gibbs and Abbi a roaster for Christmas. I don’t know how much Abbi gets to use it, but he and Gibbs are messing with it all the time. Before you’re done with this new diner of yours, you might have a new coffee supplier.”

Elaine looks intrigued by that. She’s always served good, strong, hot coffee, but it was never “special.” “Locally, fresh-roasted beans might get people in the door.”

Brian’s also thinking about it. “If he’s good at it, we could use it.”

Both of them are looking across the room, to where Gibbs is dancing with Abbi, and Fornell is a few steps behind, leaning against the bar, sipping a scotch.

He hears Wendy say, just before he’s out of earshot, “They both need something to do with themselves. Way too much free time.”

Once he’s in there, and has taken care of why he’s in there, he pulls out his phone. He almost takes a picture of himself, but decides not to. He does fire off a quick text to Breena:

Twenty minutes to go. Been watching your lips all night. Can’t wait to kiss them. Want to suck your lower lip between mine, feel my teeth glide over it, and hear that little whimper you make when I do that.

A kiss emoji comes up on his phone a moment later.

Nine thirty rolls around. And while there is a certain level of temptation to take advantage of the ‘guy only’ after-party Pride’s inviting them to, Tim and Jimmy both have other plans.
They, with their wives, say their goodbyes, make sure everyone knows they’re looking forward to tomorrow, and then… They’re free.

Tim’s never been the kind of guy to make fun of minivans. He’s not the one who’ll smirk about mom-mobiles and the like. That said, he doesn’t personally own one, and previous to a minute ago, didn’t think there was much chance of that changing.

But… as he’s finding out, much to his enjoyment, if you happen to have a minivan, and three of your favorite playmates are in it, and if all four of you happen to be looking to get laid, and if there’s a conveniently located empty parking lot, all of those things together can wrap up into a marvelously good time.

Last time he and Abby did this, they had to stop mid-fuck to take the top off of his Porsche. Both of them are just too damn tall to have sex in a sports car. This is not an issue in a minivan.

And, should that desert tryst have involved all four of them… well, it wouldn’t have, the Porsche was a two person car. No matter how intimately involved four people are, a Porsche just isn’t a good place for them.

But a minivan… Yeah…

He’s starting to see all the advantages of a minivan.

Once they pull into the parking lot, making sure that they’re not visible from the street, Tim and Abby hop into the middle seat with Jimmy and Breena.

“Finally!” Breena says, unbuckling, scooting over so she’s in Jimmy’s lap, and there’s room for Tim next to him on the seat.

“Amen,” Abby adds, pushing Tim down, yanking up his kilt, and going after her skirt, too.

Jimmy’s at something of a disadvantage here. Tim and Abby are already making happy groaning sounds, and he’s still fussing with his belt.

“See…” Tim gasps a bit as Abby leans back. “There’s a… Oh God… reason… Uh… Why three of us… God woman, you’re killing me!… wore skirts.”

Jimmy flashes him the stink eye while he wrestles with his zipper, and finally gets it undone. A moment later, his voice, and Breena’s joins the chorus of happy sounds.

He’s sitting almost hip to hip with Jimmy. (Abby’s leg is between them.) And after hours of teasing words and touches no one is looking for long or drawn out. This is firework sex, fast, bright and sparkly. And here, in the middle seat, with Abby in his lap, he can touch and kiss all three of them.

He’s kissing Breena, feeling Abby rising and falling against him, holding Jimmy’s hand. They’re both moving fast, and he knows it can’t last, not long, but he doesn’t need it to. Right here, right now, a kiss and breath, a gasped sigh. He’s pulling forward, hand on Breena’s breast, and then back, kissing Jimmy, and Abby, glorious, wonderful Abby, in his lap and heart and soul, his lips find hers, and all of them, together in a cocoon of warm breath and fogged windows, no world outside of them, nothing mattering besides the feel of four bodies gliding with and against each other.

Sparks gather, burning brighter, bursting in grunts and cum cries.

Heavy, half-gasped breaths slowing down. Hearts slowing, too. He’s sprawled back on the seat, head resting on Jimmy’s shoulder, Abby curled up against his chest, Breena’s thigh under his palm, basking in the firework bright glow of another night with his loves.

Sometimes, life is truly sweet.

He trades lazy kisses with all three of them, and finds himself thinking tomorrow will be sweeter, yet.
A Beginning and An End

Chapter Notes

Okay Loves, There’s something of a soundtrack for this one. If you’re on google play, there is supposedly a way to look up Playlists. (No, I don’t actually know how to do this.) But, if you do know how to do it, feel free to hunt down Shards To A Whole by Keryl Raist. I’ve got the versions of the songs I’m thinking of on there. (If any of you do manage to succeed in this, let me know how to do it. I may, eventually create the STAW Master Playlist, with ALL the songs mentioned in the story in it.)

If you aren’t, you’re looking for:

You’re My Best Friend: Queen

For My Wedding: Don Henley

Pachabel’s Canon In D Major (Preferably a piano and violin mix, but violin on its own will work fine, too.)

You Got It: Roy Orbison

Sway: Blue October

I’ll put the title of the song in asterisks when it needs to start. Pachabel’s Canon In D Major for example.

And without further ado: Chapter 608: A Beginning and An End

On December 31st, 2017, Gibbs wakes up on Fornell’s sofa. He blinks a few times, wondering what’s going on. It’s been a long time since he woke up here. Years? Got to be. It’s disorienting for a moment, and then he knows. Abbi’s at home. He’s at his best man’s place, spending the night before his wedding away from the bride.

He checks his watch; it’s 06:00. He thinks they got to bed around… God… 03:00. He’s sure that if he bounces off that sofa and starts moving around, Fornell will slap him upside the back of his head.

With his alarm clock.

So, he rolls over and tries to get back to sleep, expecting it to be useless.

But… It’s a comfy sofa, and he is tired, and… possibly, still a little drunk, or… okay, maybe a lot drunk…and…
At the McGee house, most mornings (these days, this will shift again in about another month when Donnie gets to where he can go six hours without a feed) go something like this:

Wake up number 1: This one happens at 5:00, and it’s Breena’s. Between work and wanting to sleep regularly, Donnie does nurse, but not every feed. First breakfast and second dinner are his nursing meals. His first wakeup of the day is (and right now, you can set a clock by it) 5:03 AM.

So, at 5:03 AM, Breena’s up with the first of their five tiny alarm clocks who do not understand the concept of late nights, holidays, or weekends. Said clock is looking up at her with big blue eyes, and fussing mightily because it’s been a minute and a half since he began requesting breakfast number one, and like all babies, he’s firmly convinced he will starve if not fed immediately upon request. But, after a bit of shushing, some patting, and a new diaper, Donnie settles in for his breakfast. He’s a good eater, and in twenty minutes, she’s laying him back in his crib.

She returns to her own bed. Barely 5:30 in December may as well be midnight, but they’ve got nightlights all over the house, so in the dim blue glow, she can see her mates. Her own space, on Jimmy’s right, is open and waiting for her. Tim’s on his side, his back to Jimmy’s hip, snuggled around Abby. There are soft breathing sounds, the occasional quiet moment as they shift in their sleep, and then a second of enveloping warmth as she slips between the sheets, snuggling in next to Jimmy. He doesn’t actually wake up, but he does kiss her forehead as she rests her head on his shoulder.

Normally, wake up number 2 would happen around seven, and this one would get two of the three of them who are not Breena up. Tim, Jimmy, or Abby would respond to the sound of two little girls playing in their room (Molly and Kelly share a room at Tim and Abby’s place, and have gotten pretty good about not getting out of bed until some adults come for them. What they haven’t gotten good at is the idea that sound travels. Or for that matter, the difference between indoor and outdoor volume.) and Anna will usually be calling out, sometimes with words, sometimes just fussing, because if her sisters are playing she wants to be up and at it, too.

Some mornings she wakes Sean up, too. In which case they’ll come in and find her standing, holding onto the edge of the crib, and he’ll be sitting up, looking up at them. Other mornings she doesn’t, and he sleeps through her fussing.

This is not how wakeup number two goes this morning though. At about 6:30, when Molly wakes up, she comes bounding out of her room, singing, at the top of her lungs, “Wedding Day! Wedding Day! Pop And Abbi are wedding today!” and then bounces into their room, climbing into bed with the adults, who, granted, are excited about the wedding, too, but not in a ‘let’s get out of bed early and dance around about it’ level.

So, for Tim, wake up number two is a loud, jarring voice, followed by the feel of a small kneecap pressing deeply into his kidney as said voice apparently climbs over him to snuggle with her Daddy and Mama.

He’s almost got his eye open when another elbow, this one apparently attached to a quieter, but somehow no less pokey child, hits him in the hip. Kelly’s not making as much noise as Molly, but she’s just as determined to get in on the snuggles.

He hears Jimmy, with a very sleepy Dad-voice, saying, “You’re supposed to stay in bed until 7:00.”

“It’s wedding day!” Molly explains, because in her world, this does explain it.
Tim debates saying something like, “Yes, but not for eleven hours,” but decides against it because eleven hours is at best a tenuous concept for Molly and at worst might involve crying.

“Back to your room!” Jimmy says.

Assorted non-verbal whining responds to that.

Abby comes up with a save, “Go to your room, and get all of your wedding gear out.”

And that gets two little girls out of bed, (this time Tim doesn’t get a sharp pokey bit in a sensitive place) back to their room, to get whatever it is they think they need for the wedding, picked out.

Half an hour later, Tim and Jimmy do roll out of bed, and maybe they aren’t light on their feet and full of smiles, but they also didn’t stay out ‘til 03:00 with Gibbs, Fornell, Pride, Callen, Bleach, Leon, and Ducky, so they aren’t cursing and looking at the world like it’s a bleak landscape of alcohol-blurred exhaustion.

So, while it’s true they’re a tad forlorn at having missed what was likely to be an epic night of tales of thrilling bullshit, because Pride can out-bullshit the thrillingest bullshitter ever, it’s also true they had a great time getting home from the party, and they’re rather pleased to not be getting up at 07:00, when the aforementioned tiny alarm clocks who do not understand the concept of weekends, holidays, or late nights, all begin to clamor for breakfast, on something less than three hours of sleep.

Tim’s rubbing his eyes as he’s corralling kiddos, trying to get Sean to stay still while he cleans him off and gets a fresh diaper on him, but he can see his sisters are up and playing, and he keeps trying to roll away and join the fun.

“Oh no you don’t!” he says, grabbing his squirmy, poop-bottomed little wannabe escape artists. Sean doesn’t crawl, yet. He does roll, and if there’s a way to make a bigger mess than rolling away with an unwiped bum, none of the McPalmer kids have found it… yet. “Jimmy?”

Jimmy looks over from picking out onesies and socks, and then kneels down, holding Sean’s shoulders, allowing Tim to rapidly clean him off without the little guy attempting another escape. “There!” Tim adds, clean diaper on and snug. “Go, be free.”

Sean looks up at him, goes completely limp, and just lays there, grinning.

“Uh huh… Yeah… now you’re all ‘I’ll just lie here and smile,’” Tim says as he stands up to wash his hands.

“What are we doing when the girls get up?” Jimmy asks, when he comes back.

“We’re on kiddos and breakfast. They’re on sleep in. Then they get up, we hand ‘em off. We’ve got haircuts then back here. Everyone gets lunch, then they’re off to the Omni, and we’re on the flower run. Heather’ll meet us there. She takes over major child watching. We hand out flowers and get ready for the wedding. Molly gets her five minutes of fame. And then from there, they get to be part of the party as much as they can handle, and then back up with Heather and Keith when it’s sleepy-time or they just need the quiet.”

“And we, with any luck, get at least once dance with our girls.”

Tim smiles. “With any luck. Jeannie and Ed won’t stay that late, right?”
Jimmy shrugs.

Tim grabs Sean again, who has rolled over and is just about to make a break for it, or as much of a break as someone who does not yet crawl can make. He sets Sean in his lap. “Ha! You thought you could get away,” he says and signs it. Sean’s implant isn’t on yet, that’s the last bit of his ‘outfit’ when he gets dressed, so he’s watching Tim’s hands avidly. Tim takes a pair of socks from Jimmy, and begins to wriggle them up his son’s feet.

In the more than a year that Abbi’s lived at the Gibbs house, the doggies have learned a few things: A: Gibbs gets up early. B: Abbi gets up early a lot. C: Sometimes she does not. And D: if you wake her up when she’s not getting up early, she makes some sharp, angry noises, and you don’t get petted. They don’t like that at all.

This morning though, there are new people in the house. Jeff and Becky are up at their normal time, which on the east coast time works out to 07:00.

Elaine and Brian are here, too, and they’re also no strangers to early rising.

So, while it’s true that both doggies know that waking Abbi up when she’s having a laying about sort of day is a bad thing, it’s also true that with four other people in the house up and moving around and doing things, they’re excited, and like the McPalmer Little Alarm Clocks, they do not grasp the nuances of what’s happening.

So, at a bit before 08:00, a cool, damp nose is poking Abbi, making sure that the human who is supposed to be in this house knows what’s going on, and approves of it.

Abbi wasn’t out that late. She and her Marines went out for a few drinks, but she didn’t want to be exhausted today, so they (she) called it a night at 01:00. (For all she knows, they may still be out.) She’s tired, but not wrecked when Mona nudges her again.

“Sleeping time!” she says to Mona.

Mona nudges her again.

“The damn house better be on fire.”

Mona barks.

“Fine!” She sits up, pulls on her robe, and follows Mona downstairs. Jackson is on the sofa, keeping watch on the kitchen. He doesn’t know Brian or Elaine, and he does know Jeff and Becky, but none of them are supposed to be here.

Mona heads over to him, and both of them are staring at the people making breakfast in their kitchen, eyeing them with deep suspicion.

Abbi groans at them. “It’s morning, they’re eating. They’re allowed to.”

Mona tilts her head to the side. You sure about that?

Abbi pats her on the head. “Stand down, this is fine.”
“Good morning!” Elaine says to her. “Are you up or…”

Abbi yawns. “I don’t know. I hope not.” She glares at the dogs. “Both of you, have some breakfast and go run around outside.”

They scramble off the sofa into the kitchen, looking chagrinned for having misjudged what’s going on in there.

Abbi heads back upstairs, plopping herself between warm, soft blankets, and hopes that sleep will revisit her. Sure, she’s done more than a few days on less than six hours, but she was hoping today wouldn’t be one of them.

A few minutes later, she’s getting her wish.

At 10:00 in the morning, on December 31st, 2017, Tony DiNozzo is nervous.

“What do you mean there’s traffic outside of Wilmington? It’s supposed to be here by now!” he’s saying to a courier who was supposed to get here any minute, and apparently won’t be doing that.

“You don’t need it until 5:00, and I’ll get it to you by 2:00.” The voice on the line sounds bored. Obviously he does not grasp the gravity of what will happen if that tux doesn’t get here by 4:00. (Tony will be head smacked into an early grave if the tux shows up at 5:00 for a 5:30 wedding, so that damn thing better be here by 4:00, or he’s going to personally shoot the courier in each of his joints, twice.)

“You better! It’s THE GROOM’S tux!”

“Dude, chill. I’ve got this. You won’t be explaining to your groom why he’s getting married naked.”

“I better not be.”

“Relax.”

That ‘relax’ doesn’t sound nearly worried enough. “Just remember I’m a cop, I have a gun, and if that tux isn’t here before the wedding…”

“Chill. It will be.”

“It better.”

The voice on the other line laughs. “Yeah, sure, Mr. Cop. You think you’re scary, if I don’t get it down here in time, I better not ever come back, because Mr. Huong’ll skin me alive and wear me around to keep the other couriers in line.”

Tony nods at that. “Good.”

Ziva’s been watching this conversation, and Tony pacing around their apartment while he’s been having it.

When Tony hangs up, he says, “He’s going to kill me if this doesn’t work.”
“It will be fine, Tony.”

“And Fornell will piss on my corpse, because I talked him into going along with this.”

“Where is it?”

“Outside of Wilmington.”

“That’s not so bad. I can drive that in an hour and a half.”

And Tony knows exactly how that trip would go. “Oh, God, the last thing I need is the courier killing someone to get this thing down here on time!”

Ziva stands up, and places her hands on his shoulders. “It will be here. But, if it makes you feel better, call the place Fornell got the original tux from, and see if they’ve got another one. It shouldn’t be that difficult to find another black tux with a gray vest.”

Tony nods, and kisses her, and then goes to his computer, putting her back up plan into play.

“Wedding day! Wedding day! We’re gonna go to a wedding today!” Molly’s dancing around the living room as she sings this. “Can I see my dress again?”

“No, honey. We’ve got everything packed up and ready to go,” Abby says.

Molly pouts at that, she loves her dress. If it were up to her, she’d be wearing her flower girl dress 24/7. And, honestly, once the wedding is done and that dress no longer needs to be pristine, her collected parents have decided they are perfectly fine with her wearing it as much as she likes. After all, it’s not like she’s going to have a lot of occasions for a royal purple satin dress with silver embroidery on the neckline and hem. At least, not before she’s outgrown it.

“But…” Tim says, with a behave and we may have a deal tone of voice, “if you want, you can come with your daddy and I to the flower store and help us pick up all the flowers and deliver them.”

That gets a quickly sucked in breath from Molly. “The FLOWERS!”

Tim’s nodding. “Yes. The flowers. And we’re going to have to be very careful with them, because we’ll have Abbi’s bouquet, and everyone’s boutonnieres, and” Tim says the magic words, “all of the flower petals you’re going to scatter for Abbi!”

The tiny little wiggle of a pout on Molly’s lip vanishes so fast it practically never existed.

It’d been a while since Tim got a haircut. Since before he put the fear of McGee into the FBI. And now, almost… actually… more than three months later, it’s getting a bit shaggy. Not record setting long, especially not for him, but it’s at that stupid length between short and professional and long and slightly less professional but vaguely stylish.
Jimmy’s getting his normal trim. He hasn’t changed his hair in the more than decade Tim’s known him, though Tim suspects that’s because any shorter looks stupid and any longer turns into the white guy equivalent of an Afro. Even in the pictures of Jimmy from college and high school they’ve got on the mantle, his hair is pretty much the same way it is now.

Tim does his usual somewhat sloppy job of attempting to explain what he wants. (Like this, but shorter!) The hair cutter does her job, and in a bit, it’s shorter. But whatever it was Henry did to his hair three months ago, the magic didn’t translate, and he’s not sure if he likes this. It’s definitely shorter, but also sort of flat.

“How’s it look?”

Jimmy flashes Tim a I can’t believe you asked me that look as they’re walking out.

“Well, that normally works with my hair.”

“I did just make it worse?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Yeah, I think so. Abby and Breena’ll know what to do.”

Tim rolls his eyes. Once they’re back in the car, he checks himself in the rearview mirror. “Asshole.”

Jimmy smirks. Tim’s hair looks fine, better than it did before Jimmy played with it. “Ask them if your hair looks good, not me.”

“Noted.”

Abbi would have to say that this part feels weird. She’s in jeans, a sweatshirt, an old coat, and no makeup. And everyone with her is in the same condition. They’re all standing around in the foyer at the Omni, a huge, high-ceilinged place made of marble with a crystal chandelier, and huge, towering flower displays, waiting for Ziva, who this room ‘officially’ belongs to, to check in.

Miranda, who’s standing next to her says, “You remember this part from my wedding?”

Abbi thinks back, and says… “A little. Felt like we spent hours lugging everything into the inn.”

Miranda smiles at that, and looks at the bell hop who’s piling their luggage onto a wheeled carrier, complete with a high bar to hang things, like a wedding dress, on. “I don’t think that’ll be an issue here.”

“Yeah, it’s a tad more catered than your cabin in Alaska.”

“Well, that was sort of the point, it was rustic.”

Abbi and Miranda both laugh. The “inn” they were supposed to be at had been very carefully photographed for the brochures. It did have the views that they booked it for, but it was, probably by at least fifty percent, smaller than they’d expected. And the service left a bit to be desired.

Miranda taps her wedding ring. “Pretty settings are nice, but… You’ll forget. Not the big stuff, but the little bits. And the big ones will get fuzzy. You’ll remember how it felt more than how it looked or tasted.”

Abbi nods at that. That’s how all of life works.

“But you’ll live it, every day, and maybe the party gets dim, but the life that party set in motion… That’ll stay.”

Abbi nods at that, too, her voice suddenly feeling tight. Miranda sees what she’s doing, nodding so she doesn’t have to talk, and hugs her close.

A moment later, Ziva’s over. “We are checked in. Let’s go!”

The next time Gibbs wakes up, it’s one in the afternoon, Wendy is making them brunch, and Fornell’s poking him. “Get moving sleepyhead.”

Gibbs opens one eye, peers up at Fornell, who’s smirking in a very pleased sort of way at him, and then blinks, sitting up.

“Supposed to be at the hotel in two hours. That’s enough time to eat, get a shower, and get moving, right?”

Gibbs nods. “Yeah.” He smells coffee and hears the first sizzle of bacon hitting the frying pan and begins to perk up.

Lunch, shower, getting packed up and ready to go…

Just a normal morning—except it’s well into afternoon.

Gibbs is out of the shower, putting on his clothing, and getting ready to gather up his stuff, when Fornell walks in… Gibbs shrugs, not like Tobias hasn’t seen it all before, and it is his room.

“All ready?”

Gibbs looks at Fornell, and then looks down at himself. He’s wearing his boxers and socks. He looks back at Fornell. “Oh yeah. Planning on cementing my reputation as the worst husband ever.” Gibbs rolls his eyes and picks up his pants.

Fornell laughs at that, and goes to the closet, grabbing their suits. He looks at the bag on the dresser. “So, what’d they get you? DiNozzo said it was sexy.”

Gibbs rolls his eyes and looks into the bag as Fornell carries their suits to the door. “I haven’t opened any of it. Gonna do that with Abbi,” He grins at that. He’ll admit to being kind of curious as to what sort of stuff is in there, but he doesn’t want to play with any of it on his own. “Only thing I know for sure is in there are three diplomatic tags and a bottle of Viagra,” he calls out.

Fornell comes back, without the suit bags. He’s just staring at Gibbs, looking boggled. Finally he comes up with: “In what possible universe does that combination make sense?”

Gibbs shrugs. “Made sense to the McPalmers and Ziva.”
“Diplomatic tags?”

“I guess so I can take it wherever and not have the TSA mess with it.”

Fornell doesn’t buy that, and Gibbs would admit it’s not anything he’d ever thought of. Then both of them have the same idea at the same time. Gibbs is double checking the stickers, Fornell reading over his shoulder.

Both of them share a look.

“If we ever find someone…” Gibbs says.

Fornell’s nodding. If they ever find a person to smuggle into the US, all they need is a box big enough to hold her, stick on of these stickers on it, and it cannot be opened, inspected, touched, taken custody of…

“I’d kiss McGee if he were here!” Fornell says.

“You’d shock the hell out of him.”

Fornell waves that off. “Not like he’s never been kissed by someone with stubble.”

Gibbs laughs at that, turns around, and fetches his t-shirt. A minute later he’s got his polo on over it.

“Okay, now I’m ready.”

“Good. Let’s go get you married.”

Gibbs grins at that. He slips on his shoes, grabs the bag, and they’re off.

“So, do we have a flower girl who wants to pick up some flowers?” Jimmy calls out when they get back to their house.

Molly and Kelly come bounding to him as he says that.

Their mothers follow a little more slowly, ready to check out the haircuts, make sure no last minute fix-ups are necessary.

Jimmy passes muster easily. Both of them fuss with Tim’s hair for a moment before deciding he’s allowed to attend the wedding.

He’s standing there, letting them play with his hair, and then says, “You’re going to make me go back up to New York every time I need a haircut now, aren’t you?”

He sees them both glance at each other, and for a second they seem to be actually contemplating it, but then Abby says, “Maybe you could just ask the guy who did it, who he recommends around here.”

Tim nods, that’s likely doable. “Or just ask Senior. It’s his guy.”

“Which you could probably do today,” Breena adds.

Tim nods. He notices that Molly’s actually pulling her shoes on and is already wearing her coat. “I take it you’re eager to go.”
She looks up at him, huge smile on her face.

“‘We’ve been hearing nothing but flowers all morning,’” Breena says.

“Then flowers we shall get!” Jimmy replies. “So, grab ‘em, and then meet up at the Omni?”

“That’s the plan,” Abby replies.

Tim kisses both of the ladies. “Then we’ll see you there in an hour or so!”

It’s not a long drive to the flower place, and once there Tim’s got Kelly in his arms, because everything around them looks so fragile.

Molly’s on her best behavior. “Just looking, no touching,” Jimmy says, keeping an eye on her as she wanders around, hands clasped behind her back so she won’t touch.

There’s a lady at the counter. Tim makes a beeline for her. “Hi. We’re here to pick up the flowers for the Borin-Gibbs wedding.”

“Are you Tim McGee or Jimmy Palmer?” she asks.

“I’m Tim.”

“Great. Let me see some ID, and I’ll help you load them up.”

Tim feels like having to show ID to get flowers is weird, but… Why not? He flips open his wallet and shows off his driver’s license.

“Thanks.”

“Is this normal?” he asks.

“One bride screaming about lost flowers was one too many. I’m never doing that again.”

Tim glances to Jimmy and both of them feel like there’s got to be a hell of a story behind that, but probably not one they need to know.

The flower lady shakes her head. “You’re right, you don’t want to know. Humans suck. Anyway… You parked nearby?”

“Right out front,” Jimmy says.

“Great. None of it’s heavy, but it’s all fragile, and there’s a lot of it.” She notices Molly, staring at the flowers in the display case. “Are you the flower girl?”

“Yes!” Molly says, very serious.

“Would you like to see all the flowers before we put them into the boxes to take them to the wedding?”

“YES!”

The Flower Lady nods to the back, and Jimmy and Molly follow her. It’s cold back there, which he supposes makes sense. And on two of the shelves, there’s a huge collection of clear plastic clamshell boxes in a bunch of different sizes.
Molly’s eyes are enormous as she sees what’s in them. Some are just petals. There boutonnieres. Small bouquets Abbi’s ladies. There’s a box filled with white and purple roses for the place settings. There’s another one filled with calla lilies to go around the cake. There’s a big one with Abbi’s bouquet, a cascade of lilies. Jimmy knows the white and purple ones are calla lilies, and he can identify a rose with the best of them, but he’s never seen the white calla lilies with purple centers before.

“Are the white and purple ones real?”

“Oh yes. They’re called Picasso Calla Lilies. Quite popular in wedding bouquets.”

“So pretty!” Molly says.

“Yes they are.” The Flower Lady reaches over and grabs one of the boxes of petals. “I think these are yours. You need to be very careful with them. Can’t spill them until it’s wedding time, but I bet your Daddy would be okay with you carrying them to the car.”

Jimmy nods. “No problems. Let’s get the rest of these loaded up.”

The Flower Lady grabs a large, flat box. And like she said, none of it was heavy, but definitely fragile.

When they’re back in the car, Tim says, “The last time I drove this carefully, I was bringing Sean and Abby home from the hospital.”

Jimmy chuckles at that, but he also agrees with it. They’ve got one job, and it’s going to be done right.
When they get to the hotel, Gibbs notices, in a somewhat absent sort of way, that Tobias has a suit bag over his shoulder, but only one of them.

When they get into the elevator, and Gibbs is growing a tad more aware of the things around him, and less in a I'M GETTING MARRIED haze, absent turns into present as a quick count confirms that there is indeed, only one suit bag between the two of them.

And that… uh… yeah… That’s half as many tuxes as they need to get this show on the road.

And… he think back. That bastard intentionally distracted him with the bag of toys so he wouldn’t notice him only taking one suit bag out of the closet.

Gibbs rubs his lips together staring at the bag, and says, “Don’t suppose that one’s mine and you’re planning on streaking as a wedding prank?”

Fornell snorts a fast laugh at that idea. “That’s an assault, not a prank. DiNozzo’s got yours.”

Gibbs stands there, feeling the elevator creaking its way up to the tenth floor. He’s fairly certain Tony shouldn’t have his tux. Fornell, on best man duty, went with him for the last measurement/pick the damn things up trip, and was there when they schlepped the tuxes to his car, and he took them out of his car, and moved them into his home, where, supposedly, they hung in a closet, waiting for this morning to be transported from Fornell’s home to the Omni.

“Why’s Tony got mine?”

Fornell shrugs. “He came over in the morning, said Ziva was on the flower run, and was going to the hotel after, and asked for it.”

Okay, Fornell is a good liar. He’s a very good liar. So the problem isn’t that he’s got any tells, or that he doesn’t sound convincing, it’s just a wildly out of character move for Tony, and there’s no possible way he’d have slept through Tony coming by, and he knows for a fact that Tim and Jimmy are on the flower run.

“He asked for just my tux?”

“Yes.” The door to the elevator opens.

“And you gave it to him?”

Fornell shrugs, as if handing over the tux right before the wedding is the most normal thing ever.

Gibbs’ eyes narrow. He wouldn’t put it past Tony to come up with some sort of prank. He also wouldn’t think he’d do anything that might actually hurt, and messing with his tux when they’ve got, he checks his watch, two hours to go, would hurt.

Fornell puts a hand on Gibbs’ shoulder, gently nudging him out of the elevator. “Relax. It’s nothing bad. He was hoping you’d be out of it enough to not notice.”

Those eyes get narrower, but now it’s at the idea of a mystery, not anger.

A mystery readily solved. He and Fornell aren’t the first ones to get to his room. He can hear voices, Ziva, Tony, Dave’s fussing a bit. Nothing out of the ordinary. He knocks instead of patting down too many pockets looking for his key card, and a minute later, Ziva’s opening the door, hugging both of “Right on time,” Tony says. Then he really sees Gibbs’ face. “He noticed.”

“He noticed,” Fornell replies. “I told you, you should have just switched them out.”

“I couldn’t. We literally got it an hour ago.”

Gibbs is watching this exchange, his arm around Ziva, who’s grinning at this, while holding Dave, who is a bit miffed at not being the center of his Safta’s attention. Gibbs takes Dave, who stops fussing once Gibbs has him, and says, “Gonna fill me in?”

“Yes,” Ziva replies. “Come.”

Team Bride has a suite two floors down, on the other side of the hotel. Wedding prep is happening there. Baby central is set up in the spare room. The McPalmers have the adjoining suite on the one side, Ducky and Penny have the other, and tonight Tony and Ziva are taking over that room for themselves. Right now, all the doors are open, and it’s a big area for people on Team Bride to get ready. In fact, once this is done, Ziva’s heading down with Dave and joining that side of the party.

But it’s not where Gibbs and Abbi are going tonight. They’re landing here, in Team Groom’s suite. So, right now, they’re all standing around in a sitting area, but Ziva’s leading Gibbs to the bedroom, a huge smile on her face, and once he steps into the bedroom, he sees what she’s grinning at. It’s a large, flat, shiny black box, on the bed.

“Wedding present, from us,” Tony says.

“Your bride mentioned she really enjoyed you dressed up in a good suit,” Ziva adds as Gibbs sits down next to the box, handing Dave over to his father, who is also grinning at him.

The box isn’t wrapped, but it does have a white ribbon on it, and Huong and Son, on a gold sticker in the middle.

Gibbs slits the ribbon, and then opens the box. Resting in white tissue paper is a tux. A good tux. Not that the one he rented was bad or anything, but just looking at it, he can see the fabric’s buttery wool-silk blend is a few miles ahead of what he had. The tux he rented was black, just like the rest of his wedding party. This one is black, too, but the dye and the fabric quality make it a deeper, blacker black. There’s a white shirt, so white it almost hurts to look at, and unlike the rest of his wedding party, who all have royal purple vests and ties, his is steel gray with a silver paisley.

“I had to grab the one you rented so Mr. Huong could get your size, and Palmer’s been using his ‘rehab measurements’—” And Gibbs suddenly comes to the conclusion that just possibly Jimmy didn’t need to check quite that closely how he was ‘coming along’ on ‘rehabbing’ after last Fall. Though he is pleased to see Jimmy got what he was doing past him. “—to make sure we had the rest of your measurements, so this should be as close to perfect as you can get without actually measuring you,” Tony says as Gibbs just stares at the suit in front of him.

His hand inches out, almost afraid to touch the fabric, but when he does, his fingers find a supple, lush texture with enough body to feel like a suit, but soft enough it’s not business class armor.

His mouth drops open, and no words come out, but Tony and Ziva don’t need them. They can see he’s glowing at it, and a moment later, he turns around, hugging both of them close, as Fornell snaps a quick picture of it.

He turns back to the suit, and notices a small white box tucked into the corner. This one doesn’t have a Huong and Son’s label on it. It says: Halston. It’s taped to a small card. Gibbs picks that up, and opens the card: For my son’s other father. Congratulations on your wedding! --Tony Gibbs opens the box, and looking up at him are two cufflinks.

“Dad wanted to make sure you were set up,” Tony says.

They’re disks of some sort of gray metal. The centers are a brushed matte finish, and the rims are gleaming. He feels like he should know what this is, but… It’s not silver. He’s fairly sure it’s not white gold.

Ziva sees the way he’s looking at the links. “They’re steel, Dad. Senior thought if they were for you, they should be strong and durable, with” and she does her best Senior impression, “‘a certain understated flash.’”

Fornell chuckles at the impression. Gibbs smiles at it, and then lies the box back on the suit. He doesn’t know what to say to this, doesn’t know what he’s feeling other than ready.

Time’s moving too slow, and he’s got to get moving, got to put this on, got to go.

“Oh, I know that look,” Tony says. “Anyone who slows this down is about to get a head slap.”

Fornell laughs at that, too. “Yeah. I think you pegged that. It doesn’t matter if you’re ready right now, Jethro, it’s still two hours away.”

Ziva kisses Gibbs’s cheek. He’s not really paying attention to them, he’s seeing the near future, willing it to come faster. She takes Dave from Tony, and says, “Time for us to head down. We’ll see you in a few hours!”

One hour until they need to get downstairs. One hour and twenty-five minutes until it’s wedding time. Gibbs hears knocking at his door, and knows that this has to be the last of his side of the wedding party. Tony gets the door, and a moment later Tim and Jimmy are laying out boxes of flowers on the coffee table.

“Oh, I’ve got four Picasso calla lilies for the groomsmen. I’ve got one royal purple one for the Groom. I’ve got a white rose for Ducky. I’ve got a box of rose petals for whatever it is you guys want to do with them later,” Jimmy’s talking, and Tim puts that one in the little fridge to help keep them fresh.

“Flowers are delivered. Flower girl is downstairs, happily getting her hair done. Flower-girl-in-waiting has her own box of petals she’s tossing around. Second-runner-up-to-the-flower-girl-in-waiting was last seen being told to put the eyelash curler down, so I can report that our job is done, and everything is going just about the way you’d expect downstairs,” Tim adds.

“And your bride gave us this and told us to give it to you,” Jimmy says, giving Gibbs an envelope.

Gibbs opens it, and for a second he’s not sure what he’s looking at. A photograph, obviously. It’s supposed to mean something to him, but… And then it clicks and he feels the smile spread across his face. It’s the crime scene of the first case they worked together.
“From there to here, all the stops in between, and the steps not yet taken. Love you, Abbi.”

The hum of the airbrush dies down, and Breena says, “Okay, your skin is done.”

Abbi’s never had her makeup done with an airbrush before, but looking in the mirror, she’s thinking that Breena was right when she said, “Here, let me. I do more makeup in a week than you do all year, and when I do it, it stays put. Trust me, you’ll look like a million bucks when I’m done.”

Her skin is perfectly even, with just a light flush on her cheeks, and a very subtle sheen to her cheekbones.

“You’re glowing!” Abby adds. She gives Breena a hug. “Great job.”

Breena looks pleased with herself. “Yep! You want to do your eyes and lips, or shall I?”

Abbi keeps looking in the mirror. The Bride is taking shape before her, and she’s feeling… She’s not sure. Like she’s in unfamiliar territory. All of this last few days have been new terrain, and the sense of being even deeper into uncharted territory is palpable right now.

“What would you do if you did them?” Abbi asks.

“Pretty much what I did with your skin. Keep the style natural. Darken your lashes and brows. Add a little eyeliner, maybe a cat-eye if you like, that’d go with the way you’ve got your hair, nicely. Lips… up to you, we can go nude and glossy, or red and matte, or anything in between. I’ve got the whole Lip Tar line here, so I can mix you any color and texture you could imagine. Heck, if you want silver and purple, I can do that.”

“You’ve got the ‘40s glam hair going,” Abby says. “Breena could give you the whole look. Cat eye, classic red lip, do your best Lauren Bacall.”

Abbi thinks about it, as Breena gets up from her seat at the dressing table, and goes to take a good, long look at the wedding dress. It’s off the shoulders, with a fitted bodice, and a skirt made of hundreds of layers of light floaty fabric. No lace, no beads, no sparkles. Nothing to break the simple elegance of the cut. A line of pearls down the back, and a satin bow around the waist make for ‘ornaments.’ It’s graceful and elegant, in a light, cloud of fabric sort of way.

“You’re wearing the cloak instead of a veil?”

Abbi nods. When they got the cloak, thick white wool with a white fur trim, she didn’t know that the wedding, and the reception, and the getting ready, would all be in the same place. She’s not going outside again until tomorrow. It’s warm enough here that she doesn’t really need a cloak, but it does have a fur-trimmed hood, and it is somewhat veil shaped, and the look of it, the white dress, layer on top of layer of fine silk gauze, swathed in the cloak, is practically magic-snow-princess territory.

Breena’s seeing it in her mind. Then she turns back to Abbi. “Soft pink lip, pretty much your natural color, just a little gloss, maybe with a tiny bit of silver sheen. Mostly nude eye, just a little liner on the top lash line, and a subtle highlight on the brow bone. If you want to amp it up after the ceremony, I’ll keep the eyeliner handy. But right now, when you walk down that aisle, all wrapped in fluffy white, you’re going to look soft and flushed. Like you’ve been playing in the snow.”

Abbi can see the idea of it, and nods.
Breena sits in front of her and gets to it.

For My Wedding

Gibbs flips the collar of his shirt, and slips the tie around his neck.

It’s a bizarre sensation, both very familiar and somewhat new. He does this regularly, before Sunday church with the Slaters, when he goes out with Abbi on a ‘date night,’ so it shouldn’t be different, but it is.

He’s very aware of it. He’s feeling silk sliding against jacquard, the slight friction of one fabric against the other as his hands go through the motions of adjusting and tying his tie. He’s never been this aware of tying a tie. Or as he reaches for his jacket, the drape of it against his body.

He’s very present right now. Sniper level present. Time slows, stretching between right now and twenty minutes from now, when they’ll head downstairs to the ballroom, seat their guests, and then… a breath eases out of him, slow, steady, get married.

He doesn’t remember this happening the first time he got married. Doesn’t remember much of getting ready for the ceremony. Obviously, it happened. In that his bachelor party had been the night before, and it had involved a half-dozen twenty-year-old Marines, it’s possible part of him not having any clear memories of getting ready may have had something to do with the boatload of alcohol they’d downed the night before.

Enough to get toasted. Enough he was feeling awfully green in the morning. No so much he was still sick when his Dad stood in front of him, brushed an imaginary speck of lint off of his uniform, straightened an already level straight collar, and smiled at him.

That memory’s suddenly very clear. Jackson standing there, smiling, nodding. He took his watch off, the one his father gave him when he married Jethro’s mother, and then he took Jethro’s wrist and put it on him. He pulled Jethro into a hug, and his best man, Bill Marsh, got a picture of the two of them, or tried to, he ended up cutting their heads out of the shot. For everything Marsh could do, take a picture that didn’t have his thumb or less than half of the people in it, wasn’t on the list.

Gibbs is already wearing the watch. Usually, it’s invisible on his skin, noticed only in its absence. But right now, he feels it intently, and the weight of his father’s spirit. He can feel that smile again, and it doesn’t much matter to him if it’s really here, or not.

Fornell is in front of him, pinning his lily to his suit. Once it’s on, Fornell says to him, “This feels familiar.”

Gibbs cracks a smile at that. “Yeah, well…” Tobias had done that right before they headed down for his wedding to Diane. Franks was sprawled out on the sofa, sleeping off as much of the drunk as he could. Ducky was checking with the minister, making sure things were ready to go. Pride was… Gibbs doesn’t remember. He was at the bachelor party, and he was at the wedding party, so he must have been at the bits in between, but Gibbs doesn’t remember what he was doing.

Unlike marrying Shannon, he was drunk for that one. He thinks he made sure he had a drink at hand the whole way through. Not wasted or sloppy, or anything along those lines. Not so far gone that he did anything stupid or embarrassing (other than, of course, marrying Diane), just well enough toasted to shut down the part of his brain that knew he was doing something he shouldn’t.
He’s stone cold sober now. Fourth cup of coffee of the day, so he’s buzzing, but not a drop of alcohol. (That damn roaster. He’d been cutting back some, but suddenly he’s got all of these really tasty options and… Every other day he or Fornell comes up with another idea, and they’ve got to test all of them, and… Yeah, it hasn’t been good for keeping his coffee consumption in check.) Right now, everything is very clear, very slow, and very real.

Ducky’s reading over the speech he wrote up for the ceremony one last time, making sure he’s got it down cold.

Fornell and Tony are talking about Draga. Apparently, there’s been yet another development in the never-ending-custody-battle-of-doom. Kevin’s mother is getting married. Apparently, Kevin’s new step-dad to be doesn’t much want a kid with another dad around, and is trying to get the arrangement re-done so Kevin’s with Draga fulltime and just visits his mom. Draga’s good with this, but he’s scrambling around, looking for a new place. On the upside, the real estate market crashed, so he’s got options in his price range galore. On the downside, the schools are also upside down, so he’s not sure where he wants to be. But, compared to this time last year, when he was fighting just to get to see Kevin regularly, he’s on cloud nine.

Tim’s getting the sporran on his kilt properly. (This time it’s a nice, discreet, black leather pouch. No Mallard-heritage taxidermy hell.)

Jimmy’s tying his tie.

It’s almost time, and they’re almost ready.

The Bride is definitely staring back at Abbi as she looks in the mirror, now.

Breena got it right. Her makeup is soft, natural, and she does look a bit like she’s been out in the snow playing. (Or maybe going for a gentle stroll. After all, she’s not sweaty or disheveled, which is how she looks after actually playing in the snow.)

She goes to check her wrist, but she’s not wearing her watch. Somehow an MTM Special Forces Hypertech doesn’t exactly go with The Bride.

Ziva sees her doing it, and says, “Half an hour. Time to get dressed.”

“You want help?” Miranda asks.

Abbi waves that off. She’s been dressing herself for decades, getting into a pair of stockings and a dress (even a very fluffy one) isn’t that hard.

And so, she gets the room to herself. For a moment, she just walks around. Her dress and the cloak are hanging off the door to the bathroom. Her stockings, garter belt, panties, and bustier are all on the bed. Her shoes are in a box, sitting at the foot of the bed.

Silk and satin all around.

That sense of being deep in uncharted territory increases. She reaches for the first of the stockings, raunching it up on her hand, and then slipping it over her toe. Then she sighs. Garterbelt, that goes on first. She slips it over her hips, fastens it, and then finishes with the stocking.
A million hard things have defined Abbi’s life. And there’s not a single hard thing, literally hard, diamond hard, that she’s unwilling to tackle. Boots, leather, body armor, tanks, guns, sharp edges, stiff textures, rigid identities, bring ‘em on, she’s ready.

Swath yourself in hardness. Wrap steel, plastic, leather, and Kevlar around your body. Protect the soft and weak bits underneath from harm.

She remembers a moment with Gibbs, more than a year ago now, when they were making love, and it felt like her world was shifting. Like plates of armor were melting, rearranging themselves. She slips the second stocking on, feeling silk smooth nylon on her skin.

Nothing in this room is hard. There’s just her, skin and bones, heart and mind, wrapped in silk and satin, offering herself, naked, metaphorically, if not literally, to a man for the rest of her life.

And that’s the new territory. It’s not that the armor has shifted to let someone else in, it’s that right now, she’s taken it off. Right now, there’s just her, and all of the protections she carries in her mind and on her skin are gone.

It takes a few moments to finish dressing, and another moment to arrange the dress, making sure the layers all fall correctly, but once done, she takes the time to look at herself in the mirror. Her back is straight, shoulders back, posture tall and strong. Military.

But this is a wedding. It’s a place for lovers, not warriors. She shifts, just a little, not so much a changing of her physical body, she’s still tall and strong, but there’s another layer there, elegance, grace. Silk to go with the steel. Then she picks up her bouquet, a mix of Picasso Calla Lilies, white lilies, purple lilies, royal purple roses, crystal accents, and silver ribbons.

Today, she’s not The Director, nor The General. She’s The Bride, or… though she doesn’t think it, not until she hears Molly gasp it, a few seconds later when she steps out, The Queen.

“We ready?” Jimmy says a second before both his and Tim’s phones buzz. Everyone looks dressed, and just sitting around up here is boring.

They both check their phones and find a picture from Breena. There are three little girls, all in purple dresses. Molly and Kelly, who both have long enough hair, have a spray of tiny white flowers threaded through their hair. Anna’s flowers are just in a circle sat on top of her head. All three of them are each holding her own Picasso lily, and Molly’s got her little basket of petals for flower-girling.

They’re all staring at Abbi, eyes wide with adoration.

Abbi’s kneeling between them, dress and cloak flowing around her like a white cloud, holding her bouquet of lilies and roses.

And Tim and Jimmy more or less coo. In a restrained, manly sort of way.

Tony’s hovering close, about to look, but not sure if he should. Jimmy nods. “You, Fornell, and Ducky can see it. Sorry, Gibbs, it’ll spoil the surprise.”

“Yeah. We’ll show you in an hour.”
Gibbs knows, in general, what they’ve got to be looking at, but he restrains himself from peaking.

Though he wants to.

The knock on the door surprises the members of team Groom. Everyone who is supposed to be up here is up here. Tony’s flashing all of them a we’re not missing anyone, right? look as he answers it.

Diane’s at the door. She’s dressed in a pretty red dress, and looks ready to enjoy the party.

“Jethro, Tobias,” she smiles at the rest of them, but it’s clear she’s there to see the two of them. “Can I get…?” Diane says as she heads into the Groom’s nook. The rest of the party looks at her, and begins to file out.

Tobias looks like he’s about to, also, but she grabs his wrist, stopping him, holding his gaze with hers.

After a moment, it’s just the three of them.

She looks at Gibbs and Fornell, and shakes her head at both of them. “A lot of years.”

Gibbs nods, and Fornell says, “Yeah.”

Diane steps closer, wrapping an arm around each of them, and kissing each one on the cheek.

There’s a moment of tension, but Gibbs feels his arm stretch out, wrapping around her back, and his fingers brush Fornell’s hand, already on Diane’s back. They pull Diane in closer, and hold her for a moment.

Gibbs kisses her cheek, and gives Fornell a little squeeze.

Fornell chuckles, and rolls his eyes a little, but he keeps the hug going.

Diane snuggles in between them, and for another moment, the embrace holds, and then she steps back, breaking the hug, carefully wiping her eyes.

Diane nods, “Okay.” She smiles at both of them. “Here. You’ll need it. And none of your boys will remember it.” She hands Gibbs a handkerchief. “It’ll be good to see some happy tears from you.”

Then she turns and leaves, going down to join her date, Emily, and Drew with the rest of the guests.

Once she’s gone, Fornell says, “You know, when she does it for real, finds a man she actually loves, we’re both gonna give her away.”

Gibbs chuckles a bit at that, and smiles, looking forward to it.

With Gibbs and Tobias doing some time with Diane, the rest of Team Groom decides to head down and check out the location.

Jimmy’s telling them the story of trying to get Alan a seat for this damn thing, muttering about how the chair bunting better be made from unicorn hair and angel feathers, given how big a pain in the ass it was getting another of them.
Once they enter the ceremony space, Jimmy stops complaining. He nods, slowly. “Okay… Yeah, that was worth it.”

It’s a simple design. Three concentric circles of chairs. On one side, the circle is broken by an aisle. On the other, there’s a spot for the photographer. In the center, there’s just a space. No altar, no candles, no… stuff. Nothing to clutter up this moment, or distract away from what it is. Just a place for two people to join each other in love, and for the man who will offer a few words to keep the ceremony moving.

Those chairs, each one is draped in a soft, matte satin silver fabric, with a royal purple bow tied around the back. They do look nice, and yes, if a folding chair had just been shoved into place, it’d look beyond tacky.

Looking around, Jimmy’s nodding. Tony looks like he approves. And Tim says, “We ever redo our vows, something like this?”

Jimmy nods at that, too. One of these days, when the kids are old enough to understand and be part of it, and maybe, who knows… maybe it’ll be legal, but even if it isn’t… One of these days, standing up with their whole family to renew their vows… Be surrounded by their loves as they say the words. Yeah, he likes that idea.

People have been coming in and out of Team Bride’s rooms pretty much since five minutes after they got here, so one more knock on the door… No biggie.

Half of the crew doesn’t know the Asian man standing at the door in the nice blue suit, but Ziva’s met him before.

“Omagi!” She greets him.

He smiles at her. “Hey, DiNozzo. I wanted to stop in before everything started. Can’t let my old partner go get married without a hug, first.”

Abbi hears the voices, and steps out from the bedroom, where she’s been waiting, with somewhat less than perfect patience for one of the guys to send the text telling them it’s time to get moving.

“Tell me you’re not here on work!”

He looks concerned for a second, like he’s about to give her bad news, and then breaks into a huge grin. “Nah! Come here.”

She does, and he looks her up and down, and then nods. “It suits you.”

“Thanks.”

He holds his arms wide, and she steps in, enjoying the embrace. “You ready?”

She nods at that. “Yeah, I am.”

He steps back, looking at her, another smile on his face. “Yeah, you are. Okay, Lucy’s downstairs getting us seats. See you on the other side, Boss.”

She fires off a quick, two fingered salute to him, and he grins at her, before heading downstairs.
There’s not a whole lot of ushering for this shindig. Tim’s feeling a bit like he and the rest of the crew are there mostly as a welcome wagon. None of them are guiding people to seats, though they are saying hello, taking congratulations, offering hugs, and posing for a lot of selfies/photos.

He sends the shot of Gibbs, Tony, Fornell, Leon, Pride, and Callen up to Abby with Legends of NCIS as the tagline.

Delphine and Senior stop by to say hello to them, before asking where team bride was. They want to head up and say hello to everyone, too. (Though, a moment before heading up, when Senior notices Sam and Alan coming in, holding hands, he looks over to Jimmy and says, “Was this what you meant by complicated?” It takes Jimmy a moment to remember that, and then say, “Half of it.”)

Tim and Jimmy get a moment to gossip briefly about Sam’s Alan. They only get a few words with him, but his accent says BOSTON in all capitals, though his dark skin, deep brown eyes, and wavy black hair makes Tim think of Hawaii. The two of them holding hands makes Jimmy smile, along with the rather proud tone of voice when Sam introduces him, “Jimmy, this is Alan. Alan, this is Jimmy, here, and Dr. Palmer, at work.” Jimmy offers him a smile, and says, “I hope to see more of you.” Alan seems pleased by that, and more pleased by Sam.

Tim gets a shot of Brian and Elaine all dressed up for the party. They look like they’re planning on having a great time.

Breena’s parents are a few minutes behind, and they wrap Gibbs in a huge, congratulatory hug, before also asking where the girls are. Jimmy tells them, and pulls them aside to show off the picture of the girls. Even Ed coos at it.

For all the guests, and all the greeting, they aren’t doing much seating.

Gibbs and Abbi decided not to bother with sides. They’ve got fewer than fifty people coming to this, and so many of them overlap between the two of them, that the idea of sorting people into sides didn’t seem like much of a plan. This is one family, coming together to celebrate, and the seating makes that clear.

The clock ticks down, and Tim hears a high-pitched voice calling out “Daddy!”

A few seconds later he scoops up Kelly, who is holding her very own flower. A few steps behind is Abby. Both of them are in long purple dresses. Abby’s is a halter top with an empire waist, flowing down to her toes. Kelly’s is shorter, only coming to her shins, and the top is regency style, but the color matches. She’s got a wreath of baby’s breath and little silver sparkles in her hair. Her mother has her hair in a Hollywood ‘40s glam style. Black and purple flow down her shoulders in sensuous waves. Her makeup matches, blood red lips, dark, dark lashes. She’s every goth-pinup fantasy he’s ever had.

Tim hugs both of them, kissing Abby. His eyes find Breena, who’s in the same dress Abby is, though her hair is up in a French twist, and her makeup is softer, pinks and a smoky eye. She and Anna are getting hugs and kisses from Jimmy. He says it to Abby, but makes sure Breena knows he’s talking to all of them, as he says, “I’m the luckiest damn man alive. God! Look at you! Gorgeous!”

Abby grins at him, and spins around, showing off the whole look. “Almost ready to go?”

“Almost,” Tim says.
Abby sees Gibbs standing by the door, saying hello to a few of Abbi’s Marines.

“Almost.” He watches Abby head over to Gibbs, and give him a huge hug. There are tears in her eyes as she says, “I’m so happy for you!”

Gibbs eyes are awfully bright as he nods back at her, and bends his head to snuggle in for a long, all-encompassing Abby hug.

Breena peeks in at the guests and, does a quick head count, all 45 of them are accounted for. She sends a quick text to Abbi, letting her know it’s go time. Then she opens the doors. “Okay, Gibbs, time to go.”

He nods at Breena, and then he and Ducky take the first steps into his wedding.

They take their place in the center, and wait.

Fornell and Wendy, walking together, holding hands, follow them. Tony and Ziva follow them. Tim gets to escort Abby to her seat, and they sit next to each other, with Kelly, who did not want to miss this, on Abby’s lap. They’re followed by Jimmy and Breena and Anna. Miranda and Drew follow.

Only three seats left in the inner circle.

There’s another moment of waiting, of staring at the currently closed door.

Pachabel's Cannon in D Major

The music starts, the doors open, and Molly, in her little purple dress, with her ringlet curls threaded through the white flower crown in her hair, starts off, looking very determined, carefully dropping white and violet rose petals on the rug.

Breena’s kneeling at the edge of the aisle running, thumbs up to Molly, smiling at her, and when Molly sees her Mommy, she grins big, and begins to move faster, dropping flower petals with abandon.

When she gets to the end of the aisle, she gets a kiss from her Pop, and a kiss from her Ducky, and then she goes to sit with her Mommy and Daddy, too.

Two seats left.

Everyone stands up. Jeff and Becky open the doors, and Abbi steps into the room, her parents at her sides.

Gibbs feels his world narrow and breath hitch. He feels space collapse and expand. There’s no space between them now, and much too long before she’s before him, holding his hands.

It’s a slow song, but a short walk, and then Abbi’s there, before him, not yet holding his hands. Right now, she’s holding her bouquet, and her parents are still standing next to her, each with an arm around her.

Ducky says to her parents, “Who brings this woman to the place of matrimony?”

“We do,” Jeff and Becky manage in more or less unison.
“And do you offer your blessing and support to this union, vowing to do what you can to help your daughter, and now son, to live a life full of love and happiness with each other?”

“We do.”

“Thank you.”

Both of Abbi’s parents hug and kiss her, and then they step back, taking the last two open chairs in the inner circle. Abbi turns, handing her flowers to her sister, and then faces Gibbs, offering him her hands.

He takes them, grinning at her, feeling her hands shake, and his, too. He’s unable to produce anything even nearly approaching a serious face. She grins back at him, and he leans forward for a quick kiss.

That gets a little chuckle, and then Ducky begins. “Dearly beloved…” Ducky pauses there, and smiles. “That’s generally how these things start, isn’t it? But that’s often boilerplate, a collection of syllables designed to indicate something traditional is starting. It could, usually, just as well be the sound of a gong going off for all those sounds mean.

“And yet, I look at this collection of people here today, and think of the history, the lives, the experiences, both good and bad, that have bound this group together, and I think those words are more fitting than is often the case.

“So, let us begin again, aware that this is a group that is dear, and beloved, and hold those feelings in our hearts as we begin this.” He smiles at Penny, eyes especially bright, and then the rest of the crowd, before continuing. “Dearly beloved, we are gathered here today to mark the joining of Abigail Borin and Leroy Jethro Gibbs in marriage.

“Traditionally, the vows are to love, honor, and cherish, all three of them in their verb form. We understand, readily, that a marriage is a commitment to the act of loving, honoring, and cherishing one another.

“But as I think about it, marriage is an honor in its noun form, too. You start this journey together with your beloved honoring you with their life, their home, their trust, adoration, and protection. The ring we bind these vows with, it’s a medal in its own right.” Ducky holds up his own left hand, showing off the ring Penny placed on him. He gently strokes it, saying, “This tiny circle is the mark of winning the highest honor another person can give you. The chance to become one: one life, one love, one home.

“And the job of being married is living up to that honor. The job is to be worthy of the ring placed upon your finger, and the job of us, here, watching this exchange of vows, is to help support these people we love in that endeavor.

“So, before Jethro and Abigail exchange their vows, I would ask all of us here to take a moment to pledge to yourselves that you will help foster this relationship. That you will nurture this love, and encourage the kind of behavior that lives up to the honor that Abbi and Gibbs are offering each other.”

Ducky pauses for a moment, and Tim wonders if Gibbs asked him for that. Or if Ducky, having seen that that’s the unspoken gift they’ve offered each other, since Jimmy and Breena got married, decided it was time to say it out-loud.

Either way, he approves. He pledges himself to it, kissing Abby, able to brush Breena’s hand with the one he’s got wrapped around Abby’s waist, and then he nuzzles Kelly, and uses that to get a quick look in at Jimmy, too, catching his eye for a second. He will live up to the honor they’ve given him. He sees that Jimmy’s rubbing his wedding rings with his thumb, and Tim squeezes his hand, feeling the ring Abby placed on him. He can’t touch the tattoos, but he can twist his wrist a bit, feeling the leather band the three of them bought for him. Feel the marks they’ve placed on him, the honor offered, and his own cherishing of those honors.

To my last breath.

“Thank you,” Ducky says, after a moment of silence. “Neither Gibbs nor Abbi wanted anything long and drawn out, and though I may have a reputation for liking to hear myself talk, some things are sweeter in brevity, so, as they say, ‘let’s get this show on the road.’ Jethro?”

All attention’s on him, and it’s time to speak, but for a heartbeat, Gibbs’ mouth feels dry. Like he can’t possibly put this into words. There aren’t words, never have been, just actions, and one breath to the next, and life poured over all those things. Or maybe all of those things come together to make life, or at least make it worth living.

But for right now, there have to be words. There’s a magic to this, and he needs to cast the spell, and the spell needs words.

He clears his throat, feeling choked up, and then begins, voice thick with emotion.

“All the times, and done this too many. And maybe I did need someone to whack me upside the back of the head with a golf club,”—Diane sniggers a bit at that—“but eventually, I got it. I hope.” He’s looking deep into her eyes, pausing, and then brushes her cheek with his fingertips, “Abbi, I love you.” And that gets another kiss. When he pulls back, he smiles at her again.

“It’s a pretty feeling. Lights me up inside, makes me feel happy, and right, and whole. But it’s got to be more than pretty feelings. I’ve done the pretty feelings, too many times, too. Pretty feelings come and pretty feelings go, and I can’t be the man who floats around on them when things are easy, and runs away when they get hard.

“It’s got to come from change and lead to change.

“So, that’s it. The promise. I will be the better man. I will be worthy of your love, and your home, and your life.

“I will be your partner. I will have eyes on your six. I will defend you, your heart, and your home.

“I will cherish you, and support you, and build a life with you that we both adore.

“Easy times, hard times, start of the day until the end. I will be here, with you, to ride whatever’s left of this road.

“I love you.” His voice shakes on that, and he kisses her again, feeling so sure of himself and everything he’s just said. Then he feels Fornell tap his wrist. A second later, he’s holding the ring he made for her, wood and a tiny clasp. His love of her, wrought by his own hand, for her to wear forever. He takes her hand, slips off her engagement ring, setting the wood band around it, and replaces it, now whole, on her hand.
Abbi’s grinning at him, crying a little, and he is, too, but it feels too good to keep in, too real to hide behind a stoic face.

Abbi reaches up, cupping the back of his head, and offering him another kiss before she begins her vows.

“They say love is patient, and kind, that it is not jealous. That it keeps no record of wrongs, nor is it self-seeking. So, I know the path to stay on, and the easy pitfalls to avoid.

“But I know I’m going to make mistakes. I know there will be times when easy wins over right. But, I promise though, I will learn from them, move forward, and return to a life with you. Always return to you. We hit rough spots, or the world outside goes crazy, and I will always, no matter what, return to you.”

He can see her, dirty, tattered clothing, rifle in her arms, riding literal shotgun after the Fall of DC, coming home, to him, and he’s fairly sure, she’s seeing it, too.

“No matter what, at the end of the day, end of the mission, I will always return to you.”

She steps a little closer, laying her hand on his chest, only a few inches away from where the bullet he took for her stopped. “I will respect you, knowing that you are strong enough to carry me and my hurts and fears, and I will protect you, offer you my strength to carry you and yours.

“I will honor you.

“I will cherish you.

“And I will love you, for all the days of my life.”

Gibbs is tearing up, feeling his eyes burn and the smile on his lips, his voice is low, shaking a bit, but he doesn’t care, right now the words are flowing, soft, easy, and he means them so much. “I love you.” Maybe it didn’t exactly go there in their carefully planned out vows, but he’s feeling it, and Abbi’s smiling at him like all the joy in the world lives in his skin, and really, that wraps it all up.

Beginning, middle, and end, that’s why they’re here. Love is a noun and a verb, and with that as his core, he can be the better man. Be the man worthy of her.

She slips the ring onto his hand, and there, carrying the soft weight of wood and mother of pearl on his finger, Gibbs is whole again.

He can feel it, in a way he didn’t know he was missing.

What had he told Mike? The only thing he ever wanted to be was a good Marine, a good husband, and a good father.

He swallows hard. He can see his kids watching him, and the woman in front of him, and he’s crying and laughing and kissing Abbi. She kisses back, snags the handkerchief from his pocket, and wipes his eyes, wipes hers too, and after a quick nod, they go back to looking at Ducky, who, grinning from ear to ear, says, “I now pronounce you husband and wife.”

And with that, they kiss again.
After the ceremony, the guests are ushered into the Omni’s small ballroom.

It’s ready for a party.

Leon’s smiling as he’s looking around. “New Year’s and a wedding.”

Lara smiles back at him, approving of the job Gibbs and Ziva did in setting this up. Six tables, all set with dark purple and silver linens, each one with a mirror in the center, and a collection of candles in violet and silver glasses flickering away. The mirror reflects the candle glow, doubling the effect of what appears to be hundreds of pillar and votives. The rest of the lighting is soft, washes of white and violet painting the walls in their colors. Top and bottom of the walls, and draping around the windows, there thousands of flickering Christmas lights.

There are no flower centerpieces, which Leon approves of. He likes to be able to see and talk to whomever he’s sitting with. But at each place setting, on top of the main plate, there’s a tiny bowl with a white or purple rose floating in it.

There’s a dance floor, and behind it is a DJ. He’s got what Leon thinks of as ‘mingle’ music going. The volume is low, it’s fast enough to not encourage dancing, and bland enough that should anyone have a great Aunt Mildred or the like lurking about, her delicate sensibilities would not be ruffled.

Over the course of a long career as a public servant, Leon’s heard about a million hours of mingle music, and he’s hoping it won’t last all that long through this wedding.

Lara tugs him toward the cake, which has its own table, near the bar. It’s a traditional three-tiered cake, but the shape is square, and as best as he can describe it, it’s got a base of dark purple frosting (“Fondant,” Lara calls it.) with lacy-looking silver accents. Then from one of the corners of each tier, there’s a drape of more fondant, designed to look like a swath of silver fabric, swooping from the corner to the base, leaving half the cake draped, and half bare purple. On top, instead of the traditional bride and groom, there are two, entwined silver hearts.

It’s pretty. Very cake-like. Lara’s impressed, but he’s just not a cake guy.

The appetizers that are being carried through… Just like Leon’s heard a million hours of mingle music, he’s eaten a truck load of generic appetizers designed to feed the maximum number of people for the minimum number of dollars.

These are, only in their size and the fact they’re being carried around on trays and offered to guests, not akin to those appetizers. Lara’s got bacon wrapped scallop. He’s nibbling a minty-curried lamb chop and enjoying it very much as the bar gets his attention.

It’s probably a very good thing that no one’s driving anywhere tonight. In addition to it being New Year’s, so all the maniacs will be out, and likely drunk, the fact that Gibbs and Abbi set this up to match their own tastes means that the bar here is stocked.

His lady by his side, arm wrapped around her waist, Leon contemplates a tasting menu of twelve kinds of bourbon.

And coffee.

He’s not sure how they got this set up, but… It’s a coffee and bourbon bar. Any sort of caffeine you could want is waiting to be whipped up for you. From a standard black as sin in a mug, to the fluffy, spicy, crème de menthe spiked thing with shaved chocolate on top that Lara’s sipping, you name the coffee, and they’re making it.
Pride sidles up next to him, munching on what Leon thinks is some sort of kabob, also eyeing the bourbons.

“You feel like Mike Franks is about to walk through those doors and order at least a shot of everything?” Leon asks.

Pride, getting his glass, takes a sip, and says, “You ever hear of the angel’s share?”

Leon raises an eyebrow, and Lara says, “Tell us more.

Callen sidles up. He knows what he wants and orders it, succinctly. “The angel’s share? You mean the alcohol that evaporates off?”

“Exactly.” Pride says. “When they make it in wooden barrels, some absorbs into the wood, some evaporates. Supposedly that’s the angel’s share. And somehow, when I think of the angel that gets that share, I’ve got a Mike Franks sort of image in my mind.”

Leon chuckles at that. Mike Franks with wings and a halo tickles him to no end, if for no other reason than he can hear Mike saying, “Good Lord! Get me out of this ridiculous get-up!” He chuckles at that, and begins to tell Lara some of the less risqué (okay, flat out illegal) Mike Franks stories, with Pride happily adding his own adventures with Franks, as well.

Pictures. A million pictures.

They bring the kids down for that. And, for the most part little guys are okay with having their photos taken with their various aunts, uncles, parents, and grandparents.

And it’s awfully nice to get a shot of all of them together, all dressed up.

But the one that Gibbs loves the best is Abbi on her own. She’s in her dress and cloak, wrapped up in flowing white, looking beyond the camera to him, a warm smile on her face.

He knows when the photographer gets the shot that’s going to go in his wallet. The one he’ll carry with him until the end of his days.

A bit later, when all the girls are getting a group shot, Tim steps near to Gibbs, claps a hand on his shoulder and says, “You nailed ‘em.”

Gibbs smiles, pleased. He nods long and slow.

Tony sees what they’re up to and he gives Gibbs a little pat on the back of the head and says, “Attaboy!”

The photographer thinks he’s just getting a shot of part of the wedding party, and Tim’s fine with that. He probably assumes that two of them are siblings, or something like that. He doesn’t need to know why he’s getting a shot of Jimmy, Breena, Tim, and Abby, all together. They know, and that’s more than enough. He’s the tallest, so he’s furthest back, one arm around Jimmy (looks friendly, hand on his shoulder) Abby’s in front, and just to the right of him, so he’s got an arm around her waist, too. Breena’s in front, between Jimmy and Abby. Jimmy’s got his arms around her, which means he’s also got his hand pressed to Abby’s hip.

They’re smiling for the camera, and Tim says, under his breath, lips barely moving, “’Til my last breath.”

His loves smile just that little extra bit brighter in that shot.

The grab the kiddos for the next shot. The adults sit on the floor. Tim and Jimmy are kneeling in the back. Abby and Breena sitting on the floor in front of them. Molly and Kelly, the big girls, get to stand next to their mamas’, each one with one of their daddy’s hands around their waist. Anna’s sitting between Abby and Breena. Sean’s in Abby’s lap, and Breena’s holding Donnie.

And it only takes what feels like 65,000 shots to get one where all of them are looking in the general direction of the camera.

But they do get that one shot, and Tim loves it.

When every possible combination of all of them have been shot in every possible pose, it’s finally time to get on with the party.

Gibbs is waiting outside the door to the ballroom with Abbi, for their grand entrance. It’s the first time the two of them have been alone all day.

He’s feeling giddy with everything, and a huge grin on his face he says, “Hi.”

She starts to laugh in response. It’s just so damn silly. “Hi.”

Breena and Jimmy open the doors, and the DJ says, “For the first time in public MR. and MRS. BORIN-GIBBS!”

Abbi’s startled by that for a moment, Gibbs grins at her, kisses her, and then takes her hand, pulling her into the ballroom, where their friends and family are cheering.

“The Way You Look Tonight” begins, and with it their first dance. They’re swaying along, and Abbi quietly asks him “Borin-Gibbs, you didn’t…”

He shakes his head. He didn’t change his name, too, but he also didn’t want this to be a mirror of his wedding to Diane or Shannon. And, he could get into the deeper stuff, or the changes he needs in his own head, but… He doesn’t need to. “It mattered.”

She nods at him, getting it. “Okay.”

He’s looking down at her, watching her so intently, trying to burn every second of this into his memory. “You’re beautiful.”

She smiles up at him, fingers caressing his suit. “Cleaned up good, yourself, too.”

He pulls her close, her cheek to his, and for a moment, they sway together, feeling the music, the motion of the dance, and their bodies close. Gibbs’ fingers entwine with hers, and he gives her left hand a little squeeze, feeling her wedding band there.
He kisses her again, and she kisses back. “Husband.”

He shivers a little, feeling that word, back, where it belongs, with him. “Wife.”

She nods at him, eyes warm, flirty. “This day ‘til our last.”

He kisses her again, and again, and the song rolls on.

You Got It

The second song opens the dancefloor to everyone else, and if Gibbs had remembered this song existed, he likely would have suggested it for their wedding song, but… he didn’t, so he didn’t.

That said, “You Got It” from Roy Orbison is a great wedding song.

As soon as Roy Orbison began warbling away with, “Anything you want, you got it, Anything you need, you got it, Anything at all, baaaabyyy!” Gibbs does remember this song, and he’s liking it.

He’s full face grinning at Abbi as they dance, light on his feet, bubbling with joy, and she’s got her head back, laughing as he dips her low.

He’s singing along, when he pulls her back up, dancing cheek to cheek, and she’s holding him tight.

“I live my life to be with you

“No one can do the things you do

“Anything you want, you got it

“Anything you need, you got it

Tim’s happily dancing with Abby, Kelly in their arms between them. He can see Penny and Ducky a few feet away, swaying to the song. Jimmy’s dancing with Molly, and Breena’s bopping with Anna in her arms right next to him. Gibbs and Abbi are in the middle of the dancefloor. The Fornells are cutting the proverbial rug. Tony and Ziva have the moment to themselves and are enjoying it, Dave is dancing with his Poppa and Gran. Apparently, and this surprises Tim, but Ed can really dance. He’s leading Jeannie around with panache. Tim figures he must have seen that back at Jimmy and Breena’s wedding, but he doesn’t remember it. Elaine and Brian are boogieing down. Bleach and his wife have rolled on over and are happily scooting along to Roy. Abbi’s parents have a corner of the dancefloor and are happily using it, next to Miranda and Drew. Sarah and Glenn are showing off their moves. Sam and Alan are looking a little unsure, but it’s possible this is their first dance ever, but unsure or not, they appear to be having a good time. Emily and Drew are not looking unsure, at all. Both of them are grinning like grins were invented specifically for them, and for this moment of their lives. Diane and her... Tim knows he should know the name of her date, he’s on this side of the country because of Tim, but all he’s got in his head is Western Accountant, look like they’re having a good time. Leon and Lara are dancing close and sure. Omagi and his wife are giggling as they try to dance, off-footed, but enjoying it. And it looks like Pride has talked one of Abbi’s Marines onto the dancefloor.

It’s almost perfect. He and Abby get a bit closer to Jimmy and Breena. They aren’t exactly dancing with each other, but they can hold eye contact, and synchronize a bit.

As they get to the last verse, Kelly wants to get down. They let her down, and she takes Molly’s hand, and from there… Well, if the girls are dancing together with Jimmy… Tim takes Abby’s hand, and she takes Jimmy’s, Breena joins them, and for a moment at least, they get to dance, together, hands joined and the three girls giggling and wiggling between them.

“Anything you want/you got it

“Anything you need/you got it

“Anything at all/you got it

“Babyyyyyyyy…”

Dinner is, of course, steak. There are some greens, and some rather tasty baked potatoes, but mostly it’s steak. Big, beautiful, wood-fire cooked steaks. (Present from the bride’s parents.)

This is not a wedding for the vegetarian-minded.

Nor the calorie conscious dieter.

But, for a night, everyone’s okay with a little (lot) of indulging.

Tim wonders, idly, how they got 45 steaks, cooked to order, all at once, but he’s not willing to ask any of the servers. There is food, it’s good, and in front of him. And for right now, the kiddos are contentedly messing around with their dinners, so he’s got a minute or two to enjoy his steak, without having to play goalie for the food games of toddlers.

He leans back, chewing, hand on Abby’s back, watching his loves, as Breena talks to Sarah about the ins and outs of embalming, while Ducky and Jimmy adds bits and bobs from their perspective. At any other table that’d be a grim topic, but here… Sarah’s working on a story of her own right now, and it’s set in a fantasy world where the dead have risen, and up and at ’em again, they want to look as good as possible. Tim’s not sure if a story about a group of ladies who work at a beauty parlor catering to Zombies will sell, but… Hey, he’s just a writer, not a publisher.

He chuckles a little as he thinks about that, looking around him. Sarah and Glenn are having a blast. It’s their first night out on their own since Nick was born. Ducky and Penny are talking animatedly, and holding hands. Abby’s at his left hand, Sean in her lap, and on her left is Kelly. On his right is Jimmy, who’s got Donnie in his arms right now. Breena’s the next one in their circle, giving Jimmy a bite of her steak as he bounces Donnie, with Anna next to her, and Molly one seat down.

The McGees, (almost) all together.

“It feels different, doesn’t it?” Tony asks Tim and Jimmy as the three of them are at the bar, relaxing with drinks, as their wives dance with the kids.

“Tony?” Jimmy says.

“This wedding.” He nods to Senior, who’s on the dancefloor with Delphine. “I’ve married Dad off, three, four times, something like that. You were… when your mom got married again…” He’s looking at Jimmy.

“I don’t exactly remember. Not long before Breena and I got together. So… say 32.”

“Tim?”

“Twenty-eight, and I gave mine away, and yeah, it’s different.”

And it is. This feels markedly different from standing around in his tux at his mom’s wedding. It wasn’t bad, and he’s actually got some fairly good memories of that time. But it’s not this.

Tony’s looking thoughtful. “This matters more. I mean… I’m glad Dad found Delphine, but if they hadn’t met, hadn’t married, nothing would have changed. I wouldn’t have missed it. But I think, if we’d lived in a world without Abbi, or if they just hadn’t crossed paths again… I’d have missed this. I wouldn’t have known to, because… I mean… Shit, how much have I drunk?” He stares at his scotch, but it’s only the second one of the night, and he’s only a tablespoon into it, so he’s pleasantly buzzed, but not drunk.

Jimmy laughs at that, sipping his own drink. (Gin and diet tonic. He’d tried to get a mojito, but bourbon-land was apparently not set up for that). “Not that much. And I know what you mean. Obviously, we wouldn’t have known, but it wouldn’t be right without this.”

Tim nods, too. He’s watching his Dad and Abbi sway in the center of the dance floor. “He needs her, and this life, to be happy, and we want him to be happy. We’ve been here for pretty much every step of this, cheering them on, wanting it to work, wanting both of them to get the happily ever after. I met Ben, my step-dad, once before they got married. I wasn’t invested in it, because I was never really part of it. I mean, if they’d had broken up, I’d have been sad for my mom, but it wouldn’t have really touched me. But this… Think about it, until the kids start bringing their own loves home, we’re done. Everyone who’s going to be joining our family is here.”

All three of them feel that moment. Their whole family, is, for the moment, settled.

______________________________

Tony’s favorite shot of the night comes a moment later. The one that will go up behind his desk at work, he’ll use it as his wallpaper on his phone, and carries in his heart. It’s him, and Ziva, dancing, with Dave between them.

She’s holding Dave, in his little black baby tux, and he’s got his arms around them, holding them both. She’s looking up at him, and he’s looking down at her, and the child they made together, while said child grabs his tie in his tiny hands, trying to gnaw on it.

He’ll have a wet spot on his tie in just about all the rest of the wedding photos, because a second after that shot is taken, Dave succeeds in getting the tie into his mouth, but he wouldn’t have it any other way.
Tim stands behind Abby, who’s holding Sean. He’s got his chin on her shoulder, and his arm around her and their boy. Kelly’s standing between them, holding his and Abby’s hands

“Cake!”

“Soon, Kelly, see…” The caterer is wheeling the cake into position in front of Gibbs and Abbi.

“They’re going to cut the cake, and then we get to have some,” Abby says, keeping a firm grip on their daughter.

Kelly has two favorite parts of this wedding, her flower, which are made of silk, and she’s been flinging about with reckless abandon. (Which is why it’s silk and not a real flower. When she got to see Molly’s job for the wedding, Kelly decided she could throw flowers just as well as anyone.) And, the cake. She’s been eyeing it all night. And four times already she has been swooped up by one adult or another as she’s been edging closer and closer trying to get some frosting before the cake cutting.

And now, finally, as Abbi and Gibbs grab the cake cutter, and slice through the middle layer, it’s CAKE TIME!

Everyone laughs and claps as they cut the cake, feeding each other bites of it. Kelly loudest of all.

After kissing Abbi, and both of them chewing their bite of cake, Gibbs turns to the girls, and wiggles his finger. All three of them come running (toddling) to him, drawn by the irresistible pull of yummy, yummy sugar.

Gibbs kneels down to offer them each a little piece, and the girls are over the moon.

And their parents absolutely adore the shot the photographer gets of it. Gibbs is on his knees, Abbi behind him, hand on his shoulder, handing him little, dice-sized bites of cake, and he’s offering them to the girls, each one in her own, tiny, royal purple dress.

Once the cake is cut, taking it to the back, disassembling it, and putting it on plates takes time, and this seems like a splendid break in the party to take kids up to bed.

The kids all get their goodnight kisses from the various adults, and then, with something of a spring in their step, Tim and Abby, Jimmy and Breena, and Tony and Ziva hand little guys off to Heather and Keith, and finally get to the part of the party where they’re only responsible for themselves.

As the elevator is slowly wandering its way back up to their floor, Tim says to Abby, “We left something back in the room.”

Jimmy and Breena and Tony and Ziva all roll their eyes.

“That’s the worst line ever!” Tony says.

Tim looks over to Abby, “You minding?”
“Nope!” She grins. “Let’s go find that thing!”

All six of them laugh, and Tim glances around, no one else is up there, so he kisses Breena and Jimmy, saying, “We’ll find your thing later tonight,” and then swoops up Abby, fireman carry style, and takes her back to their room.

She’s giggling in his arms, and he kisses her, feeling light and happy all over.

It’s only two dozen steps to their door, and they don’t bother even thinking of going to the bedroom. Right there, next to the door, an inch away from anyone who may be walking through the hallway is just fine.

“We can’t miss cake!” Abby says, hand trailing up the inside of his thigh, as she kicks off one of her shoes.

He looks her up and down, eyes hot, attitude cocky, dropping to his knees, hands on her hips, pulling her skirt up. “I’ll get you there in time.”

She leans down, kisses him, sucking his tongue, before straightening up, draping her leg over his shoulder. “Don’t I know it!”

And seven minutes later, with a minute and a half to spare, they are back at their seats. Tim’s hair is a bit fluffier than it was before, like, say, just possibly someone had her fingers clenched in it, and an observant person might notice that his sporran isn’t exactly dead center anymore, but said observant person would also likely notice how pleased with each other and the world in general both of the McGees seem to be right now.

There are two flavors of cake. Most of it is chocolate with a coffee glaze and coffee frosting. But one layer is vanilla with raspberry, because certain people, like Abby and the girls, are not huge coffee fans.

Tim, having had a bite of both, is pleased to report both options are excellent. In fact, he’s so pleased that, when Jimmy skips his piece, he throws himself upon the metaphorical grenade and finishes it for him.

Cake is served. It’s good, and there’s not a single crumb of it on Fornell’s plate, testifying to how good it was. And there’s a collection of wait people circling around, filling glasses with champagne.

Which means it’s about time to swing into action. When he sees the guests all have drinks, (Including Emily and Drew. He’s not sure if he should be irked at that or not, and decides on not because they’re staying at the hotel tonight, not driving home.) Fornell whacks his glass with his wedding ring a few times, and eventually, that gets everyone’s attention.

He stands up, holding his champagne glass, and starts, “Apparently, about a minute after getting engaged, it occurred to Jethro that he needed someone to marry him, and a best man. And a minute after that Ducky and I had jobs. Now, for the most part, I’m ready and willing to best man like a world beater, I plan bachelor parties the same way Montgomery planned D-Day, but right now, this part here, I’m kind of wishing Ducky had the job.”
Everyone laughs a little at that. Ducky half-starts to stand up, upping the joke just a tad more.

“Sit down, Duck. I’ve got this. Just… Probably not as smooth as you would have. So… Here goes.

“Longer ago than anyone wants to admit to, I, a baby FBI agent, got called into a case with, and here’s where my boss rolled his eyes and sighed, ‘A real cowboy. A shoot first, shoot last, shoot in between, and maybe, after the lead’s all spent, ask a few questions, cowboy,’ at NCIS.”

Fornell can see some of the crew looking at Gibbs wondering what the hell he was like back in the day.

“That cowboy was Mike Franks.” And with those words everyone knows how this works. “And Mike, God rest his soul, certainly lived up to the hype.” Fornell makes a phew sound. “I didn’t exactly sprint out of that job, because there was something to Mike. He might not have been the straightest arrow, in fact, it’s possible he was a boomerang, but, he knew who the bad guys were, and once he had them in his sights…

“So, a few years later, when I get another case that brushes up against NCIS, I agree to go, because, well, Mike and I aren’t besties, not by any stretch, but he’s solid, and I’ll put my back to his and ride out whatever’s coming our way.

“This time, Mike’s got himself a genuine Probie.” Fornell pauses to laugh at the memory. “And this one is a straight arrow, well, at least, next to Mike, he is.” Gibbs sniggers. Next to Mike, just about everyone looked like a straight arrow.

“And we hit it off. I sat down to figure out when the hell that was before I got writing this, and as best I can remember, that was 1993. And here it is, the last day of 2017, twenty-four years later. We’ve had some damn adventures over the years, some good ones to tell the grandkids about when we’re old and dotty, and some less than fabulous times that maybe we’re better off forgetting, but… Twenty-four years.

“Ducky said it, ‘dearly beloved.’ Twenty-four years, and we didn’t just build a friendship, but we made a family. And maybe we didn’t always like each other, but we’ve always had each other’s backs. We’ve always given each other good advice, even if we didn’t want to hear it.”

Gibbs laughs at that, given the history of him and Fornell, that’s true. “Especially when we didn’t want to hear it.”

Fornell nods at that. Then he pulls Gibbs up, and hugs him. “Brother, and I mean that, this is the best damn thing you’ve ever done. And I’ve seen all the ups and the downs.” Then he leans down, kisses Abbi, and says, “And you… You light him up and keep him whole. I met maybe, at best, half a man back in ’93, and now, here, with you, he’s who he’s supposed to be, and even if you weren’t one of the most awesomely badass women I’d ever met, I’d love you for that. But you are, so…” He raises his glass, “To Gibbs and Abbi. To more years. To watching our family grow.” Fornell hugs both of them, and then drinks from his glass.

So, technically speaking, Jimmy is Sam’s Boss.

Just like, technically, Ducky was Jimmy’s Boss.

But somehow, those lines don’t, especially at a wedding, seem as clear as usual.
And Jimmy’s fairly sure that even if here weren’t on his third gin and tonic of the night, and it wasn’t a wedding, thus focusing his attention on love and relationshipy sorts of things, that he’d feel rather protective of his Sam, and not want his heart to get stomped upon.

He supposes this is a big brother sort of thing, maybe with a splash of Dad, but, watching Sam with his Alan, he is feeling a bit protective, and he’s not entirely sure what to do with it, because… Well… Sam’s not a girl.

He feels a little silly about that. He’s been able to whip out his pseudo big brother for Amy and Collin. And when Emily was in need of a clan of menfolk to protect her, he leapt into place, in both of those cases with nary a second thought, but…

Sam’s not a girl. And has done absolutely nothing to indicate he may want a big brother watching his back.

This has not, however, stopped him from leaning against the wall as Sam, Alan, Ducky, and Penny are talking, keeping his eyes on Alan, with a ‘mess with my Sam and die’ look on his face.

He’s not sure if Alan is properly cowed or not. Or for that matter, what properly cowed would be.

He does know that Sam’s been talking about the Fall and what he and Ducky and Penny did. Now, more than a year later, stories of the three of them in body armor going out in an ambulance with snipers on the roof to offer help to people are fairly exciting and fun. (Though Jimmy notices that neither Tony nor Tim, both of whom did sniper duty on some of those runs, sticks around to hear them.)

But those stories wrap up and the conversation lulls, so Jimmy says, “Sam says that you’re an infectious disease specialist out of Johns Hopkins. What’s got you down in DC?”

Sam sighs a little. “A hybrid of fascination and depression. As I’m sure you know, there’s been a debate as to how hospitals effect the infectious disease rates. We try to tease out how much they act as a cure and as a vector. Because of the unfortunate experiences at the end of 2016, we now have the making of a perfect laboratory.

“There’s no functional hospital left in DC. The next one isn’t set to open until late 2019. Surrounding Virginia and Maryland have hospitals. We know that when things get really bad, people in DC leave the city to seek treatment. We know fewer of them do that than they would if a hospital were right nearby. We can look at hospital service rates in the areas around DC, control for SES…” Sam sees that Jimmy doesn’t know that bit of jargon. “Socio-economic-status. How much money you’ve got.”

Jimmy nods.

“We control for SES, and then we get to see how disease populations respond to the presence of a nearby hospital.”

Jimmy would have to admit, he finds that interesting, and both Ducky and Penny look fascinated.

“And what are your preliminary findings, Dr. Samuels?” Ducky asks.

“The sort of thing that might shake your faith in humanity, Dr. Mallard,” Alan replies, copying Ducky’s formality to highlight their credentials for this. “Basically, hospitals are great, for emergencies. But D—SC’s got lower flu, norovirus, strep, and chicken pox levels, even controlling for income and vaccination levels. People get sick, they go to the hospital, and get everyone near them sick, too.”
“Schools,” Jimmy adds. “Our schools are also at least partially offline. I think Heather was saying that any student who can use a computer to remote into class in SC is doing so, that way they don’t need as much space for everyone. Fewer students all together would cut down on disease transmission. That might get messing with your numbers.”

Alan nods at that. “I’ll add that into the vectors we’re going to work with. We’re also working on a project… Actually, Sam’s stories,” Alan gently strokes his hand against the back of Sam’s, and Sam lights up in a happy smile, “gave us an idea. Without an emergency room, mortality from accidents, heart attacks, strokes, burns, wounds, ect… you get the idea, all go through the roof. With an emergency room, they drop, but infectious disease shoot up.

“After listening to Sam’s stories, I was thinking about a possible experiment. Set it up so emergency rooms are for emergencies. You cut your hand off, your heart stops beating, you’re seizing, off to the ER you go. But, we have mobile treatment centers for sickness. You get a bad fever, you’re puking your guts out, wheezing like crazy, you call the on-the-go Doc. He’s got a van with things for testing, maybe a portable x-ray machine. He goes to you, checks you out, runs the tests he can in the van, takes samples back to the lab for more advanced testing. If he’s stumped, or if you’re in really bad shape, he takes you back to the hospital, directly to the department you need to go to.

“I’m working on writing the grants to get a few vans set for on-the-go Docs, and we’ll continue to experiment from there.”

“And, do you think the experience of some people who have worked as on-the-go-Docs may come in handy?” Ducky asks.

Jimmy can see how Ducky’s watching that, and he’s got the idea that he and Penny are no longer wondering what comes after their time in New York.

“Yes, Dr. Mallard, I believe it would,” Alan says with a smile.

Tim’s dancing with Abby when he notices Breena and Jimmy draw close. He feels a hand in his jacket pocket, Breena’s from the feel of it, and then they dance away.

“Key card?” he says to Abby?

“Key card. We don’t have pockets, and I don’t know where Jimmy’s is.”

He nods a bit at that. Jimmy’s jacket retired to his chair an hour ago, so grabbing Tim’s rather than going back to the table probably just seemed easier.

However it works out, he watches his loves sneak out for a little alone time with each other.

“May I?” Leon says, cutting in on Fornell and Lara.

She smiles up at him, and Tobias bows out, with a grin.

“Can you, old man?” Lara teases, Leon.

“Old!?!?” He’s mock appalled by that, and dips her back, low and easy. His lips find hers for a quick kiss. Then he spins her away, pulling her close again, her left hand in his right. He sees the spark of her engagement ring. They haven’t exactly been wedding planning with a vengeance, likely because they’re actually married, but the fact that something else always keeps popping up isn’t helping, at all.

“What do you think,” he says, his cheek against hers as they sway, “about this time, next year, on the beach, under the stars? Start 2019 as Mrs. Vance?”

She raises an eyebrow at him. “That depends, will you make sure to take enough time off, really off, to make it happen?”

He kisses her. “Yes. Things are calm enough for me to step back for a bit.”

“I’ll believe it when it happens.”

“I’ll make it happen.” And right now, he sounds awfully convincing.

Jeff and Abbi are dancing. Fornell’s got Emily in his arms. Ed and Breena have their own part of the dance floor.

And Gibbs is holding Ziva and Abby.

Tim’s standing next to Jimmy, and his hand brushes Jimmy’s. “Twenty-five or so years.”

Jimmy nods.

One day, they’ll stand up there and dance with their girls, at their weddings. And right this second, that’s making Tim blink, hard. One day, tiny little purple dresses may shift to long white ones, and there’ll be a party, celebrating the family they haven’t met, yet.

Tim wipes his eyes, and Jimmy wraps an arm around him.

The night is getting late, and everyone’s been “loosening up” for hours. Ties are undone, top (and lower) buttons are undone, jackets are off, hair is fluffy from “dancing,” pinchy little shoes have long been jettisoned to under the dining tables.

These are Tim’s favorite shots from the wedding. There’s one of him, Jimmy, Gibbs, Tony, Ducky, and Fornell. They’re all at the bar, drunk and grinning like morons, but those grins are real, eyes and smiles lit up with joy and love.

There’s a shot of him and Abby, on the dance floor. She asked for (You) Shook Me All Night Long, and they’re happily re-creating a very pleasant memory from their own wedding.

There’s a shot of Ducky and Penny, dancing slow and close. Tim knows that Ducky’s on his tip toes, but he was bound and determined to have at least one dance where his lady could lay her head on his shoulder.

Tim’s got one of him in his chair, Abby’s in his lap. Jimmy’s leaning in to hear something they’re saying, but only for a second because Breena’s got his hand, leading him back to the dance floor.
There’s one of Breena and Abby dancing with each other. They’re also tipsy and grinning. Abby’s leaning Breena back into a slightly wobbly dip, and both of them are laughing, loud.

There’s a shot of Tony waltzing Tim around. (Something about making sure he got at least one dance with everyone in the place with a skirt.) That was the joke, and the setup. There isn’t a shot of what came next, but Tim remembers it well. Jimmy “cut in” on them, and the two of them got one dance together.

Tim doesn’t know what Fornell’s getting Gibbs ready to do. Go fight a mob? Boxing? Tell Diane she looks fat in that dress? No idea, but he’s standing behind Gibbs, rubbing his shoulders the way the fight coach would for a boxer about to go into the ring.

He’s not entirely sure how Pride talked him into it (he’s also suspicious that Jimmy and Tony helped), but somehow, round about his fourth scotch of the night, there’s a garter toss, and there appears to be photographic evidence that Tim’s the one who’d been wearing the garter. (He’s fairly sure that he can pass a polygraph saying no such thing ever happened, but there are pictures.) (It’s Breena’s garter.) (And Abby took it off with her teeth.) (Diane caught it.)

There are a lot of pictures of Abbi and Gibbs dancing, or sitting together, or just being near each other. And most of them have at least one of the two of them, if not both, staring at each other, dumbstruck at how lucky they are, and how in love.

It’s New Years’, so the “official” end of the wedding is midnight.

Gibbs and Abbi get their last dance, and Wonderful Tonight ends at 11:59:30. The DJ calls them together to send Gibbs and Abbi off, and that starts with counting down the last ten seconds of the year.

“Three! Two! One!” Silver and purple balloons fall from the ceiling, drifting around the wedding party, amid a shower of silver glitter. Everyone exchanges kisses and hugs. 2017 is over, and with it, this wedding.

Gibbs and Abbi, both with wicked, and happy, smiles on their faces head off to the cheering of the remaining guest.

Sway

It’s almost time for the McPalmers to be leaving, too. Heather and Keith are staying for the morning, but if they don’t get to bed soon, they’ll be walking dead in the morning.

But it’s not quite time, not yet.

The lights are burning low, most of the candles out, and the music’s been getting softer as more and more people have left. Only a few of them are still here, dancing slow and easy, Sam and his Alan, Emily and Drew, Abbi’s parents, Sarah and Nick, lingering at the edges of the festivities, not quite ready to end the party, yet.
Breena heads over to the DJ, asking for a song. That’ll be their last dance for the night. She smiles up at Jimmy, across the dancefloor.

He knows what’s coming, maybe not the exact song, but he’s got the idea, so he stands up to meet her halfway. Then the music starts, and he does know what’s coming next. It’s one of her favorites, and they’ve danced to it before.

We sway/ Grabbed you by the hips and hand and off we went…

And he does, pulling her close, one hand in hers, one on her hip, anchoring her against him, pulling her into a deep swaying grind, and then dipping her back, before pulling her back up, and kissing the base of her throat.

She grins up at him, and kisses him back as they slip into the beat of the song. His body leading hers, as they move, fluidly, to the music.

I only want to dance with you/Every time I try/We only get an hour or so

Tim and Abby watch them. She’s sitting in his lap, and he’s resting his chin on her shoulder, arms around her waist. In the low light, with the flecks of glitter on their skin and clothing, Jimmy and Breena seem to sparkle as they dance.

Another few seconds, and Breena wiggles a finger, calling Tim and Abby into the dance.

They start with each other, hitting the dancefloor and bopping with each other. It’s a moderately paced song, fast enough to move, slow enough to really dance. Tim kisses Abby, and she runs her fingers through his hair.

We’ve got these times of our lives/Let’s take this time and let it show

Abby’s in Tim’s arms, her body snug to his, fitting against him in a way that thrills him, even all these years later. They ease toward Jimmy and Breena, getting closer to closing the square.

We sway/The moon shines down/And everybody’s safe/Christmas lights all day

And they dance. Tim’s holding Abby close, his hands on her hips, her hands around his neck as they sway with each other. There’s a tiny fleck of glitter on her nose, and more of them in her hair, all of them catching sparks from the lights.

When they get within arm’s reach of Jimmy and Breena, Abby turns, so she’s side by side between Tim and Breena. One of her hands leaves Tim and wraps around Breena’s back. Tim circles Abby, dancing at her back, his hands around her waist, his chin on her shoulder. She turns her face towards him for a kiss, keeping pace with Breena and Jimmy.

Jimmy’s takes the step to dance behind Breena, one arm around her. His other hands is on Abby’s hip, fingers twined with Tim’s.

Breena’s got one hand on Abby’s shoulder, the other one, twined with Tim’s hand on her hip.

They hold that for a moment, before sliding into a square, a gently moving four-way embrace.

We feel high as fuck/And everything is good/Good to go

Maybe a few of the guests, Abbi’s parents for example, might be wondering about the four of them dancing together, but it’s late, it’s mostly private, and this is time carved out for each other.
Tim watches his loves, the joy in their eyes, smiles on faces. Yes, it’s a wedding, and people tend to be happy at weddings, but he thinks it’s more than that. They’re here, together, touching and loving, and swaying to a beautiful song.

He kisses each of them, not caring who may see. There’s so much joy in his heart, it’s got to be expressed, let out. This kind of happiness can’t stay locked in a body, it needs to be free, needs to be shared.

Feels great to be honest/Forget about the troubles/Forget about the drama.

And right now, everything outside the circle of the four of them doesn’t matter. Right now there’s music, and breath, bodies moving together.

I ain’t Casanova baby/I can’t dance for days

But they don’t have to, right here, right now, it’s enough.

This time with you is just amazing in so many ways

And it is. They move closer, holding each other, and the beat. Tim’s watching the other three of them, reveling in these people he’s built a life, family with.

We stay here until we want to/Now we just sway

The song is coming to a close, and so is the evening, but right now spreads out, time slowing, a moment stretching, encompassing the four of them…

Come on… Dance with me…

Pretty thing… dance with me…

These, these are ours…

These, these are ours…

And that’s where we’ll leave them, on the dance floor, celebrating each other, and Gibbs’ fifth, and final wedding.

An End

Chapter End Notes

Afterword:

Holy Shit! Almost 2.9 million words, 608 chapter, six weeks shy of five years.

All of it spawned by a two second bit of conversation back in season ten when McGee says to Abby, on the phone, that he’ll meet her for dinner. Of all the random moments, huh?
So, are we done? Is that it?

Sort of. Shards To A Whole is a classic Hero’s Journey. It hits all of the traditional beats. We see our young hero, with his wise older mentor. He’s got to come into his own power, face many hard tests, eventually take the place of his mentor, and then, and only then, will he be ready to take on the nemesis, slay the nemesis, and finally come into his own.

So, Tim’s Hero’s Journey is done. His demons are slain. His shards have been fitted back together. He’s as whole as he can get, and so are the people around him.

On that level, Shards To A Whole is Done.

But just because the journey is done doesn’t mean the Hero is.

I’ve still got stories to tell in the Shardsverse. I intend to tell them. But I’m not going to be doing it anytime soon. Probably at least six months until the next update, if not a bit more. But, we’re going to see Gibbs leading the Cub Scout pack. (Come on, you know he’s going to lead the pack, and Tim’s got to help out, and the shorts have to be part of it, and likely some poison ivy, and…) And those McPalmOzzo kids need to learn to drive, and we have to have at least one Halloween story, where all the kiddos are old enough to trick or treat, right? And God help Molly’s first boyfriend when he meets both of her dads, and Dave DiNozzo’s going to own the little league and the ballet, and there’s at least one kid we haven’t met yet, and sex ed with Dr. Palmer is something we can’t possibly miss, and…

And, of course, the Hydra isn’t dead. You know that right? The fight is eternal, and eventually I’ll come up with another case to bring everyone out on again.

So, I’ve got more stories, but they aren’t the story, which was getting all of my little Shards whole, and getting all of Tim’s internal shards whole and healed.

And we’re there. Tim’s whole. Lover, Husband, Father, Boss, Whole. His team, his loves, they’ve found their hearts and wholes, too. So, the great Hero’s Journey is done.

For the immediate story right now, I’ll open up one more chapter for an Ask Me Anything. Anything you guys want to know, feel like I dropped, need more background on, about the story or about writing or whatever… feel free to fire away, and I’ll get to it in the next chapter, and then…

Then Shards To A Whole, will be whole.

And it feels really amazing, and sad, to say that. (You may have noticed a substantial slow down on chapters lately, and that’s because I’ve known every word’s been getting me closer to here, so the words slowed down.) I started this in January of 2013, and not doing it every single day is going to be a massive hole, but it’s time to focus on other stories, and explore other lives. I’ve been wearing a Tim suit for almost five years now, and, yeah, it’s time to take him off for a bit, hang him up, and spend some time in a few other people’s heads.

Anyway, it’s been a blast, and I’ve been so happy and grateful for those of you who’ve gone with me on this trek. I know you look forward to my updates, and I look forward to the notes you send me. I tell my husband about how you guys are doing, and what you like and don’t like, and…
It’s been a long run, and a good one, and I’ve loved writing it, and now, at least for the time being, it’s done.

And, yes, I’m crying. I’ll say so long for now, instead of goodbye.

Thanks,
Keryl
Hey Guys!

So, not a whole lot of questions on the AMA, but we did get some, so here goes!

Desirea Yardley asks:

How does your Kayla Vance story end does she find her women and get married, serve for her entire career... where does she end up?

I'll admit that right now, I'm not entirely sure how her story ends.

Does she get her woman? Probably/Eventually/There may be more than one.

Does she go to Annapolis? Yes! She'll serve in the Navy and specialize in logistical efficiency. (She'll be the one who makes sure stuff gets where it needs to be, at the right time, in the right place, and using the least amount of other stuff to get it there. Sounds boring, until you're on a ship with 500 gallons of ice cream and no tampons.)

Because the longer term Shardsverse is fuzzier than the nearer term Shardsverse, I'm not entirely sure if she'll serve out her whole career in the Navy.

I do, however, anticipate, that there will be a point, when she's been in for 22ish years, that she'll cross paths with a certain Marine, who will be fresh out of Annapolis, and might, just possibly, need an occasional smack upside the back of the head.

Mother Oracle asks:

What is Tim's reaction to John's death?

You'll forgive me for keeping that story close to my vest. (This is one of the future stories, though it's a ways off.) He will, eventually, after Penny dies, figure it out, and like many things in the Shardsverse, I'm thinking it's safe to say his response will be complicated.

He won't begrudge his Uncles for not telling him/them, though. (Sarah will likely be a different story.)

Are the uncles okay with the extended marriage? Enquiring minds want to know!

Tom McGee has seen basically everything under the sun, and as a result he's extremely difficult to shock or disgust. He's not bothered by it, but he's not enthusiastic about it either.

Mostly, when he looks at the four of them, and, as they spend more time together, their increasingly bad job of keeping the secret when they're "home," he sees a knife.

He's cold enough that he knows that, if he feels like he needs to, he can use this knife to hurt Tim.

He's warm enough to know that someone else could use this knife to hurt Tim, too, and he wants to protect him from that.

Right now, Tim's on Uncle Tom's side of the angels, and as long as that's true, Tom will do what he can to make sure no one else picks up the knife and stabs Tim with it.
If he thinks Tim's straying too far over to the dark side, he'll stab him himself.

To say that Tom feels burned from his previous government employment is not an exaggeration, and these days, the only moral compass he's going by is his own.

Uncle Mike is more conservative in these matters, and honestly, he thinks it's kind of icky. But, he's not about to piss off his mom by ever admitting that. He figures that since he lives 5000 miles away, and sees Tim once or twice a decade, that he can just ignore it.

Pretty much, he can't see any reason to hurt Tim because he's personally squeamish about this.

Levana says:

I'm hoping in that future, one of the girls becomes a Marine.

The military tradition will run strong in the McPalmer family. At least one of the kids will go onto Annapolis, as a Marine.

And said child/ren, will join an extremely select group of officers that their Pop is proud to salute.

I imagine a granddaughter sanding a boat with Pop while in a prom dress because you can't shoot your loser date.

: ) But that won't stop him from suggesting it.

I would love to see Gibbs and Fornell walking their wife down the aisle

I really hope the inspiration fairy hits for that, because I'm looking forward to writing that.

And I guess that's where we're going to end, for now.

For those of you who want to keep track of me, I'm always Keryl Raist. Twitter, Facebook (though I don't update there), and Instagram, I'm Keryl Raist. On Deviant Art, I stretched a little and am KerylR.

And… Uh… Yeah. Did you guys know Reylo is a thing? I do now. And… um… sixty-five pages later…

(I promise I won't write 3,000,000 words of Reylo.)

But, I've got a new story up, and like any Keryl Raist work, I'm gonna call it porn with philosophy, because that's just the niche I like to inhabit.
