Cormac: "Hm? [He blinks.] "Oh, sorry, am I supposed to be doing something?"
Blaise: [impatiently] "Yes. We're working on the Slub Club reunion party, remember?"
Cormac: "Question. Who will be presenting me with the lifetime achievement award?"
Blaise: "No one."
Cormac: [shrugging] "Never heard of her."
Blaise: "What exactly are you even supposed to have achieved up to this point, McLaggen?"
Cormac: "It's a lifetime of achievement, Zabini. The achievement is ongoing."
Blaise: "Well, you're useless."
Cormac: [smugly] "Joke's on you. I already know that."
Neville, from just outside camera view: "Blaise, I really don't think I can be helpful with this right now—"
Blaise: "And why not?!"
Neville: [frantically] "Because I have to do something about all these poisonous plants!"
[Camera pans out to reveal that Neville's desk is surrounded by abnormally large potted plants, of at least a dozen nefarious varieties.]
Blaise: "Holy hell, Longbottom. Who are you trying to murder?"
Neville: "They're not mine! I just came in and they were here! The weird thing is they're not even from the same genus of flora."
Blaise: "Really? That's the weird thing?"
Cormac: [pointing] "I'd marry that one, fuck that one, and kill that one."
Blaise: [alarmed] "Jesus, McLaggen—"
Neville: "No, no. He's right."

[Cuts to Cormac interview.]

Cormac: "I mean, the game definitely has a good amount of nuance, but when it comes down to it, I always know what things should or shouldn't be fucked. It's basically just a teeth rule. Like, does it have teeth? Ask first. If it says yes, then fine. If it says no, then no. If it can't speak, probably also lean towards no, just for safety." [He pauses.] "Also, all of the plants were addressed to Malfoy, but that didn't seem relevant to mention."

[Cuts to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: [irritably] "Yeah, so, this whole 'secret santa' thing is going to be a challenge. I had good intentions at first! In fact, I was planning to do something a little bit less—"

Rita: "Villainous?"

Hermione: [shrugging] "Yeah, sure." [Her expression darkens.] "But then he had to go and be a total monster."

[Cuts to the office earlier that day.]

Hermione: "What do you think about herbology?"

Draco: [not looking up] "Honestly? I'm not convinced."

Hermione: [continuing] "Because I was thinking that for the curricul—" [She stumbles to a halt.] "Wait a minute. What do you mean you're not convinced about herbology?"

Draco: [shrugging] "Just sounds like a pseudoscience, you know? Like astrology, or gravity."

Hermione: "Malfoy, gravity is definitely a real thing." [She pauses, genuinely concerned.] "You do know that gravity's a thing, right?"

Draco: "Look, the whole thing is based on some guy getting hit in the head with an apple. I don't know about you, Granger, but I don't know that I can trust something that begins with a concussion, even if it does involve Latin. And apples."

Hermione: [momentarily speechless] "Gravity is one thing, fine, but herbology, Malfoy? It's the entire basis for potions, and it's obviously crucial for care of magical creatures—"

Draco: "Look, you asked, and I gave you my answer."

Hermione: "Yes, but are you honestly just suggesting, just… a blanket no on all herbology?"

Draco: [shrugging] "I mean, if the shoe kicks."

[Cuts to Pansy and Daphne.]

Daphne: "If the shoe kicks, definitely buy it."

Pansy: "Yes. These shoes were made for kicking."

Daphne: "Unless it's a dead man's shoe."

Pansy: "In which case, if it kicks, put it back. It's haunted."
Daphne: "Right. So basically, just don't underestimate a kicking shoe."

Pansy: "You knew it was a shoe when you picked it up."

Daphne: "Yep. So put it back down."

[There is a pause.]

Pansy: "I feel like we were supposed to be doing something."

[Camera pans out to reveal a lengthy queue of people at their service desk.]

Marcus: "Hello? Are you even working?"

Daphne: "Which Marcus even are you?"

Pansy: "Also, we're closed for the day."

Marcus: [with palpable annoyance] "It's 9:30 in the morning!"

Daphne: "Look, when we need a snotty talking watch, we'll let you know."

[Cuts back to Hermione and Draco.]

Hermione: "So, let me get this straight: no herbology. No gravity. None of it."

Draco: "Right."

[A pause.]

Hermione: "ARE YOU INSANE?!"

Draco: "DON'T YELL AT ME, YOU OPPRESSIVELY WHIMSICAL MOONBEAM!"

Hermione: "What if I delivered a dozen poisonous magical plants to you, hm, Malfoy?" [With a distinctive air of 'I told you so'] "If you hadn't taken herbology, you wouldn't even know they were toxic!"

Draco: [scoffing] "I don't need to know a plant is toxic to know not to fuck it, Granger."

[Cuts to Cormac.]

Cormac: "See? Teeth rule. Tell your friends."

[Cuts back to Hermione and Draco.]

Hermione: "MALFOY, YOU ARE IMPOSSIBLE!"

Draco: [hopefully] "To resist?"

Hermione: "TO WORK WITH!"

Draco: "Oh. Well, in that case—" [He holds his hand up to his ear.] "What did you say?"

[Cuts to interview with Theo and Harry.]

Harry: "So, we've had sort of a busy morning."
Rita: "Sorry, you are … I want to say Terry?"

Gilderoy: [excitedly] "Close!"

Harry: [sighing] "Isn't this getting old yet?"

Gilderoy: [to Rita] "It's pronounced 'Terr-ay,' but in my experience names can be very confusing."

[Cuts to Neville.]

Gilderoy: "Sorry, your name is what?"

Neville: [sighing] "Neville Longbottom."

Gilderoy: "Yes, yes, Longbottom. And this is… [He trails off, squinting intently.] "A normal name?"

Neville: [exasperatedly] "Can I just please get rid of these plants? They're starting to burn."

[Cuts to Cormac.]

Cormac: "I have rules about burning, too, but they're pretty self-explanatory. Mostly just a delicate no to anything that burns."

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry.]

Theo: "Yeah, so, I sort of figured Granger was going to send something terrible, but this was a surprise." [He shudders.] "Frankly, I'm starting to question how responsible she actually is."

Rita: "She once kept me in a jar."

Theo: "Did she?"

[Camera pans out to reveal Severus beside them dabbing a brush onto canvas. He is crafting an elegant watercolor that features a lime green bowler with sensual eyes, overlooking a vast ravine with a series of crumpled hats at the bottom.]

Severus: "Also, she once lit me on fire."

Theo: "Right, okay, so rule number one, be careful with Granger."

Harry: "It's a good rule." [To Theo] "So what exactly did you do with the plants, anyway?"

Theo: "You say that like you don't trust me to have done the responsible thing, Potter."

Harry: "Well, now that you mention it—"

[Cuts to Neville, who is nursing a series of nasty-looking blisters.]

Neville: "I mean, it's really best that I got them, anyway. At least I know what to do with them, right? Someone else could have really been hurt!"

[Cuts back to Harry and Theo.]

Theo: "Listen, I went with the option that would cause the least damage, okay?"

Harry: "Fine. And what about Malfoy?"
Theo: "What about him?"

[The camera pans out to show Draco popping up from behind his desk, looking feverishly manic. All of his drawers have been opened and everything he owns is levitating in the air, orbiting his head like a halo.]

Draco: "IT'S GONE!"

Harry: "THE WRIST THING, AND KNOCKT- oh sorry." [He exhales slowly.] "Reflexes, you know."

Gilderoy: "I understand."

Harry: "Do you?"

Gilderoy: "Yes." [sympathetically] "It's hard to keep him in the pants."

Theo: [To Draco] "What's gone, buddy?"

Draco: [wringing his hands] "MY—MY—"

Theo: "Use your words, pal."

Draco: "IT'S—I CAN'T—"

Theo: [innocently] "You're not missing a book of Granger poetry by any chance, are you, Draco?"

Draco: [with obvious distress] "I DON'T WRITE POEMS."

[He leaves with a clatter, looking severely unhinged. Harry glances at Theo.]

Harry: "Hm. Is it possible this is all escalating a bit too quickly?"

Theo: "Anything's technically possible, Potter. That doesn't mean we should spend all day charting every possibility. I have far too many demands on my time as it is."

Rita: [skeptically] "Working hard, are you?"

Theo: [shrugging] "Hey. I could be worse."

[Cuts to Daphne and Pansy.]

Daphne: "You know, I'm really warming up to this whole quidditch thing."

Pansy: "I know, right? I feel like it's doing me a lot of good professionally."

Daphne: "Yes. And my skin feels clearer, too."

Pansy: "Right. There's just something about investing in my career that's really cleansing my aura."

Daphne: "I'm so proud of us."

Pansy: "Me too!"

[Camera pans out to show Ginny waiting in line at the service desk.]

Ginny: "So … are you guys going to fill out this permit form, or—?"
Pansy: "Honestly? Probably not."

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XIV

[Scene opens with Dean and Seamus.]

Seamus: "You know, I will say that whoever Gossip Girl is this year, they're really missing that poetic touch from last time. It used to be more of a sly meandering into the point, you know what I mean?"

Dean: "Whereas now, it's more like the dropping a point-laden anvil."

Seamus: "Which is great in many ways, obviously."

Dean: "Of course. Efficiency, for one."

Seamus: "Yes, very efficient. Just get in—"

Dean: "—strongly suggest that the Slug Club is some sort of incestuous sex organization—"

Seamus: "—and get out."

Dean: "Right. Efficiency."

Seamus: [nodding gravely] "Efficiency."

[Cuts to Neville, Cormac, and Marcus.]

Cormac: [thoughtfully] "I'm going to say fuck me, marry Marcus, and kill Neville."

Neville: "Yeah, that sounds about right."

Marcus: "I'd fuck you, Longbottom."

Cormac: "Really? So then you'd marry me?"

Marcus: "Well… that is one option, yes."

Cormac: "But then you'd have to kill yourself."

Marcus: "A coincidence, I'm sure."

Neville: [to Rita] "Sorry, what was the question?"

Rita: "I asked what you think about the latest Gossip Girl allegations."

Marcus: "What, that we're sex fiends?"
Cormac: "Oh, was that a Gossip Girl note? Weird. I thought they were just renaming the department."

Marcus: "You thought they were renaming the department to members of the Slug Club past establish sex den for members present?"

Cormac: [shrugging] "Hey man, I don't oil the machine, I just fuck her til she comes."

Marcus: "That's ... progressive?"

Cormac: "I like to think so."

Neville: "For the record, we're pretty sure that note doesn't apply to us."

Rita: "Who else would it apply to?"

[Blaise pokes his head in.]

Blaise: "Okay, so for the reunion, do we think seven minutes is enough? What about like, fifteen minutes in heaven? I just feel like seven is sort of a lot of pressure to perform, you know what I mean? Actually, maybe twenty minutes, just to be safe." [He pauses.] "How long if I'm factoring in possible cunilatio?"

Cormac: "Is Mercury in retrograde?"

Blaise: "What? No."

Cormac: "Are there roller skates involved? Or any heavy machinery?"

Blaise: "I—no. Definitely not."

Cormac: "Any gluten allergies?"

Blaise: "Not that I know of."

Cormac: "How many buttons?"

Blaise: "On her, or on me?"

Cormac: "Total."

Blaise: "Um. Two?"

Cormac: [shrugging] "Then sure, twenty minutes."

Neville: "Hold on. Isn't this party being held at work?"

Blaise: "Yes. But do I even work here?"

Cormac: "Who, you?"

Marcus: "Are you talking about you?"

Neville: [frowning] "I no longer feel like I understand this."

Rita: "Wait, does he work here?"
Neville: "Who, Blaise?"

Cormac: [approvingly] "Back in it. Nice."

Neville: "Thanks." [He sighs contentedly] "It felt right."

Blaise: "Also, do we think black tie?"

Marcus: "I thought this was just a casual get together."

Blaise: "Well, right, it was. But then someone pointed out that we picked the same day as the Ministry quidditch game, so I figured we should probably have it afterwards. Plus, you know." [He shrugs] "I just look better in dress robes."

Neville: "Who exactly are you trying to impress, Zabini?"

Cormac: "Me, I assume. In which case, don't worry. I'm looking, and I like what I see."

Blaise: "I—no. Thank you, but no."

Cormac: "I didn't actually offer."

Blaise: "Oh."

Cormac: [scoffing] "Believe me, when I offer, you'll know."

[Cuts to Cormac interview.]

Cormac: "It's because there are several legally binding contracts involved."

[Pans out to reveal Daphne and Pansy on either side of him.]

Pansy: "It's just the smart thing to do, honestly."

Daphne: "Nobody wants to be held liable for unforeseeable damages."

Pansy: "Unforeseeable by the victim, obviously."

Daphne: "By which she means partner."

Pansy: [frowning] "Why, what did I say?"

[Cuts back to office scene.]

Rita: "So hold on. You're throwing a reunion party just so you might have a chance to sleep with someone?"

Blaise: "Well, I considered writing a book of poetry and accosting them slowly over time, but recent events have proven that to be a somewhat vulnerable way of going about things."

[Cuts to Draco interview. His hair is standing on end and he is twitching slightly.]

Draco: "Okay, so here's my theory—ghosts."

Rita: "Is... is there more?"

Draco: [whispering] "Ghost thieves."
Blaise: "I'm thinking I made a good call, all things considered."

Rita: "Right. And the person you're doing all this for?"

Blaise: "Oh. Um—"

Ginny: "I mean, I'm not going to lie. I've definitely wondered about how this whole reunion thing is going to go now that Harry and I are publicly broken up. Blaise and I used to have sort of an affinity for broom cupboards, if you know what I mean."

Gilderoy: "Sorry, is that a reference to sex or murder?"

Ginny: "What?"

Gilderoy: "It's just that when I don't understand something, it's usually about sex or murder."

Ginny: [apprehensively] "Who have you been talking to about murder?"

Sorting Hat: "—and when all these SPINELESS COWARDS have finally stepped aside and relinquished MY MORTAL ENEMY from his WRETCHED SANCTUARY OF COWARDICE, I'll have him swimming with the fishes before I've even finished my afternoon Earl Grey."

Gilderoy: [tentatively] "Sorry, is that a sex thing?"

Ginny: "Turns out hats don't have sex."

Ginny: "Right."

Gilderoy: "They appear to be super into homicide, though."

Ginny: [thoughtfully] "Well, in fairness to you, 'swimming with the fishes' wouldn't be the weirdest sex euphemism I've ever heard."

Daphne: "Taming the strange."

Luna: "Joint session of congress."

Harry: "Opening the Chamber of Secrets."

Neville: "Spelunking down under."

Seamus: "Detention in the Forbidden Forest."

Minerva: "Fifteen minutes of disappointment."

Theo: "The disappearing wand trick."
Draco: "Servicing Venus."

Albus: "Wrangling the cyclops."

Gilderoy: "Honestly? No one will tell me."

Cormac: "Spaghetti time!"

Hermione: "Ouch, my hair is stuck."

Blaise: "Ain't nothin' wrong with a little bump and grind."

Ron: "Am I doing this right?"

Pansy: "It's called fucking, you amateurs." [She pauses.] "But I'm sure the golden snatch applies here somehow."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: A short one today, as I really, really need to sleep. Resounding thanks for following along!
Minerva: "Do you even have any idea what's going on in this Ministry, Shacklebolt?! Granger's trying to require accreditation! She wants teachers to be credentialed! She's demanding standards! Measures!"

Sorting Hat: "VENGEANCE!"

Albus: "It's like she's trying to turn the school into some sort of—some kind of—"

Kingsley: "School?"

Albus: "YES, EXACTLY. Like some sort of—"

Kingsley: "Fiduciary bureaucrat?"

Albus: "THE WOMAN MUST BE STOPPED!"

Sorting Hat: "THE DAWN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS IS UPON US!"

Kingsley: "You guys really need to refine your agenda. Candidly, it seems like it's going in a few different directions."

Albus: "To be honest, we've definitely already discussed it."

Kingsley: "It's my fault. I got carried away."

Albus: "It's fine."

Kingsley: "I appreciate that. I feel heard."

Albus: "Hm?"

Minerva: "Listen, you just need to put a stop to it, Kingsley, immediately. Just—move Granger to a different department or something."

Kingsley: "It can't be that bad, can it?"

Minerva: "ROLL THE TAPE, JORDAN!"

Lee, outside camera view: "YOU'RE NOT THE BOSS OF ME!"

Minerva: "JORDAN, THIS ISN'T THE TIME FOR ROLEPLAY."

Lee: "Fine."

[Cuts to Hogwarts.]
Hermione: "I understand that many of the professors here have excellent academic track records, Professor, but they also have quite a number of issues."

Minerva: [haughtily] "Like what?"

Hermione: [enumerating on her fingers] "Professor Sinistra and Professor Trelawney run an illegal gambling ring out of the Astronomy tower. Professor Flitwick has an outstanding warrant for his part in a diamond heist in Munich. Madame Hooch is using school funds to sell students' shoes to foot fetishes via owl post. Madame Pince has actually been dead for three years and her Inferius is currently running the library. Oh, and Filch is just three bags of sand piled on top of each other wearing a housecoat."

Minerva: [scoffing] "Please. And how would you possibly know about any of this?"

[Cuts to Hermione at Grimmauld Place.]

Winky: [slurring her words into a bottle of butterbeer] "And… and did Winky tell yous, Binns and the Bloody Baron be—" [She pauses, hiccuping.] "They be swimming with fishes every Wednesday when they be thinking Winky is asleeping. But Winky is not asleeping." [She shudders.] "Winky is awakened."

Harry: "You mean woke?"

Winky: [nodding somberly] "Winky is lit."

Hermione: [with palpable concern] "Harry, what's going on?"

Harry: [turning to face her] "Hm? Oh, right, sorry, Kreacher brought Winky over when I asked him to come chat about one of my cases."

Hermione: "Why?"

Harry: "Well, I've started using house elves as informants, did I tell you? Worked out well when we needed to find Mundungus, so I figured I'd keep doing it. Nobody notices them, so, like, I barely have to do any work."

Hermione: "No, I mean—why is Winky here with Kreacher?"

Kreacher: [gravely] "It be spaghetti time, Miss."

[At that, Winky stumbles to her feet, winking outrageously at Hermione and dragging the butterbeer behind her. Scene cuts back to Hermione and Minerva.]

Hermione: "Oh, right. It might also be worth mentioning that some of your house elves have drinking problems."

[Cuts back to Kingsley's office.]

Minerva: "So as you can see, you really need to get your house in order, Shacklebolt."

Kingsley: "What?!"

Luna: "Oh! Maybe you should try going undercover."

[Kingsley jumps in alarm as the camera pans out to reveal Luna standing behind him, gingerly massaging his shoulders.]
Kingsley: "FOR THE LOVE OF—"

Sorting Hat: "—BLOOD FEUDS AND RETRIBUTION!"

Kingsley: [frustratedly] "—how do you keep getting in here—"

Luna: [absentmindedly digging her elbow into a knot in Kingsley's shoulder] "Well, I'm just thinking—what better way to see how the Ministry is doing than going undercover to find out? Seems perfectly reasonable to me."

Kingsley: "I really wish you would stop touching me."

Luna: [lightly pounding his upper back with the blades of her hands] "Well, set achievable goals, I always say."

[Scene cuts to Harry and Theo interview.]

Rita: "So what exactly did you tell Granger? I'm still not understanding the purpose of this prank war."

Harry: "It's not really a prank war so much as a charming scam. You know, like… a whimsical beguilement."

Rita: "Well thank you, Herbert Parsnip, but I don't think I asked for clarification on the verbiage."

Harry: [to Theo] "Actually, what did you tell her, Nott?"

Theo: "Hm? Oh, I told her that secret santa is a weeklong series of alternating gift exchanges."

Rita: [skeptically] "And she believed that?"

Theo: [shrugging] "She really didn't have a choice."

[Hermione: [confused] "Wait. So I gave Malfoy a gift yesterday, and he gives me one today, and then I give him another one tomorrow?"

Theo: "Yes. And this goes on for several more days."

Hermione: "But that doesn't make any sense."

Theo: [pointing to the parchment] "The memo was printed with a Ministry seal, Granger. And it's in Didot font."

Hermione: "That's true." [She sighs.] "Well, I suppose the markers of authenticity are inarguable."

Theo: [patting her shoulder] "Exactly."

[Hermione: [pointing to the parchment] "The memo was printed with a Ministry seal, Granger. And it's in Didot font."

Hermione: "That's true." [She sighs.] "Well, I suppose the markers of authenticity are inarguable."

Theo: [patting her shoulder] "Exactly."

[Rita: "I genuinely worry about literally everyone who works here."

Harry: [resignedly] "Well, speaking of working here, I should probably go back to doing my job. Kingsley's been going undercover to all the offices, so I suppose I should try to pretend like I want
Theo: "Oh, is he doing that? I didn't realize he was having a sneakaround. I should have offered to join." [He shrugs.] "You know. It being the year of pranks and all that."

Harry: "Well, he seems really proud of his disguises, so try not to say anything if you see him."

Theo: "No promises."

Harry: "Right. Bye, then."

[Harry leans forward, brushing his fingers against Theo's arm. Theo leans in at the contact, cupping his free hand around a furtively concealed smirk.]

Rita: [blinking at Harry] "Did—did you just... caress him?"

Harry: [innocently] "Hm?"

Theo: "Who?"

Rita: "I just..." [With furrowed disbelief] "I just honestly don't understand how you didn't think I would see that."

Theo: "See what? I don't even know who this person is. Herbert Parfait, was it?"

Harry: "Parsnip, actually."

Theo: "Right. And also, he's not even remotely Draco's mother."

Harry: "True. Not even a little. Though we were possibly equally obsessed with him at one point in time."

Theo: "That's fair."

Rita: "No it isn't. That's mad."

Theo: "Yes, well, that's the world. Bye, then."

Harry: "Bye."

[Harry leaves.]

Rita: "Well. What now?"

Theo: "Work, I suppose."

Rita: "Working hard, are you?"

Theo: "I've done some things, yes."

[Cut to earlier that day in the office.]

Hermione: [holding a hand tentatively to her mouth] "What is this?" [She looks up at the camera, her eyes wide.] "Who put this here? It's—" [She swallows, glancing back down at the slim leather-bound volume, and whispers quietly to herself.] "He wrote this for me?"

[Cut back to Theo interview.]
Rita: [drily] "Ah, and is that all you did today?"

Theo: "Eh, more or less."

[Cuts to Hogwarts.]

Sorting Hat: [shrieking] "WHAT IS THIS?"

[Minerva jumps in place, turning to glare at it.]

Minerva: "What is it now, you shriveled stewed prune?"

Sorting Hat: "WHO PUT THIS HERE?"

Minerva: "Hold on, what the—" [She breaks off, frowning.] "Is this a ransom n- ah, nope, okay, it's signed 'Bowler Hat,' clearly this is—"

Sorting Hat: [wailing] "HE WROTE THIS FOR ME!"

[Cuts back to Theo.]

Theo: "Fine." [He shrugs.] "More 'more' than 'less,' I suppose."

Rita: "... right."

Theo: "Hey man, I could be worse."

[Cuts to Pansy and Daphne.]

Pansy: [thoughtfully] "I think I'd fuck a troll over a goblin."

Daphne: "Really? But trolls just seem so, you know. Needy in the bedroom."

Pansy: "Right, I get that, but there's no way a goblin would let me stab him in the heat of the moment. That's just—I just don't see that happening, frankly."

Daphne: "Right. That's fair. So would you kill the goblin, then?"

Pansy: "No, I'd definitely marry the goblin. Can you imagine the jewelry? I'd probably Imperius him to forget our anniversary just to be sure I got a tiara out of it." [She pauses.] "Or maybe really fancy handcuffs."

Daphne: [nodding] "Okay, see, I think I'd kill the troll, and I definitely see your argument about the metallurgy with the goblin—"

Pansy: "Right, yeah."

Daphne: "—but that leaves fucking the centaur, and I'm just not sure how feasible that is."

Pansy: "Which part?"

Daphne: "Well, I'm just not sure I buy into the whole divinist angle, you know what I mean? Like, is he going to fuck me and then go on for weeks about our astrological compatibility? That's just really not what I'm there for. I worry that there could be some clinginess involved."

Pansy: "Hm, true. So what then, kill the centaur?"
Daphne: "I actually think marry the centaur. I'll fuck the goblin, it's fine."

[Camera pans out to show that Kingsley is standing at the service counter. He is wearing a fake mustache and a lime green bowler hat, looking horrified to the very core of his being before he slowly backs out of the office.]

[Cuts to Kingsley interview.]

Kingsley: [whispering] "I've made a terrible mistake, and now I am shaken."

Luna: [patting his shoulder] "I think you mean 'shook,' but good try."

[Cuts back to Pansy and Daphne.]

Pansy: [brightly] "Oh, right, so speaking of fucking goblins—"

Daphne: "Yes, speaking of, back to the topic at hand."

Pansy: "Right. So, where do we stand on potentially fucking Weasley?"

Daphne: "How did that lead into this conversation, by the way?"

Pansy: [frowning in thought] "I think it started with 'things we would literally never do' and then transitioned into 'actually, things we might do upon further reflection,' which brought us approximately here."

Daphne: "Right. So where did we land on that?"

Pansy: "We didn't."

Daphne: "Ah, right. Because goblins."

Pansy: "Right. And I'm not sure it matters, anyway. Weasley is currently dating Granger, and I suppose it's probably one of those weird monotonous relationships, isn't it?"

Daphne: "You mean monogamous?"

Pansy: "Why, what did I say?"

Luna: "That doesn't seem like it'll last, though, does it?"

Pansy: [thoughtfully] "Well, that's true. But I'd rather not take the scraps of a relationship, you know what I mean? Even if it is for the benefit of my uninhibited sexual pleasure."

Daphne: [tentatively] "He does meet our standards, though, doesn't he?"

Pansy: "Which standards?"

Daphne: "Well, for one thing, he seems fairly comfortable with being ruthlessly dominated by women, to the point of it altering his entire psyche and possibly damaging him well into adulthood."

Pansy: "Mm, true. And he does take instruction well."

[Cuts to Ron and Pansy.]
Ron: "Okay, so one more time, there are three chasers—"

Pansy: [interrupting] "Weasley, I've decided something."

Ron: "Oh god."

Pansy: "No, it's fine, it's good."

Ron: "I doubt it."

Pansy: "Are you ready?"

Ron: "No."

Pansy: "Okay, here it is: I've decided you're going to be the next Head Auror."

Ron: [taken aback] "Why?"

Pansy: [shrugging] "I think I need friends in high places."

Ron: "Why don't you just befriend people in high places, then?"

Pansy: "Weasley, please. When I want you to be a cunt, I'll strip you down and grab a dildo. In the meantime, do be quiet."

Ron: "Am I allowed to ask questions?"

Pansy: [pausing] "Fine. You can ask three questions."

Ron: "Okay, first question: can I have more questions?"

Pansy: "No. Next?"

Ron: "Are you going to make me do anything illegal?"

Pansy: "Probably. Last one."

Ron: "How is this haircut?"

Pansy: "Bad. So, are we clear?"

[Cuts back to Daphne and Pansy.]

Daphne: "He really does check a lot of boxes."

Pansy: [sighing] "He really, really does."

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XVI-XVII

Summary: The Real World, continued. Olivie Advent Day 16 and 17, because it is finally the last race of Mr Blake's regular season, but the weekend has made me immensely tired.

[Scene opens with Ron and Hermione.]

Rita: "So, what's new with you two?"
Ron: "Not much, really. Working, I suppose."

[Cuts to earlier that day in the Auror office.]

Harry: "Right, so, we have a fairly high-profile case of organized pixie thefts in Knockturn Alley —"

Pansy: [interrupting] "Are the pixies being stolen, or are they doing the stealing?"

Harry: "Well, I'm not—" [He pauses.] "Sorry, why are you here?"
Luna: "It's a valid question."

Harry: "Luna? Why are y-" [He sighs.] "You guys know this is a closed meeting, right?"

Pansy: "I rather think it isn't, Potter. And anyway, it doesn't matter. Disregard my initial question, just write down that Weasley volunteers."

Ron: [startled] "What? I do?"

Pansy: "Yes. He'll be there with balls on."

[Cuts to Cormac.]

Cormac: "I feel that one's pretty self-explanatory."

[Cuts back to Auror office.]

Ron: "Why am I volunteering?"

Pansy: "Because."

Ron: "Oh."

Pansy: "Also, put these on."

Ron: [skeptically] "Are these leather trousers?"

Pansy: [shrugging] "We're just trying things out."
Daphne: "Personally, I wanted you to wear a deerstalker, but Pansy won the toss."

Harry: [frowning] "I'm just realizing there are no other Aurors in this room."

Luna: "Look at you, Harry! Observation."

Gilderoy: [solemnly] "Observation and voyeurism are similar but different things."

Luna: [cheerfully] "Yes, very good, Professor!"

Ron: "Wait. Couldn't I just wear the hat and the trousers at the same time?"

Pansy: "Of course not."

Daphne: "You can't run two experiments at the same time, Weasley."

Pansy: "It's a matter of attribution."

Daphne: "Besides, I never said anything about pants."

Harry: "So… should I just leave, or—?"

Luna: "Do you have somewhere else to be?"

Harry: "Not really."

Luna: [patting the seat beside her] "Come sit, then."

Harry: [resignedly] "Okay."

[He sits.]

Ron: "Hold on. What exactly is the experiment?"

Daphne: "Ooh, sorry, can't tell you."

Pansy: "It's a blind study."

Ron: [alarmed] "Am I going blind?"

Daphne: "I wouldn't worry about it."

Pansy: "Off you go, Weasley. You have pixies to wrangle."

Luna: "Or recover. As yet undetermined."

Harry: [eating popcorn] "I don't actually know, to be honest."

Ron: [as he is being shoved out the door] "Wait, but then how am I supposed to—"

Daphne: "Bye, Weasley!"

Pansy: "Take what's yours!"

Luna: "Manifest destiny!"

Gilderoy: "And if the door says 'ladies,' knock first!"
Ron: "I think I might possibly be some sort of political puppet?" [He frowns.] "But that can't be right—"

Hermione: [fidgeting, her ankle dancing as she crosses her legs tightly] "Well, you certainly haven't been doing anything else of note."

Ron: [startled] "What's that supposed to mean?"

Hermione: "I've seen beauty in your absence / I've known privilege all the same / I know the sun still rises / But I am gutted like a flame / For all that I have loved you / For how deeply I've adored / How bitter my devotion / Now my love's all but abhorred." [She pauses, sniffing.] "The world continues turning / I sleep and then I wake / You exist somewhere beside me / Never mine to give or take." [She pauses again, swiping at her eyes.] "Imagine me from time to time, while badly do I suffer / Transfigure me to weathered stone, that time may make me tougher."

Hermione: "I worship you best from my knees / I am holiest from there / Call me penitent in sorrow / Call my name while I despair—"

[She breaks off, bursting into tears.]

Hermione: [between bouts of muffled sobbing] "The last four pages were literally about my breasts and I've been crying on and off for forty-five minutes!"

[Cuts back to Hermione and Ron.]

Hermione: [stiffly] "Just out of curiosity, Ronald, how would you describe my hair?"

Ron: "Um. Brown?"

[Cuts back to Hermione reading aloud.]

Hermione: "... as tangled as our circumstance / As unruly as my heart / As brilliant as a sunbeam / As delicate as art." [She pauses, wailing.] "THAT MAJESTIC BASTARD!"

[Cuts back to Ron and Hermione.]

Ron: "No, wait, your hair is—" [He pauses.] "Pretty? No, wait, trick question." [He grins broadly.] "I value you for your brain, because your hair is not a reflection of your intellect."

Hermione: "Oh, just SHUT UP."

[She promptly storms out. Ron stares after her, puzzled, and then sighs.]

Ron: "You know, all of the women in my life are being very confusing at the moment."

Rita: "Well, Miss Parkinson and Miss Greengrass certainly seem to have taken an interest in you."

Ron: "True, Daphne seems to have warmed to me. I'm still not sure about Pansy, though." [He shifts uneasily] "Sometimes she seems like she's saying a nice thing, but I'm never fully convinced she isn't holding a knife, you know what I mean?"
Daphne: "That's the thing about being in Pansy's life. You never really know for sure if she likes you."

Pansy: "Well, I don't know. Eventually I think you sort it out."

Daphne: "We're certainly permitted our suspicions."

Pansy: "Yes. And in the event of confusion, I've written down all my opinions on people, with instructions to be read aloud at my funeral."

Pansy: "To Potter: I didn't actually want the Dark Lord to murder you. I probably would have managed to live with myself if he had, but it was really more of an in-the-moment expression of concern for my own well-being, and therefore almost not at all about you. Hope that makes you feel better. If it doesn't, I don't care. To Theo: I have almost no thoughts about you. Don't take that as an insult, but also don't take it as a compliment. It means nothing, which is coincidentally what you have meant to me. To Granger: I know it must have seemed like you annoyed me, and perhaps that I was rude to you out of some sort of inherent, baseless dislike. This is correct. Please know that nobody has ever annoyed me more than you, and that I have never had a reason. Some things just are. Also, in case I didn't get to say it while I was alive, please also know that the brown skirt you seem to like is the most terrible thing I've ever seen and I've set it on fire. Oh, note to Daphne: please see that this is done. Thank you. And also, I did genuinely like you, but don't tell anyone, because it's embarrassing."

Daphne: "That's very thoughtful of you."

Pansy: [nodding] "I like to think so."

Ron: "Well, anyway. I should probably go. Apparently I'm up for a promotion, and I think my girlfriend might be cross with me, so I suppose I should probably apologize."

Rita: "What are you planning to apologize for?"

Ron: [thinking] "Well, from experience, I've either unjustly blamed her cat, failed to ask her to the Yule Ball, or left her stranded on a horcrux hunt."

Rita: "Just... any one of those things?"

Ron: "I'll probably apologize for all of them, just to be safe."

Rita: "Fair enough. Oh, and I take it you haven't seen Gossip Girl's latest memo?"

Ron: [frowning] "No. What's it say?"

Seamus: "Well, between you and me and everyone, Weasley's quite the hot topic this morning."

Dean: "Yes. Apparently he's competing with Harry for the Head Auror job? Which I'm not sure he knows about. It doesn't seem like something he'd do on purpose."

Seamus: "Well, he did beat out Potter for Prefect, didn't he?"

Dean: "Yeah, but I'm pretty sure Dumbledore said that came to him in a dream."

Seamus: "I'm sure Kingsley has dreams too. He has a whimsical disposition, I think."

Dean: "Are you suggesting that Dumbledore had a whimsical disposition?"

Seamus: "Well he had a twinkle in his eye, didn't he? So it was definitely either whimsy or a vaguely dangerous mania."

Dean: "Right, true. Oh, and speaking of Kingsley, I've been meaning to ask—do we think that he might be Gossip Girl?"

Seamus: "Why do you say that?"

Dean: "Because he's been sitting here for three hours pretending to be a potted plant."

[Camera pans out to show Kingsley standing in a large ceramic pot. There are several leaves and twigs taped to his clothing. He sighs, rises to his feet, and drags the planter along behind him as he exits the office.]

Seamus: "Well, that's new."

Dean: "Sorry, what was the question?"

[Rita walks past the doorframe, coming to a sudden halt and pausing to poke her head in.]

Pansy: "Weasley, aren't you supposed to be working?"

Ron: [startled to his feet] "Yes, right, sorry—"

[He leaves. Pansy glances at Rita, arching a brow in disapproval.]

Pansy: "Is there a reason you're speaking to him?"

Rita: "Yes. And I know what you're doing, you know."

Pansy: [skeptically] "Oh really?"

Rita: "Obviously. You're not the first woman to try to prop up a useless man for her own selfish purposes, you know."

Pansy: "Hey, he's not totally useless! [She shrugs.] "I assume, anyway."
Pansy: "To Weasley: You're not totally useless. I assume." [She glances up.] "I update these on a biweekly basis, so, you know. All of it is subject to arbitrary change."

Pansy: [suspiciously] "Besides, who exactly have you propped up, Skeeter?"

Woman: "Look, we need to up your screen time, okay? For some reason the audience loves your idiotic non sequiturs, much as I utterly loathe them. If we're going to parlay this pile of steaming swamp-trash into something that's beneficial for both our careers—by which I mean mine, obviously—then we need to grab your middle-aged housewife demographic and milk it for all its worth." [A pause.] "Try following the blonde nonsense girl around. She seems to pop up everywhere."

Man: "If I do, then can we do this again? You have an absolutely spectacular—"

Woman: [interrupting] "I know I do, and no. Absolutely not. This was a mistake, and it's not happening again."

Man: "Does that mean tomorrow?"

Woman: [with irritation] "Yes. Obviously."

Luna: [curiously] "What are you doing, Lee?"

Rita: "I didn't mean me, you nasty twit. It was a metaphor."

Pansy: [sniffing] "Please. I think you mean metawhore."

Cormac: "Metawhore: when a person sleeping with another person for profit likens one situation to another in a way that isn't literally true, but helps explain an idea or make a comparison." [He brightens.] "Alternately, a self-referencing slutbag!"

Rita: "Fine. You stay out of my lane, I'll stay out of yours. Deal?"

Pansy: "Deal."

Cuts to Cormac.

Cormac: "Metawhore: when a person sleeping with another person for profit likens one situation to another in a way that isn't literally true, but helps explain an idea or make a comparison." [He brightens.] "Alternately, a self-referencing slutbag!"

Cuts back to Rita and Pansy.

Rita: "Fine. You stay out of my lane, I'll stay out of yours. Deal?"

Pansy: "Deal."

Cuts back to Pansy reading aloud.
Pansy: "To Rita Skeeter: I almost never keep my promises."

[She closes the book, smiling serenely at the camera.]

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Someone sent me a facebook post the other day from Nikki, who is having a tough time. I'm not in any facebook groups, but a note from me to you: I hope you are doing okay, and I am here for you in spirit (and also in the form of terrible jokes!)

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XVIII

Summary: The Real World, continued. Olivie Advent Day 18.

[Scene opens with Theo and Harry.]

Theo: "Honestly? I really thought this prank would be much more satisfying."

Harry: "That's true. It's been pretty quiet, and like—vaguely whimsical?"

Rita: "Whimsical?"

Harry: [to Theo] "Is there a better word for it?"

Theo: "Hm. There's definitely an element of quaintness."

Harry: "Sort of a… frolicsome effervescence?"

Theo: "It's kind of frothingly irritating, actually. Like, for example, take the third day—"

[Cuts to footage of the office.]

Draco: "Granger, what is this?"

Hermione: [blushing] "Hm?"

Draco: "This, Granger. This—this thing. What is it?"

Hermione: "It's an enchanted coffee mug, Malfoy. It keeps your coffee hot for twelve hours."

Draco: [bluntly] "What for?"

Hermione: "Oh, well, um—" [She pauses, flustered.] "I just noticed you're always using reheating charms in the afternoons or getting up to refill your cup, so I thought I'd charm one for you."

[There is a pause.]

Draco: [suspiciously] "I don't understand."

Hermione: "Oh, it's, er." [She is furiously crimson.] "It's a gift, Malfoy."

Draco: "For what?"

Hermione: "For secret sant-"

[She breaks off as Theo, who is sitting at his desk in the corner, lets out a loud, hacking cough.]

Hermione: "Sorry, anyway, like I was saying, it's my turn to exchange a gift for sec-"

[Theo abruptly begins coughing again.]
Draco: [with oppressive bewilderment] "I don't understand, Granger. You're giving me something... nice?"

Hermione: [sheepishly] "Well, after you gave me that book of p-"

[Theo makes a loud, unpleasant retching sound.]

Hermione: "Sorry, one second—Nott, are you dying?"

Theo: "Hm? No, I'm fine."

Hermione: "Right. Anyway, Malfoy, since you gave me that book of poe-"

[Harry enters, shoving the door open with a bang. The others slowly turn to stare at him.]

Harry: "Oh, hello."

Hermione: "Hi Harry. Do you need something?"

Harry: "Hm? What? No, carry on."

Hermione: "Oh. Well, as I was saying, after I read the p-"

[Theo and Harry cough loudly in unison.]

Draco: [with disgust] "Do you want to grab some coffee, Granger? Apparently if we stay here much longer, we'll both get the plague."

Hermione: "Oh." [She pauses, considering it.] "Yes, alright."

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry interview.]

Theo: "There were some logistical issues, so for ease of use, we put a taboo on the words 'secret santa' and 'poetry.' But don't worry, we fixed it so that they wouldn't die."

Harry: "The trade-off being that they would, however, be instantly swarmed by bees."

Theo: "Yeah. Taboos aren't great charms, to be honest with you. There's a definite underlying hint of darkness that you really can't shake."

Harry: "Right. So anyway, we thought day four might be more interesting, but—"

Theo: "But, much to our joint dismay—"

Lee, from off-screen: [wailing] "OTP!"

Theo: [grimly] "—it was not."

[Cuts to office footage.]

Hermione: "What's this?"

Draco: "Hm?"

Hermione: [exasperatedly] "Malfoy, do not start with me—"

Draco: "What's what, Granger? There's no need to get so beatifically shrill."
Hermione: "What's this tree, Malfoy?"

Draco: "Which tree?"

Hermione: "This one."

[Camera pans out to reveal a willow tree draped in blossoming enchanted flowers, many of which have fallen onto Hermione's desk and buried her paperwork beneath a snowy layer of petals.]

Draco: "Oh, that?"

Hermione: "Yes. This."

Draco: "It's a wishing tree."

Hermione: "What?"

Theo: [with confusion, and palpable disappointment, as if he were hoping for something much worse] "What?!"

Draco: "It's a wishing tree. If you take one of the flowers, you can make a small, unobtrusive wish. A reasonable one, though—like possibly fewer bees."

Hermione: "Oh, true." [She grimaces.] "I had no idea there were so many bees in the Ministry."

Draco: "Right. So anyway you just, er, make a wish, and—" [He waves a hand.] "It'll come true, provided it's not, you know. Alchemy, or something theoretically impossible, like understanding the answer to why you're dating Weasley."

Hermione: [with surprised awe] "Malfoy, this is so poet-"

[Theo ducks preemptively, covering his head.]

Hermione: "-ic."

[Theo pops back up, relieved.]

Hermione: "Really, almost as thoughtful as that book of poe-"

Theo: [as a loud, warning buzzing sound commences] "Oh no."

[Cut back to Harry and Theo.]

Harry: "It's possible we're responsible for a global bee shortage."

Theo: "Possible, but unlikely."

Harry: "Right. And anyway, we changed the taboo again, so it's fine."

Theo: "Yes. We also added the word 'bees' to the list, just in case."

Rita: "So what happens now if they use any of those words?"

Harry: "Hm? Oh, they die."

Theo: "He's joking. They won't die."
Harry: "We're pretty sure, anyway."

Theo: "TBD."

Harry: "No, but what will happen is they'll be forced into a simulation in which they have to fight each other to the death."

Theo: "But not actually die."

Harry: "We're pretty sure, anyway."

[Cuts to Draco and Hermione. They are in the throes of a fencing competition, which has destroyed the entire office. After an expert series of parries and feints, Draco taps Hermione in the chest with his sabre and they stop, both removing their helmets and attempting to speak between breaths.]

Draco: "What is that, another tie? 2-2?"

Hermione: "Yes, I think so. That was a good one, actually."

Theo: [from beneath a desk] "Maybe you guys should like, stop speaking to each other. Try getting some work done, maybe?"

Draco: "Well, wait. We were working, weren't we?"

Hermione: "Yes, I think so, and then we got interrupted."

Draco: [puzzled] "What were we talking about?"

Theo: [rubbing his temple] "Oh boy."

Hermione: "Well, I was just saying that I wasn't expecting much from you, but that book of poetr-"

Draco: [with a strike of fervor] "EN GARDE!"

[She breaks off as the simulation once again takes effect and both she and Draco resume their combative stances, replacing their helmets on their heads. Theo sighs, climbs into what appears to be a fort made from a pile of bookshelves, and continues doing his work.]

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry.]

Harry: "I'm not ready to call it a failure yet, but I'm not ready to call it a success, either."

Theo: "They do seem to be getting along, at least."

Harry: "That's true."

Theo: "How's Weasley taking it?"

Harry: [frowning] "I haven't seen him in a while, now that I think about it. I think he might be undercover, actually."

[Cuts to footage of Ron. He is painted bright blue.]

Ron: [whispering] "I'm infiltrating a pixie ring for whereabouts of the stolen goods. Or pixies, actually—TBD. Either way, they are notoriously judgmental creatures, so I've had to spend most of the day working on blending in properly and rising to the top of their social hierarchy. Luckily, Pansy's been very helpful with that."

[Cuts to Pansy interview.]

Pansy: "It's really easy, actually. All societies are essentially the same. Step one: be beautiful. If you can't be beautiful, be rich. Step two: find the current leader and damage them psychologically. If that's going to take too long—or, if in the rare event of proper leadership they can't be destroyed by virtue of insults and passive-aggressive comments about their intellect and/or weight, rise to the top incrementally. Win over each member. This can take some time, so lacking all else, the ideal situation is for everyone to find themselves in oh, I don't know—say, for example, a dangerous hostage situation, wherein you can win the respect of the group by expertly negotiating their release."

[Cuts back to Ron and the pixies. Daphne enters, dressed in an elaborate silver tiara and hoisting a large muggle chainsaw.]

Daphne: "You are all my prisoners!"

Ron: [in fluent pixie] "Chill, guys, I've got this. I'll negotiate our release."

[Cuts back to Pansy.]

Pansy: [shrugging] "Look, Weasley isn't beautiful or rich. Knowing which cards to play is an equally important strength for social domination."

[Cuts back to Harry and Theo.]

Harry: "Huh. Well, I'm sure he's fine."

Theo: "Cool. Brunch, then?"

Harry: "Oh, sure. Let me just grab my brunch cape."

Theo: "I thought you weren't into capes."

Harry: "You know, I thought I wasn't? But for some reason I just felt like I needed one."

[They exit the corridor, passing by a life-sized poster of Cormac enthusiastically wearing a cape that reads 'Mimosa Time.' Meanwhile, footage cuts to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "I have to say, I'm surprised by how well things are going with Malfoy. I mean, granted, I'm very sore and I keep inexplicably losing my train of thought, but we've been getting quite a lot of work done, too."

[Cuts to office footage.]

Draco: "You know, I think Hogwarts could stand to have some non-magic classes in its curriculum."

Hermione: [surprised] "Really?"

Draco: "Sure. I mean why aren't there art classes? Or photography, or music, or literature? And there's no expository writing classes, which means half the students that go there have about the same spelling capacity as the average concussed troll—"

Hermione: "That's true, and I have some experience with concussed trolls." [She pauses and then, thoughtfully, and with surprised pleasure: } "You know, I actually think this is great idea, Malfoy. I think I may have underestimated your interest in liberal arts."

Draco: "Who said I had any interest in your artsy liberalism, Granger?"

Hermione: "You like to write, don't you?"

Draco: [scoffing unconvincingly] "And how would you know that?"

Hermione: "Well, after seeing your book of po-"

Draco: [with a groan of obvious fatigue] "EN GARDE!"

They both reach sluggishly for their helmets, feeling blindly for their sabres. Footage cuts back to Hermione interview.

Hermione: [nursing a sore bicep] "In any case, maybe I was wrong about us not working well together."

Camera pans out to reveal Luna on her right side, drinking a mimosa.

Luna: "Yes, but the important thing is that I wasn't wrong."

Hermione: "Hey, where'd you get that?"

Luna: [sipping loudly] "It's kind of invitation-only."

Hermione: "Oh."

Camera pans out further to reveal Gilderoy on Hermione's left side, also drinking a mimosa.

Gilderoy: "This juice makes me feel things!"

Camera pans out further to show Severus lying on a beach towel in the middle of the floor, drinking his mimosa from an elaborate straw. He is wearing a 'Mimosa Time' cape.

Severus: "I feel like I'm forgetting something."

Camera cuts to Hogwarts.

Sorting Hat: "Come out, come out, Bowler Hat. You said three o'clock sharp, and here I am, ready for a reckoning!" [The hat brandishes a large shotgun, aiming it into the darkened corridor.] "THIS IS THE EYE OF THE STORM, MY FRIEND!"

Cuts back to office footage.

Severus: "Eh. [He shrugs.] "Probably wasn't important."

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XIX

Summary: The Real World, continued. Olivie Advent Day 19.

[Scene opens with Marcus, Neville, and Cormac.]

Marcus: "Longbottom, you've got to do something about these nightmare plants. They're crowding my desk. And also, they're poisonous and I might die."

Neville: "Oh, they just need to be re-potted, that's all. They're in those rebellious teen years where all they want is to establish possession over their surroundings."

Marcus: "What, like a dog pissing on trees?"

Cormac: "First of all, that's totally obscene. And secondly, it's more like humping."

Marcus: "For fuck's sake, McLaggen—"

Neville: "No, no, he's right. There's a definite layer of sexual underpinning."

Cormac: [loftily] "That's called missionary, Longbottom. And should you really be doing that with your plants?"

Neville: "No, I probably shouldn't."

Marcus: "I—hold on. You shouldn't and you aren't, right?"

Neville: "Pass."

[Ginny enters.]

Ginny: "Oh, hey guys. Is Zabini around?"

Marcus: "No, not at the moment. Why?"

Ginny: "Well, I got his invitation to the Slug Club reunion and I was coming to RSVP, but I actually have a few questions first."

Cormac: "Well, to answer your first question: no, we probably shouldn't."

Ginny: "I don't—what?"

Cormac: "Unless you really want to. In which case—" [He shrugs.] "Fine."

Ginny: "Is this about sex?"

Cormac: "No, those are just my standard answers to the usual first round of questions with regard to crudités. If you have questions about sex, though, I'm going to need more details. For example, will there be any operation of heavy machinery?"

Ginny: "I highly doubt it."

Cormac: "Well, then the answer is a gracefully ambiguous maybe."

Ginny: "Look, I'm just—I just don't understand, like, any of this. I mean, why is this event black tie? Isn't it just half a dozen people? And why is it being held at Hogwarts? I really thought it was just going to be, you know, inside the Ministry somewhere."

Neville: "Well, Blaise moved it to Hogwarts after he found out that the Ministry quidditch game was going to be held there."

Ginny: [surprised] "What? Is that Pansy's doing?"

Marcus: "Actually, I believe Parkinson wanted to build a stadium specifically for it, but apparently that budget request wasn't approved."

[Cuts to Seamus and Dean.]

Seamus: "Look, I wanted to make it work."

Dean: "We just couldn't get around the unforgivable excess."

Seamus: "You say unforgivable, I say necessary."

Dean: [skeptically] "You say necessary?"

Seamus: "Well, worth watching, at least."

Dean: "Better."

[Cuts back to the office.]

Neville: "I also heard Pansy had nude statues commissioned of her and Daphne for it."

[Cuts to Pansy and Daphne.]

Pansy: "What? Nude statues for a quidditch game? Longbottom should be fired, that would be completely insane."

Daphne: "Yes. Who would do that, honestly?"

Pansy: [scoffing] "Ridiculous."

Daphne: "That statue was for our living room."

Pansy: "Yes, because we aren't unhinged narcissists."

Daphne: [nodding] "We're private ones."

Pansy: "By the way, did we tell you? We're moving in together."

Daphne: "By which we mean Pansy got evicted."

Pansy: [shrugging] "Potato, potato. Apparently not all landlords can handle a little bit of lip these days."
Daphne: "You told him you were going to ‘cock-slap him so hard his dentures would fall out of his cunt purse,’ and then you cursed all the items in his kitchen to periodically explode."

Pansy: "Yes, and like I said, apparently not all landlords can handle that."

[Cuts back to the office.]

Ginny: [tentatively] "This all seems a little bit excessive. Is this all Zabini's doing?"

Neville: "There's really no way of knowing."

Marcus: "We don't even know if he works here."

Cormac: "Who, Blaise?"

[Cuts to Marcus and Oliver.]

Marcus: "Actually, we were the ones who thought it would be best if we just had the quidditch game at the Hogwarts pitch, since it is technically the closest to an operational infirmary."

Oliver: "Yeah. In terms of crisis management, Hogwarts is probably the best place to be."

Marcus: "Plus, it's pretty safe. I mean, people have only died there…” [He pauses, considering it, and frowns.] "Okay, well, retraction: a lot of people have died there."

Oliver: [quickly] "But not of quidditch injuries."

Marcus: "Yes, right, saved it. They definitely died from murder labyrinths and bathroom snakes, not quidditch."

Oliver: "Right. So anyway, we figured that's the best place for it."

[Cuts back to office footage.]

Marcus: "I guess there are worse places to be. Plus it is a bigger venue, which might be necessary, seeing as it seems like everyone is bringing a date."

Cormac: "Hold on. How did you get back here so fast?"

Marcus: "What?"

Ginny: "Wait—I'm not bringing a date. Should I be?"

Neville: "I'd ask you to go with me, Ginny, but I'm bringing Luna."

Ginny: [surprised] "Oh, I didn't know you two were—"

Luna: "He doesn't mean me."

[Camera pans out to reveal Luna perched on Neville's desk, stroking the leaf of a garishly violet plant.]

Neville: "That's Luna."

Ginny: "I know that's Luna."

Neville: "No, I meant that."
[Camera pans out further to show Gilderoy leaning over, attempting to lick the leaf of what is quite obviously a poisonous herb.]

Neville: [sternly] "Hey, what'd I just say?!

Gilderoy: [sighing] "No licking."

Neville: "Exactly, no licking—"

Gilderoy: [sulkily] "I hate that rule."

Ginny: "Seems like a pretty good rule, honestly."

Gilderoy: [sniffing disapprovingly] "Red-mouth pretty-tits seems to disagree."

[Cuts to Rita glancing in a small silver compact, applying her signature crimson lipstick. She catches the camera behind her and turns, sparing it a glare.]

Rita: "Jordan, what the ever-living fuck do you want?"

[Camera abruptly jostles, cutting back to the office.]

Ginny: "Well, whatever. See you guys there, I guess. Oh, and Kingsley, I'll have my notes for that Knockturn investigation on your desk by three this afternoon."

[Camera pans out to reveal Kingsley standing beside the bookcase near the door, holding a variety of coats.]

Kingsley: [gruffly] "Thank you."

Ginny: "No problem."

[She leaves.]

Neville: [thoughtfully] "You know, I did find it a bit odd that the coat rack didn't say anything to me this morning."

Marcus: "Sorry, you thought that was weird?"

Neville: "Well, usually it says something to compliment me when I set my coat on it. Something like 'that ass looks toooight in them trousers' or 'damn son, noice cardie,' or—"

Cormac: [interrupting] "That's not the coat rack. That's me."

Neville: "I—what?"

Cormac: "Coat racks don't talk, Longbottom."

Neville: "Yeah, but—"

Cormac: "And hey, listen, I appreciate your work attire. I dig your whole business casual, bureaucrat-on-the-brink vibe, you know? [He shrugs.] "No hobo, obviously."

Marcus: "Did you just say 'no hobo'?"

Cormac: "Yeah, I mean. I have my own clothes. I'm not homeless. I just appreciate how Longbottom wears his cardies, so, you know—no hobo."
Seamus: "Meh. Sounds gay."

Cormac: "What?"

Kingsley: [whispering] "So listen, I've been in this office for over four hours."

[Kingsley turns back to the camera] "Frankly, I'm very proud and relieved to report that during that time, nothing life-alteringly disturbing was said or done in my presence."

Cormac: "Guys, question. Would it be better to fuck a boggart?"

Marcus: "Better as opposed to what? Not fucking it?"

Cormac: [scoffing] "Don't be ridiculous."

Neville: "A boggart is just a manifestation of your fears, McLaggen. What would you even be fucking?"

Cormac: "Myself, only with smaller calves."

Kingsley: [sighing] "Nevermind. Forget everything I've ever said."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: I can't believe we're on day 19? What even the fuck? By the way, this ends on December 24, but a new one shot will post on the 25th, because as far as I can tell the true meaning of Christmas is the selfless offering of unmitigated filth.

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XX

[Scene opens with Dean and Seamus.]

Seamus: "So, get this: apparently Weasley and Granger are, much like my preferred method of whisky consumption, on the rocks."

Dean: [scoffing] "Sea, don't be ridiculous."

Seamus: "What? I didn't make this up, Dean. According to Gossip Girl's memo this morning, they're really not doing well."

Dean: "Okay, fine, but you definitely don't take your whisky on the rocks."

Seamus: [indignantly] "Sometimes I do, Dean. You don't know everything. Sometimes I'm in a different room from you." [He pauses.] "Or, you know, somewhere else in the same room."

Dean: "Okay, first of all, you don't even drink whisky, and I know that for a fact. The last time I tried to pour you some you told me to 'get out of here with my toxic masculinity' and 'bring you a Cosmopolitan as Godric Gryffindor intended,' which can't possibly be right—"

Seamus: "Honestly, don't you read? It's notably his signature drink."

Dean: [sighing] "I really don't think that's in any way canon."

Seamus: "None of this is, Dean. And more's the pity for it, frankly."

Dean: "True."

Seamus: "Anyway, I have to say, I was getting bored with that whole Granger-Weasley pairing. I'm glad we finally get to see what else is out there. I mean, will Granger finally get with Potter? We've been talking about that possibility for years. Or hey, who knows, maybe Weasley will get with Potter." [He shrugs.] "Weirder things have happened, right?"

Dean: "I really don't think they have. And do you really think they were all just biding their time until they could swap around?"

Seamus: "I really don't see any other reason for it."

[They pause.]

Dean: "Eh. Fair enough."

[cuts to Ron and Hermione.]

Rita: "So, I take it you both have seen the latest from Gossip Girl?"

Ron: "Yes, we have, and one of us is taking it very poorly."
Hermione: stiffly "I assume by that you mean me?"

Ron: "What? No. You've been here for two minutes, I have no idea how you're taking it. I'm taking this very badly."

Hermione: with stark indignation "What? Are you saying this is somehow worse for you than it is for me?"

Ron: "Of course it is. I mean, do you even know how hard the last couple of days have been for me?"

[Cuts to Ron, Pansy, and Daphne.]

Ron: "Right, so, it turns out that Harry's little so-called 'pixie theft' was actually a massive magical narcotics bust tied to a kidnapping ring, so technically the pixies were both stealing and being stolen."

Daphne: "Yes, and naturally the first thing we did was accidentally implicate Weasley by making him the leader of what we didn't realize was the equivalent of a dangerous armed mob."

Pansy: "In my defense, the whole thing seemed very normal. There were maybe one or two mentions of murder and abduction but, to be honest, that's pretty standard in all my conversations." [She shrugs.] "What can I say? I like what I like."

Ron: "Well, anyway, I got arrested for a second there—"

Daphne: "But luckily, we'd had the foresight to change his emergency contacts to us."

Ron: "That, and Harry was the one who did the arresting, so he sort of already knew I wasn't a pixie mob boss."

[Cuts to Harry.]

Harry: "Honestly, I did stop to question it for a second. I'm not suggesting that I believe Ron's a dangerous criminal, of course, but I definitely am suggesting that he had a worrying amount of control over those pixies."

[Camera pans out to show Pansy eyeing her fingernails next to him.]

Pansy: "Oh, that was me—I taught him how to more effectively threaten their families. At first he was just trying to intimidate them with, I don't know, some line about swimming with the fishes? And I was like Weasley, I can't believe I'm saying this, but sex really doesn't seem like the answer at this particular moment."

Harry: "Oh." [He shrugs.] "That makes sense."

[Cuts back to Ron, Pansy, Daphne.]

Pansy: "We had also changed the details of his medical records, so it's sort of unfortunate that he was only arrested and not, you know, stabbed."

Daphne: "You mean fortunate, right?"

Pansy: "Eh. I said what I said."

Ron: "Hold on, you did what?!"
Pansy: "In my defense, I just wanted to see what would happen."

Ron: "That's not a defense!"

Daphne: "I'm sure we'll have another chance, though."

Ron: "What?"

Pansy: [brightly] "Well, that's true. There's a lot of other ways for him to get gravely injured, I suppose."

Daphne: [cautioning] "Only if he breaks up with Granger, though."

Ron: "What?"

Pansy: [surprised] "Really, Daphne? What is this supposed to be—morality?"

Daphne: "Well, yeah. I mean look, I may not have any ethics, but I do have some scruples."

Ron: "What?"

Pansy: [shrugging] "Well, all I have are urges, so—"

Daphne: "Still. He'll have to break up with Granger or it's not an option. Okay?"

Ron: [frantically] "What's not an option?"

Pansy: "Ugh, fine." [She sighs heavily.] "Well, break it off then, Weasley. What are you waiting for?"

Ron: [uneasily] "You're not talking about my bones, are you?"

Daphne: "Only one of them. And that's really more of a euphemism than anything."

Ron: "Oh."

Pansy: "By the way, how was Azkaban?"

Ron: "I didn't actually have to go to Azkaban. I turned over the evidence I'd gathered during my undercover operation."

Pansy: [disappointed] "Oh."

Daphne: [to Pansy] "I take it Potter didn't accept your bribe then, Pans?"

Pansy: "Apparently not!"

[Cuts back to Ron and Hermione.]

Ron: "So yeah, I've had a rough couple of days."

Hermione: [irritably] "And what do you think I've been doing, then?"

[Cuts to footage of Draco and Hermione's office. Their desks are no longer situated across the room; now her desk is pushed against his, and their paperwork is sprawled over both surfaces.]

Hermione: [eyeing the paperwork thoughtfully] "Okay, so I think we've finalized all the curriculum requirements, plus we've updated the safety manuals, so all that's left are the emergency walk-throughs I have to do, and then—"

Draco: "I can do those with you if you want, Granger."

Hermione: [surprised] "Really?"

Draco: "Well, yeah, of course."

[She stares at him.]

Draco: "What?"

Hermione: [furiously] "WHAT THE FUCK, MALFOY?!"

Draco: "EXCUSE ME, YOU PETAL-FACED WREATH OF MAGNIFICENCE?"

Hermione: "Don't do that. DO NOT DO THAT AGAIN—"

Draco: "DO WHAT AGAIN?!"

Hermione: "YOU KNOW WHAT YOU DID YOU HORRIBLE, CONCEITED, MONSTROUSLY BREATHTAKING WORDSMITH—"

Draco: "LISTEN UP YOU CELESTIAL EMPRESS, I DON'T KNOW WHY YOU'RE SHOUTING AT ME—"

Hermione: "I'M SHOUTING? YOU'RE SHOUTING, YOU PORCELAIN-SKINNED INVEIGLER—"

Draco: "IF YOU HAVE SOMETHING TO SAY, GRANGER, THEN JUST COME OVER HERE AND SAY IT TO MY FACE!"

Hermione: "FINE! HOW CLOSE IN YOUR FACE DO YOU WANT ME?!"

Draco: "JUST LAY IT ON ME, GRANGER!"

Hermione: "I—" [she pauses, frustrated.] "I CAN'T! I'M DATING RON!"

Draco: "AND WHOSE FAULT IS THAT?!"

Hermione: "YOURS!"

Draco: "YOU'RE RIGHT. I SHOULD HAVE JUST KILLED HIM WHEN I HAD THE CHANCE!"

Hermione: [hastily] "No, no, wrong direction—"

Draco: "What? Sorry, just got sort of swept up in it—"

Hermione: "YOU WEREN'T SUPPOSED TO BE A DEATH EATER, MALFOY! YOU WERE SUPPOSED TO JUST—YOU WERE SUPPOSED TO—"

Draco: "WHAT, LOVE YOU?!!"

Hermione: [torn] "Well—YES!"
Draco: "WE NEVER DISCUSSED THAT! HOW IS THIS POSSIBLY MY FAULT?"

Hermione: "DID YOU FORGET ABOUT THE MURDER THING?"

Draco: "THAT WAS MURDER-ADJACENT AT BEST AND YOU KNOW IT!"

Hermione: "THAT ISN'T EVEN A THING!"

[Cut to Cormac.]

Cormac: "Oh, murder-adjacent is definitely a thing. It's when someone gets inadvertently murdered, but you just happened to be standing next to it."

Draco, from out of camera view: "No, no, it's—"

[He stomps over, stooping to whisper in Cormac's ear.]

Cormac: [listening intently] "Mhm, mmhmm, okay so you tried to kill Dumbledore but didn't, because you almost killed Weasley instead? Mm, right, yes, okay—and you definitely poisoned some mead? And—Imperius curse? Oh. Hm. Definitely some intent there but, mmhmm, yes, I see." [Draco steps away and he nods.] "Yes, okay."

Draco: [hopefully] "Okay?"

Cormac: "What? Oh, no. Sorry, I mean to say that in that case, murder-adjacent is definitely not a thing."

Draco: "What the fuck, man?"

Cormac: [shrugging] "I don't make the rules, Malfoy. I just comment unnecessarily on them."

[Cut back to Draco and Hermione.]

Draco: "SO WHAT NOW, THEN? IT'S JUST 'NOT A THING' AND I'M TOO LATE?"

Hermione: "YES! IT'S NOT A THING, AND YOU'RE TOO LATE!"

Draco: [swallowing] "Oh."

[They pause.]

Hermione: "You know I'm with him, Malfoy." [She sighs.] "You should have said something five years ago."

Draco: [frustrated] "YOU'RE SUPPOSED TO BE THE BRIGHTEST WITCH OF YOUR AGE, GRANGER!"

Hermione: "THAT LITERALLY MEANS NOTHING! A HOGWARTS DROPOUT SAID THAT TO ME! AND A WEREWOLF, AND AN ESCAPED CONVICT—"

Draco: "SO WHAT, THEN?"

Hermione: [exhaling] "So nothing."

[They pause for several minutes.]

Draco: "So." [He clears his throat.] "Should we just do those walk-throughs tomorrow?"
Hermione: uncomfortably "Yeah, sure. That sounds fine."

[Cuts back to Ron and Hermione.]

Ron: "Look, I don't know what you've been doing, Mione. Working?"

Hermione: irritated "Do you even know what I do?"

Ron: "I—" He pauses. "It's something about paperwork, isn't it?"

Hermione: "Ron! Seriously?"

Ron: "What?! It's not like you take any interest in activities I like! Do you even know where I was the past three days?"

Hermione: "I don't know. Quidditch?"

Ron: "That's? That's not a place."

Hermione: "Oh pipe down, Ronald. If this is about a spider again, I swear—"

Ron: "Seriously?"

[She rises to her feet, storming off.]

Ron: "I ALMOST GOT ARRESTED!"

[Cuts to Harry.]

Harry: "I did consider taking Ron to Azkaban just to see what it would be like. Plus Pansy offered me a lot of money, and I may be rich, but I'm not stupid."

Theo: "Well, carting Weasley off to wizard prison would have fit in nicely with the year of pranks."

Harry: "Is that really a prank, though? Or just like, a vaguely terrible thing to do?"

Theo: shrugging "You tell me."

Harry: "Well, in general, this whole prank war business is not entirely a success. You might have been right about me not being any better at them."

Theo: resting a comforting hand on his shoulder "Hey, don't beat yourself up over it."

Harry: "I wasn't. I'm fine."

Theo: "Oh. Oh good."

[He reluctantly removes his hand.]

Harry: "You can put that back, if you want."

Theo: "Oh."

[He replaces his hand.]

Harry: "Besides, there's still time, don't you think?"
Theo: "Eh, it's not promising, but sure. I'm willing to give you the benefit of the doubt."

Harry: "Thanks. How's your other prank going, by the way?"

Theo: "Hm?"

[Cuts to Hogwarts.]

Sorting Hat: hysterically "HE HAS MY WIFE!"

Minerva: sighing "For the last time you cunting swine, you don't have a wife."

Sorting Hat: "BECAUSE HE TOOK HER!"

Minerva: "He's a hat—"

Sorting Hat: "HE'S A MONSTER!"

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry.]

Theo: "Eh, it's pretty much on schedule."

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XXI-XXII

Summary: The Real World, continued. Olivie Advent Day 21-22.

[Scene opens with Severus and Luna.]

Luna: "What have you been up to? You've been rather quiet."

Severus: [painting a lime green bowler leading a threatening army of knife-wielding Santa hats] "Oh, just getting into the holiday spirit."

Luna: [surprised] "Holiday spirit?"

Severus: "Yes. You know. That thing that seems to infect everyone like a virus."

[Cuts to Cormac interview.]

Cormac: "Coincidentally, 'holiday spirit' is also what I call my penis."

[Cuts back to Severus and Luna.]

Luna: "I didn't realize you were so enthusiastic about Christmas, Severus."

Severus: "Does that surprise you?"

Luna: "A bit, yes. The words 'jolly' and 'festive' don't really spring to mind as things I would expect you to enjoy."

Severus: [scoffing] "You're referring to the commercialities of the holiday. But Santa Claus is, of course, a scam."

Luna: "You know, people often say that. But they say the same things about nargles and flu shots, so—"

Severus: "Well, in this case, they're correct. The myth of 'Father Christmas' comes from Odin, the Norse god, and the traditional corresponding Viking celebrations of the winter solstice, i.e. the demonic plunging of the world into much deserved, near-unceasing darkness, casting all the wretchedness of humanity into a burdensome void of nothingness at the whims of our apathetic overlords." [He sighs contentedly.] "A charming time of year."

Luna: "Right, yes."

Severus: [continuing] "As I was saying, Odin was of course a ghastly specter who would lead some of his uncivil god friends, a handful of ghosts, and all his various celestial sword-whores on a grisly hunt above the rooftops, terrifying children and forcefully breaking into their homes to leave them threatening gifts of toys and candies."
Luna: "Hm. So, I suppose the proper words to describe the holiday spirit would be…"

[Cuts to Cormac interview.]

Cormac: "Yeah, that sounds right."

[Cuts back to Severus and Luna.]

Severus: "Not to mention the implication of blind obedience to a capricious, terror-inducing deity in exchange for the promise of sweets."

Luna: "Oh."

[She looks somewhat lost, as though the very core of her beliefs has been called into question. Severus, meanwhile, offers her a box of candy.]

Severus: "Fizzing Whizbee?"

Luna: [accepting it] "Oh!"

[Cuts to Dean and Seamus interview.]

Rita: "So, have you two read the new memo from Gossip Girl?"

Dean: "I have a question. Why do you always ask us about Gossip Girl?"

Seamus: "Yeah! Riddle us that, Miss Thing. You make it sound like all we do all day is sit around here talking about our colleagues!"

Dean: "It's incredibly prejudicial, you know."

Seamus: "Yeah! Do you realize how much you've given into gratuitous stereotypes by repeatedly asking us specifically to discuss it?"

Rita: [confused, and artfully offended] "Excuse me?"

Seamus: "I mean, of course we're expected to be the ones gossiping, aren't we? Because this whole thing is a small-minded, discriminatory, heteronormative cockfest of an exercise, isn't it?"

Dean: "Yes. Frankly, it speaks volumes that you would regularly choose to pose this question to the two of us over everyone else who works at this office."

Seamus: "Yes! Just because we are an openly Irish couple—"

Dean: [haltingly] "Wait, no. What?"

Seamus: "Hm?"

Dean: "I—that's, no. First of all, I'm not Irish."

Seamus: "Openly ginger, then."

Dean: "No."

Seamus: "Openly prone to arson?"
Dean: "Also no, but—closer?" [He considers it.] "No. Nope. That's still not right."

Seamus: "Openly conservative."

Dean: "No, I was trying to say that we—wait." [He frowns.] "You're a conservative?"

Seamus: "I notoriously oppose big government, Dean. You know this."

Dean: [bemused] "But Sea, you work for the government."

Seamus: "Yes, and I think I've made it very clear my work here is almost entirely an exercise of self-loathing."

Dean: "Well, fine. But still, as we were saying—"

Seamus: [to Rita] "Listen you bigoted hussy, just because we are two men in a loving, supportive venture capitalist startup does not mean we are the only people who can be consulted about Gossip Girl."

Dean: "That's still not—" [He shrugs.] "You know what? What he said."

Rita: "Fine. Forget I asked, then."

[They pause.]

Seamus: "Okay, but did you guys read it, though? It was juicy as fuck."

Dean: "It really, really was."

[Cuts to Theo and Draco in the office.]

Theo: "Hey, did you see Gossip Girl's latest memo?"

Draco: [absentmindedly] "Yeah, yeah, yeah. I'll read about Finnegan and Thomas' torrid sex life later, Theo."

[Cuts to Seamus and Dean.]

Seamus: "Oh, yeah! We're also gay!"

Dean: "Slipped your mind, did it?"

Seamus: "There are just so many other ways I define myself, Dean."

Dean: "Such as?"

Seamus: [ticking them off on his fingers] "Entrepreneur. Maverick. Animal lover. Coffee drinker. Leather enthusiast. Connoisseur of artisan cocktails. I could go on; I mean 'habitual consumer of dick' has to be what, twentieth on the list?"

Dean: [gently] "Okay, right, but in terms of relevance—"

Rita: "Basically what I get from this is that you're rightfully accusing me of belittling you to a pair of gossipy queens."

Dean: "Yes, that."
Seamus: "Ohhhhh." [He pauses.] "How dare you?"

[Cuts back to Draco and Theo.]

Theo: "Draco, bud, I really think you should read it."

Draco: "Well, I can't. I'm late for these Hogwarts walk-throughs and Granger's going to give me one of her horrifyingly arousing lectures any minute."

Theo: "Yes, true, but before you go—"

Draco: "Love you, mean it—"

Theo: [hastily] "Yes yes I love you too, but—"

Draco: "BYE!"

[He leaves. Theo heaves a sigh.]

Theo: "So, anyway. I take it you needed something, then, Minister?"

[Camera pans out to reveal Kingsley standing in the corner wearing a camouflaged suit of armor. He flips up the visor, looking grim.]

Kingsley: "What exactly does this department do for the Ministry, Nott?"

Theo: "Um, well, the prank war is sort of headquartered here."

Kingsley: "Is that the explanation for this office being in literal shambles?"

[There are discarded sabres on the floor. Most of the furniture is irrevocably damaged.]

Theo: "Fine and no."

Kingsley: [dubiously] "Yes and no?"

Theo: "Fine. More 'yes' than 'no,' but—"

Kingsley: "What about the changes to Hogwarts curriculum? Those are Miss Granger's doing, correct?"

Theo: "And Draco's, yeah."

Kingsley: "And you've been…?"

Theo: "Fine, thank you. And yourself?"

Kingsley: "I meant more along the lines of what you've been doing."

Theo: "Oh, well I recently learned how to flambé. Great for parties. Less great for love-making, but you know, there's a sensitive balance."

[Cuts to Pansy.]

Pansy: [shrugging] "It happens. This is why we have liability waivers."

[Cuts back to Theo and Kingsley.]
Kingsley: "Okay, so let me get this straight: your department doesn't do anything at all, except for a weird loophole Miss Granger found in an old contract containing a clause that enabled her to take complete bureaucratic control of Hogwarts."

Theo: "Yes."

Kingsley: "So all this work—all of it has been for the school?"

Theo: "Yes."

Kingsley: "Hm. And how much of it was done by you?"

Theo: "Sorry, do you mean this stuff?"

[Camera pans over to Theo's makeshift fort of desks and bookshelves.]

Kingsley: "No. This stuff."

[Camera pans to a small pile of paperwork on Hermione's desk.]

Theo: "Oh. Yeah, none of it."

Kingsley: "You do realize you're essentially useless, then, don't you?"

Theo: "I've heard that before, yes. But don't say it too many times or you'll incite my daddy issues, Minister, and I simply don't have time for an unhealthy sexual attachment to you right now."

Kingsley: [tutting quietly] "I'm afraid this is unacceptable, Theodore."

Theo: "That's another thing my father used to say to me, sir! You've got a real knack for it."

Kingsley: "I have to say, I'm rather disappointed."

Theo: "You sound just like him!"

Kingsley: "I'm going to leave before this gets worse."

Theo: "Dad, is that you? No, no, I'm kidding. I mean, it is verbatim his usual abandonment threat, but I do totally see how in this particular instance leaving would be completely necessary."

[Cuts to Kingsley interview as he walks through the halls.]

Kingsley: "Well, clearly we're going to have to trim the fat around here. I've been to every office at this point and granted, there's a spectacular mess going on in all of them, but the Department of Magical Contracts and Tortfeasor Comeuppance is definitely going to have to be absorbed into something else, if not severed outright. [He pauses outside the door to the Auror office, pushing the door open.] "Luckily I still have Potter to count on, right?"

[Harry looks up from his desk, a bit startled at Kingsley's entrance.]

Harry: "Need something, Kingsley?"

Kingsley: "No, nothing Harry, nothing. Carry on." [Sighing happily, he turns to the camera.] "Isn't it nice to have one office that runs smoothly?"

[Behind him, Theo's head pops up from underneath Harry's desk. Harry shoves him back down] and smiles awkwardly as Kingsley turns to beam approvingly at him.

Luna's voice, from beneath the desk: "Ooh, what are we doing under here?"

Theo's voice: "What?! How did you—"

Gilderoy's voice, also beneath the desk: "Hey, I was here first!"

Theo's voice: "How long have you been there, exactly?"

Gilderoy's voice: [morosely] "Shrill voice nipple queen says I'm not allowed to say."

Kingsley: [frowning] "Sorry Harry, did you say something?"

Harry: "Hm? Oh, nope! Just filing some paperwork, you know. The usual. Anxious to get out of here, you know how it is."

[There is a thud beneath the desk.]

Kingsley: "Well, I'll leave you to it, then. I'm sure you'd like to leave before the festivities tomorrow—must be full of holiday spirit, eh, Harry?"

Theo's voice: "Oi. Phrasing."

[Cuts to Cormac.]

Cormac: "For the record, I call it that because it always comes too early and never lasts as long as you'd like. And also, it drains your wallet." [He pauses, brightening.] "And people have written songs for it!"

[Cuts back to Harry and Kingsley.]

Harry: "I wouldn't say I'm full of holiday spirit at the moment." [He clears his throat, half-smiling.] "Though I expect I'll be accosted with it later."

Kingsley: [curiously] "Oh?"

Harry: "Well, we'll see. Who knows? Maybe I'll pass on some of my own holiday spirit instead. Inject it into a few other—" [He cuts off, doubling over, as there is a loud clatter beneath the desk.] "I didn't mean—not an actual few, I was just—it's a saying, but anyway—" [He exhales, shaking his head.] "Just the one person, sorry."

Luna's voice: "Aww!"

Kingsley: [confused] "Well, I would think you'd want to spread your holiday spirit around to everyone you meet, Harry, not just one person."

Harry: "Well, sometimes I think so too, Kingsley, but I think society generally prohibits it."

[Cuts to Daphne and Pansy.]

Daphne: "It's the goddamn patriarchy, man."

Pansy: [eyeing her fingernails] "Thanks, Shacklebolt."

[Camera pans out to show Kingsley standing behind them, arms folded.]
Kingsley: "So are you two planning on working, or—?"

Daphne: "Oh, let's see. Pans?"

Pansy: "Hm, hm, hm…" [She rolls a die.] "Well, it came up 'masturbate for an hour,' so yeah, we will. Probably in an hour."

Kingsley: "Did you say 'probably'?"

Daphne: "Definitely. Maybe."

Pansy: [nodding] "That sounds right."

[Cuts back to Kingsley interview.]

Kingsley: [wearily] "Unfortunately, we do really need their department."

[Cuts to Hogwarts.]

Minerva: "Where is your insufferable partner in tyranny, Mr Malfoy?"

Draco: "Who, Granger? I don't know. She's normally oppressively punctual."

Minerva: "She's a real thorn in my side, that one."

Draco: "I know. Personally I'm hoping to have her excised."

Minerva: "Like a tumor?"

Draco: "Ah, no. What's the one for when you're possessed by spirits?"

Sorting Hat: "EXORCISM!"

Draco: "That's the one, thanks."

Sorting Hat: "EXPULSION OF DEMONIC PLAGUES AND THE CURSES WHICH WREAK HAVOC UPON YOUR LINE!"

Draco: "Yeah, cool. Sure."

Albus, via his portrait: "For the record, I'm looking forward to being rid of Miss Granger's shenanigans myself."

Minerva: "Oh shut up, you thigh-skimming jizz harmonica. You're not even really here! I've always had it harder than you."

Albus: "Oh, please. When? When you were dropping babies on muggles' doorsteps, or when you were haplessly counting on a pair of pre-pubescent to help a hippogriff escape?"

Minerva: "When I was your deputy! I was always the one sending out the letters, dealing with the errant children, sorting through the class schedules, doing all the real work—whereas you, the actual headmaster, just sat there and—"

[She comes to an abrupt halt, her eyes widening.]

Draco: "Professor?" [He leans forward, snapping his fingers in front of her face.] "Professor, did you just have a stroke?"
Albus: "Try holding a mirror under her nose."

Sorting Hat: "Yes, try that, or FEASTING UPON THE ENTRAILS OF YOUR ENEMIES!"

Draco: "Professor, if you're dead, this really isn't going to look good for me." [He pauses, frowning.] "Though I think it would be classically murder-adjacent, but I'll have to double-check. To be honest, I don't think I really have a handle on the definition."

Minerva: "First of all, I'm alive, you trumpeting moron."

Draco: "Oh. Well, phew."

Minerva: "But secondly, I did just have a stroke—"

Draco: "Yikes."

Minerva: "—only it was of GENIUS!"

Draco: "Oh." [He pauses.] "Eh, still bad."

[Behind them, the door opens and Hermione enters.]

Hermione: [out of breath] "Malfoy, I'm sorry I'm late, but I have to tell you someth—"

Draco: "WHAT IS IT NOW, YOU RESPLENDENT MOONFLOWER?"

Hermione: "CAN YOU NOT YELL AT ME? I'M TRYING TO HAVE A NORMAL CONVERSATION WITH YOU—"

Draco: "THEN BY ALL MEANS CONVERSE, YOU PULCHRITUDINOUS DROP OF AMBROSIA!"

Hermione: "LISTEN YOU DERANGED SLICE OF MANIA—"

Draco: "OH, SO I'M JUST THE SLICE, AM I?"

Hermione: "YOU'RE THE ENTIRE LOAF, MALFOY!"

Draco: "WELL THEN BUTTER ME UP, GRANGER, I'M TOAST!"

Albus: "Are you understanding any of this?"

Minerva: "Don't talk to me, I'm having an epiphany. And what are you doing here?"

Albus: "Me? I live here!"

Minerva: "Not you, you asinine dick maraca. Him."

[Camera pans out to reveal Gilderoy perching on the corner of Minerva's desk, voraciously tickling her desk plant.]

Gilderoy: "Epiphanies and orgasms are similar but different!"

Albus: [shrugging] "Well, he's not wrong. A good epiphany will certainly make your toes curl if you do it right."

[Cuts to Pansy.]
Pansy: skeptically "Toe-curling? That's it?" She scoffs. "He's doing sex wrong."

Harry: "What are you doing in here?"

Camera pans out to reveal she is in the Auror office.

Pansy: "Oh. I was looking for Weasley."

Harry: "Why?"

Pansy: "To discuss him being on our team for the match tomorrow, of course."

Ron: "What?"

Pansy: "Oh, there you are."

Ron: "You're sitting on my lap."

Pansy: "Am I?"

Ron: "Yes. You just came in here and sat down."

Pansy: "Oh. I thought you were a chair."

Ron: "I'm not."

Pansy: "Well, good to know."

Ron: "What's this about being on your team?"

Harry: "Yeah, Parkinson. You know that all the Aurors play on the Auror team."

Ron: "It's kind of why I look forward to it, in case you missed that whole thing. You know, because I like winning, and the Aurors always win?"

Pansy: "Wait a minute. Are you saying the not-Aurors lose?"

Harry: "It's at least being heavily implied, yes."

Pansy: darkly "Well, I hate that. I hate it. I don't like it. I'm—I hate it."

Ron: whispering "Harry, I'm frightened—"

Harry: hastily "Well hold on, Parkinson. I mean, there's a first time for everything, I suppose."

Pansy: thoughtfully "Hm. That's true. That is how virginity works."

Cuts to Hermione and Daphne.

In unison: "Virginity is a social construct of the patriarchy to assign irrelevant values to women as currency."

They glance at each other.

In unison: "Awww!"

Cuts back to Pansy.
Pansy: "Well, how about this, then: Weasley, you play for our team, and if you win, you get the Head Auror position. If Potter wins, he gets it."

Ron: scoffing "There's no possible way that Harry would ever agr-"

Harry: "Done."

Ron: squawking "What?!"

Pansy: "Excellent!"

Harry: "Sounds good to me. Also, if you get Ron, then I call Nott."

Pansy: "Done!"

Ron: "Wait a min-"

Pansy: "No, shut up Weasley, it's good. Nott's a horrific quidditch player. He might actually die during the game, and that's a win for everyone."

Cuts to Theo and Harry interview.

Theo: "She's right. I'm pretty terrible at it." He turns to Harry. "You know, it's almost like you're trying to lose, Potter."

Harry: "Hm, me?" He shrugs. "Hey, I still have Ginny, plus the other Aurors are much better than Pansy and Daphne, seeing as I'm pretty sure they haven't actually played before and possibly still don't know the rules."

Theo: "Still. That's a pretty generous bet, you know."

Harry: innocently "Well, maybe I'm just full of holiday spirit, Nott."

Cuts to Cormac interview.

Cormac: "Potter? No. I mean sure, it happened once in a dream, but who hasn't had that dream, am I right?"

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XXIII

Summary: The Real World, continued. Olivie Advent Day 23. Yes, I know it's late. EVERYTHING IS A MESS. Enjoy this for now, and the concluding Day 24 post will be here shortly.

[Scene opens with Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "So, I'm sort of having a small issue."

Rita: [not unkindly] "Is it your hair?"

Hermione: "What? No."

Rita: "Well, then you're having two issues, but continue."

Hermione: "Okay, so, there's something I need to tell Malfoy, but I just can't seem to find the right time to do it. [She sighs.] Historically, I really struggle with timing."

[Cuts to footage of Hermione from second year.]

Hermione: "Hey, have you seen Harry? Or Ron? It's important. I just found out that the creature in the Chamber of Secrets is a basilisk."

Cormac: "Coincidentally, 'basilisk' is also what I call my penis."

Hermione: "Yeah so, that's cool, but could you maybe tell them? I have a feeling it's going to come after me soon because, you know. Muggleborn and all that."

Cormac: "Roger that, Granger."

[She leaves. Harry and Ron enter the corridor.]

Cormac: "Oh, hey, Granger wanted you to know something."

Harry: "About what?"

Cormac: "My dick."

Ron: "Interesting. Go on."

[Cuts back to Hermione.]

Hermione: "In retrospect, I probably should have clarified which part I wanted him to tell."

Rita: "Riveting. So is this about Gossip Girl's memo from yesterday, then?"

Hermione: [fidgeting] "Yes. I have to be honest, I really thought Malfoy would, um. Comment on it? But then yesterday was sort of a bad day for him in general, I think."

[Cut to footage from the walk-through.]

Draco: "Okay, so, in terms of emergency exits—"

Hermione: "Malfoy, listen, before we go any further, I really need to talk to you about something."

Draco: "Is it about the staircases?"

Hermione: "No. Wait. Why?"

Draco: "Because I really feel like we've been going in circles. Didn't we just pass this portrait of Dumbledore?"

Hermione: "That's not Dumbledore, that's Professor Lockhart in a wig. And also, it's not a painting, he's just standing there."

Gilderoy: "The scary one said to make myself useful."

Draco: "Do you mean McGonagall?"

Gilderoy: "Is that the brown shouty one?"

Draco: "I genuinely don't know."

Gilderoy: "The one who likes murder?"

Hermione: "Well, this is appropriately troubling, but anyway, as I was saying—"

[An owl drops in with a letter addressed to Draco, releasing it into his hands.]

Draco: "Hold that thought, Granger. This is marked with the Minister's seal."

Hermione: "Right, but just really quick—"

[The letter leaps from Draco's hands, unfolding itself and clearing its throat to speak in Kingsley's voice.]

Kingsley: "To Draco Malfoy: the Department of Magical Contracts and Tortfeasor Comeuppance is hereby disbanded. You are asked to kindly relinquish your Ministry badge by the end of the day. Happy holidays!" [There is a brief sound of rustling papers.] "Mafalda, how do I turn this off?

Yes, I know the message would be better delivered in person, but who has the time—yes, yes, I realize it's the holidays. In fact I said happy holidays, didn't I? No, it's not the same as adding 'lol' to the end of a passive-aggressive owl. Why? Because it is! The 'lol' is just a bald-faced lie, Mafalda. Nobody's laughing out loud and we all know it—yes, I'm aware it still reeks of disingenuity, but I'm allowed to say something, aren't I? Yes, I know I just fired him, but that doesn't mean I oppose him as a person. Can I not wish to be rid of someone professionally while also wanting them to enjoy the holidays in some, I don't know—abstract way? It's not my fault his job is redundant! I didn't invent the Ministry. Mafalda—come on. Come on, Mafalda. Faldy, come on sweets, don't look at me like that. Come here. I didn't mean to upset you, I'm sorry. Why don't you just sit here and—" [A loud shuffle.] "FUCKING HELL, how did you get in here again?! This is a matter of national security! What do you mean the thing is still recording?" [Another shuffle.] "Oh, for fuck's sake—"

[The letter dissolves into nothing, leaving Hermione and Draco in silence.]
Hermione: gently "Malfoy, I'm so sor-

Draco: "Wait a minute. WHAT?!"

Cuts back to Hermione interview.

Hermione: "So yeah, it was kind of, um, not the proper thing to bring up right after he'd just been fired, you know? Seemed like a selfish thing to do."

Rita: "Didn't you also get fired?"

Hermione: "Oh, I had actually already quit my job that morning. That's why I was late." She grimaces. "Not that McGonagall seemed to know that."

Cuts to Hermione and Minerva footage.

Minerva: "Granger, I've decided something."

Hermione: "Oh?"

Minerva: "I'm going to ruin your life."

Hermione: "Oh."

Minerva: "And I'm going to do it by offering you a job."

Hermione: "What?"

Minerva: "You heard me. Rather than let you stick your greedy little Ministry fingers where they don't belong, I'm going to make the school's business your business. You feel me?"

She leans back, sliding on a pair of sunglasses and fist-bumping Albus' portrait behind her.

Hermione: "I'm sorry, what's the job?"

Minerva: "Deputy headmistress."

Albus: "Otherwise known as official bitch-ass ho!"

Next to him, Armando Dippet's portrait lets out a loud whoop of agreement.

Minerva: "Would you driveling imbeciles please shut your gaping dickholes?"

Albus: "Fine. But only because we want to, and not because you said so."

Armando: "Yeah!"

Minerva: grumbling "Fine."

Albus: "You'll get to say things like that soon, Minnie. It's the best."

Armando: "It really is."

Minerva: sighing "I'm sure."

Hermione: "Okay, so I really don't understand what's happening. Did you just ask me to be deputy headmistress of Hogwarts?"
Minerva: "Yes. Responsibilities include: general responsibility, 80% of the work and 5.7% of the credit, total command of school functions while receiving approximately 15% of my salary, and obviously all relevant labor implied therein. I will, of course, maintain uncontested veto power and the freedom to ship my students at will."

Hermione: "I'm sorry, did you say 'ship' them?"

Albus: "Yes! How else do you think you went to the Yule Ball with Viktor Krum?"

[Cuts to Year 4 footage.]

Albus: "You're going to ask Miss Granger to the Yule Ball. I've seen you watching her in the library and I like it. I ship it. It is decided."

Viktor: [with his hands up] "Is—is that a gun?"

[Cuts back to Minerva and Albus.]

Minerva: "Basically, Granger, it finally occurred to me that I've been doing everything wrong. I wanted the privileges of being headmaster, but because I didn't have a second-in-command, I was having to do all the work, too. Obviously that has now been rectified."

Hermione: [tentatively] "May I ask what's in it for me?"

Albus: "No, you can't!" [To Minerva] "See, Minnie? This is why it's fun."

Minerva: "Oh, hold on. I'll tell you what's in it for you, Miss Granger."

Hermione: "Okay, so—"

Minerva: "But only because I want to, and not because I'm in any way obligated."

Hermione: [sighing] "Fine."

Minerva: [impressed] "You're right, Albus. That is fun."

Albus: "Yaass, bitch!"

[Cuts back to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "She eventually explained that I'd be able to continue improving the school's safety and curriculum if I wanted. I'd just be doing it as part of Hogwarts' faculty instead of as a Ministry employee."

Rita: "Oh. So is that why you quit your job?"

Hermione: [blushing] "Oh, no, actually, it isn't. I had quit because, um." [She pauses sheepishly.] "Well, because dating within Ministry departments is frowned upon."

[Cuts to Pansy and Daphne.]

Daphne: [frowning] "Wait. Is it?"

Pansy: "Huh. Not sure I knew that."

Daphne: "Well, should we quit?"
Pansy: "Why, so as to avoid being frowned upon?" [She scoffs.] "Please. I frown upon at least thirty people a day and none of them have come even close to dying yet."

Daphne: "Unfortunately."

Pansy: "Yeah, exactly."

[Cut to Seamus and Dean.]

Seamus: "Yeah, we know about that rule too."

Dean: "But as you might have guessed, nobody ever asks us if we're dating."

Seamus: "We told them that this is platonic hand-holding. What are they going to do, disagree?"

Dean: "Yeah. Plus we also convinced them that 'bro kisses' were a thing, so, you know. Lost cause, pretty much."

[Cut to Cormac.]

Cormac: "What? Bro kissing is totally a thing." [He turns over his shoulder.] "Hey Longbottom, bring that tight ass over here."

Neville: "What's up?"

Cormac: "We kiss, right?"

Neville: "Sure. Platonically, obviously."

Cormac: "Exactly."

Neville: "That, and sometimes our mouths get bored."

Cormac: "Yes, and then we progress to 'bro makeouts,' which is similar but more complex."

Neville: "Exactly. You know, when my plants are busy."

[Camera pans out to Marcus, who glances up sharply.]

Marcus: "What did you just say, Longbottom?"

Neville: "Nothing."

Cormac: [to Marcus] "Bro kiss, my dude."

Marcus: [resignedly] "Yeah, fine. Later."

[Cut back to Hermione interview.]

Rita: "Ah. So the rumors are true, then."

Hermione: "That Ron and I broke up? Yeah, that's true."

Rita: "Gossip Girl seemed pretty excited about it."

Hermione: "Yeah. She seems to have not enjoyed us very much."
Rita: "Nobody does."

Hermione: "What? Some people do."

Rita: "Stupid people."

Hermione: [frowning] "That's—I really don't think that's—"

Rita: [interrupting] "Anyway, I take it that's what you wanted to discuss with Draco?"

Hermione: "Well, yes. But unfortunately the rest of the day didn't go much better."

[Cuts back to Hogwarts footage.]

Draco: "I can't believe it. I'm fired? I almost never get fired. Not even Voldemort fired me. Granted, I came close to death a couple of times, but fired?"

Hermione: [gently] "Isn't it better to be fired than, I don't know—murdered?"

Draco: [scoffing] "Believe me, Granger, I'd much rather be permanently dead than temporarily undignified. It's like you don't even know me."

[Another owl flies in, dropping a letter in Draco's hands.]

Hermione: "Oh. Uh oh. I don't know if you should open that one."

Draco: "Why? It's just from Pansy—"

[Pansy: "DRACO MALFOY, HOW DARE YOU?! WHAT KIND OF NERVE—I CAN'T EVEN—YOU COME INTO MY HOUSE AND JUST—NO, NO, DAPHNE, I'M FINE. I'M FINE. PUT THE VIBRATOR AWAY, I'M CALM. OKAY, WHERE WAS I? RIGHT—DRACO. HOW DARE YOU GET YOURSELF FIRED?! I'VE ALREADY ARRANGED FOR YOU TO BE ON MY QUIDDITCH TEAM, AND NOW YOU CAN'T EVEN PLAY? BECAUSE YOU'RE NOT?! EVEN IN THE MINISTRY ANYMORE?! HONESTLY, IT'S LIKE YOU DON'T EVEN CARE ABOUT MY NEEDS. NO, DAPHNE, PUT IT AWAY, THOSE AREN'T THE NEEDS I'M TALKING ABOUT RIGHT NOW. DAPH, I'M SERIOUS, I—OKAY, FINE. JUST—QUIETLY. I'M STILL WORKING ON THIS HOWLER. YES, OKAY, RIGHT THERE. OOOOH YES, THERE, MM YES GOOD, OKAY, WHERE WAS I—OH YES. DRACO, YOU SELFISH MOTHERFUCKER, HOW AM I SUPPOSED TO WIN N- OH, MMMM YEP. YEAH, LIKE THAT. NO, WAIT, LOWER. YES, THERE. THANK YOU. OKAY, YOU KNOW WHAT? JUST TURN IT OFF, I THINK I'VE SAID EVERYTHING. NO, NOT THAT, KEEP THAT GOING, I MEANT TURN THE—YES, THE RECORDING, OKAY—"

[The letter dissolves in the air, leaving Hermione and Draco in silence.]

Hermione: [tentatively reaching out] "Malfoy, are you—"

Draco: "WHAT the FUCK?!"

[Cuts back to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "So yeah. It was sort of a day of more pressing things, I think."

Rita: "Sounds to me like you're kind of a pussy, actually."
Hermione: "What?"

Rita: "Hm?"

Hermione: "Well, look. It could have been worse."

Rita: "Could it, though?"

Hermione: "I mean, at least there were no bees."

[Draco appears, brandishing a sabre.]

Draco: "EN GARDE!"

Hermione: [sighing as she puts on her helmet] "Oh no."

The Real World: Ministry of Magic
Episode XXIV

Summary: The Real World, concluded. Olivie Advent Day 24. Merry Christmas!

[Scene opens with Ron interview.]

Ron: "So, the Ministry quidditch game was pretty, um… interesting this year, I guess you could say."

Rita: "That's putting it lightly."

[Cuts to footage from the game.]

Pansy: "Okay, so, on the Auror team, we have Potter, she-Weasley, Theo—" [She pauses.] "Okay, he doesn't even work for the Ministry anymore, but fine, whatever."

Harry: [shrugging] "I gave him a day pass."

Pansy: "Sounds fake, but I don't care. So anyway there's you guys, some other Aurors, whatever, blah blah blah. And on my team, we have me, Daphne, Weasley, and also these professional quidditch players."

[Marcus, Oliver, and Viktor Krum line up behind her, arms folded.]

Harry: "I thought you guys were officiating?"

Pansy: "They were, but then I remembered that I really don't care about rules."

Oliver: "And I assume this goes without saying, but we were coerced."

Viktor: [grumbling] "I hate this school."

Daphne: "Oh, hush. You all liked it."

Marcus: "We didn't not like it, but that's not the point."

Harry: "Wait a second. These three don't work for the Minister- well, depending on whichever Marcus that is, I guess—"

Marcus: [confused] "What?"

Pansy: [airily] "Well, Potter, I also gave them day passes."

[Harry and Pansy eye each other carefully. Harry sighs.]

Harry: "Fine."

Pansy: [gleefully] "Let's play!"
Ron: "Spoiler alert: we won. Though it does feel a bit like an empty victory?"

Rita: "Understandable."

Ron: "But anyway, can we get back to this meeting?"

[Rita: "Oh, sure. Carry on."

Kingsley: "Sorry, so Ron, you were saying that you and Harry made a bet, and now you're Head Auror because you won a highly illegal quidditch game?"

Ron: "Er, yes."

Kingsley: [thoughtfully] "Well, I suppose you did just have that big pixie bust. You aren't totally unqualified."

Luna: "Aww! That's sweet."

[Rita: "Oh, my God—"

Kingsley: "How the actual fuck do you keep getting in here?"

Luna: "Who, me?"

Kingsley: "Yes, you!"

Luna: "Oh. I thought you meant him."

[Kingsley: "OH MY GOD—"

Severus: "Relax."

Seamus: [sighing morosely] "I just want to KNOW—"

Severus: "Fine. You want to know the truth? I'm a ghost."

Rita, Ron, Kingsley, Seamus, Dean, and Blaise: "WHAT?!"

Luna: "Ooh, when did you get here, Blaise?"

Seamus: "Who, Blaise?"

Dean: "Do you mean Blaise?"

Kingsley: "Do you even work here?"

Ron: "Who, Bl-"

Blaise: [to Ron] "Don't, Weasley. You'll ruin it."
Ron: [sighing] "Fine."

Blaise: "But to answer your question, I don't actually work here."

Rita: [surprised] "What? Are you a ghost too?"

Luna: "No. Only Severus and I are ghosts."

Rita: "Wait a minute. What?!"

Luna: "Yeah. I've been dead for three years. That's how I keep getting in here undetected."

[There is a moment of stunned silence.]

Kingsley: "Well, I'm... guiltily relieved?"

Luna: "That's nice."

Ron: [awkwardly] "Super sorry about your death though, Luna."

Luna: "It's fine."

Rita: "I'm actually not sure how we didn't notice this before."

Luna: [sympathetically] "Well, you're all fools."

[Cuts to Luna and Severus interview.]

Luna: "For the record, we're definitely not ghosts."

Severus: "Yes. We're very much alive."

Luna: "Kingsley just has terrible security."

Severus: "The worst. Also, we personally disabled all the wards."

Luna: "Yes. That, and everyone who works in this Ministry is, as I've mentioned, a fool."

Severus: "Yep."

Luna: [brightly] "Hey, we should burn it down!"

Severus: "We should."

Luna: [shrugging] "Later, maybe."

Severus: [kindly] "Well, we'll see where the afternoon and/or the inevitable revolution takes us."

Luna: "Right. Anyway, where were we?"

Severus: "Spaghetti time?"

Luna: "Spaghetti time!"

[Severus offers her a fork, holding up his plate of spaghetti.]

Theo: [popping his head in] "Year of pranks, baby!"
Rita: [to Blaise] "Hold on. If you don't work here, then what exactly do you do?"

Blaise: "Oh, I'm a showrunner. I've been poking around here looking for ideas, and I think I found one. Get this—Gossip Girl. It's a show about someone who pretends to be an anonymous source in order to get the attention of the person they're secretly in love with."

Rita: "Sounds stupid."

Blaise: "You can be in it, if you want."

Rita: "Sounds genius!"

Lee, from out of screen view: "HOLD ON A MINUTE—"

[Cut to Theo and Harry interview.]

Theo: [to Harry] "You know, this whole Gossip Girl thing did seem suspiciously convenient this time around. I mean, it's almost as though you and I wouldn't be together if not for Gossip Girl."

Harry: "Sure. Almost."

Theo: [shrugging] "Well, anyway. I guess she's done now? I haven't seen anything new since yesterday."

Harry: "You sure? This memo came this morning."

[He hands Theo a piece of parchment.]

Theo: "Oh." [reading aloud] "Will you go out with me, xoxo Gossip Gi- hold on." [He pauses, looking at Harry with confusion.] "Is this—did you—" [He falters again, stunned.] "Potter, are you Gossip Girl?"

Harry: [innocently] "Well, you said you wanted a prank war."

[There is a long pause.]

Theo: "You motherfucker. You motherfucker, you are the fucking king of pranks."

Harry: "Thank you. I know."

Theo: "Well wait, hold on. What happened with our other prank? You know, with Draco and Granger?"

Harry: "Oh, right, that. That wasn't really a prank. It was more of an ambiguous 'break up Ron and Hermione because they keep making me tag along and I'm tired of couple's brunch' sort of thing than a prank."

Theo: "Right, sure, but what happened?"

Harry: [to the camera] "Lee, can you roll that?"

[Cut to footage from the girl's bathroom at Hogwarts.]

Moaning Myrtle: "Still not playing in the quidditch game, huh?"
Draco: "This time is different, Myrtle. And anyway, what rhymes with 'crippling sensation of guilt'?

Myrtle: "Rippling temptation of filth!"

Draco: [considering it] "Well, I suppose that's not totally off base—"

[Hermione enters, out of breath.]

Hermione: "Malfoy!"

Draco: "WHAT IS IT, YOU DESPOTIC SPRING BREEZE—"

Hermione: "Just—stop for a second, okay? Don't say anything."

Draco: [indignantly] "Well that's terribly rude, you golden-flushed sun princess—"

Hermione: "I just need to get this out, okay? Can you— [She swallows hard.] "Just listen, okay?"

Draco: "Fine. What is it?"

[Hermione shakily unfolds a piece of parchment, clearing her throat.]

Hermione: [reading aloud] "I hate the way you talk to me / And the way you cut your hair / I hate the way you drive my car / I hate it when you stare."

Draco: [bewildered] "Car? What in the name of Salazar's emerald phallus is a car?"

[Cuts to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "Yeah, so, I kind of borrowed this poem." [She sighs.] "Look, I'm not very creative, okay? Besides, he'll never know."

[Cuts back to Draco and Hermione.]

Hermione: "I hate your big dumb combat boots / And the way you read my mind—"

Draco: [interrupting] "Combat boots? Granger, these boots are from Twilfitt and Tatting's and I've been comfortably assured by my mother and Theo that they suit my aesthetic perfectly. Also, I've never once used legilimency on you, but if you'd like me to start—"

Hermione: [continuing] "—I hate you so much that it makes me sick / It even makes me rhyme."

Draco: [sighing] "Well, that's accurate."

Hermione: "I hate the way you're always right / I hate it when you lie / I hate it when you make me laugh / Even worse when you make me cry." [She sniffs a little, and Draco visibly softens.] "I hate it when you're not around / And the fact that you didn't call / But mostly I hate the way I don't hate you." [She pauses, wiping her eyes, and glances up at him.] "Not even close, not even a little bit, not even at all."

[There is a pause.]

Myrtle: "Honestly? That was terrible."

Draco: [uncertainly] "Granger, I don't understand. I thought you said—"
Hermione: "I broke up with Ron."

[Cuts to Ron interview.]

Ron: "Okay, first of all it was mutual, but—"

Pansy: "Shut up, Weasley."

Ron: [hastily] "Right, sorry, as you were."

[Cuts back to Draco and Hermione.]

Draco: [disbelieving] "You—you did?"

Hermione: "Yes." [She takes a deep breath.] "And there's something else."

Draco: [tenuously optimistic] "What?"

Hermione: "I've been made Deputy Headmistress at Hogwarts, which puts me in charge of hiring. And—" [She exhales.] "And I'd like to offer you a job as an English professor, if you're up for it."

Myrtle: [scoffing] "What, this guy? He can't even write a poem without my help!"

Draco: "Myrtle, what rhymes with 'go away'?"

Myrtle: "Flow balle- ah, nope, I heard it. Continue."

Hermione: "So, um. Would you do it?" [She fidgets.] "To clarify, it would mean that we'd both be working here."

Draco: "Together, you mean?"

Hermione: "Er, yes. It would mean we would be, um, close-proximity work associates."

Draco: "Mmhm, yes, I see." [He pauses, considering her.] "And is there anything else you'd like to ask me, Granger?"

Hermione: [furiously flushed] "Er, I don't. I, um." [She trails off.]

Draco: "Granger." [He sighs.] "You stupid, stupid sun goddess."

Hermione: "WHAT?"

Draco: "DON'T YELL AT ME. WE'RE HAVING A MOMENT."

Hermione: "WE'RE ALWAYS HAVING A MOMENT!"

Draco: "AND IT DIDN'T OCCUR TO YOU THAT THAT MIGHT MEAN SOMETHING?"

Hermione: "IT DID, BUT—" [wailing] "BUT I'M THE DUMBEST GIRL IN SCHOOL, MALFOY!"

Draco: "OKAY, NOW YOU'RE JUST BEING RIDICULOUS—"

Hermione: "BOOKS! AND CLEVERNESS! THERE ARE MORE IMPORTANT THINGS—FOR EXAMPLE, MY EMOTIONAL QUOTIENT IS PITEOUSLY LOW, AND—"
Draco: "GRANGER, YOU RESPLENDENT FOOL, I'M GOING TO KISS YOU NOW."

Hermione: "You are?"

Draco: "Well, if you want me to. I mean, if you'd rather not, then—"

Hermione: "DON'T RUIN IT, YOU BEAUTIFUL HELLSCAPE!"

Draco: "GOD, I LOATHE YOU."

Hermione: "I LOATHED YOU FIRST!"

[They kiss.]

Myrtle: "Aww!"

[The kissing escalates voraciously.]

Myrtle: "Okay, gross. That's enough. I died a virgin." [She pauses.] "Actually, you know what? Keep going, I died a virgin. I'd like to see where this goes."

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry.]

Theo: "I think that prank went well, actually."

Harry: "What about the other one?"

Theo: "Hm?"

[Cuts to Hogwarts. The Sorting Hat is laughing maniacally, lightning striking in the background as he stands over the lime green bowler hat, which hangs precipitously from the window.]

Sorting Hat: [dramatically] "DAS… VI… DANIYA!"

[The bowler hat falls below, swept on the wind and into the lake while the Sorting Hat continues its haunting cries of laughter.]

Theo: "Ehem."

[Camera pans out to reveal Theo and Severus sitting behind the Sorting Hat.]

Severus: [licking his finger, turning a page of the Quibbler] "You know he has a horcrux, right?"

Sorting Hat: [abruptly choking] "What?"

Theo: "A horcrux. You know, an object imbued with his soul? He'll just come back to life."

[There's a long pause.]

Sorting Hat: "NOOOOOOOOOO!"

[Cuts back to Theo and Harry.]

Theo: "Oh, right, that one. It's on hiatus, I guess? Depends how long a horcrux hunt takes. I think it's going to be a few months' worth of camping, though, so I've got some time."

Harry: "That sounds right. And what are you planning to do now that you've been fired?"
Theo: "What, like for money? I'm independently wealthy."

Harry: "Oh. Right."

Theo: "What about you? Now that Weasley's been made Head Auror instead of you, I mean."

Harry: "Oh, I quit my job. Turns out I'm also independently wealthy, and more importantly, I hate being an Auror."

Theo: "Yeah, that was becoming increasingly apparent."

Harry: "Well, anyway." [He gestures to the parchment in Theo's hand.] "Are you going to answer Gossip Girl's memo or what?"

Theo: "Are you just going to continually refer to yourself as Gossip Girl?"

Harry: "I might. I think it suits me."

Theo: "Fair. What's your offer?"

Harry: "Well, we're rich, we're young, and we're magic. We could travel the world?"

Theo: "Hm. How about a caper of some sort?"

Harry: "That works too."

Theo: "I feel like I would enjoy committing an elaborate heist."

Harry: "Year of crime?"

Theo: "Year of crime!"

Harry: "Well, we should probably stop filming this, then."

Theo: "Oh, right, good shout."

[Cuts back to Kingsley's office.]

Blaise: "So anyway, I'm going to leave now. First of all, I have to get back to Hogwarts for that Slug Club reunion, and secondly, this show is over. I hired all the camera people for my new show."

Lee: "YOU DID WHAT?!"

Blaise: "Also, it's probably going to come out soon that Rita and Gilderoy are like, a thousand percent fucking."

[Cuts to Pansy interview.]

Pansy: [innocently] "What's that? Stay in my lane?" [She smirks.] "Bitch, they're all my lanes."

[Cuts back to Kingsley's office.]

[Gilderoy pops up from beneath her dress, gasping for air.]
Rita: [sighing] "That may or may not be valid."

Kingsley: [skeptically] "May or may not?"

Rita: [shrugging] "More 'may' than 'may not,' but—"

Luna: [to Gilderoy] "How was it, Professor?"

Gilderoy: "Like a savory pie!"

Lee: "EVERYONE GET OUT!"

[Cuts to Slug Club reunion gala at Hogwarts.]

Minerva: "Granger, why are there so many cunting baboons in my house?"

Hermione: "Don't worry, Professor. I'll take care of it."

Minerva: "YOU CERTAINLY WILL, DEPUTY BITCH ASS."

Hermione: [sighing] "Is that—should I just get used to that, or—"

Minerva: "Come on, Albus. We're going to sing karaoke and try on poison rings."

Albus, via his portrait: "Yeah!"

[They leave. Camera pans over to Blaise and Ginny.]

Blaise: "Oh, hey Weasley. So I heard there's going to be some sort of sexy game later."

Ginny: "That wouldn't happen to be—" [She glances down at the programme.] "Seventy-five to ninety minutes in heaven, would it?"

Blaise: [slyly] "That's the one. And I mean, who knows, maybe we'll get each oth-'"

Ginny: "Hey, want to just ditch this and have sex?"

Blaise: "I—what did you just say?"

Ginny: "This party is lame. I'd rather be fucking you."

Blaise: "Oh."

Ginny: "We could have dinner first, if you want. You know, if you want to date or something." [She tilts her head, considering it.] "You don't like, throw your socks on the floor without warning, do you?"

Blaise: "I only wear Italian loafers. I don't own socks."

Ginny: "Perfect. So, you in?"

Blaise: [surprised] "I guess I am, yeah."

Ginny: "Well, good. I'm glad all I had to do was ask."

Blaise: [clearing his throat] "Yeah... pretty weird if someone had actually like, paid a fortune to have an unnecessary party as an elaborate scheme. Or, you know. Something."
Ginny: "What? That's insane. Who would do that?"

Blaise: "No idea."

[They leave. The camera pans over to where Cormac, Marcus, and Neville are standing together in the Great Hall.]

Marcus: "Let's give Longbottom another turn. I'm convinced one of these days he's going to get it."

Neville: "Pomona Sprout, Justin Finch-Fletchley, and Filius Flitwick."

Marcus: [pleasantly surprised] "Whoa, weird. That was actually pretty norm-

Neville: "...have all been arrested for various counts of smuggling and racketeering."

Marcus: "-al. Nevermind. [He pauses.] "But since you brought it up: fuck Pomona, marry Filius, kill Justin."

Cormac: "That sounds right."

Neville: "Anyway, it turns out McGonagall needs a new Herbology professor, so I think I'm going to come teach at Hogwarts. At the very least, it'll give me a place to put my plants."

Marcus: "That's true."

Cormac: "Oh. [He looks disappointed.] "Well, I'm going to miss your sassy cardies, Longbottom."

Neville: "Well, you could probably come if you want, McLaggen. They do need a new Charms professor, after all."

Cormac: [brightly] "I am uniquely average at Charms."

[Cuts to Cormac interview.]

Cormac: "Coincidentally, that's also one of my euphemisms for fucking."

[Cuts back to Slug Club reunion.]

Neville: "Yeah, so, you should apply. And then we can keep bro-fisting."

Marcus: "Do you mean fist-bumping?"

Cormac: [gleefully] "Nope!"

[Camera pans over to Draco and Hermione.]

Draco: "Granger, it's simple. If the Defense Against the Dark Arts position is still cursed, then we'll just create another class and call it 'The Dark Arts Can Fuck Right Off.' Simple, job done."

Hermione: [groaning] "Malfoy, we can't possibly call it that. Do you even hear yourself?"

Draco: [holding a hand to his ear] "Sorry, what?"

Hermione: "ARE YOU KIDDING ME?!

Draco: "OKAY, LISTEN UP, YOU SHOUTY VIXEN—"
She cuts him off with a kiss. Camera pans to Theo and Harry chatting together as Rita approaches them, dragging Gilderoy behind her.

Rita: "Well, needless to say, it gives me great pleasure to finally get out of this hell hole. Goodbye forever, Harley Porthouse—"

Gilderoy: [to Rita] "Ooh, sweetheart, it's pronounced 'Har-lay,' but we'll get there."

Harry: "Bye, Rita. How did Lee take the news, by the way?"

Rita: "I'm not sure he noticed, honestly."

Gilderoy: "Is that the crying one?"

Theo: "What?"

Gilderoy: "The crying one. You know, the one who dies?"

[Camera pans out to reveal Lee sniffling next to Theo and Harry, intermittently sobbing 'OTP' and 'JUST THROW ME IN A RIVER' as he lets out a loud wail.]

Harry: "Ah, yes. He's dead. It's happened before."

Theo: "I wouldn't worry about it."

Luna: "Yes. In fact, many of us are dead."

Severus: "And we're all doing just fine."

Lee: "OH, JUST SHUT THE CAMERA OFF, WOULD YOU?!"

Harry: [glancing around] "Hold on a minute. Where's Ron?"

Lee: [wailing] "WHO CARES?!"

[Camera jostles, and then footage cuts out.]

[Scene reopens with three people in a bedroom, none of their faces visible. The camera has clearly been placed on something approximately waist-level, and a golden statue of two naked women is visible on the left.]

Woman's voice: "Okay, we're good to go. You ready?"

Man's voice: "Wait, hold on. Is that a camera?"

Woman's voice: "Just try to ignore it, okay? Just relax."

Second woman's voice: "Or don't. Doesn't really matter. You already signed the papers. You're in this for a long-term contract."

Man: "Well, okay, I guess—"

[There is a rustle of clothing.]

Woman 2: "HOLY SHIT. Is that your dick?"

Man: "I—yes?"
Woman 1: "Oh my god. Oh my god, it's—"

Woman 2: "Listen, I never cry, but—"

Woman 1: "It's beautiful."

Woman 2: "It's fucking majestic."

Woman 1: "I've seen some amazing things in my life, but this is—this is breathtaking."

Woman 2: "It's sort of like… when you see the sunrise for the first time?"

Woman 1: "Honestly? I really think I could conjure a patronus right now."

Woman 2: "We wouldn't even need one. The dementors would take one look at that dick and fucking weep."

Man: "...thank you?"

Woman 1: "I mean, I suspected, but—"

Woman 2: "I didn't. I am genuinely surprised. Thank god we didn't kill you."

Man: [alarmed] "Wait a minute, when was that on the table?!"

Woman 2: "Shut up. We're busy."

Woman 1: "I honestly still can't get over how pretty it is."

Woman 2: "I know, it's—it's like, delicate, almost? But also austere, like a deer in the forest."

Man: "You're actually crying, aren't you?"

Woman 2: "It's just—we worked really hard for this."

Woman 1: "Yeah. We broke, like, a lot of laws to get here."

Woman 2: "Right. And it was a pretty big gamble, too."

Woman 1: "Totally. You could have had a pencil dick."

Woman 2: "Or like, a stubby one. And sure, girth is more important than length, but still. Nobody wants a goblin dick."

Woman 1: "Or an elf dick."

Woman 2: "Could have had a ghost dick, even."

Woman 1: [shuddering] "True."

Man: "What the hell is a ghost dick?"

Woman 1: "It's not important."

Woman 2: "The point is, I'm just really, really proud of us."

Woman 1: "Yes. Immensely."
[They sigh contentedly.]

Man: "So, um. Should we get to it, then?"

Woman 1: "What, sex? Yes, definitely."

Man: "Oh. Okay, cool."

Woman 2: "Buckle up, dickhead. We're going for a ride."

Woman 1: [whispering] "XOXO."

[Footage runs out.]

Survival Techniques

Pairing: Parkweasel (Pansy Parkinson x Percy Weasley), background Nottgrass (Theo Nott x Daphne Greengrass)

Universe: Post-War, EWE

Rating: M for language, sex

Summary: Beds are cold in the winter; Pansy needs someone to fill hers. Inspired by an advent edit by aurorarsinistra.

I. (Need)

"You know what I need?" Pansy prompts, contemplating her glass of Ogden's before raising it to her lips. "A winter boyfriend."

"What?" Daphne asks, making a face. "You mean a snowman?"

"No. A winter boyfriend. You know," Pansy says emphatically, "a boyfriend to sleep with while it's cold and fuck through the major commercial holidays, but immediately break up with as soon as the snow melts."

"That," Daphne says, chewing the thought slowly, "doesn't really make sense."

"Beds are cold in the winter," Pansy replies smartly. "It's a survival technique."

"Well, fine," Daphne says, shrugging. "Have someone in mind?"

At that, Pansy sets down her now-empty glass, scanning the room for prospects.

It's discouraging right from the start; the one in the corner, just within her periphery, is far too short. His friend, who wanders over by the bar, is much too loud.

The one leaning against the opposite wall is promising for a second, but his hair is too long, and not in a sexy way.

The one glancing listlessly around the room looks too much like her ex.

One man shifts, though, and his motion catches her eye. He looks like he's here after work, too, which is promising—because it means that he works, and that's never (rarely) a bad thing. From where she sits she can see his tailored dress shirt, the slim cut of his trousers. He's lean and tall, which isn't exactly outside her usual taste, but she can see the light glinting from the corner of a pair of tortoiseshell glasses, which is considerably less her style. If they're for fashion, that's no good, but he doesn't look fashionable, per se.

She suspects, approvingly, that he probably needs the glasses to see.
"What about him?" she asks, nudging Daphne, and Daphne cocks her head, considering it.

"Can't see his face," she notes. "Red hair, though."

"Is it? Looks darker."

"Auburn?"

"Does it matter?"

"Kind of."

"Hm." Pansy considers it, watching him order. He does it smoothly, the bills tucked between his fingers and in towards his palm, flashing it just long enough for the bartender to see and take his offer seriously. He takes his whisky straight, she notes; she watches him tuck his wallet back into his pocket and raise the glass to his lips with a quiet, unassuming motion.

She still can't quite see his face.

But by now, she's willing to risk it.

"Be right back," she tells Daphne.

"Sure you will," Daphne replies spiritedly, toasting her as she goes.

Pansy checks her hair, refreshing the waves with a twist around her finger, and adjusts her cleavage. Then she taps him on the shoulder.

"Excuse me," she begins sweetly, and he turns.

"Oh," she says, blinking.

"Oh," Percy Weasley agrees, and she regrets every moment of her life that's led to the horrendous now.

II. (Mistaken)

"Sorry," she says bluntly, "I just thought—"

—thought you were someone else, she wants to say, but he barely blinks, almost as though he knows the sentence is actually meant to end with I thought you were hot from far away, but now that I'm here, I'm fully aware this can't happen; but just so you know, you're unexpectedly hot up close, too, and it's only that I'm so fucking repulsed by the entire prospect of who you are that I need to bail immediately.

"Right," he says, a bit clipped.

"Right," she agrees. "So, anyway, sorry about that, I was—"

"Would you like a drink?" he interrupts.

No, she wants to say.

No, she should say.
"Are you paying?" she asks bluntly.

He nudges his glasses further up his nose.

"That was implied," he says.

"Fine," she says. "I'll have an Ogden's."

He flags the bartender down with a sly motion, as though in the last five minutes the two have established some kind of code. The bartender nods, the transaction appears to be complete, and then Percy motherfucking Weasley hands Pansy her glass.

"Want to sit?" he asks.

She glances around apprehensively (someone might see, after all), but over at her table she can see that Theo's here now, and Daphne's nuzzling his neck in greeting.

Her stomach turns.

"Fine," she permits. "But somewhere else."

He gestures to the bar's patio. "Outside?"

She shrugs. "Fine."

It's a nice night, and they settle in at one of the highboys. She crosses one leg over the other, wondering what they could possibly have to say to one another.

He sips his whisky.

She watches his mouth, briefly.

Then she watches the way his fingers curl around his glass.

His nails are trim but neat. The fingers themselves are long, narrow, ink-stained. He's wearing a battered watch, but it's tasteful. Nothing ostentatious. In fact, there's nothing all that ostentatious about him. His color palette is subdued. His nature, in fact, is subdued. He doesn't seem nervous. He doesn't seem much of anything.

"I'm just staying until the bottom of the glass," she says. Obnoxiously.

He nods curtly. "Likewise."

She blinks, but tries not to betray her surprise.

"So," she attempts. She's a little frustrated that she's the one who loses the battle against silence, but he seems like he might not speak if she doesn't, and she's never been comfortable without some tangible shield of flirtation. "What are you here for?"

"A meeting." He takes a sip. "It went well."

"Oh."

"And you?"

"Sex," she says, with a carefully cultivated boldness.
His gaze cuts sideways.

"Are you implying—"

"Not with you," she assures him bluntly, pointedly raising her glass. "We're just having a drink."

He nods.

They both take a sip.

"What kind of knickers are you wearing?" he asks neutrally, and she promptly chokes, sputtering on a too-large swallow.

"What?" she manages, coughing.

"Lace?" he guesses, his gaze flicking over her. "I'd guess lace. Silk, maybe? Seems impractical, but if you're here for sex—" he trails off, shrugging. "I don't take you for the cotton type, but I suspect you could be surprising."

She, meanwhile, suspects that he's fucking with her.

"They're lace," she admits, crossing her legs a little tighter.

He eyes the liquid in his glass.

"What color?" he asks.

She straightens. "Black," she lies, with confidence.

He chuckles, leaning towards her.

"Liar," he says.

She blinks.

"What color are they, then?" she prompts, and he leans down, adjusting the laces of his oxfords and seeming to consider the air between them before pausing, his voice low.

"They're green," he says, and to her utter displeasure, she shivers. "With pale pink embroidery. Excellent taste," he determines, now leaning away from her and settling back in against the chair. "I think black would have been rather overdone."

She knows he can't see them, but that's much too specific to be a guess.

"Did you just use legilimency on me?" she demands, and he shrugs.

"I'm a very talented wizard," he informs her.

"Fine," she growls, glaring at him. "Then tell me what I'm thinking now."

He shakes his head.

"No," he says without elaboration, and then he adds, "Why don't you tell me what I'm thinking instead?"

She frowns.
She doesn't want to, but also, she really, really wants to.

She forces indifference.

"It's dirty, isn't it?" she guesses dully, and he shrugs.

"Your friend over there," he says, aiming his chin over his shoulder to reference where Daphne and Theo remain inside the bar. "From where she's sitting, she wouldn't see if I were to—" he pauses, his fingertips brushing her knee. "May I?" he asks, and for reasons she cannot possibly fathom, Pansy uncrosses her legs at his prompting. "From where she's sitting," he continues, his fingers drawing up the inside of her knee and pausing at the midpoint of her inner thigh, "she wouldn't be able to see this. Or this," he adds, as Pansy swallows and lets him part her knees further, his fingers now brushing the curve of her thigh. "I could keep going," he adds, raising his glass to his lips with his free hand, "but I think you see my point."

He withdraws his hand and Pansy exhales sharply.

"But," he says, "seeing as I've reached the bottom of my glass—" He drains it, pointedly setting it down on the table. "I think my time here is done."

Pansy stares at him.

And stares.

"Are you serious?" she demands.

He rises to his feet.

"Would you like to continue?" he asks.

She bites her lip.

Bites it hard.

"No," she says, rightfully. "This can't go anywhere."

"Yes, I agree," he says with a nod. "Seems foolish to pursue it."

"Glad we're on the same page," she says coolly, and he nods, already looking over his shoulder and preparing to leave.

"But," Pansy attempts, her throat suddenly quite dry. "If you were to, um, finish what you started, I guess I'm just curious—"

He steps a little closer, digging a business card out of the inner lining of his pocket and handing it to her. He catches her wrist loosely as she accepts it.

"I'd have liked to keep going," he says, "but tonight's not the night."

When he releases her, she glances down at the card.

_Percy Weasley_
_Office of the Minister_

"It's enchanted," he says. "Use it for access to my Floo, if you wish."
She looks up at him, surprised.

"My office Floo," he clarifies, biting back a chuckle. "So don't do anything too drastic."

"I'm not actually going to use this," she reminds him.

He shrugs.

"Goodnight, Miss Parkinson," he says, leaving her behind with his empty glass.

III. (Ambition)

RSVPing to Daphne's engagement party with a plus one a month ago was not one of Pansy's best ideas.

"A little ambitious," Daphne agrees gently.

Pansy sighs.

"Draco will be there," Daphne reminds her quietly.

"I know," Pansy half-moans, wanting to die. "I can't go alone."

Daphne hesitates. "Well—" she says, and her gaze flicks to where Percy Weasley's card sits on Pansy's dresser, untouched for the past two weeks.

"Pans," Daphne attempts, in a voice that Pansy knows contains bad news.

She sighs.

"Draco won't be alone, will he?" Pansy guesses, and Daphne winces in answer.

Of course he has a date.

Of course he has a date.

Pansy picks up the card.

"Fine," she exhales grumpily, heading towards her Floo.

When she walks into Percy Weasley's office, he's still working. He glances up at her and she comes to a halt, freezing in place while he adjusts his glasses.

"Yes?" he says.

"I," she begins, and can't quite cough it out of her throat. "What are you," she sputters instead, "some sort of secretary?"

He blinks.

"Undersecretary," he says. "To the Minister."

"Oh." She chews her response. "Is that prestigious?"
His mouth barely quirks, in the subtest possible indication of amusement.

"To some," he permits. "But I don't think you're here for my prestige."

Her mouth falls open, and then snaps shut.

"What do you do?" he asks.

"Go to parties," she hurls back, daring him to mock her.

He rises to his feet, declining the opening.

"You need something," he notes, almost as if he's guessing.

"Is that legilimency?" she sniffs.

His mouth twitches. "Observation," he corrects. "Of course, my perception of social behaviors is often rather flawed, so—"

"I need a date," she confirms. "An engagement party for my friend Daphne."

She pauses, and he waits.

"Tomorrow night," she clarifies.

His brows arch, surprised.

"Tomorrow night," he echoes, stepping around his desk. "Rather last minute."

"I know." She stiffens, unapologetic. "So, will you go or not?"

"Depends," he says, taking a step towards her, and then another.

He brings them face to face and tilts his head down, considering her.

"Ask me nicely," he says.

She rolls her eyes.

"Please, then," she says.

He steps closer.

He smells clean, like a sea breeze, and—very much against her will—she glimpses a comparable blue in his eyes.

"Ask me," he murmurs, "nicely."

She swallows.

"Will you please go with me?" she asks. "I need your help. I—" she exhales. "I need you to say yes."

He lets a beat of silence pass.

Then—
"Dress robes?" he asks.

She exhales the breath she didn't know she was holding.

"Yes," she says.

"Will black and white robes be acceptable?" he prompts.

"Yes."

"And you will be wearing—?"

"Green," she says, and feels her cheeks flush hot at the memory when she meets his eye.

He half-smiles. "And I will be your—?"

"Boyfriend," she supplies, flinching. "If you can stand the lie."

He glances down, eyeing her hand, and then he reaches for it. He holds it to his lips, brushing them slowly, tenderly (agonizingly) across her knuckles, the whole of it more breath than contact.

"Very well, Miss Parkinson," he says, half-bruising her with the impact.

---

IV. (Convenience)

In the end, she spends the entire night avoiding Draco.

"There you are," Percy says quietly, rounding the corner to where she's pressed flat against the corridor wall, wishing to dissolve into it. "You know, if you want to leave—"

"I can't leave," she snaps. "He's—" she withers. "He'll see."

Percy says nothing.

"It's just hard," she manages after a few beats of silence, "because it used to be the four of us. You know? Since we were kids. But now Daphne and Theo are getting married, and Draco has something real, and I," she concludes, swallowing. "I have—"

"Me?" Percy prompts, with a faint air of self-deprecation.

She sighs.

"I just meant," Pansy amends, "that he has someone he cares about, and who cares about him, and you're—"

"Convenient," Percy replies.

"Yes," Pansy concedes miserably. "You're here because I begged."

Percy pauses.

"No," he says. "I'm here because I wanted to be." He pauses again, sipping his glass of wine. "Though, coincidentally, I did enjoy hearing you say please."

She sighs again. Less sulkily this time, or so she intends.
"Sorry I keep ditching you," she exhales. "I really just—"

She breaks off, recognizing Draco's voice, and feels the blood drain from her face as she recognizes a woman's voice with him.

"I," she attempts helplessly, their footsteps growing louder, and Percy glances down at her.

"Close your eyes," he says.

"Wh-"

"Close them," he murmurs, and places his hands on her hips, aligning them with his.

She obeys, and she feels his lips brush her cheeks, first, and then her nose, and then each of her eyelids, Draco's voice coming closer.

"Relax," Percy says, and draws her chin up, his lips meeting hers.

She gasps, her eyes fluttering open.

Percy's eyes float shut.

She deepens the kiss, pulling him towards her, and she briefly registers the sound of Draco's footfall coming to a halt as Percy yanks her dress up, sliding his palm against the outside of her thigh and fitting himself between her legs.

The footfall resumes, the echo of it fading in the opposite direction, and only then does Percy lean away.

Pansy, lamenting the loss of him, tangles her fingers in the hair at the nape of his neck. He matches the pressure with his fingertips, digging them into her waist.

"Don't stop," she whispers.

He looks her in the eye, gauging the truth of it.

Then he apparates them away.

V. (Pillowtalk)

"God, I love your pussy, Pansy, your cunt is so fucking wet, so fucking wet for me. Could fuck you like this all night, all fucking night, Pansy, fuck, you're so good. You're so good. You're so fucking hot, Pansy. You're so beautiful. You're so fucking beautiful and you feel so good, so fucking good, fuck. Do you like that, Pansy? Like it when I fuck you like this? You want it harder, Pansy? Deeper? Tell me. I want to watch you, want to see your face when I make you come. You're so fucking hot, Pansy, fuck—come on, come for me, baby—"

She comes so hard she can't see.

"Fuck," she whispers, shuddering hard, and he pauses, brushing her sweat-slicked hair back from her eyes and staring intently, voraciously, at her face.

"You're so fucking gorgeous when you come," he says without hesitation, and for some reason, she believes him.
VI. (Pretense)

She isn't sure what to make of their night together, so she decides to make it nothing.

Three days go by.

Then he shows up in her bedroom Floo.

"Are you still my girlfriend?" he asks simply, and she frowns.

"That was just—"

"Pretense, yes," he agrees. "But are you able to continue?"

She thinks about it.

"It won't be pleasant," he says, in a tone that suggests she really shouldn't ask.

"Maybe if you ask nicely," she sniffs, and he steps towards her, backing her against her bed and throwing an arm around her just before she falls back onto it, lowering her carefully near the edge.

"Very well," he says, and lowers himself to his knees, his hands tracing the inside of her thigh.

"Please," he says, sliding her skirt up. "Will you"—to the curve of her thigh—"accompany me"—his breath against the cotton of her knickers—"to a family dinner"—she stiffens at that, but his tongue darts against her clit, brushing it through the fabric—"please?"

"You said please twice," she informs him, inhaling sharply as he nudges the fabric inside and buries his fingers inside her, his tongue sliding against her knickers once again.

"I'm asking you very nicely," he murmurs to the lips of her cunt, chastely kissing them through the fabric, and she foolishly murmurs something like agreement, letting him lay her back against the bed.

VII. (Indignation)

"Oh, right, almost forgot Perce was here. No use making jokes, is there?"

Pansy watches Percy swallow, eyeing his plate as he methodically flexes his fingers.

It's been several hours of this already, with only brief intermissions.

"Oh, you know how serious Percy is. Always so terribly caught up in things, isn't he?"

"No, Mum, the de-gnoming situation in the garden is serious. Excessive taxation is serious. Overpopulation of the planet is serious. Percy, on the other hand, is bloody funereal."

"Remember the time he tried to convince us that bureaucracy was actually some sort of beautiful, ingenious thing? Honestly, we can do magic and it's paperwork he loves—"

"Stop it," Pansy erupts without warning, slamming her fork down against the table and startling everyone into silence. "First of all," she announces, catching the motion of Percy's gaze dropping apprehensively to the table and ignoring it entirely, "he doesn't love the bureaucracy itself, you twits. He enjoys the satisfaction of his work, which is something none of you blithering idiots can say—joke shop owner, low-level meter maid, professional ball juggler," she accuses hotly, pointing a declaratory finger at each of the stunned freckled morons. "Secondly, he manages to be far more interesting than all of you combined, and he doesn't have to stoop to idiotic puns and tasteless sarcasm to do it."

She throws her napkin down, glaring over at the Weasley matriarch.

"And as for you," she snaps at Molly Weasley, "if you didn't plan to love all your children equally, then you shouldn't have had so many. And THANK YOU FOR DINNER, IT WAS LOVELY," she finishes, kicking her chair back and heading for the Floo.

She grimaces when she hears footsteps following behind her; hears her mother's voice in her head—behave, Pansy, hold your tongue!—and curls her fingernails anxiously into her palm, flinching at the pathetically delayed input from her better judgment. This was his family, after all; he had wanted her to make things easier, to help him simply blend in, and what has she done instead?

"I'm sorry," she sighs without turning. "I know I shouldn't have lost my temper, but—"

"Thank you."

She blinks, turning to face him.

"What?" she asks, bewildered, as Percy takes a series of slow, prowling steps towards her.

"I said," he repeats, backing her against the mantle of the fireplace, "thank you."

His hand slips under her skirt, startling her into a gasp as he kisses her.

"What are you—"

He catches her sheepish mewl of pleasure on his tongue, pressing himself against her.

"Quiet," he murmurs, "or my family will hear you."

She pauses for a moment, utterly confounded, and draws back to look at him. His mouth, bitten and red from her kiss, twists up wryly in what appears to be softened amusement, and in a moment of devious recognition, Pansy feels her own lips curl up in a matching smile.

"Oh god," she says loudly, tugging him closer. "OH, PERCY, YES—"

He growls his approval into her neck, drawing one of her legs over his hip as she fumbles with his belt, half-laughing into his mouth.

"OH, YES, RIGHT THERE—"

"There?" he murmurs with a chuckle, and despite the theatricality of the entire situation, she still can't help a moan of approval.

"PERCY, YOUR DICK, IT'S HU-"

"Too much," he cuts in gruffly, and she giggles as he digs his nails into the skin of her thigh.

"Sorry," she whispers insincerely, letting her head fall back with a groan.

VIII. (Defense)
"So," Daphne says neutrally. "Do you like him, then?"

"I told you," Pansy grunts impatiently, "I just need a boyfriend through the winter, and he's a genuinely good fuck. It's not like it's going to last."

"But you're seeing him tonight," Daphne muses. "Even though you saw him last night?"

"I'm sure the effect will wear off shortly," Pansy airily remarks, holding up a pair of black stilettos and looking to Daphne for approval. "Hey, do these say 'authority' to you?"

"They say 'sex,' I think," Daphne supplies.

"That works too," Pansy determines, nodding with approval.

IX. (Roleplay)

"The Minister will see you now," Pansy calls, legs crossed expectantly from where she sits behind his desk.

He opens the door slowly, nodding slyly as he looks at her.

"Madame Minister," he opens, inclining his head.

"Mr Weasley," she returns primly. "Is there something you needed?"

"I brought you the forms you requested," he replies, with practiced solemnity.

"Bring them to me."

He steps forward, slowly running his thumb along the line of his lower lip.

"WW-426," he begins, setting it down on her desk. "Signed and dated, just as you asked—"

"And the others?" Pansy prompts. "Is everything as I requested it?"

"I don't know what you mean, Madame Minister," he replies coolly, watching her as she rises to her feet, stepping around the desk to reach him. "What else did you ask for?"

"I asked," Pansy says, sliding her hand down the front of his trousers, "for you to make sure I was satisfied in every way. And do I look—" she trails off, rubbing her palm against the stiff head of his cock. "Satisfied, Mr Weasley?"

He inhales sharply, shifting against her hand.

"Ah-ah," she warns, shaking her head. "I didn't say you could move, Mr Weasley. Did I?"

"I don't think I can satisfy you very well without some degree of motion, Madame Minister," he replies, his gaze dropping to her bare chest and sliding, with some degree of restraint, down the lines of her torso, falling to her stiletto heels and dragging approvingly back up. "Perhaps if you were to give me some instruction?"

She grabs hold of his tie, yanking him towards her.

"Fuck me on my desk, Mr Weasley," she instructs him, "and do it well, or you'll be fired for your incompetence."
He picks her up without a word, clearing the desk of its papers and setting her down on top of it with his arm wrapped tight around her ribs.

"You know," he murmurs in her ear, "I'm aware this is your fantasy, but I think I'm quite enjoying it myself."

"Did I say you could speak, Mr Weasley?" Pansy prompts, pulling the tie from around his neck and letting it drop to the floor as she lays herself back against the desk. "I believe your instructions were to satisfy me, not bore me."

He yanks her hips towards him, smiling darkly.

"I suppose you don't want me to tell you how hard I'm going to fuck you, then?" he prompts neutrally. "And I probably shouldn't say anything about how wet I'm going to make you, or how much you're going to beg for me—"

"Put your dick in me," Pansy pants, wrapping her legs around his hips, "or you're fired."

He smiles.

She knows he is going to toy with her when it's his turn; but that, she supposes, is the benefit of going first.

It's not currently her problem.

"Yes ma'am," he permits, just before impressively fucking himself straight to an imaginary raise.

X. (Roleplay, Part II)

"Miss Parkinson," he says, making a soft tutting sound. "Out of bed this late, are you?"

"I'm just going to meet my boyfriend," she replies, which is improvised, but he doesn't seem opposed. "Please don't tell the headmaster."

"Well, I'm afraid I'm going to have to," he says. "I am Head Boy, after all."

"But if you do, I'll be in trouble," Pansy whispers, biting her lip. "I'll lose my Prefect badge."

"Well," he muses, circling her, "I suppose you'll just have to make it up to me, then, won't you?"

"I'll do anything," Pansy assures him, laying it on thick. "Anything you want, Weasley—just please don't tell anyone you saw me."

He steps closer.

"Anything?" he asks.

She trills with anticipation.

"Anything," she promises.

He smiles.

"Tell me, Miss Parkinson," he murmurs. "Are you a good girl?"

"Always?" he muses. "So you've never touched yourself, then?"

"Never," she whispers, feeling a thrill of excitement.

"Well," he says. "I'd be remiss if I didn't help you, I think." He takes a step back, resting his hands on her hips. "Perhaps you should take this off," he suggests, and she obliges, removing the old Hogwarts uniform she'd dug up from her school things. "And these," he adds, his gaze flicking to her white cotton knickers.

She obediently steps out of them, never taking her eyes from his. "Is that all?"

He gestures to her blouse and she removes it, letting it fall slowly from her fingers.

"I'm nervous," she says.

"Don't be," he replies. "Now tell me, Miss Parkinson," he says, with a breathy air of contemplation. "Is your pussy wet?"

"Yes," she whispers.

"Wetter than when your boyfriend looks at you?"

"Yes."

"Wetter than when he touches you?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because you fascinate me," she says, surprising herself with the truth, and he seems to catch the look of startled wonder that must have filled her eyes.

"Touch yourself," he says.

She shivers.

She knows he's going to make her work for this one.

XI. (Fitting)

"Here," he says, tossing her a faded crimson jumper.

She makes a face as she catches it.

"Really?" she prompts skeptically, holding it up with a grimace of something that she's pretty sure he can tell is disgust. "It has your initial on it."

"Or," he suggests, "it has your initial on it."

She considers that for a moment.

"It is very soft," she grumbles in concession.
"You don't have to wear it," he says, shrugging, "if you don't want to. I'd just as happily have you sleep in nothing."

He himself is sleeping in next to nothing, slipping under his covers in his underwear and nothing else. She, on the other hand, is immensely cold, and she shivers at the prospect, glancing skeptically at the ruins of her white oxford where it sits discarded on the floor.

"Fine," she says, and pulls the jumper on. It's a little lumpy and long, probably even for him, and it skims the tops of her thighs. "How does it look?"

His mouth quirks.

"Very fitting," he says, and beckons to her.

She sighs, climbing in next to him.

"I don't cuddle," she warns him. "I don't like it."

"Fine," he agrees. "This is purely a matter of sleeping, isn't it? Sleep however you like."

She lies down on her back, and he on his.

"Goodnight," he says, in a perfunctory sort of way.

"Goodnight," she agrees, and he rolls onto his stomach, his head turned away from her.

She lies down on her back, and he on his.

"Goodnight," he says, in a perfunctory sort of way.

"Goodnight," she agrees, and he rolls onto his stomach, his head turned away from her.

She closes her eyes.

Opens them.

She scoots over slightly so that the barest centimeters of skin are touching, thigh to thigh.

His arm shifts, draping itself over her hips.

She closes her eyes again.

She falls asleep almost instantly.

---

XII. (Habit)

"Goodnight," he says, turning out the light the next night.

"Goodnight," she agrees, and turns onto her side, facing the wall as he faces the door.

_I don't like cuddling_, Draco had said to her once.

_Neither do I_, she'd replied, and they'd gotten in the practice of sleeping back to back, operating in separate spheres. She was used to sleeping on her right side, and he on his left. It was habit, a natural inclination. It hadn't seemed like the beginning of the end, even though it probably had been.

Here, in the strangeness of now, Pansy accidentally lets out a slow exhalation at the memory. Horrifyingly, it emerges as something like a mournful sigh.

She feels Percy shift in bed, nudging her shoulder with his.
She waits for a moment, feeling the warmth of him, and then she slides her hand behind her, resting it on his thigh.

He loops his pinky through hers, squeezing it once.

They fall asleep back to back.

---

XIII. (Holiday)

"Happy Christmas, Miss Parkinson," he murmurs to her as they stretch out on the carpet beside the fireplace. "Was this a sufficient gift?"

She thinks about it.

Then she leans over, resting her hand on his bare chest.

"Tell me more about the liability waivers," she beckons at a murmur, not quite ready to be finished with him. His gaze cuts slyly to hers.

"First," he says quietly, tracing his fingers up the curve of her inner thigh, "you have to file form WW-414 to submit a request for permit."

"Oh god," Pansy exhales, parting her legs for him. "And then?"

"And then," he continues, rolling over to settle himself between her knees, "you have to submit to the Ministry Events department office on the third floor. With," he adds, taking a handful of her hair and speaking low in her ear, "three sickles for a filing fee."

"Fuck," Pansy breathes, letting her head fall back when he releases her. "And after the permit?"

"If the Unspeakable grants the permit," Percy goes on neutrally, "you are then responsible for filling out form HP-12 and taking that upstairs"—he pauses, bending his lips to her neck—"for someone in Wizard Accounting to approve."

A gasp cuts between them. "And?"

He chuckles, his lips taking a lazy, torturous path from her torso down, down, down, lower, yes, _there—_

"And then," he says gruffly, capturing a moan between her lips. "If you're lucky," he clarifies, the words murmured into her cunt, "more paperwork."

"Oh god," she gasps, the feel of his lips so furiously decadent that she closes her eyes, wondering whether she has ever had a Christmas as thoroughly rewarding as this one.

---

XIV. (Friends)

"Theo," Pansy says, "this is Percy. Percy, Theo."

They shake hands in a perfunctory way. Theo has never really been her friend; only Draco's. But having been Daphne's boyfriend since they were sixteen, there was some obligation that Theo come along to assuage their collective curiosity—if only at his soon-to-be wife's insistence.

"And this is Daphne," Pansy continues, feeling the lurch she always does at the introduction.
Daphne is beautiful—naturally beautiful, unlike Pansy, who requires beauty charms and a certain amount of pliability from her hair to distract away from the nose she unrelentingly hates—and there is always a brief pang of wondering on Pansy's end if they (whoever any given 'they' is) might find Daphne the more desirable object of attention.

"Daphne's my best friend," Pansy adds, even though they all know this, because she immediately feels guilty for her unpleasant internal monologue.

"Hi," Daphne offers with her usual radiance, sparing Percy a dazzling smile.

He nods. "Nice to meet you," he says.

Then he reaches for Pansy with his free hand, lightly touching the inside of her elbow.

She takes comfort from it—from the benefit of his proximity—but it doesn't register as anything more. Not right away.

Despite the signs (like that one), Pansy doesn't actually realize right away how nervous Percy is. In fact, it only occurs to her in stages.

First, he babbles something incomprehensible about the principles of queuing, which even Pansy has to admit is outrageously mundane.

Then he fails to laugh at a joke Theo makes, hurriedly making up for it with a strangely misplaced chuckle.

Then, when the light touch against Pansy's elbow evolves to an arm wrapped tightly around her waist, it finally dawns on her.

"You're doing fine," she assures him, leaning in to say it in his ear. "They like you."

Percy lets out a breath, turning to spare her half a smile, and that's when she notices something else: that he doesn't look at Daphne—or anyone—the way he looks at her.

Not even close.

XV. (Ours)

"Pansy," he says. "May I ask why there's a dog on my sofa?"

"You can ask," she replies, "but I don't think he'll answer."

Percy sighs.

"Very funny," he says.

The truth is that she found the dog, the giant Saint Bernard, wandering around in the snow in Diagon. She already checked; he's not an Animagus. He's just a dog, and a hungry dog, too, and because she couldn't take him home—where her mother would sniff her disapproval and her father would cast an unsympathetic veto—she took him here, instead.

She explains this with slightly more panache, leaning into the humor of the situation, but she wonders if Percy can see that she genuinely doesn't want to let the poor fur-laden menace go.

"He's sweet," she attempts, though even she knows that's a meager offering at best. "See?" she adds hopefully, as the dog begins to pant heavily in Percy's face, promptly fogging up his glasses.

"Well," Percy says uncomfortably, "I'm not generally a dog person."

She grimaces and nods, deflating.

"But I suppose if he needs a home," Percy continues, looking pained, and then he trails off, letting her draw her own conclusions from the fact that he has now allowed the dog to vigorously sniff his face, knocking his glasses askew.

Pansy turns to face him, swallowing exuberance in favor of something passably refined.

"Do you know," she finally says, "I hate almost everyone I know, but I think, at this moment, I hate you the least."

The dog expresses something similar, lurching down and resting his slobbering chin atop Percy's immaculate trousers.

"Well," Percy permits, clearly fighting his own discomfort. "What will you name him, then?"

"Me?" Pansy asks. "He's your dog."

Percy blinks, turning slowly to face her.

For a second, she's terrified he'll change his mind, say no, call her a fool; treat her to a buffet of mockery and disdain. Which, she abruptly realizes, is something she would expect from anyone else in her life.

Instead, he says, "Our dog."

She buries her face furiously in the dog's fur, hoping Percy doesn't see the look of total madness on her face. She's fairly certain it's something that's part smile and part encroaching sobs, but either way, it's an outrageous, unbridled flood of emotions. It's definitely something inadvisable, too, because there will almost certainly be a time after him. She's sure of it, in fact. There will be the time before him, the time of him, and then the time after him, and so she hides her inconvenient satisfaction.

"Fine," she sniffs eventually. "Except he lives here, and you have to take care of him most of the time, so you should probably name him."

Percy nods, patting the dog's head with a truly resplendent awkwardness.

"Ronald," he decides.

Pansy fights a laugh. "Isn't that your brother's name?"

"Yes," he admits. "I'm not very good at names."

Pansy straightens to wrap her arms around his neck, pulling him towards her.

There will be a time after him, she knows, but right now that's not her problem.

"Actually," she says, "I rather think you are."

XVI. (Bonding)
For a while, the dog renders them domestic. Ronald, who is more often referred to by Percy (for reasons Pansy doesn't fully understand) as 'Dog Quixote' or 'Dog Giovanni,' relentlessly follows Percy around his flat, panting up at him with such a slavish expression of adoration that gradually Percy, too, begins to look some degree of fond. He and Pansy now spend most of their nights doing nothing together on the sofa, one of Percy's arms slung around Pansy's shoulders while the other absently pats Ronald's head, reading in comfortable silence while a long series of January storms rages outside.

"Come on," Pansy says eventually, tugging at Percy's belt and luring him out of their sluggish coma of contentment. "It's been all day, Weasley. I want to hear you write sonnets to my pussy."

"But," Percy protests helplessly, glancing at where the dog is eyeing them from his spot on the sofa. "He's watching."

Pansy groans, pulling away. "If I'd known the dog was going to interfere with my sex life, I might not have rescued him," she grumbles unhappily, and Percy catches her face in his hands.

"We can close the door," he suggests, and though Dog Quixote seems vaguely displeased by the prospect of them tripping over each other to his bedroom, she figures he'll get over it.

XVII. (Fixation)

She's never met a man who enjoys cunnilingus as much as he does. He seems to genuinely revel in it, too, not merely perform it, and he does it with a fascinating contemplation; a thriving shiver of sensations, as if the taste of her is not enough without the feel of her, without the capture of her breath between his hands.

She also didn't realize there were so many ways to have her pussy licked until she met him. He sucks her clit while she lays back on the kitchen table, kneeling at the edge of it and draping her legs over his shoulders; he slides underneath her when she climbs into his lap, leaving her helplessly straddling his jaw. He does it in the shower, on his knees while her back presses against the too-cold tiles; he does it from behind while she's on all fours, his fingers wrapped around her thighs. He makes a wreckage of her, her legs shaking from the smallest motions of his tongue, and she wonders if she ever truly repays the favor.

"Do you feel that?" she whispers after she groans, her hips arching up as her own sensations cascade in waves and her fingers tighten in the soft strands of his hair. "Do you feel the way you make me come?"

He gives her a look like his soul is fucking escaping his body.

"Pansy," he says, more shudder than sound, and then, all at once, she no longer wonders.

By virtue of her wanting, she can see her debt is more than repaid.

---

XVIII. (Saints)

"Saint Valentine was murdered," Pansy comments, eyeing the inane display of pink and red hearts coming from Twilfitt and Tatting. "He was tortured and killed and hastily reburied, and somehow I'm supposed to want to buy chocolate?"

"Perhaps it was more commercially viable than death," Percy suggests blithely, "and seeing as there's already a holiday for severed heads and cobwebs, Valentine's Day had to select a different
"Well, when you're right, you're right," Pansy permits, shrugging. "Though I would think there's plenty of room for more murder-related holidays."

"In fairness, Halloween is more about death and the spiritual otherworlds than murder," Percy remarks, humming to himself as he considers it. "So, if you want, we can make Valentine's Day a murder holiday. Presuming you don't actually intend to commit any homicide," he cautions her. "In which case, I must request that you refrain."

"What if I don't kill you?" Pansy suggests brightly. "I could kill someone else. We could do it together," she adds, and nudges him. "Come on. Wouldn't it be romantic?"

"What, a joint killing?" Percy says. "I'm flattered, but appropriately on edge, I think."

"You know, I think you'd know what to do," Pansy comments tangentially. "How to get away with it, I mean. You would know which spells are tracked by the Ministry, and how fast things decay, and what times of day to dispose of a body, and basically everything monotonous that normal people get caught with, you know? I think you'd be the only person in the entire world who could fully get away with it. Ooh look, pretty," she says, pointing to some sugar-spun garlands in the windows of his brother's shop, but then she realizes that he's paused somewhere behind her.

She stops, turning towards him with a frown, and takes a few steps back to where he's abruptly come to a halt, staring into nothing.

"What is it?" she asks him, bewildered.

"That," he rasps, swallowing heavily, "is perhaps the kindest thing anyone has ever said to me."

"What?" she demands, wondering what exactly she even said aside from idly suggesting he pursue a career in serial killing. "That's insane."

"You realize that most people think I'm useless," Percy informs her, with so little hesitation it makes her heart hurt. "I know it, and I'm sure you do too. I'm aware that most people find me dull, and they consider my conversation topics trivial and mundane. But you, you just—"

He breaks off, choking slightly on emotion, and Pansy is more than a little alarmed.

"Um," she begins, resting her hand lightly on his arm. "There, there—"

"I would happily help you kill someone," he promises her firmly. "Provided your life was at stake," he amends, "or possibly if it were to save the entirety of mankind. There are of course caveats," he clarifies unnecessarily, "but provided I approved of your motives, then I would willingly aid in your homicide."

"Weasley," Pansy chides playfully. "People can hear!"

"Let them," he invites, with a decided dearth of shame. "Anyone who isn't at least a little afraid of you, Miss Parkinson, lacks a terrifying amount of self-preservation."

She leans into him at that, raising her chin on instinct when he turns to brush his lips thoughtfully against hers.

"And that," she informs him, "is the nicest thing anyone has ever said to me, so we're even."
He pauses, something half-said forming on his tongue, and she wonders if he knows what he wants to say. She thinks that she knows, and for once, she hopes that she's wrong, because she isn't sure she's ready yet. She can feel her legs twitch beneath her and she knows if he says it before she's ready, she'll run.

She'll run, and then it'll progress to the time after him, and at this moment, she's absolutely certain that that's the very last thing that she wants.

"Pansy," he murmurs, and she holds her breath.

Feels it swell, and waits to burst.

"Hungry?" he asks neutrally.

She exhales.

"Sure," she replies.

"Too bad," he says, "because I'm planning to fuck you like I just got away with murder."

She shivers.

"Fucking twisted," she proclaims, relishing the contortions of his mind.

She wasn't hungry anyway.

---

XIX. (Important)

She and her mother fight often. It's nothing new.

Pansy's always been a disappointment to her mother. She couldn't hold on to Draco, after all; she had one shot at a decent pureblooded engagement and she failed, and to begin with, she's not as pretty as her mother was, nor as docile or as sweet, and so Pansy has always been a thorn on the rose of perfection that is Dahlia Parkinson's life. Pansy is the only child, the only hope, and thus the only disappointment. This is nothing new.

So yes, this is far from their first fight about Pansy's failings, but this fight is slightly different than the others, because the words "I love him" slip out tearfully without warning. Of course, in the moment that it happens Pansy's pretty sure she's just saying it, and that it doesn't mean anything at all. It's just something she says, isn't it? Something she throws out like a weapon when she fights with her overbearing mother.

She said "I love him," like an idiot, and then, like an idiot, she ran.

She checks his flat first, but he's not there. Dog Quixote is, and he gives her a quizzical stare, so she pats his head and dries her tears in his fur but she keeps going, passing through the Floo to Percy's office.

"Weasley," she announces, "I need you to—"

She breaks off as she sees him sitting with a member of the Wizengamot. They're clearly drinking something expensive and discussing something Private and Important and Pansy has a rush of memories—of her father closing his office door to keep her out, of "I'm busy right now, Pansy," and "you can show me later, Pansy," and "Pansy, it will have to wait"—and in the spirit of crippling nostalgia she backs away quickly, mumbling apologies under her breath.

"One moment," Percy offers to the Warlock, and Pansy freezes in place as he rises to his feet, coming towards her.

"Is everything okay?" he asks quietly. He's analyzing her, she can tell; it's an investigatory question. Is everything okay, the first step to assessing the problem.

"It can wait," she says, and he nods.

She's about to head shamefully back through the Floo when Percy's voice cuts through the room again.

"Warlock Hawkworth," he beckons formally, "have you met Pansy Parkinson?"

Pansy recognizes the Warlock's name from countless newspapers; from the important sections of the paper, too, the ones she tries to read but doesn't always manage. Her mind buzzes as the Warlock says something along the lines of no, no, haven't had the pleasure—

"Isn't he important?" she whispers furtively to Percy, her fingers darting out to grip his waist. "I shouldn't be here."

Percy glances down, assessing her a second time.

"You're my girlfriend," he tells her. "You're important."

She blinks.

She has never thought of this as being true before.

"Do you mind talking with him?" Percy presses quietly. "If you'd rather not, I understand."

"Me? But—" She blinks again. "Are you sure that I won't—" She drops her voice. "You know. Embarrass you?"

He looks bemused, as though that particular prospect has never occurred to him before.

Then he leans over, kissing her cheek, and nudges her towards the Warlock.

"Pansy's a very talented witch," Percy says firmly. "Top of her class at Hogwarts, and quite a charming conversationalist. I think her perspective would be quite valuable to you, Warlock," he says, and he continues on, saying something about retail or development or perhaps unicorns or pirates, but Pansy doesn't hear him.

All she can hear is valuable and important and she wants to cry again, only she wouldn't dare ruin this for him. So she smiles as politely as she can, sits as straight as her spine will permit, and lays her hand carefully (and respectfully) on Percy's knee.

He rests his hand on top of hers, brushing his thumb over her knuckles, and while the Warlock drones on about something only marginally coherent, she flips Percy's hand over, tracing her nails along his palm.

I love you, she writes, and his fingers contract slightly as he registers the message.

Good, he writes back on her knuckles, as the smallest, most unassuming of smiles traipses across his lips.
It's so miniscule a motion that the Warlock doesn't catch it.

In fact, it's so astoundingly him in its smallness that only she would catch it.

Because she loves him.

And he hasn't said it yet, but she knows. He has already said as much in all the ways that matter.

He loves her.

XX. (Spring)

"Snow's melting," he says, handing her a cup of coffee and nudging Dog Giovanni over before slipping back in bed beside her, gesturing out the window. "Nearly spring."

"Strange," she murmurs, letting the warmth of the mug bleed into her fingers. "I'm pretty sure there's something I was supposed to do when the snow melted."

"Oh?" he asks, turning to look at her. First thing in the morning his hair is always a mess, some of it sticking straight up while the rest cascades forward into his eyes, and her gaze traces the shape of it thoughtfully. "What was it?"

She considers telling him.

He is so appealing, and so endearing, and she wonders if there is anything left in her heart that she doesn't want him to have, so she considers telling him.

But it now seems so foolish a concept it disappears entirely, lost to the recesses of her idiot past.

"Did you fall in love with me on purpose?" she asks instead, indulging a strange, sudden curiosity.

"With intention, you mean?" he asks.

She considers it.

"Yes," she rules. "Sure, with intention."

"The steps were all there," he says. "The algorithm of it. I might not have bought you that drink. Might not have given you my card. Might not have felt the need to help you when you asked. So I suppose that's some evidence of intent, isn't it?"

She groans. "Just answer the question."

He turns, his gaze falling slowly on hers.

"I knew what I was doing when I fell in love with you," he says, and then corrects himself. "I didn't fall," he amends. "I went willingly." He pauses. "Does that make sense?"

"So there was a deliberate quality?" she muses.

"Yes," he agrees. "I certainly wasn't dragged."

They both sip their coffee.

"Will you go with me to Daphne's wedding?" she asks neutrally. "It'll be a whole thing," she adds,

He nods.

By now, he more than understands the subtext.

"That's in the summer," he remarks, his gaze drifting out to the melting snow.

"I know," she says. "No snow."

"No snow," he confirms.

"But I'll need you there," she says. "Survival technique."

He turns his head, half a smile pulling at his mouth, and brushes his lips against her forehead.

"Survival technique," he agrees.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Happy birthday AngelicaElizaAndPeggy! Also, go check out Aurora's edit on tumblr, and many thanks (as ever) for reading. The coming month will be primarily focused on finishing Nobility (which is the multi-chaptered expansion of Chapter 22, Chaotic Good, if you weren't already aware of that) but I do have a few unfinished drafts (and a few long overdue birthday gifts) to wrap up and put in here soon!
Things About You

Pairing: Nottgrass (Theo Nott x Daphne Greengrass)

Universe: Nobility prequel

Rating: M for sex

Summary: A birthday gift for oblivionbaby, whom I love and who loved Nobility (the full story expanded from chapter 22 of this collection, Chaotic Good.) A note: this story can stand alone, but the setting may be hard to follow without having read either Nobility or Chaotic Good.

Daphne Greengrass and Theo Nott are promised to each other as children in a court filled with turmoil and uncertainty. From the moment they meet, they only know one thing: they definitely do not want each other.

At six years old, Lady Daphne Greengrass understood a great many things about the world. Namely that her father was a great man at court, which made her wealthy, and that her recently deceased mother had been descended from a long line of titles, which made her noble. Daphne understood that she was expected to behave in precisely the right way at all times, and that the right way was not always the same way each time. She understood, too, that there were sides to all things—a right one, and a wrong one—but it was difficult to know the right one from a distance, and so it was important to keep her heart and her mouth distinctly separate entities until she could be sure.

She understood that her father kept her at court because her mother had born only two daughters, and so her own marriage was the only thing that would conceivably bring her parents the avenue for prestige they might have had if she had been a son. She understood clearly that one day very soon she would be promised to a man—a lord or a duke if she were lucky—and from then on, she would belong to him, and she would have to listen to him, the same way she listened to her father. She understood all these things, and lived beneath the weight of them, accepting them as true.

Mostly, though, Daphne understood that she was alone.

oOo

There were a few other children at court; mostly boys, the sons of nobles who were raised to follow their fathers' footsteps into battle to fight for one king or another. For now, it was the Peverell King, but his intended heir had long ago been killed, and the line of succession was still uncertain. Daphne knew when her father slid into a room with angry-looking men and shut the door it meant that something was going to happen, and more importantly, that she should leave.

So she did.

On one such occasion, the clatter of wooden swords brought her to the courtyard, where two boys were fighting—or perhaps playing, though they both had their teeth gritted, no doubt struggling to ensure the other would not win.

One of the boys was easy enough to identify. He was Draco Malfoy, the only son of Lucius Malfoy, whose pale blond hair always made him seem like the sleek golden strands on Daphne's loveliest dresses; the ones she only wore at Christmas, or for especially extravagant things. He seemed to her to be a very valuable thing, if a bit cold. Not unlike her mother's jewels.

The other boy, she noted, was dark and slight and extremely thin, as if he were little more than a shadow; a slip of a thing, really, and far smaller than Draco, though they must have been the same age. The other boy had his dark brow furrowed, sweat dripping down his forehead, and as Draco aimed high, the other boy stumbled to counter, nearly slipping in the loose mud beneath his feet.

"Careful, Theo," Draco taunted, his pale hair glinting in the light. "Don't fall," he sang, and leapt forward, hitting the other boy—Theo, as it were, making him almost certainly Theodore Nott and therefore the son of a duke, although that certainly wasn't evident at first glance—square in the chest and sending him flying back in the mud, teeth gnashed together in pain.

"Stop it," Daphne interrupted, lifting her skirts and launching herself at where Draco stood laughing, gracelessly mocking Theo's collision with the ground. "Stop—it's not funny! Here, let me help you," she offered, turning to Theo and stretching out her hand. "Are you hurt?"

For a moment, he simply stared at her, his eyes widening slightly. They were dark, she thought, like the rest of him; there were shadows in his gaze as well as his motions, and she watched the rapid change in his expression, from shock to dismay to anger.

"Go away," he spat at her, shoving himself onto his feet and glaring over his shoulder. "We're busy."

Daphne, who had never been spoken to that way before, glowered defiantly back. "I'm just trying to help," she informed him, as his mouth tightened to a thin, mean line.

"I don't need your help," he retorted flatly, and then he shoved past her, heading back to Draco's side. She spun, furious, and saw that Draco was smothering dismay into his hand, attempting to conceal the motion. At first she thought it was because he, too, thought it was outrageous that Theo had spoken that way to her, but the closer she looked, she could see it wasn't that at all.

Draco was laughing, hard, his cheeks pink and his shoulders shaking, and Daphne gaped in disbelief. Whatever she'd done, Draco certainly thought it was very funny, but Theo clearly didn't think it was funny at all.

"Fine," she seethed, but Theo didn't look at her.

Daphne strode away, eyeing the mud on the hem of her dress and wishing she'd known from the start Theo Nott wouldn't have been worth a single soiled inch.

oOo

He was always like that. He was always scowling, or else glowering, always casting his dark gaze around the room with his back in a corner, like an animal in a cage. Daphne didn't try to speak to him again, and he didn't speak to her.

In fact, he spoke to no one, except for Draco.

It was strange, really, because in addition to being a contrast between light and dark, the two of them could not have been more different in temperament. Draco was a darling of the court, always being called upon to dance with someone—usually Daphne, who was the best of the girls—for the entertainment of idle nobility, all of them happy to praise him for his looks, his confidence, the sureness of his steps. Draco was no higher a noble than Theo, but it was difficult to remember that when they stood next to each other—one like a golden prince, and the other like a sharp-eyed
Theo always looked especially vicious when Draco was gone from his side, as if he might bite anyone else who tried to come closer. Sometimes, Daphne almost felt sorry for him.

Sometimes.

But then she would remember the way his face looked when he shouted at her, and abruptly, she wouldn't feel sorry anymore.

oOo

The more people began to whisper about the old King's failing health, the more Daphne saw her father taking meetings. She didn't concern herself with them much at all until she noticed that one man in particular seemed to take most of the meetings, and then one day he left looking especially pleased. Dangerousely pleased, she thought, like a snake that had swallowed a bird whole.

She knew who he was.

She knew what it meant.

"No," she whispered to herself, watching Lord Nott stride away from her father's chambers with a trunk full of her mother's jewels.

oOo

_I don't want him. Not him, not him, not him. Father, you don't understand, he's rude and horrid and angry, he's like a shadow, like the edge of a knife, I can never love him, I'll never love him and he'll never love me—_

"Why him, Father?" she asked quietly, stifling her temper, and her father shrugged.

"Because marriage to Nott's son means that someday, you'll be a duchess," he replied, as if that were the only thing that mattered, and perhaps in his world it was. "It is the highest title I can get for you, Daphne. You'll be an even greater lady than your mother, and your sister will bow to you —wouldn't you like that?"

_Not if it means I have to marry him!_

"Not Draco?" she asked tentatively, and her father grimaced.

"Lucius Malfoy is too dangerous to align with right now," he said, and when she frowned, he beckoned for him to come closer, sitting her on his knee and toying with the long plaits of her hair.

"The tides are changing soon," her father murmured. "This King is very ill and soon to die, and then there will be war, and in war, there are always winners and losers. You must try very hard to be a winner, even if you must lose." He paused. "Lord Malfoy fights openly for the Gaunt challenger, but if he loses, then the Malfoys will be destitute, tried and executed for treason. To side with them is to aim foolishly," he cautioned, and Daphne nodded.

"And Lord Nott?"

"He is a more quiet supporter," her father confirmed, "and therefore safer. Your title will be secure."
She thought of him again; of Theodore Nott, with his dark eyes and his slight limbs and the harsh line of his mouth. More than likely he would be cruel, like his very old father, and he wouldn't even know how to laugh, much less how to love. How would there ever be light in her life with him?

Sometimes, Daphne thought morosely, it was a very poor thing to be a girl.

Still, she knew what was expected. "Yes, Father," she said obediently, as he nodded his approval, absently stroking her hair.

As Daphne and Theo grew older, the betrothal started to mean slightly more than purely an arrangement between two noblemen—only it revealed itself in small, irritating ways. Like, for example, while the other girls at court were permitted to dance with the other boys, Daphne was always led directly to Theo, who had thankfully caught up to her height by then (but no taller, unfortunately). He was always sullen, meeting her eye with a fierceness the other boys didn't. They looked at her like a sweet to be unwrapped; Theo looked at her like a chore, or some equally unpleasant burden.

By then, Draco had learned to flirt, which only made things worse. He always greeted her with a smile, with a calculated little curve to his mouth when he said her name. He was graceful and poised, and Daphne nearly always forgot to notice Theo's slim presence beside him, carved into Draco's side. They were almost never without each other, as attached at the hip as they'd been as boys, and for all her attempts to sort it out, Daphne couldn't understand. Why would someone like Draco want someone like Theo always at his heels? It made no sense.

Personally, Daphne wished she could spend less time with Theo. She also thought, selfishly, that if her betrothal had been a gamble, it was clearly paying off on only one side. Lord Nott had bought her for his son when she was only six, not even knowing she would grow into a beauty.

What had she gotten in return?

Theo gave her his sullen glare from across the Great Hall, and she realized she'd been staring. He was still too skinny, his features still too harsh. The other day, too, she'd noticed a fresh bruise on his arm, and he'd caught her staring.

"Drills," he supplied, his voice clipped, and pulled irritably at his sleeve.

I didn't ask, she wanted to say.

Instead, though, she said nothing.

"How are you liking your future husband?" her father asked her, looking amused when she struggled not to make a face. "I'm told he has a rather reserved and studious nature," he remarked optimistically. "Seems to like books, or so I hear."

"Yes, well, he's hardly a warrior," Daphne murmured, and her father laughed.

"He may yet grow into his limbs," he assured her, "but until then, be certain he keeps to his reputation. That's your job, you know," he added slyly. "Men will always be quick to boast of their own prowess, but it's a woman's job to keep her husband careful in times of war."

"Is this war?" Daphne asked, surprised, and her father's mouth quirked.
"Everything is always war," he assured her. "But yes, now especially. Keep him in line," he warned. "If you do it well, he'll never thank you for it, because he'll never notice. But the noblest deeds are often the quietest."

"Am I to be so noble that I never make a sound?" Daphne complained, and again, her father laughed.

"Yes, maybe," he permitted. "But if you can keep your head, your jewels, and your title, then what does it matter whether you have a voice?"

Daphne bit her tongue, not wanting to tell her father she thought him enormously incorrect.

"Yes, Father," she agreed instead, and bowed her head, sweeping him a perfect curtsy.

For a while, Daphne tried to think of Theo as a project. Something, she reasoned, that could eventually be fixed.

"You spend too much time with Draco," she whispered to him as they dutifully rehearsed a pavane. Daphne, unlike her partner, knew the steps without pause, having been called upon to lead the dances more than once. Theo merely scowled at his feet, not lifting his chin for the hopeless need to stare at them. "His father is on campaign now, I hear—he could be tried for treason, you know, and he could lose everything. And if the Gaunt challenger loses—"

Theo's response was quick and ruthless. "I don't care," he said, a rare reply, and she almost tripped, startled by the sound of it. She regularly forgot how dry and harsh his voice was; almost like if aimed correctly, it could cut through glass. "And don't pretend like you don't like Draco, either. I see you looking at him from time to time."

Daphne felt her cheeks flush. "Well, you dishonor us both by ignoring my father's wishes, and you diminish the entire purpose of our betrothal," she reminded him under her breath, grimacing as he put his hands on her waist for the lift. "My father chose you for me instead of Draco because your title is—"

"Ah yes, my title." Theo looked at her then, mutinous, but she avoided meeting his eye as he set her none-too-carefully back on the floor. He might make a mockery of himself, she thought murderously, but she would do no such thing. She kept her gaze lowered, her head tilted dutifully, so that her father, unlike his, would never suffer the shame of having raised a defiant fool.

"I know perfectly well why my father bought you for me," Theo continued, "and why your father agreed to the price. But neither of them own me," he informed her, and dropped his voice as the song slowly came to an end, his head nearing hers as he bowed. "And as long as I live," he whispered, "I will choose for myself with whom I wish to stand, and for whom I deign to kneel. I promise you, it certainly won't be you who tells me."

She bit her tongue, not wanting to snarl at him, but found herself unable to prevent it.

"You will do as your father commands you," she hissed, "as I do my duty by my father, and—"

She broke off, startled, as the doors flew open with the violence of urgency; of news that could not wait. A grim, hard-ridden messenger strode in without pause, his lungs filled to bursting with panic as he faced the nobles around the room, the dancers pausing in the center of the hall.

"My Lords," the messenger called, breathless, "the Gaunt challenger has laid waste to the Duke of Grimmauld's army. He is right now riding up to the gates to take the castle—"

There was a series of gasps and motion around the room as Daphne swallowed hard, looking for her father in the crowd. There will be war, he had warned her. Men will die, and I may be one of them, but whoever I must fight for, you must always stay on the winning side, Daphne—

"Go to your rooms," she heard in her ear, and realized that Theo was speaking into it, one hand on the ceremonial hilt slung around his hips as the other floated near her arm. His voice was still sharp, but it was edged now with something else. "Take your ladies and lock the doors, bar them. If the castle falls, they will come for you first—do not wait," he warned. "If you see the flags torn down, take to the castle ramparts and escape. Are you afraid?" he asked, and she looked up, startled, as she registered the way he stood with his entire narrow body blocking her, as if he would somehow shield her from the news that had burst through the doors.

"No, I am not afraid," she told him, though she was. "Are you?"

"Me? I am terrified." His mouth was a thin, grim line, and she didn't dare ask him how he knew why they would come for her. It seemed a very adult thing to know, and they felt hardly older than children. "I will feel better, though, if I know you will not be one of my concerns."

She realized then, amid the most inopportune timing, that while she'd thought for so long that his eyes were dark, small and shadowed like a bird of prey, in reality, they were green. Up close they were wider, richer, brighter, and she felt she might have understood now why Draco wanted Theo at his side. They seemed to be the sort of eyes that missed nothing.

"Don't worry about me," Daphne told him, and then hesitated, realizing she should leave him with some blessing, or some benediction, as his future wife. "Please don't die," she determined briskly, though it could easily have been contempt.

"I'll try very hard not to," he informed her, and then, across the room, she caught Draco's pale hair flashing, his voice booming through the crowd.

"NOTT!" he yelled, a call to arms, and Theo nodded, releasing Daphne.

"Go. Don't be a fool," he told her, already angling himself towards Draco. "Run if you must. That is your only duty to me—do you understand?"

She nodded, and he turned, striding away.

She knew she had promised to go, to hide, but she paused in the commotion to watch him, curious about what he would say when he reached Draco's side.

"Who do we fight for?" she watched him say to Draco. It was a fair question, considering the years of turmoil at court between the rival royal lines, and the other boy shrugged.

"Each other," Daphne watched Draco reply, and Theo nodded. It seemed that was enough.

Daphne watched two coltish boys ready themselves to fight like men, and then, determining that none of them were children anymore, she spun on her heels, letting the silk of her skirts trail along the cobbled stone of the castle as she ran the steps to barricade herself in her rooms.

The new King was as handsome as he was ruthless, or perhaps the other way around. He was more a man than anyone Daphne had ever seen, and though she would never be ill-composed enough to stare the way the other girls did, she understood perfectly well why they did it. Most of the time, Tom seemed more vengeful god than human man, and his entire court feared him as much as they admired him.

In at least one respect, Lucius Malfoy's wager had paid off tremendously. His place at the King's side meant that Draco was favored, and because Theo had fought with Draco while the King had seized Hogwarts, Theo was favored, too. The Nott family had always been Loyalists, but now they were boastfully hailed as such; Daphne could see that Theo's title was worth even more now, and quietly, she was pleased, particularly once she saw her own father repeatedly leaving private audiences with the King.

Theo himself remained unchanged. She thought perhaps they'd had a moment, but the weeks following the castle's siege proved her wrong. He looked at her no differently; valued her no higher, by the looks of it, though admittedly not any lower. He'd fought on the winning side, and though Draco wore that honor in the way he carried his shoulders, strutting boldly through the halls, Theo remained unchanged.

From time to time, Daphne heard Draco's laugh cutting through the Great Hall, and she would always look up, curious, to see that the sound had been the result of something Theo had said. She wondered, disbelieving, at the possibility that Theo could have ever managed any humor at all. She wondered why it bothered her, or if it even did. It seemed unlikely that anything Theo Nott did would ever register important enough to embed itself in her thoughts, and yet she felt distinctly certain that she hated whatever he kept from her—whatever little flashes of humanity that he seemed only willing to give to Draco, and not to her.

For a time, she felt more alone than ever. She'd known her intended husband nearly all her life, and yet he remained a stranger still.

oOo

"He likes you."

Daphne jumped, startled, as she noticed that Theo had crept over to her side, pausing beside her in the hall. Another year had passed and he seemed to have been stretched through the entirety of it; astoundingly, he now towered over her, and he looked as though he was hardly done growing. Still, he remained as quiet and lost to the shadows as ever.

"Who?" she asked, trying not to betray precisely how alarmed she had been.

"The King," Theo replied, and she blinked. His gaze cut down to hers, oddly curious. "You didn't know?"

"I—I don't know what you mean," she ventured slowly, though in truth, she'd certainly caught the King's strange blue eyes on hers from time to time. It wasn't particularly surprising; others had stared often enough, so why should any man, even a King, not also find her something of interest? She knew she was liked—she was, as her father often praised, beautiful, valuable, and temperate—and she wasn't particularly surprised by the information.

Theo seemed to sense as much, and shrugged.

"You are the most eligible bride available at court, should he choose a noble," he supplied knowingly. "I'm told the King has been discussing you as a marriage prospect."

"But—" Daphne stared up at him, bewildered. "But I am already promised to someone."
"Yes, someone," Theo wryly agreed, chuckling under his breath. "Someone," he murmured, "who is practically no one, at least compared to a King. It is an honor for you, for your father. And I know how such things matter to you."

She turned, frowning. "You would release me from our agreement?" she asked, surprised, and he shrugged.

"It isn't up to me," he reminded her. "It's up to the King, to your father, to my father—to everyone else before either of us," he clarified. "But it would mean you would be Queen, and I'm sure the King would pay my father the value of the betrothal, so they'll be happy. And you too, I imagine," he added, glancing at her again. "You'd get a crown and a throne out of the deal instead of me."

Daphne carefully cleared her throat. "And you?" she asked. "Would you be happy to be free of me?"

Theo paused in place, tension spreading through his shoulders at the question.

"You're hardly mine," he told her stiffly. "I know perfectly well you don't like me."

"I—" Daphne toyed with her words, hesitating to answer. "I simply don't know you."

"You don't know Draco, either," Theo told her. "And yet I know you'd have preferred to be given to him."

"Yes, well, he is different," Daphne protested. "He's easy to understand, but you—" She hesitated again. "You and I have nothing in common," she insisted defensively, and he turned to face her, glancing down at her.

"You are right about that," he agreed, and then, after a long look at her, he turned away, disappearing down the corridor.

She wasn't given to the King. It seemed he had something else in mind, though nobody at court seemed to know what. He paid you numerous compliments, her father assured her, coughing slightly from the illness that had kept him from the hunt that day, but he doesn't wish to take a wife from the daughters at court. Perhaps he aspires to a foreign princess.

Daphne nodded, not wanting to reveal that she was relieved. Already, only months into the new King's reign, there was talk of nobles being slaughtered for their protection of the Peverell heir—the young man called Harry, who'd recently arrived at court bearing the title that had once belonged to the slain Duke of Grimmauld. Daphne had watched the King's blue eyes go hard at the sight of the roguish Duke, and upon witnessing the change in them, she'd been certain he would be no ideal husband, however desirable a man or powerful a monarch he might have otherwise been. She could sense no softness anywhere in his gaze, and breathed out a muted sigh of relief when she learned she had not been his choice, even though she could hear whispers at her back for how she must have somehow displeased him.

The day the gossip spread that Daphne had been passed over, she caught a flicker in the shadows from the corridor, recognizing Theo's shape. Without thinking, she walked towards him, leaving the whispers of the other spiteful girls behind and pausing, unsure of what to say, until he gestured into an alcove, concealing them from sight.

"You are still promised to me," he noted without expression.
"Yes," she agreed.

"Are you disappointed?" he asked neutrally, and she blinked.

"No," she replied, and watched him inhale.

"Well," he said, and before she could wonder what was coming next, he had bent his head towards her, his lips carefully brushing hers. It was over so quickly; barely a breath, and he had kept his hands at his sides, conspicuously not touching her, before he leaned away, prompting her to sway dizzily towards him. For a moment, she'd felt his softness, felt something tender and delicate and divine, and then just as quickly he was staring at her with his dark, discerning eyes, his mouth back to its usual line of constraint.

"There," he said, and she stood in place, waiting. "Maybe we had nothing in common before," he remarked, "but at least now we have a secret."

Then he turned, leaving her behind to stare at where he had been.

Her father passed away in the middle of the night one night, quickly and without much ceremony. The illness he'd sustained while hunting had never really cleared from his lungs, and Daphne was informed without much softness at all that her life had been transferred from her father's hands, her sister sent away until a suitable husband could be found.

"Do you understand what I've explained to you?" Lord Nott prompted gruffly, as if Daphne were somehow stupid or silly enough to have questions. Her father had died; now she, her sister, and her inheritance all belonged to her future husband's father. He could take it without giving her the marriage he'd once promised. He could shut her up in a manor house for the rest of her life, if he wished it. Daphne knew as much, and didn't look up at Theo, who stood silently beside his father.

"I do," she said, and paused. "Will I have to move my household, then?"

The old man replied with something of a grunt. "I have no room for you yet. But given the King's impending marriage—"

"Father," Theo interrupted, and Daphne fought the urge to look up, startled. "Is there any reason the marriage should not go ahead sooner rather than later?"

Daphne watched Lord Nott's attention cut irritably to his son, one brow arched without further comment.

"The King will need a Loyalist to run the future Queen's household," Theo continued, his voice light, as if to suggest he'd just thought of it. "Why not offer him someone from our house? Then we'd have the Queen's ear as well as the King's."

"I didn't think you particularly cared whether or not I had the King's ear," Lord Nott remarked, with a hint of offense, as if perhaps Theo had once disappointed him in a similar conversation. "Though I suppose you're not wrong." He paused, vacantly staring into the empty space above Daphne's head, and then turned back to his son. "Fine. I'll put her forth as an option for the Queen's ladies, and if he accepts, you'll be married within the week."

Daphne wired her jaw shut, imploring it not to drop.

"Well, we're done here," Lord Nott said, giving a brisk wave of his hand. Daphne read it as dismissal and rose to her feet, backing herself to the door and then turning sharply, half-running through his quarters and frantically towards her own.

"Daphne," she heard Theo call after her while she silently fumed, not wanting to face him. "Lady Greengrass, wait—"

"You ambushed me," she hissed at him, spinning in place as he caught her. "You've been plotting that for some time, haven't you?"

He looked as though he would protest, but then he closed his mouth, snapping it shut and hardening against her fury. "Your father is dead," he reminded her, and she flinched. "I promise you, you do not wish to have your inheritance in my father's hands."

"And why would I like it any better in yours?" she snapped. "Why should I trust you to be any different?"

Theo blinked, taken aback.

"You think I'm like my father?" he asked, and like the first time she'd ever spoken to him, she could see without doubt that he'd heard something far worse than she'd intended. "Is that really what you think?"

"How am I supposed to tell the difference?" she demanded. "You are a man, same as he is. You want what's mine, same as he does!"

"I don't—" He broke off, jaw clenched, and ground his words into fine, invisible powder. "Fine," he said eventually. "Fine."

He turned, walking away, and Daphne reached a hand out, about to stop him, when she realized she had nothing to say. She didn't know what she'd done; she knew only that she was angry, and that whatever she'd said had been as effective as a slap across his face.

She wondered if she should be sorry.

She knew for certain that she was.

oOo

They knelt side by side at the altar and Daphne wondered if Theo could see her fingers shaking. Are you afraid? she remembered him asking on the day the King had won, and reminded herself that if she'd been asked the same question today, the answer would still be no. The answer should be no. She had lived through more terrifying things than this, hadn't she? This was only marriage. These were only vows. This was only forever.

She laced her fingers tighter, imploring them to be still. Beside her, Theo stiffly bent his head, and she stole a glimpse at him, watching. She saw his mouth curl around a shaky breath, and strangely, she felt something that might have been relief.

He was afraid, too.

oOo

The wedding feast was relatively small but still alarmingly excessive, and Daphne felt certain the costs had all come from her late father's wealth. Lord Nott drank the finest wine and ate plentifully, but beside Theo, Daphne merely picked at her food.
"She'll be the head of the Queen's household," Lord Nott declared, swaying slightly in his intoxicated state. "To the beautiful, rich, and highly useful Lady Nott!" he called, raising his glass. From across the room, Daphne saw Lucius and Draco Malfoy exchanging wary glances, unwillingly lifting their glasses in acknowledgement. "And to the benefit of her ceremonial role," Lord Nott added slyly, "which will ensure she only has to fuck my weedy prat of a son every seven days—"

Daphne froze, alarmed by the language before registering the words, and then noticed Theo tensing beside her. His knuckles were white where they sat in his lap.

"Is that true?" she whispered to him, and his mouth tightened. "About my role, I mean," she amended, horrified, and he let out a grim huff of mirthless laughter.

"Yes, that part is true," he confirmed. "You'll be expected to spend most of your nights with the Queen, once she arrives. I've arranged for you to have your own quarters near hers." He fidgeted for a moment. "And until then, you need not concern yourself with me, outside of what is necessary." His mouth twitched. "After all, I am a weedy prat. That part is also true."

She blinked, stunned.

"Is that what you think I want?" she asked, and he looked up, bemused. "That I—" she hesitated. "That I wish to be away from you?"

"You have never once wanted to marry me," he reminded her, as if she might have somehow forgotten. "At least this way you won't have to."

"Let the poor girl put my son to bed and be done with it!" Lord Nott crowed with a laugh, waving his goblet around, and Daphne felt her chair yanked back, turning only long enough to see Theo's face contorted with something she might have called apology as she was led away without another word.

oOo

Theo's chambers were much nicer than she expected. She supposed she regularly forgot how wealthy he was, and how well-titled, but clearly, being one of the nobles who had fought for the King had served him well. The fabrics on the bed were luxurious with warmth and there was a general finery to the room that she stared at, mindless, while the other ladies stripped her of her gown and freed the pins from her hair.

She understood enough about what was supposed to happen. The other girls hadn't been particularly secretive about it, though it sounded barbaric even in the most exuberant of terms. She climbed onto the bed, waiting, and imagined what Theo would be like; what he would look like, even. He and Draco were both men now, striding around court like the nobles they were, but still. It wasn't as if it were that easy to tell what he looked like under his clothes, and—

She shivered, considering it, just as the door opened, revealing Theo in the frame. For a moment he stopped, frozen, and stared at her. His eyes seemed to trace the glow of her hair against the candle beside the bed, and then, after another moment, he remembered himself, stepping inside the room.

"We don't have to," he said before she could speak. "If you don't want to. If you're not ready."

She stared at him. "But the marriage—if we don't, then—"

"I'll lie," he assured her. "It's easy enough to fake the details, and my father won't question it."
"Oh." She swallowed. "Okay."

It was a spectacular kindness, she knew. She wasn't sure how to thank him, though, so instead she shifted awkwardly, not looking up from where she had curled her toes under her feet, uncurling them slowly and then absently coiling them under again.

Theo lingered by the door, sliding his tongue over his lips in thought, and then nodded briskly. "Would you like something to drink?" he asked. "I can have some mead brought in, or—"

"No, I'm fine," she assured him. "I'm just—" She paused. "Can we just… talk, for a bit?" she asked tentatively, and Theo nodded with relief, abruptly stripping his shirt from his shoulders and sliding into the bed beside her, almost childlike with his motions.

"Yes. Tell me about you," he said, and she couldn't help it. She giggled, watching his eyes go wide. "What?" he protested. "I don't—I don't know anything about you. Just tell me something."

"Like what?" she asked, and he shrugged. Alone he was something different; without his father watching over him, he was brighter, more alive.

"Anything," he said. "Your regrets, your favorite things, your fears—"

"I'm not afraid of anything," Daphne replied, and Theo's mouth curled up at the corners in an expression she hadn't seen before. A smile, she realized, and wondered the moment she saw it how she could have possibly found him to be dark and foreboding.

"Of course not. Of course not." His smile broadened. "But if you were—"

"I'm a little afraid of what the Queen will be like," Daphne permitted, and he nodded sagely, as if he'd suspected as much and agreed. "And—" she hesitated. "And your father makes me nervous."

Immediately, she wished she hadn't said it. At the mention of the elder Theodore Nott, the light doused from Theo's eyes.

"I won't ever let him hurt you," Theo said, and Daphne opened her mouth to say that wasn't what she'd meant—of course he wasn't going to hurt her—when she realized that perhaps there was a reason he'd chosen those particular words. She remembered, too, the bruises on his arms, and the anger that had so long been coiled in his mouth, in his voice, in his actions, and then she wondered how she hadn't thought to consider the sum of those things before.

"I'm sorry," he continued, and she opened her mouth to protest that he had nothing to be sorry for, only this was the truest version of himself he'd ever been with her and she didn't want him to stop. "I didn't want him to control you. I thought it would be better if I—" A breath of hesitation. "I thought you would know that I was trying to help you. I'm sorry." He cleared his throat. "I thought you knew I only wanted to help you, but I know now that I should have asked you, first."

Daphne paused, unsure whether a man had ever apologized to her before. She wasn't sure she'd ever heard a noble apologize to anyone, much less to a woman; much less a lord to his wife. She let a few moments of silence pass before sliding down on the bed, bringing them to eye level.

"You're not what I thought you were," she remarked slowly, and Theo's dark brow twitched slightly with confusion.

"What did you think I was?"

"I thought you were—" She bit her lip, feeling foolish. "I thought you were mean. Angry."
"I often feel angry," Theo acknowledged. "But why would you think that?"

"You—you shouted at me. When we were children." She turned her head away, too embarrassed to look at him. "When I—when you and Draco were—"

"Ah." He sounded amused, and she chanced a look over at him, finding her suspicions confirmed. "Well, you embarrassed me. Draco teased me about needing a girl to defend me for weeks. Probably months, actually."

"I didn't mean to! And anyway, why is that so bad?" she insisted, sitting upright to scowl down at him and finding him laughing again. "Who cares if I'm a girl? Why should girls not be able to protect people?"

"Well, I was very stupid then," Theo assured her, tucking one arm behind his head. She could see the shape of his chest that way, and the definition of the muscle in his arms. "I didn't know at the time that you were afraid of nothing."

"You're teasing me," Daphne sighed, and Theo sat up, chuckling.

"No, I'm not, I promise." He smiled again, and she was relieved to see it. "You aren't afraid, and you're braver than me. And I have no doubt that you could have taken Draco easily. Even he knows it, I'm sure."

At that, she permitted a laugh of her own, and then she quieted, gradually made nervous again by the way he was looking at her. "I mean it, though, you know," she told him, looking down at her hands. "You're not at all what I thought."

A few seconds passed in silence. Then Theo reached out slowly, resting his fingers against the inside of her wrist until she managed to look up, locking her gaze on his.

"Let's go to sleep," he suggested, and she nodded, climbing beneath the covers and settling herself against the pillows while Theo reached over, blowing out the candle beside the bed. For a moment, just before the light went out, she watched the sinews of his back, the column of his spine.

She was his now, she realized.

She fought the sudden urge to reach out and trace the shape of his spine, tensing pathetically at his side until he had resumed lying down beside her.

"Goodnight," he murmured, and she opened her mouth to say something, to ask for something, though she had no idea what.

"Goodnight," she whispered, and imagined the shape of his smile on his lips, letting her breath slow to the rhythm of his.

\[\text{oOo}\]

She woke as the color of the sky started to change. It was early still, the sun not yet prepared to rise, but the pitch-black shifted discreetly to indigo as Theo shifted towards her, the bared skin of his shoulder pebbling slightly in the crisp air of his chambers.

"Theo," she whispered, and his eyes fluttered open. She'd guessed he hadn't been sleeping. "May I ask you something?"

She watched the motion of his throat as he swallowed. "Ask me."
"Will you kiss me again?" she murmured, and in the barest of morning light she saw his mouth twitch with surprise, his lips tentatively parting.

"You want me to?" he asked, and she felt her cheeks flush.

"Yes," she said, and nearly choked on a mismanaged breath. "That is, if you—if I'm—"

She broke off as he pushed himself up onto his left elbow, his right hand emerging from the sheets to gently cup her cheek. He slid his thumb down the line of her jaw, passing it briefly over her lips, and she closed her eyes, waiting.

"I want to," he said, his voice gravelly with morning, and then he tilted her chin up, brushing her lips with his again.

It was like the first time, only it wasn't. It felt the same, tasted something like it, but this time, with his hand curled around her face and the rest of them mere inches apart, she felt her pulse race wildly, leaping into her mouth as she pressed herself against him, the rest of her body answering the question his seemed to have asked.

She wanted to stop and ask him if he'd done this before—he must have, she reasoned; half the girls at court seemed to have had some dalliance or another with Draco, and it was unusual for any boys to enter a marriage wholly inexperienced—but whatever his answer might have been, it hardly seemed to matter. He was hers now, and she was his, and was it so terrible to be here with him, being touched by him like this? He rolled over her, his breath quickening, and then paused, his hips pressed against hers.

"We could," he began hoarsely, and stopped. "I know that for girls it's—it hurts, I know, but if you wanted, we could—"

"Let me see you first," she suggested, and he pulled away, yanking the covers free and fumbling with the ties at his britches. He slid out of them, leaving her to stare at the crevices in his stomach—hard and flat and lined with muscle, sloping down between his hips—and she followed the thin trail of dark hair that drew her eye down further, to the undeniable hardness between his legs.

He shifted onto his side, watching her watch him, and then tilted his head.

"Now you," he said, clearly holding his breath, and she drew her shift up her legs, obligingly pulling it over her head and discarding it on the floor. She waited for his gaze to travel slowly, from the line of her neck and over the curves of her breasts to her hips, her thighs, her calves and then back up, lingering on her lips as he swallowed again, that same curve of his throat swelling and easing.

"You," he said breathlessly, "are the most beautiful girl at court."

"Woman," Daphne corrected, half-laughing. "I'm Lady Nott, aren't I?"

"Yes, you're—" He swallowed painfully. "You're my wife." It seemed to register slowly, the truth of it dawning on him gradually, not unlike the sun rising from the window at his back. "You're my wife," he repeated, awed. "I can hardly believe it. Do you even know how many other men wanted you? How many would have stolen you from your promise to me in an instant, if they could have—"

"The marriage isn't consummated yet," Daphne informed him boldly, sitting upright. "I haven't really done my duty yet, have I?"
Theo let out a growl of dismay, positioning himself above her, and paused as he slid a hand between her thighs, his fingers testing the slickness between them as she sucked in a breath, somewhere between anticipation and need.

"Are you afraid?" he whispered.

"I'm not afraid of anything," she replied, and certainly not you, and definitely not this, I want you, I want you, I—

He slid inside her slowly, carefully, his weight braced on his elbows as she adjusted to the feel of him, her heels digging forcefully into the muscle of his thighs. She took a breath, then another, and when she nodded, he moved again, guiding his hips against hers with a cautious, astounding patience.

He exhaled as she winced. "Is this—"

"Yes, just—slowly," she said, tearing at the span of her lip she held tight between her teeth. "But—please, don't stop, I want to—" I want to feel you, I want you, I want you, please don't stop, please, please, don't ever stop—

He looked lost, his eyes wild and hazy, the lids half-shut. She pulled him down, one arm snaked around his neck, and kissed him; he kissed her back without hesitation, his tongue darting into her mouth this time and leaving her with a strange, unplaceable sensation of need. She sorted out after a minute or two that she could move against him, rounding her back every time he shifted his hips against her, and it made everything better, and unbearably so. It seemed everything was a clash, a commotion, a confrontation between parts of them, and she lamented how long she had dreaded it—how much time she had wasted—as something inside of her quaked and clenched and burst, flooding her limbs with a wash of satisfaction. She felt rather than heard a gasp that came from her lips, dissolving to an almost incoherent sound of anguish, and Theo choked out a groan, falling against her and resting his forehead against her shoulder.

It took a minute to catch their breaths; Daphne brushed her hair from her eyes, suddenly certain she looked an absolute mess, and Theo gently rolled onto his side, turning his head to look at her.

She wondered as she struggled to collect herself how she had ever thought his eyes weren't green, or that he wasn't kind, or that she didn't wish to have him. Everything she seemed to have known before seemed suddenly terribly wrong, and now, with the sun shining into the room, she knew she had wasted the entirety of a night she wouldn't get again for several more.

"Was it—" Theo hesitated. "Are you—"

"My Lady?" A knock at the door. "Are you dressed?"

Daphne reached hurriedly for her shift, tossing it over her as Theo scrambled to cover himself.

"Not yet," she called. "Just—just a moment, I—"

She turned, about to reach for Theo, but found he'd already risen to his feet, pulling his britches on and then reaching for his shirt, nearly dressed.

"Just one minute," Daphne called again, and Theo paused, glancing at her, his expression still somewhat tentative.

She didn't quite know what to say; she wanted to say something, but hadn't the slightest idea what. Instead she gaped, her mouth opening and closing like a fish, and he gave her something of a shrug.
"Have a good day," he offered without expression, and then he headed to the door, pulling it open and advancing through it.

She wondered when she would see him next.

"My Lady?" one of the maids asked, holding up fresh linens, and Daphne sighed.

"Yes," she agreed, "I'm coming."

Daphne spent the next night in the chambers he'd prepared for her, which were even grander than his. She imagined she could see him in the little choices he'd made; in the bedding he'd chosen to be the color of her favorite gown, the pale blue one she wore most often. The sheets were unforgivably soft, the tapestries beautiful and soothing to look at, but still, she couldn't sleep.

She kept feeling his lips against hers, his breath in her mouth, his voice in her ear.

I want to.

Nothing much had changed, really. They occupied separate spheres during the day, rarely speaking, and he danced with her the same way he always had, with the distinct sensation of not particularly enjoying it.

He barely looked at her, and it haunted her slightly, dizzying her with the prospect of what she might have done wrong.

She wanted to hear his laugh, watch him smile, but that was some other version of him. Some secret Theo she only got to have one night a week, if at all. She merely lived like a ghost, counting the days, until she could wait in his chambers again.

She waited on his bed for him, like she had the previous night they'd had together. He walked in, not meeting her eye, and said nothing. He slipped out of his shirt, lifting the covers just enough to slide in beside her, and blew out the candle beside the bed.

"I won't make you do it again," he said, and then turned on his opposite side, facing his back to her. He said nothing else, and didn't move, and if it weren't for the motion of his chest, she would have barely noticed he was breathing.

She stared at the canopy above her, watching the shadows move with the night, and wondered how she could possibly tell him that this wasn't what she wanted at all.

It only got worse. The next week was the same, and on the day of the fourth week of their marriage, she paced the floor of her chambers, certain she wouldn't be able to stand it. She wasn't brave at all when she was sitting on his bed, the portrait of a wife, silently waiting for him. None of her thoughts felt like her own when she was playing a role she still didn't quite understand.

She knew she'd have to draw him out of hiding somehow, and in her desperation to manage it, she did the unthinkable.

She ruined the steps of a dance.
"Ouch," Theo hissed, doubling over as she pounded her heel into his shoe, and she let out a facetious cry of dismay, tucking his arm against hers and weaving through the line of dancers to guide him out of the Great Hall.

"Let me help you," she crooned, easing him into the corridor and then waiting, impatient, as he gradually put weight on his foot again, scowling at her. "Oh, stop it, you're fine—"

"I'm not fine," he informed her irritably, with an outrageously sulky hint of disapproval. "You've never missed a step like that in your life, so why would you—"

"I needed to talk to you," she urged. "Please. Before we—" She hesitated. "Before tonight."

His expression tightened with apprehension.

"I told you, we don't have t-"

"That's not it, I—" she attempted, and stopped, stumbling. Once again, she found with displeasure that hesitation was ruining her best laid plans. "I wasn't—it's not that I—"

"Tell me." His voice was quiet, but firm. "Whatever it is, I promise I won't be angry."

It occurred to her she ought to be grateful, only she was too busy struggling with what to say.

"I—" she began again, and paused, still burdened by humiliation. "I want to," she whispered, managing nothing more than that, and Theo stared down at her, openly shocked.

"But—but your face, I thought you—I thought you hated it, hated me—"

"I didn't. I don't." She felt her cheeks flush, her gaze cutting sheepishly away, and after a moment of awkward silence had ticked by, Theo drew her chin up gently, giving her a curious glance of sympathy. The green of his eyes was obvious now, the color changing in the light, and then changing again the longer he looked at her, responding to the temperature of his thoughts.

"Please," he said eventually, scanning her face for something she hoped he managed to find, "in the future, try to tell me what you're feeling without destroying my feet in the process."

She gave him a weary smile.

"No promises," she said, and he rewarded her with his secret laugh.

oOo

That night, when he came to her, she didn't wait for him on the bed. She stood by the door and took his hand when he walked through it, not saying a word. His lips parted as if he might have said something, but she pressed a finger to his lips, first, and then hers, holding them both to silence. She always said the right thing, she knew, except for with him. With him, she seemed to be nothing but mistakes and misjudgments, and tonight, she wanted it to be them as they were, or as they could be; as they might be, if she ever learned to speak his language.

He watched her fingers as they drew up the hem of his shirt, the light scraping of her nails as they passed along the ridges of his stomach. He sucked in a breath, following the motion of her hands, and she carefully slid the fabric over his head, tracing the shape of his chest beneath the pads of her fingers.

He seemed to understand what she wanted. He stepped closer, still silent, and slid one side of her dressing gown over her shoulder, baring the curve of it and cautiously—as if it might break—bringing his lips to the bone. She felt the pressure of his kiss, trapping a breath in her lungs, and settled her hands on his hips, her head falling back to let his lips travel to her neck and then up to her cheek, resting near her eyelids as they fluttered shut.

She felt him inhale; felt herself echo the same breath.

"Last time," he murmured, his lips still pressed to her skin, "you seemed to be in pain."

"For a time, yes," she permitted, shrugging. After all, it was almost precisely as every other girl had described it, only they'd left out most of the reward. Perhaps they hadn't had it, she suspected.
"But it wasn't terrible, and—"

"I think I can fix it," Theo said thoughtfully, and then he gestured to the bed. "Lie down," he suggested, his voice once again assuming its softened alter ego, and she reached behind her for the mattress, settling herself on top of it and waiting until he joined her, positioning himself between her legs.

He drew the material of her shift up past her knees and then higher, adjusting her on the bed so that her thighs fell on either side of his shoulders. "Hold still," he said very seriously, drawing her legs apart, and then he lowered his head to the slit of her cunt, darting his tongue over it as she wriggled from surprise beneath him.

The moment she felt his mouth on her, she determined that she hadn't the slightest idea what he was doing, but that she never wanted him to stop. She found herself delirious with tension, her entire body flooded alternately between chills and warmth, and by the time she felt certain her limbs would detach from her body—by the time pleasure seemed to be escaping her in shudders—she felt twisted up and wrung out and pressed impossibly thin, her toes curled and her fists clenched while the rest of her seemed to float above the bed, impossibly disembodied.

"That," she exhaled when he lifted his head, "must be some sort of horrifying sin, or some kind of terrible crime. You should probably be arrested."

He laughed, sliding his bare waist up against her until his hips were settled between her thighs; she was still slick and sensitive and she gasped again, tightening her legs around him.

"We can stop there, if you want," he told her, toying with her hair. "I don't mind."

She blinked, surprised. He was hard already, she could feel him; from what she'd heard, abandoning such a thing wasn't an ideal state for a liaison of any kind to end. She wondered why he would possibly make such an offering until she realized he couldn't quite meet her eye, or else simply didn't want to.

"Do you really still think I don't want you?" she asked, disbelieving, and he hesitated.

"It's hard to imagine why you would," he admitted, and for a moment, she wondered who she hated more; his father, for almost certainly putting the initial concept in his head, or herself, for having let him think it could be true. She slid her hand down his stomach, taking the length of him in her hand, and waited until she heard the sound of his breath catching in his throat.

"I do want you," she told him, stroking him gently first, and then more firmly, noticing the way his breathing faltered, his lips parted. "I do. And do you want me?" she asked when his hips began to move against her palm, responding to her touch. She released him, laying back, and pulled him closer, sliding her hands beneath his arms and up over the blades of his shoulders. "If you want me, you can have me," she told him, as his eyes closed, briefly, and reopened, fixing on hers with uncertainty.

"Daphne," he murmured. "I—"

"Theo," she said back, holding him tighter. "Please. I want to."

That, finally, seemed to be enough, and when he slid himself inside her, she wished she could have captured the look on his face, or at least the shape of his mouth, or the feel of his lips. It seemed unfair to lose the memory to such a small, careless moment, to some apathetic beat of time.

For her, it was like colliding with the sun.

Tell me about you.

She wished she could answer the question again for him now; now that there was something worth telling.

She'd had no secrets before, but now—

_I can't take my eyes away from you_, she wanted to confess when she watched him, his head bent in conversation with Draco. _I think of you, relentlessly, at every hour. I worship with your name on my lips._

_I think I miss you, even though I barely know you_, she wanted to tell him when she stared at the canopy of her bed, lying awake in the chambers he'd so painstakingly prepared for her. _I want to hear what you think about this or this or this, about that, about everything. I want to see you smile. I want to make you smile._

_I long for you_, she thought when his eyes met hers across the Great Hall, fortune conspiring to bring them a moment of mutual wanting. _Can't you see it? Can't you tell?_

Tell me about you.

_I'm desperate for you_, she wished she had said, so that he would have never had to wonder.

He was different after that, in little ways. In ways she learned to look for. She used to wonder why Draco was always laughing in Theo's presence, and now she felt like she knew; the little oddities that nobody else paid any attention were precisely what Theo noticed. He was an able noticer, a practiced observer. He said things—little things, small insignificant nothings—and that was what made Draco laugh, and what made Daphne long to be in his place. She'd never been jealous of Draco before, but now she was hopelessly envious.

She'd been well assured of her own beauty since she was a child, but now she tried harder, fighting diligently for Theo's attention, however discreet. She feared he found her boring or silly, and even as she spent hours on her hair or on the stitching of her dresses she still wondered if he noticed, or if in the noticing he was displeased, or any number of countless haunting insecurities, any single one of them enough to fill volumes of their own accord.

Every day she woke without him she wondered if he thought of her, and if he did, what he thought of her. She wondered and wondered until she thought she might be sick with wondering, and then she wondered more. The Queen was coming soon, she knew, and each time she remembered, she breathed a sigh of relief; of gratification for distraction.

Soon she'd be too busy to pine for him like some stupid servant girl, Daphne reminded herself. She'd be a noble wife, faultless and untouchable, dutiful and loyal and never wavering, never faltering—no matter what impenetrable idiocies plagued each beat of her heart. She reminded herself of this, of her father's many lessons and her birthright as she'd been taught, and she prepared herself for war. Her father had told her to always be on the winning side, which meant always preparing for the worst; always with a part of her waiting for the sky to fall, and therefore never investing too intently in whatever place she stood.

But then Theo would catch her eye across the Great Hall, and he would give her his secret smile, and she would melt into wonderings again, utterly feverish with all of it.

oOo

On the nights they spent together, Daphne forced herself to be calm, to be reasonable, to sit patiently, even as she wanted to throw herself in his arms. She waited, rooted in place on his bed as he came in the door, letting it shut carefully behind him.

"This," he began slowly, "is very difficult. I think I did a terrible thing."

"Oh?" she asked, holding her breath.

"Yes," he confirmed gravely. "Do you realize how long a week is? I never knew how tedious the days were before, or even how uniquely cruel a single hour can be." His mouth quirked slightly, and she let out a breath, relieved. "I thought you wouldn't want me like this," he added after a moment, looking down at his hands and resolutely avoiding her eye. "I thought it would be kinder to you to keep my distance, but—"

"I hate waiting," Daphne cut in bluntly. He looked up, surprised, and she shifted onto her hands and knees, crawling towards him to perch at the edge of the bed. "These nights without you," she clarified, reaching a hand towards him until he took it, walking unsteadily towards her. "I swear, Theo, I can hardly stand them."

"Your room," he exhaled, momentarily confusing her. "That's what's displeasing, then? Surely it can't be for lack of me."

She tugged him closer with a sigh, resting her arms gently around his neck.

"Yes," she wryly agreed. "The room is egregiously displeasing."

"Is it the tapestries?" he prompted. "Are they not to your liking?"

"I loathe them," she whispered, loosening his shirt from his britches and gradually sliding it over his head. "They're terrible."

"Oh. Oh, no." He stepped closer, brushing his lips against her shoulder. "The linens?"

"Rough. Scratchy. I toss and turn all night, and—" she gasped, stifling a whimper, as he drew his lips over her throat. "I never sleep. Not at all."

"Poor thing," he lamented softly, his fingers settling on the hem of her shift to lure it up the length of her thighs. "My god, you've been so mistreated. The bed," he murmured, sliding the thin fabric over her head and stroking a line between her breasts, "is it uncomfortable?"
"It's an abomination," Daphne informed him, letting out an inadvertent, girlish squeal as he wrapped an arm around her waist, tossing her back against the pillows and climbing onto the bed after her. "It's an affront to furniture," she added, tugging at his britches and none-too-carefully kicking them down his legs, stifling a laugh at their collective haste. "Frankly, I'd rather burn it to the ground."

"What a criminal appetite you have," Theo noted, sliding between her legs. "Well," he mused, his lips pressed firmly to hers, "if the bed is so terrible, and the tapestries so tasteless, then perhaps we should discuss a change in decorati-"

"We're done with this game," Daphne informed him, sliding her hand down to watch with satisfaction as he hissed through his teeth, responding to her touch. "You know perfectly well that it's for lack of you that the room will never be satisfying."

That, more than anything, seemed to shudder through his body.

"I am such a fucking fool for you," he whispered, and she opened herself to him again, tightening her arms around his neck.

oOo

"Was there ever anyone else?" she asked him, drawing mindless circles on his chest.

"Hm? Not really," he replied. "I—" He hesitated. "I've had some dalliances, yes, but nothing—not like this. I've been promised to you since I was six years old, and besides, I'm nothing special." He kissed the top of her head. "Certainly not standing beside Draco," he conceded wryly.

"That's not true," Daphne protested, and Theo arched a brow, skeptical.

"You preferred a betrothal to him instead when the arrangement between us was made," he said, and she sighed, rolling into her back.

"I didn't know you then," she said, and then, thoughtfully, "and in fairness, I couldn't have imagined you'd be like this."

"Like what?" He rolled over her, taking her hand and brushing his lips against her knuckles.
"Voracious? I didn't either," he said with a laugh, "though I never would have thought anything could feel like this."

She wasn't sure she wanted to ask if he meant her, or sex.

As it occurred to her, she didn't know if she really wanted the answer.

Unpleasantly, she felt a cold, mesmerizing chill, realizing how many nights they would inevitably spend apart, and how unlikely it was he'd be alone during them. Theo was, after all, a wealthy, valuable noble; even now, he stood only a few coffins away from the throne. He was desirable to any woman at court, whether he felt himself so or not, and Daphne had lived at Hogwarts long enough to know that every noble wife regularly turned a blind eye to her husband's indiscretions.

Her father had always warned her that everything was war, and that tides were constantly changing. How long, then, before Theo tired of waiting for her?

"Daphne," Theo interrupted, and she turned towards him, realizing she'd been staring into nothing as she'd unwillingly traveled the imaginary footpath of disaster. "I suppose I never asked if you might have wanted another man for a husband. Are you happy with me?" he asked, bracing himself for her answer.

At the improbable question, she briefly considered who else she might have even been with. Draco? At one time, maybe, but not since. Harry, the Peverell knave? Certainly not, even if he'd ever been a viable choice, which he wasn't. The King himself had never entered her mind as an option. In fact, no other man had ever compared with Theo Nott, and that was the stunning, unlikely truth.

Betrothal or not, she'd belonged to Theo long before she even knew she had.

"I've never wanted another," she promised him, which seemed an underwhelming turn of phrase, but it appeared to be enough for him. He kissed her again, holding her in his arms.

"Should we sleep, then?" he asked, carefully restrained.

Sleep seemed an impossible waste of time. "We only get one night," she reminded him, and he smiled.

"I was hoping you'd say that," he replied, and slid one arm under her, rolling them both onto his back.

Daphne vaguely remembered that there had been a time she hated dancing with Theo; she recalled, hazily, that for several years of her life she had loathed the moments the dance would call for him to touch her waist, or pick her up. Always, she'd waited with displeasure for him to set her down, spending each moment aloft contemplating how subtly she might stab the heels of her shoes into his feet. Now, of course, dancing with him was an invigorating form of torture. Each time they touched was never quite long enough, and she found herself losing her impeccable rhythm more than once, always pausing beneath his desperate grip a beat too long before parting.

"This is unbearable," he murmured to her between gritted teeth, and she grimaced her agreement. "What day is it?"

"Not a day that matters," she replied, shivering as he brushed his lips ever so discreetly near her ear. "Can't you just—I don't know. Take me in the kitchens? A haystack? It seems to work for other women," she grumbled under her breath, and felt the reward of his furtive smile.

"You're my wife," Theo scolded in her ear. "You're not some scullery maid in a barn."

"Oh, hang it all," Daphne replied sulkily, and watched his shoulders shake with muted laughter. "Are you not suffering even remotely?"

"Oh, Daphne, I suffer endlessly," he assured her. "I have half a mind to stab myself in the leg just so no one can demand I leave my bed."

"Lot of good you'd do me with a stab wound," Daphne said, and considered it. "Though, I suppose I could work with that."

"Oh, don't tease me, please." He drew her close, holding her fingers a little too long again as they nearly missed the next set of steps. "Aren't I suffering enough?" He stepped back, permitting her to revolve gracefully beneath his arm, and added, "he's watching. My father, I mean." He paused. "And the King, too."

"Remind me again why we're doing this?" Daphne exhaled, glancing over her shoulder to find that Lord Nott was, indeed, watching closely. "Something about decorum, I'm sure, or protocol, or something else equally stupid—"

"Ah, and here I thought you loved your sterling reputation," Theo tutted softly, chuckling again. "Remember how you used to admonish me for spoiling it?"

Daphne sighed, dropping into a curtsy as the song came to an end. She used to think a lot of things, and she no longer found any of them important.

"How much longer?" she asked under her breath, and per custom, Theo bowed.

"Three days," he said, and she discreetly made a face.

"I can't wait that long," she whispered.

"Neither can I," he replied, the shape of it more breath than words when they parted.

oOo

She'd barely undressed for bed before he came hurrying into the room, pulling her close without a word. She registered only the rustle of his clothing and the hurried, arrhythmic pattern of his breath as he bent his head to the line of her neck, his hands shaking on her waist.

"Daphne," he exhaled in relief, and she clung to him, burying her fingers in the folds of his shirt. "I haven't been able to sleep all week. I can't, I couldn't—"

"What do you do when you can't sleep?" she asked him, curious if his thoughts were anything like hers.

"Believe me," he growled salaciously, "it's nothing appropriate for your ears."

She laughed, muffling it into his shoulder. He was so tall, his shoulders so broad, his chest so defined, even with fabric between them; he was so unlike the boy he'd been, and she marveled at him, spreading her fingers out to hold as much of him as she could.

"What do you think about?" she asked.

"You," he replied easily. "Nothing. Everything." He nipped at her clavicle, sliding the fabric down to kiss the curve of her shoulder. "This. The way your skin feels," he murmured, running his fingers gently down her abdomen, "and the sound you make when I—" She gasped, fighting a tiny sound of satisfaction as he kissed her neck. "Yes," he proclaimed approvingly, "that."

"And then what?" she asked breathlessly, exhilarated by the thought.

"I think about the things I'd like to do when no one's looking. The ways I'd like to have you, if I could." His hands busied themselves with her shift, drawing the fabric up. "I swear, Daphne, you'd hate me if you knew the things I think about without you."

"What if I gave you something, then," she whispered, and he leaned back, bemused. "Something to think about when you're alone?"

"I—" he swallowed, eyes widening. "Like what?"

She smiled, shoving him back against the wall and tugging at the laces of his trousers, sliding her hand inside and waiting for the tell-tale hiss between his teeth.
"Pretend I'm not your wife," she advised him, and adjusted her shift, dropping to her knees as his grip tightened on her arms, his breath quickening frantically.

"Daphne, no, this is—you shouldn't—"

But she'd taken him in her mouth already, ignoring his stifled protests. She knew enough about this, she figured; it wasn't a particularly difficult task. Even the suggestion of this sort of activity was undignified, but why risk losing him to some servant girl who had no need for dignity anyway? She drew him in between her lips, sliding her tongue along the smooth shape of his shaft, and looked up to find him staring, his legs already shaky as he leaned back against the wall.

She picked up speed slightly, sliding her fingers along the length of him that her lips couldn't reach, and he dissolved under her touch, close to collapsing. She kept going, steadily increasing speed until he clapped his own hand over his mouth, smothering a loud groan.

"Daphne," he choked out again as she slid her lips over him a final time, swallowing the taste of him. He opened his mouth, clearly trying to formulate words and failing, and she rose to her feet, arching a brow expectantly.

"Daphne, I—" A falter. "You, I can't—" Another pause.

"Lost for words?" she asked, distinctly pleased with herself, and he grimaced, pulling her back into his arms.

"I will never wish to pretend you're anything but my wife," he said firmly in her ear, and she closed her eyes, realizing now how much she hoped he meant it. She desperately longed to believe he meant it, her father's advice or not.

Still, it could all so easily fade.

So she held him tighter, just in case.

After nearly two months, the King finally announced that he would be marrying Lady Pansy Parkinson, the daughter of a Borderlands noble. A strategic match, Daphne knew; her father had said as much would likely be any King's choice. This was, after all, a warlike King, and with many enemies. He would want to secure his borders before anything else.

"As head of the future Queen's ladies-in-waiting, you will be responsible for running her household," Lord Nott informed Daphne, as she let her gaze travel every few minutes to Theo, savoring each covert moment of mutual regard. "She'll be a Loyalist Queen, and if you play your cards right, she will reward our family well in the future."

"I'm well aware of my duty to our family, my Lord," Daphne assured him, sneaking another glance at Theo, whose lips curled helplessly to a smile. "I'd be happy to befriend the Queen, and I'm prepared to make her feel welcome at court."

This, like most things she said, was met with contempt.

"What do I care if she's welcome at court?" Lord Nott prompted crossly. "She's young, her only job is to open her legs and have sons. Frankly, Tom may discard her yet."

"Father," Theo sighed, glancing apologetically at Daphne, who shook her head.

"No, you're right, my Lord," she agreed sweetly. "But for as long as she is useful to you, I will make sure she is loyal to us."

"Good," Lord Nott said, still unreasonably agitated despite it being one of Daphne's characteristically faultless answers. "Go," he added lazily, waving a hand, and Daphne gestured for Theo to follow as she went, pausing just outside his father's door and waiting until he slipped out after her.

"What did you—"

She held a finger to her lips, shushing him, and he shook his head, looking amused.

"Every time I say something nice to him, it seems to poison him more," she whispered. "I'm pretty sure if I keep doing it, he'll spontaneously die."

"You minx," Theo murmured approvingly, backing her against the wall with his hands on her hips. "Are you ready, though? For the Queen," he clarified, looking vaguely concerned. "Is there anything I can do?"

"Of course not," she assured him, scoffing. "I've been a noblewoman at court my entire life, haven't I? There's nothing I'm not prepared for—and even if there were, it's certainly nothing you can help with. Unless you're suddenly very gifted at embroidery."

She'd meant it to be funny, but clearly he was distressed. "Ah, I don't know that it's only that," he warned cautiously, looking oddly serious. "This King is—" he hesitated. "Not like other Kings," he determined uncertainly, and Daphne glanced up at him, surprised.

"You sound nervous," she noted, and he shook his head.

"I only mean that his reign isn't quite secure, and the closer you are to his Queen, the more danger you're in if he falls, or if he's even displeased. The Peverell heir is still a threat, and—"

"Are you worried for me, Theo?" Daphne prompted, amused, and he nodded slowly.

"I swore I would protect you," he replied, and she looked up, recalling the moment he'd first stood like this, keeping her from harm; the moment she'd first noticed his eyes, though she only realized now that it was the way he'd looked at her that had paused her, not merely the color of them. "I swore it to myself the day I was betrothed to you, I swore it to you the day I married you, and I promise you, Daphne, I will not fail."

Daphne slid her hand up gratefully, curling it around the back of his neck.

"Theo, I—"

Tell me something about you, she heard him say, and felt herself respond.

I have always thought I stood alone, until today.

"I'll protect you, too," she promised, and he smiled down at her.

"Good. I'm glad," he said. "Then I'm in excellent hands, because you're not afraid of anything."

oOo

Daphne took to the new Queen easily, finding her to be cleverer than most. Pansy was a quick study, curious about the court and respectful of Daphne's knowledge and position. She was discreetly nervous, too, which was something Daphne found easily understood.
"Is your husband—" Pansy began, hesitating. "Is he… kind?"

It was the first question the new Queen had asked that Daphne had not known the answer to since birth. She gave a moment, considering it, and then answered honestly, feeling her cheeks heat at the thought.

"Prodigiously," she replied, and then, "I'm luckier than most."

Pansy nodded. She was a noble's daughter herself; she knew as much. "Have you been married long?"

"Not at all," Daphne replied, shaking her head. "Betrothed for ages, since we were children." She wondered for a moment if she should say something else—if she should admit her misconceptions, and the painful waste of time that had been her uninformed judgments of his nature—but opted not to, half afraid she might still jinx it if she spoke her feelings aloud. "But with the King choosing a wife the wedding was pushed up, so that the head of your house would be suitably—" She paused, thinking. "Experienced, I suppose. Tested, I think," she amended, "is the better word."

"How long ago were you married?" Pansy asked.

"Two months," Daphne replied. "I spend a night a week with him, and it's—" she hesitated, not wanting to admit that each night in his arms was somehow perilously consuming, guiltlessly sustaining, and yet never possibly enough, leaving her longing for him again each morning. "It's not something to fear, anyway. Marriage, I mean," she clarified, recognizing that it was the first time she'd stumbled during their conversation, though it seemed to have humanized her in a way that made the future Queen smile.

"You like him?" Pansy guessed. "Your husband?"

More than anything, Daphne thought, and bit it back, knowing such a recognition was only bound for disappointment.

"I honor him, of course," she said cautiously, "and I do not delude myself. I know it was a match made to deepen his coffers and strengthen my father's name, but—"

"I am certain he likes you, too," Pansy said knowingly, and Daphne felt warmed enough to laugh, though she hoped the Queen was right. It was a foolish thing to do, but still—

She hoped, she hoped, she hoped.

oOo

"Do you like her?" Theo asked, the sheets tangled around them as their legs remained lazily twined, her head resting delicately on his chest.

"I do," Daphne confirmed. "I'm happy to be head of her household." She twisted in his arms, looking up at him. "Partially because it will make the time away from you a little more bearable, I think. Or at least distracting enough that I can bear it."

He gave a quieter, sleepier version of his laugh, low and rumbling beneath her cheek.

"I half hoped you'd hate her. That maybe you'd beg me to release you from your service to her," he murmured playfully, toying with her hair, "and then we'd both be exiled back to my estate, so I could stay with you every night." He paused, releasing the coiled curl he'd wrapped around his finger. "I don't suppose you'd be up for committing treason, would you?"
"Stop," Daphne said with a laugh. "The King would never let you go."

"True," Theo agreed sullenly. "But someday when the King inevitably tires of my insolence and the Queen decides you're much too beautiful to serve her, I'll take you to my house, where I was born. There are so many gardens there, and trees," he said softly. "Everything smells and tastes different there. A little bit sweeter, I think."

"My father never liked going back to our estate," Daphne recalled, barely remembering it. The house had been drafty, and not very well cared for. "He much preferred the excitement at court, he said."

"As does my father," Theo replied, shrugging beneath her. "And I like it too, of course, but at times it's nice to hear silence. Real silence," he clarified, and she looked up, bemused. "It doesn't exist here. Not really. There's always footsteps somewhere, creaking on the stairs, voices and gossip and grunting and scolding. There you can hear the wind." He stroked her arm slowly, delicately tracing over it with the pads of his fingers. "And from time to time, you can hear absolutely nothing, and then it's as if time stops, just because you ask it to."

"Would you?" Daphne asked, looking up. "Ask for time to stop, I mean."

"With you? Always," Theo answered without hesitation. "I'd stop it now, in fact, if I could. Keep you here in my arms," he mused, his voice softening slightly as sleep danced along the edge of it. "Would you?"

Daphne considered it. "No, I don't think so. But only because I want to see what happens next," she clarified. "I want to see the gardens, to hear the sound of silence while I'm lying beside you in the grass. But then maybe we can stop time, if it'll let us. Or maybe I still won't," she amended, smiling to herself, "because I'll want to see us when we're older. When we have so many secrets shared between us that there's nothing I know about myself that you don't know, too."

His arms tightened around her, satisfied, as he rested his cheek against the top of her head.

"I suppose we should keep going, then," he said, as she felt her eyes close, surrendering her consciousness to the warmth of him.

"I suppose we should," she murmured, feeling herself drift to sleep.

oOo

"There are other women, you know," Daphne heard Draco say as he strode down the hall, and she tucked herself out of sight, catching his voice and then a predictably matching set of footsteps approaching. "How long are you planning to behave yourself so dully?"

"I've been married barely over three months," she heard Theo reply drily. "Do you really think I possess absolutely no self-control, Malfoy?"

"Well, you might, but I certainly don't," Draco scoffed. "What woman is worth six nights of celibacy?"

At that, Daphne heard the sound of a blade being pulled from a sheath, a series of rapid, shuffling footsteps, and then, abruptly, silence.

"Fine, fine," Draco muttered eventually. "Get that away from my throat, would you? I know you wouldn't actually stab me, you imbecile."
"I might," Theo replied, as Daphne heard him return the sword to the scabbard he typically wore at his waist. "For her, maybe I would. Did you ever think about that?"

Draco grunted his disapproval. "If I ever lose my mind over a woman, feel free to actually stab me," he added listlessly, and Daphne heard Theo's low chuckle.

"Believe me," he replied, "I am already counting the days."

Daphne waited until they passed, hiding a smile in the palm of her hand.

Perhaps it had been worth it to hope.

Daphne's days were filled with quiet combat, as her father had always warned her they would be. Her days were saddled with tiny, wordless wars, when she stood beside her Queen and faced an apathetic court. Her nights, too—six of them in a row, doomed to be repeated—were plagued with worry, and by the pain of knowing that her closest friend remained alone.

But one night a week, Daphne permitted herself a night without torment. One night per week, she gave herself only one task: learning a man she'd always known.

Tell me something about you; your regrets, your favorite things, your fears.

He was an only child, more comfortable being alone, and happier to observe than to be observed. He feared being made to fight in wars he didn't believe in, and also certain kinds of snakes. He regretted that he had not been softer when they were younger; that when they'd met, he hadn't learned much kindness yet. The tree outside his nursery had been his favorite thing, at first, and then the first sword he'd ever been handed, and then the dagger Draco had given him; and then, eventually, it had been her, and the way she'd first begun to smile at him.

"Like candlelight," he told her, whispering it in the dark. "How it flickers first, uncertain, and then it flames. It's not like how you smile at the rest of the court; for them, it's painted on—and true, it's beautiful, of course," he assured her, and she nodded, "like everything you do, and it's always the right smile for the right moment; but still, it's only for them, and not for you. Not like when you really smile."

"It's a secret," Daphne realized, surprised to find that what she liked about him was so perfectly echoed by what he liked about her, and Theo nodded.

"Yes," he agreed. "It's like a secret between you and me, and that's what I like best."

"It's something we have in common," she said, and he smiled his smile for her.

"Though not just that, of course," he reminded her, and then she smiled her smile for him.

"No," she agreed. "Not just that."

There was so much more that they shared, after all, and so many more things they would share well into the future. So many wars they would still fight together; so many more secrets they'd whisper into pillows and bare skin until the sun rose again, stretching its obtrusive rays over them both. She almost pitied it, really, that it could have so little power. That for all that it meant an ending to a night in Theo's arms, she still faced each day with him behind her, and was never alone again.

oOo
After a while, Daphne understood a great many things about the world. She understood that her father had been a great man at court, which had made her noble, and that her husband was the inheritor of a treasury to rival a king's, which had made her powerful. She understood that she was expected to behave in precisely the right way at all times, and that the right way was not always the same way each time. She understood, too, that there were sides to all things—a right one, and a wrong one—but it was difficult to know the right one from a distance, and so there was always a chance she could lose. There was always, always a chance she could lose, but she could stand the gamble if she trusted what was right, and if she remembered that Theo Nott believed (and she believed it, too, when he did), that she was a woman who feared nothing.

Perhaps she still didn't understand all things, but she understood one thing very clearly, and that seemed to amount to everything.

That in the end, what Daphne understood about the world and what she knew about herself each amounted to only one thing of importance, and that after a time, they were both the same.

_Tell me something about you._

Easy, she always thought.

_I love you, I love you, I love you._
3:35 p.m.

It's always hot in Vegas. Inferno hot, Harry thinks, and the glare from the pool isn't helpful. Saturdays mean club beats pounding while he sits aloft in his lifeguard throne and bakes, hovering somewhere between the circles of hell reserved for gluttons and sloths. If someone set fire to this town, he thinks, nobody would even notice.

He shades his eyes from the sun, sighing. Two children (where are their parents?) splash around wildly and two drunk women complain, looking to Harry for assistance. He's not here for them, Not as they are, anyway. His job is not to be dissatisfaction police for rich women gradually turning their skin to leather. He's here for when the couple in the corner inevitably tries fucking in the pool, or when someone gets drunk enough to try to dive into three feet of chlorinated cesspit (if that). He's the last line of defense between irresponsible fun and death.

Despite this, Harry recognizes the collective compulsion to find water. It calls to him, too. Funny thing, he thinks, being a lifeguard at the Mirage. It's a name so apt it should almost be funny.

He sighs again, rubbing at the sweat pooling under his sunglasses.

It's too fucking hot in Vegas.

4:43 p.m.

Vegas is so over. So fucking over, Theo thinks, and another glance around the Mirage pool does nothing to convince him otherwise. None of the swimsuits are in any way stylish. None of the tattoos are artsy. Too many people are drinking Miller Lite in one place than should be drinking Miller Lite at all, ever. Los Angeles, he thinks, even at its worst and most pretentious, is at least never trying this hard.

Theo considers going home early, but that's not happening. He isn't sure why he forgets every time that the drive back from Vegas to L.A. is always harder than the opposite direction. Drives to Vegas are comforting, full of promise, like diving directly into a sun-soaked pool (though not this particular pool, which would be to aim for certain death and very probably chlamydia). The other direction, on the other hand, is like leaping directly into the sun itself. And not in a good
Theo glances around, Draco pausing at his side. "No room," Theo says. Draco, meanwhile, is happily drinking a mai tai, which Theo wants very badly to knock from his hands directly into the pool. "Why'd you pick this hotel again?"

(The suite they have at the Mirage is fucking resplendent with the worst of the 1970s. It's retro, and again, not in a good way. Not to say there's a good way. But if there is, the Mirage is not it.)

"You hate every hotel," Draco reminds him. "I'm telling you, Nott, Vegas just is what it is. The city of sin," he adds, winking, as he fits his lips around a weed pen.

"I'm surprised you aren't more opposed," Theo notes, making a face. "None of this seems elite enough for you. And didn't you do coke last night? It's not 1982."

"Well, what do you want me to do?" Draco prompts lazily. "I didn't have any meth."

"Ah, see, you're joking, but it's not even a good joke," Theo points out. "Everyone knows pharmaceuticals are the new cocaine. Coke is Gen X, and meth, as literally everyone on earth agrees, is exclusively for midwesterners."

"That's fucking fascinating, Nott. Tell me more," Draco says drily.

"Remember ecstasy?" Theo muses, obliging. "Talk about a throwback—"

Exactly two chairs. In the shade (not ideal), next to a waterfall (noisy), directly adjacent to a bachelorette party with two unclaimed girls who are peering around like hawks (bad). They'll be wanting someone to bankroll them, surely. Theo and Draco are the sort of people who look like they might do that, except they wouldn't. Or at least—Theo wouldn't, anyway.

"I'd rather drown," Theo mutters.

Draco squints up, eyeing the lifeguard sitting above them. "You hear that?" he calls up obnoxiously. "My friend has a death wish. If you let him drown, I'd be happy to tip."

Theo doesn't expect the lifeguard to answer—assuming, as one does, that the lifeguard is a normal human being who takes no interest in what two drunk idiots are doing at his feet—but surprisingly, he does. He nudges a pair of sunglasses further up his nose and slumps down, warily regarding Theo and Draco before speaking.

"I died once," the lifeguard remarks idly. His hair is messy and wild beneath a stark white visor, his skin bronzed and slick beneath institutionally pristine shorts. He looks like he probably smells like suntan lotion; the coconut kind, if Theo were to guess. "I was without oxygen for five minutes. Can't say I'd try it again. Can't say I wouldn't."

"Jesus Christ," mutters Draco, about to walk away, but Theo stays behind.

"Tell me more," he commands. The lifeguard lifts his sunglasses, squinting at him.

"You thinking of trying?" the lifeguard says. His name tag says HARRY, LAS VEGAS, just like that. All caps. As if it's something to be proud of. "Overdose would be more pleasant, I think, given the option. Pretty sure you could afford it."
"That's presumptuous," Theo notes testily. Draco grabs his arm, trying to leave, but Theo nudges him away, flashing him a polarized glare from beneath thousand-dollar lenses before turning back to the lifeguard. "Any recommendations?"

The lifeguard, Harry, considers it for a second. "Not a stimulant," he says.

"Beg pardon?" Theo asks.

"I mean, could always overdose on caffeine," Harry muses, "given accessibility, but I have to imagine it would hurt. Like, with a normal overdose—"

Theo balks. "Normal overdose?"

"—yeah, normal, like sleeping pills or whatever," Harry continues, unfazed, "you just lose consciousness, right? Everything slows down. Sedatives would be the way to go. Want to die with stimulants, pretty sure that's a heart attack. Can't say for certain, but I'd guess it hurts more. You know how your heart races sometimes and shit? And it, like, stings? That's—that's no good. Might as well drown if you're going to go out that way."

"Jesus fucking Christ," Draco says under his breath, but Theo is enraptured.

"What time do you get off?" Theo asks Harry, ignoring Draco as he walks away, exasperated.

Harry laughs. "Fuck off," he says, and turns back towards the pool.

"I'm serious," Theo says. "Hey," he adds, when the lifeguard doesn't turn. "I'm fucking talking to you."

"I see that," Harry notes. It's irritating, and Theo fucking loves it.

"I'll be back in an hour," Theo says.

Harry nudges his sunglasses back on. "Fuck off."

Theo smiles.

Maybe Vegas isn't over yet.

---

5:43 p.m.

Harry isn't sure why he decided to talk to the rich kid with the sunglasses and the death wish who has hair that screams Los Angeles (who was probably 'ironically' at the Pitbull concert last night), but he doesn't think much of it until the too-skinny asshole with the dry voice shows up again.

"One hour on the dot," he says, and Harry rolls his eyes.

"Can't prove it," Harry replies. "Wasn't counting."

"You're a fucking liar," says Asshole, flagrantly. Shamelessly.

Harry glances down at his watch.

"Fine," he permits. "One hour on the dot."

The Asshole smiles.
"My friend dragged me here," Asshole says, gesturing over his shoulder. "The blond one, looks real smug? Him. Anyway, we're here for the weekend. Drove in from L.A., for no real reason. Vegas always seems like a good fucking idea, you know? And then you get here and six hours later you're like, shit. This place is so over."

Typical, Harry thinks. It's not like hating Las Vegas is somehow avant-garde.

"I actually like Vegas in theory," Asshole continues. "I like the idea that it's just so fake and we're all in on the joke. Like, we're all here to entertain this grandiose idea that we can escape into a fantasy for forty-eight hours or whatever." He pauses. "The Venetian is my favorite hotel," he adds, "because they really fucking committed, you know? I mean yeah, sure, it's fake, but it's beautiful. The ostentatious kind of beautiful, too—like, um, what's the word—"

"Opulence," Harry says by accident.

"Yes." He can hear the satisfaction in Asshole's voice. "Exactly."

The Venetian is Harry's favorite hotel.

"I mean, you have to like the Bellagio," Asshole continues, apparently not bothered at all by Harry's lack of communication. "It's got a real sense of the absurd, you know? The giant flowers and gardens and the fountains. It's like—the Bellagio is Dada. It's all just fucking satire, man."

"Do you ever stop talking?" Harry asks.

"Tell you over dinner," Asshole says.

"I have no interest in hanging out with you," Harry says, "or your smug blond friend."

Harry says nothing.

"I've got this theory about Pitbull," Asshole remarks tangentially, and Harry rolls his eyes. Knew it, he thinks, until Asshole abruptly surprises him.

"I think he might be a god," Asshole says.

Harry blinks.

"A minor god," Asshole amends quickly. "Like Bacchus, maybe? Or some sort of revelry creature, or maybe an incubus of some kind? I mean okay, I'm not saying he's literally divine, but he had a cold last night at the start of the show and then by the end of the night he was fine and I had the fucking cold, so. You do the math."

"You think Pitbull," Harry echoes slowly, "the singer from Miami, might be Bacchus."

"Yeah, I mean." Asshole shrugs. "Yeah."

Harry turns, staring at him. "Seriously?"

Fuck this lunatic, Harry thinks for a second, but after the idea settles in, he grudgingly decides he kind of likes it. It makes Vegas less hellish and more fantastic, in the literal sense. Fantasy. That's what Vegas promises, and what it fails to deliver, favoring $30 mai tais instead.

"Dah-le," Asshole adds, grinning, and then, evidently pleased with himself, he half-shouts, "Mujeeeeeres!"

"Stop," Harry says.

"I'll stop over dinner," Asshole replies.

"Please stop," Harry says, though he checks his watch.

Asshole clearly notices. "You know I have a death wish," he remarks, gesturing blithely to the pool. "Could just try to repeatedly drown until your shift is over."

Harry grimaces. His shift is over.

"What's your name?" Harry says.

"Theodore Videlio Nott the third," replies Asshole.

"Seriously?" Harry says.

"No." Asshole barks out a laugh. "I'm only the second."

"Theodore?" Harry echoes, and frowns. "Go by Ted?"

"Theo," Asshole corrects him, and shudders dramatically. "If you ever fucking call me Ted I'll bury your dick in the ground."

"Pharmaceuticals are the new cocaine," Theo says.

Harry wants to kiss him on the mouth.

"Fine," he says, and climbs down from the lifeguard stand, wondering if he might die tonight.

6:15 p.m.

Theo tells Harry, Las Vegas, to meet him out front, though when he says it, he's still not entirely sure that the lifeguard is going to come. Theo doesn't know what he's doing, exactly. He doesn't know why he's so very insistent on spending time with a lifeguard, particularly one who works at a hotel he doesn't even like. What does that say about him, exactly? Or his choices? Also, it's something of an unreasonable trap, because if Harry, Las Vegas, wants to go clubbing, then Theo hates him. If Harry, Las Vegas, is a gambler, Theo hates him for that, too. There are so many ways that Theo could hate him, and Harry, Las Vegas, doesn't even know.

But then Harry shows up outside, and Theo decides he doesn't hate him.

Theo doesn't hate him at all.

"I was gone fifteen minutes," Harry sighs, looking as if he's biting back a groan, "and somehow you managed to put on a full suit."

Theo glances down. "Well, as I understand it, shirts are required for service. Though if you'd like to cause a stir, I can always go without."

Theo thinks briefly that he'll do it, actually, if Harry asks. He suspects he'll do anything Harry asks. Probably because Harry doesn't seem like the type to ask for anything.

"Take the jacket off," Harry says.

Ah, so Harry doesn't ask. Harry tells.

Theo smiles.

"Have to put it back in my room, then," he says. "You coming?"

Harry looks startled, but only for a moment. He either pretends at being fearless, or has no fears. "Fine."

Theo beckons in the opposite direction and they wind through the casino, heading back towards the lifts. On their way, a variety of women pause to look at them. It's always a bit carnivorous, these glances, because again, most of these women are looking for someone to buy them drinks all night. Maybe someone to fuck them, if they're lucky enough to get their room to themselves for an hour or so. Mostly, though, Theo is a wallet that almost certainly contains a Black Card (status: affirmative), and that's all they need to know. Harry, on the other hand, they look at like a piece of meat.

"You don't seem to mind the smoke," Theo notes, and Harry shrugs.

"Grew up here," he says, and fixes Theo with an unnervingly direct gaze, daring Theo to mock him. "Where are you from?"

"Guess," Theo says, half-smiling.

"Los Angeles," Harry replies.

Right on the first try, which Theo hates a little bit. Technically, he's from Rancho Palos Verdes, which is less a beach town than a gated neighborhood nestled in the cliffs, overlooking the ocean. He usually tells people he's from Manhattan Beach, though it isn't actually much of an improvement. It indicates very clearly an innumerable amount of things about him, most primarily that he went to a private high school. His parents (his father, specifically, seeing as his mother is deceased) were Republicans, though specifically the kind who worshipped Reagan, not McCain, and certainly not Palin. Theo, who worships nothing, does not bring any of this up.

"That obvious?" he asks.

"You're tan, and it's only May, so you live somewhere warm. You're rich, clearly, but not old enough to live somewhere suburban. Ergo, you're either some kind of foreign prince, or you're from L.A.," Harry summarizes disinterestedly, in a way that indicates he's seen it often enough to know. "I generally avoid the L.A. weekenders," he remarks, as if he can't really prevent himself from adding it.

"Generally," Theo notes. "But not today?"

"You didn't give me a choice," Harry reminds him dully.

"You seem like the kind of person who always has a choice," Theo replies, and for some reason, Harry stops, suddenly falling to a halt and turning towards Theo.
"If you're going to play some sort of game where you force me into explaining why I'm here," Harry says, not particularly bothered as the crowd swerves around them, "I don't want to play it. I'm not interested in having to answer for anything."

At this angle, straight on, Theo can see that Harry's eyes are extremely green. He's wearing a pair of glasses that look sturdy and light. Theo can picture them sitting on his nightstand, just like he can picture Harry's clothes on his floor.

"Noted," Theo says, and gestures to the elevators. "Shall we?"

Harry lifts his chin, which is like a nod, only more stubborn.

"This one," Theo says, beckoning to the lifts that are marked A-E. He can see on Harry's face for a moment that he knows that means Theo has a suite, but the brief degree of calculation is smoothed over relatively quickly.

"Got it," Harry says, and follows him into the elevator.

It opens onto floor A with a ding.

"I hate the aesthetic of this hotel," Theo comments, gesturing to the carpeting and the doors, which look Eastern-influenced in a way that screams oriental, or some other shameless cultural misappropriation. "In what way is any of this a mirage? There should be, I don't know. Phantasms. Hallucinogens. I should feel distinctly misplaced in time and space."

"How exactly would that be a hotel theme?" Harry asks, following him down the corridor. Theo places his key in the lock and waits for the beep, then shoves the door open, permitting them entry.

"Ghosts," Theo says in answer, and watches as Harry almost laughs.

The suite is ridiculous and Theo knows this. The view is nice, but almost any view is nice at this height. The sofa is angular and stupid. The bar is reflective and gaudy. There's a television at the foot of the massive bed in the closest bedroom, which can almost be seen from the front door, but not quite. It says a lot that there's a television there, Theo thinks. That's not what Theo does in the bedroom, though the television above the jacuzzi is, of course, another story.

"Put the jacket down and let's go," Harry says, his gaze flicking to the totally unnecessary dining table. "I only agreed to dinner."

Theo looks over what Harry is wearing. Jeans and a henley, two of the three buttons undone, plus a pair of scuffed up Chuck Taylors. Theo, meanwhile, is wearing a bespoke suit. Three of his own top buttons are undone, and part of him wants to button one more, wondering if he's saying too much, but it's too late for that. Instead he removes his jacket and lets it slide to the floor, making a statement. The statement is, of course, this: I don't put things where they belong, and therefore, I am trouble.

Harry watches Theo roll his sleeves up.

Harry looks like exactly the kind of trouble Theo came here for, even if he'd never admit it.

"What do you want to eat?" Theo asks him, and does not say anything crude, although it does occur to him to wonder what else Harry feels like putting in his mouth.

"You're the guest here," Harry says, shrugging. "You pick."
Theo wonders if Harry isn't setting a trap for him now, as equally and as shamelessly as he set one for Harry. You're the guest here, so use me as you wish, but if you use me, I will hate you.

"I want a burger," Theo says. He's suddenly starving, he thinks, and Harry's mouth quirks.

"Burger it is," Harry replies, and perhaps it's Theo's imagination, but he sounds a bit hungry, too.

6:45 p.m.

Harry notices right away that Theo isn't a compulsive phone-checker, which surprises him. He realizes that he actually did notice Theo at the pool earlier that day, though he hadn't committed it to memory (well, he had, but only in retrospect, which doesn't count) and recalls that when he first noticed the two rich assholes (the other of which Theo informs Harry is outrageously called Draco, which practically screams obscure left-coast intellectualism) Theo was on his phone, staring mindlessly at his screen in a way that usually indicates disinterest rather than communication.

Harry notices now, though, that Theo doesn't remove his phone from his pocket, not even to look at a map of the Strip, until it rings. Then Theo sighs, glances at the name on the screen, and raises it to his ear.

"What?" he says, which Harry thinks is fantastic. One day, Harry reminds himself, he'll be the sort of person who can answer the phone that way. No greeting, no salutation. Simply a what, what is it, you're wasting my time, which will be a welcome relief from years of hello, this is he, thank you for calling, may I help you?

"No," Theo says, and pauses. "Fine. No, I haven't seen your texts. You text me too much, I told you, I don't need to know where you are at every moment. No, I'm—fine." He rolls his eyes, dodging a woman wearing nothing but nipple pasties and feathers, and beckons for Harry to keep up. "No, come on, I don't want to go there. I don't want sushi again, it's not that good here. We're landlocked for fuck's sake, Malfoy, and I just s- fine. Gordon Ramsay?" He makes a face, then glances at Harry. "Yeah. No, I'm not alone. I told you, I'm with- no, that wasn't a joke. I agree, it isn't funny. Amazing, isn't it, that something that's very much happening is not a joke? Fine." A groan, and another glance at Harry. "Well, he doesn't like you. No, not ironically. He doesn't like you, Malfoy, because you're an asshole. Me? I'm charming. Tell him."

Harry blinks, realizing that Theo is holding the phone out to him.

"Sorry," he says. "What?"

"Tell him," Theo repeats, "that I'm charming."

For whatever reason (to end this, perhaps) Harry agrees to take the phone.

"Hello?" he says, warily.

"Ah. So he's not joking, then." It's the smug blond prince on the other end, sighing. "Well, I assume he's told you that some of our friends have joined us for dinner."

"No, he hasn't," Harry says.

Silence.

"You know, if you're after him for his money," smug blond prince warns quietly, the sound on the other end changing slightly as if he's gone outside from somewhere loud, "I recommend walking away. Hand him back his phone and turn around."
"What's he saying?" Theo asks impatiently, but Harry holds up a hand.

"I think I can decide for myself what I do with my time," Harry says into the phone, "but thank you endlessly for your concern."

A pause, and then a loud scoff. "Fine." He can practically hear the teeth gritting on the other end. "He's a big boy. I'm sure he'll sort it out for himself soon enough."

Harry says nothing.

"Just tell Nott to meet us at Planet Hollywood," the smug blond says, rejoining whatever crowd he was just in. "I presume you're tagging along?"

Harry glances at Theo and for a moment he's angry, or irritated, but he realizes almost immediately that Theo has genuinely no idea what his smug blond friend is saying to him. Harry also realizes that perhaps the smug blond is something of a gatekeeper, which says much more about Theo than he thinks it does.

"If Theo is going," Harry says, "then I'm going."

Theo blinks, surprised and pleased.

"God, this is so fucked." The smug blond prince hangs up, and Harry hands the phone back to Theo.

"We're meeting your friends at Planet Hollywood," Harry says.

"I hate that place," Theo groans, tucking his phone back into his pocket, "but at least we're getting a burger. What's your stance on truffle fries?"

"I don't have one," Harry says.

"You should," Theo advises.

If you like them, Harry thinks, I bet I like them.

"Dying of high cholesterol wouldn't be the way to go," Harry says instead.

"You know, I've thought about it," Theo tells him, "and I think you're right about an overdose. I'd like to be killed by excess, you know what I mean? I think it says a lot. I think it says something terrible, and I'd want that, I think. I'd want people at my funeral talking about how I deserved it. Like, 'oh, good thing there's champagne here, because I hated that asshole. Overdose? Please.' Honestly, I think if people cried I'd just be insulted."

"Yeah?" Harry asks.

"Yeah," Theo confirms. "Because it means they didn't know me at all."

Harry permits three steps in silence before glancing at Theo.

"You should have cake at your funeral," he says. "And a guillotine."

"Oh, like a French Revolution theme?" Theo asks, and Harry nods. "I like it, actually." He tilts his head. "Wow, yeah, I like that a lot. I think it says exactly what I want it to say."

He turns his head, glancing at Harry.
"How did you do that?" he asks.

Harry shrugs. "Just a guess."

"Huh," Theo says, and smiles down at his feet. "Huh," he repeats, quieter, and Harry glances at the knuckles of Theo's hands.

Theo has smooth hands, slender fingers. The bone of his wrist is prominent in a way that makes him look like an artist. The knuckles, however, are bruised, just faintly. He has a thin scar running between the webbing of his pointer and middle fingers. He wears a single ring, a signet ring, on his pinky. It looks like it could cause some damage, but the face of it is blank. No crest, no monogram, no initial. Harry blinks, picturing that hand sliding down his own stomach, the ring catching briefly on the button of his jeans just before it dips under.

But then he realizes that's not it. That's not the hand.

"You're left-handed," Harry observes, noticing that Theo wears his watch on his right wrist. It's a worn leather band, nondescript, save for the small Rolex logo on the face.

"Yeah," Theo says, and slides his left hand through his hair for emphasis, turning to smile briefly at Harry.

His left hand is unadorned, and Harry smiles back.

Convenient.

8:15 p.m.

Dinner goes on for way too long. Blaise tells too many stories about traveling, and asks Harry too many questions about where he's been, which isn't too many places. Theo shifts uncomfortably, wishing he would stop. Harry doesn't seem terribly bothered, but his hand seems tight around his beer.

Harry is, of course, extremely underdressed compared to Draco and Blaise, and even compared to Greg and Vince, who are very much Draco's friends. They're the stupidest investment bankers Theo has ever met, but he's glad, at least, every time they talk, because he catches Harry laughing at them, not with them, and Theo finds that rewarding. He finds it apt. Draco forgives their stupidity because he likes a posse, an entourage. He's willing to surround himself with idiocy if finery comes with it. Theo, on the other hand, is itching to be alone with Harry. He wants Harry to notice things about him, to tell him things. Sometimes (most of the time) Theo doesn't know himself very well, but somehow, Harry picks through his unspoken thoughts and unasked questions and sorts him out within minutes, within seconds, and does him the kindness of not ultimately putting him in a box.

Just before they leave, Theo boldly sets a hand down beside him, on the spot in the booth between him and Harry. He waits for a second, lifting his glass with his free hand, and then lets his pinky drift slightly, permitting it to brush against the hem of Harry's jeans. He waits, wondering if Harry will notice. Theo read somewhere once that touch is the most acute of human senses. He read, more specifically, that if someone is touching you, it's not an accident. They are aware. He silently begs Harry to notice that this is not an accident. He hopes that Harry is aware.

"Ready?" Draco prompts, and the group begins to vacate the booth.

Harry shifts, preparing to rise to his feet, and Theo's pinky retracts, shameful.
Aim too high and you hit the sun, he reminds himself, hiding his disappointment as he slides out after Harry.

Naturally, after eating, Draco wants to gamble. He really is unnaturally good at blackjack, considering he's twice as clever as he looks, and he certainly doesn't look like a fool. He's wary-eyed and sharp, and much too smart for Vince and Greg, who mostly enjoy things like craps. Theo, on the other hand, is excellent at Texas Hold'em. Draco isn't bad either. Blaise mostly gambles wildly, erratically, and exclusively while drinking, but he's preternaturally lucky. Any given weekend in Vegas, the three of them will usually come out on top, with their suites comped—the irony of wealth, really. They showed up here already fucking loaded, and they leave having gotten everything for free.

The moment they find a table with the 'right vibe' in the casino (at the Paris hotel, which is always lucky at this time of night), Draco throws two hundred dollars down on the table, and Theo sees Harry swallow hard. He supposes it is kind of sickening to watch. At one point, Theo was able to feel some sort of revulsion at the idea of having so much money it's worth spending on adrenaline alone. Now he feels very little, except for the motion of Harry pulling away from him.

Harry watches Draco make a hundred dollars in less than five minutes and turns his head away.

"You playing?" Draco calls over his shoulder, beckoning for Theo, but Theo knows if he sits down now, it's over. Harry will walk away, and no amount of money could make him chance that. He will never know how to find Harry again.

"I gotta go," Harry says, turning over his shoulder and proving Theo right, and though Theo is rarely wrong, he still hates it.

"Right," Draco says, knowing perfectly well Theo doesn't answer his phone. He glances sharply at Harry, who's already taken another step in retreat. "You sure about that?" Draco says under his breath, but Theo glares at him. "Fine." He waves a hand at Harry. "Bye," he says, with his particular gift for making a single syllable sound like a threat.

Harry turns to walk away and Theo chases after him.

"What now?" Theo asks, a little breathless, and Harry shrugs, not slowing down.

"I only agreed to dinner," he says.

"But that's not fair," Theo counters. "We didn't talk about death at all over dinner. Draco's friends are blissfully unaware of their mortality," he adds. "It's a damn shame, really. It's what all the kids are missing these days, I say."

Harry pivots so quickly Theo almost collides with a stranger, only just managing to steady himself as Harry stares at him. It's not a mean look, but it's certainly accusatory.

"What do you want from me?" Harry asks.

Theo blinks.

Having dinner with his friends was almost certainly a mistake.

"I'm not like them," he says, and he can hear a little bit of pleading in his voice, which he hates.
"Seriously. I'm not."

"I fucking know that," Harry says, and then grimaces. "I'm sorry," he adds in an undertone. "I didn't mean to—" He swallows. "I'm just sorry."

"It's fine." Theo is relieved, or possibly jittery. He inhales Harry's apology until it fizzes in his veins, an inexplicable high. "Let's get a drink. You and me. Anywhere you want."

Harry considers it. "You ever been to the Chateau?"

Yes, Theo has been there, many times. It's the rooftop lounge in the hotel they're currently standing in, and not exactly a hidden wonder.

"Have you?" Theo asks.

"No," Harry says.

"Oh, Theo thinks.

"I really hope you're using me for my money, then," Theo says, half-laughing. He'd rather spend it on Harry than on the blackjack tables, anyway. Somehow he thinks the investment will be met with better results.

"Maybe," Harry says. "Or maybe I just don't want to be inside."

Theo thinks Harry probably looks good under tea lights and stars.

"Think they have guillotines?" Theo asks.

"I think they'd be idiots not to," Harry replies.

Jesus Christ, Theo wants to touch him. Wants to drown in possibility, in mights and maybes and coulds. Wants to luxuriate in the promise of touching him; wants to paint a portrait with the probable softness of his mouth; wants to wear the finery of imagined bruises Harry might leave along the slopes of his thighs.

"Let's go, then," Theo says, and the Harry who stands before him unfortunately doesn't drop to his knees and pull at Theo's belt, but he nods.

"Let's go," Harry agrees and turns towards the elevator, dragging Theo back to the spectacularity of now.

9:45 p.m.

Theo clearly paid for bottle service and Harry wants to be annoyed, only he did do it very discreetly, and also did something of a dance of feigned surprise when they got seated somewhere intensely private. It's so wildly endearing that Harry can't really be angry, even if he does feel like he's being distinctly Pretty Woman-ed. He considers making a joke about how Theo's renting him by the hour, only Theo's gone to such lengths not to make it seem that way that he would hate to ruin the effort.

Instead, Harry thinks back to Theo's pinky lingering near his thigh—and the ghost of a shudder it sent up his spine—and decides maybe this is just Theo's version of sharing. If he had money, Harry thinks, he'd probably do the same thing. If he had money, he'd probably be alone with Theo right now (pouring Dom Perignon into the hollow of his throat from the back of an Escalade, if the rap songs were to be believed) so maybe Theo was actually a saint, and deserved the money.

"Drink," Theo says, thrusting a champagne flute into Harry's hand, and Harry amends the last part of his suspicions.

"Trying to take advantage of me?" Harry asks.

"Can you be bought?" Theo counters.

Yes. "No." Maybe. "But I'd be insulted if you didn't try."

"Ah." Theo laughs, then gestures up. "So. Everything you hoped it would be?"

Yes, actually.

"It's pretty nice," Harry says, and then adds, "I miss the gold standard."

"What?" Theo asks, startled.

"The gold standard," Harry repeats. "You know, where a country's monetary system was linked directly to gold—"

"I fucking know what the gold standard is," Theo cuts in, rolling his eyes. "I've read Capitalism and Freedom. Why the fuck do you miss the gold standard?"

"Well, maybe what I miss is gold," Harry corrects himself. "I mean, in some weird, sentimental, pirate sort of way. Like, I'd love to throw down some gold coins, you know what I mean? Bills are fine. They're fine." He barks out a laugh, and okay, maybe he's a little bit drunk. "But I want to fucking shower someone in gold coins before I die."

"Dude," Theo says. "That is a wild dream."

"What's yours?" Harry asks casually, leaning back against the loveseat.

"My dream?" Theo cocks his head, considering it. "Besides my French Revolution funeral, you mean."

"Obviously," Harry says.

"Obviously," Theo echoes with amusement, running his thumb over his lip with a laugh. "Right, well, aside from that, and my preeminent death, I guess I'd say..." He tilts his head. "I want to be late to something," he said, which is surprising, mostly in that it makes no sense.

"That's it?" Harry says. "You're so punctual you aspire to tardiness?"

"Well, no," Theo admits, grimacing into his champagne flute. "It's hard to explain."

"I just told you I wanted to throw down in gold coins," Harry said. "I think you can explain yourself."

Theo rolls his eyes. "It's dumb."

"Of course it's dumb," Harry says. "That's the point. If you'd said something sophisticated, I'd punch you."

"Well, I do deserve it," Theo says. "I mean, just generally."
"Right," Harry confirms. "Yes. I'm aware."

Theo's gaze slides to his, brows arched.

"You're uniquely punchable," Harry assures him, "and you know that. But answer the question."

Theo groans, but relents.

"I want to be the kind of late that means you were distracted," he says eventually, eyeing his glass. "You know. Like, I want to be with someone who makes me not care what time it is. I want to be on my way to something, a meeting or something, and then have that person show up naked at my door, and then I want to just go, I don't know—fuck it. Fuck whatever else I was doing, this is more important." He pauses, running a thumb along the condensation of his glass. "Oh, dinner with a client in ten minutes?" he poses facetiously to himself, half-smiling. "Well, fuck it, it can wait. It can wait, because I need to fuck this person right now—here, now, because I have to. Because—I don't know. Them, me, this particular transgression, we are irreplaceable. Because I will never be this young or this in love or this terribly, unbearably wanting again, and I can't fucking waste it. Because this fucking second, this very moment is fleeting, it's rare and won't come around again, and client dinners can wait fifteen minutes or however long it takes. I want to have that person in my doorway and then decide, well, fuck, I guess this is what I'm doing now, and have that be that."

He tips his head back, draining his glass, and Harry realizes he might be in love with him.

Either that, or he's unforgivably drunk.

"Theo," he says, and Theo shakes his head.

"Don't," Theo says. "Don't kiss me right now, I won't believe it. I won't believe you if you do it now." He turns his head. "Do it later. When I'm not ready. When I can't breathe."

Harry blinks, and then nods slowly.

"Okay," Harry says.

A busty waitress pours more into Theo's glass, and then into Harry's. For several minutes they sit in silence—or something like silence, anyway, which doesn't actually exist in Las Vegas. In Vegas, on a Saturday night, Flo Rida is as good as silence, even as it transitions to some other too-loud beat. Britney's Work Bitch comes on next and fuck, this would be a terrible time to have a first kiss. A truly awful time.

Harry turns his head and grabs Theo's jaw, pulling it towards him, but at the last second something compels him to pause, and he stops just shy of touching his lips to Theo's.

Theo's chest rises and falls aggressively, but he doesn't move. Harry releases him and exhales, letting his head fall forward. Still, Theo doesn't move. Harry's nose slides along one side of Theo's and still, he doesn't move. Theo's breath is on Harry's lips; his eyes close, and his lashes flutter against Harry's temple; but he doesn't move. Harry's hand, which hovers in the air from where he let it fall from Theo's cheek, float slowly and unsteadily until it lands on Theo's hip, precisely where his shirt is tucked into his trousers.

Harry lets his head fall, his forehead resting on the bridge of Theo's shoulder, and only then does Theo's hand rise, his fingers toying with the hair at the nape of Harry's neck as Harry closes his eyes, breathing hard.

"I'm drunk," Harry says, and presses his lips to Theo's chest, just below his clavicle. He bites down briefly, obscenely wishing he could saturate the fabric with his tongue, if nothing else. He feels Theo manage a swallow; shivers as Theo's fingers tighten on his hair.

"Maybe we should go somewhere," Theo says. "Walk a bit. Get some air."

Harry's hand is toying with Theo's shirt, untucking it slightly. The pads of his fingers brush Theo's abdomen and he thinks, faintly, that he might scream if he can't get any closer, if he can't feel any more.

"My friend," Harry attempts, and falters, forcing another swallow. "My friend's a club promoter. He's going to be at Oak tonight." It's the nightclub in the Mirage. "Could get us in if you wanted to walk back that way."

Theo nods, turns his head to speak in Harry's ear. "Sounds good," he says, and slips his tongue briefly along the lobe, as Harry feels his entire body suffer an avalanche of tremors.

Harry forces himself to his feet, knowing perfectly well he can't stand another moment of whatever Theo is doing to him. Waiting, he supposes, which has never been Harry's strong suit. He glances over the edge of the wall before they leave, eyeing the Strip below.

"Don't jump," Theo says, standing behind him. "Can't be the best way to go."

Not true, Harry thinks to argue. It'd be more merciful than this, at least.

"I'd rather skydive than bungee jump," Harry offers instead, as a nearly unrelated sidebar. "At least with skydiving, if you're going to die, you die from a heart attack in the air. You know it's coming, and your heart fucks off. Bungee jumping you die on impact." He shudders pointedly. "No thanks."

"I'm not here for a crash," Theo agrees, with a faint smile. "So yeah, cross that one off the list."

Harry thinks it's distinctly possible he might die tonight, and he thinks maybe he won't mind it.

"Harry," Theo says, and Harry shakes his head.

"Don't kiss me," Harry says. "Not here. Not like this."

Then he gestures ahead and Harry nods, leading them back to the elevators.

11:44 p.m.

It's not a great nightclub, and Harry's friend Seamus is one of those dodgy characters Theo suspects has a juvenile record. Probably arson or some shit. Still, they're playing some of those early 2000s hyphy movement songs with the heavy beats. It's less sexual than it is purely nostalgic, and they can't talk in here, so they drink instead. They drink, and they dance. Not really with each other, though Theo considers how badly he wants Harry to grind on his lap—not dissimilar from what the girls in the next booth over are offering the best man of an extremely Southern bachelor party. Theo wants filthy, dastardly, ignoble things from Harry, but not here. Not where the floor is sticky with Smirnoff and cheap tequila. He wants Harry naked on a cold marble floor; wants to leave marks somewhere porcelain.
Harry makes Theo want sumptuousness. Opulence. Not this, the worst track from the post-One Direction singles, which is an abrupt end to Tell Me When to Go. Harry's hair is falling into his eyes and Theo stops dancing to brush it away, slicking it back from his face.

"Don't kiss me now unless you have a death wish," Harry warns, laughing, and pulls Theo towards him, one hand wrapped tight around his arm.

"And what if I do?" Theo shouts. Some girl gives him a come-hither look from over Harry's shoulder and he ignores it, though he might not have done so on another night. For now, his attention is occupied. His curiosity is piqued. His hands drop to Harry's hips, and the girl frowns. She'll tell her friends later that every man is scum or gay or both and kick her shoes off with a whine, and maybe by the time she does, Theo will have sucked a bruise in the shape of his teeth into the side of Harry's neck. Or maybe not. Maybe he'll still be here dancing with Harry, the tips of his fingers still damp with Harry's sweat.

"Not here," Harry laughs into Theo's ear, the heel of his palm pressed into Theo's chest. "Not now."

Then when? Theo wants to beg, only he laughs instead.

Harry's free hand is somewhere on Theo's thigh and it stops, freezing in place.

"Your phone," Harry says.

"What?" Theo yells.

Harry slides his own hand into Theo's pocket and Theo nearly convulses.

"Your phone," Harry says, smacking it into Theo's palm.

Theo looks down, groaning at the lit-up screen. Missed text messages are somewhere in the double digits, and now the phone is vibrating with further evidence of Draco's displeasure.

"Fuck," he says.

"Might as well answer," Harry tells him with a shrug. "We've got nothing else going on."

"WHAT?" he shouts into the phone.

"What?" Draco yells back.

Theo sighs, grabbing the collar of Harry's shirt and pulling him towards the exit.

"What is it, Malfoy?"

"Where are you? You can't possibly still be with what's-his-face."

"Harry," Theo says, rolling his eyes. "You know his name, Draco."

"Seriously? Still? Come on. Let's, I don't know. Karaoke. You know, that one place? With the—the ramen. Yes, Blaise, bottle service, this isn't my fucking first day. Blaise, would you very kindly shut the fuck up, I'm trying to talk to Nott—"

"Where?" Theo sighs, exasperated.
"We'll meet you in the lobby of the hotel, I just stopped to—BLAISE. PUT THAT DOWN- Theo, ten minutes. FOR FUCK'S SAKE—"

Draco hangs up and Theo sighs, glancing at Harry.

"Karaoke?" he asks.

"Sure," Harry says.

"Great," Theo says, turning away. "We're meeting Draco in ten min-"

He breaks off as Harry yanks him back and forces him against the wall, holding his wrists steady. Theo blinks, uncertain, and then Harry releases his hands, shifting instead to take hold of Theo's face.

The kiss comes out of nowhere. Harry's hips press against Theo's with his hands firmly wrapped around either side of Theo's jaw, and Theo can't breathe, can't speak, can barely manage to kiss back as his hands come around to rest somewhere beneath the muscle of Harry's back, curved around his shoulder blades. It lasts somewhere between eternity and half a second, Harry's glasses jabbing slightly into Theo's cheek, and then Harry yanks Theo's head back, placing a single kiss on the arch of Theo's throat as Theo lets out a loud gasp, surfacing from an unholy depth.

"What the fuck," Theo manages, as Harry steps back and then away, turning towards the exit. "Hold on," Theo growls after him, grabbing his arm. "What do you think you're d-"

"We're meeting Draco in ten minutes," Harry says, and then grabs Theo's arm, checking his watch. "Nine, even."

"We could be late," Theo suggests dizzily, but Harry grins.

"Not yet," he says, and keeps walking.

Theo stares after him, dismayed and disbelieving and utterly distraught.

"You fucker," he sighs, and chases after Harry, bursting through the doors and back into the lobby of the Mirage.

1:07 a.m.

"Carry on my wayward son," Harry sings deliriously, "there'll be peace when you are done, lay your weary head to rest, don't you cry no more—"

Draco, who is considerably more bearable when he's drunk, sings loudly with his arm thrown around Harry's shoulder, apparently in approval of the song choice (if not also of Harry himself, though he seems to have at least abandoned his insistence on contempt). Blaise, who has somehow befriended what looks like a birthday party for some girls named after flowers and Greek myths, toasts him from the lounge sofas that are probably going to need a solid scrub before the night is over. Vince and Greg, the two idiots that Theo obviously hates, are playing twin air guitars and trying very badly to get two of the birthday party girls to watch.

Theo, meanwhile, is staring up at Harry from where he's sitting alone, a bottle of Sapporo clutched tightly in his hand. It occurs to Harry in flashbacks from pieces throughout the night that Theo is often sitting alone, even when he's with other people. It isn't as if he doesn't care, or as if people don't care about him. It's more like he's a piece that doesn't know where he fits, or that maybe doesn't mind that he doesn't.

Harry thrusts the microphone into Draco's hands and leaves him to the rest of the song, opting to fall into the seat beside Theo's.

"Tired?" he asks Theo.

"No," Theo says, and grins. "You're a fucking terrible singer."

"I know." Harry reaches out, touching his pinky to the side of Theo's thigh. "I want to kiss you again," he says, probably too quietly for Theo to hear, but Theo shifts his leg over, seeming to grasp the message.

"Pick out a song for me," Theo says, which seems to mean we're not leaving yet, asshole, because you did this to yourself, and now you're going to suffer for it, and Harry's secretly kind of glad about it. The wait is doing things to his internal organs.

Something to his chest, too.

He sits up and grabs the booklet from the girl with the flower name and the too-smug nose, ignoring her when she lets out a squawk of opposition.

"Here," Harry says, pointing to the song title and offering it to Theo.

"Done," Theo declares, draining his beer, and then he rises to his feet, taking the mic from Draco and pivoting with far too much panache for any single person to possess (much less a drunk person with no obvious coordination).

"Surprise, bitches," Theo adds, winking at Harry, "I'm actually fucking fantastic."

Draco lets out an approving howl, and Harry watches, entranced, as the song begins.

"You are my fiiiiiiire, my one desiiiiiiire," Theo sings, and even though the sound of it is almost immediately lost in a swarm of chorusing voices, Harry decides Theo's actually a pretty good singer.

Either that, Harry thinks, or maybe—just maybe—he's just a little bit in over his head.

2:15 a.m.

The girls lure Draco and the others off to their suite at the Venetian and Theo hangs back, pausing Harry as he climbs out of the back of the cab. He says nothing; only gestures across the street at the Mirage, and Harry nods.

"Want to tell Draco?" Harry asks, but Draco's far ahead already, swept up in being the center of attention. That's Draco's happy place, but Theo suspects he's already in his.

"Nah," Theo says. "Wouldn't be the first time I disappeared."

Harry arches a brow. "And if he decides to text you relentlessly?"

Theo pulls his phone out of his pocket. "Whoops," he says, powering it off with a swipe, "slipped and fell."

Harry smiles.
The walk back to the Mirage is, of course, needlessly long, considering it's directly across the street. Reaching the limited access points is something of a drawn out process, particularly since the streets are still flooded with people who are surely only going to make mistakes. Theo wonders for a second if he is, too, but determines that unimportant. If this is a mistake, then so be it. What else is Vegas for, anyway?

The walk back through the casino is stranger now, considering how far they've come. Theo knows what Harry tastes like now, has felt Harry pressed up against him, and that makes all of the difference. Some of the difference. The world is different, for whatever reason, even though it looks and smells the same, hazy with that distant sensation of smoke.

Every step Theo takes is something of a choice. Should he stop here, kiss Harry here? The elevator door closes. How about now? Pressed up against the reflective surfaces? If he shoved hard enough Harry might growl his opposition, hiss in pain, and maybe it would make Theo smile a little, give him a reason to make it up to Harry later. The elevator lands at his floor, dings, and Theo realizes he missed it. Missed his chance. Here, then? Up against the wall? He could slide his hand down Harry's jeans and coax him into something; something he hasn't decided yet, but something. No, not here, he misses it again, dips his keycard into the lock and waits for another beep to tell him that time is passing, time is slipping away from him, soon the door will be open and he'll be alone with Harry, and then what? What does he want, what does he want? Has he decided? He walks into the room and Harry's next to him and he stares at the brass reflective surfaces at the bar, the lights from the skyline outside. He could kiss Harry now, surely. It's private, isn't it? Here, in this horrible suite, he could take Harry's clothes off, could drag him down onto the retro floors and—and—

Harry takes one of Theo's shaking hands and brushes his lips against his palm, closing his fingers around it.

"Tell me something stupid," Harry says quietly, and Theo lets out a breath.

"I'm afraid," he says.

Harry steps closer. "Of?"

"You know how they say you die twice?" Theo exhales, and Harry nods. "Once when you stop breathing, and again when someone says your name for the last time. I'm afraid of the second death." He smiles half-heartedly. "I'm afraid I'll live a life so ordinary that once I die the first time, nobody ever says my name again."

"No," Harry counters, shaking his head, and Theo frowns, not having expected to be disagreed with on such an intimate point. "That's not what you're afraid of—you're afraid of living," he says, as Theo blinks. "Really living, I mean. A full life, you know, with love and shit. You're afraid you'll live an empty life, or that nobody would love you enough to miss you when you're gone. But if you ask me," Harry continues mildly, taking another step forward, "I don't think you really have to worry about that."

Theo's throat is dry. "No?"

"No." Harry's very close now, his chest rising almost to where it could meet Theo's, if he inhaled sharply enough. "For one thing, you just have to die before Draco. He seems like he'll probably want to discuss you at length."

Theo wants to laugh, but can't.

"Is that it?" he asks, swallowing, and Harry reaches out, brushing his thumb across the exposed line of Theo's chest; just beneath the button he's really rather glad now he didn't fasten.

"I'll never forget you," Harry says softly, "as long as I live. If you walk out of here right now and I go to work tomorrow and everything is exactly as it was, I promise, Theo, I will never stop saying your name. I'll repeat it to myself before I fall asleep," he murmurs, his lips brushing the side of Theo's mouth. "I'll say it in the mornings, the moment my eyes open." His fingers toy with the buckle of Theo's belt. "I'll say it when you're long gone from here, and I'm still thinking about what it felt like to kiss you." He presses his lips softly, once, to the bone of Theo's cheek. "I'll say it to myself every time I suspect this place is a hell'scape I'll never escape. I'll say your name, and remember how much I loved being tossed to the flames."

"Corny," Theo chokes out, his hands coiled in Harry's shirt. He can feel the lines that make up the sides of Harry's abdomen, can feel them shifting under his hands. "Was it even your turn to say something stupid?"

"Yes," Harry confirms, "and I'm not done, either."

Theo closes his eyes, aching. "What other stupid shit you got?"

"I think maybe I've been waiting my whole life just to touch you," Harry says, and it is stupid, and shitty, and Theo wants to die. To fucking freeze time and just die—here, now, in Harry's arms, burnt to ash by Harry's warmth, reduced to a puddle of nothing at Harry's feet.

"Touch me, then," Theo says, because he definitely has a death wish.

He wonders if he won't spontaneously collapse.

3:04 a.m.

Theo's face is a fucking masterpiece, a collection of secrets. Along his cheekbone are three freckles, like Orion's belt, all in a line. Harry runs his fingers over them, careful, steady, and lets the pads of his fingers press against the shadows beneath Theo's eyes. There's a wild cacophony of color there, faint bits of purple and green, indicators of sleeplessness, swollen little bruises that mean something keeps Theo up at night, and Harry wants badly to know what it is. To know what he thinks about, to read him like a line in a book, like many lines, like the hidden messages between them. There's a faint scar on Theo's lip, evidence of stitches, and Harry's thumb brushes over it, presses down. At some point in Theo's life he bled there, sliced it open. Something hurt him and so Harry leans forward, kissing him with softness, with kindness, with reverential wonder. He kisses the scar on Theo's lip and pulls away when Theo tries to kiss back, leaving him to stagger forward and brace himself against Harry's hips.

Harry glances down, eyeing where Theo's hands have tightened on him, and nods his approval, turning his attention wordlessly to Theo's shirt. He slides a hand under the lapel, undoes one button at a time. One button, pauses, kisses Theo's chest, just where he can feel a pulse. Another button, another pause, a kiss to the center of Theo's sternum. A third button, brushes his tongue across what he knows, professionally speaking, is the xiphoid process, and slides his hands around Theo's ribs. He looks up, mouth still pressed to Theo's skin, and sees Theo's head falling back, his eyes closing. Another button. Another. He pulls the shirt out from Theo's trousers and lowers himself to his knees, kissing the flat of Theo's stomach. Theo is lean and muscular, slender but strong. Harry buries his thumbs in the lines of Theo's abs and smiles slightly as they flex under his touch, frozen along with Theo's breath.

Theo says nothing as Harry tugs at his belt, loosening it and letting it gape before sliding a thumb over the obvious outline of Theo's cock, which is hard and sort of laughably pressing into Harry's chin. He kisses it through the fabric, licks it, lets his mouth rub against it until Theo is panting, his fingers shifting to tighten in Harry's hair.

Harry looks up, half-smiling, and Theo reaches down, running his thumb over Harry's mouth. Harry bites down lightly, kisses him, pushes his hand away. Not now, he communicates silently, his hand on Theo's zipper. Not now. I'm busy.

Theo is of course wearing impossibly soft boxer-briefs, the fabric such a silken cotton it feels almost a crime to stretch out the elastic, drawing it halfway over Theo's backside. Theo widens his stance, still half-holding his breath, and Harry wants to take his time, but wonders if he'll be able to. Doubts it, actually.

The moment Harry closes his lips around Theo, he can feel the earth beneath him shift. He can feel the world in motion, and he discovers it is quiet now, so quiet he only just hears the sound that leaves Theo's lips—"Harry," Theo whispers, in a way Harry is sure means his own name, at least, will never die.

He welcomes it, whatever comes next. He shifts his hand and rests it on the small of Theo's back, pulling him closer.

When Theo comes, Harry's hand remains in place, holding him steady.

Holding him.
Holding on.

4:15 a.m.

They're on the floor when Theo lifts Harry's shirt, slowly kissing the span of his torso. He's athletic, more so than Theo, and he's littered with old scars, like a museum of trauma. Theo firmly believes among his very few convictions that it is only possible to understand a work of art when it's been looked at, intensely, for thirty entire seconds, and so he takes his time, absorbing each little or not-so-little marking; as if he might have sat on some velvet bench in front of each one, having paid a gratuitous sum just for a ticket to view them.

Harry is art, and a specific kind of art. The kind for which imitation has no value. Some works are better in person, and this is something Theo has the privilege of knowing. Klimt is one of those. Harry is like a Klimt; like The Kiss, which is itself like witnessing splendor. Harry flashes gold in the light, and like the painting, touching him is somehow both religious and pornographic. Theo's touch, aptly, is reverential and primal all at once.

"You're a pretender, aren't you," Harry murmurs, his fingers toying with Theo's hair. "You're a mystery I'd like to solve."

"What am I pretending to be?" Theo asks neutrally, shifting to one side and sliding his hand under Harry's waistband. "Not straight, clearly," he says with a breathy laugh, curling his hand around Harry's cock and delighting in Harry's immediate stuttered inhale.

"Just—something," Harry says, exhaling, as Theo strokes him under his jeans. "I don't—I don't know. You just—" His hips shift under Theo's hand and he leans forward, pulling Theo's mouth to his. "You're not what they think you are," he exhales rapidly into Theo's mouth, and then kisses him until he gasps again, responding to Theo's touch.
"And what do you think I am?" Theo asks, not pulling away. He kisses Harry roughly, enjoying the way Harry's breath falls short. He increases the speed of his hand, too, part of him wanting to laugh at the way this is so juvenile, so hurry up before someone sees, but pushes Harry backwards when he tries to move. He's going to make Harry come like this, flat on his back and powerless, so that Theo can be sure he's capable of bringing Harry to literal, undeniable ecstasy with nothing but his touch.

Harry pants into his mouth, writhing underneath him. "I don't know," he says, digging his nails into the back of Theo's neck, "but I think—I think it, would take a—" He chokes slightly, mouth falling open. "Alifetimetofindout," he finishes rapidly, and then finishes, coming on Theo's hand as Theo leans forward, catching the words on his tongue.

Harry didn't ask what he was, but Theo tells him anyway.

"You're a new moon," Theo says. "You're day one, the first step. You're the toe in the water."

"Just a toe?" Harry asks, his breath slowing gradually as Theo slides his hand out from under his jeans.

"Take off your clothes," Theo advises, and then he adds, because it cannot be avoided, "and you're a fucking cannonball."

5:34 a.m.

The sky starts to go a little pale sometime between moving to Theo's bedroom and hearing Draco enter the suite. Time, it seemed, had flown; it wouldn't have occurred to Harry that it was late (or early, as the case may be) if he hadn't seen the sky changing and proceeded to squint at the clock, trying to make out the shapes of the numbers.

"What time is it?" he asks, reaching for his glasses on Theo's nightstand, but Theo grabs his hand, rolling over him instead.

"Does it matter?" Theo asks, and in answer, Harry shrugs, permits Theo's kiss, and points to the window.

"Seems like maybe we've been up all night," Harry remarks, and Theo frowns.

"Huh," he says, glancing at the clock. "Yeah. I guess so."

"Weird," Harry says. "I've never actually done that before."

"Neither have I," Theo remarks, and falls onto his back. "Huh," he says again, "and I guess I have to drive four hours through the desert today, don't I?"

That information slams into Harry's chest like an anvil.

"Guess so," he says, and strongly wishes he had his glasses on. He wants to know for sure whether there is any hesitation on Theo's face at the thought, or whether that's only his imagination. He wants to count the three freckles by Theo's eye, which he can't see like this. He can see barely anything, though he can count all the places he and Theo are touching, and it isn't nearly enough.

Harry rolls over Theo this time, pulling the duvet with him.

"You should sleep," he says. "And hydrate."
"Or—and hear me out—I could just die in the desert," Theo suggests as an alternative, holding Harry closer, "which would save me the cost of pills."

Suddenly, despite the obvious (i.e., that Harry met Theo less than twenty-four hours ago, and knows nothing else about him other than the fact that he's a too-rich not-an-asshole with a death wish), Harry finds that he can no longer bear the joke.

"How about water instead," Harry advises.

"What if I promise to leave all my earthly possessions to you?" Theo asks, and Harry buries his face in Theo's chest, shaking his head.

"Go to sleep," he says in answer. "Please."

Beneath his lips, Harry can feel Theo's heart beating, steady and comforting and sure.

"Okay," Theo says, and adds, "but only because you said to, and not because I want to."

Harry closes his eyes gratefully as Theo taps an unidentifiable rhythm into his shoulder, beating out something of a melody until it slows, and then gradually stills.

"This hotel isn't so bad," Theo says, just as the sun rises fully in the sky. "Nice pillows."

Harry doesn't answer.

Harry falls asleep in Theo's arms.

11:48 a.m.

There's a loud banging on the door that jolts Theo awake. He blinks, unable to place himself for a moment until Harry groggily raises his head, squinting questioningly at Theo.

"Theo, I've been calling you for almost an hour," Draco growls through the door. "Check-out is in less than fifteen minutes. We have to go."

"Oh, shit," Theo says, glancing at the clock, and Harry reaches over, clumsily placing his glasses on his face. "Yeah, I'll, um—just a minute," he shouts back to Draco. "I'll be right there."

"You'd better," Draco says grumpily, and then Theo catches the sound of him walking away.

"I have work in an hour," Harry sighs, shaking his head and pinching the bridge of his nose. "Though, in fairness, baking in the sun sounds like precisely what I deserve for my misdeeds."

Harry rises to his feet, looking around for his boxers, and Theo sits upright to watch him as he sorts through the pillows on the floor, pausing every now and then to press a steadying hand to his temple. "Jesus," Harry exhales, muttering to himself as he pauses, his entire body centered in the doorway, "I'm getting old."

But Harry isn't old, of course. Not in the slightest. Theo, watching him, feels positively ancient. He feels as if he dragged his own body up from a tomb and is waiting to climb back into it. He watches Harry move,catalogues the muscles of his arms and legs and all the places Theo has kissed all night (all morning). He thinks about the drive back home, the inevitable stop for hangover gyros, the likelihood that Draco will fall asleep having put on some shimmering alternative band with a monosyllabic name, and finds all of it suddenly so oppressively mundane it would be as good as dying, or would at least be like a burial of some kind. The burying of something in himself he's only just awoken.

"Harry," Theo says, and Harry looks over his shoulder, waiting.

Theo holds up a finger for pause and then leans over, picking up the phone.

"Hi. Yeah, I need a late checkout." He listens as the front desk tells him about the extra charge.
"Yeah, that's fine, it's just—I'm going to be late." He glances at Harry, whose mouth twitches up with surprise. "Fuck it," Theo says, covering the phone's mouthpiece and shrugging, "I'm going to be late."

Harry, who has only just found his boxers, crawls across the bed and kisses him, and around the effort of kissing back Theo mumbles his assent into the phone.

"Yes. Yeah. Okay." He struggles to replace the phone in the receiver, letting Harry shove him back on the bed just before he turns his cell phone on. "Hope you can spare an hour," Theo says, and Harry holds on tighter for a moment; holds on, and doesn't let go.

"Yeah," Harry says, and it's more than enough.

Theo knows he will never be this young, or this in love, or this terribly, unbearably wanting again, and he knows he can't fucking waste it. Because this fucking second, this very moment is fleeting.

It's rare, and it won't come around again.

"NOTT," Draco bellows. "Did you just text me that we're staying another hour?"

"You must have a death wish," Harry remarks, glancing over his shoulder at the door, but Theo merely kisses him again.

"Yeah," Theo says, ignoring Draco's voice and pulling Harry close. "Yeah. I definitely do."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Full disclosure, I wrote the first part of this one shot while I was still a little drunk from a poolside piña colada. Anyway, future things: How to Win Friends and Influence People is ending with a final chapter + epilogue this week, which means a new Dramione WIP is starting! The expansion of Paradox (chapter 66, though no need to re-read, as the WIP will include material from the oneshot) will begin next week. In this fic, I have three new stories coming shortly-ish: a supernatural Tomione, a space Dramione, and a Highlander Jily, most likely in that order. Thank you for reading!

The Commoner's Guide to Bedding a Royal

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione)

Universe: Muggle AU

Rating: M

Summary: Objectively speaking, Hermione Granger knows that Britain has a monarchy, and that Prince Draco (the grandson of the current King of England) is probably floating around somewhere living his royal life in total unrelation to hers. Contrary to popular belief, she doesn't actually pay much attention to celebrities; least of all foreign princes. So, when she happens to be placed in his dorm at Hogwarts University during her semester abroad, she doesn't really expect to be Prince Draco's friend—which is probably best, as 'friend' isn't really what either of them have in mind.

Draco and Hermione: A Royal Love Story
By Rita Skeeter

While many of us here in Britain have been captivated by the blossoming romance between His Royal Highness Prince Draco of Wales and his American sweetheart, Miss Hermione Jean Granger, very few are privileged to know the true story about how the young couple met. A fairy tale from the very beginning, it was love at first sight when Draco took notice of Hermione, the daughter of hardworking American parents eager to give their only child the education they had both been denied by curses of circumstance. At the time, Hermione had risen to the top of her class at Stanford University in sun-kissed, tropical California, and was granted acceptance as a foreign exchange student to Hogwarts University. Needless to say, the effervescently pretty Hermione, along with several would-be hopefuls who'd learned of Prince Draco's enrollment, was lucky enough to come across the dashing young royal in her classes — though her academics were, of course, her primary concern.

Both fastidious, intensely dedicated students, Draco first caught sight of Hermione's luxurious silken curls in their English Literature class at Hogwarts, and from there, a whirlwind courtship between two intellectual equals began. It is said by their peers that Draco was enamored with Hermione from the start, and as anyone close to him would be quick to confess, the prince has known with absolute certainty from the moment he laid eyes upon Hermione that she was meant to be his wife, his confidante, and ultimately, his Queen.

Stop. Stop reading. This is absolute rubbish. Yes, I said rubbish, even though I'm an American and apparently a peasant, too (my parents are dentists, and certainly not 'cursed by circumstance,' but sure). Two months ago Rita Skeeter was openly calling me 'the frizzy colonial upstart,' and now this ABOMINABLE TROSS has been released? Let me tell you, it was hardly the fairy tale she claims. It was only a fairy tale in that I did occasionally want to saw off my own effervescent toes.

In reality, the British press has been absolutely ruthless. Even Draco, despite his signature capacity for appearing collected, has been known to have a cold sweat or two over what his father (yes, that would be HRH Lucius, Prince of Wales, Earl of Chester, Duke of Cornwall, Duke of Rothesay, Earl of Carrick, Baron of Renfrew, Lord of the Isles and Prince and Great Steward of Scotland, in case you were wondering) calls a 'truly abysmal union.' Absolute certainty? What a joke. What an absolute forking joke. What utter motherboarding nonsense. I don't think Draco was ever really certain; not even when he was down on one knee, struggling beneath a diamond the size of New Zealand while I shouted the last of my once-beloved profanities. Was he certain he loved me, at least? Oh yes, definitely, I trust that. I trust that absolutely, or else I would have gone positively flanking insane by now. But was he ever certain that his country would accept me? That's another matter altogether, which is what makes this whole Rita Skeeter book bollocks to the highest degree of bollockery.

Do you want the real story? Maybe you don't, as it's a bit of a mess, despite what Rita so feverishly insists. I'm a bit of a mess, actually, and frankly so is Draco (no matter what the newspapers would have you believe), but considering I'm sitting here in a haute couture wedding dress staring down the barrel of a truly earth-shattering scandal, I'm sort of in the mood for truth; so maybe you, like me, have no choice in the matter. The thing is, once upon a time, I fell deeply, inescapably (tragically) in love with a man and subsequently had to learn how to be the consort of a prince, which mostly meant learning that truth may only out on occasions less frequent than bank holidays. But for once in my gourd-drammed life, I want to say something real—so here's what really happened, in all its terrible, awkward, humiliating glory.

Here's how I, the Colonial Upstart, accidentally bagged myself the most eligible man in Britain.

August 30, 2010
Hogwarts University

Well, there was no escaping it. Hogwarts was a castle. A castle with many stairs, and Hermione, a girl with many suitcases, was encountering the first of her very many problems. She eyed the staircase, frowning, before glancing down at her bags, wondering if it would be possible to carry one of them on her back. Apparently there wasn't anyone around to help; hazards of arriving before term officially started, she lamented internally.

"Excuse me," came a voice behind her. "Are you by chance trying to grow an extra arm?"

She turned, startled, to find a tall young man standing there, his lips curled up in something of an arrogant (albeit playful) smirk. He was dressed somewhat formally (more formally than anyone at Stanford had ever dressed, aside from the tech fanboys who lived in Sperry boat shoes and those slightly-too-short coral-colored shorts) and looking at her with amusement. His pale blond hair was swept off to the side, a hint of strands falling across his forehead as if he'd just popped in from some sort of high-class sport on horses, and he was cute. Very cute.

Hermione, on the other hand, was very not, given that the messy bun piled atop her head was much more a show of convenience than fashion. Luckily, she was also very distracted, and therefore unable to focus on how cute or not-cute either of them happened to be.

"Is that an option?" Hermione asked, frowning slightly at her bags. "I'm beginning to think I miscalculated. I sort of just got out of the cab," she explained, gesturing vacantly over her shoulder, "and didn't really think to bribe the driver into helping."

"Well, for future reference, extortion always works," remarked the blond, his accent as airy and crisp as the unseasonable breeze outside. "Though we do consider ourselves a country of gentlemen. Perhaps you might have heard?"
"You're the first I've met," Hermione replied. "Countrymen, I mean," she amended, waving a hand around the empty courtyard, "not gentlemen."

His smirk curved up slightly. "Is that an accusation?"

"Gentlemen do carry bags, don't they?" she prompted, and he chuckled, sparing her a genial shrug.

"Well, I suppose I have something to prove, then," he determined, hoisting her duffel bag over his shoulder and taking the larger of her suitcases, "on behalf of my country, that is. I'm Draco, by the way," he added, shoving the bag over to extend his right hand. "And you must be some sort of foreign succubus, seeing how you've talked me into manual labor. You're the exchange student, I take it?"

"Hermione," she confirmed, giving his hand a quick pulse of pressure before picking up the last of her suitcases, "and yes. I just got off a plane, actually—though I can't imagine what could be giving me away," she remarked drily, wondering if she shouldn't have checked for sweat stains. The Stanford t-shirt she'd opted to wear on the plane wasn't exactly flattering so much as it was… old. And vaguely ill-fitted. She gave herself a testing sniff as discreetly as possible before turning her attention back to him.

"Hold on, isn't Draco the prince's name?" she asked, abruptly registering a hazy sense of recognition. She fuzzily considered she might have seen the name plastered on a tabloid or two while standing in line for groceries, though she was fairly confident the British prince was older. He certainly looked solemnly regal in all the pictures she'd seen. "Coincidence or namesake?"

"I believe it was a very popular choice the year I was born," Draco remarked, gesturing ahead as a series of stairs branched off in several different directions. "So, which dorm?"

"Um—" She glanced down at the informational packet in her hand. "Slytherin?"

"Ah, excellent," Draco said, beckoning her ahead. "The dorms are down under the lake. I take it you're filling Tracey Davis' spot, then?"

"Yes," Hermione confirmed with a frown, "I think."

"Well, you'll like your roommate," Draco assured her. "Daph's great. The good kind of posh," he added as an afterthought.

"The good kind?" Hermione echoed uncertainly.

"Yes. Pansy is, of course, the bad kind. She's a very dear friend," he informed her, "and Blaise is much, much worse. He's also disastrously charming, so do be careful."

"Ah," Hermione said, momentarily dizzied. "Who else should I know about?"

"Well, there's Theo," Draco supplied thoughtfully, guiding her through the winding old corridors of the castle. "He's one of those old-money-nobility types. We all have a bit of a wager going as to whether he and Daphne will kill each other or get married."

"Sometimes they're not mutually exclusive options," Hermione remarked, following as he made his way to a set of enormous iron doors.

"Well, I'll put you down for both, then," Draco said with a cheeky grin, pausing to pull a set of keys out of his pocket. "Sorry," he said, shuffling through a set of them, "security's a bit tight down here."
"I see that," Hermione commented, as he finally seemed to jimmy the old door open, gesturing her inside. "Any particular reason?"

"Oh, none, I'm sure," Draco replied casually, pointing up a set of winding stairs. "Yours and Daph's room is up there. People sometimes study here," he explained, gesturing to the still-empty seating, which was about what Hermione had expected. The other students would be arriving en masse in approximately two days, according to the administrative guide at Hogwarts; Hermione, however, had wanted to acclimate in advance. "More often the library, but this can be nice on occasion. Convenient, at least."

"I take it you're in this dorm too?" Hermione asked, following him as he briskly took to the stairs. The common room, as it appeared to be, was lit by a large, warm fire, and provided a strange, almost eerie view of the lake. "I suppose I should have asked—"

"Yes," Draco said. "It's the only one successfully bulletproof, I think."

"Bulletproof?" Hermione echoed. "Are you some sort of secret agent, then?"

He laughed. "Only a little," he assured her, and paused beside a door, knocking twice. "Daphne," he called, sparing Hermione another small grin, "I have a parcel for you."

The door swung open, revealing a breathless girl dressed in perfectly-fitted jeans and a worn Hogwarts t-shirt, her long auburn hair pulled back in a high ponytail that swung down over her shoulders.

"Is she here? Is she—oh good," the girl apparently called Daphne exhaled, looking over Hermione with glowing approval. "Look at you, you're real! And already putting the crown to work," she joked to Draco as Hermione paused, startled. "And to think, we're considered the imperialists—"

"Wait a minute," Hermione said, blinking with confusion at the reference. It seemed jet lag had vastly limited her cognitive skills. "You're actually… the Draco?"

"Oh balls, she doesn't even know," Daphne sighed happily to no one in particular, ostensibly delighted. "You're a real live person, aren't you?" she asked Hermione again, tugging her inside before glancing over her shoulder. "Draco, set those down, you look positively ridiculous. Was there no one else to help with the bags?"

"I haven't a clue, Lady Daphne," Draco replied grandly, letting Hermione's duffel bag slide gracefully from his shoulder to the floor before setting the suitcase down beside it, "but it's certainly been an honor serving as ambassador on behalf of my country, Miss…?"

It took a moment before Hermione realized he (him, actual Prince Draco, whom she probably should have recognized but didn't, because who ever expects the actual prince to be wandering around?) was waiting for an answer.

"Oh, um. Granger," she supplied, wondering now if she was supposed to have curtsied. "And you, uh. Prince, um—"

"Draco will be fine," he assured her, looking mischievously pleased. "And don't bother about gratuity. Just be sure to leave a little extra on your taxes," he suggested, "or I'll have to charge you with treason, and frankly, who has the time?"

"He's joking," Daphne assured Hermione, rolling her eyes at Draco. "Still coming out for drinks with us this evening, Your Royal Highness?"
"Have an engagement with the Prince of Darkness, actually," Draco replied coolly, as Daphne made a sympathetic face, "along with your sister, who's been ringing me nonstop about, I don't know. Dresses, I suppose, or possibly hats—"

"Ah, I'd forgotten about that dinner," Daphne said, deflating slightly. "I suppose that means Theo and Harry are out too, aren't they? I'd hoped they'd come meet Hermione tonight," she lamented, flashing Hermione a look of apology, "but I suppose duty calls—"

"Unfortunately duty not only calls, but veritably drags," Draco lamented, before suggesting hopefully, "Tomorrow night? Before term starts?"

"Oh, of course," Daphne confirmed, warm again. "And I can ring my sister for you, if you want," she offered, as Draco made a face of obvious relief, "but do tell Theo to wear a better jacket this time, would you?"

To that, Draco scoffed. "You tell Theo to wear a jacket—"

"He doesn't listen to me!"

"He only listens to you—"

"Actually, you know who he'll listen to is—"

"—Pansy," they said in unison, and then gave gloriously dazzling peals of laughter, both clearly in on a joke Hermione had yet to understand.

"She'd scare the knickers off anyone," Daphne explained to Hermione, who abruptly realized she'd been staring between them with something equal parts curiosity and bemusement. "You'll meet her later. Though, try not to look her in the eyes when you do."

"Yes, you'll almost certainly turn to stone," Draco said, and then offered her a nod. "Until next time, Miss Granger—"

"Oh right, um, bye…" Hermione trailed off, uncertain what to call him, and he laughed again, consummately tickled.

"Draco," he reminded her. "Just Draco, unless we're at a ribbon cerem- ah, hold on, seems it's too late for you to handle this for me, Daph," he mused to her, pulling his cell phone out of his pocket and holding it to his ear. "Yes, hello, you've reached Draco Wales," he said into it, sparing Hermione a wink and Daphne a wave before ducking out of their door frame. "Astoria, I'm joking. Half the job is elaborate theatrics, you know this—"

"Well," Daphne said, letting the door fall shut in Draco's absence and turning to Hermione with a smile. "I see you've met the future King of England, then?"

"Does he really just—wander around like that?" Hermione asked, slightly dazed, and Daphne shook her head.

"No, almost never, actually, but term hasn't officially started, so…" She trailed off with a shrug before permitting a long exhale, offering Hermione a brilliant, lovely smile. "I have to say, it's such a pleasure to meet you."

"Oh, and you," Hermione said, recalling with a start just how apprehensive she'd been about her roommate up until minutes before she'd walked in. The benefit of having accidentally bullied the nation's heir into carrying her bags was that she'd temporarily abandoned her nerves, but now she was here, finally, tucked into an old dorm room with a girl she'd just met and hoped to live harmoniously with for at least the next four months. "It was so nice of you to send me a letter before term started—"

"Ah, I was worried you'd find it dreadfully formal, but it's my breeding, I'm afraid," Daphne told her, ushering her further inside the room and gesturing to the fixtures. "Desk, bed, vacant floorspace for aerobics and interpretive dance," she joked, giving Hermione the grand tour. "My grandfather would absolutely have a heart attack if he knew the positively shameful plebeianism I'm living in," she added with a light-hearted shrug, "but I suppose that's the benefit of him being dead."

"Are you—" Hermione hesitated. "Um. Nobility also?"

"Only barely," Daphne said with a laugh, "though it's enough for my sister to formally date Draco with Prince Lucifer's approval, it seems. Of course, who knows how long that'll last—"

"Lucifer?" Hermione asked.

"Oh, sorry, bit of a slip on my part," Daphne sighed, scolding herself. "Prince Lucius, though Draco and Harry both call him—well, you heard, I hardly have to repeat it—"

"Harry?" Hermione echoed. "As in—"

"Henry, Duke of… whatever he's duke of these days," Daphne said, frowning. "Grimmauld now? I think? Everyone calls him Prince Harry, which is of course not remotely accurate, but it helps Draco to not have all the focus from the press, so—ah, I'm rambling," she lamented, cutting herself off with a shake of her head. "Apologies, you must be tired. Are you tired? I can show you around the school," she offered, and then frowned. "Unless you'd prefer to rest, in which case I could rustle up some tea? Unless you don't drink tea—"

"Daphne," Hermione exhaled, half-laughing. "I'm fine. A tour would be great," she added, as Daphne's expression lit up with pleasure. "It's really nice of you to offer."

"Tracey and I weren't particularly friends," Daphne explained tentatively. "But I suppose I'm quite used to having a girlfriend around, given my growing up with a sister, so…" She trailed off. "I'm rather hoping to have another go at it. If you're up for it, that is."

Hermione wished she could express the degree of relief she felt at this, a highly vulnerable offering from a pretty rich girl who could have so easily snubbed her. Daphne would have made the most popular girls at Carondelet look like absolute trolls, and yet she was far kinder than any of the girls Hermione had gone to high school with.

"I'm an only child, personally, and I always thought it would be fun to have a sister," Hermione assured her. "Besides, my last roommate wasn't much to compete with. Actually, she stole my underwear, so—"

"You're joking," Daphne said, looking horrified. "She thieved your knickers?"

"She thieved my knickers," Hermione confirmed solemnly. "In fairness, it was for a Take Back the Night rally, but still—"

"Well, I don't know why I'm trying so hard, then," Daphne noted, looking smugly pleased. "At the very least, I can confirm I possess my own knickers and have no particular desperation for yours."

"So it's settled, then," Hermione said, holding out a hand and forgetting all about the prince who'd carried her luggage. "Friends?"

Daphne accepted with a luminous smile. "Friends."

The Hog's Head wasn't quite as nice as the Three Broomsticks, Daphne explained, but it was at least quiet enough that nobody was going to have a fuss about all of them being there. Draco wouldn't be there, she'd reminded Hermione, but photographers would still try. It was apparently not a particularly well-kept secret who the prince's inner circle was.

"He grew up with Pansy," Daphne clarified as they each ordered a pint of richly brown beer Hermione was sure would be much too thick to go down easy, "and Harry, obviously, and Theo, but—ah, rats," she sighed, the beer slopping over the glass and onto her wrist. "Honestly, one of these days my coordination will improve—anyway, what was I blathering on about?"

"Theo," Hermione supplied, and a voice behind her chuckled.

"Well, I do love to know you're talking about me, Greengrass," remarked a lanky dark-haired man, his mouth quirking up in something of a half-smile. He offered Daphne a wink in greeting, and Hermione abruptly remembered the wager Draco had so carelessly mentioned to her. "Discussing my unconventional attractiveness, I take it? Perhaps my ebullient charm?"

"More like your incestuous family tree," Daphne replied, turning to roll her eyes. "Hermione, this is Theodore Nott. Theodore, Hermione Granger."

"Ah, the new Tracey Davis," Theo said as Hermione gave his proffered hand a perfunctory shake. "And also, never call me Theodore. That's my father's name, as Greengrass here knows perfectly well. She lives to torment me," he remarked, flashing Hermione a conspiratorial grin.

"It's not my primary vocation," Daphne assured Hermione, "but really, everyone should have a hobby. Even though using your given name is hardly a torment," she informed Theo, with a particularly challenging glare.

Theo, meanwhile, took Daphne's beer out of her hand, permitting himself a long, obnoxious sip before replacing it. "I meant that dress you're wearing," he remarked quietly, and though Hermione caught a momentary degree of widening from Daphne's eyes, it was quickly obscured by the entrance of another, much noisier body to their right.

"Ah, is this the new Tracey Davis?" asked a spectacularly attractive dark-skinned young man, whose overall appearance was hindered slightly by a v-neck cut nearly below his pectorals. "I thought you were coming from California," he remarked with a bemused frown, as Daphne cleared her throat, shoving her beer into Theo's chest and nudging him away.

"Just have that, Nott, it's got your germs on it now—and Blaise, you mustn't be such a glorious idiot," she scolded him firmly. "Why wouldn't she be from California?"

"Well, shouldn't she be, I don't know—more tan? Or more blonde?" Blaise asked irreverently, before turning back to Hermione. "I don't suppose you had class on the beach, did you?"

"I go to Stanford," Hermione said, stifling a laugh. "It's not exactly beachy."

"So does that mean you don't surf to school?" Blaise asked, looking disappointed, and Hermione was about to open her mouth to inform him that first of all, surfing wasn't a mode of transportation, and second of all, what did she just say, when yet another person joined them—or was about to join them, though Daphne pulled her aside in warning first.
"That's Pansy," Daphne explained, gesturing to a slender young women with one of those elegant long bobs Hermione would never be able to pull off, the sharp raven tips of her hair slicing against the defined line of her clavicle. "She's got about six names and none of them are worth hearing all in a row, but suffice it to say—"

"She's about one or two major flu epidemics away from the throne," Theo supplied, "and if you ask me, she's in desperate need of coitus."

"I—sorry, what?" Hermione asked, as Daphne gave Theo an alarmingly ferocious glare of disapproval.

"She's really not so bad when you get to know her," Daphne clarified hurriedly. "The problem is just that she, um—"

"Detests when people are talking about me behind my back," Pansy inserted coolly, joining them with something of a disinterested scowl. "You're new, then," she noted with a sniff, acknowledging the air around Hermione before glancing away at nothing.

"The word Daphne was looking for was 'bitch,'" Theo whispered-declared to Hermione, and Pansy rounded on him, obviously less than amused.

"Theodore," she said, and he instantly blanched. "Did you wear the jacket?"

From Blaise: "Yes. Didn't you see the pictures?"

From Theo: "For the record, I only wore it because it complimented my singular muscularity."

From Daphne: a wordless scoff, though Hermione caught her looking.

From Pansy again, impatiently: "You're going to have to learn to follow instructions, Nott."

From an indignant Theo: "Why? I'm not the one trying to bed a prince—"

Pansy, irritably: "Good thing, too, because at this rate, you certainly wouldn't succeed."

Blaise, delighted: "Another crushing blow from Lady Parkinson! What is that, twenty points?"

Theo, pouting: "I thought this was about my jacket, not my flaws as a human."

Pansy: "It's about both. And anyway, you're not the Daily Prophet, Theodore, don't make this about Astoria—"

"They're talking about my sister now, unfortunately," Daphne whispered to Hermione, who was very much amusing herself watching Pansy and Theo have something of a highly British standoff, neither quite challenging the other. "Tonight was Astoria's second public event as Draco's, um. Female friend," she murmured, and this time, it was Theo who scoffed.

"Ridiculous, the whole thing," Theo informed Hermione. "The whole 'relationship' is a sham. I mean we all know Prince Lucif—"

"Don't," warned Pansy, tartly.

"His Royal Highness, the Prince of Darkness," Theo amended irreverently, "is practically falling over himself with approval. He tried to force you on Draco when he first started here," he reminded Daphne, pointedly taking a sip of his beer as her gaze cut guiltily to Hermione's.
"And here you made it sound like you were hardly aristocratic at all," Hermione commented playfully, sipping at her own beer. It wasn't quite as bad as she expected, but more importantly, she was perfectly able to drink it despite not being twenty-one for the next three weeks. That, at least, tasted satisfying.

"Well, I certainly have no interest in being with a prince," Daphne said firmly. "Besides, Draco and I didn't even meet until university, so it's hardly like I'm in with the rest of you," she pointed out, gesturing to the others as they exchanged clannish grins (except for Pansy, who made more of a pursed and-don't-I-know-it face).

"How about being with someone prince-adjacent, then, Daph?" Blaise asked her, nudging Theo with a wink.

"Theo's not remotely prince-adjacent," Pansy scoffed, coming to Daphne's rescue. "At least four dozen people would have to die before he came anywhere near the crown—"

"Well, I'm not a coward, if that's what you're saying," Theo assured her.

Theo shrugged. "People have really gone soft on treason these days," he remarked, taking another sip of his (her) beer. "If I can't pluck the crown up from a battlefield, what's even the point of having it?"

"My opinion exactly," came another voice. "Of course, I suppose that's due to being the spare."

"You're hardly the spare," Pansy said, rolling her eyes, though even she managed to look a little affectionate as the latest member of their little circle joined in, giving his ruffled black hair a shove from his face. "And what are you doing back so early? One of these days you'll have to put the incessant knavery to bed—"

"Along with the rest of Britain," Theo remarked, grinning.

"Ah, that's ten for Nott," Blaise said, scribbling it an imaginary notepad as the person Hermione suddenly realized from her minimal tabloid exposure was Prince Harry (in reality only a duke, as Daphne had mentioned, though in general Hermione was finding herself a bit swamped with ambiguous British succession lines) shifted to throw an arm around Pansy's shoulder, smacking a loud kiss against her forehead.

"Hello, Lady MacBeth," he told her, sparing her a roguish grin. "Besmirching my good name already?"

"Much as I love that extremely flattering comparison," Pansy said drily, "never call me that again. As for your good name, I'm besmirching nothing you haven't irreversibly blackened," she corrected, sliding out from under his arm and giving him a nudge in the ribs. "I'm merely commenting you're supposed to be at a state dinner."

"They don't need me," Harry said. "Besides, I don't see you asking Theo why he's here—"

"You both left Draco alone with that dreadful bore?" Pansy realized, appalled.

From Daphne: "That 'dreadful bore' is my sister, Pans."

From Theo and Blaise: "She knows."
"Draco's fine," Harry assured Pansy. "He and the Prince of Darkness were getting along swimmingly when I left. I believe they successfully exchanged one or two words? One of which may have even been a pleasantry."

"But was he doing the thing?" Pansy prompted apprehensively. "You know. The smile thing?"

From Theo: "The thing where his smile doesn't reach his eyes?"

From Blaise: "Where it looks like his soul has evacuated his body?"

Theo again: "A bit like he's died somewhere on the inside?"

"Yes, that," Pansy said.

"Oh, definitely," Harry confirmed, nodding. "Very much so to all of the above."

"Right, yes, he's miserable," Theo contributed, "but it's not as if the press is going to know that, which is what I assumed your main concern was."

From Pansy, at a growl: "You're all impossible."

From Blaise, Theo, and Harry, in spirited unison: "We know."

"Oh," Harry said, his gaze suddenly landing on Hermione's with a jolt. "Well, hello—didn't see you there."

"She's not a topiary, Harry," Daphne said.

"Well, maybe if she were, he might have noticed her sooner," Theo suggested, giving Daphne another nudge. "Harry loves a good topiary."

"Shut up," Daphne sighed.

"I'm Hermione," supplied Hermione, as Harry slipped from Pansy's side to stand next to her at the bar. "I'm the new Tracey Davis."

"Who?" Harry asked, frowning.

"Oh, Harry's not in Slytherin," Daphne explained to Hermione, reaching over to give Harry's cheek an affectionate pat in greeting. "He just pops by to visit when he feels like antagonizing Draco."

"Which I often do," Harry added with a grin. "Though I suppose now I can pop by to antagonize you as well," he commented, slipping almost effortlessly into a low tone of flirtation as he spared her a slow, sidelong glance. "Lucky me."

All at once, Hermione realized why it was Harry's face she recognized from the tabloids. _He_ was the one always romancing some actress or model or another, and while she might have otherwise been flattered by the attention of an obviously handsome man, part of her withered a little at the idea that he might have selected her, the naive little American girl, as yet another notch on his bedpost.

Luckily, to Hermione's immense relief, Daphne smacked him in the arm with her clutch.

"Ouch," Harry said, with a radiantly childish scowl. "What's that for?"
"Leave the poor girl alone," Pansy cut in, her expression souring. "The last thing she needs is to be forcefully ushered out of your disease-ridden bedchambers."

Hermione, who wanted to point out that was hardly the trajectory of the evening, determined it not worth the effort as Pansy's gaze collided with hers, the sharpened arch of a single brow enough to caution her to silence. Something that was either disapproval or Chanel No. Five seemed to seep from every single one of Pansy's perfectly-sized and blemishless pores, leaving Hermione feeling more than a little bit inadequate.

"Ignore her," Daphne advised in Hermione's ear, pulling her towards the bar. "She's just outrageously protective of Draco and Harry—not that you can tell. She's sometimes very lovely, but—" She paused, considering it. "I'd say her personality is about a fifty-fifty split between natural venom and a very, very strange form of showing affection."

"Is she interested in…" Hermione paused. "Either of them?"

"Hm? No, no," Daphne said, half-laughing. "No, I don't think she relishes the idea of being thrown in the spotlight. Nor do I, truth be told," she admitted with a grimace. "My sister is another story, of course. Like Theo said, I don't think it'll last with Draco, but I suppose she's having fun for the time being."

"Where does Harry go to school, if not here?" Hermione asked, regretfully hazarding a glance at where he'd joined Blaise and Theo near the impromptu dance floor. To her dismay, he was watching her with a rather fox-like look of amusement, his messy hair giving him an unruly halo from the light refracting around his face.

"He doesn't," Daphne said. "He's in the army, actually, which is where Draco wanted to be as well, only…" She trailed off hesitantly. "Well, you can't really be too careful with the heir to the throne, can you? Whereas Harry's a cousin, who can really do whatever he likes."

"Seems he often does," Hermione remarked, and then struggled to hide an enormous yawn, covering her mouth with sudden, jolting exhaustion. "Yikes," she managed, feeling her eyes water. "I'm so sorry—"

"Nonsense, you must be tired," Daphne said at once, looking feverishly concerned in a way that nearly delivered Hermione to delirious laughter. "We can go immediately, of course. I suppose I forgot all about the jet lag—"

"Greengrass!" Theo called, toasting her from afar as he and Blaise made their way onto the dance floor. "Are you coming or what?"

"No, I'm—" Daphne gestured apologetically to Hermione. "We're just leaving—"

"NOOOOOOO," Blaise howled, as Theo flashed a set of mopey puppy-eyes at her. "MINUS TWENTY POINTS—"

"So sorry," Daphne sighed, angling Hermione towards the door despite being unable to resist a glance over her shoulder, unsuccessfully feigning disinterest. "It's just that we haven't seen each other all summer—but we'll see them tomorrow anyway," she reminded Hermione, forcing a casual reassurance, "so it's fine, really—"

"You stay," Hermione told her, struggling to withhold another vastly cavernous yawn. "Seriously, I'll be fine. I'll get some sleep tonight and try again tomorrow," she offered, as Daphne frowned hesitantly.
"Are you sure?" Daphne asked, concerned. "It's not a problem, really, I'll just tell them that—"

"No, stay," Hermione insisted, giving her hand a squeeze. "I'll be fine! The walk will do me some good, honestly. Have fun," she said, dodging both the curious glance from Harry and the unnerving stare from Pansy as she turned towards the door. "Seriously," she added with a laugh as Daphne's expression turned pained with conflict. "Breakfast tomorrow?"

At once, Daphne's face brightened. "Oh yes, defi-"

She broke off with a shriek as Blaise picked her up with an arm around her waist, gracelessly hauling her backwards. Satisfied, Hermione gave an exaggerated wave, shaking her head before turning to the door and hiding yet another oppressive yawn.

Hermione had only just finished fussing with the keys when she realized the yelling she thought she'd imagined in some sort of exhaustion-haze was both very real and very much coming from inside the Slytherin common room.

"—don't know what you want from me. You told me to bring her, so I brought her. That doesn't mean I'm interested in this going any further—"

"You need to be serious about your reputation, Draco," came a harsh male voice in reply. "With you holed up here at Hogwarts the press has nothing to do but speculate about what sort of wildly irresponsible decisions you're making—"

"And how is that my fault?" Draco's voice countered. "You're the one who told me I had to come here. Harry's already been in the military for almost three years! He's already an officer, and I'm—"

"You have a responsibility as my heir," returned what could only have been Prince Lucius' voice. "You cannot simply flit around turning your life into a spectacle for public consumption. The people want to see you in a committed relationship, with someone appropriate—"

"I'm twenty years old!" Draco shouted back. "What exactly does it prove about my capacity to rule by flashing Astoria Greengrass around like some sort of... of fancy cufflink—"

"She comes from a good family," Lucius cut in impatiently. "You're friends with the elder sister, are you not? How hard can this be?" When there was no answer, he pressed, "I had no idea being asked to stand beside a beautiful girl was such a dreadfully unpleasant chore for you, Draco—"

"I just want one thing in my life to be real," Draco begged his father, "and I certainly have no interest in getting married anytime soon! Look what happened to M—"

"Do not," Lucius said sharply, "bring her up right now."

Silence.

Hermione crept forward slowly, trying to ease her way into the room. Unfortunately, this did not work even remotely, as she stubbed her toe on one of the spindly table legs and abruptly doubled over, muttering a string of quiet obscenities under her breath.

Immediately, the two men snapped into place. In a matter of seconds, both had adopted identical expressions of neutral impassivity that could only have been the result of decades of practice. Hermione, however, having had no such lifetime of rehearsals, tried and failed to bite back a pained grimace, awkwardly attempting to straighten.
"So sorry," she offered, cheeks almost certainly flushed with equal parts ouch-throbbing-toe and yikes-this-is-awkward. "I, um—I'm so sorry, I was just heading to my room, and—"

"No need to apologize," said Lucius, in the sort of tone that suggested exactly the opposite. "Draco, you and I will discuss this later. I presume I don't need to ask you to keep this to yourself?"

It took a moment before Hermione realized he was talking to her. "What?"

"I'll need you to sign a non-disclosure agreement," Lucius began loftily when Draco stepped forward, shaking his head.

"Father, it's fine," he muttered, tone gruff with displeasure. "She's going to bed, not to run off and speak to the press."

At that, Lucius turned to his son, obviously irritated. "Draco. How many times must I tell you—"

"I won't say anything," Hermione cut in quickly. By the look on Lucius' face, she could see he was not often interrupted, and certainly wasn't pleased about it now. "Your son is my friend," she said, giving Draco what she hoped was a supportive glance, "and I have no interest in sharing the details of his personal life."

Rather than help the situation, however, she seemed to have conspicuously hindered it. Lucius' eyes narrowed, falling on hers with rigid opposition.

"Who are you?" he demanded accusingly.

She opened her mouth, but Draco spoke for her.

"This is her dorm, Father," Draco pointed out, "and we're the ones intruding. And seeing as Hermione's just arrived today, I imagine she's rather in a hurry to go to bed. We won't keep you any longer," he assured her, giving her an apologetic look as he added, in a tone of princely finality, "My father was just leaving."

At that, Lucius' eyes narrowed again, trapped by the necessity of anything resembling manners. He spared a final glower at his son before turning to exit, pausing briefly beside Hermione.

"If you breathe a word of this," he said, and didn't finish. She supposed he wasn't in the business of needing to complete his threats.

"I wouldn't do that to him," she replied simply, and then managed to collect herself enough to bow her head, realizing she was probably required to show some courtesy, even if she felt none.

Lucius made something of a noncommittal noise and strode out of the room, letting the door shut behind him.

The moment he was gone, Draco finally let out a breath, shaking his head.

"Well," Draco said. "I don't suppose I need to tell you that you just met Prince Lucius, do I?"

Hermione winced, and Draco fell into the sofa behind him with a sigh, leaning his head against the cushions. For a moment, she hesitated, wondering if there was something she should say, but when he didn't move, she opted to take a step toward the stairs, quietly making her way back to her room.

Draco's voice paused her. "You faced him rather gloriously, you know." She froze, and he gave a little hum of something like amusement to himself. "I expect he'll hold it against you for some
"I—" She hesitated. "I'm not sure whether an apology note would help the situation."

At that, Draco chuckled, though there wasn't much energy to speak of in the sound. Hermione waited, her hand still on the banister; suddenly, she couldn't quite remember how tired she was and simply stood frozen in place, uncertain what to do next.

He solved it for her. "Did you really not know who I was?"

She turned slowly, making her way to the sofa as Draco's eyes fluttered open, regarding her with something that looked to be equal parts frustration and jagged, cut-open misery.

"I promise," she said, "I really did not know who you were."

He nodded. She had a feeling there was more coming, so she settled herself on the coffee table opposite where he sat, figuring it wouldn't cost her too much to listen.

"You know, it's funny," Draco said, proving her right. "The last spontaneous thing I did was carry your luggage. Before that, it was the time I climbed up a trellis outside my mother's childhood home and broke my arm." He swallowed. "I was five."

Hermione bit her lip, waiting.

"I suppose it's incredibly selfish to complain," Draco continued, "as there are so very many lives harder than mine. And so many who envy my life, I'm sure. It seems a very stupid thing to feel so much resentment when I have so many privileges, and it makes it worse, really, that it's such a selfish problem to have," he admitted softly, glancing up at her. "It makes it hard to breathe sometimes, knowing that nothing I do comes without strings, or without responsibilities, or even with the benefit of my choice. In the end, everything I do is measured and premeditated and preapproved by my father or my advisors or my grandfather—and my god, I want to kiss you," he suddenly said, and she blinked, startled. "I want so badly to kiss you, I wanted to kiss you when I saw you this morning, only I can't, because even now I'm thinking to myself that I won't want to stop at a kiss, but I certainly can't go any further, because would that really be fair to you? Would it be fair to subject you to constant scrutiny and horrible invasions of privacy and can I even—could I even do it? My father would disapprove; my grandfather would certainly never allow it. You're an American, and you've only just arrived, and that's to say nothing of your feelings, which could be—"

He swallowed hard, coming to an abrupt, screeching halt. "Which could be," he exhaled slowly, "that I'm a conceited prick who just said all of that without even wondering whether you might have any inclination to kiss me, too."

Despite her captive breath, Hermione astoundingly managed to exhale.

Eventually.

After perhaps a minute.

Maybe less, if she were flattering herself.

Either way, she managed it.

"It would be a pretty bad time for a kiss," she eventually said, clinging to whatever bits of her sanity had not been swallowed up by transcontinental travel, or by what was unquestionably the single strangest day of her life. "Considering you have some sort of girlfriend-type situation, don't you?"

He grimaced, baring his hands in his lap. "So it would seem."

"That, and you're upset with your father," Hermione noted slowly. "So, probably looking for a rebellion, I imagine?"

"A reasonable conclusion," Draco replied, shrugging.

"And," she finished, drawing her thumb carefully over her bottom lip, "we've only just met. We could hardly be friends if we kissed now," she told him. "Dreadfully awkward, don't you think?"

"That's true," he agreed, and this, unlike his other commentary, he seemed to genuinely mean. "And I do want to be your friend."

"As do I," Hermione returned. "So probably no kissing, for all the reasons listed above."

"Right," Draco exhaled, nodding. "Right. We should probably never kiss, in fact," he determined, looking briskly certain. "It would make things so difficult, really. And I do need friends," he lamented, faltering slightly. "I think many people speculate about my relationship with my father, but—" He waved a hand to where Lucius had been. "Nobody's actually seen it."

"Understandable," Hermione confirmed. "So, we're agreed, then."

"Yes, definitely," Draco said, propping himself upright with a nod. "No kissing."

"No kissing," she confirmed. "But we can definitely be friends. I don't have to treat you like a prince, you know," she hurried to assure him, hoping the offering sounded slightly less stupid than she suspected. "I mean, to be honest, I'm not totally sure how I would even go about treating you like a prince. I have no idea how to curtsy," she admitted. "I don't even know your proper title."

"True," Draco said, looking pleased. "You know nothing about me or my family, do you?"

"Everything I know about the British monarchy stops at 1776," Hermione promised firmly, as his mouth twitched up in a smile. "Believe me, I have absolutely no clue who your third cousins are. Even if Daphne did try all evening to educate me."

"Well, that's a relief," Draco remarked, chuckling. "So I suppose I can really be whatever I want with you, can't I?"

"You can," Hermione promised again. "Largely because I won't know the difference either way."

"Well, that's marvelous," Draco declared, smacking his palms on his thighs and rising sharply to his feet. He was wearing a tuxedo, Hermione realized, with all the trimmings; the cummerbund, the cufflinks, the whole nine yards. He was unforgivably handsome in it—in all of it—and the firelight danced with a glow around his face, making him a painting come to life; like a portrait, like a fantasy, like a daydream.

"So. Friends, then?" he prompted, holding out a hand for hers.

She rose to her feet, accepting his grip. "Friends," she assured him, giving his hand a squeeze.

He didn't let go.

Neither did she.
"What do friends do in California?" he asked, a bit breathless.

She blinked.

"Hug, I suppose," she said, dismayed to find her voice a horribly distracting rasp. "I, um. Here," she offered, reaching her arms up and giving him a perfunctory hug.

He leaned in, holding her for a moment. He bent his head, his chin pressing into the line of her shoulder, and she felt his cheek against hers, warm and comforting. He had a masculine smell, all sage and cedar. The tux material was stiff, but not scratchy. His arms around her waist were both anchored and weightless; perfectly complementary shapes. Part of her hoped he wouldn't lean away, but after a moment he released her, sparing her a nod.

"Right," he said, gaze fixing on hers. His eyes were a blue so pale they were grey, sharp and strange, and wholly signs of warning; the sky before the rain. "So, friends, then."

"Friends," Hermione said again. "Definitely friends."

He didn't step away.

Neither did she.

"Please don't tell the press I'm such a dreadful liar," were the last words she remembered him saying before her entire brain was swallowed up by delirium, his lips falling to hers with a sense of lawlessness that came from desperation; from the knowledge on both sides that if it could have possibly been avoided, it would have been, if not for a paralyzing impossibility to deny. His hands fell to her waist with the perfect synchronicity they'd had before, but now with urgency, with pressure, with direction, until she was stumbling with the backs of her knees against the table, snaking her arms around his neck to keep herself aloft.

There was no reason for him to be a good kisser. She imagined no girl on earth would have told him if he were doing it wrong, and therefore there was no plausible reason he should have any talent for it whatsoever, and yet the reality was that he—him, an actual prince, with his actual royal tongue in her hopeless colonial mouth—was criminally skilled, and she—a commoner who would be spending no more than four months in his country—had never been kissed so breathless in her entire god-almighty life. He fit against her perfectly, and she molded faultlessly into him, and what sort of joke was this, that he would be here and be him and she would be there and he would be her friend and really, truly, could they honestly be friends? Could anyone be friends who kissed like this? Could anyone exist apart from someone else after knowing this, all of this and everything, was what they were together?

His hands slid under her shirt and crept up to her ribs and she very nearly moaned in his mouth yes, yes, do it, definitely do it, don't stop, but they heard the fumbling of an old key in an ancient lock and sprang apart, Draco turning away sharply as Hermione pressed a hand to her too-warm cheeks, almost collapsing again on the table.

"Draco," came Pansy's voice, and Hermione didn't have to look at her to know the look on her face was admonishing at best. She did anyway, and immediately regretted it, feeling her face heat as Pansy's gaze slid past her to land disapprovingly on Draco. "You're back early."

"Pans," Draco said in greeting, nodding vaguely. He was looking furiously away, awkwardly adjusting his stance like a child avoiding a scolding. "Dinner didn't go particularly long."

"Mm," was all Pansy said.
"I should, um. I should go," Hermione said hurriedly, launching herself for the stairs. She didn't even bother saying goodnight to Draco, which was probably rude, and it occurred to her that maybe she shouldn't have turned her back on him (was that an archaic rule? Was it even a rule?) but she was too busy making her way to her dorm room, fumbling once again with the unfamiliar keys.

She paused as a set of footsteps sounded behind her, followed by the sound of a throat clearing.

"He's a job," Pansy said, and Hermione froze, turning slowly over her shoulder. "He's a job," Pansy repeated, folding her arms over her chest, "and you're unqualified to hold it."

"He's—" Hermione hesitated. "It's not like that. We're friends."

"You'd better hope that's all you are," Pansy said simply. "He's one of the most scrutinized people in the entire world, you know. It bothers him, and that's even knowing he was born into it. But you," she mused, flicking her disdainful gaze over Hermione's face, "I'm not sure you could handle it. I'd advise you to keep your distance."

"I didn't ask for your advice," Hermione said, stiffening slightly, and Pansy let out something of a tiny, disinterested scoff.

"He'll never marry an American," Pansy said. "His wife will be some insipid, well-born idiot like Astoria Greengrass, and I absolutely do not encourage you to let him pretend differently."

Hermione bristled. "I'm not trying to marry him—"

"No, certainly not. But do you think he can have a casual girlfriend?" Pansy asked pointedly. "Do you really think the Prince of Wales gets to have flings? No. Stay away," she warned again. "I'm not interested in watching him get hurt, and certainly not by someone like you."

The last bit was said with considerable derision, and Hermione, who suddenly remembered how thoroughly exhausted she was, only permitted her mouth to tighten as Pansy took a step back, sparing her a tiny shrug.

"By the way," Pansy said casually, "I suppose I didn't mention it earlier: Welcome to Hogwarts."

Then she turned down the corridor, disappearing into her room.

He's a job, and you're unqualified to hold it.

I never forgot those words, which was strange to me at the time, particularly because I was (back then) in the habit of discarding nearly everything Lady Pansy Parkinson-Six Names said to me. Not to mention that I was tired, exhausted, mentally adrift and, unfortunately, still fairly exhilarated from being transcendently kissed by the man I would later fall madly, stupidly, desperately in love with—and still, despite all those things, I never forgot those words.

In retrospect, it's probably because somewhere, somehow, I always knew they were true.

Reverie

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione)

Universe: Post-War, Hogwarts Year 8

Rating: M

Summary: Little Chmura, my artsy pierogi princess, asked for a Dramione one-shot based on one of her gorgeous pieces (available on Tumblr) in which Draco and Hermione are snuggled up against a tree on the Hogwarts grounds. Naturally, I took 'Hogwarts comfort + angst' and turned it into something thoroughly mad, which is this. (Also, if you're musically inclined, I wrote this while listening to Rêverie, L. 68 as written by my fave, Debussy, and performed by AVA.)

After opening a questionable book in the restricted section of the library, Hermione Granger has somehow become Draco Malfoy's responsibility.

The Problem

"She's dead."

"She's what?"

"She's dead," Harry repeated slowly, as if his cadence had been the problem, "and apparently, only you can wake her."

That wasn't exactly true.

But it wasn't exactly false, either.

"What is she?"

"She's not dead," had been Draco's tentative reply.

"I didn't ask what she wasn't," had been Ron's less-than-flattering retort.

Draco rubbed his temple.

"It's complicated," he grumbled under his breath.

"Complicated I can do," Ron said, fiddling with his new Auror badge. "Cyclically dead girlfriend? Not so much."

"It's like narcolepsy," Draco lied, shrugging. "She'll wake."

"Yeah, but apparently only if you bloody wake her," Ron muttered. "Where exactly is she, anyway?"
Draco grimaced, not particularly wanting to answer.

Largely because any answer he gave was almost certainly going to sound like a lie.

"Hi," she said, looking up as he entered. She looked happy to see him, which wasn't particularly helpful.

"Hi."

He was happy to see her, too, which was worse.

"You have to come back," he said, not bothering with pleasantries. She knew why he was there, anyway.

"I will," she promised, "eventually. I did last time, didn't I? And the time before that. Though your diligence is noted," she added, half-smiling.

"You've stayed longer this time," he said, the dull pounding in his head rather impolitely refusing to ease. "I'm worried you're going to forget this isn't reality."

She arched a brow. "Worried for me, Malfoy?"

He looked away. "I'm just afraid you're going to get carried away, that's all."

"Are you now," she murmured, her lips twisting up slightly. "How interesting."

"They think you're dead," Draco reminded her. "It's not that interesting. It's fairly straightforward, actually. You have to come back so as to prove you are not, in fact, dead. Basic stuff, Granger."

"Well, to hear you tell it, I essentially am dead," she said.

"Yes," he sighed, exasperated, "but you're not. Not really."

She looked around, nudging the plaited flower crown back on her head, and shrugged.

"Close enough," she said before rising to her feet, stepping alarmingly close to place her fingers firmly against his temples. "Hold still," she warned when he tried to pull away, and he sighed again, but relented.

After a moment, the pressure in his head soothed slightly, then evaporated. She stepped back with a smile, the curve of it uneven and pleasantly asymmetrical; torn, as she was, between two completely impossible states. Amusement and sympathy, in this case. The real world and this one, in a larger sense.

"Better?" she asked, and he swallowed tightly, nodding. "Can you sleep yet?" she added, softer.

He could not.

"Doesn't matter," he reminded her, shifting his stance. "And anyway, if you're actually concerned, you should know I definitely won't be able to sleep if you don't come back. Potter and Weasley seem to be taking turns calling me every hour."

"Tell them they're misusing your Floo privileges," Hermione advised.
"Tell them yourself," Draco countered, and she sighed, the garland of flowers in her hair wilting slightly.

"Fine," she said. "But only because you asked nicely. And because I do miss them," she added thoughtfully. "How long has it been?"

He swallowed. "Too long," he said, and she nodded, letting him take her hand to pull them both out.

The Explanation

She'd been gone for about two days that time. The first time had only been a matter of hours. It had also been an accident, or something like an accident. Either way, it hadn't been Draco's fault.

This whole situation was precisely the trouble with having eighth year curriculum, really. Nobody quite knew what to teach them anymore. After all, what can you possibly tell a bunch of teenagers who are too old, not just for the school, but for their own skins? They'd seen death. Seen war. Seen each other make terrible choices. They'd seen the ugly in the world and couldn't look away, so what was left to teach?

The solution, ostensibly, was 'independent study,' as McGonagall had hesitantly called it, glancing between the five of them who'd returned: Draco, Hermione, Theo, Neville, and Padma. They all had specialties, for the most part. Neville, for example, was primarily there to pass the N.E.W.T. he needed in herbology, so that was his major focus. He was constantly with Sprout in the as-yet unrepaired sham of a greenhouse. Padma was usually in the Astronomy tower—which was a place Draco in particular no longer cared to go.

There was no room for them in the seventh year classes. Physically there was, of course, but any time any one of them sat down in lectures the rest of the class was immediately distracted. The five eighth-years were individually loathed or beloved for one reason or another, but collectively they no longer fit within the fabric of the castle, figuratively and metaphysically. The castle had only provided enough beds for the students enrolled in years one through seven, so the five of them had been lumped together and thrown into a slightly cramped flat in Hogsmeade. They came to the castle each day to study in a corner of the library near the restricted section, each following a suggested curriculum written out for them by the various professors to help them pass their N.E.W.T.s on their own.

It was on one of those days when Hermione beckoned to Draco and Theo from her usual table in the corner. (Neville had been in the greenhouse; Padma was sleeping, in advance of her studies that evening.)

"This book," Hermione said, pointing to her pile of assigned reading, "wasn't with my things yesterday."

They were friends by then, sort of. Hard not to be, considering they all had to occupy the same flat—which was even smaller when Harry and Ron were visiting her, so they were friends, too. Sort of. Flitwick had charmed the space to give them something of an expansion, but they could practically feel the walls groaning and swelling when the wonder twins came up to visit from Auror training.

"Those are runes," Theo pointed out, gesturing to the cover.

"I know," Hermione said.
"It says," Theo began, and squinted. "Worlds and reveries,' I think.

"Yes," Hermione said again, "I know. I didn't call you over for a translation."

"Well, that's all I have," Theo said, and turned to leave, determining any further input unnecessary or uninteresting. Draco, however, stayed behind, watching Hermione stare curiously down at the cover.

"You said it just appeared?" he asked quietly, and she nodded, frowning.

"I want to open it," she said, fingers twitching towards it, "but also, I don't."

Fair, he thought.

"How about," she began, and turned tentatively to him, "I open it, and you stay here. Just to see if something happens."

He nodded. He could do that. He'd already been reading about debunked magical theories for two hours and he wasn't hungry yet.

"And," she added thoughtfully, "maybe you should touch me, too."

He balked. "What?"

"Well, just in case," she said simply. "Keep a hand on my shoulder or something," she clarified, gesturing. "Just in case," she repeated, and he frowned. "Books can be tricky."

"Well—" He considered advising against it, but his head was hurting. It often was these days. He wasn't sleeping well. "Okay. Fine."

Because we don't have all day: He places his hand on her shoulder. She opens the book. It tumbles to the ground with a clatter, falls open, and she drops along with it, unmoving. He looks around, confused, his hand now simply resting on empty air. He's about to shout for help when something pauses him. The pages of the book fill with a line or two of type. They provide the following message spelled out in runes, seemingly for him: 'What is a world without a creator? What is a life without a meaning?' He bends over her and holds a hand under her nose. She's not breathing. She's dead. No, he thinks, she's not dead. There's no proof of it, but he thinks it's true. He calls for Theo, beckons for him to come quietly. Theo says she's dead. Draco says she isn't. Theo says there's no proof of that whatsoever. Draco says look, I know death, she isn't. Theo says nothing, because Draco has a point. Then he asks Draco what he wants to do about it and Draco says he doesn't know. Should he go get her? Theo says if you can go get here, what are you doing talking to me? Draco says I don't know, can you give me some fucking space to breathe please, Christ, there's a dead girl on the floor, and Theo says she isn't dead and Draco says how do you know and Theo says because you just told me she isn't. So Draco goes to get her. He just knows, somehow. He touches the book and he shows up inside it, and there's nothing, but Hermione's there. She says look and shows him she can make something: light. She cups it in her hands. She says: Aren't you tired of the dark? He swallows hard and says you can't stay here. She sighs, fine, how do we get out? And he says I'll take you back, and he does. He doesn't know how he does any of it. He has no explanation. Two weeks later, Ron and Harry find him in a panic. We came to see her but she's dead, Ron says hysterically, but Harry says she's not, that she left them a note and it says 'if I'm not awake by Saturday noon tell Draco to wake me.'

It changes everything.
The Book

There was a world inside the book of worlds. It didn't exist when she got there, Hermione explains, but now that she's there, she can make things. She made light the first time, and it would have been enough, except once you can make light out of nothing you don't particularly want to stop making things. That, and she didn't have especially good impulse control. She went back and made a landscape: to Draco, it looked like a forest. Then she got stuck, she said.

He suspected she was lying, but she, like most people, didn't seem like she would be receptive to being called a liar. So, after a while, he simply made a habit of coming to get her whenever she'd been gone too long.

The fifth time it happened, she'd added animals. By the time he arrived, she was riding some sort of winged unicorn.

"Pegacorn," she said. "Pegasus and unicorn."

He sighed. "You can't stay here," he warned. "It's not real."

"How do you know what's real?" she asked, as the pegacorn (no, he told himself, he wasn't calling it that) knelt down, permitting her to land deftly on her feet. "Thanks, Draco," she said to it, and it nodded brusquely before taking flight, bounding away.

"Draco?" echoed human Draco, making a face.

"Reminds me of you," she said, shrugging. "Finicky. Prone to sulking. Hates leafy greens."

"Ha," he said glumly, and she smiled.

"Lighten up," she suggested, gesturing around. "It's nice, right?"

"I guess," he said, "if you like nature."

"Everyone likes nature," she said.

"Not true. And anyway, you know why I'm here."

"Yes, I do," she agreed, "but I'm not ready yet." She fell to the ground, patting the space beside her. "Come sit."

He sat, but he wasn't happy about it. He'd simply learned by then it was easier not to argue.

"You can't stay here," he reminded her. "You asked for an extra day and I let you have it, but you have to come back now. It's not real."

"How do you know what's real?" she asked again. Next to her, a plant bloomed from nothing, and she reached over, plucking something from its leaves. "Hungry?" she asked, offering it to him, and he frowned at it.

"What is it?"

"Thing I made," she said. "Tastes like strawberry ice cream, I think. Try it," she said, holding it out to him. It was a softly pink plum.

He took a bite, unsure what to expect. It was soft and sort of cold, giving him a strange sensation in his teeth.
"Strawberry ice cream," he agreed, and she nodded.

"Real enough, isn't it?" she said, gesturing to it.

"Maybe so, but still. Potter and Weasley are more real," Draco reminded her, "and they're worried about you."

She leaned back, falling against the high, sweet-smelling grass.

"I don't like that world anymore," she said. "It disappointed me."

"I disappointed you, too," Draco pointed out, "and you still talk to me."

She turned her head, smiling at him. The sun shone a little brighter through the canopy.

"True," she said, and he looked away.

"Your boyfriend," he said, "is looking for you."

She sighed heavily, as if Draco was the one being tiresome.

"You could at least tell him where you are," he insisted.

"No," Hermione said. "No way. Better he thinks I've got some weird death disease. Otherwise he'll want to come, or he'll tell Harry, and then Harry will want to use the book, and I don't want to—"

She paused, thinking. "It's just that every time I make something, it stays that way," she explained slowly, gesturing around, "just as I like it. This place I'm making, it's—"

"Yours," Draco said, though he may as well have said perfect, and she nodded slowly.

"I'm just not ready to share yet," she said.

He doubted she ever would be, but that was mostly understandable.

"Do you want me to make you something?" she asked him, possibly trying to butter him up.

"Not unless you can make a version of me who isn't a fuck-up," Draco muttered. "And not a pegacorn, either," he warned, before kicking himself. He said he wasn't going to call it that. He couldn't entertain all her whims.

She sat up, taking his hand without a word to lead him through the forest. They walked for a few minutes in silence, a baby deer leaping by with a flash of golden antlers, before arriving at a narrow stream. She leapt over it, releasing his hand to jump, and then beckoned for him to follow. He did.

Then she said, "Close your eyes."

He really needed to stop enabling her. She was getting to be thoroughly impossible.

He closed his eyes.

When he opened them, she had created a shining, faultless version of the castle. The real one was still undergoing construction of sorts, with all the professors and the older students lending their spare time to rebuilding it. This one was pristine, shining in the sun.

He shaded his eyes, staring at it.
"Oh, sorry," Hermione said, and swept out a hand. Behind them, she'd grown a tree beside the lake, shading them both from the sun. "There. Better?"

More than better.

Breathtaking, he wanted to say, but didn't.

"It's not a new you, technically," she said, "but it's still sort of new, isn't it? And anyway, I think the current you is fine. When you're not leaving the toothpaste out."

Her fingertips brushed his. On purpose?

Probably not.

"I never leave the toothpaste out," he forced out, clearing his throat. "That's Longbottom."

"Oh," she said, shrugging. "Well, your dishwashing charms could still use some improvement."

"I know," he said.

He wanted to take her hand. Instead, he told her, "Your boyfriend is waiting for you."

She turned, eyes wide, to give him an unreadable look.

"Fine," she said. "Take me back, then."

He still didn't know if she was capable of removing herself, magically-speaking. But he did know that in other, truer respects, the answer was definitely no.

"Granger," he said tentatively, and she shook her head.

"Don't," she said.

Behind them, the sun dimmed.

The Friends

Harry and Ron were, not unpredictably, a touch concerned.

"What's going on?" Harry asked Draco. "This seems like it's been going on for a while."

"Yes, and I think I deserve to know," Ron contributed.

Draco, Theo, Padma, and Neville exchanged glances.

"The thing is," Draco said slowly, "she doesn't want me to tell you. Yet," he added optimistically, though that was a concept mostly of his own invention.

"What?" Ron barked.

"It's not just Draco," Padma added quickly. She and Hermione shared a room, so Draco assumed she had been the first person Hermione told outside of him. Padma was also not home very often, given that her work was done at night, and when she was in the flat, she slept during the day. All in all, she was very high on the list of Hermione Granger's enablers. "I mean—" Padma glanced at Neville, who gave a guilty-looking shrug. "She asked all of us not to, right?"
"Not me," Theo said. "I can tell you."

Harry looked expectantly at him.

"I said I can," Theo said, shrugging. "Didn't say I would."

Harry rolled his eyes.

"You can't just keep this a secret," Ron said, obviously frustrated as he rounded on Draco. "It's one thing for them not to tell me, but you—why is it you're the only one who can wake her?" he demanded. "Why not Padma?"

Draco didn't want to answer the question being asked (why are you the one she's always asking for?) because his more pressing question (why is she yours?) was something he didn't really want to think about.

"If she wanted you to know," Draco said instead, "she would tell you herself."

"Fine," Harry said wearily, yanking Ron back by the collar of his shirt. "Tell her we came to see her then, would you?"

But Ron wasn't so easily satisfied. "Why can't you just wake her now?" he asked Draco, shoving Harry away. "I haven't seen her in a month, and this is the third time”—that you know of, Draco thought—"she's been like this."

"It takes a while," Draco said, which was adjacent to the truth. The actual extraction was simple enough, but the process of persuading her to wake was something of a drawn-out dance. "If you want to wait, you can."

"Then I'll wait," Ron said, falling onto the cramped sofa between Padma and Neville.

Draco rose to his feet, rubbing his temple. "Fine," he said.

"Oh, hi," Hermione said, turning to find him walking towards her. "Guess what I did today?"

She pointedly flapped her set of shimmering, gossamer wings.

"Got a haircut?" Draco guessed drily, and she laughed.

"Let's go," she said, holding a hand out for his. "Want your own, or can you just hold on?"

"Granger," Draco warned.

"I think I could probably grip you around the waist," she said, turning him brusquely, "just, right here—"

She secured her arms around him and he jumped, bolting out of her reach.

"You have to come back," he said firmly. "Weasley's waiting for you. He hasn't seen you in a month."

"Yes, sure, fine," Hermione said, waving a hand. "Twenty minutes."

"No, Granger," Draco said. "Now."
"Fifteen."

"Now."

"Seventeen."

"This is not a negotiation," Draco growled, and she laughed.

"You're right," she said. "Because you don't actually have any leverage."

He grimaced.

"I thought you didn't like to fly," he said.

"I don't like brooms," she corrected, "or quidditch. But these are mine," she clarified, gesturing to her wings. "I made them. It's different."

"Granger—"

"This world is never going to turn on me," she said, "because I made it. It will never… abandon me. It won't show up dead and make me wonder if it was my fault, or if I didn't do enough. It won't do anything I can't control, and as long as I'm here—"

She took a breath and let it out, and for whatever reason, Draco noticed for the first time that the trees didn't rustle. He hadn't realized before there wasn't really weather here; it was more like a pleasant lack of it. Sun, but no particular heat. A sense of motion in the air, but no actual wind.

"When I leave here," Hermione said hoarsely, "the castle is still broken. The news is still terrible. My parents are still gone. People I loved are still dead." She looked at him, more numb than pained. "I don't want that world right now, Malfoy. I just don't."

He swallowed hard.

"I am so sorry," he said robotically. "I'm so sorry."

"Don't be," she told him. "Just… if you're going to be here, then be here."

He nodded slowly.

"Twenty minutes," he said.

Her smile flickered and stretched, and maybe this was her world, he thought, but he'd been the one who made that smile. He had made a little light for himself, so he understood why she couldn't bear to leave the things she'd crafted from nothing. From emptiness. From total vacancy in the pages of a questionable book.

"Okay," she said, and slid her arms up around his ribs, holding him steady.

Four hours later, when they landed back on the ground and he insisted they go home, they arrived back in the flat to find Ron was asleep on the sofa.

---

The Trouble

"It's been a week since I've seen her," Padma told Draco.
"Mr Malfoy, have you seen Miss Granger?" asked McGonagall. "She said she would help me with repairing some of the castle enchantments in my office, but it's been a day or so with no response."

"Look, I get you can't tell Ron," Harry said, "but can't you at least tell me?"

"Are you seriously just going to sit here and do nothing?" Theo asked. "She's falling into a delusion and leaving her there isn't helping. Why haven't you gone after her yet?"

"It's none of my business," Neville said tentatively, "but, um. It's a bit odd, isn't it? That it's been so long? My kitchen herbs are getting fidgety."

"Are you sleeping?"

Draco blinked, dragging himself back to the present.

Though not quite to reality.

"What?" he asked.

"Are you sleeping?" Hermione asked him. "You could sleep here, if you wanted. I could make sure of it."

"I can't—" He hesitated. "Granger, I can't just stay the night here."

"Why not?" she asked. "Your head hurts all the time," she pointed out, gesturing to where he'd lifted a hand to his temple again. "You need a full night of sleep. You need several nights, actually," she amended. "Do you know what a sleep deficit is? Because you certainly have one by now—"

"Granger," Draco blurted painfully, "I can't spend the night here with you. Don't you understand that?" he said. "Don't you understand that I can't—that being here, I'm just so—"

He bent his head.

"Forget it," he said. "Are you coming?"

She stared at him, and then set her jaw.

"No," she said.

"Fine," he exhaled, and left.

He came back alone and walked into the kitchen.

"What happened?" Theo asked.

"I can't wake her," Draco said.

"Like, magically, or—"

"I just can't," Draco snapped, and then he stormed into their shared bedroom, where naturally he was met by Neville and some sort of new carnivorous-looking pot of greenery.

"It needs to be sung to sleep," Neville said apologetically.

"I don't care," Draco said, and threw himself onto his bed.
He didn't sleep.

He never slept. He saw too many things too vividly whenever he closed his eyes, so he stared at the ceiling instead. There was a spot there, a mark of age or wear, and it looked a little bit like a pegacorn, only those weren't real. And if they were, he definitely wouldn't call them that.

Draco sighed.

Hermione was right.

There was something wrong with this world.

He tried again the next day.

"I do need to sleep," he told her, "but I can't stay here, either."

She tilted her head, considering him. She'd been in the middle of brushing some sort of large, fluffy kitten.

"How about a nap, then?" she suggested, and as she set down the brush, the kitten bounded away, disappearing between the trees. "Come here," she beckoned, and he grimaced, but per usual, he ceded to her wants, sitting beside her and letting her guide his head towards her lap. "Close your eyes," she said, and he obeyed, because what else was he even capable of doing these days?

"Sleep well, Draco," she murmured, brushing her thumb against his forehead, and he drifted off, finally seeing nothing behind his tired eyes.

The Truth

In this precise moment, these are the things Draco doesn't know about:

Padma is sitting alone under the stars, contemplating the constellation Draco. It's the dragon assigned as a guardian; it keeps secrets. She smiles to herself, a little. It's a name that fits, she thinks, and scribbles a few notes about the position of Mars for her research.

Neville is talking to Luna about his recent observation of young hamadryades trees where he's planted them just outside the still-in-disrepair greenhouse. The trees don't grow in groves, he says, but in small groups. One of them isn't growing like the others, though—its colors resemble a tree less developed—and the one closest to it has started to… lean. Closer. Neville thinks the smallest one is dying, that the roots aren't taking to the soil, so the closest one to it is showing signs of mourning. Luna frowns, looks into nothing, and says, "How do you know which one is really alive?"

About a week ago, Hermione received a note. It contained the following message:

I love you. You know I love you. But I can't do this. What's going on? You're telling me nothing. You're telling me nothing, and I'm sorry, but I can't do this anymore. I used to feel like we had something nobody else in the world had. That you were the person I knew best in this entire universe. I used to know you, Hermione, and now I don't. It's like you're on another planet. I'm suffering too, you know. This wasn't just your war. I know you said you couldn't just move on, but what about me?

Also in this precise moment, these are the things Draco does know about:
The softness of Hermione's touch while he sleeps.

The Creations

Pegacorn. A unicorn and a pegasus.

A hypoallergenic kitten the size of a labrador who answers to the name Brutus.

A set of collapsible wings.

A small and highly territorial vanilla-scented bear.

A grove of pre-decorated Christmas trees.

Gold. (Because alchemy.)

A perfect model of Hogwarts. This is where Hermione sleeps, when she sleeps. She curls up in the bed in the Gryffindor dormitory and stares up at the canopy and relives the moments she thought were hard but weren't really, like being torn between Ron and Viktor. Wasn't that a fun problem? she thinks. Comparatively, anyway. She thinks about the tests she once thought she would fail. The mean things Draco Malfoy said that he doesn't say anymore. The hard look on his face that's long gone, replaced by something different. Then she laughs to herself at the memory of slapping him and waves a hand, and because she willed it to, snow falls outside her window.

As she drifts to sleep, Hermione creates a dream for herself. In it, she falls inside of a book, builds an entire world, and from time to time, Draco visits her. One of those times, he looks at her and he says, "I don't really need an entire world, you know. Just you," he says. "Just you."

Inside the book of worlds, Hermione creates beautiful delusions.

The Offer

"It's summer," Draco said. "Don't you want to go home for a bit or something?"

"No," Hermione said.

"Well, I don't want to either," Draco grumbled. "So the least you could do is come back to the flat. Everyone else is staying, and Theo's planning some sort of mad birthday dinner for me." He paused. "It's going to be terrible."

"Why don't you stay here, then?" Hermione asked him.

"What?"

"Stay here," Hermione said again.

"I can't."

"Why not?"

"Because I can't."

"Why not?"
"Because—" Draco growled. "I can't live in a fantasy, Granger. I don't want it."

She looked down.

"But you can sleep here," she pointed out.

"Yes."

"And your head doesn't hurt when you're here."

"No," he sighed, "It doesn't. But—"

"And I'm here," she said.

He said nothing.

What could he say?

"You still don't want to," she registered, deflating.

"Because this isn't real," he told her for the thousandth time, stepping closer. He looked at her, really looked, and said, "Granger, nothing here is real."

The moment he said it, he could see he'd made everything worse.

"I know," she said, turning away, and he caught her hand.

"But," he sighed helplessly, "if you want me to stay, I will. For a while," he warned. "But then you have to come back with me. Got it?"

She tilted her chin up, smiling her uneven smile. "Fair enough."

The Argument

For two days, Hermione showed Draco the things she'd made. For him, there were three primary moments of significance. One, when she concocted a particular pastry that smelled and tasted like one he'd had as a child during his favorite holiday with his parents in their chateau outside Versailles. Two, when she took him for a swim in the lake, giving them both temporary tails and fins like merpeople. Three, when she looked at him for a long moment, and then he asked her what was wrong and she said nothing, like she meant it, and he realized nothing was wrong, too.

Still—"We have to go back," he said, "or I'll miss Theo's stupid party."

"Actually," she said, not looking at him, "I've changed my mind. I'm not going."

"Why don't you just stay?" she said, and brightened. "Have you ever been on a jet-ski?"

"Granger, this is ridiculous," Draco said. "It's been weeks now. You can't just stay here."

"I don't like—"

"The real world, yes, yes, I know." He was extremely annoyed, and he wasn't trying very hard to hide it. "You've seen some shit, Granger, but you don't get to disappear. The Hermione Granger I knew wouldn't just give up, would she?"
She stiffened, and then glared at him.

"The Draco Malfoy I knew took a world full of magic and helped it start a war that almost killed me," she said, "so I don't think that's a very fair assessment. Do you?"

He stared at her, stunned.

"Is that still what you think?" he asked.

She didn't answer.

"Fine. I'm leaving," he said.

"Good," she said.

Then he left.

The Party

The night of Draco's birthday Theo did, in fact, throw a truly terrible party. Mostly because other people were there. Before it started, Draco had considered trying to wake Hermione again (it had been an additional two days by then) but decided it better not to. Clearly she didn't want anything to do with him, and he certainly wasn't in the mood to have yet another argument trying to drag her back after what she'd said.

At the reminder of it, he winced.

"Cheer up," Theo said. "Made you a cake."

It was a pretty good cake, too. Very symmetrical.

"You've been having a tough time," Theo explained, shrugging. "Figured I could do something."

"Who says I've been having a tough time?" Draco said.

"Oh, only your face," Theo replied jubilantly, conspicuously turning to someone else as Harry sidled determinedly up to Draco.

"Hermione isn't dead," Harry announced without preamble.

"No," Draco confirmed again, until he realized it wasn't actually a question that time. "Wait, what?"

"She's not dead," Harry said firmly. "She goes somewhere, right? Somewhere that isn't like here."

Draco frowned. "How do you know that?"

"Well, actually, I was thinking about it," Harry said, "and I figured that had to be it. I don't really blame her for not telling us," he added. "If I could escape, I think I'd do it."

"Would you?" Draco asked doubtfully. "Seems out of character."

"I mean, maybe not forever," Harry said, shrugging. "But it's nice to have a purpose, you know? Meaning. Maybe Hermione hasn't found hers yet."

Or maybe being an omnipotent god in some sort of fairyland is it, Draco thought, and now she's
It struck him as he sat beneath the tree by the lake that Hermione had done an excellent job reconstructing the castle from memory. It made sense, he thought. She was observant. She had a remarkable eye for detail. There was something about her eye for emotions, too; for things that weren't quite tactile or quantitative. She'd drawn the whole thing up from nothing but the image in her head and yet, somehow, all the colors reflected in the sky around it were precisely right. The sensations of the air had been right. The distance; the feeling that the castle could loom but still be welcoming, was precisely right.

Her version was more visually arresting, though, of course. Everything was a little better through her eyes, him included.

"Hi," he heard behind him, and spun.

She was standing there, holding herself back, fidgeting. She looked like she'd been crying.

He blinked. "How did you—"

"I could always get myself out," she said. "I just didn't want to."

He swallowed. "Oh."

An owl flew by in the distance.

The branches of the tree above them rustled in the wind.

"I thought you weren't going to come back," Hermione eventually said, eyeing her feet. "I thought maybe you were done with me. And then I thought how terrible it would be if I'd made you upset, or if you thought I'd meant what I said, or what I didn't say, and then I just—"

"Granger." He tilted his head back against the tree, beckoning to her. "Come here."

For once, she listened, sitting beside him.

"Ron broke up with me," she said, and he blinked. "A while ago."

"Probably because you kept dying just to avoid seeing him," Draco remarked.

"Yeah," she sighed. "I think that was probably it."

He sat up slightly. "Are you okay?"
"Kind of." She turned, giving him one of those off-kilter smiles over her shoulder. "I mean, I don’t think I really wanted the relationship, but still. It’s sad when things end."

She glanced at the castle, which was still a bit ruined; unlike her version of it.

"Not all endings are bad," Draco told her carefully. "When things end, new things start."

He gestured for her to come closer, which she did, and then he pointed up at the castle.

"See the greenhouse?" he murmured, and she nodded. "Longbottom and I finally got around to fixing up the north bit of it about a month ago. I don’t know if it’s better than the original greenhouse, but I do know that the people who fixed it could never have done so together if it had never been broken to begin with. Which I realize is quite a mad thing to say," he lamented, "considering this was very much my fault, and perhaps I should have been a better person to begin with and then nothing would have broken—"

"But it looks good," Hermione interrupted. "Shiny and new."

"Yeah," Draco said. "Yeah, I guess so."

The wind rustled around them, brushing her hair back from her shoulders. He smelled something floral in her hair and breathed it in, letting it curl up in the recesses of his lungs.

"I thought you weren’t coming back for me," Hermione said quietly, and he shook his head.

"I would have come back," Draco said. "For you? Trust me, Granger. I would have come back for you."

She glanced at him. "But you wouldn’t have stayed?"

He shook his head. "No," he said, and then hesitated before admitting, "but not because I wouldn’t want to. I just owe this world too much."

She nodded in quiet recognition. "I guess I didn’t realize while I was off making my own world you’ve been trying to make this one better," she noted.

"Yeah, well, I figured you’d want to come back one day," he said. "And when you did, I wanted it to be a little better for you."

At that, her throat seemed tight for a moment, her lips parting briefly, and then she tentatively shifted towards him. He adjusted his position against the tree, making room for her, and she settled herself against his chest, leaning into him.

Slowly, he wrapped his arms around her. She slid a hand up, resting it over his heart, and curled her fingers into the fabric of his shirt, holding on.

He rested his head against the tree.

"This world is beautiful, too," Hermione murmured.

"It is now," he said, and she closed her eyes, both of them drifting off in the reverie of the present as their pulses gradually aligned, the sun fading into the background.

---

The Resolution
When they returned to the flat, everyone had already gone out. Theo left a note saying they were at the Hog's Head, but they didn't read it because Hermione was pulling Draco into her bedroom, breath catching as his hands slipped under her shirt. She stumbled back, fumbling for the bed behind her, and he was kissing her neck when she realized something was out of place.

Something was gone.

He stopped, frowning. "Could someone have taken it?"

"I don't know," she replied.

"Want to look for it?" he asked.

She looked up at him, at the mouth she'd been kissing and the way it formed something she had tried many times to recreate, but never properly managed.

"No," she said, and then added, "By the way. Are you staying to keep working on the castle?"

"Yes," he said.

"Can I help?" she asked.

He looked down at her, at the girl he'd been in love with for months, and imagined an impossible world in which he could refuse her anything.

"Later," he suggested, and she tugged him onto the bed with her, twining her legs with his.

Because we don't have all day: He takes off her shirt. Then her jeans. Then her bra. She fumbles with his clothes and deposits them on her floor. He says he wishes he had told her sooner how he felt and she says he needs to shut up, right now, she's busy. She kisses him, he kisses her, he ventures down her torso, lips and tongue and teeth. Cunnilingus. Orgasm. Not too quickly—a realistic one, where she squirms and cries out and tightens her fingers in his hair and says yes right there don't move just right there and because he can follow instructions, orgasm is achieved. Then an attempt at fellatio in exchange, which is rebuked in favor of sex. Sex, sex, sex. God, you're so good, he says, and she murmurs I'm going to come, and he whispers something both blasphemous and obscene and they have the first of their impossible moments together and come at the same time. He tells her he thinks he loves her. She tells him she probably loves him. They laugh at their mutual stupidity. He says you are the only thing that brings me peace and she says you are the only thing that's real, and everything will be different now. This is real, he thinks when he touches her, and she thinks it, too, when she touches him. They sleep soundly and dream of pegacorns. Book, what book? Nobody here needs a book. They both know what they're doing, and yet equally, they don't. The world can burn down tomorrow, and if it does, they'll start over. They are resilient. They are creators. They are living proof that something can come from nothing.

They are evidence the world can begin again.

The End

To conclude:

The Question
What is a life without meaning?

The Answer
Nothing but a dream.

Convenient Ways to Kill a Man

Pairing: Something I will not list, because doing so is a spoiler for How to Win Friends and Influence People

Universe: How to Win Friends and Influence People-verse (are you sensing a theme?), post-war

Rating: M

Summary: This story begins one week after the events of the How to Win epilogue, so please, I beg you, do not read this unless you have read the whole story. Do you hear me? THE ENTIRE STORY. Do not show up in the reviews telling me you read this without reading How to Win from beginning to end. You will be very confused, I promise you. Have you read How to Win? Yes? Okay good, moving on. Two people who met in the epilogue have agreed to a dinner celebrating their mutual attraction (and, if certain divinists are to be believed, their combined destinies). Unfortunately, they both have jobs to do, which means romance is perhaps less important than some other things... like taking out a dangerous criminal, for example.

The Arsonist
Diagon Alley
November 9, 2006
8:25 p.m.

"You know, I hate to say it," she said, "but I really think this is going disastrously well."

Her lips curled up to a coy, laughing grimace of irony, and he wanted so badly to kiss her. He wanted to reach across the table, take hold of her face, and kiss her deeply. Or gently. Maybe a little bit of both. Hard at first, with a little bite of promise, but then softer. Something to remember him by.

He'd learned a lot about her over the past week; they'd been owling back and forth multiple times a day, in fact, about this and that and everything. About life. About their respective lack of lives. She was funny, he realized. The sort of funny that beautiful girls sometimes weren't. The sort of funny that was bold and brash and uncontained. She was focused, too, and honest. She was painfully honest, and she was direct and brilliant and strangely kind, and now that he was looking at her face—at the petal-pink rose of her mouth—he truly wished he hadn't done what he had.

"I'd hoped I might find something about you I didn't care for," she continued, still with that subtly endearing half-smile that was as much a weapon as it was a gift, "like maybe you had some sort of horrifying political opinions," she mused idly. "Or at least an unbearable habit I couldn't stand being around."

"I've been known to snore," he offered, and her smile broadened.

"I'd like the opportunity to find out," she returned, reaching her hand across the table for his, and he could do it, he thought. What would be the worst thing to happen? Her hazel eyes were fixed on his, and maybe he should just do it. If she pushed him away, then she pushed him away. At least he would have tried. At least he would have had one moment of being close to her, breathing her in, even if it was the only one he got. He thought maybe it would be worth it, and by the way she wasn't dropping her gaze, he was pretty sure she'd left an opening. The figurative door was ever so slightly ajar.

He leaned forward. "Daphne," he attempted, clearing his throat, and her lips parted slowly.

"Do it," she murmured, flinging the door wide open, and at the distinctly welcome offering he determinedly reached out, brushing her hair from her cheek with a careful, exquisitely painful deliberation. He leaned in, grazing his nose deftly along hers, and in response, she tipped her chin up, closing her eyes. Emboldened, he brought her lips to his, and—

"Cadell Hawkworth," came a voice behind them, and immediately, he felt her hand slip from his, the moment abruptly snatched out from beneath them. "You're under arrest for violation of your parole. Put your hands in the air where we can see them."

Cadell grimaced, glancing lamentingly down at his unfinished dinner and falling back into his chair.

"I won't go back," he replied gruffly. Heads were starting to turn; ideal. He raised his voice. "I'm never going back to Azkaban."

He spun, aiming a stunning spell at one of the Aurors behind him that narrowly missed, and as he rose to his feet, Harry Potter's expression went grim.

"Cadell," he warned, "put your wand down and your hands in the air. We're taking you into custody."

"I'd rather die," Cadell shot back, and then he heard it. A camera. Then two more. He painted a gruesome snarl on his face and raised his wand when he heard a third, aiming a wordless spell that Harry rapidly disarmed. "If you want me, you'll have to kill me first, Potter—"

"Take him in, Auror Weasley," Harry commanded, and as Ron stepped forward, Cadell lunged, Daphne already gone from his peripheral. She'd be slipping into the crowd now, backing away. Pictures were being taken, after all, and she couldn't be in them. Her anonymity was key. For him, however, visibility was paramount.

Ron extended a hand, ostensibly to take hold of Cadell's wrist, and the moment they touched—

"Oh, hello," drawled Theo Nott as Cadell stumbled sideways, nearly colliding with the brick wall in the alley. "Here's your wand," he offered, holding it out for Cadell, "and some clothes. I take it you've been briefed on the communication protocol?"

"I'll send a patronus out as soon as I make contact." Cadell confirmed stiffly, trading his jacket for the cloak Theo had offered him. "But again, you have to make sure nobody tries to contact me. If any messages arrive at the wrong time—"

"We know the drill," Theo assured him. "We're really much more competent than we look." He paused before adding, "Thanks for doing this, by the way. I'm sure it's not exactly what you wanted."

Cadell nodded, his fingers closing deftly around the wand which was, in fact, his. The other had been a decoy, as had the Weasley product that had transported him outside, leaving a fake bloodied limb behind.
"Not a problem," he said, clearing his throat. "Harry's right. I'm the best person to do it."

Theo shrugged. "Well, certainly never hurts to be the best. Anything else?"

Cadell considered it.

"Yeah, actually," he said after a moment. "Can you tell Daphne," he began, and paused. He wasn't sure what to say to her. He rather wished he'd thought it through. "Can you just, um. Can you tell her that…"

He trailed off. Nothing seemed good enough.

"Tell her yourself," Theo suggested, giving Cadell's shoulder a remarkably comforting pat. "Shouldn't take more than what, a couple of weeks? Build a little suspense. Just don't take too long with the runaround."

Cadell smiled weakly. "Right," he confirmed. "Okay, well—" He turned over his shoulder, eyeing the darkened alley to his left. "See you, then."

"Good luck," Theo called after him, bending to speak into his tie clip as Cadell shivered in the evening air, pulling his cloak tighter around him.

One Week Ago

The Ministry of Magic, Department of Magical Law Enforcement

November 2, 2006

10:35 a.m.

"The suspect's name is Mordred," Harry said, placing one file in front of Cadell as he placed the other in front of Daphne. "Deathstar's already been briefed," he added to clarify, "but I wanted to review it with the two of you separately."

"Why?" Daphne asked, frowning as she opened the file. "Does this have something to do with the Avalonian Order we just shut down?"

"Yes and no," Harry said unhelpfully, falling back into his seat. "We went through their records and sorted out that Mordred was one of their primary donors, so to some extent that's a yes, but it seems they weren't his only beneficiaries. He's been known by other names," he explained, gesturing to the files, "but the records from the Avalonian Order match some open cases we have belonging to other wizarding terrorist groups from the last twelve years. Mordred is only his most recent iteration."

"Who is he?" Daphne asked, frowning at the blurry picture of a middle-aged man that had been tucked into the file, and Harry shrugged.

"That's the question," he returned. "Whoevers Mordred is, he's extremely well-hidden. Impossible to contact unless he wants to contact you." His gaze slid slowly—knowingly—to Cadell's. "Have you heard of him?"

Cadell nodded, and Daphne's heart sank.

This was why they'd been called in.

"I know of him," Cadell clarified. "Never met him, but I know his associates."
"Could you get to him?" Harry asked.

For a moment, Cadell didn't speak. He looked at the file, obviously lost in thought.

"It would save a lot of lives if you could," Harry pressed, obviously adopting a gentler tone to soften his urging. "Mordred supplies money and resources to groups with intent to harm the public and the Ministry. He also gives them the means to avoid imprisonment." He paused before adding, "He's basically the Godfather of the magical underground."

To that, Cadell's mouth twisted. "Rhys loves those films."

Harry nodded, half-smiling. "I know. Loves them even more now that he and Daisy work for MACUSA." He waited another beat, letting the camaraderie sink in before pressing on. "Anyway, I thought maybe you could help us. If, that is, you were able to reach him. Dig up his real identity and tell us who he is." Another pause. "We can't stop him if we can't find him."

Daphne glanced sharply at Cadell, who was chewing his thoughts, looking torn. He exhaled after a moment, slowly rubbing his temple.

"Yes," he said eventually, and the moment he said it, Daphne ached for him. He'd been so relieved to be back in the wizarding world, and now..."Yes, I could find him. But everyone underground knows I'm supposed to be in Azkaban," Cadell pointed out, glancing fleetingly at Daphne. "With the Avalonian Order dismantled and me suddenly out of prison, Mordred might suspect I got clemency from the Ministry. I won't be able to get close to him if he thinks I'm working with the Auror department."

"Right," Harry agreed, "but I had a thought about that—we could stage something. A highly publicized re-arrest that goes wrong. Something that ends up in the papers," he clarified, "to make the rest of the world believe you're on the run again."

"But that will destroy his reputation," Daphne argued. "Not to mention your department!"

Harry glanced at her, grimacing. "I know. Temporarily, though, we'll have to do it. And listen, I know Cadell was going to get a desk job in the Department of Mysteries, but—"

Daphne struggled to manage her disappointment.

She'd just met him.

She'd just met him.

And now he was going to be gone?

"We could really use him," Harry finished, giving Cadell a sympathetic glance. "We don't have anyone else who could go undercover like this."

"Not Draco or Hermione?" Daphne asked Harry, who shook his head.

"It already came out after Halloween that their divorce was staged. Nobody would believe them if they went undercover now. And if it were a simple assassination, that would be one thing," Harry added apologetically, "but we have reason to believe Mordred's various enterprises would continue on his orders even if he died. None of us can figure out how he transfers funds, so we can't just take him out. We have to take down his entire network, and that requires knowing who he is and who's protecting him."
"But Cadell just got his life back," Daphne began, and Cadell leaned forward, gently cutting in.

"It's fine," he told her. "Harry's right. It's a good plan." He slid his gaze briefly to Harry's. "And it won't take too long, will it? You just need me to figure out who Mordred is and report back?"

Harry nodded. "After that, no more undercover work—you have my word. You can be an Auror or an Unspeakable if you want to, up to you. But I swear, this is the last time I'll ask you to do anything like this."

"Is my department involved in the investigation, too?" Daphne asked, hoping for at least that much, but Harry shook his head slowly.

"No," he said, "and you definitely shouldn't communicate. And I'll need you to get rid of any record of his employment, Daphne, because if there's even a single shred of evidence tying Cadell to the Ministry, Mordred will find it. We think he has at least one associate on the inside, either in the Ministry or somewhere financial," Harry explained, directing that information at Cadell. "So you'll have to cut ties completely."

Gradually, Cadell managed a nod.

"Understood," he said, resigned to his fate, and beside him, Daphne suppressed a sigh, trying not to look as disappointed as she felt.

Daphne Greengrass' Flat
Knockturn Alley
November 9, 2006
9:04 p.m.

"So," Pansy called from the fire, smiling devilishly through the flames, "how was the dinner?"

Daphne grimaced. "Pans, I just got home. Can you not wait around for me like that?"

"Daphne Elizabeth Greengrass," Pansy warned. "You promised me details."

Daphne sighed, hanging her robes up by the door and falling back against the cushions of her vintage sofa. She was really rather a fan of her cozy Knockturn flat when it wasn't being invaded by nosy newly-pregnant friends; admittedly, the neighborhood left something to be desired, but seeing as a new cafe had just been put in, Daphne suspected it'd be lousing with gentrification soon enough.

"Well?" Pansy demanded. "I've just been sitting here with my feet up for hours, so—"

There was no getting around it. Better to get it over with quickly.

At once, Pansy's expression melted. Daphne thought at first it was a result of the flames, but no. Pansy's entire countenance visibly formed itself to something surprisingly human as she let out a loud, incoherent sound of relief (or pain. Difficult to tell).

"I'm so happy for you," Pansy wailed; relief, Daphne confirmed internally. "It's been THREE YEARS, Daphne!"

"I'm aware," Daphne said drily.
"It's been three years, and all that time, what have I been saying? That you would fi-"

"I'd find someone, yes, yes, I know, but you're getting ahead of yourself—"

"You like him—oh, I'm so relieved," Pansy exhaled. "I genuinely thought I was going to have to keep setting you up on terrible first dates until one or both of us died—"

"Pans, come on—Pansy, are you crying?"

"It's the hormones," Pansy sniffed, pawing lightly at her face. "Anyway, why aren't you excited? This is huge, Daphne! He's the first person you've taken any interest in who wasn't, I don't know, a suspect in a murder investigation—"

"Well, not quite, remember?" Daphne lamented, leaning her head back against the sofa. "I told you, he's going undercover. I won't talk to him again until he finds Mordred, and who knows how long that'll take—"

"But why," Pansy whined. "Doesn't Potter know you need to get laid?"

"This Mordred guy is apparently some kind of destructive billionaire with bad intentions," Daphne reminded her. "I think stopping wizarding terrorism is probably more pressing to Harry Potter's agenda than my carnal urges."

"Eh, potato, potato. In any case, I'm hearing far too much work," Pansy complained, "and not nearly enough details. Spill, Daph."

"I—"

What was there to say, really? That for three years she'd barely slept for seeing Cadmus Peverell in her dreams? That for over a thousand nights she'd heard his voice and felt his touch and now, finally—when she could finally think of him without crying—the only man she had any sort of connection with was gone?

"He's…"

She sighed.

He has the kindest eyes, she wanted to say. Brown and discerning and quick to take in details. He was observant in ways that struck her as meaningful; he seemed to know what she was thinking before she said a word. Not like Cadmus, who was observant in something of an impish way—a playful how can I use this later? sort of way—but rather, Cadell looked at her as if he were seeing her through a totally different lens. Cadmus had known her as a girl, lost and finding her way and constantly needing to be reassured, but Cadell looked at her as a woman. A woman who'd fought for her place in the world, just as he had. He was someone now he had never been before, and no one who had known him before could conceivably see the difference. But that, Daphne thought, was something she fully understood.

Losing a love changes a person. Molds you into something unrecognizable and unfamiliar. But time changes you, too, as Daphne had learned. Eventually the pain gets easier to bear, and then even that is painful. Like maybe your body is forgetting how it felt to lay beside him, so it cruelly permits you to breathe. Sometimes the breath of relief that inevitably follows heartbreak is the very worst of the pain.

I know, Cadell had said when she told him, surprised the words even managed to leave her constitution without simply swallowing her up. I thought for a long time I wanted to drown, only to feel guilty for continuing to swim.

And now? she'd asked him. Is it better now?

He'd looked at her like no one had ever looked at her. Like nobody could ever look at her, for not possessing the capacity to understand the volumes of what she'd become.

If I know one thing about life, he'd started to say—in a moment so similar to one she'd had nearly three years before that she thought she might have fallen through the looking glass—and she'd paused him, reaching across the table to take his hand.

It's that it goes on, she finished for him, and she'd known right then Cadell Hawkworth wasn't something that would fade.

"Never mind. You don't have to say anything," Pansy said, interrupting Daphne's thoughts with a surprisingly gentle tone. "I can see it on your face. You like him. That's all."

Daphne nodded slowly.

Yes.

She liked him.

It didn't even feel like a betrayal of her past, really, because she would never have felt this way about Cadell Hawkworth if she'd met him back then. She could only feel this way now. She could only feel this for having been what she'd become because of Cadmus. After all, Cadmus, a man who had only ever known who he was with his brothers standing beside him, had been the one to teach Daphne she could stand alone.

"So you have to wait, what, a couple of weeks, then?" Pansy guessed, biting daintily into a chocolate frog. "You can wait that long. You already waited three years."

Daphne chuckled under her breath. "True," she agreed. "Compared to three years, a few weeks is nothing."

"Easy," Pansy assured her. "You're fine."

To that, Daphne Greengrass let out a breath she felt she'd been holding a long, long time.

"Yes," Daphne confirmed. "I'm fine."

Eight Fucking Months Later

Lady Mystic's House of Reverie

Knockturn Alley

July 3, 2007

9:15 p.m.

"Are you and Potter sure about this?" Parvati asked Daphne, the silver veil floating above her platinum-white hair. She wasn't always so formal, but considering the occasion, she'd leaned into looking unearthly and ethereal in her costume as Cassandra, Knockturn's resident Lady Mystic. Beside her, Blaise fidgeted with the gold circlet on his head, squinting at himself in the mirror. "Oi, Zabini," Parvati said, snapping her fingers. "Focus."

"Right," Blaise agreed, turning back to Daphne. "You look great."
"That's not what we were talking about," Parvati growled, glaring at him. Daphne sighed, suspecting she was being held hostage to a very niche brand of foreplay before the other two went off to play their respective roles as the heads of secret criminal enterprises. "She's putting her life in danger, you idiot—"

"I put my life in danger all the time," Daphne reminded Parvati. "It's what we do every day, isn't it?"

Parvati frowned. "Yes, but that doesn't mean I have to like it. This guy's trouble," she warned. "I don't trust him or his associates, and if this doesn't work—"

"Oh, relax, Lady Mystic," Blaise advised, his fingers brushing lightly over the small of Parvati's back. "If you get all riled up now, your revel won't be any fun at all."

"You know I hate these," Parvati told him gruffly, though she leaned in gratefully at his touch. "I'm not Dionisia, Blaise. I'm not a pimp."

"A madame, you mean," Blaise assured her with a furtive laugh, "and anyway, we know. You're just doing Potter and Deathstar a favor."

"You really are," Daphne assured her. "Cadell's been out of contact for too long. After his last message, Harry suggested this as the best way to get in touch with him discreetly, and I agreed. In fact, I offered," she added, though she pointedly didn't mention she had her own agenda for doing so—largely because Parvati already knew as much. Daphne suspected she'd known for quite a long time, though she did them both the favor of not bringing it up.

Love fiercely, love brightly, because someone waits for you.

"Well, fine," Parvati permitted after a moment, eyeing Daphne with approval again. "You do make an excellent harlot."

Daphne glanced down at herself, stifling a sigh. Parvati had gone with Lady Revel's previous theme of overdone French gowns (this one being at least slightly less pretentious and more luxurious, as it was one of Mel's couture designs). Daphne also wore a complex silver-powdered wig on her head that wasn't particularly comfortable, though admittedly the priestess' wimple she'd worn in the Avalonian Order had been far less flattering.

"Thanks, I guess," she sighed. "Shall we?"

"Shall we entertain a wizarding terrorist and a dozen of his most disgusting associates? If we must," Parvati sniffed distastefully, "then I suppose we shall."

---

9:23 p.m.

It had been a relief to receive the scroll inviting them to Lady Mystic's for a revel. The rebuilt House of Fortune (now House of Reverie) was still widely considered a safe haven for people of their underground circle, and was simultaneously an inconspicuous place for a meeting as much as it was the only place Cadell could conceivably speak to someone representing the Ministry. A polyjuiced Theo, he assumed, as Harry was unlikely to put himself at this much risk. Maybe Draco or Hermione.

It had never occurred to Cadell they might try to hide someone in plain sight.

"This is Lady Guinevere," said Cassandra, the public persona belonging to Parvati Patil. Cadell didn't know her well, but Harry had assured him prior to his calculated escape underground that she could be trusted. Besides, Cadell's own experience with her had certainly been… illuminating, to say the least.

The woman she beckoned stepped forward, long lashes framing unforgettable hazel eyes.

"My Lords," offered a faultlessly disguised but aptly-named Lady Guinevere, sweeping her skirts back in a flawless curtsy. "Might one of you be wanting entertainment?"

She was skirting Cadell's eye. Smart, he thought. Wouldn't want it to look planned. It was perfectly fine for him to stare at her, but certainly not the other way around.

Beside him, Mordred looked entirely too delighted. He was a notably unhandsome man, though certainly unremarkable. There was a reason his face was so difficult to identify, whether the witnesses' memories (or alternatively, their Gringotts vaults) had been modified or not. Whatever else Mordred was, he was an incredibly forgettable man—pale with watery blue eyes, slightly thick around the waist, and identifiable only by a consistently receded hairline and a tendency to wear colorless clothing—who was better known for his despicable deeds than for any notable physicalities.

"Ah," Mordred said with a laugh, "you wouldn't make it so easy for us, would you, Lady Guinevere?"

"Guinevere is my most uniquely talented offering," Cassandra cut in, loftily suggestive. "She doesn't come cheaply. Or easily."

"Hm," Mordred said, curling a hand around his mouth. "And by unique talents, you mean…?"

Lady Guinevere gave him a sweetly delicate smile. She could play the coquette like no one Cadell had ever seen, and he'd seen quite a lot. Particularly over the past eight months. His stomach churned at the knowledge, realizing again how long it had been. I've missed you, I thought of you every day, and I won't let him hurt you, I won't let him touch you—

But of course, he'd been foolish to worry. She could handle herself. In a sweeping motion, Lady Guinevere had plucked a narrow rapier free from its place above the hearth, tossing it into the air and catching it deftly in one hand before aiming it daringly at Mordred.

"My Lord," she said with feigned bemusement, "you didn't think I meant anything untoward, did you?"

Slowly, she tucked the rapier under Mordred's chin, lifting it as he smiled broadly.

"I hope you have a champion for me, My Lord," she told him, and finally permitted her gaze to rest on Cadell's. "Maybe this one?" she asked, shifting the point of the rapier to aim it against his chest.

She gave a slight flick of her wrist, prompting him to inhale sharply as the blade edged closer to his throat.

"What's your name, soldier?" beckoned Lady Guinevere.

Cadell glanced questioningly at the aptly-named Lady Mystic, who shrugged.

"This is a safe place, gentlemen," she assured him. "The only names required are the ones you wish to use."
"Well, Tal?" Mordred asked, grinning at Cadell. "You heard the lady. She wants a name and a fight, and I'm happy to give one if you'll give the other."

If only you meant that, Cadell thought grimly, I could have been home months ago.

Home.

Not that he had even one anymore.

He fixed his attention on Lady Guinevere, who held the blade steady at his throat. "Is there a name, My Lord?"

"Talon," Mordred provided on Cadell's behalf, opting for his criminal moniker before turning to him, gesturing him forward in what was most likely a test. "You wouldn't leave the lady wanting, would you, Tal?"

Cadell arched a brow at Lady Guinevere. Are you sure you know what you're doing?

The corners of her lips quirked. Always.

He reached out without a breath of warning, taking hold of her rapier's hilt and using her own grip to yank her closer, aiming the tip of the blade upright. He locked her in place against him, drawing his concealed dagger with his free hand and carefully pressing the flat of his blade to her neck.

She held her breath, careful not to move.

"I'm afraid you have me at a disadvantage, Sir Talon," she said. The shallow breaths she took beneath his dagger swelled against his chest. "The rapier is a weapon best suited to thrusting. Perhaps that isn't one of your skills?"

Behind them, Mordred chuckled, obviously enjoying the show.

Cadell spun Lady Guinevere out in something of a dance, leaning back on his heel to snatch the other rapier from the wall as she returned with a rapid pivot, aiming her blade directly at him.

"Lose the dagger," she commanded.

Obediently, he tucked it back into the waistband of his trousers.

"Now," she beckoned, leaning into a fighting stance, "are you sure you know how to wield something so large, My Lord?"

"You flatter me," Cadell said drily, setting himself across from her. "Aren't you worried you might be overselling?"

She smiled. "You should see me when I'm selling something," she replied, and stepped forward, taking the first shot.

He parried her blade away, stepping back and casting out for space around the room, the two of them carefully circling each other. He jabbed forward once, testing, but she was far too clever to take the bait. She swiped at his wrist instead, slicing a line into it, and he glanced down, eyeing the thin trail of blood her blade had left behind.

"I see," he said softly, tiny beads of crimson swelling up to the surface of his skin. "This isn't a game, is it?"
She shook her head, lips twisting up slyly. "Not when so many other men would die to have me, My Lord."

Behind them, Mordred chuckled again. She was playing her part perfectly.

Now, though, it was Cadell's turn.

A sharp jab forward sent her leaping back. She recovered quickly, aiming for him again, but a predictive step to the side left her unbalanced. No doubt the dress was heavy and cumbersome, and she only managed to resume her stance in time to prevent a jab near her neck. Cadell sliced quickly, a long silvery curl falling from her wig to the ground between them, and she looked down at it with surprise before glancing up at him.

"Looks better on the floor," he remarked to her, "don't you think?"

Her mouth twisted.

She lunged, and he stepped back, drawing her forward in time to duck under her blade and around to her left, materializing on her other side as she spun half a beat too late. He slid an arm around her waist, locking her against him, and shifted to hold his blade against her chest, feeling her breath rise and fall heavily under the weight of his hand.

"Drop it," he said in her ear.

She let the rapier fall from her hand.

Then, sharply, she stepped hard on his foot, prompting him to release her with a searing burst of pain, and she snatched the pommel of his rapier from his own hand, aiming the blade warningly up at his throat.

He paused, breathing hard, and looked down at her.

He could overpower her if he wanted to; the leverage required to hold the sword upright would have her at a disadvantage, given her size.

But surely this much had been believable enough.

"Whatever she costs," he said to Lady Mystic, not taking his eyes from the flawlessly camouflaged courtesan, "I'll pay it. I have to have her."

Lady Guinevere's mouth twitched, satisfied.

"Done," Cassandra said at once, and Lady Guinevere stepped backwards, falling into a curtsy. "You won't regret it, My Lord. And while you enjoy our Guinevere, we'll keep your employer busy," she added with a pointed glance at Mordred, "whatever his entertainment preferences are."

Lady Guinevere stepped forward, taking Cadell's hand, and led him up the stairs. He paused for a moment to glance over his shoulder, eyeing Mordred for evidence of suspicion; when he found none, he turned to follow his prize for the evening, her hips swaying purposefully as she led him through a hall of elaborately painted bedrooms.

"My Lord Talon," she said, beckoning him into a suite, and he strode inside without comment, waiting until the door closed behind them.

The moment it did, she let out a breath, carefully casting a silencing charm.
"Cadell," she said, and in an instant, he felt a surge of relief.

She'd bought him an hour of pretend, and it would be the realest thing he'd possessed in almost a year.

Perhaps more, even.

"Daphne," he said, and slowly, she offered him the warmth of her brilliant smile.

---

10:15 p.m.

"Are you alright?" she asked, rushing towards him. She checked the thin scratch on his wrist, healing it quickly, and he chuckled a little under his breath at her concern.

"That was nothing," he assured her. "I'm a hardened criminal now," he joked, toying with her wig as she fussed over his arm. "Can't be too upset to lose a little blood from time to time."

"Well, listen, we don't have a lot of time," she said, pulling him after her to the bed and removing the wig, setting it down on the ground. "Harry said you've been having trouble?"

"Mordred's extremely secretive," Cadell confirmed with a grimace. "He's got a vast network, too. All I know for sure is that he's definitely been funding some of the smaller attacks on the Ministry. I was able to warn Harry before the last one, but—"

"Why the Ministry?" Daphne asked, frowning. "Is he just an anarchist?"

"Honestly? Hard to tell," Cadell said. "I have no idea what his real identity is. Whoever he is, it's definitely not anyone important. He's not a pureblood," he clarified, "though he seems to have inherited a fortune somehow, or stolen one. How he did it, I have no idea."

"Anything about his background? His education?"

Cadell shook his head. "It took me six months just to earn a spot in his circle," he admitted. "And to get here, I did…" Another grimace. "A lot of illegal things. The only time he even trusted me to begin with was when I started speaking out against my father, but even when I had his ear, he still wanted absolute proof I wasn't working for the Ministry." A wince. "Mordred has… extremely bloody tastes. Combined with his absurd love of treasure, he's practically a goblin."

"Oh, no," Daphne exhaled. In the months since she'd seen him, Cadell's appearance had taken on something of a hardened exterior; the streaks of silver in his hair seemed to have intensified, and his gaze had a hollowness to it he hadn't possessed before. "I'm so sorry."

"It's fine. It's necessary, actually, if it means bringing him down. Like I told Harry, this guy is dangerous," Cadell said. "He's a sadist, for sure. And he's angry at someone. But I haven't come any closer to figuring him out—certainly haven't had news in a while."

"That's why Harry sent me in," Daphne said. "He hadn't heard from you in nearly a month. He also wanted me to tell you they can pull you, if you want," she added, which was not at all what Harry had said, but something she would insist on if she had to. She didn't like Cadell being this close to danger; not after seeing his face while he spoke of Mordred. "If you want to get yourself arrested, he'll pull some strings, or I will. You have plenty of friends in the Ministry, Cadell, and—"

Cadell held a finger to his lips, abruptly pausing her to train his ears on a noise from the corridor.
"Dispel the Muffliato," he whispered. "Now."

"What? But—"

"Just do it," he said, and she flicked her wand, complying. "Good, and—"

He surveyed her with a touch of uncertainty, grimacing for a moment, and sighed.

"I'm so sorry about this," he said, and slid the dagger from his waistband.

She felt her eyes widen. "Cadell, what are you—"

He sliced up the lacing of her bodice, tearing at the silk and yanking it open, and then hurried to adjust her on the bed, angling one of her legs over his hips just as the door slammed open, revealing Mordred in the frame.

"Ah," Mordred said with an approving laugh as Cadell's hands tightened on Daphne's thigh, somewhere between pretense and apology. "I didn't actually think you had it in you, Tal."

"Are you wanting to watch, Mordred?" Cadell asked gruffly, and pointedly brushed his lips against Daphne's neck. He kept his eyes on his employer's as he slid the broad side of his tongue up over her jaw, nudging her cheek to have her tip her head back. She complied, fighting a shiver.

"It'll cost you to watch," Daphne managed to warn Mordred, pointedly clawing her nails into Cadell's back. "There are rules here, you know. One at a time, and no free shows."

To that, Cadell tugged her onto his lap, sitting her firmly in his lap.

"If that's all," she said to Mordred, pulling Cadell's mouth to her décolletage, "I have a customer, My Lord."

Mordred permitted a disgusting smile. "Very well. Try to enjoy yourself, Tal," he suggested doubtfully, and laughed again as he vacated the room, leaving Daphne to let out a stifled breath in his absence.

"He is terrible," she said, and glanced down at Cadell, who had dutifully removed his hands from her waist (and his head from her breasts) except for the effort it took to hold her bodice in place, securing it with his hands for lack of lacing. "You really spend all your time with him?"

Cadell nodded morosely. "He's deeply unpleasant. And I told you, he still clearly doesn't trust me," he added, gesturing over his shoulder. "He suspects me of Ministry cooperation, which makes sense, seeing as all my brothers are either in the British Ministry or MACUSA. Still," he exhaled, shaking his head and gesturing to her ruined bodice. "I'm genuinely sorry about this, but if he thought I wasn't..." A pause. "It would set me back months of progress. And I really don't want to be doing this much longer."

He leaned away, shifting to remove her from his lap, but at the thought of releasing him, she hastily shook her head.

"Not yet," she murmured, pulling him back to her. "He might come back."

He glanced up at her, surprised. "Probably not. I mean, not now that he thinks I'm—"

"Cadell." Daphne closed her eyes, sliding her fingers through his hair and then shifting his hands, letting her bodice fall open beneath them. "He might come back."
She felt his breath catch. "Yes, I… I suppose that's possible."

His arms came around her slowly, gently wrapping around her waist.

"Do you do this often?" she asked him.

"What, visit brothels? Mordred does. I don't generally partake, which is why I thought he might find it suspicious." He swallowed, his pulse quickening next to hers as she let her fingers slip, tracing the vertebrae of his neck. "But nobody in their right mind could deny you. If it were anyone else, I'm sure he'd have more doubts, but you, you're—"

"Did you think of me?" she asked tangentially, shifting a little on his lap. He stifled a groan and she felt her body tense in response, quietly attuned to each of his sensations.

"Yes. Constantly." He drew two fingers along the sliced opening of her bodice, lightly tracing a line from her throat to her navel. "Did you think of me?"

Yes. She wasn't even assigned to this case and still, she'd asked Harry for news from the investigation at every given opportunity. She'd checked every Gringotts account of every wealthy suspected criminal for months. She'd even done extensive research on the possible meaning of Mordred, the character from Arthurian legend. She assumed for a time Mordred's identity had been chosen for its significance to the Avalonian Order, but once she'd found it being used more than once, she realized it must mean something more. Mordred, who killed King Arthur.

Cadell's lips pressed lightly to the spot between her breasts and she tightened her fingers in his hair, her breath quickening.

Yes, she'd thought of him. Of this, in fact. And yes, the whole thing was pretense, but now she knew he was alive and well (sort of), a few other things came to mind aside from the investigation about Mordred. Like the way Cadell felt when he was pressed against her, his blade held precariously to her neck. That, and the way he looked at her. Sure, she was dressed as a whore and there was certainly a lot to take in even without looking closely, but the shiver he gave her wasn't for having undressed her with his eyes. It was for how he would have touched her if she let him.

His hands slid under her dress, fingers toying with the lace of her stockings.

"You haven't answered my question," he said, glancing up at her. "Did you think of me, Daphne?"

Oh, you have no idea, she thought. If you only knew the selfish way I put you to use while you were playing sidekick to an evil man's games and betraying your name to catch a twisted murderer. If you had any clue the things I had you do to me in bed while you were here, risking your life, forced to blacken the memory of your dead father—

"Your dead father," she said, suddenly going rigid at a piece of Arthuriana she hadn't yet connected, and Cadell blinked.

"What?" he asked, leaning away. "Is that… hold on, what—"

"In the myths, Mordred is sometimes Arthur's son—and you said this Mordred only trusted you after you spoke against your father," Daphne realized. "Maybe it wasn't because you were proving you weren't working for the Ministry—maybe it's because it was your father."

He paused, letting that sink in, and then nodded slowly.

"That makes sense." Cadell fell silent for a moment, frowning to himself. "So you think Mordred might be doing all this to act against his father? But then why attack the Ministry?"

"Arthur is a political figurehead. Maybe Mordred's father is in the Ministry, or he was," Daphne said, thoughts whirring. "Maybe they're estranged?"

"I could ask him questions about his father," Cadell agreed, thinking it over. "I've never really known what connection to make with him, but there might be something to that—"

"Yes, you'll have to," Daphne said firmly, glancing down at him. "You'll have to bond with him over it. The more details you pick up about his adolescence, the more we can figure out who he is. Do you know how old he is?"

"In his early forties?" Cadell guessed. "He projects like a man in his fifties, but he sometimes doesn't know references his older associates make. He plays it off, or tries to, but I think he's younger than he seems."

"Unlikely," Cadell said, shaking his head. "I don't think he got a formal education. He also seems to know some things that aren't taught at Hogwarts; wandless stuff."

Daphne nodded, distractedly toying with Cadell's hair. "I can pull a list of all the children born in the 1960s and cross-reference it with a list of Hogwarts attendees in the seventies; that could help. And—"

He cut her off, tugging her closer and tugging her forehead down to his.

"Thank you," he said quietly. "Daphne, thank you."

She blinked, swallowing hard. She was suddenly highly conscious of his lips and where they rested near her cheek, just a reckless breath away from her mouth.

"It's my job," she reminded him, throat dry.

"No, it isn't," he corrected. "This is an Auror investigation. The Department of Mysteries has no involvement in this, and yet here you are. Helping me. Putting your life at risk. You could have sent anyone, but—"

"But I was selfish," she cut in, running her fingers lightly over his mouth. "Because I wanted to be the one to remind you where you belong."

She felt his breath hitch beneath her touch. "You did?"

She swallowed hard, managing a nod. "I wanted you to see me, Cadell. I wanted you to walk in and find me here and feel better. I wanted to be alone with you." She paused, hesitating, and then rushed out, "And I wanted you to want me. I could have found another way to get you alone, but—"

She rested a hand on his chest, letting her fingers spread over the fabric.

"I wanted you to want me," she whispered, tightening her fingers in his shirt, and his arm slid around her waist again, securing her against him. "And now, Cadell, I want you to come home. I want you to show up at my flat, take me to dinner, and then I want you to try to take my clothes off, and I want to be able to say 'oh no, Cadell, so sorry I can't, I'm not that type of girl' and I want you to say 'of course you're not, Daphne, of course not, don't worry I'll call you tomorrow' and then
"I want to stop you from leaving at the last second because I am that type of girl," she struggled to say, "and because it's been eight fucking months and I've been waiting—"

"Daphne," Cadell exhaled, pulling her mouth to his and kissing her firmly, his hands rising to take hold of either side of her face. "I swear, if I could have been here sooner—"

"Shut up," she gasped, and with a hurried, collective push-and-pull amid antiquated skirts he had her on her back, her fingers dropping to tug at the button of his trousers. He stopped, rearing back onto his knees and frowned, his fingers looped with confusion around the belt of her stockings.

"Jesus," he said under his breath, "what is this, a trap?"

She managed a low, desperate laugh, though it caught in her throat for a moment once she watched him fumble for the dagger he'd used to cut her bodice, now pressed flat against her thigh. She held her breath, the cold metal sending a shiver up her spine.

"My sincerest apologies," he told her at a breathless murmur, and sliced the knife upwards, tearing at her underwear for good measure. "I only have an hour, you understand—"

"Yes, fine, I forgive you," she gasped, and he tossed the knife onto the nightstand beside the frame, taking her in his arms again before tugging her down on the bed, wrapping her legs around his hips.

He paused, pressing his forehead to hers, and laughed a little.

"Sorry," he whispered. "I'm a little nervous. Been a while."

She kissed the hesitation from his mouth, licking the smoky aftertaste of scotch from his lips to a little hint of spearmint, tasting it delicately on his tongue. She slid her fingers through his hair and held him steady, shifting her hips with his until the two of them were moving in perfect concert; until they were nothing but seabound tides, aligned in longing synchronicity. He slid his hand around the back of her head, cradling it, and in response, she wrapped her fingers around his wrist, locking him in place.

When he slid inside her, it was like a sigh. Like a whisper of relief. Like a breeze that came in from the shore. She tensed around him, adjusting to the feel of him, and felt him suck in a breath; like a tremor. Like an earthquake. Like a thunderclap on high.

"Come home," she whispered to him, arching her back and digging her heels into his thighs to pull him closer, closer, and please, please, closer. "Come home, Cadell Hawkworth, I've waited long enough—"

He shivered, fingers tightening in her hair as he slipped his lips over her neck and down to her chest, brushing reverently across her ruined bodice.

"Home," he echoed, voice hoarse with gratitude and longing, and in the same moment, Daphne felt herself shatter and fall, twisted and wrenched to searing perfection before floating, weightless, to wrap her arms around his neck, pressing her lips to the column of his throat.

11:15 p.m.

"How was she?" Mordred asked from a velvet fainting couch as Cadell descended the stairs, jumping at the sound of his voice.
"Jesus, fuck," Cadell exhaled, pressing the heel of his hand into his chest and then hurrying to straighten his clothes, running a hand through his hair. "Have you really just been sitting there?"

Mordred shrugged, rising to his feet to throw an arm around Cadell's shoulders. "Well, excuse my lack of faith, Tal, but I didn't think you cared much for the fairer sex," he remarked. "Never seen you delight in pleasures of the flesh before."

Cadell tried not to grimace, managing instead, "You saw her. That's not the usual offering."

"No, no, it isn't," Mordred agreed, chuckling to himself. "A remarkable find. Would've had her myself, you know, if you weren't so eager."

"Well, have to take my opportunities when they come around," Cadell said, fighting to disguise his violent opposition to the idea of Mordred touching Daphne before forcing himself to add, "Which is something my father used to say. Fucking bastard," he muttered, possibly gratuitously. "Did I ever tell you he tried to take me in himself after I killed that Snatcher?"

"Did he?" Mordred asked, mouth tightening. "Sounds like the sort of thing my father would do. Only ever put me to work, til I wasn't even good enough for that. 'Law enforcement,' what a fucking joke, and—" He blinked, catching himself. "Frankly," he amended darkly, "I wish I'd just killed him."

Cadell bit his tongue, trying not to seem too eager. "Well, happy to swap bad dad stories anytime. In the meantime, I should probably pay Lady Mystic," he said, gesturing down the corridor, and Mordred shrugged.

"Don't take too long."

"Mordred warned. "I've got some funds to deposit in the morning. I'll want you making sure I don't run into any…" He trailed off, smiling absently. "Problems."

Cadell fought a shudder and nodded quickly, aiming himself into the other room. Parvati was waiting expectantly and he shut the door carefully behind him, beckoning to her for a quill and parchment.

"Give this to Daphne," he murmured, sketching something onto the page and folding it up, handing it to her. "And tell her that her hunch is right. Mordred's father was in the Ministry—Department of Magical Law Enforcement."

"Will do," Parvati said, smiling slightly. "By the way," she added slyly, "I told you, didn't I? That someone was waiting for you."

Love fiercely, love brightly, because someone waits for you.

She'd said that to him three years ago. Had she known even then?

"You're terrifying," he told her, and her smile broadened.

"Yes," she agreed. "It's one of my many charms."

_Daphne Greengrass' flat

"Why are you still awake?" Pansy demanded, her head flickering into the flames of Daphne's fireplace approximately five minutes after she'd sent an owl with explicit instructions to cause a
"You realize I'm supposed to be sleeping, as a human child is about to come out of me at literally any moment—"

"It's Percy's, human isn't exactly a given," Daphne replied, not looking up from her books to catch Pansy's predictable scowl, "and listen, help me out with this. We know Mordred's father was in the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, but we don't know when. Could his father have been, I don't know. An Auror?"

"No," Pansy said without hesitation, and Daphne looked up, frowning. "No, not an Auror. The groups and causes he supports attack municipal workers, not Aurors. If he wanted revenge on his father—" Pansy paused. "You know who we need, don't you? If we're talking problematic fathers, that is."

Five minutes later, Theo apparated into Daphne's flat.

"Yes?" he said. "I heard patricide and came running."

"Mordred is doing all of this to get revenge on his father, who must have worked for the Ministry," Daphne confirmed, and Theo tilted his head, considering that information. "Who could it be?"

"Well, anyone prominent enough in the Ministry would have recognizable children, too," Theo said, frowning. "It'd be pretty fucking hard to be anonymous."

"Not if he's an illegitimate son, like you said," Pansy reminded Daphne. "He wouldn't have gone to Hogwarts. Probably would have been homeschooled."

"Okay, so we're looking for someone who cheated on his wife about forty years ago," Daphne said, sighing. "which, to be clear, could have been anyone back then. Any ideas?"

"Well, hold on, back to the dad point," Theo said, lifting a finger in thought. "Someone who was a terrible father to his illegitimate son was probably just as bad to his legitimate children. And the Ministry is filled with horrifying fathers," he added, making a face. "Draco's, for example. Or Orion Black. Hell, everyone whose son became a Death Eater, right? Look at fucking Barty Crouch—"

"God, I wonder what happened to the Crouch fortune," Pansy muttered, biting into yet another chocolate frog and pondering it as Daphne searched aimlessly through a pile of old Ministry employment records. "He and his son were the last of that pureblood line, remember?"

"Don't know," Theo said, and frowned. "Was it really a fortune?"

"Yes, absolutely it was. Their vault was near my parents'. It was filled with goblin silver, I remember that much—"

"Goblin silver? Damn, wouldn't have guessed. Did they have a relationship with goblins?"

"Of course, Theodore, don't be stupid. The family was one of the co-founders of Gringotts. I heard they even knew a bit of goblin magic, having made so many deals with them over the years—"

"Wait," Daphne said, looking up. "Gringotts?"

"Yes," Pansy said, licking chocolate from her fingers. "The bank? You may have heard of it."

"Gringotts," Daphne repeated, blinking. "That could be how money gets transferred without any records! Harry said he knew someone on the inside, and—oh my god," she said, jolting forward and hunting through her records, levitating the relevant ones up and grabbing them. "Barty Crouch Sr checked into Saint Mungo's for exactly thirty minutes in 1964," she said, half-squealing with disbelief as she shoved the hospital records under Theo's nose. "He wasn't there for any reason, he just signed in as a visitor at the same time—yes," she yelped, smacking Theo hard in the abdomen. "He went one hour after a baby boy was born in the hospital! No name listed, fuck—give me the payment records," she commanded, rising to her feet and pacing the floor as Theo hastily rose with her, shoving them into her hands.

"Mordred's aliases must be meaningful," Daphne continued to mutter, thinking aloud. "Mordred kills his father, that's easy, but that wasn't the only name he used."

"What else was he called?" Theo asked, and Daphne scanned the list.

"Loki was his most common name," she said, frowning. "Do either of you know anything about Norse mythology?"

"Ooh, hang on," Pansy said, turning over her shoulder. "WEASLEY!"

From behind her, a muffled voice was audible. "Wh- what is i- is it time, or—?"

"No, hush, the baby's still in me. What's the significance of 'Loki' if a man who hated his father was using it as an alias?"

A rumpled Percy revealed himself in the flames beside his wife, his glasses sitting crooked on the edge of his nose.

"Loki is the Norse god of mischief," he said in the midst a broad yawn, "but—" Another yawn. "For fatherhood, specifically—"

"USE YOUR WORDS, WEASLEY," Pansy barked, and Percy hastily straightened his glasses, shoving them up his nose.

"Odin banished Loki," Percy supplied, blearily squinting at Daphne and Theo. "Why, what's this about?"

"Barty Crouch," Daphne explained grimly. "I think Mordred is his illegitimate son."

"Oh," Percy said, blinking. "Well, I worked for Crouch as his assistant. He had a… an account manager of some kind. I think. Definitely someone who had access to his money," he added, frowning. "He was also regularly in communication with goblins. And he once asked me to send an owl closing off access to his Gringotts account."

"That's the banishment! Crouch must have locked Mordred out of the Gringotts account," Daphne said, smacking Theo again. "Where's the bank records?"

He shoved them at her, pointedly holding himself at arm's length.

"Thanks… let's see… when was that, Percy?"

"Great, yes, okay—"

Daphne shuffled through the records until she abruptly stopped, blinking, and stared down at the page.
"Here it is," she said, disbelieving. "You were right, Percy. One name was cut from Barty Crouch Sr's Gringotts account in 1994."

"His other son must have done it," Theo pointed out, glancing over Daphne's shoulder. "Crouch was under the Imperius curse back then."

"Yes," Percy lamented, "I remember. I'm afraid I don't have a very good eye for other people's cursed behavior."

"You think?" Pansy trumpeted brusquely, though she conceded to lean over, kissing his cheek in the fireplace.

"Oh my god," Daphne said, and looked up so sharply she knocked into Theo, sending him reeling. "Oh my god, get Harry. Get Harry right now."

"Right," Theo agreed, fumbling for his wand and conjuring a patronus. "Yes, okay, and… what do you want me to tell him, exactly?" he asked warily, frowning at Daphne with confusion.

"Tell him... tell him we've got him," she said, looking up from the Gringotts records and permitting a slow, grim smile. "Tell Harry we've finally got Mordred."

_Somewhere literally underground_
_Possibly in England?_
_10:00 p.m._

"Boss," grunted one of Mordred's men. "You got that visitor arrivin' shortly."

"Ah, excellent," Mordred said, turning to grin cruelly at Cadell. "Got a surprise for you, Tal."

"For me?" Cadell asked, abruptly discomfited. "To what do I owe the pleasure?"

"Ah, well. More of a surprise for me, actually. That Lady Mystic put out word Lady Guinevere was looking for another fare," Mordred remarked, leaning back in his chair as Cadell felt the blood drain from his face, leaving him chilled. "I told her I'd have a bite this time, if the lady felt up for a trip."

Cadell cleared his throat. "Oh. And she said—?"

There was a timely rustle of silks and the low sound of heels clipping on the wooden floor in the darkened old tavern as Daphne materialized in another elaborate French ball gown, her fingers wrapped loosely around an antique baby rattle that she then dropped none-too-carefully on the floor.

"You asked for me, My Lord?" she said to Mordred, who spared another nasty smile in Cadell's direction, beckoning for her to come closer. "I'm afraid I'm used to slightly more amenable ambiances. Where are we, exactly?"

"Ah, well there's a reason I sent your employer a portkey, love," remarked Mordred. "This place is untraceable, and even if it weren't, I'd hardly give that information away."

"Mm, of course." Daphne took a few steps forward, sparing Cadell a lascivious glance. "Not very pleased to see me again, Sir Talon?"
She gave him a meaningful look, toying with her necklace.

An ostentatious locket.

Cadell blinked, recognizing its purpose.

"Perhaps you might feel safer with me," he suggested to her, keeping his tone even. "If Mordred isn't up for making you comfortable, that is."

"Ah, well, in my experience pain can be sweet," she said, winking at Cadell, "but you're right, My Lord. I do have a strict set of rules. And if your master isn't up for following them, then, well—"
She gave a pretty, delicate shrug before reaching out, brushing her fingers below his chin. "I suppose I could be amenable to another tas-

"You're in a tavern below the Thames," Mordred cut in sharply, as Daphne turned slowly to face him, immediately extracting her hands from Cadell. "The Arrogant Bastard," he clarified at a mutter, and Daphne smiled.

"You have a very consistent aesthetic, My Lord," she told him, shoving him back in his chair and leaning forward. "Mordred. It's all very cleverly related, isn't it? The name. The clubhouse. And," she murmured, climbing delicately into his lap and turning to whisper in his ear, "the way you've spent your father's fortune systematically dismantling everything he publicly stood for."

Mordred stiffened, and Cadell blinked.

"Oh, love, I know all of it," Daphne lamented falsely, tutting softly under her breath. "Your father never gave you anything he gave to his other son, did he? His name. A Hogwarts education. You were left to your own devices your entire life, but at least he gave you a job, right? Until he took that from you, too."

Mordred's hand shifted for his wand and Cadell turned, aiming his concealed dagger directly under Mordred's chin.

"Don't move," he advised.

In the same motion, all of Mordred's associates drew their wands, aiming them at Cadell, who aimed his own with his free hand. He took stock of the room quickly, identifying everyone in the tavern and quantifying their strengths; six of Mordred's circle of twelve were present. Though, helpfully, it was the least talented six.

Daphne, meanwhile, smiled beatifically down at Mordred.

"Oh, not to worry, My Lord, I'm sure Talon here could kill you faster than any of these gents can cast a spell, but we're not nearly done yet. We have a whole history lesson to go through, don't we? Let's start with your origin story," she determined, stroking a long fingernail across his cheek.

"You're the son of Barty Crouch," she said, and Mordred's color drained from his face, "but he never let you claim anything, did he? His name. A Hogwarts education. You were left to your own devices your entire life, but at least he gave you a job, right? Until he took that from you, too."

Mordred tightened his grip on the chair. "Don't you fucking say my—"

"Ragnuk." She smiled broadly as he lurched forward, stopping only as Cadell's blade kissed the side of his neck. "Ragnuk Fitzroy, born on the twenty-seventh of April, 1964. In the absence of "Who, me? No, don't be silly," Daphne assured him, laughing. "I'm just a civic-minded whore you'll never have the pleasure of fucking who wants you to die in prison, Mordred. Or here," she said with a shrug. "We'll see how the rest of this goes."

"Do you realize how many people I have in my pocket?" he hissed to her. "How many fucking vaults I control?"

"Hm? Oh, yes, actually," Daphne remarked. "Which is why I brought along a few personal friends. Draco?" she asked, speaking into the locket. "Hermione, would you two join me, please? You heard Ragnuk, I presume."

"Not to worry, Daph," came Draco's voice in the room. "We arrived a couple of minutes ago."

Immediately, two of Mordred's associates dropped to the floor.

"Oh, come on," Hermione's voice sighed. "I thought we were handling this?"

"Granger, don't be ridiculous," Draco's voice remarked. "You know Potter can't help a dramatic entrance."

There was a ripple of a cloak as Harry revealed himself in the room.

"Nope," he agreed, looking immensely pleased with himself. "I certainly can't, Malfoy. Now, Ragnuk," he said to Mordred, "you can try to fight if you want. Or not." He shrugged. "With your finances already under Ministry control and your Gringotts associates apprehended, I don't think you have any favors left to call in. So, after my colleagues here arrest everyone in this room—"

He stopped, evidently waiting for something, and Mordred scowled.

"You think you're invincible, Harry Potter, but you're nothing but a—"

Harry cut him off with a finger, calling for pause.

"Hello?" Harry barked over his shoulder, and Draco and Hermione promptly flickered into view. "I had a perfect setup for you two. Didn't you hear me say to arrest everyone?"

"Sorry," Draco drawled, eyeing his fingernails. "I make a point of not listening to your maniacal speeches."

"Malfoy, honestly," Hermione sighed, throwing her hands up. "Could you not—"

"That, and also, I was getting this," Draco remarked, and leisurely tossed a narrow vial to one of Mordred's associates. The glass broke easily at his feet, releasing a hazy pink vapor into the air and delivering him to collapse as one of the other associates aimed a spell at Daphne's back, forcing Cadell to counter with the wand in his left hand.

At once, there was a flurry of activity. Draco, Hermione, and Harry dueling against the other three as Daphne yanked her skirts up to retrieve her own wand from where it had been laced to her stocking, holding it under Mordred's chin.

"Just so you know," she murmured to Mordred as he glared at her, "because of you I didn't have sex for eight months, and I'm really not happy about the lost time. So, needless to say, I hope you don't come quietly," she told him, her painted lips twitching with promise, "because I know I certainly won't."

Her gaze flicked pointedly to Cadell, who hastily suppressed a smile.

"You don't need him alive for anything, do you?" he asked Daphne.

She turned to Mordred, scrutinizing him beneath her delicate lashes.

"You fucking bitch," Mordred hissed. "You're going to regret this."

"Somehow I doubt that," she replied, twisting her wand, and without another word, Mordred's chin dropped, head lolling to the side as Cadell grandly offered Daphne his hand, easing her down from Mordred's lap.

"Hi," he said as she lightly dusted her voluminous skirts, collecting herself.

"Oh, hey," she replied, straightening her wig. "What's up?"

"Not too much," he said, just as the green light of an Avada zinged between them.

"Oi," Draco called to them. "Some help?"

Of Mordred's remaining associates, only one was still dueling, recklessly shooting killing curses in all directions as Harry and Hermione ducked behind shield charms, leaving Draco to fumble for another vial from his pocket. As Draco gave a moody sigh (muttering something like 'criminals these days' to himself) Cadell took another look at the people on the floor, grimacing.

It wasn't a particularly pretty sight, though Cadell knew better than anyone how richly they all deserved it. In fact, his opposition was merely limited to the fact that there were still six associates remaining. He knew where at least three of them were, given that they were running an errand for Mordred. Unrelated to financial crimes, Mordred had a number of other criminal enterprises that could continue without his leadership. Any of the remaining six could carry on in his absence. Possibly even rebuild.

Cadell sighed, yet another sinking realization uncomfortably filling the hollowness in his chest.

Daphne had already turned to Draco, rolling her eyes. "Fine, we're coming—"

"Actually, wait," Cadell said, reaching out to take her arm as she turned to him with a frown, bemused. "Arrest me with the others," he said to her. "Please."

"What?" she demanded, balking. "But—"

"Just do it. Stun me and arrest me, and please, make sure nobody outside this room knows I turned on Mordred. It's just—" He hesitated, and then exhaled, letting out the toxicity of truth. "I just saw so much shit," he confessed through his teeth, feeling her lace her fingers through his at the tension in his frame. "I could take them all down, Daphne. I thought," he began, and withered. "I thought I'd spend my whole life being the son who failed my father, who destroyed my whole family for nothing, but maybe I'm not. Not if I keep being useful—if I can do this. Not everyone Mordred worked with is in this room," he repeated emphatically as she swallowed hard, forcing a nod, "but I could find them. I could go after them, I could get them all, but—"

"Cadell." She reached up, brushing her fingers against his cheek. "You're just a damn hero, aren't
He closed his eyes, heavily remorseful. "I'll come home soon," he said. "I promise."

She sighed, letting out a long, lamenting breath, and brought her lips to his.

"I just keep missing you, Tal," she murmured, and in lieu of a proper apology, he kissed her as fiercely as he could manage, determining in the process that perhaps criminal justice was a less compelling cause than resigning himself to die slowly between her legs.

"Well, on second thought," he murmured against her lips, but clever witch that she was, she'd already aimed her wand at his temple.

"Stupefy," Daphne whispered.

Cadell dropped to the floor, limp.

Daphne Greengrass’ Flat
Knockturn Alley
July 21, 2007
5:15 p.m.

"So you finally decided on a name, then?" Daphne asked Pansy’s head, which had burst forth from the flames the moment she'd apparated into her flat. The highly-publicized conclusion of criminal investigations after an anonymous source had left six of the crime lord Mordred's associates tied up in a tavern under the Thames involved a huge, exhausting slew of media coverage (and for Daphne, the requisite skirting thereof). Unfortunately, it had also meant a lot of looking at the calendar, wondering how the days could be moving at such a detestably glacial pace.

"If 'finally' means a mere forty-eight hours after her birth, then yes, we have. Congratulations," Pansy announced grandly, "we named her after you, which I'm sure you're aware is an honor, Daphne Elizabeth, though please do try not to weep—"

"I've told you," Daphne cut in at a groan, "it doesn't count as naming her after me if it's not my name—"

"Oh, hush. Her name is Gwyn," Pansy clarified, rolling her eyes, "because I know your name, you goon. Gwyn Elizabeth Weasley, actually," she added with an undeniable look of mischief, "which is an unfortunate surname, but I'm sure I'll make it up to her via my superior genetics. Mostly I think all these Arthurian crimes have been getting to me. Plus Weasley says it's topical or something, I don't know, I stopped listening—"

"Oh, Pans," Daphne said, surprised. "That's… that's such a nice name, actually."

"Yes, I'm aware," Pansy sniffed. "Now get over here, would you? You promised to come by after work."

"Yes, I know, I'm coming, I was just getting my things, and—"

She paused, something catching her eye.

"Actually—Pans?" she said to the fireplace. "I have to call you back."

"What? Daphne Elizabeth Greengrass, you get over here or so help me—"
But Daphne wasn't listening.

She was looking at the silvery hawk that had landed on her kitchen counter. She'd seen a rough sketch of it once before; delivered to her by a certain Lady Mystic, in fact, after a revel that now seemed so long ago.

When you see this, Cadell's scribbled note had said, you'll know I'm on my way.

"Hello, Tal," Daphne murmured to the patronus, watching it tilt its head to fix her with Cadell's attentive gaze as she approached. "Got a message for me?"

"Something like that," came a voice from the other side of the door.

At the sound, Daphne smiled. She took a moment, collecting herself, and then crossed the room to fling the door open, letting it swing wide.

"You know, this is a terrible neighborhood," remarked Cadell Hawkworth the moment she filled the frame, his mouth quirking slightly as he glanced down at her from his side of the threshold. "Feels a lot like a place I recently left, actually. Though, in your defense, there do seem to be fewer lifeless bodies on the floor."

She wanted to laugh, but couldn't quite manage it.

"Are you home?" she asked him instead, suddenly quite breathless, and gradually, his smile broadened.

"I'm home," Cadell promised her.

Love fiercely, love brightly, because someone waits for you.

"Good," Daphne murmured, slipping her arms around his neck and pulling his lips down to hers. "It's about damn time."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Okay, you people claimed you wanted it, so I DID IT. Happy wayyyy belated birthday pansparks! Also, I swear the previously promised one-shots are still happening. I think the jily will be next? But then again I'm massively unreliable when it comes to these, so we'll see.

---

It's not like they were rivals. That would imply Theo considered Harry to be competition, which he decidedly did not. Harry Potter was less a rival then he was a latent threat, which wasn't an unremarkable position, but it was an important distinction.

They'd already been cast for the season's production of Romeo and Juliet, which was well into rehearsals and rapidly approaching opening night. Theo was Romeo, otherwise known as the uncontested lead, and Fleur, the snobby blonde who embodied everything that was so stereotypically implied in the word 'ballerina,' was Juliet. Harry was merely Mercutio—which, okay, fine, it was a decent part, and 'made a beautiful fucking tragedy out of a death scene typically played with laughably tiresome dramatics' or so the early critics would not stop raving (give or take a few embellishments on Theo's part)—but whatever, he wasn't the lead. Harry wasn't the star.

So they weren't rivals. But that certainly didn't mean Theo liked him.

It seemed to be mutual, anyway. Harry always looked at Theo as if he wanted him to stop doing whatever he was doing, eyes narrowing at something or other in a way that suggested he was mentally noting all the unchecked elbows, the incorrect placements of Theo's chin, the little wobbles in moments that could, should, might possibly be better. True, Theo didn't look like the usual dancer—too tall, too thin, derisively called 'gangling' and 'weedy' for most of his training and often dismissed on sight until the moment he actually began to dance—and he certainly wasn't of the Harry Potter school of recklessly altering choreography from night to night despite countless rehearsals, which Theo supposed might have made him look stiff and uncreative by comparison.

Harry Potter somehow managed to be everything Theo wasn't, and Theo positively loathed him for it. He was pretty sure Harry hated him, too, and figured Harry probably thought the same thing everyone else did: that Theo's money had landed him this. Nobody in the company was particularly sparing with affection for Theo, which was a grand total of zero surprise to him. His father was a patron of the Royal Ballet (as everyone knew and was laboriously reminded each time a show began) so in their minds, nepotism had signed Theo's contract for him.

As if his father had ever given one single fuck what he did.

"You're doing it wrong," said Harry from the doorway, interrupting Theo's after hours rehearsal and appearing in the mirror's reflection as Theo nearly had a fucking heart attack, not aware anyone was still left in the building.

He'd been rehearsing the balcony pas de deux in front of the mirror for the last several hours with Prokofiev's score on repeat in his headphones, the volume turned up each time his frustration grew and his shirt long since discarded for having suffered through hours of sweat. The balcony scene, specifically Theo's opening dance, was the only portion of the ballet which seemed not to impress anyone despite the considerable time he continued to spend on it. It wasn't that there was anything to critique, necessarily; it was simply that praise seemed to be more about Fleur's half of the dance than his. Theo, by comparison, was probably being his too-stiff, too-tall self, as if it were somehow his fault his limbs were so upsetting. He was stronger than he looked, and far more coordinated than he seemed. Still, the chainés were supposed to be captivating, not merely an opportunity for people to admire the set construction before Fleur's dramatic arabesque. He'd been here running it over and over late into the night, more agitated and further prone to stupid mistakes the more he watched himself move.

"Fuck off, Potter," Theo said, but when Harry didn't take that as the dismissal it obviously was—instead frowning at Theo's reflection in the mirror, contemplating something—Theo growled with irritation, removing his headphones from his ears. "Doing what wrong?"

"I don't know. The turns. Everything." Harry was frowning at him, concentrating on something unsaid, and Theo wondered if his father had donated enough money by now that he wouldn't lose his part if he simply punched Harry in the face. "This scene," Harry said, clearing his throat, "it's about love, about the… instability of it."

Theo rubbed his temple, tossing the headphones on the floor. "Great. Excellent notes, Potter. So helpful."

"I'm just saying, you're just—" Harry shrugged, letting his bag fall to the floor. "You're trying too hard. You're making each step so deliberate, but that's not the choreography."

"The choreography is perfect," Theo snapped. "My timing is fine."

"Well, sure," Harry permitted warily, "but the audience can't sympathize with perfection. They don't know how to interpret it. They don't know what it means."

A heap of bullshit, as far as Theo was concerned, but it didn't look like Harry was leaving. Actually, it looked like Harry had been in the process of leaving—warm-ups on, black hair messy and a little stiff with sweat—but he had apparently felt it worth his time to interrupt Theo instead.

"What are you doing here?" Theo asked gruffly. "It's after midnight."

"I get more done when nobody's here distracting me," Harry said, and then without pause, "I mean, do you know why the death scene works so well?"

Jesus. "I don't need a lecture from you," Theo snapped.

He really didn't. He was tired of it, tired of everything, tired of Harry Potter being so fucking good he felt he had a right to comment on Theo's performance even in Theo's private rehearsal space. Theo had heard enough about Harry long before they'd both joined the company; Harry was the precocious one, the chosen one, the golden boy. He was that rare combination of talent and dedication, and by contrast, Theo was… Theo was good. Theo was excellent, obviously, or he wouldn't be the lead. But Harry, their instructors and choreographers had whispered, Harry Potter was gifted. A natural. The best they'd seen in decades.

Theo bristled all over again, and Harry, catching it, shook his head, hastily amending the statement. "I don't mean me," he clarified. "I was going to say the opposite, actually."
That surprised him, and Theo paused. "What?"

"Well, I'm certainly not not good." Harry's mouth twitched with humor, and for whatever reason, Theo found himself curious enough to wait for the statement's probably stupid resolution. "But it's not as if it's just my scene."

It is, though, Theo would have argued if he were a more gracious person. Blaise, who played Tybalt, always managed a perfect depiction of the smuggling necessary for someone who ultimately stabs a beloved character in the back, but it was impossible to look away from Harry. Theo, who studied all his own rehearsal footage, knew grudgingly from experience that nobody but Harry Potter was visible on that stage during the scene. When Harry staggered and dropped, his face beatific with confusion and desperation and things left tragically undone, it was impossible not to feel a low ache of devastation. When Harry-as-Mercutio dies, the audience mourns him. It should be nothing but a plot point that leads to Romeo's impulsive murder, but instead, Harry always managed to make the entire room feel a palpable sense of loss.

"You know what makes it good?" Harry asked.

Theo, who loathed patronizing questions even more than he hated his rehearsal time being interrupted, did not reply. It was after hours, he thought. Maybe he could get away with a slap.

"You," Harry said, and Theo blinked.

"What?"

"You," Harry repeated, slower. "are the reason the death scene is so good."

Theo frowned. "I barely do anything."

Harry shook his head. "Not true. The audience has to feel what Romeo feels, don't they? The entire play hinges on Romeo's decision to seek revenge on Tybalt, which is ultimately his downfall—that's what leads to Romeo's banishment, and what takes him away from his true love. But first," Harry said, taking a step further into the room, "before that can happen, the audience has to believe Mercutio means enough to Romeo that he's willing to risk everything to avenge him."

Harry paused, and then, before Theo could say anything, he was off and ranting again.

"If you were to show anything less than anguish at the loss of Mercutio," Harry continued, "then Romeo's death would mean nothing. It would just be the result of a reckless choice, but because of you, I have something I can use. Because okay, so Mercutio is dying, right?" Harry tried to explain, almost laughably urgent now with his insistence. "When he's bleeding out and his life is flashing before his eyes, what makes him keep fighting? What makes him try to keep going?"

Theo said nothing.

"It's Romeo," Harry supplied firmly. "It's because Mercutio knows that if he dies, Romeo will want retribution, and he'll probably succeed. He knows Romeo will suffer, he'll be exiled, his life as he knows it will fall through his fingers and everything, Juliet included, will be lost. So Mercutio fights to stay alive to save him." Harry paused. "The way I see it," he ventured carefully, "Mercutio hangs on to every thread of life in him because if he doesn't, he can see what will happen. He knows Romeo will suffer for his death—and so, in the moments his body is fading, he tries desperately to hold on."

A not-insignificant piece of Theo wanted to tell Harry this was an extremely loose interpretation. The play called for no such anguish; Mercutio and Benvolio and Romeo were all just Italian fuckboys, one of whom happened to die in the equivalent of a street brawl after one of the others had chased the wrong girl.

"The point is, I can only be as good as you are in that scene," Harry determined, shrugging. "You play Romeo's reaction with such perfect sensitivity, like it means something to you. It makes the whole scene different. It's why people cry when Romeo dies—not just because of the love story," Harry said, shaking his head, "but because of his entire tragedy. A young life, wasted."

Another pause.

"Everything that makes this story beautiful," Harry finished, "plays out perfectly in the way Romeo holds Mercutio in his dying moments."

It was somewhat extravagant praise, which always made Theo uncomfortable. He crossed his arms over his bare chest, suddenly aware of the cool air on his skin. It wasn't like they'd never rehearsed together shirtless—even in groups it wasn't uncommon by any means—but now, all of a sudden, it felt… bare.

Theo preferred to go back to things he understood, like criticism and his latent sense of indignation. "So what's wrong with the balcony scene, then, if I'm so very good?" he drawled, and Harry rolled his eyes.

"You're just—okay, look, hang on, I can't really explain it—"

Harry broke off to remove his warm-ups, under which he was wearing a compression shirt and a pair of unbelievably tight shorts.

Theo, who was wearing fitted joggers, made a face.

"What the fuck are those?" he demanded, flicking his attention to what might as well have been tiny spandex boxer-briefs, and Harry—who had a far more athletic frame and probably no reason to feel self-conscious about anything, ever—didn't even blink.

"Better to see the lines of my legs. Helps me check that the right muscles are doing the work, and listen, okay, here's the thing," Harry said, all one rushed out response as he wandered over to Theo and took his (Theo's, which was frustrating, to say the least) starting position. "Right, so you've got all these—"

Harry cut himself off in favor of doing the turns, abandoning spoken word altogether to focus on the arabesques and the attitudes, the details of which Theo was furious to see were, in fact, not only managing the instinctual quality of motion Theo had been aiming for himself, but were also much easier to see with nothing obstructing the view of Harry's legs. While Harry was outdancing Theo at the steps he'd been rehearsing all night, there was a definite sense of unplaceable dizziness; a surreal quality that Theo couldn't look away from. Harry's grand jetés made him look as though he'd been plucked from the air against his will and dropped; his tours en l'air seemed to very nearly stumble until the millisecond he caught himself, all of the motions somehow managing to still be fluid and uninterrupted.

"The idea, right," Harry said, panting a little by the time he finished, "is all these motions are supposed to be imperfect. Romeo's falling in love, he's throwing caution to the wind. He's quite literally reeling, and then when he touches Juliet—" He broke off. "Well, that's another thing."

Theo blinked. "What?"

Harry looked thoughtful. "You don't… you don't hold her right."
"That's fucking ridiculous," Theo snapped. "Every single one of those lifts is textbook."

"Well, right," Harry said slowly, "and that's the problem. But look, it's none of my business, seeing as you clearly don't want my help."

He wandered away, heading back towards his bag, and Theo, who couldn't quite decide if he was angry or disappointed or both, suddenly found himself calling out after him.

"Prove it, then," Theo said, and in response, Harry's shoulders stiffened. The lines of muscle in his back were prominent beneath his shirt as he tilted his head, weighing the value of biting at Theo's obvious challenge without turning around. "If there's something wrong with my lifts," Theo said, "then prove it. Tell me what I'm doing wrong."

Harry pivoted gracefully, doubtful. "I don't think you can lift me, Nott."

It took everything Theo possessed not to laugh. "I'm stronger than I look, Potter."

Harry gauged him with obvious skepticism.

"You have to lift me," Harry said slowly, "over your shoulders."

"Yes," Theo said. "I fucking know how the lift goes."

It was about thirty seconds long in total, though the lift in question was only about ten. Fleur started it with an arabesque, curling her leg around Theo's body with a sweeping grand rond de jambe; after that, the musical theme would soar, and then Theo would lift her onto his shoulders until she was lying parallel to the ground, giving herself to him completely in more ways than one.

It was supposed to show trust, they'd been told. That she trusted him, and then finally he would let her down and take her in his arms, pulling her close. It's the moment in the ballet that Juliet falls in love with Romeo, and it's both an emotional moment in the narrative and a challenging one in the choreography.

"I don't think you can do it." Harry had folded his arms over his chest.

"Why not?" Theo demanded. "Because my father bought me my lead, is that it? Because I work hard, Potter," he spat, "harder than you think, and just because you've been told you're the golden boy so many times—"

"I don't think that," Harry cut in sharply, flinching.

Ah, but Theo'd hit a nerve, somehow. He could see it.

"Then do it," Theo said, beckoning Harry again. "Show me what I'm doing wrong."

"I—" Harry grimaced. He seemed to be looking for every reason to refuse, but Theo knew perfectly well he wasn't going to. He couldn't resist it; if it were Theo in Harry's place, Theo knew instinctively he wouldn't either. "Fine," Harry said gruffly, stalking back towards Theo. "Are you ready?" he asked bluntly, and Theo gave a low scoff.

"You sound scared, Potter."

A scowl. "Shut up."

Theo couldn't help an irreverent smirk. "Don't tell me," he guessed derisively, "you're worried you can't lift your leg over your—"
But he was forced to break off mid-sentence as Harry moved towards him, beginning Juliet's turns without preamble as Theo shifted to reflexively set his hands on Harry's waist, muscle memory taking over. Fleur's waist was narrow and curved, tiny and soft and flared out at the hips, but Harry, by comparison, felt like a mass of carved muscle, each motion underneath Theo's hands identifiable to an upsetting degree of anatomical perfection.

The first lift, unfortunately, was less smooth than Theo would have liked. He got an arm around Harry's waist, but the shift in physiology was jarring; Theo was too conscious of how hard Harry's stomach was in comparison to Fleur's and how much broader Harry's shoulders felt against his bare chest, and when he lifted Harry off the ground he had to grit his teeth a little from strain, their collective timing not quite perfect. He set Harry back down too roughly, and when Harry's arabesque jerked slightly, lacking Fleur's delicate-limbed finesse, he turned away from watching their respective shapes in the mirror to give Theo an irritable look.

"You're going to hurt yourself making mistakes like that," Harry said.

"Fuck off," Theo replied, turning Harry the same way he always did with Fleur: one arm shifting to place both hands on Harry's waist.

For a moment, they stood still, looking at each other.

Then Harry nodded gruffly, prompting them both forward, and Theo leaned him back over one arm, Harry's torso stretching out to let his fingers skate gracefully towards the floor in one direction, then the other. Theo's cheek grazed Harry's stomach, softly brushing his chest, and by then the motion of pretending to covet his partner had been pounded into his brain, but for the first time Theo noticed details in their motions, all of it somehow made new. He catalogued it in parts: the weight of Harry in his arms. The smell of laundry detergent and sweat. The arch of Harry's back, the jutting bones of his hips, the elongated column of his neck. He held the suspended line of Harry's torso a breath longer than he would have with Fleur—feeling, in this case, the moment called for a slight dramatization—before returning to center and proceeding to drop, as the dance required, to one knee.

Harry paused for a moment, contemplating Theo again.

"You have to hold her like you love her," Harry said, a little winded as he looked down at Theo, still wary. "But not… not just like she's precious to you, even though she is. You have to hold her like you want her," he clarified. "She falls for you in this moment, Nott. She's literally," he clarified with an irritatingly factual tone, "head over heels for you."

This was, of course, idiotic commentary. First of all, it wasn't as if Theo didn't know how to make a woman fall in love with him—at least not when it was required in dance form. That was mostly all ballet was: love, sensuality, desperation, all of it in different parts each time. It was all Theo knew, the motions of seduction as strictly defined by his training as anything else, and he hardly needed a lecture from Harry.

Still, he found his mouth uncomfortably dry. "Yes, Potter," he drawled. "I grasp the metaphor."

"Her body," Harry pressed him, "it... forms itself to Romeo's."

His gaze flicked briefly down to Theo's, and Theo realized for the first time that Harry Potter had the greenest eyes he'd ever seen. That, and his mouth was full of vulnerability. Above the muscle of his abs and chest and the sinewy quality of his thighs, there was a sensuality to Harry that made him obviously a dancer, not just some gym-going dickhead who knew how to bench press.
"Juliet gives herself to Romeo the moment he lifts her," Harry said, and Theo paused for a moment. He tried not to focus too closely on anything else he was currently at eye level with, or to think about anything Harry might (maybe, possibly) be implying.

"Just do the damn lift," Theo eventually said, and Harry hesitated.

"Look, if—if you need to drop me—"

Theo glared up at him, resolute. "I won't drop you."

Harry grimaced, still doubtful.

"Harry." Theo paused, hoping he wouldn't have to beg despite knowing that at this point, it wasn't entirely out of the question. "Just trust me."

The grimace tightened, then slipped away.

"Fine," Harry said, and Theo held his hand up, offering it for him.

Harry's hand slid along the inside of Theo's wrist, hesitant for a moment, and then curled around it, locking in place to use Theo's forearm as an anchor. Harry leaned across Theo's shoulders, one of Theo's hands briefly brushing the back of his legs to help him—the widths of which were, of course, nothing like Fleur's. She was strong, obviously, but slender. Harry's hamstrings might as well have been made of marble, the lines of them stark and broad, and Theo locked his hand behind Harry's knee, completing the lift for half a second before he moved.

Theo, who had always known how badly his strength was underestimated, made a point to take Harry's weight with perfect balance. Within seconds, Harry was stretched across the upper line of Theo's back, the execution performed with a faultless expense of effort.

It wasn't excessively difficult to hold Harry this way. He could see Harry's version of Fleur's motions in the mirror, the graceful, outstretched lift of one leg perfectly timed with Harry's transition from a look of hesitation—lip snagged between his teeth—to relaxation, a languid elongation of every part of him from the tips of his fingers to the outstretched point of his toes. The next part of the lift was typically Theo's least favorite; the releasing of Fleur just slightly, sending his own equilibrium entirely to one side to let her slide one leg down against him, but Harry, who had mostly abandoned his reservations by then, did it with ease. It occurred to Theo only when Harry had curled fully around him that the steps, which nearly always felt halted and too-deliberate beneath Fleur, felt oddly comfortable now. He and Harry locked eyes in the mirror for a split second, but then, caught up in the pas de deux, they moved on, the motions appearing more natural and innate than Theo had ever felt them to be.

It felt like Harry's body molded perfectly to his, and by the time Theo had released Harry from the circuitous steps of the lift, lowering him carefully to the ground, Theo realized he'd forgotten to look at his own form entirely, being instead entranced by how strangely right they looked together.

How right they felt together, too.

Theo's arm slid up to Harry's shoulders; muscle memory again. The next step of the pas de deux with Fleur was to pause, to simulate an almost-kiss, arms wrapped around each other for a brief moment as she stroked his cheek and then they parted, continuing the dance.

Now, though, Harry's chest was pressed to Theo's, and both of them were breathing hard.

"So what did I do wrong?" Theo managed to croak.
"I—" Harry swallowed. "Nothing. That time was—that was different."

"Was it?"

They were nearly the same height, Harry's shoulders slightly broader, Theo's chin slightly higher and his torso narrower. It was difficult for Theo not to compare them when they stood this way, like mirror images. Both were dark-haired, both lined with similar forms of muscle, a strange exercise in symmetry. Theo wondered what it would be like to curl his tongue around the lobe of Harry's ear. He wondered how his teeth would feel sinking into Harry's bicep. He slid his hands down slightly from where they rested around Harry's scapulae to the small of Harry's back, burrowing in the indentations there.

When Harry didn't move, Theo let his hands slip to Harry's hips.

Harry took a breath, his chest expanding against Theo's.

"You sometimes look like you're thinking too hard," Harry mumbled to Theo, his fingers shifting. His hands, until then, had been hovering in the air but fell, carefully, to float gently over Theo's hair and then dropped to his shoulders, each motion its own inexplicably crafted work of beauty. "You didn't that time."

"I was hardly trying at all." Theo's throat was impossibly dry, and Harry's fingers brushed over his mouth. "You're too fucking good, you know," he said with a shake of his head. "You really are a fucking natural, Potter."

He matched the motion of Harry's forehead coming forward and the two of them paused there, skin to skin, Theo's nose sliding delicately along Harry's.

"You," Harry said softly, "are the most beautiful dancer I've ever seen. Everything about you, it's like the dance is being poured out of you, seeping out of every limb. Fleur's good, but she's not you." His voice was hushed, his hips flush against Theo's. "Your father has nothing to do with it. You're good, Nott. You don't look like a dancer and you're better for it. Because every move you make looks like reverence, like a meditation, like something you've brought to life."

"You said I was doing it wrong," Theo reminded him.

"I didn't say you were perfect," Harry growled with displeasure, shaking his head, "but can't you tell I watch you? I thought it was obvious. I can't take my eyes off you." His mouth brushed Theo's in something that wasn't a kiss; something that was just a touch, an exploration. "When you dance," Harry said softly, "I can't look away."

Theo's breath caught as Harry's mouth brushed over his again.

"I thought you hated me," Theo confessed reluctantly.

"I thought you hated me," Harry agreed.

"I do hate you," Theo said.

"I know," Harry whispered, half-smiling, "and it fucking sets me on fire."

His fingers slid up to trap themselves in Theo's hair but it was Theo who closed the distance; it was Theo who dragged Harry's breath up from his lungs and drew them closer, as close as they could be, one body molding perfectly to another. Theo's hips ground against Harry's and Harry's hands—his fucking hands, intent and searching and sure—wandered over all the spare inches of Theo, desperate and hungry and lacking even a trace of hesitation.

Harry's palm slid under Theo's pants, tugging the waistband down, his fingers closing around Theo's cock as he laughed into Theo's mouth; a clever I knew it in reply to Theo's erection that made him bite down with a shudder of both fury and ceaseless want, pressing hard against Harry's lips; a clumsy little scraping of teeth. Theo yanked at Harry's compression shirt and Harry took a step back, pulling it overhead and tossing it to the floor before pausing.

Waiting.

Harry Potter had the torso of a god; perhaps a god of war, or some sort of streamlined ancient mythological hero whose job was to kill hydras and fuck nymphs. His stomach was carved and firm and each crevice was shadowed slightly, dragging Theo's gaze down lower.

"Take the shorts off," Theo rasped, and then, "Please."

Harry didn't say a word as he slid them down, the material straining to pass over the curves of his backside and then clinging to his thighs before the hard length of him sprang up, expectant. Theo swallowed, his own dick still propped up by the band of his joggers, and let his own hand fall, stroking over the tip of it.

Harry shuddered viscerally, every angle of the motion visible from where he stood with his back to the mirror. "Come here," he said, beckoning, and Theo took three long strides to have Harry's mouth on his again.

Harry kissed like he danced. It was natural, unburdened, never too much or too little. He kissed Theo with a sense of agitation, a little yearning, like restraint had been a price, and to Theo, that did not feel unfamiliar. Ballet was discipline. It was the art they made with muscle and bone, the stories they told with pain and sweat. If Harry had been wanting, if he had been keeping his distance, then that was just another dance between them; a pas de deux begun apart before they could move together. Theo licked at Harry's swollen mouth and promised him, as best he could, that he would be worth the waiting.

Theo slithered down Harry's torso, pressing kisses and licks and little bites to the carved out sections of his stomach, then dropped to his knees, to the same place he'd been before the lift. Harry inhaled sharply, watching, and Theo looked up, passing his tongue over his lips before leaning forward to slide them over the tip of Harry's cock, waiting for a telling inhale of breath.

Harry's fingers tightened in Theo's hair as he slid his mouth, his lips and his tongue, along the length of Harry, pulling his hips closer and closer and fucking closer until finally Harry lifted one leg, resting it atop Theo's shoulder in what Theo could see in the mirror—taking a brutally unsubtle and entirely selfish glance—was a faultless line from hip to toe. Harry held Theo's face in both hands, thumbs drawn over his cheeks, and with the same pressure and persistence Theo's nails scraped over Harry's hips, red marks visible in the low light of the rehearsal space. It was rough, inconsiderate, Theo's hands digging into Harry's arse while Harry tugged at his jaw, letting out gruff pants of colorful, relentless obscenities. Harry's hips ground inelegantly against Theo's mouth, his motions a stunning absence of deliberation until he let out a groan, every muscle in his legs gone rigid as he came.

Theo dragged himself up from his knees, swallowing the taste of Harry, and Harry's hand dropped not to Theo's cock—the head of which was stiff and throbbing and perhaps a little blatantly uncoy—but to the bones of Theo's hips, his thumb gliding along the crevices. He turned Theo gruffly, forcing him to face the mirror, and slid Theo's pants down with painstaking slowness, both their eyes locked on their respective reflections as the fabric pooled momentarily at Theo's feet,
"I like watching your neck," Harry said, brushing his lips against it. "Other people might drop their chins, but you don't. You keep your chin high, your eyes up." His hands traveled slowly down, forming his palms to Theo's thighs, his chest pressing into the blades of Theo's shoulders as he shivered. "And your legs—"

"Skinny," Theo muttered, and Harry chuckled.

"Maybe, but I can see every line when you move," he said, flicking lightly at Theo's muscle. "I knew you were strong." A kiss to the back of his neck, then to the top of his vertebrae. "At first glance it's deceiving, but I've watched you plenty."

Theo's eyes closed, relaxing into the feel of Harry's touch, and Harry dug his fingers in tight, curling them into Theo's waist. "You didn't want me to lift you," Theo noted, cracking one eye, and Harry bit down on his shoulder, half-laughing into his skin as he met Theo's glance in the mirror.

"No, I didn't," Harry agreed. "I wasn't sure I'd be able to look at you again after being that close to you, and that," he said, sliding his tongue along a few spare inches of Theo's spine, "would have been pretty fucking bleak."

Theo tried to turn, tried to kiss him, but Harry held him still, hands steady around his ribs.

"Your father didn't get you this," Harry said in Theo's ear. "You did. You're Romeo, it's in your every step. Maybe you don't look like he's supposed to," he conceded, half-smiling, "but still, you made him yours."

"Doesn't matter, you're still better," Theo muttered, his body flooded with a lazy warmth, Harry's lips falling further down the line of his back to let his hands curl delicately around Theo's hips. "You're better than I am, it comes so easily to you. You were born for this, and I—"

"Sometimes," Harry said quietly to the small of Theo's back, "we don't always love what we're born for."

Theo's heart pounded as Harry lowered himself to his knees, his hands curving around Theo's arse and then around to his cock, stroking him. Theo held his breath, watching himself being touched by Harry, hardly able to process it. "You're so good," Theo told him roughly, a reverent truth delivered with a startled whisper. "You're so good, how could you not… love it? How could it not be love, when you, you're—"

He let out a gasp, Harry's tongue sliding somewhere new and different.

"The steps, the movements, that's the easy part," Harry said with a little shrug. "You don't fall in love with something that comes easily. But I told you," he reminded Theo quietly, stroking the line of Theo's thigh, "there's a reason the death scene is so good."

It's you, Theo heard in his head, and closed his eyes as Harry's lips dragged over him again. He kicked his knees out wider, let his mind go blank; let one hand begin stroking mindlessly over his cock while the other, behind him, blindly found the roots of Harry's hair, twining his fingers tightly in the strands.

They weren't rivals, Theo decided again, more firmly this time. That would imply Theo considered Harry to be competition, which he decidedly did not. Harry was the rhapsodic swell of Prokofiev, the ardent dizziness of attraction, the progression of off-kilter leaps. Theo's breath quickened, Harry's mouth on him gradually deeper and more urgent, and the closer he came to mindless exaltation, the more forcefully he came to realize: it was all, all of it, precisely as Harry had said.

Theo had been doing the pas de deux all wrong because he hadn't known that anything could feel like this. He hadn't known it should feel like this, uncontrolled and wild and tempestuous, every beat of it untamed. He thought the steps in his mind, the familiar pulse of them a new and violent rush through his veins, and understood clearly that every repetition he'd undergone until that moment had been a waste. He watched himself now, breath ragged and every muscle tensed, and saw the dance precisely as it should be performed.

He understood it now.

Theo came with a groan, spilling onto his hand, and choked out something like Harry's name, barely managing the effort of syllables. Harry, always gifted with cadence, kissed Theo slowly, indulgently—low back to scapulae, left and then right, up to the top of his spine—and leaning Theo's head back to rest limply against Harry's shoulder.

"I don't suppose you rehearse this late often, do you?" Theo asked, eyeing Harry's reflection in the mirror. "Not that I need help, obviously," he added quickly.

Harry let a slow, satisfied smile spread across his lips before he turned Theo around to face him, dragging Theo's mouth back to his. "Could be persuaded," he said wryly, and then added, with a pulse of promise, "for you."

Theo kissed him back, reveling in it.

"So, um," he said, eyes still closed, and Harry sighed.

"You want to run it again?" Harry guessed drily.

"Yes, definitely," Theo said, shoving him away and reaching for his joggers as Harry backed up with a shake of his head, tossing his shorts up from the floor with the sweeping ease of a lazy rond de jambe. "Ready?"

"Always," Harry said, rolling his eyes.

"Good," Theo said firmly, placing his feet in first and beckoning across the room, something like a leap taking off inside his chest. "I want to see you really work this time."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: For Colubrina, who lured me into this despite my (obviously very weak) insistence I probably shouldn't. Hey, did you guys know I have a vlog now? You can find it on youtube, Olivie Blake is Not Writing. Also, I'll be back with a Halloween one shot for sure, so stay tuned!
Rebel North, Part I

Pairing: Jily (James Potter x Lily Evans)

Universe: magical Outlander-esque AU (you do not need to have watched the show or read the books, it's simply time travel + Scottish Highlands)

Rating: M for sex

Summary: Happy Halloween! Psst, my new book is out today… but since you're here, have some smut!

When Lily's fiancé takes her to Hogwarts Castle on Halloween to work on his latest academic research in 1983, she accidentally gets transported back in time three hundred and fifty years via a strange door on the seventh floor. Lily nearly lands in the dangerous grips of the castle's baron, Lord Voldemort, but a mysterious Scottish laird with a secret of his own intervenes, setting them both on an unexpected path.

It wasn't as if Lily didn't find historical potions to be interesting; she did. She was an intellectual sort of girl—pretty and smart, as her mother had always dotingly told her—but still, there was a time and a place for such things. This, a week before their wedding, was neither the time nor the place for Severus to be more interested in the potions discovery that had been made at Hogwarts Castle than he was in her undergarments.

"Sev," Lily murmured, trying to lure him discreetly into bed. "Can't it wait until morning?"

"Hm? Oh, sorry," Severus said absently, dragging his gaze up from his notes, and Lily managed a smile. It was endearing, at least, how wrapped up he got in his work, even when it was largely inconvenient. "Sorry, I know, but just one more page—it's really fascinating. For example, did you know," he began, clearing his throat and lofting a page up to squint at it as she stifled a sigh, "in the seventeenth century, because there was so little advancement in magical studies in the Scottish Highlands during the middle ages, potion incantations were still mostly wandless by the early modern era, and instead—"

He stopped, blinking, as he presumably caught the evidence of her eyes glazing over. "Sorry," he said sheepishly. "I'm boring you."

"What? No, of course not, it's just… late." She tucked her knees into her chest, bunching her fingers in the duvet. The bedding was, like everything in Hogsmeade, needlessly charming and quaint, and she wished she didn't despise it so much. "You keep reading," she assured him. "We'll just talk in the morning, shall we?"

Severus heard the little off-color note of wrongness in her voice and grimaced, reluctantly leaving his chair but conceding to settle himself beside her on the bed, taking her chin lightly. "Sorry, sweetheart," he murmured, brushing his lips against hers. "I promise, tomorrow is the last of it, okay? And then we can get back to the crushing minutiae of normality," he assured her grimly, "like whether Petunia is or isn't going to throw a fuss over her dress."
Lily gave a tired chuckle. "Well, when you put it that way, perhaps we should just stay."

He smiled. She figured he would like that very much.

"Enjoy your day, won't you?" he said, stroking her cheek. "Don't just stay locked in here fretting over your mother's phone calls. Come up to Hogwarts with me, look around," he suggested. "The castle will be in prime condition for Samhain, and it's quite fascinating, you know, all the history. They say a war with a ruthless Baron nearly destroyed the place three hundred and fifty years ago when it was taken back by a gang of Highland rebels. They even say," he mused, "that every Halloween, the ghosts of the Order rebels who defeated him pay a visit to the castle, riding around the halls and reenacting their victory."

"Oh?" Lily said, impressed. "A gang of ghost rebels sounds kind of exciting."

Severus chuckled. "'Exciting' is one way to put it, yes." He leaned forward, kissing her forehead. "Sleep well, Lily," he murmured, with one final stroke of warmth to her nose. "I promise, I'll have looked over everything tomorrow, and then we can head back to London straightaway."

He'd said that the day before. And the day before, too. The weekend mini-holiday had stretched into Tuesday. After nearly five years waiting for him to propose, Lily had grown a talent for waiting, though she certainly hadn't developed a fondness for it. This was what it was to love a man devoted to his work, she reminded herself firmly, and besides—she wouldn't love him if he were not precisely what he was.

"Okay," she said, pressing her lips to the heel of his palm. "Tomorrow, then."

Hogwarts was a fascinating place, even if it wasn't at all the place Lily wanted to be. To be fair, she didn't want to be at any of her various dress fittings either, but at least at home in London she wouldn't be wandering through an empty castle alone, particularly not on Halloween. She was beginning to worry the suits of armor might wake just to ask her what she thought she was doing noisily pacing the halls. Perhaps it was merely her frustration mixing with Severus' playful teasing, but either way, she was beginning to worry she was beginning to worry she'd end up spending the day consorting with ghosts. The castle was littered with monuments to whichever battle had taken place there however many centuries prior, the main one being the mural painted in testament to the benevolent-looking English noble with an enormous beard who stood at its foreground. The painting was called Reubaltaich, Gaelic for rebel, and for whatever reason, Lily found herself looking at the painting for quite a long time, marveling a little at the odd and almost eerie dignity of the warring Scotsmen set against the castle's shadowed form at dusk.

The monument to the rebels was massive, to say the least, but it was difficult to say which room in the castle was most interesting. The Great Hall was beautiful, of course, all of it presently festive with the hallmarks of autumn. The bedchambers, now mostly portrait galleries, all featured high ceilings, vaulted and stunning, and the tapestries were rich depictions of warfare Lily could hardly imagine. She loved the towers, the view of the castle's grounds and the lake; up there, she almost forgot for a moment how lonely she was, and how little she knew of the future. It was easy to forget one was about to become a professor's wife when one was looking out into the Scottish Highlands. It was easy to forget one was a person at all, really, given the span of such unimaginable beauty.

It was the room on the seventh floor that was the strangest, though, as Lily could have sworn it had been an empty corridor when she'd first passed with Severus on their initial tour of the castle. The door didn't look like the others; it looked older, firstly. It wasn't one of the fire doors that had been installed in the last century like most of the others were, and it looked, somehow, like it was inherently secret; as if it might have needed a key.

"What's in that room on the seventh floor?" she asked Severus when she tried to drag him away from his studies for lunch. She'd known he wouldn't leave, of course, so she'd brought some soup down to the potion labs in the dungeons, feeling a bit victorious when she caught the hints of adoration in his grateful smile.

"There's nothing up there," Severus told her absently, biting into a piece of bread. "It's just an empty corridor."

"No, there's definitely a room," Lily said with a laugh. "I saw it myself, Sev."

There was a pause, an unusual ingredient catching his eye. Evidently, modern potion work had changed quite a bit over time; Lily supposed if medical advancements were possible, magical ones certainly were as well.

"Hm?" he said, temporarily recalling her existence. "You must have been lost, sweetheart. Maybe you meant another floor."

"I—" No, Sev, I know what I saw—"I'm interrupting you," she forced out instead, managing a smile. "Shall I just come back to check on you this afternoon?"

"Maybe around dinner?" he asked. He reached out blindly, snaking an arm around her waist in a motion that was as much instinctive as it was habitual, and she leaned her head against his shoulder.

No chance they were leaving tonight.

"Sure," she sighed. "Dinner, then."

She lingered outside the door on the seventh floor for nearly ten minutes before she eventually decided she'd simply have to try it. If it was locked, then so be it. It wasn't as if she had anything better to do. The brass handle was smooth under her touch, inviting. She gave the handle a tug and it opened—just like that.

She laughed to herself. Maybe it was just a novelty toilet, or a storage room.

At first glance, she suspected it was a storage room, only it was the most disorganized of such rooms she'd ever seen. Things were stacked in piles of what could only be called 'stuff,' or possibly 'junk,' disarrayed and lacking any sort of organization. She wandered around the pillars of items, gaping at the pure scope of it. How could one room contain so many things? Who on earth had built it?

And who, she wondered with a wrinkle of her nose, had thought it wise to put so many expired ingredients in a broken cupboard like this?

She ventured from item to item, from broken portrait bust to tarnished tiara to umbrella stand full of racing brooms, shaking her head. What a waste of a perfectly lovely room. Light was streaming in from windows so large she couldn't imagine how anyone could have missed it; did it even make sense with the castle's external architecture? She supposed a sentient castle could draw light from anywhere, but still.
She paused beside a vial of monkshood, smiling faintly at it. Once upon a time, she'd been a fair hand at potions herself, though it was Severus who had the far deeper interest for it. Still, this was expensive. It was the main ingredient in wolfsbane, and was so prohibitively costly most werewolves struggled to get it. She tucked it into her pocket, resolving to tell Severus something should be done about whatever valuable items might be unknowingly left in this room.

She spent several hours wandering around, reading books left behind by nobles who must have lived here at some point in history before proceeding to temporarily doze on one of the crushed velvet chairs. Eventually she guessed it had darkened enough to reasonably pursue dinner, and she wound her way back through the labyrinth of the storage room to reach the door, wondering whether she could talk Severus into joining her for a pint.

It was Halloween, after all. Magically speaking, Samhain was something of a significant holiday. Maybe that would sway him.

She slid into the corridor, shutting the door behind her. There was the wafting smell of food, she noted, and frowned, wondering if Severus was already eating. Couldn't he have come to find her? She didn't even know the castle still served food. She was about to head for the stairs when a hand closed around her arm, yanking her back.

"And just where do ye think you're goin', lass?" a low voice asked her, and she wrenched forcefully out of his grip.

"Get your damn hands off me," she snapped, glaring at him, and his lips curled up slowly. He had a mean look to him, a toothy grin beneath a full and wiry beard, but it was hard to take him seriously when he was dressed like one of the castle guides. She'd thought it was silly, the outfits, but Severus told her authenticity was paramount to the Hogwarts board of curators.

"Sneakin' around the castle, and with a rebel tongue to boot?" the man asked, his Highland brogue strong and thick. "Lord Voldemort will be wantin' to hear from you."

It must have been some sort of play Severus had neglected to tell her about. He'd said the castle was at its prime during Halloween, hadn't he? It wouldn't be the first time he'd neglected to inform her of an irritating detail.

"I'm not in the mood for this," Lily said, turning to leave, but the man stopped her with a flick of a hand, magically binding her in place. How had he done that? He wasn't holding a wand. She stiffened a little in panic, her mind filling in the blanks about the sorts of things that happened to young women wandering alone at night; she'd certainly heard enough rumors about what happened in university stacks.

"How dare you—"

He took a step closer, yanking her flush against him, and now she was more than a little nervous. He pressed his hands into her waist, feeling over her hips. "Very interestin' clothes you have on, lass," he noted, fingering the hem of her high-waisted jeans. "Is this the latest of Dumbledore's tricks? First them cloaks, now lasses in britches?"

"Don't—" Her mouth was dry as she struggled to reach her wand, but his grip on her was ironclad. "Don't touch me."

He chuckled darkly as her pulse raced. "Lovely form for a rebel, eh? His Lordship will have a lovely time with you, I reckon. One way or another," he added with a whisper in her ear, "he'll be glad to hear you scream."
Her mouth was dry. "This isn't funny. Let me go, now, or—"

He toyed with her ponytail, sniffing at her hair. "Or else what?"

"Let her go, Greyback."

Another voice echoed from down the corridor, steps materializing on the stairs. Lily's stomach roiled as the man holding her spun, facing someone else who'd entered the corridor.

"What do you want, Potter?" her captor demanded.

"That's no way to speak to a laird, Greyback," came a drily disinterested voice. It was as heavily accented as her captive's, but without the snarl underneath. "I wouldn'a wish to tell His Lordship his dogs have gotten rather out of hand, ye ken?"

Lily swallowed hard, unsure whether this situation was better or worse. Where was Severus? She wished she hadn't gotten so far away. Unlikely he'd manage to notice this from down in the dungeons.

"Caught this rebel sneakin' around on His Lordship's private floor," her captor snarled back at the other man. "If I want to have some fun with her first, that's my choosin'."

"Hardly," said the other voice, footsteps coming nearer, and Lily held her breath as he stepped around to face her, the shadow of his form falling over her in the flickering light of the torches. Torches? she thought with alarm, certain they'd been normal track lighting earlier that day, but then she was distracted by the man's face coming into view.

He had black hair, she noted, like Severus, but outside of that, the two men could not have looked more different. While Severus was lean and almost slight, his posture somewhat imperfect from years spent over his books, this man was solidly built, broad-shouldered, his features strong and prominent and his hair long and loose, almost wild. He was wearing a kilt, like the other man, and Lily found herself wildly distracted by the shape of his calves, defined and sturdy. He had an athletic look to him, scars on his hands and his neck, and one, deeply carved, in his chin. His eyes were hazel, a subtle blend of amber-green-grey, and they weren't unkind. They regarded her slowly, searching her, but with something intensely asexual.

He was studying her for something, she realized, though she couldn't imagine what.

"Did Dumbledore send ye?" he breathed in a low voice, and she blinked. Swallowed. She hadn't the faintest idea what he was talking about, but she was growing rather tired of being trapped.

"I can't move," she whispered to him, and he looked up with annoyance, presumably at her captor behind her.

"Let her go," he said. "Greyback, this is a bit much, even for you."

"Fuck off, Potter," said her captor, Greyback. "Lord Voldemort might have no choice but to invite you here, but I know better, your lairdship."

"Your suspicions are quite charming," said the other man, Potter, unfazed. "Still, there's no reason to use a body-bind on a woman, Greyback. She's harmless," he added, flicking his gaze over her briefly as if ascertaining that for himself.

Lily scoffed lightly under her breath and Potter's eyes narrowed in warning.
"Ye'll give us both away," he said, the words barely audible. He was mouthing it almost silently, eyes locked on Greyback behind her. "Just hold your tongue, ye ken?"

This, she thought mutinously, was quite a lot for a theatrical production. She'd have to tell Severus about it—though, maybe that was for the best. This would certainly be persuasive leverage for her to insist on leaving that evening.

"I suppose we'll have to see what His Lordship has to say about this," Greyback said, and Lily saw the knuckles of Potter's hands grow tense, tightening into his palms even as he kept his face stiffly pleasant.

"I expect ye will, then," he said, waving a hand. "Take her straight down to the Great Hall or there'll be hell to pay, Greyback. I'll make sure of it." He paused tartly, then added, "In the meantime, I have business to attend to."

He glanced at her, expressing nothing, and then pivoted away, disappearing down the stairs.

Lily bit the inside of her cheek, furious. The moment this was over, she was going to have them all sacked.

The man playing Lord Voldemort looked convincingly like the portrait Lily had seen in one of the other castle rooms. How they had found him, she had no idea. She also had no idea how they'd gotten the Great Hall ready for a full banquet so quickly, or how they'd filled it with so many historically accurate actors. Surely this was something that could be better advertised? Even the food looked authentic, which couldn't have come cheap.

"Let her loose, Greyback," said Lord Voldemort, waving a hand. He was inordinately handsome, she thought, blinking a little at the sight of him. Wherever they'd found him, he could certainly have a career in films, though she doubted he could play a romantic lead. He had a distinctly villainous look to him, piercing blue eyes and a cruel mouth that lent a visceral sharpness to his beauty. "Who are you?" he asked her, scanning her swiftly.

He was English, not Scottish, she noted, as the real Baron Voldemort had been. She faintly recalled from a plaque she'd read earlier that day that his forcible occupation and installment by the king was an oppressive burden on the Scottish clans.

"My name is Lily Evans," she sighed impatiently, "I'm here with a visiting professor, and listen, I really don't have time for this. I understand if you're upset I was in the storage room, but—"

"Storage room." At that, Voldemort's voice went cold. "What storage room?"

"The room, the one with all the things," she said, waving a hand ambiguously. "The room on the seventh floor, I didn't realize—"

"There is no such room." His eyes flashed with fury. "Who are you?"

Unbelievable. Severus would need to grovel for days to make up for this. "I just told you—"

"Get rid of her," he said disinterestedly, glancing at Greyback. "Now, if you like," he added, "seeing as you're so very eager."

Greyback smiled, his incisors glinting in the flickering light. "As ye wish, Your Lordship." He turned to Lily, bearing what she realized now were claws, letting them flash pointedly for her view. "Would ye like to watch?"
"Fenrir, I'm eating," Voldemort said disinterestedly. "Either an Avada or the carotid will do."

Lily waited for someone to gasp, or to say something, or at least to whisper to each other about how positively savage things used to be. Avada Kedavra was illegal, obviously, even then, as murder of any sort continued to be, and she was stunned to see that not one of the actors broke character. Instead, they were looking at her as if they were... hungry.

No, she thought with a shudder. Eager.

"Wait a minute," Lily said, blinking. "That's—that's not funny, you can't—"

"Now, please?" Voldemort said, irritable with impatience. "And tell Dumbledore I grow tired of his spies. No amount of money he funnels for the Order to infect my household is going to change my mind. Send, I don't know, a finger," he suggested disinterestedly, flicking a hand at Lily. "Or her whole head, if you're worried about authenticity."

"Okay," Lily said with a growl, finally able to remove her wand from her pocket, "that's quite enough. If you could just—"

Lord Voldemort summoned the wand from her hand without a word, smacking it with a single motion into Greyback's chest. "And take this. You should have checked her for weapons before you brought her here. I prefer not to have any splinters," he said with an arched look of displeasure.

"Well, not much can be done with a stick, can it?" Greyback said gleefully, flexing and unflexing his fingers. "As for her head, I suppose I can be convinced t—"

"Your Lordship," came another voice as the man called Potter strode quickly into the hall, another tall dark-haired man (this one, too, uncomfortably handsome, his long hair tied back in a knot away from his face) at his side. "Turns out ye canna quite murder the lass after all. My apologies," he added wryly, sweeping a bow, "but I am afraid I wasna aware Sirius' cousin had joined us for the evening."

"His cousin?" Lord Voldemort asked skeptically.

"Aye, so verra sorry," said the other man, who must have been the aforementioned Sirius. "A bhobain, you canna wander off like that," he said chidingly to Lily with a bit of incomprehensible Gaelic, gesturing for her to agree before glancing up at Voldemort. "If ye dinna mind, My Lord—"

"What was she doing on the seventh floor?" Voldemort asked suspiciously.

"Oh, ye know how the lasses are," said Sirius, looking dastardly cheerful, and Lord Voldemort's eyes narrowed.

"You really expect me to believe that?" he asked. "You can't be—"

"Sirius?" Potter cut in knowingly, tilting his head. "I am afraid, Your Lordship, this has all been a misunderstanding. We'll take her," he added, his eyes slightly more amber as they fell on hers. "Dinna worry, this willna happen again, I assure you. Come now," he beckoned to Lily, beckoning her like a dog. "We'll deal with you later."

Greyback looked somewhere between furious and disappointed as Lord Voldemort set his jaw, intent on something.

"Do you mean to tell me," he said slowly, "that she disobeyed her guardian's direct orders?"
"What?" Lily demanded, turning to glare at him. "This isn't funny anymore, I want t-"

"Oh, aye, she's headstrong, My Lord, but surely isna a threat," Potter cut in smoothly. "If ye simply let her come with us—"

"She's disrespected me twice in my own house," Lord Voldemort said firmly, "and for that, she'll have to be punished. Anyone else in her position would be. Do you disagree, Potter?" he asked curtly. "Or is there some reason you're suddenly so desperate to have her spared?"

"It's," Potter said, looking abruptly trapped. "It's not—"

Greyback stepped forward, smiling mercilessly. "I'm happy to take care of this now, Your Lordship. A few lashes would put the lass in her place."

"You're joking," Lily said, infuriated. "This has gone too far! All of this, this—" She sputtered, unable to put her outrage into words. "This pretense has to end, this is unacceptable—"

"Ah, hush, lass," Sirius said, somewhat nervously. "Er, dear, sweet cousin—"

"Lashes will be fine," Lord Voldemort said, leaning back in his chair. "Just end this, please, Fenrir. The food is getting cold."

Greyback stepped forward eagerly, smiling his chilling smile at Lily. He, she thought, was the least likely to be pretending; no man could fake his degree of bloodlust, no matter how well-trained. Was it possible this was… real?

"Wait," Lily said, scrambling away until one of Lord Voldemort's guards prodded her back in place. "Wait, wait a minute, wait—"

"I'll take them," Potter cut in brusquely, and Lily froze, as did Sirius beside him.

"James," Sirius whispered urgently. "Dinna be noble now, ye stubborn arse, ye know he'll kill ye if he gets the chance—"

"What was that, Potter?" Lord Voldemort said, leaning forward.

"I'll take her punishment," Potter said staunchly, not looking at Lily, and Voldemort's lips curled up in a slow smile.

"Does she mean something to you, James?" he murmured. "Is she someone… important to you? Or, perhaps, to Dumbledore?"

Abruptly, Lily recalled what James had said to her: You'll give us both away.

It seemed his lairdship, whoever he was—or whatever character he was playing—had something of his own to protect.

"If you're asking if I want to see her pretty skin bleed, the answer is no, I dinna wish it," Potter said stonily. "As the patron of the arts ye claim to be, Your Lordship, I expect you'll understand that something this lovely shouldn't be broken by this," he said with a glare at Greyback, "bit of filth."

Lord Voldemort chuckled. "Well, she'd be a better wife for you, James. More your style than that English heiress whose treasury I know you're chasing," he added at a murmur, and Potter flinched slightly. "I always told you money and power didn't suit you, James. Perhaps this one is more your speed. Evans, wasn't it?" he asked Lily. "That doesn't sound like any of the clans. Certainly doesn't sound like Black," he added with a knowing glance at Sirius, who grimaced.

Lily answered with a muted glare.

"Thought so," Lord Voldemort murmured to her, turning back to Potter. "I think it's high time you were settled and sent back to your little country house, James. You've been a guest here long enough."

Potter's mouth tightened. Lily wasn't sure she understood what was going on in the narrative, but she knew whatever the logistics of this was, it was a successful trap. Lord Voldemort rose to his feet, stepping closer to Potter and leaning in, his voice nearly inaudible from where Lily was sitting.

"I know you've been corresponding with someone, and I have my suspicions who it is," Lord Voldemort said, and Potter's mouth stiffened. "I also know you're pursuing a marriage for the wealth your overtaxed clan so humbly lacks, and I know what someone like you would do with that kind of money. Or do you think I don't know what you're all planning?"

Potter's mouth stiffened, and Voldemort laughed. "I could kill you," he mused, curling a hand thoughtfully around his mouth. "Would save me a lot of trouble, only I don't need a reason to upset the other lairds by killing one of their own. This, though." Another low chuckle. "This would be quite the neat solution. Get rid of you, the Order, and Dumbledore's spy, all in one stroke."

He leaned away, and Potter said nothing.

"Your choice, James," Lord Voldemort said, shrugging. "Give the girl to me to punish or claim her as your own. Cousins notwithstanding," he added with a skeptical glance at Sirius. "Marry your little Evans girl or she dies."

Potter glanced at Lily, his mouth tight.

Surely this was a play, she thought.

Surely this wasn't happening.

"Fine," he said, gritting it out. "Come on, then," he beckoned to her, prompting her to freeze with uncertainty, but Lord Voldemort held up a hand with a laugh.

"She still defied my authority," he said. "That still calls for punishment."

Potter looked furious. "Did ye not say—"

"I know what I said. Fenrir?" he called to Greyback, and Potter scowled.

"Fine," he said. "But I'll take my beating in fists, na lashes, and put your filthy claws away," he warned Greyback, who smiled thinly.

"Oh, I've been waitin' for this," he said, and before Lily realized what was happening, Greyback had punched Potter hard below the sternum, aiming a shot that brought the other man to his knees.

He didn't make a sound. He simply collapsed, betrayed by the functions of his body, and met her eye with his. He looked angry, furious, resigned, pained, and then Greyback yanked him up by the collar of his shirt, smiling as he aimed another shot; this time to Potter's ribs, surely breaking at least one with the impact. Potter staggered backwards, looking dazed, and Lily, who could barely stand to watch despite the delighted whispers from the audience, knew only one thing for certain.

This was not pretend.

Sirius was half-carrying Potter into his rooms, lowering him onto the bed as Lily followed in silence, eyeing her feet. Greyback had broken Potter's ribs, his nose, and probably damaged his organs, too. She had forced herself not to look away, knowing this was somehow her fault. She didn't know where she was, but she understood silence was imperative. She'd only said one thing, actually.

"My wand," she'd said to Sirius in a low voice, followed by his frown. "I need my wand."

"Wand?" he echoed, and she grimaced.

"The stick," she whispered, gesturing to it in Greyback's pocket. "I need it back."

"Oh, is it some sort of weapon? Did Dumbledore tell ye t- sorry," he said at her silencing glare, "never mind—oi, the stick," Sirius announced quickly to Greyback, who bit lightly on the edge of it, testing it for something Lily couldn't begin to imagine before conceding gruffly to hand it over.

Now that Potter was seated, barely conscious, Lily fidgeted for a moment, uncertain whether she might unintentionally make things worse before eventually resigning herself to giving it a try, shoving Sirius out of the way.

"Hold still," she told Potter, which was probably a stupid thing to say, all things considered, and then she held her wand to his ribs. "Ferula."

Potter let out an anguished roar of opposition, glaring at her, but she didn't have time to worry about his discomfort. She hurried to cast every healing spell she could think of, easing the pressure on his organs before turning her attention to his face.

"Wait," he gasped, snatching the tip of her wand. "Leave... leave it. He'll... check."

"What?" she asked, unable to understand him through his groans of pain, and Sirius leapt forward.

"James is right," Sirius said quickly. "Voldemort will be expecting to see a bruise, ye ken? He canna know you're a healer," he explained to her, "or he'll suspect he made a bad deal."

"I'm not a healer," Lily said, frowning. "These are standard spells, things we learn in our first year."

"First year of what?" Sirius asked. "Healer training? Did ye study with a shaman?" he pressed curiously. "I hear there are some who still use Merlin's healing books. What is the stick for?"

"It's—" She gaped at him. "This is a wand. Why has nobody seen one?"

"A wand?" Sirius echoed, eyeing it suspiciously. "Is it dangerous?"

"Only if I do something dangerous with it," Lily grumbled, but at Sirius' widening eyes, she hurried to reassure him. "I'm just a witch, honestly—"

"Na a normal one," Potter coughed up, wincing. He seemed to be breathing easier now, the pain of the healing spells subsiding, and after a testing inhale-exhale from his lungs, he pressed his hands to his ribs, looking up at her with awe. "How'd ye do that? Did Dumbledore teach you?"
"And what did he send you there for? That's dangerous, even for him," Sirius said, looking troubled. "Besides, isna a thing up there. We all ken that."

"There's a room there," Lily said. "It's filled with, I don't know. Things. Items. Haven't you seen it?" she asked, and Potter and Sirius exchanged a glance.

"Nobody goes there," Potter said slowly, "on pain of punishment, as I expect ye mighta sorted out."

"Well, I need to," Lily insisted, folding her arms over her chest. It seemed straightforward enough; whatever time or place she was in now, she wasn't where she was supposed to be. She'd have to go back. "I need to get into that room tonight," she said firmly, and rose to her feet, heading for the door.

"Are ye mad?" Potter gritted out, flinging out a hand to hold her back. "You canna go back there, certainly not now—he'll kill you, and me, too—"

"Well, I need to," she said, and paused. "Dumbledore said I needed to," she added, hoping that would work, and James and Sirius exchanged another glance.

Sirius relented first. "If Dumbledore said to, then—"

"Fuck Dumbledore," Potter hissed. "I'm na prepared to die today, Sirius, ye ken?"

"Take the cloak," Sirius urged. "Greyback knows about it, but still, if ye take proper care—"

"This is mad," Potter said, setting his jaw. "This is mad, and reckless, and—"

"You don't have to come with me," Lily cut in, jolting his attention back to her. "I can go by myself without your help."

"Dinna be ridiculous," Potter growled, getting to his feet and then pausing, surprised, as if he'd been expecting pain. Clearly, Lily thought, their healing spells left something to be desired. "If Greyback caught ye," he continued brusquely, "or worse, Voldemort himself—"

"I'm not your responsibility," Lily said, rolling her eyes. "I can take care of myself, and—"

"No, you canna take care of yourself, actually," Potter shot back with a glare, "or else I wouldna have to marry you, would I?"

"I—" She broke off. "That was real?"

"Of course it was—" He stopped himself, shaking his head. "Never ye mind," Potter snapped. "Just… sit down, we'll think of how we can sort this out tomorrow, and—"

"No," Lily said flatly, a little panicked now. "No, I can't marry you. I'm—I'm engaged, and—"

"So am I," Potter retorted. "But as I have to marry you or one of us dies, it seems our previous promises dinna count for much."

"No," Lily said, suddenly overwhelmed. "No, I have to—I have to get back there, I have… I have to—"

She was breathing hard, losing her grip on reality. Severus always called them 'Lily panics' in a tender sort of way, which she'd hated. She'd eventually tire herself out, but in the moment it brought her chest pain, a lurking sense of wrong, as if the pieces of her life were all out of place. She was a person who liked things a certain way, everything lined up neatly and in control. She liked Severus because he was stable, reliable, calming, and now—and now—

"Hey. Lass." Potter's hands closed tentatively around her shoulders, smoothing down to her arms. "Breathe. Can ye hear me?" he asked, and she managed a nod. "Breathe in, then. That's a good lass." His voice was low and soft and she inhaled raggedly, half-choking. "Breathe out. Let it out." He set a rhythm for her, in and out, his fingers curled loosely around her arms as her hands shot out, clutching at his elbows. "Nighean mhath," he murmured to her, "good girl, just breathe."

She calmed slowly, his hand rising from her arm to tuck her hair behind her ear.

"Better?" he asked, and she nodded slowly. "Good," he said, and nudged her a step back. "Now I can get back to telling ye how stupid you sound."

She glared at him, and behind them, Sirius chuckled.

"Better just take her, aye, James?" he advised drily. "Seems the lass is a wee bit stubborn."

Potter shook his head, grimacing over his shoulder, and then turned back to Lily.

"Are ye ready to risk your life for this?" he asked her plainly, and she nodded, perfectly sure of that. Better to die trying to get back to where she'd been than to die of cholera in whatever place this was. If that was the real Lord Voldemort, then this was... the seventeenth century?

She'd surely die of the plague, and she'd read too much about that to chance it now.

"Yes," she said, lifting her chin. "I'll risk it. I'm going, whether you help me or not."

Potter sighed. "I reckon I owe ye a bit." He glanced down, checking his ribs. "Still, I hope you willna make me save your life again, reubaltaich."

She recalled that word from the painting in the castle earlier that day. Reubaltaich. Rebel.

Not today, she thought.

"Good," she said firmly.

After tonight she'd be gone, and then it wouldn't be a problem for either of them.

Except the door was gone.

The door was gone.

"No," Lily whispered, pressing her hand to the castle's stone, and Potter looked apprehensively over his shoulder. "It was here, I—I swear, it was right here, and—"

"We shouldna stay here," he warned her. "We can ask Dumbledore about it, I'm sure he would know, and—"

"Wait." She turned beneath the cloak—a very fine one, considering the lack of magic elsewhere—to glance imploringly at him. "You," she began, and paused. "You believe me, don't you?"

He looked down at her, bemused. "What?"
"I," she attempted again, and winced. "I'm not lying, I swear, there was a door here, there was a room, and—"

She broke off, pained, and he paused for a moment, his face momentarily unreadable.

"Ye say there was a door here, I believe ye," he said. "I dinna think you'd have any good reason to lie. Am I wrong?"

"What? No, of course not, but—" She flattened her palm against the wall. "I wouldn't blame you," she said quietly, "if you thought I was totally mad."

He swallowed, glancing at his hands for a moment before looking back at her.

"I dinna think you're mad," he said, and hesitated for a moment. "I mighta died from my injuries this evening," he told her, his voice quiet. "I'm sorry I didna say so sooner, but I know verra well I would be dying slowly in my bed if not for you."

She shook her head weakly. "Someone could have healed you."

"Not like you. Not this well. You saved my life." He paused, and then cleared his throat. "Now," he said gently, "let me save yours."

She looked up to find him slowly resigning himself to something, breathing out.

"About this marriage," he said tentatively, and she glanced at the wall.

Please, she begged it, please, let me back in. Bring me back to the man I love. Put me where I belong.

Nothing.

Nothing.

"I was meant to wed an English girl, the daughter of one of Dumbledore's allies," Potter said quietly. "It woulda meant supplies, weapons, magic, money—but I'll find some other way. I'll find another way." He looked at her for a long time, searching her for something. "I'm verra sorry the kindest thing I can do for you is claim ye, but if it helps, I will do it."

She shivered. "Will he really kill me if I don't?" she asked carefully, and Potter nodded solemnly.

"You dinna want to test him," he said, swallowing. "It will come down on both our heads."

She believed him. It had come down on his already, and why lie? He had nothing to gain by marrying her.

How had any of this happened?

She shut her eyes, shaking her head.

"Can you do something for me?" she asked, and he gave her a wary nod. "Can you answer three questions for me, but not ask me why I'm asking? You said you believed me," she pointed out, gesturing to the wall when he frowned with uncertainty. "Can I ask you to trust me again?"

He paused, considering her request, then nodded slowly.

She took a deep breath.
"Where am I?" she asked, and he blinked, but delicately ventured an answer.

"Hogwarts Castle," he said. "Hogsmeade, north of Edinburgh."

So it wasn't an issue of place, then. She was precisely where she'd been since the previous weekend. That was disheartening.

"What day is it?" she asked, bracing herself.

He blinked again. "Samhain." Halloween, precisely as it had been when she'd left—which meant only one impossible thing.

She held her breath. "And the year?"

The words fell with a dull thud. "1633."

No, no, no.

"Ah." Her mind spun, tipping her thoughts off balance until she suspected they might slide out from her skull. "Okay."

"Now I have a question for you, lass." He tilted her chin up, searching her face. "What's your name?"

It seemed silly he'd agreed to marry a woman whose name he didn't even know. Silly, she thought, or stupidly chivalrous. "Lily," she said, extending a hand. "Lily Elizabeth Evans."

He glanced at her hand, then offered his. His palm was callused and strong, the raised scars on the backs of his hands brushing hers as he took hold of it, though he didn't give it a shake. Instead he raised her fingers to his lips, touching them briefly to her knuckles.

"Lily," he repeated softly. "My name is James Potter."

"James," she echoed. It slid comfortably from her lips.

She didn't notice he was still holding her hand in his until he shifted his free hand, resting it lightly on her hips. She was wearing jeans, of course. She was always wearing jeans when her mother wasn't pestering her about her clothes, time-travel through a Scottish castle notwithstanding, and James was curiously running his thumb over the material, marveling at its construction.

Or so she assumed. He might have been contemplating what lay beneath the fabric, but she wasn't sure she was ready to consider that possibility yet.

"You will need a gown," he said after a moment, clearing his throat and removing his hand. "Do ye have anything?"

She shook her head silently.

"Alright, then. I'll arrange it." A pause. "Lily," he said, and she looked up, the sound of it strangely delicate, as if he'd crafted it carefully on his tongue before saying it aloud.

"Yes, James?" she asked.

"We'd better get out of here before we get killed," he said.

"Oh," she realized, feeling her cheeks flush. "Yes. Right."
It was hard not to think of the wedding dress she was supposed to have worn on Saturday, only a few days away, when she'd planned to marry a long-familiar man in a black suit, not a stranger in a red and gold kilt. James looked well enough; his hair was slicked back from his face, skin polished with cleanliness, and his jacket—which certainly looked less silly on him than she thought clothes from this period should look on a man—was fitted perfectly to his broad shoulders. Unfortunately, the bruising around his eye had set in, the shadows above his cheeks purpled and swollen. It was something he could have charmed away or eased and instead opted not to, which was a distraction throughout the ceremony.

That, of course, and the fact that he wasn't the man she'd wanted to marry.

Worse, Lord Voldemort was there, and Greyback, and a collection of dirty, stern-looking men who were ostensibly members of James' clan. One, a grumpy man who managed to have both a false eye and a false leg like some sort of Scottish pirate, had been the one to bring Lily her gown. "Here, from Jamie," he'd said, almost intelligible in his thick brogue. He'd thrust it into her hands and then turned and left, not even sticking around long enough for her to realize who he'd meant.

The dress was mostly red, deep and crimson, surprisingly form-fitting and with long, tapered sleeves, a white damask beneath the soft and supple velvet. It was a beautiful gown, though Lily thought she looked a bit odd in it. Her actual wedding dress—the one waiting for her three hundred and fifty years plus a few days away—was white, mostly tulle; a ballgown, and it certainly hadn't required this level of corset-lacing. Her face looked too pale, her auburn hair colorless against the gown.

Perhaps the worst thing about the ceremony was the contrast between Lord Voldemort's gleeful look of triumph and the somber expressions on the faces of James' collection of friends and allies, all of whom seemed to take the loss of James' alternate betrothal as a blow that Lily herself had dealt them. She understood that, in some abstract way. They didn't want her, and she didn't want them. The only thing that kept her from running out of the small stone church was the steady lock of James' gaze on hers, and the single word he said to her when he met her at the church:

"Reubaltaich."

The whole thing went by in a blur, and then the man with one eye was on his feet, heading towards them with a knife. Lily went rigid, startled, and James, seeing her distress, paused the man, taking the knife from him.

"Ye just have to repeat after me, ye ken?" he murmured to her, drawing a thin line in his wrist and then holding his hand out for hers. "Can ye do that?"

Lily's heart sank. Magic like this, with blood, was sacred. More than. There was no getting around it. They'd be bound together as long as their blood still ran in their veins. She wanted terribly to refuse, but now, like before, he was standing there bleeding for her against his will, and it was the second time in two days he had done so.

She held out her hand without an answer. He slid his thumb gently across her wrist, following with the knife so quickly and with such care she felt nothing but the fragility of his touch. Then the man with one eye gruffly tied their hands together, holding them in place as Lily held her breath, uncertain.

"Ye are Blood of my Blood," James said quietly, "and Bone of my Bone. I give ye my Body, that we Two might be One. I give ye my Spirit, 'til our Life shall be Done."
She repeated it back to him, stumbling only slightly on til our life be done, and he gave her a smile that was more of a grimace. She returned with something she hoped was a better attempt, and beside them, the priest beckoned for a kiss.

She tilted her chin up, waiting, but James took hold of her waist first, gently. He pulled her in close, pausing just before their lips met, and slid his nose along hers; comforting her, asking her permission, which she granted with an inhalation, drawing it sharply into her lungs.

"Lily," he said, half-smiling, and kissed her.

She hadn't expected it to feel like much of anything. She'd kissed hello, goodbye, salutation and felicitation, and none of those had ever meant anything. She expected it to be something like that; just skin-to-skin contact, good intentions, and nothing else.

Only it wasn't.

His breath tasted a little like the mead he must have drunk, scented with spices, and he smelled clean, the way a river smells as it rushes between the trees. He filled her nose and her mouth and her lungs and it was a relief, in a way, her lips meeting his. It was as if she'd been running, sprinting at top speed, and had collided with safe harbor, with safety, with the rush of a current before landing smoothly on solid ground. He felt like sun; like too much time in the sun; like the earth when it was cool beneath the shade. Her heart raced and danced and leapt, away and back and forward, cast out on a gust of wind, and his lips were sweet, honeyed, wild. Like she'd pressed her tongue to the taste of adventure itself.

They pulled apart, and she was breathless. He was holding his breath, too. And from his seat in the audience, Lord Voldemort's smile faltered, catching something: a small detail gone awry.

"I now pronounce you husband and wife," said the priest, and abruptly, Lily's cheeks flamed.

She'd married another man. Somewhere Severus was alone and she was here, her hand in someone else's, her blood bound to a stranger she'd only met yesterday. She hadn't even thought of Severus when she'd kissed James Potter.

What had happened to her?

James, catching her expression, visibly faltered. There had been a stunned little smile on his lips after their kiss, a pleasant look of surprise, but it was gone now, the light of it dimmed almost to nothing.

"Well," Lord Voldemort said cheerfully, rising to his feet. "That's that, then. Shall we celebrate?"

Apt, Lily thought, as he was the only one with anything to celebrate.

She let James tuck her hand into the crook of his arm and followed, a floating sense of numbness filling her chest at the knowledge there would still be a long night ahead.

"I'm sorry, lass," James said, grimacing a little as he closed the door behind him, the raucous sounds echoing up from the Great Hall as she settled herself uncomfortably on the edge of the bed. "They're bawdy lads, Voldemort's men, and I fear they willna leave."

"This is all so primitive," Lily muttered, glancing at the finery of her dress and the bedding and scowling at it, wishing it more adequately reflected the rottenness of the situation. "It's barbaric."
"Well, this may surprise ye, lass, but it's no great pleasure for me to lie with a woman who shrinks from my touch," James said, his voice dry and reluctant again. "This wasna my choosing anymore than it was yours."

She glanced at him, more than tipsy; a little annoyed, too, and a little sorry, though she wasn't sure which feeling she wanted to indulge at the moment. "Who were you supposed to marry?" she asked bluntly, apparently opting for the former. "The rest of your friends seem to wish I'd never been born."

"I reckon they do," James said, and she glared at him. "You're just as unhappy to have me, Lily, as they are to have you. I dinna know why it's necessary to pretend."

"That man, though," she said, making a face. "With the eye, he's just so—coarse."

"Mad-Eye?" James said with a laugh. "He's soft as they come, lass. You canna let a missing leg put you off."

"He doesn't seem soft," she muttered grumpily. "He seems like he wants me to live a life of constant misery."

"Constant vigilance," James corrected, and she gave him a skeptical glance. "It's just something he says. Isna important."

She opened her mouth to say something, and then paused, suddenly remembering something she hadn't thought about yet. "He calls you Jamie," she recalled, and James gave her a slow, almost syrupy grin.

"He's known me since I was a wee scrap of a thing, Mad-Eye, and he's too old to change," he said with a laugh. "But I prefer if my wife dinna call me by a lad's name, ye ken?"

"Wife. There it was again. Her head and her morals spun and she grimaced, eyeing her hands. James had leaned closer as they spoke, but she shifted away, angling herself elsewhere.

"At least… tell me something," she urged him. "Tell me about her. Your erstwhile bride," she said with a moody laugh, and he shook his head.

"Well, I havena met her," James said, half-laughing as he leaned against the post of the bed. "It woulda been an arrangement, same as this one, to provide us some of the things we presently lack—though this one leaves us just as starving as we were before," he said grudgingly, "what with Voldemort taking as he does—and with a lady of the house who isna wee bit experienced at running one, much less an entire clan."

She glared at him. "How do you know I have no experience?"

"Just a guess, lass." He leaned forward, resting his forehead against his arm where it propped him up against the bedpost. "If I am not the husband you wanted, Lily, I am verra sorry about that. But as we are both left with no other options, I expect we shouldna spend our wedding night locked in a fight we canna win."

She grimaced. He was right, but still. It wasn't like she was thrilled with the idea of opening her legs for some medieval Scot who, while nice enough, wasn't at all the man she'd been in a relationship with for the past five years, and friends with long before that. She'd been with a few people before Severus had come to his senses and asked her out (most of them foolish regrets, ultimately, hardly even worth it) but this—while apparently tempting enough at times, if their kiss was to be believed—wasn't exactly what she'd dreamed about.
"Did you love him?"

She looked up, startled, to find James looking at her.

"Your betrothed," he clarified. "Was it... a love match, between ye?"

"Oh." Her voice was small and quiet. "Yes, yes it was." She cleared her throat. "But he, um. He's gone," she said softly, feeling her throat tighten. "He's gone now."

"Oh, Lily." James' voice carried a low hum of sadness and she looked up, surprised to find the amber in his eyes settling on hers with palpable sympathy. "I'm verra sorry to hear that. How did he die?"

"Oh no, he's—" She swallowed, half unable to think of a lie, half unable to speak. "It's... he's just, um—"

She trailed off, unsure what to say, and James cleared his throat after a moment.

"Perhaps," he said, pausing to carefully consider his words. "I willna try to fill his place, then." Another pause, a little tick of hesitation in his breath. "Perhaps," he said, "I'll simply be me, and you be you, and whatever we are together, Lily, let it be nothing like it was before. I wasna ready for you, nor you for me, but we can be something different now, can we not? No better or worse, just... us."

In the weighty pause that followed, he grimaced, shaking his head. "Perhaps it's a bit foolish."

"No, James, it's—" It wasn't foolish at all. It was, much to her surprise, precisely what she'd needed to hear. "It's nice," she said after a moment's pause. "I'd like that."

Perhaps Severus would understand. She tried to imagine telling him what had happened; instead, though, she could only picture him bent over his books, poring over his notes.

Briefly, a tiny voice in her mind echoed with something disconcerting.

What if he hadn't even noticed she was gone?

She felt James drawing her towards him before she fully realized what was happening, having been lost in the reedy hum of her darker thoughts until the moment she was colliding with his chest. She caught the hint of his scent again, that vivid sense of rivers rushing, and looked up to watch the amber shift to grey and green and back again, adjusting to the view of her face.

"Ye looked a bit lost," he said. "I thought perhaps I should find you."

"That's," she began, and felt her cheeks flush. "That's quite a line, James. Do you use that on all the girls?"

His mouth twisted upwards in a progression of animated stages, as if he'd fought his amusement for dominance and somehow, she'd won out. "I normally dinna have a problem keeping the attention of a lass, but I suppose you're na a usual one of them, are ye?"

She turned away, feeling silly. She felt doe-eyed and slight in his arms; like the heroine of a romance novel, which she resolutely was not. "You barely know me, James."

"I dinna know you at all, Lily," he agreed with a laugh, the sound of it light and airy as it brushed across her cheek. "I only know you are a dangerous woman, and a hell of a witch."
"Yes, and that's all you need to know," she assured him, a bit distracted by the shape of his mouth. It looked different when he was smiling like this, without restriction. He looked younger, freer, reckless and wild, and there was something about him now that was as familiar to her as her youth. To look at him was to remember sneaking out of her house; tiptoeing across the lawn; borrowing her mother's car without asking. It was that first sip of an amaretto sour on a school night, makeup smeared across her eyes, kissing a boy she'd just met. It was putting on glitter for a rock show, placing her head to the ironing board and making her hair stiff and straight, tying her shirt above her navel and pulling her jeans down low.

Being in James' arms felt like breaking the rules, more dizzying than the mead she'd drunk, and the ghost of who she might have been if she'd never suffered a single consequence crept slowly out of her bones, seizing her fingers and directing her touch until she had tightened them with undeniable longing in the fabric of his shirt.

He shifted out of his jacket, letting it fall to the floor, and paused before brushing the hem of her dress, his fingers hovering above her décolletage. "Do ye need help," he said softly. "With... with the lacing?"

Her heart pounded, ricocheting through her ribs.

"Sure," she said, turning to place her hands against the bedpost. He rested his hands carefully on her waist, steadying her—or himself, unclear—and slid his hands smoothly over the blades of her shoulder, putting himself to work.

His movements were sure and measured, almost rhythmic with their precision. She felt her ribs creak from strain as the dress loosened around them, and James' hands brushed the bit of bare skin between the nape of her neck and the top vertebrae of her spine as she permitted the gown to fall from her shoulders, leaving only her shift.

"Your hands are warm," she said, dazed, and he smiled.

"I'm a wizard myself," he told her. "Just not quite so good as you." He turned her carefully, taking her hand in his, and exhaled softly across her knuckles, warming them. "Some things," he said quietly. "Some things I can do."

She blinked. Blinked again.

"Anything else?" she asked, voice just a touch above hoarse, and his mouth curved and bent, accommodating a smile that became a look of solemnity as he reached for her, carefully cupping his palm around the shape of her cheek.

Tentative would have been the wrong word for his kiss. It was more like testing, experimental, exploratory. He was tasting her with the way he ran the tip of his tongue over her lower lip, applying it with a gentle pulse of pressure. It was a meditative give and take, a brush of his lips to be met with hers, and then a little more, with a pause to see what she offered in return.

At first his hand remained on her cheek, but as she leaned closer, pressing the full weight of her palm against his chest, his fingers slowly traveled up from where he'd set them on her waist, taking a little more distance each time. Up to the base of her ribs, down to her hips. Up slightly higher, dragging his thumb up from the first to the second, then pressure to her waist, then down again to her hips. Up, just under the swell of her breast, then down, further in, lingering at her navel before falling lower.

And then his hands paused.
"Have ye been with a man before?" he asked her, and she nodded somewhat guiltily. It was an unhelpful time to think of the way Severus made love to her, which was detailed and practiced and as meticulous as his notes, equally academic. She enjoyed it thoroughly, but Severus was a man of concentration, at times as severe as his name suggested. There was a sense, with him, of getting it right, doing things by the book.

James was curious in a different way. Each new inch of her he'd gained by virtue of his touch brought a new expression of lightness to his face; a little new awe with each new bit of distance.

"Yes," she said. "And you?"

"No," James said, joking, "havena been with a man myself," and she smiled.

"Yes, but I meant—"

"I know what you meant." He pressed his forehead to hers, half-smiling. "Will ye think less of me, Lily, if I tell you I havena been with a woman?"

She blinked, surprised. He didn't exactly scream inexperience. "You haven't?"

"I'm a laird, Lily," he said with a chuckle. "My father died when I was still verra young, and I have responsibilities to my home, to my clan. Besides, I'm a rebel, at that. I didna have time to waste on stolen pleasures." He stroked the backs of his fingers against her cheek. "And I had a responsibility to my future wife," he told her softly, "though I didna ken who she might be."

Wife. She was his wife.

Lily swallowed. "And are you disappointed?"

"With you? Ah, you're headstrong, Lily. You're trouble. Ye'll be the death of me, I reckon I'm quite sure of that." He drew her face up to his again. "But," he murmured to her lips, letting her savor the taste of a silver lining, "I couldna dreamt you. I coulda wished for many things in a wife," he murmured, "that she be beautiful and clever and strong, and still, I wouldna ken she'd be as beautiful or as clever or as strong as you are, Lily."

"Lily," he repeated, with a kiss this time that she returned, leaning into the taste of it. "Mo leannan. My Lily. Mine," he repeated, snaking an arm around her waist and drawing her so close to him she thought she might simply shatter in his hold, letting out a gasp that tore out from her mouth into his.

He slid one of her legs up—proving they could, in fact, be closer—and she felt the hard length of him pressing against her. An inch and he could slide inside her, and she'd be ready for him, too. Already she was aching, tied up in knots that pulsed for him, throbbing with each careful motion of his hips. He angled her knee wider, the entirety of her body suffering a jolt as his thigh brushed her clit.

"For a virgin," she told him, half-panting, "you really have a handle on this."

His mouth twitched with humor. "I'm a rebel, Lily. Surely you didna think I was too pure of heart."

He did it again, this time shifting lower so his hips rubbed against her. God, she could come like this, right now, without him even inside her. She felt like a teenager all over again, discovering the simple magic of friction. She remembered once thinking dry-humping was more fun than sex—that pretending at sex was much more exciting than the act of sex itself—but now she wished she could go back and tell her younger self that she was wrong; she was so, so wrong.
This wasn't nearly enough. She dug her fingers into the back of James' neck and pulled his lips to hers, finding a way to tell him; to show him with her kiss how much she desperately wanted more.

"Do you want me to teach you?" she asked him, and he paused, his tongue darting hungrily over his lips.

"Show me," he said, taking hold of her hips and pressing her back against the bed. "Please."

She arched a brow, amused. "Have you never even seen a naked woman before?"

"Not one like you." His mouth twitched up. "And not one that's mine."

It was hard not to find his satisfaction with her somewhat compelling.

"Well, your first lesson is that a woman needs more than a man does," she told him, folding her arms over her chest. "So I want to see you first."

His mouth twitched up at one corner, then the other. "Verra well," he agreed, kicking off his boots, one and then the other, before lowering his fingers to the belt wrapped around his kilt. He let the belt fall, then the fabric; then eyed her for a moment before he reached over his shoulder, bunching the back of his shirt with one hand and tugging it over his head.

He let the shirt fall from his hand, kicking the kilt aside, and stood bare in front of her, permitting her to look. "Terrible view, I take it?" he asked, smiling somewhat roguishly at her. "What are your thoughts, lass?"

"My thoughts?" she echoed, unsure how to put them in words. Primarily: that it might have been a mistake to make him go first.

He was, in a word, physical perfection. Which was not to say he was unblemished, as his body had as many scars as his hands and face, flecked all over his skin in crevices and marks—but the construction of him was faultless. He had crevices of muscle that bore evidence of use, of craftsmanship, all structured arms and broad shoulders and shapely chest. His stomach was a broad ripple of curves and angles leading to the defined slope of his hips, and perhaps at another moment she might have noticed the toned lines of his legs, long and firm, had something else not directed her attention to the unmistakable hardness that sat between them.

"Oh," she said faintly, taking a step around him, peering from a new and reprehensibly faultless angle to find that his arse, as she might have suspected, was positively carved from marble. "I take it you've, um." A pause, a sharp inhale caught between her hesitant teeth. "You seem to lift heavy things from time to time."

She watched him bite back a laugh, politely smothering it between his lips.

"Only when required," he assured her carefully, letting her continue her scrutinizing circle around him before reaching out, taking hold of her elbow gently with one hand. "Lass," he said softly. "Fair is fair."

She blinked, pausing in place, and nodded. There was really no point putting it off. She slid the shift from her shoulders, stumbling a little as she let it pool on the floor, and turned to face him, holding her breath.

He did her the kindness of not making her wait for judgment. "Mo leannen," he said, taking a step towards her, "you are." A pause, and then a kiss to the left side of her neck, the warmth of his sigh skating across her shoulder. Then a stroke to her clavicle, his finger sliding slowly between her breasts. "Perfect," he murmured, looking as if he were watching the motion of her breath, and she swallowed hard.

Perfect she most certainly wasn't. She was still betraying one man and lying to the other, and she would need more than several drinks and a few bleary-eyed glances for her to cross that line—but at this point, drawing it out would only make it worse.

"I'm going to… lie back," she said, clearing her throat as she fumbled for the bed behind her, sitting down and sliding herself back across the duvet. "And, um, then you'll just—"

"What do you like?" James asked, turning to face her, and she blinked.

"What?"

"How do ye like to be touched?" he asked, clarifying himself with a distinct lack of chagrin, and she stared at him, breathing hard.

"Oh," she said. "Well, um—"

He leaned forward, resting his palms on the bed, and in her surprise at his proximity, she instinctively clamped her thighs in place; the motion was such a nervous jolt of agitation her knees knocked together, and she let out a growling hiss of 'fuck' before turning her head away, embarrassed. He gave a low chuckle, climbing further on top of the bed and lightly kissing the bone of her patella, gently drawing her ankles apart.

"Show me," he beckoned quietly, and after settling himself near her, he drew her legs on either side of his hips, sitting patiently between them.

The ache inside her after seeing him—after touching him, after breathing his air and feeling his pulse and politely asking her mind not to run wild with thoughts of his hands, his lips, his tongue—was adamant now, and she was grateful, despite her initial surprise, for the chance to relieve some of her festering need for pressure. She slid a hand down, circling the swollen lips of her cunt and dipping lower, inside her. His brows rose, surprised, as she let out a little hiss of need, trying unsuccessfully to trap it in her mouth as she drew her fingers out, sliding them on either side of her clit.

"This," she said with difficulty, "is, um. It's—"

"Let me try," he said, tugging her hips towards him with a look of determination, the white imprints of his teeth momentarily lingering on the swell of his lower lip. His hands fit comfortably around the circumference of her thighs and then dropped, cupping her bum. He brushed his knuckles over her clit and she moaned, clapping her hand over her mouth. "Did I hurt ye?" he asked, looking concerned, and she shook her head.

"No, it's—it's good, I just—"

"Do ye like," he began, and paused. "Other things?"

She blinked. "Like what?"

"Like—" A pause. "Stop me," he said, "if it's… if you dinna like it."

He leaned forward, one hand sliding up to press her hips flat against the mattress, and brushed his lips against her. He kissed her there like he'd kissed her on the mouth, with a slow, careful pulse of his lips, and then tentatively drew his tongue over her. She gasped, and he looked up.

"Bad?"

She shook her head wordlessly and he nodded, grasping the point, and dropped to lay flat on his stomach, her legs pushed up over his shoulders. The muscle of them shifted as she watched, his arms coming up around her thighs to pull her close as he lowered his mouth to the heat of her again. He made a slow motion with his lips, the warmth of his breath tingling against the sensitive flesh of her cunt, and as he slid his tongue inside her, she tightened her fingers in his hair, tugging at the roots.

"James," she whispered.

He responded with another kiss, gentle, and then a motion of his tongue. Up, down, around, swirling around her in a deep, fluid motion. Her hips jerked beneath his touch and he did it again. Again. He learned fast, too fast. He slowed down, sliding his thumb over the place his lips had just been. She shuddered and groaned. He did it again. Trial and error, pause for evaluation, repeat. He scraped his knuckles against her clit and she yanked at his head. "Too much," she growled, and he grinned, directing a kiss of apology to the mound of her pussy. Then he licked, south to north, and sucked lightly.

"Again," she said faintly.

He obliged.

She was twisting and writhing beneath him, hips held unsuccessfully in place with his left hand as he slid the thumb of his right one against her, and—once, twice, a third, a shift of his palm to cup around her as she ground against him—she was shaking, hands fisted in this sheets as her body went rigid and then flooded with release, tingling down to her toes as James lifted his head, curiously watching her face.

"Is that," he said, and paused. "Does that mean—"

She reached down, taking hold of his chin and dragging his face up to hers to press her lips against his without finesse, with urgency, with a barely stifled moan until he had fumbled to fit between her legs, the leaking head of his cock angled at the slit of her cunt. He glanced at her, blinking with momentary hesitation, and she slid her fingers through the thick strands of his black hair.

"James," she said softly, "you're my husband now." Husband. The impact of it struck her square in the chest, and he nodded slowly, understanding.

"Still," he said. "I would prefer if ye… wanted me. Like I—" He broke off, resting his forehead against her. "Like I want to have you," he said, his voice a heated barely-whisper, and she drew his lips down to hers.

"I want to," she told him, tightening her fingers in his hair. "You can—"

A swallow. A pause. A kiss of desperation as she gave in, discarding the last of her reservations; the lost face that lingered at the back of her mind. She would find her way back to Severus somehow, and when she did… She couldn't think about that now. Right now, her survival depended on James Potter, and he needed three words from her.

"I want you," she whispered, and with that, James pushed himself into her, prompting them both to a collective, visceral gasp.
His hips thrusted against hers with patience, slowly, carefully, gradually gaining speed as he went deeper, pouring himself into her as she disentangled herself from any sense of control. It was like a panic attack, just as uncontained and frantic, but this time, as she lost herself, she wasn't spinning out; she wasn't cast out into oblivion alone. James was there, the broad presence of him grounding her in place as they both came, sweat from his brow glinting across her clavicle.

He let his weight drop against her, shifting from his arms to lay against her chest, and while he was solid as a rock, she felt oddly comforted by his body pressing into hers. She ran her fingers over his spine, toying with his skin, and gradually he rolled onto his side, looking at her.

This was it, she thought. His wife. Her husband.

The reality of it flung itself onto her, heavier even than he had been. She was promised to someone else, and she'd betrayed him. Necessity or not, she'd enjoyed the feel of another man; she'd promised her life and her body to someone who wasn't the man she'd said I love you to just the day before.

Did that make her a liar, or just a fool?

"Perhaps we should sleep," James said. He was watching her face, the light of the candles flickering over them both to swath them in uneven glimpses of color, and she turned away, reaching for her shift.

"Perhaps we should," she agreed, slipping it back on and getting into bed beside him, facing her back to him.

She waited, but she never heard the sound of rhythmic breathing. Both of them, it seemed, could do nothing but lie awake, separately caught in a web of their respective sacrifices.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: So, this was YET AGAIN a one-shot that got carried away, so the next two parts will post over the next two days. Happy Halloween! If you have any interest in my original work, Lovely Tangled Vices (my latest book, featuring rival witch sisters, a coven masquerading as a sorority, and my staple: inadvisable romance) is now available. You can find it (and a wild cocktail recipe, be careful) on my website or tumblr. See you back here tomorrow for more rebel lairds!
Rebel North, Part II

Pairing: Jily (James Potter x Lily Evans)

Universe: magical Outlander-esque AU (time travel + Scottish Highlands)

Rating: M for sex

Summary: Part II of Rebel North, continued. Having unwillingly married a Scottish laird who's been all but exiled, Lily has no choice but to join him and his men on their progress back home. Along the way, though, she learns there's far more to her new husband than meets the eye, and she manages to make herself useful in a time of less sophisticated magic.

The next morning was no particular thrill. Opening her eyes to a world she'd inadvertently chained herself to (until it had become willing, she thought with a grimace) was hardly ideal, and especially not when a near-stranger was stirring beside her. James turned his head, looking at her.

"I hope it wasna too terrible," he said in a low voice, and for as much as she wanted to deny everything—especially her own pleasure—she found she could as easily let him linger in disappointment as she could kick a puppy.

"It wasn't, James," she said, turning onto her side to face him. He shifted to face her, brow furrowed with concern. "It's not… it's not anything you did, it's just—"

"The situation?" James guessed.

"Yes." She swallowed. "Yes, it's… all a bit much, I'm afraid."

"Maybe Dumbledore can help ye, Lily. Maybe ye dinna need to stay." He looked perfectly miserable as he reached out, brushing her hair from her cheek. "I dinna wish ye to be unhappy."

"I—" This was torture. Exquisite torment, particularly as she could see the shape of his chest, the muscle of his arms. She could feel the heat of him beside her, bringing an unavoidable flush to her cheeks. Was she really this kind of girl? Could she really throw away the relationship she'd had before, all because the man in her bed was—admittedly—quite up to the task of bedding her?

She shoved it aside.

"I'm not unhappy, James. It'll just… take some getting used to." She exhaled, shaking her head. "I'll need some time to adjust."

He nodded. In the spare glow of morning light from the window his black hair took on a rosy sheen, the wild thickness of it spilling onto his forehead as his eyes changed again, softening to amber. "Ye'll have it. All the time ye need. If you dinna wish to—" He broke off, hesitating. "If ye dinna wish to have me again, you willna need to, seeing as we'll hardly have the time. It's a verra long ways to my family home."
"What?" Lily asked, blinking. "Wait, we're leaving the castle? Today?"

"Yes." His mouth quirked slightly. "I told ye you would need to run a household, did I not?"

"Yes, but—"

"Our marriage is for Voldemort to be rid of me. We dinna have a choice, mo leannan."

"I know, but—"

She broke off, suddenly remembering something.

"What does that word mean?" she asked, frowning as she noted his repeated use of unfamiliar Gaelic. "You called me that last night."

"Oh, ah." James' cheeks flushed slightly. "Nothing, dinna worry. Just a pet name."

"A pet name?" Lily asked, arching a brow. "What, like… darling?"

"Aye, something like that," he said, not quite looking at her. "You havena much to pack, I reckon?" he continued, changing the subject back to what it had been and chuckling to himself. "While we're on the road, Lily, ye'll have to tell us how a lass such as yourself came to be without even a single worldly possession."

"Oh, um—" She hardly wanted to have that conversation. "Yes, I suppose I'll need to find some things. Some clothes," she added, clearing her throat. "It'll be quite cold, won't it?"

"Yes," James said, nodding, "but dinna worry. I'll have Mad-Eye fetch ye something."

"Oh, you don't have to do that," Lily said warily, and to that, James gave her a bright, ferociously adamant look of opposition.

"You're my wife, Lily," he told her, though it seemed to mean something different to hear him say it this time. "You have ownership now of my name, my clan, and you have the protection of my body, if ye require it." He sobered for a moment, contemplating her. "This is what it means to be one with me, reubaltaich, and to be mine, as I am yours. From now on, you will never stand alone, and as for your needs, whatever they are—" He shrugged, the sheet slipping from his shoulder.

"Ye willna want for nothing, Lily, so long as I can help it."

Lily swallowed hard. It was… an excessive offer, to say the least.

Appealingly so.

"James," she said softly, reaching out for him, and his eyes widened for a moment with surprise, darkening to slate as he looked at her. She brushed her fingertips across his lips, saying thank you with the quietest of pressures, and he closed his eyes, leaning into her touch before snaking a hand out around her waist, pulling her closer.

He was still bare beneath the covers. She felt her heart leap in her chest, plummeting rapidly elsewhere, and as his eyes floated open, she could already taste the closeness of him; the still-strange, newly-familiar sense of being near him, breathing in the clean smell of his hair.

"Will ye kiss me, Lily?" he asked her, the words melting on her lips, and she shivered a little, letting him mistake her wanting for cold and permitting herself to be pulled closer, sheltered within the breadth of his frame.
You have the protection of my body.

"James," she said again, gratitude rasping into her voice, and tilted her chin up, touching her lips tentatively to his. He let her linger there, meandering slowly into the kiss, before his arms grew tight around her, yanking her closer, closer, hiking the material of her shift up to slide his palm smoothly over her thigh.

She could feel the tightness of his fingers where they fisted in her shift, holding it at her waist, all the tension between them channeled into the consequence of his grip as he slid her leg between his, putting skin on skin. Lily, feeling bold, ran her tongue across his lower lip, tasting him, and in response he groaned, lost to even the smallest of her movements. How many times had she made love to Severus knowing he was thinking of something else? Some research, some other thing he had to do, some stress or worry? And here was James, a man forced out from his rightful position because of her, treating her kiss like it was the fullest of luxuries. She parted her lips to deepen the kiss, shifting to take hold of the hand that had stilled at her side and easing the tightness of his fist, twining her fingers with his.

He was content to hold her hand, gently running his thumb over her knuckles, and she placed his hand on her hip, sliding it up to her ribs. She felt his breath stutter with understanding, with anticipation, and then he covered one of her breasts with his hand, smoothing his callused palm over it before tweaking lightly at her nipple. She gasped, the sound bursting out without her permission, and in answer he bucked his hips against hers, no longer quite so patient. He rolled on top of her, the sheet falling from his back as she traced her fingers up his spine, and it occurred to her that perhaps the night before hadn't been some trick of ale or desperation.

She wanted him, badly—and what did that say about her?

She went rigid beneath him and he stopped, pulling back to look at her with confusion on his face.

"Did I hurt ye?" he asked, voice gravelly with concern, and she swallowed hard.

She wanted terribly to have him again, to feel him. She wanted nothing more than to arch her hips up, to tell him to fill her, to whisper to him how safe she felt in his arms. She wanted to cry out obscenities about wanting to fuck him—truly, to be fucked by him—and every single one of them choked her into anguished silence, uncertain how she could possibly want him so badly even while knowing he wasn't the one.

"No," she whispered. "No, but I—"

"JAMIE." It was Mad-Eye's voice. "JAMIE, GET YER ARSE OUT OF BED, WE'RE LEAVIN'."

James winced, turning over his shoulder. "I'm a bit busy, Mad-Eye," he shouted, and the door burst open, leaving Lily to let out a squeak of dismay as James sat upright, blocking her from view.

"Let's go," Mad-Eye said gruffly, his good eye falling approvingly on where Lily was tucked behind James. "Congratulations on yer virility, lad, but it'll have to wait."

"I dinna appreciate you breaking into my bedchambers, Mad-Eye," James sighed, carelessly raking a hand through his tousled hair. "My wife requires a certain amount of privacy, ye ken?"

"Oh, I ken, alrigh'," Mad-Eye said with a laugh. "Proud of ye, Jamie, for keepin' the lass wantin' more at this hour—"

"Mad-Eye," James growled warningly.
"—but still, put yer cockstand away, we canna stay much longer. Remus needs ye," he added, and Lily felt the blades of James' shoulders going stiff.

"So soon? I thought it would be at least a week yet until the next moon."

Mad-Eye shook his head. "Days, lad."

Lily frowned, glancing questioningly at James. She couldn't see his expression from where she was hiding behind him, but she caught evidence of stress along the back of his neck.

"Get Lily some clothes," James said, suddenly a laird again. Even like this, naked and admonished, Lily had to admit he had a presence; a palpable sense of authority, which was hard not to admire.

"We'll leave in an hour."

Lily blinked. "An hour?" she asked tentatively, and James twisted around to look at her. "That's…it's just so soon—"

"Mad-Eye'll get you some clothes," James said. "I dinna have a choice, it must be now. Unless there's something else you'll be needing?"

Yes, she thought. To revisit the room on the seventh floor, to go home, to have never wanted you. To have never tasted you.

"No," she said eventually, and James nodded.

"Verra well," he said, and slid out from the covers, reaching for his kilt. "We'll be off shortly, then."

She couldn't decide if it was better or worse to be mounted in front of James on his horse. She wasn't exactly proficient on her own, but still. She hardly needed the steady rise and fall of his chest to remind her of her disastrous conflict about him—which manifested in the occasional drifting of her thoughts to the feel of his thighs astride hers, or the way his arms wrapped around her. Luckily, he seemed equally distracted, muttering things in Gaelic to Sirius or to Mad-Eye as they went, but paying little attention to her. Something was worrying him; whoever this Remus person was, he was important to James, and by the looks of it, to the others as well.

They hadn't ventured far from Hogwarts when James called their travel party to a halt, pausing in the midst of the castle's surrounding forest. "Wait here," he said to Lily, who blinked, startled.

"What? No," she said through gritted teeth, glancing skeptically around. "Alone?"

"I'll have someone wait with ye," James promised. "Mad-Eye willna let anything happen to ye—"

"I'm going with you," Lily insisted staunchly, and James grimaced.

"Reubaltaich, dinna be stubborn today, I beg ye. It'll be naught but a moment, I swear it—"

"I'm not going to wait here, James," she told him. "Why can't I come?"

He grimaced. "It's dangerous."

"So? This is dangerous," she reminded him, waving a hand at the forest and, more importantly, at his ragged crew of disciples. "I'd rather be closer to you than stay here with people I hardly know."
At that, his expression wavered slightly, humor passing over it. "Ye hardly know me, lass, in case you didna remember."

She set her jaw, irritated. "Still. You're not leaving me behind."

He scowled slightly, glancing at an expectant Sirius and then back at her.

"Lily, you dinna understand—"

"It's a werewolf," Lily said, and James blinked. "Right?"

"I," James began, immediately faltering. "I wouldna say—"

"It is," Lily said firmly, "and I can help him. Or her. Or whoever." She folded her arms over her chest. "I helped you, didn't I? And I have—" She blinked, remembering what she'd transferred from her cast-off jeans and placed in the little pouch she'd been given to keep tied around her waist. "I have monkshood, which will ease his transition, and—"

He seemed to have connected the offer with something that might succeed in helping, which even in her rightful time in history was woefully minimal.

"Alright then, lass. Sirius," James barked over his shoulder, holding out a hand to help Lily down from the saddle. She didn't hesitate, instead exhaling relief, letting him lift her with an inconceivable lack of effort before setting her on the ground. "Let's go," James said, steadying her as she nearly stumbled into his chest, finding the earth beneath her feet slightly uneven.

She looked up, her breath catching slightly at her view of him from where she leaned against his chest. His black hair was softer in the forest light, a crown of trees forming regally around his head, and at this proximity, his eyes fell like darkened jade on hers.

"Dinna be afraid of him," James said quietly to her. "He's kind, Remus. But his condition pains him."

"I'm not afraid," Lily said, and to that, James' smile broadened.

"No, I suspect you dinna fear much, mo leannan," he said to her before setting her upright on her own, beckoning for her to follow. "Now come on," he said, gesturing over his shoulder. "We have to find him yet."

The man called Remus was shivering slightly in the cold, wearing little more than rags. He was young, like James and Sirius, but had scratches and scars all over him; clearly the result of his transformations. There was a faint yellowness to his eyes as he looked up at them, fixing temporarily on her, and Lily tried not to falter, but she hung back in deference to James and Sirius as they approached carefully, hands outstretched.

"Remus?" James said. "Moony, can ye hear me?"

Remus turned his head slowly, acknowledging James' presence, but didn't take his eyes from Lily.

"This is Lily," James said, exchanging a worried glance with Sirius, "and she knows how to help ye, Moony. If you let her, she can help ye."

Remus let out a soft snort, his feet pawing with agitation at the ground. Lily could see he was missing a shoe.
"He'll get frostbite," she hissed to James, who didn't look at her. He shook his head, holding a warning finger to his lips.

"Moony," Sirius said, his voice pitched to a low, soothing tone, "it's nearly time. But she can make it easier, ye ken?"

Remus gave a growled-out sort of scoff.

"Just give it a chance, would ye? Ye stubborn arse," Sirius muttered under his breath, surprising Lily. "For once in your life, Remus Lupin, would ye do as you're told? Ye bloody cunt," he added, and though Lily was taken aback by the comment, it seemed to have done the trick. The yellow faded from Remus' eyes, becoming a lighter, softer brown, and he seemed to shake free of it for a moment, his posture going slack.

"Padfoot," croaked Remus, and then, with a slow glance at James, "Prongs."

"Well look at you, ye menace," Sirius drawled, beckoning Lily forward. "Seems the monster within manages some reprieves."

James laughed, the tension broken, and Lily took the opportunity to step closer, holding out the monkshood flower. "I don't have time to make a full wolfsbane potion before you turn," she said apologetically, "but if you just… if you crush this up, there's a bit of a waxy film, and if you rub it on your top lip, just under your nose—"

"Who's this?" Remus asked, glancing at James. "Got yourself a real witch, then, Prongs?"

He was English. Lily was stunned. She hadn't expected him to be so human so quickly, but it seemed the other two were favorable influences.

"I'll have ye ken this is my wife, ye abominable creature," James said, now perfectly relaxed. "Sorry you missed the wedding, but it was rather unplanned."

"Well, it's wonderful to make your acquaintance," Remus said, continuing to surprise Lily with every word he spoke. He reached out a hand, letting her place the monkshood on his palm. "Under my nose, you said? Like some sort of inhalant?"

"Yes," she said, blinking. "It'll ease your symptoms as you transition."

"I'm surprised you're so at ease," Remus remarked, crushing the bulb of the flower between his fingers. "It's not too many people who can stand to be around werewolves."

"Well—" She broke off, recalling his missing shoe. "May I?" she asked, reaching for her wand, and when Remus bared his teeth, hissing at the sudden motion, James launched himself in front of her.

"Careful," he warned her over his shoulder, one hand keeping Remus at bay. "He's an old friend, but still. This close to the full moon, there's no predicting."

"Right," she said softly, reaching slowly for her wand. "Um, may I?"

"May you poke me with a stick?" Remus asked, blinking back the brief return of his wolfishness, and she gave an uncomfortable laugh.

"No, um… just, this," she explained, transfiguring the leaves below his bare foot into a boot to match the other, wrapping around his foot and securing itself. "There," she said, pleased. She hadn't had a chance to do that in a while; Severus usually insisted on fixing things. "And if you'd let me mend your clothes—"

"Let you? My god, please," Remus said, blinking with wonderment as he wiggled his toes. "This is the most human I've felt in weeks."

James warily stepped away, letting Lily venture forward to repair the holes in Remus' clothes, coming close enough watch the fabric stitch itself over. She relaxed into Remus' presence, moving slowly and carefully, and when she was done, he looked at her with a deep, solemn appreciation.

"I am forever in your debt," he told her.

"What, for this?" she asked doubfully, shaking her head. "This is nothing. The wolfsbane will be more complicated, but—"

"Wolfsbane?" Remus echoed.

"Yes, it's a potion to help you between full moons," Lily explained. "To, um. Keep your more troublesome instincts at bay, I suppose you might say."

"Would that mean he can travel with us?" Sirius asked, stepping forward, and Lily turned over her shoulder.

"Yes, of course," she said. "He'll live a perfectly normal life with wolfsbane, minus the actual full moon—but so long as you all take precautions, I see no reason why he couldn-'"

She broke off, finding herself enveloped in a hug from Sirius that prevented her from continuing, the rest of the statement muffled into his shirt.

"Thank you," Sirius said fiercely, his grip on her so tight she wondered if her ribs might break. "Ye've no idea, none at all, how much I thank ye."

"Oh, um. You're welcome," Lily managed to say, blinking with surprise as he released her. "It's nothing, really, it's just—"

She turned, catching James' eye. He was looking at her with a strange expression on his face; something like surprise, but also tinged with a bit of pride. As if he were proud of her, in fact. I'm not the one who's good at potions, she nearly said, breaths away from saying Severus' name, but instead, she let him step forward to take her hands.

"You canna possibly imagine," James told her, "how much ye've helped us. Remus especially, but Sirius, too. And me."

"Oh, it's nothing," she said, tucking a loose strand of hair behind her ear. "Really, it's… it's not difficult, it's—"

"It isna difficult, to look a man in the eye and make him feel he isna a monster? No, Lily," James told her, slipping a finger below her chin and lifting her gaze to his. "It is so difficult most men canna manage it, but you," he exhaled, pausing to shake his head.

In the moment, the trees rustling overhead and leaves displacing themselves at their feet, she could have sworn she saw something change in his eyes.

"I couldna wished for a better woman," he told her quietly.
She wanted to kiss him.

She wanted desperately, achingly, to throw her arms around his neck, to pull his lips to hers, to thank him; to cry and rage and sob that he could make her feel things she didn't wish to feel.

Instead, she merely nodded, stepping back.

"I'm happy to help," she said. "Though I should start working on the potion. I'll need to gather ingredients, get it brewing. He can start taking it the moment the full moon has passed."

James blinked, registering the distance she'd put between them, and gave a tentative nod.

"Verra well," he said, his voice slightly clipped. "Then I reckon we should get started."

James decided to camp for a few days on the outskirts of the wood, biding their time until the full moon. He spent some of that time with her, helping her to find the necessary ingredients for wolfsbane, but much of it was spent in the woods with Remus and Sirius. When he returned, Lily often noticed twigs in his hair, new marks and scratches on his arms; she asked him what he was doing but he only ever demurred, claiming it was "just lads being scoundrels, dinna worry, reubaltaich."

She noticed, though, that the rest of James' crew—Mad-Eye, a set of twins she couldn't keep straight named Prewett, a stocky man called Caradoc Dearborn, and a mostly-cheerful one called Benjy Fenwick—didn't seem to find anything odd about these occurrences. They mostly kept away from her, speaking to each other exclusively in Gaelic, and weren't overly fond of her, though she noticed they were typically hanging around to stand guard in her presence.

Considering they seemed more concerned with her than with the ominous threat of open woods, though, she began to wonder if this was less about her safety than it was about James' privacy. After all, Voldemort had certainly hinted at James' involvement in something nefarious, or at the very least, secretive.

"What's he up to?" she asked one of the twins. She was pretty sure this one was Fabian, though there was no telling.

"Never ye mind, lass," said probably Fabian, possibly Gideon.

Lily, however, was never one to easily give up. She reached discreetly for her wand, conjuring a series of glittering charmed birds. She'd always been especially good with charms, though Severus had considered that more a party trick than a skill. She'd told him party tricks were skills, and not everything required being bent over a musty cauldron.

"Hey, look over there," she said, pointing to the flashes of wings, and the person who actually might have been Gideon—now that she thought about it—pivoted sharply, taken aback.

"Ooh, shiny," said 90% probably Gideon, and Lily slipped away, making her way into the trees where she'd last seen James.

She followed a set of large footsteps, presuming them to be his, but much to her dismay, she was deep into the woods by the time they disappeared entirely, as if he'd vanished altogether. She blinked, staring around the soft earth of a forest clearing, and wandered its perimeter looking for something; broken twigs, perhaps, or something similar she could track. She saw nothing. She frowned, bewildered, and turned around to head back when she noticed something very interesting indeed about woods.
That when you didn't know them very well, it was a very simple matter to get lost in them.

"Fuck," she said under her breath, something catching her attention from out of sight as she whipped around, holding her wand out. "Who's there? James?" she called into the trees. "Sirius?"

She hesitated, then attempted, "Remus?"

Nothing.

She swallowed hard, trying to find the footsteps she'd used to make her way here. She couldn't identify the direction she'd come from and grimaced, finding any trace of footsteps far more difficult to see in this softer, more malleable earth. She took a step, about to simply guess at which way she'd come, when she heard another sound behind her.

She pivoted quickly, wand outstretched. "James," she said.

No answer.

Where could he have gone?

What could he have been up to with Remus?

Something itched in her brain.

Hadn't Remus called him something else?

"Prongs?" she called tentatively, and then something moved behind the trees.

It took her a moment to realize it was a deer; a stag, specifically, and one with a full set of antlers. It gave her the oddest impression she'd seen it before, and she blinked with the recollection of the trees against James' head, forming a crown of branches precisely the same way the antlers curled around the head of the stag.

"Prongs?" she asked again, and the stag flickered quickly out of sight. Then she heard rustling, twigs snapping; footsteps. She tightened her fingers on her wand. "I swear to god, whoever you are, you'd better reveal yourself or I'll—"

"Lily, is it really so verra difficult to do as you're told?" came an exhausted version of James' voice, and Lily let her wand fall with a sigh, stomping towards it.

"James, if you would just—"

She broke off, spotting him where he was standing behind the circle of trees, reaching down for his kilt.

He was…

She swallowed.

He was naked.

He was spectacularly naked.

And—

"Your back," she blurted loudly, and he turned, frowning slightly at her.
"What?"

"Your back, it's—" She shook herself, launching forward. "It's bleeding," she explained, about to reach out towards the trickle of blood that ran parallel to his spine until he turned to face her, distracting her with his... well, and his—

She blinked.

"Yes?" James asked, obviously stifling a laugh at her expense.

"You're naked," she said.

He shrugged. "Yes. A bit."

"A bit?"

"It happens."

"You—" She blinked, piecing it together: Prongs. "You're the stag, aren't you?"

He grimaced. "Yes. Which you shouldna know."

"But why would you—"

"For Remus," he said. "So he willna be alone when he turns."

"But—"

"Lily."

"But you," she blurted, stopping as he stepped closer. "But you... you lied to me," she attempted lamely, looking anywhere but at his chest, or his...

She swallowed.

"Yes. Because it is na permitted," he said, lips curling up with a grim bit of reticence. "A dastardly offense, all of this. Consorting with monsters, transforming ourselves—"

"You didn't trust me?" Lily demanded, and when James' expression faltered, she glared at him. "Turn around," she snapped, and he balked, obviously unused to being told what to do. "Now," she clarified impatiently, "before you get infected."

His eyes narrowed, but he obeyed. This was, of course, only marginally helpful. She could no longer see his dick or his abs, but she was, however, subjected to an eyeful of his sculpted back and arse, which were certainly no poorer a view. She forced herself to be as clinical as possible, casting a healing charm to repair the gash on his back.

"There," she said, watching the skin stitch itself over the same way Remus' clothes had done before stepping away, averting her gaze in relief. "And now, of course, I'll head back. To camp." She swallowed, pivoting sharply. "Just as soon as I figure out which way it is, and then—"

She broke off again, catching motion from her periphery as the frame of his shoulders vibrated soundlessly.

He was laughing at her.
"Don't," she hurled at him, and he laughed harder still, the sound joyously escaping his lips this time as she glared at him.

"Is there something you wish to tell me, mo leannan?" he managed to ask. "Perhaps something you feel you need to say about any of this?"

He was infuriating.

"Yes, actually," she sniffed, lifting her chin. "How is it you can't heal yourself, but you can somehow transform into a deer?"

He shrugged. "Necessity, I reckon."

"And why a deer?"

"Couldna say, lass. Was simply the form which came most naturally."

"And you do this for Remus," Lily said irritably. "So he won't be alone?"

She forced her mouth, which ached to be on his, into a scowl.

"You should have told me," she said. "I would have understood."

For once, he managed to look a bit remorseful. "You may be right about that."

"Yes. I am."

"I'm verra sorry," he told her, softening. "I didna think anyone would understand, ye ken? I shoulda known better—shouldna assumed, seeing as you've never given me a reason to doubt ye," he clarified, "and for that, I am truly sorry, Lily."

She didn't know what she'd expected, but it certainly hadn't been that.

"You're sorry?" she echoed.

"Yes," James said, nodding soberly. "Do ye forgive me?"

God, he was impossible.

She turned her head away. "You're going to freeze like that."

"Well, you didna say I could dress, did you?"

At that, she looked up, startled. "What?"

"You were upset," he said. "I reckon listening was the more important task."

"But—" She stared at him. "What?"

"Was I wrong?" he asked, stepping closer to her.

She was breaths away from him now. If he even inhaled too sharply, his bare chest might brush against the fabric of her dress. She counted the little skips of his pulse near his throat and wondered how loudly his heart was beating; whether his heart, like hers, had raced.
"Tell me, Lily," he said softly to her, "what would you have me do?"

She shut her eyes.

Take me. Have me. Trust me.

Kiss me. Fuck me. Love me.

"James," she said miserably, driven half mad with torment, and he reached out, curling a hand around her cheek.

"Would ye have me, Lily?" he asked her.

She shivered, raising a hand to his chest and placing her palm against it, smoothing her fingers out slowly. She savored the heat of him, felt his pulse quicken beneath her hand, and scraped her nails lightly over his chest, lower to the ridges of his stomach, finally letting her fingers settle around his hip to stroke her thumb beside the throbbing stiffness of his cock.

He was hard for her already. She was, without reservation, desperately wet for him, her breathing shallow and forced. He leaned forward, as if he might have kissed her, but merely slid his nose along her cheek, lips finding her ear.

"Say yes," he murmured to her.

Was there any other answer?

"Yes," she exhaled dizzily, and he swept her up in a fluid, rapid motion, yanking her into him with a growl and backing her against the broadness of the tree behind her.

She'd known him no more than a week, had made love to him only once, and yet her body molded perfectly into his, her back arched to press every inch of herself against him. Her breasts strained against the fabric of her dress and he bent his head, dragging her neckline lower, passing his tongue in tiny, circular swirls over the bud of her nipple until she cried out in desperation, tangling her fingers in his hair. He glanced askance, eyes wild, and located his kilt, moving to take hold of it; probably to lay it (and subsequently, her) over the ground, but she couldn't release him, not even for a moment.

"No," she whispered. "Now. Here."

She could see the glazed look of hunger on his face. "Are ye sure?"

In answer, she yanked her skirt up and grabbed his hand, propping one leg over his hips and dragging the tips of his fingers over the wetness between her thighs. "Do you feel that?" she whispered to him, watching him convulse with longing. "It means I want you, James. It means I want to have you now, right now, circumstances be damned."

He let his fingers saturate with the feel of her, stroking her until she let out a mewl of impatience.

"James, please—"

He grinned, bending to press his lips to her neck. He slid his tongue over her skin, languidly continuing to stroke her, exploring in broader and broader circles until she was sure her knees were going to buckle beneath her.

"James, you bloody impossible arseh-"
He kissed her gruffly, his tongue slipping between her parted lips as she gasped, clinging to him. She was hovering around the brink of orgasm now, precariously balanced on the edge of it, and he slid a finger inside her, then another, working them in and out of her with criminal patience, her breath coming short in his mouth.

She shoved his hand away before she came, yanking her skirts up (wishing, not for the first time, to be in one of her more helpful miniskirts if only for purposes of ease) and he grasped her hips with both hands, effortlessly lifting her to slide his cock inside her in nearly the same motion, both of them choking on groans of satisfaction.

"Yes, like that, James," she said, deliriously pleading with him as he thrusted into her, her skirts shoved up to her waist. She didn't care who saw, didn't care who heard; she only knew she wanted him, needed him; she could think of nothing but him, her vision blurred to everything but the forest's crown of branches around his head. "James," she gasped, legs and arms and cunt squeezed tight around him as she came, the rippling pulse of her orgasm thundering down the entire length of her limbs.

He came with a strangled groan after a few more thrusts, falling against her as she went limp. She couldn't begin to imagine the pair they must have made, him stark naked and covered in scratches and dirt and her with her dress yanked not only up past her hips but also down below her breasts. Still, she refused to release him, holding tightly to claw her nails into his shoulders, digging into the span of his back. The moment they parted, she was sure the remorse would set in; the sensation of wrongness, of having been so impossibly selfish she could manage to forget what her life had once been.

But for now, with him still inside her, she could think only about the way he filled her up, from the tiny little vacancies of her heart she hadn't known she possessed to the voracious craving she had for him, which she'd never known herself to have for anyone before. With him this close to her, holding her like this, she could forget anything else had ever existed, and that alone was far too blissful to release.

"Is this real?" James asked her raggedly, breaking the spell of silence. "Can this be possible? I didn't ken I could want something so badly," he murmured, an uncanny mirror of her thoughts. "Does it always feel like this, Lily?"

He seemed to be begging her for an answer, for reassurance, and she wished she could have answered yes. She wished with all her conviction that she could say she had felt this for Severus, the man she'd always loved. The man she'd promised her life to.

But she knew it would be a lie, and that, out of everything, was the worst of it.

"No," she whispered to him, closing her eyes and curling her fingers into the dark waves of his hair. "No, James, it doesn't."

"I canna breathe," he muttered to her shoulder, shaking his head. "Thinking of you, watching you, my breath comes short. I fear ye will be the death of me, reubaltaich, for how much I want ye. You could ask me to cut out my heart and leave it at your feet and still, I wouldna hesitate to slice open my chest."

She shivered, wondering if this between them was madness, or possibly something else.

Something worse.

"Are ye cold?" he asked, leaning back with concern, and she forced a nod, disentangling herself
"Yes," she said, and with all the restraint she possessed, added, "We should get back."

The first full moon after Samhain was, magically speaking, not to be underestimated. They had camped in place for days, anticipating its effects, and the day they knew the moon would be at its fullest left Lily feeling oddly restless.

"I'm worried, that's all," she said when James questioned her about it. She'd been almost finished with the wolfsbane, which would help Remus recover well enough to join them on the road. She would have enough to ease his condition until the next full moon, but she felt helpless for having little to do to prevent his turning that evening. "What if he gets hurt?"

"Ah, Remus only looks harmless," James said with a laugh. "He's got a set of claws, our Moony. You needna worry about him, reubaltaich."

She bit her lip, not wanting to confess it wasn't actually Remus she was worried about. James had come back from the woods that day with his arms covered in thin, shallow slashes, and Sirius had a freshly gruesome gash beside his eye.

"Just try not to do anything stupid," she told James flatly, and his mouth twitched at the corners.

"Me, lass? I almost never do stupid things," he assured her. "Aside from marrying reckless English rebels from time to time, I reckon I'm as careful as they come."

"He's a wolf, James," she said sternly. "It's not his fault, but his instincts make you prey. If he tries to hunt you—"

"Mo leannan, this isna my first full moon," he told her, vaulting her chin up with one strong hand. "It's a welcome surprise, though, to see you're so verra filled with concern for me."

They hadn't touched since the time in the woods two days prior. She was keeping her distance, and she suspected he was letting her. He hadn't said anything about it, letting her stick to the lie that she needed to focus on her potion, but now, with his thumb so close to her lips—close enough to stroke them, lightly, as she knew he would do if she let him—she tore her gaze away with a lurch, shaking her head.

"You're needed," she reminded him. "You're the laird. You're necessary."

"Oh?" he asked, laughing. "And who needs me for anything around here, hm? Not you, of course."

"Not me," she agreed, vehemently shaking your head. "But what am I supposed to do if… if something happens to you? You can't think to leave me here with Mad-Eye," she grumbled, thinking unhappily of the way his one good eye continued to fix on her with palpable disapproval. "I'd find you and kill you myself," she warned him.

"Ah," James said, "and as you're so busy already, that would be verra inconsiderate of me, would it?"

"Yes." She glared at him. He was laughing at her again, albeit silently. "I have a lot of things to do, James Potter. Murdering you would take a lot out of my day."

"Not to mention the necessary penance," he said, nodding sagely. "And the grieving."
"Grieving? You mistake me for one of your simpering lasses, your lairdship," she informed him stiffly. "We've known each other hardly over a week, and I assure you, I'd be perfectly fine."

To her alarm, he stepped closer at that, catching her off guard as she gasped and stumbled, her hand flying out only to be caught by his quick fingers.

"Lily," he said gruffly, pulling her into him and pressing her, hard, against his chest. "I will never make you grieve for me."

She swallowed, closing her eyes, and let her forehead fall against the beating pulse beneath his sternum. His arms wrapped around her, soothing her into quietude, and for a moment, she simply breathed with him, letting the expansion of his ribs be the rhythm guiding her to comfort.

"It's been barely over a week," she said again.

"Yes," James murmured, brushing his lips against the top of her head.

"This doesn't happen," she mumbled to him. "I don't... it isn't happening."

"You dinna want to care for me, lass?" He looked down, teasing her chin up again. "Am I so verra displeasing?"

No. No, he wasn't. He was kind to his friends. She'd seen him get his hands dirty for them, even though he was above them. Even though it was probably one of their jobs to repair something or to hunt or to cook or to tend the fire, James always did what needed to be done. He was funny, charismatic, clever. He was quick to temper, but easily cooled. He listened when others spoke. He was one of them, an equal, but he was still decisive, firm, logical. When there were problems, everyone came to James for his thoughts. Mad-Eye respected him. The others adored him. James Potter was handsome and charming and full of youth, full of loyalty, full of life.

He was irresistible, and what was worse, Lily couldn't resist him. True, these were circumstances beyond her control, but shouldn't she have had some reservation? Shouldn't she be warier of him? Severus would think him irresponsible, she was sure, and James was that and more, definitely. He was reckless, and for what she knew of the times, extremely careless with his own life for someone who had no living heirs. He was shamelessly, flagrantly absent any self-preservation, which Severus would surely detest.

If Severus were here, Lily knew, he'd call James arrogant, perhaps even smug. She'd probably even agree with him.

But Severus wasn't here.

And James was looking at her like that, and—

"I dinna need time," he told her simply. "A week, a year, a lifetime—I reckon I'd scarcely know the difference. Some things a man just knows, Lily," he said softly to her, bending towards her. "Some things a man feels in his bones and knows to be true."

She pulled away, flinching, before he could kiss her. If he kissed her after saying that, she'd fall for him. She'd fall for him, inescapably, and if there was one thing she couldn't do, it was that. She had to make her way back to Severus; back to her time, and to her life, and she couldn't allow James, with whatever strange appeal he possessed, to keep her from it.

"Just be careful," she said, and turned away, returning to her draught.
He waited a few beats of silence without moving.

"I see," he murmured eventually, and then he turned. "I willna bother ye any further, then."

She didn't answer.

His footsteps quietly faded away, and she felt a gruesome twisting in her chest that she told herself wasn't regret; it was homesickness. She missed Severus. She loved Severus. There was no denying those things were still true.

But once James was gone, the forest suddenly seemed completely empty, and she felt more alone than ever before.

She woke in the early hours of the morning to the sound of shouting. She'd gone to bed without any further sight of James, figuring she would simply see him in the morning when he returned from his little animagus jaunt with Remus.

With Remus.

She jolted upright, hurriedly reaching for her boots and tugging them on, grabbing her wand. She didn't bother to fully dress; merely pulled her cloak over her shift and ran outside, spotting Mad-Eye carrying something in his arms.

Not something, she realized, the blood draining from her face.

Someone.

"James," she shouted, and shot forward, shoving Benjy and possibly Gideon aside to reach him. "James," she exhaled, catching the troubling pallor of his face; he'd been wrapped up in his kilt, but it was obvious he was injured. He was unconscious, and his breathing looked shallow. "What happened?" she demanded from Mad-Eye, who grimaced in non-answer, shaking his head. "Get him in the tent. Now," Lily snarled, and Mad-Eye, who looked as though he'd never been ordered about by a woman half his size before, scowled at her.

"Listen to her," Sirius said, appearing from behind them. He had his arm around a pale-faced Remus, who looked stricken and traumatized with guilt. "Ye'll do as she says, Mad-Eye, or I'll strike you down where ye stand!"

"He's my husband," Lily insisted, her heart racing. James hadn't moved, and his color looked… She swallowed hard, dismayed. She was no healer by training, but he didn't look nearly as alive as he should have. He should have been laughing, telling a bawdy joke; he shouldn't be like this, limp and unable to stand. "He's my husband," she said again, unsteadily this time, "and I can heal him —"

Mad-Eye nodded gruffly, beckoning for her to lead as she hurried him into her tent. James had slept with his men in the open; the tent had been for her privacy. Now it would be for his, she thought with a grimace, noting the men who crowded with worry around them.

"Leave him alone," she snapped impatiently, shooing them away once Mad-Eye had settled James on the ground in her bedding. "Do you hear me? GET OUT," she said, letting Mad-Eye and Sirius take over the process of removing people as she ducked inside, peeling away the fabric of James' kilt to eye the damage.

It was bad. He'd definitely been thoroughly clawed at, though if he'd been bitten, it wasn't a werewolf bite. She fumbled for her wand; she'd have to repair the damage to his intestines, regrow the skin. He'd be dead without a spell, that was for certain, but she had to be calm enough to cast it. She had to focus, and she had to do everything in her power not to panic. She inhaled slowly once, exhaled it out, and searched for something to ease her apprehension.

_Some things a man just knows, Lily._

She swallowed hard, shaking her head.

"Don't die on me," she whispered to him. "Not today, you idiot. You stupid, stupid rebel laird. You will not die on me today."

She held her wand to his wounds and got to work; it would be a lengthy process. His injuries were substantial, and she certainly wasn't a healer by trade. Still, he was young, his body was healthy… he had things to live for. Surely the rest of him would fight to stay alive.

There was a weariness in her bones before long. The muscle in her neck and shoulders pained her, and the tension in them just from enduring the use of the spells was enough to strain the rest of her limbs. Her head hurt, her heart pounded, she could feel beads of sweat dripping down her spine, but this was for James. For James, who'd taken a beating for her that nearly killed him. Who married her at great cost to himself, just to save her life.

When the skin closed up, stitching itself neatly (it would scar, but James had scars already, all over his torso and back and littering his arms and legs) she waited, eyes closed, for what might come. Perhaps nothing for some time. His body would still need to recover its usual functions; he may not be conscious for many hours yet. She lay down at his side, facing him, and realized he would need to be warmed. She took her cloak, spreading it over them both, and pressed herself close to him.

Then she waited, his shallow breathing beside her identifiable, but slow.

So she waited.

And waited.

Outside, the light came and went.

And still Lily lay beside him, waiting for him to wake.

"Lily."

Her eyes snapped open. He'd said it raspingly, croaked it out, his eyes still closed. She sat up quickly, checking him, though for what, she had no idea. She ran her fingers over his chest, his stomach, lightly brushing over his new wounds, and his arm shifted, his fingers closing around her wrist.

"Careful," he said with a little laugh, "ye keep touching me like that, mo leannan, and I willna be able to keep myself from returning the favor."

"Oh god, James," she exhaled, bending over him with palpable, furious relief. "You bastard," she muttered into the skin of his chest, his hand rising slowly to cup the back of her head, fingers twining languidly into her hair. "I specifically told you not to die!"

"Aye, and I listened, did I not?" he murmured to her, laughing weakly. "It wasna Remus," he explained. "We ran afoul of some other creatures—"
"I don't care. God, I don't care, I never want to hear it, I'm never letting you out of my sight again. You bastard. You bloody fucking bastard." She felt his fingers tighten in her hair, both of them seeming to realize at the same moment and with precisely the same stiffening of surprise that she was crying into his chest. "You fucking arsehole, you nearly—you were almost—"

"I wouldna left you, Lily." His voice was soft now, tender and comforting. As if she'd been the one who'd nearly died instead of him. "I made a promise to you, reubaltaich. You'll grow old with me, ye poor lass." He pulled her closer, tucking her against him, and she curled up into his side, letting him cradle her head against his chest. "I promised you I would love you for your whole life," he whispered to her, "and I swear, mo leannan, I meant it. No pack of wolves could take me away from you, Lily. No force on earth could keep me from your side."

She shuddered without a sound, clutching him.

And then, after a moment, she felt him swallow. "If ye'll have me, that is."

She shut her eyes.

"I don't want you to die," she said. "I don't—I can't—"

"Aye, you saved me again, after everything," he noted to himself, toying with her fingers. "I'm beginning to owe you so many lives, reubaltaich, I reckon I owe ye my devotion for more than just the one of them."

It was terrible. Impossible. He was the most impossible man, and she doubted this would be the last time she would have to save his life.

She didn't want to make promises. She didn't want to say forever.

But god, she wanted him.

She reached up without warning, abruptly giving in, and pulled his mouth down to hers to kiss him so fiercely he gasped, choking slightly with pain. "Ah, lass—"

"Sorry, sorry," she said quietly, whispering it and stroking her fingers over his cheeks, his nose, the shape of his brow, the scar on his chin. "Just… let me," she said, and in the dark she felt his brow furrow, not grasping her intent.

"Lily, I—"

She kissed him again, softer this time, and then slid down his torso, carefully trailing her lips over his injuries, old and new. She kissed his ribs, his sternum, down to his navel; kissed the places she had just healed, and then slid lower, listening to his breath come short.

"Lily—"

His cock was hard, unmistakably so, and she took it in her hand, wetting her lips and sliding her tongue over his tip.

He inhaled so sharply she was sure it must have hurt. "Lily, what are ye—"

She didn't let him finish. She drew her mouth over him, running her tongue along the shape of his cock. She'd done this plenty of times, for Severus and for other people. It had always been a chore, something of a stopover to better, more desirable things. Who'd ever liked getting something speared inelegantly into their throats? But with James, it felt like a necessity to taste him, to run her lips and tongue along the shape of his hardness, to feel him writhe helplessly beneath her. She moved with excruciating slowness, taking him deeper with each thrust into her mouth. A shallow motion at first, sweeping her tongue broadly across his tip, and then deeper.

He groaned, something unequivocally obscene falling from his lips in Gaelic; he slapped a hand over his own mouth, realizing belatedly that someone outside might be listening, and she felt a little thrill of satisfaction. She was wet and throbbing, aching to take him inside her to ease the growing pulse of desire between her legs, but she also wanted him to know she was more than just a healer. More than just an unwanted, unwilling wife. And most of all, she wanted him keening for her again, calling out for her, begging for her with the motion of his hips.

She had wanted him so badly and so powerfully she now needed him to want her just as fiercely. She wanted him, the next time he came close to recklessness or death, to think of how her lips felt when they were wrapped snugly around his cock and decide to turn away, preferring the precariousness of being in her grasp to any other form of risk.

When "Lily, please," slipped half-whispered from his lips, his hands trembling where his fingers slid into her hair, she sat upright, lifting the fabric of her shift and straddling him carefully, delicately, so as not to disturb his wounds. His hands wrapped tightly around her hips and she moved with exquisite slowness, holding the tip of his cock to the wet slit of her cunt and then taking him inside her, inch by blessed fucking inch, until he filled her up entirely, both of them stifling gasps.

She rode him slowly, quietly, his hands rising up to slide under her shift and cupping her breasts, thumbs brushing over her nipples. He was staring up at her, the outline of his face just visible from the dying embers of the fire outside, and she looked back at him, watching the ardent parting of his lips.

The ache at her core grew, desperation festering to molten need inside her, and she bent to kiss James just as she came, crying out softly into his mouth. He held tightly to her, reaching for every part of her he could touch, his arms circling around her with a defiant, immovable certainty.

"Do you fear it," he whispered to her, "whatever this is between us?"

"Yes," she told him honestly, and he gave a ragged exhale, his breath coming short.

"You are not alone in that, Lily," he said, barely more than a murmur. She could feel him struggle, restraint lining the edges of his mouth. "I fear you almost as much as I want you."

In answer, she picked up the pace of her motions, grinding against him and letting him guide her hips as he wished. His fingers dug into her thighs, his teeth clenched as he came close, so very close to release, his head falling back.

"Dinna send me away," he gritted out. "Please," he said, the effort of pleading manifesting in his touch, "I canna bear it, Lily. If ye must push me away, then let me stay gone, but if you dinna wish to—" He broke off, teeth clenched. "If you want me at all, Lily, please—"

"I won't do it again." She knew that much. Whatever this was, it seemed more and more pointless to deny it. "I won't push you away again, I promise, I won't—"

He came with a groan, pulling her into him and rolling firmly over her as she gasped, panicked.

"You were just injured, James, you shouldn't—"

"What life is worth saving if it means I canna kiss my wife when I damn well wish to?" he informed her, and she shivered beneath him, giving in.

"They'll want to know you're alive," she told him, admonishing him with something she hoped was a requisite sternness. "They'll want to see you, and—"

"They can wait," James said gruffly, and kissed her again as she relented, savoring the brush of his tongue against her lips.

By morning, James was almost fully healed. Lily, who had never considered herself a particularly skilled healer, was pleased to see she'd done moderately good work. Severus could have done better, she was fairly sure, but James was positively exuberant in his praise of her, and even Mad-Eye appeared to have softened slightly, grudgingly making his way over to her and muttering, "Ta, lass, for savin' our Jamie," softly in her ear.

They camped an additional day in place, James eating ravenously to regain his strength, before setting off again towards James' home in the northern Highlands. Remus, who had been sheepishly avoiding camp, came at Lily's beckoning to receive his wolfsbane potion.

"Here," she said briskly, shoving the draught at him. "Once you take this, you'll be perfectly fine to travel with us."

"I'm not sure I should," Remus said, eyeing it. "I'm grateful to you, of course, but… I don't know. I worry about what trouble my presence will bring for the others."

"Don't be ridiculous," she told him, shaking her head. "James and Sirius want you along, so you're coming. Everyone knows that what happened to James wasn't your fault."

"Wasn't it, though?" Remus' eyes made their way tentatively to hers. "Surely you must have blamed me at least once when you—" He swallowed. "When you saw him like that."

"Why?" Lily demanded.

"Well, I—" Remus hesitated again. "If I were you," he said, lowering his voice quietly, "I would blame me. For putting him in harm's way. He could have died, and all because of me."

Lily vehemently shook her head. "James always knew what he was doing when he joined you that night. We all knew it would be dangerous."

"Still." He cracked a wary smile. "I cannot imagine you thanked me much when you saw your husband nearly bled to death."

"I—" She meant to scold him again, but in truth, the vision of James' shallow breathing hadn't fully left her. "I was worried about him, yes," she conceded, "but he's strong, and it was his choice. He chooses to stand by his friends, whatever the cost to himself," she said firmly, "and for that, I could never hold it against you. It would be thoroughly pointless to deny the best parts of him by wasting my time blaming you."

Remus' smile broadened. "You really care for him, don't you?" he asked, and she hastily demurred, holding out the potion for him again. "I'm fairly certain it's mutual. Many young women have been infatuated with our Prongs," he informed her wryly, accepting the draught from her this time, "but it's something different between you."

Don't remind me, she thought grimly, but forced a smile.
"He's a good man," she said simply, watching Remus drink the potion. "By the way, how did you two manage to meet?"

It must have tasted something awful. Remus shuddered a little, then shook himself.

"I was on the run," he explained. "I was chased out of my own village, for obvious reasons," he said as she grimaced her understanding, "and I was making my way as far north as I could go. James and Sirius were riding by when I was stopped by some Death Eaters."

"Death Eaters?" Lily echoed, and Remus nodded.

"Lord Voldemort's private army, his guards. They've overrun the Highlands, harassing the clans and stealing from countrymen," he said, scowling. "They surely would have killed me for having nothing to take from me—or for simply being what I am," he muttered, and Lily nodded, "only James came to my aid. He was… my god," Remus exhaled, shaking his head, "we were all only teenagers then, and he took a thrashing for intervening." His tone was reverently grateful. "I am only alive today because of James' protection, and I do not forget that."

Lily, who knew well the old look of countless scars on James' body, found herself lost for words.

"Same," she managed to say, and Remus smiled thinly.

"So, then you see," he told her. "Don't you? How I would hate myself for eternity if I ever harmed him. Or if he were harmed in any way because of me."

She nodded, wordless, and let the thought turn over in her mind as they readied themselves to resume their travel. The next time she saw James—who had been helping the Prewett twins with the horses—he was holding his hands out for hers, readying to help her into the saddle.

Instead, she took hold of him without hesitation, yanking him into her, and kissed him as thoroughly as she could manage, her hands coveting the angles of his face as he stiffened slightly, startled, and then melted into it, gradually throwing both his arms around her. The rest of his men lewdly whooped their approval; he chuckled against her lips and turned her, concealing her from view to kiss her longer and ending on a distinct note of sweetness before they parted.

"What was that for?" he asked, hazel eyes a warm and molten amber with surprise before adding hurriedly, "Not that I disapprove. I verra much enjoy your enthusiasm, but—"

"Nothing." She brushed his hair from his forehead; the color was back in his cheeks, and he looked well again, as if nothing had ever happened. As if he'd never been circling death in her arms. "You're just… you're my husband," she reminded him. "I can kiss you however I like, can't I? And you promised to let me."

He smiled at her, pleased.

"I did, aye," he said. "Lucky thing, that."

He was staring down at her, a little transfixed, and she was considering the prospect of kissing him again until he suddenly took hold of her waist, lifting her roughly onto the saddle before giving her arse a light and artless smack.

"Well, off we go, then," he told her, swinging himself up behind her, and she sighed, rolling her eyes.

"You ruined a very nice moment," she informed him, glaring over her shoulder, and he laughed, leaning forward to speak in her ear.

"Only because I wish to have you in our bed, reubaltaich," he whispered, hands pointedly brushing the curve of her thigh, "without a moment's delay."

For two days they rode almost incessantly, barely stopping to make camp. Twice, James nearly fell asleep on horseback, Lily only catching him as she noticed his iron grip on her going slack. She asked him more than once—sore as she was, considering she'd hardly experienced that sort of discomfort much before—why he was so loath to stop, even with his men growing tired, but he only shrugged, saying the roads weren't safe.

Partway through day three of travel, she finally understood what he'd feared.

"Stop," called someone in a uniform she only half-recognized, noting the design of a snake interlaced through a skull. "Where do you lot think you're going?"

James nudged their horse forward, addressing the uniformed men—two or three of them, all in uniform—as Lily caught sight of Sirius and Remus slipping out of view, concealing themselves behind the caravan.

"James Potter," he said, "Laird of Clan Potter. We've been sent from Hogwarts at your master's behest."

"Ah, Jamie, we meet again," said the man Lily realized was a Death Eater, now recognizing Lord Voldemort's ensignia on him. "Have you got your werewolf in tow, hm? Bet you do. Come to think of it, we owe him something, don't we lads?" he muttered over his shoulder to the others, who glared, unsmiling, at James. "Ah, and you've got yourself a lovely little whore now, too—"

"Leave us alone," Lily said flatly, and the Death Eater chuckled.

"Ah, feisty, I see," he said. "Are you well, sweetheart? Hope these filthy Scots haven't roughed you up too much. To think," he mused, "what harm could befall them for kidnapping an Englishwoman, lads? Hate to consider the consequences—"

"You're the only filthy one here," Lily snapped, but James' hand tightened warningly on her waist.

"I havena seen a werewolf myself, save for the one in your master's keeping," James said coolly, "but I'm sure he would happily inform you it's on his orders my wife and I are heading north."

"Wife, hm?" the Death Eater said, openly staring at Lily's breasts. "Well, pity that—"

"Yes, quite a pity," James half-snarled, obviously barely restraining himself from doing far worse. "If that's all, Lestrange?"

"Oh, that's all," Lestrange replied with a laugh, "for now. But we'll be watching you, Jamie. The moment you slip, or that werewolf of yours makes an appearance—"

"I dinna think ye should be threatening me, Lestrange," James snapped. "Unless ye've forgotten what harm came to ye last time you ran afoul of my arm."

Lestrange turned impassively to Lily, ignoring James' warning. "My goodness, I don't know how you understand him. Unless you happen to speak dumb brute quite fluently?"

She set her jaw. "Are we done here?"
Lestrange gave their horse's flanks a smack. "For now, My Lady," he said with a mocking bow, and James led the horse back onto the path, his knuckles white with tension where he gripped at the reins.

"I'm sorry I couldn't do worse to him for insulting you," he said. "I simply wished to be out of there with some haste, for Remus' sake—"

"No, I understand," she said quickly. "I don't need you getting in trouble for something as stupidly ill-conceived as that bastard's fuckery."

James snorted lightly, prompting her to turn towards him. "What?" she demanded, and realized he was yet again laughing at her. "What, James—"

"You've got quite a mouth on ye, mo leannan," he said, looking somewhere between impressed and amused. "I thought it was just passion when ye said it before, but I'm na sure it was just that, was it?"

"What, fuck?" she asked, watching him fight a laugh again.

"I havena heard an Englishwoman—or any woman," he corrected himself, "swear as mightily as you do, Lily."

"Well, perhaps none of them have been as angry as I am," she informed him. "You shouldn't have to take that sort of nonsense from Lord Voldemort, and certainly not from his men. Isn't there something to be done about it?"

James shook his head. "Voldemort controls most of the Highlands since he took over Hogwarts," he said. "He has more magic, more money, more weapons, and aside from that, the English have always enjoyed meddling in our affairs," he informed her, resting his chin on her shoulder. "Hence Mad-Eye's… well, his certain coolness towards ye, lass, ye ken?"

She'd forgotten most of her history, it seemed.

Though, speaking of history—

"Why don't you simply take Hogwarts back?" she asked, abruptly recalling the painting she'd seen from the Battle of Hogwarts memorial in the castle's modern iteration. "Surely if you could gather enough support from the other Highland clans, you could stand against Lord Voldemort, couldn't you?"

"There are many who fear His Lordship's wrath," James said, shaking his head. "He is an unnaturally cruel man, and not many have the stones to stand against him."

"But you do," she said, and James' brows arched, surprised at her enthusiasm. Suddenly, she felt it quite obvious what needed to be done. "I mean, if you led them, James—"

"Me?" he asked, surprised. "I thought perhaps Dumbledore, but—"

"Fuck Dumbledore," Lily said, stunning James into silence. "I mean sure, he could help—everyone could help—but it's you who'll win, James." She twisted around to look at him. "You're actually from here," she reminded him. "This is your land, your home. You're brave, you're strong, your men love you—I'd be willing to bet there's not a single Scot who wouldn't follow you into battle. If you lead them, James," she murmured to him, reaching around to run her fingers appealingly through his hair, "I promise you, you'll win."
He rested his forehead against hers, shaking his head. "How can you be so sure, reubaltaich?" he asked her. "Nothing is ever so certain."

In her case, though, it was.

"How could you not win?" she asked him. His mouth was perilously close to hers, his breath hot against her cheeks, his hands resting on her thighs. Her entire body seemed conscious of the fact that it had been some time since they'd last put skin on skin, and every inch of her craved to feel him again. "I don't need to see the future to know it for certain, James. You were meant to do this. Reubaltaich," she said in a low voice, trying to mimic his pronunciation of it, and he gave a dry, throaty laugh, obviously as aware of his closeness to her body as she was to his. "If you lead them, James, there's no way Voldemort could stand against you. You'll win."

He lifted one hand, stroking it slowly over the column of her throat.

"You are so verra dangerous for me, Lily," he said in her ear.

She wanted his hands on her breasts, his mouth on her cunt. She wanted to feel his cock inside her again, his hips thrusting into her with her hands smoothing over the firm curve of his arse.

At the same time, though, it occurred to her that coming back to Hogwarts meant trying again with the door on the seventh floor. If James took back Hogwarts, there was a chance it might appear; that if it did, she could go home.

Perhaps this was merely infatuation, she reminded herself. It would pass, and then what would she really want? Her parents, her friends, her sister, Severus—she could be back with all of them, and surely that would outlast her hunger for one man, however appealing he was.

Still, that was a question for another day.

"Are we home yet?" she breathed to James, who groaned softly in her ear.

"I might go mad before we reach it," he answered her, and she shivered, equally in agreement.

It took another two days before they arrived at James' 'house,' which was really more of a castle, though significantly less so than Hogwarts. It became clear to Lily just what it meant that James was a laird when many of the men and women inside were quick to show him deference, quite obviously pleased with his return.

She was also surprised to see how much attention was lavished on her—minus the younger women, who seemed instantly furious with her existence—and noticed people were quick to come to her aid. Mostly, though, she was desperate for a bath.

"Minerva here will take care of ye," James said, swiftly kissing Lily's cheek and gesturing her towards the stern-looking woman who'd been running the house in James' absence. "Minnie, may I entrust my wife to you?"

Lily noted the pleasure James took in the phrase my wife, using it as often and as pointedly as possible. She wanted to laugh at how endearing it was, only at the moment, it seemed Minerva was quite unamused.

"Come, then, lass," she said briskly, beckoning for Lily to follow, though Lily paused, apprehensively catching James' arm before he left.
"Will you, um. Be long?" Lily asked, and James smiled at her, reaching out to stroke his thumb across her cheek.

"Not a moment longer than required, mo leannan." He kissed her firmly, ignoring the throngs of people watching; Lily felt it shamelessly obvious what he was promising her with the kiss, and though she was a bit more hesitant with such a keen audience, she figured it wasn't the worst thing for the rest of his household to know their laird was a man who bedded his wife well (or, at least, thoroughly).

"I only need to chat with Mad-Eye about your… proposition." James winked at her, spinning her with a kiss to her cheek to face Minerva. "Take good care of her, Minnie."

"Impertinent lad," Minerva sniffed, but she seemed to have warmed slightly, beckoning for Lily to follow her. "Come on, then."

Lily was startled to find she'd been more comfortable with James' men than with the women who worked in his household; she realized she was now essentially their employer, and felt immensely uncomfortable at having to order them around.

"Oh, you don't have to do that," she said to one girl, a scullery maid who was unpacking what little things Lily possessed, but Minerva scoffed.

"She certainly does," Minerva insisted. "You're Jamie's wife, and the lady of this house. Dinna be putting silly ideas into her head about what she can and canna do. You're livin' in her ladyship's chambers now." She busied herself with the bath water, eyeing Lily closely. "You're too thin," Minerva ruled after a moment. "We'll need to feed you better than those troublesome lads did if you're plannin' to bear Jamie's sons. Why, Jamie himself was a wee bit of a thing and still, he nearly broke his poor mother in two—"

Lily blinked. "I—what?"

"Jamie wrote me about ye before you left the castle," Minerva continued, brusquely stripping Lily of her shift and leaving her to awkwardly cover her private bits, "and I will confess, I didna think you'd be any more than an arrangement. But hearin' what he called you—"

"What?" Lily asked. "Reubaltaich? It's just a joke, really—"

"What? No, lass." Minerva stopped for a moment, staring at her, before putting two and two together, realizing Lily was missing something. "Lass, Jamie calls you his love," she explained, softening.

"I—" Lily blinked. "He does?"

"Do ye not know, you silly child? 'Mo leannan,'" Minerva clarified. "It's what Jamie's father called his mother before they passed, bless them both—"

"It is?" Lily echoed, swallowing. "I thought it just meant… you know, like, 'sweetheart,' or something—"

"Oh, aye, it does," Minerva agreed, holding a hand out to help Lily into the bathtub, "but our Jamie, he would only call ye that if he meant it. He's a sweet lad," she added fondly, with an incongruously iron grip on Lily as she helped her into the water. "If he loves ye like he says he does, then you are a lucky lass indeed."

Lily, scalded by the hot water, scarcely noted her displeasure, distracted by what Minerva had just
"He loves me?" she asked, and for the first time, Minerva smiled at her. It looked unnatural, rare and unpracticed and somewhat crooked, but still, it was a smile nonetheless.

"Can ye not tell by how he looks at ye?" Minerva asked. "Like you are the only woman in the world."

At that, all Lily could feel was a perilous bliss floating up in her chest.

"I suppose," she managed faintly, the water settling to warmth against her limbs.

Rebel North, Part III

Pairing: Jily (James Potter x Lily Evans)

Universe: magical Outlander-esque AU (time travel + Scottish Highlands)

Rating: M for sex

Summary: The continued saga of Rebel North, thusly concluded. When Lily's identity is revealed, she faces a difficult choice between two loves while the Order prepares to take back Hogwarts Castle from Lord Voldemort's control.

An alternate summary, courtesy of aurorarsinistra: "Male significant other got you down? Not doing the dishes? Not listening? Not transforming into a deer in his free time? Well, I've got just the escapism for you!

It was late by the time James came to find her. He bounded noisily into the room as Lily was already preparing for bed, turning with surprise at his sudden entry.

"Take that off," he said, lips twisting up in a smile as he pointedly eyed the outline of her breasts beneath the thin material of her shift. "I want to see you, wife."

He seemed a little tipsy, certainly merrier than usual, but no less impossible to resist. The candles flickering beside the bed gave him an entrancing glow, and he stripped his shirt off one-handed in that careless way he always did, one hand bunching the fabric to yank it overhead.

Still, she bided her time, playing at disinterest. "Is that the best you can do, James?" she sniffed, turning away, but he was quicker.

"Ah, my apologies—" He reached out, catching her arm, and drew her back flush against his torso, forming her spine to the shape of his chest. "Is this better?" he asked her, running his hands from her hips to her waist, curving around her breasts. She let him tilt her chin over her shoulder, the spice of the mead he'd drunk warming her lips as he kissed her slowly. "I dinna think I would survive such a wait," he murmured to her, one hand coming around her jaw. "I wasna sure I could keep myself from touching you much longer."

His hands drifted low, fistng the fabric of her shift tightly. He slid the material up her legs, fingers tracing the slopes and valleys of her, and she lifted her arms for him to pull it gruffly over her head before he stepped back, looking at her.

"Lily," he said, swallowing appreciatively as she turned to face him. "My Lily. Mo leannan. You're beautiful."

She felt a flush creep up in her cheeks at the heat of his eyes on her. "You don't know any better," she reminded him. "You've only been with me."

He shook his head. "I only need you."
She opened her mouth, considering an argument, but then shook her head instead, sitting back against the bed and gesturing.

"Take off your kilt," she said.

He blinked. "My kilt?"

"No, take your shoes off first," she corrected herself, and he bent down with a grin, kicking off one boot, then the other. "Okay. Now the kilt."

"Yes, my Lady," he said, removing his belt to let the material fall away. "Anything else ye wish?"

She pushed herself back on the bed, propping herself up on her elbows. "Come here," she said, beckoning to him, and he took three eager steps forward until she held up a hand, shaking her head. "Stop," she said. "Wait there."

He groaned a little. "Lily, ye little minx—"

"How was the meeting?" she asked neutrally, adjusting her hair to fall away from her bare breasts.

His gaze raked openly over her torso, hungrily taking her in. "Fine," he said, swallowing. "We… we made plans. Sirius and Remus will get a message to Dumbledore about gathering the Order."

His throat was dry, his cock already unapologetically hard for her. He slid a hand over it, just once, but didn't look away. "I, meanwhile," he muttered, "have plans to never leave my wife's bed until I return to Hogwarts—"

"You?" Lily echoed, suddenly abandoning her pretense and sitting upright. "You mean we, don't you?"

He blinked, catching her shift in tone. "Surely you dinna mean to suggest I bring ye with me."

She felt a bit of panic rise up in her chest. "You'd leave me here?"

"It's my job to protect you." His voice was grave now, and solemn. "I wouldna dare to put you in danger, Lily. I dinna think it unreasonable to keep you here, safe, where ye canna be harmed."

"I'm coming with you," Lily said, scowling at him, "because that's ridiculous. You think it's your job to protect me, James? Let me remind you I've already saved your life twice," she snapped at him, and he frowned. "Who do you think will do it if I'm not there?"

"But—"

"No buts," she said, and then, flatly, "Come here."

He blinked, then stepped forward.

"Lily—"

"Tell me you want me," she told him, reproachfully folding her arms over her chest. "Not just in bed. Not just as something to amuse yourself with. I'm not just a warm body, James, I'm useful, I'm —" She blinked, something infuriating rising up in her throat. "You can't honestly think I'll let you do this without me."

"But—"

"You can't just want my tits or my cunt," she told him, watching his hazel eyes darken to sage as she spoke. "You have to want my brain, James. My abilities. You have to want my—"

"Your strength," he cut in, with something else in his tone that was just as hungry as before, but markedly distinct. "Your defiance."

She swallowed.

"You are braver than any man I know, reubaltaich," he said softly, reverently. "I wasna thinking clearly."

He dropped to his knees in front of her, his hands rising to the bed to curl around her calves.

"Forgive me, I dinna think—I wasna in my right mind," he said, turning to press his lips to the curve of her thigh. "I canna do it without you, Lily. I was wrong to think it. Can ye forgive me?" he murmured, and he nudged her knees apart just slightly; just enough to let his lips gently brush across her clit. It was a kiss, soft and sweet, to the most intimate part of her.

"If ye wish me to beg, Lily," James said, "I willna hesitate."

"I—"

His lips meandered slowly, gradually making his way over her. His tongue slid out every now and then, darting over her with pensive longing before moving slower, savoring her. It was blissfully perfect, terribly distracting. She gasped, his tongue laving inside her, and then he took the whole of her clit in his mouth and sucked experimentally, intensifying his efforts the more her legs started to shake around him.

"James," she gasped, placing the arch of her foot firmly on his shoulder and shoving him away. "I want you inside me, now—"

"I—"

"I havena been forgiven," he said, hands firmly digging into her hips as his mouth returned to her cunt, and she nearly cried out in frustration.

"James," she attempted, his tongue steadily passing over her as his thumb circled her throbbing slit, dipping inside her once before being replaced with his fingers. "James, my god, James, I'm going t-oh god—"

She came with a cry she was certain the rest of the castle had heard, shoving him away as the aftershocks of her orgasm ricocheted through her. She shuddered, feeling the ripple of pleasure leave her like a wrench of dissipation, the whole of her going numb.

But even as she panted out her satisfaction, letting the waves of pleasure ebb gradually away, James remained on his knees at the edge of the bed, waiting for her approval.

"Will ye come with me, Lily?" he asked her solemnly. "I willna be able to do it alone. I will need you by my side."

She was aflame for him, her entire body arched with craving.

"Yes, fine," she panted, shuddering again as he rose to his feet, one hand on the utter luxury of his shaft as he waited for an answer. "Yes, I'll come with you, just—fuck me," she gritted out, scrambling back as he knelt onto the mattress, making his way towards her with an infuriating slowness. "Please, I want you so badly, James, please—"

"You dinna have to beg for me," he said with a laugh, gruffly catching her around the ankle, "but I
He stroked her swollen clit, gaze dropping to look at her. Even in the candlelight, she could see how pornographically wet she was for him, her clit that rose-red color of desperation as he positioned himself between her legs, the rest of her keening shamelessly for want of him.

"I want ye like I've never wanted anything," he told her, his voice gravelly and low. "Truth be told," he murmured, stroking his tip over her clit and diminishing her to a shiver, "I wanted ye the moment I saw ye. I dinna think you'd want me, not like this."

"James." She was practically crying for him now, her voice hoarse. "Please. I need to have you. I need to feel you—"

"Do ye want it slow, reubaltaich?" he asked her. "Because I dinna think I will be able to control myself. When I see you like this, I canna stop my thoughts. I want to bite the little pearls of your breasts," he said, leaning forward to slide his tongue over her nipple. "I want to put my teeth on your perfect skin. I want to feel the heat of you around my cock," he whispered to the unsteady race of her pulse, "and I dinna want slow, Lily. Sometimes, I want you so much I dinna know how to control myself—"

"Don't go slow," she whispered to him, aching. "Have me, James. Take me, have me as hard as you want and I swear, I want it too—"

"Dinna play with me, reubaltaich." He swallowed. "You are my wife. You are no common whore, and I wouldna—"

"James." She let her hand drop down, stroking at his cock as he gritted his teeth. "In this, whores and wives are no different. Don't think I don't enjoy it, because I do." She sat up, picking up the pace of her grip on his cock. "You think I don't like sex?" she whispered to him. "That I only want slow and gentle, even when I ask you for more?"

"I—" His eyelids were heavy. "I…"

"I like it, James. I like it very much, and I like it with you. I like the way you feel inside me. I like how hard you get for me." She saturated her thumb in the pooling wetness at his tip. "I like when you lose control, when you take me and—"

She let out a yelp as he shoved her slightly onto her back, yanking her hips down and filling her in the same motion, both of them delivered to the immediacy of need. He seemed to have taken her words to heart, one of her legs wrenched over his shoulder, and he slammed so perfectly into her she knew it would be a matter of seconds before she came.

It was sex, but it was more than just carnality. Their rhythms were equally paced with desperation, their motions perfectly fluid, each of their bodies so keenly fitted to the other. For once, she didn't care how her hair looked, or whether she'd eaten too much at dinner; she didn't care about anything, not even the sweat pooling between them. The only thing that mattered was that she and James were touching in every possible place, not an inch between them wasted, and as the pressure of her orgasm built—agonizing urgency built-up and knotted, tangled somewhere inside her—his thrusts were hardly gentle, but still, in his arms, she was safe. She was wanted. She was coveted like this, and rough as he was, and as unsanctified the act—however wrong it was—it was still fervent, almost worshipful. There was no missing the devotion in his touch.

In return, she made sure to let him see, the moment her orgasm hit her, how much she'd enjoyed it; she let her head fall back, his name ripping from her throat as the full impact of what he'd built inside her quaked in fissures through her body. She let the unabashed unloveliness of orgasm take over, the gruesome, elated anguish of it unhidden on her face, and he stared down at her in disbelief, one of his hands stroking gently at her cheek.

She turned her head, catching the tip of his finger on her tongue, and sucked it lightly. He gave a visceral shiver and came with a sputter of "Lily," choked out so passionately and so reverently on his tongue she wouldn't have ever guessed it to be her name.

She'd never had sex like that with Severus.

She'd never had sex like that at all, and she wondered now if it was merely chemistry, a simple matter of physicality, or if it was something else entirely. Something as indescribable, and as undeniable, as the existence of magic itself.

"Mo leannan," James whispered to her as he collapsed against her, so quietly it might have been a breath.

She wrapped her arms around his neck, the rise and fall of their chests gradually joining in syncopated comfort.

"My love," she murmured back to him, and he buried his lips in her neck, sighing into her skin.

Now that they were in James' house, it was impossible to ignore whatever was growing between them. Lily still felt it unlikely to truly be love—at least not the sort of love that was practical, and meant to last—but it was certainly something very like it. She was ravenous for him; not merely for sex, but for his company as well. He was something different here in his own house. A bolder, even more certain version of himself (something she hadn't imagined possible, and yet…) and more commanding, too. Among his men he was an equal, a friend, a confidante—but here, he was in his element as a leader, particularly when piecing together what disarrayed pieces existed of their resistance against Lord Voldemort. Other lairds had begun approaching James since he'd sent Sirius and Remus off to speak with Dumbledore, all of them pledging their loyalty to the Order, and what Lily might have called arrogance before was serving him well now, easily establishing him as the most influential man in the room.

Which is why it certainly wasn't not sex. Flawed as she was, she couldn't separate her admiration for him and her want; instead, she religiously counted the hours until dark when he would join her in their chambers, undressing her without a word and taking her without hesitation. They found ways to touch each other during the day, too, his fingers stroking her spine or resting too long on the small of her back, and she would let her hand linger in his, discreetly tracing the lining of his forearm. His house was large enough that they could get lost in it for a few minutes at a time, and even after weeks with him—when her appetite for him had still not faded—she was still pulling him into vacant corridors more often than she cared to admit, letting him wrestle with her skirts as her back pressed against the cold stone walls.

He'd been a virgin when they'd met, and now he was haute couture, bespoke to her desires and designed for every inch of her pleasure. There were plenty of pretty young girls who tried to tempt him, positioning themselves favorably to brush against him in the halls, but it was Lily alone who held his eye. He watched her so closely, his gaze fixed so intently on everything she did, that she half-felt it necessary to warn him that everyone could plainly see what was on his mind.

She didn't, though. She felt a new and irrepressible thrill at being wanted so often and so badly it burned between them even when they stood apart, and she had no compelling interest in dousing that particular flame.
"Lily," James would whisper while he pulled her astride him, letting her take the lead while she leaned back to let him run his tongue along her sternum. "Mo leannan, ye always taste so verra sweet."

She loved the smell of him; something she wouldn't have thought she'd say about a man who spent most of his days sweating through some new physical task. She would bury her nose and lips in the crook of his neck, her fingers tangled in his thick black hair, and inhale the scent of wood and trees, clean air on cedar skin. Prongs, she'd whisper, his true self always there on the tip of her tongue, at the edge of each inhale. Salt and sage and pounding hearts.

The rest of his household adjusted to her presence. Mad-Eye was kinder to her now, in his way, and she even learned to identify the Prewett twins—Gideon had a birthmark on his left ear, while Fabian had a scar across his knuckles. Minerva was a relentless taskmaster, always reminding Lily of household things that needed to be done, but after seeing that Lily's magical proficiency could ease both their workloads considerably, Minerva spared a rare expression of satisfaction for her (which of course earned a scullery maid a scolding for gadding about, presumably in the interest of balance).

About a month after their arrival, Lily thought she'd finally found a place there amid forced blood oaths and unwilling marriages. She was even beginning to consider herself happy, perhaps even lucky.

She should have known that couldn't last forever. It lasted very specifically until the disruption of a stolen moment—James was kissing her breasts against the wall of an empty corridor, his tongue on the edge of fabric and fingers drifting under the edge of the bodice—when they were interrupted by a loud, throat-clearing cough, the two of them leaping apart.

"Aye, Sirius, what is it?" James said gruffly, blocking Lily from view as she hurried to adjust her bodice.

"Oh, nothing really," Sirius said spiritedly. "Only that Dumbledore's here."

"What?" James asked, and Lily glanced sharply at Sirius, equally surprised. James said Dumbledore's magical and financial aid would be crucially important, but he hadn't expected him to arrive in the flesh. "He came here? Does that mean—"

"He's willing to help the Order? Aye," Sirius said, as Lily swallowed hard, abruptly chilled with a flood of concern. "He's brought some men and guns, too, and he wishes to speak with ye."

"Oh, that's—" James blinked, reaching behind him for Lily's hand. "Do ye need a moment," he murmured to her, "or are ye ready to see him now?"

"Me?" she managed to say before being tugged after him, his footsteps quickening with urgency. "James, I—this is a very important guest," she said faintly, though her concern was far less for Dumbledore than it was for herself. "Perhaps I should make sure Minerva has everything she n-"

"Nonsense, Minnie's been waiting for this day since she was born," James said firmly, pausing before entering the castle's receiving hall. "Is Remus with him?" he asked Sirius, who shook his head.

"No," Sirius said. "He said he wished to speak to you alone."

"Verra well—" James paused, glancing at Lily, who was desperately seeking a way out of the introduction.
"Are you sure?" she asked him, warily eyeing the door. "If he says he wants to speak to you alone —"

"What's got ye so skittish, reubaltaich? It's na like you to be so meek," James said with a laugh, resting a steadying hand on her waist. "Surely you're na afraid of Dumbledore, are ye?"

"Well, you're the one who told me I hadn't any idea how to run a house," Lily retorted, swallowing hard. She was hovering near another episode of panic, reaching somewhat frantically for a reason —any reason—not to enter the room, despite knowing she could hardly avoid it for long. "This is my first real test, James, and I don't want to disappoint you—"

"Mo leannan." He tilted her chin up, pausing her. "When I said that, I was a laird in need of a lady. Now, I am a man wedded happily to a woman, and I require nothing but you, just as you are." He bent down, pressing his forehead to hers. "Any lass can make sure there's food in the kitchen, Lily. If something goes wrong, so be it. In this, you canna disappoint me."

"I—" There was no getting around it. "Okay," she said lamely, and James tucked her hand into the crook of his arm, nodding to a fondly smirking Sirius to open the door.

Inside the hall, an older man was waiting, salt and pepper flecked into a long auburn beard that shifted as he turned over his shoulder. Abruptly, Lily recognized the face of the man who had been painted on the wall of Hogwarts Castle in 1983, all of the pieces coming together in history even as the pieces of her life remained in disarray.

"Dumbledore," James said, sweeping into a bow as Lily dropped to a semi-awkward curtsy. "I dinna expect us to join us."

"Ah, I hope you don't mind the imposition," Dumbledore said, turning a blankly polite smile to Lily.

"Nonsense, you are verra welcome here—and surely you know my bride, Lily," James said. "You are the reason we are wed, are ye not?" he laughed, and Dumbledore nodded blankly, acknowledging neither Lily nor the reference.

"Well, my congratulations to you both," Dumbledore said with an obvious lack of recognition, prompting James' expression to falter, his brow stitching together with confusion. "Shall we discuss how we're going to get you into Hogwarts? I'm sure it won't interest the lady at all," he remarked, and Lily nodded quickly. She curtseyed again and pulled hastily away from James, who was hesitant to release her.

"Surely you want Lily here," James said to Dumbledore slowly. "Do ye not?"

Dumbledore's smile faltered. "If you prefer, James, but—"

"She's gotten into the castle for you before," James said firmly, "has she not?"

"James," Lily said quietly, watching Dumbledore's gaze fall on her with suspicion. "You two can talk privately. I'll speak with you when you're finished."

"Very kind of you," Dumbledore told her as James seemed to fumble with uncertainty.

"I dinna understand," he said, and Lily shook her head.

"We'll talk later, James. My Lord," she said, bidding farewell to Dumbledore with a nod, and then she turned briskly, not bothering to see if James' glance of dismay had followed her out the door.
She was hiding in her chambers when he came to find her, the look on his face precisely as she feared it would be. As if she were a fraud, a liar, a stranger.

It was worse to know she was all three.

"Who are you?" he asked her, and she cast her gaze down, stung.

"You know who I am," she said quietly, and he shook his head.

"I know who I thought ye were," he said, frowning.

He stared down at her for a moment where she sat on the bed.

"Dumbledore never sent you," he said eventually.

She swallowed hard. "No."

"Then how did ye get there? What were ye doing in Hogwarts?"

She said nothing.

He exhaled raggedly.

"Are you a spy?" James asked, and she looked up, startled.

"What?"

"This. This marriage between us," he said slowly. "Were ye trying to... to—"

"To what?" she demanded, rising sharply to her feet. "You honestly think I was spying on you, James? That I saved your life just so I could betray you, is that it?"

"Dumbledore thinks it's possible Voldemort arranged this," James said, turning his gaze away from her. "He suspects that you are a spy for him."

Lily stared at him, stunned. "You really think that?"

He wouldn't look at her. She reached out, forcing his chin towards her, and he stepped backwards with a grimace.

"I dinna what to think," James said stonily, folding his arms over his chest. "I dinna wish to believe the worst of you, Lily, but I need you to tell me why you're here."

"I... I can't," she said, shifting away from him and starting to pace the floor. She'd known this was coming, and still, she hadn't prepared a defense.

What defense could she possibly have?

"James, listen to me, I'm not a spy, I was never—I wasn't trying to hurt you, I didn't want to harm you or even... I never wanted this," she spat, gesturing to the ring on her finger. "I wasn't—I was just... James, you have to—" She broke off, choking. "You have to believe me, I wouldn't—I would never—"

The room was spinning, her mind heavy, chest flooded once again with panic; she felt somewhere between tears and vomit, knowing he would never believe the truth just as she knew there were no satisfactory lies. He obviously worshipped Dumbledore; what if he believed him over her? What was she going to do if he cast her out, or worse? What would she do without him? The reality of her situation crashed down on her with ruthless uncertainty and she reached out to steady herself on the post of her bed—their bed.

"James, please—please, you have t-"

"Lily." He exhaled it out, sighing it, and came up behind her, wrapping his arms around her ribs and holding her tightly, his cheek resting beside hers as she inhaled sharply and gasped it out. "Breathe, Lily. In, out." He went through the motions with her, his chest filling and emptying against hers. "In," he said with her again, his fingers stretching out to capture hers, "and out."

Her breath steadied, his hand firm on her waist.

"Tell me the truth," he said quietly, his voice a low vibration in her ear. "I will listen, I promise ye. I swore it on my blood," he reminded her, "on my heart and my life, and I only need ye to be honest, Lily, and tell me the truth."

She shut her eyes, fearful still. "You won't believe me."

"I believed you once," he reminded her. "I can do it again, mo leannan, as many times as you wish me to."

She hated how much she didn't hate him. How patient he was, and how fair.

Maybe he would listen to her.

She inhaled shakily, sighing it out, and turned to face him.

"I'm not… from here," she said, and he nodded, having known as much already. "Not… not just from England. I'm… I got to Hogwarts by accident. Well, I was there with my fiancé," she said slowly, "and then I went through a door on the seventh floor, and then… you found me."

James blinked, startled. "I dinna understand. You… never left?"

She shook her head. "When I walked in through the door, it was Samhain in 1983," she said, watching his eyes widen, "and then when I walked out—" She waved a hand, gesturing between them. "This is why my magic is so different, James, and why I have a wand. And this is how I know you'll win," she told him, watching his hand rise helplessly to his mouth. "I know because it already happened, James. You're going to take Hogwarts back, you and the Order, and I—"

"Your… betrothed. He's alive?" James asked, feeling behind him for the bed. "You… you are promised to another man. He is waiting for you?"

"Yes," Lily said slowly, wincing as James sat down with a heavy drop, obviously shaken. "It's why I… why I didn't want this to get, well, here." She sat down beside him, shaking her head. "I didn't see a way around it, and I certainly didn't think you'd believe me. I tried to go back, but—"

"The castle is magic. Even I know strange things happen there, though I wouldn'a imagined something this strange." James stared down at his hands, shaking his head. "The door wouldn'a reveal itself to you a second time?"

"No. You saw, it wasn't there." Her stomach twisted with anguish. "And I know, James," she rushed out, "that you have no reason to believe me, but at least let me help you. I can help you fight for your freedom, and—"
“Do you wish to go back?” he asked, not looking at her. “Is that what you want, Lily? To return to where ye belong?”

She swallowed hard. Hadn't she been asking herself precisely the same question for over a month?

“I don't know,” she said slowly, which was obviously the wrong answer. His mouth tightened, and she hurried to reassure him. “I didn't think I could feel this way,” she said, reaching out for him, “but I left a whole life behind, James. I have my parents, my sister. I have—”

“Your betrothed.” He looked stricken with pain. “I dinna realize. I dinna know, I was—”

“Of course not, James. I couldn't tell you, but I—” She reached out for his hand, holding it to her lips; she kissed his knuckles, then uncurled his unwilling fingers, placing a kiss in the center of his palm. “I haven't been pretending with you, I swear. This, between us, it's real, James. I just… I already made promises, and now—”

Abruptly, he pulled his hand from her reach and turned to look at her.

“This is why ye wished to come to Hogwarts,” he said flatly, and she blinked.

“James, no, I—”

“Perhaps ye wanted to help me,” he conceded grudgingly. “But it was him you were trying to return to.”

She couldn't deny it. Still, it felt wrong to let him remain in his thoughts. She reached out, taking hold of his chin to turn his face towards her.

“You're the one who said we should start over,” she told him firmly. “You and I were supposed to have something that was just ours, just yours and mine. Weren't we?”

He wouldn't look at her. “I didna know the truth then.”

“And I didn't know I could feel like this. For anyone. For you.” He looked up, grudgingly meeting her eye, and she took his face in both hands. “Everything between us, James, it's been real. Yes, I was engaged to another man. But what I feel for him, and what I feel for you…” She swallowed. “It couldn't be more different.”

James exhaled wearily. “But you love him.”

Again, she couldn't deny it. “Yes.”

He was silent for a few long moments.

He turned, pressing his lips to the inside of her wrist, and then he carefully removed her hands from his face, placing them gently in her lap.

“We will leave tomorrow for Hogwarts,” he said carefully. “I will take you back to that room myself.”

“James—”

He rose to his feet, shaking his head.

“Stay here tonight,” he said. “I will sleep in my chambers.”
Her chest heaved with difficulty. "James."

"I willna ask you to… to break your word again."

He turned to the door, about to leave, and Lily rose hastily, chasing after him.

She grabbed his arm, pulling him back. "James—"

He caught her around the waist, his forehead falling to hers. She could see the pain on his face, unmissable in the contortion of his features, but as she slid her nose along his, trying to comfort him, he skirted her kiss.

"I don't know what to do," she whispered to him, pleading. "I'm bound to you by blood, I know, but I'm not… I don't belong here, and—"

"Dinna worry about the blood oath," he said. "I release ye from it."

"James, it doesn't work like that," she said, shaking her head. "You can't just… release me, it's… it's blood magic, it's binding, and you could—"

"Die?" he asked drily. "I may die verra soon regardless. You dinna say I would survive, did ye? Only that the Order will win."

"I—"

It was true she didn't know for sure; he wasn't the one whose name or face had been remembered. Something could happen to him. Something could happen to him, and that was unbearable. Unutterable. Unthinkable.

"Mo leannan," she choked out, but he exhaled raggedly, shaking his head.

"Good night, Lily," he said, and then he tore himself away, departing from the room without another word.

The journey from Potter castle to Hogwarts was a difficult one. They were traveling through mud, trying desperately to cover the weapons Dumbledore had brought for the men who would be joining the Order from the other Highland clans, and this time, James had procured Lily a horse of her own. It was a journey made unquestionably worse for lack of his chest comforting her through the long hours on the road, and though her horse was docile enough, Lily felt more isolated than ever. James wasn't outwardly cold to her, but still—it was obvious that everyone knew something had come between them.

"You look unhappy," Remus noted, sidling up to her one evening when she sat alone before the fire. James had brought her food, nodding curtly before wandering over to see if the Prewett twins needed anything, but outside of that, everyone had mostly left her alone, save for Remus.

"Something wrong?"

She watched James climb atop one of the caravans, pulling the protective lining taut.

"A few things," she murmured, and Remus gave her a sympathetic glance.

"Whatever it is, I'm sure the two of you will be back to normal soon," he told her, and she shook her head.

"Not this time." She tore her gaze away, staring down at her lap. "I think I've lost him this time."
Which was probably for the best, she didn't add.

It made her decision easier, at least—if the door actually managed to appear for her this time.

"Ah, I don't think you've lost him." Remus shook his head, chuckling a little under his breath. "You didn't happen to see Mad-Eye today, did you?"

"No," Lily said, frowning. "Why?"

"Well, if you happen to notice he's sporting a bit of a bruise on his eye, know it's because James took a shot at him for saying you shouldn't be here. James said just this morning you were worth ten men, and that he'd prefer you by his side over anyone." He turned to look at her, half-smiling. "He loves you," he told her, shaking his head. "Whatever's come between you, believe me, James will either fight it head-on eventually, or it will pass."

Lily wondered which she preferred. After all, wasn't it much easier, knowing she could go back to the life she'd known? It was easier, wasn't it, when she had only loved Severus?

She fought the briefest image of her last night with Severus, his face lit by his desk lamp as she waited for him to come to bed, and exhaled slowly.

"I suppose we'll see," she said, and Remus patted her shoulder, rising to his feet as they made to return their journey on the road.

Dumbledore's aid meant at least a hundred Scots now had weapons, crude firearms made with ballistic magic (from what Lily could tell, essentially pulverized blasting charms) along with swords and daggers designed to be wielded by the deftness of wizards. The cold metallic assemblage of weaponry was stowed covertly, disguised as tax revenue, as they approached the castle through the woods. The other clans had joined them there in the forest, all of them meeting up for a surreptitious strategic meeting which Lily observed from afar.

She'd been right that it was James who would lead them. Dumbledore was a stranger to them, wealthy and old and English, and the clans deferred to James, one of their own, who was clever and fierce and brave. Watching James like this, so obviously in his element, caused another creak of longing in Lily's chest, though she clung to the knowledge that even if she'd lost him with her betrayal of hesitation, she had given him something, at least. She'd given him the courage to lead an army. She'd proved him capable of declaring his birthright. She'd put him on the path to reclaiming his freedom. He, the man who was a stag, valued his freedom above all things, and if nothing else would come from them having had each other, then at least James and his countrymen would take back what was rightfully theirs.

When it came time to plot their descent on the castle, everyone looked to James to lead them; to inspire them, the way no other man could. History would have it wrong, Lily thought. They would praise Dumbledore for his money and his magic and his might, but it would be another man entirely who'd truly made the difference. Lily made her way through the crowd of the Order, standing beside Remus and Sirius as James took to his horse, wheeling it around to speak to his audience.

"Lord Voldemort thinks he can take our home, tame us," he called to them. "But we are as wild as this country; we are as unbroken as this land. We are no more born to be captive men than the trees are born to bend, or the highland hills to bow!"

He paused as the Order cheered, and for a moment, he seemed to be looking for something. He was scanning the crowd, and part of Lily's chest abruptly filled and burst, torn apart by the perilous mix of both optimism and longing.

"We have a right to rule ourselves," James shouted, and the crowd roared back in agreement. "By the sovereignty of the blood in our veins, this land is ours," he called to an uproarious shout of approval, "and in that, we are united. There are no titles between us. No lairds, no lords; we are all equals, and together, we are all—"

He broke off, spotting Sirius, Remus, and then, with pained deliberation, finding her.

"Rebels," he said, and locked eyes with her in the crowd.

It was an impassioned moment; James was gleaming with greatness, with fervor and fury, and when he looked at her, she realized she was crying at the sight of him. He was history itself, victory incarnate, and it was impossible not to take strength from him. He was a man born to lead a revolution, and she was as willing to follow him into battle as every Scot who stood breathless at her side.

She smiled through her tears, overcome with pride in him, and after a moment—after a helpless shake of his head—he jumped down from his horse, hair wild and eyes bright as he raced through the throngs of men to aim himself in her direction. The crowd cheered again, parting for him to make his way through, but he paid them no attention. He didn't let his gaze drop from hers until he had reached her, her attention fixed so completely on his oncoming form that she didn't notice Remus and Sirius fading into the background.

James held out his hands for hers and she took them without hesitation, unthinking.

"I dinna care who loved you first, Lily, or who will love ye last," he told her gruffly, taking her in his arms. "I will love you best, reubaltaich."

She shut her eyes, lips parting with a gasp as his mouth fell on hers, his kiss as familiar and as wild and full of freedom as ever. She could taste the adrenaline on his lips, pounding in his heart, and she coiled her fingers desperately in his shirt, refusing to let him go even as the men around him whooped their approval.

They parted briefly, his eyes falling gladly on hers. "Will ye fight at my side, reubaltaich?" he asked her, breathless with relief. "I wouldna have you anywhere else."

"James, if I don't stay close to you, someone's surely going to try to kill you," she said, and then laughed through her tears, letting him kiss her again. "But I won't let them," she whispered to him, and he pressed a kiss to her nose, her eyes, her forehead.

"So long as I have you, Lily," he said. "Mo leannan, my love, with you by my side, I canna fail."

She didn't bother to correct him. He had her, fully, for at least the rest of this day, and she sensed that even if she left his side, he would still have her—all of her—in a way no one else ever would.

"Let's go take your country back," she said to him, and he smiled at her, hoisting his sword in the air.

"Reubaltaich!" he shouted to the crowd.

"Reubaltaich!" they shouted back, and the echoes of their voices rained down around them as James kissed her again, his lips ripe with the honeyed taste of victory.
Lily understood why James had been quick to believe she'd been sent into the castle by Dumbledore, and why Dumbledore had presumed her to be a spy; the old Englishman was far more sly than he seemed, overly fond of espionage, and advised James to take a furtive way in to keep Lord Voldemort's Death Eaters distracted.

"There's a tunnel," Lily recalled, blinking. Severus had mentioned it at least twice while they'd been on their initial tour of Hogsmeade. "It runs from somewhere in Hogsmeade into the castle."

James nodded his agreement. "They willna refuse us," he said firmly, glancing at Sirius. "They will let us in. Do you know where the entry is?" he asked her.

His glance at her was attentive again, steady with his iron certainty and unshakeable faith in her, but she faltered, unsure how to explain it had been a sweets shop in 1983.

"It's nearest to the castle," she said, and James nodded, sending Sirius and Remus off with a gesture. "What about you?" she asked him, and he shook his head.

"Us," he corrected her, and she frowned.

"But what am I—"

"You said you wouldna hesitate to stand at my side, did ye not?" James asked, grinning at her. "It's your lucky day, reubaltaich. That's precisely what you'll be doing."

"But," she began, and faltered. "But I can hardly wield a sword. Or a gun, for that matter—"

"Ye'll not have to, mo leannan," he said, taking her face between his palms and kissing her forehead gruffly. "Ye've got that magic stick of yours, do ye not? And me," he promised, pressing his forehead to hers. "Ye'll have me, Lily, and I willna let any harm come to ye."

She believed him, strange as that was—which was why, she supposed, she found herself doing the most insane thing she could possibly fathom: agreeing to face Lord Voldemort.

She found she wasn't afraid; not even remotely.

She didn't need to be.

"Will you have my back?" she asked him, and he smiled.

"Aye, and your front," he murmured to her lips, "and your side—" A kiss to her cheek, brushing down to her neck. "And your—"

"Jamie," Mad-Eye growled. "Surely there's a better time for this?"

He winked at her, shameless, and she laughed, lacing her fingers in his and forging boldly ahead.

"My husband has earned his place here," Lily said loudly, glaring at the Death Eaters who surrounded them. As she spoke, she knew that Remus, Sirius, and Mad-Eye were leading the other clans of the Order through the tunnel to break into the castle en masse; she and James only had to keep Voldemort distracted for perhaps twenty minutes. "You cannot keep him from his right to participate in the ruling of the Highlands. This castle—"

"Let me stop you there," Lord Voldemort said, eyeing her with palpable annoyance. Beside him, Greyback licked his claws, not taking his eyes from hers. "This castle is mine, Lady Potter, by order of His Majesty, and you should be quite grateful for my assistance. I recommend you both turn and go back to your estate," he added to James, "unless you'd like to be punished anew for your wife's inability to hold her tongue."

"Dinna speak to her that way," James warned, one hand falling on the hilt of his sword. "She speaks on my behalf, and she doesna speak false. This land isna yours to rule, Your Lordship," he said, sparing pointed traces of mockery at the title, "and ye canna keep your interests here for long."

"My god, this is exhausting," Lord Voldemort declared, falling back in his chair with a weary sigh. "Fenrir, would you take care of this, please? Just..." He waved a hand. "I don't know, put them somewhere, eat them, do whatever you like—"

"You can't be serious," Lily said, trying not to flinch as Greyback unfurled a long claw and smiled; even James looked unnerved at the prospect, stiffening slightly at her side. "You can't intentionally set a creature on a wizard, that's illegal—"

"Oh drat," Lord Voldemort drawled. Beside him, his Death Eaters were losing interest, clearly letting their attention wander at the prospect of James and Lily being dispatched. "Add it to my list of unprovable offenses, Greyback, when you're done with your present instructions—"

This wasn't going to work. It wouldn't take twenty minutes for them to die; she had to think of something else, and quickly.

"How about a duel?" Lily asked suddenly, and James' hand shot out to hold her back, but she'd already stepped forward, ready this time when Lord Voldemort's ice-blue eyes shot to the wand she slid down from her sleeve. "Just try me. If nothing else, a bit of sport for your noble court," she said, gesturing around to the jeering Death Eaters. "Unless you're afraid?" she mocked, and behind her, she was certain—had memorized him well enough by now to know—James had cracked that crooked, arrogant smile, trusting even her most reckless of ideas.

Under other circumstances, now would have been time to panic. Under most circumstances, in fact, she would have panicked, but not with James here.

With James at her side, she felt madly certain there was nothing to fear.

"Please," Voldemort said, sweeping a hand, but she was ready. His magic, in this time—with only limited advancement and training and without the refinement of a wand—would only manage to be elementary; a crude form of Avada Kedavra without something to channel its effects. She flung a stunning spell at him, just missing something that brushed her ankle to bring her a shudder of torment; probably a primitive form of Crucio, she guessed, gritting her teeth through a bodily ricochet of pain.

He was better than she expected, even with her advantage. Still, she didn't need to beat him; she needed to keep him distracted, and more importantly, she needed to disarm his guards and his men. She glanced around, trying to think of the best way to manage it, and aimed a blasting curse at the ceiling, sending part of it crashing down overhead.

"Lily," came James' growl, thrusting a hand up to pause a fallen slab of stone from landing on her, "be careful, ye reckless little—"

"Get over here," she hissed to him, grabbing his hand and tucking him behind her as she cast a charm to slow the rubble over her head, watching Lord Voldemort manage to do the same with only the magic that expelled from his palms. "I'm—I'm just trying to—"
"I know what you're doing, mo leannan, and you're making a verra fine mess," James told her, "but still, ye need to watch your head, or who will do the healing?"

She shoved him back to avoid another spell from Lord Voldemort, and then, from the courtyard, she heard the sounds of men and shouting; signs the barricades of the castle had been breached by the rest of the clans.

Emboldened, she threw another blasting curse, this time caving in the exit the Death Eaters were using to try to escape. "We have to make sure to get Lord Voldemort," she said to James, panting as she tried to climb over the piles of stone. "Do you see him?"

James' arms came around her waist, tugging her back just as a spear of magic sliced at where she'd been.

"Found him," he said in her ear, both of them choking on the rise of dust from the impact of the castle crumbling.

"Who are you?" demanded Lord Voldemort, appearing from within a thick cloud of smoke as bits of the ceiling continued to rain down, the rebels making their way inside with the heady smell of gunfire to apprehend the Death Eaters. "You," he flung at Lily, "you're not one of Dumbledore's, you must be—"

He stopped, blinking.

"The seventh floor," he said slowly, swatting away her stunning spell like it was nothing more than a fly. "The room—you found it, didn't you?"

She didn't bother registering his remark.

"I'm a fucking rebel, Your Lordship," she assured him, "and you may as well have dug your grave the day you tried to kill me."

She threw another stunning spell but was forced to duck as Lord Voldemort sent a crude ball of magic her way; surely a killing curse. Curses were faintly colored, just as they were when cast with a wand, and she suspected she knew what he was doing with that one.

"You're good," came Lord Voldemort's voice, "but you can't outlast me."

"Oh, is that so?" Lily said, feeling a telling vacancy behind her.

Will you have my back, James?

Aye, and your front, too—

"Watch me, Your Lordship," Lily snarled.

She threw another stunning spell, catching the tell-tale flash of motion behind Lord Voldemort as he dodged it again, flinging another curse at her. She hurled a blasting curse his way, upending the floor between them to root him in place as he stepped towards her, and then caught a glimpse of exactly what she'd been waiting for.

"NOW, JAMES!"

Lord Voldemort cried out as a sword flashed amid the rubble and smoke, burying itself in the Baron's back. He staggered forward, choking, and blood dribbled down from the corners of his lips.
as he dragged his gaze up to Lily, coughing.

No, not coughing.

_Laughing._

"I'll be back," Lord Voldemort gurgled up, and she shoved him to his knees, the extension of James' sword from his sternum holding him upright amid the shards of stone. "You'll see, just watch and —"

She aimed her wand. "That's enough from you," she said flatly, and felt James' hand steadying her at her elbow as she cast a final spell, stunning Lord Voldemort to silence and leaving him to bleed out on the floor of the castle he'd stolen.

Then she turned with exhaustion and relief, seeking the broadness of James' chest.

"Lily," she heard him say in her ear. "Lily, we have to get out of here—"

She nodded hazily, a little drained from the effort of duelling, and without hesitation, James scooped her up and lifted her from the ground, carrying her over the sharpness of jagged wood and stone. He hurried her away from the fighting for what seemed like miles, eventually kicking down a door to duck into the room she was ironically certain would one day be the potions dungeon where Severus had been working the day she'd disappeared.

James set her down slowly, placing her with grave care atop the surface of the wooden table.

"Are ye hurt at all?" he asked worriedly, scanning her for injury. He tested her arms, her wrists, checking over her shoulders; her dress had been torn and she had some cuts she'd need to heal. She watched his brow furrow, his entire focus on her, and felt a stirring of something she wished she'd known sooner.

But once she knew, she dragged his mouth to hers, unwilling to wait. He gasped with surprise, the salt of sweat and hard-fought triumph mixing with desperation on the tips of their tongues. He held her without reservation; he kissed her with fervor, with ardor, and with the sanctity of lifetimes; with the conviction of being bound to her, wholly and completely, with his breath between her lips.

She pulled him into her, fitting his hips between her legs as she kissed him deeply, without hesitation. She licked the ash from his mouth, eagerly permitting his touch to kindle the adrenaline already sparking through her unsteady limbs, and his hand came down to rest over her racing pulse, tearing them brusquely apart.

"It isna easy, resisting you," James managed hoarsely, half-laughing at himself, "but still, Lily, are ye sure—"

"I want you," she said, bunching up the material of his kilt with all the foregone patience she felt certain she'd never have to waste again. "James," she whispered, "I shouldn't have—I should have told you, I should have told you every day that we weren't speaking that I wanted you, and—"

He shuddered as her hand closed around his cock; it seemed fighting had directed the majority of his blood helpfully elsewhere. "Mo leannan," he choked out, "if you dinna plan to stay, I dinna think I can bear it, I canna think t-"

He broke off as she brought his hand to the wet slit of her cunt, guiding his fingers against her. She was certain that if she'd been bare before him now, he would have seen how much her cunt glistened for him, even in the ruddiness of the dungeon's light. She felt like a randy teenager again, diminished to traces of her younger self, even as she saw well into the future, too.

She marveled at how temporally misplaced she always was with James; never quite rooted in any time or another. Not 1983, not 1633, not in any time or place she'd ever been before or would ever be, but just... with him.

Just him.

"Don't refuse me, James," she rasped, moving his hand to stroke herself with his fingers. "You know how pointless it is; you know I'll only—"

He cut her off with a ravenous kiss, his hands dropping to her bodice.

"Can ye fix it," he said, gesturing down, "if I—"

"Rip it," she whispered, and he shuddered hard, his cock leaping against her thigh as he tore open the front of her dress.

He dropped his head, inhaling the scent of her, and brushed his lips to the swells of her breasts.

"Lily, I swear ye'll be the death of me," he told her, shivering as he pushed himself inside her and they both cried out in unison; in harmony; in satisfaction, at long last.

This time, the door was there.

She and James stood still, staring at it.

"What is he like?" James asked, and Lily glanced at him. "Your betrothed."

"Not like you," she said, turning to face him, and he chuckled. "He's a scholar. Very serious."

"Ah," James said sagely, nodding. "Less likely to get injured, then."

"Yes, much." She chewed her lip, eyeing the outline of the door again. "But it was never just him. It's my mother, too, my father, my sister—"

"Of course." James pressed his lips to the top of her head, brushing a tender kiss. "I dinna ken how it happened, reubaltaich, but if this is as much as I've been given—"

He shook his head, taking her fully in his arms.

"I took a vow," he said, "to love you. And I will." He kissed her forehead. "Whatever you choose, mo leannan," he murmured to her, "and wherever ye go, I will die with your name on my lips."

She closed her eyes, exhaling, and tilted her chin up, letting his kiss float down to her mouth, blessing her with certainty.

"I'd better stay then," she whispered, "or else that will surely happen sooner than you'd like."

He froze, then took a step back, looking down at her. "Lily, are you—"

"Am I sure? Yes," she told him, reaching up to wind her arms around his neck. "Thank you for giving me the freedom to choose, but I promise you, I'm sure—about this, and about you, James, I'm sure."
She stood up on her toes, waiting for the thrill of his lips meeting hers, and he didn't disappoint. His kiss was warm and comforting, alive with everything that was to come, and she pulled him close to rest their beating hearts against each other, letting their rhythms intertwine.

"Mo leannan," she whispered to him. "My rebel laird."

He smiled down at her. "My love," he said, and she smiled slowly in return, basking in the promise of all that was yet to be as she left the door on the seventh floor behind her.

Halloween was Severus' least favorite holiday.

Primarily because his fiancée had disappeared without a trace the year prior, and just days before their wedding. There'd been no sign of her; local aurors only insisted she must have run away, though Severus doubted it. Her clothes were still there, untouched, as if she'd simply vanished into thin air.

At least Lily's disappearance meant Severus was free to pursue his academic career at Hogwarts now, which was something she would have found mundane, to say the least. Potions had always been Severus' first love, and Lily had never quite understood that. She'd always been itching for something, nothing either of them could identify or explain, and he had never found himself properly able to give it to her.

Since Hogwarts had been reopened as a research facility, though, Severus found Samhain an unbearably touristy holiday, during which he could get little work done. It was always crowded, most of the castle open for tours, and it was exhausting. He rubbed his temple, shaking his head, and made his way up the stairs.

Luckily the seventh floor was always vacant. He'd gone up there several times after Lily had insisted there had been a room there, but he'd been right. She must have been mistaken. There was nothing there, nothing there at all, and this time was no diff-

He stopped, eyeing an ornate wooden door just as the handle turned, someone stepping out at the precise moment his feet touched the landing.

"Hello?" Severus said, and the black-haired man in a strange costume turned, eyeing him.

Severus blinked, stunned.

The door had never been there before.

Had it?

He shook himself.

Clearly he was starting to hallucinate.

"Where am I?" the man asked. English, not Scottish, though his accent was difficult to place.

"Hogwarts," Severus said slowly, and the man frowned.

He looked familiar, though Severus couldn't quite place it. He thought of a portrait on the bottom floor, but that couldn't have been it. Perhaps the man was some sort of actor hired for the evening's 'traditional' Hallow's Eve feast (which was hardly traditional so much as it was overpriced and ghastly).
"What day is it?" the man asked.

"31 October," Severus said, and then, in the interest of accuracy, "1984."

The man blinked.

Blinked again.

"Ah, Samhain, I see," he said, and settled into resolution, a slow smile spreading across his lips. "Yes, of course. I was lost for a very long time, I'm afraid."

"Are you looking for the feast?" Severus asked. He had no time for this, of course, but it seemed rude not to ask. Lily had always told him he was too invested in his own little world; perhaps that was why she'd left him, in the end. He made a note to himself to simply take this particular day off next year. "Do you need help finding..." He trailed off, eyeing the man's dingy costume. "Wherever it is you're going?"

The man, whoever he was, looked positively delighted.

"No, actually," he said. "I think I'm precisely where I need to be."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Hope you had fun! I'll be back soon with a dramione for Chmura's birthday. I do have some other things in the queue, but tbd on how long they'll take. Reminder that my new book, Lovely Tangled Vices, is now available to you, should you wish to have it. Thanks for celebrating Halloween with me!
The shot of rebel explosives narrowly missed where Draco was stationed, the rubble from the blast clipping him in the shoulder. He broke out in a slew of expletives, hurrying to repair the damage. It would be a matter of minutes before the spacecraft went down, and there was no amount of magic in the cosmos sufficient to keep him alive if he happened to careen into space without oxygen.

"Damn, damn, damn," Draco muttered to himself, army-crawling through the rubble to reach the communication device strapped to a dead Death Eater's waist. So much for his first tactical mission. His father was going to kill him, assuming the Dark Lord didn't do so first. Maybe death here would be preferable. He could simply float into empty darkness, become a comet, explode into a million tiny pieces. It was that, it seemed, or another wretched paternal lecture.

"This is Lieutenant Draco Malfoy," Draco said to the Floo device. "Slytherin module, do you copy? Over."

The voice on the other end crackled a response. "Lieutenant, we hear you. What do you need? Over."

He exhaled his relief. "The ship is fucking crawling with members of the Order," he said, fiddling with the two-way radio to improve the clarity of sound. "I need to get a message to my father, General Lucius Malfoy. Over."

"General, hm?" he heard a voice murmur above him, and Draco froze, looking up to find a shadow casting itself over him from beneath the flickering fluorescent lights. An Order member, their uniform marked with the symbol for Captain, bent down, the click of a blaster that Draco guessed had been loaded with a Confringo charm settling with ease at the back of his head. "Interesting."

"Lieutenant, the line is clear," said the voice on the other end of the radio. "Commence the message, over."

Draco opened his mouth to shout for help but went rigid, the blaster shoving itself further into his head in warning.
"Alright, now look," the Order member murmured to him, their voice obscured by the sound of their oxygen mask, "the thing is, I obviously can't let you go, can I? But also, I need a way off this ship myself. You feel me?"

Draco grimaced, furious. "Fucking die, rebel scum—"

"Sweet of you, darling, but no, not today, I have plans. Thanks for that, though," they said, adjusting the tuning on their mask and slipping the radio from his hand. "Tell my father," the Order member said, now mimicking Draco through what was obviously some sort of voice modulator he'd unwittingly given them the means to use, "I need a carrier ship to get off this station. Something big enough for a dozen people and weapons. We're commencing evacuation protocol, over."

"You fucking—" Draco broke off, the Order member pointedly tapping the trigger of their blaster.

"Quiet," they warned, and the radio issued a response.

"We're sending a carrier to the east transport immediately, Lieutenant. Over."

The Order member turned their head, eyeing him. "You wouldn't say thank you, would you?" they mused. "No, I doubt it."

"Get fucked and die," Draco suggested.

"Language," they murmured drily, "but fair enough. Alright," they said, using Draco's voice again to speak into the radio, "I'm pleased to be spared your usual ineptitude. The ship will blow in ten minutes—better that than falling into the hands of rebel scum, over."

"You got it, Lieutenant. Ship is apparating from hyperspeed now, over."

"Good. See you on the other side, over." The Order member glanced down at Draco, tucking the radio into the pocket of their worn uniform. "Well, this has been fun. Thanks a lot for your help, couldn't have done it without you—"

"You're just going to let me die?" Draco snapped.

To his surprise, the Order member sighed heavily, sounding momentarily distressed.

"No, I guess not," they muttered, removing their helmet. Draco blinked, startled, as a wave of curly brown hair tumbled free, revealing a young woman with fox-like features and overlarge brown eyes.

A smile pulled at the corners of her lips. "Here," she said, shoving the helmet onto his head and hitting a button, prompting him to gasp a lungful of charmed air. "You know," she added, blaster still aimed at him as she rose to her feet, "you're sort of cute when you're issuing death threats. If you live through this, definitely look me up."

"You're fucking insane," he spat at her as she took two steps back, laughing. "You think I'm going to survive you blowing up my ship?"

"Oh, is this your ship?" she asked, feigning lamentation. "Huh, bummer. Well, I liked it," she said, pausing in the threshold. "Clean lines, very orderly. A great ship, actually, before it started shooting at me and everyone I love... and, you know, the concept of freedom and also the autonomy of free will—"
"Salazar's balls, just kill me," he muttered, hoping to be spared the misfortune of two lectures, and she smiled broadly at him.

"I bet you look great naked," she remarked, and vanished through the portkey door.

Draco looked around, shaking his head.

And to think, he lamented internally, it was only Monday.

"Crookshanks," Hermione whispered to her droid, who made a low series of beeps in response. "What kind of establishment is this?"

Her single-occupant apparition pod had been knocked out of the sky before they'd made it back to The Phoenix, landing them both on a nearby seedy planet Hermione felt sure was full of vagrants and thieves. Luckily, Crookshanks had been built out of spare parts and certainly didn't look valuable, and neither did she. The pod she'd crashed, on the other hand, would be discovered very shortly if they didn't get out of here soon and back to her ship.

Crookshanks replied with a series of whirs and clicks.

"A tavern?" she echoed. "Well, bartenders do always seem to know where to get spare parts, don't they? Could be worse."

Crookshanks beeped its unwilling agreement, twitching with nerves.

"Oh, calm down," Hermione said, pushing the door open. "It's not like it could possibly be a—"

"Hello," came the voice of the smug blond lieutenant, the tavern falling silent as a blaster aimed itself at her temple. "Out," he commanded flatly to the other occupants, and they slowly made their way out the back entrance, leaving Hermione alone with what looked to be at least four other Death Eaters.

"—trap," she finished weakly, and Crookshanks made a high-pitched squeak of opposition. "I see you lived," she noted, turning her glance to the Death Eater who was holding a blaster to her head. "Lieutenant Malfoy, was it?"

"Yes. Very little thanks to you, but yes, I did happen to live—and what do we have here?" He reached over, pulling aside her cloak to read her badge. "Ah, Captain Granger," he said quietly to himself, half-smiling. "Enemy Number Three, what marvelous good fortune. I had no idea it was your pod that went down above Knockturn, but now that you're here, I accept—"

"I'm number three?" Hermione echoed, blisteringly furious. "Who's number two? If it's Ron, I swear to Merlin—just because I'm a girl," she half-shouted at him, "that does not mean I'm not the second most dangerous person in the cosmos!"

"Weird time for an ego trip, but okay," Malfoy said, sounding bored. "So, how would you like to die? Torture okay?" he asked spiritedly. "Or maybe you'd like to float out into space in a shoddy rebel helmet waiting for rescue while your ship explodes around you," he mused, giving her a pointed glance. "Just spitballing here, of course, because surely no one would do that, would they?"

"You know," she said hastily, "I'm sure we could strike a deal here, Malfoy. I'm a captain," she reminded him, "which means I'm afforded some deference for my rank."

"We're not on the same team, Granger," he replied drily. "Your rank means literally nothing to me."

"Okay, sure, I'll give you that," she conceded, "but remember, I didn't actually let you die. In fact, I kind of saved your life, didn't I? Admit it," she said, trying not to wince as he dug the blaster deeper into her temple. "You wouldn't be alive at all if I hadn't put that shoddy helmet on your head."

She hadn't actually expected him to hesitate, but she felt his breath hitch, just for a moment. Aha, she thought triumphantly, turns out someone isn't pure evil after all, is he?

"Besides," she breathed in his hesitation, shifting towards him as much as she could without earning a blasting curse to the face, "I've been thinking about you, you know."

He stiffened. "Don't," he warned flatly.

"But I have," she said, turning her head and simpering just enough to let the words ghost across his throat. "Ever since I left you there I've been considering what it might be like to take that little skull and crossbones uniform off you. See what you've got underneath," she mused, letting her gaze drop below his waist.

"Like I'd let you touch me," he snarled, but she smiled.

He'd shivered. Perfect.

"Lieutenant," one of the Death Eaters said, gesturing with indiscreet repulsion at Crookshanks. "What do you want us to do with the droid?"

Her heart faltered. She needed more time.

"You know," she permitted, forcing a laughing whisper into Malfoy's ear, "just to be clear, when I was thinking about it, you were doing most of the touching. I bet you're very meticulous in bed, aren't you?" she asked him. "Not me, I'm afraid. I prefer things hard and—"

"THE DROID," Malfoy coughed up, his voice teetering on the edge of breaking as he gruffly addressed the other Death Eater. "Take it, to. Ah—"

"There's probably not too many girls on your evil little spaceship, I'll bet," Hermione whispered to him. "So I guess you're probably out of practice, aren't you? We'd have to try a couple of times, just to be sure." She let her fingers drop against the fabric of his trousers, delighting in the way he instantly went rigid. "How's your stamina, Malfoy?"

"Shut up. Stop it." He was squirming, much to her satisfaction. "Stop i- HEY," he barked to one of his Death Eaters, "get the droid out of here, check it for plans, and—"

"Yes, I agree, we should be alone," Hermione purred to him, stifling laughter. "Voyeurism has a time and place, obviously, but our first time should be special, don't you think?"

He shoved the blaster further into her temple, annoyed. "You really think this is going to work? You're trapped, Granger, and I'm not an idiot."

"No, I'm serious, Malfoy," she said, glancing down at Crookshanks. "All this time running around shooting each other, getting all sweaty and worked up..." She winked at him. "Nothing like a near-death experience to really whet the appetite, you know what I mean?"
"I," Malfoy said through his teeth, "am going to have so. Much. Fun. Murdering you."

"Well, everyone's got a kink," Hermione said, just before the roof of the tavern came crashing down, a shot from somewhere above sending Malfoy's blaster flying.

"GET IN," Harry shouted, and upon seeing his face, Hermione elbowed Malfoy in the abdomen, drawing her wand and apparating herself and Crookshanks into the cockpit of The Marauder II. "Welcome back, Captain," Harry said with a grin, removing himself from her seat and gesturing her into it. "Good thinking having Crookshanks remotely turn on the map," he added, shouting over the sound of Death Eaters blasting holes in her beloved ship.

"I just hope you didn't break anything," she told Harry, waving down to Malfoy as she prepared to make her escape. "CROOKSHANKS," she shouted to the droid, "SEND US TO HYPERSPEED!"

Just before they went, she saw Malfoy's face turn red with fury, his grey eyes widening with a glorious rage that looked, much to her displeasure, incredibly appealing on his sleekly elegant features. She didn't bother fighting the urge to visually undress him; the effort would have been wasted, and she shivered with promise in the aftermath.

"It's too bad we didn't work out," Hermione sighed, shaking her head. "He could've used the exercise."

"What?" Harry asked.

"Hm? Oh, nothing," Hermione said cheerily, gripping the controls and lurching back into open space.

Draco walked briskly through the corridor, the wards going off behind him. "Get the Dark Lord to the west transport," he said to Rosier. "Make sure he and the Chamber plans are off this ship and then evacuate the entire northwest quadrant. You know Potter and the rest of his rebel scum never hesitate to blow things up just for fun."

"Yes, Lieutenant," Rosier said, hurrying in the opposite direction as Draco walked into his quarters and stopped, waiting.

After a moment, he flicked his wand, shutting the door behind him.

"You can come out now," he said to empty air.

Slowly, Hermione Granger of the Order of the Phoenix, Enemy Number Three and captain of The Marauder II, warped into being where she stood in front of the door.

"How'd you know I was here?" she asked neutrally, and he turned to face her.

"Because you can't resist following me around," he said, and her mouth twisted into a grim smile. "I did some research on you," he commented, folding his arms over his chest.

"Did you? That's sweet," she said, stepping further into the room. They circled each other for a moment, keeping a wary distance. "I did some on you, too. You're the son of General Lucius Malfoy, notorious murderer and Lord Voldemort's second in command," she said, shaking her head disapprovingly. "Bet you've got some daddy problems, don't you, Lieutenant? Of course, that's just my presumption anytime someone's father is the right-hand man of a genocidal dictator," she mused, "but that could just be me."

"You're nothing," he remarked nastily. "Potter and Weasley are certainly scum, but not like you. They plucked you off some garbage planet, didn't they?"

"Oh, dirty talk, nice," she replied drily. "And here I thought we were actually getting somewhere this time."

"Well, we do have a knack for finding each other," he said before asking, "Where's Potter?"

She looked intensely annoyed.

"That's what you want to talk about?" she asked crossly. "If I'm not mistaken you've trapped me in your quarters," she pointed out, gesturing to the wards around the room that had prevented her from disapparating the moment she'd entered, "and yet, stupidly, now you want to have a chat about what the Chosen One's gotten off to?"

"In case you've missed it, the Dark Lord does want Potter dead," Draco said, shrugging. "Believe it or not, my concern is hardly about whatever pretty perversities you so delight in whispering to me."

"Perversities, huh?" she asked, stepping close enough for him to identify the real reason he'd been certain she was in the room; her hair smelled like gardenias, and he would have recognized the scent of her anywhere. "You fucking love it, though, don't you? Bet you wish I'd touch you, Malfoy," she said with a laugh. "Exactly how many of your darkest fantasies involve being balls-deep in rebel scum?"

She was taunting him. In response, Draco reached out, brushing his thumb over her lip and smiling slightly as she narrowed her eyes at him, recoiling.

"What a filthy little mouth you have," he said, and she scowled, prompting him to laugh. "What, are we not bantering anymore? Pity," he sighed, "I was so looking forward to another round. Personally, I find it's much more fun when I'm the one winning."

"You're not winning," she told him, smirking slightly. "Lord Voldemort's not going to be able to leave this fucking ship. Harry's got the west transport surrounded."

"Ah yes, of course he does," Draco agreed, facetiously shaking his head, and then he leaned closer, catching the faltering of her breath between his lips from no more than an inch away. "I suppose it's not worth telling you the Dark Lord was never on this ship," Draco murmured, and she stiffened, angrily clenching a fist. "Nor is it worth mentioning you're trapped inside a blood ward I know for a fact you can't break."

Her mouth twisted, to his surprise, into a nasty smile.

"So, you actually managed to trick me for once," she noted. "Good for you, Malfoy. I was starting to worry I had overestimated you."

"Mm, no," he assured her, cupping her chin. "And I wish I had time to bask in my victory," he lamented, murmuring the words to her upturned mouth, "but unfortunately, this part of the ship is about to blow."

"Well, then at least something's getting off," Granger muttered, and he smiled broadly.

"It really is so unfortunate," he mused, letting his gaze flick over her. "I'd have liked to taste you once."
"Once? Please, Malfoy," she scoffed. "You'd have begged for more."

He leaned forward, brushing his lips against her cheek, and turned to speak in her ear.

"Don't die," he whispered to her, and she shivered, furious.

Then he disapparated away, her scream of frustration echoing in his ears.

"Did she buy it?" Rosier asked from the control room.

"Yes," Draco said, gesturing to the part of the ship Granger and Potter were currently on. "Light it up."

Rosier hesitated. "Lieutenant Malfoy, your father hasn't confirmed the ord."

"For fuck's sake," Draco said, shoving Rosier aside and hitting the controls himself. Three beeps, and then the ground beneath them shook, the lit-up portion of the ship gone dark.

"There," Draco said, something tightening to an ache inside his chest. "She's gone."

---

"Hi," Hermione said, leaning over a sleeping Draco Malfoy and prompting him to bolt upright, panting; he smacked into the top of the ship's ceiling, growling his displeasure. "Yeesh," she commented, eyeing her fingernails as she leaned over the edge of his bunk. "Jumpy, much?"

"How," he began, staring at her. "What—"

"How did I get in here? Well, I'd rather not say," she said, blithely answering herself. "Tricks of the trade, Malfoy, not sharing. How'd I survive you blowing up your father's ship? Eh, I'll save it for my memoir. What am I doing here right now?"

She paused, waiting, and he stared vacantly at her.

"Oh, sorry, I thought you might try to guess. I'm here to kidnap you," she said spiritedly, and he reached for his wand, obviously realizing with a lurch that it wasn't there.

"Like hell you are," he retorted, backing away from her with a scowl. There had at one point been a blaster beneath his mattress; she watched him reach for it, fighting a laugh.

"I found that one, too," she said, and he scowled at her. "Oh, come on, Malfoy, it'll be fun," she told him. "No harm, no foul, we'll just ransom you and maybe cut off one or two your less-valuable body parts. We'll see where the night takes us."

"Aren't you a captain?" he hissed, furious. "What the fuck are you doing running around abducting people?"

"Oh, and here I thought you'd be happy to see me," she lamented with a sigh. "Besides, the Order's kind of an all-hands-on-deck brand of revolution," she said, leaping down and glancing at her droid. "Right, Crookshanks?"

The droid whistled its confirmation in response as Hermione flicked her wand, levitating Draco out from his bed and depositing him flat on his back on the floor. He was illustriously shirtless, a little sheen of sweat glinting from his chest, and she considered what a marvelously lucky person she was to have not only evaded his capture multiple times but also to have guessed correctly what his pectoralis looked like.

"Don't bother," she said, bending over him as he glanced at a drawer that had once held a spare knife, "I've gotten rid of all your weapons. Checked out a few other things while you were sleeping, too," she added with a blatant glance at his thin cotton pants and a wink, and he gaped up at her. "Have to say, I'm not disappointed."

"I can't believe you're not dead," Draco groaned.

"Well, you specifically told me not to die," she reminded him, "so that's on you. I'm very good at following instructions."

"I'm pretty sure that's completely false," he said.

"Well, it's sweet we're still learning each other," she replied, just as a Death Eater walked in, swiping an access key to his room.

"Oh, thank god," Draco exhaled, scrambling to his feet. "Rosier, get word to my fath-"

He broke off as Ron cheerfully lifted the stolen helmet. "Hi, Mione," he said. "This the one, then?"

"Yep, this is the one," Hermione said, gesturing between them. "Draco Malfoy, Ron Weasley. Ron, Draco."

"For the utter love of fuck," Draco said, and Ron grabbed him briskly by the shoulder, yanking him to his feet.

"Should we get him dressed?" Ron asked her, and she shrugged.

"Nah," she said, stepping closer to Draco and flicking her gaze openly over his chest. "What, no threats, Malfoy?" she asked him, smiling darkly at his fuming silence. "Nothing about how your father's going to kill us all, or maybe how you'll get us and our little droids, too—"

"And give you the satisfaction? Not today, Granger," Draco seethed. "You play your little game however you want to, and we'll see what comes out of it."

She leaned forward, speaking in his ear as he'd once done to her. "A game," she murmured, stroking a finger down his stomach, "is precisely what I had in mind. Presuming you live through it."

He gave her a bitter scowl and she stepped back, satisfied, to smile at Ron. "All set?"

"All set," Ron confirmed. "Wards have been reversed. Everyone on the ship is now trapped in their own rooms, and we're free to walk right out of here."

"Hear that, Malfoy?" Hermione asked him, stifling a laugh at his look of unadulterated contempt. "It's our first romantic stroll. Hope you like long walks into captivity."

"I can't wait to kill you," he snapped.

Crookshanks made a series of high-sounding beeps.

"Yes," Hermione agreed, "he is a funny man, Crookshanks."
Draco stared up at the ceiling of his cell, not moving as a shadow fell across him.

"Three days," came Hermione's voice.

He shut his eyes. "Well, your fault for miscalculating," he said flatly. "If you'd done your research properly, you'd know my father has no problem with you killing me. Certainly not if your ransom is too high," he clarified, letting his head roll towards her, "which it is. He'd sooner die than betray the Dark Lord by sending you the Chamber plans, so killing me? Perfectly fine with him, which anyone would have told you if you'd bothered to ask."

She looked at him in silence for a second.

"What does the Chamber do?" Hermione asked.

He shrugged, turning back towards the ceiling. "Same thing everything does. It's a weapon, just like anything else. One you can't fight against."

"Nothing is invulnerable," Hermione argued, ever the idiotic optimist. "It's just a weapon."

"Just a weapon," Draco scoffed, closing his eyes again, and she stepped closer, wrapping one hand around one of the bars between them.

"You're boring like this," she said, with a hint of meanness. "I can hardly fantasize about you when you're basically comatose in a dungeon."

"Well, much as I hate to disappoint you," he said drily, "I don't really see how I can help the situation."

"Oh, come on." She sounded irritated, or at least agitated. "Get up, Malfoy."

He cracked one eye, lifting his head to look at her. "Bored, Granger?"

"Obviously," she told him gruffly, "and you're bumming me out. At this rate, it's not even going to be fun to kill you."

He lurched upright, looking up at her.

"You can't do it, can you?" he asked her, and she blinked.

"What?"

"You can't kill me," he said, rising to his feet and striding over to where she stood on the other side of the bars. "My father's calling your bluff," he remarked, leaning against the bars and looking down on her. "You're not going to kill me because you can't do it, and you can't use me to get what you want, either. Nice move, Captain," he said, shaking his head. "You miscalculated even worse than I thought."

She glared up at him, but said nothing.

"You've got to mean it, you know," he said in a low voice, curling his fingers around the bar where her hand rested. "When you're weighing someone's life against something you want, you've got to make good on your threats. Poor thing," he said, brushing her knuckles and feeling her stiffen beneath his touch. "You're failing hostage negotiation, you know, and once you realize you're not going to get what you want, your conscious will force you to let me go."

"I'm perfectly happy to let you die in this cell," she informed him, pulling away, and his hand shot out, catching hers before she took a step back.

"Oh, but you hate me in chains, Granger," he whispered to her, wanting to laugh at the sight of her swallowing heavily, proving him right. "You thought you'd like it, didn't you? But you don't like power, not really. What you want," he murmured, tugging her closer through the bars, "is for someone to put you in your place."

"You think I like hearing you call me scum, Malfoy?" she asked, seething with contempt. "I don't need your… your bigoted condescension—"

"No, that's not what you want. You want an equal," he determined with a smile. "You want someone who can match you; who can go head to head with you, and who's capable of coming out on top. You want to lose as many times as you win," he informed her, "because it means you have a worthy adversary."

"I prefer winning, thanks," she said, tugging away, but he didn't release her.

"I want that, too," he said softly, permitting his gaze to turn ravenous, just once. "I don't want you to beg. I don't want you on your knees, begging me for mercy. I want your fire, Granger," he said. "Your spark. I want to have to chase you just to taste you—and I want you to want me," he clarified in a low voice, "as equally and as thoroughly as I want you."

She looked up at him, the motion of her hesitant swallow obvious from where they stood on opposite sides of metal bars.

"I'm not dumb enough to fall for this," she managed eventually. "If you think this is going to make me let you go, you're wrong."

He released her with a grimace, stepping back.

"Fine," he said. "Good. Glad to hear it, Captain," he added with a mocking snarl. "Glad you've got some sense, then, beneath all that unconvincing bravado."

Her eyes narrowed, mouth lined with anger.

"You could have kidnapped anyone on that ship," he reminded her with a darkened laugh, sliding down against the back wall to sit on the floor of his cell. "Why did you pick me?"

She stared at him.

Then she spun on her heel, stomping away from him and out of sight without answering.

(6)

"Are you sure about this?" Harry asked apprehensively, grimacing as she unlocked the prisoner's cell. "You're wagering quite a bit on him, you know."

"Not on him," she sniffed. "Just his sense of self-preservation."

She kicked at Draco's foot, startling him awake.

"Come on," she said.

He sat up slowly, glaring blearily at her. "Did my father arrange for my release?"
"Nope," she replied. "But we need those Chamber plans and you know a way in, so. You're coming."

"You're joking," Draco said flatly, glancing at Harry. "She's joking, isn't she?"

"Unfortunately, she doesn't joke," Harry replied grimly. "I don't like it either, but here we are."

"Listen," Hermione interrupted, crouching down to hold her blaster to Draco's chest. "You're worthless to us dead, Malfoy. Your father doesn't want you, but we need you. I do," she clarified, and the corners of his mouth quirked up, amused. "Not like that," she muttered, jamming her blaster deeper into his sternum until he coughed with displeasure, glaring. "Listen, I need these plans. I need to know what the Chamber is for, so you're getting me on board the Slytherin station whether you like it or not."

Draco clearly couldn't decide whether to be angry or annoyed. "Why would you possibly be stupid enough to trust me?" he demanded. "I could be leading you into a trap. I could get you—"

"Well, if I die, you die," she said flatly, grabbing his hand and magically cuffing it to hers, holding it up for his scrutiny. "Easy as that. You're still a prisoner," she informed him, gesturing around his cell, "but now you get a slightly bigger cage."

"I've seen that metal box you call a ship," he muttered to her, bristling. "It's not that much bigger than this."

She didn't have time to argue. "I think you're failing to grasp, Malfoy, that you don't have a choice."

"I could get us both killed, you know," he reminded her, half-spitting it out. "Maybe I prefer to die than to help your side win against mine."

"Funny thing about these sides," Hermione said, yanking a growling Draco this feet, "as far as I can see, one doesn't want you and the other does, so you really ought to reconsider your position on the matter. That," she added, leaning into speak into his ear, "and you and I both know you don't want to die. Not yet," she murmured, one hand unsubtly resting on his belt as Harry turned away, blatantly ignoring the exchange. "Not before you've had what you want."

"Is this supposed to be a threat," Draco muttered brusquely, "or a bribe?"

"Neither. Both." She yanked him after her, dragging him from the cell. "Crookshanks, ready the ship," she called to the droid from the corridor. "We're leaving immediately for the Slytherin space station."

The droid responded with a series of rapid beeps and whirs, scurrying off to the portkey.

"Captain Granger," Harry called after her, and she paused, pivoting around to face him while she jerked Draco alongside her, sending him half-stumbling over his own feet. "Be sure to get those plans," Harry said, half-smiling. "The fate of the Order is in your very capable hands."

"Touching," muttered Draco, repulsed, and Hermione elbowed him in the ribs, sending him doubling-over again with a groan.

"Myths never die," Hermione called to Harry, and in response, he tossed her a salute.

"We always rise," he called back, and she turned the corner with a smile, glancing down at her captive.
Even unwashed and rid of his possessions, captive Lieutenant Draco Malfoy still possessed a spoiled, silvery gleam. His hair fell into his face and his mouth, grim with determination, was as full and appealing as ever.

"We need to get you a shirt," Hermione said, casting a glance over the muscle of his shoulders and back. A pity he was so despicably appealing.

"Might as well continue enjoying the view," Draco said gruffly, "seeing as we're both about to be killed. Slytherin's impenetrable," he said with a skittish glance at her, "and all my codes will be disabled. I'm no help to you at all."

"You're still a set of eyes, aren't you? Still a functioning brain, or something close enough," she said, "and you know the layout of the station."

"They're going to kill you," he said under his breath.

"Us," she corrected spiritedly. "They're going to kill us," she clarified, "and do you really want those to be your dying words?"

He glared at her. "I fucking loathe you."

"Better," she agreed, giving him another shove and aiming them through the portkey wards to the ship portals. She headed over to her ship, the words The Marauder II gleaming proudly in the institutional lighting among the other junked-up apparition pods.

"What happened to the first Marauder?" Draco asked, making a face. "Or do you rebels only have enough creativity for one name?"

She gave him a shove, directing him into the cockpit.

"Lord Voldemort destroyed it," she said. "Along with everything else."

To her gratification, she could have sworn she saw him swallow hard.

"Oh," he said, permitting her to shove him into his seat as she prepared for take-off.

"Okay, we're in," Hermione whispered to her droid from her communication device, an earpiece she kept referring to as an extendable ear. She nudged Draco, gifting him another sharp elbow to the ribs. "It's your turn," she told him, pointedly raising her arm where it had been bound to his.

"Get us in or die, your call."

He rolled his eyes, ducking down as a Death Eater went past. "Get back here," he muttered to her, pulling her down with him. "The plans would be in the digital archives. We have to make our way to the center of the ship without someone blasting us first."

She nodded, waving him forward. "Go," she said.

He wondered why she was trusting him. Sure, she had a point that they were currently bound together, but it wouldn't take much to break it. The moment anyone knew she was on this spacecraft, they wouldn't do her the courtesy of taking her hostage and letting her live in a cell for a few days. She'd take her very last breaths on this ship, and it scarcely seemed to register with any reasonable amount of fear.
"This way," Draco said, leading her down the labyrinthine paths. She'd stolen some Death Eater uniforms for them to wear inside—probably the same ones they'd stolen in order to abduct him—and hers was too big for her, his too small for him. If anyone looked closely, they'd obviously be out of place, but that was the beauty of having too much power. Nobody looked closely at the details until it was too late.

He entered a passcode into the digital archives and the doors slid open, revealing a vast chamber filled with electronic records. It gleamed with metal and glass, blinding them temporarily.

"How do we know which one it is?" Hermione whispered.

Only a Death Eater with access would know.

"Ask your droid," he said, though he knew it wouldn't work.

She touched her hand to her ear, blinking. "Crookshanks?" she asked, and frowned. Poor thing, he thought. She'd underestimated the magical technology of a Death Eater space station, though depending how things went, it was the last time she'd commit that particular error. "Crookshanks, I need—"

The door slid open behind him, revealing two Death Eaters in the frame.

"Hello, Lieutenant Malfoy," said a grim Rabastan Lestrange. "I see you've managed to make it back." He turned, sliding a glance to Hermione. "Ah, and you've brought Captain Granger, too. Excellent."

Draco felt Hermione's breath catch next to him, her hand moving towards her blaster. He caught her arm and wrenched it back, shoving her in front of him as well as he could manage while still being attached to her.

"Lestrange," Draco said quickly, "she's here for the Chamber plans. Remove them from the archives and take them to my father immediately."

Hermione twisted to stare over her shoulder at him, gritting her teeth with fury. "What code did you use?"

"My father's," he replied coolly, "but he's not on this ship, which is presumably what raised some alarm. Lestrange, if you will?" he asked, gesturing, and then he wrested Hermione's blaster from her hand, angling the barrel into her back. She shoved him away, and he dug it into her vertebrae, turning to the other Death Eater. "Rowle, I need this binding undone," he said, referencing where he'd been forcibly cuffed to Hermione. "I'll happily kill Captain Granger myself," he added, turning to murmur in her ear as she struggled against his chest, "once I've finished with my… personal restitution."

Rowle nodded, removing the cuff with a flick of his wand, leaving Draco to yank Hermione's arm forcefully behind her back.

"Do you have the plans, Lestrange?" he asked the other Death Eater, who had swiped his access card, removing one of the digital files. "You'll have to get it to the Dark Lord. It seems the Order wants it badly enough to die for it, which is a wish I'm quite happy to grant."

"You motherfucker," Hermione rage-whispered, struggling to tear herself free from his grasp. "I thought you were different, I thought you were—"

"Lestrange?" Draco asked, ignoring her. "Recreational pursuits await, as you can see. Do you have the plans?"

Lestrange took hold of them from where they'd been deposited by a robotic arm before tucking his identification away. "Yes, Lieutenant Malfoy. I'll bring them t-"

He broke off as Draco promptly released Hermione, aiming her blaster at Lestrange's head and pulling the trigger to send him dropping to the floor. Then Draco shifted, shooting the rifle out of Rowle's hand, and aimed the blaster at Rowle's temple, glancing over at Hermione as she stared numbly back at him in disbelief.

"Take the files and go," Draco told her flatly. "Take Lestrange's access card. I'll keep them both here long enough for you to get out."

Hermione stared at him. "You'll be killed!"

"Yes, probably," Draco agreed, shrugging, "but it doesn't matter. I owe you one, don't I? You could have killed me on my ship all those months ago," he reminded her, "and you could have killed me when you took me prisoner, but you didn't. So go," he said again. "I know what the Chamber is. I know what it does. You'll all be blown to bits if you don't get those plans back to Potter, believe me."

"Traitor," Rowle spat at him through his teeth.

"Yeah, yeah, whatever," Draco muttered, rolling his eyes and jamming the blaster further into Rowle's temple. "You seemed to be fine with leaving me to die on a rebel excuse for a ship, so forgive me if I'm not especially interested in your side of things. Go," he instructed Hermione curtly, gesturing to where the plans remained in Lestrange's lifeless hand.

She stared at the plans, first, and then at him.

"Why are you doing this?" she asked quietly.

He shrugged.

"Maybe you're right that my side doesn't want me," Draco said. "Maybe I don't want the deaths of rebel scum on my hands, or maybe I know my father and the Dark Lord will never really give a shit whether I live or die. Or, maybe it's because I'm a fucking idiot," he suggested blithely, "and I've decided to be slightly more proactive about making sure you don't wind up dead. You know, instead of our usual game," he reminded her, "which is waiting to see how you miraculously survive."

Slowly, her mouth twitched up in a smile.

Then Rowle lunged without warning, breaking Draco's nose in one sharp motion and scrambling for Lestrange's communication device. "THE CHAMBER HAS BEEN OPENED," Rowle shouted as Draco struggled to see through watering eyes, "REPEAT, THE DIGITAL ARCHIVES HAVE BEEN COMPROMISED, THE CHAMBER HAS BEEN OP-"

He broke off, going limp as Hermione aimed a shot from Rowle's discarded rifle.

"Let's go," she said briskly to Draco, yanking the plans from Lestrange's hand and pausing just before she crossed the archive's threshold, waiting for him. "Or do you want to die here?" she demanded brusquely.

Blood was dripping from his nose, his entire skull searing with pain. They were never going to make it out alive. The whole of the Death Eater army would descend on them shortly, and they would surely go down via firing squad.

Still, he could see how the chance of survival with her was preferable.

"Here," he said, offering her the blaster and holding out his hand for the rifle, "give me that one and I'll—"

"No way, Malfoy," she said, hoisting the rifle in the air and smirking at him. "I get the big gun. That one looks super cute on you," she said, and jammed Lestrange's ID into the archive door, swiping it for access and stepping into the corridor.

Hermione and Draco had dispatched half a dozen Death Eaters each before she got them back into Crookshanks' communication range, shouting for the droid to hack into the space station's emergency system and lead them to the appropriate portkey. Draco had her back; Hermione concerned herself exclusively with forging ahead, the heavy Death Eater's weapon in her hands a more than ample substitute for her blaster.

Miraculously, they made it to the ships. She shoved the rifle into Draco's chest, leaving him to cover them as she sprinted onto The Marauder II and placed herself at the controls. Better to let him shoot down a few more Death Eaters while she and Crookshanks got the ship in motion; she had them hurtling through the air within seconds, seamlessly guiding them out through the rapidly closing portal of the Slytherin station.

Hermione let out a whoop, inserting the Chamber plans into the ship's database to send the details to Harry and Ron, and turned as Draco entered the control room. "You're not so bad with that thing, you know," she said approvingly, gesturing to the air rifle. "In fact," she mused, rising to her feet, "seeing how well you operate a gun makes me curious how you'd do with my—"

"Granger," Draco mumbled, his face ghostly pale, and then he dropped to the ground, unmoving.

She blinked.

Then she stumbled towards him, hurriedly checking him for damage. His chest had been singed by a blaster, and he'd clearly lost some blood from a deep wound in his arm. Narrow escapes, but he needed healing, badly.

"Crookshanks, take over the controls!" she yelled, and struggled to drag Draco to the back part of the ship, setting him down on a medic's cot and reaching hurriedly for her wand. "Come on, Malfoy," she seethed to him, incomprehensibly furious. She removed the too-small uniform, tearing open the shirt he wore underneath. "Honestly," she muttered as she healed the cuts and bruises and the broken nose, reaching for a salve to replenish the blood loss, "all those times you deserved to die and didn't, and now—"

He sat up with a gasp, panting, and caught her hand, startling her.

"Granger," he croaked.

"WHAT?" she demanded, irate once she'd recovered from her shock. "Don't talk to me right now, I'm upset," she grumbled, turning away to clean up the mess she'd made while hunting hysterically through salves, and he caught her arm, yanking her back.
"What are you possibly cross with me for?" he snapped, dragging her closer. He was staring at her with something very close to fury, though they looked at each other so few other ways she wasn't entirely sure she could tell the difference. "Did I not get you those plans, Granger? You shouldn't be shouting at me, you should be thanking me—"

"I was just healing you, you loathsome cockroach," she growled to him. "You nearly got yourself killed—which, by the way," she snapped, "was a THOUGHTLESS INCONVENIENCE—"

"Me? You nearly took a blast to the head, you reckless little cow," he gritted in reply, "and if I hadn't been there to cover you—"

"FINE, SO YOU SAVED MY LIFE," she hurled at him, helplessly infuriated. "WHAT DO YOU WANT FROM ME?"

She was breathing hard, leaning into his bare chest; his hand remained curled around her forearm, locking her in place against him, and he was glaring down at her.

Or, possibly, staring.

"You realize I don't have a place in the entire universe anymore," he said, his voice suddenly low and hoarse. "I can never go back. I'm not a lieutenant, I'm not an officer—my father will have disowned me ten times over by now. I'm not a Death Eater, and I'm certainly not a rebel. I used to be one of the most powerful men in the cosmos, and now," he gritted out, swinging his legs around with a wince to yank her flush against him, "I am even less nothing than you have ever been. And still, with all that," he said helplessly, "do you know what I can't stop thinking about?"

She scowled at him. "What?"

To her surprise, he exhaled with a shake of his head, bending his forehead to hers.

"How fucking worth it it would be," he said, the words warm against the cool sweat that still clung to her cheek, "to die fighting for you, Captain."

He _would_, she thought crossly. He fucking _would_ do that while she was angry. Of course he'd confess something like that while she was furious that he'd come to mean something to her—to mean _everything_ to her—just when she was most hoping to deny it.

She looked up slowly, fixing him with her angry, embattled gaze.

"You were supposed to die," she said, "a long time ago."

"I know," he agreed. "You kept me from it. So I imagine that means my life is yours."

He pulled her up from the floor, guiding her legs around either side of his hips as he settled her on his lap, sitting astride him on the cot.

"Stop saying stupid things," she grumbled, annoyed. "We're going to fuck and that's it. This is sex only, do you understand me? I hate you," she mumbled, running her hands over his stomach and brushing over the lingering marks of his injuries.

"Did I stop at my life?" he mused, tugging at the zipper of her uniform and peeling it back from her shoulders, pressing his lips to the bare skin around the strap of her bra. "My loyalty, too. You wanted me to choose a side? Fine. I choose yours," he murmured, letting her dig her nails into slim, reddened crescents on his chest.
"Stop talking," she hissed, shutting her eyes and shivering. "I don't want your promises, Malfoy, I just want your—"

"Language," he tutted disapprovingly, catching her fumbling hands and twisting around to pin her on her back, positioning himself above her. "Surely this was different in your imagination, wasn't it?" he asked, stroking a line across her clavicle.

"When I imagined it, I was murdering you," she muttered. "You know, blaster to your temple, bending you over my ship's control panel—"

"Later," he suggested impassively, gripping her hips. "Right now, it's my turn."

She reached up with a sigh, taking a handful of the pale blond strands at the back of his head and wrenching his head up to look at her.

"And what do you have in mind?" she asked him, not quite giving in.

In answer, he dropped his lips to hers; something part kiss, part promise. He seemed to channel all the frustration they'd accumulated into one incomprehensibly thrilling motion, a simple brush of contact that was capable of bringing her to feverish, maddening satisfaction.

"Fine," she said, muttering it as she let her hands traverse the landscape of his torso. "Proceed."

"Captain's orders?" he asked.

"Call it an irrefutable request," she replied.

He smiled, then slid down her torso, kissing his way as he went. She shivered as he made his way lower, peeling away the falseness of the the Death Eater uniform and leaving them pressed together, skin to skin. It was impossible to think how she'd withstood the absence of him for so long; it seemed another life, light years away in some other time-space continuum.

It was also impossible to fathom how he could be moving so slowly, his tongue languidly tracing little patterns of nothing around the curves of her thighs, threading the lips of her cunt before darting up, down, and over. The orbit of his breath near her aching core was enough to drive her to insanity; to violence, in fact, kicking him away to send him stumbling to his feet from the edge of the cot, staggering backwards.

"What the—"

"If you're going to fuck me on my ship, Malfoy," Hermione said, sitting up to admonish him, "you're going to do it my way, do you understand? None of this teasing nonsense, just get to the p--"

He cut her off, throwing one arm around her ribcage and lurching her upwards to slam her against the wall of her ship, rendering her momentarily breathless once she'd yelped at the cold metal sensation against her skin.

"Are you done?" he demanded, locking one of her arms overhead. She was pleased to see she hadn't underestimated his upper-body strength; even injured, he was managing things quite impressively. She'd have to applaud him for it later, in her way.

"Better," she managed with a rasp of approval, and gratifyingly, he slid the tip of his cock to the slit of her cunt, lowering her onto him.

She returned his hiss of vindication with a lavish moan of relief, clutching him tightly. "Don't die," she advised, and he looked up at her, a helpless laugh escaping through gritted teeth as she yanked at the roots of his hair.

"I've had worse deaths," he said, and thrust firmly into her, both of them lost to the oblivion of satisfaction as they plunged headlong into space.

"Stop whining," Hermione said impatently, and Draco groaned.

"You've hardly thought this through," he insisted, following after her as she climbed up the ramp to The Marauder II. "This is madness. Even Potter and Weasley disagree," he added, making a face, "and loath as I am to bring them up as if they possess any sort of qualifications between them—"

"Malfoy," she said, pivoting so quickly he stumbled directly into her, "it's very bad for morale for you to contradict your captain."

"Whose morale?" he demanded. "This rebellion of yours is a sham—it's only you and me on this ship!"

"And Crookshanks," she reminded, to which he grunted his unwilling agreement, "and besides, between the two of us we've destroyed plenty of space stations. Or have you already forgotten the circumstances under which we met?" she prompted, batting her lashes. "If anyone can cause massive damage to the cosmos, surely it's us—now sit down," she commanded, impatiently shoving him into his chair at the weapons' control. "If we're going to destroy the Chamber, I'm going to need your entire focus."

"You're going to get us both killed," Draco informed her, but ultimately, he relented, resigning himself to the task at hand as she took her seat in the captain's chair. He'd long ago come to terms with the idea he'd probably die in her arms either way.

"Myths never die, Malfoy," she informed him, "and we always rise. Now, are you ready?"

"Fine," he said, pursing his lips and strapping himself in as she winked at him over her shoulder, turning back to the controls.

"CROOKSHANKS," Hermione shouted gleefully, "TAKE US INTO WARPSPEED!"

Draco, knowing there was no other choice than to exist at her side, closed his eyes with a sigh, letting himself be swallowed up by the freedom of open sky as he careened, yet again, to inevitable misadventure.

Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche

Pairing: Ensemble pairings

Universe: Roaring Twenties AU; Lightning Era in Gatsby-esque New York

Rating: eventual M for sex

Summary: It's December 1st, which means… Welcome to the Olivie Advent! There will be an update every day until December 24th. Happy holiday season!

When an aimless Harry Potter is asked to retrieve Draco Malfoy from the sinful clutches of American high society, he gets unwillingly dragged into the opulent wizarding party scene of Prohibition-era New York City. Meanwhile, a string of grand thefts draws an investigative auror from the British Ministry to MACUSA, whose Department of Magical Law Enforcement recruits her for the protection of an American heiress who recently came into a vast inheritance.

1 December, 1925

It seemed, in Harry's opinion, that grandeur was just a cousin of boredom, only slightly better dressed. He wandered around his godfather's house in silence, fingertips trailing over dusty shelves as he listened to Sirius rant about his dead mother's hoarding compulsion.

Harry had offered to help clean out 12 Grimmauld Place for the day, a thankless but still preferable task to whatever else he would have been doing. Finding a job, he supposed, though that seemed intensely unlikely. If it hadn't already happened in the months since sitting for his N.E.W.T.s at Hogwarts University, it certainly wouldn't happen today.

"—ridiculous, honestly, who could have any possible need for this many shrunken heads?" Sirius was saying, which Harry hoped was a rhetorical question. "I swear, the woman's main motivation for dying was to continue the process of driving me to slow, creeping insanity- don't touch that," he warned sharply, hand shooting out to stop Harry from winding a small pocket watch. "Cursed," he panted in explanation, "much like myself."

"It's not so bad, is it?" Harry asked, gingerly replacing the watch where he'd found it and glancing over at Sirius. "Could be worse, anyway."

"True, she could be alive," Sirius agreed, shuddering. "There isn't a living member of the wretched House of Black who needn't be promptly done away with. Don't tell Bellatrix I said that," he hastily amended, angling a menacing crucifix in Harry's direction, "and certainly not Narcissa, either. Though you'll be hard-pressed to speak to Narcissa," he grumbled under his breath, "through her constant blubbering about her witless son."

"Draco?" Harry asked, frowning. They'd known each other from the inevitable consequence of attending wizarding primary school through university together, though they certainly hadn't been friends. They'd very much not been friends, in fact, as Harry had always found Draco Malfoy stuffy and irritating, and Draco seemed to find Harry equally distasteful—though, perhaps that was just
"Ah, that's right, I forgot you two were the same age," Sirius straightened, a curious look on his face as he eyed Harry. "Say, you're not particularly busy, are you?"

"Me? No." Obviously not, seeing as he was here. "Why?"

"Well, it's just that I'd hate to go through another dreadful Black family gathering with more of Narcissa's wretched whinging," Sirius said with an incongruously spirited smile. "If you needed something to do, perhaps you'd be willing to go to New York? Persuade Draco to come home?"

Sounded positively awful. "Why, again?"

"Because you'd be doing your godfather a favor, firstly," Sirius said, clasping a hand around Harry's shoulder, "and secondly, because you ought to see more of what's out there. You've been locked away at boarding school for the last however-many years, haven't you?" he prompted, and Harry shrugged in acknowledgment. "Time to have an extended visit with the world, young Harry," Sirius mused. "Spread your wings, et cetera. Besides, I hear New York's a riot these days—a less intellectual Paris," he clarified with a smirk, "and a proper filthy London."

"I'm not that into filth," Harry said with a grimace. "I assume, anyway."

"Well, never know until you try," Sirius countered, which Harry conceded with a shrug. "You've been bored out of your wits for months, Harry. I'm sure the Malfoys would be willing to pay you," he pointed out, which was certainly tempting. "Lucius won't stop babbling about how much Draco's allowance is costing him, so I'm sure he'd see it as a business expense. 'It's time that son of mine came home to join the family business,' he says at every opportunity," Sirius yowled in an unflattering imitation of Lucius Malfoy, "which is an enterprise of smarmy sauntering, I assume, or maybe investment in hair grease—"

"Well, hm." Harry self-consciously raked a hand through his own unruly hair, considering it. "I suppose I could use the money."

"Perfect, it's settled. You should take some clothes," Sirius added, giving Harry's loose-fitted shirt a swift, mildly disapproving once-over. Sirius, entirely overdressed for the task of sorting through his dead mother's junk, was a fashionable contrast in trousers, a waistcoat, and a single-breasted lapel jacket, his black hair slicked back and gleaming against his head. "You'll need a tuxedo, I suspect."

"I doubt I need one just to drag Draco home," Harry countered dismissively. "How long can that possibly take?"

"You think that smarmy little arsehole has any interest coming home? Believe me, he doesn't," Sirius said with a shake of his head, "rightfully, I imagine, and besides, don't discount the prospect of enjoying yourself while you're there. I hear there's a whole bunch of expats your age floating around Manhattan society," he said, appearing to think this would somehow interest Harry (who'd never taken any interest in society, Manhattan or otherwise). "Maybe you'll meet someone of interest, hm?"

"I doubt it," Harry said, but by then Sirius had already moved on, sifting through his mother's cupboard of shrieking china and resuming his ongoing tirade.

"I don't understand," Hermione said slowly, frowning at Minister Shacklebolt. "You want me to "Well, of course we don't want you to," Shacklebolt corrected gently. "You're exceedingly valuable to us, Miss Granger, but as I've told you several times, there's just no room for any additional aurors in our department. Not that your clerical assistance on the Zabini case wasn't invaluable," he hastily added, "as it most certainly was. If anything, I suspect your insight on that case is the reason MACUSA's taken such a keen interest in you."

"No disrespect, Minister, but it really didn't take a genius to sort that case out," Hermione said, frowning. "The woman's first six wealthy husbands died mysteriously, so... it really wasn't a stretch to sort out what might have happened to the seventh. Really, the mystery was why people kept marrying her," she said, frowning, "so—"

"The point, Miss Granger," Shacklebolt cut in, "is that this is your..." He glanced down, skimming the page. "I believe it's your twentieth request to sit for auror examinations?"

"Twenty-third," corrected Hermione, who was a firm believer in accuracy. "I'm very proficient at tactical defense spells, as I've mentioned," she reminded him, "and I've asked several of my former professors to recommend my skills in various related subjects—"

"Yes, we received those, too," Shacklebolt said, shifting uncomfortably. "Unfortunately, we just don't have any open positions right now."

That, as Hermione was smart enough to know, wasn't remotely the issue. The issue, which Kingsley Shacklebolt would surely confess if he had ever shared her interest in accuracy, was that she was Miss Hermione Granger and not Mister... whatever the male equivalent of Hermione was. It certainly didn't help that she was muggleborn, but even then, if she'd been a wizard instead of a witch, they might have made an exception. She pursed her lips, crossing one ankle stubbornly behind the other.

"So you're sending me away," she summarized, displeased.

"You don't have to go," Shacklebolt hurried to assure her. "But MACUSA is rather desperate, as I understand it. A young heiress, Miss Daphne Greengrass, requires some sort of... protection," he determined, coughing slightly to obscure the obvious mundanity of the task. "She's recently come into a sizable fortune following the death of her parents, and aurors at MACUSA believe her to be the next target in a string of pureblood thefts."

"So they want someone to babysit her," Hermione said doubtfully, "is that it?" No wonder they'd wanted her. No male auror would want to chaperone some spoiled heiress; they'd find it demeaning, as they should. "You're sending me to be a grown woman's nanny?"

Shacklebolt looked away, obviously unsure what to say, and Hermione sighed. It was still better than paperwork, she grumbled internally. And an auror license, even a conditional one from MACUSA, was certainly closer to a real one than she was going to get sitting behind a Ministry desk.

"Fine," she said, and Shacklebolt glanced up, visibly relieved. "I'll go, then. But I want you to promise me something," she insisted, leaning forward. "If I solve this MACUSA case, you'll let me sit for auror exams. No more empty promises or countless owls of 'we'll see, Miss Granger,'—an actual guarantee." She rose to her feet, stretching a hand across the desk. "Are we agreed?"

Shacklebolt considered her hand briefly and then nodded, accepting it with every indication he didn't expect any such thing to happen.
"Agreed," he said, and Hermione nodded firmly, whirling out the door and heading straight home to pack.

Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 2

Summary: The advent, continued.

"So you're really going to New York, are you?" Ron asked, watching Harry pack his things (most of which had been borrowed from Sirius) and draping himself over the foot of Harry's bed. "We'll miss you at the Burrow for Christmas this year, mate. It won't be the same without you. Well, it'll be the same," he amended, grimacing, "but without you there for my mum to fuss over, ergo… worse."

"I don't think I'll be gone longer than a few days," Harry said. "Even internationally, apparition is somewhat, you know—" He shrugged. "Straightforward."

Ron scoffed, admonishing Harry with a pursed look of skepticism. "From what I've heard? You may as well move there. Haven't you kept up with any news recently?"

"Gossip isn't news," Harry said, cutting him a doubtful glance. "You sound like Lavender."

"Well, I would, wouldn't I?" Ron said, unfazed. "She's the one sharing the necessary research. Apparently Malf..."—a loathsome couple vying for rulers of the Underworld, or so Harry imagined—"were nearly engaged," Ron said in a hushed, sensationalized tone, "but Lav says there's been… a rift."

Harry frowned. "A rift?"

"A skirt-shaped rift," Ron clarified with a knavish glance, and then, "Have you heard of Daphne Greengrass?"

"No," Harry said. "Should I have?"

oOo

"Stop staring," Pansy grumbled, cutting a glare at Draco from where she sat sipping her cappuccino. American coffee was a travesty, but with enough foam, it was nearly palatable— unlike Draco's obviously wandering eye. "You're going to burn a hole through her."

Across the room, Daphne Greengrass was being seated for lunch with an older gentleman, probably someone from her recently-deceased father's estate. He had a lawyerly look to him; Daphne, on the other hand, had a look that would have made Paris of Troy think twice about Helen. Golden and lovely, her hair in a gleaming chignon and her petite curves draped in a pink silk that would make God Himself redefine complexion, Daphne looked as positively celestial as ever.

That heinous bitch.

"What?" Draco said, then dragged his gaze to Pansy. "Sorry, did you say something?"
To say it wasn't working out between them was an understatement. They'd gone to New York ages ago, jetting off at the first sign of trouble in their year-long process of courting, but a summer in Long Island followed by an autumn in their twin Woolworth hotel suites had done little to improve the state of things between them romantically. They'd agreed for a time to keep up appearances, sort of, but even their faux aesthetic was ostensibly unconvincing. Pansy's mother's owls typically detailed the gossip around London's wizarding society, most of which currently seemed to be that she—Pansy Parkinson, Slytherin sweetheart, President of the Young Witches of London who'd been elected Most Likely to Marry Well by her Hogwarts class—was about to be abandoned, heartbroken and with her reputation in disrepair, by the dapper Malfoy heir.

It was infuriating to think Draco's attention could be so easily disrupted, his need to establish their break-up far more sudden than she'd expected, but Pansy grudgingly supposed it made sense. Their chemistry had been atrocious, their temperaments too flighty to coexist, and besides, Daphne Greengrass was one of those Yankee darlings, all glitz and adornment (her father had magical factories for steel or something—or he'd owned a railroad? Who could keep track anymore) and Draco was as competitive as he was predictable. The moment Daphne stepped out from her family's mansion onto the New York City scene, every eligible bachelor (and the ineligible ones, too) had set out trying to win either her bed, her fortune, or her blood status.

Draco, Pansy suspected, was after all three; after all, she'd always admired him for his ambition, and he'd want nothing less than everything. Pansy's old money was all fine and good, it seemed, but not quite compelling enough to override the banality of their sex life. Daphne Greengrass may have been some bastardized cousin of the British Sacred Twenty-Eight line, but she was also rich and desirable.

And desired, too, if Draco's blatant staring was indication enough.

Pansy turned stiffly, watching Daphne laugh at something her father's lawyer said. What was so appealing about her, anyway? Her figure was enviable, certainly, but Pansy was no slouch. If anything, Pansy had the better set of breasts. Fuller, at least, though Daphne's were perfect, perky swells against that wretched silk. Her lips were a similar petal-pink, her cheeks rosy and flush; she was a damned rhapsody in peach. They'd only met once or twice in person, bumping into each other in shops or for drinks at the Harkaway, but each time, Daphne had been unmistakably charming and sweet. It was enough to make Pansy sick.

Across the table, Draco shifted without warning, crossing one leg over the other, and Pansy felt her eyes narrow, wondering what might have suddenly prompted him to adjust. Probably the thought of Daphne's lips wrapped around his cock, enthusiastic tits bouncing along as she joyfully put herself to task. She probably had no gag reflex, Pansy thought venomously, glancing at Daphne again and feeling a wave of shameful heat at the profanity of her thoughts.

Not that she thought about such things, usually. Or ever. Though, there was a certain degree of satisfaction to the thought of cornering Daphne Greengrass in a darkened room, dragging her perfect hair from its jeweled pins and tearing at the silk of her dress. Something about Daphne's perfection practically begged to be put to ruin; pleaded for it, long lashes fluttering from where she knelt at Pansy's feet. Pansy thought of sinking her teeth into that long, unblemished neck; a pair of shaking hands rising, trembling, over her bare breasts while her own fingers, restless and laden with destruction, raked up that delicate spine—

She shook herself, blinking, and glanced at Draco, whose brow had furrowed at something across the room.

"What is it?" Pansy asked with brisk impatience, locking her knees together and reaching breathlessly for a glass of chilled water.

"Nothing," he muttered, but Pansy knew well enough what that meant.

Easy enough to tell, after all, seeing as she wasn't blind. Theo Nott had just entered the Harkaway Hotel, and by the looks of it, Daphne Greengrass certainly wasn't unhappy to see him.

Slowly, Pansy smiled into her glass. It seemed Draco wasn't winning, for once.

Theo Nott, a detestable (and detestably wealthy) member of the American nouveau riche, seemed to be Daphne's favorite suitor, or at least the boldest of them. That was always the way with those new money types, Pansy thought distastefully; they contained far more panache than class. Still, that sort of showy charm must have worked on Daphne, who went so far as to brush her lips against Theo's cheek—in full view of all the men she must have known were watching.

Them, and Pansy, of course, whose stomach clenched a little at precisely the same moment that Draco's hand tightened on his cup. Perhaps neither of them were winning, she thought with an inward wave of discomfort; then she turned away from Daphne's melodic laugh, staring at the lipstick stain on her glass as Draco sipped his cappuccino, silent.

"Miss Greengrass," Draco called, catching sight of her across the lobby of the Harkaway and aiming himself in her direction.

"Oh, Mr Malfoy, hello," she said brightly, turning to face him. He was relieved she didn't have that dreadful Nott buffoon hanging on her arm like usual; Theo Nott was the worst kind of rich, flagrantly showy and utterly without taste, and mostly known for his outrageous parties, none of which Draco had ever been invited to (not that he wanted to attend; after all, he hadn't come to New York to immerse himself in rubbish). "How are you?" she asked, accepting his arm as he offered it to her, falling in step with him. "I feel as if I haven't seen you in ages."

"Ah, only because you've been wasting your time on lesser pursuits," he said knowingly, sparing her a sidelong glance and observing with delight as her cheeks flushed from his attention. "Perhaps I could get you alone today, hm? We could take a walk if you like. Central Park is lovely this time of year, from what I hear."

"It's freezing," Daphne said with a laugh. "The whole thing is covered with snow!"

"Well," Draco said, pausing to face her, "I'm sure we could find a way to keep ourselves warm. If you wanted, of course," he murmured, permitting his thumb to brush lightly along the curve of her waist.

He felt her stuttered inhale, reveling in it. "But," she began, swallowing. "Aren't you… why, aren't you still going with Pansy Parkinson?" she asked, her dainty brow furrowed with apprehension. "I wouldn't… I mean, I'd hate to—"

"Pansy? No," Draco said with a laugh, "we're friends, that's all."

"Oh," Daphne said, her lashes fluttering as she glanced down, her gaze tracing the placement of his hand. She’d be the perfect image of innocence, Draco thought smugly, if she weren't reduced to breathlessness under his palms, hips obviously angled towards him. To his displeasure, though, she seemed to have noticed her indiscretion, quickly nudging him a safe distance away. "I have a meeting with someone this afternoon, and it simply can't wait."

Draco grimaced. So close. "Ah, I see."

"But perhaps I'll see you tomorrow evening?" Daphne said, surprising him.

"Tomorrow evening?" Draco asked, frowning. "Is there something going on I should know about?"

"Oh, don't you? I assumed… Well, in any case, Theo Nott is having a party," Daphne said, obviously dismayed at the awkwardness of him not knowing and hurrying to ease the situation. "Of course, if you won't be there, then perhaps the following afternoon? Oh, well, I do have to do some shopping for the holidays," she said, frowning to herself. "Maybe Satur- no," she sighed, "not Saturday, either, and really, my whole weekend is a mess, so—"

"Oh, silly me," Draco cut in quickly, sparing a laugh. "Yes, of course I'm going to the party tomorrow. I wasn't entirely sure I'd be attending, given so many other social obligations," he lied smoothly as she nodded, wide-eyed, "but if you'll be there, then—"

"Wonderful." She was positively radiant at the thought, or so he smugly suspected. "I so look forward to seeing you. I was wondering if we'd ever find any time to be, you know—" That marvelous flush crept up in her cheeks again, flaming both her features and his increasingly unbearable need to see how they looked in the dark. "Alone."

He smiled. She smiled.

He had to find a way into that party. Sure, Theo Nott had inauspiciously 'not been home' the last time Draco had casually tried to see him, and okay, so the Malfoy fortune wasn't so much a fortune as a ticking clock (which no one, not even Pansy—especially not Pansy—knew about), but… he would make this happen. He would find a way even if it killed him.

Better dead than abstinent, and certainly better dead than bankrupt and publicly humiliated.

"Oh, we will," he assured her, taking her hand and brushing his lips over her knuckles. "Believe me, we will."

---

Woolworth was an exceedingly confusing place—even for Harry, who typically navigated things with ease. He'd been a seeker and a quidditch captain twice over and possessed an innate sense of direction, but the flurry of activity in the Woolworth wizarding neighborhood was rapidly diminishing him to a base degree of ambulatory.

He bumped into someone, colliding with their shoulder, and gave a frustrated exhalation of apology. "So sorry," he muttered, jostled inelegantly to the side until a hand reached out, steadying him.

"You look lost," said a sharp, dry voice, which upon further inspection belonged to a wiry, well-dressed man with slicked-back dark hair. He was wearing a black suit that made him look exceedingly thin, and while at first glance he appeared quite a bit older, after a moment of closer inspection Harry realized that the man, whoever he was, was probably somewhere around his age.

"Is this your first time?" asked the stranger.

"Sorry?" Harry asked, blinking, and the man laughed.

"In Woolworth," he explained, and thrust out a hand. "I'm Theo Nott."

"Harry Potter," said Harry, accepting the proffered shake. "You wouldn't happen to know which way the Harkaway Hotel is, would you?"

"I would, in fact," Theo said unhelpfully, "though I don't recommend you going there. Nothing but snobs and fakes in that wretched circle of hell."

"Noted," Harry said, grimacing. "Unfortunately, I'm about to pick up one of those snobby fakes."

For whatever reason, Theo looked amused. "What a magnificent travesty," he said. "I have half a mind to direct you somewhere fun instead. Have you at least imbibed in anything worthy while you've been here?"

"Imbibed," Harry echoed. "In alcohol, you mean?"

"Certainly not, young man," Theo said. "That's illegal."

Harry frowned, bemused. "Oh. Sorry, I thought—"

"My goodness," Theo cut in with a laugh, "you're really a lost cause, aren't you?" He surveyed Harry with a furrowed brow. "I take it you don't know who I am?"

"Should I?" Harry asked.

Theo considered him a moment, then shook his head.

"No, you shouldn't," he pronounced crisply, "though I must say, I do worry about this place swallowing you whole. What are you doing tomorrow evening?" he asked tangentially, and Harry blinked.

"Well, I expect to be gone by the morning," he said. "I'm really only here for a short errand."

"Hm. Pity," remarked Theo, shrugging briskly and reaching into his pocket for a small index card. "Well, take this anyway," he said, handing it to Harry. "If you happen to still be here, the card's a portkey."

Harry glanced over the card, frowning. "To what?"

"A party," Theo said simply, "which I'll be attending, and which is sure to be enormously unpleasant, though don't let that preclude you from considering it. I personally am never fully satisfied unless I'm being made to suffer in complete and total misery."

"Well… okay, I guess," Harry said doubtfully. "To tell you the truth, though, even if I still happened to be here, I'm really not a party person."

"I can tell," Theo said ambiguously, but before Harry could ask what he meant, he'd already added, "Well, in any case, I do have some good news." He gestured broadly to the building on his left. "You've managed to successfully locate the Harkaway Hotel."

Harry blinked, turning to look at the building they had inadvertently stopped in front of. "This, really? Well, I thought—"

He glanced back, finding that Theo Nott had already disappeared into the passing crowd.

"Huh," Harry said to himself, frowning, before spotting a pale blond head exiting the Harkaway's front doors. "Malfoy," he called, the name falling from his mouth before the rest of him had even registered it, and after a moment of confusion, Draco Malfoy's expression soured.

"Whatever it is, not now, Potter," Draco said, prepared to shove past him as he'd so often done while they were at Hogwarts. "I'm very busy," he muttered in concentration, leaving Harry to follow in something of an ungainly chase.

"Malfoy, would you hold on, please?" Harry growled, gripping Draco's arm and dragging him back, resulting in a violent look of displeasure which fitted itself quite naturally to his pointy features.
"Don't touch me, Potter—"

"Believe me," Harry said, holding firm as Draco attempted to wrench away. "I don't want to either, but seeing as your parents have given me a thousand galleons just to bring you home, I can't very well let you go, can I?"

Draco came to a comically sudden halt. "A thousand?"

"Yes. It seems your mother would pay just about any ludicrous amount to have you home immediately. God knows why," Harry said with a grimace, "as I'm sure she'd be better off with a cat, or perhaps a stuffed peacock—"

"Hilarious." Draco's mouth was lined thinly, his brow furrowed. "Well, this can wait," he said eventually, pivoting away. "Get yourself a room at the Harkaway, or do… whatever." He gave a brief, dismissive gesture, mumbling, "I, meanwhile, have got to find a way into Theo Nott's party tomorrow evening, which will surely be no pleasant task—"

"Theo Nott?" Harry echoed. "The party's his?"

"I—" Draco stopped, glaring at him. "You know him?"

"Well, he just invited me," Harry said, holding up the card. "I assumed he was just attending, I didn't think he was actually hosting—"

"Give me that," Draco said, snatching at it. "This is a portkey, isn't it? Unbelievable." He looked up, glaring at Harry. "He's invited you to this? It's the most exclusive party in New York. Even Pansy didn't know where to get an invitation," he grumbled, shoving the card back into Harry's chest.

Pansy Parkinson—ugh. Ron had said so, but still. "So that's still going, then?" Harry said, making a face. "You and Parkinson, that's still a thing?"

"Hm? No, but—" Draco was obviously distracted. "A thousand dollars, you said? Well, that's certainly enough for a better-fitting suit," he determined, shifting his attention to eye Harry's clothes. "We'd better get started now," he said with palpable distaste. "Could take all day to find something suitable."

"I have clothes," Harry said, distressed, "but Malfoy—"

"Look," Draco said, impatiently cutting him off. "My parents sent you here to help me, didn't they?"

"What?" Harry asked, frowning. "No. They only asked me t-"

"It's implied," Draco informed him, angling Harry into the crowded Woolworth streets, "so that's what you'll be doing, Potter. Otherwise, you're just wasting my family's fortune," he said, "and we simply can't permit that, can we?"

"But—" Harry sighed, permitting himself to be dragged. "Just until this party, though, right?" he asked hopefully. "And then we'll go back to London straightaway?"

a/n: There's been a death in my family and I needed to go home. Will continue posting this in my spare moments, but I would expect the Commoner's Guide update to come late this week. Thank you for your patience!
"Right, okay, so," Hermione said, glancing up from her notes. "Do you have any questions?"

After a moment of strain, Daphne Greengrass' brow materialized from behind one of the towering piles of research in an artfully furrowed expression of bemusement.

"Sorry… Auror Granger, was it?" came her melodic voice of confusion, a glimpse of a floaty blue silk dress appearing as she leaned to the side. "I'm afraid I'm just having some trouble understanding," she offered apologetically. "You think someone might… steal from me?"

"Well, it's just—" Hermione attempted to shove aside the pile of notes and sighed, frustrated, as it immediately collapsed in a fluttered heap on the floor. "Sorry about the, um. Desk situation," she offered with a grimace, flicking her wand to clear away some of the mess within the (minimal) space she'd been allotted by MACUSA. "I'm still settling in. Oh, and there's no need to call me Auror Granger, either," she added hastily, catching the motion of Daphne's amused gaze as it followed her mostly-unsuccessful efforts to make room. "It's only a provisional title, so Hermione will be fine."

"Provisional?" Daphne echoed, tentatively clearing her throat. "Do you mean to say you've never done… this," she said, daintily charming a pile of notes and shifting it aside to the teetering edge of Hermione's temporary desk, "before?"

"Well—" Hermione hesitated. Despite having managed a sufficient window to face each other across her desk, communicating the reality of the situation hadn't much improved. "This is my first hands-on case, I'll admit, but I've solved many just like it," she hurried to say. "I've handled the paperwork for the British DMLE for over half a year now, so—"

"Paperwork," Daphne noted with obvious reluctance, looking vaguely concerned. "So you don't have any field experience, then?"

"I've been… getting my bearings," Hermione lied, leaving out the bit about having been repeatedly denied an auror exam only to be shipped off for the benefit of some spoiled rich woman, however perfectly nice she happened to be. "I assure you, Miss Greengrass, you're in good hands. If there is indeed someone out there looking to exploit your fortune, I will find them well before they have a chance."

"Well, that's reassuring," said Daphne, who was at least more gracious than Hermione had anticipated. "I certainly appreciate your help. Though," she sighed, "I do hate to think anyone would have such unsavory motives."

Hermione bit back a reflexive retort that the world must be quite marvelous indeed when one was beautiful, blonde, and the inheritor of a massive fortune. "True as that may be," she said slowly, "there's been a variety of thefts reported over the last five months, all against wealthy women in the state of New York. It seems that the thief—whoever he is," she said with a grim sweep of her towering notes, "is escalating quite a bit. I personally think we're all better safe than sorry."

"Oh, of course," Daphne said, looking relieved enough. "Well, how would you like to go about this, then? Weekly reports, perhaps?"

"Actually," Hermione said, "I think it'd be better if I accompanied you. At least for the time being," she said, shifting her attention to the pile of scrawling notes on chronology. "By the pattern established thus far, I would expect the thief to strike sometime before the end of the year."

"Oh, but how dreadful," Daphne said, looking wistfully inconvenienced. "But yes, of course, Hermione. Whatever you need. Though," she began, and then paused, cheeks turning faintly pink. "In terms of my, ah. With things being as they are, I—" She broke off, toying guiltily with her gloves. "Well," she eventually sighed, "let's just say I'm afraid I have social obligations which are perhaps not in accordance with No-Maj law."

"Prohibition laws, you mean?" Hermione asked, and Daphne winced, sparing a radiantly troubled nod. "I see. Well…"

Hermione paused, considering it. That was certainly a conundrum. On the one hand, MACUSA had no such codified restrictions, but on the other, wizards were highly discouraged from imbibing around muggles—No-Majs, she corrected internally. Though, how would she possibly earn her right to sit for her auror exams if she wasn't there when Daphne was most likely to be preyed upon?

"My job is to investigate your case," Hermione said slowly, "not to interfere with No-Maj law, so that's… fine."

"Well, that's a relief," Daphne breathed, satisfied. "And in that case, I should tell you that you'll need a dress for this evening—"

"I'm sure this will be fine," Hermione said vacantly, gesturing to her practical skirt suit (a flattering cut, and a lovely beige) as Daphne cleared her throat in tentative opposition.

"Hermione," she said carefully. "I have to imagine you don't wish others to be aware they're being investigated. Am I correct?"

"Of course," Hermione said, frowning. "If they knew, I could hardly do my job very well, could I?"

"Well, exactly," Daphne said, giving her a saintly look of relief. "Seeing as the culprit might find your sudden presence a bit suspicious, it's rather important that you… blend. I imagine." She smiled brilliantly. "Though I am, of course, no expert on auror practices."

Hermione looked down at her clothes, scrutinizing the sensibility of her outfit, and then up at Daphne, whose blue silk seemed to have magnified in luxury even beneath the harsh light of the auror office.

"I should get a dress," Hermione noted glumly, and Daphne's smile broadened.

"That sounds like a lovely idea," she said, preening with approval.

"I got your owl," Pansy said without preamble, opening the door to her hotel suite for Draco to pass. "Potter's here? How positively dull."

She tried to shut the door and felt it catch, stuck on something.
"Nice to see you, too, Parkinson," said the obstacle in the doorframe, and Pansy scowled.

"You again," she said, and Harry Potter shrugged.

"Not willingly, believe me."

"Oh, do shut up," Draco said, falling exhaustedly across Pansy's sofa. "You agreed, didn't you? Not to mention you're the one who decided to take on this demeaning little errand."

"Things are going well, I take it," Pansy remarked, and Draco cracked one eye.

"Potter's got an invitation to Nott's party," he offered in explanation, and she glanced at Harry with grudging interest, which seemed to repulse him as much as it infuriated her.

"How?" she demanded, and he shrugged.

"I ran into Theo Nott. What's his deal, anyway?" he asked, setting his hat on the table beside the door. "He acted like I was supposed to know who he was."

"Well, if you'd opened your ears for one buggering second, Potter, you would know who he was," Draco said lazily, "but you're still just as unbearably oblivious as you were at school, aren't you?"

Harry turned to the door without a word, reaching for his hat, and Draco launched upright, clearly about to chase him. "Would you desist—"

"As I've mentioned, Malfoy, if you want my invitation, then you'll have to be nice," Harry said, and Pansy stifled a laugh; obviously this was a game they'd played a few times already. "Otherwise, I'll simply head off back to London and tell your desperate, doting parents their son is dead and requiring no further allowance."

"Well, you're still unbearable," Draco muttered, though at the renewed motion of Harry's hand towards his hat, he sighed loudly. "Fine, fine. The point, Parkinson, is I'm going to Nott's party this evening," he informed her, "so you'll have to do without me tonight."

She'd done without him plenty of nights, which he seemed to have conveniently forgotten.

"I want to come," she said, and Draco fixed her with a piteous look that said, quite plainly, We've talked about this, we're done. "Not for you, you smug little idiot," she told him sharply. "Just because I haven't been to a party in ages. Besides, I presume you're going for Daphne Greengrass?" she asked, and Draco stiffened, which was a stinging confirmation. "Then I'll go with Potter."

Harry blanched, looking as opposed as Pansy felt, but Draco looked as if she'd recently invented apparition.

"Now that's a thought," he agreed, eagerly sitting upright. "Daphne did mention she was concerned you and I were still together. Better you do take someone else, then."

It wasn't the best thing, but perhaps if Pansy looked well enough this evening, the gossip would be less about her being abandoned by Draco Malfoy and more about how fabulous she seemed without him.

Pansy wondered, briefly, what Daphne would wear. She would have to look better, of course, or at least try to. Perhaps this evening called for her emerald green evening gown, which was a color she doubted Daphne could pull off quite so well. A girl that golden and innocent would never dare wear something so eye-catching—nor something so boldly revealing.
Pansy smiled, satisfied with the thought.

"Seems a bit inconsiderate on my part," Harry said, interrupting her wandering thoughts. "Theo didn't say I could bring anyone, much less two someones."

Pansy and Draco cut him matching glares.

"Fine," Harry conceded, shrugging. "Whatever it takes to get out of here."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Thank you for your support. Chag same'ach to those of you celebrating Hanukkah!
Well, there was Pansy Parkinson, that snotty little tart, looking her usual moneyed self in a backless green gown with pearls spilling down her spine, the strands tied up and resting between her scapulae. A shiny blond head that meant Draco Malfoy was present (despite his very intentional lack of invitation) gleamed in her proximity, and Theo turned away from his hiding spot at the top of the stairs, already bored to tears.

This party, like all his parties, was an utter fucking sham.

He took a sip from his champagne, eyeing it. Being rich wasn't nearly as wonderful as it had once appeared to be. After a while, it became grotesquely dull. Redundant, even. Week after week he threw these parties, pretending to enjoy the crowds, and for what? It was lonelier than ever from his place on high—though he preferred to be aloft in authentic silence than among the throngs of pretentious madness.

He took another sip, letting it settle, and turned to eye the crowd again. This time, he saw something more promising than the usual mundanity of gold and jewels; it was a little flash of silver spectacles, attached to a head of unruly black hair and a tuxedo that was clearly ill-fitted. Borrowed, if Theo had to guess, and currently fitted without much skill to a man who'd clearly never known a taste of luxury in his entire life. After so many nights of bespoke suits and arrogant laughter, that degree of genuine discomfort stuck out like a sore thumb, which meant there was only one person that could be.

Theo drained his glass and smiled to himself, pleased.

Harry Potter was here.

Excellent.

"Ah, Daphne!" said a man with pale blond hair, and Hermione fought a grimace, recognizing Draco Malfoy from her years at Hogwarts and wishing desperately that this party had been a masquerade. "What a pleasure, and you've brought… oh," Draco said dully, catching sight of Hermione's woefully unobscured face and faltering. "You know Granger?"

"Oh that's right, you're both English!" Daphne said spiritedly, accepting the arm Draco offered her. "Do the two of you know each other?"

"No," Draco and Hermione said in unison, which was true. Mostly. After all, he'd hardly deigned to speak to her during the entirety of their schooling. They'd had one little episode of maybe-something right before their final year, but…

She shuddered. That had obviously been a mistake.

"I thought you were supposed to be working some sort of desk job for the Ministry," Draco remarked to Hermione, and she dug her nails into her palm, annoyed. Only he could make something purely factual sound so outrageously derisive.

"I'm here to spend the holidays with Daphne," she replied tightly, and then, with a bit of haste, "We're old friends," sticking to the cover story she and Daphne had crafted (prior to her knowing they'd be accosted by idiots with more arrogance and hair pomade than sense, of course) and Draco let out a bursting, obnoxious laugh, patting Daphne's hand.

"In what universe would you and Granger here ever be friends?" he remarked, chuckling. "I couldn't imagine two people more different. Care for a drink?" he asked Daphne, who glanced apprehensively at Hermione.

"Oh, I don't want to leave Hermione—"

"No, no, go ahead," Hermione said firmly. "I'll just... have a look around," she said, hoping the 'investigatory' bit of Investigatory Auror was enough to clue Daphne in to what she was doing, and Daphne nodded. She wasn't a total idiot, Daphne Greengrass, even if her taste in men was obviously suspect.

"Well, alright," Daphne said uncertainly, though within moments she was well and helplessly distracted by Draco's attention, letting him slide his arm around her waist. Clearly he'd given up on Pansy Parkinson, whom Hermione spotted staring darkly at the pair from afar. True, Daphne was richer, more beautiful, and infinitely more tolerable, but still, everyone in London believed the Parkinson and Malfoy union to be so well-matched it was inevitable. Or they had believed it, anyway, though it had always been mostly assumed, as nobody had seen either party since...

Hm.

Hermione frowned, filled with a sudden suspicion about why Draco Malfoy, heir to the Malfoy Enterprises throne, had been away from London for precisely the same amount of time as the string of thefts in New York.

"Well, well, Draco Malfoy," Hermione murmured to herself, "you've just added yourself to my list of suspects."

oOo

It was impossibly crowded inside what Harry assumed to be a basement of some kind, though there was no telling in this degree of darkness. They'd simply taken the portkey and arrived here, at which point Pansy had commenced chattering nonstop about this person or that person, or what he was doing or what she was wearing. The whole thing was exhausting, and when Pansy turned away to get more whisky, Harry slipped away from the crowd, darting along the periphery and opening a door that he hoped would lead to somewhere quiet.

He blinked upon entry, realizing he was in some sort of office. The walls were a dark green textured pattern of interwoven snakes and ivy that twisted in ceaseless motion towards gilded copper moldings, gradually disappearing into the gleaming mahogany of the floors. He let his gaze sweep over the furnishings, taking it in; a Greco-Roman bust perched atop a marble pillar beside a velvet tufted sofa. A low table sat in the corner, an organically crafted wave of glass that sat in front of a bronze sideboard. Upon first glance, most of the furniture was either gleaming mahogany, polished brass, or ebony encrusted with mother of pearl.

In a word: expensive. This was no 12 Grimmauld Place, that much was obvious, but it was certainly its own kind of opulent boredom.
"You're still here," came a familiar voice as Harry surveyed the room. "Interesting."

Harry glanced askance, catching the slender silhouette of Theo Nott, who rose slowly to his feet from an oversized clawfoot chair. "Sorry," Harry said, startled, "I was just—"

"Looking for someplace quiet?" Theo prompted. "I know the feeling." He tucked one hand into his trouser pocket, the other curled around a glass of something caramel-colored and crisp. "You stayed," he noted.

"Not for long," Harry said, and then gestured to the glass. "Thought that was illegal."

"It is," Theo said, taking a sip. "But illegal and impossible to get are hardly the same thing." He beckoned Harry into one of the armchairs. "Sit."

Obediently, Harry sat.

"Would you like a glass?" Theo asked neutrally, pouring one before Harry could answer.

"No, I'm—" Harry broke off, the glass charming itself into his hand with a supple zing of motion. "Fine," he finished, but shrugged, sniffing at the liquid in the glass. "Or I'll have one, I guess."

"It appears you will," Theo agreed, falling back into the seat beside Harry. "Enjoying the party?"

"Honestly?" Harry asked, making a face. "No. Not really."

"Mm." Theo shook his head. "They're terrible. I told you you'd hate them." He took a long sip, then turned back to Harry. "What made you decide to come?"

"Remember the errand I had to run?" Harry asked, and Theo nodded. "The errand wanted to run here."

"Draco Malfoy," Theo said knowingly, and Harry looked up, surprised. "What? I can piece things together. I saw you come in with him and that dreadful Pansy Parkinson— who certainly isn't fooling anyone," he added, glancing with a silent laugh at Harry. "A woman with her degree of vanity wouldn't touch you unless she had no other choice."

"I'm insulted, I think," Harry said, taking a sip. This whisky, whatever it was, was inconveniently strong, and he didn't drink much. He coughed, sputtering up, "In any case, no, we're not together."

"Obvious enough. You're too good for that crowd," Theo said slowly, "particularly Malfoy."

Harry coughed again. "You don't like him?"

For a moment, Theo didn't say anything; merely ran a hand over the clean-shaven angle of his cheeks. "He wants something that belongs to me."

"Ah," Harry said, half-laughing into his whisky. "Daphne Greengrass," he said, and then, to Theo's arched look of surprise, "What? I can piece things together."

"You certainly can," Theo agreed, then glanced down at his glass. "We're old friends, she and I. Though," he murmured, "I was always considerably less than she was."

"Not anymore," Harry noted, gesturing around the office. "If you're trying to prove something, you've certainly proved it."

Theo swirled the liquid in his glass, considering it. "Maybe." He drained the contents, shaking his head, and then set the glass down on the table, eyeing Harry as he straightened. "You should stay," he said neutrally, rising to his feet, and Harry blinked.

"What?"

"Stay in New York," Theo clarified. "For the holidays, at least. It's a wonderful time," he said drily, "as all the falsities are especially festive."

"I can't," Harry reminded him. "I have to go home."

Theo shrugged. "Just a suggestion."

He put his hand on the door, preparing to leave, and Harry hastily came to his feet to follow, hesitant to set his drink down on one of the glassy mahogany surfaces. "Use my office as long as you'd like," Theo assured him, pausing Harry with a single motion of his hand. "Quiet in here," he murmured, "with all the fakes and liars on the other side of this door."

Then, with an impossibly quick motion, Theo was gone, disappearing once again into the crowd as Harry remained behind, fingers clasped tight around his glass.
Was it irritating that Hermione Granger was here? Yes. Did he wish she would desist her incessant staring at him from across the room? Also yes. Had she given him a needlessly accusatory glance of suspicion? Maybe. Hard to tell. Draco was seeing suspicion on everyone's faces these days; he was constantly watching his step, wondering if this person or that one would see through him. It used to be that he'd owned the privilege of seeing nothing and nobody, Hermione Granger included (sort of). Now, though, that oh-so-exclusive social blindness might be gone by the first of January—much like everything else he owned—if everything failed to go precisely as planned.

"Let's go somewhere," Draco murmured in Daphne's ear, saying it as quickly as he could before she, ever the coquette, would inevitably pull from his reach. "Somewhere alone, just you and me."

He caught the satin of her gloved hand, drawing it towards his chest, and she gave him a breathless little giggle. "Really?"

God, he longed to kiss her. Her lips were so supple and full of sweetness, unlike Pansy's tiresome charade of elegance. Sure, he needed Daphne for a variety of reasons no one else could ever know about, but it wasn't as if he couldn't indulge in a bit of good old-fashioned wanting, too. He would've kissed her right then, propriety be damned, if it weren't for Hermione Granger staring unrepentantly at his back. She didn't look half bad, really—all done up in some frothy blue frock that made her look very nearly like a human woman instead of a pile of books under some blandly colored skirt suit—but he'd certainly known her long enough to know better.

Minus one… incident, one might say, which Draco did not presently have the time to consider.

"We could take a walk," he said in Daphne's ear, tucking a hand under her chin. "Get away from the noise."

She smiled up at him. "And what would we do there, Mr Malfoy?"

He thanked his stars she couldn't see what floated through his mind in answer. "Well," he said, "for starters—"

"Miss Greengrass," came a voice behind them, and Draco grimaced, recognizing the dry voice belonging to Theo Nott. "I do hope you've saved me a dance."

Balls, balls, motherfuckery-taint-snatched balls.

"Theo," Daphne gushed, releasing Draco to take Theo's outstretched hand. "You know Draco Malfoy, don't you?"

"I know everyone," Theo remarked neutrally, though he gave Draco a glance that read, unambiguously, that the forgone invitation had not been an accidental oversight. "Malfoy," he said with a nod, "surely you don't mind if I dance with the guest of honor, do you?"

"Oh, Theo, stop," Daphne said, playfully swatting at his arm in a motion of flirtation that Draco catalogued with a furtive scowl. "Flattery will get you everywhere, you know."
"I certainly hope so," Theo replied, and Daphne laughed, reaching up to curl her palm around his cheek with obvious affection.

"You don't mind, do you, Draco?" she asked, glancing back at him, and he forced a smile. "Well, wonderful, I'll have a dance with Theo and then we can all mingle, can't we? Oh, but just a moment," she said with a sigh, shaking her head at Theo. "You wait right here—I've just got to powder my nose."

"M'lady," he said, gesturing her to the bathroom, and she flitted off, leaving Draco and Theo standing together amid the crowd.

"You know," Draco said testily, turning to Theo, "you can't win her over purely by hosting elaborate parties every chance you get."

For a moment, Theo merely glanced at him, expressionless.

Then, abruptly, "Do you have any secrets, Malfoy?"

Draco blinked, taken aback. "I beg your pardon?"

"Because I really only like people who have something to hide," Theo continued, shrugging. "Otherwise, you're just... well, you're just an empty pile of money, aren't you?" he said with a hollow laugh, and Draco felt his eyes narrow. "Oh, come now," Theo sighed. "Don't all your breed of pureblood have some lurking disdain for your own wealth?"

Speaking of lurking. Draco caught Hermione's curls from the corner of his eye, then grimaced as she hurriedly moved elsewhere. She was always flitting in and out, hovering unhelpfully in his periphery; not exactly the setting he'd hoped for, and certainly not conducive to the rest of the evening's activities.

"Everyone's hiding something," Draco said, turning away from where Hermione had been to focus on Theo, who was waiting with a smug look on his face. "The richer you are," he added pointedly, "the more dastardly the secrets."

Theo eyed him for a moment, then smiled slowly.

"Perhaps you're not quite as bad as I thought," he conceded wryly, "but still, she won't choose you, you know. She's much too good for you."

That she almost certainly was, but it made no difference.

"We'll see," Draco murmured, and caught yet another glimpse of curly brown hair.

Hermione Granger did look better, he thought grudgingly, skirting eye contact with her and turning his attention to the drinks placed temptingly atop a floating tray. Granger was the studious, unmarriable type, having always avoided social gatherings while they were in school together. Draco had never seen her done up like this, nor in any place where her figure (also surprisingly pleasant, he noted with displeasure) wasn't obscured by a desk or a pile of books.

Not that he hadn't looked once. Or twice.

Which was irrelevant, he reminded himself, and certainly in the past.

At the thought, Draco promptly angled himself towards the bathroom, waiting for Daphne to return. Huffing into his glass of whisky, he longed once again for a simpler time when he might simply snapped his fingers, removing Theo Nott and all the other objectionable distractions from his sight and thinking positively nothing of it.

oOo

"Oh," came Daphne Greengrass' voice as Pansy looked up from the mirror, turning at the sound of the bathroom door. "Hello," Daphne said, looking flushed. She'd obviously been dancing, her hair in a perfectly lovely state of disarray, and there was the faintest sheen of perspiration on her cheeks. "Awfully hot in there, isn't it?"

Pansy, of course, wouldn't have known. Her date had mysteriously disappeared, which was why she was here, fixing her mother's strand of pearls for the eighteenth time. She said nothing in reply, though that didn't stop Daphne from wandering over to pause beside her, eyeing her reflection in the mirror.

"Good heavens, I look a fright," Daphne said, continuing to talk to herself as she sorted through her clutch. "And the lipstick I bought is no help, honestly. You should take it," she suggested, holding it out to Pansy. "Suits your coloring much more than mine. That's a lovely dress, by the way," she added, lipstick still extended, and Pansy glanced down at the little gold cylinder.

She thought, unhelpfully, of Daphne putting the color to her lips, stroking along the bow of them; she pictured Daphne pursing the swells of them together, blotting them lightly, eyeing the finished product in the intimacy of her vanity.

"I'm also quite sorry to hear things didn't work out with Draco," Daphne said, obviously attempting to cover her discomfort with the topic as her fingers continued to clutch the little tube of lipstick. "If you'd like me to keep my distance, I would, of course, I just… Well," she sighed heavily, "I haven't had the chance to speak to you about it. And really, I don't even know how appropriate that is, to be honest, but I simply thought—"

Pansy stepped forward, watching Daphne's breath promptly falter at the motion. She reached for the lipstick, letting her fingers flutter above Daphne's hand, and then let her gaze rise to Daphne's face, watching her apprehensively moisten her lips.

"Thanks," Pansy said, her fingers closing around Daphne's. For a moment, she let her hand linger there, her gaze floating wherever it liked—from Daphne's lips, parted and breathless, to the neckline of her gown, down to the dropped-waist silhouette and back up—before taking the lipstick from her, stepping away.

"Don't mention it," Daphne said with a heavy swallow, all the brightness dulled to breathy confusion.

Then Pansy swept past her and pushed open the door, the tiny gold tube pressed tightly into her palm.
"Well, that was utterly hopeless," Draco said, half-tossing his fork down on his plate over breakfast. "Obviously I can't go home yet. We're going to have to stay a few more days."

Harry gritted his teeth. "You can't be serious, Malfoy. It's nearly Christmas, and—"

"You were there, weren't you?" Draco demanded in his sulky, pampered way. "She spent nearly the whole night dancing with that Nott lunatic. I can't possibly leave now," he sniffed, sinking back against the chair. "I'd lose her, and that simply can't happen."

"Have you considered that perhaps you can't actually trick her into falling in love with you?" Harry said, shoving his plate away from him. "Maybe she's already seen who you are," he suggested irritably, "and decided she doesn't care for it."

"Oh, shut up," Draco snapped, fussing with his food. "Nott's having another party and he's actually invited us to this one, so we're going to have to stay at least another couple of days. During which time you should really have your clothes altered," he added, sparing Harry a look of contempt. "I can't continue being seen with you like this, it's revolting. I can't even eat," he muttered, rising to his feet and tossing his napkin down. "I'm distraught, Potter. I can't possibly come home now!"

"Another party?" Harry asked, immediately suffering a wave of near-sickness. The alcohol he'd drunk the night before bubbled promptly in his chest, returning him to a shudder of repulsion. He hadn't cared for the noise or the drinking, and nor had he much liked the way Theo Nott looked at him; like he'd been peeling away the layers of him, one by one. "I'd really rather not—"

"Nott insisted you be there," Draco cut in firmly, and Harry grimaced. "Hell if I know why, but he specifically mentioned you by name. You'll have to come, or I won't come home at all," he warned, and Harry, really quite sick of the ongoing tantrum, rose to his feet, preparing to exit the hotel suite. "Where the devil are you going?"

"Out," Harry said flatly, and reached for the Harkaway's apparition portkey, transporting himself into Woolworth market just outside the hotel for a much-needed breath of air.

"Harry?" someone asked, startled, and Harry glanced up, spotting the source of the voice after a moment of trying to place it. "Harry, hi—it's Hermione Granger," said Hermione Granger, heading excitedly towards him and sounding as if she thought (incorrectly) that perhaps he didn't remember her from school.

"Hermione, of course," he said. "I thought I'd seen you last night, but then I just assumed—" He broke off, not needing to get into the many ways he'd been questioning his sanity over the previous evening, which had certainly not been limited to the brief motion of curly brown hair he'd assumed was some sort of stress-induced phantom. "What are you doing in Woolworth?"

"Oh, um… visiting a friend," Hermione said brightly. "Do you know Daphne Greengrass?"

Harry was beginning to think if he heard the name Daphne Greengrass come from anyone else's mouth, he might start to lose his wits.
"I do," he said slowly, and upon further consideration, wondered if maybe this might not solve his problems. "You know, I'm here with a friend, too," he told her, hoping to make the misnomer of 'friend' sound even remotely true. "Draco Malfoy, actually, if you remember him—"

"Oh, are you?" Hermione asked, sounding curious. "My goodness, I haven't heard heads or tails about him since we left Hogwarts. How is he?"

"Well, perhaps you could ask him yourself," Harry suggested, quite certain this was the inception of a brilliant plan. "We could get dinner, the four of us? Might be nice to all catch up, wouldn't it?"

"Oh, but that'd be wonderful," Hermione exclaimed. "I'm sure Daphne would love that!"

"Excellent," Harry judged, mentally upgrading the plan from 'brilliant' to 'impending success.'
"Tonight, then? At the Harkaway?"

"Yes, sounds perfect," Hermione replied brightly. "I'll just go tell Daphne, then!"

There, Harry thought, smugly conclusive. Now they wouldn't have to wait for another of those wretched parties, and if all went well—that is, if Draco was remotely as persuasive as he claimed to be—they could head home. He wouldn't even have to see Theo Nott again.

Which, Harry reminded himself, was a good thing.

Probably.

A brief spark of opposition caught somewhere in the joints of his limbs, but he nudged it aside.
"See you tonight," Harry said cheerfully, waving farewell as Hermione ventured off in search of Daphne. He, meanwhile, decided he should probably tell Ron's mother to make that treacle tart he'd always loved, as he would surely make it home in time for Christmas.

OODOO

Draco Malfoy almost certainly had a secret, and Hermione was going to sort it out, whatever it took. Even if that meant having dinner with him, though she doubted she'd stomach much in his presence. Even if it meant dressing up like a silly little socialite doll to sit silently next to Daphne.
Even if it meant staying up all night poring over his financial records, which she'd definitely already done—and which she now regretted, finding it immensely difficult to keep her eyes open.

Daphne was carefully fluffing her golden curls, eyeing herself in the vanity as Hermione struggled to remain upright. "You don't really think it's Draco Malfoy, do you?"

Oh, she most certainly did. He'd proven well enough he didn't have a well-meaning bone in his body, though she hadn't the faintest idea what he'd need Daphne's money for. A thrill, maybe?
Hermione had never understood rich people or purebloods, and Malfoy was both. However, as she was a professional, she kept that to herself.

"I just think we should approach every angle," she said, and Daphne gave her a grateful nod.

"I have to say, it's nice having you around," Daphne mused, spritzing on some perfume and adjusting the butter yellow evening gown that shouldn't have looked good on her, but somehow—whether magically or via petitioning the devil, Hermione couldn't say—was absolutely perfect. "I was getting a bit lonely with only boys for company."

"Don't you have a sister?" Hermione asked, and Daphne turned to her with a smile.
"You really did your research, didn't you? Yes, I have a younger sister," she confirmed. "She married her childhood sweetheart a couple of years ago and used her portion of our inheritance to buy a quiet little farm upstate. She never was one for excitement," Daphne said with a wistful sigh. "Sometimes I'm quite lonely without her."

"Don't you have friends here?" Hermione asked, frowning. "Surely a girl like you would be popular in the city."

"Oh, I don't know," Daphne demurred with an airy shrug. "The men are quite friendly, but the women seem a bit resistant to invite me places. I suppose I just haven't made a very good first impression," she sighed. "Pansy Parkinson seems to hate me most out of everyone, though I suppose I can't blame her."

"That's just what Pansy's face looks like," Hermione assured her, dismissing Daphne's jarring lack of self-awareness in favor conspiring briefly on the subject of the only person she detested more than Draco Malfoy. "Don't take it personally."

Daphne gave Hermione a warm look of gratitude. "What about this Harry person you mentioned? Is he a friend of yours?"

"Well—" They weren't not friends, though Harry had mostly kept to himself, and so had she. "Yes," she said, figuring that was the easiest response. "Yes, we knew each other at university."

"And Draco, did you know him as well?"

"A… bit," Hermione said faintly. "Enough to have questions about his interest in you," she determined, and Daphne rose to her feet, frowning slightly into empty air.

"I do hope he's not up to anything," she lamented. "He's very handsome, isn't he? And charming."

Yes, Hermione thought. When he's looking at you, it's like the sun is shining, but then he looks away and you realize it was never really there. It was only ever an illusion, and then, right when you thought you were seeing him clearly, he was gone.

"Well, we'll see, won't we?" Hermione said with a false brightness, gesturing Daphne to the door.
Harry may have been an annoying little pest, but damn if he wasn't useful. Draco fussed with his waistcoat, checking his watch twice until Daphne and (unfortunately) Hermione arrived, Draco's hand smacking into Harry's unsuspecting torso to prompt him inelegantly to his feet.

"Miss Greengrass," Draco offered warmly, sparing Hermione the least acknowledging glance he could summon. "Miss Granger, hello."

"Hi, Harry—and Malfoy," Hermione said rudely, blatantly dismissing Draco (who couldn't possibly have cared less) before taking a seat beside Harry. "Thank you so much for the invitation."

Invitation. Drat. Perilously straddling the line between having everything and losing everything meant that Draco often forgot the issue of being expected to pay. Draco glanced at Harry, remembering that he, at least, had a thousand galleons expressly for the occasion, and let out a furtive breath of relief. This had been Harry's stupid idea, anyway. He could cover the cost of dinner—which was going to be exorbitant, if Daphne's choice of starter was any indication. Oysters at this price had better contain pearls.

Still, Draco lamented internally, it was always going to have to be done, as the only thing that attracted money was money. It was the same principle as attracting flies to honey, though that had never made any sense to Draco. He'd certainly seen plenty of flies on manure.

"So, how long are you here?" Hermione was asking Harry, jolting Draco back to the conversation.

"Not long," Harry said. "Malfoy and I are heading back soon, actually, just until—"

"The end of the month," Draco cut in firmly, slicing Harry a glare as Daphne blinked, surprised. "I hope you don't have any plans for New Year's Eve," he told her with as suave a smile as he could manage, though the effect was swiftly diminished by further idiocy from Harry.

"But I thought you said—"

"Not now," Draco hissed to Harry, glancing back at Daphne. "Through the holidays, as I said. Anyway, what were we saying?" he mused, attempting to change the subject. "Ah yes, oysters—"

"That's a very specific timeline you have," Hermione noted, prompting Draco to bristle with annoyance. There was nothing worse than how positively little she missed, and while it was probably nothing more than some retaliatory method of punishing him via irritation, it certainly wasn't helping his growing paranoia. "Gone by the first of January, Malfoy? And here all of London's been saying you've no intention to return."

"Well, I do," Draco said impatiently. "Just not quite yet. Anyway, as for the oysters—"
"How long has it been since you've been home?" Hermione asked, pointedly batting her lashes at him. "I'm surprised your parents haven't summoned you back—aren't you expected to take over your father's business quite soon?"

"What an interesting theory," Harry muttered, and Draco kicked his shin, silencing him (sort of) as he let out a loud groan of pain.

"My goodness, are you alright?" Daphne asked Harry, who shot Draco a grimace.

"You know, I'd heard Malfoy Enterprises wasn't recovering quite so well from the war," Hermione continued, tapping her mouth. "Though… obviously that can't be true, can it? After all, look at you," she said with the falsest smile Draco had ever seen her produce, and he promptly rose to his feet, seconds away from losing his temper.

"Bathroom," he said flatly, and stalked away, stopping only once he was out of sight.

Damn her.

Damn her.

How could she possibly have heard anything? There were no rumors, he'd made sure of it. What could she know? They couldn't possibly be innocent comments… could they?

He flinched as he heard her voice behind him. "Malfoy—"

"What are you doing?" he growled, rounding on her. One of the waiters passing by paused to frown at them, and Draco took Hermione's arm, pulling her behind the velvet curtain of the kitchens.

"What are you playing at, interrogating me like that?"

"It's called conversation, Malfoy," Hermione snapped, "and don't manhandle me. I know you're up to something," she warned, her brown eyes narrowing. "Something's not right, and believe me, I do plan to get to the bottom of it."

"You. Are. Impossible," he hissed at her. "You're doing this on purpose, aren't you? You're out for revenge now, is that it?"

"Revenge, really?" She scowled at him. "Have you completely lost your mind?"

His temper was boiling over, no less heated than the kitchens themselves. He swiped at a bead of sweat on his forehead, advancing to press her against the beams of the threshold.

"Stay away from me," he warned in the most quietly dangerous voice he could summon. "Do you understand me? Don't go shoving your bushy little head into my affairs, Hermione Granger, or there'll be hell to pay."

"I'm not afraid of you, Malfoy," she spat, staring defiantly up at him. "Whatever you're hiding, I'm going to find it."

God, she was infuriating.

"You're a spiteful little shrew, you know that?" he said through his teeth.

"And you're a bloody pompous toadstool," she shot back with a scowl.

From this angle, he was uncomfortably conscious of her breath rising and falling, their chests inches from each other as he leaned heavily on the hand he'd rested behind her head.
"Stay away from me," he repeated, his voice an uncomfortable rasp.

"Not. A. Chance," she said hoarsely, slicing it out like a knife.

Fine. He could win Daphne Greengrass with or without her watching. He'd done just fine before, and it certainly made no difference now whether Hermione Granger was there or not.

Probably.

oOo

"Well," Daphne said, glancing up at Harry with a smile. "What's your story, then?"

"No real story," Harry replied absently, glancing around for Draco and Hermione. "Just here for a visit with Draco. By the way," he added, determining he could certainly hurry this whole charade along if he put his mind to it, "he seems quite fond of you. If you wanted, I could—"

"Well, hello," came a dry, cheery voice, the narrow figure of Theo Nott falling into Draco's seat between Harry and Daphne. "Marvelous I caught you both."

Immediately, Harry experienced a series of unpleasant sensations; something vaguely tight in his chest, followed by something close to indigestion near his stomach.

Rats, he thought.

"Theodore, you rascal," Daphne said fondly. "What fresh chaos have you brought, hm?"

"Oh, very nearly none," Theo said, though he had already removed two champagne glasses from the enchanted pocket of his waistcoat before shifting, upon further consideration, to pull out a third. He conjured a bottle from one of his other pockets, charming it to pour itself as he winked at Daphne and turned towards Harry. "You're still here, I see."

"For the time being, yes," Harry managed to say, recalling Draco saying they'd been invited to something and opting not to mention it. Theo raised a brow, sliding a glass his way, and Harry permitted a glance, but didn't drink. "Is this your business, then?" he asked, gesturing to it.

"What," Theo said innocently, "luxury? Finery?"

"Havoc," Daphne corrected, resting her hand on his arm as she picked up her glass for a sip.

"That's the one," Theo agreed, sparing her an indulgent look. "Well, I won't keep you," he said, interrupting before Harry could assert that no, he'd meant alcohol, but fine. "Do join me tomorrow for a swim, won't you?" Theo asked Daphne, and she hurried to nod her enthusiastic assent. "Bring whoever you like, we'll make a day of it. This one, even," he said with a laughing glance at Harry, "if he's still here tomorrow, that is."

"A swim?" Harry asked, utterly bemused. "But it's freezing outside."

"Oh, Theo's got a marvelous pool," Daphne said with delight. "Really, it's a treat, you'll have to come."

"Yes. Have to wow you with something, otherwise what's all the money for?" Theo said drily, rising to his feet as Draco and Hermione reappeared. "Ah, I see your companions have returned. Tomorrow?" he asked Daphne, who smiled in confirmation. "Wonderful. Tomorrow, then."

Theo tipped his hat at Harry, sparing him a glance beneath the brim of his hat and prompting him to another shudder of uncertainty. Theo Nott, whatever else he was, had a sort of quiet violence around the eyes; a sense of something hardened over time. He also seemed to know the value of only letting them land from time to time.

Then, of course, he was gone.

"Sorry, sorry." Hermione said, looking slightly flushed and out of breath. "Would you believe there was a line?"

Draco gave a grunt of something similar, watching Theo go. "What did Nott want?"

"I have no idea," Harry said, and he didn't.

Though, as it happened, he suffered an uncomfortable compulsion to find out.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: finally headed home today, so will hopefully be back on track by monday. grieving is hard. see you tomorrow!
Harry Potter must have been preternaturally lucky. How else was he getting all these lavish invitations? Pansy made a mental note to lend him some serious consideration. Maybe he wasn't all that much to look at, but there was something to be said about a man who opened doors—even if those doors led, yet again, to an extravagant Theo Nott party. This time, an enormous swimming pool was the central feature inside of a glass atrium lined with private cabanas, a live band playing in the corner and drinks flowing freely from spouts along the walls.

Draco had insisted she join them again—a seemingly unnecessary request that Pansy intuitively understood, much to her chagrin. Draco was old money, a polished jewel who looked best against a vintage setting. Against all the flash of Theo Nott's wealth, by contrast, he tended to look stuffy and conservative. Standing with Pansy and Harry meant that Draco would outshine them both, ever the life of the party.

To her surprise, however, Draco's shimmer dimmed upon spotting someone in the crowd. "Damnit," he seethed, "Granger's here again." His hand shot out for a drink, downing it in one go, and then he thrust the empty glass into an unsuspecting Harry's hand. "Must go. See you later," he said, running a hand over his slicked-back hair and painting an elaborate smile on his face before heading into the crowd.

"Well, this is terrible," Harry said, glancing uncomfortably around at the blinding jewels and scantily-clad women being chased by ludicrously delighted men. "I've changed my mind, I'm going home."

"Oh, don't be such a ninny, Potter," Pansy sniffed, making her way towards one of the champagne spouts and gesturing impatiently for him to follow. "You'll have to get used to it, you know."

"I certainly will not," Harry mumbled to his shoes. He hadn't even worn a bathing costume, which was ridiculous. Pansy was going to require alcohol just to look at him. "I don't see why Draco doesn't just propose already, if that's what he wants."

Pansy's mouth tightened. "I suppose he wants to be certain, Potter. It's not unreasonable."

Unlike everything else Draco had done that year, she amended internally, which continued to be mystifying. Sure, the sex had never been particularly good and they'd really only got on from time to time, but still. It had been abrupt, to say the least.

"Why can't he just invite Daphne to London?" Harry continued to complain, dodging out of the way as a gaggle of squawking girls darted past. "He's plenty influential there. Does he have to try to win her affections here, of all places?"

Never mind her initial approval, Pansy sighed to herself. Harry Potter was an infernal menace.

"Just drink this and be quiet," Pansy said, thrusting a glass of champagne into his hand and turning towards the pool. It was charmed, clearly, the water probably perfectly warm. This would have cost a fortune; one that Pansy certainly had herself, though her allowance was controlled by her father, and it had already been restricted twice this month. He was the conservative type, as bankers usually were. Unfortunately, that meant no purchasing of her own swimming pools.

Harry took a sip of his champagne, considering it. "Huh. That's good."

Good. That would keep him quiet for a bit. She only needed him as a silent fixture at her side, anyway. The more people saw her with him, the better.

That is, until something across the room caught her eye.

"Wait here," Pansy said, shoving her glass into his chest, and Harry frowned down at it.

"Where are you going?"

"To fix my lipstick," she murmured, watching a certain petite blonde hurrying to slip inside the privacy curtains of one of the cabanas.

Daphne couldn't help a gasp, suffering a wave of relief as it was only Pansy Parkinson who'd entered and not Draco or Theo, who might've caught her in quite a compromising position. "Oh," she exhaled, relieved, "good, it's just you. Can you help me?" she asked, gesturing behind her. "I think the material caught on something, the strap's just torn. I was trying to repair it, but I can't quite see it—"

"Of course," Pansy cut in, stepping forward. She smoothed a hand over the strap, stroking lightly, and Daphne shivered. "Are my hands cold?"

"No," Daphne said, hoping to keep her voice steady. There was something very odd about Pansy Parkinson; something that made her feel unnervingly unmasked. "Thank you," she said gratefully, turning around once Pansy had murmured a charm to fix it.

Pansy looked fashionable as ever, this time in a suit of kelly green. She really did have the most flattering figure, Daphne thought. It was truly a wonder Draco had ever tired of her; it was, truth be told, the only thing about him that was giving her pause.

"Oh," she noticed, recognizing the shade of crimson on Pansy's mouth, "you're wearing the lipstick, aren't you?"

Pansy's lips curled up, pleased. "You noticed."

"Well, how could I not?" Daphne asked, employing a little half-laugh. After all, she wouldn't miss that sort of thing. "It looks absolutely stunning on you. In fact, I—"

She broke off, startled, as Pansy stepped forward, coming so close to Daphne she felt quite certain she might fall. "Oh," she said helplessly, her breath quickening. "Sorry, I. What was I saying? I was just..."

She trailed off as Pansy's fingers drifted out to her collarbone, tracing the line of her clavicle, and rose to her jaw. She was quite certain she ought to run, or possibly to scream, but her voice seemed to be momentarily trapped somewhere behind her tongue, which tentatively slipped out to moisten her lips. Maybe this was just how English girlfriends behaved.
"Pansy, I was thinking," Daphne attempted to say, Pansy's fingers curling under her jaw, "it's really quite silly we aren't friends. It can be so lonely in the city, really, and if you could find it in you to give me a chance, perhaps I could—"

"Be quiet," Pansy interrupted, her gaze falling to Daphne's mouth, and Daphne blinked. "Don't say a word," Pansy murmured, and then she leaned forward, enveloping Daphne in the scent of honeyed flowers as her lips brushed Daphne's, delivering her to a shiver. It should have been strange, Daphne thought, or perhaps invasive, but it wasn't. She felt her sensations wander from Pansy's lips, supple and sweet from champagne, to her touch, tentative at first, before settling comfortably into the kiss.

Pansy's tongue darted out, delicate and soft, her lips continuing to pulse against Daphne's. When Daphne shivered, returning the motion with an experimental slip against Pansy's lower lip, the kiss grew insistent; almost desperate, with Pansy's hands digging tightly into Daphne's waist before rising, finding her breasts. Pansy's fingers pinched lightly through the fabric, toying with her, and a rush of excitement paired with the quickening of their heated breaths, the pace of Pansy's kiss suddenly feverish and unrelenting.

Daphne felt a gasp escape her, startled by the heat of a sudden, forceful ache from somewhere at her core, and that was enough to wake her to astonishment. She tore abruptly out of Pansy's grip, backing away. "I… I can't, I don't…" She sputtered, "Pansy, I—"

"Don't tell anyone," Pansy warned sharply, taking a step back. She was gloriously threatening, and in response, Daphne's pulse hadn't stopped racing. "Not a soul."

"I won't," Daphne said, the words leaving her in a helpless whisper, and Pansy turned and left.

Then Daphne lifted a hand to her mouth, pressing her fingers to her swollen lips and sinking, weak-kneed, into the chair behind her.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: the portmanteau you're looking for is 'parkgrass.' thank you again, so much, for your support. I really appreciate the kind messages you've left for me!
"Alone?" Theo asked, and the unmissable head of unruly dark hair turned to reveal precisely the man he'd guessed it had been. "Pity, that," he said into his glass, and Harry's eyes narrowed, caught somewhere between suspicion and curiosity. Good, Theo thought. So he wasn't an idiot, then. "Walk with me."

Harry glanced around. "Where?"

"Elsewhere." Theo ventured away without waiting, dismissing Harry's hesitation and setting off briskly down a side corridor. He smiled to himself, obscuring the motion into the curve of his palm, as he heard the telling sound of reticent footsteps shuffling after him, followed by a stifled groan.

"I see you're not dressed for the occasion," Theo noted, discarding his amusement and glancing at where Harry's loose-fitting shirt had been tucked into practical trousers.

"Nor are you," Harry noted, skeptically eyeing Theo's usual waistcoat, which today had been paired with a double-breasted dinner jacket. "Unless that jacket's also a floatation device."

Theo chuckled, draining his glass and tossing it aside. Harry stared after it, obviously expecting it to break, but it wouldn't. Not here. At parties like this, Theo always used unbreakable glass. Otherwise things got messy.

Messier, anyway.

"Where are we going?" Harry asked.

"My office," Theo said with a sidelong glance.

"Why?"

"You have questions, don't you? Too loud up here for conversation."

Even from Theo's periphery, he could see Harry's frown; the man had intensely expressive brows. "What makes you think I have anything to ask you?"

"Don't be ridiculous. Everyone does." Theo walked briskly to the lifts, gesturing Harry inside, and then slid down the portkey lever, transferring them to the floor below. It was significantly quieter there, and Theo led Harry down the corridor to his study, waving a hand to beckon a pair of cigars that followed after him. "Do you like jazz?" he asked tangentially, handing one to Harry.

Harry took it with several degrees of confusion, staring down at it. "Jazz?"

"Yes, jazz. Music." Theo snapped his fingers twice, once for the gramophone to commence quietly from elsewhere in the house and a second time for the benefit of his cigar, lighting it with a spark. "Doesn't matter," he ruled in lieu of Harry's answer, taking a series of quick puffs and exhaling slowly. "I've decided for you."
Harry paused, training his ear on the sound. "I like it," he said after a moment. "It's very… frantic."

"Nobody likes frantic," Theo said with a laugh, glancing at him.

"I do." Harry shrugged. "I find it relatable, anyway."

"Unsurprising," Theo said, which was something he found he meant, despite also believing precisely the opposite. He paused beside the door, prompting Harry over the threshold upon unlocking the handle. "Want me to light that?" he asked, noting Harry was still holding the cigar gingerly between his fingers. "Easier to smoke it when it's lit," he advised, and then opted to go ahead with a spark, jarring Harry a step backwards. "Magic only goes so far."

By the time Harry had recovered his footing, the cigar's tip had already begun to emit a thin wisp of smoke; Harry glanced questioningly down at it, and then back at Theo. "What exactly are you?" he asked, which wasn't at all a relevant topic of conversation, though Theo supposed it wasn't ever not, either.

"Just an interesting surface, I assure you." Theo took another drag from his cigar, blowing out a series of smoke rings that dissipated into the air of his study. "In need of a friend, as it were."

"I don't think you want me for that," Harry remarked, sniffing at the cigar's general area and then leaping back a second time as some ash drifted out from the end of it, nearly landing on his pants. "As it turns out, this really isn't my expertise," he pointed out with a grimace, and Theo took the cigar from Harry's fingers with a roll of his eyes, holding it up in the air between them.

"Here," Theo offered. "I'll hold. You smoke."

Harry flashed him a doubtful glance.

"Charmed them myself," Theo said, wiggling the cigar with his right hand and pointedly taking a puff from his own with his left. "Would be rude to refuse," he remarked to the air, smoke unfurling gradually from his lips, and Harry gave a somewhat petulant sigh, ultimately conceding to lean forward.

Harry curled his lips around the cigar, saturating the tobacco paper slightly with his lips inches from Theo's steady fingers and then inhaling with a sudden lurch of get it over with-esque fortitude, coughing it out. Smoke hovered thinly as he choked up a cloud of tobacco-tainted respiration, eyes watering, and gave Theo a sullen look of opposition.

"Good, right?" Theo said, grinning, and Harry waved a hand, cough-mumbling his opposition as he backed away. "Yeah, I know." He put Harry's cigar out on the ashtray on the coffee table, rising again to look at him. "So. Are we friends yet?"

"What do you need friends for?" Harry muttered, making a face at what was probably the ash still coating his tongue until Theo summoned a glass and placed it indelicately in his hand, permitting him to wash it down. "Thanks," Harry said, shuddering.

My god, Theo thought with relish. He was gloriously unrefined.

"Call it boredom, if you like. Call it unpopularity." Theo took another drag from the cigar, shaking his head and rounding the subsequent smoke ring into a sphere. He tapped the bubble lightly with a finger, bouncing it in Harry's direction, and suppressed yet another laugh as Harry dodged it, grimacing.

"You've got all these people upstairs," Harry said, watching the little orb of smoke dissipate above his head. "Aren't they your friends?"

An idiotic question, really, considering the man had eyes. "Certainly not," Theo said, sparing a glare of reproach.

"Then what are they?"

"On a good day?"

"Their good days, not mine." Another slow exhalation of smoke. The air of his study was thick with it now, and Theo noted the little cough Harry had tried unsuccessfully to hide, opting to casually lean over to put out his cigar. "Sometimes they get their acts together long enough to truly disappoint me," Theo noted, "at which point I have no choice but to reward them with genuine enmity. Otherwise, they're merely faceless inconveniences."

"One might consider that a preferable alternative," Harry suggested.

"One might," Theo permitted simply, and watched Harry's mouth quirk slightly, one corner lilting up.

"So," Harry said after a moment. "You want a friend?"

"Yes," Theo confirmed.

"But not just any friend?"

"Certainly not."

"Me?"

His eyes were green. The enormity of knowing it was momentarily overwhelming.

"Perhaps," Theo said. "Perhaps not."

"And it depends on...?"

"You," Theo said, reaching for a glass and filling it slowly. "What's your story?" he asked, looking over his shoulder.

Harry shrugged. "Not a very interesting one."

"No enemies?" Theo asked. "No tireless vendettas? A grudge or two to keep you warm?"

"Not really," Harry said, and added, "I suppose I'm really quite boring."

I doubt that, Theo didn't say.

"Appears so," he agreed instead, "but then, so am I." He waved a hand around as he sipped from his glass. "I do, after all, have my moments of crushing mundanity."

"Is that what this is?" Harry asked.

Theo opened his mouth to answer—of course it is, and isn't it such a privilege, really, being so frightfully dull?—only Harry had stepped forward before he could, taking the glass from his hand and raising it to his lips. Harry took a long sip, managing (miraculously) not to cough anything up this time, and then he eyed it in the light, letting his gaze travel slowly from the caramel translucency of the liquid back to Theo's face.

"I'd hate to bore you," Harry said, voice neutrally quiet, and Theo suppressed a shudder.

"Then don't," he advised.

Harry set the glass down on the table, eyeing it. "The thing is, I'm afraid we have competing interests," he remarked, not looking up, "as one of your sometimes-nemeses is the reason I'm here."

Theo arched a brow. "You think Malfoy's one of my nemeses?"

Harry's attention slid up from the glass.

"You said yourself," he remarked, "he wants something from you. Doesn't he?"

"Everyone does," Theo said.

Harry's mouth twitched again. "Not me."

No, Theo thought, not you.

"Care to make a wager?" he asked, and Harry gave a small indication of not-disinterest. "Stay another day," Theo advised. "See if you don't want something from me by the end of it."

"I'm busy," Harry said.

Theo shook his head. "You're not."

"I don't want to stay."

"And yet you have so far."

"Only because I have to."

"Seems to me a man like you doesn't do things unless he wants to."

Harry eyed him for a moment. "You think you know me?"

"Of course not. You said yourself there's nothing to know," Theo said.

"There isn't," Harry replied.

"Good," Theo said, "then this friendship will be quite easy indeed."

"I never said we were friends."

Theo waved a hand, dismissive. "Do you accept the terms of the wager or not?"

"You never specified terms."

"Fine. Tomorrow, come here. If you see no reason to return, then don't."

"Those are parameters, not terms. Who wins or loses?"
Wasn't it obvious?

"Either we both win," Theo said, "or we both lose."

Harry blinked.

"Not really how wagers work," he commented after a moment, though he didn't sound particularly corrective.

"So you agree?" Theo asked.

Harry considered it, turning it over for a bit in his head, and held out a hand.

"Tomorrow," he confirmed, but before Theo could accept, he retracted the offering slightly. "If," Harry amended, "you tell me something. A secret. One secret of yours," he clarified, "for one day of mine."

Theo did the math, calculating the proposed values. On the one hand, his secrets were highly valuable. Probably more so than Harry could ever guess.

On the other hand, he had so very many of them that concern hardly seemed relevant.

"One secret," Theo agreed, nodding, and Harry presented his hand a second time, this time holding it steadily between them. Theo reached out, accepting his proffered grip, and closed his hand briefly around Harry's knuckles, carefully calibrating the pressure.

"See you tomorrow, then," Harry said, and Theo nodded, releasing him without pause or hesitation. He'd always been proficient at endings; he knew, faultlessly, when to let something go.

"The flat will see you to the door," Theo replied, gesturing into the self-adjusting corridor before wandering towards his desk, taking a seat behind it.

It should have been dismissal enough for someone trained to recognize the obvious, but Harry paused for a moment in the doorway, hesitating. "Aren't you coming?"

Theo glanced up from his papers. "Whatever for?"

"It's your party," Harry pointed out, and Theo let out a hard scoff of a laugh, returning his attention to the banality littering the surface of his desk.

"They all are," he said, not looking up until the echo of Harry's footsteps had gradually faded into nothing, disappearing down the hall.
"Looking for someone?"

Draco spun, irritated, and glared down at the apparently unceasing presence of Hermione Granger, whose hands sat smugly where her pale pink swimming costume was stretched luridly across her hips. The garment was cinched around the waist to accentuate her shape, the neckline a fashionable v-shaped dip against the slopes of her breasts; all of which was Daphne Greengrass' influence, surely. Draco had never seen proof of Hermione's knees, much less any curving evidence of her thighs, and was momentarily disarmed by their presence.

More distracting than the mold she'd poured herself into, however, was the expression of triumph on her lips, which was positively abhorrent.

"What do you want?" he hissed, and her smile only broadened.

"I told you," she said, "I'm going to be everywhere you are, Malfoy. Looking for Daphne?" she asked again, less subtly this time, and he dug the crescents of his nails into his palm, stifling an unpolished growl of opposition.

"That's none of your business," he informed her, motioning dismissively with his head and angling himself into a crowd of intoxicated non-Daphnes (and therefore, people of complete and utter unimportance). "Now," he said, sauntering forward, "if you'll excuse me—"

"You know, fascinating thing," Hermione cut in, darting after him as he began winding his way through the crowd. "Do you know much about Pansy Parkinson's family?"

"Of course I do," Draco muttered, trying to flick her away like a fly, but unfortunately, she was far too persistent to shoo. "I nearly married her, didn't I?"

"Yes, that's what got me interested in the first place," Hermione said, colliding briefly with a tray of champagne glasses and prompting Draco to suppress a snort of laughter as she doggedly caught his heels. "Obviously I have no interest in Pansy, seeing as she's completely intolerable—"

"Interesting assertion, coming from you," Draco said, purposely dodging a pillar only at the last possible moment, leaving Hermione to clip her shoulder on the marble.

"—but I thought to myself, why would you end your courtship so abruptly? It's not as if it would have been a surprise to you what her personality was like, and anyway, you hardly strike me as someone looking to marry for some cause as paltry as affection—"

Draco glanced at the pool, contemplating jumping in. Or drowning. Whatever it took to escape her.

"—I mean, if you'd been looking for any sort of connection, I hardly think Pansy would have been your choice. Though, clearly I was wrong about you, wasn't I? Which is another thing. You're obviously excellent at concealing your motives, so—"

"Granger," Draco slid through his teeth, pivoting sharply to face her. "If there's a point, just make it, would you? Spare me the theatrics and just get it out!"

To his dismay, she continued to look beatifically amused.

"Fine. You want the point? Pansy Parkinson's father is notoriously tight with money," Hermione said, knowingly raising a brow. "It took very little research to discover that particular detail, you know. In fact, it's fairly public knowledge that he's already stipulated Pansy will have a carefully measured allowance, overseen by him, with no access to her inheritance until her twenty-third birthday—which," Hermione clarified with triumph, "is next October."

Draco felt his shoulders grow rigid. "So?"

"So," Hermione said with a slow smile, "that's not soon enough, is it? Not for you."

Abruptly, Draco's pulse raced.

This was a problem. And not a problem the way Hermione Granger had always been a problem. This was a new problem, and a big problem, and furthermore, it was a problem he could not presently stand to have.

"You're jealous," he spat instinctively, and Hermione blinked, startled.

"What?"

"You're jealous," he repeated nastily, watching her face contort with indignation. "I chose Pansy over you and you're looking for any reason to justify it, aren't you?" he asked, and felt a surge of satisfaction as her eyes widened in recognition, lips pressing thin. "You think it's me who's done something wrong, Granger," he murmured, leaning towards her, "but the truth is you simply can't admit to yourself that I felt nothing for you, can you?"

When her jaw dropped, he was flooded with a bitter relief, bile flooding his tongue as her knuckles grew white with rage.

"You asked me to meet you," she said, her voice a dangerous near-whisper. "You came after me, Malfoy. I told you I had no interest in you, didn't I? And you insisted."

"It was all for a laugh," he told her, the words twisting sharply in his chest. "Nothing more."

He wondered if she would believe him. She'd be a fool to do it—she was there, after all—but then again, she'd always had her own version of his irredeemable pride.

"It was nothing, period," she snapped, glowering defiantly up at him and proving him right, at best, and crushingly terrible, at worst. "I haven't thought of you at all since that night."

Leave it alone, he thought. After all, he would get away with it if he simply said nothing.

But then—

"Liar," he said, his lips and his brain in total disagreement, and her eyes narrowed, jaw going rigid as he leaned towards her. "You haven't forgotten, have you?" he said quietly, tilting his head with mockery, and she glared up at him, gaze going mean beneath her furrowed brow. "You waited for me, Granger. No point denying it."
He may not have met her that night, but he'd watched her arrive. He'd known. She'd gone to meet him in their place outside the library, all dressed in red with her hair swept back, and he'd torn himself away without a word.

Now, of course, her cheeks were as flushed as that dress, crimson with a mix of humiliation and rage, and he probably should have seen it coming, but he didn't.

He only noticed her small hands resting flat against his chest after he'd already been sent flying into the pool, careening backwards and breaking the stillness of the water's surface to watch her pale pink figure disappear from sight, arms braced tightly at her sides.

oOo

Hermione turned, face still hot with anger, to collide with Harry, who was adjusting his glasses and staring at his feet as he walked.

"Oh, sorry," he said distractedly, pausing as he registered her presence. "Is that," he began, and then frowned, glancing over her shoulder and rephrasing, "What happened to Malfoy?"

"I pushed him in the pool," Hermione said tightly, and Harry considered that information for a moment before ultimately shrugging, satisfied.

"Any reason why?" he asked. "Or just, you know. The usual?"

He was there. He was there. She wanted to say it, to shout it, to scream it; she wanted to drag Draco from the pool and then shove him under again, holding his head beneath the surface until he gurgled up an explanation, and then she wanted to do it again, that time for an apology. Then one more time, again, for fun.

"You don't like him," Hermione remembered abruptly, watching Harry glance with something that was either impassivity or amusement at where Draco was now climbing irritably out of the pool, shoving away the elf who offered him a towel. "Why come here, then?" she asked Harry, gesturing for him to follow her to the door. He conceded, letting her take the lead.

"He's a job at present," Harry said, shoving one hand in his pocket and returning to his shuffling walk. He'd always been somewhat lanky, perpetually slouched. She wasn't dissimilar herself, posture-wise, though that had been the result of heavy books. "His parents want him home," he explained, "and his mother is my godfather's cousin, so—"

"They sent you to bring him home?" Hermione said, finding it odd, though before Harry could answer, they were interrupted by the agitated presence of Pansy Parkinson. She had barreled in from nowhere, taking hold of Harry with a slightly too-familiar hand on his forearm that paused Hermione with a frown.

"Take me home," Pansy said instantly, dark brow furrowed, and Harry gave an exhausted sigh.

"First you want to come to the party, then you want t-"

"Potter," Pansy warned with thin-lipped disapproval, "this isn't the time." She glanced pointedly at Hermione, slowly manufacturing the grim arch of a falsely interested smile. "Granger," she said, looking as if she might have preferred to choke on the name. "Wonderful to see you."

Hermione raised a brow to Harry in something of a What's this?
He replied with an exhausted look of I couldn't tell you if I tried, and she gave a tiny shrug, about to leave them to it when Pansy's attention slid hurriedly around the room, looking for something unidentifiable.

"Is that Draco in the pool? He hates water," she noted to herself with a frown, before adding, "I suppose we see Nott before we go. Rude not to bid farewell to the host, after all—"

"He's not here," Harry said. "He's in his office."

"Nonsense, Potter, he's right there," Pansy said, gesturing stiffly, and Hermione noted with interest that Harry's expression morphed to confusion, locating Theo wandering towards a still-sodden Draco with a laughing Daphne on his arm. "With her, per usual," Pansy muttered with palpable venom, and to Hermione's dismay, she felt a wave of displeasure that seemed to match precisely with Pansy's tone, and Harry didn't look dissimilar.

Well, that was disappointingly inevitable, Hermione thought, watching Harry tear his gaze away from Theo and Daphne and back to his feet. Harry had always seemed pleasant enough, but he was a man nonetheless, and probably not entirely unaffected by Daphne's undeniable beauty. Hermione tucked that observation away, determining it best to head home sooner rather than later.

After all, she had research to finish. Draco Malfoy alone would take all night.

Exposing him, that is, she corrected herself with a shudder, and then she hurried away without another word, waving awkwardly to Harry and directing herself through the double doors of Theo's penthouse without even remembering her coat.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: and back to Commoner's Guide I go! See you late tonight with an update, hopefully.
Summary: The advent, continued.

There was nothing Hermione hated more than when pieces of logic didn't quite fit together, and this, unfortunately, was a case full of pieces that wouldn't fit. She took a sip of her disgusting Keep-Awake potion, shuddering as it went down, and sorted through the persons of interest again.

The first was Harry Potter. On the surface he was the simplest, of course, being mostly an open book, but given his proximity to the others, he couldn't be dismissed. He and Draco Malfoy had been rivals in school, so his presence here, ostensibly for Draco's benefit, was... questionable. Why would the Malfoys pay him, of all people? And if money was persuasive to Harry, might that include theft?

Hermione frowned at his portrait. "Tell me, Harry Potter," she mused quietly to herself, "what are you really doing in New York?"

"Walk with me," Theo said without preamble, disappearing from the threshold before Harry had even knocked on the door. He glanced at his raised hand, a little disarmed by the interrupted sequence, but consented to follow the sound of Theo's footsteps.

"Where are we walking, exactly?" Harry asked.

"Elsewhere," Theo's voice called from inside a room ahead to his left, which Harry entered to discover was a library. "Tell me," Theo said, startling Harry by appearing without warning at his side, book in hand, "what do you know about crisis management?"

"Nothing," Harry said, and at Theo's arched brow, he shrugged. "Well," he amended, "I'm told I have a good head for a crisis, if that helps."

"Not very panicky?" Theo asked.

"Not especially," Harry said.

"Good," Theo ruled, beckoning again for Harry to follow as he headed further into the room. "There's a problem at my club," he explained, pausing beside the library's fireplace. "We have to run an errand before I give you that secret I promised."

"So you're a bootlegger, then?" Harry asked.

"That," Theo said shortly, "is not a secret. Elbows in," he advised without transition, tossing emerald powder into the flames and taking Harry with him at the last possible second, the fireplace slurping them up and spitting them out into the room Harry recognized as the location of Theo's first party.

"Come on," was Theo's usual beckoning, his footsteps echoing into the distance as Harry wiped at the ash on his glasses, hurrying to follow. "I make most of my money from No-Majs," he said over his shoulder once Harry caught his heels, gesturing to an area that looked like a distillery, though no machinery was involved. "They don't particularly care about quality, but I have my pride."

"You sell them magic whisky?" Harry asked, and Theo glanced at him, appearing to dismiss the question entirely.

"What's your story?" he asked. "No way you decided to come here just for Malfoy."

"His parents paid me," Harry said. "I needed the money."

He hazarded a glance askance, testing, but Theo seemed to have no particular reaction to the statement.

"Interesting," said Theo, insincerely. He seemed distracted by something else, tapping his wand on the door of his office and then proceeding directly to his desk, sifting through pages of what seemed to be something financial.

"How long have you been doing this?" Harry asked, glancing around the room, and Theo didn't look up.

"Long enough," he said.

"Long enough to what?"

That got a glimpse of something. Theo looked up, amused.

"To hate it," he said, and paused, leaning against the desk. "Are you prying, or asking?"

"Asking," Harry said. "You already promised me a secret. I don't need to pry."

Theo chuckled, returning his attention to his books. "Well, you've come to the right place for one," he said.

"Have I?"

Theo opened his mouth, glancing up, then closed it.

Then, abruptly, he took hold of Harry's arm, pulling him into the hallway and pointing to the sign above the club's empty stage.

THE CHAMBER OF SECRETS, read a set of illuminated letters.

"Oh," said Harry, and Theo gave another low laugh, returning to his office as Harry sighed and followed. "Look, if you want me to come back later—"

"Of course I do," Theo said absently. "The point of having a friend is to have one, isn't it? With some degree of reliability, anyway. How's Thursday?" he asked, looking up. "It'll be another loathsome party, which of course you're now obligated to enjoy."

"I might not be here Thursday," Harry reminded him.

This, despite being Harry's constant refrain, seemed to agitate Theo into motion. He set the pages down, then took several long strides to bring himself face to face with Harry. It was all so abrupt and absent of warning Harry felt himself suddenly cemented to the floor, unable to move until Theo's gaze had fallen curiously on his from no more than a foot away.

"What do you want to know?" Theo asked neutrally.
A thousand things flashed through Harry's head.

Unfortunately, "Why me?" was what fell out of his mouth.

Theo's voice was a laughing murmur. "Ego," he mused in dispassionate non-answer, tilting his head. "All the things you could have asked about me, and instead you decide to ask about yourself?"

"It'll tell me what I need to know about you," Harry countered, which was true. "Everything else I could technically glean over time."

"Assuming you're capable of gleaning much."

"Which I am," Harry said, "technically."

Theo's lips curled up slowly.

"What a talented man you are, Harry Potter," he said, and Harry fought a shiver. At this distance, he could smell the faint hint of tobacco on Theo's clothes mixing with the mint he half-imagined on his breath.

"I need someone I can trust," Theo said. "Someone who doesn't lie. You seem like someone suited to my needs, and I find it promising for my purposes."

"Who says I'm not a liar?" Harry asked.

"I didn't say I didn't want a liar," Theo corrected. "I just want someone who doesn't lie to me."

"And will you lie to me?" Harry asked.

Theo's tongue slid between his lips, moistening them at precisely the moment Harry realized his throat had gone dry.

"Only if you ask," he said, and then he pivoted away, returning to his desk.

oOo

Perhaps more curious a case than Harry Potter, Hermione thought, was Theo Nott. He, unlike Harry, was intensely secretive. All she could dig up about his past from his MACUSA records was the deed for a large underground basement and some tax forms, all of which confirmed the obvious—that he had made vast amounts of money very, very quickly. Perhaps that was easy enough to sort out, given what she suspected was his current profession, but still, it was too convenient to discard. Adding in his reputation for antisocial behavior (almost no one actually spoke to him at his parties, or so it seemed), it seemed an incongruous set of details.

How, she wondered, had Theo Nott come to make all that money?

oOo

The fireplace in Theo's office glowed brightly for a moment, revealing the slender figure of a blonde in an olive green coatdress. "There you are," said an exasperated Daphne Greengrass, tapping Theo on the shoulder. "I've been looking everywhere for you."

"Have you?" Theo asked, looking up at her, and then he gestured blindly in Harry's direction. "You already know Potter, don't you?"
Daphne turned, blinking with surprise as she identified Harry in the room. "Oh, Harry," she said, before peering expectantly over his shoulder. "Is Draco with you?"

"Not today, I'm afraid," Harry said. "He had some errands to run, I believe."

"Ah, well it's nice of Theo to keep you company," she said, sparing him a smile. "He's not usually the 'company' type, so you must be highly compelling entertainment. Either that," she amended with a laugh, "or miraculously lacking any of the usual irritating qualities."

"Harry's helping me through a crisis," Theo informed her matter-of-factly, cutting in before Harry could answer. "We're friends, as it were. Didn't you say I needed more of those?"

"It's true, you do," Daphne confirmed with a playful sigh, turning back to Harry with a smile. "Theo's always been the lonely type, ever since we were practically children."

"Children?" Harry echoed, surprised, and Daphne nodded.

"Oh, did he not tell you?" she said, frowning slightly. "Theo and I grew up together. Of course, he wasn't quite so fancy then," she recalled with a laugh, giving him a nudge. "I used to sneak him food and clothes," she explained to Harry, "but I always knew he'd be something one day."

Theo, Harry noted, didn't smile at the memory, nor did he seek Harry's reaction. "All thanks to you, I'm sure," he said to Daphne, who gave him a warm smile.

"Oh, hush," Daphne said, shaking her head. "Anyway, a crisis, you said? I should leave you to it, then," she told him, dusting a bit of ash from her skirt. "I have some shopping to finish, like usual—I just thought I'd see what you were up to," she explained, "seeing as I couldn't find you at your suite."

"Have to work, I'm afraid," he told her. "Not all of us have your charms."

"Thank goodness," she agreed, and then leaned forward, brushing her thumb fondly across his cheek. "Well, tomorrow, then?" she asked him. "Or was it Thursday?"

"Whenever you wish," Theo said, inclining his head slightly, "as ever."

She made a face, admonishing him with a little twist of her lips, then turned to Harry. "Do say hello to Draco, won't you?" she asked, and then she waved, bidding them both farewell and turning to the fireplace, the office suddenly quite drained of energy in her absence.

Harry noticed, too, that Theo's expression had gone slightly distant with distraction once Daphne had gone. Harry battled himself for a moment—several moments, all of him slightly in turmoil—but ultimately broke the silence when his curiosity got the better of him.

After all, it now seemed so terribly obvious.

"The money," Harry said. "This, everything. You did it for her, didn't you?"

In answer, Theo's gaze dragged slowly upwards, his eyes falling squarely on Harry's in another of his rare glances.

"If you want another secret," Theo advised, "you'll have to come back tomorrow," and where Harry should have suffered a twinge of annoyance, he felt instead a strange flutter of anticipation.

Though, at a glimpse of where Daphne had just been, he felt it quickly sour to disappointment, leaving him with a bitter curiosity he couldn’t quite resolve.

Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 13

Summary: The advent, continued.

Hermione set Theo Nott's portrait aside, glancing at the one beside it with an irksome rush of loathing. Pansy Parkinson, of course, who hadn't left Manhattan despite losing her would-be fiancé. Pansy, whose wealth was limited by her father. Who seemed noticeably present, too.

What could be her motivation to stay?

oOo

Daphne dropped her purse with a clatter, holding a panicked hand to her chest as Pansy approached her where she stood beside the mirror.

"My word, you're quiet," Daphne muttered breathlessly to Pansy, bending to retrieve her purse as Pansy smiled thinly in reply.

"Shopping for something in particular? Or someone, I suppose I should say," Pansy amended, gesturing to the lingerie Daphne was holding up against her petite frame. A fortunate coincidence, Pansy thought, that she'd happened to spot the American heiress slipping inside from where she'd been walking down the bustling Woolworth street herself.

Well, it was luck, of course—and a bit of research about where Daphne Greengrass preferred to shop. Pansy was many things, but hardly uninformed.

Daphne's gaze darted away. "Just a little something, that's all," she demurred.

Pansy reached out, running her fingertips in muted appreciation over the silken hem of the bralette in Daphne's hand. "For Draco?" she asked neutrally.

Daphne's cheeks flushed. "I… hadn't thought about it," she informed her shoes, which were a stylish pair of heeled Mary Janes that Pansy would have coveted, were she not distracted with other things.

Pansy glanced over her shoulder, ascertaining that no one was looking, and then she gestured to one of the salon's private rooms. "Shall we, then?"

Daphne looked up sharply, eyes widening. "You don't mean—"

"Well, I need a new chemise myself," Pansy cut in innocently, summoning one from a table of silken unmentionables that had been debuted that morning for a fashion show. "And you did want us to get to know each other, didn't you?"

The turn of phrase, knowingly aimed as a challenge, was positively delicious. Pansy's bones thrilled with power, particularly once Daphne's breath visibly quickened, her porcelain hand fluttering up to her golden curls.
"I suppose that's true," Daphne said, uncertainly chewing her lip, and from there, Pansy had turned towards the changing rooms, beckoning Daphne in her wake.

She wasn't entirely sure what she wanted. She knew she couldn't forget the taste of Daphne's lips, that much was obvious, but aside from an unyielding desire to see Daphne again—to witness with her own eyes whether the effect had been diminished, only to discover that it unfortunately had not—Pansy wasn't entirely certain what she intended. In fact, it was only once she'd watched Daphne's silhouette through the curtain of her changing room that she decided.

"Let me see," Pansy called, gambling on a hunch, and she watched Daphne freeze in place.

"I can't come out like this," Daphne said, swallowing.

"Well, if you want my opinion," Pansy offered knowingly, and Daphne hesitated.

But then, of course, the inevitable.

"You'll have to… come in."

Pansy smiled, straightening her black silk chemise, and slid from her room to Daphne's, pulling aside the curtain. Unfortunately, all control Pansy thought she possessed drained when she looked at Daphne, who was wearing pettipants of an ivory silk crepe that had been lined with chantilly lace. The matching bralette, also a delicate ivory silk, slid smoothly around the creamy expanse of Daphne's rib cage, the fabric embroidered with a pattern of impossibly tiny roses.

Daphne herself, backed into a corner of her changing room, was holding her chin almost defiantly high, her lips trembling slightly. It was cold inside the salon, a visible shiver threading the curves of Daphne's body as she stood half-naked and chilled, and Pansy reached out, brushing the tips of her fingers over the pebbled skin of Daphne's décolletage.

"I worry," Daphne began, obviously nervous, and swallowed. "I worry," she repeated, with slightly more steadiness that time, "that the silk is too thin."

Pansy let her gaze drop, fingers falling with it. True, the pettipants were a near-transparent gauze of fabric. Difficult to launder, were they anything but witches. Pansy toyed with the hem, sliding her fingers under it to brush the outset of Daphne's thigh, and Daphne gave a little mewl so undeniably fearful that Pansy had to fight a laugh.

"Let's see," Pansy murmured, and slipped her palm against Daphne's inner thigh, curving around them. "Yes, I suppose there's quite little to the imagination," she said, watching her own hand rise to brush between Daphne's legs.

Her confidence faltered, however, finding an unexpected slickness there and saturating her fingers in the heat of Daphne's arousal, turning her attention to the way Daphne's breath had quickened. This wasn't her imagination, Pansy confirmed, but instead of triumph, she felt a rush of fear. Daphne had returned her kiss, and now Daphne wanted her. Wanted more.

What, then, did she want?

It seemed Pansy's hands, disembodied from her more practical thoughts, had decided for her. The lips of Daphne's sex were velvety and soft, warm and inviting, and she found herself unwilling to resist. She circled the pad of her finger against the slit of Daphne's cunt, watching the little pearls of Daphne's nipples strain against the blessedly sheer fabric of her bralette. Pansy lowered her lips to the material, running her tongue across the silk, and in timid but undeniable answer, Daphne slid the strap of Pansy's chemise from her shoulder, fingertips exploring the shape of Pansy's clavicle. Pansy smelled her own perfume mixing with the sweet scent of Daphne's hair and marveled, lips still pressed against the silk, that anything could be so delicate, so fragile; so desperately feminine, and still with such a powerful ache she felt certain she'd swiftly come undone.

Pansy adjusted her hand, quickening her pace between the curves of Daphne's thighs, and was rewarded with the tightening of Daphne's fingernails into her spine. She yanked at Daphne's thigh, pulling her closer, and Daphne clapped a hand over her own ardent moan, biting on her palm until Pansy pulled it aside to cover Daphne's mouth with hers. She slid her tongue lightly along the inside of Daphne's lips, tasting her mouth with little pulses of desperation as she resumed her mindless circles of friction against Daphne's intoxicating heat.

"Miss Greengrass?" called the salon's owner, startling them both. "Is there something I can help you with?"

Daphne, panicked, moved to shove Pansy away, but having come this far, she certainly wasn't willing to stop. Instead, she held Daphne in place, feverishly increasing the pace of her hand, and Daphne shuddered out a silent moan.

"I'm… I'm fine," she called weakly to the salon owner, trying to hold Pansy's wrist still, but Pansy shoved her hand away, unrelenting. "I'll just, um. I'm—just need a… a minute, please—"

"Are you liking the new silk?" the owner called, sounding worried. Surely Daphne Greengrass' approval meant others would flock to the salon, and at the thought, Pansy had to fight a laugh. It was certainly effective lingerie, though given her current constraints, she would have preferred to leave it in pieces on the floor. As it was, Daphne Greengrass looked close to fainting, far more Venus than virgin; her lips were wantonly parted, head thrown back while Pansy's fingers darted inside her, then back out to circle her slit.

"It's… beautiful," Daphne managed, eyes fluttering open to find Pansy's. "Really, it's—it's such a lovely, ah—"

She broke off, finally rupturing at Pansy's touch, and shuddered so violently Pansy thought she might convulse. Her nails pierced the skin beneath Pansy's chemise, and with a stifled yelp of pain, Pansy retaliated with a hard kiss to Daphne's lips.

Daphne shoved her away, struggling to catch her breath.

"I'll take it," she half-shouted to the shop owner. "I'll wear it now, under my clothes. Charge my account, please, and see that—" She broke off, pressing a hand to her mouth as she stared at Pansy. "See that my friend Miss Parkinson gets whatever she likes, as well."

"Yes, Miss Greengrass, of course—"

Daphne fumbled for her dress, yanking it on and charming the buttons before Pansy gripped her arm to drag her from her haste, pausing her in place.

"Daphne," she said in a low voice, "if you tell anyone—"

"It won't happen again," Daphne said firmly, walking out without another word, and though Pansy should have been ashamed, she merely bit back a smile as Daphne went.

After all, that was easy for her to say, Pansy thought. Daphne would be spending the rest of the day wearing the incontrovertible evidence that Pansy had held her in her mercy with little more than a lift of her finger—and that, Pansy reasoned, was more than enough to satisfy her.

She'd have liked to see Draco try that, Pansy mused to herself, before declining to buy the chemise, making her way out of the shop without making a purchase.

After all, the silk was obviously flimsy.

Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 14

Summary: The advent, continued.

Hermione was sitting on the floor, staring at a series of portraits—one of which, Daphne registered with a shudder, belonged to Pansy Parkinson—when Daphne walked into her dreadful hovel of an aurors' office, falling into the vacant seat at Hermione's desk.

"Have you found anything?" Daphne asked hopefully, and Hermione looked up with a grimace.

"Nothing, really," she admitted, shaking her head. "Draco Malfoy was my primary suspect, but I'm not sure he makes sense. I can't find any proof his family's company's made any money in the last few years, which certainly gives him a motive, but I also can't seem to find any evidence he's been behind any of the recent thefts."

Daphne grimaced, chewing her lip. "You think he's in financial trouble?"

Hermione shook her head. "I'm not sure, really, as Gringotts is particularly protective of their Sacred Twenty-Eight patrons. I'd have to get into his vault," she sighed, "which I couldn't do even if I had a Ministry license, Goblins are tricky that way, very private. Dangerously so," she added offhandedly, glancing back down at her notes.

"Surely there's some way to find out," Daphne said, slightly apprehensive, and Hermione frowned to herself, considering it.

"Well," she said slowly, "I suppose I could try to find out myself. He and I do know each other," she admitted with a grimace. "I have some idea how to make him talk, though I certainly wouldn't call us friends."

"I'd just feel so much better if I had some answers," Daphne lamented, glancing at her hands. After all, the sooner she had answers, the sooner she'd know who she could trust, and the sooner she knew who to trust, the sooner she could stop running into Pansy Parkinson—who, much as she hated to even consider it, had an unnerving way of getting under her skin.

She tightened her legs in an unwilling response to her thoughts, shuddering at the motion of the silk against her thighs.

Yes, she thought again, the sooner she had answers, the better.

"The thing is," Daphne exhaled, chewing her lip, "I just feel very vulnerable at the moment, and Draco's been pursuing me quite... intensely, as I'm sure you've seen." An understatement, really. Still, at least Draco's attention was something she knew what to do with; Pansy's, less so. "I know he has some interest in me," Daphne confessed, "but obviously I can't even begin to consider his proposal while he might be planning to use me."

"Proposal?" Hermione echoed, startled. "He's already proposed?"

"Well, he's certainly hinted at it," Daphne said, shaking her head. "But then, with this investigation — " And the continued existence of his former lover, she thought grimly, "I just thought..."
"Say no more," Hermione assured her, looking sympathetic. "I'll see what I can find out from him."

She shuffled through her notes, moving aside a few other portraits, and Daphne blinked with surprise, noticing the familiar faces blinking up at her. "Is that Theo?" she asked. "And… my goodness, Harry Potter, really?"

"Well, I try to be thorough," Hermione said, glancing down with a shrug. "And besides, there's something off about Theo Nott that I can't quite shake."

"Oh, but Theo wouldn't dream of harming me," Daphne said, frowning. "We've known each other for ages, since we were teenagers. I love him dearly, and he loves me."

Hermione paused, frowning to herself. "Hm," she said unhelpfully, scribbling something to herself — motive, Daphne managed to read, followed by, unrequited? and then several question marks, shoving it back into her pile of research. "Well, in any case, I'd better see what I can discover, which is hopefully something useful," Hermione said, setting down her quill and rising sharply to her feet. "Either way, it's about time Malfoy got what he deserved," she muttered absently to herself, vigorously slamming a drawer shut after checking her hair in a small compact mirror.

"My, that sounds vengeful," Daphne noted, surprised, and Hermione stopped short, seeming to have only just realized she'd said it out loud. "You're sure you don't mind talking to him?"

"No, no, I'm fine," Hermione assured her unconvincingly. "Everything's fine. See you soon!" she added in a too-bright sing-song, disappearing from the room and leaving Daphne to lean back in her chair, sighing in exhaustion.

Thoughts of Draco swam in her head, followed by the unrelenting presence of Pansy. Her lips were so soft, so sweetly insistent… Daphne shivered, shoving it aside. Likely she was only fixating because it was exciting, and because there was so little to compare it to. She'd only kissed one boy in her life, and that had been Theo.

Daphne bit her lip, contemplating it, and then leaned forward, identifying the parchment with Hermione's most recent notes and crumpling the page, depositing it in her purse. It wasn't as if she was doing anything wrong; after all, they were only notes. If Hermione remembered what she'd scrawled to herself, so be it. If she didn't, it still wasn't as if Daphne had really done anything to derail the case.

It wasn't Theo. That much she knew. It couldn't have been Theo. Worse, investigating him would only waste time, and it was Draco that Daphne needed answers about.

On second thought, she removed the crumpled page from her purse, skimming it.

HP—family? Parents dead… money?
PP father (inheritance!)
DM no new investments, portfolio missing, M.O.? (?) NOTE TO SELF: still a tossery knob
TN unrequited… jealousy? love?

"Incendio," Daphne whispered, and from the tip of her wand, the page went up in flames.

Then she vanished the ash and brushed off her dress, making her way out of the office.

"You two are suspiciously quiet," Draco noted over dinner, glancing between Pansy and Harry as he sipped his wine. "What were you doing all day?"
"Went shopping," Pansy said.

"Did some paperwork," added Harry.

Draco waited for one or both of them to expound, but they clearly didn't feel the need to do so. Figured, he thought. Only the two of them could come to New York and do nothing at all worth remarking. He rolled his eyes in their persisting silence, returning to his dinner.

"Well, seeing as you're both so criminally dull—"

"Malfoy," came a voice behind him, and immediately, he felt his chest seize up with panic.

"Tell me that was a hallucination," he hissed to Pansy and Harry, who both looked up.

"Nope," said a sullen Pansy.

"Hi, Hermione," Harry added, and Draco scowled, turning to find the very hallucination he'd hoped to avoid in the form of a ruffled Hermione Granger.

"Hi, Harry," she said, voice gruffly affectionate, and then she turned her attention to Draco. "Listen, Malfoy, we need to talk."

"Oh, do we?" Draco huffed, doubtful. "I can't imagine why."

"It's important," Hermione informed him snottily, folding her arms over her chest. "Believe me, I wouldn't be here if it weren't."

"Well, that's marvelous for you," Draco said, "but as you can see, I'm very busy with my present companions. We're having din-"

"Oh, just go ahead," Pansy said impatiently, tossing her napkin down on her plate and rising to her feet. "Potter," she barked at him, "are you coming?"

Harry looked up, sighing heavily. "And what, pray tell, are we doing?"

"Throwing ourselves into the Hudson," she snapped, pivoting sharply away.

"Transcendent," Harry muttered, rising to his feet and following after her, "I can't wait—"

"Great," Hermione said firmly, pulling out Pansy's chair and taking her place just as a lean figure manifested across the room. "Now listen, I have to tell you, there's something going o-"

"NOTT," Draco bellowed frantically, and at the sound of his name, the slim silhouette of Theo Nott fell to a rigid halt, his head angling over his shoulder in the direction of Draco's voice. "Come join us, won't you?" Draco called, flagrantly feigning normality, and though Theo's eyes narrowed—and across the table, Hermione's mouth had become its most thinly pursed version—he consented to turn, making his way to their table.

"Hello," Theo said, nodding to Hermione, first, and then to Draco, looking pained by the task of speaking. "I'm very busy," he said, which seemed to be neither a greeting nor a refusal, but rather a declarative statement of information.

"Magnificent, we won't be long," Draco said, kicking the chair out for him to sit. "Granger?" he asked her. "You were saying?"

She set her jaw in annoyance, glancing at Theo, who shrugged.
"If it helps," he informed her, "whatever this is, I don't care."

"Nor do I," Draco contributed, and she scowled, sliding her chair out and rising to glare at him.

"We're not done here," she said. "I'll see you tomorrow."

"Is that a threat?" Draco retorted, and to his relief, she pivoted away, stomping off without a word of farewell.

"She seems nice," Theo said, watching her go, and Draco heaved an enormous sigh, the weight of his guilt settling in before her unruly curls had fully disappeared from sight.

"I did something terrible to her once," he admitted in a low voice, shaking his head.

Theo shrugged, reaching into his waistcoat for a thin glass vial that he poured into Harry's empty glass. "Probably more than once, by the looks of it," Theo said, gesturing to where she'd been before raising the glass to his lips.

"Fine, maybe twice," Draco muttered, glancing at the vial. "Got another of those?"

Theo removed a second vial, handing it to him, and Draco poured it into his wine.

"Cheers," he grumbled, raising his glass, and Theo made a face.

"I'd prefer if we didn't speak," he said, and Draco shrugged.

"Fine by me," he agreed, and leaned back in his chair, the two of them marinating in silence as they each took a sip.
"You know, you really shouldn't be spending so much money," Hermione called out to Draco, watching his shoulders stiffen at the sound of her voice as he spun to locate her amid the ostentatious Woolworth holiday decorations.

The moment his gaze fell angrily on hers (even as the rest of him turned irritably away), Hermione had to fight a smile. She knew quite a few things about Draco Malfoy, and was presently in the throes of employing three of them in particular to try to get what she wanted.

One—that he was extremely prone to accidentally revealing things under pressure.

Two—that nothing was more important to him than his family name, which often meant there was nothing more important to him than the man from which it had come.

Three—that he was an arsehole she'd once been foolish enough to almost-nearly-narrowly fall for.

(Though, there was certainly no danger of that happening again.)

(Also, that one wasn't necessarily relevant. It just happened to also be a fact.)

(For purposes of present use, she referred back to the earlier two.)

"I don't think your father would be too pleased about all this excess," she called to Draco's flustered back, and true to form, he paused for a moment, turning to face her with a grimace of displeasure.

"What do you want?" he said without greeting, forcing her to catch up to him on the sidewalk as he strode briskly and without pause in the direction of his hotel. "I feel I've made it very clear I have no interest in you, Granger."

"Hard as it is to believe, I'm not interested in you, either," Hermione informed him, half-jogging to match his lengthy stride. "What I am interested in," she panted lightly, "is whatever's going on with your company."

"Well, take a number," Draco muttered, "as I'm sure we'd all like to know."

She filed that away under 'ostensibly harmless comments which unintentionally reflect truth,' which was one of his classic missteps. It was also one of the first layers of sorting through his numerous deflective coping mechanisms, all of which she had been forced to learn after being partnered with him at Hogwarts.

"Your family's having money problems," she said declaratively, watching him stiffen in response. To her relief, his opposition caused him to slow down just enough for her to avoid a stitch in her side as she added, "You do realize you don't have to hide that from me, don't you? I'm not Pansy."

"I do not wish to discuss this or anything with you," Draco said, glaring at her. "And by the way, that color doesn't flatter you in the slightest."

Well, there was 'blatant rudeness,' she thought, filing it away. That was deflective mechanism number two.

She was definitely onto something.

"Why New York?" she asked him. "Why not Paris?"

"Paris is full of French people," Draco replied with a sniff of displeasure, "and if I wanted to cater to the whims of pretentious artsy swines, I'd have simply had dinner with my cousins."

She plucked the word 'pretentious' out, opting to refocus the conversation.

"Well, it is quite easy to be a new person here," she admitted, certainly capable of knowing as much herself. "It's a bit freeing, isn't it?"

He slid her a suspicious glance, slowing to a meandering pace.

"What are you getting at, Granger?" he asked.

"Nothing," she assured him. "I'm just saying, if I wanted to start over, I'd do it here."

"Is that what you're doing?" he asked, changing the subject in a way clearly designed to irritate her. That was number three, or perhaps number four. It had been a while since she'd ordered them. "You know," he added snidely, "that would explain this new version of you."

She fought a roll of her eyes. "And what new version would that be?"

"You know. The one with all the socializing and the scandalous swimming costumes and the proximity to illegalities," he accused, falling to a halt so sharply that several people had to float on either side of them. "This isn't you, Granger."

"You don't know me," she reminded him. "You said yourself it was nothing between us."

"Ah, so I have," he said, obviously pleased with himself for having been clever enough to think of it already. "How accommodating of you to remember."

She dug her nails into her palms, trying not to let him distract her away from the point. That was one of his more effective mechanisms; she hadn't quite perfected a response to it, as she was pretty sure it was one of his own methods of debilitating her.

And it worked, clearly. The last time she'd been onto something, she'd ended up pushing him in the pool.

"Tell me the truth," she said, throwing him off their usual rhythm with a new move: a moment of sincerity. "After that night," she said, straining not to reveal any discomfort at the mention of it, "you started going with Pansy. Was that real," she asked plainly, "or was it for money?"

"My goodness, Granger, I'm not some sort of... courtesan," Draco sputtered, though all of his tells were going off; no eye contact, hands flailing, complete and total loss of composure. "Obviously she was a suitable match. Our families have been close for years, and as for the timing—"

"It wasn't a laugh, Malfoy," Hermione said firmly. She was gambling now, but if there was one thing to disarm him, it was definitely the truth. He never knew what to do with it. "Maybe it wasn't what you wanted, and maybe it means nothing to you now, but whatever it was, it wasn't a laugh."
He set his jaw, obviously conflicted, and then glanced down at her.

"What do you want?" he asked, and this time it was less mocking, though it was hardly warm.

"If you've done something bad," she said, hurriedly rushing it out in the spare moments of humanity he might have been willing to offer. "If you need help, Draco, all you have to do is tell me, and—"

Too far. She'd forgotten the extent of his pride, recalling it with palpable disappointment the moment his pale brow furrowed above his grey eyes.

"I don't need your help," he said flatly, turning to leave, and Hermione's hand shot out, catching his arm in the same moment he was forced to dodge a fast-walking passerby.

"Malfoy, wait, I—"

He collided with her, all of his momentum unsuscpecting pulled in her direction, and they staggered together briefly, caught in the paths of bustling New Yorkers. Irony, really, she thought with a grimace; colliding with him seemed to be as predictable as the seasons. It took a moment to steady herself, Draco's grip setting her upright away from the crowds, but then—to her immense surprise—by the time he glanced down at her again, he seemed to have softened slightly.

Maybe the crash had jarred him in some way, the same way it had unsettled her.

"It wasn't… for Pansy," he said gruffly, grey gaze sweeping over her face. "It wasn't like that. It wasn't you for her."

She looked up, surprised, and immediately regretted it, finding that his eyes on hers were the beginning of a very familiar choreography between them. He had a way of looking at her that generally left her reeling, and beneath all the layers of insincerity and subterfuge, she'd thought that had been the core of him.

That, she registered with displeasure, was a fact about him she'd clearly failed to properly calibrate.

"You're not going to leave me alone, are you?" he asked her, and she shook her head numbly.

"Not a chance," she said, and he grimaced, tearing his gaze from hers and breaking the temporary spell with his usual petulant scowl.

"Fine." He adjusted his hat, straightening his lapel and turning away. "Try not to accost me with so many people around next time," he sniffed with displeasure, and then he slid into the current of Woolworth's foot traffic as Hermione let him go, returning silently to her calculations.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: just landed in a foreign country without my suitcase. mazel! see you tomorrow my loves Theo's affinity for rooftops was either a function of morbidity or loftiness. Perhaps he had always had a latent tendency for dramatics that hadn't been given the opportunity to surface until he could afford his own lavish sensibilities, but either way, he was drawn irresspressibly to heights. And distance.

Maybe distance was really the key.

He was standing behind the thin railing of the upper floor of his penthouse atrium, glancing moodily down at the others. Daphne had her arm looped through Draco Malfoy's, laughing brightly at something he'd said (doubtful it was actually funny) while the curly-haired English girl lingered nearby, observing. Presumably Pansy Parkinson was around somewhere, swanning about... yes, there she was, Theo registered grimly, and on the arm of—

Theo frowned, recognizing Harry Potter at precisely the same moment Harry turned, gaze rising to follow the staircase that had been charmed to pen the unruly (and unwanted) guests down below. Harry's glasses flashed in the light, glinting for a moment to obscure his attention, and then Theo blinked, finding that Harry had spotted him.

From below, Harry's mouth twisted to half a smile, nodding up at Theo, who raised his champagne glass in answer. Harry beckoned down, gesturing, and Theo shook his head, motioning Harry to the stairs. Charms could be altered; his willingness to interact with others could not.

Harry paused for a moment, considering it, and then turned to Pansy, saying something in her ear.

Theo tightened his fingers around his glass, waiting.

Then Harry slipped into the crowd. Theo, with a rousing satisfaction, flicked his wand and drained the rest of his champagne, meeting Harry at the top of the stairs.

"You know," Harry said in greeting, hands tucked into his ill-fitted tuxedo pockets, "if you want peace and quiet, you should really stop inviting people to your house."

"I should pay you for that advice," Theo said, tapping his glass to refill it and glancing at Harry's empty hand. "Care for a drink?"

"Not tonight," Harry said. "I think I've finally come to admit I don't particularly care for intoxication."

"Ah, and there it goes," Theo said, facetiously motioning to an imaginary breeze. "My last bit of usefulness to you, gone."

"Not true," Harry said, shrugging. "We're friends, aren't we? Given our recent wager."

"Are we?" Theo echoed doubtfully. "That wager was about whether you wanted something from me, not whether we were friends. Though," he amended, "I suppose that's really the same thing, isn't it?"
"If that's true, your other friends must not be very good," Harry said doubtfully.

"If I had any outside of you, I'm sure they'd be deeply insulted," Theo replied, turning to look down over the railing. "Good party, though, isn't it?" he asked, finding Daphne in the crowd. She'd worn gold, which suited her. She was always accompanied by some sort of ethereal gleam. "One of my better ones, aesthetically speaking."

Harry followed Theo's gaze, finding Daphne, and then glanced back at Theo.

"Listen, about your childhood," Harry began, and Theo scoffed.

"It's a party, Harry. Not a dull biography."

"But about what Daphne said," Harry pressed. "About… giving you things, I just wanted to tell you, I—" He hesitated, and then, "I understand. I grew up with my aunt and uncle, and my cousin. It was… not ideal," he exhaled. "My godfather and I reconnected later, but initially, it wasn't great."

Theo considered this a moment, then turned to face Harry. "Is this some sort of offering?"

"Maybe. Yes." A shrug. "The point is," Harry summarized factually, "it seemed to make you uncomfortable that I knew, so I thought I should make an effort at fairness. Now you know something uncomfortable about me."

More consideration.

Then, "What was the worst part?"

"Of being poor?" Harry asked, and Theo nodded. "The hunger. Not just for food," he clarified. "For recognition, for respect. For decency, I guess. For the right to have goals, or expectations." He leaned his elbows against the railings. "What about you?"

Theo angled his head towards Harry, pausing, and mirrored his half-smile.

It was a motion designed to indicate the sentiment: Of course you would say that.

Then Theo clapped a hand on Harry's shoulder, beckoning him to the stairs.

"Let us not have starved for nothing," he said, and Harry gave a conciliatory nod, consenting graciously to follow.

oOo

"You seem a little distracted this evening," Daphne noted, and Draco blinked, catching himself looking over her shoulder and turning his attention swiftly back to her. "She's over there," she added neutrally, gesturing to where Hermione was staring with confusion at a bright pink drink she'd just been handed in a champagne flute.

"I'm not looking for her," Draco said quickly, and Daphne arched a brow, doubtful. "Okay, fine, I was," he admitted with a grumble, "but only because I can't seem to get rid of her. I mean, I know she's your friend," he corrected himself quickly, "so, of course, but—"

"You and Hermione have a history of some kind, don't you?" Daphne prompted.

"Nothing very interesting," Draco said, hedging a little, but at his avoidance, she seemed to lose interest, her own gaze wandering into the crowd towards what Draco recognized as a familiar weedy form. "Well, I only mean that I don't want you to worry," he told her quickly, hoping to regain her attention, lest he lose it again to Theo Nott. "After all, it's you I'd hoped to see."

Flattery, as he'd come to learn, was for Daphne, hit and miss. His attention was a ball of string she usually seemed pleased with at first, but which she easily cast aside if it failed to hold her interest. Thus, when she asked, "Well, what happened?" he felt he had no room for refusal, hesitating for a moment before finally conceding with a grimace.

"We were assigned to work together for a class our final year at Hogwarts," he explained, and she nodded, always keen to hear a story. "It seemed there might have been some… spark between us. We hated each other at first, of course," he said, and she nodded again, sympathetic, "but then—"

He coughed. She didn't need the details.

"In any case," he continued, "I asked her to meet me… romantically. She agreed, but that same day I received some unfortunate news from my father." He squirmed a little, not wanting to get into that, either. "I realized it was best that I not get involved with someone who wasn't going to be a possibility long-term."

"Oh?" Daphne asked, obviously made slightly uneasy by the statement, and Draco hurried to put her at ease.

"I was foolish then, afraid to tell her the truth. It's no wonder she hates me."

And it wasn't, all things considered. "But it's always been my job to inherit the family company, and unfortunately, she—" Another tick of hesitation. "She didn't quite fit my father's hopes for the future of our family enterprise," he summarized, as neatly as he could.

"What about Pansy?" Daphne asked, and Draco fought another grimace.

"Well, Pansy was the perfect fit, or seemed to be," he said, clearing his throat uncomfortable. "But, ah, circumstances weren't favorable."

"Meaning?" Daphne asked, arching a brow.

"Meaning," Draco said, flailing around for the right words, "that we were… ill-suited for each other. Not a very good match, personality-wise."

That, he thought, and the tiny, nearly inconsequential episode of her father casually threatening to kill his father. Which wasn't even to mention the note Draco had received that very morning adding his own name to the list of impending deaths if he didn't sort things out quickly.

Though, that wasn't particularly relevant, as the mismatched personality thing really answered the question in full.

"I don't know what to make of her," Daphne said thoughtfully, spotting Pansy in the crowd. She had just bumped into Hermione, who by then had consumed her pink drink and seemed to be seeking out another; the two were making strained, awkward conversation from a distance.

Strangely, he watched Hermione frown to herself—an expression he recognized as the look she got right before she discovered something, like an ingredient that needed to be added to a draught.

"I agree," Draco murmured to himself, watching Hermione draw a quill from her purse (which—of course she carried a quill in her purse) before scribbling something down on a napkin.

He didn't know what to make of her, either.
"Dull, isn't it?" Pansy said, obviously already a bit tipsy. "Nothing like a party with your ex and your constantly disappearing date to remind you how fleeting youth can be. God, beauty is a prison. Another drink?" she asked Hermione tangentially, then made a face. "Never mind, I'll get one myself. You know, for an American, Theo Nott makes an excellent Hanky Panky."

"A what?" Hermione asked, and Pansy scoffed.

"A Hanky Panky," she said, gesturing to the drink in Hermione's hand. "They've been charmed to match the party, obviously, and served in entirely the wrong glass, but it's definitely got amaro and vermouth. I've an excellent palette," she said with a lofty glance at Hermione, tongue slipping out to brush over her painted lips. "Very informed. Very partial to sweetness."

She paused, appearing to lose her train of thought, and then glanced back down at her champagne flute. "I'd no idea Americans even knew how to make it," she said, eyeing her glass and shrugging. "Well, bye, then," she said, wandering away, and Hermione stared after her for a moment with confusion, contemplating her comment before hurrying to write it down.

"Taking notes at a party?" came a dry voice behind her, and she jumped, startled to find Theo Nott standing idly at her side. "An odd choice of activity."

The accent was definitely American. She tried to place it, straining to identify the difference between the fast-talking split Manhattanite phonetics and the more Canadian-sounding regions from upstate, but it was difficult. She wasn't any sort of expert on the matter, though she figured she could be shortly if she drank enough Keep-Awake potion overnight.

"Just didn't want to forget something," she said, hurrying to tuck the napkin into her purse. "This is quite a party."

Theo made an incomprehensible sound of disagreement, somewhere between a 'tsk' and a 'mleh.' "It's fine," he said, taking a sip from his drink. "I've been to worse. No dead bodies at this one, at least."

Hermione blinked, jolted slightly by the reference. "Excuse me?"

"Funerals," Theo clarified, glancing at her. "I'm in what one might call the event planning business, if you hadn't gathered. Even the sad ones require libations," he informed her, turning his attention back to the crowd.

That, Hermione thought, was unnecessarily cryptic. "What exactly is your profession?"

"What's yours?" Theo countered.
"Touché, Hermione thought grudgingly.

"Just visiting," she said, and then, "I'm friends with Daphne."

"So am I," he replied.

"We've been friends for ages," she added.

"Funny," Theo said, taking another sip, "I don't remember seeing you there."

She drummed her fingers against her purse, caught somewhere between the necessity of lying and the absolute impossibility (but still, oddly tempting option) of telling the truth.

"Speaking of Daphne," she said, suddenly remembering what she'd been meaning to ask if she'd gotten the opportunity to speak to him, and he turned to look at her. "Are you two close?"

"Shouldn't you know that, friend of Daphne?" he asked, and she let out an impatient sigh.

"Fine," she said, "so we're... somewhat newer friends. Still, she's important to me." She paused, weighing his response, which was very close to nothing. "I suppose I can't help but wonder why you haven't proposed to her yourself, given how close you are."

He stiffened slightly, the pads of his fingers white against his glass.

"Daphne requires a certain kind of partner," he said, gesturing to where Draco and Daphne were dancing, "as I'm sure you might have guessed, given her current company."

"You mean the sort of partner who doesn't partake in criminal activity?" Hermione guessed, and Theo shot her an exhausted glance, as if he found her choice of retort immensely tiresome.

"You know Draco Malfoy, don't you?" he noted. "You have some sort of romantic history, by the sounds of it."

What a patently irrelevant comment, Hermione thought, bristling.

"You're not answering the question," she said.

"Aren't I?" Theo countered. "It's no difficult stretch. Tell me why you're not a proper fit for Draco Malfoy."

She blinked. "Excuse me? Who said I was—"

"Everyone," he said, "but also, no one, as such a thing would be highly uncouth to confess aloud, would it not?"

She stiffened. "Well, I never said I had any interest—"

"Correct, and neither did I," he cut in.

"But I wasn't—"

"I agree," he said with a smile. "All in all, you've made an excellent point. Miss Granger, was it?" he asked her, and she felt a sudden wave of dizziness.

"Yes," she said uncertainly, and Theo held out a hand for hers, bringing it to his lips and brushing them gently over her knuckles.
"Enjoy the party," he said, fetching another glass from a floating tray and placing it in her vacant hand. "Try not to miss anything," he advised, and then he turned away, wandering into the crowd.

oOo

"Hot out there, isn't it?"

Daphne spun to find Pansy standing expectantly behind her in the powder room, that same silken smile on her bordeaux-colored lips. She had gone full vamp that evening, her dark red gown and black evening gloves a stark and strident contrast to Daphne's lavender drop-waist dress. She strode over to stand beside Daphne, setting her purse down on the vanity and stumbling slightly, catching herself.

"Whoops," she said. "Drinks are a little strong this evening, aren't they?"

An innocent comment, only it wasn't. Heat rose in Daphne's cheek at their proximity, clearing her throat as she attempted to ignore the way Pansy was blatantly skating a gaze over her breasts.

"Don't," Daphne warned, leaning forward to apply a bit of powder to her nose, and Pansy slid a smile over her lips.

"I won't," she said. "Though I suspect you'll ask me soon enough."

Daphne scoffed lightly, glancing over her shoulder at Pansy with as much contempt as she could muster in her current state of general life confusion before returning her attention to her reflection.

"What on earth makes you say that?"

"Just a hunch," Pansy said, pulling a tube of lipstick from her purse. She wet her lips, biting softly, and then raised the lipstick to her mouth, applying a fresh coat with a tantalizing slowness. She was all sensuality all the time, Daphne thought, grimacing. Daphne might have been beautiful, but her beauty was born from perfection. It was designed and artfully curated to remain perfectly still, never disrupted. By contrast, there was something about Pansy that made her constantly in need of being unwrapped, laid bare, and it wreaked havoc on Daphne's insides.

"If," Daphne ventured with a shudder, and Pansy's dark brows rose with interest, quick to recognize the signs of an impending game. "If I were to ask," she managed to get out, "what would you offer me?"

"Hm." Pansy blotted lightly at her lipstick, turning to look at Daphne. "Well, I do have a distinct sense of fairness," she murmured, reaching out to toy with one of Daphne's curls, "so, given how things are, I'd tell you it was your turn to please me, Miss Greengrass."

Daphne swallowed. "And what pleasure would I possibly take from that?"

"Imagine how sweet I'd taste," she murmured, and Daphne fought a shiver as Pansy pulled away, leaning back against the vanity this time to angle them towards each other. "Though, of course, it's up to you. Perhaps you're tired of being everyone's little plaything," Pansy said with a shrug, turning to the mirror to adjust her lashes with the tip of her finger. "Maybe you'd like a little power for a change."

She slid a glance at Daphne, white teeth glinting as she smiled.
"You could make me beg for you," she said softly, "if you wanted."

Daphne's pulse raced in response, humming wildly in her veins.

She took a breath, then reached out, drawing her index finger slowly over the swells of Pansy's breasts; tracing the hem of her gown until the motion of Pansy's breath had ceased, withheld at Daphne's touch.

Daphne leaned forward, hand rising to Pansy's ivory throat and dancing up to her red lips, and watched Pansy's tongue drift out to brush over Daphne's fingertips.

"Then beg for me," Daphne advised, and precisely when Pansy staggered forward to touch her, she withdrew without a second glance, smiling to herself as she slipped out of the powder room and made her way back to Draco.

Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 18

Summary: The advent, continued.

"I asked her to have lunch with me today," Draco was ranting, pacing back and forth through his hotel suite, "and do you know what she said?"

"Tell me," Harry muttered disinterestedly, flipping the page in his newspaper.

"She said she'd love to, only she already has plans with Nott," Draco snapped, glaring at Harry as if he should intuit the necessary implications. When Harry did not—due largely to his continued lack of interest—Draco clarified (angrily, and with exasperation), "She's putting me off, Potter! Always making excuses, stringing me along—it's like she's waiting for something—"

"For you to tell her how you feel, by chance?" Harry prompted, and Draco sighed irritably.

"That's not how the world works, Potter, you can't simply run around talking about feelings and just—" He waved a hand, "Maniacally confessing things, and then hoping people don't think you're an absolute lunatic—"

"My mistake," Harry said, flipping another page. "Clearly you're not a lunatic."

"I'm running out of time," Draco said, rubbing furiously at his temple and returning to his pacing. "Maybe I should just give up," he said, throwing his hands in the air. "She's not the only woman who's beautiful and rich, is she?"

Harry considered it. "Well—"

"Sure, they wouldn't have precisely her money," Draco cut in, "or quite her looks, but surely there's another similarly gorgeous pureblood who's recently inherited one of the largest wizarding fortunes on the entire continent. Right?" he asked hopefully, and at Harry's look of skepticism, he threw himself down on the sofa with a groan.

"Fine—anyway," Draco muttered, suddenly incomprehensibly morose, "even if there were someone like that, I'd still only have a week, at best."

"Why?" Harry asked, and Draco huffed something from behind where he'd clapped his hands exhaustedly across his face. "Sorry," Harry muttered insincerely, rolling his eyes, "you'll have to speak the King's English, Malf—"

"Malfoy," Harry sighed, "are you being dramatic, or are you finally suffering your long-impending psychotic break?"

Draco, unsurprisingly, wasn't listening. "Nevermind that if I'm not lucky enough for a quick death," he bemoaned with a wail, "I certainly wouldn't last five minutes in Azkaban—"

"Why on earth would you go to Azk-"
"DON'T ASK STUPID QUESTIONS," Draco bellowed, storming furiously into his bedroom and slamming the door shut.

"My goodness," Harry said to himself, returning to his paper just as the bedroom door flew open again, revealing a wild-eyed Draco in the threshold.

"I apologize," Draco said. "I appear to have temporarily lost my head—"

"I can't imagine what would make you say that," Harry said, sipping his coffee.

"—and in light of these recent events," Draco cut in loudly, "by which I mean—"

"Your continued descent into madness," Harry supplied.

"—yes, my continued desc-" He broke off, glowering. "Shut up, Potter."

Harry shrugged, taking another sip. "Go on."

"I—" Draco stopped, clearly having lost his place in whatever mystifying mental plane he was attempting to navigate and glaring at Harry before continuing on. "The point is," he announced, "I have decided to confess my affections and propose marriage to Daphne Greengrass."

"Remember when you thought that would be insane?" Harry said, chuckling to himself. "Ah, memories."

That, it seemed, had no effect on Draco.

"PUT ON A COAT, POTTER," Draco said, "WE'RE GOING OUT."

"What, now?" Harry asked, doubtful. "Right now?"

"Right now," Draco confirmed, vigorously tossing Harry his hat. "Up you go, Potter, on your feet—"

"Malfoy," Harry sighed, having clearly miscalculated, "do you even know where to find her? I mean this… this is not precisely what I meant when I said you should tell her how you f-"

"Of course I know where to find her," Draco cut in, entirely aflame with energy again. "She's with Theo Nott, isn't she? You know him," he added, tossing that in as an afterthought. "Where would he be?"

"Uh," said Harry, whose previous experiences with Theo Nott had been less enlightening with regard to his habits and personality than they had been purely baffling on all fronts. "At home?" he guessed.

"At home it is," Draco trumpeted firmly, launching Harry's coat at him and vaulting himself to the door. "Well, then, are you coming?"

Harry, who was beginning to worry Draco had, in fact, lost his mind, picked up his coat with a groan and took one last heaping bite of his breakfast.

"Leggo," he mumbled through a mouthful of toast, gesturing Draco ahead as they made their way to the lifts of the Harkaway.
"You've been busy," Daphne noted when Theo opened the door to his suite. "I hardly saw you at all last night."

He waved her inside without a word. "Drink?"

"Yes, please," she said, setting down her purse, first, and then her coat, followed by her gloves. She always removed them one finger at a time, focusing on the activity like it was a meditation. "Gin?" she asked hopefully.

"Always," Theo confirmed, beckoning her into his sitting room and wandering in the direction of his liquors to mix her a martini. She smiled her appreciation, watching him do it with her usual fondness, then proceeded to deposit herself ungracefully in one of the leather chairs of his sitting room. "How goes your courtship?" he asked, glancing over his shoulder as he charmed the contents of the glass to stir.

She sighed, prettily pursing her lips. "Oh, I don't know," she said, reaching out for the drink once he'd offered it and taking a sip, as satisfied with the drink (like always) as she was visibly uncontent with her situation. "I don't at all know what to make of Draco Malfoy," she explained moodily. "He seems perfectly interested in me, but then I worry perhaps he's hiding something."

"Be careful," Theo warned, mixing himself a drink. "There's something off about him."

"Him," Daphne agreed, "and that Harry Potter fellow. Whom you've been spending quite a lot of time with, by the way," she noted, giving him a knowing glance. "Are you even attending to your usual business? He seems to be taking up all your time, as far as I can see."

"I like him," Theo said, falling into the seat beside her. "He's a terrible fit for his surroundings, and I find it helplessly entertaining."

"Mm," she said disapprovingly, "well, I hope he's not after your money, Theo. Can't be too careful these days, it seems," she sighed. "Impossible to tell who can be trusted or not."

He slid a glance at her, arching a brow. "True," he noted without inflection, and she frowned, rightfully suspicious.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

He drummed his fingers against the arm of his chair. "You're not telling me something."

"Of course I'm not not telling you something," Daphne countered. "What on earth would I not be telling you?"

"Well, I haven't the slightest idea," Theo informed her, "but I know I'm not as apprised as I should be."

She took a sip of her drink, biding her time. One of her more specialized magics, he thought.

"Is that some kind of accusation?" she asked eventually.

"Yes, it's an accusatory accusation," Theo replied. "I'm not the only one keeping secrets, Daphne."

She gave him the same impatient look she'd always given him when they were younger, before she'd learned what sort of woman she wanted to be.

"Theo," she began, about to launch into a lecture, when there came a loud, frantic knock at the door. She sighed, beckoning for him to answer. "We'll continue this in a moment," she warned, and Theo rose neutrally to his feet, conceding with a tilt of his head.

He had barely placed a finger on the handle before Draco Malfoy came bursting into his penthouse flat, glancing wildly around.

"Where is she?" Draco barked, and Theo glanced over his shoulder to find Harry standing there with a look of tired complacency, shaking his head.

"Sorry," Harry said.

"In there," Theo replied to Draco, before adding to Harry, "No need to apologize. I love a good unraveling."

Harry's mouth did its usual unwilling quirk of a smile, and after a moment of silent consideration, Theo added, "An odd day, isn't it?"

"In my experience, it's simply called a 'day,'" Harry replied.

"You make an excellent point," Theo agreed. "Drink? I have some that will leave your corporeal state unaltered," he clarified, "if you prefer to be hydrated rather than inebriated."

Harry nodded. "Please," he said, and they followed Draco into the sitting room, finding him on one knee before a startled Daphne.

"—know this will sound strange," he was saying, and Harry and Theo exchanged a glance of muted agreement, "but truly, Daphne Greengrass, I can't possibly stand another moment without you. Marry me," he announced, and Daphne's eyes widened, Theo's own comprehension suffering a tick of lag before the words sank in. "Allow me the honor of being your husband. I know it's unconventional," Draco added desperately, "but isn't that love, in the end? Defying convention?"

"Well, he's not wrong," Harry murmured.

Theo glanced at Harry to find that the other man was watching him for a reaction. He gave a little swallow, clearing his throat, and cast his gaze to his shoes.

"Draco, I—" Daphne looked at Theo, obviously flustered. "How… unexpected," she said uncertainly, and it occurred to Theo that Harry wasn't the only one waiting for his reaction.

Still, it wasn't as if it mattered. Daphne would accept, of course. They would wed, naturally, and they would have a beautiful blonde ceremony filled with weeping, old-monied aristocrats, and Theo would cater the reception.

"Yes," Daphne said slowly, and then nodded, cementing her answer. "Yes, Draco, of course I'll marry you—"

Immediately, Draco's pale features were flooded with relief.

"Marvelous," he said, glancing over his shoulder at Harry. "I told you, Potter, I knew what I was doing."

Daphne, meanwhile, continued to look to Theo, who held up his glass. Engagements were a straightforward enough affair; he'd certainly seen enough of them to know.

"May you have a long and prosperous marriage," he offered, toasting her from afar. "Shall we celebrate with a party this evening?"

He turned to find Harry looking curiously at him.

"Assuming you're still here, that is," Theo added in a low voice, meant for only Harry.

Across the room, Daphne's smile faltered, and Theo strode away, beginning the necessary preparations for the evening.

Oo

In her hotel room, Pansy opened a pale pink gift box, sliding the ribbon aside and finding with some confusion that it hadn't come with a note.

She opened the box, finding a bralette and pettipants that were identical to the ones Daphne had purchased, only these were black with green lace, the tiny embroidered roses a shade of red so deep they were nearly as dark as the silk.

"Interesting," Pansy mused, holding them up to her frame.

Yes, she thought.

These would suit her just fine.
Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 19

Well, fuck, thought Draco.

So he was engaged now. Magnificent. He'd have to be married shortly, and more than married, he'd have to make several large account withdrawals from his newly joint vault very soon. He shouldn't have spent so much time dragging his feet, he reminded himself, furious. He'd been distracted. Hermione Granger had distracted him, which was yet another reason he would need her to stay safely away until he'd placed the bloody ring on Daphne Greengrass' finger.

The thought of it, once more than appealing, sent a little shudder of apprehension up his spine. The stakes had always been high, but they were becoming increasingly difficult to stomach. He thought of the note he'd received and grimaced with revulsion.

Better work fast, Malfoy, or you won't wake to see 1926.

He'd been so lost in his own thoughts he scarcely noticed before bumping into someone on the street outside the Woolworth department store, nearly knocking them both into the horrific Christmas pageantry they were calling a display.

"Sorry, so sor- Oh."

"Oh," he unhappily agreed, glancing down to realize he'd once again collided with Hermione Granger. The cause, naturally, was that she was looking down and taking notes as she walked, reading a book in one hand and scribbling with a charmed quill in the other, and she looked up at him with the expression of distinct distraction he recalled as yet another version of her thinking face.

"Did you know there's an English Theodore Nott?" Hermione asked, glancing up at him, and Draco frowned, bemused. He attempted to step to the side, circumnavigating her, but she merely moved with him. "He's too old, though," she said, shaking her head before returning her attention to her notes. "Plus he died over a decade ago, so no point looking for him."

"That's all fine and good, Granger, but I hardly think I'm necessary for whatever this little project is," he informed her, taking another step that she again matched, "so if you could please remove yourself from my path—"

"What? I'm waiting for you to move," she said, bewildered. "I was… I thought—"

She glanced up, grimacing.

"Oh," she said, pointing upwards, and he winced, suddenly comprehending the issue even before he located the absurdly impractical sprig of mistletoe that was hanging from the Woolworth department store balcony. "This is a safety hazard," Hermione said indignantly, shaking her head and taking a step back that rapidly prompted Draco forward. "Someone should really inform the Office of Wizarding Decorations! Spelled mistletoe can be incredibly potent, and—"

"Granger, please," Draco muttered, rubbing furiously at his temple and hoping she'd do him the very great favor of neither lecturing him unnecessarily nor continuing to move. "I'm tired, I'm engaged, I haven't eaten in about four hours, I have a party to get to and I can't find my good socks —"

"Sorry, what?" she cut in, startled. "Did you just say you were engaged?"

"Yes," he said, bristling from a sudden wave of irritability, "to Daphne Greengrass, obviously, and while we're on the subject—"

"Oh." She blinked. "Did that… just happen?"

"What? Yes," Draco said, impatiently waving a hand. "I just left her to go make sure my tuxedo for the evening was properly starched—"

"Oh." Hermione's brow furrowed, all her motions coming to a halt. At least she was standing still now, Draco thought grudgingly, though he wasn't sure at all how to read the latest expression on her face. "Well, congratulations, I suppose," she told him, forcefully ridding herself of her hesitation. "You'll be very, um… blonde together," she determined, and lifted a hand for him to shake. "Congratulations, Malfoy—"

"Granger, for heaven's sake, it's mistletoe," Draco reminded her, swatting her hand away and gesturing upwards again. "If you ever want to move independently again, we'll have to simply kiss and get it over with—"

This, like all things he said, was clearly the wrong thing to say.

"I can't kiss you," she said, rapidly transitioning from astonished to aghast. "You're… you're betrothed to another woman!"

"It's not a romantic kiss," Draco informed her, rolling his eyes. "It's just a… greeting. Like a hello, goodbye, many happy returns, et cetera. You won't even notice," he advised.

"Well, what if you notice?" she retorted. "And besides, maybe I happen to keep my lips to myself for all felicitations!"

"My god, Granger, you're impossible," Draco snapped. "This doesn't have to be difficult—"

"Like hell it doesn't, Malfoy—"

"Listen," he growled, "just… close your eyes—"

"I will not close my eyes! That's wildly intimate!"

"Fine, then leave them open—"

"Well, now that's simply unnatural. Do you have to look at me like that?"

"Granger, for the utter love of—just come here," he snapped, taking hold of her shoulders and dropping his head to press his lips to hers for a quick pulse of pressure. "There," he said, suddenly furious for reasons he could neither immediately comprehend nor wish to process. "See? That's it. It's just a kiss."

"Malfoy," Hermione said, and he glared down at her.

"It's nothing," he told her. "We've kissed before, haven't we? And this was nothing like that."
"Malfoy, I'm just trying to—"

"That kiss was passionate," he informed her, breath quickening a little at the thought of it; at the way her hair had been glowing in the low light of the library when he'd let himself get caught up in the moment, foolishly asking her to meet him the following night. "That was spontaneous, unplanned. That kiss was undeniable, and this is just… this is nothing. Less than nothing," he feverishly assured her, and she nodded slowly, overlarge eyes wide. "This doesn't mean anything."

"Malfoy," she said, more quietly that time, and he shook his head.

"I'm just saying, whatever we had before, it's gone," he told her. "It can't happen now, and it has to be over. It has to be done, do you understand? Because I have to do this. I have to, and if I don't—"

"Malfoy—"

"—I couldn't even begin to tell you what would happen if I don't, and—"

"DRACO," Hermione cut in, exasperated, and that time he blinked, looking down at her. "I was just trying to tell you that you can let go of me now," she pointed out, removing his hands from her waist and taking a step back, pointedly unhindered.

Inexplicably, he felt distance come between them like a measurable loss; at least of certainty or conviction, if not of warmth, draining from his entire constitution.

"Oh," he said gruffly, pressing his mouth thin. "Well. Good, then."

"Yes," she said, frowning up at him. "Though, at the risk of upsetting you—I have to ask," she ventured, tentative, "if something's going on—"

"I have to go," Draco said flatly. "I'm going to be late to my own engagement party, so I have to leave. Goodbye," he said, but as he moved to stride pass her, she caught his arm.

"You know, it really was a great kiss," she offered softly, and then, tentatively, "Which is why you're right that we have to let it go."

He flinched, nodding, and then she released him.

"See you at the party," she said in passing, turning away, and he rounded on her with an exasperated sigh.

"What?" he barked, but she had already resumed her walking, returning her attention to her notes as he looked down at his watch to register that he was, in fact, going to be late.

_oOo_

"Well," Pansy said, sidling up to Daphne amid the crowd of Theo's basement speakeasy. Like usual, champagne was flowing freely from an enchanted fountain in the center of the room, and the ceiling had been charmed to fade effortlessly into a vaulted recreation of the night sky, stars glinting above them.

"Congratulations on your engagement," Pansy said innocently, "though I suppose you seem to be missing a fiancé."

Draco was late, it seemed. Which, Daphne, supposed, meant she was now free to explore alternate uses of her time. After all, any second she wasn't being admired in her silver beaded gown with its
"It’s a trifle inconvenient," Daphne said, taking a sip of her champagne and sliding Pansy a glance. "Strange that you don't seem terribly upset."

"Why would I be?" Pansy asked, shrugging. She was wearing a shift dress that flowed loosely against her curves, black beading layered delicately over a green silk that, unfortunately, left far too much to Daphne's imagination. "Should I be mourning Draco's loss?"

"Well, I'm sure no one would blame you if you did," Daphne replied, taking another sip and then turning to face Pansy. "Are you wearing them?" she asked neutrally, and Pansy's red lips parted to accommodate a darkened smile.

"Perhaps I should show you," she said, briefly drawing the neckline of her dress down low enough for Daphne to see a little flash of embroidered roses, and at the sight of it, Daphne's pulse quickened. From afar, she caught Theo's approaching form and hurriedly turned away, gesturing Pansy in the opposite direction.

"Let's go somewhere quiet," Daphne suggested, and after a moment's pause for a smug look of triumph, Pansy gestured for Daphne to lead.

"Somewhere quiet it is," she murmured in agreement, the words sending a bristle of anticipation up the line of Daphne's spine.
Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 20

"Have you seen Daphne?" Hermione asked Harry, catching his arm before he passed and glancing around for her again, frowning. "I can't find her anywhere."

Harry shook his head. "I haven't seen Pansy, either," he said, "though believe me, I'm not complaining."

"Well, rats," Hermione said, frowning. "I'd better go find her—Daphne, I mean," she clarified with a shudder, "not Pansy," and he shrugged.

"Best of luck," Harry called after her, but he seemed entirely distracted, his gaze falling on someone approaching from afar as Hermione hurried away, seeking out that familiar head of buoyant blonde curls.

She'd come to a conclusion; rather, a half-conclusion, really, after going through some of the records of the previous years' thefts. There was a distinguishable modus operandi, she'd noted, which was missing from at least one of her suspects—namely, Draco Malfoy. While the other thefts were relatively quick—timelines of only days, followed by near-gruesome violence— whoever was now targeting Daphne was most certainly taking their time about it.

After talking to Draco, Hermione felt more certain than ever that something was definitely wrong with him, but he was obviously not her primary suspect; suspicious, maybe, but not a threat. The marriage aside (which, Hermione reminded herself, she felt nothing about, and certainly no opposition) she did feel she owed it to Daphne, her client and her friend, to warn her of two things: firstly, that something dodgy was going on with Draco Malfoy, and more importantly, that someone else in her midst was probably far more dangerous.

"Let me guess," Harry said, catching sight of Theo approaching. "Walk with you?"

Theo permitted half a smile. "You're good, Potter," he said, and then pivoted away, taking Harry down the now-familiar path to his office. "It was getting a bit unbearable in there," he noted, charming the lock free and pushing open the door, beckoning Harry inside. "It's a wonder you haven't fled yet."

"Well, it seems now I'll have to stay for a wedding," Harry noted, gesturing in the general direction of the party. Theo, unhelpfully, had already busied himself with his liquors by then, pouring them both a drink while Harry eyed the now-familiar twining of the enchanted snakes on the green painted walls.

No point biding his time, he reminded himself. If Theo wasn't offering a response, he'd have to simply ask.

"Do you love her?" Harry posed abruptly, and Theo paused his motions, angling his head over his shoulder to scrutinize Harry from afar.
"Yes," he said, "in a way."

Well, there it was, Harry supposed. He dropped into one of Theo's chairs, crossing one leg over the other.

"What sort of way?" he asked.

"In a way that will always be paved with inequity." Theo replied without hesitation, turning with a drink in each hand. "Yours is practically juice," he offered tangentially, handing it to Harry with a grim smile.

Harry accepted the glass, watching as Theo made no opposition to Harry's fingers brushing his.

"You know, there's something strange about you," Harry said, observing as Theo carefully lowered himself into the seat beside him. "You have this air of trauma," he explained for the benefit of Theo's questioning glance, "though I can't decide if it's related to Daphne or not."

Theo swirled the liquid in his glass, crossing one leg over the other. "It's more of a musk," he said. "An eau de toilette, really." He took a sip of his drink, testing it, and then returned his attention to Harry. "Do you suspect me of something?"

"Yes," Harry said. "Many things."

It was a challenge, in a way, though one which Theo obviously planned to decline.

"You already got one secret," Theo pointed out. "Not a very good one, I might add, which is entirely your doing."

"Tell me another, then," Harry invited, and Theo chuckled into his glass.

"They're not free, you know."

Harry hadn't thought so, but he wasn't quite ready to relent. "Well," he attempted, "what would be an acceptable currency, then? In the event I have something to barter with," he amended, banking on Theo's inability to resist his own curiosity.

He wasn't wrong. "I'd say a secret of yours," Theo said thoughtfully, "but you don't strike me as the secretive type."

"I don't?" Harry asked, surprised.

Another sip. "Well, you just seem so very fond of your truths."

"Truths and secrets aren't precisely dissimilar, are they?"

"No, but secrets require lies. They're a prerequisite." Another sip, and a narrowed glance. "Not a secret, then. But perhaps an answer."

Close, Harry thought with a rush of anticipation. Very close.

"An answer to what?"

"A question."

"Yes," Harry said drily, "I'd gathered as much."
"A question I've already asked, actually," Theo said, rising abruptly to his feet and wandering over to his desk, running his fingers over the grains of the wood. "You might remember we made a wager," he said. "A day of your time in exchange for a secret of mine. Do you remember the terms?"

Did Harry remember? Of course he did. He ran through the little slivered pieces of that conversation one by one each night.

Still—"Something about whether I might want something from you," Harry said, pretending at a faulty recollection. "Is that it?" he asked, while he hoped Theo pretended not to be pleased.

"Yes, quite." Theo set the drink down on his desk, letting it float for a moment above the wood with a flutter of his fingers, and looked at Harry where he sat in the chair. "So," Theo beckoned, leaning against the desk. "An answer to the question, then."

Harry set his glass down on the floor, rising to his feet to slip his hands into his pockets. "Which is?"

"Did you decide what you want from me?" Theo asked, expectant.

Harry considered it a moment, taking a step in Theo's direction. "You know, it's the strangest thing," he said slowly, "but I have this entirely unhelpful desire to understand you."

Theo gave him a laughing glance. "Understand me, really?"

"Know you, at least," Harry corrected himself. "I think the understanding would come on its own, if I simply knew more about you."

Theo's gaze dropped again, his fingers tapping his glass in another moment of consideration.

"Like what?"

"That's the thing," Harry said. "I don't know where to start. I want to know what made you, I suppose. What broke you." He stepped forward, bringing himself to eye-level with Theo, and paused; just before their knees might have collided, or their various spheres of existence might have merged.

Harry stood on the border between himself and Theo, waiting for the audacity of invasion to come. Somewhere, some splintered versions of alternate lives and other Harrys took a breath and walked away, leaving only words to linger in the space between them.

But in this one, boldness had never failed him.

"I want to know what shape you took," Harry said softly, "before you rebuilt yourself into this."

He reached out, brushing his thumb over the expensive fabric of Theo's double-breasted tuxedo, and Theo didn't move. Beside him, his drink was long forgotten.

"That's not the answer," Theo said.

"Isn't it?" Harry countered.

"It's an answer," Theo corrected, "not the answer."

His gaze rose to Harry's again in that careful, measured way. There was that mint and tobacco smell, that hazy burn of whisky; something smoky and almost ashy, and still slightly sweet. If Theo moved, Harry thought, and if he had a sound, then he would sound like the rustle of silk. Theo would sound like tousled sheets against bare skin, and he would feel like the intactility of smoke, dissipating impassively from a cigar beside the bed.

"What do you want from me?" Theo asked him, and Harry, already emboldened beyond any reasonable state of fear, reached his hand up, stretching the tips of his fingers to run them lightly over Theo's mouth.

That answer, it seemed, was suitable enough.

"Is this what you wanted to hear?" Harry asked, and Theo's tongue slipped out, brushing across Harry's fingertips.

"Yes," he said, and Harry, who'd always known when he'd caught something valuable between his hands, leaned forward, pulling Theo in gruffly for something he only realized was a kiss when his mouth initiated the motions.

At first, it had only been some need to pull Theo closer; to be closer, to eradicate the gap between them, but when Theo's tongue had parted Harry's lips he'd understood that no, this wasn't about space. It was about contact, but not in any recognizable way. For all that he'd imagined holding Theo's fractured little pieces and re-living what sparsity he had of them, replaying them in his sleep, he had never imagined how much he would long for the taste of him.

Gin, vermouth, a little hint of bitters. Crushed mint, the vanishing smoke from an hour ago, and the heat of desperation.

"What do I taste like?" Harry rasped in Theo's mouth, and Theo's hands fell to Harry's hips, coiling tightly in the too-loose fabric of his trousers.

"Like honey and clove," Theo murmured back, pulling Harry's hips against his, "and the best fucking gin this side of the Atlantic."

Harry shivered, smoothing a hand through Theo's slicked-back hair.

"And the secret?" Harry asked, watching Theo struggle to drag himself to cognizance. "The one you owe me," he clarified, "in exchange for my answer."

Theo looked up through heavy lids, leaning his head back as Harry slid his thumb over the column of his throat, hooking a finger in the knot of Theo's tie.

A pulse of the clock.

Two, three.

Harry felt Theo's throat swell with hesitation, the motion of a swallow manifesting beneath his fingers.

"I've caused a lot of pain in my life," Theo said, "but I would never hurt you."

Harry tightened his grip, nails scraping across the pale blue veins beneath the skin of Theo's throat.

"That's your secret?" he asked neutrally. "Pain?"

Theo shrugged, one hand fisting Harry's shirt at the small of his back.

"Is it good enough?"
Good enough. What a question.

Pain, Harry didn't say, was the only secret he'd ever understood.

"Tell me another in the morning," Harry said, and brought Theo's mouth to his again, making plans for whatever would pass between them until the sun rose.
Summary: The advent, continued.

Nearly ten years of glamour charms and potions and skincare rituals (Vesuvian clay to detoxify imaginary layers of grimy city air; Alpine lavender essence to soothe any lingering blotchiness; Atlantic sea urchin venom to slow aging and brighten her color) had ensured Pansy would never look at herself and expect to find perfection. Instead, she had always thought of herself as a canvas to be improved. Here, a little narrower. Here a little warmer, a little less sallow. It was businesslike, a brisk and impersonal study of enhancement that she had never thought to question, and had never given a single moment of pause. Her father had always had clear, precise expectations; Pansy met them, or tried to. Questioning him had never seemed worth the time.

But here, twisted up in Daphne Greengrass' silken sheets, Pansy Parkinson looked down at the slivers of bare skin emerging from virginal white and saw nothing, not one thing, that she would change about the palette of the moment. On the floor, her new undergarments were discarded and left in ruin, and for once, Pansy didn't care to cover any part of herself. She slid one leg out from beneath the sheets, newly admiring the unblemished curve of her thigh. It had looked better while thrown over Daphne's narrow shoulders, but languidly outstretched in Daphne's bed was a close second.

She looked and looked and looked at herself until she'd drunk herself silly on looking, venturing into a combative state of pure intoxication.

"Your fiancé will be looking for you," she said, turning to Daphne, who didn't open her eyes.

Daphne's lips were parted, relaxed, and Pansy had been right about at least one thing when it came to her furtive imaginings of Daphne and Draco together. All the times that, amid her little perversions of envy-turned-desire, she'd considered them lying next to each other—glistening with a sheen of sweat, finally sated after making love (no, fucking) for hours—Pansy had never once thought Daphne would curl up in Draco's arms like a child needing to be soothed. No, Pansy thought enviously, Daphne was never shrunken or diminished; neither by the rapidly-vanishing phantom of the Draco in Pansy's imagination or by the reality of Pansy herself, who'd been the one on the tip of Daphne's tongue until the creeping tendrils of morning. Instead, Daphne lay still and detached, elongated and glorified by a spare ray of sun from the window, and one hand was stretched overhead to rest amid the undone waves of her golden hair.

In answer to Pansy's disruption by virtue of Draco's mention, Daphne was quiet for a moment, unwilling to break from her moment of peace.

"I'll see him shortly," she said, apparently deciding to focus on logistics. "An hour, perhaps two. He's joining me for breakfast." She turned her head, meeting Pansy's lingering gaze. "You realize this will have to end," she warned, apparently unconcerned with how she'd so ardently begged Pansy not to dream of stopping just hours prior. "When I sent the lingerie to you I had no idea Draco had planned to propose, but things are different now."

Different now. The thought plunged a tangible bitterness into Pansy's chest. "Why should your engagement change anything? It's not as if his existence makes any difference to me." She sat upright, suddenly bristled with irritation. "Anyway, it's not as if he doesn't deserve a bit of deception. He's used plenty on both of us already."

Daphne lifted her head, propping it on one arm. "Meaning what?"

It took a moment. A struggle, actually, not to laugh. "He thinks I don't know," Pansy said, turning over her shoulder to give Daphne a look of dry impassivity. "He passes it off, you know, or tries to. A little 'can you get this one, Pans?'" she mocked, "or some mention of forgetting his billfold, or perhaps having improper change—but I'm not stupid."

Daphne blinked. Blinked again.

"You don't think," she began, and faltered. "Is he… I mean, am I—"

_Is he using me_, Pansy guessed, and _am I a fool?_

Yes to both, she scoffed internally, rising from the sheets.

"That alleged fortune of Draco's is either recently drained or long-emptied," Pansy said matter-of-factly, feeling a rush of smugness; of cleverness, in fact, at what pretty little Daphne Greengrass had so simperingly failed to see. "I'm sure he thinks you'll be an asset in more ways than one."

The color had drained from Daphne's face. "But—"

"You deserve each other, you know. You're both liars, so have him," Pansy said flippantly. She'd always resorted to meanness when she was angry. She was malicious when hurt, always keen to leave a mark, just to prove she'd mattered enough to cause pain. "Enjoy your life together, Daphne Malfoy, and may you be satisfied with whatever comes." She hunted around for her slip, angrily unable to locate it amid her rising temper, which was rapidly devolving to shame. "Have your fortune," she muttered, chest and eyes and throat stinging, "and your precious standing in society, see if I c-"

She broke off as Daphne whipped her around, shoving her forcefully against the post of the ornate bed until Pansy's spine had aligned painfully with the wood. _Stand up straight_, Pansy heard her father snap in her mind's ear, _be beautiful, Pansy, be clever, be untouchable, and never, ever be weak—_

But just as quickly, Daphne's mouth was on the side of her neck, those pale pink fingernails digging into the skin of her thighs. Pansy arched her back with hopeless resignation, and Daphne's lips—which had long since sacrificed their crimson stain to the arousal between Pansy's legs—traveled down to close with patient delicacy around a nipple that, by the mournful tremor of Daphne's breathy sigh, may as well have been the very sweetness of heaven itself.

"Don't stop," Pansy said deliriously, or possibly didn't say, only thinking it with desperation. It was impossible by then to tell what was real and what wasn't, as Daphne's hips slid forward to graze hers with such indecent femininity it must have been a dream.

"I don't want to stop," Daphne confessed, and Pansy shivered, dragging two rebellious fingers down the line of Daphne's navel and letting them linger where they wished.

This morning, like last night, it would be Pansy's pleasure to see to it that Draco would have to wait.

_oOo_

Theo sat up with a start, displacing Harry's arm from his waist as he felt a brief, nearly imperceptible shift in his wards.

"Whasgoinon?" Harry managed to cough up, eyes blearily half-opened, and Theo shook his head, motioning Harry to silence.

"Stay here," Theo said, summoning his robe and letting the silk drape loosely around him as he slid on his trousers, foregoing underwear. He stretched upwards—robe undone, torso still bare, covering a yawn—and glanced down at a mussed and shirtless Harry, who had fallen rapidly back asleep.

Theo fought a smile, shaking his head. There were certainly worse ways to wake, he thought, briskly making his way to the source of the disruption.

His moment of contentment at having a sleeping Harry Potter in his bed faded the instant he caught a glimpse of curly brown hair, recognition settling in with a sour grimace.

"Let me guess," Theo said loudly, and Hermione Granger promptly jumped, whipping her wand behind her back to obscure what she'd so obviously been doing. "Someone let you in," he drawled facetiously, "it's a big suite, you got lost, et cetera, et cetera—and now you can't find your way out?"

She blinked.

Then—"Yes," she exhaled rapidly, giving him a sheepish half-smile that played unconvincingly at helplessness rather than guilt. "Yes, exactly that, I'm so sor-"

"Except," Theo cut in, "nobody let you in, because nobody works here. It's a big place, that's true enough," he permitted, observing with a knowing glance of impassivity when her expression faltered, "only most of it is inaccessible without my permission. You're not lost," he corrected her, folding his arms over his chest, "you're looking for something. So, what is it?"

Like Harry, Hermione wasn't a very good liar. Her eyes darted up, down, sideways; anywhere but him as she threw out, "I thought I might find Daphne here, but then—"

"She's not here. You have three questions," Theo said, and at that, Hermione stumbled warily into silence, finally acquiescing to the reality of having been caught. "You'll ask, I'll answer, you'll kindly leave me alone forever, I'll politely decline to call the police. Understood?" he prompted, leaving no room for compromise.

She looked suspicious, of course. Rightfully. Her gaze traveled over his careless state of undress, weighing him—and his lack of weapon, he guessed.

She must have reasoned, correctly, that it was the best offer she was going to get.

After a moment, "Fine."

"Ask, then," he beckoned, and she grimaced.

"What's this?" she said, gesturing to the door behind her. It was, in Theo's opinion, fairly obvious, though that was as good a place to start as any. Most likely, it was the thing she'd had every intention to find.

"A vault," Theo said.

He half-hoped she'd mindlessly echo A vault? And he'd say Yes, a vault, and she'd say What kind of vault? and he'd say A money one and then they'd be done here, and she could leave, and he could continue the morning the way it had started—with the man sleeping peacefully in his bed.

Whatever he hoped, though, he certainly expected more from her, and she didn't disappoint.

"Most people keep their money in banks," she said.

"Not a question," he replied.

"No, it's not," she agreed. "It's a statement. A conversation, almost," she attempted.

Her optimism was charmingly ineffective.

"I don't converse with people who break my blood wards and sneak into my suite," Theo said.

To her credit, she grimaced. "Fair." She glanced over her shoulder at the vault's door, then back at him. "Fine, I'll bite," she said, and he gestured; get it over with, I don't have all day, that question's as good as any. "Why do you keep your wealth in a vault in your home instead of in a bank?"

"I'm not overly fond of goblins," he replied.

He considered that an evasive enough response, only to his discomfort, her brow furrowed.

"Goblins," she echoed curiously, heightening his agitation, "are specific to Gringotts. Aren't they?" she asked, tilting her head with expectancy.

Ah, so he'd underestimated her. Wonderful, Theo thought. The sensation of surprise had for so long been so very difficult to come by and now here he was, surprised twice in less than a day.

"I was making a reference I knew you'd understand," he said smoothly. "You're obviously British, aren't you? I don't expect you to know Manhattan's idiosyncrasies."

"How accommodating of you," Hermione said, which sounded more like, I'm not stupid.

"I think myself a welcoming host," he replied, sharpening his voice with a hint of, Careful, you only have one question left.

She smiled politely. He smiled back.

"You know, it's interesting," she mused, "I've found almost no public records for you. No birth certificate, no certificates of schooling, no records of anything at all, really. In fact, it's almost as if—"

"Almost as if I've never mattered?" Theo guessed, leaning against a wall. "Tragic, I agree."

"Almost as if they've been completely wiped clean, actually," Hermione said neutrally, and forced another smile. "Isn't that interesting?"

This time, her tone said, Caught you.

He smiled broadly, replying, With what?

"There's another Theodore Nott," she informed him. "He's dead."

"Pity," said Theo.
"The timing is also interesting," she added. "What records you do have came after his death—did you know that?"

He supposed he could have considered that her final question and sent her out the door with a lesson on how not to be so careless, but as it turned out, he was enjoying himself. She, on the other hand, did not appear to care for his demurrals, which only contributed further to his lack of urgency.

"No," Theo said, and added, "I do tend to carry an umbrella, though, as one never knows when it's going to rain."

Behind him, he heard the quiet padding of footsteps. Something inside him braced, but Hermione, who hadn't noticed, had already abandoned her patience with their game.

"One more question," she said, and he nodded as if to say, If you must. "Say I were accusing you of something. Murder, perhaps," she suggested, and Theo schooled his expression, a long-practiced gift of weighing a response. "Say I thought you were a killer," Hermione went on, "and a thief. Say I believed you responsible for terrible atrocities, and then say, hypothetically, I asked you one thing: Why?"

She paused, and then, "What would you say to me?"

In that precise moment, Theo Nott was conscious of two things.

One was the truth, which Hermione Granger obviously didn't have. If she did, she wouldn't be speaking in hypotheticals.

The second was the man he was certain stood listening somewhere behind them.

"I would say," Theo replied carefully, "that underneath all the wealth, perhaps I've always been nothing. That if ever someone stripped everything away," he said, waving a hand around his penthouse with its spectacular view of New York's wizarding splendor, "they would eventually find that nothing at all would be left in its place."

Hermione's brow furrowed. "Is that all?"

"That," Theo conceded, "and the fact that there is nothing more terrifying than the prospect of your own emptiness."

He paused, letting the statement settle between them, and then, "Would that answer your question, hypothetically?"

She opened her mouth. Closed it.

Opened it again, and narrowed her eyes.

"Is that true?" eventually escaped her.

"No real way to tell," slipped carelessly from him, and then, "But either way, you've gotten what you came for."

He had her there, and they both knew it. She nodded, and then she left, her footsteps carrying down the hall as Theo turned to find the corridor vacant, the unexpected presence in the room suddenly gone.
It struck Harry as more than a little ironic that he was currently pacing the floor of Theo's bedroom precisely the same way Draco had wandered their shared hotel suite the morning prior. Harry's devolution, however, had been the result of his helpless struggle to figure out what to say and how to say it, as the words you're lying, I know you're lying, I know the shape of your mouth when you lie and I know that your voice only shakes when you're telling the truth had a tendency to come off cold, perhaps even angry. He had nearly perfected the right Tone and Cadence and Pattern of Speech (proper nouns for a Proper Undertaking) when he heard Theo's voice echo through the suite again, spearing temporarily through Harry's crisis of confidence.

"You can't be serious!" Theo suddenly snapped, and Harry blinked, leaning helplessly towards the slivered vacancy of the door. "No, listen to me, I've had it. This has gone too far, much too far—"

Harry frowned, waiting, but whoever Theo was speaking to clearly had more presence of mind than to match his volume. Could it have been Hermione still? No, Harry was sure she'd left at least ten minutes ago, though he hadn't been able to sort out why she'd been digging into Theo's background to begin with. What concern was Theo of hers?

"—not doing it again!"

Harry supposed, given his lack of alternate options, he should probably lend some thought to whether or not Hermione could have been right about her suspicions. He tried to think of whether he'd ever gleaned any hint of wrongdoing from Theo—which he most certainly had, several times over. Was it possible he'd dismissed something serious? Theo's air of quiet violence had been the very first thing Harry had noticed about him, so perhaps it wasn't a dismissal. But what if that violence wasn't quiet so much as strategically suppressed?

"Bloody Christ, are you listening to yourself—"

Harry frowned, leaning closer. He could have sworn he'd heard the slip of an English accent, only it was definitely still Theo's voice. Harry had never heard it so angry; more often Theo was contained, always cool, sometimes chilled. The temperature of his present rage sounded strange on him, cloaking him in something that was both more human, and less.

"—will not calm down. Haven't my hands been dirtied enough?"

At this point, Harry was forced to acknowledge that whatever was happening in his head was far less interesting than the conversation taking place outside Theo's bedroom. He stepped closer to the door, careful not to let the beams creak beneath him.

There was a muffle of a response to Theo, the voice unidentifiable at a distance. Harry held his breath, straining to hear, but Theo's anger had suddenly dissipated as he said, "Leave him out of it."

Muffled sound, and then, "I'm serious."
More muffled sound, a light scoff, and then, to Harry's alarm, footsteps.

He launched himself backwards, scrambling for the wand in the pocket of his trousers before yanking the covers over him, feigning sleep.

"Stop," was Theo's bristled opening, and Harry cracked one eye, his fingers still tight around his wand. "I know you're not asleep," Theo muttered, letting his robe fall from his shoulders as he rubbed wearily at his temple, every fibrous grain of muscle tensed beneath the lean expanse of his back.

Harry was still watching silently as Theo's rigid stalking around the room fell to a sudden halt. He cast a swift glance over his shoulder, ascertaining Harry's position in the room, and turned away.

"Thought you'd left," Theo said, the sound of the words so quietly miserable Harry was sure he'd half-imagined them.

In an instant, the speech Harry had so intentionally rehearsed fell away from his lips, leaving something inadvisably bare in their place. "You can tell me your secrets," he said without preamble —without forethought or even a measly hint of guile—but it was only after he said it that he realized he meant it.

Harry sat up, abandoning the sheets behind him; leaving behind his wand and his self-preservation and reaching for Theo's hand. On a whim, he pressed his lips to the scars on Theo's knuckles: Tell me your sins, let me count them with you, let me fall asleep cradled in the palms of your immoral hands. Give me your troubles, grant me the filth of your lies, permit me the purity of your terrors, let me carry them for you to the ends of the earth.

Tell me your secrets and I will bless you for them, Harry's lips said to Theo's fingers, and he felt the little cracklings of Theo beginning to give way, shedding his scales of inequity.

"It started," Theo said, "with my father. The elder Theodore Nott. The promises I've had to make, they've been because of him." A pause, and then, "I bound myself to a lifetime of lies, all to rid myself of him. Every time I get close, I—"

He broke off, mouth tightening.

Then, "The horizon recedes, you know," he murmured. "It falls back as you approach it."

Harry shivered helplessly, as vulnerable and exposed as Theo had become, purely by virtue of listening. This was the distinction about Theo's real voice, Harry thought. He'd considered it dry, low, measured, but in reality, it was rehearsed. This, the privilege of an untold story, turned Theo's voice nearly melodic, all with an echo of childhood Yorkshire.

Harry pulled Theo close, lips finding a home in the bend of his shoulder.

It started with my father, Theo had said.

"Where did it end?" Harry asked, and Theo let his head fall back.

"It hasn't," Theo said, eyes falling shut. "And perhaps it never will."

oOo

"Come in," came the disgruntled voice behind the door, followed by the restless casting of an unlatching charm. "Potter's not here, Pansy," Draco added from where he was standing across the room at the window, pressing two fingers to the bridge of his nose and raising a glass of whisky to his lips. "Haven't the slightest idea where he's been all night, either—"

Hermione cleared her throat. "Not Pansy," she said, attempting a gentle interruption, though Draco still whipped around with a start. "Sorry," she hurried to say, holding her hands up to assure him she hadn't come to fight. "I just… needed to tell you something."

His eyes narrowed a little, still guarded, but he nodded slowly. "Sit," he suggested somewhat gruffly, beckoning her to the sofa of his hotel suite, but she hesitated.

"I think it's better if I just get it out," she said, and he shrugged, apparently indifferent. He perched on the arm of the sofa, waiting, and she inhaled swiftly, wondering where to start.

"So," she said, opting, aptly, to begin at the beginning, "the truth is I'm an auror. Sort of. Conditionally." Her cheeks burned slightly at the sight of Draco blinking with confusion, unreadable save for his bemusement. "I… work for MACUSA. Well, I'm sort of on loan from the Ministry," she hastily explained, "but, you know, they didn't have room for me, so I worked out a deal to take the auror exam—anyway, it's a long story." She swallowed, adding, "I've finagled a bit of a deal to make sure they hire me back in London, but the point is—"

"Good for you," Draco cut in neutrally, taking a sip, and Hermione paused, startled by the absence of irony in his tone. She replayed it, altering the pitch in her mind, but even then, his expression—specifically, the fact that it lacked any noticeable scorn—was bewildering. "What?" he asked, noticing her tepid glance of doubt. "You're smart. Talented. Makes sense." He shrugged. "Besides, it explains things, doesn't it? Your interest in me."

She blinked. "Sorry, what?"

"Well, all this following me around you've been doing. Your little curiosities about my well-being and all that. Makes a bit more sense that it's purely professional," he said with another sip, "doesn't it?"

It crossed her mind that perhaps he'd intended to imply something else, but she didn't dare the imbecilic optimism of imagining what.

"Oh, um—yes." She cleared her throat. "Anyway," she continued briskly, "the point is that I've been investigating possible subjects of interest with regard to the recent pureblood thefts, and—"

Draco's face drained slightly, the hand holding the glass of whisky giving the briefest, nearly imperceptible tremor. "You know, then?"

That, she thought with a frown, was not the response she'd been expecting.

"I know Daphne's a target," Hermione confirmed slowly, "and I know something's gone terribly wrong with you, but I wasn't—"

"It's my father," Draco interrupted, rising so sharply to his feet she nearly collided with him again. "He made a few bad investments with company money. More than a few," he corrected himself, shaking his head with a grimace. "He fell in with some goblins to try to cover his tracks, now he has personal debt he can't pay off. I came to New York to see about a loan, but no one will lend to us now—and at this point," Draco exhaled, returning to the same motion of suppressing what looked like a building tension headache, "my failure to find a suitable solution means my neck is on the line. My parents might be foolish enough to think if I come home we can outrun goblin debt forever, but I'm certainly not." He shuddered, flinching. "And now, if I don't marry Daphne, we'll
"Malfoy," Hermione said with concern, reaching impulsively for him, and he shook his head.

"Don't you see?" he asked her, grey gaze finding hers in a way that sent a terrible, euphoric shiver up her spine. "It was you I wanted all along," he confessed, diminishing her to silence as the admission continued pouring out of him, "but then I found out the company was failing. I needed Pansy's money, but then once Parkinson knew my father was in debt—I don't know how," he said, a bit frantic in his distress. "But somehow, he managed to blacklist us from every financial institution—"

"Malfoy, I didn't mean—"

"So what was merely debt became threats, and now," Draco exhaled weightily, shaking his head. "Now that it's much too late, I'm realizing what a fool I was. I've been trying so hard for so long to save the money," he told her, suddenly snatching her hand up with his, "and only now that I've risked my life to save it does it finally make sense—it means nothing. It never did."

He leaned forward, desperate, and Hermione, helpless, leaned against him, rapidly losing track of why she'd come.

"I don't expect you to forgive me," Draco murmured in her ear, "but I wish you would. I just want you to know, Granger, before I lose my chance to say it, that the only time I ever felt worth anything at all were those quiet evenings alone in the library with you. It was always you," he said, obviously pained, "and now—"

His admission, something Hermione had been adamantly denying that she'd ever wanted, was suddenly unbearable. It was impossible, and so she forced herself to say something, anything, just to make it stop.

"Theo," Hermione blurted, and Draco blinked, stepping back.

"Excuse me?" he demanded, indignant. "I understand it's a difficult moment, Granger, but I would hope you'd recall I'm Draco—"

"I think it's Theo," Hermione explained, chewing her lip. "I was on my way to tell Daphne, but I stopped to tell you first, because…" She broke off, swallowing. "Because, well, I wanted to make sure you were going to be well, Draco. Because despite everything—despite my job," she said, frustrated, "and despite my client, and my obligations—it was you I thought of."

Her gaze fell to her hands, unable to meet his.

"It's you I worry about, Draco, constantly. It's you I think about, even when I shouldn't. It's you that I—" She broke off, cheeks hot with shame. "It's you that I miss," she murmured in confession, and he let out a strangled sigh that was both frustration and relief, tugging her firmly into his arms.

"I wish I'd known," he said hoarsely, his lips so close to her ear she could only imagine them other places; lingering on her skin somewhere, lit by the patient flicker of a candle. "I wish I'd had any idea, Hermione, and I might have made other choices—"

"You knew," she told him, aching sharply at the implausibility of his ignorance. "I agreed to meet you, didn't I? I was ready to throw everything away for you, Draco, and then when you weren't there—"

He shook his head. "Not that. That's not what I meant. What I meant," he said, taking her hand a second time, "is that I wish I'd known how little the money really mattered. I wish I'd been less afraid," he murmured, brushing his lips to the tips of her fingers as she felt her pulse stammer in her chest, torn between don't, you can't, I can't and please, yes, this, please. "Underneath the wealth I was nothing," he said, smoothing his thumb over the lines of her palm, "and it terrified me, knowing how insignificant I could be, but with you—"

He tilted her chin up, nose grazing hers, and she felt her eyes flutter shut, utterly spellbound.

"I wish I'd known that fear could be so easily undone by one touch from you," he said, the words tender and tempting on her lips, and all at once, Hermione was hazily aware that she could kiss him. It wasn't inconceivable; he was close enough—so very, perilously close—and she had tasted him before and liked it, wanted it, craved it; had found that all his thorns and too-sharp angles could melt to softness in her hands. If she kissed him now, she thought deliriously, perhaps everything would be different. Maybe they'd both shed their skins and become something new, something unmade and unmasked and unmastered, and he wouldn't have to marry another woman for something as paltry as money; something as superficial, as madness-inducing, as meager and false as money, or the pale glitters of something as deceptive as gold.

At the thought—Draco standing so close to her now that she could fill the vacancy in his lungs with the breath from her own lips—Hermione's eyes snapped open, something registering sharply in her mind.

"I know who it is," she said suddenly, and Draco blinked, stepping back with astonishment as she tore out of his arms. "I know who did this," she half-shouted at him, "and I have to do something, but just… just wait here, Draco, I can fix this for you, I promise—"

"Granger," he said, aghast with puzzlement. "What are you—"

But she was already gone, not even bothering to shut the door behind her.

She had to find Harry Potter before it was too late.

a/n: They'll be a little longer until we reach the end, hope you don't mind. Excited to bring you the last two days! Also, my favorite line from the story is in this chapter. Just a fun fact.
"I know everything," Hermione said, her wand aimed between Theo's shadowed eyes as she shoved Harry behind her, keeping him back. "Harry told me the whole story. I know what you've done, and it's over, Theo." She steadied her wand, and then, again, "It's over."

Theo held out his hands, emptied and spent, and glanced at Harry, whose pulse quickened.

"Well," Theo said, speaking to Harry instead of Hermione, "are you sure about this, then?"

Harry dug his nails into his palms, forcing certainty into them.

"It ends here," he confirmed, and when the green light left Hermione's wand, Harry didn't close his eyes; didn't blink, determined instead not to let his gaze fall from Theo's narrow form as he dropped, weightless and insubstantial, to land beneath the slithering patterns of emerald-colored snakes.

"Tell me you've heard," Pansy said, rushing into Daphne's suite and hastily nudging aside the little fishnet veil concealing one dark eye. She knew she shouldn't be barging into Daphne's flat like this, but given everything, she couldn't prevent herself from launching directly to the Harkaway from where she'd been shopping once Draco had sent her an owl. "You have, haven't you? It's terrible, truly, and to think, all this time, none of us had any idea—"

"What is it?" Daphne asked, shutting the door behind her with bemusement and an airy sense of disruption. "Pansy, you look an absolute fright, what's happened?"

That, Pansy thought, was an impossible reaction. She gaped at Daphne for a moment before blurting, "You really haven't heard?"

"Pansy," Daphne sighed, primly impatient, "really, I hate to be rude, but you'll just have to speed this along, I have plans with—"

"It's Theo Nott," Pansy said, chewing her lip; she hadn't expected to be the one to deliver the news and immediately loathed that she hadn't waited long enough to let the aurors precede her. "I hate to be the one to say this, Daphne, but…"

She trailed off, reticent. The moment Theo's name had entered the conversation, Daphne had gone rigidly still.

"Tell me," Daphne said flatly, pretty mouth lined with dread. "Tell me now."

"He's—" Pansy swallowed. "He's dead, Daphne," she said quietly, and in response, Daphne's breath seemed to catch in her chest, frozen. "They caught him—the aurors, they came with a warrant. He resisted arrest and they killed him on the spot."

Daphne blinked.

Blinked again.

Turned pale, and then, abruptly, exhaled sharply.

"Well, then," Daphne said, suddenly coltish and unsteady. "I'm going to need a favor."

oOo

Is it done?

Three words over two hours ago, and all he needed was one more. Draco was beginning to think he'd done permanent damage to the floors of his hotel suite from the incessant pacing, but he stopped the moment he saw the owl.

He hurried to reach the window, scrambling for the letter attached to its leg. "Come on, come on," he muttered to himself in some sort of secular prayer, and then he unrolled the little scrap of parchment, hands shaking as he went.

Twenty-hour hours for confirmation of payment. Then it's done.

Then, as if it were a joke between them, a little sign-off: You got lucky, Malfoy.

Draco exhaled his bitter relief, falling back against the sofa cushions. He looked out his window to watch snow falling, Christmas carols echoing somberly in the background of his thoughts. Tomorrow would be Christmas morning, and perhaps then he might finally be free.

All there was left to do was wait.

oOo

Theo Nott had been born richer than the devil and he'd never given two fucks about it. Privilege, after all, didn't amount to much when its ungodly fingers come intertwined with isolation and violence.

Theodore Nott, named for his father, was born in the middle of winter and sometimes wondered if the snowy chill had never really left his soul. His mother had died in childbirth—a strange thing, considering all the money and all the magic and yet nothing they had could save her—and his father had never forgiven him for it. How dare he deign to resemble her, after all? It was as though Theo had called on Death himself just to steal her lovely features and claim them for his own. He had Aria Nott's coloring, her build, her profile; the one thing his father had provided were the eyes, cold and luminescent. There was distance in them, a command: Take a step back.

Don't get close to a Nott, others of the elder Sacred Twenty-Eight would say with a laugh. Call it pain, if you must, but it is a horror to see—which is perhaps why none had known a Theodore Junior ever existed. The elder Nott had made sure no one had ever seen him, and in the end, that had been his father's greatest favor: anonymity, by virtue of neglect.

Theo saw death for the first time when he was standing over his father's body, curiously analyzing the glassy quality that had taken over the elder Theodore Nott's eyes. Nott Sr had been a hard man, and death did not suit him; the man who'd come to the house seemed to agree, his face contorted softly in consummate displeasure.
"I didn't do it," Theo said quickly, straightening and crossing his arms over his chest.

"No," Parkinson agreed, his lips pursed. "Though I imagine that has less to do with your mercy than it does with his faulty diet."

Theo forced a shrug, intent on showmanship, even at thirteen. "I'd have done better work, I think," he commented, looking down again at the dark green eyes that were so precisely like his own.

"Well, there is elegance in simplicity," Parkinson countered. "To be killed by a heart is a rather poetic thing, in the end."

True enough; the irony, Theo thought, was that he hadn't known his father possessed one.

"Should I run?" Theo asked, after perhaps a minute of silence.

"Run?" Parkinson echoed, doubtful. "What for?"

"No family," Theo supplied, shrugging. "I'll go to some other prick. You know."

"I do know," Parkinson agreed, and for the first time he seemed to regard Theo with purposeful consideration. "Yes," he mused thoughtfully, nodding his assent. "I suppose you could run." He paused, then sighed, eyeing Theo carefully. "You're trouble, aren't you?" he commented tangentially.

Not entirely inaccurate, Theo thought, though he didn't appreciate the oversimplification. There was a certain inelegance to the notion that this man, standing so disinterestedly over Nott Sr's unmoving body, would see Theo no differently than his brute of a father had done.

"So?" Theo posed, his fists clenched.

"So," Parkinson supplied carefully, "I think it's best if I keep an eye on you. I have a partner," he explained, unbuttoning his jacket as he bent to scrutinize Nott Sr, fingers hovering above the dead man's face to solemnly shut his eyes. "Greengrass," he continued, rising to his feet. "In New York. We have something of a joint venture, and perhaps you could be of use."

"Why?" Theo returned, vehement in his confusion. He knew his face had taken on that angry twist of his, the one his old governess had called deeply unsettling, Nott, you should really tighten the reins before he'd woken to find her gone and himself ostensibly too old for a governess. "I don't need your help."

"Actually," Parkinson replied, tugging at a pair of formal leather gloves, "if you truly wish to leave this behind you, then I rather think you do."

Loan shark, Theo later learned, was the word for his new employer, who'd done something truly ingenious: he'd taken his family vault, his good name, and his spotless record and he'd used them as a shield to keep himself from even a shameful speck of suspicion, doubling, tripling, perhaps more of what had been his ancestral wealth. This, Theo discovered, was his first lesson about how money begot money, which would remain true until the end.

Theo would also come to learn that Greengrass was Parkinson's partner in what was less a true business than an oligarchy of questionable activity. It was from Viridian Greengrass that Theo learned the business of bootlegging, the craft of violence, the talent of concealing one's identity ("Lose the accent," Viridian had said when they first met, and so Theo had promptly abandoned it) and the delicate art of leading two lives: one with his two daughters upstate, and the other amid seedier circles in Manhattan.
Of the two Greengrass daughters, the important one (in Theo's mind) was a pretty, spirited girl named Daphne who grew into a lovely teenager and from there a radiant, beautiful woman. Daphne, who'd nursed Theo's cuts and bruises and never asked what errands he'd just returned from on behalf of her father. Daphne, who'd eventually kissed his lips and touched his heart and told him it'll be okay, Theo, one day it'll just be us, and you won't have to answer to anyone.

When they were seventeen, Theo tied a piece of string around Daphne's finger and asked her to marry him. "I'll make us some money," he promised her, "and then you and I can have a little house near the ocean."

"You'd better," she said, taking his face between her silken palms and smiling.

It became a game between them. When we're grown, when we're rich, when we're married. When we have a set of twins and a white picket fence, a dog and a cat and an icebox to keep our drinks cold. When I can drape you in pearls and you'll fix my cuffs as I walk out the door, kissing my cheek and wishing me luck at the office.

But then Greengrass had died unexpectedly, and it had been Theo, hoping for an inheritance for his fine labor, who had discovered the truth: Viridian Greengrass had died without a cent to his name, and the goblins had come shortly after.

"Parkinson is owed," they said.

It turned out the partners had not split their wealth equally—and perhaps hardly been partners at all, seeing that Parkinson had considered Greengrass' 'little loans here and there' to be liabilities requiring goblin oversight. More than one wealthy pureblood had indebted themselves unwisely to goblins, and Theo had known it well enough, having observed it many times himself. The 'thefts,' as they were being called by wizarding officials, were little more than episodes of recompense for fortunes already drained. In the end, it seemed Theo had watched more closely than his employer.

The options, as the goblins informed Theo and Daphne, were either payment for restitution, prison for Greengrass' (and consequently, Theo's) illegalities, or death—which was, presumably, for fun.

"Perhaps option one," Theo suggested blithely, and the goblins shrugged.

"You have until January first to pay the debts belonging to Viridian Greengrass," they said, pretending at sympathy for Greengrass' grieving daughter, and then they disappeared, leaving behind a ticking clock and a sudden wrench in Daphne and Theo's plans.

"I'll have to marry someone," Daphne whispered to Theo, watching with pale-faced horror as they lowered her father into the ground. Astoria had already done it, but Daphne, as Theo had always privately known, wouldn't be satisfied with a simple house upstate. "Someone with money, status, someone who can keep us afloat a little longer—"

"But I can do it," Theo said, objecting, naturally, to the idea of her being on someone else's arm. "I can take over your father's businesses. Hell, I can run the bootlegging myself, I certainly know enough about it—"

She'd soothed him with a touch, like always. She thought he'd come from nothing, an orphan beholden to her father and possessing nothing of his own, and he'd been happy to let her believe it. She, on the other hand, had grown accustomed to a certain kind of prestige. Her father had drilled it into his favorite daughter's head that her lifestyle should rival any pureblooded heiress from London, Parkinson's own daughter included.
"It'll have to be someone else," Daphne said gently, and then, as if the thought would cheer him, "We could always kill him, you know, when we're done. It's what that Zabini woman did in London."

She'd inherited more than purely debts from her father. "Sure," Theo had said, and then she'd set about making herself the Daphne Greengrass of Manhattan, socialite extraordinaire.

The moment they arrived, Draco Malfoy became the obvious choice. Theo, in the meantime, was responsible for maintaining the facade of wealth that would afford him and Daphne their eventual life together, or so he'd believed. Regardless, the pretense came naturally. All he'd ever done for a lifetime was pretend.

Daphne, meanwhile, was out of her element. She didn't look it, of course, but they argued constantly about what should be done to ensure they'd selected the right mark. The past month, too, had been an issue. Daphne had fallen in love not with Draco, but with adoration, with being the deceitful darling of wizarding society, at the same time that Theo had grown disenchanted with his own role. He was restless, tired of lying; the Daphne he'd known seemed to have disappeared entirely beneath the silks and jewels he was bankrolling, and their combined attempts to trap money with money (the lesson he'd never forgotten from his employers) barely scratched the surface of repaying her father's debts. She was spending too much, he said when she selected the alcohols and commanded his parties. He was too stiff, she replied, too sulky, no fun at all, and didn't he realize this was all for them?

It wasn't, he knew, and then the final blow.

"You'll need to marry Pansy," Daphne said, hastily scraping together a plot once it was revealed their mark was empty, but Theo, who knew Daphne had strayed as irreversibly as he had strayed, had long since run out of patience. "Draco's a dead end, but Pansy—"

"You can't be serious!" Theo had snapped, and Daphne opened her mouth to argue, but by then, he couldn't stand to hear it. "No, listen to me, I've had it. This has gone too far, much too far—"

"Calm down," Daphne hissed, her voice barely above a whisper. "Theo, listen to me, it won't be hard. She's desperate, and I can convince her—I can talk her into it, I promise, she listens to me—"

"You don't understand, Daphne—we've been through enough of this already," Theo gritted through his teeth, "and I'm not doing it again!"

But she wasn't listening; she hadn't been for months. "We'll have to kill her father if it's going to be worth it," Daphne said, prompting Theo to gape at her in reply.

"Bloody Christ, are you listening to yourself—"

"Well, he controls her allowance, Hermione said so herself—"

"Don't get me started on the auror," he cut in, grumbling. "She's onto me already. I wouldn't be surprised if she uncovers me sooner rather than later, just wait—"

"Calm down, Theo—"

"I will not calm down. Haven't my hands been dirtied enough?"

Suddenly, the whole thing was unbearable, and Daphne seemed to know it. Something between them that had been showing cracks in the foundation for months had finally broken, shattering over their heads.
"Is this because of Harry?" Daphne asked him, both hard and soft in the solemnity of her anger. "You would have done anything for me, Theo, before him."

"Leave him out of it."

"I know you, Theo," she pressed. "I know the way you look when you're in love. It's the way you used to look at me, isn't it?"

"I'm serious," Theo said, pained. "Stop—"

"If you don't want me anymore, Theo—"

"It's not you I don't want," he said, feeling something inside him collapse at the admission. "It's all of this, Daphne. This... life, this debt, this pretense, I want it gone." Once the words began, he couldn't stop them, exhaling, "I want all of it over, I want the quiet life we always talked about—"

"Well, I've changed," Daphne said, lifting her chin. "I don't want quiet, Theo. I don't want to be soft, I don't want to be sweet, I'm tired of being everyone else's plaything. I want more, I want freedom, and I want—"

"Someone who isn't me," Theo said flatly, and then he walked away, because by then they both knew it.

Then Theo Nott had told Harry Potter the whole story, who'd relayed it to Hermione Granger, confirming her suspicions.

And that was how Hermione had known to be waiting for Daphne Greengrass at her father's estate, surrounded by a flock of MACUSA aurors.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: "Tell me your secrets and I will bless you for them." One more day!
Felicitous Tidings from the Nouveau Riche, Day 24

Summary: The advent, concluded. Merry Christmas Eve!

"I knew it was you," Hermione said. "And do you know why?"

"Oh, do tell," Daphne invited drily, eyeing the wands pointed in her direction.

"Because it was perfect," Hermione replied, lowering her wand. No point pretending; obviously Daphne could make no escape, with or without Hermione threatening her. "Because there's always something darker behind every glimmer of perfection, and no one would know that better than you."

She stepped closer, watching Daphne's mouth twitch with half a satisfied smile.

"You saw MACUSA's coverage of the goblin thefts and decided to paint yourself as a likely target," Hermione said. "Easy, wasn't it? They had no reason to doubt you," she said, which had been precisely the elder Greengrass' play. "People who look wealthy enough are always trusted, and you knew it. You probably also knew they'd have no interest in your case and assign you an inexperienced auror. You must have thought it was your lucky day when it was me," she guessed, challenging Daphne, whose crimson lips stretched up with pleasure.

"Only for a moment," Daphne said. "But then you kept getting close. Figures," she added flippantly, "that a women would see what any man would have missed."

True enough, Hermione thought, struggling to remember whose side she was actually on.

"Your only mistake was your mark," Hermione continued. "Otherwise you'd have gotten away with it, wouldn't you? Married Malfoy, staged an accident, run off with his fortune?"

Daphne gave a lovely shrug, and Hermione sighed.

"Are you even blonde?" she asked, and Daphne's hair rippled for a moment, and then became a deep, saturated auburn that slid over her shoulders, disappearing in a river down her back.

"Like I said," Daphne said without a hint of shame, "If you'd been a man, I'd have won."

She smiled. And even amid her frustration, Hermione smiled back. Daphne had done her a favor; she tucked that particular line into the file marked 'how to cement the Ministry auror job,' certain it would sway Kingsley Shacklebolt at least a little.

"So," Daphne said, nudging Hermione back to her narrative, "you were saying. You knew to come after me because…?"

"Ironically, because of something Draco and Theo said," Hermione told her. "Something about being nothing underneath all the wealth. When Theo said it, he was lying," she explained, "but it sounded so close to the truth it must have been, in some way." She paused, and then, "Once I sorted out who he was, I realized he must have been doing all of this for someone close to him. Someone who lived paralyzed by fear, and once I realized that, I knew it had to be you."

Daphne's mouth tightened. "You think I'm afraid?"

"I think you'd have to be," Hermione said plainly, "with so much to lose. With so little agency on your own, gambling on your looks. You think I don't know what it's like to be dismissed?" she prompted, and despite her attempts at sympathy, Daphne remained expressionless. "So then I looked for Harry to see if he could be convinced to turn Theo over in order to get to you, and what do you know? He was," she mused, reaching out to brush an errant strand of auburn hair from Daphne's cheek. "And now, of course, here we are."

Surprisingly, Daphne's facade faltered slightly, wavering as Hermione stepped nearer. "Just tell me one thing," she said, lowering her voice for Hermione alone. "Is he really dead? Theo," she said, obviously struggling to say his name. "Is it true, or—or—?"

For a moment, Hermione almost felt sorry for Daphne Greengrass, the woman who had been so ruthless, so calculating, and so terribly, terribly devious that in the end, Hermione envied her far more for her cleverness than for her beauty.

"The death certificate was filed with MACUSA this morning," Hermione said. "He's gone."

For the briefest moment, she was sure she saw Daphne's lip tremble.

"Oh," Daphne said faintly, but by then, there was no further conversation to be had.

"Daphne Greengrass," Hermione said, speaking louder for the benefit of their audience and reaching for her wand, "on behalf of the Magical Congress of the United States of America, I am hereby placing you under arrest for conspiracy, attempted murder, attempted robbery, and—"

But she never got to finish her sentence.

Before she'd finished speaking, the lights had all gone out, and the moment Hermione could finally see again through blearily cracked eyelids, Daphne Greengrass had vanished.

oOo

"She was just… gone?" Draco said, astonished. "Just like that?"

"Just like that," Hermione confirmed, grimacing. "Still, I did my part, or so Shacklebolt seems to think. He's arranged for me to sit for the auror exams next week."

"Well, congratulations," Draco said, impressed, holding up his champagne flute and permitting it to clink lightly against hers. "Here's to Auror Granger, then."

"And you?" she asked expectantly, bringing the glass to her lips. "Your father's debts all squared away?"

"Yes, many thanks to you," he told her. "And to Theo Nott, of course."

Upon proving Theo Nott's lineage, the contents of the Nott vault, which had been previously unclaimed for lack of heirs, transferred to Theo. Theo's death then meant the contents then transferred to his chosen beneficiary, which was, to the surprise of many, one Draco Malfoy.

From there, it had been easy enough to contact the goblins his father had owed. The debts were paid, with interest; the Malfoy fortune would remain dwindled, but by then, Draco was no longer particularly concerned with what might be said about him.

He'd lost his taste for polite society, as it turned out.

"Well," Hermione said, rising to her feet after a sip of champagne, "I suppose I'd better leave you to pack, then. If you're going to be home in time for Christmas, anyway," she said primly, "which I think Harry was fairly intent on doing—"

She was thoroughly, utterly, undeniably impossible.

"Granger," Draco growled, catching her hand and pulling her into him with shake of his head. "You do realize I don't plan to leave your side as long as I live," he murmured in her ear, "don't you? I wasn't lying, you know, when I said it was you I wanted."

She had never been one to give in so easily. "And say I want you to stay away?" she countered, leaning back to admonish him with a glance, and he smiled.

"Not. A. Chance," he murmured, parroting her and venturing forward to brush his lips against her forehead. "This time, where you go, I go," he said, dropping to kiss her cheek, "I promise."

She squirmed in her hesitation, and he delighted in the tension of waiting. It was what he deserved, anyway, and it would make the winning of her affections all the sweeter.

"Well, you'll have to get a job," she said, not quite ready to relent. "I certainly don't plan to watch you indebt yourself to goblins again, or to bail you out a second time," she sniffed, and he sighed.

"I suppose if you require my assistance," he said, attempting to kiss her again, and she rolled her eyes. "What, like your government salary is going to be anything impressive? In this economy, honestly—"

"I'm serious, Malfoy—"

"Fine, I'll get a job hanging mistletoe outside Woolworth's," he said, earning himself a smack to the gut. "Whatever it takes," he coughed up with a laugh, pulling her now-unresisting form into his arms again, "to be with you, Granger, I will."

She sighed, consenting to be held, and then reached up, stroking a slow line over his cheek.

"You're still a pompous toadstool," she informed him, "and you'll have to make all of it up to me, you know. With interest."

A debt, he thought, he was perfectly willing to pay.

"Well, you're the spiteful shrew who saved my life," he replied, "so I suppose I can stomach the dreadful restitution."

She made a face, and he laughed, tightening his arms around her.

"Will you run if I kiss you this time?" he asked her.

"I won't if you won't," she promised.

In the end, he bent his head to hers in the same moment she tipped her lips up, crashing into him as they'd always done; colliding, meeting up like sky and sea, this time with the privilege to stay.
"Happy Christmas, Malfoy," she said to his lips, the words warm and tender between them, and briefly, he pondered the value of the moment.

"Happy Christmas, Granger," he replied, and swept her up in his arms, determining that for the first time in his life, he possessed something wholly and blissfully incalculable.

OoO

"Are you positively mad?" Parkinson demanded, glaring at his daughter.

"Of course not, Papá," Pansy replied, shrugging. "Spiteful? Yes. Vindictive? When it suits me. But mad? Never," she said, lowering her sunglasses to glance at the brunette beside her. "You don't think I'm mad, do you?"

"Certainly not," said Daphne Greengrass, facetiously indignant at the suggestion. "Mad would be, oh, I don't know… snatching someone from a room full of MACUSA aurors and mysteriously disappearing," she hypothesized, shrugging. "This, on the other hand, is a simple matter of leverage."

"That was my thought," Pansy agreed. "Leverage which we do have, don't we? Sorry, Daddy, blackmail's new to me," she lamented, glancing back at her father, "but by my calculations, we have enough to put you in Azkaban, oh… thrice over, would you say, Daph?" she mused, and Parkinson scowled as Daphne gave a lash-batting smile of agreement.

"You realize this solves nothing," he snapped, furious. "She's still wanted by MACUSA," he said, giving Daphne a pointed glare, "and after this, you'll both be international fugitives—"

"Which is precisely why we need the money, Father," Pansy sniffed, holding out a contract signing his control of her wealth back over to her. "So, are we in agreement?"

Parkinson, who until then had had his limbs bound to his favorite chair, leaned forward with palpable loathing, taking the quill Daphne cheerfully handed him and signing his name to the spellbound contract.

"There," he muttered, shoving it towards Pansy, "and I hope you know what a disappointment you've been to me."

"Oh, you have no idea, Daddy," Pansy assured him, tucking the contract into her silken bralette and then tugging Daphne towards her. "Shall we be off, darling?" she asked, brushing the tips of her fingers over the beading of Daphne's evening gown, and in reply, Daphne smiled her perfect smile.

"Let's," Daphne said, and leaned forward to kiss Pansy full on the lips, disapparating them in precisely the moment Parkinson began to scream.

OoO

The hotel room in Paris was nearly as nice as the Harkaway, though it became obvious at first glance that it wasn't nearly as secure.

"What's that?" Daphne asked, immediately catching sight of a note tied to a labelless bottle of champagne, and Pansy shrugged. She, Daphne determined, was still riding a high from the thrill of disobeying her father—and, presumably, from staking her claim to a large sum (read, as he hadn't: all) of his fortune.

"Don't know," Pansy called disinterestedly, meandering towards the clawfoot tub to run what was sure to be a very expensive bath.

Daphne, meanwhile, felt a pang at the sight of the handwriting, swallowing hard once she recognized the familiar scrawl.

"Pans," she said, unrolling it slowly. "You know, you never told me the details. How did you know how to break into my father's house?"

"Hm?" Pansy asked, demurring as she lazily waved her wand, filling the tub. "Well, turns out I'm a criminal's daughter, Daphne, in addition to not being stupid. Must be in my blood somewhere. Are you coming?" she added tangentially, slipping out of her robe.

"In a moment," Daphne said, heart leaping in her chest at the contents of the note.

I'll always find you, D.

Not just anyone could have known the escape mechanisms of the Greengrass estate without first serving nearly a decade at her father's side. Not just anyone could have found her hotel room without first developing the skill to do so. Not just anyone would leave her this note without first loving her enough to let her go.

Daphne smiled slowly.

He's gone, she suddenly remembered Hermione had said, not he's dead.

The tricky minx.

Daphne's pulse raced a little, wondering how quickly he would find her.

Soon, she hoped.

Though not too soon, of course.

First, she had a bath to take.

"Alright, Pansy," she said, slipping her cloak from her shoulders and unzipping her dress, letting it slither to a crumpled heap on the floor. "I'm ready."

oOo

Harry shaded his eyes from the sun, turning to identify the lean figure loping towards him.

"Well?" he asked, and Theo Nott, recently deceased, gave one of his usual impassive shrugs, tucking something into the breast pocket of his jacket.

"Walk with me," he said, and Harry replied with a resigned sigh, following as Theo continued to wander the old Greengrass estate, checking the remaining contents of his many, many hiding places. "I think I've got it all now," Theo murmured, mostly to himself. "Enough to get us to London, anyway."

"Well, you'd better," Harry said. "I was hoping to be home by Christmas, if you recall."

"Mm, of course," Theo said lazily, "and how do you plan to explain me, then?"

"Easy," Harry said. "I don't."
Theo rolled his eyes, sparing Harry a fleeting glance. "I suppose I shouldn't ask any more from you," he said, "given that you've already permitted me my freedom."

Actually, that had been quite easy. Most of it had been Hermione's idea: Use Theo as the bait to prompt Daphne (the guiltier party, in Hermione's conditionally-professional opinion) to drastic action, fake his death, pass his money off to Draco and neatly solve all her problems before disappearing forever. It was, as Hermione had offered plainly to both Harry and Theo, the perfect deal in exchange for revealing Daphne's complicity—nobody would be looking for him, and for the first time since his father's death, Theo would owe nothing and no one.

"This is so good of you," Harry noted neutrally. "Showing gratitude. It's very nice."

"Never say that to me again," Theo muttered, and then glanced sideways at him. "It's a relief, you know," he murmured, "to be free of everything." He stared out over the New York landscape, shaking his head. "Most of the people I spent every day with until you had tasted everything and still managed to have no taste."

"Not you, though," Harry said, and Theo turned to him, a smile sliding slowly over his lips.

"I hadn't tasted anything yet," Theo said, and brushed his lips against Harry's jaw, prompting him to a shiver.

"By the way," Harry said, pausing Theo's meandering fingers before they progressed too intently over the bones of his hips, "while we're on the subject, I've been meaning to tell you something."

"Mm?" Theo asked.

"You chose the wrong mark," Harry said, and Theo scoffed, unsurprised.

"Well, I certainly know you're poor," he said, running his tongue over the notches of Harry's throat. "That's a given," he said, flicking the material of Harry's ill-fitting shirt, and Harry shook his head, nudging Theo away.

"I meant when you chose Malfoy," Harry said, and Theo frowned, pulling back with bemusement.

"I'm not actually poor, technically," Harry explained, impassive. "I have my parents' fortune."

Theo blinked. "Did you just say—"

"Fortune? Yes," Harry confirmed, shrugging, "though I haven't spent a knut of it, and I've been saving for the right reason to use it. Some express purpose. Something of significance," he murmured in clarification, running a hand through Theo's hair. "Which, I hope you understand, does not include massive parties."

"If I never attend another party as long as I live, it'll still be too soon," Theo said with a shudder of distaste, and then he gave Harry a look of curiosity. "What will you use it for, then?"

Harry shrugged again. "Well, I'd like to see things," he said, and then, with a second glance at Theo, he added, "Taste them."

Theo's lips parted with clarity. "Ah," he said, and smiled slowly. "And where should we start, then?"

Harry shaded his eyes again, looking out into the horizon.

"There," he said, pointing, and Theo leaned his chin up, letting the slowly fading sunlight cast a shadow over his restless cheeks.

Tell me your secrets, Harry thought, and I will carry them with me to the ends of the earth.

"Perfect," Theo said, and closed his eyes, twining his fingers with Harry's.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Boundless gratitude to Aurora for her eyes on this one, especially with how difficult it ended up being for me to write. This has been a roller coaster of a month in my personal life, and while I wish I'd been able to give this story the attention I'd planned for it before things went awry (I mean really, a nottpottt!Gatsby, I was so excited to write it!) I do hope you've enjoyed it. Just a side note: the line 'tasted everything and having no taste' comes from The Talented Mr Ripley, which was the second inspiration for this fic along with The Great Gatsby. Look out for my D/Hr Advent one shot to post in this collection tomorrow, and have a wonderful Christmas Eve!

A Matter of Practicality

Pairing: Dramione (Draco Malfoy x Hermione Granger)

Universe: Hogwarts eighth year

Rating: T

Summary: Behold my contribution to the 2018 D/Hr Advent, which originally posted to AO3 on December 1. Thanks to those of you who nominated me! In honor of the day, please enjoy this bit of Christmas fluff.

Returning to Hogwarts to take their N.E.W.T.s hasn't exactly been fruitful, seeing as Hermione's relationship has disintegrated and Draco's family and fortune have both been dismantled by Ministry decree. At least they'll be alone for the holidays, which is precisely what they both want. Or is it?

You can find this one shot here: A Matter of Practicality [ AO3 ]. Again, just posting the chapter on FFN without disturbing the matching chapter enumeration on AO3!

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Be sure to check out aurorarsinistra's edit for this story and Little Chmura's contribution to the advent on tumblr! In 2019 you can expect to see a few new oneshots in here; definitely a new theo x daphne that's sort of a prequel for Ride or Die, probably a new batch of Disney AUs, there's something in my notes about a mermaid story and... archery? Anyway, until then, have yourself a merry little Christmas! Thank you for sharing your holiday with me.
Black Jeans and Daphne Blue

Pairing: Nottgrass (Theo Nott x Daphne Greengrass)

Universe: Prequel to Ride or Die, basically a muggle high school AU

Rating: M for sex and language

Summary: For Valentine's Day, a little bit of teen trash Daphne and Theo I've been dying (for literal years) to write since I heard the song One More Time by Jon Bellion. Title from the song Daphne Blue by The Band Camino. For reference, if you haven't read the full length version of Ride or Die or need a refresher: it is approximately the year 2005, and Daphne, Theo, and Draco are seventeen years old, best friends, and juniors in high school. Draco and Theo aren't Death Eaters yet, but their fathers are, and they plan on it. Narcissa is a college professor who doesn't always live at home. The Weasleys and the Malfoys have bad blood. Daphne's father is alive, and he Doesn't Approve™ of Theo.

Begin scene.

In 1958, General Motors trotted out a custom color for its newest Cadillac, a shade of blue they dubbed 'Daphne.' It fell somewhere on the color wheel between baby blue and teal, something pastel and candy-colored and sweet. Now, people might recognize it as something akin to Tiffany blue, like those little boxes of expensive jewelry that usually land in movies and commercials. It's iconic, and that's always been true. But in the 1960s, Fender guitars made Daphne Blue part of their official lineup, putting it to work for their electric Stratocaster, and that's what's much more important.

Because at some point in the late eighties, Viridian Greengrass told his girlfriend Ava that one day, after he'd made it as a rockstar and settled back down in Diagon, he was going to have a girl and name her Daphne, after the blue of his prized possession: his vintage Fender Strat. "I think I'd prefer something prettier, like Astoria," remarked Ava, busying herself with daydreams of weddings and babies, but Viridian, who thought it unlikely he and Ava would even end up together considering the fame and innumerable blow jobs that were surely just around the corner, merely shrugged.

"Fine," he said, "you can name the next one that, but Daphne will always be my favorite."

Fast forward a few years to the age of Juicy Couture sweatsuits and the resurgence of gangster rap (crunk, maybe, though that hyph shi is picking up) and you get Daphne Greengrass in the flesh, though she's not exactly as sugarspun as the original shade of Daphne. She typically gets to school in her dad's old coupe, which is neither a Cadillac nor vintage. It's a Volvo, actually, which is dumb, especially because Viridian won't let her have a bike, despite the fact that he gets everywhere on his Harley. "It's fucking dangerous," says Viridian. "I know," says Daphne, which should tell you a lot about what she's like.

Unsurprisingly, Daphne wears her namesake with pride, and today she's wearing a Daphne Blue t-shirt that ends just below her navel and a pair of worn black jeans that ride low on her hips. A little of her black thong is sticking up above her jeans, which Ava yelled about this morning. "Whatever, Mom," said Daphne, and Astoria, who is fifteen and worships the ground Daphne walks on, rolled her eyes in conspiratorial agreement.

"Hey," Daphne says to Astoria, who's riding in the passenger seat and hoping to one day be half as cool as Daphne. "Can you get a ride home this afternoon? I'd take you, but I'm probably going to a party with Theo."

"Maybe Draco will take me," Astoria says hopefully, and Daphne tries not to laugh. Yeah, sure, Draco fucking Malfoy is going to take her kid sister home from school, that checks out. More likely he'll be with her and Theo until he bails, making eyes at Pansy Parkinson or sweet-talking his way into some chick's pants with the promise of Lucius' beer and Narcissa's weed. (They're both out of town 'working on their marriage' or whatever, which sounds gross. Hence the party.)

"Sure, maybe," Daphne says, and then adds, "I'll meet you out here at three to make sure, okay? But if you can get a ride, that'd be ideal."

"Okay," Astoria says happily, and Daphne's not worried. Astoria's pretty and popular and she's not completely an idiot, though Daphne likes to check on her fairly often. Big sister shit and all that. "See you at three, then."

"Right, see you," says Daphne, but she's immediately distracted by the hand slipping over her bare midriff, because it means Theo's found her.

Theo does this thing she loves where he gives her belt loop a tug and a spin, pulling her into him. She tells him she hates it, obviously, because she doesn't want him to think he can go around manhandling her whenever he likes, but in reality, it thrills her. Yes, have me, she thinks, take me however you want, make me feel like I'm yours. Make sure everybody here knows it, make sure they believe it.

Still, for appearances' sake, she swats his hand away and turns, reclining against her car door as Theo leans towards her, resting one arm against the driver side window.

People think Draco's the smooth one. They're wrong.

"Hey," Theo says, and Daphne fights the urge to kiss him and like, whatever, write poetry about his face or something. Which he doesn't know that she does. Well, he knows, but they're songs, not poetry, and she tells him the only reason she writes love songs is because that's what gets picked up. Viridian always says the only reason he never made it is because his stuff was too abstract. Nobody cares if you're a true artist, Viridian always rants, they just want someone they can control, and don't you ever be that, Daph, don't you dare fucking sell out.

But at the same time, he smiles when she sings, and so does Theo.

"Hey yourself," Daphne says, and Theo smiles, dropping his chin to kiss her. He slides a hand under her t-shirt, resting his palm flat against her ribs. When he kisses her, he always yanks her hips against his like she belongs to him, and she does.

She does, and she fucking loves it.

"Gross," coughs up an unsurprising voice, which means Draco's here, as he usually is (where Theo is, Draco is never far behind).

Daphne slides a thumb over her lip, winking up at Theo, who almost certainly needs to readjust his
"We get it," Draco mutters with a roll of his eyes, "you're animals. No need to fuck right here in the parking lot and make us watch."

"You wish you could watch," Daphne says, letting Theo tuck her securely under his arm. Across the parking lot Astoria turns, spotting Draco, and waves enthusiastically. Draco waves back, amused, and Daphne cuts him a glare. "Don't lead her on, shithead. That's my sister, Malfoy, and I'll kill you before I ever let you touch her."

"Relax, Greengrass, she's a baby," Draco says, shrugging. "But hey, can you blame her? She's got a crush, it's cute."

Theo slides Daphne a look that says, Draco is so fucking shameless sometimes.

"What?" demands Draco, catching it, and Theo laughs.

"Calm down, princess," he tells Draco, shifting his arm so the tips of his fingers brush Daphne's cheek as Vince and Greg spot them from near the planters, rising to their feet. "It's too early to lose your shit," Theo reminds Draco, who isn't listening. Probably because for Draco, losing his shit is an hourly occurrence.

"What the fuck are you looking at, Weasley?" Draco sort of half-shouts, because apparently Ron and Dean and Seamus have also stopped to stare at him from where they're standing near the high school's center quad.

Daphne sighs, feeling Theo's arm slide from around her shoulders. "Nott, fucking don't," she warns, but he's not listening, because Draco's taken a step forward and that means Theo's stepping forward, too. Boys are so stupid, she thinks. It's like their brains shut off for fights and sex.

"It's a free country, Malfoy," Ron is saying, and Daphne sighs, spotting Susan Bones and wandering over to her, because obviously the boys are going to go around measuring their dicks now or whatever.

Susan's with Greg Goyle or something, hard to tell. She might be gunning for a spot in their crowd, not that it matters. She's cool, and anyway, she can't upstage Daphne. Daphne's Nott's girl, and besides, she's Viridian's daughter. If she acts like hot shit, it's because she is.

"I hate this," says Susan, who's nervous for Greg because she doesn't understand the hierarchy yet. Someday she'll learn that only Draco and Theo take blows, and only because they give them twice as hard. If Greg gets involved, it's going to be with Seamus or something, who's really not into this shit. Daphne likes Seamus, and Dean, too. Dean's smart, which she appreciates.

Ron, on the other hand, mostly loves to do two things: run his mouth and stare at Daphne.

"Don't worry about it," Daphne says coolly, watching Theo's shoulders tense as Draco and Ron continue swapping dumbass taunts. She doubts Ron Weasley knows how often Theo and Draco spar after school, or how good they actually are. Lucius taught Draco how to throw a punch when he was like, eight, and when Darian Mulciber caught the two idiot boys wrestling like idiot boys, he taught them how to actually fight. Sometimes Daphne watches them do it when she's bored. Viridian taught her, too—just some basic self-defense things—and sometimes Theo pulls her into the 'ring,' which is really just four cones on the floor of the Manor while Darian's working.

Theo's the one who really taught Daphne where to aim, how hard to hit. Once, he made her punch him in the face, repeatedly, until she was no longer scared of doing it. He just stood there, not defending himself, until she understood: Make people respect you. Don't just make them flinch.

Ron Weasley has no fucking clue who he keeps picking fights with, though secretly, Daphne's a little worried about the fact that if he keeps talking shit, he might find out. It's not like she wants him to die. Besides, if Theo and Draco get expelled, what the fuck is she doing to do at school all day?

Inevitably, the perpetual argument between Ron and Draco escalates to the real problem: that Ron's dad is a prosecutor and Lucius Malfoy is someone who makes a living out of fucking with the law. Ron thinks this makes him a good guy and Draco a bad guy, and Draco fucking loves to play the villain.

"I doubt you'll be so fucking cocky when your dad's in prison," Ron says, which isn't good. This is never all that far from reality, which they all know. "What do you think's gonna happen when he gets caught, Malfoy? Your dad's whole club's going down."

Ha, Daphne thinks, hoping Draco will laugh it off too, but he doesn't.

"Say that again to my face, Weasley," Draco warns, and he's not dicking around anymore.

The bell rings, and nobody moves.

"Nott," Daphne says, and catches a little hesitation in Theo's shoulders at the sound of her voice. "Nott, don't waste my time," she says, boredom in her tone, though what she means is: Nott, don't get in trouble again, you know your dad will fuck you up if you get in trouble and we both know this little shit isn't worth it.

Ron, of course, lets a smile flicker over his face. "Yeah, Nott," he says, "listen to your girlfriend. It's either her telling you what to do or Malfoy, isn't it?"

Jesus. He fucking wants to die, doesn't he?

Daphne struts forward, positioning herself so she's the point of a triangle between where Theo and Draco are standing and where Ron is flanked by a visibly uncomfortable Seamus and Dean. She knows better than to get between them in an actual fight, but still. They need a wakeup call, and she knows if she flips her hair a little, Ron will notice the lace of her black g-string and forget about whatever shit might otherwise come next.

"Hey," Draco snaps, because Daphne's basically an oracle and surprise, surprise, Ron's looking. "Don't look at her like that," he says, because he knows Daphne's his best friend's girl, and Theo obviously isn't thrilled that someone else's eyes are on her.

"Oh, shut up, Malfoy," Ron says testily, and arches a brow at Theo. "Or does he always fight your battles for you, Nott?"

That, of course, is not a remark that lands well.

"Jesus," Daphne mutters under her breath, throwing a hand out in an effort to put some distance between Ron and an aggressively peacocking Draco. "Malfoy, come on," she warns, shoving him away from Ron, and then she catches Theo's eye, giving him a look that says, Come on.

Come on, Theo, this isn't sexy, give it up.

Theo gives a gruff nod of acknowledgement and yanks Draco back by his collar, giving him a look, and Ron lets out a triumphant little laugh.
"Good thing you've got your whole crew of snakes, Malfoy, or else you might've actually had to—"

Daphne turns and punches Ron, hard, in the gut, somewhere that'll leave a bruise but not one people can see. He coughs up something angry, but by then Theo's taken hold of Daphne's arm and pushed hurriedly through the crowd of people, dragging her away just before a teacher comes to break it up.

"Babe," Theo says, which is a mix of, Babe, seriously? and Babe, that was so fucking hot. "You could have gotten in trouble. Again," he adds, lifting an admonishing brow as if he hadn't been the one to fucking start it, and she sighs, shoving him against the wall and glancing over her shoulder.

There's no one there, so she kisses him hard, partially to shut him up and partially because she knows she owes him one for parading around for Ron Weasley's benefit, even if it was just to distract him. Theo's hands drop to her belt loops and she grinds against him for a second before saying in his mouth, "Fuck homeroom."

He grins at her. They're already at least ten minutes late to class anyway. They'd get detention if they went, and it's only a matter of time before Ron squeals and she gets dragged to the principal's office.

"I'll drive," Theo offers.

"Thought Draco drove this morning?" They always come to school together.

"He did. But I've got keys," he says, and gestures to where they're clipped to his belt loop. It's Draco's Impala, which used to be Lucius', but as with anything that belongs to Draco, it's just as much Theo's. "We just have to be back at three."

"Cool," says Daphne, and slides her tongue over his lower lip. "Then let's go."

Draco's basically the only guy at school who's never made a move on Daphne, aside from Seamus and Dean (who are either really nice or super gay and either way, Daphne is chill with it), and it's because she's always been Theo's. Even when they were younger, Draco always understood that Theo was the one who really loved her. Theo never tugged her ponytail or teased her. He was always good to her, even as a kid. Daphne didn't know what that meant, but Draco did. She only figured it out when Cormac McLaggen took her to Homecoming sophomore year and he got a little too handsy on the dance floor. She was pushing him away, trying to tell him nicely that she wasn't into it, but it was loud and the bass was thudding in both their ears. Before she knew what was happening, Theo had grabbed Cormac's shoulder and punched him in the face.

Daphne had taken Theo home and iced his knuckles, telling him he was stupid. "Well, I didn't like that he wasn't listening to you," Theo said, and then he left when his dad came to pick him up, stone-faced.

"Stay away from Nott's kid," Viridian warned Daphne, watching Theo and his father drive away. "He and Malfoy's mini-asshole are just begging for trouble," he told her, probably because they were, "and I don't want my daughter getting mixed up in all that." High school boys only want one thing, blah blah. The usual dad bullshit, like Daphne's some kind of precious flower he needs to protect. Though, thankfully, Viridian's never laid a hand on her and would probably fucking die first. Unlike Theo's dad.

The point is, the following Monday she'd grabbed Theo's hand at lunch and pulled him behind the gym.
"Hey," she said, "do you like me?"

"Define like," he said, and she rolled her eyes.

"I thought it was noble, what you did," she said. "Dumb, but noble," and he gave her the little smirk he and Draco were already so fucking adept at. She had no idea where they learned it, but it was getting ridiculous what it was doing to her.

"That's me," Theo said, and she didn't do anything about it yet because what kind of answer was that, but when she asked Draco about it, he gave a laugh that wasn't even really a laugh. It was more like a scoff.

"Does he like you?" Draco echoed, looking repulsed. "Jesus, Greengrass, what are you, blind?"

Yeah, she thought, yeah, maybe I am, because look at him. I don't know how I missed it, but it's a real fucking shame.

She kissed him the next day because it had become apparent she would need to do most of the heavy lifting.

"Damn," Theo said, impressed, "you're good at that."

It was her first kiss. She told him so, warily—thinking he might be like yikes, what's wrong with you, to which she would have had to defensively point out that she'd been waiting for the right guy because, you know, she wanted it to be special and all that, and anyway, she was a lady and she didn't just go around giving shit away for free—but instead, Theo smiled.

"Mine, too," he said, and she thought: Fuck.

She had a feeling Theo Nott was going to be a lot of her firsts, and maybe a few of her lasts.

Theo Nott is named for his father, which isn't nearly as cool as Daphne being named for a guitar—or maybe it was cooler, when he put it that way?—but either way, who gives a fuck. His mom died when he was a kid, which probably accounts for most of his flaws. Not that that or anything else is important at the moment, though, because by the time he slips Daphne's t-shirt—her signature color, Daphne Blue—from her shoulders, Theo's mind pretty much goes blank.

She's wearing a soft, pretty pink bra. This, Theo knows, is only for him. The racy black thong he can see above her jeans is a taunt for the rest of the world, daring them to want her so that she can say fuck 'em and refuse, but the pink lace under her t-shirt is for his eyes only.

He slides his lips over the curves of her breasts, taking his time, and she sighs quietly, tightening her legs around his waist.

"So, about Draco's party," she says, and Theo looks up. "Wanna skip it?" she asks, and Theo chuckles, shaking his head.

"We can bail early," he offers, but they can't not go, because Draco expects him to be there. He's Draco's shadow, he knows, but he doesn't give a shit. Who cares what people think? He's got Daphne Greengrass, he's got Draco, everything else is secondary. Besides, people have Draco all wrong. Draco's whip-smart, and he's going places. When Draco talks, people listen. People fucking listen, and Theo knows a leader when he sees one. That, and Draco doesn't treat Theo like his second. Theo's not just some mindless goon. People listen to Draco, and Draco listens to Theo. They're going places, the two of them, someday.
Daphne smiles at him and Theo fucking melts. She makes him gooey and stupid, which Draco mocks because he doesn't understand it. He will someday, Theo thinks, but probably not anytime soon. Draco's playing the field or something, and besides, there's only one Daphne Greengrass. There's only one, and she's his.

"Hey," she says, nudging him. "Were you kissing me or what?"

God, she's so fucking bossy and Theo loves it. It's one of her best features, though Theo thinks the hottest thing about Daphne Greengrass is the way she aims a gun. Not because she's a girl who can shoot a gun, though that's obviously not unsexy, but because of how fucking fast she learned it. Viridian showed her once—one time—and then handed her the Glock and said, Go. She had it on the first try, and Theo worships her for that.

He worships her for a lot of things.

"Maybe we should slow down," he suggests, because her nails are tracing over the bare skin of his torso and he's so hard now that things might get out of hand real fast if they don't stop. She gives a little whine, tightening her legs around him, and he kisses her neck. "We are not," he says firmly, "having sex for the first time when your mom could come home any minute."

People make assumptions about their relationship. Theo lets them think what they want.

"That doesn't mean we have to stop," Daphne says, though Theo thinks he hears an engine from outside. Daphne gives him a shove, straddling him on her bed, and leans in so that her auburn hair falls around him in a wave. "Nott," she says, and good god, she is convincing. As if teenage hormones aren't bad enough. As if having a dick isn't already hugely problematic. She's positioned right on top of his cock and he is having some extreme difficulties controlling himself—which is presumably the point, but still.

"I heard something outside," he says, throat dry. "I heard a bike, it might be your dad—"

"You're paranoid," Daphne says, and when she kisses him he growls his concession into her mouth because sure, fine, whatever. Viridian Greengrass carries a handgun around and can and will kill Theo for this, but sure, it's worth it. He tugs at Daphne's hair, his hands peeling back the cups of her bra, and she grinds slowly against him, making his breath fall short. Theo sits up slightly, kissing beneath her jaw, and she leans her head back just as her bedroom door slams open.

"Daphne," says Viridian, and she scrambles away with a stifled yelp, while Theo abruptly suffers a brush of cardiac arrest. "Get dressed," Viridian says to Theo with a notable lack of surprise, tossing him his shirt, "and get the fuck out of my house."

"Daddy, it's not his fault," Daphne says quickly, grabbing Theo's arm before he can obey. She's already tugged her t-shirt back on and she's commenced phase two: glaring at her father. "What are you even doing home?"

"What am I—?!" Viridian struggles to contain his temper, and Theo suspects the only thing preventing him from shooting Theo right there and then is the fact that Viridian and the elder Theodore Nott wear the same snake emblem on their leather cuts. "Daphne, you're supposed to be at school!"

Daphne rolls her eyes, adjusting her choker. "Yeah, well, it's not like anything important is happening tod—"

"Your principal called me," Viridian snaps. "Then I saw this little fucker's car in the driveway," he mutterts with a hard glare at Theo, before transitioning back to admonishing his eldest daughter. "You punched someone, Daphne?"

Daphne lifts her chin, defiant. "Just Ron Weasley," she says, gloriously irreverent, and if Theo wasn't deeply afraid for his life, he's pretty sure he'd kiss her right then, right on the mouth. He'd take the bullet, he figures. It'd be worth it, because look at her. She's a fucking girl almighty.

"Weasley's hardly someone," Daphne says, "and anyway, he started it. I ended it."

Viridian's expression hardens, and his hazel eyes—very similar to the ones he gave Daphne—cut to Theo. "Get out of my house," he says again, "and if you ever put your fucking hands on my daughter again, I will end you. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," lies Theo, who isn't an idiot, but naturally, that doesn't remotely work.

"Jesus, Dad," Daphne growls, still refusing to let go of Theo's arm even after he tugs his shirt back on and reaches for his shoes. "I'm not a child, and this isn't the middle ages. You can't just tell him not to touch me like I'm your property——"

"Daphne, don't start," Viridian warns, looking positively exhausted. "I'm not done with you——"

"Oh?" she scoffs. "Well, I'm done with you," she says, and Theo has no choice but to pick up his shoes and let himself be dragged away as Daphne shoves past her father, leaving Theo to give him something of a half-apologetic look.

"Daphne," Viridian grits through his teeth, "DON'T YOU DARE——"

"What are you gonna do, Dad?" she demands, spinning to face him. "Lock me in here, ground me, what?"

Viridian, Theo can see, is trapped. Daphne is his favorite child and Viridian has never said no to her, and now look what he's done. He's raised a beautiful, vicious, angry little goddess, and because he never set limits, she has none, and inevitably, Theo loves her.

"Look, I'm going back to school," Daphne says, using her silky liar's voice, "and we can talk about this when I get home."

"There's nothing to talk about," Viridian says, but even Theo can see he's giving in. "I don't want to hear from your fucking school again, Daph, do you hear me?"

"Yeah, yeah, whatever," says Daphne, tugging Theo behind her and tossing him the keys he would have very well forgotten as he struggles to pull on his shoes. It's his usual, an old pair of black Chucks with holes in the heels. Draco wears coke-white Vans, artfully scuffed. Daphne wears black high-tops that she draws on with silver Sharpie during class. Everything you need to know about them is visible by their footwear.

"Drive," Daphne tells him, falling into the passenger seat, and Jesus motherfucking Christ, someday Theo's definitely going to get shot. She leans over and kisses him hard, her hand tight on his inner thigh. "I love you," she says fiercely, "so fuck my dad."

It's thrilling, really, being in love with someone so fucking insane.

"Where are we going?" Theo says, and Daphne shrugs.

"Just drive," she says, and closes her eyes as he slips the key in the ignition.
Diagon's not exactly a big place, so it's probably not a huge surprise when Theo tenses at the sound of a motorcycle pulling up outside the Leaky Cauldron. Daphne's just finished ordering an extra basket of fries when they spot the elder Theodore Nott aiming himself at the diner's front doors. The Impala's parked outside and there's no time to hide, so Daphne slips hastily onto Theo's side of the booth, shoving him closer to the window and serving as a buffer.

"Don't," Theo says, trying to convince her to stay out of it, but she wants to make damn sure his father doesn't lay a hand on him. The only way to do that, as far as she can tell, is to make sure he has to go through her.

"Shut up," she says, and then Nott is at their table, giving Theo that dead-eyed stare he always gives him, like his own son's a stranger. Just some good-for-nothing kid that looks like his dead wife, which makes Daphne furious.

"What the fuck are you doing here?" says Nott.

"It's lunch," Daphne says before Theo can open his mouth, and Nott glares at her, then returns his attention to Theo.

"Get the fuck back to school," Nott says. "I don't need Greengrass calling me to tell me to get my kid under fucking control, do you hear me?"

Fuck, Daphne thinks furiously, because her father has no fucking clue what he's just done. Theo can't go home now, his dad'll beat the shit out of him. He'll have to stay with Draco again, but it's not like Nott won't find him there. Her dad has never understood that just because he loves her, it doesn't mean all dads are like that. Some men have no fucking problem treating their kids like shit.

"Yeah, Dad," Theo says. "Sorry."

Daphne curls a fist, waiting. She's seen Nott backhand Theo just for looking at him wrong, and she almost wants him to try it now. She was ten back then, but she's older now. She's not afraid of an old man, whether he has the same tattoos as her father or not.

Theo nudges her knee with his, warning her not to push it.

"Go to school," Nott says.

"Okay," Theo replies.

Nott looks at Daphne, who glares up at him.

"You're a fucking handful, aren't you?" he says. "Figures. Viridian's too soft with you."

"Dad," Theo says tightly, "don't—"

"My father's worth ten of you," Daphne snaps.

"Actually, your father's a fucking idiot, but fine," says Nott, and turns to leave just as Daphne considers throwing a punch. What's he going to do, hit a teenage girl? Just try it, she thinks murderously, only Theo's got his arms around her waist, tugging her firmly back to his side.

"Don't you dare," he says in her ear, and she sighs, relenting just as their fries arrive. "Can we get a box?" Theo asks the waiter, who nods, turning to retrieve one, and Daphne looks at Theo with surprise, bemused.
"Why?"

"Because we're going somewhere," Theo says, and he's wearing his best 'fuck it' expression, which means something fucking amazing is about to happen. Immediately, Daphne's rage with his father (and hers) melts away. Theo usually has adventures with Draco, but today he's going to do something stupid with her, and she's fucking amped.

"Fuck my dad," says Theo.

"Yeah, fuck him," Daphne jubilantly agrees, exhilarated. "Where are we going?"

Theo twines her ponytail around his hand, giving it a tug that bares her throat, and then he kisses her in the spot just behind her ear, which always makes her shiver.

"My house," he says.

She's breathless. "Why?"

"Because," he murmurs in her ear, "we're gonna borrow a fucking bike."

"Borrow?"

She can feel him smile.

"Yeah," he says, "sure."

Theo's dad has a collection of motorbikes that he thinks aren't in proper working order, unaware that his son is a uniquely skilled mechanic. Theo's dad is also unaware his son has an A in AP Physics, which is a class normally reserved for seniors (which Theo is not), and that Theo has managed this despite the fact that he's almost never there. To the surprise of many, the only class Theo is actually failing is physical education, because he's gotten a dress cut five times, and that's only counting the times he's bothered to show up. Getting Theo into a uniform isn't exactly the easiest thing in the world, nor is telling him what to do.

Theo parks a few blocks away, just in case, and then he and Daphne sneak into his father's detached garage. He picks out the old Ducati Scrambler he fixed with Darian and Caleb last month and scrounges around for an extra helmet, handing the good one to Daphne. She straps it on and straddles him easily, like she was born for this, which he figures she probably was.

"Let's go," she says, holding him tightly, and he's full of the adrenaline of theft and the thrill of having her hands on him. He loves the way it feels to have her confidence, to know she trusts him. Her thighs are wrapped around his and he lifts one of her hands, kissing her knuckles brusquely.

"Let's go," he agrees, and takes off from his driveway.

They don't go anywhere in particular. He gets on one of the back roads, making their way through the hills. The point is to be free, to go fast, though not too fast. Precious cargo, he thinks, knowing he's responsible for her, and that the point of wearing leather is to not get all scraped up. He hasn't earned a cut yet, something he and Draco are both very, very conscious of. Lucius says they can't join until they graduate, which Theo is pretty sure is Narcissa's rule. She's pretty chill as far as parents go, but she's a college professor and Draco's education is deeply important to her—which is why Draco, unlike Theo, almost never skips class.

Theo has better things to do, he thinks, Daphne's arms tightening around him while he hugs the curves of the narrow road. He leans to take the speed with something his father probably doesn't know is expertise, but which very much is. Draco rides Lucius' motorcycle with his father's permission, but Theo actually has a license, class C and class M both. He's been forging his father's signature since he was eleven years old.

"Pull over," Daphne says in his ear, and he does, because her hands are tugging at his t-shirt and it's not that hard to figure out what she wants. He pulls to the side of the road, near a forested section of trees, and he turns around so she's on his lap, hands fumbling with his belt buckle. Her hair smells like wind, a little like gasoline and a vintage motor, and he flips open the button of her black jeans to slide his hand under the fabric of her underwear.

They haven't had sex yet, but still, Theo knows how to do a thing or two. Daphne moans, rubbing against his palm, and he smirks against her lips, cock twitching as he nudges the black lace thong aside. Anyone could see them if they drove by, but no one does. She pants and whines, breasts straining in a way that makes him want to fucking die. Her black nails dig into the back of his neck and sure, his hand almost cramps, but it's worth it when she comes, biting down on his lip and grabbing his hand to hold it still.

They ride it out together while she catches her breath, his cock straining beneath his jeans.

"Come on," she whispers, "let me return the favor."

She's very reciprocal that way, which he appreciates, but still. "It's two, Daph. We should get back."

"Oh please," she scoffs, rolling her eyes. "Like this'll take long."

Unfortunately, she's right. More unfortunately, Theo hears a car coming the moment her hand closes around his shaft. He hurriedly pushes her hand away, and lucky he does, too, because it's a police cruiser coming around the bend.

"Slughorn," he mutters, and Daphne makes a face of repulsion, buttoning her jeans and adjusting her bra.

The police chief pulls up next to Theo's bike, rolling down the window and arching a brow.

"Nott Junior," he says, knocking his sunglasses down his nose to give Theo a pursed look of disapproval, "shouldn't you two be in school?"

"Maybe," Theo says, because if there's one thing he doesn't give a shit about, it's cops. He doesn't know anybody who does, and Daphne's no different. Theo re-settles himself on his bike, pulling his helmet on, and says, "Got a problem?"

"You shouldn't be here," Slughorn says.

"We wouldn't be if you weren't still talking to us," Theo says.

Slughorn looks at Daphne, then back at Theo.

"Get back to school," he says. "If I catch you here again, I don't care who your daddy is, Nott. You can go downtown and stay the night."

"For what?" Theo scoffs. "I'm not doing anything illegal."

"Come on, babe," Daphne says. "Let's go."
She usually has a cooler head when it comes to these types of run-ins, probably because Slughorn doesn't ride her the way he does Draco and Theo. Slughorn has it out for them, the same way he had it out for their fathers, and the fat bastard doesn't even bother to know that Theo's dad doesn't give a shit if he rots in jail. Theo's first call would be Draco or Darian, not his dad, but that's not important.

Daphne said to go, so they're going.

"Later, Chief," says Theo, tossing him a lazy salute. He starts the engine when Slughorn says something; probably something along the lines of 'I'll get you next time, you meddling kids,' but Theo can't hear it. He only hears Daphne laughing in his ear as he flips the bike around, heading the other way down the narrow tree-lined path.

Daphne's perched on Theo's bike, reclining against it when Astoria emerges from class, dark eyes widening at the sight of her big sister being the stuff of every teenage boy's wet dreams. "Keep walking," Daphne lazily advises Ron Weasley, whose mouth snaps shut when he realizes she's noticed him noticing her.

"You heard her," Theo said, slinging an arm around Daphne from behind and winking at Ron, who flips him off, meeting up with his sister Ginny.

"Hey, Gin," Daphne calls, tilting her head to lean against Theo's chest, and Ginny turns. "Party tonight at Malfoy's. You coming?"

They're not friends, exactly, but Ginny's taken a drag from Daphne's joint before. She's cool. More importantly, it makes Ron furious.

"Yeah," Ginny says, "su-"

"No, she isn't," Ron snaps, incensed, and Daphne winks at him before turning her head, slipping her tongue in Theo's ear. "You two are fucking disgusting," Ron shouts at them, hurrying his sister to the beat-up old station wagon his brother Percy used to drive as Daphne and Theo laugh, waving him away.

"Wait, it's Draco's party?" Astoria says, because unfortunately Daphne forgot her sister was within hearing distance while she was busy trying to ruin Ron Weasley's day. "Can I come?"

"Absolutely fucking not," says Daphne, because Astoria is a freshman and fifteen and a fucking baby bird and nobody, nobody, at that party is going to be anything but trouble. Daphne included.

"Aw, come on, Greengrass," Theo drawls in her ear. "Let the kid have some fun."

Daphne elbows Theo, who nips at her neck, and then she's turned her head and he's trapped her into a kiss and she's scolding him, muttering to his lips about how he needs to just shut the fuck up once in a while, but then her tongue is in his mouth and his hands are on her bare torso and fuck, she's forgotten about Astoria again, until someone else sighs loudly.

"Nott," says Draco's voice, "what the fuck is this?"

Daphne and Theo break apart, regrettably, and she hunts for chapstick in her bag while Theo explains to Draco why he doesn't have the Impala anymore and only has a bike.

"You weren't at lunch. Have you two honestly just been fucking all day?" Draco says, exasperated, and Astoria giggles. "Better get it out of your systems before tonight. I don't want people throwing up in my house just because you two can't keep your hands to yourselves."

"True," Theo drawls, "I usually leave the vomit-inducing to you. Hate to have to steal that crown."

"Tighten up," Draco mutters, "that was abysmal."

"Hey, Draco," Astoria simpers coquettishly, and Daphne notices that while Draco was talking to Theo, her little sister rolled the waistband of her white miniskirt. Subtle, Daphne sighs internally, and gives her sister a glare of admonishment as Draco glances distractedly elsewhere.

"Yeah, hi Astoria—"

"Come on, let's go," Daphne suggests, leaping down from Theo's bike and giving him a parting kiss. "I'll just take her home and then I'll meet you at Draco's."

"Wait," Astoria says, looking disappointed. "I don't want to go home, Daph—"

"She can come if she wants," Draco says, giving Astoria half a glance and shrugging. "I've got errands to run, anyway. Can't do it on a bike," he grumbles, giving Theo a purposeful glare.

"Don't sulk so much, sweetheart," Theo advises, giving Draco's cheek a smack before nudging Daphne. "Babe," he says, with the puppy-dog look he usually gives her when he's about to ask for a favor, "give Draco your car so he can buy cups and perfect his party mixtape."

"I don't have a party mixtape," Draco says irritably.

"Sure you don't," Theo soothes him, and Daphne is hesitant, but after a moment of consideration (and after glancing at Astoria, who is feverishly begging Daphne with a desperate glance), she grudgingly retrieves her keys.

"Drive carefully," she warns Draco, who rolls his eyes. She knows he's a good driver, but still. She wants it to be perfectly clear she'll murder him if he ever lets anything happen to Astoria, who looks positively rapturous at the prospect of going to the liquor store with Draco Malfoy. "And as for you," she says to Astoria, "you are not drinking tonight, do you understand me? You can stay for a bit, but that's it."

Astoria, unfortunately, is too excited to listen. "Oh, Daph, you should bring your tattoo gun!"

"Your what?" Theo and Draco say in unison, and Daphne groans.

"You're not supposed to know about that," she says to Astoria, who smiles sheepishly. Daphne hides it in her car, which is the one place her mother doesn't snoop through during the day because it's here, in the school parking lot. She hasn't used it on skin yet, because duh, but she thinks she could probably figure it out. Provided it isn't Astoria she's using for a guinea pig.

Luckily, though, there are other things to discuss. "We'd better go," Theo tells Daphne, catching that Draco has noticed Ron where he and Ginny have stopped to talk to Dean and Seamus in the parking lot. Like this morning, Ron and Draco are now giving each other murderous glances, which is apparently as annoying to Theo as it is to Daphne.

"Hey," Theo warns, backhanding Draco in the chest and nudging him towards Daphne's car. "Pick a new fight, Malfoy. This show's getting old."

Draco makes a gruff sound of agreement, his attention shifting slightly, but not quite enough.
"Weaslette's gotten hot," he muses unhelpfully, looking like he might have licked his lips like a cartoon wolf. Beside him, Astoria makes a tragic face of disappointment, wilting slightly.

"He's an idiot," Daphne reminds her sister, "who just wants to fuck Ginny to piss off her brother—which, by the way, is objectively stupid," she adds to Draco, giving him a warning glance. "And not even worth it."

"Sure," Draco says, smug as always, though he concedes to grant Astoria the almighty gift of his attention. "Hey, you into Coheed and Cambria?" he asks her, pulling the cd out of his bag.

"I love Coheed and Cambria," Astoria lies dotingly, and Daphne turns to Theo with an eye roll, beckoning him back on the bike.

"Let's go, stud," she says, and he smiles at her in a way that reminds her how much she likes his mouth. It also reminds her that she owes him something, and that she thinks she can remedy it. Draco's driveway conveniently stretches out to the backyard, and if Theo pulls his bike around near Lucius' shed, she can go down on him out of sight from the street.

She loves the way Theo's torso looks in daylight. He's always been lanky, but lately his natural weediness has sprouted abs and one of those Adonis belts, with the V-shape that angles down along the bones of his hips. It's exciting, feeling the hard crevices of him. Probably as exciting as her softness, Daphne guesses, and she thinks again that maybe she really does want to have sex with him. She likes everything they've done so far. She especially likes when Theo goes down on her, something she was nervous about until it was him, which brings her back to thoughts of his mouth.

"Let's go," he agrees, and suddenly, she can't wait to touch him. She thinks she probably won't wait long at all, and then, true to form, once she decides not to, she doesn't. The moment they pull into Draco's house, she has him leaning back on his bike with her hands on his hips, and while he's gritting her name through his teeth, she thinks: Yeah, maybe tonight.

Maybe it'll be tonight.

The party that night is the same as every party, even when Ron shows up with Seamus and Dean. Theo and Draco have done the same thing with the older Weasley brothers' parties—because this is Diagon, and it's a small town, and it's not like there's anything else to do.

"Weasley," Draco says coolly, "glad you could make it. Weaslette," he adds to Ginny, handing her a beer, and Theo watches with half a smile as Draco employs a little of the panache he usually reserves for special occasions of seduction. Her cheeks flush instantly in the same moment Ron makes a face, which makes it clear they'd never planned on coming until Ginny insisted. Theo thinks, fuck, she doesn't stand a chance, and then he laughs to himself, knowing Ron Weasley's kid sister is about to fall victim to the charms of Draco Malfoy.

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Daphne says, reappearing from the bathroom. She slips comfortably under Theo's arm, eyes narrowing at the sight of Draco flirting with Ginny. "Really, her? How transparent is he?"

"Apparently not very," Theo says, gesturing to where Ron looks like he's about to lose his mind. "It's very good revenge, if you want to think about it that way."

"Ugh. He could at least not do it in front of Astoria," she says, gaze flicking to her sister, who is definitely drinking. Both the Greengrass daughters refuse to follow instructions, it seems, and Theo's amused by that, but he knows Daphne won't be. He lures her away from Astoria and grabs Draco, yanking him away from Ginny.

"How about you put that tattoo gun to use, Greengrass?" Theo says to her, and this, he knows, is enough to get Draco's attention. The only thing Draco loves more than his mom, his dick, and his books is the prospect of getting tattoos, which is another thing Lucius has forbidden until Draco's eighteenth birthday, along with joining the Club. "We should try it out."

They're just drunk enough that this is a great idea, but not so drunk that Theo has any lingering doubts Daphne can do it. Though, in fairness, he always thinks she can do anything, whether he's been drinking or not.

"Yeah, let's," Daphne says, and turns to Draco. "So what d'you want?"

"A dragon," he says instantly, "on my forearm."

"Yeah, aim lower," Daphne says with a scoff. "I'm just a girl with a tattoo gun from a pawn shop, not a fucking professional tattoo artist."

"Or someone with a sterile environment," Theo says, "though, throw some vodka on there and I can only assume we're good to go."

"Fine," Draco says, and settles for his initials on the inside of his bicep.

Theo approves of the choice. Daphne's always been especially good at lettering, which he knows from having watched her do it in her school books since they were kids. He hopes he can talk her into singing tonight, too, which she doesn't do often, but it always reminds him of the fifth grade talent show when she does. She'd borrowed her dad's acoustic guitar and sung Fleetwood Mac, looking like an angel in her white prairie dress. Baby, I'd give you my world, he can still hear her sing in the bell-like tones of her soprano, and it always prompts a shiver in his bones.

Draco's pleased with it, more arrogant than ever from the impulsive thing he's just done. He wants to try tattooing Daphne in return, but she says no, so he immediately loses interest and bails.

"What about you?" Daphne asks Theo, and he shrugs, sipping from his beer.

"Surprise me," he says, and she takes his arm, giving him a narrow, angular heart just beneath the fold of his elbow, on the inside of his forearm. The needle scratches at his skin and stings and he suspects he now has a little of Draco's blood flowing through the tunnels of his veins, but Daphne's hand holding him steady is warm, comforting, sure. His skin is red and a little swollen, but when she finishes, she looks up at him with a smile.

"It's so you always have my heart on your sleeve," she says. Her auburn hair is falling forward into her face, and he fucking loves her. He wants to aim his fist at the sky, Judd Nelson-style, because he loves her and she's his and he's got her heart on his sleeve, but he doesn't.

Instead, he pulls her to her feet and says, "Dance with me."

In the background, Draco's been playing 90s hip-hop (because Professor Narcissa once told him Straight Outta Compton influenced a whole generation and Draco thinks of himself as Revolutionary with a capital R even though he is most certainly Not with a capital N) and Theo wants to dance with Daphne. He wants to dance with his girl, and sure, he wishes it was some smooth 70s classic rock ballad so he can hold her close, but he'll take what he can get, and she smiles at him and lets him do it. She grinds on him to Shoop, which she knows most of the words to (You're packed and you're stacked, 'specially in the back! she mouths with absolute delight),
The song becomes Gold Digger, which, fair enough, is a jam, and then transitions to Candy Shop, which has Daphne's hips swaying in a mesmerizing figure-eight. Everyone else is dancing now, lurching sloppily to the music while 50 Cent raps about blow jobs. Theo, meanwhile, has his hands tight on Daphne's black jeans, his thumbs toying with the hem of her blue t-shirt and a little sweat starting to drip down his back. His new tattoo still stings and he wonders if he should do something to treat it, but discards that when Daphne leans against his chest, reaching behind her to pull him closer. Give it to me, baby, nice and slow, Fiddy says, and Theo thinks through gritted teeth, You're not helping.

Daphne turns, laughing, and her black eyeliner is smudged, and she's perfect. Theo takes another sip of his beer, letting her hands slide under his t-shirt, and yeah, everyone's watching, but fuck it. He kisses her, she kisses him back, and they only slow down when the song changes again, this time to Let Me Love You. This one is slower, a little closer to the ballad he was looking for, and he pulls her into his chest, cradling the back of her head.

His lips brush her cheek, his hands running along the slickness of the sweat on her skin. She wraps her arms around his neck, humming along.

"I'm going to get a real tattoo soon," she muses in his ear, just loud enough over the music for him to hear her voice. "A snake and a rose, I think. Around my upper arm. For my dad," she adds, "and for you."

"I'm the rose?" Theo says, and he's joking, but she smiles up at him.

"Maybe," she says, and he tips her chin up, kissing her again. She tastes like euphoria and the vodka soda she's been drinking and he's pretty sure he could find an empty room somewhere to do a lot more than kiss her, but she stiffens, frowning. "Where's Draco?" she says, and Theo blinks, looking around with suspicion.

Sure enough, Ron's still there, but Ginny's not at his side. It seems a little like Ron and Theo have sorted this out at the exact same moment, and similarly, they both spot Ginny pulling Draco's hand somewhere that looks like it's about to be a room upstairs—where, coincidentally Theo had hoped to take Daphne.

"Hold it," Ron says, launching in front of his sister. "You're not going anywhere with him."

'Hi'm is, of course, delivered with venom, or as much venom as someone like Ron Weasley can conjure, which is more like a juvenile tantrum.

"Oh, shut up, Ron," Ginny says, rolling her eyes, but Ron looks more murderous than usual, so Theo gives Draco a look that says, Don't start.

In reply, Draco lifts his bottle to his lips, smirking something that looks like, Already did.

"Malfoy," Ron growls, "if you so much as look at my sister the wrong way—"

Draco winks at Ginny, who slides her tongue out over her glossless lips.

"MALFOY," Ron snarls, but Theo makes a point of stepping deliberately in front of him, suggesting wordlessly that perhaps he's chosen the wrong place for a turf war.

"Out," Theo says, and Ron's eyes narrow.
"It's not your party," Ron says.

"No," Theo agrees, "but if you'd like to remain in the same condition you came in, then consider it a piece of friendly advice."

Theo's 150% sure that Draco is doing this purely to upset Ron, and he's 800% sure it's working. Ron scowls, letting his gaze cut to Draco.

Draco, meanwhile, throws an arm around Theo's shoulders, posing with all the regality of someone who should definitely get punched in the face, but likely won't. At least not tonight.

"Bye, now," Draco says with obnoxious cheer, and surely—surely—they're going to pay for this someday, but they don't really care about it right now. Theo and Draco watch Ron get dragged out by Seamus and Dean, holding their ranks in silence until the front door shuts, and Theo turns to Draco.

"You're a dumb piece of shit, you know that?" Theo says, and Draco grins, downing the rest of his bottle.

"I'm doing the poor girl a favor," he says, shrugging. "What was I going to do, turn her away?"

"It'd be a first," Theo drily agrees, and Draco laughs, clapping a hand on his shoulder and returning to the party as Theo looks around for Daphne.

He finds her in the backyard with her arms around Astoria, who's sniffling quietly. "Hey," Daphne says, relieved to see him, "thank god you're here. You can drive, right?"

Theo, who doesn't care much for drinking, has had less than a beer. "Yes."

"Can you help me take her home?" Daphne says, stroking her sister's hair. Poor thing, Theo sighs internally. Falling for Draco Malfoy is surely a unique form of punishment.

"Yeah," Theo says, and gestures Astoria around the side yard so she doesn't have to walk through the party, where Draco is almost certainly dancing with some other girl. Daphne flashes him a grateful smile and cups his cheek, and he's disappointed the night with her is over, but it is what it is. He figures he'll probably come back here and help Draco clean up, maybe pass out on the couch like he does when he's avoiding going home, but then Daphne surprises him.

"After we take her home, let's go somewhere," she says softly, and Theo blinks.

"Really?"

"Really," she says, and gives him a smile that he's pretty sure means this night is far from over.

Daphne and Astoria have a bond that means when Daphne says, "Don't tell Mom any of this," Astoria nods and it's as good as a blood oath between them. She sneaks in through Daphne's bedroom window, and though there's no way Viridian or Ava are sleeping, that's not Daphne's problem right now. In terms of punishment, Astoria takes the early shift. Daphne will take the brunt of it later.

"Come on, let's go," she says when they pull away with the headlights off, but they've got nowhere to go, really, so Theo drives them back to the high school. They park in the parking lot and make their way to the football field. Obviously, neither of them are much for team sports. They're adept at hopping fences, though, and when the field proves uninteresting, they make their way past it to the pool.

The whole place is so dead it's like they're ghosts, like time is somehow suspended. Daphne pulls off her shirt, then unzips her pants, and Theo sighs like, Really? and she smirks like, Really. He strips down to his boxers and she's left in her bra and underwear, and then she jumps into the pool, full cannonball, because that's her style. Everything about Theo is meticulous and hard-won, but Daphne likes to push him, to shove him out of his comfort zone. To her, he is most beautiful when he's like that, when he's thrilled and fucking scared and alive as shit, which he always is when he's jumping in after her.

"Fuck," he says when he surfaces, flinging his dark hair out of his eyes, and she floats over to him, wrapping her legs around his hips as he slides an arm around her ribs. "And to think," he says, "we could have just gone to the Leaky and had bagels."

She shuts him up with a kiss that escalates to friction, her fingers running through his wet hair. Her makeup is probably a lost cause by now, but she's not worried about it. He tastes like salt and chlorine and she's just tipsy enough that the heat of his touch is positively fucking infernal. She can feel his hand on her ass like it's going to leave a mark, like it's going to brand her, and his fingertips are tracing her skin in smooth little circles that are never, not ever, going away. She licks at his lips and gives him sloppy, syrupy kisses, over his cheeks and up to his eyes and then to his forehead, where she lingers.

"I love you," she says.

He looks up at her, half-smiling, half-dazed.

"And I love you," he replies, and if only all of life can be this simple. If only life is as easy as when Theo holds her close, kisses her hard, slides his hands over her body. If only the whole thing could always be as uncomplicated as her hips grinding against his while she listens for the inevitable gasp that follows. She squirms and wriggles and moans and tightens her fingers in his hair, and it's just that, and it's perfect, and it's easy. Just her and him, both of them stupid and young and in love.

How many times in life does a person even get that lucky?

With him, every opportunity is the perfect one.

"Theo," she says, when her whole body is flooded with numbness and bliss and his chin is resting on her shoulder, his lips pressed to the line of her clavicle. He looks up, and she twists her fingers in his hair. "I want you to give me a tattoo," she says.

"Where?" he asks.

She smiles.

"Good question," she says, and floats toward the stairs, beckoning for him to follow.

They go back to her car to retrieve the tattoo gun. Daphne's busy being mysterious, as she loves to do every so often, and while Theo's a little paranoid her dad's going to be out looking for her soon enough, he forgets about it the moment she unzips her jeans for the second time that night.

She tugs her black thong down to show him. "Here," she says, pointing to a spot just below her hips, and he swallows. "We should do it back there, then," he manages to say, gesturing blindly to the backseat of her car, because he can't stop staring at her. "You know, where there's better light."

"Yeah, sure," she says, and she climbs into her backseat. He shoves the two front seats down and clammers in after her, noticing that she's discarded her black jeans altogether. She looks at him for a moment, seeming determined, and then she pulls her underwear down, too.

He looks down at her and thinks for probably the hundredth time that day that he's almost certainly going to die tonight, and that's perfectly fine with him.

"There?" he manages to say, tracing his finger over the spot she's selected, and she nods.

"There," she says, and shows him how to operate the tattoo gun. "I want a heart," she says, "like the one I gave you."

His heart, she means.

It's really not that complicated, though trying not to spill the little tub of ink is messy and he's worried the heart is lopsided. She makes a little hiss of pain at first, startled by the vibration on what is obviously extremely sensitive skin, and he worries the entire time that he's hurting her. Which is good, because if not for that, he would be distracted by how close he is to her bare cunt, which is something he's touched before, and tasted, too, but only in hasty moments of shoving her underwear aside or ducking his head under her skirt. That she's basically naked now, right there in the backseat of her car, is failing to process in his brain, and he can hardly think at all except to think Dear god, please say I'm not hurting her, please tell me I never will.

He finishes and blows lightly over her skin, which is super definitely not medically sound but he doesn't want it to sting, and it's what people do when they get cuts and bruises. It's what people do when something hurts.

Then he kisses it softly, and his lips are right there, so he slides down a little lower, hearing her breath come short.

This is not easy to do in a car, but he manages to arrange her legs in a butterfly around his head, and then he kisses her between the lips of her pussy, which he is hard-pressed not to notice is wet for him. It's almost worth laughing about, really, that it's him she wants, when he is nothing that anyone wants and somehow she, the perfect person—the world's most perfect fucking person—could be with anyone, anyone at all, and she picks him. He sucks her clit and thinks, You picked me, and it suddenly makes him ravenous to please her, desperate for her satisfaction as she moans and quakes around his head.

He was her first kiss, her first orgasm, her first everything, and she is his everything in general, and when she whispers, "Let's do it, please, I want to," he knows this was something that was always going to happen, even if he didn't picture it like this. Are you sure? Yes she's sure. Really, here? Yes, here, it's the perfect night, Theo, and I don't want to wait anymore, I want you, I want to know what you feel like. I want you too, I want you so badly, but I can wait for a better time, a better place—No, there is no better time Theo, this is the one, can't you feel it? Don't you feel it in the air, aren't you sure?

She strips him carefully, almost gingerly, partially because there's not a lot of room in this coupe of hers but also because he's pretty sure she's more nervous than she seems, but he understands that she doesn't want him to know that. He kisses her hands and tries, with what little resources he possesses, to make it special. He says I love you as many times as he can, calls her babe, calls her Daphne, calls her his. He kisses her in the spots she likes, behind her ear and at the base of her throat. He holds her head with one hand and her fingers with the other. Somehow, through no small amount of fumbling, he's got on the condom from his wallet that he's put on with shaking hands. She pulls him close and he swallows hard and when he angles the tip of his cock at the slit of her cunt, they both suck in a breath.

"Nervous?" he asks her, laughing a little because he's scared shitless, and sure, he wants to do this with her more than he's ever wanted to do anything in his entire life, but he also kind of wants her to say no, so that next time he can be, you know. Ready. Or at least, more ready. Or something. But then no, if she changes her mind he'll die, probably. Or something.

"Yeah, I'm a little nervous," she confesses, and she's taken it off now, the Daphne Blue t-shirt that will forever be her color in his mind, and the pale pink bra, too. She's naked in his arms and they could get caught so easily but who cares, who gives a fuck about any of it. He'd rather go to prison for loving her than anything else. "I'm a little scared, but you're here," she says to him, and kisses him. "Theo," she whispers, "I'm not afraid when you're with me."

He nods, trying not to quake too raucously from nerves, and after another breath to look her in her hazel eyes and center himself, he slides slowly inside her.

She whimpers a little and he stops.

Then she nods, "Slowly," and he moves again. He pushes inside her and he can feel some sort of maddening euphoria, only he tries desperately not to make it too short or too terrible. He has a brief, traumatizing vision of her telling the story someday to some other guy, laughing about the time she lost her virginity to her high school boyfriend and how it was terrible, and that he was probably dead now for all she knew.

The thought's just sobering enough for him not to completely explode, though she doesn't look any more comfortable than she did before. He winces, certain he's going to get some sort of cramp from trying to fit his interminably long legs into the backseat, and then he pulls out of her gently, shaking his head.

"Let's try this instead," he says, sitting upright and pulling her into his lap, and agreeably, she straddles him, and now she's the one who gets to choose how deep he goes and when. She lowers herself onto him, and this time their eyes are locked, she's not flinching from pain, and she nods carefully when she takes all of him inside her. He's still very, very close to losing it, to coming undone with a single fucking shift of her hips, but she rocks slowly, very slowly, and he holds her in his arms while she does.

Hilarious, really, that everyone thinks they've been fucking for ages. Everyone thinks Greengrass and Nott get it all the time—like crazy, like rabbits. In reality, he has been falling in love with every part of her slowly, and as far as what he's wanted all this time, this isn't the only piece, or the best piece, or the last piece. It's not even the most important piece. It's just one piece among many, and Theo is lucky, luckier than she understands, that now, he will forever have a piece of her and keep it for himself. Sure, they have tattoos now, so there are multiple levels of permanence involved, but the fact that they chose each other on this particular night is something they will always keep between them, and that's why they waited. That's why everything that everyone else can see is such a fucking joke. Because she is Daphne Blue in his arms, and she is valuable and rare, and someday, he will be old, and he will still think of the night he held her like this, as close to her now as he has ever been to anyone.

She moans a little, because he's positioned just near her clit, and he holds on barely, just barely long enough for them to come at the same time. It's a fucking miracle, which probably means god was listening to him earlier and now they've entered into some kind of contract which might work out for Theo, or might not. It doesn't matter. It doesn't fucking matter. Theo strokes Daphne's hair and runs his fingers over her spine and thinks about nothing else but the shape of her, about the beat of her heart, and about how it feels to catch his breath.

They sit there for a long time, him still inside her, her arms still tight around his neck.

"I should take you home," he says, and she turns her head, pressing her lips to his cheek.

"I am home," she whispers, and he closes his eyes, holding onto her so gratefully he can't even manage to speak.

---

When she wakes, her head resting on his chest where they've somehow managed to fall asleep in the reclining seat on the passenger side, it's nearly morning. Consequence of teenage mischief, probably, that they still manage to sleep under the worst and most dastardly conditions.

They should go, Daphne thinks, because her father is probably going to come looking for her soon, and although the high school is hardly going to be the first place he looks, it's still a possibility. Diagon really isn't that big.

"Your dad's going to kill me," Theo says, his voice gravelly with morning, and Daphne stifles a laugh.

"Yeah, probably," she says, and rests her chin on his chest. "Sorry."

"Nah," he says, "worth it."

He plays with her hair, smiling a little absently, like his mind is on other things. On her, but on other versions of her. Maybe the her from last night, which makes her smack his chest with her palm.

"Stop," she says.

"Stop what?"

"Smiling like that."

"Like what?"

"Like you've seen me naked."

His smile broadens, and she groans.

"I said stop—"

"Alright, alright," he says, still looking terribly amused with himself, and then he says again, "I should take you home."

"Mm," she says.

Neither of them move, and she stretches out, her t-shirt rising up above her belly button while she slides her fingers through his lawless hair.

"Let's get bagels," she says, "I'm hungry."

Theo's mouth twitches. "Oh, yeah?"
"Yeah," she says, and then, after a second to consider it, "But before we go—"

"Yes?"

"I think that we should do it one more time," she whispers, and her fingertips trail down over the stubble on his cheeks until they brush his lips, temptingly. She looks at his green eyes and thinks, You make me so soft, you stupid boy.

Theo, in answer, puts his hand on her black jeans, tugs at her blue t-shirt, and thinks, for better or worse, This will always make me think of you.

In the late eighties, Viridian Greengrass named his daughter after the color of his Fender guitar, and a little under two decades later, she makes the shade her own. She claims it as hers, and then she gives Theo Nott permission to make it his. Fast forward a few more years, past the boho and the low-lows into the age of contouring and crop tops, and these things will still be undeniably true.

But in the early 2000s, with nothing in the world to worry about except the world itself, Theo gives Daphne Greengrass' belt loop a tug and pulls her in for a kiss, and like another young man once thought, the color Daphne Blue is Theo Nott's most prized possession.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Happy Valentine's Day, lovers! In case you care what's new with me, One For My Enemy is now available on my tumblr. Thank you for reading!
You Make My Dreams

Pairing: Jamcissa (James Potter x Narcissa Black)

Universe: muggle AU

Rating: M for sex and language

Summary: Narcissa and her sisters are a trio of burlesque dancers in downtown Los Angeles, while James is an aspiring actor. Turns out the industry of starving artists in L.A. is really rather small.

A little lower.

Please, god, a little lower, nearly there—

Yes, okay, good. Good, that's good.

Oh. Oh, better.

Yes, come on. There it is, blondie, right there. Suck on it a little, come on, give me something—

"Good?"

"Yeah, so good—"

Jesus, a little variation would be nice. Spell the alphabet, I don't care—

"You look uncomfortable."

"Hm? I'm not, I'm fine."

"You're fine?"

"Yeah, I'm… I like it, keep going."

Her phone buzzed from where she'd discarded her purse on the bed and she grimaced, turning to dig it out of her bag.

"Um," said Lucius, lifting his head. "Are you really going to take that right now, or—?"

"It's probably just my sister. Do you have a condom?" she said, and he blinked, surprised.

"I… Really? But—"

"Put it on," she advised, hitting answer, "this'll only take a sec." She raised the phone to her ear, unsurprised by the name on the screen. It was always either Andromeda or Bellatrix, though far more often the latter. "Andy?"

"Cissa, hi. How was the coffee date?"
Andromeda sounded nervous, which wasn't a good sign.

"Um," Narcissa said, glancing down at where her skirt had been pushed up around her waist. "Good."

"Great, good, excellent. So, about tonight—"

"The Edison, right?"

"Yeah. No, wait, sorry—no, it's Clifton's tonight." Narcissa mentally added 'frantic' to the list of Andromeda's unusual qualities, along with 'distracted.' "But listen, I called because, um. Okay, so, about Bella—"

Narcissa looked up, watching Lucius eagerly unroll the condom over his dick.

"Yeah?"

"I'm going to tell her tonight."

"No," Narcissa said, shooting upright. "Really?"

She glanced up at an expectant Lucius and frowned, about to mouth for him to wait before swiftly changing her mind. It wasn't like it was any harder to have this conversation on her hands and knees. "Quietly," she warned, beckoning him.

His surprise lasted about half a second before he slid his hands hungrily over her ass, not needing to be told twice.

Andromeda, meanwhile, was still parsing uncertainly through her explanation. "I know it's not ideal timing, but honestly, will it ever be? I'm starting to think I should just get it over with. Ted wants an answer and really, I don't blame him. I know the whole thing puts you in a difficult position—"

"Is there lube on that?" Narcissa asked over her shoulder, covering the receiver and arching a brow as Lucius nudged the tip of his cock against her. He paused, then hastily leaned over, removing some from his nightstand and proceeding to spill it over his palm.

"—but I just don't think I can lie to Bella any longer about my plans. And listen, I promise I won't tell her until after the set—"

"What?"

"Not you, Andy. Talking to the barista."

"You're still there?"

"No, I'm—wait, what?"

"You're still at the coffee shop? I thought you said the date was over."

"Yeah, it is, I just—" Lucius pushed inside her with a little hiss between his teeth; to his credit, he was adequately sized. Narcissa shifted onto her elbows, frowning as she returned her attention to the phone. "Look, never mind. You really think it has to be tonight?"
Andromeda sighed. "Yes, Cissy. Tonight. I can't put it off any longer—but I'll warn you before I tell her, I promise."

Narcissa sighed, chewing her lip, and then, remembering she was supposed to be enjoying herself, she glanced over her shoulder at Lucius. "So good," she mouthed to him in reassurance, and he gave her a little smirk, traces of his fingers already manifesting on her skin.

"I've been wanting to do this since I first saw you dance," he said, and Narcissa held a finger to her lips, silencing him.

"Narcissa, are you still there?"

"Yes, Andy, I'm here—"

"You're not upset, are you?"

Narcissa grimaced. "I mean, it's not great news," she admitted, "but if you're sure—"

"I'm sure, Cissa. Really sure. But we can talk about it more if you want," Andromeda offered, gratuitously sympathetic. "Are you meeting us at the venue, or are you coming home first?"

Curtain call was at nine, which was seven hours away, and there was absolutely no chance Narcissa would be staying here longer than twenty more minutes.

"I'll see you at home. Bella's meeting us at the venue, though."

"Right. Yeah, I know. Okay, see you later—want me to get you anything?"

Lucius gave a low groan. Twenty minutes had been generous; Narcissa would be out the door in fifteen. Probably best, as she was starving.

"The salad with the strawberries, please?"

"You got it. See you soon."

Narcissa hung up the phone, tossing it aside, and straightened to glance lasciviously at Lucius. This was practice for later, really. No point wasting her best moves now, but it was at least more fun than lazily browsing her Netflix queue.

"Come for me," she breathed in Lucius' ear, raking her fingers through his hair.

Conveniently, he obliged.

A trio of pretty burlesque dancers—sisters, at that—could find fairly steady work in the downtown Los Angeles scene, surprising as that seemed. The Edison, a 1920s-themed bar located in an old city power plant, was one of the better venues for it, but that evening would be Clifton's, which was possibly one of the strangest and most eccentric places downtown. The bottom floor was a menagerie of taxidermy that looked straight out of the Matterhorn ride at Disneyland; the second floor was an enormous courtyard designed around a massive tree, from which two levels of balconies could be viewed. Typically, Narcissa and her sisters were distributed along the top floor, grinding slowly against glass barriers and turning sultry glances downward for the benefit of Clifton's patrons. Elsewhere on the third floor, in a marginally more private ballroom, there was a live brass band and, of all things, swing dancing; an abrupt shift from the club mix outside.

That particular night wasn't anything out of the ordinary. These types of appearances were less choreographed than they were curated; as in, it wasn't about the dancing so much as how the sisters looked against the sparkling darkness of the club. Bella usually dressed Narcissa in black, offsetting the platinum blonde of her hair. "Everyone loves a little mystery," she always said, so while she and Andromeda wore red lace balconette bras with matching panties and garters, Narcissa usually wore a black satin bustier, her hair left in pillow-tousled waves down her back.

The three of them always got ready together in the makeshift dressing room, fixing lipstick and refreshing curls, sometimes interacting with other dancers. It was the highlight of Narcissa's evening, usually, as the dancing itself had gotten old. There wasn't a lot to think about anymore, aside from not tripping in her stiletto heels. She used to people-watch while she arched her back and swung her hips, but even her curiosity was mostly tired. Club mating rituals rarely changed enough to make it worth taking stock from night to night.

Typically, Narcissa preferred the elegance and careful rehearsal of their performances at The Edison to the chaotic, palpable weirdness of Clifton's. There was only one good thing about being there, though it wasn't always a guarantee, and she wasn't sure yet if tonight would be worth the hassle of finding out.

She followed her sisters back to the dressing room after their performance and changed methodically into normal underwear (and actual clothes), only half-listening while Bellatrix said something about their next audition.

"—a great opportunity, Cissy. Though, now that I think about it we should put you in white. Also, I know you have that whole wide-eyed ingenue thing going for you, but a little smiling might help —"

"Yeah, Bella, sure—"

"Andromeda agrees with me. Don't you, Andy?"

"Hm? Oh, right, yeah… but actually, um. Bella?" ventured Andromeda, looking demurely hesitant despite the flame-red of her lips and nails. She took their eldest sister by the crook of her arm, angling a deliberate glance over her shoulder at Narcissa. "Can we talk?"

That was warning enough. Narcissa grabbed her bag and pivoted away the moment Bella turned to Andromeda, leaving her costume behind and figuring it was only fair to make her sister take it home. She had no interest in being there after Andromeda confessed she would be leaving; Bella would assume Narcissa planned to stay, probably, which meant she'd have to make up her mind about whether or not she was going to.

Which she definitely wasn't interested in doing right now. Certainly not after a long night.

Narcissa wandered out of the dressing room, smothering a little disappointment when she found the rest of the club mostly empied. Luckily, she caught the motion of the alley door just before she slipped out through the exit, registering voices from outside. Downtown L.A. wasn't exactly the safest place to wander the shadowed spaces between buildings, but she was used to reading the atmosphere by now. She knew what kind of yelling to stay away from, and this wasn't that.

"Lil, come on—"

"Fuck off, James!"

"Oh, come on, I was joking—"

"You're an arrogant shitbag, James Potter, and I'm fucking sick of it. I don't know what possessed me to sleep with you in the first place."

Narcissa waited, half-concealed behind the door.

"Fine, Lily," James sighed, sounding exhausted. A fair descriptor, as it was nearly two in the morning. "If you want to storm out, storm out. I won't stop you."

"Don't tell me what to do, asshole!"

Narcissa heard the sound of heels clicking down the alley, and then she stepped down from the stoop, catching sight of James. He was in his usual Clifton's disguise: neatly-parted hair, contact lenses, a white collared shirt and suspenders. He was one of the hired swing dancers, an aspiring-something, like everyone in Los Angeles. Screenwriter, actor, musician, dancer, the list was endless. Fame, unfortunately, was a very fickle mistress at times. At others, it was a recalcitrant whore.

"Sounds bad," she remarked, and James turned, hands in his pockets as he pivoted.

"Try not to sleep with your partners," he advised grumpily, and Narcissa shrugged.

"They're my sisters," she reminded him, "so if I did, we'd have a completely different set of problems."

To that, he gave an unwilling chuckle, pulling a joint out of his folded sleeve and offering it to her. "You want?"

"Need to light it, dumbass."

He rolled his eyes, reaching into his pocket for a lighter. "Here," he said, handing her the joint, and she placed it between her lips as he brought the little flame up to the edge of the cigarette paper. "Good night?"

"Oh, you know. Same old." She inhaled deeply, choking a little. "Yikes, this is—"

"Shitty, I know. Best we had in the loft." He shared an apartment with three other roommates, all fellow aspiring-somethings. One had a small part on a soap opera, while the other two were struggling musicians.

"Haven't seen you in weeks," James commented, and she made a face, handing him the joint.

"I know. We've been busy."

"Heard there's some interest in a reality show for you three?"

"Yeah, maybe, but that's not happening now. Andy's out."

"Out out?"

"Out out."

James inhaled, shaking his head. "Shame. She's really good."

Narcissa elbowed him sharply, prompting him to cough out a small cloud of smoke. "Don't."

"No, I'm serious. I mean Bellatrix is all tits and terrifying bedroom eyes or whatever, but Andy's got solid technique." He paused, glancing at her. "So do you, for what it's worth."
Of course she did. Narcissa had fallen in love with ballet first, then branched out to jazz and hip-hop. The easiest road to fame was the one her sisters had already paved for her, though, so burlesque it was.

"I haven't seen you dance in ages," she said offhandedly, taking the joint from his fingers, and James' mouth half-twitched.

"Got plans now?" he asked.

She considered it, exhaling with purposeful deliberation. "It's late."

"Yeah, and we're young, aren't we?"

She regarded him swiftly in silence.

"I take it you and Lily are broken up again?"

"I wasn't implying anything," he said quickly, but shrugged. "But yeah, I'd say so."

She took a long drag, exhaling, "Wonder if it'll last the week."

He slid her a grin, or a smirk. Hard to tell in the dark.

"You dating anyone, Black?" he asked.

"Went out with someone this morning."

"Yeah?"

She shrugged. "Just some guy who saw me dance last week. His dad's got some new hotel going up or something, I don't know," she lied. She knew perfectly well who was building the latest high rise downtown, just like she knew the Malfoy logo was bound to grace the skyline. "Bella said she thought we'd get along, which is probably code for 'blow him so he'll book us,' I think."

James nodded, unsurprised. "Do you? Get along, I mean."

Narcissa thought first of Lucius' mouth on her clit, then of the black card he'd put down to buy her coffee. "Well enough, I guess."

"Good for you." James reached over, brushing her fingers as he took another drag from the joint. "Need to go back inside, or—?"

"Nah." Andromeda and Bellatrix would be fighting for hours, probably, and Narcissa had no interest in sticking around to watch them do it. Instead, she watched James extinguish the smoldering joint with the pads of his fingers, shaking them out when they stung. "You're a fucking idiot," she noted, and James slid a hand over his hair, grinning. It was slicked back tonight, which he only did when he was performing. Otherwise, it usually fell into his eyes.

"Come on," he said, beckoning to her. "Since you're here, I'll even spring for an Uber."

"Decadent," she remarked drily, and he smiled at her, giving her a wink as he pulled out his phone.

Sirius was at a cast party, he said, while Remus and Peter were playing at Perch. They'd probably gone out with the rest of the hired musicians, James explained as he let her into his apartment, and if she wanted, they could meet up with them.
Nah, she didn't; Okay, a nightcap, then.

He poured her some cheap whiskey, diluting it with off-brand ginger ale, and then slid the glass across the counter to her. She stirred it with a finger, shaking her head. She wasn't rolling in money, exactly, but James was a full on mess. She doubted there was anything but limes and beer in his fridge, and it gave her a little ache of some nameless, shapeless thing, like an itch.

Someone needed to take care of him. He was just such a fucking disaster that being here was practically community service.

"Quit it," he said, observing her.

"Quit what?"

"That, all of it. Judging me. I gave you the good stuff, you know. It's luxe, baby."

He'd winked at her, the little shit, and she took a sip, making a face. "And to think Lily called you arrogant."

They all knew each other. Small industry, if you could call it that, which meant Lily and Narcissa had definitely sat together in waiting rooms for auditions before. Bella had once tried to recruit Lily for their burlesque act; something to do with wanting a redhead as part of the fantasy suite of sisters. In the end, the two had argued over costumes, and Lily had stormed out.

Obviously, though, they still ran in the same circles.

To Narcissa's surprise, James winced at the mention of his fight with Lily. "You heard that?" he asked, and Narcissa gave a disinterested nod. "Damn. Thought maybe you wouldn't find out until it was too late."

Maybe he was torn up about it. Always hard to tell with him.

"Actually, I think your arrogance is one of your better qualities," she assured him. "Comes with being good at things, you know."

She immediately regretting being nice to him when he smiled broadly. "You think I'm good?"

"Not anymore, I don't."

She took another sip, glancing around his apartment, and then snuck a look at him. He was one of those weirdos who really pulled off suspenders, something she couldn't honestly say about too many other men. Which wasn't to say he didn't look just fine in a t-shirt, but he definitely had an old-fashioned sort of handsomeness, like Matthew Rhys or James Marsden. Someday, someone would want James Potter for a period piece or something, and he'd win an Oscar, or at least a Golden Globe. He could sing, too, though Narcissa only knew that from a drunken night (or drunken early morning, more likely) in K-Town, so maybe that impression wasn't entirely accurate.

She blinked, registering a hand on her elbow.

"Come on," James was saying, snapping her free of her thoughts. "Hear that?"

His neighbor was playing Despacito.

"These walls are paper thin," she said, scowling her disapproval, and he shrugged, pulling her off the stool.
"Sure, but why waste it," he said, and spun her under his arm, yanking her back in for what she realized was a salsa only after her feet had already begun to follow the familiar rhythms, her hips expertly matched up with his.

She'd asked him once who taught him ballroom dancing and he'd said his mother, who was basically elderly from the time he was born. James had come from old money, the kind who still enrolled their daughters in debutante balls, so this sort of thing came as naturally to him as breathing. She was pretty sure he could have a nicer apartment if he wanted, but he strictly reserved his trust fund for when his roommates couldn't make rent. It was a pride thing, she guessed, or a stubbornness thing. He was hell-bent on making it on his own, and who knew. Maybe he'd be one of the rare ones who actually would.

James dipped her low, shifting his hands along her spine, and then brought her back up, one hand securing her neck. She would never admit it, but the song was sort of feverishly danceable, even for her professionally-salacious hips. She gave herself a little solo choreography, embellishing the steps, and he gave her an approving grin, spinning her under his arm again.

It was fun, dancing with him. She'd forgotten dancing could be fun. Burlesque was always about the audience, about being the object of fascination, which was less fun than it was erotic.
Ironically, though, Narcissa had always found salsa to be sexier. Ballroom was always about your partner, which made it more intimate. The fact that she was fully clothed and barefoot on James' probably-disgusting carpeted floors seemed somehow perfectly irrelevant, at least temporarily.

The door behind them burst open somewhere around the song's bridge and Sirius' broody cheekbones appeared in the frame, taking up most of the doorway until he was nudged forward to make room for Remus, who shuffled in while struggling to hold an amp and a guitar.

"NARCISSAAAAAA," called Sirius, winking at her. They were cousins or something, not that it mattered. He'd been dramatically cast out by his parents for either being an asshole or sucking cock (unclear which unforgivable crime came first) long after the Blacks had stopped doing
Thanksgiving together. "Long time no see."

"Pads," came Remus' frustrated growl, "for fuck's sake, move—"

"You're home," James said, a little breathless by the time he came to a halt.

Narcissa couldn't tell if he was actually disappointed, or if that was just her imagination.

"Are we dancing?" Sirius asked, stripping off his leather jacket and tossing it on the couch. "I could dance," he purred, and clearly, he'd been drinking. He appeared to be doing his best impersonation of the lead guy from The 1975, and Narcissa glanced at James, who shrugged.

"Hall and Oates?" he asked her.

She stifled a laugh. "I mean…"

"Don't you fucking dare," groaned Remus, just before Sirius approvingly hit play on You Make My Dreams. It was common knowledge, at least as far as Narcissa could tell, that it was Sirius' favorite song, and therefore Remus' least favorite. When it came to music, James liked everything, or maybe nothing. Maybe he just liked fucking with everyone around him.

He pulled Narcissa into his arms again, tugging her into a too-fast swing pattern that didn't remotely suit the music.

"James, what the fuck—"
"Come on," he said in her ear, "let me show off a little."

She sighed, shaking her head, but permitted him to set his hands on her waist.

"Don't throw me," she warned.

In answer, he promptly threw her in the air, catching her with her legs around his hips, and then dropped her back to her feet, locking her against his chest. She landed perfectly because of course she did, but still. He probably thought he was so fucking smooth.

"Oops," he said, and she wondered why she didn't hate him.

"You're hopeless," she told him, and slid her fingers over his hair, one wave coming loose to fall into his hazel eyes.

Remus dragged Sirius to bed when Peter came home two hours later (his bed was the couch, which was where Sirius had opted to pass out). It was nearly four by then, and James told Narcissa he'd take her home if she wanted. "Just have to swap out my contacts," he said, disappearing into his 'room,' and she followed him behind the curtain that served as his door, pausing just inside it.

He shared the closet-sized room with Sirius, or had at first, until it seemed like maybe Sirius had taken up residency in Remus' bed. There was a desk that served only to hold their individual headshots and the paperwork for Sirius' TV royalties, a calendar marked with auditions and gigs, and a whiteboard where James scribbled addresses for go-sees. Sirius, naturally, had left his mark in Sharpie with a drawing of a gigantic, hairy cock. Narcissa wandered over to it, picking up the dry-erase marker, and drew a tiny lightning bolt in the corner of the board.

"Okay," James said behind her, rifling around in the pockets of his jeans. "Just let me find my keys, and then we can—"

"My sister's leaving," Narcissa said, turning from where she'd been blankly staring at the whiteboard, and James stopped, dragging his thoughts from wherever they'd been. "I don't know what I'm going to do when she goes," she confessed.

From the living room, Peter gave a loud snort, apparently already asleep. James glanced over, shutting the curtain, and turned back to Narcissa, gesturing for her to sit beside him on the bed. "You don't want to dance with Bella anymore?"

"I don't know." And she didn't. "I like dancing, but not, you know. Like that."

"But you're so good at it."

"Yeah, but I've been doing it for five years, James. Without Andy there's no deals on the table, and to be honest, I don't know if it's worth it. I mean, at some point we have to admit this shit's not working, right?"

A practical thing to say, she reminded herself, though James didn't look like he agreed.

"Dunno, Black." He leaned back on his elbows, looking at her. "I'm not really the person to talk to about giving up."

True, he wasn't. "You're really that set on being famous?"

"I'm set on doing what I love, yeah. Which is apparently eating bar scraps six nights a week and never owning property."

"And driving a shitty car, don't forget that."

"Shitty?" he scoffed. "I believe the word you're looking for is vintage."

(He'd definitely meant shitty.)

"I'm serious, though," she sighed, flopping back on the bed and turning her head to look at him. "I don't know what I'm going to do. I don't know how much I have left in the tank, you know?" she asked, and he nodded, reluctantly understanding. "Without Andy, Bella's going to expect me to hustle. She wants… I don't know. To headline in Vegas or something. Be on TV."

James toyed with her hair. "And you want…?"

"I don't know." She closed her eyes, feeling James lie back to settle his shoulders beside hers. He had a comforting weight to him, like usual. He had a way of being a human anchor.

"Are you really that sure?" she asked him. "You never have doubts?"

"Sometimes I want to be less sure," he admitted. "If I could bring myself to care about a plan b, maybe I would actually take it. Seems unlikely, though."

She could feel him breathing beside her. His cotton shirt had a hole in it near the hem, which she had noticed earlier. Someone needed to take care of him; he was really a mess.

"I guess it makes me sad," James said slowly, "to think you wouldn't be doing this anymore."

She cracked one eye. "Why?"

"I don't know. Because it's a shame to waste it, your talent. Your art." Her eyes fluttered open, and she caught him looking at her. "You were having fun tonight, weren't you?"

"We were fucking around, James. It's not the same thing."

"Kinda, though."

His hand was resting on the bed between them. He didn't own a duvet, the motherfucker, just a set of jersey cotton sheets. She slid her hand over, touching the knuckle of her pinky finger to his.

"I do like dancing," she said. "And I like dancing with you."

"Because I'm arrogant?"

"Because you're good." She paused. "And, you know. Charmingly boastful."

He brushed his fingers over her knuckles, drawing little shapes around the slopes of them.

"You don't have to go," he said after a minute or so. Finally. She wouldn't have been pleased if he'd just assumed, but still. "Yeah?"

"We don't have to do anything. We can just talk. Or sleep."

"Should probably do that," she said.

But then, "Maybe later."
He traced the bones of her fingers lightly.

"Date went that badly, huh?"

He was teasing her, the asshole, like he didn't know what she wanted, or like he wanted her to be the one to ask for it. Arrogant shitbag.

She swatted his hand away, rolling over him until her hair fell around his face, and slid her thumb over his cheeks. He looked good like this, too. And he looked perfectly pleasing in nothing. It wasn't just the suspenders that did it.

"You know how I like it," she murmured to him, "right?"

His hand slid under her tank top, palm stretched out over her ribs. Men had stared at her ass and tits all night and it had been absolutely fucking nothing. She regularly played at sex in her corsets and bustiers, but had mostly foregone the reward.

James gathered her hair in a fist, then parsed it through his fingers, letting the blonde strands spill onto his chest.

"Yeah," he said, "I do," and tilted his chin up, kissing her until the skin under his touch pebbled with longing.

Yes, like that, god yes.

Yes, James, yes, now just—there. Yes, there.

She let out a sigh, wistful and delicate.

"Like that?"

"So good, baby, right there."

Just give it a little—yes.

Yes, like that, oh. Oh, oh.

Oh, fuck yes, yes, yes—

He slid up to reach her mouth, hands tight on her thighs. Small details of physicality were paramount to every discipline of dance; placement of fingers, fluidity at every joint. It was how to translate passion, how to make ugly things look gentle. If the world were as it should be, James Potter would teach a master class in making shame look and feel like innocence. Give the boy an Oscar, give him a Pulitzer, give him the Nobel Prize. This morning she'd been in a penthouse, half-clothed and languid in Egyptian cotton, and now her fully-naked ass was pressed to bare mattress, the sheets twisted up and kicked away from where they'd been tangled around James' ankle. There was a fucking shower curtain separating her from the three drunk boys on the other side of what was definitely not a door, and she was having to be quiet, or trying to be. She had her hands in James' hair, working it free of whatever cheap pomade he probably used that smelled like apples, and her lips were saying things in his ear, nonsense things. You make me so wet, James Potter. I hate you so fucking much for what you do to me, I hate you, I love this, keep going, please don't stop.

He laughed in her mouth. His capacity for joy, with her, was boundless. He would think this euphoric because he could find pleasure in anything, in touching her or not touching her, in waiting or insisting not to wait. He could look at her and make her want to melt, want to leave, want to die like this. He could try to be serious, he could try on Casanova or Romeo just to see how it looked, and maybe it would suit him with someone else, but she'd make him laugh. You're an asshole, James Potter, an arrogant shitbag, and please, please, don't ever stop.

"I missed this," he said. She slid her hand flat against his abs, saturating her palm in the sweat between crevices. The first time she'd seen him dance, they were at Clifton's together. They shared a dressing room that night and she'd looked at him and thought: Good thing he has that smile, because his six pack slopes down on the right. Good thing no one will ever say no to that smile.

"Missed you," he said.

Missionary was usually been-there-done-that territory, but she liked fucking James face to face. There was something about seeing him, or maybe about him seeing her. "Leave them on," she'd said when he tried to take off his glasses, and she hadn't said because I want you to look at me, but he'd figured it out for her. Eye contact. That was another thing they taught you in dance: See everything, and glorify in being seen.

Missed you, missed you, missed you.

She usually declined to stay the night. His apartment was disgusting, and he smelled too much like hope. He was full of pointless dreams, James Potter, in an infectious way, like a virus. Sometimes he made her want things so badly it stung inside her throat.

"You're an idiot," she whispered, angry because she was trapped and sad and maybe a little bit in love with him, and he paused so long she nudged him with her hips. "Do the thing," she said, meaning the thing she liked, and of course, it made him laugh.

"Okay," he said, and hiked one leg over his hip, pulling it up around his waist and turning to speak in her ear. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said in the announcer's voice he'd developed from one or two odd jobs as an auction MC, "you have known her as Dido, as Odette, as Juliet, as Carmen. You have despised her, you have mourned her, you have lusted for her—and for one night, ladies and gentlemen," he said raggedly, "you will have the privilege of loving her."

Narcissa shuddered, digging her nails into his back. She was close now, and surely he could feel it. He always felt things as intensely as she did; birds of a feather, or something. There was a little bit of glitter on his cheek, probably from touching her hair, or maybe from kissing her bronze-oiled shoulders. She probably smelled like alleyway smoke and tasted like cheap whiskey, but for a second, she was something with a little polish, or at least a little shine.

He adjusted her in his arms, catching the gasp that meant he should stay there. "It is my honor to introduce to the stage: Narcissa Black," he said in her ear, brushing her cheek with the line of his jaw.

Then it burst behind her eyes, blinding her like stage lights, and she closed her eyes, bathing in the aftermath of reverie.

"You called me baby," he commented afterwards, one hand thrown over his head. The cotton sheet was pulled low across his hips and around her thighs, draped with minimal effectiveness over them both.

She shrugged.
"It was sex," she said. "Just a sex word."

"You've never said it before."

"Maybe I'm expanding my arsenal."

"Ah." His eyes were closed. "Okay."

She waited a moment, twitching a little in the silence.

"You're not mine," she reminded him.

"I know."

"You and Lily fight all the time, but you make sense. You and me, we're not—" She trailed off, shaking her head. "This is just something we do."

He said nothing. She suspected he understood it, for the most part; that for a hustler, she was really kind of risk-averse. Not like him, and not like Lily. It's why they were the same, why he and his roommates were all the same, because they were fine with gambling their lives, their futures, their feelings. They would chase the things they wanted until it broke their backs, but that wasn't her. Had never been her.

"Though," she murmured, letting out a quiet breath. "The next time you want to break up with her—"

She broke off, glancing at him. He was pretending to sleep, she was sure.

"Let me know," she finished.

His mouth quirked with a furtive smile, and then a long arm slid over her torso, pulling her into him.

"For the record," he said in her ear, adjusting himself to curve around her, "I wasn't planning to apologize any time soon."

She slid her fingers over his forearm, lightly scraping her nails against his skin. He brushed his lips against the back of her neck and inhaled the smell of her, which she was fairly confident was mostly hairspray and body glitter. The sun would be up soon, and then they'd both become aware of how badly they needed to shower.

The dream was never quite as dazzling in the day.

"Idiot. She'll never take you back."

Not that it wasn't still pretty.

"Guess not," he said.

Then Narcissa closed her eyes, falling asleep to the vision of herself before an audience of starlight, floating on clouds with James Potter until the soles of her shoes fell away.

Death of a Con Man, Part I

Pairing: Nottpott (Theo Nott x Harry Potter), background Dramione (Draco Malfoy x Hermione Granger)

Universe: Anastasia AU. Potterverse magic, consistent with canon until 1981.

Rating: M for sex and language

Summary: Seventeen years after Harry Potter and Lord Voldemort both go missing on Halloween, the wizarding world is unrecognizable from what it was: Hogwarts is disbanded, the Ministry of Magic rules with an iron fist, and what remains of Dumbledore's Order of the Phoenix is left to occupy the fringe. While the Order rallies behind their continued belief in the missing Chosen One and the Death Eaters wait zealously for the return of the Dark Lord, there is one man who gives absolutely no fucks about any of it, focused only on securing his next meal. Fortunately or unfortunately for him, he's about to end up with a lot more than he bargained for.

On the occasion of Halloween Eve in 1981, there were two mysterious disappearances which would dominate the politics to follow. One was that of Lord Voldemort, who had caused the deaths of thousands, and whose steady increase of power had seemed virtually unstoppable until that night. Regrettably, even his absence would bring little relief. There was a difference between vanquished and dead and gone, and for now he was only the latter; for how long that would remain true, though, no one could comfortably tell.

The other disappearance was that of Harry Potter, the young son of James and Lily Potter, whose parents had both been killed by Lord Voldemort as the result of some unknowable vendetta. When Aurors arrived on the scene, searching for evidence of either the boy or his parents' killer, it seemed both had vanished without a trace.

Fearing the worst, the wizarding community went into immediate lockdown. The Ministry of Magic secured itself with heightened secrecy laws, forbidding contact between wizards and muggles. Fearing for their children's safety, parents returned to the old ways of educating their families privately, secured within the safety of their tightly enchanted homes. Gradually, the Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry and its board of governors were gradually dismantled by unanimous Ministry vote. Safety first, the Ministry said. Shortly afterwards, Albus Dumbledore, then-Supreme Mugwump, was removed from his position in the International Confederation of Wizards, casting him further into obscurity and effectively censoring him and his followers.

By Harry Potter's eleventh birthday, there was little for him to return to. Thus, when he ultimately failed to resurface, no one was particularly surprised. See? We were right, said the Ministry, deeming the Boy Who Lived a lost cause. The school was vacated entirely within a year, and the castle fell into disrepair shortly after.

The absence of Lord Voldemort, however remained a haunting specter. A pattern of unicorn slayings and unexplained possessions in the late 1990s brought about the rumor he was still out there somewhere; biding his time, awaiting his return. In the years he was at large, a prophecy was revealed in whispers: There was a curse, some said. Lord Voldemort had set a curse upon the Potter bloodline, but somewhere along the line it had backfired. What did this mean? Nobody knew for sure, but Harry was alive somewhere, that much seemed plausible, and if he was alive, then so was Voldemort. The story was the kind that spread like a virus, eerie and fabled, and it remained in the public mythos until even children began to repeat it to each other, bouncing it on their tongues like a playground chant or a nursery rhyme: Neither can live while the other survives.

The longer one stayed away, the more passionate a requisite belief in the other. Two sides of the same coin. Find one, find the other. The Chosen One would rise again. The Dark Lord would be waiting. Eventually, they said, Harry Potter would have to come of age, perhaps returning on such occasion to fight the curse the Lord Voldemort had placed on his family. Some called it the end of days; some looked to the anniversary of the Potters' deaths with hope. Albus Dumbledore, who remained the leader of the Order of the Phoenix and the chief voice of Ministry opposition, offered one shocking announcement before he, too, disappeared without a trace: that the time of Harry Potter's return was coming. When it did, Dumbledore declared he would personally greet young Harry—by then the beacon of a vigilante cause—with open arms, along with anyone who could reunite the boy with his supporters.

It wouldn't be long before things, as they often did, took a turn. Seventeen years after the mysterious night in Godric's Hollow, the Boy Who Lived would do the unthinkable, and rise from the dead once again.

"Oi," said Theo, yanking a worn cloak from atop what appeared to be a huddled pile of laundry. "Wake up."

Nothing. Unsurprising. Some people were such honest to god princesses in the morning—or, as it were, the late afternoon. Unfortunately, Theo didn't have time to bake fresh scones or summon songbirds or whatever else it might take to entice his moderately hungover business partner with the luxury of a gentle waking.

"Oi. Wake up," Theo said again, punctuating the point with the toe of his boot. "Two suits in the Three Broomsticks said something about the Ministry demanding access to Rosmerta's Floo."

That was enough to get any hungover derelict out of bed, this one included. "Balls almighty," said his colleague, fellow grifter, and master of the con: the wanted fugitive (not unlike Theo himself, though 'murder' and 'failure to register' were, at least to an outsider, distinctly different crimes) Sirius Black. "Aurors again?"

It would make the third raid that week, not that Theo had time to fondly relive the memories. Things were always questionable around Halloween, when anarchist rebels devoted to one cause or another ("The Dark Lord will rise again," "The Chosen One will return," et cetera et cetera, so on and so forth) would unhelpfully disrupt Theo's humble intent to quietly scam his way through life. Rather than wasting much thought on whether this Halloween might be any different from the others, Theo spent his spare minutes pre-escape casting the usual concealment charms while Sirius, who hadn't actually made it into the bed, stumbled for his shoes, knocking into the wooden post with a groan.

"We've got to find another scam," Theo reminded him. "A more portable one than the potions, and we have to do it soon," he said firmly, to which Sirius waved a hand of yeah, yeah, I hear you from where he had collapsed on the floor, shoving his left foot into his right boot. "I don't know about you, Black, but my delicate bone structure certainly isn't up for another winter dodging Aurors in this shitty castle."
"Delicate my arse," Sirius said, struggling to resume the position of standing. He rubbed his eyes, squinting up at Theo, who tapped his foot expectantly. "There really is no rest for the wicked these days," Sirius lamented, staggering to his feet as Theo rolled his eyes.

"We can have our usual tarty banter later," Theo advised, tossing a shirt at him. "Right now, it's time to work."

Sirius pulled the shirt on backwards, sighed, and then twisted around, trying again. "You've got the potions, I take it?"

"What's left of them, yes." The trouble with distributing illegal potions was the high risk of contamination, which had unfortunately created a path straight for their whereabouts. A string of junkies suddenly oozing a mysterious blue goo wasn't as covert as Theo might have liked. He'd already made a mental note-to-self to test the ingredients they bought off seedy corner witches in Knockturn; clearly, the eyes of newt had been long expired. Worse, they may have been eyes of… something entirely else. "We'll have to destroy the evidence before we go."

"Fine. I'll hide the papers, you clear out the potions."

Typical. Theo was almost always given the task of mass destruction while Sirius got the leisurely clerical duties. Providing papers to muggleborns and halfbloods had once been a stable source of income, but sadly for both of them, that was a rapidly shrinking demographic. It had been months since anyone had come looking for Ministry papers. An unfortunate development, really, as Theo had a real talent for creating falsified patents of blood status; his calligraphy was, as Sirius regularly put it, positively breathtaking.

"Fine. Just get moving, would you? We should head back to Diagon for news."

Theo stepped away, footsteps echoing through the halls as he exited what was once the Gryffindor common room. The castle had fallen into disrepair almost immediately after its vacancy nearly a decade ago, probably the result of its sentience rebelling. A bit petulant, deciding to make itself unlivable, but that was castles for you. No such thing as hospitality without some lord or headmaster strutting around to make it so.

He sprinted down the stairs, leaping from one to the other (they'd long stopped pausing long enough to settle fully against the landings) until he made his way to the dungeons, illuminating them with a flick of the wand that was his only real possession. Even with how young he'd been when his father died, Theo had already understood that having no family meant he'd go to some fake-penitent Death Eater, or worse, into one of the Ministry's homes for disreputable children (he assumed that was what they were called). Deciding his own hands were more reliable than fate's, Theo had stolen a handful of galleons, a pocket watch, and a wand from his father's antique collection, taking his weedy eleven-year-old self on the run. He'd fed a shaggy black dog with the scraps of what remained from the last of his meals and woken up to find himself inside Hogwarts, a lanky black-haired man sitting at the foot of his bed.

"Know any magic?" asked the man who was Sirius Black. He sounded unaccustomed to speaking; his voice was gravelly and rough, clothes and hair a mangled mess that smelled unmistakably of whisky soaked in unfavorable circumstances. He was enough to scare anyone but Theo, who had long since learned looks weren't indicative of much at all.

"Aren't you wanted for murder?" asked Theo.

"Innocent," Sirius replied with a shrug. "Managed to get away—though, I am in need of some assistance, if you can keep your mouth shut and your eyes open. Bonus points if you can brew sober-up potions in decent quantities."

Those were Theo's primary qualities. Minus the last one, but he could learn.

"I know a few things," Theo said. "All wandless."

He hadn't been old enough to learn from his father, but he'd mastered some primal bursts of juvenile magic. He could illuminate things, deluminate them. He could heal small cuts and bruises; bigger ones, too. Anything he'd needed to do while living in his father's house, he could do.

"You need a wand?" Sirius asked, and Theo shook his head, removing his father's stolen wand from his pocket. "Well, I can teach you to use it if you can help me eat something other than fucking squirrel," Sirius said, and Theo nodded, finding it to be a mutually beneficial arrangement.

It was Sirius who taught Theo the art of the con, and in turn, Theo became the guardian of Sirius' occasional jaunts into destructive behavior. They'd been partners for nearly eight years by then, with Sirius teaching Theo everything he'd learned at Hogwarts (most of which Theo had to supplement with books he stole from the library, as he got the feeling Sirius hadn't been a particularly good student pre-genocidal wizarding war) and the two of them struggling mutually to make ends meet.

They weren't exactly well off; the poverty line was something of an aspiration, which was a circumstance unlikely to change. Theo's failure to register his blood status after the death of his father marked him as a runaway until he came of age, at which point he officially became a fugitive. (Sirius had stolen a cake for the occasion.) Neither of them could hold a job, at least not in the wizarding world; Sirius, who couldn't and likely wouldn't prove his innocence, usually traveled as a dog, simply to avoid being caught by Aurors. Half of Theo's job in the arrangement was turning door knobs for Sirius' lack of thumbs.

It wasn't an easy life, but it certainly could have been worse. The only thing Theo needed more of was money, really. Enough to get a place to live, at least, and stop hiding out in this shithole of a crumbling castle.

Theo threw open the door to the cupboard containing the contaminated potions, shaking his head. They couldn't be buried without leaking into the soil; he certainly couldn't insult the merpeople by tossing them into the lake. They'd need to be burned, magically, and that was going to be a mess.

Oh well. It wasn't like the castle wasn't already falling apart.

Theo took several steps back, finding a secure spot in the stone archway from which the door had long since fallen away, and aimed his wand at the cupboard.

"Confringo," Theo said.

Then he turned, sprinting from the heat and stray shards of glass, as the base of the castle rumbled angrily from the impact of the blow.

The usual curly brown hair was visible from the front of the pub, even with her attempt to hide it. Try as she might, Hermione was never especially good at blending in with a crowd, and her too-clean, respectable-looking hoodie meant there were a number of eyes darting curiously towards her.

"Tom," she called, spotting him. Not that he was easy to miss, either. If the taped-up glasses weren't distinctive enough, then the underfed look to him probably gave him away. That or the lightning-shaped scar on his forehead, which he grew his hair unflatteringly long to cover.

"Hey, Hermione," he said as he slid into the booth across from her, glancing over his shoulder. "Bit of a dodgy choice, don't you think?"

"Well, I've run away from home, haven't I?" Hermione replied smartly, shoving a pint of Guinness in front of him like it was a prop. "Just... try to look normal."

Normal was something neither he nor Hermione were particularly good at, hence their unlikely friendship. He was one of the scrawny kids at the woefully ill-cared for Wool's Orphanage, which had been rapidly losing their government-provided resources despite the increase in vagrants. She, on the other hand, was a pristine, Oxford-bound girl from the part of London where houses had gardens, with only her enormous hair and aggressively bookish nature to keep her from being properly posh. The one thing he and Hermione had in common was the thing that had earned him everything; his reputation, his name, and his one clue as to who he really was.

"Eerie, that one is," Mrs Cole had whispered to one of the others when he was still a child. She had long since passed, having been terrifyingly old for as long as he'd known her. "Only ever had one like him—that Tom Riddle boy, you remember him. Could do things, strange things. This one can, too."

Mrs Cole was the one who had started calling him Tom, alternating between that and 'you' until she'd finally fallen too sick to hobble up and down the stairs. On her deathbed, he'd gone in to ask her the truth about Tom Riddle, which she'd answered in some sort of delirious fever dream.

It was all so nonsensical that there was an equal chance it meant nothing, but it had stuck in Tom's brain for nearly eight years. After Mrs Cole died, he'd broken into her office and snuck through the files, finding the birth certificate for Tom Marvolo Riddle and tucking it in his pocket, carrying it around like a clue. Could this have been his father? He'd never met anyone else who could do what he could except for whoever Tom Riddle had been.

Then he'd locked the office door with a twist of his fingers, revealing nothing at all to anyone else until Hermione.

He'd been walking along the street about a year ago when he caught her glancing over her shoulder, looking nervous. He'd frowned, deciding to follow, and realized the poor girl was being stalked by a suspicious-looking man that she clearly didn't know. It was only when the bloke reached for her gruffly that Hermione had turned, frightened, and held out a hand, shoving him away from her.

The moment she touched him, the man had dropped to the ground, unmoving. She panicked, looking up and catching Tom's eye before taking off at a run, sprinting towards the river.

He managed to catch her despite her being almost inhumanly fast, pulling her aside as she insisted, teary and breathless, that she hadn't meant to hurt the stranger. "It just happens sometimes when I'm scared," she confessed at a whisper, obviously still radiating with fear, and it occurred to Tom that perhaps she might know something about the peculiarities he couldn't explain about himself.

"What else can you do?" Tom asked, and Hermione, relieved that someone actually believed her, had told him the truth: she could unlock doors. She could start fires with only her mind. More than once, she had cauterized the bleeding from a gash to her knee, her arm, paper cuts on her fingers. And this wasn't the first time she had stopped a man's heart by accident.
"I'm either a minor god or some kind of monster," she said, sounding perfectly serious, and Tom laughed, holding out his hand.

"Watch this," he said, and led her to the edge of the river. He rested a hand down against the water's edge, channeling some inconceivable stillness he could reach when he really tried, and let the surface become a shiny, reflective glass, spreading gradually across the width of the Thames until the entire thing was a bright, blinding mirror.

Then he smashed his heel down onto it, shattering it to bits, and watched the shards trickle off and disappear, carried away on the motion of the current.

"Jesus," Hermione said, exchanging a glance with him. "What did you say your name was?"

It was Hermione's idea that they both run away from home, though that was considerably easier for Tom than it was for her. It wasn't like he had any family—he didn't even have a last name; he'd simply been dropped off at Wool's Orphanage as a child and had begun working there once he became too old for free room and board—but Hermione had slipped out of her parent's house and given up her plans for university, all to try and find out what they were. She was convinced that the names Mrs Cole had given him, Dumbledore and Hogwarts, were the key to their real identities.

"My parents think I'm a freak," she told him with a grimace. "They love me, in their own way, but they think I'm… unlucky, shall we say. And hey, fair enough," she determined briskly, "but let's just say they'll file me missing and then secretly think it a relief when I'm gone."

She'd given him the minimal information she could scrape together about the three names they knew: Tom Riddle, Dumbledore, and Hogwarts. Of the three, she could only gather basic public information on Tom, who had begun attending some sort of school outside London during the fall and spring terms. After Tom Riddle turned seventeen, he never returned to the orphanage, but he never paid any taxes or bought property, either. There were no records for him at all after 1943—not even a death certificate, though there had been one for what must have been his father. As far as they could see, no one who would have known Tom Riddle as a teenager was left alive.

"I did find this," Hermione said, sliding papers she'd printed off at the library across the table to him. "Apparently someone who was at your orphanage spent several years in counseling, and then his therapist wrote a book about his patients." She tapped the page. "See? He claims the man had delusions, nightmares about something that had happened to him while at the orphanage. Something about following one of the other orphans to this strange set of bricks and watching him disappear behind it," she said, becoming increasingly excited as she spoke. "It has to be somewhere in London, right? How far could these children have possibly gotten on foot?"

"This describes the other orphan as 'vindicative and manipulative,'" Tom read aloud, frowning as he scanned the page. "The therapist calls the delusions trauma from aggressive childhood bullying, Hermione. You really think the boy in the story is Tom Riddle?"

Hermione waved a hand in apparent dismissal. "Oh, just sensationalism, I'm sure. Besides, how many times have people told you you're strange? Possessed? Even evil?" she said knowingly, and Tom shrugged. She definitely had a point. The second owner of the orphanage after Mrs Cole had strapped him to the bed, hiring a priest to attempt an exorcism after she'd watched his broken arm snap back into place. Eleven-year-old Tom, fearful of what they might do to him, had broken out of the restraints, and she'd tumbled backwards from the open window in fright. When the third owner arrived, he made a point to stay in his room.

There were other things, too. He hadn't told Hermione about the nightmares. Those, he thought, were too much to confess, even to her. The things he had either done or dreamt (no telling which) still flashed inside his head from to time, invading him. The same red-slitted eyes he half-recognized; the screams, waking him up to a cold sweat.

Hermione already thought she was a monster. If she knew what he saw behind closed eyes, he was pretty sure she'd never speak to him again.

"Fair," Tom said uncomfortably, taking a sip of Guinness. "People are looking at us," he observed, setting down the glass, and Hermione glanced around, frowning.

In the same moment, there was a scurry of feet beneath them. Hermione jumped, startled, and in response to her panic, the table cracked in half.

"Shit," she whispered. "Let's go. This place has rats."

Tom nodded, leaving a few coins behind on the table.

"Where are we going?" he asked her, and she shrugged.

"Not sure," she said. "But according to this, I think we're looking for something called Diagon Alley."

Chapter End Notes

a/n: For my girl nymphadoraholtzmann, who lives on the dean's list! This story will update as I find time to edit it in pieces, which is… not something I can plan in advance yet. But stay tuned! I will be back with more soon.
Diagon was lousy with Aurors; something about an explosion at Hogwarts, or so Theo happened to overhear. He kept his head down and gestured for the dog at his heels to follow as he made his way past Diagon's entrance, entering muggle London.

They ducked into an alley as Sirius changed back, Theo handing him his clothes blindly from around the corner. That was mostly an apology, as Sirius was perfectly capable of procuring them himself; he'd (illegally) enchanted the collar he wore in Padfoot form to contain his things, clothes and wand included, long before Theo had come along.

"Sorry," Theo remarked half-sincerely as Sirius stepped around the corner, snapping up the collar of his old leather jacket with a pursed look of disapproval.

"You blew up half the castle," Sirius reminded him, which was as close to admonishment as he ever got. "You really couldn't have gone with something, I don't know. Smaller?"

Theo shrugged. "You told me to take care of it," he said, and Sirius rolled his eyes.

"Well, whatever. We just have to keep to this side of town until things blow over. Got any muggle money left from last time?" Sirius asked, and Theo arched a brow. "Eh, it was worth a try. Can't blame me for my optimism."

"Got my cards, though," Theo said. He hesitated before adding, "The watch, too."

"Ah, that's a thought." The Covent Garden crowds loved an old school hypnotist, though Theo did always feel a bit guilty about using the Imperius Curse on muggles. It made his skin crawl to use anything with 'curse' in the title, but it was a lot neater than a Confundus Charm.

That, and very little effort got them enough for several nights of suppers, pints, and the occasional cheap room above a filthy tavern. They could live like kings in the muggle world if they really tried; unfortunately, being a muggle king was still supremely boring compared to magic.

"Bit early to start, isn't it?" Sirius asked, gesturing for Theo to check the time.

"Could wait a bit," Theo agreed, though his stomach rumbled. Sirius usually got some scraps from various passersby as a dog, but Theo remained a bit o' rough, all skinny limbs and narrowed eyes. Hardly the sort wizarding children were encouraged to linger around.

Theo surveyed their surroundings, trying to decide whether it was worth doing a card trick from the sidewalk corner (a little, "Is this your card?" with a bit of legilimency thrown in was worth at least a Big Mac, if he chose his victim correctly) until he noticed Sirius was frowning at something over his shoulder.

Theo followed his line of sight, bemused. "What are you staring at?"

"Are you seeing that?" Sirius asked him, staring at someone crossing the street.
"What, the girl?"

"No, the boy," Sirius said, and Theo made a face.

"No way," he said. "The girl might gives us something, maybe, but—"

"No, look at him," Sirius said, and for a man who was usually drunk and rarely serious, his expression of total astonishment took Theo by surprise. "Notice anything about him?"

Theo flicked a gaze over the two who had crossed the street with their heads down, discussing something with quiet intensity. The girl was a curly-haired brunette; sort of forgettable, except for jeans that definitely retailed for over a hundred quid. The other was a skinny, dodgy-looking bloke with messy hair who didn't seem to be her boyfriend, though there was no telling. His canvas jacket, one of those military-styles that he wore over a grungy red hoodie, was either a hand-me-down or thrifted.

No money there, clearly. Certainly no food. Just a pair of harmless muggles, as far as Theo could tell.

"So?" he said, bewildered, and Sirius shook his head.

"It's James," he said.

"Who?"

"James. My best mate, James—"

"I thought I was your best mate," Theo remarked, half-joking, but before he could stop him Sirius had thrust a hand out, drawing the black-haired kid to a stop.

"Are you," Sirius began, and then stopped, realizing the girl had leapt back and was glaring at him with unveiled suspicion, obviously spooked. "Sorry," he offered, hurrying to reassure her. "Sorry, I just—here, hang on—"

He reached into his pocket, at which point the boy and the girl both took several hasty steps back.

"It's not a fucking gun," Theo informed them, irritated, and for the first time, the boy looked up.

Theo blinked, startled to realize the boy wasn't much of a boy, really, but someone at least his age. He had a hollow sort of look in his green eyes, hungry the way Theo recognized was actual, physical hunger, and he had a slice of something, a spindly lightning bolt, carved into his forehead.

Scars were something Theo knew well, too.

"What does he want, then?" the boy asked gruffly.

"I don't fucking know," Theo snapped, just as Sirius seemed to find whatever he was looking for.

"Here," Sirius said, breathlessly withdrawing a photograph from his pocket and smoothing it out, pointing. "See?" he said, muscling his way past the brunette and half-shoving the picture in the boy's face. "You look just like James," he said, triumphant. "It's uncanny, and it's… well, it's obvious, isn't it?"

Theo craned his neck, hazarding a quick glance at the photograph he'd known Sirius carried on him but had never looked closely at. It was a picture of four boys, all dressed in school uniforms, one of which was a much younger, much cleaner Sirius. There was a scarred-up boy with his arm slung around Sirius’ waist on the right, a short, pudgy kid on the end, and then, on Sirius’ left with one arm thrown over Sirius’ shoulder, was a black-haired boy with a lazy grin and messy hair.

Aside from the eyes, Sirius was right. The boy on the street was the spitting image of the boy in the picture.

Though, there was another thing Theo noticed about the picture, and he grimaced as he realized Sirius’ mistake.

"Shit, is this picture moving?" said the boy, who was clearly looking at a magical photograph for the first time. Theo gave Sirius’ arm a yank, pulling the picture away as the girl hurried to look.

"Sorry," Theo said, attempting to drag Sirius in the opposite direction. "Never mind my uncle, he's just had too much to drink, like always—"

"That does look quite like you," the girl said, frowning as she caught a glimpse of the photo from Sirius' flailing arms. "My goodness, you could be twins. How old is this picture?"

"Is it you?" Sirius asked the boy, jerking himself from Theo's reach. "After all these years, have I finally found you?"

"Sorry, sorry," Theo said, still struggling to grab him. "Don't mean to bother y-"

"I don't think so," the boy said. He seemed to feel a bit sorry for Sirius, but surely his patience would run out soon; or, if not his patience, then definitely the girl's. "No offense, but I've never seen you before."

"But—" Sirius sputtered, half-pleading. "But you… you must be James' son, you have to be—"

"You sound like a lunatic," Theo hissed in Sirius' ear. "Calm the fuck down, would you?"

"Sorry," the boy said with a shrug. "Never heard of any James."

"We should go, Tom," the girl said, frowning at Sirius with an obvious look of distrust. "Don't want to be late for class."

There was that patience running out; she was definitely lying about class. "Come on, let it go," Theo said gruffly to Sirius, who—with a surprising, irritating strength—yanked himself free from Theo's grip one final time, hurrying to catch the other two.

"I came to find you," Sirius panted, short of breath from his struggle with Theo. "I came to find you, but it was too late… I was too late, and your crib, it was—" He broke off, shaking his head. "Did you get your Hogwarts letter, at least? Was it… have you been living with muggles, or—?"

Theo fought a groan as the boy, Tom, furrowed his brow. Another maniacal word from Sirius and they'd surely summon the muggle authorities, who were at best an unwelcome nuisance.

"Sorry," the girl told Sirius, trying to compel the boy forward and, to Theo's relief, dismissing his ranting entirely. "Good luck with whatever you're looking for," she said with obvious disdain, beckoning for a still-frowning Tom to follow and ending the exchange, or so Theo thought.

But then, out of nowhere, Sirius did something truly insane.

He stumbled forcefully into Tom, colliding with him; surely not an accident. He appeared to be shoving the young stranger into traffic, and worse, directly into the path of an oncoming taxi.
Before Theo registered what Sirius had done, Tom had already landed hard on his back in the street, looking up into the headlights and hastily trying to shield himself from unavoidable impact.

It all happened impossibly quickly; the taxi swerved into the opposite lane, swearing out the window at what appeared to be all four of them. The girl gasped, one hand flying to her mouth, and then she darted into the street, helping Tom to his feet and pulling him back to the sidewalk.

"Have you lost your bloody mind?" Theo demanded, wandlessly yanking Sirius back before he accidentally murdered a muggle. "Come on, let's get the fuck out of here before they call the police —"

But Sirius, still staring at a shaken but unharmed Tom, deflated, looking as if he'd expected more.

"Oh," he said, swallowing. "Right. Well. I suppose you couldn't be Harry Potter, my mist-

Harry Potter.

Harry fucking Potter.

Even pureblood runaways living off the land knew that name.

"Oh, shit," Theo realized under his breath, pausing mid-stride and piecing together why ascertaining whether someone was or wasn't James' son was important enough to chance a homicide. A pity the experiment hadn't worked out in their favor. Whatever—or whoever—Tom happened to resemble, his lack of magical reaction meant he was, despite everything, just a muggle.

Understandably, the girl was anxious to leave. Tom, though, was bizarrely insistent on saying something to Sirius. "Did you say Hogwarts?" he asked, brows furrowed, which wasn't exactly the response Theo would have for someone who'd just tried to kill him.

At the mention of it, the girl suddenly stopped trying to lure Tom away, coming to a sudden halt to wait for Sirius' response.

Curiouser and curiouser, it seemed.

"Well—" Sirius hesitated, having fallen into the trap of not being able to explain himself. "I mean, yes, but… but you wouldn't know anything about it, because you're not, um. You aren't—"

But Theo, who, unlike Sirius, had not been having a meltdown, noticed something odd about Tom's reaction. Mostly in that he seemed like he'd heard it before.

Theo turned, concealing the flick of his wrist as he cast a legilimens. He wasn't fantastic, but if something was prominent enough in someone's mind…

Ah, yes, there it was. Tom Riddle. Hogwarts.

Dumbledore.

Interesting.

"Give us a moment, would you?" Theo said, pulling a dumbfounded Sirius aside. "Sorry, just a second—Black," he hissed to Sirius once they were a safe distance away, casting a brief Muffliato around them. "I swear, you're a fucking savant—"

Sirius looked groggy, glancing up at Theo through a fog. "What?"
"Black, this is it—this is the fucking scam," Theo informed him, gesturing with his chin to the boy who could have easily been Harry Potter in another life. "You saw Dumbledore's willing to give a reward to anyone who finds Harry Potter, right? And these two are looking for Dumbledore. We're talking a chance at actual money here," he pointed out, as Sirius frowned, looking doubtful. "Something we can live on, for once, not just whatever we can scrape together—and if we came bearing the Order's precious Chosen One, maybe you could finally get a shot at a fair trial—"

"Whoever that is, it can't be Harry," Sirius said, glancing up at Tom. "He may look like James, but he's clearly not a wizard. Both of them are muggles."

"So?" Theo demanded, flailing a bit at Sirius' failure to piece it together. "Look at him! He could convince Dumbledore long enough for us to get away, couldn't he?"

"That's assuming we find Dumbledore," Sirius muttered unhelpfully.

"If we brought this kid to someone—anyone—in the Order, Dumbledore would have to come out of hiding. And who knows how to find underground vigilantes better than us?" Theo pressed him, increasingly urgent. It wasn't like they had all day to decide. "Besides, even if the Order refused, wouldn't the Ministry pay a premium to get their hands on the Boy Who Lived?"

Sirius glanced over at Tom, frowning. "That can't be him," he said, sounding as if he were still trying to convince himself. "Harry didn't have a scar like that."

"So what? Maybe he got it later or something."

"He keeps touching it," Sirius observed with a frown, and Theo grimaced.

"Black, forget the scar. You said you knew James, right?"

Sirius hesitated. "Yes, but—"

"So whether he's Harry or not, we can teach him. We can make him into Harry Potter. If he knew all the right details, nobody would possibly believe otherwise, would they?"

Sirius shook his head. "Not if he can't do magic. You really think the son of James Potter could possibly be born a squib? No way, not possible," he mumbled, though even Theo could see he was taking another long look at the boy called Tom, unable to dismiss the likeness. "Besides, even if we could convince him to play along, how would we do it?"

That was good enough for Theo; he was proficient enough to figure it out as they went. "Just let me handle it. Play along," he advised, and waved the silencing charm away, gesturing for Sirius to follow before jogging back over to Tom and the girl.

"Hey," Theo called to them, "my apologies, I never properly introduced myself. I'm Theo, this is Sirius. You said something about Hogwarts?"

"Yes," the girl said quickly. "We want to, um—"

She broke off. Clearly she didn't know what Hogwarts was, or whether it was a person, an object, or one of Jupiter's moons.

"Go there?" Theo prompted, and the girl blinked.

"Yes," she said, stubbornly resolved. "Yes, we need to go there."
"Well, it's funny you say that," Theo said, gesturing between himself and Sirius. "We were actually in the middle of paying a visit to this friend of ours, Albus Dumbledore—"

"Dumbledore?" Tom echoed, precisely as Theo had hoped.

"Yes, Dumbledore," Theo confirmed. Why two such obvious muggles were looking for Dumbledore and Hogwarts he had no idea, nor did he care. Muggle secrecy was a Ministry problem, not his. "Why," he added with feigned surprise, "do you know him?"

"We're looking for him," the girl said. "You can take us to him?"

Theo glanced at Sirius, wordlessly suggesting that now would be an opportune time to participate.

"Why yes, of course," Sirius said in his best pretender's voice. "Right now, in fact."

"No, not right now," Theo interjected, regretting that he hadn't confirmed they were on the same page before inviting Sirius to the con. "We have to go to Hogwarts first, just to pick something up. Papers we need," he added with a sidelong glance at Sirius, "in order to see Dumbledore."

"Right, yes," Sirius confirmed, thankfully registering that Theo meant the false wizarding paperwork they'd hidden in the castle. "Yes, Hogwarts first, then Dumbledore—"

"There's just one thing, though," Theo said, turning to Tom. Of the two, he felt certain Tom was more likely to rise to a challenge. "It would be a lot easier if you were Harry Potter."

Tom's brow creased, accenting his lightning-shaped scar. "Why?"

"Oh, you know how bureaucracy works," Theo said with a wave of his hand. "That's who Dumbledore's looking for, and considering you look so much like him and all..."

He trailed off pointedly, and Tom frowned.

"Is this some sort of crime thing?" he asked. "You want me to be a drug mule or something?"

"No—Jesus, what? No," Theo said, repulsed. "Christ, we just—"

"You just look so much like him," Sirius cut in, and, managing a slightly more reasonable tone from his initial delirium, "What's your last name, if you don't mind me asking?"

Tom snuck a glance at the girl, then back at Sirius.

"Riddle," he said.

And then, after a moment of pause, "I think."

Theo scoffed. "You think?"

"Yes, I think," Tom snapped. "I don't know. I'm an orphan. Been in an orphanage my whole life."

At that, Theo and Sirius exchanged a glance, collectively feeling the spark of a scam finding its footing.

"Well," Sirius said, turning slowly to Tom, "then who's to say you're not Harry, hm?"

"Do you even know how you got to the orphanage?" Theo asked him.
Tom's brow stitched together in what was a resounding, perhaps life-defining 'no.'

"Even you can't deny how much you look like James," Theo reminded him. "You don't technically know what happened to you—"

"—and nobody knows what happened to Harry," Sirius contributed.

"So, if you don't actually know who you are—"

"—and nobody knows where he is—"

"—then who's to say you couldn't be him?" Theo and Sirius concluded in unison.

"Me?" Tom echoed, frowning.

"Could be. Maybe, maybe not. Either way, there's no real reason not to find out for sure, is there?" Theo posed helpfully, observing that Tom had begun to contemplate it himself, the wheels starting to turn somewhere under all that messy jet-black hair.

The girl, however, still looked tentative, gripping Tom's arm.

"Tom," she whispered. "I don't know about this."

Figured. Women were much too sensible.

"Well, better that you're both comfortable," Theo said, beckoning to Sirius and turning away. "Pity we couldn't make this work, but such is life. Thanks anyway," he called, "very best of luck to you, watch out for any errant vehicles—"

"What are you doing?" Sirius demanded, slicing a glare at Theo as he forcefully angled them away. "I thought you said you were going to handle this?"

"I am handling it," Theo assured him with a shrug, grabbing Sirius' arm before he could turn back around. "I've got this, okay? Just stay calm, I saw it on his face. We have the answers he wants," he assured Sirius, "and once he's talked his little friend into it…"

He trailed off, holding up an expectant hand and counting down the seconds.

Three, two, one…

"WAIT," came a voice behind them, and Theo fell to a victorious halt, sparing Sirius a wink before pivoting around, triumphant.

"Tom, you can't be serious," Hermione whispered to him, frowning as the two grubby-looking strangers walked away. "One of them nearly killed you, for one thing—and they're obviously, I don't know… vagrants," she said with a frown. "Or at the very least not especially trustworthy."

That much was undeniably true. The older one, whose age was mostly evident in the stray white stubble around his sunken, unshaven cheeks, wore a leather jacket that was less fashionable than it was probably his only article of clothing. His black jeans were exceedingly worn, ripped clean through in a handful of spots and then rubbed to faded patches in at least three others, and his too-long hair was knotted at the back of his head.

The other, far thinner and noticeably younger, consisted of similar materials: jeans, functional brown boots, an unaccented leather jacket. He had glints of things, though, odd quirks and eccentricities that were evident in his choice of accessories; like the chain of something, possibly an old-timey pocket watch, that hung from the front pocket of his jeans. The neck of his v-neck slung low enough to reveal another thin chain, its contents hidden under his shirt, and a handful of rings flashed from his fingers, decorative accents to his fidgeting motions. His hair was short, dark, practical; no fuss except for the outline of wings that crept out from under his jacket, reaching up to the right side of his neck. Behind his left ear was another tattoo: a series of what looked like hand drawn lines. A set of four with a slash across it, then two more. Seven marks in total.

So, yeah. Not exactly the ideal conspirators.

But Tom's scar was starting to hurt again; the way it only did in his recurring dreams, in his nightmares. If this was going to be his only option about figuring out who and what he was, then he was just going to have to jump.

"You did all the research, didn't you?" Tom reminded Hermione. "Dumbledore's our only clue, and you and I both know it's a dead end on our own. If we don't go with them, we might lose our only chance to find him."

"But they want you to be someone named Harry," Hermione insisted. "That doesn't bother you?"

Tom shrugged. "Who says I'm not? I don't know who I am, and they clearly know something we don't about Hogwarts," he pointed out, and she grimaced. "Besides, it's not like they can hurt us." Nobody ever had before; Tom was fairly certain he might've exploded the oncoming taxi if he'd considered himself in real danger, but it had been a long time since he'd let fear get the better of him. "I'm pretty sure we can take care of ourselves."

"Still. I don't think we should trust them." She gave the two men another furrowed look of doubt. "Let's just… let's not tell them about our powers, okay? What we can do and all that. Let's at least keep that between us."

"Sure, fine." Tom itched to catch up with them; to make sure they didn't get away. The picture the older one had shown him had left a sensation of longing he couldn't suppress, and even if that James person wasn't his father, it was still a feeling he'd spent his whole life wanting. It was such a normal thing in his mind, so beautifully un-monstrous, to look at a family photo; to have someone comment that he had this person's hair, or this person's knobby knees. If he had to be Harry Potter to feel that way again, so be it. He could manage it for a time.

"So you agree, then?"

Hermione grimaced. "Well, if we have no other choice—"

They didn't. As far as Tom was concerned, that was good enough for a yes.

"WAIT," he called after the other two, catching them as the younger one—the one with the air of combativeness, who looked like a bike gang gypsy—turned sharply to face him. "Theo, was it?"

"That scar," Theo cut in. "You always had that?"

As far as he could remember, yes. "Yeah."
"Ever thought of covering it up?"

That, as far as Tom knew, was impossible. He'd tried. Mrs Cole had tried. In the end, they'd decided it was some sort of devil's mark that probably shouldn't be touched.

He let his hand fall, deciding it wasn't worth getting into.

"Well, anyway, we really have to be on our way," Theo mused, gesturing evasively down the road. "I mean if you're not Harry, we'll just have to keep looking for him, so…"

"You swear you can get us to Dumbledore?" Tom cut in, setting his jaw.

Theo scrutinized him a moment, which was a compulsion Tom was more than willing to reciprocate. Despite the fact that Theo was a too-skinny, hawk-eyed derelict with a distinct air of arseholery, it occurred to Tom that Theo couldn't have been much older than he was. That, and he didn't look particularly well cared for. It was something Hermione would judge, but Tom, who'd grown up feeling hungry more often than he was full, was willing to disregard.

Eventually, Theo nodded. "I can get you there. Believe me," he added, "I'll do everything in my not-inconsiderable power to make it happen."

Hermione glanced at Tom, giving him another silent look of, Are you sure?

Nope, not sure at all. But anywhere was better than nowhere, which was where he'd been headed his entire life until today.

"So. Do we have a deal?" Theo asked, thrusting out a hand for Tom's. "We'll get you to Dumbledore and in return, you'll be Harry Potter."

"What about me?" asked Hermione.

"What about you?" Theo retorted, and she scowled.

Not a promising start, obviously, but still. It would have to be this or nothing.

"Fine," Tom said, accepting Theo's grip as Hermione folded her arms over her chest, moodily resigned. "Fine. It's a deal."

---

Two sides of the same coin.

Find one, find the other.

Neither can live while the other survives.

"Master," Wormtail croaked, "are you… alright?"

I will be in good time.

They should not have been saying his name where just anyone could hear it.
Acquiring sufficient muggle currency was a simple matter of a handful of "is this your card"s until they received large enough bills to use as a base, followed by some straightforward duplication spells. A pity magical money was so recalcitrant when it came to counterfeit, as the wizarding world was where they would ultimately spend the majority of this endeavor. Still, Tom and his skeptical friend Hermione (who had not wanted to give them her full name, much to Theo's complete disinterest) would need to believe they had never actually left the muggle world, so, muggle things would need to be purchased. The train ticket, for one.

"You can't Floo," Sirius reminded Theo. "Requires blood registry."

"I know, Black." Astoundingly, it wasn't his first day.

"Can't apparate, either. No permits, and we're out of fake ones."

Something had really shaken Sirius up, it seemed. He was unusually fidgety since having met Tom, and seemed to keep reaching unconsciously for the picture he kept in his pocket. That, or for the flask Theo ultimately opted to swipe from his jeans, just to be safe. Sirius tended to be strange every year around Halloween, but this was a new record.

Odd as it was, Theo was determined not to let Sirius' agitation infect him. "You really think I can convince them they took a sleeping pill and wound up in Hogsmeade? Don't be stupid, it looks terrible on you."

"Nothing looks terrible on me," Sirius replied, a reflexive response that indicated he was at least normal enough to continue the discussion. "So what's your plan, then?"

Easy. The Hogwarts Express was still running, as it had been more costly for the Ministry to argue about dismantling it than it was to simply let it exist. The train itself hadn't functioned regularly in close to a decade, but that was an easy fix. Theo and Sirius had used it more than once on their jaunts to and from London.

"I won't be able to help you as Padfoot," Sirius warned, and Theo shrugged.

"You say that like you're any help in human form," he replied. "Now get changed, would you? We're meeting them in ten minutes."

Maneuvering dog-Sirius from King's Cross back into the wizarding world was always a bit of a hassle, as it required him to wear the service animal regalia he had to be extremely drunk to let Theo put on. He swayed slightly in place while Theo explained to a skeptical Tom and Hermione, ostensibly cat people, that Sirius had been called away overnight and would meet them upon arrival.

"So it's just you, then?" Hermione asked doubtfully, gaze flicking over Theo's appearance. He, in turn, made a point of silently condemning hers, prompting her to shrink just enough to prove his point. She'd obviously aimed for unremarkable when she'd dressed that morning, but Theo knew how to recognize money when he saw it. The sweater was wool, the nice kind. Her jacket, a trench shape tied around her waist, wasn't cheap either. She obviously took her fashion cues from an off-duty Princess Diana.

Tom, who had his genuinely poor hands tucked into the pockets of the same jacket from yesterday, cleared his throat. "She just means—"

"I know what she means," Theo gestured briskly into the station, beckoning for them to follow. "Watch the dog," he added, as Hermione nearly tripped over a slowly ambling Sirius.

"Does he bite?" she asked, and Theo scoffed.

"Does he look like he bites?"

"Well, I don't know, I just—"

"Trust me," Theo assured her, directing them smoothly to the platforms, "he couldn't be less interested in you."

Sirius glanced up, giving Theo a dull look of _hush_. Tom, Theo noted, was busy staring around the train station, looking slightly awed.

"Never been here before?" Theo asked.

"Sure, all the time," said Hermione. Beside her, Tom nodded solemnly, apparently content to let her do most of the talking and, as far as Theo could tell, all of the lying.

"How exactly did you two meet?" Theo asked them, maneuvering a labyrinthine path through the peak hour crowds. Better that it was too busy for the muggles to focus on anything other than their feet. "You don't exactly seem like you run in the same circles."

"School," Hermione said, as Tom replied, "Work."

"Yeah, that checks out," Theo remarked, angling them both towards the wall between platforms nine and ten.

"Which platform did you say it was?" Hermione asked, glancing around with a frown. "If you just gave us the tickets, I'm sure we could—"

"Oops, sorry," Theo said, confusing them momentarily with a subtle flick of his wand before knocking them both sideways, shoving through the barrier with a stumbling Sirius at his heels. As of that morning, neither of them had been positive that whatever muggle protections previously put in place were still functioning, but worst case, Theo merely shoved them into a wall and proclaimed it an accident. Sirius had already done worse, hadn't he? That, and Theo could live with the consequences.

To his relief, though, they passed clean through to the other side, Hermione straightening with a dazed look on her face to register they were now standing on the platform.

"It's—"

"Quiet, I know," Theo said, handing Tom the leash. "Hold my dog, would you? I'll go take care of our tickets."

"Has he got a name?" Tom asked, glancing doubtfully at Sirius, who looked dumbly up at him.

"Yeah, Padfoot," Theo replied over his shoulder, jogging away as Hermione attempted to pet Sirius' head. She'd probably pay for that later, he assumed, but for now he was focused on the matter of getting the train on its way.

Theo glanced around, checking over his shoulder to ensure Tom and Hermione were successfully distracted before darting onto the train, making his way to the engine car. Usually all it took was a little enchantment here and there; bada-bing bada-boom, ta-dah. Magical transportation was usually in a state of wanting to run, unlike castles. A little animation did the trick, delivering sufficient steam after a few short seconds, and then Theo hustled into the middle car with a whistle for Sirius, who came bounding up to the carriage with Tom and Hermione in tow.

"Quite a trained dog you have," Hermione panted, struggling with the leash. In return, Sirius slimed the leg of her pants with a glob of drool. "Oh," she said, glancing down with a look of displeasure. "Well, that's, um—"

"Why isn't anyone else on this train?" Tom asked with a suspicious glance at Theo, who shrugged.

"I'm sure they'll be along. You coming or what?"

Tom glanced at Hermione, who, much to her own detriment, had tried to remove Sirius' drool from her pants. It was now slung between her fingers like a spider's web.

"Yeah, fine," Tom muttered, easing her up by the elbow.

Sirius, who had been unsuccessfully dragging Hermione toward one of the compartments, gave the leash a swift tug, sending her lurching after him. Tom, though, paused beside Theo.

"You really think I could be this… Harry person?" he asked.

"Would I be doing any of this if I didn't?" Theo replied.

That, much to Theo's immense displeasure, was apparently insufficient.

"And he's important or something?" Tom said, frowning. "Harry, I mean."

"Important enough for Dumbledore to go looking for him," Theo offered evasively, gesturing to the compartment. "Just sit down, would you? We're about to leave."

"So Dumbledore's important, then," Tom guessed. "Must be, if you're going to all this trouble."

"What trouble?" Theo mused, shrugging. "Train ride's hardly trouble. Just sit down, have a nap, get to Hogwarts, no problem."

"Yeah, but—" Tom looked uncertain, eyeing the distance his feet would have to travel as if the floor of the train carriage might somehow explain it to him. When it didn't, he glanced up at Theo with a frown. "What's in it for you?"

"Why does there have to be something in it for me?" Theo asked. "Just doing my civic duty, that's all."

Tom's frown deepened. "But—"

Christ, he was tiresome. Worse, he was tiring.

"Are you going to sit down or not?" Theo interrupted, losing his patience and catching the wand he'd obscured in his sleeve with the heel of his hand. If that was what it took, so be it.
Tom gave Theo a look of supreme annoyance, or possibly mild loathing. Not that it mattered; so they were off on the wrong foot. So what? Once the two muggles were handed off to one of the channels of the Order, they'd all be done here. Theo could happily roll around in his galleons and pretend this entire day had never existed, and the other two...

Well, they weren't his problem, were they?

"You know," Tom said, "I'm not so sure I like you."

"Well, you wouldn't be the first," Theo assured him, waving him into the compartment.

That time, Tom miraculously obliged, tossing another narrowed look of contempt over his shoulder.

"There we go," Theo said with approval, falling into the empty seat beside Tom as Hermione, who held a snoring Sirius' head in her lap, looked down at the dog with a vague sense of repulsion.

Understandable, really. Sirius' breath wasn't so much a whiff of fresh air as it was a gust of disgusting garbage poison.

"Well, off we go, then," Theo said cheerfully, just as the train began rolling out of the station.

He can feel the boy getting closer, waking up. The Boy Who Lived is coming closer to him, coming home, and so is he.

Find one, find the other.

We have both been cursed, Harry Potter, but now we're waking up.

"My Lord." A whisper from Wormtail. "It is arranged as you have asked."

Excellent.

Welcome to the nightmare, Harry Potter. It's finally time to wake up.

Tom woke with a start, catching himself as he nodded off.

He'd been having a dream, sort of. The usual one, which was less a dream than it was a recurring scene he'd witnessed before. Red-slitted eyes. A woman's screams. Sometimes he could pause it, walk around in it, observe and catalogue the damage inside it. The body on the floor, the sound of a crying baby. He could feel his own heart beating, pulsing, a sense of finally, of resolution about to come. No matter how many times he had the dream, he never reached the promise of absolution. It was like one of those dreams people always talked about having, where you're running and running and you try—you do everything in your desperate, sluggish power to reach the place where you need to go—but you never, ever make it.

Tom shivered, wiping away the cool sweat that had formed at the back of his neck with his palm.

He glanced around the carriage, checking if anyone else had been disturbed by his restlessness, but it seemed nobody had noticed. Beside him, Theo was curled up with his arms folded, his head leaned against the compartment wall. From that angle, the tally marks on his neck were prominently visible.

Hermione had stretched out with the dog, whose head still rested heavily on her thigh. He snorted once, loudly, and flicked at nothing with his ear.

Tom looked out the window, a flash of something catching his eye.

Nothing. Just empty countryside.

He shivered, suddenly realizing he was quite cold. The train felt empty, almost hollow. He glanced at Theo again, who twitched in his sleep.

It was eerily, uncomfortably quiet.

Tom closed his eyes again, leaning back against the seat. A little shudder ran through his limbs, vibrating around in them. What was he doing here, really? The doubt crept in like a sickness, steadily taking root: He wasn't whoever they claimed he was. His life was empty, full of wrongs. He was wrong; he was a monster with red-slitted eyes. They, none of them, had any idea what they'd invited into their lives when they'd foolishly let him in.

Tom swallowed hard, trying to force his intrusive thoughts away. What would happen when he became that monster again? The sense of dread came closer, poised to swallow him up. He tried to draw to mind Hermione's face, her look of reassurance, and only saw the tally marks on Theo's neck. The lines took the shape of a cage, and then a bone, and then a grave.

Then, without warning, he heard the sound of a terrible, piercing scream.

"Fuck," he exhaled, eyes snapping open, and beside him Theo jolted awake, startled by the sound of his voice.

"What is it? What's going on?"

"Tom?" Hermione mumbled, yawning as she struggled to sit up. "Is everything alr-"

Theo cut her off, leaping to his feet.

"Do you feel that?" he demanded.

Hermione stretched out her neck, slow to wake. "What?"

"That! The… cold," Theo said, sounding agitated, even paranoid. He had risen to his feet, throwing the compartment door open and eyeing the corridor. "The chill, and the—fuck, that… emptiness?" he asked impatiently, glancing over his shoulder at them. "The uncanny, incorporeal sense that nothing will ever be good again?"

"What?" Hermione asked, bewildered, before Theo turned helplessly to Tom.

"You feel it," he said. "Look at your face. I know you do."

Tom swallowed. "I…" He cleared his throat. "It's a bit cold, yeah."

"Dem… what?" Hermione asked, but the dog had already leapt from beside her, trotting into the train corridor.

"Come on," Theo said, and took a sharp left from the compartment. Tom, having no choice but to follow, grabbed Hermione's hand, tugging her after him.
He hadn't wanted to admit it, but whatever Theo had incoherently described, Tom was positive he felt it. It was following them now, coming closer.

It felt familiar. Terrifying, but familiar.

"Tom," Hermione huffed in his wake, "wait, our things—"

"Leave them," Theo shouted over his shoulder, shoving open the door between passenger cars and racing towards something near the engine. "Get moving!" he shouted, but Tom, feeling the sensation Theo had described begin to reach like tendrils for his lungs, glanced briefly over his shoulder.

He fought a gasp, seeing something at their heels; a figure inside a floating cloak. A ghost? The grim reaper, surely. Was it death?

Tom froze, suddenly unable to move as the creature came closer, looming over him.

"Tom, what is it? Tom, come on, run!"

Hermione's voice floated in and out of his head, a whorl of sounds.

Take the baby and go, I'll hold him off!

"Tom!"

Step aside, girl, don't be a fool…

"I said come on," Theo suddenly growled in Tom's ear, taking him by the arm with a hard yank and delivering him from his temporary paralysis.

Tom blinked, stumbling over himself as Theo dragged him through what remained of the passenger compartments. Hermione was ahead of them, running with Padfoot to the engine car.

"What… where are we—?"

"Move fast enough and we'll get rid of them, just—come on." Theo gave Tom one last tug that nearly removed his arm from its socket before shoving him out of the way, securely planting Tom and Hermione in the engine compartment while Theo—who had clearly gone mad—leapt down onto the link between train cars, the wind outside whipping color into his cheeks.

Tom stumbled to the edge of the engine car to stare down at the tracks, watching Theo balance precariously between them.

"What are you doing?" he shouted over the motion of the train.

"Hold on, would you?" Theo shouted back, reaching out to grip Tom's wrist. "I just have to get down and look at something!"

He leapt beneath the car using Tom for leverage, momentarily sending them both careening off-balance.

"I said HOLD ON," Theo growled, and Tom, rolling his eyes, adjusted his grip on Theo's forearm.

Theo slid out of sight, the majority of his torso disappearing beneath the train car as Tom struggled to maintain his grip.
"What exactly are you—"

There was a loud bang; a blast of something.

"—doing," Tom panted as Theo tugged at his arm, signaling that whatever idiotic thing he'd planned to do, he'd managed it. Tom dragged him up, gripping him by the shoulders and yanking him back into the car. "Did you just—"

"Blow up the train? Barely," Theo panted, rings glinting as he wiped the sweat from his temples. In front of them, the train carriages had disengaged from the engine car; the hooded figures that had floated in their wake were now hovering in the distance.

"What are those?" Tom asked, precisely as one of them lifted into the air, taking flight like a hooded specter.

"Fuck," Theo said, glancing at the dog. "Any ideas?"

Tom frowned. "Are you asking… Padfoot?"

Bizarrely, the dog appeared to shrug.

"No, I'm just—" Theo broke off, obviously frustrated. "I didn't know they could do that. I don't even know why they're here!" he ranted. "They're supposed to be… I don't know, in Azkaban or some shit—"

A slew of cloaked figures approached them from the disengaged passenger cars, the wind whipping Tom's hair into his eyes. The continuing chill was biting now, angry, and the sense of dread came over him again. The spectral fingers of the hooded figures reached for him, craving him, finding a little spark of him and grasping for it, aching to close their bony claws around it, and the closer they came, the more Tom could hear it… screaming, crying, Please, please I beg you, I'll do anything… Please, kill me instead!

He tasted blood in his mouth as Theo snatched the back of his collar, dragging him back to consciousness.

"We're going to have to jump," Theo said in his ear, barely audible over the sound of the racing train car.

"Like hell we are!" Hermione shouted from somewhere behind them, indignant as only Hermione could be, but Tom could barely move. The closer the figures came, the more he felt certain it was over… the more familiar it was, that something he desperately wanted existing just out of reach… he'd come close, but not nearly close enough… he was tired, numb, wrung out and—

"On my count," Theo yelled in his ear. "Are you ready?"

Screaming, sobbing, a burst of green light and—

HARRY!

"JUMP," Theo shouted, and all Tom could hear was the roar of the wind, delivering his wild mind to silence.
He is awake now; I can feel him.

I can feel him slipping from my grasp again.

"My Lord, please forgive me, I do not know how he escaped!"

Harry Potter must not escape me now.

If you cannot help me, I will find something more useful that will.

Dementors. Great, excellent, perfect. What next?

"Fuck," Theo said under his breath. "Aurors."

It probably shouldn't have surprised him that Hogsmeade was swarming with Ministry officials, but the leap from the train had done away with quite a bit of Theo's plan, along with most of his capacity to strategize. All the enchantment wards in the village had been activated, meaning invisibility was impossible; just what he needed, really, as if being a fugitive running around with a mass murderer and two muggles wasn't bad enough.

"What?" Hermione asked, panting a little from the trudge into the village.

Ever since they'd started walking, Hermione had been talking Theo's ear off. What were those things back there, why were they here, where are we going, are you sure you know what you're doing, why did they seem to want Tom so badly? Theo had no answers, obviously, and the constant refrains of "I don't know" were getting needlessly repetitive.

"Nothing," Theo said, glancing over his shoulder at Tom, who remained a little shaken up from the jump. He seemed to attract bad luck, like some kind of reverse talisman; if he hadn't been extremely crucial to the future of Theo's lifestyle comfort, he'd have ditched the guy long ago. "Just… try to keep up, okay?"

He led them to one of his usual haunts, weaving circuitously around buildings and darting out of sight whenever he saw the flash of an Auror badge.

"Where exactly are we?" Hermione asked, Sirius' leash wrapped around her knuckles. "Are you hiding from the police or something? Because if there's something we should know—"

"Just people I don't want to run into, that's all." Theo pulled the collar of his jacket up, making his way to the Hog's Head. "Try to keep up, would you?"

He ducked in through the open front door, hurrying Tom and Hermione in after him and then shutting it firmly behind them, opening the slot to peer around for Aurors.

"Theo," Hermione hissed. "If we're in danger, I demand you tell us th-"
"Thought I wouldn't be seeing you again for weeks, Nott," came a voice behind them as Hermione jumped, hand shooting out for Tom's. Theo turned, catching Aberforth's smirk, and scowled.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Well, they're saying the castle's near been destroyed," Aberforth said with a chuckle. "Any idea who else might've done that, hm?"

"You know perfectly well I'm a respectable citizen, Ab." Theo turned back to the slot in the door, grimacing. "All entrances blocked?"

"All but one," Aberforth said, gesturing behind him. "And as a reminder, it ain't free."

"Never is, dickhead." Theo glanced down at Sirius, who had at least managed to sober up from the fall. "Go get Sirius, would you?"

The dog bounded up the stairs as Hermione frowned, the leash getting yanked from her hand.

"Where's he going?" she asked, looking concerned as she peered after Padfoot, but Theo had other things to deal with.

"If you need a room, that's ten galleons," Aberforth said, and Theo scoffed.

"Like hell it is!"

"Rate's gone up, kid. Supply and demand. Economics of utility, et cetera—"

"Don't et cetera me—"

"We're staying here?" Hermione asked tentatively, which Theo ignored.

"You really think I'd pay ten galleons for this shithole?" he snapped at Aberforth. "I can get a room from Rosmerta for half that!"

"I'm sure you could," Aberforth smugly agreed, "but it wouldn't get you back into the castle, would it?"

Theo regretted how many times Sirius had had a few too many at the Hog's Head bar. Aberforth never batted an eye—certainly never turned them in—but he certainly made them pay.

"If it's a matter of money," Hermione ventured, "and Aberforth's attention swiveled to her.

"What's this you got, Nott? Muggles?"

She might not have understood the word, but his tone was unmistakable. "Excuse me," Hermione said, stepping forward. "What's that supposed to mean—"

"Jesus," Theo said under his breath, hooking a finger in Hermione's coat and dragging her back as Tom looked on, wary. "Stay here, would you? Don't talk to anyone, I've got an errand to run. We'll take the room," he said to Aberforth, who shrugged, having already guessed as much. "Just make sure they don't get mixed up with Aurors while I'm gone or you can kiss that ten galleons goodbye, you hear me?"

Hermione took one look at a slyly grinning Aberforth and grimaced, turning to Theo. "Wait," she said, feigning brightness as she hastily determined him the lesser of two evils. "If there's something we can help you with—"
"Just stay here," Theo repeated, and from the stairs, he heard Sirius' usual footfall. "Great, stay with Sirius. And make sure he doesn't drink anything," he added firmly, as Sirius emerged from the stairwell, smelling like... well, not roses, exactly. He'd be wearing the spare set of clothes he'd hidden the last time they'd used the Head to lay low, which probably meant the wafting scent of contaminated potions still clung to them. "I mean it," Theo added to Aberforth, aiming a finger over his shoulder as he shoved open the doors to the old man's private office. "You know he'll never pay his tab, Ab!"

"Sure," Aberforth said, pouring a bottle of Ogden's into a waiting glass as Theo gritted his teeth, heading for the painting of the little girl that hung behind the desk.

"Well, go on," Theo said impatiently, gesturing to her the moment he entered Aberforth's office, and she pursed her lips. "What, you want me to ask nicely?"

She scowled.

"Fine. Please go on," Theo said.

She twirled her hair around one finger, ignoring him.

"Look, I've had a shit day," Theo said. "There were dementors on the train."

Her eyes slid slowly to his, still narrowed.

"I just need to pick up something I left behind and then I'll never bother you again," he promised her. "I've finally got a real ticket out of here, okay? So just let me in and we'll never have to see each other for the rest of time."

The prospect of his absence seemed to satisfy her. She turned around, walking wherever she always walked, and gradually the tunnel from the portrait became accessible, allowing Theo to step inside the frame.

"Thanks," he called to wherever she went when she did this, making his way to the room full of shit that was usually his portal into the castle when the front door was swarmed with Aurors. Not exactly a shortcut, but it served fine enough. He made his way past the toilets and the books and the broken potion ingredients and poked his head out from the slowly materializing door, listening.

He caught the sound of an oncoming voice and leapt back, leaving it open only a crack.

"—pain in my side, like always, though I suspect there's a chance to finally be rid of him. Rumor has it he's sending someone; one of his minions, if I had to guess. Knowing Dumbledore's flair for subtlety, it'll be the bloody half-giant or the werewolf—"

That was a voice Theo knew well, though he hadn't heard it for a number of years. He slid the chain around his neck out from under his t-shirt, untwisting the vial that was usually nestled against his sternum and letting the tiny parchment fall into the palm of his hand.

"Engorgio," he whispered, and within seconds, the Marauder's Map spread out to full size. "I solemnly swear that I am up to no good."

Welcome back, dipshit, said the map, revealing the usual layout of the castle. It was something of Sirius' making, or so Theo had gathered; back when Sirius was still fairly useful he'd snuck into the castle's caretaker's office and stolen it back from when it had been confiscated during his final year of schooling. Hard to believe now that Sirius had ever been capable of making something so advanced, considering it was around Theo's neck for a reason. Sirius almost always tried to gamble it or trade it away for firewhisky.

Theo zeroed in on where he was, glancing around at the footsteps. Yes, as predicted, he'd correctly identified the voice. The tiny letters Lucius Malfoy were making their way down the stairs beside the unsurprising name of Cornelius Fudge.

"Well, I certainly hope he won't disrupt this year's All Hallows gala," Fudge was saying apprehensively. "I don't suppose he'd show up personally, do you?"

"Dumbledore, in Godric's Hollow?" scoffed Malfoy. "Fudge, don't be ridiculous. For all those who still worship the doddering old fool, there's another half who thoroughly resent him. After all, who has he helped by going into hiding? Certainly not any Ministry constituents I know."

"True, true," Fudge said. "Why send someone, then?"

"Well, I doubt he can help himself," Malfoy sniffed. "Of course, if the Order does plan to make a scene, we'll be ready. I have my son Draco handling security in the event he does try something."

Theo blinked, startled by the name.

"Draco's a promising young Auror, Malfoy, but for something of this… magnitude?"

"He's not just an Auror, Fudge. He's well on his way to being Shacklebolt's lieutenant," Malfoy said with his usual smuggery. "He'll replace Shacklebolt, if I have anything to say about it, within the next year, mark my words. Everyone knows Shacklebolt's a Dumbledore fanatic, and his influence wanes every time his precious Chosen One fails to materialize."

"Yes, yes, well, if you're sure. What about the castle, then?"

Their voices began to fade, heading towards the dungeons.

"The whole place needs to be condemned, frankly. Clearly there've been squatters living here, so better for everyone if the whole place is demolished. Come to think of it, I could use a new country home—"

Theo waited until the two had disappeared before slipping out of the room, heading for Sirius' hiding place in Gryffindor Tower. So, Dumbledore would be sending someone to the Ministry gala, hm? That was one way to find the Order, though they'd have to find their way into the gala first.

He paused before the portrait of the Fat Lady. "Hey," he said. "Just have to get something."

"Not you again," she replied, scowling. "Every time the two of you come back, the whole place smells of whisky and anarchy. Is that mud you're tracking in my quarters?"

He glanced down at his jacket. "Just dirt," he grumbled, waving it away. "Had a rough time getting in."

"Good," said the Fat Lady.

Theo held an agitated finger to his lips. "Would you just open up? And quietly, please—"

"DON'T TELL ME WHAT TO DO," she barked, though she conceded to swing open, leaving Theo to roll his eyes and dart inside, heading for the loose floorboard under one of the beds in the dormitories.
He pried it open, pulling out Sirius' usual treasures; mostly other photographs of the schoolmates he'd shown Tom along with some old empty vials, plus a handwritten letter from someone called Lily that Theo assumed was a former girlfriend and/or the reason Sirius drank so much. He reached underneath for the papers, the fake Ministry seal, and the dried up pot of ink before casting a few of the counterfeit spells, locking the enchantments in place. Then he wrote in careful letters:

Tom Riddle

Hermione

Fuck, what was her last name?

Theo shrugged. Better that he determine that for her, anyway.

Hermione Malfoy

There. If anyone looked closely they'd be fucked, but this was at least real enough to distract someone long enough to get away.

That was his usual scam, wasn't it? Nothing ever had to be real. It only had to be real enough that people could believe it until he was gone, untraceable and impossible to catch. He took what he needed and he left, just like he'd left his life behind seven years ago.

Theo scratched at the tattoo behind his ear, surveying the finished product.

He really had a gift for forgery.

Then he pulled the watch out of his pocket, realizing he'd been gone long enough for Sirius to give away at least four of his personal secrets, and sighed.

The sooner he was done with all of this, the better.

"I don't think you're supposed to be drinking," Hermione said to Sirius, who glanced up at her from his second half-empty pint glass.

"Believe me," he assured her, "you don't have to listen to everything Nott says."

She flushed a little pink. "Well, it's just—"

"You," Sirius said, kicking Tom's barstool and turning to him. "You want to hear about your dad?"

Tom was caught by surprise. "My dad?"

"Yeah, your dad. Harry's dad, James." Sirius slammed the glass against the counter, gesturing to the bartender. "Another Ogden's, Ab."

"That'll be another galleon," said the old man.

"Put it on the kid's tab," replied Sirius, turning back to Tom. "Anyway, where was I?"

"James," Tom said. Hermione glanced at him, frowning, but he ignored her. So what if he wanted to pretend he was whoever Harry was for a moment? It was better than thinking about the hooded creatures who'd shown up on the train. He couldn't help thinking he'd brought them there, somehow. Like he'd spirited his own nightmares to life.
“What was James like?”

“A fucking piece of work, that’s what. An arrogant little dickhead.” Sirius grinned broadly. “Best I ever saw on a broom, too. Absolute shit with women. Nearly didn’t get Lily until the end.” The bartender slid a whisky across the bar, which Sirius downed in one go. "Bastard was my best fucking friend. Thick as thieves, me and James. Right ‘til the end, I’d have died for him. With him. If he’d just…”

His expression grew tight as he set the glass back down, glancing blearily at Tom.

“You look just like him except for the eyes,” Sirius mumbled. "The eyes are your mum's."

Hermione nudged Tom's shoulder gently. "I don't think you should be doing this," she whispered to him. "He's… he's confused, and drunk, and—"

"Tell me about my mum," Tom said, and Sirius' sloppy grin returned.

"Too good for your dad, that's what she was. Angry little spitfire of a witch, and best in our year. When my parents kicked me out and I went to live with James, guess who brought me everything I needed?"

"My mum?" Tom guessed, and Sirius smacked his hand against the bar.

"Lily fucking Evans," he confirmed. "I'd have loved her my whole life if I wasn't too busy being in love with Prongs. And Moony," he said, and stared into nothing. "Fuck, I loved them all so much I don't even know which one I loved most." He glanced down at his empty glass, peering at it. "Wish they'd forgive me," he muttered. "Wish I could tell them I was wrong."

Then he let out a barking laugh, startling Tom slightly, before he glanced up with a crooked smile.

This time, Hermione's grip on Tom's arm was too urgent to ignore.

"We need to talk," she whispered, pulling him outside.

"Hermione, Theo said not t-"

"Just for a second." She ducked through the tavern doors, shivering a little as the northern autumn breeze whipped around them. "Don't you think there's something weird about these two?" she asked him, frowning. "They're running from the police, Tom. They could be more sinister than we think."

"These don't look like police," Tom said, gesturing to the strange men walking by in cloaks. They all wore badges with some sort of unrecognizable seal, but they were hardly the uniformed officers he was used to; those typically identified him as trouble and chased him out of public places on sight.

"And listen," Hermione whispered, "about those things, with the cloaks—?"

"I think I brought them," Tom admitted, and Hermione swallowed, nodding anxiously. "It had to have been me," he told her, catching her apologetic frown, as if she'd been reluctant to say so.
"Well, we've got to find Dumbledore soon," she said quietly, shivering through another gust of wind. "Hopefully Sirius and Theo don't catch onto us before we get a chance to talk to him. I can't decide which one I trust less," she added, glancing over her shoulder at where Sirius remained inside the tavern. "Sirius seems nice enough, but he did talk about killing someone. And Theo, well—"

Briefly, Tom thought of the look on Theo's face after they'd jumped from the train.

_They're after you_, he'd said, and the look on his face hadn't been curiosity.

It was… something else. Like he was sad, or sorry.

"Are you sure we shouldn't just tell them what we are?" Tom said, interrupting whatever Hermione's thought had been. "Sometimes it seems like… I don't know. Like maybe they know something, or—"

"What? Absolutely not," Hermione said, her curls whipping into her face again as another gust went by. "Tom, don't be ridiculous. We just need them to get us to Dumbledore and then we can go from there on our own. Maybe he's, you know, some kind of Professor X-type or something—"

"Yeah, maybe," Tom said.

His mind wandered back to the creatures on the train, prompting him to fight a shudder. It seemed that ever since he'd left the orphanage, his nightmares were getting worse. They used to be intermittent, haunting him with the tolerable frequency of indigestion, but now it seemed every time he closed his eyes he could only hear the screaming, or else feel Theo's arm dragging him backwards, shouting for him to wake up.

This time, as another peal of wind went by, it dragged with it a piece of parchment that smacked into Hermione's face.

"Good lord, what the—"

She peeled it away, frowning down at it, and blinked. "Tom," she said, and he glanced down, half-listening. "Tom, look at this."

Her voice snapped him back to reality as he looked down at the page, which was some sort of wanted ad with a row of at least twenty headshots.

At the top, the most prominent:

_WANTED FOR DESTRUCTION OF PUBLIC PROPERTY, INCITEMENT, AND RESISTING ARREST: ALBUS DUMBLEDORE_

It was a picture of an old man with a white beard and a crooked nose who couldn't have looked less like someone who would resist arrest. The page was also moving, unless Tom was mistaken, precisely like the picture Sirius had shown him. Figuring that wasn't the weirdest thing he'd ever seen—certainly not even the weirdest thing he'd seen _that day_—Tom shrugged.

"So what, this is Dumbledore?"

"Not that," Hermione hissed, jabbing a finger to the bottom of the page. "That."

_WANTED FOR THE MURDER OF PETER PETTIGREW: SIRIUS BLACK_
"Oh," Tom said, though before he could focus on the page, there was someone yanking him back inside.

"Thanks for your excellent job keeping Black in line," Theo said gruffly, gesturing over his shoulder to where Sirius was snoring on the bar as Hermione quickly shoved the flyer in her coat pocket. "Did I not say to keep an eye on him?"

Tom could feel Hermione buzzing with worry beside him.

"Sorry," he said, speaking for them both, and Theo shrugged.

"Whatever. We have to get out of here anyway," he said, lifting Sirius with a surprising strength and beckoning for Tom to take his other side. "Got it? Great, let's go," he said, ducking Sirius' head from view and dragging him to the door as Hermione, chewing her lip, proceeded unwillingly to follow.

"Oi," the bartender called after them, reappearing from behind the bar as Theo was struggling to get the door open. "Nott, you little shit, you've got a tab here!"

"Fuck," Theo said, spotting one of the strange policemen from the door and darting back inside, sending Tom stumbling under Sirius' weight. "Well, that's not an option—"

"Hey," the bartender growled, pulling out a thin wooden stick. "You haven't forgotten the last time you failed to pay your bill, have you?"

"Ah, Christ." Theo glanced at Tom with frustration, seeming to make a split second decision while he was caught in the threshold, torn between two bad options. "Sorry about this."

"Sorry about wh-"

But then, before he could finish his sentence, everything went dark.

The apparition was risky—Theo figured there was approximately a 75% chance he'd get caught—but seeing as every Ministry Auror seemed to already be at Hogsmeade or Diagon and he certainly couldn't handle another of Sirius' exorbitant bar tabs, it was probably worth chancing the distance to Godric's Hollow. Theo calculated their chances to be 50/50, which was good enough to make the decision for him.

He and Sirius had hidden in Godric's Hollow before, tucked into the basement of an abandoned shack. He waited a few seconds after landing, determining the apparition successfully unnoticed, before digging some sober-up potion from the caverns of his magically expanded pocket and sitting Sirius up, prying open his jaw.

"Welcome back," Theo said as Sirius coughed himself to consciousness, dragging the back of his hand across his mouth. "You're worse than usual," he commented, and Sirius made a face, struggling to sit upright.

He frowned around the basement, glancing at the two sleeping muggles Theo had left beside him. "What'd you do, obliviate them?"

"Nah, just a stunning spell."

"You think you can explain this when they wake up?"
"Me? No," Theo said, shrugging. "I thought I'd leave that up to the responsible adult."

"Ha, ha," Sirius groaned, rising to his feet and half-stumbling towards Theo. "Why are we here?"

"Ministry gala," Theo said, taking a seat on the crumbling cot they'd dragged in from one of their other misadventures. "Heard Lucius Malfoy say that Dumbledore might be sending someone."

"Fuck Malfoy," Sirius said, shuddering at the reminder. "Hate that guy."

"Yeah, well, who doesn't." Theo rummaged around in their cupboards, hoping they'd left some food behind. Nothing, of course. "We're going to have to eat," he said, gesturing to the two muggles. "Probably have to grab something from in town."

"Mm."

Theo paused for a moment, peering at Sirius. "What's going on with you?"

"What do you mean?"

"Black."

Sirius gave him a weary glance, half-amused.

"The kid," he grudgingly admitted, gesturing to Tom. "Brings back memories, I guess. Tough ones."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah."

"If it's too much for you—"

"It's not."

"I'm serious, Black, if you're going to be a problem—"

"I won't. It was a one time thing, I swear." He looked over at Tom again, shaking his head. "But fuck, the kid looks like James. It's..." He trailed off with a shrug. "Just fucking uncanny. Hard to keep reminding myself it's not him." He scratched at his scalp, dog-like, and shook his head. "Every now and then I see him, I forget it's not my old life, and then I remember."

He smiled thinly.

"I remember, and then I feel old, and then I remember my best mates are gone and I need a fucking drink."

"Well, you can have your old life back again, maybe," Theo said, probably too-optimistically. "If Dumbledore helps clear your name—"

Sirius shook his head. "He won't."

"He might."

"Maybe." He didn't sound like he believed it much. "Anyway, can hardly go back to eighteen, can I? Even if we do manage to find Dumbledore."
"Well," Theo said drily, "from experience, eighteen's not that great."

Sirius let out a little snort of a laugh. "You know," he said, rolling his neck out and cracking it once, "neither of us can get into that gala; certainly not with all the Ministry officials around. Unless you think Malfoy's kid won't recognize you," he said, and Theo shook his head.

"Actually, I'm banking on him knowing exactly who I am. But I figure we'll need these two regardless," he said, gesturing to the unconscious Tom and Hermione. "Assuming Malfoy can get me in, then we need whoever the Order sends to see Tom, don't we?"

"Using him as bait?"

"Fucking yeah, Black, duh."

Sirius chuckled. "I taught you well," he said, clapping a hand on Theo's shoulder and wandering over to Tom and Hermione. "Hey," he said, nudging them both. "Hey, wake up."

Theo watched Tom and Hermione slowly sit up, looking around in bewilderment. Hermione, Theo noticed, shrank back from Sirius' touch, panicked.

"We're going to need you two to help us get into a party," Sirius said.

"What happened?" Tom asked. He drew a hand up to his forehead, rubbing at his scar.

"Got into a bit of a scuffle," Theo said. "We're fine now."

"But I don't—" Hermione frowned. "I don't even remember leaving, so how did we—"

"Can you kids dance?" Sirius interrupted, straightening. Theo could see his wand slipped into his hand from his sleeve, ready to cast something if she couldn't be easily distracted. "You're going to need to. Bit of an old-fashioned soirée we'll be attending."

"Dance?" Tom echoed, glancing at Hermione, who shook her head.

"Don't look at me," she said warily. "I'm certainly not the debutante type. And listen," she added to Sirius, giving him a look, "who are you really? Because—"

"Well," Sirius interrupted, "you're going to have to learn. Come on, come here," he said, beckoning Tom to his feet before turning to Theo. "You too, Nott."

Fucking hell. "No way."

"Yes way. Unless you'd like to get caught," Sirius warned, and Theo rolled his eyes, coming to his feet with a sigh. "Alright, so Nott'll be the girl—"

"What?" Tom asked, frowning at Theo with suspicion.

Dick. "Not like I'm happy about it either," Theo informed him.

"Curtsy," Sirius told him.

"Fuck you."

"Now honestly, is that how a lady talks?"

"Fuck you," Theo said in a slightly higher register, and Tom's mouth twitched.
A smile. Maybe even a laugh.

"Go on," Sirius said, and Theo sighed, but conceded to curtsy. When it came to Sirius' whims, better to just do as they were told. "Good. Now you, Harry?"

"His name's Tom," Theo said at the same time Tom said, "I'm not Harry," but that seemed to be unimportant information to Sirius.

"You're here to be Harry, aren't you? Might as well get used to it." He gave Tom a nudge, pushing him towards Theo. "One hand on the waist, and the other in his hand."

"Just do it," Theo muttered to Tom, who still looked doubtful. "The sooner we get it over with, the sooner we're done."

Tom grimaced, but placed one hand on Theo's waist, safely above his hip and below his ribs. The other hovered in the air for a moment, reluctant, before settling in Theo's.

"And one-two-three, one-two-three—"

Tom stumbled into Theo's foot, stepping down hard. "Sorry, I just—"

"It's fine," Theo said between his teeth, resuming their positions. "Just—go this way, okay? And then this foot, and—"

"Stop leading, Nott," Sirius said. "Harry leads."

"Black, I really don't think—"

"Sorry," Tom said again, quietly this time, and Theo turned to look at him.

"For what?"

"I guess everything." It occurred to Theo that he wasn't talking about stepping on his foot. "I just… I'm sorry," Tom said, his voice so low Theo could barely hear him.

"It's fine," Theo said, clipped. Regrettably, he meant it. "You didn't do anything wrong."

"You don't know that." To his surprise, Tom's eyes were steadily on his, unwavering.

"I do know that, act-"

"Oi," Sirius said, falling beside Hermione and clapping his hands briskly in their direction. "You were dancing?"

Theo turned back to Tom, trying to relax his grip on his shoulder.

"Is this about those things on the train? Because I see things too," Theo said in a low voice, as perfunctorily as possible. Not reassurance, really. Just fact. "It's not just you."

Tom swallowed, then nodded.

"Ready?" Theo prompted. "You lead, or Black'll never let it go."

Tom glanced at their feet, then up at Theo.

His eyes were very green. They were wide and lost, and blazingly defiant.
Then he took a step, and Theo followed.

Another step, more sure, and Theo went.

One-two-three, one-two-three—

They moved easily after a while, Tom's steps more naturally placed, his hand gradually relaxing in Theo's.

"How do you know how to do this?"

"Grew up rich," Theo said. "Old money."

"Lost the family fortune in a game of chance or something?"

"Yeah." Sure. "Something like that."

Tom's hand slid up, curving around the base of his shoulder.

Theo's turn. "You really never knew who you were?"

"No, never. Not a clue. Spent most of my time in the orphanage."

"This must be strange for you, then."

"Not as strange as you might think."

Theo could feel Tom's pulse. He could see the beat of his heart beside his throat.

They danced in silence. Theo's breath increasingly became a struggle, maybe from all the motion. Spinning was making him light-headed, dizzied. He watched Tom's lips, wondering if it was only him and assuming, based on the obvious fact that this was entirely ridiculous, that it was.

"I've never had any friends besides Hermione," Tom said.

"I'm not your friend," Theo replied.

Tom gave Theo a long, discerning look.

"You take care of Sirius," he commented.

"Yeah, well, he took care of me. I owe him."

"That's the only reason?"

"Yes."

"And what are we, then?"

He meant he and Hermione we, surely. "A project."

"You take on projects often?"

"From time to time."

"Ah," Tom said.
Theo's head spun.

"Hermione thinks you're a con artist," Tom said.

His mouth was dry. "What?"

Tom's mouth was close. "She thinks I shouldn't trust you."

"Oh." No surprise there. "And do you?"

"I don't not."

"You probably shouldn't."

"You saved me on the train. Didn't you?"

"Should I have left you to die?"

"Is that what would have happened to me?"

Not exactly. "Pretty much."

"You've seen those things before, haven't you?"

A stiff nod, and a glance at his shoes. "Once."

"When?"

Tom's voice was soft.

No, not soft.

Gentle.

It was too much, and Theo shook himself, abruptly releasing him.

"You've got it now," he said, stepping away as Tom frowned, startled. "You should teach Hermione. I'll get food."

He turned to the stairs, taking them two at a time, and didn't stop to process the way Tom had looked at him, watching him in silence as he went.

To say Tom had been unsettled by his conversation with Theo was a rather underwhelming turn of phrase. It distracted him, at least, from the way the scar on his forehead (or his forehead beneath the scar, impossible to tell) had been throbbing unceasingly since they'd arrived. After he'd managed a passable waltz with Hermione, Tom made excuses to go outside and get some air, wandering down the roads of the old village as Hermione's gaze followed his back, obviously concerned. She could take care of herself, as she assured him with a sidelong glance at Sirius, but still. He didn't plan to be away any longer than it took to catch his breath.

It would have been quaint, really. Even the old churchyard was full of picturesque decay, with vines that spread over graves like covetous tendrils. There was something oddly familiar about being there, though Tom had never seen the English countryside outside of pictures in books, or the occasional cheap paintings designed to cheer the orphanage's crumbling walls.
He felt a bit like he'd been there in a dream. Astral projected there or something.

Tom followed a winding path lined with cottages, markers of lives being lived around him. In his memory, or whatever sense of déjà vu it was he kept experiencing, there was nothing; only stillness. By comparison, the kitchen sounds and flickering lights seemed out of place.

He passed an obelisk, some sort of war memorial, and continued to move past it until it shimmered from the edge of his periphery, warping in the air as he passed.

Then he took a step back, frowning.

This time, it wasn't an obelisk but a statue of three people; a man, a woman, and a baby. It was strange, and strangely familiar, like everything in this town seemed to be. Tom's scar throbbed again, stinging slightly the longer he looked, and he turned away, hurrying down the road before being unable to resist a look back over his shoulder.

Gone. He must have imagined it.

Tom shook himself, swallowing. The line between waking and dreaming was getting so thin lately. First sign of insanity, Hermione had said once, confusing real life with dreams.

So reassuring, she was.

"Hey," came a voice. Theo's voice, specifically, which was dry and distinctly annoyed. He was carrying a bag of what looked like fish and chips. "What are you doing out here?"

"Just wanted to look around, I guess." Tom turned, changing direction to fall in step with Theo, who barely paused to accommodate his pace. "It's nice here," he added, attempting to make what he assumed was normal conversation. "Different."

Theo looked skeptical. "Never been to a shithole village before?"

"No, actually." They walked in silence, gravel crunching beneath their feet. "Never really left the orphanage before yesterday."

"Shit," said Theo. "That's it?"

"Nowhere to go."

"Literally or metaphorically?"

"Both, I guess."

He slid a glance at Theo, who was contemplating something in silence.

"Listen, about earlier," Tom said. "I'm sorry if I made you feel—"

He trailed off, unsure what to say.

"What?" Theo's voice was rigid, snappish. "Made me feel what?"

Safe, Tom thought.

Whole.

Like maybe the world wouldn't fall apart if they just held on.
"I didn't mean to pry," Tom amended, and Theo's mouth tightened, but he seemed to accept that.

"Just… don't get confused, okay? We're not friends," Theo reminded him. "We're temporary business partners. I'm doing my job, you're doing yours. It's not complicated."

"Right," said Tom.

Theo turned to him with something like a scowl of frustration, pausing as they arrived back at the house on the outskirts of the village.

"It's nothing personal," Theo said, setting his jaw. "I just prefer if I don't get—"

"Attached?" Tom said.

He'd noticed Theo's eyes when they were dancing. They had looked too-sharp and dark at first, almost black and generally buried beneath furrowed brows or embedded in narrow slits, but they had changed somehow when Tom looked closer, evolving until they clung to undertones of green. Tom noticed that chameleonic quality again now; the way Theo's eyes went from accusatory to mistrusting to deeply, unquestionably loathing, and then they softened to saddened, slid to anger, and cooled their way back again, landing somewhere near irritated.

"Come on," Theo said gruffly, shoving open the broken latch and gesturing Tom inside. "Let's eat."

At long last, the Boy Who Lived has returned to where it all began.

Welcome home, Harry Potter. Let's see if we can jog your memory.
Theo had not spoken to Tom again, choosing instead to turn in early. Within minutes, he was snoring intermittently from a cot in the corner of the basement while Hermione and Tom sat with Sirius, who looked piningly at his soda as if he wished he could turn it to whisky.

Tom didn't mention he had done so once. Well, not soda to whisky. Water to wine. Just to see if he could.

"James Potter was the son of Fleamont and Euphemia Potter," Sirius was telling Tom, reciting facts about not-him in a low voice; apparently, Sirius was the dossier. "James was the inheritor of his father's company, Sleekeazy's. They make hair potions."

"What, like mousse?" asked Hermione.

"Never saw a moose myself, but couldn't rule it out." Sirius took a sip of his Coke, making a face, and set it down. "As for Lily, she was—"

He broke off, stumbling to a halt. Tom watched his attention flick to Theo's sleeping form, then back.

"Well, I don't know much about her parents," Sirius admitted after a moment. "In any case, there should be quite a lot of money involved in your return. The Potters were quite well off."

"I don't care about money," Tom said. After a lifetime of having none, it was no great detriment not to expect any. "Where did they live? We, I mean," he amended quickly. He seemed to get more information out of Sirius when he played along. "Where did we live when I was a baby?"

"Here," Sirius said, expression going tight for a moment.

"What, here?" Hermione asked, glancing around the basement with shock, and Sirius rolled his eyes.

"No, just here. In the village." He eventually gave up on the soda, turning his full attention to Tom. "There was a cottage here no one else knew about." Tom watched Sirius' jaw clench for a moment as he added, "I came to get you, but it was too late."

"Too late how?"

It seemed to be too much for Sirius.

"I always wonder who could have gotten to you first," he said, mumbling it under his breath. "Clearly it wasn't Dumbledore, like it should have been. I always come back at least once a year, you know, just in case. Curse or no curse, they say lost things always find their way back to the source." He drummed his fingers against the floor. "I thought old Bathilda would know," he said, recounting his old theories, "but she was half batty already, according to Lily."

"Bathilda?" Hermione asked.
"Bagshot. The author." Sirius rubbed at his eyes. "She lives here still. I've searched the place more than once, looking for god knows what, but she's got nothing, no clues. Just old books and moldy dishes." Tom could see Sirius' eyes were misty, troubled with memory. "That's enough for tonight," he said gruffly, clearing his throat and gathering the refuse from their dinner.

Hermione leaned into Tom, whispering in his ear. "Do you think he might have murdered them?" she asked, frowning as Sirius disappeared upstairs for a moment. "He seems to have an awful lot of guilt, and he clearly can't discuss what happened."

Guilt was definitely the right word for Sirius. "I don't know," Tom said. "I don't think so."

Hermione looked troubled. "Maybe we should leave."

"And go where?" She grimaced. "There's nowhere to go, Hermione. It's this or nothing. Besides," Tom added, not wanting to get into the hallucination he'd had of the statue in the village, "I think there might be some clues here."

"Sure, maybe, but——"

They heard the sound of Sirius returning and Tom beckoned to the sleeping bags Theo had unrolled for them in the opposite corner. Hermione crept after him, hesitantly slipping into the one beside his.

"Just… be careful," she said softly.

Tom nodded, and Hermione quickly closed her eyes, pretending to sleep as Sirius reappeared.

Tom heard Sirius turn out the flickering light above them, removing his boots and grunting himself into his rickety cot before covering up with his jacket. He tossed one way, then the other, and then settled into a noisy, muttering pattern of rhythmic breathing.

Tom closed his eyes, letting the sensation of sleep drift over him. It wasn't difficult; the basement was surprisingly warm, despite not having a heat source, and he'd had worse sleeps in the orphanage.

Eventually, a sense of calm stole over him, drifting up his tired limbs.

"Harry," said a voice in his ear. "Harry Potter."

It was a woman, calling him softly. "Harry," she said again, and Tom sat up with confusion, turning in the direction of the basement stairs.

"Lily?" he asked. She shook her head, and he saw in the glimpse of light that slid in from somewhere outside that she was much, much older.

He frowned. "Bathilda?" he guessed, and she smiled.

"Harry," she said again, and beckoned him up the stairs.

He disentangled himself from the sleeping bag, rising groggily to follow her. She moved up the stairs easily for her age, almost floating over them. Was it a dream? If it was, at least it was different than the usual. Tom followed her out of the house, through the gate.

"Is it you?" he asked her. She angled her chin over her shoulder, smiling at him.

"Harry," she said.
He frowned, but kept walking.

She led him to another cottage covered with climbing vines, the door seeming to open by magic. She hadn't touched it, and neither had he. He felt the usual heart-pounding sense of fruition in his bones; the indefinable portent of something coming. It felt wrong, but also right. He was going somewhere. He was going to get answers.

Still, something about the house warned him that if he went inside, he would never be able to turn back.

"What am I?" he asked her, hesitating. "Just tell me that."

"See for yourself," she said. He heard the slightest drag on the word see.

Ssssee.

Tom stared into the darkened house, uncertain. Between what pulled him forward and what held him back, though, the instinct to keep going, to put one foot in front of the other, was far stronger.

His scar sent a jab through his skull, momentarily throwing him. For half a second, he wondered if he should stop; turn back; run.

But then—

"Come inssssside," said the old woman. She disappeared once she entered the house's shadows, swallowed up by an enigmatic dark and leaving the night air to lift the hairs at the back of his neck, hinting at something to come.

So Tom followed after her, one foot in front of the other.

Theo's eyes snapped open when he heard the creak on the stairs, his entire body reflexively shooting upright at the possibility of intrusion. Sirius was sleeping soundly, that much was obvious, and Hermione was equally out of commission beside his cot, curled up in a little frizzy ball like a snoozing kitten. The sleeping bag next to hers was empty, and in the precise moment Theo registered Tom's absence, he heard the door above them slowly wrench open.

Something didn't feel right.

Theo sat up quietly, conjuring a silencing spell to muffle the sound of his footfall as he made his way carefully up the stairs, obscuring the little scurry of rats he'd long since grown to ignore. He'd been struggling with a strange suspicion that Tom was keeping something from all of them, even Hermione. There was no mistaking the haunted look on his face as he'd passed the place the Potters' house had been; almost as if he could sense the disturbance that had always been there. The first time Theo had seen it, he'd stared up at the statue Tom surely couldn't see, wondering what had happened to the little boy who would have been the same age he was then, about to attend a Hogwarts that didn't exist. He didn't blame Tom for looking spooked.

Not that Theo gave a damn what Tom did. He just didn't want his entire future resting on something that slipped out in the night.

The ground was damp, muddy with tracks through autumn frost making slush of gravel, and Theo shivered, chilled by the night air. Tom's footsteps led unsteadily down the path, as if he'd stumbled as he walked. Theo frowned, folding his arms tightly across his chest, and hurried to follow.
He caught sight of Tom pausing on the threshold of a rickety old house, resting one bare foot on the step. Theo ducked behind a tree, watching with bemusement. What the fuck was he doing? His eyes were closed, arms red from cold. People who planned to take leisurely nocturnal strolls were usually clever enough to take a jacket. Or shoes.

Theo strained to hear what was going on. Was Tom talking to someone? He trained his ears on the silence, waiting, until the sound of something finally expelled from inside the house.

Not a voice. The sound of a snake hissing.

A large snake. A specific snake. The kind, Theo realized with a shudder, that he only heard in his nightmares.

"Shit," Theo exhaled, watching Tom take a step over the threshold.

Whatever was going on, Theo was certain it wasn't good—as if dementors weren't bad enough for one day. He darted out from his hiding spot and sprinted for the door, both palms hitting it with frustration as it slammed in his face.

"Shit, shit, shit," he muttered, jiggling the handle and swearing under his breath as he touched it. The knob had frozen to ice, breaking off in his hand, and he tossed it aside, pounding a fist against the door. "Tom!" he shouted, slamming the wood with an open hand. "Open the fucking door!"

He pressed an ear to the wood, waiting. No answer.

Not good.

Theo grimaced, aiming his wand at the door and taking three running steps back. "Expulso," he said, dodging the predictable launch of flying shards and rushing inside, coughing up dust from where the door had been.

The house smelled of mold and decay, broken glass shattered on the floor. Theo dodged most of the wreckage, shouting again for Tom.

"Where the fuck are you?"

He cast a wordless Lumos, peering into the dark.

"Tom," he said, and waited, his breath letting out a puff of white in the house's cold, stilted air. "Tom," he said, louder, "can you hear me?"

Theo caught the sound of something behind him; a little rustle of something, like fabric.

"Tom?"

He whipped around, wand extended, just in time to hear a heavy slither on the floor.

"Come closssssssser," the old woman was whispering in Tom's ear. Her face was familiar, like something he'd seen in a dream, only it wasn't the usual one. He saw it floating above him, blurry, smiling. Lily, what a lovely baby!

Something in his memory voiced its opposition. It was her eyes, he thought. Something about them was discomfiting now; different. They'd been wider than this, brown instead of amber, a little dotty and distracted but still—familiar, comforting.
Harry, sweet boy, don't cry!

Safe.

Come with me, he heard in his ear, I'll take you somewhere safe—

There was a piercing sound from somewhere else; someone calling out in distress. Tom turned, trying to see what it was, and the old woman seethed something at him.

"Come, come closer—"

He heard the sound again, something foggily outside the realm of his thoughts. His scar burned, more painful now, and he felt something both foreign and innate; unnatural, and yet born from something inside him. A burst of anger, rage, was boiling in his veins, only it wasn't his. It seemed to struggle violently beside his growing sense of confusion, disorientation.

"TOM!"

Somewhere in his head, he knew that voice. He tried to turn towards it, to see what was wrong, and the old woman warped where she stood; flickering, becoming someone else. A much younger woman, with red hair and green eyes, full of fear. Tom felt it again, the sense of something impending. This woman, she was in his way. She needed to get out of his way, and then he would have what he wanted.

He took a step and the scene changed again, becoming the room from his dreams; his scar seared with pain, temporarily blinding him. The room went white and returned, only this time, Tom felt his heart pound with anticipation, the red-slitted eyes returning as he gasped and stumbled backwards, a sharp jab jolting him awake.

He'd stepped on something; a piece of glass. The pain shot up his foot and he caught himself, braced from an impending fall against the peeling wallpaper of an unfamiliar house. Had he been sleepwalking? He was suddenly acutely conscious, though he failed to recognize his surroundings, panting for breath until he remembered something recent; something known, something anchoring. He caught the sound of a loud yell, whipping towards it.

It registered with a hitch of clarity.

"Theo," Tom slid through his teeth, yanking the glass shard from his foot and running—hobbling—for the sound of Theo's voice.

He skidded to a halt as he saw it. A snake, the biggest he'd ever seen, shot forward from an explosion, a cloud of smoke. A gun? No, Theo was holding a thin piece of wood, aiming it like a sword. No, not like a sword.

Another explosion shot out, hitting the floorboards beside the snake.

"You have no business here, son of Nott," the snake said, angry now. It lunged for Theo, who aimed the thin stick down at it again, just missing it.

"Stop it," Tom said, and the snake went rigid, turning to glance at him with narrowed eyes.

Eyes. Those eyes.

The woman, the one he'd been following in his dreams… was it possible?
Another explosion from the stick in Theo's hand dragged Tom's mind back to the present as the snake, apparently tiring of the lanky young man in its path, shot forward, sending Theo stumbling to land against a bookshelf behind him, the books tumbling out. It curled around Theo's legs, throwing him off balance, and as he slammed into the floor, the piece of wood went flying from his hand.

The snake gave a hiss of triumph, tightening to render a struggling Theo red-faced and immobile before rearing back to strike, teeth bared.

"No," Tom said without thinking, lurching forward and throwing out a hand.

Then, once again, there was a dazzling force of light, burning the backs of his eyelids as everything in the room turned a blinding shade of green.

Theo woke with a gasp to find Tom's face floating above him, dark brow furrowed with concern.

"Holy shit," Theo gasped, launching upright so rapidly they nearly collided. "What happened? The last thing I saw was… that snake, it fucking—it was about to kill me, and then—"

He broke off, noticing the smear of blood across one lens of Tom's glasses.

Then he blinked, turning his attention to the rest of the room.

Books lay on the ground, an entire shelf overturned. Glass from the shattered windows was scattered everywhere. His own head was pounding, racing, adrenaline rushing from some kind of impact.

And beside him—

Theo shrank back, stunned.

"Did you kill that snake?"

"I—" Tom cleared his throat, unable to meet Theo's eye. "I didn't want you to die."

Theo glanced down at his torn clothes, the scrapes of fangs that had narrowly missed crucial arteries, and the splatter of blood across his own haphazardly chest. There was blood on Tom's knuckles, his palms, and the torn material of his shirt, but he looked… otherwise unharmed.

Suddenly, with enormous delay, it occurred to Theo.

The blood on Tom's glasses didn't belong to the snake. It was Theo's.

"You saved my life," Theo realized, and then, in a rush, it came back to him. "You saved my life with a killing curse," he said, and blinked, scrambling backwards. "Fucking Christ, did you cast a killing curse without a wand?"

Tom blinked. "A what?"

"How did you even—? How—?" Theo stammered to a halt, staring at him. "You can do magic?" he demanded, suddenly enraged by his epiphanic moment of clarity. "Why didn't you fucking say something?"

Theo rose to his feet, spotting his wand on the floor and snatching it up, retreating a few steps from Tom to leave room for disbelief, for astonishment. For gratitude, for relief. For some wild combination of things he wasn't ready to feel.

Easier, then, to focus on the simplest of them.

"Do you realize," Theo hissed, embracing his frustration, "that everything would have been about ten thousand times easier if you'd just said that?"

To his surprise, Tom merely stared at him, bemused.

"You don't," he began, and stopped, swallowing. "You don't think… I'm a freak? Or like, possessed or anything?"

"Do you—" In response, Theo gaped helplessly back. "Do you not even know what you are?"

It dawned on him too late that fuck, of course not.

Fucking of course Tom didn't know. What muggleborn would?

"Jesus," Theo said, collapsing slowly beside Tom. He turned to look at him, everything rearranging itself more clearly in his head. "You had no idea you were a wizard?"

"A what?"

Fuck, he was going to have to start from the beginning. "A wizard," Theo repeated. Possibly without much patience. "Someone who can do magic?"

Tom frowned. "You're one?"

"Fucking—yes, obviously," Theo growled. "Do you think I'm just making this shit up?"

Tom's gaze drifted to Theo's wand.

"Wand," Theo supplied in explanation, holding it up between two fingers. Tom continued to stare at it, while Theo caught another revolting glimpse of dead snake from his periphery. "You've done that before," Theo realized, slightly unsettled as he kicked the snake away. "You do realize killing curses are illegal, right?"

That snapped Tom's attention back to him. "I figured," he said drily.

"But you've done it before?"

Tom shrugged. "Sirius killed someone."

"No he didn-" Theo broke off. "What?"

"Hermione and I saw the wanted ad," Tom said. "I know he killed someone. Was it James and Lily?" he pressed, more curious than concerned. "Harry's parents, did he kill them?"

" Fucking hell," Theo swore under his breath. "You've just been tagging along with us this whole time convinced Sirius was some kind of murderer? What the fuck were you thinking?"

"What was I supposed to do?" Tom demanded, apparently defensive of his lunacy. "You said you could take me to Dumbledore. He's the only clue I've got."

"But—" Theo's head spun. "Never mind. You think Sirius killed—"
He lifted a hand, massaging his aching temple. Where to start?

"Lord Voldemort killed the Potters," he decided, and Tom's brow twitched with confusion. "He's… it's hard to explain, but he's a dark wizard, the most powerful one there's ever been. Most people are afraid to say his name." He watched Tom process this, wheels slowly turning. "He disappeared the same night he murdered the Potters. They say the Potter bloodline's cursed or some shit—it's why Dumbledore wants to find Harry."

"But I thought Harry was just a baby," Tom said with a frown.

"Well, yeah, but he's also the only person to ever survive a killing curse. If he even survived," Theo said with a shrug, "but there's no proof he didn't. He just—poof. Disappeared."

"And Lord… Voldy-thing?"

"Also gone. Though, there've been rumors he's alive somewhere." Theo glanced again at Tom, trying to figure out what he might have been thinking. "You said Dumbledore was your only clue?"

Tom nodded. "There was someone at the orphanage before me who could do… what I can do. I'm pretty sure." He paused, hesitating a moment, and then confessed, "The owner of the orphanage told me that someone came for the other Tom Riddle once. A man named Dumbledore, who said something about Hogwarts."

"Oh." Theo blinked. "Well, Hogwarts was a school for witches and wizards, so yeah. Whoever that Tom Riddle was, he must have been a wizard."

Tom nodded slowly, processing that. "He never came back. Never did anything. Even Hermione can't find him."

"Well, that Tom must have been muggleborn too," Theo said, grimacing, "so…" He cleared his throat. "It's possible Voldemort killed him. He's not a big fan of people who are, you know. Outsiders. Muggle blood. That sort of thing," he said, suddenly feeling deeply uncomfortable.

"Like me?" Tom's gaze slid to his. "And Hermione?"

"Hermione too?" Theo asked, surprised.

Tom nodded.

"Oh," Theo said, and then, "Yeah."

Tom was quiet for a moment before turning to look at him. "That… lord guy," he said. "I thought you said people were afraid to say his name?"

Theo shrugged. "He killed a lot of people. Understandably, he's not considered polite conversation."

"But you've said his name more than once." Tom sounded curious.

"Yeah, well. Guess I've got more things to worry about than whether or not I should be scared of some fucker's name," Theo said.

The side of Tom's mouth twitched. Amused, or pleased.

"You've got some dark shit, don't you?" he said wryly, and Theo rolled his eyes. "Some angst and shit."
"Shut up, dickhead." Theo kicked his legs out, leaning against the bookcase, and let his head loll in Tom's direction. "So," he said. "Magic."

Tom looked thoughtful. "Magic?"

"Yes, magic. What did you think it was?"

"I don't know." He rubbed the back of his neck. "Is it weird if I just… thought I was a monster?"

"Doesn't take magic to wonder that," Theo said.

Tom dragged his contemplative gaze up to Theo's, the green filling with something.

If Theo had to guess, it would have been relief. Or gratitude. Things he, too, was unfamiliar with. And genuinely hated to feel.

"You're not a monster," Theo said gruffly. "In case that was unclear."

Tom's tongue slid over his lip, shaking his head. "You don't actually know me."

"True."

"We're not even friends."

"No," Theo agreed, "we're not friends."

Tom's attention drifted briefly to Theo's wand again, darting guiltily away.

Theo, catching it, held the wand up, offering it to him. "Try it," he said. "It won't work as well for you as your own wand would, but still, it's something." His fingers brushed Tom's as he passed it over to him, resting it in his palm. "It's sort of a swish and flick motion," he said, gesturing. "Usually you say an incantation, like, uh—"

"Lumos," Theo suggested. "Just… swish the wand a bit and say—"

"Lumos," Tom said, flicking the wand lightly.

Immediately, the entire house was engulfed in light, so bright it stung the backs of Theo's eyelids. Tom, too, cast his head aside, startled, and Theo reached over, grabbing his hand around the knuckles to wave the spell away, delivering them safely to darkness.

"Gentler," Theo said, and then hesitated. "Not with the wand, but with—"

He gritted his teeth, trying to figure out how to explain it.

"The wand… it channels your energy, right?" he asked, and Tom nodded tentatively. "So… don't ask for so much. Don't… crave the spell, just…" Fuck, it was hard to put in words. Sirius had been a much better teacher. "Imagine that there's a certain amount of power in the world, right?" Theo asked, and Tom nodded. "And it's all yours to access, but you can't use it all at once. You can't waste it on anger or desperation, you have to portion it out, take only what you need."

He realized he was still gripping Tom's hand, holding it steady.
"You have to want the light," he said, "but you can't ask it for too much, you can't waste a drop of it. You don't want all the world's light," he added firmly, "but... just enough. Just enough for you to see clearly."

He released Tom's knuckles, gesturing to empty air.

"Again," he said, and Tom nodded, brows knitted in concentration.

"Lumos," he said.

This time, the wand emitted a glow that illuminated the room softly, stretching out to fill the space. A faint incandescence at first, it burned brighter the longer Tom held the spell, his fingers gradually loosening on the wand as he grew comfortable with controlling the sensation.

Then he waved it away, staring at the point of the wand.

"Holy shit," he said.

"I know," Theo replied.

Then, before Theo could say anything else, Tom had shifted, the wand gripped tightly in one hand as the other shot out, closing around Theo's cheek and dragging him closer.

Tom's mouth was on his before Theo registered what was happening. He lurched away, one hand shoved between them on the bloodied fabric of Tom's t-shirt.

"What the—"

He broke off, seeing Tom's expression of astonishment.

"I'm... I'm sorry," Tom said, blinking as he sat back, face pale. "I just—it was just, using that spell, I felt—" A swallow. "I didn't mean t-"

Fucking hell.

"Shut up," Theo said, tightening his grip on Tom's shirt and yanking him back, closing the distance between them to find, breathless, that Tom's lips had parted instantly, with all the desperation Theo had just advised him not to feel.

The kiss was unexpected, searing-hot, Theo's clammy skin pressed to the warmth that radiated from Tom while his inadvisable blood loss cours ed too-fast through his limbs, lending him a shiver. It manifested in an exhalation, a breath Tom stole from his mouth, and then Theo was forcing Tom on his back, the wand clattering to the floor beside them.

Theo could feel his pulse raging; paralyzed with fear, and then triumphant with it. Tom's hands were under his shirt, nails scraping at the skin beside his spine, digging in with all the frustration he must have felt for a lifetime. It was like Tom was anchoring himself to the answers he'd never gotten; to the knowledge he'd never been allowed to possess. He shimmied his quick fingers up to Theo's ribs and stole up to his shoulders, tongue darting over Theo's bottom lip, and Theo, braced on his elbows, slowed the kiss to manage a heavy swallow, forehead falling raggedly against Tom's.

"We should get back," he said hoarsely.

He could feel Tom's lungs filling beneath his chest, pulse racing.
He was certain Tom could feel the same from him.

Tom's hands slid from his shirt and Theo shut his eyes, hating himself. He wanted to go back to five minutes ago, to the exhilaration of kissing Tom, to replaying it on a constant loop. He wanted to be sure he never did it again, going back in time to unkiss him, untouch him, unfeel the sensation of wanting him. He wanted, cruelly, to do neither, to do both. To move forward and pretend it never happened at all.

Tom's hand closed around the back of his neck, tracing the spot below his ear.

"What are the tally marks for?" Tom asked, too softly. Gently.

He should let go, Theo thought. He should shove Tom away, release him, back away for the distance of a lifetime. He should get to his feet and run. He should leave and never look back.

"Seven marks," he said. "Seven years."

He was so fucking good at running. There was a mark for each year he'd been someone else.

Tom slid slowly out from under him, sitting himself carefully upright. Theo shifted away, about to be the first to turn and leave, but Tom caught him by the collar, yanking him back.

"Let's go," Tom said, and then, in a motion so quick even Theo didn't see it coming, he pressed a final kiss to Theo's mouth and dragged him up, launching them both to their feet.

It was a petty dare; a parting challenge.

So Theo nodded, one hand pressed to his lips, and followed in silence as Tom picked his way through the rubble, heading toward the faint glow of the broadening horizon.

Wormtail was hesitant, frightened.

"My Lord… Nagini, she is—"

_Gone. I felt her go._

_You may have won this time, but I can feel myself getting stronger. The closer you come to knowing who you are, the more my power resurrects._

_Two sides of the same coin._

_Find one, find the other._

_The Boy Who Lived may rise, but so will I._

_You can run from me all you like, Harry Potter, but we only come closer in the end._
"I knew it," Sirius exclaimed, "he's Harry. He has to be," he said, triumphant. "He can't possibly be the son of muggles—"

"But I am," Hermione said, frowning as she exchanged a glance with Tom. "I'm positive my parents aren't magic."

The knowledge that his logic might have been flawed seemed to deflate Sirius, but only for a moment. "Maybe you're adopted," he suggested brightly, and Hermione shook her head.

"I collected DNA samples from my parents when I was ten," she said matter-of-factly. "I know my parentage with less than 0.5% margin of error." At Tom's arched glance, she shrugged. "What? I can't claim perfect certainty, but still. That's statistically significant, even with the numerous sensitivity factors involved in determining DN-"

"Yeah, fine, we get it," Theo said, rising listlessly to his feet. "You're going to need these," he said, removing two slips of parchment from his pocket. "Regardless of who your parents are, wizards have to be registered with the Ministry, which you aren't. They're not perfect," he added, turning to Tom, "but they'll do the job."

Their fingers brushed by accident as the paperwork changed hands, and Tom looked up, catching Theo's eye. He caught the traces of half a smirk, which were quickly swept away from Theo's features as he turned to Hermione.

"Hermione… Malfoy?" she asked, frowning, and Sirius looked up. "Who's that?"

"Arbitrary choice of surname," Theo said loftily, and true, Tom didn't know him particularly well, but even he was sure that was a lie.

"Nott," Sirius warned in a low voice. "What are you doing?"

"Hm? Nothing," he said. "Anyway, we'd better get going, shouldn't we? Fashionably late is one thing, but total inconsideration I simply will not abide."

"Balls," Sirius muttered, and then, to Tom's utter confusion, he began… shrinking.

No, expanding.

No, neither, he was—

"Padfoot?" Hermione gasped, and the big black dog shook himself of Sirius' clothes, giving Theo a strangely human look of impatience, a la, Happy now? "But," Hermione sputtered. "But he was… but I—"

"Shall we?" Theo said, summoning Sirius' clothes from the floor and shrinking them into a collar he fastened around the dog's neck. Now that the secret was out, Tom could see just how frequently the other two used their wands, which was... pretty much reflexive. "Come on, with a sense of urgency," Theo told a still-gaping Hermione, nudging her to the stairs until the dog trotted over and nipped at his heels. "Ouch, you buggering—" Theo broke off, brow furrowing, as Sirius motioned with his snout to Hermione. "Ah, right."

He frowned, considering something, and said, "Pink or blue?"

"What?" Hermione asked.

"Would you prefer pink," Theo repeated with painful slowness, "or blue?"

"Pink or blue what—"

"Periwinkle it is," Theo determined, and flicked his wand.

Immediately, Hermione's jacket and jeans morphed into an evening gown with corresponding cape, the denim stretching out and floating briefly before snapping into a tight, glimmering silk that came in at the waist and flowed out, settling against the floor. Hermione frowned, hitching a foot out from under the skirt, and eyed her shoes.

"Are those glass slippers?"

"If the shoe fits," Theo said.

"Is this supposed to be a costume, or…?"

"It's Halloween, isn't it?" Theo told her impatiently, and turned to Tom. "Ready?"

"I'll take pink," Tom said.

Theo smiled thinly. "Oh, so he's clever, then."

Another flick of the wand turned Tom's outfit to something of an old-fashioned tuxedo, or what Tom would have considered old-fashioned, having never seen one in real life before. It was a simple black and white, which Theo then duplicated on himself with minor differences: an untied bow tie, for one, and a green silk lining on his jacket. Then he removed two of his rings, one silver and one brass, and transformed them into two masks, similar in design. He handed one to Tom, a brass Roman design that was so thinly woven Tom could scarcely believe it had ever been metal, while Theo put on the other, a silver Venetian mask accented with a delicately braided wreath.

"Don't wear it," Theo warned, pausing Tom mid-motion as he shifted to put on his mask, confused whether to put it below or above his glasses. "Just, you know... hold onto it."

"Why wouldn't I wear i-"

"Shall we?" Theo interrupted, offering Hermione his arm. She made a face, still in opposition to the shoes, but ultimately permitted Theo to lead her up the stairs behind a trotting dog-shaped Sirius as Tom followed, hiding his amusement and securing the mask atop his head.

Theo led them down the same path Tom had taken the day before, strolling at a leisurely pace.
There were other people out and about in the village; Tom assumed the three of them would prompt some stares, given their formal outerwear, but nobody who passed them seemed to be interested in them at all. Instead, everyone seemed to look directly through them, and by the time Theo finally came to a stop, Tom was convinced the passersby were not only uninterested in seeing them, they were incapable.

"Here we are," Theo announced.

Where yesterday there had been nothing, there was now a massive, glittering mansion that stood at a distance, separated from the road by a lush, expansive lawn. The entry to the gardens featured two opulent fountains and a small pond, out of which a fish leapt to dazzle briefly in the sun.

"It's all an illusion," Theo assured them, releasing an awed Hermione's arm. "Probably a tent they expanded and transformed for the occasion. Wait here," he added, glancing around at the men and women who were starting to materialize from thin air, or who slid in from the sky, riding—to Tom's great bewilderment—on brooms. "Just have to fetch our invitations," Theo said, tipping a hat he hadn't previously been wearing in Tom's direction before strutting off to a small stand marked BROOM CHAUFFEUR, dog-Sirius at his heels.

Hermione leaned closer to Tom, glancing apprehensively around. "What are the chances he actually has an invitation?"

Tom watched Theo subtly flick his wand, then glance around before perching on the chauffeur's counter and sliding to the other side.

"Almost none," he said, fighting a laugh. "But you have to hand it to him, he's resourceful."

"I still don't trust him," Hermione said, lips pursed. She folded her arms over her chest, glancing down at the neckline of her gown. "I mean, don't you think he could have made this less revealing?"

"I think you look great." That, and he wasn't too worried about Theo's interest in her breasts. "Have you come around on Sirius?"

"What? Of course not." She gave Tom a reproachful look. "He may have murdered someone, Tom. Just because he seems nice enough doesn't mean we should trust him implicitly."

"Theo says he's innocent," Tom said, observing Theo from afar. He had an interesting way with people, pulling on a successful mask of pleasantries that Tom could see, even through an actual mask. Theo seemed perfectly comfortable with each arriving guest, chameleonic each time his audience changed. Contrary to his eccentric first impression, all evidence pointed to the likelihood that when Theo wanted to blend, he could blend. Nobody seemed to consider him out of place.

"Oh, so we're just going to take the con man at his word?" Hermione scoffed. "Please."

"Do you really think he's a con man?" Tom asked, watching Theo take a broom from someone dressed as a mythological figure while summoning something from their pocket, handing it off to the dog waiting behind him.

"Well, he's certainly not an upstanding citizen," Hermione grumbled, though she softened slightly. "Though it is rather nice to know we're not... abnormal."

Tom watched a woman soar in on a broomstick, leaping delicately to her feet in a gossamer gown and cloak of scarlet red.

"I suppose not," he said, watching Theo again. This time, Theo kissed the woman's hand, slipping the invitation from her coat pocket with a little motion of his fingers.

Tom recalled, briefly, the feeling of those fingers twisted in his shirt.
"Well, hopefully Dumbledore is here," Hermione said, apprehensive. "It'd be nice to speak to someone respectable, for once."

Tom turned to her, arching a brow. "Respectable?"

"Oh, you know what I mean," she sighed, waving a hand at the arriving guests. "Theo and Sirius aren't particularly conventional, are they? Even for wizarding society, by the looks of it." She glanced around again, adding with a frown, "Is Theo even properly trained? He didn't sound as if he'd ever actually attended Hogwarts."

Tom thought of his magic lesson with Theo the previous night. "If he isn't, he's very smart."

"Well—" She hesitated, giving Tom a wistful look of apology. "I don't mean to imply that education is everything, of course," she said, seeming to remember that Tom himself had once been (and in fact, still was) something of an undesirable member of society, "but—"

"You'd rather talk to someone else," Tom supplied neutrally. "I understand."

She seemed to register her mistake. "Tom, I didn't mean t-"

"Here we are," Theo said, materializing in front of them again before handing them each an invitation. "Ah, one second," he said, and tapped his wand against each one, changing the scripted lettering from Gilderoy Lockhart and Rita Skeeter to Tom Riddle and Hermione Malfoy. "There we are," he said, giving Hermione his arm again. "Shall we?"

"Where's S-" Hermione broke off, frowning. "Where's Padfoot?"

"Oh, I can hardly bring my dog to the party, can I? He'll keep watch from outside. Come along, then," he said, nudging her off down the path and into the manor house. "By the way," he said with a sidelong glance at her, "you don't happen to speak French, do you?"

"I took it in school," Hermione said, which Tom could see was information that appeared to confirm Theo's suspicions. "Why do you a-"

"Hello," Theo said to the man at the door, taking Hermione's invitation from her hand and passing it off in greeting. "Apologies for the delay, awful traffic on the Floo, you know how it is getting into the countryside during peak hours—"

"Malfoy," the man at the door read doubtfully, flicking a glance up at Hermione. "You're telling me this is a Malfoy?"

"Ah, my apologies, I forgot you may not be familiar," Theo said. "She's one of the French cousins—une cousine de Bordeaux. N'es-tu pas, ma chérie?" he said without a trace of an accent, giving her a sharp nudge to the ribs.

"Ah, um… oui," Hermione said weakly.

"See? There you go," Theo said. "If you have any doubts, you can always confirm with Draco. He is managing security for this event, is he not?"

The man's eyes narrowed.

"Auror Malfoy," he said into his tie clip. "There's someone here claiming to be a cousin of yours. From—"
"Bordeaux," Theo supplied, still smiling.

"Bordeaux," the man echoed into the tie clip.

"What?" barked a voice on the other end. "Dear god, no—wait there."

There was a loud crack as a young man with pale blond hair suddenly materialized in place, wearing a tuxedo not dissimilar from Theo's. His, however, was an entirely emerald green jacket with black lapels, the garment made of fine, gleaming velvet. He wore a signet ring on one hand, marked by some sort of noble crest, and if there was one thing obvious from his appearance, it was money. His mask was secured just below the high bones of his cheeks and then up like vines above his brows, tendrils of silver serving as decorative embellishments to his skull rather than concealment, as if he hadn't actually cared to obscure his identity.

The rich man who apparently oversaw security turned to Hermione. "Wait a minute," he said with a puzzled frown, "you're not Hort-

He broke off as he noticed Theo, who had nudged his mask up on his head.

"—not what I expected," the man hastily amended, clearing his throat. He seemed to be addressing Theo alone, his attention flicking back and forth between him and Hermione. "I didn't realize you'd, um. Well—"

He seemed flustered, which the man at the door appeared to notice.

"We're fine here," the blond man said hastily. "I'll just… I'll show them inside myself," he said, pulling Theo after him. Tom hurried to follow as Hermione threw a panicked glance over her shoulder, never one to enjoy being unwillingly caught up in someone else's plan.

Theo, however, seemed perfectly at ease, even when the blond rounded on him with what appeared to be abject fury.

"You absolute motherfucker," said the blond. "You shitbag of epic proportions."

"Yes, hello," Theo replied. "Lovely to see you, Draco, it's been far too long."

"It's been SEVEN FUCKING YEARS," said the blond, briefly attracting the attention of the guests around them before he hurried to lower his voice, curling one hand to a fist.

"Has it? Hm," Theo said. "Well, you know how life gets in the way. You look good," he added, patting the blond, Draco, on the shoulder until the latter swatted his hand aside. "Auror, really? An odd choice, though with Lucius so high up in the Ministry I suppose the 'exam' must have been rather straightforward—"

"What on earth are you doing here?" Draco hissed, before seeming to recall Hermione's presence. "Sorry," he told her curtly, attempting to collect himself as he snuck another overlong glance at her. "Your name, again? Seeing as you are not my cousin."

"It's… Hermione," she said, looking as if she'd forgotten it herself for a moment. "And this, um." She glanced at Tom, frowning. "Well, this is Tom, and—"

"I need your help with something," Theo said, snapping his fingers in Draco's face. "Got a minute?"

"Did you have a minute?" Draco demanded, his attention landing back on Theo with a scowl. "Did you have one bloody minute at any point over the last seven years to tell me that you weren't dead, or was that too much to ask?"

"Well, I'm here now, aren't I?" Theo countered, which did not particularly thrill Draco. "You two should probably go enjoy the party," he said, turning to Tom and Hermione. "You know, have a drink, dance, carouse, so on and so forth."

He seemed insistent on speaking to Draco alone, going so far as to give Tom a look of prompting when Hermione looked as if she might argue.

"But we just got here—"

"I'm sure Draco will show you around later," Theo assured her, giving Draco a look. "Right?"

The blond didn't seem any less bothered, but he nodded gruffly, softening just enough to reassure her.

"Fine. Then let's talk," he said, taking Theo's arm and leading him away.

In their wake, Hermione frowned, chewing lightly on her lip as the blond disappeared with Theo, the sound of a loud crack echoing through the ballroom as they went.

"What was that about?" she asked, and Tom, who hadn't the slightest idea, shook his head.

"Don't know," he said, and wandered into the ballroom, permitting himself to be distracted by the floating candles, the sky-resembling canopy of stars, and the silver platters of champagne. "But I'm thinking we should probably get a drink."

Draco's grip on Theo's arm did not relent until he had apparated them outside, where, if he wished, he was free to shout at his leisure.

Which he did not hesitate to do.

"—AND THEN, WITHOUT EVEN A NOTE, YOU'RE JUST GONE! JUST… GONE! POOF! DISAPPEARED WITHOUT A TRACE! AND I THOUGHT SURELY HE'LL SAY SOMETHING, MAYBE HE'S WAITING FOR THE SEARCH TO DIE DOWN BUT OBVIOUSLY HE'LL SAY SOMETHING, YOUR BEST FRIEND WOULDN'T JUST DISAPPEAR AND LEAVE YOU WITHOUT A WORD—"

"Okay, so you're upset," Theo judged, at which point Draco's mouth snapped shut with fury. "I hear you, but—"

"YOU HEAR ME? THEO, I—"

"To be clear, everyone hears you," Theo said, stepping forward and clapping a hand over Draco's mouth. "Quiet down, would you? I'm happy to explain," he clarified to Draco's muffled yell, "but I can hardly do that over the sound of all this shrieking."

Draco's eyes narrowed, no less enraged, but he was at least clever enough to stop shouting. Theo released him, disengaging with a shrug.

"I wanted to say something," Theo said. "But also, I didn't."

Draco glared at him, folding his arms petulantly over his chest. "There better be more to it."
"What was I supposed to tell you?" Theo demanded. "If Lucius had found out—"

Draco looked taken aback. "You thought I would tell my father?"

"You tell your father everything," Theo said. "Don't you?"

"I'm a grown man, Theodore, I hardly need t-"

"Well, we were eleven then," Theo reminded him succinctly. "Specifically, I was eleven, and uninterested in being caught by the Ministry. And you were doing well enough without me, so—"

"Hang on," Draco said, frowning. "How would you know that?"

Theo sighed, exasperated. "Do you really think I'd have left my best friend alone?" he demanded, and Draco's expression stiffened. Then, gradually, it softened. Marginally.

"What do you want now, then?" Draco asked.

Well, huffed. But it was at least an improvement.

"I haven't exactly been… legally compliant," Theo said. "My existence over the past seven years has diminished to something of a chaotic path."

Draco's pale brow furrowed. "Okay, and…?"

"And I've got one final con," Theo said. "One big one, and then I'm done. I'm going to leave England, leave all this behind. But I need your help."

Draco's mouth stiffened. "You want my help just so you can leave again?"

Theo shrugged. "I can't really come back, can I? You know who my father is," he reminded Draco. "He was headed for Azkaban and so am I, for different reasons."

"But I could help you," Draco said.

"Yes, you can," Theo agreed, "and that's why I'm asking you for help."

Draco grimaced. "Seriously?"

"Seriously."

"But—"

"Are you my best friend or not?"

"I have no fucking idea," Draco replied hotly.

"Well, then I suppose we're at an impasse."

The two of them looked at each other for a long time, each gauging the other. Draco had always been a bit pointy, in Theo's opinion, but now that he was older it had softened him a little, making him sleeker, angular but less haughty. The conceit was there, of course, in the way his hair was slicked back and his jacket was undeniably ostentatious, but age had rendered him a less saturated mirror of Theo.
"I really didn't think I'd even recognize you," Draco said in a low voice. He circled Theo for a moment, warily considering him from different angles. "I remember thinking when I was thirteen or fourteen that my god, I wouldn't even know him anymore. If I bumped into him in Diagon I wouldn't even know I'd done it."

He paused in front of Theo, scrutinizing him.

"But you're you," Draco said after a moment, seeming to say it more to himself than to Theo. "You look completely different and exactly the same. You still look like I could tell you all my secrets and you'd take them to the grave, just like you did when we were kids."

He paused, pinching the bridge of his nose, and sighed.

"What do you want?" he said irritably, and Theo leapt to take advantage of his opening.

"I have to find Dumbledore," he said, and at Draco's scoff, he clarified, "Any member of the Order will do."

"What?" Draco demanded. "If I could find Dumbledore, don't you think I'd have arrested him by now?"

"I heard your father say he was sending someone to this party," Theo said, and Draco frowned.

"How do you know that?"

"What, I've been gone for seven years and now you want to focus on unnecessary details?" Theo scoffed. "Honestly, Draco, where are your priorities—"

"What do you need Dumbledore for?" Draco cut in. "He's not going to be any quicker to forgive you than the Ministry."

"I don't need Dumbledore, I need to bring something to Dumbledore," Theo said. "Did you get a good look at the skinny little miscreant I brought with me?"

"The girl? She's not a miscreant. Kind of pretty, actually—"

"Not the girl, Casanova, the boy. You didn't notice him?"

Draco frowned. "What, with the glasses? And the scar?"

"Yes, that's the one, good work having eyes—"

"What about him?" Draco asked, and Theo leaned forward, conspiratorial.

"What if I told you," he began, heightening the sense of mystique, "he was really… Harry Potter?"

No one hearing that name could do so with any less than utter dramatics.

"No." Draco leapt back, alarmed. "Seriously? Him?"

"Maybe," Theo said, shrugging. "Who's to say, really?"

Draco stared at him, disbelieving.
Then, after a moment, he rolled his eyes, groaning.

"It's a con," he said tartly.

"Excellent deduction, Auror Malfoy, you've correctly detected mischief afoot," Theo said, toasting him with an imaginary glass.

"Jesus," Draco said, turning away. "I'm on track to become Head Auror, Nott. I'm not going to help you commit a crime—"

He was pleased to see the meter added to Draco's height hadn't diminished his acute sense of opportunity. "Oh."

"Yes, 'oh' indeed," Theo agreed. "Appealing, isn't it?"

Draco hesitated. "Even if I could help," he said uncertainly, "I don't know how I would. I have no idea who Dumbledore is sending."

Theo shrugged. "Well, they're inside somewhere, aren't they? It's a simple matter of using those working eyes of yours, I imagine."

"That's assuming I'll find them before you do," Draco said.

"Well, you've already demonstrated your excellent capacity for deduction, haven't you?"

Draco cut him a glare. "And if you find them before me?"

Ah, so it would be teamwork, then. Hardly Theo's specialty over the last seven years, but it wasn't as if Draco had to know that.

"You help me find Dumbledore, I'll help you turn him in," Theo said, extending a hand. "I'll take the reward money, you can have the fame and Daddy's everlasting approval," he suggested neutrally, and to Draco's lack of opposition, he added, "Do we have a deal?"

Draco considered it a moment, then gave in, clasping his hand around Theo's.

"Deal," he said, apparating them back inside.

Hermione may not have liked the dress Theo had chosen for her, but the other wizards at the gala certainly did. Within minutes, a rather large man had approached, asking for a dance.

"Oh, um, I'm not sure if—"

"Vat is your name?" asked the man, who seemed to be some sort of Bulgarian athletic type. He was wearing a mask that looked more like a birdcage.

"Hermione, but—"

"Herm-ow-ninny?"

"Her-my-oh-knee," Hermione said, "but like I said, I…"
She trailed off as the not-particularly-fluent Bulgarian kissed her hand, a flush materializing to rise in her cheeks.

"Just go," Tom advised her, amused. "Put those waltz rehearsals to use."

She gave him a pained look, already being led away. "But—"

"Have fun," Tom called after her, turning back to a floating platter of champagne before suddenly locking eyes with someone across the room.

He felt a little nudge of something unpleasant as a black haired man in a serpentine mask approached him, wading through the crowd. Tom glanced over his shoulder, hoping the man was looking for someone else, but unfortunately he swooped across the room to stop directly in front of Tom, peering at him with narrowed contemplation over a noticeably hooked nose.

"Those eyes," the man murmured, and his voice was low, unpracticed. Slippery with something. Condescension, maybe, though he seemed to be talking more to himself than to Tom. "They're her eyes," he said, staring discomfitingly at Tom, and then, abruptly, he seemed to snap from a trance. "Who are you?"

Who was he seemed to be the better question, but Tom would have done anything to get away almost the second he started speaking. "I'm Tom."

"Tom what?"

"Tom Riddle." He glanced around, looking for Theo, but there was no sign of him yet. "Do I know you?"

The man's already narrowed eyes became slits. "Tom Riddle?"

"Yeah, I—" Tom glanced around again, looking for the pompous blond. "Right, well, I should probably go—"

"Go where?" the man demanded. "How did you get here?"

"I—" Tom broke off, suffering a searing heat to the scar on his forehead beneath his mask. "I have to go," he said, pressing a hand to his temple and turning away. "Sorry—"

"Wait," the man called after him, launching forward, but Tom slipped through the crowd, rushing away.

His scar was paining him again, as it seemed to be doing incessantly since leaving the orphanage. It burned intensely now, stinging with a radiating pain, and Tom only came to a halt the moment he slammed into someone, ricocheting clumsily away.

"Sorry, sorry—"

"Tom." The glint of a silver Venetian mask flashed in his periphery as Theo's cool hands slid to either side of his forehead, lifting his gaze. "What's happening?"

Through the fog of pain, Tom registered the sound of Theo's concern.

"It's nothing," he said, forcing himself to straighten. Even through the mask he could see Theo's brow was furrowed, one hand still resting on his shoulder. "Did you get what you needed?"

"Hm? Yeah. Yes, sort of. What's going on?"
"Nothing, my scar—it does this sometimes. Where's Hermione?"

Theo waved a hand. "I sent Draco over to her. They'll either fall in love or keep an eye on the party, whichever comes first. Do you need help?" he asked, frowning. "I can try to ease the pain. Sirius almost always needs a headache spell, his hangovers are fucking deadly—"

"No, it'll pass." It was passing already. Tom blinked a couple of times, clearing his vision. "Did you see that weird guy in the cape?" he asked, turning over his shoulder and seeking out the man who'd spoken to him. "The snake mask, with the hooked nose—?"

"Were you by chance recently concussed?" Theo asked drily, gaze flicking rapidly over the rest of the room. Tom was pretty sure whatever else Theo was, he was incredibly observant. If such a man had been present, Theo would have seen him. "Maybe we should leave, get some sleep."

"I don't need sleep." Tom spotted Hermione in the center of the room, dancing with Draco now. She seemed a little more nervous than she had with the Bulgarian, though it was clear that Draco, whatever else he was, was a far better dancer. He swept her across the floor with rehearsed precision, effortless, and her cheeks were flushed from either motion or what Tom guessed to be his aristocratic charm. "That guy," Tom said, gesturing with his chin. "Is he a friend of yours?"

"Draco?" Theo shrugged. "Sort of."

Tom slid another look at him. Draco was… posh, clearly. The type of boy Hermione probably would have dated had she gone to Oxford. If Theo had known Draco in some prior iteration of his life, that would explain the little glimpses of things Hermione had missed about him; the knowing how to dance, how to dress. The perfect manners, when he wanted to have them. The strangely accessible French. "Sort of?"

He turned back to find a slow smile creeping over Theo's face.

"What?" Tom said, bristling, and Theo laughed.

"You're jealous," he observed, and Tom felt a little uprising of humiliation.

"I'm not jealous, I'm just saying, it's not as if you've ever been forthcoming—"

"You're fucking jealous," Theo cut in, "and it's fine. It's funny." He chewed the thought for a second, still half-laughing, before sliding another look at Tom. "It's fucking hilarious is what it is."

Tom rolled his eyes. "Don't get carried away, dickhead. It was one kiss."

"Yeah?" Theo stepped forward, as if he were going to speak in Tom's ear. "Interesting," he said, and Tom swallowed, feeling the little brush of unshaven hair from Theo's cheek. "One kiss and you're already worried I'm going to run off with the first pretentious pureblood I see."

Tom struggled not to show the way his pulse thrilled. "Pureblood?"

"Means there's no muggle anywhere. Witches and wizards all down the line for generations."

"Oh." Theo hadn't moved away; instead, he reached down for the champagne glass in Tom's hand, bringing it to his lips and taking a sip. "What about you?" Tom began, and angled his head to the side. He could play this game. "Are you a pureblood too?"

Theo chuckled, his lips moist from the champagne as his eyes flicked over the distance from Tom's mouth to his. "Do I look like a pureblood to you?"
"Yes, actually. You hid it well," Tom congratulated him neutrally, "but you can't hide it here. I know a silver spoon when I see it, and you told me yourself you grew up rich."

"I see." Abruptly, Theo pulled away, easing distance between them as he looked up at Draco. "I've got him looking for someone," Theo explained, raising the champagne to his lips again as he gestured to the center of the ballroom. "They say there's supposed to be someone from the Order here tonight."

Tom shook off the hollow sensation of Theo's absence. "The Order?"

"Dumbledore's organization." He drained the rest of his champagne, sidling up to a nearby tray of glasses at the same moment Draco led Hermione away from the dance floor. "Hasn't seen anyone, by the looks of it."

Draco approached with Hermione on his arm, picking up a glass from the tray beside Theo.

"Nothing," Draco said in a low voice, making it look as if he were speaking to Hermione. "I can keep looking, but I doubt anyone else would arrive this late."

"Laugh," Theo said, facing the opposite direction.

"What?" Draco asked.

"Not you. Her," Theo said, turning to face Tom as Hermione made a slightly uncomfortable sound, feigning conversation with Draco. "Your father just walked in."

Tom scanned the room, identifying a formally dressed man that was clearly an older version of Draco. Rather than a mask, he wore some sort of laurel circlet, a crown with leaves of thin silver filigree.

"Shit," Draco said, picking up a second glass and handing it to Hermione. "You'd better go."

"Fine. You stay here," Theo told Hermione out of the side of his mouth. "Padfoot will meet you outside."

She nearly turned to give him a look of surprise. "You want me to stay?"

"You've got a reason not to fuck me over, don't you?" Theo told her, locking eyes with Tom to make a point. "Doesn't she?" he asked Tom coolly.

Tom frowned. "I can't just leave her," he said.

"Nonsense," Theo assured him, "she's in good hands."

Tom flicked a doubtful glance at Draco, then back to Theo, who smiled thinly.

"Up to you," Theo said. "Stay or go, your choice." He leaned forward, setting his glass on the tray before murmuring in Tom's ear, "It was only one kiss."

Then he turned and walked away, tucking his hands into his pockets as he went.

Tom stared after him, uncertain, and glanced at Hermione.

"Are you going to be alright?" he asked her.

She nodded. "I'm fine," she assured him. "Draco and I will keep an eye out. Theo's right," she added, voice a little high with pretense, though it was calculated kind. The kind that meant she was working an angle.

From his periphery, Tom watched Theo slip out the doors of the enchanted ballroom, disappearing.

"Go," Hermione said over her shoulder, smiling for a moment at Draco before permitting herself to be led back to the ballroom floor.

Then Tom pivoted sharply and dodged through the crowd, hurrying after Theo.

Chapter End Notes

a/n: Reminder that this is the rare instance where the whole story is already written, I'm just posting as I find time to edit. Should wrap up in about ten parts total quite soon. Thank you for being here! I have a soft spot for this film, so naturally the AU was irresistible.
Theo caught the sound of footsteps behind him on the gravel road back to the house in Godric's Hollow, not bothering to turn around. Eventually, as Theo predicted, Tom caught up and fell into step beside him, moderately winded.

Neither of them said anything. They walked in silence through the village, the path crunching beneath their feet, until Theo suddenly changed direction.

"This way," he said, leading them off the path.

"Where are we going?"

"Somewhere quiet."

He led Tom to the spot he frequented when Sirius was busy drowning his sorrows, or his memories, or whatever else it was Sirius was trying to put to rest in Godric's Hollow. Just beyond the churchyard were the beginnings of some farmland and the outskirts of a secluded wood.

"Going to murder me?" Tom said drily.

Theo didn't answer.

Instead, he waited until they were out of sight from the village before coming to a halt, pivoting around to trap Tom against his chest.

"Maybe later," Theo said, pulling Tom's mouth to his.

Tom, who wasn't totally an idiot, was ready for him, snatching Theo's mask first and then his own, and what started as a kiss became an artless fumble, progressing until Tom had wrestled him back against a tree. Theo gave Tom a shove in return, just for fun—just because—and Tom shoved him back, pinning his shoulders to the bark. The leaves rustled beneath their feet and Theo yanked at Tom's jacket, tugging it from his shoulders and depositing it carelessly on the ground.

"Pureblood, huh?" Tom said in Theo's mouth. His fingers lingered near the clasp of Theo's trousers, toying with the zipper, and then he slid his palm down, catching Theo's groan between his teeth. "Interesting."

"Doesn't mean shit anymore," Theo replied, unbuttoning Tom's shirt. Tom was wiry and lean, the presence of muscle unavoidable for lack of comforts like proper meals, and Theo thrilled a little at the feel of him, bony and sharp and clearly not for everyone.

Not for everyone, but here, now, for him.

Tom's mouth slid to Theo's jaw, leaving a trail down the side of his neck as his hands scraped over the roots of Theo's hair, gripping the back of his skull. He slipped his tongue over the tattoo that stretched up from Theo's shoulder, tugging at the collar of his shirt.

"What's this?"
"Fucking… bird," Theo mumbled, "I don't know, who gives a shit—"

Tom peeled away the buttons carefully, giving Theo another hard shove when he tried to speed things along. "I want to see it," Tom said, green eyes flicking over him as Theo chewed at his lip; impatient, frustrated, desperate.

Theo's jaw clenched in tacit resignation, teeth locked together to keep from something fucking stupid like saying 'please,' and Tom's lips flicked up in a smile. He drew a careful, deliberate line with the tip of his finger, following the shape of Theo's tattoo. It revealed itself in pieces as he went: jaw, neck, shoulder, traveling down the length of his arms until Tom had removed Theo's shirt entirely, leaving the whole thing exposed.

"Did it hurt?" Tom asked, brushing the pad of his thumb over the shape of it. A falcon, a snake pulled taut between its talons, wings outstretched to reach from the side of Theo's neck to the bone of his shoulder.

"No." A lie. Of course it fucking hurt, not that Theo was going to admit that.

Tom's fingers hovered down the falcon's talons to the snake that draped across his clavicle. Then he leaned forward, placing a kiss to the hollow of Theo's throat.

Then to the left side, traveling west.

Tom's lips followed a careful path to the base of Theo's jaw as his hand stole up to cup the back of Theo's head, curving around the nape of his neck.

"The tally marks," Tom said. He scraped his teeth across them, lightly. "You ran away seven years ago?"

Tom's other hand stole down Theo's torso, smoothing over the front of his trousers and then flicking the clasp undone, followed by the zipper.

"Answer," Tom said, biting at the lobe of Theo's ear, "or I won't keep going."

Theo jerked his hips against Tom's hand, and he pulled back.

"Nope," Tom said.

"Asshole," Theo gritted out.

Tom lifted his palm, holding it up for Theo's inspection. "Tell me," he said.

Theo grimaced, half loathing him.

"My dad," Theo said gruffly. As a reward, Tom lowered his palm, resting it on the outside of Theo's trousers. "He… wasn't a good guy. Was a pretty shit guy, actually." Tom's thumb stroked the outline of Theo's cock. "Fuck," Theo exhaled, coughing it up.

"Keep going," Tom said.

Theo swallowed, tearing at his lip with his teeth. "He worked for the man I told you about. The Dark Lord," he said, as Tom's fingers slid under the band of his pants. "Lord Voldemort," hissed out from his teeth.

"Yeah?" Tom's hand wrapped around his cock, easing over his shaft.
"Yeah, he—" Theo's head fell back as Tom slid down to his knees, breath hot against the bare skin of his torso. He shivered, managing, "My dad, he… died. I—"

Tom's lips slid over him, tongue pressed to the fabric of his underwear.

"Fuck, I—"

"Keep going," Tom said.

"I… fuck, I ran," Theo choked out. Tom swirled his tongue gently over his tip, sucking at him through the fabric. "It was… he was on his way to Azkaban, I didn't want to wait to see what the Ministry would do to me—"

"Azkaban?"

"Wizard prison." Theo exhaled raggedly, flakes of bark scraping loose against his head. "I ran away. Met Sirius. Been on the run ever since."

"And?"

Shit, fuck, fucking Christ—"And what?"

Tom looked up.

"What are you counting?" he said neutrally, tugging Theo's trousers down lower. Fuck, Theo was going to have scrapes everywhere, fucking nature and shit in his hair, fuck it. Fuck everything but this, Tom's mouth, his hands, his eyes.

"I don't know," Theo said, desperately trying not to beg. "Years until I find it."

"Find what?"

Theo let out a haggard breath as Tom slid his lips over him.

"Something that feels like home," he said to the autumn air, tangling his fingers in Tom's hair as he let out a moan of something wordless, like a stab to his fucking heart.

It wasn't that Tom was some sort of sadist. He simply saw an opening, realizing Theo might actually want him; that in fact, Theo might want him more than anyone had ever wanted him, Hermione included. Theo didn't want his secrets, didn't want his powers, didn't want him for who he resembled or who his parents might be. Theo wanted him, and maybe there was some pleasure in that for Tom. Maybe he wanted to know more about Theo than what his tattoos were, or what the vial contained around his neck. He wanted to know those things too, obviously, to build a library of information about every embellishment of Theo's form, but he wanted other things more. To know how Theo tasted, how he sounded when he came. To know what Theo looked like when he was weak, when his knees buckled, when he broke down and told the truth. He wanted to memorialize the look on Theo's face when it was frozen in ecstasy, twisted in confession. He wanted to possess every detail of Theo's form and commemorate them with his hands, his teeth, his hips.

It was almost all a fumble, imprecise and too-rough, and if it was the rarity of Theo's softness that had ever made Tom look twice, then it was Theo's fury, his defiance, that made Tom want a taste. This was a con man, a liar, a fake. This was a man whose blood ran pure and who had cast himself down to nothing instead, sacrificing privilege for freedom. This was a man seeking as profoundly and as hollowly as Tom was seeking; as hungrily and as desperately, too. It was near and out of reach, close and insurmountable, and when Theo pulled him down to the ground Tom didn't resist, lighting the match that struck for every inch of contact between them.

Theo had him on his back, leaves in his hair, spine arched from the ground with his hips framed by the shapes of Theo's fingers, Theo's tongue dragging over him like he never wanted to have anything less worthy pass through his lips again. He came with a blinding, excruciating sense of anguish, displaced from the bones of his limbs, and then reached blindly for Theo without a word, dragging him up until Theo had collapsed on his side beside him, dropping like a stone.

They stayed like that for several minutes. Fucking freezing, not that it mattered. Tom would have frozen to death rather than moved. His scar burned, a cool sweat plastered to his temples, but fuck, this close to Theo he could feel his heart beating.

This close, he could feel the beat of Theo's heart.

"I have these nightmares," Tom said before he realized he intended to speak, and Theo shifted to look down at him, waiting. "I'm in this house," Tom explained in a low voice, "someplace familiar. It's the same every time—I'm walking up the stairs, looking for something. I have this feeling of… I don't know. Relief. Something's going to be over soon. Something I want, badly. Something I need."

He closed his eyes, fighting the sting from his scar.

"Then I hear a scream," he said, and Theo shifted, fingers finding the curve of Tom's jaw. The rings on Theo's fingers were cold against his skin, but the brush against his cheek was incongruously soft; airy, delicate, floating. "A man yells something about a baby, and then a woman screams."

Theo's nails scraped up the back of Tom's neck, darting up to his scalp. If they kissed now, Tom would taste himself on Theo's lips. He shivered at the prospect of it, dissolving once again to bittersweetness; to the acrid taste of his confession, coaxed out by Theo's honeyed touch.

"I see this… man. This thing with red eyes," Tom said, swallowing, "so it's not exactly a man. I mean, he is," he amended, "but… there's something wrong with him. Sometimes I think it's me—I can feel his emotions and his thoughts," he explained, letting Theo tap mindlessly along the bones of his vertebrae, "but sometimes, I'm the one looking at him. And sometimes, I see him coming—his eyes, first, they're glowing—and then his…" He closed his eyes. "Then his face comes into focus, and then—"

"Wait." Theo went rigid, his grip suddenly tightening around Tom's neck. "Did you say a man with red eyes?"

Tom opened his eyes, watching Theo's expression change.

"Yeah," Tom said, shifting toward him with a frown. "Why?"

"Like… red slits?" Theo asked him. He looked unsettled; possibly even fearful, the way he had when they'd been attacked on the train. "Narrow, cold, cruel—?"

"Yeah," Tom confirmed, a little breathless. It was the only time he'd ever told anyone about his dreams, gambling on the idea that Theo might not consider him a monster, but he hadn't expected Theo to react with… recognition. "He takes a step towards me," Tom said, and backed away, keeping his distance in the event Theo's look of panic turned to coldness—or worse, to horror. "He comes for me, and I'm—"

He shook himself. Some things were too difficult to explain, and Theo still looked rattled.

"There's something after, too. A woman. The one—the snake," Tom said, and Theo blinked. "I thought at first the snake was her, but then—"

"You said the man comes for you?" Theo cut him off, propping himself upright. With the few inches between them, Tom could see his pulse quicken. "What does he do?"

"There's—" Tom strained to remember. "There's a green light," he said, trying to recount the events of the dream in the proper order. "It's blinding for a second, and then when I open my eyes again it's a blur, but the man, he's gone—"

"Jesus, fuck," Theo unexpectedly swore, stumbling to his feet and reaching for their clothes, yanking his jacket from the dirt. He tossed Tom his pile of trousers and jacket, scraping a many-ringed hand against his scalp as Tom staggered to his feet, taken aback. "Shit, Tom, you're—"

Theo broke off, staring for a moment at Tom.

Tentatively, he reached forward. His motions were robotic, almost clumsy, as he took Tom's face in both hands, disbelieving.

Then his eyes traveled to the scar on Tom's forehead, fingers hovering over it in silence.

Tom blinked with confusion, swallowing hard.

"Theo," he said, but Theo was shaking his head, hurrying to fasten his trousers.

"Come on," Theo said. "We have to get back to Sirius. Right now."

It's him.

The reality slammed into Theo's chest, vibrating through his limbs.

It's actually fucking him.

The red eyes, the green light. That could be no one else but Voldemort; no other spell but an Avada Kedavra.

Tom had survived the killing curse. He was the Boy Who Lived.

Tom wasn't some James Potter lookalike who'd wandered by just when Theo was desperate enough to do something mind-numbingly stupid.

He was fucking Harry Potter—the one person on earth Lord Voldemort couldn't kill.

"What's going on?" Tom asked, hurrying to keep up with him. He sounded concerned, but Theo needed to tell Sirius first; needed to tell him they'd done it.

They'd fucking found him. What were the odds? Theo wasn't good enough at math to even begin to comprehend them. There wasn't a goddamn witch or wizard who didn't know the name Harry Potter and somehow, they'd fucking found him.
The black dog met them outside the house, trotting apprehensively along the village's main artery until he saw Theo approaching.

"I need to talk to you," Theo said flatly. "Human you. Now."

"Theo," Tom said, still reaching for him with confusion, but Theo shook his head.

"Go see if Hermione's inside," he said, before turning back to Sirius. "Change back, Black. Now, right now."

Tom slipped away, ducking his head and making his way into the basement as Sirius, hidden behind the shack, stretched out to his usual form of a slightly alcoholic but probably reasonable adult man.

"The son of Lucius fucking Malfoy is here," Sirius growled, reaching for his clothes and tugging on a pair of his worn trousers. "Couldn't you have mentioned you were going to ask for his help?"

"It's him," Theo said, as Sirius continued ranting, struggling to pull on a shirt.

"Where have you even been, Nott? You shouldn't have left him alone with her," he snapped. "I've been listening to him talk to that girl and trust me, she's a better actress than she looks, or there's something about her th-"

"It's him," Theo said again, grabbing hold of Sirius' shoulders the moment he was dressed and forcing him to pay attention. "Tom—it's him, you were right. He's Harry," he said, as Sirius went rigid and then frowned, his posture melting further the more he registered what Theo was saying. "He can describe the whole thing, Black, right down to the way Voldemort looks. He remembers the Avada. It must be where the scar comes from," he said, suddenly feeling sick. "He must have gotten it when he survived the curse, but—"

"My god." Sirius dragged a hand to his mouth, disbelieving. "He's… it's him, you're sure? It's really him?"

"Yes." Theo, suddenly needing to sit down, collapsed down onto the ground, shaking his head. "We fucking found Harry Potter, Black. We found the savior of the wizarding world and he doesn't even know—"

Sirius' attention snapped to Theo. "You didn't tell him?"

"Do I look like I told him?"

"Nott," Sirius growled, "are you joking? After all this, you didn't even s-"

"Say what?" Theo demanded, cutting him off in retort. "What was I supposed to say? How do I even begin to explain that this entire world he just fucking discovered has been waiting decades for him to surface? He doesn't know how to use magic," Theo reminded Sirius with a grimace, "and for fuck's sake, he still thinks he's a monster, he doesn't even realize th-"

"Ah," came a voice behind them, as Theo and Sirius both went rigid. "I should have known it would be you, Black."

"—all it is, you're sure?"

"It's… been a long time," the voice replied hesitantly. "I admit, he might have other reasons, but as far as I know—"

"Tom," Hermione said, whipping around to face him as he made his way into the basement. "We have to go."

Tom, who hadn't quite recovered from Theo's abrupt dismissal, found himself caught off guard a second time. "What?"

"Sirius and Theo," Hermione insisted, stomping over to him, "they're criminals. You're just part of some... some con. They don't even know where Dumbledore is, they're just trying to get him arrested—and that murder Sirius is accused of? It's not just that," she said, dropping her voice to a hushed tone of conspiracy. "Haven't you wondered why he's so desperate to believe you're Harry? He needs you, Tom, because he has to finish the job! He's the reason the Potters are dead."

Tom opened his mouth to deny it, but then stopped short.

Admittedly, there had always been something strange about Sirius' guilt.

He shook himself. "But Theo, he's—"

"He's lying to you," Hermione told Tom fiercely. "I know you like him," she added, softening a bit in sympathy, "but can't you see that's just part of his plan? Sirius wants to use you, to bring you back to some Dark Lord, and as for Theo—" She broke off, frustrated. "We're just a paycheck for him, Tom!"

The idea that what he'd just done with Theo might have meant nothing to one of them seemed to stick in Tom's brain like a thorn.

"Hermione, I—"

"Draco will help us," Hermione said firmly, turning to the blond behind her. "Won't you? He works for the Ministry of Magic," she added, turning back to explain the situation to Tom. "If anyone's going to get us to Dumbledore, it's going to be him."

Tom's gaze flicked from her to Draco, who seemed torn, but still grimly determined.

"I didn't realize Theo was working with Black," Draco said, grey eyes shifting to Hermione. "He's a notorious follower of You-Know-Who, and he once murdered a man in public—in broad daylight.
And Theo hasn't explained how dangerous it is, either, the two of you being here," he added, looking solemn. "If you were to get caught—"

The you in this scenario that was cause for concern seemed, to Tom, to be Hermione.

"—you'd be arrested, sent to Azkaban. You already ran afoul of some dementors," he said with a glance at Hermione, as Tom tried not to wince at the memory of the hooded figures. "You need protection, which I can actually provide, and I can help you find Dumbledore—"

"Or," came a cold voice at the top of the stairs, "I can take you to Dumbledore right now."

Tom swiveled around to find the same man who had been at the party, recognizable by his voice, his nose. Behind him, Theo and Sirius were bound by illuminated rope, floating down the stairs in his wake.

"Snape?" Draco asked, astounded. "What are y-"
But he was cut off as the man shot a rapid spell from a wand he produced from nowhere, hitting Draco square in the chest. The blond dropped instantly, collapsing in a pile at Hermione's feet.

"Draco!" she gasped, hurriedly dropping to her knees to revive him.

"Hey," Tom said, turning back to the hook-nosed man; a little spark of anger erupted in his palm as he saw Theo struggling against his restraints. "What do you think you're doing with them?"

"These men," said the hooked-nose man, "are criminals. This one," he said, jerking his head to Theo, "is the son of one of the most ruthless Death Eaters of all time, and this one," with a nod to Sirius this time, "is the murder of Peter Pettigrew, responsible for the deaths of James Potter and Lily Evans. No doubt these two have both been conspiring to turn you over to the Dark Lord since the moment they found you."

Tom blinked.

"What? But—"

"These two have never known how to find Dumbledore," the man said with a sneer over his shoulder at Theo and Sirius, "but I can take you to him now."

"There will be no need for that, Severus," came another voice, materializing from the shadows of the basement to startle Hermione into a gasp. "I am already here."
Death of a Con Man, Part VIII

Cont'd.

Theo had seen Albus Dumbledore once or twice, though never up close. Usually on the cover of the Daily Prophet, which never seemed able to make up its mind about whether Dumbledore was a hero or a villain. Anti-establishment for sure, and a little foreboding. Sort of a guerrilla hero, one of those cult-types, or so Theo would have said if he'd been asked before today.

Which was maybe why he was a little underwhelmed to find a heavily robed, Gandalf-style man with a long white beard.

A little gasp of, "Fuck," escaped Sirius under his breath, which Theo thought was a bit of an overreaction. Given that Sirius had been ripping into whoever Snivellus Snape was not five minutes earlier—calling him obscenities Theo wasn't even sure were technically obscenities because they were so violently incomprehensible from rage—it seemed unlikely that the presence of an old man should merit something so dramatic. Theo strained around, trying to glance questioningly at Sirius (he did not want to look at Tom, who was now Harry, who had been staring at Theo as if Tom-Harry-whoever-he-was had been… fuck, wounded or something) when he noticed the mutterance had been delivered not in response to Dumbledore, but to the others who were apparating into the basement, one by one.

Nearly all of them were faces Theo had seen from time to time, either because they were Ministry workers or, alternatively, because they were wanted by the Ministry for crimes of incitement; little misdemeanors of rabble-rousing from time to time. Extremists, mostly, who lived the cult of the Chosen One. They saw themselves as Robin Hoods, vigilantes, while the Ministry mostly saw them as headaches, nuisances, little more than the opposite side of the spectrum from the former Death Eaters who were just as troublesome, albeit more likely to be violent. Dumbledore's followers were, like Dumbledore himself, not exactly amoral, but devoted to a reality Theo had considered far out of reach before knowing, as they were about to find out, that they'd been right all along.

Most of them seemed to have caught on already, victory settling into their faces while Hermione and Tom-Harry, unsure what was happening, stood closer to each other, shoulder to shoulder once Hermione rose up from Draco's stunned form on the ground. But while the others were staring, wide-eyed, at the man they now knew to be Harry Potter, one, Theo noticed, was looking directly at Sirius. His face, scarred and sallow, was particularly haunted, and even the sandy colorlessness of his hair looked electrified with shock.

He also looked vaguely like the boy who had been in Sirius' picture; one of the four in Gryffindor uniforms, though with noticeably more scars.

"Padfoot," he croaked. "Is that… are you—"

"Moony."

It was something Theo had heard Sirius say many times in his sleep, muttering it to himself or even shouting it, waking up in a sweat while Theo, usually somewhere in the vicinity, would pretend to sleep through it. He knew perfectly well the kind of torment that name had brought Sirius; he anticipated that whatever else this reunion was, it would be, at very least, a relief of some sort.

Or perhaps not.

"You fucking bastard," the scarred man suddenly growled, advancing toward Sirius with his wand out only to be stopped by Snape, the man who had an almost-familiar, not-entirely-a-stranger face Theo couldn't quite place.

"If anyone's going to have the honor of dispatching Sirius Black, it's going to be me," said Snape, as Theo struggled pointlessly against his restraints to disagree. "The death of Lily Evans is on his hands, and—"

"Oh, bugger off, Severus," snarled the scarred man, whom Theo was surprised to see had shoved the greasier man away in favor of digging the tip of his wand into Sirius' forehead. "You traitor," the man was seething, practically salivating with rage. "You betrayed them! All of them! And now you have the bloody nerve to take their son—"

"Remus, please. Harry is what's important," Dumbledore said calmly, but Sirius didn't move.

"It wasn't me," Sirius said, his voice a low, solemn rasp. "It was my fault, yes, but Remus, it wasn't me, it was Wormt-

"YOU KILLED WORMTAIL!"

"I didn't," Sirius snapped, "though if I had, I would have been fully justified, wouldn't I? Ask him," he said, and from Theo's strained vantage point, Sirius seemed to be talking about Dumbledore. "I wasn't their secret-keeper, Moony, it wasn't me. It was Wormtail, not me." He was a little winded with desperation, struggling with his confession, which even Theo had not heard prior to that evening. He had never asked about the circumstances behind Sirius' run from the law, merely trusting that he was innocent.

"Moony," Sirius said again, "it wasn't me." His voice softened, and Remus' eyes, glowing and amber, slowly widened. "It wasn't me," Sirius said again, his voice pained, "but my god, Moony, I wish it had been. Every fucking day I wish it had been me instead of James."

Theo watched Remus' hand shake on his wand, teeth gritted.

"You can't honestly believe him," Snape scoffed from behind them, eyes narrowed. "If he were innocent, why would he have run?"

"They were taking me to Azkaban," Sirius said, speaking exclusively to Remus and ignoring Snape altogether. "You know I wouldn't have gotten a fair trial. They would have looked at me, at my family and my name, and convicted me on the spot. I tried to reach you, but—"

"I was underground," Remus realized, brow furrowing. "I was organizing the werewolves, you couldn't have reached me."

"Yes," Sirius said with a nod, "and I didn't know if I could trust him." His gaze flicked to Dumbledore then, who said nothing. "To be honest with you, Moony, I still don't."

All eyes were on Remus, who seemed frozen, paralyzed with indecision.

Then, slowly, Remus lowered his wand from Sirius' forehead, taking a slow, staggered step back.

"Release them, would you, Severus?" Dumbledore said coolly, despite the greasy man's look of astonishment that he would suggest something so positively unpalatable. "Of course we're all willing to hear Sirius' side of the story. After all, Harry is unharmed, is he not?" he asked, turning to Tom-Harry with a warm, paternal smile. "We owe Sirius a debt of gratitude for leading us to the Chosen One, whatever his intentions."

Snape scowled, but flicked his wand as he was bidden, removing the restraints that had bound Theo and Sirius. Theo turned to find Tom-Harry still staring at him; still accusatory. He shifted away, averting his gaze to where Sirius and Remus were standing at a wary distance from each other.

"Now, Harry," Dumbledore said, turning to Tom-Harry. "We have so very much to talk about."

Tom-Harry numbly shook his head. "I'm not him, sir," he said, gaze flicking back to Theo as he spoke. "I… I can't be this… this Chosen One. Whoever that is, I'm sorry, but I just can't be the one you're looking for."

That, it seemed, was finally enough for Sirius to snap out of his Remus trance.

"Actually, you are," he said, and then, perhaps remembering that he was delivering some weighty news, Sirius took a few steps towards him. "Listen," Sirius said quietly, "I knew the moment I saw you that I had known you once, and I was right. I was—I am—your godfather," he explained, half-smiling, half-teary, finally able to confess what Theo had been so desperate to tell him only moments ago. "Harry, you are exactly who we've all been looking for. You're the spitting image of James Potter, my best friend, except for your eyes." Sirius gave a tentative, shaky smile, and said, " Those belong to Lily Evans, the brightest witch of her age. Your mother."

So that was it, then. Now he knew.

Now he knew he was Harry Potter, the son of two war heroes, not Tom the abandoned muggle orphan. He would leave here and be Harry Potter, the savior of the Wizarding World, who did not know Theo Nott, con man and son of a murderer, and who never would.

"You and I," Sirius said to Harry, "we're the only family either of us has left."

Theo swallowed, fixing his attention somewhere near his boots.

"You should join us, of course," Dumbledore interrupted, stepping beside Sirius. "You're more than welcome. And you, as well," he told Hermione, smiling genially at her. "Are you a witch, my dear?"

She seemed hesitant to answer. "Yes," she said, and then glanced down at Draco. "But if I go, he goes."

"Of course," said Dumbledore, unbothered. "The more the merrier. In fact, we should celebrate. We have finally found our Harry Potter—and on Halloween, of all nights!" he announced, beckoning to the others, who must have been relieved to know their cause for seventeen years had not been in vain. "Harry, my boy, you're finally home," Dumbledore told him, and with that, the swarms of other Order members came closer, including Remus.

"I was one of your father's closest friends," Remus told Harry gently, with a cautious glance at Sirius. Those two, Theo thought, would have plenty to discuss among themselves. It was obvious Sirius planned to go with them, wherever the Order's headquarters were.

Theo's throat tightened.
Wherever that was, it was none of his business.

He stepped away, turning to Snape, who had hung back from the others.

"My fucking wand, please?" Theo said under his breath, and astoundingly, Snape's eyes managed to narrow further. "I'm not going to do anything, dickhead. I just need it to leave."

"I know who you are, you know. I know who your father is."

Abruptly, Theo placed him, remembering that nose beneath a dark hood, obscured by a sinister mask.

"You," he said, blinking. "But you're... you're one of—"

"Do you really think I'd be here if I were? Just take the wand and go," Snape said coldly, shoving it into Theo's hands. "You clearly understand nothing."

Hints of his Dark Mark were visible from Snape's forearm and Theo blinked away the memory of his own father's Mark, accepting the wand with a curt, dismissive nod.

He raced up the stairs, ignoring the usual scurry of vermin beneath them and making his way to the village road. The sun would be down soon, and he would need to find somewhere to sleep, which wouldn't be here. If there was one thing he was sure of, it was that he would not be returning to Godric's Hollow again.

"Theo. Theo, wait!"

Theo flinched, stopping in his tracks, and schooled his expression before turning to find Harry Potter there, standing breathless in his wake.

"What?" Theo snapped, and Harry blinked.

Frowned.

"You knew it was really me," Harry said. "You knew, didn't you? How long?"

"The whole time," Theo lied, and waved a hand, turning away. "Tell Dumbledore I'll be in touch for my payment."

"Wait a minute—"

Harry snatched at Theo's arm, tugging him back, and Theo slid his gaze away.

"That's it?" Harry said, lips pressed thinly. "I was just a payout to you? Nothing else?"

It was a window, it seemed. But what was Theo supposed to say to the Chosen One? I'll worship you? I'll give up everything for you? It was nothing the others wouldn't have already said to him, promising him far more than Theo had to offer. Harry would shortly know how many of them had already given their lives for him without Theo adding himself to the list of devotees.

In the end, Harry Potter would be better off without the son of a Death Eater.

"I told you from the beginning," Theo said. "You were always a job. That's it."

Harry blinked.
"Let go of me, Harry," Theo said, and watched him register the name: Harry. Not Tom.

He released Theo with a grimace, taking a step back. Making them strangers again, as Theo had tacitly demanded.

"Nott," came Sirius' voice, jogging after them with a look of confusion. "Nott, where the fuck are you going?"

Theo flicked his gaze to Sirius, then back to Harry. "Make sure Sirius doesn't drink too much," he said in a low voice. "And tell him to bathe. He's around polite company now."

Harry said nothing, and Theo turned away.

"Nott, what the—Theo," Sirius panted, reaching him and frowning as Harry turned away, heading back to the basement. "What are you doing?"

"I have other engagements," Theo said. "A garden party, et cetera—"

"Nott, don't be stupid, I'm begging you—"

"Don't beg, Black, it's unbecoming."

"Nott, don't—" Sirius grabbed his arm again, admonishing him this time. "Theo, you stubborn arse, if you leave now—"

"He'll forget me," Theo supplied coolly. "He'll go onto bigger things, better ones. He'll be the hero everyone wants him to be. And he'll be with you," he reminded Sirius, clapping a hand on his shoulder, "and you'll be back where you belong, too. So…"

He trailed off with a shrug, gesturing to the road before him, and Sirius sighed.

"Are you sure you want to do this?"

Theo nodded. "I'll be fine, Black. Just—" Another dismissive wave. "Go."

Sirius glanced over his shoulder to where Remus stood outside the door, waiting.

Harry had already disappeared.

"If you need me, you can find me at the Burrow," Sirius said, turning back to Theo. "Okay? It's their safehouse, it belongs to Molly and Arthur Weasley."

"You'd better return Draco to his father," Theo said, and Sirius waved a hand.

"Yeah, yeah, eventually. But you—"

"I'll be fine," Theo said. "Really." A shrug. "We always knew this would come to an end, didn't we?" he prompted, forcing some warped version of his usual irreverent smirk. "The student was always going to surpass the master, and anyway, I'm out of sober-up."

Sirius gave him a wistful look, tapping the tally marks on the side of Theo's neck.

"I really hoped you wouldn't make it to eight," Sirius commented, shaking his head.

Theo merely shrugged. "Take care of yourself, Black," he said.
Then he turned away, taking the village path and following it into the autumn sunset.

"My Lord, they have found him!"

Excellent, Wormtail. Fetch me a cloak, and procure my wand.

It is only fitting that my reunion with Harry Potter be tonight.

Tom, who was somehow Harry, rubbed at the sting of his scar, which only seemed to be getting worse as the night progressed. He was careful not to admit it to the others, trying to hide the motion each time he raised his hand reflexively to the source of his discomfort, but he wished he could have told Theo about it; or about how the visions, the red-slitted eyes, kept reappearing in his mind, even though he was awake.

He wished, mostly, that Theo had been… different, somehow.

That everything had been different, somehow.

He rose from where he was sitting in the Burrow, where he had been introduced to what seemed like countless redheaded siblings and at least a dozen other people who kept shaking his hand, telling him how long they'd been waiting for him. One man, Doge or something, had tried kissing his knuckles before Tom (no, he reminded himself, Harry) had hurried away, trying to find Hermione.

She was sitting beside Draco, who was awake now, in one of the house's cramped bedrooms.

"You won't turn them in, will you?" she was whispering to him. "Please, you can't. I know we've just met, but—" She reached out, tentatively permitting her hand to hover above his knuckles. "Please," she said softly, "if Dumbledore can really help T-" A pause. "If he can help Harry, then… please." A breathy exhale. "Don't turn these people in."

Draco's grey eyes fixed on hers, considering her for a moment.

"Is that really all you want from me?" he asked her, and Harry watched her breath quicken. "Or," Draco said, sitting upright to lean towards her, "is there some other reason you're here with me instead of out there with them?"

Hermione swallowed, hesitant. "Draco, I…"

But Harry, noticing that Draco had taken her face gently between his hands, slipped away, trying to find solace in some other corner of the bustling house.

"Are you alright, Harry?" Sirius asked, spotting him as he passed and pausing him with a hand on his shoulder. He and Remus had been deep in conversation, presumably covering the events of their seventeen years apart. "Something wrong?"

Harry shook his head, spying Dumbledore's silhouette outside the window.

"I think I'll just have a chat with Dumbledore," he said, feigning normality as Sirius nodded, releasing him and turning back to Remus.

It was hard to believe Albus Dumbledore's face in real life was the same vaguely menacing one Harry had first seen on the wanted poster near Hogwarts. In fact, all he could remember thinking from Dumbledore's first appearance was that he was not at all what Harry had expected. This was the man who had shown up to take Tom Riddle from the orphanage?

"Ah, there you are," Dumbledore said, smiling pleasantly as he noticed Harry's presence. "Quite a temperate evening, isn't it?"

It was getting late quickly, already a touch before midnight. Out here in the country, there were more stars in the sky than Harry had ever seen in London.

"You can see, I'm sure, how much you mean to everyone," Dumbledore continued, waving his hand at the party going on inside. "There isn't a witch or wizard alive who doesn't know your name."

Theo had known it, then. Theo had known precisely how valuable he was.

That was all he had ever been.

Harry swallowed it down, turning to Dumbledore. "Can you tell me about Tom Riddle?" he asked, and Dumbledore blinked. "That's what I was called before, back at the orphanage. Mrs Cole named me Tom, after a boy who lived there before me. She's the one who told me to find you."

Dumbledore cleared his throat. "An orphanage, hm? Ah, Bathilda," he sighed, shaking his head. "I always suspected she'd taken you somewhere, but even legilimency was no use. Her mind was already going even before you were born." He stared grimly out into the night sky. "That wasn't part of the plan, you know."

Harry frowned. "The… plan?"

Dumbledore paused a moment, tilting his head in thought, and then turned to Harry.

"Do you know the significance of Halloween?" he asked, and Harry shook his head. "Magically speaking, the veil between the living and the dead is thinnest at midnight on this precise day. It's a time of death and rebirth, resurrection." He placed a fraternal hand on Harry's shoulder, adding, "It is also the night Lord Voldemort killed your parents; and, I presume, the night he left you that scar."

Harry touched a hand to it, relieved to have an excuse to do so. "This?"

"Yes," Dumbledore said. "It's quite an unusual scar. Only a curse like Avada could have done it."

"Avada?"

"Avada Kedavra, the Killing Curse. Its use is unforgivable, of course, rarely used. Lord Voldemort was… quite free with it."

The red-slitted eyes flashed behind Harry's eyelids again. For a moment, as Harry looked at Dumbledore, his vision seemed to spark and warp, filling him with a rush of loathing.

Then he blinked it away, painfully unclenching his fists.

"Are you alright?" Dumbledore asked, frowning at him.

"Yes, I'm… I'm fine," Harry said. "But about Tom—"

"Oh, Tom Riddle is long gone, my boy. Lord Voldemort killed him long ago," Dumbledore tutted softly, adding, "He has killed many people, Harry. Your parents, of course—"
A scream.

Lily, take the baby and go!

"—but countless others, as well. He is without empathy, you know. Incapable of love."

Harry, Harry my sweet boy.

"He has caused so much damage to this world, which was once so free, so beautiful. I deeply regret that you were never able to know life at Hogwarts the way your mother and father did."

Harry, Daddy loves you—

"You would have loved this world, Harry."

—Mama loves you!

"It should never have become like this."

A flash of red eyes, a scream.

Lily, take the baby and go! It's him! I'll hold him off—

Not Harry! Please... have mercy... have mercy...

Please... I'll do anything!

"And if we'd had more time, perhaps I could have made you understand why this was all necessary —"

Step aside, girl, don't be a fool—

The red eyes. They weren't Harry's red eyes, he realized, suddenly able to place himself in the dream. They had always been someone else's. The eyes, the rage he felt coursing in his bones… those were someone else's, too. It wasn't a dream at all; not a monster living inside his head, but a memory of one.

That was it, Harry suddenly realized.

That was how Theo had known.

It hadn't been the whole time. It had only been when Harry confessed that he, too, had seen Lord Voldemort that Theo had recognized him for what he truly was. Theo had known he was Harry because they had shared the same nightmares, the same fears. Because for a lifetime, they had been haunted by the same ghosts.

He had lied, yes, but not about everything. He'd lied to see Harry free, then; to cut him loose.

An idea formed in Harry's head, solidifying like a pulse: He had to find Theo. He wasn't what these people thought he was. He wasn't a hero, and he had to leave here, leave all of this before it was too late, and—

"Unfortunately," Dumbledore said with a sigh, "this has all gone on long enough."

Harry blinked, Dumbledore's hand tightening sharply on his shoulder.
"What?"

"I'm terribly sorry, Harry," Dumbledore said kindly, "but I'm afraid neither can live while the other survives."

Then, before Harry could say a word, he felt himself sucked into the vacuum of the night sky, hurtling out of orbit to free-fall madly into space.
Death of a Con Man, Part IX

Theo stumbled a little out of the pub, a bit more capable now of understanding Sirius' incurable proclivity for drink. Sure, maybe it wasn't the best use of time, but it certainly did something. Turned the volume down. Made the sharpness of the pain duller until he felt nothing, or at least a little less.

He licked some spilled firewhisky from his wrist, tasting Tom's skin beneath his tongue. Harry, whatever. No, he'd remember him as Tom. Tom, yes, god. Tom was very, very good. He tasted better than this whisky. He tasted like the first time Theo had run from Aurors, or like how it felt to rob a rich man blind. He tasted precisely like the sensation of proving someone wrong or discovering a lucky break. Like the sickle he'd forgotten he'd left in his pocket when his belly was empty, or the vacant alley that could lend an escape. Tom wasn't the opulence Theo had been born with; not the decadence his father had known. Tom tasted like the bittersweet fortune of this is it, I finally have nothing—only to find the universe had offered up one more reason to keep going. One more trick up its sleeve.

Fuck, Theo loved the con. He loved it. It tasted like freedom. Tom, Tom, don't stop.

No, his brain cells reminded him, tragically left alive despite his fervent attempt to poison them. Not Tom. Harry.

Theo looked up at the night sky, kicking aimlessly at it.

"I found him," he said loudly. Elsewhere, someone pulled their coat tighter around them, hurrying away from the delirious vagrant who was yelling at the sky. "HEY!" Theo shouted to the stars. "Did you hear me? I found him," he said, stumbling on a rock to land flat on his back, staring blearily up.

"I found Harry Potter," he muttered to himself. "The Chosen One." He nearly swallowed his tongue, or some other lump in his throat. "He will rise again," he mumbled, before resuming his attention on the night sky.

He drew over the stars, squinting one eye and tracing shapes. Sirius had known all the constellations and resented teaching them, but he had done it at Theo's insistence.

"He will rise again," Theo said, connecting the dots of Ursa Major, Orion's belt. "The Dark Lord will be waiting," he said, and then stopped.

_The Dark Lord will be waiting._ His father said in his mind, snarling it in his usual mania. _Find one, find the other—_

_Just wait, Nott Senior ranted in his son's ear. Just wait, Theodore! It will be Samhain, when the veil is thin, and the Dark Lord will be waiting._

_Find one, find the other._

"Neither can live while the other survives," Theo registered from his father's voice, and immediately shot upright.

"Keep back, sweetheart," cautioned a passerby, nudging his frightened girlfriend away from Theo. "People always go mad on Halloween, I don't know what it is about it—"

"Fuck," Theo said, stumbling to his feet and nearly knocking into the man on the road. "It's fucking Halloween, isn't it?"

"You're drunk," the man said disapprovingly, and Theo shook his head.

"Not for much longer," he determined, digging in his coat pocket for the vial of sober-up he'd so lyingly claimed not to have before apparating out with a pop.

When the tightness left Harry's chest, he straightened to find himself on soft earth. Too soft. His knees buckled slightly and he struggled in his lingering vertigo to turn towards Dumbledore, who had released him, peering around.

"I thought for certain he would be here," Dumbledore murmured, holding out his wand. "All the prophecies suggested it would be in this place, on this night."

"Where are we?" Harry asked him, uneasy now. "Is this…"

He trailed off, registering the presence of headstones, and shivered.

Okay, so. The old man had taken him to a cemetery.

That was…

Not ideal.

His scar seared with pain as a voice inside his head registered with a high, clear sound.

"Kill the spare."

Dumbledore whipped around, pivoting with his wand out, but it was too late. There was a flash of green light, so quick Harry barely processed it, and then Dumbledore fell to the ground in a heap, glassy eyes unblinking.

"Jesus fuck," said Harry, leaping back and falling onto the sodden earth, scrambling back in a panic.

"Ah, reunited at last," said a voice, the sound of it so familiar Harry might have thought it was his own. "And now you finally know the truth."

Harry struggled to his feet, or tried to, but found himself unable to move, locating a hooded figure coming towards him with a bundle in his arms. The man, or whatever it was, set the bundle down carefully beside a headstone and flicked his wand, illuminating the name on the stone.

TOM RIDDLE

Harry swallowed, uncertain, as the next motion from the hooded figure shot out like rope, binding Harry's limbs to the stone. He seemed in a hurry to accomplish something; after ascertaining that Harry was secured in place, the figure in the cloak—who was panting, shallowly—rolled out an enormous cauldron, beginning to prepare something. A stew? Were wizards cannibals?
"Who are you?" Harry asked, and the face beneath the cloak—ratlike, but somehow familiar—looked up, and then quickly away. "Wait a minute—it's you," Harry registered, frowning. "You're… you're in the picture, the one Sirius has, with J—" He stopped. "With my… my dad—"

But the hooded man rushed back to the bundle on the ground, ignoring him altogether.

"It is ready, My Lord," the man said, and then Harry heard the voice again; high and cold, and resonating from somewhere inside his head.

"Do it now, Wormtail."

The man unrolled the cloak, revealing its contents, and Harry fought the compulsion to vomit. It was hairless and scaly-looking; a dark, raw, reddish black. Its arms and legs were thin and feeble, and its face, flat and snakelike, had a set of gleaming, red-slitted eyes.

A man with red eyes? Theo asked in Harry's head. Narrow, cold, cruel?

Step aside, girl, don't be a fool—

Lord Voldemort.

This…

Harry frowned.

This was Lord Voldemort?

It couldn't move on its own, whatever it was. Wormtail, who seemed to be a servant of some kind, placed it in the cauldron, obviously up to something troubling. He removed a bone from the grave, mumbling some sort of chant to himself; then he took a knife, the glint of it reflective with moonlight, before slicing at his own arm, and delivered an entire hand into the cauldron as Harry bit back a mouthful of bile, certain he was going to be sick.

Wormtail turned to him with the knife and Harry fought the ropes, skin singeing where they touched. How many times had his instincts reacted when he was in danger? Almost always, but against someone with a wand, they seemed to be of no use. He struggled, unexpectedly powerless, while Wormtail sliced at his arm, careful not to lose the blood before he could drip it into the cauldron.

Even with a literal stab wound, it was difficult to focus on the pain of his arm compared to the pain in his skull, which was ricocheting around in his head. His scar was excruciatingly painful, growing more so, and Harry felt rather than heard himself scream as Wormtail shouted, zealous with devotion, "BLOOD OF THE ENEMY, FORCIBLY TAKEN, YOU WILL RESURRECT YOUR FOE!"

It was blinding, deafening; sparks emanated from the cauldron to shoot towards the blackened night sky, glinting like starlight and then dissipating into a thin, hazy mist. Harry's head pounded, the pressure so painful he felt certain his own skull was about to burst open, and then, abruptly, the haze of enchantment cleared.

Rising through the fog was a man, tall and skeletally thin, emerging from within the cauldron. His silhouette only seemed human for lack of other species for comparison; from a distance, only one thing was clearly visible.

A pair of red-slitted eyes.
"Lord Voldemort," Harry choked out, tearing the name from his lungs, and the thing—the man, whatever it was—gave a smile so cold it stopped his breath in his throat.

"Welcome back from the dead, Harry Potter."

"Hey," Theo said, apparating into the Burrow on Sirius' instructions and looking around wildly for Harry. "Where is he? Is he still here?"

The crowd of celebrating people around him turned with obvious suspicion, eyes narrowing as they registered his identity.

"Well?" Theo demanded, and regrettably, it was Snape who pushed toward him through the crowd.

"You're not welcome here, Nott," Snape warned in his lifeless monotone, but Sirius was quick to shove him aside, reaching Theo with a look of concern.

"Nott, what are you doing?"

"Where is he? Where's T-" Theo broke off, shaking himself. "Harry, where is he?"

"Harry? He's just—" Sirius glanced outside, then frowned. "He was just outside with Dumbledore, but I suppose they must've wandered off—"

"He's with Dumbledore?"

Theo's heart pounded. Of course it was Dumbledore. He didn't want Harry Potter back, he wanted Lord Voldemort dead. There was a difference, and he would have only needed one to unlock the mystery of the other.

How had he done it?

"Theo?" came Draco's voice, reaching Sirius with Hermione at his side. "Where've you been? I thought—"

"Why Tom Riddle?" Theo said suddenly, turning to Hermione, who looked startled. "He was fixated on that name, wasn't he? Why him?"

Hermione frowned. "Well, he was the only wizard that T- Harry knew about, wasn't he? So, naturally it was—"

"What did you know about him?" Theo pressed her. The others, gauging Theo mostly uninteresting, had returned to their revelry; only he seemed to feel the urgency at hand.

"Dumbledore, Hogwarts—was that all he knew?"

"Essentially, yes," Hermione said, doing Theo the favor of at least concentrating on his request while the others wandered away. "He disappeared when he was a teenager, that's all we know. Though, we did find his m-" She stopped, looking at Draco. "Muggle?" she asked. He nodded, and she continued chattering away. "Right, so, his muggle birth certificate, and his father—he was named after his father, did I mention that?—anyway, we found his father's death certificate, too. His full name was Tom Marvolo Riddle—"

"Marvolo," Theo echoed, and Sirius set a hand on his shoulder.

"Nott, you reek of whisky," he said under his breath. "What's going on?"
But Theo was thoroughly distracted.

"What a bizarre fucking name," he muttered. Tom Marvolo Riddle. "Not Thomas?"

Hermione shook her head. "No. I thought that was a bit strange, too, but it was all strange, so—"

"Marvolo's the name of that Gaunt fellow," Draco said. "It's in the book, isn't it?"

"Book?" Hermione asked him, curious.

"Yes, the book. Every pureblood family has one. The last of the Gaunt line ends there," Draco explained, "and his son, Morfin, died in Azkaban."

"Does that actually help, though?" Theo asked doubtfully, and Draco shrugged.

"Too weird a name to be a coincidence," he said.

"Regardless of what you suspect, the boy is with Dumbledore," Snape cut in, which Theo ignored. Unfortunate but predictable that Snape didn't seem to be the partying type, choosing instead to intervene where his hooked nose didn't belong. "He couldn't possibly be in safer hands, so if that's all—"

"What could Lord Voldemort have to do with Tom Riddle?" Theo interrupted, turning to Hermione. She hadn't liked him much, but at least she wasn't an idiot. "There must have been some reason all this led you here. Anything you can think of?"

Hermione considered it. "Only that it sounds like a bit like an anagram," she remarked, tilting her head. "The two have all the same letters."

Theo waved a hand, dismissing it. "That definitely doesn't h-"

Theo broke off, blinking.

"Wait a minute," he said. "Did you say his father's death certificate?"

Lord Voldemort advanced toward Harry, who recognized the sensation from his nightmares; the impending victory, the buzzing sense of triumph.

"At last," he murmured, and Harry struggled again to find a weakness in his restraints, hoping that some friction or tension might leave room for some magical reaction, or possibly a magic-less escape. "We finally meet again, Harry Potter."

His red eyes flicked down to Dumbledore. "Pity," he sighed, "I'd have liked to do that myself. Still, it's what he deserves. An unceremonious death for an unremarkable man."

Then he turned back to Harry, tilting his head.

"So, you're the boy who survived my killing curse," Lord Voldemort murmured. "I've seen inside your head so many times I've often wondered what you might actually look like."

"I thought I was possessed," Harry said. An odd time for confession, but it was at least a distraction.

"Well, muggles have a way of understanding absolutely nothing," replied Lord Voldemort, giving Harry another once-over and then flicking his attention to the grave, which Harry followed. "So," Lord Voldemort said, fixing his eyes on the corpse below their feet. "You called yourself Tom Riddle, I hear."

"I know you killed him," Harry said, struggling not to recall who lay in the grave, and to his surprise, Lord Voldemort gave another high, cold laugh.

"No, no, you stupid boy. I mean yes, I did, but not the one you're thinking of."

He flicked his wand.

"Don't you see?" he murmured, conjuring the letters TOM MARVOLO RIDDLE in the air and then waving his wand, enchanting them. "You and I have been two sides of the same coin for so long, Harry Potter," he mused, permitting the letters to rearrange themselves.

I AM LORD VOLDEMORT

It hit Harry with repulsion so strong he gagged.

"You mean I—" It was bitter, impossible to swallow. "All these years, I've been—"

"Using the name of the man who killed your parents? Yes. A delightful irony, isn't it?" Lord Voldemort said, laughing again, and this time, Wormtail, his servant, laughed uncomfortably beside him. "And now, of course—"

He slashed his wand, freeing Harry from the ropes until he stumbled forward, landing on his hands and knees in the dirt.

"—look how we've ended up," Lord Voldemort murmured, raising his wand the way Harry had seen it so many times inside his head; outstretched, held steady, followed by the green light. The same green light that had struck Dumbledore minutes before. The same green light that had killed his parents.

"Goodbye, Harry Potter," said Lord Voldemort, aiming his wand as Harry hastily rose to his feet, staggering to the side and struggling to run.

Then, to his surprise, there was the sound of a low, audible pop.

"Hey, motherfucker!" came a voice, followed by a yelp from Wormtail. "That skinny dickhead is mine."

Theo wasn't sure what it said about the wizarding world that Hermione Granger's ability (remarkable, if a bit mundanely muggle) to identify about twenty anagrams for any given word was the reason for his arrival at the elder Tom Riddle's grave in time. The others, Sirius and Snape included, had been arguing amongst themselves about Dumbledore's unquestionable authority, but Theo wasn't about to linger unnecessarily on what felt like a highly irrelevant detail. He stunned the cloaked man the moment he apparated and hurried to reach Harry, shouting the first thing that came to his head.

"You," hissed Lord Voldemort, who looked somehow slightly more disgusting than Theo remembered, but basically the same. "You're Nott's son!"

Theo aimed a curse that dissipated mid-air, suggesting, much to his dismay, that perhaps the Dark Lord had not become so powerful for lack of duelling skills.
"Your father would be ashamed of what you've become—"

"Oh, good, excellent," Theo said, dodging the green light that shot towards him. "That was rather my aim, actually—"

Voldemort threw another curse and Theo ducked behind a grave, conjuring a hasty shield charm as the rubble of stone rained down overhead.

He heard another spell aimed somewhere else; probably at Harry.

"HARRY," Theo shouted blindly, "RUN!"

His shield charm was blasted through with another spell; he barely managed to roll away in time, out of breath already. He raised his wand again, conjuring the most explosive thing he could think of.

"Confr—"

"Avada Kedavra!"

Theo scrambled away, army-crawling on his knees and elbows before managing to gain the momentum for a running start, panting as he floundered upright. A blast directly in front of him sent his wand flying out of his hand and he cursed aloud, caught by a spell that singed the side of his coat.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck—"

"You're a disgrace to everything your father was, Nott. Now, step aside and let me finish this—"

"No," came Harry's voice, and in the moment the smoke cleared, Theo looked up to find Harry's silhouette standing in front of him, blocking him from the path of Lord Voldemort's wand. "If it's me you want, then kill me. Leave Theo alone."

Theo's breath caught; he spotted his wand and lunged for it.

"No, wait," he gasped, scrambling to his feet to shove Harry aside and aiming a spell, any spell, for any place Voldemort was or might have been. "Harry, don't—"

But it was too late.

There was a flash of green light, and for a moment, Harry Potter seemed to float.

Then he fell limply backwards, collapsing into Theo's disbelieving arms.

Harry tumbled backwards for a long time before he realized he was flying, or something like it. Acting on instinct, he managed to slow his fall, controlling it, before landing gently on his back, finding himself once again inside the room from his dreams, his nightmares.

His memories.

The face of a woman with red hair appeared above him, her green eyes lighting up at the sight of him. Beside her, a man appeared, his black hair rumpled, glasses crooked. Harry realized he was lying inside some sort of child's cot.

"Harry," said the woman, reaching down to touch his cheek. "You brave boy."
Harry blinked, struggling to sit up, and frowned between his parents, unsure what he was doing there.

"Am I…"

He stopped, shrinking back as he realized there was something in the cot beside him. It was thin and huddled up for warmth, shriveling to a grotesquely bundled mass of skin and bone where it lay whimpering beside him.

"Fucking shit," Harry said, scrambling out of the cot until he spilled over onto the floor, where Lily and James Potter cheerfully sat down beside him.

"He's definitely your son," James said to Lily. "Got your mouth, doesn't he?"

"Shut up, James," Lily replied, turning back to Harry. "Are you alright, sweetheart?"

"Uh," Harry said, frowning. "Well, that depends."

"Are you worried you might be dead?" Lily asked sympathetically, and beside her, James gave a comforting nod. "It's okay to talk about it if you like."

"Well, it's just, um. It'd be sort of unfortunate if I were dead… currently. Don't get me wrong, I'd love to chat with you," Harry hurried to assure them, "it's just…"

"Well, seeing as you're maybe deceased, it's probably an emergent situation wherever you popped in from," James guessed. "Right?"

"Right," Harry confirmed. "I just got murdered, maybe."

"Oh no," Lily said, frowning. "Voldemort?"

"Yeah," Harry said, as Lily and James exchanged a look. "So anyway, am I dead?"

"I don't think so," James told him, shaking his head. "It seems like you're in some sort of in-between place, actually."

"Really? Weird," Harry said. "So I could just…?"

"Go backwards? I think you could, yes," Lily said. "Assuming you're James' son, you're probably stubborn enough to insist the universe send you back, anyway."

"Assuming he's my son?" James echoed indignantly, which Lily and Harry both ignored.

"Okay, it's just that I have to save Theo somehow," Harry explained to her. "But—"

He stopped, taking a long, hungry look at her.

"But I'd really like to talk to you," he confessed, turning to James. "Both of you."

"Eh, plenty of time for that later," James assured him. "Tell Pads and Moony to behave, and stab Wormtail for us."

Lily reached out, taking Harry's face between her hands, and smiled widely.

"Mummy loves you," she said, stroking his cheek. "Dad does, too, but that's less important."
"Thank you, Evans," James said, "but she's right. We're very proud of you, Harry."

Harry was fairly certain that if he spent one more second with them he wasn't going to be able to leave. He tore himself away, heading for the door and the stairs he knew so nightmarishly well.

"Oh, wait," he recalled, pausing in the door frame to look over his shoulder with a frown. "I don't exactly know how to use any magic, and I don't have access to a wand. Any ideas about how to kill a Dark Lord?"

"Wing it," James suggested. "See how it goes."

They waved back, James' arm slipped around Lily's shoulders, and Harry took off down the stairs, throwing the front door open and permitting himself to be swallowed up by the starlit sky outside.

The moment Theo caught Harry's unmoving body in his arms, he felt a roar of fury leave his lungs, his wand rising of its own accord.

"You bastard—"

The green light flashed from the edge of his wand, ricocheting from whatever defensive spell Voldemort had used against him. The Dark Lord returned with something else, something meant to keep him at bay, like a body-bind curse or leg-locking; Theo stumbled, but only long enough for Harry to fall from his arms. Within seconds, he had regained use of his limbs, taking off at a run.

He dove, sliding, behind another of the headstones, aiming a curse as he went. That time, Voldemort struggled to repel it. The angrier Theo got—unable to process the idea that Harry could possibly gone; unwilling to believe those lungs had emptied, and in Theo's own arms—the more potent his magic seemed to be. Not that it was any easier to duel; Voldemort threw spell after spell, curse after curse. For whatever reason, be it Theo's rage or something else, nothing stuck for long, and Voldemort let out a roar of frustration, shattering headstones at random as he went and sending Theo flying backwards from the force of his explosions. Theo's wand, the victim of an errant spell, flew from his hand and was immediately crushed under heavy stone, leaving Theo to swear quietly, seeking out some other weapon.

There were no hiding places left by the time Voldemort had finished his destructive tantrum, sending every headstone shattering within the circumference of his fury. Theo sprinted back to where Harry was—determined, at least, to prevent Voldemort from doing any further damage—but skidded to a halt, discovering with alarm that the body was no longer where he had left it.

"What the—"

Behind him, there was a loud, piercing scream, and Theo pivoted sharply, finding that Harry Potter, somehow alive and upright despite dying in Theo's arms, was burying a knife into the side of Lord Voldemort's neck.

Voldemort staggered away, clawing at the handle, and collapsed to his knees, leaving Harry to stand above him, staring coldly down.

"That was for my family," Harry said, waiting until Voldemort had fallen onto the crimson-stained ground before yanking the knife free.

"This," Harry said, eyeing the blade for a moment before looking up at Theo, "is for him."
He drove it into Voldemort's chest, puncturing a lung.

"And this," Harry said, dropping to his knees and holding up Voldemort's head, watching his eyes struggle to remain open. "This is for me."

He took the knife, tilting his head to look at Voldemort's face, and carved a thin, unmistakable lightning bolt into the side of the Dark Lord's temple.

"Goodbye, Tom," Harry Potter said quietly.

Then, as he released the Dark Lord's body to let it collapse motionless to the ground, the Boy Who Lived rose slowly to his feet, the knife glinting like a scepter in his hand.
Death of a Con Man, Part X

Concluded.

Harry matched Theo's stride to cross the rest of the distance in what remained of the graveyard, meeting him between the triangle of bodies that was Wormtail, Lord Voldemort, and Albus Dumbledore.

"Sweet knife," Theo said, and Harry glanced down at it, shrugging before tossing it away.

"Pulled it from that one," he said, pointing to Wormtail. A fairly simple task in the moment, really. Nobody ever expected a dead man to rise.

"Used it on him first, I see," Theo observed.

"Yeah. It's possible I might be a murderer now," Harry said, holding up one hand to eye the blood staining his knuckles, saturating his skin in a viscous red-black. "Sort of unfortunate news, really," he remarked, smearing the back of his hand over his jeans until the mess of crimson became mostly unidentifiable, blending with pre-existing filth. "Can't be good for my reputation."

"What," Theo guessed, "as Chosen One?"

"No," Harry said. "I meant more like law-abiding citizen."

"Ah," Theo said, clearing his throat. "Well, that's something I've never been, so…"

"So you could probably teach me a few things."

Theo blinked, betraying a rare glimpse of surprise, before permitting his mouth to stretch slowly to a smile.

"Interested in the art of the con, Harry Potter?" Theo mused. "An interesting career choice for the Boy Who Lived, wouldn't you say?"

"Well, say I wasn't the Boy Who Lived, then," Harry suggested. "Maybe I could be the Boy Who Lived Just Conveniently Long Enough Until He Died."

"Catchy," Theo said.

"You know, if you think about it," Harry said, "the whole thing was kind of a con, wasn't it? I've been living a lie for seventeen years. Feels at least a little con-adjacent."

"It's pretty elaborate, I'll give you that," Theo commented. "Though, I think faking your death would be the real con, if that's what you actually have in mind."

"It is." And it was.

"Planning to go somewhere?"
"Well, you're a fugitive," Harry pointed out. "Coincidentally, I happen to be one, too."

He watched the green in Theo's eyes travel from astonishment to relief, then back to its perfunctory state of nonchalance.

"Ah," Theo said. "So this is a partnership, then?"

The motherfucker was going to make him say it. Typical.

"You're down a partner," Harry pointed out, "aren't you?"

"True. Though," Theo said, shrugging, "speaking of accomplices, he might come looking for me soon. I rushed off in a bit of a hurry."

"Ah. Well." Harry stepped forward, reaching out to brush his thumb over the tally marks on the side of Theo's neck, then traced the bird's wing down the ripped material of his shirt, following it to his shoulder. "I don't suppose there's any chance you want company, is there?"

He expected a gratuitously vague remark; sure, if I must, but don't get carried away, we're still not friends.

But was Theo who took the step Harry had been sure he'd have to be the one to take.

"I should just let you go," Theo growled, but in the end, one stride was all it took. Theo kissed him, half-gasping into his mouth when he pulled Harry closer, and the two of them stumbled over the rubble of broken headstones, graceless with haste. "I should tell you to go off and be whatever the fuck you're supposed to be in this world without having me around to cock it up, but god, fuck, I just—"

Theo broke off, swallowing as he met Harry's forehead with his.

"I can't," he managed to confess, shaking his head. "I couldn't leave you, and fuck it, I don't want to."

If Harry Potter knew one thing, it was that Theo Nott would never add to the tally on the side of his neck so long as he could help it.

"I saved your life twice already," Harry reminded him, tightening a hand around the back of Theo's head to drag his lips up a second time, resuming the kiss that had finally proven him wanted. "Far as I can tell, what I'm supposed to be doing is keeping your dumb arse alive."

"Yeah, well, if we make it to tomorrow, remind me to thank you," Theo muttered. His hands gripped tightly to Harry's hips, devoted in his irreverence, and Harry rolled his eyes, curling his palm possessively around the unshaven bone of Theo's cheek before shoving him brusquely away.

"Come on," Harry said, beckoning to the road. "Let's get out of here before we're convicted for something. Property damage or some shit."

Theo considered it for a moment before bending to pick up Voldemort's wand, using it to leave a sprawled message over the shattered graves.

"Technically," Theo informed him, "I think we'd be strong contenders for desecration, which is new for me."

"Impressive," Harry said, observing him with interest. "Missing any of the other big transgressions?"

"Eh, bit of a germaphobe, so lots of the unsanitary crimes are out. Plus, I try to avoid collusion. Don't play well with others, et cetera," Theo said, rising to his feet to cast some sort of symbol overhead.

Harry pointed to the wand. "Theft?"

"Been there, done that, and I certainly don't fucking want this one," Theo scoffed, tossing the wand back down beside Voldemort. "Just alerting Aurors."

"Responsible," Harry remarked. "Even, dare I say… exemplary?"

"I have my moments. Hey, ever used magic for a card trick?" Theo asked tangentially, gesturing Harry to the road and picking his way through the rubble. "Seeing as I have recently lost my wand, I'm somewhat limited," he clarified, adopting a reasonably brisk pace, "but if we do it for long enough in Covent Garden I can buy you dinner."

"Depends what the card trick is," Harry replied, falling into step beside him. "I once set one on fire with my mind."

"Well, duh, easy. That's a non-verbal Incendio.

"It has a name?"

"Of course it does," Theo said. "There's so much to teach you."

The road was stretched out in front of them, the sun beginning to break over the tops of the nearby village.

"Well," Harry said, the tips of his fingers brushing Theo's knuckles, "I've got time to learn."

"Are you sure you want to do this?" Draco asked, turning to Hermione as they approached the graveyard. It was swarmed with Investigatory Aurors; she probably wasn't allowed to be at an active crime scene, but what was the point of being in charge if he couldn't bend the rules a little from time to time?

"It's pretty gruesome," he warned.

She gave him a stunningly doubtful glance. "I'm not afraid of gruesome."

Unsurprising. He'd come to understand she wasn't afraid of much at all.

"Well, still. Watch your step," Draco advised, lifting the enchantments around the cemetery and beckoning her forward. "There's rubble everywhere."

Hermione nodded, gingerly stepping over one of the broken headstones. "Did you find Harry?" she asked, following him, and Draco shook his head.

"No. Not Theo, either. Though, someone had to have cast the Auror charm, so…" He trailed off with a shrug. "I assume I'll run into Theo again at a party seven years from now or something."

"Did they leave anything behind?"

She wobbled unexpectedly on the uneven ground, hand shooting out for stability, and Draco caught her arm.

"Just this," he said, gesturing to the message on the shattered headstones.

IN THE FACE OF DARKNESS, THE CHOSEN ONE WILL ALWAYS RISE

"Keeping the myth alive?" Hermione guessed, tilting her head.

"Something like that. There was a bit more, too," Draco said, bending down to reference something he'd removed before the others arrived. "Sort of a lengthy manifesto about how Sirius Black was disavowed by the Dark Lord and therefore innocent, et cetera, et cetera. Plus one or two things about my ineptitude as an Auror."

"Naturally," Hermione agreed, nodding.

"But," Draco said, rising to his feet and turning to her, "in any case, they made sure the world would be a different place than they found it. Or, at least, it will be someday, anyway."

"Ah, so it's a perfect ending for the saga of the Chosen One, then," Hermione remarked, stepping over the open grave to reach him.

She had been remarkably easy to fall for, all things considered. It was highly possible Theo had known as much when he arranged their meeting, or had at least suspected Draco of being the sort of Auror who'd fall for someone so clearly made of trouble. Already, Draco had observed the countless things Hermione could do without a wand when she thought he wasn't looking, proving her dangerous enough he suspected he ought to keep an eye on her.

Both eyes, in fact, as a matter of public safety.

And both hands, when the situation called for it.

He kissed her, obliging his investigatory talents, and slid an arm around her shoulders, surveying the unrepentant mess Theo had left behind.

A perfect ending? Perfect was a strong word, as was ending.

"Nah," Draco said, brushing his lips against her forehead. "It's a perfect beginning."

Le Vélo Pour Deux

Pairing: Mulcibery (Darian Mulciber x Caleb Avery), Nottpott (Theo Nott x Harry Potter)

Universe: sequel to Vive Le Tour (Ch. 75)

Rating: M for language, sex

Summary: When his impulsive public retirement from professional cycling prompts accusations of suspected doping, six-time Tour de France winner Darian Mulciber returns for a final season as the lead for Team Slytherin, unceremoniously replacing his former teammate-turned-rival, Caleb Avery. Despite their previous reconciliation, Caleb's demotion as a result of Darian's return prompts conflict once again, pitting the two against each other as unexpected contenders for the yellow jersey. Meanwhile, Team Slytherin sprinter Theo Nott is back for redemption, but an up-and-coming Team TMR rider threatens to take what's rightfully his: Harry Potter's green jersey, along with Harry Potter himself.

(Mr Blake has requested I continue drawing attention to the sport of professional cycling, so... here we are! In honor of the first day of the Vuelta de España. Thank you for continuing to indulge my niche sport AUs, as they do not appear to be stopping anytime soon.)

Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Ladies and Gentlemen, hello and welcome to this year's Tour de France broadcast, hosted once again by myself, Lee Jordan, and my colleague, Luna Lovegood!"

Luna: "Wisdom is for those who seek it!"

Lee: "Absolutely on the money, Luna, as always! Ever an epicenter of excitement in the cycling world, this year's Tour is particularly controversial. Even more so than last year, Luna, wouldn't you agree?"

Luna: "Does a thestral have horns?"

Lee: "I have absolutely no idea! However, I can say that the sudden return of Darian Mulciber to Team Slytherin has been quite the shocking development. For those who were not aware, Mulciber abruptly announced his retirement from the sport of professional cycling at the end of last year's Tour, when he clinched the coveted yellow jersey for his sixth Tour de France win. Unfortunately, due to a variety of suspicions, Mulciber's retirement was ultimately thought to be the result of rising allegations of doping; specifically, the use of salbutamol, a stimulant designed to treat asthma, as well as suspected transfusions, which increase white blood cell counts for maximized recovery. Any thoughts on the scrutiny of Mulciber's blood, Luna?"

Luna: "Genocide is not the answer!"
Lee: "So true! In any case, Mulciber's effort to disprove his critics while performing amid frequent voluntary blood tests has led to his pursuit of the grand tour triple crown: the pink jersey of the Giro d'Italia, the yellow jersey of the Tour de France, and red jersey of the Vuelta de España. Having already won this year's Giro, Mulciber is here seeking his record-breaking seventh Tour win—the second and most coveted jewel in the crown of professional cycling."

Luna: "Be vigilant with talking crowns!"

Lee: "Always, Luna, always! Adding to the controversy surrounding Mulciber is, once again, Caleb Avery. Mulciber's former Team Slytherin domestique-turned-rival, Avery is, astoundingly, Mulciber's teammate once again."

Luna: "I ship it!"

Lee: "Naturally, ships ahoy—though, we can expect that the position of domestique, the official term for a rider seeking exclusively to aid his team's leader rather than winning the Tour outright, is not a position that will satisfy Avery for long. After a celebrated win in last year's UCI World Championship, rumor has it Avery expected to be Team Slytherin's lead for the first time in his career, only to be replaced by Mulciber's quest for redemption. After sitting out the Giro in favor of recovering from his celebrated classics season, this will be Avery's first appearance as Mulciber's teammate after nearly four years. A spot of trouble for them, eh, Luna?"

Luna: "Never tickle a sleeping dragon!"

Lee: "Yes, quite right, so true. Meanwhile, the sprinters have their own battle for the green jersey, don't they? Returning this year is the incumbent points winner Harry Potter of Phoenix-Hogwarts, along with a particularly hungry Theo Nott of Team Slytherin, who recently won the coveted title of Paris-Roubaix champion during the spring classics. Of course, the most interesting new contender for the points competition is young Draco Malfoy of Tom Riddle's Team TMR, don't you think?"

Luna: "Don't say his name!"

Lee: "Hard not to, considering all the buzz around Malfoy's unprecedented transition to professional road racing! Already a World Cup champion in cyclocross, a discipline of bike racing that shares more parallels with mountain biking and criterium racing than with road, Malfoy is a new favorite for the green jersey, given his impressive technique and talent for sprinting. He'll certainly be one to watch for—and even, dare I say, Potter's primary competition? What do you think, Luna?"

Luna: "I think Malfoy is up to something!"

Lee: "Ah, well, aren't we all, Luna! Aren't we all."

OoO

I can feel Caleb's anger radiating at my back like waves; little or not-so-little ripples of loathing, resentment that waxes and wanes like tides. I've come to know every inch of him, every modulation of his mood, every timbre of his thoughts, and I would be an idiot or a monster not to see the rage he aims at me in silence, conserved in all his aching limbs.

I know how hard he trained. I was there; beneath him, above him, beside him. In bed with him, for all those nights. I know all his soreness, all his pain. I was there, and now he's here, and neither of us can forget that in the time between it was me, and my choices, that brought us to where we are today.

He hasn’t spoken to me in months. I raced the Giro alone. I used to wake up to the sight of Caleb’s golden hair and his grinning face, but now his voice is reserved for perfunctory replies; little barbs of spite nobody but us knows how to translate. It’s even lonelier, really. Even now, only Caleb understands me.

They put us in a room together again, misunderstanding everything; knowing how close we used to be and presuming we’d keep up the myth—teammates to rivals and back again. Everyone loves a good story, and we are undoubtedly that. People cheered from the crowd when they saw us, the two coveted Brits, Caleb with his Welsh flag and me with my Union Jack. It was the first time anyone has cheered for me since one year ago, when I last wore the yellow jersey of the Tour de France.

Caleb doesn’t understand what the last year has cost me; it comes down to that. He doesn’t understand, and how could he? He wasn’t the one slandered and ridiculed, left sleepless and emptied at night. No one called Caleb a liar. No one threatened to take Caleb’s hard-fought wins away. The blood Caleb shed and the muscle he burned are still safely his, because only champions deserve the venom of undisguised hatred. He doesn’t understand that, so is it my fault? Yes, maybe, I don’t know. I just know that I can’t take it anymore; the disintegration of the legacy I built. It’s like taking from the marrow of my bones, or the anchors of my soul, or the beat of my dispirited heart.

I can feel his frustration with me; I can lick it, bittersweet, from the tip of my sorry tongue, because I know what I’ve done to him. I know what I’ve done just as well as I know how he tastes, so maybe for that, he’ll forgive me. Maybe he won’t.

But what Caleb doesn’t understand is that I will end this race in yellow if I have to drag my broken body across the finish line myself.

-oO-

Eleven Months Ago

"Watts for days," Caleb said, falling onto the sofa in Darian's flat and gleaming up at him, eyes closed, face coated in a sheen of sweat. "King of the mountain," he declared, ostensibly about himself.

"These are the watts of a king?" Darian asked drily, lifting Caleb's hand to glance at the bike computer held between his fingers. "Personally, I have my doubts."

Caleb smiled without glancing up. "Will you not bend the knee, Darian Mulciber?"

"I will not," Darian informed him, letting Caleb's arm fall with a roll of his eyes. "If I were still racing, you'd be in trouble." A pause, and then, "Though I suppose no one else would believe it."

He moved to step away, heading for the kitchen when Caleb's hand stopped him, sliding around his calf. "You're still letting it get to you," Caleb observed, one blue eye floating open. "You promised you wouldn't."

Darian permitted himself to pause, watching Caleb's hand float under his shorts, reaching up the fibers of his hamstring. "Letting what get to me?"
"Darian." Caleb shifted, resting his lips against Darian's thigh. "You've been tested for drugs a million times. We all have."

"I know." It came out more gruffly than he intended. Yes, he hadn't technically failed a test, but neither had plenty of other cyclists who were later revealed to be doping. Lance Armstrong wasn't reviled for cheating, but for lying.

And that's what they thought Darian was doing now.

"They're dropping the salbutamol case," Caleb reminded him.

"I know." An inhaler, for fuck's sake. All of this was over a fucking inhaler.

Well, that, along with anecdotal behavior some people called suspicious. Times Darian would not let other people in his hotel room, for instance. But unfortunately, that part wasn't a truth to which they were entitled, and neither was it something Darian had the liberty to reveal.

"All your teammates can attest to it, Darian," Caleb continued. "And the transfusions case will—"

"Get dropped eventually, I know." Even so, there would always be enough doubt to cast his career in the shadows. People would whisper yeah, he won, but... did he? And they would have no reason not to. The denial of an athlete had meant nothing countless times before. "I know."

"Then why...?"

"I'm not, Caleb. I'm just—" Darian broke off, trying not to lose his temper. Again. God, all he wanted to do was get on the trainer and ride until his legs went numb, or his pedals fell off. One or the other. "I don't want to talk about it, Caleb, I'm just saying. I turned over all my training numbers, and—" Another pause. "I just don't know what else to do."

Not exactly.

Darian, it's Armando again; listen, give me a call back—

"You've already done everything you can, Darian."

Again, not exactly.

With all this unpleasantness going around, I think I've got a way to help us both.

Darian sighed, and Caleb sat up, tugging him down.

"Come here," Caleb said, his voice too rough for a whisper, and yes, he was sweaty from his training ride, and yes, he tasted like diluted Powerade and salt, but Darian still went limp at the familiar shape of his mouth, letting himself be pulled down to the sofa.

"It'll pass," Caleb said, and god, fuck, damn it, why did he taste so good? What magic did he have that Darian could never fight? He wanted to sulk, to throw things, at best to calmly discuss in rational tones that it wouldn't just pass—but Caleb's golden curls were slick beneath his fingers and Darian was ravenous, bone-weary and starved.

He kissed Caleb back and stopped talking, as Caleb had clearly wanted him to do, and then he slid down Caleb's torso, letting his breath saturate the thin material of Caleb's kit.

It's not that we're not sure about Avery. But Darian, he's not you.
Later, Darian would tell himself that was why he hadn't told Caleb about the phone call. His mouth was busy doing other things.

STAGE TWO:
Flat Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, day two is certainly off to an interesting start, what with a surprising stage win by Alexander Poliakoff of Team Durmstrang! All eyes are on Darian Mulciber and Team Slytherin, of course, where leadout man Caleb Avery has set Team Slytherin on a path to victory. I daresay it's sure to be a fascinating road to Paris!"

Luna: "Bouillabaisse!"

Lee: "Bless you! Ah, that never gets old, does it? Well, once again we have a long ride through the French countryside, and—OH, MY! OH MY WORD, DAY TWO OF THE TOUR AND ALREADY HARRY POTTER IS ON THE BREAKAWAY!"

Luna: "The Boy Who Broke Away!"

Lee: "My god, and… yes, yes it is, it's Draco Malfoy right behind him, followed by Theo Nott! Team Slytherin will have to work hard for this one, and—AND THERE GOES AVERY, taking off behind Nott in his World Champion stripes! But where is Darian Mulciber?"

Luna: "Denial!"

Lee: "Not a river in Egypt, that's for certain! It appears Mulciber is blocked in by the members of Team TMR, left behind by his domestiques as Avery slips away to join the chase with the sprinters. My, my, this is quite an interesting turn indeed!"

oOo

"Avery, what are you doing?" Dippet's voice crackled from his earpiece. "Nott's going for the sprint points and you left Mulciber behind you. He's boxed in."

As if Caleb had ever not known where Darian was. "I'm protecting the team lead, Dippet. That's my job."

The response was predictable. "Your job is to ride for the team lead, Avery. Nott doesn't need your help."

"I'm not here to help Nott, I'm here to make sure Lestrange loses." He glanced up at Theo's back, riding in his narrow slipstream until the time came to switch places. Caleb had no interest in winning a sprint, but it was obvious already that he had the legs and Darian didn't. If Darian was still tired from the Giro, that was on him. Caleb had trained for this, and trained hard. He had something to prove that Darian's six wins and countless lies weren't going to take from him. "What do you care, Dippet?" he muttered into the radio. "So long as someone crosses the finish line in your logo, it's just more publicity for you."

To that, Dippet couldn't disagree. "Fine. Stay with Nott if you're going to stay up there," he said. "And you'll be the one to explain this to Mulciber."

"I won't have to," Caleb said, unzipping his jersey and preparing to take his turn at the front of the breakaway; leaving the peloton, and Darian Mulciber, behind. "He already knows why."

oOo

I fell in love with Darian Mulciber because he's a winner. I fell out of love with him for the same reason. For other men, winning is something they do, but for Darian, it's all that he is. He defines himself by it, and I didn't understand until now what that truly meant, though I should have. In the end, Darian will never love anything as much as he loves winning, and for that I have taught myself to despise him. I learn it a little more painfully every day.

It's not as if I can't understand him. I know what he is, and that he takes his value from the championships tied to his name. I'm not so blind that I can't see the way who he is and what he's accomplished are inseverable from one another, but still; I thought I fit in there, somewhere. I thought after everything I'd done, one day he would return the favor. For every win I earned for him, I felt sure he'd repay me somewhere down the line. I thought it would be soon, if I'm being honest. If I'm being really honest, I thought it would be now.

But it turns out everything I thought was wrong.

I thought he loved me. Sometimes, the way he looks at me, I thought I was more valuable to him than anything else he'd ever held. He has a gift that way, a sense of focus he transmits with a glance, with a brush of his fingers, and in his hands I was everything, infinite. Not a cyclist, not even World Champion, but the actual world itself, the universe as a whole. That's how deluded I was, or how persuasive his touch is. With Darian Mulciber's hands on you, you feel like you're where everything begins and ends; and I was that, until I wasn't.

The truth is uncomplicated, stunning in its simplicity: I loved him and he lied to me. I thought he loved me more than cycling, more than the Tour, but that was just another lie among so many others. No wonder it was so surreal, loving him and being loved by him. No wonder it felt like a fog, like a sun-soaked daydream, awash in a gleaming haze of white sheets and tangled limbs. Nothing I had with him was ever what I thought it was, though I understand now that I should have seen that sooner. I've always known what he was.

That I was ever anything to him at all was only in my imagination.

STAGE THREE:
Team Time Trial
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "The team trials are always an interesting event to watch, particularly given the conflicts within Team Slytherin! While all time trials are a race against the clock, the team trials allow for the best individual riders to carry the team as a whole. Of the seven permitted team members, the time goes to the fifth member—meaning that while two members are allowed to get dropped by the rest of the team, the first five will all receive the same time."

Luna: "The Sorting Hat decides!"

Lee: "Yes, without a doubt! The strongest sprinters will typically carry the team at first, leading the other members and dropping out as the riders with more endurance continue on to the finish. In the case of Team Slytherin, we would expect to see sprinter Theo Nott lead out in advance, eventually dropping off to let stronger GC riders like Darian Mulciber pull to the finish."

Luna: "The end is nigh!"
Lee: "Too true, and of course there's typically no telling what will become of Caleb Avery, a GC contender known to struggle with time trials. But it looks like there's a fire under him today as he takes over Nott's lead, and... yes, despite an excellent performance from Team TMR and Team Phoenix-Hogwarts, it looks like Team Slytherin will have the day! A predictable outcome, perhaps, though there's some drama off the road, isn't there?"

Luna: "The game of love is afoot!"

Lee: "Well, who's to say for sure, but it certainly looks that way, doesn't it? A curious rumor has been spreading about Team TMR newcomer Draco Malfoy and early points leader Harry Potter, who do seem... particularly combative, don't you think?"

Luna: "They should meet for a midnight duel!"

Lee: "Right after Mulciber and Avery, who don't look especially thrilled with their win! Avery keeps his yellow jersey from yesterday's breakaway, but we all expect to see a smashing return from Mulciber once we reach the mountain stages."

"You know," came a voice behind Theo, "maybe instead of heroically getting dropped by your teammates you could try actually winning one of these things for yourself."

Theo didn't have to turn to know it was Harry Potter's voice lingering at his back, so he continued scrutinizing his derailleur. "I'm sorry, didn't your team lose the time trial, Potter? Weird flex, but okay," he said, rising to his feet.

At that precise moment, of course, Draco Malfoy chose to saunter by, blond hair slicked back with his jersey half undone. "Nott," he acknowledged, nodding to Theo before turning with an irreverent smirk to Harry. "Potter," he said, and while it was technically no different from his greeting to Theo, there was a definite sense of mockery to it, as if Harry's entire entity were something laughable.

Theo watched Harry stiffen. "Malfoy. Not much of a showing today, was it?"

"Resting for a real sprint tomorrow," Draco explained with a shrug, turning to walk backwards away from them. "That win yesterday was narrow, Potter. If you ask me, you've finally met your match," he added, and jogged away with a laugh, prompting Theo to bristle.

"What a smug motherfucker," Harry muttered under his breath, green eyes on Draco until long after he'd disappeared. "Who is he?"

Theo's old training partner, not that it mattered. "CX guy," Theo said. "He's won three Cyclocross World Cups in the last three years."

"Yeah, but no grand tours." Harry frowned, still staring after Draco. "You know him, then?"

"Sort of." They had been close once, though they hadn't spoken much since Theo made the switch to road four years ago.

"Well, he's a fuckin' asshole," Harry said, turning back with the look of supreme irritation that used to be reserved for Theo, though why he suddenly felt such a nostalgia for it was completely incomprehensible. "Anyway," Harry continued, leaning against the Slytherin trailer and bending down to speak near Theo's ear, "are you planning to actually race me this year, Nott, or should I..."
just plan to leave the green jersey on while I wine and dine you in Paris?"

For some reason, something in Theo that usually danced when Harry spoke snapped instead.

"I should get some sleep," he said gruffly, locking the derailleur back in place and rising so sharply he nearly knocked into Harry's chin. "In case you forgot," he snapped, "there's more than one sprint contender for you to worry about tomorrow."

Then he turned away, forcing himself not to look over his shoulder as he went.

 oOo

I want it to bother me less, seeing Caleb in yellow. This isn't the first time he's worn that jersey before I took the lead, and I've never begrudged him those stage wins in the past. I should be proud of him—in fact, I am proud of him. But something in my soul wants that jersey like I've never wanted it before; something in me needs it, compulsively, and that sense of craving is mixing in with something so much worse.

All I can think about when I see Caleb standing there in yellow isn't how hard I've worked to earn that jersey, even though I can feel in my bones how much it has already cost me and how much it will cost me still. It isn't the jersey itself that distracts me; that blinds me and enrages me and fuels me. I wish it were, but it's not.

With Caleb's back to me, all I can taste is the bitterness of knowing it's him I don't deserve.

---

STAGE FOUR:
Flat Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Today's big event is the finishing sprint, where we can expect to see Draco Malfoy and Harry Potter battle it out for a stage win. The sprinters are already taking their respective positions; you can see Nott on the left of the screen making his way to slip past Potter's elbow—but OH, LOOK! AVERY IS JOINING THE SPRINT!"

Luna: "Stop fighting Mum and Dad!"

Lee: "My, my, what a controversial choice, leaving team Slytherin leader Mulciber behind for the second time this Tour! Certainly we know Avery's a talented sprinter but still, I didn't expect… LOOK AT THAT, IT'S A PHOTO FINISH! Nott blocks Malfoy from the win, very questionable sportsmanship there but AVERY AND POTTER ARE BATTLING IT OUT, AND… YES, IT'S AVERY! CALEB AVERY TAKES THE STAGE BY A HAIR FROM HARRY POTTER!"

 oOo

"Are you fucking kidding me?"

Caleb let out a tight-lipped sigh, turning at the sound of Darian's voice. "I had the legs, Mulciber —"

"Of course you had the legs!" Darian snapped, furious. "Everyone has the legs, Avery, it's fucking day four! But are you going to have the legs in the Alps? In the Pyrenees? On day sixteen, Caleb, are you going to have the legs then?" At Caleb's silence, Darian shook his head. "You think I don't see what you're doing?" he demanded. "You're only forcing me to push too hard too soon, Caleb, and it's going to cost us yellow in the end. You're not trying to beat me—you're trying to bury us both!"

"Then pull rank, Mulciber." Caleb's teeth flashed white against the glint of sweat on his lips as the words fell with irreverence, tumbling into the space between them. "Go ahead. Tell me you're the team lead. Say it to my face, Darian: that it's my job to come second to you, and it always has been. Say it and I'll back down."

Say it, Darian thought. Do it. Salvage the race.

Say it and shut him up. I'm the lead, Caleb. You answer to me. Say it or you die on that bike, chasing after a reckless madman, trying desperately to play a game you cannot win.

Darian opened his mouth, but nothing came out. Not even the ghost of a defense.

"Didn't think so," Caleb said brusquely, turning away under the weight of Darian's silence.

oOo

_Eleven Months Ago_

"Darian."

Caleb's voice was a whisper, his touch soft in the dark as he slid into bed with Darian. He didn't force open the curtains; didn't pull back the sheets. He just crawled in, one hand sliding over Darian's hip, and gave him a pulse of pressure.

"Darian. Come here."

Darian turned unwillingly; only because this wasn't what he'd promised Caleb. When they'd started over, promising each other to try again, Darian had been a champion six-times over. Now he was just a man in bed until well past noon, staring into nothing and wondering when he'd become so easy to defeat.

Caleb, on the other hand, was fresh out of the shower. He'd probably done sixty miles already that morning, maybe more. It took as much effort for Darian to turn towards him as it used to take for him to climb a mountain, though the reward this time was greater. Caleb caught his mouth in a kiss he wasn't ready for, the effort of his swallow sticking in his throat.

"Get back on the bike," Caleb whispered to him. "Drown out the noise." He kissed Darian softly, then harder, one hand wrapped around Darian's jaw. "Get back on your bike and don't stop until you feel like you again."

"Caleb, I—"

Another kiss. Another. Again and then another, until Darian was on the verge of tears, feeling wanted and unworthy in the same unsteady stroke.

"Don't let them win," Caleb said. "You're a winner, Darian, so don't let them win."

The voicemails from Dippet were still living in his phone, unanswered.

"Okay," Darian said, letting Caleb's hand snake into his boxers. "Okay, Caleb. Okay."
Lee: "Now, given the tension between members of Team Slytherin, we obviously have to discuss the controversy surrounding team lead Darian Mulciber, whom none of us expected to see this year after his sudden decision to retire at the end of last year's Tour. What do you think about Mulciber's doping scandal, Luna?"

Luna: "Blood prejudice!"

Lee: "So true, and at this point, what do you suppose we can expect from his performance?"

Luna: "Once a Death Eater, always a Death Eater!"

Lee: "The same can be said for yellow jersey winners! Albeit, of course, today, the Slytherin team member in yellow is Mulciber's one-time domestique, Caleb Avery. Now, for those unfamiliar with the sport, let me reassure you the yellow jersey is rarely determined by the first week. Mulciber is less than a minute behind in contention for the lead, but Avery is certainly looking very strong. Will Avery burn out in the early stages, leaving the jersey to Mulciber, or will Avery's aggressiveness on the bike win out in the end?"

Luna: "I'm starting to think I'm the only one who can see nargles!"

Lee: "Oh, Luna, you're so right. Always a mystery, but never a dull moment at the Tour de France!"

oOo

"Stay out of the red, Avery," came the voice of Dippet through the headpiece. "Today's for the sprinters and the climbers; don't waste your energy."

Caleb fought an eye roll, which the cameras would surely catch.

"I told you once and I'll tell you again, Avery," Dippet continued. "If you force Mulciber to push too hard, you'll both lose."

"Mulciber already won the Giro. He's tired."

"So?"

"So I'm not going to ride at Mulciber's pace. If he can't keep up—"

"Jesus, Avery," Dippet's sigh was muffled. "Just stay out of the fucking red, do you hear me? Do I need to explain the fucking science to you? If you blow past your threshold heart rate you won't recover for tomorrow. You'll get dropped in the Pyrenees, or even sooner. You'll fucking lose, Avery, and Mulciber will, too."

"I'm a goddamn professional cyclist, Dippet, I know how my fucking heart works," Avery snapped. A few feet away, Mulciber looked up, catching the sound of his voice, and then looked back down, concentrating on doing precisely what Dippet had asked.

Stay out of the red. Stay in your lane. Keep to your limits.

Avery inhaled once, counted to three, and exhaled.
"Slow down," Dippet said.

Avery set his jaw, forcing a swallow.

"Fine," he said, not looking up from his wheel.

oOo

Darian is better than I am. I know that. I've always known it. But he's also tired, he's overtrained and overworked, and he's suffering. I know that, too. I watched him do it. He's smart on the bike, calculated, but he doesn't take risks. He never gives more of himself than he's asked, and now that he needs to be aggressive, he may not have the energy to do it.

The truth is he's not scared of me. He knows my limits because he's trained with me; because he's on my team. If he wants to crush me, he can find my threshold power and hold me there until I crack.

He's not scared of me, but the truth is I am scared of him, because I know that when Darian Mulciber chooses to be brave he makes himself fucking unstoppable. He is blindingly, dazzlingly unstoppable, so for me it's a simple matter; a gamble. If I win, then I win yellow, and it's Darian's own fault for not chasing me when he had the chance. If I lose...

But of course I won't lose, will I? Because I know him.

In the end, I am just another risk Darian Mulciber wouldn't take.

STAGE SIX:
Flat Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Caleb Avery's departure from Team TMR at the end of last year's Tour was one of many surprise decisions, leading to the selection of Rodolphus Lestrange as the team's new leader. Of course, much attention has been paid to the team's new sprinter, Draco Malfoy—both since his surprising appointment to the team, and since rumors first began circulating about his curious antagonism towards green jersey favorite, Harry Potter."

Luna: "Time to tail him with a house elf!"

Lee: "Or a stage win, perhaps! Malfoy is getting into position here, putting in work along with Nott of Team Slytherin and of course Harry Potter, already securely in green. Now, normally cyclocross riders get lost on world tour teams, given their skillset and the necessity of supporting the team lead, but—OH, LOOK! MALFOY TAKES OFF, MUSCLING PAST POTTER TO BREAK OFF FROM THE FRONT OF THE PELOTON! MY OH MY, MALFOY HAS CERTAINLY THROWN DOWN THE GAUNTLET!"

Luna: "The Hand of Glory, one might say!"

Lee: "Yes, glory indeed at the Tour, and will it come down to just the two, or—OH! NOTT HAS JOINED THEM! IT'S A THREE-MAN BREAKAWAY WITH NOTT LATCHING ONTO MALFOY'S WHEEL!"

oOo
"Glad you could join us," Draco said, glancing over his shoulder and chuckling as Theo caught onto his slipstream. "Is it too much to ask you to shoulder some of the work, or…?"

"Shut up, Malfoy," Harry snapped, cutting Theo off before he could speak. "If I have to hear your voice all the way to the finish I'm going to crash this bike into the barriers myself."

"Always so touchy, Potter," Draco mused, tutting softly and passing Harry a wink. "You know, if we're going to spend the next twenty kilometers by ourselves, we may as well get comfortable. You know, talk about our hopes and dreams, our weaknesses, our mortal enemies, how you're going to handle your post-race concession interview once I've won the stage—"

"Jesus fuck," Theo muttered, pushing his wheel past Draco's and taking the lead, leaving the two of them to follow. They could switch if they wanted, but he'd rather do most of the work than listen to them bicker like children.

He caught the shadow of Harry's Bianchi pulling up beside his and glanced down, resolutely focused on his power meter.

"Are you going to talk to me or what?" Harry asked him.

"What's to talk about?" Theo said, shrugging.

"Look, you asked me to come to Milan-San Remo and that meant something to you, I get that now," Harry said under his breath, "but I'm a world tour racer, Nott, I don't do spring classics. I was training for the Tour of California and—"

"Potter," Draco scoffed, "what are those, DT 350 hubs? Seriously?"

"Bloody Christ, Malfoy," Harry shouted, twisting around on his bike. "Do you ever shut up?"

They were going to be in the breakaway for nearly a third of the stage, which meant plenty of camera time. Certainly plenty of time for the motorists nearby to capture Harry and Draco yelling at each other and write up a new version of the same articles they'd been printing since the Tour started: Is there something… especially charged about Malfoy and Potter's interactions?

Is it just us, commentary suggested, or does it seem like there's something more than just competition between the two best sprinters in the Tour?

"Nott," Harry growled, "are you listening to me?"

"No," Theo said brusquely, and then he put his head down, focusing on his wheel in silence until Harry sighed, falling back until it was time for Draco to take the lead.

---

I am exhausted.

I've never been this tired before. Sure, I'm getting older. Sure, I just won the Giro, I'm less fresh than the rest of these riders, but it's more than that. These grand tours, with all the stages and travel and shitty hotel rooms, they leech the energy from me, sap me to dullness, and I was an idiot to think it would be better with Caleb at my side. It was hard to imagine anything being worse than coming back alone for the Giro, which was the worst tour win of my career. People hate me now; they don't trust me. I'm not beloved like I was. I thought even Caleb's silence would be preferable to open suspicion, but I was wrong.
I can't sleep at night. I'm barely two feet away from him and his steady breathing; from the solemn beat of his heart. I lie awake and toss and turn and I wake up sore and miserable, tired and drained and alone. Caleb leaves without saying anything. How is he sleeping? How can he do it when I'm right there, bleeding out beside him? I deserve to lose this Tour.

It's such a pity so few people ever get what they deserve.

STAGE SEVEN:
Medium Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, after yesterday's sprint finish—just a hair's breadth between the front of Draco Malfoy's wheel and Harry Potter's handlebars, with the win narrowly going to the rider from Team Phoenix-Hogwarts—I think we can all agree that the first week of this Tour has been filled with surprises!"

Luna: "Usually Gryffindor wins!"

Lee: "Oh, without a doubt, and now we're starting to see some contention for the yellow jersey. Today Lestrange from Team TMR has the lead, but it looks like he's unlikely to keep it. Mulciber and Avery are nearly tied, only fifteen seconds apart for their overall times, but—OH LOOK, MULCIBER'S TAKING OFF! Mulciber is going for the points in this climb, and it looks like… yes, it looks like Mulciber will have it! Darian Mulciber takes the lead and the yellow jersey for the first time in this Tour!"

oOo

"Well," came a voice behind Caleb, "can't say I'm surprised. You turned down the lead on my team for… what, another excuse not to win?"

Caleb went rigid at the sound of Tom Riddle's voice, pivoting slowly to find him smiling.

"Such a pleasure to see you fall," Tom remarked, striding over to reach him. "I know I said no hard feelings but truly, I'm delighting in watching you suffer."

He had never said any such thing, but of course that wasn't the point.

"You know, when Dippet told me he was taking Mulciber back as the lead, I thought… my god, and to think that's what brought Avery running to me in the first place. He must hate Mulciber right now. But then I thought… actually, I don't think he does."

Caleb stiffened, saying nothing.

"You know what I think?" Silence. "I'm not stupid, you know. You were fine until I threatened Mulciber. And now that I watch the two of you more closely, I get it. I thought you lacked a killer instinct, but it was really just… one person you couldn't kill, wasn't it?" More silence. "But now, suddenly, you can. Now that you're on his team and it's the objectively stupid choice, of course. In fact it's so stupid it can't be logical, and if it isn't logical, then it's… emotional."

Silence.

"You don't hate Mulciber," Tom murmured thoughtfully. "But he doesn't feel anything in particular about you, does he?"
Caleb swallowed, and Tom smiled.

"Enjoy your Tour, Avery," he said, patting Caleb's shoulder and putting on his sunglasses, whistling as he made his way over to his team car.

Eleven Months Ago

"I think, in the end, we all want to know about the secrecy, Darian. Reportedly, there was no accounting for your whereabouts on multiple occasions, even by other team members or by the team doctors. Several times you were insistent you not be disturbed inside your rooms. Surely you understand, given the allegations against your peers—"

"So all of a sudden wanting my privacy means I was doping?" Darian's voice interjected on Caleb's screen. "Nothing about my performance reflects that. My results were consistent. I passed every test."

"And the salbutamol?"

"I have asthma. The levels were already deemed permissible by the UCI."

"There are rumors that Team Slytherin's reluctance to name their new team lead suggests you have plans to come back for one more season. Is that to compete again under a microscope, I imagine? Something you intend to do to clear your name?"

"They're just rumors," Darian's voice said flatly. "I can't speak to Dippet's intentions, or to his plans for the rest of his team."

Caleb jumped a little, hearing the sound of approaching footsteps.

"What are you watching?"

Caleb turned, tucking the iPad away. "Nothing," he said quickly. "I was just—"

Darien tilted his head, eyeing the obvious shape of the iPad sticking out behind the sofa cushion, and Caleb sighed.

"I could have vouched for you," he grumbled, holding up the video of Darian's interview, and Darian nudged him over on the sofa, sitting beside him.

"You would have implicated yourself," Darian commented, and Caleb scoffed.

"In what? You weren't doping and neither was I, and if they want to compare our results—"

"That's not what I mean."

Caleb fell silent.

Darian cleared his throat, and then said, "My career is over, Caleb. Yours isn't. We both know that if people found out, you could lose your spot on the team. You said yourself you could lose your sponsors."

"Yeah, well, Dippet hasn't finalized my new contract yet," Caleb said, opting for a joke, "so maybe I don't even have a spot on the team."
After a moment, he turned to find Darian staring at him.

"What?"

Darian opened his mouth, then closed it.

"You've been training hard lately," he said eventually. "You must have that shoulder knot again."

"Yeah," Caleb confirmed, grimacing. "It's a fucking disaster, I swear, it never fully goes away—"

"Let me take care of it." Darian gave Caleb's t-shirt a tug, slipping it over Caleb's shoulders, and then leaned forward, brushing his lips across the line of Caleb's neck. "Breathe in," he cautioned, his voice a low apology, and Caleb, oblivious to the pain that was to come, tranquilly closed his eyes.

STAGE EIGHT:

Flat Stage

Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, today we have a very familiar sight: Darian Mulciber in yellow, with Team Slytherin rallied around their leader. Times remain close, with Caleb Avery down by thirty seconds and Rodolphus Lestrange about a minute and a half behind, so just about anything could happen!"

Luna: "Cars could fly!"

Lee: "Absolutely, possibilities are endless! There's been a bit of grumbling of course, as there are many who consider Team Slytherin and Darian Mulciber in particular to be too calculated, lacking any excitement or passion. What do you think, Luna?"

Luna: "I think passion is precisely the problem!"

---

About a year ago, for almost a month, I had the perfect life.

I had retired just before the Vuelta and Caleb hadn't yet been signed to a new team, so we spontaneously stayed a couple of extra weeks in Paris. I rented a flat, taught Caleb to make a proper omelet, ate too much cheese and nearly got fat, and every night I fell asleep beside him. I thought this is it, this is all I'll ever need, this is all I've ever wanted. We took shitty city bikes out to the countryside and collapsed beside a vineyard, drunk on wine and possibility. When I think of golden hour I think of his lips, the way they were stained with merlot and mocking laughter. The way they touched mine and bled into them, the taste of him meant to live forever on my tongue.

We tried living together. We were apart frequently; cycling has always been a matter of travel. Training, competition, it's all just constant motion, eternally grinding gears. I had the UCI allegations to deal with; the trial. Caleb, meanwhile, was back with our old team, traveling all over Europe except for the American races, the weeks training in Colombia. He came and went, and I stayed still.

To sleep, I used to close my eyes and reach for those golden hours in Paris, thinking of the wine on Caleb's lips. Sometimes it would work. Sometimes not.

It isn't working now.
"Are you really not going to talk to me?"

Darian didn't know what did it; the last straw didn't even seem to be a straw at all. One minute he was watching Caleb get ready for bed and the next he was flinging accusations at him, as if he were entitled to them. There wasn't a lot of logic to this thing.

Then again, there never had been.

"What exactly do you want me to say?" Caleb replied, his voice hollow and dispassionate and no different from the mechanized sound of the tour bus GPS. "You've got your jersey now. What the fuck do you want from me?"

"How about an explanation?" Darian demanded, realizing it was a mistake even before Caleb pivoted sharply, anger in his clear blue eyes.

"Did you give me an explanation, Darian?"

Darian swallowed, determined not to back down now.

"You know why I did it. It was just one more season, Caleb, one more, and then—"

"Bullshit."

"You know what?" Now something had snapped. Darian could feel it, the way it burst, shattered, seeped down from his mouth to his chest. "You're punishing me. I get it. You think I'm not punishing myself? I don't even want to be here, I don't want to do this—"

"But you are. And you did."

"I fucking know I did, but—"

Darian's breath quickened. "Caleb—"

"No, don't talk to me. Don't fucking talk to me." Caleb's voice was breaking when he took the steps across the room, cornering Darian by the door. Shitty hotel room after shitty hotel room; that was all the gloried Tour de France had ever been, and now Darian's shitty self was trapped between the shitty bathroom and the shitty bed frame. Caleb was swearing at him, and all Darian could hear was how madly Caleb wanted to tear his chest open, to leave him gasping for breath on the floor.

"Don't say a fucking word," Caleb warned, and it was quiet that time, like a whisper. He was standing there, close enough to love or to stab, and Darian, idiot that he was, stared blankly, unsure whether he wanted neither or either or both.

By the time Caleb kissed him, yanking him painfully close, Darian was sure it was punishment. There was no way Caleb wanted him, not now, not after he'd ruined everything—certainly not while Caleb was calling him a liar—so obviously it meant Caleb had wanted him to suffer, and now, vengefully, he had finally found a way. Darian kissed him back, brutal with desperation, savage with remorse, but it was over far too quickly, Caleb slamming him back and stalking away.

"You fucked this up," Caleb said hoarsely, "and I will never forgive you."

Then he turned off the light and fell into the bed, and it was over.
Darian stood alone in the dark and shivered, suddenly cold, the taste of merlot fading like the sunset from his tongue.

STAGE NINE:
Flat Stage: Cobbles
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, this was certainly a good day for Theo Nott to make up some sprint points! Pleased to see him get a win. Nott's one of the stronger cobbles riders, given his recent win in Roubaix, but Draco Malfoy was very close, wasn't he? Of course, now that the race has gone on for the team leaders to try to make up some time, he and the other sprinters will fall back with the peloton… though, at the moment Malfoy appears to have dropped back to the team car! Do we suspect a problem with his equipment?"

Luna: "I have a feeling his equipment is working fine!"

Lee: "Hm, well you can see here he's speaking to someone in the car… perhaps the team doctor, by the look of it. There's been plenty of rumors, of course, that Malfoy's been having trouble with his hamstring—"

Luna: "That's what the kids call a network-friendly euphemism!"

Lee: "—but his challenge to Harry Potter for the points classification seems, dare I say, personal. What do you make of the rumors Draco Malfoy was seen on the floor of Harry Potter's hotel room last night, Luna?"

Luna: "Midnight duel!"

Lee: "Oh Luna, you always liven things up. It's been a duel on the cobbles today, that's for certain!"

---

oOo

I don't know why I kissed Darian last night. I only know I couldn't not, because the words I wanted to find were so impossible, so distant and inaccessible, that there was only one way I could find to communicate something to him; to confess everything to him, all the things inside of me he doesn't deserve to hear. To take the dagger from my mouth and shove it down his throat.

Because the truth is I want him, I always want him, no matter how much time passes or how senselessly he betrays me or how destructive I am to myself. I love him, I loved him, and part of me wants to continue being loved by him, even when he does it badly. Even when he loves me poorly, when he does it without talent; when it's the only thing he ever does with such a brutal lack of skill.

Why did I do it? Because I love him. Because I hate him. Because I see his exhaustion and I want it to burn him down, and then I want to lie down in his ashes and tell him the truth: that I'm sorry, that I'm angry, that I resent him, that I understand him.

That he hurt me, and therefore I need to cause him pain.

How can anyone begin to say any of that in words?

oOo
"You know, if you just adjusted your stem, you might not have so many problems."

That was Darian. See a problem, diagnose it. Nevermind that adjusting the length of Caleb's stem meant adjusting everything, starting from scratch with his seat post and his pedals and hell, even the clip on his shoes.

"Just fix it, would you?"

Caleb knew precisely what Darian was going to do: drill that elbow of his into Caleb's shoulder knot until his eye watered from the pressure; until he had to remind himself to breathe through the pain, wondering how someone could inflict so much torment on another human being and finish by saying there, you're fixed, all better.

Instead, though, Darian leaned forward and slid his thumb over the place the knot usually was, where Caleb's muscle was coiled up with swelling. He brought his lips to the tangle of nerves and tension, soothing it with warmth.

"You know how I feel about you," Darian said, his voice muffled into Caleb's shoulder. "Right?"

Caleb leaned back, meeting Darian's forehead blindly with the back of his head.

"Yeah," he said.

Sometimes Darian did things like that. Made him get comfortable. Caleb had never really intended to be—he had come here expecting to suffer—but then Darian was being tender and gentle and Caleb hadn't asked for it, wasn't prepared. Sometimes he thought, I'll just stay here forever. I will never move again; I will never need to move again. This will be where I live, right here with him, because I cannot fathom a world where this is not enough.

But then Darian shifted, stabbing his elbow into Caleb's knot without a breath of warning, and Caleb let out a growl of anguish, surprised and half-angry and sharply, agonizingly sore.

"Just remember that," Darian advised, "the next time I hurt you."

And Caleb said nothing, because his eyes were watering; because breathing was difficult; because he was in pain.

STAGE TEN:
High Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Today will be a difficult day for the climbers as we enter the high mountain stages! This is sure to be a punishing climb; you can see Darian Mulciber in the yellow jersey being protected by the members of his team, including Caleb Avery. Do you think we will see an attack from Team Slytherin, Luna?"

Luna: "It's not their fault snakes are cold all the time!"

Lee: "So true, and of course we can see the leaders on Team TMR pushing Lestrange to the front of the peloton, so there will surely be a showdown between the GC riders today. Obviously Darian Mulciber is a favorite to win the Tour, but what else might we expect?"
"Enemies to lovers!"

"Definitely, and it will be interesting to see if Caleb Avery does close that twenty second gap, or if Team Slytherin will focus their energy on beating Team TMR!"

"You're stalking," Theo said as Harry pulled up on his wheel. "This is what they call stalking."

"You're getting dropped," Harry pointed out, gesturing to the distance between them and the peloton. "This is what they call dropping."

Theo ignored him, focusing on his wheel. "Where's Malfoy?"

"Fuck if I know," Harry said, shrugging. "What's your deal with him?"

"Nothing, I told you. He's a cross champion."

"Yeah, and…?"

"And you're points champion," Theo said bitterly, "again."

Harry rode for a moment in silence, reaching behind him for his water bottle.

"Want me to pull?" he said, and Theo gave something like a scoff, only he worried it was more of an exhausted huff.

"I don't need your help," he muttered, though fuck, he certainly needed something, and help seemed like a prime contender. These high mountain days… he wasn't built for this shit.

"I know I didn't come when you asked me to," Harry said. "I know I let you down, okay? I didn't see how badly I fucked up then but I see it now, and if you could—"

"It's not that hard to see what people need, Potter," Theo snapped, because when you spend a perfect night with someone in Paris, you think: Surely it wasn't just me.

Surely they'll call.

And true, maybe you never treated it like anything but a joke while it was happening, but you didn't realize he was the kind of person who could have the perfect night and then not want to have it again. He seemed like the kind of person who overdosed on perfection, who craved it like a drug, so if he didn't call then it was never perfection at all, and that meant you imagined the whole fucking thing. You made the whole thing up in your head, and maybe that was just what he did every time he rode a world tour; maybe he picked out some hotshot sprinter to be his rival, and then when it was over he gave them one night in Madrid. In Pasadena. In Verona.

Carbon copies of a perfect night in Paris.

"Fine," Harry said.

Then he pulled in front of Theo's bike, lingering there until Theo finally latched onto his wheel with a grumble, biting back the gratitude from his tired, dehydrated tongue.

I know Caleb is torturing me on purpose. He didn't look at me again tonight, and now I'm driving myself mad wanting to be close to him; wanting him to push me away so I won't have to do the work of pulling. I imagine calling for a new room a thousand times, halfway to dialing with my thumb on the pulse of my mobile phone, but in the end I know I can't be anywhere but here. I am tired, I'm empty and worn out and sore. I can't finish this tour without him.

I sleep facing him while he sleeps with his back to me, until finally, I give up. The effort keeping me here is enough to make me sick, and I have to ride the mountains tomorrow. I rise to my feet and shove his duvet aside to climb in bed with him, curling myself around his spine and tucking my knees behind his. I hold my breath, waiting to see if he'll wake, but he doesn't. I bury my face in the back of his neck and breathe him in.

In the morning, when I wake up in his bed, Caleb is already gone.

STAGE ELEVEN:
High Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "It's been a struggle for Darian Mulciber. You can see it on his face, the way he's in a great deal of pain. If he's trying to prove to the world he hasn't been doping, I have to say, I think he's proved it! No man on drugs would look this exhausted, don't you think?"

Luna: "Only if the drugs were really bad!"

Lee: "So true, and meanwhile Caleb Avery looks determined, gritting his teeth through the pain and hanging onto his second place. Not normally a climber, Avery, but this has undoubtedly been his strongest Tour—perhaps even better than last year when he rode for Team TMR. Any speculation on his parting ways with team owner Tom Riddle last year?"

(Silence.)

Lee: "Well, Luna is reluctant to voice what I can only call a horrified grimace, but stay tuned! We're going to recap this morning's stage in about thirty seconds, at which point perhaps she will recover from—"

Luna: "Don't say his name!"

Lee: "Oh good, she's back! Wonderful, carry on."

oOo

Darian was already in the room, changing out of his kit when Caleb came barging in, somewhere between continuing the imaginary argument in his head—How dare you get in bed with me like that! How dare you hold me like you care! I slept like a fucking baby and how dare you, the audacity! Do you know what it's like to wake up in your arms and feel whole again and know it was all a fucking dream howdareyou!—and the silence of spending the whole day slaving over the incline of a fucking mountain (an experience that was mostly a lot of: fuckfuckfuck, shut up legs, fuck), but then he saw Darian there.

Specifically, he saw Darian's head bent, his chin dropped nearly to his chest, using his precious yellow jersey to mop sweat from his forehead as if it were just some dishrag he plucked from the floor. Caleb saw Darian looking like he wanted to vomit into his shoes, or possibly fall to his knees and not get up, worn down by defeat even while he was winning.
Caleb had no doubt winning the Giro had been difficult. Lestrange had pushed Darian hard, harder than he probably wanted to go; calculated Darian, who never did more than he needed to, because he knew how to conserve energy. Careful Darian, who understood how to preserve himself from pain.

Caleb dropped the bag from his shoulder and made his way across the room to have Darian's face in his hands in a matter of seconds, and the moment he kissed him, Caleb felt the energy drain from him and into Darian, jolting him to life.

"This doesn't mean anything," Caleb heard himself say, a faraway voice from a disembodied corpse. His voice was monotonous and strained. "Do you understand? This is nothing. It's just physical."

"Okay." Darian sounded broken. "Yeah, okay, fine."

Then they were kissing again and Caleb was pulling Darian into the bathroom, putting him in the shower, part lover and part mother, part impatient coach. "Get in," he said, and turned the water on, and he watched it pour over Darian's shoulders and thought fuck, he was already breaking eleven months ago and I didn't stop it, I didn't know how.

I watched him fall apart and then I left.

So Caleb stripped down to nothing and got in the shower. He shoved Darian against the wall and got down on his knees, throbbing with heat already.

How many times had he done this? Countless. He could draw the surface of Darian's abs from the tips of his fingers in his sleep. He knew precisely the sounds Darian would make and exactly the way he would return the favor. This, the person standing before him, was a stranger. He was a fraction of the man Caleb used to love. But if he made the sounds Darian made and kissed him the way Darian kissed him, then maybe Caleb could hate him again.

"This means nothing," Caleb said.

Wordlessly, Darian slid his fingers through Caleb's hair.

STAGE TWELVE:
High Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Things are certainly heating up in the mountains! There seems to be a fire lit under Darian Mulciber today. Together he and Caleb Avery have taken off, dropping Rodolphus Lestrange of Team TMR and also Augustus Rookwood, who will both lose at least a minute in the race for the yellow jersey. A quiet day for the sprinters on the course, minus the ongoing gossip!"

Luna: "Only if you speak Parseltongue!"

Lee: "Indeed, and rumors continue to circulate about arguably the two lead sprinters in the race, though of course we won't hear much from them until tomorrow's flat stage!"

OoO

"Oi," came a voice behind him, and Theo grimaced, glancing over his shoulder to see Draco approaching from the back of the race. "Going a bit hard for a mountain stage, don't you think?"
Theo frowned, gauging Draco's trajectory. "Did you just come from your team car?"

"Glutes are troubling me," Draco said with a shrug, pulling up beside him. "These Alps stages are shitty, aren't they?"

"Glutes?" Theo asked, frowning. "Is that a new thing?"

"Been three years since we trained together, Nott," Draco reminded him. "Not that I'd tell you if I actually had a weakness."

He flashed a pale, silvery smile at Theo, who sighed.

"You're a real shitbag, Malfoy," he said, semi-ample praise, and Draco's smile broadened.

"Hey, what's Potter's deal?" he asked, gesturing to where Harry was bent over his wheel a few riders away. "Has he got some sort of bone to pick with you or something?"

"What?"

"He's always got one eye on you," Draco said. "Look, watch."

Theo glanced over and at precisely that moment, Harry looked up, catching his gaze and quickly turning askance, glaring at Draco.

"I think he's just busy trying to beat you," Theo said.

"True." To that, Draco looked aggressively delighted. "Fucker really hates me," he said, sounding like someone who'd already snatched a prize nobody else could even see.

I probably shouldn't have slept with Darian last night.

Correction: I know I shouldn't have slept with Darian last night. I know it fixes nothing. I should resent the fact that he seems more himself now, like I'm someone he can fuck for good luck when it's convenient. I'm the same as a favorite pair of socks, a favored climbing gear. He's an athlete and I'm his superstition. I know that. I know that's all I've done.

But it didn't come for nothing; it cost me greatly. I spend the day ravenous, starving. It eats away at my chest, burning in my muscles. I want him, I want him, I want him.

I ride hard and barely feel it, knowing I need to finish this stage; I need to be alone with him again. It will cost me everything—again—but I already know I will gladly, bitterly pay it.

The moment the door shuts behind us, he has me in his arms. Soon he'll have his mouth on my neck, traveling down my chest. I'll have my hands on his hips, digging angry crescents into his skin. He'll have me face down on his mattress and he'll come whispering my name in my ear, choking on the sound of the satisfaction I give him. I will bite my teeth into the muscle of his shoulders and he will touch me until I keen with pleasure, choking with pain. Soon he and I will be tangled on my bed, hatefully indistinguishable in parts. He will stroke my hair. I will fall asleep in his arms.

We don't speak a word, because we don't need to.

We know we've both burned all day for this. There is nothing else to say.
STAGE THIRTEEN:
Flat Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, it seemed at first that this would be a sprinters' day, but there's been a little bit of a shake-up in the general classification race! Looks like Team TMR rode out an interesting strategy, making their way to the front of the race and pushing the pace to force Darian Mulciber and Team Slytherin to work unusually hard for a flat stage."

Luna: "Potato, potato!"

Lee: "Admittedly, Caleb Avery opened the gates for this particular strategy by exposing Mulciber's weakness! Mulciber is a highly strategic rider, famously so, focusing on his own power threshold and never exceeding it unless it becomes necessary, but this is a faint margin. It seems Avery has the legs to push along with Team TMR even if Mulciber doesn't… so will Avery ride for his team leader, or will he try to take the stage win?"

Luna: "Lovers to enemies!"

Lee: "So true, and—OH, OH MY, and here's our answer! Avery is pushing to the front, ready to compete for the stage win!"

oOo

Caleb makes it hard to let him go. He exists, he lives and he breathes, and just for the enormity of who he is I know I can't release him. I know how unhealthy this is, how toxic and how twisted, that no one has ever hurt us worse than us. Not even the Alps; not even the Tour itself. Nothing has ever made us hurt like us, and still we can't let go. I run my fingers through his golden curls and cling to him, never saying a word outside of Caleb, Caleb, please.

I have to win this Tour, I have to. I have to, and I can't let him stop me. I can't let him push me or pull me. I have to win, even if that means he loses.

But all the same, I can't let him go.

oOo

"So." Darian leaned against the bathroom sink, watching Caleb reach for his toothbrush. "Nothing, huh? No excuse?"

Caleb deliberately applied the toothpaste without looking up. "Why would I need an excuse?"

"You attacked. Again."

"It's a race," Caleb said, pausing with his hand on the faucet. "People attack."

"People do. You don't." Caleb ran the water and Darian stared at him, waiting for something, anything. Some sign he was listening. "So we're done, then?"

"What?"

Caleb put the toothbrush in his mouth, the son of a bitch, and started brushing.

"We're done," Darian said. "Or so I have to assume."
Caleb said something through a mouthful of toothpaste and Darian glared at him. He rolled his eyes, spat it out, and repeated, "Why?"

"Why what?"

"Why assume we're done," Caleb said with painful condescension, "just because I attacked?"

He glanced up, Darian's pulse quickening when their eyes finally met.

"I told you this was nothing," Caleb said, and though Darian had had his heart broken by Caleb a thousand different ways by now, this one still managed to register. "You're still in yellow, Darian. It's still the Tour. We can fuck if you want to," Caleb said, shrugging, "or we can stop. Means nothing to me either way."

"Fine." Darian turned away, heading for his bed because for fuck's sake, he wasn't a total sadist, but Caleb caught his wrist, yanking him back.

"At least you know that if you win," Caleb said, "it won't be because I let you."

Then he pulled Darian close and, not for the first time, ruined Darian's life with a kiss.

STAGE FOURTEEN:
Medium Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, it's a very tight race for yellow, with the top five GC contenders separated by a matter of seconds! Remarkable, particularly with two riders on the same team. Any thoughts on this mountain stage, Luna?"

Luna: "It's the climb!"

Lee: "What is that, Miley Cyrus? Beautiful, so prophetic, and of course Darian Mulciber is looking focused in yellow, protected by his teammates. Team TMR will not be able to attempt an attack today, that's for sure! Not with Team Slytherin's command of the peloton. An early breakaway by Krum and Poliakoff has already been caught, so provided Avery does not attack, Mulciber may take the stage win!"

---

Eleven Months Ago

"Have you eaten?" Caleb shouted from the bathroom, waiting for an answer, but after a few seconds of silence he sighed and made his way downstairs. Darian's London townhouse, the result of his six Tour de France wins, had a gym on the bottom floor, which was the only place Darian could be found if he wasn't still in bed.

"Babe," Caleb said, turning the corner, but paused as he noticed Darian had hooked himself up to the ergometer once again; another FTP test. The third, at least, in three days. Caleb tucked himself out of sight and frowned, watching the sweat drip from Darian's brow onto his handlebars.

Threshold testing was twenty minutes of effort. Full stop, uninterrupted power, balls to the wall for twenty minutes, and it was indescribably worse on a trainer. Caleb had always preferred to do his threshold testing outdoors on some stretch of road; any amount of time was less like hell when you had fresh air and something to look at. Only for metabolic testing had Caleb ever allowed himself to be indoors and hooked up to a machine, working his heart to its max just to push up against his limits.

But now Darian, a retired cyclist, was doing his third FTP test in three days. There was no way the numbers were getting better. Overtraining was pointless even for an athlete who actually had something to train for. There was no reason for this.

Darian was just slowly going insane.

Caleb closed his eyes, waiting for the buzz of Darian's pedals to stop. It took about five more minutes, and then all he heard was panting. No doubt Darian's heart felt like it was tearing itself from his chest right now; Caleb peered around the corner, eyeing Darian's silhouette, and watched him stare blankly down at his power meter.

By the way Darian's neck had bent with disappointment, Caleb was sure he would be doing another one tomorrow.

"Babe," Caleb called, softer this time, and Darian jumped, startled, whipping around to face him as if he knew he'd been caught. "Hungry?"

Darian stared at him for a second, dazed, and managed a nod.

"Yeah," he said.

Darian was always the better athlete. He did what he was told, and that meant never doing too much or too little. Caleb hated training, finding it to be mostly a nuisance, but Darian took his training plans and his coach's notes and did it all without complaint. He already knew this was excessive. He already knew what he was doing was punishing himself.

So Caleb didn't say any of that.

"Okay," was all Caleb said, beckoning him. "Let's get something to eat."

\[O O O\]

Darian's thinner now. I can feel the way he shrank a little. He feels smaller in my hands.

Darian always felt larger than life to me. How could a man like that—with that much power, with that much capacity for greatness—ever feel small? He wasn't the team leader because he was the fastest in a sprint or the strongest up a climb. It was because he did the imaginable steadily, making his way there over time. He is the kind of man who wins grand tours because he can go harder when another person in his position would, and inevitably does, fail. He can outlast everyone. There is always something left in Darian, some reserve tank of immensity, and even at his most exhausted there is a piece of him that refuses to break.

I still feel it from time to time. This is the same man I loved, just a smaller version. A tired version. That reserve tank is emptying; it's doing it slowly, still rendering him better than most of the riders out there, but it's emptying all the same. I'm grateful for the chance to have something of Darian to resent. I let myself believe the man he was a year ago was frail, incapable of damage, but he was not that, and never has been. He felt himself breaking and he hurt me for it, just to make sure it never happened to him.

For a moment, when he makes me choke down on the rupture of his touch, I almost tell him I love him. For a moment I forget, and I don't see the man who lied to me. I see only the man I have missed, that I've worshipped as much as I've loathed, and I almost say I love you like I used to. My preferred way of coming was always with adoration on my tongue.

Then I stop myself. I didn't destroy him today when I could have, so I've already given him more of myself than I wanted.

For now, that's enough to help me bite my tongue.

---

STAGE FIFTEEN:
Medium Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, today is off to an exciting start in the rain! The sprinters once again had an opportunity for points—which of course Harry Potter ran away with, securing his lead for the green jersey. Barring any misfortune, he'll be impossible to beat!"

Luna: "Youngest seeker in a century!"

Lee: "Without a doubt, and now the rest of the day will be devoted to the general classification race. There was a slight push from Lestrange, but Mulciber was able to retain control. He will have the yellow jersey once again, and tomorrow we are back in the Alps!"

---

I'm not afraid of Lestrange. I never have been. Someone pushes me every Tour, trying to get the better of me. I've never been afraid of whoever that faceless rider is.

It's Caleb who terrifies me. Will he suddenly take off, leave me behind? Will this be the night he says that's it, no more, I'm done with you forever?

I push and push and push, my hands going numb around my handlebars.

I will lose something. Please don't let it be this race.

---

Caleb kissed the back of Darian's neck, making his way lower, lips trailing Darian's spine until he shuddered. Caleb was like that, an expert in touch. His skill on the bike had always been the way he never dropped a chain; he always knew which gear to ride in, precisely when to change. He could feel it the way Darian could not. It was like the universe had a pulse and Caleb was always tapped into it, riding with it, effortlessly in the slipstream of life itself. Darian just pushed back.

He let his head fall forward as Caleb's hands curled around his ribs.

"Fuck," Caleb said softly, lips pressed to Darian's back. "Fuck, I want to hurt you."

Darian closed his eyes. It wasn't as masochistic as it sounded, because Darian could hear the end of the sentence; could feel the things Caleb hadn't said.

Fuck, I want to hurt you.

But I can't, I can't, I can't.

He twisted around, taking Caleb's face in his hands, and kissed him with as much anger as he could conjure. Take it then, he thought, tasting the rage on Caleb's tongue. Lash out.
They fell together onto Darian's bed, Caleb fumbling with his pants and scrambling lower until Darian let out a hiss of something; pleasure itself.

And fuck, did it hurt like hell.

STAGE SIXTEEN:
High Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, today is a punishing day for all the riders, who are dealing with slightly slick conditions from the rain in addition to the vigorous climbs. Caleb Avery is always fascinating to watch, and he certainly looks to be enjoying himself today, doesn't he?"

Luna: "Smiling is one way to show your teeth!"

Lee: "And he's certainly got teeth! Both Avery and Mulciber took off in a breakaway joined by Krum and Poliakoff, dropping Lestrange and Rookwood from Team TMR. Looks as if the Durmstrang boys are falling off, and… YES, THERE THEY GO! Avery and Mulciber increase their lead in the GC competition, gaining two minutes on the third place rider, Lestrange!"

"You good?" Caleb asked, panting as he turned to Darian, who gave him a grisly little smile.

"I'm good," he said. "Short pulls?"

Constant slipstream, rapid switching back and forth. That was good. Caleb liked motion, and now that the other two had fallen off it would just be the two of them. They could do things on impulse alone. They would know without asking when the other was tired, just like they knew Krum and Poliakoff wouldn't catch back on. They were fast and unstoppable. They were the greats; two of the best cyclists to ever live, each lucky enough to have always had the other to push.

"You go first," Caleb said, and Darian gave him a look like, You know I hate the rain.

"You wear me out," Darian said, but he pulled in front. At the memory of all the versions they had been Caleb caught himself smiling, and rapidly, ruefully, he stopped.

---

Eleven Months Ago

"Hey. You up?"

Caleb rolled over, squinting at Darian in the dark. "What?"

"I love you," Darian said.

Caleb groaned, raising one hand to his face. "You woke me up to tell me that?"

"Yes."

"Alright." He sighed, letting his eyes fall shut again. "Fine. I love you, too."

"Good."
Darian was quiet for a moment, which led Caleb to believe that he might actually be done. Darian had been acting strangely for weeks, only ever found in his bed or in the gym, so his inability to sleep wasn't really that alarming.

But then Darian spoke again.

"What do you think about us getting married?"

Caleb, frozen, cracked one eye, taken by surprise. "I… what?"

Darian said nothing.

Caleb frowned. "Are you… Darian, are you being serious? Because nobody, you know. Nobody knows about us, and…" And I have a career. I have sponsors. My ability to race depends on me saying, doing, feeling the right things. Loving the right people.

He trailed off, suddenly chilled.

"No," Darian said. "Wasn't serious. Just thought I'd bring it up."

He leaned over, brushing his lips against Caleb's chest.

"Get some sleep," Darian said, tossing onto his other side with a yawn. "Your watts are shit."

STAGE SEVENTEEN:

High Mountain Stage

Lee: "With Mulciber's stage win yesterday signaling that perhaps the infighting on Team Slytherin has come to a close, it seems like he'll be difficult to beat!"

Luna: "Like a bludger!"

Lee: "Absolutely, though of course there's always the chance that—OH, LOOK AT THAT! LESTRANGE IS ATTACKING AND MULCIBER IS BOXED IN! It looks like Avery will have the choice to stay back or—NO, AND AVERY FOLLOWS! He will not be letting Mulciber get his win so easily, will he? Mulciber is struggling to follow, but does he have the legs?"

Luna: "Not compared to an acromantula!"

Lee: "OH, LOOK AT HIS FACE, THE EFFORT IS KILLING HIM! Mulciber is in pain but he is following the breakaway! The yellow jersey pulls ahead!"

oOo

"Alright," Harry said, pulling up alongside Theo, "I hate this."

"It's a climb," Theo said gruffly. "We all hate this."

"Not that. This." He gave Theo an irritated glance. "I miss the dumb shit that comes out of your stupid mouth."

"Don't you get enough dumb shit from Malfoy?"
"His shit is actually shitty. Yours is fake."

"So sweet of you," Theo huffed, and Harry gave an elaborate sigh of annoyance.

"So what, you hate me now?"

"I've always hated you," Theo reminded him.

Harry's eyes had never been greener.

"Nah," he said.

_Nah._

And then, having apparently said everything he needed to say, the golden boy of professional road cycling pulled away, rejoining his team and leaving Theo to suffer alone.

_oOo_

_Eleven Months Ago_

"Listen," Caleb said, wandering into the bedroom looking troubled. "About last night—"

"I have to tell you something." Darian looked up, the pads of his fingers white around his phone, and Caleb shook his head.

"Wait, just let me finish, okay? I know you said you were joking, and—"

It was now or never. Darian couldn't let Caleb finish that sentence. "I just told Dippet I would race another grand tour season."

"—honestly it took me by surprise, but if you meant it, then—"

Caleb broke off, a little stunned by the information, and stopped.

"What?" he asked, looking dazed, and Darian sighed.

"Listen, I know what this means for you, and I know you'll probably hold it against me. But Dippet's right; if I come back, that might be enough to put the rumors to rest, and—"

"You asked me to marry you," Caleb said in disbelief, "and now you're… asking me to be your domestique again?"

"I didn't ask you to marry me. And I'm not asking you about this, either."

Darian rose to his feet, letting the phone with all of its voicemails—all his messages of refusal except for the one call, the one time he'd said yes—fall onto his duvet.

"I'm racing the Tour," he said. "And the Giro. And the Vuelta."

Caleb stared at him.

"It's the only thing I can do to restore my reputation," Darian said, because he wasn't outing Caleb. He wasn't going to reveal what he'd really been doing all those times he was accused of doping. If he was going to destroy something, it wouldn't be Caleb's career. Last night had been enough to make up his mind for him.
And now he would have to win this Tour, or this, the worst thing he'd ever done, would have only been for nothing.

"You can ride for me, Caleb," Darian said, "or you can leave."

And that was it.

---

STAGE EIGHTEEN:

Flat Stage

Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, if there's anything to be said for this year's Tour, it's certainly that anyone can see Darian Mulciber did not cheat. He voluntarily took multiple drug tests before the start of this Tour, and, more importantly, the man is undoubtedly suffering."

Luna: "Someone yeet him to Paris!"

Lee: "If only we could! Mulciber maintains his lead by thirty seconds, which is certainly close, but when the second place rider is a teammate, perhaps there's not much to be concerned about. Meanwhile, it's a sprinter's day! Do we think it'll be Malfoy or Potter, Luna?"

Luna: "Sectumsempra is not a toy!"

Lee: "So true, and by the way the teams are maneuvering their riders into place, it'll be a photo finish for sure!"

  oOo

The sound of Darian Mulciber's voice startled him.

"Do you need a leadout?"

Theo blinked, glancing to the side as the rest of the sprinters took their places at the front of the race. "What?"

"Don't sacrifice yourself this time, Nott," Darian said, and nearby, Caleb Avery looked up, brow furrowed behind his sunglasses. "If you need a leadout," Darian said again, "I owe you one."

"This stage? No," Theo told him gruffly. It was a power stage, a technical sprint, perfect for a cyclocross champion. Even Harry Potter, who was the greatest sprinter Theo had ever seen, would be hard-pressed to manage it. "Malfoy'll take it."

The moment he said it, he felt himself realize something he'd been denying the entire Tour.

The thing dragging him down wasn't that Draco was the better sprinter.

It was that even before they got on the bike, Theo kept letting him win.

"Take what's yours, Nott," Darian said, like he could read Theo's mind. "Nobody in this life is going to hand it to you."

Theo didn't have time to say anything; certainly not to argue. Not if he was going to make it. Theo glanced ahead, trying to be smart. He had won Paris-Roubaix; he'd won a technically difficult race that most people said he should have lost, and this was a similarly technical sprint, almost a climb.
Draco would take the lead; Harry would bide his time and put out more watts at the last second.

So Theo would have to take them out one at a time.

First was Draco, who only ever looked over his right shoulder. Theo slid a wheel on his left, glancing up to find Harry, but couldn't see him. Fine, so it was Draco he had beat. He muscled ahead and Draco kept up. This, Theo knew, was going to be a matter of forcing the wheel forward, not his body; something Draco wouldn't know to do.

Call it a technicality. It was, after all, a technical sprint.

In the end Theo took the win, with Draco right behind him. They called it on the photo finish, pointing to the narrow inches where Theo's wheel had beaten Draco's across the line.

"Hey," came Draco's voice when Theo dismounted his bike, looking around for Harry. "Nott," he panted, tossing his bike aside to someone on his team and jogging over to him. "That was excellent, man. Congratulations, I'm glad it was you."

Theo, stunned, gaped at him. "What?"

"That was epic," Draco said again. "I obviously underestimated you. Maybe I should have started the rumor it was you I was fucking," he added with a bark of laughter, glancing around with a scoff. "Seeing as Potter couldn't be bothered to make an appearance."

"I," Theo began, and stopped. "What?"

"Oh, you know how it is… cross riders get lost in the fray, blah blah," Draco said, dismissing it with a wave of his hand. "I wanted to make a name for myself, start a rivalry, get the cameras on me. Plus I'm sort of sleeping with our team doctor," he added, winking from afar to a girl with bushy brown hair who instantly turned away, "so, kinda have to prove I'm valuable and all that before Riddle tries to sack me for breach of contract."

"Wait." Theo frowned. "So, the hotel room pictures—"

"Yeah, weird coincidence, right? Potter's room was very conveniently located. Hey, seriously though, where is he?" Draco asked, glancing around with a frown as a handful of medics hurried through the crowd. "God, hope he didn't make good on his threats and crash out. That would be a waste of a fake relationship," he added, tossing Theo a wink and disappearing.

Medics. Theo went numb counting them. Four, five…

A lot of medics.

And no Harry Potter across the finish line.

The helmet fell from Theo's hand and crashed to the ground, just before he was hurried dizzily away for the podium presentation.

STAGE NINETEEN:
High Mountain Stage
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, this was quite the emotional stage, wasn't it? Harry Potter tore his quad on a barrier yesterday after some aggressive riding by fellow sprinter Viktor Krum, and while Potter hoped to Luna: "Unless he speaks parseltongue!"

Lee: "Absolutely, and of course this will be an interesting stage… for one thing, we're about to come into some severe weather! An unexpected snowstorm—yes, you heard that correctly, snow in July… always a fascinating Tour!—has rendered the second of today's climbs unrideable. The UCI is debating right now whether the stage will be neutralized, meaning the riders will be held until conditions are safe—"

Luna: "Mother nature comes for us all, that vengeful bitch!"

Lee: "—or whether the stage will be canceled. Now, this would be quite the surprising upset! Both Mulciber and Avery joined the breakaway, but Mulciber was dropped at the top of the first climb, giving Avery a twenty second lead. If the officials call the race at the end of the climb, then not only will the green jersey change hands, but the yellow jersey, too!"

oOo

"They're stopping the race," came Dippet's voice over the radio. "Avery, Mulciber, stop riding. They're stopping the peloton now."

"Is that some kind of joke?" Caleb glanced around at the small breakaway, noting that both the Team TMR riders were on their radios as well, along with the Durmstrang rider. "Why are they canceling it? Did someone fucking die?"

"Snow," Dippet said. "On the descent."

"What—?"

"Stop riding," Dippet said again, and Caleb twisted around, looking over his shoulder.

"But Mulciber's about to catch up, we need that second climb—"

"Caleb." Darian's voice came through the radio. "It's done, we're done. They're pulling me from the course."

"But—" Shit. Fuck. Fuck. "But that means—"

"That means you're in yellow, Avery," confirmed Dippet's voice. "You won the climb, you're taking yellow. You had twenty seconds on Mulciber."

Caleb's head swam. The TMR riders had slowed; if they were pulling off, then it wasn't some dirty trick of Tom's. It was actually, definitely true. The stage was fucking canceled with two goddamn days left—only one of which actually mattered for the general classification race.

Global warming had genuinely tampered with the fucking Tour de France.

"You'll have to win the time trial tomorrow if you want to beat me," Darian said over the intercom. "So Caleb, for the love of god, get off your damn bike and rest."

But his hands felt numb. His legs, too.
Time trials are Caleb's weakness. There's no fun in it for him, and discipline has never been his strong suit. I can still win this Tour. I can beat him in the time trial.

Or.

Or.

I can let him win.

The truth is I may not deserve to win. I'm not the strongest rider here. Maybe I was once, or I would be if I hadn't exhausted myself to win the Giro, but there's a reason I got dropped on the climb today. I had a wheel—for fuck's sake, I had Caleb's wheel, and I never lose in Caleb's slipstream—but I couldn't hold it. My legs gave out.

I was tired and I got dropped.

Maybe I would have caught him for the finish if the stage had been allowed to continue. The piece of me that believes Caleb still feels something for me believes that, too; that Caleb expected me to catch back on, to win today, then win tomorrow. To win my last Tour and finish this, everything between us, for good.

But I got dropped and the stage got canceled, and maybe I could have fucked Caleb tonight in yellow, but now I will be back in my own jersey, nothing remarkable at all, wholly and apologetically myself. The same version of myself who turned to him in the middle of the night and couldn't quite beg him to marry me. The version who tried but couldn't say you're enough for me, Caleb. If I have you I won't need the validation of the UCI; I won't even need my medals. I won't need anything at all if you say yes.

It's not my best version.

But it is, despite my best intentions, the only one I have the energy to be.

STAGE TWENTY:
Individual Time Trials
Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Quiet an unexpected sweep by Team Slytherin! Theo Nott rides in green, Caleb Avery in yellow, but all eyes are on the GC race. There are less than thirty seconds between Avery and Mulciber, but barring any disasters, Mulciber has proven time and time again he is the better rider when it comes to time trials."

Luna: "Time is a construct!"

Lee: "Very true, though Avery has looked much stronger this year. He has always had the makings of a general classification champion, but will this be the year he actually wins?"

Luna: "Infinity is a myth!"

Lee: "Luna, I wholeheartedly agree. And as always, we'll just have to watch and find out!"
Darian had his eyes closed when the final times were announced. He stayed there until he heard Caleb's time, and then he didn't move, hardly breathed, until he heard the familiar footsteps that meant Caleb was standing right in front of him.

"Tell me the truth," were the first words out of Caleb's mouth, arrogant as ever, and Darian smiled. "Did you let me win?"

Darian cracked one eye, looking at the man who had just won his first yellow jersey at the Tour de France.

The man Darian loved, despite everything.

"I was tired," Darian said, and to Caleb's look of impending argument, he firmly shook his head. "I gave it everything I had," Darian assured him. "I earned my second place and I'm proud of it. I nearly killed myself to get it."

"I didn't help," Caleb said gruffly. As close to an apology as anything.

"No," Darian agreed, "but you shared six wins with me. Do you even know how much that means to me? How much that matters to me?" In response to Caleb's silence, Darian clenched a fist, voice straining. "They weren't just threatening to take those yellow jerseys away from me, Caleb, they were going to take them away from us. But fuck," he said with a humorless laugh, "at least because of this stupid fucking thing I did, we'll always have this one."

He swallowed and looked up, forcing a smile that he hoped Caleb would understand.

"This one," Darian said, "is ours."

For a moment, he was sure Caleb was going to kiss him.

He didn't. He took a step back.

"I have to go," Caleb said, a little dizzied. "I just… I just won the Tour."

It was the thing every cyclist dreamed of. It was the thing Caleb had surely dreamt of, and now, finally, it was his.

"Go," Darian said. "I'll see you later."

He expected that to be as much as they had time for. At the last moment before he turned, Caleb's mouth had stretched into a brilliant smile, the sheen of it as warm as golden hour in the sun.

"Yeah," Caleb said. "Yeah, Darian, you will."

oOo

I wish I'd realized while it was happening that this would be the last Tour I rode with Darian.

I knew it, in some distant, abstract way, but I'd forgotten. Last year I was alone, watching him from afar, denying everything and suffering in silence. This year, for the last time, I spent three weeks in his orbit, doing the thing I love most with him at my side. In my anger, I took it for granted. If I had been the lead—if Darian had never said yes to Dippet and come back—I would have ridden this Tour alone. Nobody would have been here to push me, to make me better. Would I have even won if not for him?

No. I think I know it in my soul, that if I am a winner—not just a cyclist, but a champion—then it's because of something I share with Darian. Because he shared himself with me.

And for the first time in weeks I cannot resent him. Not for that, or for anything at all.

STAGE TWENTY-ONE:

Flat Stage

Audio Broadcast

Lee: "Well, a first win for Caleb Avery! We have Armando Dippet on the line, owner of Team Slytherin—how are you, Armando?"

Armando: "Hi, Lee! Luna, how are you?"

Luna: "You really should have noticed Tom Riddle's latent psychopathy."

Lee: "Okay, everyone's doing great! Anyway, I hear there's some updates from Team Slytherin about the Vuelta de España—is that right, Armando?"

Armando: "Yes, I spoke to Caleb Avery last night. As you both know, Avery would not normally ride the Vuelta after winning the Tour, given the importance of recovery. However, Avery has made it clear he intends to ride another grand tour this year."

Lee: "Will he be taking over Mulciber's lead?"

Armando: "No. Mulciber will remain team lead."

Lee: "Oh, what a surprise! Does that mean Mulciber plans to continue his quest for the triple crown?"

Armando: "Lee, this has always been about Darian's legacy as a cyclist. He's a champion, and he's proven it six times already. He doesn't need another yellow jersey to prove he earned the jerseys before, and while I hope his reputation going forward will be secure, he remains one of the greats of the sport, through and through. This journey was never going to end with a single race."

Lee: "No doubt of that! So we will see Mulciber and Avery at the Vuelta, then, for Mulciber's last grand tour?"

Armando: "Oh, absolutely! They're my dream team, Lee. They make magic happen!"

Luna: "Not always the good kind, but that's okay!"

oOo

Without Harry, the sprint to Paris was laughably easy. Theo beat Draco Malfoy and Viktor Krum and crossed the finish line first. He won the green jersey and it meant absolutely nothing, obviously. It was only a technicality.

"You did it," Harry said, waiting for Theo at the finish. He should have been in a hospital or on his way home but instead he was waiting for Theo at the finish. The cameras were everywhere, and Harry Potter of Team Phoenix-Hogwarts was here, waiting for Theo Nott of Team Slytherin, standing on crutches at the finish line in Paris.

"About time," Harry added.
"Shut up," Theo sighed, rolling his eyes. "You know this means nothing."

"A win's a win, Nott."

"No." Theo shook his head. "No, it's not."

Harry was quiet for a moment.

"I'm sorry," he said eventually. "About everything."

Theo arched a brow. "Everything?"

"Everything."

"You not calling me, you mean?"

"Yes, that. But in my defense I often lose my phone, and I really thought you would call again."

Typical. "So you just waited for me to do something, then?"

"I mean, yeah. I never said I was a genius."

"I know you aren't," Theo sighed. "And your affair with Malfoy?"

Harry's brow furrowed. "What?"

"Well," Theo said, "not so much the affair, but—"

Harry stared at him, disbelieving. "Wait. You really thought I wanted him?"

Immediately, Theo wished he'd said nothing.

"I mean," he began, feeling stupid. "In my defense, you were just so—"

He broke off, though, when Harry pulled him in and kissed him.

In full view of the cameras.

In front of the entire world.

"You stupid idiot," Harry whispered, one hand locked around the back of Theo's neck while photographers crowded frantically around them. "You really think there's anything I've ever wanted more than you?"

Theo managed a smirk. Or, if things had not gone as suavely as he intended, then a smile.

"Dinner on you?" he asked.

"If you want to fuck me, Nott, just say so," Harry replied.

"Nah," Theo said, though he did not, as Harry had, stop there. "I want to date you, Potter. Flowers and candles. Romance and shit." He reached out, touching his thumb to Harry's chin, and gave him a merciless look of arrogance. "I want to love you, Potter. But I'll fuck you if you ask nicely."

Harry tilted his chin up in apparent acquiescence.

"Alright then, Nott," he said. "Then consider this my formal request."
When the ceremony is over, Caleb finds me. I've never been on this side of it, in the shadow of someone else's glory, but for the first time I understand how Caleb must have felt for all those years.

His win has taken nothing from me. For the first time in years, I don't feel empty. I have come in second at the biggest cycling event in the world, and I am satisfied and whole.

"I was going to make a big public scene," Caleb tells me, "but Potter beat me to it."

I had been looking at my derailleur before he found me, determining how to finish what I started. I'll have to win the Vuelta and the World Championships now, if I still want that triple crown. I don't know if I have the energy for it, or the strength. The World Championships is one stage; that I can manage, if I rest well enough. The Vuelta I cannot possibly do alone.

I say what, confused by whatever Caleb is saying, and he bends down beside me, crouching to glance a moment at his hands.

"I love you," he says. "I want to spend my life with you."

I wait, of course. We've both made versions of these promises before.

But then he says something else; something new.

"I don't want to fucking hide," Caleb tells me, and then it's enough for me to pull him closer, because I have misunderstood everything in my life but this.

I wasn't satisfied before; that's why my sense of self was so easily taken from me. I thought taking those jerseys away meant I wouldn't exist, but the truth is I was never truly complete even with them. I have never been satisfied alone, because what I am is half of whatever I make with Caleb. I am not myself without him.

I don't know what the next stage will be for me. I have no way of knowing whether Caleb chances destroying his career, or if mine has yet to suffer. I step forward knowing that whatever comes from this, it will be enough for me. When I am the man Caleb Avery can love, openly and without reservation, then I am the man I want to be.

Whatever happens next will be whatever it is. I no longer concern myself with the finish line. I have been made and unmade by the places I took when I finished, and even the rosy glow of nostalgia won't make me long for the uncertainty of the start. I don't need to fall in love again; I don't need to start over. For the first time, what I hold in my hands is enough.

Take it from someone who knows; it's not a race. Coming from me that's ironic, but for what it's worth, the finish doesn't determine who you are. The gold medal, the yellow jersey… whatever it is, it can't make you whole if you weren't enough at the start.

If I've learned one thing, it's this: It's not where you place when you finish.

It's who's by your side at the end of the ride.
I know, I know, sequels are never as good as the original, but I tried. Thank you to Aurora, mostly just for loving the first one so much, though also for editing. Happy first day of the Vuelta, and vive le Tour!

Dearly Departed

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione)

Universe: muggle AU

Rating: T

Summary: Hello and welcome to Olivie Advent 4.0! I have been collecting prompts over the past month and will be posting brief one shots every day from now until Christmas. Thank you to everyone for your submissions! As we move forward, the specific request(s) will be listed below. Some caveats: Many prompts have been combined in order for me to address as many requests as possible. Additionally, these will all be fairly brief, as I do have to write 24 of them, and they will vary experimentally by mood, characterization, etc., so if you don't care for one day's prompt or pairing, there will be something very different the next. (You are welcome to tell me if you'd read more of any tropes or concepts in particular, as I'm always up for pondering future stories.) Thanks again for joining me!

Prompts: 1) Barista x obnoxious customer w/creatively misspelled names; 2) Draco as a funeral director.

Fine. So she was 'just' a barista. So what?

"Uni's quite expensive," she would offhandedly remark, quick as a trigger pull. It was a reflexive tick, that little compulsive add-on of explanation, which came at the end of what do you do and no really, you? and just before the hasty little so great to see you, we should definitely catch up!

"Sure," Hermione would say, forcing a smile and sliding a latte across the bar to the girl who'd cheated off her exams from ages 8-13 without fail. "Skim milk, right?" she would add, former prodigy turned perpetual failure, and in return, the girl would smile and give her a half-hearted compliment, eager to ring up her mates from lower sixth announcing just what had become of brainy Granger.

In Hermione's defense, uni was quite expensive.

But also, the real world just fucking sucked.

He was wearing a black suit the Monday he arrived in her cafe: single breasted. Fitted in the shoulders. Two buttons, with only the top button done. She would later wonder if he owned any other clothing, only to gradually conclude that he probably did not. He had a preternaturally formal look to him, almost vampirically. Pale skinned, pale blond, utterly lacking in both melanin and patience. The stitching on his lapel read Dearly Departed: Malfoy Funeral Services.

He was exactly the sort of character one expected to find at a cafe, of which there were many identifiable types: The Sing-Song Customer chirping about the weather. The Indecisive One, who was compelled to ask several questions about Hermione's selection of milk as if she had been the one to do the milking. The Mother With Too Many Children, who couldn't be faulted but certainly wasn't a thrill.

Then there was The Asshole, who was always somehow in a hurry; twitching in line, tapping his foot, sighing loudly when he reached the counter as if to say finally—only of course he wouldn't, because microaggressions were more suited to his aesthetic.

Entitlement. He was rife with it.

"Is that a joke?" Hermione asked, pointing to his nametag as she wrote down his afternoon order: half-caf Americano, room for cream.

He slammed the bills down on the counter, half-startling her. "Yes," he said. "We in the industry are positively notorious for our vivacious grasp of humor. How can we make you laugh today?" he snapped, sliding his wallet back into the inner pocket of his jacket.

Hermione paused, irritated. Sometimes when her manager was out and the lines were short, she liked to play a little game of who could be more difficult.

"Is that a joke?" she asked innocently, glancing up from the cup.

He opened his mouth, then closed it.

"Your job," he said, "is to make my coffee. Not to ask stupid questions."

"Do you get any calls about supernatural stuff, like Ghostbusters," she asked, pondering it aloud, "or is it only the regular kind of death?"

He glared at her. "Just make the coffee. Hermione," he added derisively, glancing at her nametag as if it had personally threatened to raise his taxes.

She glanced at his nametag again: Draco, it read, followed by: Have a happily ever afterlife!

"Drah-co?" she said.

"Dray-co," he corrected, pursing his lips. "Are we done here?"

She smiled broadly, hospitably. "Almost."

Five minutes later, after humming the full overture to the Nutcracker suite and watching Draco slowly melt with fury, Hermione set the coffee down on the bar.

"Americano for Dracula," she called mellifluously.

He snatched the cup from the counter and stormed out.

"Oh look, it's the harbinger of death," she said, flipping a page in her book from where she sat alone behind the counter.

"Can you just honestly fuck off?" he muttered, slapping his credit card into the counter. This time, his nametag cheerily read In your end is your beginning!

"Seriously," he added, "I'm begging you."

"No need to beg," she said. "Although tips are appreciated."
He slid a glance over her doubtfully, eyeing the stains on her apron where it sat above a shirt she hadn't particularly cared to un-wrinkle before arriving. "I'm sure they are."

She ran his card in silence, waiting for the beep that meant the transaction had gone through.

"Hope you don't mind, though," she remarked offhandedly. "Steamer's a bit dodgy this morning, so it might take a bit."

His mouth tightened. "What?"

"Two minutes, I'm sure," she assured him.

Ten minutes later, after quite a lovely performance of Schubert's Ave Maria, his coffee was ready.

"Cappuccino for the Grim Reaper," Hermione called.

"Jesus fucking Christ, you're a menace," he muttered, letting the door slam as he went.

"Has it ever occurred to you that I might find this deeply insulting?" he asked, after she announced that a latte was ready for Maweth, Angel of Death. "Do you have a manager I could speak with?"

"If you're collecting souls, can't say I recommend Frank's," advised Hermione. "Just a professional courtesy between us."

He scowled. Today, his nametag read See what awaits beyond the grave!

"You think this is funny?" he said. "It isn't."

"You're coffee's getting cold, Maweth," Hermione said.

"Well, you don't have much experience aside from this… little cafe," noted the interviewer, frowning to himself. "No internships, anything like that?"

Internships didn't pay and landlords didn't typically accept 'a promising future' as a form of compensation, so no.

"I do have excellent references from my professors," Hermione began, but the interviewer cut her off with a glance.

"Mm," he said, "yes, of course. And what's one thing you've learned from working at the cafe?"

She blinked. "What?"

"As a company we value work experience," he reminded her. "What's one thing you've learned?"

She paused, clearing her throat.

"Um," she said.

He picked up the cup, staring at it. "Who the bloody fuck is Thanatos?"

"God of death," replied Hermione, "obviously."

"You mean Hades?" said Draco, unconvinced.
"No, Hades is the god of the Underworld, not death. Not the same."

She turned away, wiping down the machine and glancing at his nametag.

Make us your first stop on the train to Glory!

"Why do you know so much about death?" demanded Draco. "It's unsettling."

"I know about a lot of things you evidently don't," replied Hermione. "Coffee, death, human decency…"

He rolled his eyes and spun, the heels of his dress shoes tapping across the floors.

"Have a heavenly day," she called after him, waiting until the door fell shut to let her smile fade.

---

His cup read San La Muerte, Saint of Death.

His nametag: We'll be there when your number is up!

"How does one become a mortician, exactly?" she asked him.

"I'm not a mortician," he told her, irritated once again. "I don't touch the bodies. You need a license for that. I just—"

"Do you drive the hearse?" she asked thoughtfully, stretching her imagination as to what he might do when he wasn't caffeinating at odd hours.

His eyes narrowed, glowering a bit. "On occasion, yes."

She wiped down the counter, pondering it further. "Are you like, a pallbearer?"

"If others cannot be found."

She paused, replacing the filter basket.

"Do people often die alone?" she asked. "Or, you know. With no one to bear the pall, I guess."

He paused, regarding her warily.

"Sometimes," he said.

She waited for him to demand that she move faster, but what came out of his mouth was, "It's quite difficult, actually, to die with loved ones around you. It necessitates the prerequisite of being loved to begin with," he explained with a sullen glance at his hands, "which seems impossible enough as it is."

She glanced at him, waiting for a glimpse of mockery, but he seemed entirely serious.

"Do you think about that often?" she asked him.

"Incessantly," he said.

But that seemed to be all the civil interaction he could handle, so when his coffee was finished, he turned without a word and left.
"Americano for Draco," she called.

He blinked, then frowned.

"Americano for Draco," she repeated, as if perhaps he had simply misheard.

He plucked the cup from the counter gingerly, giving it a thorough inspection, and then looked up.

"For what it's worth, you make very good coffee," he said, looking positively strained by the concession. "You're meticulous about it. Annoyingly so," he added in apparent defense, preemptively daring her to challenge him.

"Well," she remarked, "things ought to be done well if they're going to be done at all."

There was no need to continue, though she glanced up at him again, perhaps on impulse. That day, his nametag read Find tranquility beyond the veil!

"Anyway, it all seems rather pointless sometimes," she continued, for reasons utterly unknowable. "Go to university, get good marks, find a proper job, take out all sorts of massive loans, drudge through life to pay your debts, get married at some point neither alarmingly late nor irresponsibly early, have a few ungrateful children, work until all work grows meaningless and then tend to your feeble vegetables until you die. It's all a bit sickening, if you ask me," she said, shifting to clean out the coffee grinder. "There's not a spot of joy in the whole thing unless you make one. Or," she added on second thought, "unless you find it in a proper cup of coffee."

"Right," he said. "My thoughts exactly."

He slid on a pair of sunglasses and turned on his heel, exiting through the doors.

Two minutes later, her phone buzzed in her pocket; three times from an unknown number.

hello hermione it's me

death

don't suppose you're free thursday

That day, his cup had read Why do it alone?, followed by her phone number.

She gave it a moment, polishing the espresso machine until it gleamed, then typed her response.

assuming your colleagues don't come for me first? I can be available.

good, he said. I'll be the one on the pale horse.

Chapter End Notes

Happy belated birthday Little Chmura!
They are at war from the moment they meet.

"Let him go," says Draco when Theo stops, catching signs of life in the high Scottish grass. The boy barely visible between the reeds is thin, almost skeletal, and his eyes are closed, but his lungs are filling, emptying slowly. On his forehead is a thin, lightning-shaped scar.

"Nott, there's no time, we have to leave—"

"He's alive," Theo pants, trying to catch his breath. "He won't be for long."

Draco, equally breathless, hesitates a moment, glancing over his shoulder. "My father's waiting for us, Theo. If we stay out here long—"

"Just help me get him somewhere safe," Theo pleads. "I'll come back for him."

He isn't sure exactly why he stopped; whether it was this particular boy or the sight of yet another body. They had seen so much death by then; their friends, their families. War was death by sword or by famine, by unforgiving wildlands or blood, by man or by nature. One way or another, the soul began to fade.

"Just help me," begs Theo.

Draco grimaces, but agrees.

He opens his eyes to the vastness of night, half-illuminated by a set of narrow black eyes.

No, not black.

Green.

"What's your name?" asks the stranger. The symbol fastening his cloak bears a skull and a snake, but his hands are gentle, and it is too painful to move.
It takes a while to find his voice. His head swims.

"Harry," he manages to say.

Then he tumbles backwards into darkness once again.

When Harry wakes, Theo is sleeping beside him. They have already won, the Order surrendering at last to Lord Voldemort's forces, but no one will miss Theo if he waits in the forest another few days. Draco has gone home already, collecting their rewards, making their excuses.

When Harry wakes, Theo's eyes snap open with alarm, hand thrusting out behind him for the dagger he knows by now not to sleep without. But Harry already has it, and quick as a flash he has it raised to Theo's neck.

"What do you want from me?" Harry asks hoarsely. His ribs are healing well, apparently, as he's summoned the strength to slit Theo's throat.

"Nothing," says Theo.

He almost stops there, but in the end he adds, "I just wanted to keep something alive for once."

Harry blinks, swallows hard.

From where he straddles Theo's hips, the situation shifts somehow. Something between them changes. They were men at war before, and they are still at war now, but in the span of a breath, the tension is somehow different.

Theo reaches up, curling his hand around Harry's, which remains wrapped tightly around the knife.

"Will you kill me?" Theo whispers.

Harry leans forward, catching Theo's mouth with a gasp.

The blade falls to the ground, forgotten.

He has to go, he tells Theo. He can't stay here. If Voldemort has won, then he will surely be captured and killed. The life that Theo saved for him depends on his escape. From here on, he has to save what remains of his people. He has to save himself.

"I understand," Theo says, but doesn't look at him.

That night they lie naked together, his hands tracing Theo's scars. They are boys with men's bodies, a pair of soldiers with a widow's sense of loss. Theo kisses Harry's ribs penitently, blessing them.

"If there were a place we could be together," Harry murmurs, but Theo doesn't let him finish.

"I know," he says. "I know."

In the morning, Theo pretends to sleep while Harry slips away.

Theo and Draco are both granted positions of privilege. Over the next few months they cultivate new lands, new wealth. Draco becomes accustomed to comfort, but Theo, a restless soldier still, makes war on Voldemort's behalf whenever it is asked of him. He becomes known for his prowess, his talent at war, his unassailable luck. He scours the land for Harry's body, thanking the gods each night he doesn't find it.

Five years later he is summoned to Voldemort's court. At last, Voldemort is satisfied with his empire.

"Let us have my old champion fight my new one!" Voldemort says with a laugh, lifting his glass in Theo's direction, and Theo obediently straps on his armor. Numbly, with motions long lost to reflex, he picks up his sword.

His opponent, wearing a mask and the markings of a prisoner of war, only stares at him.

"Will you kill me?" the masked man asks.

Voldemort is watching, so Theo is quick, ruthless, and Harry, who has clearly been beaten and starved for months, goes down without a whimper, without a sound.

"Stay down," whispers Theo.

Sorrow and sweat are both matters of salt. Theo licks it from his lips while Harry is dragged away.

Harry wakes to find blackness above him.

No, green.

"You'll be killed if he finds out," he warns through cracked lips.

"Let him try," says Theo, as Harry's eyes fall shut again.

Theo reminds Voldemort he has asked for nothing; not jewels, not gold, not land, not even a wealthy wife. He serves his Dark Lord faithfully; has served since he was a boy.

Does he not deserve a reward?

"Fine, take him," Voldemort says, who is not above slavery.

Theo takes Harry to his rooms in chains; then, carefully, worshipfully, he removes them. He kisses the wounds on Harry's wrists and bathes them with his own hands. He wipes away the blood, the dirt, the carnage. He finds the old scars buried under new ones and sits dutifully beside him while he sleeps.

"Why this prisoner?" asks Draco, who doesn't recognize Harry. To him, the faces have only blurred throughout the years.

Theo doesn't answer. When Draco leaves, he helps Harry sit up, gives him water. Feeds him by hand. He holds a cool cloth to Harry's forehead until his fever of malnourishment breaks.

When Harry has sweat through his linens, waking to find Theo asleep beside him, he turns and strokes Theo's hair, startling him awake. On instinct, Theo's hand closes around Harry's wrist.

"Easy," says Harry, but Theo's grip doesn't relax.

Instead he forces Harry onto his back, straddling him, and stays there, bending his head slowly until their noses brush, their foreheads meet.

"Don't make me let you go this time," Theo says quietly.

Pleads, really.

Harry says nothing.

That night, Theo kisses Harry like he hates him. It burns and burns and burns.

"It's only you for me," Theo says, furious. "Only you."

"Only you," Harry promises him, swearing it like an oath. "Always you."

In the morning, Theo pretends to sleep while Harry slips away.

The Order becomes a threat again, rising from the dead. It resurrects like the phoenix for which it was named. Voldemort is furious, sending Theo into a battle he knows he cannot win. Some things can't be forgiven, and now Theo is one of them.

When Theo goes down he thinks of Harry, the way he tastes, the way he feels. He remembers Harry's lips, the shape of his mouth, the arch of his back. They are at war eternally, unceasingly, forever. When Theo falls, cut down by an Order sword, he chooses to die with Harry's name on his lips.

He falls into darkness and wakes, two stars blinking above him.

No, not stars.

Green.

Theo is weak and delirious, thinking he's dead. He thinks this is heaven.

Theo's heaven, Harry realizes, is Harry's eyes.

"Did you kill me?" Theo pleads with him, shivering with fever. He was left alone without resources, with insufficient men. After so many years, after countless victories, Voldemort has turned on his most decorated lieutenant.

Harry holds a cool cloth to Theo's head.

"Not yet," he says.

That night is tenderness and promises. For a night, they are at peace.

In the morning Harry keeps his eyes closed. The moment they open, he will be at war again, as he and Theo have been from the moment they met.

Fingertips brush his ribs, blessing old scars and new.

"Only you," Theo says.

"Always you," Harry murmurs, and for another few minutes, this will be enough.

Thank you guys so much for your encouragement, and for following along. Something very different tomorrow!
A Little Twisted

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione)

Universe: Year 6 AU

Rating: M for sex

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) Dramione based on Jeux d'Enfants (Love Me If You Dare); 2) Dramione coming together to get revenge on someone (super manipulative and particularly vengeful); 3) Could you maybe do a one shot in your advent of Hermione and Draco as a power couple? Ambitious, manipulative, power hungry, kinda bad?

I think I'm in love with you, read the note.

Hermione glanced at it, arched a brow, and scribbled her response below his.

Prove it, she said, charming it into a bird and sending the note on its way.

She had a craving for small spaces that he was starting to suspect was incurable. Broom cupboards, alcoves, once below a desk in a classroom that was fully empty. He could have easily sat her down on top of it, proceeding to fuck her more comfortably there, but no, it had to be on the floor, as if sex for her was unsatisfying unless it tore apart his knees.

"What do you want from me?" he panted.

She slid her tongue over the tip of his cock again, releasing it with a little pop from her lips.

"I'm sure you'll think of something," she said.

An unfamiliar owl had dropped a particular heavy package atop the table that morning: a catalogue of vanishing cabinets.

"So this is how much you love me?" Hermione prompted, straddling Draco's hips. She let him slide his hands beneath her skirt, pushing aside her knickers, but stopped him just shy of anything more sinful—or, as it were, more satisfying. "Just a clue, Malfoy? And not even a very good one."

"What are you offering me in return, hm?" His slid his knuckles against her clit, finding a way to circumvent her deliberate resistance. He was constantly deteriorating her sensibilities, delivering her to wanton shudders. "I don't see you proving anything."

"Why should I have to prove anything to you?" she scoffed.

He looked at her for a moment, grey gaze thoroughly unreadable.
Then, startling her to a gasp, Draco lifted her up by the ribs, setting her on her feet and waltzing out of the room, unfazed. The air in his absence was suddenly cool, the fabric of her knickers thoroughly saturated with wanting.

"Damn," she muttered to herself, positively aching.

Clearly she would have to take care of things herself.

"Who's someone you hate?" she had asked him once.

"Why?" Draco said, eternally suspicious.

"I like to know these things," she replied. "Says a lot about a person who their enemies are."

"Who do you hate, then?"

An odd thing to say with his cock still inside her, but that was the fun of her. No one else would be so blatantly undeferential.

"Fine. Besides you and Potter and Weasley," Draco conceded, to which she placed her foot on his chest, ready to shove him away, "I suppose I hate Snape."

He hadn't expected to say that until it came out, and perhaps it wasn't even true. It was only that he was so very annoyed with all the fussing. Yes, fine, Draco had to kill Dumbledore and it was difficult, logistically and psychologically speaking. Still, it didn't mean he needed a nanny.

"Hm," said Hermione. "Interesting."

That day, Crabbe flew into the Great Hall with Goyle flapping madly beside him.

"Did you hear?" they squawked, practically in unison.

"One at a time," Draco replied, impassively as ever. The two of them shared a single brain cell, and not even a reliable one at that.

"Snape's been sent to St Mungo's," Crabbe said, sounding distressed. "Said he's gone mad!"

Draco glanced up, catching sight of Hermione across the room. She had her right leg crossed over left, but upon feeling his gaze on her, she shifted subtly in her seat. Below the table, he watched her knees part slowly, widely, before crossing left over right, settling back in place.

"Hm," said Draco. "Interesting."

He tried to fuck her during the ten minutes between potions and transfiguration, but of course she wasn't having it. "I've just done something massive for you, haven't I?" she reminded him, bristling. "It's your turn."

Not that it was difficult, really. Snape's life was a nightmare already. It had taken scarcely any magic at all to make the nightmare stick permanently, and she could hardly be blamed for him deciding to go mad as a result.
Resilience was a valuable trait.

"Fine," Draco seethed, though before he went, he shoved her against the wall, leaning in as if he would kiss her. "You're really very twisted," he said to her lips, skating cruelly above them. "Does anyone else know?"

Certainly not Harry. Not Ron, either.

Rita Skeeter probably did.

"Give me something good, Malfoy," she told him, stroking the outline of his cock. Poor thing leapt perilously in her hand. Draco's haughty expression contorting with desperation yet again. "Satisfy me," she whispered. "Please?"

Boys. They only wanted one thing: their egos stroked.

He shoved a hand under her skirt, cupping his palm between her thighs.

"Fine," he sighed, grimacing, and left.

Two days later, a list of names. Within a couple of hours she had worked out that they were the names of current Death Eaters, planted by Voldemort to take over positions of monotony within various branches of wizarding government. Within days, their homes had been raided, their fortunes turned over to the Ministry for their efforts at war relief.

Then, a week later, a note: You owe me.

Hermione smiled to herself. Yes, she really rather did.

Harry Potter and Ron Weasley failed their exams.

"It's funny," said Draco crossly, "but hardly the same thing."

"Oh, I know," Hermione assured him. "I'm not finished."

Then, a week later, the unbelievable happened.

"There's no way you did this yourself," commented Draco in disbelief, murmuring it out of the side of his mouth.

Hermione, dressed somberly in black robes, didn't look up. They hadn't intended to be seen together publicly, but some things couldn't be avoided.

"He was dying anyway," she replied under her breath, shrugging, "and this way, no one's starting an idiotic war over it. He just… passed away in his sleep, that's all."

Inadvisably, Draco suppressed a shiver.

"You've got ice in those veins," he remarked to no one in particular.

She shifted in the crowd, brushing the (unfortunately) tented material of his trousers with the fabric of her skirt.

"And here you thought it was mud," she replied.
Then she looked up, eyes wide and wet, before brushing away a single, artfully manufactured tear.

Just after Easter, a surprising announcement came via Ron's idiotic owl Pigwidgeon.

"What the—" Ron stared at it. "Harry, bloody Christ—"

But shortly afterwards, everyone's owls had streamed in with their own copies of the Daily Prophet, rendering the rest of Ron's sentence mostly pointless.

"He's dead," came a shout from Seamus Finnegan. "You-Know-Who is dead!"

There was a shout from the crowd, an uproar, and shortly after, Draco waltzed in late for breakfast and pointedly alone; one hand in his pocket, tie loosely slung around his neck. He paused in front of the Gryffindor table, glancing sideways at Hermione, and slid his tongue between his lips, mouth stretching into an arrogant smirk.

"Sorry to hear about your Dark Lord and savior, Malfoy," remarked Hermione, reaching dispassionately for her cup of coffee.

"Strangest thing, isn't it," drawled Draco. "Hate to think it was the poor hospitality wherever it was You-Know-Who was staying." He slid his glance to Ron, considering him for a moment. "What's your hovel called, Weasley? The Pigpen?"

"Sod off, Malfoy," snapped Ron.

Draco winked at him, striding lazily away, and Hermione tightened her legs, suddenly rather throbbing.

She would owe him quite a lot of somethings after this.

"What if I said I loved you back?" she asked.

By then the announcement had already been made that they had been named Head Boy and Head Girl respectively. Not that it was a competition, really, after the only other male student with Draco's grades coincidentally wound up with some sort of obscure 18th century swamp flu.

"You'd have to actually say it," he said. "Which I'm not sure you can."

She was radiant with perspiration, gloriously naked in his bed. One of the conditions of their recent detente was that she would give him proper space for once, and he had returned the favor tenfold, in his opinion. True, at least three mermaids had watched him fuck her with her tits pressed to his lake-facing window, but that was rather a fun addition to the tryst.

"Well, I don't see why this should have to end," she said. "Whose turn is it, anyway?"

"Yours," he told her. "It'll be yours for quite some time."

She sighed, stretching out against his sheets.

"Could always take over the Ministry ourselves," she offered, rolling the prospect around on her tongue. "I'm sure I could manage it."

She twisted to face him, giving his cock a stroke.
"He's tired," warned Draco, exhaustedly shoving her hand away.

"Too bad," she said, and to his dismay, she was right. "So, will that do, then?" she asked, giving him another languid stroke.

"Will what do?"

"Political omnipotence," she said. "Shared," she added, "seeing as I think I might be in love with you."

Christ, she was fucked up. Then again, he'd rather enjoyed offing Voldemort, so maybe it was a meeting of the minds.

"Prove it," he said, and she gave him another spectacular smile.

Chapter End Notes

Trying to keep your daily fare diverse. Thank you for following along!
Things generally came in threes: deaths, catastrophes, other issues of portent. By the third time she wound up in his bed, it had become fairly clear they'd have to stop, or else chance a compounding cataclysm.

"We have nothing in common," Pansy said, still panting a bit. She really ought to get in a bit more cardio, as this was becoming shameful. True, he was an unnaturally inventive partner, but there was a difference between winded and utterly catatonic. "At this point, we're just being irresponsible."

Percy turned his head, considering her. "You want to stop?"

"That's not what I said. But yes."

"So it is what you said."

"Shut up." She closed her eyes, limbs starting to buzz with that familiar post-carnal euphoria. He was good, no question about that, but she was a Parkinson. He was a Weasley. Nothing had ever been less suited for the future.

"You," she reminded him, "are my accountant."

"I am an accountant," he said. "Not yours."

"Well, whatever you are, we're done here," she said.

"Mm," he replied. Ostensible agreement. "Are you staying the night, then?"

The idea of getting to her feet—putting on clothes, how dreary—was absolutely unacceptable. Walking all the way to the floo? Impossible. She'd already used the toilet. Any further movement was out of the question.

"Yes," she said. "But tomorrow morning, we're done."

She woke to the motion of the mattress as he sat heavily beside her, lacing a pair of trainers. He was wearing some sort of ratty crewneck and a pair of… shorts. How odd.

"I'm off," he said. "Will you be able to let yourself out?"

"What are you doing?" came out of her mouth before she could prevent it.

"Running," he said. "Training, technically. My family's recently decided we're all going to do something called a 'fun run' together," he clarified drily, "though I haven't the slightest idea when the fun's going to come into play."

His family. His family of Weasleys, aka half the reason she needed to leave.

"You could come," he said. "Get a bit of a workout in."

"I thought I'd already had one," she said.

He gave her half a smile, which never looked like something she had earned. Always something she stole unwillingly.

"Well, anyway," he said, rising to his feet. "I'm off, then."

The shorts were ridiculous, but she could see the outline of his quadricep flexing as he stood. She watched the lines of his calves, lingering over the toned muscle of them. It never failed to surprise her what the former Head Boy had kept dutifully hidden beneath his robes.

"Wait," she said, sitting upright. "I'll come, I suppose. Just for the exercise. Something competitive usually helps a workout."

(Up against a tree, her palms pressed flat to the bark. His tongue under the fabric of her athletic shorts, his mouth sucking her through them. A moan, twisting around to look at him, clapping a hand belatedly over the sound. "Lovely day, isn't it?" from a passing jogger. Hidden by the bushes, thank god. Building and building, legs shaking, heart pounding. "Yes, yesyesyes—quite," forced from her lips, followed by a strangled cry.)

"Wonderful," said Percy. "After that we can be done."

"I need a doubles partner for tennis," she said. "My dreadful relatives are coming into town and my uncle always has something to say about my swing, or my nose. I'd like to beat him."

"Don't you know anyone better suited?" asked Percy. "Possibly someone with which you have something in common?"

"Draco's rubbish on the ground," she said. "Daphne's only leggy in the optical sense."

"Meaning?"

"No one but you," she concluded tartly, resenting having to spell it out. "Though of course, if you're busy—"

"I'm not busy," he assured her.

(In the locker rooms, her back pressed to the wooden bench. The door locked, handle jiggling, voices swearing impatiently just outside. One leg over his shoulder, the other thrown to the floor for leverage. Pressure mounting, abdomen aching, a cramp in the arch of her foot. A moan: "Harder, Weasley!" A whisper in her ear: "You'll come when I say you can come, Miss Parkinson."
"We'd better win," she warned him. "I'm very competitive."

"We will," he assured her. "I'm very good at tennis."

"Since we're getting all this running in," he said. "I don't suppose you'd like to come for a family game of rugby."

"Rugby?"

"My father's enamored. Mostly I have the sense that everyone on the pitch is a beater in one form or another."

"Are they?" she echoed, dismayed and intrigued. "How utterly barbaric."

"True, but you'd get to antagonize the members of my family," he pointed out. "My sister in particular has a tendency for physical violence."

Pansy bristled. "And you think she's better than I am?"

"Not at all," Percy assured her. "Hence your invitation."

(In his childhood bedroom, a fraction the size of her own and still somehow shared with his brothers. Standing up, her back to the wall, his hands curved around her backside. Watching him slide into her, in and out. Deeper, deeper, hands above her head. His lips on her breasts, his tongue, his teeth. "Did you take girls here?" "One or two. "Were they as good as me?" "Careful, Miss Parkinson. I might take that as an indication you'd like to stay.")

"Well," she said stiffly. "So long as your family doesn't mistake this for anything serious."

"I'm sure they think it unlikely anyone would take me seriously," said Percy.

"Oh, don't be so tragic," Pansy sighed. "And anyway, this doesn't mean anything. It's just a favor, so don't get your hopes up."

"I wouldn't," he assured her. "As a rule, I don't."

"Are you… dating?" asked Daphne, bewildered.

"Not even remotely," said Pansy. "By the way, you don't have any exercise-related events you need to attend, do you?"

"Me? No," Daphne said, making a face. "Though my mother's been trying incessantly to convince me to go on some sort of yoga retreat."

"Ridiculous," scoffed Pansy.

"I know," Daphne agreed.

(Outside, on the grass, everyone else in bed. Last minute thing, forced into it, needed someone to come along, he understood. Yoga side by side, their clothes soaked through with sweat. Licking salt from his skin, mouth watering. "Yes, god, Percy, yes—" One hand over her mouth, catching a gasp. "This is a silent retreat, Miss Parkinson." Grass stains on her sports bra, blooming bright "Are you sure you don't like him?" Daphne asked.

"What on earth would there be to like?" Pansy said crossly. "We've nothing in common."

"I don't know. Does there have to be something? Sometimes it's enough to just…" A shrug, dainty as ever. "Want someone around."

"Polo?" he asked.

(In the stables, on the hay.)

"Swimming," she said.

(In the showers, on her knees.)

"Golf," he suggested.

(Skirts shoved up above the sink.)

"Badminton," she supplied.

(Trousers unzipped by the pool.)

"What should we do now?" she asked, turning to look at him.

He slid a hand down, fingers brushing hers.

"I have a book I'd like to read," he said. "Perhaps you might have one as well."

"But there's nothing competitive about reading," she said.

"No," he agreed. "There's not."

He sat up on the bed, reaching for a pair of glasses and his book. He opened it, finding his page, and began reading.

Pansy rolled onto her side, looking up at him.

"What are you reading?" she asked.

"Muggles?"

"Rival bloodlines," he explained. "Brother against brother. That sort of thing."

"Oh." She paused. "I like history," she remarked.

Percy patted the empty space next to him on the bed, beckoning her. She hesitated, but ultimately conceded to sit, settling herself beside him.

"Shall I read aloud?" he asked her.
She never liked things being left unfinished. If she let him start reading now, she'd be there all night.

(In his bed, wrapped in his arms until morning, growing drowsy from the sound of his breathing. In, out. In, out. His lips beside her cheek. Thinking he's asleep, "I like you." His arms tightening around her, secure. "I like you, too.")

"Yes, please," she said.

He gave her half a smile. They came more freely now, so long as it was her.

"Alright," he said, slipping an arm around her. "This could take a while."

"Fine," she said; a little bit sore, moderately exhausted.

Privately, she rather hoped it would.

Chapter End Notes

Quite similar to Survival Techniques (ch. 97), but I am what I am, which is trash.
Robotics wasn't exactly a popular thing to do at any high school except theirs. Here, though, the robotics team were practically gods. Every year the Slytherin Academy of Science and Technology took first place in the national high school robotics competition, and the only reason that year was any different was because there was a girl on the team.

(Pansy. Pansy was the girl.)

Things got off to a rocky start when Pansy was picked initially, owing to the small technicality that she had never actually done this before. Her dad was rich, obviously, but that was due to some biochemical, pharmaceutical mumbo-jumbo Pansy only half understood and had zero time for. But robotics was Draco's thing, and because he was naturally a dick and also the son of Lucius Malfoy —aka the biggest for-profit weapons manufacturer in the developed world—he was properly outraged that a girl with no experience was randomly assigned to his team at the last second.

"What has she even done?" he demanded of Slughorn. "She writes code! She can't build a bot!"

In response, Pansy took out her own bot, which was really more of a pod. It wasn't great, but she had programmed it with a laser, which quite helpfully burned the shit out of his bot's retractable claw.

For a moment, Draco said nothing, staring at the place his parts should have been.

"Okay fine," Draco said, shoving the remote into Crabbe's hands. "But if she's going to be on the team, then she's working with me."

It turned out there was a lot of time to discuss things that weren't bots while Pansy ran tests or Draco fiddled with things she didn't understand. (She really wasn't into hardware and had only wound up doing this because Slughorn had bullied her into it, plus she desperately needed some extracurriculars on her university applications that weren't another one of her mother's 'philanthropies.') Once Draco sorted out she wasn't completely useless, he wasn't that difficult to get along with. He also seemed to have forgotten entirely that she was a girl, but that was probably best. She suspected he might not have been so open with her otherwise.
"What's it like being Lucius Malfoy's son?" she asked him once.

"Oh, you know how it is," he said, though she didn't, technically. "High expectations. Impossible ones. And he and I have totally different ideas about what I should do with my life."

"Yeah, my mum's always trying to get me to do... I don't know. Ballet or something." Maybe she did know how it was.

"Anyone can dance," Draco said without looking up. "Not everyone can code like you."

"First of all, that's outrageously false," she said, making a face. "And secondly, I think most people would rather date a ballerina than a software engineer."

He paused, looking up at her, and brushed his hair out of his eyes. It was absurdly unfair for him to be so attractive. A person shouldn't be smart and hot, and anyway, she had gone to a school full of nerds for the express purpose of not being distracted.

"You're not just someone to date," he said. "You can really do something with your life. Something big."

It wasn't exactly the compliment she was looking for, but she figured it could have been worse.

"Whatever," she said.

"Not whatever," he corrected her. "My dad builds bombs and guns and shit. You think that's something? It's nothing. I hate it, but it's what everyone expects me to do."

"Well if I'm not someone to date, then you're not someone to do whatever your father does," Pansy advised him.

He shrugged, returning his attention to his bot. "Easy for you to say."

With her software running his bot, they won handily. Slytherin took their fifth straight gold at nationals along with the prize money, and Pansy got early admission and a scholarship to MIT.

Draco got into CalTech shortly after. They said goodbye on graduation night, the day before he flew out to meet his parents in Paris.

"Guess this is it," said Draco.

"Guess so," Pansy said.

They had gone to prom together as friends. Mostly they spent the night talking about video games and the likelihood of terraforming life on Mars. Draco was highly elitist, the worst kind of intellectual snob. Pansy was, too, whenever she cared to admit it.

It was why they got along so well: they hated all the same things.

"Well, stay in touch," said Draco impassively, though his mind seemed to be elsewhere. He had already said something about how the hottest girls were in France, which was where he would be for the whole summer. He'd probably lose his virginity to someone tall and tan and blonde.

"Sure," she replied, forcing a smile.

She was fairly certain they would never speak again.
Pansy focused mostly on school after arriving in Cambridge, competing in various hackathons and frustrating all the male CS majors until they cried about the injustice of affirmative action. She slept with her Algorithms and Computations T.A. freshman year and decided sex was less fun than coding. She didn't have time for robotics, though when NASA hosted their national competition for college students on MIT's campus, she showed up to support the handful of friends she had on the electrical engineering track.

She caught a glimpse of his blond hair and turned away, startled and unprepared. He, meanwhile, saw her and didn't hesitate.

"Parkinson!" he half-shouted, striding across the room to her. This was a big thing in their world, so the room was packed and noisy. He forced through the crowd to reach her, breathless by the time he got to her side. "Fuck," he swore as he tugged her into a distracted hug. "you don't have a bot in this thing, do you?"

Jesus, he had clearly been working out. How fucking unfair was that?

"What? No," she managed, trying not to stare at his biceps. Or his abs. Which she could see through his white t-shirt. "Um, no, I'm just… you know. Watching."

"Thank god," he exhaled, shaking his head with relief. "You're the one thing I can't beat."

_Same_, she thought silently.

"Want to get dinner later? My treat, since I'm totally winning this thing." He smirked at her, princely and deliberate.

"Oh, yeah, I think I c-"

"Hey, Ironman!" called someone from the CalTech engineering team, interrupting as they passed and nearly shoving her into him in the process. "You coming?"

"Ironman?" Pansy echoed, and Draco rolled his eyes, jogging away.

"It's nothing. See you tonight," he called, disappearing into the crowd.

It wasn't romantic or anything. Just conversation over burrito bowls. He was interviewing at NASA and SpaceX, he said. This latest robotics win—one in a string of college robotics wins—would hopefully clinch a job in one of their development departments.

"What about Malfoy Industries?" she asked.

He hesitated. "Well… you know." His fingers drummed against the table. "It's just not my thing."

"I know. But maybe you could turn it around? Do something different?"

"Maybe. Probably not. What about you?" he asked evasively, reaching for his glass. "Something genius, I hope."

"I don't know," she said. "Guess I'll work for a startup or something."

Draco paused with the glass halfway to his lips.

"You're a genius, you know that?" he told her. "You're fucking brilliant, so don't waste it. Do something big."

She bristled a little. "Are you implying that I'm small if I don't?"

When his grey gaze fell on hers, she wished she had said nothing.

"Whatever, didn't mean to piss you off," he said, with his usual air of not particularly caring who he pissed off when he talked. "But hey listen, I'm glad we could do this."

"Yeah." She chewed her lip, feeling positively tiny. "Yeah, me too."

---

They stayed in touch this time. She dated a few guys who looked like cheap imitations of him, but nothing stuck. For six months he drifted away, busy with a new girlfriend and work, but when he came back he was inexplicably weird.

"Can I come to California and see you?" he asked, sounding jittery. He was in London working for his father by then. Apparently the position with NASA had fallen through, or some truer reason he wasn't going to tell her.

"Sure," said Pansy.

When he showed up at her door, he had a duffel bag slung over his shoulder, effortless. He was wearing a cashmere hoodie, the bastard. It fit his chest so perfectly she wanted to crawl inside it and never leave.

"My Uber driver was a fucking idiot," Draco announced, letting the bag fall the moment he walked inside.

"Uh," said Pansy, watching him wander into her kitchen. "How long are you staying, exactly?"

He had already claimed her space, pulling a beer from her fridge.

"Until I've had a great idea," he said. "So I guess that depends on you."

---

They were absolutely high on Red Bull and cheap beer when they thought of it: a self-driving electric car with an augmented reality feature built into the GPS so it would tell you in real time, right there on the road, where to turn.

"Can't tell my dad," Draco said once the buzz from caffeine started to wear off, leaving him slumped down in her sofa. "He'll turn it into a tank and sell it to North Korea."

"Can't tell my boss," Pansy agreed, legs curled under her on the floor. Her current project manager was a total brogrammer who absolutely refused to even so much as glance at her ideas. "I mean, we could," she amended, shrugging. "He'd just ignore me."

Draco sat up, shoving aside his sketches. He was a gifted artist, really talented. She had already known that, but she never got tired of watching him build things. He could dream them up inside his head and commit them to any medium he wanted. He could frame that drawing and put it in the goddamn Louvre and people would line up for it like the Mona Lisa.

"Fuck, I'm so in love with you," Draco said, a bizarre mirror of her exact thought, and Pansy blinked, wondering for a second if she'd imagined it. "I don't know why I've never told you before."

She forced a swallow, setting down her beer.

This couldn't be happening.

Could it?

"You're drunk," she said slowly.

He scoffed. "Barely."

"Delirious, then."

"On what? This?" He shoved the graphic paper aside, settling himself next to her on his knees, and she stared at him. "I could do this, Pansy," he told her, so close she could see the motion of his swallow. "I could do it for a lifetime."

"Do what?"

"Build things with you." She could practically taste the IPA he'd drunk. "I'll quit my job tomorrow. You and me, let's do this."

"The… the car?" Pansy asked, her heart pounding. "Or—?"

"Both. The car, yeah, but this, too. Us, let's do it."

"Draco, you're being crazy. You're just saying that because you're here, and because—"

He leaned forward, taking her face with both hands, and kissed her so resoundingly she forgot how to breathe, how to speak, how to do anything except kiss him back, her hands running helplessly down his ribs and climbing up the shape of his shoulders.

"Only came here 'cause I couldn't do it," he murmured to her lips. "Couldn't be the guy who wasn't yours."

She really needed to have a talk with him about not being so entitled. Tomorrow, she told herself. Tomorrow they'd have that talk.

She kissed him again, sweeter this time.

"Know any VCs?" she asked him.

"Fuck yeah, plenty. Your code and my build? We'll have offers down the block." He bumped her shoulder with his forehead, half-nuzzle, half-nudge. "Come on, Parkinson. Let's do something big."

Yeah, she thought. Yeah, Ironman, let's do it.

"Alright, Malfoy," she said. "I'm in."

Chapter End Notes

I don't think I would have even attempted this pairing three years ago… probably not
It was unfortunate that one of the markers of polite society was order, as it meant there would always be some sort of police scuttling around the realms to upend a perfectly decent Thursday. Even with the expansion of the sentient universe—even with all of space to explore—the Ministry of Magic was quick to enforce a system of intergalactic Aurors whose job it was to make the joyous freedom of uninhibited space flight 64% less fun. Humans, according to the Ministry, couldn't be trusted to behave honorably under most (or any) circumstances.

Naturally, Theo couldn't imagine why that would be.

"It's happening again," said Hermione, who was, in order of her proficiencies, an excellent captain, a moderately gifted thief, and a stunningly irreverent nag. They were being flagged down by an Auror ship yet again, the communication light blinking on the dash for some new and unavoidable castigation. "Did you check the heat pipe before we left?"

"Of course not," Theo said. "I wasn't in the mood to ruin my day."

"The heat shield, then?"

"No."

"The droplet radiator?"

"You may list all the things you like, Madame," Theo assured her grandly. "As you know, we won't be able to fix anything on this abominable heap of junk until we finish this job."

"Well, balls," was Hermione's final ruling, leaning over to fiddle with the dials on the intergalactic radio. "Sorry, what seems to be the problem, sir? Over."

Sir? mouthed Theo. Hermione shrugged, impassive. He mostly hoped it wasn't anything requiring a fine. True, they never paid any, but the paperwork for new identities each time they accrued one was getting tiresome.

"Your location transmitter is off," came the voice over the radio. "We nearly crashed into you before realizing there was something unlabeled on the map."
"Fancy map," mouthed Theo, as staying off of one was precisely what they'd intended from the start. Again, though, Hermione shrugged.

"Do you realize how dangerous this is?" demanded the Auror. "Over."

"Is it?" asked Hermione. "Hm. Odd we were never informed, over."

There was a moment of silence wherein Theo and Hermione exchanged a glance, waiting.

"I'm coming aboard," said the Auror. "Lower your wards. Over."

That, Theo thought, was a far worse outcome than a fine.

"Best you didn't," he fumbled to say, leaning over to speak before Hermione could open her mouth. "It's a mess in here. Isn't there some sort of statute we can—"

"No," said the Auror. "Over."

"I wasn't finished," said Theo hotly.

Silence.

"Over," Theo added.

"Let the wards down, Captain. As for your lieutenant, I advise you to order him to stand down as well. Over."

"What happens if we don't comply?" demanded Theo. "Over."

Another pause.

"If you do not remove your wards, we will remove you from the sky," said the Auror. "Over."

Theo had no doubt that was a possibility, seeing as the ship was hardly in proper state for flight to begin with. It could withstand one, maybe two significant blasts before being blissfully knocked out of orbit and exploding to smithereens, but overall it was a gamble, and not even the fun kind.

"Well, alright then," Hermione murmured, turning to Theo. "How bad can it be? Maybe he won't notice anything amiss."

They both turned to look at the abnormally large package stowed away in plain sight and grimaced.

"Sure," said Theo. "I'm sure everything will be fine."

It was obviously a smuggler's ship, though they must not have been particularly good at said smuggling. The moment he got on board, Harry was unsurprised to find that the captain, a sort of half-pretty girl with wild hair, and the lieutenant, a weedy bit of mouthy intemperance, were both young, his age most likely. That being said, Harry was the youngest Auror in about a century and these two were criminals, so it wasn't as if they were on comparable paths; youth notwithstanding.

Harry suspected piracy. Or perhaps he hoped it? Unclear. There were only so many exciting things about being an Auror, truth be told, and right now he needed a big arrest to move up in ranks. For the moment his job was the equivalent of being a muggle policeman, merely stopping ships to inform them their tail lights were out.
Dull, to say the least.

"What's this?" Harry asked, kicking the toe of his boot into a box unceremoniously hidden in the corner of their orbital module. They had draped some sort of sheet over it, probably hoping he'd be too distracted by the skinny lieutenant's drawling anecdotes about the weather in space (there was none, hilarious, move on) to notice, but it was clearly unmistakable.

"Nothing," said the lieutenant. "Tea."

"Tea?" echoed Harry skeptically.

"Well, we're British, aren't we?" asked the captain, though she gave her lieutenant a look suggesting she wished he'd said anything else.

"I suppose we'll find out," said Harry, pulling out his wand.

"No, wait," the captain cut in hastily, rushing towards him. "I… I wouldn't."

Harry turned over his shoulder, frowning at her. "You realize that's not going to stop me, don't you?"

"Marvelous. So chivalry is dead, then," lamented the lieutenant, haughtily patting the captain's shoulder. "Let it go, Granger. Men, as we all suspected, are unrepentant trash."

"No, I just mean… for your safety," she began, and winced. "I just— Well, the thing is—"

"You don't know what's in it," Harry deduced with a sigh, and the captain lifted her chin, meeting his glance with defiance.

"Do you even understand who you work for?" she demanded. "The Ministry is corrupt all the way through. For one thing, their tests for establishing sentience are inherently biased by imperialism, making nearly all colonization of alien life forms a question of slavery—"

But before she could continue, Harry flicked his wand, prying open the lid of the box.

"Well, fine," said the captain, setting her jaw. "If that's how you want to play it, let's play."

Hermione had been perfectly willing to get along until the Auror had gone and interrupted her. Men were always interrupting her, thinking aha, a female captain, easy to trip over, delightful to step on. She had been concerned about his safety initially, but that was obviously nonsense now. Instead she cast her own spell, locking all three of them (and the box) into the orbiting module.

"You realize this is an abduction now, don't you?" Theo whispered to her, but that was Theo. All mouth, no action. "You're effectively kidnapping an Auror! And the one thing we don't do is—"

"Yes, yes, I'm familiar with our excuse for a moral code," Hermione snapped, though she'd already gone ahead and defied what remained of it anyway. The thing about people is there were only two kinds: those who postulated and those who acted. Well, four kinds, actually. Those who postulated, those who acted, those who did neither (who were probably dead now), and then Hermione, a reformed postulator who had become a person of action by necessity.

Space was unsafe, unexplored. It required a certain proficiency at blind leaps.

Besides, it wasn't that she loved this particular way of life. It was simply that she couldn't foresee another.
"Put your wand down," said the Auror, but it was much too late for that. She'd already disarmed him, sending his wand flying across the room to Theo, who for all his uselessness was at least adequate enough to catch the things she threw at him.

"Back away from the box," warned Hermione. 'If you ever plan to get off this ship—"

But just then, there was a low sound from inside the container, and she paused, all three of them intently listening.

"What was that?" demanded Theo, at the same moment the Auror demanded, "Who hired you to smuggle this for them?"

Not that Hermione was paying any attention.

"My father will have your heads for this," muttered a groaning voice from within the box, revealing that perhaps it had never not been an abduction after all.

He'd been trained, of course, for what would happen if he were ever kidnapped. As the son of a high ranking Ministry official, he was a prime candidate for kidnapping: worth his weight in gold—or, even better, in the sort of materials used to traverse galaxies. Unfortunately, the grim reality of kidnapping was that being knocked unconscious and stuffed into a box barely big enough for him to breathe was not a good time to begin revisiting his lessons in hostage negotiation.

"You realize who that is?" came one voice, and Draco blearily glanced up, registering the familiar uniform of a Ministry Auror within his swimming line of sight. "This is a capital offense—the Malfoys could have you both thrown in Azkaban without so much as a trial!"

"Well, this just gets better and better," came another dry voice as Draco tried and failed to orient himself to his new surroundings, squinting into bright white to sudder occasional shocks of motion. "I suppose it's no wonder they offered so much money for this transport—"

"Unhand me," mumbled Draco, swatting away something that turned out to be a frizzy curl.

"Who are you?" demanded something. Someone.

A face, as it were, of a girl belonging to the frizzy curl.

"You don't know who he is?" The Auror's voice again. "For fuck's sake. Who on earth gave you this package?"

"We ask not 'who' so much as 'how much,' Your Eminence," replied the dry voice. "This was enough for an entirely new ship, which tells me exactly as much as I need to know about its contents."

"That's the last time we deal with Snatchers," came the rumble of the girl's voice again, though she had turned over her shoulder to address one of the others.

"Snatchers? No," came the Auror's voice. "This isn't the work of a Snatcher."

"Well, he was dressed like one, wasn't he? In one of those low hoods, and he was—"

At the mention of a hood, Draco's vision swam.

I wish I could say I was sorry about this, said a low voice, but unfortunately, I can't say that I am.
Uncle Tom, wait—!

"I've got to get to the Diagon space station immediately," Draco announced, clambering to his feet before a light flashed, and everything went dark.

For a moment after the entitled blond had been stunned, they all stared at his vacant expression.

"Where were you supposed to deliver the package?" asked the Auror.

"We weren't," said Theo, as coolly as possible.

"We were supposed to destroy it," came a thin version of Hermione's voice.

"Well." The Auror straightened, glaring at them both. "A good thing I came along, then. We'll have to take him back to the station on Knockturn, it's closest, and then—"

"Don't be an idiot," snapped Theo, losing all semblance of rationality and rounding on the Auror. "Don't you realize what this is?"

"It's an assassination," Hermione realized aloud, her face nearly as pale as the Malfoy's hair. "We were hired to kill him, and we had no idea."

"We're going to Knockturn," said the Auror firmly. "I need this reported, and then—"

But it was one thing for Theo to come second to Hermione, a fellow ruffian who knew what it was to starve until her next job. It was one thing to be her lieutenant, following the orders she gave because she was usually inhumanly clever and remarkably well connected—perhaps too well connected, in this case—and quite another to respond to some pampered prince of the Ministry church.

So instead, Theo turned and ran, sprinting for the command center.

The Auror's reflexes must have been remarkable, because he pivoted with hardly a breath's hesitation to catch onto Theo's heels in a moment. Not that it mattered; Theo knew this shithole of a ship better than anyone but Hermione, and he had his hand on the apparition lever before the Auror could block his path. Unfortunately, he didn't have enough time to set a destination.

With a jolt, they were sent into hyperspeed, heading straight into empty space.

"You idiot motherfucker," swore the Auror. "We'll die out here. We'll all fucking die, you stupid, mad little—"

"Theo," said Theo. "Call me Theo before we die in space."

The Auror's eyes slid to his, warily at first, and then with palpable loathing.

"Harry," he said.

Then Harry hit him so hard Theo saw stars.

It was supposed to happen one way. She had thought about it carefully, deciding they clearly needed a bit more control than they currently had. He had money, and clout, and thanks to Theo, they desperately needed a safe place to stop for fuel, and also a significant need for fuel itself. She sat by his side and waited, holding a cool cloth to his forehead.
Gradually his eyes opened, revealing a crisp, wintry grey.

"Who are you?" were the first words out of his mouth.

"Don't talk," she advised him. "You've had a rough couple of days in here."

She brushed the tips of her fingers over his cheek, and then his lips. She traced them down to his jaw, then slid them over his bare chest, drawing a thin line down his abdomen until he shivered.

"You're Draco Malfoy, I take it," she said. "Son of Lucius Malfoy. Currently on track for a seat in the Intergalactic Wizengamot, if I'm not mistaken. Being groomed for Minister, even."

"Someone—" He broke off. "Someone wanted me out of the way. My uncle. Well, he's not my biological uncle… it doesn't matter. His name is—"

But he stopped when her fingers brushed his hip, boldly stroking lower.

"Poor thing," she murmured, but he caught her hand stiffly, sitting upright and glaring at her.

"You can't seduce your way out of this," he snapped, shoving her away and rising to his feet. It seemed he was unconcerned with his own nudity, beginning to prowl around for his clothes and glaring at her again when he discovered they were hidden from sight. "You really expect me to forget that it was your job to kill me?"

Abruptly, Hermione did away with her facade, launching upright in annoyance.

"We'll all die unless you help us," she said. "We're in space, and—"

"Yes, I'm aware," snapped Draco.

"No, not—we're in space," she growled more emphatically, suddenly furious with his very existence. After all, none of this would be happening if he had not been so disastrously foolish as to get himself kidnapped and shoved onto her ship. "Open space, Malfoy! Meaning we're going to be splinched," she spat in frustration, "unless you can get us safe passage somewhere soon."

"Splinched?" Rightfully, his expression contorted with distress. With all hyperspeed launches, it was crucial to set an intended landing coordinate. Even someone like him would understand that being 'splinched'—that is, leaping to apparition without a clear destination—was as good as a death sentence unless they found a safe place to stop. "But—"

He stopped, considering something, and rounded on her.

"If I help you," he said slowly, calculatedly, "you'll have to help me."

Unfortunately, naked was not a bad look for him. It was a bit too persuasive.

"Help you do what?"

"Do you have blasters?" he asked. "Dueling proficiency?"

She gave a shrug intended to indicate that she was here, wasn't she? Out in the middle of empty space on a smuggler's ship with an Auror kidnapped on board. It wasn't like she'd gotten this far with any sort of practical ineptitude.

"I need to take down my uncle," he supplied in grim explanation. "In exchange for my help getting us safe passage to Diagon, you'll need to raid the Ministry with me."
"So my options are I die, or I die," Hermione countered, irritated. "Is that it?"

"No," he corrected. "You die for certain, or you chance getting out alive."

"Not good enough," she determined with a scoff, and turned away, though he caught her arm, tugging her backwards.

"I'll buy you safe passage out, if you want," he said. "Clear up the little misunderstanding you obviously have with the Ministry Auror you've unlawfully dragged aboard. Or," he began, and stopped.

She waited impatiently, tapping her foot. "Or what?"

Right about then she thought for the second time that things were going to a certain way. He was going to shove her against the wall of the ship, tug at her trousers and fuck her too-roughly until she faked a moan and he had what he wanted. That was how things went, after all.

He stepped towards her, backing her into the wall (prophecy part one) and slid one hand up her thigh, letting it settle.

"I need a wife," he said, startling her into silence. "Ministry politics are brutal, dangerous. Even if I kill my uncle, someone else will come for me, and someone after that. The galaxy is changing, and I need someone who can handle herself. Someone to rule beside me."

He glanced down, stroking his thumb over her hip through the fabric.

"You'll do," he murmured.

It was possible she'd stopped breathing.

"Fuck you," she said, or possibly whispered.

He smiled at her, thinly.

"Think about it," he told her, and tossed himself backwards onto the cot, eyes falling languidly shut.

"How's that?" asked Theo, checking the restraints on Harry's wrists. "Comfortable?"

Harry, who was currently strapped into one of the emergency landing seats, glared at him.

"Well, I just need to make sure you sit quietly while Granger and her new fancy boy go aboard and sweet talk their way into some fuel," Theo said, folding one leg over the other as he picked up a months-old copy of the Daily Prophet.

Harry stared at him, immediately listless. He hated restraints of any form, and particularly hated having been put there by someone so stupid as to nearly get them all splinched.

"How does it feel," asked Theo without looking up, "being a useless puppet of the Ministry?"

"How does it feel being a useless criminal belonging to nobody and nothing?" Harry retorted bitterly, and Theo glanced up.

He stared for a moment, then rose to his feet, pausing just in front of Harry.
"It feels," he said in a low voice, "incredible."

Harry blinked, startled, and Theo's lips curled into a derisive smile.

"Feels like oblivion," he said, and leaned closer, his mouth brushing Harry's ear. "Tastes like freedom."

Harry stiffened, suddenly aware of Theo's proximity and worse, his absence when he pulled away. He struggled a moment, bracing; though against what, he wasn't entirely sure.

"I used to have a place, you know," Theo drawled. "My father's Sacred Twenty-Eight. I bailed because I hated it, because it was so stifling, all of it. Felt like I was choking all the time, dying of boredom, sick of my cage." He stretched upwards, feline, and rolled out his neck, giving Harry another look of haughty certainty. "You think I'd ever go back?"

"I'm nothing," came out of Harry's mouth before he could prevent it. "No parents. No bloodline to speak of."

Theo's eyes traced him slowly. They were expressive and deep, searching and cold. He spoke volumes without making a sound.

"Shame," he remarked, patently mocking, and turned away.

Theo considered it, pausing, and then turned, obeying out of curiosity, or possibly something else. Something in Harry's veins had already thrilled a little by the time he registered Theo's presence in front of him.

"Loosen the bindings," said Harry.

"No," Theo said lazily.

"Fine," Harry conceded. "Then touch me."

"Where?"

"You know where."

It was the first time Theo had been truly thrown off guard, and it showed on his face. He looked younger, more vulnerable for having encountered it, though it was only for a moment before he had placed one hand on Harry's mouth, stroking the shape of it with the pads of his fingers. Harry let his lips part, Theo's fingers drawn along the chapped edge of one before he eventually moistened them, swallowing.

"The one thing I do have," said Harry, "is a map. A rather useful one, if you wanted."

Theo's free hand slid up his thighs, pausing precisely where he shouldn't.

"I'm listening," he said.

She slid silently into the cot, turning to face him.

"We'll land in Diagon shortly," she said.
"And have you made your decision?" he asked her.

He'd been watching her since their little jaunt for more fuel. She hadn't liked the Death Eaters on the Wiltshire station, but then again, despite having known most of them for the majority of his life, suddenly, neither had he. He didn't like the way they looked at her, like a sweet to be unwrapped. It made him anxious, set his teeth on edge. She, meanwhile, treated them like they were nothing. She had shot one in the shoulder with her blaster just for looking too long at her legs.

At the moment she was naked, which Draco supposed was a decision of sorts. He rolled over her in the cot, sliding the palms of his hands along her upper arms until both were secured locked above her head.

"What I need," he reminded her, "is a wife. Not a mistress. Certainly not a smuggler."

She arched her back placatingly and sat up, nipping his ear.

"No," he said, pushing her back down and watching her eyes widen in the dark. "No."

She glared at him. "But I thought—"

"You will ask to see Tom Riddle alone and he will agree, because he is far too arrogant to think you a threat on your own. You and I will kill him together." Her breathing was unsteady, rising and falling beneath his chest. "Then we will get married, properly. After a decently long engagement. Then I will run for Minister. One day, you and I will rule this galaxy together."

They fit together so perfectly, after all. He had known right away that she had the sort of ruthlessness he needed. Besides, he knew craving when he saw it, and whatever he felt was currently mirrored by her face.

"And until then?" she asked, half-holding her breath.

He glanced down at her body, considering it.

He needed a virginal wife, that was true. Someone acceptable by pureblood standards, which she certainly was not. But 'acceptable' left ample room for interpretation and he'd already seen her handle herself with a blaster, so he slid down her torso, positioning himself between her legs, and adjusted them to drape over his shoulders.

"How long until we land?" he asked, glancing up. She was staring down at him, transfixed.

"Ten minutes. Perhaps less."

"Excellent," he said. "You'll have time to come twice."

Then he put his tongue to better use.

Is the Princess of Wales Expecting?
Daily Prophet Exclusive Coverage
Rita Skeeter, Royal Correspondent

Earlier this week, the Princess of Wales was seen to publicly decline a celebratory glass of champagne, holding her hand delicately to her stomach in apparent refusal. Given how positively joyful Their Royal Highnesses have looked upon their return from their goodwill trip to Pakistan, is it fair to say there is something in the air besides diplomacy? At Hermione's age, there mustn't be any dawdling!

We likely won't see the Prince and Princess again in public until they arrive at Sandringham tomorrow for Christmas, but until then, the Daily Prophet remains your number one source for all things Royal News. Subscribe for more details!

Bonus Daily Prophet Exclusive: Click the link below for our retrospective celebrating two years since the engagement between Hermione Granger and Prince Draco! Includes never before seen footage from the American's lavish thirtieth birthday celebration.

Ah yes, so lavish, definitely not paparazzi photos of me in the car. Well anyway, I suppose this makes perfect sense, doesn't it? Nevermind that Prime Minister Scrimgeour's a warmongering xenophobe—that's certainly not news compared to me declining a glass of champagne. A country in chaos needs only one thing: a reminder that its princess very well spat in the face of tradition by daring to close her own car door (last month's news, though I suspect I'll be paying for that one for weeks yet) and also, speculation about her uterus. For fork's sake, you'd think refusing champagne might be seen as an economical choice after being slammed last month for wearing too much couture. Sometimes I'm too princessy, sometimes not princessy enough… an impossible balance, particularly 'at my age,' which you'd think was positively ancient.

In any case, I am not with child, of course. If I were, that would mean that I would be carrying the next heir to the throne of England, which of course I am not and couldn't possibly be. Yes, I've been a bit ill, and yes, my unmentionables are impossibly tender and perhaps certain things are a bit off, but that would be the jet lag. Or the stress! It's difficult enough battling outrageous feud rumors or misbehaving royal cousins without having to worry about whether I may have put on a few pounds—which is quite a sexist consideration to begin with, though don't get me started on that bowlshirt. When Daphne convinces Draco to wear a velvet dinner jacket he's hailed as a fashion icon representing the dazzling future of the crown, but when I wear velvet it's nothing but 'visible boob darts?!' and "PRINCESS OF WALES CARRYING TRIPLETS" for weeks.

In any case, I can't possibly be pregnant. Obviously.

I'm... pretty sure I'm not.

"Well? Is she or isn't she?"

"I hardly think I should be the one to comment on that," replied Daphne warily, chewing her lip and glancing askance at Theo, who arched a brow over the top of his book. Pansy, Daphne mouthed in explanation, and Theo shrugged, unsurprised. "But really, Pans," she said firmly, "you mustn't bully her, you know how she is—"

"For heaven's sake, Daphne, women have managed to bear children before," came Pansy's usual intolerance for nonsense. "What I can't fathom is why she wouldn't tell us, at least. She's been back for days now, hasn't she? Surely you've seen her."

"Well—" Daphne paused, glancing again at Theo, who held out his hand, expectant. She sighed, placing the phone in his palm, and he lifted it to his ear without looking up from his page.

"Lady Seven-Names," he said coolly, to which Daphne could hear the instant tones of betrayal coming from the receiver. "Yes, yes, I'll scold her later, vigorously I'm sure—but the point is you've got to let Cali come around to these things on her own time. You know she's foreign and exotically delicate." There was another feverish burst of commentary. "Yes, I'm aware." More babbling. "Well, that's a bit uncalled for." Pause. "Of course he hasn't said anything to Abraxas. After all, we can't be cert-" A sharp, biting tone of disagreement. "Well, that's all well and good, Pansy, but as things stand, I think some patience is in order. Yes, I agree. Thank you for being so level-headed about the whole thing. The usual Saturday brunch, you said? Wonderful, we look forward to it. Yes yes, love to you both, goodbye."

He held the phone out to Daphne, who sighed.

"She already hung up, didn't she?"

"Yes, very much so," confirmed Theo, "though truthfully, I can't say I blame her. I don't think any of us can even begin to understand what's going through Cali's mystical head at the moment."

"It's not so unreasonable," Daphne grumbled, nudging Prince Lucius' tartan dog bed aside with her foot before falling ungracefully into Theo's lap. "She just didn't expect anything to happen so soon, that's all. And she does have a way of... Well—"

"Subsisting on denial?" Theo prompted.

"Hesitating," Daphne corrected. "And thinking. Perhaps overthinking." Definitely overthinking, seeing how there were few other conclusions to come to when the signs were showing so undeniably in her recent bust measurements.
"She needs to be ready," Theo summarized succinctly. "Which, unfortunately, she can't be, or at least not as ready as she'd like."

"No," Daphne agreed, leaning her cheek against his shoulder.

They sat in silence for a moment, Theo setting aside his book to make more room for her, and she readily expanded into the vacancy.

"And how are you, darling?" she murmured to him fondly, toying with his collar. "I feel as if we haven't been alone together for ages."

There were so very many international fashion weeks, after all, and while Theo's burgeoning reputation as a high profile philanthropist mostly kept him in London, he had just returned from a week's trip to Barcelona co-chairing a conference on public art in architecture. It was rare they had a moment to themselves.

"Do you know," Theo replied quietly, speaking the words into her hair, "there's not a place on earth I love more than right here, with you?"

"I'm familiar with the feeling." She burrowed down into his side, letting him lazily stroke the inch of bare skin where her jumper had risen above her hip. "Shall we take a sabbatical?" she suggested. "Run away to Greece or something?"

He kissed the top of her head. "Well, I do love when you tease me with absconsion."

Truthfully, they loved their work too much. They had both fought too long for it: her for recognition, him for passion.

But they both knew where home was.

"You know I've arranged to stay in London until after New Year's? Once we're back from Sandringham we'll have a week, at least."

"Of course. And I'll meet you in Paris as soon as the Transfiguration budget is finalized."

"Perfect." And it was.

Eventually they grew drowsy by the fire, his breathing steady and soothing, and it occurred to Daphne once again—a renewed revelation each time, blissfully—that this was comfort like she'd never imagined. A love so bespoke and unfailing that she could trust it to wrap around her with ease, each time a more perfect fit. Perhaps a matter of years ago a moment like this would lead to sex, but by now their love was more than lustful incandescence.

Or, she thought, feeling Theo's fingers begin to trace their way temptingly up her spine, perhaps there was still some of that to burn, too.

The small child barreling into Pansy's legs the moment she hung up with Theo had to be Jamie, not exclusively because Teddy was so remarkably like his mother in terms of maintaining some reasonable amount of decorum (and also only recently able to walk) but also because only Jamie could move so quickly. She was like a bolt of lightning, that girl. As fearless as her father and twice as reckless, if not more.

"Jamie, sweetheart," Pansy sighed, "where's—"
But there was no need to ask, of course. Within moments, Harry had rounded the corner with their one-year-old son thrown over his shoulder, colliding with an arm to Pansy's stomach that sent the whole of her little family crashing into the priceless upholstery of the sitting room's Hanoverian sofa.

"Careful," she half-heartedly scolded, though Jamie had already crawled up somehow, holding Pansy's face tightly between her hands for her undivided attention.

"Mummy," announced Jamie gravely, green eyes wide and preternaturally persuasive, "can we visit Aunt Luna today?"

"Your father will have to take you," Pansy told her, "because Mummy needs to see to something immediately."

"This isn't still about Hermione, is it? Pans," growled Harry, freeing one arm to slide it around Pansy's waist and tug her closer. "She'll come around."

"Since when?" Pansy scoffed. "She's going to go mad, Henry, and perhaps Draco's willing to let it happen, but I'm certainly not."

"Mama," said Teddy, who was not particularly chatty yet, and therefore used frequent mention of Pansy to refer to almost anything unrelated. In this case, it seemed to be

Mother, this is undignified and frankly, unacceptable, or alternately,

Mummy I'm squished.

"Henry, sit up, you're crushing our son," said Pansy, and Harry grinned, peeling upright only to launch a wriggling Teddy onto his shoulders. She had intended to name their second child after Draco, naturally, until Blaise had insisted the better name would be his favorite fictional character: Edward, the Black Prince from A Knight's Tale. (Draco cheerfully settled for the middle name, applauding Blaise's sensibilities and earning himself a respectable heaping of points.)

Jamie, meanwhile, had settled herself on Pansy's lap. "Is Aunt Hermione being appalling again?" she asked serenely.

"Immensely," Pansy agreed, ignoring Harry's eye roll, "but it's only because she's frightened of something."

"Mama," said Teddy, which seemed to mean, But Mother, what could the Princess of Wales possibly be frightened of? or, alternately, Daddy's hair is an atrocity.

"Ouch," said Harry, reaching up to relax Teddy's grip on his roots.

"But you said Aunt Hermione's brave," insisted Jamie. "Isn't she?"

Pansy sighed. As far as she could tell, parenting was mostly a series of being called out by her children for things she had mistakenly said when she thought they weren't listening. "Even brave people encounter frightening things sometimes," she explained, or tried to. "It's not bad to be scared so long as you face your fears. Or at least accept help if you need it," she added with a grumble, "which Hermione certainly needs—"

"And which Mummy does all the time," Harry interjected. "Doesn't she?"

Pansy opened her mouth to tell him to be quiet—she was busy teaching her daughter a lesson or something—but of course he reached out, taking hold of her chin and kissing her silent.

"Yeeuuuuuck," whined Jamie, sliding bonelessly from Pansy's lap to the floor.
But Harry only pulled away with a smile, leaving Pansy to bask in the gleam of it.

"Mummy's the bravest person I know," Harry declared, launching to his feet this time as Teddy let out a shriek of hysterical exuberance. "And she always remembers to be… what again, Willow James?"

"KIND," bellowed Jamie, at precisely the moment Teddy announced, "Mama!"

Pansy gave Harry a look of don't sell unnecessary propaganda to our children, and he returned with a look of make sure you've removed that dress before I come back or I'll have to strip it from you myself.

"You're hopeless," sighed Pansy, which was one of many ways she typically said I love you.

Harry smiled. "I know," he said, which meant, like most things he said, exactly what he said.

"Well," said Blaise, removing his helmet, "that was invigorating."

"It was, rather. I'm pleased we ran into each other." Beside him, his companion pulled off his own helmet, running a hand through his silvery-grey hair.

"I suppose I understand now why my son has such a fondness for these," remarked the former Prince of Wales and current Duke of Malfoy, glancing over the handlebars of his borrowed motorbike. "You said this is his spare? Outrageous to think he's got a better one hidden away somewhere," Lucius scoffed, half-impressed.

"Yes, well, he's prince or something," Blaise confirmed with a shrug, and Lucius made a sound suspiciously like a laugh.

"Well, I'm sorry you missed him," he said. "He and Hermione were in something of a hurry to get to Sandringham."

"They're hiding, as I understand it," Blaise replied. "Pansy's already rung me several times this morning about it."

"Yes, Narcissa seems to feel similarly." Lucius leaned back for a moment, tilting his face toward the sky. "Bit brisk for a ride, isn't it?"

"Sometimes that's best," said Blaise. "Clears the head."

"Are you doing much head-clearing these days?"

"A… bit."

"I see. And would this have anything to do with your friendship with the erstwhile Lord Longbottom?"

Outrageous. No longer the heir to the throne and still, there was no detail too small for the Prince of Darkness to inexplicably know.

"He's no longer erstwhile," Blaise said, avoiding the question. "As it turns out, his grandmother didn't properly disinherit him before she passed last month. Neville is now functionally in control of his entire estate, or will be soon." He glanced askance at Lucius, adding, "Terrible oversight on her part."
"Not an oversight, I suspect," Lucius remarked.

There was a moment of pause.

"No," Blaise admitted. "I suppose not."

They sat in silence for a few more minutes before Lucius finally rose to his feet, stretching upright. "A bit of fresh air does these old bones some good," he admitted, and Blaise managed half a laugh.

"I never would have predicted you to join me." That, Blaise thought silently, was worth at least fifty points, if not a hundred. Though of course it would be outrageous to levy points to Prince Lucifer himself.

"I suppose everything I once was is different now. No longer being the future of the crown has a way of changing my perspective," Lucius offered in explanation, adding offhandedly, "I was never very cut out for it to begin with. Always a bit too afraid to break something."

"Ah." Blaise glanced down. "Yes, I know the feeling."

There was another lengthy pause.

"You know, I'm sure, that your friendship with the young Earl is not something my father approves much of when it comes to Draco's inner circle," remarked Lucius, prompting Blaise to inwardly flinch. "Lord Longbottom has been subject to quite a lot of controversy over the last year or so."

One would not imagine sexuality to still be such a despicable thing in 2019, but then again, the English aristocracy was its own beast. "And to think," Blaise commented drily, "I'm the one who's supposed to be the last of the Bad Lads."

Lucius removed his gloves carefully, one fingertip at a time. "It's an old world we come from," he remarked off-handedly. "Old traditions. Old values. And yet," an afterthought, "much of what we consider normal has only been normal for perhaps a century or two, hardly more."

"Is there some other normal we ought to concern ourselves with besides that one?" Blaise prompted coolly, though he knew the answer well enough. The truth of his isolation would be as it had always been.

Lucius looked up, fixing Blaise with the grey gaze so like his oldest friend's.

"Is it only friendship between you?" he asked.

"Yes," Blaise said.

A pause.

"Is it only friendship between you," Lucius clarified slowly, "because you are afraid to break something?"

They'd been dating other people casually for a year, trying to be friends. It was going so well, so smoothly, like the mechanizations of muscle memory: brunch from time to time, coffee in the late afternoons, occasional dinners that bled into drinks. The stakes belonging to this iteration of them were as Blaise preferred them: low to none.

Naturally, Neville had ruined it.

It's only you I want, said Neville, revisiting some weighty truth they'd both been trying for months to ignore. Let's have Christmas in my bed, Blaise. Let me kiss you on New Year's Eve. Give us a chance to be holiday-bright, shiny and new, like normal people.

And if what we are is old and misshapen?

Then let's find out once and for all.

"Ten points to the Prince of Darkness," murmured Blaise, unthinking, and narrowly, Lucius permitted a smile.

"Invite him to Sandringham," he suggested. "From what I understand, my son will happily welcome whatever guest you choose to bring, and I doubt Hermione would disagree."

"I'd need the King's permission," Blaise pointed out, but Lucius, recently the sort of man who was no longer ruled by considerations of such things, gave a light, dispassionate shrug.

"Don't worry about my father," Lucius said. "I'll handle it."

He straightened, setting the helmet atop the motorbike's handlebars.

"It's good to clear one's head, isn't it?" he said, and at a nod from Blaise, he turned on his heel, heading back into the house.

Hermione, it's Daphne. Listen, we don't have to talk about the tabloids, but if you'd like to just have a chat—

Hermione, this is absurd. Do you plan to ignore us forever? I know you've been in London for days. Winky's already called me twice to confirm I won't be serving raw fish at the Christmas brunch Harry and I are hosting. Why on earth do you suppose she would ask me that, hm? The job isn't just Draco, the job was always partially bearing Draco's child—

Cali, I know you've never liked champagne. It's that cigar habit you've got to watch out for. Straight to voicemail, is it? MINUS TEN! Though, plus five for royal panache. Listen, about Sandringham—

I have two children, Hermione. Two. As we speak Harry is willfully trying for a third—Henry, please. I'm on the phone—and all things considered, if you're going to make such a fuss about something so abysmally normal, I'm going to have t—

Hello, sunshine! Dad and I are having a wonderful time in Australia, we may never leave. Thank Dobby again for the wonderful suggestions, will you? By the way, you would tell me if you were pregnant, wouldn't you? The tabloids down here seem to think you're going to have twins any day now—

Hermione. It's Narcissa. I suppose you ought to know that when I discovered I was pregnant with Draco I tried to throw myself down a flight of stairs in Kensington Palace. I felt woefully inadequate, for what I assume are obvious reasons. Countless eyes, always judging. In the end I—

"Narcissa," Hermione said breathlessly.

"Did you, um—" Where to begin. "Did you say—?"
"Stairs," Narcissa confirmed. "Ironic, considering what happened years later with Lucius and the pills, but… bygones, as they say," she concluded evasively.

"Oh." Hermione's fingers tightened around the phone.

"It's rather not my finest moment, but in any case I understand what you must be going through. I was you once, not so long ago, if you recall. Though, I was only twenty-two at the time," Narcissa reminded her with a sniff of disapproval. "You, meanwhile, are at a perfectly acceptable age to bear children. Aren't you in your thirties now?"

"I just turned thirty," Hermione insisted, immediately defensive, and Narcissa gave another tired sigh.

"My dear, youth is positively overrated," she said, half-scolding. "No one knows anything at all until they're at least twenty-five, and even then it's highly questionable."

"Well, I'm…" Hermione faltered. "This isn't about my age, it's—"

"Of course it is, and of course it isn't. It's about everything, in the end, isn't it? This kingdom will only put your value on your face or your womb, no exceptions. And now you have concerns about both, I take it?"

Hermione hesitated.

"I do know you, Hermione," Narcissa reminded her crisply. "I was in your place once. I can assure you now that whatever it is you are facing, you cannot do so alone. It is, perhaps, the best possible way to crumble, and that is the one thing I have repeatedly mentioned you must never do."

"But—" Hermione swallowed. "But do you think it's possible that I'm… still quite unsuited for all this? It hasn't been the easiest year."

(Too thin. Too old. Too familiar. Too elitist. Too outspoken. Too American. Not British enough, not royal enough, not good enough. Sometimes she glanced down at her unpainted nails, long and unblemished, and failed to recognize her own hands.)

On the other end of the line, there was a long, steady pause.

"In every conceivable way there is to fail as a mother, I have done it," said Narcissa matter-of-factly. "And still, somehow, I have the perfect son. So I think perhaps there is no such thing as suitability, is there?"

It wasn't a question requiring an answer. Instead, Hermione glanced up at Draco, who was sleeping with his head against the car window. One hand was resting comfortably on her knee, and she reached down to brush his fingers with hers. At least one thing remained reliably constant.

"I suppose I should go," murmured Hermione into the phone. "We'll be in Norfolk soon."

"Good," said Narcissa, and hung up.

By then Draco had stirred, eyes blearily opening to find her watching him.

"Who was that?" he asked, gesturing to the phone.

"Just Winky with some last minute details," said Hermione.

He had been terribly patient with her. She had spoken to the family doctor in private that morning, revealing nothing. Prior to their departure she had spoken alone with the staff, suggesting certain changes to their usual grocery purchases in the interest of improving their nutrition. Over the past couple of weeks she had excused herself more often than usual, and not once had he questioned or pushed her.

He had said only one thing of relevance, which was, "I had a dream I met our daughter."

Hermione said nothing, and Draco continued, "She had your hair and my eyes. Very bookish. In fact, she was telling me about a book she'd just finished, and I thought my god, you're just like your mother. So thoughtful, so bright. So terribly uninterested in tennis." He paused. "She had a laugh like your mum's and a smile like my grandfather's." Then he kissed the top of Hermione's head, adding softly, "It was a lovely dream."

That was over a week ago.

Today, though, was a different day. A week ago, Hermione was just a woman with a long-missed period and swollen breasts who wanted nothing more than to ignore the signs of something bigger, clinging to the safety of a version of herself that had already slipped away.

Today, she was a different person; her truer self. The more that person came into focus, the less she felt afraid.

"Draco," she said. "I have to tell you something."

Slowly—delicately, like snow falling—he smiled.

They had all flocked to her side without needing to be asked; birds of a feather.

"Well, there was going to be a storm," sniffed Pansy, stiffly allowing herself to be pulled into Harry's lap. "What were we supposed to do, risk our lives by arriving a day later?"

"Lady Seven-Names has it," Theo agreed, settling himself at Daphne's feet while dog-Lucius remained stoically beside the hearth where Jamie had left him. "This was all a simple matter of logistics."

From Daphne, with a sigh: "And because we care about you, of course."

From Pansy, with a grumble: "Now you've done it. That'll go straight to her head."

From Draco, indignantly: "What about me? I haven't seen any of you in at least a month."

From Theo, grandly: "Yes, and now, at long last, the light of the throne shines upon us!"

From Harry, grinning: "We were blind, but now we see."

From Blaise, who folded one long leg over the other from the corner of the sofa: "Ten each to Lord Potter and Associates for sass, though it'll be twenty total to Lord Nott if he can manage to start another feud rumor before day breaks upon the Yule."

Pansy, with a disapproving scoff: "Please. Make it a real feud or get out of the sandbox."

Harry, with a sidelong glance: "Whose side are you on?"

Pansy, matter-of-factly: "The crown's, of course. Though as the father of my children, I would prefer you not embarrass yourself or your progeny."
Harry: "Thank you, sweetheart. I love you too."

Hermione, with a roll of her eyes: "For what's worth, you were all quite unnecessarily worried about my sanity."

Daphne, loyally aghast: "I wasn't!"

Theo: "Yes, she was charmingly apprehensive, which is its own delightful category."

Blaise: "True."

Daphne, expectantly: "…No points?"

Blaise, with a sage nudge of invisible spectacles up his nose: "If I gave you points for that now, I'd be forced to eventually award the whole game to Princess New Tracey."

Pansy, with a shudder of dismay: "You shut your mouth."

Hermione, loudly: "None taken, and anyway, the point is, everything's fine. Though we're glad you're all here for this, of course. You too, Neville."

From Neville, who was also there, and who was in fact frequently there these days, although previously in the slightly different context of amicably platonic pretense: "Yes, thank you, this is all very new and exciting."

Blaise: "We wouldn't have missed it. Well, correction, we would have—"

Neville, assuringly: "But we didn't, and that's what's important."

Blaise: "More like what's factual, which is so close the Venn diagram is all but a circle as far as I'm concerned."

Theo, cheerily as ever: "Personally, I'm only here because I heard there was some theoretical news to be shared. Something about… what was it, Greengrass? A tapeworm? Some sort of parasitic growth?"

Daphne: "Don't be ridiculous, Nott. It's that Draco's got another saucy jacket."

Draco, royally pleased: "It's silk jacquard and believe me, it's pure cheek."

Blaise, pinky aloft: "It's about time someone else join me in silks. I've been saying this for years."

Pansy, frowning with either displeasure or intense concentration: "I don't think I've ever seen Draco in something other than tails or a navy suit."

Theo: "Yes, as I recall it was nappies, kilts, then straight into navy suits."

Harry: "There was a brief period of kicky short-pants, don't forget those."

Blaise: "Not to mention the Etonian era, which to my recollection involved a sparse amount of tribal jewelry and a great deal of unnecessary stripes."

Draco, bewildered: "Are you referring to my rugby uniform? Harry wore it too, as you might recall."

Blaise: "Is that what that was? Strange."
Draco, with a sigh: "This group desperately needs new members."

Theo: "Well, there's only a few good years left to get to work, isn't there? One of us will have to do it soon or risk extinction."

Blaise: "Yes, the little science girl with plaits says we've only got twelve left. Personally I've sworn to buy all my ceremonial hats vintage, specifically for the cause."

Daphne: "I had no idea you were such an environmentalist, Blaise."

Neville: "He was taken in by the 'how dare you' bits, I suspect."

Blaise: "You know perfectly well I prefer my outrage in excess."

The group, in unison: "Excess or death!"

Blaise: "—and here we have the source of our global pandemic, but yes. Ten points to everyone for avarice, gluttony, et cetera, well done."

Theo: "It was fun while it lasted, but I think we all know a meteor's been justly earned."

Daphne, with a sigh: "Personally I find the whole thing mildly paralyzing."

Theo: "What, the apocalypse? I certainly hope so. I could use the reassurance that some things still come as advertised."

Daphne: "Well, that, but certainly other things. I can't imagine bringing something into this world and then having to explain its carbon footprint. Or immigration policy. Or why anyone ever got a perm, for that matter."

Harry, surprising them: "But that's the thing, though, isn't it? There's so much to show them, good and bad. They're just blank pages waiting to be filled. And you can teach them to see fear or hatred or you can teach them to find beauty, to be curious. Ideally, to be smarter than you ever were."

Theo: "Ah, and thus leave the survival of the species to them? Excellent. As plans go, I find it resoundingly flawless."

Pansy, with a perfunctory purse of her lips: "Really, the best thing about it is giving them everything you never had and watching them fail to notice."

Daphne, surprised and a touch skeptical: "The best thing, really?"

Pansy, fixing Daphne with a glance: "My daughter will never know what it is to have a mother who demands her to be something she isn't. My son will never be made to question his worth or what he should be."

Harry, arms wound loosely around Pansy: "My children will know what it is to have invasive family dinners, to be thoroughly embarrassed by their parents at any given moment. Which is, in a way, to never have to wonder how it feels to be supported and adored."

Pansy, with a delicate shrug: "So if they take it for granted, good. That is the privilege I want for them, far more than titles or wealth: To not even wonder whether the world ought to look any differently, because the one they know is only love."

From everyone: momentary silence.
Theo: "Well, you've gone and ruined the joke, you bawdy vagrants. Now how are we supposed to lament the failures of humanity?"

Daphne, arching a brow: "Assuming there's anything relevant to announce, that is."

Slowly, everyone's heads swiveled to Hermione, expectant. She glanced at Draco, who shrugged (pretending, as it were, that he was not presently vibrating silently with suppressed excitement), and she sighed, finding that to be as good a moment as any.

Funny how something shared between eight people could still be intensely private, perfectly intimate. Something precious and delicate and yet belonging to others beyond herself, as every piece of her life would be from this day on. Hermione supposed she had forgotten that wasn't the same as performing for an audience of millions.

This was life, and it was meant to be shared.

"I want this for them," Hermione confessed, looking around the room. "I want them to know what it feels like to be surrounded by everyone they love most."

It was a confession even if it technically wasn't; and beside her, Draco reached for her hand, raising it to his lips in a familiar gesture, comforting and sure. Marriage was the same, really, even if it was inexplicably different. Initially she'd believed nothing post-nuptials had changed—they loved each other, so naturally they'd gotten married to keep it that way—but in reality, theirs was a constantly changing enterprise, every day a slightly different turn. Each one was a new piece of shared history, the building of a future still to come.

"Not so scary anymore?" Draco asked, and Hermione exhaled with a smile.

"No," she agreed. "Not anymore."

You'd think with everything I've gone through I'd have lost a bit of my old apprehension by now, but Pansy's right, I grudgingly suspect, that fear isn't about the absence of some hardier fibers, but a process of repeatedly learning to overcome. Facing life head-on and saying yes, I'll be ready for this, but even if I'm not, I'm not alone. I suppose I forgot that for a moment, but that's something to teach my child, isn't it? That no matter how old you get, there are always new challenges. New roads that become new adventures, and being brave enough to love can make you strong.

I'll tell Rita eventually. Or I'll leak it to Gilderoy just to spite her, whatever happens first. For now, though, it's enough to tell the man I love, and to let him hold me in his arms, because when he holds me, he holds you, too. And I guess all this time I've really been talking to you, haven't I? Even if I didn't know it yet.

Welcome to the world, Baby Wales. I can't wait for you to see it.

Chapter End Notes

This story was just… So Much, you know? Hard to shove all the pieces of everything it was into something short, but I hope this was something close! (Also, I have a ton of comments I need to respond to, esp. my lady engineers. I see you!)
"Listen girly, I don't need to explain the details of what you've done wrong and I'm guessing you don't need to hear it. Obviously you stepped on my turf, and I ain't buying that's an accident—out here, the drugs are mine, the profit's mine... everything the sun touches? Mine. Simple rules, and you're too pretty to let this get ugly. Got big dreams, little rich girl? Bet you do. This town's a small pond with a lot of big fucking fish, and you—what are you, Pali? Nah, Malibu, I'll bet—you're a goddamn minnow."

"Did you rehearse that in the car?" asked Daphne.

Scabior smiled broadly, all teeth.

"Just get me the money in forty-eight hours, sweetheart," he said.

"Better," she noted, approving. "Neater without the excess threats. I mean, I admire the showmanship, you know? But it's just kind of a lot."

Scabior rolled his eyes, beckoning to his comrades. "These L.A. bitches," he said to no one. "They're fucking fearless. Too much money. Think they're untouchable and they're almost right." He slid a glance at her. "Which is why I don't miss when I take a shot at one."

Deep down, she was a little scared.

Just a little.

"I'll get you your money, shitbag," she said.

Scabior called her bluff with a wink. "See you back here in two days, princess," he replied, stepping into his Camaro and heading back down Saddle Peak.

"Okay, here's what we're gonna do," she said in a low voice, pulling a pre-grumbling Draco aside. "We're gonna throw a party."

Naturally, he was in, even if he pretended not to be. "You're planning to make fifty thousand off a high school party? Must be some fucking party."
"I made that much off them once. I'll do it again." Prescription drugs, mostly, but also molly, coke, whatever else she could get her hands on. Basically, whatever anybody wanted, Daphne Greengrass could get. Never touched it herself, obviously, as she liked looking like this and certainly didn't have any interest in corrupting her bloodstream or her brain. Mostly she just liked the thrill of fucking with everyone else. Including the Snatchers, who were basically low level drug dealers. She was in hot water, sure, but she could still get out.

"Why not just get the money from your parents?" Draco asked.

"Are you kidding me? No way," she scoffed. "Viridian'll shit himself. We'll do this grassroots."

"What, like campaign donations?"

"No. Shut up. We'll do... gambling." She smiled broadly, pleased. "Like Vegas. The house gets a cut."

"A cut of what?"

"Doesn't matter. Poker, I guess. Whatever else people bet on." Not that she really knew or cared, but her classmates would. Slytherin Prep was full of celebrity children, tech billionaire offspring, the untalented progeny of entertainment lawyers and plastic surgeons. Even old money like hers had a spot if it could summon the exorbitant funds to pay, and the only commonality more important than their wealth was that they were all bored out of their fucking minds.

"Fucking... ponies or some shit?" Draco asked her, bewildered.

"No. A fight. A tournament or something." The idea came to her with delight. "Can we get Flint? Pucey?" They were older, still doing nothing, but now with an upgrade to hard drugs and threesomes. They ran with a crew that never lasted more than a night in jail before bail was posted and the whole thing forgotten, plus a handwritten apology from the D.A. himself.

Boredom and money, baby. Corruption made the world go round.

"I mean sure, maybe," Draco said, shrugging. "But you have to have a purse, Daph. Reward money and all that, or at least a cut of the house's earnings."

"Yeah, duh. Got it."

"... Do you, Daph?"

"I don't know. Shut up, I'm thinking." One of her secrets? She was fucking good at math, which made her fucking good at business. Also, she knew her customers, and the more illicit activity at the party, the more it would be the thrill of the year. "Yeah, okay. This could work. But if we really want to make bank, we need to fix it."

"Find someone guaranteed to win, you mean?"

She shook her head. "Too risky. No one'll beat Pucey, anyway. We need someone guaranteed to lose."

"Then pay someone to lose. Someone good, though," he cautioned. "If they can't win to begin with, nobody'll place the bet."

Slowly, Daphne's gaze slid across the quad. Crabbe and Goyle, Draco's usual flunkies, had wandered up to one of the weedier kids, needling him with idiocy. His mouth twitched, irritated, but he didn't move.

"Bet Nott's got something lethal stored in the tank," she commented. "Don't you think?"

"No," said Draco. "Don't even think about it."

But it was too late.

"Hey, Nott," Daphne called, rising to her feet and swinging her hips as she walked. "I've got a proposition for you."

Everyone knew who Daphne Greengrass was. Everyone also knew what she kept in her backpack.

"I don't want drugs," muttered Theo the moment she approached.

She rolled her eyes. "Scatter," she suggested to Crabbe and Goyle with a wave of her hand, sending them fumbling to leave before sliding into the seat beside Theo, gracing his empty table with her miniskirt and baby doll tee. "Want to make some money?" she asked him.

"What makes you think I need money?"

"Nobody here needs it," she said. "But burning it sure is fun."

She flashed him a smile, bright as the sun.

He returned his attention to his notes. "What do you want, Greengrass?"

"I'm throwing a party. Thought we'd host a fight." He glanced up again, arching a brow. "Gambling," she said with a shrug.

"You want me to fight?"

Her hand slid over his thigh, her knee nudging his.

"Maybe I do," she murmured.

"You're fixing it, I take it." He wasn't an idiot. "You want me to go down? That'll only work if people bet on me to begin with."

"We'll do one after school for publicity," she said, adding, "I'll let you fight Crabbe and Goyle, if you want."

Crabbe and Goyle, his thick-headed tormentors. Theo didn't fight them because he had a plan. Harvard. Then Harvard Law. A clerkship. Federal judge. Supreme Court Justice. Whatever it took to eventually sit on high and finally fucking look down.

He didn't fight them because he didn't need to.

That didn't mean he couldn't fight them.

"Fine," he said. "After school, then."

"Jesus fuck," said Draco after Crabbe went down with one shot.

Nott straightened, blandly shaking out his hand, and looked up at Daphne.
"See you at the party," he said, and walked out.

Daphne turned to Draco, who was still watching Crabbe.

"What the fuck," Draco said again, transfixed. "He can't just do that."

"Sorry," she said insincerely, "but I told him he could have Crabbe or Goyle in exchange for playing tomorrow night."

Technically she had offered Crabbe and Goyle, but it was probably best Draco didn't hear that.

"Fuck, I don't even care," said Draco, still staring. "Holy shit."

Daphne looked up, watching Theo disappear around the corner behind the band room.

Then she took off after him. First a walk, then a run.

He was waiting when she turned the corner, grabbing her arm and tugging her into him so firmly she gasped.

"You like it, don't you?" he asked her. "Violence."

She kissed him so hard he thought his lips had started bleeding. Turned out no, that was just how she tasted. Coppery and sour-sweet, like blood. He slid a hand under her shirt, just to do it. Just to see. He dug his fingers into her vertebrae and counted the notches to her bra.

"Fuck," she whispered, shuddering when his palm closed around her ribs, and he was suddenly pretty sure she was in more trouble than she pretended to be. A girl like this had real problems, and real problems meant real trouble. He would know.

"What's the money for?" he asked her.

She shoved him and walked away.

She recruited Pansy and Tracey to do helpful things, like wear tight dresses and trick their male classmates into revealing the names of their childhood pets and their mother's birth dates, plus using the face scanner on their phones for what they insisted was 'just a selfie.' They emptied Urquhart's checking and savings before he passed out, then Venmo-ed whatever else they could find into Daphne's account in increments of $4,999 until Daphne's account got flagged for suspicious activity.

It wasn't a bad start, but it wasn't enough. By eleven, Daphne slid her phone away and checked on the booze, which was flowing. These kids were definitely not alright.

"Daph, I need some candy," whined Millicent Bulstrode, daughter of a producer currently being investigated for sex crimes. She was useless; her funds were all tied up in legal bullshit.

"Bathroom," suggested Daphne, spotting someone more interesting down the hall and slipping deftly towards him.

"Hey," she said to Theo, who glanced down at her. He had this way of looking down, slant-eyed, at whoever was speaking to him. It was totally fucking creepy and it thrilled her. "Ready for your fight?"
He said nothing.

Then he took her arm and led her to the coat closet, shoving Draco's mom's furs aside and tugging Daphne in after him.

"What the fuck is this?" he asked her, shutting the door behind them.

She leaned on her toes, kissing him. He hesitated a moment, but let her do it. She pushed and pulled, tugging him closer, but he took hold of her hips and shoved her back.

"What do you need the money for?"

"I owe someone." She licked her lips. "Need fifty thousand by tomorrow."

"I can give you that."

She bristled, annoyed. "I don't want it."

"Why not?"

"Because I," she informed him flatly, "don't need to be saved."

It was dark in there, too dark to see him, but she caught the motion of his hand resting on the wall behind her head. He was leaning into her, first close and then too-close, and she could hear his pulse, feel his breath, taste his excruciating nearness.

"Sure about that?" he murmured.

She tugged him down and kissed him again desperately, furiously, and this time he kissed her back angrily, with spite. One arm was long enough to wrap around her waist, the other used to hold them both upright. She fumbled with his zipper and he laughed, maliciously.

"I'm not doing that in a coat closet," he said. "Fuck off."

She bit his lip. He slid a hand under her bra.

"What do you need me to do?" he muttered.

"Lose," she told him, breathless. "Go down in the last round."

"Fuck you," he said.

She took hold of his face and turned it, drawing his ear closer to her lips. "Do it and I'll fuck you."

He released her, letting her stumble clumsily backwards, and then yanked open the door, leaving without another word.

He was supposed to go down in the last round to Adrian Pucey, who had tormented him for the year he'd played freshman football. Nott Senior considered sports deeply important, so when Theo came home and told him the varsity captain had nearly drowned him in the school's artificial lake, Nott told him to toughen up.

He did.

There weren't that many rounds. Goyle was probably on coke, Flint did steroids, but it didn't matter. Theo was good at this, better than he looked.

When it came to Pucey, though, he played around a little. Slid to the side, too-quick. Did it a few times, just to watch Pucey lose his temper.

"Nott!" shouted Daphne, and he glanced her way.

In a sea of wasted, stumbling teenagers, she alone was clear-eyed and calculated. She wanted him to lose; would make money off him if he did. It wasn't personal, that much was clear. He was a piece of a much larger plan. Probably her life was riding on this, her safety. Was she really that sort of person, the kind born with everything who spent their whole lives trying to throw it away? What a waste, a fucking waste. Jesus. He wanted to put his tongue on her neck and lick her clean.

He gave her a look that said Too bad, and she blinked.

"Nott wait, don't—!

He turned, faking a cross, then threw a hard overhand right, slamming it into Pucey's temple.

Pucey went down and his posse, all coked out and armed beside the makeshift ring, went deaffeningly silent.

By the time Theo leapt over the side and strode to the exit, all the color had drained from Daphne's face. "You fucking idiot," she whispered, her lips as blue and numb as if she'd spent the whole night in the cold.

"Come on," Theo said, taking her by the shoulders and turning her. "Let's go."

Pucey's crew were furious. Theo and Daphne ran.

"Don't worry about it," he told her in the car.

She said nothing.

"I'll figure something out. But I wasn't going to lose to him."

The road up to Saddle Peak was dark and twisting. He had to keep his eyes on the road, his hand on the gearshift. She wanted to look at her phone, which was buzzing with panicked texts from Draco, but knew she'd probably get sick. She didn't have the stomach for this.

"I don't know what your deal is," Theo said after a few minutes of silence, "but if you're just trying to get someone to see you, Greengrass, then fine, I fucking see you. I don't know what you want, I don't know what you think you're missing, but Jesus, don't waste it, don't waste your life. You don't have to be good," he told her, sparing her a fleeting glance. "You just have to be smart."

She closed her eyes, then opened them.

"Pull over," she said.

There were three spots at the top of Saddle Peak and he pulled into the furthest one, shutting off the car. The lights of the city blinked down below on the right, the ocean black and limitless on the left. The sky was hazy, the desert air frigid and cold.

"I bet on you," she said, and he turned to face her.
"What?"

"You don't lose," she mumbled. "I'm not stupid. I never should have asked you to lose."

For a moment, he didn't move. Didn't speak.

"Fuck," he said, and she was sure he would kiss her hard, hatefully, but he didn't.
Instead he slid a hand over her cheek, tender and sorry and awed.

"Now what?" he asked her.

"Don't know." She leaned into his hand. "I don't actually have the money. He's meeting me here in a few hours and I'm not ready, I don't have enough."

"Pucey's thugs would've killed me if we stayed."

"And me. I'm the one who told them he was going to win."

Theo let out a darkened laugh. "So it's Snatchers or thugs, huh?"

"How did you know it was Snatchers?"

"Just a guess."

There was a pause, and then Daphne leaned over with a sigh, flipping the handle on Theo's seat until he shot backwards, lying flat in the driver's seat. She clambered over him, straddling his lap, fingerling his collar. They still had a few hours to make something happen. Maybe Draco would manage to deposit the money from the fight in her account before then.

Maybe not.

"Where're you headed, Nott?" she whispered, running her fingers over the shape of his lips.

As far as she cared, there was one dumb answer and a hell of a lot of smart ones. She had a guess they were both total fucking idiots, and conveniently, he proved her right.

"Wherever you're going, Greengrass," he said, "I'm going too."

Chapter End Notes

I just really enjoy writing these two as anarchist teens. Something a bit more magical tomorrow!
Once upon a time, a handsome prince lived in a shining castle. Although he had everything his heart desired, he was spoiled, selfish, and unkind.

But then, one winter's night, an old beggar woman came to the castle seeking shelter from the bitter cold. Repulsed, the prince turned her away.

"Whatever this is, consider it declined," he said, about to close the door, when the old woman revealed herself to be a young enchantress. The prince glanced over her wild curls, her diminutive form, and added with a derisive sneer, "Not much better, if we're being honest."

"Not everything is about looks, you absolute cockstain," said the witch, raising her wand in her hand.

The prince moved to shut the castle door again but it was too late, for the witch had already seen there was no love in his heart. As punishment, she transformed the prince into a creature—half-man, half-fish—and placed a powerful spell on the castle, concealing it from any who aimed to seek it.

"Where are you going?" demanded the prince, who was now confined to his enchanted cove. He glanced over his silvery-grey scales, frowning at the pearlescent blue, and glanced up again to face her, scowling. "You can't just leave me here."

"I can and I will," replied the witch. "I'll be back to check on you at some point."

"When?"

"None of your business," she told him, though truth be told, she couldn't have told him even if she wanted to. Life as a vengeful enchantress left her without a proper home, and unfortunately, humans were mostly rubbish. Already she had a collection of spoiled princes and warmongering kings to keep track of, and this was only one stop on her rounds.

"Well, in that case, you may as well run along," said the prince, sparing her a fleeting look of annoyance as he splashed his tail below the water's tranquil surface. "Unless you plan to curse me further."

She opened her mouth, about to do precisely as he suggested, when she paused instead, frowning at
"You really mean that, don't you?" she asked him, and he glanced up.

"Mean what?"

She bristled, considering that perhaps this was a tactic of some sort. After all, men had been known to trick enchantresses before. Look at Odysseus and Circe.

"You do realize I won't turn you back," she warned him. "Nothing you say can convince me to forgive you. You will simply have to stay here until you learn to love another and earn their love in return," she informed him, watching his handsome face contort with displeasure. "Only then will the spell be broken."

"I didn't ask for forgiveness," he said, and she blinked.

It was true, he hadn't. Typically, they begged. They pleaded. They fell over themselves clutching at her ankles, clinging to her robes. Anything to be a man again—to be a prince again. She'd seen many of them weep rather than let her go, though she invariably did.

"So you'd rather be a merman forever?" she asked, bewildered.

"Yes," he said flatly. "If that's what it takes."

She considered that maybe she ought to try a different tactic—perhaps she'd left too much human in him, and could always swap the top and bottom halves—but in the end she decided to trust her instincts, leaving him as she'd initially intended. After all, this was the perfect trap. He might be intoxicated by his own beauty for now, or enamored with the power of his new exotic form, but coaxing others to shore with his song would become an exquisite trap eventually. For each person he lured, he would only become lonelier, more desolate with boredom. As the years passed, the prince would fall into despair and lose all hope.

After all, who could ever learn to love a fish?

"Fine," she said, certain he would come to regret this soon enough.

Then she disappeared, leaving him to the solitude of his cove.

"Well," said Hermione. "Can't say I like what you've done with the place."

It had been at least a decade, though of course neither of them were much in the business of aging. He was trapped in a curse, and she was a powerful witch. Unfortunately, she may have underestimated his sense of entitlement, as he appeared to have spent the last ten years doing nothing more than collecting trinkets, presumably from ships.

At the moment, he was polishing what appeared to be a lovely bronze bust.

"I intend to put it there," he remarked, gesturing over his shoulder to an empty spot in the corner.

That seemed to be all he planned to say, though Hermione remained at the edge of the banks, considering the rest of his interior design.

"I see you've discovered the luring bit," she said, and he glanced up.

"I never really had a voice before," he commented, fins glinting opalescent in the midday sun.
"Never intended to make music my vocation, either, but candidly, there are worse things."

"What about the people?"

"What people?"

"The people on the ships," she said. "The ones you lure. What do you do with them?"

He shrugged. "I don't," he said, which wasn't an answer, though she opted not to get into it at the moment. Other curiosities were more pressing.

"You're really not sorry?" she asked him.

"I don't think being sorry would help," he remarked, returning his attention to the polishing of his bronze. "Would it?"

She considered it. "No," she admitted. "What's done is done. But you understand, don't you, what happens if you don't find someone to fall in love with you?"

"Well, as far as my calculations have taken me," said Draco, pursing his lips, "I'll either be a merman forever or I'll die alone."

She waited for him to express malcontent with either option, but he didn't.

"Are you really this stubborn?" she asked him, irritated. "Or are you truly psychopathic?"

That time, he glanced up at her, fixing her with a princely look of impassivity.

"Does it matter?" he asked.

She was starting to get the feeling she ought to leave.

"Well, goodbye," she concluded, rising to her feet. "I'll be back at some point, maybe."

He placed the bust in his intended corner, fiddling with its placement.

"Yes, goodbye," he said disinterestedly, not even looking over his shoulder as she went.

---

The next time she arrived he had managed to build his own castle out of the gold stolen from ships. Half of his eccentric construction was underwater, or appeared to be. He was the one with the fish lungs, not her, so she didn't bother trying to find out.

"Exactly how many ships have you robbed at this point?" she asked him.

"Does it matter?" he asked her again.

She was starting to think maybe it should.

"You're supposed to be falling in love," she told him. "You know. Breaking the curse?"

"Love is a fallacy," he replied. "There's not a force on earth more destructive than love."

"That's ridiculous," she told him. "Haven't you seen greed? Hate?"

"Yes," he said.
"Avarice? Envy? Wrath?"

He glanced up fleetingly. "Have you ever watched a heart break?" he asked her. "Really break, I mean. Shatter. Have you seen love's desolation? Its loneliness, its emptiness. That can be far more persuasive than envy or wrath. In fact it can be envy and wrath even while it is love."

"Yes, but love is also beautiful," she told him, and this time, his lips curled up thinly.

"Aren't you the one who told me beauty isn't everything?" he said.

Irritated, Hermione rose to her feet and left.

When she returned, he was in the process of painting a mural. His original castle—the one she'd cursed—was starting to crumble, so he appeared to have taken on the task of refreshing it with a bit of art. He was about halfway through, as far as she could tell, though the scene was unrecognizable to her.

"What's this?" she asked.

"You obviously haven't gone far enough if you don't recognize it," he said without turning around, though he paused his brush to swim slightly backwards, looking over his progress. "Where is it you go, anyway?" he asked, sweeping one hand through his hair and leaving behind a bit of pink; coral, she presumed, which had been ground down to pigment.

"I told you," she said, settling herself on a rock. "You're not allowed to ask me questions."

"Fine." He swam forward again, fixing a spot on the sunrise he was painting.

She watched him mix darker and darker pigments, the sunrise gradually becoming a night sky. He painted the stars in precise patterns, using a constellation map for reference that he must have drawn by hand.

"There's a fine line between observation and voyeurism, you know," he told her.

She had half-forgotten they'd been sitting in silence for hours.

"Aren't you lonely?" she asked him.

He twisted around, glancing at her, before turning back to his painting. He had aged a little over the years, just slightly. Just enough that he was unquestionably a man now. Perhaps in a century or so he might start to have a few silvery strands woven into his pale hair.

"Are you lonely?" he asked her.

"You're not allowed to ask me questions," she reminded him.

"Why not?"

"Because you're not. I'm the one who cursed you."

"You know, for someone who puts so much stock in love, you don't seem to understand it," Draco remarked. "You have to give, too. You can't just curse one-sidedly."

She couldn't tell if he was joking. He seemed like maybe he was, but if he was, then he was making her the joke, which she didn't appreciate.
"You're selfish," she told him. "Vain."

"Yes, I know."

"You're cruel and unkind."

"Yes."

"That doesn't bother you?"

"From time to time," he said.

"Then why not try to break the curse?"

He paused, then set down his brush, turning to face her.

"Do you want me to be a better person," he asked, "or do you want me to not be alone? Because they're not the same thing."

She frowned at him. "You can't ask me questions."

"You keep saying that," he said. "But you're the one who could easily make me stop."

She sighed, rising to her feet. "You're tiresome," she said.

"So I've heard," he told her, plucking his brush from the ground.

Agitated, Hermione turned and left.

When she came back, he was singing. It was a little sailor shanty, something about storms on the horizon. All sailors sang about storms, and obviously Prince Draco, who was no longer prince of anything, had come across plenty of them over the course of his curse. By now, his castle gleamed with paint and gold, his cove half-buried under riches.

"Sounds lovely," she said when he finished.

"Thanks," he said. "I like that one."

He was lying on the roof of his underwater castle, sunning his grey-blue tail and turning his skin slickly bronze. How he had gotten up there, she wasn't totally sure. Upper arm strength, she supposed. Ropes or seaweed or something.

"Don't you ever wonder what happened to your kingdom?" she asked, treading carefully over the beams toward him and then, giving up, choosing to magically levitate herself over them instead.

"Not really," he said.

"Don't you want to know what happened?"

He cracked one eye, turning to face her. "Sure," he said, impassive. "Tell me."

"It's a democracy now, sort of. Little city states."

"Ah. And does that work?"

She considered it. "Have you heard of Florence?" she asked him. "Or Naples?"
"Yes."

"Well, so basically no," she concluded, "it doesn't work."

A moment passed in silence.

"People can be tricky," remarked Draco, closing his eyes again.

Hermione settled herself back on the roof of his castle, soaking in the warmth of the sun. It was an unusually calm day, or so she assumed, though it was difficult to tell. He had cleverly built his castle to block most of the tempestuous winds from the sea.

"Do you still curse people?" Draco asked, half-startling her.

"Hm?"

"It just seems like a lot of work," he said. "And most people are looking for love anyway. They don't need to become strange creatures just to be incapable of finding it."

She remembered that she had forgotten to tell him he wasn't allowed to ask her questions. Oh well. Too late.

"I think you might be right about love," Hermione admitted softly. Cursing was increasingly difficult work as humanity progressed, and hardly even worth it. Beasts got things they didn't deserve every day, and the business of reprisal was a rather demanding vocation. It turned out that even love could be toxic and unwell, parasitic and fleeting.

Worse, it could be beautiful and harshly unforgiving.

After a moment's silence, Draco reached over, brushing the knuckles of her hand with the soft, worn wetness of his fingers.

"Don't take it personally," he said.

He was never going to break the curse. Or maybe he already had. Maybe she didn't actually understand the first thing about curses.

In the end she simply nodded and closed her eyes, content to lie beside him in the sun.

Forgive Me, Father

Pairing: Parkweasel (Pansy Parkinson x Percy Weasley)

Universe: post-war, EWE

Rating: M for themes, language

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) Fleabag with a twist; 2) a Pansy/Percy rom-com. To be clear: Fleabag is perfect and I would change nothing about it. I made drastic changes to the personalities of these characters/plots in order to make this pairing work. The show did the right thing, and I have intentionally gone a different direction to arrive at a different ending. You do not need to have seen the show to read this.

This is not a love story.

I suppose if I have to start somewhere, I'll start with me. My mother will say that's nothing outside the usual, but she's a bit of a cunt. I say that lovingly, of course (I don't, I'm lying) but it's a foundational aspect of her personality. Some people are just a tad cuntier than others by nature, and she is one of those.

I, on the other hand, am not a cunt. Not to say I'm any better than my mother (I'm not), but being a cunt takes real panache; a splash of something zester than whatever I've got. When used effectively entitlement is fifty-percent confidence, but when I do it, I'm just a bit of a spoiled little bitch. I'd love to improve, but it seems unlikely. I am currently an only child, though I'm sure my mother would be more than happy to pop out someone's progeny if it meant they'd foot the bill for her lavish, cuntly lifestyle.

We used to have money—we don't anymore. My father passed a few years after the war, and much to my mother's distress, he died without a sickle to his name. Turns out he never had any to begin with, and now, of course, we're swimming in debt.

I have thus far failed to marry rich, having been cursed with my nose and also my personality, but luckily my mother clung devotedly to her figure over the years. When Ava Greengrass ran off with the gardener, poor Viridian was left with his enormous manor house and two beautiful, accomplished daughters, which was just about the best thing to happen to my mother. Mum, a longtime friend of the Greengrasses, was more than happy to tend to Viridian's emotional wounds. (By which I do mean his penis.)

Daphne's my best friend and she's fundamentally perfect. I wish I could think of something unflattering to say about her, but even at my foulest she lacks any conceivable flaw. (She's outrageously inoffensive; there, that counts as one.) Her younger sister, Astoria, is beautiful and talented and sweet, but she at least has moments of selfishness. Like now, for instance. Daphne and I are accompanying my mother and her father to dinner, but Astoria's off in Bulgaria, probably sucking off some quidditch player in heat. (Not that I blame her. I'd like to be doing the same thing.)

Mum, of course, surprises us the moment we sit down to a table set for five, not four.

"What's this?" I ask in reference to the empty chair beside me. (She ignores me.)

"Daphne, dear," says my mother, turning to the daughter she frequently tells me she wishes was hers, "where's Theodore?"

"Oh, Theo had a meeting," says Daphne, who even lies beautifully. (Theo's her doting husband. Skinny, but rich. Independently wealthy, and therefore unbeholden to meetings.) "He's ever so sorry he couldn't join us." (False. Theo is the only person who hates my mother more than me.) "He sends his love!" (He doesn't.)

"How is Draco?" asks my mother, which prompts Viridian to cough quietly into his hand. For what it's worth, I've always loved Viridian, who was as much a father to me as he was to his own daughters. (It's not his fault he went weak for a cunt like my mother. There's a secret they'll never tell you in school: Men often adore cunts, so if that's your style, embrace it. Wear it well.)

"Oh, he's… fine," says Daphne evasively, glancing at me.

(I am also fine.)

(We broke up ages ago.)

(It would be weird if I weren't fine.)

(Which, obviously, I am.)

"Well, good," says my mother, who is admittedly very beautiful for a woman of her age. "Pansy, sit up straight," she adds, which of course I thought I was doing. (Years of Russian ballet typically ensure that I am, but mother knows best, as they say.) "Anyway," she continues, as if I've interrupted her somehow, "Viridian and I have an announcement to make."

Before she can tell us what her announcement is (please god, not a baby) someone suddenly pulls out the empty chair beside mine, sliding into it.

"Apologies," says a slim redheaded man I have to blink to recognize. (A Weasley, that's obvious, but it takes a moment to align this man with the stuffy Head Boy from fourth year.) "Food drive took a bit longer than I anticipated."

"Food drive? How quaint," purrs my mother. "Father Percy, I'm sure you remember Daphne."

(Father?)

"Yes, of course. Hello, Miss Parkinson," he says (Miss Parkinson?), turning to me despite my mother's obvious wish to collectively pretend I'm not here. "It's nice to see you again."

"Oh yes, of course." (His eyes are disturbingly blue.) "How are you?" (Were they always this blue?) "Doing well, I hope." (I don't mean that, but it doesn't matter. It's called decorum, which I have and the Weasleys famously do not.)

"Father Percy's a priest," inserts my mother, as I blink. (A what now?)

"I didn't care for the Ministry lifestyle," explains Percy, catching the confusion on my face. (I can't say I bothered to hide it.) "I was going down a bit of a bad path. Pushing away the people I loved, forgetting my values, that sort of thing. Ambition," he remarks, in something of a joking tone, "is a hell of a drug."

"You probably shouldn't try cocaine," I say. (Why is he looking at me?)

Daphne laughs, but my mother doesn't.

"I have," says Percy.

A weighty silence falls over the table as he looks at me, raising his glass of water to his lips as if challenging me to test him. I don't, though I want to. (It would only delight my mother if I embarrassed her now. Then she could hate me outright, like a proper mother, instead of forcefully feigning approval.)

"So, anyway," my mother says brightly, "Viridian and I are getting married. Surprise!"

I choke on my glass of water as Daphne reaches out, clutching my arm beneath the table. (His eyes are so fucking blue.)

"Your mum's a cunt," says Percy, and that's the moment I realize I want to fuck him.

I'm getting ahead of myself. First my mother and Viridian announce their engagement, and then they reveal they'd like to get married in a church. "Doesn't that sound so charming?" exclaims my mother.

"I wasn't aware you were particularly religious," I say.

"Don't be ridiculous, Pansy, of course I am," says dear old Mum. "Viridian and I just went yesterday and we positively adored Father Percy's little speech."

"Homily," says Percy.

"Yes, of course," smiles my mother, looking happy as a clam. "In any case, we're doing a small wedding, just us and you girls and Astoria, plus a few close friends—" (Translation: Everyone she knows will be sorry they ever doubted her resurrection to the heights of social graces.) "—and Father Percy's been gracious enough to agree."

"It's really not a problem," says Percy. "Gives me the day off from healing the sick."

"Do you encounter many lepers?" I ask him. (My mother glares at me.)

"None so far, but I was only recently ordained," he tells me. "Wine?"

"I didn't realize priests were allowed to drink," I remark. (My mother's hand is so tight around her glass I think it might shatter in her hand.)

"So long as you do more good than harm," Percy says, leaning over to refill my glass, "the rules are somewhat circumstantial."

"I don't think that's how it works," I say.

(He's so close to me I can smell him. Linen and bit of aftershave.)
"Stop pestering him, Pansy," says my mother. "Daphne, more wine?"

Dinner went on as normal, with a few more apologetic glances from Viridian. He always looks a bit embarrassed by my mother, but in a powerless sort of way. She has a tendency to dominate a room.

The bit where it gets complicated is mostly when my mother says right at the end of dinner, "Don't spoil this for us, Pansy."

"Me?" I ask. (I had been staring at Percy's hands, trying not to.) "What does that mean?"

"It means don't show up in Viridian's house drunk and crying with your dress on inside out," says my mother smartly. "Please, don't find a way to make this about you."

(The episode in question was the anniversary of my father's death. Also, a week after Draco dumped me.)

"Right," I say.

Percy was silent at the time, though he caught me on the way out. "Your mum's a cunt," he says, though you know that already, and you know my thoughts on the matter as well.

(Largely: I want to fuck him into the goddamn floor.)

"I know," I say.

"Don't listen to her."

"I don't." (I absorb her and spend the rest of the evening wringing myself out like a dishtowel.) "What do you care?"

"I've had... some difficulties," he tells me curtly. "My little political fall from grace, my brother's death, it all led to some very poor choices. But now I'm here," he reminds me, tapping his little priest's collar. "You'll find peace eventually."

"Did you?" I ask him.

We stand there in silence for so long that I wonder briefly whether I actually spoke aloud.

"No," he says.

Then he tosses some powder in the flames and disappears into the Floo.

It's not like I'm desperate for marriage. Yes, Daphne and Theo had a lovely wedding and combined they have more money than God, but it's not about the institution of the thing, or the possession of it. It isn't something shallow, like how Daphne looked so much better in her gown than I could ever dream of looking. It's her certainty; her knowledge that they belong together. It's the way Theo looks at her as if she's the most precious thing in the entire world.

I used to think that Draco and I belonged together until I realized it was just my mother's voice telling me that. Now I know I don't belong to anyone, but it makes me feel untethered, awash. Like I'm floating aimlessly without direction, and nobody cares where I land.

I've never gone to church before, but now obviously I can't resist. After mass, I pause to shake his
"I liked it," I say. "The little speech."

"Homily," he corrects me.

(So, so blue.)

"Come here," he suddenly says, taking my elbow and leading me into the rectory or something; whatever this old room full of choir robes and moldy Bibles is called.

He plucks one from the table, handing it to me. "Thirsty?" he asks.

"For… scripture?" I ask uncertainly.

"I was thinking more like wine," he says. "Though I keep Ogden's in my good robes."

"These aren't your good robes?" (They're green and gold, and they bring out his eyes.)

"You'll know my good ones when you see them."

He disappears and I flip through the Bible, aimless. He returns, handing me a glass, which I accept.

"Have you read it much?" he asks, pointing to the Bible in my hands.

"I've read enough to know it doesn't work," I say.

Then, because he doesn't say anything, I add, "For half this book God is vengeful and cruel. Storms and locusts. Bloodshed. Wrath. Then he's merciful, but what kind of mercy is it? Killing his own son? And anyway, I don't think we're made in His image. I don't think it's possible. He's something else, some other creature we can't fathom. If we could, we'd make the world ourselves."

(I don't know what I'm on about.)

"Men told these stories. The narrators are unreliable," I continue babbling. "It's basically gossip."

"If it were all fiction, would you believe it?"

"What?" (His sudden interruption startles me.)

"If it were fiction," Percy repeats, pointing to it. "Would you believe it?"

I sort of half-understand what he means. If this book were fiction, would I trust the themes more. Redemption and forgiveness and doing unto others. Fires and floods, plagues and virgins.

"I don't know," I say listlessly, "maybe."

I set the book down at the moment he steps towards me, and for a second I think he'll hold my hand. (Stupid.)

"What?" he says.

"What do you mean 'what'?"

(I am so, so stupid.)

"That," he says, frowning. "Where did you just go?"
"I don't know what you're talking about."

(I hate it, how much it thrills me to have his eyes, his attention. My skin crawls with humiliation from being noticed, from craving it. I devour it too quickly, swallowing it whole. Do it again, I want to beg.)

"That," he says again.

"You're being ridiculous," I say.

He regards me warily for a moment.

"Come with me," he says.

"You ruined our name, you know," my mother likes to remind me. "No one will ever have you now."

For the record, I thought I was being practical when I suggested turning Harry Potter over to the Dark Lord. Seems silly to think that was a problem once, given my current set of mundanities, but at the time I was only thinking: one life for many. His life for Daphne’s, for Draco’s, for all of my friends, for everyone I’ve ever loved. I wish I had said nothing, obviously. I don’t even think I meant it at the time, but this is my nature. I say things and can’t take them back, like I love you.

"I thought you knew this was sort of a casual thing for me," had been Draco’s response to that.

I don’t blame my mother for resenting me, or Draco for leaving me. I don’t blame Viridian for not wanting to be alone, and I certainly don’t blame my father for dying. I don’t blame Daphne for being cherished, for being beautiful, for being loved.

I suppose at this point I’m so numb I don’t blame anyone for anything at all.

Father Percy takes me to St Mungo’s, which is where he goes in the afternoons. This is what he meant by healing the sick. "Providing comfort," he explains. "It gives me something to do. Something purposeful."

"Why am I here?" I ask him.

"Because I thought you might want to feel something," he says.

We spend the day chatting with absolute lunatics, which gives me an unsettled sort of feeling, like I’m off-kilter and trying to catch my balance. Percy handles himself better, though he’s not necessarily a natural when it comes to caregiving. Even I can carry a conversation better than he can, though anyone can see he’s trying. (A woman hands me a wrapper from some sweet and I tuck it in my pocket, oddly touched. It’s a possession she wants me to have, which certainly feels like something.)

"The thing about drugs," Percy remarks uninvited, "is they destroy your natural ability to feel. And feeling things is so powerful, so potent. I was afraid to lose that, so I went somewhere safe. Somewhere quiet."

"You couldn’t think of another place besides a seminary?" I ask doubtfully.

"I wasn’t thinking," he explains with a shrug. "That was the beauty of it. For once I stopped thinking and simply went, and then I thought, maybe this is God."
"Vengeful God or merciful God?" I ask him.
"Either," he says. "Both."
(I love his mouth.)
"What?"
"Hm?"
He stares at me.
"I think I'd like to do terrible things with you," he remarks, a bit resentfully.
I tighten my legs, sitting up straight.
"Maybe you should do them," I tell him.
He smiles, distant now.
"Forgive me, Father," he murmurs to nothing.
I look at his hand, which rests between us.
(Every fiber of me wants to take it and hold it.)
(I'm breathless with the mortification of craving.)
(Can he hear my heart beating?)
"I should take you home," he says.

This is not a love story because you can't love someone you've just met. You don't love someone on sight, because that's not what love is. It's an addiction, yes, chemical and hormonal, but that's the rush, that's not love. Love is knowing someone's ins and outs with intimacy. Love is trust and friendship. Love is acceptance and kindness. Love is mercy and forgiveness, even when it is vengeance and justice. It is patient and kind even when it is harsh and grim and cruel.

You don't love him when he takes your face in his hand, carefully holding your chin between his thumb and the crook of his finger. You don't love him when he brushes his lips against yours the first time. That's not love. It's not love when you fantasize about him parting your thighs with his knee, taking you in his arms, balling your skirt in his fist. Love isn't like sex; it doesn't just happen. The end to loneliness is not love, even if it looks a great deal like it.

Love is made. It's like peace. It happens over time, with acceptance.

This is a hope story.

I start to cry even before he holds me. It's embarrassing, but for a moment I'm blissfully ignorant, totally blind. I can't see anything but him.

"It's just madness, you know?" I say deliriously. "It's all so empty and pointless and still, I'm just so terrified I'm doing it all wrong."

I imagine he'll taste like red wine, which is how I imagine Jesus tastes. Instead I can smell the aftershave, and his tongue is spiced with whiskey. (This man is not okay, not even close. He ran from his life and he's been seeking solace ever since.)

He cradles my head with his palm, smoothing his hand over my hair. I fantasize that I am his serenity, only I know he couldn't be so unlucky. (This is a good man, albeit a confused one. Even on his worst days, he surely doesn't deserve me.)

"I don't think I'm capable of doing right by you," I say.

"Good," he says. "I haven't hit my quota of daily wrongs."

He slides his hands under my skirt. The little white collar blinks from around his neck.

(Am I going to fuck the priest because I know my mother will be furious?)

(From I going to fuck the priest?)

"Will you forgive me?" he says. (His breath is hot against my ear.)

"For what?"

His lips brush mine again. "Not letting you go."

Ah yes, the sin that is many sins. Lust and passion and greed. The desire that is more than desire, because it is craving untended, longing unfulfilled. Men of the cloth are meant to be above such things, turning their intentions skyward, but this one is lost.

(Like me.)

"Perhaps," I say, "you should kneel."

He strokes my cheek with his thumb, and then he lowers himself slowly, trailing kisses gently down my torso until he rests on his knees.

When he meets my eye, I know my mother's wedding day is ruined.

This is a story about finding where you're meant to be.

Chapter End Notes

I suspect the sum total of these stories is going to be a sense of what it's like to live with a bipolar person's brain for four weeks. (Me. I'm the person.) Hope you're still enjoying it! Or at least something close.
Gossip Girl here, back with a special holiday update. As of today, finals are at an end, which means your Manhattan elite are finally out to play—or are they? Climate change is no joke bbs, and this year's snowfall means there's no place like home for the holidays. Even the private jets of Columbia's finest can't take the chill, while the Brooklynites are bailing on their upstate meditation retreats to settle their angst with some cruelty-free vegan cocoa.

With our reigning Park Avenue Princess cozing up to the Chosen One this December, will there finally be—dare I say it—peace? Not if D and H have anything to say about it. As far as I'm concerned, this year's snowpocalypse means the real winter games are about to begin.

"Sign it," said Pansy flatly, sliding the page across the table to Draco.

"It would really mean a lot to us," added Harry, though he had the requisite sense to address that particularly useless remark to the only person in the room who would bother listening to him to begin with.

Draco cast a glance beside him to Hermione Granger, who for some godforsaken reason still hadn't disappeared. Her scholarship to Hogwarts High had been bad enough for the last four years, but Draco had been sure there would be no further reason to concern himself with her existence once he'd started at Columbia. She was supposed to be at NYU learning about Nietzsche or animal husbandry or something, totally forgotten as a single, troublesome blip on his social and academic radar, but then by some cruel twist of fate she wasn't. She was at his school. In his life. Again.

He adjusted his Maison Margiela sweater and turned disinterestedly away until Pansy snapped her fingers twice in his face, prompting him to a scowl.

"You will get along," she warned, threatening him with a glance. "We're all going to be together at the Christmas party tomorrow night, and I will not allow you two to ruin this for us—again," she added with a glare, echoing his precise thought. "Am I understood?"

Beneath the table, Hermione tapped her heinous winter boots and sighed.

"Fine," she conceded to Harry, pointedly ignoring Draco as she reached for the pen. "But only because it's you. And also because you'll owe me for the next hundred years."

"Understood," said Harry, obviously relieved.

Hermione swirled her name in script and handed the pen to Draco, who balked, glaring at her.

"Do it," Pansy said, "or I'll tell everyone what happened last year in Aspen."

"What happened last year in Aspen?" Harry asked, and Pansy pointedly arched a brow in Draco's direction, aiming it like a weapon. Hermione, still holding the pen, gave Draco a look like whatever, don't care, which was about as plebeian a lie as it could possibly be.

Naturally he'd rather die than have anyone find out, and Pansy knew it. Worse, she was certainly sadistic enough to call his bluff.

"Fine," Draco muttered, snatching the pen from Hermione's hand and scrawling his signature onto the page. "Let's just get this over with."

The contract, if one could call it that despite the fact that it would never hold up in any court as a result of being openly unconscionable and probably also extortion, was two parts: one, a peace treaty, and two, submission to one (1) day of forced togetherness so that tomorrow, at Pansy's parents' annual Christmas party that was the 'event of the season' (meaningless to Hermione, but so be it), the bourgeoisie of the Upper East Side could remain blissfully undisturbed. Why Hermione had to be part of it in any conceivable way was unclear, though Harry seemed to consider it a truce of sorts. "Pansy's just trying to be friends," he offered optimistically, though Hermione doubted it. It seemed more probable that this was all punishment from some atrocity she'd committed in a past life.

Hermione, thoughtfully winding her scarf around her neck, was fairly certain the only way she could survive a day with Draco (a favor she would perform for Harry and Harry alone) was to very deliberately keep from speaking. "We could see a movie," she suggested, annoyed that he was already eyeing her knitted scarf as if he'd rather she freeze to death than force him to be seen standing next to it. "There's a foreign film festival in—"

"Do not," snapped Draco, "say Brooklyn."

"It's in Harlem," Hermione informed him, irritated anew as she shoved the signed contract into her pocket, "but never mind, meaningless classism it is. Do you have any better ideas?"

"We're going to Barney's," Draco informed her, yanking the door open to wave her through it, while Hermione stared blankly after him.

"What?"

"I have shit to do, Granger. You can tag along like a good girl," he suggested with a snide expression of open challenge, "or we can tell Pansy you're the one who broke the contract."

God, he was the absolute worst. On the bright side, it was the worst possible time to be visiting a department store, so maybe he'd be trampled to death somewhere around the makeup counters.

"Fine," Hermione allowed, gritting her teeth. "I need new gloves anyway."

He slid a pursed glance to her current gloves, which had been knitted by her roommate. There were beets dangling from the fingertips, which weren't exactly useful or attractive, but she couldn't exactly say no. She hadn't meant to use them today, but they'd been right beside the door, and, well…

"You certainly do," Draco said with displeasure, letting the door fall shut just as she turned to follow him.

"Let me guess," she sighed, which was almost certainly the unpromising and intolerable commencement of yet another nonsensical rant. "You want me to try on one of these dresses under the pretext of needing one as a gift, when really, you're just going to subjugate me with the usual chauvinism of the male gaze, all because Pansy's got some sort of dirt about your recreational drug use or, I don't know, teen fight club that'll prevent your future appointment to the cabinet?"

It was just like her to be so self-righteous. It was the same whether the situation was the final round of Model U.N. or a simple fucking errand. Hermione Granger, Brooklyn-born and hippie-bred on a lifelong diet of wheatgrass and liberalism, didn't have a single opinion that wasn't militantly socialist and/or built on a fundamental misunderstanding of capitalism as a whole.

She didn't belong in his world, much less in his comparative literature course. Or in any of the three classes they had together outside of his introduction to finance course, which was the one she actually needed.

"First of all, I have no interest in gazing at you, male or otherwise," Draco informed her impatiently. "I'm supposed to have a gown sent for my mother, who's at least six inches taller than you, so as far as I'm concerned, you can sit quietly until I'm finished."

He turned, expecting her to do as he'd instructed, but of course she leapt forward and collided promptly with his heel. "For fuck's sake," he growled, fully trod upon by the heavy tread of her stupid boots, but she ignored him.

"What's the gown for?" she asked.

"The Christmas party," he snapped, "obviously."

"Isn't it a family party? I thought your family and Pansy's were close."

Questions, questions, questions. "Yes, Granger, they are." Just ask Page Six.

"But then why—"

"Tradition, Granger, is what separates us from the animals," sighed Draco, rounding on her in agitation. "If you were part of this world in any conceivable way, you'd understand."

"But that's the point—I can't be part of it, can I? And anyway, tradition is inherently fallacious," she said, expressionless. "Most of the world's current traditions came from the Victorians and were spread via imperialism."

Jesus Christ. "So?"

"So," she retorted, liberally emphatic, "doesn't it bother you that you're contributing to a stratified class system that not only ensures continued inequality, but celebrates it?"

"Oh, please," Draco scoffed, having had enough of this argument from their final round of debate senior year with McGonagall, another notorious left-wing nutjob. "If you want money, Granger, get a job. Start a business. Whatever. I can't help those who don't help themselves."
"Oh right, a business," Hermione echoed. "Do you mean the one your father inherited from his father that got bailed out by Congress, or the one his father got a million dollar loan from his father to start? So difficult to remember which is which," she added facetiously, "seeing as neither one pays taxes."

Draco, exasperated, plucked a slinky black dress off the rack and thrust it in her hands. "Put that on," he suggested, letting his eyes travel pointedly down the bulge of her probably-recycled shapeless puffer coat. "I might be able to stand you if I had something decent to look at."

Hermione scowled, silenced by fury, and Draco smiled to himself. At least he still knew how to shut her up.

Pansy and Harry had almost gotten together once before, but then Hermione and Draco had gotten into an argument so heated it had gotten them both suspended. One thing led to another and Harry had sided with Hermione, Pansy with Draco, and for months the line was drawn somewhere around the East Village. Now they were trying it again, only Hermione and Draco were still… Hermione and Draco.

Meaning: he was still a total asshole and she still hated every individual atom of his guts.

"Let's just go back to my place," Draco said. "It's big enough that we can avoid each other all afternoon."

"Great," spat Hermione, only with the weather so bad and getting worse every hour, they waited outside for a cab only for her to give up in teeth-chattering exasperation, dragging him to the nearest subway entrance. From there, every train car was packed and suffocating, and Draco, princess that he was, wouldn't stop complaining at length about the assault to his senses as if she had somehow craved the smell of urine, or getting dick pics air-dropped to every phone on the train. Eventually, Hermione couldn't stand him or the heat, letting the crowd shove her out the door at what turned out to be entirely the wrong stop.

"I want some coffee," she announced, registering her error with a mild flame of frustration. She could never admit it now; he'd lord it over her forever. Or at least until Pansy and Harry had the decent sense to break up.

"From here?" Draco asked, patently doubtful.

"Yes," she said, shoving into whatever nameless cafe was nearest to where they'd paused outside the turnstiles.

The coffee was watery and acidic, but at least it was hot. Draco, meanwhile, looked at his cup like it might come to life and eat him. "This is disgusting."

"It's cheap," said Hermione, forcing cheerfulness. "Enjoy it."

"Whatever," he said, shoving it listlessly away before adding, "You really shouldn't drink Sumatra."

"Why," she scoffed, "is Indonesia suddenly too plebeian for you?"

He tossed her a glare. "They intentionally burn the forests, Granger. Contaminates the air in all the nearby countries. Shouldn't you already know that? Since you're so concerned about world peace or whatever," he added blisteringly, and she felt an uprise of annoyance.
He had so many terrible versions and somehow, the very worst one was when he was even moderately close to right.

"That isn't 'world peace or whatever,' Malfoy," Hermione snapped.

She glanced at her cup, and Draco launched one leg out, kicking her foot.

"Sorry," he said insincerely.

This was going to be a long fucking day.

"Let's just get an Uber and go," growled Hermione.

"You do know Lyft has cleaner track record as far as data breaches and corporate policy," drawled Draco. "Or do you not care about #MeToo?"

She wanted to slam his head into the table, but managed to suppress it. Harry and Pansy are in love, she told herself for the fortieth time. Harry's in love, and also, I can't go to law school if I go to prison for murder first.

"Whatever," she said, tossing out her coffee half-drunk.

Surge pricing in this weather was so heinously exorbitant that there was no way she was even going to consider it. Draco could see the hesitation on her face, and the delight of offering her money only for her to self-righteously refuse was too delicious to resist.

"Need something?" he prompted, the portrait of innocence. As predicted, she shoved her phone back in her monstrosity of a coat.

"Let's get a drink," she said flatly, and he scoffed.

"Granger, it's four in the afternoon. Just admit you can't afford the Uber." She was so fruitlessly immovable he suspected she'd gladly die before asking him for help. He was no different, probably, but this wasn't about him.

"It's cold and I want a drink," she said, proving him right. "So are you coming with me, or is Pansy going to have to tell us what you did in Aspen?"

Ah. So she was curious, then.

"After you," he offered in the most lofty iteration of his voice, waving her onward.

She glared at him, but for once, comeuppance was particularly expeditious. She slipped immediately on slick ice, landing hard on her backside while he took a long, deliberate step, leaning pointedly over her.

"Don't suppose you need help getting up?" he mused aloud.

"Fuck off, Malfoy." She was effortlessly predictable.

"Language," he drawled, tugging at his leather gloves while she struggled to her feet. Thankfully she'd bought herself a new pair at Barney's, as her old ones were properly revolting. These still weren't leather—something about cows, though he reminded her vegan leather was plastic and therefore equally problematic—but were at least moderately less embarrassing to be seen with.
She led them to a nearby dive bar, which upon entry was revealed to be filled with what Draco's mother liked to call 'the elements'—drunks half-passed out on the bar, lunatics chattering to themselves, plus an entire group of men who smelled like smoke and a couple more who would have been vastly improved by the smell of smoke. He would have dubbed it disgusting and left on the spot had Hermione not been just as uncomfortable as he was and twice as unlikely to admit it.

"We could leave," he murmured in her ear, taunting her with the possibility of admitting defeat, and she shoved him brusquely away.

"It's fine," she said, lyingly. "It's character. These are real people, Malfoy, which of course you wouldn't know anything about."

It was consistently astounding just how ridiculous she could be. "Granger," he growled, "just admit my way of life is preferable and let me pay the surge fee, would you? This is getting stupid."

"Or," she countered, "we could get back on the train. I've got an Italian roast in my dorm," she offered melodically, "if that's more suitable to your product ethics."

The idea of what sort of communal anarchy he might find in her dorm room was enough to reduce him to shudders. "I'm not getting on that train again. It's sweltering, and anyway, the tracks are probably frozen by now—"

"Well, then I'm not leaving here," she informed him stubbornly, plunking down on a bar stool and shoving her coat forcefully from her shoulders. "So either you drink or you tell Pansy the contract is void."

He stared at her, wondering just how much he wanted to push the limits of his father's friendship with the District Attorney before finally pulling out the chair beside her.

"Fine," he said, flashing a bill between his fingers at the bartender. "Then we're drinking."

He was much too pretty for prison, and anyway, he could definitely use a drink.

She preferred him silent, ideally comatose, so naturally he opted for revoltingly chatty. Within an hour she was pretty sure she had enough information for nearly all his bank codes. His mother's birthday, the city his parents met, his first pet. (A turtle named Herbie, called Herb as it matured. Narcissa had allergies.) He still lived in the same penthouse where he was born, so the street he lived on was easy enough, though apparently he had a second house in the Hamptons and a third somewhere on the Riviera, which offset her calculations.

She, meanwhile, was starting to feel it by the bottom of her first drink, though any further feelings had the courtesy to blissfully depart by drink three or four. Apparently she was being funny or something, because Draco was laughing. At her, not with her, probably, but she was too cold and miserable to care.

"You know, I'll never like you," she informed him, possibly a bit slurred. "If today's convinced me of anything, it's that."

"Personally, I plan to hate you as long as I live," he told her, flagging the bartender down for shots. "You're repugnant."

"Why," she scoffed, "because I don't have a trust fund? Or because someone else had to pay for me to go to your school?"
"Oh, don't sell yourself short, Granger. It's your personality I can't stand," he assured her at a drawl, sliding the glass of tequila in her direction.

"Ugh. Tequila. You would." Secretly, she liked tequila shots more than most other forms of alcohol. The ritual of it was comforting: lick your hand, pour the salt, lick it off, toss back the shot, bite down on the lime. Fluid, comprehensible, beholden to scientific properties. She performed the ceremony with furtive relish, wincing as the alcohol burned down her throat and then shuddering around the citrus.

Beside her, Draco licked the sheen of alcohol from his lips. "You're the worst," he told her, reaching for the lime wedge between her fingers and sucking at what little remained.

Her fingers brushed his Adam's apple as he swallowed. Perturbed and disgusted, she waved the bartender for another round, tossing the discarded lime aside.

"You're paying for this," she informed him.

"Should've just let me pay for the Uber."

"Lyft."

"'kay," he said, obediently lifting his hand. She paused for half a second, then licked it, sprinkled the salt over it, and handed it back to him as the bartender refilled their glasses.

This time, Draco raised the tequila to his lips and held it there, tilting his head back and downing the shot in one swallow. Then he leaned forward, replacing the glass on the bar with his mouth. "Yikes," he said, eyes watering.

It occurred to her that maybe this was not her best idea. Still, the opportunity to watch him suffer was too pleasing to resist, so Hermione shoved his head back, squeezing drops of lime onto his tongue.

He licked his lips again, sparing her a glare. "Your turn."

"Fuck you," she said, and took another lick from his hand, smugly challenging him to stop her. In apparent reprisal, he held the glass up to her lips, tipping the liquid so forcefully between them she nearly choked on her swallow. "Lime," she coughed up, reaching for it, but he plucked it from the dish first.

He raised it to his own mouth, holding it between his teeth. "Let me order the Uber," he said around the rind, taunting her with it.

This was the problem. When it came down to it, it was this: everything with him was a taunt, a dare, a challenge. Everything was push and pull, hot and cold, and she always felt mystified by him, caught up in a burst of confusion.

Time to make things simple.

She rose to her feet, grasping his jaw stiffly with one hand, and leaned forward, loosening the lime from his lips with her tongue. He shuddered, and she, triumphant, sucked the lime's juices dry before tossing it aside.

"I hate you so much," she said, pursing her lips from the tartness, pure citrus.

"Finally, something we have in common." He picked up his phone with a sparkling laugh.
They fumbled into his foyer, him stripping the coat from her shoulders and tossing it blindly away. Beneath it, much to his astonishment, she had an actual shape. A good one. He wanted to frame it on his mantle, wrap it in silk. He wanted to fight with her about Reaganomics in the bath. Wanted to sip champagne from her navel while she lectured him about Iraq.

"Jesus," she said into his sweater, half-melting into it. "This feels like butter."

"It's cashmere, sweetheart," he told her, reveling in the growl that followed. "But don't worry, I wouldn't expect you to know your textiles."

"God, I hate you so much," she said again, and kissed him to prove it, biting hard on his lip.

He laughed, dizzy and day-drunk, and sat her on top of the foyer's untouched baby grand, removing her stupid boots one by one. They spent hundreds of dollars to tune it only for it to sit here and shine, useless. Her narrow heel could dig into a flawless middle C, finally something worth playing, and it would be fucking extravagance. A perfect fucking waste.

"You," he said to her mouth, "are exhausting. I hate you so much it burns." Or more accurately, it throbbed.

In answer, she withdrew the contract from her pocket, tearing it mindlessly to shreds as he pulled his sweater over his head, tossing it aside.

"It's off," she said, letting the pieces scatter to the floor. "We can't get along. Peace canceled."

She was looking at him like she'd happily stab him with his mother's good crystal, burying the shards somewhere in his ribs. She could watch him bleed or curl her palm around his cock, same thing. Her impassivity was incandescent.

"Good." He slid his tongue in her mouth, laughing again when he tasted tequila and surrender. "Besides," he murmured, "it really doesn't matter who the fuck Pansy tells."

Hermione dug her nails into his chest, red crescents blooming from her touch. "What'd you do in Aspen?"

"Got drunk," he said, sliding a hand into her jeans. He shoved aside what was definitely not La Perla with a desperate clench of his jaw, finding its contents to be decadent enough without it. The only thing more impossible than basic amicability was clearly going to be restraint.

She tugged his head back by his hair, prompting him to a groan. "And?" she prompted, one hand clawed around his neck. Her teeth scraped over her lips, bitten and red, slick with promise. Vindictive with it.

Finally. Someone who could keep up. He hated her most for that, or for making him wait. For making him suffer, which only she could do. All of the above.

He dove his fingers deeper, possessive, and caught her moan on his tongue.

"Told her," he murmured to her mouth, "that I wanted to fuck you." He peeled back the cup of her bra with his free hand, sliding his tongue over the bead of her nipple until she gasped. "But no one would ever believe that, would they?"

"Nope," she agreed, tugging at his zipper and drawing him between her legs. "Not in a million years."
Well, would you look at that. It might be cold outside, but baby, it's hot in here. The planet might be in crisis, but these polar icecaps melting? That's my kind of fun. XOXO—Gossip Girl.

Chapter End Notes

Just saying, when a man sells his girlfriend for a hotel and repeatedly tries to convince her that her only value is his love, the only thing I ship him with is the bottom of the ocean. Cheers! XOXO, Olivie.
He's riding the bottom of some uppers when he sees her.

"Hey," he realizes, falling blearily to a halt. "I know you."

"Please. You hardly know yourself," she says, and doesn't stop.

"We fight like my parents," she whispers, and he's made her cry again, and there is nothing lower than knowing that's on him. There is nothing like this guilt, sickening. Nothing like his skin crawling with contrition and longing and fear.

He pours the wine from the bottle, letting it drip onto the contours of her stomach. "Thought you didn't want to see me again."

"I didn't."

He trails the tip of his finger from the base of her ribs to her navel, leaving a glaze of malbec behind. "What changed?"

Her eyes are closed when she says, "Saw it in my tea leaves."

For once, he hopes she's right.

"No, really, I know you," he says, catching her arm, and she gives him a slant-eyed look of distaste, or possibly loathing.

"You're dying," she says.

"God, I hope so," he tells her. "See it in your tea leaves or something?"

"I can see it on your face," she says.

Their first kiss is behind a locked door. He has kissed her many times before this in his head, and he suspects the evidence of that is clear. This kiss, though, is spontaneous, unplanned, and it's difficult to tell which of them is more surprised. He kisses her like a sob, and she kisses him back like a scream. Ultimately it was probably an accident.

It gets heated quickly, probably because of the anguish and rage which has nothing and everything to do with both of them, and soon he has a handful of her hair and she's shoving his hand under her skirt and it's pretty clear where this is going, and the only thought going through his mind is how much he wants to see her naked. That won't happen here, not now, but someday he plans to look at her long and hard and carefully, conscientiously, committing her to memory. He'll dip his fingertips in watercolor to paint the sharp bones of her hips.

She seems to know he's a mistake. "You're going to break my heart," she says prophetically.

"No," he says. No, not yours.

She sighs when he fills her, or he does.

"I think I'm going to let you do it," she mumbles into his neck.

They fight about his drinking. They fight about her tarot cards. They fight about where to eat dinner. They fight about whether she should get a cat. They fight about her sister. They fight about his mother. They fight about the situation in the Middle East. They fight about his socks. They fight about his friends. They fight about him. They fight about him. They fight about him.

"You're not even trying," she says. "You're not even trying to be alive."

He can't figure out what the fuck that even means.

She snatches the bottle from his hand and brings it to her lips.

"Someday you won't have me anymore," she says. "Bet you won't even see it coming."

Then she throws the bottle at the wall, letting it shatter, and vanishes the glass.

After the first night he sees her he becomes mildly obsessed, which is not something he typically becomes when it comes to women (or men). For the record, there are an endless amount of ways their first meeting goes differently, and almost none of them end like this. "Hey, I know you." "Yeah, we went to Hogwarts together." "Hey, I know you." "I know you, too. Bye." "Hey, I know you." Silence. "Hey, I know you." "Who the fuck are you?" "Hey, I know you." "Fuck off."

"Hey, I know you." "Please. You don't even know yourself." This is the only outcome that has him scrambling for an explanation, thirsting for one. He learns her best marks were in divination and her best friend died during the war and now she works for some sort of wizarding art collective. She's not an artist herself but she manages their accounts, showcases their work. She has chosen to surround herself with beautiful things.

It's easy, then, to show up at her gallery opening in his most expensive tailored robes, buying a piece off the wall within five minutes of entering. He looks for her and doesn't see her.

"Why that one?" she says from behind him, and he jumps.

"Fucking hell," he says, spilling his martini on the floor. She vanishes it before it lands, the motion so quick he glares at her.
"Why?" she says again.
"Why what?"
"Why that painting?"
"Because I like it."
"No, you don't."
"Fine, because I like you."
"You definitely don't."
"What?"
"You don't know me. And you don't like that painting."
"What makes you so sure?"
"Because if you like that painting," she says, "there's something seriously fucking wrong with you."

He stares at her.

"It reminds me of my mother," he confesses eventually, feeling stripped down to his bones.

"Yeah," she says. "That makes sense."

Then she turns and walks away.

Inevitably he resorts to begging.

"Where is she?"

Her twin has different eyes, a different mouth. He is exceedingly aware that he has never kissed this mouth, and he hates it. It feels mocking and cruel.

"If she wanted you to know, Zabini, you'd know."

Some nights he holds her like he's going to lose her. "You'd tell me if you were leaving me, wouldn't you?"

"No, probably not," she says, but her legs are woven with his and her arms are tangled around his neck and she is pressed against him, every inch, and so he thinks fears are mostly impossibilities, irrationalities. She wouldn't go, not her, because she's not actually very good, and certainly not very healthy. A good person or a healthy one would leave and find something better, but she's a little fucked up, like him. Little things. When he puts on his shoes she always looks like she's going to cry. She trembles sometimes in her sleep. She flinches when he speaks too loudly. Little things.

He's never actually considered anything precious before. Money does that to a person, so he doesn't know how to take care of her. How to keep her without hoarding her. He only knows how to waste things, misuse them.
He buys her gifts she doesn't use, and it infuriates him. "I don't want this," she says, tossing the necklaces back to him, the lingerie, the bottles of expensive wine, the candied chestnuts and truffles. "Stop."

Her rejection of him stings. He's giving himself to her and she says no you're not.

"The money is all I am," he snarls.

The look she gives him is 99% pity, 1% rage.

"I told you," she says. "You're not even trying."

For a person with hard edges, she cries easily. Sad tears. Happy tears. Tears of frustration. Tears when he leaves. Tears when he comes back. Tears when he says I love you. Tears when he says you love me, admit it, just say it, just tell me you love me and come home. Tears when he paints her toenails for her. Tears during sappy romantic movies. Tears when she draws the five of swords. She has brown eyes, liquid ones. At first she looks like the sort of girl who'd be pretty if she smiled more but eventually he realizes that when she smiles, she becomes this terrifying thing full of lethality and violence, practically cavernous with her joy.

Her beauty is the enormity of her heart.

It makes him furious when people don't see her. It makes him less angry when they do, but still angry. It's some intrinsic ownership reflex, provider bullshit, possessive-jealous fuckery that embarrasses him and makes him sweat. He wants people to understand that a single glance at her is not enough. He wants to understand how other people look away. The way he feels about her is a mix of resentment and poison. She reminds him of black coffee stirred with lavender sprigs. He thinks: I have to fuck her. Then he thinks: I can never fuck her, I don't want to get burnt.

In the end he does fuck her, only he doesn't, because even with his cock inside her this isn't fucking, it's something cliched and full of rose petals and bubble baths. He feels Byronic about her, Shelley-esque. She does some twisted shit to his brain that makes him want to rhyme. Why her? Because shut the fuck up, it's obvious, he has no goddamn idea. Maybe because she's been mourning him from the start.

"You're dying slowly," she says. "I know I'll miss you someday."

Then, because she's a little bit cruel, she adds, "Or maybe I won't."

Imagine some fucking oracle says you're dying. What do you do, heal? He doesn't.

He writes her eighteen letters over the course of eight days and then drinks for three weeks and then cries over the letters he wrote her. He throws a knife into the painting he bought, the one that reminds him of his mother. Underneath the painting is another painting, just kidding it's another dimension, just kidding he's on drugs. He's high for another two days and thinks about jumping off his roof until he realizes oh, duh, that's what she meant. He's been dying slowly since the moment he was born.

But then he comes down from the high and takes a four hour shower and thinks oh shit, I wasn't even on the roof. What the fuck?

But she's still gone.
Their third kiss is memorable because he's holding her hand and he comments out loud how cinematic this all is. The wind in her hair and the flower he's just tucked behind her ear and all that; it's highly literary.

He says, "How did I get you?"

"Animal magnetism," she replies.

The truth is she's funny and scary and her heart is bigger than his and her mind has all these nooks and crannies, twists and turns, and she sees right through him and he likes it. She says, "You're such a fucking fraud," and he says oh shit I am and kisses her gratefully, hungrily. He kisses her like he's eating himself alive, putting his whole psyche in her hands.

"Want the truth?" she says.

"Never," he tells her.

"I like how fragile you are." She laughs. "You're so delicate you make me look strong."

He's insulted and in awe. He adores her, slavishly.

"What do you want? Anything," he says. "Say anything and it's yours."

"Me," she says.

Then she kisses him until his lips burn.

She gives him the third best blow job of his life on his birthday and afterwards, she says, "God, I debase myself a thousand different ways for you."

"How does it feel?" he asks her.

"What, debasing myself?"

"Yeah."

"Really good." She smiles at him and he thinks she'll probably cry later. The cake is really beautiful. She might cry about that. Or maybe he'll get too drunk and she'll cry. He is hit with a mix of intense, insurmountable shame and glittering, opulent affection. "Makes me feel absolutely filthy," she says. "Terrifically gone to shit."

She kisses him again, and she is happy-sad, or sad-happy.

"I'm going to miss you," she says.

"Are you going somewhere?"

"Someday, yeah," she says. "Don't rush me, though."

Stay, he wants to say, but he doesn't.

"Come on," she tells him, dragging him back to the party. "Your degenerate friends are waiting."

He loses track of how long she's been gone. He sends so many owls to her gallery they start sending them back unopened. Is she there? No, she's not here, please stop this Mr Zabini, it's becoming upsetting to the artists in residence. Miss Patil is on sabbatical, no we don't know when she'll be back. She didn't leave an address or a message. We don't know who to ask, try her sister. Try her friends.

The truth is she doesn't have friends. When he realizes it, he starts to understand: she doesn't have friends. Not really. He was her friend. He was her friend and he hurt her, he was mean to her, he was a bad friend to her, he let her down. He loved her badly, so she left.

She tells him his palm says he has a big heart, that he'll live a long life. He has "air palms," all anxiety and artistry, she's jealous. Three children or no children, unclear. One lover but also, many trysts. Sensuality abounds, she muses, either teasing him or lamenting it to herself.

She kisses the center of his palm and curls his fingers around it, which is the only part of that he actually believes.

"Thought you said I was dying," he says.

"You are," she says, "but you're going to live a long life while you do it."

"Do what?"

"Die slowly."

"Sounds painful," he says.

She gives him a fleeting look of sorrow and her eyes briefly water, red-rimmed.

"It will be," she says. "It is."

"I know you," he says.

She cut her hair and changed her perfume, but still, it's unquestionably her.

"Yeah?" she says.

"Yeah," he tells her, "but you don't know me."

"I don't?"

"Not anymore. Whoever that was before, he finally died," he says. "The handsome gentleman you see before you was just recently born. Possibly this morning."

She arches a brow, then beckons for his palm. "Show me."

He gives it to her, and she studies it for a long moment. Several long moments.

"I've seen this palm before," she says, delivering her verdict.

"I know," he tells her. "You have."

"But you're different?"

"Unrecognizable."
"Clean?"

"Virginal."

She pauses a moment, shading her eyes from the sun.

"Are you here to take me home?" she asks, after perhaps another minute of silence.

"I don't need to," he says. "I am home."

When the gallery aides drop off the painting, he's hungover and much more broke than he was yesterday. Still, he turns it over to inspect his new purchase, spotting the label on the back.

_Some People are Made of Death._

Oil on canvas, Parvati Patil, 2 May 1999.

"I wouldn't have answered that owl for just anyone, you know. I have a lot of clients. I can't meet with every rich prick who spends too much money on bad art."

"It's not bad art."

She arches a brow, disagreeing, and he changes his tactics.

"So, how often do you sell your own work?"

She sips her gin quietly. "Never."

(He will kiss her in ten minutes.)

"So this was…?"

"An exception."

(Nine.)

"You made an exception for me?"

"I didn't know it was going to be you, but yes."

"Why this painting?"

(His life will change irreversibly in seven minutes.)

"It was ugly," she says.

"It's not ugly."

"It is," she corrects him, sparing him a glance that says _don't argue_, and he obeys. "It is, and I wanted it to be. I wanted to make something ugly. If I made something ugly then maybe I would get it out of my sight. And if I got it out of my sight, maybe I could get it out of my body. And if it was gone from my body, then maybe it would finally be gone from my soul."

(Six.)
"Did it work?"

"No." Pause. "Not really."

"So what are you going to do about the ugliness?"

"Carry it, I guess. I don't know. Wear it like a cloak. Or a scarf."

"Or a noose?"

"Yep. Probably."

(Five.)

"I like it," he said. "The painting. Well, no," he corrected himself. "I don't like it. It makes me feel sick to look at it, and honestly I was drunk when I bought it."

(Four.)

"But," he said, "I don't want to look away."

(Three.)

"That's brave of you," she says, expressionless. "Or fucked up, I don't know. Perverse, kind of. Definitely a little sexy."

"Thank you? I think."

(Two and a half.)

(Two and a quarter.)

She drains her glass, rising to her feet and glancing toward her office.

(Two.)

"Want to go somewhere?" she asks him.

(One.)

"Yeah," he says. "I thought you'd never ask."

Chapter End Notes

The compliment I value most is people who will read whatever I offer them regardless of what pairing is listed at the top. I don't expect many to reach this point, but to those of you who are here: Thank you, you're my favorites. Title of the story from one of my favorite albums.
Prophecy

Pairing: Nottpott (Theo Nott x Harry Potter)

Universe: fairytale/Disney AU

Rating: T

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) a Tangled AU; 2) archery; 2.5) There's Only One Bed.

Prophecy is a tricky thing. Anyone who has ever been the subject of one will tell you that, though in most cases said subjects are difficult to find. Take young Lord Voldemort, for instance, who is both not young and not a lord, but that's not the point. For the purposes of this story he's a cheeky young lad running around unattended, murdering left and right where it suits him with all the virility of youth, and then one day he hears an unfortunate rumor: A baby that will be his end will be born at the end of July! The worst possible news for any given Tuesday.

Things go wrong as they always do when one tries to bargain with prophecy, which is a bit like fate's kid sister, mostly in the sense that for all we know, fate may not care much for prophecy's shenanigans but there's still a sense of possessiveness there. So young Lord Voldemort, who is not the hero of this story but certainly a character of importance, runs off to kill his baby arch nemesis and then, surprise surprise, it doesn't work. So what does he do? He takes the baby. He disappears.

Why? Unclear. As far as the world can tell, both the baby and our dashing young antagonist are gone, and the world, including me, waits for both its hero and its villain with baited breath. Somehow, there's a sense for all of us that something, somewhere, is missing; Death Eaters and Snatchers wait one way, while the rest of the world waits another. A different boy turns seventeen and opts to disappear rather than choose a side, though nobody cares much about him. Another story, another time.

Well, this story, this time. But at the moment I don't have a lot of spare breaths, because you see, I'm on the run. Again. Most likely I will be on the run for the entirety of the story, if not the whole of my life. But what's important is, again, the prophecy, and it isn't about me.

It's about him.

The story starts here:

Two days before Harry's seventeenth birthday, he wakes to find his father standing over him and jumps. "Holy Salazar fuck," he says before he can stop himself, and his father leans back with a sigh.

"Language, Harry," is what comes from beneath the cloak. "Are you awake or not?"
"I am now," says Harry, who typically rises early, but this is so early as to still be night, and therefore closer to late. He rubs his eyes blearily, frowning around his room. "Did you need something, Father?"

Father is very mysterious, as he always is. He doesn't care for questions. "I have an errand to run," he says. "I came to tell you I won't be back until Thursday."

"But that's two days from now," says Harry.

"Yes," Father says. "And you mustn't leave here until I return."

Harry is never permitted to leave here for a variety of reasons; primarily, the muggles. Father tells him frequently of the dangers of muggles, which have enormous teeth and sometimes claws and who all want Harry to be dead. There are also mudbloods and apparently some half-breeds, which equally can't be trusted. Essentially, it's safest if Harry just stays here, where Father's untraceable wards can protect him. Even magic isn't enough to keep him safe among the outside world, though only Father has it.

"You've never been gone so long," Harry says uncertainly, and Father gives a weighty sigh.

"I found something I've been looking for, Harry. I need to fetch it. Just stay here," he says. "I've left you plenty of food. Read a book," he suggests.

"What a wonderful idea, Father," says Harry.

Eventually Father rummages around collecting things and prepares to depart, plucking his usual bottle of tonic from Harry's shelf. Father is very particular, and he must take this tonic each evening. It is Harry who procures the ingredients, though he doesn't stray too far. After all, outside of these wards, danger is lurking. Muggles are waiting to eat his flesh; to pick at their teeth with his bones.

"Behave," says Father. "Father loves you."

"And I love you, Father," Harry says solemnly, retrieving a book from his shelf and settling into his chair, beginning to read this particular story for the fourteenth time. "Have a wonderful trip," he says, and watches his father slip out the door, heavy cloak disappearing into the night.

Harry has a good life here in the forest, safe inside his untraceable plot of land. That much is unquestionable, as he is securely kept from harm and he is loved by his adoring father and he has quite a lot of books and also arrows for procuring his father's tonics. He has everything he could need.

Though, Harry also has a secret, and it is this:

He is deeply, prodigiously bored.

The next day, Theo is running, as he always is. The trick to stealing is not the stealing itself but the running, because anyone can snatch something up, but not everyone can disappear quickly. Sometimes he uses a broom, though Theo doesn't care for flying. He has long legs and an impossible stride and if he looks a bit weedy, that's only because of the long legs and impossible stride, which make him an uncommonly gifted thief.

Yesterday, Theo paid a visit to Hogwarts, which is not a school he attends, but rather a school he used to attend until recently and is now something of a veritable treasure trove he still uses in order to eat. He went there long enough to learn Gamp's Law of Elemental Transfiguration, which means it was sufficient time to understand the only thing that truly makes food is money. So, from time to time Theo pops by and plucks up an odd book or a remembrall or something he can turn around and sell in Knockturn Alley, and on this particular capital venture he has stolen a bit of chatty silver, but also something else.

Theo, nearly briefly caught, was forced to hide inside a cupboard when the Headmaster suddenly burst into the kitchens, saying something to one of the elves about treacle or possibly nitwit, blubber, oddment, tweak. The most important thing about this story is the wand sticking out of the Headmaster's pocket, which for some reason (fun?) Theo steals.

The second most important thing about this story is that today, Theo, who was spotted by the castle's poltergeist upon scaling down from a second-floor window, is now, once again, on the run.

"Did ye hear?" wails one of the patrons at the Hog's Head. "Dumbledore's gone—killed, yesterday, and 'is wand stolen, too!"

An unfortunate coincidence, Theo wants to say, but doesn't.

"Who could have possibly killed Dumbledore?" someone asks, dismayed.

"Some sort o' weedy little thief. A former student, if ye can believe that—"

"No," gasps the patron's companion. "A student, really?"

"They say it's one of the purebloods," another patron says, overhearing. He glances around before adding under his breath, "Nott."

"The Death Eater, you mean?"

"The very same. 'Course it was Peeves who saw 'im," says the first patron, "and everyone knows what Peeves' about, but the bugger doesn't lie, does 'e? Dumbledore's dead, and it's Nott who's killed 'im."

Upon hearing his name, Theo thinks one thing: Fuck.

Then the barkeep locks eyes with him, brows furrowing, and Theo thinks another, more familiar thing:

Run.

Harry contemplates the line on the ground that represents his safety. It's a spell, his father tells him. Something to keep him safe, and to keep others out. Something untraceable. Beyond the line is danger. Here, though, Harry is secure, impossible to locate. Safe.

Harry eyes the line and toes it, then stops.

When nothing happens, he takes a step, and then another. One at a time, his feet plant themselves outside the line of his father's spell.

He takes a breath, free of his father's magic for the first time in his life.

Then something collides with him, and he goes tumbling down to the ground.

"Holy fuck," says something, which is evidently someone, and Harry wrestles himself away with his usual quickness, producing an arrow from his quiver and holding it to the obstacle's face.

"Who are you?" he demands. "Are you a muggle?"

The thing, which is strangely familiar in that it is mostly Harry-shaped but with skinnier limbs and less wild hair, glares up at him. "What the fuck?" says the thing, which must be a person. "Is that a fucking arrow?"

Harry quickly loads the arrow in his waiting bow and shoves his foot down on the thing-person's chest, causing it to groan. "Are you a muggle or aren't you?"

"I hardly think it matters," coughs the man-monster. "What are you doing running out of nowhere like that?"

"Out of nowhere? This is my house!"

"Uh," the thing says. "What house?"

So then Harry stops, eyes widening, because he has forgotten something in his calculations: He has, up until this point in his life, lived in an untraceable house on an unfindable plot of forest where his father has assured him every single day of his life that no one, ever, would be able to reach him.

Now that he is outside it, of course he can no longer see the house.

Immediately, Harry panics. The arrow, strung tight in his bow, shakes a little in his hand. He has no method of safety now. He has the little wooden whistle in his pocket, which he blows to make the horned horses come, and he has his arrows, but he has no way of returning home.

Instead of panicking for long, however, Harry notices something about the boy-thing he's currently stepping on, which is a wand. A very familiar wand. Something he's seen before in a book he has read several dozen times, and which has always given his father a strange, disconcerting look.

"Where did you get that?" Harry asks. "You shouldn't have it."

"I know," says the man-boy-thing, though he adds afterwards, "Why, is it valuable?"

"It's invincible," says Harry, frowning. "And lost."

Whatever it is that's just collided with him smiles so archly Harry can see all his teeth, which are not pointed, though it's not unscary and Harry certainly isn't unscared.

"Not lost anymore," says Harry's new problem.

The person who calls himself Harry is essentially a feral thing, which is ideal, because he clearly doesn't read the Daily Prophet and therefore has no interest in turning Theo over to any Aurors. Theo suggests they get some food and talk about whatever wand this is he's procured, mostly for the conversation but also to be polite, but instead Harry draws his arrow lightning-fast, prowling into the woods, and within minutes sets up a spit for what turns out to be delightfully seasoned rabbit.

"It's the Elder Wand," Harry says, having at least the decency to chew politely, so he wasn't entirely raised by wolves. "My father's looking for it."

"Oh?" says Theo, realizing Harry's father will know how to find it quite soon if he reads the papers, which could be either good news or bad. "Is he a buyer?"

"He's quite ill," says Harry. "He requires a nightly tonic I have to hunt."

By this point Theo has learned a few other things about Harry: one, he's a lunatic. He seems to be obsessed with teeth. Two, Harry seems to have never left his house or this forest, which means he knows absolutely nothing about anything if it hasn't existed in books, and therefore Theo is unsure what he means by tonic.

"Oh, I hunt the horned horse," Harry says. "Well, I summon it, and then—"

"The tonic is unicorn blood?" Theo asks with horror. "But anyone who kills a unicorn lives a half-life. A cursed life—"

Which would explain a lot, but Harry gives a happy-cheery sort of shrug. "I don't kill it," he says. "I just ask it for some and it gives it to me, and then I put it into a bottle for my father."

Theo is starting to think he's come across something very, very strange.

"About your father," Theo says. "Is he… normal?"

"He's a bit skeletal," says Harry thoughtfully. "Which is why he wears a cloak. But he keeps me safe," he adds with a shrug.

"He keeps you hidden," Theo corrects, "and he's looking for an invincible wand, and he thinks—"

Slowly, too slowly, Theo pieces this together. "Wait. He hates muggles?"

"Only the ones with teeth," Harry says, and Theo is about to say something like holy shit I think maybe your father isn't actually your father or if he is then you are in terrible trouble whoever you are, because suddenly I have an idea who actually killed Headmaster Dumbledore and also, I think I know what he was after and now, inconveniently, he's going to be after me, only someone interrupts them.

"Theodore Nott, put your hands in the air!"

Aurors. Lots of them. Theo winces, about to rise to his feet in surrender, but then Harry draws an arrow, and then another.

Harry, Theo realizes, is either the best thing that has ever happened to him, or the worst.

Theo rushes Harry out of the forest, which is not a place Harry has ever thought to have a beginning or an end. The forest was his entire world until this morning, but now Theo is dragging him into some sort of village and furiously wiping the blood from Harry's face.

"Do you realize what you just did?" Theo demands.

"Saved you," Harry says. "Why?"

Theo pauses for a moment, tense, but then sighs.

"Fine, yes," Theo tells him raggedly, "but still, be careful with those arrows."

"Were those muggles?" Harry asks him, feeling a wary concern for Theo's safety now that he knows they're both vulnerable to being eaten alive, and in answer, Theo gives him a hard look.
"Come on," Theo says, and sucks Harry into the air, into time and space, until they're standing somewhere bright and blinding.

This, Theo explains, is a place called London. Specifically, this is the British Museum, which is filled with a lot of interesting things, some of which Theo has tried to steal (a crime, Harry admonishes him, which for some reason Theo ignores) and others he just looks at.

"See these people?" Theo asks Harry, who can hardly see at all, it's so bright. "All muggles. The whole lot of 'em. Muggle from tip to toe."

"But—" Harry stares at them, awed, and clutches his bow tightly. "But their teeth are—"

"Normal? Yes," Theo confirms, and waves his wand again, sending them somewhere new this time, which Theo calls a pub. "Now, tell me about your father and this wand."

Harry repeats what he remembers from the tale about Death and the three brothers, which is of course every line, but then he realizes it's getting late and he tells Theo he'll have to get back before his father arrives home. Father was going to fetch something, but he'll be very worried if Harry's gone. They'll have to make it back to the unsearchable house before Harry's birthday, which is tomorrow.

Well, tonight at midnight, technically.

"I'll take you back," Theo says to Harry. "For now, though, come with me."

Theo takes Harry to an impossibly tiny room above the pub, which he claims is his flat. He tells Harry they'll stay there for the night, and then tomorrow, when Harry is seventeen, they'll be able to find Harry's house in the woods.

"How do you know?" says Harry.

"Just a hunch," says Theo, and adds, "Besides, I think your father might come looking for me."

For a moment Harry wonders where he'll sleep in the interim, but Theo just shoves him onto the bed and lies down on the floor, claiming it's not the worst thing he's ever done. Harry argues and they speak crossly until Harry points an arrow at Theo in frustration and Theo knocks the bow from Harry's hand, calling his bluff.

"You're not going to hurt me," Theo says, throwing Harry's only weapon across the floor, and for a second Harry is angry and a little frightened.

"No," he says miserably, "I'm not."

He misses his father. He misses his house. For a second he wishes he had never taken a single step outside those wards, but then Theo is standing in front of him and Theo curls his hands around Harry's face and Theo doesn't have claws and his teeth are carnivorous but normal and when Theo breathes, Harry breathes.

When Theo comes closer, Harry soars.

Theo's lips touch his and Harry changes his mind about missing things. He changes his mind about houses and wands. He changes his mind about muggles. Theo lips touch his and Harry changes, he's rebuilt from the inside out and reconstructed, piece by piece. Harry wants to take this new form and put it closer to Theo, as close as he can. He wants to be one with Theo, indistinguishable. He pulls Theo onto the bed with him and faces him and looks at him and breathes him and kisses him and Theo does all of that too, like a mirror. Like a reflection of Harry himself.

Theo changes Harry and Harry changes Theo, too. He can see it happen. He watches Theo traverse from shock to hunger to wonder and Harry thinks enormous things, like how he wants to put an arrow in Theo's hands. He wants to put all of his arrows in Theo's hands, to give them to Theo to keep them safe. He wants to put his hands all over Theo until there isn't an inch of him untouched. Harry doesn't even get tired, not like he normally does. He doesn't miss books. None of this is in books. In books there are brothers and lovers and somehow, for Harry, Theo is both.

By the time the sun rises, this new version of Harry has lived an entire life in a night.

But then, like two days before, Harry wakes to his father standing over him, one hand closed around Harry's throat, and once again Harry is alarmed, though for different reasons this time. His father is looking not at him, but at Theo, and it occurs to Harry that actually, his father has strange teeth and ugly eyes and his hands aren't much different from claws.

Maybe his father's sickness can't be cured.

Prophecy is a tricky thing. It leaves out the details, like if you foolishly try to kill the boy born to parents who've thrice defied you and it doesn't work, then you have the option of either letting the boy grow up to be some sort of symbol of the resistance inevitably leading to your death or you can hide him in the woods, somewhere no one could ever find him. You could teach him to fear the outside world and make him dependent on you, force him to hunt fragile things for you. But of course, what a young lad like you might not understand is that beautiful things can still come from ugliness. They do it every day, so maybe you can raise a child with hate and he will still turn out a beautiful, prophetic thing.

Prophecy does not include the caveats, like how a baby with defiance in his blood might one day grow up and slip out from his cage only to find another, worse boy who comes blessed with a pair of long legs and light fingers. It doesn't tell you that if you fail to kill the baby who later becomes a man, then the world will conspire to save him. The world, in the form of a weedy, irresponsible thief, will point an invincible wand at you on the morning you planned to finally kill your abducted son/nemesis and say, "Neither can live while the other survives," which is this thief's way of saying hasta la vista, baby.

So then Lord Voldemort dies and the subject of this particular prophecy turns to me and I, irresponsible thief and freshly-minted murderer that I am, think well fuck, here we go, time to run again, but he kisses me, and I kiss him back, and the story doesn't end, because I turn the page and there's more story, endless, and I kiss him like that, like I have no end, because there's only one prophecy that matters, and at the moment, it's the one that says:

Your fate has just caught up with you.

Pairing: Ronsy (Ron Weasley x Pansy Parkinson)

SURPRISING BETROTHAL NEWS FROM WAR HERO WEASLEY AND HEIRESS PARKINSON

Fascinating development indeed following the announcement of an engagement between Ronald Weasley and Pansy Parkinson, writes social correspondent Rita Skeeter. Many in the wizarding world will be quick to register the sensation of surprise, perhaps even astonishment, at hearing the news that two such highly public figures have been carrying out what has obviously been an exceedingly furtive romance. While the highly public fallout from Miss Parkinson's previous relationship with Draco Malfoy and the even more recent disintegration of Mr Weasley's relationship with fellow war hero Hermione Granger have certainly been enough to send all four into hiding, it is perhaps safe to say that no one quite expected this news to break between two such unlikely parties.

While it may be rather out of fashion to discuss, there is no denying the Weasleys and the Parkinsons have had their disagreements over the past few centuries. Optically, this is a match that might make someone awakening from a coma consider returning to sleep! True, modern times call for modern sensibilities, as both families must be distinctly aware, but the couple have hardly been known for their amicability. While Weasley and Parkinson were Prefects together during their Hogwarts years, their personal history shows they interacted very little except to trade sharpened barbs, according to their former classmates.

"I can't say I find this to be anything less than a shock," adds Lavender Brown, an erstwhile paramour of Weasley's. "I had no idea they were even civil, much less romantic. Are you sure this isn't more of an obituary sort of thing? Did they both die, maybe?"

"I think it makes sense in a distinctly weird way," remarks Terry Boot, a prefect of Ravenclaw house while Parkinson and Weasley attended Hogwarts. "I mean, who else would have them, right?"

"I'd really prefer not to talk about this," comments Harry Potter. "I thought I made it clear you couldn't come to my office whenever you needed a stupid quote about Hermione. Oh hang on, this is about Ron? Wait. What's Ron done?"
... how pleased I was to hear of their engagement, Dahlia, how wonderful! You didn't ask, of course, but allow me to assure you I have no lingering qualms about your daughter's urgency to turn my adoptive son over to You Know Who. Assuming there are no other Dark Lords coming to power I will rest assured there will not be a repeat of former events. Bygones! Obviously we're thrilled, as I can't think of an acceptable reason we could possibly feel otherwise. As far as it goes with the details, I think it's best we keep it small, don't you? We'd be happy to host it. My eldest had his wedding here and aside from the small interruption by your husband and his warmongering comrades, it was a truly lovely affair...

... assure you not to concern yourself with the details! Your son is of course not what we would consider a traditional match, but I think we both know (some of us more than others) that nothing is traditional anymore. As for your offer to help financially, that was very charming, Molly, thank you, I quite enjoyed the laugh, but of course it's not a problem for us to take on the bulk of the society events. It's best if I handle everything, as I'm sure you're already aware my husband and I are very well connected. (You might remember Warwick from Hogwarts, I suspect? I was of course a mere child at the time!) In terms of the engagement dinner, if I could just confirm your wardrobe? The color palette in our ballroom is rather a challenging one for your complexion...

Do you really think this'll work?

Of course it'll work. What do you think I am, an amateur?

MINISTRY EMPLOYEE ASSAULTS FORMER HOGWARTS GOVERNOR AT SON'S ENGAGEMENT DINNER

'Volatile' hardly begins to describe this evening's dinner celebrating the engagement between Pansy Parkinson and Ronald Weasley, writes social correspondent Rita Skeeter. While the event was practically aglow with the finest of wizarding society and also many members of the extended Weasley clan, it appears some bad blood still managed to work its way to the surface—literally! After what could only be called a hostile exchange of words between Arthur Weasley, department head for the Misuse of Muggle Artefacts department, and Warwick Parkinson, former governor for Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, the interaction soon came to blows alongside what will unfortunately not be the subject of this article: the truly breathtaking cake, designed by Diagon's own Winchester Ambrose of Ambrose's Ambrosial Delights. While there is no telling what initiated the altercation aside from generations of warring ideology, the bride and groom did not seem to take the family squabble to heart.

"Oh, them? Yeah, they're fine," remarks close friend of the groom, Seamus Finnegan. "Are you going to finish that, by the way?"

… on earth was I supposed to know Arthur would still be so sensitive about it? War is such an ugly thing, Molly, so of course Warwick would never have mentioned it had Arthur not brought it up. We would never have guessed you still considered the wound so fresh, considering at your age, there is so little time to waste on old wounds. I am still waiting, of course, for Arthur's apology, and if you could give your daughter something of a nudge, I'm sure Pansy would be relieved to hear from her. Bat mucus is extremely difficult to remove from silk and for her father to have had to take his formal portraits with such obvious blemishes will surely dampen what is otherwise an exceedingly joyous occasion...

… true, thank you for reminding me, Dahlia, that of course five years is long enough for anyone to have forgotten the carnage of having our world utterly turned upside down. I don't mean your obvious hardships of Ministry fines, of course, though clearly that must have traumatized you deeply. Consider it all forgotten! Tell Pansy to rest assured, I'm positive Ginny will have passed along her condolences for Warwick's robes, and in the meantime I hope Warwick's nose is healing nicely. Frankly, I'm shocked Arthur was able to make such precise contact with such a peculiar target! I do so look forward to what our grandchildren will end up with...

It's not working, Parkinson.

How is it not working?

My mum's still driving me mad, isn't she?

It's not an instant fix, Weasley, Christ. Were you expecting me to kill her?

I can't believe I'm having to clarify this, but just in case: I'd really prefer if you did not.

Then sit quietly and let the adults do their work. By the way, those robes were a vast improvement. The portrait should be lovely.

You picked them out.

Yes, and I have magnificent taste.

I can't wait for this to be over.

It will be, Weasley, soon. My money's on your mother calling it off any day now.

Doubtful. Did you see your mum's face when my dad punched yours?

I did. And I positively relished it.

Funnily enough, so did I.

GUEST LISTS REVEALED FOR FORTHCOMING PARKINSON-WEASLEY AFFAIR

In today's social news, a shocking turn of events as the Parkinsons and Weasleys reveal their guests for the coming wedding breakfast and ceremony, writes social correspondent Rita Skeeter. While it's certainly not unusual to have an A-list and a B-list, this one is quite a baffling series of decisions, almost as if the two parties opted to throw some names arbitrarily into a hat, threw the hat away, and then asked an inebriated rabbit to choose for them. While there are certainly the expected names—Harry Potter and Hermione Granger on one side, Theodore Nott and Draco Malfoy on the other—they've all been mixed in with distant Sacred Twenty-Eight cousins, popular public figures, custodial Ministry employees, members of the Greek aristocracy, and what appears to be a small Icelandic village.

"I do not know vat I am doing here," comments Viktor Krum, another mystified ceremony invitee. "Does this mean Herm-ow-ninny is free?"

... room for our many guests, of course. I'm sure you're having a similar problem; after all, Ronald is sixth of seven, isn't he? Or is it eight of nine? I tried to count during the engagement dinner but I'm afraid I was frequently having to start over. I must say, it's a wonder you can keep track of how many of them are coming and going, though by the sounds of it perhaps you don't...
... are quite frosty together, aren't you? Ronald and I are of course inconceivably close, I adore him, and I'm sure that must be uncomfortable for you, all that affection flying about unattended. So interesting to see there was one more Parkinson guest than there were Weasleys in the end; surely a coincidence. By the way, have we spoken about my Aunt Muriel's tiara? I'm positive Pansy will want to wear it, after all I think she gets enough coldness from your side of the family without having to add in their jewels...

You're mad.

Am I?

You're absolutely mad. What did you do, taunt your mother into expanding the guest list?

You sound impressed.

I'm not impressed, I'm in awe. Though my mum's head's going to explode any day now, and I specifically told you not to kill her.

It's not my fault they're doing precisely what we predicted they'd do. Are you trying to tell me you're out?

What, now? Absolutely not. Hermione's even owled me to ask if I'm dying or something.

You see? All we have to do is carry out the plan, and soon enough we'll both have precisely what we wanted.

AFTERNOON BRIDAL SHOWER ERUPTS IN FLAME, SINGES REPORTER'S BRAND NEW ROBES

This morning's celebration of Pansy Parkinson's forthcoming nuptials to Ronald Weasley were off to a lovely start until a startling turn of events involving what some suspect to be creature-related arson brought the whole thing to a fiery halt. While the event began beautifully, with many a society witch and also Hermione Granger joining Miss Parkinson for tea in honor of her highly publicized marriage next month, it appears there may have been some tension around the time of the fire, which blazed along the outer edge of the Parkinson estate.

Closest to the flames were the mothers of the bride and groom, Molly Weasley and Dahlia Parkinson, both of whom were later reported to be "a bit scorched around the boots, but otherwise unharmed" by the unlikely presence of what nearby party-goers suspect to be the usual incendiary behavior of wild Cornish pixies.

"Pixies? Is that what Mum said? What a load of hogwash," remarks Ginevra Weasley, sister of the groom. "Honestly, I haven't seen my mum lose her cool like that in ages, though if anyone was going to get set upon by her untended rage, it makes sense to be that awful w-"

"GINNY, COME ALONG," shrieked the mother of the groom calmly, flashing this reporter a manic smile as she dragged her daughter away.

... you have some sort of problem with my daughter's marriage to your son, then of course I would love to hear it. We have tried and tried to be accommodating but it appears your family has yet to reconcile what I can only imagine to be lingering Weltschmerz following the war. Have you tried meditation to soothe your petty grievances? Candor is such an important thing between family...
WAR HERO'S STAG PARTY RESULTS IN MASSIVE KNOCKTURN DRUG BUST

While out with the lads, future husband to Pansy Parkinson and current junior Auror for the Department of Magical Law Enforcement Ronald Weasley happened upon some suspicious criminal activity this evening, writes social correspondent Rita Skeeter. Weasley is of course best known for being eternal sidekick to Harry Potter, the Boy Who Lived and champion of the wizarding world, but on this particular evening it is, in a historic first, Weasley's own name in the spotlight. Upon departing a pub on the outskirts of Diagon, Weasley is said to have caught sight of former Snatcher and Greyback apostle Amias Sterling, ultimately giving chase. After a bit of dueling, Weasley and Potter apprehended Sterling inside a tavern that seems to have been a front for dark artifacts and illicit narcotics.

Weasley, who was injured by a blast from Sterling's associates, declined an interview, though his fiancée, also out and about for a hen do this evening, was summoned to the scene. Little could be heard from their exchange upon arrival, but Parkinson, wearing a custom set of sequin robes and a crown of phalluses, was spotted tending to her future husband's wounds.

"At first I thought this whole thing was a total sham and we were only getting sauced for a laugh," said Milicent Bulstrode, "but now I think maybe Weasley can legitimately get it. In fairness, Pansy's had quite a lot of Ogden's."

"You love to see it," contributed Tracey Davis fondly, adjusting her BRIDE TRIBE sash.

"I thought this interview was supposed to be about crime," said Amias Sterling, recent arrestee. "How am I supposed to know if they're serving quail at the reception?"

… feel differently now that my son the war hero is a hero once again! I believe you've spoken before about 'social credentials,' have you not? Of course, I'm aware you must assign value to other things, though I can't possibly think what; given the way Pansy is unemployed and has never contributed anything to the world or to society in any way…

… so adorable that he should have any sort of profession. A job, how quaint! The pressure of bearing a name like ours can be so deeply stressful, it's lovely that he has a hobby. What a relief, too, that he can accomplish anything without Harry Potter's assistance! You must be so very proud, and I am speaking of course of Ronald, who is one of your sons, in case perhaps you had forgotten which…

We can never do that again.

Agreed.

If you tell anyone I'll kill you.

I'll kill myself, believe me.
It was just the one time.

Yes.

Good.

Forgotten.

Absolutely.

Though it wasn't terrible, was it?

Shut up.

Right. Well, I'm sure this will all be over soon enough, and then we'll never have to speak again.

Of course.

Good.

Excellent.

Quite.

Apropos of nothing, what are you doing later?

You have wedding things for me to do, I take it?

Yes. Wedding things. Good idea.

WEDDING REHEARSAL ENDS IN TEARS, EXTENSIVE PROPERTY DAMAGE, DISSOLUTION OF HIGH-PROFILE BETROTHAL

A sad day for love indeed, writes social correspondent Rita Skeeter, as the saga that has been the Parkinson-Weasley wedding comes to an end this evening. Always an unlikely match, it is now perhaps fair to say that everyone involved expected this to end badly, and none could be disappointed by the results. A mix of charmed birds, bat-bogeys, accusations, and fists, this is one dinner not soon to be forgotten.

"Obviously we're devastated," said Ron Weasley, hands clasped with his former intended. "But it's become quite clear that neither our families nor our previous partners are quite ready for our love."

"It is with heavy hearts that we announce our official separation," added Pansy Parkinson somberly. "We do hope that one day, there will be a world where families like ours are not drawn into such terrible conflict."

Indeed, this reporter is deeply saddened to lose the entertainment that has been this unlikely affair. However, there is a light on the horizon! With Malfoy and Granger at each other's throats and Potter and Nott coming to blows this evening amid the reckoning between the Parkinsons and Weasleys, it appears there will be no peace anytime soon.

… SO ABSOLUTELY DISGUSTED I NEARLY DIED OF SHAME. IT IS A RELIEF TO KNOW WE HAVE NOTHING FURTHER TO SAY TO ONE ANOTHER. THOUGH BEFORE I GO, ALLOW ME TO ASSURE YOU THIS HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH BLOOD AND EVERYTHING TO DO WITH YOU BEING A MISERABLE, CONNIVING LITTLE…

… any remaining costs and leave it at that. I must say, Molly, I'm disappointed you've managed such a poor showing, but of course it's no surprise. A return to the normality of your absence will be a marvelous reprieve, and it is with great pleasure that I look forward to a lifetime of never speaking to you again…

Hungry?

Starved. Why?

Thought we could get dinner.

What, like a date?

Sure. If you want to call it that.

You want to date me? Weasley, you poor thing. I thought this was just about getting back at our exes and ruining our mothers’ lives.

It was. But now it's not.

Interesting. So what's it about now?

I don't know. You?

Seems unlikely. Sex?

That works.

Such a dirty boy you are.

So you're in?

Why not? See you in an hour.

Excellent. Can't wait.

In Harmonia Progressio

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione), Nottpott (Theo x Harry)

Universe: eighth year AU

Rating: T

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) dramione are assigned a toddler in a family planning class at hogwarts; 2) dramione/nottpott post-war at Hogwarts, Draco has to deal with issues of returning and Harry finds comfort in Theo. I didn't exactly keep to that first prompt, but… kinda.

"Harmonia harminetus," announced Professor Sprout, referencing what appeared to be a plump, leafy fern before her. "This particular plant is the source of most therapeutic balms and ointments, but it does have certain… preferences, as you'll soon learn. For this particular lesson, we'll be separating into partners. Let's see," she murmured, casting a glance around the room to where each pair of students stood before a pot of fresh soil. "Well, you've mostly arranged yourselves, haven't you? So let's have Nott with Malfoy, Potter with Granger—"

Hermione glanced at Harry with relief. "Thank god," she murmured under her breath, inching closer to him. "I was so worried I was going to have to work with—"

There was a sudden, wailing sob that became a scream, manifesting from somewhere in Harry and Hermione's seedling. At first it was easy to ignore, nothing more than a twitch of discomfort to the inner ear, but gradually, there was no denying that the plant's entire soul was in palpable hysterics.

"Oh no, oh no," fussed Professor Sprout, leaping down to shove Hermione and Harry apart, glancing over at the pot. "No, this won't do—Nott, come here—"

The harmonia harminetus screamed ever more distressfully, sounding as if it had been tortured.

"Fine, fine—Malfoy… Mr Malfoy!"

Hermione flinched as Draco sulked forward and the screaming abruptly stopped, settling to a tiny snifflle.

"Well," Professor Sprout said. "I did say they had peculiarities, did I not? Malfoy with Granger, then, and Potter, take a step to the left?"

There was a pause as Harry took a slow, unwilling step towards Theo's planter. Much to Harry's obvious distress, the plant began making tiny gurgling noises, cooing its approval.

"Marvelous," ruled Professor Sprout, exhaling in relief. "Well, that's that, then, isn't it?"

This was N.E.W.T. level Herbology, which of course Harry was only taking because it seemed like a nice place to finally get a bit of peace and also, because Neville had all but begged him. Seeing as Harry had already decided he'd had enough of the Ministry to last him a lifetime, he figured he ought to test the limits of his interests. All he'd wanted was to be an Auror alongside Ron, but now that it was a possibility, he wasn't entirely sure what he wanted. He'd only come back because Hermione had thought it wise, and whatever Hermione thought wise was probably close enough to it.

Theo Nott and Draco Malfoy were the only Slytherins to return for their eighth year, and their reasons were both distinct from Harry's and functionally the opposite. The Ministry was requiring it, as far as Harry could tell; a rehabilitation of sorts.

Not that Harry could figure out how his reward and Theo's punishment were the same thing. Tending to an infantile seedling that grew finicky each time its whims went unacknowledged seemed like a poor substitute for governmental accolades and a flourishing career. The Harmonia plant seemed to require feeding at all sorts of odd hours, growing easily too warm or too cold depending on the slightest shift in humidity. On the second day of tending to their plant, Harry and Theo were fanning it more vigorously each time its tiny, recently-sprouted leaves went limp.

"I don't see why we both have to do this," grumbled Harry, frustrated. "I was supposed to help Ginny with the new recruits by three." He wasn't captain—it was her turn—but still. Better that than this.

"Oh yes, for your little game," drawled Theo. "The one where you fly around and toss each other the toy?"

Harry bristled. "Quidditch is not just a game, Nott, it's—"

"That's right, you catch the special toy, I forgot," said Theo. "Silly me."

Harry glared at him, rising to his feet. "You can do this alone," he said definitively. "It doesn't take two people to keep a plant from overheating."

He spun, preparing to head to the pitch, when their harmonia seedling gave off a high pitched whistle, gradually becoming a sound like "deeeeaayyyyyaaaaddddDDDDYYYY!"

"Did that just—" Harry stopped. "Did it just—"

"—dadadadADADADDAYYYYYYY—"

"—fine, fine, sorry," Harry said hurriedly, shushing the little sprouted leaves. "I'll stay, I promise. I'm right here," he soothed it. "I'm right here, I promise."

The plant gave a little shudder of relief, and Harry glanced up, spotting Theo hiding a laugh.

"What?" he demanded.
"Nothing," said Theo.

"What, Nott?"

"I told you, nothing."

"You obviously think something's funny—"

"No, no. I don't." Theo gave one of the plant's leaves a gentle stroke. "Poor little war hero," he murmured to it, glancing up just long enough to give Harry a broad, half-taunting smirk. "If it isn't one thing, it's another."

The mockery was the cherry on top of an already frustrating afternoon. "Why doesn't it scream like that at you?" Harry demanded, and Theo gave a shrug in response.

"Because," he said. "It already knows I'm not going to leave."

The harmonia plant had been alternating between loud moans and intense bursts of hiccups for at least the last twenty minutes.

"It's hungry," said Draco flatly.

"It's not hungry," retorted Hermione. "It's only half past two!"

"Look at it, Granger—"

"Look at what, Malfoy?"

"It's obviously in distress, and whenever it's hungry it gets a bit peaky-looking like that—"

"All the books say to keep a regular schedule, Malfoy—"

"Would you put down the books for a second, Granger, and look at the fucking thing—"

"Look at what? It's precisely the normal height for this stage of development—"

"Don't worry about its height, I'm talking about its needs—"

"Are you trying to tell me I'm not nurturing our plant well enough?"

"AHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH," wailed the plant, and Draco growled his frustration, rubbing his pounding temples as Hermione gave an exasperated half-whimper, bending to face the plant head on.

"What is it?" she offered coaxingly. "I'm right here, I promise—"

"—ahhhHHHHHHHHHhhhhhaaAAAAEEEEEE—"

"For fuck's sake," Draco snapped, reaching over her for the mix of water and salt. "Here, just give it some, would you?"

"Malfoy, it doesn't need an—"

"—YYYYYYYYYAAAAAAAAHHHHHHHHHHRRRRRR—"

"Granger, just take it!"
"Fine, I just—here, HERE, here you go, EVERYTHING'S FINE! Everything's—" Hermione broke off, collapsing with exhaustion as the plant happily lapped up the fertilizer, suckling at the sodden dirt with cheerful gurgles.

"Everything is fine," Hermione said, and promptly burst into tears, falling onto the low stool behind her.

Draco stared at her, taken aback, before clearing his throat, crouching down until they were nearly at eye level. "Granger," he said, approximating a comforting tone.

She gave a little sniffle from behind her palms, shoulders quaking with silent sobs.

"Er," Draco said. "Listen, Granger. Ah. This is… it's fine. Really. If you need to, erm." He sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose. "Do you, if you want…? So. Yeah."

"I," she announced from behind her hands, "am less maternal than Draco Malfoy."

"Uh," he said.

"I," she repeated, abruptly surfacing from her hysteria to reveal her red-rimmed eyes and swollen nose, "am less nurturing than a war criminal!"

"Well," said Draco stiffly, "that's a lovely way to put it, thanks—"

"I don't know what people need," she sobbed, suddenly collapsing again. "I don't know what they want. I don't understand it. I don't understand anything."

She cried a few more minutes in earnest, though it seemed to not be about Draco at all. A relief, really, as most things seemed to be about him these days.

Mostly about how he'd fucked it all up, which he couldn't even argue with.

"Granger," he said. "The plant's telling you what it needs. You don't have to understand. All you have to do is listen."

She sniffled again, turning her overlarge eyes on him for a beat of silence.

Two beats.

Three.

"Sixth year," she said, startling him. "You stopped playing quidditch. You were late to class. Your eyes were shadowed and your exams…" She hesitated. "Your schoolwork suffered."

"I—" He frowned at her. "What?"

"You were clever," she said. "Terrible and smug, but clever. And then you weren't."

"That's a bit harsh," he said defensively, but she was crying again, only this time she had leaned into his shoulder.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I'm sorry no one heard you."

Half of him was frozen with shock, the other half with misery. He was the one who needed to apologize to her. He was the one who was apologizing to the world just by being here, just by existing. He was the one who had come back to the place he'd nearly destroyed, bathing in the wreckage, and not once had he questioned whether his guilt was earned. It was. It was justifiable misery.

This, however.

This was something else.

"It's okay," he said gruffly, because she had offered him something and it would be rude not to accept, and then he gave her hair a tentative stroke, hoping that might somehow return the favor.

From the pot, their plant stretched slowly upwards, humming to itself with a wistful sigh.

"People don't talk about how much it sucks when your best friend leaves you," Harry said.

"No," said Theo. "They don't."

The plant had reached its adolescence, which meant it kept the same hours as a teenager: it rose late, well after their herbology class period, and then stayed awake well into the evening. At the moment they were in the greenhouse alone after midnight, for which they'd had to receive special dispensation from Professor Sprout.

"He left me," Harry said. "It wasn't just Hermione. It was me, too."

Theo was silent a moment.

"You'd make a shitty Auror," he said after a while.

Harry turned his head, arching a brow. "Better not," he warned blandly. "You know the plant hates it when we're cross."

"It's not an argument. I'm not trying to have a row."

"Then what are you—"

"People born in captivity," Theo said, "aren't meant to do it to others. People who live in a cage shouldn't be responsible for putting other people inside them. And people who get left behind shouldn't have to turn their lives into a chase."

Harry blinked, and across from them, the plant gave them both something of a conspiratorial eye roll.

"Why are you here?" Harry asked Theo eventually.

"Complicity," Theo said. "Plus the criminality in my blood."

"No," Harry sighed, impatient, "really."

"Really."

"Stop it or the plant will scream."

"Plant doesn't scream anymore."

"True. It swears, though."

They sat in silence another moment, and then Theo shrugged. "I'm righting my wrongs."
"You don't have any wrongs, Nott."

"Of course I do."

"You don't."

"I do."

"Not like Malfoy does."

"I do."

"Like what?"

"Like everything," Theo said. "I didn't lift a finger. I didn't stop any of it. I just sat there and watched it happen." He glanced at Harry again. "I'm guilty of all of it. Everything Draco did, that's on me just as much."

Harry shook his head. "You were just a kid," he said.

"So were you," said Theo. "And not a damn person tried to make that easier for you."

Harry hesitated, swallowing. "I didn't need them to."

"Yes," Theo said. "Yes, Potter, you fucking did, and they let you down."

A few seconds ticked by in silence as they stared at their angling plant. Out here it was so quiet they could hear a church bell chime the single hour from afar, followed by the sound of Peeves pelting Mrs Norris with something. Probably chalk.

"Is our plant smoking?" asked Harry eventually.

"I think it plans to get a tattoo," said Theo, "shortly."

He slid a hand over, brushing Harry's pinky with his. Harry didn't move.

"Don't leave," said Harry quietly.

Theo turned Harry's hand over without looking, brushing the tips of his fingers over the calluses of his palms and then lacing them together.

"I won't," said Theo, letting Harry hold on tightly.

Their plant matured more slowly than the others. Hermione took to checking on it between classes, sometimes reading aloud to it and otherwise bringing a thermos of tea for her own silent meditation. The third time she did this, she noticed Draco must have been there as well, because the plant's soil was freshly watered. The sixth time, the pot had been rotated to face the sun. The seventh time there was a note that said, "Noon?"

Hermione wrote back, "Noon."

He was sitting beside the plant, which was nearly fully grown now. It hadn't quite caught up to the others, but it would soon. Hermione was quite sure it would soon.

Neither she nor Draco said anything as she took a seat beside him. She was starting to learn things about him, sorting out the language of his posture or his tone. Today he was mostly relaxed, though his hands were clasped tightly.

"Everything alright?" she asked him.

He turned his head slowly, like in a trance, and found her from a long distance.

"Bad news from my mother's trial," he said.

"Oh. I'm sorry."

"Don't be," he said. "It's justice. It's deserved."

Hermione chewed her lip, then leaned forward, taking a closer look at their plant. It had a lovely color to it, a nice sheen. She noticed that it bloomed most on sunny days, and also when she played music. She waved her wand and put on a bit of Vivaldi, and when she settled back, Draco had closed his eyes.

"I like this one," he said. "Spring."

"Feels clean, doesn't it?" she said.

"Yes." His mouth twitched. "That's precisely the word."

She pulled out her book, about to start reading, when she stopped, glancing warily at Draco a second time.

"Do you want to talk about it?"

"No," he said.

"Right," she murmured, and opened her book to the page she'd left off. She glanced over it, half-skimming, and then sighed, shutting it again.

"Draco," she said, and his eyes floated open, finding hers expectantly.

She hesitated a moment, and then leaned forward, pausing just shy of his lips. She waited, letting the syrupy sound of the strings carry from Spring's second movement to the third, and when Draco didn't move, she closed the distance lightly, gently.

It lasted only a moment, her pulse bouncing sweetly, and then she sat back, clearing her throat and picking up her book.

"Thank you," he said.

"You're welcome," she told him.

She leaned her cheek against his shoulder. He tucked one arm around her waist.

Tranquilly, their plant made a soft sound of satisfaction, unfurling its leaves with a contented yawn and sprouting a blade of blossoms as tall as it was wide.
I know, not exactly the request, but I hope it's enjoyable regardless. I've said this many times now (or at least I hope I have) but thank you so much for being here. I am very grateful to have you.

Where You At

Pairing: Parkgrass (Pansy Parkinson x Daphne Greengrass)

Universe: muggle AU

Rating: M

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) Pansy x Daphne pairing; 2) Pansy x Daphne World Cup AU. I took a lot of inspiration from the EP Junk by Carlie Hanson.

Being a teenage girl is already gross and disgusting enough without having a perfect best friend to make it harder, but Daphne only looks perfect. In real life she swears and makes dirty jokes and complains about her zits, but only to Pansy. At school she's hot shit, all short skirts and fluttering lashes and whatever else it takes to get Michael Corner to do her AP Chem labs for her, but when it's just the two of them—at soccer practice, on Pansy's couch, in homeroom, anywhere Daphne might be avoiding being at home—it's different. It's natural. They have a secret language, they make pinky swears, they watch the same shitty tv shows and cry at the same parts of movies. They've been friends forever, longer than forever, ever since they were in diapers. They're practically sisters, as Daphne likes to say.

Pansy isn't allowed to do much on the nights before games, so Daphne usually comes over and they go for a run or something. Anything to get out of the house.

"Did you see Mr Lupin's sweater vest today?" Daphne asks with an air of being about to say something Pansy can never, ever repeat, though she wouldn't. They both know Daphne's secrets will go to Pansy's grave. "He has some real daddy vibes, you know?"

"You're disgusting," says Pansy disapprovingly, and Daphne shoves her off the back road they use that winds between the oversized McMansions of Pansy's gated community. In response, Pansy hooks one leg behind Daphne's knee, playfully tripping her up.

"God, I've been horny since I was like, twelve," sighs Daphne, tightening her ponytail as they both get back on track. "Too bad boys are fucking disgusting."

"And stupid," says Pansy. "Don't forget stupid."

"Totally stupid," Daphne drily agrees, "but they're just so boy, you know? Stupid boys," she laments. "So nice to look at. So totally inept."

"I really worry about what sort of stupid boy you'll end up with when I'm gone," scoffs Pansy unthinkingly, and for a moment, they both fall silent.

Neither of them date much, mostly because dating would take time away from soccer. They both worked hard to make varsity together as freshmen, then worked hard again to make co-captains as juniors, then worked even harder to get offered spots on college teams. They wanted to both work hard for UNC-Chapel Hill after Daphne got offered a spot as a sophomore, but when Pansy was recruited to Harvard, her parents made it clear where she was expected to get her degree. She and Daphne have been spending the last year trying not to think about what's going to happen once they're apart.

"Worry about the stupid boy, not me," says Daphne, eventually breaking the silence.

"Yeah," says Pansy, because she does.

They decide to go to Draco Malfoy's graduation party because one night isn't going to kill them, or so Daphne is forced to reassure Pansy. Pansy is the serious type, always worried about what people think of her, but Daphne's sick of what people think of her. She takes a shot and convinces Pansy to take one. She sees Draco's eyes on her and decides to give him something to look at, pulling Pansy to where the music is loud and starting to dance with her. You know, dance with her. Sexy, or as sexy as Daphne knows how to be without actually doing anything with anyone. She let the Bulgarian foreign exchange student finger her in the bathroom last year thinking it'd be fun and exciting or whatever, but it mostly just hurt, so she hasn't really done much since then. Only Pansy knows about that.

Daphne leans forward to kiss Pansy, knowing every boy in the room is watching. She's sending a very clear message—I'm a bad girl, look how bad I am, I fantasize about blowing my history teacher and I make out with my best friend, it's HOT—but it doesn't quite work out the way she plans, because Pansy is clearly uncomfortable and the kiss is clumsy, so instead Daphne sighs and pulls her away to take more shots. She doesn't have to take very many before she's stumbling, and when she spills on Draco's t-shirt, he rushes off to change and Daphne's already bored. She takes hold of a half-empty bottle of Patron and grabs Pansy's hand, pulling her outside.

They collapse on the lawn, taking turns sipping from the bottle. Pansy is smiling, flushed.

"This feels so weird," says Pansy, who never does anything wrong, ever. She crosses one leg over the other and Daphne watches the muscle flex in her quad. Pansy is really fucking good at soccer. So is Daphne, but Pansy loves it more. She works harder. Daphne is pretty sure she wouldn't be doing this if Pansy hadn't started when they were five, though Daphne is unnaturally quick, effortlessly agile. She loves running. She specifically loves running away.

Daphne's head is spinning a little when she takes the bottle from Pansy's hand. She takes a sip, deciding tequila is disgusting but in a good way, and says, "Have you ever made yourself come?"

"What? Jesus." Pansy's already pink cheeks redden furiously. "Daph. That's... I don't do that."

"God, I do it all the time." The first time was so weird. Her hand cramped doing it and for the entire next day she made excuses about why she couldn't write properly. "I feel like everything gets me going, you know? Mr. Lupin. Draco. Tracey's pink sports bra." That's a secret; it slips out. Pansy says nothing. "I've just got all this energy or something. There's something in me that's constantly on fire. I just want to burn out."

"Don't," says Pansy.

Daphne turns her head, and because she's drunk and sad about them parting ways for the first time ever and also a little curious about Pansy's lip gloss, she leans forward and kisses her again. This time it's just for them, and it's different. Daphne left her hair down for the party, but Pansy's is in her customary ponytail. Daphne grabs it, tugging Pansy's head back, and Pansy lets out a moan in Daphne's mouth that makes them both gasp a little, electrified. This, Daphne realizes, this is it. This is what makes the buzzing stop. This is the most fun she's ever had, and it's scary as fuck, too. In a good way.

No one can see them from here. Daphne slides her hand under Pansy's shirt and Pansy moans again, though she looks guilty about it. Daphne laughs, "Oh my god, your heart is beating so fast," and Pansy kisses her angrily, like it's a betrayal. Her kiss says don't talk about it, just keep going, and Daphne thinks maybe Pansy wants this—maybe all that good behavior keeps her locked up in a cage—so as a favor to her best friend, she decides to be the baddie she pretends to be. She takes off her shirt and Pansy's eyes widen. She takes Pansy's hand and pulls it to her breasts, which yeah, are not very big, because the two of them are both skinny and shaped more like athletes than supermodels. Daphne's palm rests on Pansy's flat stomach, the abs beneath them going firm as Pansy holds her breath.

"It's just me," Daphne says, and she kisses Pansy's neck. Then she kisses Pansy's collarbone. She draws her lips downward, kissing Pansy's cleavage. Her stomach. She pulls up Pansy's dress and Pansy still can't breathe and Daphne leans forward, parting Pansy's thighs. Things are about to get really serious if Daphne lets it.

So she does.

She slides her tongue along Pansy's clit and thinks this is weird, this is so weird, it's hot though, it's so hot, and Pansy gives another moan and buries her fingers in Daphne's hair and Daphne remembers that Pansy's never come before and holy shit, wouldn't it be crazy to do it now? It would be, so Daphne sucks and licks and it's so weird and different because Pansy is so soft here, silky and sweet, even though she's hard muscle everywhere else. Pansy's legs tremble and she pulls Daphne's hair hard and when she comes she practically cries.

Pansy shoves Daphne onto her back and when she works her fingers under Daphne's thong it doesn't hurt this time. Pansy's touch is gentle, stroking, but she won't look away and Daphne is a little embarrassed so she closes her eyes, breathing like she does after the team runs sprints. It feels the same, almost like flying, like winning, like scoring, and she comes so fucking hard and she opens her eyes and Pansy's still staring at her.

"I love you," Pansy says raggedly.

Fuck, Daphne thinks.

Time to run away.

Daphne makes excuses for the rest of the summer and then they go to college. Pansy calls often, every day, and then every week, and then less frequently. Once a month. Then once every other month. Then it's summer again and Daphne doesn't come home because she has a training camp. Her Instagram pictures are full of parties and short skirts and Pansy can't tell whether she's more worried about the pretty girls—Daphne's team at UNC and her sorority sisters—or the boys, who seem to always have their hands on Daphne's bare midriff in the pictures. Daphne's eyes are often unfocused, too, just slightly. Daphne almost never calls Pansy, though when she does it's usually at two or three in the morning when she's just getting home.

Their teams rarely play, but senior year they manage it. Pansy comes to Chapel Hill in Harvard crimson, and Daphne looks perfect in that North Carolina baby blue.
"Are you okay?" Pansy asks.

"I'm amazing," says Daphne, who has just finished telling Pansy about how she fucked her hot comparative literature professor on his desk last week. UNC is undefeated this year. Daphne's on top of the world. "Like, seriously. The best."

"Right, but like… are you okay?" Pansy says.

This time Daphne can hear what she means. Her brow furrows.

"What are you saying?"

"I'm just worried about you, Daph," Pansy says. "I just don't want you to, you know. Get lost."

"Meaning?"

"You're—" Pansy hesitates. "They just don't know you like I know you," she says. "I'm just worried, that's all."

Unfortunately Daphne takes this poorly. Pansy can see it, the way Daphne shuts down. She saw it three years ago, too. The last time she saw it everything ended, and it's about to end all over again.

"You don't really know me anymore," Daphne says, and it's mean, and the way Daphne says it—the look on her face—is cutting, designed to stick. Pansy hasn't said anything about how she tried to date one of the girls on her team but then that girl shattered her heart, because she doesn't really trust Daphne anymore with anything that hurts.

UNC wins. Pansy leaves.

Daphne goes to play for the Sol in L.A. and Pansy moves to Chicago to play for the Red Stars. She still calls Daphne every now and then, though Daphne never answers.

"Thinking about you," Pansy says. "Call me back."

She hears on Entertainment Tonight that Daphne has some sort of quickie marriage to some musician with swoopy hair, though it falls apart a couple of months later. Daphne is traded to another team, the Portland Thorns, and then to the Utah Royals. She sits out a few games. People no longer write NSWL highlights about how Daphne is the most talented player of her generation; now the articles are all about Daphne being 'difficult to work with' and how her team has concerns about her health. Daphne tears her ACL the year that Pansy has her best professional season, and when Daphne comes back, she's a little better, closer to her old self. She gets traded again, this time to the Washington Spirit. They encounter each other frequently—it's a small league, obviously—but they never speak. It becomes notorious: Daphne Greengrass and Pansy Parkinson, former teammates turned rivals. Two superstars battling to sell out stadiums when they play.

Pansy dates a journalist for three years. They move in together, then it falls apart. Pansy is just looking for a new apartment when she gets the call she's been dreaming about since she was eleven fucking years old: She made the U.S. World Cup team. There's only one problem.

So, her manager tells her, did Daphne Greengrass.

They have a reputation for being nemeses or something, which is Daphne's fault. She never looks at Pansy because looking at Pansy means looking in a mirror, and that's the absolute last thing Daphne wants to do. It has nothing to do with Pansy's game, which is solid, or the fact that Pansy is an outspoken supporter of good things, like women's rights, and Daphne is mostly known for fucking a guy from a British boy band. Things are looking up, but not enough for her to face it. Not enough for her to tell Pansy that Pansy was right all along, and the thing burning inside Daphne has been slowly eating her up.

Their first few practices together are kind of a disaster. The chemistry with the team is all off, and a lot of the girls have their doubts about Daphne to begin with. Daphne's reputation as an athlete is a disaster; she dragged it through the mud herself. The girls look to Pansy, who was just on a magazine cover for a speech she gave about equal pay, instead.

Eventually, after a week of awkward encounters, Daphne and Pansy collide (physically) and then they combust (psychologically) and Daphne swears and Pansy fumes and their coach says get in the locker room, now. Work your shit out, ladies.

So they do.

Daphne throws herself onto the bench in frustration and Pansy lingers in the doorway, hesitating.

"Look," says Pansy, but then she gives up and doesn't say anything else.

They both know it's Daphne's turn to speak. It's been Daphne's turn for years.

What is she supposed to say, I'm sorry? You scared me shitless, Pans. You didn't just make me come that one time when we were drunk in high school, you made me feel special, you made me feel loved, and don't you understand how fucking terrifying that is? Can't you see how badly I take it?

She says the only thing she knows to be true, which isn't much.

"I," Daphne says, "am not okay."

Pansy hesitates another moment and then sits beside her.

"I know," she says.

"I don't know if I've ever been okay."

"I know."

"I was with you, I think. You kept me… balanced. But then—"

"I know."

"It was too much. It was way too much. I'm not good at this. I'm not good."

"You are."

"No, I'm not. Everyone knows I'm not."

"I know what you are."

"You don't know me anymore. You don't know what I turned into."

Daphne wants to cry, which is not very sexy. She doesn't cried much, never has. She only ever cried while watching The Notebook with Pansy, but they were girls then. Stupid.
They sit in silence for a long time before anything breaks it.

"If you don't like where you are," Pansy says quietly, "you can always come back."

"Jesus," Daphne says, only she weeps it, fluidly, mumbling that she's sorry, she's so, so sorry, and Pansy pulls her into her arms and it's a mix of sweat and tears and eyeliner bleeding into the fabric of their uniforms. She sobs and Pansy doesn't have a long ponytail anymore, and Pansy's different now and somehow, Daphne's still the exact same. Still just a fucking mess trying to make people believe she's something different.

When Pansy kisses Daphne she gasps into her mouth, sobs a little, kisses her back with desperation. Pansy slides her hand under Daphne's jersey and manages a hoarse laugh of, "You're not even breathing." Daphne swallows and tugs Pansy's jersey free, peels her sports bra off. Pansy wrestles her into the showers and slides to her knees, trailing kisses down her torso, and Daphne is ashamed to tell her how different this feels. How many people she has been wrong about. Pansy most of all.

They let the water run long after they're done, hair slicked back from Pansy's temples while it lies matted around Daphne's shoulders. This, success, the World Cup—this is what they talked about doing when they were girls, and now they are women and doing a terrible job of it. Or at least Daphne is.

"I've always loved you," Daphne says sadly, because she knows it's about ten years too late, but Pansy only looks at her, half-smiling.

"I told you," Pansy says. "You can always come back."

Masters of Ink

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione), Nottpot (Theo x Harry)

Universe: muggle AU

Rating: T

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: 1) Theo on a TV game show; 2) Ink Master AU. If you've never seen Ink Master, it's a reality show in which tattoo artists compete in a series of artistic challenges, and it's my favorite thing. Tragically, this is not as absurd as my usual reality shows. Try not to be devastated.

Lee Voiceover: "Welcome back to Ink Master! This week, the final ten competitors will compete for a feature in Inked Magazine along with the grand prize of $100,000."

[Footage rolls of the final ten competitors: Hermione Granger, wearing a demure set of oversized glasses with curls piled on her head. Latin script is interwoven with ivy in ink along her forearms. Parvati Patil, with long plaits and a neck tattoo of delicate lilies stretching up to her throat. Lavender Brown, with a crescent moon tattooed beside her eye and her signature bandage dresses, revealing celestial black-and-grey artwork that traverses her thighs. Pansy Parkinson, who flips her long hair over one shoulder and arches a brow at the camera. Her tattoos are vibrantly colored, most of them arranged like jewelry. Daphne Greengrass, wearing a crop top and black jeans, smiles serenely. Her tattoos are largely hidden, though she has a dagger stabbing a rose on her inner arm. Harry Potter, in a short-sleeved button down patterned with lightning bolts buttoned to his neck, shrugs amiably at the camera. His arms are patterned with a cohesive sleeve design involving imagery of flight, castles, dragons, and armor. Theo Nott flips the camera off, detailed runes on his fingers filling the screen. Draco Malfoy folds both arms over his chest, emphasizing the tattooed dragon and family crest on his forearms. Blaise Zabini cracks his knuckles, winking. His tattoos are minimalistic and geometric, his clothing fashionable and high-end. Neville Longbottom brushes his shoulder off in a way that was clearly posed by the producers, apprehensively fingerling the line of one hipster suspender. A sword stretches up the inside of his left arm.]

[Stock footage of New York City plays over a hard rock guitar riff as the judges, Sirius Black, Minerva McGonagall, and Remus Lupin, all enter the warehouse for the flash challenge.]

Lee: "Welcome, artists! This week, your subject is: Adaptability."

[Camera shows Draco smiling thinly at Hermione before cutting to Pansy's interview.]

Pansy: "Adaptability is just being able to do everything that comes your way. Hard canvas, easy canvas, light skin, dark skin, any artistic style…" [Shrug.] "Everything comes down to adaptability."

[Cuts back to Lee.]
Lee: "This week, each person will be creating a design for someone on the other team to tattoo."

[Camera pans to Theo grinning broadly before cutting to his interview.]

Theo: "I'd like to see Granger be adaptable. Or Potter, for that matter. The guy's got one trick."

[Cut to Hermione interview.]

Hermione: "This would be a fun challenge if I were back at my home shop, but I'm pretty sure the other team is going to try to trip us up somehow. I wouldn't put it past them."

[Scene cuts to the Slytherin and Gryffindor teams whispering on opposite sides of the room.]

Harry: "Look, we already know Malfoy's a front runner, but he only does that fine line black-and-grey bullshit. Let's give 'em something big, something color."

[Cut to Parvati interview.]

Parvati: "Potter's clearly shooting himself in the foot, but it wouldn't be the first time. I guarantee we'll have to do our own designs later, and right now Potter's drawing a twelve-hour back tattoo for Nott to do in six hours."

[Footage shows Harry drawing an enormous photorealistic lion as the camera cuts over to the Slytherin team.]

Draco: "Obviously we should do this smart. We know Lavender's going to do the same girly watercolor shit every time—"

Pansy, lips pursed: "Watch out for Neville. He got us last week."

[Cut to Neville interview.]

Neville, cheerfully: "My philosophy is why make enemies? I just want to support my team."

[Cut to Daphne interview.]

Daphne: "Sure, we're all on teams now, but eventually it's every man for himself. By which I mean every woman for herself."

[Footage cuts to the artists at work.]

Daphne, brightly: "How's it going, Blaise?"

Blaise: "Not very fucking well, Daph."

Daphne: "Oh nooooo!"

[Draco walks by Hermione and pauses.]

Draco: "Let me guess, another lion, Granger?"

[Across the room, Harry looks up from his drawing with a frown.]

Hermione, without looking up: "Can you quit running your mouth, Malfoy? Just shut up for five seconds."

[Cut to Pansy interview.]
Pansy: "There's been some definite tension in the house lately. Some of it good, some of it gross."

[Cuts back to Hermione and Draco.]

Draco: "No need to be so testy, Granger. Nervous?"

Hermione: "About you? Please. I think we've all seen enough mandalas to last the whole competition."

Draco: "Whatever, Granger. You don't get to stay up all night studying like you did for pin-up day this time."

[Cut to Hermione interview.]

Hermione, clearly apprehensive: "Malfoy? No, I'm—I'm not worried, no. I mean—" [She hesitates.] "No, it's fine. I'm fine. I've read all the books, so—" [Nervous laugh.] "As long as it's not like, a Japanese Hannya mask or something. Those have a lot of specific rules and take years to really do properly, and—" [A pause.] "Oh god."

[Footage cuts to the canvases being introduced as the artists swap drawings. Hermione's design, drawn by Draco, is an intricate Hannya mask that is clearly tripping her up. Theo's, drawn by Harry, is a photorealistic lion. Harry's, drawn by Blaise, is an illustrated snake and skull.]

Harry, muttering to himself: "Seriously? Hasn't this been done?"

[Cut to Blaise interview.]

Blaise: "Yes. It has. But Potter's got a weird thing with anatomy. Also, the guy can pull a clean line, but can he shade?" [A pause.] "Well, I don't know, maybe." [A frown.] "Personally, I think he's cheating."

[Footage of the artists tattooing. Hermione is visibly frustrated as footage cuts to her interview.]

Hermione, distressed: "My canvas is extremely sensitive. His leg keeps twitching and it's screwing up my lines."

[Footage shows Draco walking by as Hermione pauses tattooing.]

Draco, gleefully: "How's it going, Granger?"

Hermione: "Jump off a bridge, Malfoy."

[Theo walks by and observes Harry's tattoo, frowning.]

Theo: "Potter, I think you're missing something."

Harry: "Whatever, Nott."

Theo: "Maybe somewhere around the… mouth? Is that a mouth?"

Harry: "Nott, I'm busy."

Theo: "Seriously. Is that a worm?"

Harry, irritably: "Fuck off."
Harry, head in his hands: "Fuck. I fucking forgot teeth."

Harry wipes down his finished product and from afar, Theo is smirking. The snake now has a pair of adequately sized fangs. Elsewhere, Hermione is forcing a smile as she and her canvas part ways. She is obviously unhappy, and Draco walks by, hesitating.

Draco: "Granger—"

Hermione, sighing loudly: "Malfoy, I can't do this right now, I don't have time f-"

Draco, interrupting: "It was a tough canvas. Just… fight for it, yeah?"

Hermione, glaring at him: "What's that supposed to mean?"

Draco: "If you get sent to the bottom—"

Hermione, viciously: "Fuck you, Malfoy—"

Draco, impatiently: "—I said if you get sent to the bottom, just… fight for it. You're good, okay? Just… don't get defeated before you even have to defend yourself."

[Theo is first as the judges critique his work.]

Minerva: "This lion got away from you a bit, I think. It has a slightly unfinished look to it."

Remus: "Still, you can see the complexity of the drawing, and as far as the overall feel… I'd wear that, for sure."

Sirius: "I agree, I think it's a great tattoo. Not perfect, which is a problem since we're down to the final ten, but it's very cool. Very different from what we're used to seeing."

[Theo says nothing, pointedly not looking at Harry as he resumes his spot and Draco is called forward.]

Minerva: "It's a great tattoo, but we've been seeing a lot of the same from you. If you're going to be Ink Master, you're going to have to branch outside your comfort zone."

Draco, mouth tight with disagreement: "Understood."

[Harry interview.]

Harry: "Whatever. What does she know? [A pause, and then quietly:] "Fuck."

[Camera shows Hermione's face, expressionless. Harry is called forward.]

Sirius: "Now this is an amazing tattoo. That snake looks totally fierce."

Remus: "I agree, it's really tough. Plus those lines are super clean."
Minerva: "This is great. Definitely a surprise from you!"

[Behind Harry, Theo glances at his feet, setting his jaw.]

Sirius: "I'm going with Harry for tattoo of the day."

Remus: "Me too."

Minerva: "Harry it is! Congratulations Team Gryffindor, who will now have the opportunity to decide to send one person from Team Slytherin down for elimination."

[Footage cuts to Team Gryffindor meeting in private.]

Parvati: "Okay, so, we're here to decide on who had the worst tattoo from Team Slytherin."

Lavender, lips pursed: "I really didn't like Daphne's rose. Neville's drawing was way more intricate.
I don't know why the judges didn't like it."

Neville, troubled: "What about Pansy's galaxy tattoo?"

Parvati: "But we need someone who can—no offense, Hermione—but someone who did worse than the Hannya mask."

Lavender, jumping in: "Daphne's lines are cleaner than Hermione's, and the judges seemed to like Pansy's galaxy more than Neville's surrealism tattoo. We have to send someone down who can lose, right? And Theo's was spotty, definitely—"

Harry, firmly: "Not Nott."

Lavender: "But—"

Harry: "Not his."

[Cut to Harry interview.]

Harry, fiercely: "What?"

[Cut back to discussion.]

Parvati, frowning: "Nott's probably going down to the bottom anyway."

Harry, aggressively: "Right. So let's pick someone else."

[The others exchange a glance before Hermione speaks.]

Hermione: "I vote we send Draco's down."

[The room is taken aback in unison.]

Neville, stunned: "What? But his execution of Lavender's drawing was nearly perfect."

Hermione: "Yeah, but the challenge was adaptability. He didn't adapt. I did."

[The others consider this information as the footage shifts to their return to the house. Theo pulls Harry aside angrily.]

Theo: "Listen you motherfucker, if it weren't for me—"
Harry: "Thank you."

Theo, whispering: "Shitbag."

Harry: "Say it like you mean it, Nott."

Theo, huskily: "Fuck you."

Lee: "Who has Team Gryffindor chosen to send down for elimination?"

Harry: "Team Gryffindor is sending… Draco."

Lee: "Alright artists, so why did Team Gryffindor choose to send Draco down to the bottom?"

Hermione: "We just feel he's been doing a lot of the same work. Everyone else here did something different from their usual, but Draco didn't bother showing much adaptability."

Sirius: "That's true. If the theme of the day is adaptability, then Draco's is in the bottom for sure."

Remus: "Still, is it worse than Hermione's tattoo? Those lines are shaky."

Minerva: "Yes, but she still adapted enough to alter her technique. The outline isn't perfect, but is it worse than the other three?"

Sirius: "Well, if we're going technical—"

Minerva: "Neville's is the bottom for me, unfortunately."

Remus: "Yeah, mine too."

Lee: "Stay tuned for next week's episode of Ink Master!

Cut to future montage: Hermione and Draco are fighting."
Draco: "—can't believe you threw me under the bus like that—"

Hermione: "You told me to fight, so I did!"

Draco: "I didn't mean you should send me home!"

Hermione: "Well, you know what, Malfoy? If it comes down to a choice between you and me, I choose me!"

Draco, outraged: "Fuck, I hate you."

Hermione, red-faced: "I hate you more!"

[They kiss passionately as footage shifts to Blaise and Theo.]

Blaise: "Is anyone in this house not fucking?"

[Daphne looks up from where she's perched on Pansy's lap as Lavender toys with Parvati's hair. Harry walks out from one of the bedrooms shirtless, glances at Theo, cocks his head, and walks away.]

Theo: "Dunno, man. Gotta go, though."

[Blaise frowns at the camera as footage cuts to end credits.]

TURNS OUT a one-shot is not enough to do remotely anything with, but here, I tried my best. Also, for anyone else who watches the show, let me just say on a personal note: Chris Nuñez can totally get it. It's those disapproving vibes.
I'll Tell You How the Sun Rose

Pairing: Blaise Zabini x Neville Longbottom

Universe: mythology AU

Rating: M

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: Blaise x Neville as a Greek myth. Title from the Emily Dickinson poem of the same name.

His father is mad, or so they say. The more favored members of the Dark Lord's court certainly say it to Neville freely, gleefully taunting. Everyone knows his father's mind is going, or perhaps it is already gone. The worst of it is that Neville himself doesn't know the difference.

He can tell people suspect it of him as well. People with less privilege than the Carrows or the Lestranges do him the kindness, at least, of merely avoiding him in the street, mocking him only once his back is turned. By now Neville's grown up to be inordinately tall, which renders him difficult to miss in a crowd, even for the unprivileged. He doesn't interact with anyone much, and his shoulders have only one shape: hunched protectively, like armor.

"You shouldn't hide," says a voice, and from where he stands in the Hogsmeade market sorting through his options of figs, Neville looks up to find himself blinded. A man with dark skin and sleek features gleams languidly in the sun, and only after Neville shades his eyes can he even tell the difference between the rays themselves and the man's golden robes.

"I'm not hiding," says Neville.

"Sure you aren't," says the man.

"Call me Blaise," he says, which Neville mishears at first.

"Blaze?" he echoes, thinking of their first meeting, the glint of the midday sun.

At first Neville is convinced that Blaise is a hallucination; a manifestation of his own impending madness, inherited from his father. It becomes clear over time, however, that he could not have hallucinated Blaise, because Blaise is nothing like him. It's not as if Neville could have created some imaginary friend from the depths of his own mind, because Blaise is unapologetically, undeniably mean.

"Why doesn't anyone seem to like you?" is an example of something Blaise asks Neville, without batting an eye to the mockery inhabiting the remark. His tone is both luminous and dry while he inspects his glossy fingernails, the sound like flat champagne.
"People seem, no offense, visibly repulsed," Blaise says.

"Well, my father's mad," says Neville uncomfortably, though he finds it a difficult subject to speak aloud.

Blaise, helpfully, scoffs in the face of Neville's existential torment. "Your father isn't mad," he says. "But nobody ever likes someone who sees things differently. It reminds them of everything they'll never be."

Neville thinks this is patently false, probably. But it's interesting to be rebuked for something other than his genetics.

"Why do you care whether people like me?" he asks.

"I don't," says Blaise. "I don't care about you."

"Then why are you here?"

"I don't know," Blaise says, sounding like he means it. "But I suppose you're quite interesting to watch."

On good days, Neville's father is an inventor, a highly skilled architect. It's the only reason anyone puts up with him, because his madness does occasionally create things of use, or it did once. He used to be more prominent at Hogwarts, but it's possible the Dark Lord has required too much of his brilliant mind. Now, he mostly rambles to himself about darkness.

"What we need is an escape," Frank mutters. By now their chambers in the castle's highest tower are littered with drawings of what looks like birds, though Neville looks closer and sees they are actually keys with wings.

An escape, Neville knows, is exactly what they will never get.

Lately his father has been much worse. As far as Neville can tell, the Dark Lord has asked Frank Longbottom to hide something inside the castle, building a new chamber within that which Frank himself designed. It's like Frank is planting a labyrinth inside his own creation, giving his own life's work a tumor, which is becoming a perennial maze inside his mind.

Some days, Neville suspects he and Frank are both trapped inside it.

"I'm afraid I'm too much like him," says Neville.

"No," says Blaise lazily, "you already know you're like him."

"Then what am I afraid of?"

"Everything," Blaise says. "It's my least favorite thing about you, actually," he adds with a sidelong glance. "All that fear."

"I don't know who I'd be without it," Neville says honestly, and he waits for Blaise to mock him, to berate him, only he doesn't.

"True," Blaise says, as if maybe he wouldn't watch so closely if Neville were someone else.

When Frank babbles on about a monster with no face, Neville spends more time with Blaise. He never knows where Blaise comes from or how he arrives—sometimes it's as if Neville catches a glitter out of his eye and then suddenly Blaise is standing there, or sometimes when light pours into his tower window Neville squints, and the strain to see becomes, inexplicably, Blaise—but the longer Blaise lingers, the more Neville wants him to stay.

Blaise has a fascinating way of seeing the world. He, unlike Neville, looks down on it. Nothing has ever lessened Blaise, never diminished him, and he mocks Neville for wanting silly, petty things like being accepted, or being liked.

"Haven't you ever wanted more?" says Blaise, sounding exasperated with Neville's mediocre longings.

The truth is that Neville has never actually wanted anything. That has never been apparent to him before, but now it is as inescapable as his father's maze. The longer Blaise is there beside him, the closer Blaise gets, the more intensely Neville registers the sensation of wanting. The hunger of it is shiny and new, vibrant and insatiable.

Before Blaise, Neville wanted only to be invisible, and now that Blaise exists, he wants only to be seen. Which is why Neville is the one to take the step that startles Blaise, forcing him against the tower's cold stone walls.

"You think I like this?" Neville forces through his teeth. "You think I enjoy being nothing?"

Blaise's lips curl up derisively.

"No," he says. "I know for a fact that you don't."

Neville swallows, because he was bold for a moment, but now he can feel the way Blaise's warmth is scorching him; punishment for going too far. Their proximity is uncalculated now, and therefore dangerous. Neville knows if he brushes Blaise's mouth, if he even grazes it, the tips of his fingers will burn.

"Why are you here?" Neville asks again, hardly able to speak it aloud, and Blaise reaches up to trace the shape of Neville's throat, smoothing over the motion of his swallow.

"Imagine," Blaise murmurs, "being so distant from everything that nothing matters. Imagine being so caged, so interminably alone, you feel nothing at all."

"I don't have to imagine it," Neville says, lousy with truth; rotten with it, spoiled to the rind.

Blaise's breath is warm along the side of his neck, edging towards his jaw.

"I know you don't," he says, and Neville shivers with heat.

Scalding, blistering. Neville radiates with this, whatever it is. Sensation overflows in his veins, tiny incisions in his abdomen peeling open, ripe from every echo of Blaise's touch. He blooms and bursts, begets himself, forgets himself. It unfurls from his toes and takes shape in his lungs. He sobs in silence, in euphoria. Ecstasy is anguish melting from his chest.

In the wake of golden sheets and bleeding whimpers, Neville thinks of darkness. It fills the castle from every corner, and even the light in Neville's tower is insufficient, paltry, small. He thinks of his own smallness and suffers in shame, feeling the expansion of himself like an ache, excruciating. All he is now is waiting. The absence of Blaise's warmth measures itself in tiny cuts along his arms and legs, so that whenever the Highland winds blow, Neville shrinks from the chill. He climbs the steps to the tower he shares with his father and wants to scream at him WAKE UP, only it's madness. Neville knows this is his madness, just like Frank's is Frank's.

When Blaise is gone everything is the same. The Carrows, the Lestranges, the Dark Lord, everything his colorless and shadowed. Everything is cruelty and taunts, darkness and threats and manic laughter. Neville is useless, of course, always has been, only this time when they use their wands on him for sport, it doesn't hurt. It used to be pebbles of discomfort, bouncing pointlessly off his back, but now he is a man burning alive, so he swallows it up, incendiary. He becomes the pain, and it becomes him.

Blaise glitters into his room in a shower of gold while Neville lies curled atop his blankets. He feels Blaise crawl into the bed, curling himself around Neville, and then Neville can feel his scalding warmth again, sharp around the angle of his hips.

"You could be free," Blaise says.

It's the cruelest thing that Blaise has ever told him.

Neville returns home to find Frank muttering to himself again, only this time his father's thoughts feel more fragmented than usual. Frank's mind is trapped in its own labyrinth again, paralysis incarnate. Frank relives the same nightmares, cyclical and perpetual and stifling, and whether they are real or dreamt, Neville wakes one day to discover that Frank is unable to rise from the floor.

"An escape," Frank says, teeth chattering. "Neville… Neville, run."

Neville no longer believes that his father can ever escape.

"Run, Neville," Frank says again, and inside his mind, Neville can see his father is no longer screaming. He was once—there used to be other things in there, genius and brightness and cleverness, like lightning—but it's gone now, and Neville knows the feeling. Frank has been cauterized by his work, burned to numbness by the conscience he tried so long to fight.

Neville plucks one of his father's drawings from the floor, carefully, so as not to disturb the fragile pages. The room is littered with them, overflowing, and they are all variations on the same thing:
winged keys.

An escape, Frank says, and Neville understands now that the darkness is a curse, it is madness undiscovered, and when Frank says to run, he means something else. From inside the maze of his thoughts, he is giving Neville the key to save his life. Unlock the door and push it open.

When Frank says run, Neville knows he means fly.

Neville stands at the top of the castle tower, a bit of stone breaking loose beneath his feet. It crumbles to the ground, and above his head is darkness, a pitch of open sky. It will glow rosy soon with waking, when this castle full of monsters will all stir their malevolent heads.

He closes his eyes and thinks he'll burn for this.

Then he steps over the ledge, letting himself fall—

And fall—

and fall
and fall
and fall
and when he should land

he doesn't.

"Are you ready now?" Blaise's voice says in his ear, and it envelopes Neville like the whole of the sun, a sigh unfurling like a pair of tufted wings to gather him in its embrace.

Not afraid anymore. Not afraid.

Dauntless, gleaming. Blazing and adored.

"Yes," Neville says. "I'm ready."

Chapter End Notes

A bit of Helios x Icarus for your Wednesday.
Until March, Pansy's sorority house getting kicked off frat row was the worst thing that had ever happened to her. Then it was the suspension by the university they were dealt in April. By late May, the worst thing that had ever happened to her was her rejection from campus housing for the summer. By the first of June, it was her new address: the very last available studio in a dilapidated building well at a distance from the rest of campus, where she would be spending her summer and, by the looks of it, her final year.

Hardly a victory lap, she thought with the opposite of relish.

"Great," Pansy muttered aloud, pulling into her parking spot in the alley and catching sight of motion from the rearview mirror. She climbed out of the car just in time to see a group of boys wandering into her new building, all four of them shouting to each other about weed or Zeppelin or something else unintelligibly male.

"BIG D," yelled one, prompting one of the larger boys to turn in answer, and Pansy grimaced, hitting the alarm button a second time on her white BMW.

Disgusting.

"Hey," said a voice behind her, and she turned to find a boy with messy black hair calling out to her from his car window. "You're in my parking spot."

"Harry," bellowed the boy called Big D. "Hurry up, asshole!"

The boy who was apparently Harry (or Asshole) rolled his eyes, or so she guessed through the mirrored lenses of his sunglasses. "Hey," he said to Pansy again, ignoring the other voices drunkenly calling out for his attention. "Come on. Move."

He was better looking than the others, or maybe it was just the way he was driving the car. He had the windows down, one elbow resting on the door, one hand at the top of the steering wheel while he looked at her. He was rumpled and at ease and she would have bet money that his white t-shirt smelled like sea breeze laundry detergent, or something within that category of quintessential boy smells. From the angle she was looking, she could see the lines on his long legs, tan up to the point where his shorts had ridden up on his thighs.
Boys driving were their own genre of unhelpful appeal.

"My spot," she corrected him. "Landlord said so."

"Are you sure?" he prompted, dropping his sunglasses to look at her as if she were the kind of sorority girl who maybe didn't know how to read, and she gave him the sort of smile that suggested he was the sort of boy who maybe shouldn't try to push her buttons.

"I'm sure," she said sweetly, putting her headphones in and turning to go inside as he growled after her in frustration.

Living with his cousin Dudley was the goddamn worst. Luckily, it was short term; only for the summer while his usual roommates, Ron and Hermione, were off working their various internships elsewhere.

Still, having to live with Dudley's gang of idiot thugs coming and going was enough to make Harry ponder the potential benefits of being homeless. Piers, for example, was constantly sleeping on his couch, and Dennis and Malcolm were always touching his recording equipment. His Victrola (a gift from Hermione) had coffee spilled down the side, and he was pretty sure Gordon was eating his cereal. He had to keep his guitar with him all the time now, just to make sure they didn't touch it when he wasn't looking.

All of that might have been fine, but then there was the girl who lived above them. Priscilla or Princess or something. She kept parking in Harry's spot, and every time he asked Dudley for the lease agreement to show her, Dudley insisted he would get around to digging it up and then, shock of all shocks, didn't. (Harry would've called the landlord himself, but sublets were... frowned upon, and/or expressly forbidden.)

At first Harry tried to be nice about it, which didn't work. Then he tried being a dick about it, which definitely didn't work. Eventually, it became clear they had totally different schedules. She was gone all day, doing whatever it was she did—her nails, probably—and he was gone at night, when he used the university recording studios. By the second week he simply pulled into the spot when she wasn't home and locked his car, satisfied.

One night he came home to find a cone in the spot and rolled his eyes, getting out and moving it out of the way like a normal human being with opposable thumbs. The next time, she had posted a sign with his license plate number saying DO NOT PARK HERE, which he removed. Again, with his working thumbs.

Very infrequently did they run into each other in person. Only once did they actually speak, though it wasn't especially noteworthy. She had been looking over something at the time, a frown painted on her lips in coral-pink, and for half a second he thought about asking her what was wrong until she looked up, conjuring a snotty layer of impatience at the sight of him.

"Can you keep it down?" she offered snidely, glancing at the guitar case in his hands. "Seriously. It's getting ridiculous. And stop parking in my spot."

"It's not your spot," Harry said. "For the last fucking time—"

But she left, walking away as if he hadn't even spoken at all.

There was constant music from his apartment. There were people coming in and out at all hours, waking Pansy when she was trying to rest for her internship. It had been hard enough to try and squeeze in all the courses she needed to graduate pre-law with a double major in history and econ, and now that she was having to take a creative writing course over the summer for her fine arts elective in addition to the hours at work, she was losing her mind.

She'd always been bad at writing; she had always preferred math because there was always an answer. History, too, had already happened. There was nothing to invent. Writing was a pain, and if she couldn't get something passable together, her 4.0 was going to take a hit from her pass-fail arts elective, of all things. What a fucking joke. Unfortunately, she doubted Yale Law was going to be thrilled with her being president of a sorority that had gotten itself kicked off the row, much less whatever this did to her grade point average.

But Harry what's-his-face was always playing that heavy metal shit and distracting her and keeping her up at night, and the one time she wanted to try leaving to get coffee, she came back to find Harry was parked in her spot again. Furious, she left a note that said she would absolutely tow him if he did it again; don't test her.

When she came out the next morning, the note was taped to the wall with an irreverent scrawl beneath it: Go for it, princess.

She was livid. "I'm going to fucking murder him," she said over the phone to Daphne, who was sympathetic, albeit not nearly as enraged as Pansy needed her to be.

"Don't kill him," Daphne suggested unhelpfully. "Just like, make a schedule or something. Compromise."

Fuck schedules. Fuck compromise.

"Yeah, sure, a schedule," Pansy said, googling numbers of towing companies as she spoke.

"What the fuck did you do to my car?"

"What car?" she demurred, theatrically bemused.

To her credit, Harry's storming up to her apartment hadn't seemed to faze her much. Passive-aggressive notes were one thing, but he'd expected her to cave under the pressure of someone actually protesting to her face.

Turned out, no.

"It was parked in my spot—"

"My spot," she said, glancing at her nails.

"—and now it's go- Oh, okay, so you admit it, then," Harry fumbled retroactively, a bit taken aback. "What did you do to it?"

"Made it disappear," she said, smiling thinly. "I'm a witch."

He glared at her, and the irksome smile broadened. She was pretty and monstrously awful, like some kind of glittering, toxic snake.

"I take it you had it towed?" he prompted, exasperated by the runaround she was still all too happy to give.

"You parked it in my spot," she replied, impassive.
"It's not your—" He broke off, about to pinch the bridge of his nose before remembering he was wearing his goddamn glasses. "Look," he began, "Penelope—"

"Pansy."

"Fine, whatever, sure—look," he said, "please. I can't afford to get my car out of an impound lot right now, okay? I can't." It was going to be hundreds of dollars he resolutely didn't have. If he did, he wouldn't be spending the summer here in the first place, would he?

"Probably shouldn't have parked in my spot," she advised, and Harry tightly clenched a fist, gritting his teeth.

"Can you just—"

"Maybe we can come to a deal," she suggested. "A contract, if you will."

This, Harry suspected, was going to be a lot like bargaining with the devil.

"Yes?"

"The spot is mine," said Pansy. "Non-negotiable."

"It isn't y-" He broke off, stopping himself. "Fine. Where am I supposed to park, then?"

"The street," said Pansy, obviously fully aware that street parking in this neighborhood was impossible to find. A mere myth, like Santa or the tooth fairy. "And I have two more conditions."

"What? No," Harry snapped. "Giving up my spot is already a condi-

"The first of these conditions," Pansy continued, again as if he had never spoken at all, "is that you will stop playing so much loud music."

"I don't play any music," Harry said, frustrated.

"You have a guitar. I've seen it."

"What? No." He blinked. "I mean yes, but—"

"And as for the second," she went on, "your friends have got to stop coming and going at all hours. It's impossible to think, and—"

"Wait," Harry said, staring at her in disbelief. "You think those are my friends?"

She gave him a look of impossible boredom.

"So should I get my coat?" she asked him, opening the door just enough for him to see that her keys were hooked on the wall beside the frame. Her apartment, unlike Dudley's, was spotless and fully furnished. Harry hadn't lived in a place that nice since… ever. Not that he could think about it now, nor do anything but seethe in the glow of her privilege. "Or are we going to argue some more?"

He stared at her.

And stared.

For half a second he considered taking her keys, but then no, she'd probably have him arrested. Or executed. Or deported.
"You know what? No," he said. "No. Fuck your conditions."

She blinked, and aside from that one moment by the mailbox, it was the first time he had ever seen her look vulnerable. Her eyes, usually narrowed beneath dark brows, suddenly went wide and soft, almost fearful.

Just as quickly, though, she was back to her usual portrait of entitlement.

"What are you planning to do, then?" she demanded. "I'm not helping you get your car back unless you do something about the noise and your shitbag crew, and certainly not if you're going to keep parking in my spot—"

"I don't need your help," Harry snapped, and reached forward, closing her apartment door on himself as her face promptly flamed with fury, the slap of a half-formed expletive just audible when the door fell shut.

Harry dug out his phone as he stomped down the corridor, dialing the first contact on his speed dial when he reached the stairwell.

"Hermione?" he said, descending irritably to his apartment. "Yeah. I, uh. I need you, please."

Pansy was already exhausted after a long day at the library when she caught sight of him sitting atop the trunk of his car, elbows resting placidly on his knees. She pulled up next to him, double-parked, and glared at him through the window.

"You've got to be kidding me," she said, but before she could make any threats, he had already pulled open her rear passenger door, tossing his guitar into the backseat and then sliding into the passenger side. "What the—"

"Can't use my car or I'll lose my spot," Harry said, and she glared at him. "Just take a left when you get to the light," he added, buckling his seatbelt.

"What the fuck do you think you're doing?"

"That," he said, twisting around to point to his guitar case, "is an acoustic guitar."

"So?"

"So," he said flatly, "just drive."

The last thing she wanted to do was play some sort of maniacal guessing game, but it seemed like Harry wasn't going to move until she indulged him. That, and he was clearly in her parking spot. Again.

"I could just dump you in the river," she said.

"What river?"

"Doesn't matter. I could find one."

"Great," he said. "Drive."

So she drove, reluctantly. He said nothing except to direct her to campus, and specifically to the music school, where he instructed her to park and then wrenched open the door, pulling out his guitar and snapping his fingers when she didn't move.

"Come on," he said.

She rolled her eyes and followed, wanting to punch him. Maybe she still would. But on the other hand, she was curious now. He let her into the building without any further explanation, swiping his access card, and then pushed open one of the doors on the left.

"Get in," he said.

She glared at him, but entered.

She walked in to find a girl with extremely curly hair looking up from where she was perched on a stool, holding a violin. A thin, gangling redhead was seated at the upright piano.

"These," Harry said, "are my actual friends. Hermione is poly sci and a classically trained violinist. Ron is in the screenwriting program, though he plays when we need him." He paused to pull his guitar out of its case, revealing a smooth, worn looking wood. "This," he said bluntly to Pansy, "is an acoustic guitar, not an electric guitar. What you're hearing all night is my cousin Dudley's music."

"Okay," Pansy said uncertainly, bristling. "So?"

"Harry, hang on," interrupted Hermione, frowning at Pansy. "Isn't this the girl who had your car towed?"

Ron's eyes narrowed. Agitated, Pansy lifted her chin. "He was in my spot," she said.

"It's not your spot," Hermione and Ron said in unison, but by then Harry had already tossed the guitar strap around his neck, taking a seat between the other two.

He strummed something for a moment, and for whatever reason, Pansy waited without argument. Curiosity, she supposed.

"We have a folk band on the side," Harry said to Pansy. "Ron and Hermione are both working this summer, but they came back for the weekend." He glanced at Hermione, who reluctantly raised her violin. "Thatta girl," said Harry approvingly, grinning at her, and then he turned to Pansy. "Sit," he said.

Astoundingly, she sat.

Harry strummed a little more, tuning with Hermione and Ron, and then after a few runs from each of the instruments, he tapped out a rhythm. "Alright?"

"Alright," said Ron, with a nod from Hermione.

And then Harry was… singing.

"She take my money," he sang in a silky baritone, "when I'm in need—"

Pansy blinked as Hermione played an irreverent riff on the violin.

"—yeah, she's a triflin' friend indeed. Oh, she's a gold digger, way over town—"

Pansy glared at Harry, who stifled his obvious laughter, cutting the other two off with a wave of his hand.

"Wrote that for you," he said.

She rose to her feet with a scoff of disgust, but he caught her arm.

"Sit down," he said again. "Just listen."

Again, Ron and Hermione gave Pansy matching looks of displeasure, but Harry tapped his foot four times, and Hermione grudgingly raised her violin to her shoulder.

"Entitled in the worst way," sang Harry, "feelin' nothin' that I wanna put in words. Wanna maybe take my mask off, so I can see what's under yours."

He glanced up at her, expectant. She sat very still, and he continued strumming.

"Don't need to read your lips to know what you're tryna say, think I can see damn well what's written on your face. Doll, you make me crazy, make me such a maniac. You make me wanna drive away, make me wanna come right back."

He finished with another strum, slowly fading into nothing, until finally the song ended, or it stopped.

"You wrote that?" Pansy asked, clearing her throat after a moment of silence.

"It's not finished," Harry said. "But yeah."

She glanced down at her hands, feeling a wave of something she hated to call by its name.

"I can't write shit," she admitted.

Harry rose to his feet, taking a step towards her, and then reached for her cheek, carefully lifted her chin with one finger.

"Give me back my parking spot," he said, "and maybe we can work something out."

Ultimately, it didn't matter. By the end of the summer, they mostly took one car.

Chapter End Notes

My D/Hr Advent fic, Run the Gauntlet, posted separately yesterday if you are interested in a tale of dramione working at a magical renaissance faire. (I will post it in this collection next week.) As for the above, the lyrics to Gold Digger are, tragically, not mine. The others are, and the moment I start my long-deserved folk band it will be my lead single.
Could've Been Worse

Pairing: Bill Weasley x Hermione Granger

Universe: post-war, EWE

Rating: M

Summary: Olivie Advent cont'd.

Prompts: a Bill x Hermione with a conceivable way to end up together, a request based (I'm guessing) on their brief and ill-fated pairing in Nightmares and Nocturnes. I've previously been very adamant about why that form of these characters would not/should not result in a happy ending, but have made changes to make it theoretically possible here.

Near miss. That's what they were calling it.

"It might've worked," said Ron. "But it didn't, and that's fine."

Yes, fine. Definitely. That's what Hermione was thinking, too.

"Could be worse," Harry assured her. "You heard Bill and Fleur are splitting up, right?"

"What does that have to do with anything?" Not that she was surprised to find Harry's input profoundly unhelpful. He was a lot of things, but never especially comforting. "Just because I'm not married to Ron it's somehow… not as bad?"

"Well, it isn't, is it?" he replied in his most earnest form of optimism, and he was probably right, though she couldn't quite put it in those terms. It had still been three years with Ron, plus the seven in the making.

"Misery's not comparable, Harry," she told him with a sigh. "It's not a competition."

"Well, I know," he said, shrugging. "But hey, Voldemort's dead, right? War's over. So yeah, it could definitely be worse."

She avoided all things Weasley for a considerable amount of time, for obvious reasons. After a while, though, she caught wind of something odd.

"A self-defense class, you said?" she asked, interrupting Harry, who had been sort of vocally meandering while her mind drifted. "Like the D.A. meetings we used to do, you mean?"

"No, not particularly," said Harry. "It's sort of a mix of muggle and magical techniques, though much more physical. I tried it out once last year and it's quite good, actually. Very useful."

"I suppose wizards do rely a bit overmuch on their wands," Hermione remarked, frowning in thought.
"Yes, I think that's Bill's point."

Hermione considered the mention of Bill. "I don't really see him as any sort of martial arts instructor."

Not that she saw him as much of anything, or ever had. Though, once she thought about it, she supposed the Greyback scars probably added to his legitimacy as far as credentials went.

"He had some experience as a curse-breaker, I think. Hand-to-hand combat is part of the training. Plus, you know. After everything with the war, and with Fleur gone…" Harry trailed off. "Maybe you should try it out," he suggested. "See if you like it."

"Self-defense? Harry," Hermione scoffed, "don't be ridiculous."

He shrugged. "Just an idea," he said. "Can't be worse than sitting at home alone."

The nightmares about Bellatrix Lestrange she'd been having for years were unfortunately more problematic without Ron in her bed. She would wake to a weight on her chest nearly every night now, leaving her kicking and flailing for escape. Would things have been different if she'd been able to fight back? Difficult to tell what was psychological trauma and what was her rational mind trying to be sensible, but the opportunity to do something about it was starting to loom. Eventually she opted to give it a try, walking into the Diagon Alley studio to find a much larger group than she anticipated.

"Oh, hello," came a voice behind her, and she turned, startled, to find Bill Weasley at her heels. "Didn't know you were coming. Need help with your wraps?"

"Wraps?" she echoed, uncertain.

He smiled. He'd cut his hair differently since the war, having done away with the ponytail for what she presumed to be practical reasons. It made the jagged scars across his cheekbones more stark, though not unpleasantly so. His temples were starting to grey, peppered with tiny flecks of white. Probably stress, Harry had said, seeing as he's only twenty-eight.

It suited him, aging. It made him look distinctive; manly, un-boyish.

"Here," Bill said, pulling a roll of what looked like bandages from the pocket of his athletic shorts and tossing one outward, floating it like a ribbon across the studio floor. "Start here," he said, looping it around her thumb. "Wrap four or five times around your wrist, then four around your knuckles."

"Like this?" she asked, probably clumsily.

"A bit lower."

"Lower?"

He reached for her hand, brushing a thumb coolly across the midpoint of her fingers.

"Here," he said. "Otherwise it slips down."

"Oh." She swallowed. "Right, okay—"

"Bill?" came someone else's voice, and Bill, turning to follow the sound of his name, released her.
"Sorry," he said over his shoulder, distractedly addressing Hermione again after a brief communication across the studio. "Anyway, wrap between your fingers, okay? Like this." He traced the motion into the air around her hands. "Then a few more times around the knuckles, yeah? I'll check on you in a second."

"Sure, of course," Hermione said, watching him go.

After he'd gone, she could still feel his touch as if he'd marked her.

She expected to pick it up quickly, as she had with everything at Hogwarts.

She did not.

"Just keep coming," Bill said at the end of class. She was rubbing the sting from her eyes, unable to tell if she'd somehow been inadvertently crying from exhaustion or if her eyeballs were merely sweating. "It's muscle memory," Bill told her, sounding factual. Detached, even. "Eventually you won't have to think so hard about getting things right."

Thinking was the one thing she did well. The moving part came less naturally.

"Yes, okay," Hermione lied, fully intending to never return, but Bill caught her by the elbow.

"It'll get better," he said. "Trust me."

She was pretty sure it was only meant to resonate one way, but it seemed to flood her temporarily in waves of impact. She felt it in her chest, and then in her head. It slid from her arms and legs, trickling down her spine alongside the hour's worth of sweat.

"You promise?" she said wryly, half-joking.

His mouth twitched.

"I promise," he said.

In the shower she marveled at the pain in new places, growing distinctly sore and stiff throughout the day. Then she glanced down at her knuckles and thought of his touch smoothing over them, healing and soft.

"How was it?" asked Harry in the Floo.

"Well, I didn't die," said Hermione. "So I guess it could've been worse."

She started coming twice a week, finding that Bill was at least right about one thing: it got easier each time. After about a month she was starting to counter naturally, the motions becoming more reflexive than planned. It continued to hurt, but either she was quietly masochistic or the pain was somehow cathartic. Eventually it became a relief of sorts, learning the limits of what she could take, pushing them as far as she could. That she could take a blow and return it became a certain reassurance, proof of life. Her lungs, so long paralyzed in the aftermath of what she'd left behind, gradually re-learned how to fill.

She and Bill spoke politely, though infrequently. People typically required his attention, though in December his class had all but emptied.

"Holidays," he explained when she walked in to find herself alone, shrugging in answer to the question her furrowed brow must have implied. "Mind if I do a work out with you? I wasn't expecting anyone to be here."

"Oh, no. No, of course not." She let her bag slide from her shoulder, beginning to wrap her knuckles. Bill was wearing an old t-shirt, the fabric thinned around the blades of his shoulders, and his hair was slick with sweat.

"Are you going to the Burrow?" she asked him.

"Not yet." A pause. "Or maybe not at all."

She blinked, surprised. "No?"

He looked over at her from where he'd been stretching. "It's a bit odd now. My mum," he began, and hesitated. "She… fusses."

"Right." Hermione cleared her throat, approaching him in the center of the room. "Should I get on one of the bags, or…?"

"Nah. We'll spar." He beckoned her forward, and she blinked. "Don't worry," he said with a laugh. "We'll keep it light."

"But—"

"Just try not to think so much."

Right. This again. "You know that's actually impossible, right?"

He shrugged. "Just focus on slipping. Watch my shoulders," he said, tapping one. "If my right one comes forward, your right shoulder comes forward. Same with the left."

He motioned slowly, and she watched. Movement for him was fluid, natural. She could see the muscle beneath his shirt and followed the lines of it, his planes of mechanization.

She watched him, and swallowed.

"Right," she said, taking her place opposite him. "You sure?"

"Just feel it. It's the same with magic," he said. "Trust it."

"I'm not so good with trust," she said before she could stop herself, and his tongue slid out between his lips, moistening them briefly.

"Yeah," he said. "Yeah, I know."

She got him in the chin with an uppercut and he praised her for it, making her want to die a little from the mix of confusion and pride; elation alongside dismay. Then, once people returned to class in January, Bill started summoning her to the front of the room, using her to demonstrate their drills. She learned him, adding his motions to her database of reflexes along with her own. If his shoulder came forward, so did hers.

A demonstration of possible attacks to the body had him slowly modeling a shot to her stomach. His hand lingered, instruction droning in and out.

"—aim it up, not swiping to the side—"
Each motion brushed her ribs, his proximity to her suddenly unavoidable.

"—like that," he finished, pausing with his hand in place. "Got it?"

There was a mutter of agreement as Hermione glanced down, noticing the pebbled flesh across her arms with a mix of embarrassment and longing.

"Got it?" he asked again, murmuring it to her privately this time.

Her body sang it back to him, rising up from her chest with certainty: Yes. Yes. Yes.

"Sure," she said. Too softly, but at least she managed to find her voice.

"You seem much better," Harry commented later during one of their usual chats. "Come to think of it, Bill seems better, too."

"Probably the endorphins," Hermione said. "Or something."

Harry's reply was a grin over his salad. "Well, I suppose there's worse ways to get those," he said.

"What happened with Fleur?"

She surprised herself with the question, finding it immediately too personal the moment it left her lips and regretting that she'd asked it. They were alone in the studio once again, with her lingering in the doorway to face his back. Valentine's Day made for another unpopular evening where it came to exercise.

Bill, however, didn't seem to mind. His shoulders, which she knew how to read by now, didn't visibly tense. He turned to glance over his shoulder with expectancy, as if he'd been waiting for her to be standing right where she was.

"Nothing. Everything." He kept his chin angled over one shoulder. "Woke up one day different people than we were."

"Near miss?" she asked with a grimace, letting her bag fall from her shoulder.

"No." He was wearing the same old t-shirt, the fabric thinnest in all the spots his frame was most broad. "We didn't miss. But just because something lands doesn't make it last forever."

"Think you might have lasted forever without the war?"

He shrugged. "No point wondering. It happened, and it made me. It made her." He paused before adding, "And it made you, too."

This, she thought, was what she had been trying to get Ron to come to terms with. That she couldn't remove what she'd been through from who she was; not one piece of it. Not the nightmares, not the need to fight the things she couldn't see. Not the fear that she should have been stronger, quicker. The version of her that had not seen war was somewhere else, with someone else, doing something else.

That version didn't exist, and she didn't want to pretend it did.

"Right." She stepped towards him. "Spar?"

He met her in the center of the room, and she waited for him to start the timer. Two minutes, light, playful, same as always. Keep it light, he always said, so frequently she'd memorized the cadence of it in his voice. Sometimes she paused to find herself contemplating the shape of his words in her head, wondering how they'd sound if he ever changed his mind.

He stepped forward and reflexively, she stepped back.

Another step, another dance backwards.

Another step, another, until her back hit the wall behind her.

His right shoulder came forward.

Hers did, too.

"Stop me," bled from his lips.

From across the room, she could see the reflection of his shoulders in the studio's mirrors, the blades of them coiled and careful.

"Don't think," she whispered.

He kissed the side of her neck, her clavicle. His lips traveled lower, fingers following the shape of her tank top, folding back the material of her sports bra. He ran his tongue over her skin slowly, letting her shiver in his hands.

The kiss, when it happened, took her like a blow.

A quick motion had her up against the wall. Another motion had her legs over his shoulders, another quick toss propping her hips on his arm. His mouth slid against her, tongue pressed to the material of her workout crops, working her through the fabric.

"Shouldn't," he breathed to the curve of her thigh, breath hot against her skin, and it occurred to her that he might be right.

Oh well, she thought, mindless with rapture by the time he peeled the lycra from her skin, her gasp in reflex slowly learned for months.

Could've been worse.

Chapter End Notes

I had two similar requests: one for Bill x Hermione, one for Bill x Narcissa, and in the end this won out only because there are more epilogical diaries being added to Modern Romance that deal with the latter.
He was sure Flint was going to give him hell.

He was sure of it.

"What the fuck," Marcus said aloud, mockingly awed.

Oliver had been finishing up a workout on the pitch when Marcus showed up, predictably unexpected and uninvited. They'd had a little tiff, trading insults as they always did, and when Oliver picked up his bag to storm away it had unhelpfully ripped open, a litter of contents pouring out. He typically carried nothing unusual, really, just a quill and some water and a potion for sore muscles, so on any other day it would have been nothing more than a simple annoyance and an easy repair, but today there was also… the book.

The book, which Marcus summoned from the ground before Oliver could think to prevent him.

"The Witch and the Rake?" Marcus read aloud from the cover, mouth contorting in what Oliver was sure would be a sneer. "Seriously, what the—"

"It's nothing," Oliver snapped, snatching the book back from Marcus, or trying to. "It's just a laugh, that's all," he attempted with a hollow scoff, but Marcus held it at a distance, forcing Oliver into a collision with his chest when he reached for it again.

"Didn't take you for the chick lit type, Wood," Marcus drawled, and Oliver, down to the last straw of his patience (or possibly the last remaining thread of his pride), wound up and hit Marcus as hard as he could, sending Marcus staggering backwards as the book fell to the ground with a conclusive thud.

Oliver threw it angrily into the torn remainder of his bag and looked up to find Marcus staring at him, one hand pressed to the little dribble of blood from his nose.

"You motherfucker," said Marcus. "You're gonna pay for that."

"Make me," Oliver spat, challenging Marcus with a glare.

In the end it happened as it always did, and as it always had. When they were at Hogwarts it was usually after a match, maybe in the showers. Maybe it would happen outside when everyone else was at the Three Broomsticks. Maybe it would happen in one of the classrooms with the door spelled shut, charmed from the corridor to let them know if someone was coming. No matter what, though, it would always happen like this: someone hit first, and then someone hit back.

This time, Marcus took hold of Oliver's shirt and tugged him closer. "Tonight?" he said, rasping it.

"Yeah." Oliver swallowed, watching the little trickle of blood from Marcus' nose as it drifted solemnly down to his lip. "Yeah. Fine. Tonight."

"Explain the book," Marcus said later.

Oliver had slid in from the floo without a word, and subsequently, Marcus had shoved him into the wall beside the fireplace and kissed him. It was the sort of kiss that was powered by frustration and loathing, because neither of them technically wanted to do this. Neither of them wanted to want this—and yet here they were, same as always.

Being drafted to the same quidditch team meant it was even harder to resist than it had been at school. Now they were inseparable by vocation as well as the petty consequence of vice.

Oliver tensed and turned onto his side, sliding a glance to Marcus. "Thought this was just sex."

"It is."

"So why should I explain anything?"

"Because it's one thing if you're fucking me for convenience," Marcus said. "Another if you're hiding some sort of bizarre bodice-ripping kink I'll only be dragged into later."

"Shut up." Oliver shoved himself upright, reaching for his shoes, and Marcus yanked him back with a groan of annoyance, wrapping one arm around his chest.

"Tell me."

"Fuck you."

His slid his arm up, catching Oliver's throat with the crook of his elbow. "Tell me," he said again, and felt Oliver swallow. His free hand traced the side of Oliver's ribs, thumbing over them like the strings of a guitar.

"It's… Katie said…” A pause. "Apparently I—" Oliver broke off again, muttering, "Apparently I'm not good at fucking women."

"You don't say," Marcus drawled, and Oliver elbowed him sharply.

"Fuck off. She says I don't—" Hesitation. "She says I can't—"

Pause.

"I just needed to know what the fuck she wants in bed," Oliver mumbled, and it occurred to Marcus that the reason Oliver had broken his nose that afternoon was not because of anything Marcus had done at the time, but because of what he had inadvertently discovered.

"Oh. Well." Marcus cleared his throat, releasing Oliver. "Okay then. Was that so hard?"
Oliver refused to look at him, and he sighed.

"Look, it's not a big deal," he said. "Gimme the book. Let's see it."

"What?" He felt Oliver's spine go rigid. "No, absolutely not—"

"Come on. I'm not exactly… you know." He shrugged. "It's not like I have a girlfriend either, do I?"

"Oh." Oliver's voice was gruff. "Well, fuck, fine. If you really want to."

He leaned forward, sorting through his things, and tossed the book over his shoulder to Marcus, who caught it easily with one outstretched hand. That was Marcus' thing, catching things. Catching things, scoring points. Fucking Oliver Wood.

Just sex, he reminded himself. Just sex.

"Alright, what the fuck's a rake?" asked Marcus.

They didn't get along on the pitch for obvious reasons. Oliver considered the rules something of importance, while Marcus had never heard of 'rules' or 'regulations' or 'basic human decency,' and therefore half the time they were slapped with unnecessary penalty calls because Marcus had knocked someone off their broom. Not to mention that if Oliver ever missed a save, Marcus immediately became a monster. As if Oliver weren't beating himself up enough as it was.

"If you just worked the lateral drills a little harder—"

"Don't talk to me about lateral drills until you've gotten a few more points in the crease!"

"Fuck you, Wood—"

"Fuck off, Flint!"

And from there they'd have to be separated by the coach, or by the referee, or by whoever was standing nearby who wasn't afraid of tremendous and unavoidable bodily harm.

If someone wasn't standing there—if, by coincidence, no one was around to separate them—then things went rather differently. Fuck you became fuck me which became fuck yes, and what none of the rest of their team could understand was that if Marcus and Oliver worked it out alone, if they sweat out their enmity and worked off a little steam, then everything was fine. It was normal.

Or something.

"This one's halfway decent," commented Marcus, thumbing through the pages of their latest read: A Wicked Kind of Wizard. "I liked this book more than the last one."

"The one with the fake dating, you mean? And the duke?"

"No, that one was fine. I meant the one with the arranged marriage," Marcus said, making a face. "I like this better. A makeover," he said in the same reverent tone he frequently used to describe the intricacies of a quaffle, "is a great fucking trope."

They were in bed together; Oliver's this time. It had been a few weeks now of reading these stupid romance books, both separately and together: The Warlock and I. To Tame a Witch. What a Wizard Wants.
"I'm not sure it's helping at all," Oliver remarked with a twinge of disappointment. "As far as I can tell, women just want a rich man who tells them they're beautiful because they don't know it."

"What? Fuck off," said Marcus. "It's the devotion of it, fucker."

He punched Oliver's shoulder, probably to drive the point home.

"Women want a man who makes her feel wanted," Marcus said.

Oliver wondered if maybe that had been the problem with Katie. They kept trying to make something work—they had all the same interests and sure, he traveled a lot, but she was one of those independent girls who liked her own space—but still, in the end something was just… off. He liked sex with her just fine, but he could tell it was underwhelming on her end. That was why they'd decided to keep things open, each committing only to the idea of not being entirely committed to the other.

"Maybe I don't touch her right," said Oliver.

He leaned forward, resting his chin on Marcus' shoulder. He could feel the dip of Marcus' posture relaxing, settling his head more comfortably in place.

"Probably would do it better if you ran the right drills," said Marcus.

"Fuck you."

"Fuck you—"

"You really think that's helping?"

"Wood, I'm obviously not trying to help—"

"Just come here," Oliver said, only realizing he'd been pleading after Marcus' mouth was already on his.

Marcus walked into Oliver's flat to find him setting out two plates, then two sets of silverware.

"What the fuck?" he demanded.

"It's… you know. Food," Oliver said, cheeks reddening. "Like a proper book club or something."

"Jesus." Marcus' stomach growled in response to the smell of food wafting through the air, which he resolutely ignored. "We're not a book club, Wood. And what part of 'just sex' remains unclear?"

"Fine. Don't eat, then," said Oliver tartly, sitting down to the shepherd's pie he'd made. "Stay there."

In the wake of Marcus' opposition, Oliver took a bite directly from the dish, immediately choking on how hot it was, and then forced a swallow. After the initial discomfort, he promptly took another bite, repeating the process, and then again, until Marcus was forced to launch forward in annoyance, snatching the fork from Oliver's hand and casting a cooling charm on the pie.

"Idiot," he muttered, and dug Oliver's fork into the crust himself, thinking but not wanting to marvel aloud at how respectably flaky it was for someone he assumed was unable to cook. (Reading bodice rippers together was one thing, but enjoying the finesse of another man's pie crust was too much.)
In answer, Oliver reached around, sliding one hand down Marcus' spine. "Did you like the book this week?"

A troubled knave and a high-spirited, free-thinking witch. He was a duke in need of a wife to inherit his fortune! She was in need of a wealthy man to fund her alchemical research! They loathed each other on sight, as was only right and proper, but the inevitable roadside robbery led to a revelatory night in the nearby tavern's single bed, ultimately concluding—to everyone's astonishment—with the usual wedding and babies.

"Well enough, I suppose." Marcus took another bite. "Though I found the trope far-fetched and frankly, a bit contrived."

"Oh, absolutely," Oliver agreed. "If they hated each other so much, why find so many reasons to spend time together?"

"Ridiculous," Marcus agreed, handing Oliver the fork.

Oliver took a bite in silence as Marcus sat in the chair beside him, waiting for him to finish chewing.

Then, when that wasn't close enough, Marcus hooked one foot around the leg of Oliver's chair, dragging it closer.

"Sex and occasional dinner," he proposed, apropos of nothing.

"Sex and regularly scheduled breakfast," Oliver countered, equally unfazed.

Marcus set his jaw, sighing.

"Sex," he conceded eventually, "and book club. Along with all the meals 'book club' implies."

Oliver took another bite, contemplating it for a moment before handing the fork back to Marcus.

"Done," he agreed, running his thumb along the line of Marcus' inner arm.

Marcus shook his head as he leaned over to take another bite of the pie, inwardly lamenting the things he did to keep the peace.

"Alright," he said, mouth full. "Let's talk themes."

Chapter End Notes

Mr Blake is sick, so here's me reminding you to drink some water. Best of luck to anyone else facing the trials of holiday travel!
Imagine my surprise upon discovering the Noble House of Black was not as noble as it appeared. True, I had questioned upon some occasions why my mother had platinum blonde hair that didn't seem to grey as other mothers' did, but there were other things on my mind for most of my conscious adolescence. Quidditch, for example. The heinous murder of an authority figure whom I did not technically respect. The Yule Ball. You understand, I'm sure, the quintessential hallmarks of youth, hence why I did not question until my early twenties why something odd seemed to be separating me from my peers.

It started when people began to fall into a trance of sorts whenever I came around. Initially I thought they were all having a laugh, or possibly avoiding me because I had recently become what some called an "unjustly exonerated war criminal," but eventually I started to notice it happening with undeniable frequency. People struggled to recall my name or any details they had once known about me, peering at me as if through a fog instead.

Naturally, I knew there was only one person I could ask.

"Oh yes," remarked my mother, thoughtfully reclined in her cell at Azkaban. "I wondered if you might start to see some signs. Granted, you're less than half, but I suppose now that you've reached sexual maturity something was bound to show up sooner or later."

"Mother, I lost my virginity ages ago," I informed her. After all, I'd been a virile, sexually active human (?) man since I was sixteen.

"Well, I'm sure you tried your best, darling," remarked my mother unhelpfully, adding, "You really ought to be careful, sweetheart. I suppose you've noticed the… side effects, by now?"

"People not remembering me, you mean?" Even Pansy and Daphne had struggled to recall my name recently, and the two of them, at least, should certainly know it, though thanks to my mother I'm beginning to doubt myself profoundly.

"Yes," said my mother, offering the salivating guard a lascivious glance over my shoulder that made me supremely uncomfortable. "Your lovers, for what it's worth, likely will not remember you either. My mother certainly didn't remember her own tryst that led to me," she added, lifting her pinky on a delicate teacup I now suspected was not typically given to Azkaban captives. Come to think of it, most cells, my father's included, were not so lavishly decorated, either.
"Father seems to know who you are," I reminded her, reconsidering their relationship from an entirely new and upsetting perspective, and she gave something of a lofty shrug.

"Oh, you know how these things go," she said. "Skips a generation, I suppose."

She went on to tell me that I, much like a werewolf, would be at the mercy of some sort of aggressive hormone; something like an animal in heat. I would be overcome with a specific kind of need, which ultimately would be wiser to indulge than to fight.

"Just be careful, dear," added my mother, and she made an excellent point, as it was no small thing I'd been cursed with, and though I didn't realize it at the time, I might now have preferred to be locked within a cell like she was, or even contaminated by a werewolf, for that matter.

You see, the problem isn't that veelas bite, my friends.

They fuck, and only one of us remembers.

---

I first saw her in Diagon Alley, five years after the war. Unlike the others, she did manage to recognize me after a blink or two, though I could see it was a strain. That brilliant mind I'd loathed and envied in equal parts was piecing me together like a set of ancient runes, clarity swimming before her eyes like something long-forgotten.

"You," she said with all the derision she could muster, and as you might have guessed, given the nature of the universe, it was the Tuesday of a full moon and I was suffering all sorts of indelicacies. I was noticing things I didn't quite know I was noticing, like the little sliver of skin I could see from the parted neckline of her simple Oxford. When her lips parted to acknowledge my presence, I could only process the exquisite red of her mouth, the pink of her swollen lips. She seemed to me to be the only thing for miles, my vision altered irrevocably, and so I said something utterly nonsensical to her.

"I'm sorry," I believe were the words in specific. They caught her by surprise, and then I pushed it a bit further. "Let me buy you a drink."

She protested, glaring at me, but I reminded her that prejudice was the very thing she had fought against, and therefore if I were making amends it was only reasonable she should accept. "One drink," I said.

One drink turned into two, which became three, which was then five and eventually, perhaps, more. She was waxing poetic about her breakup, though of course I had forgotten Ron Weasley even existed (and not in a magically-altered sort of way). I was straining at the time, unable to look away from the juncture of her knees or the way her tongue slid across her lips, moistening them. I looked at the curve of her throat with only the image of my own fingers tracing over it playing in my mind.

Eventually she seemed to gather some awareness of the things coming to fruition in my head, so when I offered to get us a room, she accepted. I don't know if this was a result of fluid conversation or excessive alcohol or my natural hormonal secretion; perhaps a combination of all three. In any case, I summoned a key and we fell into a sparse, undecorated room, tumbling together onto the bed. Her breasts, I remember, fit perfectly into my palms, and running my tongue over them was sweetly satiating, like lapping at a pond of cool water. The parting of her thighs was my oasis, and I quenched my thirst all night.

She seemed to remember her hatred of me throughout the whole of the encounter, because she tugged at my hair and bit hard at my lip, and I think there was conflict within her (that is, alongside my cock). I think she hated me, or hated that she did not hate me quite enough to stop herself. I know she was thinking only of me when she came that night, because she said my name like a shudder of relief. I think she was exorcising me for herself, and had no intention to see me again.

Nor did I have any intention to see her. I woke early, pulling on my clothes, and was already fully dressed when she opened her eyes, staring at me.

"What on earth are you doing in my room?" she demanded.

It was back. I could see on her face that she saw Draco Malfoy, junior Death Eater and unrepentant idiot, rather than me, Draco, the man who had whispered to her how sweet she tasted while she used my hand to stroke herself.

"Wrong room," I said, and saw that she could find nothing amiss in my obvious lie.

"Get out," she told me coldly, and so, on that particularly lovely morning, I left.

I think there was something especially odd about the fact that it was her mind doing the forgetting. Easy enough for other people to fuck me and forget me, considering I'd never known them to be the brightest to begin with, but for the labyrinth that was Hermione Granger's mind to lose track of me entirely felt somehow… disappointing. Never fuck your heroes, as they say. Not that she was my hero, but she was a hero according to the Daily Prophet, and that was all that mattered. I watched her for any sign she could recall having spent a night with me, but as far as I could tell, she didn't. Typically my partners' minds fill in the gaps with something they can stand; her mind had told her she spent a relaxing evening alone in a tavern room, avoiding her bed at home where Ron Weasley no longer slept.

She moved out of her flat and into a new one. After a week, she began taking her coffee at the same little cafe, answering her correspondences and then stepping out to go to her job as a newly minted Ministry employee. She worked in the legal department, and also had a longstanding weekly appointment with someone in a nondescript building near the cafe.

Upon occasion of my next heat, I manufactured a little stumble in her path, colliding with her as she struggled to place me. "You," she groused through her teeth, and unfortunately I timed it poorly, because I was much too far along in my hormonal cycle by then to restrain myself. I kissed her, and she shoved me away angrily. "What on earth do you think you're doing?" she demanded.

I'm a bit ashamed to say I begged. "Please," I said. "Please, I need you."

She looked stunned, so I tried my best to backtrack. Unfortunately, I was clinging to her fingers, and physical contact sometimes makes things worse. I must have looked desperate, because she pulled me up to her flat and made me a cup of tea. As she poured it, I felt my eyes glued to the motion of her hips, the swell of her breasts as she bent over the table, tucking one rose-scented curl behind her ear.

I inhaled raggedly, and exhaled, as solemnly as I could, "I'm sorry."

That night I made a note of the books she kept in a pile beside her bed, most of them marked with little slips of parchment to contain her many thoughts. I wondered what she was taking note of, though later I realized they were descriptions of sensations that I, too, had somehow felt: "I am a restlessness inside a stillness inside a restlessness." "Sometimes we reveal ourselves when we are least like ourselves." "Perhaps only people who are capable of real togetherness have that look of being alone in the universe."

I devoured the books, and the next time I put myself in her path, I made sure to be in a more manageable state of mind.

"Listen," I said before she could speak, "I know you don't want to see me—"

She gave me the derisive look she usually paired with the word you, and I couldn't tell whether I was relieved she knew me at all or displeased she couldn't seem to rid herself of her continued loathing.

"—but I have to know something," I said. "Could you ever forgive me?"

I watched her mouth twitch with excuses to leave. I wanted to tell her listen, we've spent two nights together by now, surely you must remember something! That great brain of yours, Granger, it can't be a total sham—

"Give me a reason to forgive you," she said, and so for the rest of the afternoon we talked about our school days, about the war. I told her I had been a fool and she told me she had known it. I assured her that I had repented my wrongs, and she seemed as if she might believe me.

She was the one who kissed me that time, and I remember feeling a strange, haunting sadness, because I was unsure whether she meant it or whether something in my blood had awoken something in her.

"I should go," I said. "Shall I come by tomorrow?"

"Yes," she whispered. "Yes, tomorrow."

But when I arrived, it was more of the same.

"You," she said through her teeth again, staring at me as if I'd cost her everything.

I was starting to wonder if perhaps I had.

I suppose there are many ways to view what I was doing as abhorrent, perhaps even repulsive. After all, I was repeatedly tricking a woman that I had now slept with dozens of times. Each time I told myself there wouldn't be any more sex, but every time there was, because of course there was a little seedling of truth between us: What we had in the bedroom together was riper and more undeniable than anyone else could possibly give or fathom or believe.

Even after months, I have only watched her stare into nothing after any sort of sexual encounter with another man, her brilliant mind half-remembering something she had once clung to like some intangible craving. Worse, by now I've started intervening. It's upsetting, I know, but I can make her come like no one else.

I can make her smile like no one else.

I was beginning to think I was getting a bit mental, so I booked an appointment with my old friend Theo Nott, who is some sort of counselor these days. An odd choice of profession, though I suppose he was always good at listening intently to things and fading into the background while doing it.

"Oh," he said when he saw me. "How odd. You remind me of someone."
"A friend, I hope," I said when I took a seat, and for a moment his eyes seemed to glisten.

"He died," said Theo. "My old friend."

I told you, didn't I, that people's minds give them something they can make sense of once they've forgotten me? I suppose it's no wonder that Theo's mind would tell him I died around age eleven, or certainly well before age sixteen.

"In any case," Theo said, throwing one long leg over the other, "what's the matter?"

"I may be in love with a woman who routinely forgets me," I said.

"You mean she isn't particularly thoughtful?"

"No, she's very thoughtful," I said, because she is. Sometimes she frowns to herself when she inexplicably guesses how I take my tea. Other times she kisses the spot beneath my jaw where it makes me growl a little in my throat, and then she stiffens, as if she's feeling the echo of knowing how I like my cock sucked.

"It's more of a…" I clear my throat. "Well, I'm always having to prove myself to her."

"An unfortunate consequence of love," said Theo. "All the proving oneself. Terribly inconvenient."

"Oh, I agree," I said, "though it's… a bit more of a challenge than it sounds."

"I'm sure it seems that way," Theo demurred. "Every love is some new and different oddity. A unique and solitary language. Have you tried discussing it with her?"

"Well—" I hesitated. "I suppose not."

"Open communication is the key to a healthy relationship," said Theo.

"I suppose," I replied, because I had a feeling cognitive recognition was equally of consequence, but wasn't entirely sure how to point that out.

At that moment, however, I heard the sound of familiar footsteps, and it occurred to me (belatedly) that this was the building where she had the longstanding weekly appointment. I had forgotten, which was ironic. Normally she was the one doing the forgetting.

"I should go," I said to Theo, resolving to return, and then I slipped out just as she came in, sparing me another hateful glance.

"You," she said derisively.

"Yes, me," I sighed, waving her inside.

At the last moment I waved the door open just slightly, just enough to hear. Invasive, I know, but this is not a story about my morality. Besides, I have a tendency to escape punishment for my crimes.

"How is the recurring dream?" asked Theo.

"I seem to be having it more often," she said.

"You said before it made you feel unsteady. Like you woke not knowing where you were."
"Yes."

"And now?"

"I still wake without knowing where I am," she said uncertainly. "It's... very vivid. Unsettling."

"Still the same, then?"

"No, not the same," she said. "I feel... safe, actually. As if I'm coming home somewhere."

"Would that have anything to do with your sense of loss? It's been a difficult couple of years for you, losing your parents and then Ron."

"Oh yes, it has, but it's not like either of those things, I don't think. I don't feel loss at all. In fact, I feel... free." She swallowed. "Untethered. As if I'm finally given permission to be myself."

A pause.

"You can't live in dreams, Hermione."

"I know. I know." Her voice was small. "But sometimes I wish I could."

I left around then, finding the situation to be quite private, though I waited for her outside. She collided with me outside the door, distracted with thoughts from her session.

"I," I told her, "am a restlessness inside a stillness inside a restlessness."

She stared at me, taken aback, and I said, "May I buy you lunch?"

That night we made love three times on her sofa. Normally she's very ritualistic about where the fucking takes place, but we'd just finished watching a film that she and I have seen together seven times and I know her fondness for cunnilingus, so when I slid between her legs she didn't argue. Before I left, I wrote her a note detailing everything that had happened that day. What I had said to her and what she said back to me, the positions I had fucked her in, the details I understood of my family tree. I cited a book about veela behaviors from a Romanian professor whose work she respects, and then I wrote: I will be back for you tomorrow at ten. You will not remember any of this, but if you read this letter, then you already know what I'll say to you—I am a restlessness inside a stillness inside a restlessness—and you'll know I wasn't lying.

Then I slipped out, hoping Theo had been right.

I was waiting for her at the cafe. She stopped dead when she saw me, and I could see the letter with my handwriting clutched tightly in her hand.

"You," she said, but this time, it sounded more like a question.

"I am a restlessness inside a stillness inside a restlessness," I said in answer to the thing she hadn't asked, but she still blinked uncertainly, so I pushed out the chair across from mine.

"Sit," I said. "I'll tell you all about it."

There may not be sex tonight. In my experience, she'll have a lot of questions, and I plan to answer every single one. To the best of my knowledge, anyway. Besides, maybe the letter will be more effective in the future if she writes it herself, or if we write it together. Then tomorrow I can tell her all over again, at which point we can both start to prepare for the next full moon.
"Okay," she said, and slowly took a seat.

"Does it feel familiar?" I asked her.

She chewed her lip for a second before answering.

"Yes," she said eventually.

"Like a recurring dream?"

She glared at me. "Have you been stalking me?"

"Yes and no," I said. "But again, I'll tell you all about it."

For a second she looked like she might still hate me, but then I caught the look that followed.

Relief.

"Alright, fine," she said, choosing to believe in me, and then I thought: Maybe this is love. "Talk."

Chapter End Notes

Getting close to the end! Also, the literary quotes come from I Capture the Castle by Dodie Smith, Henry and June by Anaïs Nin, and Lady Chatterley's Lover by D.H. Lawrence, respectively.
"He's weird, right?" Theo murmured to Draco as the new deputy sheriff walked away. "I told you. Something's off with him."

"He's really fuckin' by the book," said Draco, grey gaze narrowed in disapproval. "Jesus," he added after a breath's calculation, "if Slughorn doesn't keep him on a leash, we're fucked. We've already got Greyback and his goons to deal with. Last thing we need is Diagon PD."

"Yeah," said Theo, adding after a split-second, "Think I'm gonna go after him."

"What? Nott, for fuck's sake, I don't need another search of the Manor," Draco started to growl in his wake, but Theo was already taking off, briskly catching the police officer's heel.

"Hey," he said. "I need a favor."

The deputy, Potter, turned with obvious unwillingness to face him.

"What?" he said, condensing his feelings on the matter into one insoluble word.

"So, you know my dad, right?" prompted Theo. "Scary big dude, rides a bike like maybe he's got an anvil between his legs? Arrested on five separate occasions, zero prison time?"

Potter's mouth tightened. "I'm familiar," he said warily.

"Yeah, well, I need someone," said Theo. "To bring to dinner with him. Christmas Eve."

One dark brow arched. "What, like a date?"

"Sure. Whatever."

"I don't think I'm what your father wants you to bring home," he said evasively.

"Yes," Theo confirmed. "Exactly. So you see why it's brilliant."

Potter paused a moment to consider this.
"Why me?" he asked after a second.

"Because," Theo said, "he'll fuckin' hate you. His pretentious asshole of a son bringing home a cop? A dude cop? Think about it. Like really fuckin' picture it. It's some once in a lifetime fuckery, man. Dickmanship to the highest degree."

There was a pause as the cop in question pondered the offer.

"There's nothing in it for me," Potter observed eventually, which was true enough. Not that Theo made a habit of letting rationality stop him.

"Not very philanthropic of you, Officer," admonished Theo.

Potter fixed him with another expressionless glance, eyes shifting from the Manor behind Theo back to Theo himself.

"Fine," he said. "Give me your phone."

"Not without a warrant," Theo scoffed, and Potter rolled his eyes.

"Fine, then you can find me yourself to tell me the details. Call me Harry," he said. "More intimate."

Then he unlocked his police cruiser and slid into the driver's seat.

There were no good reasons for Harry to say yes, other than having nothing else going on. No family of his own, and Ron would be off with his own obligations. The Weasleys had invited Harry to join them for dinner as well, but there was something a little stifling about latching onto Ron's family traditions. Besides, Harry had already agreed to spend Christmas Day with the Weasleys. One night out wouldn't kill him, unless the elder Theodore Nott tried to. In which case at least Harry had a gun.

Unfortunately, he figured it wasn't a good idea to waltz into a Death Eater's house packing his Diagon PD-issued Glock 19, so he tossed it into the glove compartment of his car instead. He was about to climb into the driver's seat of his Civic when a loud engine ripped from down the street, gradually revealing the narrow form of a heavily leather-clad Death Eater.

Not exactly a fitting sight, considering the houses were currently bedecked in garish Christmas lights, oversaturating the street in reds and greens. The asphalt was glossy and slick with rain, the sky fading early to black the way December evenings always did. It made the appearance of the man on the bike seem briefly like the arrival of Death himself.

Theo Nott took off his helmet, giving Harry a hawkish once-over.

"Get on," he said, smacking a gloved hand on the seat behind him.

"Absolutely fucking not," said Harry, and Theo threw one leg over the bike to rise to both feet, striding up the driveway and thrusting a helmet into Harry's abdomen.

"Get," Theo said, "on."

Harry supposed it was moderately hilarious that he was the one being brought home to scandalize a parent when frightening people was obviously Theo Nott's wheelhouse. He had a swallow tattooed beside his eye, his hair buzzed, a pair of leather gloves on the slender fingers of his restless hands. Beneath his leather cut was a v-neck that slid back from his collarbone, where the shape of a hawk's wing was stretching up to the base of his jaw. Harry didn't have to look to know there was a pistol hidden somewhere below the excess of leather.

"Do I need my Glock?" Harry asked, half-serious about grabbing it from the glove compartment.

"You can use mine," said Theo, unblinking.

Jesus fuck, Harry thought.

Theo shoved the helmet against Harry's chest again. "Put it on."

"Concerned for my safety, Nott?"

"Call me Theo in front of my father," suggested Theo. "Say it like you mean it, too."

His smile was carnivorous and deeply troubling.

"Yeah, fine," said Harry, putting on the helmet. "Whatever."

Theo strutted back to the bike and Harry grimaced.

"I can grab a lovely sidecar if you'd prefer it," Theo called over his shoulder. His voice had the particular register of a sneer from time to time, though more often it was dry and sharp; consummately impatient.

Harry rolled his eyes and straddled the bike behind Theo as the latter picked up his own helmet and strapped it on.

"Ready?" asked Theo.

"What exactly am I getting into?" said Harry.

"I'll take that as a yes," Theo replied over the sound of his engine roaring mockingly to life.

It would have been worth it for the look on his father's face alone. The moment Deputy Sheriff Harry Potter walked in the door, it was enough for the elder Theodore Nott to choke on about a thousand simultaneous expletives, though lamentably, none of them were lethal enough to stick.

"What. The. Fuck," muttered Nott, glaring at Theo. There were quiet sounds of conversation coming from the living room; the voices of whoever Nott was fucking these days, probably, and then whoever her sister was. As far as Theo's calculations had produced, there was almost always some hanger-on sister with a drug problem and more babies than she could logistically count.

"You said to bring someone, Papa," Theo reminded him blithely. "You know Harry, don't you?"

They knew each other quite well, as Theo understood it. Harry had recently pulled his father over for speeding, and only after Nott had bellowed red-faced at Slughorn while waving his gun around had the mess eventually gone away, though Theo suspected Harry knew nothing of the aftermath.

"Nott," said Harry to Theo's father, which was less respectful than it was factual, as if Harry could have read it off some fast food uniform and not the emblem of stature on his father's worn leather cut. "A pleasure."

Nott's face contorted briefly before he dragged Theo into the kitchen by the collar of his jacket, furious. "You're fucking joking."

"I did inherit your terrific sense of humor," said Theo, obligingly.

"Listen to me you little piece of shit, I've put up with enough bullshit from you over the years without having to deal with some sort of—"

"Something wrong?" asked Harry, draping himself in the door frame as if he might have wandered in by mistake. It took everything Theo possessed not to shout triumphantly at the perfection of the moment: Harry in his oatmeal-colored sweater and worn grey jeans, his father looking like he'd pull a knife on Theo any second. Harry's hair was still wild from the helmet, the tips of the raven-black sent anarchically in every direction, while his green eyes remained steadfastly focused on one thing: Theo's father's hands on Theo's collar.

Theo practically shivered from the irony, delicious, because while he had known there was something odd about Harry, he hadn't pinpointed until that precise moment that it was Harry's focus that had unnerved him so blissfully. It was the way he fixated on something without releasing it, without any intent to let it go. Theo had noticed it subconsciously when Harry was working his way through the Manor, finding all their most important secrets without even lifting a finger. The door to the meeting room where only Death Eaters could enter. The shelf that sat atop the trapdoor to the basement where they kept the AKs. The desk that held their most prized possession: the ledger containing the debts on which they had yet to collect, but inevitably would.

Harry had seen through all of them with a single glance, without blinking, and he had said nothing. He, unlike most people, didn't have to throw his weight around making threats. He had taken one look at everything he would need to remember and then he had stored it away like a fucking assassin, knowing what he'd come back for when the time was right.

And now he was looking at Nott's hands like he would cut them off at the first given opportunity.

"Is there a problem?" Harry said, before lifting his gaze to Theo's face, and all of a sudden Theo realized he had not been looking for an obstacle. He was obstacle enough already.

Whatever he had been looking for, he found it.

"Let's eat," said Nott gruffly, half-throwing Theo aside.

It became rapidly apparent that Harry's presence at dinner had started a war, and no one was pleased to see him. Darian Mulciber had walked in with Caleb Avery and shoved a bottle of something into Theo's hands as a gift, eyes narrowing as they strutted past Harry. Rookwood. Rowle. Malfy. All the same story, and then Draco Malfoy, who followed behind his father. He muttered something in Theo's ear and beckoned him away, calling for a sidebar. Theo glanced at Harry, giving him a half-nod that was more informative than apologetic—I'm leaving, I'll be back when I'm done—and stepped outside.

Five minutes passed, then ten. By the time Tom Riddle, president of the Death Eaters, walked in wearing a Santa hat and giving Harry a smile so thin he felt it scratch across his brain, Harry had waited long enough. He walked into the kitchen, glancing around, and stiffened when he heard the sounds of someone following him.

"How's it going, Officer?" came Theo's low drawl, and Harry gratefully unclenched his fist. He released the tension one knuckle at a time, hiding his relief.

"Where's your recycling?"
"That's so fucking cute," chuckled Theo. "Love that."

Harry turned stiffly as Theo took a step closer. He was, for better or worse, contemplating what might happen to him if anything at this party came to blows. Every single guest had a visible weapon, plus surely more invisible ones. Harry, meanwhile, was an outsider, a cop. The opposite of everything they stood for, and now he stood in the snake pit unarmed.

But suddenly it seemed other dangers were more interesting to consider.

"Come on," said Theo, beckoning Harry with a motion of his chin. Harry, however, hesitated a beat, resenting the summons.

"What'd Malfoy want?"

"Nothing." Another chin thrust. "Come."

Harry's jaw clenched, but he followed. Theo led him on a serpentine path out to the backyard, circumventing an enormous and ill-cared for tree before bringing him through a side door into one of two garages.

"This is mine," Theo said, pulling at a string overhead to illuminate a buzzing, uncovered bulb.

The space was neat and orderly, unlike the rest of the backyard, which had been filled with lumber and auto parts and unmowed grass. Here there were a variety of bike parts as well, but they had clearly been arranged in some purposeful context. Two motorcycles that didn't appear to be in working order sat against the wall, leaned obligingly for attention. Theo ran a hand over one of them fondly, like saying hello to an old friend.

"We don't have to go back inside," Theo said.

Harry scratched his forehead, folding his arms over his chest.

"You shouldn't let him talk to you like that," he said.

Theo didn't even blink. "It's not worth fighting."

"Then why come home at all?"

"Because fuck him, that's why."

"In what way are you fucking him?"

"Gross. And that's not the point."

"Enlighten me."

"Just spite, I guess. Reminding him he made me. The misery of it," Theo said with a grim smile, "keeps me going."

It wasn't enough for Harry. "But—"

"Jesus," Theo said, exasperated, and took two long strides to have Harry's face in his hands.

If pressed, Harry would confess that he had known it was coming; that he had long suspected the kiss that followed wouldn't be soft. It did not take him by surprise; not entirely.
It wasn't soft. It was angry, and precisely as spiteful as Theo's many mannerisms had suggested it might be, but blearily, out of the corner of Harry's eyes, he could see the black ink from Theo's knuckles stroking his face; the cold metal from Theo's rings brushing gently across his cheeks.

So he pulled Theo closer, turned to shove him against the wall of the garage, the two of them stumbling to circumvent the obstacles on the floor. Theo's hands slid under his sweater and he inhaled so sharply, so rapidly it hurt. The breath that escaped Theo in return was ragged and torn, closer to a sob than a gasp, and then Harry shoved him again for good measure, fitting their feet like puzzle pieces on the floor. He leaned his hips against Theo's and stayed there, and gradually, the kiss soothed to a softer, more manageable pace.

Harry's lips were still brushing Theo's when he said, "Nothing would spite him more than your happiness."

"How do you know?" asked Theo hoarsely.

"I know," said Harry. "Believe me, I know."

He kissed the edge of the hawk's wing where it met Theo's neck, running his tongue over the place where it met the base of Theo's jaw.

Outside, they could hear the sound of Christmas music alongside the sound of glass tinkling, the clink of beer bottles and cheap wine. Shouts of something incoherent about fucks and bikes, the sound of Nott's slurred speech.

"You want revenge? Come home with me," said Harry. "Wake up in my bed."

"He'll hate that," Theo mused aloud, toying with Harry's hair.

"Yeah, maybe, who cares. Do it because you want to," Harry said. "Because someday he'll be dead and you'll be old, and you'll be the only one thinking about all the time you wasted." He kissed Theo again, angrily this time. "Do it," he murmured, "because I know what the fuck I'm doing in bed."

"Jesus," Theo groaned again, his eyes closing briefly before refocusing on Harry's face. "Sure you want trash like me dirtying up your sheets, Officer?"

"I," Harry said, "can set you straight."

"Ha." Theo's laugh was free of melancholy, perfectly amused, and Harry recalled the furtive conversation Theo had just had with Draco, the state of the Death Eaters' clubhouse, piecing it all together and wondering if he'd still feel like this if Theo's true vocation was anything close to what the evidence suggested. "I'd like to see you try."

He made his calculations quickly: It didn't matter. It didn't fucking matter. Maybe it would eventually, but that was future Harry's problem. They kissed again, Theo's hands fumbling for Harry's zipper this time, but Harry took a step back, beckoning him with a glance.

"Make a call, Nott," Harry said. "My house. My bed. Or—"

"My rage?" Theo guessed drily, and Harry shrugged.

"You can bring it with you. Two whole bedrooms. Plenty of space."

There was a pause.
"Don't you have somewhere to be Christmas morning?" Theo's voice was heavy with suspicion, or with dread.

"Not anymore," Harry said.

The idea that maybe they were two people who didn't belong anywhere at all seemed enough to persuade him. Theo glanced over his shoulder to where the party went on outside before turning back to Harry, running his thumb over his lip and flicking it into the shape of a smile, like lighting a match.

"Same," said Theo, turning over his shoulder with the motion of his chin. "Let's go."

Chapter End Notes

Some updates: the last episode of Olivie Blake is Not Writing for 2019 just posted on youtube, and the discussion for this month's S.P.E.L.L. read is now available on tumblr. One more day remaining in the advent! Thank you so much for following along.
"It's quiet for Christmas Eve, I'll say that much," Ron remarked in a dull tone, spooning a bit of sugar lethargically into his tea and glancing over his shoulder at the passing form of Padma Patil. "Still," he sighed, watching her sit beside Parvati before dragging his attention back to the subject at hand, "better than the dreary alternative of joining Bill and Fleur at the cottage. What's in your letter, Mione?" he asked tangentially, leaning across the table to where Hermione had just finished reading the note an owl had dropped into her lap five minutes earlier.

"Oh, um. Nothing," she said, forcing brightness. Unfortunately Harry, who was now a person who had defeated a Dark Lord and therefore one who had little time for bollockery, arched a brow in open disagreement. "Alright, fine," Hermione grudgingly conceded, setting the letter on the table between them. "See for yourself."

Just as Harry reached for the letter, Ron's owl Pigwidgeon arrived, struggling overhead with the weight of a rather ordinary-sized package that was several times larger than the owl itself. The package fell to the table with a slap of contact, drawing attention from the other few people scattered across the room.

"Viktor wants you to come to Durmstrang?" Harry read aloud in bewilderment, at precisely the moment Ron had unwrapped his package.

"Bloody hell, what the—"

"Durmstrang?" sounded above Hermione's head, prompting her to look up as Draco was walking by with Theo at his side. "You can't be serious."

She flushed briefly at the sound of his voice, feeling a bit unprepared for his presence despite its relative frequency these days. They had just finished a potions assignment before the holidays, for which they'd both done remarkably well and managed, miraculously, not to kill each other. Lately, instead of being combative in the classroom they'd been courteous, and in private, there were moments when he was almost…

Something.

No, nothing.
Certainly nothing that was worth mentioning, whatever it was.

"Not that it's any of your business, Malfoy," Hermione said primly, bristling a little as Theo's lips thinned in obvious preemptive derision, "but Viktor was… Well." She cleared her throat, finding the presence of an audience abruptly discomfiting. "He was merely suggesting that if it's too difficult to sit for my N.E.W.T.s at Hogwarts, I should consider, erm. Staying with him," she coughed up. "To sit for my exams at Durmstrang instead."

"Ah yes, it's your exams he's concerned about, I'm sure," Draco sneered. It was a tone she hadn't heard from him in years, or at the very least in months, and within Hermione's chest, an old impulse seemed to tighten and constrict, launching her back to her younger self as she struggled not to sting with insult.

Evidently she'd been right; nothing had changed between them after all. He was clearly just as unbearable as he'd always been.

"So," Draco prompted, folding his arms combatively over his chest. "The golden girl runs off and leaves her broken castle behind for someone else to fix, then?"

Hermione flinched. "First of all, if anyone's gone and broken the castle—"

"Oi," Theo cut in, jutting his chin across the table. "Looks just like you, Malfoy."

The others stopped talking as Ron gingerly plucked the strange item he'd received from its box, staring at it in total bewilderment. It was a small wooden doll, or so it looked at first glance, wearing a soldier's uniform.

"What the fuck is that?" demanded Draco, shrinking back from it.

"A voodoo doll, I hope," muttered Ron under his breath, turning it over to toy with the little wooden lever.

"It's a nutcracker, you dolts," Hermione grumbled as Draco flicked his wand, summoning it from Ron's hand to scrutinize it with a scowl.

"Well, whatever it is, it has your eyes," commented Theo to Draco, "not to mention your milky complexion."

"For fuck's sake, Nott, do shut up—"

"Give it back," Hermione snapped at the two of them, and Draco glared at her, slamming the nutcracker down in front of Harry in response.

"Well forgive me, Granger, but as ever we have better things to do than linger," Draco drawled. "Enjoy Durmstrang. I hear the sun shines almost three whole days out of the year," he remarked, and then practically slithered away, leaving Hermione to turn to Harry with a roll of her eyes.

He, however, was ignoring Draco entirely, waiting for something from her instead. "Well?"

"Well what?" she demanded, prompting him to cock a brow in answer. "Oh, I don't know," she grumbled irritably, snatching the letter back from him. "It's just… Well, he might have a point about needing a change of scenery, just for sanity's sake. I mean, it's a bit odd, isn't it?" She swallowed, glancing around the room. "So many people gone, and after such a horrid year…"

She trailed off, and Harry and Ron exchanged a glance.
"I suppose it isn't the worst idea," Ron managed unwillingly.

Harry said nothing.

"All he said was that I should think about it. Nothing final. Anyway, what's this about?" Hermione demanded, nudging the nutcracker back towards Ron. "Some sort of bizarre gift from your mother?"

"I suppose," Ron said with a shrug, "or possibly some oddity from my father, but whoever it's from, they've forgotten a note."

"Well, it's certainly quite odd," Hermione judged with sudden, blistering impatience.

Again, Harry and Ron exchanged a glance in silence.

"Yeah," said Harry eventually, directing his attention to his toast. "A bit odd, that's all."

The three of them went up to their respective bedrooms very infrequently, particularly now that classes weren't in session due to the onslaught of the holidays. That night, they were huddled together in the Gryffindor common room; Hermione in the chair beside the fire, Harry lying on his back beside the hearth, and Ron taking up the entire sofa with his interminably long legs. The nutcracker sat on the side table between them, face turned up to where Hermione was reading until she frowned at it, unnerved.

"Sometimes it's hard to believe it's really over," Ron commented, breaking the silence.

They all knew what he meant. It was difficult to sleep these days, owing mostly to the difficulty of recovering from the war. Harry in particular didn't sleep well, according to Ron. He often sat upright in a cool sweat, ringing out his t-shirt in the bathroom and then returning quietly, unaware Ron had witnessed the whole thing.

When neither of the others spoke, Ron stretched out from where he was lying on the sofa, knocking the nutcracker from where it sat upon the table onto the floor.

"Ah, buggering fuck," he said, and Hermione rolled her eyes, leaning over to pick it up. The arm had broken off, so she repaired it with a quick charm, setting the nutcracker back down on the table and then running her finger carefully over the thin fracture where the break had been.

"Sometimes I think maybe it's not over at all," Hermione murmured, though it was buried beneath the sound of the fire crackling in the hearth.

Hermione woke sometime after midnight to find that Harry and Ron must have finally gone up to bed. She sat upright, groggily stretching to her feet, and realized that something, somewhere, was off: as her eyes adjusted to the low glow of the aging fire, she could see the common room sofa had been torn apart by what looked like claws. The upholstery was ripped, the frothy white down from the pillows littering the floor, and there was a pool of dark liquid where a cup had been overturned.

Hermione shot to her feet with a gasp as she heard a low hiss, a heavy slither on the floor. She hunted for her wand, digging helplessly through her pockets, but there was nothing. Rapidly, it was as if the room had started to grow, or else she had started to shrink; the sound of the snake came closer and closer, and when Hermione stumbled backwards she collided with what once had been a table leg, fear compressing her lungs as she struggled to run.
"Harry," she shouted desperately. "Ron!"

"Get down," hissed a voice, and she turned to find the nutcracker speaking to her in Draco's voice, his face and limbs wooden and stiff. The arm that had broken was held carefully to his chest, slung there with uncertainty as if he had his doubts it could be used. "Have you lost your mind?"

"I have to find them!"

He yanked her back again with his free hand and she rounded on him, furious.

"Listen Malfoy, or… Nutcracker, or whoever the hell you are—"

"Stay down and be quiet," he snapped. "Do you want to fight with me or do you want to survive?"

"I—"

She watched the snake's shadow morph from where it was silhouetted by the flames, becoming the shape of a hooded figure.

"No," Hermione said, scrambling backwards into the nutcracker's chest. "No, no, it can't be—"

"You have fought," said a cold, high voice, "valiantly."

She wanted to scream. She wanted to be sick. She squirmed as the nutcracker held her back with his good arm, her stomach wrenching at the thought of it: I knew it. I knew he wasn't gone. He'll never be gone, not really—

"If you continue to resist me, you will all die, one by one. I do not wish this to happen. Every drop of magical blood spilled is a loss and a waste."

It'll never be over, if I stay here it'll never end—

"Lord Voldemort is merciful," the voice said, but the rising volume of Hermione's panic seemed to have reached a breaking point, contorting something for her. Somewhere, something in her head seemed to snap.

"Oh, fuck you," she suddenly said, and then she tore furiously from the nutcracker's reach, tripping over the shoes Ron had left beside the sofa (as he always did) and plucking one up from the ground, lunging forward. "FUCK. YOU," she said clearly and calmly, tossing Ron's dirty old trainer directly into the head of the resurrected Lord Voldemort.

It was hopeless—she knew it was hopeless, even if rage was hardly ever rational—but somehow, she watched in amazement as the cloaked figure suddenly careened to the ground, twitching and falling still. There was a whorl of wind around her, the flames from the hearth dancing up to the height of the ceiling, and then, as the cloak of Lord Voldemort went up in flames, the nutcracker grabbed her arm, yanking her out of the common room.

They kept running until they reached the forest, the castle blazing behind them. Hermione doubled over upon planting her feet on sodden earth, panting from the effort; she rounded on the nutcracker the moment she caught her breath, managing, "We have to find them. We have to find Harry and Ron, we have to make sure they're safe—"

But before she could continue, there was a glimmer from the corner of her eye, and she turned to find… Harry.
Only it wasn't Harry.

Was it?

"Hermione," said Harry in relief, proving that it was, in fact, him, but she had never seen him like this before. The glasses and the gangling were gone, and in their place stood Harry in full prince's garb, wearing a coat so fine he shone an opalescent gold, like spun sugar. On his head was a crown edged with diamonds, its many facets glinting in the sun, and behind him the forest was thoroughly white with snow, the trees blanketed with powder.

"You did it, Hermione," he said adoringly, seeming to float towards her as he took her hand. "You defeated Lord Voldemort."

"What? No, I—you did that," she reminded him, baffled and therefore flustered, but Harry only smiled.

"Come," he said, beckoning her after him. "You should see what the world looks like now that you've set us free."

"But—" She followed him uncertainly, blinking. "But Harry—"

"You can come too," Harry said over her shoulder, and Hermione turned in confusion, finding to her astonishment that the nutcracker, wooden and hardly moving just moments before, had somehow been transformed by a flurry of snow. Where once had stood an odd, moderately damaged toy was now a familiar form: another prince, this one bedecked in silver. He was so radiant it nearly hurt Hermione's eyes to look at him, reflective from the gleam of his pale hair to the thrill of his grey eyes.

"Well, I thought you'd never ask," drawled the nutcracker-prince, his hair glinting amid the snow's pale sheen as he turned to Hermione. "Shall we?"

He offered her his arm, but she, skeptic that she was, set her jaw.

"Let's just go find Ron," she muttered, shoving past him to enter the forest alone.

The Forbidden Forest was nothing like Hermione remembered. It was filled with lush evergreens, just as it had always been, but now the air smelled like baking sweets, the ground a deep, saturated chocolate. Harry offered her a lift atop a thestral, which she accepted. Before she could say anything else, though, the nutcracker had climbed on as well, settling himself behind her.

"Who said you could come?" she hissed at him.

"That's quite the thank you for helping you escape," he observed.

"You didn't help me escape, you just—"

But she broke off as they entered a forest clearing bedecked in paper lanterns that glittered with color, pigmented dew drops in a celebration of light. The lanterns littered the trees like ornaments, filling the height of the forest as far as Hermione's eyes could see, and on the ground were a series of silks below little tongues of flame: candles that glinted joyously upwards, leading them down a narrow path. Overhead, Hermione caught the signs of fireworks and stared for a moment, forgetting entirely what she was saying as another familiar form came into view.

"Oh good, you're here," Ron said cheerily, manifesting from beneath a canopy to reveal himself in a tunic fashioned with red silk. "I'm so relieved you saved us."

"I didn't save you, Ron," Hermione said uncomfortably. "Don't you remember? Harry saved us, but if Voldemort came back once, he could easily come back ag-"

"Ron?" came a voice through the clearing.

Hermione looked up to see Padma Patil standing at the other end of the clearing, wrapped in a floaty red veil that perfectly matched the silk of Ron's tunic.

"What's Padma doing here?" Hermione asked, turning in befuddlement to address the question to Harry before realizing that he and his thestral were both gone. "Oh no, not again—Ron," she said, turning back to him in apprehension. "Ron, listen, we have to—"

But Ron had taken Padma's hand, pulling her into his circle of light and beginning to dance with her, slowly. He revolved in place, his eyes never falling from hers, and Padma reached up to brush his hair from his forehead, both of them behaving as if Hermione wasn't even there.

"Ron!" Hermione said in desperation, but the nutcracker's arms tightened around her, taking the reins gently from her hands.

"Let them have their peace," said the nutcracker, spurring the thestral further into the forest.

Beyond the lights and silks came the unexpected sound of water. The forest had somehow cleared away to the sea, and from the emblazoned greens and reds came a deep, cerulean blue. To Hermione's astonishment, Bill and Fleur rose up from the waves in robes of chiffon, manifesting from the ocean foam like gods from the deep. The sound of the sea itself rushed like blood in her ear, filling her lungs with salt while the path beneath them turned to soft, unblemished sand.

"Looking for someone?" asked Bill, though he didn't look up from where his gaze was currently fixed. He had his arm around Fleur, whose sea-robes were clinging to her hips and shrouding her breasts as she gave a little siren-laugh, melodic and lustfully sweet.

"I need to find Harry," Hermione said, feeling a little flush in her cheeks as Bill's hands started to wander, caressing his wife's backside. He lifted her up from the waves without any concern for Hermione's presence, Fleur's long legs wrapping around his torso to settle herself astride his hips. "Bill, have you, um… Have you seen him, or…? I'm just a little worried," Hermione called, blinking rapidly as Bill's tongue emerged to slide along the arch of Fleur's pale throat. "You know, since Voldemort came back," she hastily explained, "I'm not quite sure if he's safe, so—"

"He's gone, Hermione. It's over." Bill growled it into Fleur's neck, and Fleur laughed, tearing free from his arms and darting playfully into the sea. "He's gone," Bill called again, and then swept Fleur up with one arm like a tidal wave, dragging her under the deep and disappearing with a husky laugh, leaving Hermione behind to swallow uncomfortably.

"Well," Hermione said, suddenly conscious of the nutcracker's arms still around her waist where they rode astride the thestral. "That was unhelpful."

The nutcracker chuckled in her ear. "They don't care to be disturbed, I suppose."

"I… suppose not," Hermione said uncomfortably. "But still, if Harry's in trouble, we ought to go."

"We could stay," the nutcracker suggested, gesturing with his chin to where Bill and Fleur had disappeared. "They seem to be having fun, don't they?"
She squirmed a little in his arms.

"Let's just go," she said, giving the thestral a nudge with her heels.

"I told you," she said the moment they arrived back in the forest. This time the thickness of the canopy blocked out the sun, and within seconds they were enveloped in unrelenting darkness. "I told you he was still here somewhere!"

She struggled down from the thestral, searching for a source of light, when suddenly the nutcracker pulled a sword free from the sheath around his hips, wrenching a blade of blinding illumination from his scabbard as if he'd cast a Lumos along its edge.

"Here," he said, handing it to her. "Try this."

"Oh. Thanks." She cleared her throat gruffly, venturing forward with him in her wake. "Well—"

"Herm-ow-ninny," came a voice, and Hermione swept the blade upright, catching the glint of Viktor's face at what seemed to be a distance. "You haff decided to come! Vat excellent news," Viktor said, half his face shining with pleasure from the sword's edge as he stepped closer. "I am so pleased."

"Viktor, it's… quite dark here," Hermione said uncertainly. "Don't you have, um… something?"

"It is dark everyere, Herm-ow-ninny," said Viktor sagely, stepping towards her again. "You know this."

"Well, right, but if Voldemort is still here somewhere, we really ought to be able to see, so—"

"Don't be silly," said Viktor, one of his hands closing around Hermione's wrist. "Come, let us hide over here, you haff nothing to fear anymore—"

"Wait, Viktor don't—Nutcracker, help!" Hermione shouted, panicked, and felt his hand slip around hers, tugging her out of the darkness as the light of the sword's edge was swallowed up in a sudden, encasing gleam.

She stumbled in his arms, finding herself at the edge of the forest clearing again. This time, when the nutcracker released her, Hermione looked up to find Harry standing there with a placid smile, confusion evident on his face.

"What are you doing?" he asked, guilelessly puzzled. "You look frightened."

"Harry, I'm—"

She shrank back as a shadowed figure emerged once again from the corner of her eye; just like the snake. Just like Lord Voldemort. Once again, someone was approaching Harry in a mask, shrouded arms outstretched beneath a heavy black cloak.

"Harry," she gasped. "Harry, WATCH OUT!"

But the man had already slid the mask from his face, tossing it to the ground for it to be swallowed up by a yawn from the forest floor.

"Oi, Potter," said Theo Nott. "Been looking for you."
To Hermione's continued disbelief, Harry turned with a smile, reaching for Theo's cheek with one hand and tugging him closer. "There you are," Harry said, before doing the absolute least possible thing and kissing Theo's lips lightly, gently. "I was just about to tell Hermione how we're safe here," he explained to Theo, turning back to face Hermione with a look of contented rapture. "It was a long journey, wasn't it?" he asked her wistfully. "So perhaps you don't know yet how everything turns out. Voldemort's gone, but you're still here. And I promise," he said, lacing his fingers blindly with Theo's, "there is peace eventually, Hermione. For all of us, there is peace."

"But," Hermione said, and frowned. "But… is this…"

The word real lingered on her tongue, but in the span of her inability to voice it, Harry soon lost interest. Theo pulled Harry into him again, and Hermione felt a familiar touch on her arm coaxing her backwards, towards the castle.

This time, she let herself be led, dizzily numb and uncertain until the moment the nutcracker paused, turning towards her and waiting in silence for her to speak.

"What if he isn't really gone?" she finally managed to whisper in confession, and the nutcracker took her face gently in his hands.

"You're safe here," he told her. "You can stay here."

"But what if I'll always be afraid? What if I never believe I'm actually safe?"

She looked up to find him observing her in penitent silence, that familiar grey gaze settling gently on hers as if he'd already seen the future. As if he already knew she would wind up here one day, with her hands held securely in his.

"You're safe here," he said again, and when he leaned forward, Hermione felt the words blooming over her lips like spring itself, rising up to heat her cheeks and warming her from the inside out, like the crackle of a midnight fire.

"Don't go," the nutcracker whispered to her lips, and Hermione clung to him, wanting to say I won't, I won't leave, I promise, but the warmth was pulling her elsewhere, out of the snow, away from the trees, and she slipped away from him gradually, one finger at a time.

Hermione opened her eyes to find embers dying in the hearth, a little drool on the pillow beneath her cheek. She sat up, glancing from Harry to Ron, and frowned, blinking, as she remembered the nutcracker sitting beside her chair, still staring lifelessly at her.

It was morning by then, the sun creeping in through the tower windows to fill the common room with early light. It was Christmas morning, she remembered, and decided it would be best if she busied herself by fetching some cocoa for Ron and Harry when they woke.

She crept into the corridor, still a little shaken by her odd and vivid dream, and suddenly collided with someone outside the portrait.

"Fuck, balls, I—"

She looked up to find herself leaned against Draco Malfoy's chest for balance, having staggered unexpectedly into him.

"You really do look like that nutcracker," she remarked without thinking, and he opened his mouth, then closed it.
She could see him battling with himself to prevent saying something dickish in reply, so she sighed, figuring it was best to just get it over with, and managed a slightly stiff, "What are you doing here?"

That was when she noticed the envelope in his hand, her name sprawled across it in careful, premeditated script.

"Nothing," he muttered, "I was just—"

He winced, catching her swift glance of confusion, and then sighed, shaking his head.

"Don't go," he said miserably. "I've been a prick, I know, and you've no reason to stay, but—"

A pause.

"Don't go," he repeated softly, and she blinked, disarmed by the tone of sentiment.

Before she could reply, the portrait opened behind her, Harry and Ron's voices pouring out from the common room in their wake. Hastily, Draco released her, turning gruffly towards the stairs and shoving the note back into his pocket as he went.

"—should've figured it was from George. Apparently he put some sort of hallucinogenic vial inside it to smuggle to seventh years? Doesn't care whether I'm his intoxicant drug mule, obviously, plus then he forgot to put the note with instructions inside the—Oh, Mione," Ron remarked with surprise, colliding with her precisely as she'd just collided with Draco. "What are you doing out here?"

Someday, Hermione was pretty sure she would have to tell him to talk to Padma instead of staring longingly at her from afar. But for now, she was already running, catching hastily up to Draco on the stairs and tugging him back before he could settle both feet on the landing.

"Wait," she gulped, pausing breathlessly as he turned to face her. Above their heads, a little sprig of mistletoe unfurled and stretched its leaves, blossoming with promise.

"Yes?" he prompted, but by then, she didn't bother with a reply.

The kiss she gave him, steady and safe and sure, was answer enough for them both.

Chapter End Notes

We did it! A miracle. Thank you so much for your prompts and for following along with me this advent; I really wanted to give you all a little something as a thank you for being here another marvelous year, so I hope you found it enjoyable (or, at the very least, a pleasant distraction).

In personal news, you can now find my next release, THE ATLAS SIX, on my website. Also, while my personal advent has concluded, I will be back tomorrow to post my D/Hr Advent fic. Until then—Merry Christmas Eve, Happy Hanukkah, and many besos from the wasteland!
Run the Gauntlet

Pairing: Dramione (Draco x Hermione)

Universe: Post-War, EWE

Rating: T

Summary: Written for the 2019 D/Hr Advent. When the Ministry of Magic announces a renaissance faire to benefit families affected by the war, everyone agrees it's probably a stupid idea —except for Draco, who has amends to make, and Hermione, who has an ex to avoid. Seeing as artisans and performers don't interact, they're convinced it won't be a problem. Much to their joint dismay, fate intervenes to prove them wrong.

You can find this one shot here: Run the Gauntlet [AO3]. Again, just posting the chapter on FFN without disturbing the matching chapter enumeration on AO3!

Chapter End Notes

If you're interested in my books, a reminder that you can find my latest release, THE ATLAS SIX, on my website or tumblr. Outside of that, thank you for another year in the wasteland; once again, Merry Christmas, Happy Hanukkah, and here's to 2020!
"Well," said Theo Nott, drumming his fingers on the table. "Gotta say, I thought you were gone for good, Parkinson."

"So did I." She walked slowly around the room, eyeing the frames on the walls. "So you're head honcho now, huh Nott? Didn't see that coming."

"It seems Draco has a taste for more conventional politics," Theo supplied in explanation, "but you know that was never my style. Too niche," he clarified facetiously, gesturing to where he sat in his black leather cut. He'd gotten a proper haircut at some point since high school; presumably more than just the one, though there was no way of confirming. Altogether he looked less like he'd stumbled in off the street than Pansy could remember from their anarchical teen years. "My appeal is somewhat less universal."

Pansy paused to arch a brow over her shoulder. "But every cult needs a leader, right?"

"Yep." He leaned back in his chair, head lolling against it with a languid smile. "That's the one."

Pansy continued her perusal of the photographs, falling still in front of a picture of her father.

"Left him on the wall?" she murmured.

"Of course. Once a Death Eater, always a Death Eater."

"Except for Riddle?"
"Traitors," Theo said, "are something different."

She nodded, still looking at the picture. Her father stood beside Theo's father, posing next to their bikes like club bouncers on Sunset. Irreverent thugs.

Her heart ached a little.

"Parkinson," Theo called from behind her. "Take your coat off and stay awhile."

"Nah, I won't be here long." Having run out of pictures to peruse, she turned to face him where he sat. "I just came to ask you something."

"Yeah? Ask." Theo beckoned her with his chin, which was split down the center with a scar. She wondered if she had been there to see him earn it and then dismissed the thought. Most likely not. She'd missed a lot in the decade or so she'd been away.

"You guys still kill people?" she ventured tangentially.

"Only on the second Thursday of every month," Theo drawled, lacing his hands behind his head. "But we'll Tonya Harding someone if they've really got it coming."

"Break a kneecap, you mean?"

"No, win the Nationals in figure skating," said Theo, before kicking his legs out and asking, "Who've you got it in for, Pans?"

"No one." She stepped towards him, distancing herself from the picture of her father. "Nothing. Just wondering what else might've changed around here, that's all."

"You certainly have," Theo commented blandly.

She smiled at him. Not a blinding one, well-rehearsed. A felt cute, might delete later one. She generally tried to mix it up on her Instagram feed, never wanting to appear too out of touch. People liked to see a little insecurity in their icons.

"Not as much as you'd think," she told him, and he smiled back, all teeth.

She couldn't remember what the salon had been before, but her instincts told her it had been a salon then, too. From the outside it was pristine, almost too perfect, like a Drybar in Beverly Hills, except it was flanked by the flagging brick of two Main Street staples—the used bookstore and the only other cafe in town besides the Leaky—instead of a minimalist boutique or whatever artisan baked goods were considered fashionable these days.

She pushed open the door and stepped inside, catching sight of Daphne from afar. She was chatting with someone in medical scrubs who looked up, pausing, which then prompted Daphne to look up, too.

Daphne looked the same. Sweeter without the low-lows, definitely, and considerably less likely to offer up a joint from her backpack, but generally the same.

"Pansy," Daphne registered without thinking, and then blinked. "Holy shit, Pans, is that you?"

The other woman, exceedingly small and with hair pulled uncomplicatedly back from her face, seemed to frown with confusion when Pansy stepped forward in greeting, accepting Daphne's warm embrace.
"Daph," said Pansy, before glancing at the bemused woman in scrubs. "And you are…?"

"Oh gosh, sorry, I'm Hermione," the woman supplied, shaking herself of her momentary daze, "I just—" A pause. "Aren't you…?"

"No, I just look like her." Pansy flashed the woman, Hermione, a paparazzi smile. "Get it all the time."

"Oh, right," said Hermione, offering up a faint, half-convinced laugh when Daphne mercilessly cut in.

"Oh Jesus, she's joking—Pansy," Daphne sighed, rolling her eyes, "this is Hermione, Draco's wife. Dr. Granger," she purred, applying an emphatic layer of formality obviously intended to make Hermione groan, "this is Pansy Parkinson. An old friend."

"Yeah, wow, it's so surreal to meet you," offered Hermione along with her hand, looking moderately recovered from her initial stumbling. "I mean with all the news coverage and stuff, I feel like I just saw your name this morning—"

"Wife," Pansy echoed with an arched brow at Daphne, as Hermione made a dismissive little gesture of yeah, sure, probably. "My goodness, it's every girl's dream to marry a doctor, isn't it? How impressive for Draco to have managed it."

"Oh, it's—" Again, Hermione waved her away with a flushed look of don't be silly. "Nothing."

"I think you and I both know it's not nothing," remarked Pansy, before turning back to Daphne. "And you, Little Miss Entrepreneur, I hear you have a baby now?"

"Well, it just seemed like less work than a medical career," Daphne replied.

Pansy smiled.

"I guess I never made the connection you were actually from here," Hermione commented, still evidently distracted by Pansy's appearance. "I mean, Draco mentioned it once when your song came on the radio, but I honestly thought he was joking—"

"He was a terrible prom date," said Pansy. "Got in a fight that night at the Leaky. Got blood on my dress, too," she added with a roll of her eyes.

"How do you know it wasn't your blood?" asked Daphne wickedly. "I seem to recall you putting Ginny Weasley's nose out of commission that night, Miss Parkinson."

Pansy smiled thinly as Hermione's eyes widened.

"Oh Daph, you know I don't bleed," she said. "I just sparkle."

"Miss Parkinson. Rumor has it you're in town? Much as I've adored our little year-long game of phone tag, I'm going to have to insist this time: You're it. Your father's estate papers need to be taken care of. The deed to the house is still in my possession. Your inheritance, paltry as it is compared to whatever else you may have in your 401k, is currently awaiting your attention. While I appreciate we're all being blessed with the rare presence of our own almighty pop star and former Prom Queen, I hope it's not too terribly much to ask that you arrange to come by my office and sign a few papers. Twenty minutes and you'll be on your merry way."

"You look well," said Pansy conclusively. "Very well."

Susan gave her a glowy, suburban sort of look.

" Turns out you really can sweat out a coke problem if you do enough pilates," she said.

Pansy chuckled, uncrossing her legs and rising to her feet.

"Thanks for this," she said, picking up the packet Susan's husband Cormac had left for her. "And for the lemonade, too. Tell McLaggen I'll put the house on the market as soon as I get everything taken care of with the lawyer."

"Sure," said Susan, walking her to the door. "Oh, but Pans," she said, cautiously clearing her throat, "what brings you back? I mean… I guess we all expected to see you at the, you know. The funeral."

"Right, yeah," Pansy said, willfully expressionless. "I know. But I was in Japan at the time and couldn't get back."

"Right, sure, of course," offered Susan hastily. "But then with your mom gone and everything—"

"Yeah, I know. I just couldn't get away."

"—Oh of course, and I mean the whole thing was like, so weird, right?" she sighed, evidently attempting to be sympathetic. "Like, all that and then your tour finishes, then you announce another album and boom, you're randomly in the news for jury duty—like, what the hell, right? I mean I guess even pop stars have a civic duty or whatever, but still—"

"Sooz, babe, I'm so sorry, I have to run," said Pansy, leaning forward to kiss her cheek. "Coffee soon? Bagels?"

"Yeah, sure, anytime!"

"Perfect," said Pansy, sliding her sunglasses on her face with the private assurance that neither of them would ever dream of following up. "See you soon."

"All in favor?"

"Aye," said Percy, along with the rest of the planning commission.

"Excellent. Meeting adjourned."

There was a snap from one of the Creevey brothers' cameras and then, blessedly, freedom. Percy grabbed a cup of takeaway coffee from the Leaky and hurried out the door, bypassing the store-bought cookies with the stale, cake-like consistency and thick pink frosting. He'd had enough of those to last a lifetime, though evidently the rest of the commission disagreed.

"Weasley, if we could just get—"

"Yeah, email me," said Percy over his shoulder. "I've got a meeting."

"What, now?"

"Yes, now," Percy confirmed, shoving open the City Hall doors and hurrying up the street to his office.
He did not have a meeting.

He did, however, have other places to be, with nearly any place containing far more pressing work than whatever awaited him over stale cookies in the council chambers. Small town politics were and forever would be the same, as far as Percy was concerned. Perhaps things were a bit more exciting at the city council meetings, but the planning commission… there were only so many discussions he could have about the dangerous effects of back pain caused by speed bumps.

(Bumps were the narrow ones. 'Humps' were broader, more expensive, and generally preferred. Roundabouts were much too European for Diagon. But think of the children! Drive like your kids live here, et cetera et cetera. Half the time it took four months of argument just to produce a flashing sign.)

He had wanted to be a prosecutor, attracted by the excitement of criminal law, until his father had gotten beaten up by the Death Eaters, which was too much excitement. Percy had been in college at the time, worryingly sitting by his phone and waiting for news from his mother so intently (she'd forgotten to call and report back post-surgery, having been occupied by one of his more pressing siblings) that he nearly slept through his finals. Then he'd wanted to be a defense attorney, until he realized his clients would be the same people who'd beaten his father half to death.

When Arthur Weasley told him to stick to contracts, Percy listened. He focused on transactional law, finding he had a talent for accountancy, real estate, and wills, all of which were complicated. So complicated, in fact, that friends of his mother began calling him the moment he passed the bar, asking if he wouldn't mind helping with this or that. So complicated that he'd set up a temporary office in his parents' house, thinking he'd help for a few months before finding employment at a firm somewhere in San Francisco or Los Angeles, but had instead been pushed to open an office on Main Street when the house became too cramped and the billable hours didn't stop. So complicated that he didn't need business cards, just word of mouth, because all the Diagon housewives would say to each other, "Give Molly's boy a call, he'll help you," and now here he was, right where he'd started, except he was in his second term as planning commissioner and scheduled to speak at his high school's career day next week.

Bill was somewhere in Egypt. Charlie was in Romania or something, though he was coming home for a day or so like he usually did every couple of years before jetting off again. Even Fred and George split their time between their shop downtown and New York City to negotiate the franchising of their products. (They'd had Percy look over the contracts.) Ron was still in Diagon for now, but who knew where Padma's cardiology career would ultimately take them. Ginny had gotten the hell out of Dodge after college and though her absence seemed to plague their mother most intently, Percy hadn't blamed her. There wasn't a lot left here to see.

Which wasn't to say he didn't like living in Diagon. It kept him busy, at least, and it had seen a lot of improvements since the Death Eaters' leadership had changed hands. Retail was doing well. Downtown, where he operated his legal business, was pleasantly gentrifying. He slid up the narrow stairwell between two Main Street storefronts and took the usual sharp right, pushing open the door to his second-story office. It was unlocked because he had only been gone for an hour, and Diagon generally wasn't the sort of place he had to worry about things being stolen unless he'd offended a Death Eater, which he hadn't.

But one was sitting on the couch that purported to be a waiting room anyway.

"Weasley," said Pansy Parkinson, rising to her feet. "You rang?"

She was wearing a pair of skintight leggings, a loose white tank top, a long blazer. Her hair was long and thick, glamorous and effortless at the same time.
"Closed," Percy said without a second glance, waltzing into his office and referencing the sign on the door. The coffee in his hand was cold, but he drank it anyway. "I asked you to schedule a meeting with me, not surprise me after hours."

"Well, I was in the neighborhood," said Pansy, evidently unfazed by his tone. "I'm hoping to have this taken care of tonight."

"Hope is a dangerous thing for anyone to have, Miss Parkinson," Percy called over his shoulder, loosening his tie and tossing it aside.

It was typical of her not to think much of his time; not only because she was some sort of famous pop singer now—someone who made the news just for walking into a courthouse, which Percy did several times a week—but because she was the daughter of a Death Eater. Limitless. Condescending. They thought they ran this town, and just because they were generally correct about that didn't make it more palatable. It was only with severe misgivings that Percy had backed Draco Malfoy in the most recent City Council election; he wouldn't have if not for finding Cormac McLaggen, Malfoy's opponent, to be an absolute imbecile.

Pansy appeared in the door frame, leaning against it.

"Dark," she commented.

He glanced up. "I need time to look over your file to make sure I have everything pulled for you to sign. I'd like to have this over with in one sitting."

"Jesus," remarked Pansy. "You haven't changed a bit, have you?"

Percy, irritated, woke his computer with a tap on the return key. "No, Miss Parkinson, I have not."

"Yikes." She was still standing there, testing him.

"Come back in the morning," he suggested. "I open at nine a.m."

"Can you do earlier? I'm a morning person," she said.

"Great," he replied. "Then you won't be late."

She made a sound like a snort of disbelief, and he looked up.

"I have things to attend to," he informed her. "The world does not simply stop because you've asked it to."

Her expression hardened, going cold.

"I know that," she said.

Then she turned on her heel, and Percy remembered that she was here to sort through the papers of her father's death, and if he had not felt that a year was ample time for her to deal with it, he might have felt sorry for how he'd acted, a little bit, maybe—but he did feel she'd dragged her feet more than strictly necessary, so instead he pulled up the bankruptcy papers for one of his other clients and got to work with another sip of cold coffee, hoping to make it home before ten.

Pansy didn't make her nine o'clock appointment.

Instead she sat in her father's living room and watched his television, flipping through channels.
She'd made sure her assistant continued to pay the cable bills, electric, water, gas. Did she want to find a tenant for the house? No, she didn't. Did she want to sell it? Yeah, sure, eventually, but who knew what sort of state it was in. Did she want someone to go look at it? No of course not, there were personal possessions in there, she would do it herself eventually. Did she want someone to buy plane tickets? Please stop pestering her, she had a tour to prepare for. An album to record. Her first Vogue shoot. It was tax season. Holiday season. Boyfriend season. Breakup season. Allergy season.

She flipped through channels, pausing only briefly.

"—make fetch happen, it's not going to happen—"

"—DOW at an all-time high—"

"—WE WERE ON A BREAK—"

"—expected to begin this morning here in Los Angeles. The case against Hollywood producer Ludo Bagman has garnered unprecedented media attention in recent weeks, owing in large part to the testimony of singer Pansy Parkinson during jury selection proceedings."

Pansy paused her finger expectantly on the channel-up button.

"Miss Parkinson, seen here exiting the Los Angeles County Courthouse, was ultimately dismissed from jury selection despite her professed willingness to serve and be impartial. After Bagman's team of lawyers questioned her relationship with one of the witnesses, an alleged victim in what may very well be the most controversial sexual assault investigation of the dec—"

"—will be a blustery fifty-two degrees this morning with temperatures reaching an average high of sixty-five mid-afternoon—"

Pansy shut the television off and rose to her feet, contemplating how to spend the rest of her morning. Possibly she could pack up the rest of her father's things, though most of it seemed to have already been picked apart, presumably by her AWOL mother or one of the other Death Eaters. Theo had promised (via her assistant) to have someone pick up the majority of the things Pansy had wanted removed, like the mattress her father had died on, and anything of value, like the grandfather clock that was now being sold in one of the thrift shops on Main Street. Theo was at least very reliable, which Pansy supposed he always had been. She just hadn't stayed long enough in Diagon to find out for herself what he'd grown up to be.

She slid a glance listlessly outside, to the garage where her father kept his bikes. She'd told Theo to get rid of anything that wasn't working, but he'd sent back (again, via her assistant) that all of her father's bikes were, in fact, in near-perfect order. Granted, that was just shy of a year ago. Probably most of them could use some tuning up.

Pansy stretched to her feet, swapping her yoga pants for a pair of jeans.

Time to go fix some bikes.

Of course she hadn't shown up. He wasn't even surprised when she wasn't there at nine, and certainly not when the clock struck ten without her present. He had a feeling she'd wanted him to suffer for letting her proffered window of amiability lapse, and while he probably should have seen that coming, it also intensely annoyed him.

At noon, having glanced at the Parkinson file too many times to count, Percy finally rose to his feet, scribbling a note that he'd be out of the office for lunch before climbing into his Prius, heading first to the nicest inn on Main Street. No, no check-ins the previous day, the front desk said. He drove to the Manor, stepping inside just far enough to ask if Theo Nott had any idea where Pansy Parkinson was. The response—Nott wasn't there, leaving him to speak with Mulciber, the garage manager—was a menacing, Why, who was lookin' for her? Never mind. He tried Daphne Greengrass' salon, knowing they'd been friends half a lifetime ago. No, she hadn't seen her, not since yesterday. Okay, great. Wonderful. Perfect.

The Parkinson house was his seventh stop. He hadn't sincerely thought that after a year of zealously avoiding anything to do with her father's death, Pansy might have chosen to return there, of all places—to the house she refused to sell or do anything with aside from paying the property taxes, which she'd done only after Percy had spoken impatiently with both her voicemail and her assistant thirty separate times—but he paused when he heard the sound of an engine roaring to life from the garage. He slid his messenger bag from the passenger seat and stepped out of his car, heading up the driveway.

"Miss Parkinson," he called over the sound of a Harley, or what he assumed was a Harley. He was never much into motorsports. All very ecologically unsound, in his view, not to mention inescapable deathtraps.

She glanced up at him, distracted, and returned her attention immediately to the bike, as if he'd interrupted her mid-thought. She was wearing a pair of jeans, hair tied back in a loose braid down her back. No makeup, but she had the sort of skin millions of dollars in album sales could probably buy, and therefore didn't need it. She could probably also afford the trainer that got her that body, those legs. She had two black-and-white swallows circling each other tattooed on the outside of her wrist. They had focused on it for her Vogue cover, leaving only her dark eyes visible, both of them swiped with thick eyeliner. She had looked like a goth and haunted poet instead of what she actually was: the daughter of a thug and an arms dealer who'd grown up in a small town, exactly the same way he had.

"Miss Parkinson," he said again, lifting the file for her to see. "We have an appointment."

"So you won't meet before or after hours, but you'll do house calls," she replied without looking up, revving the engine again. He doubted there was any use for it except to drown out his response, though he didn't make one. She glanced up, adding snidely, "You should put that on your business card."

Percy famously did not lose his temper. It unnerved people, especially other lawyers, though it wasn't any sort of skill. He simply had an unflappable quality that was the result of him being the middle of seven siblings. There was no point getting angry. Someone older would only shove him, someone younger would inevitably prank him, and his sister would flip him off and roll her eyes before walking away, indifferent. Getting angry had never served him well.

"Miss Parkinson," he said again. "If you would please just—"

But he was forced to cut himself off when she suddenly tossed him a helmet, retreating to the garage.

"Put it on," she called over her shoulder.

He sighed heavily, glancing down at it. "Miss Parkinson, I really do not have time t-"

"Mm, yeah, I know," she replied, tugging on an oversized leather jacket marked with the Death Eater symbol that must have belonged to her father. She put on her own helmet, beckoning to him.
"Get on," she said, patting the seat of the motorcycle.

Percy inhaled once, then exhaled.

"Miss Parkinson, I really must insist—"

"I need groceries," she said. "Forgot to have my assistant stock the fridge before I got here. I mean, granted, I'm not going to be here long, but I prefer my meals home-cooked. Easier to get lean proteins that way. Fresh produce."

She beckoned him again. He understood that he was being toyed with.

"You only have to sign the papers," he reminded her. "We just have to talk for a few minutes, and then—"

She slid on a pair of aviators. "We can do it after I get groceries."

No point fighting her, he thought, grudgingly resigned. She clearly wanted him to resist.

"Very well," Percy said tightly, "but if you insist, I imagine a vehicle would be easier. My car is right there," he pointed out, gesturing over his shoulder, "and I'd be happy t-"

"Yeah, I'm not getting in your car," she told him, throwing one leg over the bike. "How do I know you're not a serial killer?"

"I suppose it's a risk you'll have to take," he said, "though again, I'm happy to talk right here, if you'd like. There's no need t-"

She revved the engine again, drowning him out.

"Get on the bike, Mr Weasley," she said mockingly, "or we can reschedule. Say March thirty-second, 2049?"

Inhale. Exhale.

Percy slid the file back into his bag, walking over to the bike. He tucked the helmet under one arm and paused to roll up the sleeves on his dress shirt, starting with the left.

"You know, it's ironic," he said, finishing his right sleeve and then securing the helmet on his head with pointed deliberation, "I don't actually have a will. If I die on this bike, someone's going to have to handle quite a lot of inconvenient paperwork."

She fixed him with a steady glance. "You think I don't know how to ride a bike?"

He was unfortunately quite certain that she did, in fact, know how. All evidence pointed to it. She had anarchy in her blood, chaos in her genes. She was an agent of disaster, the inheritress to generations of lawlessness, who had somehow channeled it all into saccharine sweetness; wistful songs about broken hearts.

He climbed on behind her, pausing to adjust his bag before setting both hands on her hips. The hourglass of her waist seemed fragile, even if he knew perfectly well she was anything but.

The moment he touched her he saw the blades of her shoulders tensing and he realized that perhaps she had miscalculated, not him; she hadn't really expected him to do it. Inwardly he smiled to himself, securing his thighs around hers, wrapping his arms firmly around her. The inhale when he brushed her ribs was sharp.
"Don't fall off," she said.

Then she took off with a jolt down the driveway, taking the first hard right.

She leaned into every corner just because. Just fucking because. Because he clearly thought he had some idea who she was, what she was like, what she'd say no to. Because he was calling her bluff, but she wasn't fucking bluffing.

His arms went perilously tight around her and savagely, she fought a laugh.

He hadn't looked as ridiculous as she'd expected him to when he put on that helmet. She'd suffered the abject curse of knowing a man always looked better when he rolled up his sleeves, the little flex of forearm serving to remind her inconveniently of masculinity and primordial things. Primal things.

God, she wished she could give up on men. It wasn't even entirely out of the question. She wasn't hopelessly heterosexual, like some women; the option to ignore her attraction to dick was often easy to indulge. She'd had a little fling with a Victoria's Secret model last year (secret, of course, though they'd looked good together on their little Melrose jaunts) and Pansy had thought she could do it, potentially. Quit men altogether and focus her emotional efforts on dating women.

But Percy was right about hope, unfortunately. It was a dangerous thing for anyone to have.

Luckily nothing in Diagon was very far away, and Pansy pulled up to the parking lot of the grocery store within a matter of five or so minutes. He was obviously eager to get off the bike, pulling away instantly, and she grudgingly lamented the loss of him against her back. His shoulders and chest were broad, and he smelled fucking fantastic. Freshly laundered, freshly showered. Pheromones were such a curse, and worse was the rise of hipsterism in Hollywood. Now it was unexceptional for men to look like nerds; even considered attractive. Percy Weasley was built like a Tom Ford model, all skinny ties and dress shirts and cheekbones holding up glasses that framed his blue eyes. If she took him to a party in Hollywood, people would probably ask which Ian McEwan adaptation they knew him from.

Pansy's tastes, fortunately, were more Tarantino. The Timothée Chalamets of the world could have their moment if they wanted. She liked boys with big guns.

"Where are you planning to put the groceries?"

She blinked, having forgotten he was capable of speech. "What?"

"The groceries," said Percy, removing the helmet. His hair was a mess. He rifled a hand through it carelessly and she thought, Don't. Please, don't. "Did you bring a bag?"

She ignored him, sitting her helmet on the bike and walking into the grocery store.

He followed, undeterred.

"What brought you back?" he asked her. "You never said why you were here."

She plucked a cantaloupe from a crate near the door, sniffing it for ripeness. "My father died, Weasley. Pretty sure you're aware of that."

"A year is a long time to put off this sort of thing."
"Well I'm here now, aren't I?" She set the melon down, shifting over to the apples. A pity avocados weren't currently in season. "Better late than never."

"I just find it odd," remarked Percy.

"I'm busy. The tour, my album—"

"The trial," he said.

She picked up a peach, staring at it.

"You know, most people will do absolutely anything to get out of jury duty," he commented. "Especially someone like you, who doesn't even have the time to attend her father's funeral."

She set the peach down too hard to look at him, surely bruising it on impact. "What's that supposed to mean?"

She only realized he was baiting her into acknowledging him until after a little smirk of satisfaction flitted across his lips.

"Nothing," he said.

He reached for his bag and she gritted her teeth.

"I told you, I'm buying groceries right now—"

"Yes, and we can talk about your father's debts and assets while you test every peach in the store, Miss Parkinson. Take your time."

He was infuriating.

"I came to your office," she reminded him. "I was ready to go through this then."

"I'm aware, but—"

"Have you ever had to deal with a parent dying?" she asked him blisteringly.

"No."

"His tone was clipped, formal. "However, I did once sit beside my father's hospital bed for several days waiting to see if he would live. I believe you may recall that event? Your father was there, in fact," he informed her, leaving the sentence flatly between them. "I'm sure you were very concerned he might be arrested but, of course, he was not."

"So that's what this is." Pansy curled a fist, wanting to punch him, only she noticed that other people had started to do the double-takes; the little is that really her? look that Dr Draco's Wife had given her the previous day. "You want to antagonize me over an old blood feud or something? I have no control over what my father did to yours."

"I am simply not in the mood to be antagonized, Miss Parkinson," said Percy blandly. "Sign the papers. Sell the house if you want, I don't care. Just put this behind you and move on."

He had the file in his hand.

She looked at it, looked at his face, at those blue eyes, and shut down.

Then she walked out of the store and got back on the bike, peeling out of the parking lot before checking to see if he had followed.
"You really shouldn't be haranguing her like that," said one of his mother's friends, who—just his luck—happened to be in the store in time to see Pansy walk out. "It's tragic what happened. Not everyone handles death well."

"Evidently some people do not handle it at all," remarked Percy, tucking the file back into his bag for the second time that day. "How wonderful that she can be so privileged."

He didn't bother waiting for a response, instead deciding to walk back to his office. He had already spent two hours on this; he wouldn't allow any further time to be wasted. He had other clients, countless responsibilities. At least twelve emails from the planning commission were currently waiting to be answered. His stomach growled, and at the last second he bought a packaged salad and a cup of coffee, making his way up the stairs to his office.

He would have to pick up his car eventually. Unfortunate. He pinched the bridge of his nose, resigning himself to calling his brother.

"Ron. Sorry to bother you. Can I get a lift from my office, please?"

"A lift? Why? Where?"

"I left my car somewhere. At a client's house."

"What?"

"Ronald, please," Percy exhaled at a mutter. "I do not enjoy asking you for favors."

"Alright, Jesus, no need to shit your pants, Perce. I'm off tonight anyway. Be there in five."

More like ten minutes, as Ron never got anywhere in five. Percy stood outside anyway, waiting a mostly-inoffensive fifteen, and then stepped into Ron's car without a word.

"Where to?" said Ron.

Percy gave him the address.

"Hang on, isn't that—"

"Just drive, please," said Percy, leaning his head back against the seat and closing his eyes, exhaling.

"Well, you're in a lovely mood," Ron remarked, pulling back into the street with a hasty glance over his shoulder.

"Signal, Ron, aren't you a policeman?"

"Perce, can you kindly shut up? Thanks."

They drove in silence the rest of the way, Ron pulling up beside Percy's Prius.

"Hey," he said, "everything okay? Like, really."

Ron was obviously trying to be friendly, which was a rarity. They tended to avoid each other, not out of active dislike, but as a result of having nothing to discuss. They had once attended some sort of football match together when no one else was available at Ron's disposal; both had sorely regretted it, refusing to speak of it afterwards.
"I'm fine," said Percy, opening the passenger door and stepping out of it. "It's been a long day."

The garage was closed. Percy contemplated simply getting into his car and driving off, but the light in the living room was on.

He sighed, heading for the front door, and knocked twice.

He waited thirty seconds, meticulously counting, and was about to turn away when the door finally opened, revealing Pansy in the frame. She was no longer in the blazer or the jeans. She had showered, her hair was wet, her skin was dewy and smelling like jasmine. She wore a cropped t-shirt, braless. Her torso was long, her navel winking up at him above the line of her leggings. The house smelled like garlic and jalapenos, so presumably she had managed to get groceries after all.

"The office is closed," she said, an obvious mockery of him. "I don't work after hours."

"I didn't mean to upset you," he told her. "You were testing my patience. I reacted badly."

She frowned at him, eyes narrowing for a moment.

"Understood," she said. "And you're right. I was being difficult."

He waited for an apology, given that she had abandoned him in a grocery store and therefore derailed the majority of his afternoon, but when it appeared he wouldn't get one, he nodded his head and turned away.

"Hey," she called after him. "Hungry?"

Inconveniently, his stomach rumbled. He had worked late to make up for missing two hours and had eaten nothing but the packaged salad.

He turned towards her.

"I made too much," she offered in apparent explanation.

He nodded. "Cooking for one can be difficult."

"Right." She stepped to the side, gesturing him inside. "Oh," she added as an afterthought, pausing him just before he stepped over the threshold, "but I'm not signing anything. And if you mention my father, you're gone."

He turned his head, glancing down at her. The hand she'd used to stop him rested on his stomach, safely above his belt and below his chest.

"Fine," he said.

She released him and he walked inside.

They had been eating in silence for nearly fifteen entire minutes when he wiped his mouth with a napkin, asking impassively, "Why did you want to be on that jury?"

She paused, setting her fork beside her plate in irritation.
"I'm not asking about your father," he pointed out.

"I obviously should have been more specific," she muttered.

"Yes, but you weren't, and legally speaking you should clarify the terms of a contract before offer and acceptance."

He seemed to be teasing her. Not cruelly. Just... conversationally.

"L.A. is a zoo right now," she said. "Everyone made a big deal of the trial."

"Partially due to you," he commented.

She glanced up sharply, but again, he didn't seem to be speaking maliciously.

"Yes," she confirmed, her reply carefully crisp and expressionless. "I guess people made a big deal of my involvement."

She thought that would be the end of it, but of course it wasn't.

"For what it's worth, I'd have liked to see you on that jury," Percy remarked. "But I knew the defense would never allow it. A young woman in the music industry? You must have seen versions of Bagman a thousand times over. What is he, a producer?"

She picked up her fork. "Yes."

"Amazing how some people think they're untouchable." He gently stabbed a piece of broccolini and raised it to his mouth.

Pansy, meanwhile, simply stared at her dinner, suddenly losing her appetite.

"I've seen lots of versions of him," she said. "But not because I'm famous. Not because I'm a singer."

Percy paused his chewing. After a moment, he swallowed carefully.

"My father wasn't a good guy," Pansy said. "I know that. I can see why you don't have a lot of sympathy for me. I can see why you don't miss him, why you think it doesn't matter to me that he's gone. But when I was—"

She broke off.

Percy set his fork down, saying nothing.

"You probably don't know this about me but I was in the high school wind ensemble," Pansy said, the words suddenly pouring out of her uninvited. "I was first chair, actually. Flute and piccolo. Tried it out in fifth grade and fell in love with music. Happened to be good at it, too."

"You're right," Percy said, "I didn't know that."

He was looking at her attentively, but not forcefully. He was listening, but he wasn't pressuring her to go on.

"The band teacher in high school, I don't know if you remember him—"

"Karkaroff."
"Yeah, him." She cleared her throat. "He... Well, it doesn't matter. Nothing happened," she said quickly. "I mean, nothing like... nothing like the trial. Nothing like Bagman. But I tried to tell another teacher and they didn't do anything. I tried to tell them but they didn't listen, said it was in my head or told me to stop wearing... I don't know. The point is I quit," she said flatly. "I just came home one day and told my dad I quit. He yelled at me, said he'd wasted money buying all the stuff I needed, my flute and all that. I just took it. He wouldn't stop pestering me about it, said if I didn't like hard work then I wouldn't like life. But I guess eventually he remembered that I didn't mind practicing; I used to do it every day. He used to yell at me to stop, actually. 'That's enough, it's been an hour, shut up,' that kind of thing. He and my mom were always either yelling at each other or at me."

She swallowed thickly, pushing the stir-fry around on her plate.

"But then I quit band and stopped practicing and I stopped talking and started sleeping all the time and my dad finally pieced together that something was wrong. So one day he comes home, throws my flute at me, says he took care of it and that I better not forget whose daughter I was ever again. Scared me shitless." Pause. "The next day I went to school and found out Karkaroff was in the hospital. Punctured lung. Broken ribs. Broken leg. Someone," she said, "had put the fear of God in him, and he never taught again."

She rose to her feet, suddenly desperate for motion. "Wine?"

Percy nodded. "Sure."

"Red or white?"

"Whatever you'd like."

She slid into the kitchen, poured them both a glass, and returned, setting his beside his plate.

"Thank you."

"You're welcome."

She resumed occupancy of her chair, taking a seat.

"Ludo Bagman," she said eventually, "did far worse to those women than anyone's ever done to me. But if he doesn't get a guilty verdict—"

She stopped.

Told another sip of wine.

"After I got dismissed from the Bagman trial I had this shitty, paralyzing thought: I want my dad." She cleared her throat, fiddling with the stem of her wine glass. "I just wanted my dad to fix it, but then I realized he can't. He'll never fix anything for me ever again. Which I've known for an entire year," she admitted, "and presumably you think I don't care about him, and that that's why I haven't come home or something. And yeah, you're half-right, sometimes I hate him, I'll admit that. But then I miss him. And the truth is I couldn't do it, couldn't face all those things. Not all at once," she said.

She took another sip. Percy raised his glass, taking one as well.

"For what it's worth, the evidence against Bagman is astounding," he commented, pointedly not mentioning her father. She had a feeling that because he had already promised not to, he wouldn't, even if Pansy had broken her own rule. "I heard there were over a hundred witnesses."

"Yeah, I know."

"Evidence of harrowing complicity in the industry, certainly, but at least it's evidence."

"I know."

"And I know I can't promise anything about the trial. I wouldn't," Percy corrected himself. "I know the justice system has failed before. Will fail again, inevitably." He took another sip, and Pansy stared at her glass. "But I will say that the damage to Bagman's reputation has been considerable. That won't be easily undone."

"Yes," Pansy said restlessly, "but doesn't it seem unfair that men like him can take our passion, the things we love—they can take our lives and our bodies and our self-respect like it's something they're owed—and all we can take in return are their reputations?"

Silence.

"Forget the trial," Pansy muttered bitterly. "I wish I could break his ribs."

When she looked up, Percy was… smiling.

"Your sense of reprisal is sensational," he said. "Compelling."

She rolled her eyes, lifting her glass to her lips.

"And to think you tried to swear that you could be impartial," Percy murmured, amused.

"I could be impartial," Pansy insisted. "But if the facts are there, what am I supposed to do? Seems pretty straightforward to me."

She shrugged, and Percy's smile broadened.

She had the distinct feeling he was laughing, albeit quietly. Soundlessly.

"I'm assuming you never mentioned anything about Karkaroff in your Vogue interview," he said, and Pansy shook her head. No, admitting her father had nearly killed a man wasn't exactly something she wanted people to know about. She certainly didn't need to incite public speculation as to anyone her father had actually killed.

"Did you continue in band after the, ah," Percy began, and determined, "Warning shots from your father?"

"Yes." She nodded. "And then I moved to L.A. as soon as I graduated. I worked as a waitress, then a bartender, til I got my shot. I recorded demos, YouTube videos, you name it. Performed on the Santa Monica Promenade for a bit. I did everything I could to get close to people in the industry," she added drily, "which was… not always innocent."

"But you've never told anyone about Karkaroff?"

She shook her head. "He didn't shape me. I could have died in this town, I could have been nothing, but I wasn't, and he doesn't deserve credit for what I turned out to be." She took another sip of wine, adding, "I refuse to let him be part of my origin story."

"I see." He picked up his fork, puncturing a mushroom. "I think you're right," he commented after a moment's contemplation. "Your story is much more interesting without him."

They didn't speak further, opting to continue eating in silence. Privately, though she knew she would never admit it, she felt she owed him something; for unsettling the knot in her chest, which had been enough to prevent her from eating only moments ago. It felt like a weight had been lifted.

Eventually Percy rose to his feet, attempting to clear the table, but Pansy stopped him. "I've got it, don't worry about it."

"You sure?"

"Yeah."

He walked over to his bag, picking it up, and then paused. He looked down for a moment like he might open it.

Pansy, meanwhile, sidled purposefully up to him, pausing him with a cautionary glance. "Don't even think about it," she warned.

She thought she saw half a smile, or possibly something even smaller. He leaned towards her, a little sway as if he might whisper a joke in her ear, or brush his lips against her cheek.

"You'll have to sign them eventually, Miss Parkinson."

She forced herself not to shudder at the proximity of his voice. He'd said it so quietly that if there had been anyone else in the room, they wouldn't have heard it. Only she could, suffering it like a vibration in her chest.

"Make me," she said, letting out a breath.

His eyes slid over her face, down to her lips and back up.

"Have a nice evening," he said, and then turned away, opening the door and disappearing through it.

She spent the next day bracing for something. She watched the clock hit nine, ten, eleven. She looked at her phone constantly but opened none of the messages, ignored the calls. She itched with unknown agitation, like a muscle cramp. Her eyes had opened with a flutter, her chest tight, like she'd been dreaming something wonderful and had reason to believe it would continue upon waking. When she woke up, though, she couldn't remember what it was.

She got on her father's motorcycle and rode to Daphne's salon.

"Oh, wow," said Daphne, looking up at Pansy's entry. "I really didn't think you'd still be here."

"Yeah, neither did I," Pansy sighed, falling into the salon chair. "Got time for a walk-in?"

"Sure," Daphne said, stepping behind the chair and toying with Pansy's long hair. "I had a cancellation anyway."

"Rude," said Pansy.

"Nah," countered Daphne, shrugging. "I'll just charge you extra."

Pansy made a face at her in the mirror. Daphne smiled broadly.
"So," Daphne said. "Are we going to talk about how you skipped your dad's funeral? Or are we just going to catch up on a decade of gossip," she amended on second thought, teasing. "Any new crushes to speak of?"

Oof. The irony.

"Very funny," said Pansy.

Fortunately Daphne was already distracted. "Are we doing a trim, or are we just chopping the whole thing off?"

"Chop it," said Pansy, and Daphne's hands stilled.

"What? Pans, I was kidding—"

"Cut it," Pansy said, meeting her eye in the mirror. "Lobs are in now, right?"

"But—"

"Daph," said Pansy firmly. "If anyone's going to cut my hair off, it should be you. You used to hold it back for me all the time in high school." She settled herself in the chair, reaching for a magazine. "You can sell it on Ebay, I won't be mad."

"Pans, honestly." Daphne smiled faintly. "I mean, you know I've always said you'd look great with short hair—"

"Yes, I know."

"—but that's a big change, and your hair's so healthy—"

"I'm not getting bangs, woman, just cut it," said Pansy. "If I miss my long hair, I'll get extensions. Or a wig."

Daphne rolled her eyes. "Alright, fine. Sure you don't want to dye it purple while you're here?"

"Why, do you think that'd look good?"

"Okay, seriously. What's going on with you?" sighed Daphne.

"Nothing." Pansy shrugged while Daphne reached for an elastic band, gathering Pansy's hair into a ponytail. "Though, just curious," she ventured, watching as Daphne engaged some sort of hair wizardry via eye-balling, "do you know anything about Percy Weasley?"

"Mm, no, not really," Daphne absently replied, wrapping a hand around Pansy's ponytail. "He's on the planning commission, if you're interested in having something rezoned."

"Ah," said Pansy with an inward roll of her eyes, "Thanks. Helpful."

"No problem." Daphne rumbled around for scissors, pulling a clean pair out of a drawer. "Has he been giving you shit or something?"

"Yeah, he's my dad's estate lawyer."

"Oh, yeah, makes sense." Daphne paused, smoothing her hands over Pansy's ponytail, and said, "Hey, I know we don't really talk anymore, and I get it if you don't want to. But are you, like… okay?"
They locked eyes in the mirror, and it occurred to Pansy that she'd really done herself a disservice not staying in touch with Daphne after she left. She supposed Daphne had run away, too, and she'd never thought to ask what happened after that.

"Yeah, I'm good," said Pansy. "Thanks for asking."

In answer, Daphne cut off part of Pansy’s ponytail and let it fall to the floor.

"Don't panic," she said, but Pansy didn't plan on it.

There was something reassuring about letting it all go.

Percy had no intention to contact her. There would have been something inhumane about it, in his view. He was primarily her father's attorney, and even in death there was a sense of responsibility to his client. That he may have felt something by virtue of standing so close to her rendered it an inopportune time to demand that she sign, read, or waive anything, and given everything she'd said to him at dinner, he doubted she would want to be around him unless his interest in her was purely clinical, fiduciary. In order for that to be the case, he would need a day or so to catch his breath.

That being said, he braced himself nearly every hour at the sound of a motorcycle revving on the street outside. He was forced to pause mid-thought each time, reminding himself silently that this was Death Eater country—not every motorcycle had an attractive brunette on it; realistically, 99% of them did not—and continuing to work. At around three in the afternoon, though, the blistering sound of an engine was followed by the echo of footsteps from the stairwell, then the door opening, then the door closing, and then the blur from his periphery that meant someone was standing expectantly in the threshold, paused between his waiting room and his office.

"Busy?" she asked, and he looked up.

She'd cut her hair short. It skated her clavicle now, making her look both tough and sleek. She was wearing black skinny jeans, heeled black ankle boots, that same oversized leather jacket, wine-colored lipstick. Terrifying and traumatically, upsettingly beautiful. Like she'd scare his mother half to death.

He glanced askance at the file with her name on it, then flicked his gaze back to her.

"No," she said.

"No?"

"No," she confirmed. "Not now."

"You came to my office to tell me that? An interesting method of refusal."

She walked inside, shutting the office door behind her.

"It occurred to me that a decent person might have said something to me after last night," she said. "But then," she reconciled offhandedly, tongue slipping out between her lips, "I remembered you're a lawyer."

He closed out of the contract he had on the screen and pulled up the mediation he was currently drafting between two downtown business owners. "Very original," he said. Not caustically, though he could have. Jokes at the expense of lawyers and thieves were a dime a dozen without him wasting any hostility on the subject.
"I told you some really personal things," Pansy reminded him flatly. "I think it would be to my detriment if I didn't ask you to sign a non-disclosure agreement."

He looked up, arching a brow. "You think I'll go running off to the tabloids to tell them about your perjurious attempt at jury infiltration?"

She pulled out the chair across from his desk, lowering herself into it.

"I'd like to prevent it," she said. "If at all possible."

She seemed completely serious. He wondered if it was haunting her now that she had been so honest with him the night before. For a woman who'd made her career trafficking as a poet with an ear for hooks, she seemed to dislike sensitivity. He had a feeling it was unwelcome in her past life.
No Death Eater would ever stand for knowing someone had something to hold over them—least of all someone like him having something like that on someone like her.

As if she could read his thoughts, Pansy shrugged her father's leather cut from her shoulders, letting it fall around her waist where she sat in the chair.

"Tell you what," Percy said, leaning back to steeple his fingers against his mouth. "I'll sign an NDA if you go through your father's estate paperwork with me."

"No," she said. "I won't sign them at all without an NDA."

"And who's going to draft it? Me?"

"No. I have a standard copy."

"For record producers? People in the industry?"

"Them," she confirmed. "But also people I hire. People I give interviews to." She didn't blink before adding, "People I sleep with."

"And I fall into…?"

"You're your own category."

"How special for me," Percy murmured.

She gave him a thin, derisive smile.

"I came back here due to extenuating circumstances," she reminded him. "I could argue that you took advantage of that. My emotional distress."

"You could have had a career as a lawyer yourself, Miss Parkinson." She was a natural shark, and he'd seen a lot of them in law school. They were mostly litigators and defense attorneys now, though if he'd moved somewhere more prominent he might have come up against some of them in notable contract negotiations.

"One lawyer in the room is more than enough," she said.

Percy tapped his fingers on the desk, considering it.

"Do you have the NDA on hand?"

"I have an electronic copy. I can AirDrop it to you now."
"Do that," he advised.

She pulled out her phone and, as promised, the little bubbling sound of impending acceptance emanated from his computer speakers. He hit download, then print.

"One moment," he said.

He rose to his feet, stepping out of his office to the industrial printer that had been his one real investment aside from the office and the law degree itself. The contract was obviously standard; drawn up by a large Los Angeles-based firm. Everything, Percy judged with a glance, was on the up and up. Clearly she had gone through this song and dance before.

When he returned to his office she was standing beside the file cabinets that sat in an orderly line behind his desk, eyeing the nothing that occupied his walls.

"You don't have any personal items in here," she observed without turning around. Beneath the leather jacket was a thin, loose tank top. He could see the motion of her shoulders underneath it as she tested one of the drawers, attempting to pull it open. It was locked.

"Not even a stress ball," she said.

Percy approached his desk, setting the contract atop his keyboard. "What were you expecting? Wedding photos? Baby pictures? Sentimental tchotchkes?"

"Maybe." She turned to give him a hawkish, accusing glance. "Do you not have any of those?"

"No," he said. "I find sentiment largely wasteful."

"Charming," she said bitingly.

Her eyes flicked to the contract, then back to him.

Then she reached for a pen, bending over his desk to reach her portion of the agreement. She shuffled to the last page and wrote her name in print, then signed it. She scribbled in the date without asking him what day it was, which was… an oddly respectable thing.

"So she does know how to sign a contract," Percy mused aloud.

She held the pen out to him, wordless.

"This," he commented, "seems a very strange punishment. Perhaps I was giving you space?"

"This isn't punishment."

"Isn't it?" he countered, accepting the pen from her.

His fingers brushed hers; briefly, pointedly. She didn't shy away from the contact, nor even blink. She merely looked up at him, expectant.

"For what it's worth," he said, "I think it suits you."

"What does?"

"All of it. The hair," he said. "The litigiousness. The vengeance. The 'fuck-yous' and the 'motherfuckers' you're constantly saying or implying. The bike." He gestured out the window to where she must have parked it outside his office. "The explicit terror of being seen."
"You don't know me," she said accusingly.

"No, I don't. But you want me to," he said, and for once, she faltered. "That's why you told me all of that last night, and why you're punishing me now. Because I fucked up. Is that it?"

"I'm not punishing you."

"Right, yes, of course." He set the pen on the desk and took a step towards her, watching her breath catch in her chest. She didn't retreat, which he thought was vastly to her credit. He paused there, too-close, glancing down at her. "What do you really want from me?"

"Sign it." She pointed to the desk behind him without dropping her gaze from his. "The contract. Sign it."

"Ah, but getting people to sign things is so difficult these days," he lamented, pointedly referencing the file marked with her father's name. "The price for acquiescence is steep. The market value on legally binding signatures seems to only be increasing."

"You want me to acquiesce," she said with a scoff, "really?"

"Would you rather I ask you to beg?"

She blinked.

He, admittedly, wasn't entirely sure he meant it.

"If you're calling my bluff, Weasley, then call it," she said. "See if I back down."

Unless he was very much mistaken, her pulse had raced exquisitely.

He took another step and she matched it, retreating. Another. Another.

He secured her back against his file cabinets and paused, loosening his tie.

"Perhaps it's me you underestimate," he said.

He slid the tie from his collar, pulling it free. She watched his mouth, his throat. She made no secret of it, which was profound and inspiring and nearly enough to make him stop, because there was no way he was going to be able to do all the things he'd like to. There would be something troubling about it, problematic. Yesterday she had exposed her inner fractures to him, and there was something wrong about the fact that it was him—the man who was forcing her to confront one more, to peel back another glimpse of malformation each time they saw each other. She was showing him all her ugly pieces and it was only making her more beautiful to him, more desirable, drawing his attention to the subtle pebbling of her skin. She had walked into his office blemishless, synthetic perfection. The irony of his attraction now made him deferential and idly sick.

He reached behind her, finding one wrist, and slid his tie around it. When she said nothing, he reached for the other, looping it around the handle of the drawer behind her. She didn't move, didn't breathe, didn't protest. He slid it around a few more times, leaning forward to reach behind her back, tying a blindly constructed sailor's knot. Her lips brushed his throat, evidence of their parting left behind in spectral traces of warmth against his neck.
When he was finished he stayed there, still leaned against her, her hands bound behind the small of her back and her teeth gently scraping his jaw. She bit lightly at his chin, tilting her head up for his, and he closed his eyes a moment before looking down.

She knew what she was capable of when he met her eye. She knew what she could do from this position, hands or no hands. He took one look at her and thought, Fuck.

"Well?" she said. Taunting him.

His mouth twitched, accommodating the briefest flicker of a smile.

Then he drew his attention downward and flicked open the button of her jeans.

Her breath caught and he slid the zipper down, slowly. He stroked the black lace of her underwear and glanced up at her. "For me?"

"For me," she corrected him, her voice dry. "But you can see them."

He gave a curt, deferential nod. "If you'd like."

He eased his hands under the waistband of her jeans, marveling at the way they fit her while he peeled them away from her hips. He slid the material carefully over her backside, stroking his thumbs along bare skin, and then tugged them down to the midpoint of her thighs.

"Lovely," he said, stroking the lace of her thong. His thumb dragged down her clitoris, experimental. He fit his palm between her legs, incautiously doting. "Expensive?"

"Very." He could feel her keening against him, the slightest roll of her hips to encourage him. "Planning to stop there?"

"Not quite."

He dropped to one knee, gesturing with a hand, and she blinked with confusion before gingerly adjusting her footing, setting one boot in his waiting palm. He balanced her foot on his thigh and unzipped the side of one shoe to remove it, tossing it away, before beckoning for the other. She switched feet, struggling a little without her hands for balance, and he slid away the left boot, pausing to pair them meticulously beside each other, returning his attention to her jeans.

He tugged them gently from the cuffs, fastidiously unrolling each leg from her calf. By the time they pooled at her ankles he tapped the side of her right knee, inviting her again to lift her foot. She did, and he slid them away, followed by a tap to her left knee. Then he folded them neatly and draped them over the side of his chair, returning to stand at a distance of a foot from her, perhaps less.

She didn't drop her eyes from his when he nudged her heels apart, gently widening her stance. His hand found her clit again lazily, stroking without purpose.

"What exactly is your plan?" she asked him, only slightly panting.

"If I'm going to sign an NDA, I'm going to earn it."

"That's not how this works."

He paused his hand, tilting his head to watch her stifle a whimper in frustration.

"Tell me how this works, then," he said.
She glared at him. He opted to reach forward, smoothing the neckline of her gratuitously revealing tank top to observe the matching black bra, peeling back the lace. The stroke of a nipple left it hardened in the wake of his touch, a little bud of expectancy. He lowered his head and sucked it lightly, brushing it with his thumb when he pulled away.

Unless he was very much mistaken, she shivered viscerally. "Fuck me."

"Is that a request or a command?" he asked.

"This is not a negotiation."

"I wouldn't know," he said. "You don't technically negotiate with me."

"Come here." Her hips canted forward, brushing his. "Touch me."

"Please," he mouthed.

She scowled.

He smiled.

"Fine." She swallowed, then gritted out, "Please," sharpening the single word into a violent, insidious barb.

"Well, since you asked so nicely," he said.

He lowered to his knees again, smoothing his hands along her waist until they paused at her hips, framing them between his palms. He leaned forward and slid his lips along the outside of her underwear, breath intermingling with the lace. She exhaled, stepping towards him, and he eased her legs apart, sliding the material away.

"Pretty," he said.

"What is?"

"Your pussy," he said, and glanced up. "Or do you prefer cunt?"

He could see she'd had to stifle a moan.

"I'd prefer you stop talking," she panted.

He shrugged. "Suit yourself."

In fairness she glistened, jewel-toned and lush, and he was not remotely opposed to being a bit more expeditious with his progress. He slid his tongue against the slit of her cunt and listened to her ragged exhale, absorbing it like Beethoven, straddling the line of genius and madness and whatever lay between. He parted her thighs more gruffly, fitting his jaw between the curves of them, and she ground her hips against his mouth, gasping.

His office phone rang and he stopped, pulling away.

"Don't you dare," she snarled, tugging at the drawer handle in frustration.

He smiled politely, rose to his feet, and walked to his desk.

"Percy Weasley's office," he said into the phone.

"Percy Weasley's office," he said into the phone.
Pansy gave him a look like she would strangle him with her bare hands.

"Percy, it's Mom," said Molly's voice. "Have you talked to Ronald? He's not answering his phone and I don't know if he and Padma are both coming or not because if that's the case I'm going to have to make more bean dip—"

"Mmhmm," said Percy, still eyeing the pop star who was currently tied to his file cabinet.

"—and anyway you know this is important, Charlie's hardly ever home and I've had enough on my plate trying to wrangle Fred and George as it is. They've swapped phones again I think, which I keep telling them is totally unprofessional but of course your father thinks it's positively hysterical —"

"Of course," said Percy, holding up a finger to Pansy for pause. She gave him an exquisite look of impending homicide.

"—speaking of your father, his back's acting up again, would you mind doing a few things around the house? If you could bring the bins in that would be wonderful, I'm just so busy in the kitchen I don't know if I'll get around to it and the neighbors actually complain, if you can believe that—"

"Not a problem," said Percy. He stretched the cord on his phone and stepped towards Pansy, reaching between her legs to slide a finger inside her, then another. She made a little sound of desperation, eagerly accommodating him while he fit his hand to the shape of her, thumb idly stroking her clit. "Anything else?"

"You're not bringing anyone, are you? I mean of course you aren't, but I just thought I'd ask, I didn't know Charlie was dating someone and I feel so uninformed, I mean is it really so much to ask that I be told who's coming around to the house? Not that I mind of course, the more the merrier and who knows if Ginny will come or not, she seems to have totally lost the ability to communicate—"

Pansy's lips parted, close to release, and he stopped, not wanting to be distracted when it happened.

"So sorry, I'm actually with a client right now," said Percy. "I'll talk to you soon."

"Oh right, yes of course, though did you hear from—"

He slammed the phone down and dropped to his knees again, maneuvering Pansy's leg hastily over his shoulder. She gasped, delirious with relief, while he dove his fingers into her, his mouth circling, darting, sucking, all restraint gone from the room with the exception of her wrists. When her legs shook, the cabinet behind her jerking slightly from her effort to stay upright, Percy looked up and watched her face wrench in perfect torment; agonizing, excruciating closeness.

He felt her clench around his fingers and watched her come, shoulders exhaustedly going limp after the tremors had left her body in waves.

"You asshole," she gritted through her teeth, breathing hard.

Percy rose to his feet without a word, reaching for her jeans. He repeated the same process of undressing her in reverse, gesturing for one foot, then the other, carefully drawing them up her legs and then fastening them around her waist. Then her shoes.

Then he paused, and she glared at him. "Untie me."

"Sign your father's papers," he said.
"Am I supposed to do that with my hands tied?"

"No. You're supposed to do it this evening, at—" He paused, turning to his desk, and scribbled on a post-it, folding it up and slipping it into her front pocket. "This address. Seven o'clock, and don't be late."

She glared at him. "You can't be serious."

"Deadly, I'm afraid. As for this," he said, reaching over to pluck the non-disclosure agreement from his desk, "I'm going to need a few hours to look over it. Standard procedure, you understand."

"You're serious." She was gaping at him now. "Are you going to leave me here?"

"Well, yes and no," he said. He leaned closer, skating his lips beside her cheek as he loosened the knot of his tie from her wrists. "This will only take a few more seconds to get out of, I think. Do you need me to tell you how to lock the office up behind you?"

He turned his head to glance at her furious face, his nose brushing the lobe of her ear.

"No," he murmured, "you're a smart girl. You'll be fine."

He gave her hips a light smack and gathered the rest of the papers from his desk, shoving them into his bag and striding out of his office without another glance. Either she'd make him pay for that, or…

Or nothing, he thought, satisfied, as he followed the familiar path to the stairwell, out to the sidewalk, her bike gleaming in the fading sun outside.

There was no chance she'd let him off the hook.

________________________

She wasn't exactly proud of the fact that the first thing she'd done when she'd freed her hands from his filing cabinet was to immediately dive her hands into her pants and relieve the renewed tension there herself, viciously shoving her fingers against the pulsing ache remaining. She came again, unprettily, holding her breath and sputtering out a gasp, and then contemplated whether or not it was worth it to murder him.

Or, as Theo had once suggested, to simply break his kneecaps.

Jesus, but his face. His hands. His mouth. The utter fucking carnality of him. The shamelessness of it all, of leaving her there, waltzing out without even expecting a hand on him in return. He hadn't even kissed her.

She shuddered at the thought of it, his mouth pressed to hers.

Jesus.

She went home and showered. She went for a run, then showered again. She came in the shower, then air-dried and went to lie on fresh sheets in her teenage bedroom, still naked. She'd lusted after supermodels before, musicians, actors, CEOs and industry professionals, and now she was contemplating trying to Prime Now a vibrator all because of a stuffy, unsettling small-town lawyer. He wasn't even the kind with money.

He was on the goddamn planning commission, for fuck's sake.

Her mind was filled with malevolence and barbarism. She was overcome with something; not the bile that had initially brought her here to seek out her father, her former life, her sense of control, but... something else.

Vulgarity. While he was going down on her she'd wanted to tug at the roots of his hair, to destroy him a little. Instead he'd taken a sip of her and walked away, perfectly sated.

She sat upright and shook herself.

This was unacceptable. She had come here to get away from the circus in L.A., to remember her roots, whose daughter she was—to recall that she was Pansy goddamn Parkinson, who did not and would not take no for an answer, ever. She had told her assistant a day or two, three tops. There was no purpose to this—to this agonizing over him, or whatever she was doing. Yes, she'd made a mistake telling him the truth about what brought her here, but that could be remedied. She could get the NDA signed, close the book on her father's death, and then be done with Diagon forever. It was what she'd wanted all those years ago, staring at this exact ceiling and wishing something miraculous would take her away.

All she had to do was leave. She'd done it once. She could do it again, and with finality this time. She and Daphne could email or FaceTime and everything else could stay buried; stay in her veins—in her blood and in her past—and that's it.

Fine. Fuck it. Fine.

She plucked out a pair of jeans, a white oversized button down. Business, or something like it. The tips of her newly cropped hair sliced at her collarbone and she reveled in it.

Time to go, Pans, her reflection said. You're too much for this place to hold.

Then she rifled the little scribble of an address out of her jeans and got on her father's bike, heading for wherever Percy Weasley was waiting.

By the time it was 7:38 he was fairly sure she wasn't coming, and secretly, he thought that was best. It was a risky game, whatever this was, and it was probably to his benefit if she refused to play it. He could always fax the papers to her. If she disappeared and never spoke to him again, so be it.

Then the doorbell rang.

"PERCE, CAN YOU GET THAT?" shouted his mother over the raucous sound of his twin brothers telling some story about a poltergeist. He hadn't been listening; his involvement in the conversation typically invited mockery of some kind, so it was easiest to simply stay silent. He might have taken any interruption whether it was her or not.

So he rose to his feet without protest, pulling open the front door.

She seemed to know immediately by the sounds emanating from the dining room that she'd been tricked, though to her credit she didn't immediately make a scene.

"What is this?"

The question was tight-lipped and exacting; the manifestation of don't waste my time.

"It's game night," Percy said, and she shuddered.
"Game night?"

"Yes."

"What, like Monopoly?"

"Yes, and life-sized Jenga."

"I hate games." She looked repulsed.

"PERCE, WHO IS IT?" yelled Molly.

"I also hate games," said Percy, pointedly not answering his mother.

"I thought we were signing papers."

"We are. Eventually."

She scowled at him.

"This is my nightmare," she said vitriolically.

"Mine too."

"Is your whole family here?"

"Most of them."

"Jesus." She looked like she was going to be sick. "No. Absolutely not."

"Okay," he agreed, "then get on your bike. Go home."

"I want this taken care of tonight."

"Okay, then stay."

She seemed to know she'd been outmaneuvered.

"You. Fucking. Asshole," she ground through her teeth.

"PERCY! IS IT THE MAIL? YOUR FATHER'S BEEN WAITING ALL DAY FOR A PACKAGE!"

"Shall I tell her you're here?" he prompted.

He hadn't really expected her to stay. He'd mostly thought she'd show up and be pissed and leave and he'd have the upper hand still, which was the only thing that felt safe at the moment. His proximity to her was beginning to unnerve him. He was starting to want things from her, and pushing her to her limits seemed to be the only plausible cure. Hate me more, push me away so there's distance, something like that. That seemed to be the gist of it.

But before either of them could say anything, Ron had materialized in the entryway, sidling up to Percy from the hall.

"Oi, Mom's asking—"

He broke off, staring. "Parkinson?"
Pansy rolled her eyes and shoved her helmet into Percy's chest. "Put that somewhere," she said, dismissive.

Percy shrugged, waving her inside, and moved to set the helmet on the entry table when Ron gave his arm a tug, keeping him back.

"Excuse me, an explanation, please?" Ron demanded in an ineffectual whisper. "When you left your car at that house I thought you said it was a—"

"Client," Percy confirmed. "A client. She is. I need her to sign something and she's being difficult."

"Oh, well, color me fuckin' shocked about that," grumbled Ron, but gratifyingly, he didn't push the issue. "Mom's going to completely lose her mind."

Secretly, Percy was counting on it. He hadn't noticed how little choice he'd had in the matter of his life until after Pansy Parkinson had walked into it. A seismic shock to Molly Weasley's system felt like exactly the thing he needed, or possibly just wanted. Maybe that was a little unnecessarily vengeful, which Pansy unquestionably was, and which Percy had never been.

Then again, maybe it wasn't worth continuing to be anything that Percy had ever been. Not if whatever came next would be better.

Everyone had folded. A pile of quarters sat in the middle of the table for the taking.

"So? What do you have?" grumbled one of the twins Pansy vaguely remembered from high school. Unsurprisingly, their paths hadn't crossed much. She doubted they would cross again after he (they) had taken such catastrophic losses tonight.

"I don't have shit," said Pansy, laying down her handful of worthless cards and picking up her can of White Claw for emphasis. "Suck it."

There was a groan around the table as Pansy collected her prize, having successfully bluffed her way into the entire table's contents.

"You're banned," said Ron immediately, who seemed to suck slightly less than he had in high school. Whether that had to do with Pansy being famous now or him having forgotten most of what they'd been through after a decade of time away was irrelevant. "You can't come back here. We're putting your picture on the wall at the precinct. You're a thief."

"Thank you," said Pansy coolly, glancing at Percy. He was sitting beside her without much comment, a faintly amused expression on his face. He was one of the first to fold, purely out of disinterest. Unlike the others, he had no stake in the game.

He hadn't been very good at Pictionary. He was a disaster at the celebrity game. The only game he was good at, allegedly, was Trivial Pursuit—which is why, according to his siblings, they now refused to play it. He had also been too good at Scrabble, they said, which was why they had thrown it out ages ago.

They mocked his scribbled drawings and his inefficient charades and in response he hardly batted an eye. They shouted over him frequently. His mother fussed over his brothers—his sister, thankfully, wasn't there—and seemed to keep forgetting where he was, tripping over him like the errant corner of a bed frame. She had fawned over Pansy, of course, going so far as to blindly ignore the Death Eater logo on her father's cut, and Pansy saw the copies of People and US
Weekly that meant Molly Weasley had some form of celebphilia, which probably explained why Percy had known what had or hadn't been mentioned in Pansy's Vogue interview. There were pictures of the Weasley children all over the house, dominated by the oldest and the youngest. Wedding photos, baby pictures, vacation photos, all filled to the brim with freckles and red hair. Sentimental tchotchkes.

The only picture of Percy that Pansy could find was the one from his law school graduation. Percy was only half-smiling, caught off guard, while Arthur smiled broadly at the camera, beaming.

She didn't know why she was still there, truthfully. She'd already texted her assistant to book her a flight back to Los Angeles tomorrow afternoon and it was arranged, handled, done. This, game night or whatever, was a waste of time—particularly if it wasn't going to end with her getting her contract signed—but every time she thought about leaving, she knew that Percy wouldn't stop her, and it hurt a little. Stung.

Right about now, though, she finally realized something.

"You really do hate this," she murmured, and he looked up.

"Hm?"

He probably wasn't used to people observing him in this atmosphere, much less noticing him. She sighed, rising to her feet. "Alright gang, I gotta go," she announced, as the others offered muted groans of not particularly caring whether she stayed or went. "Percy, you needed me to look over something, right?"

He blinked up at her, but thankfully wasn't a complete idiot. "Yes. Right."

"Okay, great. Sorry to steal him away," she offered facetiously, half-dragging him out of his chair by his collar, "just want to get this taken care of—"

"Your winnings," said Padma, Ron's whatever-she-was, and Pansy glanced over her shoulder at the pile of quarters, fighting the urge to laugh. She'd made that much off of album sales in the last five minutes, probably.

"Keep it," she said. "I've got everything I need."

She turned and walked out, Percy following in her wake.

"You're in a hurry," he observed neutrally.

"Yeah, well, you looked miserable," she muttered, picking up her helmet from the entry table and pulling open the door. "You coming?"

He arched a brow, pausing. "Where?"

"Wherever the fuck isn't here," she said, waving a hand outside.

He shrugged.

"Alright," he said.

He only faltered one more time, turning in the direction of his car before stopping again, noticing that Pansy had walked to her bike. "Are we…?"

"Get on, Weasley." She handed her helmet to him, and he shook his head.
"You have it. You're worth more," he slid onto the seat behind her, securing his arms around her waist. "Just don't kill me," he said in her ear.

She put the helmet on, giving him a glance like I don't know, we'll see how I feel.

"Fair enough," he said.

She didn't take the corners so tightly this time. She kept to the speed limit. Percy's arms around her waist tightened at times, evidence of apprehension he obviously didn't want to confess aloud.

"Hold on," she shouted over her shoulder, not because she was going to do anything dangerous, but because she suspected he needed to hear that it was okay to do it if he wanted to. If he was scared, she wouldn't judge him.

He circled his arms around her ribs and curved his entire chest around her back, snugly.

She wasn't totally aware where she was going until after she pulled into the Leaky Cauldron.

"No offense," she said over her shoulder, "but your mom's food isn't exactly edible."

"None taken," he said, dismounting first and holding out a hand for her.

It was a quiet night, even by Diagon standards. She slid into a booth on the left and he lowered himself into the opposite side. The menu hadn't changed.

"Umm, Greek salad, please? And a glass of wine. Any white will be fine."

She glanced up at Percy, who nodded. "I'll have a glass of whatever she's having, thanks."

The waitress, whom Pansy distantly remembered from high school but dismissed after a second's consideration, turned away, and Pansy directed her attention back to Percy.

"Got the NDA with you?"

"Yes." He reached for his bag and her hand shot out, pausing him.

"Look, it's fine," she said. "Just… don't tell anyone what I told you, okay?"

He looked up, locking eyes with her, and nodded.

"Okay," he said.

Their glasses of wine arrived. Nothing special.

"So listen," Percy said eventually, after they had each taken sips. "About your father—"

"Just tell me what to sign and I'll sign it," Pansy said, suddenly resigned. "I've got McLaggen putting the house on the market. Anything that comes from that can be used to settle his debts, and I can handle most of that remotely."

"Ah, excellent. Very practical." Percy dug the file out of his bag, sliding it across the table to her.

"Ready?"

She glanced at it.

"You get it," she said uncertainly, "right? Why I couldn't…"
She trailed off.

"Yes," he said. "Finality can be excruciating."

She wondered what made him sound so assured of that.

He opened the file and slid a pen towards her. "Do you want to discuss anything?"

"Honestly, you've made it clear plenty of times. I read all your emails, I just—"

She stopped.

He folded his hands in his lap.

"If there's anything I can do to help," he said. He left the remainder of the sentence to linger between them, and she shook her head.

"No, I'll just… get it over with."

She plucked the pen from the table where he'd placed it, signing everywhere he'd indicated. He had been meticulous about it, and each time she found a new place to sign, he paused her, explaining what the form was. He had broken down her father's financials, the taxes and bills to be paid, everything that needed to be taken care of. He had taken care of her, generally, and it wasn't like she wasn't accustomed to being taken care of—she was a commodity, after all, with someone hired to handle every song she wrote and every outfit she wore—but there was something different about the way he did it. The way he listened when she spoke. His exorbitant patience.

She signed the final papers and listened to his final explanations and sat back numbly, realizing it was over. That her father was dead and buried and she had no reason to come back here now; no house she'd grown up in to hide when L.A. got too overwhelming. The weight was lifted, but freedom was its own strange sensation. A discomfiting tingling in her veins.

Her salad arrived.

"Wow," she said, pushing the papers back to him. So it had only taken five minutes, maybe ten at most. "That was some brutal procrastination on my part."

"Yes," he agreed, sliding the file back into his bag. "I'll get you copies of these in the morning."

"You can just shoot them over to my assistant," she said, before wincing. "I mean, not that… I just, you know, he handles all the logistics and paperwork and—"

"I understand."

Percy looked away, raising his glass to his lips and contemplating something out the window.

"What will you do next?" he asked her.

"Well, I'm going home tomorrow." She cleared her throat, waiting to see if he would react. He didn't. "Evidently," she continued, "I can't hire the Death Eaters as contract killers anymore, so I guess I'll just watch the Bagman trial from afar like everyone else."

"You're friends with one of the victims, aren't you?" he said. She'd been joking, but he wasn't. "The reason you were removed the jury?"

"Yes." She sipped her wine.
"I'm happy to offer legal counsel," said Percy. "I assume anyone involved has their own team of lawyers, but if you or anyone you know is ever in a bind—"

"Do you like it?" She looked up at him.

He turned to look at her. "Like what?"

"This. Your job."

"It has advantages and disadvantages, like any profession," he said.

"Oh wow, you hate it," she observed drily, plucking an olive with her fork.

"The work, no. The job, sometimes." He absently stroked the stem of his glass with the pad of a finger. "I confess to having bigger dreams. Or to having had them, at one point."

Finality, she realized in retrospect. So he had resigned himself to this.

"I'm leaving tomorrow," she said again, and he nodded. "What happened today in your office…" She trailed off, clearing her throat. "It could happen again, if you wanted. One more time."

"Are you propositioning me? I don't have a lawyer present." His smile quirked when he raised his glass to his lips, and she sighed.

"Look, I'm just saying we can fuck if you want," she said. "No strings. No contracts. No talk of dead fathers or shitty Hollywood producers. We can just have a night together and walk away."

"Tempting," he said.

He didn't elaborate, and she wondered if maybe she had insulted him. She pushed the salad around on her plate, suddenly no longer hungry.

"I hope you get it," she said, abandoning the effort and turning her attention to her wine instead. "That I wouldn't stay here. Even if..." Another pause. "Even if I had a reason. There's nothing in the world that could keep me here."

He fixed her with a purposeful glance. "No. Nor should there be."

"I built this life. I wanted a few days away and I got them, but I love what I built. And not just because I built it. I really do love it. Even the bad stuff."

He nodded. "As you should."

"This place is where I came from. It's not who I am. This," she added, with a lingering glance at her father's leather jacket. "It's not what I am."

She expected another nod, a brittle of course not. He was not very reactionary, and she could see why. His siblings must have poked and prodded for reactions all his life and he had learned to give them nothing.

But instead he rose to his feet, removing a few crisp bills from his wallet and tossing them on the table.

"Let's go," he said.

"What?" She stared at him, bemused. "But—"
"If you're hungry again later I'll cook for you. Let's go."

"Weasley, I'm—"

He palmed her helmet from where it sat in the booth, offering it to her, and then held out his hand expectantly for hers.

"Come on."

She had the sudden, gripping terror that she would follow him anywhere and hoped to god he didn't ask that from her, because she wasn't totally sure she could prevent herself from saying yes.

"Yeah, alright," she said, shoving aside the salad and snatching the helmet from him. "Give me that," she said, "I'm driving."

They didn't make it very far beyond her front door. Almost immediately he was pressing her against the wall and stripping her of her father's jacket simultaneously, pushing and pulling all at once. She tugged at his practical navy chinos, stroking her palm over his cock, and dug her thumbs into the bones of his hips. He tossed her aloft and carried her into the near-empty living room, setting her down at the edge of the couch.

She slid her hands under his sweater and he obliged her, pulling it one-handed over his head and tossing it aside. She looked at him and fucking ached, still not fully recovered from her afternoon spent at his mercy.

"Is that honestly what you look like?" left her mouth in a groan.

"I exercise," he muttered in reply, leaning over to kiss her neck. She pushed him away to pull her shirt over her head and he shifted to sit on the couch, beckoning her towards him. He sat her on his lap, his thighs straddling hers, the same way they'd been on her father's motorcycle.

Hers, she corrected herself internally. It was hers now.

Percy slid her arms up, reaching them behind his head and running his palms reverently over her body, molding his hands to the shape of her. One of them slid under her jeans and the other curled under her jaw, cupping it with one hand to lift her chin while he kissed her. She sighed quietly, girlishly, and he stroked her below her jeans.

"What am I allowed to say?" he asked in her ear.

She turned in his arms, straddling him on the couch.

"Say you want me," she said, lowering herself onto his lap.

"I want you."

She rewarded him with a long kiss, greedy and taxing. The shorn edges of her hair slid around them, her hands possessive around his jaw.

"Say you like the way I taste."

"I do."

"Say it."
He turned her face with one hand, sliding his tongue along her throat. "I like the way you taste," he said quietly, and she shuddered, her hips shifting rhythmically above his.

She got reckless, carried away. "Say if things were different you'd want me for yourself," she whispered.

He tugged at the roots of her hair with one hand, gruffly, and shifted to flip her onto her back. He slid one of her legs over his hip, positioning himself between her thighs.

"I want you for myself," he said.

She froze, staring at him, and he stared back.

"That's not what I told you to say."

"It's not what you wanted."

"Don't tell me what I want," she snapped. She wanted to push him away but couldn't quite manage it, instead resting one hand on his sternum.

He shook his head.

"You said if things were different," he said. "But they don't have to be different for that to be true."

"I told you, I'm not staying—"

"I'm not asking you to stay."

She was breathing hard, her hands still braced on his chest. "Then what are you saying?"

"I'm saying I've seen what my life looks like without you in it and there's not a lot there."

She held her breath, waiting.

"And listen, this isn't me saying you've got to be saddled with me if that's not what you want. If you want one night and that's it, then that's what you're getting. I've got no problem with that. But if even a piece of you wants more," he said, and then stopped.

He rested his forehead against hers, raggedly exhaling.

She bit her lip, closing her eyes. Silence pulsed between them, delicate.

"Fuck, I want you," he growled, suddenly coming to life again in her arms. "Pansy, just tell me—"

"Fuck me. Please."

It was a manic shuffle of clothes, limbs, the parting of her legs and the feeling of him filling her, and the sound of his groan in her ear, repression finally unleashed. The ache she had for him was almost vestigial, atavistic, like something she'd been missing for generations, for hundreds of thousands of years. Just sex, she told herself, just great fucking sex, but she clung to him and he made a legless, mindless mess of her, the two of them actively desecrating the living room she'd grown up in. She'd fucked boys in this house only to dismiss the memory of them like ghosts, fading to non-existence by comparison. Suddenly she wanted him in her bed in L.A., on holiday in Bali. She wanted to fuck him with his hand over her mouth while hiking somewhere in Muir Woods or in the bathroom of a club after performing. She wanted to fuck him on her birthday, on his birthday, whenever the hell that was. She wanted to take a call with her agent or her manager.
while slowly lowering herself onto his cock, both of them trying not to breathe too heavily into the phone.

If even a piece of you wants more—

"I want you," she said, her whole body wrung out and tense, muscles tight and sweat glistening on the skin between them. "I want you, I want you, I—"

Then, with a rupture of anguish, Pansy shattered and soared.

In the morning he woke alone in her twin bed, still naked. He sat up, glancing around slowly, and realized he had never asked what time her flight was. The clock beside the bed read 6:45 a.m., but she'd said she was a morning person. Who knew what that even meant in Los Angeles terms.

He slid his legs out from the sheets, resting both feet on the floor and preparing to rise when she suddenly appeared in the doorway.

"Coffee?"

The amount of relief he felt at the sight of her was devastating. It meant the next time she was gone—really and truly gone—it would hurt twice over. The loss would worsen tenfold before it ever started to fade.

"Sure." He slid over on the bed and she perched beside him atop the covers, handing him a cup. She was wearing a pair of underwear, a bralette. He remembered the feel of her under his tongue and thought he would become a morning person if it meant he could make use of this hour, or however many hours remained between now and her flight.

"Come with me," she said, coffee untouched.

He hoped he'd imagined it. Not that he'd ever had much of an imagination, but the thing in his chest had to be hope if it was real, and he thought he'd safely gotten rid of that a long time ago.

"You don't have to like, move there," she said quickly. "But... you know. Come for a trip or something. Stay the weekend, and if you want to keep staying, then stay. We could keep things quiet for a bit, see if it works for us. Honestly, if I didn't have to go back today I wouldn't, but I've got a meeting with a really talented songwriter tomorrow and I—"

"A weekend sounds good." He sipped his coffee, letting its warmth radiate comfortably through his palm. "Want me to give you a few days? You can have your meeting without any distractions. I can always fly out to meet you next Friday."

She blinked, turning to look at him. "Really?"

Maybe she hadn't believed him when he said he wanted her. It wasn't that long a flight to try and tell her again.

"I haven't taken a vacation in about fifteen years," he said. "Plus I hear the tacos are good."

"They are," she said, turning to him with awe.

He wasn't sure what to say at that point, but then she suddenly removed the coffee from his hand and set it aside. She threw herself into him with such force that they were immediately tangled up again, wrapped up in each other's limbs like they'd been all night.
"I've got a feeling I want to see what you do next," Percy murmured in her ear, toying with the tips of her dark hair, and her resulting exhalation, the release of a lifetime's worth of apprehension, escaped into his shoulder. "Plus, given your sense of vengeance, I suspect it's inevitable that you'll need a lawyer at some point."

"Shut up." She kissed him brutally, ruthlessly. "It's in my blood."

He knew it was. He knew her type. She, like the father who raised her, was chaos unrelenting. She would need a ride or die, a never-blink kind of man. Someone unafraid and lawless.

Somehow he suspected he'd always been that brave without being given much of a chance to prove it. If this was his fate, he welcomed it.

"Guess I'll see you soon, then," he murmured to her cheek.

She rolled over him, securing him between her thighs like the motor of her Harley.

"My flight doesn't leave until three," she said, sliding pointedly out of her bralette.

Chapter End Notes

Thanks for joining me here on my birthday! If you'd like to continue my personal celebration, THE ATLAS SIX will be available on my website and tumblr as of January 31. Thank you very much for reading, and to those of you who voted for the nottpott over this pairing, I think it likely you will see that quite soon. Perhaps Valentine's Day?
Intimacy Issues

Pairing: Dramione (Draco Malfoy x Hermione Granger)

Universe: post-war, EWE

Rating: M for sexual language

Summary: A little dramione fluff for Valentine's Day.

For whatever it was worth—and it was worth quite a lot, in his mind—this had not been his idea. First it had been something Theo said about needing to improve his communication and also something about his general intemperance. War's over, for fuck's sake Malfoy get your shit together, that sort of thing. "Your intimacy problems are a real drain on available resources," etc. etc., and from there, a languid half-intoxicated laugh as Blaise had suggested, "There are people you can call for that, you know."

Blaise had practically dialed the phone for Draco himself. Or, at least, that was how Draco would choose to recall the events from here forward.

His fingers shook only slightly as he placed the call, settling himself on the center of his bed. He hadn't been entirely sure how to go about any of this, but had decided to leave his clothes on. That way, if he were caught somehow—By whom? Unclear. Aurors?—he'd be able to protest that it was all a big misunderstanding. There was less guilt involved with his clothes on, and anyway, if it was terrible and he hung up the phone right away while still fully dressed, then it would be like it never happened.

He fidgeted for a moment, then drank the full glass of Ogden's beside the bed before pouring himself another. He glanced down at his trousers, sighing internally.

Right then. Off they went.

He pinned the phone between his right shoulder and right ear, plucking the whisky glass up from the nightstand with his left hand. He'd have to set one of these things down at some point, he realized with a frown, and drank another half of the glass's contents. It had been some time since he'd been in any position remotely close to this one, having been touched by a grand total of nobody, himself included. He doubted it would last particularly long, if it were to go anywhere at all.

One ring, two rings—

"Lady Revel's House of Fortune, Athena speaking," said a female voice. "What shall I call you, fair stranger?"

Draco swallowed tightly, clearing his throat. "Oh. Am I supposed to, uh…?"

"Choose a name? Yes, fair sir, it's your choice. It will be more pleasurable for you to have one, and more convenient for me as well."

"Right. Okay. Ah." He cleared his throat, fumbling aloud, "Did you say you're Athena?"

"Yes, I'm Athena."

"Right, okay, then I'll be..." He racked his brain for whatever he could draw from his shallow well of mythology. "Apollo."

"Apollo." Her voice was silken and rich and faintly familiar. "Excellent. And what might you be looking for this evening, Apollo?"

"I was, um. I was hoping for... Well—"

He broke off, hesitant and thoroughly horrified with himself, and the female voice on the other end gave a low chuckle of amusement.

"Am I to understand that you would like me to make you come, Apollo?"

He winced, left hand clutching tighter around his glass. "Well—"

"Apollo, life allows for two essential choices. Pleasure or pain. Joy or sorrow, having or wanting. You've already shown up here, haven't you? So do what pleases you," she advised him, and again, Draco had the oddest feeling she reminded him of something, like a glimmer from his past. "I'm here to please you, Apollo," she murmured. "All you have to do is say yes."

"I... hang on." He inhaled, exhaled, and drained the remainder of his glass, setting it down on the nightstand. "Alright," he said. "Yes."

"Excellent. Do you have any particular fantasies, Apollo?"

"Oh, ah. Well." He closed his eyes, right hand foisting open his zipper. "I... is there something you, um. That most people—?"

"Every fantasy is unique. But if you need a place to start, I'm happy to make some suggestions. Some people prefer to imagine a dark corner somewhere, a beautiful stranger. Some people prefer an island setting, forbidden lust..." A pause. "Perhaps you might like to imagine we're in the restricted section of a library after hours," she suggested. "You've come to meet me, but nobody can know."

"Yes." He nearly sighed with relief, shifting lower on the bed and folding a hand experimentally around his half-hard cock. "Yes, that."

"The lights are burning low and the castle is quiet—you jump at every sound. You keep glancing over your shoulder, worried we'll get caught. Your friends won't approve—no one will. But there's something between us, something burning, and neither of us can stand it any longer. You want to see for yourself the way my nipples become little pearls of anticipation when you speak to me. You want to slide your hand under my skirt to see how wet I am after your eyes have met mine across the room."

Draco closed his eyes, relaxing into a slow stroking pattern. "Yes," he exhaled, and the voice on the other end made a sound of acquiescence.

"Now that we're here alone together, I can finally tell you all the secret thoughts I've had. The way I want to run my tongue along your thick, hard cock. How badly I want to sit across your thighs, with your hands so tight around my waist they bruise me. Do you want me to beg for you?"

"Oh, um. Sorry, but I want, er… gentler?" Draco said, wincing a little with his eyes closed. "It's just —I'm not—"

"Ah, I see, okay." Athena's voice softened. "We're both nervous," she said, her voice nearly tender this time. "Your hands shake when you reach for me, but you can see on my face how badly we both want this. You draw my legs apart and I gasp, so loudly you think someone will hear me. So you place a hand across my lips and I kiss your palm, which is your first indication that I want this as badly as you do."

Draco made a low sound that he would have been heartily embarrassed by under any other circumstances, his grip tightening around his cock.

"Apollo, I didn't think you'd come." Her voice sounded young now, girlish, as if she were filling the role she'd described. "I've been waiting for hours, just sitting here thinking of you."

"What were you thinking about?" Draco asked raggedly.

"Being in your arms," she whispered. "Your hands running along my body. Your lips on my neck. I've been thinking about meeting you here alone for such a long time."

"How long?" Suddenly he wished he'd removed his trousers. The excess fabric was difficult to wrangle as his grip on himself grew more urgent.

"For weeks. Months. Every night before I go to bed, I lie in the moonlight and think of your tongue stroking over my breasts. I know it's wrong, Apollo, but I can't help it. When you're near me I can't breathe, waiting to see if you'll come closer. Even your smell drives me wild."

He groaned a little. "And now that we're alone?"

"Tell me what you want, Apollo."

"I—" He frowned. "Well, I'm—"

She seemed to take his hesitation for what it was—either confusion or lack of imagination, or a little of both—and helpfully, she decided for him. "Should I take off my skirt? My blouse?"

"Yes. Wait—no." He shook his head. "Um, take off your knickers. Leave the skirt on."

"I slip my knickers off from under my skirt and tuck them into your trouser pocket. For later."

Draco shuddered. An excellent detail. "Yes."

"Do you want to touch me?"

This he could manage without hesitating. "Yes."

"You're parting my legs now, stroking your fingers up my thighs, and I'm pulling your head to my breasts. You slide your tongue slowly around my nipple and I gasp, my knees buckling a little. You pressing me against the bookcase is the only thing keeping me upright—I can hardly breathe for having you so close to me."

"Mm," said Draco, quickening his pace again. "Now touch me. Please," he added hastily.

"No need to beg." He could hear her smiling, and briefly, a familiar image passed through his head.
of autumn leaves, chocolates and sweets, Hogsmeade visits. "I'm fumbling with your trousers, anxious and apprehensive but unable to stop myself. I want you so badly my fingers shake, and then I slide my palm below the band of your pants."

He frowned a little, suffering that faint brush of familiarity again. A niggling sensation, just out of reach.

"You and I both falter, realizing we're holding our breaths. I curl my hand around your cock and oh god, you're so hard." She gasped a little, theatrical and feminine, and Draco's breath grew rapidly unsteady, the pulse in his mind matching the throb of his erection.

"Your cock is so thick and long, Apollo, I want you inside me, but I can't have you like this. Is this wrong?"

"No, it's not wrong," he mumbled, only half-aware he was speaking.

"You push my legs apart and feel me, how wet I am for you. You press against me and I'm keening for you, pleading without words." Almost there, he thought. Things were mounting with embarrassing quickness. "I'm nervous and desperate. I want to be able to say no but I can't, I'll die if I can't have you. I'm panting in your arms—oh god, yes." He moaned into the phone, nearly bursting. "Your hands are driving me mad but still, we could get expelled for this—"

"Granger?" he blurted without thinking, before suddenly spilling into his own palm, choking.

There was silence on the other end.

"That'll be ten galleons," said Hermione Granger.

Needless to say, this had not been Hermione's first choice of post-war employment. Unfortunately, being a war hero was not as lucrative a position as it seemed, and politics in the wake of the wizarding war was a bit of a mess. The Ministry's starting pay wasn't enough to live on in London, which certainly gave her a new respect for Arthur Weasley's ability to keep his family fed—as far as Hermione could tell, wages had seen no increase since the first Voldemort war, much less the second. She no longer had any real assets, muggle or magical, having used most of what she'd saved on hers and Harry's little camping trip hunting horcruxes, and she needed something that could pay for her pricy Diagon flat—the first thing she'd found after moving out of Grimmauld Place. That, of course, was a thing also she hadn't been able to afford to do, necessarily, but much to her financial chagrin, breaking up with Ron had sort of necessitated it.

She'd been told a few times throughout her schooling that she had a nice voice. When she found an ad in the Daily Prophet calling for a part-time voiceover artist, she thought it seemed like something she could reasonably fit into her daily work schedule. When she discovered the hours were primarily used at night, she was relieved. When she discovered the pay, she was delighted. As for the work…

Well. It hadn't come naturally, but she was a quick study. She had always been highly clever for her age. One of her primary talents—and the reason she was one of Lady Revel's top earners—was that Hermione had a knack for discovering what each of her callers really wanted, and very rarely was it sex. More often it was some obscure loneliness or intimacy issues, or they just wanted a proper hug from their dads. Whatever it was that made men want to call into sex hotlines and pay money for someone to talk to, it served Hermione fantastically well, and though she never mentioned to anyone what it was she did every night while her colleagues and friends all went out for a pint, she didn't exactly regret doing it.
At least, not until, "Granger?"

She was silent for a moment, of course, because she hadn't recognized his voice until he said her name, but now, obviously, she did. How deeply regrettable.

"That'll be ten galleons," she managed eventually. "There's an enchantment enacted at the beginning of the call, so the deposit will be automatic. Thank you for your time this evening, and we at Lady Revel's House of Fortune wish you pleasant dreams."

"Wait, Granger, hang on—"

She hung up the phone, frowning to herself.

Well. That was interesting.

She supposed it made sense on second thought, or perhaps third. Draco Malfoy was still unfairly wealthy following the outcome of the war and furthermore, he was almost certainly the type to pay for sex. Phone sex was an odd choice. Though, before she had known who he was, she had read him (correctly, given his reaction) as the type of man whose fantasies were less about any sexual desire than they were about desire itself—being wanted rather than being touched.

She shook herself of the oddity, then returned her attention to the phone. There would be other callers tonight, and gradually she would forget about him.

Maybe.

Probably.

Surely if she tried hard enough, then yes.

The phone rang once, then twice, and she picked it up, raising it to her ear. "Lady Revel's House of Fortune, Athena speaking," Hermione said. "What shall I call you, fair stranger?"

He waited two nights before calling again.

"Lady Revel's House of Fortune, Delilah speaking," said a different voice, this one raspy and secretive. "What shall I call you, fair stranger?"

"Actually, um. Is Athena there?" he asked, toying with the ice in his glass before setting it down on the nightstand. He sat at the edge of his bed this time, jittery and confused as to what exactly he was doing. Even more confused than he had been the first time.

"Yes she is, fair sir. One moment."

There was a pause as a bit of music played, transferring from one line to another. Draco chewed the skin around his thumbnail for a moment before reaching for his glass, attempting to drain it. The ice took a dive towards his nose, scotch spilling out from the sides of his lips as he choked on the excess liquid.

"Lady Revel's House of Fortune, Athena speaking," said Hermione Granger's voice, followed by, "Sorry, are you alright?"

"Yes, yes I'm here, just—" Draco turned away from the phone receiver, coughing until his eyes watered, and then returned to the phone. "Wrong pipe," he managed, before remembering this wasn't about his own idiocy, but hers. "And what exactly are you doing, Granger?"
There was a pause.

"What shall I call you, fair stranger?"

"Are you saying you don't know who I am?" demanded Draco, before realizing that maybe she didn't. Surely if she had, she wouldn't have continued through the fantasy either.

"What shall I call you?" she asked again, militantly scripted.

"Right, sorry, um. It's Apollo," he said, not wanting to make matters worse. For whatever reason, he'd been positively dying of curiosity since he spoke to her two nights ago, and he was now fairly certain she wouldn't speak to him at all if he used his real name.

There was another beat of silence.

"Apollo," she echoed. "What might you be looking for this evening?"

"An answer, mostly," he said. "I thought that was clear."

"If you'd like an orgasm, Apollo, I'm happy to arrange it. Otherwise, thank you for your time this ev-"

"No, no, wait," he said hastily, glancing down at the whisky he'd spilled on his shirt before forcing himself to say, "I'd like to come, please."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, I…” He trailed off. "Yes."

"It would be my pleasure, Apollo." Whether she recognized him or not, her voice hadn't lost its buttery quality. "How would you like your ecstasy this evening?"

"Look, I'm not judging you, obviously," said Draco. "It's just a bit odd, isn't it?"

"Do you have an affinity for touch?"

"I—doesn't everyone? But look, Granger—"

"Athena," she corrected, "and I'm currently lying on a massage table, slathered in oil."

Draco froze, his hand tightening briefly around his glass. "What?"

"You're running your hands along my spine and watching the shape of my ribs expanding. You can't be sure, but you think I've keened a little at the presence of your fingers. You run your hands over my arse and arrive at my thighs, finding yourself curious what would happen if you stroked your finger along the lips of my pussy."

Draco, holding his breath, exhaled. "You don't have t-"

"You finally gather the courage and I inhale sharply, surprised, but I don't move. Feeling emboldened, you slide a finger inside me and I moan, shockingly eager. This leads you to realize you're so hard you're throbbing."

Draco glanced down at his cock, which was indeed much harder than he'd anticipated.

"You come around the table to stand beside my head and I gaze up at you, questioning. Slowly, and without a word, you slide down the zipper of your trousers, and without speaking I sit upright, teasing the tips of my fingers along the edge of your shaft."

Fuck, Draco thought. Then, grudgingly, he unzipped his trousers, diving one hand into his pants.

"Oh god," Hermione breathed, "you're so hard, so smooth. I want you in my mouth."

Draco swore quietly under his breath. "Take me in your mouth, then."

"I want to, Apollo, but first I run my tongue below your shaft, curling around the tip." She paused as Draco exhaled raggedly. "I'm stroking you with my tongue repeatedly, until you're not sure you can continue to stand. After a few minutes of this, when you're about to groan with frustration, I take all of you into my mouth, sucking you hard from base to tip."

He wanted very badly not to picture her face specifically while imagining this, but it was inevitable that he would. Her overlarge eyes, that massive cloud of hair. Looking up at him with her lips on his cock.

"You're so hard," Hermione breathed over the phone.

It was all he could do not to come on the spot.

She wasn't especially proud of the fact that she'd brought Draco Malfoy to orgasm over the phone for the second time, but then again, he clearly knew it was her. He'd let her do it anyway, so maybe his shame was technically greater.

It wasn't even that he'd simply let her do it. He'd paid her to do it, twice now, and 'fool me twice' was one thing, but fool me three times—

"It's Apollo," he said after the third ring. "Don't hang up."

She considered doing it anyway.

Then, thinking better of it, she said, "I've raised my rates."

"Have you?"

"It'll be twenty galleons for your pleasure tonight, Apollo."

"And if I just want to talk to you?"

"Thank you for calling Lady Revel's House of Fortune," she said conclusively, forcing a spirited tone to her voice. "Have a delicious evening—"

"Fine, fine. Okay." He exhaled, and she heard the rustle of clothing, or bedsheets. "But this time I want to talk."

"You're paying twenty galleons just to talk to me?"

"No, I mean—" He stopped. "You talk, but I want to talk, too. I want to be part of it."

"Roleplay?"

"Uh, sure." He cleared his throat. "I don't actually know any of the, um. You know—"
"Kinks?"

"I mean… Salazar's balls," he muttered to himself, "yeah, fine. Sure." There was a little tinkle of ice in a glass, followed by, "I don't know what the fuck I'm doing."

"I'm here to guide you," she told him carefully.

"Yeah, right, I get that, but seriously, I don't know," he said. "I just… don't."

She waited a moment before answering.

"It's my job to know for you," she assured him. "You are allowed to take pleasure in it, if that's what you want."

"I don't know what I want. That's why I'm here." Another sound of ice in a glass, followed by a swallow. "I'm not good at any of this, honestly, but I want to try."

"Okay. Well," Hermione said, "why don't you pick a scenario, then?"

"Oh. Um." He sounded agitated. "A picnic."

"A picnic?" Part of her wanted to laugh. "So we're outside," she said. "The sun is… high?"

"Yes, that sounds good."

"The sun is high," she confirmed. "It's hot. Sweltering. You watch me take a bite of a strawberry, the juices spilling over my lips."

"There's the smell of fresh grass," he suddenly cut in, and she blinked, unprepared for his contribution. Granted, he'd said he wanted to, but still. She hadn't entirely believed him. "Your eyes and mine catch for a little too long. Just a beat."

"The third time they do this, you can see the blush in my cheeks," she said. "The strap of my dress falls from my shoulder and I don't bother to fix it."

"The sweat on your skin is intoxicating," he said. "I fantasize about running my tongue along the side of your neck and before I can stop myself, I do it."

"I turn my head," Hermione said, hoping he wouldn't hear the way her skin had pebbled just slightly, "and you catch my lips in a breathless kiss. Both of us are taken by surprise and yet we're completely expectant, as if some part of us has always known this would happen."

"I part your lips with my tongue and you sigh into my mouth." Another muffled sound, as if he were lying back on his bed. "I peel back the bodice of your dress and cup your breast in my hand, stroking it."

"I gasp and pull you closer, pressing myself against you. Your hands are feverish on my bodice, fumbling with my skirt—"

"I slide my hand along your thigh—"

"—I groan and dig my hands into your hair—"

"—your knickers are soaked with desire and sweat," he said. "I tug at your hips, laying you down across the blanket, desperate to put my mouth on you—"
"When your tongue slides across the slit of my dripping cunt, I whisper your name," she said, and he stopped.

"Say it," he said, and she flinched. They had just been getting into the flow of things, and just when she'd stopped thinking...

"Apollo," she said, channeling the sound into a breathy moan.

"No. Say my real name. I know you know it," he said in a lower voice, almost pleading. "Say it."

Part of her knew that admitting it out loud would mean the end.

"You start slowly at first," she said instead, ignoring him. "Tentative. But I'm desperate for you, canting my hips. I can't bear another moment without you inside me."

He said nothing.

"I try to pull at your trousers, oblivious to whether we might get caught, but you stay out of reach. You slide a finger into me with your mouth sucking me, licking, watching my legs tremble around your head. Just when I'm crying out for you—"

"I stop," he said, and Hermione blinked. "I sit up, look you in the eye, and say I'm going to watch your face while you come, and then I keep stroking you with my fingers. I run my thumb along your clitoris, diving inside you, touching that spot that makes your back arch. You want to look away but I won't let you. I keep my eyes on yours."

She grimaced, unsure what to do next. "You make me come—"

"Twice," he corrected. "I make you come twice before I let you touch me."

"I take off your shirt—"

"—and I let you run your hands over my chest. Slowly."

Hermione swallowed, her throat suddenly quite dry. "Your skin is soft and smooth," she said. "The muscle underneath it is hard and firm, and your cock—"

"Is throbbing for you," he said. "Touch it."

She squirmed a little, glancing around.

"Oh," she exhaled into the phone.

He was quiet for a moment.

"I can't tell if it's more fucked up or less that we're doing this with each other," he said. "In some ways it's fitting. In other ways it's totally perverted."

Her mood soured. "Well, if that's all—"

"I just mean that it's not as if I haven't had these fantasies before," he said hastily. "And it's a bit strange to be doing this now, that's all."

"You're the one who called."

"Yes, I know."
"If you want to get your twenty galleons' worth, I should probably continue," she added.

"I already came," he said. "Before I called."

She blinked.

"Sorry, I clearly spoiled the mood," he said. "Is it alright if I call again tomorrow?"

She considered it. "It'll be another twenty."

"That's fine."

"Alright," she said. "Then thank you for your time this evening, Apollo, and we at Lady Revel's House of Fortune wish you pleasant dreams."

She hung up the phone and excused herself, then walked directly to the toilets. She shut the door behind her and slid one hand into her knickers, relieving herself of her sudden, inexhaustible ache.

Theo and Blaise had mild curiosities as to what he was up to every night recently, though not enough to really press the issue. Which was good, as Draco wasn't sure what he would have told them anyway. He was reserving each evening to get off on the phone with a girl he hadn't seen in close to three years, not to mention one he hated. Or had hated, once.

There was no logical explanation for why he continued calling. He supposed the only thing he could say was that it was a relief, somehow, to hear her voice. It bore some semblance of a foregone normality, even if the only topic they could conceivably discuss was sex.

"I have these nightmares," he said. "I wake up and I'm back in the past, like the end of the war was just a dream I had and reality is the nightmare."

"Your cock tastes so good," she said in reply. He took it as encouragement.

"Do you ever feel how alone you are? Like, really feel it. To the point where you're surprised other people can't see it. It's like you're wearing this horrifically tasteless cloak or something and everyone else is politely pretending not to notice."

She was quiet for a moment before saying, "Would you like to hear how wet I am?"

He considered it. "Yes."

"I'm so wet you could see it. My knickers are soaked through."

He inhaled sharply. At this point he no longer bothered touching himself. He got off to the thought of making the call and then simply spoke to her with his eyes closed.

"I'd like to see them," he said softly.

"Where are we?" she prompted.

"Uh," he began, and cleared his throat. "Your office?"

"Alright. I'm sitting at my desk and you come closer."

"Yeah," he said. "That sounds good."
"I ask you to shut the door. Then I part my legs just slightly, just enough so you can see my knickers below the desk."

"I crawl under it to look closer," he said, eyes still closed.

"I let you," she said.

For a moment it felt very real—that the two of them were together in one room and he was actually on his knees for her, begging for her permission. His cock ached in his trousers, but he ignored it.

"You're beautiful," he said.

She said nothing.

"Your pussy, I mean," he said quickly. "Like velvet."

"Use your mouth," she suggested.

He smiled with his eyes closed.

"You taste so sweet," he murmured, and wondered if he could have ever said that to her face.

Or if she'd even let him try.

She was starting to wonder if she were in dire need of some sort of counseling, as this was clearly not a normal thing to do. It seemed the purpose of their calls was less and less for sex, and she was starting to feel morally obligated to put it to a stop.

Unfortunately, it was also very enjoyable. Even without considering her sudden increase in earnings, he was the best client she had ever had. He was highly inventive, which suited her, so long as he wasn't trying to push her boundaries.

"Can you do me a favor?" he said. "Ask me why I call you."

This was one such example of pushing, though it wasn't a clear violation. She doubted knowing the answer would improve her feelings on the matter, but she did as he suggested.

"Why do you call me?"

"Because I want to feel something," he said. "I think initially I wanted to feel anything, literally anything, but now I think it's only you. I specifically want whatever feeling you give me."

She cleared her throat, prepared to drag them back to the subject at hand. "You undo the ties of my bathrobe—"

"—and set you on the edge of the sink." A pause. "Tell me how you want me to fuck you."

"Apollo," Hermione warned carefully, "this isn't about me."

"Well, tonight I want it to be about you," he said, suddenly restless. "I want to get off on whatever it is you want."

This was troubling, right? Hogwarts had no courses on psychology, but she was fairly certain this was unhealthy, or maybe it had always been unhealthy, from the moment they recognized each other's voices on the phone and failed to hang up.

"I want the opposite of what you want. To feel nothing," she said.

This time, he was quiet.

"I can fuck you like that," he offered eventually. "Until you forget everything. I can fuck you slow and deep until you can't think of anything else but how badly you want to come."

She shivered a little, glancing around again.

"I think I could lose myself inside you," he said.

She forced herself to think of something from one of her scripts. Something that was sexual but not intimate. He was always forcing her off-book, which was as frustrating as it was enjoyable. Like a new, unsolved puzzle each time.

"Your cock is so hard," she whispered.

"Only for you," he said. "Just for you."

Yeah, she thought, this was definitely very fucked up.

He had an evening ritual now. He got in the shower, got off to the thought of her voice, and then air-dried before lying on his bed fully naked. Typically he'd pour himself a glass of Ogden's—without ice, ever since the previous debacle—or occasionally some sherry. He'd drink it while he spoke to her, staring down at himself and imagining her with him. Beneath him. Astride him.

"Tonight you're fucking me with a view of the sea," she said. "You've faced me towards the window while you thrust into me from behind, harder and harder."

"Oh god, Granger, yes," he exhaled, curling his hands into his duvet. Something about her fantasies always made him feel the need to hold on tight.

Unfortunately he hadn't meant to say her name aloud, and he registered at her pause that her silence meant she hadn't enjoyed it.

"Athena," she reminded him tightly.

His eyes fluttered open.

"I know who you are," he said. "You know I'm not calling for some nameless fantasy."

She was quiet for several moments.

"Then what are you paying for?" she asked blandly.

He hung up, furious. He stalked around the room for a second before remembering he was starkly nude and somewhat cold.

Then, instantly remorseful, he called again.

"Lady Revel's House of F-"

"Athena," he said. "It's Draco."
He felt nearly positive he could hear her moment of hesitation over the phone.
"I'm sorry," he said. "I'm so sorry."
"For what?"
"For… I don't know. Everything." He fell onto the bed, cradling his head in his hands. This, he thought, was almost certainly a new low, which he hadn't even known he could conceivably reach after having been through so many of them. "It just… it felt safe. It didn't feel wrong."
"What didn't?"
"This. With you. I don't want to ruin it, I just want—" He exhaled deeply. "Sorry. I guess I'm just realizing that maybe this means nothing to you."
"This is my job," she told him.
"I know. I… I get that, I do. I guess I just thought—"
"It's my job," she said again.
"So you want me to stop calling you?"
"Stop calling Athena," she said flatly, and hung up the phone.

She was at work when one of the other assistants stepped in from the corridor. "Hey Granger, there's someone here for you."
"Is it those event forms for Kingsley?" she called back without looking up. "Because it's been nearly three days now, and if I don't get them soon—"
She broke off when she saw who her visitor actually was. Her mouth clamped shut of its own accord upon his entry.
"Not event forms," said Draco Malfoy, hands outspread and empty. "Sorry."
Hermione gestured him into the chair across from her desk, pointedly choosing not to make a scene. He seated himself carefully, glancing around.
"So," he said, observing their surroundings. "You don't actually have an office."
She glared at him. "I'm an assistant. None of us have offices." And keep your voice down, she thought brusquely, suddenly enraged at the thought of him actually thinking he could climb under her desk to go down on her in real life. At first it was difficult to tell whether it was because she doubted the ten or so other people working in this office would appreciate that very much, or because he was still thinking of her sexually.
Her, and not her incorporeal alter ego.
"Look, I won't keep you long," Draco said, folding his hands in his lap. "I wanted to call you, but I wasn't sure how to reach you."
"You could have sent an owl," she said irritably, "rather than accosting me at work."

Another assistant walked by her desk and she forced a smile, nodding to him.
"Well, clearly I'm not great at this," Draco replied, equally snappish, though thankfully he was speaking in a deliberately hushed tone. "It just seemed like maybe I needed to say some things to you in person."

"Such as?"

"Such as I'm sorry I'm such an arse," he muttered. "I'm sorry I'm so generally disgusting, both as a person and as a man. I will quite literally beg your pardon for everything I am, if you'll let me."

Her hand stiffened over a pile of paperwork. "And what would be the intended outcome if I did?" she asked, pretending to glance over a page of budget calculations.

"Look, I'm—" He glanced around again before dropping his voice even lower, leaning towards her. "Fine, you're right," he exhaled, "I clearly shouldn't have come here. I don't know what I'm doing, I'm just—"

He shot to his feet, suddenly agitated.

"Forget it," he said. "I won't bother you again."

She read the same paragraph ten times after he left.

He got the first owl while he was reading alone in bed, three days later.

What you're doing is really messed up. You know that, right? You called me for sex. There's an inherent problem with you knowing it was me the whole time. Power balance and all that. Also, just because you paid me to carry your emotional burdens doesn't mean any of it was real intimacy.

He considered it for several minutes before replying, I know it wasn't, and then, at the last second, added: but wasn't it?

The response arrived within twenty minutes.

It was entirely one-sided. You confessing things to me just makes me a receptacle for your thoughts, which is patently unfair. Women are more than just vessels.

He rolled his eyes, replying, This isn't really an issue of gender roles, is it? This is about you and me.

This time, ten minutes: There is no you and me.

He picked up a quill to reply, then thought better of it. Which was all well and good, really, because another owl arrived ten minutes later.

And another thing, she'd written. What on earth gave you the idea that you should come to my place of work?

Then, five minutes later, You absolutely do owe me an apology. You should beg for my forgiveness. You called me names, you mocked me for years, you belittled and upset me—and now you think you deserve even one moment of my time?

Then his phone rang.

"You had no right," she said when he answered. "No. Right."
"How did you get this number?"

"All the numbers that call in are tracked," she snapped, before continuing, "Why on earth would you choose to confide in me, anyway? Did I seem safe to you or something?"

"No, actually you seemed distinctly unsafe," he said. "Which I suppose is why I kept doing it."

"That makes no sense."

"Well, even I will admit it's a fallacy on my part," he sighed, leaning back against his pillows. "I thought if you hadn't hung up on me, then maybe there was still hope I wasn't total rubbish as a human being after all."

"I didn't hang up because you were paying me not to hang up."

"Yes, I grasp that, but you could have refused my calls," he pointed out. "You almost did more than once, but then you took them anyway."

"I needed the money," she said, voice clipped.

"Right," he said. "Well, either we can move past that or we can't. Up to you."

"It's unethical," she said vitriolically.

"Are there actually vocational ethics involved in phone sex?" he asked, doubtful.

She hung up on him and he sighed, setting the phone down on the receiver and closing his eyes.

Then, a moment later, it rang.

"Hello?"

"What happens if we move past it?" she said. "In your mind. Which is obviously very troubled."

"Oh. Um." He settled against his pillows again. "I guess we would try just… talking? Without an exchange of currency, I mean."

"Talking about what? About sex?"

"Well, I guess if you wanted to."

"Do you not want to?"

"No, I… I do," he said uncertainly. "But there are other things, too."

"Like?"

"I don't know. Feelings," he said lamely.

"I'm not a counselor."

"I know."

"And if you're not paying me, I'm not… I'm not that, either."

"I know."
"I'd just be me."

"Yes."

"And that's not weird to you?"

"Not any weirder than the alternatives, no."

"Why not?"

"I like talking to you," he said. "About anything."

"Fine, so you like talking to me," she said restlessly, "but will you like listening to me?"

He made himself more comfortable on his bed, adjusting his position.

"Try me," he said.

She told him about her cat. She told him about her parents. She told him about how hard it was to find a job in this economy and how ridiculous it was to still be considered a child even after everything she'd fixed that adults couldn't solve. She told him about how disappointing sex was in real life. She told him how she didn't mind talking about it anymore, how it was the same as talking about anything: potions, history of magic, blow jobs. Actually it was worse because it was boring, because cocks were all basically the same. Oh, your cock is so hard, blah blah. Nothing really got her going anymore except for the fantasies, so really it was more like erotic storytelling and there was a little bit of creativity in that, which was soothing. She told him that she hadn't been on a date ever, basically, since she and Ron hadn't "dated" so much as flirted badly for seven years and then fooled around for two more. The sex part was fine, but the romance was lacking. And it wasn't that she was some sort of woman who needed rose petals and grand declarations—she wasn't, and she wasn't afraid of being alone, either—she wasn't one of those girls who didn't know who she was and therefore needed a man in order to divine it—but she had at least loved herself enough to walk away when something didn't fit.

"What's that like?" he asked.

"What, you've never been in a bad relationship?"

"No, the other bit," he said. "Loving yourself."

"Well, ironic that I would have to explain this to you, but it was close to impossible while we were at Hogwarts," she told him. "Largely thanks to you."

"Right," he said. "Understandable."

"But eventually it occurred to me that if I didn't love me, then I'd be waiting my whole life for someone else to do it properly, and I've learned a lot about waiting," she said. "I waited for nearly a year. For horcruxes, for death. Either or, from my perspective. And I realized I was done waiting to find reasons to like who I was. So I stopped waiting and decided to do it."

"And that worked?"

"Not immediately," she said. "And not all the time. But yeah, I think it did, for the most part."

She fidgeted in place, waiting to see what he would say next. He was quiet for a very long time, though she could still hear him breathing. She wondered for a moment if he'd fallen asleep.
"My cock is so hard," he said unexpectedly.

She bit back a laugh. "Seriously?"

"It's really hard, yeah. I don't know, maybe it's Pavlovian."

"Me talking about my emotional distress gets you off?"

"No, just you talking. And it's not distress," he said. "You're just talking about you, and I like it."

"Gross," she said.

He chuckled from the other end of the line. "Honestly, though. I do like it."

"Am I supposed to talk about your cock now?"

"Only if you want to."

She nudged a hand under the button of her jeans, sliding it below her knickers for curiosity's sake. "I'm a bit wet, actually."

"Are you?"

"Don't get too cocky," she said. "Just a bit."

"Could help with that," he offered. "If it doesn't interfere too much with your personal ethics."

She thought about it, weighing her options.

"Maybe it's about time you begged my forgiveness," she said thoughtfully.

"On my knees, you mean?"

"Yes."

"Dirty, Granger," he said in a low voice.

She bit her lip, imagining his mouth as she slid a finger inside her.

"Yeah," she exhaled, "I know. Keep going."

"What are you doing tomorrow?"

"You mean later today?"

"Is it that late? Shit. Yeah, I guess."

"Work. The usual."

"Can I call you later?"

"You're asking while you're still on the phone with me if you can call me later?"

"Seems like the polite thing to do. Worked for me yesterday."

"Yesterday I was off the phone by midnight. Now it's... bloody Christ, it's nearly three."
"Ah, my fault. You should get to bed then."

"Yes, I really should."

"But that's a yes for tomorrow?"

"I don't know."

"You don't know?"

"I mean... yeah, sorry, it's a yes. It's just..."

"Just what?"

"I don't know. What are we doing, I guess?"

"I don't know, Granger. Talking."

"Isn't it a bit weird?"

"Does it feel weird?"

"No. But it feels like it should feel weird. And anyway, aren't you sick of me yet?"

"No. Are you sick of me?"

"This version of you? No."

"Then that all seems reason enough to keep going, doesn't it?"

"I... suppose so."

"So that's a yes for tomorrow night?"

"Yes, fine, alright Malfoy. You win."

"Excellent. Talk to you tomorrow."

"You're not going to bed now, are you?"

"Hm? No, probably not. Might read a bit first."

"What are you reading?"

It seemed inevitable that they would run into each other in person. You can only exist in someone's distant orbit for so long before developing a casual paranoia that they're somewhere around the corner, taking their coffee to go from the same cafe as you. It's something magnetic, knowing they exist somewhere and it might as well be here.

In this case, the event was a matter of strolling through Diagon Alley, her with Harry and Ron and him with Theo and Blaise. Their eyes locked briefly as they passed and they nodded to each other in greeting, politely, before disappearing in opposite directions.

"What was that?" said Ron, bewildered by what was by all accounts agreed to be mild amicability.

"Oh, nothing," Hermione said. "Malfoy called into a sex hotline I was working and now we're the best of friends."

"There's no need to be sarcastic," mumbled Ron sullenly, though they were on their way to eat ice cream, so he wasn't terribly injured for long.

Draco, on the other hand, was a bit strange that evening.

"Don't you think we ought to see each other?" he asked over the phone. "Like, in person."

"I don't know," said Hermione listlessly. "Don't you think it might be weird?"

"I don't think it's not weird if we confine our relationship to phones."

(This being a thing he said after they'd both gotten each other off for the first time that evening, so naturally she was inclined to agree with his point.)

"We could have dinner," he suggested.

"Is that a euphemism?"

"We could fuck too, but I'm specifically asking about dinner."

"I really don't think this is a relationship."

"That's not an answer."

"Fine." She chewed her lip, sighing out, "Okay, dinner. But it's going to be weird."

"It's never not been weird, Granger."

He chose a decently sized restaurant and arrived early, watching her take a seat at the table he'd specifically selected by the window. It had a balcony looking out over Diagon Alley, and he watched her observe her reflection for a moment, frowning at her hair, until the waiter brought her a phone. Her brows knitted in confusion, bewildered, and then she finally caught a glimpse of Draco where he was seated at the bar, her expression turning from puzzlement to half-mocking laughter as she picked up the phone from the tray and waved the waiter away.

"You're an idiot," she answered in a low voice, turning away from the crowd to take the call more privately.

"Yeah, I know," he said. "Just thought it might be easier this way. Familiar. Less weird."

"It's still weird."

"Maybe a script will help," he offered. "What might you be looking for this evening, fair stranger?"

He watched her suck in a breath, fighting a smile.

"A little conversation," she said. "Maybe some sex."

He tilted his head. "Am I to understand that you would like me to make you come?"

She turned towards him, hesitating a moment before rolling her eyes. She crossed one leg over the other, drawing her skirt pointedly up on her thigh as she moved.

"Maybe later," she said.
"Dessert after dinner, I take it?"

"Precisely."

"Right, of course. So should I join you?"

She observed him for several moments from across the room, drumming her fingers on the table.

"Yes," she said eventually.

"Yes?"

"Yes. Have dinner with me, Draco," she said.

He made a show of hanging up the phone before stretching to his feet and sauntering over to her table, pulling out the chair across from hers.

"Hi," he said, sitting down.

Her eyes were bright and cynical and lovely. "Hi," she agreed.

"Some things you should know before we start," he said, smoothing his napkin across his lap. "I dislike olives," he said, glancing up at her, "and I'm told I have intimacy issues."

Her smile quirked. "Me too."

"Well, nothing wrong with that," he said. "Now that's out of the way, shall we split some tapas?"

She gave a little laugh, shaking her head as if she couldn't believe anything he'd just said, but she wanted to. She really, really wanted to.

"Why not?" she said, shrugging.

Like it was the most natural thing in the world.

Summary: Everyone has a hobby. Theirs is… uniquely theirs.

---

The carpet, which had come to the Malfoys by way of the House of Valois somewhere around the fourteenth century, was a priceless antique. It was also an atrocity, having been abandoned to age ungracefully in one of the lesser-used upstairs drawing rooms. But obviously that was neither here nor there, because none of it was currently visible beneath Theo's latest dive into mania.

While this room was typically quite sparse—paying homage, of course, to that priceless and abominable rug—it was currently covered in juvenile structures that, optically, were scattered across a spectrum of cartoonishly bright to offensively garish. The London skyline had been reconstructed beside something that appeared to be an operational space station, and beside that was a temple erected to a mini-figurine closely resembling Draco himself.

"What's this?" Draco asked aloud, falling to a halt. Not that anyone ever used this room, but its vacancy was its primary redeeming factor. There was also something disconcerting (and perhaps borderline dangerous?) about its current occupation.

"Found these," replied Theo, not looking up. He waved a hand around the room, ostensibly indicating that those two words should explain everything without further questioning.

Draco exchanged a skeptical glance with Hermione beside him. He'd warned her there would be some consequences to her moving in, though this particular one hadn't been on the list of aforementioned topics.

"There's no such thing as a casual hobby for him, is there?" she murmured tentatively.

"No," Draco confirmed. "There is not."

"And this is… normal? For him?"

"Well, he's never done this particular thing before," Draco acknowledged with a shrug. "But thematically it's very on brand."

Hermione was a problem-solver at heart, which was something Draco admired about her. He also found it very amusing how tirelessly she threw herself at unsolvable things, such as the very truth and nature of his lifelong friend and eternal plague, Theodore Nott.

"Um, Theo," Hermione called out to him, nearly tipping sideways as she attempted to reach the epicenter of the mess. She stepped over a miniature racetrack and crouched down beside him, engaging a soft, pedantic tone. "I don't suppose you've given any thought to what you're going to do… next?"

"Well, I've been immensely overstimulated," said Theo, still focused on the obelisk he was presently constructing. "You've seen how much sugar I let into my diet. Some might call it irresponsible to the point of lethality."

"Oh," said Hermione, looking concerned. "Well, I'm sure if it's a matter of nutrit-"

"He's joking," Draco growled impatiently, stepping over the miniature petting zoo to urge Hermione back to her feet. "Nott, you've got to stop this," he said firmly to Theo, coaxing Hermione away from the monster at the center of the labyrinth. "You're turning the whole house into your personal palace of eccentricity and frankly, it's all very underfoot."

Theo ignored him, as he usually did, and Hermione turned to Draco with a sigh.

"He's healing," she attempted to reason sympathetically.

"He's a child," Draco corrected.

"Maybe there's a way to get him to channel all this into something positive?" Hermione suggested, tepidly chewing her lip. "I don't want to just be rid of him."

"Well, I do. It's very simple, Theodore," Draco said to Theo, though he may as well not have bothered. "Just stop building Legos in my house!"

When there was predictably no answer, Draco sighed. "Jesus Christ," he murmured to himself, or to Hermione, or to whoever might manifest to assist him in this time of need. "What sort of adult man still does this?"

Just then, something seemed to occur to Hermione with a delayed bolt of recognition.

"Oh," she said. "Hm."

"Potter," called the department head. "May I see you in my office for a moment?"

Harry looked up from his desk with a start, nearly toppling the dragon figurine that had taken him a full week's holiday to build. He'd taken the time off the moment he'd gotten his hands on the special edition Hungarian Horntail, not even hesitating to file the request despite the time he'd probably need later that year for Dudley's wedding. Now the dragon's tail curled comfortably down onto his computer screen, filling him with a rare and probably short-lived glimpse of happiness.

"Potter, as you know there's been some… cuts to the department," said Slughorn, looking deeply apologetic. "And as you are still only an associate member of our faculty, I'm afraid my hands are tied. I'm happy to provide references—"

Harry tuned out the remainder of whatever Slughorn had to say, knowing there had never been a purpose to getting comfortable. He listened to himself getting sacked for the second time in a year as if it were a foggy gramophone recording and then nodded numbly, rising to his feet to collect his figurines from his office.

That Harry had wound up in academia had always been something of a demented outcome. Mostly he'd wanted to stay in school as long as possible, keeping away from whatever his aunt and uncle demanded of him at home. Presumably they expected him to care for Aunt Marge, who was not even related to him by blood, or to work for Uncle Vernon, who couldn't have cared less whether Harry had any interest in industrial drills. So long as universities kept paying him to research obscure historical documents, Harry had done it. But now, it seemed, his excuses might be at an end.

He placed his collection of figurines—an elf he called Dobby, a giant he called Hagrid, a wizard he called Dumbledore who was in constant battle with an evil sorcerer called Voldemort—into the box he hadn't even bothered to be rid of when he arrived, and recounted how little hope there had been to begin with. His research was so very niche and useless (purposefully, since it meant he wasn't exceptionally bothered by anyone while he worked) that funding would forever be in the process of getting cut for his particular expertise.

As Harry was glancing over his box of figurines and resigning himself to an unceremonious return to Privet Drive, his phone rang in his pocket. He shifted to reach for it, pulling it to his ear without a glance. No doubt it would be Dudley calling about his stag night—again.

"I told you the stripper was handled," Harry said perfunctorily. "And no, I didn't ask for a picture of her tits because that's reductive. I'm sure they're perfectly fine."

"Um, Harry?" said an unfamiliar voice as Harry blinked in surprise, adjusting his hold on the box of figurines. "It's Hermione. From Hogwarts?"

"Oh." Drat. "Sorry, that was—"

"Don't worry about it," she assured him, her voice self-consciously sunny. "I was just wondering… it's odd, I know, but… do you still have that, um. Hobby of yours?"

"My research, you mean?" Hermione, too, was an academic, though she'd specialized in ancient linguistics. The summer after they'd both finished their doctorate programs she'd supposedly gone off to some archaeological site and fallen in love with the son of the program's aristocratic patron. "Yes, I still work in fictional dialects and folklore, though lately I've had to pivot somewhat," he said, glancing down at his recently emptied desk.

"No, I meant—" She let out an uncomfortable laugh. "$\text{The... other thing.}$"

Harry frowned wordlessly down at his box of figurines.

"Do you still build things?" Hermione asked him gently. "$\text{The little, um. Toys?}$"

Toys. Speaking of reductive. Not that it was worth getting into.

"I do," Harry said. Over his shoulder he caught sight of Slughorn's secretary, who must have been sent after him to make sure he didn't steal any of the department's letterhead. "$\text{Sorry, not to rush you, Hermione, but is there a reason you're asking?}$"

"Well, I was just wondering," Hermione said. "$\text{Would you ever consider meeting up with someone who had... similar inclinations?}$"

Even from across the cafe, it was obvious that Harry Potter was primarily skinny, messy-haired, and bespectacled. He was also dressed horribly, wearing an overlarge rugby polo with a pair of worn jeans that was as upsetting as it was striped. His haircut was the worst thing Theo had ever set eyes on in his entire life and all in all the view was unsavory—but Harry Potter was useful, and Theo Nott was very utilitarian by nature. Usefulness was all that mattered.
"There's a reality show competition for Lego builders," Theo announced without preamble, nearly startling Harry into dropping his cup of tea. His glasses fogged up somehow, lending him a distinct air of madness as Theo slid the screen of his iPad across the table. "I need a partner."

"What… a what?" Harry repeated slowly. "Who? Sorry." He inhaled deeply. "Who are you?"

"I'm Theodore Nott the second. Do not google me, you won't like what you find." Theo flipped his chair around and perched across from Harry, staring at him. "What's that?" he asked, pointing to the scar on Harry's forehead.

"Nothing." Harry fussed with his hair, covering it up. "Are you Hermione's friend?"

"Not even remotely," said Theo. "But she and Draco needed me out of the house, so for all intents and purposes yes."

"You said this a… Lego competition?" asked Harry, and then glanced up. "You build Legos?"

Theo heard the unspoken implication. Harry was taking in Theo's immaculate suit, the military haircut and probably also the biceps, piecing together his indubitably false impression.

"I dabble," said Theo. "And you?"

"Well, I don't necessarily limit myself t-"

"You don't have a wife or anything, do you?" asked Theo, prompting Harry to balk at him, still vaguely foggy-eyed from clutching his mug of tea protectively to his chest. Theo sighed, impatiently removing the mug from Harry's hand. "What I mean is you don't have any pressing reason to remain here, do you? Because we'll be required to stay in Holborn for filming."

"Stay," Harry echoed vacantly. "Stay…?"

"In a hotel? You've heard of them, yes?"

"For a… Lego competition?"

Okay, so Harry was an idiot. Or slow. Whatever the politically correct term for that was these days. Not that it mattered. He could be anything but comatose and it would be sufficient. It would give Theo something to do, which he sorely needed.

"Listen. Do you have literally anything better to do with yourself?" Theo asked Harry flatly.

For a singular flash of a moment, he thought he recognized something in Harry's glance.

"No," Harry said. His first coherent answer all afternoon.

"Good." Theo rose to his feet. "Then pack your bags. We start filming on Monday."

If Harry could credit Dudley with anything it would be naming Harry his best man, as it was an exceptionally creative form of indentured servitude. Harry fumbled for his mobile phone nearly twenty times a day attending to Dudley's various demands, which had already been Harry's arena of concern for essentially their entire lives.

"Hello?" Harry said, answering the phone as he and Theo pulled up to the hotel. Theo slid out from the driver's seat and tossed his keys to someone standing nearby, which Harry stared after with a frown. "Theo, I don't think that's a valet."
"Oi, Harry, have you got everything Cho's asked?" Dudley said. Fate was a cruel mistress indeed giving a woman like Cho Chang to a man like Dudley Dursley. "She'll be in a foul mood if you've not got the photo booth she asked for."

"What?" Theo asked.

"That's not a valet," Harry said again, pointing to the man who was currently holding Theo's keys. In response, Theo pivoted, whipping his sunglasses from his face with obvious disbelief. "This place doesn't have a valet—and Dudley, can you just give me a minute? I'll call you back in just a minute—"

"I thought you understood this was important," Dudley said. "If you don't want to help, I can always have Piers step in. He's a real mate," he accused snidely.

"Listen Dudley, it's fine, I'll just give Cho a call this afternoon and—"

Harry stopped as Theo yanked the phone from his hand, tossing it over his shoulder and into the street. There was a smack of metal and the crunch of a car tire before a driver shouted profanities out his open window to Theo, who strode into the Hoxton without even a blink.

"What—" Harry froze. "What did you just—? What…?"

"I need you focused," Theo said, doubling back and snapping his fingers. "Do you understand? I need your full, entire focus. Let's go, walk." More finger-snapping.

"But…" Harry stared longingly into the street at his shattered screen.

"Your cousin messaged you three times on the drive alone," Theo reminded him impatiently. "What's so important you can't devote your attention solely to this for the next month?"

With as irrational as Theo clearly was, Harry was somehow struggling to conjure up any rationality of his own. All he could think was Cho, the woman he'd loved for the last decade of his life, had specifically asked his help to give her the perfect wedding, and because he had known Dudley would not do it—and because he knew Dudley could not give her anything close to a perfect life, though nobody had asked his opinion on the matter—Harry had accepted the role of best man and shouldered all the expectations therein. He half-considered a mad dash into the street for the phone's mangled corpse until Theo waved his hands distractingly, this time right in front of Harry's nose.

"Focus," said Theo. "Aren't you unemployed? You need the money. I need the win."

Harry shut his eyes. Theo Nott wouldn't understand this, of course, being the rich prick he so obviously was, but Harry did need the money. Not just the money, but what the money meant. That for once he had done something of value.

"Good luck," Cho had breathed to him, her smile warm and soft as he'd headed out the door. "I'm so happy you've finally taken your shot, Harry."

"Harry," barked Theo. "Are you listening?"

Harry blinked. "What?"

Theo rolled his eyes.

"Come on," he said, grabbing Harry's shoulder and leading him into the hotel. "We've got to get
The room was fine. Not especially large and designed to resemble a contemporary flat which was unnecessarily kitschy, but fine. The shower was constructed improperly. Fine. The towels were decent and the shampoo was vegan. Harry was clearly going to be a lot of work. Fine.

If there was one thing Theo relished, it was the thrill of an impossible task.

Though Theo had specifically said not to google him, Harry most certainly had. Theodore Nott was the son of an English nobleman—was a nobleman himself—and had recently been honorably discharged from the British Royal Air Force. He was a pilot, a decorated officer, and most confusingly, a hero. That being said, not one thing in Theo's google search had populated any results to suggest the man Harry was currently sharing a hotel room with was even remotely the same person.

"Are you listening?" was one of Theo's top five questions, though in Harry's opinion it was physically impossible to listen to anything Theo said. He spoke incoherently, in half-sentences, and often interrupted himself to snatch the tablet from Harry's hands and begin drawing it himself. (They were, according to Theo, "casually sketching" in advance of the competition itself, though nothing about what they were doing aside from Harry's wardrobe seemed remotely near casual.)

"I'm trying to listen," Harry said. "But you've spent the last forty-five minutes alternately quoting Shakespeare at me and mumbling to yourself."

"Well, if you have any ideas, I'd love to hear them," Theo replied, dripping with sarcasm. Harry, who seemed to be the only person in the room aware that it was currently four in the morning, rose to his feet and grabbed the tablet back from Theo.

"Here," he said, sketching out a possible landscape. At this point he didn't even care what it was, so long as Theo stopped talking. "There's a good chance we'll be asked to design a dystopia, so here's a duel scene. There's the good guy," he said, pointing, "here's the bad guy, and if we put this in the middle—"

He blinked as Theo suddenly dropped beside him on the bed, the whole thing shifting beneath his weight as if an anvil had collided with the mattress.

"Keep going," Theo said.

Harry glanced at him, bracing for criticism or mockery, but Theo seemed genuinely entranced. His eyes were wide, the shadows beneath them stark against his pale skin, and for the first time it was as if Theo's entire being had temporarily quieted. He vibrated at a slower, almost tranquil frequency, his chin paused beside Harry's shoulder and fixed on the screen with obvious anticipation for whatever Harry drew next.

"Well," Harry said, shifting slightly so that Theo could see better. "What if we added… planes? Or something in the sky? Something to give it dimension, height—"

"No," Theo said. "Not planes. Doesn't even make sense." He slid an accusing glance to Harry. "What kind of narrative involves both wizards and airplanes?"

"Oh." Harry supposed he was right about that. "Maybe… monkeys with wings? Something Wizard of Oz-y?"
Theo shook his head. "People on broomsticks," he said.

"Okay." Harry bent his head, sketching something he'd imagined himself at least a hundred times. "Like that?"

"Like that," Theo agreed, before finally—thank god—covering a yawn.

The other competitors were hobbyists, also amateurs. There were two sets of twins (the Patils and the Weasleys), a father and son (the Diggorys), a set of cosplaying enthusiasts, Loony something and her bizarre partner Severitus, a pair of quarrelsome boyfriends (Sean and Deamus?), and some other people, maybe. Mostly Theo was focused from the start on the newly married couple, the Longbottoms. The husband, Neville, seemed pleasant enough, easily stomped on, but Theo got very disturbing vibes from the wife. Pansy had a slightly unhinged look to her, like possibly she kept a store of poisons under the beams of her floorboards for anyone she considered a threat.

"Watch out for Crazy Eyes," Theo murmured to Harry, nudging him. He had dressed Harry that morning, opting to lean into Harry's professorial qualities with a shawl-collared cardigan. He'd worn a henley and jeans himself.

"Oh, that's Neville Longbottom," Harry said, glancing up with surprise. "He's an incredible brickmaster."

"What?"

"He's very good at building things," Harry clarified. "So good there's a rumor he was asked to be a designer for Lego and he turned them down."

"Why?"

"To do stuff like this instead, I guess," Harry said with a shrug.

Theo frowned. "How do you know this?"

"Dunno. I go on the messageboards and such," Harry said, turning to Theo with confusion. "Don't you?"

Theo had never had much of a childhood, so he'd only discovered the very existence of Legos approximately two weeks ago. Maybe three, depending what day it was now. He had scoured the internet for tricks when it came to building styles, mechanical techniques, and terminology, but of course he hadn't bothered to research the "community," which was full of uninhibited weirdos.

"Does it matter if I do or not?" asked Theo, sliding a glance askance. Since walking into the competition film studio, Harry had become a different person. He was still skinny and bespectacled, definitely, but he seemed to be standing straighter, holding his shoulders back with something Theo suspected was meager but noticeable confidence.

"No," Harry said, glancing at Neville again. "He's good, but I'm better."

"Big words from someone who's never actually done anything before," commented Theo, who had done precisely what he'd told Harry not to do and googled him. Harry Potter had a Ph.D. in obscure linguistics and had shuffled between universities since the completion of his dissertation. His permanent address was listed as the one belonging to his aunt and uncle, where he'd lived his entire life. Even Hermione had said quietly to Draco that while Harry was very good at building things—figurines and whatever else—he had always seemed distinctly odd. Alienated by his own inaction.
"Better late than never," Harry remarked, one hand rising to his scar, though he ultimately refrained from touching it. Theo had told him to move the hair aside, leaving the lightning bolt on display for the audience. It's cool, he'd said, niche, memorable. That sort of shit sticks.

"I don't think I'm that memorable," had been Harry's murmured response.

"Then give them something to remember," Theo replied.

By the first day of competition, there was no question about it. Theo Nott was a madman.

This had good and bad implications. On the plus side, Theo's ability to visualize something before he even set a hand to building it was fucking unparalleled. Harry had never met someone who could stare into space for five seconds and then suddenly produce a full concept of what should come next, and Harry had spent a lot of time observing Lego builds on YouTube. Theo was so proficient it was almost as if he wasn't even doing it in real time; as if he'd frozen portions of Harry's consciousness and bopped around in time and space, only allowing Harry to see the subsequent edits—the cuts and pastes that revealed the final product.

Theo was also rigorously scheduled, methodical, ruthlessly efficient. Building, this sort of thing, had only ever been for Harry's personal fulfillment, never for profit or on a timeline. Nobody had ever asked him why he started or what he enjoyed about it. Nobody cared about any of this at all except for Theo, so Harry had never been forced to admit his origin story to anyone until the day Theo drilled him about it.

"Okay no, it wasn't my hobby, exactly," Harry had said without thinking. The interrogation ("A MEANINGFUL STORY TO CONNECT WITH THE AUDIENCE," Theo had shouted at Harry like a gun going off) was part of a crash-course in media preparation that Theo considered necessary to their success. It had taken place just before sunrise, at which point Harry was too bleary-eyed with exhaustion to contemplate a better answer. "My cousin Dudley went through a Lego phase, but of course he had the most fun destroying the sets after he built them. I'd go into his second bedroom—"

"Second bedroom?" asked Theo, barking it like a sergeant.

"Yeah, he had two bedrooms," Harry said, as mechanical by then as one of his own lifeless builds. "One for him and one for his toys, which took up most of the upper floor. But at night—"

"What about you? Where was your room?"

"I… had a room also," Harry mumbled. "Anyway, at night I'd go into his second bedroom and take the broken bits and fix them and put the sets back together. I just couldn't stand it, seeing them destroyed like that, it felt… I just couldn't stand it." He blinked, rubbing his eyes beneath his glasses. "Besides, it wasn't like I had anything better to do."

Theo's silence in response had been deafening, and then he'd followed it up with an even stranger look.

"That's depressing as fuck," he said, tossing a pillow at Harry. "Go to bed."

But ever since that conversation, Harry had noticed Theo looking at him differently. Almost as if Harry was a supplementary Lego set that Theo was responsible for piecing together invisibly inside his head, though clearly none of the pieces were locking into place.

They won best build of the day in the first round. A lot of that was due to Theo's ability to finish things with extraordinary efficiency—he took almost no time in the production process and used a schedule breaking each hour into ten minute increments—but it was Harry's detailed model of a phoenix with outstretched wings of flame that received the most praise from the judges, Minerva and Filius.

"This is so imaginative," said Minerva. "It's spectacular in the true sense of it. That sense of spectacle is there, the element of the fantastical. This is what Lego is all about: the story, the wonder. There's something very special about this build."

Harry waited for Theo to drill him on something when they returned to their hotel room, but surprisingly, he hadn't. Theo simply picked up his tablet and started drawing.

"Do you want me to work on some new sketches?" asked Harry uncertainly.

It took a second for Theo to tear his gaze from his drawing. "What?"

"Well, I don't know what you're working on, but if you want—"

"I thought you'd want to sleep," said Theo. "I'm just doing this to amuse myself."

He lowered the stylus to the screen again, continuing to work. Harry, meanwhile, shifted his weight from foot to foot.

"I'd actually… rather not," said Harry. "I don't sleep that well, to be honest. And, I don't know, I'm not tired."

Theo glanced up fleetingly. "What's your deal?" he said, as Harry blinked.

"What?"

"Your cousin," Theo said. "You rebuild his Legos. You stay in his shadow. You even take it upon yourself to save his wedding."

"I'm not saving it, I'm just—"

"You are."

He never got a word in edgewise. "I'm n-"

"You can deny it however you like, Potter, but it's quite clear that y-"

"I thought I wanted to be rid of him," Harry snapped, suddenly frustrated with Theo's constant bulldozing. "I thought for years I just wanted to be anywhere he wasn't, but then I realized the rest of the world's no different. There are Dudleys everywhere, a thousand different forms of them, and at least I understand how this particular Dudley works."

He glanced down at his hands, suddenly flaming with anger. Theo, wisely or curiously or disinterestedly or possibly just bored, said nothing.

"I waited," Harry grumbled, falling onto the mattress behind him. "My entire life I waited for someone to walk in the door and tell me I was special, to explain that I was alive for a reason, that I was destined for greatness. That I was put here on this earth for a purpose. And I waited and waited and realized nobody gives a damn if I live or die, nobody cares. There's no such thing as karma, the world's not fair, and we just mythologize ourselves to get through it." He slid a glance at the window, rubbing his temples. "We want to believe in fate or destiny but there's no such thing.
There's no purpose to any of it. We just exist because of randomness, entropy, I don't know, some roll of the dice. Statistics. And it makes sense, doesn't it, because why should we be different from any other species? Flies don't have destinies and neither do we. We're not special, we don't get more credit just because we can collectively point to something and call it angst. We're part of an ecosystem that truly doesn't give a damn which of us lives or dies. It doesn't ask for qualifications. We live or we don't and either way, the rest of the world moves on."

Harry's parents had died and he had lived, but for what? Petunia and Vernon, monsters that they were, had lived when James and Lily had died. There was no logic to it, no rationality. There was no reason Dudley was considered special and Harry was not. That was just the way of it, the universe, and it didn't matter whether you were good or bad, special or unspecial. Harry had learned that lesson, finally, when Cho had chosen Dudley over him.

"Wow." Theo set down his stylus, staring at Harry with something very close to a laugh. "That's the imagination that won us the first round? You must be joking."

Harry turned away, sickened. "Never mind. I'll just—"

"Here," Theo said, offering him the tablet and the stylus. "Draw me something."

Harry glanced at him, waiting for the joke. The beat of sarcasm. The underlying pulse of ridicule, the jeering or disdain; the implications of pity or mockery that other people assumed for whatever reason that Harry couldn't hear or feel.

"What? Draw," Theo said, militaristic again. "I'm not going to just sit here waiting all night."

"Why don't you sleep?" Harry asked him, snatching the iPad from Theo's hand. It felt like a jostled recoiling, that single motion. He'd been reluctant to reach out at all, assuming things were safer if he kept within the limited frame of his limbs.

"I'll sleep when I'm dead," Theo assured him, "which by your reasoning could be any moment."

He could hear that Theo was definitely making fun of him that time, but it wasn't the same as Dudley or anyone else who had ever stared at his Lego builds with derision.

"Don't tell me you're an optimist," Harry muttered, falling into the bed beside the desk where Theo sat.

"Me? I know why I exist," Theo said, shrugging. "I'm here to make my father uncomfortable and to take up space in my best friend's house. I already know that my calling is delightfully diminutive."

He propped his feet up beside Harry.

"You know what? Do the planes," Theo said. "Why not. What's the worst that can happen, someone crashes and I get a medal of bravery? The universe would never allow it, it's too divine a comedy."

He'd said it with effortless theatricality, as if he really believed nobody else could hear the echo, the cavernous drop underneath. Or possibly Theo didn't believe anyone was listening for it, and maybe also had a lifetime of watching his suspicions prove themselves true.

Harry was starting to think he understood what kind of adult man became obsessed with winning a Lego competition. It wasn't all that different from the sort of child who painstakingly put broken pieces back together again.
"Don't take this the wrong way," Harry said slowly, "but are you by any chance supposed to be on some sort of high dosage medication?"

Theo gave a burst of laughter so loud and uninhibited that Harry was sure he'd woken their neighbors.

"Aren't we all," managed Theo eventually. "Aren't we all."

Having won the first round, Theo expected he and Harry would be murdered in their beds by Pansy very shortly. By the third round, while the others were starting to be sent home, he'd begun speculating that Pansy was a very specialized sort of gold digger who'd recognized Neville's undeniable skill at Lego building and begun monetizing it, because nothing else could possibly explain their relationship. True, they were constantly holding hands and repeating the same (clearly rehearsed!) portions of their courtship, but Theo was convinced none of it could possibly be real. Pansy always seemed to go a little dead-eyed whenever it happened, and Stockholm Syndrome aside, Theo was almost positive Neville was still a virgin.

"You're being mean," Harry murmured, though Theo could see quite clearly he was suppressing his amusement.

"You know I'm right," Theo informed him. "Look at her," he added, gesturing to where Pansy hadn't blinked in the last three minutes, staring at whatever Neville was building into the scene. "I don't know whether to summon the police, child services, or the zoo. I'm genuinely concerned she'll ingest him like a spider right in front of us if they ever drop into the bottom two," Theo commented, watching Harry's hands shake slightly with laughter while he continued their city build.

They'd decided to build the tallest skyscraper in the room, complete with moving parts that Harry brought to life like magic. Unfortunately something had gone horribly wrong in the transportation of the build, and just before the judging portion of that round, the top of their skyscraper had crashed to the ground, leaving their build incomplete.

Theo had watched Harry's face go blank, his entire frame frozen, before he suddenly darted out of sight.

"You should go after him," said a producer to Theo's left.

"Shut up," said Theo, who was already half-jogging in the direction Harry had gone. The fact that a camera had followed him was not ideal; upon discovering Harry sitting alone in the dark, he desperately wished they'd had the space to be alone.

"Hey," Theo said. "It's okay."

Harry's face was buried in his palms.

"Hey." Theo knelt in front of him, trying to ignore the presence of the cameraman on his left. "Listen to me," he said quietly. "It's not life or death. It's just Lego."

"It's everything," Harry whispered back, barely audible. "Don't you understand? It's everything."

Yes, Theo understood. It was more than just a build. It was transfiguring the chaos of the world into something ordered, something beautiful, something fantastical. It was the transformation of the universe's bullshit, the outcome of their shitty lives into something notable, something of value. He thought of a younger Harry sneaking into his cousin's second bedroom and repairing the damage his cousin had done, unknowingly tying himself to all the damage his cousin would ever cause for the entirety of a damaging lifetime.

Even if either of them were normal people, it would have been a shame to lose nearly ten hours of work. But they weren't normal, not in the least, which made it infinitely worse. They were the sort of people who had to be rebuilt from night to night, from day to day. They were faulty structures with broken parts, men who were hardly even standing.

"Come on," said Theo, pulling Harry to his feet and tugging him into a spontaneous embrace, obscuring their conversation from the camera. "You never know. There might be some sort of miracle that keeps us here."

Harry's reply in his ear was thin and unconvinced. "Like what?"

"Maybe Crazy Eyes out there murdered someone on the studio floor? That's got to merit a spot in the bottom two, at least."

Harry laughed, which might have been a sob, though Theo held him through it regardless.

"Alright, fine," Harry exhaled, pulling away. "I guess the universe is random enough that miracles are bound to happen."

"Statistically speaking, one mustn't discount the anomalies," Theo reminded him.

In the end, they were all tasked with another five hours to add an additional narrative onto their builds, allowing Harry and Theo to repair theirs as part of the subsequent challenge. Pansy shot daggers at them from across the room as if they'd somehow conjured this outcome into being, though Harry was so relieved by the opportunity to fix his mess that he hadn't even noticed.

Theo, for his part, was feeling something very different than he had been. He'd arrived there a man with a plan, intending to win, but now there was… something else.

He was a member of a team, which he had not been for some time. The last time, of course, someone had died, which was why Theo suddenly felt that nothing should ever harm Harry Potter again so long as he was there. From now on, Theo reasoned internally, everything he built with Harry would have to be perfect, if only because it was what Harry Potter deserved.

Harry wasn't surprised when they were asked to build bridges. The competition had always been part science, part art, so the physics of building was certain to come into play. He and Theo constructed something of a stylistic aqueduct, for which Harry was happy to let Theo take the lead. Theo's expertise was architecture, structure, while Harry built a series of ornately grotesque gargoyles to overlook the bridge.

The night before, he and Theo had been spitballing further fantasy narratives (Harry's specialty, given his work) when the tablet made a small sound indicating an email on Harry's account. He saw the name Cho and quickly swiped it away, which of course Theo hadn't missed. He had a hawkish sort of observation, which was funny when it was directed at others and horrifying when it was directed at Harry, the only other person in the room.

"So, you're in love with your cousin's betrothed," Theo drawled. Sometimes when he used that particular voice, Harry pictured him on the cover of a satirical newspaper: Local Man Observes Surroundings, Declares Them Unfit.

"Is that a question?" Harry prompted.
"No."

"Oh." Harry frowned. "You're not going to ask… why?"

"Oh, I know why," said Theo, hauling his long legs from the floor to set them on the edge of Harry's bed. Neither of them slept much, and truthfully Harry was getting used to it, the feeling of drowsiness that accompanied his sleeplessness. He'd never felt refreshed in the mornings before this anyway, and now the sense of having uncovered something interesting during the night was more invigorating than any cellular recharging.

"Oh." Harry slid another look at Theo. "Well, fine."

Theo chuckled. "I take it you want to tell me about it?"

"I didn't say that."

"You don't say much," Theo agreed.

Again, Harry felt the little irk of being under Theo's surveillance.

"I met her first," said Harry. "At university."

"Mm," said Theo. "Riveting. Go on."

Harry glanced up, anticipating ridicule, but Theo was looking at him expressionlessly, waiting.

"She came to visit me once over the Christmas holidays. Friends," Harry clarified, clearing his throat. "We were friends. She'd had a boyfriend and—"

"Ah," Theo said, stretching out until he'd slumped down in his chair, ankles beside Harry's seated hips. "She wasn't available, so you didn't push her. But Dudley did."

"Not exactly."

"Hm?" Theo's smile twitched. "Delightful. I do so love to be proven wrong."

"It was more a matter of… timing," Harry explained. "Cedric, her boyfriend… he was a mate of mine, and well, he died."

"Oh." Theo propped himself up on his elbows. "An unexpected twist. So Dudley was there to comfort her in her time of need while you were both in mourning?"

"I…" Harry hesitated. "Evidently."

"Which he did with his prick, I presume."

Harry felt his cheeks flush. "I really don't kn-"

"Grief," Theo supplied dismissively, "is highly amorous under the right circumstances. It's biological, did you know that? A member of the herd dies, the sexual impulse kicks in. The urge to procreate is a matter of sociological dependency."

"I thought you said it was biological?"

"I haven't the faintest fucking clue," Theo replied, appearing to have already grown tired of the conversation. "I went to military school my entire life and my curriculum was lacking. I only know how to follow orders."

"I find that incredibly difficult to believe."

"Believe whatever you like," Theo assured him. "My father's the one who decided I needed structure. And what's more structured than a cage?" He let out a bark of a laugh, like cannon fire. "Gilded, though. Something like that. The finest iron a man can wrought."

"What might you have been otherwise?" Harry asked, staring down at his tablet. He was learning it was better not to make eye contact when he asked personal questions. Theo, predatory though he liked to pretend he was, was extraordinarily skittish.

"There's really no value to pondering conditionalities," Theo said. "What we might have been, what we deserve, what we are, those are the irrelevancies of life, the superfluities. Aren't you the one who said we mythologize ourselves in order to survive? I have no interest in doing so."

"In surviving?"

To that Theo glanced up so sharply Harry felt it like the pull of his own chin.

"I look forward to being rot," Theo said. "Putting myself to use in degradation."

Harry looked over the features of Theo's face, assessing them again. The arrogant mouth that was nearly feminine. The prominent brow that sat furrowed and angry, perpetually entombed by the wounds he couldn't speak of without causticity. The eyes that saw everything, both existing and not.

"And until then?" Harry asked.

"Until then I will be nothing. I will be anything," Theo clarified, "but the kind of man who breaks things."

Then he removed his legs from Harry's bed and used them to stride into the bathroom, the door securing in the latch without any further sound.

Theo was aware that Harry had gathered things about him. Harry was a hunter-gatherer; he plucked things up and stowed them, putting them away for safekeeping. Theo could see Harry looking over his little collection, frowning at it, wondering what else he needed or wanted to have while measuring it against what he thought himself likely to get.

"What do you know?" Theo asked him over their sixth build. It was a battle scene, good and evil. Harry had wanted to be good but they'd gotten evil, and Harry was struggling with it at first, poor thing, until his instincts took over. Power was a wonderful thing, a terrible thing. It was appealing in its ugliness, its deformities. There was such incredible beauty to the corruption of the human soul.

Harry slid a glance to where Neville and Pansy, their collaborators, were working on the other half of the scene, and then returned his attention to the snake he was constructing. It was haunting, a nightmare snake. Theo would dream of it again and again.

"Someone in your command was killed," Harry said in an undertone. "You're relatively decorated, which means you must have killed someone, too. Many someones. I assume you had some sort of psychological evaluation afterward that you must have failed, which is why they discharged you instead of sending you back into service." He paused. "I'm guessing you failed it on purpose."
"Interesting take," Theo said, glancing at Pansy. She was saying something in Neville's ear that was giving his hand a slight but noticeable tremor of nerves.

"You know what people want to hear," Harry continued to Theo, and then shook his head, amending his answer. "No, that's not right, that's not it. You know what people don't want to hear. You must have sat there for hours saying everything they didn't want you to say. I wouldn't be surprised if you looked them in the eye while you recited it verbatim. I don't think you'd have had any trouble failing." Harry paused again. "I think you must have stayed awake all night memorizing it, the red flags. The loaded phrases. They wouldn't be difficult to find and I know you know how to research. I think you liked flying," Harry added, "because you thought you were out of reach and out of sight and then you realized that was never true and it broke the latch somewhere, the component they installed in you. All that time they spent teaching you to follow orders, it was like one of those retractable coils, a catch in the mechanism. It worked every time until it misfired."

Theo looked over at Harry's snake, the burst of green light he'd constructed as a backdrop, the work of his imagination. He hadn't just built a battle scene; he'd built a death scene. None of that would be mentioned aloud during the judging period, of course, but it was obvious to Theo. Harry had built the split-second of life just before everything went cavernously dark.

"So what's it like," Theo said casually, "being partnered with a madman?"

"You'll hate to hear this, I'm sure, but your madness is actually very serene," Harry said. "There's clarity to your insanity."

"Clarity?"

"I think you're astoundingly rational for a man out of his wits," Harry confirmed. "Almost clinically so. Your lucidity is what's so unsettling."

"To you?"

"To everyone else."

"And it doesn't upset you?"

"It enrages me," Harry said.

Theo fought a smile. "You're angrier than you think you are, generally speaking."

"I know." Harry looked up. "I didn't say I didn't appreciate you for it, did I?"

Fair point. And for one fair point, another: "You ought to be angrier."

"You think?"

"Your docility is letting people get too comfortable."

"You," Harry posed neutrally. "Are you comfortable?"

"Me? I'm on pins and needles," Theo said. "I'm in a constant state of static shock."

He brushed Harry's fingers with his own, passing the sensation along. The hairs on Harry's forearms lifted from his skin just slightly, the skin pebbling beneath.

"So what are you going to do about it?" Harry asked, which seemed to be either a question or an "Agonize," said Theo.

"Masochist."

It was unclear how serious the conversation was. It had the rhythm of flirtation, percussive and quick, but meaning was another matter. Hour thirteen of a nearly-completed build on the dichotomy of good and evil wasn't exactly the place to theorize about sex.

"As a rule I don't crave blindly," Theo said.

"Meaning what?"

"I accept devotion or nothing."

"You must have very little, then."

"I," Theo confirmed, "have nothing at all."

At one hour remaining, Pansy came over to speak with Theo about combining the two halves of their scene. He noticed she spoke with an affectation, a lilt.

"Researcher to researcher, I respect your work," Theo commented blithely. "What is that, a clean octave above your usual speaking voice? No, don't tell me. I love a mystery."

She glared at him.

"What exactly do you do when you're not using your husband?" Theo pressed her. "Does he just sort of sit in the cupboard next to the Hoover, or...?"

"Well, I'd have gone with yours," she replied with a flick of a glance to Harry, "but even I know when something's too weird."

"Is that an admission? You won't win."

"We'll see."

She flipped her hair and sauntered away, leaving Theo to glance again at Harry.

Too weird. That was an understatement. Harry belonged to a species Theo felt sure he would never encounter again.

"How's it going?" Cho said on the phone. She'd rung Harry's hotel room that afternoon, missing him, so he'd called her back. She chattered for several minutes about this and that, bridesmaids and hen parties. "I miss you," she said with a sigh, and Harry opened his mouth to answer, but Theo interrupted from where he was lying on his bed.

"Tell her how you'll fuck her when you get back," Theo suggested without looking up from the magazine he was reading. "And I don't mean sentimentally. Give the poor girl some filth."

"Harry?" asked Cho uncertainly. "Are you still there?"

"Yes, sorry," Harry said, his hand tightening around the phone as he looked at Theo. "Sorry, Cho, what did you say?"
"I said—"

"Tell her you've no plans to do it slowly," Theo said, flipping a page. "Let's be honest, we're all aware of her suspicions. She thinks it would be lovemaking with you, pure softness."

"Harry?" Cho said again, sounding confused by his inattention. Which made sense, since as far as their past went, she was almost always his entire focus. "Are you still there?"

"Truthfully, I don't think you'd want it soft." Theo paused to glance up at Harry, musing it to himself. "You strike me as just on the manageable side of sadistic, maybe more so if you really gave in. I think you're just as capable of selfishness as anyone, if anything more so. A little darkness," he advised, finishing his thought and returning his attention to his magazine. "Tell her you won't do it quietly, either."

"Harry, if this is a bad time—"

"Cho, just so you know, I'm perfectly capable of fucking you," said Harry into the phone, and Theo looked up, obviously delighted by the unexpected turn of events.

"What?" Cho asked.

"It's more than sex," Harry said. "I've always thought it was, at least. For me it always has been. But if the question has ever been sex," he exhaled, "then the answer is no, it wouldn't be soft, and it wouldn't be selfless. In fact I think it wouldn't be anything like our friendship has been until now."

He heard Cho swallow through the phone. "Harry, I don't think we should—"

But Harry was looking at Theo, who had shifted on the bed to sit upright, waiting. They were positioned symmetrically now, facing each other.

"It would be possessive," Harry explained. "A little toxic, even, and not nearly gentle or tender enough. I would say a lot of things to you that I've never said before. Things I'd like to say with my fingers on your neck."

"Harry," Cho exhaled.

But she didn't tell him to stop.

"I'd want that as well," Harry decided aloud. "I'd want you to say my name. Mine, over and over. I'd want to make demands. I'd want control, I'd want you on your knees, I'd want to choose how and when, how fast. I wouldn't touch you, not the way you wanted me to, until you were begging, because truthfully there is a part of me that wants you to be sorry. I love you, I always have," he said, his hands tightening around the receiver when Theo's lips parted, just slightly, "but I'd fuck you like you owed me every breath of satisfaction that you got."

"Harry," Cho breathed again. "Harry, does Dudley know?"

"Of course he doesn't know. But now you do. So think about it," Harry said.

"I… I don't know what I'm supposed to say, I don't—"

"Think about it," Harry said again.

"But Harry, there's a lot more to it than just us. I… I admit, there might be something between us, but I can't just cancel the wed—"
"No," Harry said, stopping her in her tracks. "No, you misunderstood. It's not going to happen, Cho. I'm never going to touch you. You made your choice. But I do want you to think about it. When you're living your life with my cousin, when he's failing to give you everything I would have offered you gladly, I want you to remember this conversation. I want you to wonder what you gave up."

He slammed the phone down, suddenly breathing hard, and looked up at Theo, who sat motionless on the opposite bed.

"How did that feel?" Theo asked curiously.

Harry could still feel it buzzing around in his veins. Exhilaration. Rage.

"That was really fucked up," he said, a cool breeze from his conscience reminding him why he'd never said any of that before, why he'd kept it to himself. "I… that wasn't okay, she's… I care about her, she's—"

Theo planted his feet on the floor between them and stood. Then he took a step toward Harry, sinking to his knees.

"Tell the truth," Theo said.

Harry stared down at him and Theo stared back, his hands wrapping around Harry's thighs slowly, one singularly manic finger at a time.

"You're like an infestation," Harry said. "You drive the people around you to madness, don't you?"

"Mm." Theo slid his thumbs along Harry's inseam. "One of my talents."

Harry reached a hand out, smoothing his fingers through Theo's hair. It was soft, still growing in from his former buzz cut, and Harry tightened his fingers around the roots, tugging lightly at the back of Theo's head until Theo groaned quietly, the sound almost inaudible against the fabric of Harry's jeans.

"Be honest, you're hard as fuck," said Theo. "You loved it, telling her off. You'd do it again in a heartbeat."

Harry yanked Theo up by his collar, tossing him brusquely onto his back in the opposite bed. Theo said nothing, eyes wide, and one hand rose to curl around the faint evidence of a smile as Harry straddled him slowly.

"Thought you only accepted devotion," Harry said, tracing one thumb over the motion of Theo's throat while he swallowed.

"I'll make an exception."

Harry reached down, palm grazing the stiffened evidence he'd expected to find.

"Maybe you will," Harry said, and leaned closer, turning his head to brush experimentally against the stubble on Theo's cheek. "But I won't let you."

Then Harry rose to his feet and walked into the bathroom, turning the shower on cold.

Maybe it had been the distraction. Maybe it had been the way Theo could no longer concentrate "We're so sorry to say this," Minerva said tearfully on the day of their seventh build, "but Harry and Theo, you're the builders going home this week."

She said something else, many things, something about the story not being clear in their time-turner narrative, the judges' inability to visualize their intent the way they usually could. Pansy pretended to cry. Neville looked genuinely stricken; he had expected to be cut. The other two, the Patil twins, were obviously next on the chopping block. Theo could think of a million reasons their design had been worse; how were they even supposed to put themes like time and love and impossibility into Lego form?

It was Harry who took it stoically, unblinking. He must have known, must have felt it coming. Harry was accustomed to disappointment of this kind, unearned and unjustified, but Theo wasn't. He had prepared for every possible outcome but the one where he let Harry down.

"I don't know what to say," Theo said during their closing interview, staring blankly at the camera. "I don't know what to say."

"Is there anything you'd like to tell us about your time in this competition?" asked the producer. It was the same one who'd told him to go after Harry, which now felt like lifetimes ago.

"We're very grateful for the opportunity to work alongside such talented builders," said Harry graciously. "We wish them the best of luck."

Theo, beside him, fumbled for his mic. He suddenly felt he was being strangled by it, rising to his feet in a fit of discomfort. Something in his mind wasn't working, the mechanism wasn't catching. He could feel the burst, the shift in his narrative, the break. His internal voice wasn't speaking anymore, the train of thought that usually directed him. All he felt was numbness, emptiness, suffocation, the anesthesia of worthlessness that fell around him like a shroud.

He stumbled to his feet, Harry chasing after him as he fled the interview green screen.

"Theo," said Harry, and this time no producers followed them. They were no longer interesting, no longer the subjects in this odd, contained experiment. Theo would not build anything anymore, he couldn't feel his fingers. There had never been a purpose to it, not beyond winning. He hadn't actually projected a time after the competition itself. He couldn't feel his face, couldn't feel it when Harry pinned him to the studio wall. Couldn't feel it when Harry's lips met his. "Theo, Theo, it's not life or death, it's just Lego."

Harry's lips were velvet, passion dripping from the walls like the cool trail of sweat down Theo's spine, impermeable. He could taste Harry's desperation, the hands in his hair, the motion of himself reaching for more until his arms suddenly gave out, falling limp at his sides.

He wanted to go limp, to rag-doll into Harry's arms. But training kept him aloft and he turned away, walking and walking and not stopping until the ringing in his ears rendered him deaf to the sound of Harry's voice, which faded to nothing behind him.

Harry no longer had a phone. What he did have was whatever Theo had unwisely ignited. That fury, whatever it was, that spark. It had lain dormant for years, dying off—or so he thought—with his hope, his longing, but now it was awake, mutinous. He returned to his aunt and uncle's house and took nothing but the old Lego sets, the ones that were Dudley's until Harry made them his. Vernon yelled and so did Aunt Marge, who, again, wasn't even Harry's biological aunt. Which was why he didn't feel particularly sorry when he wordlessly removed the leash from her hand and walked away with her beloved bulldog Ripper.

"Harry," Cho called, catching up to him after he'd walked two blocks in the direction of the nearest train station. "I wish I'd known," she said miserably, her lips finding his through tears. "If I'd known—"

She tasted like salt and disappointment, but only distant traces; it was all substantially less than Theo's kiss, which had been hysterical and overwrought until it had gone flatly catatonic. Harry knew it probably wasn't Cho's fault; that maybe Dudley had given her something she wanted that Harry hadn't offered her at the time, that maybe she'd want something else in the future and it would be someone else and maybe right now that was Harry, but he wasn't the same Harry he'd once been and that was thanks to someone who wasn't her. It wasn't her at all.

"Yeah, well, good luck," he said, disentangling from her. "Though you really ought to marry someone else, for whatever that's worth."

"Harry—"

But he and Ripper kept on walking until he found a phone.

"Hermione," he said when she picked up the phone. "Can you help me find him?"

"Actually, not even Draco's heard from him," she said, sounding apprehensive. "I really thought this would be good for him, but he just… he walked in and then walked out again without saying anything, just grabbing his things and disappearing on foot—"

"I think there's something really wrong with him," Harry said, which was strange, because even as he was saying it, he kept thinking that the only thing wrong with Theo was the rest of the world. He thought about the fact that someone must have noticed that about Theo right away; someone must have felt threatened by it, because they'd gone and put him in a cage. Harry realized that maybe Theo hadn't purposely said the wrong things during his psych evaluation. Maybe he'd just said Theo things, and everyone else was just really fucking wrong about what the right things actually were.

Hermione made fretting noises and then Draco, Theo's friend, got on the line.

"Yeah, I don't know who you are or what the fuck you want," Draco said, "but I've known him my whole life, I know him better than anyone, and I can tell you right now he doesn't want to be followed. Not by me, not by anyone."

Harry glanced down at Ripper, who was actually not so demonic when he wasn't with Aunt Marge.

"No," Harry said.

"What?"

"No."

"No what?"
He shook his head. "You're wrong. Devotion," he explained.

"What?"

"Theo only accepts devotion," Harry said again.

"Jesus, you sound just like him. Look, forget it, I'll take care of it—"

"No," Harry said. "I've got it."

Then he hung up the phone and got on the next train.

Theo's father's house was palatial. There were plenty of rooms for a child, but of course children were not the ideal occupants of a house of this nature, and certainly not a child like Theo. What had been wrong with him then? What was wrong with him now? Nothing, everything, something. It didn't really matter in the end, the difference. He and his Legos would only be underfoot; not that he'd brought any with him.

He felt Harry before he heard him. "Odd place for a nap."

Theo said nothing from where he'd curled lethargically on the floor.

There was a clatter of sound, some footsteps.

"Build something with me," Harry's voice said.

Theo didn't answer.

"Okay, fine," Harry said. "I'll start. You can join me whenever you like."

Theo didn't turn, though he heard the signs of plastic blocks tumbling onto the floor. He listened carefully to the sounds at his back while he kept one eye on the antique mantle clock, wondering how long it would be until Harry gave up. After an hour, nothing.

After two hours, Theo turned slowly onto his other side, observing Harry's build. It was a castle of some kind, which made sense. Harry had a very medieval aesthetic, very fantasy-based. He was constructing some small figurines, tiny suits of armor, which he was placing experimentally along the half-constructed halls.

"What else does a castle need?" Harry asked without looking up, surveying the build and considering how he wanted to line its interiors.

Theo had to swallow before answering. Nobody had spoken to him in days.

"Ghosts," he said.

"A bit gloomy," Harry noted, "but I'll take it."

After five hours Harry had finished the castle's skeleton and made prototypes of the characters filling it. He had selected four different house colors, arranging the figurines into groups.

"Brooms," Theo said.

"Good idea," said Harry.
After Harry had been building for ten hours, Theo suddenly got up and disappeared. Harry stopped, wondering if he should go after him, but instinctively he felt that was an unlikely solution. Draco had been partially right, at least—Theo did not like to be chased. He was the sort of creature who only approached on his terms, when he was ready.

Theo returned twenty minutes later with a tray of assorted teas and baked goods, setting it beside Harry, who paused.

"English Breakfast?"

"Yes, please."

"Cream?"

"A bit."

"Sugar?"

"Sure."

"There should be something odd in the lake. Merpeople. A giant squid."

"Okay."

"Okay."

"Biscuit?"

"Please."

"Why are you here?"

"Because you're here."

"I'm not very good company."

"No, and you're a very sore loser, too."

"Did Pansy and Neville win?"

"Yes, but you were right about one thing."

"What?"

"Neville's gone missing."

"What?"

"Yes, it's the strangest thing but he's gone."

"Fled? Absconded to freedom?"

"Or ingested by Pansy."

"What about you?"

"What about me?"

"You've absconded, in a sense."
"Yes." A pause. "Help me with the astronomy tower, would you?"

"There's an astronomy tower?"

"Of course. Where do you expect them to see the stars?"

"How long are you staying?"

"Well, it's not my house and I've not been officially invited, so I suppose until this castle's finished."

"And then?"

"And then I'll come back with another build."

"What is this supposed to be, an intervention?"

The opposite, if that were possible. "Build the tower, Theo."

Theo looked up, appearing to spot for the first time the extremely fat bulldog who was sleeping in one of the room's panels of sun.

"What's that?"

"A dog."

"Has it been here the whole time?"

"He's wandered in and out."

"What's his name?"

"Theodore."

"Is not."

"You're right, it isn't. It's Ripper."

"Uncreative."

"I didn't name him."

"Did you steal him?"

"Yes."

"Did you really?"

"Yes."

"Are you lying to me?"

"Theo," said Harry, pausing his motions to look over at him. "Build the tower so we can do other things."

He saw the vestiges of a familiar recklessness crossing the planes of Theo's face.
"I'd like to taste you properly," Theo admitted. "This time."

"You will. And the next time as well. And the next."

"Hm. Is that devotion I hear?"

Harry watched Theo reach out for one of the tower bricks, cradling it gently in his palm.

"Yes," Harry said.

They took breaks from building only to walk the dog in the gardens, eat, or doze off on the floor. Theo had the sense Harry was watching him, measuring his progress. The more they created, the more Theo returned to himself, slowly, gradually. They built a secret room into the castle and then Theo got to work on a nearby village while Harry designed the lake.

And then at some point after days and days of building, they stopped.

They weren't normal people and so there was no normality here, nothing recognizable. Theo had never crawled on his hands and knees like this before, their eyes meeting over the build that had taken over the room. He had never acquiesced like this, lying on his back when Harry told him to, closing his eyes and letting someone else's touch take over.

"Tell me what you want," said Harry.

"Are you ordering me to give orders?"

"Yes." Harry's calloused fingers dragged along the inseam of Theo's calf. "Tell me."

"Touch me."

"And?"

"Fuck me."

"And?"

Theo exhaled, Harry's breath perilously close to the zipper on his trousers.

"Love me," he said.

Harry dragged himself upright until he was stretched out next to Theo on his side, one hand reaching over to slowly undo the buttons on Theo's shirt. Harry's fingers traveled over the skin beneath the fabric, torturous. There was nothing economical about his touch. He wasted it, lavished it, until Theo was distorted and emaciated for the ecstasy, an eternal want of more.

"Which version of you do you want me to love?" Harry asked neutrally, and Theo's exhale was a slow, shuddering breath that rattled his insides, scrambling his thoughts.

"Which one do you want?"

"All of them. All of them or nothing."

"None of them scare you?"

"All of them scare me." Harry's lips were acid with lemon, bitter with oversteeped forgotten tea.
His voice was jagged-edged, broken, and Theo was moving beneath his hands, communicating his distress with the motion of his hips, the curl of his toes. "Makes me feel alive."

They kissed infinitely. All kisses were conversations and theirs was an argument, no resolution, winner-take-all, until it dissolved into the murky, unintelligible markers of escalation, agitation and panting breaths.

"You're going to have some rules from now on," Harry said with his teeth gritted beside Theo's ear. "You'll not walk away from me again. You'll eat, you'll sleep, you'll create things and not destroy them, and that includes yourself. Are we clear?"

Theo had a feeling Harry had found a purpose in life.

"Yes," he said, and let Harry make him over from scratch, building him up again from nothing.

Several months after Theo ceased his hazardous occupation of Malfoy Manor but one or two weeks before the competition actually aired, Draco looked up from his reading to find that his prodigal friend had returned, the leather leash of a magnanimously sized bulldog looped casually around his arm.

"Where've you been?" asked Draco guardedly, followed by, "Please don't damage any further upholstery."

"Well, primarily I've taken a lover," Theo replied, "but I should think you know perfectly well I've never harmed an innocent textile in my life."

"A lover," Draco echoed. "Surely you don't mean that very strange friend of my wife's?"

"He's quite a dextrous academic," Theo said. "Currently at work on a very impressive book about the philosophy of magic. Or at least an impressively lengthy one."

"Magic," Draco echoed again, "meaning the thing that doesn't exist?"

"Doubtless you're aware of this, Draco, but the frailty of your imagination has always disappointed me," Theo said. "Which is why I've gone ahead and directed my attention elsewhere."

"Can you do nothing without overdoing it?" sighed Draco. "Other people manage to have relationships without acquiring their partners as pets."

"I've heard that," acknowledged Theo. "But in any case, I thought you ought to know. I'm aware how matronly you get when you've grown concerned for my well-being."

"False," said Draco, who had hired a private investigator several weeks to find out precisely what Theo had just told him. "The possibility of your demise delights me, as ever."

"As it should," Theo assured him. "But in any case, do thank Hermione for me."

"You say that as if you have grand plans to disappear somewhere."

"I do, mightily grand ones," said Theo, glancing down at the dog. "Sit if you like."

The dog looked doubtfully upward.

"It's entirely your choice," added Theo.
"That's not how dog training works," Draco said.

The dog sat.

"Well, shows what you know," Theo replied. "In any case, I'm thinking Cornwall will be the place, should you need to reach me. Harry's very partial to open sky."

"I'm fairly confident I won't have any reason to seek you out," said Draco, though of course he would very soon become a religious viewer of the Lego show, and would also write a very strongly worded letter following Theo and Harry's unjust elimination that would involve several deeply litigious threats of judicial incompetence and a scathing public review, ultimately resulting in the show's cancelation. After all, even a cursory reminder of the Malfoy name in the context of immense displeasure was enough to bring things crashing down.

"I'll miss you too," Theo said.

"Get out of my house."

"No need to be so sentimental, Malfoy. You're about as subtle as a brick through a window."

"Goodbye."

"Say goodbye to Draco," Theo said to the dog, whose tongue lolled lethargically from the side of its pronounced underbite. "Well, that's your choice." He straightened and slid on his sunglasses, giving Draco something of a mutinous salute. "Until next time."

And with that he was gone, the sanity in the room finally returning to normal.

Chapter End Notes

Uhhhh so some things: 1) I know it's LEGO and not Lego but nobody has time for that. 2) Yes I've been watching the show Legomasters. I'm furious with it. There's nothing for my creative process like rage. 3) I hope you're all doing well and I'm sorry everything I ever write for this pairing involves such lengthy contemplation of mortality. It's their brand, I'm afraid. 4) Lastly and most importantly: this is for you, ellejb, on the occasion of your betrothal.
